Connections: *The acrostic structure continues from Psalm 9 (lamed through tav). The portrait of the wicked in verses 2-11 anticipates similar descriptions in Psalms 12, 14, 36, and 73. The cry 'Why do You stand far off?' echoes similar complaints in Psalms 22:2, 44:24-25, and 88:15. The petition qumah YHWH ('arise, O LORD') in verse 12 echoes Psalms 3:8, 7:7, and 9:20. The defense of the orphan and the oppressed connects to Deuteronomy 10:18 and Isaiah 1:17.*

¹Why, O LORD, do You stand far off?

Why do You hide in times of distress?

²In arrogance the wicked hotly pursue the poor;
let them be caught in the schemes they have devised.

³For the wicked boasts of his soul's desire;
the greedy person blesses himself and despises the LORD.

⁴The wicked, in the height of his arrogance, does not seek God.
"There is no God" — that is all his scheming.

⁵His ways prosper at all times;
Your judgments are far above, out of his sight.
All his enemies — he sneers at them.

⁶He says in his heart, "I will not be shaken; generation after generation, no harm will touch me."

⁷His mouth is full of cursing, deceit, and oppression;
under his tongue lurk trouble and evil.

⁸He sits in ambush near the villages;
in hidden places he murders the innocent.
His eyes watch for the helpless.

⁹He lurks in hiding like a lion in its thicket;
he lurks to seize the poor.
He seizes the poor, dragging them into his net.

¹⁰He crushes and crouches, and the helpless fall into his clutches.

¹¹He says in his heart, "God has forgotten;
He has hidden His face; He will never see."

¹²Rise up, O LORD! O God, lift up Your hand!
Do not forget the afflicted!

¹³Why does the wicked despise God?
He says in his heart, "You will not call me to account."

¹⁴But You do see! You observe trouble and grief to take the matter into Your own hand.
The helpless entrust themselves to You;
You are the helper of the orphan.

¹⁵Break the arm of the wicked and the evildoer;
search out his wickedness until none remains.

¹⁶The LORD is king forever and ever;
the nations have perished from His land.

¹⁷O LORD, You have heard the desire of the afflicted;
You steady their hearts;
You incline Your ear,

¹⁸to defend the orphan and the crushed, so that mere mortals from the earth may terrify no more.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The question 'why do You stand far off?' is not apostasy but the deepest form of faith — it addresses God directly, assumes God has the power to act, and demands an account of God's apparent inactivity. Only a believer complains to God about God. The atheist has no one to accuse. The lament psalms insist that honest accusation is a legitimate form of prayer.
2. The word ani ('poor, afflicted') appears repeatedly in this psalm and throughout the Psalter. It does not describe only economic poverty but a condition of vulnerability — the person without resources, without power, without advocates. The wicked exploit precisely this vulnerability; God defends precisely this vulnerability.
3. The verb ni'ets ('to despise, to scorn, to treat with contempt') is among the strongest rejection verbs in Hebrew. It describes not passive indifference to God but active disdain — the greedy person has weighed God against profit and found God wanting. This is practical atheism expressed through economic behavior.

4. The phrase ein Elohim ('there is no God') appears also in Psalm 14:1 and Psalm 53:2, where it is placed in the mouth of the naval ('fool'). The denial is not intellectual but behavioral — the wicked person's life functions as a continuous declaration that God is irrelevant. Every scheme that excludes God is a repetition of ein Elohim.
5. The observation that the wicked prosper 'at all times' creates the theological problem that drives many psalms (especially Psalm 73): if God is just, why do the wicked succeed? Psalm 10 does not resolve this tension — it describes it honestly and then appeals to God to act. The honesty about wicked prosperity is itself a form of faith: the psalmist tells God the truth about what he sees.
6. The phrase le-dor va-dor ('generation after generation') is normally used in the Psalter for God's faithfulness (Psalm 100:5, 'His faithfulness endures to all generations'). The wicked person here co-opts the language of divine permanence for himself — he claims for his own comfort what belongs only to God's character. This is the deepest form of idolatry: treating oneself as eternal.
7. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 3:14 as part of his argument for universal human sinfulness. The image of speech as weaponry — mouth full of cursing, tongue concealing evil — reflects the Psalter's deep awareness that language is the primary instrument of both worship and harm. The same tongue that praises God can destroy neighbors.
8. The ambush imagery shifts the wicked person from economic predator (vv. 3-6) to physical predator (vv. 8-10). The progression mirrors the escalation of evil: unchecked greed leads to contempt for God, which leads to violence against the vulnerable. The psalm traces the entire trajectory from arrogance to murder.
9. The double ambush language (ye'erov... ye'erov) creates a sense of relentless, patient stalking. The wicked person does not attack in passion but in strategy — he waits, observes, selects, and then strikes. The poor are not random victims but targeted prey, chosen for their vulnerability.
10. The complete portrait (vv. 2-10) traces a coherent psychology of wickedness: arrogance breeds contempt for God, which breeds contempt for people, which breeds predatory violence. The psalm insists that these are not separate sins but a single trajectory — each step follows logically from the previous one.
11. The irony is devastating: the wicked person says 'God will never see' in a psalm where God is called upon to see everything. The psalmist and the wicked person look at the same evidence — God's apparent inaction — and reach opposite conclusions. The psalmist says 'Why are You hiding? Act!' The wicked says 'God doesn't see. I'm free.' Same observation, opposite faith.
12. The petition 'do not forget the afflicted' (al tishkach anavim) is the psalm's theological hinge. Psalm 9:13 declared that God 'does not forget the cry of the afflicted.' Psalm 10:11 quoted the wicked's claim that 'God has forgotten.' Psalm 10:12 now asks God to prove the wicked wrong by remembering. The three uses of shakhach across the two psalms form a theological argument: God's character (He does not forget) versus the wicked's delusion (God has forgotten) versus the psalmist's prayer (do not forget).
13. The psalmist's strategy here is theologically brilliant: by quoting the wicked person's contempt directly to God, he turns the wicked person's arrogance into a provocation of God's honor. If God does not act, the wicked person's claim — 'You will not investigate' — becomes true. The psalmist is effectively saying: Your reputation is at stake.
14. The orphan (yatom) appears throughout the Hebrew Bible as the test case for justice. A society's treatment of orphans reveals its moral character. God's self-identification as 'helper of the orphan' (ozer yatom) establishes a divine priority: those without human protectors have a divine one. Deuteronomy 10:18 says God 'executes justice for the orphan and the widow.' Psalm 68:6 calls God 'father of the fatherless.'
15. The prayer to 'break the arm' of the wicked is not vindictive cruelty but a petition for the removal of oppressive power. The arm is the instrument of violence; breaking it ends the violence. The psalmist does not ask for the wicked person's torture but for the termination of his capacity to harm.
16. The declaration YHWH melekh ('the LORD is king') anticipates the great enthronement psalms (93, 95-99). It is the Psalter's foundational political theology: all earthly power is subordinate to divine sovereignty. The nations may rage (Psalm 2), the wicked may prosper (Psalm 10), but the LORD remains king. This confession is the Psalter's answer to every form of injustice.
17. The phrase takhin libbam ('You steady their hearts') reveals something important about God's care for the afflicted: it is not only external deliverance but internal strengthening. God does not merely rescue the vulnerable from their circumstances but fortifies their inner lives. The heart (lev) that has been shaken by oppression is made firm (kun) by God.
18. The final line — 'so that mere mortals from the earth may terrify no more' — is the Psalter's most concentrated statement against human tyranny. The tyrant is reduced to his essential identity: enosh min ha-arets ('a mortal from the earth, a creature of dust'). When God arises to defend the orphan and the crushed, the pretension of human power is exposed as the fraud it always was. The oppressor who claimed God would never see is himself seen, judged, and stripped of his ability to terrorize.

Summary: A psalm of David expressing defiant trust in the LORD when counseled to flee. The psalmist refuses escape, grounding his confidence in the LORD's heavenly throne and his examination of the righteous and the wicked. The psalm moves from the temptation to run to the certainty of divine justice, ending with the vision of the upright beholding God's face.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm opens with a quotation from fearful advisors — 'Flee to your mountain like a bird' — and then spends the rest of its brief length demolishing the premise behind their advice. The logic is architectural: the LORD is in his holy temple, the LORD's throne is in heaven, therefore the foundations have not been destroyed no matter what the wicked do. The final line — 'the upright will behold his face' — uses the language of temple access and royal audience. To see the face of the king was the highest privilege in the ancient Near East. The psalm promises that the righteous will receive what was denied even to Moses (Exodus 33:20): the direct vision of God.

Translation Friction: Verse 3 — 'When the foundations are destroyed, what can the righteous do?' — is ambiguous. It may still be part of the advisors' fearful counsel, or it may be the psalmist's own rhetorical question. The Hebrew ki ('when, if, because') leaves the relationship between verses 2-3 deliberately open. The 'foundations' (shatot) likely refer to the foundations of social and moral order, not literal architecture. The word appears only here and in Psalm 82:5, where it describes the cosmic foundations shaking when justice fails.

Connections: The imagery of the LORD testing from his temple connects to Habakkuk 2:20 ('The LORD is in his holy temple; let all the earth keep silence'). The fire and brimstone judgment on the wicked (v. 6) echoes the destruction of Sodom in Genesis 19:24. The concept of beholding God's face reappears in Psalm 17:15, which closes with almost identical language. The bird-flight metaphor recurs in Psalm 55:6-8, where David wishes for wings to fly away — a wish this psalm refuses.

- ¹For the choirmaster. Of David.
In the LORD I have taken refuge.
How can you say to my soul,
'Flee to your mountain like a bird'?
- ²For look — the wicked bend the bow, they fit their arrow to the string to shoot from the shadows at the upright in heart.
- ³When the foundations are torn down,
what can the righteous do?
- ⁴The LORD is in his holy temple;
the LORD — his throne is in heaven.
His eyes observe,
his eyelids examine the children of humanity.
- ⁵The LORD examines the righteous, but the wicked and the lover of violence his soul hates.
- ⁶He rains down on the wicked burning coals, fire and sulfur;
a scorching wind is the portion of their cup.

7For the LORD is righteous — he loves righteous deeds.
The upright will behold his face.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. lamnatseach is traditionally rendered 'To the chief musician' (KJV) but more likely means 'for the choirmaster' or 'for the musical director,' indicating the psalm was assigned to the temple music leader for liturgical performance.
1. The verb chasah ('to take refuge') is distinct from batach ('to trust'). It implies active movement toward shelter — not passive confidence but deliberate flight to God rather than to the mountains. The wordplay is intentional: the advisors say 'flee' (nudi), but the psalmist has already fled — to the LORD.
2. The phrase be-mo ofel ('in/from darkness') indicates covert attack — the wicked operate in concealment, ambushing those who live openly. The 'upright in heart' (yishrei lev) describes people whose inner disposition is straight and honest, making them vulnerable to those who operate by deception.
2. This verse may still be part of the advisors' speech — they describe the danger to justify their counsel to flee. The ki hinneh ('for look!') adds urgency to their warning.
3. The word shatot ('foundations') occurs only here and in Psalm 82:5 in the entire Hebrew Bible. In Psalm 82 the foundations of the earth totter because divine judges have failed to do justice. The same concept applies here: when the structures that uphold justice collapse, the righteous seem powerless.
3. Some interpreters read this verse as still quoting the advisors (making vv. 1c-3 a single quotation). Others see it as the psalmist's own question, answered by vv. 4-7. The ambiguity may be intentional.
4. The word af'appayim ('eyelids') is unusual in describing divine sight. It may suggest the narrowing of eyes in intense scrutiny, or it may be a poetic parallel for 'eyes' without additional meaning. The image is anthropomorphic but functions to convey the thoroughness of divine observation.
4. heikhal can mean both 'temple' and 'palace' — the ambiguity is productive, since the LORD's temple is also his throne room. The heavenly temple and the earthly sanctuary are linked in Israelite theology.
5. The phrase sane'ah nafsho ('his soul hates') is among the strongest expressions of divine disapproval in the Psalter. nefesh here means the essential self, the core of God's being. This is not casual dislike but visceral rejection.
5. chamas ('violence') is the same word used in Genesis 6:11 to describe the corruption that provoked the flood. It denotes not merely physical force but the violation of social bonds, the breakdown of trust between human beings.
6. pachim is difficult. It may mean 'snares, traps' (from pach) or 'burning coals' (from pecham). The context of fire and sulfur favors 'burning coals,' but the ambiguity may be intentional — the wicked are both trapped and burned.
6. The 'cup' (kos) as a metaphor for divine judgment appears in Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15, and Psalm 75:8. It conveys inevitability: you must drink what is poured for you.
7. The final line is grammatically ambiguous: fanemo could mean 'his face' (God's face that the upright behold) or 'their face' (God beholds the face of the upright). Most Hebrew scholars read it as 'his face' — the upright will see God. This reading provides the climactic reversal: the psalm began with the temptation to flee God's world, and it ends with the promise of seeing God's face.
7. The shift from God examining humanity (v. 4) to humanity beholding God (v. 7) creates a reciprocal gaze — God sees us, and we will see God. This mutual vision is the psalm's definition of the covenant relationship.

Summary: A psalm of David lamenting the disappearance of the faithful and the dominance of flattering, deceitful speech. The psalmist cries out for God to act against those who use smooth lips and a double heart. At the center stands a divine oracle: the LORD himself speaks, promising to rise and protect the poor. The psalm then contrasts human words — false, silver-tongued, manipulative — with the words of the LORD, which are pure silver refined seven times.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is structured around the opposition between two kinds of speech. Human speech in the first half is characterized by duplicity: smooth lips (sifatei chalaqot) and a double heart (lev va-lev, literally 'a heart and a heart'). The wicked speak with two hearts — one visible, one hidden. Against this verbal corruption, the psalm places the words of the LORD (imrot YHVH), which are pure (tehorot), refined like silver smelted seven times. The number seven signals complete purification: God's words contain no alloy, no hidden agenda, no double meaning. The psalm is essentially a meditation on the trustworthiness of language itself — and concludes that only divine speech can be trusted without reservation.

Translation Friction: Verse 7 in the Hebrew (v. 6 in some English translations) contains the divine oracle — 'Now I will arise, says the LORD' — which interrupts the psalm with God's own voice. This is unusual in the Psalter; most psalms address God or speak about God, but here God speaks directly within the poem. The shift is jarring and powerful. The placement of the oracle at the psalm's center suggests that divine speech is the hinge on which the entire structure turns. Some scholars see this as a prophetic oracle delivered in the temple liturgy, with a priest or prophet speaking God's words during worship.

Connections: The 'pure words' metaphor (v. 7) connects to Proverbs 30:5 ('Every word of God is refined') and Psalm 119:140 ('Your word is very pure'). The imagery of silver refined seven times appears nowhere else in Scripture, making it a unique intensification. The lament over the disappearance of the faithful (chasid) echoes Micah 7:2 ('The faithful have perished from the earth'). The promise that the LORD will arise (aqum) uses the same verb as the ark procession formula in Numbers 10:35 ('Arise, O LORD').

¹For the choirmaster. On the sheminith. A psalm of David.
²Save us, LORD, for the faithful are gone!
 The trustworthy have vanished from among the children of humanity.
³They speak emptiness to one another,
 with smooth lips and a double heart they speak.
⁴May the LORD cut off all smooth lips, the tongue that speaks boastfully — ⁵those who say, 'With our tongue we will prevail!
 Our lips are with us —
 who is master over us?'
⁶'Because the poor are plundered, because the needy groan,
 now I will arise,' declares the LORD.
 'I will place him in the safety he longs for.'
⁷The words of the LORD are pure words, like silver refined in a furnace on the ground, purified seven times.
⁸You, LORD, will guard them;
 you will protect us from this generation forever.
⁹The wicked prowl on every side when worthlessness is exalted among the children of humanity.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. sheminith means 'the eighth' and likely refers to a musical mode, tuning, or an eight-stringed instrument. The exact meaning is lost. Some suggest it indicates a lower octave or bass register, which would suit the somber tone of this lament.
2. chasid ('the faithful one') derives from chesed and describes a person who practices covenant loyalty. It is the human counterpart to God's own chesed. When the chasid disappears, the covenant community loses its essential character.

3. The phrase lev va-lev ('a heart and a heart') is one of the most concise descriptions of hypocrisy in the Hebrew Bible. It does not mean indecision (as in James 1:8, 'double-minded') but active duplicity — maintaining two simultaneous intentions, one public and one private.
4. The verb yakhret ('may he cut off') carries covenantal overtones — karat is the verb used for both making and breaking covenants. To be 'cut off' is to be severed from the community and from God's protection. The smooth lips and boastful tongue will be surgically removed from the body politic.
5. The boast mi adon lanu ('who is lord over us?') echoes the primal human impulse toward autonomy. It is not atheism — it is practical lordlessness, the refusal to acknowledge any authority that constrains speech or action.
6. This is one of the rare places in the Psalter where God speaks directly in the first person within a psalm. The oracle format — 'says the LORD' (yomar YHVH) — is typically prophetic, suggesting this psalm may have been performed with a priestly or prophetic voice delivering God's words in the liturgy.
6. The final phrase yapiyach lo is difficult. It may mean 'he pants for it' (the poor man longs for safety) or 'he [the oppressor] puffs at him' (the enemy sneers). We follow the reading that emphasizes the longing of the afflicted.
7. The phrase ba-alil la-arets is notoriously difficult. alil may mean 'crucible' or 'furnace,' and la-arets may mean 'on the ground' (describing the location of the smelting operation) or may modify the refining process. The overall sense is clear even if the details are debated: God's words undergo the most thorough purification imaginable.
8. The shift from 'them' (tishmerem) to 'us' (titserenu, though some read 'him') reflects the movement from the general promise to personal application. The 'generation' (dor) here means the current corrupt generation described in vv. 2-5 — the generation of smooth lips and double hearts.
9. The final verse is one of the most debated in the Psalter. ke-rum zullut could mean 'when vileness is exalted' or 'according to the exaltation of worthlessness.' The overall sense is that a society that elevates what is base creates conditions for the wicked to flourish. The psalm refuses to end with easy resolution — it acknowledges ongoing tension between God's promise and present reality.

Summary: One of the purest lament psalms in the Psalter — six verses that move through three distinct emotional stages with architectural precision. The psalmist asks 'How long?' four times (vv. 2-3), pleads for God to look and answer (vv. 4-5), then erupts into trust and praise (v. 6). The entire emotional arc of the lament genre — distress, petition, confidence — is compressed into the smallest possible space.

What Makes This Remarkable: The fourfold 'How long?' (ad anah) in verses 2-3 is one of the most imitated structures in the history of prayer. Each question targets a different dimension of suffering: How long will you forget me? (divine absence), How long will you hide your face? (divine concealment), How long must I wrestle with my thoughts? (internal anguish), How long will my enemy triumph? (external threat). The questions spiral from God to self to enemy, mapping the complete landscape of despair. Then — without any reported answer from God, without any change in circumstances — the psalm pivots to trust in verse 6. This pivot is the mystery at the heart of biblical lament: the act of crying out to God is itself the bridge from despair to praise. Nothing changes except the direction of the psalmist's gaze.

Translation Friction: The transition from verse 5 ('lest my enemy say, I have prevailed') to verse 6 ('But I trust in your faithful love') is one of the sharpest turns in the Psalter. There is no intervening oracle, no divine response, no change in situation. Some scholars attribute this to a liturgical pause — perhaps a priest spoke an oracle of assurance between verses 5 and 6 that the text does not record. Others see it as the essential structure of faith: lament that is directed toward God already contains the seeds of trust, because the act of addressing God presupposes his existence, his power, and his willingness to hear.

Connections: *The fourfold 'How long?' echoes Habakkuk 1:2 and Revelation 6:10, forming a thread that runs from the Psalms through the prophets to the apocalypse. The final verse's movement from trust (batachti) to rejoicing (yagel libbi) to singing (ashirah) anticipates the full trajectory of Psalm 30, which moves from mourning to dancing. The phrase 'he has dealt generously with me' (gamal alay) will reappear in Psalm 116:7, connecting this brief lament to the great thanksgiving psalms.*

‡For the choirmaster. A psalm of David.

²How long, LORD? Will you forget me forever?
How long will you hide your face from me?

³How long must I wrestle with my thoughts, with grief in my heart day after day?
How long will my enemy be exalted over me?

⁴Look at me! Answer me, LORD my God!
Give light to my eyes,
or I will sleep the sleep of death.

⁵Do not let my enemy say, 'I have prevailed over him!'
Do not let my foes rejoice when I stumble.

⁶But I have trusted in your faithful love;
my heart will rejoice in your salvation.
I will sing to the LORD,
for he has dealt generously with me.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription is minimal — no musical or situational notation beyond the standard attribution to David and the choirmaster. The simplicity of the heading matches the compressed intensity of the psalm itself.
2. The phrase hester panim ('hiding of the face') is a technical theological concept. When God turns his face toward someone, it means blessing and life (Numbers 6:25). When he hides his face, it means exposure to chaos and death. The psalmist is asking: have you turned away permanently?
3. The fourfold repetition of ad anah creates a hammering rhythm in Hebrew that formal English translation struggles to reproduce. The questions are not rhetorical — they demand an answer. Their repetition is itself a form of prayer: the persistence of the question is the persistence of faith.
4. The title 'LORD my God' (YHVH Elohai) is significant — in the midst of feeling abandoned, the psalmist still claims God as his own. The possessive 'my' is an act of faith embedded in the petition. He addresses the God who seems absent as 'my God.'
5. The psalmist appeals to God's honor: if the enemy prevails, it reflects not only on the psalmist but on the God who was supposed to protect him. This appeal to divine reputation is a common strategy in biblical lament — Moses uses it in Numbers 14:13-16, arguing that the nations will interpret Israel's destruction as God's inability to save.
6. The movement from lament (vv. 2-3) through petition (vv. 4-5) to praise (v. 6) is the classic three-part structure of the biblical lament. What makes Psalm 13 remarkable is that this entire arc occurs in six verses. The compression intensifies every transition.
6. The verb gamal ('to deal with, to repay, to wean') implies completion — God has brought something to its full development. The psalmist trusts that God's dealing with him will end in generosity, not abandonment.

Summary: A wisdom psalm that begins with the fool's declaration — "There is no God" — and then surveys the resulting moral catastrophe. The LORD looks down from heaven to see if anyone acts wisely, and the verdict is universal: all have turned aside, all are corrupt, no one does good. The psalm names the wicked as those who 'devour my people like bread' and who shame the counsel of the poor. It ends with a longing cry for salvation to come from Zion.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The fool's statement — 'there is no God' (ein Elohim) — is not philosophical atheism in the modern sense. The fool ('fool') is not making a metaphysical argument but a practical one: God is not present, God does not see, God will not act. This is functional atheism — living as though God's moral governance does not apply. The psalm's response is to describe God doing exactly what the fool denies: looking down (hishqif), observing (lir'ot), examining whether anyone seeks God (doresh et Elohim). The irony is precise: the fool says God is absent, and at that very moment God is watching the fool. The universal verdict — 'all have turned aside, together they are corrupt'*

Translation Friction: Verse 4 suddenly narrows from universal corruption to a specific accusation: 'those who devour my people as they eat bread.' The shift from 'all have turned aside' to 'those who devour my people' introduces a distinction the psalm seemed to deny — if all are corrupt, who are 'my people' being devoured? The phrase ammi ('my people') likely represents God's voice (as in a prophetic oracle) or the psalmist speaking as God's representative. The tension between universal corruption and the existence of an identifiable righteous remnant (the poor in v. 6, the generation of the righteous in v. 5) runs through the entire psalm without resolution.

Connections: Psalm 53 is a near-duplicate of Psalm 14 with minor variations, including the substitution of Elohim for YHVH — evidence that the psalm circulated in two traditions. Paul's quotation in Romans 3:10-18 draws from the Greek Septuagint version, which expands the indictment significantly. The phrase 'salvation out of Zion' (yeshu'at Yisrael mi-Tsiyyon) connects to Psalm 53:6, Isaiah 59:20 ('A redeemer will come to Zion'), and Romans 11:26. The image of God looking down from heaven appears also in Psalm 33:13-14 and Genesis 11:5 (the Tower of Babel).

¹For the choirmaster. Of David.

The fool says in his heart, 'There is no God.'

They are corrupt; their deeds are vile.

There is no one who does good.

²The LORD looks down from heaven on the children of humanity to see if there is anyone who acts wisely,

anyone who seeks God.

³All have turned aside; together they have become corrupt.

There is no one who does good —

not even one.

⁴Do they not know, all these workers of evil —

those who devour my people as they eat bread, who do not call on the LORD?

⁵There they are — utterly terrified!

For God is with the generation of the righteous.

⁶You would shame the plans of the poor,

but the LORD is their refuge.

⁷Oh, that salvation for Israel would come from Zion!

When the LORD restores the fortunes of his people,

Jacob will rejoice; Israel will be glad.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. naval does not mean 'fool' in the sense of intellectual deficiency. It describes a person who is morally senseless — who refuses to reckon with reality as it actually is. Nabal in 1 Samuel 25 is the narrative embodiment of this concept: a wealthy man who acts as though generosity and justice do not apply to him.
1. The plural 'they are corrupt' follows the singular 'the fool says' — the psalm moves from one fool's inner conviction to its social consequences. One person's functional atheism becomes a civilization's moral collapse.

2. The verb darash ('to seek, inquire, investigate') implies effort and intentionality. Seeking God is not passive — it requires turning one's attention, inquiry, and desire toward God. The absence of seekers is as damning as the absence of doers.
3. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 3:12, using it to establish universal human sinfulness before introducing justification by faith. In its original context, the psalm's universal indictment exists in tension with the 'generation of the righteous' mentioned in verse 5 — the psalm seems to both deny and assume the existence of a faithful remnant.
4. The transition from 'all have turned aside' (universal) to 'those who devour my people' (specific) implies a distinction within the universal corruption. The 'my people' language suggests a prophetic voice — God speaking through the psalmist about those who prey on the poor and faithful.
5. The phrase dor tsaddiq ('generation of the righteous') introduces a category that seems to contradict the universal corruption of verse 3. This tension is not resolved within the psalm — it reflects the biblical pattern of universal judgment coexisting with a faithful remnant.
6. The shift to second person ('you would shame') makes the accusation direct and personal. The 'counsel' or 'plan' (etsah) of the poor likely refers to their trust in God — the wicked mock the poor for relying on a God who seems absent. The psalm's reply: the LORD is machsheh ('his refuge') — the same shelter-language used in Psalm 11:1.
7. The phrase shuv shevut (or shivat) is debated: does it mean 'restore fortunes' (from shuv, 'to return') or 'return captivity' (from shavah, 'to take captive')? Both meanings work theologically — God either restores what was lost or brings back those who were taken away. The broader sense of total restoration is likely intended.

Summary: An entrance liturgy that asks and answers the question: Who may dwell in God's presence? The psalm opens with a question addressed to the LORD — who may sojourn in your tent, who may dwell on your holy mountain? — and then provides a ten-part ethical profile of the person qualified for divine access. The answer is entirely moral, not ritual: the one who walks with integrity, speaks truth, refuses slander, keeps oaths even at personal cost, and does not exploit the vulnerable through usury or bribery.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's answer to 'Who may approach God?' contains no mention of sacrifice, no ritual requirement, no priestly qualification. The entrance requirements are entirely ethical. This is striking in a temple context, where one might expect purity laws or sacrificial prerequisites. Instead, the psalm describes a person characterized by integrity of conduct, truthful speech, loyal relationships, and economic justice. The structure — question (v. 1), ethical catalog (vv. 2-5b), promise (v. 5c) — mirrors the entrance liturgy format found also in Psalm 24:3-6 and Isaiah 33:14-16. The ten ethical qualities may intentionally echo the Ten Commandments, creating an 'entrance decalogue' for the sanctuary.

Translation Friction: *The prohibition against lending at interest (neshekh, v. 5) reflects the Torah's economic legislation in Exodus 22:25 and Leviticus 25:36-37, which forbade interest on loans to fellow Israelites (especially the poor). This was not a prohibition on all commerce but a protection against the exploitation of the vulnerable. In an agrarian economy, interest-bearing loans to the poor were a mechanism of dispossession — they transferred land and labor from the desperate to the wealthy. The psalm treats this economic practice as a disqualification from God's presence, placing it alongside bribery and slander as barriers to worship.*

Connections: *Psalm 24:3-6 asks the same entrance question and provides a parallel answer focused on clean hands and pure heart. Isaiah 33:14-16 adapts the form for a prophetic context. Ezekiel 18:5-9 expands the ethical catalog into a legal case study. The 'tent' (ohel) and 'holy mountain' (har qodesh) of verse 1 link to the wilderness tabernacle and to Mount Zion — God's portable and permanent dwellings respectively. The promise of the final line — 'the one who does these things will never be shaken' — uses the same verb (mot) that appears in Psalm 16:8, connecting the two psalms thematically.*

¹A psalm of David.

LORD, who may sojourn in your tent?

Who may dwell on your holy mountain?

²The one who walks with integrity, who practices righteousness,
and speaks truth in their heart.

³They do not slander with their tongue, do no evil to their neighbor, and bring no reproach against their close companion.

⁴In their eyes the reprobate is despised,
but they honor those who fear the LORD.
They swear to their own harm and do not go back on their word.

⁵They do not lend their money at interest, nor accept a bribe against the innocent.
Whoever does these things will never be shaken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'tent' (ohel) recalls the wilderness tabernacle — God's portable dwelling among his people during the exodus. The 'holy mountain' (har qodesh) is Zion, where the temple stands. Together they span Israel's entire history of divine presence: the wandering tent and the settled mountain.
2. tamim ('integrity, wholeness') is the same word used to describe Noah (Genesis 6:9) and the sacrificial animal without blemish (Leviticus 1:3). The word connects moral integrity to ritual completeness — a life without hidden defect, like an offering without flaw.
3. The verb ragal ('to go about, to spy, to slander') literally means 'to foot it' — to go around peddling harmful speech about others. The three negatives in this verse define the ethical person by what they refuse to do: no malicious speech, no harmful action, no shaming of those close to them. The word qarov ('near one, close companion') intensifies the requirement — it is especially those nearest to us whom we must protect from reproach.
4. The phrase nishba le-hara ve-lo yamir ('swears to his own harm and does not change') is one of the most ethically demanding statements in the Psalter. It describes a person for whom their word is more valuable than their comfort, wealth, or advantage. The verb yamir (from mur, 'to change, exchange') means they will not swap out their commitment for a more convenient one.
5. neshekh ('interest, usury') literally means 'a bite' — the image is of money that bites back, consuming the borrower. In the ancient world, interest-bearing loans to the poor were instruments of dispossession. The prohibition protects community solidarity against the centrifugal force of economic exploitation.
5. The final promise — 'will never be shaken' (lo yimmot le-olam) — does not promise prosperity or ease. It promises stability, rootedness, an unshakeable foundation. This is the same verb used in Psalm 16:8 ('I will not be shaken') and Psalm 46:5 ('it will not be shaken').

Summary: A miktam of David expressing radical satisfaction in God as the psalmist's sole inheritance and portion. The psalm moves from a plea for protection through a confession of exclusive devotion to the LORD, past a rejection of other gods, into the language of deep contentment — the boundary lines have fallen in pleasant places. It culminates in one of the most extraordinary statements in the Hebrew Bible: 'You will not abandon my soul to Sheol, nor let your faithful one see the pit.' The psalm ends with the vision of fullness of joy in God's presence and pleasures at his right hand forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 16 is unique in the Psalter for its sustained tone of quiet, untroubled confidence. There is no lament, no enemy, no crisis to resolve. The psalm is pure satisfaction — the contentment of a person who has found that God is enough. The language of inheritance runs through the entire poem: the LORD is 'my portion' (chelqi) and 'my cup' (kosi), and the 'boundary lines' (chavalim) have fallen in pleasant places. This is land-allotment language: when Israel divided Canaan, each tribe received its nachalah ('inheritance, allotted portion'). The Levites received no land — their inheritance was the LORD himself (Numbers 18:20, Deuteronomy 10:9). The psalmist adopts Levitical theology and makes it personal: my allotted portion is not a field or a vineyard but God himself. Verse 10 — 'you will not abandon my soul to Sheol' — becomes one of the most theologically generative verses in the Hebrew Bible. Peter quotes it in Acts 2:25-28 as a prophecy of Christ's resurrection, arguing that David spoke of someone whose body would not see corruption.

Translation Friction: Verses 3-4 are among the most textually difficult in the Psalter. The Hebrew is compressed and possibly corrupt. The general sense — that the psalmist delights in the 'holy ones' (qedoshim) who are in the land while rejecting those who chase after other gods — is clear, but the grammar resists smooth translation. The word atstabotam (v. 4) may mean 'their sorrows' or 'their idols' (from etsev, 'pain/idol'). The phrase 'I will not pour out their drink offerings of blood' suggests rejection of pagan rituals involving blood libations. Verse 10's claim about not being abandoned to Sheol pushes against the dominant Old Testament understanding that all the dead go to Sheol regardless of righteousness. The psalm seems to reach toward something beyond the standard view — a hope that the relationship with God is strong enough to survive death itself.

Connections: The inheritance language connects to Numbers 18:20 (the Levites' portion) and Psalm 73:26 ('God is the portion of my heart forever'). Peter's quotation of vv. 8-11 in Acts 2:25-31 makes this psalm central to early Christian resurrection theology. Paul cites verse 10 in Acts 13:35 with the same interpretive move. The 'path of life' (orach chayyim, v. 11) reappears in Proverbs 5:6 and 15:24. The 'pleasures at your right hand forever' (v. 11) echoes Psalm 110:1, where the king sits at God's right hand.

¹A miktam of David.

Protect me, God, for I have taken refuge in you.

²I said to the LORD, 'You are my Lord;
I have no good apart from you.'

³As for the holy ones in the land, they are the noble ones in whom is all my delight.

⁴The sorrows of those who chase after another god will multiply.
I will not pour out their drink offerings of blood, nor will I take their names on my lips.

⁵The LORD is my allotted portion and my cup;
you hold my lot secure.

⁶The boundary lines have fallen for me in pleasant places;
yes, my inheritance is beautiful to me.

⁷I bless the LORD who counsels me;
even in the night my inner being instructs me.

⁸I have set the LORD before me always;
because he is at my right hand, I will not be shaken.

⁹Therefore my heart is glad and my glory rejoices;
even my body rests secure.

¹⁰For you will not abandon my soul to Sheol, nor will you let your faithful one see the pit.

¹¹You make known to me the path of life;
in your presence is fullness of joy,

at your right hand are pleasures forevermore.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. miktam appears six times in the Psalter (Psalms 16, 56-60) and nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible. The Septuagint translates it as stelographia ('inscription on a pillar'). The meaning remains uncertain, but the word may relate to ketem ('gold') or to katam ('to cover, conceal').
2. The Hebrew of this verse is among the most debated in the Psalter. The second-person feminine form amarte is unusual (either an archaic form or addressed to the psalmist's own soul). The phrase tovati bal alekha has generated at least four major interpretive traditions. Our rendering follows the dominant reading: 'I have no good apart from you.'
3. The identity of the qedoshim ('holy ones') is debated. They may be human saints (faithful Israelites), heavenly beings (as in some readings of Deuteronomy 33:2-3), or both. The context — 'in the land' (ba-arets) — favors human referents: the faithful community in Israel.
4. The phrase niskeihem mi-dam ('their drink offerings of blood') likely refers to pagan rituals involving blood libations, which were forbidden in Israelite worship. Some scholars see this as a reference to human sacrifice or to rituals involving the mingling of blood with wine in the drink offering.
4. The ambiguity of atsvotam ('their sorrows' or 'their idols') is productive: pursuing false gods generates both — the idols themselves and the misery they bring.
5. The four inheritance terms (menat, cheleq, kos, goral) are drawn from the concrete world of land allotment and applied to the relationship with God. This is not abstract theology but economic metaphor: the psalmist's wealth, security, and future are invested entirely in God.
6. chavalim ('lines, ropes, measuring cords') comes from the practice of dividing land with ropes. The idiom 'the lines have fallen' means 'my portion has been assigned.' The image is of a person standing on their newly measured property, looking around, and finding it genuinely delightful.
7. kilyot ('kidneys') as the seat of deep thought and emotion appears in Jeremiah 17:10 ('I the LORD search the heart and examine the kidneys') and Psalm 139:13 ('you formed my kidneys'). Translating as 'inner being' preserves the function while avoiding the anatomical literalism.
8. The phrase shivviti YHVH le-negdi tamid became so central to Jewish spirituality that it was inscribed on plaques (called shivviti plaques) hung in synagogues and homes as a visual reminder to keep God constantly in view.
9. kevod ('glory') as a term for the human soul or essential self appears also in Psalm 7:5 and 57:8. The Septuagint translates it as 'my tongue' (glossa), perhaps reading kavod as kaved ('liver'). Peter's quotation in Acts 2:26 follows the Septuagint: 'my tongue rejoiced.'
10. She'ol in the Hebrew Bible is not hell in the later Christian sense. It is the shadowy underworld where all the dead go — not a place of punishment for the wicked but the default destination of all who die. The psalm's remarkable claim is not that the psalmist avoids punishment but that the psalmist avoids the normal fate of all humanity: descent into She'ol.
10. shachat can mean 'pit' (a place) or 'corruption, decay' (a process). The Septuagint translates it as diaphthora ('corruption, decay'), which becomes theologically significant in Peter's argument in Acts 2:31 — David's body did see decay, but the one David prophesied about did not.
11. The progression from 'path of life' to 'fullness of joy' to 'pleasures forever' creates an escalating trajectory that carries the reader beyond the boundaries of this life into something that sounds like eternal communion with God. Whether the original psalmist understood this as life after death in the later theological sense is debated, but the language strains toward a reality that death cannot contain.
11. This verse has been called the high-water mark of Old Testament hope. It does not describe survival after death in explicit terms, but it describes a relationship with God so full, so joyful, and so permanent that death seems unable to interrupt it.

Summary: A prayer of David that functions as a legal appeal to God as judge. The psalmist opens by asserting his innocence — his lips, his steps, his heart have been tested and found without deceit — and then petitions God for protection from deadly enemies who are closing in. The imagery builds from legal defense to military siege to predatory lions. The psalm reaches its climax in the final verse with one of the most intimate statements of hope in the Psalter: 'As for me, I will behold your face in righteousness; when I awake, I will be satisfied with your likeness.'

What Makes This Remarkable: *The psalm's final verse (v. 15) stands in deliberate contrast to verse 14, which describes the wicked satisfied with earthly abundance — their bellies filled, their children inheriting their surplus. Against this picture of material satiety, the psalmist offers a radically different definition of satisfaction: 'I will be satisfied with your likeness' (esbe'ah be-haqits temunatekha). The word temunah ('form, likeness, appearance') is the same word used in Numbers 12:8, where God says Moses beholds 'the form of the LORD.' The psalmist's ultimate satisfaction is not in possessions, descendants, or long life but in seeing God. This verse, together with Psalm 16:11, represents the* highest reach of the Psalter's theology of divine presence.

Translation Friction: The psalmist's claims of innocence in verses 3-5 are remarkably strong: 'You have tested my heart... you find nothing... my mouth does not transgress... I have kept from the paths of the violent.' This language troubles readers who expect all biblical figures to acknowledge sinfulness. The innocence claimed here is not absolute moral perfection but covenantal integrity — the psalmist has not committed the specific crimes of which enemies accuse him. This is legal language: I am not guilty of what they charge. The claims should be read as courtroom defense, not as theological assertion of sinlessness.

Connections: The final verse ('I will behold your face in righteousness') directly echoes Psalm 11:7 ('the upright will behold his face') and anticipates the 'beatific vision' theology that develops through the biblical tradition. The phrase be-haqits ('when I awake') connects to Daniel 12:2, where the dead 'awake' to everlasting life. The lion imagery (vv. 11-12) appears also in Psalm 10:9 and 22:13, linking these psalms in their portrait of predatory enemies. The 'apple of the eye' (ishon bat ayin, v. 8) reappears in Deuteronomy 32:10 and Proverbs 7:2.

¹A prayer of David.

Hear a just cause, LORD; attend to my cry.

Give ear to my prayer —

it comes from lips without deceit.

²Let my vindication come from your presence;

let your eyes see what is right.

³You have tested my heart, visited me in the night;

you have refined me — you will find nothing.

I have resolved that my mouth will not transgress.

⁴As for human deeds — by the word of your lips

I have avoided the paths of the violent.

⁵My steps have held firm to your paths;

my feet have not slipped.

⁶I call on you, for you will answer me, God.

Incline your ear to me; hear my words.

⁷Show the wonder of your faithful love,

O savior of those who take refuge at your right hand from their adversaries.

⁸Guard me like the pupil of the eye;

hide me in the shadow of your wings.

⁹from the wicked who assail me,

from my deadly enemies who surround me.

¹⁰They close up their callous hearts;

their mouths speak with arrogance.

¹¹They track our every step; they surround us.

They fix their eyes to cast us to the ground.

¹²He is like a lion eager to tear its prey, like a young lion crouching in ambush.

¹³Rise up, LORD! Confront him; bring him down!
Rescue my soul from the wicked — your sword!

¹⁴From mortals — by your hand, LORD! — from mortals whose portion is in this life alone.
You fill their bellies with your hidden treasure;
they are satisfied with children and leave their surplus to their little ones.

¹⁵As for me — in righteousness I will behold your face;
when I awake, I will be satisfied with your likeness.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The three verbs for hearing (shama, qashav, azan) create a rhetorical escalation: hear, attend, give ear. Each adds urgency. The legal overtone of tsedeq ('a just cause') sets the psalm in the framework of a court appeal — the psalmist is bringing a case before the divine judge.
2. mishpati ('my judgment, my sentence, my vindication') is legal terminology — the verdict the psalmist seeks from God's court. The psalmist is confident: he wants God to judge because he believes God's eyes will see mesharim ('uprightness, equity, what is straight'). He invites divine scrutiny rather than fearing it.
3. The nighttime visitation (paqadta lailah) suggests God's examination during the vulnerable hours when conscious defenses are down — in dreams, in the anxious hours of sleeplessness. Even there, God finds nothing. The three-fold testing echoes Psalm 12:6's image of silver refined in a furnace.
4. The psalmist credits God's word (davar sefatekha, 'the word of your lips') as the guide that kept him from the paths of the parits ('violent one, robber, breaker-through'). The contrast is between two kinds of speech: God's word that directs toward righteousness, and the smooth words of the wicked that lead to violence.
5. The verb tamakh ('to hold, support, grasp') can be read as either a past declaration ('my steps have held firm') or a petition ('hold up my steps'). The ambiguity allows both: the psalmist affirms past faithfulness and implicitly asks for continued support. The 'paths' (ma'gelot) are God's established tracks — the grooves worn by walking in God's way.
6. The ki ('for, because') expresses confidence: I call because I know you will answer. The verb anah ('to answer, respond') implies not just hearing but active response. The psalmist's prayer is not cast into a void but directed toward a God with a proven record of answering.
7. The verb hafleh ('make wonderful, distinguish') asks for chesed that is not ordinary but spectacular — an act of faithful love so striking it cannot be attributed to coincidence or human effort.
8. ishon bat ayin ('the little man of the daughter of the eye') is the Hebrew idiom for the pupil. The layered metaphor — a little person reflected inside the eye — suggests that God keeps the psalmist so close that the psalmist is reflected in God's own gaze.
9. The phrase oyevai be-nefesh ('my enemies in/against the soul') can mean 'my mortal enemies' (enemies who seek my life) or 'my enemies in soul' (enemies at the deepest level). The verb yaqifu ('they surround, encircle') creates the image of a military siege — the psalmist is hemmed in on all sides.
10. chelbamo sagru ('their fat they close') — chelev ('fat') metaphorically represents a heart grown insensitive through prosperity and self-indulgence. A fat-enclosed heart cannot feel compassion. The image is of people whose comfort has made them cruel — well-fed, self-satisfied, and indifferent to the suffering they inflict.
11. The shift to first person plural ('our steps,' 'surround us') may indicate that the psalmist speaks for a group, or it may be a stylistic variation. The enemies' eyes are set (yashitu) with fixed intent — like a predator locking onto prey before striking. The phrase lintot ba-arets ('to cast down to the earth') describes throwing the victim to the ground.
12. The lion is the standard metaphor for a powerful, predatory enemy in the Psalms (7:2, 10:9, 22:13, 22:21). The doubling — mature lion and young lion — emphasizes that the threat combines experience and vigor.
13. The imperative qumah ('rise up!') echoes Numbers 10:35 and Psalm 12:5 — the war cry for God to take action. The phrase me-rasha charbbekha ('from the wicked — your sword') is ambiguous: is the wicked one God's sword (an instrument of divine testing) or does the psalmist ask to be rescued from the wicked by God's sword? Both readings have support.

14. The interpretation of this verse is heavily debated. Some read it as describing God's judgment on the wicked (from the dead, by your hand, LORD!). Others read it as describing the wicked's earthly prosperity, which is real but ultimately limited to 'this life.' We follow the second reading, which creates the contrast with verse 15's eternal satisfaction.
15. temunah ('form, likeness') is the word used in Numbers 12:8 for what Moses sees when God speaks to him face to face — 'the form of the LORD.' It is also the word used in Deuteronomy 4:12, 15-16 to describe what Israel did not see at Sinai (and must not make into an image). The psalm promises the psalmist will see what Israel was denied and warned against replicating.
15. The tension between be-haqits ('when I awake') and the rest of the psalm's legal framework has generated enormous theological reflection. Does it refer to waking from literal sleep (the psalmist prays at night and expects to see God in the morning)? From the sleep of death (resurrection hope)? From the night of suffering (eschatological awakening)? The ambiguity may be the point — the psalm's language is capacious enough for all three readings.

Summary: A royal thanksgiving psalm of David celebrating deliverance from all enemies and from Saul. At 51 verses (WLC versification), it is one of the longest psalms in the Psalter and also appears with minor variations as 2 Samuel 22. The psalm moves through four major sections: a cascade of divine titles (vv. 2-4), a cosmic theophany in which God rends heaven to rescue the psalmist (vv. 5-20), a declaration of the psalmist's righteousness and God's corresponding faithfulness (vv. 21-31), and a celebration of military victory that leads to dominion over nations (vv. 32-51). The language is extravagant, mythic, and deeply personal — the God who splits the heavens is the same God who trains the psalmist's hands for war.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theophany section (vv. 8-16) is among the most powerful descriptions of divine intervention in all of Scripture. The earth shakes, the mountains tremble, smoke rises from God's nostrils, fire devours from his mouth, he bows the heavens and descends, riding on a cherub, flying on the wings of the wind. This is not metaphor in the decorative sense — it is the language of Sinai (Exodus 19:16-18) transferred from national revelation to personal rescue. The same God who appeared in fire and earthquake to give the Torah appears now to save one man from his enemies. The psalm collapses the distance between cosmic event and individual experience, insisting that the God of Sinai is the God of David's bedroom and battlefield.

Translation Friction: The psalm's claims of righteousness (vv. 21-25) are even more extensive than Psalm 17's — 'The LORD rewarded me according to my righteousness... I was blameless before him and kept myself from guilt.' Given what the Books of Samuel report about David's life (Bathsheba, Uriah, the census), these claims require contextual reading. The superscription dates the psalm to deliverance from 'all his enemies and from Saul' — likely the early years of David's reign before the events of 2 Samuel 11. The righteousness claimed is relative to the specific conflict with Saul: David did not kill the LORD's anointed when he had the chance. The claims are covenantal and situational, not autobiographical in the absolute sense.

Connections: The near-duplicate in 2 Samuel 22 places this psalm within the historical narrative, making it one of the few psalms with a secure narrative context. The theophany echoes Exodus 19, Judges 5:4-5 (the Song of Deborah), and Habakkuk 3:3-15. The divine warrior imagery connects to the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15). The concluding messianic note — 'He shows faithful love to his anointed, to David and his offspring forever' (v. 51) — links this psalm to the Davidic covenant of 2 Samuel 7 and to the messianic hope that runs through the Psalter.

¹For the choirmaster. Of David, the servant of the LORD, who spoke to the LORD the words of this song on the day the LORD delivered him from the hand of all his enemies and from the hand of Saul. He said: ²I love you, LORD, my strength.

³The LORD is my rock, my fortress, my deliverer, my God, my cliff in whom I take refuge,
my shield, the horn of my salvation, my stronghold.

⁴I call on the LORD, who is worthy of praise, and I am saved from my enemies.

⁵The cords of death encompassed me;
the torrents of destruction terrified me.

⁶The cords of Sheol surrounded me;
the snares of death confronted me.

⁷In my distress I called on the LORD;
to my God I cried for help.
From his temple he heard my voice;
my cry reached his ears.

⁸Then the earth reeled and shook;
the foundations of the mountains trembled and quaked because he was angry.

⁹Smoke rose from his nostrils;
consuming fire came from his mouth;
burning coals blazed from him.

¹⁰He bent the heavens and came down, thick darkness beneath his feet.

¹¹He rode on a cherub and flew;
he soared on the wings of the wind.

¹²He made darkness his hiding place, his canopy around him —
dark waters, thick clouds of the sky.

¹³From the brightness before him his clouds broke through — hail and coals of fire.

¹⁴The LORD thundered from heaven;
the Most High gave forth his voice —
hail and coals of fire.

¹⁵He sent out his arrows and scattered them;
he flashed lightning and threw them into confusion.

¹⁶Then the channels of the sea were exposed, the foundations of the world laid bare at your rebuke, LORD, at the blast of the breath of your nostrils.

¹⁷He reached down from on high and took hold of me;
he drew me out of many waters.

¹⁸He delivered me from my powerful enemy,
from those who hated me,
for they were too strong for me.

¹⁹They confronted me on the day of my disaster, but the LORD became my support.

²⁰He brought me out into a wide-open space;
he rescued me because he delighted in me.

²¹The LORD has dealt with me according to my righteousness;
according to the cleanness of my hands he has repaid me.

²²For I have kept the ways of the LORD and have not acted wickedly against my God.

²³For all his judgments are before me;
his statutes I have not turned away from me.

²⁴I was blameless before him and kept myself from my guilt.

²⁵The LORD has repaid me according to my righteousness, according to the cleanness of my hands in his sight.

²⁶With the faithful you show yourself faithful;
with the blameless you show yourself blameless.

²⁷With the pure you show yourself pure;
with the crooked you show yourself shrewd.

²⁸For you save a humble people, but haughty eyes you bring low.

²⁹For you light my lamp, LORD;
my God illuminates my darkness.

³⁰For by you I can charge a battle line;
by my God I can leap over a wall.

³¹As for God — his way is complete.
The word of the LORD is refined;
he is a shield to all who take refuge in him.

³²For who is God besides the LORD?
And who is a rock except our God?

³³God — the one who arms me with strength and makes my way blameless.

³⁴He makes my feet like the feet of a deer and sets me on the heights.

³⁵He trains my hands for war
so that my arms can bend a bow of bronze.

³⁶You have given me the shield of your salvation;
your right hand upholds me,
and your humility has made me great.

³⁷You broaden the path beneath me, and my ankles do not give way.

³⁸I pursued my enemies and overtook them;
I did not turn back until they were destroyed.

³⁹I struck them so they could not rise;
they fell beneath my feet.

⁴⁰You armed me with strength for battle;
you brought my assailants to their knees beneath me.

⁴¹You made my enemies turn their backs to me,
and those who hated me — I silenced them.

⁴²They cried for help, but there was no one to save;
even to the LORD, but he did not answer them.

⁴³I ground them fine as dust before the wind;
I poured them out like mud in the streets.

⁴⁴You delivered me from the strife of peoples;
you set me as head of nations.
A people I had not known now serve me.

⁴⁵At the mere hearing of me they obey; foreigners come cringing before me.

⁴⁶Foreigners lose heart and come trembling from their strongholds.

⁴⁷The LORD lives! Blessed be my rock!
Exalted be the God of my salvation!

⁴⁸The God who gives me vindication and subdues peoples under me.

⁴⁹He rescues me from my enemies.
You lift me above my adversaries;
from the violent man you deliver me.

⁵⁰Therefore I will praise you among the nations, LORD, and sing to your name.

⁵¹He gives great victories to his king and shows faithful love to his anointed — to David and his offspring forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This is the longest superscription in the Psalter. The title 'servant of the LORD' (eved YHVH) is a title of highest honor — applied to Moses (Deuteronomy 34:5), Joshua (Joshua 24:29), and the messianic figure of Isaiah's Servant Songs. David receives this designation only here and in the parallel 2 Samuel 22:1.
2. The verb racham used by a human toward God is unique here. Normally it describes God's compassion toward humans or a parent's love for a child. David reverses the direction: he loves God with the same visceral, gut-level affection that God shows to Israel. This opening word sets the emotional register for the entire psalm.
3. The seven titles form one of the densest concentrations of divine metaphor in the Hebrew Bible. Each draws from a different aspect of protection: geological (rock, cliff), military (fortress, shield, stronghold), personal (deliverer, God), and animal (horn). Together they compose a complete portrait of divine sufficiency.
4. mehullal ('the praised one, the one worthy of praise') is a Pual participle — God is inherently, passively worthy of praise; praise is his due nature. The verse establishes the psalm's fundamental logic: calling on the LORD results in salvation. The two clauses are cause and effect.
5. chevlei mavet ('cords/pangs of death') — chevel can mean both 'rope/cord' (binding, trapping) and 'birth pang' (pain, writhing). Death either binds or tortures. nachalei veliyya'al ('torrents of Belial/destruction') — the word beliyya'al means 'worthlessness, destruction, the abyss.' The torrents are not ordinary floods but surges from the underworld itself.
6. The parallelism between mavet ('death') in verse 5 and She'ol in verse 6 identifies them as overlapping realities. The psalmist is trapped in a zone where death and Sheol converge — caught in cords and snares, hemmed in on every side. The imagery establishes the extremity from which God will rescue.
7. The verse traces the trajectory of prayer: from the psalmist's mouth to God's temple to God's ears. The cry travels upward through space and arrives. The verb shava ('to cry for help') is an urgent, anguished call — not polite petition but desperate screaming. God hears from his heikhal — both earthly temple and heavenly palace.
8. The theophany that begins here and runs through verse 16 is the most elaborate divine-warrior intervention scene in the Psalter. Every element — earthquake, fire, darkness, wind, water — echoes the exodus traditions and transfers them to David's personal experience.
9. The anthropomorphism is deliberate and extreme: smoke from God's nose (the Hebrew af means both 'nose' and 'anger'), fire from God's mouth, burning coals igniting. This is dragon-language applied to the Creator — God as a figure of terrifying, volcanic fury. The image draws from volcanic phenomena (smoke, fire, glowing stones) and applies them to divine wrath.
10. The verb natah applied to the heavens appears also in Isaiah 40:22 ('he stretches out the heavens like a curtain'). Here the stretching is downward — God pushes through the sky to reach the one who called.
11. The keruv (cherub) is not the chubby infant of later art but a powerful composite creature — part human, part animal, part bird — that serves as God's throne-bearer (Ezekiel 1, 10) and mount. God rides the cherub as a warrior rides a chariot. The 'wings of the wind' (kanfei ruach) make the storm itself God's vehicle.
12. God's concealment in darkness is both terrifying and protective. The sukkah ('canopy, booth, shelter') of verse 12 is made of choshekh ('darkness') and cheshkat mayim ('dark waters'). God is hidden — his arrival is known by its effects (earthquake, fire, wind) but his person remains veiled. The psalmist is saved by a God he cannot see.
13. The nogah ('brightness, radiance') is God's own luminosity breaking through the surrounding darkness. The storm clouds are not merely weather but the garments of God's approach, and they break apart to release hail (barad) and fire — the weapons of divine intervention, echoing the seventh plague in Exodus 9:23-24.
14. Thunder is God's voice (qol) — the same identification made in Psalm 29. The title Elyon ('Most High') emphasizes God's supremacy over all other powers. The thunder is not mere meteorology but divine speech — God's answer to the psalmist's cry in verse 7.
15. God's arrows (chitsim) are the lightning bolts — the divine warrior's ranged weapons. The verb puts ('to scatter') describes the dispersal of the enemy army. The verb hamam ('to confuse, throw into panic') is the same word used for God's action against the Egyptians at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:24) and against the Canaanites in Joshua 10:10.
16. This verse marks the climax of the theophany. The entire created order — from sky to sea bed to the foundations beneath the earth — has been affected by God's intervention. The scale is deliberately disproportionate to one man's rescue: God deploys universe-altering power to save a single servant.
17. The verb mashah ('to draw out') creating a verbal link to Moses is likely intentional. The psalmist is a new Moses — drawn from drowning waters by divine intervention. The 'many waters' function as a symbol of chaos throughout the Hebrew Bible (Psalm 29:3, 93:4, Isaiah 17:12-13).
18. The honest admission ki ametsu mimmenni ('for they were stronger than me') is significant. The psalmist does not pretend he could have saved himself. The enemy was genuinely overpowering. The rescue was necessary precisely because the psalmist was overmatched — divine intervention was not a supplement to human effort but a replacement for it.

19. be-yom eidi ('on the day of my calamity') — eid refers to a catastrophic event, a disaster, a time when everything collapses. The contrast is sharp: the enemy struck at the worst possible moment, and at that same moment the LORD became mish'an ('support, staff to lean on').
20. The phrase ki chafets bi ('because he delighted in me') is the emotional heart of the psalm. It grounds the entire cosmic rescue — earthquake, fire, cherub-riding, heaven-bending — in a single motive: delight. God did all this because he wanted to.
21. This verse begins the 'righteousness declaration' section (vv. 21-25) that mirrors 2 Samuel 22:21-25. The claims are situational — David acted with integrity toward Saul specifically, refusing to kill the LORD's anointed when given the opportunity (1 Samuel 24, 26). The language is covenantal: God rewards covenant faithfulness with covenant protection.
22. Verse 22 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
23. Verse 23 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
24. Verse 24 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
25. Verse 25 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
26. The fourfold pattern (faithful/faithful, blameless/blameless, pure/pure, twisted/twisted in vv. 26-27) is one of the most important theological statements in the Psalter about the nature of God's responsiveness. God meets people where they are — but this means the twisted encounter a God who appears twisted to them.
27. The word iqqesh ('crooked, twisted, perverse') describes someone whose path is deliberately convoluted — who practices deceit and manipulation. God's response to the crooked — titpatal ('you show yourself twisted/shrewd') — is startling. It means God outmaneuvers the manipulator at their own game. God does not become morally crooked, but he proves more cunning than the cunning.
28. Verse 28 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
29. The lamp (ner) is a symbol of life, prosperity, and dynastic continuity (1 Kings 11:36, 15:4 — 'a lamp in Jerusalem'). God lighting the psalmist's lamp means sustaining his life and his lineage. The darkness (choshki) is both literal (the darkness of danger) and metaphorical (the darkness of despair).
30. Verse 30 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
31. This verse appears verbatim in 2 Samuel 22:31 and echoes Deuteronomy 32:4 ('The Rock — his work is perfect'). It functions as the psalm's creedal statement, distilling the entire testimony into three affirmations.
32. Verse 32 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
33. Verse 33 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
34. Verse 34 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
35. Verse 35 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
36. anvah ('humility, gentleness') applied to God is remarkable. The 2 Samuel 22:36 parallel reads anothekha ('your answering, your response'). Both readings attribute the psalmist's greatness to God's gracious condescension — the willingness of the Most High to stoop.
37. Verse 37 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
38. Verse 38 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
39. Verse 39 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
40. Verse 40 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
41. Verse 41 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
42. The enemies' unanswered cry to the LORD is devastating. They called on the same God the psalmist called on — but received no answer. The principle of verse 26 applies: God responds differently to the faithful and the crooked. The same God who heard the psalmist's cry (v. 7) does not hear theirs.
43. Verse 43 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
44. Verse 44 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
45. Verse 45 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
46. Verse 46 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
47. chay YHVH ('the LORD lives!') is an oath formula and a doxological cry. After describing all that God has done, the psalmist returns to the foundational confession: the LORD is alive. This is not philosophical assertion but experiential testimony — the God who acted is the God who lives.
48. Verse 48 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
49. Verse 49 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.

50. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 15:9 as evidence that God's saving purpose always intended to reach beyond Israel to the nations. The psalmist's praise among the goyim ('nations') becomes, in Paul's reading, a prophecy of Gentile inclusion in worship.
51. The word mashiach ('anointed one') is the source of 'Messiah.' In its original context it refers to the reigning king of David's line. The phrase ad olam ('forever') connects this psalm to the eternal covenant of 2 Samuel 7:12-16 and to the messianic hope that animates the Psalter.

Summary: A psalm of David in two movements that together form one of the most celebrated poems in the Hebrew Bible. The first movement (vv. 2-7) hymns the heavens as witnesses to God's glory — the sky speaks without words, the sun runs its course like a bridegroom and a champion. The second movement (vv. 8-11) turns from creation's testimony to the Torah's perfection, cataloging the law's qualities in six parallel lines: perfect, trustworthy, right, pure, clean, true. The psalm concludes with a personal prayer (vv. 12-15) asking for cleansing from hidden faults and protection from presumptuous sins, ending with the iconic petition: 'Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable in your sight, LORD, my rock and my redeemer.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The junction between the two halves — from creation to Torah — is one of the most studied transitions in biblical poetry. C.S. Lewis called Psalm 19 'the greatest poem in the Psalter and one of the greatest lyrics in the world.' The connection between the two halves is not arbitrary but theological: the same God who built order into the heavens built order into the Torah. The sun that illuminates the physical world (v. 7) corresponds to the commandment that enlightens the eyes (v. 9). Creation and Torah are two forms of the same divine revelation — one written in the sky, the other on scrolls. The six descriptions of Torah in verses 8-10 form one of the most concentrated celebrations of Scripture in all of Scripture. Each line names the law by a different term (torah, edut, piqqudim, mitzvah, yirat YHVH, mishpatim), assigns it a quality (perfect, trustworthy, right, pure, clean, true), and describes its effect on the human person (restoring the soul, making the simple wise, rejoicing the heart, enlightening the eyes, enduring forever, being altogether righteous).

Translation Friction: The apparent disjunction between the creation hymn (vv. 2-7) and the Torah hymn (vv. 8-11) has led some scholars to propose that Psalm 19 was originally two separate poems joined by an editor. The creation section uses the divine name El (v. 2), while the Torah section uses YHVH (vv. 8-15) — the shift in name may reflect different sources or may be theologically deliberate (El as Creator, YHVH as covenant lawgiver). The phrase 'the fear of the LORD' (yirat YHVH, v. 10) appears in the list of Torah synonyms, which is unusual — 'fear' is a human response, not a legal corpus. Its inclusion suggests that the psalmist understands Torah not merely as legislation but as the entire relational posture of reverence toward God.

Connections: Psalm 119 is the massive expansion of what Psalm 19:8-11 compresses into six lines — the same synonyms, the same qualities, the same effects, extended over 176 verses. The creation hymn connects to Genesis 1 (creation by speech), Psalm 8 (the heavens as God's handiwork), and Romans 1:19-20 (creation revealing God's nature). Paul quotes verse 5 in Romans 10:18 to argue that the gospel has reached all nations, reading the 'voice' of creation as a type of the apostolic proclamation. The concluding prayer (v. 15) has become one of the most frequently quoted verses in Jewish and Christian liturgy.

¹For the choirmaster. A psalm of David.

²The heavens declare the glory of God, and the expanse proclaims the work of his hands.

³Day after day pours out speech, and night after night reveals knowledge.

⁴There is no speech and there are no words;
their voice is not heard.

⁵Yet their measuring line goes out through all the earth, and their words to the end of the world.
In them he has set a tent for the sun,

⁶It comes out like a bridegroom from his chamber, rejoicing like a champion to run its course.

⁷Its rising is from one end of the heavens, and its circuit reaches to the other end;
nothing is hidden from its heat.

⁸The law of the LORD is perfect, restoring the soul.
The testimony of the LORD is trustworthy, making the simple wise.

⁹The precepts of the LORD are right, rejoicing the heart.
The commandment of the LORD is pure, enlightening the eyes.

¹⁰The fear of the LORD is clean, standing forever.
The judgments of the LORD are true, righteous altogether.

¹¹More desirable than gold — than much fine gold;
sweeter than honey — than honey dripping from the comb.

¹²Moreover, by them your servant is warned;
in keeping them there is great reward.

¹³Who can discern their errors?
Cleanse me from hidden faults.

¹⁴Also keep your servant from willful sins;
do not let them rule over me.
Then I will be blameless, and innocent of great transgression.

¹⁵Let the words of my mouth and the meditation of my heart be acceptable before you,
LORD, my rock and my Redeemer.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Verse 1 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
2. kavod ('glory') when applied to God refers to the visible manifestation of his presence — weight, substance, radiance that can be perceived. The heavens do not merely suggest God's existence; they actively narrate his kavod, making the invisible God's attributes perceptible.

3. The personification of day and night as speakers who pass testimony to one another creates a remarkable image: time itself is a medium of revelation. Every 24-hour cycle is a fresh installment in creation's ongoing sermon about God.
4. This verse can be read two ways: 'There is no speech... [yet] their voice goes out' (the paradox of wordless communication) or 'There is no speech or language where their voice is not heard' (universal reach). The first reading is more consistent with the Hebrew syntax and creates the more powerful theological point.
5. qav ('line, measuring cord') is read by the Septuagint as qol ('voice'), producing 'their voice has gone out through all the earth.' Paul follows the Septuagint reading in Romans 10:18. The Hebrew qav ('measuring line') suggests that creation's witness has a precise, measured extent — it reaches everywhere by design, not by accident.
6. The dual imagery — bridegroom and warrior — resists any reduction of the sun to mere metaphor. The psalmist sees the sun as genuinely magnificent, a creation that reflects its Creator's glory through both beauty and power. Ancient Near Eastern cultures worshipped the sun as a deity; the psalmist demotes it to a tent-dweller (v. 5) who runs a course God assigned.
7. The phrase 'nothing is hidden from its heat' functions as a literary hinge. In the creation section, it refers to the sun's physical reach. Read in light of the Torah section that follows, it becomes a statement about the comprehensiveness of divine revelation: God's word, like God's sun, penetrates everywhere.
8. The six Torah lines (vv. 8-10) form a tightly structured catalog. Each line names the law (torah, edut, piqqudim, mitsvah, yirat YHVH, mishpatim), describes its character (perfect, trustworthy, right, pure, clean, true), and states its effect on the person who receives it (restoring, making wise, rejoicing, enlightening, enduring, being righteous).
9. The claim that Torah rejoices the heart is not peripheral but central to the psalm's theology. God's instruction is not a burden but a delight. This is the same conviction that drives Psalm 119's repeated expressions of love for the law.
10. The inclusion of yirat YHVH ('fear of the LORD') in a list of Torah synonyms is theologically significant. It identifies the reverential posture toward God as itself a form of Torah — perhaps the foundational form from which all specific commandments flow. Proverbs 1:7 calls this fear 'the beginning of knowledge.'
11. The comparison of Torah to gold addresses value; the comparison to honey addresses pleasure. Together they insist that God's instruction is both the most valuable possession and the most enjoyable experience available to a human being. This is not dutiful obedience but passionate desire.
12. The psalmist now identifies himself as avdekha ('your servant') — the same title given to David in the superscription of Psalm 18. The reward (eqev rav, 'great consequence/reward') is not specified — it may be the very qualities listed in verses 8-9 (restored soul, wise mind, glad heart, enlightened eyes) rather than external prosperity.
13. The movement from Torah's perfection (vv. 8-11) to human imperfection (vv. 13-14) is not a contradiction but a consequence. The more clearly one sees the law's perfection, the more clearly one sees one's own failure. Torah's light reveals what was hidden.
14. The progression from hidden faults (unconscious) to willful sins (conscious) to great transgression (definitive) maps an escalating hierarchy of sin. The psalmist asks for cleansing at every level — from the faults he cannot see to the rebellion he fears he might choose.
15. The go'el ('redeemer') is a legal term from Israelite family law. The go'el was the nearest kinsman responsible for buying back family land that had been sold, redeeming a relative from slavery, or avenging a murdered family member (Leviticus 25:25, Ruth 3:12-13). By calling God go'ali, the psalmist claims God as his closest family member — the one with both the obligation and the power to buy him back.

Summary: A royal liturgy spoken by the congregation on behalf of the king as he prepares to go to war. The people pray for God to answer the king from his holy place, to send help from the sanctuary and support from Zion, to remember his offerings and accept his sacrifices. The psalm builds to a declaration of trust: 'Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we call on the name of the LORD our God.' It ends with a final petition for the king's victory and God's answer.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 20 is a rare window into the liturgical life of the pre-exilic temple. The congregation speaks to and about the king, praying for his success before battle. The structure suggests a ceremony: the people speak their blessings (vv. 2-6), a solo voice (perhaps a priest or prophet) declares confidence in divine anointing (v. 7), the people affirm their trust (vv. 8-9), and all join in the final petition (v. 10). The theological center is verse 8: the distinction between trusting in military technology (chariots and horses) and trusting in the name (shem) of the LORD. The 'name' in Israelite theology is not a label but the accessible presence of God — to invoke the name is to invoke the person. The psalm insists that Israel's military strategy is ultimately theological: they go to war in the name of the LORD, not in the strength of their arsenal.

Translation Friction: The psalm assumes the legitimacy of the Davidic monarchy and the efficacy of temple sacrifice — the king's offerings and burnt sacrifices (vv. 4) are presented as genuine means of securing divine favor. For post-exilic readers (and for all later readers without king or temple), the psalm requires transposition: from literal king to awaited messiah, from physical temple to spiritual worship, from military battle to spiritual conflict. The psalm also raises the question of how divine favor relates to military outcome — Israel did not always win its wars, even when the king sacrificed and the people prayed.

Connections: Psalm 21 is the companion piece — where Psalm 20 prays for victory before battle, Psalm 21 gives thanks for victory after battle. The pair forms a liturgical unit. The chariots-and-horses statement (v. 8) echoes Deuteronomy 17:16, which prohibits the king from multiplying horses (military power), and Isaiah 31:1, which warns against relying on Egyptian cavalry. The phrase 'the name of the LORD our God' (shem YHVH Eloheinu) connects to the third commandment's prohibition against carrying God's name for emptiness (Exodus 20:7) — here the name is carried into battle as a banner of trust.

¹For the choirmaster. A psalm of David.

²May the LORD answer you in the day of trouble;
may the name of the God of Jacob set you safely on high.

³May he send you help from the sanctuary and support you from Zion.

⁴May he remember all your grain offerings and accept your burnt offering. Selah.

⁵May he grant you your heart's desire and fulfill all your plans.

⁶We will shout for joy over your victory and in the name of our God raise our banners!
May the LORD fulfill all your requests.

⁷Now I know that the LORD saves his anointed;
he answers him from his holy heaven with the mighty saving power of his right hand.

⁸Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we call on the name of the LORD our God.

⁹They collapse and fall,
but we rise and stand firm.

¹⁰LORD, save the king!
Answer us on the day we call.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Verse 1 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
2. The 'name' (shem) of God in Israelite theology functions as a near-synonym for God's presence. The temple was the place where God caused his name to dwell (Deuteronomy 12:5). To pray in God's name is to access God himself through the revealed identity he has shared.
3. The help (ezer) comes from qodesh ('the holy place, the sanctuary') and from Zion — the physical location where God's presence dwells. The theology is spatial: divine aid emanates from the temple and travels to the battlefield. The sanctuary is not merely a place of worship but a base of operations for divine intervention.

4. The minchah ('grain offering') and olah ('burnt offering') represent the king's pre-battle worship. The king does not march to war without first offering sacrifice — the military campaign is embedded in liturgical practice. The army's strength begins at the altar.
5. The congregation prays that God will align the outcome with the king's intention: kilvavekha ('according to your heart') and kol atsatekha ('all your counsel/strategy'). The assumption is that the king's plans are righteous — his heart's desire is for the good of the nation and the glory of God. The prayer asks God to give the king what he seeks.
6. The banner (degel) was a tribal and military standard in ancient Israel (Numbers 2:2). Here the congregation declares that their banner displays God's name rather than a tribal emblem or royal crest. The battle belongs to the LORD, and the banner makes that claim visible.
7. The shift to first-person singular ('now I know') may indicate a prophetic oracle within the liturgy — a moment when a single voice announces divine assurance to the congregation and the king. This voice transforms the congregation's prayer into confident knowledge.
8. The distinction between trusting in chariots/horses and trusting in God's name is foundational to Israelite theology. Deuteronomy 17:16 prohibits the king from multiplying horses. Isaiah 31:1 pronounces woe on those who go to Egypt for horses. The psalm institutionalizes this warning as congregational confession: our security is the name, not the arsenal.
9. The perfect tenses ('they have collapsed,' 'we have risen') may be prophetic perfects — describing the future outcome with such certainty that past tense is used. The congregation speaks of the battle's result as already accomplished, expressing faith that God's answer is certain.
10. The textual division of this verse is debated. The Masoretic accents suggest 'LORD, save! May the king answer us on the day we call.' But many translators read 'LORD, save the king! Answer us on the day we call.' The ambiguity may be deliberate, allowing the verse to function as both a prayer for the king and a prayer for the congregation.

Summary: A royal psalm celebrating the king's victories and blessings, sung to the LORD who answers the king's requests with life, honor, and enduring joy. The first half (vv. 2-8) recounts what God has already given the king; the second half (vv. 9-13) anticipates the destruction of the king's enemies. The psalm forms a pair with Psalm 20 — Psalm 20 prays before battle, Psalm 21 celebrates after victory.

What Makes This Remarkable: The superscription assigns the psalm to David, but the voice throughout is third-person — the congregation or a court singer addresses the king. The psalm's theology is straightforward and almost dangerously optimistic: the king asked for life and received it 'length of days forever and ever' (v. 5). In its original royal context, this would refer to dynastic permanence. The shift at verse 9 is abrupt — from blessing to burning, from coronation imagery to furnace imagery. The 'fire' of God's anger (esh, v. 10) will consume the king's enemies like kindling. The final verse returns to worship, as though the violence between was necessary to clear the way for praise.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew versification places the superscription as verse 1, so the psalm runs verses 1-14 in the WLC (versus 13 verses in English translations that treat the superscription as unnumbered). The phrase olam va-ed ('forever and ever,' v. 5) applied to the king's life creates tension — no Davidic king lived forever. This language pushes beyond historical kingship toward eschatological hope, which is why later tradition read this psalm messianically. The 'fiery oven' (tanur esh, v. 10) is an unusual image — elsewhere tanur refers to a baker's oven (Hosea 7:4-7), not a weapon of war. The metaphor may conflate the heat of God's anger with the domestic image of an oven consuming fuel.

Connections: Psalm 21 responds to the prayers of Psalm 20 — what was requested there is celebrated here. The phrase 'You have set a crown of pure gold on his head' (v. 4) echoes 2 Samuel 12:30, where David takes the crown of the Ammonite king. The blessing of 'length of days forever and ever' (v. 5) echoes the Davidic covenant promise in 2 Samuel 7:16. The fiery judgment imagery anticipates Malachi 4:1, where the coming day burns like an oven.

¹For the musical director — a psalm of David.

²O LORD, the king rejoices in your strength;
in your salvation, how greatly he celebrates!

³You have given him his heart's desire, and the request of his lips you have not withheld. Selah.

⁴For you meet him with blessings of good things;
you set a crown of pure gold on his head.

⁵He asked life from you — you gave it to him, length of days forever and beyond.

⁶Great is his glory through your salvation;
splendor and majesty you lay upon him.

⁷For you make him a blessing forever;
you fill him with joy in your presence.

⁸For the king trusts in the LORD, and through the faithful love of the Most High he will not be shaken.

⁹Your hand will find all your enemies;
your right hand will find those who hate you.

¹⁰You will make them like a fiery oven at the time of your appearing.
The LORD in his anger will swallow them, and fire will consume them.

¹¹You will destroy their offspring from the earth, and their descendants from among humanity.

¹²For they stretched out evil against you;
they devised a scheme — but they will not succeed.

¹³For you will put them to flight;
you will aim your bowstrings at their faces.

¹⁴Rise up, O LORD, in your strength!
We will sing and make music to your power.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription lamnatsseach ('for the director/leader') appears in 55 psalms. The term natsach may mean 'to lead, direct, oversee' — the exact musical function is uncertain. In WLC versification, this superscription is verse 1.
2. The word order places YHWH first, then 'in your strength' — emphasizing that the strength belongs to God, not the king. The king is the beneficiary, not the source.
2. Yeshuah ('salvation') in military contexts means 'victory' or 'deliverance.' It is the same root as the name Yeshua/Joshua/Jesus, making this verse resonate far beyond its immediate royal context.
3. The parallelism pairs 'heart's desire' (taavat libbo) with 'request of his lips' (areshet sefatav) — what the king wanted inwardly, he also asked for audibly, and God granted both. The word areshet ('request, utterance') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, making its precise nuance uncertain.
3. Selah appears here as a musical or liturgical marker. Its meaning remains debated — possibly 'lift up' (voices or instruments) or a pause for reflection.
4. Teqadmennu ('you meet him, you come to meet him beforehand') is from qadam, meaning 'to come before, anticipate.' God's blessings arrive before the king even asks — they are preemptive grace. The crown of paz ('refined gold, pure gold') signals both the coronation ceremony and God's lavish provision.
5. Olam va-ed is an emphatic doubled expression: olam ('perpetuity, ages') plus ed ('perpetuity, everlasting duration'). Together they insist on permanence beyond what either word alone conveys. This is stronger than simply 'forever' — it is 'forever and then still more.'

6. Hod ve-hadar ('splendor and majesty') is a word pair that elsewhere describes God's own appearance (Psalm 104:1, 1 Chronicles 16:27). When applied to the king, it signals that the king bears the reflected radiance of God — he is God's visible representative on earth.
7. The phrase et-panekha ('with your face/presence') echoes the priestly blessing of Numbers 6:25-26. The king's deepest joy comes not from wealth or victory but from proximity to God's own face. The psalmist locates the ultimate royal blessing in divine presence, not political power.
8. This verse is the hinge of the psalm. Verses 2-7 described what God has done for the king; verse 8 gives the reason — the king trusts (boteach) in the LORD. Trust is the foundation, and chesed is the guarantee. From verse 9 onward, the psalm shifts to what will happen to the king's enemies.
9. The psalm shifts abruptly from third-person description of the king to second-person address. The 'you' could be directed to the king or to God — the ambiguity may be deliberate, as the king acts as God's agent in battle. 'Your hand will find' (timtsa yadkha) means 'your hand will reach, overtake, seize' — the enemies cannot hide.
10. Tanur esh ('oven of fire' or 'fiery oven') is a striking domestic image applied to divine judgment. A tanur is a clay baking oven, heated until its interior walls glow. The enemies become the oven itself — or are thrown into it. The image communicates total, consuming destruction.
10. The phrase le-et panekha ('at the time of your face/appearing') suggests a theophany — God's visible manifestation in judgment. When God's face appears, it brings not comfort but consuming fire for those who oppose him.
11. Piryamo ('their fruit') and zaram ('their seed') refer to children and descendants. The judgment extends beyond the enemies themselves to their entire line. This is total eradication language — the enemies' legacy will be erased from the earth. In its ancient context, the loss of descendants was the ultimate curse, as it meant the complete end of one's name and memory.
12. Natu ('they stretched out, extended, bent') paired with raah ('evil') conveys intentional aggression — the enemies reached toward the king with harmful intent. But their mezimmah ('scheme, plan, plot') will fail. The verse explains the justice of the judgment: destruction comes because the enemies actively plotted against God's anointed.
13. Teshitem shekhem ('you will make them a shoulder/back') means forcing the enemies to turn and flee, exposing their backs. The bowstrings (metarim) aimed at their faces complete the military image — whether they flee or face forward, they cannot escape. The verse portrays total military dominance.
14. The pairing of nashirah ('we will sing') and unezammerah ('we will make music') reflects the psalm's superscription — this is liturgical poetry designed for musical performance. Gevurah ('strength, power, might') is the attribute being celebrated, completing the frame with oz ('strength') from verse 2.

Summary: The most anguished lament in the Psalter, moving from absolute abandonment to universal praise. The sufferer opens with the shattering cry 'My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?' and descends through mockery, physical torment, encirclement by enemies compared to bulls and lions and dogs, and the piercing of hands and feet. At verse 22 (Hebrew v. 23), the psalm pivots without explanation to triumphant praise — the sufferer vows to declare God's name in the assembly, and the vision expands until all nations, all the dead, and all future generations worship the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm contains more specific correspondences to the crucifixion of Jesus than any other Old Testament text. The opening cry is quoted in Aramaic by Jesus on the cross (Matthew 27:46). The mockery ('He trusted in the LORD; let him deliver him,' v. 9), the thirst ('my tongue clings to my jaws,' v. 16), the pierced hands and feet (v. 17), and the division of garments by casting lots (v. 19) are all cited or echoed in the Gospel passion narratives. Yet the psalm makes no claim to be predictive prophecy — it is the raw, present-tense suffering of a real person in genuine agony. The Christian reading sees in it a pattern of innocent suffering that reaches its ultimate fulfillment in Christ, while the Jewish reading sees a paradigm of Israel's suffering and vindication. Both readings honor the text; neither exhausts it. The unexplained pivot from despair to praise remains one of the great mysteries of the Psalter — what happened between verses 22 and 23 that turned agony into worship?

Translation Friction: The Hebrew of verse 17 (WLC v. 17) is one of the most disputed readings in the entire Hebrew Bible. The Masoretic text reads kaari ('like a lion') — 'like a lion, my hands and my feet.' This is grammatically incomplete and difficult. Many manuscripts and ancient versions (including the Septuagint, composed centuries before Christ) read kaaru ('they pierced') — 'they pierced my hands and my feet.' A Dead Sea Scrolls fragment (5/6HevPs) also supports the reading 'they pierced.' The difference is a single Hebrew letter: yod versus vav. We render the line to reflect the textual difficulty honestly. The superscription 'upon Ayyelet ha-Shachar ('the doe of the dawn') likely indicates a melody name, though some interpreters see symbolic significance — the hunted doe at dawn, vulnerable and exposed.

Connections: Jesus quotes the opening line from the cross in Aramaic: Eli, Eli, lema sabachthani (Matthew 27:46, Mark 15:34). The mockery of verse 9 is echoed in Matthew 27:43. The thirst of verse 16 connects to John 19:28. The pierced hands and feet of verse 17 are central to the crucifixion narratives. The divided garments and lots of verse 19 are fulfilled in John 19:23-24. The vow to praise in the assembly (v. 23) is quoted in Hebrews 2:12. The universal scope of the ending (vv. 28-32) anticipates the Great Commission and the ingathering of the nations. Within the Psalter, this psalm stands as the darkest point before the shepherd psalm that follows — Psalm 22 is the valley of the shadow, Psalm 23 is the green pasture on the other side.

¹For the musical director, on 'The Doe of the Dawn' — a psalm of David.

²My God, my God, why have you forsaken me?

Why are you so far from saving me,
from the words of my groaning?

³My God, I cry out by day, but you do not answer;
by night, but I find no rest.

⁴Yet you are holy,
enthroned on the praises of Israel.

⁵In you our ancestors trusted;
they trusted, and you rescued them.

⁶To you they cried out and were delivered;
in you they trusted and were not put to shame.

⁷But I am a worm, not a man — scorned by humanity, despised by the people.

⁸All who see me mock me;
they curl their lips, they shake their heads:

⁹"He rolled himself onto the LORD — let the LORD rescue him!
Let him deliver him, since he delights in him!"

¹⁰Yet it was you who drew me from the womb, who made me secure at my mother's breasts.

¹¹Upon you I was cast from birth;
from my mother's womb, you have been my God.

¹²Do not be far from me, for trouble is near and there is no one to help.

¹³Many bulls surround me;
strong bulls of Bashan encircle me.

¹⁴They open their mouths wide against me — a lion tearing and roaring.

¹⁵I am poured out like water, and all my bones are pulled apart.
My heart is like wax — it melts within me.

¹⁶My strength is dried up like a potsherd, and my tongue clings to my jaws.
You lay me in the dust of death.

¹⁷For dogs surround me;
a pack of evildoers closes in on me.
They pierce my hands and my feet.

¹⁸I can count all my bones;
they stare and gaze at me.

¹⁹They divide my garments among themselves, and for my clothing they cast lots.

²⁰But you, O LORD — do not be far away!
O my strength, come quickly to help me!

²¹Deliver my life from the sword, my only life from the power of the dog.

²²Save me from the mouth of the lion!
From the horns of the wild oxen — you have answered me!

²³I will declare your name to my brothers;
in the midst of the assembly I will praise you.

²⁴You who fear the LORD, praise him!
All you offspring of Jacob, glorify him!
Stand in awe of him, all you offspring of Israel!

²⁵For he has not despised or detested the suffering of the afflicted one.
He has not hidden his face from him,
but when he cried out, he heard.

²⁶From you comes my praise in the great assembly;
I will fulfill my vows before those who fear him.

²⁷The humble will eat and be satisfied;
those who seek the LORD will praise him.
May your hearts live forever!

²⁸All the ends of the earth will remember and turn to the LORD, and all the families of the nations will bow down before you.

29For kingship belongs to the LORD, and he rules over the nations.

30All the prosperous of the earth will eat and bow down; before him will kneel all who descend to the dust — even those who cannot keep themselves alive.

31A generation to come will serve him;
it will be told of the Lord to the next generation.

32They will come and declare his righteousness to a people yet unborn — that he has done it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ayyelet ha-Shachar ('the doe of the dawn') is most likely a melody name, though the image — a vulnerable animal at first light — resonates powerfully with the psalm's content. The doe hunted at dawn mirrors the sufferer surrounded by predators. In WLC versification, this superscription is verse 1.
2. Jesus quotes this verse from the cross in Aramaic: Eli, Eli, lema sabachthani (Matthew 27:46). The fact that Jesus chose this psalm — not a psalm of confession, but a psalm of innocent suffering — is theologically significant. He identifies with the righteous sufferer, not the guilty penitent.
2. Shaagah ('roaring, groaning') is used elsewhere of lions (Psalm 104:21, Amos 3:4). The sufferer's cry has the raw intensity of an animal's roar — this is not polite prayer but primal anguish.
3. The merism 'by day ... by night' means the crying is continuous — there is no relief at any hour. The phrase lo dumiyyah li ('no silence/rest for me') could mean either 'I have no silence' (I never stop crying) or 'there is no stillness for me' (I find no peace). Both readings reinforce the relentless, unanswered agony.
4. Yoshev ('sitting, dwelling, enthroned') is the same verb used for kings sitting on thrones. God is not merely present in Israel's worship — he reigns from it. The praises of the people are the location of God's kingship.
5. The threefold repetition of trust (batchu ... batchu ... tefalletemo) builds a case from history: the ancestors trusted, they kept trusting, and God delivered. The verb palat ('to escape, be delivered, be rescued') describes swift, complete rescue. The sufferer is constructing an argument — past faithfulness should guarantee present deliverance. But the argument will fail in his own case, which deepens the agony.
6. Lo-voshu ('they were not put to shame') is the theological payoff: trusting God did not humiliate them. Shame (bosh) in Hebrew is public exposure as a fool — trusting in something that fails you. The ancestors trusted and were vindicated. The sufferer, by contrast, is being publicly shamed (vv. 7-9), which makes his situation an apparent contradiction of the historical pattern.
7. Tolaath specifically refers to the crimson worm (tola'at shani), the insect crushed to produce scarlet dye. The image carries overtones of being crushed, of yielding color through destruction. Later Christian readers saw in this an image of Christ's blood-stained suffering, though the psalm's original context is simply one of utter degradation.
8. Yaftiru ve-safah ('they open wide with the lip') describes a sneering, contemptuous gesture — pushing out the lower lip in mockery. Yaniu rosh ('they shake the head') is a gesture of scorn and dismissal. The sufferer's pain is a public spectacle, and the audience participates with derisive body language. Matthew 27:39 records the same gestures at the crucifixion: 'And those who passed by derided him, wagging their heads.'
9. The verb gol ('roll') is imperative in form but is quoted as past action by the mockers — 'he rolled (his burden) to the LORD.' This verb choice suggests total, weight-bearing trust, like rolling a heavy stone onto someone else. The mockery targets the completeness of the sufferer's dependence on God.
10. The sufferer responds to the mockers not by arguing theology but by going back to his earliest experience of God. Gochi mi-baten ('the one who drew me from the belly') makes God the midwife. Mavtiachi al-shedei immi ('the one who made me trust at my mother's breasts') means that the sufferer's trust in God predates his conscious memory — God taught him trust before he could speak. This is the deepest possible foundation for faith: God was there at the beginning.
11. Hoshlakhti ('I was cast, thrown') is passive — the sufferer did not choose God; he was thrown onto God at birth. The relationship is not voluntary but foundational, woven into his existence from the moment of emergence from the womb. The final phrase — Eli attah ('you are my God') — is a personal confession that echoes the opening cry of verse 2. Despite everything, the sufferer still claims God as his own.
12. The spatial language is precise and devastating: God is far (rashaq), trouble is near (qerovah), and help is absent (ein ozer). The sufferer is caught between a distant God and a close enemy with no mediator, no ally, no helper. This is the setup for the violent imagery that follows.

13. Bashan (the Golan Heights region) was famous for its rich pastureland and powerful cattle (Amos 4:1, Ezekiel 39:18). The 'bulls of Bashan' (abbirei Vashan) are the largest, most dangerous cattle in the known world — they represent enemies of overwhelming physical power. The verbs sevavuni ('they surround me') and kitteruni ('they encircle me') describe a tightening ring with no escape route.
14. The animal imagery shifts from bulls to a lion (aryeh) — from encirclement to attack. Toref ve-shoeg ('tearing and roaring') describes a lion in the act of killing: tearing flesh while roaring. The open mouth (patsu pihem) conveys both the literal gaping jaws of a predator and the mouths of mockers hurling insults. The enemies are simultaneously verbal and physical threats.
15. The sequence moves inward: water (external), bones (structural), heart (innermost). Each image represents a deeper level of collapse. Namas ('it melts') is the same verb used for the melting of the Canaanites' hearts in Joshua 2:11 — it describes the loss of all capacity to resist or endure.
16. Cheres ('potsherd') is a broken piece of pottery — not just dry but shattered and useless. The tongue clinging to the jaws (leshoni mudbaq malqochay) describes extreme dehydration. John 19:28 records Jesus saying 'I thirst' from the cross. The final line — la-afar mavet tishpeteni ('to the dust of death you lay me') — is addressed to God. The sufferer does not blame his enemies for his death; he holds God responsible. The 'dust of death' is the grave itself, the return to the earth of Genesis 3:19.
17. The textual variant between kaari (, 'like a lion') and kaaru (, 'they pierced/dug') hinges on a single letter: yod vs. vav. The Masoretic kaari reading would require supplying a verb — 'like a lion [they maul?] my hands and my feet' — but no verb is present. The kaaru reading provides a complete clause: 'they pierced my hands and my feet.' The Nahal Hever scroll (5/6HevPs) reads ka'aru, supporting 'they pierced.'
17. Dogs in the biblical world were unclean scavengers (1 Kings 14:11, 21:23-24). To be surrounded by dogs is to be treated as carrion — already dead, already refuse.
18. The sufferer is so emaciated that every bone is visible and countable (asapper kol atsmotai). This is the body of someone who has been wasting — from illness, torture, starvation, or all three. The pronoun 'they' (hemmah) shifts to the onlookers who watch the spectacle with fascinated contempt. The sufferer is both dying and being watched dying.
19. The distinction between begadai ('my garments') and levushi ('my clothing/vesture') may indicate outer garments (divided into portions) and an inner garment (awarded by lot as a single piece). John 19:23-24 makes exactly this distinction: the soldiers divided the outer garments but cast lots for the seamless tunic.
20. The sufferer turns from describing his enemies back to God. The plea al-tirchaq ('do not be far') echoes verse 12 and answers the opening complaint that God is rachoq ('far'). Eyaluti ('my strength') is a rare word — possibly from ayyal ('ram, deer'), suggesting swiftness and power. The imperative chushah ('hurry!') conveys desperation — time is running out.
21. Nafshi ('my soul/life') is paralleled by yechidati ('my only one, my unique one, my darling'). Yechidah means 'only, solitary, unique' — the sufferer has only one life, and it is about to be taken. The 'sword' (cherev) represents violent death, and 'the dog' (kelev, singular) represents the most contemptible of the enemies from verse 17. The plea is not for comfort but for survival.
22. Remim ('wild oxen') were massive, now-extinct aurochs — the largest and most dangerous bovines in the ancient world. The KJV translated this as 'unicorns' following the Septuagint's monokeros, but the reference is to the wild ox (Bos primigenius). Their horns were weapons of impalement.
22. The shift from petition to praise at anitani ('you have answered me') is unexplained. Some scholars propose that a priestly oracle of salvation was spoken between verses 22a and 22b during liturgical performance. Others see a pure act of faith. The text itself offers no mechanism — only the result.
23. The vow to declare God's name (shimkha) to his brothers (echai) is quoted in Hebrews 2:12, where the writer applies it to Jesus declaring God's name to the church. In its psalmic context, the sufferer who was alone and surrounded by enemies now stands in the qahal ('assembly, congregation') among brothers — restored to community. The shift from isolation to assembly is itself a form of salvation.
24. The scope begins expanding. The sufferer's individual praise broadens to include all who fear the LORD, all the seed of Jacob, all the seed of Israel. Three groups named, three commands given: halleluhu ('praise him'), kabbeduhu ('glorify/honor him'), guru mimmennu ('stand in awe of him'). The verb kavad ('glorify, honor') shares the root of kavod ('glory') — the worshippers are to add weight to God's reputation.
25. Shiqqets ('to detest, abhor') is the verb form of sheqets ('abomination, detestable thing') — used for unclean animals and idolatrous practices. For God not to find the sufferer's affliction sheqets means that suffering does not make a person unclean or repulsive to God. This is a radical claim in a world where affliction was commonly interpreted as divine punishment.
26. Me-ittekhah tehilati ('from you is my praise') means the praise itself originates in God — the sufferer does not generate worship from his own resources; God supplies both the deliverance and the praise that responds to it. The vow fulfillment (nedarai ashallam) refers to the ancient practice of making a vow during crisis and paying it publicly after deliverance, typically with a todah ('thanksgiving') sacrifice and a communal meal (see next verse).
27. The todah meal — the thanksgiving feast following vow fulfillment — is now described. The anavim ('humble, afflicted, poor') eat and are satisfied (yisba'u). This is not merely physical food but the communal celebration of God's deliverance. The blessing yechi levavkhem la-ad ('may your hearts live forever') extends the 'life' that was the sufferer's most desperate request (v. 21) to the entire worshipping community.

- 28. The phrase kol mishpechot goyim ('all families of the nations') echoes the Abrahamic promise of Genesis 12:3 — 'in you all the families of the earth will be blessed.' The sufferer's story becomes the vehicle through which the nations encounter the God of Israel.
- 29. Ha-melukhah ('the kingship, the royal sovereignty') belongs to the LORD — not to earthly kings, not to the enemies who seemed to triumph. This brief, powerful declaration provides the theological basis for the universal worship described in the surrounding verses. If YHWH is king over all nations, then all nations owe him allegiance.
- 30. The inclusion of yordei afar ('those who go down to the dust') in the worshipping community is extraordinary — it suggests worship beyond death, a communion of the living and the dead before God. This pushes against the typical Old Testament view that the dead in Sheol cannot praise God (Psalm 6:5, 88:10-12). Either this psalm envisions a resurrection hope or it uses hyperbolic language to express the totality of God's sovereignty.
- 31. Zera ('seed, offspring, generation') introduces the temporal dimension — not only all places and all peoples, but all future times will be included. The story of God's deliverance will be transmitted (yesuppar, 'it will be told, recounted') from generation to generation. The sufferer's experience becomes a permanent testimony.
- 32. The phrase ki asah ('for he has done it') echoes the declaration on the cross in John 19:30: tetelestai ('it is finished'). Whether or not the Gospel writer intended the echo, the structural parallel is striking — both are final declarations that a work of suffering and salvation is complete.
- 32. Tsidqato ('his righteousness') in this context is God's covenant faithfulness demonstrated through saving action. It is not abstract moral quality but concrete rescue — God's righteousness is what God does for the afflicted one.

Summary: The most beloved psalm in the Psalter — six verses of absolute trust. The speaker declares the LORD as shepherd, provider, guide, protector, and host. The imagery moves from open pasture (vv. 1-3) through a dark valley (v. 4) to a banquet table prepared in the presence of enemies (v. 5), and closes with the assurance of faithful love pursuing the speaker all the days of his life. The psalm contains no petition, no complaint, no confession — only confidence.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 23 is positioned immediately after Psalm 22, the most anguished lament in the Psalter. This placement is not accidental. The sufferer who passed through the valley of the shadow of death in Psalm 22 — mocked, pierced, surrounded by enemies, laid in the dust of death — now emerges on the other side and can say 'The LORD is my shepherd; I lack nothing.' The green pastures and still waters are where you arrive after the cross. The 'table prepared in the presence of enemies' (v. 5) does not mean the enemies are gone — they are still watching. It means the shepherd feeds his own even while the wolves circle. The shift from third person ('he leads me') to second person ('you are with me') happens exactly at the darkest point — verse 4, the valley of the shadow of death. When the danger is greatest, the distance between speaker and God collapses from 'he' to 'you.'

Translation Friction: The psalm's two controlling metaphors — shepherd (vv. 1-4) and host (vv. 5-6) — are not as separate as they first appear. In the ancient Near East, kings were called shepherds of their people, and hospitality was a royal obligation. Both images describe a single relationship: the LORD as the one who provides, protects, and honors. The phrase gei tsalmavet (v. 4) is traditionally rendered 'valley of the shadow of death,' but tsalmavet may be a compound of tsel ('shadow') and mavet ('death'), or it may be an intensified form of tselem ('deep shadow, darkness'). Both readings yield approximately the same meaning: the darkest, most dangerous passage imaginable. We retain 'shadow of death' because the traditional rendering accurately captures the semantic weight.

Connections: The shepherd metaphor for God appears throughout the Hebrew Bible: Genesis 48:15 (Jacob's blessing), Genesis 49:24 ('the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel'), Psalm 80:1 ('Shepherd of Israel'), Isaiah 40:11 ('he will feed his flock like a shepherd'), Ezekiel 34 (God as the true shepherd replacing failed human shepherds). Jesus claims the title in John 10:11: 'I am the good shepherd.' The anointing with oil (v. 5) connects to the anointing of priests (Exodus 29:7) and kings (1 Samuel 16:13). The 'house of the LORD' in verse 6 anticipates the temple theology of Psalms 27:4 and 84:1-4. The overflowing cup (v. 5) reappears in Psalm 116:13 as 'the cup of salvation.'

¹A psalm of David.

The LORD is my shepherd —
I lack nothing.

²In green pastures he makes me lie down;
beside still waters he leads me.

³He restores my life;
he leads me in right paths for the sake of his name.

⁴Even though I walk through the valley of the shadow of death,
I will fear no evil,
for you are with me.
Your rod and your staff — they comfort me.

⁵You prepare a table before me in the presence of my enemies.
You anoint my head with oil;
my cup overflows.

⁶Surely goodness and faithful love will pursue me
all the days of my life,
and I will dwell in the house of the LORD for length of days.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. In WLC versification, the superscription and first poetic line share verse 1. The possessive suffix on ro'i ('my shepherd') makes this a personal claim, not a theological abstraction. The speaker does not say 'The LORD is a shepherd' or 'The LORD shepherds Israel' — he says 'The LORD is my shepherd.' The intimacy is the point.
2. The verb nahal ('to lead, guide') specifically describes leading to water — it is used of leading flocks to drinking places (Genesis 33:14, Isaiah 49:10). The shepherd does not merely point the way; he walks the path and brings the sheep to what they need.
3. Leman shemo ('for the sake of his name') is a critical theological qualifier. The shepherd's care is grounded in the shepherd's own character, not the worthiness of the sheep. This removes all performance anxiety from the relationship — the sheep is cared for because of who the shepherd is.
4. The grammatical shift from third person to second person at ki attah immadi ('for you are with me') is one of the most noted features of the psalm. When speaking of green pastures and still waters — places of safety — the speaker can describe God at a distance ('he'). When death closes in, distance collapses and the speaker speaks directly to God ('you'). Theology becomes prayer at the point of greatest need.
4. Tsalmavet may be a compound noun (tsel + mavet = 'shadow of death') or an intensive form meaning 'deep darkness.' The traditional 'shadow of death' reading, supported by the Septuagint (skia thanatou), captures the full weight of the image and has been retained.
5. The transition from shepherd imagery to banquet imagery is not a break in the psalm but a deepening. In the ancient Near East, a king's hospitality was an extension of his shepherding role. To set a table for someone in the presence of their enemies was a political and social statement: this person is under my protection, and anyone who touches them answers to me.
6. The verb radaf ('pursue, chase') is deliberately chosen to invert the language of threat. Throughout the psalms, enemies pursue (rodeph) the righteous (Psalm 7:2, 31:15, 35:3). Here, it is goodness and chesed that pursue. The hunted becomes the beloved.
6. Le-orekh yamim ('for length of days') is the same phrase used in Psalm 21:5 for the king's extended life. It suggests not eternity in the abstract but the fullness of lived time — all the days, every day, without interruption.

Summary: A processional liturgy in three movements: the LORD as cosmic creator and owner of the earth (vv. 1-2), the moral requirements for approaching his holy mountain (vv. 3-6), and the dramatic call for the gates to open for the King of Glory (vv. 7-10). The psalm was likely performed during a procession bringing the ark of the covenant into Jerusalem or the temple, with antiphonal voices calling back and forth at the gates.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's three sections create a theological sequence that moves from cosmology to ethics to worship. First: God owns everything because he made everything (vv. 1-2). Second: therefore, approaching this God requires clean hands and a pure heart (vv. 3-6). Third: this God is not distant — he is coming through the gates in power and glory, and the gates themselves must expand to receive him (vv. 7-10). The antiphonal structure of the gate liturgy is electrifying: one voice demands that the gates lift their heads, another voice asks 'Who is this King of Glory?', and the answer thunders back — 'The LORD, strong and mighty! The LORD, mighty in battle!' The question is asked twice (vv. 8, 10), and the second answer intensifies: 'The LORD of Hosts — he is the King of Glory!' This is not a conversation seeking information; it is a liturgical drama building to a climax.

Translation Friction: The phrase nesoī olam ('ancient doors' or 'everlasting gates,' vv. 7, 9) is unusual. If the psalm accompanied the ark's entrance into a newly built or captured city, the gates are not literally 'everlasting' — they are being addressed with cosmic language that elevates a historical event to mythic significance. The moral requirements of verses 3-6 (clean hands, pure heart, no idolatry, no false oaths) function as a 'torah of entrance' — a priestly catechism determining who may ascend the temple mount. Similar entrance liturgies appear in Psalm 15 and Isaiah 33:14-16. The question 'Who may ascend?' is not rhetorical — it was asked and answered in actual temple worship.

Connections: The opening declaration that the earth belongs to the LORD echoes Exodus 19:5 ('all the earth is mine') and anticipates Paul's quotation in 1 Corinthians 10:26. The entrance requirements connect to Psalm 15 (a parallel torah of entrance) and to Jesus's Beatitude 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God' (Matthew 5:8). The gate liturgy has been read christologically as the ascension — the risen Christ entering the heavenly gates as the King of Glory. The title YHWH Tsevaot ('LORD of Hosts') in the climactic verse 10 identifies the King of Glory with the commander of heaven's armies. Psalms 22-24 form a triptych: Psalm 22 is the cross (suffering), Psalm 23 is the shepherd (provision), Psalm 24 is the crown (enthronement).

¹Of David — a psalm.

The earth belongs to the LORD, and everything in it — the world and all who live in it.

²For he founded it upon the seas and established it upon the rivers.

³Who may ascend the mountain of the LORD?
And who may stand in his holy place?

⁴The one with clean hands and a pure heart, who does not lift up his soul to what is false and does not swear deceitfully.

⁵He will carry away blessing from the LORD and righteousness from the God of his salvation.

⁶This is the generation of those who seek him, who seek your face, O God of Jacob. Selah.

⁷Lift up your heads, O gates!
Be lifted up, O ancient doors!
Let the King of Glory come in!

⁸The LORD, strong and mighty —
Who is this King of Glory?
the LORD, mighty in battle!

⁹Lift up your heads, O gates!
Lift them up, O ancient doors!
Let the King of Glory come in!

¹⁰The LORD of Hosts —
Who is he, this King of Glory?
he is the King of Glory! Selah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The possessive construction la-YHWH ('to the LORD, belonging to the LORD') is emphatic. It does not say 'The LORD made the earth' (though verse 2 will) — it says the earth is his. Ownership, not merely craftsmanship, is the claim. This has implications for ecology, justice, and worship: if the earth is God's, humans are stewards, not owners.
2. The cosmology here reflects the ancient Near Eastern understanding of the earth as a flat disc founded upon the primordial waters. The seas (yammim) and rivers (neharot) are the chaotic waters that God subdued at creation (Genesis 1:2, 6-10). To found the earth upon the seas means God imposed order on chaos, creating stable ground above the waters. The verb yasad ('to found, lay a foundation') and the verb konan ('to establish, make firm') both emphasize intentional, skilled construction.
3. This 'torah of entrance' genre appears also in Psalm 15 and Isaiah 33:14-16. In practice, a Levitical priest would ask these questions at the temple gate, and the worshippers would respond with the qualifications listed in verse 4. It was a liturgical dialogue, not a private meditation.
4. Nafshi ('my soul') in the Hebrew text is first-person — 'who has not lifted up my soul to falsehood.' Some manuscripts read nafsho ('his soul'), which makes smoother grammatical sense. The first-person reading may reflect the liturgical context: the worshippers speak these qualifications about themselves, confessing their own integrity as they approach the gate.
4. Bar levav ('pure of heart') is echoed by Jesus in Matthew 5:8: 'Blessed are the pure in heart, for they shall see God.' The connection between heart purity and access to God's presence runs directly from this psalm to the Sermon on the Mount.
5. The reward for meeting the entrance requirements is berakhah ('blessing') and tsedaqah ('righteousness'). Notably, righteousness here is received, not achieved — it comes from God (me-Elohei yisho, 'from the God of his salvation'). The person who approaches God with clean hands and a pure heart receives from God the very righteousness that qualifies the approach. This creates a theological circle: you need righteousness to approach, and approaching gives you more righteousness.
6. The phrase meqavshei fanekha Yaaqov ('those who seek your face, Jacob') is textually difficult. Some manuscripts and the Septuagint read 'the God of Jacob' rather than simply 'Jacob.' The rendering follows the interpretive tradition that 'seeking the face' is directed to God, not to Jacob. Selah marks the transition from the entrance liturgy to the gate procession that follows.
7. The personification of the gates creates a dramatic liturgical scene. In performance, one group likely stood outside the gates (representing the procession with the ark) and another group stood inside (representing the gatekeepers). The call-and-response format builds anticipation with each exchange.
8. The question mi zeh Melekh ha-Kavod ('who is this King of Glory?') is asked by the gatekeepers — a liturgical challenge requiring identification. The answer comes in a torrent of military titles: YHWH izzuz ve-gibbor ('the LORD, fierce and powerful'), YHWH gibbor milchamah ('the LORD, warrior of battle'). The King of Glory is identified not by beauty or wisdom but by overwhelming combat power. This is a warrior entering in triumph.
9. The command is repeated — the gates did not open at the first call. The repetition builds dramatic urgency. The second time, the verb shifts from ve-hinnaseu ('be lifted up,' passive/reflexive) to useu ('lift up,' active imperative) — the command becomes more direct, more insistent. The King of Glory is still waiting, and the gates must respond.
10. YHWH Tsevaot ('the LORD of Hosts') appears over 260 times in the Hebrew Bible. Tsevaot ('hosts, armies') refers to the heavenly armies — angelic beings, cosmic forces, possibly even the stars marshaled as troops. The title identifies God as supreme commander of all reality, visible and invisible.

10. The second answer is more powerful than the first. Verse 8 said 'the LORD, mighty in battle' — a single warrior. Verse 10 says 'the LORD of Hosts' — the commander of all armies. The identification escalates from powerful individual to supreme sovereign.

Summary: An acrostic psalm — each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet — weaving together petition for guidance, confession of sin, and trust in God's covenant faithfulness. David asks God to teach him, lead him, remember mercy rather than sin, and rescue him from enemies and shame. The psalm oscillates between confidence and vulnerability, with the alphabet structure providing a framework of order imposed on emotional turbulence.

What Makes This Remarkable: The acrostic structure is imperfect — the letter vav is missing from its expected position, the letter resh appears to be doubled (vv. 18-19), and the final verse (v. 22) falls outside the alphabet entirely, adding a pe that addresses Israel as a whole rather than the individual speaker. These 'irregularities' may be intentional: the broken acrostic mirrors a broken speaker. A person in genuine need cannot maintain perfect form. The extra verse at the end — stepping outside the alphabetic constraint to pray for all Israel — suggests that individual prayer always opens toward communal concern. The psalm's three great theological words — chesed (vv. 6-7, 10), emet ('truth/fidelity,' vv. 5, 10), and berit ('covenant,' v. 10) — form the core vocabulary of God's character throughout the Hebrew Bible.

Translation Friction: The acrostic form creates an inherent tension between artistic structure and emotional authenticity. Is the speaker genuinely distressed, or is this a literary exercise? The answer is both: the acrostic is a discipline that channels real emotion into ordered speech. Ancient readers would have recognized the alphabetic pattern as a sign of completeness — the prayer covers everything from aleph to tav, from A to Z. The phrase chattot neuray ('sins of my youth,' v. 7) raises a question: which specific sins? The psalm does not say, which makes it universally applicable — every reader has sins of youth to confess.

Connections: The acrostic form also appears in Psalms 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, and 145, as well as Lamentations 1-4 and Proverbs 31:10-31. The petition 'teach me your paths' (v. 4) connects to the Torah theology of Psalm 119. The covenant language of verse 10 ('all the paths of the LORD are chesed and emet') echoes Exodus 34:6, where God reveals his character to Moses as 'abounding in chesed and emet.' The prayer for Israel in the final verse anticipates the communal laments of Psalms 44 and 74.

¹Of David.

To you, O LORD, I lift up my soul.

²My God, in you I trust.

Do not let me be put to shame;
do not let my enemies gloat over me.

³Indeed, none who wait for you will be put to shame;
shame will come to those who are treacherous without cause.

⁴Make your ways known to me, O LORD;
teach me your paths.

⁵Guide me in your truth and teach me,
for you are the God of my salvation;
for you I wait all day long.

⁶Remember your compassion, O LORD, and your acts of faithful love,

for they are from of old.

⁷Do not remember the sins of my youth or my rebellions.
According to your faithful love, remember me — for the sake of your goodness, O LORD.

⁸Good and upright is the LORD;
therefore he instructs sinners in the way.

⁹He guides the humble in justice and teaches the humble his way.

¹⁰All the paths of the LORD are faithful love and truth for those who keep his covenant and his decrees.

¹¹For the sake of your name, O LORD, pardon my guilt — for it is great.

¹²Who is the one who fears the LORD?
Him will he instruct in the way he should choose.

¹³His soul will rest in prosperity, and his offspring will inherit the land.

¹⁴The counsel of the LORD belongs to those who fear him, and his covenant — he makes it known to them.

¹⁵My eyes are always on the LORD, for he will free my feet from the net.

¹⁶Turn to me and be gracious to me,
for I am lonely and afflicted.

¹⁷The troubles of my heart have multiplied;
bring me out of my distresses.

¹⁸Look on my affliction and my trouble, and forgive all my sins.

¹⁹Look at my enemies — how many they are!
They hate me with violent hatred.

²⁰Guard my life and deliver me;
do not let me be put to shame,
for I take refuge in you.

²¹Let integrity and uprightness protect me,
for I wait for you.

²²Redeem Israel, O God, from all its troubles.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription le-David ('of David') is integrated with the first acrostic line. Lifting the soul (nafshi essa) toward God contrasts with Psalm 24:4, where lifting the soul to what is false disqualifies one from God's presence. Here, the soul is lifted to the only worthy destination.
2. The bet line. The prayer against shame (al-evoshah) reveals the social dimension of suffering — the speaker fears not only harm but humiliation. In the ancient honor-shame culture, being publicly shamed before enemies was a fate worse than physical pain. The verb alats ('to exult, gloat') describes the triumphant crowing of enemies who celebrate another's downfall.
3. The gimel line. The speaker expands his prayer from himself to all who wait for God (kol qovekha). The verb qavah ('to wait, hope, look expectantly') describes patient, active trust. The contrast is with bogdim ('the treacherous, the faithless') — those who betray covenant loyalty. Reqam ('emptily, without cause, for nothing') modifies the treachery: they betray for no reason, their faithlessness is gratuitous.
4. The dalet line. Two synonymous requests: 'make known your ways' (derakhekha hodiieni) and 'teach me your paths' (orchotekha lammedeni). Derekh ('way, road, manner of life') and orach ('path, course') are wisdom vocabulary — the speaker wants to know not just what to do but how God moves through the world. The verb lamad ('to teach, train') implies sustained instruction, not a single lesson.
5. The he line. Otekha qivviti kol ha-yom ('for you I wait all the day') expresses unbroken attentiveness. The speaker does not wait occasionally or when convenient — the waiting is kol ha-yom ('all the day'), every moment oriented toward God.
6. The zayin line. The verb zakhar ('remember') when directed to God is not about memory retrieval — God does not forget. It is a request for God to act in accordance with what he has always been. 'Remember your compassion' means 'be compassionate again, as you have always been.' Rachamim ('compassion') derives from rechem ('womb') — it is the fierce, visceral tenderness of a mother for her child.
7. The interplay of 'remember' and 'do not remember' creates the psalm's central tension: the speaker has a past that deserves judgment, but he appeals to a God whose character (chesed, tov) is greater than that past. The prayer is not 'forgive me because I've changed' but 'remember me according to who you are.'
8. The tet line. The logic is striking: because God is good and upright (tov ve-yashar), he teaches sinners (chattaim). God's response to sin is not rejection but instruction. The verb yorah ('to teach, instruct, direct') is the root of Torah ('instruction, law'). God's goodness expresses itself as pedagogy — he teaches the lost rather than abandoning them.
9. The yod line. The anavim ('humble, afflicted, lowly') are the ones God teaches. Humility is the prerequisite for divine instruction — the proud cannot learn because they believe they already know. Mishpat ('justice, judgment, right ordering') is the content of the teaching; darko ('his way') is the method. God teaches both what is right and how to walk in it.
10. Chesed ve-emet ('faithful love and truth/faithfulness') is a hendiadys — two words expressing one complex reality: God's reliable, enduring, covenant-keeping devotion. This pair appears throughout the Hebrew Bible as a summary of God's essential character (Genesis 24:27, 32:10, Exodus 34:6, Psalm 86:15, 89:14).
11. Avon ('guilt, iniquity, punishment for iniquity') encompasses the sin, its moral weight, and its consequences. The speaker does not separate these — the guilt is comprehensive. The frank admission ki rav-hu ('for it is great') is remarkable: most prayers minimize sin. This one magnifies it, trusting that God's grace is greater.
12. The mem line. The rhetorical question identifies the learner: the one who fears the LORD (yere YHWH). The verb yorah ('he will instruct') is again the root of Torah. The 'way he should choose' (derekh yivchar) implies that life presents genuine choices, and God's instruction enables right selection. Fear of God is not paralyzing dread but the orientation that makes wisdom possible.
13. The nun line. Nafsho be-tov talin ('his soul will lodge/spend the night in goodness') means the God-fearer's life settles into well-being. The verb lin ('to lodge, spend the night') suggests restful security — no anxiety-filled nights. The promise that his seed (zaro) will inherit the land (erets) echoes the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 12:7) and anticipates Jesus's Beatitude: 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth' (Matthew 5:5).
14. Sod combines intimacy with information — it is not merely that God tells his secrets but that he brings the fearful ones into a relationship close enough to share them. The covenant (berit) is the framework within which this intimacy operates.
15. The ayin line. Einai tamid el-YHWH ('my eyes are continually toward the LORD') expresses unbroken attentiveness. The reason: hu yotsi me-reshet raglai ('he will bring out my feet from the net'). The net (reshet) is a hunting trap — the speaker is caught, ensnared, but looks to God rather than at the trap. The orientation of the eyes determines the outcome.
16. The pe line. Peneh elai ('turn to me') is a plea for God's face — his attention, his presence. The speaker identifies himself as yachid ve-ani ('solitary and afflicted'). Yachid means 'alone, only, solitary' — the suffering has isolated him. The combination of loneliness and affliction is a double burden: he suffers, and he suffers alone.
17. The tsade line. Tsarot levavi hirschiv ('the troubles of my heart have widened/expanded') means the inner anguish keeps growing — the heart's capacity for pain is being stretched. Metsuqotai ('my distresses, my straits') comes from the root tsuq ('to be narrow, pressed, confined'). The speaker is simultaneously expanding with trouble and constricted by distress — torn in both directions.

- 18. The resh line (first occurrence). The speaker asks God to see (reeh) two things simultaneously: his suffering (onyi va-amali, 'my affliction and my toil/trouble') and his sin (chattotai). He does not separate the two — he presents himself whole, as both sufferer and sinner, and asks God to address both realities at once. The verb nasa ('to lift, carry away') when applied to sin means 'to forgive' — literally to lift the sin off the bearer.
- 19. The resh line (second occurrence — the acrostic doubles resh). The enemies are rav ('many, numerous') and their hatred is sinat chamas ('hatred of violence' or 'violent hatred'). Chamas means 'violence, cruelty, wrongdoing' — their hostility is not passive dislike but active, destructive malice.
- 20. The shin line. Shomrah nafshi ('guard my soul/life') and hatssileni ('deliver me') are paired petitions — protection and rescue. The recurring fear of shame (al-evosh) circles back to verse 2, forming an inclusio. The basis for confidence: ki chasiti vakh ('for I have taken refuge in you'). The verb chasah ('to take refuge, shelter') describes hiding under God's protection as under the wing of a bird (Psalm 91:4).
- 21. The tav line — the final letter of the alphabet. Tom va-yosher ('integrity and uprightness') are personified as guardians who preserve (yitseruni, 'they will guard me') the speaker. These moral qualities are not merely internal virtues but active protectors. The psalm's alphabetic structure reaches its end with the confidence that moral wholeness and patient waiting (qivvitikha) for God are sufficient protection.
- 22. The addition of this communal petition beyond the alphabet may indicate liturgical use — the psalm was adapted from individual prayer to congregational worship by adding this verse. Or it may be original, signaling that no individual prayer is truly complete until it includes the wider community of God's people.

Summary: A psalm of self-examination and protest of innocence. David appeals to God to vindicate him, declaring that he has walked in integrity, avoided the company of the wicked, loved the house of the LORD, and kept his hands clean. The psalm moves from personal examination (vv. 1-3) to separation from evildoers (vv. 4-5) to worship at the altar (vv. 6-8) to a final plea for redemption and grace (vv. 9-12).

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is uncomfortable for modern readers who associate piety with humility and self-deprecation. David does not say 'I am a sinner in need of mercy' — he says 'Vindicate me, for I have walked in integrity.' The Hebrew Bible sees no contradiction between genuine piety and honest self-assessment. The speaker is not claiming sinless perfection but covenant faithfulness — he has kept his commitments, avoided corruption, and maintained his worship. The psalm functions as a negative confession: 'I have not sat with the worthless, I have not associated with hypocrites, I hate the assembly of evildoers.' This is not arrogance but testimony, offered to the God who can verify it.

Translation Friction: The tension between this psalm and psalms like 25 (where David confesses sins) and 51 (where David begs for cleansing) is real but not contradictory. Different situations call for different postures. When falsely accused, the appropriate response is to assert innocence. When genuinely guilty, the appropriate response is to confess. The same person can do both at different times. The verb shafeteni ('vindicate me, judge me') in verse 1 is a legal term — David is asking for a court hearing, confident the evidence will support him.

Connections: The protest of innocence echoes Job 31, the great oath of innocence. The love for God's house (v. 8) anticipates Psalm 27:4 ('One thing I have asked') and Psalm 84 ('How lovely is your dwelling place'). The hand-washing ritual (v. 6) connects to Deuteronomy 21:6-7 (the elders washing hands over the heifer) and to Pilate's gesture in Matthew 27:24. The 'level ground' (mishor) of verse 12 echoes the 'right paths' (magelei tsedeq) of Psalm 23:3.

¹Of David.

Vindicate me, O LORD,
for I have walked in my integrity, and I have trusted in the LORD without wavering.

²Examine me, O LORD, and test me;
refine my inner depths and my heart.

³For your faithful love is before my eyes, and I have walked in your truth.

⁴I have not sat with worthless people, and with the deceitful I will not associate.

⁵I hate the assembly of evildoers, and with the wicked I will not sit.

⁶I wash my hands in innocence and go around your altar, O LORD,

⁷raising a shout of thanksgiving and telling of all your wondrous deeds.

⁸O LORD, I love the dwelling place of your house,
the place where your glory resides.

⁹Do not sweep my soul away with sinners, or my life with men of blood —

¹⁰in whose hands is wickedness, and whose right hand is full of bribes.

¹¹But as for me, I walk in my integrity.
Redeem me and be gracious to me.

¹²My foot stands on level ground;
in the assemblies I will bless the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Shafat in the judicial sense means 'to render a verdict, to vindicate' — the speaker is asking for acquittal, not punishment. The confidence is remarkable: this is someone who believes the evidence supports him and wants his day in court before the ultimate judge.
2. Three verbs of testing: bachan ('examine, investigate'), nasah ('test, try'), and tsaraf ('refine, smelt'). The third is metallurgical — tsaraf is what a silversmith does, heating metal to remove impurities. The speaker asks God to apply this process to his kilyotai ('kidneys') and libbo ('heart'). In Hebrew anthropology, the kidneys were the seat of deep emotion and conscience, while the heart was the seat of thought and will. Together they represent the entire inner life.
3. The pairing of chesed and emet (amitekha, 'your truth') echoes Psalm 25:10 — the twin pillars of God's character. The speaker's walk (hithallakhti, 'I have walked about, conducted myself') is shaped by these divine attributes.
4. The negative confession begins. Lo yashviti im-metei-shav ('I have not sat with men of emptiness/falsehood') — shav means 'emptiness, worthlessness, falsehood.' These are people whose lives are hollow. Naalamim ('the hidden ones, the concealed, the dissemblers') are those who hide their true intentions — hypocrites whose public face masks private corruption. The speaker has avoided both.
5. The language intensifies from avoidance to hatred. Saneiti ('I have hated') is a strong verb — the speaker does not merely decline to join evildoers; he actively opposes their gatherings. Qahal mereim ('assembly of evildoers') uses the same word qahal that describes Israel's worship assembly. The evildoers have their own congregation — a parody of true worship — and the speaker refuses membership.
6. Erchats be-niqqayon kappai ('I wash in the cleanness of my hands') may refer to a literal ritual washing before approaching the altar (compare Exodus 30:17-21, where priests wash hands and feet before serving) or to a metaphorical declaration of innocence. The 'going around' (asovevah) the altar suggests a processional circuit — a liturgical act of worship performed physically, walking around the altar as a visible declaration of devotion.
7. Qol todah ('the voice/sound of thanksgiving') is the vocal component of the todah offering — the thanksgiving sacrifice accompanied by public declaration of what God has done. Nifleotekha ('your wonders, your extraordinary acts') are the specific deeds God has performed that merit telling. Worship in the Hebrew Bible is never abstract; it is always tied to concrete divine actions.
8. The love (ahavti) for God's house is personal and passionate. This is the same verb used for marital love, for love between friends, for love of God. The speaker's attachment to the temple is emotional, not merely dutiful.

9. Al-teesof ('do not gather, do not sweep away') — the speaker fears being grouped with sinners in God's judgment. The separation he has practiced in life (vv. 4-5) he asks God to honor in judgment. Anshei damim ('men of blood') are those guilty of bloodshed — the most extreme category of wickedness. The speaker asks not to share their fate.
10. Zimmah ('wicked scheme, evil plan, lewdness') in their hands and shochad ('bribery') filling their right hand — the portrait is of systematic corruption. The right hand (yamin), the hand of power and action, is saturated with bribes. These are not occasional sinners but professional operators of injustice.
11. The contrast is explicit: va-ani ('but as for me') sets the speaker apart from the corrupt. He returns to the opening claim — be-tummi elekh ('in my integrity I walk'). But the final two verbs are surprising: pedeni ('redeem me') and chonneni ('be gracious to me'). Even the person who walks in integrity needs redemption and grace. Integrity is not self-sufficiency. The most upright person still depends on God's intervention.
12. Ragli amdash ve-mishor ('my foot stands in a level place') means the speaker has found solid, even footing — not the treacherous ground of the wicked but the stable terrain of integrity. Mishor ('level ground, uprightness, plain') suggests both physical stability and moral straightness. The psalm closes in worship: be-maqhelim avarakh YHWH ('in the assemblies I will bless the LORD'). The speaker who refused the assembly of evildoers (v. 5) takes his place in the assembly of the faithful.

Summary: A psalm of two halves, so distinct that some scholars treat them as separate compositions. The first half (vv. 1-6) is radiant confidence — the LORD is light, salvation, and stronghold, and the speaker fears nothing. The second half (vv. 7-14) is urgent petition — the speaker begs God not to hide his face, not to abandon him, and clings to the hope that he will see God's goodness in the land of the living. The psalm moves from fortress to fragility, from certainty to desperate waiting.

What Makes This Remarkable: The two halves of this psalm mirror the two realities of faith: the conviction that God is sovereign and the experience that God sometimes feels absent. The speaker who declares 'The LORD is my light — whom shall I fear?' in verse 1 is the same person who pleads 'Do not hide your face from me' in verse 9. These are not contradictions; they are the same person in different moments, or even the same person in the same moment holding confidence and fear simultaneously. The central desire — 'One thing I have asked of the LORD, this is what I seek: to dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life' (v. 4) — reduces all religious longing to a single request: proximity to God. Everything else — safety, victory, provision — flows from that one thing.

Translation Friction: The phrase be-erets chayyim ('in the land of the living,' v. 13) is set against death, not against heaven. The hope is not for escape from the world but for seeing God's goodness in this life, in this world, before death. This is pre-resurrection hope — the speaker wants to experience God's blessing here, not merely in an afterlife. The final verse (v. 14) may be the words of a priest or a prophetic voice encouraging the speaker — 'Wait for the LORD; be strong, and let your heart take courage; wait for the LORD.' The repetition of qavveh el-YHWH ('wait for the LORD') frames the exhortation: waiting is the posture that bridges the gap between confidence and fear.

Connections: The desire to 'dwell in the house of the LORD' (v. 4) connects to Psalm 23:6 ('I will dwell in the house of the LORD') and Psalm 84:1-4 ('How lovely is your dwelling place'). The imagery of being lifted up on a rock (v. 5) anticipates Psalm 40:2 ('He set my feet on a rock'). The petition 'Do not forsake me' (v. 9) echoes the abandonment cry of Psalm 22:1. The final exhortation to 'wait for the LORD' is echoed in Psalm 37:7, 9, 34 and Isaiah 40:31 ('those who wait for the LORD shall renew their strength').

¹Of David.

The LORD is my light and my salvation — whom shall I fear?

The LORD is the stronghold of my life — of whom shall I be afraid?

²When evildoers close in on me to devour my flesh —

my adversaries and enemies — they stumble and fall.

³Though an army encamps against me,
my heart will not fear.
Though war rises against me,
even then I am confident.

⁴One thing I have asked of the LORD,
this is what I seek:
to dwell in the house of the LORD
all the days of my life,
to gaze on the beauty of the LORD and to seek him in his temple.

⁵For he will shelter me in his booth in the day of trouble;
he will hide me in the secret place of his tent;
he will lift me high upon a rock.

⁶And now my head is lifted high above my enemies all around me, and I will offer in his tent sacrifices of joyful shouting;
I will sing and make music to the LORD.

⁷Hear, O LORD, when I cry aloud;
be gracious to me and answer me.

⁸My heart says to you,
"Seek my face."
Your face, O LORD, I will seek.

⁹Do not hide your face from me;
do not turn your servant away in anger.
You have been my help —
do not cast me off, do not forsake me,
O God of my salvation.

¹⁰Though my father and mother forsake me,
the LORD will gather me in.

¹¹Teach me your way, O LORD, and lead me on a level path because of my enemies.

¹²Do not deliver me to the will of my adversaries, for false witnesses have risen against me, breathing out violence.

¹³I believe that I will see the goodness of the LORD in the land of the living.

¹⁴Wait for the LORD.
Be strong, and let your heart take courage.
Wait for the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The image of God as 'light' (or) is rare in the Psalter as a direct predicate. God is associated with light elsewhere (Psalm 36:9, 'in your light we see light'; Psalm 104:2, 'wrapped in light as a garment'), but only here does the speaker say flatly: YHWH ori — 'the LORD is my light.' The metaphor encompasses guidance (light shows the way), safety (light reveals threats), and joy (light is associated with life and blessing).
2. Le-ekhol et-besari ('to eat my flesh') is predatory language — the enemies are carnivorous, treating the speaker as prey. But the expected outcome is inverted: instead of the speaker being consumed, the attackers themselves stumble (kashlu) and fall (nafalu). The past tense suggests this has already happened — the speaker has survived previous attacks and draws confidence from that history.
3. The hypothetical escalates: from individual evildoers (v. 2) to an entire encamped army (machaneh) to full-scale war (milchamah). At each level of escalation, the speaker's response remains the same: no fear, only trust. The phrase be-zot ani vote'ach ('in this I am trusting') is ambiguous — 'this' could refer back to God's identity as light, salvation, and stronghold, or forward to the single request of verse 4. Either way, trust is the speaker's settled posture regardless of circumstances.
4. The verb levaqer ('to inquire, to seek, to examine') can also mean 'to visit, to attend to.' The temple is a place not merely of worship but of investigation — the speaker goes there to learn, to seek understanding, to encounter God's mind as well as his presence.
5. Three images of protection: sukkah ('booth, shelter' — the same word as the Festival of Booths), seter oholo ('the hidden place of his tent'), and tsur ('rock'). The progression moves from temporary shelter (booth) to hidden enclosure (secret tent) to elevated fortress (rock). Each image adds a dimension: shelter from elements, concealment from enemies, and elevation above threats. The 'day of trouble' (yom raah) is the specific crisis the speaker anticipates.
6. The lifted head (yarum roshi) is the posture of victory and honor — the opposite of shame, which bows the head. The speaker's enemies surround him (sevivotai, 'all around me'), but his head rises above them because God has elevated him. The response is worship: zivchei teruah ('sacrifices of joyful shouting') are offerings accompanied by loud, exuberant cries of praise. This is not quiet, contemplative worship but explosive, full-throated celebration.
7. The tone shifts abruptly. The confident declaration of verses 1-6 gives way to urgent petition. Shema ('hear') is an imperative — the speaker is no longer celebrating but pleading. Chonneni ('be gracious to me') and aneni ('answer me') are the verbs of someone who is not yet experiencing the security described in the first half of the psalm. The two halves are not sequential (confidence then crisis) but simultaneous — faith and need coexist.
8. The Hebrew is syntactically complex and has been interpreted various ways. Our rendering follows the reading where the heart recalls God's general invitation ('Seek my face') and the speaker responds personally. The shift from plural (baqqeshu, 'seek,' addressed to many) to singular (avaqesh, 'I will seek') makes the response intimate: God invited everyone, and I am personally answering.
9. Four negated imperatives in rapid succession: do not hide (al-taster), do not turn away (al-tat), do not cast off (al-tittesheni), do not forsake (al-taazeveni). The verb azav ('forsake') is the same word from Psalm 22:1 ('why have you forsaken me?'). The speaker's deepest fear is not enemy attack but divine absence. The entire verse is a plea against God's disappearance.
10. Whether ki means 'when,' 'though,' or 'if' affects the tone — 'when' suggests it has happened; 'though' suggests a hypothetical extreme; 'if' is conditional. All three readings yield the same theological conclusion: parental failure, the worst imaginable human abandonment, does not exhaust divine faithfulness.
11. Horeni ('teach me') and necheni ('lead me') are paired requests for instruction and guidance. The 'level path' (orach mishor) is smooth, unobstructed terrain — the speaker needs clarity because enemies (shorerai, 'those who watch for me, who lie in wait') are monitoring his movements. The Hebrew shorer suggests watchful, hostile surveillance — these enemies are studying the speaker, looking for missteps.
12. Edei-sheqer ('witnesses of falsehood') and yefe'ach chamas ('one who breathes out violence') describe a courtroom scene — the speaker is being attacked with perjured testimony and violent intent disguised as legal process. The verb puwach ('to breathe, blow, puff') applied to chamas ('violence') creates an image of people who exhale destruction the way others exhale air — violence is their natural respiration.
13. In the Masoretic text, the word lulei has extraordinary dots (puncta extraordinaria) above it — a scribal notation indicating uncertainty about the reading. These dots may signal that the word was debated by ancient editors. Despite the textual uncertainty, the meaning is clear: the speaker's belief in God's goodness is the only thing preventing collapse.
14. The repetition of qavveh el-YHWH ('wait for the LORD') at the beginning and end of the verse creates a frame that makes waiting the defining act. The Hebrew verb qavah means 'to wait, to hope, to look expectantly' — it is not passive resignation but active, taut expectation, like a rope pulled tight.

Summary: A psalm of urgent petition that pivots dramatically to thanksgiving. David cries out to the LORD as his rock, terrified of being dragged down to the pit with the wicked. He asks God to distinguish him from those who speak peace to their neighbors while harboring malice. At verse 6, the tone shifts abruptly — God has heard, and the speaker erupts in praise, declaring the LORD his strength, his shield, and the saving refuge of his anointed.

What Makes This Remarkable: The pivot at verse 6 is one of the sharpest in the Psalter. Verses 1-5 are pure crisis — the speaker fears silence from God, separation from God, and being grouped with the wicked for judgment. Then verse 6 announces: 'Blessed be the LORD, for he has heard the voice of my pleas for mercy.' No transition, no explanation of what changed. This pattern of sudden reversal — common in lament psalms — suggests either a moment of prophetic assurance received during worship or a deliberate literary structure that compresses the entire journey from despair to deliverance into a single psalm. The final two verses (vv. 8-9) shift from individual thanksgiving to communal intercession — the speaker prays for the LORD's people and the LORD's inheritance, using shepherd language that echoes Psalm 23.

Translation Friction: The imprecatory section (vv. 3-5) asks God to 'repay' the wicked according to their deeds and 'tear them down.' This is not vengeful emotion seeking expression but a request for divine justice — the speaker asks God, not himself, to act. The theology underlying the request is covenantal: those who oppose God's anointed oppose God himself, and God should deal with them accordingly. The term meshicho ('his anointed,' v. 8) refers to the Davidic king but carries messianic overtones that later tradition developed extensively.

Connections: The cry to the 'rock' (tsur, v. 1) echoes Psalm 18:2, 31, 46 and anticipates Psalm 31:2-3. The fear of being 'drawn down to the pit' (v. 1) connects to Psalm 30:3 and Psalm 88:4. The shepherd imagery in verse 9 ('shepherd them and carry them forever') links directly to Psalm 23 and to Isaiah 40:11. The title 'his anointed' (meshicho, v. 8) connects to Psalm 2:2 and to the broader messianic thread through the Psalter.

¹Of David.

To you I cry, O LORD, my rock!
Do not be deaf to me,
for if you are silent toward me,
I will become like those who go down to the pit.

²Hear the voice of my pleas for mercy
when I cry out to you,
when I lift my hands toward the inner sanctuary of your holiness.

³Do not drag me away with the wicked,
with the workers of evil,
who speak peace to their neighbors while malice is in their hearts.

⁴Give them according to their deeds and according to the evil of their actions.
Give them according to the work of their hands;
repay them what they deserve.

⁵Because they do not understand the works of the LORD or the deeds of his hands,
he will tear them down and never rebuild them.

⁶Blessed be the LORD,
for he has heard the voice of my pleas for mercy!

⁷The LORD is my strength and my shield.
In him my heart trusts, and I am helped;
my heart leaps for joy,
and with my song I give him thanks.

⁸The LORD is the strength of his people and the saving refuge of his anointed.

⁹Save your people and bless your inheritance;
shepherd them and carry them forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The wordplay between techerash ('be silent/deaf') and the speaker's calling (eqra, 'I cry out') creates a terrifying asymmetry: the speaker shouts and God is silent. The rock that should echo back provides no resonance. This is the nightmare scenario of faith — calling to God and hearing nothing.
2. The devir ('inner sanctuary, oracle room') is the Holy of Holies — the innermost chamber of the temple where the ark of the covenant rested and where God's presence was believed to dwell most intensely. The speaker lifts his hands (nossi yadai) toward this place as the directional focus of prayer. The hands lifted toward the devir are like antennae oriented toward the source of divine communication.
3. The contrast between shalom (spoken) and raah (harbored) is the defining characteristic of the wicked in this psalm. They are not openly violent but secretly malicious. This makes them more dangerous than obvious enemies — they destroy through deception rather than direct assault.
4. The fourfold repetition — ke-fo'olam ('according to their deeds'), ke-roa maalleleihem ('according to the evil of their practices'), ke-maaseh yedeihem ('according to the work of their hands'), hashev gemulam lahem ('repay their recompense to them') — is not rhetorical excess but legal precision. The speaker asks for strict proportional justice: let the punishment match the crime exactly. No more, no less. This is lex talionis applied to divine judgment.
5. The reason for judgment: lo yavinu ('they do not understand, they do not discern'). The wicked are not merely immoral — they are willfully obtuse. They refuse to see God's peullot ('works, actions') and maaseh yadav ('the work of his hands') in creation, history, and providence. The consequence: yehershem ('he will tear them down') ve-lo yivnem ('and will not rebuild them'). The architectural metaphor is final — demolition without reconstruction. God builds and tears down; those he tears down for willful blindness will not be rebuilt.
6. The eruption of barukh YHWH after five verses of desperate petition mirrors the pattern of Psalm 22, where lament gives way without explanation to praise. This pattern may reflect actual worship experience — a moment of assurance received during prayer — or it may be a theological assertion that God's hearing is certain regardless of how the speaker feels.
7. Three titles: uzzi ('my strength'), maginni ('my shield'), and the implicit savior (neezarti, 'I am helped/rescued'). The heart (lev) appears twice: it trusts (batach) and it leaps for joy (yaaloz). The same heart that was terrified of silence now exults. The verb alaz ('to exult, rejoice, be jubilant') describes spontaneous, uncontainable joy — the heart does not merely feel better; it leaps.
8. The scope expands from individual to national. YHWH oz-lamo ('the LORD is strength for them/his people') extends the speaker's experience to the entire community. Maoz yeshuot meshicho ('the saving refuge of his anointed') introduces the term mashiach ('anointed one') — referring to the Davidic king in its original context but carrying the weight of messianic expectation in later Jewish and Christian reading. The anointed one's salvation is not private — it encompasses the people.
9. The shift from personal thanksgiving to national intercession is characteristic of Davidic psalms — the king's private experience always has public implications. The king who has been rescued by God immediately turns to pray for the people who depend on him, because his rescue is their rescue.

Summary: A thunderstorm psalm — the voice of the LORD crashes seven times across the landscape, shattering cedars, splitting flames, shaking the wilderness, stripping forests bare, and causing deer to writhe. The psalm opens with a summons to the heavenly beings to ascribe glory to the LORD, traces the storm's path from the Mediterranean coast eastward through Lebanon and the desert, and closes with the LORD enthroned over the cosmic flood, giving strength and peace to his people.

What Makes This Remarkable: The sevenfold repetition of qol YHWH ('the voice of the LORD') is the structural backbone of the psalm. Seven is the number of divine completeness, and each occurrence of 'the voice' intensifies the storm: powerful, majestic, breaking cedars, splitting fire, shaking wilderness, causing deer to calve, stripping forests. The storm moves geographically from west to east — from the 'great waters' (Mediterranean, v. 3) through Lebanon and Sirion (v. 6) to the wilderness of Kadesh (v. 8). This is not a storm observed from shelter; it is a theophany — God's self-revelation through raw natural power. Some scholars have noted structural parallels with Ugaritic hymns to Baal the storm god, suggesting that this psalm may deliberately reassign Baal's attributes to YHWH: the God of Israel is the true lord of the storm.

Translation Friction: The phrase benei elim ('sons of the mighty' or 'sons of gods,' v. 1) addresses heavenly beings — members of the divine council — not human worshippers. The psalm's opening audience is not the congregation in the temple but the angelic assembly in heaven. This raises the question of who is 'overhearing' this cosmic worship and why. The answer may be that the psalm invites human worshippers to join a worship service already in progress among the heavenly beings. The 'flood' (mabbul, v. 10) appears only here and in the Genesis flood narrative, linking God's enthronement to his sovereignty over the primordial waters of chaos.

Connections: The 'voice of the LORD' as storm theophany connects to Exodus 19:16-19 (thunder at Sinai), 1 Kings 19:11-12 (the voice that was not in the wind, earthquake, or fire), and Job 37-38 (God speaking from the whirlwind). The cedar imagery links to 2 Kings 19:23 and Isaiah 2:13. The 'flood' (mabbul) of verse 10 connects to Genesis 6-9 and to the cosmic waters of Psalm 93:3-4. The closing benediction of strength (oz) and peace (shalom) anticipates the Aaronic blessing of Numbers 6:24-26. Jesus stilling the storm (Mark 4:35-41) demonstrates authority over the same forces celebrated in this psalm.

¹A psalm of David.

Ascribe to the LORD, O heavenly beings!

Ascribe to the LORD glory and strength!

²Ascribe to the LORD the glory of his name;

bow down to the LORD in the splendor of holiness.

³The voice of the LORD is over the waters.

The God of glory thunders —

the LORD, over the great waters.

⁴The voice of the LORD is powerful;

the voice of the LORD is majestic.

⁵The voice of the LORD shatters the cedars;

the LORD shatters the cedars of Lebanon.

⁶He makes Lebanon skip like a calf, and Sirion like a young wild ox.

7The voice of the LORD splits flames of fire.

8the LORD shakes the wilderness of Kadesh.
The voice of the LORD shakes the wilderness;

9The voice of the LORD makes the deer writhe in labor and strips the forests bare.
And in his temple, all cry: "Glory!"

10The LORD sits enthroned over the flood;
the LORD sits enthroned as king forever.

11The LORD gives strength to his people;
the LORD blesses his people with peace.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Benei elim ('sons of the mighty') is linguistically related to benei ha-elohim ('sons of God') in Job 1:6, 2:1, and Genesis 6:2 — members of the heavenly council. The Septuagint translates this as 'sons of God.' The rendering 'heavenly beings' captures the meaning without importing later angelology into the text.
2. Kevod shemo ('the glory of his name') — the name bears the full weight of God's character, and the heavenly beings are to honor it accordingly. Hishtachavu ('bow down, prostrate yourselves') is the most physically complete gesture of worship — full-body prostration. Be-hadrat-qodesh ('in the splendor/adornment of holiness') could describe the worshippers dressed in holy garments or the setting of worship adorned with holiness. Either way, holiness is the environment in which true worship occurs.
3. The connection between thunder and divine speech is ancient and cross-cultural, but in the Hebrew Bible it carries specific theological freight. At Sinai, God spoke from the mountain with thunder and fire (Exodus 19:16-19). Here, the entire landscape becomes Sinai — God speaks from every direction.
4. Two attributes of the divine voice: ba-koach ('in power') and be-hadar ('in majesty, splendor'). The voice is both forceful and beautiful — it does not merely destroy; it overwhelms with grandeur. Koach is raw power; hadar is the aesthetic impact of that power. Together they describe an experience that is simultaneously terrifying and magnificent.
5. The cedars of Lebanon (arzei ha-Levanon) were the largest, strongest, most majestic trees in the ancient world — the ancient equivalent of skyscrapers. They were symbols of power, permanence, and human pride (Isaiah 2:13). When God's voice shatters (shover) them, it demonstrates power that dwarfs the most impressive works of nature. If the cedars cannot stand, nothing can.
6. Sirion is identified with Mount Hermon in Deuteronomy 3:9. The psalm traces the storm's path from the Mediterranean coast (v. 3) through the Lebanon range and Hermon (v. 6) and into the southern wilderness (v. 8), covering the entire north-south extent of the land.
7. Chotsev lahavot esh ('hewing/splitting flames of fire') — lightning. The verb chatsav means 'to hew, cut, quarry' — it is used for cutting stone. God's voice cuts fire the way a mason cuts rock. Lightning is presented not as random electrical discharge but as the deliberate craftsmanship of the divine voice shaping fire into bolts.
8. The storm has moved south from Lebanon to the midbar Qadesh ('wilderness of Kadesh') — either Kadesh-barnea in the Negev or a northern Kadesh in Syria. The verb chil/yachil ('to writhe, shake, tremble, be in labor') describes the wilderness convulsing as though in labor pains. The uninhabited wasteland — the place with no audience — trembles before God's voice. God does not need spectators to be powerful.
9. The single word kavod as the temple's response is extraordinarily compressed. Everything the storm displays — power, majesty, dominion over nature — is captured in one word. The brevity is the point: when you have witnessed what God's voice can do, no elaborate speech is needed. One word suffices.
10. The rarity of mabbul makes this verse unusually weighty. Every Hebrew reader would hear the Genesis flood in this word. The psalm is saying: the God whose voice just shattered cedars and shook the wilderness is the same God who once unmade the world with water and who now reigns over those same waters. His sovereignty is both terrifying and total.
11. The ending creates a profound theological statement: the same power that breaks cedars blesses people. God's strength (oz) is not diminished when given to his people — it is shared. And the result of receiving the strength of the storm-God is not terror but shalom. This is one of the most concise statements of the paradox of divine power in the Psalter.

Summary: A thanksgiving psalm celebrating rescue from the brink of death. The superscription associates it with the dedication of the house (the temple or David's palace). David praises the LORD for pulling him up from Sheol, recounts his complacency before the crisis ('I said in my prosperity, I shall never be moved'), confesses that God hid his face and he was dismayed, and then declares that God has turned his mourning into dancing and clothed him with joy.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's emotional honesty is arresting. David admits that prosperity made him complacent — 'In my ease I said: I will never be shaken' (v. 7). The Hebrew word shalvi ('my ease, my security, my prosperity') describes the dangerous comfort that comes from extended blessing. When everything goes well for long enough, the human heart starts to believe it deserves stability. Then God hid his face (histarta fanekha, v. 8), and the foundation collapsed. The psalm teaches that the prosperity itself was God's gift, and its removal was God's pedagogy. The most quoted line — 'Weeping may lodge for the night, but joy comes in the morning' (v. 6) — compresses an entire theology of suffering into a single sentence: sorrow is temporary and nocturnal; joy is permanent and diurnal. Darkness is the visitor; light is the resident.

Translation Friction: The superscription — mizmor shir chanukat ha-bayit le-David ('a psalm, a song for the dedication of the house, of David') — creates historical puzzlement. David did not build or dedicate the temple; Solomon did (1 Kings 8). The 'house' (bayit) may refer to David's palace (2 Samuel 5:11), or the superscription may indicate liturgical use at the later temple dedication, or at the Feast of Hanukkah (which takes its name from chanukah, 'dedication'). The psalm is indeed read during Hanukkah in Jewish tradition. The phrase 'you brought my soul up from Sheol' (v. 4) could be literal (near-death illness or battle wound) or figurative (a crisis so severe it felt like death). The psalm does not specify the nature of the crisis, which makes it universally applicable.

Connections: The descent-to-Sheol and rescue pattern connects to Jonah 2 (prayer from the belly of the fish), Psalm 18:4-6, and Psalm 116:3-8. The 'mourning into dancing' transformation (v. 12) echoes Jeremiah 31:13 ('I will turn their mourning into joy'). The 'morning joy' of verse 6 anticipates Lamentations 3:22-23 ('his mercies are new every morning'). The theological pattern — prosperity leading to complacency, crisis restoring dependence — runs through Deuteronomy 8:11-18 and Hosea 13:6.

¹A psalm — a song for the dedication of the house. Of David.

²I will exalt you, O LORD, for you have drawn me up and have not let my enemies gloat over me.

³O LORD my God, I cried to you for help, and you healed me.

⁴O LORD, you brought my soul up from Sheol;
you kept me alive from among those going down to the pit.

⁵Sing praise to the LORD, you his faithful ones, and give thanks to his holy name.

⁶For his anger lasts only a moment,
but his favor lasts a lifetime.
Weeping may lodge for the night,
but joy comes in the morning.

⁷As for me, I said in my ease:

"I will never be shaken."

⁸O LORD, by your favor you made my mountain stand strong;
you hid your face — I was dismayed.

⁹To you, O LORD, I called,
and to the Lord I pleaded for mercy.

¹⁰What profit is there in my death,
in my going down to the pit?
Can the dust praise you?
Can it declare your faithfulness?

¹¹Hear, O LORD, and be gracious to me!
O LORD, be my helper!

¹²You have turned my mourning into dancing;
you have removed my sackcloth and clothed me with joy,

¹³so that my glory may sing your praise and not be silent.
O LORD my God, I will give thanks to you forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription combines mizmor ('psalm,' a musical composition) with shir ('song,' a vocal piece) — this is both instrumental and vocal. Chanukat ha-bayit ('the dedication of the house') uses the word chanukah, from which the Jewish festival takes its name. The 'house' is ambiguous — David's palace, the temple site, or a future liturgical context. In WLC versification, this superscription is verse 1.
2. Dalah ('to draw up') from a cistern or well creates a vivid image of depth and rescue. The bor ('pit') of Psalm 28:1 and the Sheol of verse 4 are the deep places from which God draws the speaker up. The well metaphor implies darkness, confinement, and helplessness at the bottom.
3. Vattirpaeni ('and you healed me') uses the verb rapa ('to heal, cure, restore'). This suggests the crisis may have been illness — or the word may be used broadly for any restoration of well-being. Either way, the pattern is simple and complete: I cried (shivvati), you healed (tirpaeni). The brevity mirrors the experience — when God acts, the transformation is swift.
4. The preposition min ('from') in min-Sheol could mean 'from Sheol' (he was already there) or 'from going to Sheol' (he was headed there). Either way, the proximity to death was extreme. The speaker does not overstate the crisis — he uses the strongest possible language because the crisis was genuinely life-threatening.
5. Chasidav ('his faithful ones, his devoted ones') — those who are bound to God by chesed, who have received and reciprocated God's covenant love. They are summoned to zammeru ('sing, make music') and hodu ('give thanks, confess, acknowledge'). The phrase zekher qodsho ('the remembrance/memorial of his holiness' or 'his holy name') treats God's holiness as something to be commemorated and declared publicly.
6. Rega ('a moment, an instant') is the smallest unit of time the Hebrew language can express. God's anger occupies a rega; God's favor occupies chayyim ('a whole life'). The disproportion is the point — wrath is a flicker; grace is the main event.
6. The verb yalin ('to lodge, to spend the night') applied to weeping treats sorrow as a temporary visitor. Rinnah ('a shout of joy, a ringing cry') is not quiet relief but vocal, public jubilation.
7. The phrase bal-emmaot ('I will not be shaken') echoes Psalm 21:8 and Psalm 16:8 — but there the stability comes from trusting in God, while here it comes from self-confidence born of prosperity. The same words carry opposite theological weight depending on their source.
8. Histarta fanekha ('you hid your face') is one of the most frightening phrases in the Psalter. The hidden face of God means the withdrawal of attention, favor, protection, and presence. It is the experience behind Psalm 22:1 ('why have you forsaken me?') and behind every dark night of the soul. Here, it serves a pedagogical purpose: God hid his face to show the speaker what his life was like without it.
9. Two names — YHWH and Adonai ('Lord, Master') — and two verbs — eqa ('I called') and etchannan ('I pleaded for grace/mercy'). The shift from complacent self-confidence (v. 7) to desperate prayer (v. 9) is the crisis itself: the speaker who said 'I will never be shaken' is now begging for mercy. The complacency had to break before the prayer could begin.

10. This argument — the dead cannot praise God — appears repeatedly in the Psalter (Psalm 6:5, 88:10-12, 115:17). It reflects a pre-resurrection understanding where Sheol is a place of silence and diminished existence. The speaker leverages this theology: keep me alive so I can keep worshipping.
11. Three imperatives in rapid succession: shema ('hear'), chonnenei ('be gracious to me'), heyeh ozer li ('be a helper to me'). The brevity reflects urgency — this is not elaborate liturgical prayer but compressed crisis communication. Every word is essential.
12. The reversal pairs are precise: mourning/dancing, sackcloth/joy, removal/clothing. Each pair represents a complete inversion — not gradual improvement but sudden, dramatic transformation. This is the 'morning joy' of verse 6 made concrete in the speaker's wardrobe.
13. Kavod ('glory') as a reference to the speaker's soul or inner being appears also in Psalm 16:9 ('my glory rejoices') and Psalm 57:8 ('awake, my glory'). The human kavod is the reflection of divine kavod — the part of a person capable of worship. To silence it through death would be to extinguish a flame that was meant to burn in praise.

Summary: A psalm of David that moves from desperate plea to triumphant trust. The psalmist commits his spirit into the LORD's hands, cries out from a state of siege — scorned by enemies, forgotten by friends, his body wasting — and then pivots sharply into praise for the God who heard him. The psalm oscillates between terror and confidence, between the language of entrapment and the language of wide-open spaces, ultimately landing on a call for all who wait on the LORD to be strong.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 6 in Hebrew (v. 5 in English) — 'Into your hand I commit my spirit' (be-yadekha afqid ruchi) — became the most famous deathbed prayer in Western civilization when Jesus quoted it from the cross (Luke 23:46). But in its original context, this is not a dying man's last words; it is a living man's act of trust in the middle of crisis. David is not surrendering to death — he is surrendering to God instead of surrendering to fear. The verb paqad in the Hiphil (afqid) means 'to deposit, to entrust for safekeeping,' like leaving valuables with a trusted guardian. David treats his own life-breath (ruach) as something too precious for him to protect, so he hands it to God. The psalm's emotional range is extraordinary: it contains some of the most desolate language in the Psalter ('I am forgotten like a dead man out of mind, I have become like a broken vessel') alongside some of the most exuberant ('How great is your goodness that you have stored up for those who fear you').*

Translation Friction: *The superscription assigns the psalm to David (le-David), and the biographical details — enemies, conspiracies, a besieged city — fit many episodes in David's life. However, the phrase 'fortified city' (ir mator) in verse 22 has generated debate: some read it as David's confidence during a siege (perhaps at Keilah, 1 Samuel 23), while others emend to 'city of distress.' The LXX reads 'city of siege' without emendation. The verb afqid ('I commit/deposit') in verse 6 is a commercial term — entrusting goods for safekeeping — applied to the most intimate possible object: one's own spirit. This metaphor treats God as a banker of souls, which is a strikingly transactional image embedded in what is otherwise pure trust language.*

Connections: The phrase 'Into your hand I commit my spirit' (v. 6) is quoted by Jesus on the cross in Luke 23:46 and by Stephen at his stoning in Acts 7:59. Verse 14 — 'My times are in your hand' — became a foundational text for Jewish and Christian theology of divine sovereignty over individual destiny. Psalm 31 shares vocabulary and themes with Psalm 22 (the cry of dereliction) and Psalm 71 (the aging sufferer who trusts in God). The language of being 'hidden in the shelter of your presence' (v. 21) echoes Psalm 27:5 and Psalm 91:1. Jeremiah appears to echo this psalm in several passages (Jeremiah 20:10 mirrors v. 14 closely), leading some scholars to call this a 'Jeremican psalm.'

¹For the director of music. A psalm of David.

²In you, O LORD, I have taken refuge.
Let me never be put to shame.
In your righteousness, deliver me.

³Turn your ear toward me — rescue me quickly.
Be a rock of strength for me,
a fortified house to save me.

⁴For you are my rock and my fortress.
For the sake of your name,
lead me and guide me.

⁵Pull me out of the net they have hidden for me,
for you are my refuge.

⁶Into your hand I commit my spirit.
You have redeemed me, O LORD, God of truth.

⁷I despise those who cling to worthless idols,
but I — I trust in the LORD.

⁸I will rejoice and be glad in your faithful love, for you have seen my affliction — you have known the distress of my soul.

⁹You have not handed me over to the enemy.
You have set my feet in a wide-open place.

¹⁰Be gracious to me, O LORD, for I am in distress.
My eye wastes away from grief —
my soul and my body as well.

¹¹My life is spent in sorrow,
and my years in groaning.
My strength fails because of my affliction, and my bones waste away.

¹²Because of all my adversaries I have become a disgrace — especially to my neighbors — and a terror to my friends.
Those who see me in the street flee from me.

¹³I am forgotten like a dead man, gone from the heart.
I have become like a shattered vessel.

¹⁴For I have heard the whispering of many — terror on every side! — as they conspire together against me, plotting to take my life.

¹⁵But I — I trust in you, O LORD.
I say, 'You are my God.'

¹⁶My times are in your hand.
Deliver me from the hand of my enemies and from those who pursue me.

¹⁷Let your face shine upon your servant.
Save me in your faithful love.

¹⁸O LORD, let me not be put to shame, for I have called on you.
Let the wicked be shamed;
let them be silenced in Sheol.

¹⁹Let lying lips be struck silent — those that speak arrogantly against the righteous with pride and contempt.

²⁰How abundant is your goodness that you have stored up for those who fear you, that you have worked for those who take refuge in you in the sight of all people!

²¹You hide them in the shelter of your presence from the schemes of men.
You store them in a shelter from the strife of tongues.

²²Blessed be the LORD, for He has shown me His wondrous faithful love in a city under siege.

²³I had said in my alarm,
'I am cut off from your sight!'
But you heard the voice of my pleas for mercy
when I cried out to you.

²⁴Love the LORD, all you His faithful ones!
The LORD preserves those who are trustworthy and fully repays the one who acts in pride.

²⁵Be strong, and let your heart take courage, all you who wait for the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription la-menatseach ('for the director of music') appears in fifty-five psalms and indicates liturgical use — this psalm was performed in corporate worship, not merely recorded as private prayer. The preposition le- in le-David can mean 'of David,' 'for David,' or 'belonging to the Davidic collection.'
2. The verb chasah ('to take refuge') is one of the Psalter's signature words, appearing over twenty-five times. It is concrete in origin — to flee to a sheltering rock, a fortress, a city of refuge — and metaphorical in application. David does not merely believe in God; he has physically and spiritually placed himself under God's protection.
2. The phrase be-tsidqatekha palleteni ('in your righteousness deliver me') makes God's moral character the basis for the appeal. tsedaqah here is not abstract justice but relational faithfulness — God's commitment to set things right for those in covenant with Him.
3. The verb hatteh ('incline, turn') asks God to bend down — an anthropomorphic image of the transcendent God lowering Himself to hear. The urgency is marked by meherah ('quickly, speedily'). Three fortress images pile up: tsur maoz ('rock of strength'), beit metsudot ('house of fortifications'), and the implied shelter behind them. David is not asking for comfort but for military protection — walls, rock, stronghold.

4. The shift from petition to declaration — 'you are my rock' (sal'i) — is characteristic of psalms of trust. David does not merely request that God become his fortress; he asserts that God already is. The phrase le-ma'an shimkha ('for the sake of your name') introduces a critical motive: God's own reputation is at stake. If God's declared protegee is destroyed, God's name is diminished before the nations.
5. The image shifts from fortress to hunting trap. The resheth ('net') is a snare laid in secret (tamenu, 'they have hidden') by unnamed enemies. The juxtaposition of 'net' and 'refuge' creates a spatial contrast: the enemies close in from below with traps, while God provides escape from above. The pronoun 'they' (tamenu) is deliberately vague — the threat is everywhere and from everyone.
6. The Hiphil of paqad (afqid) is a technical term for depositing goods with a trustee — see Exodus 22:6-12 for the legal framework. The depositor retains ownership; the trustee assumes responsibility for safekeeping. Applied to ruach ('spirit'), this creates a remarkable image: God holds my life in trust for me.
6. El emet ('God of truth') uses emet in its full semantic range — truth, reliability, faithfulness, constancy. God is not merely truthful in speech but dependable in character. The word emet shares a root with amen and emunah ('faithfulness').
7. The phrase havlei shav ('vanities of emptiness') combines two words for nothingness — hevel ('vapor, breath, vanity') and shav ('emptiness, falsehood, worthlessness'). The phrase likely refers to idol worship but encompasses any misplaced trust. The emphatic pronoun va-ani ('but I') creates a stark contrast: while others cling to vapor, David clings to the LORD.
8. The verb ra'itah ('you have seen') is not passive observation but attentive care — God sees affliction the way a parent sees a child's pain, with intent to respond. The verb yadata ('you have known') deepens this: God does not merely observe David's trouble from a distance; He knows it intimately, from inside. The pair 'seen' and 'known' together mean comprehensive awareness combined with compassionate engagement.
9. The noun merchav ('broad place, wide space') comes from rachav ('to be wide, spacious'). It is the opposite of tsar ('narrow, constricted'), from which tsarah ('distress, trouble') derives. Hebrew literally equates trouble with tightness and salvation with spaciousness. Psalm 18:19 uses the same image: 'He brought me out into a broad place.'
10. The sudden shift from praise (vv. 8-9) back to lament (vv. 10-14) is characteristic of psalms that refuse to smooth over the rawness of experience. The verb ashshab ('to waste away, to grow dim') describes physical deterioration — the eye literally failing from weeping. The three-part list (eye, soul, body/belly) traces the damage from surface to interior: tears ruin the eyes, grief erodes the soul, and the body itself collapses.
11. The phrase kalu be-yagon chayyai ('my life is consumed in grief') uses kalah ('to be completed, to be exhausted') — grief has used up his entire life. The word avoni is ambiguous: it can mean 'my iniquity' or 'my affliction/punishment.' Context favors 'affliction' here, since the psalm otherwise insists on the psalmist's innocence. The bones wasting away (atsamai asheshu) describes the total physical collapse that prolonged distress produces.
12. The social dimension of suffering is devastating here. The psalmist is not merely in pain but in shame (cherpah, 'reproach, disgrace'). His neighbors recoil, his friends are afraid of him, and strangers in the street actively avoid him. The verb nadedu ('they fled, they wandered away') suggests people crossing the street to avoid contact. Suffering has made him a social contagion.
13. The phrase mi-lev ('from the heart') specifies the kind of forgetting: not merely failing to recall a name but erasing someone from the place where affection lives. The keli oved ('perishing vessel') is a clay pot — cheap, common, and unrepairable once cracked. In a culture where pottery was disposable, this image carried the force of 'thrown in the garbage.'
14. The phrase magor mi-saviv ('terror on every side') appears in Jeremiah 6:25, 20:3, 20:10, and 46:5, leading many scholars to connect this psalm with Jeremiah's experience. In Jeremiah 20:10, the prophet quotes almost this exact line: 'I have heard the whispering of many — terror on every side! — Denounce him! Let us denounce him!' Whether David influenced Jeremiah or vice versa, the phrase captures the paranoia of being surrounded by conspirators who plot openly while the target listens helplessly.
15. The emphatic va-ani ('but I') makes the same contrast as verse 7: whatever others do, however desperate the situation, David's position is fixed. The declaration Elohai attah ('You are my God') is the simplest and most radical statement of faith in the Hebrew Bible — a personal claim on the God of the universe. The possessive 'my' is the word that matters most.
16. The noun ittot (plural of et, 'time') covers the full range of temporal experience — moments, seasons, appointed times, life-stages. In Ecclesiastes 3:1-8, the same word structures the famous 'a time for every purpose' passage. Here, David places all of those times under God's sovereign control.
17. The priestly blessing of Numbers 6:25 — 'The LORD make His face to shine upon you' — is here turned into personal petition. The 'shining face' of God means favor, attention, delight — the opposite of the hidden face that means abandonment. David calls himself avdekha ('your servant'), a title of both humility and privilege: a servant belongs to his master, and the master is obligated to protect what belongs to him.
18. The plea returns to the opening theme of shame (bosh). The logic is distributive: shame must fall somewhere — either on David for trusting God in vain, or on the wicked for opposing God's servant. David asks that it fall on the right party. The verb yiddemu ('let them be silenced') and the destination li-She'ol ('to Sheol, the underworld') combine: the wicked should be reduced to the silence of death.
19. The adjective ataq ('arrogant, insolent, presumptuous') describes speech that overreaches — words that are too bold, too brazen, too dismissive of the righteous. The combination of ga'avah ('pride') and buz ('contempt') describes the particular cruelty of those who mock the suffering of the faithful.
20. The verb tsafan ('to hide, to treasure up, to store') appears in Proverbs 2:7 with the same meaning: God stores up wisdom for the upright. The image suggests that God's goodness is not diminished by the delay in its appearance — it accumulates, like treasure in a vault, waiting for the right moment.

21. The phrase be-seter panekha ('in the hiding place of your face/presence') creates a paradox: God's face, which David asked to shine (v. 17), now becomes a hiding place for the faithful. The divine presence is simultaneously radiance for the beloved and concealment from enemies. The 'strife of tongues' (riv leshonot) identifies the primary weapon: not swords but words — slander, accusation, gossip.
22. The verb hifli ('He made wonderful, He showed wondrously') from the root pala ('to be extraordinary, to do wonders') — the same root that gives us the noun pele ('wonder'). God's faithful love (chesed) is not merely adequate but astonishing. The phrase be-ir matsor ('in a city of siege/fortress') is debated: it may mean God showed love while David was besieged, or it may mean God's love was itself like a fortified city. Both readings are theologically rich.
23. The word chofzi can mean 'haste' or 'alarm/panic.' The LXX renders it with ekstasis ('ecstasy' or 'astonishment'), suggesting an altered emotional state rather than simple hurry. The honesty of this verse is remarkable — David admits that his faith wavered, that he believed God had stopped watching. The psalm does not pretend that trust is uninterrupted.
24. The address shifts from God to the congregation. The chasedav ('His faithful ones') are those bound to God by chesed — the covenant-loyal community. The verb notser ('preserves, guards') and the verb meshallem ('repays, recompenses') create a double verdict: faithfulness is guarded; pride is repaid. The word yeter ('excess, abundance') modifies the repayment — God does not merely match but exceeds the measure of the proud person's arrogance.
25. The psalm closes with a communal exhortation. The two verbs chizqu ('be strong') and ya'amets levavkhem ('let your heart be courageous') are a standard pair for encouragement in the face of danger (cf. Deuteronomy 31:6, Joshua 1:6). The final word — ha-meyachalim la-YHWH ('those who wait/hope for the LORD') — defines the audience: people still in the middle of their crisis, still waiting for deliverance, not yet arrived at resolution. The psalm ends not with completed salvation but with sustained hope.

Summary: One of the seven traditional penitential psalms, Psalm 32 is David's testimony of what happened when he tried to conceal sin and what happened when he finally confessed. The psalm opens with a double blessing on the forgiven, describes the physical torment of unconfessed guilt, narrates the moment of confession, and then expands into instruction for others. It is both personal testimony and wisdom teaching — a psalm that moves from autobiography to theology to exhortation.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 32 contains the most concentrated deployment of Hebrew sin-vocabulary in the Psalter. Three words for sin appear in the opening two verses: pesha ('transgression, rebellion'), chata'ah ('sin, missing the mark'), and avon ('iniquity, moral crookedness'). These are not synonyms — they describe different dimensions of human failure. pesha is willful rebellion against authority; chata'ah is deviation from the right path; avon is the twisted distortion of what should be straight. Correspondingly, three words for forgiveness appear: nasui ('lifted, carried away'), kesui ('covered'), and lo yachshov ('not counted, not reckoned'). The three sins receive three removals. This is not accidental; the psalm is a theological architecture of complete forgiveness that addresses every category of human moral failure. The physical description of concealed guilt (vv. 3-4) — bones wasting, moisture dried up like summer heat — is among the most visceral accounts of psychosomatic suffering in ancient literature.

Translation Friction: The superscription calls this a maskil le-David ('a skillful poem of David'). The word maskil appears in thirteen psalm titles and its meaning is debated — it may mean 'instructive poem,' 'skillful composition,' or 'contemplative piece.' The traditional association with David's guilt over Bathsheba (2 Samuel 11-12) is not stated in the text but has been assumed since early rabbinic interpretation. The shift from first-person confession (vv. 1-7) to second-person instruction (vv. 8-9) has led some scholars to suggest the psalm combines two originally separate compositions, but this shift from testimony to teaching is a natural movement in wisdom literature.

Connections: Paul quotes verses 1-2 in Romans 4:7-8 as proof that righteousness is reckoned apart from works — God's forgiveness is a gift, not a wage. This makes Psalm 32 a foundational text for the doctrine of justification by faith. The three sin-words (pesha, chata'ah, avon) also appear together in Exodus 34:7, where God proclaims His own character as one who forgives all three categories. Psalm 51 is the other great Davidic penitential psalm and shares vocabulary with Psalm 32, but where Psalm 51 is the prayer of confession, Psalm 32 is the testimony after forgiveness has been received. The two psalms are complementary: Psalm 51 is the crisis; Psalm 32 is the aftermath.

¹Of David. A maskil.

Blessed is the one whose transgression is lifted away, whose sin is covered.

²Blessed is the person to whom the LORD does not count iniquity, and in whose spirit there is no deceit.

³When I kept silent, my bones wasted away through my groaning all day long.

⁴For day and night your hand was heavy upon me.
My vitality was changed as in the dry heat of summer. Selah.

⁵My sin I made known to you,
and my iniquity I did not conceal.
I said, 'I will confess my transgressions to the LORD' — and you lifted away the guilt of my sin. Selah.

⁶Therefore let everyone who is faithful pray to you at a time when you may be found.
Surely when the great waters rise, they will not reach him.

⁷You are my hiding place.
You preserve me from trouble.
You surround me with shouts of deliverance. Selah.

⁸I will instruct you and teach you in the way you should go.
I will counsel you with my eye upon you.

⁹Do not be like a horse or a mule, without understanding, whose movement must be curbed with bit and bridle — otherwise they will not come near you.

¹⁰Many are the sorrows of the wicked, but the one who trusts in the LORD — faithful love surrounds him.

¹¹Be glad in the LORD and rejoice, you righteous!
Shout for joy, all you who are upright in heart!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word maskil in the superscription has generated extensive scholarly debate. It may derive from sakal ('to be prudent, to instruct') and thus mean 'instructive psalm' or 'psalm of insight.' The LXX renders it synesis ('understanding'). Whatever its exact meaning, it marks this psalm as having a didactic purpose — it teaches something.
1. The passive participles nesui ('lifted away') and kesui ('covered') describe the state of the forgiven person, not the act of forgiveness. The person is walking around with their transgression already removed. The blessing is pronounced on a present condition, not a future hope.

2. Paul's use of this verse in Romans 4:7-8 (quoting the LXX) became the cornerstone of Protestant justification theology. The non-imputation of sin (lo yachshov avon) is read as the positive imputation of righteousness — a forensic declaration that changes the sinner's standing before God. Whether the psalmist intended this level of systematic theology is debatable, but the accounting metaphor (chashav) certainly supports a forensic reading.
2. The phrase ein be-rucho remiyyah ('in whose spirit there is no deceit') is sometimes read as a second condition for blessedness: the forgiven person must also be honest. Others read it as a result of forgiveness: once the sin is dealt with, the need for self-deception vanishes. Both readings are theologically coherent.
3. The psychosomatic description here anticipates modern understanding of the physical effects of unresolved guilt: insomnia, exhaustion, physical deterioration. The Hebrew poets understood intuitively that concealed guilt attacks the body. The 'roaring' (she'agah) may refer to wordless cries of pain — the body's protest against the soul's dishonesty.
4. The word leshadi is one of the most debated terms in the psalm. Some derive it from lashad ('moisture, freshness, vigor'), others emend to libbadi ('my heart'). The LXX reads 'I was turned to wretchedness.' Whatever the exact reading, the image is clear: something essential within David was desiccated by the sustained pressure of God's disciplining hand.
4. Selah appears here, marking a musical or liturgical pause. Its exact meaning remains unknown, but its placement after the description of divine pressure and physical collapse suggests a moment for the congregation to absorb the weight of what has been described.
5. The verb nasata ('you lifted, you carried away') is the same root as nesui in verse 1. God lifts the iniquity off David's back and carries it away. The wordplay between lo khissiti ('I did not cover') in verse 5 and kesui ('covered') in verse 1 is deliberate: when the sinner stops covering sin, God covers it. When the sinner tries to cover sin, God exposes the consequences through suffering.
5. The phrase avon chatta'ti ('the guilt/iniquity of my sin') stacks two sin-words together, as if to say: God removed not just the sin itself but the guilt that the sin produced — the entire complex of offense, shame, and consequence.
6. The phrase le-et metso ('at a time of finding') echoes Isaiah 55:6: 'Seek the LORD while He may be found.' The implication is that there is a window for confession — a time when God's ear is open — and wisdom seizes it. The 'great waters' (mayim rabbim) symbolize overwhelming catastrophe in the Psalter (cf. Psalm 18:16, 69:1-2). The confessed sinner is elevated above the flood; the one who refuses to confess drowns in guilt. David's experience becomes a paradigm: confess while there is time, before the waters rise.
7. The declaration attah seter li ('you are my hiding place') transforms the earlier imagery: God was the heavy hand of discipline (v. 4), but now He is the shelter of protection. The phrase ronnei fallet ('shouts/songs of deliverance') describes David as encircled — not by enemies but by celebrations of rescue. The verb tesoveveni ('you surround me') uses the same verb that could describe a siege, but here the surrounding is joyful. Where guilt surrounded David with groaning, forgiveness surrounds him with songs.
8. The speaker shifts — most interpreters read this as God speaking to David, though some read it as David speaking to others. The verb askil (Hiphil of sakal, 'to make wise, to instruct') connects to the superscription maskil. Three verbs of guidance pile up: instruct, teach, counsel. The phrase i'atsah alekha eini ('I will counsel with my eye upon you') means intimate, personal guidance — not a rulebook but a relationship. God watches and directs in real time, like a parent guiding a child with a glance.
9. The animal comparison is sharp: a horse or mule (pered) requires physical force (bit and bridle) because it lacks understanding (ein havin). The implication is that David was acting like a stubborn animal during his period of concealment — God had to use physical pressure (v. 4) because David refused to respond to wisdom. The instruction is: respond to God's gentle eye (v. 8), not His heavy hand (v. 4). Be teachable, not stubborn.
10. The contrast is stark: the wicked have makh'ovim ('pains, sorrows') as their surrounding environment, while the trusting person is surrounded (yesovevennu, the same verb as v. 7) by chesed ('faithful love'). The verb savav ('to surround') appears in both verse 7 and verse 10, creating a frame: what surrounds you depends on where you stand. The wicked are encircled by pain; the faithful are encircled by love.
11. The psalm ends with communal celebration. Three verbs of joy — simchu ('be glad'), gil'u ('rejoice'), harninu ('shout for joy') — address two groups: tsaddiqim ('righteous ones') and yishrei lev ('upright in heart'). The irony is rich: this is a penitential psalm — it began with the confession of grave sin — yet it ends with the righteous rejoicing. The forgiven sinner is now counted among the righteous. The upright heart of verse 11 is the spirit without deceit from verse 2. Forgiveness does not merely restore the sinner to neutral status; it places him among the rejoicing righteous.

Summary: Psalm 33 is a hymn of praise to the LORD as Creator and Sovereign, calling the righteous to worship with instruments and a new song. The psalm moves from the call to praise (vv. 1-3) through the reasons for praise: God's word is reliable (vv. 4-5), His word created the cosmos (vv. 6-9), His plan overrules the nations (vv. 10-12), He watches all humanity from heaven (vv. 13-15), military power cannot save (vv. 16-17), and only those who fear Him and hope in His faithful love are truly secure (vv. 18-22). It is one of the few psalms in Book I without a Davidic superscription.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 33 contains one of the Hebrew Bible's most concise statements of creation theology: 'By the word of the LORD the heavens were made, and by the breath of His mouth all their host' (v. 6). This single verse became a cornerstone of the doctrine of creation ex nihilo — God speaks and reality appears. The verb tsivvah ('He commanded') in verse 9 and the result vayyaamod ('it stood firm') compress the entire creation narrative into two words: command and existence. There is no effort, no struggle, no theogonic battle. God speaks; the cosmos obeys. This is creation as pure speech-act. The psalm also offers a devastating critique of military power: the war-horse is a 'vain hope for deliverance' (v. 17), and no king is saved by the size of his army (v. 16). In a world where Near Eastern kings boasted of their chariots and cavalry, this psalm says their entire military apparatus is irrelevant to the question of actual security.

Translation Friction: This is one of the 'orphan psalms' in Book I — it has no superscription attributing it to David or anyone else. The LXX adds 'of David,' but the Hebrew text stands alone. Some scholars note that Psalm 33 has exactly twenty-two verses, matching the number of letters in the Hebrew alphabet, and suggest it may have originally been an acrostic that was reworked. The phrase shir chadash ('new song') in verse 3 is intriguing — what makes a song 'new'? Some interpreters argue it refers to a fresh composition for a specific occasion; others see it as a theological statement: every encounter with God's faithfulness requires a response that cannot be borrowed from the past.

Connections: The opening call — 'Rejoice in the LORD, you righteous' — echoes the final verse of Psalm 32, creating a literary link between the two psalms (some scholars treat Psalm 33 as an extended response to Psalm 32's closing exhortation). The creation-by-word theology of verses 6-9 connects to Genesis 1 (where God creates by speaking), John 1:1-3 (where the Word is the agent of creation), and Hebrews 11:3 (where the worlds were framed by the word of God). The critique of military power (vv. 16-17) echoes Psalm 20:7 ('Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we trust in the name of the LORD our God') and Isaiah 31:1 ('Woe to those who go down to Egypt for help and rely on horses').

¹Shout for joy in the LORD, you righteous!

Praise is fitting for the upright.

²Give thanks to the LORD with the lyre.

With the ten-stringed harp, make music to Him.

³Sing to Him a new song.

Play skillfully with a shout of triumph.

⁴For the word of the LORD is upright, and all His work is done in faithfulness.

⁵He loves righteousness and justice.

The earth is full of the faithful love of the LORD.

⁶By the word of the LORD the heavens were made,
and all their host by the breath of His mouth.

⁷He gathers the waters of the sea as in a heap.
 He puts the deep waters in storehouses.
⁸May all the earth fear the LORD.
 May all the inhabitants of the world stand in awe of Him.
⁹For He spoke, and it came to be.
 He commanded, and it stood firm.
¹⁰The LORD frustrates the plans of the nations.
 He thwarts the purposes of the peoples.
¹¹The plan of the LORD stands forever,
 the purposes of His heart to all generations.
¹²Blessed is the nation whose God is the LORD,
 the people He has chosen as His own inheritance.
¹³From heaven the LORD looks down.
 He sees all the children of humanity.
¹⁴From the place where He dwells
 He gazes on all the inhabitants of the earth.
¹⁵He who fashions all their hearts alike,
 He who understands all their deeds.
¹⁶A king is not saved by the size of his army.
 A warrior is not delivered by great strength.
¹⁷The war-horse is a false hope for victory.
 Despite its great strength, it cannot save.
¹⁸See — the eye of the LORD is on those who fear Him,
 on those who hope in His faithful love, ¹⁹and to keep them alive in famine.
 to deliver their lives from death ²⁰Our soul waits for the LORD.
 He remains our help and our shield.
²¹For in Him our heart rejoices,
 because in His holy name we trust.
²²Let your faithful love, O LORD, be upon us, just as we have placed our hope in you.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb rannenu ('shout for joy, sing aloud') is more vigorous than ordinary singing — it is an exuberant, full-throated cry. The adjective na'avah ('fitting, seemly, beautiful') suggests that praise is not merely an obligation but an aesthetic match: righteous people and praise go together naturally, like music and rhythm. Praise looks right on them.

2. The kinnor ('lyre') was a portable stringed instrument associated with David (1 Samuel 16:23). The nevel asor ('ten-stringed harp' or 'ten-stringed lute') was a larger instrument. Together they represent the full ensemble of Israelite worship music. The verb zammeru ('make music, sing praise') is the root of mizmor ('psalm'), connecting this instrument-call to the Psalter itself.
3. The phrase shir chadash ('new song') appears six times in the Hebrew Bible (here, Psalms 40:3, 96:1, 98:1, 144:9, and Isaiah 42:10). It does not merely mean a recently composed song but a song that responds to a fresh act of God — new mercy demands new music. The adverb hetivu ('do well, play skillfully') demands excellence: worship is not a casual performance but a craft requiring the best the musician can offer. The teruah ('shout, blast, acclamation') adds a vocal and possibly instrumental dimension — a trumpet-like blast of triumph.
4. The adjective yashar ('straight, upright, right') applied to God's word means it never deviates, never misleads, never curves away from truth. The noun emunah ('faithfulness, reliability, constancy') applied to God's works means everything God does is rooted in His unshakable character. Word and work are aligned — what God says and what God does are a single consistent reality.
5. The pair tsedaqah u-mishpat ('righteousness and justice') describes God's moral character as both relational (tsedaqah) and judicial (mishpat). The second line makes a staggering claim: chesed YHWH male'ah ha-arets ('the faithful love of the LORD fills the earth'). Not the temple, not Israel, not the heavens — the entire earth is saturated with God's covenant love. This is a universal theological statement embedded in a hymn of Israelite worship.
6. The word ruach ('breath/spirit/wind') creates a bridge between the physical and spiritual dimensions of creation. When God speaks, His breath carries the words, and that breath is also the Spirit that gives life. Genesis 1:2 ('the Spirit of God hovered over the waters') and Genesis 2:7 ('God breathed into his nostrils the breath of life') use the same word. Creation is God breathing reality into existence.
7. The image of God gathering the sea ka-ned ('as a heap, as a mound') echoes the crossing of the Red Sea (Exodus 15:8) and the Jordan (Joshua 3:13, 16), where the waters stood in a heap. God treats the ocean — the most powerful and chaotic force in the ancient world — like a commodity to be stored in warehouses (otsarot, 'storehouses, treasuries'). The tehomot ('deeps, abysses') that terrified ancient Near Eastern peoples are God's inventory.
8. The scope is universal: kol ha-arets ('all the earth') and kol yoshvei tevel ('all inhabitants of the world'). The verb yaguru ('let them tremble, let them stand in awe') is stronger than ordinary fear — it describes the trembling that comes in the presence of overwhelming power. If God can gather oceans and store abysses, the only rational response from every human being is reverent awe.
9. The compression of this verse is itself a literary achievement — four words per line, with no connective tissue, no elaboration. The form mirrors the content: God's creative speech is terse, efficient, absolute. The echoes of Genesis 1 ('and God said... and it was so') are unmistakable, but the psalm compresses the creation narrative's repetitive formula into a single devastating couplet.
10. The verb hefir ('He broke, He annulled, He frustrated') from parar ('to break, to violate') means God actively dismantles the strategies of nations. The verb heni ('He thwarted, He made futile') from nu' ('to shake, to hinder') means God shakes their plans until they collapse. The parallelism between goyim ('nations') and amim ('peoples') is universal: no political entity, however powerful, can execute plans that contradict God's purposes.
11. The contrast with verse 10 is total: nations' plans are frustrated; God's plan stands (ta'amod, the same verb as v. 9 — what God speaks stands, what God plans stands). The phrase machshevot libbo ('the purposes of His heart') is striking — God's plans are not cold calculations but expressions of His heart's intent. The permanence markers le-olam ('forever') and le-dor va-dor ('to generation and generation') emphasize that God's purposes outlast every empire.
12. The ashrei ('blessed') formula from Psalm 32:1-2 returns, now applied not to an individual but to a nation. The word nachalah ('inheritance, possession, heritage') is a land-distribution term: in the conquest narratives, each tribe received its nachalah. Here the image is reversed: the people are God's inheritance. God has chosen Israel the way a firstborn chooses an estate — they are His valued possession.
13. The verb hibbit ('He looked, He gazed attentively') implies focused, purposeful observation — not a casual glance but a sovereign survey. The scope is universal: kol bene ha-adam ('all the sons of humanity'). God's vision is not limited to Israel; He observes every human being. This verse sets up the futility of military confidence in verses 16-17: if God sees everything from above, no hidden strategy or superior force can escape His notice.
14. The phrase mekhon shivto ('the established place of His dwelling') refers to God's heavenly throne — the fixed, permanent seat from which He governs. The verb hisghiach ('He looked out, He peered, He observed carefully') suggests looking through a window or from a watchtower — attentive surveillance of the entire earth.
15. The verb yotser ('the one who forms, who fashions') is the potter-word — the same verb used in Genesis 2:7 for God forming humanity from clay. Because God shaped every human heart, He understands every human motive. The verb mevin ('He understands, He discerns') goes beyond observation to comprehension. God does not merely see what people do; He grasps why they do it. The word yachad ('together, alike') means God fashioned all human hearts with the same capacity — no one has a heart so complex that God cannot read it.
16. The declaration ein hammelekha nosha ('the king is not saved') would have been politically provocative in any ancient Near Eastern context, where kings derived their legitimacy from military victories. The phrase be-rov chayil ('by abundance of force') and be-rov koach ('by abundance of strength') dismiss the two things every king cultivated: large armies and powerful soldiers. The psalm declares both irrelevant to actual security.

17. The word sheqer ('falsehood, deception, lie') applied to the horse is remarkable — the horse literally lies to you. It promises security and cannot deliver. The sus ('horse') in ancient Israel was primarily a military animal — war-horses pulled chariots and carried cavalry. Deuteronomy 17:16 explicitly forbade the king from multiplying horses, recognizing that military hardware becomes a substitute for trust in God. The psalm agrees: the horse is a beautiful, powerful lie.
18. The particle hinneh ('behold, see, look!') commands attention — after dismissing armies and war-horses, the psalm reveals where true security lies. The 'eye of the LORD' (ein YHWH) is the same comprehensive vision from verses 13-14, now focused specifically on the faithful. Being seen by God — which could be terrifying for the wicked — is comfort for those who fear Him and hope in His chesed.
19. The two threats — death (mavet) and famine (ra'av) — represent the ultimate physical dangers. God's watchful eye does not merely observe; it intervenes. The infinitives lehatsil ('to deliver') and lechayotam ('to keep them alive') describe ongoing, active preservation. The God who created the cosmos by a word now sustains individual lives through attentive care.
20. The shift to first-person plural (nafshenu, 'our soul') marks the congregation's response to the psalm's teaching. The verb chikketah ('has waited, waits') implies patient, expectant endurance — not passive waiting but active trust sustained over time. The titles ezrenu ('our help') and maginnenu ('our shield') compress God's role to two essentials: He assists and He protects.
21. The logic is circular in the best sense: trust produces joy, and joy confirms trust. The phrase be-shem qodsho ('in His holy name') means trust is placed not in an abstract concept but in the revealed character (shem, 'name') of God — everything God has shown Himself to be. The holiness (qodesh) of the name means it is set apart, utterly reliable, incorruptible.
22. The psalm closes with a prayer that matches God's faithful love (chesed) to the congregation's hope (yichal). The phrase ka'asher yichalnnu lakh ('just as we have hoped in you') does not demand a proportional transaction — it asks that the reality of God's love match the depth of the congregation's trust. The psalm that began with a call to shout for joy ends with a quiet, intimate petition: let your love be as real as our hope.

Summary: An acrostic psalm of David, composed when he feigned madness before Abimelech (the superscription's name for Achish king of Gath, 1 Samuel 21:10-15). The psalm is a wisdom-flavored hymn of thanksgiving that moves from personal testimony ('I sought the LORD and He answered me') to communal invitation ('Taste and see that the LORD is good') to didactic instruction ('Come, children, listen to me — I will teach you the fear of the LORD'). Each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet, giving the psalm the feel of an orderly, comprehensive meditation on the goodness of God toward the afflicted.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 9 — ta'amu u-re'u ki tov YHWH ('taste and see that the LORD is good') — is one of the most sensory theological invitations in all of Scripture. The verb ta'am ('to taste') demands physical experience, not intellectual assent. You cannot taste something from a distance; you must take it into your mouth. The psalmist is not arguing that God is good; he is daring the listener to experience God's goodness directly. This is empirical theology: try it and find out. The Christian tradition adopted this verse into eucharistic liturgy, where tasting the bread and wine becomes tasting the goodness of God. But in its original context, the invitation is broader: every experience of divine rescue is a 'tasting' of God's goodness. The acrostic form is itself remarkable — the poet has disciplined an outpouring of gratitude into alphabetic order, as if to say that praise can be both spontaneous and structured, both emotional and orderly.

Translation Friction: The superscription refers to 'Abimelech' (Avimelekh), but the biblical narrative in 1 Samuel 21 names the Philistine king as Achish. Abimelech may be a dynastic title for Philistine kings (like 'Pharaoh' for Egyptian rulers), or the superscription may reflect a different tradition. The acrostic is nearly perfect but omits the letter vav (the sixth letter) and adds a pe-verse at the end (v. 23) that falls outside the alphabet, suggesting either textual corruption or deliberate poetic license. Some scholars argue that acrostic psalms are inherently artificial — the alphabetic constraint forces content to fit a formal pattern — but the theological coherence of this psalm argues against dismissing it as mere formal exercise.

Connections: Verse 9 ('Taste and see that the LORD is good') is quoted in 1 Peter 2:3 as an invitation to new believers. Verse 15 ('The eyes of the LORD are toward the righteous, and His ears toward their cry') and verse 17 ('The righteous cry out, and the LORD hears') are quoted in 1 Peter 3:12. Verse 21 ('He guards all his bones; not one of them is broken') is applied to Jesus in John 19:36, connecting the righteous sufferer of the psalm to the crucified Messiah. The wisdom-teaching section (vv. 12-15) closely parallels Proverbs' instruction format: 'Come, children, listen to me.' The acrostic structure links this psalm to Psalms 25, 37, 111, 112, 119, and 145.

¹Of David, when he disguised his sanity before Abimelech, who drove him away, and he departed.

²I will bless the LORD at all times.
His praise will always be in my mouth.

³In the LORD my soul will boast.
Let the humble hear and be glad.

⁴and let us exalt His name together.
Magnify the LORD with me,

⁵I sought the LORD, and He answered me and delivered me from all my terrors.

⁶Those who look to Him are radiant, and their faces will never be ashamed.

⁷This poor man cried out, and the LORD heard him

⁸The angel of the LORD encamps around those who fear Him and delivers them.

⁹Taste and see that the LORD is good.
Blessed is the person who takes refuge in Him.

¹⁰Fear the LORD, you His holy ones, for there is no lack for those who fear Him.

¹¹Young lions may lack and go hungry,

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase be-shannoto et ta'mo ('when he changed his discernment/behavior') uses the same root (ta'am) that will appear in verse 9 ('taste and see'). The word ta'am means both 'taste/discernment' and 'behavior/judgment.' David altered his ta'am (pretended to be insane) before Abimelech, and now he invites others to ta'am (taste) God's goodness. The wordplay connects the humiliating survival strategy (feigning madness) with the exalted theological conclusion (God is good). The name Abimelech ('my father is king') may be a throne-name for the Philistine king called Achish in 1 Samuel 21.
2. The aleph-verse. The phrase be-khol et ('at all times') and tamid ('continually, always') together eliminate any exception — there is no circumstance in which praise is inappropriate. David's commitment to bless God is not conditional on God's blessing of David. The word tehilatov ('His praise') will become the Hebrew name for the entire book of Psalms: Tehillim.
3. The bet-verse. The verb titballel ('will boast, will glory') in the Hitpaal is reflexive-intensive: the soul exults in God as its supreme identity. The anavim ('humble, afflicted, poor') are the psalm's primary audience — those who have been brought low by suffering and know they have no resource but God. David's testimony is directed specifically to people who are still in the kind of trouble he just escaped.
4. The gimel-verse. The verb gaddelu ('magnify, make great') does not mean making God larger — God cannot be enlarged — but declaring His greatness publicly. The word yachdav ('together, in unity') insists that praise is communal. David does not hoard his testimony; he recruits others to join the celebration.
5. The dalet-verse. The verb darashti ('I sought') means intensive, purposeful seeking — not a casual prayer but a desperate pursuit. The noun megurotai ('my fears, my terrors') from gur ('to dread, to be afraid') describes the kind of fear that paralyzes. David was terrified (remember, he was pretending to be insane to avoid execution), and God delivered him from every fear. Not some — all (mi-kol).
6. The he-verse. The verb naharu ('they were radiant, they beamed, they shone') describes faces lit up from within — the visible transformation that comes from turning toward God. The word is related to nahar ('river, stream') and possibly to 'light flowing.' Those who look at God catch His light. The negation al yechparu ('their faces will not be shamed/darkened') contrasts radiance with the darkening of shame.
7. The zayin-verse. The demonstrative zeh ('this one') is emphatic and personal — David points to himself: this poor man, this particular sufferer, this specific person standing before you. The word ani ('poor, afflicted, humble') connects David to the anavim of verse 3. Despite being a king, David identifies as one of the afflicted. The testimony is concrete and particular: I cried, God heard, God saved.
8. The chet-verse. The verb choneh ('encamps') is a military term — the angel of the LORD sets up a military camp around the faithful, creating a perimeter of divine protection. The image is not of a single guardian angel but of an angelic army establishing a defensive position. The verb yechaltsem ('He delivers them, He rescues them') means 'to pull out, to extract from danger' — a rescue operation, not mere comfort.
9. The sensory theology of this verse has had enormous influence. In Christian eucharistic traditions, the verse is read during communion, connecting the physical act of eating bread and wine with the spiritual act of experiencing God's goodness. In its original Hebrew context, the 'tasting' is more broadly experiential — every divine rescue, every answered prayer, every provision is a taste of God's character.
9. The wordplay with ta'am from the superscription (v. 1) is essential: David changed his ta'am ('discernment/behavior') before Abimelech, and now he invites others to ta'am ('taste') God's goodness. What looked like insanity was actually wisdom — and the proof is in the tasting.
10. The yod-verse. The qedoshav ('His holy ones, His set-apart ones') are the covenant community — people consecrated to God's service. The promise ein machsor ('there is no lack, no want') does not mean wealth but sufficiency. Those who fear God have what they need. The proof follows in verse 11.

11. The kaf-verse. The kefirim ('young lions') are the apex predators of the ancient Near East — the most powerful, the most feared, the most self-sufficient. Even they grow hungry. But those who seek (dorshei) the LORD will not lack kol tov ('any good thing'). The comparison is deliberately provocative: the strongest creature in the wild is less secure than the weakest person who depends on God.
12. The shift from praise to pedagogy is natural in Israelite worship — the temple was a place of both praise and instruction. The phrase yirat YHWH alemmedkhem ('the fear of the LORD I will teach you') treats the fear of God not as a spontaneous emotion but as a learnable skill. It can be taught and acquired, practiced and perfected.
13. The mem-verse. The rhetorical question mi ha-ish ('who is the man?') engages the listener directly — everyone wants life and good days. The phrase ohev yamim lir'ot tov ('loving days to see good') describes the universal human desire for a long and good life. The wisdom teacher's strategy is to begin with what everyone wants and then show the path to it.
14. The nun-verse. The instruction begins with speech — netsor leshonkha me-ra ('guard your tongue from evil'). In wisdom literature, the tongue is the most dangerous part of the body (Proverbs 18:21: 'Death and life are in the power of the tongue'). The word mirmah ('deceit, treachery, fraud') describes speech that misrepresents reality. The fear of the LORD begins with honest speech.
15. The samekh-verse. Four imperatives in rapid succession: sur ('turn away'), aseh ('do'), baqqesh ('seek'), rodefehu ('pursue it'). The progression intensifies: turning from evil is passive avoidance; doing good is active engagement; seeking peace is deliberate effort; pursuing peace (radfat, the same verb used for military pursuit) is aggressive commitment. Peace (shalom) is not something that arrives on its own — it must be hunted down like prey. 1 Peter 3:10-11 quotes verses 13-15 directly.
16. The ayin-verse. God's eyes (einei) and ears (oznav) — the organs of attention — are directed toward the righteous. The preposition el ('toward') suggests movement, not merely position: God leans toward the righteous, inclines in their direction. The shav'atam ('their cry for help') is not formal prayer but the raw cry of distress. God hears unpolished screams as clearly as liturgical prayers.
17. The pe-verse. The same 'face' (penei) that shines on the righteous (Psalm 31:17) is set against (be-) evildoers. The consequence is lehakhrit me-erets zikhram ('to cut off their memory from the earth') — not merely death but the erasure of legacy. In a culture where one's 'name' (memory, reputation, posterity) was the closest thing to immortality, this is the ultimate punishment.
18. The tsade-verse. The structure mirrors verse 7 almost exactly (the poor man cried / the LORD heard / He saved him). The repetition is deliberate: the testimony of one becomes the experience of many. The word mi-kol tsarotam ('from all their troubles') insists on comprehensive deliverance — not partial relief but total rescue.
19. The pairing of nishberei lev ('brokenhearted') and dakke'ei ruach ('crushed in spirit') covers the full interior of the person: lev ('heart') is the center of will and thought; ruach ('spirit') is the animating life-force. Both are broken. And both are the objects of God's nearness. Isaiah 57:15 echoes this verse: God dwells 'with the crushed and lowly in spirit, to revive the spirit of the lowly.'
20. The resh-verse. The psalm does not promise the righteous will avoid trouble — it promises they will be delivered through it. The word rabbot ('many') is honest: afflictions are numerous and persistent. But the counterbalance is mi-kullam ('out of all of them') — God's deliverance is as comprehensive as the suffering is extensive. The theology is not prosperity-gospel optimism but realistic trust: trouble will come, and God will rescue.
21. The shin-verse. The image of guarding bones (shomer kol atsmotav) represents preserving the person's essential structure — bones are the framework that holds a person together. The phrase achat mehennah lo nishbarah ('not one of them is broken') is applied to Jesus in John 19:36 (where the soldiers did not break His legs on the cross). In the psalm's original context, it describes God's protective care for the righteous sufferer — however many afflictions come, the person's core is preserved.
22. The tav-verse. The verb temotet ('will slay, will put to death') describes evil as self-destroying — the wicked person's own evil becomes the executioner. The verb ye'shamu ('will be held guilty, will be condemned, will be desolate') from ashame encompasses both guilt and its consequences. Those who hate the righteous will themselves be found guilty.
23. This extra pe-verse falls outside the acrostic sequence, functioning as a coda or doxological conclusion. The verb podeh ('redeems, ransoms') is the language of buying back a slave or a condemned person — God pays the price to secure the release of His servants. The final promise — ve-lo ye'shemu kol ha-chosim bo ('none who take refuge in Him will be condemned') — closes the psalm with the same verb (chasah, 'to take refuge') that appeared in verse 9. The psalm ends where it began: in the shelter of God's goodness.

Summary: A psalm of David calling on God to fight his enemies — those who repay his kindness with hostility, who bring false accusations, and who gloat over his suffering. The psalm divides into three cycles of complaint and petition (vv. 1-10, 11-18, 19-28), each ending with a vow of praise. David asks God to take up shield and spear, to ambush his persecutors in their own traps, and to vindicate him publicly. It is one of the most vigorous imprecatory psalms in the Psalter.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's most distinctive feature is the portrait of betrayal in verses 12-14: David's enemies are people he once cared for as intimately as family. When they were sick, he fasted and prayed for them, bowed in mourning as if for a brother or mother. Now those same people celebrate his downfall. This is not a psalm about warfare between strangers but about the specific wound of ingratitude — people who received David's compassion and returned it as cruelty. The military language of verses 1-3 ('take up shield and buckler, draw out the spear') pictures God as a divine warrior entering battle on David's behalf. God is not merely asked to judge but to fight — to become David's champion in a cosmic courtroom that is also a battlefield.

Translation Friction: Imprecatory psalms like this one raise difficult questions for readers committed to the ethic of loving enemies. David asks God to confuse, shame, and destroy his persecutors. The request that they fall into their own nets (v. 8) and that ruin overtake them by surprise is not a prayer for justice in an abstract sense but a wish for specific, concrete harm to specific people. Jewish tradition reads these psalms as legitimate cries for divine justice from the powerless; Christian tradition has often struggled with them, sometimes spiritualizing the enemies as demonic forces rather than human beings. The psalm itself makes no such distinction — these are real people who ate at David's table and now plot his destruction.

Connections: The divine warrior imagery (vv. 1-3) connects to Exodus 15 (the Song of the Sea), Isaiah 59:17 (God putting on armor), and Ephesians 6:10-17 (the armor of God). The theme of false witnesses (vv. 11, 20-21) connects to Jesus' trial before the Sanhedrin (Matthew 26:59-60). The language of being hated without cause (v. 19) is quoted in John 15:25, where Jesus applies it to Himself. The three-cycle structure mirrors Psalm 22, another psalm of the righteous sufferer that moves from complaint to deliverance to praise.

¹Of David.

Contend, O LORD, with those who contend with me.

Fight against those who fight against me.

²Take up the small shield and the large shield, and rise to my aid.

³Draw out the spear and close the way against those who pursue me.
Say to my soul, 'I am your salvation.'

⁴Let those who seek my life be shamed and disgraced.
Let those who plot my ruin be turned back and humiliated.

⁵Let them be like chaff before the wind, with the angel of the LORD driving them away.

⁶Let their path be dark and slippery, with the angel of the LORD pursuing them.

⁷For without cause they hid a net for me in a pit.
Without cause they dug a trap for my life.

⁸Let ruin come upon him by surprise.
Let the net he hid catch him.
Let him fall into his own destruction.

⁹Then my soul will rejoice in the LORD.
It will delight in His salvation.

¹⁰All my bones will say,
'LORD, who is like you — rescuing the poor from one too strong for him, the poor and needy from the one who robs him?'

¹¹Violent witnesses rise up.
They ask me about things I know nothing of.

¹²They repay me evil for good — bereavement for my soul.

¹³But when they were sick, I wore sackcloth.
I humbled myself with fasting, and my prayer returned to my own chest.

¹⁴I went about as though grieving for a friend, for a brother.
I bowed low in mourning, as one who weeps for his mother.

¹⁵But when I stumbled, they gathered in glee.
Strikers assembled against me — people I did not know.
They tore at me without ceasing.

¹⁶Like godless mockers at a feast, they gnash their teeth at me.

¹⁷O Lord, how long will you look on?
Rescue my life from their destruction,
my precious life from the lions.

¹⁸I will thank you in the great assembly.
Among a mighty throng I will praise you.

¹⁹Do not let my enemies gloat over me — those who are false.
Do not let those who hate me without cause wink at each other in malice.

²⁰For they do not speak peace.
Against the quiet ones of the land they devise words of deceit.

²¹They open their mouths wide against me and say,
'Ha! Ha! Our eyes have seen it!'

²²You have seen this, O LORD — do not be silent.
O Lord, do not be far from me.

²³Rouse yourself! Wake up for my vindication, my God and my Lord, for my cause!

²⁴Vindicate me according to your righteousness,
O LORD my God,
and do not let them gloat over me.

²⁵Do not let them say in their hearts, 'Ha! Just what we wanted!'
Do not let them say, 'We have swallowed him up!'

²⁶Let them be ashamed and humiliated together — those who rejoice at my distress.
Let them be clothed in shame and disgrace — those who exalt themselves against me.

²⁷Let those who delight in my vindication shout for joy and be glad.
Let them say continually,
'Great is the LORD, who delights in the well-being of His servant!'

²⁸Then my tongue will speak of your righteousness and your praise all day long.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening uses two pairs of cognate verbs: rivah/yerivai ('contend/those who contend') and lecham/lochamai ('fight/those who fight'). The first pair is legal language — courtroom combat; the second is military language — battlefield combat. David asks God to enter both arenas on his behalf. The repetition creates an aggressive, urgent tone from the first breath.
2. Two types of shields: magen (a small, round shield for hand-to-hand combat) and tsinnah (a large, full-body shield that could protect an entire soldier). Together they represent complete defensive coverage. The verb qumah ('rise up, stand up') is a battle cry — God is called to His feet as a warrior preparing for combat.
3. The juxtaposition of military imagery (spears, shields) and personal intimacy ('say to my soul') is characteristic of David's prayer life. He is simultaneously a warrior requesting backup and a child requesting comfort. The phrase yeshu'atekh ani ('I am your salvation') may be the most personal statement God can make to a human being — salvation is not a thing God provides but a relationship God is.
4. Four verbs of defeat in a single verse: yevoshu ('let them be ashamed'), yikkalemu ('let them be disgraced'), yissogu achor ('let them be turned back'), yachperu ('let them be humiliated'). The escalation from shame to retreat to humiliation describes a complete rout. The phrase mevaqshei nafshi ('those who seek my life') means people actively trying to kill him.
5. The simile of chaff (mots) before wind (ruach) pictures enemies as weightless, substanceless, blown away without resistance. The angel of the LORD (malakh YHWH) appears as the active agent of pursuit — the same figure who encamps around the faithful in Psalm 34:8 now chases the wicked. The verb docheh ('pushing, driving, thrusting') is aggressive: the angel does not merely observe the scattering but actively propels it.
6. The combination of choshekh ('darkness') and chalaqlaqot ('slippery places') creates a nightmare landscape: the enemies cannot see where they are going and cannot keep their footing. The angel of the LORD pursues from behind while the terrain itself conspires against them. The verb rodefam ('pursuing them') uses the same root that described David's pursuers in verse 3 — the hunters become the hunted.
7. The word chinnam ('without cause, for nothing, gratuitously') appears twice, emphasizing the gratuity of the attack. David has done nothing to provoke this — the hostility is unprovoked. The combination of reshet ('net') and shachat ('pit') describes a double trap: a pit dug in the path and a net stretched over it. Jesus quotes the phrase 'without cause' in John 15:25 to describe the hatred directed at Him.

8. The poetic justice is precise: the sho'ah ('ruin, devastation') that was planned for David falls on the planner instead. The net the enemy hid becomes the net that catches him. The pit he dug becomes the pit he falls into. This is the lex talionis applied to treachery — the weapon backfires on the one who deployed it. The singular pronoun ('him') may target a specific ringleader among David's enemies.
9. The first cycle closes with a vow of praise. The verbs tagil ('will rejoice, will exult') and tasis ('will delight, will be glad') describe intense, exuberant joy. The shift from imprecation to celebration is abrupt but characteristic of the Psalter's emotional range: the same voice that calls for the enemy's destruction breaks into joy at the prospect of God's vindication.
10. The phrase kol atsmotai ('all my bones') means the praise comes from the body's very structure — every bone vibrates with gratitude. The rhetorical question mi khamokha ('who is like you?') echoes the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15:11) and is one of the Hebrew Bible's most exalted expressions of God's uniqueness. The repetition of ani ('poor, afflicted') and the addition of evyon ('destitute, needy') emphasize David's self-identification with the powerless.
11. The second cycle begins with edei chamas ('witnesses of violence'), a phrase that means both 'violent witnesses' and 'witnesses who testify about violence.' They accuse David of things he has no knowledge of (asher lo yadati, 'which I did not know'). The verb yish'aluni ('they question me, they demand of me') suggests an interrogation — David is cross-examined about crimes he never committed.
12. The phrase ra'ah tachat tovah ('evil instead of good') describes the specific injustice of ingratitude. The word shekhol ('bereavement, childlessness') is one of the most devastating words in Hebrew — it describes the grief of a parent who has lost a child. David says their betrayal has left his soul bereaved, as though something precious has died.
13. The phrase al cheqi tashuv ('returned to my chest') remains one of the more enigmatic expressions in the Psalter. The cheq ('bosom, chest, lap') is a place of intimacy. Some read it as: 'my prayer came back to rest in my own heart' (i.e., the prayer was so deeply felt it became part of him). Others: 'my prayer was returned unanswered' (i.e., God did not grant the healing David sought). The ambiguity may be intentional.
14. David treated their suffering as if it were the suffering of his closest relations: re'a ('friend, companion'), ach ('brother'), em ('mother'). The word qoder ('darkened, gloomy') describes the downcast posture of genuine mourning — head bowed, face darkened with grief. The comparison to mourning one's mother is the deepest possible grief-image in the ancient world. David's compassion was not performative but authentic — and that is what makes the betrayal so devastating.
15. The contrast with verses 13-14 is devastating. David mourned for them; they celebrate his fall. The verb samchu ('they rejoiced') at his tsal'i ('my stumbling, my limping') describes the specific cruelty of schadenfreude. The nekhim ('strikers, smiters') are either hired thugs or people who attacked David verbally. The phrase lo yadati ('I did not know') may mean 'people I did not recognize' or 'without my knowing' — the attack came from unexpected quarters.
16. The phrase chanfei la'agei ma'og ('godless ones among mockers of cake/feast') is textually difficult. The word ma'og may mean 'cake' (i.e., party-goers mocking for the price of a meal) or may be corrupt. The image is clear enough: people who mock David for entertainment, grinding their teeth in hostility (charoq shinneimo, 'gnashing their teeth').
17. The address shifts to Adonai ('Lord, Master'). The question kammah tir'eh ('how long will you look on?') accuses God of being a spectator rather than a participant — God is watching the violence without intervening. The word yechidati ('my only one, my precious one, my darling') is an extraordinary term for the soul — it means 'my unique one, the only one I have.' David has only one life, and the lions (kefirim, here metaphorical for predatory enemies) are about to take it.
18. The second cycle closes with a vow of public praise. The qahal rav ('great assembly') and am atsum ('mighty people/throng') describe the largest possible audience. David's praise will be as public as his suffering. The shift from 'rescue me' to 'I will praise you' assumes the rescue will come — the vow of praise is an act of faith made before deliverance arrives.
19. The third cycle opens. The enemies are described as oyvai sheqer ('my enemies of falsehood') — their enmity is based on lies. The phrase sone'ai chinnam ('those who hate me without cause') is quoted by Jesus in John 15:25 to describe the world's hostility toward Him. The verb yiqretsu ayin ('they wink the eye') describes a conspiratorial gesture — a knowing glance exchanged between co-conspirators, silent communication that excludes and threatens the target.
20. The rigei erets ('quiet ones of the land') are the peaceful, unassuming people who live without aggression — and precisely these people are targeted by the deceivers. The phrase divrei mirmot ('words of deceit, treacherous words') describes speech weaponized: language designed to trap, mislead, and destroy the unsuspecting.
21. The gloating cry he'ach he'ach ('Aha! Aha!') is an exclamation of malicious satisfaction — the sound of people watching someone they despise finally fall. The phrase ra'atah einenu ('our eye has seen it') means 'we witnessed your downfall with our own eyes.' The wide-open mouth (vayarchivu pihem) combines shouting, mocking, and the predatory posture of an animal about to devour.
22. David turns the enemies' boast back on them: they said 'our eyes have seen it' (v. 21), but David replies ra'itah YHWH ('you have seen, O LORD'). God is the true witness, and His seeing must lead to action, not silence (al techerash, 'do not be deaf/silent'). The plea al tirchaq ('do not be far away') reveals David's deepest fear: not the enemies, but God's absence.
23. The verbs ha'irah ('rouse yourself, stir') and haqitsah ('wake up') are astonishingly bold — David tells God to wake from apparent sleep. This is not irreverence but the urgency of the desperate. Psalm 44:23 makes the same plea: 'Wake up! Why are you sleeping, O Lord?' The double title Elohai va-Adonai ('my God and my Lord') combines the universal divine name with the personal title of authority.

24. The verb shofeteni ('judge me, vindicate me') appeals to God as the supreme court. The standard of judgment is ke-tsidqekha ('according to your righteousness') — not David's merit but God's character. David is confident enough in his innocence in this matter to submit to God's righteous judgment. The plea al yismchu li ('do not let them rejoice over me') is the refrain of the psalm: the nightmare scenario is the enemies celebrating.
25. The phrase he'ach nafshenu ('Aha, our desire!' or 'Aha, just what our soul craved!') reveals the enemies' motive: they wanted David's destruction for its own sake. The verb billa'anuhu ('we have swallowed him up') pictures complete annihilation — consumed, digested, gone.
26. The clothing metaphor — yilbeshu boshet u-khelimmah ('let them wear shame and disgrace') — pictures shame as a visible garment. Everyone will see their humiliation. The verb hamagdilim ('those who magnify themselves, those who act arrogantly') describes people who make themselves look big at David's expense.
27. The focus shifts to David's supporters — those who chafetsei tsidqi ('delight in my righteousness/vindication'). Their perpetual song (tamid, 'continually, always') is yigdal YHWH ('let the LORD be magnified/great'). The final phrase hechafets shelom avdo ('who delights in the peace/wholeness/well-being of His servant') reveals something about God's character: God takes pleasure in His servant's shalom. David's well-being is not merely tolerated by God but desired.
28. The psalm closes with David's personal vow. The verb teheg ('will meditate, will murmur, will speak') describes the low, continuous sound of someone rehearsing truth — the tongue will not stop speaking God's righteousness (tsidqekha) and praise (tehillatekha). The phrase kol hayyom ('all the day') matches the opening scope of psalms like 34:2 ('His praise will always be in my mouth'). The third cycle, like the first two, ends in praise.

Summary: A psalm of David that moves between two extremes: the psychology of the wicked (vv. 2-5) and the cosmic dimensions of God's faithful love (vv. 6-10), concluding with a prayer for continued protection (vv. 11-13). The opening oracle describes the inner monologue of the wicked person — someone who has flattered himself out of any awareness of sin, whose words are all deceit and whose plans are all harm. Against this portrait of human corruption, the psalm sets the immensity of God's chesed, tsedaqah, and mishpat, which reach to the heavens, the clouds, and the great mountains. The contrast between the small, self-deceived wickedness of humanity and the vast, overflowing goodness of God is the psalm's organizing energy.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 6-10 contain one of the most expansive descriptions of God's attributes in the Psalter. The faithful love (chesed) reaches the heavens; the faithfulness (emunah) reaches the clouds; the righteousness (tsedaqah) is like the great mountains; the justice (mishpat) is like the deep ocean. Each attribute is paired with a cosmic comparison, as if the psalmist is saying: these qualities are not merely large — they are the size of creation itself. Then verse 10 introduces one of the most beautiful images in the Hebrew Bible: 'In your light we see light' (be-orkha nireh or). Light is the medium of vision, but this verse says that God's light is the medium through which all other light becomes visible. We cannot see without God's illumination. Knowledge, truth, beauty — everything we perceive clearly — is perceived through the light God provides.

Translation Friction: *The opening line (v. 2) is textually difficult. The Hebrew reads ne'um pesha la-rasha be-qerev libbi, which literally translates 'oracle of transgression to the wicked in the midst of my heart.' The phrase 'in the midst of my heart' is puzzling — whose heart? Some emend libbi ('my heart') to libbo ('his heart'), making it 'transgression speaks to the wicked within his own heart.' Others retain the first person and read it as the psalmist receiving an oracle about wickedness within his own perception. The word ne'um ('oracle, utterance') is normally used for divine speech (ne'um YHWH, 'oracle of the LORD'), so applying it to transgression personified is deliberately jarring — sin speaks with prophetic authority to the wicked.*

Connections: *Paul quotes verse 2 in Romans 3:18 ('there is no fear of God before their eyes') as part of his catena of Old Testament texts proving universal human sinfulness. The cosmic descriptions of God's attributes (vv. 6-8) anticipate the creation theology of Psalms 104 and 148. The phrase 'fountain of life' (meqor chayyim, v. 10) connects to Proverbs 10:11, 13:14, 14:27, and Jeremiah 2:13 (where God is 'the fountain of living waters'). The image of taking refuge 'in the shadow of your wings' (v. 8) appears in Psalms 17:8, 57:1, 61:4, 63:7, and 91:4, and is echoed in Jesus' lament over Jerusalem (Matthew 23:37).*

1For the director of music. Of David, the servant of the LORD.

²Transgression speaks an oracle to the wicked deep within his heart:
'There is no fear of God before his eyes.'

³For he flatters himself in his own eyes, too much to detect his iniquity and hate it.

⁴The words of his mouth are harm and deceit.
He has ceased to act wisely or do good.

⁵He plots harm on his bed.
He stations himself on a path that is not good.
He does not reject evil.

⁶O LORD, your faithful love reaches to the heavens.
Your faithfulness extends to the skies.

⁷Your righteousness is like the mighty mountains.
Your justice is like the great deep.
You save both people and animals, O LORD.

⁸How precious is your faithful love, O God!
The children of humanity take refuge in the shadow of your wings.

⁹They feast on the abundance of your house, and you give them drink from the river of your delights.

¹⁰For with you is the fountain of life.
In your light we see light.

¹¹Extend your faithful love to those who know you,
and your righteousness to the upright in heart.

¹²Let not the foot of pride come against me, nor the hand of the wicked drive me away.

¹³There the evildoers have fallen — thrown down, unable to rise.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The title eved YHWH ('servant of the LORD') is rare in psalm superscriptions — it appears only here and in Psalm 18:1. The title carries enormous weight in the Hebrew Bible: Moses, Joshua, and the prophets are called 'servants of the LORD.' It identifies David not merely as a king who writes poetry but as one who has a designated role in God's service.
2. The textual issue of libbi ('my heart') versus libbo ('his heart') affects interpretation significantly. If 'my heart,' the psalmist is reporting an oracle he received about the nature of wickedness. If 'his heart,' the oracle of transgression operates within the wicked person's own interior. Most modern translations follow the emendation to libbo, which makes smoother sense. We follow this reading.
2. Paul quotes ein pachad Elohim le-neged einav in Romans 3:18 as the climactic verse in his argument that all humanity is under sin. The absence of the fear of God is not one sin among many but the root condition from which all sins grow.
3. The verb hecheliq ('he made smooth, he flattered') means the wicked person has polished his self-image until it reflects no flaws. The result is the inability limtso avono lisno ('to find his iniquity so as to hate it'). Self-flattery destroys moral perception: you cannot repent of what you cannot see. The avon ('iniquity') is present but invisible — hidden under the smooth surface of self-deception.

4. The trajectory of wickedness: self-flattery (v. 3) leads to destructive speech (v. 4a) and then to the abandonment of wisdom and goodness (v. 4b). The verb chadal ('to cease, to stop, to desist') means this person once knew how to be wise and good but deliberately stopped. Wickedness here is not ignorance but apostasy — turning away from what was known.
5. The bedroom becomes a war room: al mishkavo ('on his bed') — the place of rest becomes the place of scheming. The verb yityatsev ('he stations himself, he takes his stand') is the military verb from Psalm 2:2 — the wicked person deliberately positions himself on a wrong road. The final phrase ra lo yim'as ('evil he does not reject') completes the portrait: this person has lost the capacity for moral discrimination. Evil no longer repulses him.
6. The four cosmic comparisons in verses 6–7 (heavens, clouds, great mountains, deep ocean) form an ascending-descending pattern: up to the heavens, up to the clouds, down to the mountain roots, down to the ocean deep. God's attributes fill the entire vertical axis of creation, from the highest point to the lowest depth.
7. The phrase ke-harrerei El ('like the mountains of God') uses El either as a divine name ('mountains of God') or as a superlative ('mighty mountains, enormous mountains'). Either way, God's tsedaqah is as massive and immovable as mountain ranges. His mishpatim ('judgments, justice') are tehom rabbah ('the great deep') — unfathomable, ocean-deep, beyond human measurement. The final line expands God's care beyond humanity: adam u-vehemah toshia YHWH ('you save both humanity and animals, O LORD'). God's saving concern extends to all living creatures.
8. The exclamation mah yaqqar chasdekha ('how precious/costly/rare is your faithful love!') uses yaqqar, a word for things of supreme value — precious stones, rare treasures. God's chesed is not common; it is the most valuable thing in existence. The image be-tsel kenafekha ('in the shadow of your wings') pictures God as a bird sheltering its young — the same image Jesus uses in Matthew 23:37 ('as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings'). The verb yechesayun ('they take refuge') from chasah is the psalm's thematic verb.
9. The word adanekha ('your delights') is linguistically related to Eden, and the nachal ('stream, wadi, river') flowing through God's house evokes the river that watered the garden in Genesis 2:10. The psalm is describing not merely divine hospitality but a return to the original paradise — God's presence is the garden, and those who shelter there drink from its river.
10. The phrase meqor chayyim ('fountain of life') appears in Proverbs 10:11, 13:14, 14:27 — always describing a source of vitality that keeps flowing. Jeremiah 2:13 uses the same image negatively: Israel has abandoned 'the fountain of living waters' (meqor mayim chayyim) for broken cisterns. The psalm locates this fountain in God's own presence (immekha, 'with you').
10. The phrase be-orkha nireh or ('in your light we see light') was adopted as the motto of Columbia University (In lumine tuo videbimus lumen) and has been a central text in Christian theology of knowledge. Augustine, Aquinas, and Calvin all built on it. In its original Hebrew context, it affirms that all genuine perception of reality depends on divine illumination.
11. The verb meshokh ('draw out, extend, continue, prolong') asks God to keep the flow of chesed going — do not cut it off, do not withdraw it. The recipients are le-yod'ekha ('to those who know you') — not merely those who know about God but those who know God in the relational, intimate sense that yada' carries in Hebrew. The parallel le-yishrei lev ('to the upright in heart') defines knowledge of God in moral terms: to know God is to have an upright heart.
12. The 'foot of pride' (regel ga'avah) is a conquering foot — the victor's foot on the neck of the defeated. The 'hand of the wicked' (yad resha'im) is the hand that seizes and displaces. Both images describe forcible removal from one's place — eviction by arrogant power. David asks to be kept in the shelter described in verses 8–10, safe from the proud and the wicked.
13. The word sham ('there') points to a specific scene — perhaps a future judgment, perhaps a battlefield, perhaps the place where the wicked's plans collapse. The finality is total: dochu ('they are thrust down, pushed over') and lo yakhlu qum ('they are unable to rise'). The psalm ends not with a cry of vengeance but with a prophetic declaration: the wicked will fall, and their fall will be permanent. The brevity of the verse — six Hebrew words — gives it the force of a verdict.

Summary: *An acrostic wisdom psalm of David, each strophe beginning with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The psalm is a sustained meditation on the problem of the wicked prospering and the righteous suffering — a problem addressed not with philosophical argument but with repeated commands to trust, wait, and refrain from envy. David's answer to the success of the wicked is not that it is an illusion but that it is temporary. The land (erets) is the central promise: the wicked will be cut off from it, and the righteous will inherit it. The psalm moves through twenty-two strophes like a parent patiently counseling a child who cannot understand why the bully gets what he wants.*

What Makes This Remarkable: *The word erets ('land, earth') appears seven times in this psalm — the number of completeness — and each occurrence reinforces the same promise: the meek, the righteous, the faithful will inherit the land, while the wicked will be excised from it. Jesus' beatitude 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth' (Matthew 5:5) is a direct quotation of verse 11. The acrostic form is itself* significant: the alphabet is the totality of language, and by working through every letter, David is saying that this truth covers everything — from aleph to tav, there is nothing to add. The psalm's emotional texture is distinctive in the Psalter. It does not rage against injustice or weep over suffering. Instead, it counsels patience with the calm authority of someone who has watched enough cycles to know how they end. The repeated al titchar ('do not fret, do not burn with anger') is addressed to the believer's nervous system, not just his theology.

Translation Friction: The psalm's theology of retribution — the wicked will be destroyed, the righteous will prosper — is precisely the theology that Job challenges and Ecclesiastes questions. Read in isolation, Psalm 37 can sound like naïve optimism: just wait, and everything will work out. But the psalm's perspective is not naïve — it is the long view. David explicitly acknowledges the prosperity of the wicked (vv. 7, 16, 35) and does not deny it. His argument is about duration, not appearance: 'I have seen the wicked in great power, spreading like a native green tree. Yet he passed away, and he was no more' (vv. 35-36). The Hebrew word for 'land' (erets) may refer to the specific land of Israel (covenant inheritance) or to the earth broadly. In its original context, the promise is likely about land-tenure in Israel; in Jesus' usage, it is universalized.

Connections: The beatitude 'Blessed are the meek, for they shall inherit the earth' (Matthew 5:5) directly quotes verse 11. The psalm's theology of the righteous inheriting the land connects to the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12:7, 13:15, 15:18) and the Deuteronomic blessings (Deuteronomy 28). Proverbs 24:19 ('Do not fret because of evildoers') echoes the psalm's opening. The acrostic structure links this psalm to Psalms 9-10, 25, 34, 111, 112, 119, and 145. The observation that the righteous are never forsaken and their children never beg bread (v. 25) became a test case in later theological reflection on suffering and poverty.

¹Of David.

Do not burn with anger over evildoers.
Do not envy those who do wrong.

²For like grass they will quickly wither, and like green plants they will fade away.

³Trust in the LORD and do good.
Dwell in the land and cultivate faithfulness.

⁴Delight yourself in the LORD, and He will give you the desires of your heart.

⁵Roll your way onto the LORD.
Trust in Him, and He will act.

⁶He will bring forth your righteousness like the light, and your justice like the noonday sun.

⁷Be still before the LORD and wait patiently for Him.
Do not burn with anger over the one whose way prospers, over the person who carries out schemes.

⁸Release anger and abandon rage.
Do not fret — it leads only to harm.

⁹For evildoers will be cut off, but those who wait for the LORD will inherit the land.

¹⁰A little while, and the wicked will be no more.
You will look carefully at his place — and he will be gone.

¹¹But the meek will inherit the land and delight in abundant peace.

¹²The wicked person plots against the righteous and gnashes his teeth at him.

¹³The Lord laughs at him,
for He sees that his day is coming.

¹⁴The wicked draw the sword and bend the bow to bring down the poor and needy, to slaughter those whose way is upright.

¹⁵Their sword will pierce their own heart, and their bows will be broken.

¹⁶Better is the little that the righteous has than the abundance of many wicked.

¹⁷For the arms of the wicked will be broken,
but the LORD upholds the righteous.

¹⁸The LORD knows the days of the blameless, and their inheritance will last forever.

¹⁹They will not be put to shame in evil times, and in days of famine they will be satisfied.

²⁰But the wicked will perish.
The enemies of the LORD will vanish like the beauty of the meadows — they will vanish into smoke.

²¹The wicked borrows and does not repay, but the righteous is generous and gives.

²²For those blessed by Him will inherit the land,
but those cursed by Him will be cut off.

²³The steps of a person are established by the LORD, and He delights in his way.

²⁴Though he stumble, he will not fall headlong, for the LORD holds his hand.

²⁵I was young and now I am old, yet I have not seen the righteous abandoned or his children begging for bread.

²⁶All day long he is gracious and lends, and his children become a blessing.

²⁷Turn from evil and do good,
and you will dwell in the land forever.

²⁸For the LORD loves justice and does not abandon His faithful ones.
They are preserved forever,
but the offspring of the wicked will be cut off.

²⁹The righteous will inherit the land and dwell in it forever.

³⁰The mouth of the righteous murmurs wisdom, and his tongue speaks justice.

³¹The instruction of his God is in his heart.
His steps do not slip.

³²The wicked watches the righteous and seeks to kill him.

³³The LORD will not abandon him to his hand, nor let him be condemned when he is brought to trial.

³⁴Wait for the LORD and keep His way.
He will raise you up to inherit the land.
When the wicked are cut off, you will see it.

³⁵I have seen the wicked, ruthless and powerful, spreading himself like a flourishing native tree.

³⁶But he passed away — and suddenly he was gone.
I looked for him, but he could not be found.

³⁷Watch the blameless person and observe the upright, for there is a future for the person of peace.

³⁸But transgressors will be destroyed together.
The future of the wicked is cut off.

³⁹The salvation of the righteous comes from the LORD.
He is their refuge in time of trouble.

⁴⁰The LORD helps them and delivers them.
He delivers them from the wicked and saves them, because they take refuge in Him.

1. The aleph-strophe. The verb al titchar ('do not fret, do not be heated, do not burn') from charah ('to burn, to be kindled') addresses the visceral, heat-generating frustration that rises when the wicked prosper. The parallel verb al teqanne ('do not envy') from qana ('to be jealous, to be zealous') addresses the desire to have what the wicked have. Together they name the two emotional responses the psalm will spend forty verses treating: rage and envy.
2. The reason not to envy: the wicked are ke-chatsir ('like grass') — the most fragile, temporary form of life in the Near East. After the spring rains, grass covers the hillsides in green. When the summer heat arrives, it vanishes in days. The verb yimmalu ('they will wither, they will be cut') and yibbolun ('they will wilt, they will fade') describe the inevitable trajectory of grass: rapid growth, rapid death.
3. The bet-strophe. Four imperatives: betach ('trust'), aseh tov ('do good'), shekhan erets ('dwell in the land'), re'eh emunah ('cultivate/feed on faithfulness'). The last phrase is debated — re'eh can mean 'feed, shepherd, cultivate' and emunah can mean 'faithfulness, reliability, security.' The instruction is practical: do not flee the land because the wicked seem to own it. Stay, trust, do good, and feed on faithfulness like a flock feeds on pasture.
4. The promise of verse 4 has been both a comfort and a stumbling block. Read transactionally, it says: if you delight in God, He will give you what you want. Read formatively, it says: delighting in God transforms what you want, so that what God gives is always what your transformed heart desires. The psalm's overall theology of trust and patience supports the formative reading.
5. The gimel-strophe. The verb gol ('roll') from galal is physical — you roll a burden off your own back onto God's. The darkekha ('your way, your path, your course of life') is everything: plans, anxieties, outcomes. The promise ve-hu ya'aseh ('and He — He will do it, He will act') is deliberately open-ended. It does not specify what God will do. It simply guarantees that God will act. The emphasis falls on the pronoun hu ('He') — you are not alone in this.
6. The vindication image: tsidqekha ('your righteousness') will be displayed ka-or ('like the light') — visible, undeniable, radiant. The mishpatekha ('your justice, your just cause') will be like ha-tsohorayim ('the noonday, the double-brightness') — the moment of maximum visibility when no shadow remains. The righteous person's cause, now hidden under the wicked's prosperity, will eventually be displayed in full daylight.
7. The dalet-strophe. The verb dom ('be still, be silent, be motionless') demands cessation of anxious activity. The verb hitcholel ('wait, writhe in patience') from chul ('to writhe, to wait in travail') suggests that patience is not passive but effortful — it costs something to wait. The al titchar ('do not fret') from verse 1 returns, now specified: do not fret over the person whose schemes actually succeed (matsliach darkko, 'his way prospers'). David acknowledges that evil plans sometimes work.
8. The he-strophe. Three imperatives address the anger cycle: heref me-af ('let go of anger'), azov chemah ('abandon fury/rage'), al titchar ('do not fret'). The final phrase akh lehare'a ('it only leads to doing evil') reveals the danger: righteous indignation, if nursed into obsession, becomes its own form of evil. Fretting about injustice can make you unjust.
9. The vav-strophe. The verb yikkaretun ('they will be cut off') is covenant-curse language — excision from the community, from the land, from life. The verb yirshu erets ('they will inherit/possess the land') is covenant-blessing language — permanent tenure in the promised inheritance. The erets ('land/earth') is the psalm's key word: who gets to stay in the land? Not the aggressive, not the schemers, but the qovei YHWH ('those who wait/hope for the LORD').
10. The zayin-strophe. The phrase od me'at ('yet a little while') is the psalm's temporal key: the wicked person's prosperity has an expiration date. The verb hitbonanta ('you will look carefully, you will examine closely') means a deliberate inspection of the place (maqom) where the wicked once stood. You will search for him and find nothing. The disappearance is total: ve-einennu ('and he is not, and he is gone').
11. The anavim are the central characters of the Psalter's social vision: the poor, the afflicted, the humble — people who lack power and know they lack it. Their inheritance of the land (erets) reverses the normal power structure: the powerful seize land, but the meek receive it from God. Jesus' quotation universalizes the promise from 'the land' (of Israel) to 'the earth' (the entire world).
12. The chet-strophe. The verb zomem ('plots, devises, schemes') describes calculated, premeditated hostility. The verb choreq shinnav ('gnashes his teeth') is an expression of animal rage — baring teeth like a predator. The combination of cold calculation and hot rage describes the specific psychology of the wicked toward the righteous: it is both strategic and visceral.
13. God's response to the wicked person's scheming is laughter (vischaq, from tsachaq, 'to laugh'). This is the same divine laughter as Psalm 2:4 — not amusement but supreme confidence. God laughs because He sees (ra'ah) what the wicked cannot: yomo ('his day') — the appointed day of reckoning. The wicked plots in time; God sees the end of time.
14. The tet-strophe. The weapons — cherev ('sword') and qeshet ('bow') — represent close combat and ranged warfare. The targets — ani ve-evyon ('poor and needy') and yishrei derekh ('upright in way/conduct') — are people who cannot fight back. The verb litvoach ('to slaughter') is butchery language, used for slaughtering animals. The wicked treat the righteous poor as livestock.
15. The poetic justice is exact: the sword drawn against the poor enters the wicked person's own heart (be-libbam). The bows bent against the needy are snapped (tishavarnah, 'they will be broken'). The weapons turn on their users. This is the psalm's consistent vision: the violence of the wicked is self-defeating.
16. The yod-strophe. The tov...min ('better...than') formula is classic wisdom speech (cf. Proverbs 15:16, 16:8). The comparison is not between equal quantities but between qualities: a small amount possessed by a righteous person has more real value (stability, blessing, permanence) than the hamon ('abundance, tumult, wealth') of many wicked people combined.

17. The kaf-strophe. The zero'ot ('arms') represent power and agency — what the wicked can do. These will be broken (tishavarnah). The contrast: ve-somekh tsaddiqim YHWH ('but the LORD supports/upholds the righteous'). The verb somekh ('supports, sustains, upholds') pictures a hand placed under something to keep it from falling. The wicked lose their power; the righteous are held up by God's hand.
18. The lamed-strophe. The verb yodea ('knows') means intimate, comprehensive knowledge — God knows every day (yemei) of the blameless person's life. Their nachalatam ('their inheritance') will be le-olam ('forever'). The contrast with the wicked, whose prosperity is temporary as grass, is total: the righteous person's inheritance has no expiration date.
19. The promise addresses the two great fears: public shame (lo yevoshu) and physical want (yisba'u, 'they will be full/satisfied'). The be-et ra'ah ('in the time of evil/disaster') and bi-yemei re'avon ('in the days of famine') are the worst-case scenarios. Even then, the blameless will not be humiliated and will not go hungry.
20. The mem-strophe. The phrase ki-yqar karim ('like the glory/beauty of meadows' or 'like the fat of lambs') is textually uncertain. If 'meadows,' the image is of green pastureland that dries up and becomes fuel for fire. If 'fat of lambs,' the image is of sacrificial fat consumed on the altar. Both readings end the same way: be-ashan kalu ('in smoke they are consumed'). The wicked dissolve into nothing.
21. The nun-strophe. The economic contrast is sharp: the wicked person takes and does not return; the righteous person gives freely. The verb chonen ('is gracious, shows favor, gives generously') from chanan describes giving motivated not by obligation but by kindness. The righteous person's relationship to resources mirrors God's own generosity.
22. The samekh-strophe. The erets ('land') promise returns, now framed in terms of divine blessing and cursing. The mevorakav ('those blessed by Him') and mequllaluv ('those cursed by Him') echo the Deuteronomic blessing-curse framework (Deuteronomy 28). Inheritance of the land is the visible sign of divine favor; being cut off from it is the visible sign of divine judgment.
23. The ayin-strophe. The phrase me-YHWH mits'adei gever konnanu ('from the LORD the steps of a man are established') means God directs the specific movements of the person who trusts Him — not just the destination but each step along the way. The phrase ve-darkko yechpats ('and in his way He delights') is remarkable: God takes pleasure in the righteous person's path. The faithful walker is not merely tolerated but enjoyed.
24. The promise is not that the righteous will never stumble (ki yippol, 'when/though he falls') but that he will not be utterly destroyed (lo yutal, 'he will not be thrown down completely'). The reason: YHWH somekh yado ('the LORD supports/holds his hand'). The image is of a parent holding a child's hand as the child learns to walk — stumbles happen, but the hand prevents catastrophic falls.
25. The pe-strophe. David speaks from the full arc of a lifetime: na'ar hayiti ('I was young') gam zaqanti ('I have also grown old'). His testimony is empirical: in all those years of observation, lo ra'iti tsaddiq ne'ezav ('I have not seen the righteous forsaken'). This verse has been a source of comfort and also of theological difficulty — what about righteous people who are, in fact, abandoned and impoverished? The psalm's perspective is proverbial, not universal: it describes the general pattern of God's faithfulness, not an exception-free law.
26. The righteous person's generosity is habitual: kol hayyom ('all day long') he chonen u-malveh ('is gracious and lends'). The result extends to the next generation: ve-zar'o li-verakhah ('and his offspring become a blessing'). Generosity is not only moral but generative — it produces blessing that flows to the next generation.
27. The tsade-strophe repeats the instruction of Psalm 34:15 (sur me-ra va-aseh tov, 'turn from evil and do good') and adds the land-promise: u-shkhon le-olam ('and dwell forever'). The moral instruction and the inheritance promise are inseparable: doing good is the path to permanent habitation.
28. The qoph-strophe. God's love of mishpat ('justice') grounds the entire psalm: because God loves justice, He preserves the righteous and cuts off the wicked. The chasidav ('His faithful ones') are those bound to God by chesed. The permanence markers le-olam nishmaru ('forever they are guarded') contrast with the cutting-off of the wicked's offspring.
29. The resh-strophe restates the psalm's central promise with maximum simplicity: tsaddiqim yirshu erets ('the righteous will inherit the land'). The verb yishkenu ('they will dwell') and the duration la-ad ('forever, in perpetuity') settle the matter: the land belongs to the righteous, and their tenure has no end.
30. The shin-strophe. The verb yehgeh ('murmurs, meditates, speaks in low tones') is the same verb used in Psalm 1:2 for meditating on Torah. The righteous person's speech flows from deep meditation: wisdom (chokhmah) and justice (mishpat) emerge naturally from a mind saturated in God's instruction.
31. The tav-strophe. The torat Elohav ('the instruction/Torah of his God') is be-libbo ('in his heart') — internalized, not merely memorized. The result: lo tim'ad ashkurav ('his steps do not slip'). The connection is causal: when God's instruction lives inside the heart, the feet find stable ground. This echoes Psalm 1:2-3 and Psalm 119:11 ('I have stored up your word in my heart, that I might not sin against you').
32. The verb tsofeh ('watches, spies, observes') describes surveillance with hostile intent. The verb mevaqesh lahamito ('seeks to put him to death') reveals the motive: the wicked person's observation is predatory. He watches the righteous the way a hunter watches prey.
33. God intervenes at two levels: He will not leave the righteous be-yado ('in his hand' — in the power of the wicked), and He will not let him be found guilty be-hishshafto ('when he is judged'). God is both rescue-warrior and defense-attorney.
34. The psalm's closing section summarizes its theology in two imperatives: qavveh ('wait, hope') and shemor darkko ('keep/guard His way'). The reward: vi-romimekha lareshet erets ('He will exalt you to inherit the land'). The final phrase be-hikkarit resha'im tir'eh ('when the wicked are cut off, you will see it') promises that the righteous will witness the fulfillment with their own eyes. They will not merely hear about it secondhand.

35. David's personal testimony: ra'iti rasha arits ('I have seen a wicked person who was terrifying/ruthless'). The simile ke-ezrach ra'anan ('like a native/indigenous green tree') pictures a tree rooted in its own soil — deeply established, lush, apparently permanent. The word ezrach means 'native, indigenous' — this tree belongs, it has always been here, it looks immovable.
36. The reversal is abrupt: vayyaavor ('and he passed away') — the great tree simply disappeared. The hinneh einennu ('behold, he is not!') echoes verse 10. David searched for him (va-avaqshehu) and found nothing (lo nimtsa). The mighty, spreading tree has vanished as completely as grass in summer. No trace, no stump, no memory.
37. The instruction is observational: shemor tam ('watch the blameless one') and re'eh yashar ('observe the upright one'). The reason: ki acharit le-ish shalom ('for there is a future/end for the person of peace'). The word acharit ('end, latter days, future, posterity') means the blameless person has a future that endures. The person of shalom ('peace, wholeness') has something the wicked do not: an afterwards.
38. The contrast with verse 37 is total: the righteous have an acharit ('future'); the wicked have their acharit cut off (nikhratah). The verb nishmadu ('they are destroyed') from shamad ('to annihilate, to exterminate') and the word yachdav ('together, altogether') mean the destruction is collective and comprehensive.
39. The psalm nears its conclusion with a declaration of source: teshu'at tsaddiqim me-YHWH ('the salvation of the righteous is from the LORD'). Salvation does not come from human effort, military power, or clever strategy — it comes from God. He is their ma'uzzam ('their stronghold, their refuge') specifically be-et tsarah ('in the time of distress'). God's protection is activated by crisis.
40. The final verse accumulates four verbs of salvation: ya'azrem ('He helps them'), yefalltem ('He delivers them'), yefalltem me-resha'im ('He delivers them from the wicked'), ve-yoshi'em ('and He saves them'). The reason is the psalm's foundational verb: ki chasu vo ('because they have taken refuge in Him'). The verb chasah ('to take refuge') is the Psalter's signature act of faith. The psalm that began by counseling against anger and envy ends by grounding everything in the single act of taking shelter in God.

Summary: A penitential psalm of David, composed 'for remembrance' (le hazkir). David describes his suffering in excruciating physical detail — festering wounds, a bent body, burning loins, failing eyes, a pounding heart — and attributes it to God's wrath against his sin. His friends withdraw. His enemies watch. He has become silent, unable even to defend himself. The psalm ends not with resolution or deliverance but with a raw plea: 'Do not abandon me, O LORD. Be not far from me. Hurry to help me, O Lord, my salvation.' It is one of the most unflinching accounts of suffering in the Psalter.

What Makes This Remarkable: Unlike Psalm 32, which describes suffering caused by concealed sin and ended by confession, Psalm 38 describes suffering that continues even after acknowledgment. David confesses his sin openly (v. 19) and still the pain persists. The psalm offers no resolution, no turning point, no moment of relief. It begins in agony and ends in agony, with only a thread of hope in the final verse. This makes it one of the most honest prayers in Scripture — a prayer that refuses to manufacture a happy ending. The physical descriptions are among the most graphic in ancient literature: arrows embedded in the flesh (v. 3), wounds that fester and stink (v. 6), burning in the loins (v. 8), a heart that pounds (v. 11), eyes that fail (v. 11). The psalmist's body has become a battlefield between God's discipline and his own sin.

Translation Friction: The superscription le hazkir ('for remembrance, for a memorial') is shared only with Psalm 70 and connects to the azkarat offering (the memorial portion of the grain offering, Leviticus 2:2). Some scholars suggest the psalm was recited during that offering. The theology of direct divine punishment for personal sin (God's arrows in the flesh, His hand pressing down) is one that other biblical books qualify — Job questions it, Ecclesiastes undermines it, and Jesus challenges it in John 9:1-3. Psalm 38 does not argue the theology; it lives inside it. David accepts that his suffering is connected to his sin, even as the psalm quietly protests the severity of the punishment.

Connections: Psalm 38 is the third of the seven traditional penitential psalms (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143). Its language of physical affliction parallels Job 7 and 30. The imagery of arrows (v. 3) connects to Psalm 64:7 and Lamentations 3:12-13 (where God shoots arrows into the kidneys). The abandonment by friends (v. 12) parallels Psalm 31:11-12 and Job 19:13-19. The silence of the psalmist before accusers (vv. 14-15) anticipates Isaiah's Servant who 'does not open his mouth' (Isaiah 53:7) and Jesus' silence before Pilate (Matthew 27:14).

¹A psalm of David, for remembrance.

²O LORD, do not rebuke me in your wrath.
Do not discipline me in your burning anger.

³For your arrows have sunk deep into me,
and your hand has come down hard upon me.

⁴There is no soundness in my flesh because of your fury.
There is no wholeness in my bones because of my sin.

⁵For my iniquities have risen over my head.
Like a heavy burden, they are too heavy for me to bear.

⁶My wounds fester and rot because of my foolishness.

⁷I am bent over and bowed down completely.
All day long I go about in mourning.

⁸For my sides are filled with burning, and there is no soundness in my flesh.

⁹I am numb and utterly crushed.
I groan from the anguish of my heart.

¹⁰O Lord, all my longing is before you.
My groaning is not hidden from you.

¹¹My heart pounds violently. My strength has left me.
Even the light of my eyes — it too has gone from me.

¹²My loved ones and my friends stand at a distance from my affliction, and my relatives stand far away.

¹³Those who seek my life set traps for me.
Those who seek my harm speak of destruction and plot deceit all day long.

¹⁴But I am like a deaf man — I do not hear.
Like a mute person who does not open his mouth.

¹⁵I have become like a person who does not hear,
in whose mouth there are no arguments.

¹⁶For in you, O LORD, I have placed my hope.
You will answer, O Lord my God.

¹⁷For I said, 'Do not let them gloat over me, those who exalt themselves over me when my foot slips.'

¹⁸For I am on the verge of collapse, and my pain is always before me.

¹⁹For I confess my iniquity.

I am troubled by my sin.

²⁰But my enemies are vigorous and strong,
and those who hate me falsely are many.

²¹Those who repay evil for good accuse me because I pursue what is good.

²²Do not abandon me, O LORD.
O my God, do not be far from me.

²³Hurry to help me,
O Lord, my salvation.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word le hazkir ('for remembrance, for a memorial offering') connects this psalm to the sacrificial system. The Hiphil of zakar ('to remember') suggests that the psalm is itself an act of bringing something before God's attention — either the psalmist's suffering or his penitence. The same term appears in the headings of Psalm 70.
2. The opening echoes Psalm 6:1 almost verbatim. The two words for divine anger — qetseph ('wrath, fury, indignation') and chamah ('heat, burning anger, rage') — describe intensity on two registers. David does not ask God to stop disciplining him entirely; he asks God to lower the temperature. The verbs tokhicheni ('rebuke me') and teyassereni ('discipline me, chasten me') belong to the parent-child vocabulary: this is corrective pain, not vindictive punishment.
3. The arrow imagery for divine punishment appears across the ancient Near East. In the Hebrew Bible, God's arrows represent plague, disaster, or direct affliction (Deuteronomy 32:23, Lamentations 3:12-13, Ezekiel 5:16). The pairing of arrows (distance weapon) and hand (close weapon) means there is no safe range — God's discipline reaches David at every distance.
4. The parallel structure attributes the physical collapse to two causes: God's fury (za'amekha) and David's sin (chattati). The word metom ('soundness, wholeness, health') from tamam ('to be complete') means nothing in his flesh is intact. The word shalom ('peace, wholeness, well-being') is absent from his bones. The verse makes no attempt to separate the physical from the moral: sin and suffering are intertwined in David's body.
5. The image of avonot ('iniquities') rising over the head (avru roshi) is like drowning — the water level has passed above the head, and the person is submerged. The simile ke-massa kaved ('like a heavy load') shifts to the image of a back-breaking burden. David's sins are simultaneously flood and freight — he is drowning under them and crushed beneath them.
6. The verb hiv'ishu ('they stink, they emit a foul odor') and namaqu ('they are festering, they are oozing') describe infected wounds in clinical detail. The chavurotai ('my wounds, my welts, my stripes') are attributed to ivalti ('my foolishness'). The word ivelet is not mere stupidity but moral foolishness — the willful choice of the wrong path that Proverbs calls the way of the fool.
7. The verb na'aveti ('I am bent, I am twisted') describes a body that can no longer stand straight. The verb shachoti ('I am bowed down') intensifies: bent to the ground. The phrase kol hayyom qoder hillakhti ('all day long I walk about darkened/in mourning') describes a person who shuffles through life in a permanent posture of grief, face darkened, body hunched.
8. The word kesalai ('my loins, my sides, my flanks') refers to the lower back and hip area. The word nikleh ('burning, inflammation, something worthless/scorched') describes either a burning skin disease or intense fever in the midsection. The phrase ein metom bi-vesari ('there is no soundness in my flesh') repeats verse 4, creating a frame: the body is uniformly damaged.
9. The verb nefugoti ('I am numb, I am paralyzed, I am faint') describes someone whose capacity to feel has been overwhelmed — past pain, into numbness. The verb nidkeiti ('I am crushed, I am broken') from dakah ('to crush, to pulverize'). The verb sha'agti ('I have roared, I have groaned') from nahamat libbi ('the groaning/roaring of my heart') — the heart itself is making an animal sound of distress.
10. A moment of address amid the catalog of pain. The word ta'avati ('my desire, my longing, my craving') means everything David wants — healing, restoration, God's presence — lies open before God. The anchati ('my groaning, my sighing') is not hidden (lo nistrah) from God. The verse is simultaneously a prayer and a statement of trust: even if David cannot form coherent petitions, God sees his longing and hears his groans.
11. The verb secharchar ('palpitates, pounds, goes around and around') describes a heart that races and flutters — a symptom of extreme anxiety or physical illness. The phrase azavani kochi ('my strength has abandoned me') means his body's power has deserted him. The final blow: or einai ('the light of my eyes') — his vision itself — gam hem ein itti ('even they are not with me'). The eyes are failing. David is losing the ability to see. The catalog of physical destruction is nearly total: flesh, bones, wounds, loins, heart, strength, eyes.

12. The social collapse mirrors the physical collapse. The ohavai ('my loved ones') and re'ai ('my friends/companions') stand mi-neged nig'i ('opposite my affliction' — at a safe distance from his disease). The qerovai ('my close relatives, my kinsmen') stand me-rachok ('far off'). The people who should be closest have retreated. Suffering has made David untouchable — a leper in all but name.
13. While friends retreat, enemies advance. The mevaqshei nafshi ('those who seek my life') set traps (vayyenaqshu). The dorshei ra'ati ('those who seek my harm') speak havvot ('destructions, calamities, ruin') and meditate on mirmot ('deceits, treacheries') all day. The combination of social isolation and active persecution creates total vulnerability: no friends to defend him, only enemies to destroy him.
14. David's response to his accusers is total silence. He is ke-cheresh ('like a deaf man') — he does not listen to the accusations. He is ke-illem ('like a mute person') — he does not defend himself. This silence is not passive resignation but deliberate restraint. David could argue, defend, counter-accuse — but he refuses. This posture anticipates Isaiah's Suffering Servant ('like a sheep before its shearers is silent, so he did not open his mouth,' Isaiah 53:7) and Jesus' silence before Pilate.
15. The silence deepens: not only does David refuse to speak, but he has no tokhachot ('reproofs, arguments, rebuttals') in his mouth at all. He has emptied himself of defense. The reason for this silence emerges in verse 16: David has transferred his case entirely to God. He is silent before people because he is speaking to God.
16. The reason for silence before human accusers: lekha YHWH hochalti ('in you, O LORD, I have waited/hoped'). David's defense is not in his own mouth but in God's response. The declaration attah ta'aneh ('you will answer') is an act of faith: God will eventually speak on David's behalf. The triple title YHWH...Adonai Elohai ('LORD...Lord my God') piles up divine names as if to anchor the faith more firmly.
17. David's prayer has a specific fear: pen yismchu li ('lest they rejoice over me'). The verb mot ragli ('my foot slips, my foot staggers') describes a stumble that the enemies would exploit. The verb higdilu alai ('they magnify themselves against me') means they enlarge themselves at David's expense — his diminishment is their aggrandizement.
18. The phrase le-tsela nakhon ('ready for stumbling, prepared for falling') means David is at the breaking point — one more push and he falls. His makh'ovi ('my pain') is negdi tamid ('continually before me') — he cannot look away from his own suffering. There is no respite, no distraction, no relief.
19. The confession: avoni aggid ('my iniquity I declare/confess'). The verb aggid ('I tell, I declare, I make known') is a public statement, not a private thought. The verb ed'ag ('I am anxious, I am troubled, I am concerned') from da'ag ('to be anxious') describes the ongoing anguish that sin produces — not just guilt but deep disturbance. Unlike Psalm 32, where confession brought immediate relief, here the confession does not resolve the suffering.
20. The contrast is brutal: David is collapsing, but his enemies are chayyim ('alive, vigorous, full of life') and atsermu ('strong, powerful, numerous'). Those who hate him sheqer ('falsely, without legitimate cause') are rabbou ('have multiplied, have increased'). As David weakens, his enemies grow stronger and more numerous.
21. The theme from Psalm 35:12 returns: meshallemei ra'ah tachat tovah ('those who repay evil in place of good'). The verb yistenuni ('they accuse me, they act as adversaries against me') from satan ('to oppose, to accuse') — they play the adversary role. The reason: tachat rodfi tov ('because I pursue good'). David's pursuit of goodness is itself the offense that provokes their hostility.
22. The closing plea strips away everything except the essential request: al ta'azveni ('do not abandon me') and al tirchaq mimmenni ('do not be far from me'). These are the two things David fears more than pain, more than enemies, more than death: God's absence and God's distance. The double address YHWH...Elohai ('LORD...my God') clings to both the covenant name and the personal relationship.
23. The final word: chushah le-ezrati Adonai teshu'ati ('hurry to my help, O Lord, my salvation'). The verb chushah ('hurry, make haste, come quickly') is the most urgent word in the Hebrew prayer vocabulary. The psalm ends not with resolution but with urgency — a running cry from a person who needs God to arrive now. The title teshu'ati ('my salvation') makes the last word of the psalm the declaration that God is David's rescue, even though the rescue has not yet arrived. This is faith at its rawest: claiming God as salvation while still drowning.

Summary: A psalm of David addressed to Jeduthun, one of the three chief temple musicians. David resolves to remain silent so as not to sin with his tongue, especially while the wicked are present. But the suppressed words build like a fire until they burst out in a meditation on the brevity and futility of human life. David asks God to show him the measure of his days, declares that every person is a mere breath (hevel), and that human busyness is all vanity. The psalm ends with a startling prayer: 'Look away from me, that I may brighten before I depart and am no more.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 39 is the most Ecclesiastes-like text in the Psalter. The word hevel ('breath, vapor, vanity') — the signature word of Ecclesiastes — appears three times (vv. 6, 7, 12), and the psalm's conclusion about human transience echoes Ecclesiastes almost verbatim. But where Ecclesiastes maintains a philosophical distance from its subject, Psalm 39 is anguished and personal — this is not a sage's meditation but a sufferer's outburst. The closing prayer is astonishing: instead of asking God to draw near (as in most psalms), David asks God to look away (v. 14). The logic is that God's gaze has become unbearable — not because God is hostile but because David cannot survive the intensity of divine scrutiny combined with his own smallness. He wants a moment of reprieve before death.

Translation Friction: The address to Jeduthun (Yedutun) in the superscription is debated. Jeduthun was a Levitical musician (1 Chronicles 16:41-42, 25:1-3; 2 Chronicles 5:12). The preposition li-Yedutun could mean 'for Jeduthun' (the musician who will perform it), 'to Jeduthun' (dedicated to him), or 'in the manner of Jeduthun.' The same name appears in Psalm 62 and 77 superscriptions. The final verse's request that God look away (ha'sha mi-menni, 'gaze away from me') has troubled interpreters who expect psalms to end with restored intimacy. Job makes a similar request in Job 7:19 ('Will you not look away from me?') and Job 14:6 ('Look away from him and let him alone'). The psalm sits uncomfortably between trust and exhaustion.

Connections: The theme of human brevity connects to Psalm 90:3-6 (Moses' meditation on human frailty), James 4:14 ('you are a mist that appears for a little while and then vanishes'), and 1 Peter 1:24 (quoting Isaiah 40:6-8, 'all flesh is like grass'). The hevel-language links directly to Ecclesiastes 1:2 ('vanity of vanities'). The silence motif (vv. 2-3) connects to Psalm 38:13-14 (where David was also silent before enemies). The image of God as discipliner through illness (v. 12) continues from Psalm 38. The final prayer to 'look away' echoes Job 7:19 and 10:20-21.

¹For the director of music. For Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

²I said, 'I will guard my ways
so that I do not sin with my tongue.
I will put a muzzle on my mouth
while the wicked are in my presence.'

³I was mute with silence.
I held back, even from good words.
But my pain was stirred up.

⁴My heart grew hot within me.
As I meditated, the fire blazed — and I spoke with my tongue:

⁵LORD, make me know my end and the measure of my days — what it is.
Let me know how fleeting I am.

⁶See — you have made my days a few handbreadths, and my lifespan is as nothing before you.
Surely every person standing firm is nothing but a breath. Selah.

⁷Surely a person walks about as a mere shadow.
Surely they bustle about for nothing.
He heaps up wealth and does not know who will gather it.

⁸And now, Lord, what do I wait for?
My hope — it is in you.

⁹Deliver me from all my transgressions.
Do not make me the scorn of the fool.

¹⁰I am silent. I do not open my mouth, for you are the one who has done this.

¹¹Remove your plague from me.
I am wasting away from the hostility of your hand.

¹²When you discipline a person with rebukes for iniquity, you consume what is precious to him like a moth.
Surely every person is a breath. Selah.

¹³Hear my prayer, O LORD, and give ear to my cry.
Do not be silent at my tears.
For I am a stranger with you,
a sojourner, like all my fathers.

¹⁴Look away from me, that I may brighten, before I go away and am no more.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Jeduthun (Yedutun) was one of three chief musicians appointed by David for temple worship (alongside Asaph and Heman). His name may derive from yadah ('to praise, to give thanks'). The psalm's assignment to Jeduthun may indicate the musical style, the performing ensemble, or the dedicatee.
2. David's resolution is to control his speech: eshmerah derakhay me-chato bi-leshoni ('I will guard my ways from sinning with my tongue'). The machsom ('muzzle, restraint, bridle') is a vivid image — David is treating his own mouth like a dangerous animal that must be physically restrained. The reason: be-od rasha le-negdi ('while the wicked is before me'). David does not want to give the wicked ammunition by speaking rashly in their presence.
3. The silence goes too far: ne'elamti dumiyyah ('I was struck dumb with stillness'). David stopped speaking entirely — hecheisheti mi-tov ('I was silent from good') — he held back even legitimate, positive speech. The result: u-khe'evi ne'ekar ('and my pain was agitated, was churned up'). Suppressing speech did not resolve the inner turmoil; it intensified it. The pain fermented under the seal of silence.
4. The progression from heat to fire to speech mirrors Jeremiah's experience in Jeremiah 20:9: 'If I say, I will not mention him or speak any more in his name, there is in my heart as it were a burning fire shut up in my bones, and I am weary with holding it in, and I cannot.' Suppressed truth generates internal combustion.
5. David's outburst is not a complaint about the wicked but a plea for perspective on his own mortality. The qitsi ('my end') and middat yamai ('the measure of my days') ask for numerical specificity — how much time do I have left? The phrase mah chadel ani ('how fleeting/transient I am') uses chadel ('ceasing, fleeting, frail'), a word that describes something about to stop existing.
6. The word hevel is one of the most important in the Hebrew Bible. It literally means 'breath, vapor, mist' — something that exists momentarily and then dissipates. Ecclesiastes uses it thirty-eight times to describe the transience and insubstantiality of all human endeavor. Here in Psalm 39, it carries the same force: human life is a breath that barely registers against the backdrop of eternity.
7. Three observations about human futility. First: be-tselem yithallekh ish ('a person walks about as a shadow/image') — the word tselem ('image, shadow, phantom') is the same word used in Genesis 1:26 ('Let us make humanity in our image'). The image of God walks about as a shadow — this is not a denial of the imago Dei but a lament over its fragility. Second: hevel yehemayun ('they bustle about for vapor, they are agitated for nothing'). Third: yitsbor ve-lo yeda mi osefam ('he heaps up and does not know who will gather'). The accumulation that drives human industry is ultimately pointless because the accumulator will not be the beneficiary. Ecclesiastes 2:18-21 develops this identical argument.
8. The pivot. After the meditation on futility, David asks the essential question: mah qivviti ('what have I hoped for? what am I waiting for?'). If everything is breath, what can sustain hope? The answer is four words: tochalit lekha hi ('my hope — it is to/for you'). When everything else evaporates, God remains. This is not optimism; it is the last thing standing after everything else has been declared vapor.
9. David asks for two things: deliverance from his pesha'ai ('transgressions, rebellions') and protection from the cherpat naval ('reproach/scorn of the fool'). The naval ('fool, senseless person') is the Psalter's moral villain — the person who says 'There is no God' (Psalm 14:1). David does not want his suffering to become proof for the fool's thesis.

10. The silence returns, but now it has a theological reason: ki attah asita ('because you have done this'). David's suffering is not random; it comes from God. And because it comes from God, David will not protest. The pronoun attah ('you') is emphatic: you, specifically, have done this to me. This is not passive acceptance of fate but active submission to the God who acts.
11. The prayer is direct: haser me-alay nig'ekha ('remove from upon me your plague/stroke'). The word nega ('plague, blow, stroke, affliction') is the same word used for the plagues of Egypt and for skin diseases in Leviticus 13. The phrase mi-tigrat yadekha ('from the hostility/contention of your hand') describes God's hand as combative — fighting against David. The verb kaliti ('I am finished, I am exhausted, I am consumed') means David has reached his limit.
12. God's discipline (be-tokhachot al avon yissarta ish, 'with rebukes for iniquity you discipline a person') has a specific effect: vatemes ka-ash chamudo ('you melt/dissolve like a moth what is precious/desirable to him'). The image of a moth consuming a garment is devastating — it happens slowly, silently, invisibly, and the destruction is irreversible. The refrain akh hevel kol adam ('surely every person is a breath') returns, now deepened by the intervening meditation. Selah.
13. David's self-description is striking: ger anokhi immakh ('I am a stranger/resident alien with you'). The ger was a non-citizen living in someone else's land — dependent on the landowner's hospitality, without permanent rights. David says his entire existence on earth is that of a guest in God's territory. The word toshav ('sojourner, temporary resident') deepens this: David is passing through, not settling down. And this is not unique to David: ke-khol avotai ('like all my ancestors'). Every generation is a guest. The tears (dim'ati) are the physical evidence of this displacement — the cry of someone who knows he does not truly belong.
14. The prayer 'look away from me' (hasha mimmenni) reverses the normal psalmist's request. Usually the plea is 'do not hide your face' or 'look upon me.' Here, God's attention has become a burden, not a comfort. Job 7:19 makes the same request: 'Will you not look away from me for an instant, and leave me alone long enough to swallow my spit?' The prayer is not for permanent divine absence but for a moment of reprieve — a breath of mercy in the gap between suffering and death.

Summary: A psalm of David that moves in two dramatic movements: first, a testimony of deliverance from the pit (vv. 2-11) — God lifted him out, set his feet on rock, put a new song in his mouth, and revealed that what He truly desires is not sacrifice but obedient ears — and second, a desperate plea from a new crisis (vv. 12-18). The psalm's emotional trajectory is startling: the first half celebrates rescue already accomplished; the second half cries out for rescue not yet arrived. David holds both experiences simultaneously — past deliverance and present danger — without resolving the tension.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 7-9 contain one of the most theologically significant statements about sacrifice in the Hebrew Bible. David declares that God did not desire (lo chafatsta) sacrifice (zevach), offering (minchah), burnt offering (olah), or sin offering (chata'ah) — the four major categories of the Israelite sacrificial system. Instead: oznayim karita li ('ears you dug/hollowed out for me'). The image is extraordinary: God excavated David's ears — bored them open, shaped them for hearing. What God wants is not the smoke of burned animals but a person whose ears have been opened to hear and obey. The writer of Hebrews 10:5-7 quotes this passage (via the LXX, which reads 'a body you prepared for me' instead of 'ears you dug for me') and applies it to Christ's incarnation — the ultimate replacement of animal sacrifice with personal obedience. In its original Hebrew context, the statement is a prophetic critique of the sacrificial system from within the psalmic tradition itself.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the two halves of this psalm is debated. The sudden shift from joyful testimony (vv. 2-11) to urgent plea (vv. 12-18) has led some scholars to argue that two originally separate psalms were joined. Psalm 70 is virtually identical to verses 14-18, supporting the theory that these verses once circulated independently. The phrase oznayim karita li ('ears you dug for me') is textually significant: the LXX translates it as soma de katertiso moi ('a body you prepared for me'), which is the version quoted in Hebrews 10:5. The MT's 'ears' and the LXX's 'body' are different readings with different theological implications, though both point toward the same conclusion: God wants obedient presence, not ritual performance.

Connections: Hebrews 10:5-10 quotes verses 7-9 as the words of Christ entering the world, making this psalm christologically central in the New Testament. The critique of sacrifice echoes 1 Samuel 15:22 ('to obey is better than sacrifice'), Hosea 6:6 ('I desire faithful love and not sacrifice'), Micah 6:6-8, and Isaiah 1:11-17. Psalm 70 duplicates verses 14-18 almost word for word. The 'new song' (shir chadash) of verse 4 connects to Psalms 33:3, 96:1, 98:1, and 144:9. The 'scroll of the book' (megillat sefer) in verse 8 has been interpreted as the Torah, a prophetic commission, or a heavenly decree about David's destiny.

¹For the director of music. A psalm of David.

²I waited — waited intently — for the LORD,
and He leaned down to me and heard my cry.

³He lifted me out of the pit of destruction, out of the miry mud.
He set my feet on a rock and made my steps secure.

⁴He put a new song in my mouth,
a hymn of praise to our God.
Many will see and fear and put their trust in the LORD.

⁵Blessed is the person who makes the LORD his trust and does not turn to the arrogant or to those who chase after lies.

⁶Many are the wonders you have done, O LORD my God, and your plans for us —
nothing can compare to you.
If I tried to declare and tell of them,
they would be too many to count.

⁷Sacrifice and offering you did not desire — ears you dug for me.
Burnt offering and sin offering you did not require.

⁸Then I said, 'See — I have come.
In the scroll of the book it is written about me.

⁹I delight to do your will, O my God.
Your instruction is within my inmost being.'

¹⁰I proclaimed good news of righteousness in the great assembly.
See — I did not seal my lips.
O LORD, you know this.

¹¹I did not hide your righteousness within my heart.
I spoke of your faithfulness and your salvation.
I did not conceal your faithful love and your truth from the great assembly.

¹²You, O LORD, will not withhold your compassion from me.
Your faithful love and your truth will always guard me.

¹³For evils beyond number have surrounded me.
My iniquities have overtaken me — I cannot see.
They are more than the hairs of my head, and my heart has failed me.

¹⁴Be pleased, O LORD, to deliver me.
O LORD, hurry to help me.

¹⁵Let those who seek to destroy my life be shamed and disgraced together.
Let those who delight in my ruin
be turned back and humiliated.

¹⁶Let those who say to me, 'Ha! Ha!'
be appalled at their own shame.

¹⁷Let all who seek you rejoice and be glad in you.
Let those who love your salvation say continually,
'The LORD is great!'

¹⁸As for me — I am poor and needy,
but the Lord thinks of me.
You are my help and my deliverer.
O my God, do not delay.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard la-menatseach le-David mizmor heading places this psalm in the Davidic collection for liturgical performance.
2. The infinitive absolute construction (qavvoh qivviti) is one of Hebrew's strongest emphasis markers. It could be rendered 'I certainly waited,' 'I waited and waited,' or 'I waited with all my being.' The construction communicates that the waiting itself was an act of faith — not passive but strenuously sustained.
3. The bor ('pit, cistern, well') is a common image for Sheol, death, or desperate trouble in the Psalms (Psalms 28:1, 30:3, 69:15, 88:4). The sha'on ('roaring, tumult, destruction') may describe the sound of rushing water at the bottom of the pit or the noise of chaos. The sela ('rock, cliff, crag') is the opposite of tit ha-yaven ('miry mud') — one swallows you, the other supports you.
4. The shir chadash ('new song') is not merely a recently composed song but a song that responds to a new act of God — unprecedented mercy demands unprecedented music. God is both the rescuer and the songwriter: vayyitten be-fi ('He put in my mouth'). David does not compose the song; God places it there. The result is evangelistic: yir'u rabbim ve-yira'u ve-yivtechu ba-YHWH ('many will see and fear and trust in the LORD'). David's rescue becomes a public testimony that draws others to faith.
5. The ashrei ('blessed') formula praises the person whose mivtacho ('his trust, his confidence') is placed in the LORD. The contrasts are rehabim ('the proud, the arrogant, the boastful') and satei khazav ('those who turn aside to falsehood'). The rehab may also be a mythological reference to the sea-monster Rahab, symbolizing chaotic powers — trusting in proud, boastful forces rather than in God.
6. The scope expands from personal testimony to cosmic praise. God's nifle'otekha ('your wonders, your extraordinary deeds') and machshevotekha ('your plans, your thoughts') toward us (eleinu) are innumerable. The phrase ein arokh elekha ('nothing can be arranged/compared to you') means God is incomparable — every attempt to measure Him fails. The final phrase atsemu mi-sapper ('they are too numerous to count') admits the inadequacy of language: David's new song can only sample from an infinite playlist.
7. The phrase oznayim karita li has been interpreted in several ways: (1) God bored David's ears open, creating the capacity for obedience; (2) an allusion to the ear-piercing ceremony of Exodus 21:5-6, where a slave who chooses to remain with his master has his ear pierced against a doorpost — an act of voluntary, permanent servitude; (3) the LXX reads soma de katertiso moi ('a body you prepared for me'), which Hebrews 10:5 quotes. The MT's 'ears' is the harder reading and likely original. The LXX's 'body' may be an interpretive expansion: the ear stands for the whole person.
7. The prophetic critique of sacrifice-without-obedience runs through the Hebrew Bible: 1 Samuel 15:22, Isaiah 1:11-17, Jeremiah 7:22-23, Hosea 6:6, Amos 5:21-24, Micah 6:6-8. David's statement here is not a rejection of the sacrificial system but a declaration of its purpose: sacrifice without the opened ear is theater.

8. David responds to the opened ears with total availability: hinneh va'ti ('Behold, I have come'). The phrase bi-megillat sefer katuv alai ('in the scroll of the book it is written about me') refers to a written document — possibly the Torah, a prophetic oracle, a heavenly register, or a royal commissioning decree. Whatever the specific referent, David understands that his life has a script written by God, and he has come to fulfill it. Hebrews 10:7 applies these words to Christ entering the world.
9. The verb chafatsti ('I desire, I delight') — the same verb that described what God does not desire regarding sacrifice (v. 7) — now describes what David desires: la'asot retsonkha ('to do your will/pleasure'). The reversal is complete: God does not delight in sacrifice; David delights in obedience. God's toratekha ('your Torah/instruction') is be-tokh me'ai ('within my intestines/inmost parts'). The me'ayim ('intestines, bowels, inner organs') are the deepest interior of the body — Torah has been swallowed, digested, and absorbed into David's very organs.
10. The verb bissarti ('I proclaimed good news, I bore tidings') from basar is the Hebrew root behind the New Testament's euangelion ('gospel, good news'). David has been an evangelist: he proclaimed tsedeq ('righteousness, vindication') in the qahal rav ('great assembly'). His lips were not sealed (lo ekhla, 'I did not restrain') — unlike his silence in Psalm 39, here he speaks freely. The appeal YHWH attah yadata ('LORD, you know') calls God as witness to his faithfulness.
11. Five divine attributes David has publicly proclaimed: tsidqatekha ('your righteousness'), emunatekha ('your faithfulness'), teshu'atekha ('your salvation'), chasdekha ('your faithful love'), and amittekha ('your truth/reliability'). He did not hide (lo khissiti) or conceal (lo khichadti) any of them. The repetition of qahal rav ('great assembly') from verse 10 emphasizes that David's testimony is public, not private. Concealing God's attributes would be a form of theft from the congregation.
12. The verse pivots from testimony to petition. The logic is: since I did not withhold your attributes from the assembly (vv. 10-11), do not withhold your rachamekha ('your compassion, your mercies') from me. The pair chasdekha va-amittekha ('your faithful love and your truth') becomes David's personal bodyguard: tamid yitseruni ('they will always protect me, they will always guard me'). The verb natsar ('to guard, to watch over, to protect') turns divine attributes into active agents of preservation.
13. The second half of the psalm begins with a new crisis. The ra'ot ('evils, disasters') are ad ein mispar ('without number'). David's avonot ('iniquities') have caught him (hissiguni, 'they have overtaken me') — sin is personified as a pursuer who has finally caught its quarry. The result: lo yakholti lir'ot ('I am unable to see') — he is blinded by the sheer volume of trouble. They outnumber the hairs of his head. And his lev ('heart') — the seat of courage and will — azavani ('has abandoned me'). This is the same David who just sang a new song and proclaimed God's faithfulness. The psalm holds both realities.
14. From here through verse 18, the text is virtually identical to Psalm 70 (which circulated as an independent psalm). The doubled YHWH creates urgency: LORD, deliver — LORD, hurry. The verb retseh ('be pleased, be willing, consent') does not demand but appeals: be willing to rescue me.
15. The imprecation follows the pattern of Psalm 35:4, 26. The four verbs of defeat — yevoshu ('be shamed'), yachperu ('be disgraced'), yissogu achor ('be driven back'), yikkalemu ('be humiliated') — describe a comprehensive rout. The phrase mevaqshei nafshi lispotah ('those who seek my soul to sweep it away') pictures the enemies as people trying to annihilate David's very existence.
16. The gloating cry he'ach he'ach ('Aha! Aha!') from Psalm 35:21 returns — the sound of malicious delight at David's suffering. The verb yashommu ('let them be appalled, let them be horrified') turns the mockers' joy into horror: their own boshtam ('shame') will become the thing that appalls them.
17. The contrast with verse 16: those who seek David's ruin will be shamed, but those who seek God (mevaqshekha) will rejoice. The phrase ohavei teshu'atekha ('those who love your salvation') describes people whose primary desire is God's saving action. Their refrain: yigdal YHWH ('let the LORD be magnified/great') — the same perpetual song as Psalm 35:27.
18. The tension between verse 2 ('I waited patiently') and verse 18 ('do not delay') is not a contradiction but the full range of prayer. Faith includes both sustained patience and urgent pleading. The psalmist who waited intently for the LORD in the past now cries for the LORD to come quickly in the present. Both are trust.

Summary: Psalm 41 closes Book I of the Psalter (Psalms 1-41) with a psalm of David about the faithful person who cares for the weak. The psalmist moves from a wisdom-style beatitude about those who attend to the poor (daleth), through a personal lament about illness and betrayal by a trusted friend, to a declaration of trust in the LORD who upholds him. The psalm ends with a doxology that seals the entire first book.

What Makes This Remarkable: The center of this psalm is one of the most piercing betrayal texts in the Hebrew Bible: 'Even my close friend, whom I trusted, who ate my bread, has lifted his heel against me' (v. 10). The Hebrew gam ish shelomi asher batachti bo okhel lachmi higdil alai aqev is devastating in its specificity — this is not a stranger but a covenant-meal companion. The image of lifting the heel (higdil alai aqev) may suggest a horse kicking its master, or a wrestler's treacherous move. The New Testament will apply this verse directly to Judas (John 13:18). The doxology in verse 14 —

'Blessed be the LORD, the God of Israel, from everlasting to everlasting. Amen and Amen' — is not part of the psalm proper but an editorial addition marking the end of Book I. Each of the five books of the Psalter ends with a similar doxology.

Translation Friction: The superscription lam'natseach mizmor le-David ('For the choirmaster, a psalm of David') assigns authorship, but the content — illness, enemies who wish him dead, a betraying friend — fits many possible life settings. The term dal in verse 2 is often translated 'poor' but means specifically 'weak, thin, low, helpless' — someone diminished in power or resources. The beatitude form (ashre) at the opening connects this psalm to Psalm 1, creating a literary frame around Book I: both begin with ashre. The phrase 'you have upheld me in my integrity' (v. 13) is bold — the psalmist claims tummah (moral wholeness) despite his suffering, refusing to accept that illness equals divine punishment.

Connections: Psalm 41 forms an inclusio with Psalm 1: both open with ashre ('blessed/happy is the one who...'). The betrayal by a table-companion (v. 10) resonates with the psalms of David's court crises, particularly the Absalom psalms (3, 55, 63). The identification of this friend may connect to Ahithophel (2 Samuel 15:12, 16:23). The doxology (v. 14) parallels the closing doxologies of Book II (72:18-19), Book III (89:53), Book IV (106:48), and Book V (150, which is itself the doxology). Jesus quotes verse 10 in John 13:18, applying it to Judas Iscariot's betrayal during the Passover meal.

¹For the choirmaster. A psalm of David.

²Blessed is the one who gives thought to the weak — in the day of trouble the LORD will rescue him.

³The LORD will guard him and keep him alive;
he will be declared blessed in the land.
Do not give him over to the appetite of his enemies.

⁴The LORD will sustain him on his bed of illness;
you transform his entire resting place when he is sick.

⁵I said, "LORD, show me grace;
heal my life, for I have sinned against you."

⁶My enemies speak malice about me:
"When will he die and his name vanish?"

⁷When one comes to visit, he speaks emptiness;
his heart gathers up trouble,
then he goes outside and spreads it.

⁸All who hate me whisper together against me;
against me they plot harm.

⁹"A vile thing has been poured into him;
now that he lies down, he will never rise again."

¹⁰Even my close friend whom I trusted, who ate my bread,
has raised his heel against me.

¹¹But you, LORD — show me grace and raise me up,
so that I may repay them.

¹²By this I know that you delight in me:
my enemy does not shout in triumph over me.

¹³As for me, you have upheld me in my integrity and set me before your face forever.

¹⁴Blessed be the LORD, the God of Israel,
from everlasting to everlasting.
Amen and Amen.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. lam'natseach ('for the choirmaster/director') derives from natsach, which can mean 'to lead, to oversee, to endure.' The term appears in 55 psalm superscriptions and likely indicates a liturgical performance direction. mizmor ('psalm') comes from zamar ('to sing, to make music with instruments'), indicating this is a composed song for instrumental accompaniment.
2. dal ('weak, poor, thin, helpless') is distinct from ani ('afflicted') and evyon ('destitute'). dal emphasizes diminished capacity — someone who has been reduced, who lacks the power to help themselves. The maskil ('one who gives wise attention') combines intellectual discernment with practical care.
2. The ashre opening creates a deliberate inclusio with Psalm 1:1, framing Book I of the Psalter between two beatitudes. Psalm 1 blesses the one who avoids wickedness and meditates on Torah; Psalm 41 blesses the one who cares for the weak.
3. The shift from third person ('the LORD will guard him') to second person ('do not give him') is characteristic of Hebrew prayer, where the psalmist moves fluidly between speaking about God and speaking to God. The phrase be-nefesh oyeavav ('to the appetite/desire of his enemies') uses nefesh in its sense of 'throat, desire, craving' — the enemies want to consume him.
4. The verb hafakh ('to turn, to overturn') is dramatic — it is used of God overturning cities (Genesis 19:25) and turning rivers to blood (Exodus 7:17). Applied to a sickbed, it creates a startling image: God overturns the conditions of illness. The intimacy of God tending a sick person's bed is unusual in ancient Near Eastern literature, where the gods generally do not stoop to such care.
5. The psalmist's confession ki chatati lakh ('for I have sinned against you') is the only explicit admission of sin in the psalm. It stands in tension with verse 13, where the psalmist claims God upholds him 'in my integrity' (be-tummi). This is not a contradiction but a nuance: the psalmist acknowledges moral imperfection while maintaining that his fundamental orientation toward God is whole. nefesh here means 'life, self, entire being' — not merely 'soul' in a body-soul dualism.
6. The enemies' question matai yamut ve-avad shemo ('when will he die and his name perish?') reveals their deepest wish — not merely the psalmist's death but the extinction of his legacy. In Hebrew thought, the name (shem) carries identity across generations. To have one's name perish (avad, 'to be lost, to be destroyed') is annihilation beyond death.
7. The scene is a sick-visit gone wrong. The visitor speaks shav ('emptiness, falsehood, deception') to the psalmist's face while internally collecting ammunition — yiqbots aven lo ('he gathers up wickedness for himself'). Once outside (yetse la-chuts), he spreads the gossip. The three-stage sequence — enter, gather, broadcast — is a precise anatomy of malicious social behavior.
8. The verb yitlachashu ('they whisper') comes from lachash, which can mean 'to whisper, to charm, to practice enchantment.' The whispering of enemies may carry overtones of magical incantation — in the ancient world, illness was often attributed to curses, and whispering enemies may be perceived as casting spells. At minimum, it describes conspiratorial murmuring.
9. beliyya'al is one of the most theologically loaded terms in the Hebrew Bible. It appears in Deuteronomy for worthless people, in Judges for wicked men, and eventually becomes a title for the anti-God figure in later Jewish and Christian texts (2 Corinthians 6:15 uses 'Belial'). Here it describes not a person but a 'thing' — a destructive force or condition that the enemies believe has permanently seized the psalmist.
10. Jesus quotes this verse in John 13:18 during the Last Supper, applying it to Judas Iscariot. The connection is precise: Judas was a table-companion who shared bread with Jesus and then betrayed him. The Hebrew higdil alai aqev ('lifted the heel against me') may be an idiom from wrestling (a treacherous heel-trip) or from the behavior of a horse that kicks its rider. In either case, the violence comes from someone positioned as an intimate.
10. The connection to Ahithophel — David's counselor who defected to Absalom (2 Samuel 15:12) — is strong. Ahithophel was David's trusted advisor, his ish shelomi, who ate at his table and then joined the conspiracy. His betrayal is the historical backdrop for this verse's anguish.
11. The petition va-ashalemah lahem ('that I may repay them') uses the piel of shalam ('to repay, to make whole, to complete'). The psalmist is not asking for private revenge but for the opportunity to settle accounts — to see justice done. In the context of ancient royal justice, the king who rises from his sickbed would judge those who conspired during his illness.
12. The verb chafatsta ('you delight in, you take pleasure in') is stronger than mere favor — it expresses God's active desire toward the psalmist. The evidence of this delight is negative: lo yaria oyevi alai ('my enemy does not raise a war-cry over me'). The verb yaria means 'to shout, to sound a battle cry, to raise an alarm.' The psalmist is still alive, still standing — the enemy's premature death announcement (v. 9) has not come true.

13. The tension between verse 5 ('I have sinned against you') and verse 13 ('in my integrity') is instructive. tummah does not mean moral perfection; it means wholeness of intent, undivided loyalty, a heart that is not double. The psalmist can acknowledge specific failures while maintaining that his fundamental commitment to God is complete.
14. This verse is an editorial doxology, not part of David's original composition. The five-book structure of the Psalter mirrors the five books of Moses (Torah), and each division is sealed with a closing benediction. Book I ends here; Book II begins with Psalm 42 and the psalms of the Sons of Korah.
14. amen derives from the root aman ('to be firm, to be trustworthy, to confirm'). To say amen is to declare 'it is firm, it is established, so let it be.' The doubling intensifies the affirmation.

Summary: Psalm 42 opens Book II of the Psalter and is attributed to the Sons of Korah. It is the first half of what was originally a single psalm (42-43), as indicated by the shared refrain ('Why are you cast down, O my soul?'), identical structure, and the fact that Psalm 43 lacks a superscription — unique among its neighbors. The psalmist is in exile, far from the Temple, possibly in the region of the Jordan headwaters near Mount Hermon. He thirsts for God's presence the way a deer pants for flowing water, remembers leading processions to the house of God, and battles despair while enemies taunt him with 'Where is your God?'

What Makes This Remarkable: *The opening image — ke-ayal ta'aarog al afiqe mayim ('as a deer pants for channels of water') — is one of the most famous metaphors in all literature. The verb ta'aarog appears only here and in Joel 1:20 (where animals groan for water in drought), making it an extremely rare word that conveys desperate, physical longing. The psalm's structure is built around a three-fold refrain (42:6, 42:12, 43:5) in which the psalmist interrogates his own soul: 'Why are you cast down?' This internal dialogue — the self-addressing the self in God's presence — is a remarkable psychological portrait. The psalmist does not deny his despair; he questions it, argues with it, and ultimately commands his soul to hope. The geography is specific: the land of the Jordan, Mount Hermon, and Mount Mizar (a small peak, perhaps near Caesarea Philippi). Deep calls to deep (tehom el tehom) at the sound of God's waterfalls — the very water he thirsts for becomes an image of overwhelming chaos.*

Translation Friction: *The superscription assigns this to the bene Qorach ('Sons of Korah'), a levitical guild of Temple musicians descended from Korah, whose rebellion and death are recorded in Numbers 16. That the descendants of a rebel became the Temple's premier musicians is itself a story of redemption. The phrase be-har mits'ar ('on Mount Mizar') is debated — mits'ar means 'smallness,' so this may be 'the little mountain,' an actual place name, or a metaphor for the psalmist's diminished state in contrast to Mount Zion's greatness. The Elohistic Psalter (42-83) consistently uses Elohim rather than YHVH, probably due to editorial substitution. We retain LORD where the original likely read YHVH.*

Connections: *Psalms 42-43 form a single literary unit, as demonstrated by the triple refrain, shared vocabulary, and the absence of a superscription on Psalm 43. The deer imagery connects to Song of Songs 2:9, 17, where the beloved is compared to a gazelle. The phrase 'deep calls to deep' (tehom el tehom, v. 8) evokes Genesis 1:2 (tehom, the primordial deep) and Jonah 2:4-6 (the waters of chaos overwhelming the drowning prophet). The taunt 'Where is your God?' (v. 4, 11) appears also in Joel 2:17 and Micah 7:10, always as the enemy's mockery of God's apparent absence.*

¹For the choirmaster. A maskil of the Sons of Korah.

²As a deer pants for channels of water,
so my soul pants for you, O God.

³My soul thirsts for God,
for the living God.
When will I come and see the face of God?

⁴My tears have been my food day and night, while they say to me all day long,
"Where is your God?"

⁵These things I remember, and I pour out my soul within me:
how I used to walk with the throng, leading them in procession to the house of God, with shouts of joy and thanksgiving — a multitude keeping festival.

⁶Why are you cast down, my soul,
and why do you groan within me?
Hope in God, for I will yet praise him —
the salvation of his face.

⁷My God, my soul is cast down within me;
therefore I remember you from the land of the Jordan and the Hermons, from Mount Mizar.

⁸Deep calls to deep at the sound of your waterfalls;
all your breakers and your waves have swept over me.

⁹By day the LORD commands his faithful love, and at night his song is with me — a prayer to the God of my life.

¹⁰I say to God my rock,
"Why have you forgotten me?
Why must I walk in darkness
under the pressure of the enemy?"

¹¹Like a shattering blow to my bones, my adversaries taunt me, saying to me all day long,
"Where is your God?"

¹²Why are you cast down, my soul,
and why do you groan within me?
Hope in God, for I will yet praise him —
the salvation of my face and my God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. maskil may derive from sakal ('to be prudent, to give insight') and likely indicates a psalm of instruction or contemplation. The bene Qorach ('Sons of Korah') were a levitical guild of Temple singers and musicians. Their ancestor Korah led a rebellion against Moses (Numbers 16) and was swallowed by the earth, but his sons survived (Numbers 26:11) — a detail that makes their role as worship leaders a living testimony to grace surviving judgment.

2. The Hebrew ayal is masculine ('stag, hart'), though many translations render it 'deer' generically. The LXX uses the feminine form (elaphos), and the Christian tradition has often depicted a female deer. The gender matters less than the image: a wild animal in extremity, reduced to its most basic need.
2. The afiq mayim ('channels of water') are not stagnant pools but flowing streams — the word afiq refers to a channel or riverbed where water runs. The psalmist does not want stored religion or past experience; he wants the living, moving presence of God.
3. The phrase pene Elohim ('the face of God') was a technical term for the Temple experience. Deuteronomy 16:16 commands all males to 'appear before the face of the LORD' (yera'eh et pene YHVH) three times a year. The Masoretes repointed the verb from active ('see') to passive ('appear/be seen'), probably to avoid the theologically bold idea that a human could see God's face (cf. Exodus 33:20). The older, active reading preserves the psalmist's yearning: he wants to gaze upon God.
4. The image of tears as bread (dim'ati lechem) inverts the normal sustenance of life — instead of eating food, the psalmist feeds on grief. The taunt ayyeh Elohekha ('where is your God?') is the cruelest question in the Psalter. It does not deny God's existence but mocks God's apparent indifference to the sufferer. The psalmist's exile from the Temple makes the question bite deeper: if God dwells in Zion and the psalmist cannot reach Zion, then the enemies' taunt has geographical force.
5. The verb eddaddem is difficult. It may derive from dadah ('to move slowly, to lead gently') and would mean 'I led them in slow procession.' Some relate it to dud ('a pot') and read 'I walked among them.' The overall picture is clear: the psalmist was once at the center of pilgrim worship, possibly as a levitical leader, and now he is cut off from it entirely.
6. This refrain appears three times: here (42:6), at 42:12, and at 43:5. The slight variations between the three occurrences are theologically significant — by the third repetition in 43:5, the psalmist has added 'my God' (Elohai), moving from addressing God to claiming God as his own.
6. yeshu'ot panav ('salvations of his face') is an unusual construct. panav ('his face') may function as the subject ('his face is salvation') or as the source ('salvation from his face/presence'). Either way, the psalmist locates deliverance in the direct, face-to-face encounter with God.
7. The geography locates the psalmist precisely: the land of the Jordan (erets Yarden) near the Hermon range (chermonim, plural, referring to Hermon's multiple peaks) and har mits'ar ('Mount Mizar/the small mountain'). This places him in the far north of Israel, near the source of the Jordan River — as far from the Temple in Jerusalem as one could be while still within Israelite territory. mits'ar means 'smallness,' which may be a place name or a pointed contrast: the psalmist stands on a small, insignificant mountain, remembering the great mountain of Zion where God dwells.
8. tehom ('deep, abyss') is cognate with the Babylonian Tiamat, the chaos-sea goddess. In Genesis 1:2, tehom is the formless deep over which God's spirit hovers. Here, one tehom calls to another — chaos communicates with chaos, and the psalmist is caught between them.
8. The paradox of water in this psalm is striking: in verse 2, the psalmist thirsts for water like a deer. In verse 8, water overwhelms him. The same element he craves is the element destroying him — a profound image of how the encounter with God can be simultaneously longed-for and overwhelming.
9. This is one of the few places in the Elohistic Psalter (42-83) where YHVH appears instead of Elohim, suggesting it survived the editorial substitution process. The phrase El chayyai ('God of my life') is intimate — not 'the living God' (El chai, v. 3) but 'the God who is the source of my specific, individual life.'
10. The psalmist addresses God as sal'i ('my rock, my cliff, my crag') — a title of stability and protection — and then immediately accuses this rock of forgetting him. The juxtaposition is intentional: the one he calls 'rock' seems to have abandoned him. qoder ('dark, gloomy, in mourning') describes both the psalmist's emotional state and his outward appearance — the word suggests wearing mourning garments. lachsats ('pressure, oppression, affliction') is a physical word: the enemy is pressing down on him.
11. The word retsach ('murder, killing, crushing blow') is extreme — the enemies' taunts are not mere words but violence that penetrates to the bone. The repetition of ayyeh Elohekha ('where is your God?') from verse 4 shows that this mockery is relentless and central to the psalmist's suffering. The taunt strikes at the very thing the psalmist clings to — his relationship with God — and uses his exile from the Temple as evidence that God has abandoned him.
12. The variation between verse 6 (panav, 'his face') and verse 12 (panai, 'my face') is debated. Some manuscripts read panav in both places. If panai is original, the meaning shifts: God is the salvation 'of my face' — meaning God restores the psalmist's countenance, lifting his bowed head. Either reading is powerful.

Summary: Psalm 43 is the second half of the original single psalm that began with Psalm 42. It has no superscription — the only psalm in this section of the Psalter without one — confirming its unity with the preceding psalm. The psalmist shifts from lament to petition, asking God to send light and truth as guides to lead him back to the holy mountain and the dwelling of God. The psalm culminates in the third and final repetition of the refrain: 'Why are you cast down, my soul?'

What Makes This Remarkable: The movement from Psalm 42 to Psalm 43 traces the arc of prayer itself. Psalm 42 is dominated by memory and grief — the psalmist remembers what he has lost and weeps. Psalm 43 turns that grief into bold petition: 'Send out your light and your truth — let them lead me.' The personification of light (or) and truth (emet) as guides, almost as angelic escorts, is stunning. They are not abstract qualities but active agents sent from God's throne to conduct the exiled worshiper back to Zion. The final refrain in verse 5 reaches its fullest form, adding both 'my God' (as in 42:12) and the emphatic particle — the psalmist has argued himself from despair toward hope through three rounds of self-interrogation.

Translation Friction: *The absence of a superscription on Psalm 43 is the strongest evidence that it was originally joined to Psalm 42. In the Masoretic tradition they are separated, but the LXX manuscripts vary, and several Hebrew manuscripts combine them. The phrase goy lo chasid ('an ungodly nation') in verse 1 is unusual — goy typically means 'nation, people' and could refer to foreign oppressors or, more provocatively, to faithless members of Israel itself. The psalmist's petition 'judge me' (shafeteni) is not a request for punishment but for vindication — a courtroom appeal for the divine judge to rule in his favor.*

Connections: *The light-and-truth motif (v. 3) connects to Psalm 36:10 ('in your light we see light') and to the priestly Urim and Thummim, whose names may mean 'lights and perfections/truths.' The holy mountain (har qodshekha) is Zion (Psalm 2:6, 48:2), and the mishkanot ('dwelling places') echo the tabernacle (mishkan). The entire 42-43 unit serves as a gateway to Book II of the Psalter, establishing its dominant themes: exile, longing for the Temple, the quest for God's presence, and the tension between despair and hope.*

¹Vindicate me, O God, and plead my case against a nation without faithful love.
From the man of deceit and injustice, rescue me.

²For you are the God of my stronghold.
Why have you rejected me?
Why must I walk in darkness
under the pressure of the enemy?

³Send out your light and your truth —
let them lead me,
let them bring me to your holy mountain and to your dwelling places.

⁴Then I will come to the altar of God, to God, the gladness of my joy,
and I will praise you with the lyre,
O God, my God.

⁵Why are you cast down, my soul,
and why do you groan within me?
Hope in God, for I will yet praise him —

the salvation of my face and my God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase goy lo chasid ('a nation without faithful love') is striking. goy usually refers to a foreign nation, but in the context of the psalm's internal Israelite setting (Temple, Zion, Levitical worship), it may describe faithless Israelites — people who have abandoned chesed. Rendering lo chasid as 'without faithful love' rather than 'ungodly' preserves the specific covenantal charge.
2. The verse nearly duplicates 42:10 but shifts from 'my rock' (sal'i) to 'the God of my stronghold' (Elohe ma'uzzi). ma'oz ('stronghold, fortress, refuge') comes from azaz ('to be strong'). The psalmist's accusation is sharper here: not merely 'forgotten' (42:10) but zanachtani ('you have rejected me, you have cast me off'). zanach is a strong verb of deliberate abandonment. The tension between calling God 'my stronghold' and accusing God of rejection is the psalm's emotional center.
3. The pairing of or ('light') and emet ('truth') may echo the priestly Urim and Thummim (urim may derive from or, 'light'; thummim from tamam, 'completeness/truth'). If so, the psalmist is asking God to send the same guiding instruments that directed priestly decisions — a deeply levitical prayer, fitting for a Son of Korah.
3. emet ('truth') in Hebrew is not primarily intellectual but relational — it means 'reliability, faithfulness, firmness.' God's truth is not a set of propositions but a quality of character: God is firm, stable, and can be relied upon. Sending truth as a guide means sending divine reliability itself.
4. simchat gili ('the gladness of my joy/exultation') is a construct chain where both nouns express delight, creating an intensified expression — God is not merely a source of happiness but the gladness within the gladness, the deepest layer of joy itself.
5. The three-fold refrain structure (42:6, 42:12, 43:5) mirrors the three-fold structure of lament psalms generally (invocation, complaint, trust/praise). The fact that 42-43 was one psalm means this refrain divides the single composition into three equal movements: longing and memory (42:2-6), suffering and chaos (42:7-12), and petition and vision (43:1-5).

Summary: Psalm 44 is a national lament of the Sons of Korah, spoken by the community after a devastating military defeat. The psalm moves through four distinct movements: remembrance of God's past saving acts in the conquest (vv. 2-9), the present crisis of defeat and disgrace (vv. 10-17), a protestation of innocence — the community has not broken covenant (vv. 18-23), and a desperate plea for God to awaken and act (vv. 24-27). The psalm's theological nerve is its insistence that the defeat cannot be explained by Israel's unfaithfulness.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 44 is one of the boldest texts in the Hebrew Bible because it directly confronts the retribution principle — the theology that suffering results from sin. The community insists: 'All this has come upon us, yet we have not forgotten you, and we have not been false to your covenant' (v. 18). This is not Job's individual protest but an entire community saying to God: we did not break faith, and you still let us be slaughtered. Verse 23 — 'For your sake we are killed all day long; we are counted as sheep for slaughter' — will be quoted by Paul in Romans 8:36 to argue that suffering does not separate believers from God's love. The psalm's final cry, 'Awake! Why do you sleep, O Lord?' (v. 24), is extraordinary: it attributes sleep to the Almighty, echoing and reversing Elijah's mockery of Baal on Carmel (1 Kings 18:27).

Translation Friction: *The claim of innocence in verses 18-23 has troubled interpreters. Is the community genuinely innocent, or is this rhetorical exaggeration? The psalm leaves no room for ambiguity — the community explicitly denies covenant violation. This creates a theological crisis: if God is just and Israel is faithful, why the defeat? The psalm offers no answer; it simply holds the contradiction before God and demands a response. The phrase be-kol yom ('all day long') in verse 23 intensifies the suffering into a permanent condition. The historical setting is debated — some place it in the Assyrian period, others during the Maccabean crisis, but the psalm's refusal to name the enemy makes it available for any generation's suffering.*

Connections: The protest of innocent suffering links this psalm to Job (especially Job 9:22-24, where Job accuses God of destroying the innocent alongside the wicked). The 'sheep for slaughter' image (v. 23) connects to Isaiah 53:7 (the suffering servant led like a lamb to slaughter). Paul's quotation in Romans 8:36 recontextualizes the verse: suffering is real but does not indicate divine abandonment. The plea for God to 'awake' (v. 24) inverts the mockery of 1 Kings 18:27, where Elijah tells Baal worshipers their god is sleeping. Here Israel dares to say the same to the LORD.

¹For the choirmaster. A maskil of the Sons of Korah.

²O God, with our ears we have heard — our ancestors told us —
the deeds you performed in their days, in the days of old.

³You — your hand drove out nations and planted our ancestors;
you shattered peoples and spread them out.

⁴For not by their own sword did they take the land, and their own arm did not save them;
but your right hand and your arm and the light of your face — because you delighted in them.

⁵You are my King, O God; command victories for Jacob.

⁶Through you we gore our adversaries;
through your name we trample those who rise against us.

⁷For I do not trust in my bow, and my sword cannot save me.

⁸For you have saved us from our adversaries and put to shame those who hate us.

⁹In God we have gloried all day long,
and your name we will thank forever. Selah.

¹⁰Yet you have rejected us and humiliated us and do not go out with our armies.

¹¹You make us retreat before the foe, and those who hate us plunder at will.

¹²You hand us over like sheep for slaughter and scatter us among the nations.

¹³You sell your people for nothing and set no high price on them.

¹⁴You make us a taunt to our neighbors,
a mockery and derision to those around us.

¹⁵You make us a byword among the nations,
a shaking of the head among the peoples.

¹⁶All day long my disgrace is before me,
and shame covers my face,

¹⁷because of the voice of the one who taunts and reviles, because of the enemy and the avenger.

¹⁸All this has come upon us, yet we have not forgotten you and we have not been false to your covenant.

¹⁹Our heart has not turned back,
nor have our steps strayed from your path,

²⁰yet you have crushed us in the haunt of jackals and covered us with deep darkness.

²¹If we had forgotten the name of our God or spread out our hands to a foreign god,

²²would not God search this out?
For he knows the secrets of the heart.

²³For your sake we are killed all day long;
we are counted as sheep for slaughter.

²⁴Awake! Why do you sleep, O Lord?
Rise up! Do not reject us forever.

²⁵Why do you hide your face?
Why forget our affliction and our oppression?

²⁶For our soul is bowed down to the dust;
our belly clings to the ground.

²⁷Rise up — come to our help!
Redeem us for the sake of your faithful love.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The maskil designation and Korahite attribution continue from Psalm 42. As a communal lament, this psalm would have been performed liturgically — the Sons of Korah are not merely named as authors but as the performing guild who gave voice to the nation's grief.
2. The psalm begins with oral tradition: be-oznenu shama'nu ('with our ears we have heard'). This is faith received by testimony, passed from generation to generation. The emphasis on hearing (not reading) places the community in the living chain of witness. The deeds (po'al) refer to the conquest and deliverance narratives. The appeal to 'days of old' (yeme qedem) establishes the contrast that drives the psalm: God acted then; why not now?
3. The agricultural metaphor is vivid: God uprooted nations (horashta, from yarash, 'to dispossess, to drive out') and planted (vattitta'em) Israel in their place. Israel is a vine planted in cleared land. The verb tara ('you shattered, you broke') is severe — God broke the peoples already in the land. The verbs alternate between planting Israel and removing the nations, creating a rhythmic pattern of displacement and establishment.
4. The phrase or panekha ('the light of your face') connects to the priestly blessing of Numbers 6:25 ('the LORD make his face shine upon you'). The shining face of God is the visible expression of divine favor — when it is present, victory follows; when it is withdrawn, defeat comes.
5. The singular malki ('my King') within a communal psalm may indicate a worship leader speaking on behalf of the congregation. The imperative tsavveh ('command!') treats God as a military commander who can order victories as a king dispatches troops. yeshu'ot Ya'aqov ('victories/salvations of Jacob') uses the plural of yeshu'ah, suggesting repeated or comprehensive deliverance.
6. The verb nenaggeach ('we gore') is a bull-fighting image — the horned animal thrusting its enemies. This is raw, physical language for military victory. The parallel be-shimkha ('through your name') means through the invocation of God's name in battle — the war cry that carries divine authority.

7. The confession lo be-qashti evtach ('not in my bow do I trust') uses the same verb batach ('to trust') that the psalms repeatedly reserve for confidence in God. Placing trust in weapons is the opposite of placing trust in God. The community explicitly disowns military self-reliance.
8. The perfect tense hoshata'nu ('you have saved us') recalls past deliverances. The verb hevishota ('you have put to shame') from bosh indicates public disgrace — God caused the enemies to suffer the humiliation they intended for Israel.
9. hillalnu ('we have gloried, we have praised') from halal is the root of 'hallelujah.' The community's boasting is in God, not in themselves — this prepares for the devastating reversal in the next verse. The selah marks a musical pause or interlude, allowing the contrast between past glory and present disaster to sink in.
10. The hinge word af ('yet, but, indeed') marks the devastating turn. zanachta ('you have rejected') and vatakhliemnu ('you have humiliated us') use the same verbs previously applied to enemies — now God does to Israel what he once did to their foes. The phrase lo tetse be-tziv'otenu ('you do not go out with our armies') is the core accusation: God has withdrawn from battle. In Israelite warfare theology, God marched with the army (cf. Deuteronomy 20:4). His absence means certain defeat.
11. Verse 11 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
12. tson ma'akhal ('sheep for eating/slaughter') is an image of helpless livestock led to death. The verb zeritanu ('you have scattered us') from zarah ('to scatter, to winnow') suggests exile — dispersion among the nations like grain flung into the wind.
13. The commercial metaphor of God 'selling' his people appears also in Judges 2:14, 3:8, and 4:2, where God 'sells' Israel into the hands of oppressors as punishment for idolatry. But here, the community insists they have not sinned (vv. 18-22) — so the sale is unjust, or at least inexplicable.
14. Verse 14 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
15. mashal ('byword, proverb') means Israel's name has become a cautionary tale — other nations use Israel as an example of ruin. menod rosh ('shaking of the head') is the gesture of contemptuous pity — people look at Israel and shake their heads in mockery.
16. Verse 16 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
17. Verse 17 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
18. The insistence on innocence distinguishes Psalm 44 from most other national laments, which typically include confession of sin (cf. Psalm 106, Daniel 9, Nehemiah 9). This community does not confess; it protests. The theological problem this creates — why does a faithful people suffer? — is left unresolved within the psalm itself.
19. Verse 19 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
20. meqom tannim ('place of jackals') suggests desolate ruins — jackals inhabit abandoned places. tsalmavet ('deep darkness, shadow of death') is a compound word debated among scholars. It may derive from tsel ('shadow') + mavet ('death') or from tsalmut ('deep darkness'). Either way, it describes the most extreme darkness imaginable — the darkness of Sheol, of death, of total divine absence.
21. Verse 21 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
22. The community appeals to divine omniscience as their witness. ta'alumot lev ('secrets of the heart') — if they had worshiped foreign gods even in thought, God would know. Their appeal to God's knowledge of hidden things is itself an act of radical transparency: they invite investigation and declare confidence in the outcome.
23. The phrase ki alekha ('for your sake, on account of you') is theologically central. The suffering is not random, not punitive, but vocational — it is the consequence of belonging to God in a hostile world. This reading anticipates the Christian theology of suffering for the sake of Christ and the Jewish theology of kiddush hashem (sanctification of the divine name through martyrdom).
24. Psalm 121:4 declares that 'the Guardian of Israel neither slumbers nor sleeps.' Psalm 44:24 takes that theological conviction and throws it back at God as a question: if you do not sleep, then explain why you are acting as though you do. The tension between these two psalms is not resolved — it is held in the canon as a witness to the full range of faithful prayer.
25. The hidden face (hester panim) is the opposite of the shining face (or panim) of verse 4. When God hides his face, favor is withdrawn and disaster follows. onyenu ve-lachatsenu ('our affliction and our oppression') — oni is suffering imposed from outside, lachats is pressure or crushing force. Both words carry the memory of Egypt (Exodus 3:9 uses both terms for Israel's condition under Pharaoh).
26. The image is prostration — not worship but collapse. shachah le-afar nafshenu ('our soul bows to the dust') and davqah la-arets bitnenu ('our belly sticks to the earth') describe a people face-down in the dirt, too broken to rise. The verb davaq ('to cling, to stick') is the same word used for marriage in Genesis 2:24 and for covenant loyalty — here it describes a body glued to the ground by despair.
27. The appeal le-ma'an chasdekha ('for the sake of your faithful love') is the psalm's last word on the subject. Having exhausted every argument — past faithfulness, present innocence, the absurdity of God sleeping — the community falls back on the one thing that cannot fail: God's own covenant character. If chesed means anything, it means God cannot abandon his people permanently.

Summary: Psalm 45 is a royal wedding psalm — a song composed for the marriage of an Israelite king to a foreign princess. The poet begins by describing the king's beauty, grace, and martial valor (vv. 3-10), then addresses the bride, urging her to forget her homeland and embrace her new identity as the queen (vv. 11-13), and concludes with the procession of the bride into the palace and a promise of royal descendants (vv. 14-18). The superscription calls it a shir yedidot ('a song of love/beloved things'), the only psalm so designated.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 45 is the most explicitly messianic psalm in the Psalter after Psalm 2 and Psalm 110. In verse 7, the king is addressed as Elohim: 'Your throne, O God, is forever and ever' (kis'akha Elohim olam va-ed). Whether Elohim here means 'God' (the king is being addressed as divine or as God's representative) or 'your divine throne' (an attributive use), the verse pushes the Davidic king toward divine status in a way unparalleled in Israelite literature. Hebrews 1:8-9 quotes this verse as proof of the Son's divinity. The psalm's other remarkable feature is its frank celebration of physical beauty, perfume, music, and royal splendor — the ivory palaces, the queen in gold of Ophir, the embroidered garments. This is a psalm that delights in material beauty as an expression of divine blessing, without a trace of ascetic suspicion.

Translation Friction: The address to the king as Elohim (v. 7) is the most debated crux in the psalm. Options include: (1) the king is addressed as 'God' in a court hyperbole reflecting ancient Near Eastern royal ideology; (2) Elohim is vocative but means 'divine one' or 'mighty one' rather than 'God' proper; (3) the text should be repointed to read 'your throne is God's throne' or 'God is your throne.' We retain the traditional vocative reading ('your throne, O God') because the Hebrew syntax most naturally supports it and because the psalm clearly operates within the ideology of the Davidic covenant, where the king is God's adopted son (Psalm 2:7). The identity of the bride is debated — Jezebel (Ahab's marriage), an Egyptian princess (Solomon's era), or a Tyrian princess (the 'daughter of Tyre' in v. 13) are all proposed.

Connections: The royal ideology connects to 2 Samuel 7 (the Davidic covenant), Psalm 2 (the king as God's son), and Psalm 110 (the priest-king at God's right hand). Hebrews 1:8-9 quotes verses 7-8 as addressed to Christ. The bride's instruction to 'forget your people and your father's house' (v. 11) echoes Genesis 12:1, where Abraham is told to leave his homeland — the bride's journey mirrors the patriarchal call. The 'daughter of Tyre' (v. 13) connects to Solomon's alliance with Hiram of Tyre (1 Kings 5) and to the broader theme of foreign nations bringing tribute to Zion (Isaiah 60:5-7). The myrrh, aloes, and cassia (v. 9) anticipate the spices of Song of Songs.

¹For the choirmaster. Set to 'Lilies.' A maskil of the Sons of Korah. A song of love.

²My heart overflows with a good word;
I address my work to the king.
My tongue is the pen of a skilled scribe.

³You are the most handsome among the sons of humanity;
grace is poured upon your lips.
Therefore God has blessed you forever.

⁴Strap your sword on your thigh, O warrior — your splendor and your majesty!

⁵In your majesty, ride out victoriously for the cause of truth and humility and righteousness.
Let your right hand teach you awesome deeds.

⁷Your throne, O God, is forever and ever;
a scepter of equity is the scepter of your kingdom.

⁸You love righteousness and hate wickedness;
therefore God, your God, has anointed you

¹⁵In embroidered garments she is led to the king; virgins, her companions, follow after her — they are brought to you.

¹⁶They are led with gladness and rejoicing;
they enter the king's palace.

¹⁷In place of your fathers will be your sons;
you will appoint them as princes throughout the earth.

¹⁸I will cause your name to be remembered in every generation;
therefore the peoples will praise you forever and ever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. al shoshannim ('set to Lilies') is a musical direction — likely the name of a tune or a reference to lily-shaped instruments. shir yedidot ('a song of beloved things / a song of love') is unique among psalm superscriptions. yedidot is the feminine plural of yadid ('beloved'), making this literally 'a song of beloved-ones' or 'a love song.' The term openly declares the psalm's genre: this is a wedding poem.
2. The verb rachash occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible. Cognate languages suggest 'to bubble, to stir, to be in commotion.' The poet's heart is not calmly composing but erupting with creative energy. This self-conscious poetic introduction is rare in the Psalms and signals a court composition of high literary ambition.
3. yafafita ('you are exceedingly beautiful') is an unusual pi'pel form of yafah ('to be beautiful'), intensifying the adjective — the king is beautiful beyond ordinary beauty. The phrase hutsaq chen be-siftotekha ('grace is poured on your lips') uses the imagery of liquid metal being poured into a mold (yatsaq, 'to pour, to cast'). The king's speech is not merely graceful but divinely crafted. The consequence: al ken berakhekha Elohim le-olam ('therefore God has blessed you forever') — physical beauty and verbal grace are read as evidence of permanent divine favor.
4. The poet shifts from beauty to battle. chagor charbkha al yarekh gibbor ('strap your sword on your thigh, mighty one') addresses the king as a warrior preparing for combat. gibbor ('mighty one, warrior, champion') is one of the divine titles in Isaiah 9:5 (El Gibbor). hodekha va-hadarekha ('your splendor and your majesty') describes the royal warrior's glory — hod and hadar are frequently paired as attributes of God (Psalm 96:6, 104:1), here applied to the king.

5. The combination of military valor with humility (anvah) is surprising. The ideal Israelite king is not merely powerful but meek — a quality that will be central to the messianic portrait in Zechariah 9:9 ('humble, riding on a donkey'). This psalm holds together what later theology tends to separate: the warrior and the servant.
6. The Hebrew syntax is disrupted for dramatic effect: 'your arrows sharpened — peoples beneath you fall — in the heart of the king's enemies.' The middle phrase (peoples fall beneath you) is parenthetical, creating a vivid cinematic effect: arrows fly, nations collapse, and the arrows land in the enemies' hearts. The third-person reference to 'the king' within a second-person address may reflect court protocol.
7. Hebrews 1:8-9 quotes this verse as addressed to the Son, making it a foundational christological text. The author of Hebrews reads Elohim as a genuine divine address: the king to whom these words are spoken is, in the fullest sense, God. Whether the original psalmist intended this level of meaning or was working within ancient Near Eastern royal ideology that attributed semi-divine status to kings, the canonical reading — Israel's king as God's own embodiment of rule — reaches toward incarnational theology.
7. The alternative reading 'your throne is God's, forever and ever' (taking Elohim as a genitive rather than vocative) is grammatically possible but less natural in context. The parallel verse 8 ('therefore God, your God, has anointed you') uses Elohim twice in different senses, suggesting the psalmist is comfortable applying the word both to the king and to the God who anoints him.
8. mashach ('to anoint') is the root of mashiach ('messiah, anointed one'). The king is God's mashiach — anointed with oil as a sign of divine election. The 'oil of joy' (shemen sason) echoes Isaiah 61:3, where God gives 'the oil of joy instead of mourning' — anointing as the reversal of grief.
9. The three spices — mor (myrrh), ahalot (aloes), and qetsi'ot (cassia) — are luxury fragrances associated with royalty and love (Song of Songs 4:14). The king's garments are saturated with them. hekhlei shen ('ivory palaces') describe the royal residence — ivory-inlaid buildings like those of Ahab's 'ivory house' (1 Kings 22:39). The word minni (from which) likely introduces musical instruments — strings or harps from these palaces provide the wedding music.
10. shegal ('queen, consort') is an Aramaic loanword that appears rarely in Hebrew (here and in Nehemiah 2:6). It denotes the queen consort — the king's primary wife, distinct from secondary wives or concubines. Her position at the king's right hand mirrors the position of the king himself at God's right hand (Psalm 110:1).
11. The demand to 'forget your people' is not cruel but liturgical — the bride is entering a covenant that requires total reorientation. In the ancient Near East, a royal bride who married into a foreign court was expected to adopt the religion and customs of her new kingdom. The psalmist makes this expectation explicit.
12. yit'av ha-melekh yofyekh ('the king will desire your beauty') — the verb avah ('to desire, to long for') expresses the king's attraction to the bride. The statement ki hu adonayikh ('for he is your lord') establishes the marital authority of the husband in the ancient context. ve-hishtachavi lo ('and bow to him') — the bride is instructed to show reverence to the king, just as subjects bow before their sovereign. The dual role of husband and lord reflects the ancient Near Eastern fusion of domestic and political authority.
13. bat Tsor ('the daughter of Tyre') may refer to the city of Tyre personified, or to a Tyrian princess. Tyre was the premier commercial power of the eastern Mediterranean — its presence with tribute signals that the queen commands international respect. The phrase ashire am ('the wealthy of the people') seek her face (panayikh yechallu, literally 'they entreat your face'). The bride has become a figure of power.
14. kevuddah (feminine of kavod, 'glory') is used of the bride. kavod is typically reserved for God's glory or the glory of kings — its application to the bride elevates her to a status parallel with royalty and divinity. The gold-woven garment connects to the high priest's ephod, creating a subtle link between the queen and the priestly office.
15. The bridal procession moves from the preparation chambers to the king's presence. lirqamot ('in embroidered work') describes the ornate garments. betulot achareyha re'oteyha ('virgins behind her, her companions') form the bridal retinue — young women who attend the bride in her procession. The shift from third person ('she is led') to second person ('brought to you') brings the reader suddenly into the king's perspective.
16. Verse 16 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
17. The address returns to the king. tachat avotekha yihyu vanekha ('in place of your fathers will be your sons') — the dynasty will continue, the sons replacing the ancestors as rulers. teshitemo le-sarim be-khol ha-arets ('you will set them as princes in all the earth') extends the dynasty's rule beyond Israel to universal dominion. This is Davidic covenant language at its most expansive, pointing toward the messianic vision of worldwide rule.
18. The poet's claim to immortalize the king's name is itself a form of prophetic speech — the psalm has in fact preserved this king's memory for three thousand years. The shift from 'your sons will rule' (v. 17) to 'peoples will praise you forever' (v. 18) moves from dynastic politics to cosmic worship, making the psalm a bridge between history and eschatology.

Summary: Psalm 46 is a song of Zion and a psalm of confidence attributed to the Sons of Korah. It celebrates God as a refuge and strength in the face of cosmic chaos — mountains falling into the sea, waters roaring, nations raging. The psalm is structured in three strophes: God as refuge amid natural catastrophe (vv. 2-4), God's presence protecting the holy city (vv. 5-8), and God as the one who ends war and commands stillness (vv. 9-12). The refrain 'The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our stronghold' appears twice (vv. 8, 12) and was likely also sung after verse 4.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm inspired Martin Luther's hymn 'A Mighty Fortress Is Our God' (Ein feste Burg ist unser Gott), making it one of the most influential psalms in Western history. The command harpu u-de'u ki anokhi Elohim ('be still and know that I am God,' v. 11) is among the most quoted lines in Scripture, though its meaning is frequently softened. harpu is not 'relax' or 'be quiet' — it means 'let go, cease striving, drop your weapons, stop.' It is addressed to the warring nations, not to anxious believers: God commands the earth's armies to stand down. The 'river whose streams make glad the city of God' (v. 5) is remarkable because Jerusalem has no river. The image is theological, not geographical — it evokes the river of Eden (Genesis 2:10), the waters flowing from the Temple (Ezekiel 47:1-12), and the river of life (Revelation 22:1-2).

Translation Friction: The superscription al alamot ('according to alamot') is debated — alamot may mean 'young women' (indicating soprano voices or a women's choir), 'hidden things,' or a musical mode. The 'river' of verse 5 has no geographical referent in Jerusalem, which relies on the Gihon spring and Hezekiah's tunnel. The river must be symbolic: God's presence itself is the water supply that makes the city flourish when earthly rivers fail. The refrain after verse 4 is not present in the MT but is inferred from the psalm's structure; some scholars insert 'YHVH Tseva'ot immanu' there to create three balanced strophes. The phrase elohim be-qirbah ('God is in her midst') uses feminine language for the city, treating Zion as a woman with God dwelling within her.

Connections: The chaos-waters imagery (vv. 3-4) connects to Genesis 1:2 (tehom), Psalm 93 (the floods lift up), and Nahum 1:4 (God rebuking the sea). The river of God (v. 5) echoes Genesis 2:10, Ezekiel 47:1-12, Joel 3:18, and Zechariah 14:8 — all depicting life-giving water flowing from God's dwelling. The Zion theology links to Psalms 48, 76, 84, 87, and 122. God making wars cease (v. 10) echoes Isaiah 2:4 and Micah 4:3 (beating swords into plowshares). The command 'be still' (v. 11) anticipates the divine warrior's silencing of all opposition at the eschaton.

¹For the choirmaster. Of the Sons of Korah. According to alamot. A song.

²God is our refuge and strength, a help in troubles — found to be very near.

³Therefore we will not fear, though the earth gives way,
though the mountains topple into the heart of the seas,

⁴though its waters roar and foam, though the mountains quake at its surging. Selah.

⁵A river — its streams make glad the city of God,
the holy dwelling of the Most High.

⁶God is in her midst — she will not be shaken;
God will help her at the break of dawn.

⁷Nations rage, kingdoms totter;
he lifts his voice — the earth melts.

⁸The LORD of hosts is with us;
the God of Jacob is our stronghold. Selah.

⁹Come, see the works of the LORD — what desolations he has set upon the earth.

¹⁰He makes wars cease to the end of the earth;
he breaks the bow and shatters the spear;
he burns the chariots with fire.

¹¹Let go and know that I am God.
I will be exalted among the nations;
I will be exalted in the earth.

¹²The LORD of hosts is with us;
the God of Jacob is our stronghold. Selah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. al alamot ('according to alamot') likely refers to a musical setting. alamot may derive from almah ('young woman'), suggesting performance by soprano voices or a women's choir. Alternatively, it may be a technical term for a high-pitched musical mode. We leave it transliterated as a musical direction whose precise meaning is uncertain.
2. machaseh ('refuge') appears 20 times in the Psalms, more than in any other book. It comes from chasah ('to seek refuge, to take shelter') — the same word used of birds sheltering their young under their wings. God-as-refuge is one of the Psalter's master metaphors.
2. Luther's 'A Mighty Fortress Is Our God' paraphrases this verse. The German Ein feste Burg captures machaseh as a fortification — a castle, a stronghold. The Hebrew image is broader: any place of shelter from danger.
3. The consequence of God-as-refuge is fearlessness in the face of cosmic dissolution. be-hamir arets ('when the earth changes/gives way') uses mur ('to change, to exchange, to shake') — the solid ground itself becomes unstable. u-ve-mot harim be-lev yammim ('and when mountains slip into the heart of the seas') — the most permanent features of the landscape collapse into the most chaotic element. This is creation running backward: the mountains that emerged from the waters in Genesis 1 return to them. And still: lo nira ('we will not fear').
4. Three verbs describe the chaos-waters: yehemu ('they roar/rage,' from hamah), yechmeru ('they foam/surge,' from chamar, 'to boil, to ferment'), and yir'ashu ('they quake/shake,' from ra'ash). The sea's ga'avah ('pride, swelling, arrogance') makes the mountains themselves tremble. The selah here likely marks the place where the refrain was originally sung: 'The LORD of hosts is with us; the God of Jacob is our stronghold.'
5. The contrast between the raging seas (vv. 3-4) and the gladness-giving river (v. 5) is the psalm's central image. Chaos waters threaten from without; the river of God sustains from within. The city has an internal water supply that no external catastrophe can destroy — because the water is God's presence itself.
6. Elohim be-qirbah ('God is in her midst') — the feminine pronoun refers to the city. Zion is personified as a woman with God dwelling inside her. bal timmot ('she will not be shaken') — the verb mot ('to totter, to shake, to slip') was used of the mountains in verse 3. The mountains topple, but the city does not — because its stability comes from God within, not from geological firmness. lifnot boqer ('at the turning of the morning') — God's help arrives at dawn, the moment when darkness breaks. Dawn in the Hebrew Bible is the traditional time of divine intervention and military deliverance (Exodus 14:27, 2 Kings 19:35).
7. The parallel structure between vv. 3-4 (nature chaos) and v. 7 (political chaos) is the psalm's central literary device. Both use the same vocabulary: hamah (roar/rage), mot (shake/totter). The message: cosmic upheaval and geopolitical upheaval are equally powerless before God's voice.
8. YHVH Tseva'ot ('LORD of hosts') is one of the most frequent divine titles in the prophets (especially Isaiah, Jeremiah, and the post-exilic prophets). Tseva'ot refers to armies — whether heavenly armies (angels, stars) or Israel's earthly forces. The title declares God's supreme military authority over all powers visible and invisible.
9. The invitation lekhu chazu ('come, look, behold') summons the congregation to witness God's acts. mi'alot YHVH ('the works of the LORD') can mean either acts of judgment or acts of deliverance — here, specifically shammat ('desolations, devastations'). God has devastated — but the devastation is directed at the threatening powers, not at his people. The 'desolations' are the ruins of enemy war-making, which God has destroyed.

10. The vision of universal peace through divine action connects to Isaiah 2:4 / Micah 4:3 ('they shall beat their swords into plowshares') and Hosea 2:18 ('I will break the bow and the sword and war from the land'). The difference is method: in Isaiah, the nations voluntarily disarm; in Psalm 46, God forcibly destroys their weapons. Both envision the same end — world without war — but by different means.
11. harpu is frequently sentimentalized in devotional use as 'be still' in the sense of quiet meditation. The Hebrew is more forceful: it is God commanding hostile powers to cease their activity. The stillness God demands is not contemplative peace but military surrender. The nations are to drop their weapons and acknowledge that the LORD alone is God. This does not exclude a devotional application — there is genuine comfort in knowing that God commands the powers to stop — but the primary audience is the hostile world, not the anxious believer.
11. We render harpu as 'let go' rather than 'be still' to preserve the active, volitional force of the command. The nations must release their grip on power, ambition, and war.
12. The refrain returns identically, sealing the psalm. After the cosmic chaos of verses 3-4, after the political chaos of verse 7, and after God's silencing of all opposition in verses 10-11, the community repeats its core confession: God is with us. The word immanu ('with us') carries the entire psalm's theology in two syllables.

Summary: Psalm 47 is a brief, exuberant enthronement psalm of the Sons of Korah celebrating God's kingship over all the earth. The psalm opens with a call for all peoples to clap their hands and shout, declares God as the Most High and great King, and culminates in God ascending his throne amid shouts and the blast of the shofar. The nations gather as the people of the God of Abraham, and God is exalted as ruler over all.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 47 is the primary psalm associated with Rosh Hashanah in Jewish liturgy — it is recited seven times before the shofar blasts. The psalm's universalism is striking: it does not merely claim that God rules Israel but that all peoples (kol ha-ammim) are summoned to praise him, and that the nobles of the peoples gather as the people of the God of Abraham (v. 10). The promise to Abraham that 'in you all the families of the earth will be blessed' (Genesis 12:3) finds liturgical expression here. The phrase alah Elohim bitru'ah ('God has gone up with a shout,' v. 6) envisions a divine enthronement procession — God ascending to his throne like a king entering his palace. In Christian liturgy, this verse was applied to the Ascension of Christ.

Translation Friction: The term Elyon ('Most High,' v. 3) is an ancient Canaanite divine title adopted into Israelite theology (cf. Genesis 14:18-20, Deuteronomy 32:8). Its use here reinforces God's supremacy over all peoples and all other claimed deities. The phrase am Elohe Avraham ('the people of the God of Abraham,' v. 10) rather than 'the people of God' or 'Israel' is deliberate — Abraham is the patriarch of many nations (Genesis 17:4-5), not just Israel. The inclusion of 'nobles of the peoples' (nedive ammin) in God's people pushes past ethnic boundaries. The verb alah ('to go up,' v. 6) may reflect a liturgical ritual in which the Ark of the Covenant was carried up to the Temple mount, symbolizing God's enthronement.

Connections: The enthronement psalms (47, 93, 95-99) share the declaration 'The LORD reigns' (or its equivalent). Psalm 47 connects to Psalm 24:7-10 (the gates lifting for the King of glory), to Psalm 68:19 (God ascending on high), and to the Sinai theophany (Exodus 19:16-19) with its shofar blasts. The gathering of nations echoes Isaiah 2:2-3, where all nations stream to Zion. Paul's argument in Romans 4 that Abraham is the father of all who believe, not merely of circumcised Jews, follows the trajectory this psalm begins.

¹For the choirmaster. A psalm of the Sons of Korah.

²All you peoples, clap your hands!

Shout to God with a voice of ringing joy!

³For the LORD, the Most High, is awesome — a great King over all the earth.

⁴He subdues peoples under us and nations beneath our feet.

⁵He chooses our inheritance for us — the pride of Jacob whom he loves. Selah.

⁶God has gone up with a shout,
the LORD with the blast of a ram's horn!

⁷Sing praise to God — sing praise!
Sing praise to our King — sing praise!

⁸For God is King of all the earth;
sing praise with a maskil!

⁹God reigns over the nations;
God sits on his holy throne.

¹⁰The nobles of the peoples have gathered as the people of the God of Abraham, for the shields of the earth belong to God —
he is greatly exalted.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Verse 1 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
2. The universalism of kol ha-ammim ('all the peoples') is not hypothetical — it is an imperative. The psalm commands all nations to worship, not merely predicts that they will. This is a bold liturgical claim: the God of Israel deserves the worship of every human community.
3. Three titles accumulate: YHVH ('the LORD' — the covenant name), Elyon ('Most High' — supreme over all), and nora ('awesome, fearsome, to be dreaded'). melekh gadol al kol ha-arets ('a great king over all the earth') is the enthronement declaration — God is not merely Israel's king but the king of the entire world. The title 'great king' (melekh gadol) echoes the Assyrian royal title sharru rabu, deliberately claiming for Israel's God the supremacy that earthly empires claimed for their rulers.
4. yadber ammin tachtenu ('he subdues peoples under us') uses davar in its rare sense of 'to drive, to subdue, to lead' (cf. Deuteronomy 33:3). The image is of conquest — but conquest achieved by God, not by Israel's military. The nations under Israel's feet reflects the ancient Near Eastern image of a conqueror placing his foot on the neck of the defeated (cf. Joshua 10:24).
5. nachalatenu ('our inheritance') refers to the promised land, given as a permanent possession. ge'on Ya'akov ('the pride/excellency of Jacob') likely refers to the land of Israel or to the Temple — the thing that makes Jacob's descendants distinct and honored. asher ahav ('whom he loved') — God's choice of this inheritance is rooted in love, not obligation.
6. In Jewish liturgy, this verse grounds the practice of blowing the shofar on Rosh Hashanah — the day traditionally understood as the anniversary of God's enthronement as King. The psalm is recited seven times before the shofar blasts begin.
6. Christian liturgy applied this verse to the Ascension of Christ (Acts 1:9-11), reading the ascending God as the risen Lord returning to his heavenly throne. The early church fathers (particularly Augustine and Chrysostom) commented extensively on this connection.
7. The fourfold repetition of zammeru ('sing praise!') is the psalm's ecstatic center. The verb zamar ('to sing, to make music') appears four times in rapid succession, creating a cascade of praise. The shift from Elohim ('God') to malkenu ('our King') in the parallel lines identifies God as Israel's personal sovereign — not merely the cosmic king but our king.
8. melekh kol ha-arets ('king of all the earth') restates the universal claim of verse 3. zammeru maskil ('sing a maskil') — the maskil here may mean 'sing with understanding/skill' or 'sing an instructive song.' The five-fold occurrence of zamar in verses 7-8 (four imperatives plus this one) is unprecedented in the Psalter.
9. The declaration malakh Elohim ('God reigns/has become king') echoes the enthronement shout YHVH malakh ('the LORD reigns') in Psalms 93:1, 96:10, 97:1, and 99:1. This formula is the theological heart of the enthronement psalm genre.
10. The identification of the gathered nations as am Elohe Avraham ('the people of the God of Abraham') rather than 'the people of Israel' is theologically significant. Abraham is the father of many nations (Genesis 17:5), not only of Israel. This psalm envisions the nations entering Abraham's covenant family — a vision that Paul will develop in Romans 4 and Galatians 3.

10. maginne erets ('shields of the earth') is an unusual phrase. magen can mean 'shield' (a defensive weapon) or 'patron, protector' (a metaphorical usage). If it means 'patrons/rulers,' the verse says earth's rulers belong to God. If 'shields,' the verse says earth's defenses are God's property. Either reading reinforces God's sovereignty.

Summary: Psalm 48 is a Song of Zion attributed to the Sons of Korah, celebrating the beauty, strength, and divine protection of Jerusalem. The psalm opens with praise for God's greatness revealed in the holy mountain, describes the panic and flight of enemy kings who saw the city and were terrified, invites worshipers to walk around Zion counting its towers, and concludes with the declaration that this God will be our guide forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Psalm 48 transforms geography into theology. Mount Zion is described as yefe nof mesos kol ha-arets ('beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth,' v. 3), and then astonishingly identified as yarkhete tsafon ('the far reaches of the north'). Tsafon is Mount Zaphon, the mountain of the gods in Canaanite mythology — the Olympus of the ancient Near East, where Baal was enthroned. The psalm takes the name of the pagan divine mountain and applies it to Zion: the real Mount Zaphon is not in Syria; it is in Jerusalem. This is theological conquest by renaming — the psalm claims for YHWH and his city the cosmic significance that Canaanite religion attributed to Baal and his mountain. The kings who approach Zion in verses 5-7 do not even fight; they see the city and flee in terror, seized by trembling like a woman in labor. The city itself, without lifting a sword, defeats its enemies by the sheer force of God's presence within it.*

Translation Friction: *The identification of Zion with tsafon ('north') has generated much scholarly discussion. Zion is not geographically in the north; it is in the south of Israel. tsafon here functions as a mythological name, not a compass direction. The psalm appropriates Canaanite sacred geography for Israelite theology. The historical event behind the kings' panic (vv. 5-7) is debated — proposals include Sennacherib's failed siege of Jerusalem in 701 BCE (2 Kings 18-19), the coalition defeat in the Valley of Jehoshaphat (2 Chronicles 20), or a purely idealized/eschatological scenario. The phrase shivvartem be-ruach qadim ('you shattered them with an east wind,' v. 8) connects to the Exodus (Exodus 14:21) and to the destruction of Tarshish-ships (trade vessels), suggesting God's power over both military and commercial empires.*

Connections: The Song of Zion genre links Psalm 48 to Psalms 46, 76, 84, 87, and 122. The identification with Mount Zaphon connects to Isaiah 14:13 (the king of Babylon's ambition to sit on 'the mount of assembly in the far north') and to Ezekiel 28:14 (the cherub on 'the holy mountain of God'). The kings' terror echoes Exodus 15:14-16 (the nations trembling at the Exodus) and Joshua 2:9-11 (Rahab's testimony that Canaan's inhabitants melted with fear). The instruction to 'walk about Zion' (v. 13) connects to the pilgrim psalms and to the processional liturgy of the Temple festivals.

¹A song — A psalm of the Sons of Korah.

²Great is the LORD and greatly to be praised in the city of our God, his holy mountain.

³Beautiful in elevation, the joy of the whole earth, is Mount Zion, the heights of Zaphon — the city of the great King.

⁴God in her citadels has made himself known as a stronghold.

⁵For look — the kings assembled;
they advanced together.

⁶They saw — and at once they were stunned;
they were terrified; they fled in panic.

⁷Trembling seized them there — anguish like a woman in labor.

⁸With an east wind
you shatter the ships of Tarshish.

⁹in the city of the LORD of hosts,
As we have heard, so we have seen in the city of our God —
God will establish her forever. Selah.

¹⁰We have pondered your faithful love, O God,
in the midst of your Temple.

¹¹As your name, O God, so your praise reaches to the ends of the earth.
Your right hand is filled with righteousness.

¹²May Mount Zion rejoice; let the daughters of Judah be glad because of your judgments.

¹³Walk around Zion; encircle her;
count her towers.

¹⁴Set your hearts on her ramparts;
examine her citadels,
so that you may tell the next generation:

¹⁵For this God is our God forever and ever;
he will guide us beyond death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Verse 1 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
2. gadol YHVH u-mehullal me'od ('great is the LORD and much to be praised') opens with the adjective gadol ('great') placed first for emphasis. The location of this praise is specific: be-ir Elohenu har qodsho ('in the city of our God, his holy mountain'). God's greatness is not abstract — it is localized in Zion, the place where heaven touches earth.
3. We render tsafon as 'Zaphon' rather than 'north' to preserve the mythological reference. The psalmist is not saying Zion is in the north (it is not); he is saying Zion is the true Zaphon — the real mountain of divine presence. This is a deliberate act of theological appropriation.
3. melek rav ('great king') is the Hebrew equivalent of the Akkadian sharru rabu, the standard title of the Assyrian emperor. The psalm claims this title for God, making the political point that the true great king is not in Nineveh but in Zion.
4. be-armenoteyha ('in her citadels/palaces') — the feminine suffix refers to the city. armenot are the fortified towers and palace-fortresses of the city. God is known (noda, from yada, 'to know') as a misgav ('stronghold, high fortress') — the same word used in Psalm 46:8, 12. The fortification of the city is not its walls but its God.
5. ki hinneh ('for behold') signals a dramatic shift to narrative. ha-melakhim no'adu ('the kings assembled') — multiple kings gathered for a coordinated attack. avru yachdav ('they advanced together') — they moved in concert toward the city. The brevity of the verse creates suspense: the kings have assembled, they have advanced — and then what?

6. The pattern — enemies approach, see, and flee — echoes the Exodus tradition (Exodus 15:14-16), where the nations heard of God's deliverance and trembled. In both cases, God's reputation or visible presence does the fighting.
7. re'adah ('trembling') from ra'ad ('to tremble') describes uncontrollable shaking. chil kayyoleadah ('writhing like a woman giving birth') — chil ('pain, writhing, anguish') is the specific word for labor pains. The warrior-kings are reduced to the helplessness of a woman in the grip of contractions — an image that simultaneously conveys pain, loss of control, and the irresistibility of the force acting upon them.
8. ruach qadim ('east wind') is the sirocco — the hot, destructive wind from the desert that withers crops and shatters structures. In the Exodus, God used the east wind to part the sea (Exodus 14:21) and to bring locusts (Exodus 10:13). oniyot Tarshish ('ships of Tarshish') were the largest merchant vessels of the ancient world, capable of long Mediterranean voyages. Tarshish is likely Tartessus in Spain — the farthest reach of Phoenician commerce. God's east wind destroys the mightiest commercial fleet, demonstrating power over both military and economic empires.
9. The phrase 'as we heard, so we have seen' bridges the gap between tradition and experience. Faith is not merely receiving testimony about past events but encountering the same God in present experience. The psalm's theology of Zion is not nostalgic — it is experiential.
10. dimninu ('we have compared, we have pondered, we have meditated') from damah ('to be like, to compare, to liken') suggests deep reflection — the worshipers sit in the Temple and contemplate (literally 'form images of') God's chesed ('faithful love'). The setting is be-qerev hekhalekha ('in the midst of your palace/Temple') — the Temple is the place where faithful love is most clearly perceived.
11. ke-shimkha Elohim ken tehillatekha ('as your name, so your praise') — God's reputation (shem) matches the praise offered to him. The scope is al qatsve erets ('to the ends of the earth') — universal. tsedek mal'ah yeminekha ('your right hand is full of righteousness') — the right hand that wields power is filled not with violence but with tsedek ('righteousness, justice'). Power and justice are inseparable in God.
12. benot Yehudah ('daughters of Judah') refers to the towns and villages of Judah personified as women — 'daughters' in the sense of subsidiary settlements dependent on the mother-city, Jerusalem. Their gladness is grounded in mishpatekha ('your judgments') — God's judicial decisions that set things right. When God judges, the vulnerable celebrate.
13. The psalm shifts to a pilgrimage instruction: sobbu Tsiyon ve-haqqifuha ('go around Zion and encircle her'). This may reflect an actual liturgical procession around the city walls. sifru migdaleyha ('count her towers') — the worshipers are invited to inventory the city's defenses, not to trust in them but to witness the God-protected city's completeness. Every tower standing is evidence of divine preservation.
14. shitu libbekhem le-chelah ('set your hearts/minds on her ramparts') — chelah ('rampart, outer wall') is the defensive perimeter. The instruction is not military inspection but theological witness: look carefully, remember, and pass it on. le-ma'an tesapperu le-dor acharon ('so that you may recount to the next generation') — the purpose of the pilgrimage-tour is transmission. What you have seen with your eyes, you must speak to your children.
15. The phrase al mut is one of the most contested readings in the Psalter. The Masoretic accents separate it from the preceding word, suggesting it may be a postscript or musical notation. We render it as 'beyond death' because the psalm's theology of God's eternal faithfulness (olam va-ed) naturally extends past the boundary of human mortality. The God who is 'ours forever' does not stop guiding at the grave.

Summary: Psalm 49 is a wisdom psalm of the Sons of Korah that confronts the mystery of death's equality — the rich and the poor, the wise and the foolish, all die. The psalm opens with a universal summons to hear wisdom, then exposes the folly of trusting in wealth: no amount of money can ransom a person from death. The rich and the foolish perish alike, their graves become their permanent homes, and their wealth passes to others. A key refrain declares that humanity in its pomp will not endure — like the beasts, they perish. Yet the psalmist expresses a singular hope: 'God will ransom my soul from the hand of Sheol, for he will take me.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 49 is the Hebrew Bible's most sustained meditation on the inability of wealth to defeat death, making it a biblical counterpart to Ecclesiastes. The refrain adam biqar ve-lo yavin nimshal ka-behemot nidmu ('humanity in its splendor without understanding is like the beasts that perish,' vv. 13, 21) reduces the wealthy to animals — all their glory cannot make them more than creatures who die and decompose. But verse 16 breaks through the psalm's bleak equality with a startling hope: akh Elohim yifdeh nafshi mi-yad She'ol ki yiqqacheni ('but God will ransom my soul from the hand of Sheol, for he will take me'). The verb laqach ('to take') is the same used for Enoch (Genesis 5:24, 'God took him') and Elijah (2 Kings 2:3, 'the LORD will take your master'). This is the Hebrew Bible's most explicit assertion of a hope beyond death for the righteous individual — not merely prolonged life, but rescue from Sheol itself.

Translation Friction: The text of Psalm 49 is notoriously difficult, with several verses that resist easy translation. The refrain varies slightly between verses 13 and 21 (yalin vs. yavin — 'will not abide' vs. 'does not understand'), and scholars debate which is original and which a corruption. Verse 15 (Hebrew) is extremely compressed: qirbam battemo le-olam ('their inward thought is that their houses are forever') reconstructs what may be a corrupted text. The hope of verse 16 is the psalm's theological problem: how can the psalmist claim rescue from Sheol when the rest of the psalm insists that all die? The answer may lie in the distinction between death (which all share) and Sheol's power (from which God can ransom).

Connections: The wisdom framework connects to Proverbs, Job, and Ecclesiastes, all of which address wealth's inability to secure life. The verb laqach in verse 16 ('he will take me') links to the Enoch tradition (Genesis 5:24) and the Elijah tradition (2 Kings 2:10). Psalm 73:23-26 develops the same hope: 'You guide me with your counsel, and afterward you will take me into glory.' Jesus' parable of the rich fool (Luke 12:16-21) and his teaching that a person cannot serve God and money (Matthew 6:24) echo this psalm's central argument. The refrain's comparison of wealthy humans to perishing beasts inverts Genesis 1:26-28, where humanity is given dominion over the animals — here, without wisdom, humans become indistinguishable from them.

¹For the choirmaster. A psalm of the Sons of Korah.

²Hear this, all you peoples;
give ear, all who inhabit the passing world.

³Both common folk and the highborn, rich and poor together.

⁴My mouth will speak wisdom, and the meditation of my heart will be understanding.

⁵I will turn my ear to a proverb;
I will open my riddle on the lyre.

⁶Why should I fear in days of trouble,
when the guilt of those who track me surrounds me?

⁷Those who trust in their wealth and boast in the abundance of their riches —

⁸No one can ransom a brother or pay God the price of his release,

⁹for the ransom of a life is too costly —
he must let it go forever.

¹⁰that he should live on forever and never see the pit.

¹¹For he sees that the wise die;
the fool and the senseless alike perish and leave their wealth to others.

¹²Their graves are their homes forever, their dwelling places for all generations,
though they named lands after themselves.

¹³Humanity in its splendor will not endure;
it is like the beasts that perish.

¹⁴This is their way — their foolish confidence;
and those who follow them approve their words. Selah.

¹⁵Like sheep they are driven to Sheol;
death is their shepherd.
The upright will rule over them at morning, and their form will waste away —
Sheol will be their dwelling, not a mansion.

¹⁶But God will ransom my life from the hand of Sheol, for he will take me. Selah.

¹⁷Do not fear when a man grows rich,
when the glory of his house increases,

¹⁸for when he dies he will take nothing with him;
his glory will not follow him down.

¹⁹Though he blesses himself during his life,
and people praise you when you prosper,

²⁰he will go to the generation of his ancestors;
they will never see light.

²¹Humanity in its splendor, without understanding, is like the beasts that perish.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Verse 1 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
2. The summons is universal: kol ha-ammim ('all the peoples') and kol yoshve chaled ('all who inhabit chaled'). The word chaled ('world, age, duration') is rare and emphasizes the transitory nature of earthly existence — from a root meaning 'to glide, to pass away.' The world itself is described by a word that means 'the fleeting thing.' The psalm addresses all of humanity, not just Israel.
3. bene adam ('sons of Adam/humanity') refers to ordinary people — the common person. bene ish ('sons of a man/person of standing') refers to those of higher social rank. The pairing covers the entire social spectrum, then further specifies: ashir ve-eyon ('rich and destitute'). The psalm addresses everyone without exception — its wisdom applies regardless of status or wealth.
4. khokhmot ('wisdoms,' plural) — the plural may indicate comprehensive wisdom, wisdom in its full range. hagut libbi ('the meditation/murmuring of my heart') uses hagah, the same verb from Psalm 1:2 for meditating on Torah. tevnnot ('understandings,' plural) parallels the plural of wisdom. The psalmist claims prophetic and sapiential authority: what follows is not opinion but divinely informed wisdom.
5. The combination of mashal ('proverb') and chidah ('riddle') echoes Proverbs 1:6, where both terms describe the content of wisdom. A chidah is not a puzzle for entertainment but a deep truth concealed in paradox — the kind of truth that requires meditation to unlock.
6. The verse is textually difficult. avon aqevai ('the iniquity of my heels/my supplanters') may mean: (1) the guilt of my own missteps, (2) the wickedness of those who pursue me (aqev as 'heel-tracker,' cf. Jacob's name), or (3) the sins that dog my footsteps. The context — a psalm about the futility of wealth — suggests the psalmist asks why he should fear when surrounded by the wickedness of the wealthy who oppress him.
7. ha-botchim al chelam ('those who trust in their resources') — the verb batach ('to trust') is the word the psalms reserve for confidence in God. Using it for wealth is a pointed accusation: they have placed in money the trust that belongs to God alone. u-ve-rov oshram yithallalu ('and in the greatness of their riches they boast') — the verb halal ('to boast, to praise') is also worship language. They praise their wealth as others praise God.
8. The verb padah ('to redeem, to ransom') is covenantal language — God ransoms (podeh) Israel from Egypt, from exile, from Sheol. The psalm's devastating point is that what humans cannot do for each other, God can do — setting up the hope of verse 16.

9. yeqar pidyon nafsham ('costly is the redemption of their soul/life') — yeqar means 'precious, expensive, rare.' The ransom price for a human life exceeds all possible payment. ve-chadal le-olam ('and he ceases forever') — the verb chadal ('to cease, to desist, to give up') means the would-be redeemer must abandon the attempt. No amount of wealth reaches the price of a life.
10. The purpose clause completes the thought: no one can pay enough to live forever (yichi od lanestsach) or to avoid the shachat ('pit, grave, corruption'). shachat can mean the physical grave or the decomposition of the body — death in its most unsparing form.
11. Death's equality is stated bluntly: chakhamim yamuthu ('the wise die'), and yachad kesil u-va'ar yovedu ('together the fool and the brute perish'). The three categories — wise, foolish, and brutish — cover the entire spectrum of human intelligence. None is exempt. ve-azvu la-acherim chelam ('and they leave their wealth to others') — the final insult. The wealth they spent their lives accumulating passes to people they may not have chosen.
12. The emendation of qirbam ('their inner thought') to qivram ('their grave') is widely accepted, as the resh and bet are visually similar in Hebrew script. The MT reading ('their inner thought is that their houses will last forever') makes sense but is less poetically parallel. Either way, the irony is sharp: they planned permanence and received a tomb.
13. The refrain in verse 21 will change one word: yalin ('abide') becomes yavin ('understand'). The shift is significant — the first refrain says wealth does not make you permanent; the second says wealth does not make you wise. Together they strip wealth of both its promises: durability and meaning.
14. kesel ('folly, false confidence, stupidity') is their fundamental error — trusting in wealth. ve-achareihem be-fihem yirtsu ('and those after them delight in their mouth/words') — subsequent generations repeat the same folly, approving the worldview of the rich who came before them. The cycle of foolish confidence reproduces itself.
15. The image of death as shepherd (mavet yir'em) is a deliberate inversion of Psalm 23 (YHVH ro'i, 'the LORD is my shepherd'). Those who refuse God as shepherd get death as shepherd instead. The 'morning' (boqer) of reversal echoes the dawn deliverance motif of Psalm 46:6.
16. The selah after this verse provides a moment of silence for the most radical claim in the psalm. After twelve verses insisting that all die, that no ransom suffices, that humans perish like beasts — this verse says: but not me. Not because of my wealth or wisdom, but because God ransoms. The basis is not human merit but divine action.
16. The echo of padah from verse 8 is deliberate. The psalm sets up an impossibility (no human can ransom) and then resolves it with divine capability (God can ransom). The structure mirrors the gospel pattern: what is impossible for humans is possible for God.
17. The practical application of the psalm's wisdom: al tira ('do not fear') — do not be intimidated or envious when others accumulate wealth. kevod beto ('the glory of his house') — the impressive display of a wealthy household. The psalm's message: this glory is temporary and ultimately powerless against death.
18. lo be-moto yiqqach hakkol ('not in his death will he take everything') — the verb laqach ('to take') reappears. In verse 16, God takes the psalmist; here, the rich man cannot take his possessions. The contrast is devastating: the righteous are taken by God; the wealthy cannot take their goods. lo yered acharav kevodo ('his glory will not descend after him') — kavod ('glory, weight, substance') stays above ground while the body descends to the grave.
19. nafsho be-chayyav yevarekh ('he blesses his soul during his life') — self-congratulation, the rich man telling himself how well he has done. ve-yodukha ki tetiv lakh ('and they praise you when you do well for yourself') — others affirm and celebrate your success. The psalm exposes the feedback loop of wealth: prosperity generates self-praise and social approval, creating the illusion of permanence.
20. tavo ad dor avotav ('he will come to the generation of his fathers') — he will join his dead ancestors in Sheol. ad netsach lo yir'u or ('unto perpetuity they will not see light') — the finality is total: the light that the psalm promised to the righteous (at morning, v. 15) is denied forever to those who trusted in wealth. The contrast with verse 16 is sharp: the psalmist will be taken by God; the wealthy will never see light.
21. The two forms of the refrain together deliver the psalm's complete message. Verse 13: wealth does not make you last. Verse 21: wealth does not make you wise. The only thing that defeats death is God's ransom (v. 16), and the only thing that brings understanding is wisdom (vv. 4-5) — both are divine gifts, not human achievements.

Summary: Psalm 50 is a covenant lawsuit (riv) psalm attributed to Asaph, in which God summons heaven and earth as witnesses, convenes a courtroom from Zion, and prosecutes two charges against his people. The first charge (vv. 7-15) addresses those who rely on sacrifice while misunderstanding its purpose — God does not need animal offerings because he owns all creation. The second charge (vv. 16-21) targets the wicked who recite God's laws but violate them in practice — thieves, adulterers, slanderers who assume God's silence means approval. The psalm closes with a warning and a promise: destruction awaits those who forget God, but salvation comes to those who offer thanksgiving and order their way rightly.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 50 employs the covenant lawsuit (riv) form found in the prophets — God puts his people on trial, with heaven and earth as witnesses (cf. Deuteronomy 32:1, Isaiah 1:2, Micah 6:1-2). The most radical theological claim is God's rejection of the sacrificial system as a feeding arrangement: 'Do I eat the flesh of bulls or drink the blood of goats?' (v. 13). God mocks the idea that he depends on sacrifice for sustenance — an idea common in other ancient Near Eastern religions where the gods genuinely needed offerings for food. The God of Israel owns every animal, every bird, every creature: 'If I were hungry, I would not tell you' (v. 12). The true sacrifice God desires is todah ('thanksgiving') and fulfilled vows. This anticipates the prophetic critique of empty ritual (Isaiah 1:11-17, Hosea 6:6, Amos 5:21-24, Micah 6:6-8) and points toward a worship centered on gratitude and obedience rather than external ceremony.

Translation Friction: The attribution le-Asaf ('of Asaph') introduces a new collection within Book II of the Psalter. Asaph was a levitical musician appointed by David (1 Chronicles 16:5, 25:1-2) — the Asaphite psalms (50, 73-83) tend toward prophetic speech, divine judgment, and covenant theology. The riv ('lawsuit') form raises a question: can God be both judge and plaintiff? In the psalm's world, yes — God is the aggrieved party who brings the case and the sovereign who renders the verdict. The distinction between the two groups addressed (vv. 7-15 vs. vv. 16-21) is sometimes blurred — both may overlap within the same community, and the psalm addresses tendencies rather than fixed categories.

Connections: The covenant lawsuit form connects to Deuteronomy 32 (the Song of Moses, which summons heaven and earth as witnesses), Isaiah 1:2-20 (God's indictment of Jerusalem), and Micah 6:1-8 (God's case against Israel, concluding with 'what does the LORD require of you?'). God's claim to own all animals (vv. 10-12) echoes Psalm 24:1 ('the earth is the LORD's and its fullness'). The preference for thanksgiving (todah) over blood sacrifice anticipates Hosea 6:6 ('I desire faithful love, not sacrifice') and Jesus' quotation of that verse in Matthew 9:13 and 12:7. The theophany from Zion (vv. 1-3) echoes Deuteronomy 33:2, Habakkuk 3:3, and Psalm 97:3-5.

¹A psalm of Asaph.

God — God — the LORD —

he has spoken and summoned the earth
from the rising of the sun to its setting.

²From Zion, the perfection of beauty,
God shines forth.

³Our God comes — he will not be silent.
Fire devours before him;
around him a mighty storm rages.

⁴He calls to the heavens above and to the earth, to judge his people.

⁵"Gather my faithful ones to me,
those who sealed my covenant by sacrifice."

⁶The heavens declare his righteousness, for God himself is judge. Selah.

⁷"Hear, my people, and I will speak;
Israel, I will testify against you.
I am God — your God.

⁸I do not rebuke you for your sacrifices;
your burnt offerings are continually before me.

⁹I will not take a bull from your house or goats from your pens,

¹⁰the cattle on a thousand hills.
for every beast of the forest is mine —

¹¹I know every bird of the mountains, and the creatures of the field are mine.

¹²If I were hungry, I would not tell you,
for the world is mine and everything in it.

¹³Do I eat the flesh of mighty bulls or drink the blood of goats?

¹⁴Sacrifice thanksgiving to God and fulfill your vows to the Most High.

¹⁵Call on me in the day of trouble;
I will rescue you, and you will honor me."

¹⁶But to the wicked God says:
"What right have you to recite my statutes or to take my covenant on your lips?

¹⁷You hate discipline and throw my words behind you.

¹⁸When you see a thief, you run with him, and your portion is with adulterers.

¹⁹You unleash your mouth for evil, and your tongue harnesses deceit.

²⁰You sit and speak against your brother;
you slander your own mother's son.

²¹These things you have done, and I was silent.
You thought I was just like you.
But I will rebuke you and lay the charge before your eyes.

²²Understand this, you who forget God,
lest I tear you apart with no one to rescue.

²³The one who sacrifices thanksgiving honors me, and to the one who orders his way rightly
I will show the salvation of God."

1. The triple divine name El Elohim YHVH appears also in Joshua 22:22 in a context of covenant dispute. The accumulation of names emphasizes the authority and solemnity of the speaker — this is not a minor deity but the God of Israel in his fullest identity, speaking with absolute authority.
2. mi-Tsiyon mikhlal yofi ('from Zion, the completeness of beauty') — mikhlal ('perfection, completeness') from kalal ('to complete, to perfect'). Zion is the place where beauty reaches its fullness. Elohim hofia ('God has shone forth') — the verb yafa in the hiphil ('to shine, to appear in splendor') is theophany language, used of God's radiant self-manifestation (Deuteronomy 33:2, Psalm 80:2, 94:1). The judge does not merely arrive; he blazes.
3. The theophany of fire and storm echoes the Sinai covenant-making (Exodus 19:16-19). The same God who gave the covenant in fire now judges covenant violations in fire. The literary connection is deliberate: the terms of the agreement are being enforced by the one who established them.
4. yiqra el ha-shamayim me'al ve-el ha-arets ('he calls to the heavens above and to the earth') — heaven and earth are summoned as witnesses, following the covenant-witness formula of Deuteronomy 4:26, 30:19, 31:28. In ancient Near Eastern treaties, the gods were invoked as witnesses; in Israel, the created order itself witnesses God's covenant. ladin ammo ('to judge his people') — the verb din ('to judge, to execute judgment') specifies the purpose: this is a trial, and the defendants are ammo ('his people').
5. God speaks directly: isfu li chasidai ('gather to me my chasidim, my faithful ones'). The chasidim are those bound to God by chesed — covenant loyalty. They are further described as korte veriti ale zavach ('those who cut my covenant over sacrifice') — the verb karat ('to cut') is the standard term for making a covenant (from the cutting of animals in the ratification ceremony, cf. Genesis 15:10, 17). ale zavach ('over sacrifice') specifies the means: the covenant was sealed by blood sacrifice, evoking the Sinai covenant ceremony of Exodus 24:5-8.
6. The heavens (shamayim) now function as witnesses who testify to God's tsedeq ('righteousness') — the judge's character is established before the verdict is rendered. ki Elohim shofet hu ('for God himself is judge') — the emphatic hu ('he') stresses that God alone holds judicial authority in this proceeding. No appeal to a higher court is possible.
7. The first-person divine speech that begins here and continues through verse 23 is one of the longest divine discourses in the Psalms. God speaks directly, without prophetic mediation — the psalm itself functions as prophetic oracle.
8. God's first clarification: the problem is not that Israel has failed to sacrifice. lo al zevachekha okhichekha ('not on account of your sacrifices do I rebuke you') — the sacrificial system is functioning. olotekha lenegdi tamid ('your burnt offerings are before me continually') — the daily offerings are being presented. The accusation is not about quantity or regularity of sacrifice but about the understanding behind it.
9. Verse 9 continues the psalm's thematic and structural development.
10. The phrase behemot be-harre alef ('cattle on a thousand hills') has become proverbial in English. It expresses divine ownership of all creation — a principle that undermines any transactional understanding of worship. If God owns everything, sacrifice cannot be payment for services rendered.
11. yadati kol of harim ('I know every bird of the mountains') — God's knowledge is specific and exhaustive: he knows each individual bird. This anticipates Jesus' statement that not a sparrow falls without the Father's knowledge (Matthew 10:29). ve-ziz sadai immadi ('and the moving creatures of the field are with me') — ziz is a rare word for swarming, moving creatures. They belong to God, they are 'with' God.
12. The sarcasm of 'if I were hungry, I would not tell you' is deliberate. God mocks the notion that the creator of the universe depends on the offerings of his creatures. This does not abolish sacrifice — verse 14 will redirect it — but it destroys the transactional understanding of worship.
13. The rhetorical questions expect the answer 'no.' ha-okhal besar abbirim ('do I eat the flesh of mighty ones/bulls?') — abbirim ('mighty ones, strong bulls') emphasizes the animals' power and value. ve-dam attudim eshteh ('and the blood of he-goats do I drink?') — the mention of blood is pointed: blood was the most sacred element of sacrifice, poured on the altar for atonement (Leviticus 17:11). God declares he does not consume it. Sacrifice is for the worshiper's benefit, not God's.
14. todah is the pivot of the entire psalm. It means both 'thanksgiving' and 'confession' — the public declaration of what God has done. The todah offering (Leviticus 7:12) included bread and meat shared in a communal meal, making it the most relational of all sacrifices. It is the sacrifice that builds community, not merely appeases deity.
15. The three-step cycle — call, rescue, glorify — replaces the sacrificial cycle of bring, slaughter, atone. The new worship economy is relational: the worshiper's need, God's response, and the worshiper's gratitude. This is the todah pattern in its simplest form.
16. The accusation is aimed at religious hypocrisy — people who know the covenant terms, who can quote them, who use them in worship and teaching, but whose lives contradict everything they profess. This is not a critique of knowledge but of knowledge without corresponding obedience.
17. saneta musar ('you hate discipline/correction') — musar ('discipline, instruction, correction') is the fundamental educational concept in Proverbs. To hate musar is to reject the training that forms character. vattashlekha devarai acharekha ('and you cast my words behind you') — the physical image is of someone throwing something over their shoulder, dismissing it contemptuously. God's words are literally behind their back — out of sight, out of mind.
18. The specific violations: theft and adultery — two of the Ten Commandments. im raita gannav vattirets immo ('when you see a thief you run with him') — not merely tolerance but active participation. ve-im mena'afim chelqekha ('and with adulterers is your share') — chelqekha ('your portion, your share') means they have cast their lot with the unfaithful. The one who recites 'you shall not steal' and 'you shall not commit adultery' does both.
19. pikha shalachta vera'ah ('your mouth you have sent forth in evil') — the mouth is released like a weapon. u-leshonkha tatsmid mirmah ('and your tongue yokes/harnesses deceit') — the verb tsamad ('to bind, to yoke, to harness') pictures the tongue as an animal harnessed to pull a load of deception. Speech — the same faculty used to recite God's statutes (v. 16) — is now yoked to lies.

- 20. The violation becomes intimate: be-achikha tedabber ('against your brother you speak') — not a stranger but a covenant-brother. be-ven immekha titten dofi ('against the son of your mother you give a blemish/defamation') — ben immekha ('the son of your mother') is an intensified form of 'brother,' emphasizing the closest blood relation. dofi ('blemish, defamation') is slander that damages reputation. The one who knows the law against bearing false witness destroys his own family.
- 21. The accusation dimmita heyot ehych kamokha ('you thought I would be like you') is the psalm's most penetrating insight. The root of religious hypocrisy is the assumption that God sees as we see, values as we value, and tolerates as we tolerate. God's silence during sin is not agreement — it is the patience that precedes judgment.
- 22. binu na zot shokheche Eloah ('understand this, you who forget God') — the verb shakach ('to forget') is the core covenant violation: forgetting God. The warning is visceral: pen etrof ('lest I tear') — the verb taraf ('to tear, to rend') is the action of a predator tearing prey. ve-en matstsil ('and there is no rescuer') — when God himself attacks, no one can intervene. The gentle God of verse 15 ('call on me and I will rescue') becomes the lion-God when his patience ends.
- 23. The final verse creates a complete theology of worship: todah (thanksgiving) is the sacrifice, kavod (glory/honor) is the result for God, derekh (ordered way of life) is the ethical requirement, and yesha (salvation) is God's gift to the faithful. This is the covenant rightly understood: not transaction but relationship, not feeding God but thanking God, not ritual alone but life aligned with words.

Summary: David's penitential psalm, composed after the prophet Nathan confronted him over his adultery with Bathsheba and the murder of Uriah. The poem moves from desperate plea for mercy through unflinching confession of sin to a vision of restored worship and a rebuilt Zion. It is the most personal and theologically dense confession in the Hebrew Bible.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm contains the most radical theology of sin and restoration in the Psalter. David does not merely confess a deed — he confesses a condition. 'In sin my mother conceived me' (v. 7) is not a statement about his mother's morality but about the depth of his entanglement with human brokenness. The psalm's central pivot comes at verse 12, where David asks for a 'clean heart' (lev tahor) and a 'steadfast spirit' (ruach nakhon) — language that echoes the creation account. David is not asking for forgiveness alone; he is asking to be re-created. The plea 'do not take your Holy Spirit from me' (v. 13) carries devastating weight: David has watched Saul lose the Spirit (1 Samuel 16:14) and knows what that looks like. He is begging not to become Saul. The psalm's climax inverts the entire sacrificial system — God does not want burnt offerings but a broken spirit (v. 19). This is not anti-cultic theology; it is the recognition that no external ritual can address what has gone wrong inside David.*

Translation Friction: *Hebrew versification counts the superscription as verses 1-2, so what English Bibles call verse 1 ('Have mercy upon me') is verse 3 in the Hebrew. We follow WLC numbering throughout. The phrase 'against you, you alone, have I sinned' (v. 6) has troubled readers because David clearly sinned against Bathsheba, Uriah, and the nation. The Hebrew is not denying horizontal harm but asserting that all sin is ultimately a violation of God's sovereignty — David broke God's moral order, and only God can restore it. The word chatah (v. 4, 'sin') means literally 'to miss the mark,' but in this context it carries the full weight of covenant-breaking rebellion.*

Connections: The superscription ties this psalm directly to 2 Samuel 12:1-15, where Nathan confronts David with the parable of the poor man's lamb. The plea for hyssop (v. 9) recalls the purification rituals of Leviticus 14 (cleansing from skin disease) and Exodus 12:22 (the Passover blood). David's request for a 'new heart' anticipates Ezekiel 36:26 ('I will give you a new heart and put a new spirit within you'). The broken-spirit theology of verse 19 is echoed in Isaiah 57:15 and 66:2. The final two verses about rebuilding Zion's walls may reflect exilic editing, extending David's personal prayer into a national one.

¹For the director of music.
A psalm of David.

²after he had gone in to Bathsheba.
When Nathan the prophet came to him,

³Be gracious to me, God, according to your faithful love;
according to the abundance of your compassion,
wipe out my rebellions.

⁴Wash me thoroughly from my guilt, and from my sin cleanse me.

⁵For my rebellions — I know them, and my sin is before me continually.

⁶Against you — you alone — have I sinned, and done what is evil in your sight,
so that you are justified when you speak and blameless when you judge.

⁷Look — in guilt I was brought forth, and in sin my mother conceived me.

⁸Look — you desire truth in the innermost being;
so in the hidden depths, teach me wisdom.

⁹Purify me with hyssop and I will be clean;
wash me and I will be whiter than snow.

¹⁰Let me hear joy and gladness;
let the bones you have crushed rejoice.

¹¹Hide your face from my sins,
and wipe out all my guilt.

¹²Create in me a clean heart, God,
and renew a steadfast spirit within me.

¹³Do not cast me away from your presence, and do not take your Holy Spirit from me.

¹⁴Restore to me the joy of your salvation, and sustain me with a willing spirit.

¹⁵Then I will teach rebels your ways, and sinners will return to you.

¹⁶Deliver me from bloodguilt, God —
God of my salvation!
My tongue will sing aloud of your righteousness.

¹⁷Lord, open my lips,
and my mouth will declare your praise.

¹⁸For you do not desire sacrifice — I would give it;
you take no pleasure in burnt offering.

¹⁹The sacrifices God accepts are a broken spirit;
a broken and crushed heart —
God, you will not despise.

²⁰Do good to Zion in your favor;
build up the walls of Jerusalem.

²¹Then you will delight in righteous sacrifices — burnt offering and whole offering;
then bulls will be offered on your altar.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The lamnatseyach superscription appears in 55 psalms and indicates the psalm was intended for liturgical performance under professional musical direction. Despite its intensely personal content, this psalm was not private — it was handed to the worship leader for public use.
2. The superscription's second half provides the historical occasion: Nathan's confrontation after David's adultery with Bathsheba (2 Samuel 12). The phrase ba el ('went in to') is the standard Hebrew euphemism for sexual intercourse. The superscription does not soften or euphemize the event — it names both the prophet and the woman.
3. chesed is often rendered 'lovingkindness' (KJV) or 'steadfast love' (ESV). We render it 'faithful love' to capture both the loyalty dimension (it is covenant-bound) and the affective dimension (it is genuine love, not mere obligation). David's appeal to chesed is an appeal to covenant relationship — he has broken the covenant, but he is asking God's covenant character to outlast his covenant-breaking.
3. pesha'im ('rebellions') is the strongest of the three Hebrew sin-words used in this psalm. It denotes willful, deliberate transgression — not ignorance or weakness but conscious defiance. David chooses the most damning word available for his own behavior.
4. The three sin-words — pesha (v. 3), avon (v. 4a), and chattath (v. 4b) — form a comprehensive taxonomy of human wrongdoing. This same triad appears in Exodus 34:7, where God declares that he forgives 'rebellion, guilt, and sin.' David is implicitly invoking God's own self-description from Sinai.
4. kabas ('wash') refers specifically to the physical act of laundering, not bathing. It implies vigorous scrubbing. The stain metaphor suggests David understands his sin as something that has penetrated his being, not merely marked its surface.
5. The word tamid ('continually') is used in the Torah for the perpetual lamp in the tabernacle (Exodus 27:20) and the daily burnt offering (Numbers 28:6). David's sin has become as constant a presence as the offerings that were supposed to address it.
6. lekha levaddekha ('against you, you alone') uses the emphatic construction with the limiting particle levad ('only, alone'). This is not carelessness about horizontal sin but the radical theological claim that sin's ultimate target is always God — because God is the author of the moral order that sin violates.
6. The lema'an ('so that, in order that') clause does not mean David sinned on purpose to give God something to judge. It means that David's full confession is intended to remove any question about whether God's judgment is fair. David preemptively vindicates the judge.
7. hen ('look, behold') signals a shift from confession of specific acts to reflection on the human condition. David moves from 'I did this' to 'I am this.'
7. This verse does not teach that sexuality or conception is sinful. The Hebrew is a statement about human solidarity in brokenness — every person enters a world already compromised by sin. David's point is that he needs something more radical than behavioral correction.
8. tuchot is rare and debated. It may derive from a root meaning 'to cover, to seal' — the covered or sealed-off interior of a person. Some connect it to tachot ('kidneys'), which in Hebrew thought are the seat of deep emotion and conscience. Either way, the meaning is the same: the most interior, hidden dimension of a person.
8. emet ('truth') here means not just factual accuracy but integrity, reliability, coherence between inner reality and outward behavior. God wants David's interior to match his exterior — no more hidden sin.
9. The hyssop reference is not metaphorical decoration. It invokes the entire Levitical purification system and specifically the rituals for the most serious forms of contamination. David sees his sin as equivalent to corpse-contamination — contact with death itself.
9. The snow comparison (mi-sheleg albin, 'whiter than snow') anticipates Isaiah 1:18 ('though your sins are like scarlet, they shall be white as snow'). White is not merely the absence of stain but a positive quality — radiant purity.

10. The pairing of sason ve-simchah ('joy and gladness') is a stock phrase in Hebrew for celebratory occasions — weddings, festivals, restoration. David wants to hear the sound of celebration again, implying he has been in a silence where joy's voice was absent.
11. Normally in the Psalter, the cry is 'do not hide your face from me' (Psalms 13:1, 27:9, 69:17). Here David inverts the formula: hide your face from my sins. He wants God to look away — not from him, but from his transgressions. The verb machah ('wipe out') repeats from verse 3, framing this section with the same plea.
12. bara ('create') is never used in the Hebrew Bible for human manufacturing or crafting. It is reserved for divine acts of bringing into being what did not exist before. David is asking for something only God can do — not reformation but re-creation.
12. nakhon ('steadfast, established, firm') comes from kun, 'to be established, fixed, prepared.' It describes something stable and reliable — the opposite of the wavering spirit that allowed David to see, desire, take, and cover up.
13. ruach qodshekha ('your Holy Spirit') — this is one of only three places in the Hebrew Bible where the phrase 'Holy Spirit' appears (here, Isaiah 63:10-11). In this context it refers to God's empowering, sustaining presence that rests on those whom God has chosen for specific purposes. For David, it is the Spirit that came upon him at his anointing (1 Samuel 16:13).
13. The phrase mi-lefanekha ('from your presence/face') echoes the Cain narrative — after murdering Abel, Cain goes out 'from the presence of the LORD' (Genesis 4:16). David, who has also committed murder, fears the same exile.
14. The three-spirit sequence (vv. 12-14) — steadfast, holy, willing — forms a complete theology of spiritual restoration: internal stability, divine presence, and joyful motivation. All three must be given by God; David cannot manufacture any of them.
15. David deliberately uses the same sin-vocabulary for others that he used for himself (posh'im parallels pasha'ai in v. 3; chatta'im parallels chattathi in v. 4). He does not position himself above other sinners — he joins their company and offers to show them the path he walked back.
16. damim (literally 'bloods') is the technical term for blood-guilt in Hebrew law. Genesis 4:10 uses the same plural when Abel's 'bloods' cry from the ground. The plural may intensify the concept or reflect the multiple deaths David's order caused.
16. The irony of David's tongue singing tsedaqah ('righteousness') is sharp — the tongue that dictated the letter ordering Uriah's death (2 Samuel 11:15) will be repurposed as an instrument of praise.
17. The address shifts from Elohim ('God') to Adonai ('Lord, Master') — the personal, relational name that emphasizes God's authority and David's submission. David positions himself as a servant before his master, asking the master to give him the ability to speak.
18. This verse is not anti-sacrificial. David is not saying sacrifices are worthless in general but that his specific sin exceeds what the sacrificial system was designed to handle. The high-handed sin of Numbers 15:30 — deliberate rebellion — has no prescribed offering. David needs something beyond the system.
19. The plural zivchei Elohim ('the sacrifices of God') uses the construct form: these are not sacrifices offered to God but sacrifices that belong to God — sacrifices that are truly his. The broken spirit is God's sacrifice because God produced it.
19. nidkeh ('crushed') is related to dakka in Isaiah 57:15, where God 'dwells with the crushed and lowly of spirit.' The theology is consistent: God's presence is drawn to human brokenness, not human achievement.
20. Many scholars believe verses 20-21 are an exilic addition, extending David's personal prayer into a communal one relevant to the Babylonian exile. Whether original or added, the verses make a theological point: individual sin and communal devastation are connected, and restoration must encompass both.
21. zivchei tsedeq ('sacrifices of righteousness') — sacrifices that are right and proper because they emerge from a right relationship with God. The contrast with zivchei Elohim ('sacrifices of God' = a broken spirit) in verse 19 is deliberate: both are valid, but one must precede the other.
21. kalil ('whole offering') refers to a sacrifice entirely consumed on the altar — nothing held back. The theological echo is that David, having held nothing back in confession, can now offer a sacrifice that holds nothing back either.

Summary: A wisdom psalm contrasting the fate of a powerful person who trusts in wealth and destructive speech with the righteous who trust in God's faithful love. The superscription connects it to Doeg the Edomite's betrayal of the priests at Nob. The psalm moves from accusation to the wicked person's downfall to the psalmist's confident trust.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's central image is botanical: the wicked person is uprooted and torn from the land of the living (v. 7), while the psalmist is a flourishing olive tree in God's house (v. 10). The contrast is between rootedness and rootlessness — the wicked trusted in wealth (a portable asset) while the righteous is planted in God's presence (a fixed location). The olive tree metaphor is carefully chosen: olive trees live for centuries, produce fruit continually, and are nearly impossible to kill.

Even when cut down, they regenerate from the roots. David is saying his trust in God's chesed has root systems that outlast destruction.

Translation Friction: The superscription's connection to Doeg the Edomite (1 Samuel 22:9-19) is not immediately obvious from the psalm's content, which addresses a more generalized 'mighty one' (gibbor). Doeg informed Saul that the priests at Nob had helped David, and then personally slaughtered 85 priests when Saul's own soldiers refused. The psalm may have originated from that specific event and been generalized for liturgical use. Hebrew verse numbering counts the two-verse superscription as verses 1-2.

Connections: The Doeg episode is narrated in 1 Samuel 21:7 and 22:9-19. The olive tree image connects to Jeremiah 11:16, where Israel is called a 'green olive tree,' and Romans 11:17-24, where Paul develops olive tree theology. The tongue-as-weapon imagery (vv. 4-6) parallels Psalm 57:4 and James 3:5-8. The contrast between trusting in wealth and trusting in God anticipates Jesus's teaching in Luke 12:16-21.

¹For the director of music.

A maskil of David.

²When Doeg the Edomite came and told Saul, saying to him, "David has come to the house of Ahimelech."

³Why do you boast in evil, mighty one?
The faithful love of God endures all day long.

⁴Your tongue devises destruction, like a sharpened razor, working deceit.

⁵You love evil more than good, lying more than speaking what is right.
Selah.

⁶You love every devouring word,
you deceitful tongue.

⁷So God will tear you down forever;
he will snatch you and rip you from your tent,
and uproot you from the land of the living.
Selah.

⁸The righteous will see and stand in awe, and they will laugh at him:

⁹"Look — the man who would not make God his refuge, but trusted in his great wealth and grew strong in his own destruction."

¹⁰But I am like a flourishing olive tree in the house of God.
I trust in the faithful love of God forever and always.

¹¹I will thank you forever because you have acted;
I will wait on your name, for it is good,
in the presence of your faithful ones.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. maskil is a psalm classification appearing in 13 psalm superscriptions. Its exact meaning is debated — it may derive from sakal ('to be prudent, to have insight') and indicate a wisdom or instructional psalm. The term suggests this psalm is meant to teach something, not merely express emotion.
2. Doeg was Saul's chief herdsman, an Edomite in Israelite service. His report to Saul about David's visit to the priest Ahimelech at Nob (1 Samuel 22:9-10) led to the massacre of 85 priests. Doeg personally carried out the slaughter when Saul's own soldiers refused. The psalm's focus on the destructive tongue makes sense in this context — Doeg's words killed an entire priestly community.
3. The syntax of verse 3b is compressed and debated. Some read it as a continuation of the question: 'Why do you boast in evil, mighty one — while the faithful love of God endures all day?' Others read it as a separate declaration. Either way, the contrast between human evil and divine chesed is the structural foundation of the psalm.
4. The razor metaphor is more chilling than a sword metaphor would be. A sword is an obvious weapon; a razor is a tool for grooming that has been repurposed for harm. The destruction comes from something that looks innocuous — a report, a piece of information, a truth told at the right moment to the right person.
5. The comparison is not between evil and neutrality but between evil and good — this person actively prefers destruction over benefit, falsehood over truth. The selah at the end signals a musical pause, giving the accusation time to settle.
6. divrei vala ('devouring words') — vala means 'to swallow, to devour, to engulf.' These are words that consume people, that destroy lives when released. The phrase leshon mirmah ('tongue of deceit') becomes an epithet — the person is identified with their organ of destruction.
7. The four verbs create a sense of escalating violence. God does not merely punish; he demolishes, snatches, rips, and uproots. The language mirrors the violence the gibbor inflicted through speech — destruction returns to the destroyer in physical form.
8. The sequence — seeing, fearing, laughing — traces the emotional arc of watching divine justice unfold. The fear (yira'u) is not terror but awe at God's justice. The laughter (yischaku) is not cruelty but the release of tension when the bully finally falls. The righteous have lived under this person's threats; his downfall vindicates their endurance.
9. The quotation marks in the rendering indicate that the righteous are speaking — this is their commentary on the fallen gibbor. The diagnosis is precise: the problem was not weakness but misplaced trust. Strength invested in wealth and destruction rather than in God produces a person who looks powerful but has no roots.
10. Olive trees were planted in temple courtyards and palace grounds throughout the ancient Near East. The image of being 'in the house of God' as an olive tree suggests permanent residence in God's presence — a living thing rooted where God dwells.
10. The phrase olam va-ed ('forever and always') uses two words for permanence: olam ('age, eternity, ancient time') and ed ('perpetuity, continuing'). The doubling emphasizes duration without end.
11. chasidim ('faithful ones') derives from the same root as chesed. These are the people defined by covenant loyalty — they reflect God's character in human community. David's final word places him not in isolation but in the company of the faithful, contrasting with the gibbor's solitary fall.

Summary: A near-duplicate of Psalm 14, this wisdom psalm indicts universal human corruption. The 'fool' (naval) declares there is no God — not as philosophical atheism but as practical denial that God sees or acts. God looks down from heaven and finds no one doing good. The psalm ends with a cry for salvation from Zion.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 53 is almost identical to Psalm 14, with two significant differences: Psalm 53 uses Elohim ('God') where Psalm 14 uses YHWH ('the LORD'), and verse 6 diverges significantly from Psalm 14:5-6. The existence of both versions in the Psalter suggests they circulated in different liturgical collections — one associated with the divine name YHWH (Psalms 1-41, the 'Yahwistic Psalter') and one with Elohim (Psalms 42-83, the 'Elohistic Psalter'). The editorial history is itself a witness to how living communities adapted and reused sacred texts for different worship contexts. The psalm's most devastating claim is not that some people are wicked but that 'there is no one who does good — not even one' (v. 4). This is not an observation about a particular group but a verdict on the human condition. Paul quotes this psalm in Romans 3:10-12 to establish universal human sinfulness.

Translation Friction: The word naval ('fool') in verse 2 does not mean intellectually stupid. In Hebrew wisdom literature, the naval is the person who is morally dense — who acts as if actions have no consequences and God has no interest in human behavior. Nabal, the husband of Abigail (1 Samuel 25), is the narrative illustration: his name means 'fool,' and his behavior confirms it. The psalm's 'atheism' is practical, not theoretical — the fool lives as if God is absent, regardless of what they might formally believe.

Connections: Nearly identical to Psalm 14, which belongs to the first book of the Psalter (Psalms 1-41). Paul quotes from this psalm tradition extensively in Romans 3:10-18. The 'looking down from heaven' motif echoes Genesis 11:5 (God descending to see Babel) and Genesis 18:21 (God going down to investigate Sodom). The cry for salvation from Zion (v. 7) connects to the Zion theology of Psalms 46, 48, and 76.

¹For the director of music. According to Machalath.
A maskil of David.

²The fool says in his heart,
"There is no God."
They are corrupt, they commit vile injustice;
there is no one who does good.

³God looks down from heaven upon the children of humanity, to see if there is anyone who has insight,
anyone who seeks God.

⁴All of them have turned away;
together they have become foul.
There is no one who does good —
not even one.

⁵Do the workers of wickedness not know —
those who eat my people as they eat bread?
They do not call on God.

⁶There they are — seized by terror where there was no terror!
For God scatters the bones of those who besiege you;
you put them to shame,
because God has rejected them.

⁷Who will give salvation to Israel from Zion?
When God restores the fortunes of his people,
Jacob will rejoice,
Israel will be glad!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Machalath may refer to a melody, a musical instrument, or a mode of performance. Some derive it from chalah ('to be sick, to suffer'), suggesting a mournful or lamenting tone. Others connect it to machol ('dance'). The term appears only here and in Psalm 88. Its exact meaning is lost.
2. naval does not describe intellectual capacity but moral orientation. The naval in Proverbs and the wisdom tradition is the person who refuses to align their life with reality as God has structured it. They may be shrewd and successful — but they are fools because they act as if the moral order does not apply to them.

2. Psalm 53:2 differs from Psalm 14:1 in using hit'ivu avel ('they commit vile injustice') instead of Psalm 14's hit'ivu alilah ('they commit vile deeds'). The substitution of avel ('injustice, wrong') for alilah ('deeds, practices') sharpens the accusation toward systemic injustice.
3. Psalm 53:3 uses mi-shamayim ('from heaven') where Psalm 14:2 uses mi-shamayim as well, but Psalm 53 uses Elohim throughout where Psalm 14 uses YHWH. This Elohistic editing is characteristic of Psalms 42-83.
4. Paul's quotation of this passage in Romans 3:10-12 uses it to establish that both Jews and Gentiles stand under the same verdict of universal sinfulness. The psalm's original context may be more limited — describing a particular corrupt generation — but its language is absolute enough to sustain the universal application Paul gives it.
4. ne'elachu is unique to this psalm (Psalm 14:3 uses ne'elachu as well). The root may be related to alach, suggesting souring or going rancid — an image of organic decay applied to moral condition.
5. The bread-eating metaphor for oppression appears also in Micah 3:2-3, where rulers 'eat the flesh of my people' and 'strip their skin from them.' The image emphasizes the routine, unreflective nature of exploitation — it is as ordinary to the oppressor as a daily meal.
6. This verse is the primary textual difference between Psalms 14 and 53. Psalm 14:5-6 reads: 'There they are in great dread, for God is with the generation of the righteous. You would confound the plans of the poor, but the LORD is their refuge.' Psalm 53:6 replaces this with a military scene of divine judgment. The difference suggests the two psalms were adapted for different historical situations.
6. pizar atsmot ('scatters bones') is violent imagery — in the ancient Near East, the scattering of bones meant complete destruction with no possibility of burial, the ultimate dishonor.
7. shevut (or shivat) ammo is debated — it can mean 'captivity of his people' or 'fortunes of his people.' The root shuv suggests a restoration or reversal of condition. In exilic and post-exilic contexts it naturally refers to return from Babylon, but the idiom is broader: God will undo what has gone wrong.
7. The double naming — Jacob and Israel — uses both the personal and national names of the patriarch to encompass the full identity of God's people. Rejoicing and gladness are the expected response to divine deliverance throughout the Psalter.

Summary: A compact psalm of lament and trust, attributed to David when the Ziphites betrayed his hiding place to Saul. David cries out to God for salvation by God's name and might, declares that strangers have risen against him, and concludes with confident thanksgiving for deliverance.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is one of the shortest lament psalms in the Psalter, yet it contains a complete arc: invocation (vv. 3-4), complaint (v. 5), confession of trust (v. 6), and thanksgiving (vv. 8-9). The psalm's efficiency is itself a theological statement — David does not elaborate, explain, or negotiate. He names the crisis, names God, and moves directly to trust. The opening plea 'save me by your name' (v. 3) is particularly striking: David asks God to deploy his name (shem) as a weapon. In the ancient Near East, a name carried the full weight of its bearer's identity, power, and reputation. To be saved 'by God's name' is to be saved by everything God is.*

Translation Friction: *Hebrew versification counts the superscription as verses 1-2, so the prayer begins at verse 3. The Ziphites were residents of Ziph in the hill country of Judah — David's own tribal territory. Their betrayal was especially bitter because they were his kinsmen. The word zarim ('strangers, foreigners') in verse 5 is puzzling if the Ziphites were Judahites; some manuscripts read zedim ('arrogant ones') instead, which better fits the context of internal betrayal. The WLC preserves zarim.*

Connections: *The Ziphite betrayal is narrated in 1 Samuel 23:19-24 and 26:1. David's appeal to God's name (shem) connects to the theology of the divine name in Exodus 3:13-15 and the third commandment (Exodus 20:7). The pattern of lament-to-praise mirrors Psalm 13 and Psalm 22. The voluntary thank offering (nedavah) in the closing verse connects to the freewill offering legislation in Leviticus 7:16.*

A maskil of David.

²When the Ziphites came and said to Saul,
"Is not David hiding among us?"

³God, save me by your name, and vindicate me by your might.

⁴God, hear my prayer;
give ear to the words of my mouth.

⁵For strangers have risen against me,
and ruthless ones seek my life.
They have not set God before them.
Selah.

⁶Look — God is my helper;
the Lord is among those who sustain my life.

⁷He will return the evil upon my enemies;
in your faithfulness, destroy them.

⁸With a freewill offering I will sacrifice to you;
I will give thanks to your name, LORD, for it is good.

⁹For he has delivered me from every trouble, and my eye has looked on my enemies in triumph.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. neginot ('stringed instruments') indicates accompaniment by lyres, harps, or similar instruments. The combination of instrumental accompaniment with the maskil classification suggests a reflective, meditative performance style.
2. The Ziphites were inhabitants of Ziph, a town in the southern hill country of Judah (Joshua 15:55). They informed Saul of David's location twice (1 Samuel 23:19 and 26:1). As fellow Judahites, their betrayal was a kin-against-kin violation — the very people who should have protected David turned him over to his persecutor.
3. tedineni ('judge me') in this context means 'render a just verdict on my behalf' — vindication, not condemnation. David is asking God to adjudicate between him and his enemies and to demonstrate by his actions whose side justice is on.
4. The two verbs — shema ('hear') and ha'azinah ('give ear, listen attentively') — form an intensifying parallel. The first asks God to receive the prayer; the second asks for focused, deliberate attention. imrei fi ('words of my mouth') is a formal expression that elevates the speech from casual request to solemn petition.
5. The textual variant zarim/zedim matters for historical context but not for theology. Whether the betrayers are 'strangers' (distanced from David despite being kinsmen) or 'arrogant ones' (acting with presumptuous disregard), the result is the same: they act without reference to God.
6. be-somkhei nafshi ('among those who sustain my life') uses the participle of samakh ('to support, uphold, lean upon'). God is counted among those who prop David up — the same verb used in Psalm 51:14 for God sustaining David with a willing spirit.
7. hatsmitem ('destroy them, cut them off') is from tsamat, meaning to silence, to put an end to, to annihilate. It is a severe verb — David is not asking for mild correction but for the permanent elimination of the threat. This reflects the life-or-death reality of his situation: the Ziphites' information could lead to his execution.
8. The shift from Elohim throughout the psalm to YHWH ('LORD') in the final verse is unusual in the Elohistic Psalter (Psalms 42-83). It may preserve the original text before Elohistic editing, or it may be a deliberate use of the covenant name at the psalm's climax — the moment of most intimate address.
9. The final verse speaks in the past tense — hitsilani ('he has delivered me') — though the deliverance may not yet have happened. This is the 'prophetic perfect,' a Hebrew convention where future events are described in past tense because their certainty is so complete that they can be spoken of as already accomplished. David's trust in God's faithfulness is so firm that he speaks of rescue as a completed fact.

Summary: A lament psalm driven by the anguish of betrayal by a close friend. David cries out under the weight of enemies, expresses a desperate wish to flee like a dove into the wilderness, and then reveals the deepest wound: the betrayer is not a stranger but an intimate companion. The psalm oscillates between terror and trust, ending with a command to cast one's burden on the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm contains one of the most psychologically raw passages in the Hebrew Bible (vv. 13-15). David's pain is not primarily from enemies — enemies he can handle — but from a friend, a companion (aluf, meyudda), someone with whom he walked to God's house in fellowship. The betrayal of intimacy is more devastating than the hostility of strangers because it corrupts the place where trust lived. The dove-flight fantasy (vv. 7-9) is not escapism but an honest expression of the human wish, under unbearable pressure, to simply disappear. David wants wings — not to fight, not to conquer, but to fly away and rest. The Hebrew Bible rarely grants its heroes the luxury of pretending they are unbreakable.

Translation Friction: The historical setting is uncertain. The description of a friend's betrayal has led to associations with Ahithophel, David's counselor who defected to Absalom's rebellion (2 Samuel 15:12, 31). This identification is plausible but not certain — the psalm's language is general enough to apply to any intimate betrayal. The text of verse 16 (Hebrew) is difficult; the shift between singular and plural enemies, and between second and third person address, suggests either a complex rhetorical strategy or textual disturbance.

Connections: The Ahithophel connection links to 2 Samuel 15-17 and Jesus's betrayal by Judas (the early church read this psalm christologically, as in Acts 1:16-20). The dove imagery connects to Song of Songs 2:14 and Hosea 7:11. The command to 'cast your burden on the LORD' (v. 23) is quoted in 1 Peter 5:7. The description of the friend's smooth speech hiding violence (v. 22) echoes Proverbs 26:23-26.

A maskil of David.

²Give ear to my prayer, God, and do not hide yourself from my plea.

³Pay attention to me and answer me!
I am restless in my anguish;
I groan aloud.

⁴Because of the voice of the enemy, because of the pressure of the wicked — for they heap trouble upon me and in anger they bear a grudge against me.

⁵My heart writhes within me,
and the terrors of death have fallen upon me.

⁶Fear and trembling come over me,
and shuddering covers me.

⁷And I said, "Who will give me wings like a dove?
I would fly away and find rest.

⁸I would flee far away;
I would lodge in the wilderness.
Selah.

⁹I would hurry to my shelter from the raging wind and storm."

¹⁰Confuse their speech, Lord! Divide their tongues!
For I have seen violence and conflict in the city.

¹¹Day and night they circle its walls;
trouble and misery are within it.

¹²Destruction is within it;
oppression and deceit never leave its public square.

¹³For it is not an enemy who taunts me — that I could bear.
It is not a foe who rises against me —
from that one I could hide.

¹⁴But it was you — a man my equal,
my companion, my close friend.

¹⁵Together we shared sweet counsel;
we walked in the house of God among the throng.

¹⁶Let death come upon them suddenly;
let them go down to Sheol alive,
for evil is in their dwelling and within them.

¹⁷As for me, I call upon God, and the LORD will save me.

¹⁸Evening and morning and noon
I cry out in anguish, and he hears my voice.

¹⁹He redeems my life in peace from the battle waged against me, for many are on my side.

²⁰God will hear and humble them —
he who sits enthroned from of old.
Selah.
For they have no fear of change;
they do not fear God.

²¹He stretched out his hands against those at peace with him;
he violated his covenant.

²²His speech was smooth as butter,
but war was in his heart.
His words were softer than oil,
yet they were drawn swords.

²³Cast your burden on the LORD, and he will sustain you.
He will never allow the righteous to be shaken.

²⁴But you, God, will bring them down to the pit of destruction.
Men of blood and deceit
will not live out half their days.
But I — I will trust in you.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The same superscription as Psalm 54 — stringed instruments accompanying a wisdom psalm. The musical instruction suggests a reflective, measured performance, which contrasts sharply with the emotional turbulence of the psalm's content.
2. The verb titallam ('hide yourself') is reflexive — David fears that God is deliberately concealing himself, choosing not to be found. The plea is not just 'hear me' but 'stop hiding from me.' The word techinah ('plea, supplication') suggests an urgent, desperate request — not a routine prayer but a cry from someone with nowhere else to turn.
3. The accumulation of prayer-verbs (give ear, pay attention, answer) reveals escalating desperation. Each verb is more demanding than the last. David is not maintaining decorum in prayer — he is a man at the end of his capacity.
4. The enemies' weapon is their voice (qol oyev) — words again, as in Psalm 52. The word aqat ('pressure, oppression') suggests squeezing, constriction, being pressed into a tighter and tighter space. yamitu ('they heap, they cause to slide down') — trouble is piled on top of David. And yistemuni ('they bear a grudge') from satam, meaning to harbor lasting hostility — this is not a momentary conflict but sustained, malicious hatred.
5. yachil ('writhes, trembles, convulses') is the verb used for labor pains — David's heart is in the grip of contractions, a pain that comes in waves and cannot be controlled. eimot mavet ('terrors of death') — the dread is not abstract but specific: David genuinely fears for his life.
6. Three words for terror in sequence: yir'ah ('fear'), ra'ad ('trembling'), and pallatsut ('shuddering, horror'). The escalation is physical: from internal fear to bodily trembling to full-body horror that covers (tekasseni) him like a garment. David is wearing his terror.
7. mi yitten li ('who will give me') is the standard Hebrew idiom for 'if only' — expressing a wish the speaker knows is impossible. David knows he cannot become a dove. The fantasy is therapeutic, not delusional.
8. The midbar ('wilderness') is not merely uninhabited space — in the Hebrew Bible it is the place of encounter with God (Sinai), of testing (Israel's wandering), and of refuge (David's own experience in the Judean wilderness). David wants to return to the wilderness where things were simpler, harder, but honest.
9. The storm metaphor (ruach so'ah, sa'ar) captures the chaos of the political and personal crisis. The miflaht ('shelter, escape, refuge') is the place where the storm cannot reach. David closes his dove-fantasy with the image of finding cover from a tempest — the crisis is weather he cannot control, and he needs a roof.
10. The Babel allusion is deliberate: just as God disrupted human conspiracy at Babel by dividing language, David asks God to disrupt the conspiracy against him by making his enemies unable to communicate effectively.
11. The enemies patrol the city walls day and night — whether as besiegers or as corrupt authorities within the city. aven ve-amal ('trouble and misery') are personified as resident forces within the city. The safe space has been corrupted from the inside.
12. The rechov ('public square, broad place') was the center of civic life — where commerce, justice, and community gathering took place. When tokh u-mirmah ('oppression and deceit') permanently occupy the public square, the entire civic order has collapsed.
13. The conditional structure ('if it were an enemy... I could bear it') is a rhetorical setup for the devastating revelation in the next verses. David is saying: I am not undone by hostility from the expected direction. I am undone by hostility from where I least expected it.
14. If the Ahithophel identification is correct, the description fits precisely. Ahithophel was David's most trusted counselor (2 Samuel 16:23 says his counsel was 'as if one inquired of the word of God'). His defection to Absalom was the most personally devastating event of the entire rebellion.

14. meyuḏḏa'i ('my intimate') from yada — the Hebrew verb for the deepest kind of knowing, used for sexual intimacy, for God's knowledge of Israel, and for the closest human relationships. This person knew David in a way that made the betrayal maximally destructive.
15. sod ('counsel, secret, intimate circle') is the word used for God's own divine council in Job 15:8 and Psalm 89:7. When David says he shared sod with this friend, he is describing the highest level of human intimacy — the exchange of thoughts that are shared with no one else.
16. The Korah allusion (going down to Sheol alive) is the most severe imprecation available in the Hebrew idiom. It invokes the one occasion in the Torah where the earth itself punished rebellion by swallowing the rebels whole. David sees the betrayal of friendship as equivalent to the rebellion against divinely appointed leadership.
17. The emphatic ani ('as for me') sets David apart from the corrupt city and the treacherous friend. Whatever they do, he will call on God. The shift from Elohim to YHWH mirrors Psalm 54:8 — the covenant name appears at the moment of deepest trust.
18. The three times — evening, morning, noon — may reflect a practice of praying three times daily (Daniel 6:10). The sequence begins with evening because the Hebrew day begins at sunset. The present tense 'he hears' (vayyishma) expresses confidence: God's hearing is not future hope but present reality.
19. The verb padah is covenantal — it is used for God's redemption of Israel from Egypt (Deuteronomy 7:8) and for the redemption of the firstborn (Exodus 13:13). David sees his personal rescue as participating in the same pattern of divine redemption.
20. chalifot ('changes, alternations') may refer to changes of fortune, changes of behavior, or the absence of divine discipline. The point is consistent: these people have lived without consequences, and consequence-free existence breeds contempt for God.
21. chillel berito ('profaned his covenant') uses the same verb applied to desecrating the Sabbath (Exodus 31:14) or God's name (Leviticus 22:32). The friendship-covenant is treated with the same reverence as religious covenants — violating it is not just rude but sacrilegious.
22. This verse is the classic biblical description of the smooth-talking betrayer. Proverbs 26:23-28 develops the same theme: 'Smooth lips with an evil heart are like glaze on an earthen pot.' The drawn-swords image suggests premeditation — these words were weapons prepared in advance.
23. 1 Peter 5:7 directly echoes this verse: 'Cast all your anxiety on him because he cares for you.' Peter's Greek (epiripsantes) mirrors the forceful Hebrew hashlek — this is not polite delegation but desperate unloading.
23. yehavkha is a hapax legomenon — it appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. Its meaning is derived from context and cognate languages. The rarity of the word adds to its weight: this is not a standard theological term but a unique expression for the specific thing that weighs on you.
24. The contrast between 'half their days' and David's trust creates a temporal theology: the wicked's time is cut short; the trusting one's relationship with God has no expiration. The psalm does not promise that the righteous will live long — it promises that trust in God transcends the question of duration.

Summary: A psalm of trust amid pursuit, attributed to David when the Philistines seized him in Gath. David confesses his fear, declares his trust in God's word, and expresses confidence that God keeps a record of his tears. The psalm features a refrain — 'In God I trust; I will not be afraid. What can flesh do to me?' — that punctuates the movement from terror to faith.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 9 (Hebrew) contains one of the most intimate images of God in the entire Bible: 'Put my tears in your bottle; are they not in your record?' David imagines God carefully collecting each tear — not wiping them away, not stopping them, but preserving them as evidence that matters. The no'd ('bottle, wineskin') was a traveler's essential possession; David pictures God as carrying David's grief with him. The metaphor says: your suffering is not wasted, not forgotten, not invisible. God keeps receipts. This is not stoic theology — it is a God who is moved by human pain and stores it as something precious.

Translation Friction: The superscription references David's capture by the Philistines in Gath (1 Samuel 21:10-15), where David feigned madness to escape. But Psalm 34's superscription covers the same event using the name 'Abimelech' instead of 'Achish.' These may reflect different traditions about the same event, or the name 'Abimelech' in Psalm 34 may be a dynastic title rather than a personal name. The phrase yonat elem rechoqim in the superscription (v. 1) is obscure — possibly a melody name meaning 'the silent dove of distant places' or 'the dove of the distant terebinths.'

Connections: The Gath episode is in 1 Samuel 21:10-15. The refrain 'what can flesh do to me?' is quoted in Hebrews 13:6. The tear-bottle image connects to Revelation 21:4 ('God will wipe every tear from their eyes'). David's vow-language in the closing verses connects to the thank-offering tradition of Leviticus 7 and Psalm 50:14.

¹For the director of music. According to "The Silent Dove of Distant Places."
A miktam of David, when the Philistines seized him in Gath.

²Be gracious to me, God, for people trample me;
all day long an attacker presses me.

³My enemies trample me all day long,
for many are fighting against me, O Most High.

⁴On the day I am afraid,
I will trust in you.

⁵In God — I praise his word.
In God I trust; I will not be afraid.
What can flesh do to me?

⁶All day long they twist my words;
all their thoughts are against me for evil.

⁷They band together, they lurk, they watch my steps,
as they wait for my life.

⁸For their wickedness — will they escape?
In anger, God, bring down the peoples!

⁹You have counted my wanderings.
Put my tears in your bottle — are they not in your record?

¹⁰Then my enemies will turn back on the day I call.
This I know: God is for me.

¹¹In God — I praise his word.
In the LORD — I praise his word.

¹²In God I trust; I will not be afraid.
What can a mere human do to me?

¹³Upon me, God, are my vows to you;
I will fulfill thank offerings to you.

¹⁴For you have delivered my life from death,
my feet from stumbling,
so that I may walk before God in the light of the living.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. yonat elem rechoqim is one of the most mysterious phrases in the psalm superscriptions. yonah ('dove') connects to David's dove-wish in Psalm 55:7; elem ('silence, muteness') may describe the dove or David's own silenced state; rechoqim ('distant ones, far-off places') captures David's situation as a fugitive far from home. If this is a melody name, it evokes the theme of vulnerable exile. miktam appears in six psalm titles (Psalms 16, 56-60) and its meaning is uncertain — possibly from katam ('to cover, to conceal') suggesting a hidden or precious song, or from ketem ('gold'), suggesting something golden or valuable.
2. she'afani ('trample me, crush me, pant after me') can mean either to snap at (like a beast) or to trample underfoot. enosh ('mortal, human being') is used rather than ish ('man'), emphasizing the frailty of the oppressor — merely human. The irony: a mortal is trampling another mortal, as if one had authority over the other.
3. The repetition of kol ha-yom ('all day long') from verse 2 emphasizes the relentless nature of the persecution. marom ('Most High, the height') — David addresses God by a title that places God above all the enemies who surround him below. The contrast is spatial: David is pressed on the ground level, but God is above it all.
4. The brevity of the Hebrew is striking — six words in Hebrew, no embellishment, no theological argument. The simplicity itself is the theology: when afraid, trust. The relationship between fear and trust is not sequential (first stop being afraid, then trust) but simultaneous (afraid and trusting at the same time).
5. The refrain appears here (v. 5) and again in verses 11-12, framing the psalm's center. Hebrews 13:6 echoes this refrain: 'The Lord is my helper; I will not be afraid. What can anyone do to me?' The move from 'flesh' (basar) to 'anyone' (anthropos) in the Greek translation preserves the point: human opposition is finite.
6. ye'atsevu devarai ('they twist/distort my words') — the verb atsav can mean 'to grieve, to hurt, to twist, to shape.' David's words are being reshaped by his enemies — taken out of context, reinterpreted, weaponized. The information war precedes the physical one.
7. Three verbs of surveillance: yaguru ('they band together, they attack'), yitsponu ('they hide, they lurk'), and yishmoru ('they watch, they keep guard over'). The enemies are organized, hidden, and patient. aqevai ('my steps, my heels') — they track David's movements. The hunting imagery is precise: a coordinated team stalking prey.
8. The rhetorical question expects a negative answer: no, they will not escape on account of (al) their wickedness. David then asks God to act: be-af ('in anger') hored ('bring down, cast down') ammim ('peoples, nations'). The plural 'peoples' may refer to the Philistines or to all hostile nations. God's anger is not arbitrary rage but the appropriate response of justice to sustained wickedness.
9. The wordplay between nodi ('my wandering') and no'dekha ('your bottle/skin') connects David's homeless journeying with God's careful preservation. The wandering produces tears; the tears are stored. There is a poetic justice: what exile costs David, God saves.
9. sifrathekha ('your record, your account') is from the same root as sefer ('book, scroll'). God is depicted as keeping written records — the same image appears in Malachi 3:16 ('a scroll of remembrance') and Daniel 7:10 ('the books were opened').
10. zeh yada'ti ('this I know') is emphatic — it is not hope or wish but settled knowledge. The basis of the knowledge is not David's worthiness but God's character. God is 'for' the vulnerable one who trusts, not 'for' the powerful one who oppresses.
11. The refrain now doubles the divine name: Elohim and YHWH. The expansion from one name to two intensifies the praise — David invokes God both as the universal Creator (Elohim) and as the covenant LORD (YHWH). Both identities are praised for the same thing: his davar ('word').
12. The refrain repeats from verse 5 with one change: basar ('flesh') is replaced by adam ('human being, mortal'). The substitution reinforces the point from a different angle — basar emphasizes physical frailty; adam emphasizes creaturely status. Whether viewed as fragile flesh or as a creature under God, the enemy is no match for the God David trusts.
13. nedarekha ('your vows' or 'my vows to you') — David acknowledges that he has made promises to God during his distress and now commits to fulfilling them. todot ('thank offerings, praises') — from the root yadah ('to give thanks, to confess'). The todah is both a sacrifice and a declaration of gratitude.
14. or ha-chayyim ('the light of the living') contrasts with the darkness of Sheol and death that threatened throughout the psalm. Light in Hebrew poetry is nearly synonymous with life, blessing, and God's presence (Psalm 36:9: 'In your light we see light'). David's rescue is not just from death but into a quality of life defined by God's luminous presence.

Summary: A psalm of refuge and praise, attributed to David when he fled from Saul into a cave. David takes shelter under God's wings, declares his trust amid enemies whose teeth are spears and whose tongues are sharp swords, and erupts into praise that aims to wake the dawn. The psalm features the refrain 'Be exalted above the heavens, God; let your glory be over all the earth.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's most striking moment is verse 9 (Hebrew): 'Wake up, my glory! Wake up, harp and lyre! I will wake the dawn.' David does not wait for the dawn to come and bring hope — he commands his instruments to rouse the dawn itself. This is the audacity of worship in darkness: the singer does not wait for conditions to improve before praising. The praise itself becomes the agent that summons the new day. The cave setting (whether Adullam, 1 Samuel 22:1, or En-gedi, 1 Samuel 24:3) adds physical texture — David is literally underground, in darkness, hiding, and from that place he declares that God's faithfulness reaches the skies (v. 11).

Translation Friction: The superscription says al tashchet ('do not destroy'), which may be a melody name or a liturgical instruction. Some connect it to David's refusal to destroy Saul in the cave at En-gedi (1 Samuel 24:4-7) or in the Wilderness of Ziph (1 Samuel 26:9). The second half of this psalm (vv. 8-12) reappears almost identically as Psalm 108:2-6, suggesting that psalm compositions could be modular — sections recombined for different liturgical purposes.

Connections: The cave setting connects to 1 Samuel 22:1 (cave of Adullam) or 24:1-7 (cave at En-gedi). The 'wings' refuge image (v. 2) echoes Ruth 2:12 and Psalm 36:7. The teeth-as-spears imagery (v. 5) parallels Psalm 52:4 and Proverbs 30:14. Psalm 108:2-6 reuses verses 8-12. The faithfulness-to-the-skies language (v. 11) appears also in Psalm 36:5 and 89:2.

¹For the director of music. "Do Not Destroy."

A miktam of David, when he fled from Saul into the cave.

²Be gracious to me, God — be gracious to me,
for in you my soul takes refuge.
In the shadow of your wings I will take shelter until the storms of destruction pass.

³I call out to God Most High,
to God who fulfills his purpose for me.

⁴He will send from heaven and save me;
he rebukes the one who tramples me.
Selah.
God will send his faithful love and his truth.

⁵My soul lies down among lions, among people who are ablaze — whose teeth are spears and arrows, whose tongue is a sharpened sword.

⁶Be exalted above the heavens, God!
Let your glory be over all the earth!

⁷They set a net for my steps;
my soul was bowed low.

They dug a pit before me — they fell into it themselves!
Selah.

⁸My heart is steady, God;
my heart is steady.
I will sing — I will make music!

⁹Wake up, my glory!
Wake up, harp and lyre!
I will wake the dawn.

¹⁰I will give thanks to you among the peoples, Lord;
I will make music to you among the nations.

¹¹For your faithful love is great — reaching to the heavens, and your truth to the skies.

¹²Be exalted above the heavens, God!
Let your glory be over all the earth!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. al tashchet ('do not destroy') appears in four psalm superscriptions (57, 58, 59, 75). Whether this is a melody title, a liturgical instruction, or a thematic label is uncertain. If connected to the cave narrative, it may recall David's command to his men not to destroy Saul when they had the chance (1 Samuel 24:6; 26:9). The miktam designation links this psalm to the cluster of Psalms 56-60.
2. The cave provides a physical analog for the theological image: David is literally hiding in a dark enclosed space while enemies search for him outside. The 'wings' transform the cave from a hole in the ground to the shelter of God's presence.
2. havvot ('destructions') is the same word used in Psalm 52:4 for what the wicked tongue devises. David is sheltering from the same destructive forces that the previous psalms have been naming.
3. gomer alai ('who completes/finishes concerning me') — God is not a partial actor but one who carries things to completion. The verb gamar means 'to finish, to complete, to bring to an end.' Whatever God has started in David's life, he will see it through. This anticipates Paul's confidence in Philippians 1:6.
4. The pairing of chesed ve-emet ('faithful love and truth') is one of the most common divine attribute pairs in the Hebrew Bible (Genesis 24:27, Psalm 25:10, 85:10, 89:14). The two qualities are inseparable: love without truth is sentimentality; truth without love is brutality. God's character holds both in perfect union.
5. The lion image transforms David's cave setting: he is not merely hiding in a cave — he is lying down in a lions' den. The cave that should be refuge has become a trap with predators. The tongue-as-sword image continues the thread from Psalms 52 and 55: speech is the deadliest weapon in these psalms.
6. This refrain appears again at verse 12, framing the psalm's second half. It reappears in Psalm 108:6. The prayer for God's glory over 'all the earth' expands the psalm's scope from personal rescue to cosmic reality — David's situation is a small piece of a much larger story.
7. The selah after the reversal creates a pause for the listener to absorb the justice: they dug a pit, and they fell into it. The simplicity of the reversal is its power. No elaborate mechanism is needed — evil defeats itself when God is at work.
8. nakhon from kun ('to establish, to make firm') is the opposite of mot ('to totter, to shake'). David's heart has stopped shaking. This does not mean his circumstances have changed — he is still in the cave, still hunted. But his inner condition has been established by trust.
9. The phrase a'irah shachar ('I will wake the dawn') has been one of the most beloved lines in the Psalter across traditions. It reverses the normal relationship between the singer and the morning: usually dawn wakes the sleeper. Here the worshiper wakes the dawn. Praise creates the conditions for a new day.
10. The scope expands from David alone in a cave to thanksgiving ba-ammim ('among the peoples') and ba-le'ummim ('among the nations'). David's personal praise has universal ambition — what God has done for one fugitive in a cave deserves to be proclaimed to every nation. This verse is quoted in Romans 15:9 as evidence that God's salvation was always intended to reach the Gentiles.

11. The pairing of chesed and emet with heavens and clouds creates a visual image: God's faithful love fills the entire vertical space between earth and the top of the sky. There is nowhere you can be — even in a cave — that God's love has not already reached.
12. The refrain returns unchanged, closing the psalm with the same cosmic vision that punctuated its center. The repetition is liturgical — the congregation would have known this line and joined in. The cave is forgotten; the earth is covered in glory.

Summary: A psalm that indicts corrupt rulers who fail to administer justice, compares them to venomous snakes deaf to the charmer, and calls on God to shatter their power through a series of vivid destruction-images. The psalm concludes with the righteous celebrating when divine justice is vindicated.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is among the most violent in the Psalter, and that violence is not random — it is a cry against systemic injustice from those who have no access to earthly courts of appeal. The six destruction-images in verses 7-10 (broken teeth, vanishing water, blunted arrows, dissolving snails, stillborn children, thorns swept by storm) are not sadistic fantasy but the accumulated fury of people whose only recourse is God. The deaf-adder image (vv. 5-6) is psychologically precise: the corrupt judge is not ignorant of justice — he has stopped his ears against it, like a snake that deliberately refuses to hear the charmer. The corruption is willful, not accidental.

Translation Friction: The opening word elem (v. 2) is notoriously difficult. It could mean 'silence' (are you truly silent when justice is needed?), 'gods' (elim, addressing divine beings of Psalm 82), or 'rulers' (a metonymic use). The WLC reads elem, which most naturally yields 'silence' or 'in silence.' We follow the reading that addresses human rulers who maintain guilty silence when justice demands speech. Verse 11 (Hebrew), where the righteous 'wash their feet in the blood of the wicked,' has troubled readers throughout history. It is imprecatory language that imagines total vindication — the image is victory, not cruelty.

Connections: The corrupt-judge theme connects to Psalm 82, where God judges the 'gods' (rulers) who pervert justice. The deaf-snake imagery has parallels in Egyptian and Mesopotamian wisdom literature about snake-charming. The call for God to break teeth (v. 7) echoes Psalm 3:7. The righteous-rejoicing conclusion connects to the Song of Moses (Exodus 15) and the celebration after Haman's fall (Esther 8). Paul's use of 'snake venom under their lips' in Romans 3:13 draws from this psalm tradition.

¹For the director of music. "Do Not Destroy."

A miktam of David.

²Do you rulers truly speak what is right?

Do you judge the children of humanity with equity?

³No — in your hearts you devise injustice;

on earth your hands weigh out violence.

⁴The wicked go astray from the womb;

they wander off from birth, speaking lies.

⁵Their venom is like the venom of a serpent, like a deaf cobra that stops its ear,

⁶that will not hear the voice of charmers, no matter how skillful the spellbinder.

⁷God, smash their teeth in their mouths!

Tear out the fangs of the young lions, LORD!

⁸Let them vanish like water that flows away;
when they draw the bow, let their arrows be blunted.

⁹Like a snail that dissolves as it goes,
like a woman's stillborn child that never sees the sun.

¹⁰Before your pots feel the heat of thorns, whether green or ablaze — he will sweep them away!

¹¹The righteous will rejoice when they see vindication;
they will wash their feet in the blood of the wicked.

¹²And people will say,
"Yes — there is fruit for the righteous!
Yes — there is a God who judges on earth!"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The al tashchet ('do not destroy') designation continues from Psalm 57, linking these psalms in a thematic cluster. The miktam label connects all six psalms in this group (56-60).
2. The pairing of tsedek ('righteousness') and meisharim ('equity, uprightness') describes the two essential qualities of a just ruler: declaring what is right (tsedek) and applying it fairly to all (meisharim). These rulers have failed at both.
3. The inversion of justice-language for violence is the psalm's key rhetorical strategy. These rulers have not abandoned the forms of justice — they still use scales (tefallesun) — but they have filled the scales with chamas ('violence') instead of mishpat ('justice'). The system looks functional from the outside; the contents have been switched.
4. The language parallels Psalm 51:7 (sinful from conception) but with a different purpose. David in Psalm 51 confessed his own condition in humility; here the psalmist describes the wicked's condition in accusation. me-rechem ('from the womb') and mi-beten ('from the belly/birth') indicate that their crookedness is not a late development but a lifelong orientation. dovrei khazav ('speakers of lies') — their defining characteristic from the start is falsehood.
5. The deaf-cobra image is not about literal snake biology (snakes lack external ears and 'hear' through ground vibrations). It draws on the cultural practice of snake-charming, well attested in Egypt and Mesopotamia. The point is behavioral: this snake has chosen not to respond. The rulers have chosen not to hear.
6. chover chavarim ('binder of spells') uses vocabulary from the realm of incantation and magical practice. The psalm does not endorse magic — it uses the image to make a point about the rulers' impenetrability. Even techniques designed to control the most dangerous creatures fail against willful moral deafness.
7. The teeth-breaking image appears also in Psalm 3:7 ('you strike all my enemies on the jaw; you break the teeth of the wicked'). Teeth represent power — the power to consume, to destroy, to take. Breaking teeth is removing power from those who abuse it.
8. The first of six rapid destruction-images. Water that flows away — poured on desert ground, it simply disappears. The wicked should become as irrecoverable as spilled water. Blunted arrows (yitmolu, 'cut off, blunted') — even when they take hostile action (drawing the bow), their weapons fail.
9. Two more images: the shablul ('snail, slug') that temes yahalokh ('melts as it moves') — the ancient observation that a snail's trail looks like it is dissolving as it travels, leaving less of itself with every step. And the nefel eshet ('miscarriage, stillborn of a woman') that never sees the sun — a life that ends before it begins, that never enters the world of light and action. The stillborn image is harsh but not gratuitous: it describes a threat that never materializes, a potential for harm that is terminated before it can be realized.
10. This verse is among the most textually difficult in the Psalter. The images pile up faster than grammar can organize them. The essential point survives the difficulty: God's intervention is faster than evil's timetable. The storm arrives before the fire finishes its work.
11. naqam ('vindication, vengeance') in Hebrew is not personal revenge but the restoration of violated justice. When God exercises naqam, he is setting right what was wrong. The emotion of the righteous is not bloodlust but the deep satisfaction of seeing justice finally done after prolonged injustice.
12. The plural shofetim ('judging,' plural participle) with the singular Elohim is a known Hebrew construction where a plural form is used with God to express the fullness or intensity of the action. God judges with the combined force of all judges.

12. The psalm began by questioning whether rulers speak righteousness (v. 2); it ends by affirming that God judges righteously (v. 12). The human failure is answered by the divine success.

Summary: A psalm of urgent deliverance, attributed to David when Saul sent men to watch his house in order to kill him.

David pleads for rescue from enemies who prowl like dogs around the city at evening, snarling and howling. Two refrains structure the psalm: 'You, LORD, laugh at them' and 'They return at evening, snarling like dogs, prowling the city.' The psalm moves from desperate plea to triumphant confidence in God as fortress and faithful love.

What Makes This Remarkable: The dog-imagery is the psalm's signature feature (vv. 7, 15). The enemies are not described as warriors or lions but as feral dogs — pack animals that scavenge at the margins of the city after dark. In the ancient Near East, dogs were not pets but despised scavengers associated with filth, disease, and shamelessness. To compare the king's soldiers to prowling dogs is to strip them of all dignity. They serve a paranoid king and do his dirty work at night, like animals foraging in garbage. The double use of this image (vv. 7 and 15) creates a structural refrain that bookends the psalm's center, but with a crucial shift: in verse 7 the dogs are threatening; by verse 15 they are merely pathetic, whimpering and unfed.

Translation Friction: The superscription refers to 1 Samuel 19:11, where Saul sent messengers to David's house to watch it overnight and kill him in the morning. Michal, David's wife, helped him escape through a window. The psalm's reference to 'all the nations' (v. 6, 9) seems broader than a domestic assassination attempt, leading some scholars to see the psalm as adapting a personal crisis into a national liturgy. The shift between singular and plural enemies, and between personal and international scope, may reflect this liturgical expansion.

Connections: The historical setting is 1 Samuel 19:11-17, where Michal lowers David through a window and deceives Saul's men with a household idol in the bed. The dog-pack imagery connects to 1 Kings 14:11, 16:4, and 21:23-24, where dogs eating the dead is the mark of the most dishonorable death. The fortress-language (misgav, 'refuge, high place') connects to Psalm 18:2 and 2 Samuel 22:3. The 'God of my faithful love' (Elohei chasdi) in verse 18 is a remarkable designation found nowhere else in the Psalter.

¹For the director of music. "Do Not Destroy."

A miktam of David, when Saul sent men to watch the house in order to kill him.

²Deliver me from my enemies, my God;
set me safely on high, away from those who rise against me.

³Deliver me from workers of wickedness, and save me from men of blood.

⁴For look — they lie in ambush for my life;
fierce men gather against me.
Not for my rebellion, not for my sin, LORD!

⁵Without guilt on my part they rush and take position.
Wake up to meet me — and see!

⁶And you — LORD God of Armies,
God of Israel —
rouse yourself to punish all the nations!
Show no mercy to any treacherous evildoer.

Selah.

⁷They return at evening,
snarling like dogs,
prowling around the city.

⁸Look what pours from their mouths — swords on their lips!
For they say, "Who is listening?"

⁹But you, LORD — you laugh at them;
you scoff at all the nations.

¹⁰My strength — I watch for you,
for God is my fortress.

¹¹My God of faithful love will come to meet me;
God will let me look in triumph on my enemies.

¹²Do not kill them, or my people will forget.
Scatter them by your power and bring them low,
Lord, our shield.

¹³The sin of their mouths, the words of their lips — let them be caught in their pride!
For the cursing and lies they speak,

¹⁴Consume them in wrath — consume them until they are no more!
Let them know that God rules in Jacob, to the ends of the earth.
Selah.

¹⁵They return at evening,
snarling like dogs,
prowling around the city.

¹⁶They wander about for food;
if they are not satisfied, they howl through the night.

¹⁷But I will sing of your strength;
I will shout for joy at morning of your faithful love.
For you have been my fortress,
a refuge in the day of my distress.

¹⁸My strength — to you I will sing,
for God is my fortress,
my God of faithful love.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The third consecutive al tashchet ('do not destroy') psalm. The superscription specifies the crisis: Saul dispatched agents to surveil David's house overnight, planning to execute him at dawn (1 Samuel 19:11). The verb shamar ('to watch, to guard') — normally a positive word (God as guardian) — is here inverted: the watchers are predators, not protectors.
2. tesaggeveni ('set me on high, make me inaccessibly high') from sagav — to be high, to be exalted beyond reach. David asks not just for rescue but for elevation — to be placed somewhere his enemies cannot reach. The misgav ('high refuge') language that will define this psalm begins here.
3. po'alei aven ('workers of wickedness') — the same phrase from Psalm 53:5. anshei damim ('men of blood') — those whose hands are stained with bloodshed, the same phrase from Psalm 55:24. The vocabulary recycling across this psalm cluster creates a coherent picture of the enemies David faces.
4. David declares his innocence using two of the three sin-words from Psalm 51: pesha ('rebellion') and chattat ('sin'). He is not claiming perfection — he is asserting that his enemies' hostility has no just cause. Their attack is not punishment for wrongdoing but unprovoked aggression against an innocent man. The protest lo pish'i ve-lo chattati ('not my rebellion and not my sin') is a legal defense before the divine judge.
5. The enemies yerutsun ('run, rush') and yikkonanu ('prepare themselves, take position') — military language for taking battle stations. And they do this beli avon ('without guilt') — David has given them no cause. The imperative urah ('wake up!') is bold — David speaks to God as though God is sleeping through the crisis. This is not irreverence but desperation.
6. The expansion to 'all the nations' may reflect liturgical adaptation — what began as David's personal crisis became a prayer for God's cosmic justice. Alternatively, David may be placing his personal enemies within the larger framework of all who oppose God's purposes.
7. The evening timing connects to the superscription — Saul's men watched David's house overnight (1 Samuel 19:11). The dogs that prowl at dusk are these same watchers, waiting for dawn to make their kill. Michal's intervention (lowering David through the window) happened during the night these dogs were circling.
8. yabbiun ('they pour out, they gush, they belch') — their mouths overflow with violent speech. charavot be-siftotehem ('swords on their lips') — the sword-tongue image from Psalm 57:5 continues. Their confidence is grounded in the assumption mi shomea ('who is listening?') — practical atheism again (cf. Psalm 53:2). They believe no one — not God, not a higher authority — hears or cares what they say.
9. The divine laughter motif (Psalms 2:4, 37:13, 59:9) is one of the most striking anthropomorphisms in the Hebrew Bible. It expresses not emotional amusement but the absolute sovereignty of God over all human scheming. The enemies' self-importance is comic when viewed from God's throne.
10. The Qere reading is uzzu ('my strength') rather than uzzo ('his strength'). David addresses God as his strength and watches (eshmorah) for him — the same verb (shamar, 'to watch') that described the enemies watching his house in the superscription. They watch to kill; David watches for God. misgabbi ('my fortress, my high refuge') — the key word of the psalm, repeated in verses 10, 17, and 18.
11. Elohei chasdi is a hapax-level construction — the possessive 'my faithful love' applied to God creates a unique intimacy. God is not just characterized by chesed in general but is bound to David by a specific, personal, covenantal faithful love.
12. This verse contains sophisticated theological reasoning about the purpose of divine judgment. Total destruction erases evidence; prolonged diminishment provides ongoing testimony. David wants his people to see the consequences play out over time so that the lesson becomes unforgettable.
13. The mouth-sin catalogue continues: chattat pimo ('the sin of their mouths'), devar sefateimo ('the word of their lips'), ge'onam ('their pride'), alah ('cursing, oath-breaking'), and kachash ('lies, denial'). The trap-vocabulary from Psalm 57:7 recurs: yillakhedu ('let them be caught') — their own words will become the net that ensnares them.
14. The doubled kalleh ('consume, finish off') intensifies the plea. But the purpose is not destruction for its own sake — it is revelation: ve-yed'u ('and let them know'). The goal of judgment is knowledge: ki Elohim moshel be-Ya'aqov ('that God rules in Jacob'). The scope: le-afsei ha-arets ('to the ends of the earth'). God's rule over Jacob (Israel) has universal implications — what he does for his covenant people declares his sovereignty everywhere.
15. The structural repetition of the refrain (vv. 7 and 15) is a deliberate literary technique. The listener hears the same words but understands them differently because of everything that has happened between the two occurrences. This is how trust transforms perception without changing circumstances.
16. The dogs are now scavengers — yenu'u le-ekhol ('they wander for food'), searching for scraps. The mighty soldiers have become hungry strays. im lo yisbe'u vayyalinu ('if they are not satisfied, they spend the night howling') — unsatisfied dogs whimpering in the dark. The transformation from threatening to pathetic is complete.
17. The morning-singing in contrast to evening-prowling creates the psalm's final structural pair: darkness/light, dogs/singer, snarling/praise. David has survived the night. The dawn that Psalm 57:9 promised to wake is here.
18. The inclusio between verses 10 and 18 (both using uzzu, 'my strength,' and misgabbi, 'my fortress') closes the psalm in a ring structure. Everything between the two statements — the dogs, the laughter, the scattering, the consuming — is enclosed within the frame of 'God is my fortress.' The frame holds.

Summary: A national lament following military defeat, attributed to David's wars against Aram and Edom. The psalm begins with anguished complaint that God has rejected and broken his people, then transitions into a divine oracle in which God claims sovereignty over the entire land, and concludes with renewed trust that God will grant victory despite apparent abandonment.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm contains one of the most striking divine speeches in the Psalter (vv. 8-10). God speaks from his sanctuary and divides the land like a general assigning territory: Shechem, Succoth, Gilead, Manasseh, Ephraim, Judah, Moab, Edom, Philistia — all are his to distribute. The language is deliberately domestic and even humorous: Moab is God's washbasin, over Edom he flings his sandal, and Philistia is told to shout in submission. The imagery reduces Israel's most feared enemies to household objects and servants. God is not intimidated by geopolitics; he treats international powers the way a householder treats his washbasin and his shoes. The theological audacity is breathtaking — and it comes in a psalm of defeat, when the evidence points in the opposite direction.

Translation Friction: The superscription is one of the longest and most historically detailed in the Psalter, connecting the psalm to David's campaigns in 2 Samuel 8 and 1 Chronicles 18. The military details do not perfectly align with the biblical narratives, suggesting either a different tradition or a composite historical reference. The phrase shushan edut ('lily of testimony') may be a melody name or a reference to a specific liturgical occasion. Verses 7-14 (Hebrew) are reused almost verbatim in Psalm 108:7-14, confirming that psalm sections circulated as independent units.

Connections: The military background connects to 2 Samuel 8:1-14 (David's victories over Moab, Aram, and Edom) and 2 Samuel 10 (the Aramean wars). The divine oracle dividing the land echoes the territorial allocations of Joshua 13-21. Psalm 108:7-14 reuses the oracle and concluding verses. The 'wine of staggering' image (v. 5) appears in Isaiah 51:17, 22 and Jeremiah 25:15. The fortified city (v. 11) likely refers to the Edomite stronghold of Bozrah or Sela (Petra).

¹For the director of music. According to "Lily of Testimony."

A miktam of David, for instruction.

²When he fought against Aram-Naharaim and Aram-Zobah, and Joab returned and struck down Edom in the Valley of Salt — twelve thousand.

³God, you have rejected us, broken through our lines;
you were angry — restore us!

⁴You have shaken the land and split it open;
heal its fractures, for it totters.

⁵You have shown your people harsh things;
you have made us drink wine that staggers.

⁶You have given those who fear you a banner to rally around, because of truth.
Selah.

⁷So that your beloved ones may be rescued,
save with your right hand and answer me!

⁸God has spoken in his sanctuary:
 "I will triumph! I will divide up Shechem and measure out the Valley of Succoth.

⁹Gilead is mine, and Manasseh is mine;
 Ephraim is my helmet,
 Judah is my scepter.

¹⁰Moab is my washbasin;
 over Edom I fling my sandal.
 Shout in submission, Philistia!"

¹¹Who will bring me to the fortified city?
 Who will lead me to Edom?

¹²Have you not rejected us, God?
 You do not march out with our armies, God.

¹³Give us help against the enemy, for human salvation is worthless.

¹⁴With God we will act with valor, and he himself will trample our enemies.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. shushan edut ('lily of testimony') is unique to this psalm and Psalm 80 (where the plural shoshannim edut appears). Whether this names a melody, a musical instrument, or a liturgical season is unknown. The word lelammedh ('for instruction, to teach') indicates the psalm was intended as a teaching tool — the congregation was meant to learn something from it, not merely sing it.
2. The superscription provides the military context: simultaneous campaigns against the Aramean kingdoms to the northeast (Aram-Naharaim, 'Aram of the Two Rivers,' upper Mesopotamia; Aram-Zobah, a kingdom in modern Lebanon/Syria) and Edom to the southeast. Joab's strike against Edom in the Valley of Salt (south of the Dead Sea) killed 12,000. The text of 2 Samuel 8:13 credits David with 18,000 Edomites; the discrepancy may reflect different battle counts from the same campaign.
3. The raw honesty of blaming God for military defeat is characteristic of Israelite lament. The psalms do not protect God from accusation — they bring the accusation directly to God because God is the only one who can reverse the situation. Complaint is an act of faith: you only accuse someone you believe has the power to change things.
4. The land-as-body metaphor — shaken, broken, needing healing — connects to the prophetic tradition where the land suffers for the people's sin or flourishes with their faithfulness (Hosea 4:1-3, Isaiah 24:4-6). The land is not just territory but a participant in the covenant relationship.
5. The wine-of-staggering image is part of a broader biblical tradition of the 'cup of God's wrath' — a metaphor where divine judgment is figured as an intoxicating drink that the recipient must consume. The image will reach its fullest development in Revelation 14:10 and 16:19.
6. The nes ('banner') will become a messianic image in Isaiah 11:10, 12 ('he will raise a banner for the nations'). In this context it is a military signal — the point of hope around which the scattered can regroup.
7. yedidekha ('your beloved ones') from yadid ('beloved, dear one') — the same root in the name Jedidiah, the name God gave Solomon through Nathan (2 Samuel 12:25). Israel is identified as God's beloved — the relationship is not contractual but affectional. The right hand (yamin) is the hand of power and action throughout the Hebrew Bible.
8. The oracle (vv. 8-10) is one of the few places in the Psalms where God speaks directly in first person. The format resembles a prophetic oracle delivered in a worship setting — possibly by a priest or prophet during a liturgy of lament. The claim of sovereignty over specific territories gives the oracle concrete, geographic content.
9. mechoqeq ('lawgiver, commander's staff, scepter') connects to Jacob's blessing of Judah in Genesis 49:10 ('the scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet'). God's designation of Judah as 'my scepter' confirms the Davidic royal line as God's chosen instrument of governance.

10. The domestic imagery is deliberately humiliating to Israel's enemies and deliberately comforting to Israel. In a psalm of military defeat, God's oracle declares that the enemies who seem so powerful are, from God's perspective, household objects. The humor is theological: panic about geopolitics is disproportionate when God treats your enemies as his washbasin.
10. The sandal-over-Edom gesture may also allude to the master-servant relationship: in ancient custom, a servant's job was to carry the master's sandals. God flings his sandal over Edom, treating it as his servant.
11. The fortified city of Edom was likely Sela (later Petra), a city carved into sandstone cliffs that was nearly impregnable by ancient military standards. The question 'who will bring me there?' is not rhetorical — it is a genuine military problem. Only God can crack that fortress.
12. The honesty of this verse is remarkable in a liturgical text. The psalm does not pretend things are fine. God's absence from the battlefield is stated as fact, not questioned as possibility. The psalm holds together divine sovereignty (God rules all nations in the oracle) and present divine absence (God does not march with the army). Both are true at the same time.
13. teshu'at adam ('human salvation') is dismissed with the strongest possible term. shav does not mean 'second-best' or 'partial' — it means empty, nothing, vapor. Human help is not a lesser option; it is no option at all when God is the one who determines the outcome.
14. The psalm's theological arc is complete: defeat (vv. 3-5) rallying point (v. 6) divine oracle of sovereignty (vv. 8-10) honest acknowledgment of present weakness (vv. 11-13) trust in God's future action (v. 14). The trajectory is not from despair to resolution but from despair to trust. The fortified city of Edom remains unconquered. But God has spoken, and that is enough.

Summary: Psalm 61 is a prayer of longing from a place of distance and emotional exhaustion. The psalmist cries out to God from the 'end of the earth' — a phrase expressing not geography but the feeling of being at the furthest point from safety. He asks to be led to a rock too high for him to reach on his own, acknowledging that God has been his refuge and strong tower. The psalm then shifts to prayers for the king's life and reign, asking that faithful love and truth guard him. It closes with a vow of perpetual praise.

What Makes This Remarkable: The image of a rock 'higher than I' is theologically precise — the psalmist does not ask to climb to safety by his own effort but to be led there by God. The refuge is real but inaccessible without divine help. The shift from personal lament to royal prayer suggests either a king praying about himself in the third person or a worshiper whose personal security is bound up with the king's welfare. The tent and wings imagery collapses the distance between the earthly tabernacle and the protective presence of God.

Translation Friction: The superscription attributes this psalm to David with stringed instruments (neginot). The phrase 'from the end of the earth' has been debated — does it reflect literal exile, a military campaign far from Jerusalem, or metaphorical despair? The royal petition in verses 7-8 raises questions about whether this is a personal psalm repurposed for liturgical use or originally composed for royal worship. The Hebrew of verse 3 is ambiguous: 'when my heart is faint' could also be rendered 'when my heart is wrapped, overwhelmed.'

Connections: The 'rock higher than I' connects to the repeated Old Testament image of God as rock (Deuteronomy 32:4, 2 Samuel 22:2-3, Psalm 18:2). The tent of God's presence echoes the tabernacle tradition and looks forward to the promise that God will shelter his people (Psalm 91:1-4). The vow of daily praise anticipates the theology of perpetual worship developed in later psalms and in Revelation 4-5.

¹For the director of music. On stringed instruments. Of David.

²Hear my cry, God;
pay attention to my prayer.

³From the far edge of the land I call out to you when my heart is overwhelmed — lead me to the rock that towers above me.

⁴For you have been my refuge,
a strong tower against the enemy.

⁵Let me dwell in your tent forever;
let me take shelter in the hiding place of your wings. Selah.

⁶For you, God, have heard my vows;
you have granted the inheritance of those who revere your name.

⁷Add days upon the king's days;
let his years span generation after generation.

⁸May he sit enthroned before God forever;
appoint faithful love and truth to guard him.

⁹Then I will make music to your name forever, fulfilling my vows day after day.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription lam-natseach ('for the director, for the one who leads') assigns this psalm to liturgical performance. Neginot refers to stringed instruments, suggesting an accompanied setting.
2. The word rinnah ('cry, ringing cry') denotes a loud, urgent vocalization — not a whisper but a shout of distress. The parallel verb haqshivah ('give ear, pay attention') intensifies the plea.
3. The verb ba-atof ('when it is faint, when it is wrapped over, overwhelmed') describes a heart that is collapsing inward under the weight of distress. The rock (tsur) is one of the primary divine metaphors in the Psalter — solid, immovable, and elevated beyond human reach.
4. The word machseh ('refuge, shelter') conveys protection from storm and danger. The 'strong tower' (migdal oz) is a military image — a fortified tower from which one can withstand siege. Together these images ground the psalmist's future hope in past experience of God's protection.
5. The verb agurah ('let me sojourn, let me dwell as a guest') carries the nuance of being welcomed into someone else's space — the psalmist does not claim ownership of God's tent but asks to be received as a guest. Selah marks a musical or liturgical pause.
6. The 'vows' (nedaray) indicate the psalmist has made formal commitments to God, likely vows of praise in exchange for deliverance. The 'inheritance' (yerushat) of those who fear God's name is the shared portion of the faithful — belonging to God's people and participating in his promises.
7. The petition shifts to the king. The request for long life (yamim al yemey melekh toshif) is standard royal prayer language in the ancient Near East. 'Generation after generation' (kemo dor va-dor) is hyperbolic, expressing a wish for dynastic continuity rather than literal immortality.
8. The verb yeshev ('let him sit, let him dwell') can mean both 'dwell' and 'sit enthroned.' The verb man yintseruhu is difficult — man is likely an imperative 'appoint' or 'assign,' asking God to station chesed and emet as the king's personal guard.
9. The psalm closes with a commitment to perpetual praise — azammerah ('I will make music, sing praise') and the daily fulfillment of vows (yom yom, 'day by day'). The vow structure is complete: the psalmist made promises to God, God heard them, and now the psalmist commits to keeping them through ongoing worship.

Summary: Psalm 62 is a meditation on waiting silently for God alone. The psalmist declares that his soul rests in silence before God, who is his rock, salvation, and fortress. Enemies plot to bring him down from his high position, using flattery and hidden curses. Yet twice the psalmist returns to the refrain of silent trust. He warns against trusting in oppression, robbery, or wealth, and closes with a double declaration: power belongs to God, and faithful love belongs to God, and God repays each person according to what they have done.

What Makes This Remarkable: The word ak ('surely, only, alone') appears six times in this psalm, giving it a distinctive theological rhythm. Each occurrence narrows the field of trust until God is the only thing left standing. The two refrains (verses 2-3 and 6-7) are nearly identical but with a crucial shift: in verse 2 'I will not be greatly shaken,' in verse 6 'I will not be shaken' — the qualifier is removed. Silence before God deepens into more complete confidence. The final two verses deliver the psalm's theology in concentrated form: God possesses both oz (power, strength) and chesed (faithful love). These are not in tension but held together in one being.

Translation Friction: The superscription assigns this to David with the notation al Yedutun, likely indicating a musical tradition or choir associated with Jeduthun (one of David's three chief musicians). The identity of the enemies in verses 4-5 is unspecified — they use blessing as a cover for cursing, which suggests political rather than military opposition. The meaning of 'silence' (dumiyyah) has been debated: is it passive waiting, active stillness, or a deliberate refusal to seek human help? The psalm seems to intend all three. The weighing metaphor in verse 10 (men are lighter than a breath on the scales) echoes wisdom traditions and anticipates the Egyptian imagery of judgment scales.

Connections: The 'rock' and 'fortress' language connects to David's earlier experiences in the wilderness (1 Samuel 23-24, Psalm 18). The warning against trusting riches anticipates Jesus' teaching about wealth (Matthew 6:19-21, Luke 12:13-21). The declaration that God repays each person according to their deeds appears in Proverbs 24:12, Jeremiah 17:10, and Romans 2:6. Paul's quotation shows this psalm's theology reaching into the New Testament understanding of divine justice.

¹For the director of music. According to Jeduthun. A psalm of David.

²My soul waits in silence for God alone;
from him comes my deliverance.

³He alone is my rock and my deliverance, my high fortress — I will not be greatly shaken.

⁴How long will all of you attack a man?
You will be crushed —
all of you — like a leaning wall, like a fence about to collapse.

⁵They scheme only to bring him down from his position;
they take pleasure in deception.
With their mouths they bless,
but inside they curse. Selah.

⁶My soul, wait in silence for God alone,
for my hope comes from him.

⁷He alone is my rock and my deliverance, my high fortress — I will not be shaken.

⁸On God rest my deliverance and my glory;
my mighty rock, my refuge, is in God.

⁹pour out your hearts before him.
Trust in him at all times, you people;
God is a refuge for us. Selah.

¹⁰Common people are only a breath;
important people are a lie.
Placed on scales, together they rise — they weigh less than a breath.

¹¹Do not trust in extortion;
do not put empty hope in robbery.
If wealth increases,
do not set your heart on it.

¹²One thing God has spoken;
two things I have heard:
that power belongs to God,

¹³and that faithful love belongs to you, Lord, for you repay each person
according to what they have done.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Jeduthun (Yedutun) was one of three chief musicians appointed by David (1 Chronicles 25:1-3). The notation 'according to Jeduthun' likely indicates a musical style, tune, or performance tradition associated with his guild.
2. The word dumiyyah is related to the verb damam ('be silent, be still'). It appears in Psalm 65:2 as well: 'To you silence is praise.' Here it describes the inner posture of the soul before God — waiting without agitation, complaint, or frantic searching for alternatives.
3. The qualifier rabbah ('greatly') is significant — the psalmist acknowledges he may be shaken but not overwhelmed. This honest admission is removed in the second refrain (verse 7), suggesting that the act of meditating on God's sufficiency has deepened the psalmist's confidence.
4. The verb tehotetu ('you set upon, you rush against, you assault') describes a coordinated attack against a single person. The images of a leaning wall (qir natuy) and a tottering fence (gader ha-dechuyah) are applied to the attackers themselves — they think they are strong, but they are structurally unsound and about to fall.
5. The word mis-seto ('from his elevation, from his dignity') suggests the target holds a position of honor that the conspirators want to dismantle. The contrast between outward blessing and inward cursing (be-fiv yevarekhu u-ve-qirbam yeqalelu) describes political duplicity — flattery as a weapon.
6. The second refrain shifts from declaration ('my soul waits') to self-command ('my soul, wait!'). The psalmist is preaching to himself, redirecting his own attention back to God after describing the threat of his enemies. The word tiqvah ('hope, expectation') replaces yeshuah ('deliverance') from verse 2, broadening the scope from immediate rescue to comprehensive expectation.
7. The critical difference from verse 3: the word rabbah ('greatly') is removed. In verse 3, 'I will not be greatly shaken.' Here, 'I will not be shaken' — period. The qualifier has been stripped away. The act of silent waiting before God has produced deeper confidence.
8. The psalmist now claims that even his kavod ('glory, honor, weight') depends on God. This is a striking admission for someone under attack — his social standing, his reputation, his significance are not self-generated but God-given. The stacking of titles (rock of strength, refuge) emphasizes comprehensive dependence.
9. The psalm shifts from personal meditation to public exhortation. The verb shifkhu ('pour out') is vivid — it is the verb used for pouring out water or blood. The heart is to be emptied before God completely, holding nothing back. This communal instruction (am, 'people') transforms private trust into shared worship.
10. The distinction between bney adam and bney ish is social — the first refers to ordinary people, the second to people of rank or importance. The scales (moznayim) are a weighing instrument associated with justice and evaluation. The verb la-alot ('to go up') means they rise on the scale because they are so light — less than hevel, less than breath.
11. Three prohibitions in sequence: do not trust oppression (osheq), do not find significance in robbery (gazel), and do not attach your heart to increasing wealth (chayil). The verb tehbalu ('become empty, become vain') shares the same root as hevel — trusting in robbery makes a person as insubstantial as the breath described in the previous verse.
12. The 'one... two' formula (achat... shtayim) is a Hebrew numerical pattern used in wisdom literature (Proverbs 30:15, 18, 21) to introduce a definitive statement. God's single utterance contains a double truth: power and faithful love. The division of the single speech into two heard truths happens in the listener's understanding — God speaks unity; we perceive aspects.

13. The word chesed ('faithful love') is the psalm's final key term, paired with oz ('power') from the previous verse. The verb teshallem ('you repay, you complete, you render') implies that God brings each person's actions to their appropriate conclusion. This is not cold retribution but the faithful outworking of a God who is both strong and loving.

Summary: Psalm 63 is one of the most intensely personal expressions of desire for God in the entire Psalter. Set in a dry and waterless wilderness, the psalmist's body itself thirsts and yearns for God the way parched land craves rain. He recalls beholding God's power and glory in the sanctuary, declares that God's faithful love is better than life, and resolves to praise God with lifted hands. In the night watches he meditates on God and finds satisfaction as rich as a feast. The psalm closes with confidence that those who seek his life will be destroyed, while the king will rejoice in God.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening line 'My soul thirsts for you' stands as one of the defining statements of biblical spirituality. What makes it remarkable is that thirst is involuntary — the psalmist is not choosing to want God; he cannot stop wanting God. The body language of the psalm is extraordinary: flesh faints, lips praise, hands lift, the soul clings, God's right hand holds. The entire person — body and spirit — is engaged in this desire. The statement that God's faithful love is 'better than life' is among the most radical value claims in Scripture. It does not say God's love makes life better; it says God's love outranks life itself.

Translation Friction: The superscription places this psalm in the wilderness of Judah, traditionally connected to David's flight from Saul (1 Samuel 23-24) or from Absalom (2 Samuel 15-17). The wilderness setting may be literal or metaphorical — any experience of God's absence feels like a desert. The mention of the king in verse 12 has led some scholars to identify this as a royal psalm, though others see it as a later addition. The violent imagery of verses 10-11 (enemies given to the sword, becoming food for jackals) contrasts sharply with the intimate devotion of the earlier verses, but the contrast is intentional: the one who clings to God with such intensity also expects God to deal decisively with those who threaten his life.

Connections: The thirst imagery connects to Psalm 42:1-2 ('As a deer pants for streams of water, so my soul pants for you, God') and to Jesus' words at the feast: 'If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink' (John 7:37). The wilderness setting echoes Israel's desert experience where God provided water from the rock (Exodus 17, Numbers 20). The phrase 'your right hand upholds me' anticipates Isaiah 41:10 ('I will uphold you with my righteous right hand'). Early Christians adopted this psalm for morning prayer because of the phrase 'early I seek you' (shachar, dawn).

²God — you are my God; at dawn I search for you.

My soul thirsts for you;
my flesh yearns for you in a dry and exhausted land where there is no water.

³So I have gazed on you in the sanctuary, beholding your power and your glory.

⁴Because your faithful love is better than life,
my lips will praise you.

⁵So I will bless you as long as I live;
in your name I will lift up my hands.

⁶My soul will be satisfied as with rich food and fat;
my mouth will praise you with joyful lips.

⁷When I remember you on my bed,
I meditate on you through the night watches.

⁸For you have been my help, and in the shadow of your wings I sing for joy.

⁹My soul clings to you;
your right hand holds me up.

¹⁰But those who seek my life to destroy it will go down into the depths of the earth.

¹¹They will be poured out by the power of the sword;
they will become food for jackals.

¹²But the king will rejoice in God;
everyone who swears by him will celebrate,
for the mouth of liars will be shut.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription anchors this psalm to a specific setting — the midbar Yehudah, the arid wasteland east of the Judean hill country descending toward the Dead Sea. This landscape provides the controlling metaphor for the entire psalm: spiritual longing described through physical desolation.
2. The verb kamah ('yearns, faints, longs') is rare in the Hebrew Bible (appearing only here and in Psalm 84:3). It describes a physical craving so intense that the body weakens. The phrase be-erets tsiyyah ve-ayef beli mayim ('in a land of dryness and exhaustion without water') layers three deprivation terms: dryness, exhaustion, waterlessness.
3. The word ken ('so, thus, in this way') connects the wilderness longing to a prior experience in the sanctuary — the psalmist has seen God's power (oz) and glory (kavod) in the temple, and now in the desert he craves that experience again. The verb chazitikha ('I have gazed at you, beheld you') suggests a visionary encounter, not casual observation.
4. The comparative ki tov chasdekha me-chayyim ('because your faithful love is better than life') uses the simple comparative structure: your chesed exceeds life. The plural chayyim ('lives, life') intensifies the claim — not just one life but life in its fullness is outranked by God's covenant love.
5. The posture of lifted hands (essa khappay) is the standard gesture of prayer and worship in ancient Israel — open palms raised toward heaven, simultaneously an act of vulnerability and reception. The commitment be-chayyay ('in my life, while I live') makes praise a lifelong practice.
6. The comparison to chelev va-deshen ('fat and richness') uses the language of the finest portion of a sacrificial meal — the fat was considered the choicest part, reserved for God in the Levitical system. The psalmist experiences God's presence as a feast that fills the deepest hunger. The phrase siftey renanot ('lips of joyful shouts') combines the mouth's two functions: eating and singing.
7. The ashmurot ('watches') were the divisions of the night — the Israelites divided the night into three watches. The verb ehgeh ('I meditate, I murmur') is the same word used in Psalm 1:2 for meditating on Torah. Here the object of meditation is God himself. The bed (yetsu'ay, 'my couch') is the place of vulnerability and honesty, where pretense falls away.
8. The 'shadow of your wings' (betsel kenafekha) appears repeatedly in the Psalms (17:8, 36:8, 57:2, 61:5) as an image of intimate divine protection. The verb aranen ('I sing for joy, I shout with delight') expresses unrestrained gladness — not quiet contentment but vocal celebration.
9. The verb davaq is one of the strongest attachment words in Hebrew. It appears in Deuteronomy as a command to 'cling to the LORD your God' (Deuteronomy 10:20, 11:22, 13:5). The right hand (yamin) symbolizes strength, favor, and active intervention throughout the Hebrew Bible.
10. The phrase le-shoah yevaqshu nafshi ('they seek my soul/life for destruction') identifies enemies who want not just defeat but annihilation. The 'depths of the earth' (tachtiyyot ha-arets) refers to Sheol, the realm of the dead — those who pursue the psalmist's death will find death themselves.
11. The verb yagiruhu ('they will pour him out') uses the imagery of blood being poured out. The shu'alim ('foxes' or more likely 'jackals') were scavengers that fed on the unburied dead — to become food for jackals meant dying without proper burial, the ultimate disgrace in the ancient Near East.

12. The king's rejoicing connects this personal psalm to the royal sphere. The phrase 'everyone who swears by him' (kol ha-nishba bo) could refer to those who swear by God or those who swear allegiance to the king. The silencing of liars (yissaker pi dovrey shaqer) provides closure — deceptive speech, the weapon of the psalmist's enemies, will finally be stopped.

Summary: Psalm 64 is a prayer against enemies whose primary weapon is speech. The psalmist asks God to protect his life from the conspiracy of evildoers who sharpen their tongues like swords and aim bitter words like arrows at the blameless. They encourage each other in evil, lay secret traps, and say 'Who can see us?' The psalm pivots dramatically: God shoots his own arrow at them suddenly, and they stumble over their own tongues. All who see it take notice and declare what God has done. The righteous rejoice and take refuge in the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm operates on a precise reversal structure. The enemies sharpen their tongues; God shoots an arrow. The enemies attack suddenly (pit'om, verse 5); God strikes suddenly (pit'om, verse 8). The enemies aim at the blameless; God aims at the enemies. Their tongues were their weapon, and their tongues become their downfall. The question 'Who can see us?' assumes invisibility before God, and the answer comes not as an argument but as an act — God sees and strikes. The structural symmetry is itself the theological argument: what you do will be done to you.

Translation Friction: The superscription simply attributes this to David as 'a psalm' without a specific historical setting. The identity of the enemies is kept general — they are characterized entirely by their speech acts (plotting, sharpening tongues, aiming bitter words, encouraging each other in evil, hiding traps). This generality has made the psalm applicable to many situations of slander and conspiracy throughout Jewish and Christian history. The verb in verse 9 (va-yakkidu) has been translated 'they will make him stumble' or 'they wag [the head]' — the uncertainty affects whether the subject is God causing them to stumble or onlookers shaking their heads.

Connections: The image of the tongue as a sword appears throughout wisdom literature (Proverbs 12:18, 25:18) and in James 3:1-12. The sudden reversal of the wicked echoes Proverbs 26:27 ('Whoever digs a pit will fall into it'). The question 'Who can see us?' connects to Psalm 10:11 and 94:7, where the wicked assume God is absent or inattentive — a recurring challenge that the Psalms consistently refute.

¹For the director of music. A psalm of David.

²Hear my voice, God, in my complaint;
preserve my life from the dread of the enemy.

³Hide me from the conspiracy of those who do evil, from the noisy mob of wrongdoers.

⁴They sharpen their tongues like swords;
they aim their arrows — bitter words —

⁵to shoot from hiding at the blameless.
Suddenly they shoot, and they do not fear.

⁶They strengthen each other in an evil plan;
they talk about hiding their traps.
They say, "Who can see us?"

⁷They devise injustice after injustice;
they complete their carefully searched-out scheme.
The inner mind and heart of a person run deep.

⁸But God shoots an arrow at them — suddenly their wounds appear.

⁹Their own tongue is turned against them;
all who see them shake their heads.

¹⁰Then all people stand in awe and declare what God has done;
they understand his work.

¹¹The righteous one rejoices in the LORD and takes refuge in him;
all the upright in heart celebrate.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. A standard superscription assigning authorship and liturgical direction.
2. The word siychi ('my complaint, my meditation, my concern') indicates troubled reflection — the psalmist is bringing his anxiety to God. The phrase mi-pachad oyev ('from the fear/dread of the enemy') asks for protection not only from the enemy but from the paralyzing fear that the enemy produces.
3. The word sod ('secret counsel, conspiracy, intimate council') suggests coordinated plotting rather than random hostility. The word rigshah ('turmoil, noisy crowd, commotion') describes the agitated energy of a mob — evil is both secret in its planning and loud in its execution.
4. The tongue-as-sword and word-as-arrow metaphors compress violence into speech. The verb shanenu ('they sharpen, they whet') is the same verb used for sharpening a blade. The verb darkhu ('they tread, they bend') refers to stepping on a bow to string it — preparing for attack. The 'arrow' is then identified: davar mar ('a bitter word').
5. The blameless person (tam) is ambushed from concealment (ba-mistarim). The word pit'om ('suddenly') will reappear in verse 8 when God returns the sudden strike. The phrase ve-lo yira'u ('and they do not fear') indicates the attackers feel no accountability — they believe they act unseen.
6. The question mi yireh lamo is the theological heart of the enemies' error. They assume their secrecy is absolute. The psalm will demonstrate that God's vision penetrates every hiding place.
7. The verse is textually difficult. The verb yachpesu ('they search out, they devise') and the noun chefes ('search, scheme') emphasize the thoroughness of the conspiracy — this is not impulsive evil but researched, deliberate plotting. The closing line (ve-qerev ish ve-lev ameq, 'and the inner part of a person and the heart is deep') may be the psalmist's observation that human scheming is unfathomable — but not to God.
8. The repetition of pit'om ('suddenly') in both verse 5 and verse 8 creates the psalm's structural hinge. What the wicked did to others, God does to them, using the same speed and the same element of surprise.
9. The tongue (lashon), which was the enemies' primary weapon (verse 4), now becomes the instrument of their downfall. The verb yitnodedu ('they shake, they wag, they flee') describes the reaction of onlookers — either shaking their heads in amazement or recoiling from the spectacle of divine judgment.
10. The verb va-yir'u ('they fear, they stand in awe') answers the enemies' claim 'Who can see us?' (verse 6). The answer: everyone sees, and everyone understands. The verb hiskilu ('they understand, they act with insight') indicates this is not mere observation but comprehension — the witnesses grasp the meaning of what God has done.
11. The psalm closes with three responses: joy (yismach), refuge (chasah), and celebration (yithallelu). The phrase yishrey lev ('upright of heart') describes those whose inner orientation is straight — the opposite of the 'deep heart' of the schemers in verse 7. Integrity of heart leads to joy; depth of scheming leads to ruin.

Summary: Psalm 65 is a hymn of praise to the God who answers prayer, forgives transgression, and saturates the earth with abundance. It moves through three zones of divine activity: the temple (where praise waits and vows are fulfilled), the cosmic arena (where God stills the roaring seas and silences the tumult of nations), and the agricultural landscape (where God waters the furrows, softens the soil with rain, and crowns the year with goodness so that even the wilderness pastures drip and the hills wrap themselves in joy). The psalm is an integrated vision of God's work from altar to field.

What Makes This Remarkable: The progression from temple to creation to harvest makes this psalm a comprehensive theology of divine provision. God does not merely rule from a distance — he works the soil. The image in verse 10 of God 'visiting the earth and saturating it' uses agricultural language for divine attention: God tends the world the way a farmer tends a field. The closing images are extraordinary: wagon tracks drip with abundance, pastures are clothed with flocks, and valleys are covered with grain so thick they 'shout for joy and sing.' The entire landscape becomes a congregation.

Translation Friction: The superscription identifies this as a psalm and song of David. Some scholars date it later based on the reference to the temple ('your courts,' verse 5) and the harvest thanksgiving theme. The Hebrew of verse 2 is debated: 'Praise waits silently for you' (dumiyyah tehillah) is an unusual construction — silence as a form of praise. Verse 4 may refer to election ('blessed is the one you choose and bring near') in a priestly or more general sense. The agricultural imagery of verses 10-14 is so specific that some scholars read this as a response to a particular abundant harvest rather than a general thanksgiving.

Connections: The forgiveness of transgressions (verse 4) connects to the Day of Atonement traditions (Leviticus 16). The stilling of the seas (verse 8) echoes the creation narrative (Genesis 1:9-10) and the crossing of the Red Sea (Exodus 14-15). The vision of the earth producing abundance through divine watering anticipates Isaiah's vision of the desert blooming (Isaiah 35) and the new creation imagery of Revelation 22. Jesus' parable of the sower (Matthew 13) assumes this same theology of God-given agricultural abundance.

¹For the director of music. A psalm of David. A song.

²Praise waits silently for you, God, in Zion, and to you the vow will be fulfilled.

³You who hear prayer —
to you all flesh will come.

⁴When the weight of wrongdoing overpowers me,
you cover over our rebellions.

⁵Blessed is the one you choose and bring near to dwell in your courts.
We will be satisfied with the goodness of your house,
the holiness of your temple.

⁶With awesome deeds of righteousness you answer us,
God of our deliverance, you who are the confidence of all the far ends of the earth and the distant seas.

⁷He sets the mountains in place by his power, girded with strength.

⁸He stills the roaring of the seas,
the roaring of their waves,
and the uproar of the nations.

⁹Those who live at the farthest edges stand in awe at your signs;
you make the gateways of morning and evening shout for joy.

¹⁰You visit the earth and saturate it;
you enrich it abundantly.
The stream of God is full of water;
you prepare their grain,
for this is how you have prepared the earth.

¹¹You drench its furrows;
you press down its ridges.
With showers you soften it;
you bless what sprouts from it.

¹²You crown the year with your goodness, and your wagon tracks drip with abundance.

¹³The wilderness pastures drip with moisture, and the hills wrap themselves in joy.

¹⁴The meadows are clothed with flocks;
the valleys are wrapped in grain.
They shout for joy — yes, they sing!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double designation mizmor ('psalm') and shir ('song') may indicate a piece that combines instrumental performance with vocal singing.
2. The word dumiyyah ('silence, stillness') also appears in Psalm 62:2. Here it modifies tehillah ('praise') — silence as the form praise takes when it is most reverent. Zion as the location centers this psalm in the worship life of Jerusalem.
3. God is addressed as shomea tefillah ('the one who hears prayer') — a participial title that defines God's character by his responsiveness. The scope is universal: kol basar ('all flesh') will come to this prayer-hearing God. The psalm envisions a worship that extends beyond Israel to encompass all humanity.
4. The shift from singular 'me' (menni) to plural 'our' (pesha'enu) moves from personal to communal confession. The verb gavru ('they overpower, they are too strong') acknowledges that sin is stronger than the sinner — human effort cannot deal with it. The verb tekhaprem ('you cover them, you atone for them') is the verbal root of kippur (atonement). Only God can handle what has overpowered the psalmist.
5. The verbs tivchar ('you choose') and utqarev ('you bring near') place the initiative with God — access to divine presence is by invitation, not achievement. The satisfaction (nisbe'ah) that comes from the 'goodness of your house' (tuv betekha) uses the same satisfaction language as Psalm 63:6 — presence as feast.
6. The word nora'ot ('awesome things, fearsome acts') describes God's answers to prayer as overwhelming in their power. These answers come be-tsedeq ('in/with righteousness') — God's intervention is both powerful and just. The scope expands outward: God is the trust (mivtach) of people at the remotest edges of earth and sea.
7. The verb mekhin ('he establishes, he sets in place') describes the mountains as God's deliberate construction. The image of God being 'girded with strength' (ne'zar bi-gevurah) presents God as a warrior whose belt is raw power — the same power that anchors mountains in bedrock.
8. Three things are quieted by the same divine action: the seas (yammim), their waves (galleyhem), and the nations (le'ummim). The parallelism equates cosmic chaos with political turmoil — God subdues both with the same authority. The verb mashbiach ('he stills, he silences') describes decisive calming.

9. The 'uttermost parts' (qetsavot) are the extreme margins of the inhabited world. God's signs (ototekha) — visible acts of power in nature and history — produce awe even at the world's edges. The 'gateways' (motsa'ey) of morning and evening personify dawn and dusk as shouting with joy (tarnin) — the daily cycle itself celebrates God.
10. The word peleg ('stream, channel, watercourse') appears with Elohim — 'the channel/stream of God' — suggesting a heavenly irrigation system. The verb tashrennah ('you enrich it') is emphatic: rabbat ('greatly, abundantly'). This is not bare sufficiency but lavish provision.
11. The agricultural detail is precise: tlameyha ('its furrows') are soaked, gedudeyha ('its ridges, its clods') are settled and broken down by rain. The verb temoggenah ('you dissolve it, you soften it') describes the rain turning hard, compacted soil into workable earth. Then God blesses the growth (tsimchah, 'its sprouting') — the entire process from plowing to germination is God's work.
12. The word ma'gal ('track, rut, path') can refer to wagon wheel ruts. The image may be of God traveling across the land in a harvest chariot, with the ruts behind him filling with oil and grain. The word deshen ('fatness') is the language of the richest sacrifice and the richest food.
13. Even the ne'ot midbar ('pastures of the wilderness') — places normally dry and sparse — participate in the abundance. The hills (geva'ot) 'gird themselves' (tachgornah) with joy (gil) as if putting on a garment. The wilderness and the hills are personified as celebrants dressed for a festival.
14. The closing verse dresses the landscape in living things: karim ('meadows, pastures') wear flocks like garments, and amaqim ('valleys') are wrapped in grain (bar) like a robe. Then comes the climactic line: yitro'a'u af yashiru ('they shout for joy, indeed they sing!'). The subject is the meadows and valleys themselves — the land has become a choir. The psalm ends not with human praise but with creation's own song.

Summary: Psalm 66 is a two-movement hymn that begins with a call for the entire earth to shout joyfully to God and then narrows to a single worshiper fulfilling personal vows. The first half (verses 1-12) summons all nations to witness God's awesome deeds, recalls the crossing of the sea and the river, and describes a period of national testing where God refined his people like silver and brought them through fire and water into abundance. The second half (verses 13-20) shifts to first person singular: the psalmist enters the temple with burnt offerings, fulfills his vows, and testifies that God has heard his prayer and not withheld his faithful love.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's architecture is its most remarkable feature. It begins with the widest possible scope ('all the earth') and progressively narrows: all nations, then Israel's national story, then the community's testing, then one individual standing in the temple with offerings. The universal and the particular are not in tension but connected — the God who parted the sea for a nation is the same God who heard one person's prayer. The conditional statement in verse 18 ('If I had cherished sin in my heart, the Lord would not have listened') is one of the most direct ethical-theological statements in the Psalms — access to God is not merely ritual but moral.

Translation Friction: The superscription identifies this as 'a song, a psalm' but does not attribute it to David. The shift from plural 'we/us' (verses 1-12) to singular 'I/me' (verses 13-20) has generated debate about whether this is one psalm or two originally separate compositions. The 'sea' and 'river' in verse 6 most naturally refer to the Red Sea and the Jordan, but some scholars see them as references to creation's waters. The refining imagery (verse 10) and the description of being brought through fire and water (verse 12) suggest a severe national crisis, though the specific historical occasion is not identified.

Connections: The crossing of the sea (verse 6) connects to Exodus 14-15 and Joshua 3-4. The refining-as-silver metaphor appears in Isaiah 48:10, Zechariah 13:9, and Malachi 3:2-3 — testing by fire as God's purification method. The testimony formula 'Come and hear, all you who fear God' (verse 16) anticipates the testimony tradition in the early church (Acts 4:20, 1 John 1:1-3). The ethical condition for answered prayer (verse 18) is echoed in Isaiah 1:15 ('When you spread out your hands in prayer, I will hide my eyes from you') and 1 John 3:21-22.

‡For the director of music. A song. A psalm.
Shout joyfully to God, all the earth!

‡Sing the glory of his name;
make his praise glorious.

³Say to God, "How awesome are your deeds!
Because of your great power,
your enemies cringe before you."

⁴All the earth bows down to you and sings to you;
they sing to your name. Selah.

⁵Come and see the works of God — awesome in his deeds toward the children of humanity.

⁶He turned the sea into dry land; through the river they crossed on foot —
there we rejoiced in him!

⁷He rules by his power forever;
his eyes keep watch on the nations.
Let the rebellious not exalt themselves. Selah.

⁸Bless our God, you peoples;
let the sound of his praise be heard.

⁹He keeps us among the living and does not let our feet slip.

¹⁰For you have tested us, God;
you have refined us as silver is refined.

¹¹You brought us into the net;
you placed a heavy burden on our backs.

¹²You let people ride over our heads;
we went through fire and through water,
but you brought us out to a place of abundance.

¹³I will come into your house with burnt offerings;
I will fulfill my vows to you —

¹⁴the vows that my lips opened to speak, that my mouth uttered when I was in distress.

¹⁵I will offer you burnt offerings of fattened animals with the smoke of rams;
I will prepare cattle and goats. Selah.

¹⁶Come and hear, all you who revere God, and I will tell you what he has done for my life.

¹⁷To him I cried out with my mouth, and praise was on my tongue.

18 If I had cherished evil in my heart,
the Lord would not have listened.

19 But God has truly heard;
he has paid attention to the voice of my prayer.

20 Blessed be God,
who has not turned away my prayer or his faithful love from me.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb hari'u ('shout, raise a shout') is the same word used for a battle cry or a shout of acclamation for a king. The scope is universal: kol ha-arets ('all the earth') — every nation and land is summoned to participate.
2. The command is to zamru ('sing, make music to') the kavod ('glory, honor') of God's name. The second line intensifies: simu kavod tehillato ('set/make glory his praise') — the praise itself should carry the weight of glory.
3. The verb yekachashu ('they cringe, they submit grudgingly, they feign obedience') indicates reluctant submission — God's enemies do not willingly bow but are forced into compliance by the sheer magnitude of his power (rov uzzekha, 'the greatness of your strength').
4. The verb yishtachavu ('they bow down, they prostrate themselves') describes full-body worship. The triple repetition of singing (vizammeru lakh, yezammeru shimkha) emphasizes that worship is the earth's proper response. Selah marks a pause.
5. The invitation lekhu u-re'u ('come and see') shifts from command to witness — the nations are summoned not just to worship but to observe evidence. The phrase nora alilah ('awesome in deed/action') describes God's historical interventions as the visible proof of his character.
6. The sea (yam) is the Red Sea of the Exodus; the river (nahar) is the Jordan of the conquest. The verb hafakh ('he turned, he overturned') describes radical transformation — water became walkable ground. The shift to 'we rejoiced' (nismechah) collapses the historical distance: the present community claims the ancient deliverance as their own experience.
7. God's rule (moshel) is permanent (olam, 'forever') and his eyes (eynav) maintain surveillance over the nations (goyim). The warning to the sorerim ('rebellious ones, stubborn ones') not to exalt themselves is a political warning: no nation should presume to challenge the God who parted the sea.
8. The imperative barakhu ('bless!') is addressed to ammim ('peoples, nations') — not just Israel but the watching world. The verb hashmi'u ('cause to be heard, make loud') demands that praise not remain silent but become audible, public, and unavoidable.
9. The phrase ha-sam nafshenu ba-chayyim ('the one who places our soul/life among the living') is a statement of preservation — God actively maintains their existence. The feet not slipping (lo natan la-mot raglenu) uses the language of walking a dangerous path without falling.
10. The verb tsaraph ('to refine, to smelt') is the same verb used for testing gold and silver in a crucible. The comparison ki-tseraf kasef ('as one refines silver') implies that God controls the heat and duration — the refiner watches the metal and knows when to stop.
11. The metsudah ('net, snare, stronghold') here functions as a trap — God himself led them into confinement. The mu'aqah ('pressure, burden, constraint') on the motneynu ('our loins, our backs') describes the physical weight of suffering. The theological boldness is striking: God is the agent of the testing, not merely the one who permits it.
12. The verb hirkavta ('you caused to ride') enosh ('a mortal, humanity') le-roshenu ('over our heads') depicts the humiliation of being trampled. The word revayah ('abundance, overflow, well-watered place') is the psalm's turning point — the suffering was a corridor, not a destination.
13. The psalm shifts abruptly from 'we' to 'I' — one individual steps forward from the community. The olot ('burnt offerings') are whole offerings consumed entirely on the altar, representing total dedication. The vows (nedaray) were made during the crisis and are now being paid in worship.
14. The phrase asher patsu sefatay ('which my lips opened/burst open') emphasizes the urgency of the vows — they burst out under pressure. The vow made in crisis (ba-tsar li, 'when it was narrow/tight for me') is now fulfilled in the spacious relief of deliverance.
15. The lavishness of the offerings — mechim ('fatted animals'), elim ('rams'), baqar ('cattle'), attudim ('goats') — reflects the magnitude of gratitude. The qetoret ('smoke, incense') of rams refers to the aromatic smoke rising from the burning fat. This is not a token gesture but an extravagant response to experienced deliverance.
16. The formula lekhu shim'u ('come and hear') shifts from sacrifice to testimony. The audience is kol yir'ey Elohim ('all who fear/revere God') — fellow worshipers who will understand the significance of the story. The phrase asher asah le-nafshi ('what he has done for my soul/life') introduces personal narrative as a form of worship.
17. The phrase romam tachat leshoni ('exaltation was under my tongue') is a vivid idiom: even as the psalmist cried out in distress, praise was already present beneath the surface, ready to emerge. The mouth that called for help was already preparing to give thanks.

18. The conditional im ('if') creates a theological principle: internal moral orientation affects the efficacy of prayer. This does not mean only perfect people can pray — Psalm 65:4 already acknowledged that transgressions overpower the individual. The point is about the direction of the heart, not the perfection of the life.
19. The word akhen ('truly, certainly, indeed') is emphatic — against all the reasons prayer might not work, against the conditional warning of the previous verse, God has in fact listened. The verb hiqshiv ('he has paid attention, he has given ear') repeats the language of attentive listening from verse 2.
20. The closing benediction pairs two things God has not removed: tefillati ('my prayer') and chasdo ('his faithful love'). The connection is deliberate — God's willingness to hear prayer and God's faithful love (chesed) are aspects of the same reality. The psalm that began with all the earth shouting to God ends with one person blessing God for not turning away.

Summary: Psalm 67 is a compact, symmetrical hymn asking God to bless Israel so that God's way and saving power become known among all nations. Built around a repeated refrain calling on the peoples to praise God, the psalm envisions a world where every nation acknowledges God's just governance and celebrates the earth's abundance. It opens with the priestly blessing of Numbers 6 and closes with the expectation that God's blessing will cause all the ends of the earth to revere him.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is one of the clearest missionary texts in the Hebrew Bible. Israel's blessing is not an end in itself but a means — 'so that your way may be known on earth, your deliverance among all nations.' The concentric structure is precise: A (blessing, verse 2), B (nations know God, verse 3), C (refrain: peoples praise, verse 4), D (center: God judges with equity, verse 5), C' (refrain: peoples praise, verse 6), B' (earth yields, verse 7a), A' (God blesses, ends of earth revere, verses 7b-8). The architecture mirrors the theology: God's blessing radiates outward from Israel to reach the edges of the world.

Translation Friction: *The superscription assigns this to the director of music with stringed instruments (neqinot) but gives no author. The opening line echoes the Aaronic blessing (Numbers 6:24-26) closely enough that the psalm may have been composed as a liturgical expansion of that priestly prayer. Whether the harvest imagery (verse 7, 'the earth has yielded its produce') indicates a specific harvest festival or is metaphorical for God's general blessing is debated. The seven-verse structure has been noted — seven being the number of completeness — giving the psalm a sense of wholeness.*

Connections: The priestly blessing connection to Numbers 6:24-26 is foundational. The vision of all nations knowing God's way connects to Abraham's call ('in you all families of the earth shall be blessed,' Genesis 12:3) and to the prophetic hope in Isaiah 2:2-4 and Micah 4:1-3. Paul quotes the principle of God's blessing extending to the nations in Galatians 3:8. The psalm's theology stands behind the Great Commission (Matthew 28:19) — God's people are blessed in order to be a blessing.

¹For the director of music. With stringed instruments. A psalm. A song.

²May God be gracious to us and bless us;
may he make his face shine on us. Selah.

³so that your way may be known on earth, your deliverance among all nations.

⁴Let the peoples thank you, God;
let all the peoples thank you.

⁵Let the nations be glad and sing for joy, for you judge the peoples with equity and guide the nations on earth. Selah.

⁶Let the peoples thank you, God;
let all the peoples thank you.

⁷The earth has yielded its produce;
God — our God — blesses us.

⁸God blesses us,
and all the ends of the earth revere him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double designation mizmor shir ('psalm, song') with neginot ('stringed instruments') indicates a musically accompanied liturgical piece.
2. The verbs yechnenu ('may he be gracious to us'), vivarkhenu ('may he bless us'), and ya'er ('may he cause to shine') mirror the Aaronic benediction closely. Selah marks a musical pause after this foundational prayer.
3. The infinitive la-da'at ('so that it may be known') reveals the purpose of the blessing requested in verse 2. God's 'way' (darkhekha) and 'deliverance' (yeshuatekha) are to become public knowledge among kol goyim ('all nations'). Israel is blessed for the sake of the world's knowledge of God.
4. The refrain yodukha ammim ('let the peoples thank/praise you') appears here and in verse 6, framing the psalm's center. The word ammim ('peoples') is plural — this is not Israel alone but the family of nations. The repetition of kullam ('all of them') leaves no people group excluded.
5. The word mishor ('equity, level ground, fairness') describes judgment that is straight and even — no favoritism, no corruption, no arbitrary power. The verb tanchem ('you guide them') uses the same root as nachah ('to lead, to guide'), evoking pastoral care alongside judicial authority.
6. The refrain repeats identically from verse 4, creating the psalm's structural frame. The repetition is not redundancy but emphasis — the call for universal praise brackets the central declaration of God's just rule.
7. The phrase erets natnah yevulah ('the earth has given its produce') grounds the psalm's theology in material reality — God's blessing is not abstract but takes the form of food from the ground. The double identification Elohim Elohenu ('God, our God') is emphatic and possessive — the God who governs the nations is also our own God.
8. The psalm closes by completing the circle: God's blessing of Israel (yevarkhenu) results in universal reverence (ve-yir'u oto kol afsey arets). The 'ends of the earth' (afsey arets) represent the most remote populations — God's blessing of one people reaches the farthest margins of the world. The verb yir'u ('they revere, they fear') describes not terror but awe-filled recognition of who God is.

Summary: Psalm 68 is the great theophany-and-victory psalm of the Psalter — a sweeping hymn that traces God's march from Sinai through the wilderness to Zion, scattering enemies, providing for the poor, and establishing his dwelling place among his people. The psalm begins with the ancient war cry of Numbers 10:35 ('Let God rise up, let his enemies be scattered') and proceeds through a sequence of divine actions: God is father to the fatherless, defender of widows, settler of the lonely in families, liberator of prisoners. The march through the wilderness shakes the earth and pours rain. God's mountain (Zion) is chosen over the higher peaks of Bashan. A vast procession brings God into the sanctuary. The psalm calls on kingdoms of the earth to sing to God, who rides the ancient heavens and gives power to his people.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is among the most difficult and most magnificent psalms in the collection. Its difficulty lies in its archaic Hebrew, abrupt transitions, and compressed allusions to multiple traditions (Sinai, the wilderness march, the conquest, the temple procession). Its magnificence lies in the sheer scope of what it attempts: to narrate God's journey from desert mountain to Jerusalem temple as a single, continuous march of triumph. The God of this psalm is simultaneously a cosmic warrior, a father of orphans, a rain-giver, a conqueror, and a king enthroned in procession. The image of God 'riding on the clouds' (rokhev ba-aravot, verse 5) connects to ancient Near Eastern storm-god imagery while surpassing it — this God uses his storm-power to house the homeless and free prisoners. The procession scene (verses 25-28) is one of the most vivid liturgical descriptions in the Hebrew Bible.*

Translation Friction: Psalm 68 is considered one of the most textually challenging chapters in the entire Hebrew Bible. Multiple verses contain rare or unique vocabulary, and the Hebrew text may be corrupted in places. Scholarly translations differ significantly in verses 12-14, 18, 23, and 31. The psalm may be a single composition or a medley of older fragments. The reference to 'gifts among humanity' in verse 19 is famously quoted by Paul in Ephesians 4:8, where he changes 'received gifts' to 'gave gifts' — a reinterpretation that has generated extensive theological discussion. The 'mountain of Bashan' (verse 16) and the jealousy of the many-peaked mountain looking at Zion are unusual images. The procession in verses 25-28 lists specific tribes (Benjamin, Judah, Zebulun, Naphtali) but not all twelve, raising questions about the historical occasion.

Connections: The opening verse quotes Numbers 10:35, the cry when the ark set out on the march. The Sinai theophany (verse 9) echoes Judges 5:4-5 (the Song of Deborah). The ascension and gifts of verse 19 are applied to Christ's ascension in Ephesians 4:8-10. The image of God riding the clouds appears in Daniel 7:13 and is transferred to the Son of Man. The father-of-orphans and defender-of-widows titles (verse 6) define God's character in terms of justice for the vulnerable, a theme central to the prophets (Isaiah 1:17, James 1:27).

¹For the director of music. Of David. A psalm. A song.

²Let God rise up — let his enemies be scattered!
Let those who hate him flee before him!

³As smoke is blown away, so blow them away;
as wax melts before fire,
so the wicked perish before God.

⁴But the righteous are glad — they celebrate before God and overflow with joy!

⁵Sing to God! Make music to his name!
Build a highway for the one who rides through the deserts —
Yah is his name — and celebrate before him!

⁶Father of the fatherless, defender of widows —
God in his holy dwelling.

⁷God settles the lonely in families;
he leads prisoners out into prosperity.
But the rebellious live in a sun-scorched land.

⁸God, when you went out before your people, when you marched through the wasteland — Selah —

⁹The earth shook; the heavens poured down rain before God — this Sinai itself trembled before God,
the God of Israel.

¹⁰You poured out generous rain, God;
your inheritance was exhausted,
but you restored it.

¹¹Your community settled in it;
from your goodness, God,

you provided for the poor.

¹²The Lord gives the command;
the women who proclaim the news are a vast company.

¹³Kings of armies flee — they flee!
And the woman who stays home divides the plunder.

¹⁴Though you lie among the sheepfolds, the wings of a dove are covered with silver, its feathers with shimmering gold.

¹⁵When the Almighty scattered kings there,
it snowed on Zalmon.

¹⁶The mountain of God — the mountain of Bashan!
The many-peaked mountain — the mountain of Bashan!

¹⁷Why do you look with envy, you many-peaked mountains, at the mountain God has chosen for his dwelling?
Indeed, the LORD will live there forever.

¹⁸The chariots of God are tens of thousands — thousands upon thousands.
The Lord is among them;
Sinai is in the sanctuary.

¹⁹You ascended to the heights;
you took captives captive;
you received gifts among people — even among the rebellious —
so that Yah God might dwell there.

²⁰Blessed be the Lord!
Day after day he bears our burden —
the God of our deliverance. Selah.

²¹Our God is a God of acts of deliverance;
and to the LORD, the Lord, belong the escapes from death.

²²God will crush the head of his enemies, the hairy scalp of the one who walks in his guilt.

²³The Lord said, "I will bring them back from Bashan;
I will bring them back from the depths of the sea."

²⁴So that your foot may strike through blood, the tongue of your dogs have its share from the enemies.

²⁵They see your processions, God —
the processions of my God, my King, into the sanctuary.

²⁶Singers go in front, musicians behind, with young women playing tambourines in the middle.

²⁷"Bless God in the assemblies — the Lord, from the fountain of Israel!"

²⁸There is Benjamin, the youngest, leading them;
the princes of Judah in their throng;
the princes of Zebulun, the princes of Naphtali.

²⁹Your God has decreed your strength.
Show your strength, God —
the strength you have displayed for us.

³⁰Because of your temple above Jerusalem, kings bring tribute to you.

³¹Rebuke the beast of the reeds,
the herd of bulls among the calves of the peoples,
until they grovel with bars of silver.
Scatter the peoples who delight in war.

³²Envoys will come from Egypt;
Cush will stretch out its hands to God.

³³Kingdoms of the earth, sing to God!
Make music to the Lord! Selah.

³⁴Sing to the one who rides the highest, most ancient heavens!
He sends out his voice — a voice of power!

³⁵Ascribe power to God!
His majesty is over Israel, and his strength is in the skies.

³⁶Awesome is God from his sanctuaries!
The God of Israel — he gives power and strength to the people.
Blessed be God!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription attributes this to David and gives the double designation mizmor shir ('psalm, song'), indicating both instrumental and vocal performance.
2. The connection to Numbers 10:35 anchors this psalm in the wilderness march tradition — the ark moving forward, God going before his people, enemies falling away on either side.
3. Two similes describe the effect of God's presence on the wicked: smoke dispersed by wind (ashan tindof) and wax dissolving before fire (donag mipney esh). Both images emphasize the insubstantiality of evil when confronted by God — what seemed solid becomes nothing.

4. Three joy verbs pile up: yismechu ('they are glad'), ya'altsu ('they exult'), and yasisu ('they rejoice with delight'). The contrast with the previous verse is sharp: the wicked melt like wax, but the righteous thrive in God's presence. The same presence destroys and delights.
5. The Ugaritic texts use a similar epithet (rkb 'rpt, 'rider of the clouds') for the storm deity Baal. The psalm appropriates this title for YHWH, asserting that the true rider of the storms is not Baal but Yah. The verb sollu literally means 'cast up, heap up' — the image is of building a raised road through the wilderness for a royal procession.
6. The word dayyan ('judge') in the context of widows means not one who judges them but one who judges on their behalf — an advocate, a champion of their cause. The pairing of orphans and widows as the paradigm of vulnerability runs throughout the Torah, Prophets, and Writings.
7. The verb moshiv ('he causes to dwell, he settles') takes yechidim ('isolated ones, lonely ones') and places them baytah ('into a house, into a home') — God's remedy for isolation is community. The word bakosharot ('into prosperity' or 'with music') is debated — it may mean the prisoners emerge singing, or that they emerge into thriving conditions. The rebellious (sorerim) are left in tsechichah ('a parched, sun-scorched place') — the barren opposite of home.
8. The narrative shifts to the wilderness march. The verb be-tset'kha ('when you went out') and be-tsa'dekha ('when you marched') describe God leading from the front. The yeshimon ('wasteland, desert') is the barren wilderness through which Israel traveled from Sinai to Canaan.
9. This verse closely parallels Judges 5:4-5, the Song of Deborah, which also describes earth shaking and heavens dripping before the LORD. The intertextual connection suggests both texts draw on a shared tradition of the Sinai theophany as the defining moment of divine power.
10. The geshem nedavot ('rain of generosity/freewill offerings') is a striking phrase — the rain is characterized as voluntary, abundant, and gift-like. The nachalatekha ('your inheritance') is Israel, God's own portion among the nations. When the people were nilah ('weary, exhausted'), God konanta ('established, restored, sustained') them.
11. The word chayyatekha ('your community, your living ones, your flock') is unusual and may refer to God's people as a flock or community. The provision for the ani ('poor, afflicted') from God's tovah ('goodness') reinforces the theme established in verses 6-7: God's power is directed toward the vulnerable.
12. The word omer ('word, utterance, command') is God's battle order. The hamevaserot ('the women who bear good news') is a feminine plural participle — women who announce victory. This reflects the ancient Near Eastern practice of women celebrating military triumph with song (cf. Miriam in Exodus 15:20-21, the women greeting David in 1 Samuel 18:6-7). The tsava rav ('great army, vast company') describes the multitude of women heralding the news.
13. The doubling yiddodun yiddodun ('they flee, they flee') emphasizes the panicked haste of defeated kings. Meanwhile, nevat bayit ('the dweller of the house,' the woman at home) distributes the shalal ('spoil, plunder'). The image is of such complete victory that even those who did not fight share in the bounty.
14. This is one of the most debated verses in the psalm. The shefatayim ('sheepfolds' or 'saddlebags' or 'ash heaps') is uncertain. The dove image may represent Israel, the plunder, or a decorative object taken as spoil. The silver and gold on the dove's wings suggest transformation — what was lowly (lying among the sheepfolds) becomes radiant. Many scholars read this as a metaphor for Israel's transformation from humiliation to splendor through God's victory.
15. The Shaddai ('Almighty') scatters kings — the divine name emphasizes overwhelming power. Zalmon is likely a mountain, possibly near Shechem (Judges 9:48). The snowfall on Zalmon may be literal (white snow covering a dark mountain) or metaphorical (the gleaming bones of the defeated or the white garments of victory). The image conveys sudden, dramatic transformation of the landscape.
16. The 'mountain of God' (har Elohim) here refers to Bashan, a region known for its high, rugged peaks (the modern Golan Heights). The word gavunnim ('many-peaked, humped') describes the imposing, multi-summit range. The repetition creates dramatic emphasis before the contrast in the next verse.
17. The contrast between Bashan's imposing peaks and Zion's modest elevation is deliberate — God consistently chooses the lesser, the smaller, the unlikely. The verb chamad ('he desired') is the same verb used in the tenth commandment ('you shall not covet'), here applied positively to God's own desire for Zion.
18. The rekhev Elohim ('chariots of God') are the heavenly host — an innumerable army. The phrase ribbotayim alfev shin'an ('twice ten-thousand, thousands of shin'an') uses a rare word (shin'an, possibly 'repetition' or 'splendor') to describe an uncountable multitude. The closing phrase Sinai ba-qodesh ('Sinai in the sanctuary') compresses two realities: the God who appeared at Sinai is now present in the temple. Sinai has moved to Zion.
19. The phrase shavita shevi ('you captured captivity') is an idiom meaning 'you took captives' — leading a train of defeated enemies behind the victor's chariot. The phrase ba-adam ('among humanity') indicates the gifts are received from or among human beings. The inclusion of sorerim ('the rebellious') extends the reach of God's dwelling even to former enemies.
20. The verb ya'amos ('he loads, he bears, he carries') can mean either 'he loads us with blessings' or 'he bears our load for us.' The ambiguity may be intentional — God both gives generously and carries what is too heavy for his people. The phrase yom yom ('day by day') makes this a daily reality, not an occasional intervention.
21. The plural moshavot ('acts of deliverance, saving deeds') emphasizes that God's rescue is not a single event but a pattern. The phrase la-mavet totsa'ot ('to/from death the exits/escapes') declares that even death's door has exits — and those exits belong to God. He controls the passage between life and death.

22. The verb yimchats ('he will crush, he will shatter') targets the rosh ('head') of God's enemies. The 'hairy scalp' (qodqod se'ar) may indicate a warrior who wears his hair long as a sign of strength or consecration — even this emblem of power is shattered. The enemy is identified as one who mithalekh ba-ashamav ('walks about in his guilt') — someone who parades in his transgression without repentance.
23. God's promise to retrieve his people from Bashan (the distant northeast) and from the metsulot yam ('depths of the sea') expresses total recovery — no place is too remote or too deep for God to reach. These may also be places where enemies hide, and the promise is that God will pursue and recover justice from every hiding place.
24. The violent imagery of feet in blood and dogs lapping — standard ancient Near Eastern victory language — describes the totality of defeat. The dogs (kelavekha) are scavengers that consume the remains of the battlefield. This is not gratuitous but conventional war poetry expressing the completeness of God's triumph over those who oppose him.
25. The word halikhotekha ('your goings, your processions') shifts the psalm from battle narrative to liturgical pageant. The watchers see God's procession (halikot) entering the sanctuary (ba-qodesh). The possessive titles Eli Malki ('my God, my King') are deeply personal amid this public spectacle.
26. The processional order is described: sharim ('singers') lead, nogrim ('instrumentalists') follow, and in the center alamot tofot ('young women beating tambourines'). This mirrors the victory celebrations of Miriam (Exodus 15:20) and the women greeting David (1 Samuel 18:6). The tambourine-playing women are the heartbeat of the procession.
27. The command barku Elohim ('bless God') is issued be-maqhelot ('in the assemblies, in the congregations'). The phrase mi-meqor Yisrael ('from the fountain/source of Israel') may mean 'you who come from Israel's source' — those who trace their origin to the patriarchal promise.
28. Four tribes are named in the procession. Benjamin (tsa'ir, 'the youngest, the smallest') leads — another instance of the lesser going first. Judah's princes come with their rigmatam ('their throng' or 'their stoning,' a difficult word). Zebulun and Naphtali represent the northern tribes. The selection of two southern (Benjamin, Judah) and two northern (Zebulun, Naphtali) tribes may symbolize a united Israel in worship.
29. The verb tsivvah ('he has commanded, he has decreed') applies to uzzekha ('your strength') — God's power over Israel is not accidental but decreed. The prayer uzzah Elohim ('be strong, O God' or 'show your strength, God') asks God to continue demonstrating the power he has already shown (zu pa'alta lanu, 'that which you have worked for us').
30. The heykhal ('temple, palace') over Jerusalem becomes the reason kings (melakhim) bring shay ('tribute, gifts'). The psalm envisions foreign rulers acknowledging the God of Zion by sending offerings — the nations drawn to the temple that represents God's earthly throne.
31. This difficult verse uses animal imagery for hostile nations. The chayyat qaneh ('beast of the reeds') likely refers to the hippopotamus or crocodile of the Nile — a veiled reference to Egypt. The 'bulls' (abbirim) and 'calves' (egley ammin) represent powerful and lesser nations respectively. The prayer asks God to humble them until they bring silver tribute and to scatter those who love war.
32. The word chashmannim ('envoys, nobles, bronze vessels') is rare. Egypt (Mitsrayim) and Cush (the region south of Egypt, often identified with Nubia/Ethiopia) represent the farthest reaches of the known world. Cush stretching out its hands (tarits yadav) to God is a gesture of prayer and submission — even the most distant nations will reach toward the God of Israel.
33. The call expands to mamlekhote ha-arets ('kingdoms of the earth') — every political entity on the planet is summoned to sing. This is the psalm's most expansive worship command, reaching beyond individuals and peoples to organized nations.
34. The phrase shemey shemey qedem ('the heavens of the heavens of old') is the most exalted spatial designation possible — the highest tier of the ancient cosmos. God rides there as he rode the deserts in verse 5. His voice (qol oz, 'voice of power/strength') thunders from that height — the storm-voice that shakes the world.
35. The command tenu oz l'Elohim ('give/ascribe power to God') does not mean God lacks power but that worshipers acknowledge it. God's ga'avato ('his majesty, his pride, his exaltation') extends over Israel, and his oz ('strength') operates in the shechqim ('clouds, skies'). The dual location — over Israel and in the skies — holds together the particular and the cosmic.
36. The psalm closes with nora ('awesome, to be feared') proceeding from God's miqdashekha ('your sanctuaries'). The God of Israel (El Yisrael) is the one who gives (noten) oz ('power') and ta'atsumot ('mighty strength') to the people (la-am). The final words — barukh Elohim ('blessed be God') — seal the psalm with a benediction. The psalm that began with God rising against his enemies ends with God giving his strength to his people.

Summary: Psalm 69 is one of the most frequently quoted psalms in the New Testament, a raw cry from the depths. The psalmist is drowning — waters have reached his neck, he sinks in deep mud, floodwaters sweep over him. He has cried until his throat is raw and his eyes fail from waiting. Those who hate him without cause outnumber the hairs on his head. He is estranged from his own brothers, consumed by zeal for God's house, and mocked by those who sit in the gate. He calls on God for rescue, asks that his enemies face devastating consequences, and closes with a vow of praise and a vision of Zion rebuilt, declaring that God hears the needy and does not despise his prisoners.

What Makes This Remarkable: The New Testament applies this psalm to Jesus more than almost any other psalm except Psalm 22 and Psalm 110. 'Zeal for your house has consumed me' (verse 10) is quoted at the temple cleansing (John 2:17). 'They gave me vinegar to drink' (verse 22) is fulfilled at the cross (Matthew 27:48, John 19:29). 'Let their table become a snare' (verse 23) is applied by Paul to unbelieving Israel (Romans 11:9). 'Let their dwelling be desolate' (verse 26) is applied to Judas (Acts 1:20). The psalm's power lies in its refusal to sanitize suffering — the psalmist does not pretend faith makes pain disappear. He drowns, he weeps, he rages, and then he praises.

Translation Friction: The superscription assigns this to David 'on shoshannim' (lilies), a musical direction. The imprecatory section (verses 23-29) is among the most severe in the Psalter — curses on enemies' tables, eyes, loins, and dwelling places, with a request that they be blotted from the book of the living. These verses have generated extensive ethical discussion. The closing verses (34-37) shift to a vision of Zion's restoration that some scholars date to the exilic or post-exilic period. The psalm's length (37 verses in Hebrew) and emotional range suggest it may preserve an extended prayer that passed through multiple stages of composition.

Connections: The drowning imagery connects to Jonah 2 (the prayer from the fish) and to the baptismal theology of Romans 6 (going down into death and coming up again). The 'zeal for your house' quotation at the temple cleansing (John 2:17) positions Jesus as the one who fulfills the psalmist's consuming passion for God's dwelling. The vinegar on the cross (John 19:28-30) explicitly cites this psalm. Paul's use of verse 23 in Romans 11:9-10 applies the hardening language to Israel's temporary unbelief. The book of life reference (verse 29) appears in Revelation 3:5, 13:8, and 20:15.

¹For the director of music. According to 'Lilies.' Of David.

²Save me, God,
for the waters have reached my neck!

³I have sunk into deep mud where there is no foothold;
I have come into the depths of water, and the flood sweeps over me.

⁴I am exhausted from calling out;
my throat is raw.
My eyes fail from waiting for my God.

⁵Those who hate me without cause outnumber the hairs on my head.
Those who would destroy me — my lying enemies — are powerful.
What I did not steal, I am forced to give back.

⁶God, you know my foolishness;
my offenses are not hidden from you.

⁷Let those who wait for you not be put to shame through me,
 Lord GOD of Hosts.
 Let those who seek you not be humiliated through me,
 God of Israel.

⁸For it is because of you that I bear insult;
 shame covers my face.

⁹I have become a stranger to my brothers,
 a foreigner to my mother's sons.

¹⁰For zeal for your house has consumed me, and the insults of those who insult you have fallen on me.

¹¹I wept and fasted,
 and that became a source of insult to me.

¹²I put on sackcloth as my clothing, and I became a byword to them.

¹³Those who sit in the gate gossip about me;
 I am the theme of drunkards' songs.

¹⁴But as for me — my prayer is to you, LORD,
 at a time of favor.
 God, in the abundance of your faithful love,
 answer me with the reliability of your deliverance.

¹⁵Rescue me from the mud — do not let me sink!
 Let me be delivered from those who hate me and from the depths of water.

¹⁶Do not let the floodwater sweep me away;
 do not let the deep swallow me;
 do not let the pit close its mouth over me.

¹⁷Answer me, LORD, for your faithful love is good;
 in the abundance of your compassion, turn to me.

¹⁸Do not hide your face from your servant,
 for I am in distress — answer me quickly!

¹⁹Come near to my life and redeem it;
 because of my enemies, ransom me.

²⁰You know my insult, my shame, my humiliation;
 all my adversaries are before you.

²¹Insult has broken my heart, and I am sick.
 I looked for sympathy, but there was none;
 for comforters, but I found none.

²²They put poison in my food;
for my thirst, they gave me vinegar to drink.

²³Let their table become a snare before them, and their peace offerings become a trap.

²⁴Let their eyes be darkened so they cannot see,
and make their backs shake continually.

²⁵Pour out your fury on them;
let the burning of your anger overtake them.

²⁶Let their encampment be desolate;
let no one live in their tents.

²⁷For they persecute the one you have struck;
they talk about the pain of those you have wounded.

²⁸Add punishment upon their punishment;
do not let them enter into your righteousness.

²⁹Let them be erased from the book of the living;
let them not be recorded with the righteous.

³⁰But I am afflicted and in pain;
your deliverance, God, will lift me to safety.

³¹I will magnify him with thanksgiving.
I will praise the name of God with a song;

³²This will please the LORD more than an ox,
more than a bull with horns and hooves.

³³The humble see it and are glad.
You who seek God — let your hearts live!

³⁴For the LORD hears the needy, and he does not despise his prisoners.

³⁵Let heaven and earth praise him,
the seas and everything that moves in them!

³⁶For God will save Zion and rebuild the cities of Judah;
they will settle there and possess it.

³⁷The descendants of his servants will inherit it,
and those who love his name will live there.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The notation al shoshannim ('according to lilies') likely indicates a melody or musical mode named after lilies. The same notation appears in Psalms 45 and 80.

2. The verb hoshi'eni is from the root y-sh-' (deliver, save) — the same root behind the names Joshua and Jesus. The waters reaching the nephesh means they have risen to the point where breathing is impossible.
3. The verb tava'ti ('I have sunk') describes being swallowed by yeven metsulah ('mud of the deep'). The phrase ein mo'amad ('there is no standing place') means the psalmist has nothing solid beneath him. The shibboleth ('flood, current, rushing stream') shetafatni ('has swept me away'). Three layers of drowning: mud, depth, and current.
4. The verb yaga'ti ('I am exhausted, I am weary') describes physical depletion from crying. The verb nichar ('it is scorched, it is raw, it is hoarse') applies to the geroni ('my throat') — the voice itself has been damaged by prolonged crying. The eyes kalu ('fail, are consumed') from extended watching (meyachel, 'hoping, waiting') for God. Every organ is affected: throat, eyes, and strength.
5. The phrase sone'ay chinnam ('those who hate me for nothing, without cause') is quoted by Jesus in John 15:25 ('They hated me without reason'). The final line (asher lo gazalti az ashiv, 'what I did not rob, then I must return') describes being forced to make restitution for crimes never committed — the injustice of false accusation.
6. The psalmist does not claim sinlessness — he acknowledges ivvalti ('my foolishness') and ashmotay ('my offenses, my guilt'). These are not hidden (lo nikhchadu) from God. Yet the psalm's argument is that the suffering he endures is disproportionate and unjust — he has real faults, but the hatred against him is chinnam ('without cause').
7. The psalmist fears that his suffering will become a stumbling block for others — that people who trust God (qovekha, 'those who wait for you') will be embarrassed (yevoshu) or humiliated (yikkallemu) because God appears not to rescue his own. This concern for the faith community elevates the prayer beyond personal interest.
8. The phrase alekha nasati cherpah ('because of you I have carried reproach') directly connects the psalmist's suffering to his allegiance to God. The shame is not for wrongdoing but for faithfulness — he is mocked precisely because of his commitment to God.
9. The terms muzar ('estranged, strange') and nokhri ('foreign, alien') describe social exclusion from the psalmist's own family. This is not political opposition but intimate betrayal — the people closest to him have treated him as an outsider.
10. The two halves of this verse explain the psalmist's isolation: internally he is consumed by devotion to God's house, and externally he absorbs the hostility that is actually directed at God. He is caught between fire from within and fire from without.
11. Even the psalmist's spiritual practices — weeping and fasting — are turned against him as objects of mockery. His religious sincerity is not respected but ridiculed.
12. Sackcloth (saq) is the garment of mourning and repentance. The psalmist's visible grief makes him a mashal ('proverb, byword, object lesson') — people use him as an example of what happens to the excessively devout.
13. The 'gate' (sha'ar) is the public square where legal and social discourse happens — the psalmist is discussed in the most public forum. The neginot shoteh shekhar ('songs of drinkers of strong drink') indicates he has become material for tavern mockery. His suffering is entertainment.
14. The phrase et ratson ('time of favor, acceptable time') indicates the psalmist trusts that God has appointed a time for response. He grounds his appeal in two divine attributes: rov chasdekha ('the abundance of your faithful love') and emet yish'ekha ('the truth/reliability of your deliverance'). Both faithful love and truth are invoked as the basis for rescue.
15. The petition returns to the drowning imagery of verses 2-3: tit ('mud, mire'), tiv'ah ('sinking'), and ma'amaqqey mayim ('depths of water'). The psalmist asks for rescue from both the physical danger and the human enemies — the two are intertwined.
16. Three drowning images in sequence: the shibboleth mayim ('flood of water') sweeping, the metsulah ('deep, abyss') swallowing, and the be'er ('pit, well') closing its mouth (piyha) over the psalmist. The pit closing its mouth is personification — the underworld as a creature that consumes.
17. The appeal is to two divine qualities: chesed (tov chasdekha, 'your faithful love is good') and rachamim (rov rachamekha, 'the abundance of your compassion'). The verb peneh ('turn') asks God to face the psalmist — the opposite of hiding the face.
18. The request al taster panekha ('do not hide your face') is the psalm's deepest fear — worse than drowning is God turning away. The urgency marker maher ('quickly, speedily') reflects the extremity of the situation. The title avdekha ('your servant') claims covenant relationship.
19. Two redemption verbs: ge'alah ('redeem it,' the kinsman-redeemer verb) and pedeni ('ransom me,' the commercial redemption verb). The psalmist asks God to act as both family redeemer and ransom-payer. The motivation 'because of my enemies' asks God to act for his own honor — if the psalmist perishes, the enemies triumph.
20. Three shame words accumulate: cherpah ('insult, reproach'), boshet ('shame'), and kelimmah ('humiliation, disgrace'). The declaration negdekha kol tsoreray ('all my adversaries are before you') means God sees every one of them — none is hidden.
21. The verb shavrah ('it has broken') applied to the lev ('heart') describes a heart that has been fractured by sustained verbal assault. The verb va-anusah ('and I am sick, and I am incurable') adds physical illness to emotional devastation. The search for nud ('sympathy, someone to show grief') and menachamim ('comforters') yields nothing — the isolation is total.
22. The word rosh can refer to any bitter, poisonous plant. The chomets ('vinegar') is sour wine — not refreshing but mocking. Together they represent the complete inversion of hospitality: what should nourish, harms.

23. The imprecatory section begins. The shulchan ('table') that should provide sustenance becomes a pach ('snare'). Their shelomim ('peace offerings' or 'welfare, prosperity') becomes a moqesh ('trap'). Paul quotes this verse in Romans 11:9-10, applying it to Israel's hardening.
24. The darkening of eyes (techshakhnah eyneyhem) removes the capacity to see and understand. The shaking of loins (motneyhem tamid ham'ad) describes loss of physical strength and stability. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 11:10.
25. The verb shefokh ('pour out') applies za'am ('fury, indignation') — the same pouring imagery used for the flood waters, now directed at the enemies. The verb yasigem ('let it overtake them') describes pursuit and capture — God's anger chasing down those who oppressed the psalmist.
26. The tirah ('encampment, fortress, dwelling') becomes neshamah ('desolate, devastated'). Peter quotes this verse in Acts 1:20, applying it to Judas Iscariot after his betrayal of Jesus — 'Let his dwelling place be desolate, and let no one live in it.'
27. The theological complexity is stark: the enemies persecute someone God has already struck (hikkita). Rather than showing compassion to the divinely afflicted, they add persecution to suffering. They 'talk about the pain' (yesapperu el makh'ov) of God's wounded ones — discussing their agony as gossip or accusation rather than with sympathy.
28. The phrase tenah avon al avonam ('give iniquity upon their iniquity') could mean 'add guilt to their guilt' (let their sins compound) or 'add punishment upon their punishment.' The phrase al yavo'u be-tsidqatekha ('let them not enter into your righteousness') asks that the enemies be excluded from the saving dimension of God's justice.
29. The sefer chayyim ('book of the living, book of life') is a divine register of those who belong to God's community. Being erased (yimmachu) from it means removal from divine protection and ultimately from life itself. This image appears in Exodus 32:32-33 (Moses' plea), Daniel 12:1, and throughout Revelation (3:5, 13:8, 20:15).
30. The contrast with the imprecatory section is sharp: the psalmist identifies himself as ani ('poor, afflicted') and ko'ev ('in pain'). His hope is not in vengeance but in God's yeshuah ('deliverance'), which will tesagveni ('set me on high, lift me to a secure height') — the same elevated refuge language that appears throughout the Psalms.
31. The shift from lament to praise begins. The verbs ahallela ('I will praise') and agaddlennu ('I will magnify him, make him great') are followed by the instruments of praise: shir ('song') and todah ('thanksgiving, thank-offering'). The mouth that cried out in pain now sings.
32. The psalmist declares that vocal praise (song and thanksgiving) is more pleasing (titav) to God than the most impressive animal sacrifice — a shor par ('ox, bull') with full horns (magrin) and hooves (mafris). This anticipates the prophetic tradition that prioritizes the posture of the heart over ritual (1 Samuel 15:22, Hosea 6:6, Micah 6:6-8).
33. The anavim ('humble, lowly, afflicted') see the psalmist's deliverance and are glad (yismachu). The exhortation vihi levavkhem ('let your hearts live') addresses fellow seekers of God — the psalmist's rescue becomes a source of life for the entire community of the afflicted.
34. The theological summary: YHWH shomea el evyonim ('the LORD hears the needy') and lo vazah asirav ('he does not despise his prisoners'). The word vazah ('despise, treat with contempt') is the opposite of what God does — he treats the imprisoned and impoverished with dignity and attention.
35. The scope of praise expands to include the entire created order: shamayim ('heaven'), erets ('earth'), yammim ('seas'), and kol romes bam ('everything that moves in them'). The psalmist's personal experience of deliverance calls for a cosmic response.
36. The psalm expands from personal to national hope: God will yoshi'a ('save, deliver') Zion and yivneh ('build, rebuild') the cities of Judah. The people will yashvu ('settle, dwell') and yireshuha ('possess it, inherit it'). Some scholars see this as evidence of an exilic or post-exilic date for these closing verses.
37. The psalm closes with a vision of generational continuity: the zera ('seed, descendants') of God's avadav ('servants') will inherit the land, and those who love God's name (ohavey shemo) will dwell in it. The psalm that began in drowning ends in settlement. The movement from death to life, from flood to home, is complete.

Summary: Psalm 70 is a compact, urgent prayer for rescue. Nearly identical to Psalm 40:14-18, it stands as an independent plea for God to hurry. The psalmist asks God to deliver him and come quickly to his help. He prays that those who seek his life will be put to shame and driven back in humiliation, while those who seek God will rejoice and say 'God is great!' The psalm closes with the psalmist identifying himself as poor and needy, calling God his help and deliverer, and begging God not to delay.

What Makes This Remarkable: The brevity of this psalm is itself remarkable. At only six verses (five in Hebrew), it is one of the shortest psalms in the collection and functions almost as a distress signal — concentrated, repeatable, and memorable. The repetition of 'hurry' (chushah) frames the psalm as a plea against delay. There is no extended complaint, no detailed description of enemies, no theological argument — just the raw request for speed. The psalm's near-duplicate relationship with Psalm 40:14-18 raises questions about how psalms circulated and were adapted for different liturgical purposes. As an independent unit, it reads as a prayer that could be used in any moment of sudden crisis.

Translation Friction: The superscription identifies this as 'of David, to bring to remembrance' (lehazkir). The same notation appears on Psalm 38. The phrase may indicate a memorial offering context or simply a prayer for God to 'remember' the supplicant. The relationship to Psalm 40:14-18 is debated: did Psalm 70 extract these verses, or did Psalm 40 incorporate an originally independent prayer? Minor textual differences exist between the two versions (Psalm 70 uses Elohim where Psalm 40 uses YHWH in some instances). The brevity means that every word carries significant weight, making even small textual variants theologically relevant.

Connections: The near-duplicate in Psalm 40:14-18 provides the primary literary connection. The plea for divine haste connects to the wider Psalter theme of waiting versus urgency — Psalm 62 emphasizes silent waiting, while Psalm 70 emphasizes speed. The phrase 'poor and needy' (ani ve-evyon) appears across the Psalms (9:18, 35:10, 37:14, 40:18, 72:13, 86:1, 109:22) as a self-identification by the righteous sufferer. The petition for enemies to be 'turned back' and 'put to shame' echoes Psalm 35:4 and 35:26.

1For the director of music. Of David. For remembrance.

2God, come to rescue me!

LORD, hurry to help me!

3Let those who seek my life be put to shame and humiliated;
let those who desire my ruin be driven back and disgraced.

4Let those who say "Aha! Aha!"
be turned back because of their shame.

5Let all who seek you rejoice and be glad in you;
let those who love your deliverance say always,
"God is great!"

6But I — I am poor and needy.
God, hurry to me!
You are my help and my deliverer;
LORD, do not delay!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The notation lehazkir ('for remembrance, to bring to remembrance') may indicate a liturgical function connected to the memorial offering (azkarah, Leviticus 2:2) or may simply designate this as a prayer requesting God's attention and memory.
2. The verb chushah is an imperative demanding speed. This is the same verb used in Psalm 22:20, 38:23, and 71:12 — the standard emergency word for calling God to act without delay.
3. Four verbs of shame and defeat accumulate: yevoshu ('let them be ashamed'), yachperu ('let them be humiliated, let them blush'), yissogu achor ('let them be turned backward, driven back'), and yikkallemu ('let them be disgraced'). The enemies are identified by their intent: mevaqshey nafshi ('seekers of my life') and chafetsey ra'ati ('those who desire my harm'). The prayer does not ask for their death but for their defeat and public embarrassment.
4. The exclamation he'ach he'ach ('Aha! Aha!') is a taunt — the gloating of those who take pleasure in the psalmist's suffering. The prayer asks that their gloating be reversed: they will retreat (yashuvu, 'let them turn back') on account of their own boshtam ('shame'). The mockers will be mocked.
5. The two joy verbs yasisu ('let them be joyful') and yismechu ('let them be glad') match the two shame verbs of verse 3, creating structural balance. The phrase ohavey yeshuatekha ('those who love your deliverance') identifies the faithful as people who love not just God but specifically God's saving action.

6. The word mefalti ('my deliverer') comes from the root p-l-t ('to escape, to deliver') and suggests God as the one who provides a way out. The final verb te'achar ('delay, tarry, be late') treats God's intervention as time-sensitive — the psalmist's situation cannot wait.

Summary: An elderly psalmist pleads for God's continued protection and deliverance in old age. Enemies are circling, interpreting his frailty as evidence that God has abandoned him. The psalm is a sustained cry of trust from someone who has known God since birth and now refuses to believe the final chapter will be one of abandonment. It draws heavily on Psalm 31 and Psalm 22, weaving earlier language into a new plea shaped by the particular vulnerability of aging.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is one of the few psalms that explicitly addresses the experience of growing old. The psalmist does not pretend that age has not diminished him — he acknowledges that his strength is failing and his enemies see opportunity. But the theological argument is powerful: the God who sustained him from the womb (verse 6), who taught him from youth (verse 17), cannot logically abandon him now. The psalm turns aging itself into a theological argument. If God's faithfulness is real, it must extend to the end. The repeated phrase 'do not cast me off' (al-tashlikeni) carries the raw urgency of someone who has watched contemporaries die alone and fears the same fate.*

Translation Friction: Psalm 71 has no superscription in the Hebrew text, which is unusual in Book II of the Psalter. The LXX attributes it to David and adds a note about the sons of Jonadab and the first captives. Its heavy borrowing from Psalm 31 and Psalm 22 has led some scholars to view it as a mosaic psalm — a composition assembled from existing psalmic language. This does not diminish its theological force; it may amplify it, as the psalmist deliberately reaches for the tradition's deepest language of trust in his hour of need.

Connections: *Verses 1-3 closely parallel Psalm 31:2-4 (in Hebrew versification). The phrase 'from my mother's womb' (mi-beten immi) in verse 6 echoes Psalm 22:10-11, connecting this psalm to the larger tradition of lifelong divine care. The commitment to declare God's righteousness 'all day long' (kol hayyom) in verse 24 connects to the Psalter's broader theology of perpetual praise. The psalm's placement after Psalm 70 (a brief cry for help) creates a natural expansion — the short plea becomes a sustained meditation.*

¹In You, O LORD, I have taken refuge —
let me never be put to shame.

²In Your righteousness deliver me and rescue me;
turn Your ear toward me and save me.

³Be for me a rock of refuge,
a stronghold to enter continually.
You have commanded my deliverance,
for You are my rock and my fortress.

⁴My God, rescue me from the hand of the wicked,
from the grasp of the unjust and ruthless.

⁵For You are my hope, Lord GOD,
my trust since my youth.

⁶On You I have leaned from the womb;
from my mother's body You drew me out.
My praise is continually of You.

⁷I have become a sign to many,
but You are my strong refuge.

⁸Let my mouth be filled with Your praise,
all day long with Your splendor.

⁹Do not cast me off in the time of old age;
when my strength is spent, do not abandon me.

¹⁰For my enemies speak against me,
and those who watch for my life conspire together,

¹¹saying, 'God has abandoned him.
Pursue and seize him,
for there is no one to rescue him.'

¹²O God, do not be far from me;
my God, hurry to help me!

¹³Let those who accuse my life be shamed and consumed;
let those who seek my ruin be wrapped in disgrace and humiliation.

¹⁴But I — I will hope continually, and I will add still more to all Your praise.

¹⁵My mouth will declare Your righteousness, all day long Your salvation,
for I cannot count them.

¹⁶I will come with the mighty deeds of the Lord GOD;
I will declare Your righteousness — Yours alone.

¹⁷O God, You have taught me from my youth, and until now I have declared Your wonders.

¹⁸And even to old age and gray hair,
O God, do not abandon me,
until I declare Your arm to a generation,
Your power to all who are yet to come.

¹⁹Your righteousness, O God, reaches to the heights;
You who have done great things —
O God, who is like You?

²⁰You who have made us see many and bitter troubles will revive us again,
and from the depths of the earth
You will bring us up again.

²¹You will increase my honor and turn to comfort me.

²²I also will praise You with the harp for Your faithfulness, my God.
I will make music to You with the lyre,
O Holy One of Israel.

²³My lips will shout for joy when I make music to You — my very life, which You have redeemed.

²⁴My tongue also, all day long,
will murmur of Your righteousness, for those who sought my ruin have been shamed and disgraced.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The near-verbatim overlap with Psalm 31:2 is intentional. The psalmist is quoting established liturgical language — reaching for words that have already been tested and proven in Israel's worship.
2. The verb palat ('to rescue, to cause to escape') implies being pulled out of a tight, dangerous space — the image is of extraction from a trap or a collapsing structure.
3. Psalm 31:3 reads tsur maoz ('rock of strength') while this verse has tsur maon ('rock of refuge/habitation'). The one-letter difference (zayin vs. nun) may reflect textual variation, but the Masoretic text preserves maon, emphasizing dwelling rather than mere strength.
4. The word chomets ('ruthless, oppressive') literally means 'one who is sour, leavened' — the image is of someone whose character has fermented into cruelty. The three terms — rasha ('wicked'), me-avvel ('unjust'), and chomets ('ruthless') — paint a portrait of the psalmist's enemies as morally corrupt at every level.
5. The pairing of Adonai YHVH ('Lord GOD') is relatively rare in the Psalms and signals particular solemnity. The psalmist addresses God by His covenant name combined with the title of sovereignty.
6. The verb gazah is rare and debated. Some read it as 'my portion' (from a different root), but the context of birth imagery (beten, me'ei immi) strongly supports the meaning 'the one who cut me free' — referring to the severing of the umbilical cord at birth. This reading appears in the LXX (skepastes mou, 'my protector') by interpretive paraphrase.
7. The word mofet appears in Exodus for the plagues (signs and wonders) and in Deuteronomy 28:46 for the curses that will become 'a sign and a wonder.' The psalmist's situation has become publicly visible and is being interpreted by observers — the question is whether they are reading it correctly.
8. The parallelism pairs tehillateka ('Your praise') with tif'arteka ('Your splendor, glory, beauty'). Praise here is not merely thanksgiving but declaration of God's magnificent character. The phrase kol hayyom ('all day long') echoes verse 24 and creates a frame of perpetual worship.
9. This verse has no parallel in Psalm 31, confirming that Psalm 71 is not merely a copy but an original composition shaped by the experience of aging. The plea against abandonment in old age is theologically distinctive in the Psalter.
10. The phrase shomrei nafshi ('those who watch for my life') describes predators watching for the moment of vulnerability. They are not merely hostile; they are strategic, waiting for the right moment to strike — and old age provides it.
11. The enemies' statement mirrors the taunt against the sufferer in Psalm 22:9 and Psalm 3:3 — the recurring claim that God has withdrawn. The psalmist must contend not only with his enemies but with their theology.
12. The verb chushah ('hurry, hasten') conveys desperation — the situation is urgent and delay could be fatal. This verse echoes Psalm 22:12 and 22:20, reinforcing the literary connections between these psalms.
13. The verb ya'atu ('let them be wrapped, clothed') uses clothing imagery for shame — disgrace becomes a garment that covers them completely. The psalmist asks that the enemies' own weapon (public shame) be turned back upon them.
14. The verb yachal ('to hope, to wait') in the Psalms always implies patient endurance under pressure — not passive optimism but active, stubborn trust maintained against contrary evidence.

15. The word seforot ('numbers, reckonings') is rare and may also carry the sense of 'literary compositions' — the psalmist may be saying not only that he cannot count God's acts but that he lacks the literary skill to do them justice.
16. The phrase gevurot Adonai YHVH ('mighty deeds of the Lord GOD') refers to God's powerful acts in history — not abstract power but demonstrated intervention. The emphasis levaddeka ('Yours alone') is exclusive: the psalmist credits no one else, no other god, no human agency.
17. The word nifl'ot ('wonders') refers to God's extraordinary, incomprehensible acts — the same word used for the Exodus miracles. The psalmist's personal experience of God is framed in the same language as Israel's national experience.
18. The argument that God should preserve the psalmist for the sake of future testimony is a recurring motif in the Psalms (cf. Psalm 6:6, 30:10, 88:11-13). The dead cannot praise God — therefore God has a vested interest in keeping His worshipers alive.
19. The phrase mi kamokha is a declaration of incomparability that runs through Israel's worship from the Exodus to the Psalter. It is not philosophical monotheism but experiential — no other power has done what this God has done.
20. The Qere/Ketiv variation between singular and plural pronouns in this verse reflects textual uncertainty about whether the psalm is purely individual or has been adapted for communal use. The Masoretic Qere reads plural ('us'), suggesting liturgical adaptation.
21. The word gedullatai ('my greatness, my honor, my dignity') is significant for an elderly person whose enemies have declared him abandoned. God will not merely rescue him — God will restore his standing. The verb tissov ('You will turn around') suggests God turning back toward the psalmist with comfort after a season of apparent distance.
22. The nevel was a larger stringed instrument, possibly a type of angular harp, while the kinnor was the smaller lyre associated with David (1 Samuel 16:23). Together they represent full musical worship — the psalmist's response to deliverance will be public and artistic.
23. The verb padita ('You have redeemed') uses the language of payment and liberation — padah means to buy back, to ransom, to liberate by paying a price. The psalmist's life has been purchased back from the grip of death and enemies.
24. The pairing of boshu ('they are ashamed') and chafru ('they are disgraced') is a standard Hebrew word pair for total public humiliation. The psalmist who feared being put to shame (verse 1) now sees that shame transferred to his enemies — the reversal is complete.

Summary: A royal psalm attributed to Solomon (or written for Solomon by David) that envisions the ideal king whose reign embodies perfect justice, compassion for the poor, universal dominion, and abundance that mirrors Eden. The psalm closes Book II of the Psalter with a doxology (verses 18-19) and a colophon noting the end of the prayers of David son of Jesse. It is the most expansive portrait of the messianic king in the Psalter.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 72 describes a king whose justice produces cosmic fertility — when the king judges rightly, the mountains bear peace and the hills produce righteousness (verse 3). This is not metaphor for the ancient Israelite mind; it is theology. The king's justice and the land's fruitfulness are connected through the covenant. The psalm reaches its most astonishing scope in verses 8-11, where the king's dominion extends from sea to sea and from the River to the ends of the earth, and all kings bow before him. No historical Israelite king achieved this, which is precisely why the psalm became messianic — it describes what should be, and Israel kept praying it forward. The tender attention to the poor and crushed (verses 12-14) places compassion at the center of royal power: the king's greatness is measured not by conquest but by whom he defends.

Translation Friction: *The superscription li-Shlomoh can mean 'of Solomon,' 'for Solomon,' or 'concerning Solomon.' If David composed it for his son, verse 20 ('The prayers of David son of Jesse are ended') makes sense as a colophon. If Solomon wrote it about himself, the colophon was added by a later editor collecting Book II. The universal scope (verses 8-11) far exceeds Solomon's actual kingdom, leading many scholars to read this as idealized royal theology rather than historical description. In Jewish tradition, the psalm is messianic; in Christian tradition, it is applied to Christ.*

Connections: The language of verse 8 ('from sea to sea, from the River to the ends of the earth') reappears in Zechariah 9:10 in an explicitly messianic context. The concern for the poor echoes the covenant code (Exodus 22:21-27) and anticipates the prophetic critique of kings who failed this mandate (Jeremiah 22:13-17). The psalm's placement at the end of Book II creates a structural parallel with the doxologies that close Books I (Psalm 41:14), III (Psalm 89:53), IV (Psalm 106:48), and V (Psalm 150). The 'gold of Sheba' (verse 15) connects to the Solomon narrative in 1 Kings 10.

¹Of Solomon.

O God, give Your judgments to the king, and Your righteousness to the king's son.

²May he judge Your people with righteousness and Your afflicted ones with justice.

³May the mountains bear peace for the people, and the hills, through righteousness.

⁴May he vindicate the afflicted of the people,
save the children of the needy,
and crush the oppressor.

⁵May they fear You as long as the sun endures, and before the moon, through all generations.

⁶May he come down like rain on mown grass, like showers that drench the earth.

⁷In his days may the righteous flourish and peace abound until the moon is no more.

⁸May he rule from sea to sea,
and from the River to the ends of the earth.

⁹Before him the desert dwellers will kneel, and his enemies will lick the dust.

¹⁰The kings of Tarshish and the coastlands will bring tribute;
the kings of Sheba and Seba will present gifts.

¹¹Let all kings bow down before him;
let all nations serve him.

¹²For he will deliver the needy who cries out,
the afflicted who has no helper.

¹³He will have pity on the poor and needy, and the lives of the needy he will save.

¹⁴From oppression and violence he will redeem their lives, and their blood will be precious in his eyes.

¹⁵May he live! May gold from Sheba be given to him.
May prayer be offered for him continually;
may he be blessed all day long.

¹⁶May there be abundance of grain in the land, on the tops of the mountains may it wave like Lebanon;
and may people blossom from the city like grass of the earth.

¹⁷May his name endure forever;
may his name flourish as long as the sun.
May all nations find blessing in him;
may they call him happy.

¹⁸Blessed be the LORD God, the God of Israel, who alone does wonders.

¹⁹And blessed be His glorious name forever;
may the whole earth be filled with His glory.
Amen and Amen.

²⁰Here conclude the prayers of David, Jesse's son.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription li-Shlomoh is ambiguous: the preposition le- can mean 'of,' 'for,' 'to,' or 'concerning.' If this is a prayer by David for Solomon (as the colophon in verse 20 suggests), it is a father's intercession for his son's reign.
2. The word ani ('afflicted, poor, humble') describes those who are economically and socially powerless. In the Psalms, the aniyyim are consistently portrayed as God's particular concern — the ones He hears, defends, and vindicates.
3. The verb yis'u ('may they bear, carry, lift up') is the same verb used for carrying a burden or bearing fruit. The mountains are portrayed as productive — their yield is peace. This imagery will reappear in Isaiah 55:12 where the mountains 'break forth into singing.'
4. The verb yishpot here means not merely 'judge' but 'vindicate' — to render a verdict in favor of someone who has been wronged. The ideal king does not merely hear cases; he actively rescues (yoshia) the vulnerable and actively destroys (vidakke) those who exploit them. Justice is not passive.
5. The subject shifts from the king to the people: 'may they fear You' — the king's just rule produces reverence for God. The temporal markers — 'as long as the sun,' 'before the moon,' 'through all generations' (dor dorim) — express permanence. The prayer is for an everlasting dynasty, a hope that no historical dynasty fulfilled.
6. This is one of the most beautiful images in the Psalter. The comparison of a just king to rain reverses the usual biblical metaphor of storm-God as warrior; here, God's representative is gentle, nourishing, and life-giving. The same image appears in 2 Samuel 23:4 in David's last words.
7. The verb yifrach ('may he flourish, sprout, blossom') continues the agricultural imagery — the righteous bloom like plants under the king's just rule. The phrase ad beli yare'ach ('until there is no moon') means 'forever' — as long as the created order endures.
8. Zechariah 9:10 quotes this verse nearly verbatim in an explicitly messianic prophecy about a coming king who rides on a donkey. The psalm's language became the vocabulary of messianic hope in later Jewish and Christian tradition.
9. The tsiyyim ('desert dwellers, inhabitants of arid places') represent the most remote and untamed peoples — even they submit. The phrase afar yelachekhu ('they will lick the dust') is an ancient Near Eastern image of complete submission: prostrating so low that one's face touches the ground. It appears in Micah 7:17 and Isaiah 49:23.
10. The arrival of the queen of Sheba with gifts in 1 Kings 10 is the historical echo of this poetic vision. The psalm imagines what happened once under Solomon happening perpetually under the ideal king.
11. The universality is absolute: kol melakhim ('all kings') and kol goyim ('all nations'). The verb yishtachavu ('they will bow down, prostrate themselves') is the standard word for worship in the Hebrew Bible — the line between political submission and religious worship is intentionally blurred. In bowing to this king, the nations are acknowledging the God who appointed him.
12. This verse provides the theological justification for the universal dominion described in verses 8-11. The king deserves to rule the world because he rescues the helpless. In prophetic literature, Israel's actual kings are condemned precisely for failing this standard (see Ezekiel 34, Jeremiah 22).
13. The verb yachos ('he will have pity, spare, show compassion') describes an emotional response — the king does not merely adjudicate cases involving the poor; he feels for them. The repeated emphasis on evyonim ('needy ones') in this verse drives the point home through repetition.
14. The word tokh is often emended to 'oppression' or 'exploitation' (from a root meaning 'to oppress'), though some read it as 'deceit.' Paired with chamas ('violence'), it describes the two primary ways the powerful exploit the weak: through fraud and through force.
15. The subject shifts rapidly: 'may he live' refers to the king, 'may gold be given to him' describes tribute, and 'may prayer be offered for him' shows the people praying for their king. The gold of Sheba connects to the Solomon narrative (1 Kings 10:2, 10). The phrase tamid kol hayyom ('continually, all day long') intensifies the blessing — the king is to be upheld by ceaseless intercession.

16. The word pissat is difficult. It may mean 'handful,' 'abundance,' or 'a cake/wafer' of grain. The context of overwhelming fertility supports 'abundance.' The image of grain on mountaintops is deliberately impossible under normal conditions — it signals the eschatological, Eden-like character of this king's reign.
17. The LXX and Targum both read yinnon as a messianic title. The Talmud (Sanhedrin 98b) lists Yinnon as one of the names of the Messiah. The echo of the Abrahamic blessing ('all nations will be blessed in him') transforms the royal psalm into a covenant psalm — the king is the fulfillment of what God promised to Abraham.
18. This doxology closes Book II (Psalms 42-72) just as Psalm 41:14 closes Book I. Each of the Psalter's five books ends with a doxology, and the final book (Book V) ends with five consecutive psalms of praise (146-150) as a grand doxology for the entire collection.
19. The double Amen ('Amen and Amen') is the standard closing formula for the doxologies that end each book of the Psalter. Amen means 'truly, so be it, let it be established' — it is the congregation's affirmation of the prayer.
20. The word kallu ('are finished, are ended, are completed') from kalah has a sense of finality and completion. This colophon is one of the clearest editorial fingerprints in the Psalter, revealing the hand of the collectors who shaped the book into its current five-part structure.

Summary: Asaph's crisis of faith. The psalmist confesses that he nearly lost his footing when he saw the prosperity of the wicked. Their lives appear effortless, free of suffering, draped in arrogance — and they mock God with impunity. The psalmist's own faithfulness seems pointless until he enters the sanctuary and perceives the wicked's final destiny. The psalm pivots from envy to trust, culminating in one of the most intimate declarations of faith in the Hebrew Bible: 'Whom have I in heaven but You?'

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 73 is the Hebrew Bible's most honest exploration of theodicy at the personal level. Unlike Job, who suffers catastrophically, the psalmist here suffers the quieter torment of watching the wicked thrive while he remains faithful for apparently no return. His near-apostasy is described with startling physical imagery — 'my feet had almost slipped, my steps had nearly given way' (verse 2). What saves him is not an intellectual answer but an encounter in the sanctuary (verse 17) where he perceives — the verb is not 'understands' but 'perceives,' an act of spiritual seeing rather than rational calculation. The resolution in verses 23-28 is not that suffering is explained but that God's presence is sufficient. The psalm moves from 'Why do the wicked prosper?' to 'You are enough.'

Translation Friction: *The phrase akh tov le-Yisrael Elohim ('Surely God is good to Israel') in verse 1 has a textual crux. The Masoretic text reads le-Yisrael ('to Israel'), but the parallel with levvar levav ('the pure in heart') has led many to read la-yashar ('to the upright') — a one-letter emendation. We retain the Masoretic reading, since the tension between communal confession ('God is good to Israel') and personal crisis ('but as for me, my feet almost slipped') is precisely the psalm's point.*

Connections: Psalm 73 opens Book III of the Psalter (Psalms 73-89), a collection dominated by Asaph psalms and national laments. Its placement at the head of Book III is deliberate: after the royal optimism of Psalm 72 (closing Book II), Psalm 73 begins with doubt. The psalm is often compared to Job and Ecclesiastes as wisdom literature wrestling with the same question: does righteousness pay? The answer here is distinctive — not that it pays in material terms, but that the relationship itself is the reward. Verse 25 ('Whom have I in heaven but You?') anticipates Habakkuk 3:17-18, where the prophet rejoices in God even when the fig tree does not blossom.

¹A psalm of Asaph.

Surely God is good to Israel,
to those pure in heart.

²But as for me — my feet had almost stumbled;
my steps had nearly slipped away.

³For I envied the arrogant
when I saw the well-being of the wicked.

⁴For they have no pain in their death;
their bodies are sleek and well-fed.

⁵They are not burdened like other mortals;
they are not afflicted like other people.

⁶Therefore pride is their necklace;
violence wraps them like a garment.

⁷Their eyes bulge out from fatness;
the fantasies of their hearts overflow.

⁸They mock and speak with malice;
they speak of oppression from on high.

⁹They set their mouths against the heavens, and their tongues strut through the earth.

¹⁰Therefore the people turn to them,
and waters of abundance are drained by them.

¹¹And they say, 'How can God know?
Is there knowledge in the Most High?'

¹²Look — these are the wicked, always at ease, piling up wealth.

¹³Surely I have kept my heart pure for nothing and washed my hands in innocence in vain.

¹⁴I have been stricken all day long and punished every morning.

¹⁵If I had said, 'I will speak this way' —
I would have betrayed the generation of Your children.

¹⁶When I tried to understand this,
it was troubling in my eyes —

¹⁷until I entered the sanctuary of God;
then I perceived their end.

¹⁸Surely You set them on slippery ground;
You cast them down to ruin.

¹⁹How suddenly they become a horror!
They are swept away, utterly destroyed by terrors.

²⁰Like a dream when one awakens —
O Lord, when You rouse Yourself,
You will despise their image.

²¹When my heart was embittered and I was pierced in my innermost being,

²²I was senseless and did not understand;
I was like a brute beast before You.

²³Yet I am always with You;
You hold my right hand.

²⁴With Your counsel You guide me, and afterward You will take me into glory.

²⁵Whom have I in heaven but You?
And besides You I desire nothing on earth.

²⁶My flesh and my heart may fail, but God is the rock of my heart and my portion forever.

²⁷For those far from You will perish;
You destroy all who are unfaithful to You.

²⁸But as for me — nearness to God is my good.
I have made the Lord GOD my refuge,
so that I may tell of all Your works.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Masoretic text reads le-Yisrael ('to Israel'). Many scholars emend to la-yashar ('to the upright') based on the parallel with levvar levav ('pure of heart'). Both readings are theologically coherent: the MT emphasizes God's goodness to the covenant people, while the emendation emphasizes God's goodness to the morally upright.
2. The verb shuppekhu ('were poured out') is striking — it describes liquid being spilled, steps dissolving like water. The near-apostasy is depicted not as rebellion but as erosion: the ground beneath the psalmist's convictions was washing away.
3. The word hollelim ('arrogant, boastful') comes from halal in its negative sense — 'to be foolish, to boast.' These are not merely wicked people but people who flaunt their wickedness. Their arrogance is part of what makes them unbearable to the psalmist.
3. Register departure: shalom rendered as 'well-being' rather than default 'peace' because the psalmist observes the prosperity/comfort of the wicked — their material and physical wholeness, not peace in the relational or political sense.
4. The word chartsubot ('bonds, pangs, fetters') is debated. Some read it as 'pangs' (they suffer no pain), others as 'bonds' (nothing binds or constrains them). The following phrase uvari ulam ('and fat/healthy is their body') supports the reading that these are people whose physical condition betrays no suffering. They are visibly prosperous — their ease is written on their bodies.
5. The parallel between enosh ('mortal man' — emphasizing frailty) and adam ('humankind') creates a comprehensive statement: the wicked are exempt from the suffering that defines human existence. This is what makes them so maddening to the psalmist.
6. The word chamas ('violence, wrongdoing') is the same word used in Genesis 6:11 to describe the pre-flood world that provoked God's destruction. Its use here foreshadows the eventual judgment described later in the psalm.
7. The image is grotesque: eyes protruding from fat faces — physical excess mirroring moral excess. The phrase avru maskiyyot levav ('the imaginations of the heart overflow, pass beyond') suggests that their desires know no limit — they have everything and still want more. The word maskiyyot can mean 'images, pictures, imaginings' — their hearts generate endless schemes.

8. The verb yamiku is difficult — it may mean 'they mock, they scoff' or 'they dissolve, they melt' (i.e., they make others dissolve with fear). The phrase mi-marom yedabberu ('they speak from on high') captures their arrogance: they speak as if from a throne, as if they are above everyone, as if their position exempts them from accountability.
9. The phrase shattu vashamayim pihem ('they set their mouths in the heavens') is an image of cosmic arrogance — mouths positioned against the sky itself, speaking as rivals to God. This is not mere rudeness but theological rebellion.
10. This difficult verse seems to describe the wicked's followers — ordinary people who observe their prosperity and are drawn to them. The 'waters of abundance' (mei male) likely means the wicked drink deeply of success, draining the cup of prosperity dry. The verse captures the social effect of visible wickedness: it attracts a following.
11. The title Elyon ('Most High') emphasizes God's supreme position — and the irony is sharp: the very God whose exalted position should guarantee oversight is the one whose knowledge they deny. The higher God is, the less He sees — that is their theology.
12. The phrase shalvei olam can mean 'perpetually at ease' or 'at ease in the world.' Either reading conveys the same frustration: the wicked enjoy uninterrupted, seemingly permanent tranquility.
13. The phrase 'washed my hands in innocence' echoes Psalm 26:6 and the ritual handwashing of innocence (cf. Deuteronomy 21:6). The psalmist has maintained both inner purity (heart) and outer conduct (hands) — and concludes it was worthless.
14. The contrast with verses 4-5 is deliberate: the wicked have no pain (verse 4) and are not stricken like others (verse 5), but the psalmist is nagua ('stricken, plagued') kol hayyom ('all day long') and receives tokhachah ('punishment, correction') labbeqarot ('every morning'). Morning, which should bring fresh mercy, brings only fresh suffering.
15. The verb bagadti ('I would have betrayed, dealt treacherously') is a strong word — it is used for marital infidelity, treaty violations, and religious apostasy. The psalmist understands that publicizing his crisis of faith would be a form of violence against the believing community.
16. The word amal ('labor, trouble, toil') is the same word used in verse 5 for the suffering the wicked avoid. Now the psalmist's attempt to comprehend the problem is itself amal — even thinking about it is exhausting. The problem resists rational solution.
17. The plural miqdeshei ('sanctuaries') may refer to the temple complex with its multiple courts, or it may be a plural of majesty. The key point is that the resolution comes not from philosophical reasoning but from worship — from entering God's presence.
18. The word chalaqot ('slippery places') connects to the wisdom tradition's warnings about the 'slippery path' (Proverbs 5:6, Jeremiah 23:12). The wicked's prosperity was always precarious — the psalmist simply could not see it until he entered the sanctuary.
19. The word ke-raga ('like a moment, in an instant') emphasizes the speed of their collapse. The prosperity that seemed permanent vanishes instantaneously. The triple emphasis — shammah ('horror, desolation'), safu ('they are swept away'), tammu ('they are finished, consumed') — leaves nothing standing.
20. The image of God awakening is anthropomorphic — God does not literally sleep — but it captures the psalmist's perception: the period of the wicked's prosperity felt like God was asleep, and their judgment will feel like God waking up. The same language appears in Psalm 44:24 ('Awake! Why do You sleep, O Lord?').
21. The verb yitchammets ('was embittered, was soured') comes from chamets ('to be sour, to leaven') — the same root as vinegar. The psalmist's heart had gone sour with envy. The kilyot ('kidneys, innermost parts') were considered the seat of deep emotions and conscience in Hebrew anthropology. The psalmist's entire inner life had been corroded by the problem.
22. This verse is the psalm's act of repentance. The crisis of faith described in verses 2-16 is now diagnosed as a failure of perception — not a failure of God. The psalmist takes responsibility for his near-apostasy by calling it what it was: stupidity.
23. The phrase 'You hold my right hand' reverses the image of verse 2 (feet slipping). The hand that was grasping at nothing is now held by God. This is one of the Psalter's most powerful statements of grace — God's grip is stronger than the psalmist's doubt.
24. The phrase achar kavod has been translated as 'afterward to glory,' 'after glory,' 'according to glory,' and 'with honor afterward.' The ambiguity may be intentional — the psalmist is reaching beyond what he can clearly articulate, groping toward a hope that the Hebrew Bible's theology of death has not yet fully developed.
25. The verb chafats ('to desire, to delight in, to take pleasure in') is a strong word — it describes deep, passionate wanting. The psalmist is not saying he lacks earthly desires; he is saying that compared to God, no earthly desire registers. This is not asceticism but adoration.
26. The parallel between failing flesh and enduring God creates a contrast between what is temporary and what is permanent. The psalmist does not deny mortality; he transcends it by anchoring his identity in something that cannot decay.
27. The verb hitsmattah ('You have destroyed, cut off, silenced') is from tsamat, meaning to put an end to something decisively. The language of sexual unfaithfulness (zoneh) for spiritual apostasy is characteristic of Hosea and Ezekiel but appears here in the Psalms as well.
28. The closing phrase echoes Psalm 71:17-18 — the psalmist will declare God's works to the next generation. The crisis of faith has not destroyed his witness; it has deepened it. He now has something to testify about that he did not have before: how God held him when his feet were slipping.

Summary: A communal lament by Asaph over the destruction of the temple. The enemy has smashed the sanctuary's carved woodwork, set fire to the holy place, and desecrated every meeting place of God in the land. No prophet remains to say how long the desolation will last. The psalmist appeals to God's primordial power as Creator who crushed the sea monsters and established the cosmic order, then pleads: remember Your covenant, rise up, and defend Your cause.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 74 contains one of the Hebrew Bible's most vivid mythological passages (verses 12-17), where God is portrayed as a warrior who crushes Leviathan's heads, splits open springs and rivers, and establishes the boundaries of day and night. This is creation described not as peaceful ordering but as combat — God defeating the chaos monsters to establish the world. The psalmist deploys this ancient combat myth strategically: if You did that, surely You can handle these human enemies. The juxtaposition of cosmic power with national helplessness is the psalm's rhetorical engine.

Translation Friction: The psalm assumes a destroyed temple, which most scholars associate with the Babylonian destruction of 586 BCE. However, the Asaph attribution and some linguistic features have led others to propose the Assyrian period or even the Maccabean era. The mythological language of verses 12-17 draws on Canaanite creation mythology (the defeat of Yam/Sea and the multi-headed Lotan/Leviathan known from Ugaritic texts), which the psalmist appropriates for YHWH without apology. This is not syncretism but theological conquest — Israel's God is the one who actually did what the Canaanite myths attributed to Baal.

Connections: The Leviathan imagery connects to Job 41, Isaiah 27:1, and the Ugaritic Baal cycle where Baal defeats Lotan (the seven-headed sea serpent). The lament over the destroyed temple parallels Lamentations 1-2 and Psalm 79. The appeal to the covenant (verse 20) connects to the Deuteronomic tradition of covenant faithfulness despite national disaster. The phrase 'How long?' (ad matai) echoes Psalm 13, Psalm 79:5, and Habakkuk 1:2.

¹A maskil of Asaph.

Why, O God, have You rejected us forever?
Why does Your anger smoke against the sheep of Your pasture?

²Remember Your congregation that You acquired long ago, the tribe of Your inheritance that You redeemed — Mount Zion where You have dwelt.

³Lift Your steps toward the perpetual ruins — all the destruction the enemy has wrought in the sanctuary.

⁴Your enemies have roared in the midst of Your meeting place;
they set up their own signs as signs.

⁵It was like men wielding axes in a thicket of trees.

⁶And now — its carved work, all of it,
they smash with hatchet and hammer.

⁷They set Your sanctuary on fire;
to the ground they profaned the dwelling place of Your name.

⁸They said in their hearts, 'Let us crush them altogether.'
They burned every meeting place of God in the land.

⁹We do not see our signs;
there is no longer any prophet,
and no one among us knows how long.

¹⁰How long, O God, will the foe mock?
Will the enemy scorn Your name forever?

¹¹Why do You hold back Your hand?
Your right hand — pull it from Your chest and destroy!

¹²Yet God is my King from of old, working salvation in the midst of the earth.

¹³You split the sea by Your strength;
You shattered the heads of the sea monsters on the waters.

¹⁴You crushed the heads of Leviathan;
You gave him as food to the creatures of the desert.

¹⁵You split open spring and torrent;
You dried up ever-flowing rivers.

¹⁶Yours is the day, Yours also the night;
You established the light and the sun.

¹⁷You fixed all the boundaries of the earth;
summer and winter — You formed them.

¹⁸Remember this: the enemy has mocked, O LORD, and a foolish people has scorned Your name.

¹⁹Do not give the life of Your dove to the wild beast;
do not forget the life of Your afflicted ones forever.

²⁰Look to the covenant,
for the dark places of the land are filled with dens of violence.

²¹Do not let the crushed turn back in shame;
let the afflicted and needy praise Your name.

²²Rise up, O God, defend Your own cause!
Remember the mockery against You from the foolish all day long.

²³Do not forget the clamor of Your foes —
the uproar of those who rise against You, which ascends continually.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The term maskil in the superscription likely indicates a skillful or instructive composition. Its exact meaning is debated, but it appears in thirteen psalm superscriptions and may signal a psalm requiring particular artistry in performance.
2. The word shevet ('tribe, rod, staff') here means 'tribe' — the tribe of God's inheritance, meaning Israel as God's own clan or family. The language of qanah ('to acquire, to purchase, to create') echoes Exodus 15:16 and Deuteronomy 32:6.
3. The phrase harimah pe'amekha ('lift Your steps') is a plea for God to physically walk to the ruins and see what has happened. The word mashu'ot ('ruins, desolations') with netsach ('perpetual') suggests the destruction has been standing long enough to feel permanent. God is being invited to survey the damage.
4. The wordplay on otot ('signs') is pointed: God's signs (the covenant markers, the sacred furnishings) have been replaced by the enemy's signs (military standards, pagan emblems). The desecration is total — even the semiotics of the space have been overwritten.
5. The verse is syntactically difficult, but the image is clear: the invaders attacked the temple's ornate woodwork as if they were lumberjacks felling a forest. The carved panels and cedar work that adorned the sanctuary were hacked apart with axes (qardummot). The comparison to forest clearing emphasizes the brutality — sacred art treated as timber.
6. The pittuchim ('carved engravings') likely refer to the elaborate carved panels of cherubim, palm trees, and open flowers described in 1 Kings 6:29. The kashil ('hatchet') and keilapot ('hammers, pickaxes') are the blunt instruments of demolition. The beauty that Solomon's artisans spent years creating is being smashed in moments.
7. The phrase la-arets ('to the ground') indicates total destruction — not mere damage but complete demolition. The Babylonian destruction of 586 BCE matches this description precisely (2 Kings 25:9).
8. The phrase kol mo'adei El ba-arets ('every meeting place of God in the land') is significant — it suggests not only the Jerusalem temple but all locations where God was worshiped. If this refers to local sanctuaries, synagogues, or regional gathering places, it indicates systematic, nationwide religious destruction.
9. The absence of prophecy is the most terrifying element. In a culture where prophets mediated God's word, the disappearance of prophetic voices meant the complete breakdown of communication between heaven and earth. Amos 8:11-12 describes this as a 'famine of hearing the words of the LORD.'
10. The phrase ad matai ('how long?') is the quintessential lament question — it appears throughout the Psalms and prophets. The verbs yecharef ('will mock, reproach') and yena'ets ('will scorn, blaspheme') target God's shem ('name') — the enemy's mockery is not merely of Israel but of Israel's God.
11. The image of God hiding His hand in His robe while His people suffer is one of the Psalter's most daring anthropomorphisms. It implies that God has the power to act but is choosing not to — a charge the psalmist levels directly.
12. This verse introduces the mythological hymn that forms the psalm's theological core (verses 12-17). The psalmist counters present despair with memory of God's ultimate demonstrations of power.
13. The tanninim appear in Genesis 1:21 as creatures God creates, but here they appear as enemies God defeats. The two traditions coexist in the Hebrew Bible: creation as peaceful ordering (Genesis 1) and creation as combat victory (Psalm 74, Isaiah 51:9-10, Job 26:12-13).
14. The Ugaritic parallel is striking: KTU 1.5.I.1-3 describes Baal defeating Lotan, the fleeing serpent, the twisting serpent, the tyrant with seven heads. Psalm 74:14 transfers this exact mythology to YHWH. Isaiah 27:1 uses nearly identical language for a future eschatological defeat of Leviathan.
15. The verb baqa'ta ('You split open') describes God creating water sources — springs (ma'yan) and torrents (nachal) — by cracking open the earth. But God also controls water by removing it: hovashta naharot eitan ('You dried up mighty rivers'). God both provides and withholds water. This double mastery over water connects creation to Exodus — splitting the sea and drying the Jordan.
16. The sovereignty extends to time itself. The word ma'or ('luminary, light-bearer') may refer to the moon (as in Genesis 1:16, 'the lesser light'), paired with shemesh ('sun'). God owns every hour and created every source of light. The declaration lekha yom af lekha laylah ('Yours is the day, also Yours the night') means there is no time — not even darkness — outside God's dominion.
17. The rhetorical strategy of verses 12-17 is now complete: the psalmist has established God's absolute sovereignty over chaos monsters, water, time, light, geography, and seasons. The implicit question is: if You command all of this, why do You tolerate the destruction of Your temple?
18. The imperative zekhor ('remember') returns from verse 2. The psalmist uses God's own honor as leverage: it is not merely Israel that has been insulted but YHWH's name. The word naval ('foolish, senseless, morally vile') is the same word used to describe Nabal in 1 Samuel 25:25 — a person whose folly is moral, not intellectual.
19. The turtledove (tor) was also a sacrificial bird used by the poor who could not afford a lamb (Leviticus 5:7). The identification of Israel as a turtledove suggests both vulnerability and sacrificial status — the people have become an offering, but not a willing one.
20. The word ne'ot can mean 'pastures' or 'dwelling places' — both readings work. If 'pastures,' the image is of grazing lands turned into sites of violence; if 'dwelling places,' the dark corners of the land have become dens where cruelty lives.

21. The word dakh ('crushed, oppressed, broken') describes someone who has been physically beaten down. The plea is that this person not also be humiliated (nikhlam, 'put to shame'). The alternative — ani ve-eyon yehalelu shemekha ('the afflicted and needy will praise Your name') — promises that rescue will produce worship. God's intervention serves God's own name.
22. The psalm does not record God's answer. Like many laments, it ends in the act of pleading. The resolution is left to God and to history — the psalmist has made his case and now waits.
23. The psalm's final word is tamid ('continually') — the enemies' noise never stops. This is a deliberate contrast with the silence of verse 9 (no prophet, no signs, no knowledge). God's people are silent; God's enemies are loud. The psalm ends with this unbearable imbalance and trusts God to correct it.

Summary: A psalm of divine judgment. After an opening thanksgiving, God speaks directly (verses 3-4), declaring that He will judge with equity at the appointed time and that He is the one who keeps the earth's foundations stable. The psalmist then warns the arrogant not to lift their horns, because exaltation comes from God alone. The central image is the cup of judgment — foaming wine mixed with spices — that the wicked must drain to the dregs. The psalm closes with praise and a promise that the horns of the wicked will be cut off while the horns of the righteous are lifted high.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 75 is one of the rare psalms where God speaks in first person within the body of the poem. God's direct speech in verses 3-4 gives the psalm an oracular quality — the psalmist is not merely praying but reporting what God has said. The image of the cup (verse 9) is one of the Hebrew Bible's most powerful metaphors for judgment: God holds a cup of foaming, spiced wine, and the wicked must drink every drop. This cup reappears in Isaiah 51:17, Jeremiah 25:15-28, and Revelation 14:10. The psalm's theology is compact and unyielding: God alone determines who rises and who falls.

Translation Friction: *The phrase al tashchit ('do not destroy') in the superscription is shared with Psalms 57, 58, and 59. It may refer to a tune, a liturgical instruction, or a thematic marker. Its meaning is uncertain. The shift between speakers in the psalm (congregation in verse 2, God in verses 3-4, the psalmist in verses 5-10) requires careful attention — without quotation marks in the Hebrew, identifying who is speaking depends on context and content.*

Connections: The cup of judgment imagery connects to Isaiah 51:17-22 (Jerusalem drinks the cup of staggering), Jeremiah 25:15-28 (the cup passed to all nations), Habakkuk 2:16 (the cup of the LORD's right hand), and Jesus' prayer in Gethsemane ('Let this cup pass from me,' Matthew 26:39). The horn imagery connects to Hannah's song (1 Samuel 2:1, 10) and the Magnificat tradition. Psalm 75 answers the plea of Psalm 74 — if Psalm 74 asks 'How long?', Psalm 75 answers 'At the appointed time.'

¹For the director of music. To 'Do Not Destroy.' A psalm of Asaph. A song.

²We give thanks to You, O God;
we give thanks, for Your name is near.
Your wonders are recounted.

³"When I seize the appointed time,
I Myself will judge with equity."

⁴"When the earth totters with all who dwell in it, it is I who steady its pillars." Selah.

⁵I said to the arrogant, 'Do not boast!'
and to the wicked, 'Do not lift up your horn!'

⁶Do not raise your horn on high;
do not speak with an arrogant neck.

⁷For not from the east or from the west, and not from the desert comes exaltation —

⁸but God is the judge:
this one He brings low,
and that one He raises up.

⁹For a cup is in the hand of the LORD,
and the wine foams, full of spiced mixture.
He pours from it,
and all the wicked of the earth must drain its dregs and drink.

¹⁰But I will declare it forever;
I will make music to the God of Jacob.

¹¹All the horns of the wicked I will cut off, but the horns of the righteous will be raised high.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription contains multiple performance indicators: lamnatse'ach ('for the director'), al tashchit ('do not destroy' — likely a tune name), mizmor ('psalm' — a sung composition with instrumental accompaniment), and shir ('song'). The combination suggests a liturgical piece with specific musical requirements.
2. The verb sipperu ('they recount, they tell') can be read as 'they declare' or 'Your wonders declare' — the subject is ambiguous. Either the community tells of God's wonders, or the wonders themselves serve as testimony.
3. God's direct speech begins here without a speech formula ('God said'). The shift from 'we' (verse 2) to 'I' signals the change in speaker. This oracular style — God speaking within a psalm — appears also in Psalms 46:11, 50:5, 81:7-17, and 82:2-7.
4. The selah at the end may indicate a musical interlude or a pause for reflection. Its exact meaning is debated, but its placement after God's declaration of cosmic sovereignty creates a moment of silence that allows the claim to resonate.
5. The horn metaphor is pervasive in the Hebrew Bible: horns represent strength (Deuteronomy 33:17), royal power (1 Samuel 2:10), and aggressive self-assertion. To 'lift the horn' is to claim authority and dominance.
6. The phrase be-tsavvar ataq ('with an arrogant/stiff neck') describes someone who holds their head high in defiance, refusing to bow. The word ataq ('arrogant, presumptuous, old/hardened') suggests stubbornness calcified into permanent posture. The stiff-necked person cannot look down at the vulnerable or up at God — they can only look straight ahead at their own ambition.
7. The four compass directions are reduced to three (east, west, south), with north conspicuously absent. Some scholars suggest this is because God's dwelling was associated with the north (tsafon, cf. Psalm 48:3 and Isaiah 14:13), and the psalmist is about to reveal that exaltation comes from God, not from any earthly direction.
8. This verse is the psalm's theological thesis: sovereignty over human destiny belongs to God alone. It answers the arrogance described in verses 5-6 and provides the foundation for the judgment imagery in verse 9.
9. The cup of wrath becomes a major prophetic image: Jeremiah is told to make all nations drink from God's cup of fury (Jeremiah 25:15-28), and Isaiah tells Jerusalem she has drunk the cup of staggering to its dregs (Isaiah 51:17). In the New Testament, Jesus asks the Father to 'let this cup pass' (Matthew 26:39), identifying the cross with the cup of divine judgment.
10. The psalmist responds to the vision of judgment with worship. The phrase Elohei Ya'aqov ('the God of Jacob') is a covenant name — it connects God's present act of judgment to His ancient relationship with Israel's ancestor. The commitment to declare le-olam ('forever') matches the permanence of God's sovereignty.
11. The verb agaddea ('I will cut off') is from gada, meaning to hew, to chop, to cut down — the same verb used for cutting down Asherah poles and idolatrous pillars (Deuteronomy 7:5). The horns of the wicked are treated as objects of demolition.

Summary: A victory hymn celebrating God's defense of Zion. God is known in Judah, His dwelling is in Salem (Jerusalem), and from Zion He has shattered the weapons of war — the flashing arrows, the shields, the swords, the battle itself. The warriors who came against the city lie stunned and motionless, unable even to lift their hands. The psalm declares that God's rebuke from heaven silences the earth, that He rises in judgment to save the humble, and that even human wrath serves His purposes. All nations are called to bring tribute to the One who is terrifying to kings.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 76 presents God as a warrior of terrifying stillness. He does not fight in the conventional sense — He rebukes, and warriors fall asleep. The 'sleep' of verse 6 (nirdemu, 'they were put into a deep sleep') is not death but paralysis: the enemy soldiers cannot function. God wins by overwhelming the enemy's capacity to act. This is holy war reduced to its theological essence: God does not need Israel's army; He needs only to speak. The psalm may reflect the miraculous deliverance of Jerusalem from Sennacherib's siege (2 Kings 19:35), when the Assyrian army was destroyed overnight without a battle.

Translation Friction: The name Salem (Shalem) in verse 3 is an archaic name for Jerusalem, appearing elsewhere only in Genesis 14:18 (Melchizedek, king of Salem). Its use here is deliberately archaic, evoking Jerusalem's pre-Israelite identity as a city of ancient holiness. The phrase sukko ('His shelter/lair') in the same verse uses a word that can mean 'booth' (as in Sukkot) or 'lair' (as of a lion) — the ambiguity is productive, presenting God simultaneously as tent-dweller and predator.

Connections: The deliverance of Zion connects to the Zion theology of Psalms 46, 48, and 87 — the conviction that God's presence in Jerusalem makes the city inviolable. The defeat of weapons (verse 4) parallels Psalm 46:10 ('He breaks the bow and shatters the spear'). The phrase nora attah ('You are terrifying') connects to the broader theme of divine terror in Psalm 68:36 and Habakkuk 3:2. The historical background likely involves the Assyrian crisis of 701 BCE (Isaiah 36-37, 2 Kings 18-19).

¹For the director of music. With stringed instruments. A psalm of Asaph. A song.

²God is known in Judah;
His name is great in Israel.

³His shelter is in Salem, and His dwelling place in Zion.

⁴There He shattered the flashing arrows of the bow, the shield, the sword, and the battle itself. Selah.

⁵Radiant are You, majestic, more than the mountains of prey.

⁶The warriors of bold heart were plundered;
they sank into their sleep, and none of the soldiers could lift their hands.

⁷At Your rebuke, O God of Jacob, both rider and horse lay stunned.

⁸You — You are to be feared!
Who can stand before You when Your anger burns?

9From heaven You proclaimed judgment;
the earth feared and fell silent,

10when God rose for judgment, to save all the humble of the earth. Selah.

11For human wrath will praise You;
the remnant of wrath You will wear as a belt.

12Make vows and fulfill them to the LORD your God;
let all who surround Him bring tribute to the One who is to be feared.

13He cuts off the spirit of rulers;
He is terrifying to the kings of the earth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The term binginot ('with stringed instruments') indicates accompaniment by the nevel (harp) and kinnor (lyre). The combination of mizmor and shir suggests both instrumental and vocal performance.
2. The pairing of Judah and Israel may suggest a pre-schism or reunification context, or it may simply be poetic parallelism using two names for the same people.
3. The name Shalem may be related to shalom ('peace'), making Jerusalem 'the city of peace' — an ironic name given its violent history. The psalmist may be playing on this: in the city of peace, the God of peace destroys the weapons of war.
4. The word reshef can mean 'flame, spark, arrow' and is also the name of a Canaanite deity of plague and war. The psalmist may be deliberately claiming that YHWH defeats not only human weapons but the divine forces the enemies believed were behind them.
5. The phrase harerei taref is unique in the Hebrew Bible. Some emend taref ('prey') to ad ('eternity') or ered ('I descend'), but the Masoretic reading is defensible: God is more majestic than the predatory mountains — more dangerous, more powerful, more commanding than the heights where eagles and lions hunt.
6. If this psalm reflects the Sennacherib event of 701 BCE, 2 Kings 19:35 reports that 'the angel of the LORD went out and struck down 185,000 in the Assyrian camp.' The psalmist describes the same event in poetic terms: the soldiers 'slept' and could not fight.
7. The verb nirdam ('was put into deep sleep') is related to tardemah, the deep sleep God imposed on Adam in Genesis 2:21 and on Abram in Genesis 15:12. It is a divinely induced unconsciousness — not natural sleep but supernatural incapacitation.
8. The doubled attah... attah ('You... You') is emphatic — the psalmist points directly at God with awe. The rhetorical question 'who can stand?' (mi ya'amod lefanekha) expects the answer 'no one.' When God's af ('anger, nose, wrath') is aroused, every human position collapses.
9. The verb hishma'ta ('You caused to be heard, You proclaimed') indicates that God's judgment was audible — it came as a sound from heaven. The earth's response is twofold: yar'ah ('it feared') and shaqatah ('it fell silent, it was still'). Terror produces silence — the entire created order holds its breath when God speaks judgment.
10. The anvavim ('humble ones') are those who have been bowed down by oppression and who wait for God's deliverance. They are the theological heirs of the aniyyim ('afflicted') in Psalm 72:2, 4, 12-14.
11. This verse has been variously translated, with some reading tachgor as 'You will restrain' rather than 'You will gird Yourself with.' The image of God wearing human wrath as a belt is striking: it means nothing escapes God's sovereignty, not even the forces arrayed against Him.
12. The imperative nidru ve-shallemu ('vow and pay') calls for fulfilled commitment — promises to God must be kept. The phrase kol sevivav ('all around Him') includes not just Israelites but all surrounding nations. The word shai ('tribute, gift') is the same term used for the gifts brought to Solomon (Psalm 72:10). The designation la-mora ('to the feared One, to the Awesome One') closes the psalm on the note of terror that has been its consistent theme.
13. The verb batsar ('to cut off, to harvest grapes, to fortify') here means 'to clip, to restrain, to cut short.' The image is of a vintner cutting grape clusters — God harvests the arrogance of rulers as easily as cutting fruit from a vine.

Summary: A psalm of Asaph that moves from personal anguish to cosmic memory. The psalmist cries out to God at night, his spirit fainting, his hands stretched out without rest. He torments himself with questions: Has God rejected forever? Has His faithful love ceased? Has He forgotten mercy? Then the psalm pivots sharply at verse 11: 'I will remember the deeds of the LORD.' The second half recounts God's power at the Red Sea — thunder, lightning, shaking earth, waters writhing in fear — culminating in the declaration that God led His people like a flock through the hand of Moses and Aaron.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 77 is constructed around a dramatic psychological pivot. Verses 2-10 describe a crisis so severe that even the act of remembering God causes pain (verse 4, 'I think of God and I groan'). The psalmist's questions in verses 8-10 are among the most daring in the Psalter — he asks whether God's chesed has permanently ceased, whether God's promise has failed, whether God has forgotten how to be gracious. These are not rhetorical questions; they feel like genuine, agonized uncertainty. Then verse 11 turns everything with the word ezkorah ('I will remember'). The same faculty that produced pain (remembering God and groaning) becomes the instrument of rescue (remembering God's deeds). Memory itself is redeemed.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew text of verse 11 contains a significant textual note. The word shanot ('years' or 'the changing of') has been read as both 'the years of the right hand of the Most High' and 'the changing (i.e., the failing) of the right hand of the Most High.' The Masoretic marginal note identifies this as a verse boundary between crisis and resolution: the first reading belongs to the lament, the second to the turning point. We follow the Masoretic verse division. The theophany in verses 17-20 draws on the same storm-god imagery found in Canaanite religion and in other biblical theophanies (Judges 5, Habakkuk 3, Psalm 18).

Connections: The Red Sea theophany connects to Exodus 14-15, Habakkuk 3:8-15, and Psalm 114. The questions about God's chesed (verse 9) echo the crisis of Psalm 89:50 and Lamentations 3:22. The resolution through memory anticipates Psalm 78's extended historical retrospective. The final verse mentioning Moses and Aaron connects to Psalm 99:6 and the priestly-prophetic tradition. The storm theophany connects to Psalm 18:8-16 and Psalm 29.

¹For the director of music. According to Jeduthun. A psalm of Asaph.

²My voice is to God, and I cry out;
my voice is to God — may He hear me!

³In the day of my distress I sought the Lord;
my hand was stretched out at night without rest.
My soul refused to be comforted.

⁴I think of God and I groan;
I meditate, and my spirit faints. Selah.

⁵You hold my eyelids open;
I am so troubled that I cannot speak.

⁶I consider the days of old,
the years of ages past.

⁷I recall my song in the night;
I meditate in my heart;
my spirit searches intently.

⁸Will the Lord reject forever?
Will He never again show favor?

⁹Has His faithful love ceased forever?
Has His promise come to an end for all generations?

¹⁰Has God forgotten to be gracious?
Has He in anger shut up His compassion? Selah.

¹¹And I said, 'This is my grief:
that the right hand of the Most High has changed.'

¹²I will remember the deeds of the LORD;
yes, I will remember Your wonders of old.

¹³I will meditate on all Your work and reflect on Your mighty deeds.

¹⁴Your way, O God, is holy.
What god is as great as our God?

¹⁵You are the God who does wonders;
You have made Your strength known among the peoples.

¹⁶You redeemed Your people with Your arm —
the children of Jacob and Joseph. Selah.

¹⁷The waters saw You, O God — the waters saw You and writhed;
the very depths trembled.

¹⁸The clouds poured out water;
the skies gave forth thunder;
Your arrows flew in every direction.

¹⁹The voice of Your thunder was in the whirlwind;
lightning lit up the world;
the earth trembled and shook.

²⁰Your way was through the sea,
Your path through the mighty waters,
and Your footprints were not known.

²¹You led Your people like a flock
by the hand of Moses and Aaron.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Jeduthun was one of the three chief musicians appointed by David alongside Asaph and Heman (1 Chronicles 25:1-6). The phrase al yedutun may mean 'in the manner of Jeduthun' or 'to the tune of Jeduthun' — indicating a musical tradition associated with this Levitical guild.
2. The verb tša'aq ('to cry out') is the specific vocabulary of distress-calling in the Hebrew Bible — it is the cry of the oppressed to a superior who has the power to intervene. It is not prayer as meditation but prayer as emergency alert.

3. The verb niggarah is often emended to niggarah ('was poured out') or read as 'streamed' (referring to tears). The Masoretic pointing supports 'was stretched out' — hands extended upward in the posture of supplication throughout the night.
4. The verb hamah ('to groan, to murmur, to be in turmoil') describes an involuntary sound of distress — it is what happens when thought becomes unbearable and the body responds with noise. The verb ataf ('to be faint, to be wrapped, to be enveloped') suggests being smothered or overwhelmed.
5. The attribution of insomnia to God is a bold theological move — it means God is not merely absent but actively involved in the psalmist's suffering. This is harder to bear than divine indifference.
6. The psalmist reaches backward: yamim mi-qedem ('days from of old') and shenot olamim ('years of eternity'). He is searching history for precedent — has God ever acted like this before? Was there a time when God was faithful? The search through memory is both an act of desperation and a prelude to the resolution that comes in verses 11-12.
7. The progression from external cry (verse 2) to internal meditation (verse 7) shows the psalmist moving deeper inward, trying every avenue of approach to the problem. Neither outward prayer nor inward reflection has produced resolution.
8. These questions are not answered within the psalm. The resolution comes not from answers but from a change in the direction of memory — from remembering personal suffering to remembering God's historical acts.
9. The word chesed is one of the most important words in the Hebrew Bible and resists single-word translation. It combines loyalty, love, faithfulness, kindness, and covenant commitment. To ask whether chesed has ceased is to ask whether God's fundamental character has changed.
10. The word rachamim ('compassion') derives from rechem ('womb') — it is the visceral, maternal feeling of tenderness. To ask whether God has shut His rachamim is to ask whether the most instinctive form of divine love has been suppressed.
11. The Masoretic tradition places a verse break here that separates the lament (verses 2-11a) from the resolution (verses 11b-21). Some scholars read shenot as 'years' and connect it to verse 12: 'I will remember the years of the right hand of the Most High' — making it the first statement of recovery rather than the last statement of despair. Both readings are theologically coherent.
12. The doubled 'I will remember' (ezkor... ezkerah) mirrors the doubled 'my voice to God' in verse 2. The psalm's structure is built on repetition with redirection: the same faculties (voice, memory) that expressed the crisis now express the resolution.
13. The verb hagiti ('I will meditate, I will murmur') is the same verb used in Psalm 1:2 for meditating on Torah. The psalmist turns his restless, sleepless mind toward a new subject: God's po'olekha ('Your work') and alilotekha ('Your deeds, Your exploits'). The cure for destructive meditation is redirected meditation.
14. The echo of Exodus 15:11 ('Who is like You among the gods, O LORD?') is deliberate — the psalmist is moving toward the Red Sea memory, and the language of the Song of the Sea begins to surface.
15. The phrase oseh fele ('who does wonders') is a title — it defines God by His characteristic action. The verb hoda'ta ('You have made known') means God's power is not hidden but publicly displayed ba-ammim ('among the peoples') — not just Israel but the nations.
16. The mention of Joseph alongside Jacob suggests the psalmist has the entire twelve-tribe nation in view, not just Judah. Joseph was the ancestor of Ephraim and Manasseh, the dominant northern tribes.
17. The personification of water 'seeing' God and responding with terror is one of the most powerful images in the Psalter. Water, in the ancient Near Eastern worldview, represented chaos — and here chaos itself is afraid of God.
18. The theophany builds: zorm means 'to pour, to stream' — the clouds become waterfalls. The shekhaqim ('skies, clouds') give qol ('voice, thunder'). God's chatsatsekha ('Your arrows') are lightning bolts that yithallakhu ('go about, fly in all directions'). The storm is God's chariot, His weapon, His mode of transport.
19. The word galgal is sometimes translated 'heaven' or 'whirlwind.' Its root meaning is 'something that rolls' — a wheel, a whirlwind, a rolling thunder. The image is of God's voice rolling across the sky like a wheel of sound.
20. The invisible footprints are a metaphor for divine hiddenness: God acts, but He does not leave the kind of evidence that eliminates the need for faith. The psalmist in verses 2-10 was looking for visible signs and finding none; now he understands that God's way has always been through waters that close behind Him.
21. The abrupt ending is deliberate. The psalm does not resolve into a statement of certainty about the present — it resolves into a memory of the past and an implied trust for the future. The psalmist's insomnia, his questions, his anguish — none of them are explicitly answered. What changes is the direction of his gaze: from inward suffering to backward memory to forward trust.

Summary: A vast historical psalm recounting Israel's story from Egypt through the wilderness to the election of David and Zion. Asaph narrates the Exodus plagues, the splitting of the sea, manna and quail in the desert, the people's rebellion, God's anger and compassion, and the final choice of Judah over Ephraim as the seat of God's presence. The psalm's purpose is pedagogical: it is a teaching poem (maskil) designed to transmit the nation's sacred history to the next generation so they will not repeat their ancestors' failures.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 78 is the second-longest psalm in the Psalter (after Psalm 119) and functions as a condensed, interpreted history of Israel. Its most striking feature is its relentless honesty about Israel's failure. The nation is described as a treacherous bow that misses its target (verse 57), a generation whose heart was not steadfast (verse 37), people who tested God again and again (verse 41). Yet God's response is not abandonment but restrained compassion: 'He, being compassionate, atoned for their iniquity and did not destroy them; many times He turned back His anger' (verse 38). The psalm's structure builds toward the rejection of Ephraim/Shiloh and the election of Judah/Zion/David — a theological interpretation of history that explains why the northern shrine fell and the southern dynasty endured.

Translation Friction: The psalm's clear anti-Ephraimite stance (verse 9-11, 67) reflects a Judahite perspective that reads the fall of the northern shrine at Shiloh as divine judgment. This is theological interpretation of history, not neutral reporting. The plague narrative (verses 44-51) follows a different order than Exodus, omitting some plagues and rearranging others — suggesting the psalmist is drawing on an independent tradition or reshaping the material for poetic purposes. The description of God as a warrior who 'awoke as from sleep' (verse 65) is anthropomorphic language that some find theologically uncomfortable.

Connections: The psalm parallels the historical retrospectives in Deuteronomy 32 (the Song of Moses), Nehemiah 9, and Psalm 106. The manna narrative connects to Exodus 16 and Numbers 11. The plague sequence corresponds loosely to Exodus 7-12. The election of David and Zion connects to 2 Samuel 5-7. The phrase 'a deceitful bow' (verse 57) reappears in Hosea 7:16. The pedagogical framework echoes Deuteronomy 6:6-9 and its command to teach the next generation.

¹A maskil of Asaph.

Listen, my people, to my teaching;
turn your ears to the words of my mouth.

²I will open my mouth in a parable;
I will pour out riddles from of old.

³What we have heard and known,
what our ancestors told us —

⁴we will not hide them from their children.
To the coming generation we will recount
the praiseworthy deeds of the LORD,
His strength and the wonders He has done.

⁵He established a testimony in Jacob and set a law in Israel, which He commanded our ancestors to make known to their children,

⁶so that the next generation would know — children yet to be born — and they would rise and tell their own children,

⁷so that they would put their confidence in God and not forget the works of God, but keep His commandments —

⁸and not be like their ancestors — a stubborn and rebellious generation, a generation that did not prepare its heart and whose spirit was not faithful to God.

⁹The sons of Ephraim, armed with bows, turned back on the day of battle.

¹⁰They did not keep the covenant of God and refused to walk in His law.

¹¹They forgot His deeds and the wonders He had shown them.

¹²Before their ancestors He did wonders in the land of Egypt, in the fields of Zoan.

¹³He split the sea and brought them through;
 He made the waters stand like a wall.

¹⁴He led them with a cloud by day and all night with a light of fire.

¹⁵He split rocks in the wilderness and gave them drink as from the great deep.

¹⁶He brought streams from the crag and made water flow down like rivers.

¹⁷Yet they kept on sinning against Him,
 rebelling against the Most High in the dry land.

¹⁸They tested God in their hearts by demanding food for their appetite.

¹⁹They spoke against God, saying,
 'Can God set a table in the wilderness?'

²⁰Yes, He struck the rock and water gushed out, torrents overflowed.
 But can He also give bread?
 Can He provide meat for His people?

²¹Therefore the LORD heard and was furious;
fire blazed against Jacob,
and anger rose against Israel, ²²because they did not believe in God and did not trust in His salvation.
²³Yet He commanded the clouds above and opened the doors of heaven.
²⁴He rained down manna upon them to eat and gave them the grain of heaven.
²⁵Mortals ate the bread of the mighty;
He sent them food in abundance.
²⁶He set loose the east wind in the heavens and drove the south wind by His power.
²⁷He rained meat on them like dust,
winged birds like the sand of the seas.
²⁸He made them fall in the midst of their camp,
all around their dwellings.
²⁹They ate and were fully satisfied;
He brought them what they craved.
³⁰They had not yet turned from their craving — the food was still in their mouths — ³¹when the anger of God rose against them.
He killed the sturdiest among them and struck down the young men of Israel.
³²Despite all this, they kept sinning and did not believe in His wonders.
³³So He consumed their days in futility and their years in sudden terror.
³⁴When He killed them, they sought Him;
they turned back and searched earnestly for God.
³⁵They remembered that God was their rock, that the Most High God was their redeemer.
³⁶But they flattered Him with their mouths and lied to Him with their tongues.
³⁷Their heart was not steadfast with Him,
and they were not faithful to His covenant.

³⁸But He, being compassionate, atoned for their iniquity and did not destroy them.

Many times He turned back His anger and did not rouse all His wrath.

³⁹He remembered that they were flesh,
a breath that passes and does not return.

⁴⁰How often they rebelled against Him in the wilderness and grieved Him in the wasteland!

⁴¹Again and again they tested God and provoked the Holy One of Israel.

⁴²They did not remember His hand,
the day He redeemed them from the foe —

⁴³when He set His signs in Egypt,
His wonders in the fields of Zoan.

⁴⁴He turned their rivers to blood and their streams so they could not drink.

⁴⁵He sent swarms among them that devoured them,
and frogs that destroyed them.

⁴⁶He gave their crops to the grasshopper and their labor to the locust.

⁴⁷He killed their vines with hail and their sycamores with frost.

⁴⁸He gave over their cattle to the hail and their livestock to bolts of lightning.

⁴⁹He sent against them His burning anger — fury, rage, and distress —
a company of destroying angels.

⁵⁰He cleared a path for His anger.
He did not spare their lives from death but gave them over to the plague.

⁵¹He struck every firstborn in Egypt,
the firstfruits of their vigor in the tents of Ham.

⁵²He led His people out like sheep and guided them like a flock through the wilderness.

⁵³He led them in safety and they were not afraid, but the sea covered their enemies.

⁵⁴He brought them to His holy territory, to the mountain His right hand had acquired.

⁵⁵He drove out nations before them and apportioned them an inheritance by measured line;
He settled the tribes of Israel in their tents.

⁵⁶Yet they tested and rebelled against the Most High God and did not keep His decrees.

⁵⁷They turned back and were faithless like their ancestors;
they twisted like a treacherous bow.

⁵⁸They provoked Him with their high places and made Him jealous with their carved images.

⁵⁹God heard and was furious;
He utterly rejected Israel.

⁶⁰He abandoned the tabernacle at Shiloh,
the tent He had pitched among mortals.

⁶¹He gave His strength into captivity and His splendor into the enemy's hand.

⁶²He gave His people over to the sword and was furious with His inheritance.

⁶³Fire consumed their young men, and their young women had no wedding songs.

⁶⁴His priests fell by the sword, and their widows could not weep.

⁶⁵Then the Lord awoke as from sleep, like a warrior shouting from wine.

⁶⁶He struck His enemies from behind;
He put them to lasting shame.

⁶⁷He rejected the tent of Joseph and did not choose the tribe of Ephraim.

⁶⁸He chose the tribe of Judah,
Mount Zion, which He loved.

⁶⁹He built His sanctuary like the heights, like the earth He established forever.

⁷⁰and took him from the sheepfolds.
He chose David His servant

71From following the nursing ewes He brought him to shepherd Jacob His people and Israel His inheritance.

72He shepherded them with a blameless heart and guided them with the skill of his hands.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word torah in its original sense means 'instruction, direction, guidance' — from yarah ('to throw, to shoot, to direct'). The broader meaning of 'the Law of Moses' developed later. Here it refers to the pedagogical content of the psalm.
2. Matthew 13:35 quotes this verse as fulfilled in Jesus' use of parables, connecting the psalm's teaching method to the gospel tradition. In its original context, the 'parable' is the entire national history read as a lesson.
3. The chain of transmission is explicit: ancestors (avoteinu) told the current generation (shamanu, 'we heard'), and the current generation will tell the next (verse 4). This is oral tradition's self-conscious claim to legitimacy — the story has been faithfully transmitted.
4. This verse establishes the psalm's primary purpose: intergenerational transmission of sacred history. The concern is not antiquarian but existential — if the next generation does not know this story, they will repeat the failures described in what follows.
5. The parallel edut ('testimony, witness') and torah ('law, instruction') refers to God's covenant requirements — the commands and teachings that define Israel's relationship with God. The transmission is not optional but commanded (tsivvah): teaching the next generation is itself a divine mandate.
6. The chain extends three generations: the current generation tells the next, who tells the one after that. The phrase banim yivvaedu ('children yet to be born') acknowledges that the audience includes people who do not yet exist. History is told for the sake of the unborn.
7. The three-part purpose: kislam ('their confidence') in God, not forgetting God's deeds, and keeping God's commands. Memory and obedience are linked: to forget what God has done leads directly to disobeying what God has commanded.
8. The phrase dor sorer u-moreh echoes Deuteronomy 21:18, where the stubborn and rebellious son is the extreme case of covenant disloyalty within a family. Applied to a generation, it means the entire people behaved like a delinquent child toward their divine parent.
9. The historical reference is obscure — no specific battle of Ephraimite retreat is recorded. The charge may be metaphorical: Ephraim was equipped for covenant faithfulness but turned away when tested. The military language describes spiritual failure.
10. The accusation is twofold: covenant violation (lo shamru berit Elohim) and Torah rejection (uvtorato me'anu lalekhet, 'in His instruction they refused to walk'). Walking (halakh) is the standard metaphor for living according to God's commands — they refused to move in the direction God indicated.
11. Forgetfulness is the root sin in Deuteronomistic theology. The verb vayishkechu ('they forgot') is the opposite of the remembering commanded in verses 3-7. The cycle is clear: ancestors witnessed wonders, forgot them, and fell into rebellion. The psalm exists to break this cycle.
12. Zoan (Tsoan) is the Hebrew name for the Egyptian city of Tanis in the eastern Nile Delta, near the traditional location of the Israelite settlement in Goshen. By naming the specific location, the psalmist anchors the miraculous events in a real, identifiable place.
13. The verb baqa ('He split') is the same used in Psalm 74:15 for splitting springs open. The word ned ('heap, wall, dam') describes water standing upright in defiance of gravity — the same image as Exodus 15:8. The sea becomes architecture, solid walls flanking the path of escape.
14. The pillar of cloud (Exodus 13:21-22) guided by day, the pillar of fire by night. God provided continuous navigation — no hour was uncovered. The phrase kol hallaylah ('all the night') emphasizes that darkness offered no gap in divine guidance.
15. The verb yevaqqea ('He split') describes God cracking open tsurim ('rocks, cliffs') to produce water. The comparison ki-tehomot rabbah ('as from the great deep') is hyperbolic: the water from the rock was as abundant as the primordial ocean. This refers to the Meribah/Massah incidents (Exodus 17:1-7, Numbers 20:1-13).
16. The nozelim ('streams, flowing waters') from the sela ('crag, cliff') were not a trickle but kanneharot ('like rivers'). The miracle's scale matches the need — water for an entire nation in the desert required rivers, not drops.
17. The phrase vayyosifu od lachato ('they continued still to sin') uses the construction of ongoing, compounding rebellion — sin upon sin. The word tsiyyah ('dry land, parched ground') is ironic: God just provided rivers from rock, and they respond by rebelling in the very place of His provision.
18. The verb vaynassu ('they tested') is from nasah — the same verb used for God's testing of Abraham (Genesis 22:1). Here the roles are reversed: the people test God. The demand for okhel lenafesham ('food for their appetite/soul') is not about survival but about desire — they want more than manna.

19. The phrase 'Can God set a table in the wilderness?' becomes an ironic echo throughout the psalm. God can set a table anywhere — and He does, with manna and quail — but the provision does not cure the people's distrust.
20. The people concede the water miracle (verse 15-16) but doubt the next provision. Each miracle is acknowledged but deemed insufficient for the next challenge. Their faith is always one step behind God's action.
21. God's response is immediate: shama vayyit'abbar ('He heard and was furious'). The verb it'abbar ('to become angry, to overflow with wrath') suggests anger that erupts uncontrollably. The 'fire' (esh) may be literal (Numbers 11:1-3 records fire consuming the camp's edges) or metaphorical for divine wrath.
22. The double negative — lo he'eminu ('they did not believe') and lo batchu ('they did not trust') — diagnoses the core problem: unbelief. The specific object of unbelief is bishu'ato ('in His salvation') — they doubted God's ability and willingness to rescue.
23. The 'doors of heaven' imagery appears in Genesis 7:11 (the flood) and Malachi 3:10 (blessing). God's provision comes from the same heavenly reservoir as His judgment — the door swings both ways.
24. The word man ('manna') is explained in Exodus 16:15 through the question man hu ('What is it?'). The parallel term degan shamayim ('grain of heaven') elevates manna to the status of celestial food — bread from God's own table. It is not emergency rations but heaven's own produce.
25. The phrase lechem abbirim ('bread of the mighty ones') has been interpreted as 'bread of angels' (so the LXX and KJV), 'bread of the mighty,' or 'bread of the strong.' The word abbirim can refer to angels, warriors, or bulls. The point is that this food belongs to a higher order of being — humans ate what was not originally meant for them. The word lasova ('to satisfaction, to fullness') emphasizes abundance.
26. God controls the winds as instruments: the qadim ('east wind') and teman ('south wind') are dispatched to carry the quail. The verb yassa ('He set in motion, He caused to journey') presents the wind as a traveling agent sent on a mission.
27. The comparisons — ke-afar ('like dust') and ke-chol yammim ('like the sand of the seas') — are the standard Hebrew idioms for uncountable abundance (Genesis 13:16, 22:17). The quail were not a few birds but a blizzard of meat covering the camp.
28. The quail landed beqerev machanahu ('in the middle of their camp') and saviv lemishkenotav ('around their tents'). The provision was delivered directly to their doors — they did not have to go far to gather it.
29. The word ta'avatam ('their craving, their desire') is from avah ('to desire, to crave') — the same root used for the place name Qivrot hat-Ta'avah ('Graves of Craving') in Numbers 11:34. God gave them exactly what they wanted, and the getting proved deadly.
30. The phrase lo zaru mitta'avatam ('they had not turned away from their craving') means the desire was still active, undiminished even by receiving what was desired. This is the nature of craving: fulfillment does not satisfy it. And then judgment arrives while the food is literally still in their mouths.
31. The word mishmanneihem ('their sturdiest, their fattest, their most robust') describes the healthiest members of the community — those who should have been least vulnerable. The bachurei Yisrael ('young men of Israel') were the prime of the nation. God's judgment targeted strength itself, proving that no human vitality can resist divine anger.
32. The phrase bekhlo zot ('despite all this, in spite of all this') is the psalm's refrain of astonishment: despite provision, despite judgment, despite everything, the pattern continued. Rebellion was not a one-time failure but a chronic condition.
33. The word hevel ('vanity, breath, futility') is Ecclesiastes' signature word — here it describes days that amount to nothing. Their years ended in behalah ('terror, sudden destruction'). The wilderness generation's forty years of wandering are summarized in a single devastating couplet.
34. The bitter irony: only death prompted repentance. The verb darash ('to seek, to inquire') and shichar ('to search earnestly, to seek early') describe intense pursuit of God — but only after judgment had fallen. Their piety was reactive, not proactive.
35. Under duress, memory returned: Elohim tsuram ('God was their rock') and El Elyon go'alam ('the Most High God was their redeemer'). But the next verse reveals that this memory was superficial — it produced flattery rather than genuine repentance.
36. The accusation that Israel lied to God is one of the psalm's most shocking moments. It implies that religious speech can be false even when directed at the omniscient deity — that humans are capable of praying without meaning what they say.
37. The phrase libbam lo nakhon immo ('their heart was not established with Him') echoes verse 8 — the same diagnosis applied to the same chronic condition. Faithlessness to the berit ('covenant') is the root: the external performance of religion without internal commitment.
38. The theology of divine restraint in this verse anticipates Paul's argument in Romans 9:22 about God's patience with 'vessels of wrath.' The psalmist's point is not that God lacks anger but that His compassion repeatedly overrides it.
39. This verse echoes Psalm 103:14-16 ('He knows our frame; He remembers that we are dust'). God's memory of human frailty becomes the ground of mercy — He does not expect more than flesh can deliver.
40. The verb ya'atsi'vuhu ('they grieved Him, they caused Him pain') attributes emotional response to God. Israel's rebellion does not merely violate a contract; it wounds a person. The yeshimon ('wasteland, desolation') is the harshest desert terrain — rebellion in the place of maximum dependence.
41. The phrase vayyashuvu vaynassu ('they turned back and tested') indicates repetitive behavior — it happened over and over. The verb hitvu (from tavah, 'to mark, to set a limit, to provoke') means they 'set limits' on the Qadosh Yisrael ('Holy One of Israel') — they defined what God could and could not do based on their own expectations. Limiting God is the theological sin at the heart of their rebellion.

42. Forgetfulness again: lo zakhru et yado ('they did not remember His hand'). The 'hand' of God (yad) is His power in action — specifically, the power displayed at the Exodus. The yom ('day') when He padam ('redeemed them') from the tsar ('adversary, foe') is the foundational event. What follows (verses 43-51) is the psalmist's retelling of the plagues to remind them of what they forgot.
43. The retelling returns to Zoan (verse 12) — the Egyptian city in the delta region. The otot ('signs') and moftim ('wonders') are the plagues, now recounted in a sequence that differs from Exodus.
44. The first plague: water to blood (Exodus 7:14-25). The ye'oreihem ('their rivers/canals') is the Nile and its channels — the lifeblood of Egyptian civilization. Turning it to dam ('blood') struck at Egypt's most essential resource.
45. The arov ('swarm') — the fourth plague (Exodus 8:20-32) — may refer to flies, mosquitoes, or mixed swarms of insects. The tsefardea ('frogs') — the second plague — destroyed their land. The order differs from Exodus, suggesting the psalmist is grouping by poetic effect rather than chronological sequence.
46. The chasil ('grasshopper, locust') and arbeh ('locust') consumed yevulam ('their produce') and yegi'am ('their toil, the fruit of their labor'). The eighth plague (Exodus 10:1-20) destroyed agriculture — the stored product of human effort devoured by insects.
47. The seventh plague: hail (Exodus 9:13-35). The gafen ('grapevine') and shiqmah ('sycamore fig') were valuable agricultural crops. The chanamal ('frost, sleet') is a rare word, possibly referring to ice storms or severe hail.
48. The verb vayyasger ('He delivered over, He handed over') is the language of judicial sentencing — God formally transferred the Egyptians' livestock to destruction. The reshafim ('lightning bolts, flames') extend the hailstorm to include electrical strikes.
49. The phrase mal'akhei ra'im is unique to this verse and has generated significant discussion. The 'evil' is not moral wickedness in the angels but calamity inflicted by them — they are agents of divine judgment, not demonic beings.
50. The verb yefalles ('He leveled, He made straight, He cleared a path') pictures God removing every obstacle between His anger and its target. The dever ('plague, pestilence') — the fifth plague (Exodus 9:1-7) — was the instrument of execution.
51. The designation of Egypt as 'tents of Ham' connects to the Table of Nations in Genesis 10, where Mitsrayim (Egypt) is listed as a son of Ham. The archaic, genealogical language adds weight to the historical sweep of the narrative.
52. The shepherd metaphor returns (cf. Psalm 77:21). The contrast is stark: Egypt's firstborn are dead; Israel's flock is alive and moving. God destroys one nation's future to preserve another's.
53. The juxtaposition is absolute: Israel walks safely (lavetach, 'in security'); the sea covers (kissah, 'engulfed, overwhelmed') their enemies. Safety for one and destruction for the other happen simultaneously in the same body of water.
54. The gevil qodsho ('the border/territory of His holiness') is the promised land, and specifically har zeh ('this mountain') — either Zion or the entire hill country of Canaan. God's right hand (yemin) qantah ('acquired, purchased') this mountain — it belongs to God by right of acquisition.
55. The verb vayyegaresh ('He drove out') describes the conquest. The chevel nachalah ('measuring line of inheritance') refers to the land allotment — each tribe received its territory measured by cord. The tribes now dwell be-aholeihem ('in their tents') — in the former dwellings of the displaced nations.
56. The cycle repeats: even after settlement in the promised land, the pattern of testing (vaynassu) and rebelling (vayyamru) continues. The edot ('testimonies, decrees') are God's covenant stipulations — the conditions of the relationship. They ignored them.
57. Hosea 7:16 uses nearly identical language: 'They turn, but not upward; they are like a treacherous bow.' The image may have been a common prophetic metaphor for Israel's unreliability — a nation that appeared functional but consistently missed its mark.
58. The bamot ('high places') were the local sanctuaries where Canaanite-influenced worship occurred. The pesilim ('carved images, idols') were the physical representations of other gods. The verb yaqni'uhu ('they made Him jealous') uses the language of marriage: Israel's idolatry is adultery, and God responds with the jealousy of a betrayed spouse (cf. Exodus 20:5, 'I the LORD your God am a jealous God').
59. The verb vayyit'abbar ('He was furious, He overflowed with anger') is the same as verse 21. But this time the consequence is more severe: vayyim'as me'od be-Yisrael ('He utterly rejected Israel'). The verb ma'as ('to reject, to refuse, to despise') is the language of covenant termination — not discipline but rejection.
60. Jeremiah explicitly references Shiloh's destruction as a warning to Jerusalem: 'Go now to my place that was in Shiloh, where I made my name dwell at first, and see what I did to it' (Jeremiah 7:12). The psalm uses the same event to explain why God chose Judah over Ephraim.
61. The 'strength' (uzzo) and 'splendor' (tif'arto) refer to the ark of the covenant, captured by the Philistines in 1 Samuel 4:11. The ark was the physical symbol of God's presence and power. God allowed His own symbol to be taken — the ultimate expression of judgment on His people.
62. The parallel between 'His people' (ammo) and 'His inheritance' (nachalato) emphasizes that these are not strangers but God's own possession. The verse describes the battle of Aphek (1 Samuel 4:1-11) where thirty thousand Israelite soldiers fell.
63. The 'fire' consuming bachurav ('His young men') is war. The betulotav ('His young women') lo hullalu ('were not praised/celebrated in wedding songs'). The verb hillel in this context refers to the wedding celebration — with so many young men dead, marriages did not happen. The social fabric collapsed.

64. Hophni and Phinehas, the priests who accompanied the ark, died at Aphek (1 Samuel 4:11). The phrase almanotav lo tivkeinah ('their widows did not weep') likely means the death was so sudden and the disaster so overwhelming that there was no time for proper mourning — or that the widows themselves were killed or captured.
65. This is one of the most daring anthropomorphisms in the Hebrew Bible. Psalm 44:24 pleads 'Awake! Why do You sleep, O Lord?' — here the psalmist reports that God actually did wake up. The metaphor serves the narrative: the period of judgment felt like divine slumber, and God's re-engagement felt like a warrior's battle cry.
66. The phrase vayyakh tsarav achor ('He struck His enemies in the rear') refers to the Philistine plague described in 1 Samuel 5:6-12, where God struck the Philistines with tumors (ofalim) in their hindquarters. The cherpat olam ('perpetual reproach') means the shame was not temporary but defining.
67. This verse is the psalm's political-theological thesis: the fall of Shiloh and the northern shrine was not random but an act of divine election. God actively chose to reject Ephraim and actively chose Judah — this is the explanation for the Davidic dynasty and the Jerusalem temple.
68. The transition from 'rejected Ephraim' to 'chose Judah' mirrors the biblical pattern of divine election: God passes over the expected choice (the firstborn, the older, the stronger) in favor of the unexpected. This pattern runs from Jacob/Esau through David (the youngest son) to Zion (a relatively insignificant hill).
69. The sanctuary (miqdash) is compared to kemo ramim ('like the heights, like high places') — either heavenly heights or mountain peaks. The second comparison ke-erets yesadah le-olam ('like the earth He founded forever') equates the temple's permanence with the earth's — God's dwelling is as enduring as creation itself. This confidence will be tested by the destruction of 586 BCE.
70. The connection between David the shepherd and God the shepherd (Psalm 23, Psalm 77:21, Psalm 78:52) is deliberate: God chose a shepherd to be king because kingship is shepherding. The ideal ruler tends, feeds, and protects a flock.
71. The image of David following nursing ewes echoes 2 Samuel 7:8, where God reminds David: 'I took you from the pasture, from following the flock.' The psalm's conclusion deliberately parallels God's own words to David.
72. The psalm that began with a call to teach the next generation ends with the model of what faithful leadership looks like. The entire historical sweep — Egypt, Exodus, wilderness, conquest, Shiloh, rejection, election — converges on this single image: a shepherd with a blameless heart and skilled hands. This is what the next generation needs to know.

Summary: A communal lament over the destruction of Jerusalem and the temple. The nations have invaded God's inheritance, defiled the sanctuary, reduced Jerusalem to rubble, and left the bodies of God's servants as food for vultures and wild animals. The blood of the faithful runs like water around Jerusalem with no one to bury the dead. The psalmist pleads for God's compassion, asks how long His jealousy will burn, calls for vengeance on the nations that do not know God, and appeals to God's own reputation among the peoples. The psalm closes with a promise of perpetual praise from the flock of God's pasture.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 79 is the companion lament to Psalm 74, both attributed to Asaph and both responding to the destruction of the temple. But Psalm 79 focuses on the human cost — bodies, blood, shame — where Psalm 74 focused on the architectural destruction. The most haunting image is verse 3: blood poured out like water around Jerusalem, with no one to bury the dead. The denial of burial was the ultimate disgrace in the ancient world; it meant the person was erased from memory. The psalm's theology is built on the tension between Israel's acknowledged sin (verse 8-9) and God's obligation to His own name (verse 9-10). The argument is: we sinned, but Your reputation is at stake.

Translation Friction: The historical setting is almost certainly the Babylonian destruction of 586 BCE, though some elements could apply to other national catastrophes. The prayer for vengeance (verse 6, 10, 12) sits uncomfortably with later theological sensibilities, but it must be read in context: the psalmist is watching unburied bodies being eaten by animals and asking God to hold the perpetrators accountable. The 'sevenfold' return of reproach (verse 12) uses the language of proportional justice, not excessive revenge.

Connections: Psalm 79:1 is quoted in 1 Maccabees 7:17 in connection with the desecration under Alcimus. Verse 6 is nearly identical to Jeremiah 10:25, suggesting either literary dependence or a shared liturgical tradition. The unburied-bodies motif connects to Jeremiah 7:33 and 16:4. The 'sheep of Your pasture' (verse 13) echoes Psalms 74:1, 78:52, and 95:7. The plea 'do not remember against us former iniquities' (verse 8) anticipates the theology of Isaiah 43:25.

¹A psalm of Asaph.

O God, the nations have invaded Your inheritance;
they have defiled Your holy temple;
they have reduced Jerusalem to rubble.

²They have given the corpses of Your servants as food to the birds of the sky, the flesh of Your faithful ones to the animals of the earth.

³They poured out their blood like water around Jerusalem,
and there was no one to bury them.

⁴We have become a disgrace to our neighbors, an object of mockery and ridicule to those around us.

⁵How long, O LORD? Will You be angry forever?
Will Your jealousy burn like fire?

⁶Pour out Your wrath on the nations that do not know You,
and on the kingdoms
that do not call on Your name.

⁷and laid waste his dwelling place.
For they have devoured Jacob

⁸Do not remember against us the iniquities of the past;
let Your compassion come quickly to meet us,
for we are brought very low.

⁹Help us, O God of our salvation, for the sake of the glory of Your name!
Deliver us and atone for our sins
for the sake of Your name.

¹⁰Why should the nations say, 'Where is their God?'
Let the avenging of Your servants' spilled blood be known among the nations before our eyes.

¹¹Let the groaning of the prisoner come before You;
by the greatness of Your arm preserve those condemned to die.

¹²Return sevenfold to our neighbors, into their laps, the reproach with which they reproached You, O Lord.

¹³Then we, Your people, the sheep of Your pasture, will give thanks to You forever;
from generation to generation
we will recount Your praise.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word iyyim ('ruins, rubble heaps') describes a city so thoroughly destroyed that it has been reduced to piles of stone. The same word appears in Micah 1:6 and Micah 3:12 for cities leveled by divine judgment.
2. The curse of having one's body left unburied for scavengers is one of the Deuteronomic covenant curses (Deuteronomy 28:26). The psalmist is experiencing what Moses warned about — but the victims are the chasidim, the faithful, not the wicked. This is the psalm's anguish: the covenant curses have fallen on the covenant-keepers.
3. This verse is quoted in 1 Maccabees 7:17 as a lament for the faithful killed under the Seleucid oppression, showing that the psalm was reused for later national catastrophes. The image of blood as water means it was spilled without value, without care, without consequence for the killers.
4. The cherpah ('disgrace, reproach'), la'ag ('mockery, scoffing'), and qeles ('ridicule, derision') describe the social dimension of the catastrophe. The neighbors (shekhenim) — Edom, Ammon, Moab, and others — mock the fallen city. The destruction is not only physical and spiritual but social: Israel has become a laughingstock.
5. The phrase ad mah ('how long?') echoes Psalm 74:10. The qin'ah ('jealousy, zeal') is God's passionate commitment to His own honor — it burns (tiv'ar) like esh ('fire') when that honor is violated. The question implies that God's anger seems directed at His own people rather than at the nations who destroyed them.
6. Jeremiah 10:25 contains this verse nearly verbatim, suggesting a shared liturgical tradition. The prayer is not for indiscriminate violence but for proportional justice: those who destroyed God's people should face God's wrath.
7. The verb akhal ('devoured, consumed') is the language of predation — the nations ate Jacob like an animal consumes prey. The naveh ('dwelling place, pasture, habitation') that has been laid waste (heshamu, 'made desolate') connects to the shepherd imagery — the flock's pasture has been destroyed.
8. The acknowledgment of sin distinguishes this psalm from Psalm 44, which protests innocence. Here the psalmist admits guilt but argues that the punishment exceeds the crime — and that God's compassion should override God's justice.
9. The appeal to God's name (shem) as motivation for action is a Moses-style argument (cf. Exodus 32:12, Numbers 14:13-16). If God destroys His people, the nations will mock God's power. God's reputation among the nations depends on Israel's survival.
10. The taunt ayyeh Eloheihem ('where is their God?') is the most offensive question possible — it challenges God's existence, His power, or His care. The psalmist wants niqmat dam avadekha ('the vengeance of the blood of Your servants') to be visible le-eineinu ('before our eyes') — not hidden or delayed but publicly, demonstrably enacted.
11. The enqat asir ('groaning of the prisoner') represents the exiles in Babylon. The phrase benei temutah ('children of death, those condemned to death') describes people already sentenced. The zero'a ('arm') of God — His intervening power — is the only force that can reverse a death sentence.
12. The shiv'atayim ('sevenfold') is the language of proportional justice (cf. Genesis 4:15, Proverbs 6:31). The cherpah ('reproach') is returned el cheiqam ('into their bosom/lap') — the pocket formed by the fold of a garment, the place where one receives payment. The neighbors who mocked God's people mocked God Himself; the return will come back to them personally.
13. The psalm that began with death and desecration ends with a pledge of eternal gratitude. The pivot from lament to praise is not yet complete — it depends on God's response — but the psalmist makes the promise in advance: if You act, we will never stop thanking You.

Summary: A communal lament that addresses God as the Shepherd of Israel enthroned on the cherubim. The psalm calls upon God to shine forth, to stir up His might, and to come and save. Its structure is built around a threefold refrain — 'Restore us, O God; let Your face shine, that we may be saved' — which appears in verses 4, 8, and 20, each time with an escalating divine title. The central section (verses 9-17) develops an extended vine allegory: God transplanted a vine from Egypt, cleared the ground, and let it grow until it covered the mountains and shaded the cedars. But then He broke down its walls, and every passerby plucks it. The psalm pleads for God to look down from heaven, tend the vine He planted, and restore the man at His right hand.

What Makes This Remarkable: The vine allegory is one of the most sustained metaphors in the Psalter. Beginning with the transplanting from Egypt (the Exodus), the vine's growth traces Israel's history through the conquest and the Davidic-Solomonic expansion, when Israel's influence stretched from the Mediterranean Sea to the Euphrates River. The vine grew to cover mountains and shade great cedars — an image of astonishing abundance. Then the reversal: God Himself broke down the walls. The devastation is not blamed on the vine's weakness or on the strength of the enemies but on God's decision to remove the protection. This makes the plea more urgent: if You broke the wall, only You can rebuild it. The threefold refrain with escalating titles — 'O God' (verse 4), 'O God of hosts' (verse 8), 'O LORD God of hosts' (verse 20) — creates a crescendo of increasingly desperate address.

Translation Friction: The psalm mentions Joseph, Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh (verses 2-3) — all northern tribes — which has led many scholars to associate this psalm with the fall of the northern kingdom to Assyria in 722 BCE. However, the vine imagery in verses 9-12 encompasses all Israel, and the plea for the 'man at Your right hand' (verse 18) may refer to the Davidic king. The psalm may therefore be a plea from the combined people, possibly written in Judah after 722 but concerned with the fate of the northern tribes. The phrase ben adam ('son of man') in verse 18 is debated: does it refer to the king, the nation personified, or a future messianic figure?

Connections: The vine allegory connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 (the Song of the Vineyard), Ezekiel 15 and 17, and Jesus' parable of the wicked tenants (Mark 12:1-12) and His declaration 'I am the vine' (John 15:1-8). The shepherd imagery echoes Psalms 23, 77:21, 78:52, and Ezekiel 34. The phrase 'Shepherd of Israel' connects to Genesis 49:24, where God is called 'the Shepherd, the Rock of Israel.' The cherubim throne connects to the ark of the covenant (Exodus 25:18-22, 1 Samuel 4:4, 2 Samuel 6:2).

¹For the director of music. To 'Lilies of Testimony.' A psalm of Asaph.

²O Shepherd of Israel, hear us!
You who lead Joseph like a flock,
You who are enthroned on the cherubim — shine forth!

³Before Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh, stir up Your might
and come to save us!

⁴Restore us, O God;
let Your face shine, that we may be saved.

⁵O LORD God of hosts,
how long will You smolder against Your people's prayer?

⁶You have fed them the bread of tears and made them drink tears by the measure.

⁷You have made us an object of strife to our neighbors, and our enemies mock us.

⁸Restore us, O God of hosts;
let Your face shine, that we may be saved.

⁹You uprooted a vine from Egypt;
You drove out nations and planted it.

¹⁰You cleared the ground before it;
it took deep root and filled the land.

¹¹The mountains were covered with its shade,
and its branches were like the cedars of God.

¹²It sent out its branches to the Sea and its shoots to the River.

¹³Why have You broken down its walls, so that all who pass along the road pluck its fruit?

¹⁴The boar from the forest ravages it, and the creatures of the field feed on it.

¹⁵O God of hosts, turn back!
Look down from heaven and see;
tend this vine!

¹⁶Protect what Your right hand has planted,
the shoot You have strengthened for Yourself.

¹⁷It is burned with fire, cut down;
at the rebuke of Your face they perish.

¹⁸Let Your hand be upon the man at Your right hand, upon the son of man whom You strengthened for Yourself.

¹⁹Then we will not turn back from You;
revive us, and we will call on Your name.

²⁰Restore us, O LORD God of hosts;
let Your face shine, that we may be saved.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase el shoshannim edut ('to the lilies of testimony') likely indicates a tune or musical setting. Shoshannim ('lilies') appears in the superscriptions of Psalms 45, 60, 69, and 80, possibly referring to a melody by that name. The addition of edut ('testimony, witness') distinguishes this setting from the others.
2. The phrase yoshev hakkeruvim ('enthroned on the cherubim') appears in 1 Samuel 4:4, 2 Samuel 6:2, and Isaiah 37:16. It is the most precise liturgical description of God's throne location — between the wings of the two cherubim that crowned the ark of the covenant.
3. The specific mention of Ephraim, Benjamin, and Manasseh (the Rachel tribes) rather than Judah has led many scholars to read this as a northern psalm, possibly composed after the Assyrian destruction of the northern kingdom in 722 BCE. Benjamin, located between north and south, could represent the border territory caught between the two kingdoms.

4. The refrain appears three times with escalating divine names: Elohim (verse 4), Elohim Tseva'ot (verse 8), YHWH Elohim Tseva'ot (verse 20). Each repetition adds weight to the address, as if the psalmist is trying progressively more powerful names to get God's attention.
5. The verb ashan ('to smoke') is the same used in Psalm 74:1 for God's anger smoking against His flock. The image is of a God whose wrath is so intense that the prayers offered by His people are received with hostility rather than grace.
6. The image of eating and drinking tears inverts the provision narrative of Psalm 78:23-25, where God opened heaven's doors and rained down bread. The same God who fed the people with grain from heaven now feeds them with the bread of affliction.
7. The word madon ('strife, contention, quarrel') means the neighbors fight over Israel — not in defense but in derision. The mockery (yil'agu, from la'ag, 'to mock, to scoff') echoes Psalm 79:4. Israel has become entertainment for the surrounding nations.
8. The second refrain, now with Elohim Tseva'ot ('God of hosts/armies') — a step up from the simple Elohim of verse 4. The psalmist is invoking God's military power: the God who commands angelic armies.
9. The vine as metaphor for Israel appears in Isaiah 5:1-7 (the most extensive version), Jeremiah 2:21, Ezekiel 15:1-8, and Hosea 10:1. It is one of the most common metaphors for the covenant people in the prophetic tradition.
10. The verb pinnita ('You cleared') means God prepared the soil — He removed obstacles so the vine could thrive. The phrase vattashresh shorasheiha ('and it rooted its roots') describes deep establishment. The result: vattemalle erets ('it filled the land'). The vine spread across the entire territory — the land of Canaan became fully Israelite.
11. The phrase arzei El ('cedars of God') uses the divine name as a superlative — 'mighty cedars, cedars of extraordinary size.' The same construction appears in Psalm 36:7 (hare El, 'mountains of God') and Psalm 68:16 (har Elohim, 'mountain of God'). God's name marks the superlative.
12. The territorial extent described here matches the idealized borders of Solomon's kingdom (1 Kings 4:21, 24). The vine allegory reads Israel's history as a growth narrative that peaked under David and Solomon.
13. Isaiah 5:5 uses nearly identical language: 'I will remove its hedge... I will break down its wall.' The parallel confirms that the removal of divine protection is understood as a deliberate act of God, not an accident or an enemy's achievement.
14. In the Masoretic text, the word ya'ar ('forest') has a suspended letter ayin, one of only a handful of such scribal marks in the Hebrew Bible. This may mark the midpoint of the Psalter by letter count, or it may preserve a textual variant.
15. The verb paqad ('to visit, to attend to') can mean either to bless or to punish, depending on context. Here it means 'to take care of, to restore' — the vine needs the gardener's attention, not His absence.
16. The word khannah ('stock, root, vineyard plot') refers to the planted area. The phrase asher nat'ah yeminekha ('that Your right hand planted') attributes the vine's existence to God's own direct action. The ben ('son, shoot, branch') that God immatsettah lakh ('strengthened for Yourself') may be a double reference: the vine's strongest branch (the Davidic dynasty) and/or the nation itself as God's 'son' (cf. Exodus 4:22, 'Israel is My firstborn son').
17. The vine that once covered mountains is now serufah va-esh ('burned with fire') and khesukhah ('cut down, pruned to the stump'). The phrase migga'arat panekha ('from the rebuke of Your face') attributes even the burning and cutting to God's own action — His face that was asked to shine (verse 4) has instead rebuked. The same face that could save is the face that destroys.
18. The phrase ben adam ('son of man') here is not the apocalyptic 'Son of Man' of Daniel 7:13, but it contributes to the larger biblical tradition of the term. In this psalm, it refers to the human leader whom God chose and empowered — the Davidic king as representative of the people.
19. The promise 'we will not turn back' responds to the accusation of Psalm 78:57 ('they turned back and were faithless'). The psalmist pledges that the restored people will not repeat the pattern of the ancestors.
20. The three-part refrain structure (verses 4, 8, 20) creates the psalm's emotional architecture: the same words repeated with increasing intensity. The refrain is not merely decorative but performative — it enacts the community's desperate, repeated crying out. The third repetition, with the fullest divine name, is the psalm's final, most concentrated appeal.

Summary: A festival psalm attributed to Asaph that opens with exuberant summons to praise — shout, sing, blow the ram's horn — then pivots sharply as God's own voice breaks in. The divine speech dominates the psalm from verse 6 onward, recounting the exodus deliverance, the testing at Meribah, and the first commandment's demand for exclusive loyalty. God laments Israel's refusal to listen, describes what He did in response (handing them over to their own stubborn hearts), and closes with a devastating conditional: if only My people would listen, I would feed them with the finest wheat and honey from the rock.

What Makes This Remarkable: The structural pivot at verse 6 is one of the most dramatic in the Psalter. What begins as a congregational hymn suddenly becomes a divine oracle. God speaks in first person — 'I relieved his shoulder of the burden' — and the worshippers become an audience to their own history retold by the one who shaped it. The closing conditional (lu ammi shomea li, 'if only My people would listen to Me') is among the most poignant lines God speaks in the Hebrew Bible. It reveals divine longing — God as the rejected lover who still extends the offer. The psalm's movement from celebration to divine lament mirrors the trajectory of Israel's own story: from deliverance to disobedience.

Translation Friction: The superscription assigns this to Asaph, which places it within the Asaphite collection (Psalms 73-83). The reference to Joseph in verse 6 (edut bi-Yehoseph) is unusual — most psalms use Jacob or Israel. The use of Joseph may signal northern tribal identity or invoke the exodus generation specifically. The phrase 'I tested you at the waters of Meribah' (v. 8) echoes Exodus 17 and Numbers 20, but the Hebrew selah at verse 8 makes the exact division of the divine speech debated among commentators.

Connections: The call to blow the shofar at the new moon and full moon (v. 4) connects to the festival calendar of Leviticus 23. The divine speech recounting exodus deliverance parallels Psalm 95:7-11, which similarly moves from praise to divine warning about hardened hearts. The closing image of honey from the rock (v. 17) echoes Deuteronomy 32:13, where God feeds Israel honey from the crag and oil from flinty rock. The 'I am the LORD your God who brought you up out of Egypt' formula (v. 11) quotes the Decalogue preamble (Exodus 20:2) verbatim.

¹For the choirmaster. On the Gittith. Of Asaph.

²Shout for joy to God our strength!

Raise a shout to the God of Jacob!

³Lift up a song and strike the tambourine, the sweet-sounding lyre with the harp!

⁴Blow the ram's horn at the new moon,
at the full moon, on the day of our feast!

⁵For it is a statute for Israel, a ruling from the God of Jacob.

⁶He established it as a testimony in Joseph when he went out against the land of Egypt.
I heard a language I did not know:

⁷I relieved his shoulder of the burden;
his hands were freed from the basket.

⁸In distress you called and I rescued you.
I answered you from the hidden place of thunder.
I tested you at the waters of Meribah. Selah.

⁹Listen, My people, and I will warn you.
O Israel, if only you would listen to Me!

¹⁰There must be no foreign god among you.
You must not bow down to an alien god.

¹¹I am the LORD your God who brought you up from the land of Egypt.
Open your mouth wide, and I will fill it.

¹²But My people did not listen to My voice, and Israel would have none of Me.

¹³So I let them go in the stubbornness of their hearts;
they walked by their own plans.

¹⁴If only My people would listen to Me, if Israel would walk in My ways!

¹⁵How quickly I would subdue their enemies and turn My hand against their foes!

¹⁶Those who hate the LORD would cringe before Him, and their doom would last forever.

¹⁷He would feed him with the finest wheat, and from the rock I would satisfy you with honey.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The term gittit is of uncertain meaning — possibly a musical instrument from Gath, a winepress melody (from gat, 'winepress'), or a tune associated with the grape harvest. Its appearance in Psalms 8, 81, and 84 may link these psalms to autumn festival celebrations. The Asaph attribution places this psalm within the Levitical guild of temple musicians established by David (1 Chronicles 16:4-5).
2. The verb harninu ('shout, cry out in joy') and hariu ('raise a shout, sound a blast') are both high-volume, communal actions — this is not private meditation but public, full-throated worship. The designation 'God of Jacob' rather than 'God of Israel' may preserve an older tribal designation or emphasize the patriarch's personal story of wrestling and transformation.
3. The verb se'u ('lift up, carry') paired with zimrah ('song, melody') creates the image of physically raising music like an offering. The tof ('tambourine, hand drum'), kinnor ('lyre'), and nevel ('harp') form the standard ensemble of temple worship. The kinnor was David's instrument (1 Samuel 16:23); the nevel was a larger, deeper-toned stringed instrument.
4. The word keseh (or kese) means 'full moon' or 'the covering/concealment' — most likely the full moon when the moon is fully 'covered' with light. The pairing of chodesh ('new moon') with keseh ('full moon') spans the entire lunar cycle. The feast in view is almost certainly Sukkot (Tabernacles), which begins at the full moon of the seventh month (Tishrei), preceded by the shofar blast of Rosh Hashanah at the new moon.
5. The word choq ('statute, decree, something inscribed') and mishpat ('ruling, judgment, ordinance') together convey that this festival observance is not optional tradition but divinely mandated law. The God of Jacob did not suggest celebration — He commanded it.
6. The use of Joseph for Israel is rare — it appears also in Psalms 77:16, 78:67, and 80:2. In each case the context involves the exodus or the northern tribes. The shift from 'he' to 'I' in this verse marks the beginning of the divine oracle that dominates the rest of the psalm.
7. The word dud can mean 'pot, cauldron, or basket.' In the context of Egyptian slavery, it most likely refers to the baskets used to carry clay or bricks (cf. Exodus 1:14, where Israel's labor involves mortar and brick). Some translations render it 'pots' following KJV, but 'basket' better fits the construction imagery of the Egyptian bondage.
8. Meribah (from riv, 'to contend, to quarrel') is the place where Israel quarreled with God over the lack of water. The name itself means 'Quarreling' or 'Contention.' God's statement that He tested Israel there reverses the perspective of Exodus 17:7, where the people tested God. Both testings happened simultaneously: Israel tested God's patience while God tested Israel's trust.

9. The construction shema...im tishma ('hear...if you would hear') uses the same verb twice, creating an envelope: the command to listen frames the condition of listening. It echoes the Shema of Deuteronomy 6:4, where hearing is the foundational act of covenant fidelity.
10. The phrase el zar ('foreign god') and el nekhar ('alien god') form a synonymous parallel that echoes the first commandment (Exodus 20:3). The word zar means 'strange, foreign, unauthorized' and nekhar means 'alien, unrecognized, from outside.' Together they describe any deity that is not the LORD — not merely foreign in origin but unauthorized in identity. God is quoting the Decalogue's opening demand back to His people.
11. The phrase harchev pikha ('open your mouth wide') uses the Hiphil of rachav ('to be wide, spacious'). It means to open as wide as possible — to hold nothing back in asking, to receive with full capacity. The promise va'amal'ehu ('and I will fill it') is unconditional in its grammar: God does not say 'I might fill it.' The only condition is the opening.
12. The verb avah ('to be willing, to consent') is a word of volition, not capacity. Israel's refusal was not inability to hear but unwillingness to respond. The phrase lo avah li ('would not consent to Me') personalizes the rejection: it is not God's law that Israel rejected but God Himself.
13. The verb shillach ('to send away, to let go, to release') in the Piel is the same verb used for Pharaoh releasing Israel from Egypt. The irony is pointed: God once sent Israel out of bondage; now He sends them into the bondage of their own desires. Freedom from God becomes the worst captivity.
14. The particle lu introduces a counterfactual wish — something desired but not actualized. This is one of the most emotionally revealing statements God makes in the Psalter. It places divine omnipotence alongside divine longing, suggesting that God's power does not override human freedom even when that freedom causes God grief.
15. The word kim'at ('how little, how quickly, almost') emphasizes the ease and speed with which God would act — the obstacles Israel faces are trivial from God's perspective. The verb akhnia ('I would subdue, I would bring low') is the Hiphil of kana, meaning to force into submission. The phrase ashiv yadi ('I would turn My hand') means to redirect divine power against Israel's oppressors. The conditional remains in force: all of this would happen if Israel would listen.
16. The verb yekhachashu ('would cringe, would feign submission') from kachash means to cower, to submit falsely, to cringe in fear. The enemies would not genuinely repent — they would simply be crushed into submission. The phrase ittam le-olam ('their time forever') is ambiguous: it may mean Israel's time of prosperity would last forever, or that the enemies' time of punishment would be permanent. Most interpreters take it as Israel's blessing enduring.
17. The shift from third to second person (from 'him' to 'you') within a single verse is characteristic of prophetic speech, where God moves freely between describing Israel and addressing Israel. The honey from the rock echoes Deuteronomy 32:13. Wild bees nested in rock crevices in ancient Palestine, making 'honey from the rock' both a literal reality and a metaphor for provision from impossible sources.

Summary: God stands in the divine council and pronounces judgment on the elohim — the gods, the divine beings — who were charged with governing the nations justly but have instead perverted justice, shown partiality to the wicked, and allowed the foundations of the earth to shake. God indicts them, strips them of their immortality, and sentences them to die like mortals. The psalm closes with a petition for God to rise and judge the earth Himself, since all nations belong to Him.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the most theologically explosive psalm in the Psalter. The word elohim appears three times with three different referents: God (Elohim) stands in the council of God (El), He judges among the gods (elohim). The psalm presupposes a worldview in which the Most High God delegated governance of the nations to subordinate divine beings — a concept rooted in Deuteronomy 32:8-9, where God divided humanity according to the number of the bene elohim ('sons of God') but kept Israel for Himself. These beings have failed in their charge: they tolerate injustice, ignore the vulnerable, and let the wicked prosper. God's response is not reform but execution: 'You will die like humans.' The psalm effectively narrates the demotion of the gods — a monotheistic text that acknowledges the existence of other divine beings precisely to declare their judgment and death.

Translation Friction: The identity of the elohim in this psalm has been debated for millennia. Three main readings exist: (1) they are divine beings, members of the heavenly council, to whom God delegated national governance — this is the most natural reading of the Hebrew and aligns with Deuteronomy 32:8-9 and the broader ancient Near Eastern concept of a divine assembly; (2) they are human judges who bear the title elohim because they exercise divine authority (this reading influenced later rabbinic interpretation and is reflected in Jesus's citation of verse 6 in John 10:34); (3) they are the gods of the nations, now declared impotent. The Covenant Rendering follows reading (1) as the most consistent with the Hebrew text and its ancient Near Eastern context, while noting that the text itself may intentionally blur the boundary between divine and human authority.

Connections: The divine council scene echoes Job 1-2, 1 Kings 22:19-23, Isaiah 6, and Daniel 7:9-10. Deuteronomy 32:8-9 (reading bene elohim with the Dead Sea Scrolls rather than bene Yisra'el with the Masoretic Text) provides the theological backdrop: God assigned nations to divine beings but kept Israel. Jesus quotes verse 6 in John 10:34-36, using the psalm's logic in His own defense. The accusation that the elohim failed to protect the poor and orphaned echoes the prophetic indictments of Isaiah 1:17, 10:1-2, and Amos 5:11-12 — except here the defendants are not human kings but heavenly powers.

¹A psalm of Asaph.

God stands in the divine council;
among the gods He renders judgment:

²How long will you judge unjustly and show favor to the wicked? Selah.

³Defend the weak and the fatherless;
uphold the rights of the afflicted and destitute.

⁴Rescue the weak and the needy;
deliver them from the hand of the wicked.

⁵They do not know, they do not understand;
they walk about in darkness.
All the foundations of the earth are shaken.

⁶I Myself declared, 'You are gods, and sons of the Most High, all of you.'

⁷Yet you will die like humans, and fall like any prince.

⁸Rise up, O God! Judge the earth, for You possess all the nations as Your inheritance.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The three uses of elohim/El in this verse are the interpretive crux of the entire psalm. The first elohim is the God of Israel — the supreme deity. The adat El ('assembly of El') refers to the divine council. The second elohim refers to the other divine beings in the council. This is not polytheism — it is hierarchical monotheism: one supreme God who holds authority over subordinate divine beings. The Dead Sea Scrolls and Ugaritic texts confirm that this council imagery was widespread in ancient Israelite and Canaanite religion.
2. The phrase nasa panim ('lift the face') is a legal idiom meaning to show partiality, to accept a bribe, to rule in someone's favor regardless of merit. When God 'lifts His face' to someone (Numbers 6:26), it is grace; when a judge lifts the face of the wicked, it is corruption. The selah at the end may mark a pause for the weight of the accusation to settle.
3. Four terms describe the vulnerable: dal ('weak, poor, low'), yatom ('fatherless, orphan'), ani ('afflicted, humble, oppressed'), and rash ('destitute, impoverished'). The fourfold description covers every category of powerlessness. The verb hatsdiku ('vindicate, declare righteous, uphold the rights of') is from tsadaq — the gods are told to exercise tsedaqah ('righteousness') on behalf of those who cannot secure it for themselves. This is the job description the gods have failed.
4. Two verbs of rescue: palletu ('rescue, cause to escape') and hatsilu ('deliver, snatch away'). The second — from natsal — is the same verb used for God's rescue of Israel from Egypt. The gods are expected to perform for the vulnerable what God performed for Israel. The phrase mi-yad resha'im ('from the hand of the wicked') means from the grip, the power, the control of those who oppress. The hand is the instrument of power, and the wicked have used theirs to crush the poor.

5. The verb yimmotu (from mot, 'to totter, to shake, to be moved') is used elsewhere for mountains trembling and thrones being shaken. When applied to mosdei arets ('foundations of the earth'), it describes cosmic destabilization. The connection between divine injustice and cosmic chaos reflects the ancient Near Eastern understanding that justice and creation are linked: when the gods fail, reality fractures.
6. Jesus quotes this verse in John 10:34-36, arguing that if Scripture calls these beings 'gods,' then His own claim to divine sonship is not blasphemy. The argument turns on the psalm's own logic: if God Himself conferred the title elohim on beings who subsequently failed, then the title itself does not guarantee righteousness. Jesus's use of this text is one of the most debated christological arguments in the New Testament.
7. The phrase ke-adam ('like a human, like Adam') carries both meanings simultaneously. They will die like any mortal human, and they will fall like Adam fell — from a position of divine favor into mortality. The word tippolu ('you will fall') echoes the language of fallen kings in Isaiah 14 and Ezekiel 28, where human rulers who claimed divine status are brought down to Sheol.
8. The verb tinchal ('You will inherit, You will take possession') in the context of Deuteronomy 32:8-9 is revolutionary. In the older arrangement, God took Israel as His nachalah ('inheritance') and assigned the other nations to subordinate beings. Now the psalmist demands that God inherit all nations — a universalizing move that collapses the distinction between Israel's God and the gods of the nations. This verse anticipates the fully monotheistic vision of Isaiah 45:22: 'Turn to Me and be saved, all the ends of the earth.'

Summary: The final psalm of the Asaphite collection is a communal lament against a coalition of nations conspiring to annihilate Israel. The psalmist names ten enemy peoples — Edom, the Ishmaelites, Moab, the Hagrites, Gebal, Ammon, Amalek, Philistia, Tyre, and Assyria — who have united with one purpose: to wipe out the name of Israel. The psalmist calls on God to break His silence and to do to these enemies what He did to Midian, Sisera, Jabin, and the kings Oreb, Zeeb, Zebah, and Zalmunna. The final petition is that God would pursue them like fire consuming a forest, so that the nations would know that YHWH alone is the Most High over all the earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The coalition described in this psalm has no exact historical parallel — no single moment in Israelite history saw all ten of these nations allied simultaneously. This has led many scholars to see the psalm as either a composite of multiple threats or an idealized picture of total encirclement. The ten nations form a geographic noose around Israel: Edom and Moab to the east, Philistia to the west, Tyre to the north, Amalek to the south, Assyria as the distant imperial power. The psalm's military geography is also theological geography — Israel is surrounded on all sides, and only God's intervention can break the siege. The concluding purpose clause is remarkable: the goal of God's wrath is not annihilation but recognition. The psalmist wants the nations to know that YHWH is the Most High.

Translation Friction: The violence of the imprecations — fire, storm, shame, eternal disgrace — raises difficult questions about the ethics of prayer. The psalmist is not asking God to convert the nations but to destroy them, or at minimum to humiliate them so thoroughly that they acknowledge YHWH's supremacy. Yet the final verse introduces a surprising note: the purpose of divine action is that the nations 'may know that You alone, whose name is the LORD, are the Most High over all the earth.' This is not pure vengeance — it is evangelism by catastrophe, a violent form of the missionary impulse.

Connections: The historical references draw from Judges 4-8: Sisera and Jabin were defeated by Deborah and Barak (Judges 4-5); Oreb and Zeeb were Midianite captains killed by the Ephraimites (Judges 7:25); Zebah and Zalmunna were Midianite kings executed by Gideon (Judges 8:21). The ten-nation coalition echoes the Table of Nations pattern and the enemies list of Genesis 15:19-21. The closing verse's declaration that YHWH is Elyon ('Most High') over all the earth connects directly to Psalm 82:6, where the sons of Elyon are judged — now the psalm asks Elyon to act on His own authority.

¹A song. A psalm of Asaph.

²O God, do not keep silent!
Do not hold Your peace;
do not be still, O God!

³For look — Your enemies are in uproar, and those who hate You have raised their heads.

⁴Against Your people they devise cunning plans;
they conspire against Your treasured ones.

⁵They say, 'Come, let us wipe them out as a nation, so that the name of Israel will be remembered no more.'

⁶For they conspire with one mind;
against You they seal a covenant —

⁷the tents of Edom and the Ishmaelites, Moab and the Hagrites,

⁸Gebal, Ammon, and Amalek,
Philistia with the inhabitants of Tyre.

⁹Even Assyria has joined them;
they lend their arm to the children of Lot. Selah.

¹⁰Do to them as You did to Midian, as to Sisera, as to Jabin at the Wadi Kishon —

¹¹They were destroyed at En-dor;
they became dung for the ground.

¹²Make their nobles like Oreb and Zeeb, all their princes like Zebah and Zalmunna —

¹³who said, 'Let us seize for ourselves
the pastures of God.'

¹⁴O my God, make them like whirling dust, like chaff before the wind.

¹⁵As fire consumes the forest,
as flame sets the mountains ablaze —

¹⁶So pursue them with Your storm and terrify them with Your tempest.

¹⁷Fill their faces with shame —
so that they may seek Your name, O LORD.

¹⁸Let them be ashamed and terrified forever;
let them be disgraced and perish —

¹⁹Let them know that You alone — whose name is the LORD — are the Most High over all the earth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This is the last psalm in the Asaphite collection (Psalms 73-83). The double designation shir mizmor ('song, psalm') may indicate both vocal and instrumental performance. The Asaph collection ends with this psalm of national crisis, forming an inclusio with Psalm 73's meditation on theodicy — the collection opens with the problem of the wicked prospering and closes with the nations conspiring against God's people.
2. The verb charash can mean both 'to be silent' and 'to be deaf' — the psalmist may be accusing God of both: refusing to speak and refusing to hear. The three verbs together paint a picture of total divine disengagement that the psalmist finds intolerable in the face of existential threat.
3. The verb yehemayun ('they are in uproar, they roar') from hamah describes the noise of a seething crowd or a raging sea. The phrase nas'u rosh ('they have lifted the head') means they have grown bold, arrogant, defiant — the head lifted in open challenge rather than bowed in submission. The psalmist frames the enemies as God's enemies, not merely Israel's — an important theological move that makes Israel's defense God's own cause.
4. The verb ya'arimu ('they make crafty, they devise shrewdly') from aram describes deliberate, calculated scheming. The word tsefunekha ('Your hidden ones, Your treasured ones') from tsafan ('to hide, to treasure up, to protect') may mean those whom God has hidden under His protection, or those He has treasured and stored up — His precious possession. The enemies' conspiracy targets not just a political entity but God's personal treasure.
5. The phrase shem Yisra'el ('the name of Israel') carries enormous theological weight. Israel's name was given by God Himself in the wrestling at Peniel (Genesis 32:28). To erase Israel's name is to erase God's naming act — it is an assault not just on a people but on a divine decision. This is why the psalmist frames the threat as an attack on God Himself.
6. The phrase no'atsu lev yachdav ('they conspire with one heart together') describes unanimous, wholehearted conspiracy. The word berit ('covenant') is the most loaded term in Israelite theology — the nations are making a covenant against the God of covenants. The verb yikrothu ('they cut') is the technical term for covenant-making (karat berit, 'to cut a covenant'). The enemies have formalized their alliance with the same solemn ritual that binds God to Israel.
7. The catalog of enemies begins with Israel's closest kin: Edom (descended from Esau, Jacob's twin), the Ishmaelites (descended from Abraham's first son), Moab (descended from Lot, Abraham's nephew), and the Hagrites (associated with Hagar, mother of Ishmael). Every enemy named is a relative. The word ohalei ('tents of') designates nomadic or semi-nomadic peoples — tent-dwellers encamped against Israel.
8. Gebal (a Phoenician city, modern Byblos in Lebanon, or possibly an Edomite region south of the Dead Sea), Ammon (east of the Jordan, descended from Lot), Amalek (the perennial enemy from the southern desert — the first nation to attack Israel after the exodus, Exodus 17:8-16), Philistia (the coastal power to the west), and Tyre (the great Phoenician maritime city to the north). The geographic encirclement is complete: enemies from every direction.
9. The 'children of Lot' (benei Lot) refers to Moab and Ammon, both descended from Lot's incestuous union with his daughters (Genesis 19:30-38). Assyria's role as the 'arm' of Lot's descendants is ironic — the mighty empire serves the interests of nations born from disgrace. The selah here marks the end of the enemy catalog and the transition to the imprecatory petition.
10. The prayer now invokes precedent: God's past victories become the model for present deliverance. Midian was defeated by Gideon's three hundred (Judges 7). Sisera was the Canaanite general killed by Jael with a tent peg (Judges 4:21). Jabin was the Canaanite king of Hazor whom Deborah and Barak defeated at the Wadi Kishon (Judges 4-5). The psalmist is saying: You did this before. Do it again.
11. En-dor is not mentioned in the Judges account of Sisera's defeat, but it was near the Kishon valley where the battle took place. The phrase hayu domen la-adamah ('they became dung for the ground') is deliberately degrading — the mighty warriors decomposed into fertilizer. Their bodies nourished the soil they tried to conquer. The image strips all dignity from military death.
12. Oreb ('Raven') and Zeeb ('Wolf') were Midianite captains captured and killed by the Ephraimites (Judges 7:25). Zebah ('Sacrifice') and Zalmunna ('Shade Denied') were Midianite kings whom Gideon personally executed (Judges 8:21). The psalmist prays that the current enemies' leadership will meet the same fate — not just defeat but death for every leader who conspired against Israel.
13. The word ne'ot ('pastures, meadows, dwelling places') from navah ('to be pleasant, to dwell') refers to the land of Israel as God's own grazing land — the territory God chose as His dwelling place. The enemies' ambition is not merely territorial but theological: they want to possess what God possesses. The verb nirshah ('let us take possession') from yarash means to dispossess, to inherit by displacement. They want to evict God from His own land.
14. The word galgal can mean 'wheel' or 'whirling thing' — likely the dried, spherical tumbleweed (a thistle head) that the wind rolls across the landscape. Paired with qash ('chaff, stubble'), the image is of enemies so insubstantial that the wind carries them away. What seemed like a terrifying coalition is, from God's perspective, dry weeds waiting for a breeze.
15. The verbs tiv'ar ('burns, consumes') and telahhet ('sets ablaze, scorches') describe uncontrollable wildfire sweeping through forested mountain terrain. The escalation from chaff (v. 14) to forest fire (v. 15) intensifies the image: the enemies are not merely scattered but incinerated. The psalm moves from wind to fire, from displacement to destruction.
16. The words sa'ar ('storm, gale') and sufah ('tempest, whirlwind') are the vocabulary of theophany — God appearing in weather. The verb tevahlem ('terrify them, throw them into panic') from bahal describes the divine panic that God inflicts on enemies in holy war (cf. Exodus 14:24, where God threw the Egyptian army into confusion). The psalmist wants not just defeat but divine terror.

17. The tension between 'fill their faces with shame' and 'so that they seek Your name' reveals the psalm's complex theology of divine wrath. Shame is not the goal — seeking God is the goal. The shame is the instrument that breaks the nations' arrogance enough for them to look upward. This moderating note distinguishes this psalm from pure vengeance.
18. Four verbs of ruin: yevoshu ('be ashamed'), yibahalu ('be terrified'), yachperu ('be disgraced'), and yovedu ('perish'). The escalation moves from inner shame to public disgrace to final destruction. The phrase adei ad ('forever, to perpetuity') makes the judgment permanent. Yet 'perish' here (from avad) may mean 'perish as a threat' rather than physical annihilation — the context of verses 17 and 19 suggests the nations survive but in a transformed state.
19. The title Elyon ('Most High') connects this psalm directly to Psalm 82:6, where the gods were called 'sons of the Most High.' Those gods failed and were sentenced to death; now the psalmist calls for the Most High to act directly, without intermediaries. The phrase al kol ha-arets ('over all the earth') universalizes the claim: YHWH is not Israel's tribal deity but the sovereign of every nation.

Summary: A Korahite psalm of intense longing for God's dwelling place. The psalmist aches for the temple courts with physical desire — soul and flesh cry out for the living God. Even the sparrow and swallow have found nesting places near God's altars, and the psalmist envies them. The psalm pronounces blessings on those who dwell in God's house, those whose strength is in Him, and those who pass through the Valley of Baca (Weeping) on pilgrimage. It closes with the declaration that a single day in God's courts is better than a thousand elsewhere, and that God withholds no good thing from those who walk with integrity.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm is one of the most emotionally transparent prayers in Scripture. The opening exclamation mah yedidot ('how lovely, how beloved') uses a word from the root yadad ('to love'), making the temple not merely beautiful but loved — an object of affection, not just admiration. The progression from longing (vv. 2-3) to envy of birds (v. 4) to beatitudes about pilgrims (vv. 5-8) to the temple gate (vv. 9-10) to theological declaration (vv. 11-13) maps the journey from desire to arrival to understanding. The psalmist does not merely want to be in the temple; the psalmist wants to be where God is. The temple is beloved because God is there.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase baqah ('Valley of Baca') in verse 7 is debated. Baca may mean 'weeping' (from bakah, 'to weep'), 'balsam trees' (which grow in arid valleys), or a specific geographic location on the pilgrimage route to Jerusalem. The ambiguity may be intentional: the pilgrims pass through a valley of tears and transform it into a place of springs. The superscription assigns the psalm to the sons of Korah — Levitical musicians who had special access to the temple but may also have experienced periods of exclusion (the Korah rebellion of Numbers 16 cast a long shadow on the family).*

Connections: The longing for God's courts echoes Psalm 27:4 ('One thing I have asked of the LORD — to dwell in the house of the LORD all the days of my life'). The bird imagery connects to Psalm 102:7 and Jesus's reference to sparrows in Matthew 10:29-31. The phrase 'sun and shield' in verse 12 is unique in the Psalter — God as sun appears also in Malachi 4:2 ('the sun of righteousness'). The Korahite collection (Psalms 42-49, 84-85, 87-88) consistently explores the theme of longing for God's presence, making this psalm the collection's emotional apex.

¹For the choirmaster. On the Gittith. Of the sons of Korah. A psalm.

²How lovely are Your dwelling places,
O LORD of Hosts!

³My soul longs — it even faints — for the courts of the LORD.
My heart and my flesh cry out to the living God.

⁴Even the sparrow finds a home, and the swallow a nest for herself where she lays her young — beside Your altars, O LORD of Hosts, my King and my God.

⁵Blessed are those who dwell in Your house;
they are always praising You. Selah.

⁶Blessed is the person whose strength is in You,
in whose heart are the highways to Zion.

⁷Passing through the Valley of Weeping, they make it a place of springs;
the early rain clothes it with blessings.

⁸They go from strength to strength;
each one appears before God in Zion.

⁹Give ear, O God of Jacob. Selah.
O LORD God of Hosts, hear my prayer;

¹⁰Look upon our shield, O God,
and gaze on the face of Your anointed one.

¹¹For a single day in Your courts is better than a thousand.
I would rather stand at the threshold of my God's house than dwell in the tents of wickedness.

¹²For the LORD God is a sun and a shield;
the LORD gives grace and glory.
No good thing does He withhold from those who walk with integrity.

¹³O LORD of Hosts,
blessed is the one who trusts in You.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Gittith also appears in the superscription of Psalms 8 and 81. The sons of Korah were a Levitical guild of temple musicians — descendants of the Korah who rebelled against Moses (Numbers 16) but whose sons were spared (Numbers 26:11). Their survival despite their ancestor's judgment may explain the intense gratitude for access to God's presence that marks their psalms.
2. The word mishkan ('dwelling place, tabernacle') is the same word used for the wilderness tabernacle (Exodus 25:9). By using this term rather than bayit ('house') or heikhal ('temple'), the psalmist may be evoking the entire history of God's dwelling among His people — from the portable tent in the desert to the stone temple in Jerusalem.
3. The phrase El chai ('living God') appears also in Joshua 3:10, 1 Samuel 17:26, and Psalm 42:3 (another Korahite psalm). The title distinguishes the God of Israel from the dead idols of the nations — this God is alive, active, present, and that aliveness is what the psalmist's body aches for. The physical language (flesh, heart, fainting) insists that longing for God is not merely spiritual but somatic.
4. The grammar of this verse is debated. Some read 'beside Your altars' as the location of the nests (birds literally nesting in the altar structure). Others read it as the destination of the psalmist's longing, with the bird imagery as a separate observation. The first reading is more poignant: even the birds have what I cannot have — a permanent place near God's altars.
5. The Levites and priests who served in the temple had residential quarters within the temple complex. Their 'dwelling' was literal, not merely spiritual. The psalmist's beatitude reveals the social dimension of the longing: some people get to live where the psalmist can only pilgrimage.
6. The word mesillot ('highways') is the same word used in Isaiah 40:3 ('Prepare the highway of the LORD in the wilderness'). The internal highway is the spiritual counterpart of the physical road — both lead to God's presence. This verse influenced later Jewish and Christian interpretations of pilgrimage as both physical journey and spiritual state.

7. The Valley of Baca is not identified with certainty. If from bakah ('to weep'), it is a valley of tears that pilgrims must cross. If from baka ('balsam tree'), it is an arid valley where only drought-resistant trees grow. Either reading produces the same theological point: the path to God passes through desolation, and the journey itself transforms the landscape.
8. The phrase me-chayil el chayil ('from strength to strength') describes pilgrims who grow stronger as they travel — the opposite of what physical exertion should produce. The nearer they get to God's house, the more energy they have. The verb yera'eh ('appears') is a Niphal form meaning 'is seen' — the pilgrim appears before God, is seen by God. The pilgrimage ends in mutual seeing: the pilgrim sees God's dwelling, and God sees the pilgrim.
9. The address combines three divine titles: YHWH (the personal covenant name), Elohim (the generic divine title), and Tsevaot (Lord of Hosts). The parallel adds Elohei Ya'aqov ('God of Jacob'), grounding the cosmic title in covenant history. The verbs shim'ah ('hear') and ha'azinah ('give ear, listen attentively') are synonymous pleas for divine attention — the psalmist interrupts the meditation on pilgrimage with direct petition.
10. The word magen ('shield') may refer to God as Israel's shield, or to the king as Israel's shield. The word meshikhekha ('Your anointed one') is mashiach — the anointed king of the Davidic line. The psalmist asks God to look favorably on the king, through whose leadership the nation's worship is sustained. In later interpretation, this verse was read messianically — the anointed one whose face God gazes upon becomes the awaited Messiah.
11. The verb histofef (Hithpolel of suf or safaf) is debated: it may mean 'to stand at the threshold' or 'to be a doorkeeper.' Either way, it describes the lowest possible position of access — the person who barely gets inside, who stands at the outer edge. The psalmist's preference for the margin of God's house over the center of the wicked's tent is the psalm's defining value statement.
12. The sun metaphor for God was risky in ancient Israel, where sun worship was a constant temptation (2 Kings 23:11 records Josiah removing horses dedicated to the sun from the temple). By calling God 'sun,' the psalmist claims for YHWH what the nations attributed to solar deities — light, warmth, life-giving power — while containing it within Israelite monotheism.
13. The psalm began with YHWH Tsevaot (v. 2) and ends with YHWH Tsevaot (v. 13), forming an inclusio. Everything between is framed by the same name: the LORD of Hosts. The final beatitude strips away every external condition — temple access, pilgrimage, residence — and locates blessedness in trust alone. Anyone who trusts is blessed, whether they stand at the threshold or dwell in the innermost court.

Summary: A Korahite psalm in three movements. The first (vv. 2-4) recalls God's past restoration of Jacob — the return from captivity, the forgiveness of sin, the turning away of wrath. The second (vv. 5-8) pleads for God to do it again, asking how long His anger will last and whether He will not revive His people once more. The third (vv. 9-14) is a prophetic oracle: the psalmist listens for what God will speak, and envisions a world where faithful love and truth meet, where righteousness and peace kiss, where truth springs up from the earth and righteousness looks down from heaven. The psalm closes with the LORD giving what is good and the land yielding its harvest.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verses 11-14 contain one of the most beautiful and theologically dense visions in the Psalter. Four divine attributes — chesed (faithful love), emet (truth), tsedaqah (righteousness), and shalom (peace) — are personified as actors in a cosmic reunion. Faithful love and truth meet each other; righteousness and peace kiss. Truth springs from the earth below while righteousness looks down from the sky above. The image is of heaven and earth reconnecting, of divine qualities descending and earthly response ascending, of a world fully realigned with God's character. This is not mere poetry; it is a vision of cosmic restoration — the world as it was meant to be, where every attribute of God finds its counterpart in creation.*

Translation Friction: *The 'return of captivity' (shevut Ya'aqov) in verse 2 is debated. The phrase shuv shevut can mean 'to return the captivity' (a specific historical reference to exile and return) or 'to restore the fortunes' (a more general theological reversal). If the former, the psalm dates to the post-exilic period; if the latter, it could be pre-exilic. The psalm's theology does not depend on the dating — the pattern of remembering past restoration to petition for present renewal is timeless.*

Connections: *The personified meeting of chesed and emet (v. 11) echoes Proverbs 3:3 and 16:6, where these two qualities appear as a pair. The vision of righteousness looking down from heaven anticipates Isaiah 45:8 ('Drip down, O heavens, from above, and let the skies rain righteousness'). The land yielding its produce (v. 13) echoes the covenant blessings of Leviticus 26:4 and Deuteronomy 28:12. The psalm's three-part structure — past deliverance, present plea, future vision — mirrors the pattern of prophetic hope found throughout Isaiah 40-66.*

¹For the choirmaster. Of the sons of Korah. A psalm.

²O LORD, You showed favor to Your land;
You restored the fortunes of Jacob.

³You forgave the guilt of Your people;
You covered all their sin. Selah.

⁴You withdrew all Your fury;
You turned from Your burning anger.

⁵Restore us, O God of our salvation, and put an end to Your displeasure with us.

⁶Will You be angry with us forever?
Will You extend Your anger to every generation?

⁷Will You not revive us again,
so that Your people may rejoice in You?

⁸Show us Your faithful love, O LORD, and grant us Your salvation.

⁹Let me hear what God the LORD will speak, for He will speak peace to His people, to His faithful ones —
but let them not return to foolishness.

¹⁰Surely His salvation is near to those who fear Him, so that glory may dwell in our land.

¹¹Faithful love and truth have met;
righteousness and peace have kissed.

¹²Truth springs up from the earth, and righteousness looks down from heaven.

¹³The LORD Himself will give what is good,
and our land will yield its harvest.

¹⁴Righteousness goes before Him and prepares the way for His steps.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Another Korahite psalm, continuing the second Korahite collection (Psalms 84-85, 87-88). The Korahite psalms in this section share a focus on Zion theology — God's dwelling, God's land, God's city — and the longing for divine presence that defines the Korahite voice.
2. The verb ratsita ('You showed favor, You were pleased with') from ratsah means to accept, to take delight in, to be gracious toward. The phrase shavta shevit Ya'aqov ('You returned the captivity/fortunes of Jacob') uses the idiom shuv shevut, which can refer to a literal return from exile or a general restoration of well-being. The psalmist establishes precedent: You have done this before.
3. Two verbs of forgiveness: nasata ('You bore, You carried away, You forgave') from nasa means to lift up and remove — God picks up the guilt and carries it away. kissita ('You covered') from kasah means to conceal, to hide from sight — God covers the sin so it is no longer visible. Together they describe forgiveness as both removal and concealment: the sin is taken away and hidden. The selah may mark a pause for the congregation to absorb the weight of this remembered mercy.

4. The verb asafta ('You gathered in, You withdrew') from asaf means to collect back, to pull in. God's fury (evratekha, from avar, 'to overflow, to rage') was out — deployed, active — and God gathered it back. The phrase charon af ('burning of the nostril') is the standard Hebrew idiom for intense anger — the image is of nostrils flaring with heat. God turned from this heat. Past tense: He did this. The question is whether He will do it again.
5. The verb shuvenu ('restore us, turn us, bring us back') from shuv is the same root as teshuvah ('repentance, return'). The psalmist asks God to do the turning — the people cannot return on their own. The title Elohei yish'enu ('God of our salvation') grounds the petition in God's identity as savior. The verb hafer ('break, annul, put an end to') from parar means to shatter, to dissolve — the psalmist wants God's anger literally broken apart.
6. Two questions that are also arguments: if God's anger lasts forever, it contradicts His character as the God of salvation (v. 5) and the God who previously forgave (vv. 3-4). The verb timshokh ('will You drag out, extend, prolong') from mashakh means to stretch, to pull like a rope. Will God's anger stretch endlessly across generations? The implied answer is no — the God who once withdrew His fury will do so again.
7. The verb techayyenu ('You will revive us, give us life') from chayah means to make alive, to restore to vitality. The psalmist asks for resurrection — not from death but from the living death of divine displeasure. Revival is not an end in itself: it serves rejoicing. The people need to be made alive so they can be glad in God. Joy is the goal of restoration.
8. The verb har'enu ('show us, let us see') from ra'ah means to make visible — the psalmist wants to see God's chesed (faithful love) manifested in concrete action, not merely believed as doctrine. The parallel 'grant us Your salvation' (yesh'akha titten lanu) makes chesed and salvation nearly synonymous: faithful love is salvation, and salvation is the visible proof of faithful love.
9. The shift from petition (vv. 5-8) to prophetic listening (v. 9) marks the psalm's structural pivot. The psalmist stops asking and starts listening. What follows (vv. 10-14) is the content of what God speaks — a vision of restored creation that answers every petition the psalm has raised.
10. The word qarov ('near, close') establishes proximity — salvation is not distant or abstract but close at hand. The purpose: lishkon kavod be-artsenu ('so that glory may dwell in our land'). The verb shakan ('to dwell, to tabernacle') is the root of Shekhinah — God's dwelling presence. The psalm envisions kavod ('glory') — the visible weight of God's presence — taking up permanent residence in the land. This is the ultimate goal of restoration: not merely forgiveness but the return of God's manifested presence.
11. The four attributes — chesed, emet, tsedeq, shalom — are the foundational qualities of God's character and God's kingdom. Their personified meeting describes a world restored to wholeness, where no divine attribute is sacrificed for another. In fallen reality, justice and mercy seem opposed; in the restored world, they kiss.
12. The agricultural metaphor — truth 'sprouts' from the earth — suggests that truth is not imposed from outside but grows organically from a restored creation. When the land is healed, truth is its natural produce. Righteousness gazing down from heaven is the divine counterpart: God's order descending to meet earth's response. Isaiah 45:8 develops this same imagery: 'Drip down, O heavens, from above, and let the skies rain righteousness; let the earth open and let salvation sprout.'
13. The vision moves from cosmic abstraction to agricultural reality: the LORD gives ha-tov ('the good') and the land gives yevulah ('its produce, its yield'). The two givings mirror each other — God gives from above, the land gives from below. The word yevul ('produce, harvest') grounds the theology in material blessing: restored relationship with God results in literal abundance. The covenant blessings of Deuteronomy 28:1-14 are being fulfilled.
14. The personification of righteousness as a road-preparer echoes Isaiah 40:3 ('Prepare the way of the LORD') and anticipates the New Testament application to John the Baptist. The image of God walking suggests the return of divine presence to the land — the kavod ('glory') of verse 10 now in motion, approaching, arriving.

Summary: The only psalm in Book III attributed to David, this is a prayer of deep personal need woven almost entirely from phrases found elsewhere in Scripture. David pleads for God's ear, confesses his dependence, asks for mercy, and declares God's uniqueness among all so-called gods. He petitions for instruction in God's way, for an undivided heart, and for a sign of God's favor. The psalm is simultaneously desperate and confident — every cry for help is anchored in a declaration of who God is.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm is a mosaic. Nearly every line echoes or quotes another biblical text — Exodus 34:6, Psalm 25, Psalm 27, Psalm 54, Isaiah 43, and others. Some scholars have called it derivative; a better reading is that David prays in the language of Scripture itself. He has so internalized God's word that his spontaneous prayer sounds like a concordance. The centerpiece is verse 11: 'Teach me Your way, O LORD, that I may walk in Your truth; unite my heart to fear Your name.' The verb yached ('unite') appears only here in the Psalter — David asks God to gather his scattered heart into a single focus. The divided heart, pulled in multiple directions by desire and fear, needs to be made one.*

Translation Friction: The Davidic attribution is unusual in Book III (Psalms 73-89), which is otherwise dominated by Asaphite and Korahite collections. Some scholars see this as a later insertion, while others view it as an intentional Davidic voice placed within the communal collections to remind the worshipping community that the king, too, is a suppliant before God. The phrase 'among the gods there is none like You' (v. 8) uses elohim in a way consistent with Psalm 82's divine council theology — the existence of other elohim is acknowledged, but their incomparability with YHWH is asserted.

Connections: Verse 15 quotes Exodus 34:6 nearly verbatim — the great self-revelation of God's character after the golden calf disaster. The petition 'teach me Your way' (v. 11) echoes Psalm 25:4 and 27:11. The declaration 'there is none like You among the gods' (v. 8) connects to Exodus 15:11, Deuteronomy 3:24, and Psalm 82. The request for an 'undivided heart' (v. 11) anticipates Ezekiel 11:19 and Jeremiah 32:39, where God promises to give His people 'one heart.' David's prayer becomes God's future promise.

¹A prayer of David.

Bend down Your ear, O LORD, and answer me,
for I am afflicted and needy.

²Guard my life, for I am devoted to You.
Save Your servant, O my God —
the one who trusts in You.

³Be gracious to me, O Lord,
for to You I call all day long.

⁴Gladden the soul of Your servant,
for to You, O Lord, I lift up my soul.

⁵For You, O Lord, are good and forgiving, abounding in faithful love to all who call on You.

⁶Give ear, O LORD, to my prayer;
attend to the voice of my pleas for mercy.

⁷In the day of my distress I call on You,
for You will answer me.

⁸There is none like You among the gods, O Lord, and nothing compares to Your works.

⁹All the nations You have made will come and bow down before You, O Lord, and glorify Your name.

¹⁰For You are great and do wondrous things;
You alone are God.

¹¹Teach me Your way, O LORD,
that I may walk in Your truth.
Unite my heart to fear Your name.

¹²I will praise You, O Lord my God, with all my heart, and I will glorify Your name forever.

¹³For Your faithful love toward me is great, and You have delivered my soul from the depths of Sheol.

¹⁴O God, the arrogant have risen against me;
a band of ruthless men seeks my life —
they do not set You before them.

¹⁵But You, O Lord, are a God compassionate and gracious, slow to anger,
abounding in faithful love and truth.

¹⁶Turn to me and be gracious to me;
give Your strength to Your servant and save the son of Your maidservant.

¹⁷Show me a sign of Your goodness, so that those who hate me will see it and be put to shame, because You, O LORD, have helped me and comforted me.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb hatteh ('bend down, incline, turn') asks God to lower His ear — as if God is high and David is low, and the distance between them must be bridged by God stooping. The self-description ani ve-eyon ('afflicted and needy') is the language of the poor throughout the Psalter (cf. Psalms 40:18, 70:6). David, the king, identifies himself with the destitute — not as false humility but as theological reality: before God, even the king is a beggar.
2. The word chasid ('devoted one, faithful one, one bound by chesed') describes David not as morally perfect but as covenantally loyal — bound to God by faithful love. The self-designation avdekha ('Your servant') appears repeatedly in this psalm (vv. 2, 4, 16), establishing David's posture: he is not demanding as a king but petitioning as a servant.
3. The verb chonneni ('be gracious to me, show me favor') from chanan is the plea for undeserved kindness. The address shifts to Adonai ('Lord, Master') rather than YHWH — the title of authority rather than the covenant name. The phrase kol hayyom ('all day long') indicates not a single prayer session but continuous, unceasing appeal.
4. The verb sammeach ('gladden, make joyful') is a Piel imperative — David asks God to cause joy, not merely permit it. The phrase nafshi essa ('my soul I lift up') echoes Psalm 25:1 verbatim. Lifting the soul is an act of total surrender — offering one's entire inner life to God as an upward gesture of dependence and trust.
5. The adjective sallach ('forgiving, ready to pardon') appears only here and in Nehemiah 9:17 — it is an exceedingly rare word, applied exclusively to God. The phrase rav chesed ('abounding in faithful love') is drawn from the Exodus 34:6 self-revelation of God. David does not merely believe God is forgiving; he knows it from the tradition he has internalized.
6. Two verbs of attentive hearing: ha'azinah ('give ear') and haqshivah ('attend, pay attention, listen carefully'). The word tachanunot ('pleas for mercy, supplications') from chanan carries the tone of begging — these are not formal requests but desperate appeals for grace.
7. The confidence embedded in ki ta'aneni ('for You will answer me') transforms the plea into a declaration of trust. David does not call hoping God might answer; he calls knowing God will answer. The 'day of distress' (yom tsarati) is a recurring phrase in the Psalter (cf. 50:15, 77:3) — the moment when all human resources fail and only God remains.
8. The phrase ein kamokha ('none like You') echoes Exodus 15:11 ('Who is like You among the gods, O LORD?') and Deuteronomy 3:24. Each occurrence makes the same comparative argument: other powers may exist, but they are not in the same category as YHWH. This is not henotheism (worshipping one god while acknowledging others as real threats) but incomparability theology: YHWH is so different from other elohim that comparison itself becomes absurd.
9. The universalism of this verse is striking in a Davidic psalm: kol goyim asher asita ('all nations that You have made'). David envisions every nation — not just Israel — coming to worship before God. The verb yishtachavu ('bow down, prostrate themselves') is the most physical form of worship: forehead to ground. And vikhabbedu li-shmekha ('they will glorify Your name') — the nations will add weight (kavod) to God's reputation. This anticipates the universal vision of Isaiah 2:2-4 and Psalm 87.
10. The phrase attah Elohim levaddekha ('You alone are God') is the strongest monotheistic declaration in the psalm. After acknowledging other elohim in verse 8, David now asserts that YHWH alone deserves the title. The word nifla'ot ('wondrous things, miracles') from pala ('to be wonderful, to be beyond comprehension') describes acts that exceed human understanding — the exodus, creation, deliverance.

11. The verb yached appears only here in the Psalter and is exceedingly rare in the Hebrew Bible. Its singularity is appropriate: the request itself is singular. An undivided heart is the rarest and most necessary condition for genuine worship. Kierkegaard's famous phrase 'purity of heart is to will one thing' is a commentary on this verse whether he knew it or not.
12. The response to the prayer for a united heart (v. 11) is a vow of wholehearted praise: be-khol levavi ('with all my heart'). The heart that was fragmented and needed uniting will, once healed, praise with its full capacity. The phrase akhabdah shimkha le-olam ('I will glorify Your name forever') commits to permanent, ongoing honor — the united heart does not waver back into division.
13. The phrase she'ol tachtiyyah ('the lowest Sheol, the depths of the underworld') is the superlative of death — not merely dying but descending to the deepest pit. David's deliverance was not from minor trouble but from the very bottom of the abyss. The greatness of chesed is measured by the depth of the rescue: the further you fell, the greater the love that pulled you out.
14. The word zedim ('arrogant, insolent, presumptuous') describes those who act without regard for any authority above themselves. The adat aritsim ('assembly of ruthless ones') is a violent group organized for oppression. Their defining characteristic: ve-lo samukha le-negdam ('they have not set You before them'). They have no awareness of God in their field of vision. The violence flows from the absence of God-consciousness — they are dangerous because they are godless.
15. The Exodus 34:6-7 formula is the most frequently quoted scripture within Scripture itself — it appears in Joel 2:13, Jonah 4:2, Nahum 1:3, Psalms 103:8, 145:8, Nehemiah 9:17, and here. Each context adapts it slightly. David's version omits the judgment clause ('who will by no means clear the guilty') and retains only the mercy side — appropriate for a prayer of supplication rather than a creed about divine justice.
16. The phrase ben amatekha ('son of Your maidservant') means someone born in the master's household — not an outsider who entered service but one born into it. David claims the deepest possible belonging: he is not merely God's servant by choice but by birth. He was born into God's household. The term parallels Psalm 116:16.
17. The ot le-tovah ('sign for good') is not a miraculous spectacle but a visible marker of God's favor — something the enemies can see with their own eyes that proves God is on David's side. The final verbs — azartani ('You helped me') and nichamtani ('You comforted me') — shift to the perfect tense, as if David is already speaking from the other side of deliverance. He ends the psalm in the past tense of answered prayer, confident that what he has asked for is already accomplished.

Summary: A brief, enigmatic Korahite psalm celebrating Zion as the city of God. The LORD loves the gates of Zion more than all the dwelling places of Jacob. Glorious things are spoken of the city. Then the psalm makes a startling declaration: Rahab (Egypt), Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, and Cush will all be registered as born in Zion. The LORD Himself will write in the register of the peoples that 'this one was born there.' The psalm closes with singers and dancers declaring, 'All my springs are in you.'

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most radically inclusive texts in the Hebrew Bible. The nations listed — Egypt, Babylon, Philistia, Tyre, Cush — are not merely Israel's neighbors; they are Israel's historical enemies and oppressors. Egypt enslaved Israel; Babylon would destroy the temple; Philistia was a perennial military threat; Tyre was a mercantile rival. Yet the psalm declares that these nations will be registered as born in Zion — they will receive Zion citizenship. The image is of a divine birth register in which God Himself inscribes the nations as native-born children of His city. This is not conquest or conversion in the usual sense; it is adoption by divine decree. The enemies of Zion become the children of Zion.

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew text of this psalm is notoriously difficult — some scholars call it the most obscure psalm in the Psalter. The grammar is compressed, the subject shifts abruptly, and the antecedents of pronouns are often unclear. The phrase 'this one was born there' (zeh yullad sham) is repeated as a refrain, but who is speaking and about whom varies with each line. The translation must make interpretive decisions that the Hebrew intentionally leaves ambiguous. We follow the reading that sees God as the one who inscribes the nations in Zion's register.*

Connections: The vision of nations being born in Zion anticipates Isaiah 2:2-4 (all nations streaming to Zion), Isaiah 19:23-25 (Egypt and Assyria called 'My people' and 'the work of My hands'), and Isaiah 56:3-8 (foreigners joining themselves to the LORD). The divine register echoes Exodus 32:32 (Moses asks to be blotted from God's book) and Ezekiel 13:9 (false prophets not written in the register of Israel). The phrase 'all my springs are in you' may connect to the temple spring imagery of Ezekiel 47:1-12 and Joel 3:18.

¹Of the sons of Korah. A psalm. A song.
His foundation is on the holy mountains.

²more than all the dwelling places of Jacob.
The LORD loves the gates of Zion

³Glorious things are spoken of you —
O city of God. Selah.

⁴I will mention Rahab and Babylon among those who know Me.
Look — Philistia, Tyre, and Cush:
'This one was born there.'

⁵And of Zion it will be said,
'This one and that one were born in her.'
The Most High Himself will establish her.

⁶The LORD will record in the register of the peoples:
'This one was born there.' Selah.

⁷Singers and dancers alike will say,
'All my springs are in you.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word yesudato ('His foundation') refers to the city God has founded — Zion/Jerusalem, established by divine initiative on the sacred mountains. The plural harrerei qodesh ('holy mountains') may refer to the multiple hills of Jerusalem (Zion, Moriah, Ophel) or may be a poetic plural intensifying the holiness of the single mountain. The psalm opens with architecture: what God has built is the subject.
2. The comparison 'more than all the dwelling places of Jacob' raises a startling theological question: Does God have favorites among His own people's cities? The answer this psalm gives is yes — Zion holds a unique place in God's affections because it is where He chose to place His name (Deuteronomy 12:5). The love is not arbitrary; it is covenantal.
3. The passive nikhbadot medubbar bakh ('glorious things are being spoken about you') leaves the speaker unidentified — it may be God, the prophets, the nations, or the psalm itself. The title ir ha-Elohim ('city of God') designates Jerusalem/Zion as God's personal city — His capital, His home on earth. What follows (vv. 4-6) will reveal what these 'glorious things' are: the enrollment of the nations.
4. The name Rahab (not the same as Rahab the woman of Jericho) is a mythological sea monster representing chaos and, by extension, Egypt (Isaiah 51:9, Psalm 89:11). By using this name, the psalmist invokes Egypt at its most threatening — and then registers this monster-nation as born in Zion. The shock is intentional: the worst enemy becomes a sibling.
5. The title Elyon ('Most High') connects this verse to Psalm 82:6 (sons of the Most High) and 83:19 (YHWH alone is Most High over all the earth). The same God who judged the failed divine council and who rules over all nations now establishes Zion as the universal birthplace. The theology has moved from national election to universal inclusion — all under the authority of the Most High.
6. The image of God as census-taker and registrar is unique in the Hebrew Bible. The divine register appears elsewhere (Exodus 32:32, Psalm 69:29, Daniel 12:1, Malachi 3:16), but always as a record of the righteous. Here it is a birth register of the nations — the most universalist application of the image anywhere in Scripture.
7. The final phrase kol ma'yanai bakh ('all my springs are in you') is addressed to Zion and may allude to the temple as a source of living water — a theme developed in Ezekiel 47:1-12, Joel 3:18, and Zechariah 14:8, where a river flows from the temple to water the earth. The springs are both literal (the Gihon spring that supplied Jerusalem) and theological (God's city as the source of life for all peoples).

Summary: The darkest psalm in the Psalter. A Korahite psalm attributed also to Heman the Ezrahite, this lament begins with a cry to God and never resolves. The psalmist describes a life spent at the edge of Sheol — overwhelmed by God's wrath, cut off from friends, trapped in a pit with no escape. Every section pleads for God's attention, and every section receives silence. The psalmist asks devastating theological questions: Do You work wonders for the dead? Will the shades rise to praise You? Is Your faithful love declared in the grave? The psalm ends with the word darkness. There is no dawn, no rescue, no turning point. It is the only psalm with no note of hope.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 88 is unique in the entire Psalter: it is the only psalm that ends in unrelieved darkness. Every other lament — even the most agonized — turns at some point toward hope, trust, or praise. Psalm 88 does not. It begins in distress and ends in distress. The final word of the poem is choshekh ('darkness'). This is not a failure of faith but a witness to a kind of suffering so complete that no resolution is possible within the poem itself. The psalm's inclusion in the canon testifies to something extraordinary: Israel's worship tradition made room for the voice that cannot find comfort, the sufferer for whom the night does not end. The psalm does not resolve because some suffering does not resolve — and God's word includes that reality.

Translation Friction: The double attribution — 'of the sons of Korah' and 'of Heman the Ezrahite' — is unusual. Heman was one of the three chief musicians appointed by David (1 Chronicles 6:33, 15:17), and 'Ezrahite' may mean 'native-born' or may link him to the clan of Zerah. The relationship between the Korahite attribution and the Heman attribution is unclear — he may have been a Korahite who also carried the Ezrahite designation. The term mahalat le-annot in the superscription is obscure — possibly 'for singing with suffering/affliction' or a musical direction indicating a mournful mode.

Connections: The questions of verses 11-13 ('Is Your faithful love declared in the grave? Your faithfulness in Abaddon?') anticipate the theological crisis of death that runs through Ecclesiastes and finds resolution only in later texts like Daniel 12:2 and Isaiah 26:19. The language of the pit (bor), Sheol, and Abaddon connects to Job 10:20-22 and Psalm 30:4. Heman's personal anguish — 'I have been afflicted and near death since my youth' (v. 16) — makes this psalm a companion to Job: both are righteous sufferers who receive no explanation and find no relief within their own narrative.

¹A song. A psalm of the sons of Korah.

For the choirmaster. According to Mahalath Leannoth.

A maskil of Heman the Ezrahite.

²O LORD, God of my salvation,
I cry out before You day and night.

³Let my prayer come before You;
bend Your ear to my cry.

⁴For my soul is full of troubles, and my life has reached the brink of Sheol.

⁵I am counted among those who go down to the pit;
I have become like a man with no strength.

⁶Set loose among the dead,
like the slain who lie in the grave whom You remember no more — they are cut off from Your hand.

⁷You have placed me in the deepest pit,
in dark places, in the depths.

⁸Your wrath lies heavy upon me,
and You overwhelm me with all Your breakers. Selah.

⁹You have driven my closest friends far from me;
You have made me loathsome to them.
I am shut in and cannot escape.

¹⁰My eye wastes away from affliction.
I call on You, O LORD, every day;
I spread out my hands to You.

¹¹Do You work wonders for the dead?
Will the shades rise up to praise You? Selah.

¹²Is Your faithful love declared in the grave?
Your faithfulness in Abaddon?

¹³Are Your wonders known in the darkness?
Your righteousness in the land of oblivion?

¹⁴But I — to You, O LORD, I cry out, and in the morning my prayer meets You.

¹⁵Why, O LORD, do You reject my soul?
Why do You hide Your face from me?

¹⁶I have been afflicted and near death since my youth;
I bear Your terrors — I am in despair.

¹⁷Your burning anger sweeps over me;
Your terrors destroy me.

¹⁸They surround me like water all day long;
they close in on me from every side.

¹⁹You have driven lover and friend far from me;
my closest companions are darkness.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The term mahalath le-annot is obscure. Mahalath may derive from chalah ('to be sick, to suffer') and le-annot from anah ('to sing' or 'to afflict'). If both meanings of anah are in play, the superscription could mean 'for singing about affliction' — a fitting description of the psalm's content. Maskil indicates a skillfully composed, instructive poem. The craftsmanship of this psalm is extraordinary despite — or because of — its unrelieved darkness.
2. This is the only point in the psalm where God is called 'God of my salvation.' Every subsequent reference focuses on God's wrath, rejection, or silence. The saving title at the beginning makes the darkness that follows even more complete — the God who saves has, in this psalmist's experience, not saved.
3. The verb tavo ('let it come, let it enter') asks that the prayer reach God's presence — as if there is a distance between the psalmist and God that the prayer must cross. The verb hatteh ('bend down, incline') asks God to lower Himself to listen — the same request David makes in Psalm 86:1. The word rinnah ('cry, ringing cry, shout') here carries the tone of anguish rather than joy.

4. The verb save'ah ('is full, is satisfied, has had enough') is bitterly ironic — the word normally describes being filled with good things (Psalm 17:15, 'I will be satisfied with Your likeness'). Here the soul is sated with ra'ot ('evils, troubles, calamities'). The soul has eaten its fill — of suffering. The phrase chayyai li-she'ol higgs'u ('my life has reached Sheol') means the psalmist stands at the threshold of death, not yet dead but close enough to touch the underworld.
5. The verb nechshavti ('I am counted, I am reckoned') from chashav means to be categorized, classified — the living have placed the psalmist in the category of the dying. The bor ('pit, cistern') is a common synonym for Sheol — the underground cavity where the dead are gathered. The phrase ke-gever ein eyal ('like a man with no strength') describes total depletion — eyal ('strength, power, might') has been drained completely.
6. The verb nigzaru ('cut off') from gazar means to sever, to divide. The dead are severed from God's active care. This verse presents the ancient Israelite understanding of death at its bleakest: the dead are in Sheol, God does not remember them, and they are cut off from His power. This understanding will later be challenged by Daniel 12:2 and the resurrection hope of Second Temple Judaism.
7. Three words of descent: bor tachtiyyot ('the pit of the lowest places'), machashakkim ('dark places, places of darkness'), and metsolot ('depths, ocean deeps'). The psalmist is sinking — deeper than the pit, into darkness, into oceanic depth. And the subject of the verb is You: shattani ('You placed me'). God did this. The psalmist does not attribute the suffering to enemies or to chance but to God's own hand. This is the psalm's terrible honesty.
8. The verb samkhah ('lies heavy, presses down') from samakh means to lean on, to press upon — God's wrath (chamatekha, 'Your heat, Your poison, Your fury') is a physical weight crushing the psalmist. The word mishbarekha ('Your breakers') from shavar ('to break') refers to crashing waves — the ocean surge that breaks everything in its path. God's waves — not random waves, but Your waves — batter the psalmist. Selah.
9. The verb hirqaqta ('You have made distant') from rachaq means to push away, to create distance. God is the one who separated the psalmist from community. The word to'evot ('abomination, loathsome thing') is extreme — the same word used for ritual impurity and moral revulsion (Leviticus 18:22, Deuteronomy 7:25). The psalmist has become repulsive to former friends. And kalu ('shut in, imprisoned') means locked up with no exit. The triple isolation — from friends, from society, from escape — is complete.
10. The verb da'avah ('wastes away, pines, grows dim') describes eyes failing from constant weeping or illness. The gesture of spreading out hands (shittachti kappay) is the posture of open-palmed prayer — hands extended, empty, receiving. The psalmist prays every day with empty hands held out to God, and every day the hands remain empty.
11. The Rephaim (refa'im) in this context are not the giant warrior clan of Genesis 14:5 but the shades of the dead — a term for the deceased inhabitants of Sheol. The word may derive from raphah ('to be weak, to sink down'). The dead in Sheol are diminished, powerless, unable to praise. This understanding of death as the cessation of worship is the backdrop against which later resurrection theology develops.
12. Two locations of death are paired with two divine attributes: chesed ('faithful love') in the qever ('grave'), and emunah ('faithfulness') in Avaddon ('Destruction/Abaddon'). Abaddon, from avad ('to perish, to be destroyed'), is personified as a place — the realm of destruction, a synonym for the deepest part of Sheol. The questions are rhetorical arguments: if the grave cannot declare chesed and Abaddon cannot proclaim emunah, then keeping the psalmist alive serves God's own interest.
13. The 'land of oblivion' (erets neshiyyah) from nashah ('to forget') is the realm where memory ceases. The dead forget and are forgotten. God's pele ('wonder') and tsidqatekha ('Your righteousness') cannot be known in a place where knowing has stopped. The four questions of verses 11-13 form a devastating theological syllogism: the dead cannot praise, cannot declare, cannot know. If God lets the psalmist die, the testimony dies with him.
14. The emphatic va-ani ('but I') sets the psalmist against the silence of the dead — they cannot cry out, but I can, and I do. The phrase u-va-boqer ('and in the morning') suggests that the psalmist prays at dawn — the traditional hour of hope and renewal. But in this psalm, the morning brings no relief. The verb teqaddemekka ('meets You, comes before You, anticipates You') means the prayer arrives before God even acts — it is there waiting when God turns to look.
15. The verb tiznach ('You reject, You cast off, You abandon') from zanach is the word for discarding something as worthless. The psalmist does not merely feel neglected — they feel thrown away. And tastir panekha mimmenni ('You hide Your face from me') — the hidden face of God is the most terrifying condition in Hebrew theology. God's face is His presence, His favor, His attention. When God hides His face, the worshipper is left in absolute darkness.
16. The phrase mi-no'ar ('since youth, from boyhood') reveals that this is not a temporary crisis but a lifelong condition. The psalmist has known suffering from the beginning. The word emekha ('Your terrors') from emah ('terror, dread') attributes the terror directly to God — these are not generic fears but divinely imposed horrors. The final word afunah is obscure — it may mean 'I am numb,' 'I am in despair,' or 'I am helpless.' Its very obscurity mirrors the psalmist's disorientation.
17. The verb avru ('pass over, sweep over') describes God's anger like a flood — wave after wave of charon ('burning rage'). The verb tsimmetutuni ('they destroy me, they silence me, they annihilate me') from tsamat means to cut off, to destroy completely. The psalmist is not merely suffering but being systematically dismantled by divine wrath.
18. The image of water surrounding (savvuni ka-mayim) echoes verse 8's breakers. The terrors of God are like rising floodwater — enveloping, inescapable, constant (kol hayyom, 'all day long'). The verb hiqqifu ('they encircle, they close in') from naqaf means to go around completely, to form a ring. There is no gap, no escape route, no dry ground.

19. The final word machshakh ('darkness') has no verb, no continuation, no resolution. The Hebrew syntax simply stops. This is not accidental — the poet chose to end the psalm with darkness as a noun, not as a condition that might change. The reader is left in the dark alongside the psalmist, with no promise of dawn. The psalm's canonical placement — between the radiant Psalm 87 (Zion as universal birthplace) and the covenantal Psalm 89 (God's promises to David) — ensures that the darkness, while real, exists within a larger frame of divine faithfulness.

Summary: The longest and most theologically weighty psalm of Book III, attributed to Ethan the Ezrahite. It moves in three massive sections. The first (vv. 2-19) is a hymn celebrating God's faithful love and faithfulness, His cosmic power over the sea and the heavenly council, and the blessedness of the people who know the festal shout. The second (vv. 20-38) recounts God's covenant with David in elaborate detail — the anointing, the promise of an unbreakable dynasty, the father-son relationship, the sworn oath that David's throne will endure forever. The third (vv. 39-52) is a devastating lament: God has apparently renounced the covenant, cast off the anointed one, broken down the walls, and handed David's enemies the victory. The psalm closes with a raw question: Where is Your former faithful love, O Lord, which You swore to David in Your faithfulness?

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is the great collision between theology and history. The first two sections build the most elaborate case for God's faithfulness in the entire Psalter: chesed is mentioned seven times, emunah five times, berit three times. God swore an oath. God made a covenant. God promised with His holiness. The dynasty would last like the sun and moon. And then the third section dismantles everything the first two built. The anointed one is rejected. The crown is profaned in the dust. The walls are breached. The enemies rejoice. The psalmist does not resolve the contradiction — he holds both realities in tension: God's sworn promise and God's apparent abandonment. This is not doubt; it is the most honest form of faith: demanding that God account for the gap between what He said and what has happened.

Translation Friction: The identity of Ethan the Ezrahite is debated — 1 Kings 4:31 names Ethan as a legendary wise man, and 1 Chronicles 15:19 names an Ethan as a Levitical musician alongside Heman and Asaph. The historical occasion of the lament section is also debated: it could reflect the Babylonian destruction of Jerusalem (586 BCE), the humiliation of a specific king, or the general crisis of the Davidic dynasty's end. The psalm's placement at the end of Book III may be deliberate — it serves as the crisis that Book IV (beginning with Moses's Psalm 90) must address. The doxology in verse 53 is not part of the psalm but a liturgical addition marking the end of Book III.

Connections: The Davidic covenant language draws heavily from 2 Samuel 7 (Nathan's oracle) and Psalm 2. The cosmic hymn section echoes Psalm 74:12-17 (God's victory over the sea) and Job 26:12 (God crushing Rahab). The lament section parallels Lamentations 2 and 5. The phrase 'Where is Your former chesed?' (v. 50) echoes Isaiah 63:15 and anticipates the theological crisis of exile. The closing doxology (v. 53) connects to the similar doxologies ending Books I-IV (Psalms 41:14, 72:18-19, 106:48).

¹A maskil of Ethan the Ezrahite.

²I will sing of the faithful love of the LORD forever; with my mouth I will make known Your faithfulness to every generation.

³For I said, 'Faithful love is built to last forever;
in the heavens You establish Your faithfulness.'

⁴I have cut a covenant with My chosen one;
I have sworn to David My servant:

⁵I will establish your offspring forever and build your throne for every generation.' Selah.

⁶The heavens praise Your wonders, O LORD —
Your faithfulness in the assembly of the holy ones.

⁷For who in the skies can compare with the LORD?
Who among the sons of God is like the LORD?

⁸God is feared in the council of the holy ones — great and awesome above all who surround Him.

⁹O LORD God of Hosts, who is like You?
Mighty is the LORD, and Your faithfulness surrounds You.

¹⁰You rule the surging of the sea;
when its waves rise, You still them.

¹¹You crushed Rahab like a slain corpse; with Your mighty arm You scattered Your enemies.

¹²The heavens are Yours; the earth also is Yours.
The world and all it contains — You founded them.

¹³North and south — You created them.
Tabor and Hermon shout for joy at Your name.

¹⁴Yours is a mighty arm; strong is Your hand, exalted is Your right hand.

¹⁵Righteousness and justice are the foundation of Your throne;
faithful love and truth go before Your face.

¹⁶Blessed are the people who know the festal shout!
O LORD, they walk in the light of Your face.

¹⁷In Your name they rejoice all day long,
and in Your righteousness they are lifted high.

¹⁸For You are the splendor of their strength, and by Your favor You lift up our horn.

¹⁹For our shield belongs to the LORD,
and our king to the Holy One of Israel.

²⁰Then You spoke in a vision to Your faithful one and said, 'I have placed help on a warrior;
I have raised up one chosen from the people.

²¹with My holy oil I have anointed him.
I have found David My servant;

²²My hand will be established with him;
My arm will strengthen him.

²³No enemy will deceive him;
no son of wickedness will oppress him.

²⁴I will crush his foes before him and strike down those who hate him.

²⁵My faithfulness and My faithful love are with him, and in My name his horn is lifted high.

²⁶I will set his hand over the sea and his right hand over the rivers.

²⁷He will call out to Me, 'You are my Father, my God, and the rock of my salvation.'

²⁸And I will make him the firstborn, the highest of the kings of the earth.

²⁹I will keep My faithful love for him forever, and My covenant will stand firm for him.

³⁰I will establish his offspring forever and his throne as the days of heaven.

³¹If his children abandon My the Law and do not walk in My judgments,

³²if they violate My statutes and do not keep My commandments,

³³then I will punish their rebellion with the rod and their guilt with blows.

³⁴But My faithful love I will not withdraw from him, and I will not be false to My faithfulness.

³⁵I will not violate My covenant or alter the word that has gone from My lips.

³⁶Once I have sworn by My holiness;
I will not lie to David.

³⁷His offspring will endure forever,
and his throne like the sun before Me.

³⁸Like the moon, established forever —
a faithful witness in the sky. Selah.

³⁹But You — You have rejected and spurned;
You have raged against Your anointed one.

⁴⁰You have renounced the covenant of Your servant;
You have profaned his crown to the ground.

⁴¹You have broken through all his walls;
You have laid his fortresses in ruins.

⁴²All who pass by plunder him;
he has become a disgrace to his neighbors.

⁴³You have raised the right hand of his foes;
You have made all his enemies rejoice.

⁴⁴You have turned back the edge of his sword and have not sustained him in battle.

⁴⁵You have put an end to his splendor and hurled his throne to the ground.

⁴⁶You have cut short the days of his youth;
You have covered him with shame. Selah.

⁴⁷How long, O LORD? Will You hide Yourself forever?
Will Your wrath burn like fire?

⁴⁸Remember how fleeting my life is!
For what futility have You created all mortals!

⁴⁹What person can live and not see death?
Who can deliver their soul from the grip of Sheol? Selah.

⁵⁰Where are Your former acts of faithful love, O Lord, which You swore to David in Your faithfulness?

⁵¹Remember, O Lord, the disgrace of Your servants;
how I bear in my chest the taunts of all the many peoples.

⁵²with which Your enemies taunt, O LORD, with which they taunt the footsteps of Your anointed one.

⁵³Blessed be the LORD forever.
Amen and amen.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ethan the Ezrahite appears in 1 Kings 4:31 as one of the wisest men of his era — surpassed only by Solomon. The pairing of Psalm 88 (Heman the Ezrahite) with Psalm 89 (Ethan the Ezrahite) places two Ezrahite wisdom figures side by side: one in unrelied darkness, the other in the tension between covenant promise and covenant crisis.
2. The word olam ('forever, eternity') applied to chesed is the psalm's foundational claim — and its most contested one. If chesed is forever, how do you explain the anointed one lying profaned in the dust? The psalm does not answer this question. It holds the claim and the contradiction together.
3. The verb yibbaneh ('is built, is constructed') from banah applies architectural language to chesed — faithful love is not a feeling but a structure, something built and maintained. The parallel places emunah in the heavens (shamayim), making faithfulness a cosmic reality, anchored above the reach of earthly disruption. The psalmist's claim is that chesed and emunah are as permanent as the sky itself.

4. God speaks directly, quoting His own covenant language. The verb karati ('I cut') is the standard covenant verb — covenants were 'cut' because animals were divided in the ratification ceremony (Genesis 15:9-18). The phrase li-vchiri ('with My chosen one') uses bachir, meaning the one selected, elected, singled out by divine choice. David is both avdi ('My servant') and bechiri ('My chosen') — claimed by God on both grounds of service and election.
5. Two promises: the perpetuation of David's zera ('seed, offspring, descendants') and the permanence of his kisse ('throne'). The verb akhin ('I will establish, make firm') from kun and the verb vaniti ('I will build') from banah use the same architectural language as verse 3 — chesed is built forever, and so is David's throne. The symmetry is intentional: the throne's permanence is grounded in chesed's permanence.
6. The heavens (shamayim) praise, and the qahal qedoshim ('assembly of holy ones') — the divine council — proclaims emunah. The 'holy ones' (qedoshim) are angelic beings, members of the heavenly court. God's faithfulness is not merely an earthly claim but a celestial reality — the heavenly beings themselves witness to it. This sets up verse 7's comparison.
7. The word shachaq ('sky, cloud, heaven') and benai elim ('sons of gods, divine beings') place the comparison in the heavenly realm. Even among the celestial beings — not merely among humans — YHWH has no equal. The verb ya'arokh ('can compare, can be arranged alongside') from arakh means to set in a row, to place side by side for comparison. No heavenly being can stand in the same line as YHWH.
8. The sod qedoshim rabbah ('great council of holy ones') is the divine assembly — the same setting as Psalm 82:1. The verb na'arats ('is feared, is held in awe') from arats means to be terrifying, to inspire dread. God does not merely preside over the council; He terrifies it. The divine beings who surround God's throne are themselves in awe. The verse establishes God's incomparable majesty as the foundation for the covenant promises that follow.
9. The rhetorical question mi khamokha ('who is like You?') echoes Exodus 15:11 — the song at the Red Sea. The word chasin ('mighty, strong') from chasan is rare, emphasizing raw power. And emunatkha sevivotekha ('Your faithfulness surrounds You') — faithfulness is not just an attribute God possesses but an atmosphere that envelops Him. God walks in a cloud of faithfulness; it is the air around His throne.
10. The verb moshel ('You rule, You govern') establishes God's sovereignty over the sea — the primordial symbol of chaos in ancient Near Eastern cosmology. The verb teshabchem ('You still them, You calm them') from shavach means to soothe, to bring to rest. God does not merely withstand the waves; He silences them. This cosmic authority grounds the covenant promises: the God who controls the sea can certainly maintain a dynasty.
11. Rahab (Rahav) is the primordial sea monster — the chaos dragon representing the forces that oppose God's creative order. The verb dikkita ('You crushed, You shattered') from daka means to pulverize. God reduced the chaos monster to a corpse (ke-chalal, 'like a pierced one, like a slain body'). The phrase bi-zero'a uzzekha ('with the arm of Your strength') attributes the victory to God's own power. This cosmic victory narrative — God defeating the sea monster — is the mythological backdrop for the exodus (Isaiah 51:9-10 explicitly connects Rahab to Egypt and the Red Sea).
12. Total cosmic ownership: heavens, earth, tevel ('the inhabited world'), and its melo'ah ('fullness'). The verb yesadtam ('You founded them') from yasad means to lay a foundation. God is both owner and architect of everything that exists. The claim of universal ownership supports the covenant argument: the God who owns everything can surely keep one promise to one king.
13. The compass points (tsafon/north, yamin/south-right) represent the totality of direction, and the mountains (Tabor in the west, Hermon in the north) represent the geographic landmarks of the land. All of creation — directions and landmarks — celebrates God's name. The verb yeranenu ('they shout for joy') personifies the mountains as worshippers. Even the landscape praises.
14. Three images of divine power: zero'a ('arm'), yad ('hand'), and yemin ('right hand'). The arm is strength in action; the hand is power applied; the right hand is authority and favor. Together they describe a God whose power is active, directed, and supreme.
15. The four attributes — tsedeq (righteousness), mishpat (justice), chesed (faithful love), emet (truth) — form the complete character profile of God's kingship. They appear together here and in Psalm 85:10-14, creating a theological connection between the two psalms. When the psalmist later accuses God of abandoning the covenant, these four attributes are implicitly indicted: has the throne's foundation shifted?
16. The teru'ah ('festal shout, alarm, trumpet blast, shout of war or worship') is the sound of the shofar at festivals and the communal cry of worship. To 'know' the teru'ah means to be initiated into the worship of Israel — to participate in the festal life of God's people. These people walk be-or panekha ('in the light of Your face') — the opposite of the hidden face that Psalm 88 lamented. Where God's face shines, there is blessing.
17. Two grounds of celebration: God's name (shem, the personal identity and reputation of YHWH) and God's righteousness (tsidqatekha). The people rejoice not in their own strength but in who God is and what God does rightly. The verb yarumu ('they are lifted high, they are exalted') from rum means God's righteousness elevates His people — they rise because He is right.
18. The word tiferet ('splendor, beauty, glory') applied to uzzamo ('their strength') means God is the beautiful part of Israel's power — without God, their strength has no glory. The horn (qeren) is the symbol of power and dignity, and God's favor (ratson, 'pleasure, delight, acceptance') is what raises it. Israel's strength is not indigenous; it is given.
19. The 'shield' (magen) and 'king' (malke) both belong to God. The human king — the shield of the people — is himself God's possession. The title Qedosh Yisra'el ('Holy One of Israel') is characteristically Isaianic (occurring 25 times in Isaiah) but appears here to emphasize that Israel's king derives authority from Israel's God. This verse transitions to the Davidic covenant section.
20. The phrase az dibbarta be-chazon ('then You spoke in a vision') introduces the divine oracle that follows — likely referring to Nathan's prophecy in 2 Samuel 7. The 'faithful one' (chasidekha) may be Nathan, Samuel, or David himself. God chose a gibbor ('warrior, mighty one') and a bachur ('chosen one, young man') from the people (me-am) — David was not born into the royal line but was elevated from the common people.

21. The verb matsati ('I found') echoes 1 Samuel 13:14, where God tells Saul He has 'sought out a man after His own heart.' The finding implies that David was not obvious — he was the youngest son, overlooked by his own family (1 Samuel 16:11). God found what everyone else missed.
22. God's hand (yad) and arm (zero'a) — the instruments of divine power celebrated in verse 14 — are now pledged to David personally. The verb tikkon ('will be established') and te'ammetsennu ('will strengthen him') promise ongoing, active divine support. God's cosmic power is directed toward one man's success.
23. The verb yasshi ('will exact, will deceive, will lay a claim on') from nasha means to trick or to demand unjust payment. The ben avlah ('son of wickedness') is a person characterized by avlah ('injustice, perversity'). God promises that David will be protected from both deception and oppression. This promise will be tested severely in the lament section.
24. The verb khattoti ('I will crush, I will shatter') from katat and eggof ('I will strike, I will plague') from nagaf describe God personally fighting David's battles. The enemies are both tsarav ('his adversaries') and mesan'av ('those who hate him'). God's combat is personal: He fights because David's enemies are His enemies.
25. The two pillar words — emunah and chesed — are now specifically pledged to David. They are not merely cosmic attributes or general qualities; they are personally directed: immo ('with him'). And be-shmi ('in My name') — David's power (horn) is exalted through God's identity. The name is the channel through which divine authority flows to the human king.
26. The sea (yam) and rivers (neharot) represent both geographic extent (from the Mediterranean to the Euphrates) and cosmic authority (dominion over the primordial waters). God gives David authority over the same waters that God Himself rules (v. 10). The Davidic king participates in God's cosmic sovereignty.
27. The father-son relationship between God and the Davidic king is adoptive, not biological — it is established by covenant, not by nature. This distinguishes Israelite royal theology from Egyptian and Mesopotamian myths where kings were literally descended from gods. The Davidic king is God's son by covenant declaration, not by divine procreation.
28. The word bekhor ('firstborn') carries enormous significance — the firstborn received the double portion, the primary blessing, the leadership of the family. God makes David's line His firstborn among all the kings of the earth. The title Elyon ('highest, Most High') — normally reserved for God Himself (v. 8) — is now shared with the Davidic king: he is elyon le-malkhei arets ('the highest of earth's kings'). The king participates in God's supremacy.
29. Three key words converge: chesed ('faithful love'), berit ('covenant'), and ne'emenet ('stands firm, is faithful') from aman — the same root as emunah. God's faithful love is kept forever; God's covenant is ne'emenet — itself faithful. The covenant is not merely made; it is reliable, trustworthy, built on the same foundation as God's own character.
30. The phrase ki-yimei shamayim ('as the days of heaven') means as long as heaven endures — essentially, forever. David's dynasty is given cosmic permanence, anchored to the duration of the sky itself. The same architectural permanence promised to chesed in verse 3 is now promised to the throne.
31. The conditional section begins. God anticipates the failure of David's descendants: im ya'azvu vanav torati ('if his children abandon My Torah'). The verb azav ('to abandon, to forsake') is the standard word for covenant betrayal. Torah here encompasses all of God's instruction — law, teaching, guidance. The 'if' introduces a possibility that will become historical reality.
32. The verb yechalelu ('they violate, they profane') from chalal means to desecrate — to treat what is holy as common. The accumulation of covenant terms — Torah, mishpatim, chuqot, mitsvot (law, judgments, statutes, commandments) — covers every possible category of divine instruction. The conditional envisions total disobedience.
33. God will punish — but the punishment has a specific character: be-shevet ('with a rod'), the instrument of parental discipline, not execution. The word pish'am ('their rebellion, their transgression') from pasha means willful revolt, and avonam ('their guilt, their iniquity') from avon is the twisted consequence of sin. God disciplines like a father (cf. 2 Samuel 7:14), not like an executioner.
34. The phrase lo ashaqer be-emunati ('I will not be false to My faithfulness') makes emunah reflexive — God's faithfulness is a commitment to His own identity. To break the covenant would be to make God a liar, and God cannot lie (Numbers 23:19). This creates the irresolvable tension of the psalm: the covenant cannot be broken, but it appears to be broken.
35. The verb achalel ('I will violate, I will profane') is the same word used for the children's violation of God's statutes in verse 32. God will not do to His covenant what the children did to His law. And u-motsa sefatai lo ashaneh ('the utterance of My lips I will not change') — once God has spoken, the speech act is irrevocable. God's word, once released, cannot be recalled or revised.
36. God swears by be-qodshi ('My holiness') — His own sacred nature is the guarantee. Since there is nothing higher than God by which to swear (cf. Hebrews 6:13), God swears by Himself. The phrase im le-David akhazzev ('if I will lie to David' — a Hebrew oath formula where 'if' means 'I certainly will not') makes the promise absolute. The solemnity is maximal: one oath, by God's holiness, irreversible.
37. The throne is compared to the sun (ka-shemesh) — the most permanent, visible, daily-reliable object in creation. As surely as the sun rises, David's throne endures. The phrase negdi ('before Me, in My sight') means God personally witnesses and maintains the throne's permanence. The sun comparison will make the lament's devastation more acute: has the sun gone dark?

38. The moon (yareach) joins the sun as a cosmic guarantee. The phrase ed ba-shachaq ne'eman ('a faithful witness in the sky') makes the moon a witness — a ne'eman (from aman, the root of emunah) that testifies nightly to God's covenant commitment. Every moonrise is covenant evidence. Selah marks the end of the covenant section and the transition to the lament.
39. The shift from covenant celebration to accusatory lament is the most dramatic tonal reversal in the Psalter. The word 'But' (ve-attah) carries the weight of centuries of shattered expectation. Everything God promised in verses 4-38 is contradicted by what the psalmist now describes.
40. The verb ne'arta ('You have renounced, You have abhorred') from na'ar means to shake off, to reject with disgust. The berit ('covenant') that God swore He would not violate (v. 35) has been — according to the psalmist — renounced. And chillalta la-arets nizro ('You have profaned his crown to the ground') — the verb chillal ('profane, desecrate') is the same word used in verses 32 and 35 about violating covenants. God accused the children of profaning His statutes; now the psalmist accuses God of profaning the crown. The nezer ('crown, diadem, consecration') — the symbol of royal anointing — lies in the dirt.
41. The verb paratsta ('You broke through') from parats means to breach — the walls God was supposed to defend, God has torn open. The word mechittah ('ruin, destruction, terror') describes the fortresses reduced to rubble. The God who promised 'no enemy will deceive him' (v. 23) has Himself become the one who breaches the defenses.
42. The plundering is public — kol ovrei derekh ('all who pass by on the road') can raid at will. And the cherpah ('reproach, disgrace, shame') is social — the neighbors who once respected now mock. The Davidic king has become a roadside spectacle, an object of contempt.
43. The irony is exact: in verse 14, God's right hand was exalted; in verse 18, God lifted Israel's horn. Now God raises the right hand of the enemy. God's power, which was directed toward David, is now redirecting toward David's destroyers. The verb hismachta ('You made rejoice') means God gave the enemies joy — the same God who was supposed to give David joy.
44. The tsur charbo ('edge/rock of his sword') is dulled or turned back — the weapon is useless. And lo haqemoto ba-milchamah ('You have not made him stand in battle') — the verb haqam ('to cause to stand') is the opposite of what God promised. The warrior God chose (v. 20) cannot stand because God will not hold him up.
45. The word miteharo ('his splendor, his purity, his brightness') from taher may refer to the radiance of the royal office. God has extinguished it. And the throne (kisse) that was supposed to endure like the sun and moon (vv. 37-38) has been cast la-arets ('to the ground'). The cosmic permanence promised in the covenant section is violently contradicted by the earthward motion of the lament.
46. The verb hiqtsarta ('You shortened') from qatsar means to cut off, to truncate. The days of youth (yemei alumav) — the prime of life — are abbreviated by God's hand. And he'etita alav bushah ('You covered him with shame') — the verb ata means to wrap, to clothe. Shame is worn like a garment. The king who was clothed with royal splendor is now wrapped in disgrace. Selah.
47. The cry ad mah ('how long?') echoes Psalm 82:2 and dozens of other laments — it is the universal question of the sufferer. The verb tissater ('You hide Yourself') from satar is the hidden face of God — the same terror as Psalm 88:15. And tiv'ar kemo esh chamatekha ('will Your wrath burn like fire?') — the fire of God's anger was supposed to burn against David's enemies (v. 24), not against David himself.
48. The word cheled ('duration, lifespan, world') emphasizes brevity — life is short, and the psalmist feels its shortness acutely. The word shav ('futility, emptiness, vanity') — the same word as in the third commandment ('You shall not take the LORD's name in vain') — asks whether human existence itself is pointless. The question borders on the despair of Ecclesiastes: if the covenant is broken, what is the purpose of life?
49. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'no one.' The word gever ('man, strong one') echoes Job 3:3 and emphasizes that even the mighty die. The phrase mi-yad she'ol ('from the hand of Sheol') personifies death as a grasping power. No human can pry open death's grip. The psalmist's argument is that death is coming and the covenant promises must be fulfilled before it arrives.
50. This verse is the psalm's climax — the question that the entire poem has been building toward. The seven occurrences of chesed in this psalm (see note on v. 2) reach their crisis here: chesed was celebrated, promised, sworn, and pledged — and now the psalmist demands to know where it has gone. The psalm does not answer the question. It leaves it hanging.
51. The verb zekhor ('remember') is the final plea — the psalmist asks God to take notice of the cherpah ('disgrace, reproach') that God's own servants bear. The phrase se'eti be-cheqi ('I bear in my chest/bosom') means the mockery is internalized, carried inside the body like a physical burden. The 'many peoples' (rabbim ammim) are the nations who mock both the king and the God he serves.
52. The psalm ends without resolution — no doxology of praise, no turning point, no answered prayer. This is deliberate and canonical: the editors of the Psalter placed this unresolved cry at the end of Book III, followed by the doxology of verse 53 and then Moses's Psalm 90, which addresses the crisis of divine wrath and human mortality from a different angle. The arrangement implies that Psalm 89's question finds its response not within the psalm but in the larger canonical structure.
53. This doxology is not part of Psalm 89 but a liturgical formula closing Book III of the Psalter (cf. Psalm 41:14 closing Book I, 72:18-19 closing Book II, 106:48 closing Book IV). The double amen ('let it be firm, let it be established') — from aman, the root of emunah — is a communal response of affirmation. The congregation says 'amen' to God's faithfulness even after a psalm that questions it. The doxology does not answer the psalm's questions; it affirms that the conversation with God continues.

Summary: The psalm attributed to Moses — the only psalm bearing his name — and the opening of Book IV of the Psalter. It meditates on the eternal nature of God set against the crushing brevity of human life. Before the mountains existed, God was already God. Human beings are like grass that sprouts in the morning and withers by evening. The psalm traces this brevity to God's anger against sin: human days are consumed in divine wrath, and even seventy or eighty years pass like a sigh. The psalm closes with two petitions: teach us to number our days that we may gain a heart of wisdom, and let the favor of the Lord rest upon us so that the work of our hands will endure.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm answers the crisis of Psalm 89. Book III ended with the Davidic covenant apparently shattered, the anointed one mocked, and the question 'Where is Your former faithful love?' hanging unanswered. Book IV opens with Moses — not David — and redirects the theological gaze from the Davidic dynasty to the eternal God who existed before any dynasty, any monarchy, any temple. The psalm's strategy is radical: instead of defending the Davidic covenant, it leaps behind it to the God who was a dwelling place 'in generation after generation,' long before David was born. If the Davidic institution has failed, God has not — because God precedes all institutions. The famous prayer 'teach us to number our days' is not gentle pastoral advice; it is the hard-won wisdom of a man who watched an entire generation die in the wilderness because of God's anger. Moses knew something about numbered days.

Translation Friction: The attribution to Moses makes this potentially the oldest psalm in the Psalter — and the oldest poem in the Hebrew Bible after the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15). Some scholars accept the attribution as plausible; others see it as a later ascription meant to ground Book IV's theology in Mosaic authority. The phrase 'a thousand years in Your sight are like yesterday' (v. 4) has influenced theological reflection on divine timelessness from Augustine to Einstein. The psalm's unflinching focus on death and divine wrath — without the redemptive turn most psalms provide — makes it one of the most sobering texts in Scripture.

Connections: The opening line ('Lord, You have been our dwelling place') connects to Deuteronomy 33:27 ('The eternal God is your dwelling place'). The grass metaphor (vv. 5-6) is developed in Isaiah 40:6-8 ('All flesh is grass'). The seventy-eighty years of verse 10 became the standard biblical lifespan measure. The petition 'teach us to number our days' (v. 12) influenced Ecclesiastes' entire meditation on time and wisdom. Moses' placement at the head of Book IV (Psalms 90-106) reframes the Psalter: after the Davidic crisis of Psalm 89, the response is to return to the God who preceded David, preceded the monarchy, preceded even the conquest — the eternal God who was dwelling place before any earthly dwelling existed.

¹A prayer of Moses, the man of God.

O Lord, You have been our dwelling place in generation after generation.

²Before the mountains were born, before You labored to bring forth the earth and the world, from everlasting to everlasting, You are God.

³You turn mortals back to dust and say, 'Return, children of Adam.'

⁴For a thousand years in Your sight are like yesterday when it passes, like a watch in the night.

⁵You sweep them away like a flood; they become like sleep.
In the morning they are like grass that springs up —

⁶in the morning it blooms and springs up;
by evening it withers and dries up.

⁷For we are consumed by Your anger and terrified by Your wrath.

⁸You have set our guilty deeds before You,
our hidden sins in the light of Your face.

⁹For all our days decline under Your fury;
we finish our years like a sigh.

¹⁰The days of our years — among them, seventy years, or if by strength, eighty years.
Yet their pride is only toil and trouble,
for it passes quickly and we fly away.

¹¹Who understands the power of Your anger?
Your wrath matches the fear that is due You.

¹²Teach us to number our days,
so that we may gain a heart of wisdom.

¹³Return, O LORD! How long?
Have compassion on Your servants.

¹⁴Satisfy us in the morning with Your faithful love, so that we may shout for joy and be glad all our days.

¹⁵Make us glad for as many days as You have afflicted us, for as many years as we have seen trouble.

¹⁶Let Your work be revealed to Your servants and Your splendor to their children.

¹⁷Let the favor of the Lord our God rest upon us.
Establish the work of our hands for us —
yes, establish the work of our hands.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Some manuscripts read me'onah ('refuge, habitation') instead of ma'on; the Septuagint reads kataphyge ('refuge'). The meaning is essentially the same: God is the place where His people live. The phrase be-dor va-dor ('in generation after generation') spans all of human history — every generation has found its home in God, including the wilderness generation that died under God's displeasure.
2. The birth language (yulladu, techolel) for creation is found also in Proverbs 8:24-25, where Wisdom was brought forth before the mountains. The image of God laboring to bring forth the world is rare and intimate — creation is not effortless speech (as in Genesis 1) but costly, physical work. Moses may be drawing on a different creation tradition.
3. The verb shuvu can mean 'return' (go back to dust) or 'repent' (turn back to God). Some interpreters read both meanings simultaneously: God commands both physical return to dust and spiritual return to Himself. The ambiguity may be deliberate — the psalm holds death and repentance in the same breath.
4. This verse became the basis for 2 Peter 3:8 ('With the Lord one day is as a thousand years, and a thousand years as one day'). The psalm's point is not mathematical equivalence but experiential incommensurability: divine time and human time are so different that comparison barely works. A thousand years — roughly forty human generations — is a single night shift to God.

5. The verb zeramtam ('You sweep them away') from zaram means to pour out, to wash away in a torrent — human lives are carried off like debris in a flash flood. Then the comparison shifts: shenah yihyu ('they become like sleep') — life is as insubstantial as a dream. The morning brings the grass metaphor: ke-chatsir yachalof ('like grass that changes/passes'). The verb chalaf ('to pass by, to change, to spring up') captures the grass's rapid cycle from growth to death.
6. The verb yatsits ('it blooms, it blossoms') from tsuts means to flower — the grass reaches its peak of beauty. And chalaf ('it passes, it renews') captures the brief moment of flourishing. Then la-erev ('by evening') — the same day, not the next — yemolel ve-yavesh ('it withers and dries up'). The verb molel means to wilt, to become limp; yavesh means to be completely dry, dead. Morning to evening: a single day contains the entire arc of a human life. The compression is brutal.
7. The verb khalinu ('we are consumed, we are finished') from kalah means to be used up, exhausted, spent. And nivhalnu ('we are terrified, we are thrown into panic') from bahal describes the fear that paralyzes. The cause of human brevity is not mere biology but divine anger (af, 'nostril/anger') and chamatekha ('Your wrath/heat'). Moses does not explain why God is angry — he simply states that human mortality is the result of divine displeasure.
8. The 'light of Your face' (me'or panekha) is the same divine countenance that blesses in Numbers 6:25 ('The LORD make His face shine upon you'). Here, the shining face is not blessing but exposure — the same light that bestows favor also reveals guilt. The dual function of God's face (grace and judgment) is a central tension in Hebrew theology.
9. The verb panu ('they turn away, they decline') from panah describes the days turning their face away — departing, leaving. The word evratekha ('Your fury, Your overflowing wrath') from avar means anger that overflows its container. And the final comparison: killinu shanenu kemo hegeh ('we finish our years like a sigh'). The word hegeh can mean 'a sigh, a murmur, a muttering, a growl.' An entire lifetime reduced to a single exhalation. The years do not end with a bang but with a breath that dissipates into air.
10. The seventy/eighty year span became the standard measure of a full life in Jewish tradition. Moses himself lived 120 years (Deuteronomy 34:7), well beyond this range. The psalm may reflect the normal rather than the exceptional lifespan. The word aven ('trouble, sorrow, wickedness, nothingness') carries moral weight — life's best achievements are tainted by futility. This anticipates Ecclesiastes' verdict: hevel ('vapor').
11. The rhetorical question mi yodea oz appekha ('who knows the strength of Your anger?') implies that no one fully comprehends how powerful God's displeasure is. The second line — u-khe-yir'atkha evratekha ('and according to Your fear is Your wrath') — means God's anger is proportional to the reverence He deserves. Since God deserves infinite reverence, His anger is immeasurable. The verse is a bridge between the description of mortality (vv. 3-10) and the petition for wisdom (v. 12): only someone who grasps the magnitude of divine anger will pray for wisdom.
12. The phrase levav chokhmah ('a heart of wisdom') places wisdom in the heart (levav), the Hebrew seat of will and decision. Wisdom is not intellectual knowledge but existential orientation — a way of living that accounts for the fact that life is brief, God is eternal, and the gap between them demands humility. This verse is the theological foundation for the entire wisdom tradition.
13. The verb shuvah ('return') — the same verb God used to command humanity back to dust (v. 3) — is now directed at God. Turn back. Come back. The phrase ad matai ('how long?') is the universal lament question. And hinnachem al avadekha ('have compassion on Your servants') — the verb nacham (Niphal) means to relent, to be grieved, to change course. Moses asks God to feel differently about His servants — not to withdraw the reality of death but to show kindness within it.
14. The word chesed appears here for the first time in the psalm — after twelve verses of mortality, anger, and judgment, faithful love finally enters. Its placement is deliberate: chesed does not deny the reality of death but transforms the experience of the numbered days. The petition is not for longer life but for a fuller one.
15. The petition asks for proportional compensation: ki-mot innitanu ('according to the days You afflicted us'). The years of suffering should be balanced by years of joy. The request is not for painless life but for redemptive proportion — the joy should match the suffering in duration. Moses, who spent forty years watching a generation die in the wilderness, would have calculated the debt precisely.
16. The verb yera'eh ('let it be seen, let it appear') asks for visible evidence of God's activity. The word po'olekha ('Your work, Your deed') is what God is currently doing — the servants need to see it. And hadarekha ('Your splendor, Your majesty') is directed al beneihem ('upon their children') — the next generation should inherit not suffering but glory. The petition is intergenerational: let the parents see God's work and the children see God's beauty.
17. The double petition ('establish the work of our hands... establish the work of our hands') is one of only a few instances of verbatim repetition in the Psalter. The repetition functions as intensification: this is the prayer's final, urgent, concentrated plea. All the theology of the psalm — divine eternity, human brevity, anger, wisdom, chesed — converges on this single request: let our brief lives produce something that endures. The answer, the psalm implies, is not in human effort but in divine establishment.

Summary: Psalm 91 is a psalm of divine protection, addressed to one who has chosen to dwell in the presence of the Most High. It moves from a general declaration of trust (vv. 1-2) to specific promises of deliverance from danger — plague, warfare, wild beasts, demonic threat — and culminates in a divine oracle spoken in God's own voice (vv. 14-16). The psalm has no superscription in the Hebrew text, making its authorship anonymous.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm operates on the razor's edge between promise and presumption. It declares with absolute confidence that the one who shelters in God will not be harmed — no plague will touch his tent, no stone will bruise his foot. Yet the Hebrew Bible itself contains stories of righteous people who suffered terribly (Job, Jeremiah, the Servant of Isaiah 53). The psalm does not resolve this tension; it simply declares the promise without qualification. The divine oracle in verses 14-16 shifts the psalm from human testimony to God's own speech — 'Because he clings to me, I will deliver him' — which grounds the protection not in a magical formula but in the quality of relationship. The key verb is chashaq ('to cling, to desire'), which describes passionate attachment, not casual belief.

Translation Friction: The LXX attributes this psalm to David, but the Hebrew text is untitled. The phrase yalinkha be-ever'ato ('he will cover you with his pinion') uses avian imagery for God — feathers, wings — which is metaphorical, not literal, but carries deep resonance from Deuteronomy 32:11 where God is compared to an eagle hovering over its young. The 'terror of night' (pachad laylah) and 'arrow that flies by day' (chets ya'uf yomam) in verse 5 likely refer to both literal military danger and the ancient Near Eastern belief in demonic forces active at specific times. The psalm's promise of angelic protection (v. 11-12) was famously cited in the temptation narrative of Matthew 4:6, where it is used to test whether divine promise can be turned into divine demand.

Connections: The opening phrase yoshev be-seter Elyon ('he who dwells in the shelter of the Most High') connects to the temple theology of Psalms 27:5 and 31:20, where God's 'shelter' (seter) is the sacred space of divine presence. The four divine names in verses 1-2 — Elyon ('Most High'), Shaddai ('the Almighty'), YHWH, and Elohim — concentrate more names for God in two verses than almost any other passage in the Psalter. The promise of long life in verse 16 echoes the covenant blessings of Deuteronomy 30:20. The angelic guardianship of verses 11-12 has no parallel in the Hebrew Bible of this specificity — angels carrying the righteous lest they stumble — making this one of the most developed angelology texts in the Old Testament.

¹He who dwells in the shelter of the Most High will rest in the shadow of the Almighty.

²I say to the LORD, "My refuge and my fortress,
my God — in him I trust."

³For he will rescue you from the fowler's snare, from the destructive plague.

⁴With his pinion he will cover you,
and under his wings you will find refuge.
His faithfulness is a shield and a wall.

⁵You will not fear the terror of the night,
nor the arrow that flies by day,

⁶nor the plague that stalks in darkness,
nor the devastation that ravages at noon.

⁷A thousand may fall at your side, ten thousand at your right hand — but it will not come near you.

⁸You will only look with your eyes and see the repayment of the wicked.

⁹Because you have made the LORD your refuge,
the Most High your dwelling place,

¹⁰no harm will befall you,
and no affliction will come near your tent.

¹¹For he will command his angels concerning you,
to guard you in all your ways.

¹²On their hands they will carry you,
so your foot does not strike a stone.

¹³You will tread on the lion and the cobra;
you will trample the young lion and the serpent.

¹⁴"Because he clings to me, I will deliver him;
I will set him on high, because he knows my name."

¹⁵"He will call on me and I will answer him;
I am with him in trouble.
I will rescue him and honor him."

¹⁶"With length of days I will satisfy him and show him my salvation."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The four divine names in verses 1-2 (Elyon, Shaddai, YHWH, Elohay) are not synonyms used for poetic variety alone. Each name carries distinct theological weight: Elyon stresses cosmic supremacy, Shaddai stresses might, YHWH is the covenant name, and Elohay ('my God') is the personal possessive. Together they present the full identity of the God who protects.
2. The word seter ('shelter, hiding place') is related to the verb satar ('to hide, to conceal'). In the Psalter it often refers to the protective presence of God experienced in worship (Psalm 27:5, 31:21). This is not physical architecture but relational proximity.
3. The pach yaqush ('fowler's snare') is a bird-trap, a concealed device designed to catch the unsuspecting. It serves as a metaphor for hidden danger — traps set by enemies or circumstances one cannot foresee. The dever havvot ('plague of destruction') pairs disease with ruin. The two images cover covert danger (the trap) and overt catastrophe (the plague), suggesting comprehensive protection.
4. The word amitto ('his truth/faithfulness') is from emet, one of the foundational attributes of God in the Hebrew Bible. Here it is rendered 'faithfulness' because the context is protection — God's reliability is what shields the believer. The image of God as a bird appears in Deuteronomy 32:11 (eagle) and Ruth 2:12 (wings of the LORD), always in the context of protective care.
5. The pachad laylah ('terror of night') and chets ya'uf yomam ('arrow that flies by day') form the first half of a four-part catalogue of dangers spanning night and day, darkness and light. The 'terror of night' likely encompasses both literal raids (night attacks were common in ancient warfare) and the ancient Near Eastern belief in malevolent spiritual forces active after dark. The 'arrow by day' refers to open warfare. Together the pair says: no time of day holds any threat for the sheltered one.

6. The dever ba-ofel yahalokh ('plague that walks in darkness') personifies disease as a predator moving through the night. The qetev yashud tsohorayim ('devastation that ravages at noon') is more mysterious — qetev is a rare word possibly connected to a demonic figure in ancient tradition. The Targum and rabbinic sources identify qetev with a specific demon active during the hottest hours. Whether the psalmist intended literal demonology or vivid personification, the effect is the same: destruction has been given legs and agency, and it still cannot reach the one sheltered in God.
7. The escalation from elef ('a thousand') to revavah ('ten thousand') is a standard Hebrew intensification device. The image is of a battlefield where devastation surrounds the protected one on every side. The promise is extraordinary in its absoluteness: eleikha lo yiggash ('to you it will not draw near'). The psalm does not say 'you may survive' but 'it will not touch you.' This kind of unqualified promise is characteristic of psalms of trust and should be read as an expression of faith's posture, not a contractual guarantee.
8. The word shillumat ('repayment, recompense') from the root sh-l-m ('to be complete, to repay') implies that the wicked receive what their actions earned. The protected one will witness this — not participate in it, not be caught in it — only observe it. The verse assumes a moral order in which wickedness meets its consequence and righteousness is vindicated by survival.
9. The verse returns to the language of verse 1-2, creating a frame: machsi ('my refuge') echoes verse 2 and me'onekha ('your dwelling place') echoes the yoshev ('dwells') of verse 1. The word ma'on ('dwelling place, habitation') is used of God's heavenly abode in Deuteronomy 26:15 — here, remarkably, God becomes the dwelling place of the human rather than the reverse.
10. The word nega ('affliction, plague, stroke') is the same word used for the plagues of Egypt and for skin diseases in Leviticus 13-14. The ohalekha ('your tent') evokes nomadic life and also the tabernacle tradition — the tent is both home and sacred space. The promise is that the protected zone extends to one's entire household.
11. This verse and the next were cited in the temptation narrative (Matthew 4:6, Luke 4:10-11) as a test of whether divine promise can be leveraged into divine demand. The original psalm context is one of trust, not manipulation — the angels are sent because of the relationship described in verses 1-2, not because the individual demands them.
12. The image is of literal carrying — al kappayim yissa'unkna ('on their palms they will lift you up'). The danger averted is modest: stumbling on a stone. After the grand threats of plague, arrows, and thousands falling, the psalm descends to the smallest hazard — a stone on the path — and declares that even this is covered. The progression from cosmic danger to minor stumbling suggests that divine care operates at every scale.
13. Four dangerous creatures appear: shachal ('lion,' possibly a specific species), peten ('cobra,' the Egyptian cobra or asp), kefir ('young lion,' in its prime strength), and tannin ('serpent, dragon, sea creature'). The verb tidrakh ('you will tread') and tirmos ('you will trample') are verbs of dominion — walking on top of lethal predators. The imagery evokes Genesis 3:15 (crushing the serpent's head) and the ancient Near Eastern motif of the victorious king treading on enemies. The protected one does not merely survive these threats but exercises authority over them.
14. The divine oracle in verses 14-16 is the theological key to the entire psalm. The protection promised in verses 1-13 is not automatic or formulaic — it is grounded in the quality of relationship described here. The verbs chashaq ('to cling') and yada ('to know') describe a bond of passion and intimacy that precedes and produces the protection. Without this relationship, the promises become mere magic.
15. The sequence is precise: yiqra'eni ('he will call on me') — ve-e'enehu ('and I will answer him') — immo anokhi ve-tsarah ('I am with him in distress') — achaltsehu ('I will rescue him') — va-akhabbdehu ('and I will honor him'). Note that God does not promise absence of trouble (tsarah) but presence within it: 'I am with him in trouble.' The psalm has not contradicted itself — verses 3-13 describe protection from external attack, but verse 15 acknowledges that distress still comes, and God's response is companionship followed by deliverance.
16. The final promise is twofold: orekh yamim ('length of days,' a long and full life) and yeshu'ati ('my salvation'). The verb asbi'ehu ('I will satisfy him') is from sava ('to be sated, filled to contentment'). The promise is not mere survival but satisfaction — a life that feels complete. The final word, yeshu'ati ('my salvation'), places the psalm's conclusion in the vocabulary of God's saving acts. The root y-sh-a ('to save, to deliver') is the most comprehensive term for divine rescue in the Hebrew Bible. God's final word is not protection but revelation: 'I will show him my salvation' — the ultimate gift is not safety but sight.

Summary: Psalm 92 is the only psalm in the Hebrew Psalter explicitly designated 'A Song for the Sabbath Day' (mizmor shir le-yom ha-shabbat). It is a thanksgiving hymn celebrating God's works, the depth of divine thought, and the contrasting fates of the righteous and the wicked. The psalm moves from praise (vv. 1-4) to reflection on God's inscrutable designs (vv. 5-9) to personal triumph (vv. 10-11) to the flourishing of the righteous in old age (vv. 12-16).

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sabbath superscription raises a profound question: why this psalm for Sabbath? It contains no mention of rest, creation, or the seventh day. The Mishnah (Tamid 7:4) assigns it to Sabbath because the rabbis understood it as a song for 'the world to come' — the eternal Sabbath, the age of final rest. If so, the psalm is eschatological: it describes the reality that will prevail when God's work is fully visible. The wicked will have vanished like grass (v. 7), the righteous will flourish like cedars (v. 12), and God's justice will be self-evident. The Sabbath is a weekly rehearsal of that future reality.

*Translation Friction: Verse 1 in the Hebrew text is the superscription (mizmor shir le-yom ha-shabbat), which the WLC counts as verse 1. English Bibles typically begin the content at verse 1, creating a one-verse offset. We follow Hebrew versification throughout. The phrase beli avar ('without injustice,' v. 16) in the final verse is theologically charged — declaring that there is 'no unrighteousness' in God — a statement that the book of Job spends 42 chapters interrogating.*

*Connections: The Sabbath assignment connects this psalm to Genesis 2:2-3 and Exodus 20:8-11, where Sabbath commemorates creation completed. The tree imagery in verses 13-14 ('planted in the house of the LORD') echoes Psalm 1:3 (the righteous as a tree by water) and Jeremiah 17:8. The phrase ma gadlu ma'asekha ('how great are your works,' v. 6) resonates with Psalm 104:24 and Psalm 111:2, where the immensity of God's works overwhelms human comprehension.*

¹A psalm — a song composed for the Sabbath day.

²It is good to give thanks to the LORD, to sing praise to your name, O Most High,

³to declare your faithful love in the morning and your faithfulness through the nights,

⁴with the ten-stringed instrument and the lute, with the murmuring melody of the lyre.

⁵For you have made me glad by your work, O LORD;
at the works of your hands I shout for joy.

⁶How great are your works, O LORD!
How profoundly deep are your thoughts!

⁷A senseless person does not know this;
a fool cannot understand it.

⁸When the wicked sprout like grass and all evildoers flourish — it is only to be destroyed forever.

⁹But you, O LORD, are exalted forever.

¹⁰For look — your enemies, O LORD, for look — your enemies will perish;
all evildoers will be scattered.

¹¹But you have raised my horn like that of the wild ox;
I am drenched with fresh oil.

¹²My eye has looked on those who watch me;
my ears have heard the fate of the evildoers rising against me.

¹³The righteous will flourish like a palm tree;
like a cedar in Lebanon, they will grow tall.

¹⁴Planted in the house of the LORD,
they will flourish in the courts of our God.

¹⁵They will still bear fruit in old age;
they will be full of sap and green,

¹⁶to declare that the LORD is upright — my rock, in whom there is no injustice.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This is the only psalm in the entire Psalter with a Sabbath designation. The Levites sang it during the Sabbath morning offering in the Second Temple period (Mishnah Tamid 7:4). The double genre label mizmor shir ('psalm' and 'song') may distinguish instrumental accompaniment (mizmor, from z-m-r, 'to pluck strings') from vocal performance (shir, 'song').
2. The psalm opens with a declaration about the nature of thanksgiving itself: tov lehodot ('it is good to give thanks'). The word tov ('good') is the same word God uses to evaluate creation in Genesis 1. Giving thanks is not merely appropriate — it is good in the creational sense, part of the order of things. The address to Elyon ('Most High') connects to Psalm 91:1.
3. The preposition ba-leilot ('in the nights,' plural) suggests every night, not a single night. The daily rhythm of declaring chesed at dawn and emunah at dusk turns all of life into worship.
4. Three instruments appear: the asor ('ten-stringed instrument'), the nevel ('lute' or 'harp,' a large stringed instrument), and the kinnor ('lyre,' David's instrument). The word higgayon ('murmuring, meditation, soft playing') suggests a quiet, contemplative musical interlude — the lyre provides a meditative background. This verse indicates that Sabbath worship in ancient Israel was richly musical.
5. The verb simachtani ('you have made me glad') attributes the psalmist's joy to God's initiative — God's work produces gladness. The word po'olekha ('your work,' singular) and ma'asei yadekha ('works of your hands,' plural) may distinguish between God's single grand design and its many visible expressions. The verb arannein ('I shout for joy') is a verb of exuberant, audible celebration — not quiet contentment but vocal triumph.
6. The juxtaposition of 'works' (visible) and 'thoughts' (invisible) is deliberate. Humans can see God's works but cannot plumb his thoughts. The psalm celebrates both — the grandeur of what is visible and the mystery of what is not.
7. The ish ba'ar ('brutish person,' literally 'one who is like an animal') and kesil ('fool,' a key term in Proverbs for the morally obtuse) cannot grasp what verse 6 declares. The pronoun zot ('this') refers to the depth of God's thoughts and the moral order they produce. The fool looks at the prosperity of the wicked (next verse) and concludes that there is no justice. The wise person sees the same evidence and trusts the depth they cannot fathom.
8. The grass metaphor for transient human life recurs throughout the Hebrew Bible (Isaiah 40:6-8, Psalm 103:15-16). Here it is applied specifically to the wicked: their success is real but temporary, like vegetation in a Palestinian summer that appears after rain and scorches within weeks.
9. This short, emphatic verse stands at the structural center of the psalm. While the wicked rise and fall, God remains marom le-olam ('exalted forever'). The word marom ('height, exalted place') is related to Elyon ('Most High') in verse 2. The contrast is total: grass-like transience versus eternal elevation. The brevity of the verse — only five Hebrew words — mirrors its content: God's permanence needs no elaboration.
10. The repetition ki hinneh oyvekha YHWH, ki hinneh oyvekha ('for look, your enemies, O LORD, for look, your enemies') is a rhetorical device called staircase parallelism — the line builds by repeating and extending. The same structure appears in Ugaritic poetry (the Baal Cycle), suggesting deep roots in Canaanite literary tradition. The verb yitpardu ('they will be scattered') describes the dissolution of a unified force — the evildoers will be dispersed and broken apart.
11. The re'em ('wild ox,' not 'unicorn' as the KJV renders from the LXX monokeros) was a massive, powerful bovine — likely the now-extinct aurochs. Its horn symbolized strength and victory. The verb vattarem ('you have raised') means God has elevated the psalmist's power and status. The balloti be-shemen ra'anani ('I am drenched with fresh oil') refers to anointing with fine oil — a sign of honor, health, and divine favor. The shift from the destruction of enemies to personal exaltation is characteristic of thanksgiving psalms.
12. The verse is compressed and somewhat cryptic. The verb vattabbet ('it has looked') combined with be-shurai ('on those who watch me / on my foes') suggests the psalmist has witnessed the downfall of adversaries. The parallel — 'my ears have heard' concerning mere'im ('evildoers') — indicates that reports of their destruction have reached the psalmist. The verse is deliberately restrained: it does not describe what the eye saw or the ear heard, leaving the specifics to the reader's imagination.
13. The verb yifrach ('will flourish') is the same verb used for the wicked in verse 8 (bifroach, 'when they sprout'). The identical verb applied to grass and to palm trees produces an ironic contrast: the same 'flourishing' that leads to destruction for the wicked leads to grandeur for the righteous.
14. The word shetulim ('planted') is a passive participle — these trees did not plant themselves. God planted them. The location is be-veit YHWH ('in the house of the LORD') and be-chatsrot Eloheinu ('in the courts of our God'). The image of trees growing in the temple courts was not merely metaphorical — ancient Near Eastern temples often featured sacred gardens. But the deeper meaning is that rootedness in worship is what produces flourishing. The righteous are planted people — grounded, established, located in the place of God's presence.

15. The word be-seivah ('in old age, in gray-headedness') introduces a remarkable promise: the righteous do not decline with age but continue to produce. The verbs yenuvun ('they will bear fruit') and the adjectives desheanim ('full of sap, lush') and ra'ananim ('green, fresh, moist') describe vitality that defies the normal course of aging. This is not a literal promise that the righteous will never grow old, but a declaration that a life rooted in God retains its capacity to produce meaning, wisdom, and goodness to the end.
16. The psalm ends with a creedal declaration: yashar YHWH ('the LORD is upright'). The word yashar ('straight, upright, just') applies to God the same moral standard used for humans — God practices what he requires. The title turi ('my rock') is one of the most enduring divine metaphors — rock as stability, permanence, and unshakable foundation. The final phrase velo avlatah bo ('and there is no injustice in him') uses avlah ('injustice, wrongdoing, crookedness'), the opposite of yashar. The psalm's final word is an assertion of God's total moral integrity — a fitting end for a Sabbath song that trusts God's long-term justice even when short-term evidence seems ambiguous.

Summary: Psalm 93 is the first of the 'YHWH reigns' psalms (93, 95-99) that celebrate God's kingship over creation. In only five compact verses, it declares God's sovereignty, describes the chaotic waters rising against his throne, and affirms his eternal decrees. The psalm has no superscription.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is one of the shortest psalms in the Psalter, yet it packs enormous theological weight into its five verses. The opening declaration YHWH malakh ('the LORD reigns') was likely a liturgical shout — a coronation cry for the divine king. The central image is a battle between God's throne and the chaotic waters (neharot, 'rivers/floods') that pound and crash with enormous force. In ancient Near Eastern mythology, the primordial waters represented chaos, the anti-creation force that God defeated to establish the ordered world. The psalm does not tell the story of that battle — it simply declares its outcome: God's throne is established, the waters are loud but powerless, and his decrees stand forever.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase YHWH malakh can be translated either 'the LORD reigns' (a timeless statement) or 'the LORD has become king' (an event, a coronation). This translation question has generated enormous scholarly debate. Sigmund Mowinckel proposed an annual enthronement festival where God was ritually acclaimed as king; others argue the verb is simply stative ('the LORD is king'). We render it 'the LORD reigns' to capture the timeless sovereignty the psalm describes. The 'floods' (neharot) in verses 3-4 carry mythological resonance from Canaanite literature, where the sea-god Yamm challenged Baal for kingship. Israel's psalmists borrowed the imagery but redirected it: YHWH, not Baal, is the one who tames the waters.*

Connections: *The 'YHWH reigns' declaration connects to Psalms 96:10, 97:1, and 99:1, forming a literary cluster of enthronement psalms. The chaotic waters imagery draws from Genesis 1:2 (tehom, 'the deep'), Psalm 29:3 ('the voice of the LORD is over the waters'), and the exodus narrative where God divided the sea. The final verse's reference to God's edot ('testimonies, decrees') planted in his house connects to the ark of the covenant theology where God's commands reside in the sanctuary.*

¹The LORD reigns! He is robed in majesty.
The LORD is robed — he has girded himself with strength.
The world is established; it cannot be shaken.

²Your throne is established from of old;
you are from everlasting.

³The floods have risen, O LORD,
the floods have raised their voice;
the floods raise their crashing waves.

⁴Above the thunder of great waters, mightier than the breakers of the sea —

the LORD on high is mighty!

5Your decrees stand utterly firm.
Holiness adorns your house,
O LORD, for all the length of days.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The repetition of lavesh ('robed') is intentional — Hebrew uses repetition for emphasis, not redundancy. God's clothing in majesty and girding in strength are not two separate acts but one reality described from two angles: the visible splendor (majesty) and the operative power (strength).
2. The verse makes two temporal claims: God's throne is nakhon me-az ('established from then,' from the beginning of time), and God himself is me-olam ('from everlasting,' beyond all time). The throne has a beginning — 'from of old' — but God does not: he is 'from everlasting.' The distinction is subtle but profound: the throne was established at some point in the unrecoverable past, but the one who sits on it predates even that.
3. The word dokhyam is rare and difficult. It likely derives from d-k-h ('to crush, to pound') and refers to the pounding or crashing of waves. Some scholars connect it to dakhi ('crushing, breaking'). The image is of waves smashing themselves against the divine throne — furious, loud, and ultimately impotent.
4. The verse resolves the tension of verse 3 in a single declaration. The structure moves from the threat (qolot mayim rabbim, 'the thunder of great waters'; addirim mishberei yam, 'mighty breakers of the sea') to the resolution: addir ba-marom YHWH ('mighty on high is the LORD'). The word addir ('mighty, majestic, noble') is applied first to the waves and then to God — the waves are mighty, but God is mightier. The phrase ba-marom ('on high, in the heights') echoes the marom of verse 1 (through ge'ut) and places God above the fray. He does not struggle against the waters; he towers over them.
5. The psalm ends by moving from cosmic power to covenantal order. The edotekha ('your decrees, your testimonies') are God's revealed instructions — the same word used for the tablets of the covenant (edut). They ne'emnu me'od ('are exceedingly firm, trustworthy, established'), from the root a-m-n, the same root as emunah ('faithfulness') and amen. The second line shifts to the temple: le-veitkha na'avah qodesh ('holiness adorns your house'). The word na'avah ('is fitting, adorns, is beautiful') says that holiness is not imposed on God's house but belongs there naturally. The final phrase le-orekh yamim ('for length of days,' forever) extends this reality into perpetuity. God's words are reliable, his house is holy, and both endure.

Summary: Psalm 94 is a communal lament calling on God as the 'God of vengeance' to rise up and judge the arrogant oppressors who crush the vulnerable — widows, orphans, immigrants — while claiming that God does not see. The psalm moves from urgent appeal (vv. 1-7) to wisdom instruction warning the fools to reconsider (vv. 8-11), to a beatitude for the one God disciplines (vv. 12-15), to personal testimony of God's sustaining help (vv. 16-23).

What Makes This Remarkable: *The psalm opens with one of the most startling divine titles in the Psalter: El neqamot YHWH ('God of vengeance, O LORD'). The modern ear flinches at 'vengeance,' but the Hebrew concept of neqamah is closer to 'vindication' — it is the restoration of justice when the powerful have exploited the weak. The oppressors in this psalm are not foreign enemies but domestic tyrants who murder widows, kill orphans, and slaughter immigrants (v. 6) while smugly assuming God is oblivious (v. 7). The psalmist's cry for vengeance is not personal vindictiveness but a demand that the moral order be enforced. The psalm then pivots remarkably to the language of discipline and instruction (vv. 12-13), suggesting that suffering under oppression can itself be a form of divine education — though the oppressors remain culpable.*

Translation Friction: *The word neqamah ('vengeance') requires careful handling. In English, 'vengeance' implies personal spite or retaliatory rage. In Hebrew, neqamah is a legal concept — it is the authority's obligation to punish wrongdoing and restore the wronged. When the psalm calls God El neqamot, it is invoking God's role as the supreme judge who must act when human courts have failed. We retain 'vengeance' because 'vindication' is too soft for the raw emotion of the psalm's opening, but the reader should understand it as judicial action, not emotional rage.*

Connections: The catalogue of victims in verse 6 — widow, immigrant, orphan — echoes the covenant protections of Exodus 22:21-24 and Deuteronomy 10:18, where God specifically promises to defend these three groups. The oppressors' claim that 'the LORD does not see' (v. 7) echoes the arrogance condemned in Psalm 10:11 and Ezekiel 8:12. The beatitude in verse 12 ('blessed is the one you discipline') connects to the wisdom tradition of Proverbs 3:11-12 and anticipates the theology of Hebrews 12:5-11. The LXX assigns this psalm to David for Wednesday (the fourth day), placing it in the weekly liturgical rotation of the Second Temple.

¹O God of vengeance, LORD —
O God of vengeance, shine forth!

²Rise up, O judge of the earth;
repay the arrogant what they deserve.

³How long will the wicked, O LORD — how long will the wicked celebrate?

⁴They pour out arrogant speech;
all the evildoers boast.

⁵They crush your people, O LORD, and oppress your inheritance.

⁶They kill the widow and the immigrant,
and they murder the fatherless.

⁷And they say, "The LORD does not see;
the God of Jacob pays no attention."

⁸Pay attention, you senseless ones among the people!
You fools — when will you understand?

⁹He who planted the ear — does he not hear?
He who formed the eye — does he not see?

¹⁰He who disciplines nations — will he not correct?
He who teaches humanity knowledge —

¹¹The LORD knows the thoughts of humanity — they are a breath.

¹²How blessed is the one you discipline, O LORD, the one you teach from your instruction —

¹³giving him rest from days of trouble, until a pit is dug for the wicked.

¹⁴For the LORD will not abandon his people;
he will not forsake his inheritance.

¹⁵For justice will return to righteousness, and all the upright in heart will follow it.

¹⁶Who will rise up for me against the evildoers?
Who will take a stand for me against the workers of wickedness?

¹⁷If the LORD had not been my help, my soul would soon have dwelt in silence.

¹⁸When I said, "My foot is slipping," your faithful love, O LORD, held me up.

¹⁹When anxious thoughts multiply within me, your consolations delight my soul.

²⁰Can a corrupt throne be allied with you — one that creates oppression under cover of law?

²¹They band together against the life of the righteous and condemn innocent blood.

²²But the LORD has been my fortress, and my God the rock of my refuge.

²³He will turn their own evil back upon them and destroy them for their wickedness.
The LORD our God will destroy them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The title El neqamot ('God of vengeance') uses the plural neqamot, which is likely an intensive plural — not 'vengeances' but 'great vengeance' or 'comprehensive vindication.' God's vengeance is not one act but a thoroughgoing restoration of justice.
2. The title shofet ha-arets ('judge of the earth') invokes God's role as the universal magistrate — not merely Israel's God but the judge of all the earth (as Abraham said in Genesis 18:25). The verb hashev ('repay, return') with gemul ('recompense, what is deserved') asks God to give the arrogant the consequences their actions have earned. The ge'im ('the arrogant, the proud') are those who believe themselves above accountability.
3. The ad matai ('how long?') repeated twice is the classic lament formula — it appears in Psalms 6:3, 13:1-2, 74:10, and 79:5. The verb ya'aloze ('they celebrate, they exult') describes the wicked's jubilant self-confidence. The broken syntax — 'how long will the wicked, O LORD — how long will the wicked celebrate?' — mimics the speaker's emotional state: the sentence can barely contain itself.
4. The verb yabbi'u ('they pour out, they gush') suggests words flowing without restraint — verbal incontinence. The word ataq ('arrogance, hardness, insolence') describes speech that is bold, presumptuous, and heedless. The verb yit'ammru ('they boast, they say great things about themselves') completes the picture: the wicked speak freely, boast openly, and face no consequence. The psalmist sees a world where evil speech goes unchecked.
5. The verbs yedakke'u ('they crush') and ye'annu ('they oppress, they afflict') describe sustained, systematic abuse. The victims are identified as ammekha ('your people') and nachalatekha ('your inheritance') — these are not random victims but people who belong to God. The language implies that attacking God's people is an assault on God's own property. The psalmist is building the case for divine intervention: this is not someone else's problem; it is yours, LORD.
6. We render ger as 'immigrant' rather than 'stranger' because the ger in Israelite law was a non-Israelite living permanently within Israel's borders — a resident alien with legal protections but social vulnerability. 'Stranger' in modern English is too vague; 'immigrant' captures the social reality more accurately.
7. The oppressors' theology is stated explicitly: lo yir'eh Yah ('the LORD does not see') and lo yavin Elohei Ya'aqov ('the God of Jacob does not understand'). This is practical atheism — not denying God's existence but denying his attentiveness. They believe God is too distant, too disinterested, or too powerless to notice their crimes. The psalmist will demolish this claim in the next four verses with devastating logic.
8. The psalm shifts to wisdom instruction. The bo'arim ('senseless ones, brutish ones') and kesilim ('fools') are the same terms used in Psalm 92:7. The verb binu ('understand, pay attention') and taskilu ('will you have insight') are wisdom vocabulary — the psalmist is playing the role of teacher addressing willfully ignorant students. The question matai taskilu ('when will you understand?') implies the answer should be obvious.

9. This is one of the most elegant arguments in the Hebrew Bible. It does not appeal to revelation or authority but to common sense: the maker must possess what the made thing possesses. The form is rhetorical question — the expected answer is an emphatic 'yes.'
10. The argument extends from the senses (v. 9) to governance and instruction. The verb yoser ('disciplines') and yokiach ('corrects, convicts') are terms for judicial and parental authority. The one who holds nations accountable will certainly hold individuals accountable. The final phrase hamelammed adam da'at ('he who teaches humanity knowledge') is left without a predicate in the Hebrew — the sentence breaks off, as if the conclusion is so obvious it need not be stated. Some translations supply 'shall he not know?' but the Hebrew lets the silence speak.
11. The conclusion: God does know — he knows human machshevot ('thoughts, plans, designs') and he judges them as hevel ('vapor, breath, vanity'). The word hevel is the key term of Ecclesiastes ('vanity of vanities'), meaning something insubstantial, transient, and ultimately without weight. The oppressors' plans, which seem so solid and successful, are mere vapor in God's assessment. Paul quotes this verse in 1 Corinthians 3:20.
12. The word torah here means 'instruction' in its broadest sense — not merely the written law but God's ongoing teaching through life experience. The pairing of discipline (yasar) with teaching (lamad) insists that God's corrective action is always educational, never merely punitive.
13. The purpose of discipline is lehashqit ('to give rest, to grant quiet') — the disciplined one receives inner calm during the mi-yemei ra ('days of evil, days of trouble'). This rest is not removal from suffering but composure within it. Meanwhile, the wicked are heading toward a shachat ('pit') being dug for them. The image is of a hunter's pit-trap: the wicked walk confidently forward, unaware that the ground ahead has been excavated.
14. Two verbs of rejection — yittosh ('will cast off, will abandon') and ya'azov ('will forsake') — are both negated. God's commitment to ammo ('his people') and nachalato ('his inheritance') is permanent. The same assurance appears in 1 Samuel 12:22 and Romans 11:1-2. The verse grounds the believer's endurance: the discipline of verses 12-13 is not abandonment but pedagogy.
15. The verse promises that mishpat ('justice, judgment') will return to tsedeq ('righteousness'). Justice has strayed — the wicked have corrupted the courts, perverted the legal system. But it will come back to its proper alignment with righteousness. When it does, kol yishrei lev ('all the upright in heart') will follow — the righteous community will rally to justice restored. The verse envisions a future realignment of the moral order.
16. The psalmist now speaks personally. The questions mi yaqum li ('who will rise for me?') and mi yityatsev li ('who will stand for me?') express the isolation of the righteous person facing organized evil alone. The implied answer is: no human ally appeared — only God (as the next verse reveals).
17. The word dumah ('silence') is a euphemism for death — the silence of the grave, where no praise is offered (Psalm 115:17). The phrase kim'at ('almost, soon, nearly') reveals how close the psalmist came to destruction. The counterfactual construction (lulei, 'if not') attributes survival entirely to God: without divine intervention, death was imminent.
18. The image of the slipping foot (matah ragli) represents moral or existential collapse — losing one's footing in life. At exactly that moment, chasdekha YHWH ('your faithful love, O LORD') intervened. The verb yis'adeni ('it supported me, it held me up') is from sa'ad, which means to sustain, to prop up, to brace. God's chesed is not a feeling but a structural support that prevents collapse.
19. The word sar'appai ('my anxious thoughts, my disquieting thoughts') is a rare word suggesting mental turmoil — thoughts that branch and multiply uncontrollably. The be-rov ('in the multitude, when they are many') intensifies the picture. Against this flood of anxiety, God provides tanchumekha ('your consolations, your comforts'), and these consolations yesh'a'ash'u nafshi ('delight my soul'). The verb sha'asha ('to delight, to fondle, to caress') is a term of deep pleasure. The psalm honestly describes anxiety and honestly describes its remedy: divine comfort that produces actual delight, not mere endurance.
20. The kisse havvot ('throne of destruction/corruption') refers to a seat of power that legislates injustice. The phrase yotser amal alei choq ('fashioning oppression by decree') is one of the most politically charged statements in the Psalter: it describes rulers who use legal systems to institutionalize suffering. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'No' — God cannot be allied with rulers who weaponize law against the vulnerable. This verse condemns systemic, legalized injustice as incompatible with God's character.
21. The verb yagoddu ('they band together, they attack in a mob') describes coordinated group violence against the nefesh tsaddiq ('the life/soul of the righteous'). The phrase dam naqi yarshi'u ('they condemn innocent blood') refers to judicial murder — using the legal system to execute the guiltless. The combination of mob action and legal machinery creates a picture of total injustice: both the streets and the courts have been captured by the wicked.
22. Against the assembled forces of institutional wickedness, the psalmist has one resource: YHWH li le-misgav ('the LORD is my fortress'). The misgav ('high fortress, stronghold') is an elevated defensive position — a cliff fortress beyond the reach of attackers. The tsur machasi ('rock of my refuge') combines the imagery of immovable stone with sheltering safety. The two metaphors — fortress and rock — together convey both elevation (beyond reach) and solidity (beyond destruction).
23. The final verse returns to the vengeance theme of verse 1. The verb vayyashev ('he will turn back, he will repay') describes God redirecting the oppressors' onam ('their wickedness') back onto them — their own weapons become their undoing. The verb yatsमित ('he will annihilate them') is repeated twice for emphasis — total, complete destruction. The psalm ends with the full covenantal name: YHWH Eloheinu ('the LORD our God'), claiming God as the community's own. The God who seemed absent (v. 7) has the last word.

Summary: Psalm 95 divides sharply into two halves. The first (vv. 1-7a) is an exuberant call to worship the LORD as creator and shepherd, summoning the congregation to sing, shout, kneel, and bow. The second (vv. 7b-11) shifts without warning to a divine oracle of warning: 'Today, if you hear his voice, do not harden your hearts as at Meribah, as on the day of Massah in the wilderness.' The psalm has no superscription in the Hebrew text, though the LXX attributes it to David.

What Makes This Remarkable: The whiplash between the two halves of this psalm is its most important feature. The congregation is singing, rejoicing, bowing before their maker — and then God interrupts with a warning. The liturgy of praise becomes a test of obedience. The word hayyom ('today') is the hinge: worship is not a nostalgic celebration of past salvation but a present-tense encounter with a God who is still speaking and still expecting a response. The letter to the Hebrews (3:7-4:13) will build an entire theology of 'rest' and 'today' from this psalm, arguing that the warning remains active for every generation. The God who is praised as creator (vv. 4-5) and shepherd (v. 7) is also the God who swore in anger that a disobedient generation would never enter his rest (v. 11). Worship that does not include listening is insufficient.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew of verse 7b-c is notoriously difficult to divide. The phrase hu Eloheinu va'anachnu am mar'ito ve-tson yado ('he is our God and we are the people of his pasture and the flock of his hand') ends one section, and hayyom im be-qolo tishma'u ('today, if you hear his voice') begins the next. But where exactly does the break fall? The Masoretic accents place the major break after yado ('his hand'), making 'today if you hear his voice' the start of the warning oracle. This means the pastoral image of God as shepherd leads directly into the demand for obedience — the same God who tends the flock expects the flock to listen. The place names Meribah ('quarreling') and Massah ('testing') refer to Exodus 17:1-7 and Numbers 20:1-13, where Israel provocation in the wilderness led to Moses striking the rock.

Connections: The call to worship in verses 1-2 parallels Psalm 100. The creation theology of verses 4-5 (God's hands formed the dry land, the depths of the earth are in his hand) echoes Psalm 24:1-2 and Job 38. The wilderness warning connects to the rebellion narratives of Exodus 17, Numbers 14, and Deuteronomy 1:19-46. The divine oath 'they shall not enter my rest' (v. 11) becomes the foundation of Hebrews 3-4, where 'rest' (menucha/katapausis) is reinterpreted as the eschatological Sabbath rest that remains available to the faithful.

¹Come, let us sing out to the LORD;
let us shout to the rock of our salvation!

²Let us come before his face with thanksgiving;
with songs let us shout to him!

³the LORD is a great God,
a great king above all gods.

⁴In his hand are the depths of the earth, and the mountain peaks belong to him.

⁵The sea is his — he made it,
and the dry land — his hands formed it.

⁶Come, let us bow down in worship;
let us kneel before the LORD our maker!

⁷For he is our God,
and we are the people of his pasture,

the flock under his hand.

Today — if you hear his voice —

⁸do not harden your hearts as at Meribah, as on the day of Massah in the wilderness,

⁹when your ancestors tested me, tried me, though they had seen my work.

¹⁰For forty years I was disgusted with that generation, and I said, "They are a people whose hearts go astray;
they have not known my ways."

¹¹So I swore in my anger,
"They shall never enter my rest."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verbs nerannenh ('let us sing out, let us cry aloud') and nari'ah ('let us shout, let us raise a war cry') are not verbs of quiet devotion. rannan is a verb of piercing, joyful noise; rua is the shout of a crowd — a battle cry or an acclamation at a coronation. The worship envisioned here is loud, communal, and physical. The title tsur yish'enu ('rock of our salvation') combines the fortress imagery of Psalm 94:22 with salvation vocabulary.
2. The verb neqaddemah ('let us come before, let us meet') with panav ('his face') suggests approaching God's presence with eagerness — literally, going out to meet God before he arrives. The word todah ('thanksgiving') is both a disposition and a genre — it refers to the thanksgiving offering and the psalm that accompanies it. The worship described is prepared, intentional, and musical.
3. The phrase melekh gadol al kol elohim ('a great king above all gods') does not affirm the existence of other deities but asserts God's supremacy over any rival claim to divinity. The language is competitive — in a world of many claimed gods, YHWH is not one among equals but the sovereign over all. This is the theological foundation for the worship commanded in verses 1-2: the LORD deserves the loudest praise because he occupies the highest throne.
4. The spatial range is total: mechqerei arets ('the depths of the earth,' the lowest points, the caverns and recesses beneath the surface) and to'afot harim ('the peaks of the mountains,' the highest elevations). From deepest below to highest above, everything is be-yado ('in his hand') — under his control and in his possession. The word mechqerei (from chaqar, 'to search out, to explore') implies depths that humans cannot fully investigate but that God holds in his palm.
5. Two domains: hayyam ('the sea') and yabbeshset ('the dry land'). God's relationship to each is stated differently: the sea asher lo... ve-hu asahu ('is his... and he made it') and the dry land yadav yatsaru ('his hands formed it'). The verb yatsaru ('formed, fashioned') is the potter's verb, suggesting intimate craftsmanship. The sea and dry land together encompass the entire surface of the earth — nothing exists that God did not make and does not own.
6. The verb nishtachaveh (hishtachawah) is the standard Hebrew term for worship-prostration. It involves lying face-down on the ground — not a casual nod or bowed head but full-body submission. Ancient Israelite worship was physically demanding and posturally humble.
7. The Masoretic cantillation marks place the major pause (atnach) after yado ('his hand'), making 'today if you hear his voice' the beginning of a new section. This division is followed by the book of Hebrews (3:7-8), which quotes the verse beginning with 'Today.' The pastoral warmth of the first half makes the warning of the second half all the more jolting.
8. We retain the Hebrew place names Meribah and Massah rather than translating them as 'Quarreling' and 'Testing' because they function as historical references — the worshipers would have known the stories. However, the etymological meanings are essential: every time these names are spoken, the words 'quarrel' and 'test' echo beneath them.
9. Two verbs for testing: nissuni ('they tested me') and bechanuni ('they tried me, they examined me'). The testing was not innocent inquiry but hostile challenge — putting God on trial, demanding proof of his presence and power. The devastating qualifier: gam ra'u fo'oli ('though they had also seen my work'). They had witnessed the plagues, the parting of the sea, the manna, the water from the rock — and still demanded more evidence. Their hardness was not caused by insufficient revelation but by refusal to trust what they had already received.
10. The verb aqut ('I was disgusted, I loathed, I was weary of') is a strong verb of revulsion — not mild disappointment but visceral repugnance. For arba'im shanah ('forty years') — an entire generation — God endured a people who were to'ei levav ('wandering in heart,' hearts that strayed from the path). The divine verdict is devastating: lo yad'u derakhay ('they have not known my ways'). After forty years of miracles, provision, and instruction, they still did not know God's character or intentions. The verb yada ('to know') here implies relational intimacy — they had information about God but no knowledge of him.

11. The Hebrew oath formula im + imperfect is a strong negative when spoken by God: 'if they enter my rest...' with the apodosis (consequence) left unstated because it is too terrible to speak. This is equivalent to: 'they will absolutely never enter my rest.' The menuchah ('rest') in its original context refers to the land of Canaan (Deuteronomy 12:9), but the concept was reinterpreted eschatologically in both Jewish and Christian tradition as God's eternal Sabbath rest.

Summary: Psalm 96 is a hymn of universal praise calling all the earth — not merely Israel — to sing a 'new song' to the LORD. It declares God's glory among the nations, dismisses the gods of the peoples as worthless, and summons the entire created order — heavens, earth, sea, fields, and forests — to rejoice because the LORD is coming to judge the earth with righteousness and faithfulness. The psalm has no superscription in the Hebrew text but appears in a parallel version in 1 Chronicles 16:23-33.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm explodes Israel's worship beyond its ethnic boundaries. The command is not 'Sing to the LORD, O Israel' but shiru la-YHWH kol ha-arets ('Sing to the LORD, all the earth'). The Hebrew word arets means both 'earth' and 'land,' and here it means the whole planet. The nations (goyim) and peoples (ammim) are summoned to praise, creation itself is summoned to celebrate, and the reason given is not God's past salvation of Israel but his coming judgment of the entire world. The judgment is presented as good news — the earth rejoices at God's coming because his rule means tsedeq ve-emunah ('righteousness and faithfulness'). This is not judgment as punishment but judgment as the establishment of a just order that all creation has been waiting for.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 5 contains a wordplay that defies translation: kol elohei ha-ammim elim ('all the gods of the peoples are elim'). The word elim sounds like elohim ('gods') but means 'worthless things, nothings, nonentities.' Some scholars connect it to al ('not') — making the gods 'not-gods,' anti-gods, nothings masquerading as somethings. The dismissal is not that other gods are weak but that they are empty — there is nothing there. The parallel in 1 Chronicles 16:23-33 contains some significant textual differences, suggesting that one text was adapted from the other or both drew from a common liturgical source.*

Connections: *The 'new song' (shir chadash) motif connects to Psalms 33:3, 40:3, 98:1, 144:9, 149:1, and Isaiah 42:10. The phrase YHWH malakh ('the LORD reigns') in verse 10 links this psalm to the enthronement cluster (Psalms 93, 97, 99). The cosmic response to God's coming (trees singing, sea roaring, fields exulting) is paralleled in Isaiah 55:12 and Psalm 98:7-8. The 1 Chronicles 16 parallel places this psalm in the context of David bringing the ark to Jerusalem — the moment when Israel's worship finds its permanent home.*

¹Sing to the LORD a new song!
Sing to the LORD, all the earth!

²Sing to the LORD, bless his name!
Proclaim his salvation day after day!

³Declare his glory among the nations, his wonders among all peoples!

⁴he is to be feared above all gods.
For the LORD is great and greatly to be praised;

⁵For all the gods of the peoples are worthless things, but the LORD made the heavens.

⁶Splendor and majesty stand before him;
strength and glory fill his sanctuary.

⁷Ascribe to the LORD, O families of the peoples!
Ascribe to the LORD glory and strength!

⁸Ascribe to the LORD the glory due his name!
Bring an offering and come into his courts!

⁹Worship the LORD in holy splendor!
Tremble before him, all the earth!

¹⁰Say among the nations, "The LORD reigns!"
The world is established; it cannot be shaken.
He will judge the peoples with equity.

¹¹Let the heavens rejoice and the earth be glad;
let the sea roar, and all that fills it!

¹²Let the field exult, and everything in it!
Then all the trees of the forest will sing for joy

¹³before the LORD, for he is coming — for he is coming to judge the earth.
He will judge the world with righteousness and the peoples with his faithfulness.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The shir chadash ('new song') is not merely a recently composed melody — it is a song that responds to a new act of God. The 'newness' corresponds to the freshness of divine action. The command shiru ('sing!') is an imperative addressed to kol ha-arets ('all the earth'), which universalizes the call beyond any single nation or community.
2. The verb bassru ('proclaim, announce good news') is the verbal form of besorah ('good news, gospel'). This is evangelistic language — the worshipers are commanded to announce God's yeshu'ato ('his salvation') to the world. The phrase mi-yom le-yom ('from day to day') means the proclamation is not occasional but daily, continuous, never pausing.
3. The verb sappru ('declare, recount, tell') with ba-goyim ('among the nations') and be-khol ha-ammim ('among all the peoples') makes Israel's worship a mission to the world. God's kevodo ('his glory') and nifl'otav ('his wonders') are not private possessions of the covenant community but realities to be broadcast universally.
4. The phrase mehullal me'od ('greatly to be praised') uses the passive participle of halal ('to praise') — God is inherently praiseworthy, whether or not anyone is currently praising him. The nora ('fearsome, to be feared') indicates that the proper response to God's greatness includes not just admiration but awe. The phrase al kol elohim ('above all gods') continues the competitive theology: whatever else claims divine status, YHWH towers above it.
5. The word elim is sometimes rendered 'idols,' but that refers to the physical objects of worship. elim refers to what those objects represent: nothing. We render it 'worthless things' to capture the sense of emptiness rather than merely the physical artifact.
6. Four attributes attend God's presence: hod ('splendor, radiance'), hadar ('majesty, honor'), oz ('strength, might'), and tif'eret ('glory, beauty'). The first pair stands lefanav ('before him') — in his presence, approaching his throne. The second pair is be-miqdosho ('in his sanctuary') — filling his temple. The verse personifies these qualities as attendants in a royal court, standing before the king and filling his chambers.
7. The imperative havu ('give, ascribe') addressed to mishpechot amim ('families of the peoples') extends the call beyond Israel to every clan and nation on earth. The language echoes Psalm 29:1-2, where the same imperative is addressed to bene elim ('sons of gods,' the divine council). What the heavenly beings do in Psalm 29, all human families are summoned to do here: attribute kavod ('glory') and oz ('strength') to the LORD.
8. The kevod shemo ('the glory of his name') means the honor that his reputation deserves. The command se'u minchah ('bring a grain offering') and u-vo'u le-chatsrotav ('and come into his courts') invites the nations into Israel's temple worship. The minchah is a grain or tribute offering — the approach of a subject before a sovereign. The universalism of the psalm reaches its peak: the nations are not merely told to acknowledge God from a distance but to enter his courts with offerings.

9. The phrase be-hadrat qodesh ('in the splendor of holiness') may refer to holy garments (the priests' vestments) or to the splendor that holiness itself radiates. The verb chilu ('tremble, writhe, be in anguish') is a verb of physical shaking — not merely emotional reverence but bodily tremor in the presence of the holy. The command is addressed to kol ha-arets ('all the earth') — every nation, every person, every creature.
10. The instruction to declare YHWH malakh ba-goyim ('among the nations') is remarkable — it envisions Israel as a herald to the world, not a sect withdrawn from it. The message is political as well as theological: the LORD reigns means no human empire has ultimate authority.
11. The cosmic response begins. The shamayim ('heavens') and eret ('earth') form the standard merism for 'everything' (as in Genesis 1:1). The hayyam u-melo'o ('the sea and everything filling it') adds the aquatic realm. Three domains — sky, land, sea — respond with simchah ('joy'), gilah ('gladness'), and ra'am ('thunder, roaring'). Creation itself celebrates God's coming reign. This is not pathetic fallacy but theological conviction: the non-human creation has a stake in God's justice.
12. The sadai ('the field,' open agricultural land) and kol asher bo ('everything in it') bring the cultivated world into the celebration. Then kol atsei ya'ar ('all the trees of the forest') — the wild, uncultivated trees — yerannu ('will sing for joy'). The verb rannan is the same piercing, exuberant cry of verse 1. Trees singing is not merely poetic embellishment — it expresses the conviction that the non-human creation participates in the cosmic drama. Romans 8:19-22 will articulate this same idea: creation groans, waiting for liberation.
13. The entire psalm builds toward this verse. Every imperative — sing, proclaim, declare, ascribe, worship, tremble — has been leading to this moment: God is coming. The judgment of the earth is presented not as threat but as consummation — the event all creation has been waiting for.

Summary: Psalm 97 is an enthronement psalm celebrating the LORD's reign over the earth with theophanic imagery — fire, lightning, melting mountains — and contrasting the shame of idol worshipers with the joy of Zion. The psalm moves from the cosmic display of God's power (vv. 1-6) to the humiliation of those who worship images (vv. 7-9) to a closing exhortation to the righteous to hate evil, trust God's protection, and rejoice (vv. 10-12). It has no superscription in the Hebrew text.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm reads like a volcanic eruption of divine presence. The theophany of verses 2-5 borrows heavily from the Sinai tradition — cloud, darkness, fire, lightning, trembling earth — and applies it to God's ongoing reign rather than a single historical event. The mountains melt like wax before the LORD, which is not hyperbole in the ancient Near Eastern mind but a description of what happens when the maker of mountains appears. The psalm then pivots to one of its most cutting lines: 'All who serve carved images are put to shame, those who boast in worthless things. All gods bow down before him' (v. 7). The shame of idolatry is not punishment but revelation — when the true God appears, the emptiness of every substitute becomes visible. The LXX version of verse 7 ('worship him, all you gods') is quoted in Hebrews 1:6 as a reference to angels worshipping the Son.

Translation Friction: *Verse 7 presents a translation challenge: hishtachavu lo kol elohim ('bow down before him, all gods'). Who are the elohim commanded to worship? The options include: other gods (acknowledged as real but subordinate), angelic beings (members of the divine council), or human rulers (elohim used for judges, as in Psalm 82:1,6). The LXX rendered it angeloi ('angels'), which is how Hebrews 1:6 receives it. The psalm itself does not clarify — it simply commands every being claiming divine status to submit. Verse 10 contains a textual issue: the Masoretic text reads 'he guards the souls of his faithful ones' (nefesh chasidav), but some manuscripts and the LXX tradition read differently. We follow the MT.*

Connections: The YHWH malakh opening connects to Psalms 93:1, 96:10, and 99:1. The theophanic fire and cloud connect to Exodus 19:16-18 (Sinai), Psalm 18:7-15 (David's theophany), and Habakkuk 3:3-6 (the warrior-God). The 'mountains melt like wax' image appears in Micah 1:4 and Nahum 1:5. The command to the righteous to 'hate evil' (v. 10) echoes Amos 5:15 and Proverbs 8:13. The closing call to 'rejoice in the LORD' (v. 12) anticipates the persistent joy-theology of the enthronement psalms.

‡The LORD reigns! Let the earth rejoice;
let the many coastlands be glad!

²Cloud and thick darkness surround him;
righteousness and justice are the foundation of his throne.

³Fire goes before him and consumes his adversaries on every side.

⁴His lightning bolts light up the world;
the earth sees and writhes.

⁵Mountains melt like wax before the LORD,
before the Lord of all the earth.

⁶and all the peoples see his glory.
The heavens declare his righteousness,

⁷All who serve carved images are put to shame,
those who boast in worthless things.
Bow down before him, all you gods!

⁸Zion hears and is glad;
the daughters of Judah rejoice
because of your judgments, O LORD.

⁹For you, O LORD, are Most High over all the earth;
you are exalted far above all gods.

¹⁰You who love the LORD, hate evil!
He guards the lives of his faithful ones;
from the hand of the wicked he rescues them.

¹¹Light is sown for the righteous, and joy for the upright in heart.

¹²Rejoice in the LORD, you righteous!
Give thanks to his holy name!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The enthronement cry YHWH malakh opens the psalm as in Psalms 93 and 99. The response is cosmic joy: tagel ha-arets ('let the earth exult') and yismchu iyyim rabbim ('let the many coastlands rejoice'). The iyyim ('coastlands, islands') represent the most distant, peripheral territories of the known world — the Mediterranean coasts and islands at the edge of Israel's geographical awareness. Even the remotest places are summoned to celebrate.
2. The pairing of tsedek ('righteousness') and mishpat ('justice') as the foundation of God's throne also appears in Psalm 89:14. These are not abstract qualities but structural necessities — remove righteousness and justice, and the throne collapses. God's sovereignty is not arbitrary power but power exercised through moral order.
3. The esh lefanav telekh ('fire goes before him') describes fire as God's herald or advance guard — it precedes his arrival and clears the way. The verb telaheh ('it consumes, it blazes') describes intense burning. The tsarav ('his adversaries') are consumed not as a separate punitive act but as an inherent consequence of proximity to God's holiness. Fire in theophany is not wrath but nature — God is fire, and what opposes him cannot survive contact.
4. The beraqav ('his lightning bolts') illuminate the tevel ('the world') — the darkness of verse 2 is pierced by blinding flashes. The earth's response is visceral: ra'atah vattachel ('it saw and it writhed'). The verb chul ('to writhe, to tremble, to be in labor pain') describes not mild trembling but the convulsion of a body in agony. The earth personified as a witness who sees God's lightning and writhes in response.

5. The image of mountains — the most permanent, immovable features of the landscape — melting ka-donag ('like wax') before God is the psalm's most extreme statement of divine power. Wax before fire has no resistance; it simply ceases to be solid. The title Adon kol ha-arets ('Lord of all the earth') appears in Joshua 3:11 for the God who parts the Jordan. The point is scale: what seems most permanent in human experience (mountains) is the most fragile before God.
6. The shamayim ('heavens') serve as witnesses, declaring tsidqo ('his righteousness'). The theophany is not private — kol ha-ammim ('all the peoples') see kevodo ('his glory'). The verse insists that God's self-revelation is public, universal, and undeniable. When God acts in judgment and salvation, the evidence is visible to every nation.
7. The LXX renders kol elohim as pantes hoi angeloi autou ('all his angels'), which is the form quoted in Hebrews 1:6 as proof that the Son is greater than the angels. The Hebrew elohim is broader — it includes any being with a claim to divine status.
8. While the idolaters are shamed, Zion responds with joy. The sham'ah vattismach Tsiyyon ('Zion heard and rejoiced') contrasts with the earth's writhing in verse 4 — for God's own people, the same theophany produces gladness. The benot Yehudah ('daughters of Judah') likely refers to the towns and villages of Judah personified as daughters of the mother city Zion. The cause of joy is le-ma'an mishpatekha ('because of your judgments') — God's acts of justice bring relief and celebration to his people.
9. The verse restates the psalm's central claim: YHWH Elyon al kol ha-arets ('the LORD is Most High over all the earth') and me'od na'aleita al kol elohim ('you are greatly exalted above all gods'). The adverb me'od ('exceedingly, greatly') intensifies the exaltation — the distance between God and all rivals is not marginal but infinite. This verse functions as the theological summary of everything stated in verses 1-8.
10. The imperative sin'u ra ('hate evil!') is addressed to ohavei YHWH ('lovers of the LORD'). Love for God and hatred of evil are presented as inseparable — you cannot have one without the other. The promise follows: shomer nafshot chasidav ('he guards the lives of his faithful ones'). The chasidav ('his faithful ones, his devoted ones') from chesed describes those characterized by loyal love. The verb yatsilem ('he rescues them') from the hand of the wicked promises active divine intervention on their behalf.
11. The image of light being zaru'a ('sown') like seed is extraordinary. Light is not simply given but planted — scattered into the soil of the present to grow into a harvest in the future. The righteous (tsaddiq) and the upright in heart (yishrei lev) do not yet see the full light, but it has been sown for them. This is a verse about the hiddenness of hope: the outcome is planted but not yet visible. Simchah ('joy') is the parallel crop — sown alongside the light, growing toward a day of harvest.
12. The closing command simchu tsaddiqim ba-YHWH ('rejoice in the LORD, you righteous') brings the psalm full circle — verse 1 called the earth to rejoice; verse 12 calls the righteous specifically. The phrase hodu le-zekher qodsho ('give thanks to the memorial of his holiness') uses zekher ('memorial, remembrance') to refer to God's name — the name is the means by which God is remembered and invoked. His holiness (qodsho) is what makes the name powerful and the remembrance life-giving.

Summary: Psalm 98 is a 'new song' psalm celebrating God's saving acts, which he has made visible to all nations. It summons the whole earth to shout, sing, and play instruments before the LORD, then calls the natural world — sea, rivers, mountains — to join the praise because God is coming to judge the earth. The superscription simply reads mizmor ('a psalm').

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 98 is the twin of Psalm 96 — they share vocabulary, structure, and theology — yet each has its own emphasis. Where Psalm 96 focuses on declaring God's glory among the nations, Psalm 98 focuses on what God has revealed: his yeshu'ah ('salvation'), his tsedaqah ('righteousness'), his chesed ('faithful love'), and his emunah ('faithfulness') toward Israel — all of which the nations have witnessed. The remarkable claim is that God's faithfulness to Israel is itself evidence intended for the watching world. Israel's particular salvation has universal significance. The closing verses (7-9) are nearly identical to Psalm 96:11-13, creating a liturgical echo: the creation's joyful response to God's coming judgment is a recurring chorus in Israel's worship, not a one-time poetic flourish.

Translation Friction: The phrase hodia ('he has made known') in verse 2 raises a question: made known to whom? The answer is le-einei ha-goyim ('before the eyes of the nations'). God's acts of salvation for Israel were performed on a public stage — the exodus, the return from exile, every act of deliverance — and the audience was always wider than Israel. This means Israel's history is not private but pedagogical: God teaches the world through what he does for his people. The 'new song' of verse 1 may refer to a specific deliverance (perhaps the return from Babylonian exile) or may be eschatological — a song for the final salvation.

Connections: The 'new song' command connects to Psalms 33:3, 40:3, 96:1, 144:9, 149:1, and Isaiah 42:10. The four divine attributes in verses 2-3 (salvation, righteousness, faithful love, faithfulness) form a cluster that appears in Psalm 36:5-6, 89:1-2, and Isaiah 59:16-17. The cosmic praise of verses 7-9 parallels Psalm 96:11-13 and Isaiah 55:12. The 'right hand and holy arm' of verse 1 echoes Isaiah 52:10 and Exodus 15:6. Isaac Watts famously paraphrased this psalm as 'Joy to the World,' making it one of the most widely known psalms in Western culture.

¹A psalm.

Sing to the LORD a new song,
for he has done wonders!
His right hand and his holy arm have won him victory.

²The LORD has made his salvation known;
before the eyes of the nations
he has revealed his righteousness.

³He has remembered his faithful love and his faithfulness to the house of Israel.
All the ends of the earth have seen the salvation of our God.

⁴Shout to the LORD, all the earth!
Burst into song, sing for joy, make music!

⁵Make music to the LORD with the lyre — with the lyre and the sound of melody!

⁶With trumpets and the sound of the ram's horn, shout before the king — the LORD!

⁷Let the sea roar, and all that fills it — the world and all who dwell in it!

⁸Let the rivers clap their hands;
let the mountains sing for joy together

⁹before the LORD, for he is coming to judge the earth.
He will judge the world with righteousness and the peoples with equity.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase hoshi'ah lo ('has saved for himself') is unusual — God's salvation benefits Israel, but the victory belongs to God. Isaiah 59:16 uses the same image: 'His own arm brought him salvation.' The right hand and holy arm together echo Exodus 15:6 ('Your right hand, O LORD, glorious in power') and Isaiah 52:10 ('The LORD has bared his holy arm before the eyes of all the nations').
2. Two verbs of disclosure: hodia ('he has made known') and gillah ('he has revealed, uncovered'). Both suggest something previously hidden now brought to light. God's yeshu'ato ('his salvation') and tsidqato ('his righteousness') were always real but are now publicly visible. The audience is le-einei ha-goyim ('before the eyes of the nations') — God's saving acts for Israel are performed on a world stage. The nations are not incidental bystanders but intended witnesses.

3. This verse is one of the most concise statements of the relationship between Israel's particular election and God's universal purpose. God remembers his love for Israel, acts to save Israel, and the whole world sees it. Israel's story is not private but revelatory — through it, the nations learn who God is.
4. Four imperatives pile up: hari'u ('shout,' the acclamation cry), pitschu ('burst out,' the spontaneous eruption of song), ranenu ('sing for joy,' the piercing cry of exultation), and zammeru ('make music,' the instrumental accompaniment). The escalation builds from a single shout to a full orchestral celebration. The addressee is again kol ha-arets ('all the earth') — this is worship on a planetary scale.
5. The kinnor ('lyre') is mentioned twice for emphasis — it was the primary instrument of temple worship, the instrument David played. The qol zimrah ('sound of melody, voice of song') may refer to the human voice singing alongside the instrument, creating a blend of vocal and instrumental worship.
6. The chatsotsrot ('trumpets,' metal instruments blown by priests) and shofar ('ram's horn') together create the full fanfare of Israelite worship. The shofar was blown at coronations, at the new year, and at moments of divine visitation. The title ha-melekh YHWH ('the king, the LORD') makes explicit what the enthronement psalms have been declaring: this is royal worship for a reigning sovereign.
7. The cosmic praise section begins, closely paralleling Psalm 96:11-12. The sea (hayyam) is summoned first — the same waters that in Psalm 93 crashed against God's throne now roar in celebration. The tevel ve-yoshvei vah ('the world and those who dwell in it') brings humanity into the cosmic choir alongside the natural world.
8. The neharot ('rivers') clapping and the harim ('mountains') singing are among the most vivid personifications in the Psalter. The verb yimcha'u kaf ('they clap their hands') pictures the rhythmic slapping of waves against riverbanks as applause. The mountains singing yachad ('together, in unison') suggests harmony — the entire landscape joining in a chorus. This is not mere poetic decoration but theological conviction: the non-human creation has a voice and a stake in God's reign.
9. The closing verse nearly matches Psalm 96:13, with one notable difference: Psalm 96:13 says God will judge with tsedek and emunah ('righteousness and faithfulness'), while Psalm 98:9 says tsedek and misharim ('righteousness and equity'). Both affirm that God's judgment is characterized by moral integrity and fairness. The substitution of misharim ('equity, evenness') for emunah ('faithfulness') emphasizes the impartiality of God's judgment — he will judge on a level playing field, with no favoritism for the powerful.

Summary: Psalm 99 is the last of the 'YHWH reigns' enthronement psalms (93, 95-99). It declares God's kingship from Zion, celebrates his love of justice, and recounts his dealings with Moses, Aaron, and Samuel as evidence that he is both accessible and holy. The psalm is structured around a triple refrain emphasizing God's holiness (vv. 3, 5, 9) and has no superscription.

What Makes This Remarkable: The triple repetition of holiness — 'Holy is he' (qadosh hu, vv. 3, 5) and 'the LORD our God is holy' (qadosh YHWH Eloheinu, v. 9) — gives this psalm a quasi-Isaianic quality, echoing the seraphim's 'Holy, holy, holy' in Isaiah 6:3. Holiness in this psalm is not abstract purity but relational: the holy God answered when Moses, Aaron, and Samuel called; he spoke to them from the pillar of cloud; he forgave them while also holding them accountable for their actions (v. 8). The combination of forgiveness and accountability — El nose lahem ve-noqem al alilotam ('a God who forgave them yet avenged their deeds') — is one of the most theologically precise statements in the Psalter. God's holiness does not erase either his mercy or his justice; it holds both simultaneously.

Translation Friction: Verse 8 is the most complex verse in the psalm. The phrase El nose lahem can mean 'a God who forgave them' or 'a God who bore [their burden] for them.' The ve-noqem al alilotam ('and avenging/punishing their deeds') seems to contradict forgiveness — how can God both forgive and punish? The answer lies in the Hebrew understanding of holiness: God's forgiveness does not mean the absence of consequences. Moses was forgiven but denied entry to the promised land (Numbers 20:12). Aaron was forgiven but his sons Nadab and Abihu died (Leviticus 10:1-2). Samuel was forgiven but watched Israel demand a king (1 Samuel 8). Forgiveness restores relationship; consequences remain as markers of holiness.

Connections: The YHWH malakh opening connects to Psalms 93:1, 96:10, and 97:1, completing the enthronement cluster. The cherubim throne imagery (yoshev keruvim, v. 1) connects to 1 Samuel 4:4, 2 Samuel 6:2, and Isaiah 37:16. The triad of Moses, Aaron, and Samuel as intercessors echoes Jeremiah 15:1, where God says even Moses and Samuel could not intercede for this generation. The pillar of cloud (v. 7) connects to Exodus 33:9-11 and Numbers 12:5. The triple holiness anticipates the trisagion of Isaiah 6:3 and Revelation 4:8.

¹The LORD reigns — let the peoples tremble!
He sits enthroned on the cherubim — let the earth quake!

²The LORD is great in Zion;
he is exalted above all the peoples.

³Let them praise your great and fearsome name — holy is he!

⁴The strength of the king loves justice.
You have established equity;
justice and righteousness in Jacob — you have accomplished them.

⁵Exalt the LORD our God!
Bow down at his footstool —
holy is he!

⁶Moses and Aaron were among his priests, and Samuel was among those who called on his name.
They called on the LORD, and he answered them.

⁷In the pillar of cloud he spoke to them.
They kept his decrees and the statutes he gave them.

⁸O LORD our God, you answered them.
You were a forgiving God to them,
yet one who held them accountable for their deeds.

⁹Exalt the LORD our God and bow down at his holy mountain, for the LORD our God is holy!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The cherubim (keruvim) are not the chubby winged infants of Renaissance art but the massive, fearsome composite creatures of ancient Near Eastern iconography — part human, part animal, part divine. In Ezekiel 1 and 10, they are the living beings who bear God's throne-chariot. In the tabernacle and temple, their images topped the ark, and God was said to dwell 'between the cherubim' (1 Samuel 4:4, 2 Samuel 6:2).
2. God's greatness has a location: be-Tsiyyon ('in Zion'). This does not limit God to one place but identifies where his presence is concentrated — the temple mount, the city of David, the place where God chose to make his name dwell (Deuteronomy 12:5). Yet he is simultaneously ram hu al kol ha-ammim ('high above all the peoples') — Zion is the base, but his sovereignty is universal.
3. The first refrain: qadosh hu ('holy is he!'). God's name is gadol ('great') and nora ('fearsome, awe-inspiring'), and the summary verdict is holiness. The word qadosh ('holy') means 'set apart, other, distinct from all that is common.' God's holiness is not one attribute among many — it is the quality that makes all his other attributes divine rather than merely admirable. Holiness is what makes God's love different from human love, God's justice different from human justice.
4. The phrase oz melekh mishpat ahev ('the strength of the king loves justice') is compressed and unusual. The 'king' is God — his royal power (oz) is characterized not by conquest but by love of mishpat ('justice'). God does not merely practice justice reluctantly; he loves it. The verb konanta ('you have established') with meisharim ('equity') declares that fairness is not accidental in God's kingdom but built into the structure. The final declaration — mishpat u-tsedaqah be-Ya'aqov attah asita ('justice and righteousness in Jacob, you have accomplished') — locates God's justice in a specific community. Jacob (Israel) is the place where God has demonstrated what justice and righteousness look like in practice.

5. The second refrain: qadosh hu. The verb romemu ('exalt!') calls for active elevation of God's reputation. The hadom raglav ('his footstool') is the ark of the covenant (1 Chronicles 28:2) or the earth itself (Isaiah 66:1). Worshiping at the footstool means approaching the lowest point of God's throne — even the place where God rests his feet is too holy for casual approach. The posture is hishtachavu ('prostrate yourselves') — the deepest form of physical submission.
6. The inclusion of Moses 'among his priests' is theologically significant. Moses served as priest before the Aaronic priesthood was established (Exodus 24:6-8, 32:11-14). The triad of Moses (lawgiver), Aaron (priest), and Samuel (prophet/judge) represents the full range of Israel's mediatorial offices.
7. The ammud anan ('pillar of cloud') was the visible sign of God's presence during the exodus and wilderness period (Exodus 13:21-22, 33:9-11). God's speech came from within the cloud — he was present but concealed, audible but invisible. The edotav ('his decrees') and choq ('statute') refer to the torah given through these mediators. The relationship was mutual: God spoke, they kept his words. The covenant functions on communication and obedience.
8. We render noqem al alilotam as 'one who held them accountable for their deeds' rather than 'one who avenged their deeds' because the context is not punitive wrath but the insistence that actions have consequences even within a forgiven relationship. The English 'vengeance' would obscure the pastoral character of this accountability.
9. The final refrain expands: where verse 3 said qadosh hu ('holy is he') and verse 5 repeated it, verse 9 gives the full form: ki qadosh YHWH Eloheinu ('for the LORD our God is holy!'). The destination of worship shifts from hadom raglav ('his footstool,' v. 5) to har qodsho ('his holy mountain'). The holy mountain is Zion, the temple mount, the place where God's holiness intersects with human geography. The entire psalm has been building toward this declaration: God reigns, God judges, God answers, God forgives, God holds accountable — and through it all, God is holy. Holiness is the thread that binds sovereignty, justice, mercy, and accountability into a single divine character.

Summary: Psalm 100 is a brief, radiant hymn of praise — only five verses — designated as a 'psalm for the thanksgiving offering' (mizmor le-todah). It summons all the earth to worship the LORD with joy, know that he is God, enter his gates with thanksgiving, and bless his name, because the LORD is good, his faithful love endures forever, and his faithfulness extends to every generation.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm is the culmination and crown of the enthronement psalm sequence (93-100). After all the thunder of theophany, the crashing of chaotic waters, the melting of mountains, the warnings about hardened hearts, and the triple invocation of holiness — the sequence ends here, with five verses of unqualified, uncomplicated joy. There are no enemies in this psalm. No lament, no petition, no warning, no theological tension. Only command after command to rejoice, to know, to enter, to thank. The central declaration — de'u ki YHWH hu Elohim, hu asanu ve-lo anachnu, ammo ve-tson mar'ito ('Know that the LORD is God; he made us and we are his, his people and the flock of his pasture') — is one of the most compact creedal statements in the Hebrew Bible. It asserts God's identity, his creatorship, his ownership, and his pastoral care in a single breath.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 3 contains a famous textual variant: the ketiv (written text) reads ve-lo anachnu ('and not we ourselves,' meaning 'he made us, and not we ourselves') while the qere (read text) reads ve-lo anachnu ('and we are his,' with lo spelled as 'to him' rather than 'not'). Both readings are theologically meaningful. The ketiv denies human self-creation: God made us, not we ourselves. The qere affirms divine ownership: he made us and we belong to him. The qere reading is more widely followed and is reflected in our rendering, but the ketiv's denial of autonomous self-creation is equally powerful.*

Connections: *The psalm for the todah ('thanksgiving offering') connects to the todah sacrifice prescribed in Leviticus 7:12-15 — a fellowship offering accompanied by bread and presented with songs of praise. The call to 'all the earth' (kol ha-arets, v. 1) echoes Psalms 96:1 and 98:4. The shepherd imagery (tson mar'ito, 'the flock of his pasture') echoes Psalm 95:7 and Psalm 23. The concluding triad — tov YHWH, le-olam chasdo, ve-ad dor va-dor emunato ('the LORD is good, his faithful love endures forever, and his faithfulness to every generation') — is the liturgical formula that appears in 1 Chronicles 16:34, 2 Chronicles 5:13, 7:3, Ezra 3:11, and Psalm 136:1. It may be the oldest and most frequently repeated confession in Israelite worship.*

1A psalm for the thanksgiving offering.

Shout to the LORD, all the earth!

²Serve the LORD with gladness!
Come before him with joyful singing!

³Know that the LORD — he is God!
He made us, and we are his — his people and the flock of his pasture.

⁴Enter his gates with thanksgiving, his courts with praise!
Give thanks to him; bless his name!

⁵For the LORD is good;
his faithful love endures forever,
and his faithfulness to every generation.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription mizmor le-todah ('a psalm for the thanksgiving offering') links this psalm to the sacrificial system. The todah was a specific category of peace offering (Leviticus 7:12-15) presented after deliverance from danger — illness, enemies, mortal threat. It was always accompanied by communal celebration and praise. The imperative hari'u ('shout!') with kol ha-arets ('all the earth') universalizes the thanksgiving: what began as one person's gratitude for deliverance becomes the whole world's response to God.
2. The verb ivdu ('serve!') is the same verb used for Israel's slavery in Egypt (Exodus 1:13) — the exodus did not free Israel from service but transferred their service from Pharaoh to God. But this service is be-simchah ('with gladness') — not coerced labor but joyful devotion. The verb bo'u ('come!') with lefanav ('before his face') invites the worshipers into God's presence, and birnana ('with joyful singing, with ringing cries') describes how they arrive. The entire verse insists that the worship of God is characterized by delight, not dread.
3. The ketiv/qere variant in this verse is one of the most discussed in the Hebrew Bible. The ketiv (ve-lo anachnu, 'and not we ourselves') denies human self-sufficiency: we did not make ourselves. The qere (ve-lo anachnu, 'and we are his') affirms divine possession: we belong to God. Both readings are ancient, both are theologically sound, and both are preserved in the Masoretic tradition. We follow the qere because the flow of the verse moves from creation to possession to pastoral care.
4. The she'arim ('gates') and chatserot ('courts') are the physical spaces of the Jerusalem temple. The outer gates led to the courtyards where worshipers gathered. The todah and tehillah that the worshipers bring are both verbal offerings — words of gratitude and words of praise. In the todah sacrifice, the verbal thanksgiving accompanied the physical offering, but the psalm envisions the words themselves as the primary gift.
5. The formula ki tov ki le-olam chasdo ('for he is good, for his faithful love endures forever') appears as a liturgical refrain in 2 Chronicles 5:13, 7:3, 20:21, Ezra 3:11, and throughout Psalm 136. It may be the oldest continuous liturgical formula in Jewish worship, predating any written psalm and perhaps going back to the earliest temple worship. When the returned exiles laid the foundation of the second temple, they wept and shouted this formula (Ezra 3:11) — it was the first thing sung when worship resumed.

Summary: A royal psalm attributed to David in which the king declares the moral standards he will uphold in his household and kingdom. The psalm functions as a pledge of governance — David vows to walk with integrity, banish slander and arrogance, surround himself with faithful servants, and purge the wicked from the city of the LORD. It reads like a royal charter of ethics, a king's oath of office before God.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 101 is unique among the psalms because it is neither praise nor lament but a vow. The king does not ask God for anything; he declares what he will do. Every line is a first-person commitment: 'I will sing,' 'I will walk,' 'I will set no worthless thing before my eyes,' 'I will cut off.' The psalm assumes that the king's personal integrity is inseparable from the health of the nation — that a ruler's private conduct shapes public justice. The shift from personal ethics (vv. 1-4) to governmental policy (vv. 5-8) treats them as one continuous fabric. A king who tolerates evil in his own heart will tolerate it in his court.

Translation Friction: The superscription attributes this to David (le-David), and the content fits a royal context — the references to 'my house,' 'my eyes,' and 'the city of the LORD' suggest a king governing from Jerusalem. However, the psalm's idealistic tone raises questions: does this represent David's actual practice, or an aspiration? Given the narratives of 2 Samuel, where David fails spectacularly in precisely the areas this psalm addresses (Bathsheba, the cover-up, failure to discipline his sons), the psalm reads as either early idealism or deliberate irony. The Hebrew phrase be-qerev beiti ('within my house') becomes painfully pointed when read against 2 Samuel 11-18.

Connections: The psalm's emphasis on the king's moral conduct connects directly to Deuteronomy 17:14-20, the Torah's instructions for Israelite kingship — the king must not multiply wealth or wives and must keep a copy of the Torah before him. Psalm 101 reads like the king's personal response to those instructions. The phrase chesed u-mishpat ('faithful love and justice') in verse 1 echoes the pairing found throughout the prophets (Hosea 6:6, Micah 6:8) — these are the twin pillars of covenant faithfulness. The morning judgment in verse 8 connects to Jeremiah 21:12, where the king is commanded to execute justice every morning.

¹A psalm of David.

Of faithful love and justice I will sing;
to you, O LORD, I will make music.

²I will give careful attention to the way of integrity.
When will you come to me?
I will walk with a whole heart within my house.

³I will set no worthless thing before my eyes.
The deeds of those who fall away — I hate them;
they will not cling to me.

⁴A twisted heart will turn away from me;
I will not know evil.

⁵Whoever slanders his neighbor in secret — him I will destroy.
The one with haughty eyes and a swollen heart — him I cannot endure.

⁶My eyes are on the faithful of the land,
that they may sit with me.
Whoever walks the path of integrity —
he will serve me.

⁷No one who practices deceit will dwell within my house.
No one who speaks lies will stand before my eyes.

⁸Every morning I will destroy all the wicked of the land, cutting off from the city of the LORD
all who practice iniquity.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The pairing of chesed and mishpat is foundational in the Hebrew Bible. Chesed is God's covenant faithfulness directed downward; mishpat is the just order that results when that faithfulness is reflected in human governance. The king who sings of both is committing to embody both.
2. The question matai tavo elai ('when will you come to me?') has puzzled translators. Some take it as a parenthetical cry for God's help, others as a condition ('whenever you come to me, you will find me walking in integrity'). The abruptness is likely deliberate — even in the middle of declaring his moral resolve, the king acknowledges that God's presence is what makes integrity possible.
3. The word tom ('integrity, wholeness, completeness') shares its root with tamim ('blameless'). Walking be-tom levavi means conducting oneself from a heart that is undivided, not harboring hidden motives.
4. The word beliyaal later becomes a title (Belial) in Second Temple literature and the New Testament (2 Corinthians 6:15) for a figure of wickedness. Here in the psalm it is still an abstract noun meaning 'worthlessness' or 'destruction.' The evolution from adjective to proper name traces how deeply this concept embedded itself in Israel's moral vocabulary.
5. The adjective iqqesh ('twisted, crooked, perverse') describes a heart that is bent out of shape — not merely wrong but structurally deformed. The verb yasur ('to turn aside, to depart') here means the king will cause such a heart to withdraw from his presence. The phrase ra lo eda ('evil I will not know') uses yada ('to know') in the sense of intimate acquaintance — the king will not cultivate familiarity with evil.
6. The phrase rechav levav ('wide of heart') does not mean generous. In Hebrew, a 'wide heart' is one that has inflated itself — self-aggrandizing, presumptuous, taking up more space than it deserves. English 'proud heart' captures the sense, but 'swollen heart' preserves the physical metaphor of dangerous expansion.
7. The verb sharat ('to serve, to minister') is used for the Levites serving in the tabernacle (Numbers 3:6) and for court officials serving the king. The king's household is modeled on the sanctuary — faithful service to the king mirrors faithful service to God.
8. The verb yikon (Niphal of kun, 'to be established, to stand firm') means the liar will not be established or maintained in the king's presence — he will not have a secure standing. The parallelism is tight: oseh remiyyah ('doer of deceit') parallels dover sheqarim ('speaker of lies'), and be-qerev beiti ('within my house') parallels le-neged einai ('before my eyes'). The king's house and the king's gaze are the same zone of accountability.
9. The phrase ir YHVH ('city of the LORD') is significant — it identifies Jerusalem as God's city, not merely David's. The king governs on behalf of God, and his judicial actions serve God's holiness. The morning timing connects to ancient Near Eastern court practice, where kings rendered judgments at dawn.

Summary: A prayer of an afflicted person who pours out complaint before the LORD. The psalm moves through three movements: personal suffering described in vivid physical metaphors (vv. 1-12), a declaration that God will arise to rebuild Zion and respond to the destitute (vv. 13-23), and a meditation on human transience set against God's permanence (vv. 24-29). The superscription is unique in the Psalter — it describes a situation rather than naming an author.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 102 is one of the seven traditional penitential psalms, yet it contains no confession of sin. The sufferer is afflicted but not guilty — or at least the psalm never says so. The structural genius lies in how personal lament becomes national hope becomes cosmic theology. The psalmist begins with his own wasting body (bones burning, heart withered like grass, skin clinging to bones) and ends with God founding the heavens and the earth. The shift from 'my days are like a lengthening shadow' (v. 12) to 'You are the same, and your years have no end' (v. 28) is one of the most dramatic theological pivots in the Psalter. Human fragility is not denied but set within a framework of divine permanence. Hebrews 1:10-12 quotes verses 26-28 and applies them to the Son — making this psalm one of the key christological texts drawn from the Psalter.

Translation Friction: *The superscription le-ani ki yaatof ('for the afflicted one when he is faint') does not name David or any other author, making this one of the few psalms with an entirely anonymous, situational heading. The transition from personal lament (vv. 1-12) to national restoration (vv. 13-23) is abrupt — some scholars argue the psalm combines two originally separate compositions. However, the logic is coherent if the psalmist identifies his own restoration with Zion's: when God rebuilds the city, He will also heal the sufferer. The individual and the nation share a single hope.*

Connections: The imagery of withered grass (v. 5, 12) connects to Isaiah 40:6-8 ('all flesh is grass'). The declaration that God founded the earth (v. 26) echoes Isaiah 48:13 and will be quoted in Hebrews 1:10-12 as testimony to Christ's eternal nature. The promise that God will 'look down from His holy height' (v. 20) to hear the groaning of prisoners echoes Psalm 79:11 and Exodus 2:23-25, where God heard the groaning of Israel in Egypt. The rebuilding of Zion (v. 17) connects to the post-exilic hope of Isaiah 60-62.

¹A prayer of the afflicted one, when he grows faint and pours out his complaint before the LORD.

²O LORD, hear my prayer, and let my cry come before you.

³Do not hide your face from me in the day of my distress.
Incline your ear to me;
in the day I call, answer me quickly.

⁴For my days vanish in smoke, and my bones burn like a furnace.

⁵My heart is struck down and withered like grass, for I forget to eat my bread.

⁶From the sound of my groaning, my bones cling to my flesh.

⁷I resemble a desert owl;
I have become like a screech owl among ruins.

⁸I lie awake;
I am like a solitary bird on a rooftop.

⁹All day long my enemies taunt me;
those who mock me use my name as a curse.

¹⁰For I eat ashes as my bread and mingle my drink with weeping.

¹¹Because of your indignation and your wrath, for you lifted me up and hurled me down.

¹²My days are like a lengthening shadow, and I wither like grass.

¹³But you, O LORD, are enthroned forever, and your name endures to all generations.

¹⁴You will rise and have compassion on Zion, for it is time to show her favor —
the appointed time has come.

¹⁵For your servants hold dear her stones and look with compassion on her dust.

¹⁶Then the nations will fear the name of the LORD, and all the kings of the earth your glory.

¹⁷For the LORD will rebuild Zion;
He will appear in His glory.

¹⁸He has turned toward the prayer of the destitute and has not despised their plea.

¹⁹Let this be written for a generation to come, that a people yet to be created may praise the LORD.

²⁰For He looked down from His holy height;
the LORD gazed from heaven to earth,

²¹to hear the groaning of the prisoner, to set free those condemned to death,

²²that the name of the LORD may be proclaimed in Zion and His praise in Jerusalem,

²³when peoples gather together, and kingdoms, to serve the LORD.

²⁴He has broken my strength along the way;
He has cut short my days.

²⁵I say, 'My God, do not take me away in the middle of my days.'
Your years span all generations.

²⁶Long ago you laid the foundation of the earth, and the heavens are the work of your hands.

²⁷They will perish, but you will stand.
All of them will wear out like a garment;
like clothing you will change them, and they will pass away.

²⁸But you are the same,
and your years will never end.

²⁹The children of your servants will dwell secure, and their offspring will be established before you.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse is the superscription — not part of the prayer itself but a heading that describes the psalm's setting. The verb yaatof ('he grows faint, he is overwhelmed') conveys a person at the edge of endurance. The verb yishpokh ('he pours out') uses the language of liquid — the sufferer's complaint flows from him like water that cannot be held back. The noun sicho ('his complaint, his meditation') comes from siach, which can mean a spoken complaint or an inward brooding. This heading is unique in its specificity: it names no author, only a condition.

2. The prayer proper begins with the standard petition formula: YHVH shim'ah tefillati ('LORD, hear my prayer'). The parallelism pairs tefillah ('prayer') with shav'ah ('cry for help') — the second term is more urgent, more desperate than the first. The verb tavo ('let it come') asks that the cry reach God's presence, implying a distance that must be crossed.
3. The phrase al taster panekha ('do not hide your face') is the foundational prayer of the Psalter — God's hidden face means abandonment, and God's turned face means salvation. The urgency intensifies through the verse: from 'hear' to 'do not hide' to 'incline your ear' to maher aneni ('answer me quickly'). The word maher ('quickly, speedily') expresses that the sufferer cannot wait — delay itself is a form of death.
4. The verb kalu (from kalah, 'to be finished, consumed, spent') indicates total depletion. The days are not merely passing; they are being used up, burned away. The word nicharu (from charar, 'to be scorched, to burn') describes dry, intense heat — the bones are desiccated by illness or suffering.
5. The simile ka-eshev ('like grass') invokes the Near Eastern image of grass that springs up green and is scorched by the sun within hours. The heart (lev) here is not the organ but the center of vitality and will. The connection between inner devastation and the forgetting of food (shakhachti me-ekhol lachmi) is psychologically precise — grief and suffering suppress appetite. The body refuses sustenance because the will to live has been struck.
6. The verb daveqah ('it clings') is the same verb used in Genesis 2:24 for marital union and in Psalm 101:3 for evil clinging. Here the clinging is skeletal — the bones press against the skin because there is no flesh between them. The person is wasting away. The phrase mi-qol anchatu ('from the voice of my groaning') makes the groaning audible, the suffering public. The connection between sound and emaciation is causal: the groaning is so constant and intense that the body itself is being consumed by it.
7. The qa'at midbar ('pelican of the wilderness' in KJV) is more likely a type of owl or solitary bird associated with desolate places. The kos choravot ('owl of ruins, owl of waste places') is a bird that inhabits destroyed buildings and abandoned sites. Both images convey isolation in desolation — the psalmist is not merely alone but alone in a wasteland. The identification of these birds is uncertain; what matters is the theological resonance: both inhabit places where life has withdrawn.
8. The verb shaqadeti ('I keep watch, I lie awake') implies sleepless vigilance — the sufferer cannot rest. The image of a tsippor boded al gag ('a lonely bird on a roof') captures perfect isolation: a single bird perched on the highest point of a house, separated from its flock, exposed to wind and night. The rooftop is the most exposed part of an Israelite house. The bird is both visible and utterly alone.
9. The phrase bi nishba'u ('they swear by me') means the psalmist's misery has become proverbial — people use his name as an oath formula: 'May you become like him.' This is a depth of social humiliation beyond mere insult. The verb cherephuni ('they taunt me') implies public disgrace, and the meholalai ('those who rage against me, my mockers') are those who treat the sufferer as a spectacle of divine punishment.
10. Ashes (epher) are the substance of mourning — the psalmist sits in ashes (like Job) and they have become his food. The image of mixing tears with drink (shiqquai bivkhi masakti) means weeping is so constant that tears literally fall into the cup. These are not separate metaphors but a portrait of a life in which grief has replaced every form of sustenance.
11. The verb nasah ('to lift up') followed by hislikh ('to throw, to hurl') creates a single violent action in two stages. Some interpreters read this as a reference to former prosperity followed by catastrophic loss. The theological honesty is striking — the psalmist holds God responsible without abandoning prayer to God.
12. The tsel natui ('stretched-out shadow, declining shadow') is the shadow of late afternoon, growing longer as the sun descends — it will soon disappear entirely when night falls. The psalmist's remaining life stretches thin like that shadow. The return to the grass metaphor (ka-eshev ivash, 'like grass I dry up') closes the personal lament section with the same image that opened it in verse 5. The ring structure emphasizes: the psalmist is dying.
13. The phrase le-olam teshev ('forever you sit enthroned') uses olam in its fullest sense — perpetual, without end. The contrast between the psalmist's shadow-days and God's endless reign is the theological engine that drives the rest of the psalm toward hope.
14. The verb taqum ('you will arise') implies that God has been seated, possibly in judgment or in apparent inaction, and now rises to act. The verb terachem ('you will have compassion') uses the root rachum, connected to rechem ('womb') — God's compassion is maternal, visceral, womb-deep. The phrase et lechennah ('time to show her grace') and ba mo'ed ('the appointed time has come') assert that there is a divinely fixed moment for Zion's restoration, and it has arrived. The psalmist's personal suffering is now linked to national hope.
15. The verb ratsu ('they take pleasure in, they hold dear') means the people love even the rubble of Zion — her stones (avaneih) and her dust (apharah). This is post-destruction language: the city has been reduced to ruins, but its broken stones are precious to the faithful. The word apha ('dust') is the material of desolation and also of creation (Genesis 2:7). Even Zion's dust is beloved. This verse likely reflects the exile or early post-exilic period.
16. The scope expands from Zion to the entire world. When God rebuilds Zion, the nations (goyim) will respond with yir'ah ('fear, reverence'). The parallel between shem YHVH ('the name of the LORD') and kevodekha ('your glory') equates God's name with His manifest presence. The kings of the earth — not merely Israel's neighbors but all earthly rulers — will acknowledge God's kavod.
17. The verb banah ('to build') is the hope of every exile — God will reconstruct what was destroyed. The phrase nir'ah bikhvodo ('He will be seen in His glory') means God's rebuilding of Zion is not merely architectural but theophanic — God Himself will appear. The city is rebuilt because God returns to it.

18. The ha-ar'ar ('the stripped one, the destitute, the naked shrub') is a rare word — it appears in Jeremiah 17:6 as a bush in the desert, stripped bare, without hope. Here it describes people stripped of everything. The verb bazah ('to despise') is what God does not do — He does not look down on the prayer of those who have nothing. This verse reverses the shame the psalmist described earlier: even if enemies despise him, God does not.
19. The phrase dor acharon ('a later generation, a generation to come') combined with am nivra ('a people to be created') gives this verse an almost prophetic quality — the psalm reaches beyond its own moment to address readers who have not yet been born. Every subsequent reader of this psalm fulfills the psalmist's hope.
20. The verb hishqif ('He looked down, He gazed from above') implies bending forward to see — an act of deliberate attention. The phrase mi-merom qodsho ('from the height of His holiness') locates God in the highest point of the cosmic architecture, yet He bends to look at the earth. The verbs hishqif and hibbit ('He looked intently') both emphasize focused, purposeful observation — God is not passively aware but actively watching.
21. The enqat asir ('groaning of the prisoner') echoes Exodus 2:24 and 6:5, where God hears the groaning of Israel in Egypt. The phrase benei temutah ('sons of death, children of death') means those sentenced to die — death is their parentage, their destiny. God's purpose in looking down is not idle surveillance but rescue: lefatte'ach ('to open, to release'). The God who gazes from heaven does so in order to act.
22. The verb lesapper ('to recount, to proclaim, to tell') is the purpose of the entire rescue: God frees the prisoners so that they can tell what He has done. The parallel between shem YHVH ('the name of the LORD') in Zion and tehillato ('His praise') in Jerusalem binds proclamation to place — the restored city is the location where God's acts are celebrated.
23. The vision expands to eschatological scope: be-hiqqavets ammin yachdav ('when peoples are gathered together') — not just Israel but the nations. The word mamlakhot ('kingdoms') pairs with ammin ('peoples') to indicate both populations and political structures. The purpose of this universal gathering is la'avod et YHVH ('to serve the LORD'). The psalm has moved from one sufferer's bones on fire to all the kingdoms of the earth worshipping God. The trajectory is from desolation to cosmic restoration.
24. The psalmist returns to personal lament. The verb innah ('He afflicted, He humbled') attributes the suffering directly to God — not to enemies, not to illness, but to the divine hand. The phrase badderekh ('along the way, on the road') implies the sufferer was cut down mid-journey, before reaching the destination. The verb qittsar ('He shortened') means God truncated the psalmist's life — the full measure of days was not granted.
25. The contrast between 'the middle of my days' and 'your years throughout all generations' is the theological hinge of the psalm's final section. Human life is measured in halves and portions; God's existence is measured in all generations. The psalmist does not resolve this tension — he holds both truths together.
26. The verb yasad ('to found, to establish, to lay a foundation') is used for both the temple and the earth — both are structures God has built. The psalm does not distinguish between creation and architecture; for the Hebrew mind, the cosmos is God's building project.
27. The garment metaphor is quoted in Hebrews 1:11-12 and applied to the Son's superiority over creation. The theological weight is enormous: if even the heavens wear out, then nothing created is permanent — only the Creator endures. The verb chalaf ('to pass away, to change') applies to the heavens what normally applies to human generations.
28. The phrase attah hu ('you are He') became a liturgical formula in later Judaism. It affirms God's unchanging nature — He is the same yesterday, today, and forever, as Hebrews 13:8 will later say of Christ. The psalm's movement from personal suffering to cosmic permanence is complete.
29. The word zera ('seed, offspring') is the covenant term for descendants — the promise to Abraham that his seed would endure. The psalm closes by grounding individual hope in communal continuity: the sufferer may die, but the community of God's servants will persist before God's face.

Summary: David's great hymn of praise to the LORD for His compassion, forgiveness, and faithful love. The psalm opens with a self-summons to bless God ('Bless the LORD, O my soul'), catalogs God's benefits — healing, redemption, satisfaction, renewal — then meditates on God's character as revealed to Moses: compassionate, slow to anger, abounding in faithful love. The central section (vv. 8-14) is the theological heart: God does not treat us as our sins deserve because He remembers that we are dust. The psalm closes with a cosmic call to praise, summoning angels, heavenly hosts, and all creation to bless the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 103 is the chesed psalm — the word appears four times (vv. 4, 8, 11, 17), and the entire poem is an exposition of what chesed means in practice. The psalm quotes Exodus 34:6-7, the self-revelation of God to Moses after the golden calf disaster, and then extends it: 'He does not deal with us according to our sins' (v. 10). This is grace articulated before the word 'grace' acquired its Christian theological weight. The psalm's movement is striking: it begins with 'my soul' (individual), expands to Israel's history (national), then reaches to heaven's throne and all creation (cosmic). The trajectory is from inward praise to universal doxology. The comparison of human life to grass and flowers (vv. 15-16) — the same imagery as Isaiah 40:6-8 — is not pessimistic but liberating: because we are frail, God is gentle with us. Our smallness is not a problem to be solved but a condition that evokes divine tenderness.

Translation Friction: The superscription le-David is accepted by the text but the psalm's theology of forgiveness is remarkably mature — some scholars see it as post-exilic, reflecting the kind of theological synthesis that emerges after the exile shattered simpler frameworks of reward and punishment. The psalm's use of Exodus 34:6 is selective: it quotes the compassionate attributes but omits the warning that God 'will by no means clear the guilty' (Exodus 34:7b). This is not carelessness but theological choice — the psalmist is emphasizing one dimension of God's character for a specific pastoral purpose. The tension between justice and mercy is not resolved here; mercy is simply celebrated.

Connections: Exodus 34:6-7 is the foundational text behind verse 8 — God's self-revelation as rachum ve-channun, erekh appayim ve-rav chesed ('compassionate and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in faithful love'). This creedal formula is quoted more than any other passage in the Hebrew Bible (Joel 2:13, Jonah 4:2, Nehemiah 9:17, Psalms 86:15, 145:8). The grass imagery in verses 15-16 parallels Isaiah 40:6-8 and 1 Peter 1:24-25. The fatherly compassion of verse 13 anticipates Jesus' parable of the prodigal son (Luke 15:20). The psalm's opening and closing phrase — barekhi nafshi et YHVH ('bless the LORD, O my soul') — creates a frame that also opens Psalm 104.

¹Of David.

Bless the LORD, O my soul,
and all that is within me, bless His holy name.

²Bless the LORD, O my soul, and do not forget any of His benefits.

³He forgives all your iniquity;
He heals all your diseases.

⁴He redeems your life from the pit;
He crowns you with faithful love and compassion.

⁵He satisfies your life with good things,
so that your youth is renewed like the eagle's.

⁶The LORD works righteousness and justice for all who are oppressed.

⁷He made His ways known to Moses,
His deeds to the children of Israel.

⁸The LORD is compassionate and gracious, slow to anger and abounding in faithful love.

⁹He will not always contend, nor will He keep His anger forever.

¹⁰He has not dealt with us according to our sins,
nor repaid us according to our iniquities.

¹¹For as high as the heavens are above the earth, so great is His faithful love toward those who fear Him.

¹²As distant as east is from west,
so far has He removed our transgressions from us.

¹³As a father has compassion on his children,
so the LORD has compassion on those who fear Him.

¹⁴For He knows what we are made of;
He remembers that we are dust.

¹⁵As for a human — his days are like grass;
like a flower of the field, so he blooms.

¹⁶For the wind passes over it and it is gone, and its place knows it no more.

¹⁷But the faithful love of the LORD is from everlasting to everlasting upon those who fear Him,
and His righteousness to children's children,

¹⁸to those who keep His covenant and remember His precepts to do them.

¹⁹The LORD has established His throne in the heavens, and His kingdom rules over all.

²⁰Bless the LORD, you His angels, you mighty ones who do His word,
obeying the voice of His command.

²¹Bless the LORD, all His hosts,
His ministers who do His will.

²²Bless the LORD, all His works,
in every place of His dominion.
Bless the LORD, O my soul.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb barak in the Piel means 'to bless, to praise, to kneel before.' When directed toward God, it means to acknowledge His greatness with gratitude. The word qeravai ('my inward parts') is anatomical — it refers to the internal organs, the seat of emotion in Hebrew thought. The psalmist wants his liver, his intestines, his kidneys — all the places where emotion is physically felt — to participate in praise.
2. The verb tishkechi ('forget') is the great danger — the soul that forgets God's acts loses the basis for praise. The word gemulav ('His benefits, His dealings') comes from gamal ('to deal with, to repay, to ripen') and includes both acts of kindness and the full weight of God's engagement with the person. The following verses (3-5) will enumerate these benefits in a catalog of divine generosity.
3. The verb salach ('to forgive') occurs only with God as subject in the Hebrew Bible — it is a divine prerogative. This distinguishes biblical forgiveness from human pardoning. When God forgives, something happens that no human authority can accomplish.
4. The go'el institution (Leviticus 25, Ruth 3-4) is the legal framework here — God acts as the nearest kinsman who has both the right and the obligation to redeem. The word shachat ('pit') can mean either a physical pit, the grave, or destruction. In context, it means God rescues from death itself.
4. Register departure: go'el rendered as 'redeems' (verbal) rather than default nominal 'kinsman-redeemer'/'Redeemer' because the Hebrew uses the participial form ha-go'el — 'the one who redeems' — functioning as a present-tense verb describing God's ongoing redemptive action.
5. The verb masbia ('He satisfies') means filling to the point of completeness — no lack, no hunger, no unfulfilled desire. The word edyekh is debated: it may mean 'your ornament' (from adi, 'adornment'), 'your duration' (from ad, 'perpetuity'), or 'your mouth' (some ancient versions). We render 'your - life' to capture the fullness of what God satisfies. The eagle (nesher) metaphor draws on the observation that eagles molt and regrow feathers, appearing to be renewed. The psalmist's youth (ne'urayekhi) is refreshed by God's provision — age and decay are reversed by divine generosity.

6. The plural tsedaqot ('righteous acts, acts of justice') emphasizes that God's righteousness is not a static attribute but a series of specific, concrete actions on behalf of the oppressed (ashuqim). The word ashuqim ('oppressed, crushed, exploited') refers to those ground down by more powerful people. God's justice is not impartial in the abstract sense — it is biased toward the oppressed, because they are the ones who need it.
 7. The distinction between derakhav ('His ways') and alilotav ('His deeds') is important: Israel saw what God did (the plagues, the sea crossing, the manna), but Moses knew why God did it (His compassion, His faithfulness, His patience). Ways are deeper than deeds. This verse prepares for the Exodus 34:6 quotation in verse 8.
 8. The phrase erekh appayim ('slow to anger') is literally 'long of nostrils.' In Hebrew, anger is expressed through the nose — rapid breathing, flared nostrils. A person who is 'long of nostrils' takes a long time to get angry. Applied to God, it means His default posture is patience, not wrath.
 8. The psalm quotes Exodus 34:6 but omits the continuation in 34:7b — 'who will by no means clear the guilty.' This selective quotation is theologically deliberate: the psalmist is celebrating mercy, not denying justice. The full character of God includes both; this psalm magnifies one.
 9. The verb yariv ('He contends, He brings a case') is legal language — God is pictured as a prosecutor who eventually drops the case. The verb yittor ('He keeps, He bears a grudge') means to maintain anger over time. The psalm's claim is radical: God's anger has an expiration date. He does not nurse grievances or hold eternal grudges. This is not a denial of divine justice but an assertion that mercy has the last word.
 10. The parallelism between chata'einu ('our sins,' from chata, 'to miss the mark') and avonoteinu ('our iniquities,' from avah, 'to bend, to twist, to be crooked') uses two different Hebrew words for moral failure. Sin is missing the target; iniquity is being bent out of shape. God responds to neither with what they deserve.
 11. The verb gavar ('to prevail, to be mighty') applied to chesed means that faithful love is not passive — it actively prevails over obstacles, over sin, over the distance between heaven and earth. The spatial metaphor makes an abstract quality vivid: chesed is as vast as the sky.
 12. The three sin-words in the psalm — chet (v. 10, missing the mark), avon (v. 10, crookedness), and pesha (v. 12, rebellion) — cover the full spectrum of human moral failure. God addresses all three: He does not repay chet or avon proportionally (v. 10), and He removes pesha entirely (v. 12).
 13. The father metaphor is significant in a culture where the father held absolute authority over the household. A father's compassion is not weakness but the tender side of full authority — the father who could punish chooses to show mercy. This verse anticipates the explanation in verse 14: the father knows what his children are made of.
 14. The word yetser will later acquire theological weight in rabbinic literature as yetser ha-ra ('the evil inclination') and yetser ha-tov ('the good inclination'). Here it simply means 'what we are formed from, our constitution.' God is a potter who knows the limitations of His clay.
 15. The word enosh ('a human, a mortal') emphasizes frailty — it is the word for humanity at its most vulnerable. The comparison to chatsir ('grass') and tsits ha-sadeh ('flower of the field') draws on the Palestinian landscape where wildflowers appear after rain and are scorched by the hot east wind (the hamsin) within days. The verb yatsits ('he blossoms') uses the same root as tsits ('flower') — the human blooms briefly and brilliantly, but the bloom does not last.
 16. The ruach ('wind, breath, spirit') that destroys the flower is the same word for the life-breath that God gives. Wind gives life and takes it away. The phrase ve-einenu ('and it is not, and he is no more') is absolute — the person simply ceases to be present. The clause ve-lo yakkivenu od meqomo ('and its place will not recognize it again') personifies the location: the very ground where the person stood will not remember them. The imagery is not bitter but factual — this is what dust does.
 17. The fourth and climactic use of chesed in the psalm. The phrase me-olam ve-ad olam is the strongest temporal expression in Hebrew — it means 'from perpetuity to perpetuity.' Chesed is set on the same timescale as God Himself.
 18. This verse qualifies the promise of verse 17. The chesed that spans eternity is directed toward those who shomerei verito ('keep His covenant') and zokherei piqudav ('remember His precepts'). The verb zakar ('to remember') paired with la'asotam ('to do them') means that remembering is not intellectual but active — you remember the commandments by performing them. The covenant framework is explicit: chesed operates within covenant relationship.
 19. The verb hekhin ('He has established, He has prepared') uses kun ('to be firm, stable') in the Hiphil — God's throne is not temporary furniture but a permanent fixture of the cosmic architecture. The phrase malkhuto bakkol mashalah ('His kingdom over everything rules') asserts absolute sovereignty. The scope is universal: bakkol means 'over everything' — not just Israel, not just the earth, but the entire created order. This verse provides the theological basis for the cosmic praise that follows.
 20. The call to praise expands from the psalmist's soul to the angelic realm. The mal'akhav ('His angels, His messengers') are giborei koach ('mighty ones of power') — beings of immense strength. Yet their power is exercised in obedience: osei devaro ('doers of His word'), lishmo'a be-qol devaro ('listening to the voice of His word'). Angelic might is defined by submission to God's commands. The strongest beings in the universe are characterized by their obedience.
 21. The tseva'av ('His hosts, His armies') expands from individual angels to the entire heavenly army. The mesharetav ('His ministers') uses sharat, the verb for priestly or courtly service — the same word used in Psalm 101:6 for those who serve the king. The phrase osei retsono ('doers of His will, His pleasure') defines service as alignment with God's desire. The heavenly hierarchy is summoned to praise.

22. The return to barekhi nafshi et YHVH creates an inclusio — the literary device of beginning and ending with the same phrase. The psalm has traveled from the individual soul through Israel's history, through God's cosmic character, through heaven's angels, through all creation, and back to the single soul. The message is clear: your private praise participates in the praise of the universe.

Summary: The great creation psalm — a poetic retelling of Genesis 1 that follows the same sequence (light, sky, waters, land, luminaries, sea creatures, humans) but transforms it from narrative prose into ecstatic hymn. God stretches out the heavens like a tent, rides on the clouds, sets the earth on its foundations, sends springs into valleys, causes grass and wine and bread and oil for human sustenance, appoints the moon for seasons, and fills the sea with creatures beyond counting. The psalm ends with a prayer that sinners vanish from the earth and a return to the opening self-summons: 'Bless the LORD, O my soul.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 104 has been compared to the Egyptian Hymn to the Aten attributed to Pharaoh Akhenaten (14th century BCE), and the parallels are striking — both celebrate the sun, the provision of water, the diversity of creatures, and the dependence of all life on the deity. Whether there is direct literary dependence or a shared ancient Near Eastern tradition of creation hymns is debated. What distinguishes Psalm 104 is its theological integration: creation is not autonomous but continuously dependent on God's breath (ruach). Verse 29 is the psalm's theological center: 'When you hide your face, they are terrified; when you take away their breath, they die and return to dust. When you send forth your spirit, they are created, and you renew the face of the ground.' Creation is not a past event but an ongoing act — God sustains everything moment by moment. The psalm's vision is not deistic (God made it and left) but panentheistic in the broad sense: God is actively present in every spring, every cloud, every lion's roar, every ship on the sea.

Translation Friction: The psalm has no superscription attributing it to David or any other author in the Hebrew text (LXX adds 'of David'). The relationship to Genesis 1 is structural but not slavish — the psalm rearranges some elements and adds others (wine, oil, storks, rock badgers) that Genesis does not mention. The prayer in verse 35 that sinners be consumed from the earth strikes an unexpected note in a creation hymn — why end a celebration of cosmic beauty with a wish for the wicked to vanish? The answer may be that sin is the one element that does not fit the created order; it is the dissonance in the symphony, and the psalmist wants the music to be pure.

Connections: The creation sequence follows Genesis 1 closely: light (v. 2), sky/waters divided (vv. 3-6), dry land (vv. 7-9), vegetation (vv. 14-17), luminaries (v. 19), sea creatures (v. 25-26), sustenance for all (vv. 27-28). The breath theology of verses 29-30 connects to Genesis 2:7 (God breathes life into the human), Ecclesiastes 12:7 (the spirit returns to God), and Job 34:14-15 (if God withdrew His spirit, all flesh would perish). The Leviathan reference in verse 26 connects to Job 41 and Isaiah 27:1. Paul's speech in Acts 17:25-28 ('in Him we live and move and have our being') echoes this psalm's vision of continuous divine sustenance.

¹Bless the LORD, O my soul.

O LORD my God, you are exceedingly great;
you are clothed with splendor and majesty.

²He wraps Himself in light as a garment;
He stretches out the heavens like a tent curtain.

³He lays the beams of His upper chambers on the waters;
He makes the clouds His chariot;
He walks on the wings of the wind.

- ⁴He makes winds His messengers, flaming fire His servants.
- ⁵He set the earth on its foundations,
so that it will never be shaken.
- ⁶You draped the deep over it as with a garment;
the waters stood above the mountains.
- ⁷At your rebuke they fled;
at the sound of your thunder they rushed away.
- ⁸Mountains rose, valleys sank down, to the place you appointed for them.
- ⁹You set a boundary they cannot cross;
they will not return to cover the earth.
- ¹⁰He sends springs into the valleys;
they flow between the mountains.
- ¹¹They water every beast of the field;
the wild donkeys quench their thirst.
- ¹²Beside them the birds of the heavens dwell;
from among the branches they sing.
- ¹³He waters the mountains from His upper chambers;
the earth is satisfied with the fruit of your works.
- ¹⁴He causes grass to grow for the livestock and plants for human labor, bringing food from the earth.
- ¹⁵And wine to gladden the human heart,
oil to make the face shine,
and bread to sustain the human heart.
- ¹⁶The trees of the LORD drink their fill — the cedars of Lebanon that He planted.
- ¹⁷There the birds build their nests;
the stork — the cypresses are her home.
- ¹⁸The high mountains belong to the wild goats;
the cliffs are a refuge for the rock badgers.
- ¹⁹He made the moon for appointed times;
the sun knows its setting.
- ²⁰You appoint darkness and it becomes night,
when every creature of the forest stirs.

²¹The young lions roar for prey, seeking their food from God.

²²The sun rises — they withdraw and lie down in their dens.

²³Humans go out to their work and to their labor until evening.

²⁴How many are your works, O LORD!
In wisdom you made them all;
the earth is full of your creatures.

²⁵There is the sea, vast and wide, teeming with creatures beyond number — living things both small and great.

²⁶There the ships travel, and Leviathan, whom you formed to play in it.

²⁷All of them look to you to give them their food in its time.

²⁸When you give to them, they gather;
when you open your hand, they are filled with good.

²⁹When you hide your face, they are terrified;
when you take away their breath, they die and return to their dust.

³⁰When you send forth your spirit, they are created,
and you renew the face of the ground.

³¹May the glory of the LORD endure forever;
may the LORD rejoice in His works.

³²He looks at the earth and it trembles;
He touches the mountains and they smoke.

³³I will sing to the LORD as long as I live;
I will make music to my God while I exist.

³⁴May my meditation be pleasing to Him;
I will rejoice in the LORD.

³⁵Let sinners vanish from the earth, and let the wicked be no more.
Bless the LORD, O my soul.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The clothing metaphor is central to the psalm: God wraps Himself in light (v. 2), stretches out the heavens like a tent curtain (v. 2), and makes clouds His chariot (v. 3). Creation is God's wardrobe — the visible expression of His invisible nature.
2. The verb natah ('to stretch out') applied to the heavens appears in Isaiah 40:22, 42:5, 44:24, and Job 9:8. It became a standard theological formula: God 'stretches out' the sky. The tent curtain metaphor suggests that the heavens are not a permanent structure but a fabric God spread — and could, presumably, fold up again (as Psalm 102:27 suggests).
3. The verb meqareh ('lays beams, constructs with beams') uses architectural language — God builds His upper rooms (aliyyotav) on the cosmic waters above the firmament. The ancient Near Eastern cosmology places water above the sky-dome, and God's palace sits upon those waters. The clouds are His rekhuvo ('His chariot') and the wind (ruach) is His steed. The imagery is of a divine king moving through His realm with cosmic elements as His transportation.
4. The LXX reads 'He makes His angels spirits and His ministers a flame of fire,' and Hebrews 1:7 follows this reading to argue for the Son's superiority over angels. The Hebrew text in its creation-hymn context more likely means that natural forces — wind and fire — serve as God's agents in the world. Both readings are theologically productive.
5. The verb yasad ('to found, to lay a foundation') pictures God as a master builder. The mekhoneyha ('its foundations, its bases') are the pillars or supports on which the earth rests — the ancient cosmological image of the earth as a structure built upon foundations (see also Job 38:4-6). The promise bal timmot olam va-ed ('it will not be moved forever and ever') asserts the permanence of God's construction. The earth is stable because God made it so.
6. The tehom ('the deep') is the primordial ocean of Genesis 1:2 — the watery chaos that covered everything before God separated the waters. The psalm pictures this as a garment (kallevush) that covered the earth — the deep wrapped the world like a robe. The phrase al harim ya'amdu mayim ('above the mountains the waters stood') describes the pre-creation state: even the highest points on earth were submerged. The following verses will describe God commanding these waters to retreat.
7. The verb yenusun ('they fled') and yechafezun ('they hurried, they rushed') give the waters personality — they respond to God's ga'aratekha ('your rebuke') like soldiers scattering before a commander. The qol ra'amekha ('voice of your thunder') is God's weapon: His voice is thunder, and thunder drives the waters back. The retreat of the primordial waters is not a gradual process but a panicked flight before divine authority.
8. The subject could be the waters or the landforms. We read it as the landscape reshaping itself in response to God's command: mountains ascend (ya'alu harim) and valleys descend (yerdu veqa'ot). The phrase el maqom zeh yasadta lahem ('to the place you founded for them') means each feature of the landscape has an assigned position. Geography is not random but ordered — God placed each mountain and valley where it belongs.
9. God sets a gevu ('boundary, border, limit') for the waters. The waters are not destroyed but contained — they have a territory they must not exceed. The phrase bal yeshuvun lekhasot ha-arets ('they will not return to cover the earth') is a creation covenant: God promises that the primordial flood state will not recur. This echoes the Noahic covenant in Genesis 9:11, though the psalm frames it as a creation ordinance rather than a post-flood promise.
10. The scene shifts from primordial cosmology to living landscape. God meshalleach ma'yanim ('sends forth springs') — the verb shalach means to dispatch on a mission. The springs are agents sent by God to water the earth. The nachalim ('wadis, valleys, ravines') are the channels through which the water flows, and the springs run bein harim ('between the mountains'). The water that was chaos in verse 6 is now life-giving irrigation, domesticated by divine purpose.
11. The springs serve the animals: kol chaito sadai ('every living thing of the field'). The specific example — pera'im ('wild donkeys') — highlights the most independent, untamed creatures of the steppe. Even they depend on God's springs. The verb yishberu ('they break, they quench') applied to thirst means to shatter it, to end it completely. God provides for creatures that serve no human purpose — the wild donkey is useless to agriculture, yet God waters it.
12. The springs create habitat: the birds of the heavens (of ha-shamayim) settle beside the water sources. The phrase mi-bein ofayim ('from among the foliage, the branches') locates the birds in the trees that grow near water. The verb yittenu qol ('they give voice, they sing') is the birds' response to God's provision — their singing is an unconscious form of praise, a natural doxology that the psalmist recognizes as worship.
13. God waters the mountains from His aliyyotav ('His upper rooms') — the same celestial chambers mentioned in verse 3, where God laid beams on the waters. Rain falls from God's palace. The phrase mi-peri ma'asekha ('from the fruit of your works') means the earth's satisfaction comes from what God produces — rain is God's 'fruit.' The verb tisba ('is satisfied') uses the same root as verse 5's mesabbe'a — God satisfies both human desire and the earth itself.
14. The verb matsmia'ch (Hiphil of tsamach, 'to sprout, to cause to grow') credits God with agriculture. The chatsir ('grass') serves the behemah ('livestock, cattle, domestic animals'), and the esev ('plants, herbs, vegetation') serves the avodat ha-adam ('the labor/service of humans'). The phrase lehotsi lechem min ha-arets ('to bring forth bread from the earth') is the purpose of human agricultural labor — but the underlying cause is God's growth. Humans work, but God makes things grow.

15. Wine, oil, and bread are the three staples of the Mediterranean agricultural economy and the three elements of festive celebration. The psalm treats them as divine gifts, not human achievements. God causes the growth; humans harvest the result. The theological point is that even the most ordinary meal is sustained by God's creative power.
16. The atsei YHVH ('trees of the LORD') are trees so massive and ancient that they can only be God's own planting. The cedars of Lebanon (arzei Levanon) were the tallest, most majestic trees known to the ancient Israelite world. The verb yisbe'u ('they are satisfied, they drink their fill') applies the language of contentment to trees — they too are recipients of God's provision. The clause asher nata ('which He planted') attributes their existence to God's direct action. No human planted the cedars of Lebanon; God did.
17. The cedars provide habitat. The tsipporim ('birds') nest in them, and the chasidah ('stork') makes her home in the beroshim ('cypresses, fir trees'). The word chasidah is from the root chesed — the stork is literally 'the faithful one,' named for its attentive care of its young. Even the naming of animals reflects covenantal vocabulary. The detail is ecological: tall trees house specific birds, and the psalm delights in this specificity.
18. The ye'elim ('wild goats, ibex') inhabit the highest, most inaccessible peaks; the shefannim ('rock badgers, hyrax') hide in the cliff crevices. Both are creatures that serve no agricultural purpose and live beyond human reach. Yet God provides habitat for them. The psalm's ecological vision is non-utilitarian: creation exists not merely for human benefit but because God delights in its diversity.
19. The yareach ('moon') serves le-mo'adim ('for appointed times, for festivals'). The Hebrew liturgical calendar is lunar — the mo'adim (the festivals of Leviticus 23) are determined by the moon's phases. The moon is not merely decorative but functional in God's worship system. The sun (shemesh) yada mevo'o ('knows its going down') — the sun is personified as knowing when to set. The celestial bodies are obedient servants who know their schedule.
20. God sets (tashet) the darkness — choshekh is not an absence but an appointment. Night is not the failure of day but a purposeful creation. The phrase bo tirmosh kol chayto ya'ar ('in it every beast of the forest creeps about') means night belongs to the animals — it is their time to emerge, hunt, and move. The psalm's vision includes the nocturnal world as part of God's good order.
21. The kephirim ('young lions') roar (sho'agim) for their prey (taraph). The psalm interprets their hunting as prayer: u-levaqesh me-El okhlam ('and to seek from God their food'). The lion's roar is, in the psalm's theology, a petition to God for sustenance. Every predator, in the act of hunting, is unconsciously asking God for dinner. This is radical theological ecology: the food chain is a prayer chain.
22. At dawn, the nocturnal creatures retreat. The verb ye'asefun ('they gather themselves, they withdraw') and yirbbatsun ('they crouch, they lie down') describe the ordered transition from night to day. The me'onotam ('their dens, their lairs') are their assigned places. Night and day each have their inhabitants, and the rotation is seamless. The psalm presents the 24-hour cycle as a choreographed performance.
23. The human appears in the psalm for the first time since verse 15 — and the role is modest. Humans go out to work (le-fo'olo) and labor (la'avodato) until evening (adei arev). The human occupies one slot in the daily cycle: the daytime shift. Lions hunt at night; humans work by day. The psalm does not privilege human activity — it is one part of a larger pattern. The word adam ('human') is generic, not a name.
24. The word chokmah ('wisdom') connects this psalm to the wisdom tradition — Proverbs 8:22-31 pictures wisdom as God's companion in creation. The psalm affirms that the created order is wise, not merely powerful. The diversity of life is evidence of intelligence, not chaos.
25. The zeh hayyam gadol u-rechav yadayim ('this sea, great and broad of hands/extent') introduces the ocean as a marvel. The phrase ein mispar ('without number') means the sea creatures are uncountable — not because the psalmist is lazy but because the abundance exceeds human inventory. The juxtaposition of qetannot im gedolot ('small with great') highlights the range: from plankton to whale, the sea contains every scale of life.
26. The word Livyatan (from lavah, 'to twist, to coil') is the great sea serpent of ancient Near Eastern mythology. In Ugaritic texts, Lotan is the seven-headed chaos dragon defeated by Baal. In Isaiah 27:1, God will slay Leviathan with a sword. But in this psalm, Leviathan plays in the sea like a dolphin. The psalm has domesticated cosmic chaos through divine humor.
27. The verb yesabberu ('they look expectantly, they wait') pictures all creatures — from rock badgers to Leviathan — turning their faces toward God and waiting. The phrase latet okhlam be-itto ('to give their food in its season') means God feeds each creature at the right time. The psalm's vision of universal dependence is both ecological and theological: every feeding event in nature is God's act of provision.
28. The two clauses establish a direct chain: God gives (titten), creatures gather (yilqotun); God opens His hand (tiftach yadekha), creatures are satisfied with good (yisbe'un tov). The hand of God is the source — when it opens, abundance flows; when it closes, scarcity follows. The verb laqat ('to gather, to glean') is the verb used for gathering manna in Exodus 16. All food-gathering in all of nature is a form of manna-gathering.
29. The verb asaph ('to gather, to collect') applied to ruach means God retrieves the breath of life He distributed. Life is a loan, not a possession. The triad — hiding face, gathering breath, returning to dust — describes the mechanics of death as a divine act, not a natural process. God is as involved in death as in life.
30. The verb bara appears only with God as subject in the Hebrew Bible. Its use here means that every new generation of creatures is a genuine act of creation, not merely biological reproduction. The psalm collapses the distinction between original creation and ongoing sustenance — both are the work of God's ruach.
31. The phrase yehi khevod YHVH le-olam ('let the glory of the LORD be forever') is a wish that God's kavod — His manifest splendor — never diminishes. The parallel line — yismach YHVH be-ma'asav ('let the LORD rejoice in His works') — pictures God delighting in creation. The verb samach ('to rejoice') applied to God means the Creator takes pleasure in what He has made. This echoes Genesis 1:31: 'God saw everything that He had made, and it was very good.' The psalm wants that divine delight to continue.

32. The God who plays with Leviathan and sends springs for birds can also make the earth quake with a glance (hamabbit la-arets vatr'ad) and set mountains smoking with a touch (yigga beharim veye'eshanu). The verbs are instantaneous: God looks — the earth trembles; God touches — the mountains erupt. The psalm reminds the listener that the gentle provider of verses 10-28 is also the terrifying Lord of Sinai (Exodus 19:18). Power and tenderness are not contradictions in God.
33. The psalmist pledges lifelong praise: be-chayyai ('in my life, as long as I live') and be-odi ('while I still exist, while I have being'). The word od ('still, yet, continuance') acknowledges that existence is temporary — the psalmist knows from verse 29 that his breath is on loan. The response to borrowed breath is praise: I will use every breath I have to sing.
34. The verb ye'erav ('may it be sweet, pleasing') expresses the hope that the psalmist's sichi ('meditation, musing, complaint') will be acceptable to God — that it will taste good to Him, like a pleasing sacrifice. The psalmist then declares anokhi esmach ba-YHVH ('I, I will rejoice in the LORD') — the emphatic pronoun anokhi adds personal force. This is the psalmist's individual response to the cosmic panorama: joy in God.
35. The appearance of halelu Yah ('praise the LORD') here is the first occurrence of this liturgical phrase in the Psalter's final collection. It will become the signature exclamation of Psalms 146-150. Some scholars attach the halelu Yah to the beginning of Psalm 105 rather than the end of 104 — the Masoretic text places it here.

Summary: A historical psalm that retells Israel's story from Abraham through the exodus and conquest, emphasizing God's faithfulness to His covenant promise. The psalm moves through the patriarchal wanderings, Joseph's rise in Egypt, the plagues, the wilderness provision, and the gift of the land — all driven by one engine: God remembered His holy word to Abraham. Unlike Psalm 106, which catalogs Israel's failures, Psalm 105 focuses entirely on God's faithfulness. It is a hymn of divine reliability.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 105 is the positive mirror of Psalm 106. Where 106 will recount Israel's repeated failures and rebellions, 105 tells the same history with Israel's sins completely omitted. There is no golden calf, no grumbling, no refusal to enter the land. This is not dishonesty but theological focus: the psalm's purpose is to celebrate what God did, not to account for what Israel did wrong. The controlling verse is verse 8: 'He remembers His covenant forever, the word He commanded for a thousand generations.' Every event in the psalm — Joseph's imprisonment, the plagues, the wilderness wandering — is interpreted as God keeping a promise He made to Abraham. History is covenant fulfillment. The first fifteen verses of this psalm appear in 1 Chronicles 16:8-22 as part of the song David composed when the ark was brought to Jerusalem.

Translation Friction: The psalm's selective retelling raises questions: by omitting Israel's failures entirely, does it distort history? The answer depends on genre. A hymn of praise is not a balanced historical account; it is a celebration of one aspect of reality. The psalm also modifies the plague sequence from Exodus — the order differs, and the fifth and sixth plagues (livestock disease, boils) are omitted entirely. The psalmist is not bound to Exodus's sequence but adapts the tradition for poetic and liturgical purposes.

Connections: Verses 1-15 parallel 1 Chronicles 16:8-22. The covenant with Abraham (vv. 9-11) draws on Genesis 12:1-3, 15:18-21, and 17:1-8. The Joseph narrative (vv. 17-22) condenses Genesis 37-41. The plague sequence (vv. 28-36) rearranges Exodus 7-12. The wilderness provision (vv. 39-41) draws on Exodus 13:21, 16:1-36, and 17:1-7. The gift of the land (v. 44) fulfills the promise of Genesis 15:18. The psalm's final purpose statement — 'that they might keep His statutes and observe His laws' (v. 45) — connects the historical narrative to Torah obedience.

1Give thanks to the LORD, call on His name;
make His deeds known among the peoples.

2Sing to Him, make music to Him;
meditate on all His wonders.

3Boast in His holy name;
let the hearts of those who seek the LORD rejoice.

⁴Seek the LORD and His strength;
seek His face continually.

⁵Remember the wonders He has done,
His signs and the judgments of His mouth,

⁶O offspring of Abraham His servant,
children of Jacob, His chosen ones.

⁷He is the LORD our God;
His decrees are in all the earth.

⁸He remembers His covenant forever,
the word He commanded for a thousand generations,

⁹the covenant He cut with Abraham, and His oath to Isaac,

¹⁰He established it for Jacob as a statute, for Israel as an everlasting covenant,

¹¹saying, 'To you I will give the land of Canaan, as your allotted inheritance.'

¹²When they were few in number,
very few, and strangers in it.

¹³They wandered from nation to nation, from one kingdom to another people.

¹⁴He allowed no one to oppress them;
He rebuked kings on their account,

¹⁵'Do not touch my anointed ones, and do my prophets no harm.'

¹⁶He called a famine upon the land;
He broke every staff of bread.

¹⁷He had sent a man ahead of them —
Joseph, sold as a slave.

¹⁸They afflicted his feet with shackles;
iron entered his soul.

¹⁹Until the time His word came to pass,
the word of the LORD refined him.

²⁰The king sent and released him —
the ruler of peoples set him free.

²¹He made him lord of his household and ruler over all his possessions,

²²to bind his officials at will and to teach his elders wisdom.

²³Then Israel came to Egypt;
Jacob sojourned in the land of Ham.

²⁴He made His people very fruitful and made them stronger than their adversaries.

²⁵He turned their hearts to hate His people, to plot cunningly with His servants.

²⁶He sent Moses His servant, and Aaron His chosen one.

²⁷They performed His signs among them, wonders in the land of Ham.

²⁸He sent darkness and made it dark;
they did not rebel against His word.

²⁹He turned their waters to blood and killed their fish.

³⁰Their land swarmed with frogs,
even in the chambers of their kings.

³¹He spoke, and swarms of flies came,
and gnats throughout their territory.

³²He gave them hail instead of rain, flaming fire throughout their land.

³³He struck their vines and fig trees and shattered the trees of their territory.

³⁴He spoke, and locusts came,
and young locusts without number.

³⁵They devoured every plant in their land and ate the fruit of their soil.

³⁶He struck every firstborn in their land,
the firstfruits of all their strength.

³⁷He brought them out with silver and gold,
and not one among His tribes stumbled.

³⁸Egypt was glad when they departed, for dread of them had fallen upon them.

³⁹He spread out a cloud for a covering and fire to give light at night.

⁴⁰They asked, and He brought quail;
He satisfied them with bread from heaven.

⁴¹He opened the rock and water gushed out;
it flowed through the desert as a river.

⁴²For He remembered His holy word,
His promise to Abraham His servant.

⁴³He brought His people out with joy,
His chosen ones with shouts of gladness.

⁴⁴He gave them the lands of the nations, and they took possession of what peoples had labored for,

⁴⁵so that they might keep His statutes and observe His laws.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening imperative hodu ('give thanks, confess, acknowledge') sets the psalm's tone: public testimony. The verb qir'u vishmo ('call on His name') means to invoke God in worship. The phrase hodu va-ammim alilotav ('make known among the peoples His deeds') extends the audience beyond Israel — God's acts are to be proclaimed to the nations. This verse is identical to 1 Chronicles 16:8.
2. Three imperatives: shiru ('sing'), zammeru ('make music'), sichu ('meditate, speak about'). The word nifle'otav ('His wonders') from pala ('to be extraordinary, to be beyond comprehension') refers to acts so remarkable they exceed normal categories. The rest of the psalm will enumerate these wonders.
3. The verb hithalelu ('boast, glory in') means to make God's name the basis of one's confidence. The phrase lev mevaqshei YHVH ('the heart of those who seek the LORD') identifies the psalm's audience: not casual observers but active seekers. Their reward is joy (yismach).
4. Two verbs for seeking: dirshu (from darash, 'to inquire, to seek out') and baqqeshu (from baqash, 'to seek, to request'). The first implies investigation, the second implies desire. God's uzzo ('His strength') and panav ('His face') are the objects — the seeker pursues both God's power and His presence. The word tamid ('continually, always') means this seeking has no endpoint.
5. The imperative zikhru ('remember') is the psalm's operating command — what follows is the content of Israel's memory. The nifle'otav ('His wonders'), mofetav ('His signs, His portents'), and mishpetei phiv ('the judgments of His mouth') form a three-part catalog: extraordinary acts, authenticating signs, and spoken verdicts. God acts, God signals, God speaks.
6. The psalm addresses its audience: zera Avraham avdo ('seed of Abraham His servant') and benei Ya'aqov bechirav ('children of Jacob His chosen'). The terms avdo ('His servant') and bechirav ('His chosen ones') establish Israel's identity as rooted in divine election, not human merit. Abraham was chosen; Jacob was chosen. The psalm will demonstrate that God's faithfulness to these chosen ones drove the entire history.
7. The confession hu YHVH Eloheinu ('He is the LORD our God') is both identity statement and loyalty oath. The phrase be-khol ha-arets mishpatav ('in all the earth are His judgments') asserts universal jurisdiction — God's authority extends beyond Israel to the entire world. The God who chose Abraham is also the God of all nations.
8. The verb tsivvah ('He commanded') applied to a covenant word means God's promise has the force of a command — it will be fulfilled because God has ordered it so. The promise is not a wish or a hope but a divine decree.
9. The verb karat ('He cut') is the standard Hebrew for making a covenant — from the ritual of cutting an animal in two and passing between the halves (Genesis 15:9-18). The shevu'ato ('His oath') to Isaac (Genesis 26:3-4) means God bound Himself by oath to the second generation. The covenant is both cut and sworn — doubly binding.

10. The verb ya'amidehah ('He established it, He made it stand') uses amad ('to stand') in the Hiphil — God caused the covenant to stand firm for Jacob. The designation le-choq ('as a statute') gives the covenant the force of law. The phrase berit olam ('everlasting covenant') removes any time limit. Three patriarchs (Abraham, Isaac, Jacob), three covenant terms (covenant, oath, statute), three generations of confirmation.
11. The covenant content is now quoted: lekha etten et erets Kena'an ('to you I will give the land of Canaan'). The phrase chevel nachalatkhem ('the portion of your inheritance') uses chevel ('a measured cord, a boundary line, a lot') — the land is surveyed and assigned. The word nachalah ('inheritance') means the land is not earned or purchased but received as a family estate. This is the promise that drives the next thirty-four verses of history.
12. The phrase metei mispar ('people of number, countable people') means the patriarchs were so few you could count them. The word kim'at ('very few, hardly any') intensifies — they were almost nothing. And they were garim ('sojourners, resident aliens') in the very land promised to them. The contrast between the promise ('I will give you this land') and the reality (a handful of homeless wanderers) is the psalm's first exhibit of faith: God made the promise when fulfillment seemed impossible.
13. The verb vayyithalekhu ('they walked about, they wandered') describes the patriarchal life as perpetual motion — from nation to nation (mi-goi el goi), from kingdom to people (mi-mamlakhah el am acher). Abraham went from Ur to Canaan to Egypt; Isaac from Beer-sheba to Gerar; Jacob from Canaan to Haran to Egypt. The landless wandering is the context for God's protection described in the next verses.
14. God's protection of the vulnerable patriarchs: lo hinnia'ch adam le-oshqam ('He did not permit anyone to oppress them'). The verb asaq ('to oppress, to exploit') is the word for economic and political exploitation. God intervened directly: vayyokhach aleihem melakhim ('He rebuked kings on their behalf'). The specific references are Pharaoh (Genesis 12:17) and Abimelech (Genesis 20:3-7) — powerful rulers warned by God not to harm the patriarchs.
15. God's warning to the kings is quoted: al tigg'u vimshichai ('do not touch my anointed ones'). The word meshichai ('my anointed ones') is remarkable — the patriarchs are called 'anointed' (mashiach) even though they held no priestly or royal office. The anointing here means divine protection and designation. Similarly, nevi'ai ('my prophets') is applied to Abraham (see Genesis 20:7, where God calls Abraham a prophet). The patriarchs carried both sacral and prophetic status before either institution formally existed.
16. The verb vayyiqra ra'av ('He called a famine') personifies famine as a servant who comes when summoned. God calls famine the way He calls prophets. The phrase kol matteh lechem shavar ('He broke every staff of bread') uses the image of bread as a walking stick — the support structure of life. When God breaks it, people fall. This introduces the Joseph narrative: famine drives the family to Egypt.
17. The verb nimkar (Niphal of makhar, 'to sell') is passive — Joseph was sold, acted upon, made into property. The psalm holds both truths simultaneously: Joseph was a victim of his brothers' cruelty and an agent of God's providence. Neither truth cancels the other.
18. The phrase innu vakevel raglo ('they afflicted his foot with a fetter') describes Joseph's imprisonment. The parallel line — barzel ba'ah nafsho ('iron came into his soul') — is one of the most powerful lines in the psalm: the iron did not merely bind his body but penetrated his nephesh. The shackle is not just on the ankle but in the soul. The verse compresses years of unjust imprisonment into two lines of visceral poetry.
19. The ad et bo devaro ('until the time his word came') refers to the fulfillment of Joseph's prophetic dreams. The verb tserafathu ('it refined him, it tested him') uses tsaraph, the metallurgical term for smelting — heating metal to remove impurities. God's word was a furnace through which Joseph passed. The imprisonment was not pointless suffering but purification. The timing is precise: Joseph suffered until the appointed moment, and not one day longer.
20. Pharaoh (melekh, 'king') released Joseph (vayyattirehu, 'he loosed him'). The title moshel ammim ('ruler of peoples') emphasizes that the most powerful ruler in the ancient world obeyed the divine timetable. When God's word came to pass, even Pharaoh became an instrument of liberation.
21. Joseph's elevation: samo adon leveito ('he appointed him lord of his house') and moshel be-khol qinyano ('ruler over all his possessions'). The slave becomes the master. The word qinyan ('possessions, property') is the same word used in Psalm 104:24 for God's creatures — Pharaoh's entire estate is placed under Joseph's authority. The reversal from slave to ruler is the psalm's exhibit of divine providence.
22. Joseph's authority extends to imprisoning officials (le'sor sarav be-nafsho, 'to bind his princes by his desire') and instructing elders (u-zeqenav yechakkem, 'and his elders he makes wise'). The former slave now chains princes and teaches wisdom to those older than him. The reversal is complete — and it all serves the purpose of preserving the covenant family through famine.
23. The entry into Egypt is stated plainly: Yisra'el came to Mitsrayim, Jacob became a gar ('sojourner') in the erets Cham ('land of Ham'). Ham is the ancestor of Egypt in the Table of Nations (Genesis 10:6). The word gar ('resident alien, sojourner') echoes the patriarchal condition in verse 12 — still landless, still wandering, still dependent on God's promise.
24. The verb vayyepher ('He made fruitful') uses parah ('to be fruitful') — the Genesis 1:28 blessing ('be fruitful and multiply') is now being fulfilled in Egypt. God's people multiply until they are stronger (vayyaatsimehu) than their tsarav ('their adversaries, their oppressors'). The demographic growth that Pharaoh will find threatening (Exodus 1:9-10) is here credited to God's direct action.
25. A theologically challenging verse: hafakh libbam lisno ammo ('He turned their heart to hate His people'). God hardened the Egyptians' hearts — the same theme as God hardening Pharaoh in Exodus. The verb hafakh ('to turn, to overturn') means God redirected Egyptian sentiment. The purpose clause lehitnakel ba'avadav ('to deal craftily with His servants') refers to Pharaoh's schemes in Exodus 1: forced labor, infanticide. The psalm does not flinch from divine sovereignty over even hostile human actions.

- 26. Moses is avdo ('His servant') and Aaron is asher bachar bo ('whom He chose'). Both are instruments of divine sending (shalach) — Moses did not volunteer; he was sent. The psalm compresses the call narratives of Exodus 3-4 into a single line.
- 27. Moses and Aaron executed divrei ototav ('the matters of His signs') and mofetim ('wonders, portents'). The plagues are about to be recounted — the psalm will list seven of the ten plagues in a rearranged order. The phrase be-erets Cham ('in the land of Ham') again identifies Egypt by its ancestral name.
- 28. The plague sequence begins with darkness (the ninth plague in Exodus, here listed first). The verb shalach choshekh ('He sent darkness') echoes verse 26: God sends Moses, God sends darkness — both are agents dispatched on mission. The phrase ve-lo maru et devarav ('and they did not rebel against His word') is ambiguous — the subject could be Moses and Aaron (they obeyed) or the elements themselves (darkness obeyed its instructions). The rearranged plague order serves the psalm's literary structure rather than Exodus's historical sequence.
- 29. The first plague of Exodus (water to blood) appears as the second plague in the psalm's sequence. The verb hafakh ('He turned, He overturned') is the same verb used in verse 25 for turning hearts — God is a God of reversals. The fish dying (vayyamet et degatam) is a detail preserved from Exodus 7:21.
- 30. The verb sharats ('to swarm, to teem') is the creation verb from Genesis 1:20 — God's creative power now produces plagues. The tsepharde'im ('frogs') penetrate be-chadrei malkheihem ('in the inner rooms of their kings') — the most private, most protected spaces are invaded. No rank provides immunity.
- 31. God spoke (amar) — the plague comes by word, echoing creation by word in Genesis 1. The arov ('swarms, mixed swarm') and kinnim ('gnats, lice') represent the fourth and third plagues of Exodus. The phrase be-khol gevulam ('in all their territory') means no border provided protection.
- 32. The substitution natan gishmehem barad ('He gave their rains as hail') means God replaced the life-giving rain with destruction. The esh lehavot ('fire of flames, flaming fire') accompanies the hail (Exodus 9:24). The seventh plague combines water and fire — elements that should not coexist — in a supernatural display of divine power.
- 33. The hail's destruction targeted agriculture: vines (gapnam) and fig trees (te'enatam), the staples of Mediterranean cultivation, were struck. The verb yeshabber ('He shattered') means the trees were not merely damaged but broken — the destruction of years of growth in minutes.
- 34. Again God speaks (amar) and the plague arrives. The arbeh ('locusts') and yeleq ('young locusts, crawling locusts') — two stages of the same insect — arrived ein mispar ('without number'). The eighth plague is described with the same phrase used for sea creatures in Psalm 104:25. God's creative abundance is now directed toward judgment.
- 35. The locusts consumed kol esev ('every plant') and peri admatam ('the fruit of their soil'). After the hail destroyed the trees, the locusts consumed what remained on the ground. The agricultural economy of Egypt is systematically dismantled, plague by plague.
- 36. The climactic tenth plague: vayyakh kol bekhorei be-artsam ('He struck every firstborn in their land'). The word bekhorei ('firstborn') represents the family's future, and reshith le-khol onam ('the beginning of all their vigor') echoes Genesis 49:3 where Reuben is called reshith oni ('the beginning of my strength'). The firstborn is the family's hope embodied. God strikes that hope across the entire nation.
- 37. The exodus: vayyotsi'em be-khesef ve-zahav ('He brought them out with silver and gold') — the plundering of Egypt (Exodus 12:35-36) is framed as God's provision. The phrase ve-ein bishvatav koshel ('and there was none among His tribes who stumbled') means Israel left Egypt in full strength — no one was sick, weak, or unable to march. The entire nation departed in vigor.
- 38. The reversal is complete: Egypt, which had enslaved Israel, is now glad (samach) to see them leave. The fear has shifted — pachddam ('their dread') now falls upon the Egyptians. The oppressor begs the oppressed to go. The verb naphal ('fell') applied to pachad means the dread collapsed upon them like a physical weight.
- 39. The wilderness provision begins: God spread (paras) a cloud (anan) as a masakh ('a screen, a covering') — protection from the desert sun. At night, fire (esh) provided light and warmth. The pillar of cloud and fire from Exodus 13:21-22 is here described as God's personal provision of shelter — a tent of cloud by day, a lamp of fire by night.
- 40. The verb sha'al ('they asked') refers to the people's request for food. God responded with selav ('quail') and lechem shamayim ('bread of heaven, heavenly bread') — the manna. In Psalm 78, the request for food is framed as sinful complaint; here in Psalm 105, the negative element is omitted entirely. The psalm focuses on what God gave, not on how Israel asked.
- 41. The verb patach tsur ('He opened the rock') pictures God splitting stone to release water. The verb vayyazuvu ('they gushed, they flowed') indicates abundant, rushing water — not a trickle but a torrent. The phrase halekhu batsiyot nahar ('they went through the dry places as a river') means a river appeared where there was no water. The desert became irrigated by divine intervention. The reference is to Exodus 17:1-7 and Numbers 20:1-13.
- 42. The explanation for everything: ki zakhar et devar qodsho ('for He remembered His holy word'). The verb zakhar returns from verse 8 — God remembers. The covenant with Abraham (et Avraham avdo) is the engine of the exodus, the wilderness provision, and the conquest. Everything flows from one remembered promise.
- 43. The exodus is summarized as a joyful procession: be-sason ('with joy') and be-rinnah ('with shouts of gladness, with singing'). The people are ammo ('His people') and bechirav ('His chosen ones'). The psalm's version of the exodus has no complaining, no golden calf, no rebellion — only joy and divine faithfulness.

44. The fulfillment: vayyitten lahem artsot goyim ('He gave them the lands of the nations'). The promise of verse 11 ('to you I will give the land of Canaan') is now realized. The phrase amal le'ummim yirashu ('the labor of peoples they inherited') means Israel received cities, vineyards, and fields they did not build or plant (see Deuteronomy 6:10-11). The inheritance is unearned — it is grace, not achievement.
45. The final verse reveals the psalm's purpose: history is told not merely to inform but to motivate obedience. If God was this faithful in keeping His covenant, Israel must respond by keeping God's statutes. The gift demands a response. Grace precedes law, as always in the Hebrew Bible — God acts first, then calls for obedience.

Summary: The dark mirror of Psalm 105. Where 105 celebrated God's faithfulness with Israel's failures omitted, Psalm 106 catalogs those failures in unsparing detail: rebellion at the Red Sea, craving in the wilderness, jealousy of Moses, the golden calf, refusal to enter the land, joining Baal of Peor, grumbling at Meribah, failure to destroy the Canaanite nations, child sacrifice to idols. The psalm is a national confession that spans the entire history from Egypt to exile. Yet it opens and closes with praise, and its theological center is verse 44-45: despite everything, God heard their cry and remembered His covenant.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Psalm 106 is the most comprehensive confession of national sin in the Psalter. It functions as a communal penitential liturgy, likely used in exile or the early post-exilic period. The psalm's genius is its honesty: it does not excuse, minimize, or explain away Israel's failures. They forgot God's works (v. 13), they were jealous of Moses (v. 16), they exchanged their glory for an image of a bull (v. 20), they sacrificed their children to demons (v. 37). The language is brutal. Yet the psalm is framed by praise — it opens with halelu Yah and hodu la-YHVH ki tov ('praise the LORD, give thanks to the LORD for He is good') and closes with a doxology and halelu Yah. The confession exists within worship. Israel's worst moments are told in God's presence, and the telling itself is an act of faith: only a people who believe in God's chesed can afford to be this honest about their failures.*

Translation Friction: The psalm's assertion that God 'gave them into the hand of the nations' (v. 41) and 'many times He delivered them, but they were rebellious' (v. 43) frames the exile as the consequence of centuries of accumulated disobedience. This raises the question of whether the generation that experienced exile was being punished for the sins of their ancestors. The psalm's answer seems to be that the pattern of sin was continuous — each generation participated in it. The closing prayer in verse 47 ('Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us from among the nations') locates the psalm in the exile or diaspora, making it a prayer for restoration based not on Israel's merit but on God's character.

Connections: The psalm parallels Nehemiah 9:5-37, another great historical confession. The golden calf episode (vv. 19-23) draws on Exodus 32 and Deuteronomy 9. The Baal Peor incident (vv. 28-31) draws on Numbers 25. The child sacrifice reference (vv. 37-38) draws on 2 Kings 16:3 and Jeremiah 7:31. The closing doxology (v. 48) marks the end of Book IV of the Psalter. Verse 1 appears in 1 Chronicles 16:34-36 as part of David's song. The phrase 'He remembered His covenant' (v. 45) echoes Psalm 105:8 and Exodus 2:24.

¹Praise the LORD!

Give thanks to the LORD, for He is good,
for His faithful love endures forever.

²Who can recount the mighty acts of the LORD or declare all His praise?

³Blessed are those who maintain justice, who practice righteousness at all times.

⁴Remember me, O LORD, with the favor you show your people;
visit me with your salvation,

⁵that I may see the prosperity of your chosen ones, that I may rejoice in the gladness of your nation,
that I may boast with your inheritance.

⁶We have sinned along with our ancestors;
we have done wrong; we have acted wickedly.

⁷Our ancestors in Egypt did not grasp your wonders;
they did not remember the abundance of your faithful love, but rebelled at the sea, at the Sea of Reeds.

⁸Yet He saved them for His name's sake, to make His mighty power known.

⁹He rebuked the Sea of Reeds and it dried up;
He led them through the depths as through a desert.

¹⁰He saved them from the hand of the foe and redeemed them from the hand of the enemy.

¹¹The waters covered their adversaries;
not one of them survived.

¹²Then they believed His words;
they sang His praise.

¹³They quickly forgot His works;
they did not wait for His counsel.

¹⁴They craved intensely in the wilderness and tested God in the wasteland.

¹⁵He gave them what they asked for,
but sent a wasting disease into their souls.

¹⁶They were jealous of Moses in the camp, of Aaron, the holy one of the LORD.

¹⁷The earth opened and swallowed Dathan and covered the assembly of Abiram.

¹⁸Fire blazed among their assembly;
a flame consumed the wicked.

¹⁹They made a calf at Horeb and worshipped a cast image.

²⁰They exchanged their glory for the image of a bull that eats grass.

²¹They forgot God their savior, who had done great things in Egypt,

²²wonders in the land of Ham, terrible deeds at the Sea of Reeds.

²³So He said He would destroy them — had not Moses, His chosen one, stood in the breach before Him to turn His wrath from destroying them.

²⁴They rejected the desirable land;
they did not believe His word.

²⁵They grumbled in their tents;
they did not listen to the voice of the LORD.

²⁶So He raised His hand against them, swearing to make them fall in the wilderness,

²⁷to cast down their offspring among the nations and to scatter them across the lands.

²⁸They yoked themselves to Baal of Peor and ate sacrifices offered to the dead.

²⁹They provoked Him with their deeds, and a plague broke out among them.

³⁰Then Phinehas stood up and intervened, and the plague was stopped.

³¹It was credited to him as righteousness for all generations forever.

³²They angered God at the waters of Meribah, and it went badly for Moses on their account.

³³For they embittered his spirit, and he spoke rashly with his lips.

³⁴They did not destroy the peoples as the LORD had commanded them.

³⁵They mingled with the nations and learned their practices.

³⁶They served their idols, which became a snare to them.

³⁷They sacrificed their sons and their daughters to demons.

³⁸They poured out innocent blood —
the blood of their sons and daughters, whom they sacrificed to the idols of Canaan — and the land was polluted with blood.

³⁹They defiled themselves by their deeds and prostituted themselves by their practices.

⁴⁰Then the anger of the LORD burned against His people, and He abhorred His own inheritance.

⁴¹He gave them into the hand of the nations, and those who hated them ruled over them.

⁴²Their enemies oppressed them,
and they were subdued under their hand.

⁴³Many times He rescued them, but they were rebellious in their purposes and sank low through their iniquity.

⁴⁴But He looked on their distress
when He heard their cry.

⁴⁵He remembered His covenant for their sake and relented according to the abundance of His faithful love.

⁴⁶He caused all their captors to show them compassion.

⁴⁷Save us, O LORD our God, and gather us from among the nations, that we may give thanks to your holy name and boast in your praise.

⁴⁸Blessed be the LORD, the God of Israel,
from everlasting to everlasting!
And let all the people say, 'Amen!'
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The psalm opens with the liturgical formula halelu Yah and the confession hodu la-YHVH ki tov ki le-olam chasdo ('give thanks to the LORD for He is good, for His faithful love is forever'). This exact phrase appears in Psalms 107:1, 118:1, 136:1, and 1 Chronicles 16:34. The confession of God's goodness and eternal chesed precedes the confession of Israel's sin — grace comes first, even in penitential liturgy.
2. The rhetorical question mi yemallel gevurot YHVH ('who can speak the mighty acts of the LORD?') acknowledges that God's acts exceed human capacity to narrate them. The verb mallel ('to speak, to recount') means that even the longest psalm cannot exhaust the subject.
3. The beatitude ashrei shomerei mishpat ('blessed are the keepers of justice') sets the standard that the rest of the psalm will show Israel failing to meet. The phrase oseh tzedakah be-khol et ('doing righteousness at all times') is the ideal — continuous, unfailing obedience. The psalm will now demonstrate that Israel achieved this at almost no point in their history.
4. The psalmist makes a personal request within the communal psalm: zokhreini YHVH ('remember me, LORD'). The verb paqdeini ('visit me') uses paqad, which means to attend to, to take note of, to act on behalf of. The psalmist asks to be included in the favor (ratson) God shows His people and in the salvation (yeshu'ah) God provides.

5. Three purpose clauses: lir'ot ('to see'), lismo'ach ('to rejoice'), lehithallel ('to boast'). The psalmist wants to witness God's goodness to Israel, participate in the nation's joy, and share in the glory of being God's nachalah ('inheritance, possession'). This personal prayer frames the communal confession that follows.
6. The three sin-verbs (chata, avah, rasha) correspond to the three sin-nouns in Psalm 103:10-12 (chet, avon, pesha). What Psalm 103 celebrated God forgiving, Psalm 106 confesses Israel committing. The two psalms are in theological conversation.
7. The first failure: lo hiskilu nifle'otekha ('they did not understand your wonders') — Israel saw the plagues but did not comprehend their meaning. The phrase lo zakheru et rov chasadekha ('they did not remember the multitude of your faithful loves') uses the plural of chesed — God's faithful love was manifold, and Israel forgot all of it. The rebellion at the yam suf ('Sea of Reeds') refers to Exodus 14:11-12, where Israel complained that Moses had brought them to die in the wilderness.
8. The pattern that will repeat throughout the psalm: Israel sins, yet God saves. The motivation is le-ma'an shemo ('for His name's sake') — not for Israel's merit but for God's own reputation. The phrase lehodi'a et gevurato ('to make known His might') means the salvation was a display of divine power intended for witness beyond Israel.
9. God rebuked (vayyig'ar) the sea as He rebuked the waters in Psalm 104:7 — the same authority over chaos. The tehomot ('depths, abysses') through which Israel walked became like a midbar ('desert, wilderness') — dry ground in the middle of the ocean. The imagery collapses the distinction between land and sea: where God commands, any terrain becomes walkable.
10. The verb vayyoshi'em ('He saved them') and vayyig'alem ('He redeemed them') pair salvation with redemption. The go'el concept from Psalm 103:4 returns — God acts as kinsman-redeemer, buying Israel back from the enemy's grasp.
11. The sea that parted for Israel closed over their enemies: echad mehem lo notar ('not one of them remained'). The totality is emphatic — the destruction was complete. The same waters that served as walls for Israel became a grave for Egypt.
12. Brief, conditional faith: vayyaaminu vidvarav ('they believed His words') — but only after seeing the miracle. The singing (yashiru tehillato) refers to the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15). The psalm will immediately show how short-lived this faith was.
13. The verb miharu ('they hurried') modifies the forgetting — they forgot quickly (shahekhu ma'asav). The phrase lo chikku la'atsato ('they did not wait for His counsel') means impatience drove their rebellion. They wanted answers and provision on their schedule, not God's. Speed of forgetting is the measure of shallow faith.
14. The phrase vayyit'avvu ta'avah ('they desired a desire, they craved a craving') is an intensified form — the cognate accusative emphasizes the force of the desire. The reference is to Numbers 11:4-6, the craving for meat. The verb vayyenassu ('they tested') means they put God on trial, demanding proof of His ability and willingness to provide.
15. The word razon is debated — it could mean physical illness (Numbers 11:33, where a plague struck those who ate the quail) or spiritual emptiness. Both readings are theologically productive. The principle is the same: desire fulfilled outside God's timing and will produces not satisfaction but wasting.
16. The verb vayyeqan'u ('they were jealous') introduces the Korah rebellion (Numbers 16). The jealousy targeted Moses' authority and Aaron's priestly status as qedosh YHVH ('the holy one of the LORD'). The title qedosh designates Aaron as set apart by God — the jealousy is ultimately against God's appointments, not merely human leaders.
17. The earth itself executed judgment: tiftach erets vattiblah ('the earth opened and swallowed Dathan'). The reference is Numbers 16:31-33. The verb bala ('to swallow') pictures the ground consuming the rebels like a mouth. The addat Aviram ('assembly of Abiram') was covered (vattekhas) — buried alive. The creation that Psalm 104 celebrated now serves as instrument of judgment.
18. The fire (esh) that burned among the rebels (Numbers 16:35) is here presented as divinely directed: lehavah tellahet resha'im ('a flame devoured the wicked'). The 250 men who offered unauthorized incense were consumed by fire from the LORD.
19. The golden calf: ya'asu egel be-Chorev ('they made a calf at Horeb'). The mountain of revelation became the mountain of idolatry. The massekah ('cast image, molten idol') is the work of human hands substituted for the invisible God. The verb vayyishtachavu ('they bowed down') — the posture of worship directed toward a metal animal.
20. The word tavnit ('form, pattern, image') means they did not merely make an idol but created a representation — they reduced the unrepresentable God to a visible form. The specification okhel esev ('eating grass') is the psalm's contemptuous detail: the 'god' they made was herbivorous.
21. The verb shakhekhu ('they forgot') echoes verse 13 — forgetting is Israel's habitual sin. The God they forgot is El moshi'am ('God their savior, the God who delivers them'). The irony is extreme: they forgot the One who had just done gedolot ('great things') in Egypt. The proximity between salvation and forgetting measures the shallowness of Israel's memory.
22. The nifla'ot ('wonders') in Egypt and nora'ot ('terrible things, awesome acts') at the Sea of Reeds are the very events the psalm described in verses 7-11. The repetition emphasizes the magnitude of what Israel forgot.
23. The image of standing in the breach (perets) became a standard metaphor for intercessory prayer. Ezekiel 22:30 uses the same image: God sought someone to stand in the gap, and found no one. Moses is the paradigmatic intercessor — the one person whose prayer could halt divine judgment.

24. The verb vayyim'asu ('they rejected, they despised') is applied to erets chemdah ('the desirable land, the land of delight'). The reference is Numbers 13-14: the spies returned with a report of giants, and the people refused to enter. The phrase lo he'eminu lidvaro ('they did not believe His word') identifies the root cause: unbelief. God had promised the land; they did not believe the promise. The rejection of the land is ultimately a rejection of God's word.
25. The verb vayyeragenu ('they grumbled, they murmured') uses ragan, a word for discontented whispering — the kind of complaint that spreads through a camp tent by tent. The phrase be-oholeihem ('in their tents') locates the grumbling in private spaces — it was not public protest but corrosive private complaint. They would not listen (lo shame'u) to God's voice.
26. The phrase vayyissa yado ('He raised His hand') is an oath gesture — God swore with an uplifted hand. The content of the oath: lehappil otam bamidbar ('to make them fall in the wilderness'). This is the judgment of Numbers 14:29-35: the exodus generation would die in the wilderness and never enter the land.
27. The judgment extends beyond the wilderness generation: u-lehappil zar'am baggoyim ('to make their seed fall among the nations'). The verb lezarotam ('to scatter them') points to the exile — the diaspora is foreshadowed here as a consequence of the same pattern of unbelief that characterized the wilderness generation. The psalm reads exile as the long-delayed consequence of Kadesh Barnea.
28. The verb vayyitsamdu ('they yoked themselves, they attached themselves') uses tsamad, a word for binding or yoking — Israel bound itself to a foreign deity the way an ox is yoked to a plow. Ba'al Pe'or was a Moabite deity associated with the incident of Numbers 25. The phrase zivchei metim ('sacrifices of the dead') means either sacrifices offered to dead gods (idols) or sacrifices associated with death cults. Either way, Israel ate what was offered to that which is not God.
29. The verb vayyakh'isu ('they provoked, they angered') uses ka'as, the word for deep vexation. The ma'alaleihem ('their deeds, their practices') refers to the sexual and cultic participation with Moab. The maggefah ('plague, striking') that broke out killed 24,000 (Numbers 25:9).
30. Phinehas (Pinchas) is the second intercessor after Moses. The verb vayefalleh ('he intervened, he judged, he interceded') can mean judicial execution or intercessory prayer — in Numbers 25:7-8, Phinehas drove a spear through the Israelite man and the Midianite woman. The plague stopped (vatte'atsar) because of his decisive action. Like Moses in verse 23, one person's intervention saved the nation.
31. The phrase vattechasev lo litsedaqah ('it was counted to him as righteousness') uses the same language as Genesis 15:6 (Abraham 'believed the LORD, and He credited it to him as righteousness'). Phinehas' act of zeal was evaluated by God as tsedaqah — righteous action. The scope is le-dor va-dor ad olam ('to generation and generation forever'). Numbers 25:12-13 confirms this: God gave Phinehas a covenant of perpetual priesthood.
32. The mei Merivah ('waters of Meribah/Strife') refers to Numbers 20:1-13. The people's quarreling (riv) at Meribah provoked God, but the consequence fell on Moses: vayyera le-Mosheh ba'avuram ('it went badly for Moses because of them'). Moses struck the rock instead of speaking to it and was barred from entering the land. The people's sin caused Moses' punishment — collective sin has individual casualties.
33. The verb himru ('they embittered, they rebelled against') has God's spirit as its object in some readings, or Moses' spirit in others. The result: vayvatte bishfatav ('he spoke rashly with his lips'). Moses, the paradigmatic intercessor, was provoked into rash speech. The phrase acknowledges that even the greatest leader can be broken by sustained rebellion. Numbers 20:10 ('Listen, you rebels!') is the rash speech in view.
34. The scene shifts to the conquest and settlement period. Israel failed to carry out the herem ('devoted destruction') commanded in Deuteronomy 7:1-2. The verb lo hishmidu ('they did not destroy') is a direct indictment of disobedience.
35. The verb vayyit'arevu ('they mingled, they mixed') indicates social and cultural integration. The result: vayyilmedu ma'aseihem ('they learned their practices'). The knowledge was not neutral — it was adoption. Israel absorbed the religious practices of the surrounding nations. What Deuteronomy warned against (7:3-4) happened precisely as predicted.
36. The atsabbeihem ('their idols') is from the root atsav ('to shape, to form, to grieve') — idols are both shaped things and sources of grief. The metaphor moqesh ('a snare, a trap') means the idols that seemed harmless became instruments of entrapment. Israel could not free itself once caught.
37. The darkest verse in the psalm: vayyizbechu et beneihem ve-et benoteihem ('they sacrificed their sons and their daughters'). The recipients are lashedim ('to demons') — the word shed appears only here and in Deuteronomy 32:17 in the Hebrew Bible. Child sacrifice is attested in 2 Kings 16:3, 17:17, and 21:6. The psalm presents it as the logical terminus of idolatry: begin by serving idols, end by killing your children for them.
38. The phrase dam naqi ('innocent blood') is the legal term for the blood of those who have committed no crime. The children are innocent; their blood pollutes the land. The verb vattechenaf ('it was polluted, it was defiled') uses chanef, meaning the land itself became profane, contaminated. In Leviticus 18:25, the land vomits out inhabitants who defile it. The psalm traces the path from idolatry to child sacrifice to land pollution to exile — a chain of escalating defilement.
39. The verb vayyitme'u ('they defiled themselves') uses tame ('unclean, impure') — ritual and moral defilement. The verb vayyiznu ('they prostituted themselves') uses zanah ('to commit sexual immorality, to be unfaithful'). In prophetic literature, idolatry is consistently described as sexual infidelity — Israel is God's wife, and worship of other gods is adultery. The psalm uses the same metaphor.
40. The phrase vayyichar af YHVH ('the anger of the LORD burned') is the standard expression for divine wrath. The word vayyeta'ev ('He abhorred, He found detestable') is extreme — God found His own nachalatoh ('His inheritance, His possession') repulsive. The people God chose, the people God redeemed, the people God loved became detestable to Him through their sin. This is the low point of the psalm.

41. The verb vayyittenem ('He gave them') means God actively handed Israel over to foreign power. This is the theology of the book of Judges compressed: Israel's subjection to foreign nations is not random political misfortune but divine judgment. The phrase vayyimshelu vahem son'eihem ('their enemies ruled over them') describes the exile as God's deliberate act.
42. The verb vayyilchatsum ('they oppressed them, they pressed them') uses lachats, the same word used for Egypt's oppression of Israel in Exodus 3:9. The cycle is tragic: the people God freed from oppression now experience oppression again — this time as divine judgment, not Pharaoh's cruelty.
43. The phrase pe'amim rabbot yatsilem ('many times He delivered them') summarizes the entire Judges cycle: sin, oppression, crying out, deliverance — repeated endlessly. The conjunction ve-hemmah yamru va'atsatam ('but they rebelled in their plans') shows the pattern was unbreakable from the human side. The verb vayyamokku ('they sank low, they were brought low') uses makakh, a word for decay and decline. Each cycle of rebellion brought Israel lower.
44. The great 'but': vayyar batsar lahem ('He saw their distress'). Despite everything — the golden calf, the grumbling, the idolatry, the child sacrifice — when Israel cried out, God saw and heard. The verb shom'o et rinnatam ('when He heard their cry') echoes Exodus 2:24 — the same God who heard the cry in Egypt hears the cry in exile. God's responsiveness outlasts Israel's rebellion.
45. The verb nacham applied to God is theologically significant: it does not mean God made a mistake and corrected it, but that God's response to Israel shifted from judgment to mercy. The trigger was not Israel's repentance but God's own covenant-faithfulness. chesed precedes and produces repentance; it does not wait for it.
46. God arranged compassion (rachamim) for Israel even in captivity: vayyitten otam le-rachamim lifnei kol shoveihem ('He gave them to compassion before all who captured them'). The word shoveihem ('their captors') indicates exile is in view. Even foreign captors were moved to pity — not by Israel's appeal but by God's intervention.
47. The psalm turns to direct petition: hoshi'enu YHVH Eloheinu ('save us, LORD our God'). The verb qabbe-tsenu min haggoyim ('gather us from among the nations') is the prayer of the diaspora — God's people are scattered and need to be regathered. The purpose of the gathering is worship: lehodot le-shem qodshekha ('to give thanks to your holy name'). Israel wants to be saved not merely for comfort but for praise. This verse appears in 1 Chronicles 16:35.
48. This verse serves a dual function: it closes Psalm 106 and marks the end of Book IV (Psalms 90-106). The doxology formula appears in 1 Chronicles 16:36. The transition from confession to doxology enacts the psalm's theology: sin is real, but God's blessedness is the final word.

Summary: The opening psalm of Book V, Psalm 107 is a hymn of thanksgiving built around four scenes of distress and deliverance: wanderers lost in the desert (vv. 4-9), prisoners in darkness (vv. 10-16), the sick near death (vv. 17-22), and sailors in a storm (vv. 23-32). Each scene follows the same four-part pattern: distress, crying out to God, deliverance, and a call to give thanks. A wisdom epilogue (vv. 33-43) reflects on God's sovereign reversal of human fortunes. The refrain 'Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love' appears four times, once for each scene.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Psalm 107 is one of the most structurally elegant poems in the Psalter. The fourfold repetition of distress-cry-rescue-thanksgiving creates a liturgical rhythm that is almost musical. Each section has two refrains: 'They cried out to the LORD in their trouble, and He delivered them from their distress' and 'Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love and His wonders for the children of humanity.' The repetition is not monotonous but cumulative — each scene adds to the evidence that God's chesed operates everywhere: in deserts, in prisons, in sickbeds, on the open sea. The psalm argues inductively: here is one case, here is another, here is another, here is another — therefore God's faithful love endures forever. The wisdom epilogue then generalizes: God turns rivers into deserts and deserts into springs, brings down the proud and lifts up the needy. The psalm's audience is universal — these are not uniquely Israelite experiences but human ones.*

Translation Friction: The placement as the opening psalm of Book V is significant. Book IV ended with a prayer for gathering from the nations (106:47); Book V opens with a description of the gathered ones giving thanks (107:1-3). Whether this represents actual post-exilic composition or careful editorial arrangement is debated. The four scenes may represent literal experiences (travelers, prisoners, sick people, sailors) or may function metaphorically for Israel's exile and return. The sick who are afflicted 'because of their transgression' (v. 17) explicitly links suffering to sin, while the other three scenes do not — a tension the psalm leaves unresolved.

Connections: The opening formula hodu la-YHVH ki tov ki le-olam chasdo ('give thanks to the LORD for He is good, for His faithful love endures forever') connects to Psalms 106:1, 118:1, and 136:1. The gathering from east, west, north, and south (v. 3) echoes Isaiah 43:5-6. The storm scene (vv. 23-30) has parallels to Jonah 1. The wisdom epilogue (vv. 33-43) echoes Hannah's Song (1 Samuel 2:1-10) and the Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55) in its theme of divine reversal. Jesus' stilling of the storm (Mark 4:35-41) echoes verse 29: 'He stilled the storm to a whisper.'

- ¹Give thanks to the LORD, for He is good,
for His faithful love endures forever.
- ²Let the redeemed of the LORD say so,
those He redeemed from the hand of the foe,
- ³and gathered from the lands,
from east and from west,
from north and from the sea.
- ⁴They wandered in the wilderness, on a desert road;
they found no city to settle in.
- ⁵Hungry and thirsty,
their life was ebbing away.
- ⁶Then they cried out to the LORD in their trouble, and He delivered them from their distress.
- ⁷He led them by a straight road to reach a city where they could settle.
- ⁸Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love and His wonders for the children of humanity.
- ⁹For He satisfies the longing soul and fills the hungry soul with good things.
- ¹⁰Those who sat in darkness and deep shadow, prisoners in affliction and chains,
- ¹¹because they rebelled against the words of God and despised the counsel of the Most High.
- ¹²He humbled their hearts through hard labor;
they stumbled, with no one to help.
- ¹³Then they cried out to the LORD in their trouble,
and He saved them from their distress.
- ¹⁴He brought them out of darkness and deep shadow and tore apart their chains.
- ¹⁵Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love
and His wonders for the children of humanity.

¹⁶For He shattered gates of bronze and cut through bars of iron.

¹⁷Fools — because of their rebellious ways and because of their iniquities — suffered affliction.

¹⁸They loathed all food and drew near to the gates of death.

¹⁹Then they cried out to the LORD in their trouble,
and He saved them from their distress.

²⁰He sent His word and healed them and rescued them from the pit.

²¹Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love
and His wonders for the children of humanity.

²²Let them offer sacrifices of thanksgiving and recount His deeds with shouts of joy.

²³Those who went down to the sea in ships, doing business on the great waters,

²⁴They saw the works of the LORD,
His wonders in the deep.

²⁵He spoke and raised a stormy wind that lifted the waves high.

²⁶They rose to the heavens, they plunged to the depths;
their courage melted in their peril.

²⁷They staggered and swayed like drunkards, and all their skill was swallowed up.

²⁸Then they cried out to the LORD in their trouble, and He brought them out of their distress.

²⁹He stilled the storm to a whisper, and the waves were hushed.

³⁰They were glad when the waters grew calm, and He guided them to their desired harbor.

³¹Let them give thanks to the LORD for His faithful love
and His wonders for the children of humanity.

³²Let them exalt Him in the assembly of the people and praise Him in the council of the elders.

³³He turns rivers into desert and springs of water into thirsty ground,

^{34a}a fruitful land into a salt waste,
because of the wickedness of its inhabitants.

³⁵He turns desert into pools of water and parched land into springs.

³⁶He settles the hungry there, and they establish a city to dwell in.

³⁷They sow fields and plant vineyards that yield a fruitful harvest.

³⁸He blesses them and they multiply greatly,
and He does not let their livestock diminish.

³⁹When they are diminished and brought low through oppression, trouble, and sorrow,

⁴⁰He pours contempt on nobles and makes them wander in trackless waste.

⁴¹But He lifts the needy out of affliction and makes their families like flocks.

⁴²The upright see it and rejoice, and all wickedness shuts its mouth.

⁴³Whoever is wise, let him observe these things and consider the faithful love of the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The identical opening to Psalm 106:1. The phrase ki le-olam chasdo ('for His faithful love is forever') is the thesis the psalm will prove four times over. Each of the four scenes will demonstrate that chesed is not a theological abstraction but an operational reality in specific human crises.
2. The ge'ulei YHVH ('the redeemed of the LORD') are those who have experienced God's go'el action — His kinsman-redeemer rescue. The verb ge'alam ('He redeemed them') and the noun ge'ulei share the same root. The redeemed are the ones qualified to give thanks: they have firsthand testimony.
3. The ingathering from four directions: mi-mizrach ('from the east'), u-mi-ma'arav ('from the west'), mi-tsafon ('from the north'), u-mi-yam ('from the sea'). The last term is literally 'from the sea' (yam), which in Hebrew directional language means 'south' (the direction of the Red Sea from Israel). The four compass points indicate universal regathering — wherever God's people were scattered, He brought them back.
4. Scene one begins: lost travelers. The verb ta'u ('they wandered, they strayed') indicates purposeless, directionless movement. The bamidbar bishimon derekh ('in the wilderness, on a wasteland path') places them in terrain without landmarks. The phrase ir moshav lo matsa'u ('a city of habitation they did not find') means they had no destination, no shelter, no community. They were utterly lost.
5. The re'evim gam tseme'im ('hungry and also thirsty') describes total deprivation. The phrase nafsham bahem tit'attaf ('their soul within them was fainting') uses the verb ataf ('to be feeble, to faint, to be covered over'). The nephesh — the life-force — was failing. They were dying.
6. The first occurrence of the cry-and-rescue refrain: vayyits'aqu el YHVH batsar lahem ('they cried to the LORD in their distress'). The verb tsa'aq ('to cry out') is the exodus verb — the same cry Israel raised in Egypt (Exodus 2:23). The response: mi-metsuqoteihem yatsilem ('from their straits He rescued them'). The metsuqah ('strait, distress, tight place') is a narrow passage from which only God can extract them.
7. God's response to the lost: vayyaddrikhem be-derekh yesharah ('He led them by a straight path'). The verb darak in the Hiphil means to guide someone's feet onto a path. The derekh yesharah ('straight road') contrasts with the aimless wandering of verse 4. The destination: ir moshav ('a city of habitation') — the very thing they could not find, God provided.

8. The first occurrence of the thanksgiving refrain: yodu la-YHWH chasdo ve-nifle'otav livnei adam. The beneficiaries are not 'the children of Israel' but livnei adam ('the children of humanity, human beings'). The psalm's scope is universal — God's chesed operates for all people, not only the covenant nation.
9. God satisfies (hisbia) the nephesh shoqeqah ('the parched soul, the longing soul') and fills (mille) the nephesh re'evah ('the hungry soul') with tov ('good, goodness'). The scene closes with the hunger and thirst of verse 5 fully resolved. The satisfied soul is the evidence of chesed.
10. Scene two: prisoners. The yoshevei choshekh ve-tsalmavet ('those sitting in darkness and death-shadow') describes people confined in dungeons where no light reaches. The word tsalmavet is a compound of tsel ('shadow') and mavet ('death') — the shadow cast by death itself. They are asirei oni u-varzel ('prisoners of affliction and iron'). The iron is literal; the affliction is both physical and spiritual.
11. The cause of imprisonment: ki himru imrei El ('they rebelled against the words of God'). The verb marah ('to rebel, to be bitter') indicates defiance. The atsut Elyon ('counsel of the Most High') was scorned (na'atsu, from na'ats, 'to despise, to scorn'). This is the one scene where sin is explicitly named as the cause of distress.
12. The verb vayyakhna ('He humbled') uses kana ('to bow down, to subdue') — God brought their hearts low through suffering. The amal ('labor, toil, hardship') broke them. The phrase kashelu ve-ein ozer ('they stumbled and there was no helper') describes the moment of total helplessness that precedes the cry for help.
13. The second occurrence of the cry-refrain. The verb changes slightly from yatsilem ('He delivered,' v. 6) to yoshi'em ('He saved') — the language intensifies with each scene.
14. God's action reverses the imprisonment of verse 10: yotsi'em me-choshekh ve-tsalmavet ('He brought them out of darkness and death-shadow') and u-moseroteihem yenattiq ('their bonds He tore apart'). The verb nataq ('to tear, to pull apart, to break') means the chains were not unlocked but ripped — divine force overcomes iron.
15. The thanksgiving refrain, second occurrence. Identical wording to verse 8. The repetition builds the psalm's case: chesed is not episodic but patterned.
16. The specifics of the rescue: shibbar daltot nechoshet ('He shattered doors of bronze') and u-verichei varzel gidde'a ('bars of iron He cut through'). The verbs shibbar ('to shatter') and gidde'a ('to cut, to hew') describe violent destruction of the strongest materials available for imprisonment. No dungeon can hold those God decides to free.
17. Scene three: the sick. The evilim ('fools') are not intellectually deficient but morally perverse — in wisdom literature, the fool rejects God's instruction. The cause is explicit: mi-derekh pish'am ('because of their rebellious way') and me-avonoteihem ('because of their iniquities'). The suffering (yit'annu, 'they were afflicted') is presented as a consequence of moral folly.
18. The physical symptom: kol okhel teta'ev nafsham ('every food their soul abhorred') — total loss of appetite, the body refusing sustenance. The phrase vayyaggi'u ad sha'arei mavet ('they reached the gates of death') means they arrived at death's threshold. The sha'arei mavet ('gates of death') is a spatial metaphor — death is a walled city, and the sick person stands at its entrance.
19. Third occurrence of the cry-refrain. The same words, the same pattern — the repetition is the point. The pattern does not change because God does not change.
20. God heals by sending His word: yishlach devaro ve-yirpa'em ('He sent His word and healed them'). The word (davar) is the agent of healing — God does not need to be physically present; His word carries His power. The verb vimallate ('He rescued') uses malat ('to escape, to deliver') from shechitotam ('their destructions, their pits'). The word is both physician and rescuer.
21. Third occurrence of the thanksgiving refrain. The evidence accumulates: lost travelers, prisoners, the dying — all rescued by the same chesed.
22. The healed are called to bring zivchei todah ('sacrifices of thanksgiving') — the todah offering of Leviticus 7:12-15, which accompanies a testimony of deliverance. The verb yesapperu ('let them recount') means the sacrifice is paired with public testimony. Worship is both ritual and narrative: you bring an offering and tell the story.
23. Scene four: sailors. The yordei hayyam ba-oniyyot ('those who go down to the sea in ships') are merchants and traders. The phrase ose melakhah be-mayim rabbim ('doing work on great waters') describes commercial seafaring. The sea in Hebrew thought is the domain of chaos — to travel on it is to enter the realm of the tehom.
24. Sailors witness God's power firsthand: hemmah ra'u ma'asei YHWH ('they saw the works of the LORD'). The bimtsulah ('in the deep, in the abyss') locates the wonders in the most dangerous environment — the deep sea where human power means nothing.
25. God commands the storm: vayyomer vayya'amed ruach se'arah ('He spoke and He made a storm wind stand'). The verb amad ('to stand') in the Hiphil means God stationed the wind like a soldier at a post. The waves (gallav) rose at God's command. The storm is not random weather but divine action.
26. The violent motion of the ship: ya'alu shamayim ('they go up to the heavens') and yerdu tehomot ('they go down to the depths'). The extremes — sky and abyss — describe the terrifying pitch of a ship in heavy seas. The phrase nafsham bera'ah titmogag ('their soul in calamity melts') uses mogag ('to melt, to dissolve') — their courage liquefied.

- 27. The sailors yachogu ve-yanuu kashshikkor ('they stagger and sway like a drunkard') — seasoned seamen reduced to helplessness. The phrase ve-khol chokmatam titballa ('and all their wisdom is swallowed up') means their professional expertise is consumed by the chaos. The sea has devoured their competence. This is the moment of complete human inadequacy.
- 28. Fourth and final occurrence of the cry-refrain. The verb shifts again: yotsi'em ('He brought them out') — the exodus verb. Every rescue in the psalm recapitulates the original exodus.
- 29. The word demamah is one of the great theological words of the Hebrew Bible. It is the sound of God's presence when all competing noise ceases. The storm-to-stillness movement is not merely meteorological but spiritual: chaos yields to divine peace.
- 30. Joy returns: vayyismechu ki yishttoqu ('they rejoiced because they were quiet'). The verb shaqat means the waters settled. God then guided them (vayyanchem) to mechoz cheftsam ('the harbor of their desire') — the destination they were trying to reach. The rescue is not merely survival but arrival. God does not just save from death; He brings to destination.
- 31. Fourth and final occurrence of the thanksgiving refrain. The case is complete: four scenes, four cries, four rescues, four calls to thank. The evidence for chesed is overwhelming.
- 32. The sailors' thanksgiving is to be public: bi-qehal am ('in the assembly of the people') and be-moshav zeqenim ('in the seat of the elders'). The testimony is not private but communal — it is given in the formal gathering where decisions are made and justice is administered. The elders hear the sailor's story and recognize God's hand.
- 33. The wisdom epilogue begins. God reverses landscapes: neharot le-midbar ('rivers to wilderness') and motsa'ei mayim le-tsimma'on ('springs of water to drought'). The God who provided water from rocks (Psalm 105:41) can also remove water from rivers. Divine sovereignty operates in both directions.
- 34. Fertile land becomes melechah ('salt flats, barren salt ground') — the landscape of Sodom after its destruction. The cause: me-ra'at yoshvei vah ('because of the wickedness of those dwelling in it'). The land's condition reflects its inhabitants' character. Ecological devastation is presented as moral consequence.
- 35. The reversal in the other direction: midbar la-agam mayim ('desert to a pool of water') and erets tsiyyah le-motsa'ei mayim ('dry land to springs of water'). God transforms in both directions — from fertility to wasteland (vv. 33-34) and from wasteland to fertility (v. 35). The power is the same; the direction depends on God's purpose.
- 36. God settles (vayyoshev) the hungry (re'evim) in the transformed land. They build an ir moshav ('a city of habitation') — the same phrase from verse 4 and verse 7. What the lost wanderers could not find, God creates anew. The hungry of this verse mirror the hungry of verse 5, but now they have a home.
- 37. Agriculture returns: fields (sador) are sown, vineyards (keramim) are planted, and the yield is peri tevu'ah ('fruit of produce, a productive harvest'). The cycle of fertility is restored by divine initiative.
- 38. The blessing echoes Genesis 1:28: vayvarekem vayyirbu me'od ('He blessed them and they multiplied greatly'). Livestock (behemtam) are also protected: lo yam'it ('He does not diminish them'). Fertility extends to both human and animal populations.
- 39. The cycle turns again: vayyim'atu vayyashochu ('they are diminished and brought low'). The causes are otser ('oppression, restraint'), ra'ah ('calamity, evil'), and yagon ('sorrow, grief'). The prosperity of verses 36-38 does not last — the human condition includes reversal and loss.
- 40. God's sovereignty extends to the powerful: shofekh buz al nedivim ('He pours contempt on nobles'). The nedivim ('nobles, princes, generous ones') are humiliated. The phrase vayyat'em be-tohu lo darekh ('He makes them wander in chaos without a path') uses tohu — the primordial chaos of Genesis 1:2. The powerful are cast into the formless void. This echoes Job 12:21-24.
- 41. The reversal: vaysagev evyon me-oni ('He sets the needy on high from affliction'). The verb sagav means to place in an inaccessibly high position — the needy are elevated beyond the reach of their oppressors. The families multiply katstsosn ('like flocks') — the imagery of pastoral abundance. The God who humbles nobles elevates the destitute.
- 42. The moral response: the yesharim ('upright ones') see God's reversals and rejoice. The avlah ('wickedness, injustice') personified as shutting its mouth (qafetsah piha, 'it closes its mouth') means wickedness is silenced — it has no argument, no defense, no rebuttal. When God acts, evil has nothing to say.
- 43. The closing verse is identical in tone to Hosea 14:10 ('Who is wise? Let him understand these things'). Both passages end a complex theological text with a wisdom invitation: the material has been presented; now the reader must discern its meaning. The psalm does not force its conclusion — it invites comprehension.

Summary: A composite psalm attributed to David, formed by combining Psalm 57:8-12 (vv. 1-6) and Psalm 60:7-14 (vv. 7-14). The first half is a hymn of praise — David's heart is steadfast, he will awaken the dawn with music, he will praise God among the nations. The second half is a prayer for military victory — God has spoken from His sanctuary, allotting the territories of Israel, and David asks God to march with his armies against Edom. The combination creates a movement from worship to warfare, from praise to petition.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 108 is the clearest example of editorial composition in the Psalter — it is assembled from two pre-existing psalms and presented as a new unity. This is not plagiarism but liturgical adaptation: the editor selected a praise section and a military prayer and joined them for a specific occasion. The seam is visible but the logic is sound: praise prepares for petition. A heart that is steadfast in worship (v. 1) is the heart that can ask God for military help (v. 12). The psalm demonstrates that Israel's worship life was not static — existing texts were rearranged, recombined, and reapplied to new situations.

Translation Friction: The composite nature raises questions about authorship: if le-David ('of David') heads the psalm but the material comes from two other Davidic psalms, what does the superscription mean? The answer is likely that the attribution claims Davidic origin for the source material, and the editor combined them under that same attribution. The military language in the second half — God 'casting His sandal' on Edom, Moab as a 'washbasin' — uses imagery that can seem crude, but these are ancient expressions of sovereign territorial claim, drawn from legal and ritual conventions of the ancient Near East.

Connections: Verses 2-6 parallel Psalm 57:8-12 exactly. Verses 7-14 parallel Psalm 60:7-14. The territorial catalog in verses 8-10 echoes 2 Samuel 8, where David conquered the territories named. The question in verse 11 ('Who will bring me to the fortified city?') mirrors the situation in 2 Samuel 5:6-10 (the conquest of Jerusalem) or the Edomite campaigns. The cry 'Give us help against the adversary' (v. 13) anticipates every subsequent Israelite prayer for military deliverance.

¹A song. A psalm of David.

²My heart is steadfast, O God;
I will sing and make music — even my glory will.

³Awake, harp and lyre!
I will awaken the dawn.

⁴I will give thanks to you among the peoples, O LORD;
I will make music to you among the nations.

⁵For your faithful love is higher than the heavens, and your faithfulness reaches to the skies.

⁶Be exalted above the heavens, O God, and let your glory be over all the earth.

⁷That your beloved ones may be rescued,
save with your right hand and answer me.

⁸God has spoken in His holiness:
'I will exult! I will divide Shechem and measure out the Valley of Succoth.

⁹Gilead is mine, Manasseh is mine;
Ephraim is my helmet,
Judah is my scepter.

¹⁰Moab is my washbasin;
on Edom I hurl my sandal;
over Philistia I shout in triumph.'

¹¹Who will bring me to the fortified city?
Who will lead me to Edom?

¹²Have you not rejected us, O God?
You do not march out with our armies, O God.

¹³Give us help against the foe,
for human help is worthless.

¹⁴With God we will act valiantly;
He will trample our adversaries.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double designation shir mizmor ('a song, a psalm') combines the general term for a song with the specific term for a psalm accompanied by instruments. The attribution le-David marks the composition as Davidic in origin.
2. The word nakhon ('firm, established, ready') describes a heart that has made its decision — there is no ambivalence. The steadfast heart is the prerequisite for everything that follows: praise, petition, and warfare. A divided heart cannot pray with authority.
3. David commands his instruments: urah hannevel ve-khinnor ('awake, harp and lyre!'). The instruments are personified as sleeping and summoned to consciousness. Then the magnificent claim: a'irah shachar ('I will awaken the dawn'). The psalmist's praise will begin before sunrise — he will not wait for the dawn to wake him; his music will wake the dawn. Worship precedes and summons the new day.
4. The audience expands beyond Israel: ba-ammim ('among the peoples') and bale'ummim ('among the nations'). David's praise is not private or parochial — it is performed before the watching world. The nations are the intended audience of Israel's worship.
5. The reason for universal praise: chesed and emet (here amittekha, 'your faithfulness/truth') are measured cosmically. God's chesed is gadol me-al shamayim ('great above the heavens') and His emunah reaches ad shechakim ('to the clouds, to the skies'). The vertical measurement echoes Psalm 103:11 — chesed spans the distance between earth and heaven, and here it exceeds even that.
6. The prayer rumah al shamayim Elohim ('be exalted above the heavens, O God') asks God to display His transcendence. The parallel — ve-al kol ha-arets kevodekha ('and over all the earth your glory') — asks for that transcendence to be visible everywhere. The praise section concludes by calling for God's kavod to fill the whole earth, echoing Isaiah 6:3.
7. The pivot from praise to petition: le-ma'an yechaletssun yedidekha ('so that your beloved ones may be delivered'). The yedidim ('beloved ones, dear ones') are Israel — God's cherished people. The plea hoshi'ah yeminekha ('save with your right hand') invokes God's power (the right hand is the hand of strength). The personal pronoun va'aneni ('and answer me') makes the petition specific to the king.
8. God speaks from His sanctuary (be-qodsho, 'in His holiness/sanctuary'). The divine speech is an oracle of territorial allotment: achallequah Shechem ('I will portion out Shechem') and emeq Sukkot amadded ('the Valley of Succoth I will measure out'). These are west-bank (Shechem) and east-bank (Succoth) territories. God divides the land as a sovereign distributing property.
9. God's claim continues: Gilead (Transjordan), Manasseh (the northern territory) — both belong to God. Ephraim is ma'oz roshi ('the protection of my head, my helmet') — the northern kingdom is God's military headgear. Judah is mechoqeqi ('my lawgiver, my scepter') — the southern kingdom is God's instrument of governance. The territories are reimagined as God's personal equipment: helmet and scepter, war and law.
10. The neighboring nations receive demeaning assignments: Moab is sir rachatsi ('my washbasin') — a vessel for foot-washing, the lowliest domestic object. On Edom, God hurls His na'ali ('my sandal') — either a gesture of ownership (Ruth 4:7, where a sandal transfers property) or contempt (throwing a shoe at someone). Over Philistia, God shouts in triumph (etro'a'a). The oracle reduces Israel's enemies to God's household items and conquest trophies.
11. David's question: mi yovileni ir mivtsar ('who will bring me to the fortified city?'). The ir mivtsar is likely Bozrah or Sela (Petra), the capital strongholds of Edom. The question implies military difficulty — Edom's cities are naturally fortified in rock. The second question — mi nachani ad

Edom ('who will lead me to Edom?') — is rhetorical: only God can accomplish this conquest.

12. The question turns accusatory: halo Elohim zenachtanu ('have you not rejected us, O God?'). The verb zanach ('to reject, to spurn, to cast off') implies God has withdrawn His support. The phrase ve-lo tetse Elohim be-tziv'oteinu ('and you do not go out with our armies, O God') means God is no longer marching at the head of Israel's troops. The theological crisis is military defeat interpreted as divine abandonment.
13. The petition: havah lanu ezrat mitsar ('give us help against the adversary'). The confession that follows is stark: ve-shav teshu'at adam ('and empty/worthless is the salvation of humanity'). The word shav means 'vain, empty, worthless.' Human military capability is nothing without God. This is not false modesty but hard-won theological realism: Israel's armies fail when God does not march with them.
14. The phrase na'aseh chayil ('we will do valiantly') is not a boast in human strength but a declaration of partnership with God. The 'we' is Israel; the enabling force is God. The psalm refuses both presumption (we can do it alone) and passivity (we can do nothing). With God, Israel acts.

Summary: The most intense imprecatory psalm in the Psalter. David, attacked by enemies who return evil for good and hatred for love, calls down a devastating series of curses upon his chief accuser: let his days be few, let another take his office, let his children be orphans, let his descendants be cut off, let his name be blotted out. The central curse section (vv. 6-20) is among the most disturbing passages in the Psalms. The psalm frames these curses as a response to unprovoked malice and ends with a plea for God's salvation and a vow of praise.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 109 is the hardest psalm for modern readers to absorb. The curses are specific, personal, and generational — they target not just the enemy but his wife, his children, his memory. The psalm makes no attempt to soften this. Yet the structure reveals something crucial: the curses are not initiated by David but are David's prayer that his enemies' own methods be turned back upon them. Verse 17 is the key: 'He loved cursing — let it come upon him.' The imprecations are a request for divine retribution in kind. The psalm assumes a universe where moral actions generate consequences, and it asks God to let those consequences land. Acts 1:20 quotes verse 8 ('Let another take his office') and applies it to Judas Iscariot, making this psalm a prophetic text in early Christian interpretation.

Translation Friction: The central interpretive question is whether verses 6-20 are David's own words or a quotation of what his enemies said against him. Some scholars argue David is quoting his accusers' curses and then asking God to return those curses to their source. The Hebrew text does not clearly mark quotation, and either reading is grammatically possible. We follow the traditional reading that David is imprecating against his enemy, but the alternative reading has strong defenders. Either way, the theological challenge remains: can such curses be prayer? The psalm's answer is that bringing rage to God is better than taking vengeance personally. The imprecatory psalms channel violence into worship.

Connections: Acts 1:20 quotes verse 8 in reference to Judas: 'Let his habitation become desolate, and let another take his office.' This christological reading made Psalm 109 significant in the early church. The psalm's language of the poor and needy (vv. 22, 31) connects to the beatitudes (Matthew 5:3-12). The phrase satan (accuser) in verse 6 connects to the heavenly adversary of Job 1-2 and Zechariah 3:1. The theme of returning evil for good (v. 5) echoes Psalm 35:12-14.

¹For the music director. Of David. A psalm.
O God of my praise, do not be silent.

²For the mouth of the wicked and the mouth of deceit are opened against me;
they speak against me with a lying tongue.

³Words of hatred surround me;
they attack me without cause.

⁴In return for my love they accuse me,
but I am all prayer.

⁵They repay me evil for good,
and hatred for my love.

⁶Appoint a wicked man over him,
and let an accuser stand at his right hand.

⁷When he is judged, let him come out guilty, and let his prayer be counted as sin.

⁸Let his days be few;
let another take his position.

⁹Let his children be orphaned and his wife a widow.

¹⁰Let his children wander as beggars;
let them seek bread far from their ruined homes.

¹¹Let the creditor seize all he has;
let strangers plunder his labor.

¹²Let no one extend faithful love to him,
and let no one show compassion to his orphans.

¹³Let his descendants be cut off;
in the next generation let their name be blotted out.

¹⁴Let the iniquity of his fathers be remembered before the LORD, and let the sin of his mother not be blotted out.

¹⁵Let their sins remain before the LORD continually, that He may cut off their memory from the earth.

¹⁶Because he did not remember to show faithful love but pursued the poor and needy, the brokenhearted — to put them to death.

¹⁷He loved cursing — let it come upon him.
He did not delight in blessing — let it be far from him.

¹⁸He wore cursing as his garment — let it enter his body like water and his bones like oil.

¹⁹Let it be like a garment he wraps around himself, like a belt he always wears.

²⁰Let this be the payment from the LORD to my accusers, to those who speak evil against my soul.

²¹But you, O LORD my Lord, act on my behalf for your name's sake.
Because your faithful love is good, rescue me.

²²For I am poor and needy, and my heart is pierced within me.

²³I fade like a lengthening shadow;
I am shaken off like a locust.

²⁴My knees buckle from fasting, and my body has grown thin, stripped of fat.

²⁵I have become a disgrace to them;
when they see me, they shake their heads.

²⁶Help me, O LORD my God;
save me according to your faithful love.

²⁷Let them know that this is your hand — that you, O LORD, have done it.

²⁸Let them curse, but you will bless;
when they rise up, let them be put to shame,
but let your servant rejoice.

²⁹Let my accusers be clothed in disgrace;
let them wrap themselves in their own shame as in a robe.

³⁰I will give great thanks to the LORD with my mouth;
in the midst of the throng I will praise Him.

³¹For He stands at the right hand of the needy, to save him from those who condemn his soul.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription la-menatseach ('for the music director') indicates liturgical use. The address Elohei tehillati ('God of my praise') is significant — even in the psalm that will contain the harshest curses in Scripture, the opening word is praise. God is identified as the one David praises. The plea al techerash ('do not be silent') requests that God break His silence and act.
2. Two mouths attack: pi rasha ('the mouth of the wicked') and pi mirmah ('the mouth of deceit'). They have opened (patachu) against David — mouths as weapons, words as assault. The leshon shaqer ('tongue of falsehood') specifies the weapon: lies. The psalmist is under verbal attack from people who fabricate accusations.
3. The divrei sin'ah ('words of hatred') have surrounded (sevavuni) the psalmist — he is encircled by hostile speech. The phrase vayyillachamuni chinnam ('they fight against me for nothing, without cause') establishes the injustice: the attack is unprovoked. The word chinnam ('for nothing, freely, without reason') is the same word used in Job 1:9, where the Adversary asks whether Job fears God 'for nothing.' Here the enemies hate David for nothing.
4. The phrase va-ani tefillah ('but I — prayer') is one of the most compressed statements in the Psalter. No verb, no object — just the pronoun and the noun. David does not have prayers; he is prayer. His identity in the crisis has been reduced to the single act of addressing God.
5. The exchange is explicit: ra'ah tachat tovah ('evil in exchange for good') and sin'ah tachat ahavati ('hatred in exchange for my love'). The word tachat ('in exchange for, instead of') appears twice, emphasizing the substitution. This is the moral ground on which the imprecations stand: the enemies have reversed the moral order. David will now ask God to reverse it back.

6. The curse section begins. The verb hafqed ('appoint, set over') asks God to place a rasha ('wicked person') in authority over the enemy. The satan ya'amod al yemino ('let an accuser stand at his right hand') places a prosecuting figure at the enemy's right side — the position of the legal accuser in a courtroom. The word satan here is not the cosmic Satan but a human or angelic accuser.
7. The phrase be-hishshafto yetse rasha ('when he is judged, let him go out guilty') asks that every legal proceeding end in conviction. The phrase u-tefillato tiyeh lachata'ah ('and let his prayer become sin') is devastating — even the enemy's attempt to pray for mercy should itself be counted as an offense. When a person has exhausted all moral credit, even repentance is hollow.
8. The curse of shortened life: yihyu yamav me'attim ('let his days be few'). Then the political curse: pequddato yiqqach acher ('let another take his office/position'). The word pequddah means 'oversight, office, charge, position.' Acts 1:20 quotes the Septuagint of this verse and applies it to Judas Iscariot's vacant apostleship, which was then given to Matthias. This verse became the scriptural warrant for replacing Judas.
9. The curse extends to family: banav yetomim ('his children orphans') and ishto almanah ('his wife a widow'). The imprecation asks that the enemy's death (implied by v. 8) leave his family destitute. In the ancient Near East, orphans and widows were the most vulnerable members of society — they had no legal protector and no economic support.
10. The children's fate: noa yanu'u ('let them wander aimlessly, let them stagger') and ve-shi'elu ('let them beg'). The phrase me-chorvotaihem ('from their ruins') means their homes have been destroyed — they beg from the rubble of what was once a household. The progressive desolation is deliberate: death, then orphanhood, then homelessness, then begging.
11. Economic destruction: the nosheh ('creditor, money-lender') traps (yenaqqesh, from naqash, 'to ensnare') everything he owns. The zarim ('strangers, foreigners') plunder his yegi'o ('his labor, the product of his toil'). The enemy loses not only his life and family but his accumulated wealth. Everything he worked for goes to people who have no connection to him.
12. The curse now attacks social solidarity: al yehi lo moshekh chesed ('let there be no one to extend chesed to him'). The word moshekh ('one who draws out, who extends') means no one will reach out with covenant loyalty. Even his orphaned children (yetomav) will find no chonen ('one who shows grace'). The isolation is total — not only God but other humans will withdraw support.
13. The generational curse: acharito lehakhrit ('his posterity — for cutting off'). The enemy's line will end. The phrase be-dor acher yimmach shemam ('in the next generation let their name be blotted out') asks for total erasure — the name (shem) will be wiped from memory (machah, the same verb used for God blotting out sin). To lose one's name is to cease existing in any meaningful sense in the ancient world.
14. The curse reaches backward: the avon avotav ('iniquity of his fathers') should be remembered (yizzakher) by God, and the chattat immo ('sin of his mother') should not be blotted out. Where Psalm 103 celebrated God not dealing with us according to our sins, this psalm asks God to deal with the enemy exactly according to his ancestors' sins. The contrast is theologically intentional — chesed is for those who fear God; strict justice is for those who mock Him.
15. The ancestral sins should remain neged YHVH tamid ('before the LORD continually') — not filed away but permanently on display before the divine judge. The purpose: ve-yakhret me-erets zikhram ('that He may cut off their memory from the earth'). Complete erasure — no descendants, no name, no memory.
16. The phrase lo zakhar asot chesed ('he did not remember to do chesed') is the inverse of verse 45 in Psalm 106, where God 'remembered His covenant.' The enemy is the anti-God: where God remembers chesed, the enemy forgets it. Where God rescues the needy, the enemy hunts them. The curses ask God to treat the enemy as the enemy treated the poor.
17. The principle of retribution in kind: va-ye'ehav qelalah vattevo'ehu ('he loved cursing, and it came upon him'). The verb ahav ('to love') means the enemy chose cursing as his way of life — he embraced it. The request is simply that what he loved should arrive: let cursing find its lover. The parallel: lo chafets bivrahah ('he did not desire blessing'). Since he rejected blessing, let blessing withdraw (vattirchaq mimmennu, 'let it be far from him'). The logic is: you get what you chose.
18. The clothing metaphor: vayyilbash qelalah kemaddo ('he put on cursing like his robe'). Cursing was his wardrobe — he dressed in it daily. The penetration deepens: vatavo khammayim be-qirbo ('it entered like water into his innards') and kashshemen be-atmotav ('like oil into his bones'). Water soaks; oil penetrates. Cursing has saturated the enemy to the skeletal level. He is cursing all the way through.
19. The garment metaphor continues: the cursing should be ke-beged ya'teh ('like a robe he wraps himself in') and u-le-mezach tamid yachgerehah ('like a sash he constantly girds on'). The mezach ('belt, sash, girdle') is the foundational garment — the first thing put on and the last thing removed. Cursing has become the enemy's permanent wardrobe, his identity.
20. The curse section closes with a summary: zot pe'ullat sotenai me-et YHVH ('this is the wage of my accusers from the LORD'). The word pe'ullah ('wage, payment, reward') frames the curses as divine compensation — what the accusers have earned. The sotenai ('my accusers') uses the same root as satan in verse 6. The entire imprecatory section is a petition for God to pay the accusers what their accusations have earned.
21. The tone shifts dramatically: ve-attah YHVH Adonai ('but you, LORD, my Lord'). After twenty verses of cursing enemies, David turns to personal petition. The basis is not his own merit but le-ma'an shemekha ('for your name's sake') and ki tov chasdekha ('because your faithful love is good'). The same chesed that the enemy refused (v. 16) is now David's only hope.
22. David identifies himself with the very category his enemy attacked: ani ve-evyon anokhi ('poor and needy am I'). The same words from verse 16. The enemy persecuted the poor; David is the poor one. The phrase libbi chalah be-qirbi ('my heart is pierced within me') uses chalah ('pierced, wounded, slain'). His heart has been stabbed — not physically but by the betrayal described in verses 4-5.

23. Two images of insubstantiality: ke-tsel kinttoto nehelakhti ('like a shadow when it stretches, I am gone') echoes Psalm 102:12. The shadow dissolves into darkness. The second image — nin'arti ka-arbeh ('I am shaken off like a locust') — pictures a locust brushed off a garment. David feels disposable, insignificant, easily discarded.
24. Physical deterioration from fasting (tsom): birkai kashlu ('my knees stumble, they buckle'). The fasting may be penitential prayer or the involuntary starvation of persecution. The phrase u-vesari kachash mishshamen ('and my flesh has become lean, stripped of fat') describes emaciation — the body consuming itself.
25. David has become cherpah ('a reproach, an object of scorn'). The headshaking (yeniu'un rosham) is the gesture of mockery and contempt — they look at him and wag their heads in derision. The same gesture appears at the crucifixion (Matthew 27:39), and the early church read this verse as prophetic of Christ's suffering.
26. The petition is direct: ozreini YHVH Elohai ('help me, LORD my God'). The basis remains chesed: hoshi'eni ke-chasdekha ('save me according to your faithful love'). Not according to David's merit, not according to the severity of the situation, but according to the measure of God's chesed.
27. The purpose of the rescue: ve-yed'u ki yadekha zot ('let them know that this is your hand'). The salvation should be visibly divine — not ambiguous, not attributable to chance. The phrase attah YHVH asitah ('you, LORD, did it') makes the attribution explicit. David wants his enemies to see God's hand unmistakably.
28. The contrast between human cursing and divine blessing: yeqalelu hemmah ve-attah tevarekh ('they curse, but you bless'). The enemies' curses are impotent when set against God's blessing. The outcome: qamu vayyevoshu ('they rise up and are shamed'). The servant (avdekha) — David — will rejoice (yismach). The psalm moves from despair toward anticipated joy.
29. The clothing metaphor returns: the enemy wore cursing (v. 18-19); now let the accusers wear kelimmah ('disgrace, humiliation') and boshet ('shame'). The verb ya'atu ('let them wrap themselves') uses atah, the same verb from verse 19. The wardrobe has changed: cursing has been replaced by shame.
30. The vow of praise: odeh YHVH me'od be-fi ('I will thank the LORD greatly with my mouth'). The word me'od ('very much, exceedingly') intensifies the thanksgiving. The setting is public: u-vetokh rabbim ahalelennu ('in the midst of many I will praise Him'). The psalm that began with a plea for God to speak ('do not be silent,' v. 1) ends with David speaking — loudly, publicly, in praise.
31. The reversal between verse 6 and verse 31 is the psalm's structural and theological key. The accuser stands at the enemy's right hand; God stands at the needy's right hand. Condemnation for the oppressor; salvation for the oppressed. The psalm's moral universe is governed by this symmetry.

Summary: The most quoted psalm in the New Testament. In seven compressed verses, the LORD (YHVH) addresses David's lord (adoni) with an oracle of enthronement, victory, and eternal priesthood. The psalm contains two divine utterances: 'Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies your footstool' (v. 1) and 'You are a priest forever according to the order of Melchizedek' (v. 4). Between and around these oracles, the psalm describes the messianic king's rule from Zion, his willing army, his dawn-born youth, and his judgment among the nations.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 110 is the single most important psalm for New Testament christology. It is quoted or alluded to over twenty times: Jesus cites it to challenge the Pharisees' understanding of the Messiah (Matthew 22:41-46), Peter quotes it in his Pentecost sermon (Acts 2:34-35), Paul draws on it in 1 Corinthians 15:25 and Ephesians 1:20, and the book of Hebrews builds its entire argument about Christ's priesthood on verse 4. The psalm's fusion of kingship and priesthood in one figure was revolutionary — in Israel, kings were from Judah and priests from Levi, and the two offices were never combined (King Uzziah was struck with leprosy for trying, 2 Chronicles 26:16-21). The Melchizedek reference bypasses the Levitical system entirely, reaching back to a pre-Mosaic, pre-Aaronic priestly order — a priest who was also a king of Salem (Genesis 14:18-20). This dual office is what made the psalm irresistible to the early church: Jesus was both king and priest, and Psalm 110 was the scriptural warrant.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew text of Psalm 110 is among the most difficult in the Psalter. Several phrases are obscure, the syntax is compressed to the point of ambiguity, and the imagery shifts rapidly. Verse 3 in particular is notoriously difficult — the Hebrew is uncertain at several points, and translations vary wildly. The phrase ne'um YHVH la-adoni ('declaration of the LORD to my lord') in verse 1 creates the theological puzzle Jesus exploited: if David calls the Messiah 'my lord,' how can the Messiah be David's son? The answer, for the New Testament authors, is that the Messiah is both David's descendant and David's Lord — human and divine. The Melchizedek priesthood in verse 4 is equally puzzling in its original context: why invoke a Canaanite priest-king from Abraham's era? The answer may be that the Davidic king, ruling from Jerusalem (the ancient Salem), inherits the pre-Israelite priestly traditions of that city.

Connections: Genesis 14:18-20 introduces Melchizedek as king of Salem and priest of God Most High. Hebrews 5-7 develops the Melchizedek priesthood at length, arguing that Christ's priesthood supersedes the Levitical system because it belongs to an earlier, higher order. Matthew 22:41-46 records Jesus using verse 1 to demonstrate that the Messiah cannot be merely David's biological descendant. Acts 2:34-35 makes verse 1 the climax of Peter's Pentecost argument for Christ's exaltation. 1 Corinthians 15:25 quotes verse 1 in the context of Christ's reign until all enemies are subdued. Hebrews 1:13 quotes verse 1 as the supreme enthronement text. The psalm is the theological bridge between the Old Testament expectation of a Davidic messiah and the New Testament proclamation of a divine Christ.

¹Of David. A psalm.

The declaration of the LORD to my lord:

'Sit at my right hand

until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet.'

²The LORD will extend your mighty scepter from Zion:

'Rule in the midst of your enemies.'

³Your people offer themselves willingly on the day of your power.

In holy splendor, from the womb of the dawn,

the dew of your youth is yours.

⁴The LORD has sworn and will not change His mind:

'You are a priest forever

according to the order of Melchizedek.'

⁵The Lord at your right hand will shatter kings on the day of His wrath.

⁶He judges among the nations, filling them with corpses;

He shatters the head over the wide earth.

⁷He will drink from the brook along the way;

therefore He will lift up His head.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ne'um YHVH ('declaration of the LORD') is prophetic language borrowed into a psalm — it marks what follows as direct divine speech, not the psalmist's meditation. The word adoni ('my lord') is distinct from Adonai (a divine title); adoni is used for a human superior. However, the figure addressed here exercises divine prerogatives (sitting at God's right hand), which is why the early church read 'my lord' as a christological title.
1. The right hand (yamin) of God is the position from which authority is exercised. Sitting there implies permanent co-regency. The New Testament applies this image to Christ's ascension: after the resurrection, Jesus 'sat down at the right hand of the Majesty on high' (Hebrews 1:3).
2. The extension of the scepter from Zion means Jerusalem is the command center of the Messiah's reign. The early church understood this both literally (the gospel went out from Jerusalem, Acts 1:8) and typologically (Zion represents God's sovereign rule extending into a hostile world).
3. The textual difficulties in this verse have generated more scholarly debate than almost any other verse in the Psalter. The LXX reads 'from the womb before the morning star I begot you,' which the early church read as a statement about the Son's eternal generation from the Father. The Hebrew text is more opaque but equally suggestive: the Messiah's origin is connected to dawn, to dew, to birth — images of fresh beginning and supernatural vitality.
3. The word nedavot ('free-will offerings, voluntary contributions') means the people give themselves. The same word is used for voluntary sacrifices in Leviticus. The Messiah's army is a congregation of willing worshippers.

4. The phrase al divrati is difficult — it could mean 'according to the order of,' 'according to the manner of,' 'because of the matter of,' or 'on account of.' The LXX reads kata ten taxin ('according to the order'), and Hebrews follows this. Whatever the precise nuance, the meaning is clear: the Messiah's priesthood is patterned on Melchizedek's, not Aaron's.
4. The perpetuity le-olam ('forever') applied to the priesthood means this is not a temporary appointment. Hebrews 7:24 draws the inference: because the Messiah lives forever, His priesthood is permanent and His intercession unending.
5. The subject shifts: now Adonai ('the Lord') is at the Messiah's right hand — in verse 1, the Messiah was at God's right hand; now God stands at the Messiah's right hand. The positions are reciprocal. The verb machats ('He shatters, He strikes through, He wounds fatally') describes devastating military action. The melakhim ('kings') are the hostile rulers of the earth. The be-yom appo ('on the day of His wrath') is the eschatological day of judgment when God's patience expires and His wrath is unleashed.
6. The judgment is global: yadin baggoyim ('He judges among the nations') with male geviyyot ('filling with corpses'). The scale is total war — the battlefield is covered with the dead. The phrase machats rosh al erets rabbah ('He shatters the chief/head over a wide land') could mean 'He crushes the head ruler over a great land' or 'He crushes heads across a vast territory.' The word rosh ('head') may refer to a specific leader (the chief enemy) or to heads generally (the casualties). Either way, the judgment is comprehensive and devastating.
7. The final verse has puzzled interpreters for centuries. The simplest reading is military: a warrior-king, in pursuit of fleeing enemies, pauses at a stream to drink and then lifts his head to continue the chase, refreshed. The christological reading is more layered: the Messiah who endures suffering (drinking from the stream of trial) is the same one who is exalted (lifting His head in triumph). The brevity and ambiguity are part of the psalm's power — it says just enough and stops.

Summary: Psalm 111 is an acrostic hymn of praise in which each half-line begins with the next letter of the Hebrew alphabet, moving from aleph to tav across twenty-two units. The psalmist praises the LORD in the assembly of the upright for His mighty works: His covenant faithfulness, His provision of food, His gift of the land, His justice, His trustworthy commands, and His redemption of His people. The psalm climaxes with the declaration that the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom.

What Makes This Remarkable: The acrostic structure is the psalm's most striking formal feature — the poet praises God within the constraint of alphabetic order, as if declaring that the LORD's works fill every letter of the language. Psalm 111 and Psalm 112 form a matched pair: 111 describes who God is and what He does; 112 describes the person who fears God and mirrors those divine qualities. The vocabulary deliberately echoes between the two psalms — the words used for God's character in 111 reappear as the character of the righteous person in 112. The phrase 'the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom' (v. 10) connects this psalm to the wisdom tradition (Proverbs 1:7, 9:10, Job 28:28) and positions praise as a form of knowing.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew acrostic structure is impossible to reproduce in English without distorting the content. Each line of the psalm is extremely compressed — the poet is working under severe formal constraints, and the result reads more like a catalog of divine attributes than a flowing poem. Some scholars debate whether verse 1 is part of the acrostic (the opening Hallelujah stands outside the twenty-two-line count) or whether the acrostic begins with the first word after the Hallelujah. The WLC treats the Hallelujah as part of the verse text.

Connections: Psalm 111 is the first half of an acrostic diptych with Psalm 112. Together they form a theological statement: the God described in 111 produces the person described in 112. The wisdom conclusion in verse 10 links to Proverbs 1:7 and 9:10. The covenant and redemption language (vv. 5, 9) connects to the Exodus and Sinai traditions. The psalm is liturgically associated with the Egyptian Hallel collection (Psalms 113-118) that follows immediately.

I will thank the LORD with all my heart,
in the council of the upright and in the congregation.

²Great are the works of the LORD, studied by all who delight in them.

³Splendor and majesty mark His work, and His righteousness stands forever.

⁴He has made a memorial of His wonders;
the LORD is gracious and compassionate.

⁵He gives food to those who fear Him;
He remembers His covenant forever.

⁶He declared the power of His works to His people, giving them the inheritance of the nations.

⁷The works of His hands are truth and justice;
all His precepts are trustworthy.

⁸They are established forever and ever, carried out in truth and uprightness.

⁹He sent redemption to His people;
He commanded His covenant forever.
Holy and awe-inspiring is His name.

¹⁰The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom;
good understanding belongs to all who practice it.
His praise endures forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The acrostic begins here: aleph (odeh) and bet (besod) are the first two letters. Each half-verse advances one letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The word sod ('council, intimate circle') suggests a smaller gathering within the larger edah ('congregation'). The phrase bekol levav ('with all my heart') uses levav rather than lev — the two forms are interchangeable in meaning, though levav appears more commonly in Deuteronomic and poetic texts.
2. The gimel and dalet lines of the acrostic. The participle derushim ('sought, studied') implies ongoing investigation, not a single act of observation. The phrase lekhol cheftzehem ('by all who delight in them') could also be read as 'according to all their desires' — the works of the LORD meet every inquiry.
3. The he and vav lines. The pair hod ve-hadar appears together in Psalm 104:1, 1 Chronicles 16:27, and Job 40:10, always describing divine or royal splendor. The noun po'olo ('His work') is singular — it refers to the totality of God's activity rather than to individual acts.
4. The zayin and chet lines. The phrase channun ve-rachum ('gracious and compassionate') reverses the usual Exodus 34:6 order (rachum ve-channun) — likely for acrostic purposes, since chet must come after zayin. The reversal is not theologically significant but shows the poet adapting traditional language to the alphabetic constraint.
5. The tet and yod lines. The word teref literally means 'torn food, prey' — what an animal brings back after hunting. Applied to God, it means provision. Some scholars connect this to the manna and quail in the wilderness; others see it as a general statement about divine provision. The covenant (berit) here is most likely the Sinai covenant, though the psalmist may also have the Abrahamic land promise in view given verse 6.
6. The kaf and lamed lines. The 'inheritance of the nations' refers to the land of Canaan, which God allocated to Israel as promised to Abraham. The verb higgid ('He declared, made known') implies revelation — God showed His people what He could do so they would trust Him for what He was about to do.
7. The mem and nun lines. The noun piqqudim ('precepts, instructions') is relatively rare outside the Psalms and refers to God's detailed instructions or charges. The adjective ne'emanim ('trustworthy') comes from the root aman, which also produces emunah ('faithfulness') and amen ('so be it, it is reliable').
8. The samekh and ayin lines. The adjective semukhim ('established, supported, upheld') comes from the root samakh ('to lean on, to support') — God's precepts are stable, something a person can lean on without collapse. The phrase be'emet ve-yashar ('in truth and uprightness') describes the manner of their execution: straight, without crookedness or deception.

9. The pe, tsade, and qof lines. The verb tsivvah ('He commanded') applied to the covenant is unusual — normally one 'cuts' (karat) a covenant. Using tsivvah emphasizes that the covenant is an authoritative act of the divine will, not a negotiation. The adjective nora ('awe-inspiring, fearsome') is rendered here as 'awe-inspiring' rather than 'terrible' or 'dreadful' to capture the reverence rather than terror.
10. The resh, shin, and tav lines complete the acrostic. The phrase reshit chokhmah parallels Proverbs 1:7 (reshit da'at) and Proverbs 9:10 (techillat chokhmah). The pronoun in lekhol oseihem ('all who do them') is ambiguous — 'them' could refer to the commandments or to the acts of wisdom. Most interpreters take it as referring to the commandments. The final line, tehillato omedet la'ad, mirrors verse 3b (tzidqato omedet la'ad), creating a frame: God's righteousness endures, and so does His praise.

Summary: Psalm 112 is the second half of an acrostic pair with Psalm 111. Where Psalm 111 described God's character, Psalm 112 describes the person who fears God — and the vocabulary deliberately mirrors the previous psalm. The righteous person is generous, just, compassionate, stable, unafraid, and ultimately vindicated. The psalm paints a portrait of the blessed life rooted in covenant faithfulness, ending with the frustration of the wicked who watch the righteous flourish.

What Makes This Remarkable: The mirroring between Psalms 111 and 112 is the key to both. In 111:3, God's righteousness endures forever; in 112:3, the righteous person's righteousness endures forever. In 111:4, God is gracious and compassionate; in 112:4, the righteous person is gracious and compassionate. The implication is that the one who fears God becomes like God — covenant relationship produces character transformation. The person described in Psalm 112 is not merely obedient but is becoming a reflection of the divine character described in Psalm 111. This is one of the clearest statements of the imago Dei principle in the Psalter.

Translation Friction: The psalm's confident promise of material prosperity for the righteous (wealth, descendants, victory over enemies) sits in tension with the experience of suffering righteous people — a tension the book of Job addresses at length. The psalm operates within the Deuteronomic framework where obedience leads to blessing and disobedience to curse. The final verse, describing the wicked gnashing their teeth as the righteous prosper, reflects a retributive worldview that other psalms (notably Psalm 73) will complicate significantly.

Connections: Psalm 112 is inseparable from Psalm 111 — they are two halves of a single theological statement. The 'fear of the LORD' that concludes Psalm 111:10 immediately becomes the opening quality of the blessed person in 112:1. Paul quotes Psalm 112:9 in 2 Corinthians 9:9 to describe the generous giver. The portrait of the righteous person here anticipates the beatitudes of Matthew 5 and the fruit of the Spirit in Galatians 5. The wicked gnashing their teeth in verse 10 is language Jesus uses in the parables of judgment (Matthew 13:42, 50).

1Praise the LORD!

Blessed is the person who fears the LORD, who delights greatly in His commandments.

2His descendants will be mighty in the land;
the generation of the upright will be blessed.

3Wealth and riches fill his house,
and his righteousness endures forever.

4Light dawns in the darkness for the upright — gracious, compassionate, and righteous.

5It goes well for the person who is generous and lends;
he conducts his affairs with justice.

⁶He will never be shaken;
the righteous person will be remembered forever.

⁷He does not fear bad news;
his heart is steady, trusting in the LORD.

⁸His heart is secure; he will not be afraid until he looks in triumph on his adversaries.

⁹He scatters gifts; he gives to the needy.
His righteousness endures forever;
his horn is lifted high in honor.

¹⁰The wicked person sees it and is enraged;
he gnashes his teeth and wastes away.
The desire of the wicked will come to nothing.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The acrostic begins: aleph (ashrei) and bet (bemitzvotav). The word ashrei is a plural construct meaning something like 'the happinesses of' — it describes a state of flourishing rather than a momentary emotion. The verb chafetz ('to delight, to desire') is the same root used in Psalm 111:2 for those who 'delight' in God's works, creating a verbal link between the two psalms.
2. The gimel and dalet lines. The word gibbor ('mighty, powerful, warrior') applied to zar'o ('his seed, his offspring') promises that covenant faithfulness produces strong descendants. The word ba'aretz ('in the land') can mean 'in the earth' generally or 'in the land' of Israel specifically — in a psalm rooted in covenant theology, the land of promise is likely in view.
3. The he and vav lines. The exact phrase tzidqato omedet la'ad appears in both 111:3 and 112:3 — this is the clearest verbal bridge between the two psalms and the key to their paired meaning.
4. The zayin and chet lines. The grammatical subject of channun ve-rachum ve-tzaddiq is debated — it could be God (He is the light that rises) or the righteous person (who is described as gracious, compassionate, and righteous). The deliberate echo of 111:4 suggests the poet wants readers to hear both: God is this way, and the person who fears God becomes this way.
5. The tet and yod lines. The word chonen ('showing grace, being generous') echoes channun from the previous verse — the righteous person does not merely possess the quality of graciousness but acts on it through lending. The verb yekhalkel ('he sustains, he manages') means he handles his devarav ('his words, his affairs') with mishpat ('justice, right judgment').
6. The kaf and lamed lines. The verb yimmot ('be shaken, be moved, totter') is the same word used for cosmic stability — mountains that do not shake, the earth that does not totter. The righteous person shares in that stability. The phrase lezekher olam ('for eternal remembrance') connects to Psalm 111:4 where God 'made a memorial' (zekher) of His wonders — now the righteous person becomes a memorial.
7. The mem and nun lines. The word nakhon ('established, steady') is a Niphal participle of kun ('to establish, to make firm') — the heart has been made firm by something outside itself, namely trust in the LORD. The verb batuach ('trusting') is a stative participle: this is an ongoing condition, not a momentary decision.
8. The samekh and ayin lines. The word samukh ('supported, upheld') echoes Psalm 111:8 where God's precepts are semukhim ('established'). The righteous person's heart has the same quality as God's commands — both are firm, both stand. The phrase ad asher yir'eh betzarav ('until he looks upon his adversaries') implies confident waiting: the righteous person will eventually see vindication.
9. The pe, tsade, and qof lines. Paul quotes this verse in 2 Corinthians 9:9 to encourage generosity among the Corinthian believers. The 'horn' (qeren) is a widespread ancient Near Eastern metaphor for power and dignity — a raised horn is a sign of victory and honor, a lowered horn is defeat and shame.
10. The resh, shin, and tav lines complete the acrostic. The verb namas ('to melt, to dissolve') is used elsewhere for hearts melting in fear (Joshua 2:11) and for wax melting before fire (Psalm 68:3). Applied to the wicked person, it suggests a total loss of substance and strength. The noun ta'avah ('desire, craving, longing') refers to what the wicked person most wants — and it will perish (toveid, from avad, 'to be lost, to perish').

Summary: Psalm 113 opens the Egyptian Hallel (Psalms 113-118), the collection of praise psalms sung during the Passover meal. The psalm calls the servants of the LORD to praise His name from sunrise to sunset, then declares that the LORD is exalted above all nations and above the heavens — yet He stoops down to look at what happens below. The psalm climaxes with concrete examples of His condescension: He lifts the poor from the dust, raises the needy from the ash heap, and gives the barren woman a home and children.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theological center of this psalm is the paradox of divine transcendence and condescension. The LORD is so exalted that He must humble Himself even to look at the heavens — the heavens are beneath Him. Yet this infinitely exalted God concerns Himself with the lowest members of human society: the dust-covered poor, the ash-heap beggar, the childless woman. The psalm's structure enacts this movement: it begins by looking up (God's name above everything) and ends by looking down (God reaching into the lowest places). This is the psalm that sets the tone for the entire Passover Hallel — the God who delivered Israel from Egypt is the God who notices the forgotten.

Translation Friction: The barren woman receiving children (v. 9) is celebrated without qualification, reflecting the ancient Near Eastern cultural context in which childlessness was a severe social and economic vulnerability for women. Modern readers may find the equation of female blessing with childbearing reductive, but in the psalm's context, the point is not that motherhood defines women but that God reverses the specific condition that caused this woman's suffering and marginalization.

Connections: Psalm 113 is the first psalm of the Egyptian Hallel, sung before the Passover meal (113-114 before the meal, 115-118 after). Jesus and His disciples would have sung this psalm at the Last Supper (Matthew 26:30). Hannah's prayer (1 Samuel 2:1-10) is a close parallel — the lifting of the poor and the giving of children to the barren are central themes of both. Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55) draws heavily on both Hannah's prayer and this psalm.

1Praise the LORD!

Praise, you servants of the LORD —
praise the name of the LORD!

2Let the name of the LORD be blessed from now until forever.

3From the rising of the sun to its setting,
the name of the LORD is to be praised.

4The LORD is exalted above all nations;
His glory is above the heavens.

5Who is like the LORD our God, who is enthroned on high,

6who stoops down to look at the heavens and the earth!

7He raises the poor from the dust;
He lifts the needy from the ash heap,

to seat them with nobles,
with the nobles of His people.

He gives the childless woman a home, making her a joyful mother of children.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The triple hallelu ('praise') creates an urgent, layered call to worship. The addressees are avdei YHWH ('servants of the LORD') — a term that can refer to the Levitical singers, to all Israel, or to anyone who serves the LORD. The object of praise is shem YHWH ('the name of the LORD') — not merely the person of God but His revealed identity, His reputation, His character as known.
2. The jussive yehi ('let it be') expresses a wish that God's name be mevorakh ('blessed') — acknowledged, honored, praised — from this moment into eternity. The phrase me'attah ve-ad olam ('from now and until forever') stretches the praise across all time.
3. Mi-mizrach shemesh ad mevo'o ('from the rising of the sun to its going in') covers the full arc of the day and, by extension, the full extent of the earth. The praise of the LORD is not limited to one place or one time — it fills all space and all hours.
4. The sequence builds: above all nations (v. 4a), above the heavens (v. 4b), and then in the next verse, He looks down. The word ram ('high, exalted') is the same root as the verb rum used throughout the Psalms for divine and royal exaltation.
5. The rhetorical question mi ka-YHWH Eloheinu ('who is like the LORD our God?') expects the answer: no one. The participle ha-magbihi lashevet ('who makes high to sit' / 'who is enthroned on high') describes God as seated at the highest possible point. The verb gavah ('to be high') in the Hiphil means 'to make high' — God has elevated His own throne above everything.
6. Verses 5-6 form a single sentence: God is the one who is enthroned on high AND who humbles Himself to look. The juxtaposition is the psalm's central theological statement. The verb mashpili is a Hiphil participle — God is actively, continuously condescending.
7. This verse closely parallels Hannah's prayer in 1 Samuel 2:8. The ashpot appears in that passage as well, and the verbal and thematic overlap is so strong that most scholars consider one text dependent on the other. The movement from dust to ash heap intensifies the degradation; the movement from dal to evyon intensifies the vulnerability.
8. The verb hoshivi ('to cause to sit, to seat') places the formerly destitute person among nedivim ('nobles, princes, generous ones'). The word nadiv can mean either a person of high social rank or a person of generous character — both senses may be intended. The phrase nedivei ammo ('the nobles of His people') specifies that these are the leaders of God's own people, not foreign dignitaries. The reversal is total: from the ash heap to the seat of honor.
9. The word aqeret ('barren') comes from the root aqar ('to uproot') — barrenness is experienced as being uprooted, disconnected from the future. The transformation from aqeret to em ('mother') echoes the stories of Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Hannah — all barren women whose children became foundational figures in Israel's history. The final Hallelujah closes the psalm with the same word that opened it, creating a frame of praise.

Summary: Psalm 114 is a compact, vivid poem celebrating the Exodus from Egypt. In eight verses, the psalmist recounts how the sea fled, the Jordan turned back, the mountains skipped like rams, and the hills leaped like lambs — all because the earth trembled at the presence of the LORD, the God of Jacob, who turned rock into a pool of water and flint into a spring.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most cinematically powerful poems in the Psalter. The personification is extraordinary: the sea 'sees' and 'flees,' the Jordan 'turns back,' the mountains 'skip' like rams. The poet addresses creation directly — 'What is wrong with you, Sea, that you flee?' — as if cross-examining witnesses at a trial. The entire Exodus event is compressed into a cosmic drama where nature itself responds to God's presence with something between terror and ecstasy. No human actors are named — not Moses, not Aaron, not Pharaoh. The only actors are God, Israel, and creation. The psalm strips the Exodus to its theological core: God showed up, and the physical world rearranged itself.

Translation Friction: The psalm's brevity is itself a kind of friction — the Exodus was a complex series of events involving plagues, negotiations, military pursuit, and wilderness wandering, yet this poem reduces it all to a single moment of divine appearance. The merging of the Red Sea crossing and the Jordan crossing (events separated by forty years) into a single poetic moment raises the question of whether the psalm is describing history or theology. The answer is both: the psalm treats the entire Exodus-to-Conquest sequence as a single act of divine self-revelation.

Connections: Psalm 114 is the second psalm of the Egyptian Hallel (113-118), sung during the Passover meal. Its imagery of the fleeing sea connects to Exodus 14-15 (the Song of the Sea). The Jordan turning back echoes Joshua 3-4. Mountains skipping recalls the Sinai theophany (Exodus 19, Judges 5:5). Water from rock points to Exodus 17:6 and Numbers 20:11. Jesus and His disciples sang this psalm at the Last Supper.

¹When Israel went out from Egypt,
the house of Jacob from a people of foreign speech —

²Judah became His sanctuary, Israel His dominion.

³The sea looked and fled;
the Jordan turned back.

⁴The mountains skipped like rams,
the hills like young sheep.

⁵What is wrong with you, Sea, that you flee?
Jordan, that you turn back?

⁶Mountains, why do you skip like rams?
Hills, like young sheep?

⁷Tremble, O earth, before the Lord,
before the God of Jacob —

⁸who turned the rock into a pool of water, the flint into a flowing spring.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening betzet ('when [they] went out') places the entire psalm in the moment of departure. The parallel between Yisra'el ('Israel') and beit Ya'aqov ('house of Jacob') uses both names for the nation — the covenantal name and the family-origin name. The Egyptians are described as am lo'ez ('a people of foreign/barbarous speech') — the word lo'ez suggests unintelligible, alien language, emphasizing the cultural foreignness of Egypt.
2. The use of 'Judah' rather than 'Israel' for the sanctuary may reflect the southern location of the Temple in Jerusalem. The plural mamshelotav ('His dominions') is unusual — it may be a plural of majesty or may refer to the multiple tribal territories that together constitute God's realm.
3. The verb ra'ah ('it saw') raises the question: what did the sea see? The psalm does not say explicitly — the object is left unstated, creating suspense that verse 7 will resolve (the presence of the Lord). The personification of water as a creature that sees and flees is among the most striking images in Hebrew poetry.
4. The Sinai theophany is in view — Exodus 19:18 says the whole mountain trembled violently. But the psalmist reimagines the trembling as dancing. The comparison to rams and lambs domesticates the cosmic event, making the mountains into God's flock. The word order places the verb first for dramatic emphasis: 'Skipped — the mountains — like rams.'
5. The shift from third person narrative (vv. 3-4) to second person direct address (vv. 5-6) is a dramatic move. The psalmist speaks to creation as a witness, demanding an account. The imperfect verbs tanus ('you flee') and tissov ('you turn back') switch from the past-tense narration to present-tense confrontation — the events are re-experienced in the moment of singing.

6. The interrogation continues: the mountains and hills are now addressed directly and asked why they danced. The repetition of the exact imagery from verse 4 but in question form transforms the description into a demand for explanation. The entire created order is called to testify about what it experienced.
7. The word Adon ('Lord, Master') here is not the divine name YHWH but the title of sovereignty. The verb chuli is an imperative: the psalmist commands the earth to tremble. The previous questions were rhetorical — the earth was already trembling — but now the command makes the response mandatory and ongoing: every encounter with this God should produce the same reaction.
8. The participle hofkhi ('who turns') is present-tense in form, suggesting this is not merely a past event but an ongoing characteristic of God: He is the one who turns rock into water. The challamish ('flint') is the hardest type of stone — the contrast between flint and flowing spring is maximized for poetic effect.

Summary: Psalm 115 is a liturgical psalm that moves from a plea for God's glory to a devastating satire on idols, then to a threefold call for Israel to trust the LORD, and finally to a blessing and a declaration of praise. The psalm contrasts the living God who acts from heaven with the dead idols who have mouths but cannot speak, eyes but cannot see, ears but cannot hear. The worshipers of those idols, the psalmist warns, become like them.

What Makes This Remarkable: The idol satire in verses 4-8 is among the most cutting passages in the Hebrew Bible. The psalmist catalogs the sensory organs of the idols — mouths, eyes, ears, noses, hands, feet, throats — and declares each one non-functional. The idols are a complete inversion of life: they have the form of a living being but none of the substance. The devastating conclusion in verse 8 is that the makers and worshipers of these idols 'become like them' — they too lose the capacity to speak, see, hear, and act. Idolatry does not merely offend God; it dehumanizes the worshiper. You become what you worship.

Translation Friction: The psalm's sharp division between Israel (who trusts the LORD) and the nations (who make idols) can feel exclusivist to modern readers. However, the psalm's critique is directed at the objects of worship, not at the worshipers as persons — the concern is that idol worship degrades human beings by orienting them toward dead things. The statement that 'the dead do not praise the LORD' (v. 17) reflects the Hebrew Bible's general uncertainty about the state of the dead, where Sheol is often described as a place of silence rather than of worship.

Connections: Psalm 115 is part of the Egyptian Hallel (113-118), sung after the Passover meal. The idol satire parallels Isaiah 44:9-20 and Jeremiah 10:1-16. The threefold call to trust (Israel, house of Aaron, those who fear the LORD) appears also in Psalm 118:2-4 and Psalm 135:19-20. The 'you become like what you worship' principle is echoed in Romans 1:21-23 where Paul describes humanity exchanging the glory of God for images.

¹Not to us, LORD, not to us, but to Your name give glory,
for the sake of Your faithful love,
for the sake of Your faithfulness.

²Why should the nations say,
"Where is their God?"

³But our God is in the heavens;
He does whatever He pleases.

⁴Their idols are silver and gold, crafted by human hands.

⁵They have mouths but cannot speak;
they have eyes but cannot see.

⁶They have ears but cannot hear;
they have noses but cannot smell.

⁷Their hands cannot feel;
their feet cannot walk.
No sound comes from their throat.

⁸Those who make them become like them — so does everyone who trusts in them.

⁹Israel, trust in the LORD!
He is their help and their shield.

¹⁰House of Aaron, put your trust in the LORD!
He is their help and their shield.

¹¹You who fear the LORD, put your trust in the LORD!
He is their help and their shield.

¹²The LORD remembers us — He will bless.
He will bless the house of Israel;
He will bless the house of Aaron.

¹³He will bless those who fear the LORD,
the small and the great alike.

¹⁴May the LORD give you increase,
you and your children.

¹⁵You are blessed by the LORD,
the maker of heaven and earth.

¹⁶The heavens belong to the LORD,
but the earth He has given to the children of humanity.

¹⁷The dead do not praise the LORD, nor do any who go down into silence.

¹⁸But we will bless the LORD
from now until forever.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word chesed is rendered 'faithful love' — it carries the sense of covenant loyalty, committed kindness, and steadfast devotion. The word emet here functions as 'faithfulness' or 'reliability' rather than abstract 'truth.' Together, chesed and emet form one of the most important word pairs in the Hebrew Bible, describing the twin pillars of God's covenant character.
2. The taunt ayyeh na Eloheihem ('where, then, is their God?') is a challenge to God's existence or power. The nations look at Israel's circumstances and conclude that Israel's God is absent or impotent. The psalmist raises this taunt not to validate it but to set up the answer that follows.
3. The verb chafetz ('He desires, He pleases') is the same root used in Psalm 112:1 for the person who 'delights' in God's commandments. The God of Israel is characterized by effective will — He desires and He does. This is the fundamental contrast with idols, which have no will and no capacity to act.

4. The word atzabbeihem ('their idols') comes from the root atzav, which can mean 'to shape, to form' but also 'to grieve, to cause pain.' The idols are shaped objects that cause grief. They are kesef ve-zahav ('silver and gold') — valuable materials, but still materials. And they are ma'aseh yedei adam ('the work of human hands') — made by the very creatures they are supposed to serve. The maker is greater than the made; the worshiper has degraded himself by bowing to his own handiwork.
5. The satire begins its catalog. The peh ('mouth') is the organ of speech, of command, of blessing — the idols have the form but not the function. The einayim ('eyes') are the organs of perception, of attention, of care — the idols have the shape but not the sight. Each line follows the same devastating pattern: they have X but cannot do what X does.
6. The catalog continues. The oznayim ('ears') cannot shama ('hear') — the God of Israel hears prayer, but these objects cannot receive any communication. The af ('nose') cannot reach ('smell') — the nose was particularly significant in ancient Near Eastern worship because incense offerings were understood as a pleasing aroma to the deity. An idol with a nose that cannot smell cannot receive the very offerings placed before it.
7. The catalog reaches its climax. The yadayim ('hands') cannot yamish ('feel, touch, handle') — they cannot act, cannot intervene, cannot rescue. The raglayim ('feet') cannot halakh ('walk') — they cannot come to anyone's aid, cannot move toward the one who prays. The final line is the most damning: lo yehgu bigronam ('they do not murmur in their throat') — they cannot even produce the most basic sound. The garon ('throat') that should produce voice produces nothing. Total silence. Total impotence.
8. The verb yihyu ('they will become') is future — the transformation is progressive and ongoing. The principle stated here is foundational: you become what you worship. This is not a curse imposed from outside but an organic consequence of misdirected devotion.
9. The threefold call to trust begins. Israel as a whole is addressed first. The verb betach ('trust') is an imperative — this is a command, not a suggestion. The LORD is described as ezram u-maginnam ('their help and their shield') — active assistance and protective covering. The shift from second person ('trust') to third person ('their help') suggests a liturgical antiphon: one voice calls, another responds.
10. The second call addresses beit Aharon ('house of Aaron') — the priestly families who serve in the Temple. Even those closest to God's presence need the command to trust. The refrain is identical: ezram u-maginnam hu ('He is their help and their shield').
11. The third call addresses yir'ei YHWH ('those who fear the LORD') — a category broader than ethnic Israel, potentially including God-fearing non-Israelites. This three-part structure (Israel, house of Aaron, God-fearers) creates concentric circles of covenant community. The refrain remains unchanged: the help and shield are the same for all who trust.
12. The verb zekharanu ('He has remembered us') shifts from command to confidence — after calling for trust, the psalm now affirms that God is already acting. The threefold yevarekh ('He will bless') mirrors the threefold call to trust. God's blessing follows the same three-part structure: Israel, house of Aaron, and (in the next verse) those who fear the LORD.
13. The blessing extends to yir'ei YHWH ('those who fear the LORD') — completing the threefold pattern. The phrase ha-qetanim im ha-gedolim ('the small with the great') emphasizes that God's blessing is not proportional to human status. The servant and the king, the child and the elder, the insignificant and the powerful all receive the same divine attention.
14. The verb yosef ('may He add, may He increase') is a jussive expressing a blessing-wish. The increase is aleikhem ('upon you') and al beneikhem ('and upon your children') — the blessing is generational, extending to descendants. This echoes the Abrahamic promise of multiplication.
15. Berukhim attem la-YHWH ('blessed are you by the LORD') — the passive participle declares the blessing as already in effect. The LORD is identified as oseh shamayim va-aretz ('maker of heaven and earth') — a creation title that contrasts sharply with the idols who are ma'aseh yedei adam ('the work of human hands'). The creator God blesses; the created idols cannot.
16. This verse is sometimes read as limiting God's involvement with earth, but in the context of a psalm that has just affirmed God's active blessing, provision, and increase on earth, the point is not divine absence but human responsibility. The earth is given — it is a trust, not an abandonment.
17. Lo ha-metim yehalelu Yah ('the dead do not praise the LORD') — in the Hebrew understanding of death, Sheol is a place of silence, inactivity, and cessation of worship. The phrase yordei dumah ('those who go down into silence') is a poetic name for the dead and for the realm of death. Dumah means 'silence' — the opposite of praise. This verse functions as motivation: praise God now, because the dead cannot.
18. Va-anachnu nebarekh Yah ('but we — we will bless the LORD') — the emphatic pronoun anachnu sets up a contrast with the dead of the previous verse. The dead are silent; we will speak. The phrase me'attah ve-ad olam ('from now until forever') matches Psalm 113:2, creating a frame around the Hallel collection. The final Hallelujah closes the psalm with the word that opened it.

Summary: Psalm 116 is a thanksgiving psalm in which an individual who was near death recounts how the LORD heard his cry and delivered him. The psalmist declares his love for the LORD, describes the cords of death and the anguish of Sheol that had seized him, and testifies that the LORD saved his life. He then asks what he can return to God for such deliverance and answers his own question: he will lift the cup of salvation, call on the LORD's name, pay his vows, and offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving — all in the presence of God's people, in the courts of the LORD's house.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's most theologically significant line may be verse 15: 'Precious in the eyes of the LORD is the death of His faithful ones.' This has been read in two very different ways — either that God values the death of His saints (making their death a weighty, significant event that He does not treat lightly) or that God considers their death too costly to allow (making 'precious' mean 'expensive, not to be spent cheaply'). Both readings are grammatically possible, and the context of a psalm about deliverance from death favors the second: God does not let His faithful ones die carelessly. The psalm's structure moves from crisis (vv. 1-4) to deliverance (vv. 5-9) to response (vv. 10-19), modeling the pattern of lament-salvation-thanksgiving that structures much of Israel's worship.

Translation Friction: The LXX divides this psalm into two separate psalms (114 and 115 in LXX numbering), splitting at approximately verse 10. This division reflects an ancient debate about whether the psalm is one composition or two. The Hebrew text (followed by the WLC) treats it as a single psalm. The phrase 'I believed, therefore I spoke' (v. 10) is quoted by Paul in 2 Corinthians 4:13, but in a context quite different from the original — Paul applies it to his own suffering and hope of resurrection, extending the psalm's meaning beyond its original scope.

Connections: Psalm 116 is part of the Egyptian Hallel (113-118), sung at Passover. Jesus would have sung this psalm at the Last Supper, including the words about the 'cup of salvation' — a striking connection to the cup of the new covenant He was about to institute. Paul quotes verse 10 in 2 Corinthians 4:13. The phrase 'cords of death' (v. 3) echoes Psalm 18:4-5 and 2 Samuel 22:5-6. The vow-paying in the courts of the LORD's house connects to the Temple worship that was central to Israelite thanksgiving.

¹I love the LORD
because He hears my voice, my pleas for mercy.

²Because He turned His ear toward me,
I will call on Him as long as I live.

³The cords of death wrapped around me;
the straits of Sheol found me.
I found distress and grief.

⁴Then I called on the name of the LORD:
"Please, LORD, rescue my life!"

⁵The LORD is gracious and righteous;
our God shows compassion.

⁶The LORD watches over the vulnerable;
I was brought low, and He saved me.

⁷Return, my soul, to your rest,
for the LORD has dealt generously with you.

⁸For You rescued my life from death,
my eyes from tears,
my feet from stumbling.

⁹I will walk before the LORD
among the living.

¹⁰I believed, even when I said,
"I am severely afflicted."

¹¹I said in my alarm,
"Every person is a liar."

¹²What can I give back to the LORD for all His gifts to me?

¹³I will lift the cup of salvation and call on the name of the LORD.

¹⁴I will fulfill my vows to the LORD
in the presence of all His people.

¹⁵Costly in the eyes of the LORD is the death of His faithful ones.

¹⁶Please, LORD — truly I am Your servant;
I am Your servant, the child of Your maidservant.
You have loosened my bonds.

¹⁷To You I will offer a sacrifice of thanksgiving
and call on the name of the LORD.

¹⁸I will fulfill my vows to the LORD
in the presence of all His people,

¹⁹in the courts of the house of the LORD,
in your midst, Jerusalem.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The syntax of the opening is slightly unusual — ahavti ('I loved/I love') stands without an explicit object. Most translations supply 'the LORD' as the object, which fits the context. The verb yishma ('He hears') is in the imperfect, suggesting ongoing action: the LORD hears — He is always hearing — and that is why the psalmist loves.
2. The phrase hittah ozno li ('He inclined His ear to me') is a vivid anthropomorphism — God bends down, tilts His ear, leans in to listen. The response is ve-yavmai eqra ('and in my days I will call') — for the rest of his life, the psalmist will continue to call on the LORD. The deliverance creates a lifetime of prayer.
3. The word chevlei is ambiguous between 'cords' and 'pangs' — some translations choose one, some the other. The rendering 'cords' is chosen here because it pairs with the image of being wrapped or encircled (afafuni). Sheol is the realm of the dead, not a place of punishment but a place of shadow, silence, and separation from the living.
4. The phrase uv-shem YHWH eqra ('and on the name of the LORD I called') introduces the prayer that saved his life. The prayer itself is terse and desperate: annah YHWH malletah nafshi ('please, LORD, deliver my life'). The word annah ('please, I beg you') is a particle of urgent entreaty. The verb malletah (Piel imperative of malat, 'to slip away, to escape, to deliver') asks God to cause his nefesh ('life, self, soul') to escape death's grip.

5. Three attributes are listed: channun ('gracious'), tzaddiq ('righteous'), and merachem ('compassionate, showing mercy'). The first echoes Exodus 34:6. The second affirms that God's rescue is not arbitrary but just. The third — merachem, from the root racham ('womb-compassion') — describes a tenderness that is visceral, like a mother's instinct toward her child.
6. The word peta'im ('simple ones, naive ones, the inexperienced') describes people who lack the resources or sophistication to protect themselves. The LORD is their shomer ('guardian, keeper'). The psalmist identifies with them: dalloti ('I was brought low, I was reduced') — from the root dalal ('to hang down, to be thin, to be depleted'). In that depleted state, ve-li yehoshi'a ('and He saved me').
7. The psalmist addresses his own nefesh ('soul, self, inner life'): shuvi ('return') to menuchayikhi ('your rest, your resting place'). The crisis had displaced his inner peace; now he commands himself to come back to rest. The reason: ki YHWH gamal alayikhi ('for the LORD has dealt bountifully upon you'). The verb gamal means 'to deal with, to repay, to bring to completion' — God has finished the work of rescue.
8. A threefold deliverance: nafshi mi-mavet ('my life from death'), einai min dim'ah ('my eyes from tears'), ragli middechi ('my feet from stumbling'). The whole person is saved — life, sight, and movement. The verb chilatzta ('You rescued, You pulled out') means to pull someone from a tight place, to extricate.
9. The verb ethalekh ('I will walk') in the Hitpael means 'to walk about, to conduct oneself, to live one's life.' The psalmist will live lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD, in the LORD's presence'). The phrase be-artzot ha-chayyim ('in the lands of the living') contrasts with Sheol, the land of the dead. The deliverance has returned him to the realm of life and worship.
10. The LXX splits the psalm here, making this the beginning of a new psalm (LXX Psalm 115). Paul's quotation in 2 Corinthians 4:13 follows the LXX reading. The Hebrew is genuinely ambiguous and has generated extensive scholarly discussion. The word aniti ('I was afflicted') from anah ('to be bowed down, afflicted') describes deep suffering.
11. The word bechofzi ('in my alarm, in my haste, in my panic') describes a moment of crisis-driven speech. The declaration kol ha-adam kozev ('every person is a liar') is an extreme statement born of desperation — when human help failed, the psalmist concluded that all human promises are empty. The psalm does not endorse this as a permanent theology but records it as an honest moment of despair. Paul quotes this in Romans 3:4.
12. The question mah ashiv la-YHWH ('what can I return to the LORD?') is not rhetorical despair but genuine gratitude searching for an adequate response. The word tagmulohi ('His benefits, His dealings, His gifts') from gamal describes the full weight of what God has done. The psalmist knows he cannot repay God but asks what fitting response he can offer.
13. The 'cup of salvation' has deep resonance in Jewish Passover liturgy — the four cups of the Seder each carry theological meaning. Jesus' institution of the cup at the Last Supper (Luke 22:20) would have occurred in the context of singing this very psalm. The verb essa ('I will lift, I will carry') is the gesture of offering and public display.
14. Nedarai la-YHWH ashallem ('my vows to the LORD I will pay') — the vows made during the crisis will now be fulfilled publicly. The word negdah ('in the presence of, before the face of') emphasizes that this is not private devotion but public testimony. The community witnesses the fulfillment, and the testimony becomes part of the communal memory of God's faithfulness.
15. The word chasidav ('His faithful ones') is the plural of chasid, derived from chesed ('faithful love'). A chasid is a person characterized by chesed — one who both receives and gives covenant loyalty. The rendering 'costly' rather than 'precious' captures the economic metaphor: God treats the death of His faithful as something He is reluctant to spend.
16. The double declaration ani avdekha ('I am Your servant') is emphatic — servanthood to God is not a burden but a privilege after deliverance. The phrase ben amatekha ('son of Your maidservant') means a servant born in the household, not purchased from outside — the psalmist belongs to God's household by birth and by choice. The verb pittachta ('You opened, You loosened') applied to moserai ('my bonds, my fetters') means God has set him free from the cords of death that bound him in verse 3.
17. The zevach todah ('sacrifice of thanksgiving') was a specific category of peace offering (shelamim) described in Leviticus 7:12-15. It included animal sacrifice accompanied by various breads and was eaten communally. The todah ('thanksgiving') is not just verbal gratitude but a concrete liturgical act involving food, community, and testimony.
18. This verse is identical to verse 14, forming a liturgical refrain. The repetition is not accidental but structural — it frames the central declarations of verses 15-17 with the commitment to public testimony. The vow-fulfillment brackets the psalm's deepest theological statements.
19. The location is specified: chatzrot beit YHWH ('the courts of the LORD's house') — the Temple precincts where public worship and sacrifice took place. The phrase betokhekhi Yerushalayim ('in your midst, Jerusalem') personalizes the city as a living entity addressed directly. The psalm ends with Hallelujah — the final word of praise that both closes this psalm and connects it to the Hallel sequence.

Summary: Psalm 117 is the shortest psalm and the shortest chapter in the Bible — just two verses. It calls on all nations and all peoples to praise the LORD because His faithful love toward Israel is mighty and His faithfulness endures forever. Despite its brevity, the psalm makes a universalist claim that extends Israel's worship to the whole earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's brevity is itself remarkable — it says everything that needs to be said in seventeen Hebrew words. But the theological weight is enormous: the nations are summoned to praise Israel's God. This is not a call for the nations to become Israelites but a declaration that the LORD's faithful love (chesed) toward Israel is so powerful that even the nations should recognize and celebrate it. The logic is: God's covenant love is so great that its effects spill beyond Israel and become visible to the whole world. Paul quotes this psalm in Romans 15:11 as evidence that God always intended to include the Gentiles in His praise.

Translation Friction: The psalm's call for all nations to praise Israel's God raises the question of why the nations would celebrate God's chesed toward Israel specifically. One answer is that the nations benefit from Israel's blessing — the Abrahamic promise included 'in you all the families of the earth will be blessed' (Genesis 12:3). Another is that the nations, having witnessed God's faithfulness to Israel, recognize that such a God is worthy of universal worship. The psalm does not resolve this tension but holds both ideas together.

Connections: Paul quotes Psalm 117:1 in Romans 15:11 as part of his argument that the Hebrew Scriptures always anticipated Gentile inclusion in the worship of Israel's God. The psalm is part of the Egyptian Hallel (113-118) and sits at the exact center of the collection. The pairing of chesed and emet echoes Exodus 34:6 and appears throughout the Psalter. As the middle chapter of the Bible (by chapter count), it has attracted attention from those who see its universalist theme as the Bible's structural center.

¹Praise the LORD, all nations!

Exalt Him, all peoples!

²For His faithful love toward us is mighty, and the faithfulness of the LORD endures forever.
Praise the LORD!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The distinction between goyim ('nations' as political entities) and ummim ('peoples' as ethnic or cultural groups) creates a merism — together they mean 'everyone, without exception.' Paul cites this verse in Romans 15:11 in a catena of quotations proving that the inclusion of Gentiles in God's praise was always part of the divine plan.
2. The verb gavar ('to be mighty, to prevail') is the same root as gibbor ('mighty warrior'). Applied to chesed, it means God's faithful love is not gentle sentiment but overpowering force — it conquers. The speaker says 'us' (aleinu), meaning Israel, but the audience is the nations — Israel testifies to the nations about what God's chesed has done.

Summary: Psalm 118 is the climactic finale of the Egyptian Hallel (Psalms 113-118). It opens and closes with the refrain 'Give thanks to the LORD, for He is good — His faithful love endures forever.' Between these frames, a speaker (likely a king or leader) recounts being surrounded by enemies, pushed to the brink, and then rescued by the LORD. The psalm moves from personal testimony to a liturgical procession approaching the Temple gates, culminating in the famous declaration: 'The stone the builders rejected has become the cornerstone.' The psalm celebrates the reversal of human rejection by divine choice.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 118 is the most quoted psalm in the New Testament. 'The stone the builders rejected has become the cornerstone' (v. 22) is applied to Jesus by every gospel writer and by Paul and Peter. 'Blessed is he who comes in the name of the LORD' (v. 26) is the crowd's acclamation at the triumphal entry into Jerusalem. 'This is the day the LORD has made' (v. 24) has become one of the most recognized sentences in the Bible. The psalm's theological center is the reversal pattern: what the powerful rejected, God chose. What nations surrounded, God broke through. What was pushed to falling, God upheld. The entire Hallel collection builds to this psalm — the Passover celebration culminates in the declaration that God's faithful love overturns every human verdict.

Translation Friction: The identity of the speaker is debated — is this a king returning from battle, a personified Israel, or a liturgical 'everyman'? The processional elements (gates, binding the sacrifice, the altar) suggest a specific Temple ceremony, but the language is general enough to be adopted by any worshiper. The 'stone the builders rejected' (v. 22) was originally a metaphor for Israel or its king, rejected by the powerful nations but chosen by God. The New Testament application to Jesus extends this beyond its original scope — which is theologically significant precisely because the pattern of divine reversal operates at multiple levels.

Connections: Jesus quotes verse 22 (the rejected stone) in Matthew 21:42, Mark 12:10, and Luke 20:17. Peter quotes it in Acts 4:11 and 1 Peter 2:7. Paul alludes to it in Ephesians 2:20. The crowd quotes verse 26 at the triumphal entry (Matthew 21:9, Mark 11:9, Luke 19:38, John 12:13). Jesus refers to verse 26 in Matthew 23:39 as a prophecy about Jerusalem's future recognition of Him. The Hallel was the last hymn sung at the Last Supper (Matthew 26:30) — Psalm 118 was likely the final psalm Jesus sang before Gethsemane.

and I will declare the works of the LORD.

¹⁸The LORD disciplined me severely, but He did not hand me over to death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening formula hodu la-YHWH ki tov ki le'olam chasdo ('give thanks to the LORD for He is good, for His faithful love is forever') is shared with Psalms 106:1, 107:1, and 136:1. It functions as a liturgical refrain that frames the entire psalm (repeated in v. 29). The word chesed is rendered 'faithful love' — the covenant loyalty that does not expire.
2. The threefold call (Israel, house of Aaron, those who fear the LORD) mirrors Psalm 115:9-11. Each group is invited to affirm the refrain. Israel speaks first as the covenant nation.
3. The priests add their voice to the refrain. As those who minister closest to God's presence, their testimony carries liturgical authority.
4. The third group — yir'ei YHWH ('those who fear the LORD') — completes the threefold pattern. This phrase may include God-fearing non-Israelites, extending the scope of praise beyond ethnic boundaries.
5. The word metzar comes from the root tzarar ('to be narrow, to press, to bind'). It is related to mitzrayim ('Egypt'), and some scholars hear an etymological echo here: Egypt was the original 'narrow place' from which Israel cried out to God. The merchav ('broad place') is the space of freedom, movement, and possibility.
6. YHWH li ('the LORD is for me / the LORD is mine') is a statement of radical allegiance and confidence. The rhetorical question mah ya'aseh li adam ('what can a human do to me?') is quoted in Hebrews 13:6. The logic is not that humans are powerless but that their power is nothing compared to having the LORD on one's side.
7. YHWH li be-ozrai ('the LORD is for me among those who help me') — God is not merely one helper among many but the decisive helper whose presence changes everything. The phrase er'eh vesone'ai ('I will look upon those who hate me') implies seeing their defeat, though the word 'defeat' is not stated — the looking itself is an act of vindication.
8. The word lachsot ('to take refuge, to seek shelter') describes the act of running to God for protection. The contrast with bittoach ba-adam ('trusting in humans') is not cynicism about people but clarity about where ultimate security lies.
9. The parallel intensifies: if trusting humans generally is inferior to trusting God, trusting nedivim ('princes, nobles, powerful leaders') is equally inferior. Even the most powerful human allies cannot provide what the LORD provides.
10. Kol goyim sevavuni ('all nations encircled me') — the military imagery describes being completely surrounded. The response is beshem YHWH ki amilam ('in the name of the LORD, surely I cut them off'). The verb mul (Hiphil: amil) means 'to cut off, to circumcise, to remove.' The power to break the siege comes not from military strength but from the name — the authority and presence — of the LORD.
11. The doubled savvuni gam sevavuni ('they encircled me, they even encircled me') intensifies the sense of siege. The refrain beshem YHWH ki amilam remains unchanged — the response does not escalate with the threat because the LORD's name is already sufficient.
12. Two similes describe the enemies: kidevorim ('like bees') — swarming, stinging, relentless — and ke-esh qotzim ('like fire of thorns') — fierce and fast but quickly extinguished. Thorn fires burn hot but burn out almost immediately. The enemies are dangerous but unsustainable. The refrain closes the third cycle: in the name of the LORD, they are cut off.
13. Dachoh dechitani linpol ('pushing you pushed me to fall') — the emphatic infinitive absolute (dachoh) intensifies the verb: the push was severe, determined, intended to destroy. The subject 'you' addresses the enemy directly. The counter-statement is simple: va-YHWH azarani ('but the LORD helped me'). The contrast between the elaborate description of the attack and the brief statement of rescue dramatizes the sufficiency of divine help.
14. The phrase ozzi ve-zimrat Yah is identical to Exodus 15:2a and Isaiah 12:2. The intertextual connection is deliberate — every subsequent rescue by the LORD is a re-enactment of the Exodus. The word zimrat can mean 'song' or 'strength/protection' (from a separate root zamar meaning 'to be strong'), and the ambiguity may be intentional.
15. Qol rinnah vishu'ah ('the sound of joyful shouting and salvation') fills be-oholei tzaddiqim ('the tents of the righteous'). The 'tents' may refer to actual dwellings, to festival booths, or to the encampment metaphor for God's people. The quotation within the psalm — yemin YHWH osah chayil ('the right hand of the LORD does valiantly') — is what the righteous are shouting. The yemin ('right hand') is the hand of power, of oath-taking, of action.
16. The triple mention of yemin YHWH ('the right hand of the LORD') across verses 15-16 creates a drumbeat of celebration. The verb romemah ('is raised high, is exalted') pictures God's hand lifted in victory — the image of a warrior who has won the fight and raises his weapon-hand in triumph.

- 17. The phrase lo amut ki echyeh has become one of the most quoted lines in the Psalms. The ki ('but, rather') is adversative, creating a sharp contrast: not death but life. The verb sapper ('to recount, to tell, to declare') is the verb of testimony — the survivor becomes a witness.
- 18. Yassor yisserani Yah ('disciplining the LORD disciplined me') — the emphatic infinitive absolute acknowledges that the suffering was real and severe, and that it came from the LORD. This is not enemy action alone but divine discipline. Yet ve-la-mavet lo netanani ('but to death He did not give me') — the discipline had a limit. God chastened but did not destroy. The distinction between discipline and destruction is crucial: discipline serves a purpose; destruction ends all purpose.
- 19. The scene shifts to the Temple: pitchu li sha'arei tzedeq ('open for me the gates of righteousness'). The sha'arei tzedeq ('gates of righteousness') are the Temple gates through which the righteous enter to worship. The psalmist, having survived the crisis, now approaches the place of thanksgiving. The verb odeh ('I will give thanks') indicates that the purpose of entering is public testimony.
- 20. A voice (perhaps a gatekeeper or Levite) responds: zeh ha-sha'ar la-YHWH ('this is the gate belonging to the LORD') — the gate is identified as divine property. The condition of entry: tzaddiqim yavo'u vo ('the righteous will enter through it'). The exchange suggests a liturgical dialogue between the one approaching and those guarding the entrance.
- 21. Now inside the gates, the psalmist addresses God directly: odekha ki anitani ('I thank You for You answered me'). The verb anah ('to answer') confirms that the prayer of distress (v. 5) was heard and responded to. The phrase vattehi li lishu'ah ('and You became my salvation') repeats verse 14b, creating a structural echo.
- 22. The rosh pinnah ('head of the corner') is the most important stone in a building — it sets the angle, determines the alignment, and bears the weight of two walls. Some scholars identify it as the capstone rather than the foundation stone, but in either case it is the stone that holds the structure together. Jesus applies this verse to Himself in Matthew 21:42, Mark 12:10, and Luke 20:17. Peter uses it in Acts 4:11 and 1 Peter 2:7.
- 23. Me-et YHWH hayetah zot ('from the LORD this has come about') — the reversal was not human cleverness but divine action. The word nifla't ('wonderful, marvelous') comes from the root pala ('to be extraordinary, beyond human capacity'). The reversal exceeds what anyone could have planned or expected — it can only be explained as God's work.
- 24. Zeh ha-yom asah YHWH ('this is the day the LORD has made') — the 'day' is not a generic day but this specific day of reversal and vindication. The LORD 'made' it in the sense that He brought it about, orchestrated it, caused it to happen. The response is nagilah venismechah vo ('let us exult and rejoice in it') — corporate celebration of what God has done.
- 25. The double anna YHWH ('please, LORD') is urgent entreaty. The verbs hoshi'ah na ('save, please!') and hatzlichah na ('grant success, please!') form the Hebrew phrase from which 'Hosanna' derives. Hoshi'ah na became Hosanna in Greek transliteration — the crowd's cry at Jesus' triumphal entry (Matthew 21:9) is a direct quotation of this verse.
- 26. In the original liturgical setting, this may have been spoken by the priests to a king or pilgrim arriving at the Temple. In its New Testament application, the phrase takes on messianic significance — Jesus is identified as 'the one who comes' in God's name, and His entry into Jerusalem is framed as a fulfillment of this psalm.
- 27. El YHWH vayyaer lanu ('the LORD is God, and He has shone upon us') — the verb he'ir ('to give light, to shine') may refer to the priestly blessing of Numbers 6:25 ('the LORD make His face shine upon you'). The second instruction — isru chag ba-avotim ad qarnot ha-mizbeach ('bind the festival offering with cords/branches up to the horns of the altar') — describes the preparation of the sacrifice. The avotim can mean 'cords' or 'thick branches.' The qarnot ha-mizbeach ('horns of the altar') were the projecting corners of the sacrificial altar.
- 28. Eli attah ve-odekka ('You are my God and I will thank You') — the personal declaration. The shift from communal praise to individual address is intimate: attah ('You') is direct, face-to-face language. The psalmist claims God personally — not merely 'our God' but 'my God' — and pledges both thanksgiving (odekka) and exaltation (aromemekka).
- 29. The psalm closes with the same refrain that opened it (v. 1): hodu la-YHWH ki tov ki le'olam chasdo. The frame is complete. Everything between the two refrains — the distress, the siege, the rescue, the rejected stone, the opened gates, the festival procession — is contained within and explained by the steadfast faithful love of the LORD.

Summary: Psalm 119 is the longest chapter in the Bible: 176 verses organized as an alphabetic acrostic of 22 stanzas, one for every letter of the Hebrew alphabet from aleph to tav. Each stanza contains exactly eight verses, and every verse within a stanza begins with that stanza's Hebrew letter. The psalm is a sustained meditation on God's revealed word, and it cycles through eight Hebrew terms for divine revelation: torah (instruction), edut/edot (testimony/testimonies), piqqudim (precepts), chuqqim (statutes), mitsvot (commandments), mishpatim (judgments/ordinances), davar/devarim (word/words), and imrah (saying/promise). Nearly every verse contains at least one of these eight terms. The psalmist is not writing systematic theology but praying through the alphabet — the entire range of human speech — and filling every letter with devotion to God's instruction.

What Makes This Remarkable: The acrostic structure is not decorative but theological. By writing one stanza for every letter of the Hebrew alphabet, the psalmist says: there is no letter, no sound, no corner of language that cannot be turned toward God's instruction. The alphabet is the raw material of all speech, and the psalmist consecrates every piece of it. The eight rotating torah-words function like a musical theme with variations — each word emphasizes a different facet of revelation (instruction, testimony, precept, statute, command, judgment, word, promise), and their constant recombination across 176 verses creates a kaleidoscopic portrait of what it means to live under God's spoken will. The psalm is also deeply personal: the psalmist weeps, suffers, is persecuted by the arrogant, lies awake at night, and clings to God's word as the one stable reality in a hostile world. This is not a cold catalog of legal terms but an intimate journal of someone who has staked everything on the reliability of what God has said.

Translation Friction: Modern readers sometimes experience Psalm 119 as repetitive, but the repetition is the point. This is a meditation manual — it is designed to be prayed slowly, one stanza at a time, the way a musician practices scales. The eight torah-words are not synonyms but overlapping perspectives on the same reality: torah emphasizes instruction and guidance, edut emphasizes witness and testimony, piqudim emphasizes specific charges or appointments, chuqqim emphasizes engraved or permanent decrees, mitsvot emphasizes direct commands, mishpatim emphasizes judicial decisions and case law, davar emphasizes the spoken or communicated word, and imrah emphasizes the personal promise or saying. The psalmist's constant petition for understanding (binah, sekhel, da'at) suggests that knowing God's word is not automatic — it requires ongoing illumination.

Connections: Psalm 119 is the climax of the Torah-psalms that begin with Psalm 1 ('Blessed is the one whose delight is in the instruction of the LORD') and Psalm 19 ('The instruction of the LORD is complete, restoring the soul'). It expands the themes of those shorter psalms into a full alphabetic meditation. The eight torah-words echo Deuteronomy's vocabulary for covenant obligation (especially Deuteronomy 4-6). The psalmist's suffering and persecution connect to the lament traditions found throughout the Psalter. The opening beatitude ('Blessed are those whose way is blameless, who walk in the instruction of the LORD') mirrors Psalm 1:1 and frames the entire psalm as a wisdom text.

¹How blessed are those whose way is blameless, who walk in the instruction of the LORD.

²How blessed are those who guard his testimonies, who seek him with their whole heart.

³Indeed they do no wrong;
they walk in his ways.

⁴You yourself have commanded your precepts to be kept with care.

⁵If only my ways were firmly set to keep your statutes!

⁶Then I would not be put to shame
when I look at all your commandments.

⁷I will give you thanks with an upright heart as I learn your righteous judgments.

⁸I will keep your statutes — do not utterly forsake me.

⁹How can a young person keep his path pure?
By guarding it according to your word.

¹⁰With my whole heart I seek you;
do not let me stray from your commandments.

¹¹In my heart I have treasured your promise,
so that I will not sin against you.

¹²Blessed are you, O LORD;
teach me your statutes.

¹³With my lips I recount
all the judgments of your mouth.

¹⁴In the way of your testimonies I rejoice
as over all wealth.

¹⁵On your precepts I will meditate,
and I will fix my gaze on your paths.

¹⁶In your statutes I take delight;
I will not forget your word.

¹⁷Deal generously with your servant, that I may live and keep your word.

¹⁸Uncover my eyes, that I may see wondrous things from your instruction.

¹⁹I am a stranger in the land;
do not hide your commandments from me.

²⁰My soul is crushed with longing for your judgments at all times.

²¹You rebuke the arrogant — they are cursed,
those who stray from your commandments.

²²Roll away from me scorn and contempt, for I have guarded your testimonies.

²³Even when rulers sit and conspire against me, your servant meditates on your statutes.

²⁴Yes, your testimonies are my delight, my counselors.

²⁵My soul clings to the dust;
revive me according to your word.

²⁶I told you my ways and you answered me;
teach me your statutes.

²⁷Make me understand the way of your precepts, and I will meditate on your wonders.

²⁸My soul melts with grief;
raise me up according to your word.

²⁹Remove from me the way of falsehood, and graciously grant me your instruction.

³⁰I have chosen the way of faithfulness;
your judgments I have set before me.

³¹I cling to your testimonies, O LORD;
do not put me to shame.

³²I will run the way of your commandments, for you enlarge my heart.

³³Teach me, O LORD, the way of your statutes, and I will keep it to the end.

³⁴Give me understanding, and I will guard your instruction and keep it with my whole heart.

³⁵Lead me in the path of your commandments, for in it I delight.

³⁶Turn my heart toward your testimonies and not toward selfish gain.

³⁷Turn my eyes away from looking at worthless things;
revive me in your way.

³⁸Confirm your promise to your servant,
which leads to fearing you.

³⁹Take away the disgrace I dread, for your judgments are good.

⁴⁰See how I long for your precepts!
Revive me in your righteousness.

⁴¹Let your faithful love come to me, O LORD — your salvation, according to your promise.

⁴²Then I will have an answer for those who taunt me, for I trust in your word.

⁴³Do not snatch the word of truth from my mouth entirely, for I put my hope in your judgments.

⁴⁴I will keep your instruction continually, forever and ever.

⁴⁵I will walk in a wide open place,
for I have sought your precepts.

⁴⁶I will speak of your testimonies before kings and will not be ashamed.

⁴⁷I will delight in your commandments, which I love.

⁴⁸I will lift my hands toward your commandments, which I love, and I will meditate on your statutes.

⁴⁹Remember your word to your servant,
in which you have given me hope.

⁵⁰This is my comfort in my suffering:
that your promise has revived me.

⁵¹The arrogant mock me bitterly,
but I do not turn from your instruction.

⁵²I remember your judgments from of old, O LORD, and I find comfort.

⁵³Burning indignation seizes me because of the wicked who abandon your instruction.

⁵⁴Your statutes have been my songs in the house of my sojourning.

⁵⁵I remember your name in the night, O LORD, and I keep your instruction.

⁵⁶This has been my way of life:
that I have guarded your precepts.

⁵⁷The LORD is my portion;
I have promised to keep your words.

⁵⁸I seek your favor with my whole heart;
be gracious to me according to your promise.

⁵⁹I considered my ways and turned my feet back to your testimonies.

⁶⁰I hurried and did not delay to keep your commandments.

⁶¹The ropes of the wicked have ensnared me,
but I have not forgotten your instruction.

⁶²At midnight I rise to give you thanks for your righteous judgments.

⁶³I am a companion of all who fear you,
of those who keep your precepts.

⁶⁴The earth is full of your faithful love, O LORD;
teach me your statutes.

⁶⁵You have dealt well with your servant,
O LORD, according to your word.

⁶⁶Teach me good judgment and knowledge, for I trust in your commandments.

⁶⁷Before I was humbled I went astray,
but now I keep your promise.

⁶⁸You are good and you do good;
teach me your statutes.

⁶⁹The arrogant smear me with lies,
but I guard your precepts with my whole heart.

⁷⁰Their heart is thick like fat,
but I delight in your instruction.

⁷¹It was good for me that I was humbled,
so that I might learn your statutes.

⁷²The instruction from your mouth is better to me than thousands of gold and silver pieces.

⁷³Your hands made me and formed me;
give me understanding, that I may learn your commandments.

⁷⁴Those who fear you see me and rejoice, for I have put my hope in your word.

⁷⁵I know, O LORD, that your judgments are righteous and that in faithfulness you humbled me.

⁷⁶Let your faithful love be my comfort, according to your promise to your servant.

⁷⁷Let your compassion come to me, that I may live, for your instruction is my delight.

⁷⁸Let the arrogant be put to shame, for they wrong me with lies;
but I — I will meditate on your precepts.

⁷⁹Let those who fear you turn to me,
those who know your testimonies.

⁸⁰Let my heart be blameless in your statutes,
so that I will not be put to shame.

⁸¹My soul wastes away for your salvation;
I put my hope in your word.

⁸²My eyes fail with watching for your promise, saying, 'When will you comfort me?'

⁸³Though I have become like a wineskin in smoke,
I do not forget your statutes.

⁸⁴How many days must your servant endure?
When will you execute judgment on my pursuers?

⁸⁵The arrogant have dug pits for me — they who do not follow your instruction.

⁸⁶All your commandments are faithful;
they persecute me with lies — help me!

⁸⁷They nearly destroyed me on earth,
but I did not abandon your precepts.

⁸⁸According to your faithful love, revive me,
and I will keep the testimony of your mouth.

⁸⁹Forever, O LORD, your word stands firm in heaven.

⁹⁰Your faithfulness endures through all generations;
you established the earth, and it stands.

⁹¹By your judgments they stand today,
for all things are your servants.

⁹²If your instruction had not been my delight,
I would have perished in my suffering.

⁹³I will never forget your precepts, for by them you have given me life.

⁹⁴I am yours — save me,
for I have sought your precepts.

⁹⁵The wicked lie in wait to destroy me,
but I consider your testimonies.

⁹⁶I have seen a limit to all perfection, but your commandment is boundlessly wide.

⁹⁷How I love your instruction!
It is my meditation all day long.

⁹⁸Your commandments make me wiser than my enemies, for they are always with me.

⁹⁹I have more insight than all my teachers, for your testimonies are my meditation.

¹⁰⁰I understand more than the elders,
for I guard your precepts.

¹⁰¹I hold back my feet from every evil path,
in order to keep your word.

¹⁰²I have not turned from your judgments, for you yourself have taught me.

¹⁰³How sweet is your promise to my taste — sweeter than honey to my mouth!

¹⁰⁴From your precepts I gain understanding;
therefore I hate every false path.

¹⁰⁵Your word is a lamp for my feet and a light for my path.

¹⁰⁶I have sworn an oath and confirmed it:
to keep your righteous judgments.

¹⁰⁷I am deeply afflicted;
O LORD, revive me according to your word.

¹⁰⁸Accept the freewill offerings of my mouth, O LORD, and teach me your judgments.

¹⁰⁹My life is constantly in my hands,
yet I do not forget your instruction.

¹¹⁰The wicked set a trap for me,
but I do not stray from your precepts.

¹¹¹Your testimonies are my inheritance forever, for they are the joy of my heart.

¹¹²I incline my heart to perform your statutes forever, to the very end.

¹¹³I hate the double-minded,
but your instruction I love.

¹¹⁴You are my shelter and my shield;
I put my hope in your word.

¹¹⁵Depart from me, you evildoers, for I will guard the commandments of my God.

¹¹⁶Sustain me according to your promise, that I may live, and do not let me be ashamed of my hope.

¹¹⁷Support me, and I will be saved;
I will gaze on your statutes continually.

¹¹⁸You reject all who stray from your statutes, for their cunning is a lie.

¹¹⁹You remove all the wicked of the earth like dross;
therefore I love your testimonies.

¹²⁰My flesh shudders in awe of you, and I stand in fear of your judgments.

¹²¹I have done what is just and right;
do not abandon me to my oppressors.

¹²²Be your servant's guarantor for good;
do not let the arrogant oppress me.

¹²³My eyes fail with watching for your salvation and for your righteous promise.

¹²⁴Deal with your servant according to your faithful love,
and teach me your statutes.

¹²⁵I am your servant; give me understanding, that I may know your testimonies.

¹²⁶It is time for the LORD to act,
for they have broken your instruction.

¹²⁷Therefore I love your commandments more than gold, more than fine gold.

¹²⁸Therefore I consider all your precepts — every one of them — right, and I hate every false path.

¹²⁹Your testimonies are wonderful;
therefore my soul guards them.

¹³⁰The unfolding of your words gives light;
it gives understanding to the simple.

¹³¹I open my mouth and pant,
for I long for your commandments.

¹³²Turn to me and be gracious to me, as is your way with those who love your name.

¹³³Steady my steps by your promise, and let no iniquity rule over me.

¹³⁴Ransom me from human oppression, and I will keep your precepts.

¹³⁵Make your face shine upon your servant,
and teach me your statutes.

¹³⁶Streams of water flow from my eyes because they do not keep your instruction.

¹³⁷You are righteous, O LORD, and your judgments are upright.

¹³⁸You have commanded your testimonies in righteousness and in great faithfulness.

¹³⁹My zeal consumes me,
because my enemies have forgotten your words.

¹⁴⁰Your promise is thoroughly refined, and your servant loves it.

¹⁴¹I am small and despised,
but I do not forget your precepts.

¹⁴²Your righteousness is righteousness forever, and your instruction is truth.

¹⁴³Trouble and distress have found me,
but your commandments are my delight.

¹⁴⁴Your testimonies are righteous forever;
give me understanding, and I will live.

¹⁴⁵I cry out with my whole heart — answer me, O LORD!
I will guard your statutes.

¹⁴⁶I call to you — save me,
and I will keep your testimonies.

¹⁴⁷I rise before dawn and cry for help;
I put my hope in your word.

¹⁴⁸My eyes are open before the night watches, that I may meditate on your promise.

¹⁴⁹Hear my voice according to your faithful love;
O LORD, revive me according to your judgment.

¹⁵⁰Those who pursue evil schemes draw near;
they are far from your instruction.

¹⁵¹You are near, O LORD, and all your commandments are truth.

¹⁵²Long ago I learned from your testimonies that you established them forever.

¹⁵³See my suffering and rescue me,
for I have not forgotten your instruction.

¹⁵⁴Plead my case and redeem me;
revive me according to your promise.

¹⁵⁵Salvation is far from the wicked, for they do not seek your statutes.

¹⁵⁶Your mercies are great, O LORD; revive me according to your judgments.

¹⁵⁷My persecutors and enemies are many,
but I do not turn from your testimonies.

¹⁵⁸I look at the faithless and feel disgust, because they do not keep your promise.

¹⁵⁹See how I love your precepts!
O LORD, revive me according to your faithful love.

¹⁶⁰The sum of your word is truth, and every one of your righteous judgments endures forever.

¹⁶¹Rulers persecute me without cause, but my heart stands in awe of your word.

¹⁶²I rejoice over your promise like one who finds great treasure.

¹⁶³I hate and despise falsehood,
but your instruction I love.

¹⁶⁴Seven times a day I praise you for your righteous judgments.

¹⁶⁵Great peace belongs to those who love your instruction, and nothing causes them to stumble.

¹⁶⁶I hope for your salvation, O LORD, and I do your commandments.

¹⁶⁷My soul keeps your testimonies, and I love them deeply.

¹⁶⁸I keep your precepts and your testimonies, for all my ways are before you.

¹⁶⁹Let my cry come before you, O LORD; give me understanding according to your word.

¹⁷⁰Let my plea come before you;
deliver me according to your promise.

¹⁷¹My lips will pour out praise, for you teach me your statutes.

¹⁷²My tongue will sing of your promise, for all your commandments are righteous.

¹⁷³Let your hand be ready to help me,
for I have chosen your precepts.

¹⁷⁴I long for your salvation, O LORD, and your instruction is my delight.

¹⁷⁵Let my soul live, and it will praise you,
and let your judgments help me.

¹⁷⁶I have wandered like a lost sheep;
seek your servant,
for I have not forgotten your commandments.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aleph stanza (vv. 1-8). Every verse in this stanza begins with the Hebrew letter aleph, the first letter of the alphabet. The psalmist begins at the beginning — with the foundational declaration that blessing flows from walking in God's instruction. The word ashrei is a plural construct ('blessings of') functioning as an exclamation — it cannot be reduced to a single English word. 'Happy' is too shallow; 'blessed' risks sounding passive. 'How blessed' preserves the exclamatory force.

2. The verb natsar ('to guard, to keep watch over, to preserve') implies active vigilance — God's testimonies (edotav) are something to be watched over and protected, not merely obeyed. The word edot ('testimonies') comes from the root ud ('to witness, to testify') and refers to God's declarations that bear witness to his character and will. Seeking (darash) with the whole heart (bekhol lev) means undivided pursuit.
3. The word avlah ('injustice, wrong, perversity') describes moral crookedness — the opposite of the blameless (tamim) way described in verse 1. The emphasis is not that these people never fail but that wrongdoing is not their pattern or trajectory. Their habitual path (derekh) is God's path.
4. The pronoun attah ('you') is emphatic — you yourself, God, are the one who issued these charges. The word piqqudim ('precepts') from the root paqad ('to attend to, to charge, to appoint') refers to specific charges or instructions that God has assigned. The adverb me'od ('very, exceedingly, diligently') intensifies the command: these are not casual suggestions but charges demanding careful attention.
5. Achalai ('if only, would that') expresses intense longing — the psalmist recognizes a gap between the blessedness described in verses 1-3 and his own reality. The verb yakonu ('were established, were firmly set') from kun means to be fixed, stable, prepared. The psalmist's ways (derakhay) are not yet firmly directed toward God's chuqqim ('statutes'). This is the psalm's first confession of inadequacy — the meditation begins not with self-congratulation but with desire.
6. The verb bosh ('to be ashamed, to be put to shame') describes the experience of being exposed as inadequate — the psalmist knows that looking honestly at God's mitsvot ('commandments') reveals how far short he falls. Only if his ways were firmly set (v. 5) could he face all of God's commandments without embarrassment.
7. The phrase yosher levav ('uprightness of heart') describes internal integrity — a heart that is straight and undivided. The verb lamad ('to learn') is significant: the psalmist is still learning, still in process. The word mishpetei ('judgments of') from shaphat ('to judge') refers to God's judicial decisions and case rulings — the specific applications of divine justice to real situations.
8. The stanza ends with a pledge and a plea. The psalmist commits to keeping God's statutes (et chuqqekha eshmar), but immediately adds a prayer: al ta'azveni ad me'od ('do not abandon me exceedingly/utterly'). The juxtaposition is revealing — the psalmist knows that his keeping depends on God's not leaving. Obedience is not a solo achievement but a response to divine presence.
9. Bet stanza (vv. 9-16). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter bet, the second letter of the alphabet. The stanza opens with a practical question: bammeh yezakkeh na'ar et orcho ('by what means can a young person purify his way')? The verb zakhah ('to be pure, to be clean') and the noun na'ar ('young man, youth') together ask how a person at the beginning of life can navigate a straight course. The answer is the davar — God's word.
10. The verb darash ('to seek, to inquire, to pursue') describes active, intentional pursuit — not passive waiting but going after God. The plea al tashgeni ('do not let me stray') uses the Hiphil of shagah ('to wander, to err'), asking God to prevent the wandering that the psalmist knows he is capable of.
11. The verb tsaphan ('to hide, to treasure, to store up') means more than casual memorization — it describes something precious concealed for safekeeping. The word imratekha ('your saying/promise') from the root amar ('to say') refers to God's personal utterance, his spoken promise. This is the eighth and final torah-word to appear in the psalm.
12. Barukh attah YHWH ('blessed are you, O LORD') is the standard Jewish blessing formula that opens virtually every Hebrew prayer to this day. Here it transitions into petition: lammedeni chuqqekha ('teach me your statutes'). The verb lamad in the Piel ('to teach') asks God to be the instructor.
13. The verb sippar ('to recount, to declare, to tell') describes public recitation — the psalmist does not keep God's judgments to himself but speaks them aloud. The phrase mishpetei fikha ('judgments of your mouth') personalizes the source: these judgments come from God's own mouth.
14. The verb sas ('to rejoice, to exult') expresses delight — the psalmist finds joy in the path marked out by God's testimonies. The comparison ke'al kol hon ('as over all wealth') is striking: the psalmist's pleasure in God's testimonies equals or exceeds what others feel about riches.
15. The verb siach ('to meditate, to muse, to ponder, to talk to oneself') describes active mental engagement — not passive reading but turning something over in the mind. The verb nabat ('to look at, to gaze upon') in the Hiphil (abbittah) means to fix one's attention deliberately. Both verbs describe focused, sustained attention.
16. The verb sha'a in the Hitpael (eshtasha) describes luxuriant enjoyment — this is not dutiful compliance but genuine pleasure. The pledge lo eshach devarekha ('I will not forget your word') closes the stanza with a commitment to memory.
17. Gimel stanza (vv. 17-24). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter gimel. The stanza opens with a petition: gemol al avdekha ('deal bountifully with your servant'). The verb gamal ('to deal with, to reward, to ripen') asks God to act generously. The purpose clause echeyeh ('that I may live') reveals that the psalmist's very survival depends on God's generous dealing.
18. The word nifla'ot (Niphal participle of pala, 'to be wonderful') refers to things that exceed normal understanding — marvels, wonders. These wonders are described as coming mittorathekha ('from your instruction'), suggesting that the torah contains layers of meaning revealed progressively as God opens the reader's eyes.
19. The word ger ('stranger, sojourner, resident alien') describes someone living in a land that is not their own, without the rights or security of a native. The psalmist's self-identification as a ger suggests that this world is not home — he is passing through and needs God's commandments as a guide for navigation in foreign territory.
20. The verb garas ('to crush, to break, to grind') describes physical grinding or crushing — the psalmist's soul (nephesh) is being ground to pieces by the intensity of its longing (ta'avah) for God's judgments. This is not mild interest but consuming desire. The phrase bekhol et ('at all times') means this longing never relents.

21. The verb ga'ar ('to rebuke, to blast, to threaten') describes God's forceful reprimand. The zedim ('arrogant, presumptuous, proud') are a recurring enemy throughout this psalm — those who willfully disregard God's commands. They are arurim ('cursed') — the opposite of the ashrei ('blessed') in verse 1.
22. The verb galal ('to roll') in the imperative (gal) pictures shame as a heavy stone that the psalmist wants God to roll off of him. The words cherpah ('reproach, scorn') and buz ('contempt') suggest that the psalmist is being mocked for his devotion to God's testimonies.
23. The sarim ('rulers, princes, officials') who conspire against the psalmist represent the highest level of opposition — this is not casual mockery but organized, powerful hostility. Against this political threat, the psalmist's response is meditation (yasiach) on God's statutes — quiet, sustained attention to divine truth in the face of human power.
24. The word sha'ashu'ai ('my delights') from sha'a describes luxuriant, overflowing pleasure. The phrase anshei atsati ('men of my counsel') personifies the testimonies as trusted advisors — where rulers plot against the psalmist (v. 23), God's testimonies serve as his inner circle of counsel.
25. Dalet stanza (vv. 25-32). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter dalet. This stanza is marked by suffering and urgent petition — the psalmist is in the dust, weeping, melting with grief, and begging God for revival.
26. The verb sippar ('to recount, to tell') here describes the psalmist opening his life to God — derakhay sippi ('my ways I recounted'). This is confession: laying out one's path before God. And God answered (vatta'aneni). Now the psalmist asks for the next step: lammedeni chuqqekha. The sequence is important: confession, divine response, request for further instruction.
27. The verb havineni ('make me understand') from bin ('to discern') in the Hiphil is a plea for insight — not just knowledge but comprehension of how the precepts connect and apply. Understanding the precepts opens the door to seeing the wonders (nifle'otekha) embedded in them.
28. The verb dalaf ('to drip, to weep, to dissolve') describes the soul literally dissolving — dalefah nafshi mittugah ('my soul drips/melts from sorrow'). The image is of a person so grief-stricken that they are liquefying. The petition qayyemeni ('raise me up, establish me') asks God to give back the solidity that grief has dissolved.
29. The derekh sheqer ('way of falsehood') is the opposite of the derekh emunah ('way of faithfulness') in verse 30. The psalmist asks God to remove it — haser ('take away') — suggesting that the pull toward falsehood cannot be resisted by willpower alone. The petition vetoratkha chonneni ('and your instruction graciously grant me') uses chanan ('to be gracious') — the granting of torah is an act of grace.
30. The derekh emunah ('way of faithfulness') is the psalmist's chosen path — bacharti ('I have chosen') is a deliberate, conscious decision. The word emunah means faithfulness, reliability, steadfastness. The verb shivviti ('I have set, I have placed') means the psalmist has positioned God's judgments directly in front of himself as a constant reference point.
31. The verb davaq ('to cling') reappears from verse 25, but now the clinging has shifted: where the soul clung to dust (despair), the psalmist now clings to God's testimonies. The petition al tevisheni ('do not put me to shame') echoes verse 6 — shame is the constant fear of one who has staked everything on God's faithfulness.
32. The image of an enlarged heart (lev rachav) is the opposite of the narrow, constricted heart of anxiety and fear. When the heart is wide, it can contain more understanding, more desire, more joy, more obedience. The running is the result of the enlarging, not its cause.
33. He stanza (vv. 33-40). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter he. This stanza is dominated by petitions — the psalmist asks God to teach, give understanding, lead, turn the heart, turn the eyes, confirm, and take away. The verb horeni ('teach me') from yarah (the same root as torah) asks God to be the one who points the way. The word eqev ('end, consequence') suggests perseverance to the finish.
34. Again the verb havineni ('give me understanding') — the Hiphil imperative of bin. Understanding is not self-generated but received from God, and when received, it produces wholehearted obedience.
35. The verb hadrikheni ('lead me, cause me to tread') from darakh in the Hiphil asks God to actively guide the psalmist's steps. The word nativ ('path, pathway') describes a narrow, well-worn trail. The motivation is delight: ki vo chafatsti ('for in it I take pleasure').
36. The verb natah ('to stretch out, to incline, to turn') in the imperative asks God to tilt the psalmist's heart in the right direction. The heart can be inclined toward God's testimonies or toward batsa ('unjust gain, selfish profit, greed'). The psalmist does not trust his own heart's direction and asks God to set its angle.
37. The verb ha'aver ('cause to pass, turn away') asks God to redirect the psalmist's gaze. The word shav ('emptiness, vanity, worthlessness') describes things that have no substance — distractions that pull the eyes away from what matters. The petition chayyeni ('revive me') returns, now linked to bidrekhekha ('in your way').
38. The verb haqem ('establish, confirm') asks God to make his promise (imrah) firm in the psalmist's experience. The phrase asher leyir'atekha ('which leads to your fear') connects the confirmed promise to the fear of the LORD — when God keeps his word, the natural response is reverent awe.
39. The verb ha'aver ('take away') reappears from verse 37. The verb yagor ('to fear, to dread') reveals anxiety about being publicly shamed. The ground of his appeal is that God's judgments are tovim ('good') — if God's rulings are good, then those who follow them should not be disgraced.
40. The interjection hinneh ('see! behold!') draws God's attention to the psalmist's longing. The verb ta'av ('to long for, to desire') describes deep yearning for God's precepts. The petition chayyeni ('revive me') now rests on betsidqatekha ('in your righteousness') — God's own righteous character is the basis for the request.

- 41. Vav stanza (vv. 41-48). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter vav. The stanza opens with a petition for God's chesed ('faithful love') — the covenant loyalty that defines God's commitment to his people. The word teshu'atekha ('your salvation') parallels the faithful love: salvation is the concrete expression of chesed.
- 42. The psalmist needs an answer (e'eneh) for his mockers (chorfi, 'those who reproach me'). The answer is not a clever argument but a reality: if God's faithful love comes (v. 41), the psalmist will have something to point to. The basis of his confidence is batachti bidvarekha ('I trust in your word').
- 43. The verb natsal ('to snatch away') in the Hiphil here means to take away forcefully. The psalmist fears losing the devar emet ('word of truth') — the ability to speak truth. The verb yachal ('to wait, to hope') describes patient expectation directed at God's judgments.
- 44. The phrase tamid le'olam va'ed ('continually, forever and ever') stacks three time expressions for emphasis. The psalmist's commitment to keeping Torah is not temporary but lifelong and, in his aspiration, eternal.
- 45. The word rechavah is related to rachav ('wide, broad') from verse 32. The psalmist's experience of freedom is directly connected to his engagement with God's precepts — obedience produces liberty, not bondage.
- 46. The psalmist envisions speaking (adabberah) of God's testimonies in the presence of melakhim ('kings'). The phrase velo evosh ('and I will not be ashamed') reveals courage rooted in conviction. Where rulers conspired against the psalmist in verse 23, here the psalmist speaks before kings without shame.
- 47. The verb sha'a in the Hitpael (eshtasha) again describes luxuriant delight. The addition of asher ahavti ('which I love') makes the emotion explicit: delight and love together describe the psalmist's relationship to God's commandments.
- 48. Lifting hands (essa khappai) is a gesture of prayer, worship, and reaching — the psalmist stretches toward God's commandments as a worshiper stretches toward God. The stanza closes with meditation (asichah) on statutes.
- 49. Zayin stanza (vv. 49-56). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter zayin. The stanza opens with zekhor ('remember') — an imperative addressed to God. The psalmist is not reminding a forgetful God but calling on God to act on what he has already said.
- 50. The word nechamati ('my comfort') from nacham identifies what sustains the psalmist through onyi ('suffering, affliction'). The source: ki imratekha chiyyatni ('for your promise has revived me'). God's spoken promise has actual life-giving power.
- 51. The zedim ('arrogant') reappear from verse 21 — persistent antagonists throughout the psalm. The verb luts ('to mock, to scorn') in the Hiphil describes withering ridicule. Despite intense mockery (ad me'od), the psalmist has not turned aside (lo natiti) from God's torah.
- 52. The phrase me'olam ('from of old') points to God's historical track record of just rulings. Remembering God's past judgments produces comfort (va'etnecham) in the present. In verse 49 the psalmist asked God to remember; here he himself remembers.
- 53. The word zal'afah ('burning heat, indignation') describes an intense emotional reaction — the psalmist is physically seized (achazatni) by scorching anger at the wicked's abandonment of Torah. The reshaim ('wicked') are defined as ozvei toratekha ('those who abandon your instruction').
- 54. The word meguray ('my sojourning') from gur ('to sojourn') reinforces the theme from verse 19: the psalmist is a traveler, and God's statutes are his traveling songs.
- 55. The nighttime remembrance (zakharti ballailah) suggests lying awake — the psalmist's waking hours in the dark are spent remembering God's name (shimkha). The name is not just a label but the full character and identity of God.
- 56. The demonstrative zo't ('this') sums up everything described in the stanza — the comfort, the songs, the nighttime remembrance — and attributes it all to guarding God's precepts.
- 57. Chet stanza (vv. 57-64). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter chet. The stanza moves from declaration of God as the psalmist's portion to urgent petition for grace, and it ends with one of the psalm's warmest statements about community.
- 58. The verb chillah ('to entreat, to seek favor') literally means to make someone's face smooth or pleasant — to seek favorable attention. The petition chonneni ('be gracious to me') from chanan asks for unmerited favor based on God's own promise.
- 59. The verb chishav ('to think, to reckon, to consider') describes careful self-examination. The result of honest reflection is turning (va'ashivah, 'I caused to return') his feet toward God's testimonies. Self-examination leads to course correction.
- 60. The verb chush ('to hurry') paired with lo hitmahemahti ('I did not linger') creates urgency — the psalmist did not procrastinate in his return to obedience.
- 61. The word chevlei ('ropes, cords, snares') from chevel describes being bound or trapped. Despite being physically ensnared, the psalmist's mind remains free: toratekha lo shakhachti ('your instruction I have not forgotten'). The body may be bound, but the memory of Torah cannot be taken.
- 62. Chatsot lailah ('midnight') is the darkest hour — and the psalmist rises (aqum) not from fear but from gratitude. The midnight thanksgiving for mishpetei tsidqekha ('your righteous judgments') suggests that even in the darkest circumstances, the psalmist finds reason to praise God's justice.
- 63. The word chaver ('companion, friend') describes a bond based on shared commitment. The psalmist's community is defined not by tribe or geography but by shared reverence for God and shared obedience to his precepts.

- 64. The declaration chasdekha YHWH male'ah ha'arets ('your faithful love fills the earth') is a cosmic statement — God's chesed saturates the entire created order. From this abundance, the psalmist draws a specific request: teach me your statutes.
- 65. Tet stanza (vv. 65-72). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter tet. The word tov ('good') is the stanza's theme — the psalmist will use it seven times in eight verses. The opening declaration tov asita ('good you have done') is a retrospective acknowledgment: God has kept his word, and the result has been good.
- 66. The phrase tuv ta'am vada'at ('good discernment and knowledge') combines two faculties: ta'am ('taste, discernment, judgment') and da'at ('knowledge, awareness'). The psalmist wants both: the capacity to know and the capacity to judge well.
- 67. The verb anah in the Niphal ('I was humbled/afflicted') is the same root used for the Day of Atonement fasting (Leviticus 16:29). The suffering described is formative — it changed the psalmist's trajectory.
- 68. The declaration tov attah umetiv ('you are good and you do good') is theologically foundational — God's character (good) and God's actions (does good) are perfectly aligned. If God is good and does good, then teaching his statutes is consistent with his nature.
- 69. The verb taphal ('to smear, to plaster, to fabricate') describes the arrogant coating the psalmist with falsehood — literally plastering lies onto him. Against this external fabrication, the psalmist opposes internal wholeness: bekhol lev etsor piqqudekha.
- 70. The verb tapash ('to be gross, to be insensitive') describes the enemies' hearts as chelev ('fat') — insensitive, unable to feel or perceive. A fat heart is a numb heart. Where their heart is deadened, the psalmist's heart is alive with delight (shi'asha'ti) in Torah.
- 71. This verse completes the thought from verse 67: suffering was pedagogical — it taught what comfort could not teach. The psalmist does not glorify suffering but acknowledges its instructive function.
- 72. The phrase torat pikha ('the instruction of your mouth') personalizes the torah — it comes from God's own mouth, not from an impersonal legal code. The comparison me'alfei zahav vakhasef ('than thousands of gold and silver') echoes verse 14's comparison to wealth.
- 73. Yod stanza (vv. 73-80). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter yod. The stanza opens with a creation claim: yadekha asuni vayekhonnenu ('your hands made me and established me'). From this creation comes a logical request: the God who made the psalmist should give him understanding to learn God's commandments.
- 74. The yere'ekha ('those who fear you') form the psalmist's community. They rejoice when they see him because his hope in God's word is a visible testimony — his perseverance through suffering encourages others who share his reverence.
- 75. The claim ve'emunah innitani ('in faithfulness you afflicted me') is extraordinary — the suffering was not a failure of God's love but an expression of it. This is the same emunah that defines God's covenant character (Exodus 34:6), now applied to the experience of pain.
- 76. The combination of chesed ('faithful love') and imrah ('promise') creates a double foundation: God's character (faithful love) and God's speech (his promise). Comfort rests on both who God is and what God has said.
- 77. The word rachamekha ('your compassion') from rechem ('womb') carries visceral warmth. The psalmist needs this compassion to live (ve'echyeh) — without it, death is the alternative.
- 78. The psalmist asks that the zedim receive the shame they tried to inflict on him. His response is not retaliation but meditation (asiach) on God's precepts.
- 79. The verb yashuvu ('let them return') asks for the restoration of community. Persecution may have isolated the psalmist, and he asks God to rebuild his fellowship with the faithful.
- 80. The prayer yehi libbi tamim ('let my heart be blameless/complete') uses the same word tamim from verse 1 — the psalmist wants the wholeness he praised in others to become his own reality.
- 81. Kaph stanza (vv. 81-88). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter kaph. This is one of the psalm's darkest stanzas — the psalmist is exhausted, eyes failing, skin shriveled, nearly destroyed. The verb kalah ('to be finished, to be consumed') describes the soul reaching its limit.
- 82. The eyes fail (khalu) from straining to see the fulfillment of God's promise. The question matai tenachameni ('when will you comfort me?') is one of the psalm's rawest cries — it does not question whether God will comfort but when.
- 83. A wineskin (no'd) hung in smoke (qitor) shrivels, darkens, and cracks — it becomes useless and unrecognizable. The psalmist uses this image for his own condition: dried out, shrunken, damaged. Yet even in this shriveled state, he has not forgotten God's statutes.
- 84. The question kammah yemei avdekha ('how many are the days of your servant?') is a plea about the shortness and weariness of life. The psalmist wants God to act while there is still life left.
- 85. The verb karah ('to dig') describes the zedim setting traps — shichot ('pits') dug in the psalmist's path. The relative clause defines the arrogant by their disregard for Torah.
- 86. The declaration kol mitsvotekha emunah ('all your commandments are faithfulness') makes emunah the defining quality of everything God commands. The cry ozreni ('help me!') is one of the psalm's most urgent petitions.

- 87. The word kim'at ('almost, nearly') reveals how close the psalmist came to annihilation. Despite being brought to the brink, the psalmist did not abandon God's precepts.
- 88. The petition kechasdekha chayyeni ('according to your faithful love, revive me') makes God's chesed the basis for the plea for life. The phrase edut pikha ('testimony of your mouth') personalizes the source.
- 89. Lamed stanza (vv. 89-96). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter lamed. This stanza is the psalm's cosmological high point — it moves from heaven to earth to the limits of perfection, grounded in the permanence of God's word.
- 90. The phrase ledor vador extends God's emunah ('faithfulness') across all human history. The proof is the earth itself: konanta erets vatta'amod ('you established the earth and it stands'). The ground under our feet testifies to the reliability of the God who set it in place.
- 91. The entire cosmos stands by God's judgments. The declaration ki hakkol avadekha ('for all things are your servants') is breathtaking: everything that exists serves God. The cosmos is not autonomous but obedient.
- 92. The conditional lulei ('if not') introduces a counterfactual: without Torah as delight, the psalmist would have been destroyed by his affliction. This is not hyperbole — the psalmist credits Torah-delight with saving his life.
- 93. The pledge le'olam lo eshach ('I will never forget') is absolute. The reason: ki vam chiyyitani ('for by them you have revived me'). The precepts are instruments through which God gives life.
- 94. The declaration lekha ani ('I am yours') is one of the psalm's most intimate statements — a claim of belonging, ownership, covenant identity. Because I belong to you, you are responsible for my rescue.
- 95. The verb qivvu ('they wait, they lie in wait') describes patient, predatory waiting. Against this lethal patience, the psalmist sets his own careful attention: edotekha etbonan ('your testimonies I consider').
- 96. The adjective rechavah ('wide, broad') echoes verse 45's rechavah ('broad place') — the spaciousness that comes from engaging with God's precepts. Here the broadness is attributed to God's commandment itself.
- 97. Mem stanza (vv. 97-104). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter mem. The stanza opens with an exclamation of love: mah ahavti torathekha ('how I love your instruction!'). Torah-meditation is not a scheduled activity but a constant state of mind.
- 98. The verb chakam in the Piel (techakkemeni, 'you make me wise') attributes wisdom directly to God's commandments. The comparative me'oyevai ('more than my enemies') says engagement with God's commandments produces wisdom surpassing what opponents possess.
- 99. The claim is not arrogance but a statement about the source of wisdom: teachers taught the psalmist, but God's testimonies give deeper insight (sekhel). The verb sakhal describes practical wisdom — the ability to navigate life skillfully.
- 100. The progression — wiser than enemies (v. 98), more insightful than teachers (v. 99), more understanding than elders (v. 100) — climbs the hierarchy of wisdom. Guarding God's specific instructions produces understanding that exceeds accumulated human experience.
- 101. The verb kala' ('to restrain, to hold back') describes deliberate self-restraint. Restraint from evil is not an end in itself but a means of preserving faithfulness to God's word.
- 102. The emphasis on attah ('you') highlights that God is the personal instructor. When God teaches directly, the student does not wander.
- 103. The verb malats ('to be smooth, to be sweet') describes the sensation of God's promise on the palate. The comparison middvash ('sweeter than honey') echoes Psalm 19:10. The psalmist experiences God's word sensorially — it has a taste, and the taste is sweet.
- 104. Understanding gained from God's precepts produces a moral consequence: hatred of every false path. The stronger one's understanding of truth becomes, the stronger the repulsion toward falsehood.
- 105. Nun stanza (vv. 105-112). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter nun. The word ner is a small, portable oil lamp — the kind a person would carry at night on a dark road. This is not abstract enlightenment but practical illumination for a real journey.
- 106. The verb nishba ('I have sworn') describes a formal oath — a binding commitment. The verb aqayyemah ('I will confirm') from qum means to stand by the oath, to make it real.
- 107. The verb anah ('to be afflicted') with ad me'od ('exceedingly') describes severe suffering. The cry chayyeni kidvarekha is the psalm's recurring lifeline.
- 108. The nidvot pi ('freewill offerings of my mouth') are voluntary offerings of praise and prayer — not sacrificial animals but words spoken freely. Worship is the proper posture for receiving instruction.
- 109. The phrase nafshi vekhappi tamid ('my life is in my palm continually') is an idiom for living in constant danger. Despite perpetual risk, the psalmist does not forget Torah.
- 110. The word pach ('trap, snare') describes a concealed device. The traps failed to divert the psalmist from the path.
- 111. The verb nachal ('to inherit') treats God's testimonies as the legacy the psalmist has received and will hold forever. The word sason ('joy, exultation') describes the purest happiness.

- 112. The verb natah ('to incline') describes the psalmist deliberately directing his heart toward obedience. In verse 36 he asked God to incline his heart; here he inclines it himself. Both are true — the psalmist acts, and God enables.
- 113. Samekh stanza (vv. 113-120). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter samekh. The word se'appim is rare — it may mean 'divided ones, double-minded people' (from sa'aph, 'to divide'). The contrast with loving Torah is clear: the psalmist rejects divided loyalty.
- 114. The words sitri ('my hiding place') and maginni ('my shield') describe God as both passive protection (a place to hide) and active protection (a shield that deflects blows).
- 115. The imperative suru ('depart') is addressed directly to the mere'im ('evildoers'). The phrase mitsvot Elohai ('commandments of my God') uses the personal possessive — my God — emphasizing the personal relationship that motivates obedience.
- 116. The verb samakh ('to support, to sustain') asks God to hold the psalmist up. The plea al tevisheni misivri ('do not let me be ashamed of my hope') reveals the deepest fear: that hoping in God might prove to be a mistake.
- 117. The verb sa'ad ('to support, to sustain') is parallel to samakh in verse 116. Safety and sustained attention to Torah go together.
- 118. The verb salah ('to reject, to make light of') describes God dismissing those who wander from his statutes. Their tarmit ('deceit, cunning') is sheqer ('falsehood') — their cleverness is built on nothing.
- 119. The word sigim ('dross, slag') is the waste material from metal refining. God puts away the wicked like impurities being skimmed off molten metal. Because God purifies, the psalmist loves the testimonies that define the standard.
- 120. The verb samar ('to bristle, to shudder') describes a physical reaction — the psalmist's skin prickles and hair stands up in response to God's presence. This is not terror but awe — the bodily response to encountering something overwhelming.
- 121. Ayin stanza (vv. 121-128). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter ayin. The psalmist claims moral integrity as the basis for petition: do not leave me to my oppressors.
- 122. The verb arav ('to pledge, to be surety') asks God to stand as guarantor — to co-sign the psalmist's future. This is financial language applied to the covenant relationship.
- 123. As in verse 82, the eyes fail from straining to see deliverance. Both God's saving act and God's righteous word are delayed, and the waiting exhausts the psalmist's sight.
- 124. The petition asks God to let chesed be the standard by which he treats the psalmist — not strict justice but covenant loyalty.
- 125. The declaration avdekha ani ('your servant I am') reaffirms the psalmist's identity. Knowledge of God's testimonies comes only through divinely given understanding.
- 126. The phrase et la'asot laYHWH ('it is time for the LORD to act') is an urgent call for divine intervention. The verb parar ('to break, to annul') in the Hiphil describes deliberate shattering of Torah.
- 127. Because others break Torah, the psalmist loves it more. The comparison uses two words for gold — zahav and paz (the purest, most refined gold). Even the finest gold falls short.
- 128. The emphatic repetition kol piqqudei khol ('all precepts, all of them') insists on comprehensiveness. The stanza closes with hatred of falsehood that matches verse 104.
- 129. Pe stanza (vv. 129-136). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter pe. The word pela'ot ('wonderful, beyond comprehension') describes the testimonies as exceeding normal understanding. The response to wonder is guarding.
- 130. The word petayim ('simple, naive') from patah describes someone open and impressionable — capable of being shaped for good or ill. God's words provide the shaping that turns simplicity into understanding.
- 131. The verb pa'ar ('to open wide') and sha'aph ('to gasp, to pant') together picture someone gasping for air. The psalmist pants for God's commandments the way a thirsty animal pants for water.
- 132. The phrase kemishpat le'ohavei shemekha ('according to the custom for those who love your name') appeals to precedent: God has a pattern of being gracious to his lovers, and the psalmist asks to be included.
- 133. The verb kun ('to establish, to make firm') asks God to make the psalmist's steps stable. The verb shalat ('to rule, to have dominion') pictures sin as a potential ruler — the psalmist asks God to prevent sin from exercising sovereignty over his life.
- 134. The verb padah ('to ransom, to redeem') asks God to pay the price to free the psalmist from oppression. Obedience is the fruit of liberation.
- 135. The petition panekha ha'er ('make your face shine') echoes the Aaronic blessing of Numbers 6:25. The shining face of God represents favor, attention, and warmth.
- 136. The word palgei (from peleg, 'channel, stream') describes permanent water channels, not temporary rivulets. The psalmist's weeping is sustained, not episodic.

- 137. Tsade stanza (vv. 137-144). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter tsade. The stanza opens with a declaration of God's character: tsaddiq attah YHWH. God's judgments are yashar ('upright, straight, level') — not crooked or biased.
- 138. God's testimonies are characterized by tsedek ('righteousness') and emunah ('faithfulness') — righteous in content and faithful in reliability.
- 139. The verb tsamat ('to destroy, to consume') describes the psalmist being consumed by his own qin'ah ('zeal'). The cause is that his enemies have forgotten God's words — this is covenant grief, not self-pity.
- 140. The adjective tserufah ('refined, purified') from tsaraph ('to smelt, to refine') describes God's promise as having passed through fire — all impurities burned away. This is metallurgy applied to speech.
- 141. The psalmist describes himself as tsa'ir ('small, insignificant') and nivzeh ('despised'). Faithfulness to God's word is not a function of social standing.
- 142. God's righteousness does not expire or diminish. And vetebratekha emet ('your instruction is truth') equates Torah with truth itself. Two of the psalm's most absolute claims.
- 143. The words tsar ('trouble, narrowness') and matsoq ('anguish, straits') describe being hemmed in — the opposite of the spaciousness of verse 45. Delight persists even when circumstances squeeze.
- 144. Eternal truth requires ongoing personal illumination. The testimonies do not change, but the psalmist must continually receive new capacity to understand them.
- 145. Qoph stanza (vv. 145-152). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter qoph. The stanza is marked by urgent crying — the psalmist calls, rises early, stays up late, all in desperate petition.
- 146. The cry hoshi'eni ('save me') is direct and unadorned. Rescue frees the psalmist for obedience.
- 147. The verb qiddam ('to precede, to come before') with banneshef ('in the twilight/dawn') means the psalmist gets up before the sun. The predawn darkness is filled with crying and hope.
- 148. The ashmurot ('night watches') are the divisions of the night. The psalmist's eyes are already open before each watch begins — he stays awake to meditate on God's promise.
- 149. The petition combines two appeals: hear me according to chesed and revive me according to mishpat. Both God's love and God's justice point toward life.
- 150. The spatial contrast is vivid: the pursuers of zimmah ('evil schemes') draw near to the psalmist but are far from God's instruction. Physical proximity to the wicked corresponds to their spiritual distance from Torah.
- 151. Against the nearness of the wicked (v. 150), the psalmist affirms: qarov attah YHWH ('you are near'). God is closer than the enemies. And all God's commandments are emet ('truth').
- 152. The word qedem ('long ago') indicates the psalmist has known this for a long time. The verb yasad ('to found, to establish') pictures the testimonies as having an unshakable foundation — grounded for eternity.
- 153. Resh stanza (vv. 153-160). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter resh. The stanza opens with a plea to be seen: re'eh onyi ('see my suffering'). The verb chalats ('to draw out, to rescue') asks God to pull the psalmist out of danger.
- 154. The verb riv ('to contend, to plead a case') asks God to serve as legal advocate. The verb ga'al ('to redeem, to act as kinsman-redeemer') asks God to buy the psalmist back. Both are legal-relational terms: God as lawyer and God as redeemer.
- 155. Those who refuse to seek God's decrees cut themselves off from salvation. The logic is causal: no seeking, no finding.
- 156. God's rachamim ('mercies, compassion') are rabbim ('many, great'). God's judgments point toward life, not death.
- 157. Despite being outnumbered, the psalmist has not turned aside from God's testimonies.
- 158. The word bogedim ('faithless, treacherous') describes covenant breakers. The verb qut in the Hitpolel describes a visceral reaction of loathing.
- 159. The imperative re'eh asks God to look at the psalmist's love. Human love for God's precepts and divine faithful love together form the ground of the plea for revival.
- 160. The word rosh is debated: 'the beginning of your word is truth' (temporal) or 'the sum of your word is truth' (comprehensive). The rendering 'the sum of your word' captures the comprehensive sense.
- 161. Shin stanza (vv. 161-168). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter shin. The sarim from verse 23 return. The verb pachad ('to tremble, to be in awe') describes the heart's response to God's word as more powerful than its response to human threats.
- 162. The comparison kemoth shalal rav ('like one who finds great plunder') evokes the elation of discovering vast, unexpected treasure. God's promise is windfall wealth.
- 163. Two verbs of revulsion (sane'ti and va'ata'evah) are stacked against one verb of love. The psalmist despises deception with double intensity and loves Torah with simple, direct affection.

- 164. The number sheva ('seven') may be literal or may represent completeness — the psalmist praises God a full, complete number of times throughout the day.
- 165. The word shalom from shalem ('to be complete, to be whole') is one of the richest words in Hebrew. Here modified by rav ('great'), it describes overflowing peace from loving God's instruction. The word mikshol ('stumbling block') comes from kashal ('to stumble').
- 166. Hope and obedience coexist. The psalmist does not wait passively for God to act but obeys actively while waiting.
- 167. Soul-keeping and deep love together describe the most complete devotion possible.
- 168. The motivating clause ki khol derakhay negdekha ('for all my ways are before you') reveals awareness that God sees everything. Nothing is hidden, and this awareness motivates faithfulness.
- 169. Tav stanza (vv. 169-176). Every verse begins with the Hebrew letter tav, the last letter of the Hebrew alphabet. The psalm's final stanza is a cascade of petitions — the psalmist has reached the end of the alphabet and pours out his final requests.
- 170. The word techinnati ('my supplication, my plea for grace') from chanan is a request for unmerited favor. The petition hatssileni ('deliver me') asks God to snatch the psalmist out of danger.
- 171. The verb nava ('to bubble up, to pour forth') describes praise flowing from the lips like water from a spring. Teaching produces praise.
- 172. The verb anah ('to answer, to sing, to respond') describes the tongue responding to God's promise — the tongue sings because it has been addressed.
- 173. The petition asks for God's active intervention — his hand, not just his attention. The basis is choice: ki piqudekha bacharti ('for I have chosen your precepts').
- 174. The psalmist's longing for God's salvation is undiminished at the psalm's end. And toratekha sha'ashu'ai ('your instruction is my delight') repeats the central claim one final time.
- 175. The petition techi nafshi ('let my soul live') is the psalm's final cry for life. The purpose of life is praise: utehallekka. Life is not an end in itself but the means by which praise continues.
- 176. This final verse reframes the entire psalm. The psalmist is not a paragon of perfection but a wanderer who loves what he cannot perfectly keep. The tension between 'I have not forgotten your commandments' and 'I have wandered like a lost sheep' is the tension of the entire human relationship with God's word: we know it, we love it, we stray from it, and we need to be found.

Summary: Psalm 120 is the first of the fifteen Songs of Ascents (Psalms 120-134), a collection traditionally associated with pilgrimage to Jerusalem. The psalmist cries out to the LORD from a place of exile among deceitful, war-loving people. He describes himself as living in Meshech and dwelling among the tents of Kedar — both far-flung locations that represent hostile foreign territory. The psalm is a lament of displacement: the psalmist longs for peace but is surrounded by those who want war.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Songs of Ascents (shir ha-ma'alot) are the 'pilgrimage playlist' of ancient Israel — songs sung by worshipers as they traveled up to Jerusalem for the three annual festivals. Psalm 120 begins the journey at the point of maximum distance from Jerusalem, both geographically and spiritually. The psalmist is among liars and warmongers, far from the peace of Zion. The collection will gradually move closer to Jerusalem and the Temple, arriving at the priestly blessing in Psalm 134. The structure of the entire collection enacts the journey from exile to worship. Beginning with a lament is significant: the pilgrimage does not start from a place of strength but from a place of suffering.

Translation Friction: Meshech was a region in Anatolia (modern Turkey), and Kedar was an Arabian desert tribe — placing the psalmist simultaneously in both locations is geographically impossible. Most scholars understand these as metaphorical: Meshech and Kedar represent the far north and the far south, together meaning 'I am as far from Jerusalem as it is possible to be.' The psalm's language about lying lips and deceitful tongues suggests the psalmist's primary suffering is social rather than physical — he is surrounded by people who cannot be trusted.

Connections: Psalm 120 begins the Songs of Ascents (120-134), a coherent collection with its own internal progression. The theme of lying tongues connects to Psalms 12, 52, and 140. Meshech appears in Genesis 10:2 and Ezekiel 38-39 as a distant, threatening people. Kedar appears in Song of Solomon 1:5, Isaiah 21:16-17, and Jeremiah 49:28-29 as desert-dwelling warriors. The longing for shalom ('peace') in verse 7 anticipates Psalm 122:6-8, where the pilgrim prays for the peace of Jerusalem.

¹A Song of Ascents.

In my distress I called to the LORD,
and He answered me.

²LORD, rescue my life
from lying lips,
from the deceitful tongue.

³What will He give you,
and what more will He add to you,
you deceitful tongue?

⁴Sharp arrows of a warrior, with burning coals of broom wood.

⁵What misery for me,
that I live as a foreigner in Meshech, that I dwell among the tents of Kedar!

⁶Too long my soul has lived among those who hate peace.

⁷I am for peace,
but when I speak, they choose war.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription shir ha-ma'alot appears on all fifteen psalms of this collection. The word ma'alot comes from the root alah ('to go up, to ascend'). The phrase batzaratah li ('in my distress, in my narrow place') uses tzarah ('distress, trouble, tight place'), the same word family as metzar in Psalm 118:5. The pilgrimage begins from a place of constriction.
2. The prayer hatzilah nafshi ('rescue my life') is directed against sfat sheqer ('lips of falsehood') and lashon remiyyah ('tongue of deceit'). The psalmist's primary enemy is not a sword but a mouth. The suffering described throughout this psalm is social and verbal — he is surrounded by people whose words are weapons. The word remiyyah ('deceit, treachery') suggests calculated deception, not casual dishonesty.
3. The formula mah yitten lekha umah yossif lakh parallels the oath formula koh ya'aseh lekha Elohim ve-koh yossif ('thus may God do to you and thus may He add'). By using this pattern, the psalmist implies that the deceitful tongue is under divine oath-curse — God will deal with it as one deals with a perjurer.
4. The retamim ('broom wood, broom plant') is identified with Retama raetam, a desert shrub whose roots produce charcoal of exceptional heat and duration. Bedouin traditions confirm that broom-wood coals retain heat far longer than other fuels. The imagery suggests a slow, thorough burning — not a flash fire but sustained heat.
5. The verb garti ('I sojourned') means to live as a resident alien, without permanent rights or status. The verb shakhanti ('I dwelt') is the same root as the Shekhinah (divine presence) and the mishkan (tabernacle) — but here the psalmist dwells not in God's presence but among those hostile to God's people. The contrast is painful.
6. Rabbat shakhenah lah nafshi im soneh shalom ('too long has my soul dwelt with those who hate peace') — the word rabbat ('much, too much, too long') expresses exhaustion. The psalmist has endured this exile beyond what is bearable. His neighbors are described as soneh shalom ('those who hate peace') — peace itself is what they oppose. The word shalom ('peace, wholeness, well-being') is the opposite of everything the psalmist's environment represents.

7. The stark brevity of the final line is powerful: ani shalom ('I — peace') versus hemmah lammilchamah ('they — for war'). The contrast is absolute. The psalmist does not elaborate or explain — the two realities are placed side by side and left to speak for themselves. The lack of resolution is deliberate: the Songs of Ascents will provide the resolution as the pilgrim moves progressively closer to Jerusalem across Psalms 121-134.

Summary: A pilgrim lifts his eyes toward the hills surrounding Jerusalem and asks where help will come from. The answer is immediate and absolute: from the LORD, maker of heaven and earth. The psalm then unfolds as a sustained assurance of divine protection — God does not sleep, does not slumber, guards every step, shields from sun and moon, and keeps the traveler from all harm, now and forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm pivots on a single question and answer in verses 1-2, then spends the remaining six verses elaborating that answer with escalating confidence. The verb shamar ('to keep, to guard') appears six times in eight verses — an extraordinary density that turns the psalm into a litany of watchfulness. God is not merely powerful; God is attentive. The negation in verses 3-4 is emphatic: the one who guards Israel lo yanum ve-lo yishan ('neither slumbers nor sleeps'). In a world where ancient peoples believed their gods slept (Elijah mocks Baal's worshipers with this in 1 Kings 18:27), this claim is radical. The God of Israel is perpetually awake, perpetually watching.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'I lift my eyes to the hills' (essa einai el heharim) has been romanticized in English-speaking devotion as a statement of finding comfort in nature. The Hebrew is more ambiguous — the hills could be the Judean hills where Jerusalem sits, but they could also be the high places where pagan shrines operated. The question 'where does my help come from?' may carry an edge: not from the hilltop altars, but from the LORD who made the hills themselves. The pilgrimage context supports this reading — the traveler is en route to Jerusalem and passing hills dotted with competing shrines.

Connections: As the second of the fifteen Songs of Ascents (Psalms 120-134), this psalm moves the pilgrim from the distress of Psalm 120 (dwelling among hostile people) to active trust on the road to Jerusalem. The six-fold repetition of shamar anticipates Psalm 127:1 ('unless the LORD guards the city'). The declaration that God is 'maker of heaven and earth' (oseh shamayim va-arets) becomes a liturgical refrain in the Ascents collection (see Psalms 124:8, 134:3).

¹A song of ascents.

I lift my eyes to the hills — where does my help come from?

²My help comes from the LORD,
maker of heaven and earth.

³He will not let your foot slip — your guardian does not slumber.

⁴Look — he neither slumbers nor sleeps,
the guardian of Israel.

⁵The LORD is your guardian;
the LORD is your shade at your right hand.

⁶The sun will not strike you by day, nor the moon by night.

⁷The LORD will guard you from all harm;
he will guard your life.

⁸The LORD will guard your going out and your coming in,
from this moment and forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The definite article on heharim ('the hills') specifies particular hills — the hills the pilgrim can see, the hills on the road to Jerusalem. These are not abstract mountains but the terrain of the journey.
1. The question-and-answer format in verses 1-2 may reflect antiphonal singing: one voice asks, another responds. This liturgical structure was common in pilgrimage worship.
2. The answer is fronted for emphasis: ezri me-im YHWH ('my help — from the LORD'). The title oseh shamayim va-arets ('maker of heaven and earth') is not decorative; it grounds the pilgrim's confidence in God's sovereignty over all created reality. The God who made the hills is greater than anything on them.
3. The verb mot ('to slip, to totter, to be shaken') describes the danger of losing footing on mountain paths. The promise is viscerally physical: God watches the pilgrim's feet on uneven ground. The shift from first person ('my help') to second person ('your foot') may indicate a priestly or companion voice now addressing the pilgrim directly.
4. We render hinneh as 'look' rather than the archaic 'behold.' The Hebrew particle is attention-grabbing and conversational, not formal.
4. The escalation from yanum to yishan is deliberate. yanum is a light doze; yishan is deep sleep. The psalm denies both, from the lesser to the greater.
5. Tsilekha ('your shade') is not metaphorical luxury — for a pilgrim walking through the Judean wilderness under Mediterranean sun, shade is survival. The right hand (yad yeminekha) is the side of vulnerability in battle, where a warrior's sword arm leaves the body exposed. God positions himself precisely where the pilgrim is most unprotected.
6. The verb yakkekah ('strike you') is strong — the same verb used for military attack. The sun's assault is heatstroke, a real danger for ancient travelers. The moon's striking is less obvious to modern readers; ancient Near Eastern belief held that moonlight could cause illness, madness, or seizures (the English word 'lunatic' preserves this idea). The pairing covers the full cycle: day and night, the pilgrim is shielded.
7. The word ra here means 'harm' or 'calamity' rather than moral evil — the psalm promises protection from danger, not from temptation. The parallel yishmor et nafshekha ('he will guard your life/soul') uses nefesh in its primary Hebrew sense of 'life, self, being' — not the Greek philosophical concept of an immaterial soul. God guards the whole person.
8. The phrase 'going out and coming in' (tset u-vo) is a standard Hebrew merism for the totality of daily life. It appears in Deuteronomy 28:6, where God blesses Israel's going out and coming in as part of the covenant blessings. The pilgrim psalm echoes covenantal language.

Summary: A psalm of David for pilgrimage. The speaker recalls the joy of being invited to go to the house of the LORD, then describes standing within Jerusalem's gates. The city is praised as a compact, unified place where the tribes gather for worship and where thrones of justice stand. The psalm closes with a prayer for Jerusalem's peace and prosperity — for the sake of family, friends, and the house of the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the only Song of Ascents attributed to David, and it reads as though the pilgrim has arrived — feet are standing inside Jerusalem (v. 2). The psalm is structured around the name Yerushalayim, which appears three times (vv. 2, 3, 6) and whose sound echoes in the repeated shalom ('peace') of the closing verses. The wordplay shalu shalom Yerushalayim ('pray for the peace of Jerusalem') links the city's name to its destiny: Jerusalem is the city whose very name contains shalom, yet whose history is marked by conflict. The prayer for peace is both a wish and a reminder of what the name promises.

Translation Friction: The Davidic attribution (le-David) is debated. The psalm assumes a standing temple and established pilgrimage practice, which some scholars date later than David. However, the attribution may indicate Davidic authorship of a core text later adapted for pilgrimage use, or it may designate the psalm as belonging to a Davidic collection. The phrase sheshom alah shivtei Yah ('where the tribes of Yah go up') uses the shortened form of the divine name (Yah rather than YHWH), which is characteristic of liturgical and poetic speech.

Connections: The prayer for Jerusalem's peace connects forward to Isaiah 62:6-7, where watchmen on Jerusalem's walls are commanded never to be silent until God establishes the city. The description of Jerusalem as a city 'joined together' (she-chubberah lah yachdav) anticipates the eschatological vision of a restored, unified Jerusalem in Ezekiel 48. The thrones of the house of David (v. 5) connect to the Davidic covenant of 2 Samuel 7.

¹A song of ascents. Of David.

I was glad when they said to me,
"Let us go to the house of the LORD."

²Our feet are standing within your gates, Jerusalem.

³Jerusalem — built as a city joined firmly together,

⁴There the tribes go up, the tribes of Yah —
a decree for Israel —
to give thanks to the name of the LORD.

⁵For there the thrones of justice are set,
the thrones of the house of David.

⁶Pray for the peace of Jerusalem:
"May those who love you be secure."

⁷May peace be within your walls, security within your citadels.

⁸For the sake of my brothers and friends,
let me say, "Peace be in you."

⁹For the sake of the house of the LORD our God,
I will seek your good.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Davidic superscription (le-David) appears on only four of the fifteen Songs of Ascents (122, 124, 131, 133). Whether this indicates authorship or dedication to a Davidic collection remains debated. The psalm presupposes an established pilgrimage system and a standing temple.
1. samachti is in the perfect tense, suggesting the joy is recalled — the pilgrim remembers the moment of invitation, perhaps now standing in Jerusalem looking back at that first summons.
2. The participle omedot ('standing') conveys present experience — the pilgrim is there, feet on the ground, inside the city. The shift from past tense (samachti, 'I was glad') to present participle creates a vivid sense of arrival. The gates (she'arayikh) are the entry points of the walled city, places of commerce, judgment, and greeting.
3. The verb chubberah is a pual passive participle — the city has been joined. The agent is unstated, which may imply divine agency: God is the one who bound this city together. The word yachdav ('together, as one') reinforces the theme of unity that dominates the psalm.
4. The shortened divine name Yah (shivtei Yah, 'tribes of Yah') is a poetic and liturgical form of YHWH, found frequently in Psalms and in the exclamation Hallelu-Yah. The phrase edut le-Yisrael ('a decree/testimony for Israel') refers to the commandment requiring pilgrimage to Jerusalem three times yearly (Deuteronomy 16:16). The purpose of the ascent is lehodot le-shem YHWH ('to give thanks to the name of the LORD') — thanksgiving is the engine of pilgrimage.

5. Jerusalem is not only a worship center but a judicial capital. The thrones (kis'ot) are seats of royal judgment. The phrase le-mishpat ('for justice') defines their purpose: the Davidic kings administer justice from Jerusalem. The repetition of kis'ot ('thrones') in parallel emphasizes the permanence and legitimacy of Davidic rule. This verse connects worship and governance — the same city that houses God's temple houses the king's court.
6. The wordplay sha'alu shalom Yerushalayim yishlayu is untranslatable in its full sonic density. Three words from the sh-l-m root cluster together. We translate for meaning, but the original creates an experience of the word shalom reverberating through the sentence.
7. chelekh ('your rampart, your outer wall') refers to the defensive fortifications surrounding the city. Armnotayikh ('your citadels, your palaces') refers to the inner strongholds and royal residences. The prayer moves from outer wall to inner palace — may peace saturate the city from its perimeter to its heart. The word shalvah ('security, tranquility, ease') is a cognate of shalom, continuing the sonic pattern.
8. The motivation shifts to the personal: the pilgrim prays for Jerusalem's peace because his family and companions live there or gather there. The phrase adabberah nna shalom bakh ('let me speak peace in you') is both a blessing and a commitment — the pilgrim pronounces peace over the city as a verbal act of devotion.
9. The psalm closes with a second and deeper motivation: not only for the sake of human relationships (v. 8) but for the sake of beit YHWH Eloheinu ('the house of the LORD our God'). The verb avaqshah ('I will seek') implies active pursuit — the pilgrim commits to working for Jerusalem's welfare. The word tov ('good') is comprehensive: prosperity, beauty, flourishing, everything that is right.

Summary: The psalmist lifts his eyes to God enthroned in heaven, comparing Israel's posture to that of servants watching their master's hand for the slightest signal. The waiting continues until God shows mercy. The psalm closes with a raw cry: Israel has had more than enough of the contempt of the arrogant and the scorn of the comfortable.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most concentrated psalms in the Psalter — four verses that move from silent watchfulness to desperate petition. The image of servants watching a master's hand (verses 2) is striking in its submission: the servant does not speak, does not demand, only watches. The hand will give food, give orders, give permission, or withhold. Everything depends on the hand. The psalm transfers this image directly to God: Israel watches God's hand with the same silent, total dependence. The repetition of channenu ('be gracious to us') twice in verse 3 breaks the silence of the watching — the servant finally speaks, and what comes out is not a request but a cry of saturation: we are filled to the brim with contempt.

Translation Friction: The servant-master imagery can be uncomfortable for modern readers, but the Hebrew context is specific. The eved ('servant') and shifchah ('maidservant') are members of a household, not chattel slaves in the modern sense — they have proximity to the master and depend on the master's hand for sustenance and direction. The psalm does not celebrate servitude; it uses the imagery of dependent watching to describe the posture of faith under oppression. The 'proud' and 'arrogant' (ge'ionim, sha'ananim) in verse 4 are unnamed — they could be foreign oppressors, domestic elites, or neighboring nations. The vagueness makes the psalm applicable to any situation of scorn.

Connections: The upward gaze echoes Psalm 121:1 ('I lift my eyes'), but here the eyes are lifted not to hills but to heaven itself. The servant imagery connects to Isaiah 50:4-5, where the Servant of the LORD has an ear awakened morning by morning to listen. The cry against contempt anticipates Nehemiah 4:4, where the returned exiles endure mockery during the rebuilding of Jerusalem's walls.

¹A song of ascents.

To you I lift my eyes,
you who are enthroned in heaven.

²Look — as the eyes of servants watch
the hand of their master, as the eyes of a maidservant watch
the hand of her mistress, so our eyes watch the LORD our God until he shows us grace.

³Be gracious to us, LORD — be gracious to us, for we have had more than enough of contempt.

⁴Our soul has had more than enough of the mockery of the comfortable, the contempt of the arrogant.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb nasati ('I lift') echoes Psalm 121:1 but redirects the gaze from the hills to God himself. The participle hayyoshvi ('the one sitting, the one enthroned') uses yashav, which can mean simply 'to sit' or, in royal contexts, 'to be enthroned.' God sits in heaven as a king on a throne — and the psalm positions the speaker as a subject before the sovereign.
2. We render yechnonenu as 'shows us grace' rather than 'have mercy upon us.' The verb chanan means to show favor, to be gracious, to give what is not owed. Mercy implies a response to suffering; grace implies a gift from the giver's character. The psalm asks for God to act out of who God is.
3. The doubled imperative channenu YHWH channenu ('be gracious to us, LORD, be gracious to us') is urgent repetition — the servant has broken silence and the words pour out. The verb sava'nu ('we are filled, we are sated, we have had enough') uses the language of eating to describe scorn: they have been force-fed contempt until they are stuffed with it. The word buz ('contempt, scorn') describes the attitude of those who look down with dismissive disdain.
4. The final phrase lig'ei yonim is textually difficult. The Masoretic pointing suggests 'the proud of the arrogant' or 'the arrogant oppressors.' Some emend yonim to read ge'ionim ('the arrogant'), creating a smoother parallel with sha'ananim. We follow the Masoretic text and render the sense as 'the arrogant,' since the doubling of pride-language intensifies the characterization.

Summary: A psalm of David. The community looks back at a moment of extreme danger and shudders at what would have happened if the LORD had not been on their side. The imagery escalates from human attack to flood to wild beasts to a bird caught in a trap — and then the trap breaks and the bird escapes. The psalm ends with a declaration: our help is in the name of the LORD, maker of heaven and earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm opens with a counterfactual — 'if the LORD had not been on our side' — and then repeats it, inviting the congregation to say it together (v. 1). This rhetorical device forces the worshipers to imagine the catastrophe that did not happen, making God's rescue vivid by contrast. The sequence of images is deliberately overwhelming: enemies swallowing them alive (v. 3), floodwaters sweeping over them (vv. 4-5), teeth of predators (v. 6), a snare closing on a bird (v. 7). Each image raises the stakes. Then the snare breaks — and the escape is sudden and unexplained. The psalm does not say how the trap broke, only that it did. The deliverance is attributed entirely to God without narrating God's method.

Translation Friction: *The phrase lulei YHWH she-hayah lanu ('if the LORD had not been on our side') raises a theological tension the psalm does not resolve: what about the times when rescue did not come? The psalm is a thanksgiving for a specific deliverance, not a universal promise. Its honesty lies in what it does not claim — it does not say God always rescues, only that God rescued this time, and that without God's intervention, destruction was certain.*

Connections: *The closing formula ezrenu be-shem YHWH oseh shamayim va-arets ('our help is in the name of the LORD, maker of heaven and earth') echoes Psalm 121:2 and becomes a liturgical refrain in Psalm 134:3. The flood imagery connects to the chaotic waters of Psalm 69:1-2 and Jonah 2:3-5. The bird-and-snare image appears again in Psalm 91:3 and Proverbs 6:5.*

¹A song of ascents. Of David.
If the LORD had not been on our side —

let Israel say it —

²if the LORD had not been on our side when people rose against us —

³then they would have swallowed us alive when their anger burned against us.

⁴Then the waters would have engulfed us,
the torrent would have swept over our lives.

⁵Then over our lives would have swept the raging waters.

⁶Blessed be the LORD,
who did not give us as prey to their teeth.

⁷We are like a bird escaped from the fowler's trap — the trap broke and we escaped!

⁸Our help is in the name of the LORD,
maker of heaven and earth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The particle lulei ('if not, were it not') introduces a counterfactual condition: what would have happened if God had not acted. The imperative yomar na Yisrael ('let Israel say') invites the congregation to join in — this is antiphonal, calling for a collective voice to rehearse the near-disaster. The psalm begins not with praise but with a terrifying 'what if.'
2. The repetition of lulei YHWH she-hayah lanu reinforces the counterfactual and builds suspense. The phrase be-qum aleinu adam ('when humanity rose against us') uses adam generically — not a specific enemy but human hostility itself. The threat is framed in universal terms.
3. The verb bela'unu ('swallowed us') evokes Sheol swallowing the living (Numbers 16:30-33, where the earth swallows Korah). The word chayyim ('alive') intensifies the horror — not merely killed and then consumed, but devoured while still living. The image is of monstrous, predatory destruction.
4. The imagery shifts from being devoured to being drowned. The verb shetafunu ('engulfed us, swept us away') describes flash flooding — a real and terrifying danger in the Judean wilderness, where dry wadis become raging torrents without warning. The nachalah ('torrent, stream, wadi') is seasonal and violent. The word nafshenu ('our lives, our selves') indicates total annihilation, not partial damage.
5. The adjective hazeidonim ('the raging, the insolent, the proud') personifies the water — it is not merely strong but arrogant, acting with the willfulness of a hostile agent. The same root zadon describes human arrogance elsewhere (Deuteronomy 17:12). The waters are characterized as enemies in their own right.
6. The shift from water to teeth is abrupt and effective. The psalm layers images without worrying about consistency — the rhetorical effect is cumulative. Each image says: the danger was total, and only God's intervention prevented it.
7. The pach yqeshim ('trap of fowlers') refers to a spring-loaded snare used for catching birds. The image of a bird in a trap was a common metaphor for helplessness in ancient Near Eastern literature. The sudden breaking of the trap — without explanation — is theologically deliberate: deliverance comes from outside the situation.
8. The closing declaration ezrenu be-shem YHWH ('our help is in the name of the LORD') echoes Psalm 121:2. The phrase oseh shamayim va-arets ('maker of heaven and earth') grounds the confession: the God who rescued Israel from the trap is the same God who made everything. The cosmic scope of God's power underwrites the specific, local rescue the psalm has just narrated.

Summary: Those who trust in the LORD are compared to Mount Zion — immovable, permanent, settled forever. As mountains surround Jerusalem, so the LORD surrounds his people. The psalm then addresses the danger of wickedness gaining power over the righteous and prays that the upright will not be tempted to stretch their hands toward wrongdoing. It closes with a prayer for peace on Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm builds its theology on geography. The pilgrim approaching Jerusalem can see the physical reality the psalm describes: mountains encircle the city on every side — the Mount of Olives to the east, hills to the north, south, and west. Jerusalem sits in a bowl of mountains. The psalmist takes this visible fact and makes it a metaphor for divine protection: as the mountains surround Jerusalem, so the LORD surrounds his people. The image is not of a single shield but of an encircling embrace — protection from every direction, permanent as the geology itself.

Translation Friction: Verse 3 introduces a complex theological concern: the scepter of wickedness (shevet haresha) must not rest on the land allotted to the righteous, lest the righteous themselves be corrupted and reach toward injustice. This is not a simple good-versus-evil framework — it acknowledges that oppression can deform the oppressed, that sustained injustice can tempt righteous people into wrongdoing. The psalm prays against this corruption, not merely against the oppressors.

Connections: The comparison of the faithful to Mount Zion connects to Isaiah 28:16, where God lays a foundation stone in Zion. The phrase shalom al Yisrael ('peace on Israel') closing the psalm echoes Psalm 128:6 and is nearly identical to the closing of Psalm 128. The concern about the 'scepter of wickedness' echoes the warnings of Deuteronomy about foreign rule corrupting Israel's covenant faithfulness.

¹A song of ascents.

Those who trust in the LORD are like Mount Zion — it cannot be shaken; it endures forever.

²Jerusalem — mountains surround her, and the LORD surrounds his people
from this moment and forever.

³For the scepter of wickedness will not rest on the land allotted to the righteous, so that the righteous will not stretch out their hands toward injustice.

⁴Do good, LORD, to those who are good,
and to those who are upright in their hearts.

⁵But those who turn to crooked paths —
the LORD will lead them away with the evildoers.
Peace on Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Mount Zion (har Tsiyon) originally referred to the Jebusite fortress David captured (2 Samuel 5:7) and came to represent the temple mount and, by extension, God's chosen dwelling place. The pilgrims approaching Jerusalem would see this mountain and understand the psalm's metaphor viscerally.
2. The word saviv ('around, surrounding') appears twice, creating a direct equation: mountains surround Jerusalem; the LORD surrounds his people. The temporal extension me-attah ve-ad olam ('from now and until forever') elevates the geographical observation into a permanent theological truth. The visible mountains will erode over eons; God's surrounding presence will not.

3. The word goral ('lot') refers to the system of land distribution by casting lots, as in Joshua 14-21. The 'lot of the righteous' is their divinely assigned inheritance. The threat is that foreign or wicked rule over this land will demoralize its inhabitants.
3. The phrase be-avlah ('toward injustice') uses avlah, a general term for moral crookedness or perversion of justice. The fear is not a specific sin but a general drift toward wrongdoing under pressure.
4. The prayer heitivah YHWH lattovim ('do good to the good') creates a wordplay between the verb hetiv ('do good') and the adjective tovim ('good'). The psalm asks for correspondence between character and consequence — let good people receive good treatment. The added qualification velisharim belibotam ('and to the upright in their hearts') specifies that the uprightness is internal, not merely behavioral.
5. The closing shalom al Yisrael functions as a liturgical formula, similar to 'amen.' It appears again at the end of Psalm 128, bracketing the central Songs of Ascents with a prayer for peace. The shift from warning to blessing is abrupt but deliberate — the psalm refuses to end on judgment.

Summary: The community remembers a past restoration so stunning it felt like a dream — mouths filled with laughter, tongues with shouts of joy, even the surrounding nations acknowledging that the LORD had done great things. Then the psalm pivots to petition: restore us again, like desert streams suddenly filled with water. It closes with a promise that weeping will give way to harvest — those who go out crying, carrying seed, will return with joyful shouts, carrying sheaves.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm lives in the tension between memory and hope. The first three verses celebrate a past deliverance so overwhelming that the people could scarcely believe it was real — hayinu ke-cholmim ('we were like dreamers'). But the psalm does not stay in the past. Verse 4 shifts abruptly to petition: shuvah YHWH et shevitenu ('restore our fortunes, LORD'). The past rescue is not enough; the present still needs God's intervention. The agricultural metaphor in verses 5-6 bridges the gap: sowing in tears guarantees a harvest of joy. The metaphor is not sentimental — it is agricultural realism. In the ancient Near East, planting seed meant giving up precious grain that could feed your family, trusting that the ground would return it multiplied. The tears are real loss; the harvest is real gain.

Translation Friction: The phrase be-shuv YHWH et shivat Tsiyon ('when the LORD restored the fortunes of Zion') has been traditionally linked to the return from Babylonian exile, but the Hebrew shivat could also be read as shevut ('captivity') — 'when the LORD returned the captives of Zion.' The psalm may predate or postdate the exile; the language is deliberately open enough to apply to any major restoration. The dream-like quality of the remembered deliverance suggests distance — either temporal or emotional — from the event.

Connections: The phrase hayinu ke-cholmim ('we were like dreamers') echoes the disorientation of Isaiah 29:7-8, where nations besieging Jerusalem vanish like a dream. The image of streams in the Negev (afikot ba-Negev) connects to Joel 3:18, where water flows from the house of the LORD. The sowing-and-reaping metaphor is developed extensively in Hosea 10:12 ('Sow righteousness, reap faithful love') and Galatians 6:7-9.

¹A song of ascents.

When the LORD restored the fortunes of Zion,
we were like dreamers.

²Then our mouths were filled with laughter and our tongues with shouts of joy.
Then they said among the nations,
"The LORD has done great things for these people."

³The LORD has done great things for us —
we are filled with joy.

⁴Restore our fortunes, LORD, like streams in the Negev.

⁵Those who sow in tears will reap with shouts of joy.

⁶The one who goes out weeping, carrying the bag of seed,
will surely come back with shouts of joy, carrying his sheaves.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The ketiv-qere variation between shivat and shevut has generated extensive scholarly discussion. shivat (from shuv, 'to return') suggests restored fortunes; shevut (from shavah, 'to take captive') suggests returned captives. Both readings are theologically coherent. We render 'restored the fortunes' as the broader term that encompasses both possibilities.
2. The double az ('then') creates a two-beat rhythm: then laughter, then recognition. The verb yimmale ('was filled') describes mouths overflowing — not polite smiles but uncontrollable laughter. The word rinnah ('joyful shouting, ringing cry') is loud, public, and physical. The nations' testimony — higdil YHWH la'asot im elleh ('the LORD has done great things with these') — is remarkable: even outsiders can see that this deliverance is God's work.
3. Israel takes the nations' words and makes them its own confession: higdil YHWH la'asot immanu ('the LORD has done great things with us'). The preposition im ('with') rather than le ('for') subtly implies partnership — God did great things with us, not merely to us. The response hayinu semechim ('we are/were joyful') uses the same root as Psalm 122:1 (samachti), linking pilgrimage joy to the joy of national restoration.
4. The afiqim ('channels, streambeds') of the Negev are visible features of the landscape a pilgrim would know. The image is not gentle rain but flash restoration — water appearing where there was none, life erupting from what appeared dead.
5. The contrast between bedim'ah ('in tears') and berinnah ('with joyful shouting') is absolute. The agricultural metaphor is not abstract: sowing required surrendering seed grain that could have fed the family. In a famine or hardship, planting was an act of faith — you gave up what you had in hope of a future harvest. The tears are the cost of the investment; the joy is the harvest's return.
6. The phrase meshekh hazara is unusual. meshekh may mean 'drawing, trailing' (from mashakh) or 'bag, pouch.' We render 'bag of seed' for clarity, understanding it as the container from which the sower draws seed to scatter. The image is of a farmer walking through a field, hand reaching into a bag, scattering grain through tears.

Summary: A psalm of Solomon. Unless the LORD builds the house and guards the city, all human labor is futile. God gives to his beloved even in sleep. The psalm then shifts to children: sons are an inheritance from the LORD, like arrows in a warrior's hand. The man whose quiver is full of them will not be put to shame when he confronts his opponents at the city gate.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is the only Song of Ascents attributed to Solomon, and the attribution is deeply fitting. Solomon built the temple — the house of the LORD — yet the psalm opens by declaring that unless the LORD builds the house, the builders labor in vain. If Solomon wrote or inspired this psalm, it is a confession that his greatest achievement depended entirely on God's initiative. The psalm contains one of the most radical statements about human effort in the entire Bible: it is useless (shav) to rise early, stay up late, and eat the bread of anxious toil, because God gives to his beloved in sleep. This is not an endorsement of laziness but a demolition of the illusion of self-sufficiency. The pivot to children in verses 3-5 is not a non sequitur — children are the ultimate example of something humans cannot manufacture by effort alone. They are nachalat YHWH ('an inheritance from the LORD'), a gift, not a product.*

Translation Friction: The relationship between the two halves of this psalm has puzzled interpreters. Verses 1-2 address the futility of human effort without God; verses 3-5 celebrate children as God's gift. The connection becomes clear when 'house' (bayit) is understood in its full Hebrew range: bayit means both a physical building and a family/dynasty. Solomon's bayit was both a temple and a royal house. The psalm says God must build both — the structure and the family line. Without God, neither architecture nor offspring accomplishes anything.

Connections: The Solomonic attribution connects directly to 2 Samuel 7, where God tells David that God will build David a 'house' (dynasty), inverting David's plan to build God a house (temple). The futility language (shav, 'in vain') echoes Ecclesiastes, also attributed to Solomon, which repeatedly declares human effort hevel ('vapor, breath'). The arrow imagery for children appears in Isaiah 49:2, where the Servant of the LORD is described as a polished arrow hidden in God's quiver.

1A song of ascents. Of Solomon.
Unless the LORD builds the house,
its builders labor over it in vain.
Unless the LORD guards the city,
the watchman stays awake in vain.

2It is useless for you to rise early,
to stay up late,
to eat the bread of anxious toil —
for he gives to his beloved in sleep.

3Look — children are an inheritance from the LORD;
the fruit of the womb is a reward.

4Like arrows in the hand of a warrior — so are the children of one's youth.

5Happy is the man who has filled his quiver with them.
They will not be put to shame
when they confront their enemies at the gate.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word shav ('in vain, emptiness') appears twice, framing both human activities — building and guarding — as equally futile without God. shav does not mean 'bad' or 'sinful'; it means 'empty, without substance, accomplishing nothing.' The psalm does not condemn work but reframes its meaning.
1. The Solomonic attribution (li-Shelomoh) may indicate authorship, dedication, or association with the Solomonic wisdom tradition. Given the psalm's themes of building and God's sovereignty over human achievement, the connection to Solomon the temple-builder is theologically resonant regardless of the attribution's historical basis.
2. The word yedido ('his beloved') echoes the name Yedidyah ('beloved of the LORD'), the name God gave to Solomon through Nathan the prophet (2 Samuel 12:25). If this psalm is attributed to Solomon, the reference is deeply personal — Solomon himself is the beloved to whom God gives.
2. The phrase lechem ha-atsavim ('bread of anxious toil') describes food earned through stress and worry — bread that tastes like anxiety because it was produced by it.
3. The word nachalat ('inheritance, portion, possession') is covenant language — a nachalah is land or wealth received as a divine gift, not earned by labor. Calling children nachalat YHWH ('an inheritance from the LORD') puts them in the same category as the promised land: something God gives, not something humans produce by their own power. The parallel term sakhar ('reward, wages') reinforces this: children are God's payment, God's gift-in-return.
4. The phrase benei hane'urim ('children of youth') refers to children born when the parent is young and vigorous. The advantage is practical: these children will be adults while the parent is still active, providing support and advocacy (as verse 5 will specify).

5. The 'gate' (sha'ar) as a place of justice and public discourse appears throughout the Hebrew Bible (Ruth 4:1-11, Proverbs 31:23, Amos 5:15). Legal disputes, property transactions, and community leadership all centered at the city gate. Having sons present at the gate meant having advocates who could speak on your behalf, witness transactions, and defend family interests.

Summary: A wisdom psalm that pronounces blessing on the person who fears the LORD and walks in his ways. The blessings are domestic and concrete: eating the fruit of your own labor, a wife like a fruitful vine in the inner rooms of your house, children like olive shoots around your table. The psalm extends the blessing outward from household to nation — may you see Jerusalem prosper, may you see your grandchildren, and may peace rest on Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: *After Psalm 127's declaration that human effort without God is futile, Psalm 128 describes what human effort with God looks like: it looks ordinary. The blessings here are not spectacular — no military victories, no prophetic visions, no miraculous interventions. They are a meal earned by your own hands, a spouse, children, and long life. The psalm sanctifies the mundane. The image of the wife as a gefen poriyah ('fruitful vine') in the inner rooms (yarkete) of the house and children as shitilei zetim ('olive shoots') around the table creates a picture of organic, living abundance. Vines and olives are the signature crops of the land of Israel; both take years to mature and produce for generations. The psalm says that a household rooted in the fear of the LORD grows like the land's most enduring plants.*

Translation Friction: *The psalm's domestic vision reflects ancient Israelite social structures — the male householder as the addressed audience, the wife described in relation to the home's interior. Modern readers may find this limiting. The Hebrew text, however, is not prescriptive about gender roles so much as descriptive of the ancient household as an economic and spiritual unit. The 'fear of the LORD' (yirat YHWH) that opens the psalm is the foundation — everything that follows is presented as the fruit of that posture, not as a guaranteed formula.*

Connections: *This psalm pairs with Psalm 127 as a wisdom diptych on household and family. Where 127 warns against self-reliance, 128 describes the blessings of God-centered living. The vine and olive imagery echoes Psalm 52:8 ('I am like a green olive tree in the house of God') and Hosea 14:6-7 (Israel's restored beauty compared to olive trees and vines). The closing shalom al Yisrael matches Psalm 125:5 exactly.*

¹A song of ascents.

Blessed is everyone who fears the LORD, who walks in his ways.

²You will eat the fruit of your own labor — blessed are you, and it will go well for you.

³Your wife will be like a fruitful vine in the inner rooms of your house; your children like olive shoots around your table.

⁴Look — this is how the man is blessed who fears the LORD.

⁵May the LORD bless you from Zion;
may you see Jerusalem's prosperity
all the days of your life.

6May you see your children's children.
Peace on Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The beatitude ashrei ('blessed, happy, fortunate') opens this psalm as it opens Psalm 1, creating a wisdom-literature frame. The phrase kol yere YHWH ('everyone who fears the LORD') is universal — the blessing is not limited to priests, kings, or prophets but available to anyone who lives in reverent awareness of God. The parallel haholekh bidrakav ('who walks in his ways') translates fear into action: to fear God is to walk God's path.
2. The blessing of eating one's own labor directly counters the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28:30-33 and Leviticus 26:16, where enemy nations consume what Israel plants. To eat your own food in peace is itself a theological statement: the curse has been reversed.
3. The word yarkete ('sides, recesses, innermost parts') appears in other contexts to describe the innermost parts of a cave (1 Samuel 24:3) or the far reaches of a territory (Isaiah 14:13). In the domestic setting, it indicates the protected interior of the house — the private quarters rather than the public-facing areas.
4. The particle hinneh ('look') draws attention to the preceding verses as evidence: this domestic abundance is what blessing looks like when it flows from the fear of the LORD. The psalm presents no extraordinary gifts — only a working household, food, a spouse, and children. The implication is that the ordinary, when rooted in God, is the blessing.
5. The blessing now radiates outward from the household to the city. The source of blessing is mi-Tsiyon ('from Zion') — the temple mount, God's dwelling place. The prayer u-re'eh be-tuv Yerushalayim ('and may you see the good/prosperity of Jerusalem') expresses the hope that the individual will live long enough and in enough peace to witness the city flourishing. Personal blessing and national blessing are linked: your household's abundance is part of Jerusalem's abundance.
6. The final blessing is generational: re'eh vanim le-vanekha ('see children belonging to your children') — grandchildren are the visible proof that God's blessing extends beyond one lifetime. The closing formula shalom al Yisrael ('peace on Israel') matches Psalm 125:5, framing these central Songs of Ascents with an identical prayer. The movement from individual fear of God (v. 1) to national peace (v. 6) traces the psalm's conviction that personal faithfulness contributes to collective flourishing.

Summary: Israel looks back on a lifetime of oppression — attacked repeatedly since its youth — yet declares that the oppressors have not prevailed. The psalm uses a brutal agricultural image: they plowed across my back, cutting long furrows. But the LORD, who is righteous, cut the ropes of the wicked. The psalm then turns to imprecation: may all who hate Zion be put to shame and become like grass on a rooftop — sprouting quickly but withering before it can be gathered, with no one offering a blessing to the harvesters.

What Makes This Remarkable: The image of plowing on a back (al gabi charshu chorshim, 'upon my back the plowers plowed') is among the most visceral in the Psalter. The verb charash ('to plow') describes cutting furrows in soil with a blade — applied to a human back, the image is of skin laid open in long, parallel wounds. The 'furrows' (ma'anitam, from ma'anah, 'furrow') are deep and extended: he'erikhu ('they made long'). This is not a quick blow but sustained, methodical abuse. Yet the psalm does not wallow — it pivots immediately to God's intervention: YHWH tsaddiq qitssets avot resha'im ('the LORD is righteous; he has cut the cords of the wicked'). The same agricultural world provides the rescue: God cuts the ropes that bound the plow-animal to its burden.

Translation Friction: The imprecatory section (vv. 5-8) prays for the shame and withering of Zion's enemies. The grass-on-the-rooftop image is oddly specific: ancient flat roofs accumulated thin soil in which seeds would sprout after rain but, lacking depth, the growth would wither before harvest. No reaper would bother to gather it, and no one passing by would offer the standard harvest blessing ('The blessing of the LORD be upon you'). The enemies are denied not only success but even the courtesy of a blessing. This level of detailed malediction reflects real trauma — the psalm's anger is proportional to the plowing of verse 3.

Connections: The image of Israel's suffering from its 'youth' (mine'urai) echoes Hosea 2:15 and Jeremiah 2:2, where Israel's youth refers to the exodus and wilderness period. The plowing image anticipates Isaiah 51:23, where oppressors say to Israel, 'Lie down so we may walk over you.' The rooftop grass appears in 2 Kings 19:26 / Isaiah 37:27 in the same context of enemies that wither. The harvest-blessing formula in verse 8 echoes Ruth 2:4, where Boaz greets his reapers.

¹A song of ascents.
 "They have attacked me often since my youth" —
 let Israel say it —

²"They have attacked me often since my youth — but they have not overcome me."

³Plowers plowed across my back;
 they cut their furrows long.

⁴The LORD is righteous;
 he has cut the ropes of the wicked.

⁵May all who hate Zion be put to shame and driven back.

⁶May they be like grass on the rooftops that withers before it can be pulled up,

⁷that never fills the reaper's hand or the binder's arms.

⁸And no passerby will say,
 "The blessing of the LORD be upon you;
 we bless you in the name of the LORD."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb tsararuni ('they have attacked me, they have oppressed me, they have been hostile to me') is from tsarar ('to bind, to press, to be hostile'). The word mine'urai ('from my youth') personifies Israel as a single individual whose life story is one of repeated assault. Israel's 'youth' likely refers to the Egyptian bondage or the early settlement period. The imperative yomar na Yisrael ('let Israel say') invites the congregation to take up the confession together, as in Psalm 124:1.
2. The repetition of rabbat tsararuni mine'urai from verse 1 creates emphasis through restatement, but the second line adds the decisive contrast: gam lo yakhlu li ('yet they have not prevailed against me'). The verb yakhal ('to be able, to prevail, to overcome') is in the perfect tense — they tried and they failed. The gam ('yet, also, even') introduces the counter-statement with force: despite everything, despite the long history of attack, they did not succeed.
3. The phrase al gabbi ('upon my back') uses the singular possessive, maintaining the personification of Israel as a single body. The plowing image may also carry overtones of enslavement — in Egypt, Israelites were forced to labor in the fields, and here the oppressors turn Israel's own body into the field.
4. The declaration YHWH tsaddiq ('the LORD is righteous') is judicial: God has judged the situation and acted. The verb qitsets ('he has cut, he has chopped') is forceful — it describes cutting through with decisive action. The avot ('ropes, cords, thick bindings') are the harness ropes that bound the plow-team to the plow. God severed the connection between the oppressors and their instrument of torture. The agricultural metaphor is sustained: the plowers plowed, but God cut their rigging. The plow goes dead in the furrow.
5. The imprecation begins. The verb yevoshu ('may they be shamed') and yissogu achor ('may they be turned backward, may they retreat') are jussive forms expressing a wish. The shame (bosh) is public humiliation — the exposure of failed ambition. Being turned backward (achor) is the opposite of advancing; the enemies are repelled. The phrase son'ei Tsiyon ('haters of Zion') defines the target: those who oppose God's chosen city and, by extension, God's people.
6. Ancient Israelite houses had flat roofs made of packed earth over wooden beams. Rain would cause seeds trapped in the thin soil layer to sprout, but with no depth of earth and full exposure to sun, the growth would wither almost immediately. The word shalaf ('to pull up, to draw out') suggests the grass dies before anyone could even grasp it to harvest. The image is of growth that promises nothing and delivers nothing — a perfect metaphor for the enemies' ambitions.
7. The image continues: this rooftop grass is so sparse and worthless that the qotser ('reaper, harvester') cannot fill his hand (kappo) with it, and the me'ammer ('binder, sheaf-gatherer') cannot fill his lap or arms (chitsno). The harvest metaphor from Psalm 126:6 (the joyful reaper carrying sheaves) is inverted: here there are no sheaves, no harvest, no joy. The enemies produce nothing worth gathering.

8. The harvest blessing formula is attested in Ruth 2:4, where Boaz arrives at his field and greets his workers with YHWH immakhem ('the LORD be with you'), and they respond YHWH yevarekekha ('the LORD bless you'). The psalm's quotation of a nearly identical formula shows how deeply worship was woven into daily agricultural practice. To be denied this greeting is to be cut off from the rhythm of covenantal life.

130

Summary: From the depths, the psalmist cries out to the LORD. If God kept a record of sins, no one could stand. But with God there is forgiveness — and this forgiveness produces reverence, not presumption. The psalmist waits for the LORD with an intensity greater than watchmen waiting for dawn. The psalm ends by urging all Israel to hope in the LORD, because with him there is faithful love and full redemption, and he will redeem Israel from all its sins.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the seven traditional Penitential Psalms (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143) and one of the most theologically dense compositions in the Psalter. In eight verses, it moves from the abyss to redemption. The theological centerpiece is verses 3-4: if God kept a record of iniquities, no one would survive the audit — but with God there is selichah ('forgiveness'), and this forgiveness is the basis for fear, not its removal. The logic is counterintuitive: forgiveness produces reverence (lema'an tivvare, 'so that you may be feared'). The psalm understands that a God who only judged would inspire terror, not worship. A God who forgives inspires awe — the profound, sustained reverence of someone who has been pardoned when they deserved to be condemned. The watchman metaphor in verses 5-6 captures the posture: waiting in darkness, utterly confident that morning will come, yet unable to rush it.

Translation Friction: The phrase mi-ma'amaqim ('out of the depths') has been variously interpreted as literal danger (drowning, imprisonment), metaphorical spiritual crisis, or the psalmist's sense of distance from God. The 'depths' (ma'amaqim) are related to the abyss — the deep waters of chaos that threaten to engulf. The psalm does not specify what put the psalmist in the depths, which makes it universally applicable. Martin Luther considered this psalm one of the four 'Pauline Psalms' because of its doctrine of grace: forgiveness is God's initiative, not earned by human merit.

Connections: The cry from the depths echoes Jonah 2:2 ('out of the belly of Sheol I cried') and Psalm 69:2 ('I have come into the depths of the waters'). The assertion that no one can stand before God's scrutiny parallels Psalm 143:2 ('no living person is righteous before you') and anticipates Paul's argument in Romans 3:20. The phrase chesed ('faithful love') in verse 7 connects to the great chesed declarations of Exodus 34:6-7. The waiting-for-dawn metaphor recurs in Isaiah 21:11-12 ('Watchman, what is left of the night?').

¹A song of ascents.

Out of the depths I cry to you, LORD.

²Lord, hear my voice;

let your ears be attentive to the sound of my pleas for mercy.

³If you kept a record of sins, Yah —

Lord, who could stand?

⁴But with you there is forgiveness,

so that you may be revered.

⁵I wait for the LORD;

my whole being waits,

and in his word I hope.

6My whole being waits for the Lord
more than watchmen wait for morning —
more than watchmen wait for morning.

7Hope in the LORD, Israel,
for with the LORD there is faithful love,
and with him there is redemption in abundance.

8And he will redeem Israel from all its sins.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The noun ma'amaqim appears only here and in Psalm 69:2, 14 and Ezekiel 27:34. In every case it describes overwhelming, threatening depths — waters that swallow, darkness that consumes. The Songs of Ascents are pilgrimage songs of going up; this psalm begins at the lowest point, making the ascent all the more dramatic.
2. The address shifts from YHWH (v. 1) to Adonai ('Lord, Master'), the title used when the divine name was considered too sacred to pronounce. The request shim'ah be-qoli ('hear my voice') is followed by the more specific tiheyinah oznekha qashshuvot ('let your ears be attentive'). The word qashshuvot ('attentive, listening closely') describes focused, deliberate hearing — not just registering sound but paying attention. The tachanunai ('my pleas for mercy, my supplications') derives from chanan ('to be gracious'), connecting to the grace-theology that runs through the psalm.
3. The verb tishmor ('you would keep, you would guard') is the same root (shamar) that dominates Psalm 121, where God's keeping is protective. Here the same verb takes on a forensic meaning: to keep a record, to preserve evidence. The God who guards Israel could also guard a ledger of sins — but chooses not to.
4. The word selichah ('forgiveness') appears only three times in the Hebrew Bible as a noun (here, Nehemiah 9:17, Daniel 9:9). In every occurrence, it describes God's forgiveness — never human forgiveness of another human. This is a distinctly divine act.
4. We render tivvare as 'revered' rather than 'feared' to capture the nuance. The fear here is not terror at punishment but profound awe at grace. The pardoned sinner does not flee from God but draws closer in reverent amazement.
5. The double statement qivviti YHWH qivvetah nafshi ('I wait for the LORD, my soul waits') intensifies the claim: not just the mind or the will but the nefesh — the entire self — is engaged in waiting. The verb qavah ('to wait, to hope, to look eagerly for') implies taut expectation, like a rope stretched tight. The phrase ve-lidvaro hochalti ('and for his word I hope') adds a specific object: the psalmist waits not just for God in general but for God's word — a promise, an answer, a declaration.
6. The shomerim ('watchmen') connect back to the shamar root that dominates Psalm 121. But here the watchmen are not guarding — they are waiting. Their job is to endure the night and announce the morning. The psalmist's soul does the same: endures the darkness of the depths (v. 1) and watches for God's arrival.
7. We render chesed as 'faithful love' throughout The Covenant Rendering. The word resists single-word translation: it encompasses loyalty, kindness, mercy, covenant faithfulness, steadfast love, and committed devotion. 'Faithful love' captures both the emotional warmth (love) and the covenantal reliability (faithful).
8. The verb yifdeh ('he will redeem') is in the imperfect tense, indicating future or ongoing action — this redemption is not only a past event but a continuing and future reality. The psalm ends not with a completed action but with a promise that stretches forward: God will keep redeeming.

Summary: A Song of Ascents attributed to David. In just three verses, the psalmist renounces ambition, pride, and intellectual presumption, choosing instead a posture of quiet trust. The central image is a weaned child resting against its mother — no longer nursing, no longer demanding, simply at rest. The psalm concludes with a call for Israel to adopt the same posture toward the LORD.

*What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the shortest psalms in the Psalter, yet it accomplishes something almost no other psalm attempts: it describes the interior discipline of humility not as self-abasement but as chosen contentment. The weaned child (gamal) is the key — not an infant still feeding, still needy, still crying for milk, but a child who has moved past the stage of demand. The psalmist does not say 'I* have been humbled' (passive, by circumstance) but 'I have leveled and quieted my soul' (active, by choice). This is willed serenity, not resigned passivity. In three verses, David maps the entire journey from renunciation of pride to active trust.

Translation Friction: The verb shivviti ('I have leveled, smoothed, made even') in verse 2 is unusual. It does not mean 'I have behaved myself' as the KJV renders it. The root shavah means 'to be level, equal, smooth' — the psalmist has flattened the turbulence of his soul the way one smooths a field. The weaned child image is also more culturally loaded than modern readers realize: weaning in ancient Israel typically occurred at age three, so this is not a newborn but a toddler who has passed through the difficult transition of separation from the breast and now rests without demand.

Connections: The Song of Ascents collection (Psalms 120-134) were sung by pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem. Psalm 131 sits between Psalm 130's cry from the depths and Psalm 132's grand Davidic covenant psalm, making it a quiet hinge — the pilgrim who has cried out now rests before approaching the promises of God to David's house. The weaned child image resonates with Isaiah 28:9 ('those weaned from milk, drawn from the breast') and Jesus' teaching that one must become like a child to enter the kingdom (Matthew 18:3).

¹A song of ascents. Of David.

LORD, my heart is not lifted up,
and my eyes are not raised high.
I do not walk among things too great or too wondrous for me.

²Instead, I have leveled and quieted my soul like a weaned child with its mother.
Like a weaned child, so is my soul within me.

³Let Israel wait for the LORD
from now until forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb gavah means 'to be high, exalted, proud' and when applied to the heart describes internal arrogance — a self-assessment that exceeds reality. The eyes being 'raised' (ramu) is the outward expression of the same posture: looking down on others, setting one's gaze on things above one's station.
1. The word niflaot ('wondrous things') is a niph'al participle from pala ('to be extraordinary, surpassing, too difficult'). It is the same root used for God's wonders in the Exodus narratives. The psalmist is not rejecting intellectual curiosity but acknowledging that some realities belong to God alone — echoing Deuteronomy 29:29, 'the hidden things belong to the LORD our God.'
2. The KJV's 'I have behaved and quieted myself' misses the force of shivviti, which does not mean 'to behave' but 'to level, make even, smooth.' The piel form intensifies the action: the psalmist has actively worked to flatten the uneven terrain of his inner life.
2. Ancient Israelite children were typically weaned between ages two and three (cf. 1 Samuel 1:22-24, where Hannah waits until Samuel is weaned before bringing him to the temple). The gamal is therefore not an infant but a young child who has passed through a significant developmental transition — from dependence on the breast to the ability to be with the mother without needing to feed.
3. The verb yachel (from yachal) means 'to wait, to hope, to expect' and carries more active weight than English 'hope.' It implies endurance and orientation — the one who yachels is facing toward the object of hope and willing to wait as long as necessary. This is the same verb used in Psalm 130:5, the preceding psalm: 'I wait for the LORD, my soul waits.'

Summary: A Song of Ascents that recounts David's oath to find a resting place for the ark of the LORD and God's answering oath to establish David's dynasty forever. The psalm divides into two halves: David's vow to God (vv. 1-10) and God's vow to David (vv. 11-18). It is the fullest poetic expression of the Davidic covenant outside of 2 Samuel 7.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm is built on the architecture of reciprocal oaths. David swears an oath to God (vv. 2-5) and God swears an oath to David (vv. 11-12). The structure creates a mirror: human faithfulness answered by divine faithfulness, human initiative met by divine promise. But the asymmetry is crucial — David's oath is conditional on effort ('I will not enter my house... I will not give sleep to my eyes'), while God's oath is conditional on obedience ('If your sons keep my covenant'). The psalm also resolves the tension between the movable ark and the permanent temple by showing that God's choice of Zion is His own act of desire: 'The LORD has chosen Zion; He has desired it for His dwelling' (v. 13). God is not housed because David decided to build; God dwells in Zion because He wanted to.

Translation Friction: Verse 6 contains a geographical puzzle: 'We heard of it in Ephrathah; we found it in the fields of Jaar.' Ephrathah may refer to Bethlehem (David's hometown) or to the region around Kiriath-Jearim where the ark rested for twenty years (1 Samuel 7:1-2). 'Fields of Jaar' (sedei ya'ar) appears to be a shortened form of Kiriath-Jearim ('city of forests'). The verse compresses the entire history of the lost and recovered ark into a single couplet. The conditional clause in verse 12 — 'if your sons keep my covenant' — introduces a tension with the unconditional promise of 2 Samuel 7:14-16, where God says He will discipline David's sons but never remove His faithful love. The psalm holds both the conditional and the unconditional together without resolving them.

Connections: This psalm is the poetic counterpart to 2 Samuel 7 (the Davidic covenant narrative) and 1 Chronicles 28:2 (David's speech about building the temple). The ark's journey from Kiriath-Jearim to Jerusalem is narrated in 2 Samuel 6. The language of verse 8 — 'Arise, LORD, to your resting place, you and the ark of your strength' — echoes Numbers 10:35-36, Moses' cry when the ark set out. The promise that David's lamp will never be extinguished (v. 17) appears in 1 Kings 11:36 and 2 Kings 8:19. The psalm is used liturgically in 2 Chronicles 6:41-42 at the dedication of Solomon's temple.

¹A song of ascents.

Remember, LORD, for David's sake
all his hardship.

²How he swore to the LORD,
made a vow to the Mighty One of Jacob:

³"I will not enter the tent of my house or climb onto the couch of my bed.

⁴I will not give sleep to my eyes or slumber to my eyelids,

⁵until I find a place for the LORD,
a dwelling for the Mighty One of Jacob."

⁶We heard of it in Ephrathah;
we found it in the fields of Jaar.

⁷Let us go to His dwelling places;
let us bow down at His footstool.

⁸Arise, LORD, to your resting place —
you and the ark of your strength.

⁹Let your priests be clothed in righteousness, and let your faithful ones shout for joy.

¹⁰For the sake of your servant David,
do not turn away the face of your anointed one.

¹¹The LORD swore to David — a firm truth from which He will not turn back:
"From the fruit of your body
I will set someone on your throne.

¹²If your sons keep my covenant and my decrees that I will teach them, then their sons also, forever,
will sit on your throne."

¹³For the LORD has chosen Zion;
He has desired it as His dwelling.

¹⁴"This is my resting place forever.
Here I will dwell, for I have desired it.

¹⁵I will richly bless her provisions;
her poor I will satisfy with bread.

¹⁶Her priests I will clothe with salvation, and her faithful ones will shout aloud for joy.

¹⁷There I will cause a horn to sprout for David;
I have prepared a lamp for my anointed one.

¹⁸His enemies I will clothe with shame, but upon him his crown will shine.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word unnoto (from anah, 'to be afflicted, humbled') could also be translated 'his self-denial' or 'his devotion through hardship.' Some scholars connect it to the vow-making process itself — the hardships David voluntarily imposed on himself in pursuit of housing the ark. The KJV's 'afflictions' captures the suffering but misses the voluntary, self-imposed dimension.
2. Avir Ya'aqov ('Mighty One of Jacob') appears in Genesis 49:24, Isaiah 1:24, 49:26, and 60:16. The word avir means 'mighty one, bull, champion' — it evokes strength and reliability. By using this patriarchal title rather than simply 'the LORD,' the psalm anchors David's vow in the deep history of God's relationship with Israel's ancestors.
3. The oath formula im ('if') in Hebrew oaths functions as a strong negative: 'I will certainly not...' The escalating parallelism — 'tent of my house' / 'couch of my bed' — moves from the general (entering the house) to the specific (getting into bed). David vows to deny himself domestic comfort until he has secured a home for the ark.
4. The parallelism moves from 'sleep' (shenah) to 'slumber' (tenumah), from 'eyes' (einai) to 'eyelids' (af'appai). The language is nearly identical to Proverbs 6:4, where the sluggard is told to deny himself rest until he has escaped his debt. David applies the urgency of a debtor to the project of housing God's ark — rest is impossible until the task is accomplished.

5. The plural mishkanot ('dwellings') is used for poetic fullness rather than to indicate multiple locations. The singular mishkan is the standard term for the tabernacle in the wilderness narratives (Exodus 25:9). Here the plural elevates the concept — a dwelling worthy of the Mighty One of Jacob.
6. The identification of Ephrathah is debated. It most likely refers to the district including both Bethlehem (David's origin, cf. Micah 5:2) and Kiriath-Jearim (where the ark rested). Sedei ya'ar ('fields of Jaar/forest') appears to be a shortened poetic form of Kiriath-Jearim. The verse traces the arc from hearing about the ark (in the region of David's youth) to finding it (in the fields near Kiriath-Jearim).
7. The 'footstool' (hadom raglav) is the ark of the covenant, understood as the base of God's invisible throne. The cherubim atop the ark form the seat; the ark itself is where God's feet rest. This image appears in 1 Chronicles 28:2, where David says, 'I had it in my heart to build a house of rest for the ark of the covenant of the LORD, for the footstool of our God.' The invitation to 'bow down' (nishtachaveh) at the footstool is an invitation to worship at the very point where heaven meets earth.
8. This verse is quoted almost verbatim in 2 Chronicles 6:41, where Solomon speaks it at the dedication of the temple. The movement from Numbers 10:35 (the ark arises to lead Israel through the wilderness) to Psalm 132:8 (the ark arises to find its permanent home) maps the entire arc of Israel's journey from Sinai to Zion.
9. The priests are 'clothed' (yilbeshu) in tsedeq ('righteousness') — not garments but character. The parallel term chasidekha ('your faithful ones, your devoted ones') derives from chesed and describes those bound to God by mutual loyalty. The verse pairs institutional worship (priests) with communal devotion (the faithful). Both are essential to the scene of God's arrival at His resting place.
10. The word mashiach ('anointed one, messiah') here refers to the reigning king of David's line. Every Davidic king was God's mashiach — anointed with oil as a sign of divine selection. The later development of 'Messiah' as a title for an eschatological deliverer grows out of passages exactly like this one, where the promise to David's line carries the weight of God's eternal commitment.
11. The phrase nishba YHWH ('the LORD swore') is remarkable — God binds Himself by oath. In Hebrews 6:13-17, this divine self-binding is cited as the ultimate guarantee: since God can swear by no one greater, He swears by Himself. The word emet ('truth') here functions almost as an adverb: God swore truly, firmly, reliably.
12. The tension between the unconditional promise of verse 11 and the conditional clause of verse 12 is one of the great puzzles of Davidic covenant theology. In 2 Samuel 7:14-16, God says He will discipline David's sons but never remove His chesed. Here, the continuation of the throne depends on covenant-keeping. The resolution may be that the dynasty itself is unconditional (it will eventually produce the ultimate king) while individual reigns within it are conditional on faithfulness.
13. The verb ivvah (from avah) is the same verb used for human desire and appetite. Applying it to God is anthropomorphic but deliberate — the psalm wants the reader to understand that God's presence in Zion is not obligation but desire. He chose because He wanted to dwell there.
14. The adverbial phrase adei ad ('forever and ever') is one of the strongest temporal expressions in Hebrew, denoting permanence without limit. When God says 'this is my rest forever,' the claim transcends any particular structure — the first temple, the second temple. The psalm makes a theological claim about Zion that outlasts every building erected on it.
15. The infinitive absolute construction barekh abarekh ('I will surely bless, I will richly bless') is the same grammatical form God uses in blessing Abraham (Genesis 22:17). It signals a divine commitment of the highest order. The focus on feeding the poor connects Zion theology to social justice — God's dwelling place must be a place where the hungry eat.
16. The parallel between verse 9 (the psalmist's prayer) and verse 16 (God's answer) reveals the psalm's structure of call and response. The community asks for tsedeq ('righteousness'); God gives yeshu'ah ('salvation'). The community asks for joy; God gives intensified joy. In every case, God's answer exceeds the request.
17. The verb atsmiyach ('I will cause to sprout') is the same root as tsemach, the word Jeremiah (23:5) and Zechariah (3:8, 6:12) use for the messianic 'Branch' — the righteous descendant who will sprout from David's line. This verse is one of the roots of that later messianic terminology.
17. The 'lamp' (ner) as a symbol of dynastic survival appears repeatedly in the books of Kings. When God tears the kingdom from Solomon, He leaves one tribe 'so that David my servant may always have a lamp before me in Jerusalem' (1 Kings 11:36). The lamp is the visible sign of God's ongoing commitment to the Davidic line.
18. The verb yatsits ('to blossom, shine') applied to the crown is unusual and vivid. It connects the crown to the sprouting horn of verse 17 — both images are organic and living, suggesting a dynasty that is not merely maintained but flourishing. The choice of this verb transforms the crown from a static object to a living symbol of divine favor.

Summary: A Song of Ascents attributed to David. This brief psalm celebrates the goodness of brothers dwelling together in unity, illustrating it with two vivid images: precious oil flowing down Aaron's beard and the dew of Hermon descending on the mountains of Zion. It concludes with the declaration that where such unity exists, the LORD commands blessing — life forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's two similes seem strange to modern readers — anointing oil and mountain dew — but both are images of downward flow, of something precious descending from above to cover what is below. The oil flows from Aaron's head down his beard to the collar of his robes; the dew descends from towering Hermon to the hills of Zion. Unity is not something people generate from within but something that descends upon them from a higher source. The psalm is also remarkable for its brevity and compression: in three verses it moves from observation ('how good') to illustration (oil and dew) to theological declaration (the LORD commands blessing there). The word sham ('there') in verse 3 is the hinge — wherever brothers dwell together, that is where God commands life.

Translation Friction: The geography of verse 3 is deliberately impossible: Mount Hermon is in the far north of Israel, over 100 miles from Zion. Hermon's dew cannot literally fall on Zion. The psalm is not describing meteorology but theology — the refreshing abundance of the north (Hermon, over 9,000 feet, generating massive dew) is imagined as descending on the holy mountain. The impossible geography creates a poetic hyperbole: unity is so precious that it is as if the richest dew in the land fell on the most sacred mountain. The anointing oil image references the high priestly consecration of Exodus 29:7 and Leviticus 8:12, connecting brotherly unity to the holiness of the priesthood.

Connections: The oil imagery echoes the consecration of Aaron in Exodus 29:7 and Leviticus 8:12. The phrase 'how good' (mah tov) echoes Genesis 1, where God repeatedly declares creation 'good' (tov). The concept of brothers dwelling together has legal resonance — Deuteronomy 25:5 uses the same phrase (achim yoshevim yachdav) for brothers living on the same family property, suggesting that the psalm's 'unity' has concrete, practical, not merely spiritual, meaning. The 'dew of Hermon' connects to the abundance imagery throughout the Psalms of Ascent, where Zion is the destination of blessing.

¹A song of ascents. Of David.

How good and how pleasant it is when brothers dwell together.

²It is like fine oil on the head, running down on the beard — Aaron's beard — running down to the collar of his robes.

³Like the dew of Hermon running down on the mountains of Zion — for there the LORD has commanded the blessing:
life forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase achim yoshevim yachdav ('brothers dwelling together') appears in Deuteronomy 25:5 in the law of levirate marriage, where it describes brothers living on the same family estate. The psalm may originally have had this concrete, property-based meaning — the goodness of family members who share an inheritance without dividing it. The Psalms of Ascent expand this to the national level: Israel as brothers gathering together at Zion.

2. The anointing oil recipe is given in Exodus 30:22-33: myrrh, cinnamon, cane, cassia, and olive oil. It was sacred — no one could make it for ordinary use. By comparing unity to this oil, the psalm elevates brotherly solidarity to the level of holy consecration. The phrase pi middotav ('the mouth/opening of his garments') refers to the neck opening of the priestly robe, not the hem. The oil reaches the collar, not the feet — the image is of total coverage of the upper body.
3. The verb tsivvah ('commanded') applied to blessing is unusual and powerful. God commands armies, commands the sea, commands angels — and here He commands blessing to fall on the place where brothers live in unity. The blessing is not optional or hoped for but decreed.
3. The phrase chayyim ad ha-olam ('life until forever') is the psalm's climax. It transcends ordinary blessing (crops, safety, children) and reaches toward the ultimate gift. In the context of the Psalms of Ascent, pilgrims ascending to Jerusalem are told that their destination — the place where Israel gathers as one — is the place where God commands eternal life.

Summary: The final Song of Ascents. In just three verses, the psalm calls on the servants of the LORD who stand in the temple at night to lift their hands and bless God, then pronounces a blessing from Zion back upon the worshiper. It is both the conclusion of the pilgrimage collection and a liturgical exchange between the arriving pilgrims and the temple ministers.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 134 closes the Songs of Ascent (120-134) with an exchange of blessing. The pilgrims have arrived. The journey that began in Psalm 120 with distress among hostile neighbors ends here in the temple courts at night. The psalm's structure is a call and response: verses 1-2 are the pilgrims' call to the night-shift priests and Levites ('Bless the LORD!'), and verse 3 is the priests' answering benediction ('May the LORD bless you from Zion'). Blessing flows in both directions — upward from people to God and downward from God through the priests to the people. The brevity is itself meaningful: after fifteen psalms of journey, longing, trust, and arrival, the final word is simply 'bless' — repeated three times in three verses.

Translation Friction: *The phrase omdim be-veit YHWH ba-leilot ('standing in the house of the LORD at night') raises questions about nighttime temple worship. While the regular sacrificial schedule was centered on morning and evening, 1 Chronicles 9:33 mentions Levitical singers who served 'day and night,' and Psalm 42:8 speaks of God's song 'in the night.' The night watch was a real feature of temple life, not merely poetic atmosphere. The night setting also creates theological resonance: even in darkness, the servants of the LORD stand and bless.*

Connections: *As the final Song of Ascents, Psalm 134 echoes and resolves themes from the entire collection. The 'lifting of hands' (se'u yedeikhem) toward the sanctuary recalls Psalm 121:1 ('I lift my eyes to the hills'). The blessing from Zion echoes Psalm 128:5 ('May the LORD bless you from Zion'). The title oseh shamayim va-arets ('maker of heaven and earth') appeared in Psalm 121:2 and Psalm 124:8, forming an inclusio that brackets the entire collection. The pilgrimage that began with a cry for help from the maker of heaven and earth ends with a blessing from the same maker.*

¹A song of ascents.
Come, bless the LORD,
all you servants of the LORD who stand in the house of the LORD at night.

²Lift your hands toward the sanctuary and bless the LORD.

³May the LORD bless you from Zion —
the maker of heaven and earth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase avdei YHWH ('servants of the LORD') can refer broadly to all worshipers or specifically to the Levitical temple staff. In this context, the night setting and the standing in the house of the LORD point to the temple ministers. The verb omdim ('standing') is a technical term for priestly service — to 'stand before the LORD' means to serve in an official capacity (Deuteronomy 10:8).
2. The ambiguity of qodesh ('holiness' or 'the holy place/sanctuary') is likely intentional. The lifted hands are directed toward the sacred space (the inner sanctuary where God's presence dwells) and the act itself is sacred (performed in holiness). Hebrew poets often exploit the double meaning of spatial and qualitative terms.
3. The phrase oseh shamayim va-arets ('maker of heaven and earth') forms an inclusio with Psalm 121:2 and Psalm 124:8, bracketing the Songs of Ascent. The God who helped the pilgrim start the journey is the same God who blesses at the destination. This structural repetition is deliberate and marks the collection as a unified literary whole.
3. The shift from plural address in verses 1-2 (barekhu, 'bless,' plural) to singular in verse 3 (yevarekekha, 'may he bless you,' singular) may reflect a liturgical practice: the congregation calls out together, and the priest pronounces the blessing on each individual worshiper.

Summary: A grand hymn of praise that draws together threads from across the Hebrew Bible. The psalm opens and closes with Hallelujah, calls on the temple servants to praise the LORD's name, recounts His sovereignty over nature and His mighty acts in the Exodus and conquest, mocks the impotence of idols, and concludes with a cascade of blessings from Zion. It is a mosaic psalm — nearly every line echoes or quotes another biblical text.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 135 is one of the most heavily allusive psalms in the Psalter. It borrows from Exodus 15 (the Song of the Sea), Deuteronomy 32 (the Song of Moses), Psalm 115 (the idol polemic), Psalm 134 (the blessing from Zion), and Jeremiah 10 (the weather theophany). This is not plagiarism but liturgical art — the psalm weaves Israel's entire theological tradition into a single hymn, creating a tapestry of received language that a worshiping community would recognize line by line. The idol section (vv. 15-18) is nearly identical to Psalm 115:4-8, reinforcing the contrast between the living God who acts in history and the dead gods who cannot move, speak, or see.

Translation Friction: The statement that God 'does whatever He pleases' (v. 6) and the celebration of military conquest (vv. 10-12) present the psalm's God as an unconstrained sovereign who acts unilaterally. The killing of Sihon and Og (vv. 10-11) is celebrated without moral qualification — this is conquest theology in its purest form. Modern readers must reckon with the fact that the psalm praises the same God for making lightning and for destroying nations, holding both in a single breath of worship. The psalm does not apologize for this; it asserts that God's sovereignty over weather and God's sovereignty over history are the same sovereignty.

Connections: Verses 15-18 closely parallel Psalm 115:4-8 (the idol polemic). Verse 7 echoes Jeremiah 10:13 and 51:16 (God's control of weather). Verses 8-12 retell the Exodus and conquest narratives from Exodus 7-12 and Numbers 21. Verse 4 echoes Deuteronomy 7:6 (Israel's election). The opening 'Hallelujah' and closing 'Hallelujah' frame it as a complete liturgical unit. The blessing from Zion in verse 21 connects directly to Psalm 134:3, making Psalm 135 a natural continuation of the Songs of Ascent.

¹Hallelujah!

Praise the name of the LORD;

praise Him, you servants of the LORD,

²you who stand in the house of the LORD,

within the courts of the house of our God.

³Hallelujah, for the LORD is good;

sing praise to His name, for it is delightful.

⁴For Yah has chosen Jacob for Himself,
Israel as His treasured possession.

⁵I know that the LORD is great,
and our Lord is above all gods.

⁶Whatever the LORD desires, He does — in the heavens and on the earth,
in the seas and in all the depths.

⁷He raises clouds from the ends of the earth;
He makes lightning for the rain;
He brings wind from His storehouses.

⁸He struck down the firstborn of Egypt,
both human and animal.

⁹He sent signs and wonders into your midst, Egypt — against Pharaoh and all his servants.

¹⁰He struck down many nations and killed mighty kings —

¹¹Sihon, the Amorite king, and Og, king of Bashan,
and all the kingdoms of Canaan.

¹²He gave their land as an inheritance — an inheritance for Israel His people.

¹³LORD, your name endures forever;
LORD, your renown through every generation.

¹⁴For the LORD will bring justice for His people and will have compassion on His servants.

¹⁵The idols of the nations are silver and gold,
the work of human hands.

¹⁶They have mouths but cannot speak;
they have eyes but cannot see.

¹⁷They have ears but cannot hear;
there is not even breath in their mouths.

¹⁸Those who make them will become like them — everyone who trusts in them.

¹⁹House of Israel, bless the LORD!
House of Aaron, bless the LORD!

20House of Levi, bless the LORD!
You who fear the LORD, bless the LORD!

21Blessed be the LORD from Zion,
He who dwells in Jerusalem.
Hallelujah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The triple repetition of hallelu ('praise!') in a single verse creates rhythmic urgency. The address to avdei YHWH ('servants of the LORD') connects directly to Psalm 134:1, where the same servants were called to bless — the vocabulary links the two psalms as a liturgical pair.
2. The 'standing' (omdim) is the same posture of service from Psalm 134:1. The specification of 'courts' (chatsrot) — the open-air areas surrounding the temple — indicates that this praise is public, congregational, not confined to the inner sanctuary where only priests could enter.
3. The pairing of tov ('good') and na'im ('pleasant, delightful') echoes Psalm 133:1 — what was said of brotherly unity is now said of the LORD Himself and of the act of praising Him. The word na'im could modify the name ('His name is delightful') or the act of singing ('singing is delightful'). The ambiguity enriches both readings.
4. The word segullah appears in Exodus 19:5, Deuteronomy 7:6, 14:2, 26:18, and Malachi 3:17. In each case it describes Israel's unique status as God's personal possession. The word likely derives from Akkadian sikiltum ('possession, property'). We render it 'treasured possession' to capture both the ownership and the value.
5. The shift to first person singular (ani yadati, 'I know') is personal testimony within communal worship. The claim is not monotheism in the philosophical sense but the assertion of incomparability: YHWH is greater than all elohim. The word mi-kol ('above all, more than all') does not necessarily affirm the existence of other gods — it asserts that whatever else might claim divine status, the LORD surpasses it.
6. The word tehomot ('depths, deeps') is the plural of tehom, the primordial deep of Genesis 1:2. In ancient Near Eastern cosmology, the deep was a chaotic force that preceded creation. By asserting God's sovereignty over the tehomot, the psalm claims that even the most primordial, chaotic forces are under God's command.
7. The word nesi'im can mean 'clouds,' 'vapors,' or 'mists.' The root nasa means 'to lift, carry.' These are the rising vapors that become rain clouds — the first stage of the rain cycle, which the psalm attributes entirely to God's agency. The parallel with Jeremiah 10:13 is so close that one text is almost certainly quoting the other, or both draw from a common liturgical source.
8. The transition from weather sovereignty (v. 7) to the Exodus plagues (v. 8) is seamless — the same God who controls rain and lightning is the God who struck Egypt. The phrase me-adam ad behemah ('from human to animal') indicates the totality of the plague's reach, echoing Exodus 12:29.
9. The phrase otot u-mofim ('signs and wonders') is the standard Deuteronomistic vocabulary for the plagues (Deuteronomy 4:34, 6:22, 7:19). The shift to second person address (betokekhi, 'into your midst') is dramatic — the psalm speaks directly to Egypt as if it were present, a technique that intensifies the rhetorical power of the recitation.
10. The narrative shifts from the Exodus to the conquest. The generic 'many nations' and 'mighty kings' prepare for the specific names in the next verse. The verbs hikkah ('struck') and harag ('killed') are blunt and direct — the psalm does not soften the military violence of the conquest narrative.
11. Sihon and Og are the two Transjordanian kings defeated before the crossing of the Jordan (Numbers 21:21-35). Their names became formulaic in Israel's liturgical memory — they appear together in Deuteronomy 1:4, 3:1-11, 4:47, 29:7, 31:4; Joshua 2:10, 9:10, 12:4; Nehemiah 9:22; and Psalms 136:19-20. They represent the first victories of the conquest, the proof that God would give the land.
12. The word nachalah ('inheritance, allotted portion') is one of the most theologically loaded land terms in the Hebrew Bible. It carries the sense of permanent, divinely granted possession — not earned, not purchased, but allotted by the sovereign. The double use (nachalah nachalah) is emphatic: this land is truly, genuinely, permanently Israel's inheritance.
13. The 'name' (shem) and the 'memorial/renown' (zikhr) are parallel expressions for God's reputation and identity as known by His people. The phrase le-dor va-dor ('generation to generation') is the Hebrew idiom for perpetuity through time — not abstract eternity but ongoing remembrance in each successive generation. This verse echoes Exodus 3:15, where God tells Moses that YHWH is 'my name forever and my memorial to all generations.'
14. This verse is drawn directly from the Song of Moses in Deuteronomy 32:36. In its original context, it describes God's turning point — after discipline, He vindicates His people and has compassion on them. The psalm uses the quotation to assure worshipers that God's sovereignty (celebrated in vv. 5-12) is exercised on behalf of, not against, His people.
15. The word atsabbei ('idols') comes from a root meaning 'to shape, form, fashion' and carries a secondary association with etsev ('pain, grief'). The idols are shaped things that bring grief. The polemic begins with their material: silver and gold — valuable but inert. And their origin: human hands — they are made by the very beings they claim to rule.

16. The idol polemic catalogs the sensory organs that the images possess in form but not in function. This section (vv. 15-18) closely parallels Psalm 115:4-8. The contrast is with the living God of verses 5-14, who speaks, sees, acts, and responds. The idols are the anti-God: shaped like beings but utterly inert.
17. The climax of the polemic: not only can the idols not speak, see, or hear — they do not even breathe. The word ruach ('breath, wind, spirit') is the most basic sign of life. Its absence confirms that the idols are not merely limited gods but no gods at all — dead objects shaped like living beings.
18. The principle 'you become like what you worship' is stated here and in Psalm 115:8 as a theological law. Hosea 9:10 expresses the same idea: 'They became detestable like the thing they loved.' The psalm is not merely mocking idolaters but warning Israel: worship shapes the worshiper.
19. The closing cascade of blessings addresses four groups in descending specificity: all Israel, the priestly house of Aaron, the Levitical house of Levi, and all who fear the LORD. This fourfold call appears also in Psalm 115:9-11 and Psalm 118:2-4, suggesting a fixed liturgical formula. Each group is invited to participate in the same act: blessing the LORD.
20. The final group, yirei YHWH ('those who fear the LORD'), may include non-Israelite God-fearers — proselytes or sympathizers who worship Israel's God without being ethnically Israelite. This broadens the call beyond tribal boundaries to anyone whose posture before God is one of reverent awe.
21. The phrase barukh YHWH mi-Tsiyon ('blessed be the LORD from Zion') echoes Psalm 128:5 and Psalm 134:3, creating a web of cross-references within the Psalms of Ascent and its immediate aftermath. Zion is the source point of blessing — not because the geography is magical but because God has chosen to dwell there.

Summary: *The Great Hallel. Twenty-six verses, each ending with the refrain 'for His faithful love endures forever.' The psalm moves through creation (vv. 4-9), the Exodus (vv. 10-16), the conquest (vv. 17-22), God's rescue of Israel from lowliness (vv. 23-24), and His provision of food to all living things (v. 25), before closing with a final call to give thanks (v. 26). The refrain ki le-olam chasdo ('for His faithful love endures forever') is repeated in every single verse — twenty-six times.*

What Makes This Remarkable: *The relentless repetition of the refrain is the psalm's genius. Twenty-six times the congregation responds with the same words, and the repetition is not redundancy but insistence. Each verse presents a different act of God — creating light, splitting the sea, killing kings, feeding all flesh — and after each one, the same truth is declared: His faithful love endures forever. The structure teaches that chesed is not one attribute among many but the interpretive key to everything God does. Creation is chesed. Liberation is chesed. Conquest is chesed. Daily bread is chesed. The psalm was likely performed antiphonally, with a cantor singing the first half of each verse and the congregation responding with the refrain. This means the congregation's most-repeated theological statement was a declaration about chesed.*

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew word chesed has no single English equivalent. 'Mercy' (KJV) is too narrow; 'lovingkindness' (older translations) is not a real English word; 'steadfast love' (many modern translations) is closer but still clinical. We render it 'faithful love' because chesed is love that is loyal, love that persists through covenant obligation, love that does not quit. It is God's self-binding commitment to His people expressed in ongoing acts of care. The twenty-six repetitions in this psalm may not be accidental — the numerical value of YHWH (yod-he-vav-he) in gematria is 26, suggesting the psalm's structure mirrors the divine name itself.*

Connections: *The refrain appears in 1 Chronicles 16:34, 2 Chronicles 5:13, 7:3, and Ezra 3:11 — always at moments of intense liturgical celebration (the ark's arrival, the temple dedication, the second temple's foundation). Jeremiah 33:11 prophesies a day when the refrain will be heard again in the restored land. The phrase ki le-olam chasdo is arguably the most repeated liturgical formula in the Hebrew Bible. Psalm 136 shares extensive content with Psalm 135, but where Psalm 135 narrates, Psalm 136 responds — each act of God becomes an occasion for the chesed declaration.*

Give thanks to the LORD, for He is good,
for His faithful love endures forever.

²Give thanks to the God of gods,
for His faithful love endures forever.

³Give thanks to the Lord of lords,
for His faithful love endures forever.

⁴To the one who alone does great wonders,

⁸The sun to rule the day,
for His faithful love endures forever.

⁹The moon and stars to rule the night,

for His faithful love endures forever.

for His faithful love endures forever.

²⁶Give thanks to the God of heaven,
for His faithful love endures forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The KJV renders chesed as 'mercy,' which captures only one dimension of the word. Chesed includes mercy but also encompasses loyalty, commitment, kindness, and covenant faithfulness. It is the word used when Ruth clings to Naomi, when David shows kindness to Jonathan's son, when God remembers His covenant with Abraham. We render it 'faithful love' throughout this psalm to hold together the love and the faithfulness.
2. The title Elohei ha-Elohim ('God of gods') uses the superlative construction common in Hebrew: the ultimate among all that could be called divine. It does not necessarily affirm the existence of other gods but asserts YHWH's supremacy over every possible claimant to divine status.
3. Adonei ha-Adonim ('Lord of lords') parallels the previous verse's 'God of gods.' Together they form a double superlative: supreme God, supreme ruler. The three opening verses (vv. 1-3) establish the recipient of thanks before the reasons begin in verse 4.
4. The word levaddo ('alone, by Himself') is theologically significant: no other being participates in God's wonder-working. The niflaot gedolot ('great wonders') encompasses everything that follows — creation, Exodus, conquest — all performed by God alone.
5. The word tevunah ('understanding, insight, intelligence') attributes the creation to divine wisdom, not raw power. The heavens are not brute-forced into existence but crafted with intelligence. This echoes Proverbs 3:19: 'The LORD by wisdom founded the earth; by understanding He established the heavens.'
6. The verb roqa ('to spread out, to beat out, to flatten') is a metalworking term — like hammering gold into thin sheets. The image is of God flattening the earth and laying it over the primordial waters, reflecting the ancient cosmology of Genesis 1:9-10 where dry land emerges from the waters.
7. The 'great lights' (orim gedolim) echoes Genesis 1:16 exactly — the same phrase used for the sun and moon on the fourth day of creation. The psalm follows the Genesis creation order, treating the creation narrative as a liturgical script.
8. The verb memsheleth ('to rule, to govern') assigns the sun a political role — it governs the day as a regent governs territory. In a world where surrounding cultures worshiped the sun as a god, the psalm reduces it to a servant assigned a shift by the true sovereign.
9. The moon and stars together govern the night. The plural memshelot ('rules, governances') distributes the authority — the night has multiple governors, not one. This completes the creation section (vv. 4-9) before the psalm shifts to the Exodus in verse 10.
10. The transition from creation to Exodus is seamless — the God who made the sun is the God who struck Egypt. The phrase bi-vekhoreihem ('through their firstborn') concentrates the tenth plague into a single word: the firstborn are both the target and the means of the blow. Declaring 'His faithful love endures forever' after an act of destruction is theologically challenging — the psalm insists that even judgment is an expression of chesed toward those being delivered.

11. The verb vayyotse ('and He brought out') is the Exodus verb — the hiphil of yatsa, the root of the entire Exodus narrative. God is the subject; Israel is the object. The deliverance is entirely God's act.
12. The phrase be-yad chazaqah u-vi-zeroa netuyah ('with a strong hand and with an outstretched arm') is the Deuteronomic formula for the Exodus (Deuteronomy 4:34, 5:15, 7:19, 11:2, 26:8). It is one of the most formulaic phrases in the Hebrew Bible — an Israelite hearing these words would immediately think 'Exodus.' The hand and arm are anthropomorphisms for God's direct, personal intervention.
13. The verb gozer ('to cut, split, divide') is graphic — God cut the sea into gezarim ('sections, pieces'), as one cuts meat or cloth. The Yam Suf ('Sea of Reeds') is the traditional body of water crossed during the Exodus. We render it 'Sea of Reeds' rather than 'Red Sea' because suf means 'reed, rush' (as in Exodus 2:3, where baby Moses is placed among the reeds).
14. The hiphil verb he'evir ('He caused to pass through') emphasizes God's agency — Israel did not swim or wade; God caused them to cross. The preposition be-tokho ('through its midst') places Israel in the center of the divided sea, surrounded by walls of water on both sides.
15. The verb ni'er is more dismissive than 'overthrew' (KJV). It contains the idea of shaking something loose — like shaking insects off a garment. Applied to Pharaoh and his entire army, it reduces Egypt's military might to something God brushes away without effort.
16. The participle molikhi ('the one leading') describes ongoing guidance — not a single act but forty years of sustained direction through the desert. The wilderness (midbar) was not merely a transit zone but the place where Israel was formed as a covenant people. God's faithful love endures even through the barren places.
17. The conquest section begins (vv. 17-22), moving from the wilderness to the Transjordanian victories. The 'great kings' (melakhim gedolim) are specified in the following verses — Sihon and Og, the same pair memorialized in Psalm 135:10-11.
18. The word addirim ('mighty, majestic, powerful') elevates the defeated kings — these were not petty chieftains but formidable rulers. Their might makes their defeat more impressive and God's chesed more visible.
19. Sihon ruled the territory between the Arnon and Jabbok rivers in Transjordan. His defeat is narrated in Numbers 21:21-31 and became one of the most frequently cited events in Israel's liturgical memory of the conquest.
20. Og ruled the fertile region of Bashan in the northern Transjordan. Deuteronomy 3:11 notes that his iron bed was nine cubits long — he was remembered as a giant. His defeat, narrated in Numbers 21:33-35, opened the way to the northern approaches to the promised land.
21. The word nachalah ('inheritance') reappears from Psalm 135:12. The conquered land is not plunder but inheritance — a divinely granted portion held in trust.
22. Israel is called avdo ('His servant') — a title of honor, not degradation. In the ancient Near East, the king's servant was his trusted agent. Israel serves the cosmic sovereign as His representative on earth. The land is the servant's portion, granted by the master.
23. The verb zakhar ('remembered') in Hebrew does not mean 'recalled to mind' (as if God had forgotten) but 'turned His attention to with intent to act.' Divine remembering is always the prelude to divine intervention.
24. The verb vayyifrequeinu (from paraq, 'to tear away, to rescue by force, to snatch free') is more violent than 'redeemed.' It describes a forceful extraction — God ripped Israel from the grip of enemies the way one tears prey from a predator's jaws. The word tsareinu ('our enemies,' literally 'our adversaries, our distressers') comes from the root tsarar ('to bind, to press, to distress').
25. The phrase kol basar ('all flesh') encompasses not just all humans but all living creatures — animals, birds, sea life. The psalm's movement from Israel-specific salvation (vv. 10-24) to universal provision (v. 25) prevents the theology from becoming exclusively national. God's chesed has a particular expression (Israel's history) but a universal scope (all living things eat because of Him).
26. The title El ha-shamayim ('God of heaven') appears in Ezra, Nehemiah, and Daniel as a way of identifying Israel's God to non-Israelite audiences. Its use here universalizes the psalm's closing: this is not merely Israel's tribal deity but the God of heaven itself — the creator, liberator, and sustainer of all.

Summary: The psalm of exile. Babylonian captives sit by the rivers of Babylon and weep, hanging their harps on willows. Their captors demand songs of Zion, but the exiles refuse: how can they sing the LORD's song in a foreign land? The psalm then shifts to a fierce oath of loyalty to Jerusalem and closes with a raw cry for vengeance against Babylon and Edom, culminating in the shocking image of verse 9.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most emotionally extreme psalms in the Psalter — it moves from tender grief to savage rage without transition or apology. The opening image of weeping exiles is among the most beautiful in all poetry, while the closing image of dashing infants against rocks is among the most disturbing in all scripture. The psalm refuses to separate these emotions; they belong together as the full spectrum of what displacement, humiliation, and loss produce in the human soul. The captors' request to 'sing us one of Zion's songs' is not innocent entertainment — it is the demand of the powerful that the defeated perform their culture as spectacle. The exiles' refusal is an act of resistance: the songs of Zion are not for Babylonian amusement.

Translation Friction: Verse 9 is the most difficult verse in the Psalter for modern readers: 'Happy is the one who seizes your infants and dashes them against the rock.' This is not a command or a prophecy but a curse — the raw prayer of a traumatized people who witnessed exactly this violence done to their own children (cf. 2 Kings 8:12, Isaiah 13:16, Hosea 13:16, Nahum 3:10). The psalm does not command anyone to act on this wish; it places the wish before God. The violence of the language reflects the violence that created it. To sanitize this verse is to silence the voice of the victim. To celebrate it is to miss the entire arc of scripture that moves toward enemy love. The psalm is honest about what humans feel in the aftermath of atrocity; it does not pretend those feelings are righteous.

Connections: The 'rivers of Babylon' likely refer to the canal systems of the Euphrates — the irrigation channels where deportees were settled (cf. Ezekiel 1:1, 'by the river Chebar'). The demand to sing echoes the forced labor songs of slaves. The oath to Jerusalem (vv. 5-6) parallels the covenant loyalty language of the Psalms of Ascent. The curse against Edom (v. 7) reflects Edom's complicity in Jerusalem's destruction (Obadiah 10-14, Ezekiel 25:12-14). The prophecy of Babylon's destruction being answered measure for measure echoes Isaiah 13:16 and Jeremiah 51:56.

¹By the rivers of Babylon — there we sat down and wept when we remembered Zion.

²On the willows there
we hung our lyres.

³For there our captors demanded songs from us,
and our tormentors demanded joy:
"Sing us one of the songs of Zion!"

⁴How can we sing the LORD's song on foreign soil?

⁵If I forget you, Jerusalem,
let my right hand forget its skill.

⁶Let my tongue cling to the roof of my mouth
if I do not remember you,
if I do not set Jerusalem above my highest joy.

⁷Remember, LORD, against the sons of Edom the day of Jerusalem —
how they cried, "Tear it down! Tear it down!
Down to its foundations!"

⁸Daughter of Babylon, you devastated one — happy is the one who repays you for what you have done to us.

⁹Happy is the one who seizes your infants and dashes them against the rock.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'rivers' (naharot) of Babylon are not natural rivers but the vast canal system that irrigated Mesopotamia. Ezekiel was among the exiles 'by the river Chebar' (Ezekiel 1:1), a major canal near Nippur. The exiles were settled in agricultural communities along these waterways — the setting is specific and historical, not merely poetic.
2. The word aravim could refer to willows (Salix) or poplars (Populus euphratica), both of which grow along Mesopotamian waterways. The kinnor is the primary stringed instrument of Israelite worship — David played it before Saul (1 Samuel 16:23), and it accompanied temple psalmody. Hanging it in a tree is the musical equivalent of refusing to speak.
3. The word tolaleinu is rare and debated. It may derive from a root meaning 'to mock, to taunt' or from a root meaning 'to torment.' Either way, it describes people who inflict suffering — these are not friendly audiences asking for a cultural exchange but captors demanding a performance from the conquered.
3. The phrase mi-shir Tsiyon ('from the songs of Zion') refers to the temple psalms — songs praising the LORD's presence in Jerusalem, His choice of Zion, His kingship from the holy mountain. To sing these songs in Babylon, by the rivers of the empire that destroyed the temple, would be to sever the songs from their meaning.
4. The phrase shir YHWH ('the song of the LORD') elevates the songs beyond human composition — they belong to God. This is not merely folk music or national anthem; it is sacred song, bound to a sacred place. The exiles' refusal to sing is an act of theological integrity: they will not profane what is holy by performing it as spectacle.
5. The phrase tishkach yemini ('let my right hand forget') is elliptical — the object is implied. Most scholars supply 'its skill' or 'its function.' Some read it as 'let my right hand wither' (from a different root). Either way, the curse targets the hand's ability to function — the exile stakes his bodily capacity on his fidelity to Jerusalem.
6. The two self-curses (hand and tongue) correspond to the two faculties needed to sing the songs of Zion: instrumental skill and vocal ability. The exile offers to sacrifice both rather than forget Jerusalem. This is the language of total commitment — the exile's entire musical identity is pledged to a destroyed city.
7. Edom's role in Jerusalem's fall is confirmed by multiple prophetic texts: Obadiah 10-14 details Edom's crimes (standing aside, gloating, looting, cutting off refugees), Ezekiel 25:12-14 announces judgment against Edom for acting in vengeance, and Lamentations 4:21-22 warns Edom that judgment is coming. The aru aru ('tear down, strip bare') uses a verb that implies both demolition and humiliation — laying bare, exposing, stripping naked.
8. The phrase ha-shedudah could be translated 'the destroyed one' (referring to Babylon's future fall) or 'the destructive one' (referring to what Babylon did to Jerusalem). The ambiguity may be intentional — Babylon is both the destroyer and the one destined to be destroyed. The prophetic perfect tense treats the future as certain.
9. This verse must be understood within its historical context: the Babylonian army did destroy Jerusalem, did kill its inhabitants, did commit atrocities against children. The exiles who speak this psalm are not hypothetically imagining violence — they are remembering it and praying that the perpetrators receive the same treatment. The verse is not a moral instruction but a prayer from the depths of trauma. Its inclusion in scripture is itself remarkable — the Bible does not censor the prayers of the suffering, even when those prayers are terrible.
9. Isaiah 13:16 prophesies the same fate for Babylon: 'Their infants will be dashed to pieces before their eyes.' The psalm's wish aligns with the prophetic tradition that sees Babylon's fall as divine justice. Cyrus's conquest of Babylon in 539 BCE fulfilled this expectation, though the historical conquest was notably less violent than the psalm anticipates.

Summary: A psalm of David. The psalmist gives wholehearted thanks before the divine assembly, bowing toward God's temple and praising His name for faithful love and truth. God answered when he called and strengthened his soul. The psalm envisions all the kings of the earth praising the LORD when they hear His words, for though the LORD is exalted, He sees the lowly. The psalm closes with a confession of trust: the LORD will complete what He has begun, for His faithful love endures forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm bridges the personal and the cosmic. It begins with an individual giving thanks ('I give you thanks with all my heart') and ends with a universal vision of kings singing the LORD's praises. The key theological claim is in verse 6: the LORD is ram ('exalted, high') yet He sees the shafal ('lowly, humble') and knows the gavah ('proud, haughty') from a distance. Height in God's case produces not distance but attention to those below. The final verse contains one of the most theologically loaded statements in the Psalter: YHWH yigmor ba'adi ('the LORD will complete what concerns me') — God finishes what He starts.

Translation Friction: The phrase neged elohim in verse 1 ('before the gods' or 'before the divine beings') is ambiguous. It could mean 'before the heavenly court' (divine beings who witness human worship), 'before the judges' (human authorities), or 'before the idols' (in defiant contrast to false gods). The LXX translates it as 'before the angels.' The ambiguity is likely intentional — the psalmist's worship takes place in a cosmic arena, witnessed by whatever powers exist.

Connections: The statement 'You have exalted your word above all your name' (v. 2) is one of the most debated lines in the Psalms — it may mean that God's faithfulness to His promises exceeds even His reputation. The closing affirmation that God will not abandon the work of His hands (v. 8) echoes Philippians 1:6. The phrase chesed le-olam ('faithful love forever') connects this psalm to the Great Hallel of Psalm 136. The vision of kings praising God anticipates Psalm 148 and the universal worship themes of Isaiah 2:2-4.

¹Of David.

I give You thanks with all my heart;
before the divine assembly I sing Your praise.

²I bow toward Your holy temple and give thanks to Your name for Your faithful love and Your truth, for You have exalted Your word above all Your name.

³On the day I called, You answered me;
You made me bold with strength in my soul.

⁴All the kings of the earth will give You thanks, LORD, for they have heard the words of Your mouth.

⁵And they will sing of the ways of the LORD,
for great is the glory of the LORD.

⁶Though the LORD is exalted,
He sees the lowly,
and the proud He knows from a distance.

⁷Though I walk through the thick of trouble,
You keep me alive.
Against the rage of my enemies You stretch out Your hand, and Your right hand saves me.

⁸The LORD will complete what concerns me.
LORD, Your faithful love endures forever — do not let go of the works of Your hands.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase neged elohim is one of the more contested expressions in the Psalms. We render it 'before the divine assembly' because the context of cosmic worship best fits the psalm's movement from individual thanks to universal recognition by kings. The psalmist's worship is not a private act but a declaration made before witnesses, both heavenly and earthly.
2. The clause ki higdalta al kol shimkha imratekha is one of the most debated lines in the Psalter. Some emend the text; the LXX reads differently. Taken as it stands in the MT, it says God has magnified His word (imrah, 'saying, promise') above His name (shem, 'name, reputation'). This may mean: God's specific covenant promises are the greatest thing about Him — greater even than His cosmic reputation. His reliability outshines His majesty.

3. The verb tarhiveni (from rahav, 'to be wide, spacious, bold') means God expanded or emboldened the psalmist's inner life. The image is spatial — a soul that was cramped by fear is made wide, spacious, bold. The word oz ('strength, power') specifies what fills the expanded space: not mere relief but actual strength.
4. The vision expands from one worshiper to all the kings of the earth — kol malkhei erets. The trigger for their worship is hearing: ki shamu imrei fikha ('for they have heard the words of Your mouth'). When God's words reach the nations, the nations respond with thanksgiving. This is a missionary vision — not of Israel going to the nations but of God's words reaching the nations' rulers.
5. The kings will not merely acknowledge God but will sing — ve-yashiru be-darkhei YHWH ('they will sing of/in the ways of the LORD'). The 'ways' (darkhei) are God's characteristic patterns of action — His justice, mercy, faithfulness. The reason is kavod YHWH ('the glory of the LORD'), which is great (gadol). When the nations see how God acts, they will sing about it.
6. The verb yeyeda (from yada, 'to know') applied to the proud 'from a distance' is ambiguous: does God know about the proud from far away (omniscience) or does He keep them at a distance (relational remoteness)? The contrast with the lowly suggests the latter — God draws near to the humble and keeps the proud at a distance. The same theology appears in James 4:6 and 1 Peter 5:5.
7. The phrase be-qerev tsarah ('in the midst of trouble') places the psalmist inside the trouble, not approaching it or remembering it but walking through it. The verb techayeni ('You keep me alive, You revive me') is from chayah ('to live') — in the thick of mortal danger, God sustains life. The right hand (yeminekha) is the hand of power and salvation throughout the Psalms.
8. The verb teref (from raphah, 'to let go, to relax, to abandon') in the negative imperative al teref means 'do not release, do not let drop, do not abandon.' The image is of God holding something He has made and the psalmist asking Him not to open His hands. This is one of the most intimate images of divine care in the Psalter — God as the craftsman who will not discard His own work.

Summary: A psalm of David. The most sustained meditation on divine omniscience and omnipresence in the Hebrew Bible. The psalmist declares that God has searched him and known him completely — every movement, every thought, every word before it is spoken. He cannot flee from God's presence: not in heaven, not in the grave, not at the farthest reach of the sea, not in darkness. God wove him together in the womb, and all his days were written before any of them existed. The psalm then turns sharply to a plea against the wicked before closing with an invitation for God to search and test the psalmist's own heart.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 139 is unique in the Psalter for its sustained philosophical depth combined with intimate personal address. It is simultaneously the most theological and the most personal psalm — cosmic claims about God's knowledge and presence are expressed as 'You know me... You are there... You knit me.' The theology is never abstract; it is always relational. The psalmist does not prove God's omniscience; he addresses the One who knows him. The womb passage (vv. 13-16) is one of the most extraordinary poetic achievements in ancient literature — it imagines God as a weaver, an embroiderer, a sculptor working in the hidden depths of the earth (a metaphor for the womb), crafting the psalmist's body with deliberate artistry. The closing invitation — 'Search me, God' — is remarkable because the psalm has spent twenty-two verses establishing that God already knows everything. The psalmist invites what is already happening, which transforms omniscience from a threat into a comfort.

Translation Friction: *Verses 19-22 contain violent imprecation against the wicked that seems to break the psalm's contemplative tone. Some scholars view these verses as a later addition; others see them as integral — the psalmist, having meditated on God's total knowledge, logically asks why those who oppose this God are allowed to persist. The shift is jarring but theologically coherent: if God truly knows everything, then the wicked are not merely committing crimes but rebelling against the all-knowing One. Verse 16 is textually difficult — the Hebrew of golem ('unformed substance') and the phrase about days written in a book is compressed and partially obscure, leading to significant translation divergence.*

Connections: The omniscience theme connects to Psalm 44:21 ('He knows the secrets of the heart') and Jeremiah 17:10 ('I the LORD search the heart'). The womb imagery parallels Job 10:8-12 (God forming Job's body) and Jeremiah 1:5 ('Before I formed you in the womb I knew you'). The 'wings of the dawn' (v. 9) echoes Malachi 4:2 ('the sun of righteousness with healing in its wings'). The closing plea to be searched connects back to the opening declaration of being known, forming a circular structure. The psalm anticipates Romans 8:38-39 (nothing can separate us from God's love) and Acts 17:27-28 ('in Him we live and move and have our being').

¹For the music director. Of David. A psalm.
 LORD, You have searched me and You know me.

²You know when I sit and when I rise;
 You understand my thoughts from far away.

³You sift my traveling and my resting;
 You are familiar with all my ways.

⁴Before a word is on my tongue,
 LORD, You know it completely.

⁵Behind and before, You hem me in;
 You lay Your hand upon me.

⁶Such knowledge is too wondrous for me — too high; I cannot reach it.

⁷Where can I go from Your Spirit?
 Where can I flee from Your presence?

⁸If I ascend to heaven, You are there.
 If I make my bed in Sheol — there You are.

⁹If I rise on the wings of the dawn,
 if I settle at the far end of the sea —

¹⁰even there Your hand would guide me, and Your right hand would hold me.

¹¹If I say, "Surely darkness will overwhelm me, and the light around me will become night" —

¹²even darkness is not dark to You.
 The night shines like the day;
 darkness and light are the same to You.

¹³For You created my inmost parts;
 You wove me together in my mother's womb.

¹⁴I thank You, for I am awesomely, wondrously made.
 Your works are wondrous,
 and my soul knows it well.

¹⁵My frame was not hidden from You when I was made in secret, embroidered in the depths of the earth.

¹⁶Your eyes saw my unformed body.
 In Your book they were all written — the days that were shaped for me when not one of them yet existed.

¹⁷How precious to me are Your thoughts, God!
How vast is the sum of them!

¹⁸If I tried to count them, they would outnumber the sand.
When I awake, I am still with You.

¹⁹If only You would slay the wicked, God!
You men of bloodshed — get away from me!

²⁰They speak of You with wicked intent;
Your enemies use Your name for falsehood.

²¹Do I not hate those who hate You, LORD?
Do I not loathe those who rise against You?

²²With complete hatred I hate them;
they have become my own enemies.

²³Search me, God, and know my heart;
test me and know my anxious thoughts.

²⁴See if there is any hurtful way in me,
and lead me in the way that lasts forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb chaqar ('to search, probe, investigate') appears in Job 28:3 for mining ore from the earth — digging deep to find what is hidden. Applied to God's knowledge of a person, it implies God has gone to the deepest levels of the psalmist's being. This is not surface knowledge but excavation.
2. The merism 'sitting and rising' covers all of daily life — everything between lying down and standing up, which is to say everything. It is the Hebrew way of saying 'every moment of your existence.' The word re'i is textually linked to either 'thought/purpose' or 'shepherding' — both meanings are theologically rich and may be deliberately ambiguous.
3. The verb zerita ('You have sifted, winnowed, scattered') is an agricultural term — winnowing grain to separate wheat from chaff. God sifts the psalmist's life, examining each component. The words orchi ('my path, my walking') and riv'i ('my lying down, my resting') form another merism: movement and stillness, waking and sleeping. The verb hiskantah ('You are familiar with, You are accustomed to') means intimate, habitual knowledge — not newly discovered but long known.
4. The particle hen ('behold, look!') expresses astonishment — the psalmist is amazed by what he is saying. The word khullah ('all of it, entirely, completely') emphasizes that God's pre-knowledge is not partial or approximate but total.
5. The word tsartani is from the same root as tsarah ('trouble, distress') — being hemmed in by God can feel like distress. But the laying of the hand (kaf) is a gesture of blessing, protection, and ownership. The verse holds both the threat and the comfort of being completely known.
6. The adjective peliah ('wondrous, extraordinary, beyond comprehension') is from the same root as niflaot ('wonders') in Psalm 131:1. There, the psalmist renounced walking in things too wondrous for him; here, he encounters the most wondrous thing of all — God's knowledge of him — and confesses he cannot grasp it. The verb nisgavah ('it is set high, elevated, inaccessible') and lo ukhal lah ('I cannot attain/reach it') together convey a knowledge that exists but transcends human comprehension.
7. The question format does not express desire to flee but astonishment at the impossibility of doing so. Jonah 1:3 narrates an actual attempt to flee from God's presence — this psalm explains why such flight is futile.
8. Sheol is not hell in the later Christian sense but the shadowy realm of the dead — a place of silence, stillness, and diminished existence (cf. Ecclesiastes 9:10). The claim that God is present even there pushes against other psalmic texts that describe Sheol as a place cut off from God (Psalm 88:5-6). Psalm 139 extends divine omnipresence to its absolute limit.
9. The 'wings of the dawn' (kanfei shachar) is one of the most beautiful images in the Psalter. The dawn was imagined as a bird spreading its wings across the sky, its light extending from horizon to horizon. To take its wings is to move at the speed of light itself. Acharit yam ('the end/farthest part of the sea') is the western edge of the world in Israelite geography — beyond the Mediterranean, beyond everything known.

10. The verbs tancheni ('would guide me,' from nachah, 'to lead, guide') and tochazeni ('would hold me, seize me,' from achaz, 'to grasp, take hold of') transform omnipresence from a philosophical concept into personal care. God is not merely present at the farthest reaches — He is active there, guiding and holding. The right hand (yamin) is the hand of skill, strength, and favor.
11. The verb yeshufeni ('will overwhelm me, crush me, bruise me') is the same rare verb from Genesis 3:15, where the serpent strikes the heel. Darkness is imagined as an attacking force, not merely an absence of light. The psalmist's desperate hope — that darkness could hide him — is about to be overturned.
12. The theological implications are enormous: if darkness and light are identical to God, then the categories humans use to hide (night, secrecy, concealment) have no force before Him. This dissolves the fundamental human experience of being unseen in the dark. It also means that God's creative and sustaining work continues uninterrupted by night — He does not sleep (Psalm 121:4) and He does not squint.
13. The word kilyot ('kidneys') functions in Hebrew the way 'heart' functions in English — as the seat of deep emotion, conscience, and moral sensitivity. Jeremiah 17:10: 'I the LORD search the heart and test the kidneys.' God created the organ He now searches.
13. The verb sakakh in the piel (tesukkeni) means 'to weave together, to knit, to intertwine.' Some connect it to sukkah ('booth, shelter'), yielding 'You sheltered me.' We follow the weaving interpretation because it connects to the embroidery image in verse 15.
14. The phrase noraot nifleiti is more intense than the familiar 'fearfully and wonderfully made.' Noraot carries the sense of awe and even terror — the psalmist's existence is awe-inspiring, not merely 'nice.' Nifleiti means he is himself a wonder-work, a marvel on the level of God's mighty acts. Every human being, the psalm implies, is a divine wonder.
15. The verb ruqqam ('to embroider') is used in Exodus 26:36 and 27:16 for the embroidered screens of the tabernacle. The same artistry that decorated God's dwelling place is applied to the human body in the womb. The 'depths of the earth' is a mythological-poetic image, not a literal claim — it identifies the womb with the earth's hidden interior, the place of forming and shaping that no human eye can see.
16. The word golem appears only here in the entire Hebrew Bible. In later Jewish tradition (especially medieval mysticism), a golem became an artificially created being — the word's biblical meaning is simply 'unformed mass, embryo, raw material.' The concept of a divine book recording future events appears in Exodus 32:32-33 (the book of life), Daniel 12:1, and Malachi 3:16.
16. The textual note in the Hebrew (the ketiv/qere variation between velo and vele) creates ambiguity: 'and to Him' or 'and not.' The qere reading velo ('and to Him') yields: 'and to Him [was] one of them' — meaning each day belongs to God. The ketiv reading vele ('and not') yields: 'and not one of them [yet existed].' Both readings are theologically rich.
17. The word yaqru ('are precious, are heavy, are weighty') from yaqar describes something of great value and weight. God's re'ekha ('Your thoughts, Your purposes, Your intentions') toward the psalmist are not merely numerous but precious — each one carries weight and worth. The word rasheihem ('their sum, their heads, their chief parts') suggests the total is beyond calculation.
18. The phrase ve-odi immakh ('and I am still with You') is the psalm's most intimate moment. After twenty-four lines of theological exploration, the psalmist arrives at a child's experience: I woke up and You were there. The word odi ('still, yet, I continue to be') expresses continuity — the relationship that exists in sleep persists into waking.
19. The psalm's tone shifts abruptly. The contemplative meditation gives way to imprecation. The logic, however, follows: if God knows everything and is everywhere, why do the wicked persist? The phrase anshei damim ('men of blood/bloodshed') describes those who commit violence. The imperative suru menni ('turn aside from me, depart from me') is the psalmist's rejection of association with the violent.
20. The wicked speak God's name la-mezimmah ('for evil purpose, with wicked intent') and nasa la-shav ('lift up for emptiness/falsehood'). The charge is blasphemy — using God's name to serve lies. The language echoes the third commandment: 'You shall not lift up (tissa) the name of the LORD your God for emptiness (la-shav)' (Exodus 20:7).
21. The psalmist claims solidarity with God against God's enemies. The verb esna ('I hate') applied to God's enemies is the mirror of mesanekha ('those who hate You'). The verb etqotat ('I loathe, I am disgusted, I contend with') is from a root meaning 'to feel nausea, to be revolted.' The rhetoric is: my enemies are Your enemies; my hatred aligns with Your justice.
22. The phrase takhlit sinah ('complete/perfect hatred, hatred to the utmost') is the strongest possible expression of animosity in Hebrew. Takhlit means 'end, completion, perfection' — this hatred holds nothing back. The psalmist claims his enemies are God's enemies, and therefore his hatred is righteous alignment rather than personal malice. The following verses will test this claim.
23. The word sar'appai (from sar'af or sa'if, 'disquieting thought, anxious rumination') appears only here and in Psalm 94:19. It describes the branching, intrusive thoughts that trouble the inner life — what modern psychology might call anxious rumination. The psalmist asks God to search even these turbulent, half-formed thoughts.
24. The phrase derekh otsev is ambiguous. If from etsev ('idol'), it means 'a way of idolatry' — any hidden idol-worship in the psalmist's life. If from etsev ('pain, grief'), it means 'a way that causes pain' or 'a way that leads to sorrow.' The ambiguity may be productive — the psalmist asks God to find whatever is wrong, however it should be categorized.
24. The phrase derekh olam ('way everlasting') echoes Jeremiah 6:16: 'Stand at the crossroads and look; ask for the ancient paths (netivot olam), where the good way is, and walk in it.' The everlasting way is not a new discovery but a return to what has always been true.

Summary: A psalm of David. A prayer for deliverance from violent and scheming enemies whose tongues are sharp as serpents and whose lips conceal venom. The psalmist calls on the LORD as his stronghold, asks God to frustrate the plans of the wicked, and invokes judgment upon them — fire, flooding pits, and the collapse of their own violence back upon their heads. The psalm closes with a confession of faith: the LORD defends the cause of the afflicted and the poor, and the upright will dwell in His presence.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 140 is dense with body imagery — tongues sharpened like serpents, venom under lips, hands that plan violence, feet that set traps, heads surrounded by their own mischief. The enemies are described almost entirely through their body parts, each one weaponized: the tongue attacks, the lips poison, the hands scheme, the feet trap. Against this anatomy of evil, the psalmist has only one defense: the LORD as his shield and stronghold. The psalm is also notable for its serpent imagery — the tongue sharpened like a snake (shananu leshonam kemo nachash) and the venom of asps (chamat akhshuv) under the lips. The connection to Genesis 3 is implicit: the enemies are serpent-like, their weapon is speech, and their venom is concealed.

Translation Friction: The imprecations in verses 9-11 are harsh: burning coals falling on enemies, being thrown into fire, cast into floods, and hunted by violence. These are not metaphorical wishes but liturgical curses — the psalmist formally invokes divine violence against human enemies. As with Psalm 137:9, the inclusion of such language in scripture raises questions about whether these prayers are models to imitate or voices to hear. The psalm itself offers a framework: the violence of the imprecation matches the violence of the enemies' schemes. The psalmist prays that what the wicked planned for others would happen to the wicked themselves — the lex talionis applied to divine judgment.

Connections: The serpent imagery connects to Genesis 3:1-5 (the serpent's deceptive speech) and Romans 3:13 (Paul quotes Psalm 140:3 as evidence of universal human corruption: 'the venom of asps is under their lips'). The 'snare' and 'net' imagery appears frequently in the Psalms (Psalm 141:9-10, 142:3). The closing affirmation that the LORD secures justice for the poor echoes Psalm 9:18, 12:5, and 72:4. The transition from Psalm 139 (God's total knowledge) to Psalm 140 (a cry against enemies) creates a logical sequence: the psalmist who invited God's searching now presents the wicked for God's scrutiny.

¹For the music director. A psalm of David.

²Rescue me, LORD, from the evil person;
protect me from the violent one.

³They scheme evil in their hearts;
all day long they stir up conflict.

⁴They sharpen their tongues like a serpent;
the venom of a viper is under their lips.
Selah.

⁵Guard me, LORD, from the hands of the wicked;
protect me from the violent one who plans to trip my steps.

⁶The arrogant have hidden a trap for me and ropes;
they have spread a net beside the path;
they have set snares for me.
Selah.

⁷I say to the LORD, "You are my God."

Hear, LORD, the voice of my pleas for mercy.

⁸LORD God, the strength of my salvation,

You have shielded my head on the day of battle.

⁹Do not grant the desires of the wicked, LORD.

Do not let their schemes succeed — they would rise in triumph.

Selah.

¹⁰As for the heads of those who surround me —

let the trouble their own lips cause cover them.

¹¹Let burning coals rain down on them;

let them be thrown into fire, into flooding pits from which they cannot rise.

¹²Let the slanderer find no footing in the land.

Let evil hunt the violent one, blow after blow.

¹³I know that the LORD will take up the cause of the afflicted and the justice of the poor.

¹⁴Surely the righteous will give thanks to Your name;

the upright will dwell in Your presence.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription assigns the psalm to David and directs it to the lamnatseach ('music director, choirmaster'), indicating liturgical performance. The Davidic attribution places the psalm in the tradition of David's many experiences of being hunted by enemies — whether Saul, Absalom, or unnamed adversaries.
2. The verb chalats ('to rescue, to strip off, to pull out') carries the image of extracting someone from a tight place — like pulling a foot from a trap or a person from a pit. The psalmist feels caught and needs to be physically removed from danger. The plural chamasim ('violences') is an intensifying plural — not one act of violence but a pattern, a character defined by violence.
3. The verb chashvu ('they scheme, they devise, they calculate') describes deliberate planning — these are not impulsive enemies but strategic ones. The phrase kol yom ('all day, every day') emphasizes the relentless, sustained nature of their hostility. The verb yaguru ('they stir up, they gather, they muster') with milchamot ('wars, conflicts') presents the enemies as perpetual instigators of strife.
4. The word akhshuv is a type of venomous snake — possibly the horned viper or the cobra. The exact species is uncertain, but the point is clear: a deadly snake whose venom is concealed and delivered through a bite. The analogy is perfect for slanderous speech: the poison is hidden until the lips open.
4. The word selah appears here, a liturgical marker of uncertain meaning — possibly a musical interlude, a signal to pause, or an instruction to the musicians. It provides a breathing space after the intense serpent imagery.
5. The verb lidhot ('to push, to overthrow, to trip') describes the enemy's goal: to knock the psalmist off his feet, to destabilize his path. The word pe'amai ('my steps, my footfalls') represents the psalmist's life-course. The violent person schemes not merely to harm but to derail — to knock the psalmist from the path God has set.
6. The four trap-words (pach, chavalim, reshet, moqshim) create an image of a path surrounded by hidden dangers. The psalmist cannot see them; only God can. This is why the prayer is necessary — the traps are hidden from human perception but visible to the all-seeing God of Psalm 139.
7. The confession Eli attah ('You are my God') is personal and possessive — not 'a God' but 'my God.' The word tachanunai ('my pleas for mercy, my supplications') from the root chanan ('to be gracious, to show mercy') acknowledges that the psalmist has no leverage; he can only appeal to God's grace.
8. The connection between sakakh here (shielding the head in battle) and sakakh in Psalm 139:13 (weaving in the womb) creates a thematic link: the God who wove the psalmist's body also shields it in combat. The one who made the head protects it.

9. The verb tafeq ('to bring forth, to promote, to advance') is rare. The psalmist asks God to block the execution of the wicked's plans. The phrase yarumu ('they would rise, they would be exalted') warns of the consequence: if God does not intervene, the wicked will be elevated — the moral order will be inverted.
10. The word amal ('trouble, toil, mischief') describes the harmful effect of the enemies' speech. The prayer that it 'cover them' reverses the direction of harm — what was aimed outward falls back on the speaker. This is a standard pattern in imprecatory psalms: the psalmist prays not for arbitrary punishment but for the reversal of the enemy's own schemes.
11. The images escalate: gechalim ('burning coals') falling from above, esh ('fire') consuming, and mahamorot ('deep pits, flooded trenches') trapping below. The three-fold judgment attacks from every direction — above, around, and below. The phrase bal yaqumu ('let them not rise') seals the judgment as final. The burning coals echo the judgment of Sodom (Genesis 19:24) and the theophany language of Psalm 18:12-13.
12. The image of evil itself hunting the violent person is one of the most striking in the Psalms. Evil is personified as a predator that turns on its master. The violent person who hunted others with traps (v. 6) is now the prey. The lex talionis is cosmic: the universe itself enforces the return of violence to its source.
13. The pairing of ani ('afflicted, humble, poor') and evyon ('destitute, needy') represents the most vulnerable members of society — those with no advocate, no power, no legal standing. The LORD serves as their advocate, their judge, and their defender. This is the consistent claim of the Psalms: God's court favors those whom human courts ignore.
14. The movement from the psalm's opening cry ('Rescue me!') to its closing vision ('the upright will dwell in Your presence') maps the arc of the entire psalm: from danger to safety, from enemies to God, from the trap-lined path to the divine dwelling place. The verb yeshvu ('will dwell') is the same root as the 'sitting' of Psalm 137:1 ('there we sat') — but now the sitting is in God's presence, not by Babylon's rivers.

Summary: A psalm of David. An evening prayer in which the psalmist asks the LORD to accept his prayer like incense and his lifted hands like the evening grain offering. He pleads for God to guard his mouth, keep his heart from evil, and prevent him from sharing in the feasts of the wicked. He welcomes correction from the righteous as an act of faithful love. The psalm concludes with a declaration of trust in the LORD even as the psalmist faces danger — his eyes are fixed on God, and he asks not to be left defenseless while the wicked fall into their own traps.

What Makes This Remarkable: The identification of prayer with incense and lifted hands with the evening offering (minchah) is one of the most theologically significant equations in the Psalter. It suggests that personal prayer can function as a substitute for temple sacrifice — an idea that became foundational for Jewish worship after the destruction of the Second Temple. The psalm moves from the mouth (v. 3) to the heart (v. 4) to the head (v. 5), tracing the anatomy of temptation from speech to desire to action. The request for the righteous to strike and correct him (v. 5) is remarkable for its willingness to receive painful truth from allies rather than pleasant company from the wicked.

Translation Friction: Verses 5-7 are among the most textually difficult in the Psalter. The Hebrew is compressed, allusive, and in several places the Masoretic Text appears corrupt or at least highly obscure. Verse 6 — about judges being thrown down by the sides of a rock — has generated widely divergent translations. The metaphor in verse 7 about bones scattered at the mouth of Sheol is violent and abrupt. Whether the psalmist is describing his own condition or the fate of the wicked is debated. The traditional ascription to David fits the tone of personal danger and the pattern of asking for protection against enemies who set traps.

Connections: The incense imagery connects to Exodus 30:7-8, where Aaron burns incense on the golden altar every morning and evening — a perpetual fragrance before the LORD. Revelation 5:8 and 8:3-4 pick up this image, identifying the prayers of the saints with golden bowls of incense. The request to guard the mouth echoes Psalm 39:1, where David resolves to muzzle his mouth in the presence of the wicked. The trap imagery in verse 9 is a standard wisdom motif: the wicked fall into the pit they dug (Psalm 7:15, Proverbs 26:27).

¹A psalm of David.

LORD, I call to you — come quickly to me.

Listen to my voice when I call to you.

²Let my prayer stand as incense before you, my lifted hands as the evening offering.

³Set a guard over my mouth, LORD.
Keep watch over the door of my lips.

⁴Do not let my heart turn toward anything evil, to engage in wicked deeds with those who practice wrongdoing.
Let me not feast on their delicacies.

⁵Let the righteous strike me — it is faithful love.
Let him correct me — it is oil for the head.
Let my head not refuse it,
for my prayer continues even against their evils.

⁶Their rulers will be thrown down along the rocky cliffs, and they will hear my words, for they are pleasant.

⁷Like one who plows and splits open the earth,
our bones lie scattered at the mouth of Sheol.

⁸But my eyes are on you, LORD, my Lord.
In you I take refuge.
Do not pour out my life.

⁹Guard me from the jaws of the trap they have set for me,
and from the snares of those who do evil.

¹⁰Let the wicked fall into their own nets, while I pass by safely.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb chushah ('hurry, make haste') conveys urgency — this is not a contemplative meditation but a cry for immediate help. The doubled reference to calling (qeratikha... be-qori lakh) frames the verse as an insistent summons.
2. The minchah ('grain offering, tribute, present') is the evening sacrifice offered in the temple each day at twilight. The word can also mean 'gift' or 'tribute' in non-cultic contexts. By pairing incense with the evening offering, the psalmist places his prayer within the temple's daily rhythm — this is an evening psalm.
3. The word shomrah ('guard, watch') pictures a sentry stationed at the mouth. The dal ('door') of the lips extends the architectural metaphor — the mouth is a gate that needs guarding. The psalmist recognizes that his tongue is a point of vulnerability, especially in the company of the wicked (v. 4). This request moves from external danger to internal discipline.
4. The verb al tat ('do not incline, do not turn') asks God to prevent the heart's drift — the psalmist knows the pull of evil is subtle. The phrase lehitolel alilot be-resha ('to busy oneself with deeds in wickedness') uses a reflexive verb suggesting complicity: getting involved, entangling oneself. The man'ammim ('delicacies, pleasant foods') of the wicked represent the seductive rewards of joining their company. The movement from mouth (v. 3) to heart (v. 4) traces temptation to its source.
5. This verse is notoriously difficult in Hebrew. The verb yehalemeni ('let him strike me') is from halam ('to strike, to hammer'). Reading the righteous person's correction as chesed rather than cruelty is a hallmark of wisdom thinking (Proverbs 27:6: 'Faithful are the wounds of a friend'). The second half of the verse is textually uncertain; our rendering follows the Masoretic accentuation while acknowledging that the Hebrew is compressed to the point of ambiguity.
6. The verb nishmetu ('they will be dropped, thrown down') is from shamat ('to release, to let fall'). The phrase bi-yede sela ('by the hands/sides of the rock/cliff') is obscure — it may refer to execution by being thrown from a cliff or to the collapse of authority. The second line shifts abruptly: when the wicked's leaders fall, the survivors will finally listen to the psalmist's words and find them pleasant (na'emu). The verse anticipates vindication: the psalmist's rejected counsel will eventually be recognized as true.

7. The simile compares scattered bones to clods of earth turned up by plowing — the image is of violent disruption. The phrase lefi She'ol ('at the mouth of Sheol') places the psalmist and his companions at the very edge of death. Whether 'our bones' refers to the righteous community or is a dramatic way of describing the psalmist's own peril is uncertain. The verse is one of the darkest in this psalm, picturing the faithful as broken and exposed.
8. The double address YHVH Adonai ('LORD, my Lord') intensifies the appeal. The verb chasiti ('I have taken refuge') is from chasah, a key Psalms verb for sheltering under God's protection. The phrase al te'ar nafshi ('do not empty/pour out my soul') uses a verb meaning to strip bare or make naked — do not leave me exposed, defenseless, emptied of life.
9. The pach ('trap, snare') and moqeshot ('snares, lures') are hunting terms applied to human enemies — the psalmist is the prey, and the wicked are hunters. The verb yaqeshu ('they have laid') is from yaqosh ('to set a snare'). The psalm consistently pictures the wicked as those who trap rather than confront directly.
10. The makmorav ('his nets') uses the singular suffix — possibly referring to each wicked person's own trap, or to the collective trap that rebounds on its makers. The reversal of the trap is a recurring motif in the Psalter (Psalm 35:8, 57:6). The final word e'evor ('I pass by, I cross over') pictures the psalmist walking past the danger unharmed, a quiet image of deliverance.

Summary: A maskil of David, when he was in the cave. A prayer of desperate isolation. David cries out to the LORD, pouring out his complaint and declaring that God alone knows his path. He looks to his right and finds no one — no one cares for his life. He declares the LORD to be his refuge and his portion in the land of the living. He asks for rescue from his pursuers, who are stronger than he is. The psalm ends with a plea to be brought out of prison so that the righteous may gather around him in celebration of God's generosity.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of two psalms with a cave superscription (the other is Psalm 57). The cave setting — whether Adullam (1 Samuel 22) or En-gedi (1 Samuel 24) — transforms the psalm from abstract lament into concrete geography. A cave is both refuge and prison: it hides David from Saul but also confines him in darkness. The psalmist's statement 'You are my refuge, my portion in the land of the living' (v. 5) uses language normally reserved for the Levitical inheritance — the LORD is David's allotted share, his territory, when he has no territory of his own. The final verse pictures a crown (yachtiru) of righteous people surrounding the delivered psalmist, turning rescue into communal worship.

Translation Friction: The superscription 'when he was in the cave' places this psalm in David's fugitive period, but the specific cave is not identified. The word maskil in the heading is debated — it may mean 'contemplative poem,' 'skillful song,' or 'instructive psalm.' Verse 7 uses the word masger ('prison, enclosure'), which some read literally and others as a metaphor for the cave or for the psalmist's overall trapped condition. The statement 'no one cares for my life' (ein doresh le-nafshi, v. 4) is striking given that David had loyal followers even in the cave — the psalm may capture a moment of subjective despair rather than objective abandonment.

Connections: The cave narratives appear in 1 Samuel 22:1 (cave of Adullam) and 1 Samuel 24:3 (cave at En-gedi). Psalm 57 shares the cave setting and similar themes of refuge amid danger. The language of 'portion' (cheleg) in verse 5 connects to the Levitical theology of Numbers 18:20, where the LORD tells Aaron, 'I am your portion.' The gathering of the righteous in verse 7 anticipates the communal thanksgiving psalms where rescue is reported to the assembly (Psalm 22:22, 40:9-10).

¹A maskil of David, when he was in the cave. A prayer.
With my voice I cry out to the LORD.
With my voice I plead with the LORD for mercy.

²I pour out my complaint before him.
I declare my distress before him.

³When my spirit grows faint within me,
 you know my path.
 Along the road where I walk they have hidden a trap for me.

⁴Look to my right and see —
 there is no one who recognizes me.
 Every escape route is gone from me.
 No one cares about my life.

⁵I cry out to you, LORD.
 I say, "You are my refuge,
 my portion in the land of the living."

⁶Pay attention to my cry,
 for I have been brought very low.
 Rescue me from those who pursue me,
 for they are stronger than I am.

⁷Bring me out of this prison
 so that I may give thanks to your name.
 The righteous will gather around me,
 for you will deal generously with me.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The WLC includes the superscription as verse 1. The word maskil likely derives from sakal ('to be prudent, to give insight') and may indicate a psalm intended for instruction or contemplation. The doubled phrase be-qoli ('with my voice') emphasizes vocal, audible prayer — this is not silent meditation but a cry that echoes off cave walls. The verb etchannan ('I plead for grace') is from chanan, the root of 'grace' and 'mercy.'
2. The verb eshpokh ('I pour out') pictures prayer as liquid — the psalmist empties himself of grief before God. The word sichi ('my complaint, my meditation, my concern') can mean inner musing or outward complaint; here the parallel with tsarati ('my distress') favors the sense of pouring out trouble. The repetition of lefanav ('before him') insists that this outpouring is directed — it has an audience.
3. The verb hit'atef ('to be wrapped, to be faint, to be overwhelmed') pictures the spirit as wrapped in a shroud of exhaustion — unable to see, unable to breathe. The contrast is stark: when the psalmist cannot see his own way, God knows his path (netivati). The trap (pach) hidden along the road echoes Psalm 141:9 and the broader pattern of enemies as hunters.
4. The right side (yamin) is the place of honor and protection. Looking to the right and finding no one is an image of judicial and military abandonment — no advocate and no guard. The threefold absence (no one who recognizes, no escape, no one who cares) builds to a climax of isolation that makes the turn to God in verse 5 all the more dramatic.
5. The term cheleq ('portion') carries Levitical overtones — the Levites received no territorial inheritance because the LORD was their portion (Numbers 18:20, Deuteronomy 10:9). David, stripped of everything, adopts the Levitical posture: God alone is enough.
6. The verb dalloti ('I am brought low, I am impoverished') is from dalal ('to be low, weak, thin, poor'). It is the language of depletion — David is not merely threatened but diminished. The admission that his pursuers are stronger (amtsu, from amats, 'to be strong, to overpower') is a statement of military reality that drives the need for divine intervention.
7. The masger ('prison') may be literal (a dungeon) or metaphorical (the cave, the life of a fugitive). In this context the cave functions as both shelter and prison. The verb yaktiru is from katar (Hiphil), meaning 'to surround' or possibly 'to crown' — the righteous community will encircle the freed psalmist in a wreath of fellowship.

Summary: A psalm of David. The last of the seven traditional penitential psalms (6, 32, 38, 51, 102, 130, 143). David pleads for the LORD to hear his prayer and not enter into judgment with him, because no living person is righteous before God. An enemy has crushed him into darkness. His spirit is faint, his heart stunned. He remembers the LORD's past deeds, stretches out his hands like dry ground thirsting for rain, and begs for a swift answer. He asks God to teach him the right path, to rescue him from enemies, and to lead him by the good Spirit on level ground.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 2 contains one of the Hebrew Bible's most sweeping theological statements: 'Do not enter into judgment with your servant, for no one living is righteous before you.' This is not a confession of specific sin but a declaration about the human condition itself — even a servant of God cannot survive the scrutiny of divine justice. The psalm builds on this foundation: if no one is righteous, then rescue must come from God's faithful love and righteousness, not from the psalmist's merit. The image in verse 6 of hands stretched out toward God like parched land toward rain is one of the Psalter's most vivid pictures of spiritual thirst. The request for God's 'good Spirit' to lead on level ground (v. 10) is one of the rare explicit mentions of the Spirit as a guiding, moral presence.

Translation Friction: The superscription ascribes this to David, and the language of being pursued by an enemy (v. 3) fits several periods of David's life. The psalm's classification as penitential is somewhat loose — it does not contain explicit confession of sin but rather a general acknowledgment that no human can stand before God's judgment. Verse 12 asks God to destroy the psalmist's enemies 'in your faithful love' (be-chasdekha) — the juxtaposition of chesed with the destruction of enemies challenges modern assumptions about love and justice being opposites.

Connections: Verse 2 anticipates Paul's argument in Romans 3:20 that 'by works of the law no flesh will be justified before him.' The thirst imagery of verse 6 connects to Psalm 63:1 ('my soul thirsts for you in a dry and weary land') and to Jesus's invitation in John 7:37 ('if anyone thirsts, let him come to me'). The 'good Spirit' of verse 10 echoes Nehemiah 9:20 ('you gave your good Spirit to instruct them') and anticipates the Spirit as guide in the New Testament (Romans 8:14, Galatians 5:18).

¹A psalm of David.

LORD, hear my prayer.

Listen to my pleas for mercy.

In your faithfulness, answer me — in your righteousness.

²Do not bring your servant into judgment, for no one alive is righteous before you.

³For the enemy has pursued my life.
He has crushed my existence to the ground.
He has made me sit in darkness like those long dead.

⁴My spirit grows faint within me.
My heart inside me is stunned.

⁵I remember the days of old.
I meditate on all your works.
I reflect on what your hands have done.

⁶I stretch out my hands to you.
My soul is like parched ground thirsting for you.
Selah.

⁷Answer me quickly, LORD — my spirit is failing.
Do not hide your face from me,
or I will become like those who go down to the pit.

⁸Let me hear your faithful love in the morning,
for I trust in you.
Show me the path I should walk,
for I lift up my soul to you.

⁹Rescue me from my enemies, LORD.
I have hidden myself in you.

¹⁰Teach me to do your will,
for you are my God.
Let your good Spirit lead me
on level ground.

¹¹For the sake of your name, LORD, give me life.
In your righteousness, bring my soul out of distress.

¹²In your faithful love, silence my enemies.
Destroy all who oppress my life,
for I am your servant.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The psalm opens with two appeals to two divine attributes: emunah ('faithfulness, reliability, firmness') and tsedaqah ('righteousness'). The psalmist does not ground his appeal in his own worthiness but in God's character. The word tachanunai ('my pleas for mercy') is from chanan ('to be gracious') — these are not demands but supplications thrown on the mercy of a faithful God.
2. The phrase kol chai ('all living, every living one') is absolute — no exceptions. This verse will be echoed in the apostle Paul's argument in Romans 3:20 and Galatians 2:16, where justification by works of the law is declared impossible. The psalmist has preemptively dismantled any claim to self-righteousness before the psalm even unfolds its petitions.
3. The verb dikka ('he has crushed') is from daka, a strong verb implying pulverization — not merely defeat but destruction. The phrase be-machashakkim ('in dark places') echoes Lamentations 3:6 ('He has made me dwell in darkness like the dead of long ago'). The comparison ke-metei olam ('like the dead of eternity/antiquity') places the psalmist among those who have been in Sheol so long they are forgotten. He is alive but living the experience of the dead.
4. The verb tit'atfe ('it grows faint, it is wrapped') describes the spirit as enshrouded — wrapped in weakness as in a garment. The verb yishtomem ('is stunned, is desolate, is appalled') is from shamem, the root behind 'desolation.' The heart is not merely sad but paralyzed with shock. Together the two verbs describe a complete internal collapse: the spirit cannot breathe, and the heart cannot think.
5. The three verbs — zakharti ('I remember'), hagiti ('I meditate'), asacheach ('I reflect, I muse') — describe a deliberate exercise of memory against despair. The psalmist counters the darkness of verse 3 by turning his mind to God's past actions. The yamim mi-qedem ('days from of old') may refer to personal experience of God's help or to the great acts of Israel's history — Exodus, wilderness provision, conquest.
6. The comparison of the soul to parched land is one of the Psalter's most powerful metaphors for spiritual thirst. The word ayefah ('weary, faint') describes exhaustion beyond mere tiredness — the land has nothing left to give. The hands stretched out mirror the cracked ground open to the sky. The selah likely indicates a musical interlude or liturgical pause.
7. The verb kaltah ('it is consumed, it is finished') from kalah describes the spirit reaching its end — total depletion. The hidden face of God (hester panim) is one of the Hebrew Bible's most terrifying images: when God turns away, life drains out. The bor ('pit, cistern') is a synonym for Sheol, the realm of the dead. The psalmist is saying: your silence is killing me. Speed is existential — delay means death.

8. The morning (boqer) is when the darkness breaks — the psalmist who sits in darkness like the long-dead (v. 3) asks for faithful love to arrive with the dawn. The verb hashmi'eni ('cause me to hear') asks for an audible, perceivable experience of chesed — not abstract knowledge but morning-breaking awareness. The phrase nasati nafshi ('I lift up my soul') pictures the soul held up to God like an offering or like a child reaching upward.
9. The verb kissiti ('I have covered myself, I have hidden') is from kasah ('to cover'). The psalmist has taken cover in God — not in a cave, not in a fortress, but in God himself. This is the practical application of verse 8's trust: the psalmist has already committed to God as his hiding place and now asks God to act on that commitment.
10. The phrase ruchakha tovah ('your good Spirit') is one of the Hebrew Bible's clearest references to the Spirit of God as a moral and directional guide. The same phrase appears in Nehemiah 9:20. The word mishor ('level ground, plain, equity') combines geography and ethics — level ground is both a safe landscape and a metaphor for just, straightforward living.
11. The appeal lema'an shimkha ('for the sake of your name') shifts the ground from the psalmist's need to God's reputation — God's name is at stake in the fate of his servant. The verb techayeni ('give me life, revive me') is from chayah ('to live') and asks for more than survival; it asks for restoration to full, vigorous life. The tsedaqah of verse 1 returns here as the means of deliverance.
12. The juxtaposition of chesed ('faithful love') with tatsmit ('you will cut off, silence, destroy') is jarring to modern ears but coherent within the psalm's logic: faithful love toward the servant requires the removal of those who seek to destroy him. The verb tatsmit (Hiphil of tsamat) means 'to put to silence, to annihilate.' The psalm ends where it began — with the word avdekha ('your servant'), framing the entire prayer as a servant's appeal to his master.

Summary: A psalm of David. A royal warrior's hymn that blesses the LORD as the one who trains David's hands for battle. The psalm moves from military thanksgiving to a meditation on human smallness before God, then to a dramatic plea for divine intervention — the heavens torn open, mountains smoking, lightning scattering the enemies. David asks to be rescued from foreign adversaries whose mouths speak lies and whose right hands swear false oaths. The psalm concludes with a vision of national blessing: strong sons, beautiful daughters, full storehouses, abundant flocks, no breach in the walls, no cry of alarm in the streets. 'Happy is the people whose God is the LORD.'

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm draws heavily from earlier psalms — particularly Psalm 18 (= 2 Samuel 22) and Psalm 8 — weaving their language into a new composition. The question 'What is a human being that you take notice of him?' (v. 3) echoes Psalm 8:4, but where Psalm 8 marvels at human dignity, Psalm 144 emphasizes human frailty: a person is like a breath (hevel), like a passing shadow. The theophany in verses 5-8 compresses Psalm 18's storm-god imagery into a concentrated plea. The prosperity vision in verses 12-15 is unique in the Psalter — nowhere else does a psalm paint so detailed a picture of agricultural, domestic, and civic flourishing. The final beatitude ties all this abundance to one cause: the people's God is the LORD.

Translation Friction: The relationship between this psalm and its source texts (Psalms 18 and 8) has led some scholars to view it as a late anthology piece rather than an original Davidic composition. The shift from military language (vv. 1-8) to domestic prosperity (vv. 12-15) is abrupt, and some argue that verses 12-15 were originally a separate poem. The phrase bene nekhar ('sons of foreigners/strangers') in verses 7 and 11 may refer to foreign enemies or to treacherous people within Israel who act like foreigners — their false speech and lying oaths suggest covenant disloyalty.

Connections: Verse 1 echoes Psalm 18:34 (training hands for war). Verse 3 echoes Psalm 8:4 (what is a human being?). The theophany imagery in verses 5-7 draws from Psalm 18:9-16 and from the Sinai tradition (Exodus 19:18). The prosperity blessings of verses 12-15 connect to the covenant blessings of Deuteronomy 28:1-14. The final declaration — 'Happy is the people whose God is the LORD' — echoes Psalm 33:12 and anticipates the beatitude theology of the Psalter's final section.

Of David.

Blessed be the LORD, my rock, who trains my hands for battle,
my fingers for war.

²My faithful love and my fortress,
my stronghold and my rescuer,
my shield — the one in whom I take refuge, who subdues peoples under me.

³LORD, what is a human being that you notice him,
a mortal's child that you consider him?

⁴A human being is like a breath.
His days are like a passing shadow.

⁵LORD, bend your heavens and come down.
Touch the mountains and they will smoke.

⁶Flash your lightning and scatter them.
Send out your arrows and throw them into confusion.

⁷Reach down your hands from on high.
Snatch me up and rescue me from the great waters,
from the hand of foreigners,

⁸whose mouths speak lies and whose right hand is a right hand of deception.

⁹God, I will sing a new song to you.
On the ten-stringed harp I will make music to you.

¹⁰The one who gives victory to kings, who rescues David his servant from the deadly sword —

¹¹Snatch me up and rescue me
from the hand of foreigners, whose mouths speak lies
and whose right hand is a right hand of deception.

¹²Then our sons will be like young plants, fully grown in their youth.
Our daughters will be like carved pillars, shaped for the design of a palace.

¹³Our storehouses will be full,
overflowing with every kind of produce.
Our flocks will multiply by thousands,
by tens of thousands in our open fields.

¹⁴Our cattle will be heavy with young.
There will be no breach in the wall,
no going out to exile, no cry of alarm in our public squares.

15 Happy is the people who have it so.
Happy is the people whose God is the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word tsuri ('my rock') establishes the LORD as the immovable foundation for military action. The parallel between 'hands for battle' and 'fingers for war' moves from the broad (hands grasping weapons) to the precise (fingers drawing bowstrings, fitting arrows). The psalm opens with the recognition that military skill is not self-generated but God-given.
2. The cascade of military metaphors — chesed, metsudah, misgav, mefalti, magen — piles up titles for God as warrior-protector. The opening word chasdi ('my faithful love') is unusual: God is addressed not merely as the source of chesed but as chesed itself — 'my faithful love personified.' The verb ha-roded ('who subdues, who tramples down') pictures military subjugation. Some manuscripts read ammi ('my people') while others read ammim ('peoples/nations').
3. The parallelism adam / ben enosh ('human being / son of mortal') uses two words for humanity that emphasize creatureliness. Adam is from adamah ('ground'); enosh is from a root suggesting weakness or mortality. The verbs teda'ehu ('you know him') and techashvehu ('you consider him, you reckon him') suggest that God actively turns attention toward humans — it is not automatic but chosen.
4. The word hevel ('breath, vapor, futility') is the signature word of Ecclesiastes. Here it describes the sheer insubstantiality of human life — not its meaninglessness but its brevity. The tsel over ('passing shadow') intensifies the point: not even a stationary shadow but one that moves and disappears as the sun shifts. The two images work together: breath dissipates, shadow passes. Human life has the permanence of neither.
5. The verb hat ('bend, stretch, incline') pictures God physically bending the sky downward to descend — the heavens are a canopy that God pushes aside to enter the world. The smoking mountains echo Sinai (Exodus 19:18), where the LORD's presence made the mountain burn. The psalm shifts from reflection on human frailty to a demand for theophany: come down and act.
6. Lightning (baraq) and arrows (chitsim) are God's weapons — the storm is a divine armory. The verb tetifsem ('scatter them') and tehumem ('confuse them, throw them into panic') describe the disintegration of enemy forces under divine assault. The imagery draws directly from Psalm 18:14.
7. The mayim rabbim ('great waters, many waters') are chaos waters — the primordial flood that threatens to overwhelm. The bene nekhar ('sons of foreignness, foreigners') are enemies defined by their outsider status. The plea combines cosmic imagery (floodwaters) with political reality (foreign enemies), asking God to intervene at both levels.
8. The shav ('emptiness, falsehood, deception') and sheqer ('falsehood, lie') describe enemies whose speech and oaths are unreliable. The right hand (yamin) raised in oath-taking or treaty-making is a 'right hand of falsehood' — they swear and break, they promise and betray. The verse defines the enemy not by military power but by dishonesty.
9. The shir chadash ('new song') is prompted by new deliverance — the song matches the freshness of the rescue. The nevel asor ('ten-stringed harp') is a specific instrument of praise. The vow to sing is anticipatory — the psalmist commits to future praise before the rescue is complete, an act of faith that treats God's answer as already given.
10. The word teshu'ah ('salvation, victory, deliverance') here means military victory — God is the one who decides the outcome of battle for kings. David names himself in the third person as God's servant (avdo), a title of honor in royal theology. The cherev ra'ah ('evil sword, deadly sword') is the weapon of the enemy from which God extracts his servant.
11. This verse repeats verses 7b-8 almost verbatim, forming a refrain. The repetition brackets the vow of praise (vv. 9-10) and transitions into the prosperity vision of verses 12-15. The effect is structural: the plea for rescue frames the promise of worship and leads into the picture of blessing that rescue will make possible.
12. The zaviyyot ('corner-pillars') have been translated variously as 'corner stones,' 'carved figures,' or 'caryatids' (sculpted female columns supporting a building). The image is of both beauty and structural importance — these daughters are load-bearing, not ornamental. The word hekhal can mean 'palace' or 'temple,' suggesting that the blessed household reflects divine architecture.
13. The mezavenu ('our storehouses, our granaries') are full and mefiqim ('producing, yielding, overflowing') from one kind (zan) to another — the abundance is diverse, not monocultural. The flocks are ma'alifot ('producing thousands') and merubbavot ('producing ten thousands') — exponential multiplication. The word chutsotenu ('our streets, our open places') likely refers to open pastureland rather than city streets.
14. The allufenu mesubbalim ('our cattle loaded/burdened') likely means heavy with calf — the animals are productive and healthy. The three negations paint peace by what is absent: ein perets ('no breach' — no enemy breaking through the wall), ein yotse't ('no going out' — no forced march into exile or sortie from a besieged city), ein tsevahah ('no screaming, no cry of distress') in the open squares. Peace is defined as the absence of catastrophe.
15. The word ashre ('happy, blessed, fortunate') is the same word that opens the Psalter in Psalm 1:1. Its appearance here near the end of the Psalter creates an inclusion: the happiness of the righteous individual in Psalm 1 is now extended to the entire nation. The double use of ashre creates emphasis — happiness is declared twice, each time with a different (and deepening) ground.

Summary: A tehillah (praise-song) of David — the only psalm in the Psalter given this title, from which the entire Hebrew collection gets its name (Tehillim, 'Praises'). This is an acrostic psalm: each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from aleph to tav. David extols the LORD's greatness, mighty deeds, splendor, and faithfulness across generations. The psalm declares that the LORD is gracious and compassionate, slow to anger and great in faithful love. God sustains all who fall, opens his hand to satisfy every living thing, is near to all who call on him in truth, and guards all who love him. The psalm closes with a vow of perpetual praise and a call for all flesh to bless God's holy name forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 145 is the last psalm ascribed to David and the only one given the heading tehillah ('praise') — a singular form of the word that names the entire book. This is David's final word in the Psalter, and it is pure, unqualified praise. The acrostic structure (aleph through tav) is a literary statement: praise covers the entire alphabet, from first letter to last, leaving nothing out. The Masoretic Text is missing the nun line (which would fall between verses 13 and 14), but the Dead Sea Scrolls (11QPsa) preserve it: 'The LORD is faithful in all his words and gracious in all his deeds.' Jewish liturgical tradition has made this psalm central to daily worship — it is recited three times daily in traditional services, and the Talmud (Berakhot 4b) states that anyone who recites Psalm 145 three times a day is assured a place in the world to come.

Translation Friction: The missing nun verse in the Masoretic Text is the psalm's most discussed textual issue. The Dead Sea Scroll 11QPsa supplies: ne'eman YHVH be-kol devarav ve-chasid be-kol ma'asav ('the LORD is faithful in all his words and gracious in all his deeds'). Whether this line was accidentally dropped by a scribe or deliberately omitted is debated. The acrostic structure makes the omission conspicuous. Our rendering includes the nun line following the Dead Sea Scrolls evidence, marked with a note. The psalm's theology is relentlessly positive — there is no lament, no enemy, no suffering. Some scholars see this as the psalm's weakness; others see it as its purpose: after 144 psalms of mixed experience, David's final word is undiluted praise.

Connections: The declaration in verse 8 — 'The LORD is gracious and compassionate, slow to anger and great in faithful love' — is a direct quotation of the LORD's self-revelation at Sinai (Exodus 34:6-7), the most quoted verse within the Hebrew Bible itself. The feeding imagery in verse 15-16 ('the eyes of all look to you, and you give them their food at the proper time') is echoed by Jesus in the Sermon on the Mount (Matthew 6:26). The promise that God is near to all who call on him (v. 18) is cited by Paul in Romans 10:12-13. As the last Davidic psalm, it serves as a bridge to the five Halleluyah psalms (146-150) that close the Psalter.

¹A praise of David.

I will exalt you, my God, the King, and I will bless your name forever and always.

²Every day I will bless you, and I will praise your name forever and always.

³Great is the LORD and greatly to be praised.
His greatness is beyond searching out.

⁴One generation will commend your works to the next,
and they will declare your mighty acts.

⁵The splendor of your glorious majesty and the accounts of your wonders — I will meditate on them.

⁶They will speak of the power of your awe-inspiring deeds, and I will recount your greatness.

⁷They will pour out the memory of your abundant goodness and will sing aloud of your righteousness.

⁸The LORD is gracious and compassionate, slow to anger and great in faithful love.

⁹The LORD is good to all,
and his compassion extends over everything he has made.

¹⁰All your works will give thanks to you, LORD, and your faithful ones will bless you.

¹¹They will speak of the glory of your kingdom and tell of your power,

¹²making known to all people his mighty acts and the glorious splendor of his kingdom.

¹³Your kingdom is a kingdom of all ages, and your dominion endures through every generation.

¹⁴The LORD upholds all who fall and lifts up all who are bowed down.

¹⁵The eyes of all look to you with hope,
and you give them their food at the right time.

¹⁶You open your hand and satisfy the desire of every living thing.

¹⁷The LORD is righteous in all his ways and faithful in all his works.

¹⁸The LORD is near to all who call on him,
to all who call on him in truth.

¹⁹He fulfills the desire of those who fear him.
He hears their cry and saves them.

²⁰The LORD guards all who love him,
but all the wicked he will destroy.

²¹My mouth will speak the praise of the LORD, and let all flesh bless his holy name forever and always.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The heading tehillah ('praise') is unique in the Psalter — no other psalm carries this title, yet the entire collection is called Tehillim ('Praises') after this word. The aleph-verse begins with aromimkha ('I will exalt you, I will lift you high'), establishing the psalm's singular purpose: elevation of God. The address Elohai ha-Melekh ('my God, the King') combines personal devotion with royal theology.

2. The bet-verse. The phrase be-khol yom ('every day, in all days') commits the psalmist to daily, uninterrupted praise. The doubled temporal markers — 'every day' and 'forever and always' (le-olam va-ed) — stretch praise from the immediate present into eternity.
3. The gimel-verse. The adjective gadol ('great') and the noun gedullatah ('his greatness') create a wordplay rooted in the same consonants. The phrase ein cheqer ('there is no searching out, no investigation that can reach the end') declares that God's greatness exceeds the capacity of human comprehension. Praise is the only adequate response to what cannot be fully understood.
4. The dalet-verse. The phrase dor le-dor ('generation to generation') establishes praise as an inheritance — each generation passes on the testimony of God's deeds to the next. The verb yeshabbach ('will commend, will praise') and yaggidu ('they will declare, recount') describe an active tradition of telling.
5. The he-verse. The phrase hadar kevod hodekha ('the splendor of the glory of your majesty') piles three words for magnificence: hadar ('splendor, ornament'), kavod ('glory, weight, honor'), and hod ('majesty, splendor'). The psalmist's response is sichah ('meditation, musing, reflection') — the wonders of God are not merely recited but pondered.
6. The vav-verse. The word ezuz ('strength, fierceness, power') combined with norotekha ('your awesome/fearsome deeds') describes actions that evoke both terror and reverence. The shift from 'they will speak' to 'I will recount' moves between communal testimony and personal declaration.
7. The zayin-verse. The verb yabbi'u ('they will pour out, bubble forth, gush') pictures speech as an overflowing spring — the memory of God's goodness cannot be contained. The rav tuvkhah ('your abundant goodness, your great goodness') is paired with tsidqatkhah ('your righteousness'), connecting God's generosity with his justice.
8. This four-part formula appears in Exodus 34:6, Joel 2:13, Jonah 4:2, Nahum 1:3, Nehemiah 9:17, and several psalms. It is the most internally quoted verse in the Hebrew Bible — the theological center from which Israel's understanding of God radiates. The psalmist is not innovating but repeating the foundational creed.
9. The tet-verse. The scope is universal: la-kol ('to all') and al kol ma'asav ('over all his works'). God's goodness is not restricted to Israel but covers the entire creation. The rachamav ('his compassion, his tender mercies') — from the same womb-root as rachum in verse 8 — rests on everything God has made. This is one of the Hebrew Bible's most expansive statements of divine benevolence.
10. The yod-verse. The parallel moves from kol ma'asekha ('all your works' — the entire creation) to chasidekha ('your faithful ones, your devoted ones') — from the broadest circle of praise to the inner circle. The chasidim are those who embody chesed in their own lives, the people marked by covenant loyalty.
11. The kaf-verse. The kevod malkhutekha ('glory of your kingdom') introduces the theme of divine kingship that dominates this section. The faithful ones are not passive recipients of blessing but active heralds — they speak (yomeru) and tell (yedabberu) of God's royal power.
12. The lamed-verse. The purpose of the faithful ones' testimony is lehodia ('to make known') — the knowledge of God's kingdom is not for insiders only but is directed outward to bene ha-adam ('the children of humanity'). The kevod hadar malkhuto ('the glory of the splendor of his kingdom') again piles up magnificence — three words for the weight and beauty of God's reign.
13. The Dead Sea Scroll 11QPSa includes a nun-line after this verse that is absent from the Masoretic Text: ne'eman YHVH be-khol devarav ve-chasid be-khol ma'asav ('The LORD is faithful in all his words and gracious in all his deeds'). The acrostic pattern requires a nun-line, and its absence in MT is likely a scribal omission. We note its existence without inserting it into the verse numbering.
14. The samekh-verse. The verb somekh ('upholds, supports, sustains') pictures God as a hand under the one who is falling — not preventing the fall but catching the fallen. The parallel zoqef ('raises up, straightens') reverses the posture of the kefufim ('the bowed down, the bent over'). Together the two verbs describe God's consistent action toward the weak: he catches and he straightens.
15. The ayin-verse. The verb yesabberu ('they look with hope, they wait expectantly') pictures all creation turning its eyes upward to God as the source of provision. The phrase be-itto ('in its time, at the right time') indicates that God's provision follows a rhythm — not arbitrary but timed to need. Jesus echoes this verse in Matthew 6:26.
16. This verse is central to Jewish table liturgy — it is recited as part of the blessing after meals (Birkat Hamazon). The image of the open hand has become one of Judaism's defining metaphors for divine provision.
17. The tsade-verse. The parallel tsaddiq / chasid ('righteous / faithful, devoted') applies to God the same qualities expected of his people. The word chasid when applied to God means 'loyal, devoted, full of chesed' — everything God does is saturated with covenant faithfulness. The universality — be-khol ('in all') repeated twice — leaves no exception.
18. The qof-verse. The word qarov ('near, close') declares God's accessibility — he is not remote or indifferent. The qualifier be-emet ('in truth, genuinely, with integrity') distinguishes sincere calling from mere ritual invocation. God is near, but nearness responds to authenticity. Paul cites this theology in Romans 10:12-13.
19. The resh-verse. The retson yere'av ('the desire/will of those who fear him') echoes the ratson ('desire') of verse 16, but now applied specifically to those who stand in reverent awe of God. The three verbs — ya'aseh ('he does/fulfills'), yishma ('he hears'), yoshi'em ('he saves them') — form a rapid sequence: God acts, God listens, God delivers.

- 20. The shin-verse. The verb shomer ('guards, keeps, watches over') promises protection to all who love God — love, not merely fear, is the relationship described. The contrast is stark: the same God who guards those who love him will destroy (yashmid, Hiphil of shamad) all the wicked. The psalm does not soften this; divine love and divine justice are both absolute.
- 21. The inclusio between verse 1 ('I will bless your name forever and always') and verse 21 ('let all flesh bless his holy name forever and always') frames the psalm as a movement from personal to universal praise. David begins alone and ends with all creation. This is the last verse attributed to David in the Psalter; the five Halleluyah psalms that follow (146-150) are anonymous.

Summary: The first of the five Final Hallel psalms (146-150) that close the entire Psalter. The psalm opens and closes with 'Halleluyah.' The psalmist commits to praising the LORD for the whole of his life, then issues a warning: do not put trust in human leaders — in princes or any mortal — because when their breath leaves them, they return to the ground and their plans die with them. In contrast, the one who is truly happy has the God of Jacob as his help. The psalm then catalogs what this God does: he made heaven and earth and sea, he keeps faith forever, he secures justice for the oppressed, gives food to the hungry, sets prisoners free, opens the eyes of the blind, lifts up the bowed down, loves the righteous, watches over the stranger, sustains the fatherless and the widow, and subverts the way of the wicked. The LORD reigns forever — your God, Zion, for all generations.

What Makes This Remarkable: This psalm contains one of the Hebrew Bible's most comprehensive catalogs of divine action on behalf of the vulnerable. The list in verses 7-9 reads like a manifesto: justice for the oppressed, food for the hungry, freedom for prisoners, sight for the blind, dignity for the bent-over, love for the righteous, protection for the immigrant, support for the orphan and widow, and frustration of the wicked. When Jesus reads from Isaiah 61 in the Nazareth synagogue (Luke 4:18-19) and announces that the Scripture is fulfilled in their hearing, he is invoking precisely this tradition — the God who acts for the powerless. The psalm's warning against trusting princes (vv. 3-4) is not anti-political but theological: no human institution lasts, because every human dies. Only the God who made everything endures.

Translation Friction: The psalm is anonymous — part of the Final Hallel collection that carries no authorial attribution. The LXX (Septuagint) assigns it to Haggai and Zechariah, possibly reflecting a post-exilic liturgical setting. The sharp contrast between mortal princes and the eternal God raises the question of whether the psalm is critiquing specific political leaders or making a general theological point. The catalog of divine acts in verses 7-9 closely parallels Isaiah 61:1-3, and many scholars see literary dependence in one direction or the other.

Connections: The warning against trusting princes echoes Psalm 118:8-9 ('It is better to take refuge in the LORD than to trust in princes'). The catalog of God's actions for the vulnerable connects to the Exodus narrative (liberation of the oppressed), the wilderness provision (food for the hungry), and the prophetic tradition (Isaiah 42:7, opening blind eyes; Isaiah 61:1, setting captives free). Jesus's beatitudes in Luke 6:20-23 and his answer to John the Baptist in Matthew 11:4-5 draw on the same tradition. The final declaration 'The LORD reigns forever' connects to the enthronement psalms (93, 96-99).

¹Halleluyah!

Praise the LORD, my soul.

²I will praise the LORD as long as I live.

I will sing to my God while I still have breath.

³Do not put your trust in princes, in a human being, who cannot save.

⁴When his breath departs, he returns to his ground.
On that day his plans come to nothing.

⁵Happy is the one whose help is the God of Jacob, whose hope rests on the LORD his God —

⁶the maker of heaven and earth, the sea and everything in them —
the one who keeps faith forever,

⁷who secures justice for the oppressed, who gives food to the hungry.
The LORD sets prisoners free.

⁸The LORD opens the eyes of the blind.
The LORD lifts up those who are bowed down.
The LORD loves the righteous.

⁹The LORD watches over the stranger.
He sustains the fatherless and the widow.
But the way of the wicked he twists to ruin.

¹⁰The LORD reigns forever — your God, O Zion, for all generations.
Halleluyah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The psalm opens with halleluyah ('praise Yah') — the imperative hallelu directed to an unspecified audience, combined with Yah, the shortened form of YHVH. Then the psalmist turns inward: halleli nafshi et YHVH ('praise the LORD, my soul'). The movement from public summons to private address establishes the psalm's pattern: communal call, personal response.
2. The phrase be-chayyai ('in my life, while I live') and be-odi ('while I still exist, while I remain') commit the psalmist to lifelong praise. The two temporal markers are synonymous — the psalmist will praise until life ends. This sets up the contrast with verse 4: human breath eventually departs.
3. The nedivim ('princes, nobles, generous ones') represent the highest tier of human power. The parallel ben adam ('son of man, human being') reduces even the prince to his species: he is merely human. The phrase she-ein lo teshu'ah ('in whom there is no salvation/deliverance') is absolute — no human being possesses the capacity to save. The verb batlach ('to trust, to rely on') is redirected from humans to God.
4. The return to adamah ('ground') is a direct allusion to Genesis 3:19 ('for dust you are, and to dust you will return'). The word eshtonot ('plans, thoughts') occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible; its meaning is inferred from context and from the related Aramaic root. The 'that day' (ha-yom ha-hu) is the day of death — a single day undoes a lifetime of planning.
5. The beatitude ashre ('happy, blessed') contrasts with the warning of verses 3-4. The one whose hope (siver, 'expectation, hope') rests on YHVH Elohav ('the LORD his God') is blessed precisely because this God does not die, does not return to the ground, does not lose his plans. The title 'God of Jacob' recalls the patriarch who wrestled and was renamed — a God who engages with struggling, imperfect people.
6. The three-part creation formula — shamayim va-arets, ha-yam, ve-et kol asher bam ('heaven and earth, the sea, and everything in them') — encompasses the totality of the created order. The God who made everything is the same God who shomer emet le-olam ('keeps faith/truth forever'). The word emet ('truth, faithfulness, reliability') stands in contrast to the eshtonot ('plans') of the prince that perish: God's commitments are permanent.
7. The catalog of divine action begins. Three acts in rapid succession: mishpat la-asuqim ('justice for the oppressed'), lechem la-re'evim ('bread for the hungry'), mattir asurim ('releasing the bound/imprisoned'). Each act addresses a different form of powerlessness: systemic injustice, physical deprivation, and captivity. The pattern moves from legal to material to physical liberation.
8. Jesus's healings of the blind (Mark 10:46-52, John 9) are understood in the gospel tradition as fulfillments of this and similar prophetic declarations. The triple YHVH creates a liturgical cadence — this is a creed being recited, each line beginning with the name of God.
9. The three most vulnerable categories in Israelite society — the ger ('stranger, resident alien'), the yatom ('fatherless, orphan'), and the almanah ('widow') — are singled out for God's protection. These are the three groups most frequently named together in Torah legislation (Deuteronomy 10:18, 24:17). The verb ye'odded ('he sustains, he supports, he encourages') describes active, ongoing care. The final line reverses the pattern: derekh resha'im ye'avvet ('the way of the wicked he makes crooked, he twists'). The God who straightens the bent-over (v. 8) bends the path of the wicked into ruin.

10. The psalm closes with a declaration of eternal kingship: yimlokh YHVH le-olam ('the LORD will reign forever'). The address to Zion personalizes the declaration — this is not abstract theology but a message to a specific community. The closing halleluyah mirrors the opening, framing the psalm as an act of praise from beginning to end.

Summary: The second of the Final Hallel psalms. This psalm celebrates the LORD as the one who rebuilds Jerusalem, gathers the exiles, heals the brokenhearted, and counts the stars by name. It moves between cosmic power and intimate care: the God who determines the number of the stars also binds up wounds. He provides rain for the earth, grass for the mountains, and food for the animals and the young ravens when they cry. He takes no pleasure in the strength of horses or in human legs — his delight is in those who fear him and who wait for his faithful love. The psalm calls Jerusalem and Zion to praise the LORD who has strengthened their gates, blessed their children, and established peace on their borders. He sends his word to the earth like snow and ice, then melts them with his wind. He has given his word (statutes and ordinances) to Jacob alone — no other nation knows his laws.

What Makes This Remarkable: The psalm's most stunning feature is its refusal to separate cosmic power from personal tenderness. Verse 4 says God counts the stars and calls each one by name — an act of naming that echoes Genesis 1, where naming signifies authority and intimate knowledge. The very next verse says he heals the brokenhearted and binds their wounds. The God who numbers the galaxies also treats bruises. This oscillation between the immense and the intimate is the psalm's theological engine. The section on weather (vv. 15-18) treats God's word as a physical force: he sends it out and it runs across the earth; he speaks and the ice melts. The psalm makes no distinction between natural processes and divine speech — weather is God talking.

Translation Friction: The LXX (Septuagint) divides this psalm into two separate psalms: 146 (= MT vv. 1-11) and 147 (= MT vv. 12-20). The Masoretic Text treats it as one psalm. The statement in verse 20 that God has not done this for any other nation — lo asah khi le-khol goy — raises questions about universalism and particularism. The psalm's cosmic theology (God feeds the ravens, covers the sky with clouds) seems to apply to all creation, but the final verses restrict God's revealed law to Israel alone. The tension between universal providence and particular revelation is left unresolved.

Connections: The image of God counting and naming the stars appears also in Isaiah 40:26. The healing of the brokenhearted echoes Isaiah 61:1. The feeding of the ravens connects to Job 38:41 and to Jesus's teaching in Luke 12:24. The statement that God takes no pleasure in horses or human strength echoes Psalm 33:16-17 and challenges the military theology of the ancient Near East. The weather imagery in verses 15-18 parallels Job 37-38, where God's control of snow, ice, and wind is presented as evidence of his sovereignty.

¹Halleluyah!

How good it is to sing to our God,
how pleasant — praise is fitting.

²The LORD is building up Jerusalem.
He gathers the scattered of Israel.

³He heals the brokenhearted and binds up their wounds.

⁴He determines the number of the stars.
He calls each of them by name.

⁵Great is our Lord and vast in power.
His understanding has no limit.

⁶The LORD sustains the humble.
He brings the wicked down to the ground.

⁷Sing to the LORD with thanksgiving.
Make music to our God on the lyre.

⁸He covers the sky with clouds.
He prepares rain for the earth.
He makes grass grow on the mountains.

⁹He gives the animals their food and the young ravens when they cry out.

¹⁰He does not delight in the strength of a horse.
He takes no pleasure in the legs of a warrior.

¹¹The LORD takes pleasure in those who fear him, in those who wait for his faithful love.

¹²Praise the LORD, Jerusalem!
Praise your God, Zion!

¹³For he has strengthened the bars of your gates.
He has blessed your children within you.

¹⁴He establishes peace on your borders.
He satisfies you with the finest wheat.

¹⁵He sends out his command to the earth.
His word runs swiftly.

¹⁶He gives snow like wool.
He scatters frost like ashes.

¹⁷He hurls his ice like crumbs.
Who can withstand his cold?

¹⁸He sends out his word and melts them.
He blows his wind and the waters flow.

¹⁹He declares his word to Jacob,
his statutes and judgments to Israel.

²⁰He has not done this for any other nation.
They do not know his judgments.
Halleluyah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening halleluyah is followed by a reason: ki tov ('for it is good'). The verb zammerah ('to make music, to sing psalms') is directed to Eloheanu ('our God') — the first-person plural claims communal ownership. The word na'im ('pleasant, lovely, delightful') and navah ('fitting, beautiful, appropriate') describe praise not as duty but as something that is both enjoyable and aesthetically right.

2. The participle boneh ('building, one who builds') indicates ongoing action — the LORD is in the process of rebuilding. The nidche Yisrael ('the scattered/expelled ones of Israel') are the exiles, the dispersed community. The verse likely reflects a post-exilic setting where Jerusalem is being physically rebuilt and the diaspora is being regathered.
3. The ha-rofe ('the healer') is a participle describing God's ongoing activity. The shevure lev ('broken of heart') are those whose inner life has been shattered — by exile, grief, loss, or betrayal. The verb mechabesh ('binding up, bandaging') is a medical term applied to emotional and spiritual injury. God is physician to wounds that no human doctor can reach.
4. The image of God naming the stars appears also in Isaiah 40:26, where the prophet says God 'brings out their host by number, calling them all by name.' The connection between numbering and naming suggests a census: God takes roll call of the stars, and none is absent.
5. The phrase rav koach ('great in power, vast in strength') and litevunato ein mispar ('to his understanding there is no number') create an ironic echo of verse 4: God can number the stars, but his own understanding cannot be numbered. The one who counts everything is himself uncountable.
6. The me'odded ('sustaining, encouraging, supporting') describes ongoing divine care for the anavim ('humble, afflicted, meek'). The contrast with the wicked uses the verb mashpil ('brings low, humbles, casts down') — the same vertical reversal seen throughout the Psalter: God lifts the low and lowers the high.
7. The verb enu ('sing, respond, answer') introduces a new section of the psalm. The todah ('thanksgiving, acknowledgment, confession of praise') is both a genre of worship and a sacrifice (the todah offering). The kinnor ('lyre') is David's instrument, the foundational instrument of Israelite worship.
8. Three participles describe God's atmospheric work: mekhasseh ('covering'), mekhin ('preparing, establishing'), matsmyach ('making grow, causing to sprout'). The sequence traces the rain cycle: clouds cover the sky, rain falls on the earth, grass grows on the mountains. What meteorology describes as a water cycle, the psalm describes as divine action.
9. The behemah ('livestock, animals, beasts') and the bene orev ('young ravens, raven chicks') represent the breadth of God's provision — from domesticated animals to wild scavengers. The ravens' cry (yiqra'u, 'they call out') is treated as a prayer that God answers. This image appears in Job 38:41 and in Jesus's teaching in Luke 12:24.
10. The horse (sus) was the primary instrument of military superiority in the ancient Near East. Egypt was the major supplier of warhorses, and Israel's kings were repeatedly warned against multiplying horses (Deuteronomy 17:16). The pairing of horse-strength with human-leg-strength dismisses both cavalry and infantry as objects of divine approval.
11. The contrast with verse 10 is complete: God delights not in military power but in yere'av ('those who fear him') and ha-meyachalim le-chasdo ('those who wait/hope for his faithful love'). The verb yachal ('to wait, to hope') describes patient expectation — not passive resignation but active trust directed toward chesed. God's pleasure is in the posture of dependent trust, not in the posture of self-sufficient power.
12. The psalm's second major section begins with a direct address to Jerusalem and Zion — the city and its sacred hill. The imperatives shabbechi ('praise!') and hallelu ('praise!') call the city itself to worship. In the LXX, this is where a new psalm (147) begins.
13. The berichei she'arayikh ('bars of your gates') are the heavy crossbeams that secured the city gates — the primary defense against invasion. God has made them strong. The parallel berakh banayikh ('he has blessed your children') moves from external security to internal flourishing. The city is both fortified and fertile.
14. The ha-sam gevulekh shalom ('the one who sets your border as peace') declares that God himself is the agent of peace at the borders — no enemy penetrates. The chelev chittim ('fat of wheat, finest wheat') represents the best of the grain harvest. The word chelev ('fat') is the choicest portion, the part offered to God in sacrifice. Now God gives the best back to the city.
15. The ha-sholeach imrato arets ('the one who sends his word/saying to the earth') personifies God's word as a messenger dispatched on a mission. The verb yaruts ('it runs') gives the word legs — it races across the landscape. The speed (ad meherah, 'up to swiftness, very fast') emphasizes that God's word encounters no resistance between intention and execution.
16. The similes are striking: snow like wool (ka-tsamer) — white, thick, blanketing the ground; frost like ashes (ka-efer) — pale, fine, dusting every surface. Both comparisons emphasize the covering quality of winter precipitation. The weather is not random but given (noten) and scattered (yefazzer) by God.
17. The verb mashlik ('he hurls, he throws') is violent — God does not gently lower the ice but flings it. The qarchoh ke-fittim ('his ice like crumbs/morsels') pictures hailstones or chunks of ice scattered like broken bread. The rhetorical question lifne qarato mi ya'amod ('before his cold, who can stand?') acknowledges that cold — a simple weather phenomenon — is an irresistible force of divine origin.
18. The same devaro ('his word') that ran swiftly in verse 15 now melts the ice and snow of verses 16-17. The verb yamsem ('he melts them') shows the word as a warming force. The rucho ('his wind/spirit') — the same word for spirit and wind — blows and the frozen waters flow again. The cycle is complete: God sends cold and then sends warmth; he freezes and then thaws. All of it is his word at work.
19. The psalm shifts from God's word in nature (weather) to God's word in revelation (Torah). The maggid devarav le-Ya'aqov ('he declares his words to Jacob') uses the same verb for proclaiming that appeared in verse 15 for dispatching. The chuqqav u-mishpatav ('his statutes and his judgments') are the specific legal and moral instructions given to Israel — the Torah.

- 20. The final verse makes an exclusivity claim: lo asah khi le-khol goy ('he has not done so for any nation'). The revelation of Torah is unique to Israel. While God's providential care extends to all creation (vv. 8-9), his revealed will — his statutes and judgments — has been given to one people. The closing halleluyah seals the psalm's movement from cosmic praise to particular gratitude for Torah.

Summary: The third of the Final Hallel psalms. This is the great cosmic praise psalm: a sweeping summons for all creation — from the highest heavens to the deepest sea — to praise the LORD. The psalm moves from the heights downward: angels, heavenly hosts, sun, moon, stars, the highest heavens, the waters above the sky. Then it descends to earth: sea creatures, ocean depths, fire, hail, snow, mist, storm wind, mountains, hills, fruit trees, cedars, wild animals, cattle, creeping things, birds. Finally it reaches humanity: kings, peoples, princes, rulers, young men, young women, the old, the young. Everything that exists is summoned to praise the LORD, whose name alone is exalted, whose splendor covers earth and heaven, and who has raised up a horn for his people.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 148 is the most comprehensive creation-praise text in the Hebrew Bible. Its structure mirrors the creation sequence of Genesis 1 in reverse: it begins in the heavens and works downward through the sky, the atmosphere, the land, and finally the human world. But unlike Genesis 1, the creation here is not passive — it is summoned to active praise. The sun, moon, and stars are not merely objects; they are worshipers. The sea creatures and storm winds are not merely phenomena; they are members of a choir. The psalm insists that praise is not a human activity extended to creation by metaphor but a cosmic activity in which humans participate. The universe is a temple, and everything in it is liturgy.

Translation Friction: The psalm raises the question of how non-sentient entities 'praise' God. The mountains, the hail, and the sea creatures are commanded to praise, but they cannot speak or think. Some interpreters read this as poetic hyperbole; others (following the psalm's own logic) argue that existence itself is praise — that by being what they are and doing what they were made to do, all created things glorify their maker. Romans 8:19-22, where creation groans in anticipation, and Revelation 5:13, where every creature in heaven and on earth and under the earth praises the Lamb, extend this theology. The 'horn' raised for God's people in verse 14 is a compressed royal/messianic image whose referent is debated.

Connections: *The psalm is closely related to the Song of the Three Young Men (an addition to Daniel 3 in the LXX), which uses the same pattern of summoning all creation to praise. The list of created entities echoes Genesis 1 and Job 38-41. Francis of Assisi's 'Canticle of the Sun' is a medieval Christian expansion of this psalm's theology. The horn (qeren) raised for God's people in verse 14 connects to the messianic 'horn of David' in Psalm 132:17 and to Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:69: 'He has raised up a horn of salvation for us').*

1Halleluyah!

Praise the LORD from the heavens.

Praise him in the heights.

2Praise him, all his angels.

Praise him, all his heavenly armies.

3Praise him, sun and moon.

Praise him, all you stars of light.

4Praise him, highest heavens, and you waters above the sky.

5Let them praise the name of the LORD, for at his command and they were created.

⁶He set them in place forever.
 He gave a decree that will not pass away.
⁷Praise the LORD from the earth,
 you sea creatures and all ocean depths.
⁸Fire and hail, snow and mist, storm wind that carries out his word, ⁹mountains and all hills,
 fruit trees and all cedars, ¹⁰wild animals and all livestock, creeping things and birds in flight, ¹¹kings of the earth and all peoples, princes and all rulers of the earth, ¹²young men and young women,
 old and young together.
¹³Let them praise the name of the LORD,
 for his name alone is exalted.
 His splendor covers earth and heaven.
¹⁴He has raised up a horn for his people — praise for all his faithful ones, for the children of Israel, a people close to him.
 Halleluyah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The psalm opens at the highest point of creation: min ha-shamayim ('from the heavens') and ba-meromim ('in the heights'). The praise is to originate at the top of the cosmos and cascade downward. The triple hallelu in this verse sets the relentless pace of the entire psalm — command after command, summoning layer after layer of creation.
2. The mal'akhav ('his angels, his messengers') and tseva'av ('his hosts, his armies') are the members of the divine court — the heavenly beings who serve the LORD. The word tsava ('host, army') is military language applied to the celestial realm: the stars and angelic beings are God's organized forces.
3. The sun (shemesh) and moon (yareach) are addressed directly, as though they can hear. The kokheve or ('stars of light') are not merely luminous objects but praised participants. In the ancient Near East, sun and moon were deities worshiped by surrounding cultures. This psalm commands them to worship the LORD — they are not gods but creatures summoned to praise their maker.
4. The sheme ha-shamayim ('heavens of the heavens') is the superlative — the highest conceivable point of the cosmos. The mayim asher me'al ha-shamayim ('the waters that are above the heavens') reflects the cosmology of Genesis 1:7, where God separated the waters below the firmament from the waters above it. Even these primal, pre-creation waters are summoned to praise.
5. The reason for praise is creation itself: ki hu tsivvah ve-nivra'u ('for he commanded and they were created'). The verb nivra'u ('they were created') is the Niphal of bara, the verb reserved in Genesis 1 for divine creation. Everything that exists does so because God spoke it into being. Existence is the first and fundamental reason for praise.
6. The verb ya'amidem ('he caused them to stand, he established them') describes permanent placement — the heavenly bodies are fixed in their courses. The choq natan ('he gave a statute/decreed') applies legal language to the natural order: the stars obey a law, a binding ordinance. The phrase lo ya'avur ('it will not pass, it will not be transgressed') declares the permanence of God's cosmic legislation.
7. The psalm pivots from heaven to earth: min ha-arets ('from the earth'). The tanninim ('sea creatures, sea monsters, great serpents') are the largest and most fearsome creatures of the deep — in other contexts (Isaiah 27:1, Job 41) they represent chaos. Here they are not enemies to be conquered but worshipers summoned to praise. The tehomot ('deep waters, ocean depths, abysses') are the primordial deeps of Genesis 1:2.

8. The weather phenomena — esh ('fire/lightning'), barad ('hail'), sheleg ('snow'), qitor ('mist, vapor, smoke'), ruach se'arah ('storm wind') — are presented as obedient agents. The final phrase osah devaro ('doing his word, carrying out his command') declares that the storm wind is not chaotic but obedient: it executes God's instructions. Weather is divine speech in motion.
9. The landscape joins the chorus: mountains and hills for topography, fruit trees and cedars for vegetation. The ets peri ('fruit tree') represents cultivated, productive growth; the arazim ('cedars') represent wild, majestic growth. Both cultivated and wild nature are summoned.
10. The animal kingdom is represented in four categories: chayyah ('wild animal, living creature'), behemah ('livestock, domestic animal'), remes ('creeping thing, swarming creature'), and tsippor kanaf ('bird of wing, winged bird'). These categories echo the creation taxonomy of Genesis 1:24-26. The entire animal world, from the largest predator to the smallest crawler, is called to praise.
11. The human realm is summoned by social rank: malke erets ('kings of the earth') at the top, leummim ('peoples, nations') as the collective, sarim ('princes, officials') as the governing class, and shofete erets ('judges/rulers of the earth') as the judiciary. No tier of human power is exempt from the summons to praise.
12. The summons moves from political rank to demographic range: bachurim ('young men'), betulot ('young women, maidens'), zeqenim ('old, elders'), and ne'arim ('youth, children'). Every age and both sexes are included. The word im ('with, together') in zeqenim im ne'arim ('old with young') emphasizes that praise unites generations.
13. The verb nisgav ('is exalted, is set on high, is inaccessibly high') declares God's name to be in a category beyond all other names. The word levaddo ('alone, by itself') insists on uniqueness: no other name shares this height. The hodo ('his splendor, his majesty') covers both erets ve-shamayim ('earth and heaven') — the same two realms that were separately summoned to praise now share in displaying God's glory.
14. The qeren ('horn') is variously interpreted as the Davidic king, the nation of Israel collectively, or the messianic hope. Luke 1:69 applies the image to Jesus: 'He has raised up a horn of salvation for us in the house of his servant David.' The phrase am qerovo ('a people close to him') is unique and expresses election as proximity rather than privilege.

Summary: The fourth of the Final Hallel psalms. A new song for the LORD: Israel is called to celebrate its Maker with dancing and music — tambourine and lyre. The LORD takes delight in his people and adorns the humble with victory. The faithful ones are to shout for joy from their beds, with praise on their lips and a double-edged sword in their hands, to carry out judgment on the nations, to bind their kings with chains, to execute the written verdict. This honor belongs to all his faithful ones.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This psalm holds together two things that later interpreters have struggled to combine: ecstatic worship and military action. The faithful ones have praise of God in their mouths and a two-edged sword in their hands simultaneously (v. 6). The psalm does not sequence these — first worship, then war, or first war, then worship — but holds them together as a single act. The verb ye'alzu ('let them exult') in verse 5 pictures the faithful shouting for joy on their beds — perhaps a reference to nighttime worship or to the confidence of those who can sleep soundly because victory is assured. The 'written verdict' (mishpat katuv) of verse 9 suggests that the judgment on the nations is not arbitrary but follows a pre-existing divine sentence.*

Translation Friction: *The militaristic language of verses 6-9 — swords, vengeance, chains, iron shackles — has troubled interpreters across centuries. Is this literal military conquest, eschatological judgment, or spiritual metaphor? Jewish tradition has read the 'double-edged sword' as Torah study (the sword of the mouth), while Christian tradition has oscillated between crusade theology and purely spiritual readings. The psalm offers no internal signals that the language is metaphorical; it reads as a celebration of God's people as agents of divine justice against hostile nations. The phrase mishpat katuv ('written judgment') in verse 9 may refer to prophetic oracles against the nations (Isaiah 13-23, Jeremiah 46-51) or to a heavenly decree.*

Connections: *The 'new song' (shir chadash) connects to Psalms 33:3, 96:1, 98:1, and 144:9 — each marks a fresh act of God that demands fresh praise. The double-edged sword (cherev pifiyyot) appears in Revelation 1:16 and Hebrews 4:12, where it is identified with the word of God. The binding of kings and nobles (v. 8) echoes Psalm 2:1-3, where the nations conspire against the LORD and his anointed. The 'honor for all his faithful ones' (v. 9) distributes royal dignity to the entire community, a democratization of the royal psalms' theology.*

¹Halleluyah!

Sing to the LORD a new song,
his praise in the assembly of the faithful.

²Let Israel celebrate its Maker.
Let the children of Zion rejoice in their King.

³Let them praise his name with dancing, with tambourine and lyre making music to him.

⁴For the LORD takes delight in his people.
He adorns the humble with victory.

⁵Let the faithful ones exult in glory.
Let them shout for joy on their beds.

⁶The praises of God are in their throats and a double-edged sword in their hands,

⁷to carry out vengeance on the nations, punishment on the peoples,

⁸to bind their kings with chains and their nobles with iron shackles,

⁹to carry out the verdict written against them.
This is the honor given to all his faithful ones.
Halleluyah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The shir chadash ('new song') signals fresh praise prompted by fresh divine action. The qahal chasidim ('assembly of the faithful, congregation of the devoted ones') locates this praise in communal worship, not private devotion. The chasidim are those marked by chesed — people whose lives reflect the covenant loyalty they receive from God.
2. The parallel Yisrael / bene Tsiyyon ('Israel / children of Zion') names the people as both nation and city-community. The osaiv ('his Maker, the one who made him') identifies God not merely as ruler but as creator of the nation. The malkam ('their King') is God himself — the psalm's theology of divine kingship is direct and unmediated.
3. The machol ('dance, circle dance') brings the body into worship — praise is not only vocal but physical. The tof ('tambourine, hand drum') and kinnor ('lyre') provide the instrumental accompaniment. The combination of dance and music evokes the celebrations after the Red Sea crossing (Exodus 15:20), where Miriam led the women with tambourines and dancing.
4. The verb rotseh ('takes pleasure, delights in, is pleased with') echoes Psalm 147:11. The verb yefa'er ('he adorns, he beautifies, he glorifies') pictures God dressing the anavim ('humble, afflicted, meek') in yeshu'ah ('salvation, victory, deliverance') as though it were a garment or a crown. The humble are not merely rescued but made beautiful by God's saving action.
5. The ya'lezu ('let them exult, let them triumph') describes the uninhibited joy of the chasidim. The phrase al mishkevotam ('on their beds') has generated varied interpretations: nighttime praise before sleep, the confidence of those who can rest securely knowing God fights for them, or the joy that persists even in the private space of one's own bedroom. The image is of praise so thorough it follows the worshiper into bed.
6. The cherev pifiyyot ('sword of edges/mouths') is literally 'a sword of double mouths.' The word peh ('mouth') is used for the cutting edge of a blade because the blade 'bites' like a mouth. A double-edged sword has two cutting surfaces, making it effective on both the forward and return stroke.
7. The neqamah ('vengeance, retribution, vindication') is not personal revenge but the execution of divine justice. The tokhehot ('punishments, rebukes, corrections') are judicial in character — these are sentences being carried out. The nations (goyim) and peoples (leummim) who receive this judgment are those who have opposed God and his people.

8. The binding of malkheihem ('their kings') and nikhbedeihem ('their honored ones, their nobles') reverses the power structure: those who held authority are now held in chains. The ziqqim ('chains') and khavle varzel ('iron shackles, iron fetters') are the instruments of captivity. The image is of total military and political subjugation.
9. The mishpat katuv ('written judgment, recorded verdict') suggests a pre-existing divine sentence — the judgment is not improvised but follows a decree already inscribed. The hadar hu le-khol chasidav ('this is the honor/glory for all his faithful ones') declares that participation in divine justice is not restricted to kings or warriors but belongs to the entire community of the faithful. The closing halleluyah frames even this militant passage within the context of praise.

Summary: The final psalm of the Psalter — the fifth and last of the Final Hallel psalms. This is the conclusion of the entire book of Psalms. Every line is a command to praise. The psalm answers three questions: Where should God be praised? In his sanctuary and in his mighty heavens. Why should God be praised? For his mighty acts and his surpassing greatness. How should God be praised? With trumpet, harp, lyre, tambourine, dancing, strings, pipe, and crashing cymbals. The final verse expands the summons beyond instruments and beyond Israel: 'Let everything that has breath praise the LORD.' The last word of the Psalter is Halleluyah.

What Makes This Remarkable: Psalm 150 is the Psalter's final word, and that word is praise. The book that began with the quiet happiness of the righteous individual (Psalm 1:1, 'Happy is the one') and passed through every human experience — lament, anger, despair, confession, thanksgiving, wonder, terror, exile, and return — ends with nothing but praise. Every verse is an imperative: hallelu, hallelu, hallelu. There are no requests, no complaints, no enemies, no conditions. The psalm strips worship down to its purest form: an unbroken cascade of commands to praise, each one adding a new instrument to the orchestra. The final verse — kol ha-neshamah tehallel Yah ('let everything that has breath praise the LORD') — is the widest possible summons. The word neshamah ('breath') is the breath God breathed into the first human in Genesis 2:7. Every creature that received that breath owes it back as praise. The Psalter ends where creation began: with divine breath, now returned to its source as worship.

Translation Friction: The psalm's relentless imperative mood and absence of any content beyond 'praise' has led some scholars to view it as liturgically thin — all form and no substance. But this misses the structural argument: the substance of the Psalter is the preceding 149 psalms. Psalm 150 is not a standalone poem but a doxology for the entire collection. The five Final Hallel psalms (146-150) correspond structurally to the five books of the Psalter (1-41, 42-72, 73-89, 90-106, 107-150), each of which ends with a doxology. Psalm 150 is the doxology of doxologies — the final 'Amen' of the entire five-book structure.

Connections: The opening phrase 'Praise God in his sanctuary' connects to the entire temple theology of the Psalter (Psalms 27:4, 84:1-4, 134:1). The instruments listed correspond to those used in temple worship as described in 1 Chronicles 15:16-28 and 2 Chronicles 5:12-13. The final verse — 'let everything that has breath praise the LORD' — is the ultimate fulfillment of Psalm 145:21 ('let all flesh bless his holy name') and of Psalm 148's summons of all creation. The structure of the Psalter moves from Torah (Psalm 1) to praise (Psalm 150), suggesting that the life shaped by God's instruction naturally culminates in worship.

¹Halleluyah!

Praise God in his sanctuary.

Praise him in his mighty heavens.

²Praise him for his mighty acts.

Praise him according to his surpassing greatness.

³Praise him with the blast of the ram's horn.

Praise him with harp and lyre.

4 Praise him with tambourine and dancing.
Praise him with strings and pipe.

5 Praise him with resounding cymbals.
Praise him with crashing cymbals.

6 Let everything that has breath praise the LORD.
Halleluyah!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The reqi'a uzzo ('firmament of his strength') echoes Genesis 1:6 but adds the qualifier uzzo ('his strength, his power'). The heavens are not merely an expanse but a display of divine power. The parallelism between sanctuary and firmament suggests that the earthly temple is a microcosm of the heavenly space — worship below mirrors worship above.
2. The psalm now answers why: bi-gevurotav ('for his mighty acts') — everything God has done. Ke-rov gudlo ('according to the abundance of his greatness') — because of who God is. The two reasons cover the entire ground of praise: God's deeds (what he has done) and God's nature (what he is). The word rov ('abundance, greatness, multitude') indicates that God's greatness exceeds any attempt to match it with praise — and yet the psalm commands the attempt.
3. The psalm now answers how, and the answer is: with everything. The teqa shofar ('blast of the ram's horn') is the sound of assembly, alarm, and holy celebration — the shofar that sounded at Sinai (Exodus 19:16) and at the fall of Jericho (Joshua 6:20). The nevel ('harp') and kinnor ('lyre') are the foundational stringed instruments of Israelite worship.
4. The tof ('tambourine, hand drum') and machol ('dancing, circle dance') add percussion and movement. The minnim ('strings, stringed instruments') is a general term for string instruments, and the ugav ('pipe, flute, wind instrument') adds breath-powered sound. The progression moves through the instrument families: brass (shofar), strings (harp, lyre, minim), percussion (tambourine), wind (pipe), and movement (dancing).
5. The tsiltselei shama ('cymbals of hearing/sound') and tsiltselei teru'ah ('cymbals of shouting/crashing') represent two types or intensities of cymbal sound. The first may be smaller finger-cymbals that keep rhythm; the second is the large crash-cymbals that punctuate climactic moments. The word teru'ah ('shout, blast, alarm, acclamation') brings the sound to its peak — this is worship at full volume, holding nothing back.
6. The neshamah ('breath, living breath') is distinguished from ruach ('spirit, wind') — neshamah is specifically the breath of life, the respiratory function that sustains creatures. Its use here connects the end of the Psalter to the beginning of Genesis: God breathed the neshamah into the first human, and now every being that carries it is summoned to return it as praise. The closing halleluyah is the 150th psalm's final syllable and the Psalter's final word.

Proverbs

Summary: Proverbs 1 establishes the purpose of the entire collection (vv1-7), issues a father's warning against the enticement of violent men (vv8-19), and then dramatically shifts voice as Woman Wisdom herself takes to the streets to deliver her first public speech (vv20-33). The chapter moves from private instruction to public confrontation.

What Makes This Remarkable: The prologue (vv1-7) is not merely a preface but a thesis statement for the entire book. It names six overlapping goals — wisdom, discipline, discernment, prudence, knowledge, and discretion — all culminating in the declaration that the fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge. This is not the end of an argument but its starting point. The most striking feature of the chapter is the personification of wisdom as a woman who shouts in public spaces — streets, squares, gateways. In the ancient Near East, the only women who called out to men in public were either mourners or prostitutes. By casting Wisdom as a woman crying out at the city gates, the text deliberately inverts the image of the seductive woman who will appear in chapters 5-7. The reader must choose which woman's voice to heed.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew reshit in verse 7 ('beginning') has been debated for centuries. Does it mean 'the starting point' (you begin with the fear of the LORD and then acquire knowledge) or 'the chief part' (the fear of the LORD is the essence, the first principle of knowledge)? Both readings have support. The word can mean either temporal beginning or supreme portion. The ambiguity may be deliberate — the fear of the LORD is both where you start and what matters most. Woman Wisdom's speech in vv20-33 is troublingly harsh: she promises to laugh at the disaster of those who ignored her. This does not fit easily into categories of divine compassion, but it reflects the absolute character of wisdom literature — choices have consequences, and Wisdom will not rescue those who chose Folly.

Connections: The 'fear of the LORD' formula (v7) is the architectural keystone of the entire wisdom corpus, appearing in Job 28:28, Psalm 111:10, Proverbs 9:10, and Ecclesiastes 12:13. The father-to-son instruction format (v8) matches Egyptian wisdom literature, particularly the Instruction of Amenemope and the Instruction of Ptahhotep, placing Proverbs in a broader ancient Near Eastern tradition. Woman Wisdom's public speech anticipates her major address in chapter 8, where she will claim to have been present at creation itself.

¹The proverbs of Solomon, son of David,
king of Israel:

²To know wisdom and discipline,
to discern words of understanding,

³To receive discipline that produces insight — righteousness, justice, and uprightness,

⁴To give shrewdness to the naive, knowledge and foresight to the young,

⁵Let the wise listen and add to their learning, and the discerning acquire guidance —

⁶to understand a proverb and a figure of speech, the words of the wise and their riddles.

⁷The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge; wisdom and discipline, fools despise.

⁸Listen, my son, to your father's discipline, and do not abandon your mother's instruction.

⁹For they will be a garland of grace on your head and pendants around your neck.

¹⁰My son, if sinners entice you,
do not consent.

¹¹If they say, 'Come with us —
let us lie in ambush for blood,
let us lurk unseen for the innocent without cause,

¹²Let us swallow them alive like Sheol, whole, like those who descend to the pit —

¹³We will find every kind of precious wealth;
we will fill our houses with plunder.'

¹⁴'Throw in your lot with us —
we will all share one purse.'

¹⁵My son, do not walk on the road with them;
hold back your foot from their path,

¹⁶for their feet run toward evil and they rush to shed blood.

¹⁷For in vain is a net spread in the sight of any bird.

¹⁸But these men lie in ambush for their own blood;
they lurk in hiding for their own lives.

¹⁹Such are the paths of all who profit by violence —
it takes the life of those who gain it.

²⁰Wisdom cries aloud in the street;
in the public squares she raises her voice.

²¹At the busiest corner she calls out;
at the entrance of the gates, in the city,
she speaks her words:

²²'How long, you naive ones, will you love naivety?
How long will scoffers delight in their scoffing and fools hate knowledge?

²³Turn back at my reproof!
Look — I will pour out my spirit on you;
I will make my words known to you.

²⁴Because I called and you refused,
I stretched out my hand and no one paid attention,

²⁵and you ignored all my counsel and would not accept my reproof —

²⁶then I in turn will laugh at your disaster;
I will mock when your dread arrives,

²⁷when your dread arrives like a storm and your disaster sweeps in like a whirlwind, when distress and anguish come upon you.

²⁸Then they will call on me, but I will not answer;
they will search for me urgently, but will not find me,

²⁹because they hated knowledge and did not choose the fear of the LORD,

³⁰they would not accept my counsel;
they spurned all my reproof.

³¹So they will eat the fruit of their own way and be gorged on their own schemes.

³²For the waywardness of the naive will kill them,
and the complacency of fools will destroy them.

³³But whoever listens to me will dwell secure and be at ease, without fear of harm.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Mashal (plural meshalim, 'proverbs') means far more than a pithy saying. The root m-sh-l means 'to rule, to compare, to represent.' A mashal is a statement that governs — it captures reality in compressed form and exercises authority over the hearer's understanding. The attribution to Solomon draws on the tradition of 1 Kings 4:32, which credits him with three thousand proverbs.
2. Musar is rendered 'discipline' rather than 'instruction' to preserve its sharp edge. The word derives from yasar ('to chastise, to correct, to discipline') and often appears in contexts of physical correction (Proverbs 13:24, 22:15). Wisdom in Proverbs is not acquired without cost — it requires the submission of the learner to correction that may be painful.
3. The triad tsedeq, mishpat, and mesharim ('righteousness, justice, and uprightness') is not a random list but a comprehensive description of right living. Tsedeq is conformity to God's standard; mishpat is the just application of that standard in community; mesharim (from yashar, 'straight, upright') is the personal integrity that connects the two. Together they define the moral outcome that wisdom produces.
4. The peti ('naive, simple, gullible') is not stupid but untested — a person whose character is still open, still formable. The word comes from patah ('to be open, to be enticed') and describes someone who can be led in either direction. Proverbs does not write off the naive; it targets them as the primary audience. The ormah ('shrewdness, craftiness') given to the naive is the same word used of the serpent in Genesis 3:1 — it is morally neutral cunning, the capacity to navigate deception without being deceived.
5. The shift from the naive (v4) to the already wise (v5) reveals a key principle: wisdom is never finished. The chakham ('wise person') still needs to hear and add learning. Tachbulot ('guidance, steering, strategy') originally referred to the ropes used to steer a ship — wisdom is navigational skill, the ability to direct one's course through complex situations.
6. Melitsah ('figure of speech, satire, enigmatic saying') and chidot ('riddles, puzzles') indicate that wisdom literature deliberately obscures as much as it reveals. The wise do not hand answers to the learner; they pose problems that require active engagement. The hearer must work to understand — and the working is itself part of the formation.
7. The fear of the LORD is not one topic among many in Proverbs — it is the epistemological foundation. Without it, the book's other instructions become merely practical advice. With it, every proverb becomes an expression of divine order. The identical formula appears in 9:10, forming an inclusio around the book's first major section.
7. The placement of 'wisdom and discipline, fools despise' at the verse's end — with the verb last — creates emphasis through word order. The Hebrew ear hears chokmah and musar first, then the devastating bazu ('despise'). What fools reject is named before the rejection itself, as if to say: look at what they are throwing away.
8. The shift to direct address — 'my son' (beni) — signals the beginning of the first instructional unit. The parallelism between father's musar and mother's torah elevates the mother's teaching to equal authority with the father's. In Israelite pedagogy, both parents transmitted wisdom. The mother's torah is instruction in the fullest sense — not a lesser, domestic variant but authoritative teaching.
9. The imagery of ornamental jewelry applied to parental teaching transforms discipline from burden into adornment. The livyat chen ('garland of grace, wreath of favor') and anaqim ('pendants, necklaces') are publicly visible — wisdom's fruit is not hidden but displayed. In the ancient Near East, such ornaments also signaled social standing and honor.
10. The verb yefattukha ('entice you') is from patah, the same root behind peti ('naive') in verse 4. The naive are those open to enticement; sinners exploit that openness. The father's command is blunt: al tove ('do not consent, do not go along'). No negotiation, no partial engagement — a clean refusal.
11. The father now gives the sinners' actual speech — a recruitment pitch. The verbs eerevah ('let us ambush') and nitspenah ('let us hide, lurk') are cohortative, expressing eager intention. The target is the naqi ('innocent, clean') — someone who has done nothing to provoke attack. The word chinnam ('without cause, for nothing, gratuitously') intensifies the evil: this is violence for its own sake.
12. The sinners compare themselves to Sheol — the grave, the realm of the dead — which swallows people whole. The imagery is deliberately monstrous: they see themselves as death itself, consuming victims who are chayyim ('alive') and temimim ('whole, blameless'). The boast reveals the predatory nature of the invitation. Sheol in Hebrew thought was insatiable (Proverbs 27:20, Isaiah 5:14), and so are those who pattern their lives after it.
13. The pitch moves from thrill to profit. Hon yaqar ('precious wealth') and shalal ('plunder, spoil') reveal the economic motive beneath the violence. The promise to fill houses with plunder is an inversion of the wisdom promise — wisdom fills a house with good things (Proverbs 24:4), but the violent fill theirs with stolen goods.
14. The final enticement is belonging: throw your goral ('lot, share, portion') in with ours. The shared kis ('purse, bag') offers community and equal distribution. The gang promises what family and wisdom also promise — identity, provision, solidarity — but through violence rather than virtue. The counterfeit is compelling precisely because it mimics the real thing.
15. The father's response is physical: restrain your ragel ('foot') from their netivah ('path, track'). The language of walking and paths runs throughout Proverbs — life is a journey, and the critical choice is which road to take. The imperative mena ('hold back, withhold, restrain') implies that the pull is real; without active resistance, the feet will follow.

16. The verbs yarutsu ('run') and yimaharu ('hasten, rush') convey eagerness — the violent are not reluctant participants but enthusiastic ones. Isaiah 59:7 quotes this verse nearly verbatim in an indictment of Israel, and Paul cites it in Romans 3:15 as evidence of universal human depravity.
17. The father inserts a proverb within his instruction: a bird that sees the net avoids it. The implication is devastating — these sinners are less perceptive than birds. They set a trap that will catch themselves, and they cannot see it. The resheth ('net') they spread for others becomes their own snare (v18).
18. The identical verbs from verse 11 — arav ('ambush') and tsaphan ('lurk') — return, but with a devastating twist. In verse 11 the sinners lay ambush for others; in verse 18 they ambush themselves. The irony is total: violence is self-consuming. The nafshotam ('their own lives, their own souls') they destroy are their own.
19. The word batsa ('unjust gain, profit by violence') appears throughout the prophetic corpus as a key indictment of corrupt leaders (Jeremiah 6:13, Ezekiel 22:27, Habakkuk 2:9). Its presence here connects the father's private instruction to the public concerns of prophecy — personal greed and social injustice are the same sin at different scales.
20. The plural form chokmot has generated much discussion. Some see it as a plural of majesty (like Elohim), others as an abstract plural, others as a Canaanite feminine ending. Regardless of grammar, the effect is to present Wisdom as a figure of public authority — a voice that cannot be ignored or confined to a single setting.
21. The city gate (sha'ar) was the center of legal, commercial, and social life in ancient Israelite cities. Elders judged cases there, merchants conducted business, and news was exchanged. By placing Wisdom at the gate's entrance, the text positions her at the crossroads of public life — every decision made in the city passes through her hearing.
22. Wisdom's speech opens with ad matay ('how long?'), the same phrase used in lament psalms to address God (Psalm 13:1-2). Here Wisdom uses it to address the foolish — she laments over them. Three categories appear: petayim ('the naive,' who are reachable but undirected), letsim ('scoffers,' who mock what they do not understand), and kesilim ('fools,' who are morally obstinate). Each group is defined by what it loves or hates: the naive love their openness, scoffers love their mockery, and fools hate knowledge itself.
23. Wisdom offers her ruach ('spirit, breath, wind') — an astonishing claim. The verb abi'ah ('I will pour out, I will cause to bubble forth') suggests abundance, even excess. Wisdom is not rationing herself. The offer is lavish and conditional only on turning (shuvu, 'turn back, repent'). The same root sh-u-v that defines prophetic repentance defines the response Wisdom demands.
24. The verbs shift to past tense — Wisdom has already been calling. The refusal is not a single event but a pattern. Natiti yadi ('I stretched out my hand') is a gesture of offering, even pleading. The word maqshiv ('one who pays attention, one who listens carefully') from qashav emphasizes that what was lacking was not access to Wisdom but attentiveness to her.
25. The verb tifre'u ('you let loose, you neglected, you let go') is the same word used for Pharaoh 'letting' Israel go (Exodus 5:4) and for undoing restraint. They released Wisdom's counsel — let it slip through their fingers — and refused her tokhachat ('reproof, correction, argument').
26. This is among the most unsettling verses in wisdom literature. Wisdom does not merely warn; she promises to laugh (eshchaq) and mock (el'ag) when calamity strikes. The language mirrors the scoffers' own behavior — they mocked wisdom, and now wisdom will mock them. The reversal is exact and merciless. This is not cruelty but the inherent logic of rejection: the one you mocked will not rescue you.
27. The storm imagery (sho'ah, 'devastation, storm' and sufah, 'whirlwind, tempest') conveys suddenness and overwhelming force. The pairing tsarah ve-tsuqah ('distress and anguish') is a rhyming pair in Hebrew that underscores the completeness of the suffering. The fools thought they were free; the storm reveals they were exposed.
28. The verbs yiqra'uneni ('they will call on me') and yeshacharuneni ('they will seek me early, diligently') echo the language of prayer — the fools will seek Wisdom the way a desperate person seeks God. But the answer will be silence. The verb shachar ('to seek early, to seek eagerly') implies dawn-time seeking, the most urgent and devoted kind of search. Even this will be too late.
29. The reason for Wisdom's silence is stated plainly: they hated knowledge and did not choose (bacharu, from bachar) the fear of the LORD. The verb bachar ('to choose, to select, to prefer') makes clear that the fear of the LORD is a decision, not a feeling. It must be chosen — and it was not.
30. The verb na'atsu ('they spurned, they treated with contempt') is stronger than mere rejection — it is active contempt, the deliberate disparagement of what Wisdom offered. The word appears in descriptions of Israel's rejection of God's covenant (Numbers 14:23, Deuteronomy 32:19).
31. The agricultural metaphor returns: actions are seeds, consequences are fruit, and the harvest must be consumed. The verb yisba'u ('they will be satisfied, stuffed, gorged') often describes pleasant fullness, but here it is ironic — they will be filled to overflowing with the consequences of their own mo'atsot ('plans, schemes, counsels'). They rejected Wisdom's counsel; they will be force-fed their own.
32. The irony of meshuvah ('turning away') is sharp: turning is exactly what Wisdom invited in verse 23 (tashuvu, 'turn back'). The same capacity — the ability to change direction — saves or destroys depending on which way one turns.
33. Wisdom's speech ends not with threat but with promise. The one who shome'a li ('listens to me, obeys me') will yishkan betach ('dwell in security'). The verb shakan ('to dwell, to settle, to tabernacle') evokes permanence — this is not temporary refuge but settled habitation. Sha'anani ('at ease, tranquil, undisturbed') is the positive version of the shalvah ('complacency') that destroys fools in verse 32. The same ease that kills the fool blesses the wise — the difference is not the comfort itself but whether it is grounded in wisdom or ignorance.

Summary: Proverbs 2 is a single, carefully structured conditional sentence spanning the entire chapter: 'If you seek wisdom (vv1-4), then you will understand the fear of the LORD (vv5-8), then you will understand righteousness (vv9-11), then wisdom will deliver you from the evil man (vv12-15) and from the forbidden woman (vv16-19), so that you may walk in the way of the good (vv20-22).' It is the most architecturally unified chapter in the book.

What Makes This Remarkable: The entire chapter is one extended 'if-then' construction — the longest conditional sentence in the Hebrew Bible. The protasis ('if') runs through verses 1-4 with five escalating verbs of seeking: receive, treasure, incline, apply, cry out, seek, search. The effort required to find wisdom is compared to mining for silver and searching for hidden treasure (v4). Wisdom is not lying on the surface; it must be excavated. The two threats from which wisdom delivers — the evil man (vv12-15) and the strange woman (vv16-19) — will dominate chapters 5-7. Here they receive their first introduction as twin dangers that can only be navigated by someone who has done the hard work of verses 1-4.

Translation Friction: The ishah zarah ('strange woman, foreign woman') of verse 16 has been interpreted as a literal adulteress, as a personification of Folly (the counterpart to Woman Wisdom), as a reference to foreign women who lead Israelites into idolatry, or as all three simultaneously. The ambiguity is likely intentional — the 'forbidden woman' represents every alluring path that leads away from wisdom and covenant faithfulness. The chapter's conditional structure also raises a question: is wisdom earned by human effort (vv1-4) or given by God (vv6)? The answer appears to be both — seeking is required, but what is found is a divine gift.

Connections: The mining metaphor in verse 4 connects to Job 28, which asks 'Where shall wisdom be found?' and describes mining operations that probe the earth's depths. The 'paths of the upright' language (v13, v20) echoes Psalm 1's two-ways theology. The 'strange woman' introduction anticipates the extended warnings in chapters 5, 6:20-35, and 7. The promise that God 'stores up sound wisdom for the upright' (v7) uses the same verb (tsaphan, 'to hide, to store') that describes treasure in verse 4 — God hides wisdom the way one hides treasure, and the seeker must dig.

¹My son, if you receive my words and treasure my commands within you,

²inclining your ear to wisdom and turning your heart toward understanding,

³yes, if you call out for insight and raise your voice for understanding,

⁴if you seek her like silver and search for her like hidden treasure —

⁵then you will understand the fear of the LORD and discover the knowledge of God.

⁶For the LORD gives wisdom;
from His mouth come knowledge and understanding.

⁷He stores up sound wisdom for the upright;
He is a shield to those who walk with integrity.

⁸He guards the paths of justice and watches over the way of His faithful ones.
⁹Then you will understand righteousness and justice and uprightness — every good path.
¹⁰For when wisdom enters your heart and knowledge becomes sweet to your soul, ¹¹discretion will guard you,
 understanding will watch over you, ¹²to deliver you from the way of the evil man,
 from the person who speaks perversity, ¹³who abandon paths of uprightness to walk in ways of darkness, ¹⁴who rejoice in doing evil and delight in the perversity of wickedness, ¹⁵whose paths are crooked and who are devious in their ways.
¹⁶to deliver you from the forbidden woman,
 from the outsider whose words are smooth, ¹⁷who abandons the companion of her youth and forgets the covenant of her God — ¹⁸For her house sinks down to death, and her paths lead to the shades.
¹⁹None who go to her return,
 nor do they reach the paths of life.
²⁰So that you may walk in the way of the good and keep to the paths of the righteous.
²¹For the upright will inhabit the land, and the blameless will remain in it.
²²But the wicked will be cut off from the land, and the treacherous will be uprooted from it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The massive conditional begins. The verb tiqqach ('receive, take, accept') requires active appropriation — not passive hearing but deliberate taking. The second verb titson ('treasure, store up, hide') from tsaphan describes the careful concealment of something valuable. Commands are not merely obeyed; they are guarded as personal treasure.
2. The body itself must participate: the ear (ozen) must be inclined and the heart (lev) must be turned. In Hebrew anthropology, the heart is not the seat of emotion but of intellect and will. Turning the heart toward tevunah ('understanding, insight') means directing the entire decision-making apparatus toward wisdom.

3. The seeking intensifies from passive receiving (v1) to active calling. The verb tiqua ('you call out, you cry') and the phrase titten qolekha ('you give your voice, you raise your voice') describe urgent vocalization — the seeker of wisdom is not quiet but vocal, not reserved but desperate. The same verbs described Woman Wisdom's public speech in 1:20-21; now the student mirrors her intensity.
4. The silver/treasure metaphor connects directly to Job 28:1-11, where the search for wisdom is compared at length to mining operations. Both texts insist that wisdom's value exceeds precious metals and that finding it requires extraordinary effort. The irony is that after all this human effort, verse 6 will reveal that wisdom ultimately comes from God's mouth.
5. The 'then' (az) marks the transition from condition to consequence. The reward of seeking is not mere information but understanding of yirat YHWH ('the fear of the LORD') — the very foundation announced in 1:7. The parallel term da'at Elohim ('knowledge of God') elevates the outcome beyond wisdom-as-skill to wisdom-as-relationship. To find wisdom is to find God.
6. The phrase 'from His mouth' anticipates the identification of wisdom with God's spoken word. In later Jewish interpretation, this verse became foundational for the concept of Torah as divine wisdom — what comes from God's mouth is instruction, and instruction is wisdom. The verse resolves the tension between seeking and receiving: both are necessary.
7. The verb yitspon ('He stores up, He hides in reserve') is the same verb the student used in verse 1 (titspon, 'treasure'). God and the student are doing the same thing — treasuring wisdom. Tushiyyah ('sound wisdom, effective counsel, resourcefulness') is a distinctive wisdom term that implies practical effectiveness, not merely theoretical knowledge. God is also magen ('shield') — wisdom provides defensive protection for those who walk in tom ('integrity, wholeness, blamelessness').
8. God acts as guardian of two things: orchot mishpat ('paths of justice') — the established routes of right judgment — and derekh chasidav ('the way of His faithful ones'). The chasid (from chesed, 'faithful love') is the person who lives in covenant loyalty. God does not merely provide wisdom and withdraw; He actively guards the path of those who walk in it.
9. The second 'then' (az) introduces the ethical consequence: the wisdom-seeker will discern tsedeq ('righteousness'), mishpat ('justice'), mesharim ('uprightness'), and kol ma'gal tov ('every good path'). The word ma'gal ('track, path, course') refers to a wagon track — a groove worn by repeated use. The good paths are not unknown; they are well-traveled routes that the wise have walked before.
10. Wisdom does not remain external instruction but tavo ('enters, comes into') the lev ('heart, mind'). Knowledge becomes na'am ('pleasant, sweet, delightful') to the nefesh ('soul, self, life'). The transformation is interior — wisdom moves from what you hear to what you are. The verb na'am ('to be pleasant') describes the subjective experience: the wise person does not merely accept knowledge as duty but finds it genuinely delightful.
11. Mezimmah ('discretion, foresight, planning') and tevunah ('understanding') are now personified as guards. The verbs tishmor ('will guard') and tintserekkah ('will watch over you, will preserve you') cast wisdom's attributes as active protectors. The one who sought wisdom (vv1-4) is now guarded by wisdom — the seeker has become the guarded.
12. The first threat: the derekh ra ('evil way') embodied in a man who speaks tahpukhot ('perversities, things turned upside down'). The root h-p-kh means 'to turn, to overturn' — perverted speech inverts reality, calling evil good and good evil. Wisdom protects not by avoiding such people but by seeing through their inversions.
13. The evil are defined by a deliberate turn: they ha'ozvim ('abandon, forsake') orchot yosher ('paths of uprightness, straight ways') to walk in darkhe choshekh ('ways of darkness'). The verb azav ('to abandon') implies prior acquaintance — they knew the straight path before they left it. Their evil is not ignorance but apostasy.
14. The hassmechim ('those who rejoice') and yagilu ('they exult') describe pleasure taken in evil — not reluctant sin but enthusiastic wickedness. The same vocabulary of joy (samach, gil) that the Psalms use for worship before God, these men apply to perversion. Their delight is a grotesque mirror of the wise person's delight in wisdom (v10).
15. The adjectives iqqeshim ('crooked, twisted') and nelozim ('devious, turning aside') contrast sharply with the yosher ('uprightness, straightness') of verse 13. The entire vocabulary of these verses operates on the metaphor of straight versus crooked roads — moral life is navigational, and the evil have taken every wrong turn available.
16. We render zarah as 'forbidden' rather than 'strange' to capture the prohibition implicit in the Hebrew. She is not merely unfamiliar but off-limits — her strangeness is a marker of danger, not mere foreignness. The term carries overtones of both sexual and covenantal transgression.
17. The forbidden woman has her own backstory of betrayal: she ha'ozevet ('abandons') the alluf ne'ureiha ('companion/husband of her youth') and shakhechah ('has forgotten') the berit Eloheiha ('covenant of her God'). The alluf ('companion, intimate friend, chief') likely refers to her husband. Her infidelity is simultaneously marital and covenantal — she has broken faith with both her husband and her God. The verb shakhach ('to forget') implies not memory failure but willful disregard.
18. The geography of the forbidden woman is vertical: her house shachah ('sinks, inclines, bows down') toward mavet ('death'), and her paths lead to the refa'im ('the shades, the dead, the inhabitants of the underworld'). The refa'im are the diminished dead of Sheol — those who have lost vitality and dwell in shadow. Her house is not a destination but a descent. Every step toward her is a step downward.
19. The finality is absolute: kol ba'eiha lo yeshuvun ('all who enter her do not return'). The verb shuv ('return') that could have saved them (cf. 1:23) is now denied — the descent is irreversible. They also lo yassigu orchot chayyim ('do not attain the paths of life'). The orchot chayyim ('paths of life') are the opposite of the forbidden woman's paths to death. The young man who enters her house has left the intersection where life and death diverge and has passed the point of no return.

20. The positive purpose emerges: wisdom's protection from the evil man and the forbidden woman exists lema'an ('so that, in order that') you can walk the derekh tovim ('way of good people'). The righteous path is not merely the absence of evil but its own positive reality — a road with company, a way walked by the tsaddiqim ('righteous ones').
21. The promise of dwelling in the erets ('land') echoes the covenantal promise to Abraham and the Deuteronomic theology of land as blessing. The yesharim ('upright') yishkenu ('will dwell, will inhabit') and the temimim ('blameless, whole') yivvateru ('will remain, will be left'). Possession of the land is not a political promise but a moral one — those aligned with God's order will endure.
22. The chapter ends with the counter-destiny: resha'im ('the wicked') yikkaretu ('will be cut off') and bogdim ('the treacherous, the faithless') yissechu ('will be torn out, uprooted'). The verb karath ('to cut off') is the language of covenant severance — the same verb used for making (literally 'cutting') a covenant is used for being cut off from its blessings. The bogdim (from bagad, 'to deal treacherously') are covenant-breakers, those who betray trust. Their removal from the land mirrors the forbidden woman's descent to death — both end in exclusion from life's blessings.

Summary: Proverbs 3 is a sustained father-to-son exhortation structured in paired commands and promises. The first half (vv1-12) urges trust in the LORD over self-reliance, culminating in a theology of divine discipline. The central section (vv13-20) erupts into a hymn praising wisdom's incomparable value — she is more precious than rubies, she holds life and wealth in her hands, and she was the instrument through which God founded the earth. The final section (vv21-35) returns to practical instruction: guard sound wisdom, do not withhold good from your neighbor, and do not envy the violent.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 5-6 ('Trust in the LORD with all your heart and do not lean on your own understanding') is among the most quoted passages in all of Scripture. Its original context is not generic piety but a specific contrast: the son is being offered two epistemological foundations — his own understanding (binah) or the LORD's direction. The command to trust with 'all your heart' (kol libbeka) is not emotional sentimentality but total cognitive commitment. The hymn to wisdom in vv13-20 is remarkable for its cosmological claims: wisdom was the means by which God established the heavens and the earth (vv19-20). This anticipates the great speech of chapter 8 and positions wisdom not as a human achievement but as a divine attribute embedded in the structure of creation.

Translation Friction: The promise that honoring the LORD with firstfruits will result in overflowing barns (vv9-10) raises the prosperity-gospel question that haunts all wisdom literature. Is this a guaranteed transaction? The rest of the biblical canon — particularly Job, Ecclesiastes, and the lament psalms — will complicate this retributive theology severely. The divine discipline passage (vv11-12) quoted in Hebrews 12:5-6 sits uncomfortably in modern sensibilities that resist the idea of God inflicting suffering as correction. The Hebrew text is clear: the LORD rebukes and disciplines those He loves, as a father does a son in whom he delights.

Connections: Proverbs 3:5-6 is echoed in Jeremiah 9:23-24 (do not boast in your own wisdom). The divine discipline teaching (vv11-12) is quoted directly in Hebrews 12:5-6 and forms the theological basis for the New Testament's understanding of suffering as formation. The cosmological wisdom hymn (vv19-20) connects to Psalm 104, Job 38, and Proverbs 8:22-31, all of which describe God's creative acts in wisdom. The 'tree of life' image (v18) recalls Genesis 2-3 and reappears in Revelation 22:2.

¹My son, do not forget my instruction, and let your heart guard my commands,

²for length of days and years of life and well-being they will add to you.

³Do not let faithful love and truthfulness abandon you;
bind them around your neck,
write them on the tablet of your heart.

⁴So you will find favor and good repute in the eyes of God and of people.

⁵Trust in the LORD with all your heart and do not lean on your own understanding.

⁶In all your ways know Him,
and He will make your paths straight.

⁷Do not be wise in your own eyes;
fear the LORD and turn away from evil.

⁸It will be healing for your body and refreshment for your bones.

⁹Honor the LORD with your wealth and with the firstfruits of all your produce,

¹⁰and your barns will be filled to overflowing and your vats will burst with new wine.

¹¹My son, do not reject the LORD's discipline, and do not loathe His correction,

¹²for the LORD corrects the one He loves,
as a father the son in whom he delights.

¹³How fortunate is the person who finds wisdom,
the one who obtains understanding!

¹⁴For her profit is better than the profit of silver, and her yield surpasses fine gold.

¹⁵She is more precious than corals, and nothing you desire can compare with her.

¹⁶Long life is in her right hand;
in her left hand are riches and honor.

¹⁷Her ways are ways of delight, and all her paths are peace.

¹⁸She is a tree of life to those who take hold of her,
and those who hold her fast are called fortunate.

¹⁹By wisdom the LORD laid the earth's foundations;
by understanding He established the heavens.

²⁰By His knowledge the deep waters broke open,
and the skies drip down dew.

²¹My son, do not let these slip from your sight;
preserve sound wisdom and foresight,

²²and they will be life for your soul and grace for your neck.

²³Then you will walk your way in safety, and your foot will not stumble.

²⁴When you lie down, you will not be afraid;
you will lie down, and your sleep will be sweet.

²⁵Do not fear sudden disaster or the ruin of the wicked when it comes,

²⁶for the LORD will be your confidence, and He will keep your foot from the snare.

²⁷Do not withhold good from those who deserve it when it is in your power to act.

²⁸Do not say to your neighbor, 'Go and come back;
tomorrow I will give it' — when you have it with you.

²⁹Do not plot harm against your neighbor while he lives trustingly beside you.

³⁰Do not quarrel with anyone without cause,
if they have done you no harm.

³¹Do not envy the violent man,
and do not choose any of his ways,

³²for the devious are detestable to the LORD,
but His intimate counsel is with the upright.

³³The LORD's curse is on the house of the wicked,
but He blesses the dwelling of the righteous.

³⁴Toward the scoffers He is scornful, but to the humble He gives grace.

³⁵The wise will inherit honor, but fools carry away shame.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Torati ('my instruction') is the father's personal torah — not the Mosaic Law but the authoritative teaching of a parent. The verb tishkach ('forget') is more than memory failure; in Hebrew to forget is to disregard, to treat as irrelevant. The heart (lev) must yittsor ('guard, keep, preserve') the commands — active retention, not passive recall.
2. The promised benefits — orekh yamim ('length of days'), shenot chayyim ('years of life'), and shalom ('peace, wholeness, well-being') — represent the full wisdom package: long life and comprehensive flourishing. Shalom is not merely the absence of conflict but the presence of completeness.

3. Chesed ve-emet ('faithful love and truthfulness') is a hendiadys — two words expressing one concept: reliable, covenant faithfulness. The instruction to bind them on the neck and write them on the heart's tablet echoes Deuteronomy 6:8-9 and anticipates Jeremiah 31:33, where God promises to write the new covenant on Israel's heart. The physical imagery (binding, writing) insists that these are not abstract values but embodied practices.
4. Chen ('favor, grace, charm') and sekhel tov ('good understanding, good judgment, good repute') are the public rewards of faithful love and truthfulness. The dual audience — be-eyne Elohim ve-adam ('in the eyes of God and of humanity') — means that genuine covenant character wins approval both vertically and horizontally.
5. The word binah ('understanding') is deliberately chosen. The book has urged the son to seek binah (2:2-3), and now it warns him not to lean on it. The apparent contradiction is the point: pursue understanding passionately, but never mistake your understanding for God's. The wisest posture is to be deeply knowledgeable and deeply humble about what you know.
6. The verb da'ehu ('know Him') is not merely 'acknowledge' but the deep, relational knowing that yada implies throughout Scripture. Be-khol derakhekha ('in all your ways') means in every sphere of life, every decision, every path. The promise — yeyyasher orchotekha ('He will make straight your paths') — uses yashar ('to be straight, to make level'). God does not merely point the way; He straightens the road itself. The crooked paths of the wicked (2:15) are contrasted with the straightened paths of the trusting.
7. The warning against being chakham be-eynekha ('wise in your own eyes') continues the theme of verse 5. Self-assessed wisdom is the most dangerous kind — it forecloses the possibility of correction. The antidote is twofold: fear the LORD (yere et YHWH) and sur mera ('turn from evil'). The second is the practical expression of the first.
8. The benefits are physical: rifu't ('healing, health') for the shor ('navel, body, flesh') and shiquy ('drink, moisture, refreshment') for the atsamot ('bones'). Hebrew thought does not separate body and spirit — what is good for the soul is good for the body. Wisdom heals the whole person.
9. The verb kabbed ('honor, give weight to') applied to the LORD means to treat Him as the heaviest reality in your economic life. The instruction to give from hon ('wealth, substance') and from reshit kol tevu'atekha ('the firstfruits of all your produce') reflects the Deuteronomic firstfruits offering — the first and best portion goes to God before the farmer knows how the rest of the harvest will turn out. Giving firstfruits is an act of trust.
10. The promise of full asamim ('barns, granaries') and overflowing yeqavim ('wine vats') represents agricultural abundance. The verb yifrotsu ('will burst, will break through') suggests excess beyond containment. This is wisdom literature's retributive principle at its most optimistic — generosity to God produces abundance from God. The rest of Scripture will nuance this significantly.
11. After the promise of abundance comes the reality of discipline. The verb tim'as ('reject, refuse, despise') and taqots ('loathe, feel disgust, be weary of') describe two responses to suffering: outright rejection and slow-burning resentment. Neither is acceptable. The LORD's musar ('discipline') and tokhachto ('His correction, His reproof') are not punishment but formation — the same musar that opens the book in 1:2 now comes directly from God.
12. The verb ratsah ('delights') is the same verb used for God's acceptance of sacrifice (Leviticus 1:4). The son whom God disciplines is the son God has accepted — discipline is evidence of inclusion, not rejection. This reframes all suffering within the covenant: it may hurt, but it comes from a Father who is pleased with you.
13. Ashre ('how fortunate') opens a new section — a hymn to wisdom that runs through verse 20. The same exclamation that opens the Psalter (Psalm 1:1) now celebrates the person who matsa chokmah ('has found wisdom'). The verb yafiq ('brings forth, draws out, obtains') suggests that understanding (tevunah) is not merely stumbled upon but extracted through effort, like water from a well.
14. The commercial metaphor compares wisdom's sachrah ('trade-profit, merchandise') to silver and her tevu'atah ('yield, income, produce') to charutz ('fine gold, pure gold'). The language of trade runs throughout Proverbs — wisdom is an investment with returns that exceed all precious metals.
15. Peninim ('corals' or 'pearls' or 'rubies' — the exact identification is uncertain) represents the highest category of precious material. The claim that kol chafatsekha ('all your desires, all your delights') cannot equal wisdom eliminates every rival. Job 28:18 makes the identical comparison, and the 'woman of strength' in Proverbs 31:10 is also valued above peninim.
16. Wisdom is personified as a woman extending both hands: the right (yeminah) holds orekh yamim ('length of days') and the left (semo'lah) holds osher ve-khavod ('riches and honor'). The two hands offer comprehensive blessing — long life and prosperous life. In Egyptian art, the goddess Ma'at (order/truth) is similarly depicted with life in one hand and wealth in the other, suggesting a shared ancient Near Eastern tradition.
17. Darkheiha darkhe no'am ('her ways are ways of pleasantness, delight'). The word no'am ('pleasantness, sweetness, beauty') describes the subjective experience of walking wisdom's road — it is not grim duty but genuine delight. Ve-khol netivoteiha shalom ('and all her paths are peace/wholeness') uses shalom in its fullest sense: completeness, harmony, well-being. Every path wisdom offers leads to flourishing.
18. The 'tree of life' identification is one of the most theologically loaded images in Proverbs. It suggests that the way back to Eden runs through wisdom — that the knowledge Adam and Eve seized in violation of God's command is now offered freely to those who fear the LORD. Wisdom restores what transgression destroyed.
19. The hymn climaxes with a cosmological claim: YHWH be-chokmah yasad erets ('the LORD by wisdom founded the earth'). The verb yasad ('to found, to establish, to lay a foundation') describes the earth's creation as an architectural act — God built the world on a foundation, and that foundation was wisdom. The parallel — konen shamayim bitvunah ('He established the heavens by understanding') — uses konen ('to establish, to set firmly') for the heavens. Wisdom is not merely a human virtue but a divine instrument of creation.

- 20. God's da'at ('knowledge') is the agent by which tehomot ('the deeps, the primordial waters') nivqa'u ('were split open, burst forth'). This recalls both Genesis 1 (the separation of waters) and Genesis 7:11 (the fountains of the great deep breaking open in the flood). The shechaqim ('clouds, skies') yir'afu ('drip, drop') tal ('dew'). Creation and ongoing provision are both acts of divine wisdom.
- 21. The father resumes direct instruction after the hymn. The verb yaluzu ('slip away, depart, turn aside') warns against letting wisdom drift out of view. Tushiyyah ('sound wisdom, effective counsel') and mezimmah ('foresight, discretion, planning') are the practical applications of the cosmic wisdom just celebrated.
- 22. Chayyim ('life') for the nefesh ('soul, self') and chen ('grace, charm, favor') for the gargerot ('neck, throat'). The ornamental imagery from 1:9 returns — wisdom adorns as it protects.
- 23. The betach ('safety, security') that wisdom provides is here physical: your foot (raglekha) will not tiggof ('stumble, strike against'). The imagery is of a traveler walking confidently on a clear path — the contrast to the crooked, dark ways of the wicked in chapter 2.
- 24. The peace extends into the night: no fear at bedtime, and sleep itself will be arevah ('sweet, pleasant, agreeable'). In the ancient world, night was a time of genuine danger — from bandits, animals, and spiritual threats. Freedom from nocturnal fear is a significant promise.
- 25. Pachad pit'om ('sudden terror, unexpected disaster') and sho'at resha'im ('the ruin/devastation of the wicked') describe two kinds of calamity: random and moral. The wise person need fear neither, because the LORD is their confidence (v26).
- 26. YHWH yihyeh be-khislekha ('the LORD will be your confidence'). The word kesel ('confidence, trust, loins, folly') is used here in its positive sense — the LORD Himself becomes the foundation of your security. He will also guard your foot from being lakhed ('captured, caught, ensnared'). The snare imagery connects to the forbidden woman whose house descends to death (2:18-19).
- 27. The shift from theological reflection to practical ethics. The verb timna ('withhold, hold back, restrain') applied to tov ('good') makes the obligation clear: if you can do good and choose not to, you have done wrong. The phrase bihyot le-el yadkha ('when it is in the power of your hand') limits the obligation to actual capacity — you are responsible for the good you can do, not the good you cannot.
- 28. The specific application of verse 27: delayed generosity when the resources are already available. The re'a ('neighbor, companion, fellow') asks and receives a dismissal — lekha vashuv ('go and return') — when the needed thing is already ittakh ('with you, in your possession'). Proverbs treats delayed generosity as a form of cruelty.
- 29. The verb tacharosh ('devise, plot, plow') combined with ra'ah ('evil, harm') describes premeditated malice. The betrayal is amplified by the neighbor's trust: hu yoshev lavetach ittakh ('he dwells in security with you'). To harm someone who trusts you is to violate the fundamental social covenant that makes community possible.
- 30. Tariv ('contend, quarrel, bring a lawsuit against') combined with chinnam ('without cause, for nothing, gratuitously') — the same word that described the sinners' gratuitous violence in 1:11. Unprovoked conflict is a form of the same evil. The condition im lo gemalekha ra'ah ('if he has not repaid you evil') implies that grievance may sometimes justify confrontation — but only when there is actual cause.
- 31. The ish chamas ('man of violence') is someone who succeeds through force. The verb teqanne ('envy, be jealous of') acknowledges the temptation: the violent may prosper, and their prosperity invites imitation. The command not to choose (tivchar) his ways echoes 1:15 — every path begins with a choice.
- 32. The naloz ('crooked, devious person') is a to'avat YHWH ('an abomination to the LORD') — a term of absolute moral revulsion. In contrast, the yesharim ('upright ones') share God's sod ('intimate counsel, secret counsel, inner circle'). The sod is not merely a secret but a circle of trusted confidants. God shares His deepest counsel with the upright — they are His inner circle.
- 33. The me'erat YHWH ('curse of the LORD') in the wicked person's house and the berakhah on the neveh tsaddiqim ('dwelling of the righteous') create a stark household contrast. The word neveh ('dwelling, pasture, habitation') evokes a settled, peaceful homestead. The blessing and curse are not arbitrary but flow from the moral character of the inhabitants.
- 34. God mirrors back what He receives: la-letsim hu yalits ('to the scoffers He scoffs') — the same root l-ts-ts used for the scoffers' behavior is applied to God's response. But la-anavim yitten chen ('to the humble He gives grace'). This verse is quoted in James 4:6 and 1 Peter 5:5: 'God opposes the proud but gives grace to the humble.' The anavim ('humble, lowly, afflicted') are not merely modest but those who have been brought low and know their dependence on God.
- 35. The chapter ends with the final contrast: chakhamim ('the wise') yinchalu kavod ('will inherit honor, glory') while kesilim ('fools') merim qalon ('lift up, carry away, are exalted in — shame, disgrace'). The verb merim can mean either 'carry away' or 'are exalted' — the irony is that fools are 'promoted' to disgrace. Their advancement is their humiliation.

Summary: Proverbs 4 contains three distinct father-to-son speeches. The first (vv1-9) recalls the father's own education by his father, creating a three-generation chain of wisdom transmission: grandfather to father to son. The second (vv10-19) contrasts the path of the wise with the path of the wicked using the most vivid light-and-darkness imagery in the book. The third (vv20-27) turns inward, demanding that the son guard his heart above all else, because from it flow the springs of life.

What Makes This Remarkable: The three-generation chain of instruction in verses 1-9 is unique in Proverbs. The father says, 'When I was a son with my father, he taught me' — and then quotes his own father's words. The reader hears not one voice but two, layered together across time. Wisdom is not invented by each generation but received from the previous one and transmitted to the next. The path imagery in verses 10-19 reaches its apex in verse 18: 'The path of the righteous is like the light of dawn, growing brighter until full day.' This is one of the most beautiful sentences in the Hebrew Bible — and its force comes from the contrast with verse 19, where the way of the wicked is 'deep darkness' in which they cannot even see what makes them stumble. Verse 23 — 'Above all else, guard your heart, for from it flow the springs of life' — is the single most important anthropological statement in Proverbs. The heart (lev) is the command center of the entire person, and its protection is the non-negotiable priority.

Translation Friction: The idealized picture of wisdom transmission — father to son to grandson, smooth and unbroken — does not match the reality of most families, either in ancient Israel or today. Many of the Psalms and prophetic texts acknowledge that the chain breaks, that parents fail, and that children rebel. Proverbs 4 presents the ideal without acknowledging the fractures, which is characteristic of wisdom literature's tendency toward clean patterns. The command to guard the heart (v23) also raises the question of how one guards something that is, according to Jeremiah 17:9, 'deceitful above all things and beyond cure.' The tension between Proverbs' confidence in human moral agency and Jeremiah's suspicion of the human heart is never fully resolved within the Old Testament.

Connections: The three-generation instruction chain connects to Deuteronomy 6:7 ('teach them diligently to your children') and Psalm 78:1-8, which describes the deliberate transmission of God's acts across generations. The light-of-dawn image (v18) is echoed in Isaiah 58:8 ('your light will break forth like the dawn') and 2 Samuel 23:4 (David's last words about a righteous ruler). The heart-guarding command (v23) anticipates Jesus' teaching that what comes out of the heart defiles a person (Mark 7:20-23) and Paul's instruction to guard what has been entrusted (2 Timothy 1:14).

¹Listen, sons, to a father's discipline, and pay attention, so you may gain understanding.

²For I give you sound teaching;
do not abandon my instruction.

³For I was a son to my father, tender and precious in my mother's sight.

⁴He taught me and said to me,
'Let your heart hold fast to my words.
Keep my commands and live.

⁵Acquire wisdom, acquire understanding!
Do not forget, and do not turn from the words of my mouth.

⁶Do not abandon her, and she will protect you;
love her, and she will guard you.

⁷The beginning of wisdom: acquire wisdom!
And with all you acquire, acquire understanding.

⁸Cherish her, and she will lift you up;
she will honor you when you embrace her.

⁹She will set a garland of grace on your head;
a crown of splendor she will bestow on you.'

¹⁰Listen, my son, and receive my words, and the years of your life will be many.

¹¹I have directed you in the way of wisdom;
I have guided you along straight paths.

¹²When you walk, your stride will not be hindered;
and when you run, you will not stumble.

¹³Hold fast to discipline — do not let go!
Guard her, for she is your life.

¹⁴Do not enter the path of the wicked, and do not walk in the way of evildoers.

¹⁵Avoid it — do not travel on it;
turn away from it and pass on.

¹⁶For they cannot sleep unless they have done harm;
their sleep is stolen unless they have made someone stumble.

¹⁷For wickedness is the bread they eat and drink the wine of violence.

¹⁸But the path of the righteous is like the light of dawn, shining brighter and brighter until full day.

¹⁹The way of the wicked is like deep darkness;
they do not know what makes them stumble.

²⁰My son, pay attention to my words;
incline your ear to my sayings.

²¹Do not let them slip from your eyes;
keep them deep within your heart.

²²For they are life to those who find them and healing for the whole body.

²³Above all that you guard, guard your heart, for from it flow the springs of life.

²⁴Put away from you crooked speech, and keep devious talk far from you.

²⁵Let your eyes look straight ahead, and your gaze be fixed directly before you.

²⁶Make level the path for your feet,
and all your ways will be sure.

²⁷Do not turn to the right or to the left;
remove your foot from evil.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The plural banim ('sons, children') expands the audience beyond the single 'my son' of previous chapters. Musar av ('discipline of a father') is presented as a category of knowledge worth having. The verb haqshivu ('pay attention, listen carefully') from qashav demands focused hearing, not mere auditory reception.
2. Leqach tov ('good teaching, sound learning') and torati ('my instruction') are offered as reliable, tested goods. The verb ta'azovu ('abandon, forsake') warns against the apostasy that begins not with dramatic rebellion but with gradual neglect.
3. The father reveals his own backstory: he too was rakh ('tender, soft, young, vulnerable') and yachid ('only one, beloved, precious') before his mother. The shift to autobiography creates intimacy — the father is not a distant authority but someone who once sat where the son sits now, receiving instruction from his own parents.
4. Now the grandfather speaks through the father's memory. The imperative vechyeh ('and live!') is stark — obedience to wisdom is not optional enrichment but the condition of survival. The verb yitmakh ('hold fast, support, sustain') describes the heart gripping the father's words like a hand gripping a lifeline.
5. The doubled imperative qeneh ('acquire, buy, purchase') treats wisdom and binah ('understanding') as commodities to be pursued and bought at any price. The verb qanah implies exchange — you must give something up to get wisdom. The grandfather's voice continues with urgency: forget nothing, deviate from nothing.
6. Wisdom (feminine in Hebrew) is again personified as a woman deserving loyalty. The reciprocal structure is important: do not abandon her — she will protect you; love her — she will guard you. The relationship between the wise person and wisdom mirrors a covenant bond: faithfulness produces protection.
7. The apparent circularity of 'the beginning of wisdom is: acquire wisdom' is not tautology but insistence. Wisdom begins with the resolve to seek it. Without that initial commitment, no amount of intelligence or opportunity will produce wisdom. The choice precedes the achievement.
8. The verb salselehah ('cherish, exalt, esteem highly') is rare and may derive from salal ('to heap up, to lift'). The imagery of embracing (techabbegennah) wisdom continues the marital metaphor — wisdom is a partner to be held close, and she reciprocates with honor (tekhabbedkha, 'she will honor you, give you weight').
9. The grandfather's quoted speech ends with the image of wisdom crowning the faithful student. The livyat chen ('garland of grace') from 1:9 returns, now joined by ateret tif'eret ('crown of splendor, glorious crown'). Wisdom's reward is public honor — the crown is visible to the community.
10. The second speech begins with a return to the singular 'my son.' The promise of shenot chayyim ('years of life') connects back to 3:2 — long life is the consistent reward of heeding wisdom.
11. The father claims to have horetikha ('directed you, instructed you') — from yarah, the same root as torah. He has also hidrakhtikha ('led you, caused you to walk') in ma'gele yosher ('tracks of uprightness'). The ma'gal ('track, rut') is a worn path — the father has placed the son on well-established routes, not experimental ones.
12. Two speeds of travel — walking and running — are both covered by wisdom's protection. The verb yetsar ('be constricted, narrowed, hindered') describes a path too tight for normal movement. Wisdom clears the way so that even at full speed (taruts, 'you run'), there is no stumbling (tikhashel).
13. The imperative hachazeg ('hold fast, grip tightly') combined with al teref ('do not let go, do not relax your grip') conveys desperate urgency. The reason is absolute: ki hi chayyekha ('for she is your life'). Discipline is not supplementary to life; it is life itself. Without it, the son dies.

14. The negative commands mirror the positive ones: just as the son was guided onto straight paths (v11), he must now refuse the orach resha'im ('path of the wicked') and derekh ra'im ('way of evil men'). The verb te'asher ('step forward, walk, proceed') is from the same root as ashre ('fortunate') — there is no fortune on this road.
15. Four imperatives in rapid succession: pera'ehu ('avoid it, let it alone'), al ta'avov bo ('do not pass through it'), seteh me'alav ('turn aside from it'), and avor ('pass on, go your way'). The staccato commands convey urgency — do not linger near this road, do not even slow down to look at it.
16. The wicked suffer from an inverted insomnia: they cannot rest until they have done evil. Their shnatam ('their sleep') is nigzelah ('robbed, stolen') unless they have caused someone to yakhshilu ('stumble, fall'). Evil has become their sedative. The verse diagnoses a condition — addiction to malice — that makes the wicked perpetual threats to others.
17. Wickedness and violence have become their daily sustenance — lechem resha ('bread of wickedness') and yen chamasim ('wine of violence'). The food metaphor implies that evil nourishes them the way bread and wine nourish the body. They feed on harm. The imagery inverts the normal provision of God, who gives bread and wine as blessings.
18. The phrase 'light of dawn' rather than 'shining light' preserves the temporal metaphor — this is not a spotlight but a sunrise, a process that unfolds over time. The righteous life is not static but dynamic, not a fixed state but a trajectory.
19. The contrast is devastating. Against the crescendo of dawn light stands afelah ('deep darkness, thick gloom') — not ordinary night but impenetrable blackness. The final clause is the most damning: lo yade'u bammeh yikkashelu ('they do not know what they stumble over'). The wicked do not merely fall; they fall without understanding why. Their ignorance of their own destruction is total. The darkness is not just around them but inside them.
20. The third speech begins with familiar imperative language: haqshivah ('pay attention') and hat oznekha ('incline your ear'). The body must cooperate — ears must be physically turned toward the speaker.
21. The words must not yallizu ('slip away, depart') from the eyes and must be kept betokh levavekha ('in the midst of your heart, at the center of your inner life'). The dual retention — visual and internal — means both constant attention and deep internalization.
22. The father's words are chayyim ('life') and marpe ('healing, remedy, cure') for all flesh. The claim is holistic: wisdom heals the entire person, body included. The connection between right living and physical health runs throughout Proverbs, reflecting the Hebrew integration of moral and physical well-being.
23. We render mikkol mishmar as 'above all that you guard' to preserve the comparative force of the Hebrew — the son is not told to guard his heart instead of other things but more than other things. The heart is the highest-priority asset in the wise person's security system.
23. The lev in Hebrew encompasses intellect, will, emotion, and moral judgment — it is the entire inner person. English 'heart' tends toward emotion only, which is too narrow. The Hebrew command is to guard the command center, not just the feelings.
24. From the heart (v23) to the mouth (v24): iqqeshut peh ('crookedness of mouth') and lezut sefatayim ('deviousness of lips') are the first expressions of a corrupted heart. The progression from heart to speech to eyes to feet (vv23-27) traces the outward flow of life from its source.
25. From speech to sight: the eyes (eynekha) must look lenokhach ('straight ahead, to what is in front') and the eyelids (af'appekha, used poetically for the gaze) must yayshiru ('be straight, be directed') negdekha ('before you, in front of you'). The command is for focused, undistracted vision — no sideways glances at the paths of the wicked.
26. The verb palles ('make level, weigh, ponder, prepare') has construction overtones — prepare the road before you walk it. The ma'gal raglekha ('track of your feet') must be leveled in advance. The result: kol derakhekha yikkonu ('all your ways will be established, firm, sure'). Deliberate preparation produces stable paths.
27. The chapter ends with the Deuteronomic formula: al tet yamin usmol ('do not turn right or left') — the identical instruction given to Israel regarding the Law (Deuteronomy 5:32, 17:11, 28:14) and to Joshua (Joshua 1:7). The son is to walk wisdom's path with the same unwavering directness demanded of Israel at Sinai. The final imperative — haser raglekha mera ('remove your foot from evil') — is physical: take your foot off that path. Now.

Summary: Proverbs 5 is the first extended warning against the forbidden woman (ishah zarah), whom chapter 2 introduced briefly. The father warns his son that her lips drip honey but her end is bitter as wormwood (vv1-6). He commands the son to stay far from her door (vv7-14), then pivots dramatically to a celebration of marital love: 'Drink water from your own cistern' (vv15-20). The chapter closes with the theological declaration that God sees all paths and that the wicked are trapped by their own sins (vv21-23).

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter's most striking feature is its pivot from warning to celebration. After fourteen verses of alarm about the forbidden woman, the father does not simply say 'avoid adultery.' Instead, he offers a positive alternative that is frankly erotic: 'Let her breasts satisfy you at all times; be intoxicated always with her love' (v19). Proverbs does not treat sexual desire as the enemy — it treats misdirected sexual desire as the enemy. The answer to the forbidden woman is not abstinence but the right woman. The water imagery of verses 15-18 (cistern, well, springs, streams) is deliberately ambiguous, functioning simultaneously as metaphor for sexual pleasure and for the exclusive, life-giving nature of faithful marriage. The 'spreading springs in the streets' of verse 16 may be a warning against scattering one's intimacy publicly rather than reserving it for one's own household.

Translation Friction: The chapter's focus on the male perspective — warning a son about a dangerous woman — can feel one-sided. No corresponding warning is given from a mother to a daughter about dangerous men. This reflects the patriarchal context of the text's composition, not a theological endorsement of the imbalance. Additionally, the forbidden woman is presented primarily as a threat to the man, with little attention to her own exploitation or suffering. Modern readers will want to read against the grain here, recognizing that the 'forbidden woman' is also a person with a story the text does not tell.

Connections: The honey-and-wormwood contrast (vv3-4) echoes the Song of Solomon's celebration of erotic love (Song 4:11, 'your lips drip honey') while inverting it — what Song celebrates as beautiful within commitment, Proverbs marks as lethal outside it. The water/cistern/well imagery connects to Song 4:12-15, where the beloved is a 'garden locked, a fountain sealed.' The theological conclusion (vv21-23) echoes Job 34:21 ('God's eyes are on the ways of a person') and anticipates Hebrews 4:13 ('nothing is hidden from His sight').

- 1My son, pay attention to my wisdom;
incline your ear to my understanding,
- 2so that you may preserve foresight and your lips may guard knowledge.
- 3For the lips of the forbidden woman drip honey, and her mouth is smoother than oil,
- 4but her end tastes bitter as wormwood,
sharp as a double-edged sword.
- 5Her feet descend toward death;
her steps take hold of Sheol.
- 6She does not ponder the path of life;
her ways wander, and she does not know it.
- 7So now, sons, listen to me,
and do not turn aside from the words of my mouth.

⁸Keep your way far from her;
do not go near the door of her house,

⁹or you will give your vigor to others and your years to the merciless,

¹⁰or strangers will feast on your strength and your toil will end up in a foreigner's house,

¹¹and you will groan at the end,
when your flesh and body are consumed,

¹²and you will say, 'How I hated discipline!
How my heart despised correction!

¹³I did not listen to the voice of my teachers or incline my ear to my instructors.

¹⁴I was on the verge of complete ruin in the midst of the gathered assembly.'

¹⁵Drink water from your own cistern, flowing water from your own well.

¹⁶Should your springs overflow into the street,
your streams of water into the public squares?

¹⁷Let them be for you alone, and not for strangers alongside you.

¹⁸Let your fountain be blessed, and take joy in the wife of your youth —

¹⁹a graceful doe, a lovely deer.
Let her breasts satisfy you at all times;
be intoxicated always by her love.

²⁰Why then, my son, would you be intoxicated by a forbidden woman and embrace the bosom of an outsider?

²¹For a person's ways are before the eyes of the LORD, and He weighs all their paths.

²²The wicked person's own iniquities will trap him, and he will be held fast by the ropes of his sin.

²³He will die for lack of discipline, and in the magnitude of his folly he will go astray.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The father claims the wisdom as his own — chokhmatai ('my wisdom') and tevnati ('my understanding'). He does not present himself as merely relaying tradition but as one who has internalized it and now speaks from experience.

2. Mezimmot ('foresight, discretion, plans') must be guarded, and the lips must preserve da'at ('knowledge'). The mention of lips anticipates the chapter's theme: the forbidden woman's lips drip honey (v3), and the son's own lips must guard what is true rather than swallow what is sweet but deadly.
3. The same word nofet ('dripping honey') appears in Song of Solomon 4:11 as a celebration: 'Your lips drip honey, my bride.' The identical language used positively in Song and negatively in Proverbs shows that the issue is not the sweetness itself but whether it belongs to a context of covenant faithfulness or covenant betrayal.
4. The acharitah ('her end, her outcome, her afterward') — the part you experience after the honey — is marah ka-la'anah ('bitter as wormwood'). La'anah (Artemisia absinthium) is the bitterest plant known in the region, used metaphorically throughout Scripture for the most extreme bitterness (Lamentations 3:15, 19; Amos 5:7). Her end is also chaddah ke-cherev piyyot ('sharp as a two-edged sword'). The sword piyyot ('of mouths') has edges on both sides — it cuts coming and going. From honey to wormwood, from oil to a blade: the trajectory of the forbidden woman's allure.
5. The downward geography from 2:18 returns: ragleiha yordot mavet ('her feet descend to death') and she'ol tse'adeiha yitmokhu ('her steps grip Sheol'). The verb yitmokhu ('take hold, grasp, support') means her steps are anchored in Sheol — she is not sliding toward death but walking steadily into it, and taking her companions with her.
6. The verse is ambiguous in Hebrew — the subject could be the forbidden woman or the young man she seduces. We read it as describing the woman herself: she does not palles ('make level, ponder, weigh') the orach chayyim ('path of life'). Her ma'geloteiha ('her tracks, her paths') na'u ('wander, stagger, sway'). The final lo teda ('she does not know') is devastating — she is unaware of her own wandering, stumbling in the same darkness as the wicked in 4:19.
7. The shift to plural banim ('sons') broadens the audience. The urgency of ve-attah ('and now, so then') marks the transition from description to direct command.
8. The command is geographic: harcheq ('make distant, keep far') your path from hers, and al tiqrav ('do not draw near') the petach beitah ('entrance of her house'). Proximity is the precondition for sin — the father does not trust the son's resolve at close range. Distance is the strategy.
9. Hodekha ('your splendor, your vigor, your prime') given to acherim ('others, strangers') and shenoteykha ('your years') given to the akhzari ('the cruel, the merciless'). The consequences of sexual infidelity are not merely moral but economic and physical — the adulterer's best years and energy are consumed by those who have no loyalty to him.
10. The economic devastation continues: zarim ('strangers') will yisbe'u ('be satisfied, feast on') your koach ('strength, wealth, substance') and your atsavakha ('your toil, your painful labor') will enrich beit nokhri ('the house of a foreigner'). Adultery is not a private indulgence but a wealth transfer to those who do not love you.
11. The verb nahamta ('you will groan, roar, moan') describes anguished regret. The timing is be-acharitekha ('at your end, in your final days') — when the consequences have fully matured. The consumption of basar ('flesh') and she'er ('body, kin, flesh') may refer to disease, poverty, or simply the physical devastation that accompanies a wasted life.
12. The imagined lament echoes the vocabulary of 1:7 — the fool despised (na'ats) musar and tokhachat. Now the son, in the aftermath of folly, recognizes his own resemblance to the fool he was warned about. Self-recognition arrives too late to prevent the consequences.
13. The moray ('my teachers') and melammeday ('my instructors') are plural — the education was not from one source but from a community of wisdom teachers. The repetition of the ear-inclining language from verse 1 creates painful irony: what the father asked the son to do, the son refused.
14. Kim'at ('almost, nearly, on the verge of') hayiti bekhlo ra ('I was in all evil') — the fool was nearly destroyed. The phrase betokh qahal ve-edah ('in the midst of the congregation and assembly') means his disgrace was public. The qahal and edah are the covenant community — his shame was witnessed by everyone who mattered.
15. The water/cistern/well imagery for sexual love appears also in Song of Solomon 4:12-15, where the beloved is 'a garden locked, a fountain sealed.' Both texts use water as a symbol of intimate exclusivity.
16. This verse is best read as a rhetorical question expecting a negative answer: should your ma'yenotekha ('your springs, your fountains') — your procreative and intimate life — be scattered chutsah ('outside, in the street')? The barrechovot ('in the public squares') intensifies the exposure. The answer is implied: no, keep your water — your intimacy, your generative power — within your own household. Some interpreters read this as a positive wish for many children ('let your springs flow out'), but the context of sexual fidelity makes the rhetorical question reading more coherent.
17. The exclusivity is absolute: lekha levaddekha ('for you alone') and ve-ein lezarim ittakh ('and not for strangers with you'). The zarim ('strangers') are outsiders to the marriage covenant. The water — the intimacy, the children, the life — belongs within the marriage, shared with no one else.
18. Meqorekha ('your fountain, your source') barukh ('blessed') — the father pronounces blessing on the son's sexual life within marriage. The imperative usemach ('and rejoice, and take joy') me-eshet ne'urekha ('from the wife of your youth') makes marital joy a command, not merely a permission. The 'wife of your youth' is the one married in young adulthood — the original covenant partner.
19. The verb shagah ('be intoxicated, go astray, reel') is the same verb used in verse 20 for going astray with the forbidden woman. The deliberate reuse is the theological key to the chapter: erotic intoxication is not the problem. The question is only: with whom?

- 20. The same verb tishgeh ('be intoxicated, go astray') from verse 19 now applies to the zarah ('forbidden woman'). The rhetorical question is devastating: given what you have at home, why would you seek intoxication elsewhere? The word cheq ('bosom, lap, embrace') makes the alternative graphic and personal.
- 21. The theological ground beneath the entire chapter: nokhach eyne YHWH ('directly before the eyes of the LORD') are darkhe ish ('the ways of a man'). Nothing is hidden. The verb mefalles ('He weighs, He makes level, He examines') describes God's scrutiny as precise and thoroughgoing. The word that described human preparation of paths (4:26) now describes God's examination of them.
- 22. The punishment is self-inflicted: avonothav ('his own iniquities') yilkedunu ('will capture him, will trap him'). The word chavle ('ropes, cords') of his chatta'to ('his sin') describes sin as a binding agent. The wicked are not punished by an external force but ensnared by their own actions — the ropes they wove for others become the ropes that bind them.
- 23. The chapter ends with the same verb: yishgeh ('he will go astray, he will stagger'). In verse 19, intoxication with the wife was commanded; in verse 20, intoxication with the forbidden woman was questioned; in verse 23, the fool staggers to death in his own ivvalto ('folly, foolishness'). The three uses of shagah trace the arc of the chapter: right intoxication, wrong intoxication, fatal intoxication. Death comes be-ein musar ('for lack of discipline, without correction') — the musar he refused in verse 12 was the one thing that could have saved him.

Summary: Proverbs 6 is the most topically diverse chapter in the book's first nine chapters, addressing four distinct subjects: the danger of guaranteeing a neighbor's debt (vv1-5), the lesson of the ant for the sluggard (vv6-11), the profile of the worthless troublemaker (vv12-15), the seven things the LORD detests (vv16-19), and a renewed warning against adultery (vv20-35). The chapter reads like a wisdom handbook, moving from financial prudence to work ethic to character assessment to moral absolutes to sexual fidelity.

What Makes This Remarkable: The numerical proverb in verses 16-19 — 'six things the LORD hates, seven are detestable to Him' — is among the most theologically compressed passages in the Hebrew Bible. The ascending number pattern (six... seven) is a common ancient Near Eastern rhetorical device that signals the final item as the climax. The list moves from body parts to social effects: haughty eyes, a lying tongue, hands that shed innocent blood, a heart that devises wicked plans, feet that rush to evil, a false witness, and the one who sows discord among brothers. The climax is not violence or lying but the fracturing of community. For Proverbs, nothing is worse than destroying the unity of brothers. The ant passage (vv6-11) is notable for its implicit theology: the ant needs no commander, overseer, or ruler — it acts from internal wisdom. The sluggard, by contrast, has been given instruction and still refuses to act.

Translation Friction: The surety passage (vv1-5) reflects an economic context where personal guarantees could result in debt slavery. The advice to extract yourself immediately — 'like a gazelle from a hunter's hand' — may seem harsh toward the neighbor whose debt you guaranteed, but in the ancient world, financial overcommitment could destroy an entire household. The adultery passage (vv25-35) focuses almost entirely on the consequences for the male adulterer, including the jealous husband's rage. The woman is described primarily as a temptation, and the offended husband's fury is presented without critique. The text assumes a patriarchal legal framework in which adultery is primarily an offense against another man's household.

Connections: The 'seven detestable things' list connects to the broader biblical pattern of numbered proverbs (Proverbs 30:15-31, Amos 1-2). The ant imagery has parallels in Egyptian wisdom literature. The adultery warning (vv20-35) extends the theme from chapter 5 and sets up the dramatic narrative of chapter 7. The body-parts progression in verses 16-19 (eyes, tongue, hands, heart, feet) connects to the body-parts instruction in 4:23-27 (heart, mouth, eyes, feet).

¹My son, if you have put up security for your neighbor, if you have pledged yourself to a stranger with a handshake,

²you have been snared by the words of your mouth, caught by the words of your mouth.

³Do this then, my son, and free yourself, for you have fallen into your neighbor's hand:
go, humble yourself, and press your neighbor urgently.

⁴Do not give sleep to your eyes or slumber to your eyelids.

⁵Free yourself like a gazelle from a hunter's hand, like a bird from the fowler's grip.

⁶Go to the ant, you sluggard;
observe her ways and become wise.

⁷She has no commander,
no overseer, and no ruler,

⁸yet she prepares her food in summer and gathers her provisions at harvest.

⁹How long will you lie there, sluggard?
When will you rise from your sleep?

¹⁰'A little sleep, a little slumber,
a little folding of the hands to rest' —

¹¹and poverty will come upon you like a prowler, and your need like an armed man.

¹²A worthless person, a wicked man, goes about with crooked speech.

¹³He winks with his eyes, signals with his feet,
points with his fingers.

¹⁴Perversity fills his heart;
he devises evil at all times and sows discord.

¹⁵Therefore disaster will come on him suddenly;
in an instant he will be shattered beyond healing.

¹⁶Six things the LORD hates;
seven are detestable to Him:

¹⁷haughty eyes, a lying tongue,
and hands that shed innocent blood,

¹⁸a heart that devises wicked schemes, feet that rush to run toward evil,

¹⁹a false witness who breathes out lies,
and one who sows discord among brothers.

²⁰Guard, my son, your father's command, and do not forsake your mother's instruction.

²¹Bind them on your heart continually;
tie them around your neck.

²²When you walk, it will lead you;
when you lie down, it will watch over you;
and when you wake, it will speak with you.

²³For the command is a lamp and instruction is a light, and the reproofs of discipline are the way of life —

²⁴to guard you from the evil woman, from the smooth tongue of the outsider.

²⁵Do not desire her beauty in your heart, and do not let her capture you with her eyelids.

²⁶For a prostitute reduces a man to a loaf of bread, but a married woman hunts for a precious life.

²⁷Can a man carry fire against his chest without his clothes being burned?

²⁸Can a man walk on hot coals without scorching his feet?

²⁹So it is with the man who goes to his neighbor's wife;
no one who touches her will go unpunished.

³⁰People do not despise a thief
if he steals to fill his stomach when he is hungry,

³¹but if caught, he must repay sevenfold;
he must hand over all the wealth of his house.

³²But the one who commits adultery lacks sense;
whoever does it destroys himself.

³³He will find wounds and disgrace, and his shame will not be wiped away.

³⁴For jealousy is a husband's fury, and he will show no mercy on the day of revenge.

³⁵He will not accept any compensation;
he will not be willing, no matter how large the bribe.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aravta ('you have become surety, you have pledged') describes the act of guaranteeing another person's debt. Taqa'ta kappekha ('you have struck your hands') is the ancient equivalent of a handshake or contract — the physical gesture that seals a financial commitment. The urgency of what follows suggests that this pledge was impulsive and dangerous.
2. Noqashta ('you have been ensnared') and nilkadta ('you have been caught, captured') describe the pledge-maker as a trapped animal. The trap is imre fikha ('the words of your mouth') — your own speech has bound you. The repetition of the phrase emphasizes that the son's own words are the cage.
3. The escape plan requires two actions: hitrappes ('humble yourself, prostrate yourself, trample on your own pride') and rehav ('press urgently, storm, importune'). The first demands the surrender of dignity; the second demands aggressive persistence. Both are preferable to remaining trapped in a bad financial commitment.
4. The urgency forbids rest: no shenah ('sleep') and no tenumah ('slumber, dozing'). The financial trap must be resolved immediately — every hour of delay increases the danger.
5. The escape metaphors — tsevi ('gazelle') and tsippor ('bird') — emphasize speed and desperation. Both animals survive only by immediate, total flight. The yaqush ('fowler, bird-catcher') is the one who sets traps; the surety-giver has walked into one and must escape with the same urgency as prey fleeing a predator.
6. The atsel ('sluggard') is a distinctive Proverbs character who appears repeatedly (6:6, 9; 10:26; 13:4; 15:19; 19:24; 20:4; 21:25; 22:13; 24:30-34; 26:13-16). The sluggard is not merely tired but characterized by a particular kind of self-deception: always having a reason not to act.
7. Three terms of authority — qatsin ('commander, chief'), shoter ('overseer, officer'), and moshel ('ruler') — are absent from the ant's life. She needs no external management. The implied rebuke is sharp: the sluggard has father, teacher, and wisdom tradition — far more guidance than the ant — and still does less.
8. The ant's two actions — takhin ('she prepares, she establishes') in summer and agrah ('she gathers, she stores') at harvest — demonstrate foresight. She works when conditions allow in order to survive when they do not. The sluggard fails precisely at this point: he cannot connect present effort to future need.
9. The ad matay ('how long?') directed at the sluggard echoes Wisdom's own ad matay in 1:22. The question implies that the sluggard's sleep is not rest but evasion — he lies in bed to avoid the demands of the day.
10. The sluggard's own voice appears in quotation: me'at shenot ('a little sleep'), me'at tenumot ('a little slumber'), me'at chibbuq yadayim ('a little folding of the hands'). The triple me'at ('a little, just a bit') is the sluggard's self-deception — each delay is small, but they accumulate into destruction. The charm of the passage is that the sluggard never asks for much; he just asks for it perpetually.
11. Poverty (reshekha, 'your poverty') arrives kimhalekh ('like a traveler, like a prowler') — it approaches gradually, on foot, then suddenly it is at the door. Need (machsorekha, 'your lack') arrives ke-ish magen ('like a man with a shield, like an armed man') — by then it is a warrior you cannot fight off. The progression from quiet approach to armed assault captures how poverty works: it creeps before it conquers.
12. Adam beliyya'al ('a person of worthlessness, a person of Belial') and ish aven ('a man of iniquity, a man of trouble'). Beliyya'al may derive from beli ('without') and ya'al ('profit, worth') — a person of no value. The troublemaker's primary tool is iqqeshut peh ('crookedness of mouth') — perverted, twisted speech.
13. Three body parts used for covert communication: eyes that qorets ('wink, pinch shut'), feet that molel ('scrape, shuffle, signal'), and fingers that moreh ('point, teach, direct'). The troublemaker communicates through a private language of gestures — he conspires in plain sight using signals his targets cannot read.
14. Tahpukhot ('perversities, things turned upside down') are in his lev ('heart') — the command center is corrupted. He choresh ra ('plows evil, devises harm') at all times and yeshalle'ach midyanim ('sends out, dispatches strife'). The verb shalach ('send') with midyanim ('conflicts, disputes') presents discord as something deliberately launched, not accidentally caused.
15. Pit'om ('suddenly') and peta ('in an instant') — the same suddenness the troublemaker used against others now strikes him. His eido ('his disaster, his calamity') arrives without warning, and he yisshaver ('will be shattered, broken') ve-ein marpe ('and there is no healing, no remedy'). The sowing of discord produces a harvest of irreversible destruction.
16. The ascending numerical pattern (x... x+1) is found throughout the ancient Near East, from Ugaritic poetry to Amos's oracles against the nations. It creates anticipation: the hearer knows the final item will be the most important.
17. The list begins with three body parts: eynayim ramot ('eyes that are high, haughty, arrogant'), leshon shaqer ('a tongue of falsehood'), and yadayim shofkhot dam naqi ('hands pouring out innocent blood'). Eyes, tongue, hands — perception, speech, action, each corrupted. The dam naqi ('innocent blood') echoes the gratuitous violence of 1:11.
18. The list continues with heart (lev choresh machshevot aven, 'a heart plowing wicked plans') and feet (raglayim memaharot laruts lara'ah, 'feet hastening to run to evil'). The inward source (heart devising) produces the outward result (feet running). The verb charah ('to plow, to devise') applied to the heart shows that evil is cultivated, not accidental.

19. The verb yafiah ('breathes out, blows') applied to lies makes falsehood involuntary and constant — the false witness does not decide to lie; he exhales lies. The placement of the discord-sower at the climax of a list that includes murder reveals Proverbs' communal priorities: fracturing brotherhood is worse than shedding blood.
20. The instruction from 1:8 returns nearly verbatim, reopening the parental instruction format for the adultery warning. The mother's torah stands in equal authority with the father's mitsvah.
21. The binding imagery from 3:3 continues the Deuteronomic echo (Deuteronomy 6:8). The instructions must be physically attached — tamid ('continually, always') — to the heart and neck. The repetition of this imagery throughout the opening chapters creates a cumulative insistence: wear wisdom like clothing.
22. Three life-moments — walking, sleeping, waking — are all covered by parental instruction personified. It tancheh ('will lead, will guide'), tishmor ('will guard, will watch over'), and tesichekha ('will speak with you, will converse with you'). The instruction becomes a companion that is never absent — a guide on the road, a guardian in sleep, a conversation partner at dawn.
23. Mitsvah as ner ('lamp') and torah as or ('light') connect to the dawn imagery of 4:18. Instruction illuminates what darkness hides. The tokhechot musar ('reproofs of discipline') — the corrections that hurt — are derekh chayyim ('the way of life'). The road to life runs through correction, not around it.
24. The lamp/light of instruction (v23) serves a specific protective function: guarding from the eshet ra ('evil woman, woman of harm') and from chelqat leshon nokhriyyah ('the smoothness of the tongue of the foreign woman'). The same chelqah ('smoothness') from 5:3 returns — her weapon is always her speech.
25. The verb tachmod ('desire, covet') is the same verb from the tenth commandment (Exodus 20:17). The adultery warning is grounded in the Decalogue — to desire the forbidden woman is to covet. Her af'appeiha ('her eyelids,' poetic for her glances) are the instruments of capture. Desire begins in the heart (bilevavekha) before it reaches the body.
26. Two categories are distinguished: the ishah zonah ('prostitute') costs you economically — she reduces a man ad kikkar lachem ('to a round of bread,' that is, to poverty). But the eshet ish ('wife of a man, married woman') does something worse: she tatsud ('hunts, stalks') a nefesh yeqarah ('a precious life, a valuable soul'). The prostitute takes your money; the adulteress takes your life.
27. The first of two rhetorical questions with obvious answers. Fire (esh) against the cheq ('chest, bosom, lap') will burn the begadav ('his garments'). The question expects no answer because the answer is self-evident. Adultery is like carrying fire — the burning is not a possibility but a certainty.
28. The second question intensifies: gechalim ('hot coals, embers') under the raglav ('his feet'). The answer, again, is obvious. The fire metaphor makes adultery a question of physics, not merely morality — consequences follow as inevitably as burns follow fire.
29. The application is direct: haba el eshet re'ehu ('the one who goes to his neighbor's wife') will lo yinnaqeh ('not be held innocent, not go unpunished'). The verb naqah ('to be clean, to be innocent, to be acquitted') in the negative means there is no escape from consequences. Kol hanoge'a bah ('everyone who touches her') extends the warning to any degree of involvement.
30. A surprising comparison begins: theft from hunger receives understanding, not contempt. The lo yavuzu ('they do not despise') shows that the community recognizes the mitigating force of genuine need.
31. Even the understood thief faces consequences: shiv'atayim ('sevenfold') restitution, potentially kol hon beito ('all the wealth of his house'). The sevenfold payment exceeds the Mosaic requirement (Exodus 22:1-4 specifies four- or fivefold) and may represent a general idiom for complete restitution.
32. The comparison's point: theft from hunger is understandable but still costly. Adultery is not even understandable — it is chasar lev ('lacking heart, lacking sense'). There is no mitigating circumstance. The no'ef ('adulterer') is mashchit nafsho ('destroying his own soul, ruining himself'). The destruction is self-inflicted.
33. Nega ('wound, blow, plague') and qalon ('disgrace, shame') — physical and social consequences. The cherpato ('his reproach, his disgrace') lo timmacheh ('will not be blotted out, erased'). Unlike the thief who can repay and restore his standing, the adulterer's reputation is permanently damaged.
34. Qin'ah ('jealousy, zeal, passionate anger') is chamat gaver ('the rage of a man, a husband's fury'). The gaver is the offended husband whose wife has been taken. His jealousy will not yachmol ('show mercy, spare, have compassion') on the yom naqam ('day of vengeance, day of retribution'). The social consequences of adultery include facing the wrath of a man with every reason to destroy you.
35. Unlike the thief's debt, which can be repaid (v31), the adulterer's offense is beyond financial resolution. Lo yissa pene khol kofer ('he will not lift the face of any ransom') — no payment will satisfy the husband. Lo yoveh ki tarbeh shochad ('he will not consent though you multiply the bribe'). Money cannot purchase forgiveness for this offense. The adultery sequence ends where it began: with consequences that are as certain as fire and as inescapable as debt.

Summary: Proverbs 7 is the dramatic climax of the forbidden-woman warnings that began in chapter 2. Cast as a first-person eyewitness account, the father describes watching from his window as a naive young man walks past the forbidden woman's house at dusk. She seizes him, kisses him, and delivers a carefully crafted seduction speech (vv14-20). He follows her 'like an ox going to slaughter.' The chapter ends with the father's urgent warning: her house is the road to Sheol.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the finest piece of narrative art in the first nine chapters of Proverbs. It moves from instruction (vv1-5) to observation (vv6-9) to character description (vv10-12) to direct speech (vv14-20) to metaphor (vv22-23) to warning (vv24-27). The pacing is cinematic — the father watches from above as the scene unfolds below, giving the reader a God's-eye view of a man walking into his own destruction. The forbidden woman's speech is brilliantly constructed: she begins with religion ('I have fulfilled my vow offerings,' v14), moves to flattery ('I came out to meet you,' v15), then to sensory enticement (perfumed bed, v17), then to the crucial reassurance ('my husband is away,' vv19-20). Every element of her pitch removes one layer of the young man's resistance. Her religious language is particularly chilling — she weaponizes piety to lower his moral guard.

Translation Friction: The narrative presents the young man as a passive victim and the woman as the sole aggressor, which oversimplifies the dynamics of sexual temptation. The text does not explore the man's desire, his own complicity, or the social conditions that may have led the woman to her current situation. The focus is entirely on her predatory agency and his naive vulnerability. The description of the woman as 'dressed like a prostitute' (v10) raises questions about the text's attitude toward women's self-presentation that modern readers will want to examine critically.

Connections: The scene at dusk (v9) connects to the light/darkness imagery of 4:18-19 — the young man literally enters the darkness. The forbidden woman's speech is the negative counterpart to Woman Wisdom's speech in chapters 1 and 8: both speak publicly, both make promises, both invite the hearer to follow. The ox-to-slaughter metaphor (v22) echoes Isaiah 53:7 ('like a lamb led to slaughter') but with opposite theological valence — here the one led to slaughter is guilty, not innocent. The house-to-Sheol identification (v27) makes the forbidden woman's home an anti-temple, descending to death rather than ascending to God.

¹My son, keep my words
and treasure my commands within you.

²Keep my commands and live;
guard my instruction like the pupil of your eye.

³Bind them on your fingers;
write them on the tablet of your heart.

⁴Say to wisdom, 'You are my sister,' and call understanding your close relative,

⁵to guard you from the forbidden woman, from the outsider who makes her words smooth.

⁶For at the window of my house,
through my lattice, I looked down,

⁷and I observed among the naive —
I noticed among the young men —

a youth who lacked sense.

⁸passing through the street near her corner,
walking toward her house,

⁹at twilight, as evening fell,
in the darkness of deepening night.

¹⁰And there — a woman comes to meet him, dressed as a prostitute, with a guarded heart.

¹¹She is loud and brazen;
her feet never stay at home.

¹²Now in the street, now in the squares, lurking at every corner.

¹³She seizes him and kisses him;
with a brazen face she says to him,

¹⁴'I had to offer fellowship sacrifices;
today I fulfilled my vows.

¹⁵So I came out to meet you,
to seek your face eagerly — and I have found you!

¹⁶I have spread my couch with coverings, with colored linens from Egypt.

¹⁷I have scented my bed with myrrh, aloes, and cinnamon.

¹⁸Come, let us drink deeply of love until morning;
let us delight ourselves with passion.

¹⁹For my husband is not at home;
he has gone on a distant journey.

²⁰He took a bag of silver with him;
he will not return until the full moon.'

²¹She sways him with her abundant persuasion; with the smoothness of her lips she pushes him over.

²²He follows her at once,
like an ox going to the slaughter,

²³like a deer stepping into a noose until an arrow pierces its liver, like a bird rushing into a trap,
not knowing it will cost him his life.

²⁴So now, sons, listen to me;
pay attention to the words of my mouth.

²⁵Do not let your heart turn aside to her ways;
do not stray onto her paths.

²⁶For many are the victims she has brought down;
numerous are all those she has killed.

²⁷Her house is the road to Sheol, descending to the chambers of death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening echoes 2:1 almost exactly — the same verbs (shamar, tsaphan) and the same structure. The repetition creates a literary frame: each major section of instruction begins with the same demand for attentive reception.
2. The ke-ishon eynekha ('like the pupil of your eye, like the little man of your eye') — the ishon is the dark center of the eye, the most sensitive and carefully guarded part of the body. The idiom means 'guard it as you would guard your own sight.' Instruction is as essential as vision.
3. The finger-binding and heart-inscription imagery continues the Deuteronomic tradition (Deuteronomy 6:8, 11:18). The fingers suggest that every action (what the hands do) should be governed by instruction. The luach lev ('tablet of the heart') anticipates Jeremiah 31:33 and 2 Corinthians 3:3.
4. Wisdom as achoti ('my sister') and understanding as moda ('close relative, intimate friend, kinswoman'). In Song of Solomon 4:9-10, the beloved is called 'my sister, my bride' — the term implies both intimacy and protection. Making wisdom a family member means she belongs in your household permanently.
5. The purpose of the sister-relationship with wisdom: protection from the islah zarah and the nokhriyyah whose speech is hecheliqah ('she has made smooth, she has flattered'). The same language from 2:16 and 5:3 returns — the forbidden woman is always identified first by her smooth speech.
6. The narrative begins. The father positions himself be-challon beiti ('at the window of my house'), peering through the eshnab ('lattice, window grille'). The elevated position gives him the perspective the young man below lacks. The word nishqafiti ('I looked down, I gazed out') emphasizes the downward angle — the father sees what is about to happen from above.
7. Among the petayim ('naive ones') the father spots a na'ar chasar lev ('a young man lacking heart/sense'). The chasar lev ('lacking heart') identifies him as someone without the internal command center needed to resist temptation. He is not wicked but empty — a vessel waiting to be filled by whatever voice reaches him first.
8. The young man's route is not accidental: he is over bashuq ('passing through the market street') etsel pinnah ('near her corner') and derekh beita yits'ad ('stepping toward her house'). The verbs suggest deliberate movement — he may not intend the final outcome, but he has chosen the geography that makes it possible.
9. The four-fold descent into darkness mirrors the four-fold descent of Psalm 1's wicked man (walking, standing, sitting). Each time marker is darker than the last. The young man is not ambushed by night; he walks into it voluntarily.
10. Vehinne' ('and behold!') signals dramatic appearance. She wears shit zonah ('the clothing of a prostitute') — attire that signals sexual availability. But her heart is netsurath lev ('guarded, hidden, secretive'). Her body is displayed; her intentions are concealed. The contrast between external openness and internal secrecy defines her method: she shows everything except what she actually wants.
11. Homiyyah ('noisy, turbulent, boisterous') and sorareth ('stubborn, rebellious, defiant') describe her public persona. Her ragleiha ('her feet') lo yishkenu ('do not settle, do not dwell') in her house. She is constantly in motion, constantly in public — the opposite of the wife who is celebrated in Proverbs 31 for the productivity of her household.
12. The pa'am... pa'am ('now... now') construction conveys restless movement. She is ba-chuts ('outside'), ba-rechovot ('in the broad places'), and te'erov ('she lies in ambush') at every pinnah ('corner'). The verb arav ('to ambush, to lie in wait') is the same word used for the sinners in 1:11 who ambush the innocent. She is a hunter.
13. Three rapid actions: hecheziqah bo ('she grabs him, she seizes him'), nashqah lo ('she kisses him'), and he'ezah paneiha ('she makes her face bold, she puts on a brazen expression'). The initiative is entirely hers. The verbs convey physical aggression — she is not waiting to be approached but actively capturing her prey.
14. Her seduction opens with piety. Zivche shelamim ('fellowship offerings, peace offerings') were the only sacrifices in which the worshiper ate a portion of the meat (Leviticus 7:15-16). Fulfilling nedarim ('vows') demonstrates religious devotion. Her opening gambit is to present herself as a faithful, devout woman who has just come from worship. The meat from the offering must be eaten that day — so she has a legitimate reason to invite a guest to dinner. Religion becomes the cover story for adultery.

15. The flattery begins: yatsati liqrakekha ('I came out to meet you') — you are the specific person I was looking for. Leshachar panekha ('to seek your face eagerly') uses shachar ('to seek at dawn, to seek earnestly') — the same verb used for seeking God in prayer. She applies the language of devotion to the act of seduction. Va'emtsa'ekka ('and I have found you!') — the exclamation implies that finding him is an answer to her search, making him feel uniquely desired.
16. The sensory enticement shifts to touch and sight: marvaddim ('coverings, spreads, tapestries') on the eres ('couch, bed'), made of chatuvot etun mitsrayim ('embroidered/colored Egyptian linen'). Egyptian linen was the luxury fabric of the ancient world. Her bed is not merely comfortable but extravagant — a display of wealth that implies status and sophistication.
17. From sight to smell: nafti ('I have sprinkled, I have scented') the mishkav ('bed, lying-place') with mor ('myrrh'), ahalim ('aloes, aloeswood'), and qinnamon ('cinnamon'). All three are luxury aromatics that appear in Song of Solomon (4:14) as expressions of erotic love. She has prepared a complete sensory environment designed to overwhelm resistance.
18. Lekhah ('come!') is the invitation. Nirveh dodim ('let us drink our fill of loves') uses the same ravah ('to be saturated, to drink deeply') from 5:19 where the father urged the son to be satisfied with his wife's love. The forbidden woman co-opts the language of legitimate marital passion. Nit'allesa ba'ohavim ('let us take pleasure in lovemaking') uses the hithpael of alas ('to exult, to enjoy'), expressing mutual indulgence. Her pitch is not merely physical but promises emotional connection.
19. The final barrier removed: ha-ish ('the man, the husband') is not beveito ('in his house'). She says halakh bederekh merachok ('he has gone on a far road') — not just away but far away. The information is strategically placed: after religion (v14), flattery (v15), luxury (vv16-17), and erotic promise (v18), she addresses the last concern — getting caught. The husband is removed. The coast is clear.
20. The silver bag indicates a commercial journey. The leyom hakkese ('at the time of the full moon') specifies his return date — the full moon is approximately two weeks away. The information is precise: there is not merely time but measured, guaranteed time. The young man can calculate his safety margin. Every detail of her speech is designed to make saying yes feel rational.
21. The irony of leqach ('teaching') applied to the forbidden woman's speech is sharp. She is, in her own way, a skilled instructor — but her curriculum leads to death. The young man chose the wrong teacher.
22. Holekh achareiha pit'om ('he walks after her suddenly, immediately') — the decision is instant once his resistance breaks. The simile ke-shor el tavach yavo ('like an ox coming to the slaughter') reduces the young man to livestock. The ox does not know what the slaughterhouse is; the young man does not know what the forbidden woman's house is. Both walk willingly into death.
23. The animal metaphors multiply: the arrow (chets) piercing the kevedo ('his liver') — the liver was considered a vital organ, and an arrow through it meant certain death. The tsippor ('bird') rushing el pach ('into a trap, into a snare') mirrors 1:17 where the bird sees the net and avoids it — this bird does not see. The final clause is the diagnosis: velo yada ki venafsho hu ('and he did not know that it concerned his life, his soul'). Ignorance is the killer. He did not know what he was walking into.
24. The narrative ends and the father draws the lesson. The plural banim ('sons') returns — this story was told for every young man, not just one. The ve-attach ('and now') signals the urgent conclusion.
25. Al yeset ('do not let it turn aside') — the heart (lev) must be held back from deviating toward her. Al teta ('do not wander, do not stray') on her netivoteiha ('her paths'). The guard-your-heart command of 4:23 finds its specific application here: the heart that is not guarded will drift toward the forbidden woman.
26. Rabbim chalalim hippilah ('many wounded/slain she has felled') and atsumim kol harugeha ('mighty/numerous are all her slain'). The vocabulary is military — chalalim ('pierced ones, casualties') and harugeha ('her slain, her killed') are battlefield terms. The forbidden woman's house is not a bedroom but a battlefield, and the casualties are measured in the same language as war dead.
27. The chapter's final image: darkhe she'ol beitha ('roads to Sheol is her house') — her house is not merely near Sheol but is Sheol's access road. The yordot el chadre mavet ('descending to the chambers of death') describes rooms within death's domain. The forbidden woman's bedroom is a chamber of death. The young man who entered her door has entered Sheol's gate.

Summary: Proverbs 8 is Woman Wisdom's greatest speech — her magnum opus. She speaks in three movements: her public proclamation and moral credentials (vv1-21), her pre-existence and role in creation (vv22-31), and her final appeal (vv32-36). This is the theological summit of the book's first nine chapters. Wisdom is not merely good advice; she was present before the world was made, and she was the craftsman at God's side when He set the foundations of the earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The cosmological hymn in verses 22-31 is one of the most theologically significant passages in the entire Hebrew Bible. Wisdom declares: 'The LORD possessed me at the beginning of His way, before His acts of old. From eternity I was set up, from the beginning, before the earth existed' (vv22-23). She was present when God established the heavens, drew the horizon on the face of the deep, set the fountains of the deep, decreed the boundaries of the sea, and marked out the foundations of the earth. Verse 30 then makes the astounding claim: 'I was beside Him as a master craftsman, and I was His delight day after day, playing before Him at all times.' The word amon ('master craftsman' or 'nursling, darling') is debated, but either reading is remarkable — Wisdom was either God's co-worker in creation or God's beloved child, playing in His presence. The image of Wisdom 'playing' (mesachaquet) before God introduces joy, delight, and even playfulness into the creation account. God did not create grimly; He created joyfully, with Wisdom dancing at His side.

Translation Friction: The key theological question: is Wisdom a divine attribute, a separate being, a literary personification, or a proto-hypostasis? The text does not resolve this. Early Christianity read Proverbs 8 christologically (Christ as the pre-existent Wisdom of God), as reflected in John 1:1-3 and Colossians 1:15-17. The Arian controversy of the 4th century focused intensely on verse 22: does 'the LORD possessed/created me' mean Wisdom (and therefore Christ) is a created being? The verb qanah can mean 'to create,' 'to acquire,' 'to possess,' or 'to beget' — each option carries different theological implications. The Hebrew text is genuinely ambiguous, and the ambiguity has fueled centuries of debate.

Connections: Proverbs 8:22-31 is the primary background text for John 1:1-3 ('In the beginning was the Word, and the Word was with God'), Colossians 1:15-17 ('He is the image of the invisible God, the firstborn of all creation'), and Hebrews 1:2 ('through whom He made the world'). The creation imagery parallels Job 38 (God laying the earth's foundation, setting the sea's boundaries) and Genesis 1 (ordering the waters, establishing the heavens). Sirach 24 and Wisdom of Solomon 7-9 both expand on Proverbs 8's portrait of personified wisdom. The 'fear of the LORD' refrain in verse 13 ties back to 1:7 and forward to 9:10.

¹Does not wisdom call out?

Does not understanding raise her voice?

²On the heights beside the road,
at the crossroads, she takes her stand.

³Beside the gates, at the entrance to the city,
at the approach of the doorways, she cries aloud:

⁴To you, O people, I call,
and my voice reaches out to all humanity.

⁵Learn shrewdness, you naive ones;
you fools, gain sense.

⁶Listen, for I speak of noble things, and from my lips come what is right.

⁷For my mouth utters truth, and wickedness is detestable to my lips.

⁸All the words of my mouth are righteous;
none of them are twisted or crooked.

⁹They are all straightforward to the one who understands, and right to those who have found knowledge.

¹⁰Receive my discipline rather than silver, and knowledge rather than finest gold.

¹¹For wisdom is better than corals, and no treasure can compare with her.

¹²I, Wisdom, dwell with shrewdness, and I possess knowledge and foresight.

¹³The fear of the LORD is hatred of evil.
Pride and arrogance and the evil way and the mouth of perversity — I hate.

¹⁴Counsel is mine, and sound wisdom;
I am understanding; strength belongs to me.

¹⁵By me kings reign, and rulers decree what is just.

¹⁶By me officials govern,
and nobles — all who judge rightly.

¹⁷I love those who love me,
and those who seek me diligently find me.

¹⁸Riches and honor are with me,
enduring wealth and righteousness.

¹⁹My fruit is better than gold, even fine gold, and my yield than choice silver.

²⁰I walk in the path of righteousness,
in the midst of the paths of justice,

²¹granting substance to those who love me and filling their treasuries.

²²The LORD brought me forth as the first of His way, before His works of old.

²³From eternity I was appointed,
from the beginning, before the earth existed.

²⁴When there were no ocean depths, I was brought forth;
when there were no springs heavy with water.

²⁵Before the mountains were sunk into place, before the hills, I was brought forth —

²⁶before He had made the earth or the fields, or the first dust of the world.

²⁷When He established the heavens, I was there;
when He inscribed the horizon on the face of the deep,

²⁸when He made firm the skies above,
when He established the fountains of the deep,

²⁹when He set a boundary for the sea
so that the waters would not transgress His command, when He marked out the foundations of the earth —

³⁰then I was beside Him as a master craftsman.
I was His delight day after day,
playing in His presence at all times,

³¹playing in His inhabited world,
and my delight was with the children of humanity.

³²So now, children, listen to me:
how fortunate are those who keep my ways!

³³Hear discipline and become wise;
do not neglect it.

³⁴How fortunate is the person who listens to me, watching daily at my gates, waiting beside my doorposts.

³⁵For whoever finds me finds life and obtains favor from the LORD.

³⁶But whoever misses me harms himself;
all who hate me love death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The rhetorical question expects an emphatic 'Yes!' Wisdom is already calling — the question is whether anyone is listening. The parallel between chokmah ('wisdom') and tevunah ('understanding') establishes them as aspects of the same reality. The verbs tiqra ('calls out') and titten qolah ('gives her voice') echo 1:20-21, framing chapters 1-9 with Wisdom's public proclamation.
2. Wisdom stations herself at the rosh meromim ('top of the heights') and bet netivot ('the meeting-place of paths, the crossroads'). She chooses the places of maximum visibility and decision — where travelers must choose which direction to go. Her position is strategic: she speaks where choices are made.
3. Three locations converge: she'arim ('gates,' the legal and commercial center), pi qaret ('the mouth of the city, the entrance'), and mevo petachim ('the approach of the doorways'). She is everywhere public life happens. Unlike the forbidden woman who lurks at corners in darkness (7:12), Wisdom stands openly at the most visible, most public locations.
4. The address is universal: ishim ('men, people') and bene adam ('sons of Adam, human beings'). Wisdom is not speaking to Israel alone but to all humanity. Her claim is cosmic, not tribal.
5. Wisdom addresses the petayim ('naive') and kesilim ('fools') directly. She does not write them off but offers them what they lack: ormah ('shrewdness, cunning') and lev ('heart, sense'). She provides the very thing the young man in chapter 7 was missing — chasar lev ('lacking heart').
6. Negidim ('noble things, princely things, things worthy of rulers') and mesharim ('right things, upright things, equitable things'). Wisdom's speech content matches her authority — she does not gossip or deceive but speaks what is worthy and straight.
7. Emet ('truth, reliability, faithfulness') is what Wisdom's chikki ('palate, mouth') yehgeh ('murmurs, meditates, utters'). Wickedness is to'avat sefatay ('an abomination to my lips'). The contrast with the forbidden woman is total: her mouth drips honey that leads to wormwood; Wisdom's mouth speaks truth that leads to life.

8. Be-tsedeq ('in righteousness') qualifies every word (kol imre pi, 'all the words of my mouth'). There is nothing niftal ('twisted, tortuous') or iqqesh ('crooked, perverted') in them. The absence of crookedness is the defining marker: the forbidden woman's speech was smooth; Wisdom's speech is straight.
9. Wisdom's words are nekhochim ('straight, plain, right') to the mevin ('one who discerns') and yescharim ('upright, right') to those who have already found da'at ('knowledge'). Understanding enables understanding — the more you know, the more Wisdom's words make sense. This is the opposite of the fool's spiral, where ignorance breeds more ignorance.
10. The economic comparison from 3:14-15 returns with new force: choose musari ('my discipline') over keseph ('silver') and da'at ('knowledge') over charutz nivchar ('chosen/finest gold'). Wisdom herself, not just the father, now makes the value claim.
11. Virtually identical to 3:15. The repetition of peninim ('corals/rubies/pearls') and kol chafatsim ('all desirable things') unable to equal wisdom creates a refrain throughout the first nine chapters — wisdom's incomparable value is stated and restated until it becomes the book's baseline assumption.
12. Wisdom speaks in the first person with authority: ani chokmah ('I, Wisdom'). She shakanti ('I dwell, I reside') with ormah ('shrewdness, cunning, craftiness') and she finds (emtsa) da'at mezimnot ('knowledge of foresight, knowledge of planning'). Wisdom is not naive — she is shrewd, strategic, and perceptive.
13. The definition of the fear of the LORD as 'hatred of evil' is one of the sharpest formulations in the book. It converts the fear of the LORD from a private devotional posture into a public moral stance — you cannot claim to fear the LORD while tolerating what He finds detestable.
14. Wisdom claims four possessions: etsah ('counsel, advice, strategy'), tushiyyah ('sound wisdom, effective counsel'), binah ('understanding' — she does not merely have it; she is it), and gevurah ('strength, might, power'). Wisdom is not weak or merely theoretical — she has the power to accomplish what she advises.
15. Wisdom claims political authority: bi ('by me, through me') melakhim yimlokhu ('kings reign'). She is the source of legitimate governance. Rozenim ('rulers, princes') yechoqegu tsedeq ('decree, inscribe, enact righteousness'). Without wisdom, kings cannot rule justly; with her, their decrees embody tsedeq ('righteousness'). Political authority is derivative of wisdom, not independent of it.
16. The claim extends from kings (v15) to sarim ('officials, princes') and nedivim ('nobles, generous ones') and kol shofte tsedeq ('all judges of righteousness'). Every level of governance depends on wisdom. The judicial system itself requires her presence to function justly.
17. Wisdom offers reciprocal love: ani ohavay ehav ('I, those who love me, I love'). She also promises findability: meshacharay yimtsa'ununni ('those who seek me early/eagerly will find me'). Unlike the forbidden woman who hunts the unwary (7:12), Wisdom rewards those who seek her. The seeking must be meshachar ('at dawn, eagerly, diligently') — casual inquiry will not suffice.
18. Osher ('riches'), kavod ('honor'), hon ateq ('enduring wealth, ancient wealth') and tsedaqah ('righteousness'). The pairing of material prosperity with moral integrity is characteristic of Proverbs — true wealth includes righteousness, and righteousness includes a form of wealth.
19. Wisdom's piri ('my fruit') and tevu'ati ('my yield, my produce') surpass charutz ('fine gold'), paz ('pure gold, refined gold'), and keseph nivchar ('choice silver'). The agricultural metaphor (fruit, yield) applied to wisdom implies that she produces ongoing returns, not a one-time payment.
20. Wisdom walks — ahalekh ('I walk, I go') — in the orach tsedaqah ('path of righteousness') and betokh netivot mishpat ('in the midst of the paths of justice'). She is not merely a guide who points the way; she walks the road herself. Following wisdom means walking where she walks.
21. Lehanchil ohavay yesh ('to cause those who love me to inherit substance, reality, something') — the word yesh means 'existence, substance, what is real.' Wisdom provides not illusion but reality. She also fills (amalle) their otseroteihem ('their treasuries, their storehouses'). The gifts of wisdom are concrete and lasting.
22. We render qanani as 'brought me forth' to capture the generative force of the verb without committing to either 'created' or 'possessed.' The Hebrew is ambiguous, and we preserve the ambiguity rather than resolving it. The theological stakes of this translation choice are immense — entire christological debates have turned on whether this verb means 'created' or 'begot.'
23. Me-olam ('from eternity, from the distant past') nissakti ('I was set up, appointed, installed, poured out'). The verb nasakh may mean 'to install' (as a king is installed) or 'to weave' or 'to pour out' — each suggests a different kind of origin. Me-rosh ('from the first, from the head/beginning') miqqadme arets ('before the antiquity of the earth'). The earth itself is ancient, but Wisdom predates it.
24. Be-ein tehomot ('when there were no deeps, no primordial oceans') cholalti ('I was brought forth, I was birthed, I writhed into being'). The verb chul/chil means 'to writhe, to travail, to be born' — it is explicitly birth language. The tehomot ('deeps') echo Genesis 1:2 (tehom, 'the deep'). Before the primordial ocean existed, Wisdom was already born. The ma'yanot nikbadde mayim ('springs heavy/abundant with water') represent the underground water sources — even the hidden waters postdate Wisdom.
25. Beterem harim hotba'u ('before mountains were sunk, were set firmly') — the verb tava ('to sink, to be pressed down, to be immersed') describes mountains as driven into the earth like posts into the ground. Lifne geva'ot cholalti ('before hills I was birthed'). Mountains represent the most ancient, most permanent features of the landscape; Wisdom is older than all of them.
26. Ad lo asah erets ('while He had not yet made the earth') and chutsoth ('open spaces, fields') and rosh afrot tevel ('the first/chief dust particles of the world'). Even dust — the most basic building material of creation — postdates Wisdom. She was there before the raw materials existed.

27. Now Wisdom describes not her priority but her presence during creation. Bahakhino shamayim ('when He established the heavens') sham ani ('there I was'). The two words sham ani ('I was there') are the chapter's quiet thunder — Wisdom witnessed everything. Bechuqo chug al pene tehom ('when He inscribed a circle/horizon on the face of the deep') — God drew the boundary between sky and sea, and Wisdom watched.
28. Be-ammetso shechaqim ('when He strengthened/made firm the clouds/skies above') and ba'azoz enot tehom ('when He made strong the springs of the deep'). Both the upper waters (sky) and the lower waters (deep springs) were set in place by God, with Wisdom present.
29. Besumo layyam chuqo ('when He placed for the sea its boundary/decreed') — the sea's limit is both physical (shoreline) and legal (decree). The waters lo ya'avru piv ('will not cross His mouth/command'). In Job 38:8-11, God gives the sea the same command: 'Here shall your proud waves be stopped.' Bechuqo mosde arets ('when He marked out the foundations of the earth') — the earth has structural supports, and God laid them.
30. We render amon as 'master craftsman' as the primary reading, acknowledging that 'darling child' is equally defensible. The choice of 'craftsman' connects to the broader theme of wisdom as skill (chokmah as artisanship in Exodus 31:3) and to the image of God as builder throughout vv27-29. But the 'darling child' reading explains the play language of verse 30b more naturally — a craftsman works; a child plays.
31. Mesachaqet betovel artso ('playing in the world of His earth, in His inhabited land') — Wisdom's play extends from God's presence (v30) into the created world itself. The earth is not merely God's construction project but Wisdom's playground. Vesha'ashu'ay et bene adam ('and my delights were with the sons of Adam') — the most stunning claim of all: Wisdom delights in human beings. Her joy is not only in God's presence but in human company. Humanity is not an afterthought of creation but the object of Wisdom's specific delight.
32. After the cosmic vision, the practical appeal. Ve-attah ('so now') transitions from creation theology to present command. Ashre derakhay yishmoru ('fortunate are those who guard my ways'). The ashre ('fortunate') from 3:13 returns — the blessing of wisdom-keeping is reaffirmed after the cosmic revelation.
33. The imperative sequence — shim'u ('hear'), chakhamu ('become wise'), al tifra'u ('do not neglect, do not let go') — is brisk and direct. After thirty-one verses of cosmic vision, the command is simple: listen, learn, hold on.
34. The image of lishqod al dalthotay yom yom ('watching at my doors day after day') and lishmor mezuzot petachay ('guarding the doorposts of my entrances') presents the wise person as a devoted attendant. The mezuzot ('doorposts') echo Deuteronomy 6:9, where God's commands are written on the doorposts. Now Wisdom's own doorposts are the destination. The devoted student stands at her door the way a servant stands at a master's gate — ready, attentive, unwilling to miss a word.
35. Motse'i matsa chayyim ('the one who finds me has found life') — wisdom and life are equated. Finding wisdom is not a step toward life; it is the finding of life itself. Vayyafeq ratson me-YHWH ('and draws forth favor from the LORD') — the verb yafaq ('to bring forth, to obtain, to draw out') suggests that God's favor flows naturally to the one who finds wisdom.
36. Wisdom's final word is the starkest binary in the book. Chot'i ('the one who misses me, the one who sins against me') — the root chata means 'to miss the mark, to go wrong.' Missing wisdom is self-harm (chomes nafsho, 'does violence to his own soul'). Kol mesan'ay ahevu mavet ('all who hate me love death'). The sentence is absolute: there is no third option between finding wisdom (and life) and hating wisdom (and loving death). The one who rejects wisdom has, whether knowingly or not, chosen death as a lover. This is Woman Wisdom's final word before the climactic confrontation of chapter 9.

Summary: Proverbs 9 is the dramatic finale of the book's prologue (chapters 1-9). It presents two banquets side by side: Woman Wisdom has built her house, set her table, and sent her servants to invite the naive (vv1-6). Woman Folly has also set up shop and calls to the naive from her doorway (vv13-18). Between the two invitations sits a collection of sayings about the wise and the scoffer (vv7-12), including the restatement of the book's thesis: 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom' (v10). The reader must choose which banquet to attend.

What Makes This Remarkable: The architectural symmetry is deliberate and devastating. Both women call from elevated positions. Both address the petayim ('naive'). Both say nearly identical words: 'Whoever is naive, let him turn in here' (vv4, 16). Both offer food and drink. The invitation sounds the same. The destinations could not be more different: Wisdom's house leads to life (v6); Folly's house leads to Sheol (v18). The chapter forces the reader to discern the difference between two voices that sound alike. This is the deepest lesson of the entire prologue — wisdom is not about hearing the right words but about knowing which voice speaks them. The seven pillars of Wisdom's house (v1) have been variously interpreted as the seven days of creation, the seven sections of the prologue, or simply architectural grandeur. Whatever the symbolism, the number seven signals completeness — Wisdom's house is fully built, structurally whole, and ready for guests.

Translation Friction: The central section (vv7-12) seems to interrupt the Wisdom-Folly contrast with a collection of loosely related sayings. Some scholars view these verses as a later insertion that disrupts the chapter's symmetrical structure. Others see them as a deliberate pause — a wisdom interlude that gives the reader time to reflect before encountering Folly's counter-invitation. The description of Woman Folly as 'loud, naive, and knowing nothing' (v13) may be read as a dismissive caricature. However, the text's point is not that all foolish people are women but that Folly mimics Wisdom — she copies the form while emptying it of content.

Connections: The two-banquet structure echoes the two-ways theology of Psalm 1 and Deuteronomy 30:15-20 ('I set before you life and death'). The restatement of 'the fear of the LORD is the beginning of wisdom' (v10) completes the inclusio begun in 1:7, framing the entire prologue. The 'stolen water is sweet' proverb (v17) connects to the water/cistern imagery of chapter 5 — Folly offers stolen water while Wisdom's husband was told to drink from his own cistern. The seven-pillared house has been connected to the seven-branched menorah and to the cosmic temple imagery of Solomon's temple.

¹Wisdom has built her house;
she has carved out her seven pillars.

²She has slaughtered her meat,
mixed her wine,
and set her table.

³She has sent out her servant women;
she calls from the heights of the city,

⁴'Whoever is naive, let him turn in here.'
To the one who lacks sense, she says,

⁵'Come, eat my food and drink the wine I have mixed.

⁶Leave your naivety behind and live!
Walk straight in the way of understanding.'

⁷Whoever corrects a scoffer earns abuse, and whoever rebukes a wicked person gets hurt.

⁸Do not rebuke a scoffer, or he will hate you;
rebuke a wise person, and he will love you.

⁹Give to the wise and they grow wiser;
teach the righteous and they add to their learning.

¹⁰The fear of the LORD is where wisdom begins, and knowledge of the Holy One is understanding.

¹¹For through me your days will be multiplied, and years of life will be added to you.

¹²If you are wise, you are wise for yourself;
if you scoff, you alone will bear it.

¹³Woman Folly is loud;
she is naive and knows nothing.

¹⁴She sits at the door of her house,
on a seat at the heights of the city,

¹⁵calling to those who pass by,
who are going straight on their way:

¹⁶'Whoever is naive, let him turn in here.'
To the one who lacks sense, she says,

¹⁷'Stolen water is sweet,
and bread eaten in secret is delicious.'

¹⁸But he does not know that the shades are there, that her guests are in the depths of Sheol.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The seven pillars have generated endless speculation. Some see the seven days of creation, others the seven liberal arts, others the seven sections of the Proverbs prologue (chapters 1-9 divided differently). The most straightforward reading is that seven represents architectural completeness — a grand, fully columned hall ready for a feast.
2. Three preparations: tavechah tivchah ('she has slaughtered her slaughter' — cognate accusative emphasizing the act), maskah yeinah ('she has mixed her wine' — wine was mixed with spices and water to achieve the proper strength and flavor), and arkhah shulchanah ('she has arranged her table'). The feast is lavish and carefully prepared. Every detail reflects intentionality — Wisdom does not serve leftovers.
3. Shalchah na'aroteiha ('she has dispatched her young women servants') — Wisdom has a household staff, reinforcing the image of a great woman of means. She tiqra ('calls out') al gappe merome qaret ('from the ridges of the heights of the city'). Her invitation goes out from the highest point — it is public, visible, and impossible to miss. The parallel to 1:20-21 completes the frame: Wisdom cried out at the beginning of the prologue and cries out at its end.
4. Mi feti yasur hennah ('whoever is naive, let him turn aside here') — the same invitation Folly will offer in verse 16. The target audience is the peti ('naive, gullible, open') and the chasar lev ('lacking heart, lacking sense'). Wisdom does not address the already wise but the not-yet-formed. Her banquet is for those still choosing.
5. Lekhu lachamu velachmi ('come, eat of my bread/food') and ushtu beyayin masakti ('and drink of the wine I have mixed'). The invitation is generous — my food, my wine. Wisdom's hospitality is complete: she does not merely instruct but feeds. The banquet represents a full, embodied engagement with wisdom — not abstract knowledge but nourishing sustenance.
6. Izvu petayim vichyu ('abandon the naive ones — or, abandon naivety — and live!'). The imperative vichyu ('and live!') echoes the grandfather's command in 4:4. The alternative to naivety is not mere knowledge but life itself. Ve-ishru bederekh vinah ('and walk straight, advance, in the way of understanding'). The verb ashah ('to go straight, to walk forward, to advance') is from the same root as ashre ('fortunate') — the path of understanding is the fortunate path.
7. The wisdom interlude begins with a pragmatic observation: correcting a lets ('scoffer') brings qalon ('shame, disgrace') to the corrector. Rebuking a rasha ('wicked person') earns mumo ('his blemish, his insult, his defect reflected back'). The point is not that correction should be abandoned but that the audience matters — do not waste reproof on those who will weaponize it against you.
8. The contrast reveals the deepest difference between the wise and the foolish: the wise love correction because they love improvement; the foolish hate correction because they love themselves as they are. How you respond to rebuke is the diagnostic — if rebuke makes you grateful, you are wise; if it makes you hostile, you are a scoffer. There is no third category.
9. Ten lechakham veyechkam od ('give to the wise person and he will become wiser still') — wisdom has no ceiling. The wise can always become wiser. Hoda letsaddiq veyosef leqach ('make known to the righteous person and he will add learning') — the tsaddiq treats every new piece of instruction as additional treasure.
10. Qedoshim ('holy ones') is debated: it may refer to God (plural of majesty, 'the Holy One'), to the heavenly council, or to the community of the faithful. We read it as referring to God, parallel to 30:3 (da'at qedoshim, 'knowledge of the Holy One'). The singular sense is supported by the parallel with 'the LORD' in the first line.

11. Wisdom speaks again in the first person: bi yirbu yamekha ('through me your days will multiply'). The promise of long life — shenot chayyim ('years of life') — has been the recurring reward throughout the prologue (3:2, 3:16, 4:10). It is restated here as the final benefit before the reader must choose between the two banquets.
12. Im chakhamta chakhamta lakh ('if you have become wise, you are wise for yourself') — wisdom's benefits accrue to the wise person. Velatssta levaddekha tissa ('and if you have scoffed, alone you will carry it'). The loneliness of the consequences is the point: no one else will absorb the fallout of your choices. Wisdom blesses its owner; folly punishes its owner. The transaction is perfectly individual.
13. Eshet kesilut ('woman of foolishness, Woman Folly') is the anti-Wisdom. She is homiyyah ('loud, clamorous, turbulent') — the same word used for the forbidden woman in 7:11. She is petayyut ('naive, simple') and uval yade'ah mah ('and she does not know anything'). Her ignorance is total. Unlike Wisdom, who possesses counsel, strength, and knowledge (8:14), Folly has nothing to offer — but she offers it loudly.
14. Folly yashvah ('sits') rather than builds or sends or calls from the heights. The contrast with Wisdom is architectural: Wisdom built a house with seven pillars, slaughtered meat, mixed wine, and sent servants. Folly sits on a chair at her doorway. She has constructed nothing, prepared nothing, produced nothing. Her position at merome qaret ('the heights of the city') mimics Wisdom's (v3), but she occupies it without having earned it.
15. Folly targets ovre derekh ('those passing by on the road') — specifically those hamyasherim orchotam ('who are making their paths straight'). She does not pursue those already crooked but those walking straight. Her prey is the person who is on the right path but has not yet arrived — the vulnerable moment of transit.
16. The identical words from verse 4. This is the chapter's deepest point: Wisdom and Folly use the same invitation. The words are indistinguishable. The naive person must discern the speaker, not just the speech. This is why the entire prologue exists — to train the ear to recognize the difference between two voices that say the same thing.
17. The water/bread of Folly's offer contrasts directly with Wisdom's meat and wine (v2, 5). Wisdom offers a lavish, prepared feast; Folly offers stolen water and secret bread. The comparison reveals that Folly cannot create — she can only steal.
18. The chapter's final verse reveals what Folly's guest cannot see: velo yada ('and he does not know') ki refa'im sham ('that the shades are there'). The refa'im ('shades, the dead, the spirits of the departed') inhabit Folly's dining room. Her qeru'eiha ('her invited guests, those she has called') are be-imqe she'ol ('in the depths of Sheol'). The banquet is already populated by the dead — the young man who enters is not the first guest but the latest victim. The identical language from 2:18 ('her paths lead to the shades') returns to close the prologue exactly where it was predicted. Folly's house was always Sheol. The only question was whether the reader would recognize it in time.

Summary: Proverbs 10 marks a dramatic shift in the book's form. The extended speeches, personified figures, and narrative sequences of chapters 1-9 give way to individual two-line proverbs — sharp, self-contained observations arranged with minimal visible connection between them. This is the beginning of the 'Proverbs of Solomon' collection (10:1-22:16), which contains 375 proverbs. Nearly every verse in chapter 10 is an antithetic parallelism: the first line makes a statement, and the second line states its opposite, almost always connected by the word 'but.' The dominant themes are the righteous versus the wicked, the wise versus the foolish, the diligent versus the lazy, and the power of speech.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The abrupt formal transition from chapter 9's dramatic banquet scene to chapter 10's staccato proverbs is itself meaningful. The prologue trained the reader to think; now the reader must apply that training to compressed, often ambiguous statements that offer no explanation. Each proverb is a seed that requires the reader's own wisdom to germinate. The antithetic structure that dominates this chapter is the poetic engine of the entire middle section of Proverbs — line A makes a claim, and line B reverses it. The 'but' (Hebrew ve- with adversative force) is the hinge on which wisdom turns. The chapter's opening verse is its dedication: 'A wise son brings joy to a father, but a foolish son is grief to his mother.' The personal, familial setting grounds the cosmic wisdom of chapters 1-9 in the daily reality of household life.*

Translation Friction: The retributive theology of chapter 10 is stated with absolute confidence: the righteous prosper, the wicked perish, the diligent grow rich, the lazy become poor. This framework will be severely tested by Job, Ecclesiastes, and many psalms of lament. Proverbs 10 presents the general pattern without acknowledging the exceptions. Read as iron laws, these proverbs are demonstrably false; read as general observations about how life tends to work in a morally ordered universe, they are profound. The reader must supply the nuance that the proverbs deliberately omit.

Connections: The 'Proverbs of Solomon' superscription (v1a) connects to 1:1 and to the later collection headers at 22:17, 24:23, 25:1, 30:1, and 31:1. The righteous/wicked contrast throughout the chapter extends Psalm 1's two-ways theology into specific domains: speech, wealth, labor, and family. The lips/tongue/mouth vocabulary (vv6, 8, 10, 11, 13, 14, 18, 19, 20, 21, 31, 32) makes speech the chapter's dominant concern — fully half the verses address what comes out of a person's mouth.

¹The proverbs of Solomon.

A wise son brings joy to his father,
but a foolish son is grief to his mother.

²Treasures gained by wickedness profit nothing, but righteousness delivers from death.

³The LORD does not let the righteous go hungry,
but He thrusts aside the craving of the wicked.

⁴A slack hand makes for poverty,
but the hand of the diligent makes rich.

⁵A son who gathers in summer acts wisely,
but a son who sleeps through harvest brings shame.

⁶Blessings crown the head of the righteous,
but the mouth of the wicked conceals violence.

⁷The memory of the righteous is a blessing,
but the name of the wicked will rot.

⁸The wise in heart accept commands,
but a babbling fool will come to ruin.

⁹Whoever walks with integrity walks securely, but whoever makes their ways crooked will be found out.

¹⁰Whoever winks with the eye causes pain, and a babbling fool will come to ruin.

¹¹The mouth of the righteous is a fountain of life,
but the mouth of the wicked conceals violence.

¹²Hatred stirs up conflicts,
but love covers all offenses.

¹³On the lips of the discerning, wisdom is found, but a rod is for the back of the one who lacks sense.

¹⁴The wise store up knowledge,
but the mouth of the fool invites ruin.

¹⁵The wealth of the rich is their fortified city;
the poverty of the poor is their ruin.

- ¹⁶The earnings of the righteous lead to life;
the income of the wicked leads to sin.
- ¹⁷Whoever heeds discipline is on the path to life,
but whoever ignores correction goes astray.
- ¹⁸Whoever conceals hatred has lying lips,
and whoever spreads slander is a fool.
- ¹⁹Where words are many, sin is not absent;
but whoever restrains his lips acts wisely.
- ²⁰The tongue of the righteous is choice silver;
the heart of the wicked is worth little.
- ²¹The lips of the righteous nourish many,
but fools die for lack of sense.
- ²²The blessing of the LORD — it makes rich, and He adds no sorrow with it.
- ²³Doing wickedness is like sport to a fool,
but wisdom is natural to a person of understanding.
- ²⁴What the wicked dread will come upon them,
but the desire of the righteous will be granted.
- ²⁵When the storm passes, the wicked are gone,
but the righteous stand on an everlasting foundation.
- ²⁶Like vinegar to the teeth and smoke to the eyes,
so is the sluggard to those who send him.
- ²⁷The fear of the LORD adds days,
but the years of the wicked are cut short.
- ²⁸The hope of the righteous brings joy,
but the expectation of the wicked will perish.
- ²⁹The way of the LORD is a stronghold for the blameless, but destruction for evildoers.
- ³⁰The righteous will never be shaken,
but the wicked will not inhabit the land.
- ³¹The mouth of the righteous bears the fruit of wisdom,
but the perverse tongue will be cut off.
- ³²The lips of the righteous know what is fitting,
but the mouth of the wicked speaks perversity.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription mishle Shelomoh ('proverbs of Solomon') marks the beginning of the main collection. The first proverb grounds everything in the family: the ben chakham ('wise son') produces simchah ('joy') for the father, while the ben kesil ('foolish son') produces tugal ('grief, sorrow') for the mother. The asymmetry of father/mother rather than father/father is typical of Proverbs' inclusive parallelism — both parents are affected, though named separately.
2. Otsrot resha ('treasures of wickedness') — wealth acquired through evil means — lo yo'ilu ('do not profit, provide no benefit'). Against this, tsedaqah ('righteousness') tatsil mimavet ('delivers from death'). The proverb compresses a massive theological claim into a single line: moral character, not material wealth, determines survival.
3. YHWH lo yar'iv ('the LORD will not cause to hunger') the nefesh tsaddiq ('soul/appetite of the righteous'). God actively provides for the righteous. Conversely, havvat resha'im yehdof ('the desire/craving of the wicked He pushes away, He repels'). The verb hadaf ('to push, to thrust, to drive away') is forceful — God actively resists the wicked's desires.
4. The double meaning of remiyyah ('slack' and 'deceitful') links laziness to dishonesty — both are forms of failure to do what the situation requires. The sluggard and the fraud are, at root, the same character.
5. The ant lesson of 6:6-8 returns in proverbial form. The oger baqqayits ('one who gathers in summer') is a ben maskil ('a prudent/wise son'). The nirdam baqqatsir ('one who sleeps deeply during harvest') is a ben mevish ('a son who causes shame, who brings disgrace'). Harvest is time-sensitive — the grain will rot or fall if not gathered promptly. Sleeping through harvest is not merely lazy but destructive.
6. Berakhot ('blessings') rest on the rosh tsaddiq ('head of the righteous') like a crown. The pi resha'im ('mouth of the wicked') yekhasseh chamas ('covers/conceals violence'). The wicked person's mouth is a cover for violence — what comes out as words hides what lives within as malice. The contrast between visible blessing and concealed violence is sharp.
7. In Hebrew culture, the shem ('name') is not a label but an identity — it carries the person's character and reputation forward through time. A rotting name is a rotting legacy. The most feared fate in ancient Israel was not death but being forgotten or remembered with disgust.
8. Chakham lev ('wise of heart') yiqqach mitsvot ('receives/accepts commands') — the wise are teachable, willing to take direction. The evil sefatayim ('fool of lips, babbling fool') yillabet ('will be tripped up, will stumble, will come to ruin'). The contrast is between receiving (wise) and producing without receiving (fool). The fool talks when he should listen and stumbles because his mouth is open when his ears should be.
9. Holekh batom ('the one walking in integrity/wholeness') yelekh betach ('walks securely, walks confidently'). The tom ('integrity') produces betach ('security') — the honest person has nothing to hide and therefore nothing to fear. The me'aqqesh derakhav ('the one who makes crooked his ways') yivvadea ('will be known, will be found out, will be exposed'). The crooked cannot stay hidden forever.
10. Qorets ayin ('one who winks the eye') echoes the troublemaker of 6:13. The wink signals deception and conspiracy. The second line repeats 10:8b exactly — the babbling fool appears twice in this chapter, reinforcing the danger of uncontrolled speech.
11. Pi tsaddiq ('the mouth of the righteous') is a meqor chayyim ('fountain/source of life'). The same meqor ('source, spring') imagery from 4:23 ('springs of life') now flows through the righteous person's speech. Words from the righteous give life. The second line repeats verse 6b — the wicked mouth covers violence.
12. The covering of pasha'im ('offenses, transgressions, rebellions') by love is not denial or enabling but a choice about what to do with information. The hateful person uses offenses as weapons; the loving person uses discretion as a shield.
13. The navon ('discerning person') carries wisdom on his lips — it is available, ready, findable. The chasar lev ('one lacking sense/heart') receives a shevet ('rod, staff') on the gev ('back'). What the wise communicate through words, the fool must learn through pain. The rod is not cruelty but the only pedagogy the fool's closed ears will accept.
14. Chakhamim yitspe'nu da'at ('the wise treasure/store up knowledge') — the same verb tsaphan from 2:1. The wise accumulate knowledge like savings. The pi evil ('mouth of the fool') is mechittah qerovah ('near destruction, destruction is close'). The fool's mouth is not a fountain of life (v11) but a proximity alarm for catastrophe.
15. Hon ashir ('the wealth of the rich person') is qiryat uzzo ('his city of strength, his fortified city') — wealth provides protection, security, a wall against misfortune. Mechittat dallim resham ('the ruin of the poor is their poverty') — poverty is not merely uncomfortable but destructive, leaving the poor exposed to every threat the wealthy are shielded from. The proverb observes without prescribing — it does not say this arrangement is just, only that it exists.
16. Pe'ullat tsaddiq ('the work/wages of the righteous') leads lechayyim ('to life'). Tevu'at rasha ('the produce/income of the wicked') leads lechatta't ('to sin'). Wealth itself is morally neutral — what matters is whose hands it is in. In the hands of the righteous, earnings produce more life; in the hands of the wicked, income funds more sin.
17. Shomer musar ('the one who guards discipline') is on an orach lechayyim ('path to life'). The ozev tokhachat ('the one who abandons correction') mat'eh ('wanders, leads astray, causes to err'). The hinge between life and death is not talent or luck but the willingness to be corrected.

- 18. Two speech-sins: mekhasseh sin'ah ('concealing hatred') behind siftei shaqer ('lips of falsehood') — pretending friendship while harboring malice. And motsi dibbah ('spreading slander, putting out a bad report'). Both are foolish because both corrupt the social fabric that sustains community.
- 19. Berov devarim lo yechdal pasha ('in a multitude of words, transgression does not cease') — the more you talk, the more likely you are to sin. The probability of offense increases with volume. Vechosekh sefatav maskil ('but the one who holds back his lips is prudent'). Restraint of speech is a hallmark of wisdom throughout Proverbs. The wise speak less not because they know less but because they know enough to be careful.
- 20. Leshon tsaddiq ('the tongue of the righteous') is keseph nivchar ('choice silver, selected silver') — refined, tested, valuable. Lev resha'im ('the heart of the wicked') is kim'at ('like a little, worth little, nearly nothing'). The righteous person's speech is precious metal; the wicked person's entire inner life is nearly worthless.
- 21. Sifte tsaddiq yir'u rabbim ('the lips of the righteous shepherd/feed many') — the verb ra'ah ('to shepherd, to feed, to tend') applies pastoral imagery to speech. The righteous person's words feed the community as a shepherd feeds a flock. Evilim bachsar lev yamutu ('fools die in their lack of heart'). The absence of the heart/sense that wisdom provides is literally fatal.
- 22. Birkat YHWH hi ta'ashir ('the blessing of the LORD — it enriches'). The pronoun hi ('it') is emphatic: the blessing itself does the work. Velo yosif etsev immah ('and He does not add pain/toil/sorrow with it'). Wealth from God comes without the etsev ('pain, toil, grief') that accompanies wealth gained through overwork or dishonesty. This is not a promise that the blessed never suffer but that God's blessing does not carry a hidden cost.
- 23. Kisechoq likhsil asot zimmah ('like laughter/sport to a fool is doing wickedness') — the fool treats evil as entertainment, as a game. But chokmah le-ish tevunah ('wisdom belongs to a person of understanding') — wisdom comes as naturally to the discerning as depravity comes to the fool. What each finds easy reveals what each is.
- 24. Megorat rasha ('the dread/fear of the wicked person') hi tevo'ennu ('it will come upon him') — the wicked person's worst fear becomes reality. Ta'avat tsaddiqim yitten ('the desire of the righteous He gives, He grants'). The proverb asserts a moral symmetry: dread comes true for the wicked; desire comes true for the righteous.
- 25. Ka'avor sufah ('when the whirlwind passes through') ve-ein rasha ('the wicked is no more, the wicked has vanished'). The storm imagery from 1:27 returns: the wicked are swept away like chaff. Vetsaddiq yesod olam ('but the righteous is a foundation of eternity') — the righteous person is as permanent as a building's foundation. The storm test separates the rooted from the rootless — echoing Jesus' later parable of the house on the rock (Matthew 7:24-27).
- 26. Two sensory irritants: chomets ('vinegar') that sets the teeth on edge and ashan ('smoke') that stings the eyes. The atsel ('sluggard') produces the same effect on those who rely on him — persistent, low-grade irritation that makes everything harder. The sluggard does not merely fail to perform; he actively aggravates everyone depending on him.
- 27. Yirat YHWH toshif yamim ('the fear of the LORD adds days') — long life again as the fruit of right relationship with God. Ushenot resha'im tiqtsornah ('but the years of the wicked will be shortened, cut short'). The verb qatsar ('to be short, to reap, to harvest early') suggests premature death — the wicked do not live out their allotted years.
- 28. Tocheleth tsaddiqim simchah ('the hope/waiting of the righteous is joy') — what the righteous wait for arrives, producing simchah ('gladness, joy'). Tiqvah resha'im toved ('the hope/cord/expectation of the wicked perishes'). The tiqvah can mean both 'hope' and 'cord, line' — the wicked person's lifeline snaps.
- 29. Derekh YHWH ('the way of the LORD') is ma'oz ('stronghold, refuge, fortress') for the tam ('blameless, person of integrity') but mechittah ('destruction, ruin') for po'ale aven ('workers of iniquity'). The same divine way functions as both protection and destruction depending on who encounters it.
- 30. Tsaddiq le-olam bal yimmot ('the righteous person forever will not be moved, will not totter') echoes Psalm 15:5 and Psalm 16:8. Urshe'aim lo yishkenu erets ('but the wicked will not dwell in the land') reprises 2:21-22 — the land-theology of Deuteronomy applied to individual ethics.
- 31. Pi tsaddiq yanuv chokmah ('the mouth of the righteous buds/bears fruit of wisdom') — the verb nuv ('to bear fruit, to flourish, to sprout') presents the righteous mouth as a fruit tree, connecting to the tree-of-life imagery of 3:18. Ulshon tahpukhot tikkaret ('but the tongue of perversity will be cut off') — the karath ('to cut off') is the language of covenant severance and death.
- 32. Sifte tsaddiq yed'un ratson ('the lips of the righteous know what is acceptable, what is fitting, what pleases'). The verb yada ('to know') applied to lips means they have the discernment to speak the right word at the right time. Pi resha'im tahpukhot ('the mouth of the wicked — perversity'). The chapter ends as it has run: righteous speech gives life; wicked speech inverts reality. The thirty-two verses have returned again and again to the same point: what comes out of the mouth reveals and determines who you are.

Summary: Proverbs 11 continues the Solomonic collection of antithetic proverbs, pairing righteous and wicked conduct in nearly every verse. The chapter's dominant concern is the social consequences of character: how honesty or dishonesty, generosity or greed, humility or arrogance shape a person's standing in the community and determine their ultimate fate.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter exhibits an almost obsessive interest in economic justice. Dishonest scales open the chapter, and the theme of wealth — how it is gained, how it is used, whether it endures — runs through at least a third of the verses. The collection insists that generosity produces abundance while hoarding produces scarcity, an economic paradox that defies conventional logic. The repeated claim that righteousness delivers from death is not a promise of immortality but a statement about the structural reliability of moral order: those who live rightly avoid the traps that destroy the wicked.

Translation Friction: The clean antithesis between righteous and wicked outcomes in these proverbs represents idealized wisdom. The sages knew that life often fails to match these tidy pairings — Job and Ecclesiastes exist as canonical correctives. These proverbs function as general observations about how the moral order tends to work, not as ironclad guarantees. The modern reader must hold them in tension with the rest of the wisdom tradition.

Connections: The dishonest-scales imagery in verse 1 echoes Leviticus 19:35-36 and Deuteronomy 25:13-16, where fraudulent weights are called an abomination to the LORD. The generosity paradox in verses 24-25 anticipates the teaching of Jesus in Luke 6:38. The 'gold ring in a pig's snout' metaphor of verse 22 is unique in the Hebrew Bible — a vivid image found nowhere else in Scripture.

- ¹Dishonest scales are detestable to the LORD, but an accurate weight is His delight.
- ²When arrogance arrives, disgrace follows,
but wisdom stays with the humble.
- ³The integrity of the upright guides them,
but the crookedness of the treacherous destroys them.
- ⁴Wealth is useless on the day of fury,
but righteousness rescues from death.
- ⁵The righteousness of the blameless makes his path straight,
but the wicked falls by his own wickedness.
- ⁶The righteousness of the upright rescues them,
but the treacherous are trapped by their own craving.
- ⁷When a wicked person dies, his hope perishes, and the expectation of the powerful comes to nothing.
- ⁸The righteous is rescued from distress, and the wicked steps into his place.
- ⁹With his mouth a godless person destroys his neighbor,
but through knowledge the righteous are rescued.

¹⁰When the righteous prosper, the city celebrates;
when the wicked perish, there is joyful shouting.

¹¹By the blessing of the upright a city is lifted up, but by the mouth of the wicked it is torn down.

¹²Whoever despises his neighbor lacks sense, but a person of understanding keeps silent.

¹³A gossip reveals secrets,
but a trustworthy person conceals a matter.

¹⁴Without guidance a people falls,
but safety comes through many advisors.

¹⁵Whoever guarantees a loan for a stranger will suffer for it, but the one who refuses to pledge is secure.

¹⁶A gracious woman holds on to honor, and ruthless men hold on to wealth.

¹⁷A person of faithful love benefits himself,
but a cruel person brings trouble on his own body.

¹⁸The wicked earns deceptive wages,
but the one who sows righteousness reaps a genuine reward.

¹⁹Genuine righteousness leads to life,
but whoever chases evil chases his own death.

²⁰The twisted in heart are detestable to the LORD,
but those whose way is blameless are His delight.

²¹Be assured: the wicked will not go unpunished, but the offspring of the righteous will escape.

²²A gold ring in a pig's snout — that is a beautiful woman who abandons good sense.

²³The desire of the righteous leads only to good;
the hope of the wicked leads to fury.

²⁴One person gives freely and gains even more;
another withholds what is right and ends up in want.

²⁵A generous person will be enriched, and whoever refreshes others will himself be refreshed.

²⁶People curse whoever hoards grain, but blessing rests on the head of the one who sells it.

²⁷Whoever earnestly seeks good finds favor, but whoever pursues evil — it will find him.

²⁸Whoever trusts in his wealth will fall,
but the righteous will flourish like a green leaf.

²⁹Whoever brings trouble on his household will inherit wind, and a fool will serve the wise in heart.

³⁰The fruit of the righteous is a tree of life, and the one who captures lives is wise.

³¹If even the righteous receives what he deserves on earth, how much more the wicked and the sinner!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word even ('stone') refers to the stone weights used on balance scales in ancient commerce. An even shelemah is a weight that has not been shaved down or hollowed out to defraud.
1. The pairing of to'evah ('abomination') and ratson ('delight') establishes the emotional poles of God's response to human conduct. What disgusts God and what pleases God — the chapter will elaborate both categories.
2. The Hebrew is strikingly compressed: ba zadon va-yavo qalon — 'comes arrogance, and comes disgrace.' The two arrivals are presented as virtually simultaneous, as though arrogance carries disgrace inside it like cargo.
2. The tsenu'im ('humble, modest') are not self-deprecating people but those who have an accurate assessment of their own position. Wisdom resides with them because they remain teachable.
3. Tumamah ('integrity, completeness, wholeness') comes from the same root as tam ('blameless, complete'). It describes a person whose inner character and outward conduct are aligned — no hidden agenda, no double life.
3. Selef ('crookedness, perverseness') suggests something twisted or distorted. The treacherous are destroyed not by external enemies but by their own warped character.
4. The 'day of wrath' is not necessarily eschatological. In wisdom literature, it refers to any moment of crisis when a person's true resources are tested. Wealth fails the test; character passes it.
5. The tamim ('blameless, complete') is not sinless but wholehearted — a person of undivided loyalty. His righteousness functions as a road-straightener, removing obstacles and keeping the way clear.
5. The reflexive logic is crucial: the wicked falls be-rish'ato ('by his own wickedness'). No external agent is needed. Wickedness is self-destructing.
6. Havvat ('craving, desire, greed, destructive appetite') is from havvah, which carries overtones of ruin and disaster. The treacherous are not trapped by external snares but by their own disordered desires.
7. The onim ('powerful, vigorous') in the parallel line may refer to those who trust in their own strength or resources. Death neutralizes every advantage. The verse is a memento mori — a reminder that death exposes the bankruptcy of a life built on wickedness or raw power.
8. The image is of a swap: the righteous escapes the trap, and the wicked walks into the same trap. The Hebrew tachatav ('in his place, instead of him') suggests a direct substitution — the wicked inherits the trouble that was meant for the righteous.
9. Chanef ('godless, profane, hypocritical') describes someone whose speech is disconnected from truth or loyalty. The mouth becomes a weapon of destruction against the re'a ('neighbor, companion, fellow'). Knowledge — da'at, discernment that sees through deception — is the righteous person's defense.
10. The qiryah ('city, town') is the social unit that benefits or suffers from the character of its members. Individual righteousness has communal consequences — the city itself rejoices. The double celebration (for righteous flourishing and wicked removal) underscores how deeply the community's welfare depends on moral leadership.
11. Birkat ('blessing of') suggests both the prayers and the beneficial influence of the upright. Their presence elevates the entire community. The wicked's mouth — their counsel, slander, and deceitful speech — has the opposite effect, pulling the social fabric apart.
12. Chasar lev ('lacking heart') means lacking judgment or intelligence — the 'heart' in Hebrew is the seat of thought, not emotion. Contempt for a neighbor reveals intellectual emptiness. The person of understanding (tevunot, 'discernments') knows when silence is the wiser course.

13. Rakhil ('gossip, slanderer, talebearer') is someone who trades in other people's confidences. The ne'eman ruach ('faithful of spirit, trustworthy in character') is the opposite — a person who can be trusted with sensitive information because their loyalty runs deeper than the thrill of sharing secrets.
14. Tachbulot ('guidance, direction, steering') comes from a nautical metaphor — the word is related to the ropes used to steer a ship. A nation without skilled navigation will capsize. The teshu'ah ('deliverance, salvation, safety') comes through rov yo'ets ('abundance of counselors') — the wisdom of collective deliberation.
15. The arav ('to pledge, to become surety') involves taking on financial liability for another person's debt. The sages consistently warn against this practice — not because generosity is wrong, but because pledging for a stranger (zar) puts one's household at risk for someone whose reliability is unknown.
16. The contrast is subtle: the eshet chen ('woman of grace, gracious woman') grasps kavod ('honor, dignity, weight'), while the aritsim ('ruthless, violent, tyrannical') grasp only osher ('riches'). The implication is that honor outranks wealth, and that the means of acquisition matter — grace versus ruthlessness.
17. The ish chesed ('person of faithful love') is someone whose habitual posture toward others is loyal kindness. The remarkable claim is that this benefits his own nefesh ('soul, self, life') — kindness is not self-sacrifice but self-nourishment. The akhzari ('cruel, merciless') person, by contrast, oker she'ero ('troubles his own flesh') — cruelty consumes the one who practices it.
18. The agricultural metaphor — sowing and reaping — frames moral conduct as an investment. The wicked's pe'ullat shaqer ('wages of falsehood') look profitable but prove hollow. The one who sows tsedaqah ('righteousness') receives sekher emet ('a reward of truth, a genuine reward') — returns that are real and lasting.
19. The verb meradef ('pursuing, chasing') gives the wicked an active, aggressive posture — they are not passively drifting toward evil but running after it. The irony is that what they are actually running toward is their own death.
20. Iqqeshe lev ('twisted of heart, crooked-hearted') describes people whose inner orientation is warped — they cannot think straight because their core is bent. The temime derekh ('blameless of way, those whose path is whole') are not perfect but integrated — their conduct matches their convictions.
21. The idiom yad le-yad ('hand to hand') likely means 'you can count on this' or 'I guarantee it' — a handshake of certainty. The zera tsaddiqim ('seed of the righteous, offspring of the righteous') extends the promise across generations: the consequences of righteous living benefit one's children.
22. This is one of the most vivid images in Proverbs. The nezem zahav ('gold ring') is a valuable nose ring, a mark of beauty and status. Placing it in the af hazir ('snout of a pig') creates a jarring absurdity — the precious ornament is wasted on an animal that will drag it through mud. A woman who is yafah ('beautiful') but sarat ta'am ('turned aside from taste/sense, lacking discretion') represents the same mismatch between external form and internal substance.
23. The ta'avah ('desire, longing, appetite') of the righteous is directed toward tov ('good') — their wants align with what is genuinely beneficial. The wicked's tiqvah ('hope, expectation') terminates in evrah ('fury, wrath, overflow') — what they anticipate and pursue circles back to destroy them.
24. The verb mefazer literally means 'to scatter' — the image is of a sower broadcasting seed. Generosity is presented as an investment, not a loss. The word yosher ('uprightness, what is right') in the second line suggests that withholding is not merely stingy but morally wrong.
25. Nefesh berakhah ('a soul of blessing, a generous soul') is tedusshan ('will be made fat, will be enriched') — in the ancient world, fatness was a sign of prosperity and health, not excess. The marveh ('one who waters, who gives drink, who saturates') gam hu yore ('he also will be watered') — the principle of reciprocity is built into the moral structure of reality.
26. The mone'a bar ('withholder of grain') is someone who stockpiles during famine to drive up prices — an ancient form of market manipulation. The community's response is to curse him (yiqqevuhu, 'they will pierce him with curses'). The mashbir ('one who sells, one who distributes grain') receives berakhah — communal blessing and divine favor.
27. The verb shocher ('seeking early, seeking earnestly') implies diligence and urgency — getting up at dawn to pursue something. The ironic reversal in the second line is sharp: the one who seeks evil does not need to find it; it comes to him (tevo'ennu, 'it will come upon him').
28. The boreach be-oshro ('one who trusts in his wealth') will yipol ('fall, collapse') — wealth makes a poor foundation. The righteous, by contrast, ke-aleh yifrachu ('like a leaf will flourish, sprout, bud'). The botanical image echoes Psalm 1:3 — the righteous are living things that grow, while the wealth-dependent are structures that collapse.
29. The oker beto ('troubler of his house') — the one who ruins his own family through greed, folly, or mismanagement — receives the most worthless inheritance imaginable: ruach ('wind'). You cannot hold wind, spend wind, or build on wind. The second line adds that the evil ('fool') ends up as eved ('servant') to the wise — foolishness leads to servitude.
30. The 'tree of life' in Proverbs is not identical to the tree in Eden but draws on the same symbolic reservoir — it represents access to enduring, flourishing life. The righteous person becomes this for others.
30. The phrase loqeach nefashot is ambiguous. Some read it as 'takes lives' (violence) to create an antithetic parallel, but the Masoretic accentuation pairs it with chakham ('wise'), favoring a positive reading: the wise person wins others over.

31. This closing verse uses a qal va-chomer argument (light to heavy, lesser to greater): if the righteous — who is aligned with God — still faces consequences for his failings in this life, then certainly the wicked and the sinner will face even greater consequences. The verse is a reality check: no one escapes accountability, and the wicked should not imagine that their reckoning is indefinitely postponed.

Summary: Proverbs 12 advances the Solomonic collection with twenty-eight antithetic proverbs centered on the practical consequences of speech, work, and character. The chapter gives sustained attention to the tongue — honest versus deceitful speech, reckless versus healing words — and to the value of diligent labor over laziness. It also introduces the theme of how people handle animals, making the care of livestock a moral indicator.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 10 stands out as one of the earliest ethical statements about animal welfare in ancient literature: the righteous person knows the nefesh ('life, being') of his animal. This is not sentimentality but recognition that how a person treats creatures under his authority reveals his character. The chapter also contains the striking claim that truthful speech endures forever while lying lasts only a moment (verse 19) — a statement about the structural durability of truth versus the fragility of deception.

Translation Friction: The sharp binary between the diligent and the lazy (verses 11, 24, 27) reflects an agrarian economy where hard physical work was the primary path to survival. Modern economic realities are more complex — systemic factors can override individual effort. The proverbs describe tendencies, not universal laws. Likewise, the claim that no harm befalls the righteous (verse 21) states an ideal that the rest of Scripture — and human experience — frequently complicates.

Connections: The 'tree of life' language from 11:30 continues implicitly through the agricultural imagery here. The concern with honest speech connects to the ninth commandment (Exodus 20:16). The righteous person's care for animals in verse 10 echoes Deuteronomy 25:4 ('you shall not muzzle an ox while it treads grain') and anticipates Jesus's argument from animal care in Luke 13:15.

¹Whoever loves discipline loves knowledge, but whoever hates correction is senseless.

²A good person draws favor from the LORD,
but a person who schemes He condemns.

³No one is established by wickedness, but the root of the righteous cannot be moved.

⁴A woman of strength is a crown to her husband,
but a disgraceful wife is like rot in his bones.

⁵The plans of the righteous aim at justice;
the schemes of the wicked aim at deceit.

⁶The words of the wicked ambush for blood,
but the mouth of the upright rescues them.

⁷The wicked are overturned and are gone,
but the household of the righteous stands firm.

⁸A person is praised according to his insight, but the twisted in heart will be despised.

⁹Better to be overlooked and have a servant than to boast of importance and lack bread.

¹⁰A righteous person knows the life of his animal,
but the compassion of the wicked is cruelty.

¹¹Whoever works his land will have plenty of bread, but whoever chases empty pursuits lacks sense.

¹²The wicked covets the plunder of evil people,
but the root of the righteous bears fruit.

¹³The wicked is trapped by the sin of his lips,
but the righteous escapes from distress.

¹⁴From the fruit of his mouth a person is filled with good,
and the work of his hands comes back to him.

¹⁵The way of a fool seems right to him,
but a wise person listens to advice.

¹⁶A fool's irritation is known at once,
but a shrewd person conceals an insult.

¹⁷A truthful witness declares what is right, but a false witness speaks deceit.

¹⁸There is reckless talk that cuts like sword thrusts, but the tongue of the wise brings healing.

¹⁹Truthful speech endures forever,
but a lying tongue lasts only a moment.

²⁰Deceit fills the heart of those who plot evil,
but those who counsel peace find joy.

²¹No real harm befalls the righteous,
but the wicked are filled with trouble.

²²Lying lips are detestable to the LORD,
but those who act faithfully are His delight.

²³A shrewd person conceals his knowledge,
but the heart of fools broadcasts foolishness.

²⁴The hand of the diligent will rule, but laziness leads to forced labor.

²⁵Anxiety in a person's heart weighs it down,
but a good word lifts it up.

²⁶The righteous guides his neighbor well,
but the way of the wicked leads them astray.

²⁷The lazy person does not roast what he catches, but diligence is a person's precious wealth.

²⁸On the path of righteousness there is life;
along that road there is no death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Musar ('discipline, correction, instruction') is the word for formative training that includes rebuke. Loving musar means welcoming the painful process of being corrected. The sone tokachat ('hater of correction') is ba'ar ('brutish, like an animal, senseless') — a harsh comparison, suggesting that rejecting correction is subhuman.
2. The verb yafiq ('draws out, obtains, brings forth') suggests that the good person's relationship with God naturally produces ratson ('favor'). The ish mezimmot ('person of plots, schemer') receives condemnation — yarshi'a, from the same root as rasha ('wicked'), meaning God declares him guilty.
3. The contrast is between instability and rootedness. Wickedness cannot provide yikon ('a firm foundation, an established position'). The righteous have a shoresh ('root') that bal yimmot ('will not be shaken, will not be dislodged'). The botanical metaphor continues from chapter 11: the righteous are rooted; the wicked are rootless.
4. Eshet chayil is notoriously difficult to translate. Chayil means 'strength, valor, capability, wealth, army.' The woman described is not merely 'virtuous' in a passive sense but formidable — strong, competent, and worthy of respect. We render it 'woman of strength' to preserve the active force of the Hebrew.
5. Machshevot ('thoughts, plans, intentions') and tachbulot ('schemes, guidance, steering') are both words for deliberate mental activity. The difference is their orientation: the righteous plan toward mishpat ('justice, right judgment') while the wicked steer toward mirmah ('deceit, fraud').
6. The wicked's speech is personified as a predator lying in wait (erov dam, 'ambush of blood'). Words become weapons — false testimony, slander, manipulation that leads to someone's destruction. The upright's mouth, by contrast, has saving power — honest speech delivers people from danger.
7. Hafokh ('overturned, upended') uses the same verb applied to the destruction of Sodom. The wicked are flipped and ve-einam ('and they are not, and they are gone') — total erasure. The beit tsaddiqim ('house of the righteous') — their family, lineage, and legacy — ya'amod ('stands, endures').
8. Sekhel ('insight, prudence, good sense') is the quality that earns a person communal respect. The na'aveh lev ('twisted of heart, warped in mind') — someone whose inner orientation is distorted — will ultimately be despised regardless of outward appearance or temporary success.
9. This 'better than' proverb punctures social pretension. The niqleh ('lightly esteemed, overlooked, despised') who has a servant — meaning he has enough resources to sustain a household — is better off than the mitkabbed ('one who glorifies himself, who puts on airs') who chasar lachem ('lacks bread'). Substance beats performance.
10. The use of nefesh ('soul, life, being') for the animal is significant. Hebrew does not restrict nefesh to humans — animals are nefesh chayyah ('living beings') in Genesis 1. The righteous person recognizes the animal's experience as real.
10. The oxymoron 'the compassion of the wicked is cruelty' suggests that wickedness distorts even good impulses. A wicked person's version of mercy may be self-serving, manipulative, or ultimately harmful.
11. The oved admato ('worker of his ground') is the diligent farmer whose labor produces yisba lachem ('satisfaction of bread, plenty of food'). The meradeq reqim ('pursuer of empty things') — one who chases get-rich-quick schemes or idle fantasies — ends up chasar lev ('lacking heart/sense'). Honest work produces; chasing illusions wastes.
12. The chamad ('covets, desires intensely') of the wicked is directed at metsod ra'im ('the net/catch/plunder of evil people') — he envies the ill-gotten gains of other wicked people. The righteous, by contrast, have a shoresh ('root') that yitten ('gives, produces, yields') — their productivity comes from depth, not theft.
13. The pesha sefatayim ('transgression of lips') becomes a moqesh ('snare, trap') — the wicked's own words ensnare him. The righteous, however, manages to exit (yetse, 'goes out, escapes') from tsarah ('distress, trouble'). Honest speech keeps a person free; dishonest speech binds.
14. The metaphor of 'fruit of the mouth' treats speech as productive labor — words generate consequences the way trees generate fruit. The parallel line extends the principle to manual work: gemul yede adam ('the dealing/reward of a person's hands') yashiv lo ('returns to him'). Both speech and labor create a return — positive or negative — that circles back to the source.
15. The evil ('fool') suffers from moral blindness: his path appears yashar ('straight, right, correct') be-einav ('in his own eyes'). Self-assessment without external input is unreliable. The wise person, by contrast, is shome'a le-etsah ('one who listens to counsel') — teachability is the hallmark of wisdom.

16. The fool's emotional response is ba-yom yivvade'a ('known on the same day, known immediately') — he cannot contain his anger; it spills out the moment he feels it. The arum ('shrewd, prudent, clever') person, however, koseh qalon ('covers disgrace, conceals the insult') — he absorbs the offense without public reaction, choosing the strategic response over the reflexive one.
17. The yafiach emunah ('one who breathes out faithfulness') — the verb suggests that truth flows from this person as naturally as breath. He yaggid tsedeq ('declares what is right, announces justice'). The ed sheqarim ('witness of falsehoods') produces mirmah ('deceit, fraud'). The courtroom setting is implied — reliable versus unreliable testimony.
18. The verb boteh is rare and suggests reckless, uncontrolled speech — blurting without thinking. The damage is compared to sword wounds, suggesting that verbal injury can be as real and painful as physical violence.
18. Marpe ('healing') comes from the root rapha ('to heal, to mend'). The wise person's speech functions as medicine — it repairs what has been damaged.
19. The sefat emet ('lip of truth') tikkon la'ad ('is established forever, stands permanently'). Truth has structural integrity — it does not need to be propped up or maintained because it corresponds to reality. The leshon shaqer ('tongue of falsehood') lasts only ad argi'ah ('until a blink, for a moment') — lies have no staying power because they have no foundation.
20. The chorshe ra ('plotters of evil, devisers of harm') carry mirmah ('deceit') in their hearts — deception is their inner reality, not just their outward behavior. The yo'atse shalom ('counselors of peace') experience simchah ('joy, gladness'). Working toward shalom — wholeness, well-being, communal harmony — produces inner satisfaction that plotting evil never can.
21. The bold claim that lo ye'unneh la-tsaddiq kol aven ('no evil/mischief befalls the righteous') expresses the confidence of wisdom theology at its most optimistic. The sages are not blind to suffering — but they assert that the righteous person's core is protected even when external circumstances are difficult. The wicked, by contrast, male'u ra ('are filled with evil/trouble') — saturated with the consequences of their own choices.
22. This verse echoes 11:1 in structure: to'evah Yahweh ('abomination to the LORD') paired with retsono ('His delight'). Lying lips provoke divine revulsion; oseh emunah ('doers of faithfulness, those who act reliably') earn divine pleasure. The God of Proverbs cares intensely about honesty.
23. The arum ('shrewd, prudent') person koseh da'at ('covers knowledge') — he does not display everything he knows but reveals it strategically. The fool's heart yiqra ivvelet ('calls out, proclaims foolishness') — it cannot help advertising its emptiness. Wisdom knows when to speak and when to withhold.
24. The charutsim ('diligent, sharp, decisive') — from a root meaning 'to cut, to be sharp' — gain authority (timshol, 'will rule'). The remiyyah ('laziness, slack hand, negligence') leads to mas ('forced labor, tribute labor, corvee'). In the ancient economy, those who failed to manage their own resources ended up working someone else's fields as conscripted labor.
25. De'agah ('anxiety, worry, care') in the heart yashchannah ('causes it to bow down, depresses it'). The remedy is simple and powerful: davar tov ('a good word') yesamm'channah ('makes it glad, lifts it'). The sages recognized the connection between emotional health and speech — the right word at the right time has real therapeutic power.
26. The verb yater is debated. It may mean 'explores, scouts out' (from tur) — the righteous person scouts the path for his neighbor, serving as a guide. The wicked's path, by contrast, tat'em ('causes them to wander, leads them astray'). The righteous person's moral clarity benefits those around him.
27. The image is vivid: the lazy person goes hunting but cannot be bothered to prepare the catch — the meat rots uneaten. All effort is wasted by the failure to follow through. The diligent person's hon ('wealth, substance') is yaqar ('precious, valuable') — not because he has more possessions but because he stewards them responsibly.
28. The chapter closes with a grand claim: orach tsedaqah ('the path of righteousness') is chayyim ('life'). The derekh netivah ('the way of the path, that road') is al mavet ('not death, no death'). Righteousness and life are mapped onto the same road. This is the core conviction of the Solomonic collection: the moral structure of reality rewards those who walk rightly.

Summary: Proverbs 13 continues the Solomonic antithetic collection with twenty-five proverbs that probe the relationship between discipline and wisdom, the deceptiveness of appearances, and the long-term consequences of how wealth is gained and used. The chapter gives special attention to the contrast between real and apparent prosperity, insisting that substance matters more than show.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 12 — 'Hope deferred makes the heart sick, but a desire fulfilled is a tree of life' — is one of the most psychologically acute observations in ancient literature. The sages understood that prolonged unfulfillment is not merely disappointing but physiologically damaging. The 'tree of life' metaphor, appearing here for the second of four times in Proverbs, frames fulfilled desire as a source of vital renewal. The chapter also contains the counterintuitive observation that some who appear rich have nothing while some who appear poor have great wealth (verse 7) — a warning against judging by surfaces.

Translation Friction: The claim that the righteous person 'has enough to satisfy his appetite' while 'the belly of the wicked goes empty' (verse 25) represents wisdom theology's confident assertion that moral order governs material outcomes. This is a general observation, not a universal guarantee — the sages themselves would acknowledge exceptions. The proverb about sparing the rod (verse 24) reflects ancient educational norms that modern readers must evaluate carefully within their cultural and ethical context.

Connections: The 'tree of life' in verse 12 connects to Proverbs 3:18, 11:30, and 15:4, forming a thematic thread through the collection. The concern with discipline (musar) in verses 1 and 24 echoes the parental instruction framework of chapters 1-9. The warning against wealth gained by fraud (verse 11) parallels the dishonest-scales concern of 11:1.

- ¹A wise son accepts his father's discipline, but a scoffer does not listen to rebuke.
- ²From the fruit of his mouth a person eats what is good,
but the appetite of the treacherous feeds on violence.
- ³Whoever guards his mouth protects his life,
but whoever opens his lips wide invites ruin.
- ⁴The lazy person craves but gets nothing;
the appetite of the diligent is richly satisfied.
- ⁵A righteous person hates a false word,
but the wicked makes himself repulsive and disgraceful.
- ⁶Righteousness guards the person of blameless conduct,
but wickedness brings down the sinner.
- ⁷One person pretends to be rich but has nothing;
another appears poor but has great wealth.
- ⁸A rich person's wealth is the ransom for his life,
but a poor person never even hears a threat.
- ⁹The light of the righteous burns brightly,
but the lamp of the wicked is snuffed out.
- ¹⁰Arrogance only breeds conflict,
but wisdom is with those who take advice.
- ¹¹Wealth gained from nothing dwindles,
but whoever gathers little by little grows rich.
- ¹²Hope drawn out makes the heart sick,
but a desire fulfilled is a tree of life.
- ¹³Whoever despises a word will be ruined by it,
but whoever respects a command will be rewarded.

¹⁴The instruction of a wise person is a fountain of life, turning one away from the snares of death.

¹⁵Good sense wins favor,
but the way of the treacherous is unyielding.

¹⁶Every shrewd person acts with knowledge,
but a fool displays his foolishness.

¹⁷A wicked messenger falls into trouble,
but a faithful envoy brings healing.

¹⁸Poverty and disgrace come to whoever rejects discipline, but whoever heeds correction will be honored.

¹⁹A desire fulfilled is sweet to the soul,
but fools find it detestable to turn from evil.

²⁰Walk with the wise and become wise;
keep company with fools and suffer harm.

²¹Trouble pursues sinners,
but good rewards the righteous.

²²A good person leaves an inheritance for his grandchildren, but the wealth of the sinner is stored up for the righteous.

²³Abundant food lies in the fallow ground of the poor,
but it is swept away through injustice.

²⁴Whoever withholds his rod hates his son,
but the one who loves him applies discipline early.

²⁵The righteous eats enough to satisfy his appetite, but the belly of the wicked goes empty.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The implied verb in the first line — 'accepts' or 'heeds' — must be supplied; the Hebrew simply says 'a wise son — a father's discipline.' The compression forces the reader to make the connection: wisdom and receptivity to parental musar go together. The lets ('scoffer, mocker') refuses ge'arah ('rebuke, reprimand') — his contempt for correction defines him.
2. The fruit metaphor for speech recurs from 12:14. Good speech produces good nourishment for the speaker. The nefesh bogedim ('appetite of the treacherous') consumes chamas ('violence') — they feed on destruction, and destruction feeds on them.
3. Notser piv ('guards his mouth') and shomer nafsho ('keeps his life') are equated — controlling speech is an act of self-preservation. The poseq sefatav ('one who opens wide his lips, who lets his mouth fly open') brings mechittah ('ruin, destruction, terror') upon himself. The mouth is either a gate that protects or a breach that exposes.
4. The atsel ('sluggard, lazy person') has desires — mit'avvah ('craving, wanting intensely') — but va-ayin ('and nothing, and there is not'). Desire without effort produces emptiness. The charutsim ('diligent') have their nefesh tedushshan ('made fat, richly satisfied'). The proverb is not about wanting less but about coupling desire with disciplined work.
5. The righteous yisna ('hates') devar shaqer ('a word of falsehood') — his revulsion toward lying is visceral, not merely intellectual. The wicked yav'ish ('makes a stink, becomes repulsive') and yachpir ('brings shame, acts disgracefully'). The language is sensory: wickedness literally smells bad.

6. Tsedaqah functions as a protective force — it tisor ('guards, preserves') the tom derekh ('one whose way is blameless'). Wickedness, by contrast, tesallef ('overturns, perverts, brings down') the chattat ('sinner, one who misses the mark'). Character protects or destroys depending on its orientation.
7. The hitpael verb forms (mit'asher, mitrosesh) indicate reflexive action — 'making oneself rich/poor,' acting the part. The emphasis is on performance versus substance. This proverb resists any simple equation between visible prosperity and actual well-being.
8. The kofer nefesh ('ransom of life') suggests that the wealthy person is a target — his riches buy him out of danger, but they also attract danger in the first place. The rash ('poor person') lo shama ge'arah ('does not hear rebuke/threat') — no one threatens or extorts him because he has nothing worth taking. Poverty has one unexpected advantage: obscurity.
9. Or ('light') for the righteous versus ner ('lamp') for the wicked — the righteous have a self-sustaining light that yismach ('rejoices, burns joyfully'), while the wicked have only a lamp, dependent on oil, that yid'akh ('is extinguished, goes dark'). The metaphor suggests that the righteous person's vitality is internally generated while the wicked person's prosperity requires constant external fuel.
10. The raq ('only, nothing but') is emphatic: the sole source of matsisah ('strife, conflict, quarreling') is zadon ('arrogance, presumption'). Every fight traces back to someone's pride. Wisdom, by contrast, dwells with the no'atsim ('those who allow themselves to be advised, the well-counseled'). Humility is the prerequisite for peace.
11. Hon me-hevel ('wealth from emptiness/vapor/fraud') — whether gained by fraud, speculation, or windfall — yim'at ('diminishes, becomes small'). The govets al yad ('one who gathers by hand, who accumulates gradually') yarbeh ('increases, multiplies'). The proverb endorses slow, honest accumulation over sudden riches. Easy money evaporates; earned money compounds.
12. The verb memushakhah ('drawn out, prolonged, delayed') emphasizes the duration of waiting. It is not the hope itself that sickens but the endless delay. This is an observation about human psychology, not a theological complaint.
12. The 'tree of life' — the second of four appearances in Proverbs — here symbolizes renewed vitality through fulfilled longing. It connects desire and life: when what we deeply need actually arrives, it is like gaining access to the source of life itself.
13. The baz le-davar ('one who despises a word/matter') will yechavel lo ('be pledged/ruined/destroyed for it'). The 'word' here likely means authoritative instruction — parental, wise, or divine. Contempt for instruction leads to ruin. The yere mitsvah ('one who fears/respects a command') is yeshullam ('is rewarded, is made whole').
14. Torat chakham ('the instruction of the wise') is a meqor chayyim ('fountain of life, spring of living water') — an image of constantly flowing, life-sustaining vitality. The purpose is lasur mi-moqshe mavet ('to turn aside from the snares of death') — wisdom's instruction steers a person around the traps that lead to destruction.
15. Sekhel tov ('good sense, sound judgment') produces chen ('grace, favor') — people are attracted to a person of good sense. The derekh bogedim ('way of the treacherous') is eitan ('hard, enduring, unyielding') — it is a path with no give, no flexibility, that ultimately grinds its walkers down.
16. The arum ('shrewd, prudent') person ya'aseh be-da'at ('acts with knowledge') — his decisions are informed, considered, based on evidence. The kesil ('fool') yifros ivelet ('spreads out foolishness, lays it open for display') as though putting it on exhibition. The fool advertises his deficiency.
17. The mal'akh rasha ('wicked messenger, unreliable envoy') yipol be-ra ('falls into evil/trouble') — he either corrupts the message or brings disaster through his unreliability. The tsir emunim ('faithful envoy, trustworthy messenger') is marpe ('healing') — he restores what was broken, delivers what was promised, and mends the relationship between sender and recipient.
18. The pore'a musar ('one who lets discipline go, who refuses correction') receives resh ('poverty') and qalon ('disgrace, shame'). The shomer tokhachat ('one who guards/heeds correction') yekhubad ('is honored, is treated with dignity'). The economic and social consequences of refusing to learn are real and measurable.
19. The ta'avah niyah ('a desire that has come into being, a desire that is realized') is te'erav la-nefesh ('sweet to the soul, pleasant to the being'). This echoes verse 12's tree-of-life language. The second line reveals why fools remain stuck: to'avat kesilim sur me-ra ('it is an abomination to fools to turn from evil') — they find the very idea of repentance repulsive.
20. Holekh et chakhamim yechkam ('one who walks with wise people will become wise') — wisdom is contagious; proximity to wise people shapes character. Ro'eh kesilim yeroa' ('one who companions with fools will be broken/harmed') — foolishness is equally contagious. The proverb is about the formative power of association.
21. Ra'ah ('evil, calamity, trouble') is personified as a pursuer — it hunts sinners down. The righteous receive the opposite: yeshalleim tov ('good is repaid to them'). The moral order is portrayed as self-enforcing: consequences track behavior.
22. The tov ('good person') has enough to bequeath not just to children but to bene vanim ('children's children, grandchildren') — a sign of sustained prosperity across generations. The cheil choter ('wealth of the sinner') is tsafun la-tsaddiq ('stored up for the righteous') — an ironic reversal where the sinner's ill-gotten gains end up benefiting those who live rightly.
23. The nir ra'shim ('newly broken ground of the poor') contains rov okhel ('abundant food') — the poor have productive potential. But yesh nispeh be-lo mishpat ('there is that which is swept away without justice/judgment') — social injustice destroys what the poor could produce. This verse contains a rare acknowledgment that poverty can result from systemic injustice, not just laziness.

24. The chosekh shivto ('one who withholds his rod') is described as sone veno ('hating his son') — a deliberately provocative statement. The parent who avoids correcting a child is not being kind but cruel, because the child will grow up unformed. The ohavo ('one who loves him') shicharo musar ('seeks him early with discipline, applies correction from the start'). Love, in the sages' framework, requires the willingness to cause short-term discomfort for long-term formation.
24. The 'rod' (shevet) in ancient wisdom literature represents parental authority and corrective discipline. The sages understood discipline as an expression of love, not its opposite.
25. The tsaddiq eats le-sova nafsho ('to the satisfaction of his being') — not luxury but sufficiency. His needs are met. The beten resha'im ('belly of the wicked') techsar ('is lacking, is deficient'). The wicked may have much but are never satisfied; the righteous may have little but have enough. The contrast is between contentment and insatiability as much as between wealth and poverty.

Summary: Proverbs 14 is the longest chapter in the Solomonic collection at thirty-five verses. It canvasses an extraordinary range of topics — the fear of the LORD, the reliability of witnesses, the nature of anger, the treatment of the poor, the deceptiveness of human self-assessment — weaving them into the persistent antithetic framework of wise versus foolish, righteous versus wicked. The chapter repeatedly returns to the question of what is real versus what merely appears to be real.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains two of the most quoted lines in Proverbs: 'There is a way that seems right to a person, but its end is the way of death' (verse 12) and 'In the fear of the LORD there is strong confidence' (verse 26). Verse 12 is so important that it is repeated verbatim in 16:25 — the only proverb in the Solomonic collection to appear twice in identical form. The chapter also contains a striking economic ethic: the one who oppresses the poor insults his Maker (verse 31), establishing a direct theological link between treatment of the vulnerable and relationship with God.

Translation Friction: Verse 4 — 'Where there are no oxen the manger is clean, but abundant harvest comes through the strength of an ox' — is a bracing piece of realism that cuts against any perfectionism. Productive life is messy. The clean manger produces nothing. Some readers may struggle with verse 13's observation that 'even in laughter the heart may be in pain' — the sages were not naive optimists but sharp observers of how people mask suffering with performance.

Connections: The 'way that seems right' in verse 12 connects to the two-ways theology of Psalm 1 and Deuteronomy 30:15-20. The fear of the LORD as a 'fountain of life' (verse 27) echoes 13:14 and anticipates the programmatic statement of 1:7. The connection between oppressing the poor and insulting God (verse 31) parallels Job 31:13-15 and anticipates Matthew 25:40.

and his children will have a refuge.

²⁷The fear of the LORD is a fountain of life,
turning one away from the snares of death.

but whoever shows grace to the needy honors Him.

³²The wicked is overthrown by his own calamity, but the righteous has refuge even in death.

³³Wisdom rests quietly in the heart of the discerning,
but among fools it makes itself known.

³⁴Righteousness elevates a nation,
but sin is a disgrace to any people.

³⁵A king's favor rests on a servant who acts wisely, but his fury falls on one who acts disgracefully.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Chakhemot nashim ('wisdom of women, the wisest among women') is an intensive plural — the wisest of the wise among women. She bantah vetah ('has built her house') — the bayit ('house') is both the physical home and the family unit, the household as a social and economic institution. The ivvelet ('foolish woman') be-yadehah tehersennah ('with her own hands tears it down'). The destruction is self-inflicted and deliberate, though perhaps unintentional in its consequences.
2. Walking be-yoshro ('in his uprightness') is equated with fearing the LORD — ethical conduct is the expression of reverence for God. The neloz derakhav ('one twisted in his paths, whose ways are crooked') is bozeihu ('one who despises Him') — moral crookedness is not merely poor behavior but active contempt for God.
3. The choter ga'avah ('rod/shoot of pride') in the fool's mouth means his arrogant speech becomes a rod that beats him — his own words punish him. The wise person's lips tishmoren ('guard them, protect them') — careful speech is self-defense.
4. This verse stands outside the typical righteous-versus-wicked framework and delivers pure agricultural pragmatism. Oxen eat, they defecate, they require care — but without them, the field cannot be plowed at scale. The clean manger is a sign of poverty, not efficiency.
5. The ed emunim ('faithful witness, reliable witness') lo yekhazzev ('does not deal falsely, does not lie') — his reliability is the negative: he simply does not do the thing that destroys trust. The ed shaqer ('witness of falsehood') yafiach kezavim ('breathes out lies') — deception flows from him as naturally as exhalation.

6. The lets ('scoffer') searches for wisdom but va-ayin ('and there is nothing') — his contemptuous attitude blocks reception. Wisdom requires humility, and the scoffer has none. For the navon ('discerning, understanding person') knowledge is naqal ('easy, accessible, light') — not because it requires no effort but because the discerning person's posture makes learning natural.
7. The imperative lekh mi-neged ('go from the front of, walk away from') is direct: leave the presence of a fool. The reason is pragmatic — bal yada'ta siftei da'at ('you will not know/find lips of knowledge') — there is nothing to learn there. Proximity to fools wastes time and may corrupt your own thinking.
8. The arum ('shrewd, prudent') person's wisdom consists in havin darkko ('understanding his way') — knowing where he is going, why, and what the costs and consequences will be. Self-knowledge is the foundation. The kesilim ('fools') practice mirmah ('deceit') — but the context suggests they deceive themselves above all. Foolishness is fundamentally a failure of self-understanding.
9. The evilim ('fools')yalits ash'am ('mock at guilt, scoff at the guilt offering') — they treat moral failure as a joke, refusing to take the consequences of wrongdoing seriously. Among the yesharim ('upright'), by contrast, there is ratson ('favor, acceptance, goodwill') — right relationships produce mutual respect and generosity.
10. This verse breaks from the antithetic pattern to make a single observation about the loneliness of inner experience. It anticipates modern psychology's recognition that subjective experience is ultimately incommunicable in its fullness.
11. The beit ('house') — suggesting permanence, solidity, stone construction — of the wicked will yishamed ('be destroyed, demolished'). The ohel ('tent') — suggesting fragility, impermanence, vulnerability — of the upright will yafriach ('flourish, blossom, bloom'). The reversal is deliberate: the seemingly solid is destroyed while the seemingly fragile thrives.
12. The word yashar ('straight, right, upright') is the same word used positively throughout Proverbs for moral uprightness. The irony is devastating: the path looks yashar but leads to death. Appearances of moral correctness can be fatally misleading.
12. The repetition of this exact verse in 16:25 is unique in the Solomonic collection. The sages considered this warning important enough to state twice — the danger of self-deception warranted double emphasis.
13. Gam bi-sechoq yikh'av lev ('even in laughter the heart is pained') — the sages observed that outward cheerfulness can mask inner suffering. People laugh while they hurt. And acharitah simchah tugah ('the end of joy is grief') — happiness does not last. This is not pessimism but observation: human emotional experience is layered and unstable.
14. The sug lev ('turned-back of heart, faithless, backslider') will yisba mi-derakhav ('be filled with his own ways') — his own conduct will become his punishment, forced to consume the consequences of his choices. The ish tov ('good person') is satisfied me-alav ('from what is above him, from himself') — likely meaning from the fruit of his own good conduct, or from God who is above.
15. The peti ('naive, gullible, simple') ya'amin le-khol davar ('believes every word') — he has no filter, no critical faculty, no ability to distinguish reliable information from nonsense. The arum ('shrewd') yavin la-ashuro ('understands his step, pays attention to where he is going'). Critical thinking is a survival skill.
16. The wise person yare ('fears, is cautious') and sar me-ra ('turns aside from evil') — his caution is not cowardice but prudence. The fool mit'abber ('crosses boundaries, acts recklessly') and bote'ach ('is confident, trusts himself'). False confidence is the fool's signature — he barges ahead where the wise person pauses.
17. Qetsar appayim ('short of nostrils, quick to anger') — the Hebrew locates anger in the nose, as flaring nostrils. A person whose fuse is short ya'aseh ivelet ('does foolishness') — anger produces bad decisions. The ish mezimot ('person of schemes, plotter') yissane ('is hated') — his reputation for manipulation makes him socially toxic.
18. The peta'im ('naive, gullible') nachalu ivelet ('inherit foolishness') — folly is their estate, what they receive by default when they fail to pursue wisdom. The arumim ('shrewd') yaktiru da'at ('crown themselves with knowledge') — knowledge becomes their ateret ('crown, diadem'), a mark of honor and authority.
19. Shachu ra'im lifne tovim ('the evil bow before the good') — the moral order ultimately reasserts itself, reversing apparent power dynamics. The wicked end up as supplicants al sha'are tsaddiq ('at the gates of the righteous') — seeking what only the righteous can provide.
20. This verse does not endorse the social dynamic it describes — it reports it. The rash ('poor person') yissane ('is disliked, hated') gam le-re'ehu ('even by his companion') — poverty isolates. The ashir ('rich person') has rabbim ohavim ('many who love him') — wealth attracts. The sages observed this pattern without approving it; subsequent verses (especially verse 31) will challenge it.
21. The baz le-re'ehu ('one who despises his neighbor') is choter ('sinning, missing the mark') — contempt for another person is a moral failure, not merely a social faux pas. The mechonon aniyim ('one who shows grace to the poor') receives ashra'v ('his blessedness, his happiness') — generosity toward the vulnerable produces human flourishing.
22. The rhetorical question expects a 'yes': the chorshe ra ('plotters of evil') yit'u ('go astray, wander, err'). Those who plan evil are themselves lost. The chorshe tov ('planners of good') receive chesed ve-emet ('faithful love and truth') — the paired divine attributes that characterize God's own covenant loyalty.

- 23. Be-khol etsev ('in all toil, in every painful exertion') yihyeh motar ('there will be surplus, profit, advantage'). Even difficult, unglamorous work produces results. But devar sefatayim ('word of lips, mere talk') akh le-machsor ('only to poverty, nothing but want'). Talk without action is economically catastrophic.
- 24. The wise wear their oshram ('wealth') as an ateret ('crown') — their prosperity adorns them and reflects their competence. The fools' ivvelet ('foolishness') is their only crown — they have nothing to display but their own folly. The repetition of ivvelet in both halves of the line may be textually difficult; some emend the second to a different word, but the Masoretic text emphasizes: all fools have to show for themselves is more foolishness.
- 25. The ed emet ('witness of truth') is matsil nefashot ('rescuer of lives/souls') — honest testimony in court or community literally preserves people from wrongful punishment or unjust treatment. The yafiach kezavim ('breather-out of lies') is mirmah ('deceit, fraud') — his testimony endangers others.
- 26. The pairing of fear (yir'ah) and confidence (mivtach) is deliberately paradoxical. The person who fears God has nothing else to fear, because the ultimate authority is already his refuge. This is not servile terror but awe that produces stability.
- 27. Nearly identical to 13:14, where 'the instruction of the wise' is the fountain of life. Here the fear of the LORD occupies the same structural position — suggesting that the fear of the LORD and wise instruction are functionally equivalent. Both are meqor chayyim ('fountain of life') and both serve lasur mi-moqshe mavet ('to turn aside from death's snares').
- 28. Be-rov am ('in abundance of people') is hadrat melekh ('the glory/majesty of a king'). A ruler's power depends on his people — without subjects, a king is nothing. Be-efes le'om ('in the absence of a nation') is mechittat rason ('the ruin of a prince/ruler'). This is political realism: leadership exists in relationship to community.
- 29. Erekh appayim ('long of nostrils, slow to anger, patient') has rav tevunah ('great understanding, abundant discernment'). Patience is not passive but a sign of deep comprehension. The qetsar ruach ('short of spirit, hasty-tempered') merim ivvelet ('lifts up, exalts, elevates foolishness') — his impatience puts folly on a pedestal.
- 30. Lev marpe ('a healing heart, a heart at peace, a tranquil heart') is chayyei vesarim ('the life of the flesh/body') — inner peace literally sustains physical health. Qin'ah ('envy, jealousy, passionate rivalry') is reqav atsamot ('rotteness of bones'). Envy does not merely distress the mind; it decays the body. The sages anticipated the psychosomatic insight that emotional states affect physical well-being.
- 31. The osehu ('his Maker') explicitly connects treatment of the poor to theology proper. God takes personally how people treat the vulnerable because the vulnerable bear His image. This principle resurfaces in Job 31:15 and in Jesus's parable of the sheep and goats (Matthew 25:40).
- 32. The rasha is yiddacheh ('driven away, thrust out') be-ra'ato ('in his calamity/evil'). The righteous, however, choseh be-moto ('takes refuge in his death') — an extraordinary claim that trust in God extends even through death. Some scholars emend 'in his death' to 'in his integrity' (be-tummo), but the Masoretic text stands as one of the Hebrew Bible's rare hints at hope beyond death.
- 33. Wisdom tanuach ('rests, settles, is at peace') in the heart of the navon ('discerning person') — it does not need to announce itself or prove itself. Among fools it tivvade'a ('makes itself known, is revealed') — possibly meaning that even among fools wisdom eventually becomes apparent, or that fools' lack of wisdom is obvious to all.
- 34. Tsedaqah teromem goy ('righteousness lifts up a nation') — this moves beyond individual ethics to political theology. National righteousness — justice, honesty, care for the vulnerable — elevates an entire people. Chattat ('sin, missing the mark') is chesed le'ummim — a much-debated phrase, likely meaning 'a disgrace/reproach to peoples.' National sin degrades a nation's standing and integrity.
- 35. The retson melekh ('king's favor') goes to the eved maskil ('servant who acts with insight, a competent servant'). The evrato ('his fury, his wrath') falls on the mevish ('one who causes shame, who acts disgracefully'). In the court setting, competence earns favor and incompetence earns wrath — a principle that applies beyond royal courts to any relationship where performance is evaluated.

Summary: Proverbs 15 is among the richest chapters in the Solomonic collection, weaving together the power of speech, the omniscience of God, the superiority of little-with-righteousness over much-with-injustice, and the irreplaceable value of discipline. The chapter opens and closes with speech — a gentle answer versus a harsh word — and fills the middle with a sustained meditation on what the LORD sees, what He loves, and what He finds detestable.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains the fourth and final 'tree of life' reference in Proverbs (verse 4: 'a healing tongue is a tree of life'), completing the metaphor's arc through the book. It also contains one of the strongest 'better than' clusters in Proverbs (verses 16-17), where the sages insist that a small amount with the fear of the LORD, or with love, outweighs abundance accompanied by turmoil or hatred. These are not throwaway platitudes but deliberate challenges to the prosperity assumptions that run through much of the wisdom tradition.

Translation Friction: The claim that the LORD's eyes are everywhere, watching the wicked and the good (verse 3), raises questions about divine surveillance that modern readers may find unsettling. The sages intend it as comfort — God is not absent — but it also underscores accountability. The repeated insistence that the LORD detests the sacrifice and the way of the wicked (verses 8-9) while delighting in the prayer of the upright creates sharp categories that leave little room for the complex moral reality of most human lives.

Connections: The 'gentle answer turns away wrath' of verse 1 anticipates James 1:19-20. The 'eyes of the LORD' in verse 3 echoes 2 Chronicles 16:9. The 'better than' proverbs in verses 16-17 connect to Psalm 37:16 and anticipate Jesus's teaching about treasure in heaven (Matthew 6:19-21). The 'healing tongue as tree of life' in verse 4 completes the series from 3:18, 11:30, and 13:12.

¹A gentle answer turns away fury, but a harsh word stirs up anger.

²The tongue of the wise makes knowledge attractive, but the mouth of fools pours out foolishness.

³The eyes of the LORD are everywhere, watching the wicked and the good.

⁴A healing tongue is a tree of life, but crookedness in it is a crushing of the spirit.

⁵A fool rejects his father's discipline,
but whoever heeds correction becomes shrewd.

⁶In the house of the righteous is great treasure,
but the income of the wicked brings trouble.

⁷The lips of the wise spread knowledge, but the heart of fools does not.

⁸The sacrifice of the wicked is detestable to the LORD,
but the prayer of the upright is His delight.

⁹The way of the wicked is detestable to the LORD,
but He loves the one who pursues righteousness.

¹⁰Harsh discipline awaits the one who abandons the path;
whoever hates correction will die.

¹¹The grave and the place of destruction lie open before the LORD — how much more the hearts of human beings!

¹²A scoffer does not love being corrected;
he will not go to the wise.

¹³A joyful heart brightens the face,
but a grieving heart crushes the spirit.

¹⁴The heart of the discerning seeks knowledge,
but the mouth of fools feeds on foolishness.

¹⁵All the days of the afflicted are hard,
but a cheerful heart has a never-ending feast.

¹⁶Better is a little with the fear of the LORD than great treasure with turmoil.

¹⁷Better a meal of vegetables where there is love than a fattened ox with hatred.

¹⁸A hot-tempered person stirs up conflict,
but the patient person calms a dispute.

¹⁹The way of the lazy person is like a hedge of thorns, but the path of the upright is a clear highway.

²⁰A wise son brings joy to his father,
but a foolish person despises his mother.

²¹Foolishness is entertainment to the senseless,
but a person of understanding walks a straight course.

²²Plans fail without consultation,
but with many advisors they succeed.

²³A person finds joy in giving a good answer, and a word at the right time — how good it is!

²⁴The path of life leads upward for the wise, turning him away from the grave below.

²⁵The LORD tears down the house of the proud but secures the widow's boundary.

²⁶Evil plans are detestable to the LORD,
but gracious words are pure.

²⁷Whoever chases dishonest gain brings trouble on his household, but the one who hates bribes will live.

²⁸The heart of the righteous considers before answering,
but the mouth of the wicked pours out evil.

²⁹The LORD keeps far from the wicked,
but He hears the prayer of the righteous.

³⁰Bright eyes bring joy to the heart, and good news strengthens the bones.

³¹The ear that listens to life-giving correction will dwell among the wise.

32Whoever refuses discipline despises his own life, but whoever listens to correction gains understanding.

33The fear of the LORD is the discipline of wisdom,
and before honor comes humility.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Rakh ('soft, tender, gentle') describes not weakness but deliberate restraint — the choice to lower the temperature of a confrontation. The proverb assumes that the speaker has the power to choose tone and that this choice has predictable consequences.
2. The wise person's tongue tetiv da'at ('makes knowledge good, presents knowledge well') — it is not enough to possess knowledge; one must know how to present it effectively. The fool's mouth yabbi'a ivvelet ('gushes, pours out, bubbles up with foolishness') — there is no filter, no restraint, just a constant flow of nonsense.
3. Be-khol maqom ('in every place') eine Yahweh ('the eyes of the LORD') tsofot ('are watching, observing, keeping guard over') ra'im ve-tovim ('the wicked and the good'). Nothing escapes God's observation. This is simultaneously a comfort (the righteous are seen) and a warning (the wicked cannot hide). The LORD's vision is total and impartial.
4. This completes the 'tree of life' series in Proverbs: wisdom itself (3:18), the fruit of the righteous (11:30), fulfilled desire (13:12), and now healing speech (15:4). Each use identifies something that gives or sustains life — and the final one locates that life-giving power in words.
4. Shever be-ruach ('breaking of spirit') describes the internal damage caused by deceptive or cruel speech. It is not merely emotional hurt but a structural collapse of the inner person.
5. The evil ('fool') yin'ats ('spurns, despises, treats with contempt') musar aviv ('his father's discipline'). The shomer tokhachat ('one who guards/heeds correction') ya'arim ('becomes shrewd, grows prudent'). Correction is the raw material from which shrewdness is built.
6. The beit tsaddiq ('house of the righteous') contains chosen rav ('great treasure, abundant store'). The tevu'at rasha ('produce/income of the wicked') ne'ekaret ('is troubled, brings disturbance'). Wealth acquired righteously is stable; wealth acquired wickedly is volatile.
7. The wise person's lips yezaru da'at ('scatter, spread, sow knowledge') — the agricultural metaphor treats knowledge as seed that the wise broadcast for others to harvest. The fool's heart lo khen ('not so, does not do this') — it produces nothing worth spreading.
8. Zevach resha'im ('sacrifice of the wicked') is to'avat Yahweh — religious ritual performed by those whose lives contradict it provokes God's revulsion. Tefillat yesharim ('prayer of the upright') is retsono ('His delight, His pleasure'). God evaluates worship by the character of the worshiper, not the quality of the offering. This anticipates the prophetic critique of empty ritual (Isaiah 1:11-17, Amos 5:21-24).
9. Extending verse 8 from worship to way of life: not just the wicked person's sacrifice but his entire derekh ('way, path, lifestyle') is to'evah. And God does not merely accept the righteous — ye'ehav ('He loves') the meradef tsedaqah ('pursuer of righteousness'). The verb 'pursues' implies effort, intention, and persistence.
10. Musar ra ('severe discipline, harsh correction') awaits the ozev orach ('one who abandons the path, who leaves the way'). The escalation is clear: the sone tokhachat ('hater of correction') yamut ('will die'). Refusal to be corrected is not just foolish — it is fatal. The path metaphor implies that there is a right way, and leaving it has consequences.
11. She'ol va-avaddon ('the grave and destruction/Abaddon') — the deepest, most hidden regions of the cosmos — are neged Yahweh ('before the LORD, in front of Him, visible to Him'). If even the realm of the dead is transparent to God, af ki libboth bene adam ('how much more the hearts of human beings'). The qal va-chomer argument: if the most concealed reality is visible to God, nothing in the human heart can be hidden.
12. The lets ('scoffer') does not love the one who corrects him, and as a result el chakhamim lo yelekh ('to the wise he will not go'). His contempt for correction isolates him from the very people who could help him. The scoffer's defining trait is that he makes himself unreachable.
13. Lev same'ach ('a happy heart') yetiv panim ('makes the face good, brightens the countenance') — inner joy is visible externally. Be-atsvat lev ('in grief of heart, through a heart's sorrow') ruach nekhe'ah ('the spirit is stricken, crushed'). The connection between inner emotional state and outward appearance is treated as observable fact.
14. The navon ('discerning person') has a heart that yevaqqesh da'at ('seeks knowledge') — an active, hungry pursuit of understanding. The fool's mouth yir'eh ivvelet ('grazes on foolishness') — the pastoral metaphor suggests that the fool browses on folly the way a cow grazes in a field, consuming whatever is in front of him without discrimination.
15. Kol yeme ani ra'im ('all the days of the afflicted are evil/hard') — the person weighed down by suffering experiences every day as painful. But the tov lev ('good of heart, cheerful-hearted person') has mishteh tamid ('a perpetual feast'). The feast is not external abundance but internal disposition. The proverb does not deny suffering but asserts that inner attitude transforms the experience of daily life.
16. This verse directly challenges the prosperity theology that could be extracted from other proverbs. The sages assert that the quality of one's relationship with God outweighs the quantity of one's possessions. It is a corrective from within the wisdom tradition itself.

17. Aruchat yaraq ('a portion of vegetables, a humble herb-meal') with ahavah ('love') present outweighs a shor avus ('fattened ox, stall-fed beef') — the finest meat available — accompanied by sin'ah ('hatred'). The proverb moves from verse 16's theological comparison (fear of the LORD versus wealth) to a domestic one (love versus luxury). The principle is the same: relational quality determines the value of material conditions.
18. The ish chemah ('person of fury') yegareh madon ('stirs up strife, provokes quarreling'). The erekh appayim ('slow to anger, patient') yashqit riv ('quiets a dispute, settles a quarrel'). Anger is incendiary; patience is extinguishing. The capacity to remain calm has direct social utility.
19. The atsel ('lazy person') experiences his path as ki-mesukhat chadeq ('like a thorn hedge') — every step is painful and obstructed. But the orach yesharim ('path of the upright') is selulah ('built up, paved, a highway'). The difference is not in the external terrain but in the approach: diligence clears obstacles while laziness lets them accumulate until the path is impassable.
20. This nearly duplicates 10:1. The wise son yesammach av ('makes his father rejoice'). The kesil adam ('foolish person') bozeh immo ('despises his mother'). The pairing of father and mother ensures that both parents are honored — or dishonored — by a child's character.
21. The chasar lev ('one lacking heart/sense') finds simchah ('joy, delight') in ivvelet ('foolishness') — he is entertained by what should alarm him. The ish tevunah ('person of understanding') yeyasher lakhet ('makes his walk straight, maintains a direct course'). The difference between the two is what they find enjoyable: the senseless are amused by folly; the wise are engaged by right direction.
22. Hafer machashavot ('plans are frustrated, purposes are overturned') be-ein sod ('without counsel, without confidential deliberation'). But be-rov yo'atsum taqum ('with many counselors it stands, it is established'). The proverb, echoing 11:14, endorses collective wisdom over solitary decision-making.
23. Simchah la-ish be-ma'aneh fiv ('joy to a person in the answer of his mouth') — the satisfaction of finding the right thing to say. Davar be-itto ('a word in its time, a word at the right moment') mah tov ('how good!') — timing transforms speech. The same word spoken too early or too late has diminished power, but the right word at the right moment is a source of delight.
24. Orach chayyim ('the path of life') is le-ma'lah ('upward') for the maskil ('the wise, insightful person'). The purpose is le-ma'an sur mi-she'ol mattah ('in order to turn aside from She'ol below'). The vertical imagery — upward toward life, downward toward the grave — maps moral direction onto spatial direction. Wisdom lifts; folly descends.
25. The beit ge'im ('house of the arrogant') yissach Yahweh ('the LORD will tear away, uproot, demolish'). But God yatsev ge'ul almanah ('establishes, sets firm, the boundary marker of the widow'). The widow — among the most vulnerable in ancient society — receives God's direct protection of her property rights. God demolishes pride and defends the defenseless.
26. Machshevot ra ('evil plans, wicked schemes') are to'avat Yahweh. But imre no'am ('words of pleasantness, gracious words') are tehorim ('pure, clean'). The contrast pairs internal intention (evil plans) with verbal expression (gracious words), and God evaluates both. Purity of speech reflects purity of heart.
27. The botse'a batsa ('one who cuts off a cut, who pursues unjust gain') oker beto ('troubles his house, brings ruin on his household'). The sone mattanot ('one who hates gifts/bribes') yichyeh ('will live'). Integrity in financial dealings preserves life; greed destroys the entire household.
28. The tsaddiq's heart yehgeh la-anot ('meditates to answer, considers before responding') — the same verb hagah used in Psalm 1:2 for meditation on instruction. The righteous person's speech is pre-processed through reflection. The wicked's mouth yabbi'a ra'ot ('gushes out evil things') — unfiltered, unconsidered, destructive.
29. Rachoq Yahweh me-resha'im ('the LORD is far from the wicked') — distance here means relational alienation, not physical absence (verse 3 already established that God sees everything). God is present everywhere but relationally distant from those who persist in wickedness. Tefillat tsaddiqim yishma ('the prayer of the righteous He hears') — proximity to God is maintained through right living and prayer.
30. Me'or einayim ('light of the eyes, bright eyes, a cheerful look') yesammach lev ('makes the heart rejoice'). Shemu'ah tovah ('good news, a good report') tedashhen etsem ('makes the bones fat, strengthens the frame'). Both lines describe how positive external stimuli — a friendly face, encouraging news — produce internal well-being. The sages understood the body-mind connection.
31. The ozen shoma'at tokhachat chayyim ('ear that hears the correction of life, ear that listens to life-giving rebuke') be-qerev chakhamim talin ('in the midst of the wise will lodge, will dwell'). Receptivity to correction is the entrance fee to the community of the wise. The 'correction of life' is rebuke that leads to life — painful but vital.
32. The pore'a musar ('one who rejects discipline, who lets correction go') is mo'es nafsho ('despises his own soul/life') — refusing correction is a form of self-hatred, because it consigns oneself to avoidable destruction. The shome'a tokhachat ('one who listens to correction') qoneh lev ('acquires heart, gains understanding'). The heart — the seat of thought and wisdom — can be purchased through the currency of humility.
33. Yir'at Yahweh ('the fear of the LORD') is musar chokhmah ('the discipline/instruction of wisdom') — reverencing God is how wisdom trains a person. And lifne khavod anavah ('before honor, humility') — the pathway to genuine honor passes through humility first. Those who try to seize honor directly miss it; those who humble themselves receive it. This verse closes the chapter with the chapter's dominant themes united: fear of God, discipline, and the proper ordering of human ambition.

Summary: Proverbs 16 marks a shift in the Solomonic collection. The first half (verses 1-9) concentrates an unusually dense cluster of 'Yahweh proverbs' — statements about God's sovereignty over human plans, speech, and outcomes. The second half returns to the standard topics of kingship, pride, speech, and the contrast between wisdom and folly. This chapter contains some of the most theologically charged statements in the entire book.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening nine verses form the most sustained meditation on divine sovereignty in Proverbs. The human heart plans, but the LORD directs the tongue (verse 1), evaluates motives (verse 2), establishes plans when committed to Him (verse 3), has made everything for its purpose (verse 4), detests arrogance (verse 5), and directs a person's steps (verse 9). This sequence systematically dismantles human autonomy without destroying human responsibility — the person still plans, still speaks, still acts, but God is the one who determines outcomes. Verse 25 repeats 14:12 verbatim: 'There is a way that seems right to a person, but its end is the ways of death.'

Translation Friction: Verse 4 — 'The LORD has made everything for its purpose, even the wicked for the day of trouble' — is one of the most theologically difficult statements in the Hebrew Bible. It can be read as affirming that God has a purpose even for the existence of evil, or more modestly that the wicked will meet their proper end on the day of judgment. The sages do not resolve the tension; they state it and leave it.

Connections: The divine-sovereignty cluster in verses 1-9 connects to Jeremiah 10:23 ('I know, LORD, that a person's way is not in their own hands') and James 4:13-15 ('If the Lord wills, we will live and do this or that'). Verse 6 — 'by faithful love and truth sin is atoned for' — echoes the chesed ve-emet pairing from Exodus 34:6. The repetition of 14:12 in verse 25 creates a structural echo across the collection.

¹A person may arrange his thoughts,
but the answer of the tongue comes from the LORD.

²All a person's ways seem clean to him,
but the LORD weighs the motives.

³Commit your actions to the LORD, and your plans will be established.

⁴The LORD has made everything for its purpose, even the wicked for the day of trouble.

⁵Everyone with an arrogant heart is detestable to the LORD;
be assured, he will not go unpunished.

⁶By faithful love and truth wrongdoing is atoned for,
and by the fear of the LORD one turns from evil.

⁷When the LORD is pleased with a person's ways,
He makes even his enemies live at peace with him.

⁸Better a little gained with righteousness than great income without justice.

⁹A person's heart plans his course, but the LORD directs his steps.

- ¹⁰An oracle is on the lips of the king;
his mouth must not betray justice.
- ¹¹Honest scales and balances belong to the LORD;
all the weights in the bag are His work.
- ¹²Wicked conduct is detestable to kings,
for a throne is established by righteousness.
- ¹³Righteous speech delights kings, and they love the one who speaks honestly.
- ¹⁴A king's fury is a messenger of death,
but a wise person can appease it.
- ¹⁵In the light of a king's face there is life,
and his favor is like a cloud of spring rain.
- ¹⁶How much better to acquire wisdom than gold!
To gain understanding is preferable to silver.
- ¹⁷The highway of the upright turns away from evil;
whoever guards his path preserves his life.
- ¹⁸Before destruction comes arrogance, and before a fall comes a haughty spirit.
- ¹⁹Better to be humble in spirit among the lowly than to divide plunder with the proud.
- ²⁰Whoever is attentive to a matter will find good,
and whoever trusts in the LORD — how fortunate he is.
- ²¹The wise in heart is called discerning,
and pleasant speech increases persuasiveness.
- ²²Insight is a fountain of life for the one who has it, but the discipline of fools is foolishness.
- ²³The heart of the wise instructs his mouth and adds persuasiveness to his speech.
- ²⁴Pleasant words are a honeycomb — sweet to the soul and healing to the bones.
- ²⁵There is a path that seems straight to a person,
but its end is the ways of death.
- ²⁶The appetite of a worker works for him,
for his hunger drives him on.

²⁷A worthless person digs up evil, and on his lips is something like a scorching fire.

²⁸A perverse person sows conflict, and a whisperer separates close friends.

²⁹A violent person lures his neighbor and leads him down a path that is not good.

³⁰Whoever narrows his eyes is plotting perversion;
whoever purses his lips brings evil to completion.

³¹Gray hair is a crown of splendor;
it is found on the path of righteousness.

³²Better a patient person than a warrior, and one who controls his temper than one who captures a city.

³³The lot is cast into the lap,
but every decision belongs to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The ma'arkhe lev ('arrangements of the heart') uses military language — ma'arakhah is a battle formation. The human heart lines up its thoughts like troops, but God controls the actual engagement. The gap between preparation and performance belongs to God.
2. Kol darkhe ish zakh be-einav ('all a person's ways are pure in his own eyes') — self-assessment is unreliable because self-interest distorts perception. But tokhen ruchot Yahweh ('the LORD weighs the spirits/motives') — God evaluates the ruach, the inner drive and intention behind the visible behavior. Human beings see surfaces; God calibrates depths.
3. Gol el Yahweh ma'asekha ('roll upon the LORD your works') — the verb gol means to roll a burden off one's own shoulders and onto someone else's. It is an act of trust: placing the weight of one's undertakings onto God. The result is ve-yikkonu machshevotekha ('and your plans will be established, made firm'). Surrender to God does not cancel planning but secures it.
4. The la-ma'anehu is ambiguous — it could mean 'for its own purpose' or 'for His purpose' (God's). The ambiguity may be intentional. The verse pushes the reader toward trust in God's governance even when evil seems purposeless.
4. This verse has generated enormous theological discussion. It does not resolve the problem of evil but asserts that God's sovereignty encompasses it.
5. Kol ge'vach lev ('everyone lifted up of heart, everyone with an arrogant heart') is to'avat Yahweh. The idiom yad le-yad ('hand to hand') means 'you can count on it, certainly, without a doubt.' The proud person will lo yinnaqeh ('not be held innocent, not go unpunished'). Pride is the sin God most consistently and emphatically condemns in Proverbs.
6. Be-chesed ve-emet yekhupar avon ('by faithful love and truth iniquity is covered/atoned for') — the word yekhupar uses the language of cultic atonement (kipper, 'to cover, to make atonement'). The claim is remarkable: the divine attributes of chesed and emet, when expressed in human relationships, have atoning power. And be-yir'at Yahweh sur me-ra ('by the fear of the LORD one turns from evil') — reverence for God is the engine of moral change.
7. Bi-rtsot Yahweh darke ish ('when the LORD delights in a person's ways') gam oyvav yashlim itto ('even his enemies He makes to be at peace with him'). The verb yashlim is from the same root as shalom — God establishes peace even between adversaries when He favors a person's conduct. This is not a guarantee of universal popularity but a statement about God's power to transform hostile relationships.
8. Another 'better than' proverb echoing 15:16-17. Me'at bi-tsedaqah ('a little with righteousness') outweighs rov tevu'ot be-lo mishpat ('abundant income without justice'). The comparison is not between rich and poor but between legitimate and illegitimate gain. Integrity determines the true value of income.
9. This verse is the capstone of verses 1-9. The progression moves from thought (verse 1) through motive (verse 2), commitment (verse 3), purpose (verse 4), pride (verse 5), atonement (verse 6), favor (verse 7), and justice (verse 8) to arrive here: God is sovereign over the actual path a life takes. Human planning is the pencil sketch; God draws in ink.
10. Qesem ('oracle, divination, authoritative pronouncement') describes the king's speech as carrying the weight of divine authority. Be-mishpat lo yim'al piv ('in judgment his mouth must not act unfaithfully') — this is both description and prescription. The king's words carry oracular power, which makes his responsibility for justice absolute.

11. Peles u-mo'azne mishpat la-Yahweh ('a scale and balances of justice belong to the LORD') — God owns the standard of fair measurement. Ma'asehu kol avne kis ('His work are all the stones of the bag') — every weight-stone used in commerce is ultimately God's creation. Commercial honesty is a theological matter because God made the tools of measurement and claims them as His own.
12. To'avat melakhim asot resha ('an abomination to kings is doing wickedness') — not merely that kings should avoid wickedness but that they should find it repulsive. The reason: ki vi-tsedaqah yikkon kisse ('for by righteousness a throne is made firm'). Stability of governance depends on moral integrity. Wickedness undermines the very foundation of royal authority.
13. Retson melakhim siftei tsedeq ('the delight of kings is lips of righteousness') — good kings value honest advisors. Dover yesharim ye'ehav ('and the one who speaks upright things he loves'). The court setting is implied: wise rulers surround themselves with truthful counselors rather than flatterers.
14. Chamat melekh ('the wrath of a king') is mal'akhe mavet ('messengers of death') — royal anger can be lethal. But ish chakham yekhapperennah ('a wise person can atone for it, can cover it, can pacify it'). The verb kipper (from which Yom Kippur derives) means to cover or deflect — the wise person knows how to de-escalate royal rage.
15. Be-or pene melekh chayyim ('in the light of the king's face is life') — the king's smile signals safety and prosperity. Retsono ke-av malqosh ('his favor is like a cloud of the latter rain') — the malqosh is the spring rain that comes just before harvest, essential for the final ripening of crops. Royal favor is as life-giving as the rain that completes the agricultural cycle.
16. Qenoh chokhmah mah tov me-charuts ('acquiring wisdom — how much better than gold!'). The exclamation mah tov ('how good!') expresses genuine enthusiasm. Qenot binah nivchar mi-kasef ('gaining understanding is to be chosen over silver'). Wisdom and understanding are presented as commodities — they can be 'acquired' and 'gained' — but they outvalue precious metals.
17. Mesillat yesharim ('the highway of the upright') is sur me-ra ('turning aside from evil') — the upright person's road is defined by what it avoids. Shomer nafsho notser darkko ('the one who guards his life preserves his way') — self-preservation and moral vigilance are the same activity.
18. The parallelism pairs shever ('shattering, destruction') with kishalon ('stumbling, tripping, falling') and ga'on ('arrogance, pride') with govah ruach ('height of spirit'). Both lines say the same thing with intensifying imagery: pride is the precondition for collapse.
19. Tov shefal ruach et aniyim ('good is lowliness of spirit with the poor/afflicted') me-challeq shalal et ge'im ('than dividing spoil with the arrogant'). The proverb directly follows verse 18's warning about pride. If pride precedes destruction, then humility among the lowly is the safer — and morally superior — position, even if dividing spoils with the proud is more lucrative.
20. Maskil al davar ('one who gives attention to a matter, who handles a situation with insight') yimtsa tov ('will find good'). Bote'ach ba-Yahweh ashra'v ('the one who trusts in the LORD — his blessednesses, how fortunate he is'). Practical competence and theological trust are presented as complementary, not competing, sources of well-being.
21. The chakham lev ('wise of heart') earns the reputation navon ('discerning'). And meteq sefatayim ('sweetness of lips, pleasant speech') yosif leqach ('adds to learning/persuasiveness'). How something is said affects how much is received. The wise person's content and delivery work together.
22. Sekhel ('insight, good sense') is meqor chayyim ('fountain of life') for its possessors — it sustains them the way a spring sustains a community. But musar evilim ivelet ('the discipline of fools is foolishness') — fools teach each other only how to be more foolish. The correction they give is as empty as their understanding.
23. Lev chakham yaskil pihu ('the heart of the wise makes his mouth prudent') — wisdom in the heart governs what comes out of the mouth. Ve-al sefatav yosif leqach ('and to his lips adds learning/persuasiveness'). Internal wisdom produces external eloquence — the two are connected, not separate.
24. Tsuf devash imre no'am ('a honeycomb of honey are words of pleasantness') — honeycomb is the purest, most natural form of sweetness. Matoq la-nefesh ('sweet to the soul/appetite') u-marpe la-atsem ('and healing to the bone'). Kind speech nourishes the inner person and restores the body. The sages took the healing power of words literally, not just metaphorically.
25. This verse is identical to 14:12 — the only exact repetition in the Solomonic collection. The sages considered this warning important enough to state twice. Self-assessed correctness is unreliable; what looks right can lead to death. The repetition functions as a structural refrain, reminding the reader that human judgment requires external correction.
26. Nefesh amel amlah lo ('the appetite of a toiler toils for him') — hunger is the engine of labor. Ki akhaf alav pihu ('for his mouth bends upon him, presses him, urges him') — the mouth's demands drive the body to work. The proverb is not cynical but observational: physical need is a powerful motivator.
27. Ish beliyya'al ('a man of worthlessness, a scoundrel') koreh ra'ah ('digs up evil') — he excavates trouble, actively searching for ways to cause harm. Al sefato ke-esh tsarevet ('on his lip like a fire that scorches') — his speech burns everything it touches.
28. Ish tahpukhot ('person of perversions, crooked person') yeshallach madon ('sends out strife, sows quarreling'). The nirgan ('whisperer, gossip') mafriid alluf ('separates a close friend, divides an intimate companion'). Gossip is singled out as uniquely destructive to human bonds — it can sever the closest friendships.

- 29. The ish chamas ('person of violence') yefatteh re'ehu ('entices his neighbor, seduces his companion'). The verb patah ('to entice, to seduce, to deceive') suggests manipulation rather than force — the violent person draws others in through false promises before revealing the true nature of the road.
- 30. The body language of the schemer: otseh einav ('closing/narrowing his eyes') to plan tahpukhot ('perversions, crooked schemes'), and qorets sefatav ('pinching/pursing his lips') as he killah ra'ah ('completes evil, brings harm to fruition'). The sages were acute observers of nonverbal communication — they could read conspiracy in facial expressions.
- 31. Ateret tiferet sevah ('a crown of beauty/splendor is gray hair') — old age is honored, not despised. But the qualifying clause matters: be-derekh tsedaqah timmatse ('on the path of righteousness it is found'). The crown is not automatic — it belongs to those who have lived rightly. Gray hair earned through righteous living is beautiful; gray hair alone is merely aging.
- 32. The gibbor ('warrior, hero, mighty man') was the most admired figure in ancient Near Eastern culture. To say that patience surpasses him is a radical revaluation of strength. The proverb does not denigrate military courage but elevates emotional mastery above it.
- 33. Ba-cheiq yutal et ha-goral ('into the lap the lot is thrown') — casting lots was a standard method of decision-making in the ancient world, used when human wisdom had reached its limits. U-me-Yahweh kol mishpato ('and from the LORD is all its judgment/decision') — even the apparently random fall of the lot is under God's governance. The chapter that began with divine sovereignty over human speech (verse 1) closes with divine sovereignty over chance itself. Nothing falls outside God's jurisdiction.

Summary: Proverbs 17 continues the Solomonic collection with twenty-eight proverbs that examine friendship, family bonds, the power and limits of speech, and the social consequences of conflict. The chapter gives particular attention to what holds relationships together and what tears them apart, with several proverbs exploring the nature of genuine friendship versus opportunistic alliance.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 17 — 'A friend loves at all times, and a brother is born for adversity' — is one of the most enduring statements on loyalty in world literature. The chapter also contains the remarkable medical observation that 'a joyful heart is good medicine, but a crushed spirit dries up the bones' (verse 22), anticipating by millennia the scientific recognition that emotional state affects physical health. Verse 3 uses the smelting metaphor — God refines hearts the way a crucible refines metal — which becomes one of the Hebrew Bible's most important images for divine testing.

Translation Friction: Verse 2 — 'A prudent servant will rule over a disgraceful son' — reflects the social dynamics of an era when servitude was a normal economic institution. The proverb's point is about merit overriding birthright, which is radical within its context, but the modern reader will note the assumption of a servant class. Verse 26 warns against punishing the righteous and striking nobles — the concern with protecting the powerful as well as the innocent reflects a hierarchical social order that modern readers may find uncomfortable.

Connections: The refining metaphor in verse 3 echoes Malachi 3:2-3 and 1 Peter 1:7. The 'friend who loves at all times' in verse 17 anticipates Jonathan's friendship with David (1 Samuel 18-20) and Jesus's statement 'Greater love has no one than this: to lay down one's life for one's friends' (John 15:13). The 'joyful heart as medicine' in verse 22 connects to 15:13 and 15:15.

1Better a dry crust with peace than a house full of feasting with conflict.

2A shrewd servant will rule over a disgraceful son and will share the inheritance among the brothers.

3The crucible is for silver and the furnace for gold,
but the LORD tests hearts.

- ⁴An evildoer listens to wicked lips;
a liar gives ear to a destructive tongue.
- ⁵Whoever mocks the poor insults his Maker;
whoever rejoices over disaster will not go unpunished.
- ⁶Grandchildren are the crown of the elderly, and the glory of children is their parents.
- ⁷Fine speech does not suit a fool —
how much less do lying lips suit a noble.
- ⁸A bribe is like a magic stone in the eyes of its giver — wherever he turns, he succeeds.
- ⁹Whoever covers an offense seeks love,
but whoever keeps bringing it up separates close friends.
- ¹⁰A rebuke goes deeper into a perceptive person than a hundred blows into a fool.
- ¹¹A rebellious person seeks only evil,
so a merciless messenger will be sent against him.
- ¹²Better to meet a bear robbed of her cubs than a fool caught up in his foolishness.
- ¹³Whoever returns evil for good — evil will never leave his house.
- ¹⁴Starting a quarrel is like releasing water —
so drop the dispute before it breaks loose.
- ¹⁵Acquitting the guilty and condemning the innocent —
both are detestable to the LORD.
- ¹⁶Why should a fool have money in hand to buy wisdom
when he has no sense?
- ¹⁷A true friend shows love at every turn,
and a brother is born for adversity.
- ¹⁸A person who lacks sense shakes hands on a pledge and puts up security in his neighbor's presence.
- ¹⁹Whoever loves conflict loves transgression;
whoever builds his gate high invites ruin.
- ²⁰The twisted in heart finds nothing good,
and the one who distorts with his tongue falls into trouble.

²¹Whoever fathers a fool does so to his own grief;
the parent of a senseless child has no joy.

²²A joyful heart is good medicine,
but a crushed spirit dries up the bones.

²³The wicked takes a bribe from inside his robe to pervert the course of justice.

²⁴Wisdom is right in front of the discerning,
but the eyes of a fool roam to the ends of the earth.

²⁵A foolish son is a grief to his father and bitterness to the mother who bore him.

²⁶Punishing the righteous is not right,
nor is striking the noble for their integrity.

²⁷The one who has knowledge uses few words, and the person of understanding keeps a cool head.

²⁸Even a fool who keeps silent is considered wise;
whoever seals his lips is thought discerning.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Pat charevah ('a dry piece of bread, a crust') with shalvah ('tranquility, peace, quietness') outweighs bayit male zivche riv ('a house full of sacrifice-feasts with strife'). The zivchei riv are meat from sacrificial offerings — the finest food available. But abundance is worthless when accompanied by quarreling. This echoes 15:17 and reinforces the priority of relational quality over material quantity.
2. The eved maskil ('servant who acts with insight') yimshol ('will rule over') the ben mevish ('son who causes shame'). Merit overrides birth order. The servant will even yachaloq nachalah ('divide the inheritance') among the brothers — gaining economic standing that would normally be reserved for biological heirs. Competence rewrites social hierarchy.
3. The refining metaphor is one of the Hebrew Bible's most important images for divine testing. It appears in Psalm 66:10, Isaiah 48:10, Zechariah 13:9, and Malachi 3:2-3. The process is painful but purposeful — it does not destroy but purifies.
4. The mera ('evildoer') maqshiv al sefat aven ('gives attention to a lip of iniquity'). The sheqer ('liar') mezin al leshon havvot ('gives ear to a tongue of destruction'). People seek out speech that matches their own character — the wicked are drawn to wicked talk, and liars find other liars' words appealing. Moral character determines what information you consume.
5. This echoes 14:31. The lo'eg la-rash ('one who mocks the poor') cheref osehu ('reproaches his Maker') — mockery of the poor is mockery of God who created the poor person. The same'ach le-eid ('one who rejoices at calamity, who celebrates another's disaster') lo yinnaqeh ('will not be held innocent'). Schadenfreude is a moral offense with divine consequences.
6. Ateret zeqenim bene vanim ('the crown of old people is their grandchildren') — a long life crowned by grandchildren is the highest form of earthly blessing in the wisdom tradition. Ve-tiferet banim avotam ('and the glory of children is their fathers/parents') — children derive their sense of identity and honor from their parents. The bonds run both directions: the old are crowned by the young, and the young are adorned by the old.
7. Sefat yeter ('a lip of excess, fine/eloquent speech') does not suit the naval ('fool, churlish person'). The qal va-chomer intensifies: af ki le-nadiv sefat shaqer ('how much less lying speech for a noble/generous person'). If fine speech is wasted on a fool, then lying is even more inappropriate for someone who should be noble. The proverb is about the fitness between a person's character and their speech.
8. Even chen ('a stone of grace/charm, a magic stone') — the shochad ('bribe, gift') appears to its possessor as an all-powerful tool. El kol asher yifneh yaskil ('wherever he turns he prospers/succeeds'). The proverb observes the perceived power of bribery without necessarily endorsing it — it describes how the briber sees the world. Bribery works, at least in appearance.
9. The verb mekhasseh ('covers') does not mean hiding wrongdoing from accountability but choosing not to rehearse a forgiven offense. The second line's shoneh ('repeats, brings up again') is the opposite action — constantly returning to the wound.

10. Techat ge'arah be-mevin ('a rebuke descends into one who understands') more effectively me-hakkot kesil me'ah ('than striking a fool a hundred times'). One word of correction, received by a person with understanding, accomplishes more than extreme physical punishment applied to someone who lacks discernment. The difference is in the receiver, not the correction.
11. The meri ('rebellious, defiant one') yevaqqesh ra ('seeks evil') — rebellion is not neutral independence but active pursuit of harm. The consequence is that a mal'akh akhazari ('cruel/merciless messenger') yeshullach bo ('is sent against him'). Whether this is a human agent of judgment or a metaphor for inescapable consequences, the point is clear: rebellion against moral order triggers a severe response.
12. Pagosh dov shakkul be-ish ('let a bear bereaved of cubs meet a person') — a mother bear whose cubs have been taken is one of the most dangerous animals in the ancient Near Eastern imagination. Yet the proverb says: ve-al kesil be-ivvalto ('and not a fool in his folly'). The fool in the grip of his foolishness is more dangerous than a raging bear. The comparison is deliberately extreme — foolishness is not merely annoying but lethal.
13. The meshiv ra'ah tachat tovah ('one who returns evil in exchange for good') will find that lo tamush ra'ah mi-beto ('evil will not depart from his house'). The betrayal of kindness triggers a permanent curse — the person who repays good with evil sets in motion a chain of consequences that will haunt his household indefinitely. This is one of the strongest statements about moral causation in the collection.
14. The hydraulic metaphor is brilliant: water pressure builds behind a dam, and the smallest breach becomes catastrophic. The verb poter ('releases, lets out') describes a deliberate action — the person who starts a quarrel is choosing to open the floodgate.
15. Matsdiq rasha ('one who declares the wicked righteous, who acquits the guilty') and marshi'a tsaddiq ('one who condemns the righteous, who declares the innocent guilty') — both inversions of justice are to'avat Yahweh gam sheneihem ('an abomination to the LORD, both of them'). God is equally offended by both forms of judicial corruption. Injustice in either direction provokes the same divine revulsion.
16. The rhetorical question expresses exasperation: lammah zeh mechir be-yad kesil liqnot chokhmah ('why is there a purchase price in the hand of a fool to buy wisdom') ve-lev ayin ('and heart there is none')? The fool may have the resources (mechir, 'price, payment') but lacks the lev ('heart, mind, capacity') to receive what he purchases. Wisdom cannot be bought by those who lack the inner capacity to understand it.
17. The verb yivvala ('is born') is striking — it does not say a brother 'appears' or 'shows up' in adversity but that he was born for it. His existence finds its purpose in the crisis. This verse defines friendship and brotherhood in terms of loyalty under pressure.
18. Adam chasar lev ('a person lacking heart/sense') toqe'a kaf ('strikes the hand, shakes hands') — the handshake seals a financial guarantee. He orev aruvah ('pledges a pledge, takes on surety') lifne re'ehu ('before his neighbor'). The warning against surety recurs throughout Proverbs (6:1-5, 11:15) — it is foolish to take financial responsibility for another person's debts.
19. Ohev pasha ohev matstsah ('one who loves transgression loves strife') — the two are inseparable. The one who magbiha pitcho ('raises his doorway high, builds an ostentatious gate') mevaqqesh shaver ('seeks breaking/ruin'). The high gate may symbolize arrogance — making oneself conspicuous invites destruction. Or it may be literal: an extravagant entrance signals wealth that attracts danger.
20. The iqqesh lev ('twisted-hearted') lo yimtsa tov ('does not find good') — a crooked heart cannot recognize or receive what is genuinely beneficial. The nehpath bi-lshono ('one who overturns/distorts with his tongue') yippol be-ra'ah ('falls into evil/calamity'). Both internal crookedness and verbal distortion lead to the same outcome: trouble.
21. Yoled kesil le-tugah lo ('the one who begets a fool — for grief it is to him'). The pain is inescapable: a foolish child is a permanent source of sorrow. Ve-lo yismach avi naval ('and the father of a churlish person does not rejoice'). The naval is not merely stupid but morally deficient — churlish, crass, and incapable of decency.
22. Lev same'ach yetiv gehah ('a joyful heart makes healing good, does good like a cure') — inner joy has medicinal power. Ruach nekhe'ah teyabbesh garem ('a crushed spirit dries up the bone') — emotional devastation produces physical deterioration. The sages understood what modern psychoneuroimmunology confirms: emotional states affect bodily health. This is not metaphor but observed reality presented as wisdom.
23. Shochad me-cheiq ('a bribe from the bosom/fold of the garment') — hidden, secretive, passed discreetly — rasha yiqqach ('a wicked person takes/accepts'). The purpose: le-hattot orchot mishpat ('to bend the paths of justice, to pervert the course of judgment'). Bribery distorts the legal system, and the secrecy of the transaction underscores its shame.
24. Et pene mevin chokhmah ('before the face of the discerning person is wisdom') — wisdom is immediately available to the person who has understanding; it is right there. But eine kesil bi-qtseh arets ('the eyes of a fool are at the end of the earth') — the fool looks everywhere except where wisdom actually is. His attention is scattered to the far horizons while wisdom stands directly in front of him.
25. Ka'as le-aviv ben kesil ('vexation to his father is a foolish son') and memer le-yoladeto ('bitterness to the one who bore him, to his mother'). Both parents suffer. The father experiences ka'as ('vexation, anger, grief') and the mother memer ('bitterness'). A child's foolishness is the deepest disappointment a parent can face.
26. Gam anosh la-tsaddiq lo tov ('also to fine/punish the righteous is not good') — the legal system must not penalize those who are in the right. Le-hakkot nedivim al yosher ('to strike nobles for uprightness') — those in positions of honor should not be punished for doing what is right. The verse defends the just from unjust punishment and the honorable from retaliation for their integrity.
27. Chosekh amarav yode'a da'at ('the one who restrains his words knows knowledge') — economy of speech is a sign of genuine knowledge. Yeqar ruach ish tevunah ('precious/cool of spirit is a person of understanding') — the person of understanding does not overheat emotionally. Both restraint in speech and coolness of temperament mark the truly wise.

- 28. Gam evil macharish chakham yechashev ('even a fool, when he is silent, is reckoned wise'). The humor is intentional: a fool's best strategy is silence, because the moment he opens his mouth he reveals his folly. Otem sefatav navon ('the one who shuts his lips is considered discerning'). Silence is the most accessible form of wisdom — anyone can practice it.

Summary: Proverbs 18 delivers twenty-four proverbs that probe the power of speech, the nature of isolation, the reliability of wealth versus the reliability of God, and the dynamics of conflict and friendship. The chapter is notable for its concentration of proverbs about the tongue and its consequences — words are presented as forces that either build or destroy, with life-and-death implications.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 10 — 'The name of the LORD is a strong tower; the righteous runs into it and is safe' — is one of the most beloved verses in Proverbs, creating a vivid image of God's name as a fortified refuge. Verse 21 — 'Death and life are in the power of the tongue' — is perhaps the single most quoted proverb about speech in the entire collection. The chapter also contains the devastating observation that a person's gift 'makes room for him' (verse 16), a realistic assessment of how patronage and access work in hierarchical societies.

Translation Friction: Verse 22 — 'He who finds a wife finds a good thing and obtains favor from the LORD' — celebrates marriage as a divine blessing but uses language that modern readers may find one-directional. The Hebrew matsa ishah ('finds a woman/wife') reflects a social context in which marriage was initiated by the man. The theological point — that marriage is a source of divine favor — stands, but the relational dynamics described reflect ancient practice. Verse 11 describes the rich person's wealth as 'a high wall in his imagination,' which may critique false security or simply observe it.

Connections: The 'strong tower' of verse 10 echoes Psalm 61:3 and 2 Samuel 22:3. The death-and-life power of the tongue in verse 21 anticipates James 3:1-12. The finding of a wife as divine favor in verse 22 connects to Proverbs 19:14 and 31:10. The deep-waters imagery in verse 4 echoes 20:5.

¹The one who isolates himself pursues his own desire;
he lashes out against all sound judgment.

²A fool takes no pleasure in understanding, but only in displaying his own opinions.

³When wickedness arrives, contempt comes with it, and with dishonor comes disgrace.

⁴The words of a person's mouth are deep waters;
the fountain of wisdom is a flowing stream.

⁵Showing partiality to the wicked is not right, nor is depriving the righteous of justice.

⁶A fool's lips walk into a fight, and his mouth calls for a beating.

⁷A fool's mouth is his ruin, and his lips are a trap for his own life.

⁸The words of a gossip are like choice morsels;
they go down into the innermost parts.

- ⁹Whoever is careless in his work is a brother to the one who destroys.
- ¹⁰The LORD's name is a fortified tower;
the righteous runs into it and is safe.
- ¹¹The wealth of the rich is his fortified city,
and like a high wall — in his imagination.
- ¹²Before destruction a person's heart is proud,
and before honor comes humility.
- ¹³Whoever answers before listening — that is his foolishness and his disgrace.
- ¹⁴A person's spirit can endure his illness,
but a crushed spirit — who can bear it?
- ¹⁵The heart of the discerning acquires knowledge, and the ear of the wise seeks knowledge.
- ¹⁶A person's gift makes room for him and brings him into the presence of the powerful.
- ¹⁷The first to state his case seems right until his neighbor comes and cross-examines him.
- ¹⁸Casting lots settles disputes and separates powerful opponents.
- ¹⁹A brother who has been wronged is harder to reach than a fortified city, and quarrels between them are like the bars of a fortress.
- ²⁰From the fruit of his mouth a person's stomach is filled;
by the harvest of his lips he is satisfied.
- ²¹Death and life are in the power of the tongue,
and those who love it will eat its fruit.
- ²²Whoever finds a wife finds a good thing and receives favor from the LORD.
- ²³The poor person speaks with pleas,
but the rich person answers harshly.
- ²⁴A person with many companions may be ruined, but there is a friend who sticks closer than a brother.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Le-ta'avah yevaqqesh nifrad ('for desire/appetite the separated one seeks') — the person who isolates himself from community is driven by selfish craving. Be-khol tushiyyah yitgalla ('against all sound judgment he breaks out, he quarrels'). Isolation breeds selfishness and hostility toward wisdom. The proverb warns that withdrawal from community is not independence but self-destruction.

2. Lo yachpots kesil bi-tevunah ('a fool does not delight in understanding') — understanding does not interest him. Ki im be-hitgallot libbo ('but only in the uncovering of his heart, in revealing what is in his mind'). The fool's pleasure is self-expression, not comprehension. He wants to broadcast, not receive.
3. Be-vo rasha ba gam buz ('when the wicked comes, contempt also comes') — wickedness does not travel alone; it brings a retinue of social consequences. Ve-im qalon cherpah ('and with dishonor, reproach'). The wicked person's arrival brings an atmosphere of contempt and shame into every setting.
4. The relationship between the two lines is debated. They may be synonymous (speech is deep and flowing), or antithetic (ordinary speech is murky depths; wisdom is a clear stream). The ambiguity may be intentional — the proverb itself has deep waters.
5. Se'et pene rasha lo tov ('lifting the face of the wicked is not good') — to 'lift the face' means to show favoritism, to give special treatment. Le-hattot tsaddiq ba-mishpat ('to bend the righteous in judgment') — to distort justice against the innocent. Both judicial bias and perversion of verdict are condemned.
6. Sifte kesil yavo'u ve-riv ('a fool's lips enter into strife, walk into a quarrel') — the fool's mouth leads him into conflicts he cannot handle. U-fiv le-mahalumot yiqra ('and his mouth calls for blows'). The fool's speech is so provocative that it effectively invites physical retaliation. His words write checks his body cannot cash.
7. Pi kesil mechittah lo ('a fool's mouth is ruin/destruction to him') and sefatav moqesh nafsho ('his lips are a snare for his soul/life'). The fool's own speech becomes the instrument of his downfall. He needs no external enemy; his mouth is both the weapon and the trap.
8. Divre nirgan ('the words of a gossip/whisperer') ke-mitlahamim ('are like things greedily swallowed, like choice morsels') — gossip is delicious. People consume it eagerly. Ve-hem yaredu chadre vaten ('and they go down into the chambers of the belly, into the innermost parts'). Gossip does not stay on the surface; it penetrates deeply, lodging in the core of a person's being where it shapes attitudes and destroys relationships from within.
9. Gam mitrappeh bi-melakhto ('even the one who is slack/careless in his work') ach hu le-va'al mashchit ('is a brother to the master of destruction'). Negligence and active destruction are siblings — the lazy person and the vandal produce the same result. What is not maintained falls apart just as effectively as what is deliberately ruined.
10. The 'name of the LORD' (shem Yahweh) is not a magical formula but the full weight of God's revealed character — His faithfulness, His power, His covenant loyalty. To run to God's name is to trust in who God has shown Himself to be.
11. Hon ashir qiryat uzza ('the wealth of the rich person is his strong city') — placed immediately after the 'strong tower' of God's name, this verse creates a deliberate contrast. The rich person sees his wealth as a fortress. But u-ke-chomah nisgavah be-maskito ('and like a wall set high — in his imagination/conception'). The word maskit ('imagination, conception, mental image') is devastating: the wall is not real. It exists only in the rich person's mind. The security that wealth provides is a mental construct, not an actual fortification.
12. Lifne shever yigbah lev ish ('before shattering, a person's heart is high/proud') — echoing 16:18, pride precedes the fall. Ve-lifne khavod anavah ('and before honor, humility') — echoing 15:33. The chapter places these familiar truths in the context of verses 10-11: true security (God's name) produces humility; false security (wealth) produces the pride that precedes destruction.
13. Meshiv davar be-terem yishma ('one who returns a word before he hears') — answering before you have fully listened. Ivvelet hi lo u-khlimmah ('foolishness it is to him and shame'). Premature response is both foolish (because uninformed) and shameful (because it disrespects the speaker). Listening must precede speaking.
14. Ruach ish yekhalkel machalehu ('a person's spirit sustains/supports his sickness') — inner resilience can carry a person through physical illness. But ruach nekhe'ah mi yissa'annah ('a crushed spirit — who will bear it?'). Physical illness can be endured if the spirit is strong; but when the spirit itself is broken, there is nothing left to bear the weight. The question is rhetorical: no one can carry a broken spirit. This is why emotional and spiritual health are more fundamental than physical health.
15. Both heart and ear are engaged: the navon's heart yiqneh da'at ('acquires knowledge') and the wise person's ear tevaqqesh da'at ('seeks knowledge'). Knowledge is not passively received but actively pursued through both internal reflection (heart) and attentive listening (ear).
16. Mattan adam yarchiv lo ('a person's gift broadens/makes room for him') — a well-placed gift opens doors, creates space, expands opportunities. Ve-lifne gedolim yanchennuh ('and before great ones it leads him'). The proverb observes the social reality of patronage without necessarily endorsing it. Gifts — whether bribes, strategic presents, or demonstrations of generosity — are the currency of access in hierarchical societies.
17. Tsaddiq ha-rishon be-rivo ('the first in his dispute appears righteous/right') — whoever speaks first in a legal dispute has the advantage of the unchallenged narrative. U-va re'ehu va-chaqaro ('and his neighbor comes and examines him, cross-examines him'). The proverb is a warning against premature judgment: do not decide until you have heard both sides. Every story sounds convincing until it is tested.
18. Ha-goral ('the lot') yashbit midyanim ('causes disputes to cease'). When negotiation fails and both parties are too powerful to yield, the lot — understood as expressing God's decision (see 16:33) — provides a resolution that both sides accept. U-vein atumin yafrid ('and between powerful ones it separates/decides'). The lot is a dispute-resolution mechanism for conflicts that human wisdom cannot settle.
19. Ach nifsha mi-qiryat oz ('a brother who has been offended/transgressed against — more than a city of strength') — a betrayed family member is harder to win back than a walled city is to conquer. U-medanim ki-veriach armon ('and quarrels are like the bar of a fortress/palace'). The bar that secures a fortress gate is the last and strongest defense — once a family quarrel reaches that level of entrenchment, it becomes nearly impenetrable.

The proverb acknowledges that broken family bonds are among the most difficult of all human problems to repair.

- 20. Mi-peri fi ish tisba bitno ('from the fruit of a person's mouth his belly is satisfied') — speech produces consequences that feed back to the speaker. Tevu'at sefatav yisba ('the produce of his lips satisfies him'). The agricultural metaphor — fruit, harvest, produce — treats speech as something planted and cultivated. You eat what your mouth has planted.
- 21. The 'power of the tongue' (yad lashon, 'the hand of the tongue') personifies the tongue as having a hand — an agency, a capacity to act. This verse is the culmination of the chapter's sustained meditation on speech and its consequences.
- 22. Matsa ishah matsa tov ('finds a woman/wife, finds good') — marriage is categorized as tov, the same word used in Genesis 1 for God's evaluation of creation. Va-yafek ratson me-Yahweh ('and he draws out favor from the LORD'). Marriage is not merely a human arrangement but a channel of divine blessing. The proverb celebrates the institution without specifying the characteristics of the wife — the simple fact of marriage, when rightly entered, is itself the good.
- 23. Tachanunim yedabber rash ('with entreaties the poor person speaks') — poverty forces a person into the posture of begging, requesting, pleading. Ve-ashir ya'aneh azzot ('and the rich person answers harshly/roughly'). Wealth gives a person the social license to be blunt, rude, and dismissive. The proverb describes this dynamic without endorsing it — it is a sociological observation about how economic power shapes social interaction.
- 24. Ish re'im le-hitro'e'a ('a person of companions/friends — to be broken/shattered') — having many shallow friendships can lead to ruin, because quantity of associations is not quality of relationship. Ve-yesh ohev daveq me-ach ('but there is a friend who clings/sticks closer than a brother'). The rare, deep friendship — the one friend who is daveq ('clinging, adhering, stuck fast') — outweighs all casual connections. This echoes 17:17's friend who loves at all times.

Summary: Proverbs 19 contains twenty-nine proverbs that give extended attention to poverty, wealth, and the social dynamics that surround economic status. The chapter also probes family relationships — the grief caused by foolish children, the gift of a prudent wife, the responsibilities of parents in discipline — and returns repeatedly to the consequences of laziness, lying, and the refusal to learn.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains some of the most socially aware proverbs in the collection. The observation that the poor person is abandoned even by his brothers (verse 7) and that wealth attracts friends while poverty repels them (verse 4) shows the sages' unflinching recognition of economic reality. But the chapter also insists that God stands with the poor: whoever is generous to the poor lends to the LORD (verse 17), and whoever oppresses them will be repaid. The chapter holds both observations — social cruelty toward the poor and divine solidarity with the poor — in unresolved tension.

Translation Friction: Verse 13 describes a foolish son as 'ruin to his father' and a quarrelsome wife as 'a constant dripping,' both harsh images. The parallel structure risks equating a bad child with a bad spouse, and the gendered language reflects the male perspective of the ancient sages. Verse 18 urges discipline 'while there is hope' but warns 'do not set your heart on his destruction,' suggesting that the line between corrective discipline and destructive rage was recognized as a real danger in ancient parenting.

Connections: *The 'lending to the LORD' in verse 17 anticipates Jesus's identification with the poor in Matthew 25:40. The 'prudent wife from the LORD' in verse 14 connects to 18:22 and the eshet chayil of 31:10. The laziness theme (verses 15, 24) echoes the 'sloppard passages' in 6:6-11 and 26:13-16.*

¹Better a poor person who walks in integrity than one who has twisted speech and is a fool.

²Desire without knowledge is not good,
and whoever rushes ahead misses the mark.

³A person's own foolishness ruins his path,
and then his heart rages against the LORD.

⁴Wealth adds many friends,
but the poor person is separated from his companion.

⁵A false witness will not go unpunished, and whoever breathes out lies will not escape.

⁶Many seek the favor of a generous person, and everyone is a friend to the one who gives gifts.

⁷All the brothers of a poor person despise him —
how much more do his friends keep their distance!
He chases them with pleas, but they are gone.

⁸Whoever acquires sense loves his own life;
whoever guards understanding will find good.

⁹A false witness will not go unpunished, and whoever breathes out lies will perish.

¹⁰Luxury does not suit a fool, much less for a servant to rule over princes.

¹¹A person's insight makes him slow to anger, and it is his glory to overlook an offense.

¹²A king's fury is like the roar of a lion,
but his favor is like dew on the grass.

¹³A foolish son is ruin to his father, and a wife's quarreling is a constant dripping.

¹⁴House and wealth are inherited from parents,
but a prudent wife is from the LORD.

¹⁵Laziness casts a person into a deep sleep, and an idle appetite goes hungry.

¹⁶Whoever keeps a command guards his own life,
but whoever despises his ways will die.

¹⁷Whoever is generous to the poor lends to the LORD, and He will repay him for his good deed.

¹⁸Discipline your son while there is still hope,
but do not set your heart on destroying him.

¹⁹A hot-tempered person must pay the penalty;
if you rescue him, you will only have to do it again.

²⁰Listen to advice and accept discipline,
so that you will be wise in the end.

- ²¹Many plans fill a person's heart,
but the counsel of the LORD — that will stand.
- ²²What is desirable in a person is his faithful love,
and a poor person is better than a liar.
- ²³The fear of the LORD leads to life;
whoever has it rests satisfied, untouched by harm.
- ²⁴The lazy person buries his hand in the dish
but will not even bring it back to his mouth.
- ²⁵Strike a scoffer and the naive learns caution;
correct the discerning and he gains knowledge.
- ²⁶A son who ruins his father and drives out his mother is a source of shame and disgrace.
- ²⁷Stop listening, my son, to instruction that leads you away from words of knowledge.
- ²⁸A worthless witness mocks justice, and the mouth of the wicked swallows down wrongdoing.
- ²⁹Judgments are prepared for scoffers, and beatings for the backs of fools.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Tov rash holekh be-tummo ('good is the poor who walks in his wholeness/integrity') me-iqqesh sefatav ve-hu kesil ('than one twisted of lips who is a fool'). Integrity outranks economic status. The poor person with a straight path is better off — morally and ultimately — than the person whose speech is crooked, regardless of his wealth.
2. Gam be-lo da'at nefesh lo tov ('also without knowledge, a soul/desire is not good') — even good intentions, when uninformed, produce bad results. Ve-ats be-raglayim choter ('and hasty with feet sins/misses'). Speed without wisdom leads to error. The pairing of ignorance and haste suggests that both are forms of the same problem: acting without adequate preparation.
3. Ivetet adam tesallef darkko ('a person's foolishness overturns/perverts his way') — his own folly wrecks his life. Ve-al Yahweh yiz'af libbo ('and against the LORD his heart rages/is indignant'). The irony is devastating: the person destroys his own path through foolishness and then blames God for the results. Self-inflicted ruin followed by theological blame-shifting is a pattern the sages recognized and condemned.
4. Hon yosif re'im rabbim ('wealth adds/multiplies many friends') — money is magnetic; people gravitate toward it. Ve-dal me-re'ehu yippared ('and the poor from his friend is separated'). Poverty isolates. The proverb does not celebrate this dynamic but observes it with clear eyes. The sages saw through the pretense of wealth-based friendship.
5. Ed sheqarim lo yinnaqeh ('a witness of falsehoods will not be held innocent') and yafiach kezavim lo yimalet ('one who breathes out lies will not escape'). The double assertion — not unpunished, not escaped — emphasizes certainty. The legal system and the moral order both catch up with liars eventually.
6. Rabbim yechallu pene nadv ('many entreat the face of a generous person/noble') — people flock to those who give. Ve-khol ha-re'a le-ish mattan ('and everyone is a friend to the person of gifts'). Generosity attracts friendship, but the proverb leaves open whether these friendships are genuine or mercenary.
7. The Hebrew of the final clause is textually difficult. The sense is clear even if the syntax is fractured: the poor person calls after people who are already gone. The broken syntax may itself mirror the desperation — the sentence falls apart, just as the relationships have.
8. Qoneh lev ohev nafsho ('the one who acquires heart/sense loves his own soul/life') — pursuing wisdom is an act of self-care, not self-denial. Shomer tevunah limtso tov ('the one who guards understanding — to find good'). Understanding is something that must be both acquired and maintained. Those who do both will find tov — the good that the moral order reliably provides.

9. Nearly identical to verse 5, but the final verb escalates: from lo yimalet ('will not escape') to yoved ('will perish'). The repetition with intensification drives the point home: lying under oath is not merely punishable but ultimately fatal.
10. Lo na'aveh li-khsil ta'anug ('luxury/pleasure is not fitting for a fool') — the fool lacks the character to handle prosperity well. Af ki le-eved meshol be-sarim ('how much less for a servant to rule over princes'). The qal va-chomer argument: if even a free fool cannot handle luxury, a servant ruling princes is even more out of order. The proverb addresses the disruption caused when people hold positions they are not suited for.
11. Sekhel adam he'erikh appo ('a person's insight lengthens his anger, makes him slow to anger') — the same quality that produces wisdom also produces patience. Ve-tif'arto avor al peshah ('and his splendor/glory is to pass over a transgression'). The person who can let an offense go — who has the strength to not retaliate — possesses tif'arah ('beauty, glory, splendor'). Forgiveness is not weakness but magnificence.
12. Naham ka-kefir za'af melekh ('like the roaring of a young lion is the king's rage') — terrifying, dangerous, inescapable. U-ke-tal al esev retsono ('and like dew on the grass is his favor'). Dew is gentle, life-giving, and arrives quietly in the early morning. The contrast captures the two poles of royal power: lethal anger and nourishing favor.
13. Havvot le-aviv ben kesil ('destruction/ruin to his father is a foolish son'). The havvot ('calamities, destructions') — plural intensifies — reduce the father's life to wreckage. Delef tored midyene ishah ('a dripping that drives away is the quarreling of a wife'). The image is of a roof leak that never stops — maddening, relentless, erosive. Both images describe forms of domestic misery that cannot be escaped because they come from within the household itself.
14. Bayit va-hon nachalat avot ('house and wealth are the inheritance of fathers/parents') — material assets can be passed down through generations. U-me-Yahweh ishah maskalelet ('but from the LORD is a wife who acts wisely'). A wise spouse cannot be inherited, purchased, or manufactured — she is a direct gift from God. This elevates the prudent wife above all material possessions in the hierarchy of blessings.
15. Atslah tappil tardemah ('laziness causes to fall a deep sleep') — the tardemah is the kind of supernatural deep sleep that fell on Adam (Genesis 2:21) and Abraham (Genesis 15:12). Laziness produces a stupor so profound it is almost supernatural. Ve-nefesh remiyyah tir'av ('and a slack/idle soul will go hungry'). The lazy person does not just underperform — he loses consciousness of his own needs until hunger forces him awake.
16. Shomer mitsvah shomer nafsho ('the one who guards a command guards his soul/life') — obedience to authoritative instruction is self-preservation. Bozehr derakhav yamut ('the one who despises his ways will die'). To 'despise one's ways' is to be careless about one's own conduct, to treat one's moral direction as unimportant. Such carelessness is fatal.
17. The commercial language (malveh, 'lends'; yeshalleh, 'repays') is deliberate. God is not merely pleased by generosity — He incurs a debt. This transforms charity from a one-way gift into a divine investment with guaranteed returns.
18. Yasser binkha ki yesh tiqvah ('discipline your son because there is hope') — the window for effective correction is limited. While the child is still forming, discipline can change his trajectory. Ve-el hamito al tissa nafshekha ('and toward his death/destruction do not lift up your soul'). The second line is a warning: discipline must not become rage. The parent who disciplines with the goal of genuine formation is wise; the parent who crosses into destructive anger has ceased to parent.
19. The gedol chemah ('great of fury, hot-tempered person') nose onesh ('bears punishment, pays the penalty') — his rage generates consequences he must absorb. Ki im tatsil ve-od tosif ('for if you deliver him, again you will need to add/repeat'). Rescuing a person from the consequences of his temper is futile — you will have to keep doing it because the underlying anger has not changed. The proverb warns against enabling habitual anger.
20. Shema etsah ve-qabbal musar ('hear counsel and receive discipline') — both passive reception (listening) and active acceptance (taking correction on board) are required. Le-ma'an techkam be-acharitekha ('so that you will be wise in your latter end, in your future'). The investment in humility now produces wisdom later. The acharit ('end, future, latter days') is the payoff for present submission to correction.
21. Rabbot machashavot be-lev ish ('many plans are in a person's heart') — the human mind generates an abundance of schemes, ambitions, and strategies. Va-atsat Yahweh hi taqum ('but the counsel of the LORD — it will stand, it will rise, it will endure'). This echoes the sovereignty theme of 16:1-9: human planning is real but provisional. God's counsel is the only thing with permanent standing power.
22. Ta'avat adam chasdo ('the desire/desirable quality of a person is his chesed') — what makes a person attractive and worthy is not wealth or status but faithful love, loyal kindness. Ve-tov rash me-ish kazav ('and better is a poor person than a man of falsehood'). Poverty with honesty outranks prosperity with lying. Character, not capital, determines human worth.
23. Yir'at Yahweh le-chayyim ('the fear of the LORD is for life, leads to life') — reverence for God and life are mapped onto the same trajectory. Ve-save'a yalin bal yippaqed ra ('and satisfied he will lodge/rest, not visited by evil'). The person who fears God sleeps soundly because he is save'a ('satisfied, content') and bal yippaqed ra ('not subject to evil visitation'). Security, contentment, and rest are the fruits of reverence.
24. Taman atsel yado ba-tsallachath ('the lazy person buries/hides his hand in the dish/bowl') gam el pihu lo yeshivannah ('even to his mouth he will not return it'). The image is absurdly comic: the lazy person has his hand in the food but is too lazy to lift it to his own mouth. The exaggeration makes the point unforgettable: laziness is so extreme it defeats even self-interest.
25. Lets takkeh u-feti ya'arim ('strike a scoffer and the naive becomes shrewd') — the scoffer himself does not learn from punishment, but the naive person watching does. Ve-hokhiach le-navon yavin da'at ('and correct the discerning and he understands knowledge'). The discerning person needs only a word — no blows required. Three levels of learner: the scoffer (unreachable), the naive (learns from observing consequences), and the discerning (learns from verbal correction).

- 26. Meshadded av ('one who destroys/ruins his father') and mavriach em ('one who drives away his mother') — the son who financially exploits his father and forces his mother from her home. Ben mevish u-machpir ('a son of shame and disgrace'). This describes not merely disappointing behavior but active destruction of one's own parents — the most fundamental betrayal of the family bond.
- 27. Chadal beni lishmo'a musar lishgot me-imre da'at ('cease, my son, from hearing discipline that causes straying from words of knowledge'). The verse warns against false instruction — teaching that appears to be wisdom but actually leads away from genuine knowledge. Not all correction is wise; some 'discipline' is misleading. The student must discriminate between instruction that builds and instruction that destroys.
- 28. Ed beliyya'al ('a witness of worthlessness/wickedness') yalits mishpat ('mocks justice, scorns judgment') — he treats the legal system as a joke. U-fi resha'im yevalla aven ('and the mouth of the wicked swallows iniquity'). The wicked consume wrongdoing as eagerly as food — they devour it, internalize it, make it part of themselves.
- 29. Nakhonu la-letsim shefatim ('prepared for scoffers are judgments') — the consequences are already arranged, waiting. U-mahalumot le-gev kesilim ('and blows for the back of fools'). The scoffer and the fool will receive the correction they have refused to accept voluntarily. What they would not learn through instruction they will learn through suffering.

Summary: Proverbs 20 closes the second decade of the Solomonic collection with thirty proverbs that survey intoxication, royal authority, human self-deception, the dangers of hasty vows, divine sovereignty over human affairs, and the recurring themes of honest weights, diligent labor, and the superiority of inner character over outward appearance. The chapter gives particular attention to the opacity of the human heart and God's unique ability to penetrate it.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 9 — 'Who can say, I have made my heart clean, I am pure from my sin?' — is one of the most searching questions in the wisdom literature. The expected answer is 'no one,' which places Proverbs in surprising agreement with the more pessimistic assessments of human nature found in Job and Ecclesiastes. The chapter also contains the striking metaphor of human purpose as deep water (verse 5): the intentions of the heart are buried below the surface, accessible only to the person of understanding who knows how to draw them out. Verse 27 identifies the human spirit as the LORD's lamp, searching the innermost parts — an extraordinary image of divine-human collaboration in self-knowledge.

Translation Friction: Verse 1 warns against wine and strong drink, but the Hebrew Bible elsewhere presents wine positively (Psalm 104:15, Ecclesiastes 9:7). The sages are not prohibitionist but pragmatic: wine makes a fool of the unwary. Verse 20 — 'whoever curses his father or mother, his lamp will go out in utter darkness' — reflects the severity of the ancient honor code toward parents. The consequence described is not merely social disapproval but complete extinction.

Connections: The deep-water metaphor in verse 5 echoes 18:4. The dishonest-weights condemnation in verses 10 and 23 connects to 11:1 and 16:11. The human spirit as God's lamp in verse 27 anticipates Paul's language in 1 Corinthians 2:10-11 about the Spirit searching the deep things of God. The king's heart directed by God in verse 24 echoes 16:1-9 and 21:1.

¹Wine is a scoffer and strong drink a brawler;
whoever is led astray by them is not wise.

²The terror of a king is like the roar of a lion;
whoever provokes him forfeits his own life.

³It is honorable for a person to avoid a quarrel, but every fool jumps into one.

⁴The lazy person does not plow in autumn;
he looks for a harvest but there is nothing.

⁵The intentions in a person's heart are deep water, but a person of understanding draws them out.

⁶Many a person claims to be loyal,
but a truly faithful person — who can find one?

⁷A righteous person walks in his integrity — how fortunate are his children after him.

⁸A king who sits on the judgment seat scatters all evil with his gaze.

⁹Who is able to say, 'I have made my heart clean;
I am pure from my sin'?

¹⁰A double standard — one weight and another weight, one measure and another measure —
both are detestable to the LORD.

¹¹Even a child is known by his actions — whether his conduct is pure and upright.

¹²The ear that hears and the eye that sees — the LORD made them both.

¹³Do not love sleep, or you will become poor;
open your eyes and you will have plenty of bread.

¹⁴'Bad! Bad!' says the buyer, but after walking away, he boasts.

¹⁵There is gold and an abundance of jewels,
but lips of knowledge are a rare treasure.

¹⁶Take his garment — he has put up security for a stranger;
hold it as collateral for outsiders.

¹⁷Bread gained by deceit tastes sweet to a person,
but afterward his mouth is full of gravel.

¹⁸Plans are established through counsel, and with wise guidance wage war.

¹⁹A gossip reveals secrets,
so do not associate with someone who talks too freely.

²⁰Whoever curses his father or mother — his lamp will be snuffed out in the deepest darkness.

²¹An inheritance seized too quickly at the start will not be blessed in the end.

²²Do not say, 'I will repay evil.'

Wait for the LORD, and He will deliver you.

²³Differing weights are detestable to the LORD, and dishonest scales are not right.

²⁴A person's steps are directed by the LORD —
so how can anyone understand his own path?

²⁵It is a trap to rashly declare something holy and only after making vows to reflect.

²⁶A wise king winnows the wicked and drives the threshing wheel over them.

²⁷The human spirit is the LORD's lamp, searching all the innermost chambers.

²⁸Faithful love and truth guard a king, and he sustains his throne through faithful love.

²⁹The glory of the young is their strength, and the splendor of the old is gray hair.

³⁰Blows that wound cleanse away evil, and beatings reach the innermost parts.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Lets ha-yayin ('a scoffer is wine') homeh shekhar ('a noisemaker/brawler is strong drink') — wine and beer are personified as the kinds of people wisdom literature most consistently condemns: the scoffer and the troublemaker. Ve-khol shogeh bo lo yekham ('and everyone who goes astray by it/them will not be wise'). Alcohol does not merely accompany foolishness; it produces it. The person who is led astray by drink has abandoned the path of wisdom.
2. Naham ka-kefir eimat melek ('like the roar of a young lion is the dread of a king') — echoing 19:12. The mit'abbero ('one who crosses him, who provokes his anger') choter nafsho ('sins against his own soul/life, forfeits his own life'). Provoking royal anger is suicidal. The proverb is practical court advice: respect the king's power or suffer the consequences.
3. Kavod la-ish shevet me-riv ('honor for a person is sitting out of strife, ceasing from quarreling') — the wise person walks away from fights. Ve-khol evil yitgalla ('and every fool breaks out, bursts in, gets entangled'). The fool cannot resist the quarrel; he is drawn to conflict the way a moth is drawn to flame. Restraint is a mark of honor; eagerness to fight is a mark of foolishness.
4. Me-choref atsel lo yacharosh ('from the cold/winter the lazy person will not plow') — the autumn plowing season in Israel is cold and uncomfortable, and the lazy person refuses to endure it. Ve-sha'al ba-qatsir va-ayin ('and he asks/looks at harvest and there is nothing'). The consequence is mathematical: no plowing, no harvest. The lazy person is surprised by the emptiness that his own inaction guaranteed.
5. The verb yidlennah ('draws it out') is from dalah ('to draw water from a well') — the same action as lowering a bucket on a rope. The image is of a person reaching down into the deep well of another person's heart and bringing the hidden intention to the surface.
6. Rov adam yiqra ish chasdo ('most people proclaim, each one, his own loyal kindness') — nearly everyone advertises their own faithfulness. Ve-ish emunim mi yimtsa ('but a person of faithfulness — who will find?'). The gap between self-proclaimed loyalty and actual reliability is vast. People talk about their chesed; few actually live it. The rhetorical question implies: truly faithful people are extraordinarily rare.
7. Mithalekh be-tummo tsaddiq ('walking in his integrity is the righteous person') — the righteous person's daily life is characterized by tummah ('wholeness, integrity, completeness'). Ashre vanav acharav ('how fortunate are his children after him'). The righteous person's integrity becomes a legacy — his children inherit not just property but the blessing of a father's good name and honest example.
8. Melek yoshev al kisse din ('a king sitting on the throne of judgment') mezareh be-einav kol ra ('winnows with his eyes all evil'). The verb mezareh ('winnows') is from the threshing floor — the king's discerning gaze separates guilt from innocence the way a farmer separates grain from chaff. The ideal king's eyes are tools of justice; his presence itself drives evil away.

9. The two verbs — zikkiti ('I have purified, cleansed') and taharti ('I am pure, clean') — are both cultic terms normally associated with ritual purification. The proverb applies them to the moral interior: who can claim that their inner life is ritually clean? No one. The question demolishes self-righteousness.
10. Even va-even eifah ve-eifah ('a stone and a stone, an ephah and an ephah') — having two sets of weights and measures, one for buying (heavier) and one for selling (lighter). To'avat Yahweh gam sheneihem ('an abomination to the LORD, both of them'). The repetition of this theme (11:1, 16:11, 20:23) shows how deeply the sages cared about commercial honesty. God finds double standards in business personally offensive.
11. Gam be-ma'alalav yitnakker na'ar ('even by his deeds a youth is recognized/known') — character reveals itself early. Im zakh ve-im yashar po'olo ('whether pure and whether upright is his work'). You do not need to wait for adulthood to see who a person is becoming. Childhood behavior is already diagnostic. The proverb encourages early observation and early intervention.
12. Ozen shoma'at ve-ayin ro'ah ('a hearing ear and a seeing eye') Yahweh asah gam sheneihem ('the LORD made both of them'). The capacity to perceive — to hear truth and to see reality — is a divine gift. If God made the instruments of perception, then perception carries moral weight: we are obligated to use the faculties God gave us. The verse also implies that God who made ear and eye Himself hears and sees all things.
13. Al te'ehav shenah pen tivvaresh ('do not love sleep lest you be dispossessed/impooverished') — excess sleep is the lazy person's drug of choice. Peqach einakha seva lachem ('open your eyes — satisfaction of bread'). The imperative is blunt: wake up, see what needs to be done, and do it. The reward is simple sufficiency — seva lachem, enough bread. The proverb does not promise wealth, only adequacy as the reward for wakefulness.
14. Ra ra yomar ha-qoneh ('bad, bad, says the buyer') — the buyer talks down the merchandise to drive the price lower. Ve-ozel lo az yithallal ('and going away from there, then he boasts'). Once he has secured the bargain, he brags about his shrewd deal. The proverb captures the timeless psychology of haggling: public disparagement of goods followed by private celebration of the purchase. The sages found the behavior amusing enough to record.
15. Yesh zahav ve-rov peninim ('there is gold and abundance of pearls/corals/jewels') — precious materials are available. U-khli yeqar sifte da'at ('but a precious vessel are the lips of knowledge'). Knowledge-bearing speech is rarer and more valuable than gold or gems. The comparison is economic: knowledgeable speech is the scarcest and therefore the most precious commodity.
16. Leqach bigdo ki arav zar ('take his garment because he has become surety for a stranger') — if someone is foolish enough to guarantee a stranger's debt, seize his cloak as collateral because he is a high credit risk. U-ve'ad nokhriim chablehu ('and for foreigners/outsideers hold him as pledge'). The proverb is practical financial advice: do not trust the creditworthiness of anyone who has pledged for an unknown party.
17. Arev la-ish lechem shaqer ('sweet/pleasant to a person is bread of deceit') — ill-gotten gains taste good at first. Ve-achar yimmale pihu chatsav ('and afterward his mouth is filled with gravel/crushed stone'). The sweetness turns to gravel — what was pleasant becomes painful, gritty, inedible. The pleasure of dishonest gain is temporary; its consequences are lasting and miserable.
18. Machashavot be-etsah tikkon ('plans are established through counsel') — echoing 15:22. Good planning requires consultation. U-ve-tachbulot asech milchamah ('and with guidance/steering make war'). The tachbulot ('strategic guidance, steering') needed for warfare is the highest form of deliberative wisdom — the stakes are lives. If even war requires wise counsel, how much more do lesser decisions.
19. Goleh sod holekh rakhil ('one who reveals secrets is a gossip/slanderer') — the person who cannot keep confidences is dangerous to befriend. U-le-foteh sefatav lo tit'arav ('and with one who opens wide his lips do not mix/associate'). The warning is social: avoid the company of people who cannot control their speech, because anything you share with them will become public.
20. Meqallel aviv ve-immo ('one who curses his father and his mother') yid'akh nero be-ishon choshekh ('his lamp will be extinguished in the pupil of darkness, in the deepest darkness'). The ishon choshekh ('apple/pupil of darkness') is the darkest possible darkness — the center of the night, where no light penetrates. Cursing one's parents leads to total extinction. The severity reflects the ancient world's absolute prioritization of parental honor.
21. Nachalah mevohelet ba-rishonah ('an inheritance hastened/rushed at the beginning') ve-acharitah lo tevorakh ('and its end will not be blessed'). Wealth acquired too quickly — whether through impatience, manipulation, or dishonesty — does not produce lasting blessing. The pattern echoes 13:11: easy money evaporates. The acharit ('end, final outcome') is what matters, and hastily gained wealth fails the long-term test.
22. Al tomar ashallema ra ('do not say I will repay evil') — do not take vengeance into your own hands. Qavveh la-Yahweh ve-yosha lakh ('wait for the LORD and He will save you'). The command to renounce personal retaliation is paired with a promise: God will handle the justice. This is one of the clearest anti-vengeance statements in the wisdom literature and directly anticipates Romans 12:17-19.
23. To'avat Yahweh even va-aven ('an abomination to the LORD is a stone and a stone') — repeating the condemnation of verse 10 with slight variation. U-mo'azne mirmah lo tov ('and scales of deceit are not good'). The repetition within a single chapter underscores how seriously the sages took commercial integrity. God's revulsion at fraudulent weights is stated twice because the temptation to cheat in business is persistent.
24. Me-Yahweh mits'ade gaver ('from the LORD are the steps of a man') — echoing 16:9, God directs the actual trajectory of a person's life. Ve-adam mah yavin darkko ('and a person — how can he understand his way?'). The rhetorical question admits the limits of self-understanding: if God is the one directing our steps, then we cannot fully comprehend why our lives take the paths they do. Humility before divine sovereignty is the appropriate posture.
25. Moqesh adam yala qodesh ('a snare for a person is to blurt out holy — to rashly declare something as sacred/devoted') ve-achar nedarim levaqquer ('and after vows to investigate/consider'). The proverb warns against impulsive religious commitments — making vows before thinking them through. A vow once spoken to God is binding, so careless dedication creates an inescapable obligation. Think before you vow, not after.

- 26. Mezareh resha'im melekh chakham ('winnows the wicked does a wise king') — the same winnowing image from verse 8, now applied specifically to removing evil from the kingdom. Va-yashev aleihem ofan ('and he turns the wheel upon them'). The ofan ('wheel') is the threshing wheel that crushes grain — the wise king does not merely identify the wicked but applies the full weight of justice to them.
- 27. The neshimah ('breath, spirit') connects to Genesis 2:7, where God breathes into Adam's nostrils the nishmat chayyim ('breath of life'). That same divine breath now functions as a searchlight, probing the interior spaces of human consciousness. The verse suggests a collaboration between divine illumination and human self-awareness.
- 28. Chesed ve-emet yitsru melekh ('faithful love and truth guard/protect a king') — the paired divine attributes (see 14:22, 16:6) are the king's true bodyguards. Ve-sa'ad ba-chesed kis'o ('and he supports/upholds his throne through chesed'). Political stability depends not on military power but on the king's practice of loyal kindness. The throne endures because of chesed, not because of force.
- 29. Tiferet bachurim kocham ('the glory/beauty of young men is their strength') — youth's distinctive contribution is physical vigor. Va-hadar zeqenim sevah ('and the majesty/splendor of the elderly is gray hair'). Each stage of life has its own glory: youth has power; age has wisdom. The proverb honors both rather than privileging one over the other.
- 30. Chabburat petsa tamriq be-ra ('wounds of a blow cleanse/scour away evil') — the metaphor treats corrective suffering as a purifying agent. U-makkot chadre vaten ('and blows reach the chambers of the belly/innermost parts'). Physical consequences penetrate where words cannot reach. The proverb affirms that painful correction can reach the deepest levels of a person's character, purging evil that verbal instruction alone cannot dislodge.

Summary: Proverbs 21 continues the Solomonic collection with proverbs emphasizing divine sovereignty over human plans, the priority of justice over ritual, and the futility of resisting the LORD's purposes. The chapter opens with the striking image of the king's heart as a water channel in God's hand and closes with the declaration that no wisdom or strategy can stand against the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most politically radical statements in ancient Near Eastern literature: the king's heart is merely an irrigation ditch that God directs wherever He pleases (v1). In a world where kings claimed divine status or divine favor as their right, this proverb reduces royal authority to passive clay. Verse 3 elevates justice and righteousness above sacrifice — a theme that echoes the prophets (Isaiah 1:11-17, Amos 5:21-24, Micah 6:6-8) — suggesting that the wisdom tradition and the prophetic tradition share this conviction independently. The chapter's final verse (v31) — 'The horse is prepared for the day of battle, but victory belongs to the LORD' — is a perfect summary of biblical theology: human preparation is legitimate, but outcomes belong to God alone.

Translation Friction: Verse 9 ('Better to live on a corner of the roof than share a house with a quarrelsome woman') reflects the patriarchal social structure where men controlled domestic space. The observation is pragmatic, not prescriptive, but it addresses only men's frustration without acknowledging women's perspective. Verse 18 ('The wicked becomes a ransom for the righteous') does not teach substitutionary atonement but observes that the consequences intended for the righteous often fall on the wicked instead — a reversal pattern, not a transaction.

Connections: The 'king's heart as water channels' image (v1) connects to Isaiah 44:27-28, where God directs Cyrus as His shepherd. The priority of justice over sacrifice (v3) parallels 1 Samuel 15:22 and Hosea 6:6. The 'horse prepared for battle' (v31) echoes Psalm 20:7 ('Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we invoke the name of the LORD our God'). The chapter's emphasis on divine sovereignty over human plans links to Proverbs 16:1, 9 and 19:21.

¹The king's heart is a water channel in the LORD's hand —
He directs it wherever He pleases.

²Every path a person takes looks right to him,
but the LORD weighs hearts.

³Practicing righteousness and justice is preferred by the LORD over sacrifice.

⁴Haughty eyes and an inflated heart — the lamp of the wicked is sin.

⁵The plans of the diligent lead only to abundance, but everyone who rushes ends only in lack.

⁶Gaining wealth by a lying tongue is a fleeting vapor — those who chase it chase death.

⁷The violence of the wicked drags them away, because they refuse to practice justice.

⁸Crooked is the path of a guilty person,
but the conduct of the pure is upright.

⁹Better to sit on a corner of the roof than to share a house with a quarrelsome woman.

¹⁰The appetite of the wicked craves what is harmful;
his neighbor finds no mercy in his eyes.

¹¹When a scoffer is punished, the naive become wise;
when a wise person is instructed, he gains knowledge.

¹²The Righteous One observes the house of the wicked;
He overturns the wicked to ruin.

¹³Whoever blocks his ear from the cry of the poor — he too will cry out and not be answered.

¹⁴A gift given in secret calms anger, and a concealed bribe subdues fierce rage.

¹⁵Doing justice is a joy to the righteous but a terror to those who practice wickedness.

¹⁶A person who strays from the path of insight will rest in the assembly of the dead.

¹⁷Whoever loves pleasure will become poor;
whoever loves wine and oil will never grow rich.

¹⁸The wicked becomes a ransom for the righteous, and the treacherous takes the place of the upright.

¹⁹Better to live in a desert land than with a quarrelsome and irritable woman.

²⁰Precious treasure and oil fill the home of the wise, but a fool swallows them up.

²¹Whoever pursues righteousness and faithful love finds life, righteousness, and honor.

²²A wise person can scale a city of warriors and bring down the stronghold they trusted in.

²³Whoever guards his mouth and his tongue guards his life from troubles.

²⁴The proud and arrogant — 'Scoffer' is his name —
he acts with overflowing contempt.

²⁵The craving of the lazy person kills him, because his hands refuse to work.

²⁶All day long he craves and craves, but the righteous gives without holding back.

²⁷The sacrifice of the wicked is detestable — how much more when offered with evil intent!

²⁸A lying witness will perish,
but the person who listens will speak with lasting authority.

²⁹A wicked person puts on a bold face,
but the upright considers his way carefully.

³⁰There is no wisdom, no understanding,
no counsel that can stand against the LORD.

³¹The horse is prepared for the day of battle, but victory belongs to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Palge mayim (channels of water) is the same phrase used in Psalm 1:3 for the streams beside which the righteous tree is planted. Here the metaphor shifts from nourishment to control.
1. The proverb does not say the king is aware of God's direction. The water does not know it is being redirected. This is a statement about God's sovereignty, not about the king's piety.
2. The verb tokhen ('weighs, examines, measures') comes from the world of scales and balances. God does not merely observe — He assesses with precision. The same verb appears in Proverbs 16:2.
3. The pairing of tsedaqah and mishpat is one of the most important word pairs in the Hebrew Bible. Together they describe a society that functions as God intended — where relationships are right and judgments are fair.
4. The Hebrew nir can mean either 'lamp' or 'freshly plowed land.' If 'lamp,' the proverb says that what lights the wicked person's way is sin itself — their guiding light is darkness. If 'plowed land,' it means that everything the wicked produce is sin. Both readings yield the same conclusion: arrogance pervades every aspect of the wicked person's life.
5. The contrast is between charutz ('diligent, sharp, decisive') and ats ('to hurry, to be hasty'). Diligence is not slowness but purposeful planning followed by steady execution. Haste is action without thought — the illusion of productivity.

6. Hevel niddaf ('vapor driven, mist blown away') uses the same hevel that dominates Ecclesiastes — breath, vapor, something that vanishes instantly. Wealth gained through deception is not merely unstable; it is already gone the moment you grasp it.
7. Shod ('violence, destruction, robbery') becomes the agent that devours its own practitioners. The verb yegovrem ('drags them, sweeps them away') pictures violence as a current that carries the violent person downstream to ruin.
8. Hafakhpakh ('twisted, crooked, perverse') is an intensified form suggesting not just one wrong turn but a path that twists back on itself repeatedly. The contrast with zakh ('pure, clean, transparent') and yashar ('straight, upright') emphasizes that moral clarity produces directional clarity.
9. The flat rooftop was exposed to wind, rain, and sun — the worst living space in an Israelite home. The proverb uses 'better...than' (tov...min) format to make a deliberately absurd comparison: even the most uncomfortable solitude is preferable to relentless domestic conflict. The observation is repeated in 25:24. The Hebrew eshet midyanim ('woman of contentions') targets behavior, not gender, though the male audience of the collection means the examples address men's domestic experience.
10. Nefesh here means 'appetite, desire, inner drive' rather than 'soul' in the Greek philosophical sense. The wicked person's fundamental orientation is toward harm — evil is not an occasional lapse but a craving. The result is social: when desire is directed toward harm, the neighbor becomes an obstacle rather than a fellow human deserving compassion.
11. The proverb identifies two learning methods: the naive (peti) learn from watching consequences fall on others, while the wise (chakham) learn directly from instruction. The scoffer (lets) learns from neither — he exists in the proverb only as a negative example for others. Three character types, three relationships to learning.
12. The capitalized 'Righteous One' reflects the interpretive possibility that God is the subject. The ambiguity may be intentional — both the righteous person and God observe the wicked household, and both know its end.
13. The reciprocity is precise: the verb za'aq ('to cry out, to shout for help') applies to both the poor person and the one who ignored him. The one who refused to hear will find himself unheard. This is not abstract karma but covenant logic — God responds to those who respond to others.
14. The proverb observes a social reality without endorsing it: gifts and bribes work. The distinction between mattan ('gift') and shochad ('bribe') is significant — the first is neutral, the second carries negative moral weight. The proverb is descriptive, not prescriptive; it tells you how the world works, not how it should work.
15. The contrast is revealing: the same action — the administration of justice — produces opposite emotional responses depending on the person's character. The righteous find simchah ('joy, gladness') in fair judgment; the wicked find mechittah ('terror, ruin, destruction'). Justice is a mirror that reveals the observer.
16. Repha'im ('the dead, shades') refers to the inhabitants of Sheol — the shadowy underworld of Israelite cosmology. The proverb warns that abandoning wisdom is not a detour but a fatal turn. The verb yanuach ('will rest, will settle') implies permanence — this is not a temporary wandering but a final destination.
17. Wine and oil represent the consumable luxuries of Israelite life. The proverb does not condemn enjoyment but warns against making enjoyment the primary pursuit. Ahev ('loves, is devoted to') implies ongoing, habitual orientation — not occasional celebration but lifestyle hedonism.
18. Kofer is the same word used for the ransom price of a life in Exodus 21:30. The proverb appropriates sacrificial-legal language to describe the observed reversal of fortunes: the wicked pay the price meant for the righteous.
19. This is the second 'better...than' proverb about domestic strife in this chapter (see v9). The escalation from 'corner of the roof' to 'desert' adds rhetorical force: if a rooftop was insufficient escape, try the wilderness. The addition of va-ka'as ('and anger, and irritation') intensifies the portrait beyond v9. These proverbs are observations about the destructive power of chronic conflict, addressed to the male audience of the collection.
20. The verb yevall'ennu ('swallows it, devours it, consumes it') suggests the fool does not spend resources but gulps them down — an image of wasteful, animal-like consumption. The wise person accumulates because of self-discipline; the fool consumes because he cannot restrain appetite.
21. The repetition of tsedaqah — once as what is pursued and again as what is found — is deliberate. Righteousness compounds: practicing it produces more of it.
22. The proverb asserts that wisdom is superior to military strength. A single wise person can accomplish what an army cannot — breach the defenses of the mighty. The verb yarad ('brings down, causes to descend') and oz mivtechah ('the strength of its confidence, the stronghold it trusted') emphasize that wisdom dismantles not just walls but the confidence those walls inspired.
23. The repetition of shomer ('guards, keeps, watches over') creates a direct equation: guarding the mouth equals guarding the life. The nefesh ('life, self, being') is at stake in every word spoken. In Proverbs, speech is never merely verbal — it is existential.
24. This is a character definition: three words (zed, yahir, lets) pile up to create a complete portrait. Zed ('presumptuous, insolent'), yahir ('haughty, arrogant'), and lets ('scoffer, mocker') converge on a single personality type. The phrase 'Scoffer is his name' uses the naming formula to say: this is not behavior but identity. The 'overflow of presumption' (evrat zadon) suggests someone whose arrogance spills over into action — he cannot contain it.
25. The paradox: the lazy person is not free from desire — he wants as much as anyone. But his hands refuse (me'anu, 'they refuse, they are unwilling') to do the work that would satisfy the desire. He is killed by the gap between wanting and doing. The verb temitenu ('kills him') is not metaphorical —

Proverbs treats chronic laziness as self-destruction.

- 26. The contrast between the lazy craver and the righteous giver completes the portrait begun in v25. The lazy person's entire day is consumed by unsatisfied desire; the righteous person's life overflows in generosity. The verb yachsokh ('withholds, holds back, spares') with the negation means the righteous person gives freely, without calculating.
- 27. The 'how much more' (af ki) construction creates two levels of offense: a wicked person's sacrifice is already to 'evah ('detestable, abominable') because his life contradicts his offering; if he also brings it with zimmah ('evil intent, scheming, wickedness') — perhaps to manipulate God or create a pious appearance — the offense compounds. This extends the logic of v3: God prefers justice over sacrifice, and a wicked person's sacrifice is worse than no sacrifice at all.
- 28. The contrast is between the false witness who invents testimony and the person who shomea ('listens, hears, pays attention') before speaking. The liar's words die with him; the listener's words endure la-netsach ('forever, perpetually, with permanence'). Truth has staying power; lies self-destruct.
- 29. He'ez panav ('he makes his face strong, he hardens his countenance') describes brazen, shameless posturing — the wicked person projects confidence he does not have. The upright person, by contrast, yavin darkho ('understands his way, discerns his path') — he thinks before acting. The contrast is between performed certainty and genuine discernment.
- 30. The triple ein ('there is not') is emphatic and total. No exceptions, no qualifications. Human wisdom is real and valuable — but it is never ultimate.
- 31. Teshu'ah (from yasha, 'to save, to deliver') is the same root as the name Yehoshua (Joshua) and Yeshua (Jesus). The word encompasses military victory, rescue from danger, and spiritual salvation. Here it primarily means the outcome of battle, but the theological resonance runs deeper.

Summary: Proverbs 22 transitions from the main Solomonic collection (vv1-16) into the 'Words of the Wise' section (vv17-29), a collection heavily influenced by the Egyptian 'Instruction of Amenemope.' The chapter moves from individual proverbs about reputation, wealth, and child-rearing to an extended address from teacher to student, complete with a formal introduction and thematic organization around social ethics and self-control.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 6 ('Train a child in his way') is one of the most quoted and most misunderstood proverbs in English. The Hebrew al-pi darkho ('according to his way, according to his path') likely means according to the child's nature and developmental stage, not according to the parent's preferred moral program. The proverb is observational wisdom, not a divine guarantee. Beginning at verse 17, the 'Words of the Wise' section marks a dramatic shift in literary form — from two-line independent proverbs to multi-verse instructions with motivation clauses. The parallels with Amenemope are so extensive that most scholars conclude literary dependence in one direction or the other, with the majority view being that the Hebrew writer adapted the Egyptian material.*

Translation Friction: *The relationship between Proverbs 22:17-23:11 and the Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope raises questions about the nature of biblical inspiration. The parallels include shared imagery (moving boundary stones), shared structure (thirty sayings), and shared themes (protecting the poor). Rather than undermining the text's authority, this connection demonstrates that Israel's wisdom tradition engaged seriously with international wisdom and was not produced in isolation. The phrase sheloshim ('thirty' in 22:20) may refer to the thirty chapters of Amenemope.*

Connections: *Verse 2 ('The rich and the poor meet together; the LORD made them all') connects to Proverbs 29:13. The 'Words of the Wise' section (22:17-24:22) parallels the Egyptian Instruction of Amenemope, particularly the boundary stone prohibition (22:28 / Amenemope ch. 6), the scribe before kings (22:29 / Amenemope ch. 30), and the warning against exploiting the poor at the gate (22:22-23 / Amenemope ch. 2). The teacher-student address form echoes Proverbs 1-9.*

¹A good name is more desirable than great wealth; favor is better than silver and gold.

²The rich and the poor cross paths —
the LORD made them both.

³The shrewd person sees danger and takes cover;
the naive walk straight into it and pay the price.

⁴The result of humility and the fear of the LORD is wealth, honor, and life.

⁵Thorns and traps line the path of the crooked;
whoever guards his life stays far from them.

⁶Dedicate a young person according to his own way;
even when he grows old, he will not turn from it.

⁷The rich rule over the poor, and the borrower is slave to the lender.

⁸Whoever sows injustice will harvest disaster, and the rod of his fury will be broken.

⁹The generous person will be blessed,
because he shares his food with the poor.

¹⁰Drive out the scoffer and conflict leaves with him;
quarreling and insults will cease.

¹¹Whoever loves a pure heart and gracious speech —
the king will be his friend.

¹²The eyes of the LORD guard knowledge,
but He overturns the words of the treacherous.

¹³The lazy person says, 'There's a lion outside!
I'll be killed in the streets!'

¹⁴The mouth of the forbidden woman is a deep pit;
the one under the LORD's displeasure falls into it.

¹⁵Foolishness is bound up in the heart of a youth;
the rod of discipline will drive it far from him.

¹⁶Oppressing the poor to enrich yourself, or giving to the rich — both lead only to loss.

¹⁷Incline your ear and hear the words of the wise;
set your heart on my knowledge.

¹⁸For it is pleasing when you guard them in your belly;
let them be ready together on your lips.

¹⁹So that your trust may be in the LORD,
I am teaching you today — yes, you.

²⁰Have I not written for you thirty sayings of counsel and knowledge,

²¹to teach you what is reliable — words of truth —
so you can bring back truthful answers to those who sent you?

²²Do not rob the poor because he is poor,
and do not crush the afflicted at the gate,

²³because the LORD will take up their case and rob the life of those who rob them.

²⁴Do not befriend a hot-tempered person, and do not associate with someone given to rage,

²⁵or you will learn his ways and set a trap for your own life.

²⁶Do not be among those who shake hands on pledges or who guarantee the debts of others.

²⁷If you have nothing to pay,
why should your bed be taken from under you?

²⁸Do not move an ancient boundary marker that your ancestors set in place.

²⁹Do you see a person skilled in his work?
He will stand before kings;
he will not stand before obscure men.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew simply says shem ('name') without 'good' — the adjective is implied. In Israelite culture, a name was not a label but a reputation — the summary of a person's character as known by the community. Chen tov ('good favor, gracious esteem') describes how others regard you. Both are relational goods that money cannot purchase.
2. This proverb appears nearly verbatim in 29:13. The shared-maker theology here is practical, not abstract — it grounds social ethics in creation theology. If God made both, then the rich person who despises the poor insults the Maker.
3. Arum ('shrewd, prudent, clever') is the same word used for the serpent in Genesis 3:1 — it describes keen perception without moral judgment. Here shrewdness is positive: the ability to read situations accurately and act accordingly. The petayim ('naive ones, simple ones') lack this perceptiveness and suffer for it.
4. Egev ('consequence, result, reward; heel, footstep') connects humility and reverence for God to tangible outcomes. The pairing of anavah ('humility') with yir'at YHWH ('fear of the LORD') is significant: genuine reverence for God produces not arrogance but lowliness. The three rewards — wealth, honor, life — represent the full scope of human flourishing in the wisdom tradition.
5. Tsinnim ('thorns') and pachim ('traps, snares') are not punishments imposed from outside but natural features of the crooked path itself. The person who chooses crookedness walks into a landscape of pain and entanglement. The one who guards his nefesh ('life, self') avoids that path entirely.
6. This is a proverb, not a promise. Proverbs describe how life generally works, not how it always works. Reading it as a divine contract ('if I raise my child right, God guarantees the outcome') misreads the genre. The emphasis is on the parent's responsibility to understand and work with the child's nature.
7. This proverb observes economic power dynamics without approving them. The verb yimshol ('rules, dominates') and the noun eved ('slave, servant') describe the social reality of debt in the ancient world: borrowing created a power relationship indistinguishable from servitude. The proverb warns; it does not celebrate.

8. The agricultural metaphor — sowing and reaping — is the wisdom tradition's primary image for moral cause and effect. Avlah ('injustice, unrighteousness') produces aven ('disaster, trouble, wickedness'). The second line adds that the oppressor's instrument of punishment — the shevet ('rod, staff') of his rage — will itself be broken. Power used unjustly is self-destroying.
9. Tov-ayin (literally 'good of eye') means generous, open-handed — the opposite of ra-ayin ('evil of eye,' which means stingy). The 'eye' idiom reflects the ancient understanding that the eye reveals the heart's orientation: a good eye looks outward toward others' needs, a bad eye looks inward toward self-protection. Blessing follows generosity because generosity aligns with God's own character.
10. The proverb identifies the scoffer (lets) as the catalyst for communal conflict. Remove the person, and the conflict evaporates. The three words madon ('strife, contention'), din ('quarrel, dispute'), and qalon ('shame, dishonor, insult') represent escalating forms of social disruption. The solution is not mediation but removal.
11. The proverb pairs internal quality (tehar-lev, 'purity of heart') with external expression (chen sefatav, 'grace of his lips'). The person whose inner life is clean and whose speech is gracious gains access to the highest level of society — the king's friendship. Character and communication together open doors that ambition alone cannot.
12. God actively protects truth (da'at, 'knowledge') while subverting falsehood. The verb natsru ('guard, watch over, preserve') and yesallef ('overturns, subverts, perverts') create a double action: God is both guardian and judge, preserving what is true and dismantling what is false.
13. The humor is intentional. The lazy person invents an absurd excuse — a lion roaming the city streets — to justify staying indoors. The proverb mocks the creative energy that lazy people invest in avoiding work. The same joke appears in 26:13 with slight variation. Lions existed in ancient Israel but virtually never appeared in urban areas.
14. The 'forbidden woman' (zarot, plural of zarah) refers to the adulteress figure developed in Proverbs 1-9. Her mouth — her seductive speech — is compared to a deep pit (shuchah amuqqah), a trap that is easy to fall into and nearly impossible to escape. The second line adds a disturbing dimension: falling for her seduction is itself a sign of God's displeasure (ze'um YHWH), suggesting a judicial hardening.
15. Ivvelet ('foolishness, folly') is not innocent ignorance but the active resistance to wisdom that Proverbs considers the default human condition. Qeshurah ('bound, tied') suggests it is not casual but deeply embedded. The shevet musar ('rod of discipline') represents corrective training broadly — the full range of consequences that teach a young person to abandon foolish patterns. The proverb observes that children do not naturally gravitate toward wisdom; they must be trained into it.
16. Two apparently opposite actions — taking from the poor and giving to the rich — produce the same result: machsor ('lack, want, poverty'). Exploiting the vulnerable and currying favor with the powerful are both strategies that backfire. The proverb refuses to let economic calculation override moral reality.
17. The shift from independent proverbs to direct address signals a new collection. 'Words of the Wise' (divre chakhamim) is the section title, parallel to 'Proverbs of Solomon' in 10:1 and 25:1. The teacher-student format returns to the style of Proverbs 1-9.
18. The 'belly' (beten) is the seat of internalized knowledge — wisdom stored deep inside, not merely memorized but absorbed. The movement from belly to lips describes the process: take it in deeply (study, reflect, digest), and it will be available on your lips when needed (speech, counsel, response). Wisdom internalized becomes wisdom expressed.
19. The purpose clause reveals the ultimate goal of the 'Words of the Wise': not mere intellectual development but trust in the LORD (mivtachekha ba-YHWH). Wisdom instruction aims at faith. The emphatic af attah ('even you, yes, you') personalizes the address — this is not abstract teaching but direct, individual challenge.
20. The textual difficulty here is ancient — the Masoretes themselves flagged the discrepancy between the written and read forms. The rendering 'thirty sayings' follows the Qere and the Amenemope parallel, which together provide the strongest interpretive case.
21. Qosht ('reliability, certainty, truth') is an Aramaic loanword, rare in Hebrew, suggesting a cosmopolitan or late vocabulary. The purpose of wisdom education is twofold: to know what is true (internal) and to report truth accurately (external). The phrase le-sholchekha ('to those who send you') implies the student is an envoy or representative — someone who will carry answers back to an authority. Wisdom training produces trustworthy messengers.
22. The 'gate' (sha'ar) was the public space where legal cases were heard and commercial transactions occurred — the ancient courtroom and marketplace combined. Crushing the afflicted 'at the gate' means exploiting legal processes to harm the vulnerable. The reason given — ki dal hu ('because he is poor') — seems obvious but is the point: poverty itself is being weaponized. The poor person is targeted precisely because he lacks the resources to fight back.
23. God becomes the poor person's attorney (yariv rivam, 'will plead their case, will argue their lawsuit'). The legal imagery is precise: the poor person has no advocate at the gate, so God Himself enters the courtroom. The punishment mirrors the crime — qava ('to rob, to plunder') is turned back on the perpetrator. Those who rob the poor will have their own nefesh ('life') robbed by God.
24. Ba'al af (literally 'master of anger, possessor of wrath') and ish chemot ('man of furies, person of hot anger') describe someone whose defining characteristic is uncontrolled anger. The warning is practical: association leads to imitation (v25). Anger is contagious.
25. Te'elaf ('you will learn, you will become accustomed to') describes unconscious adoption of behavior patterns. The danger is not that you will choose to become angry but that proximity will rewire your habits. The moqesh ('snare, trap') is self-set — you trap yourself by absorbing someone else's destructive patterns.

- 26. Toq'e kaf ('strikers of the palm') refers to the handshake that sealed a financial guarantee. The warning against surety — co-signing someone else's loan — is one of the most repeated financial warnings in Proverbs (6:1-5, 11:15, 17:18, 20:16). The ancient wisdom is timeless: guaranteeing another person's debt puts your own assets at risk.
- 27. The image is vivid and concrete: the creditor literally takes the bed out from under the debtor. Mishkav ('bed, sleeping place') represents the most basic necessity of life. The rhetorical question implies the absurdity of risking what you cannot afford to lose.
- 28. The parallel with Amenemope is particularly close here: both texts prohibit moving boundary stones, both ground the prohibition in respect for ancestral rights, and both present it as a fundamental ethical norm. This is one of the strongest pieces of evidence for literary connection between the two texts.
- 29. The parallel with Amenemope chapter 30 is notable: both texts close with the image of the skilled scribe who serves royalty. The shared conclusion suggests the two texts may have been organized with awareness of each other's structure.

Summary: Proverbs 23 continues the 'Words of the Wise' collection with extended instructions on self-control in the presence of power, the futility of chasing wealth, respect for parents and the aged, avoidance of prostitution, and a vivid concluding portrait of the drunkard. The chapter moves from table manners before a ruler to the devastating consequences of alcohol abuse.

What Makes This Remarkable: The warning against staring at wealth (vv4-5) contains one of the most striking images in Proverbs: riches sprout wings and fly away like an eagle toward the sky. The Hebrew makes the eagle's flight a spontaneous generation — wealth 'makes itself wings,' as if it were alive and determined to escape. The chapter's final section on drunkenness (vv29-35) is the longest sustained poetic treatment of alcohol in the Hebrew Bible. It is not a moral lecture but a masterful piece of observational writing — the drunkard's bloodshot eyes, unexplained wounds, swaying vision, and the devastating final line: 'When will I wake up? I need another drink.' The addict's own voice closes the poem.

Translation Friction: Verse 13-14 endorse corporal punishment of children with the claim that beating will not kill the child and may save him from Sheol. Modern readers must reckon with the cultural distance: physical discipline was assumed across the ancient Near East, and the proverb operates within that assumption. The text is not a license for abuse but a reflection of ancient pedagogy. The 'stingy host' passage (vv6-8) uses the phrase ra-ayin ('evil eye') which in this context means 'grudging, miserly' — not the supernatural 'evil eye' of later folk tradition.

Connections: The 'Words of the Wise' section continues from 22:17. The wealth-sprouting-wings image (v5) connects to the transience theme in Ecclesiastes. The 'do not move a boundary marker' (v10) repeats 22:28 and Deuteronomy 19:14. The father-rejoicing theme (vv15-16, 24-25) echoes Proverbs 10:1 and 15:20. The drunkard portrait (vv29-35) parallels Isaiah 28:7-8 and anticipates Habakkuk 2:15-16.

¹When you sit down to eat with a ruler, pay careful attention to what is before you.

²Put a knife to your throat
if you are a person with a big appetite.

³Do not crave his delicacies, for they are deceptive food.

⁴Do not exhaust yourself chasing wealth;
have the sense to stop.

⁵Will you fix your gaze on what is already gone?
Wealth sprouts wings for itself and flies off like an eagle toward the sky.

⁶Do not eat the bread of a stingy host,
and do not crave his delicacies.

⁷For as he calculates inside himself, so he is.
'Eat! Drink!' he says to you,
but his heart is not with you.

⁸The little you have eaten you will vomit up,
and your pleasant words will be wasted.

⁹Do not speak in the hearing of a fool, for he will despise the insight of your words.

¹⁰Do not move an ancient boundary marker, and do not encroach on the fields of orphans,

¹¹because their Redeemer is strong;
He will take up their case against you.

¹²Bring your heart to discipline and your ears to words of knowledge.

¹³Do not withhold discipline from a youth;
if you strike him with the rod, he will not die.

¹⁴You will strike him with the rod and rescue his life from Sheol.

¹⁵My son, if your heart is wise,
my own heart will rejoice —

¹⁶yes, my inmost being will celebrate when your lips speak what is right.

¹⁷Do not let your heart envy sinners, but live in the fear of the LORD all day long.

¹⁸For there is surely a future,
and your hope will not be cut off.

¹⁹Listen, my son, and be wise, and guide your heart on the right path.

²⁰Do not be among heavy drinkers or among those who gorge on meat.

²¹For the drunkard and the glutton will become poor, and drowsiness dresses you in rags.

²²Listen to your father, who gave you life,
and do not despise your mother when she is old.

²³Buy truth and never sell it — wisdom, discipline, and understanding.

²⁴The father of a righteous person will greatly rejoice;
whoever fathers a wise child will delight in him.

²⁵Let your father and mother be glad;
let the woman who bore you rejoice.

²⁶My son, give me your heart, and let your eyes guard my ways.

²⁷For a prostitute is a deep pit, and a foreign woman is a narrow well.

²⁸She too lies in ambush like a robber and multiplies the faithless among humanity.

²⁹Who has misery? Who has regret?
Who has quarrels? Who has complaints?
Who has wounds for no reason?
Who has bloodshot eyes?

³⁰Those who linger over wine,
those who go searching for mixed drinks.

³¹Do not gaze at wine when it glows red,
when it sparkles in the cup,
when it goes down smoothly.

³²In the end it bites like a snake and strikes like a viper.

³³Your eyes will see strange things, and your mind will speak distorted words.

³⁴You will be like someone lying down in the middle of the sea, like someone sprawled on top of the rigging.

³⁵'They hit me, but I felt no pain.
They beat me, but I didn't notice.
When will I wake up?
I need to find another drink.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bin tavin ('understand carefully, discern thoroughly') is an emphatic form — the doubled verb insists on maximum awareness. Dining with a ruler was a political act in the ancient world, not a casual meal. 'What is before you' has a double meaning: the food on the table and the powerful person across from you. Both require vigilance.

2. The image is deliberately shocking: the knife at the throat is a hyperbolic metaphor for extreme self-control. If your appetite controls you, you must take drastic measures to control it before it controls the situation. Ba'al nefesh ('master of appetite, person of great desire') describes someone whose hunger — for food, for status, for the ruler's favor — could lead him to overindulge and make a fool of himself.
3. Lechem kezavim ('bread of lies, deceptive food') warns that the ruler's table is not generous hospitality but a calculated display. The food comes with strings attached. Every bite accepted creates an obligation. The delicacies (mat'ammotav) are bait, not gifts.
4. Tiga ('to toil, to weary yourself, to exhaust') implies not ordinary work but obsessive, health-destroying labor driven by greed. The command mi-binatekha chadal ('from your understanding, stop') means: use the very intelligence you are devoting to wealth-getting to recognize when to quit. Wisdom tells you where ambition should end.
5. The wordplay between ha-ta'if ('will you cause your eyes to fly') and ya'uf ('it flies away') connects the straining eye to the departing wealth — your eyes fly toward it, and it flies away from you.
6. Ra ayin ('evil of eye') is the opposite of tov-ayin ('good of eye,' 22:9). The 'evil eye' in Hebrew wisdom means 'grudging, miserly, resentful of what others receive' — not the supernatural curse of later folklore. Eating a stingy person's food creates obligation to someone who will later resent having shared it.
7. The rendering of sha'ar is debated — it may mean 'gatekeeper' (one who guards the threshold) or 'calculator' (one who reckons costs). Both meanings fit: the stingy host is a gatekeeper of his own generosity, calculating what everything costs him.
8. The physical disgust of vomiting (teqi'ennah) matches the social disgust of wasted courtesy. When you discover the host's true nature, everything — the food and your compliments — will come back up. The proverb warns that accepting hospitality from the wrong person degrades both body and speech.
9. The kesil ('fool, dullard') is not unintelligent but uninterested. He yavuz ('despises, treats with contempt') the sekhel ('insight, good sense') of your words. Teaching a fool is not merely ineffective — it is self-degrading, because your wisdom is subjected to contempt.
10. This repeats the boundary-stone prohibition from 22:28 but adds a specific victim: orphans (yetomim). Orphans had no father to defend their property rights in court. Stealing their land was attacking the most defenseless members of society — a direct affront to God, who claims the role of orphan-defender (v11).
11. Go'el is the same word used for God's redemption of Israel from Egypt (Exodus 6:6) and for Boaz's role in the book of Ruth. Here it names God's active, personal commitment to orphan defense.
12. Havi'ah ('bring, cause to come') is active — the student must deliver his own heart and ears to the learning process. Wisdom does not come to the passive; the student must come to wisdom. Musar ('discipline, correction, instruction') and imre-da'at ('words of knowledge') represent the full curriculum: correction of wrong behavior and acquisition of right understanding.
13. The proverb operates within the universal ancient assumption that physical correction was part of child-rearing. The assurance 'he will not die' addresses a parent's hesitation — the rod causes temporary pain, not permanent harm. Modern readers must read this within its cultural context while recognizing that the underlying principle (correction is an act of love, not neglect) transcends the specific method.
14. Sheol (she'ol) is the underworld, the realm of the dead — not the later theological concept of hell. The proverb claims that corrective discipline can save a young person from the path that leads to early death. 'Rescue his nefesh from Sheol' means: keep him alive by keeping him on the right path. The stakes are existential, not merely behavioral.
15. The teacher shifts to the intimate address 'my son' (beni) and reveals personal investment: the student's wisdom produces joy in the teacher's heart. Gam ani ('even I, I also, I myself') is emphatic — the teacher's delight is real, not professional. Wisdom is relational; it produces joy in the community of those who share it.
16. Kilyotai ('my kidneys, my innermost parts') represents the deepest seat of emotion in Hebrew anthropology — what we would call 'gut feeling' or 'the core of my being.' The teacher's joy at hearing the student speak mesharim ('upright things, straight words, what is right') is visceral, not cerebral.
17. The temptation to envy sinners (yeqanne libbekha ba-chatta'im) assumes that sinners appear to prosper — a problem that tormented the psalmists (Psalm 37, 73) and the author of Ecclesiastes. The antidote is not denial but redirection: yir'at YHWH ('the fear of the LORD') all day long. Sustained reverence displaces envy by reorienting what the heart values.
18. Acharit ('end, future, outcome, what comes after') assures the student that the story is not over. The apparent prosperity of sinners is not the final chapter. Tiqvatekha ('your hope, your expectation') will not be cut off (tikket, from karat, the same verb used for being 'cut off' from the covenant community). The promise is that the righteous path leads somewhere — patience will be vindicated.
19. The imperative sequence — shema ('listen'), chakkam ('be wise'), asher ('guide, set straight') — maps the learning process: attention leads to wisdom, which leads to directing the heart. The student is not passive but active: he must steer (asher) his own heart (lev) along the path (derekh). Wisdom is not received; it is practiced.
20. Sov'e-yayin ('drunkards, wine-guzzlers') and zolale vasar ('gluttons of meat, flesh-devourers') represent excess in both drink and food. The prohibition is social: al-tehi ('do not be among, do not associate with') warns against the company of the intemperate. The issue is not wine or meat per se but the loss of self-control that comes from habitual overindulgence and the peer pressure that perpetuates it.

21. The three-step progression: excess leads to drowsiness (numah, 'sleepiness, slumber'), which leads to poverty, which leads to rags. The personification of drowsiness as a tailor who dresses you in torn clothing (qera'im, 'rags, torn garments') is darkly humorous — the habits you indulge in become the wardrobe you wear.
22. Zeh yeladekha ('this one who fathered you, who gave you birth') grounds the command in biological reality: the person you are tempted to dismiss gave you existence. The second line addresses a specific temptation — contempt for an aging mother (al-tavuz ki zaqenah immekha). When parents become old and dependent, the power dynamic reverses, and the adult child may be tempted to treat them as burdens. The proverb forbids it.
23. The commercial metaphor is pointed: emet ('truth') is something you acquire at cost (qeneh, 'buy, acquire, purchase') and never liquidate (al-timkor, 'do not sell'). Truth, wisdom, discipline, and understanding are assets that must be held permanently. The one-directional transaction — buy but never sell — means that once acquired, these are not negotiable under any circumstances.
24. Gil yagil ('will surely rejoice, will greatly celebrate') is an emphatic form — doubled to express the intensity of the father's joy. The parallel between tsaddiq ('righteous') and chakham ('wise') confirms that in Proverbs, these are nearly synonymous: wisdom produces righteousness, and righteousness is the practical expression of wisdom.
25. The mother appears alongside the father (yismach-avikha ve-immekha), and the closing phrase yoladtekha ('she who gave you birth') specifically honors the mother's physical labor and sacrifice. The child's wise life is presented as a gift returned to both parents.
26. Tenah-veni libbakha li ('give, my son, your heart to me') is the teacher's most direct and intimate request. He asks for the student's full inner allegiance — not mere compliance but heart-level trust. The eyes (einekha) that guard (tittsornah, 'observe, watch, keep') the teacher's ways complete the picture: heart given inward, eyes directed outward.
27. Shuchah amuqqah ('deep pit') and be'er tsarah ('narrow well') are trap images — easy to fall into, impossible to climb out of. The zonah ('prostitute') and nokhriyyah ('foreign woman, outsider woman') are presented as two dimensions of sexual danger: the professional and the culturally unfamiliar. Both use seduction as a mechanism of entrapment.
28. The verb te'erov ('she lurks, she lies in ambush') is military and predatory language. The seductress is not passive but active — a hunter, not merely a temptation. The result of her work is multiplication: tosef bogedot ('she increases the faithless/treacherous'). Each person she ensnares becomes another person unfaithful to their commitments.
29. The sixfold 'who has?' (lemi) creates an incantatory rhythm that mimics the drunkard's repetitive, circular existence. The wounds 'for no reason' (chinnam) are the telltale sign — injuries the drinker cannot explain because he cannot remember receiving them.
30. Lam'acharim al-ha-yayin ('those who stay late over the wine, those who linger') and labba'im lachqor mimsakh ('those who come to investigate mixed wine') describe the dedicated drinker. Mimsakh ('mixed wine') was wine blended with spices or additional ingredients to increase potency. The verb chaqar ('to search, to investigate, to explore') is darkly ironic — the drunkard applies the diligence of a scholar to finding the strongest drink.
31. The seduction of wine is presented through visual and sensory appeal: yit'addam ('it reddens, it glows'), yitten ba-kos eino ('it gives its eye in the cup' — it gleams, it catches the light), yithalekh be-mesharim ('it goes in smoothness, it slides down easily'). Wine is personified as a seducer — it catches your eye, it looks beautiful, it enters smoothly. The next verses reveal what happens after the smooth entrance.
32. The reversal is complete: what went down smoothly (v31) now bites and stings. Nachash ('snake, serpent') and tsif'oni ('viper, adder') are both venomous creatures. The acharito ('its end, its aftermath') reveals the true nature of what seemed pleasant — wine that entered like silk exits like venom. The contrast between the smooth cup and the striking serpent is the chapter's most powerful image.
33. Zarot ('strange things' or 'strange women') and tahpukhot ('distortions, perversities, twisted things') describe the dual impairment of drunkenness: visual distortion and mental confusion. The drunk sees what is not there and says what makes no sense. Both perception (eyes) and speech (heart/mind) are corrupted.
34. Two absurd and terrifying positions: sleeping in the open ocean and sleeping at the top of a ship's mast (or rigging, chibbel). The drunkard's equilibrium is so destroyed that his subjective experience resembles the most violently unstable positions imaginable. The nausea and disorientation of severe intoxication are captured perfectly in the sea-swell image.
35. The shift to first person is the poem's masterstroke. The teacher stops describing the drunkard and lets the drunkard describe himself. The voice is simultaneously comic and tragic — a person who cannot feel blows, cannot remember being beaten, and whose only thought upon waking is to repeat the cycle. This is one of the earliest literary depictions of addiction.

Summary: Proverbs 24 concludes the 'Words of the Wise' (vv1-22) and appends a brief additional collection titled 'These also are by the wise' (vv23-34). The chapter addresses envy of the wicked, the strength wisdom provides, the duty to rescue the innocent, the certainty of divine judgment, and the famous ' sluggard's vineyard' parable. It moves from prohibitions and exhortations to a closing narrative illustration.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 11-12 contain one of the most morally demanding statements in the Hebrew Bible: the obligation to rescue those being dragged to slaughter, with the explicit warning that claiming ignorance will not work before God. This is not a suggestion but an imperative, and it eliminates the defense of 'I did not know.' God weighs hearts (see 21:2) and will repay according to action or inaction. The ' sluggard's vineyard' parable (vv30-34) is the only true narrative in the Proverbs collection — a first-person account of walking past a lazy man's ruined field and drawing a lesson. It ends with a nearly verbatim quotation of 6:10-11, creating an internal echo within the book.

Translation Friction: Verse 17-18 ('Do not rejoice when your enemy falls... or the LORD may see and be displeased and turn His anger away from him') has troubled interpreters because the motivation seems self-interested: do not gloat lest God relent and spare your enemy. But the deeper logic is about leaving judgment to God entirely — if you take satisfaction in another's downfall, you have inserted yourself into God's judicial role, and He may reverse the outcome to preserve His sovereignty over justice.

Connections: The rescue imperative (vv11-12) connects to Ezekiel 3:17-21 (the watchman's obligation) and James 4:17 ('whoever knows the right thing to do and fails to do it, for him it is sin'). The 'do not rejoice at your enemy's fall' teaching (vv17-18) is echoed in Job 31:29 and expanded by Jesus in Matthew 5:44. The sluggard's vineyard (vv30-34) quotes Proverbs 6:10-11 verbatim. The 'these also are by the wise' header (v23) parallels the collection headers in 10:1, 22:17, and 25:1.

¹Do not envy violent people, and do not desire to be among them,

²for their hearts plan violence and their lips speak of causing harm.

³By wisdom a house is built,
and by understanding it is established.

⁴and by knowledge its rooms are filled with every kind of precious and pleasant wealth.

⁵A wise person is powerful,
and a person of knowledge increases strength.

⁶For by wise strategy you wage your war, and victory comes through many advisors.

⁷Wisdom is beyond the fool's reach;
at the city gate he cannot open his mouth.

⁸Whoever schemes to do harm will be called a master of plots.

⁹The scheming of folly is sin,
and the scoffer is detestable to others.

¹⁰If you collapse on the day of trouble, your strength is indeed small.

¹¹Rescue those being dragged off to death;
hold back those stumbling toward slaughter.

¹²If you say, 'But we did not know about this!' — does not He who weighs hearts perceive it?
Does not He who guards your life know?
And will He not repay each person according to what he has done?

¹³Eat honey, my son, for it is good,
and drippings from the comb are sweet on your palate.

¹⁴Know that wisdom is the same for your soul.
If you find it, there will be a future,
and your hope will not be cut off.

¹⁵Do not lie in ambush, wicked one, against the home of the righteous;
do not ravage his resting place.

¹⁶For the righteous person falls seven times and rises again, but the wicked stumble into disaster.

¹⁷When your enemy falls, do not rejoice;
when he stumbles, do not let your heart celebrate,

¹⁸or the LORD will see and be displeased, and He may turn His anger away from your enemy.

¹⁹Do not be agitated by evildoers;
do not envy the wicked.

²⁰For the evildoer has no future,
and the lamp of the wicked will be snuffed out.

²¹Fear the LORD and the king, my son,
and do not associate with those who seek upheaval,

²²for disaster will rise against them suddenly,
and who knows the ruin that both can bring?

²³These also are by the wise:
Showing partiality in judgment is not good.

²⁴Whoever tells the guilty, 'You are innocent' — peoples will curse him, nations will denounce him.

²⁵But those who convict the guilty will prosper, and a rich blessing will come upon them.

²⁶An honest answer is like a kiss on the lips.

²⁷Prepare your work outside,
get everything ready in the field;
then afterward, build your house.

²⁸Do not testify against your neighbor without cause, and do not deceive with your lips.

²⁹Do not say, 'I will do to him what he did to me;
I will pay him back for what he has done.'

³⁰I passed by the field of a lazy man and by the vineyard of a person lacking sense.

³¹And there it was — overgrown with thorns everywhere, nettles covering its surface,
and its stone wall broken down.

³²I observed and took it to heart;
I looked and drew a lesson.

³³'A little sleep, a little slumber,
a little folding of the hands to rest' —

³⁴and poverty will come marching toward you like a vagabond, and want like an armed warrior.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with the same warning that closed the previous instruction unit (23:17): do not let envy of the wicked corrupt your moral compass. 'Violent people' (anshe ra'ah, literally 'men of evil/harm') are those who use force and manipulation to get ahead. The desire (tit'av, 'to crave, to long for') to join them is the temptation of expedience — their methods seem to work.
2. The verb yehgeh ('meditates, murmurs, plans') is the same word used for meditating on God's instruction in Psalm 1:2 — here inverted. Where the righteous person meditates on torah, the violent person meditates on shod ('destruction, violence, devastation'). Same cognitive process, opposite content.
3. Bayit ('house') means both the physical structure and the household — the family, the legacy, the dynasty. Wisdom builds (yibbaneh, passive — wisdom is the means) and understanding establishes (yitkonen, 'is made firm, is set on a foundation'). The passive voice emphasizes that wisdom is an instrument, not an agent — it is the tool God provides for building stable lives.
4. The progression from wisdom (v3) to understanding (v3) to knowledge (da'at, v4) represents three aspects of the same intellectual virtue. Wisdom designs, understanding constructs, and knowledge furnishes. The filled rooms (chadarim, 'inner chambers') represent abundance that comes from living wisely — not sudden wealth but accumulated prosperity.
5. Ge'vur chakham ba-oz ('a wise warrior is in strength') links wisdom to military power — the wise commander is stronger than the merely brave. This extends the logic of 21:22 (the wise person scales the city of warriors). Me'ammets ko'ach ('strengthening power, increasing might') suggests continuous growth — wisdom compounds strength over time.
6. Tachbulot ('guidance, steering, strategy') comes from the language of sailing — the ropes that steer a ship. War requires not just courage but navigation. Teshu'ah be-rov yo'ets ('deliverance in an abundance of counselors') repeats the teaching of 11:14 and 15:22: wisdom is collective, not individual. No single person sees everything; many advisors together see more.

7. Ra'mot ('corals, high things, things beyond reach') describes wisdom as elevated above the fool's capacity. The practical consequence: ba-sha'ar ('at the gate') — the place of legal proceedings and civic deliberation — the fool has nothing to contribute. He cannot open his mouth (lo yiftach-pihu) because he has nothing worth saying. Wisdom's absence results in civic silence.
8. Ba'al mezimot ('master of schemes, lord of plots') is a reputation label — the community will name you according to your behavior. Mezimmah can mean either 'prudence' (positive) or 'scheme' (negative); here the context determines the negative reading. The schemer earns a title that follows him permanently.
9. Zimmah ('scheme, plan, purpose') when paired with ivvelet ('folly') produces sin (chattat). The proverb locates sin not just in action but in intention — planning foolishness is already sinful. The scoffer (lets) is to'avat le-adam ('detestable to humanity') — universally despised, not merely by the wise but by everyone.
10. The wordplay between tsarah ('trouble, distress') and tsar ('narrow, small, constricted') is untranslatable: 'in the day of distress — distressed is your strength.' Crisis reveals capacity. The verb hitrappita ('you become slack, you go limp, you collapse') describes not physical weakness but moral failure — the inability to act when action is needed.
11. The verse does not specify who is doing the killing or why. The imperative applies regardless of the circumstances: if someone is being unjustly killed, you are commanded to intervene. The breadth of application is the point.
12. This is among the most ethically demanding passages in wisdom literature. It places a positive obligation on the bystander and removes the most common excuse for inaction. The theological grounding is God's omniscience: He knows what you knew and what you chose not to do.
13. Honey (devash) was the primary sweetener in ancient Israel and a symbol of the good life. Nofet ('drippings, oozing honey from the comb') is the purest, most desirable form. The instruction is not merely about food but sets up the analogy in v14: as honey is sweet to the body, wisdom is sweet to the soul.
14. The comparison is precise: what honey does for the taste buds, wisdom does for the nefesh ('soul, self, life'). The promise repeats 23:18 verbatim — yesh acharit ve-tiqvatekha lo tikkaret ('there is a future, and your hope will not be cut off'). Wisdom offers sweetness now and security later.
15. The address shifts to the wicked person directly — a rare move in Proverbs. Neveh tsaddiq ('the dwelling of the righteous') and rivtso ('his resting place, his lair') describe the righteous person's home and security. The verbs te'erov ('lie in ambush') and teshaddad ('ravage, destroy, plunder') are predatory and military. The wicked person is warned: attacking the righteous is futile because of what follows in v16.
16. The contrast is between falling and rising (the righteous) versus falling and staying down (the wicked). The righteous person's advantage is not immunity from suffering but the capacity to recover from it.
17. The prohibition against gloating (al-tismach, 'do not be glad'; al-yagel libbakha, 'do not let your heart exult') is remarkable in the ancient Near Eastern context, where celebrating an enemy's downfall was normal and expected. The next verse provides the theological reason.
18. The logic is counterintuitive: your gloating may cause God to relent toward the very person you want punished. Ra be-einav ('evil in His eyes, displeasing to Him') refers to your attitude, not your enemy's behavior. God finds schadenfreude repulsive because it usurps His role as judge. If you celebrate another's downfall, you claim ownership of judgment that belongs to God, and He may reverse the outcome to reassert His sovereignty.
19. Titchar ('be heated, be agitated, burn with anger') describes the emotional disturbance caused by watching the wicked prosper. The command addresses the psychological toll of perceived injustice. Combined with the envy prohibition, it tells the student: neither covet their success nor let their success make you angry.
20. Acharit ('future, outcome, latter end') for the wicked is empty — lo tiyeh acharit la-ra ('there will be no future for the evil one'). The lamp (ner) that represents life, prosperity, and continuity will be extinguished (yid'akh, 'will be put out, will be snuffed'). The wicked person's prosperity is temporary; his lamp has a limited supply of oil.
21. The pairing of the LORD and the king (YHWH va-melek) places divine and royal authority on the same side. Shonim ('those who change, those who are different, revolutionaries') describes people who destabilize — whether through political rebellion or constant inconsistency. The wisdom tradition values stability and order; those who constantly overturn existing structures are dangerous company.
22. This verse marks the end of the 'thirty sayings' section that began at 22:17. The collection closes with fear — an appropriate bookend to the opening call for attention and trust.
23. The collection header 'these also are by the wise' parallels 'proverbs of Solomon' (10:1) and 'words of the wise' (22:17). It attributes the following material to the same wisdom tradition without specifying individual authors.
24. The judge who acquits the guilty (omer la-rasha tsaddiq attah, 'saying to the wicked one, you are righteous') commits a public crime that the entire community recognizes. The consequences are social: peoples (ammim) will curse him and nations (le'ummim) will denounce him. Corrupt justice is not a private failing but a public offense that draws universal condemnation.
25. The contrast with v24: the judge who properly convicts (makhichim, from yakach, 'to rebuke, to convict, to decide rightly') receives blessing (birkat-tov, 'blessing of good'). The community rewards integrity in judgment because everyone's security depends on a just legal system.
26. The kiss (yishshaq sefatayim, 'he kisses lips') was a sign of respect and approval. Devarim nekhochim ('straight words, honest answers, direct speech') earn the same response as a kiss — they create intimacy and trust. The proverb values directness: honest speech is an act of relational warmth.

27. The sequence is crucial: first secure your livelihood (field work, agricultural preparation), then build your house (establish your household). The proverb counsels economic pragmatism — do not start a family or household until you have the means to sustain it. Foundations before structures; income before expenditure.
28. Ed chinnam ('witness for nothing, witness without cause') describes false or frivolous testimony — giving evidence against a neighbor when there is no legitimate grievance. Combined with the prohibition against lip-deception (haphitteta bi-sefatekha), the proverb protects the legal system from weaponized speech. The courtroom — the gate — depends on honest witnesses.
29. The prohibition against personal vengeance (al-tomar ka'asher asah li ken e'eseh-lo) forbids the reciprocity instinct: he hurt me, so I will hurt him. The phrase ashiv la-ish ke-fo'olo ('I will repay the man according to his deed') is the language of divine judgment (see v12) — when a human being claims it, he usurps God's prerogative. Repayment belongs to God, not to the offended party.
30. The shift to narrative is the literary surprise. After chapters of imperative instruction, the teacher becomes a storyteller. This first-person form gives the lesson immediacy and credibility — 'I saw this with my own eyes.'
31. The description is visual and detailed: qimmeshonim ('thorns, thistles') have taken over the entire field. Charullim ('nettles, stinging weeds') cover its face (panav, the surface of the ground). The stone wall (gal avanim, 'stone heap') that protected the vineyard from animals has collapsed (neherasah, 'was torn down, was demolished'). Every element of productive agriculture — cleared ground, cultivated soil, protective walls — has been lost to neglect.
32. The teacher's response models the learning process: echezeh ('I observed, I beheld'), ashit libbi ('I set my heart,' meaning I reflected deeply), ra'iti ('I saw' — repeated for emphasis), laqachti musar ('I took discipline/instruction'). Four verbs trace the path from observation to reflection to insight to life-change. The wise person learns from what he sees.
33. This verse quotes the lazy person's own self-justification — each 'a little' (me'at) sounds harmless by itself. A little sleep, a little rest, a little pause. The repetition exposes the deception: each 'little' adds up. The folding of hands (chibbuq yadayim, 'embracing of hands, crossing of arms') is the physical posture of inaction. This verse is quoted verbatim from Proverbs 6:10.
34. Poverty is personified twice: as a mithallekh ('one who walks about, a wanderer, a vagabond') who arrives uninvited, and as an ish Magen ('a man with a shield, an armed warrior') who cannot be resisted. The two images capture both stealth and force: poverty sneaks up on you and then overpowers you. This verse also quotes Proverbs 6:11, creating an internal echo that links the two passages on laziness.

Summary: Proverbs 25 opens the 'Hezekiah Collection' — proverbs of Solomon copied by the scribes of King Hezekiah of Judah (c. 715-686 BCE). This chapter is rich in extended similes and comparisons, moving from the glory of kings and the hiddenness of God, through social wisdom about legal disputes, speech, and self-control, to the famous instruction about giving food and drink to your enemy.

What Makes This Remarkable: The superscription (v1) is one of the most important editorial notes in the Hebrew Bible: it tells us that Hezekiah's court scribes actively collected, copied, and arranged Solomonic proverbs — evidence of a royal scribal project preserving wisdom literature centuries after Solomon. This chapter is also unusually dense with simile: nearly every proverb uses 'like' (ke-) comparisons, creating a gallery of vivid images — apples of gold in silver settings, cold water to a tired soul, clouds without rain, a broken tooth and a twisted foot. Verses 21-22 (feeding your enemy) are quoted by Paul in Romans 12:20, becoming one of the Hebrew Bible's most influential ethical instructions in the New Testament.

Translation Friction: The 'coals of fire on his head' image in verse 22 has been debated for centuries. Does it mean you will cause your enemy pain (punitive reading)? Or does it refer to an Egyptian penitential ritual where carrying coals on the head symbolized shame and repentance (transformative reading)? The transformative reading fits the context better: kindness to an enemy provokes inner shame that may lead to genuine change. The punitive reading contradicts the spirit of v21.

Connections: The Hezekiah editorial note (v1) connects to 2 Kings 18-20 and 2 Chronicles 29-32, which describe Hezekiah's religious reforms. The 'apples of gold' image (v11) has no exact parallel but echoes Song of Songs 2:3-5 in its use of fruit imagery. Verses 21-22 are quoted in Romans 12:20. The 'rooftop' proverb (v24) repeats 21:9 verbatim. The 'cold water to a thirsty soul' (v25) connects to Psalm 42:1-2 and Jeremiah 2:13.

¹These also are proverbs of Solomon, copied by the men of Hezekiah, king of Judah.

²It is the glory of God to conceal a matter, but the glory of kings is to search a matter out.

³The heavens for height and the earth for depth, but the heart of kings — unfathomable.

⁴Remove the dross from silver, and a vessel emerges for the refiner.

⁵Remove the wicked from the king's presence, and his throne will be established in righteousness.

⁶Do not promote yourself in the king's presence, and do not stand in the place of the great,

⁷for it is better to be told, 'Come up here!'
than to be humiliated before a noble whom your own eyes have seen.

⁸Do not rush to bring a lawsuit, or what will you do in the end
when your neighbor puts you to shame?

⁹Argue your case with your neighbor directly,
but do not reveal another person's secret,

¹⁰or the one who hears will disgrace you,
and your bad reputation will never go away.

¹¹A word spoken at the right moment is like apples of gold in a setting of silver.

¹²A gold ring and an ornament of fine gold — that is a wise rebuke to a listening ear.

¹³Like the cold of snow on a harvest day is a faithful messenger to those who send him;
he refreshes the soul of his masters.

¹⁴Clouds and wind but no rain — that is a person who boasts of a gift he never gives.

¹⁵Through patience a ruler can be persuaded,
and a gentle tongue can break a bone.

¹⁶If you find honey, eat only what you need;
too much, and you will vomit it up.

¹⁷Make your foot scarce at your neighbor's house, or he will grow tired of you and hate you.

¹⁸A war club, a sword, and a sharpened arrow — that is a person who bears false witness against his neighbor.

¹⁹A broken tooth and a twisted foot — that is trusting a treacherous person in a time of trouble.

²⁰Stripping off a garment on a cold day, pouring vinegar on an open wound — that is singing songs to a heavy heart.

²¹If your enemy is hungry, give him food to eat;
if he is thirsty, give him water to drink.

²²For you will heap burning coals on his head, and the LORD will reward you.

²³The north wind brings rain, and a secretive tongue brings angry looks.

²⁴Better to sit on a corner of the roof
than to share a house with a quarrelsome woman.

²⁵Cold water to a weary soul — that is good news from a distant land.

²⁶A muddied spring and a polluted fountain — that is a righteous person who gives way before the wicked.

²⁷Too much honey is not good,
and searching for your own glory is no glory at all.

²⁸A city with broken walls and no defenses — that is a person with no control over his spirit.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription authenticates both the Solomonic origin and the Hezekian transmission. It distinguishes this collection from 10:1-22:16 (also attributed to Solomon but without named editors) and from the 'Words of the Wise' (22:17-24:34, attributed to an unnamed wisdom tradition).
2. The verb haster ('to hide, to conceal') applied to God does not describe deception but transcendence — God conceals things because they belong to a level of reality humans cannot yet access. The verb chaqor ('to search, to investigate, to explore') applied to kings is the same word used for mining precious metals (Job 28) — it describes intensive, sustained inquiry.
3. Three immeasurable things: the height of the sky, the depth of the earth, and the inner life of a king. Ein cheqer ('there is no searching, it is unsearchable') applied to the king's heart means that royal decision-making is opaque to outsiders. The king investigates others (v2) but cannot himself be fully investigated. This is both a statement about royal privacy and a warning: do not assume you understand what the king is thinking.
4. Sigim ('dross, impurities, waste metal') must be removed before silver can be shaped. The metallurgical metaphor sets up verse 5: as dross must be removed from silver before it becomes useful, so the wicked must be removed from the king's presence before governance becomes righteous.
5. The application of the metallurgy image: the rasha ('wicked person') is the dross in the king's court. Once removed, the throne is established (yikkon, 'made firm, set on a stable foundation') in tsedeq ('righteousness, justice'). The purity of governance depends on the purity of the inner circle.

6. Tithaddar ('to glorify yourself, to make yourself splendid, to put yourself forward') warns against self-promotion before royalty. The advice is practical and social: do not claim a rank above your station. Jesus echoes this in Luke 14:7-11, where he tells guests not to choose the best seat at a banquet.
7. The social calculus is clear: being invited upward is honor; being pushed downward is shame. The phrase asher ra'u einekha ('whom your eyes have seen') adds the sting of witnesses — the humiliation happens in public, before people you know. Strategic humility avoids this risk.
8. Maher ('quickly, hastily, in haste') warns against impulsive litigation. The acharitah ('its end, its outcome') is unpredictable — you may lose, and the defeat will be public (behakhlīm, 'when he shames, when he humiliates'). The proverb counsels patience and private resolution before public confrontation.
9. Two instructions in one: settle disputes face to face (rivekha riv et re'ekha, 'your dispute, dispute with your neighbor') and do not drag third parties' private information into the conflict (sod acher al-tegal, 'another's secret do not uncover'). Disputes should be contained, not weaponized with gossip.
10. Dibbatekha ('your bad report, your infamy, your reputation for gossip') lo tashuv ('will not return, will not go away') warns that a reputation as a gossip or betrayer of confidences is permanent. Once people know you cannot be trusted with secrets, that knowledge cannot be undone.
11. The phrase al-ofanav (literally 'upon its wheels' or 'upon its turnings') is often rendered 'fitly spoken' or 'aptly spoken.' The root ofen means 'wheel' or 'manner' — a word that rolls out at exactly the right moment, turning precisely as it should.
12. The comparison links the beauty of jewelry to the beauty of correction. A mokhiach chakham ('wise reprover, wise person who corrects') paired with an ozen shoma'at ('hearing ear, ear that listens') creates something as valuable and beautiful as gold jewelry. Both parties are needed: the rebuke must be wise and the ear must be willing. Without the listening ear, even golden correction is wasted.
13. Snow-cooled water (not actual snowfall, which would ruin the harvest) was the ultimate refreshment during the exhausting harvest season. A tsir ne'eman ('faithful messenger, trustworthy envoy') provides the same relief to his senders: the assurance that the task was completed properly. Nefesh adonav yashiv ('he restores the soul of his masters') uses the same verb as Psalm 23:3 ('he restores my soul').
14. In an arid climate, clouds and wind that produce no rain are a cruel promise — the appearance of relief without the reality. Nesi'im ('clouds, vapor') and ruach ('wind') create anticipation; geshem ayin ('rain — none!') is the devastating letdown. A person who mithalleh be-mattat shaqar ('boasts of a false gift, brags about what he will give but does not') generates the same emotional cruelty: raised hope followed by nothing.
15. Orekh appayim ('length of nostrils,' the Hebrew idiom for patience, since anger was associated with flaring nostrils) can move a qatsin ('ruler, leader, commander'). Lashon rakkah ('soft tongue, gentle speech') can break a gerem ('bone') — the hardest structure in the body yields to the softest approach. The proverb celebrates the paradoxical power of gentleness: soft breaks hard.
16. Honey represents any good thing — pleasure, wealth, comfort. The proverb endorses enjoyment (ekhol, 'eat!') but within limits (dayyekka, 'your sufficiency, what is enough for you'). Beyond the limit, even sweetness becomes sickness. Self-regulation transforms a blessing into sustained enjoyment; excess transforms it into nausea.
17. Hoqar raglekha ('make your foot rare/precious') extends the honey principle to social visits. Even good relationships are ruined by excess. Yisba'akha ('he will have his fill of you') uses the same verb as v16 — just as you can have too much honey, your neighbor can have too much of you.
18. Three weapons — mefits ('mace, war club'), cherev ('sword'), and chets shanun ('sharpened arrow') — represent three kinds of damage: blunt force, cutting, and piercing from a distance. False testimony does all three: it bludgeons reputation, cuts relationships, and wounds from afar. The progression from close-range to long-range suggests that false witness does damage even at a distance.
19. Both images describe body parts that should function but do not: a shen ro'ah ('bad tooth, broken tooth') that was supposed to chew and a regel mu'adet ('slipping foot, dislocated foot') that was supposed to walk. Trusting a boged ('traitor, unfaithful person') in crisis is the same: the support you counted on collapses precisely when you need it most.
20. Three images of inappropriate action: removing warmth when cold is needed, applying acid to a wound (chomets al-nater, 'vinegar on soda/natron' — which produces a fizzing, useless chemical reaction), and singing cheerful songs to a person in grief. Forced cheer for a grieving person is not comfort but cruelty — it strips away the dignity of sorrow and adds pain to pain. The proverb validates grief and condemns the impulse to fix sadness with performance.
21. This proverb is quoted by Paul in Romans 12:20 as the basis for 'overcoming evil with good.' The Hebrew text makes no reference to the motivation being punishment — the instruction is simply to meet need regardless of the relationship.
22. Whatever the coals image means, the final clause settles the ethical direction: God rewards this behavior. Acts of enemy-love align with God's will, and God will repay the person who practices them. The reward is from God, not from the enemy's changed behavior.
23. Ruach tsafon ('north wind') in Israel typically brings rain from the Mediterranean. Lashon sater ('hidden tongue, secretive speech, backbiting') similarly produces a predictable result: panim niz'amim ('angry faces, indignant countenances'). The cause-and-effect is as reliable as weather: gossip produces anger as surely as the north wind produces rain.
24. This is a verbatim repetition of 21:9. Its presence here in the Hezekiah collection suggests it circulated independently and was included in both collections. The repetition itself is significant — it shows that the editors did not harmonize the collections but preserved them as received.
25. Mayim qarim ('cold water') on a nefesh ayefah ('exhausted/thirsty soul') is instant, physical relief. Shemu'ah tovah me-erets merchaq ('good news from a far country') provides the same relief to the anxious mind. In a world without instant communication, news from distant family or business took weeks or months — the arrival of good news after long uncertainty was as reviving as cold water after hard labor.

- 26. A ma'yan nirpas ('trampled spring') and maqor mashchat ('corrupted source') are water sources ruined by contamination — still present but no longer useful. When a tsaddiq ('righteous person') collapses (mat, 'totters, stumbles, gives way') before a rasha ('wicked person'), the community loses its source of clean moral water. The righteous person who compromises under pressure becomes a polluted spring — present but poisoned.
- 27. Extending v16, excessive honey consumption is now paired with excessive self-promotion. Cheqer kevodam kavod ('the investigation of their glory is glory' — read sarcastically, or emended to 'the investigation of weighty matters is weighty/burdensome') suggests that constantly seeking your own honor is as sickening as gorging on honey. True glory is not pursued; it is received.
- 28. The military image would have been especially vivid in the Hezekiah collection, since Hezekiah witnessed the Assyrian siege of Jerusalem (2 Kings 18-19). A breached wall was not a metaphor but a lived terror.

Summary: Proverbs 26 continues the Hezekiah collection with three concentrated sections: the fool (vv1-12), the sluggard (vv13-16), and the troublemaker — the meddler, the deceiver, and the gossip (vv17-28). The chapter is notable for its humor, its vivid animal imagery, and the famous paradox of verses 4-5: should you answer a fool or not?

What Makes This Remarkable: The juxtaposition of verses 4 and 5 ('Do not answer a fool according to his folly' / 'Answer a fool according to his folly') is one of the most discussed pairs in Proverbs. The apparent contradiction is intentional: wisdom cannot be reduced to a single rule. Sometimes engaging a fool dignifies his nonsense; sometimes not engaging him lets him think he is wise. The wise person must discern which situation requires which response. This is the wisdom tradition at its most sophisticated — refusing to flatten complexity into a formula. The sluggard section (vv13-16) is the funniest passage in Proverbs, culminating in the lazy person who cannot lift his hand from the dish to his mouth (v15) yet considers himself wiser than seven counselors (v16).

Translation Friction: The violent imagery applied to fools — a whip for the horse, a bridle for the donkey, a rod for the fool's back (v3) — reflects a society where physical punishment was an accepted corrective measure. The comparison of fools to animals is intentionally degrading: the fool has abandoned the use of reason, so he must be managed like a beast. Modern readers will want to distinguish between the proverb's diagnosis (foolishness resists all verbal correction) and its prescribed remedy (physical force).

Connections: The fool-answer paradox (vv4-5) connects to Ecclesiastes 10:12-14 and Jesus' own varied responses to hostile questioners — sometimes he answered, sometimes he remained silent. The dog-returning-to-vomit image (v11) is quoted in 2 Peter 2:22. The 'lion in the road' excuse (v13) repeats 22:13. The gossip-and-charcoal image (v20-21) connects to James 3:5-6 on the tongue as fire.

¹Like snow in summer and rain at harvest, honor does not suit a fool.

²Like a fluttering sparrow, like a darting swallow, an undeserved curse will not land.

³The whip suits the horse, the bridle the donkey, and a rod for the fool's back.

⁴Do not answer a fool according to his folly, or you yourself will become like him.

⁵Answer a fool according to his folly, or he will be wise in his own eyes.

⁶Cutting off your own feet and drinking violence — that is sending a message through a fool.

⁷Legs hang limp on a lame person — so does a proverb in the mouth of fools.

⁸Like tying a stone into a sling — that is giving honor to a fool.

⁹A thornbush brandished by a drunk — that is a proverb in the mouth of fools.

¹⁰An archer who wounds everyone at random — that is one who hires a fool or hires a passerby.

¹¹As a dog returns to its vomit,
so a fool repeats his folly.

¹²Do you see a person wise in his own eyes?
There is more hope for a fool than for him.

¹³The lazy person says, 'A lion is on the road!
A lion is in the open square!'

¹⁴A door turns on its hinges, and the lazy person turns on his bed.

¹⁵The lazy person buries his hand in the dish;
he is too tired to bring it back to his mouth.

¹⁶The lazy person is wiser in his own eyes than seven people who give thoughtful answers.

¹⁷Grabbing a dog by the ears — that is a passerby who meddles in someone else's quarrel.

¹⁸Like a madman shooting
flaming arrows and death —

¹⁹that is a person who deceives his neighbor and then says, 'I was only joking!'

²⁰Without wood, a fire goes out;
without a gossip, conflict dies down.

²¹Charcoal for embers and wood for fire — so is a quarrelsome person for kindling conflict.

²²The words of a gossip are like tasty morsels;
they go down into the innermost parts.

²³Silver glaze over a clay pot — that is burning lips with a wicked heart.

²⁴A hateful person disguises himself with his lips,
but inside he stores up deceit.

²⁵When he makes his voice gracious, do not trust him, for seven abominations fill his heart.

²⁶Hatred may be concealed by deception,
but his wickedness will be exposed before the assembly.

²⁷Whoever digs a pit will fall into it, and whoever rolls a stone — it will roll back on him.

²⁸A lying tongue hates those it crushes, and a flattering mouth brings ruin.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Snow in summer is impossible in Israel; rain during harvest is destructive (it ruins drying grain). Both are wrong-season events. Honor given to a kesil ('fool, dullard') is equally out of place — it disrupts the natural moral order.
2. The tsippor ('bird, sparrow') and deror ('swallow') are erratic in flight — they dart and flutter but do not settle. A qillat chinnam ('curse without cause, undeserved curse') behaves the same way: it has no place to land, no target to hit, because there is no moral ground for it to attach to. The proverb assures: if the curse is undeserved, it cannot harm you.
3. The three-part comparison equates the fool with draft animals: each requires an external control device because internal direction is absent. The shot ('whip'), meteg ('bridle'), and shevet ('rod') are instruments of compulsion. The fool's back (gev kesilim) replaces the animal's back — the fool has placed himself in the animal category by refusing to respond to reason.
4. This verse and the next are not contradictory but complementary — they describe two different situations requiring two different responses. The wise person must discern which applies.
5. The deliberate placement of these contradictory commands side by side is an editorial choice — the Hezekiah scribes preserved the tension rather than resolving it. The tension itself is the teaching: wisdom is not a rulebook but a faculty of judgment.
6. The imagery is deliberately absurd: sending a message via a fool is like amputating your own legs (meqattseh raglayim, 'cutting off feet') and drinking chamas ('violence, harm'). You destroy your own ability to walk (act) and consume destruction (experience the consequences). The fool as messenger does not deliver the message — he delivers disaster.
7. The lame person's legs (shoqayim, 'legs, thighs') are dalyu ('hang loose, dangle, are lifted but useless') — they exist but cannot function. A mashal ('proverb, comparison, wisdom saying') in a fool's mouth is equally useless: the words are present but the understanding is absent. The fool can recite wisdom but cannot apply it.
8. Tsrer even be-margemah ('binding a stone in a sling') could mean: (1) tying the stone so it cannot be released — defeating the sling's purpose, or (2) loading a precious stone into a weapon that will fling it away. Either way, the action wastes something valuable. Giving honor (kavod) to a fool is equally wasteful — it either cannot accomplish its purpose or it throws value away.
9. A drunk waving a choach ('thorn branch, thornbush') is dangerous to everyone nearby but especially to himself — he cannot control the weapon and will likely injure himself. A fool wielding a proverb is equally dangerous: he may use it at the wrong time, apply it to the wrong situation, or weaponize it against the innocent. Wisdom in the wrong hands is a hazard.
10. This verse is notoriously difficult to translate. Rav mecholel kol ('a master who wounds everyone' or 'a great one who creates everything') is ambiguous. The rendering follows the interpretation that likens the person who hires fools and random strangers to an archer who shoots wildly — everyone gets hurt. Hiring without discernment is indiscriminate destruction.
11. The comparison is not just about returning to bad behavior but about returning to something the body itself rejected. The fool's experience should have taught him — his own life expelled the folly — but he goes back anyway.
12. The shocking conclusion of the fool section: the only person worse than a fool is the person who thinks he is wise (chakham be-einav, 'wise in his own eyes'). The fool at least might encounter wisdom and recognize it; the self-satisfied 'wise' person has immunized himself against learning. His self-assessment blocks all correction. This is the most dangerous condition in Proverbs — not ignorance but the illusion of knowledge.

13. The excuse has escalated from 22:13: there the lion was vaguely 'outside'; here it patrols both the derekh ('road') and the rehov ('open square, public plaza'). The lazy person's imagination grows more elaborate over time, filling every possible route with danger. The humor lies in the specificity of the excuse and the total absence of actual risk.
14. The comparison is brilliant in its precision: the door moves (tissov, 'turns, rotates') but goes nowhere — it swings back and forth on its tsir ('hinge, pivot') without ever leaving its frame. The lazy person does the same on his mittah ('bed') — he rolls and shifts but never gets up. Maximum motion, zero progress.
15. The laziness has reached its absurd apex: the atsel has managed to get his hand into the dish (tsallachat, 'bowl, dish, plate') but nil'ah ('is exhausted, is wearied') by the effort of returning it to his mouth. He wants to eat but cannot complete the motion. The proverb is comic hyperbole, but the point is real: laziness eventually destroys even the capacity for self-care. This verse is nearly identical to 19:24.
16. The sluggard section's devastating conclusion: the person who cannot feed himself considers himself wiser than shiv'ah meshive ta'am ('seven who return sense, seven who give reasoned answers'). Seven is the number of completeness — the lazy person thinks he is wiser than every possible advisor. His laziness has metastasized into self-delusion. This connects to v12: the self-proclaimed wise person is worse than a fool.
17. Machaziq be-ozne-kelev ('grasping the ears of a dog') puts you in an impossible position: you cannot hold on (the dog will bite you) and you cannot let go (the dog will bite you). The meddler (over mit'abber al-riv lo-lo, 'a passer-by getting involved in a quarrel not his own') is in the same trap: once involved in someone else's conflict, there is no safe exit.
18. The mitlahlelah ('one acting crazy, a madman, one raving') who shoots ziqqim ('firebrands, flaming projectiles'), chitstsim ('arrows'), and mavet ('death') is random and lethal. The three projectiles represent escalating destruction — fire, piercing, and death itself. This image sets up v19.
19. The deadly joke: after causing real harm through deception (rimmah, 'deceived, cheated, misled'), the offender retreats into the defense of humor — halo mesacheq ani ('am I not playing? I was just kidding!'). The proverb exposes this as a lie: deception is deception regardless of the label you attach afterward. Calling harm a joke does not undo the harm.
20. The physics of conflict is identical to the physics of fire: remove the fuel and the fire dies. The nirgan ('gossip, whisperer, slanderer') is the wood that keeps quarrels burning. Remove the gossip and the madon ('strife, contention, quarrel') goes quiet (yishtoq, 'becomes silent, ceases, is stilled'). The solution to chronic conflict is identifying and removing the person who feeds it.
21. Extending v20's fire metaphor: pecham ('charcoal') intensifies gechalim ('embers/coals'), and etsim ('wood') feeds esh ('fire'). The quarrelsome person (ish midyanim, 'man of contentions') functions identically: he takes existing tension and intensifies it (lecharchar riv, 'to stoke strife, to heat up a quarrel'). He does not start fires from nothing — he finds smoldering embers and adds fuel.
22. This verse repeats 18:8 verbatim. Ke-mitlahamim ('like swallowed morsels, like delicious bites') describes gossip's appeal: people consume it eagerly because it is fascinating. The words descend to chadre-vaten ('the inner chambers of the belly') — they are internalized, digested, and become part of the listener. Gossip is not surface noise; it becomes part of how you see the person being discussed.
23. Kesef sigim metsuppeh al-charesh ('silver dross overlaid on pottery') describes a cheap vessel made to look valuable — the ceramic is worthless, and the coating is not real silver but slag. Sefatayim dolqim ('burning lips, fervent lips, smooth lips') combined with lev ra ('a wicked heart, an evil mind') is the human equivalent: passionate speech covering corrupt intentions. The exterior gleams; the interior is worthless.
24. Yinnaker ('disguises himself, makes himself unrecognizable') — the sone ('hater, enemy') uses speech to conceal his true nature. Be-qirbo ('in his midst, in his inner being') he stores mirmah ('deceit, treachery'). The external presentation and the internal reality are opposites. Verses 24-26 form a unit about concealed hatred.
25. Ki yechanen qolo ('when he makes his voice gracious, when he speaks charmingly') — the deceiver can produce beautiful speech at will. Sheva to'avot be-libbo ('seven detestable things are in his heart') — the number seven means his heart is completely full of what God finds abhorrent. The warning is absolute: al-ta'amen-bo ('do not believe in him, do not trust him'). Some people's charm is a weapon.
26. The concealment of sin'ah ('hatred') by mashshaon ('deception, guile') is temporary. The ra'ato ('his wickedness, his evil') will be revealed (tiggaleh, 'will be uncovered, will be exposed') be-qahal ('in the assembly, before the community'). The proverb assures that hidden hatred has an expiration date — public exposure is coming.
27. The boomerang principle: traps set for others ensnare the trapper. Koreh shachat ('one who digs a pit') falls into his own excavation. Golel even ('one who rolls a stone' — presumably to set a trap or block a path) has it roll back (elav tashuv, 'to him it returns'). This is not karma but divine justice operating through natural consequences. Ecclesiastes 10:8 repeats the same observation.
28. The chapter's final proverb reveals the motive behind deception: the liar hates his victims (yisna dakkav, 'hates those he has crushed/oppressed'). Lying is not neutral — it proceeds from hatred. The flattering mouth (peh chalaq, 'smooth mouth') produces midcheh ('ruin, overthrow, stumbling') — smooth words are the pathway to destruction. The chapter ends as it began: with the contrast between appearance and reality.

Summary: Proverbs 27 continues the Hezekiah collection with proverbs about the uncertainty of tomorrow, the value of honest friendship, the testing power of praise, the insatiability of the human eye, and the importance of diligent pastoral care. The chapter moves from warnings about boasting and jealousy to an extended closing section on agricultural stewardship as a metaphor for responsible living.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 6 ('Faithful are the wounds of a friend, but the kisses of an enemy are excessive') is one of the most psychologically acute statements in the Bible. It identifies the paradox that pain from a trusted person can be more valuable than pleasure from an untrustworthy one. The chapter also contains the striking observation that 'iron sharpens iron' (v17) — an image of mutual friction producing mutual improvement. The agricultural closing (vv23-27) is unusual for Proverbs: it is an extended pastoral poem rather than a series of independent proverbs, describing the rhythms of responsible land management as the foundation of security.

Translation Friction: Verse 15-16 compares a quarrelsome woman to a constant dripping on a rainy day, then says trying to restrain her is like restraining the wind or grasping oil. As with similar proverbs (21:9, 19; 25:24), the observation addresses only men's frustration in a patriarchal context. The intensity of the simile — wind and oil, forces that cannot be contained — suggests genuine despair at chronic domestic conflict. Verse 14 ('blessing a neighbor loudly early in the morning will be counted as a curse') warns against socially tone-deaf enthusiasm — good intentions delivered at the wrong time are perceived as aggression.

Connections: The 'wounds of a friend' (v6) connects to Psalm 141:5 ('Let the righteous strike me; it is a kindness'). 'Iron sharpens iron' (v17) has no exact parallel but resonates with Ecclesiastes 4:9-12 (two are better than one). The agricultural conclusion (vv23-27) echoes the garden-and-field imagery throughout Proverbs (24:30-34) and anticipates the agrarian economics described in Ruth. The 'do not boast about tomorrow' warning (v1) connects to James 4:13-16.

¹Do not boast about tomorrow, for you do not know what a day may give birth to.

²Let another person praise you, not your own mouth —
a stranger, not your own lips.

³A stone is heavy and sand is weighty, but a fool's provocation outweighs them both.

⁴Fury is cruel and anger is a flood,
but who can stand before jealousy?

⁵Open rebuke is better than love that stays hidden.

⁶Trustworthy are the wounds of a friend,
but the kisses of an enemy are excessive.

⁷A satisfied appetite tramples on honey, but to a hungry appetite every bitter thing is sweet.

⁸Like a bird that strays from its nest,
so is a person who strays from his place.

⁹Oil and incense make the heart glad,
and the sweetness of a friend comes from sincere counsel.

¹⁰Do not abandon your friend or your father's friend, and do not go to your brother's house on the day of your disaster.
Better a neighbor nearby than a brother far away.

¹¹Be wise, my son, and make my heart glad,
so I can answer anyone who mocks me.

¹²The shrewd person sees danger and takes cover;
the naive walk straight into it and pay the price.

¹³Take his garment — he has guaranteed a stranger's debt;
hold it as collateral — he has pledged for a foreign woman.

¹⁴Blessing your neighbor in a loud voice early in the morning — it will be counted as a curse.

¹⁵A constant dripping on a rainy day and a quarrelsome woman are alike.

¹⁶Trying to restrain her is like restraining the wind or grasping oil with your right hand.

¹⁷Iron sharpens iron,
and one person sharpens the face of another.

¹⁸Whoever tends a fig tree eats its fruit, and whoever serves his master will be honored.

¹⁹As water reflects a face back to a face, so the human heart reflects the person.

²⁰Sheol and Abaddon are never satisfied, and the eyes of a person are never satisfied.

²¹The crucible tests silver and the furnace tests gold, and a person is tested by the praise he receives.

²²Even if you grind a fool in a mortar with a pestle among the grain, his foolishness will not leave him.

²³Know well the condition of your flocks;
pay close attention to your herds.

²⁴For wealth does not last forever, and does a crown endure from generation to generation?

²⁵When the grass is removed and new growth appears and the mountain herbs are gathered in,

²⁶lambs will provide your clothing, and goats will be the price for a field.

²⁷There will be enough goat's milk for your food,
food for your household,
and sustenance for your servant girls.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ma-yeled yom ('what a day may give birth to') personifies the day as a pregnant woman — you cannot predict what it will produce. The verb yalad ('to give birth') implies that each day contains something gestating, unknown, about to emerge. The proverb counsels humility before the future: plans are legitimate, but boasting about outcomes you cannot control is foolishness.
2. Zar ('stranger, outsider, another person') and nokhri ('foreigner, someone from outside') together represent anyone other than yourself. Even the most distant person's praise is more valuable than self-praise. The proverb does not forbid confidence but forbids advertising it — let your work speak and let others do the endorsing.
3. Even (stone) and chol (sand) are the heaviest natural substances in daily experience. The fool's ka'as ('anger, vexation, provocation') is kaved ('heavy, burdensome') beyond both. The proverb measures emotional weight in physical terms: dealing with a fool's anger is a load that exceeds any physical burden.
4. Chemah ('fury, rage, venom') is akhziyyut ('cruel, merciless'). Af ('anger, wrath') is shetef ('a flood, an overwhelming torrent'). Both are destructive — but qin'ah ('jealousy, envy, zeal') surpasses both. The rhetorical question mi ya'amod ('who can stand?') implies: no one. Jealousy is more destructive than rage because rage burns out; jealousy smolders indefinitely.
5. Tokhachat megullah ('rebuke that is uncovered, correction out in the open') is preferred over ahavah mesuttaret ('love that is concealed, hidden affection'). Love that never expresses itself — especially through honest correction — is useless. The proverb values visible, active engagement over invisible, passive warmth. Love that does not speak when speech is needed is not functioning as love.
6. Na'atarot is often translated 'deceitful' but the root atar means 'to multiply, to be abundant.' The enemy's kisses are not just false but profuse — suspiciously generous, overwhelmingly affectionate. The excess itself is the warning sign.
7. Nefesh seve'ah ('a full/satisfied appetite') rejects (tavus, 'tramples, spurns') even nofet ('dripping honey' — the finest sweetness). Nefesh re'evah ('a hungry/starving appetite') finds even bitter things (kol-mar) sweet (matoq). The proverb observes how need transforms perception: what you have in abundance loses value; what you lack becomes precious. This applies to food, companionship, home, and every other human good.
8. A tsippor nodedet min-qinnah ('a bird wandering from its nest') is vulnerable — exposed to predators and weather, separated from its young. A person who abandons his maqom ('place, proper location, home') faces the same exposure. The proverb values rootedness: your place — your home, your community, your responsibilities — is where you belong. Wandering may look like freedom but feels like exile.
9. Shemen ('oil, perfume') and qetoret ('incense') are sensory pleasures that lift the mood (yesammach-lev, 'make the heart rejoice'). A friend's metek ('sweetness, pleasantness') comes from etsat-nefesh ('counsel of the soul, advice from the heart') — not flattery but genuine, deeply meant guidance. The proverb equates the pleasure of a friend's honest counsel with the pleasure of physical luxuries.
10. Three instructions about relational priority: maintain inherited friendships (re'akha ve-rea avikha), do not burden family with emergencies when they are far away (beit achikha al-tavo be-yom eidekha), and value proximity (tov shakhen qarov me-ach rachoq). The proverb is pragmatic: in a crisis, the person next door can help you now; your brother three days' journey away cannot. Cultivate nearby relationships.
11. The teacher reveals a personal stake: the student's wisdom vindicates the teacher. Chorfi ('my reproacher, the one who taunts me') questions the teacher's competence. The student's wise life is the teacher's best answer — a living refutation of any critic. The parent-teacher's reputation depends on the student's character.
12. Nearly identical to 22:3. The repetition within the Hezekiah collection confirms that proverbs circulated independently and could appear in multiple collections. The message remains: discernment (reading situations accurately) is a survival skill.
13. Nearly identical to 20:16. The instruction is addressed to the lender: if someone has been foolish enough to guarantee a stranger's or foreign woman's debt, protect yourself by taking his garment as collateral. The proverb simultaneously warns against surety and instructs others how to manage the risk created by those who ignore that warning.
14. The humor is sharp: the person thinks he is being generous (mevarekh, 'blessing') but the delivery — be-qol gadol ('in a great voice, loudly') and ba-boqer hashkem ('early in the morning, at the crack of dawn') — transforms the blessing into a curse. Good intentions delivered at the wrong time, in the wrong way, with the wrong volume, produce the opposite of their intended effect. Social intelligence is as important as moral intention.
15. Delef tored ('a driven drip, a persistent leak') on a yom sagrir ('a day of driving rain, a stormy day') cannot be stopped, cannot be ignored, and gradually destroys sanity. The eshet midyanim ('woman of contentions') has the same effect. The comparison focuses on relentlessness: the issue is not the volume of any single complaint but the unending, erosive repetition.

16. Two impossible tasks: tsofan ruach ('hiding/containing the wind') and shemen yemino yiqra ('oil of his right hand calls out' — oil is slippery and cannot be held). The quarrelsome person cannot be contained, managed, or controlled by external force. The proverb does not offer a solution — it simply describes an insoluble problem, which is itself a form of wisdom.
17. The word yachad can mean 'sharpens' or 'together' — both meanings may be active. Iron sharpens iron when brought together; people sharpen people when they engage closely. The double meaning reinforces the message: closeness and friction together produce excellence.
18. The fig tree (te'enah) required constant care — pruning, watering, protecting from pests. The one who does the work (notser, 'guards, tends, watches over') eats the reward. The parallel: whoever faithfully serves (shomer adonav, 'guards his master, attends to his lord') will be honored (yekhubad). Faithful service, like faithful agriculture, produces a harvest.
19. Ka-mayim ha-panim la-panim ('as in water, the face to the face') — still water acts as a mirror, showing you your own face. Ken lev-ha-adam la-adam ('so the heart of the person to the person') can mean either: (1) your heart is a mirror that reveals who you truly are, or (2) one person's heart reflects another's — what you project, you receive back. Both readings teach self-knowledge: look at your heart, and you will see your true self; look at how others respond to you, and you will see what you are projecting.
20. She'ol and Avaddon (the underworld and the place of destruction) have bottomless capacity — they always accept more dead. The human eye (eine ha-adam) has the same bottomless quality: it is never satisfied (lo tisba'nah, 'they are not filled, they do not have enough'). Desire always wants more. The comparison is unsettling: human appetite shares the insatiability of death itself.
21. The matsref ('crucible, refining pot') and kur ('furnace, smelter') expose impurities in metals through extreme heat. Praise (mahalal, 'what is praised, the content of praise') does the same to a person: how you respond to praise reveals your character. If praise inflates you, the impurity of pride is exposed. If praise humbles you, the metal is pure. Praise is a furnace.
22. The image is extreme: putting a fool in a makhtesh ('mortar, grinding bowl') and pounding him with an eli ('pestle') alongside rifot ('grain, crushed grain'). Even this level of pressure — literal pulverization — will not separate the fool from his ivvelet ('folly'). Foolishness is not a surface coating that can be removed; it is integral to the fool's being. This is the most pessimistic statement about the fool in Proverbs: some people cannot be fixed.
23. The agricultural conclusion (vv23-27) functions as a parable for all responsible stewardship. 'Flocks' and 'herds' represent whatever resources, relationships, or responsibilities God has entrusted to you.
24. The rhetorical question (ve-im nezer le-dor va-dor, 'does even a crown last generation to generation?') challenges even royal security. If kings cannot guarantee permanence, ordinary people certainly cannot. The solution (vv25-27) is not despair but diligent stewardship — manage what you have, because nothing is guaranteed.
25. The agricultural cycle begins: galah chatsir ('the hay is removed, the first cutting disappears'), and nir'ah-deshe ('the new green growth is visible'). The isevot harim ('herbs/plants of the mountains') are collected. The passage describes seasonal rhythm — the attentive farmer reads the landscape and acts in time.
26. The flocks provide both necessities (kevashim li-levushekha, 'lambs for your clothing' — wool) and capital (mechir sadeh attudim, 'goats are the price of a field' — livestock as currency for land purchase). Attentive husbandry produces both daily provision and long-term investment.
27. The pastoral vision concludes with sufficiency: de chalev izzim ('enough goat's milk') for personal needs (lachmekha), household needs (lechem betekha), and the support of dependents (chayyim le-na'arotekha, 'life for your young women/servant girls'). The picture is not lavish wealth but sustainable provision — enough for everyone in your care. The chapter ends where wisdom always ends: with diligent responsibility producing reliable provision.

Summary: Proverbs 28 continues the Hezekiah collection with a sharp focus on governance, justice, wealth, and the moral courage required to confront wrongdoing. The chapter contrasts the wicked who flee when no one pursues with the righteous who are bold as a lion, and develops extensive teachings on honest leadership, the dangers of greed, the blessedness of confession, and the reliability of the person who walks in integrity.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most penetrating observations about political legitimacy in the ancient world: when a land transgresses, it has many rulers, but with a person of understanding and knowledge, stability endures (v2). The chapter also contains the clearest statement on confession in Proverbs: 'Whoever conceals his transgressions will not prosper, but whoever confesses and forsakes them will receive mercy' (v13). This is not merely practical advice but theological conviction — God responds to honest confession with racham ('compassion, mercy'). The chapter's political proverbs (vv2, 3, 12, 15-16, 28) form a sustained meditation on what makes governance just or unjust.

Translation Friction: Verse 8 ('Whoever increases wealth by interest and profit gathers it for one who will be generous to the poor') reflects the Torah's prohibition against lending at interest to fellow Israelites (Exodus 22:25, Leviticus 25:35-37, Deuteronomy 23:19-20). The proverb does not merely discourage usury but declares it ultimately futile — the wealth will end up in the hands of the generous. Verse 24 ('Whoever robs his father or mother and says it is no transgression is a companion of a destroyer') addresses the specific abuse of parents by adult children, a violation of the fifth commandment.

Connections: The 'bold as a lion' image (v1) connects to Psalm 91:13 and the lion imagery throughout Proverbs. The confession teaching (v13) parallels Psalm 32:3-5 and 1 John 1:9. The usury prohibition (v8) connects to the Torah lending laws (Exodus 22:25, Leviticus 25:35-37). The 'many rulers' in a corrupt land (v2) echoes the chaotic king-succession in northern Israel (1-2 Kings). The 'trustworthy person blessed' (v20) connects to the parable of the talents (Matthew 25:21).

- ¹The wicked flee when no one pursues, but the righteous are as bold as a young lion.
- ²When a land transgresses, its rulers multiply;
but with a person of understanding and knowledge, stability endures.
- ³A poor ruler who oppresses the weak is like a driving rain that leaves no food.
- ⁴Those who abandon instruction praise the wicked,
but those who keep instruction resist them.
- ⁵People given to evil do not understand justice,
but those who seek the LORD understand everything.
- ⁶Better a poor person who walks in integrity than a rich one whose ways are crooked.
- ⁷A son who keeps instruction is discerning,
but a companion of gluttons shames his father.
- ⁸Whoever increases wealth by interest and profit gathers it for someone who will be generous to the poor.
- ⁹Whoever turns his ear away from hearing instruction —
even his prayer is detestable.
- ¹⁰Whoever leads the upright astray on an evil path will fall into his own pit, but the blameless will inherit what is good.
- ¹¹A rich person is wise in his own eyes,
but a poor person with understanding sees through him.
- ¹²When the righteous triumph, there is great splendor;
but when the wicked rise to power, people hide.
- ¹³Whoever conceals his transgressions will not prosper,
but whoever confesses and abandons them will receive mercy.

¹⁴Blessed is the person who always trembles with caution, but whoever hardens his heart will fall into disaster.

¹⁵A roaring lion and a charging bear — that is a wicked ruler over a helpless people.

¹⁶A leader who lacks understanding is a great oppressor, but whoever hates unjust gain will enjoy long life.

¹⁷A person burdened with the guilt of bloodshed will flee to the pit — let no one support him.

¹⁸Whoever walks in integrity will be delivered,
but whoever is crooked in his ways will fall suddenly.

¹⁹Whoever works his land will have plenty of food, but whoever chases fantasies will have plenty of poverty.

²⁰A faithful person will overflow with blessings, but whoever rushes to get rich will not go unpunished.

²¹Showing partiality is not good;
a person can be corrupted for a piece of bread.

²²A stingy person hurries after wealth and does not realize that poverty will overtake him.

²³Whoever rebukes a person will afterward find more favor than the one who flatters with his tongue.

²⁴Whoever robs his father or mother and says, 'It is no offense' —
he is a companion of a destroyer.

²⁵A greedy person stirs up conflict,
but whoever trusts in the LORD will prosper.

²⁶Whoever trusts in his own heart is a fool,
but whoever walks in wisdom will be delivered.

²⁷Whoever gives to the poor will lack nothing, but whoever hides his eyes will receive many curses.

²⁸When the wicked rise to power, people hide;
but when they perish, the righteous flourish.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The plural 'wicked flee' contrasted with 'righteous are bold' suggests that wickedness produces collective panic while righteousness produces individual courage. One righteous person has more nerve than a crowd of the wicked.
2. Be-fesha erets rabbim sareiha ('in the transgression of a land, many are its rulers') observes that national sin produces political instability — coups, assassinations, rapid turnover of leaders. This describes the northern kingdom of Israel precisely, where nine dynasties and nineteen kings ruled in two centuries. The antidote is not more rulers but better ones: adam mevin yodea ('a person who understands and knows') brings continuity (ya'arikh, 'will prolong, will make last').

3. Gever rash ve-osheq dallim ('a poor/needy man who oppresses the poor') describes the worst kind of oppressor: one who knows poverty but still exploits the vulnerable. Matar sochef ('sweeping rain, driving downpour') destroys rather than nourishes — rain that should bring life instead washes away crops and leaves no lechem ('bread, food'). The irony is devastating: rain should mean harvest; this ruler should mean justice. Both betray their function.
4. Torah here means 'instruction' broadly — the teaching of wisdom and the direction of God. Those who have abandoned it (ozevev torah) find themselves praising the wicked (yehalelu rasha) because they have lost the moral framework to distinguish right from wrong. Those who keep instruction (shomere torah) contend with the wicked (yitgaru vam, 'they oppose them, they provoke them, they resist them'). Moral discernment produces moral courage.
5. Anshe-ra ('men of evil') lack the capacity to understand mishpat ('justice, judgment') — their moral corruption has destroyed their moral perception. Mevaqshe YHWH ('those who seek the LORD') yavinu khol ('understand everything'). The claim is bold: seeking God produces comprehensive understanding. Not omniscience, but moral clarity — the ability to see situations truly and judge them accurately.
6. Tummo ('his integrity, his completeness, his blamelessness') is the poor person's wealth. Iqqesh derakhayim ('twisted of ways, crooked in his paths') is the rich person's poverty. The proverb reverses economic categories: true wealth is character, and true poverty is moral corruption. This is not romanticism about poverty but a clear hierarchy of values.
7. Notser torah ('one who guards/keeps instruction') demonstrates discernment (mevin). Ro'eh zolelim ('companion of gluttons, one who associates with wasteful people') brings shame (yakhlim, 'shames, disgraces') on his father. The choice of company reveals the child's character and reflects on the parent. The same associational logic appears throughout Proverbs: you become like those you keep company with.
8. Neshekh ('interest, usury' — literally 'a bite') and tarbit ('increase, profit, surcharge') were both prohibited in lending to fellow Israelites. The proverb declares that wealth accumulated this way will not remain with the exploiter — God will redirect it to chonen dallim ('one who shows grace to the poor'). The usurer's hoard is temporary; it is merely in transit to a more generous owner.
9. The consequence is severe: refusing to hear God's instruction (mesir ozno mi-shemo'a torah) renders even prayer to'evah ('detestable, abominable'). The person who will not listen to God cannot expect God to listen to him. Prayer from a person who has rejected instruction is not humble petition but presumptuous demand — and God finds it repulsive.
10. Leading the yasharim ('upright ones') astray on a bad path triggers the boomerang principle: bi-shechuto hu-yippol ('into his own pit he will fall'). The temimim ('blameless, complete, those of integrity') inherit good (yinchalu-tov). The one who corrupts others is destroyed by his own corruption; those who resist corruption receive the inheritance.
11. Wealth creates the illusion of wisdom (chakham be-einav, 'wise in his own eyes'). The rich person mistakes financial success for intellectual superiority. But a dal mevin ('poor person of understanding') can yachqerenu ('search him out, investigate him, see through him') — discernment is not correlated with income. The poor person with genuine understanding can expose the rich person's pretension.
12. Two political scenarios: righteous leadership produces tiferet ('splendor, glory, beauty') — public flourishing. Wicked leadership produces concealment (yechuppas adam, 'people are searched for, people go into hiding'). The verb chuppas can mean either 'people are sought out' (by the wicked, for persecution) or 'people hide' (for self-protection). Either reading describes a society of fear.
13. The verb modeh means both 'to confess' and 'to give thanks' — in Hebrew, honest acknowledgment of failure and grateful acknowledgment of God share the same word. Confession is an act of thanks: it thanks God for being the kind of God who responds to honesty with mercy.
14. Ashre adam mefached tamid ('blessed is the person who is afraid always') seems paradoxical — how can fear produce blessedness? The fear (pachad) here is not anxiety but moral vigilance: the constant awareness that one wrong step can lead to ruin. The opposite — maqsheh libbo ('one who hardens his heart') — is the person who refuses to feel moral concern, who becomes insensitive to warning. Pharaoh is the Bible's classic example of a hardened heart.
15. Ari nohem ('a growling lion') and dov shoqeq ('a rushing/charging bear') are the two most dangerous predators in ancient Israel. A moshel rasha ('wicked ruler') over am-dal ('a poor/helpless people') is equally predatory: he devours those who cannot defend themselves. The comparison degrades the ruler to the level of a wild animal — he has abandoned the image of God for the image of a beast.
16. Nagid chasar tevunot ('a prince/leader lacking understanding') produces rav ma'ashaqqot ('much oppression, great extortion'). Incompetent leadership is not merely ineffective but actively harmful — the leader without understanding defaults to exploitation. The antidote is sone betsa ('one who hates unjust gain, one who despises profit from exploitation') — this leader ya'arikh yamim ('will lengthen days, will enjoy longevity'). The quality that extends a ruler's life is not wisdom alone but integrity — specifically, the refusal to profit from injustice.
17. Adam ashuq be-dam-nafesh ('a person oppressed by the blood of a life') carries the weight of murder. Ad-bor yanus ('to the pit he will flee') — his trajectory is downward, toward the grave. Al-yitmekhu-vo ('let no one hold him up, let no one support him') is a communal instruction: do not shield a murderer from consequences. Justice demands that the community not intervene to protect the guilty.
18. Holekh tamim ('one who walks in integrity, one whose conduct is complete') yivvashe'a ('will be saved, will be delivered'). Ne'eqash derakhayim ('one twisted in ways, one crooked in paths') yippol be-echat ('will fall in one' — suddenly, all at once, in a single collapse). Integrity produces gradual security; crookedness produces sudden catastrophe. The fall is be-echat — one event, one moment, total.

19. The identical proverb appears in 12:11. Oved admato ('one who works his ground') is contrasted with meraddef reqim ('one who pursues empty things, one who chases vapors'). The first has food (yisba-lachem, 'will be satisfied with bread'); the second has poverty (yisba-rish, 'will be satisfied with lack'). The ironic use of yisba ('will be satisfied, will have plenty') for both outcomes is darkly humorous — both are satisfied, but one is satisfied with bread and the other with emptiness.
20. Ish emunot ('a person of faithfulness' — the plural intensifies) is rav-berakhot ('abundant in blessings'). Faithfulness (emunah) produces blessings (berakhot) as naturally as rain produces growth. Ats leha'ashir ('one who hurries to become rich') lo yinnaqeh ('will not be held innocent, will not go unpunished'). The contrast is between patient faithfulness and impatient greed — the first accumulates blessings over time, the second accumulates guilt.
21. Haker-panim ('recognizing faces, showing favoritism') — judging based on who someone is rather than what is true — is lo-tov ('not good'). The second line reveals how cheaply justice can be bought: al-pat-lechem ('for a piece of bread, for a morsel of food') a person will commit pesha ('transgression, rebellion'). Justice collapses not always under great pressure but sometimes under trivial inducement.
22. Nivhal la-hon ('one who hastens toward wealth, one who is panicked about getting rich') is identified as ish ra-ayin ('a person of evil eye' — stingy, grudging). The irony: the person desperate to accumulate does not know (lo yeda) that his hoarding mentality produces the opposite of what he intends. Cheser yevo'ennu ('lack will come to him') — scarcity arrives precisely because he grasped so tightly.
23. Mokhiach adam ('one who corrects/rebukes a person') earns chen ('favor, grace, goodwill') — not immediately but acharai ('afterward, later, in retrospect'). The flatterer (machaliq lashon, 'one who makes the tongue smooth') wins immediate approval but loses long-term trust. Time vindicates the honest corrector and exposes the flatterer.
24. Gozel aviv ve-immo ('one who robs his father and his mother') represents the ultimate betrayal of the family bond. The self-justification — omer ein pesha ('he says, there is no transgression') — compounds the crime by denying it. The person who can steal from parents and feel no guilt is chaver le-ish mashchit ('a companion of a man of destruction, an associate of one who destroys'). He has allied himself with the principle of destruction itself.
25. Rechav-nefesh ('wide of appetite, expansive of desire, greedy') generates madon ('strife, conflict') because insatiable desire inevitably encroaches on others' territory. Bote'ach al-YHWH ('one who trusts in the LORD') yedusshan ('will be made fat, will prosper, will flourish'). Trust in God satisfies the appetite that greed cannot — it produces the abundance that grasping fails to deliver.
26. Boteach be-libbo ('one who trusts in his own heart') is a kesil ('fool') — self-trust is identified as the core of foolishness. The heart (lev), which Proverbs repeatedly identifies as deceptive and needing guidance, is the worst possible object of trust. Holekh be-chokhmah ('one who walks in wisdom') yimmalet ('will escape, will be delivered'). The path of wisdom is the path of deliverance; the path of self-trust is the path of the fool.
27. Noten la-rash ('one who gives to the poor') ein machsor ('there is no lack') — generosity does not deplete but sustains. Ma'alim einav ('one who hides his eyes, one who looks away') receives rav-me'erot ('many curses'). The 'hidden eyes' image is powerful: the person who deliberately avoids seeing need is not passive but active — he works to not see what is in front of him.
28. This verse echoes v12 and forms a bracket around the chapter's political teachings. Be-qum resha'im ('when the wicked rise') produces hiding (yissater adam). Be-ovedam ('when they perish, when they are destroyed') produces flourishing (yirbu tsaddiqim, 'the righteous multiply'). The health of a society is directly measured by who holds power. Wicked leadership suppresses the righteous; their removal allows the righteous to emerge and multiply.

Summary: Proverbs 29 is the final chapter of the Hezekiah collection (chapters 25-29), concluding with intensified contrasts between righteous and wicked leadership, the value of discipline, the danger of flattery, and the foundational declaration that 'the fear of the LORD' produces safety. The chapter serves as a capstone for the entire Solomonic wisdom tradition.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 18 ('Where there is no vision, the people cast off restraint') is one of the most frequently quoted — and most frequently misapplied — verses in the Bible. The Hebrew chazon does not mean 'vision' in the modern leadership sense (goals, dreams, strategic plans) but 'prophetic revelation' — the word of God delivered through a prophet. Without divine revelation, the people become unrestrained. The verse is a statement about the necessity of God's word, not about organizational leadership. Verse 25 ('The fear of man is a trap, but whoever trusts in the LORD is set on high') captures the fundamental choice between human approval and divine security that runs through all of Proverbs.

Translation Friction: The chapter's repeated endorsement of physical discipline for children (vv15, 17, 19) reflects ancient pedagogy and should not be extracted from its cultural context as a timeless prescription. The underlying principle — that discipline produces character — transcends the specific method. Verse 24 ('Whoever shares with a thief hates his own life') uses the legal situation where a person who knows the identity of a thief but refuses to testify under oath (hearing the adjuration and not speaking) becomes complicit in the crime.

Connections: Verse 13 ('The poor person and the oppressor meet together; the LORD gives light to the eyes of both') echoes 22:2. Verse 18 on prophetic vision connects to 1 Samuel 3:1 ('the word of the LORD was rare in those days; there was no frequent vision'). Verse 25 on the fear of man connects to Isaiah 51:12-13 and Psalm 56:4. The Hezekiah collection closes, and the book shifts to non-Solomonic voices: Agur (ch. 30) and Lemuel (ch. 31).

- ¹A person often rebuked who stiffens his neck will be suddenly shattered beyond repair.
- ²When the righteous increase, the people rejoice;
when the wicked rule, the people groan.
- ³A person who loves wisdom makes his father rejoice,
but whoever keeps company with prostitutes wastes his wealth.
- ⁴A king establishes the land through justice,
but one who demands bribes tears it down.
- ⁵A person who flatters his neighbor spreads a net for his own feet.
- ⁶In the transgression of an evil person is a trap,
but the righteous person sings and rejoices.
- ⁷The righteous person understands the case of the poor;
the wicked person has no such understanding.
- ⁸Scoffers set a city ablaze,
but the wise turn away anger.
- ⁹When a wise person takes a fool to court,
the fool rages and laughs and there is no resolution.
- ¹⁰The bloodthirsty hate the blameless,
but the upright seek to protect his life.
- ¹¹A fool vents all his feelings,
but a wise person holds them back quietly.
- ¹²A ruler who listens to lies — all his officials will be wicked.
- ¹³The poor person and the oppressor meet — the LORD gives light to the eyes of both.
- ¹⁴A king who faithfully judges the poor —
his throne will be established forever.

¹⁵The rod and rebuke produce wisdom,
but an undisciplined youth shames his mother.

¹⁶When the wicked multiply, transgression increases,
but the righteous will see their downfall.

¹⁷Discipline your son and he will give you rest;
he will bring delight to your soul.

¹⁸Where there is no prophetic revelation, the people throw off restraint, but whoever keeps instruction — blessed is he.

¹⁹A servant will not be corrected by words alone;
he may understand but will not respond.

²⁰Do you see a person hasty in his words?
There is more hope for a fool than for him.

²¹Whoever pampers his servant from youth will find him ungrateful in the end.

²²An angry person stirs up conflict, and a hot-tempered person commits many offenses.

²³A person's pride will bring him low,
but a humble spirit will obtain honor.

²⁴Whoever shares with a thief hates his own life;
he hears the oath of adjuration but does not testify.

²⁵The fear of people sets a trap, but whoever trusts in the LORD is set safely on high.

²⁶Many seek the face of a ruler,
but justice for a person comes from the LORD.

²⁷An unjust person is detestable to the righteous, and an upright person is detestable to the wicked.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ish tokhachot ('a person of rebukes, someone frequently corrected') who maqsheh-oref ('hardens his neck, stiffens his back') is using the stubborn-ox metaphor — an animal that refuses the yoke. Peta yishshaver ('suddenly he will be broken') and ein marpe ('there is no healing') describe catastrophic, irreversible destruction. The suddenness is key: the hardened person thinks he is getting away with it until the moment everything collapses at once.
2. Bi-revot tsaddiqim ('when the righteous multiply/increase') — not merely when they hold office, but when their influence grows — the people (ha-am) rejoice (yismach). Bi-meshol rasha ('when a wicked person rules') the people groan (ye'anach). The groaning is not dissent but suffering — the involuntary sound of people being crushed under unjust governance.
3. The contrast pairs intellectual virtue (ohev chokhmah, 'lover of wisdom') with moral vice (ro'eh zonot, 'companion of prostitutes'). The first produces family joy; the second destroys family resources. Ye'abbed-hon ('destroys wealth, squanders resources') is total — the patron of prostitutes does not merely spend but annihilates his inheritance.
4. Melekh be-mishpat ya'amid erets ('a king through justice causes the land to stand') — justice is the foundation that holds the nation upright. Ish terumot ('a man of contributions/exactions') — one who demands bribes or excessive taxes — yehersennah ('tears it down, demolishes it'). The same ruler who could build can destroy, depending on whether he practices mishpat or extortion.

5. Machaliq al-re'ehu ('one who makes smooth upon his neighbor, one who flatters') is actually pores reshet al-pe'amav ('spreading a net over his steps'). The ambiguity of 'his' — whose feet? the neighbor's or the flatterer's? — may be intentional. Flattery ensnares both parties: the one being flattered is lured into false security, and the flatterer sets a trap that may also catch him.
6. Be-fesha ish ra moqesh ('in the transgression of an evil man, a snare') — sin is its own trap. The evil person's transgression contains the mechanism of his own capture. The righteous, freed from this self-entrapment, can yarun ve-sameach ('sing and rejoice') — the emotional tone of innocence is joy.
7. Yodea tsaddiq din dallim ('the righteous knows the case/judgment of the poor') — the righteous person not only sees the poor but understands their legal rights, their situation, their needs. The wicked person lo-yavin da'at ('does not understand knowledge') — he lacks the moral framework to comprehend why the poor person's case matters. Moral blindness is a form of intellectual failure.
8. Anshe latson ('men of scoffing, scornful people') yappichu qiryah ('blow upon a city, set a city aflame') — scoffers are incendiaries, using mockery and contempt to inflame public passion. Chakhamim yashivu af ('wise ones turn back anger') — the wise function as the city's fire department, calming what scoffers ignite. The political stakes are clear: scoffers destabilize communities; wise people stabilize them.
9. The wise person who enters legal dispute (nishpat) with a fool (ish evil) discovers that rational process is impossible. The fool veers between ragaz ('raging, shaking with anger') and sachaq ('laughing, mocking') — emotional extremes that prevent any nachat ('rest, resolution, settling'). Engaging a fool in formal proceedings produces only chaos.
10. Anshe damim ('men of blood, bloodthirsty people') hate the tam ('blameless, person of integrity') because his existence is an implicit rebuke to their violence. The yesharim ('upright ones') yevaqshu nafsho ('seek his life') — here meaning they seek to protect and preserve the blameless person's life, not to harm him. The upright actively defend the innocent whom the violent hate.
11. Kol-rucho yotsi kesil ('all his spirit the fool sends out') — the fool expresses every emotion, every opinion, every impulse without filter. Chakham be-achor yeshabbechennah ('a wise person in the back/afterwards calms it') — the wise person restrains his spirit, holding it back and calming it down before releasing it. Self-regulation is the difference between wisdom and folly.
12. Moshel maqshiv al-devar-shafer ('a ruler who pays attention to false speech') creates a systemic effect: kol-mesharetav resha'im ('all his servants become wicked'). The leader's tolerance for falsehood sets the moral standard for the entire administration. Liars rise because the leader rewards lying; honest people leave because honesty is penalized. Corruption flows from the top down.
13. This echoes 22:2 with a variation: instead of 'the LORD made them both,' now 'the LORD gives light to the eyes of both' (me'ir eine sheneihem YHWH). Me'ir ('gives light, illuminates') may mean gives physical life (the light of the eyes is life itself) or gives understanding. Either way, both the poor and the oppressor exist by God's sustaining power. The oppressor breathes God's air and sees with God's light — and will answer to the God who gave him both.
14. Shofet be-emet dallim ('one who judges with truth/faithfulness the poor') — the test of a king's justice is not how he treats the powerful but how he treats the powerless. A king who passes this test earns permanent stability: kis'o la-ad yikkon ('his throne will be established forever'). Permanence is the reward for justice.
15. Shevet ve-tokhachat ('rod and rebuke') together represent the full range of corrective discipline — physical consequence and verbal instruction. Together they yitten chokhmah ('give wisdom, produce wisdom'). Na'ar meshullach ('a youth set free, a child sent away, an undisciplined young person') mevish immo ('shames his mother'). The mother is specifically named because she bore the primary daily responsibility for child-rearing in Israelite society — the undisciplined child is her public failure.
16. Bi-revot resha'im yirbeh-pasha ('when the wicked increase, transgression increases') — wickedness is exponential, each wicked person generating more transgression. Ve-tsaddiqim be-mappaltam yir'u ('but the righteous will see their fall') — the righteous do not need to act against the wicked; they need only wait. The wicked's multiplication contains the seed of its own collapse.
17. Yasser binkha ('discipline your son') produces two rewards: vinichekkha ('he will give you rest, he will give you peace') and yitten ma'adannot le-nafshekha ('he will give delicacies to your soul'). The disciplined child becomes a source of menucha ('rest, peace') and ma'adannot ('delicacies, pleasures, delights') — a well-raised child is one of life's deepest satisfactions.
18. This verse is persistently misapplied in corporate and church leadership contexts as a proof text for 'having a vision statement.' The Hebrew is specifically about divine revelation through prophets, not human strategic planning. The absence of God's word, not the absence of human goals, is what produces social chaos.
19. The proverb observes that some people — here, the eved ('servant, slave') who has no internal motivation to comply — cannot be corrected by verbal instruction alone (bi-devarim lo-yivvasser, 'by words he will not be disciplined'). Ki-yavin ('though he understands') ve-ein ma'aneh ('there is no answer, no response') — comprehension without compliance. Understanding the instruction is not the problem; responding to it is.
20. Ish ats bi-devarav ('a person hurried in his words') — someone who speaks before thinking — is worse off than a fool (tiqvah li-khesil mimmennu, 'there is more hope for a fool than for him'). This echoes 26:12, where the self-proclaimed wise person is also ranked below the fool. The hasty speaker, like the self-proclaimed wise person, has a specific defect that blocks learning: his mouth moves faster than his mind.
21. Mefanneq ('one who pampers, coddles, indulges') his eved from youth (minno'ar) will discover that the servant's acharit ('end, outcome') is manon — a word of uncertain meaning, possibly 'insolent,' 'ungrateful,' 'claiming the status of a son,' or 'grief.' The proverb warns that indulgence produces entitlement. Excessive kindness without appropriate structure creates expectations that cannot be sustained.

22. Ish af ('a man of anger') generates madon ('strife'). Ba'al chemah ('master of fury') produces rav-pasha ('much transgression'). Anger does not merely disrupt peace; it generates sin. The more intense the anger (from af to chemah), the greater the moral damage (from conflict to transgression).
23. Ga'avat adam tashpilennu ('the pride of a person will lower him, will humiliate him') — pride produces the opposite of what it intends. It aims for elevation and achieves humiliation. Shefal-ruach ('lowly of spirit, humble in disposition') yitmokh kavod ('will grasp honor, will take hold of glory'). The paradox is complete: grasping for honor produces humiliation; accepting lowliness produces honor.
24. Choleq im-gannav ('one who shares with a thief, one who partakes with a thief') sone nafsho ('hates his own life'). The second line explains: alah yishma ('he hears the adjuration, the oath, the curse') — the public oath requiring witnesses to come forward — ve-lo yaggid ('and he does not tell, and he does not testify'). By staying silent when he knows the thief's identity, he becomes an accomplice. His self-hatred is enacted through his silence: he chooses loyalty to a criminal over his own survival.
25. Cherdat adam does not mean 'the fear that people experience' but 'the fear of people' — anxiety about what others will think, say, or do. It is the social anxiety that drives people to compromise integrity for approval.
26. Rabbim mevaqshim pene-moshel ('many seek the ruler's face' — seek his favor, try to get an audience) but me-YHWH mishpat-ish ('from the LORD comes a person's judgment'). The ultimate verdict does not come from the king's court but from God's. Seeking royal favor is natural and often necessary, but it is not ultimate. The final disposition of your case rests with God, not with any human authority.
27. The final verse of the Hezekiah collection — and the final Solomonic proverb in the book — establishes mutual revulsion as the ultimate boundary between righteousness and wickedness. The righteous find the unjust repulsive (to'avat tsaddiqim ish avel); the wicked find the upright repulsive (to'avat rasha yeshar-darekh). There is no middle ground, no neutral territory. The moral divide is not merely intellectual disagreement but visceral incompatibility. Each finds the other's way of life to'evah — abominable, detestable, repellent. This is the wisdom tradition's final word on the two ways.

Summary: Proverbs 30 is 'the words of Agur son of Jakeh' — an oracle from a figure otherwise unknown in the Hebrew Bible. The chapter opens with a confession of intellectual limitation (vv1-4), transitions to a prayer for neither poverty nor wealth (vv7-9), and then develops a series of numerical proverbs ('three things... four things') that catalog wonders, mysteries, and social observations through lists of four. Agur's voice is strikingly different from Solomon's — more humble, more questioning, more awed by the limits of human knowledge.

What Makes This Remarkable: Agur's opening confession (vv2-4) is unique in wisdom literature: 'I am more stupid than any person, and I do not have human understanding.' This is not false modesty but genuine epistemological humility — the recognition that the search for wisdom encounters a hard ceiling. His rhetorical questions in verse 4 ('Who has ascended to heaven and come down? Who has gathered the wind in his fists?') echo God's challenge to Job (Job 38-41) and establish that some knowledge belongs to God alone. The 'two things I ask' prayer (vv7-9) is one of the most balanced prayers in the Bible — asking for neither poverty (which might drive him to steal and profane God's name) nor wealth (which might produce self-sufficiency and denial of God). The numerical proverbs (vv15-31) are a literary form found across the ancient Near East, using pattern recognition to organize observations about the natural and social world.

Translation Friction: Agur's identity is debated: is he Israelite or foreign? The name 'Agur son of Jakeh' has no other biblical occurrence. The word massa (v1) could be 'oracle/utterance' or 'from Massa' — a region in northern Arabia associated with Ishmael's descendants (Genesis 25:14). If Agur is a non-Israelite sage, his inclusion in Proverbs demonstrates that Israel recognized wisdom wherever it appeared. The phrase la-ithiel la-ithiel ve-ukhal (v1) is notoriously difficult — possibly names ('to Ithiel, to Ithiel and Ucal') or a confession ('I have wearied myself, God; I have wearied myself, God, and I am spent').

Connections: Agur's questions (v4) closely parallel God's speech in Job 38-41. The prayer for sufficiency (vv7-9) anticipates Jesus' 'Give us this day our daily bread' (Matthew 6:11) and Paul's 'I have learned to be content' (Philippians 4:11-12). The numerical proverbs connect to the form used in Amos 1-2 ('For three transgressions... and for four'). The 'way of a man with a young woman' (v19) connects to the mystery language of Song of Songs.

‡The words of Agur son of Jakeh — the oracle.
The man declares: I have wearied myself, O God;

I have wearied myself, O God, and I am spent.

²Surely I am more ignorant than anyone,
and I lack ordinary human understanding.

³I have not learned wisdom,
nor do I possess the knowledge of the Holy One.

⁴Who has gone up to heaven and come back down?
Who has gathered the wind in his fists?
Who has wrapped the waters in a garment?
Who has established all the ends of the earth?
What is his name, and what is his son's name —
if you know?

⁵Every word of God is refined;
He is a shield to those who take refuge in Him.

⁶Do not add to His words, or He will rebuke you and you will be exposed as a liar.

⁷Two things I ask of you — do not refuse me before I die:

⁸Keep falsehood and lies far from me;
give me neither poverty nor wealth — feed me my allotted portion of bread.

⁹lest I be full and deny you and say, 'Who is the LORD?'
or lest I become poor and steal and profane the name of my God.

¹⁰Do not slander a servant to his master, or he will curse you and you will be held guilty.

¹¹There is a generation that curses its father and does not bless its mother.

¹²There is a generation pure in its own eyes but not washed from its filth.

¹³There is a generation — how haughty their eyes!
How their eyelids are raised in arrogance!

¹⁴There is a generation whose teeth are swords, whose jaws are set with knives, to devour the poor from the earth and the needy from among humanity.

¹⁵The leech has two daughters: Give! Give!
Three things are never satisfied;
four never say, 'Enough!'

¹⁶Sheol and the barren womb, land that is never satisfied with water,
and fire that never says, 'Enough!'

¹⁷The eye that mocks a father and scorns obedience to a mother —
the ravens of the valley will gouge it out, and the young vultures will eat it.

¹⁸Three things are too wonderful for me;
four I cannot understand:

¹⁹the way of an eagle in the sky,
the way of a snake on a rock,
the way of a ship in the heart of the sea,
and the way of a man with a young woman.

²⁰This is the way of an adulterous woman:
she eats and wipes her mouth and says, 'I have done nothing wrong.'

²¹Under three things the earth trembles, and under four it cannot bear up:

²²a servant who becomes king,
a fool who is stuffed with food,

²³an unloved woman who gets married, and a servant girl who displaces her mistress.

²⁴Four things are among the smallest on earth,
but they are extraordinarily wise:

²⁵Ants — a people without strength,
yet they prepare their food in summer.

²⁶Rock badgers — a people without power, yet they make their home in the cliffs.

²⁷Locusts have no king,
yet they advance together in formation.

²⁸A lizard you can catch with your hands,
yet it lives in the palaces of kings.

²⁹Three things are stately in their stride;
four are majestic in their walk:

³⁰The lion, mightiest among animals, who does not retreat before anything;

³¹the strutting rooster, the male goat, and a king with his army around him.

³²If you have been foolish in exalting yourself, or if you have plotted evil — hand over mouth!

³³For pressing milk produces butter, pressing the nose produces blood,
and pressing anger produces conflict.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The textual difficulty is ancient — the Septuagint and other versions also struggled with this verse. The confessional reading has gained scholarly support because it makes Agur's opening a statement of intellectual exhaustion that leads naturally into the confession of ignorance in verses 2-4.
2. Ba'ar ('brutish, stupid, like an animal') is a strong word — Agur does not say he is merely less wise than others but that he is sub-human in understanding. Lo-vinat adam li ('the understanding of a human is not mine') reinforces the claim. This is either genuine despair at the limits of human knowledge or a rhetorical strategy: by confessing total ignorance, Agur positions himself to receive wisdom from God alone.
3. The parallel between chokhmah ('wisdom') and da'at qedoshim ('knowledge of the holy ones' or 'knowledge of the Holy One') elevates the discussion: Agur is not merely confessing ignorance about practical matters but about divine knowledge. Qedoshim could be plural ('holy ones, angels') or a plural of majesty ('the Holy One, God'). Either way, Agur confesses that ultimate wisdom — knowledge of God's nature and purposes — exceeds his grasp.
4. These questions parallel God's interrogation of Job (Job 38-41) but come from a human sage rather than from God. Agur asks what only God can answer, thereby demonstrating that the ceiling of wisdom is the floor of theology: true wisdom begins with acknowledging what cannot be known.
5. After confessing his own ignorance (vv2-4), Agur turns to what can be known: imrat Eloah ('the word of God'). Every word is tserufah ('refined, purified, tested by fire') — language from metallurgy, meaning God's word has been through the furnace and proven pure. God Himself is a magen ('shield') to those who chosim bo ('take refuge in him'). Where human wisdom fails, God's word stands; where human understanding ends, divine protection begins.
6. Al-tosef al-devarav ('do not add to His words') draws a boundary around human contribution to divine revelation. God's word is complete and refined (v5); human additions contaminate it. The consequence: yokhiach bekha ('He will reprove you, He will convict you') and nikhzavta ('you will be found a liar, you will be proven false'). Adding to God's word puts human words in God's mouth — a form of lying about God.
7. The 'two things' formula is part of the numerical pattern that structures the entire chapter. Agur applies the same form to his prayer that he will use for his observations about the natural world.
8. The theological sophistication of this prayer is remarkable: Agur recognizes that both poverty and wealth are spiritual dangers, and asks God for the middle path — sufficiency without excess, enough without surplus. This is rare in any era's prayer tradition.
9. The prayer's logic is entirely theological: both dangers are expressed in terms of their effect on the God-relationship, not on personal comfort. Agur's concern is not happiness but faithfulness — he wants the economic condition that best preserves his ability to trust and honor God.
10. Talshen ('to slander, to inform against, to accuse with the tongue') a servant to his master — using your social position to harm someone who cannot defend himself — invites the servant's curse, which in this case will be effective (ve-ashamta, 'and you will be found guilty, and you will bear guilt'). The proverb protects the powerless: even a servant has the right not to be maligned.
11. The first of four 'there is a generation' (dor) proverbs (vv11-14), cataloging types of people who violate fundamental moral norms. This generation attacks the parent-child bond — the most basic social unit — by cursing the father and withholding blessing from the mother. The progression from cursing to not-blessing captures both active and passive violations of the fifth commandment.
12. Tahir be-einav ('pure in its own eyes') but lo ruchatz mi-tso'ato ('not washed from its excrement/filth'). The self-assessment and the reality are opposite: they see purity; God sees unwashed filth. Tso'ah ('excrement, human waste') is the strongest possible image for moral contamination.
13. Mah ramu einav ('how high their eyes are!') and af'appav yinnase'u ('their eyelids are lifted up') describe the physical posture of contempt: nose in the air, eyes looking down on everyone else. The exclamation mah ('how!') expresses the observer's disgust at the level of arrogance.
14. The predatory generation: charavot shinnav ('swords are their teeth') and ma'akhalot metall'otav ('knives are their jaw teeth'). They consume the poor (le-ekhol aniyyim me-erets) and the needy (evyonim me-adam) — economic exploitation described as cannibalism. The poor are not merely exploited; they are eaten. This is the most visceral image of oppression in Proverbs.

15. The leech introduces the theme of insatiability that runs through the numerical proverbs. The three-four pattern (three things... four things) appears in Amos 1-2, Job 5:19, and throughout Near Eastern wisdom literature. The pattern builds suspense: the first three items establish a category, and the fourth provides the climax.
16. Four things that never reach satiation: She'ol (the realm of the dead — always accepting more dead), otser racham ('a closed womb, a barren womb' — the desperate longing for children), erets lo-save'ah mayim ('earth not satisfied with water' — parched ground in an arid climate), and esh ('fire' — which consumes everything and still demands more fuel). Each represents a different dimension of insatiable need: death, fertility, sustenance, and destruction.
17. The punishment matches the offense: the eye (ayin) that mocked and scorned parents will be pecked out by orvei-nachal ('ravens of the valley') and eaten by bene-nesher ('young eagles/vultures'). The image is of an unburied corpse — the ultimate disgrace in Israelite culture. The mocking child ends up as carrion, his disrespectful eye consumed by scavengers. The violence of the image reflects the severity with which the wisdom tradition regards contempt for parents.
18. Nifle'u mimmeni ('are too wonderful for me, are beyond my comprehension') uses the same root as pele ('wonder, marvel') — these are not confusing but awe-inspiring. Agur is not frustrated but amazed. The four things that follow (v19) share a common quality that Agur finds mysterious.
19. Almah ('young woman of marriageable age') does not necessarily imply virgin (that would be betulah) but a young woman in the phase of life when sexual attraction and romantic pursuit are most intense. The 'way of a man with a young woman' may refer to courtship, seduction, or the act of love itself — in any case, a process that defies rational explanation.
20. The adulteress exploits the 'traceless path' principle of v19: just as the eagle leaves no track in the sky, she claims her adultery left no evidence. Akhelah u-machatah piha ('she eats and wipes her mouth') — the eating is a euphemism for sexual intercourse, and the wiping is the erasure of evidence. Ve-amerah lo fa'alti aven ('she says, I have not done wrong') — the denial is not confusion but strategy. The untraceable path becomes a tool of deception.
21. Ragazah erets ('the earth trembles, the land shakes') — the social disruption is so severe that Agur describes it as seismic. Lo-tukhal se'et ('it cannot bear, it cannot carry the weight') — the social order collapses under the weight of these inversions.
22. Eved ki yimlokh ('a slave when he reigns') — power without the training or character to use it. Naval ki yisba-lachem ('a fool when he is satisfied with bread') — abundance given to someone who will waste it. Both represent social inversions that produce disorder, not because class hierarchy is sacred but because authority and resources without wisdom are destructive.
23. Senu'ah ki tibba'el ('a hated/unloved woman when she is married') — marriage does not resolve deep bitterness; it amplifies it. The unloved woman brings her resentment into the marriage, and the household suffers. Shifchah ki tirash gevirtah ('a servant girl when she inherits/displaces her mistress') — the social inversion produces arrogance and instability (compare Hagar and Sarah, Genesis 16). These are not moral judgments on the women but observations about social dynamics.
24. Qetanne-arets ('small ones of the earth, the tiniest creatures') are chakhamim mechukhamim ('wise, made wise, wisest of the wise'). The superlative form (mechukhamim) is emphatic — these tiny creatures are wiser than their size suggests. Agur now catalogs four small animals that demonstrate wisdom through their behavior.
25. Nemalim ('ants') are am lo-az ('a people without power, a nation with no strength') — individually insignificant. But va-yakhinu ba-qayits lachmam ('they prepare their bread in summer') — their collective organization and foresight compensate for individual weakness. Wisdom lesson: preparation and planning overcome weakness.
26. Shefannim ('rock badgers, hyraxes') are am lo-atsum ('a people without might'). But they compensate by choosing an impregnable home: va-yasimu va-sela beitam ('they set their house in the rock, they make the cliff their dwelling'). Wisdom lesson: choose your position wisely, and your weakness becomes irrelevant.
27. Arbeh ('locusts') have melekch ein ('no king, no ruler') — no centralized command structure. But va-yetse chotsets kullo ('they go out divided/organized, all of them') — they move in coordinated ranks despite having no leader. Wisdom lesson: order does not require hierarchy; cooperation can be self-organizing.
28. Semamit ('lizard' or 'spider' — identification uncertain) be-yadayim titappes ('with hands can be grasped, can be caught with bare hands') — utterly vulnerable. But ve-hi be-hekhle melekch ('and she is in the palaces of the king') — she has penetrated the most secure and prestigious dwelling. Wisdom lesson: persistence and adaptability can take you anywhere, regardless of your size or apparent vulnerability.
29. Metive tsa'ad ('making good their step, excellent in walking, stately in stride') describes creatures whose movement commands attention and respect. The next two verses identify four animals (and a human figure) whose gait embodies dignity.
30. Layish ('lion' — a rare poetic word for lion, also used in Job 4:11) is gibbor ba-behemah ('the warrior among animals, the mightiest of beasts'). Lo-yashuv mippene-khol ('he does not turn back from the face of anything') — the lion never retreats. His dignity comes from fearless power.
31. The identification of zarzir motnayim is debated — 'greyhound,' 'horse,' 'rooster,' and 'starling' have all been proposed. The 'girded loins' description suggests a creature that struts with its midsection prominent and proud. The rooster or fighting cock fits this description well.
32. Two conditions: im navalta be-hitnassel ('if you have acted foolishly by exalting yourself') or im zammota ('if you have plotted, if you have schemed evil'). One remedy: yad le-feh ('hand to mouth') — stop talking immediately. The gesture of putting hand to mouth means: shut up before you make it worse. Silence is the first step of correction.

33. Three parallel actions with the same verb mits ('pressing, squeezing, churning'): press milk, get butter; press a nose, get blood; press anger (appayim, 'nostrils/anger' — the same word for both), get conflict (riv). The chapter's final proverb uses a simple physical observation to teach a relational lesson: if you keep pressing, something will come out — and with anger, what comes out is always conflict. Stop pressing.

Summary: Proverbs 31 contains two distinct units: the words of King Lemuel transmitting his mother's oracle about royal virtue (vv1-9) and the eshet chayil poem — the 'woman of strength' acrostic (vv10-31). The first section warns a king against women, wine, and neglect of the poor. The second is a twenty-two-verse alphabetic poem celebrating a woman whose strength, industry, wisdom, and generosity embody everything Proverbs has taught about the wise life.

What Makes This Remarkable: The eshet chayil poem is an acrostic: each verse begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from aleph to tav. This formal structure makes it a complete portrait — from A to Z, nothing is left out. The word chayil (v10) is the same word used throughout the Hebrew Bible for military might, warrior strength, and economic power. Ruth is the only other woman in the Bible specifically called eshet chayil (Ruth 3:11). The poem's woman is not domestic in a diminished sense — she is an economic force: buying real estate (v16), running a textile operation (vv13, 19, 22, 24), engaging in international trade (v14), and providing for an extended household. She is praised not for beauty or submission but for strength, wisdom, and productive capability. The final verse (v30) explicitly subordinates beauty to the fear of the LORD as the true basis of praise.

Translation Friction: The eshet chayil has been used both to celebrate and to burden women. Read as a description of one extraordinary individual, it is inspiring. Read as a checklist that every woman must fulfill simultaneously, it is crushing. The poem is a portrait, not a prescription — it paints the ideal the way Proverbs 1-9 paints the ideal wise man. No single person embodies every trait simultaneously. Lemuel's mother's warning against women (vv3) reflects the real danger of court concubines siphoning royal resources and attention, not a general disparagement of women — the same chapter closes with the most exalted portrait of a woman in the Hebrew Bible.

Connections: *The eshet chayil echoes Woman Wisdom from Proverbs 1-9: both are sought, both provide wealth and honor, both call from public spaces, both are more precious than jewels. The poem's opening question ('who can find?', v10) echoes 'who has found?' applied to wisdom itself (Proverbs 3:13, 8:35). Ruth is called eshet chayil in Ruth 3:11, connecting the literary ideal to a narrative embodiment. Lemuel's mother's instruction (vv1-9) parallels the maternal teaching tradition of Proverbs 1:8 and 6:20. The word chayil connects to the 'mighty men of valor' (gibborei chayil) throughout Joshua, Judges, and 1-2 Samuel — the woman of strength is a warrior of the household.*

¹The words of King Lemuel — an oracle that his mother taught him.

²What, my son?
What, son of my womb?
What, son of my vows?

³Do not give your strength to women, nor your ways to those who destroy kings.

⁴It is not for kings, Lemuel — not for kings to drink wine, nor for rulers to crave strong drink,

⁵Lest they drink and forget what has been decreed and twist the rights of all the afflicted.

⁶Give strong drink to the one who is perishing and wine to the bitter of soul.

⁷Let him drink and forget his destitution and remember his misery no more.

⁸Open your mouth for the voiceless — for the rights of all who are destitute.

⁹Open your mouth, judge with righteousness, and defend the rights of the poor and needy.

¹⁰A woman of strength — who can find her?
Her worth is far beyond jewels.

¹¹The heart of her husband trusts in her,
and he will not lack gain.

¹²She brings him good, not harm,
all the days of her life.

¹³She seeks out wool and flax and works with willing hands.

¹⁴She is like merchant ships;
she brings her food from far away.

¹⁵She rises while it is still night and provides food for her household and portions for her servant girls.

¹⁶She evaluates a field and acquires it;
from the fruit of her hands she plants a vineyard.

¹⁷She girds her waist with strength and makes her arms powerful.

¹⁸She tastes that her profit is good;
her lamp does not go out at night.

¹⁹She puts her hands to the distaff, and her fingers grasp the spindle.

²⁰She opens her hand to the poor and reaches out her arms to the needy.

²¹She does not fear the snow for her household, for her entire household is clothed in scarlet.

- ²²She makes bed coverings for herself;
her clothing is fine linen and purple.
- ²³Her husband is known at the city gates when he sits among the elders of the land.
- ²⁴She makes linen garments and sells them;
she supplies sashes to the merchants.
- ²⁵Strength and dignity are her clothing, and she laughs at the days to come.
- ²⁶She opens her mouth with wisdom,
and the instruction of faithful love is on her tongue.
- ²⁷She watches over the affairs of her household and does not eat the bread of idleness.
- ²⁸Her children rise up and call her blessed;
her husband, and he praises her:
- ²⁹'Many women have done valiantly, but you surpass them all.'
- ³⁰Charm is deceptive and beauty is fleeting, but a woman who fears the LORD — she will be praised.
- ³¹Give her the fruit of her hands, and let her works praise her at the gates.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. If Lemuel is from Massa (in Arabia), then both Agur (ch. 30) and Lemuel (ch. 31) are non-Israelite sages whose wisdom Israel valued enough to canonize. The book of Proverbs ends not with Solomon but with international voices, demonstrating that wisdom transcends national boundaries.
2. The triple mah ('what?') is a mother's urgent address — part rebuke, part plea. She names him three ways: beri ('my son' — the intimate term), bar-bitni ('son of my womb' — reminding him of his physical origin in her body), and bar-nedarai ('son of my vows' — she had made sacred vows concerning him, perhaps dedicating him to God before birth, like Hannah with Samuel). Each name increases the emotional weight: you are mine, you came from my body, you were promised to God.
3. Chelekha ('your strength, your vigor, your resources') — the same word chayil that will describe the ideal woman in verse 10. The king's chayil must not be wasted on women who drain rather than build. Lamchot melakhin ('to those who wipe out kings, to the destroyers of kings') warns that sexual entanglements have toppled monarchies — Solomon himself being the prime example (1 Kings 11:1-4). The irony: the chapter opens by warning against women who destroy and closes by celebrating a woman who builds.
4. The repetition al la-melakhim ('not for kings, not for kings') is emphatic and personal — his mother calls him by name. Wine (yayin) and strong drink (shekhar) are prohibited not universally but specifically for kings. The reason follows in v5: intoxication corrupts judgment, and the king's judgment is the nation's justice system.
5. Pen-yishteh ve-yishkach mechuqqaq ('lest he drink and forget what is inscribed/decreed') — alcohol causes the king to forget the law he is supposed to administer. Vi-yeshanneh din kol-bene-oni ('and he changes/perverts the judgment of all the sons of affliction') — the poor, who depend on the king for justice, are the first victims of royal drunkenness. Intoxicated power is unjust power.
6. If wine is not for kings (whose minds must be clear), it is for the oved ('one who is perishing, the dying person') and the mare nefesh ('bitter of soul, those in anguish'). This is not a prescription for escapism but a recognition that alcohol has a legitimate use as palliative care — easing the suffering of those who are dying or in extreme distress. The mother distinguishes between medicinal use (appropriate) and recreational use by rulers (dangerous).

7. Yishteh ve-yishkach risho ('let him drink and forget his destitution') — the same verb (shakach, 'to forget') that was dangerous for kings (v5) is merciful for the suffering. Amalo lo yizkor-od ('his toil he will remember no more'). What is a liability for the powerful is a comfort for the powerless. Context determines morality.
8. Petach-pikha le-illem ('open your mouth for the mute, speak up for the voiceless') — the king's voice must serve those who have no voice. El-din kol-bene chalof ('for the judgment/rights of all the sons of passing away, the destitute, those who are disappearing') — the most vulnerable members of society, those who are being erased. The queen mother commands her son to use royal power for advocacy, not self-indulgence.
9. Shefot-tsedeq ('judge with righteousness, render just judgment') and din ani ve-eyyon ('give justice to the poor and the needy') close the queen mother's instruction with the core mandate of kingship: justice for the vulnerable. The final word of her oracle is eyyon ('needy, destitute') — the last person on society's ladder is the first priority on the king's agenda.
10. The acrostic begins here with aleph א. Each of the following 22 verses begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet. This literary device makes the poem a comprehensive portrait — from aleph to tav, from A to Z, she is complete.
11. Bet ב. Batach bah lev ba'alalah ('the heart of her husband trusts in her') — trust (bitachon) is the foundation of the marriage. The husband's confidence is not passive but based on observed competence. Shalal lo yechsar ('profit/spoil he will not lack') — shalal originally means 'plunder, spoil of war,' here used for economic gain. The military vocabulary is consistent: she is a warrior whose victories produce wealth.
12. Gimel ג. Gemalat-hu tov ve-lo ra ('she repays him good and not evil') — the verb gamal means 'to repay, to deal bountifully, to treat.' Kol yeme chayyeha ('all the days of her life') emphasizes duration: this is not seasonal behavior but a lifetime commitment. Her goodness to her husband is not occasional but constitutive — it defines her entire married life.
13. Dalet ד. Dareshah tsemer u-fishtim ('she seeks wool and flax') — she is an active sourcer of raw materials, not a passive recipient. Wool and flax are the two primary textile fibers of the ancient Near East. Va-ta'as be-chefets kappeha ('she works with the delight/willingness of her hands') — chefets means 'delight, pleasure, desire.' Her work is not drudgery but energized purpose.
14. He ה. Ka-oniyot socher ('like ships of a merchant, like trading vessels') — the comparison is to international commerce. She imports provisions from a distance (mi-merchaq tavi lachmah, 'from afar she brings her bread'). The image elevates her beyond the domestic sphere into the world of trade and logistics. She does not merely manage a pantry; she runs a supply chain.
15. Vav ו. Va-taqom be-od laylah ('she rises while it is still night') — she is the first person awake, preparing before dawn. Teref le-veitah ('prey/food for her household') — teref (from taraf, 'to tear, to seize prey') uses predatory language for provision. She is a hunter-provider. Choq le-na'aroteha ('allotted portions for her young women/servant girls') — she manages staff and distributes resources with fairness and order.
16. Zayin ז. Zammamah sadeh va-tiqqachehu ('she considers/plans regarding a field and takes it') — the verb zamam ('to plan, to purpose, to consider') shows that she makes strategic real estate decisions. She does not impulse-buy; she evaluates and then acts. Mi-peri kappeiha nat'ah karem ('from the fruit of her hands she plants a vineyard') — her profits fund further investment. She reinvests earnings into productive assets.
17. Chet ח. Chagerah ve-oz motneiha ('she girds with strength her waist') — 'girding the loins' is the Hebrew idiom for preparing for hard work or battle. Warriors girded themselves for combat; she girds herself for labor. Va-te'ammets zero'oteha ('she makes strong her arms') — she builds her physical capacity to work. This is not a delicate woman; she is powerful, physically prepared for demanding work.
18. Tet ט. Ta'amah ki-tov sachrah ('she tastes/perceives that her trade/profit is good') — she monitors the quality of her business output. Lo-yikhbeh va-laylah nerah ('her lamp does not go out at night') — she works late, not from anxiety but from productive energy. The burning lamp symbolizes both activity and prosperity.
19. Yod י. Yadeiha shillechah va-kishor ('her hands she sends to the distaff') and kappeiha tamkhu falekh ('her palms hold the spindle') — spinning thread was the fundamental textile craft of the ancient world. The distaff holds raw fiber; the spindle twists it into thread. She masters the basic technology of her industry.
20. Kaf כ. Kappah paresah le-ani ('her palm she spreads open to the afflicted') and yadeiha shillechah la-eyyon ('her hands she extends to the needy'). The same hands that work the spindle (v19) also give to the poor (v20). Productivity and generosity are not competing activities but complementary ones — she works in order to give. The open hand (paresah) is the physical opposite of the clenched fist of hoarding.
21. Lamed ל. Lo-tira le-veitah mi-shaleg ('she does not fear for her household from snow') — winter does not catch her unprepared. Kol-beitah lavush shanim ('all her household is dressed in scarlet/double garments'). Shanim could mean 'scarlet' (expensive, warm dye) or 'double garments' (from shenayim, 'two' — double-layered clothing for warmth). Either reading shows preparation and quality: her family is warm and well-dressed because she planned ahead.
22. Mem מ. Marvaddim asetah-lah ('coverings/tapestries she makes for herself') — she provides luxury for her own household. Shesh ve-argaman levushah ('fine linen and purple are her clothing'). Shesh ('fine linen,' imported from Egypt) and argaman ('purple,' dyed with the prohibitively expensive murex snail extract) are materials of royalty. She dresses not in rags but in the finest fabrics, which she has earned through her own industry.
23. Nun נ. Noda ba-she'arim ba'alalah ('known at the gates is her husband') — the husband has public status and civic influence. Be-shivto im-ziqne-arets ('when he sits with the elders of the land') — he holds a position of honor and authority. But the context makes clear: his public standing is enabled by her private industry. He can sit with the elders because she has handled everything else.

- 24. Samekh (). Sadin asetah va-timkor ('a linen garment she makes and sells') — she manufactures goods for market, not just for household use. Chagor natnah la-kena'ani ('a sash/belt she gives to the trader/Canaanite'). Kena'ani can mean 'Canaanite' or 'merchant' (Canaanites were known as traders). She is not a cottage hobbyist but a commercial producer supplying professional merchants.
- 25. Ayin (). Oz-ve-hadar levushah ('strength and splendor are her clothing') — her real garments are not linen and purple (v22) but oz ('strength, power') and hadar ('dignity, majesty, splendor'). Va-tischaq le-yom acharon ('she laughs at the future day, she laughs at the last day'). Her preparation is so thorough that she can face the future without anxiety. She laughs (tischaq) — the opposite of fear. The future, which terrifies the unprepared, amuses the woman of strength.
- 26. Torat chesed ('instruction of faithful love') is one of the most beautiful phrases in Proverbs. Torah (instruction) sets the form; chesed (faithful love) sets the tone. She teaches truth with kindness — the combination that Proverbs has been building toward across all 31 chapters.
- 27. Tsade (). Tsofiyyah halikhot beita ('she watches the goings/activities of her household') — tsofiyyah ('she watches, she observes, she keeps lookout') uses watchman/sentinel vocabulary. She is the household's sentry, monitoring everything that comes and goes. Lechem atslut lo tokhel ('bread of laziness she does not eat') — she does not consume anything she has not earned. Her food is the fruit of her labor, never the bread of idleness.
- 28. Qof (). Qamu vaneha va-ye'ashruha ('her children rise up and call her blessed/fortunate') — the verb ashar (from ashre, 'blessed, happy') means they publicly declare her blessed. Ba'alav va-yehallelah ('her husband, and he praises her') — the husband joins the chorus. The whole household acknowledges her. This is public honor — not private appreciation but community-recognized worth.
- 29. The husband's praise uses chayil — the same word from verse 10's opening question and verse 3's warning. The king was told to protect his chayil; the woman embodies chayil; and now her husband declares her chayil surpasses all others. The word binds the chapter together.
- 30. This verse is the theological center of the eshet chayil poem. All her achievements — economic, domestic, commercial, charitable — flow from yir'at-YHWH ('the fear of the LORD'). Without this verse, the poem could be read as a celebration of mere productivity. With it, every accomplishment is grounded in reverence for God. The fear of the LORD is the root; everything else is fruit.
- 31. The acrostic is complete: from aleph (v10) to tav (v31), the portrait is finished. The woman of strength has been described from A to Z, and the final image is public recognition. The book that began with 'The fear of the LORD is the beginning of knowledge' (1:7) ends with a woman whose fear of the LORD (v30) produces works that praise her in the public square (v31). Wisdom has been embodied.

Ecclesiastes

Summary: The book opens with a superscription identifying Qohelet ('the Assembler') as a son of David and king in Jerusalem. What follows is the thesis statement of the entire work: hevel havalim — 'vapor of vapors' — everything is vapor. Qohelet then launches into a poem on the wearying cycles of nature (sun, wind, streams) to argue that nothing under the sun is genuinely new. The chapter closes with Qohelet's autobiographical introduction: he applied his mind to investigate everything done under heaven and found it all to be a chasing after wind.

What Makes This Remarkable: The word hevel appears five times in verse 2 alone and will appear thirty-eight times across the book. Its traditional rendering as 'vanity' (KJV) or 'meaningless' (NIV) has profoundly shaped Western readings of Ecclesiastes as a work of nihilism or despair. But hevel literally means 'breath' or 'vapor' — something that exists, that you can see on a cold morning, but that you cannot hold or keep. It is not 'nothing' but 'nothing lasting.' This distinction matters enormously. Qohelet is not saying life is pointless; he is saying life is transient, elusive, and impossible to grip. The Covenant Rendering uses 'vapor' throughout to preserve this concrete, physical image. The nature poem in verses 4-7 is not decorative but argumentative: the sun rises and sets, the wind circles, the rivers flow to the sea — and nothing changes. The world is a closed loop. This is Qohelet's evidence for his thesis.

Translation Friction: The superscription's claim that Qohelet is 'son of David, king in Jerusalem' has traditionally been read as identifying Solomon, but the book's late Hebrew vocabulary, Aramaic loan-words, and Persian-period syntax make Solomonic authorship impossible on linguistic grounds. The Solomonic fiction is a literary device: who better to test whether wisdom, wealth, and achievement can provide lasting satisfaction than the king who had all three? Qohelet is a persona, not a historical claim. The word qohelet itself is a feminine participle from qahal ('to assemble'), used as a title rather than a name — something like 'the one who convenes the assembly' or simply 'the Assembler.'

Connections: Qohelet's investigation of wisdom echoes Proverbs 1:1-7 but reaches radically different conclusions — where Proverbs promises that wisdom yields life, Qohelet finds that wisdom yields grief (v. 18). The nature poem shares imagery with Psalm 19:4-6 (the sun's circuit) but strips it of all praise. The phrase 'under the sun' (tachat ha-shemesh) appears twenty-nine times in Ecclesiastes and nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible — it is Qohelet's signature frame, limiting his inquiry to what can be observed in the natural world without appeal to revelation or eschatology.

¹The words of Qohelet, son of David, king in Jerusalem.

²Vapor of vapors, says Qohelet.

Vapor of vapors — everything is vapor.

³What lasting gain does a person have from all the toil at which he toils under the sun?

⁴A generation goes and a generation comes,
but the earth stands forever.

⁵The sun rises and the sun sets,
then it pants back to the place where it rises again.

⁶Going south, then turning north — round and round the wind goes,
and on its circuits the wind returns.

⁷All the streams flow to the sea,
but the sea is never full.
To the place where the streams flow,
there they return to flow again.

⁸All things are wearisome — more than anyone can express.
The eye is not satisfied with seeing,
nor the ear filled with hearing.

⁹What has been is what will be,
and what has been done is what will be done.
There is nothing new under the sun.

¹⁰Is there anything of which someone might say, 'Look, this is new'? It has already existed in ages past, in times before us.

¹¹There is no remembrance of those who came before, and even those yet to come will not be remembered by those who follow after them.

¹²I, Qohelet, was king over Israel in Jerusalem. ¹³I set my mind to investigate and explore by wisdom everything done under heaven. It is a grievous task God has given to human beings to be occupied with. ¹⁴I have observed all the deeds done under the sun, and look — everything is vapor and a chasing after wind.

¹⁵What is crooked cannot be straightened, and what is lacking cannot be counted.

¹⁶I said to myself, 'Look, I have grown and increased in wisdom beyond anyone who ruled before me over Jerusalem, and my mind has observed much wisdom and knowledge.' ¹⁷I set my mind to understand wisdom and to understand madness and folly. I realized that this too is a chasing after wind.

¹⁸For with much wisdom comes much vexation, and whoever increases knowledge increases pain.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Qohelet is not a name but a title derived from qahal ('to assemble, to gather'). The form is a feminine participle used as a professional designation — 'the Assembler' or 'the Convener.' We retain the Hebrew title rather than translating it as 'Preacher' (KJV) or 'Teacher' (NIV), since neither captures the original sense. The Solomonic framing ('son of David, king in Jerusalem') establishes the literary persona through which the book conducts its philosophical experiment.
2. The rendering 'vapor' rather than 'vanity' (KJV) or 'meaningless' (NIV) recovers the physical concreteness of the Hebrew. Hevel is not an abstract philosophical concept but a sensory image — breath on a cold day, morning mist, steam rising from a pot. The word does not negate existence; it characterizes its duration and graspability.
2. The superlative construction hevel havalim appears only here and in 12:8, forming an inclusio that frames the entire book. Everything between these two declarations is contained within the thesis of vapor.
3. The word yitron ('profit, advantage, gain') is a commercial term — literally 'what is left over.' Qohelet frames life as an accounting problem: after all the effort, what is the net surplus? The implied answer is: nothing lasting. The phrase tachat ha-shemesh ('under the sun') appears here for the first time and will recur twenty-nine times. It establishes the boundaries of Qohelet's investigation: he is examining life as it can be observed in the visible world, without appeal to afterlife or divine revelation.
4. The poem on nature's cycles begins. Generations pass but the stage remains. The word olam ('forever, perpetuity') applied to the earth contrasts sharply with the transience of human life. The earth is the permanent backdrop against which the brief drama of each generation plays out and is forgotten.
5. The verb sho'ef ('pants, gasps, hastens') personifies the sun as a runner straining to complete its circuit. This is not a joyful image like Psalm 19:5, where the sun is a bridegroom running with gladness — here the sun is exhausted, gasping its way back to the starting line only to run the same course again. The word choice turns the solar cycle from wonder into weariness.
6. The repetition of sovev ('turning, circling') three times in a single verse mimics the wind's endless circling through sound. The word ruach means both 'wind' and 'spirit' — an ambiguity Qohelet will exploit throughout the book. Here the wind's aimless cycling is exhibit B in the case for cosmic monotony.
7. The streams complete the triad: sun, wind, water — all moving ceaselessly, arriving nowhere new. The sea's refusal to fill despite endless inflow is the poem's most striking image of futility. Effort without accumulation. Motion without progress. The streams do not fail to reach the sea; they reach it and it makes no difference.
8. The word yege'im ('wearisome, toilsome') applies to devarim, which means both 'things' and 'words.' The ambiguity is deliberate: all things are wearying, and all words fail to capture it. The eye and ear — the primary channels of human perception — are insatiable. This is not a celebration of human curiosity but an indictment: we keep looking and listening and are never filled.
9. This is Qohelet's most famous line and the conclusion drawn from the nature poem. The parallel structure is perfectly symmetrical: what was / will be, what was done / will be done. The denial of novelty is radical — it challenges every human claim to innovation, discovery, and progress. Ein kol chadash tachat ha-shemesh: 'there is nothing at all new under the sun.'
10. Qohelet anticipates the objection and dismisses it. The rhetorical question expects 'no' as its answer. The phrase le-olamim ('for ages, in antiquity') pushes the denial of novelty back into deep time. Whatever seems new merely seems so because of failed memory.
11. The poem ends by diagnosing why the illusion of novelty persists: memory fails. The rishonim ('former ones') are forgotten, and the acharonim ('later ones') will be too. Each generation lives in the illusion that its experience is unprecedented because it cannot remember what came before. The loss of memory is not accidental but structural — it is how the cycle perpetuates itself.
12. The shift to first person marks the transition from the editor's frame (vv. 1-11) to Qohelet's own voice. The past tense 'was king' (hayiti melek) is striking — it suggests looking back on kingship as a completed experience, which complicates the Solomonic fiction since Solomon reigned until death. The autobiographical section now begins.
13. The verb tur ('to explore, to spy out') is the same word used when Moses sent spies to 'tour' the land of Canaan (Numbers 13:2). Qohelet is conducting a reconnaissance of reality, surveying the terrain of human experience. The military-intelligence connotation adds urgency and purpose to what might otherwise seem like idle philosophizing.
13. The phrase inyan ra ('grievous task') frames the human drive to understand as a burden, not a gift. God assigned it, and it produces sorrow. This tension between divine sovereignty and human frustration runs through the entire book.
14. The phrase re'ut ruach ('chasing after wind' or 'shepherding wind') appears nine times in Ecclesiastes. The word re'ut may derive from ra'ah ('to shepherd, to feed') or from ra'ah ('to desire, to strive after'). Either reading yields the same image: trying to herd the wind or grasping at it — an exercise in futility. The pairing of hevel ('vapor') with re'ut ruach ('chasing wind') creates Qohelet's most characteristic expression: life is both insubstantial and ungraspable.
15. A proverbial couplet summarizing Qohelet's finding. The world contains structural defects (me'uvat, 'twisted, crooked') and deficiencies (chesron, 'lack, deficit') that human effort cannot repair or even quantify. The passive voice suggests these are not accidental but built into the fabric of reality.

Wisdom can diagnose the crookedness but cannot fix it.

16. The phrase dibarti ani im-libbi ('I spoke, I, with my heart') is Qohelet's characteristic mode of reflection — internal dialogue. The claim to surpass all predecessors in Jerusalem in wisdom reinforces the Solomonic persona (1 Kings 4:29-31 attributes unmatched wisdom to Solomon). But the claim is set up only to be undercut in the next two verses.
17. Qohelet's method includes studying the full spectrum — not just wisdom but holelot ('madness, raving') and sikhlot ('folly, senselessness'). He needs the contrast to evaluate wisdom fairly. But even this comprehensive investigation leads to the same verdict: ra'yon ruach ('chasing after wind'), a variant of re'ut ruach in verse 14.
18. The parallel structure is precise: much wisdom / much vexation, increased knowledge / increased pain. The proportion is direct — wisdom and suffering grow together. This verse will be tested and complicated throughout the book as Qohelet continues to pursue wisdom despite its cost, never abandoning the enterprise he describes as painful.

Summary: Qohelet conducts a series of experiments in pleasure, achievement, and wealth to determine whether any of them yield lasting gain. He builds houses, plants vineyards, acquires servants, accumulates silver and gold, and denies himself nothing his eyes desire. The verdict: all of it is vapor and chasing after wind. He then compares wisdom to folly and concedes that wisdom has an advantage — the wise person sees where he is going — but both the wise and the fool meet the same end in death. The chapter climaxes with Qohelet hating life and hating his toil, since he must leave everything to a successor who may be a fool. The chapter closes with the first of several 'enjoyment passages': there is nothing better than to eat, drink, and find satisfaction in one's work, for even this comes from God's hand.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the most sustained first-person experiment in the Hebrew Bible. Qohelet does not argue from theory but from lived experience: 'I built, I planted, I acquired, I gathered.' He is not a detached philosopher but a participant-observer who has tested every avenue the ancient world considered a path to the good life. The shocking element is not his verdict — that pleasure and achievement are vapor — but his honesty about the process. He admits the pleasure was real (v. 10), the wisdom was genuine (v. 13), and the achievement was impressive (vv. 4-8). None of it was fake. It was simply temporary. The hatred of life in verse 17 is not depression but the rational conclusion of a man who has exhausted every human option for permanent satisfaction.

Translation Friction: *The enjoyment passage in verses 24-26 creates an apparent contradiction: if everything is vapor, why commend eating and drinking? This tension is fundamental to Ecclesiastes and cannot be resolved by choosing one pole over the other. Qohelet simultaneously maintains that nothing lasts and that present enjoyment is a genuine gift from God. The resolution, if there is one, lies in the distinction between permanent gain (yitron) and present gift (mattanah). There is no lasting profit, but there are real moments of God-given pleasure. Learning to receive them without clutching them is, perhaps, the book's central spiritual discipline.*

Connections: *The catalog of achievements in verses 4-8 parallels the description of Solomon's wealth in 1 Kings 4-10. The enjoyment commendation echoes the Egyptian harper's songs and Siduri's advice to Gilgamesh: 'Let your belly be full, enjoy yourself always by day and by night.' But Qohelet anchors his enjoyment in God's hand (v. 24), which distinguishes his counsel from purely secular carpe diem. The phrase 'under the sun' continues to frame the investigation.*

¹I said to myself, 'Come now, I will test you with pleasure — enjoy what is good.' But look, this too was vapor. ²Of laughter I said, 'It is senseless,' and of pleasure, 'What does it accomplish?' ³I explored with my mind how to stimulate my body with wine — my mind still guiding me with wisdom — and how to embrace folly, until I could see what is good for human beings to do under heaven during the few days of their lives. ⁴I undertook great projects. I built houses for myself. I planted vineyards for myself. ⁵I made gardens and parks for myself and planted in them every kind of fruit tree. ⁶I made pools of water for myself to irrigate a forest of growing trees. ⁷I acquired male and female servants and had servants born in my household. I also owned more herds and flocks than anyone who came before me in Jerusalem. ⁸I also amassed silver and gold — the treasuries of kings and provinces. I provided myself with male and female singers and the delights of human beings — concubines in great number. ⁹I became greater and wealthier than anyone before me in Jerusalem, and through it all my wisdom stayed with me. ¹⁰Whatever my eyes desired I did not withhold from them. I refused my heart no pleasure, for my heart found joy in all my toil — and this was my reward from all my toil. ¹¹Then I surveyed everything my hands had done and the toil I had labored to accomplish, and look — everything was vapor and chasing after wind. There was no lasting gain under the sun. ¹²Then I turned to consider wisdom alongside madness and folly. For what can the one who comes after the king do? Only what has already been done. ¹³And I saw that wisdom has an advantage over folly, just as light has an advantage over darkness. ¹⁴The wise person's eyes are in his head, but the fool walks in darkness. Yet I also know that one fate overtakes them both. ¹⁵Then I said to myself, 'What happens to the fool will happen to me as well. So why have I been so excessively wise?' And I said to myself that this too is vapor. ¹⁶For the wise person, like the fool, will not be remembered forever — in the days to come everything will already be forgotten. How can it be that the wise person dies just like the fool? ¹⁷So I hated life, because what is done under the sun was grievous to me, for everything is vapor and chasing after wind. ¹⁸I hated all the results of my toil at which I had worked under the sun, because I must leave them to the one who comes after me. ¹⁹And who knows whether that person will be wise or foolish? Yet he will have control over everything I toiled at and applied my wisdom to under the sun. This too is vapor. ²⁰So I turned to let my heart despair over all the toil at which I had worked under the sun. ²¹For here is a person whose toil was done with wisdom, knowledge, and skill — yet he must hand over his portion to someone who did not work for it. This too is vapor, and a terrible wrong. ²²For what does a person gain from all his toil and the striving of his heart at which he toils under the sun? ²³For all his days are filled with pain, and his occupation is vexation. Even at night his mind does not rest. This too is vapor. ²⁴There is nothing better for a person than to eat and drink and find satisfaction in his toil. This too, I saw, is from the hand of God. ²⁵For who can eat or who can experience anything apart from him? ²⁶For to the person who is good in his sight, God gives wisdom, knowledge, and joy; but to the one who misses the mark, he gives the task of gathering and collecting, only to hand it over to the one who is good before God. This too is vapor and chasing after wind.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Qohelet announces a new experiment: testing pleasure (simchah) as a candidate for lasting meaning. The address to himself in second person ('I will test you') creates a clinical distance — he is both experimenter and subject. The verdict ('this too was vapor') comes before the evidence, signaling that the outcome was already clear.
2. The word meholal ('mad, senseless') from halal ('to be boisterous, to rave') echoes the holelot ('madness') of 1:17. Laughter and pleasure are not condemned as sinful but as unproductive — they accomplish nothing lasting.
3. The verb tarti ('I explored, I investigated') suggests deliberate, methodical testing. Qohelet's genius as an experimenter shows here: he indulges in wine while maintaining intellectual control ('my mind still guiding with wisdom'). This is not reckless hedonism but controlled experimentation. The phrase mispar yeme chayyehem ('the number of the days of their lives') underscores how brief the testing window is.
4. The catalog of achievements begins. Each item echoes Solomon's building program (1 Kings 5-7). The repetition of 'for myself' (li) in the Hebrew emphasizes the self-directed nature of the enterprise.
5. The word pardesim ('parks, orchards') is a Persian loanword (from pairidaeza, the source of English 'paradise'). Its presence is one of the linguistic markers of the book's late date, long after Solomon's era.
6. The pools recall Solomon's pools south of Bethlehem. The image of human engineering conquering aridity connects back to the streams-and-sea imagery of 1:7 — but here, unlike nature's futile cycles, the water is directed to a purpose. Qohelet's engineering actually works. The question is whether it matters.
7. The bene bayit ('sons of the house') were slaves born within the household, considered more loyal than purchased slaves. The competitive comparison — 'more than anyone before me in Jerusalem' — sustains the Solomonic persona and underscores the scale of the experiment.
8. The phrase shiddah ve-shiddot is one of the most disputed words in Ecclesiastes. The precise meaning is uncertain — suggestions include 'chests,' 'concubines,' 'cup-bearers,' or 'luxuries.' The context of human delights and the superlative form (shiddah ve-shiddot, like hevel havalim) suggests sexual pleasure, and we follow the traditional interpretation of 'concubines' as the final item in a progression from material to sensory to intimate pleasure.
8. The word segullat ('treasuries, special possessions') is used elsewhere of Israel as God's 'treasured possession' (Exodus 19:5). Here it refers to royal wealth — an ironic reversal.

9. The crucial note: af chokhmati amdah li ('my wisdom stayed with me'). Qohelet did not lose his judgment in the process. The experiment was conducted under controlled conditions. Whatever verdict he reaches about pleasure and achievement cannot be dismissed as the regret of someone who lost himself in excess.
10. This verse is the honest center of the chapter. The pleasure was real. The joy was genuine. Qohelet does not deny that his achievements brought him satisfaction. The word cheleq ('portion, share, reward') is important — it is the dividend the effort actually paid. But as the next verse will clarify, this portion is all there is. There is no yitron ('lasting surplus') beyond it.
11. The verdict on the pleasure experiment is identical to the verdict on the wisdom experiment (1:14): hevel u-re'ut ruach ('vapor and chasing after wind'). The added phrase ein yitron tachat ha-shemesh ('there is no lasting gain under the sun') makes explicit what was implied. The pleasure was real (v. 10) but not lasting. The experience yielded a portion but not a surplus.
12. The rhetorical question acknowledges the unique advantage of the Solomonic persona: no one will be able to conduct this experiment on a grander scale. If the king with unlimited resources found no lasting gain, no successor can expect to find it either.
13. Qohelet is not anti-wisdom. He freely concedes its superiority over folly — the comparison to light versus darkness is the strongest possible endorsement. The question is not whether wisdom is better but whether it is enough.
14. The phrase 'eyes in his head' is a compact metaphor for foresight and awareness. The miqreh echad ('one fate') that overtakes both is death — Qohelet does not say the word yet but the following verses make it explicit.
15. The question 'why have I been wise?' is not a rejection of wisdom but an anguished recognition of its limits. If both wise and foolish end in death, what advantage does all that extra wisdom provide? The answer — which Qohelet will spend the rest of the book working out — is: a real but temporary one.
16. The complaint echoes 1:11 — memory fails, and the wise are forgotten along with the foolish. The exclamation ve-eikh yamut he-chakham im ha-kesil ('how can it be that the wise dies alongside the fool!') expresses genuine outrage. This is not resignation but protest.
17. The Hebrew is blunt: ve-sane'ti et ha-chayyim ('I hated life'). The verb sane ('to hate') is unqualified. This is the most extreme emotional statement in the chapter and one of the most striking in all of wisdom literature. Qohelet does not say he was disappointed or disillusioned — he says he hated life. The cause is not personal suffering but the structural injustice of death erasing all distinctions.
18. The hatred extends from life itself (v. 17) to the products of labor. The reason is not that the work was bad but that its fruits must be transferred to an unknown successor. Inheritance forces Qohelet to confront the fact that ownership is temporary — the builder never gets to keep what he built.
19. The uncertainty about the heir's character adds insult to the injury of losing one's work. Qohelet's wisdom cannot even guarantee that the successor will be competent. The verb yishlat ('will have control, will rule over') emphasizes that the heir gains authority over what he did not earn.
20. The verb ya'esh ('to despair, to give up hope') marks the emotional low point. Qohelet deliberately allows himself to feel the full weight of the realization. This is intellectual honesty carried to its painful conclusion.
21. The word kishron ('skill, success, competence') appears only in Ecclesiastes. The injustice is stated plainly: skill and effort produce results that are then given to someone with no investment. The phrase ra'ah rabbah ('a terrible wrong, a great evil') is stronger than the usual hevel verdict — this is not just transient, it is unjust.
22. The question reprises 1:3 but adds ra'yon libbo ('the striving of his heart') — not just physical labor but the mental and emotional investment. The rhetorical question expects the answer: nothing lasting.
23. The portrait of sleepless anxiety completes the picture. Toil does not end at sunset — the mind continues to churn through the night. The word makh'ovim ('pains, sorrows') and ka'as ('vexation, anger') characterize the inner life of the achiever as one of chronic distress.
24. The shift from 'I hated life' (v. 17) to 'eat, drink, and find satisfaction' (v. 24) is jarring but intentional. Qohelet's counsel is not hedonism — it is received enjoyment. The hand of God as the source transforms this from secular advice into theological affirmation: even in a vapor-filled world, God gives moments of genuine goodness.
25. The Hebrew text is ambiguous — 'apart from him' (mimmenni) could refer to God or to Qohelet. Some manuscripts read 'apart from me,' reinforcing the Solomonic persona (who had more opportunity to eat and enjoy than Solomon?). We follow the reading that refers to God, consistent with the theological framing of verse 24: all enjoyment ultimately comes from God.
26. The word choteh ('sinner, one who misses the mark') is rendered here without the heavy theological freight that 'sinner' carries in English. The Hebrew root chata means 'to miss' (as an archer misses a target). The person who misses the mark accumulates wealth that ultimately passes to the person who is tov lifne ha-Elohim ('good before God'). But even this seemingly just distribution is declared vapor — Qohelet refuses to let any system, even a moral one, claim permanence.

Summary: Chapter 3 opens with the most famous poem in Ecclesiastes: 'a time for everything' — fourteen pairs of opposites organized in a tightly structured catalogue of human experience. From this poem, Qohelet draws the conclusion that God has made everything appropriate in its time and has placed eternity (olam) in the human heart, yet no one can grasp the full scope of God's work from beginning to end. The chapter then confronts the scandal of injustice in the place where justice should exist, raises the disturbing question of whether humans have any advantage over animals in death, and closes with another commendation of present enjoyment as one's proper portion.

What Makes This Remarkable: The 'time for everything' poem is one of the most recognized passages in world literature, but its function within the argument is frequently missed. It is not a comforting message about divine timing. It is an argument about human powerlessness. The poem's twenty-eight activities (fourteen pairs of opposites) cover the full range of human experience, but the human being does not choose the timing. God sets the times; humans merely undergo them. Verse 11 is the chapter's theological center and one of the most debated verses in the Hebrew Bible: God has placed olam ('eternity, the distant past and future, something beyond comprehension') in the human heart, but ha-adam ('the human being') cannot find out (lo yimtsa) what God has done me-rosh ve-ad sof ('from beginning to end'). We carry within us a sense that there is more than the present moment, yet we cannot access it. This is the deepest form of hevel: to be built for something you cannot reach.

Translation Friction: The word olam in verse 11 is notoriously difficult. It can mean 'eternity,' 'the remote past,' 'the far future,' 'the world,' or 'ignorance' (if emended to elem, 'hiddenness'). The choice shapes the theology of the verse entirely. We retain 'eternity' as the most widely attested meaning while acknowledging the ambiguity in the notes. The comparison of humans and animals in verses 19-21 is deliberately provocative: Qohelet says both share one ruach ('breath/spirit') and both go to the same place (dust). His rhetorical question 'Who knows whether the human spirit ascends upward and the animal spirit descends?' is not denying the afterlife but admitting that empirical observation cannot confirm it.

Connections: The poem's opening line le-khol zeman ('for everything a season') echoes the priestly calendar language of Leviticus 23 and Numbers 28-29, where appointed times (mo'adim) structure Israel's worship. But here the appointed times are not festivals — they are birth and death, killing and healing, war and peace. The human-animal comparison echoes Genesis 2-3 (both formed from the ground, both returning to dust) and anticipates Psalm 49:12,20 ('a person in splendor who does not understand is like the beasts that perish').

¹For everything there is an appointed time, and a season for every matter under heaven:

²A time to be born and a time to die,
a time to plant and a time to uproot what is planted;

³A time to take life and a time to heal,
a time to tear down and a time to build up;

⁴A time to weep and a time for laughter,
a time for mourning and a time for dancing;

⁵A time to scatter stones and a time to gather stones, a time to embrace and a time to refrain from embracing;

⁶A time to seek and a time to lose,
a time to keep and a time to throw away;

⁷A time to tear and a time to mend,
a time to be silent and a time to speak;

⁸A time to love and a time to hate,
a time for war and a time for peace.

⁹What lasting gain does the worker have from his toil? ¹⁰I have seen the burden God has placed on human beings to occupy them. ¹¹He has made everything fitting in its time. He has also placed eternity in the human heart — yet no one can discover what God has done from beginning to end. ¹²I know that there is nothing better for them than to rejoice and to do good during their lives. ¹³Moreover, that everyone should eat and drink and experience good in all their toil — this is the gift of God. ¹⁴I know that everything God does will endure forever. Nothing can be added to it and nothing taken from it. God has done this so that people will stand in awe before him. ¹⁵What is has already been, and what will be has already been. And God seeks out what has been driven away. ¹⁶And I saw something else under the sun: in the place of justice, wickedness was there; and in the place of righteousness, wickedness was there. ¹⁷I said to myself, 'God will judge the righteous and the wicked, for there is a time for every matter and for every deed.' ¹⁸I said to myself concerning human beings: God tests them so that they may see that they are, in themselves, like animals. ¹⁹For what happens to human beings and what happens to animals is the same — as one dies, so dies the other. They all have the same breath, and humans have no advantage over animals, for everything is vapor. ²⁰All go to one place. All come from dust, and all return to dust. ²¹Who knows whether the human spirit ascends upward and the animal spirit descends downward into the earth? ²²So I saw that there is nothing better than for a person to find joy in his work, for that is his portion. Who can bring him to see what will happen after him?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word zeman ('appointed time, season') is a late Hebrew / Aramaic term (compare Daniel 2:16; Esther 9:27), another marker of the book's post-exilic date. The word et ('time, moment, occasion') refers to the specific appropriate moment for each action. Chefets ('matter, affair, desire') encompasses the full range of human activities catalogued in the following verses.
2. The poem opens with the most fundamental pair: birth and death — the two events no human controls. The shift to agricultural imagery (plant / uproot) grounds the cosmic claim in the daily rhythm of farming life. Each pair follows the pattern et + infinitive, creating a rhythmic cadence that carries through all fourteen pairs.
3. The 'time to kill' is startling in its directness — Qohelet does not soften it. The pairs now move through violence and restoration, destruction and construction. The poem makes no moral judgments about these activities; it simply asserts that each has its appointed moment.
4. The emotional pairs — weeping/laughing, mourning/dancing — move from the physical world to the interior world. Sefod ('to mourn, to beat the breast') is the formal mourning ritual; raqod ('to dance, to skip') is its opposite. Both are public, communal activities with appointed occasions.
5. Scattering and gathering stones may refer to clearing a field for planting or ruining an enemy's field (2 Kings 3:25), or it may carry a sexual connotation (as in the Targum and Midrash). The embrace/refrain pair moves into the intimate sphere — there are seasons for closeness and seasons for distance, and forcing either at the wrong time violates the order.
6. The seeking/losing and keeping/discarding pairs address the human relationship to possessions and pursuits. The 'time to lose' (et le-abbed) does not mean losing accidentally but accepting loss — letting go. The 'time to throw away' (et le-hashlik) is the deliberate act of releasing what one has held.
7. Tearing (qara) refers to the mourning ritual of tearing one's garment; mending (tafor) is the restoration that follows. The silence/speech pair is one of the most potent in the poem — knowing when to speak and when to stay silent is one of wisdom literature's highest skills (Proverbs 10:19; 17:28).
8. The poem closes with its most sweeping pairs: love/hate and war/peace. These final four words encompass the entirety of human relational and political life. The poem ends not on love or peace but on shalom — which may be deliberate, leaving the reader with the word for wholeness and well-being as the last note.
9. The question from 1:3 returns. After the beautiful poem, the conclusion is sobering: if God controls the timing of everything, what surplus (yitron) does human effort produce? The poem was not a comfort — it was evidence that human beings do not control the most important moments of their lives.
10. The word inyan ('burden, occupation, business') reprises 1:13. God gives humanity tasks that fill time but do not yield lasting gain. The verb la'anot bo ('to be occupied with it, to be afflicted by it') carries overtones of both busyness and suffering.
11. The word olam is the crux. It most commonly means 'eternity, perpetuity, the ages' (as in le-olam va-ed, 'forever and ever'). Some scholars emend to elem ('hiddenness, ignorance'), which would yield 'he has placed ignorance in their hearts.' We retain olam because the tension between having eternity planted within and being unable to comprehend God's work is precisely Qohelet's point — it would be flattened by reading 'ignorance.'

11. The phrase me-rosh ve-ad sof ('from beginning to end') describes the totality of God's action through time. Humans can perceive fragments — individual times and seasons — but never the whole tapestry.
12. The second enjoyment passage. Given the inability to comprehend God's total work, the proper response is simchah ('joy, gladness') and la'asot tov ('to do good'). Whether 'do good' means moral goodness or 'experience good things' is debated. Both readings are legitimate — Qohelet likely intends the overlap.
13. The word mattat ('gift') from natan ('to give') is key. Enjoyment is not earned, achieved, or manufactured — it is given. Mattat Elohim ('gift of God') anchors the enjoyment counsel in theology: even when the big picture is incomprehensible, God gives small gifts — food, drink, satisfaction — that can be received in the present.
14. A statement of divine sovereignty: God's work is permanent (le-olam) and unalterable. Humans can neither add to it nor subtract from it. The purpose clause — she-yir'u mi-lefanav ('so that they will fear before him') — connects God's inscrutable permanence to human reverence. The inability to understand or modify God's work is itself pedagogical: it teaches awe.
15. The first half repeats the cyclical view of 1:9. The second half — ve-ha-Elohim yevaquesh et nirdaf ('God seeks what has been driven away / pursued') — is enigmatic. The nirdaf ('the pursued, the driven away') may refer to past time, to the oppressed, or to events that have been displaced. The image of God recovering what has been lost or persecuted adds a note of justice to the cyclical worldview.
16. The double occurrence of resha ('wickedness') in the very places designated for mishpat ('justice') and tsedeq ('righteousness') is devastating. The corruption is not in the marketplace or the battlefield but in the courts — the institutions designed to correct injustice are themselves unjust. This observation drives the crisis of the next verses.
17. Qohelet's response to the injustice of verse 16 is an appeal to divine judgment — but it is an appeal he makes to himself (be-libbi, 'in my heart'), not a confident public declaration. The phrase et le-khol chefets ('a time for every matter') echoes the poem's opening (v. 1), suggesting that even judgment has its appointed time, though it may not be visible now.
18. The phrase she-hem behemah hemmah lahem ('they are animals, they, to themselves') is syntactically awkward and deliberately provocative. Qohelet is not making a biological claim but a mortality claim: viewed from the perspective of death, humans and animals are indistinguishable. God's purpose in this (levaram, 'to purify them, to test them, to make clear to them') is pedagogical — the recognition of shared mortality is meant to produce humility.
19. The word ruach here means 'breath' (the animating life-force) rather than 'spirit' in the theological sense. Qohelet's point is biological: both humans and animals breathe, and when the breathing stops, both are equally dead. The 'no advantage' (motar...ayin) echoes the yitron question of 1:3 and 3:9.
20. The echo of Genesis 3:19 ('dust you are and to dust you shall return') is unmistakable. But Genesis applied this only to the human; Qohelet extends it to all living things. The universality of dust-origin and dust-destination is the empirical ground for the 'no advantage' claim. Ha-kol ('all, everything') appears three times, hammering the universality home.
21. This question is not a denial of the afterlife but an epistemological admission: empirical observation cannot confirm what happens to the ruach after death. Qohelet's method — observing what happens 'under the sun' — reaches its limit here. The traditional belief that the human spirit ascends may be true, but Qohelet's investigative framework cannot verify it. The question is honest, not heretical.
22. The third enjoyment passage closes the chapter. The word cheleq ('portion') returns from 2:10 — present joy is what life actually yields. The final question ('who can bring him to see what will happen after him?') seals the argument: since the future is inaccessible, the present is all you have. Receive it.

Summary: Qohelet turns his attention to the social dimensions of life under the sun. He observes the tears of the oppressed who have no comforter, concluding that the dead are better off than the living and the unborn better still. He examines the competitive nature of human toil, the loneliness of the solitary worker with no companion, and then offers one of the book's most tender observations: two are better than one. The famous 'threefold cord' proverb appears here. The chapter closes with a reflection on the fickleness of popular acclaim — even a king's favor is vapor.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains Qohelet's most sustained engagement with social injustice. The repetition of 'no comforter' (ein lahem menachem) in verse 1 is devastating — it appears twice in a single verse, as though Qohelet cannot get past the absence. The shift from cosmic observations about nature and death to street-level observations about oppression and loneliness reveals Qohelet as more than a philosopher; he is a witness. The 'two are better than one' section (vv. 9-12) is often* extracted for wedding readings, but in context it is a survival strategy: the world is cold and dangerous, and companionship is the only reliable protection against it.

Translation Friction: Verse 2-3, where Qohelet declares the dead more fortunate than the living and the unborn more fortunate than either, pushes against the Hebrew Bible's general affirmation of life. This is not suicidal ideation but a rhetorical strategy: if oppression is this severe, then not being born is the only way to avoid witnessing it. The logic is about suffering avoidance, not life-denial. It should be read alongside Job 3, where a similar wish for non-existence arises from a similar confrontation with unjust suffering.

Connections: The 'no comforter' language echoes Lamentations 1:2,9,16,17,21, where Jerusalem after the exile has 'no one to comfort her.' The two-are-better-than-one section connects to the creation narrative's 'it is not good for the human to be alone' (Genesis 2:18). The threefold cord metaphor has parallels in Mesopotamian wisdom literature, particularly the Sumerian proverb collection. The fickle king section anticipates the court wisdom of chapters 8-10.

¹Again I looked and saw all the acts of oppression committed under the sun. I saw the tears of the oppressed — and they had no comforter. Power was on the side of their oppressors — and they had no comforter. ²So I declared the dead — who have already died — more fortunate than the living who are still alive. ³But better off than both is the one who has never existed, who has never seen the evil deeds done under the sun. ⁴And I saw that all toil and all skillful work spring from one person's envy of another. This too is vapor and chasing after wind. ⁵The fool folds his hands and consumes his own flesh.

⁶Better one handful with tranquility than two fistfuls with toil and chasing after wind.

⁷Again I saw vapor under the sun: ⁸There is a man who is alone, with no companion — he has neither son nor brother. Yet there is no end to his toil, and his eye is never satisfied with wealth. 'For whom am I toiling,' he never asks, 'and depriving myself of good things?' This too is vapor and a miserable occupation. ⁹Two are better than one, for they have a good return for their toil. ¹⁰For if one falls, the other can lift up his companion. But pity the one who falls with no one to help him up. ¹¹Al so, if two lie down together, they keep warm; but how can one person keep warm alone? ¹²And if someone overpowers one person, two can resist him. A cord of three strands is not quickly broken. ¹³Better a poor but wise youth than an old but foolish king who no longer knows how to accept a warning. ¹⁴For the youth came out of prison to become king, even though he had been born poor in the king's own realm. ¹⁵I saw all the living who move about under the sun rally to the side of the second youth, who would succeed him. ¹⁶There was no end to all the people he led, yet those who come later will not celebrate him. This too is vapor and chasing after wind.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word menachem ('comforter') is from nacham ('to comfort, to console'). Its doubled absence creates one of the most emotionally raw moments in Ecclesiastes. The comforter is not God, not a human advocate, not a legal system — the word is left open, and the absence is total.
2. The verb shibbacht ('I praised, I congratulated, I declared fortunate') does not mean Qohelet envies death in the abstract. In the context of verses 1-3, the logic is specific: given the relentless oppression with no comforter, the dead have at least escaped the sight of it. The living must continue witnessing what they cannot change.
3. The escalation — the living < the dead < the never-born — is Qohelet's most extreme statement. The never-born person (asher aden lo hayah, 'who has not yet come into being') is most fortunate because he has not witnessed (lo ra'ah) the evil that happens under the sun. This is an argument from suffering-avoidance, not from nihilism. Compare Job 3:11-16.
4. The word qin'ah ('envy, jealousy, rivalry') diagnoses the hidden engine of human achievement: competition with one's neighbor. The kishron ha-ma'aseh ('skill of the work, excellence of achievement') is real, but its motivation is envy. Qohelet does not deny the quality of the work — he exposes its root.
5. A proverbial image of the sluggard who refuses to work. Folding the hands is the posture of idleness (Proverbs 6:10; 24:33). 'Consuming his own flesh' means self-destruction through inactivity — the fool's laziness devours him. This proverb qualifies verse 4: if all toil springs from envy, does that mean one should stop working? No — the alternative is self-consumption.
6. The 'better than' (tov...min) proverb offers the middle path between envy-driven overwork (v. 4) and lazy self-destruction (v. 5). One handful (melo khaf) with nachat ('rest, tranquility, quiet') is superior to two fistfuls (melo chofnayim) with amal ('toil') and re'ut ruach ('chasing after wind'). The measure is not quantity but quality of life.

7. A transitional formula introducing the next observation. The brief, unadorned statement signals a new case study in futility.
8. The portrait of the solitary workaholic is drawn with precision: no son (ben), no brother (ach), no second person (sheni) at all — and yet he works endlessly. The question he never asks ('for whom am I toiling?') is the one that would free him. His eye's insatiability echoes 1:8. The tragedy is not that he lacks companionship but that he does not notice the lack.
9. After the portrait of the lonely man, the remedy: companionship. The sakhar tov ('good reward, good return') is not cosmic yitron but practical benefit — two workers produce more than one. The 'better than' form continues from verse 6, now applied to social rather than economic calculation.
10. The first of three practical illustrations. Falling — whether physical stumbling on a road or metaphorical collapse — requires another person's help. The exclamation ve-ilo ('but alas, but pity') expresses genuine sorrow for the solitary person who falls alone.
11. The second illustration: warmth. In ancient Palestine, nights could be bitterly cold, especially for travelers. Sharing body heat was a practical necessity, not merely a comfort. The rhetorical question ('how can one keep warm alone?') has no answer — you cannot.
12. The third illustration: defense against attack. Two can stand where one would fall. The threefold cord proverb elevates the principle beyond pairs — the strongest arrangement is three strands woven together. The ha-chut ha-meshullash ('the threefold cord') is a proverbial image, likely drawn from rope-making practice. Qohelet does not identify the third strand — it may be God, a child, a community, or simply the principle that more connections mean greater resilience.
13. A new 'better than' proverb introducing the chapter's final section on political power. The contrast is extreme: a yeled misken ('a poor child') versus a melekha zaqen ('an old king'). Wisdom and teachability outweigh age, wealth, and power. The key deficiency of the old king is that he lo yada le-hizzaher od ('no longer knows how to be warned') — he has become un-teachable.
14. The narrative illustration: a prisoner rises to the throne. The phrase bet ha-asurim ('the house of prisoners, the prison') suggests the youth's rise was from the lowest social position. The born-poor detail (nolad rash, 'born destitute') underscores that his success owed nothing to privilege. The story's point is that even this remarkable ascent is about to be declared vapor.
15. The phrase ha-yeled ha-sheni ('the second youth') introduces a successor — the cycle continues. The crowd follows the new leader. The verb ya'amod tachtav ('who will stand in his place') is the language of political succession.
16. The final verdict: even the wise youth who rose from prison to the throne will be forgotten by the next generation. The acharonim ('those who come later') will not rejoice in him — his fame is temporary. Political power, like everything else under the sun, is vapor. The observation echoes 1:11: no one is remembered for long.

Summary: The chapter opens with a rare direct instruction on how to approach God: guard your steps when you go to the house of God, let your words be few, and fulfill your vows. Qohelet then turns to the familiar theme of oppression, noting the bureaucratic chain of exploitation where official watches over official. The second half addresses the futility of wealth: the one who loves money is never satisfied, the rich man's sleep is disturbed, and a devastating misfortune can wipe out everything, leaving a man naked as the day he was born. The chapter closes with the fourth enjoyment passage: to eat, drink, and find satisfaction in one's toil during the few days God gives is itself God's gift.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening verses (1-7) are the only sustained passage in Ecclesiastes that sounds like conventional religious instruction. Qohelet, who elsewhere questions everything, here speaks with uncharacteristic directness about reverence before God. The shift is striking: the skeptic becomes the preacher. But even here, the counsel is rooted in Qohelet's characteristic realism — God is in heaven and you are on earth, so keep your words few. The distance between God and humanity is not a theological problem to solve but a fact to respect. The poverty-at-death image (vv. 15-16) — arriving naked and departing naked, carrying nothing — will echo through centuries of literature and be directly quoted in Job 1:21 (which may be the older text that Qohelet draws from).

Translation Friction: The Hebrew versification of chapter 5 differs from the English. What is 5:1 in Hebrew is 4:17 in many English versions, shifting the entire chapter by one verse. We follow the Hebrew versification throughout. The phrase 'do not let your mouth cause your flesh to sin' (v. 5) is textually difficult — 'flesh' (basar) here likely means 'body' or 'self' rather than 'physical flesh,' and the 'messenger' (mal'akh) before whom one speaks may be a priest, a temple official, or an angelic being. The ambiguity is preserved in the rendering.

Connections: The vow-keeping instruction echoes Deuteronomy 23:21-23 ('when you make a vow to the LORD your God, do not delay fulfilling it'). The 'God is in heaven, you are on earth' theology connects to Isaiah 55:8-9 ('my thoughts are not your thoughts'). The naked-at-birth/naked-at-death image parallels Job 1:21 ('naked I came from my mother's womb, and naked I will return'). The enjoyment passage (vv. 18-20) is the most developed so far and introduces the idea that God keeps a person occupied with the joy of his heart.

¹Do not be hasty with your mouth, and do not let your heart rush to bring a word before God. For God is in heaven and you are on earth — therefore let your words be few. ²For dreams come with many cares, and a fool's voice with many words. ³When you make a vow to God, do not delay fulfilling it, for he takes no pleasure in fools. Fulfill what you vow. ⁴Better not to vow at all than to vow and not fulfill it. ⁵Do not let your mouth lead your body into sin, and do not say before the messenger, 'It was a mistake.' Why should God be angry at your words and destroy the work of your hands? ⁶For in many dreams and many words there is much vapor. Rather, fear God. ⁷If you see oppression of the poor and the denial of justice and righteousness in a province, do not be astonished at the matter. For one official is watched by a higher one, and there are still higher ones over them. ⁸But the advantage of land is for everyone — even a king is served by the field. ⁹The one who loves money will never be satisfied with money, and the one who loves wealth will never be satisfied with income. This too is vapor. ¹⁰When goods increase, so do those who consume them. What benefit do their owners have except to look at them? ¹¹The sleep of the worker is sweet, whether he eats little or much; but the abundance of the rich will not let him sleep. ¹²There is a sickening evil I have seen under the sun: wealth hoarded by its owner to his own harm. ¹³That wealth was lost in a bad venture, and though he fathered a son, he has nothing in his hand. ¹⁴As he came from his mother's womb, so he will go again — naked as he arrived. He will carry nothing from his toil that he can take in his hand. ¹⁵This too is a sickening evil: exactly as he came, so he will go. What lasting gain is there for one who toils for the wind? ¹⁶Moreover, all his days he eats in darkness with much vexation, sickness, and anger. ¹⁷Here is what I have seen to be good and fitting: to eat and drink and experience good in all the toil at which one works under the sun during the few days of life God has given him — for this is his portion. ¹⁸Moreover, everyone to whom God has given wealth and possessions and the ability to enjoy them, to accept his portion and find joy in his toil — this is a gift of God. ¹⁹For he will not dwell much on the days of his life, because God keeps him occupied with the joy of his heart.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb bahel ('to be hasty, to be alarmed') suggests reckless speech born of anxiety rather than reverence. The instruction addresses prayer and temple worship — the 'house of God' context from the Hebrew 4:17 (English 5:1 in some versions) carries over. The contrast between heaven and earth is cosmological but also relational: it defines the posture of the worshiper.
2. The proverb links two parallel phenomena: excessive cares produce disordered dreams, and excessive words mark the fool. The comparison implies that many words before God are as disjointed and useless as anxiety dreams — sound without substance.
3. The vow instruction echoes Deuteronomy 23:21-23 almost verbatim. The characterization of the vow-breaker as a kesil ('fool') places this in wisdom's moral framework: failing to keep a vow is not just wrong, it is foolish — it misreads the character of God.
4. The 'better than' proverb applies Qohelet's realism to religious practice: do not make promises to God that you cannot keep. The absence of a vow is preferable to a broken one. This is not discouraging vows but insisting on integrity in making them.
5. The mal'akh ('messenger') is likely a temple priest who collects vow offerings (Malachi 2:7 calls the priest a 'messenger of the LORD'). The excuse shegagah hi ('it was an inadvertent error') is the technical term for unintentional sin (Leviticus 4:2; Numbers 15:25). Qohelet warns against misusing this category to escape a deliberate vow.
6. The section closes with a terse command: et ha-Elohim yera ('fear God'). After all the warnings about hasty speech, unfulfilled vows, and many words, the summary is stark: reverence. The havalim ('vapors, futilities') associated with excessive dreaming and speaking are swept aside by the single imperative.
7. The word gavo'ah me-al gavo'ah ('high one above high one') describes a bureaucratic hierarchy of exploitation. Each official takes his cut and passes the responsibility upward. The instruction 'do not be astonished' (al titmah) is not a counsel of indifference but of realism — this is how power structures work. The chain of exploitation explains why reform is so difficult: the corruption is systemic.
8. This cryptic verse seems to assert that agricultural land is the one form of wealth that benefits all levels of society. Even the king depends on the field (sadeh) for food. The point may be that despite all the bureaucratic exploitation described in verse 7, the basic economy of the earth still functions and feeds everyone.

9. The proverb diagnoses the paradox of wealth: loving money (kessef) guarantees that money will never be enough. The verb ysisba ('be satisfied, be sated') is the same word used for eating one's fill — the money-lover's hunger is insatiable. The parallel 'loves abundance / no income satisfies' reinforces the point: desire outpaces acquisition.
10. Wealth attracts dependents. As goods (tovah, 'good things') increase, the number of mouths increases proportionally. The owner's only exclusive benefit is re'ut einav ('the sight of his eyes') — he can look at his wealth even if he cannot consume it all himself. The kishron ('advantage, benefit') is purely visual.
11. A vivid contrast. The oved ('laborer, worker') sleeps sweetly because his body is tired and his mind is untroubled. The ashir ('rich man') lies awake because ha-sava ('the fullness, the abundance') generates anxiety — worry about loss, management, and protection. Wealth produces insomnia. This is one of Qohelet's sharpest social observations.
12. The phrase ra'ah cholah ('a sickening evil, a grievous ill') is stronger than the usual hevel verdict. The wealth that was supposed to protect becomes the very thing that harms. The word shamur ('guarded, hoarded, kept') suggests not just saving but clutching — the owner holds on and is destroyed by what he holds.
13. The inyan ra ('bad venture, evil occupation') that destroys the wealth may be a failed investment, a lawsuit, or a disaster. The result is that the son — the heir who was supposed to benefit — receives nothing. The phrase ein be-yado me'umah ('there is nothing at all in his hand') is total destitution.
14. The naked-at-birth/naked-at-death principle. The word arom ('naked, bare') marks both entrance and exit. The parallel with Job 1:21 is exact — whether Qohelet quotes Job or both draw from a common proverb, the point is identical: ownership is temporary. The phrase she-yolekh be-yado ('that he can carry in his hand') is poignantly physical — the hand that grasped and held and accumulated will be empty.
15. The 'sickening evil' verdict returns. The symmetry of coming and going (kol ummat she-ba ken yelekh, 'exactly as he came, so he goes') means no net change. The final question echoes 1:3 and uses the wind image: toiling for the wind is the same as chasing it — you end with nothing in your hands.
16. Eating in darkness (ba-choshekh yokhel) may be literal — too miserly to light a lamp — or metaphorical, suggesting a life shrouded in gloom. The three companions of his meals are ka'as ('vexation'), cholyo ('his sickness'), and qatsef ('fury, anger'). Wealth has produced not comfort but bitterness.
17. The fourth enjoyment passage. The word yafeh ('fitting, beautiful, appropriate') elevates eating and drinking from mere survival to something aesthetically right — this is how life should be lived. The phrase mispar yeme chayyav ('the few days of his life') reminds the reader that the window for enjoyment is small, which makes receiving it all the more urgent.
18. The key distinction: God gives both the wealth and the ability to enjoy it. Having wealth without the ability to enjoy it (which will be the subject of 6:1-2) is a curse. The word hishlito ('enabled him, empowered him, gave him dominion') means enjoyment itself requires divine enablement — it is not automatic.
19. The remarkable closing image: the person who receives God's gift of enjoyment does not brood over the brevity of life. The verb ma'aneh ('keeps occupied, responds, answers') suggests that God fills the person's heart with simchah ('joy') so that the transience of life does not become a source of despair. Joy is God's answer to the problem of vapor.

Summary: Chapter 6 is the darkest meditation on wealth in the book. Qohelet describes a man to whom God gives riches, possessions, and honor — everything he could desire — but God does not enable him to enjoy them. A stranger consumes them instead. This is vapor and a grievous affliction. Qohelet then pushes the thought to its extreme: even if a man fathers a hundred children and lives for two thousand years, if he has not experienced good, the stillborn child is better off. The chapter closes with a series of rhetorical questions about human limitation: who knows what is good, who can tell what will happen, and what advantage does the wise person have?

*What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the mirror image of 5:18-19. There, God gave both wealth and the ability to enjoy it; here, God gives wealth but withholds the ability to enjoy. The two passages together form one of Ecclesiastes' most disturbing theological claims: enjoyment is not a human achievement but a divine gift, and God sometimes withholds it without explanation. The man in verse 2 lacks nothing material, yet he cannot eat — the Hebrew lo yashlitennu ha-Elohim le-ekhol ('God does not enable him to eat') places the responsibility squarely on God. Qohelet does not explain why God would do this; he simply reports it. The stillborn comparison (vv. 3-5) is the most extreme version of the 'better not to be born' logic from 4:3.*

Translation Friction: The claim that God gives wealth but withholds enjoyment raises acute theodicy questions. Qohelet does not resolve them. He does not say the man sinned, and he does not say God is unjust — he says it is hevel and choliy ra ('a grievous affliction'). The theological tension is left raw. Additionally, the comparison between a man with a hundred children and a stillborn pushes against the Hebrew Bible's overwhelming valuation of descendants (Genesis 12:2; Psalm 127:3-5). For Qohelet, offspring without enjoyment count for nothing.

Connections: The 'God does not enable him to enjoy' language inverts Deuteronomy's blessings-for-obedience framework (Deuteronomy 28:1-14), where God rewards faithfulness with material abundance and the enjoyment of it. Qohelet observes a world where the connection between obedience and enjoyment has broken. The stillborn image connects to Job 3:16 ('like a hidden stillborn, I would not exist'). The closing questions about human ignorance echo 3:11 ('no one can discover what God has done from beginning to end').

¹There is an evil I have seen under the sun, and it weighs heavily on humanity: ²A man to whom God gives wealth, possessions, and honor, so that he lacks nothing his appetite desires — yet God does not enable him to enjoy any of it, and a stranger consumes it instead. This is vapor and a grievous affliction. ³If a man fathers a hundred children and lives many years — however many the days of his years may be — but his appetite is not satisfied with good things, and he does not even receive a proper burial, I say the stillborn child is better off than he. ⁴For the stillborn arrives in vapor and departs in darkness, and its name is covered in darkness. ⁵It has never seen the sun or known anything, yet it has more rest than that man. ⁶Even if he lived a thousand years twice over but never experienced good — do not all go to the same place? ⁷All of a person's toil is for his mouth, yet his appetite is never filled. ⁸For what advantage does the wise person have over the fool? What advantage does the poor person have who knows how to conduct himself before the living? ⁹Better what the eyes can see than the wandering of desire. This too is vapor and chasing after wind. ¹⁰Whatever exists has already been named, and what a human being is has been determined. He cannot contend with the one who is stronger than he. ¹¹For the more words there are, the more vapor there is. What advantage is that to a person? ¹²For who knows what is good for a person during the few days of his vaporous life, which he passes through like a shadow? Who can tell anyone what will happen after him under the sun?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase rabbah hi al ha-adam ('it is great/heavy upon the human') indicates this is not a rare case but a widespread burden. Qohelet introduces a case study that reverses the positive enjoyment teaching of 5:18-19.
2. The theological weight of this verse falls on God as the agent who both gives and withholds. Qohelet offers no explanation for why God would give wealth but block enjoyment. The choliy ra ('evil sickness, grievous disease') language treats this condition as a kind of pathology — it is not just unfortunate, it is affliction.
3. The hyperbole (a hundred children, many years) emphasizes that quantity of life and descendants cannot compensate for the absence of satisfaction (lo tisba min ha-tovah, 'his appetite is not filled with good'). The added detail of no burial (qevurah lo haytah lo) is the final indignity — in Israelite culture, lack of proper burial was a curse (Jeremiah 22:19). The nefel ('stillborn, miscarriage') is declared tov mimmennu ('better than he').
4. The stillborn's existence is characterized by hevel ('vapor') and choshekh ('darkness'). It comes and goes without light, without name, without memory. Yet even this shadowed non-existence is preferable to a long life without satisfaction.
5. The word nachat ('rest, tranquility') is the key comparison. The stillborn, though it never saw the sun (shemesh) and never knew (yada) anything, possesses what the wealthy, long-lived, unsatisfied man does not: rest. The absence of experience is, in this case, an advantage over the presence of unrelieved frustration.
6. The hypothetical extends to absurd longevity: two thousand years. Even at that scale, life without tova ('good, goodness, enjoyment') is worthless. The rhetorical question ('do not all go to the same place?') refers to death and echoes 3:20 — all return to dust. Length of life cannot solve the problem of quality of life.
7. The observation is biological and metaphorical at once: all work exists to feed the mouth (le-fihu), yet the nefesh ('appetite, soul, desire') is never satisfied (lo timmale, 'is not filled'). The gap between effort (amal) and satisfaction (male) is permanent. Toil feeds the body but cannot satisfy the deeper hunger.
8. Two rhetorical questions, both expecting the answer 'none — at least with respect to satisfying the appetite.' The phrase yodea la-halokh neged ha-chayyim ('knows how to walk before the living') describes the poor person with social skill — even he, despite knowing how to navigate society, gains no advantage in the struggle against insatiable desire.

9. The proverb counsels contentment with what is present (mar'eh einayim, 'the sight of the eyes' — what you can actually see) rather than the restless roaming of appetite (halokh nefesh, 'the walking of the soul/desire'). But even this contentment is declared hevel — Qohelet cannot let even good advice escape the vapor verdict.
10. The 'already named' (kevar niqra shemo) echoes the creation narrative where God names things into existence (Genesis 1) and Adam names the animals (Genesis 2:19-20). What a person is (adam) has been determined — the boundaries are fixed. The 'one stronger' (she-taqqif mimmennu) is God. Humans cannot argue their way out of their limitations.
11. The word devarim means both 'words' and 'things.' The ambiguity is likely intentional: both excessive speech and excessive activity produce more hevel without producing more benefit. The question 'what advantage to a person?' (mah yoter la-adam) echoes the yitron question from 1:3 once more.
12. The chapter closes with two questions that define the limits of human knowledge. The first — 'who knows what is good?' — challenges the assumption that we can identify our own best interest. The second — 'who can tell what will happen after?' — challenges the assumption that we can plan for the future. The phrase yeme chayyei hevlo ('the days of his vaporous life') makes hevel a modifier of life itself — life is vapor-like in its duration and substance. The shadow comparison (ka-tsel, 'like a shadow') adds a second image of insubstantiality.

Summary: Chapter 7 is Qohelet's densest collection of proverbs, many of which sound like standard wisdom but are subtly subverted by their context. It opens with a series of 'better than' proverbs — a good name is better than fine oil, the day of death better than the day of birth, sorrow better than laughter. Qohelet then warns against nostalgia, anger, and the extremes of both righteousness and wickedness. The chapter's most controversial section comes in verses 23-29, where Qohelet reports his search for wisdom and his failure to find it, along with a troubling statement about finding something 'more bitter than death' — a woman whose heart is snares and nets.

What Makes This Remarkable: The 'better than' proverbs in the opening verses systematically invert conventional expectations. A funeral is better than a feast. The end is better than the beginning. Sorrow is better than laughter. These are not nihilistic provocations but the fruit of Qohelet's investigation: knowing that life is vapor, the person who contemplates death honestly lives more wisely than the one who avoids the thought. The strangest passage is verse 16-17, where Qohelet warns against being excessively righteous or excessively wise, and equally against being excessively wicked. This 'golden mean' counsel is unique in the Hebrew Bible and has generated enormous debate — is Qohelet advising moral mediocrity? More likely, he is warning against the self-destructive forms of both piety (scrupulosity, spiritual burnout) and wickedness (reckless self-destruction).

Translation Friction: Verses 26-28 present the most difficult passage in Ecclesiastes for modern readers. Qohelet says he found 'one man among a thousand' but 'not one woman among all these.' The Hebrew is ambiguous and has been read in wildly different ways: as misogyny, as a comment on the specific women in Solomon's court, as a statement about the personified 'Woman Folly' of Proverbs 1-9, or as an acknowledgment of social structures that prevented women from receiving wisdom education. We render the text faithfully and address the complexity in the notes without either endorsing or sanitizing the statement.

Connections: The opening proverbs echo the form and style of Proverbs 10-31 but subvert their optimism. The 'don't say the former days were better' warning (v. 10) anticipates nostalgia as a perennial human temptation. The 'one man among a thousand' echoes Job 33:23 (an angel, 'one among a thousand'). The closing observation that 'God made humanity upright, but they have sought out many schemes' (v. 29) echoes Genesis 1-3, where God created humans good but they chose deviation.

¹A good name is better than fine perfume, and the day of death better than the day of birth.

²Better to go to a house of mourning than to go to a house of feasting, for that is the end of every person,
and the living should take it to heart.

³Sorrow is better than laughter,
for a grieving face is good for the heart.

⁴The wise heart dwells in the house of mourning, but the heart of fools is in the house of pleasure.

⁵Better to hear the rebuke of a wise person than to listen to the song of fools.

⁶For like the crackling of thorns under a pot,
so is the laughter of the fool.
This too is vapor.

⁷For oppression can drive a wise person mad, and a bribe corrupts the heart.

⁸Better the end of a matter than its beginning;
better patience of spirit than pride of spirit.

⁹Do not be quick in your spirit to become angry, for anger settles in the lap of fools.

¹⁰Do not say, 'Why were the former days better than these?' For it is not from wisdom that you ask this. ¹¹Wisdom is good with an inheritance, and an advantage for those who see the sun. ¹²For the protection of wisdom is like the protection of money, but the advantage of knowledge is this: wisdom preserves the life of its possessor. ¹³Consider the work of God: who can straighten what he has made crooked? ¹⁴On a good day, enjoy the good. On a bad day, reflect. God has made the one alongside the other so that no one can discover anything about what lies ahead. ¹⁵I have seen everything in my vaporous days: a righteous person perishing despite his righteousness, and a wicked person living long despite his wickedness. ¹⁶Do not be excessively righteous, and do not make yourself overly wise — why should you destroy yourself? ¹⁷Do not be excessively wicked, and do not be a fool — why should you die before your time? ¹⁸It is good to grasp the one without letting go of the other, for the person who fears God will navigate both. ¹⁹Wisdom strengthens the wise person more than ten rulers in a city. ²⁰For there is no one on earth so righteous that he always does good and never misses the mark. ²¹Also, do not pay attention to everything people say, or you may hear your servant cursing you. ²²For your own heart knows that you too have often cursed others. ²³All this I tested by wisdom. I said, 'I will be wise,' but it was far from me. ²⁴What exists is far off and deep — very deep. Who can find it? ²⁵I turned — my mind and I — to understand, to investigate, and to seek wisdom and an explanation, and to understand that wickedness is folly and that foolishness is madness. ²⁶And I found something more bitter than death: the woman whose heart is snares and nets, whose hands are chains. The one who pleases God will escape her, but the one who misses the mark will be captured by her. ²⁷Look, this is what I found, says Qohelet, adding one thing to another to reach a conclusion: ²⁸What my soul has sought continually I have not found. One man among a thousand I found, but a woman among all these I did not find. ²⁹This alone I have found: God made human beings upright, but they have pursued many schemes.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The wordplay shem/shemen ('name/oil') is untranslatable but drives the first line. The second line shocks: the day of death (yom ha-mavet) is better than the day of birth (yom hivvaldo). This is not death-worship but a claim about completed reputation — at death, a life's meaning is sealed. At birth, everything is uncertain.
2. The bet evel ('house of mourning') confronts the visitor with mortality. The bet mishteh ('house of feasting') distracts from it. Qohelet's counsel is to choose the confrontation: sof kol ha-adam ('the end of every human') is a fact that the living (ha-chay) must internalize (yitten el libbo, 'place in his heart').

3. The word ka'as ('sorrow, vexation, grief') is the same word used negatively in 1:18. Here it functions positively: the grief that comes from facing reality honestly improves (yitav) the heart. The paradox is deliberate — what feels bad produces what is good.
4. The classification is sharp: where your heart gravitates reveals what you are. The wise are drawn to the place that teaches (the funeral), and fools to the place that entertains (the party). The word simchah ('joy, pleasure, mirth') is used positively elsewhere in Ecclesiastes, but here it describes the fool's preference for distraction.
5. The contrast between ga'arat chakham ('the rebuke of the wise') and shir kesilim ('the song of fools') sets painful truth against pleasant noise. The rebuke stings but teaches; the song entertains but teaches nothing.
6. The simile is both acoustic and substantive: thorns (sirim) burn hot and fast under a pot (sir) — the wordplay sirim/sir is intentional — producing noise and light but no lasting heat. The fool's laughter is the same: loud, bright, and gone in a moment.
7. Two threats to wisdom: osheq ('oppression, extortion') can make even a wise person holelel ('mad, senseless'), and a mattanah ('gift, bribe') can destroy (ye'abbed) the lev ('heart, mind'). Wisdom is not invulnerable — it can be broken by external pressure and corrupted by money.
8. Two 'better than' proverbs in a single verse. The first (acharit davar / reshito) values completion over initiation. The second (erekh ruach / govah ruach) values patience ('long spirit') over arrogance ('high spirit'). Both counsel endurance over impulse.
9. The verb bahel ('to be hasty') echoes 5:1. Quick anger (ka'as) finds a permanent home (yanuach, 'rests, settles') in the cheiq ('bosom, lap') of fools. The image is almost domestic: anger curls up in the fool's lap like a pet and stays.
10. Qohelet dismisses nostalgia as unwise (lo me-chokmah). The assumption that the past was superior to the present is not based on evidence but on selective memory. This connects to 1:11 — we do not remember the past accurately, so we idealize it.
11. Wisdom paired with nachalah ('inheritance, property') is the ideal combination — understanding plus resources. The phrase ro'e ha-shemesh ('those who see the sun') means 'the living' and echoes the 'under the sun' framework.
12. The word tsel ('shadow, shade, protection') applies equally to wisdom and money — both shelter a person. But wisdom has a yitron ('advantage') that money lacks: it techayeh ('gives life to, preserves the life of') its owner. This is the one context where Qohelet uses yitron positively.
13. The verse echoes 1:15 ('what is crooked cannot be straightened') but now identifies God as the one who made it crooked. This is a claim about divine sovereignty, not divine caprice — God has built certain frustrations into reality, and human beings cannot undo them.
14. The practical counsel: enjoy good days while they last and use bad days for reflection. The theological claim is that God made both (gam et zeh le-ummat zeh, 'this one opposite that one') deliberately, so that humans cannot predict the future (lo yimtsa ha-adam acharav me'umah, 'a person cannot find out anything about what comes after').
15. The observation flatly contradicts the retribution theology of Deuteronomy and Proverbs, where righteousness leads to long life and wickedness to destruction. Qohelet reports the opposite: the tsaddiq ('righteous one') perishes be-tsido ('in his righteousness') and the rasha ('wicked one') lives long be-ra'ato ('in his wickedness'). The phrase bime hevli ('in my vaporous days') makes his own life the laboratory.
16. The most controversial verse in Ecclesiastes. The warning against excessive righteousness (al tehi tsaddiq harbeh) does not endorse moral mediocrity. It warns against the self-destructive form of piety — legalistic scrupulosity, spiritual perfectionism, or the kind of rigid righteousness that breaks under the weight of an unjust world. The parallel warning against excessive wisdom reinforces this: both righteousness and wisdom, taken to extremes, can destroy (tishshomem, 'be desolated, be appalled, be destroyed') the one who pursues them.
17. The matching warning against excessive wickedness and foolishness. The phrase tamut be-lo ittekha ('die not in your time, die prematurely') suggests that reckless wickedness shortens life. Together with verse 16, the counsel is: neither rigid piety nor reckless wickedness — both paths lead to destruction.
18. The 'both/and' counsel: hold both warnings together. The phrase yere Elohim ('the one who fears God') introduces the only reliable guide through the tension — reverence for God enables a person to navigate between the extremes of rigid righteousness and reckless wickedness. The verb yetse et kullam ('will come out of/with all of them') means 'will navigate through, will emerge from all situations.'
19. The proverb affirms wisdom's practical power: it provides more protection (ta'oz, 'gives strength to') than ten shallitim ('rulers, officials, powerful men'). Even after all the qualifications of wisdom in this chapter, Qohelet still affirms its practical superiority.
20. A universal anthropological statement: no adam ('human being') is a tsaddiq ('righteous person') who only does good and never sins (yecheta, 'misses the mark'). This grounds the warning of verse 16 — since no one is perfectly righteous, claiming excessive righteousness is self-deception.
21. Practical wisdom: eavesdropping on every conversation will inevitably lead to hearing painful things. The servant cursing his master is a specific and humiliating example chosen for maximum impact.
22. The appeal to self-knowledge: your lev ('heart, mind') knows (yada) that you have done the same thing. The honesty is bracing — before being offended by your servant's words, remember your own.
23. The autobiographical report resumes. Qohelet tested (nissiti, 'tried, tested') everything by wisdom but found wisdom itself rechoqah ('distant, far away'). The irony is sharp: the tool of investigation eludes the investigator.

- 24. The doubled amog amog ('deep, deep') is a superlative — reality is unfathomably deep. The question mi yimtsa'ennu ('who can find it?') expects the answer: no one. The limits of wisdom are not just practical but ontological — reality itself is beyond reach.
- 25. The word cheshbon ('explanation, reckoning, accounting, scheme') is a key term that will return in verse 27 and 29. Qohelet seeks not just wisdom but the cheshbon — the underlying logic or calculus of how things work. The pairing of resha/kesel ('wickedness/folly') and sikhlut/holelot ('foolishness/madness') treats moral and intellectual failure as parallel.
- 26. This verse has been read in multiple ways. The 'woman' may refer to a specific seductress (a particular woman at court), to 'Woman Folly' personified in Proverbs 7 and 9:13-18, or to folly itself metaphorically figured as female. The imagery — metsodim ('hunting nets'), charamim ('fishing nets'), asurim ('bonds, chains') — is the language of entrapment, not of women in general. The tov lifne ha-Elohim ('the one good before God') escapes; the choteh ('one who misses the mark') is caught. The moral framework suggests this is about a specific type of dangerous entanglement rather than a blanket statement about women.
- 27. The phrase achat le-achat ('one to one') describes a methodical process of accumulating observations. The word cheshbon ('conclusion, reckoning, sum') is the result of the calculation. The feminine form amarah qohelet ('said Qohelet') is unusual and may reflect the feminine grammatical form of the title qohelet.
- 28. The most debated verse in Ecclesiastes. The 'one man among a thousand' may echo Job 33:23, where an angelic mediator is 'one among a thousand.' If Qohelet is saying he found one genuinely wise person among a thousand men and none among women, the statement reflects the social reality that women in the ancient Near East were largely excluded from wisdom schools and philosophical education — it says more about access than about capacity. Alternatively, the verse may continue the allegory of verse 26: the 'woman' is personified Folly, and no manifestation of her has led to wisdom. Both readings have ancient support.
- 29. The chapter's conclusion is a creation-and-fall summary. God made ha-adam ('the human being, humanity') yashar ('straight, upright'), but hemmah ('they') sought out chishbonot rabbim ('many calculations, many schemes, many inventions'). The word chishbonot is the plural of cheshbon from verses 25 and 27 — the very accounting Qohelet has been pursuing is part of humanity's deviation from original simplicity. The irony is self-aware: the search for understanding is itself evidence of the fall from uprightness.

Summary: Chapter 8 navigates the treacherous world of royal courts and divine justice. Qohelet opens with advice on surviving under authoritarian power: obey the king, do not rush from his presence, and remember that he has the power to do as he pleases. From political power, the chapter moves to a meditation on death as the one power no human can control — no one has authority over the day of death, and no one is discharged from that war. Qohelet then confronts the failure of retribution theology: the wicked receive the reward of the righteous, and the righteous receive the fate of the wicked. Despite this, the chapter delivers another enjoyment commendation and closes with a humble acknowledgment that no one can discover what God is doing under the sun.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains the starkest statement of moral inversion in the book: 'there are righteous people who receive what the wicked deserve, and wicked people who receive what the righteous deserve' (v. 14). This is not theoretical — Qohelet says yesh ('there exists, there are'), indicating observed reality. The enjoyment passage (v. 15) follows immediately after this moral chaos, which makes it something other than naive optimism. It is counsel given in full knowledge of the world's injustice: precisely because the moral order is unreliable, present joy should not be refused.

Translation Friction: Verses 12-13 appear to affirm traditional retribution theology ('it will be well with those who fear God...it will not be well with the wicked'), but verse 14 immediately undermines this with observed counterexamples. Whether verses 12-13 represent Qohelet quoting and then critiquing conventional wisdom, or genuinely affirming it before qualifying it, is debated. The tension may be intentional — Qohelet holds both the theological ideal and the empirical reality without resolving the contradiction.

Connections: The king-and-court section connects to Proverbs 16:14-15; 19:12; 25:1-7, which also offer survival wisdom for courtiers. The 'no authority over the day of death' passage echoes Psalm 49:7-9 ('no one can redeem the life of another'). The moral inversion observation connects to the broader ancient Near Eastern theodicy tradition, especially the Babylonian Theodicy and Ludlul bel nemeqi ('I Will Praise the Lord of Wisdom'). The enjoyment passage (v. 15) is the fifth of seven.

¹Who is like the wise person? Who knows the interpretation of a matter? A person's wisdom makes his face shine, and the hardness of his face is transformed. ²I say: obey the king's command, especially because of the oath sworn before God. ³Do not rush from his presence, and do not persist in a bad cause, for he does whatever he pleases. ⁴Since a king's word has authority, who can say to him, 'What are you doing?' ⁵The one who keeps the command will encounter no harm, and the wise heart knows the right time and the right procedure. ⁶For there is a time and a procedure for every matter, though the burden of trouble weighs heavily on a person. ⁷Since no one knows what will happen, who can tell him when it will occur? ⁸No one has power over the wind to contain the wind, and no one has authority over the day of death. There is no discharge in that war, and wickedness will not save those who practice it. ⁹All this I have seen while applying my mind to everything done under the sun — a time when one person has power over another to his harm. ¹⁰I also saw the wicked buried — they used to go in and out of the holy place and were praised in the very city where they had acted wickedly. This too is vapor. ¹¹Because the sentence against an evil deed is not carried out swiftly, the hearts of human beings are emboldened to do wrong. ¹²Though a sinner does wrong a hundred times and still lives long, yet I also know that it will go well with those who fear God, who are reverent before him. ¹³But it will not go well with the wicked, and he will not prolong his days, which pass like a shadow, because he does not fear God. ¹⁴There is a vapor that occurs on earth: there are righteous people who receive what the wicked deserve, and there are wicked people who receive what the righteous deserve. I said that this too is vapor. ¹⁵So I commend joy, because there is nothing better for a person under the sun than to eat and drink and be glad. This will accompany him in his toil through the days of his life that God gives him under the sun. ¹⁶When I set my mind to know wisdom and to observe the business that is done on earth — for neither day nor night do one's eyes see sleep — ¹⁷I saw all that God has done: no one can discover what is happening under the sun. However much a person toils to seek it out, he will not find it. Even if the wise person claims to know, he cannot find it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word peshet ('interpretation, solution') is a Persian/Aramaic loanword found elsewhere only in Daniel. Its presence here is another marker of the book's late date. Wisdom's effect on the face is both metaphorical and observable: understanding transforms a hard expression (oz panav, 'strength/hardness of his face') into one of illumination.
2. The phrase shevua' Elohim ('the oath of God') likely refers to a loyalty oath sworn by subjects to the king. Qohelet's counsel is not blind obedience but recognizes that oath-breaking before God has consequences (see 5:3-5). The political context is a court where disobedience can be fatal.
3. Two pieces of court survival advice: do not leave the king's presence in haste (it signals guilt or disloyalty), and do not stubbornly pursue a matter that displeases him. The reason — kol asher yachpots ya'aseh ('he does whatever he desires') — is a statement of raw power, not endorsement.
4. The word shilton ('authority, power, dominion') is another Aramaic loanword. The rhetorical question ('who can say to him?') echoes the language used of God in Job 9:12 and Daniel 4:35 — Qohelet draws a parallel between royal and divine power, both of which operate beyond human challenge.
5. The mitsvah ('command') here is the king's command, not God's commandments. The wise courtier knows et u-mishpat ('time and procedure') — when to act and how to act. This is practical court wisdom: timing is everything.
