Introduction

The Covenant Rendering is a fresh English translation of the Bible produced directly from the Hebrew and Greek source texts. It aims to bring the meaning, weight, and texture of the original languages into clear, modern English without sacrificing the literary power of the ancient texts. Where older translations sometimes obscure meaning behind archaic phrasing, and where modern paraphrases sometimes flatten the richness of the original, this rendering seeks the middle ground: faithful to the source, readable in English, and honest about the choices a translator must make.

Every translation is an interpretation. The Covenant Rendering does not pretend otherwise. Where a Hebrew or Greek word carries a range of meaning that no single English word can capture, the translator notes explain what was chosen and why. Where the ancient text is genuinely ambiguous, the ambiguity is preserved rather than silently resolved. The goal is not to replace other translations but to offer a rendering that takes the reader as close to the original as English allows, then trusts them to think.

This is the Reading Layer: clean English text with verse numbers, chapter preambles for context, and translator notes for those who want to go deeper. The Hebrew, Greek, and comparative apparatus exist in the full digital edition. Here, the text breathes on its own.

Genesis

Summary: God creates the heavens and the earth in six days, moving from formlessness to fullness. Light, sky, land, vegetation, luminaries, sea creatures, land animals, and finally humanity — male and female, made in God's image — are brought into being by divine speech.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter's architecture is itself theological: days 1-3 form the realms (light, sky/sea, land) that days 4-6 fill with rulers (luminaries, birds/fish, animals/humanity). The verb bara ('to create') appears exclusively with God as subject in the Hebrew Bible — no human ever bara. The plural 'Let us make' in verse 26 has generated centuries of interpretation. The sevenfold 'and God saw that it was good' culminates in the superlative tov meod ('very good') at creation's completion.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew ruach Elohim (v. 2) resists a clean English rendering because ruach simultaneously means 'spirit,' 'wind,' and 'breath,' while Elohim can function as 'God' or as an intensifying adjective ('mighty'). We retained the traditional 'Spirit of God' but noted the ambiguity. The rhyming pair tohu vavohu ('formless and empty') loses its phonetic force in English. We rendered raqia as 'expanse' rather than 'firmament' since the KJV term now misleads modern readers.

Connections: The 'formless and empty' state of verse 2 recurs in Jeremiah 4:23 as a vision of un-creation. The blessing of fruitfulness (1:28) will be renewed to Noah (9:1) and echoed in the patriarchal promises. The image of God (1:26-27) becomes the theological foundation for the sanctity of human life in Genesis 9:6 and is developed in Psalm 8.

¹At the very start, God created the heavens and the earth. ²Now the earth was formless and empty, and darkness was over the surface of the deep, and the Spirit of God was hovering over the surface of the waters. ³Then God said, "Let there be light," and there was light. ⁴God saw that the light was good, and God separated the light from the darkness. ⁵God called the light "day," and the darkness he called "night." And there was evening and there was morning—the first day. ⁶Then God said, "Let there be an expanse in the midst of the waters, and let it separate the waters from the waters." ⁷So God made the expanse and separated the waters that were below the expanse from the waters that were above the expanse. And it was so. ⁸God called the expanse "sky." And there was evening and there was morning—the second day. ⁹Then God said, "Let the waters below the sky be gathered into one place, and let the dry land appear." And it was so. ¹⁰God called the dry land

"earth," and the gathering of the waters he called "seas." And God saw that it was good. ¹¹Then God said, "Let the earth sprout vegetation—seed-bearing plants and fruit trees bearing fruit according to their kinds, with their seed in them, on the earth." And it was so. ¹²The earth brought forth vegetation—seed-bearing plants according to their kinds, and trees bearing fruit with their seed in them, according to their kinds. And God saw that it was good. ¹³And there was evening and there was morning—the third day. ¹⁴Then God said, "Let there be lights in the expanse of the sky to separate the day from the night, and let them serve as signs for appointed times, for days, and for years. ¹⁵And let them be lights in the expanse of the sky to give light on the earth." And it was so. ¹⁶God made the two great lights—the greater light to govern the day and the lesser light to govern the night—and the stars. ¹⁷God set them in the expanse of the sky to give light on the earth, ¹⁸to govern the day and the night, and to separate the light from the darkness. And God saw that it was good. ¹⁹And there was evening and there was morning—the fourth day. ²⁰Then God said, "Let the waters swarm with living creatures, and let birds fly above the earth across the face of the expanse of the sky." ²¹So God created the great sea creatures and every living thing that moves, with which the waters swarmed, according to their kinds, and every winged bird according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. ²²God blessed them, saying, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the waters in the seas, and let the birds multiply on the earth." ²³And there was evening and there was morning—the fifth day. ²⁴Then God said, "Let the earth bring forth living creatures according to their kinds—livestock, crawling things, and wild animals of the earth according to their kinds." And it was so. ²⁵God made the wild animals of the earth according to their kinds, the livestock according to their kinds, and every creature that crawls on the ground according to its kind. And God saw that it was good. ²⁶Then God said, "Let us make humanity in our image, according to our likeness, and let them rule over the fish of the sea, over the birds of the sky, over the livestock, over all the earth, and over every crawling thing that crawls on the earth."

²⁷So God created humanity in his own image;
in the image of God he created him;
male and female he created them.

²⁸God blessed them, and God said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth and subdue it, and rule over the fish of the sea, over the birds of the sky, and over every living thing that moves on the earth." ²⁹Then God said, "Look, I have given you every seed-bearing plant on the face of all the earth, and every tree that has fruit with seed in it. They will be yours for food. ³⁰And to every wild animal of the earth, to every bird of the sky, and to everything that crawls on the earth—everything that has life in it—I have given every green plant for food." And it was so. ³¹God saw everything that he had made, and it was very good. And there was evening and there was morning—the sixth day.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Heavens' (plural) reflects the Hebrew hashamayim (שָׁמַיִם), which is grammatically plural. Most modern translations render this as 'heavens' rather than the KJV's singular 'heaven.'
1. The Hebrew reshit (רִשִׁית) means 'beginning' or 'first.' Whether this refers to an absolute beginning ('In the beginning, God created...') or a temporal clause ('When God began to create...') is debated among scholars. The traditional absolute reading is retained here as it is the most natural reading of the Masoretic vowel pointing.
1. The particle et (אֶת) marks the definite direct object and has no English equivalent. It appears twice, once before 'the heavens' and once before 'the earth,' giving both objects equal grammatical weight.
2. 'Now' rather than 'And' signals a circumstantial clause in the Hebrew. The syntax here (waw + noun, rather than the wayyiqtol narrative form) indicates this verse describes the state of the earth, not a sequential action after verse 1.
2. The phrase tohu vavohu (תֹּהוּ וָבֹהוּ) is a rhyming pair found only here and in Jeremiah 4:23 and Isaiah 34:11. It describes a state of formlessness, emptiness, and disorder — not nothingness, but an unformed, unfilled condition. 'Formless and empty' captures both elements: tohu (formless, waste, chaos) and vohu (emptiness, void).
2. 'The deep' translates tehom (תְּהוֹם), referring to the primordial waters or abyss. Some scholars note a possible linguistic connection to the Babylonian Tiamat (the chaos sea-goddess in the Enuma Elish), though this is debated. In the Hebrew text, tehom is not personified or mythologized — it is simply the deep waters.

2. 'Spirit of God' translates ruach Elohim (רוח אֱלֹהִים). This is genuinely ambiguous: ruach can mean 'spirit,' 'wind,' or 'breath,' and Elohim can function as an adjective meaning 'mighty' or 'great.' Possible readings include: (1) 'the Spirit of God' (a divine person), (2) 'a wind from God' or 'a divine wind,' (3) 'a mighty wind.' The traditional reading 'Spirit of God' is retained here.
2. 'Hovering' (merachephet, מְרַחֵף) replaces the KJV's 'moved.' This verb appears elsewhere only in Deuteronomy 32:11, where it describes an eagle hovering over its young. It suggests protective, watchful presence rather than mere motion.
3. The Hebrew is strikingly brief and powerful — only five words. The jussive form yehi (יְהִי, 'let there be') followed immediately by the identical form vayehi (וַיִּהְיֶה, 'and there was') creates a dramatic verbal echo: command and fulfillment mirror each other exactly.
3. 'Then' renders the wayyiqtol (וַיִּקְטֹל), the standard Hebrew narrative verb form, which conveys sequential action. This marks the beginning of God's creative speech.
4. 'Good' translates tov (טוֹב), which encompasses a range of meaning: good, beautiful, fitting, pleasing, functioning as intended. This is the first of seven occurrences of God evaluating his creation as 'good' in this chapter (vv. 4, 10, 12, 18, 21, 25, 31).
4. 'Separated' (hivdil, הִבְדִּיל) is a key verb in this chapter, appearing five times (vv. 4, 6, 7, 14, 18). The act of creation in Genesis 1 is substantially an act of separation — dividing light from darkness, waters from waters, day from night. This organizing, ordering activity contrasts with the 'formless and empty' state of v. 2.
5. The act of naming in the ancient Near East signifies authority and dominion. By naming the light and darkness, God demonstrates sovereign authority over them.
5. The Hebrew reads yom echad (יוֹם אֶחָד), literally 'day one' using the cardinal number, not the ordinal 'first day' (which would be yom rishon). This is unique — days 2 through 5 use ordinal numbers (second, third, fourth, fifth), and day 6 uses the ordinal with the definite article ('the sixth day'). Some scholars see significance in 'day one' as emphasizing its uniqueness. The rendering 'the first day' follows convention for English readability, but the literal Hebrew is 'one day.'
5. The formula 'there was evening and there was morning' establishes the pattern for each creative day. The sequence evening-then-morning (rather than morning-then-evening) reflects the Hebrew reckoning of a day from sunset to sunset, a practice still observed in Jewish tradition.
5. The meaning of 'day' (yom) in Genesis 1 is debated. It can refer to a literal 24-hour period, a longer age, or a literary/structural framework. The text itself does not resolve this, and this rendering does not take a position on the question.
6. 'Expanse' translates raqia (רָקִיעַ), from the root raqa meaning 'to beat out' or 'to spread out' (as a metalworker hammers metal into a thin sheet). The KJV's 'firmament' comes from the Latin Vulgate's firmamentum, which implies a solid dome — and indeed, ancient Israelite cosmology likely conceived of a solid dome separating the waters above from those below. 'Expanse' is used here as a more neutral term that does not commit to either a solid or atmospheric interpretation. The translator note preserves the original conceptual background.
6. The separation of 'waters from waters' reflects ancient Near Eastern cosmology in which the sky was understood as holding back an upper ocean (the source of rain) from the lower waters (seas, rivers, underground springs). This cosmological framework is shared with other ancient Near Eastern creation texts but is here presented within a monotheistic, ordered framework.
7. The verb here is asah (עָשָׂה, 'made'), distinct from bara (בָּרָא, 'created') in verse 1. Asah is the common word for making or doing and is not restricted to divine activity. The alternation between bara and asah throughout this chapter has been much discussed; the two verbs appear to be used as near-synonyms here, though bara carries a stronger sense of bringing into being something new.
7. 'And it was so' (vayehi-khen, וַיִּהְיֶה כֵּן) is a formulaic confirmation that God's command was carried out. It appears six times in this chapter (vv. 7, 9, 11, 15, 24, 30).
8. The Hebrew shamayim (שָׁמַיִם) is the same word translated 'heavens' in verse 1. Here it refers specifically to the visible sky (the raqia), while in verse 1 it refers to the cosmic heavens. English requires a distinction that the Hebrew leaves fluid. 'Sky' is used here to differentiate from the broader 'heavens' of verse 1.
8. Day 2 is notably the only day in the creation account that lacks the formula 'God saw that it was good.' Many scholars suggest this is because the separation of the waters is not completed until day 3, when the lower waters are gathered and dry land appears — and day 3 receives two 'good' evaluations (vv. 10 and 12), perhaps compensating for the absence here.
9. 'Gathered' translates yiqqavu (יִקְצְאוּ), from the root qavah, meaning 'to gather, to collect, to converge.' The same root appears in the noun miqveh ('gathering, collection, pool') in the next verse.
9. 'Dry land' translates yabbashah (יַבְשָׁה), which specifically denotes land that is dry in contrast to water. It is named 'earth' (erets) in the next verse, but here its defining characteristic is its dryness — its emergence from the waters.
10. 'Earth' translates erets (אֶרֶץ), which can mean earth, land, ground, territory, or country depending on context. Here it refers to the dry land as opposed to the seas.
10. 'Gathering' translates miqveh (מִקְוֶה), from the same root as the verb in verse 9. This word later gives its name to the miqveh — the ritual immersion pool in Jewish practice.

10. 'Seas' (yammim,) is plural, indicating multiple bodies of water, even though they were gathered into 'one place' (v. 9). This may reflect the observable reality of distinct seas and oceans.
10. This is the first of two 'good' evaluations on day 3 (see also v. 12), which some scholars connect to the absence of a 'good' declaration on day 2.
11. The Hebrew uses a cognate construction: tadshé ha'arets deshe () — literally 'let the earth vegetate vegetation' or 'let the earth sprout sprouts.' The verb and its object share the same root (d-sh-a), creating an emphatic expression. 'Sprout vegetation' captures this.
11. The text appears to describe three categories of plant life: (1) deshe () — vegetation or green growth in general; (2) esev mazria zera () — seed-bearing plants/herbs; (3) ets peri () — fruit trees. However, the precise relationship between these categories is debated. Some read deshe as the general category with the other two as subcategories. The rendering treats deshe as the general term, with the other two specifying types of vegetation.
11. 'According to their kinds' (lemino,) introduces a key concept in this chapter — that plants and animals reproduce 'according to their kind' (min,). This phrase establishes the idea of distinct, ordered categories in creation.
12. The fulfillment (v. 12) closely mirrors the command (v. 11), following the pattern established throughout this chapter: God speaks, and creation responds in exact obedience. Minor variations between command and fulfillment are characteristic of Hebrew narrative style.
12. This is the second 'good' evaluation on day 3. See the note on verse 8 regarding the absence of this formula on day 2.
13. The formula is identical in structure to verse 5 and will recur for each subsequent day. Beginning with day 2, the ordinal numbers are used (sheni, 'second'; shlishi, 'third'; etc.), whereas day 1 uniquely uses the cardinal number echad ('one'). See the note on verse 5.
14. 'Lights' translates meorot (), meaning 'luminaries' or 'light-bearers.' This is distinct from or (, 'light') in verse 3. The luminaries are vessels or bearers of light, not light itself — light was already created on day 1.
14. 'Appointed times' translates moadim (), which the KJV renders 'seasons.' However, moadim does not primarily mean seasons of the year (spring, summer, etc.) but rather 'appointed times' or 'fixed occasions' — including festivals, sacred assemblies, and liturgical seasons. This word later becomes the technical term for Israel's appointed feasts (Leviticus 23). The rendering 'appointed times' preserves this broader meaning.
14. 'Signs' (otot,) refers to indicators or markers. The celestial bodies serve as signs — marking times, seasons, and possibly portents. This does not imply astrology but rather the observable use of celestial cycles for timekeeping and calendar-setting.
14. God's speech in verse 14 continues through verse 15. The verse division is an editorial addition; the Hebrew flows as a single command.
15. This verse completes God's speech that began in verse 14. The closing quotation mark is placed here. The practical function of the luminaries is stated: to give light on the earth. This is their purpose — they serve creation, not the other way around.
15. In the context of the ancient Near East, where sun and moon were widely worshiped as deities, this text is strikingly demythologizing. The sun and moon are not named; they are merely 'lights' that God made and placed in the sky. They are servants of God's purposes, not objects of worship.
16. The Hebrew deliberately avoids the words shemesh ('sun') and yareach ('moon'). These are referred to only as 'the greater light' (hammaor haggadol) and 'the lesser light' (hammaor haqqaton). This is widely understood as a deliberate polemical choice — in surrounding cultures, the sun (Shamash) and moon (Sin/Yarikh) were major deities. By reducing them to unnamed functional objects, the text strips them of any divine status.
16. 'Govern' translates memshelet (), from the root m-sh-l ('to rule, to have dominion'). The KJV's 'rule' is also accurate. 'Govern' is used here to convey the orderly, administrative nature of their role.
16. 'And the stars' (ve'et hakkokhavim) appears almost as an afterthought in the Hebrew — a brief addition at the end of the verse. This is another element of the text's anti-mythological perspective: the stars, also worshiped in the ancient Near East, are given no elaboration. God simply made them.
17. 'Set' translates natan (), which primarily means 'to give' but here carries the sense of 'to place, to set, to appoint.' God gives the luminaries their position — they are placed where God determines, reinforcing their subordinate, created status.
17. Verses 17–18 form a single sentence continuing from the making of the lights in verse 16. The verse divisions break up what is a continuous statement of purpose.
18. This verse completes the purpose statement for the luminaries, echoing the language of verse 4 where God himself separated light from darkness. Now the luminaries are given this function as God's instruments — maintaining the separation that God established.
18. The verb 'to separate' (lehavdil) appears here for the fifth time in the chapter (vv. 4, 6, 7, 14, 18), underscoring that creation is fundamentally an act of ordering and distinguishing.
19. The standard day-closing formula. Day 4 corresponds structurally to day 1: on day 1 God created light and separated it from darkness; on day 4 God creates the light-bearers to govern that separation. This pattern of correspondence (days 1–3 forming domains, days 4–6 filling those domains with rulers/inhabitants) is a widely recognized structural feature of Genesis 1.
20. 'Swarm' translates yishretsu (), from the root sh-r-ts, meaning 'to swarm, to teem, to multiply abundantly.' The noun sherets (, 'swarming things') from the same root emphasizes the abundance and teeming nature of aquatic life. The KJV's 'bring forth abundantly' captures the sense but loses the vividness of 'swarm.'

20. 'Living creatures' translates nephesh chayyah (נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה), literally 'a living soul' or 'a living being.' Nephesh here refers to animate life — creatures that breathe, move, and live. It does not carry the later Greek philosophical meaning of an 'immortal soul' separable from the body.
20. 'Birds' translates oph (אֲפֹרָת), which broadly covers flying creatures — not just birds but potentially including winged insects. 'Birds' is used for readability, but the Hebrew category is broader.
20. 'Across the face of the expanse' — the Hebrew al-penei (עַל-פְּנֵי) indicates the birds fly in front of or against the backdrop of the sky, not within the raqia itself.
21. The verb bara (בָּרָא, 'created') reappears here — its second use in the chapter (after v. 1). Its use for the sea creatures may be significant: the creation of animate life is presented as a new, distinctly divine act, not merely a continuation of the previous creative work.
21. 'Great sea creatures' translates tanninim hagedolim (תַּנִּינִים הַגְּדֹלִים). The KJV's 'great whales' is too narrow. Tannin (תַּנִּין) can refer to large sea creatures, serpents, or even mythological sea monsters (cf. Isaiah 27:1; Psalm 74:13; Job 7:12). In ancient Near Eastern mythology, the sea and its monsters represented chaos, and the creator deity's defeat of the sea monster was a central motif. Here, God simply creates these creatures — they are not rivals or adversaries but part of his ordered creation. The text demythologizes what surrounding cultures mythologized.
21. 'Every winged bird' translates kol-oph kanaph (כָּל-אֲפֹרָת קָנָף), literally 'every bird of wing' or 'every winged flyer.' The addition of kanaph (קָנָף, 'wing') specifies that this refers to winged flying creatures.
22. This is the first occurrence of divine blessing (vayyevarekh, וַיְבָרֵךְ) in the Bible. Blessing in the Hebrew Bible is not merely a wish or prayer — it is a bestowal of power, vitality, and capacity. God's blessing here empowers the creatures to reproduce and fill their habitats.
22. 'Be fruitful and multiply' (peru urevu, פְּרוּ וּרְבוּ) is a command that becomes a major theme in Genesis, repeated to humanity (1:28), to Noah (9:1, 7), and echoed throughout the patriarchal narratives. It is a word of blessing and empowerment, not merely a command.
22. The KJV's 'fowl' is updated to 'birds' for modern readability. The Hebrew oph (אֲפֹרָת) is the same word as in verse 20.
23. Day 5 corresponds structurally to day 2: on day 2 God separated the waters and created the sky-domain; on day 5 he fills those domains with sea creatures and birds. This 'forming-then-filling' pattern continues the structural symmetry of the chapter.
24. Three categories of land animals are specified: (1) behemah (בְּהֵמָה) — domesticated animals or livestock; (2) remes (רֶמֶס) — crawling or creeping things, including small animals, reptiles, and insects; (3) chayyat-erets (חַיַּת-אֶרֶץ) — wild animals, literally 'living things of the earth.' The distinction between behemah (domesticated) and chayyah (wild) is important in later biblical legislation (Leviticus 11).
24. 'Let the earth bring forth' (totse ha'arets) — the earth is commanded to participate in producing land animals. This is notable: unlike the sea creatures, which God bara ('created'), the land animals are brought forth from the earth. The earth is an agent in God's creative process, though under God's sovereign command.
25. The order of the animal categories changes between the command (v. 24: livestock, crawling things, wild animals) and the fulfillment (v. 25: wild animals, livestock, crawling things). Such variation in repeated lists is a common feature of Hebrew style and does not imply a different order of events.
25. Note that 'ground' here translates adamah (אֲדָמָה), distinct from erets (אֶרֶץ, 'earth/land') used elsewhere. Adamah refers to the cultivable soil or ground — the same word from which adam ('humanity/man') is derived in Genesis 2:7. The wordplay between adamah and adam is a significant motif in Genesis.
26. 'Humanity' translates adam (אָדָם), which here is clearly a collective noun referring to humankind as a whole, not a specific individual or male. This is confirmed by the plural pronoun 'them' (yirdu, יִרְדּוּ, 'let them rule') in the same verse and by the explicit 'male and female' in verse 27. The KJV's 'man' reflects older English usage where 'man' could mean 'humankind,' but this is no longer standard usage.
26. The plural 'Let us make' (na'aseh, נַעֲשֶׂה) and 'our image... our likeness' (betsalmenu... kidmutenu) have generated extensive debate. Major interpretations include: (1) God addresses a heavenly court or divine council (cf. 1 Kings 22:19; Isaiah 6:8; Job 1:6); (2) a 'plural of deliberation' — God deliberating with himself; (3) a 'plural of majesty' (the 'royal we'); (4) Christian tradition reads this as a reference to the Trinity. The text does not resolve this ambiguity, and this rendering does not favor any particular interpretation.
26. 'Image' (tselem, תְּצַלֵּם) and 'likeness' (demut, דְּמוּת) are near-synonyms used together for emphasis. Tselem often refers to a physical representation or statue (cf. the 'images' of tumors in 1 Samuel 6:5). Demut indicates resemblance or similarity. Together they convey that humanity bears a resemblance to God — though the precise nature of this resemblance (physical? functional? relational? vocational?) has been debated throughout Jewish and Christian history.
26. 'Rule' translates yirdu (יִרְדּוּ), from radah (רָדָה), meaning 'to rule, to have dominion, to tread.' This is a strong verb implying authoritative governance. The scope of human rule extends over all other living creatures — fish, birds, livestock, and crawling things — and over 'all the earth' itself.

27. This verse is structured as Hebrew poetry — three parallel lines, each using the verb bara ('created'). The threefold repetition of bara is emphatic and unique in this chapter; no other creative act receives this level of emphasis. The poetic structure is preserved in the rendering with line breaks.
27. The shift from singular 'him' (oto,) to plural 'them' (otam,) within the same verse is significant. It reflects the movement from adam as a collective singular ('humanity') to the concrete reality of male and female individuals. Both male and female together constitute the 'image of God' — the image is not limited to one sex.
27. 'Male and female' (zakhar unqevah,) are biological terms — zakhar ('male,' literally 'the one who is remembered/marked') and neqevah ('female,' literally 'the one who is pierced/bored'). These terms emphasize the sexual differentiation of humanity as part of God's creative design.
27. The verb bara ('created') appears three times in this single verse — and only three other times in the entire chapter (vv. 1, 21, and here). Its concentration in this verse underscores that the creation of humanity is the climactic act of divine creation.
28. The blessing and commission to humanity echoes the blessing given to the sea creatures and birds in verse 22, but with significant additions: 'subdue' the earth and 'rule over' all living creatures. Humanity shares the blessing of fertility with the animals but receives a unique mandate of governance.
28. 'Fill' translates mil'u (). The KJV's 'replenish' reflected 17th-century English where 'replenish' simply meant 'fill' (not 'fill again'). The Hebrew carries no implication of refilling something previously filled.
28. 'Subdue' translates kivshuha (), from the root k-v-sh (), which is a strong verb meaning 'to subdue, to bring under control, to conquer.' Elsewhere it is used for subjugating enemies (Numbers 32:22, 29) or forcing someone into servitude (Nehemiah 5:5; Jeremiah 34:11, 16). Its strength has generated much discussion about humanity's relationship to the earth — whether this authorizes exploitation or responsible management. The text presents it as a divine commission within the context of a creation pronounced 'very good.'
28. 'Rule' translates radu (), the imperative of radah, the same verb used in verse 26. Here it is addressed directly to humanity as a command.
29. 'Look' translates hinneh (), the Hebrew attention-getting particle. The KJV's 'Behold' is archaic; 'Look' serves the same function in modern English — drawing attention to what follows.
29. 'Food' translates okhlah (), from the root 'k-l' ('to eat'). The KJV's 'meat' reflected older English usage where 'meat' simply meant 'food' in general, not specifically animal flesh. 'Food' is the accurate modern rendering.
29. This verse, along with verse 30, prescribes a vegetarian diet for both humans and animals at creation. Explicit divine permission to eat animal flesh does not come until after the flood (Genesis 9:3). This has been noted by Jewish and Christian commentators throughout history as indicating an ideal or original state that differs from the post-fall, post-flood reality.
29. God's speech continues into verse 30. The quotation remains open.
30. 'Everything that has life in it' translates asher-bo nephesh chayyah (), literally 'in which is a living being/soul.' This defines which creatures receive the provision of green plants — those possessing animate life (nephesh chayyah).
30. 'Every green plant' translates kol-yereq esev (), literally 'all greenness of plants.' Yereq means 'green,' 'greenery,' or 'vegetation.' The animal diet prescribed here is entirely plant-based, paralleling the human diet of seeds and fruits in verse 29.
30. This verse completes God's speech that began in verse 29. The closing quotation mark is placed after 'for food.'
30. The statement that all animals were originally given plants for food includes predators. The text presents an originally non-violent creation — a theme echoed in Isaiah's vision of the restored creation where 'the lion will eat straw like the ox' (Isaiah 11:7; 65:25).
31. 'Very good' (tov meod,) is the climactic evaluation of the entire creation. All previous evaluations were simply 'good' (tov); now, with creation complete and humanity in place, the whole is assessed as 'very good.' The intensifier meod ('very, exceedingly') elevates this final assessment above all previous ones.
31. The Hebrew has 'the sixth day' (yom hashishi,) with the definite article ha- () before the ordinal — the only day (besides possibly the seventh day in 2:3) to receive the definite article. Days 2–5 are simply 'a second day,' 'a third day,' etc., but this is 'THE sixth day.' Many scholars see this as marking the climactic significance of day 6 as the culmination of creation.
31. The hinneh (, 'behold/look') before 'very good' has been integrated into the English naturally. The Hebrew reads literally: 'And God saw all that he had made, and look — very good.' The 'look' functions as an exclamation emphasizing the quality of the assessment.

Summary: God rests on the seventh day and makes it holy. A second, closer-focus account of creation follows: God forms the man from dust, plants a garden in Eden, and commands him not to eat from the tree of knowledge. Finding no suitable helper among the animals, God builds a woman from the man's side, and they are united as one flesh.

What Makes This Remarkable: The first thing declared holy (qadash) in the Bible is not a place or a person but a day — time itself is sanctified before space. The verbal root shavat ('to cease') behind 'Sabbath' means completion, not exhaustion. The wordplay between adam ('humanity') and adamah ('ground') in verse 7 encodes the inseparable bond between humans and earth. The man's poem in verse 23 is the first human speech in the Bible — and it is poetry.

Translation Friction: We rendered tsela (v. 21) as 'side' rather than 'rib,' since the Hebrew word elsewhere means an entire side of a structure (Exodus 25:12; 1 Kings 6:34). The traditional 'rib' narrows what the Hebrew leaves architecturally open. The phrase ezer kenegdo (v. 18) resists translation: ezer means 'helper' but carries no connotation of subordination — God himself is called Israel's ezer (Psalm 121:2). Kenegdo means 'corresponding to' or 'opposite,' implying equality and complementarity.

Connections: The Sabbath rest (2:2-3) becomes the basis for the fourth commandment (Exodus 20:8-11). The command regarding the tree of knowledge (2:16-17) sets up the crisis of chapter 3. The 'one flesh' union (2:24) is cited by Jesus in Matthew 19:5 and by Paul in Ephesians 5:31. Eden's river system (2:10-14) places paradise in geographical memory.

¹So the heavens and the earth were completed, and all their host. ²On the seventh day God finished his work that he had done, and he rested on the seventh day from all his work that he had done. ³God blessed the seventh day and made it holy, because on it he rested from all his work that God had created and made. ⁴This is the account of the heavens and the earth at their creation, when the LORD God made earth and sky. ⁵No shrub of the field had yet appeared on the earth, and no plant of the field had yet sprouted, for the LORD God had not sent rain on the earth, and there was no man to work the ground. ⁶But a mist would rise from the earth and water the whole surface of the ground. ⁷Then the LORD God formed the man from the dust of the ground and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life, and the man became a living being. ⁸The LORD God planted a garden in Eden, in the east, and there he placed the man whom he had formed. ⁹The LORD God made to grow out of the ground every tree that is pleasing to look at and good for food, and the tree of life in the middle of the garden, and the tree of the knowledge of good and evil. ¹⁰A river flowed out of Eden to water the garden, and from there it divided and became four branches. ¹¹The name of the first is Pishon; it is the one that winds through the whole land of Havilah, where there is gold. ¹²The gold of that land is good; bdellium and onyx stone are also there. ¹³The name of the second river is Gihon; it is the one that winds through the whole land of Cush. ¹⁴The name of the third river is the Tigris; it is the one that flows east of Assyria. And the fourth river is the Euphrates. ¹⁵The LORD God took the man and placed him in the garden of Eden to work it and to keep it. ¹⁶The LORD God commanded the man, saying, "You may freely eat from every tree of the garden, ¹⁷but from the tree of the knowledge of good and evil you must not eat, for on the day you eat from it you will certainly die." ¹⁸Then the LORD God said, "It is not good for the man to be alone. I will make a helper corresponding to him." ¹⁹Now the LORD God had formed out of the ground every animal of the field and every bird of the sky, and he brought them to the man to see what he would call them. And whatever the man called each living creature, that was its name. ²⁰The man gave names to all the livestock, to the birds of the sky, and to every wild animal of the field. But for the man, no helper corresponding to him was found. ²¹So the LORD God caused a deep sleep to fall upon the man, and he slept. Then he took one of his sides and closed up the flesh in its place. ²²The LORD God built the side that he had taken from the man into a woman, and he brought her to the man.

²³Then the man said,

"This one, at last, is bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh.

 She shall be called 'woman,' for from man she was taken."

²⁴For this reason a man will leave his father and his mother and hold fast to his wife, and they will become one flesh. ²⁵The man and his wife were both naked, and they felt no shame.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Completed' translates vayyekhullu (), from the root k-l-h ('to finish, to complete, to bring to an end'). This same root appears in the next verse. The creation account reaches its conclusion: everything is finished.
1. 'Host' translates tseva'am (), meaning 'their army, their host, their array.' The word tsava can refer to a military force, a heavenly army (stars, angels), or an organized multitude. Here it encompasses everything that populates the heavens and the earth — celestial bodies, living creatures, and all that fills creation. The phrase 'LORD of hosts' (YHWH tseva'ot), a major divine title, draws on this same word.
2. The Hebrew states that God finished his work 'on the seventh day' (bayyom hashevi'i), which could imply that some completing work occurred on day 7. The Septuagint (Greek translation) changed this to 'on the sixth day,' apparently to avoid that implication. The Masoretic Hebrew text is rendered here as it stands. The completion may be understood as the act of ceasing itself: resting is the final act that completes the work.
2. 'Rested' translates vayyishbot (), from the root sh-b-t (), meaning 'to cease, to stop, to rest.' This is the verbal root behind the noun Shabbat (, 'Sabbath'). The word primarily means 'to cease from activity' rather than 'to recuperate from exhaustion' — God does not rest from weariness but from completion.
2. 'Work' translates melakhah (), which denotes purposeful, skilled work — craftsmanship, labor, occupation. It is later used as the technical term for the work prohibited on the Sabbath (Exodus 20:10). The same word describes the skilled work of constructing the tabernacle (Exodus 31:3–5), creating a parallel between God's creation of the world and Israel's construction of the sanctuary.
3. 'Made it holy' translates vayyeqaddesh (), from the root q-d-sh (), meaning 'to set apart, to consecrate, to make sacred.' This is the first occurrence of the concept of holiness in the Bible. Notably, the first thing declared holy is not a place or a person but a unit of time — the seventh day. The KJV's 'sanctified' is accurate but 'made it holy' is clearer in modern English.
3. God's blessing of the seventh day echoes his blessings of the living creatures (1:22) and humanity (1:28). The day itself receives the same kind of divine empowerment and favor bestowed upon living things.
3. The phrase 'created and made' (bara... la'asot) uses both key creation verbs — bara ('to create,' uniquely divine) and asah ('to make,' general production). The Hebrew literally reads 'which God created to make' or 'which God had created by making.' This may be a hendiadys (two words expressing one idea) meaning 'created and made,' or it may suggest that God created with the purpose of making — that is, creation was purposeful work. The rendering follows the hendiadys reading.
3. The seventh day is unique in the creation account: it has no evening-morning formula closing it. All six previous days end with 'there was evening and there was morning — the Nth day.' The absence of this closure for day 7 has been noted by commentators throughout history; some see it as suggesting the seventh day remains perpetually open.
4. 'Generations' translates toledot (), one of the most important structural terms in Genesis. It means 'generations,' 'account,' 'history,' or 'origins.' The toledot formula ('These are the generations of...') appears ten times in Genesis (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10; 11:27; 25:12; 25:19; 36:1; 37:2), serving as a structuring device for the entire book. Whether the formula introduces what follows or summarizes what precedes is debated; here it appears to do both — summarizing the creation account while transitioning to the Eden narrative.
4. This verse marks the first appearance of the divine name YHWH () in the Bible. From this point through the end of chapter 3, God is consistently referred to as 'the LORD God' (YHWH Elohim,), combining the personal covenant name with the general title for God. This combined form is rare outside Genesis 2–3. Following established convention, YHWH is rendered as LORD (in small capitals) to distinguish it from Adonai ('Lord').
4. 'On the day' (beyom,) does not mean a literal 24-hour day here but 'at the time when' or 'when.' This is a common temporal use of yom in Hebrew.
4. The word order reverses between the two halves of the verse: 'heavens and earth' (hashamayim veba'arets) in the first half becomes 'earth and heavens' (erets veshamayim) in the second. The second pair also lacks the definite articles present in the first. This chiasmic structure (A-B / B'-A') is a common Hebrew literary device and may signal the transition from the cosmic perspective of chapter 1 (heavens first) to the earthly perspective of chapter 2 (earth first).
5. This verse describes a pre-agricultural landscape — a world before cultivated plants and before rain. Two reasons are given for the absence of vegetation: (1) God had not yet sent rain, and (2) there was no human to work the soil. This establishes the interdependence of divine provision (rain) and human labor (agriculture) as necessary for the flourishing of the land.

5. 'Shrub of the field' (siach hassadeh, שִׁיחַ חֲסַדֵּה) and 'plant of the field' (esev hassadeh, עֵשֶׂב חֲסַדֵּה) are distinct from the vegetation of 1:11–12. The word sadeh ('field') suggests cultivated or open land rather than the whole earth. These may refer specifically to wild shrubs and cultivated crops — the flora that depends on rain and human cultivation.
5. 'Work' translates la'avod (לָאָוֹד), from avad (אָוַד), meaning 'to work, to serve, to till.' This verb will reappear in verse 15 for the man's role in the garden. The human vocation of working the ground (adamah) is presented as integral to creation's design, not as a consequence of the fall.
5. The verse structure is complex, functioning as a temporal clause dependent on what follows (vv. 6–7): 'When no shrub... had yet appeared... and there was no man... then a mist went up... and the LORD God formed the man.' The rendering restructures for English clarity while preserving the sense.
6. 'Mist' translates ed (עָד), a rare and difficult Hebrew word occurring only here and in Job 36:27. Its meaning is uncertain. Possible renderings include: (1) 'mist' or 'fog' (traditional); (2) 'stream' or 'spring' (based on a possible Akkadian cognate edû, meaning 'underground water source' or 'flood'); (3) 'flow' or 'surge' of underground water. The rendering retains the traditional 'mist' while acknowledging the uncertainty.
6. The verb forms ya'aleh (יָאֲלֶה, imperfect) and vehishqah (וְהִשְׁקָה, perfect with waw consecutive) indicate habitual or ongoing action — 'would rise... and would water.' This describes a recurring process, not a single event. The rendering captures this with 'would rise... and water.'
7. 'Formed' translates vayyits'er (וַיִּצְטַר), from yatsar (צָרַר), the verb used for a potter shaping clay (cf. Isaiah 29:16; 45:9; Jeremiah 18:4–6). The image is of God as a craftsman, hands-on, shaping the man from raw material. This is distinct from bara ('created,' 1:1) and asah ('made,' 1:7) — yatsar conveys intimate, artisanal forming.
7. The wordplay between adam (אָדָם, 'man/humanity') and adamah (אֲדָמָה, 'ground/soil') is one of the most significant puns in the Hebrew Bible. The man (adam) is formed from the ground (adamah) — his very name embeds his origin. This wordplay cannot be fully reproduced in English. An approximate equivalent would be 'earthling from earth' or 'human from humus' (both share a Latin root), but these are too informal for the text's register.
7. 'Dust' (aphar, אֶפֶר) emphasizes the humble, fragile nature of the man's physical constitution. The same word recurs in the curse of 3:19 ('to dust you shall return'), framing human existence between dust and dust.
7. 'Breath of life' translates nishmat chayyim (נִשְׁמַת חַיִּים). The word neshamah (נֶשְׁמָה) is distinct from ruach (רוּחַ, 'spirit/wind/breath' in 1:2). Neshamah refers specifically to the breath that animates — the life-breath that makes a creature alive. God's direct, intimate breathing into the man is unique in the creation account; no animal receives life this way.
7. 'Living being' translates nephesh chayyah (נֶפֶשׁ חַיָּה), the same phrase used for the animals in 1:20–21, 24. The man shares this designation with the animals — he too is an animate, breathing creature. What distinguishes him is not a different category of being but the manner of his creation (formed by God's hands, animated by God's breath) and his commission (the image of God, 1:26–27). The KJV's 'living soul' reflects the later Greek philosophical reading of 'soul' (psychē); the Hebrew nephesh does not imply an immaterial substance separable from the body.
8. 'Planted' (vayyitta, וַיִּטֵּא) — God is depicted as a gardener, planting a garden. This continues the portrayal of God as personally, physically involved in creation (a potter in v. 7, a gardener here). The anthropomorphic language is striking and deliberate.
8. 'Eden' (עֵדֶן) is both a place name and a word meaning 'delight,' 'pleasure,' or 'luxury.' The Septuagint translated it as paradeisos ('paradise'), which is the origin of the English word 'paradise.' The Hebrew text treats Eden as a geographical region within which the garden is planted — the garden is 'in Eden,' not identical with it.
8. 'In the east' translates miqqedem (מִקְדָּם), which can mean 'in the east,' 'from the east,' or 'in ancient times / from of old.' The primary meaning of qedem is 'east' (the direction one faces), but it also carries the temporal sense of 'before, formerly, long ago.' The spatial reading ('in the east') is followed here, but the temporal ambiguity is noted.
9. 'Pleasing to look at' translates nechmad lemar'eh (נֶחְמַד לִמְרֹאֶה). The word nechmad ('desirable, delightful, coveted') from the root ch-m-d will recur in 3:6 when the woman sees that the tree of knowledge is 'desirable' (nechmad) — creating a deliberate verbal echo between God's provision (all the good trees) and the forbidden tree's allure.
9. Two named trees stand out from among all the trees of the garden: (1) the tree of life (ets hachayyim, עֵץ הַחַיִּים), and (2) the tree of the knowledge of good and evil (ets hadda'at tov vara, עֵץ הַדָּא'אֵת טוֹב וָרָע). The grammatical relationship between these two trees and their placement is somewhat ambiguous — the text says the tree of life is 'in the middle of the garden' but does not explicitly state the location of the tree of knowledge (though 3:3 places the prohibited tree 'in the middle of the garden').
9. 'Knowledge of good and evil' (da'at tov vara) — what this knowledge entails is widely debated: (1) moral discernment (knowing right from wrong); (2) experiential knowledge (experiencing good and evil firsthand); (3) comprehensive knowledge (merism — 'good and evil' meaning 'everything'); (4) adult wisdom or sexual awareness. The ambiguity is preserved in the rendering. The text does not explain what the knowledge is; it only narrates its prohibition and consequences.
10. 'Branches' translates rashim (רָשִׁים), literally 'heads.' In a river context, rosh ('head') can mean 'headwater,' 'source,' or 'branch.' The image is of a single river emerging from Eden, watering the garden, and then splitting into four major waterways. Whether these are understood as four headwaters (tributaries flowing into Eden) or four branches (distributaries flowing out from Eden) is debated. The flow described — a river comes out of Eden, then divides — supports 'branches' (distributaries).

10. The geographical description in verses 10–14 anchors the garden in what appears to be real-world geography (Tigris, Euphrates) while including rivers (Pishon, Gihon) that cannot be identified with certainty. This blend of known and unknown geography has led to extensive debate about whether the passage is meant as literal cartography or as theological geography.
11. 'Pishon' () — this river has not been conclusively identified. Proposed identifications range from a dried-up Arabian river to a canal in Mesopotamia. The name may be related to the root p-w-sh ('to leap, to spring forth').
11. 'Winds through' translates hassovev (), from the root s-b-b ('to surround, to go around, to encircle'). The KJV's 'compasseth' is archaic for the same meaning.
11. 'Havilah' () — a region associated with precious materials. It appears elsewhere in Genesis 10:7, 29; 25:18; 1 Samuel 15:7. Its exact location is uncertain; candidates include Arabia, East Africa, or India.
12. 'Bdellium' translates bedolach (), a word of uncertain meaning. It may refer to: (1) a fragrant resin or gum (bdellium); (2) a precious stone; (3) pearls. In Numbers 11:7, manna is compared to bedolach in appearance. The traditional rendering 'bdellium' is retained because no single modern equivalent captures the uncertain range.
12. 'Onyx' translates shoham (), a precious stone whose exact identification is uncertain. Candidates include onyx, carnelian, lapis lazuli, or beryl. Shoham stones are later used on the high priest's ephod (Exodus 25:7; 28:9, 20). 'Onyx' follows the traditional identification.
12. The detailed description of precious materials (gold, bdellium, onyx) in the land watered by Eden's river evokes abundance and divine generosity. These same materials later appear in the construction of the tabernacle, reinforcing the connection between Eden and sacred space.
13. 'Gihon' () — the name may be related to the root g-y-ch ('to burst forth, to gush'). A spring named Gihon exists in Jerusalem (1 Kings 1:33, 38), but whether it is connected to this river is uncertain. Like the Pishon, this river has not been conclusively identified.
13. 'Cush' () is rendered directly from the Hebrew rather than using the KJV's 'Ethiopia.' While Cush is often associated with the region south of Egypt (modern Sudan/Ethiopia/Eritrea), it can also refer to a Mesopotamian region (the Kassites were sometimes called Kushites). The identification depends on the overall geographical scheme, which remains disputed.
14. 'Tigris' renders the Hebrew Chiddeqel (), the Hebrew name for the Tigris River. The more widely recognized name 'Tigris' is used for clarity. The KJV's 'Hiddekel' is a direct transliteration of the Hebrew. The Akkadian name is Idiqlat.
14. 'East of Assyria' translates qidmat Ashshur (). The Tigris does flow through and east of ancient Assyrian territory, consistent with known geography.
14. The Euphrates (Perat,) is mentioned without description, presumably because it was the best-known river to the original audience. The Euphrates and Tigris are the two great rivers of Mesopotamia, firmly grounding this passage in real-world geography — even as the Pishon and Gihon remain unidentified.
14. The mention of these four rivers has long been used to locate Eden in or near Mesopotamia (modern Iraq), though the Pishon and Gihon complicate any precise identification.
15. 'Placed' translates vayyannicheh (), from the root n-w-ch (), meaning 'to rest, to settle, to place.' This is not the same verb as in verse 8 (vayyasem, 'he put/set'). The root nuach suggests that God settled or gave rest to the man in the garden — the garden is a place of rest as well as work.
15. 'To work it and to keep it' translates le'ovdah uleshomrah (). These two verbs — avad ('to work, to serve') and shamar ('to keep, to guard, to watch over') — carry theological significance beyond gardening: (1) avad is the standard verb for serving God and for priestly service in the sanctuary (Numbers 3:7–8; 8:26; 18:7); (2) shamar is used for keeping/guarding God's commands (Genesis 17:9; Exodus 20:6) and for the Levites' guarding of the tabernacle (Numbers 1:53; 3:7–8). The pairing of avad and shamar appears together for tabernacle service in Numbers 3:7–8 and 18:7. This lexical overlap suggests the garden functions as a proto-sanctuary — a sacred space where the man serves and guards in a priestly role.
15. The KJV's 'dress it' (for avad) reflects archaic English usage where 'dress' meant 'to tend, to cultivate.' 'Work it' is the modern equivalent.
16. 'You may freely eat' translates akhol tokhel (), an infinitive absolute followed by a finite verb — a Hebrew construction that intensifies the verb. Literally 'eating you shall eat.' This emphatic permission stands in deliberate contrast to the emphatic prohibition in the next verse (mot tamut, 'dying you shall die'). The lavish permission precedes the single restriction.
16. The command is addressed to the man alone (singular 'you'), before the creation of the woman. This raises the question — later important in chapter 3 — of how the woman learned about the prohibition. The text does not address this directly.
16. God's speech continues into verse 17. The quotation remains open.
17. 'You will certainly die' translates mot tamut (), another infinitive absolute construction: 'dying you shall die.' This mirrors the emphatic permission of verse 16 (akhol tokhel, 'eating you shall eat'). The symmetry is deliberate: emphatic freedom, emphatic boundary.
17. 'On the day you eat from it' (beyom akhalkha,) — this has generated much discussion, since Adam and Eve do not physically die on the day they eat (3:6–7). Interpretive options include: (1) 'day' is used loosely for 'when' (as in 2:4); (2) spiritual death or separation from God occurs immediately; (3) the process of dying (mortality) begins on that day; (4) 'you will certainly die' is a legal sentence ('you will be subject to death') rather than a prediction of immediate death. The rendering preserves the literal Hebrew without resolving the ambiguity.

17. This is the first prohibition in the Bible — a single negative command amid comprehensive freedom. The structure emphasizes the generosity of the permission (every tree) against the singularity of the restriction (one tree).
18. 'Not good' (lo-tov,) stands in sharp contrast to the repeated 'good' (tov) and 'very good' (tov meod) evaluations throughout chapter 1. After a series of affirmations that creation is good, this is the first declaration that something is 'not good.' The man's solitude is an incomplete state that requires remedy.
18. 'Helper corresponding to him' translates ezer kenegdo (). This phrase is crucial and frequently misunderstood: (1) ezer (, 'helper') does not imply subordination. The same word is used of God as Israel's 'helper' (Psalm 33:20; 70:5; 115:9–11; Exodus 18:4; Deuteronomy 33:7, 26, 29). It denotes one who provides strength, aid, or rescue — one who supplies what is lacking. (2) kenegdo () means 'corresponding to him,' 'matching him,' 'suitable for him,' literally 'as opposite him' or 'as in front of him.' The sense is of a counterpart, a matching complement — not a subordinate assistant but a partner of equal nature who corresponds to and completes the man.
18. The KJV's 'help meet' uses 'meet' as an adjective meaning 'suitable' or 'fitting' (archaic English). Over time, 'help meet' was misread as a compound noun 'helpmeet' or 'helpmate,' obscuring both the strength of ezer and the meaning of kenegdo.
19. The verb vayyitser (, 'formed') is the same potter's verb used for the man's formation in verse 7. The animals share with the man the origin of being formed from the ground (adamah), though they do not receive the divine breath.
19. 'Had formed' — the wayyiqtol form vayyitser could be rendered as simple past ('formed') or as pluperfect ('had formed'). The pluperfect reading ('had formed') is adopted here, understanding this verse as referring back to the animal creation already described in chapter 1, not as narrating a new creative act. This avoids an apparent contradiction with the sequence in chapter 1 where animals are created before humans. However, the Hebrew verb form itself does not make this distinction; 'formed' is equally valid grammatically.
19. 'To see what he would call them' — God brings the animals to the man with genuine interest in the outcome. The naming is not dictated by God but left to human judgment. In the ancient Near East, naming implies authority over what is named; the man exercises a delegated sovereignty over the animal kingdom.
19. 'Whatever the man called each living creature, that was its name' — the man's naming is authoritative and ratified. God does not correct or override the names. This reflects the human role as God's image-bearer exercising real (not merely ceremonial) authority in creation.
20. The animal categories here — livestock (behemah), birds of the sky (oph hashamayim), and wild animals of the field (chayyat hassadeh) — are consistent with the categories established in chapter 1 (1:24–25). 'Livestock' for behemah maintains consistency with chapter 1.
20. The naming process serves a narrative purpose beyond taxonomy: it demonstrates that no animal is a suitable counterpart for the man. The search through the entire animal kingdom and the verdict — 'no helper corresponding to him was found' — sets up the creation of the woman as the answer to a need that the animals cannot fill. The man's aloneness is not resolved by the presence of animals, however numerous or varied.
20. 'For the man' translates ule'adam (). The KJV renders this as 'for Adam,' treating adam as a proper name. At this stage in the narrative, the word still functions primarily as 'the man' (with and without the article). The transition from common noun to proper name is gradual in Genesis 2–5 and cannot be pinpointed to a single verse.
21. 'Deep sleep' translates tardemah (), a divinely induced unconsciousness, not ordinary sleep. The same word describes the deep sleep God brings upon Abraham during the covenant ceremony in Genesis 15:12, and upon Saul's camp in 1 Samuel 26:12. It is a sleep brought about by God for a specific divine purpose — the man is passive while God works.
21. 'Side' translates tsela (), traditionally rendered 'rib.' However, tsela in the Hebrew Bible most commonly means 'side' — the side of the ark (Exodus 25:12), the side of the tabernacle (Exodus 26:20, 26–27), the side chambers of the temple (1 Kings 6:5–6), or the side of a hill (2 Samuel 16:13). It does not elsewhere mean 'rib.' The traditional rendering 'rib' has a very long history (the Septuagint uses pleura, 'side/rib'), but 'side' better represents the Hebrew word's normal meaning. The implication may be that the woman is taken from the man's side — she is his lateral counterpart, not a small or peripheral part of him.
21. 'Closed up the flesh in its place' — God acts as a surgeon, opening the man's body, removing material, and closing the wound. The intimacy and physicality of this act is remarkable. God personally and skillfully works with flesh, just as he earlier shaped dust (v. 7) and planted a garden (v. 8).
22. 'Built' translates vayyiven (), from banah (), meaning 'to build, to construct.' This is a striking verb choice. God does not 'form' (yatsar) the woman as he formed the man from dust, nor does he 'create' (bara) or 'make' (asah) her. He 'builds' her — the same verb used for constructing buildings, cities, and altars. Some scholars see this as elevating the woman's creation: she is architecturally constructed, carefully built up from existing material rather than shaped from raw earth.
22. 'Brought her to the man' — God personally presents the woman to the man, acting in a role that later tradition compared to that of a father escorting a bride. The verb 'brought' (vayyevi'eha) is simple and profound: God brings together what he has made for each other.
23. This is the first human speech in the Bible, and it is poetry. The man's response to seeing the woman is not a clinical observation but a poetic exclamation — structured verse with parallelism and wordplay. The poetic form is preserved in the rendering with line breaks and indentation.

23. 'This one, at last' translates zot happa'am (זוֹת הַפָּא'אָם), literally 'this one, this time.' After reviewing all the animals and finding no suitable counterpart (vv. 19–20), the man's exclamation expresses recognition, delight, and relief. 'At last' captures the sense of arrival after searching.
23. 'Bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh' (etsem me'atsamai uvasar mibbesari) is an expression of kinship and identity. The same formula appears in other kinship contexts (Genesis 29:14; Judges 9:2; 2 Samuel 5:1; 19:12–13). The woman is not a stranger or a different kind of creature — she shares the man's very substance.
23. The wordplay between ishah (אִשָּׁה, 'woman') and ish (אִישׁ, 'man') is a folk etymology — a meaningful wordplay rather than a strict linguistic derivation. Linguistically, ishah likely derives from a different root than ish (ishah from 'n-sh, ish from 'y-sh), but the text presents a deliberate sound-correspondence: she is ishah because she was taken from ish. The English 'woman' / 'man' (or historically 'wo-man' from 'wif-man') offers a partial parallel. No English rendering can fully reproduce the Hebrew wordplay.
24. This verse shifts from narrative to a general principle — it is the narrator's comment (or possibly God's pronouncement) drawing a universal conclusion from the particular event. The shift from past-tense narrative to future-tense principle ('a man will leave') is marked by 'for this reason' (al-ken, כֵּן), which connects the institution of marriage to the creation of woman from man.
24. 'Hold fast' translates davaq (דָּבַק), meaning 'to cling, to cleave, to stick to, to adhere.' This is a strong verb of attachment and loyalty. It is used elsewhere for clinging to God in covenant faithfulness (Deuteronomy 10:20; 11:22; 13:5; 30:20; Joshua 22:5; 23:8). The word implies permanent, tenacious bonding — not merely living together but becoming inseparable. The KJV's 'cleave' captures the strength but is archaic.
24. 'One flesh' (basar echad, אֶחָד בָּסָר) describes the union of husband and wife. The phrase encompasses physical union (sexual intimacy), but its meaning is broader — a comprehensive merging of life, identity, and purpose. The two become a single social and relational unit. The same word basar ('flesh') was used in verse 23 ('flesh of my flesh'), connecting the one-flesh union to the woman's origin from the man's own flesh.
24. This verse is quoted by Jesus in Matthew 19:5 and Mark 10:7–8, and by Paul in Ephesians 5:31, as foundational to the theology of marriage.
25. 'Naked' translates arummim (אֲרֻמִּים), the plural of arum (אָרֹם). This word sets up one of the most important wordplays in Genesis: the next verse (3:1) introduces the serpent as arum (אָרֹם, 'crafty' or 'shrewd'). The near-homophony between arummim ('naked') and arum ('crafty') creates a literary bridge between the innocence of chapter 2 and the deception of chapter 3. The connection is audible in Hebrew but invisible in English translation.
25. 'Felt no shame' translates velo yitboshashu (וְלֹא יִתְבוֹשָׁשׁוּ), from the root b-w-sh (בֹּשׁ, 'to be ashamed'). The hitpa'el form (reflexive/reciprocal) suggests 'they were not ashamed before each other' — there was no self-consciousness, no need for concealment or protection in their mutual vulnerability. This state of unashamed nakedness represents the original condition of human relationship — complete transparency and trust. The loss of this condition is narrated in 3:7–10.
25. This verse concludes chapter 2 and functions as a narrative hinge: it simultaneously describes the final state of innocence and foreshadows its loss. The chapter ends in a state of wholeness — harmonious relationship with God, with each other, and with creation — that chapter 3 will disrupt.

Summary: The serpent deceives the woman into eating from the forbidden tree; the man eats also. Their eyes are opened, they hide from God, and each deflects blame. God pronounces consequences on the serpent, the woman, and the man, then clothes them and expels them from Eden.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The pivotal wordplay between arummim ('naked,' 2:25) and arum ('crafty,' 3:1) links innocence and cunning through a single sound. The serpent never lies about the tree's effect — their eyes were indeed opened — but frames truth in a way that distorts God's character. The woman's retelling of God's command subtly shifts it: she adds 'do not touch,' softens the death penalty from the emphatic mot tamut to the weaker pen temutun, and follows the serpent in using 'God' rather than 'the LORD God.'*

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew teshuqah (v. 16, 'desire') is rare, appearing only here, in 4:7, and in Song of Songs 7:10. Its precise meaning — sexual desire, desire for control, or longing for lost intimacy — is debated, and we noted this in the translator's notes rather than resolving it in the rendering. The protoevangelium (v. 15) uses the same verb (shuf) for both the offspring's strike and the serpent's, creating ambiguity about whether the conflict ends in mutual wounding or decisive victory.*

Connections: The enmity between the serpent's seed and the woman's seed (3:15) becomes a lens for the entire biblical narrative — later tradition reads it as the first messianic promise. God's act of clothing the couple (3:21) anticipates the pattern of divine covering that runs through the sacrificial system. Expulsion 'east of Eden' (3:24) begins a geographic motif: Cain goes further east (4:16), and Babel is built in the east (11:2).

¹Now the serpent was more crafty than any other wild animal of the field that the LORD God had made. He said to the woman, "Did God really say, 'You shall not eat from any tree of the garden'?" ²The woman replied to the serpent, "We may eat the fruit of the garden's trees, ³but from the fruit of the tree that is in the middle of the garden, God has said, 'You shall not eat from it, and you shall not touch it, or you will die.'" ⁴The serpent said to the woman, "You will certainly not die, ⁵for God knows that on the day you eat from it your eyes will be opened, and you will be like God, knowing good and evil." ⁶When the woman saw that the tree was good for food, that it was a delight to the eyes, and that the tree was desirable for gaining wisdom, she took some of its fruit and ate. She also gave some to her husband, who was with her, and he ate. ⁷Then the eyes of both of them were opened, and they knew that they were naked. So they sewed fig leaves together and made coverings for themselves. ⁸They heard the sound of the LORD God moving through the garden during the breezy part of the day, so the man and his wife concealed themselves from the LORD God's presence among the garden's trees. ⁹The LORD God called to the man and said to him, "Where are you?" ¹⁰He said, "I heard the sound of you in the garden, and I was afraid because I was naked, so I hid." ¹¹He said, "Who told you that you were naked? Have you eaten from the tree from which I commanded you not to eat?" ¹²The man said, "The woman whom you gave to be with me—she gave me fruit from the tree, and I ate." ¹³Then the LORD God said to the woman, "What is this you have done?" The woman said, "The serpent deceived me, and I ate." ¹⁴Then the LORD God said to the serpent, "Because you have done this, cursed are you above all livestock and above every wild animal of the field. On your belly you will go, and dust you will eat all the days of your life. ¹⁵I will put enmity between you and the woman, and between your offspring and her offspring. He will strike your head, and you will strike his heel." ¹⁶To the woman he said, "I will greatly increase your pain in childbearing; in pain you will bear children. Your desire will be for your husband, and he will rule over you." ¹⁷And to the man he said, "Because you listened to the voice of your wife and ate from the tree about which I commanded you, 'You shall not eat from it,' cursed is the ground because of you. In painful toil you will eat from it all the days of your life. ¹⁸Thorns and thistles it will produce for you, and you will eat the plants of the field. ¹⁹By the sweat of your face you will eat bread until you return to the ground, for from it you were taken. For dust you are, and to dust you will return." ²⁰The man named his wife Eve, because she was the mother of all the living. ²¹The LORD God made garments of skin for the man and his wife and clothed them. ²²Then the LORD God said, "See, the man has become like one of us, knowing good and evil. And now, lest he reach out his hand and take also from the tree of life, and eat, and live forever—" ²³So the LORD God sent him out from the garden of Eden to work the ground from which he was taken. ²⁴He drove the man out, and at the east of the garden of Eden he stationed the cherubim and a flaming sword that turned in every direction to guard the way to the tree of life.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Crafty' translates arum (), which can mean 'shrewd,' 'prudent,' 'cunning,' or 'crafty.' In Proverbs, arum is a positive quality — the shrewd or prudent person (Proverbs 12:16, 23; 13:16; 14:8, 15, 18; 22:3; 27:12). Here the context gives it a negative edge. The crucial wordplay with 2:25 is that arummim ('naked') and arum ('crafty') sound nearly identical in Hebrew. The chapter transition pivots on this pun: the man and woman were arummim (naked/innocent); the serpent is arum (crafty/shrewd). Innocence and cunning are placed side by side, and the narrative tension unfolds between them.
1. The serpent is identified as one of the wild animals that God made — it is a creature, not a deity or cosmic rival. The text does not identify the serpent as Satan; that identification develops later in Jewish and Christian tradition (cf. Wisdom 2:24; Revelation 12:9; 20:2). The rendering follows the text as it stands.
1. The serpent's opening question is rhetorically distorted. God's actual command (2:16–17) was generous: 'You may freely eat from every tree of the garden' except one. The serpent reframes it as a blanket prohibition: 'You shall not eat from any tree?' The distortion invites the woman to correct it — and in doing so, to engage in a conversation about God's command on the serpent's terms.

1. The serpent refers to 'God' (Elohim), not 'the LORD God' (YHWH Elohim) as the narrator and God himself do throughout chapters 2–3. The omission of the personal covenant name may be significant — the serpent depersonalizes God, referring to him by his generic title rather than his relational name.
1. 'Did God really say' translates aph ki-amar Elohim (). The particle aph () introduces surprise, incredulity, or emphasis — 'Really? Is it true that...?' The serpent's tone casts doubt not on God's existence but on his word and his character.
2. The woman begins correctly — they may eat from the garden's fruit. Her response corrects the serpent's distortion (v. 1), but as verse 3 will show, her recounting of God's command introduces its own alterations. God's speech continues into verse 3; the quotation remains open.
3. The woman's recounting of God's command differs from the original (2:16–17) in three notable ways: (1) She adds 'you shall not touch it' (velo tig'u bo,) — God said nothing about touching. (2) She softens the death penalty from 'you will certainly die' (mot tamut, an emphatic infinitive absolute construction in 2:17) to 'or you will die' (pen temutun, — 'lest you die'), removing the emphasis. (3) She follows the serpent in using 'God' (Elohim) rather than 'the LORD God' (YHWH Elohim). Whether these alterations reflect misunderstanding, embellishment, or the effects of the serpent's framing is not stated by the text.
3. The woman refers to 'the tree that is in the middle of the garden' rather than 'the tree of the knowledge of good and evil' (its name in 2:9, 17). This could indicate vagueness or avoidance, or simply that the tree was known by its location.
4. The serpent directly contradicts God. God declared 'dying you will die' (mot tamut, 2:17); the serpent says 'not dying you will die' (lo mot temutun,) — the same emphatic construction, negated. The serpent matches God's emphasis precisely while reversing the content. This is the Bible's first recorded lie — a flat denial of God's stated consequence.
4. The serpent's speech continues into verse 5. The quotation remains open.
5. The serpent impugns God's motives — the prohibition exists not for the humans' protection but because God is guarding his own prerogatives. The serpent reframes God's warning as God's insecurity. This is the heart of the temptation: not merely 'eat the fruit' but 'distrust God's character.'
5. 'Like God' translates kelohim (), which is genuinely ambiguous. It can mean: (1) 'like God' — like the one God who has been the subject throughout; (2) 'like gods' or 'like divine beings' — a more general category. The KJV renders 'as gods' (lowercase). Since the serpent is speaking about the specific God (Elohim) who gave the command, 'like God' is used here. The ambiguity is noted.
5. 'Knowing good and evil' (yode'ei tov vara,) — the serpent promises the same knowledge associated with the forbidden tree (2:9, 17). Ironically, God himself will confirm in 3:22 that the humans have indeed gained this knowledge. The serpent's statement contains a partial truth, which makes it more dangerous than a simple lie: they will know good and evil, but the knowledge will not make them like God in the way the serpent implies.
6. The woman's evaluation of the tree follows a threefold pattern: (1) 'good for food' (tov lema'akhal) — physical appetite; (2) 'a delight to the eyes' (ta'avah-hu la'einayim) — aesthetic desire; (3) 'desirable for gaining wisdom' (nechmad lehaskil) — intellectual/spiritual aspiration. This threefold appeal — body, eyes, mind — is often compared to 1 John 2:16 ('the desire of the flesh, the desire of the eyes, and the pride of life').
6. The word nechmad ('desirable') in 'desirable for gaining wisdom' is the same word used in 2:9 to describe all the trees God made: 'every tree that is pleasing (nechmad) to look at.' The forbidden tree shares the same desirability as God's good provision — the temptation lies not in some obviously repulsive thing but in something genuinely attractive.
6. 'Who was with her' (immah,) indicates that the man was present. The text does not describe him as absent during the conversation with the serpent and then arriving later — he was 'with her.' His silence throughout the exchange is striking. He does not correct the serpent's distortion, does not invoke God's command, does not refuse the fruit. He simply takes and eats.
6. The act itself is described with devastating brevity: 'she took... she ate... she gave... he ate.' Four verbs, no elaboration, no internal dialogue, no described hesitation. The narrative restraint is powerful — the most consequential human act in the story is told in the fewest words.
7. The serpent's promise comes partially true — 'your eyes will be opened' (3:5), and indeed 'the eyes of both of them were opened' (3:7). But the knowledge gained is not the god-like wisdom the serpent promised. The first thing they 'know' is their own nakedness — their vulnerability, their exposure. The promised elevation becomes an experience of diminishment.
7. 'They knew that they were naked' (vayyede'u ki eirummim hem) — the word for 'naked' here is eirummim (), a variant spelling of the arummim () of 2:25. In 2:25 they were naked and unashamed; now they are naked and aware — and the awareness produces the need for concealment.
7. 'Coverings' translates chagorot (), meaning 'girdles,' 'loin coverings,' or 'belts.' The KJV's 'aprons' is misleading in modern English. These are minimal coverings for the waist — an attempt to hide from each other what they can no longer bear to expose. The sufficiency of these coverings will be implicitly judged in verse 21, when God replaces them with garments of skin.
8. 'Sound' translates qol (), which can mean 'voice' or 'sound.' Here it likely refers to the sound of God's approach — footsteps, rustling, the audible presence of God moving through the garden. The KJV's 'voice' is possible but 'sound' better fits 'walking.'
8. 'Walking' translates mithallekh (), the hitpaal participle of halakh ('to walk'). The hitpaal form suggests 'walking about,' 'strolling,' or 'going back and forth' — a leisurely, habitual presence, not a sudden arrival. This implies that God's presence in the garden was a regular occurrence, not a special visitation. The same verb form is used for God's presence in the tabernacle (Leviticus 26:12; Deuteronomy 23:14; 2 Samuel 7:6–7), reinforcing the garden-as-sanctuary connection.

8. 'In the cool of the day' translates leruach hayyom (), literally 'at the wind/breeze of the day.' Ruach here means 'wind' or 'breeze' — the same word that meant 'Spirit' in 1:2. The phrase likely refers to the late afternoon or evening when a cooling breeze arises. An alternative reading takes ruach as 'spirit' — 'at the spirit of the day' — though this is less commonly adopted.
8. The man and his wife hide from God — the relational rupture that follows disobedience. Where once they had unashamed openness before God and each other (2:25), now they conceal themselves. The trees of the garden, which were given for their delight and sustenance (2:9, 16), become instruments of concealment.
9. 'Where are you?' translates ayyekkah (), a single Hebrew word combining 'where' (ayy) with the second person suffix (ka). God's question is not a request for geographical information — the omniscient Creator knows where the man is hiding. The question is relational and confrontational: it invites the man to reckon with where he is — not physically but existentially. He is hiding from God, and God calls him to account.
9. God addresses the man (ha'adam) directly, though both the man and his wife are hiding. The interrogation proceeds in the order of responsibility: the man first (vv. 9–12), then the woman (v. 13). The serpent is not questioned but directly sentenced (vv. 14–15).
10. This is the first occurrence of fear in the Bible. Before disobedience, there was no fear of God — only openness and trust. Fear is presented as a consequence of the broken relationship, not as an original feature of the human-divine encounter.
10. The man's answer is both honest and evasive. He admits to hearing, fearing, and hiding — but he attributes his fear to nakedness rather than to guilt. He does not mention eating from the tree. God's follow-up questions (v. 11) will press past this evasion.
10. 'The sound of you' translates et-qolekha (), literally 'your sound/voice.' The same word qol from verse 8. The man heard God's approach and responded with fear rather than welcome.
11. God's questions move from the general ('Where are you?') to the specific ('Have you eaten from the tree?'). The first question ('Who told you that you were naked?') implies that knowledge of nakedness could only have come from one source — the forbidden tree. Awareness of nakedness is itself evidence of disobedience.
11. The question 'Have you eaten...?' uses the Hebrew interrogative particle ha- (), which expects a yes-or-no answer. God does not ask 'What have you done?' but the more pointed 'Have you eaten?' — a direct question that demands confession rather than explanation.
12. The man's response deflects blame in two directions simultaneously. First, he implicates God: 'the woman whom YOU gave to be with me' (asher natattah immadi,) — the emphasis falls on God's act of giving the woman. Second, he blames the woman: 'SHE gave me' (hi natnah-li,) — the emphatic pronoun 'she' shifts responsibility. The man does finally admit 'and I ate' (va'okhel), but it comes as an afterthought, tacked on after the blame has been distributed.
12. The man who greeted the woman with a poem of joyful recognition ('bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh,' 2:23) now speaks of her as an object of blame — 'the woman whom you gave.' The relational rupture extends in all directions: between human and God, between man and woman.
13. God's question to the woman — 'What is this you have done?' (mah-zot asit,) — is not an inquiry but an accusation framed as a question. It echoes the same formulation used in later legal and prophetic accusation (cf. Genesis 12:18; 26:10; 29:25).
13. 'Deceived me' translates hishshi'ani (), from the root n-sh- (), meaning 'to deceive, to mislead, to beguile.' The hiphil form emphasizes causation — the serpent caused her to be deceived. Like the man, the woman deflects blame, though her claim of deception has a basis in the narrative: the serpent did lie about the consequences (v. 4) and misrepresent God's motives (v. 5). Paul references this in 2 Corinthians 11:3 and 1 Timothy 2:14.
13. The chain of blame runs: man blames woman and God (v. 12); woman blames serpent (v. 13). God does not question the serpent — there is no defense offered or invited. The judgments proceed in reverse order: serpent (vv. 14–15), woman (v. 16), man (vv. 17–19).
14. 'Cursed' translates arur (), the passive participle of arar (, 'to curse'). This is the first curse in the Bible. Significantly, the serpent is the only one of the three parties that is directly cursed. The woman's consequences (v. 16) are not called a curse, and in the man's case, the ground is cursed 'because of him' (v. 17) — the man himself is not cursed. The serpent alone bears the direct curse.
14. 'Above all livestock and above every wild animal' (mikkol habehemah umikkol chayyat hassadeh) — the preposition min can mean 'more than' or 'from among.' The serpent is cursed beyond all other animals — set apart in its degradation as it was once set apart in its craftiness (v. 1).
14. 'On your belly you will go' (al-gechonkha telekh) — this implies a change in the serpent's mode of locomotion, suggesting that crawling on its belly was not its original condition. The text does not elaborate on what the serpent was like before.
14. 'Dust you will eat' (ve'aphar tokhal) — serpents do not literally eat dust, but the idiom of 'eating dust' or 'licking dust' signifies utter humiliation and defeat in the ancient Near East (cf. Psalm 72:9; Isaiah 49:23; Micah 7:17). The curse consigns the serpent to perpetual degradation.
14. God's speech to the serpent continues into verse 15.
15. 'Enmity' translates eivah (), meaning 'hostility, hatred, deep antagonism.' God himself establishes this enmity — it is not a natural development but a divinely decreed state of conflict between the serpent (and its offspring) and the woman (and her offspring). The conflict is perpetual and multigenerational.

15. 'Offspring' translates zera (זֶרַע), literally 'seed.' The word can refer to agricultural seed, semen, a single descendant, or descendants collectively. Both the serpent's 'seed' and the woman's 'seed' are mentioned — the conflict extends beyond these two individuals to their respective lines.
15. 'He will strike your head, and you will strike his heel' — the pronoun hu (הוּא), 'he' is masculine singular, referring grammatically to the woman's 'seed/offspring.' This could be read collectively ('they/her descendants will') or individually ('he/a specific descendant will'). The Septuagint translates with the masculine pronoun autos, maintaining the ambiguity. Christian tradition (from at least the 2nd century) has read this as a reference to a specific future deliverer — the 'protoevangelium' or 'first gospel.' Jewish tradition generally reads it as describing the ongoing natural enmity between humans and snakes. The rendering preserves the singular 'he' of the Hebrew without interpretive addition.
15. 'Strike' translates yeshufkha/teshufennu, from the verb shuf (שָׁף). This is a rare and difficult verb, occurring only here, in Job 9:17, and in Psalm 139:11. Its meaning is debated: 'to crush,' 'to strike,' 'to bruise,' 'to snap at,' or 'to trample.' The same verb is used for both parties — the offspring strikes the serpent's head, and the serpent strikes the offspring's heel — but the targets differ. A strike to the head is potentially fatal; a strike to the heel is painful but not lethal. The asymmetry suggests that the conflict, while mutual, ultimately favors the woman's offspring.
15. This verse has generated more theological interpretation than perhaps any other in Genesis. The rendering follows the Hebrew text without resolving the interpretive questions, which belong in commentary rather than translation.
16. 'I will greatly increase' translates harbah arbēh (רַבִּיחַ אַרְבֵּה), the infinitive absolute construction expressing emphatic intensification — 'increasing I will increase.' The same construction appeared in God's emphatic permission (2:16, 'eating you shall eat') and prohibition (2:17, 'dying you shall die'). The pattern of emphatic divine speech continues.
16. 'Your pain in childbearing' — the Hebrew reads itstseveonekh veheronekh (אִתְּסֵוֹנֶכָה וְהֵרֹנֶכָה), literally 'your pain and your conception/pregnancy.' This is likely a hendiadys — two nouns joined by 'and' expressing a single concept: 'your pain in your pregnancy' or 'your painful labor.' The word itsavon (אִצְוֹן, 'pain, toil, hardship') is from the same root ('-ts-b') that will appear in verse 17 for the man's toil with the ground. The man and woman receive parallel consequences: both face increased itsavon in the spheres of their primary vocations — she in bearing children, he in working the ground.
16. 'Your desire will be for your husband' — teshuqah (תִּשְׁוָקָה, 'desire, longing, yearning') is a rare word, occurring only three times in the Hebrew Bible: here, in 4:7 (sin's 'desire' for Cain), and in Song of Solomon 7:10 (the beloved's 'desire' for the woman). The meaning is debated: (1) sexual or emotional desire/longing for the husband; (2) desire to control or dominate the husband (based on the parallel with 4:7, where sin's teshuqah for Cain is paired with the imperative to 'rule over' it); (3) a yearning for the pre-fall relational harmony. The ambiguity is preserved.
16. 'He will rule over you' (vehu yimshol-bakh, וְהוּא יִמְשֹׁל בָּךְ) — from masha (מָשָׁל, 'to rule, to govern, to have dominion'). Whether this is prescriptive (how marriage should function), descriptive (what will happen as a consequence of sin), or punitive (a judgment/sentence) is one of the most contested questions in biblical interpretation. The rendering presents it as a statement of consequence without resolving the theological question.
17. 'Because you listened to the voice of your wife' (ki shamata leqol ishtekha, כִּי שָׁמַטָּה לְקוֹל אִשְׁתְּךָ) — the issue is not that the man listened to his wife but that he listened to her rather than to God's command. The verb shama (שָׁמַע, 'to hear, to listen, to obey') with the preposition le- can mean 'to obey, to heed.' The man heeded his wife's leading into disobedience rather than heeding God's prohibition.
17. 'Cursed is the ground because of you' (arurah ha'adamah ba'avurekha, אֲרֻרָה הָאֲדָמָה בְּאִוְרֶכָּה) — note carefully: the man himself is not cursed. The ground (adamah) is cursed 'because of' (ba'avur) the man. The adam/adamah wordplay continues: the man (adam) was taken from the ground (adamah) to work it (2:5, 7, 15), and now the ground is cursed because of him. His relationship to his origin is disrupted.
17. 'In painful toil' translates be'itsavon (בְּאִצְוֹן), the same root as the woman's 'pain' (itsavon) in verse 16. The deliberate verbal parallel links their consequences: she will bear children in itsavon; he will eat from the ground in itsavon. Both primary human vocations — generating life and sustaining life — are now marked by the same painful toil.
17. God's speech to the man continues through verse 19.
18. 'Thorns and thistles' (qots vedardar, קוֹטִים וְדַרְדָּרִים) — a paired phrase that appears only here and in Hosea 10:8. The alliterative Hebrew (qots... dardar) has a harsh, prickly sound quality that mimics its content. The cursed ground will now resist human cultivation, producing obstacles alongside (or instead of) food.
18. 'Plants of the field' (esev hassadeh, עֵשֶׂב הַשָּׂדֶה) — the man's diet shifts from the abundant, freely given fruit of the garden (2:16) to the 'plants of the field' that must be wrested from resistant, cursed soil. The same phrase appeared in 2:5, where these plants had 'not yet sprouted' because 'there was no man to work the ground.' Now that context of labor finds its fullest expression.
19. 'By the sweat of your face' (bezei'at appekha, בְּזֵיעֵי אִפְּיֶךָ) — a vivid image of exhausting physical labor. Appekha is literally 'your nose/face,' and ze'at is 'sweat.' Food will come only through bodily exertion.
19. 'Bread' (lechem, לֶחֶם) is often used broadly for 'food' in general, not specifically leavened bread. The man will labor for his sustenance — the freely given food of the garden is replaced by food earned through sweat.
19. 'Until you return to the ground' (ad shuvkha el-ha'adamah, אֲדָנִי שׁוּבָה אֶל-הָאֲדָמָה) — death is framed as a return. The man came from the ground (adamah, 2:7) and will return to it. The adam-adamah wordplay reaches its conclusion: from adamah the man was taken, and to adamah he will return. His existence is bookended by the soil.

19. 'For dust you are, and to dust you will return' (ki aphar attah ve'el-aphar tashuv,) — this echoes 2:7, where God formed the man from the 'dust of the ground.' The cycle is explicit: dust life dust. This is one of the most quoted lines in scripture, used in burial liturgies across Christian traditions ('ashes to ashes, dust to dust' derives from this verse). Mortality is presented not as the arrival of something alien but as a return to what the man already is.
20. 'Eve' translates Chavvah (חַוְוָה), a name related to the root ch-y-h (ח, 'to live'). The name means 'life,' 'living,' or 'life-giver.' The Hebrew wordplay is between Chavvah and chai (חַי, 'living') — she is 'Life' because she is the mother of all the living.
20. The timing of this naming is remarkable. It comes immediately after the pronouncement of death ('to dust you will return,' v. 19) and before the expulsion from the garden (vv. 23–24). In the face of a death sentence, the man names his wife 'Life.' This has been read as an act of faith — trusting that life will continue despite the curse — or simply as a statement about her biological role. The text does not explain the man's motivation.
20. 'Mother of all the living' (em kol-chai) — this is a title of extraordinary scope. It establishes the woman not merely as the first woman but as the ancestral mother of all human beings.
21. 'Garments of skin' translates kotnot (כְּתוּנֹת). The kotonet (כְּתוּנֶת) is a tunic or long garment — the same word used for Joseph's famous garment (Genesis 37:3) and for priestly vestments (Exodus 28:4, 39–40). These are substantial garments, not the minimal fig-leaf coverings the humans made for themselves (v. 7). God replaces the inadequate human attempt at covering with something durable and effective.
21. 'Of skin' (or, כֶּסֶף) implies the death of an animal. The first clothing requires the first death. God himself provides covering for human shame, and that covering comes at the cost of a life. Many commentators see this as the first act of sacrifice and a foreshadowing of the sacrificial system — God covers sin through death. The text itself does not draw this conclusion explicitly, but the narrative implication is present.
21. God's action here is one of provision and care even in the midst of judgment. After pronouncing consequences, God personally clothes the man and his wife. The verb 'clothed them' (vayyalbishem, בָּשָׂם) portrays God dressing them — an act of intimate care performed for those he has just judged.
22. 'Like one of us' (ke'achad mimmenu, מִמֶּנּוּ) — another instance of divine plural language (cf. 1:26, 'Let us make'). The same interpretive options apply: divine council, royal plural, or trinitarian reference. God confirms what the serpent predicted — the man has indeed gained knowledge of good and evil. The serpent's lie was not in the promise of knowledge but in the denial of its cost.
22. The sentence breaks off mid-thought — 'lest he reach out his hand... and eat, and live forever—' The consequence is not stated; instead, God acts (v. 23). This is a rhetorical figure called aposiopesis — breaking off a sentence before its conclusion, leaving the implication to the hearer. The unstated but implied completion is something like: 'this must be prevented.' The prospect of fallen humanity living forever is treated as so dire it is left unspoken.
22. 'The tree of life' (ets hachayyim) — which was freely available (no prohibition against it was stated in 2:16–17) — now becomes dangerous. Eternal life in a state of alienation from God, knowing good and evil but unable to undo the knowledge, would be an eternal curse rather than a blessing. The expulsion from the garden (vv. 23–24) is thus an act of mercy as well as judgment: God prevents humanity from becoming irredeemably trapped in a fallen immortality.
22. 'See' (hen, הֵן) is the attention-getting particle, similar to hinneh. The KJV's 'Behold' is rendered as 'See' for modern readability.
23. 'Sent him out' translates vayeshallchehu (וַיֵּשְׁלַחְהוּ), from shalach (שָׁלַח, 'to send, to send away, to let go'). This is a milder term than what follows in verse 24 (garash, 'to drive out'). The progression from 'sent out' to 'drove out' intensifies the finality of the expulsion.
23. 'To work the ground from which he was taken' — the man's vocation remains: he will work (avad, אָבַד) the ground (adamah). But instead of working the garden of Eden (2:15), he will work the cursed ground (3:17) from which he was originally taken (2:7). The work continues; the conditions have changed. The verb avad ('to work/serve') links 2:5, 2:15, and 3:23 — the man's purpose endures through the fall, though it is now marked by painful toil.
24. 'Drove out' translates vayegaresh (וַיִּגְעֹרֶשׁ), from garash (גָּרַשׁ), a strong verb meaning 'to drive out, to expel, to banish, to divorce.' It is stronger than 'sent out' (shalach, v. 23). Garash is used for driving out inhabitants from a land (Exodus 23:28–31), for divorce (Leviticus 21:7, 14), and for the expulsion of Hagar (Genesis 21:10). The expulsion from Eden is not a gentle departure but a forcible removal.
24. 'Stationed' translates vayyashken (וַיַּשְׁכֵּן), from shakan (שָׁכַן, 'to dwell, to settle, to cause to dwell'). God causes the cherubim to dwell or take up permanent residence at the garden's entrance. The same root gives rise to the word Shekinah (the divine dwelling presence) in later Jewish theology.
24. 'Cherubim' translates keruvim (כְּרֻבִּים), heavenly beings associated with God's throne and the guarding of sacred space. In later biblical texts, cherubim are depicted on the ark of the covenant (Exodus 25:18–22), woven into the curtains of the tabernacle (Exodus 26:1, 31), and carved in the temple (1 Kings 6:23–28). They are guardians of holy space — the same function they perform here at the entrance to Eden. Their presence reinforces the garden-as-sanctuary interpretation.
24. 'A flaming sword that turned in every direction' (lahat hacherev hammithappekhet, לַחַת הַחֶרֶב הַמִּתְהַפֶּקֶת) — literally 'the flame of the sword, the one turning itself.' Whether the sword is a separate entity from the cherubim or wielded by them is not specified. The hitpa'el form of haphakh ('turning itself') suggests autonomous, ceaseless rotation — a perpetually revolving blade of fire blocking all approach.

24. "To guard the way to the tree of life" (lishmor et-derekh ets hachayyim) — the verb shamar ("to guard") is the same verb used in 2:15 for the man's commission to 'keep/guard' the garden. The profound irony is unmistakable: the man was placed in the garden to shamar (guard) it, and now cherubim shamar (guard) it against him. The guardian has become the one guarded against. What the man failed to protect is now protected from the man.

Summary: Eve bears Cain and Abel. Both bring offerings; God accepts Abel's but not Cain's. Despite God's warning, Cain kills his brother and is sentenced to wandering. Cain's line develops civilization — cities, music, metalwork — but also escalating violence. The chapter closes with Seth's birth and the beginning of worship.

What Makes This Remarkable: Abel's name (hevel, 'breath/vapor') is tragically prophetic: the one named 'fleeting' has his life taken. The first occurrence of 'sin' (chattat) in the Bible personifies it as a predator crouching at Cain's door, with its own 'desire' (teshuqah) — the same rare word from 3:16, linking the fall's consequences to the first murder. Lamech's boast (vv. 23-24) escalates Cain's sevenfold protection to seventy-sevenfold vengeance, tracing a trajectory from divine mercy to human brutality.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew avon (v. 13) means simultaneously 'guilt,' 'punishment,' and 'crooked act' — Cain's cry could mean 'my punishment is too great' or 'my guilt is too great.' We rendered it as 'punishment' in context but noted the layered meaning. The verb yada ('knew,' v. 1) for sexual intimacy resists any single English equivalent because it encompasses the full range of personal, relational knowing — not merely physical act.

Connections: God's question 'Where is your brother?' (4:9) echoes 'Where are you?' (3:9) — both probe moral evasion. Abel's blood 'crying from the ground' (4:10) reappears in Hebrews 12:24, where Christ's blood 'speaks a better word.' The sevenfold vengeance motif (4:15, 24) inverts into Jesus' seventy-times-seven forgiveness (Matthew 18:22). Seth's line replaces Abel's, continuing the promised seed of 3:15.

1The man was intimate with his wife Eve, and she conceived and bore Cain, saying, "I have produced a man with the help of the LORD." 2She then bore his brother Abel. Now Abel was a keeper of flocks, and Cain was a worker of the ground. 3In the course of time, Cain brought some of the fruit of the ground as an offering to the LORD. 4And Abel also brought an offering—from the firstborn of his flock and from their fat portions. The LORD looked with favor on Abel and his offering, 5but on Cain and his offering he did not look with favor. So Cain became very angry, and his face fell. 6The LORD said to Cain, "Why are you angry, and why has your face fallen? 7If you do well, will there not be acceptance? But if you do not do well, sin is crouching at the door. Its desire is for you, but you must rule over it." 8Cain spoke to his brother Abel. And when they were in the field, Cain rose up against his brother Abel and killed him. 9Then the LORD said to Cain, "Where is your brother Abel?" He said, "I do not know. Am I my brother's keeper?" 10He said, "What have you done? The voice of your brother's blood is crying out to me from the ground. 11Now you are cursed from the ground, which has opened its mouth to receive your brother's blood from your hand. 12When you work the ground, it will no longer yield its strength to you. You will be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth." 13Cain said to the LORD, "My punishment is more than I can bear. 14Look, you have driven me this day from the face of the ground, and from your face I will be hidden. I will be a fugitive and a wanderer on the earth, and whoever finds me will kill me." 15The LORD said to him, "Therefore, whoever kills Cain will suffer vengeance sevenfold." And the LORD put a mark on Cain so that no one who found him would strike him down. 16Then Cain went out from the presence of the LORD and settled in the land of Nod, east of Eden. 17Cain was intimate with his wife, and she conceived and bore Enoch. He was building a city, and he named the city after his son Enoch. 18To Enoch was born Irad, and Irad fathered Mehujael, and Mehujael fathered Methushael, and Methushael fathered Lamech. 19Lamech took two wives. The name of the one was Adah, and the name of the other was Zillah. 20Adah bore Jabal; he was the father of those who dwell in tents and raise livestock. 21His brother's name was Jubal; he was the father of all who play the lyre and pipe. 22Zillah also bore Tubal-cain, the forger of all instruments of bronze and iron. The sister of Tubal-cain was Naamah.

²³Lamech said to his wives:

"Adah and Zillah, hear my voice;
wives of Lamech, listen to my words.
I have killed a man for wounding me,
a young man for striking me.

²⁴If Cain is avenged sevenfold, then Lamech seventy-sevenfold."

²⁵Adam was intimate with his wife again, and she bore a son and named him Seth, saying, "God has appointed for me another offspring in place of Abel, for Cain killed him." ²⁶To Seth also a son was born, and he named him Enosh. At that time people began to call upon the name of the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Was intimate with' renders the Hebrew idiom yada (, 'knew'). The verb 'to know' is used throughout the Hebrew Bible as a euphemism for sexual intercourse (cf. Genesis 19:5; 24:16; Judges 11:39; 1 Samuel 1:19). The rendering follows the prompt's principle of making Hebrew idioms meaningful in English while documenting the original expression.
1. 'Cain' (Qayin,) — Eve's explanation creates a wordplay: 'I have acquired/produced (qaniti,) a man.' The name Qayin sounds like the verb qanah (, 'to acquire, to produce, to create'). The precise meaning of qanah here is debated — it can mean 'to acquire,' 'to produce,' 'to create,' or 'to buy.'
1. 'With the help of the LORD' translates et-YHWH (). The preposition et () is ambiguous: (1) 'with the help of' (the LORD assisted); (2) 'with' (together with the LORD); (3) as the direct object marker — 'I have produced a man, namely the LORD' (a theologically startling reading that some ancient interpreters entertained). 'With the help of' is the most natural reading and is adopted here. The ambiguity is noted.
1. This is the first birth in the Bible. Eve's exclamation acknowledges the LORD's role in bringing forth new life — a striking affirmation given the recent expulsion from Eden.
2. 'Abel' (Hevel,) means 'breath,' 'vapor,' or 'futility.' It is the same word used throughout Ecclesiastes ('vanity of vanities,' havel havalim). The name foreshadows Abel's brief life — he will pass away like a breath. Unlike Cain's naming, no explanation for Abel's name is given, which may itself be significant.
2. 'Worker of the ground' (oved adamah,) — Cain continues the vocation assigned to humanity: working the ground (cf. 2:5, 15; 3:23). The verb avad and the noun adamah connect Cain's occupation to the ongoing adam-adamah theme. Abel's occupation as a 'keeper of flocks' (ro'eh tson) introduces pastoralism alongside agriculture.
2. 'Keeper of flocks' — the word ro'eh (, 'shepherd') will become one of the most significant metaphors in the Hebrew Bible, applied to kings, to God himself (Psalm 23), and to the expected Messiah (Ezekiel 34).
3. 'In the course of time' translates miqqets yamim (), literally 'at the end of days.' This is a vague temporal marker — after an unspecified period.
3. 'Offering' translates minchah (), which can mean 'gift,' 'tribute,' or 'offering.' In later Levitical legislation, minchah becomes a technical term for the grain offering specifically (Leviticus 2). Here it is used in its broader sense of a gift brought to God. The text does not prescribe or explain the practice of offering — it assumes it.
3. The text says Cain brought 'some of the fruit of the ground' without specifying quality or quantity. Compare Abel's offering in the next verse, which is described with more specificity.
4. Abel's offering is described with notable specificity: 'from the firstborn' (mibbchorot,) and 'from their fat portions' (umechelvehem,). The firstborn represents the best and first of the flock; the fat portions were considered the richest and most valuable part of the animal (and are later designated as belonging to God in Levitical law, Leviticus 3:16–17). The detail suggests Abel offered his best.
4. 'Looked with favor' translates vayyisha (), from sha'ah (, 'to look at, to regard, to pay attention to'). The text does not explain how God's favor was communicated — whether through fire from heaven, visible response, or some other means. The focus is on the divine evaluation: God regarded Abel and his offering.
4. The text says God looked favorably on 'Abel and his offering' — the person before the offering. This has been widely noted: God's regard is first for the person, then for the gift.

5. The text does not explain why God favored Abel's offering over Cain's. Proposed explanations include: (1) the quality of the offering — Abel brought his best (firstborn, fat portions) while Cain's offering is described without such qualifiers; (2) the attitude of the offerer — God regarded the person before the offering; (3) blood sacrifice vs. grain offering. The text is deliberately silent on the reason, and the rendering does not supply one.
5. 'His face fell' (vayyipelu panav,) — an idiom for dejection, resentment, or downcast expression. The Hebrew literally says 'his faces fell' (panim is plural). This contrasts with the 'lifting up' (se'et) mentioned in verse 7.
6. God initiates dialogue with Cain, as he did with the man and woman after the fall (3:9, 11, 13). The questions are not requests for information but invitations to self-examination. God's speech continues into verse 7.
7. This verse is notoriously difficult in Hebrew and has generated extensive discussion. The grammar is irregular and the imagery is compressed.
7. 'Acceptance' translates se'et (), literally 'a lifting up.' This could mean: (1) 'lifting up' of the face — restored dignity and acceptance; (2) 'lifting up' of the offering — acceptance of the gift; (3) forgiveness. The word provides a counterpoint to the 'fallen face' of verse 5 — if Cain does well, his face will be lifted.
7. 'Sin is crouching at the door' (lappetach chattat rovets,) — sin is personified as a predatory animal lying in wait at the entrance. The participle rovets ('crouching') depicts a beast poised to spring. This is the first use of the word chattat ('sin') in the Bible.
7. 'Its desire is for you, but you must rule over it' (ve'eleikha teshugato ve'attah timshol-bo) — this language precisely mirrors 3:16 ('your desire will be for your husband, and he will rule over you'). The same rare word teshugah ('desire') and the same verb mashal ('to rule') appear in both verses. The parallel is deliberate: as the woman's desire and the man's rule create a tension in their relationship, so sin's desire for Cain creates a tension he must overcome. Unlike 3:16, where the ruling is stated as a consequence, here it is presented as a command — Cain is told he 'must rule over' sin.
7. The gender of the pronouns is irregular: chattat ('sin') is feminine, but the participle rovets ('crouching') and the pronoun suffixes are masculine. Some scholars explain this as treating sin like a masculine demon or predatory animal; others see it as simply irregular grammar. The rendering uses 'its' and 'it' to smooth the English.
8. 'Cain spoke to his brother Abel' — the Hebrew says vayyomer Qayin el-Hevel achiv (), literally 'Cain said to Abel his brother,' but does not include the content of what was said. The Septuagint, Vulgate, Syriac Peshitta, and Samaritan Pentateuch all supply the words 'Let us go out to the field.' The Masoretic Text leaves the speech blank. This may be an intentional omission — the words are swallowed up by the violence that follows — or it may reflect a textual gap. The rendering follows the MT as it stands.
8. The phrase 'his brother' (achiv,) appears twice in this single verse and seven times in this chapter (vv. 2, 8 [twice], 9 [twice], 10, 11). The repetition is relentless — Cain cannot escape the fact that his victim is his brother. The narrative insists on the relationship even as Cain destroys it.
8. 'Killed' translates vayyahagehu (), from harag (, 'to kill, to slay'). This is the first human death in the Bible — and it is a murder. Like the act of eating in 3:6, the murder is narrated with stark brevity.
9. God's question 'Where is your brother Abel?' echoes 'Where are you?' (3:9). In both cases God asks a question whose answer he already knows, inviting confession rather than seeking information.
9. 'Am I my brother's keeper?' (hashomer achi anokhi,) — the word shomer ('keeper') is from shamar (), the same verb used for the man's commission to 'keep/guard' the garden (2:15) and the cherubim's task of 'guarding' the way to the tree of life (3:24). Cain's deflection is thus deeply ironic: the entire vocation of humanity has been to shamar — to keep, guard, and protect. His rhetorical question implicitly rejects this calling.
9. Cain's response combines a lie ('I do not know') with a defiant question. Where the man in chapter 3 deflected blame, Cain denies knowledge and challenges God's right to hold him accountable.
10. 'Blood' is plural in Hebrew — deme'i (), literally 'bloods.' The rabbinic tradition interprets this plural as signifying not only Abel's blood but the blood of all his potential descendants — all the lives that would have come from him. The plural may also simply reflect the quantity of spilled blood.
10. 'Crying out' translates tso'aqim (), from tsa'aq (, 'to cry out, to shriek, to appeal for help'). This is the verb used for the desperate cry of the oppressed, slaves, and victims (cf. Exodus 2:23; 3:7, 9). The shed blood has a voice that appeals to God for justice. The ground (adamah) that received the blood becomes a witness.
10. God's speech continues through verse 12.
11. 'You are cursed from the ground' — unlike the serpent who was 'cursed above all' animals (3:14), Cain is cursed 'from the ground' (min-ha'adamah). The preposition min can indicate source ('cursed by the ground') or separation ('cursed away from the ground'). Either way, the man's relationship with the adamah — his origin, his vocation, his sustenance — is now fundamentally broken. The ground that was cursed 'because of' Adam (3:17) now rejects Cain entirely.
11. The ground is personified — it 'opened its mouth' (patsah et-piha) to receive Abel's blood. The earth is not a passive surface but an active participant, absorbing the blood and testifying against the murderer. The personification connects the ground's 'voice' (v. 10) with its 'mouth' (v. 11).

12. Cain's punishment intensifies the curse pronounced on Adam. For Adam, the ground would produce thorns and thistles but still yield food through hard labor (3:17–19). For Cain, the ground will withhold its strength entirely — his agricultural vocation is rendered futile. The worker of the ground (oved adamah, v. 2) is now rejected by the ground.
12. 'A fugitive and a wanderer' (na vanad,) — a paired expression using two words from the root n-w- ('to wander, to move about') and n-w-d ('to wander, to flee'). The alliterative pair emphasizes restless, rootless existence. Cain, who worked the settled soil, is condemned to endless wandering.
13. The Hebrew avoni () is deliberately ambiguous — it can mean 'my iniquity/guilt' or 'my punishment.' The statement could be read as:
(1) 'My punishment is more than I can bear' — a complaint about the severity of the sentence; (2) 'My guilt is too great to be forgiven' — a confession of irredeemable sin. The KJV and most English translations follow the 'punishment' reading. The ambiguity between guilt and punishment is inherent to the Hebrew word avon (), which encompasses the sin, its guilt, and its consequences as a unified reality.
13. God's speech continues into verse 14.
14. Cain identifies two dimensions of his punishment: (1) separation from the ground (me'al penei ha'adamah) — banishment from the soil that was his livelihood; (2) separation from God's presence (umippanekha essater) — hidden from God's face. Exile from the adamah and exile from God are presented as equally devastating.
14. 'From your face I will be hidden' — this echoes 3:8, where the man and woman 'hid themselves from the presence of the LORD God.' But while they hid voluntarily, Cain's hiddenness is imposed — a consequence of judgment rather than a choice of shame.
14. The verb garashta ('you have driven me out') is the same verb used for the expulsion from Eden (3:24, garash). Cain's banishment parallels and intensifies his parents' expulsion.
15. 'Vengeance sevenfold' (shiv'atayim yuqqam,) — God protects the murderer from being murdered. Even Cain, cursed and exiled, remains under a measure of divine protection. Sevenfold vengeance is an extreme deterrent — disproportionate retribution against anyone who would take justice into their own hands.
15. 'A mark' (ot,) — the nature of this mark is not specified. The word ot means 'sign,' 'mark,' or 'token' — the same word used for the 'signs' (otot) of the celestial bodies in 1:14. It is a visible indicator, but the text does not describe what it looked like. Proposals range from a physical mark to a protective sign or banner. The mark is protective, not punitive — it shields Cain from being killed.
15. God's response to Cain's fear reveals a complex divine stance: judgment without abandonment. Cain is cursed and exiled but not left unprotected. The God who judges also preserves.
16. 'Went out from the presence of the LORD' (vayyetse milifnei YHWH) — this geographical departure signifies theological distance. Cain moves away from God's manifest presence, fulfilling his own lament in verse 14.
16. 'The land of Nod' (erets-Nod,) — a wordplay on the root n-w-d ('to wander'). Nod means 'wandering.' Cain, condemned to be a 'wanderer' (nad), settles in the land of 'Wandering.' The irony is that the restless wanderer settles — and in the next verse, builds a city.
16. 'East of Eden' (qidmat-Eden) — the same directional language used in 2:8. Movement 'eastward' in Genesis consistently represents movement away from God's presence (cf. 11:2; 13:11).
17. 'Enoch' (Chanokh,) means 'dedicated' or 'initiated,' from the root ch-n-kh ('to dedicate, to train, to initiate'). The same root gives us Hanukkah ('dedication').
17. The subject of 'was building a city' (vayehi boneh ir) is ambiguous — it could be Cain or Enoch. The rendering follows the traditional reading that Cain built the city and named it after his son.
17. The condemned wanderer builds a city — the first city in the Bible. This stands in tension with the judgment of wandering (v. 12). Some interpreters see this as Cain's defiance of his sentence; others as God's tacit allowance of human civilization despite the fall. The text does not evaluate the act.
18. 'Fathered' translates yalad (), which literally means 'to bear, to give birth to' but in genealogical lists with a male subject means 'to father, to beget.' The KJV's 'begat' is the traditional rendering but is archaic. 'Fathered' is used consistently throughout.
18. Several names in Cain's genealogy resemble names in Seth's line (chapter 5): Enoch/Enoch, Irad/Jared, Mehujael/Mahalalel, Methushael/Methuselah, Lamech/Lamech. Whether these are variants of the same tradition or deliberate parallels is debated by scholars.
19. Lamech is the first man recorded as taking two wives — the first polygamist in the Bible. This appears within Cain's lineage, and the narrative context may imply a departure from the one-man-one-woman pattern established in 2:24. The text reports it without explicit evaluation.
19. 'Adah' () may mean 'ornament' or 'beauty.' 'Zillah' () may mean 'shade' or 'shadow,' possibly from tsel (, 'shadow').
20. 'Father of' (avi,) here means 'ancestor of' or 'originator of' — the founder of a way of life. Jabal is credited as the originator of pastoral nomadism — tent-dwelling and livestock-herding.
20. 'Jabal' () may be related to yaval ('to bring, to lead') or yuval ('stream').
20. Verses 20–22 describe the origins of three aspects of human civilization — pastoralism (Jabal), music (Jubal), and metallurgy (Tubal-cain). These cultural advances arise within Cain's lineage, presenting a complex picture: the line of the murderer produces the founders of human culture and technology.

21. 'Jubal' () is related to the root y-b-l, from which the word yovel ('jubilee,' 'ram's horn') derives. The name itself echoes the sound of music.
21. 'Lyre' translates kinnor (), a stringed instrument — David's instrument (1 Samuel 16:23). 'Pipe' translates ugav (), a wind instrument, possibly a flute or panpipe. Together they represent stringed and wind instruments — the full range of instrumental music. The KJV's 'harp and organ' uses terms that carry different connotations in modern English.
22. 'Tubal-cain' () — the name combines Tubal (possibly a people-name, cf. Genesis 10:2) with Cain. The compound name connects this metalworker to his ancestor.
22. 'Forger' translates lotesh (), from latash (, 'to sharpen, to hammer, to forge'). The KJV's 'instructor' misses the hands-on craft implied. Tubal-cain is the originator of metallurgy — working bronze (nechoshet, which can also mean copper) and iron (barzel).
22. 'Naamah' () means 'pleasant' or 'lovely.' She is the only daughter mentioned in these genealogies. The text does not explain her significance, though Jewish tradition assigned her various roles.
23. This is poetry — the 'Song of Lamech' — and is rendered with poetic line breaks. It is the second poem in Genesis (after Adam's poem in 2:23) and the first song of violence. The parallelism is precise: 'Adah and Zillah / wives of Lamech'; 'hear my voice / listen to my words'; 'a man / a young man'; 'for wounding me / for striking me.'
23. Whether Lamech is confessing a past killing or boasting of his readiness to kill is debated. The verbs can be read as past tense ('I have killed') or as a declaration of intent. The boastful tone and the comparison to Cain in verse 24 suggest bragging rather than remorse.
23. The 'man' (ish) and 'young man' (yeled) are likely the same person, described in parallel — a common feature of Hebrew poetry where two lines describe the same thing in different terms.
24. Lamech takes God's protective decree over Cain (v. 15) and amplifies it grotesquely for himself — from sevenfold to seventy-sevenfold. Where God's sevenfold vengeance was meant to restrain violence (protecting even the murderer), Lamech's claim escalates violence beyond all proportion. The Song of Lamech represents the trajectory of Cain's line: from murder (Cain) to celebration of murder (Lamech).
24. Jesus's instruction to forgive 'seventy times seven' (Matthew 18:22) may intentionally invert Lamech's boast — replacing the escalation of vengeance with the escalation of forgiveness.
24. The poem ends Cain's genealogy on a note of unrestrained violence and self-aggrandizement, setting up the contrast with Seth's line (vv. 25–26) and preparing for the narrative of escalating wickedness that leads to the flood (6:1–8).
25. This is the first verse where 'Adam' () is used without the article — functioning clearly as a proper name rather than 'the man.' The transition from common noun to proper name is now complete.
25. 'Seth' (Shet,) is explained by a wordplay with shat (, 'appointed, placed, set'). Eve says 'God has appointed (shat) for me another seed' — hence the name Shet. The name means 'appointed' or 'granted.'
25. 'Offspring' translates zera (, 'seed') — the same word used in 3:15 for the woman's 'offspring' who would strike the serpent's head. Seth is the appointed replacement for Abel through whom that seed-line continues.
26. 'Enosh' () means 'man,' 'mortal,' or 'human being' — from a root emphasizing human frailty and mortality (cf. Psalm 8:4; 103:15; Job 7:17). Where adam connects humanity to the ground, enosh connects humanity to mortality and weakness.
26. 'At that time people began to call upon the name of the LORD' (az huchal liqro beshem YHWH) — this statement marks a significant theological development: the beginning of formal worship or invocation of God by his personal name YHWH. The verb huchal () is from chahal (), which can mean 'to begin' or 'to profane.' Most translations read 'began,' but an alternative reading is 'then it was profaned — calling on the name of the LORD' — i.e., the divine name began to be misused. The traditional reading 'began to call upon' is followed here.
26. The chapter ends by establishing two contrasting lines: Cain's line, marked by violence culminating in Lamech's boast (vv. 17–24); and Seth's line, marked by the beginning of worship (vv. 25–26). This contrast sets up the narrative tension that will dominate Genesis 5–6.

Summary: The genealogy from Adam to Noah traces ten generations through Seth's line. Each entry follows a formula: the patriarch's age at his firstborn, remaining years, other children, total lifespan, and death — except Enoch, who 'walked with God' and was taken, and Noah, whose birth is accompanied by a prophecy of relief.

What Makes This Remarkable: The relentless refrain 'and he died' punctuates every entry — until Enoch, who breaks the pattern entirely. His 365-year lifespan (matching the solar year) and mysterious departure ('he was no more, because God took him') stand as a silent protest against death's dominion. The chapter begins by restating that humanity was made in God's likeness (v. 1), then notes that Adam fathered Seth 'in his own likeness, according to his image' (v. 3) — the divine image now transmitted through human generation.

Translation Friction: The phrase vayyithalekh et-ha'Elohim ('walked with God,' vv. 22, 24) for Enoch uses the hitpa'el of halakh, suggesting ongoing, intimate companionship rather than a single event. We rendered the second occurrence as 'lived in close fellowship with God' to capture the relational depth. Noah's name is explained through a wordplay that does not quite work linguistically — the name derives from nuach ('to rest') but is explained with nacham ('to comfort/relieve'), suggesting the narrator values theological resonance over strict etymology.

Connections: The ten-generation structure parallels the Sumerian King List but with dramatically reduced lifespans. Enoch's translation anticipates Elijah's (2 Kings 2:11). Noah's birth oracle (v. 29) points back to the curse on the ground (3:17) and forward to the post-flood promise (8:21). The genealogy bridges creation and flood, connecting Adam's world to Noah's.

¹This is the book of the generations of Adam. On the day God created man, he made him in the likeness of God. ²Male and female he created them, and he blessed them and called their name 'mankind' on the day they were created. ³When Adam had lived 130 years, he fathered a son in his own likeness, according to his image, and named him Seth. ⁴The days of Adam after he fathered Seth were 800 years, and he fathered sons and daughters. ⁵All the days of Adam's life were 930 years, and he died. ⁶When Seth had lived 105 years, he fathered Enosh. ⁷Seth lived after he fathered Enosh 807 years and fathered sons and daughters. ⁸All the days of Seth were 912 years, and he died. ⁹When Enosh had lived 90 years, he fathered Kenan. ¹⁰Enosh lived after he fathered Kenan 815 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹¹All the days of Enosh were 905 years, and he died. ¹²When Kenan had lived 70 years, he fathered Mahalalel. ¹³Kenan lived after he fathered Mahalalel 840 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹⁴All the days of Kenan were 910 years, and he died. ¹⁵When Mahalalel had lived 65 years, he fathered Jared. ¹⁶Mahalalel lived after he fathered Jared 830 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹⁷All the days of Mahalalel were 895 years, and he died. ¹⁸When Jared had lived 162 years, he fathered Enoch. ¹⁹Jared lived after he fathered Enoch 800 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²⁰All the days of Jared were 962 years, and he died. ²¹When Enoch had lived 65 years, he fathered Methuselah. ²²Enoch walked with God after he fathered Methuselah 300 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²³All the days of Enoch were 365 years. ²⁴Enoch lived in close fellowship with God, and then he was no more, because God had taken him away. ²⁵When Methuselah had lived 187 years, he fathered Lamech. ²⁶Methuselah lived after he fathered Lamech 782 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²⁷All the days of Methuselah were 969 years, and he died. ²⁸When Lamech had lived 182 years, he fathered a son. ²⁹He named him Noah, saying, "This one will bring us relief from our work and from the painful toil of our hands, from the ground that the LORD has cursed." ³⁰Lamech lived after he fathered Noah 595 years and fathered sons and daughters. ³¹All the days of Lamech were 777 years, and he died. ³²After Noah was 500 years old, Noah fathered Shem, Ham, and Japheth.

1. 'Book of the generations' (sefer toledot,) — this is the second toledot heading in Genesis (cf. 2:4). The addition of sefer ('book, written record, document') makes this the most formal genealogical introduction in Genesis. It suggests a written source or an authoritative record.

1. 'Adam' here functions both as the proper name of the first man and as the word for 'man/humanity.' The dual meaning is deliberate — the genealogy connects the individual Adam to the human race.
1. 'In the likeness of God' (bidmut Elohim,) echoes 1:26 but uses only demut ('likeness') without tselem ('image'). The concept of the divine image is reaffirmed at the beginning of this genealogy, establishing that the image of God persists through the generations despite the fall.
2. 'Called their name Adam' (vayyiqra et-shemam Adam) — God named both the man and the woman 'Adam.' The name is applied collectively to both, reinforcing that adam is a term for humanity as a whole, not exclusively the male. The rendering uses 'mankind' here to capture the collective sense, though the Hebrew word is simply adam.
2. This verse summarizes 1:27–28 in compressed form, reconnecting the genealogy to the original creation account.
3. 'In his own likeness, according to his image' (bidmuto ketsalmo,) — the terms demut ('likeness') and tselem ('image') from 1:26 are now applied to Adam's relationship with Seth. The word order is reversed (1:26 has 'image... likeness'; here 'likeness... image'), but the pairing is deliberate: as God made Adam in God's image, so Adam fathers Seth in Adam's image. The divine image is transmitted through human generation.
3. This verse establishes the genealogical formula that will repeat through the chapter: age at fathering son's name years after total years death.
4. 'Sons and daughters' — the genealogy acknowledges the existence of other children beyond the named son, though they are not listed. This formula recurs for each patriarch and confirms that the named son is selected for the genealogical line, not as the only child.
5. 'And he died' (vayyamot,) — this refrain closes each entry in the genealogy (with the notable exception of Enoch, v. 24). The repeated 'and he died' functions as a drumbeat throughout the chapter, underscoring the reality of the death sentence pronounced in 2:17 and 3:19. Despite extraordinary lifespans, death claims each generation.
5. The ages recorded in this genealogy are extraordinarily long by modern standards. Various explanations have been proposed: (1) literal years, reflecting a different era of human longevity; (2) symbolic or schematic numbers; (3) a different calculation system. The Masoretic, Septuagint, and Samaritan Pentateuch each preserve different numbers for many of these lifespans. The rendering follows the MT numbers without interpretive comment.
6. The genealogy now follows Seth's line — the line through which the story of God's people will continue. Cain's line, traced in 4:17–24, is left behind.
7. The formulaic pattern continues: age at fathering, remaining years, other children.
8. The death formula vayyamot ("and he died") marks the end of Enosh's entry in the genealogy. This refrain appears for each patriarch except Enoch (v 24), whose departure is described differently — he "walked with God, and was not, for God took him."
9. 'Kenan' (Qenan,) — the name resembles 'Cain' (Qayin), which has prompted scholarly discussion about whether this is a variant of the same name appearing in Seth's line. The rendering uses the standard English form.
10. Enosh's total lifespan of 905 years follows the standard genealogical formula. The extraordinarily long lifespans in this chapter have been interpreted variously: as literal years, as representing dynasties, or as reflecting a pre-flood vitality that diminished after the flood.
11. The death formula vayyamot ("and he died") marks the end of Kenan's entry in the genealogy. This refrain appears for each patriarch except Enoch (v 24), whose departure is described differently — he "walked with God, and was not, for God took him."
12. 'Mahalalel' () means 'praise of God' — from mahalal ('praise') and El ('God'). The name embeds a declaration of praise within the genealogy.
13. Kenan's total lifespan of 910 years follows the standard genealogical formula. The extraordinarily long lifespans in this chapter have been interpreted variously: as literal years, as representing dynasties, or as reflecting a pre-flood vitality that diminished after the flood.
14. The death formula vayyamot ("and he died") marks the end of Mahalalel's entry in the genealogy. This refrain appears for each patriarch except Enoch (v 24), whose departure is described differently — he "walked with God, and was not, for God took him."
15. 'Jared' (Yered,) may mean 'descent' — from yarad (, 'to go down, to descend').
16. Mahalalel's total lifespan of 895 years follows the standard genealogical formula. The extraordinarily long lifespans in this chapter have been interpreted variously: as literal years, as representing dynasties, or as reflecting a pre-flood vitality that diminished after the flood.
17. The death formula vayyamot ("and he died") marks the end of Jared's entry in the genealogy. This refrain appears for each patriarch except Enoch (v 24), whose departure is described differently — he "walked with God, and was not, for God took him."
18. 'Enoch' (Chanokh,) — the same name as Cain's son in 4:17 ('dedicated'). This Enoch, in Seth's line, will be distinguished by his extraordinary fate (vv. 22–24).
19. Jared's total lifespan of 962 years follows the standard genealogical formula. The extraordinarily long lifespans in this chapter have been interpreted variously: as literal years, as representing dynasties, or as reflecting a pre-flood vitality that diminished after the flood.

- 20. Jared has the second-longest lifespan in this genealogy, after Methuselah (969 years, v. 27).
- 21. 'Methuselah' (Metushelach,) — the name's meaning is debated. Possible interpretations include 'man of the javelin' (from mat, 'man,' and shelach, 'weapon/missile') or 'his death shall bring' (from mut, 'death,' and shalach, 'to send'). If the latter, the name may be prophetic: according to the chronology, Methuselah dies in the year of the flood.
- 22. 'Walked with God' (vayyithallekh Chanokh et-ha'Elohim,) — a unique expression in this chapter that breaks the genealogical formula. Where every other patriarch simply 'lived,' Enoch 'walked with God.' The hitpa'el of halakh ('to walk') is the same form used for God's walking in the garden (3:8). It implies a sustained, intimate companionship — a habitual way of life in God's presence. The same phrase is later used of Noah (6:9).
- 22. The preposition et ('with') indicates accompaniment — Enoch and God walked together, as companions. This is the most compressed and powerful character description in Genesis.
- 23. Enoch's lifespan of 365 years is by far the shortest in this chapter — yet the narrative presents it not as a truncation but as a distinction. The number 365 corresponds to the days in a solar year, which some scholars see as significant, though the text does not draw this connection explicitly.
- 23. Crucially, this verse omits the expected refrain 'and he died.' The absence is deafening in a chapter built on the drumbeat of death. What happened instead is stated in the next verse.
- 24. 'He was not' (ve'einennu,) — instead of 'and he died,' the text says 'and he was not.' The phrase means 'he was no longer' or 'he was gone' — he was no longer present in the earthly realm. This terse statement, unique in the chapter, has fascinated readers for millennia.
- 24. 'God took him' (laqach oto Elohim,) — the verb laqach ('to take') here implies divine removal from earth. The text does not say where God took him or what form this taking assumed. Later tradition understood it as bodily translation to heaven (cf. Hebrews 11:5; Sirach 44:16; 49:14). The only other person described as being 'taken' by God is Elijah (2 Kings 2:1–11).
- 24. In a genealogy dominated by death, Enoch's entry stands as a dramatic exception. The pattern of 'and he died... and he died... and he died' is broken by a life so characterized by walking with God that death is bypassed entirely. The contrast gives the chapter a theological dimension beyond mere record-keeping.
- 25. 'Lamech' () — the same name as the violent descendant of Cain (4:18–24), but a different person. The name's meaning is uncertain.
- 26. Methuselah's total lifespan of 969 years — the longest lifespan recorded in the Hebrew Bible follows the standard genealogical formula. The extraordinarily long lifespans in this chapter have been interpreted variously: as literal years, as representing dynasties, or as reflecting a pre-flood vitality that diminished after the flood.
- 27. Methuselah's 969 years make him the longest-lived person recorded in the Bible. According to the MT chronology, Methuselah dies in the year of the flood (his birth year + his age at death = the year of the flood in 7:6). Whether this is coincidental or intentional is debated; if intentional, it suggests he died in the flood or immediately before it.
- 28. Lamech's entry breaks the formula by not immediately naming his son. Instead, the naming and its explanation are given in the next verse — the most theologically significant naming in the genealogy.
- 29. 'Noah' (Noach,) — the name is explained with a wordplay, though it is not a direct etymological match. Noah is related to nuach (, 'to rest'), but Lamech's explanation uses the verb nacham (, 'to comfort, to bring relief'). The sound connection (noach/ynachamenu) creates the wordplay even though the roots differ: Noah ('rest') will 'comfort/relieve' (nacham) them. 'Relief' is used to capture the nuach/nacham overlap.
- 29. 'Painful toil of our hands' (itstsevon yadenu,) — the word itsstsevon is the same root used for the woman's pain in childbearing (3:16) and the man's painful toil with the ground (3:17). Lamech's lament explicitly references the curse of 3:17 ('the ground that the LORD has cursed') — the consequences of the fall are still felt and still lamented generations later.
- 29. Lamech's hope that Noah will bring relief from the curse anticipates Noah's role in the flood narrative — though the 'relief' comes in a way no one expected.
- 30. The formulaic pattern resumes.
- 31. Lamech's lifespan of 777 years contains the number seven three times. Whether this is numerically significant or coincidental is debated. In light of Lamech of Cain's line claiming 'seventy-sevenfold' vengeance (4:24), the sevens in this Lamech's lifespan may create an intentional contrast between the line of violence and the line of faith.
- 32. The genealogy ends without the formula 'and he died' for Noah — his story continues in the following chapters. Noah's entry lacks the closure that every other patriarch receives (except Enoch, for a different reason). Noah's death is not recorded until 9:29.
- 32. 'Shem, Ham, and Japheth' — the three sons of Noah who will become the ancestors of all post-flood humanity (chapters 9–10). 'Shem' () means 'name' or 'renown'; 'Ham' () means 'hot' or 'warm'; 'Japheth' () may mean 'enlarged' or 'beautiful,' related to the root y-p-h ('beauty') or p-t-h ('to enlarge'). Though listed in this order, Shem may not be the eldest (cf. 10:21, which is ambiguous).

Summary: The 'sons of God' take human wives, producing the Nephilim. God sees that human wickedness is total and resolves to blot out life from the earth. But Noah finds favor in God's eyes. God instructs Noah to build an ark, announces the coming flood, and establishes his covenant with Noah.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter introduces three theologically foundational words for the first time: chen ('favor/grace,' v. 8), berit ('covenant,' v. 18), and chamas ('violence,' v. 11). The statement that 'every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time' (v. 5) uses five terms of totality — the most comprehensive indictment of the human condition in the Hebrew Bible. God's response is not cold judgment but grief: 'he was grieved to his heart' (v. 6).*

Translation Friction: *The identity of the benei ha'Elohim ('sons of God,' v. 2) has generated centuries of debate: angelic beings, royal figures, or the Sethite line. The Hebrew phrase is used elsewhere exclusively for heavenly beings (Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7), but we preserved the literal wording and noted the ambiguity. The word tevah ('ark,' v. 14) is not a ship but a sealed container — its only other occurrence is for Moses' basket (Exodus 2:3). We also noted that the verb kaphar ('to coat with pitch,' v. 14) shares the root of kippur ('atonement').*

Connections: *The corruption of 'all flesh' (6:12) inverts the 'very good' of 1:31. The first occurrence of berit ('covenant,' 6:18) launches the Bible's central relational concept, developed with Abraham (ch. 15, 17), at Sinai (Exodus 19-24), and with David (2 Samuel 7). The Nephilim reappear in Numbers 13:33 in the spies' terrified report.*

¹When mankind began to multiply on the face of the ground and daughters were born to them, ²the sons of God saw that the daughters of mankind were beautiful, and they took as wives any they chose. ³Then the LORD said, "My spirit will not remain in mankind forever, for he is flesh. His days will be 120 years." ⁴The Nephilim were on the earth in those days—and also afterward—when the sons of God went in to the daughters of mankind and they bore children to them. These were the mighty men of old, men of renown. ⁵The LORD saw that the wickedness of mankind was great on the earth, and that every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time. ⁶The LORD regretted that he had made mankind on the earth, and he was grieved to his heart. ⁷The LORD said, "I will blot out mankind whom I have created from the face of the ground—mankind together with animals, crawling things, and birds of the sky—for I regret that I have made them." ⁸But Noah found favor in the eyes of the LORD. ⁹These are the generations of Noah. Noah was a righteous man, blameless in his generation. Noah walked with God. ¹⁰Noah fathered three sons: Shem, Ham, and Japheth. ¹¹The earth had become morally ruined in God's sight, and it overflowed with violence. ¹²God saw the earth, and it was corrupt, for all flesh had corrupted its way on the earth. ¹³God said to Noah, "The end of all flesh has come before me, for the earth is filled with violence because of them. I am about to destroy them along with the earth. ¹⁴Make yourself an ark of gopher wood. You shall make rooms in the ark and coat it inside and out with pitch. ¹⁵This is how you are to make it: the length of the ark 300 cubits, its width 50 cubits, and its height 30 cubits. ¹⁶Make a roof for the ark, and finish it to a cubit above. Set the door of the ark in its side. Make it with lower, second, and third decks. ¹⁷And I—I am about to bring the flood, waters upon the earth, to destroy all flesh in which there is the breath of life from under the sky. Everything that is on the earth will perish. ¹⁸But I will establish my covenant with you, and you will enter the ark—you, your sons, your wife, and your sons' wives with you. ¹⁹And from every living thing, from all flesh, you shall bring two of every kind into the ark to keep them alive with you. They shall be male and female. ²⁰Of the birds according to their kinds, of the livestock according to their kinds, and of every crawling thing of the ground according to its kind—two of every kind will come to you, to be kept alive. ²¹And you, take for yourself every kind of food that is eaten and gather it to yourself, and it will be food for you and for them." ²²Noah did this; according to all that God commanded him, so he did.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Mankind' translates ha'adam (), used here collectively for the human race. The setting is the spread of humanity across the earth, continuing the population growth implied in chapter 5.

1. 'On the face of the ground' (al-penei ha'adamah) — the same phrase that connects humanity to the soil throughout Genesis. The verse sets the stage for the crisis that follows.
2. 'Sons of God' (benei-ha'Elohim,) — one of the most debated phrases in Genesis. Major interpretations include: (1) angelic beings or divine beings from God's heavenly court (the most common ancient Jewish and early Christian reading; cf. Job 1:6; 2:1; 38:7; Psalm 29:1; 82:6); (2) descendants of Seth's godly line intermarrying with Cain's ungodly line; (3) ancient kings or rulers who bore the title 'sons of God' as a royal designation. The rendering preserves the Hebrew phrase without resolving the identity question.
2. 'Took as wives any they chose' (vayyiqchu lahem nashim mikkol asher bacharu) — the language of 'taking' wives and choosing freely has been read as either legitimate marriage or coercive seizure. The context (leading to divine judgment) suggests the marriages are portrayed negatively, though the precise nature of the transgression is not made explicit.
3. This verse is extremely difficult in Hebrew. The verb yadon () is uncertain — proposals include 'strive,' 'contend,' 'abide,' 'remain,' 'rule,' or 'shield.' The rendering follows the reading 'remain' (from dun/din), understanding God's spirit as the life-giving breath (cf. 2:7) that will not sustain human life indefinitely.
3. 'For he is flesh' (beshaggam hu vassar,) — the word beshaggam is also difficult. It is either a compound word meaning 'because also' (be + she + gam) or related to shagag ('to err, to go astray'). 'Flesh' (basar) emphasizes human mortality and weakness — humanity is fundamentally physical and perishable.
3. '120 years' — this has been interpreted as: (1) the maximum human lifespan going forward (though post-flood patriarchs still exceed it); (2) a grace period of 120 years before the flood arrives; (3) a general statement about the reduction of human lifespans. The text does not specify which meaning is intended.
4. 'Nephilim' () is retained untranslated because its meaning is uncertain and its use as a designation for a specific group is well established. The word may be related to the root n-p-l (, 'to fall') — hence 'fallen ones' — but this etymology is disputed. The Septuagint translated it as gigantes ('giants'), which is the basis of the KJV's 'giants.' The Nephilim appear again in Numbers 13:33, where the Israelite spies report seeing them in Canaan.
4. The syntax of the verse is complex. It may be saying: (1) the Nephilim were already on earth when the sons of God intermarried; (2) the Nephilim were the offspring of these unions; (3) both — they were present before and continued after. The phrase 'and also afterward' (vegam acharei-khen) indicates their presence was not limited to one period.
4. 'Mighty men of old, men of renown' (hagibborim asher me'olam anshei hasshem) — gibborim are 'mighty warriors' or 'heroes.' Anshei hasshem literally means 'men of the name' — famous or renowned. The language recalls ancient hero traditions but the narrative context is judgment, not celebration.
5. This verse presents one of the most sweeping moral assessments in scripture. The evaluation is comprehensive: 'every inclination... only evil... all the time.' Three absolute terms (every, only, all the time) leave no room for exception.
5. 'Every inclination of the thoughts of his heart' (kol-yetser machshevot libbo,) — the word yetser (, 'inclination, formation, imagination') comes from the same root as yatsar ('to form,' used for God forming the man in 2:7). The yetser is the inner formation or bent of the human heart — the direction of thought and desire. In later Jewish theology, the yetser hara ('evil inclination') becomes a major concept. Here the yetser is wholly given over to evil.
5. The LORD's evaluation in chapter 1 was 'very good' (1:31); now the evaluation is 'only evil.' The contrast frames the narrative arc from creation to corruption.
6. 'Regretted' translates vayyinnachem (), from nacham (), which can mean 'to be sorry, to regret, to repent, to relent, to be comforted.' This is the same root used in 5:29 for Noah's name ('this one will comfort/relieve us'). The juxtaposition is striking: Noah is supposed to bring nacham (comfort), but God feels nacham (regret). The word creates a painful irony.
6. 'Grieved to his heart' (vayyit'atstsev el-libbo,) — the root '-ts-b is the same root used for the woman's pain in childbirth (3:16) and the man's toil with the ground (3:17). Humanity's itsstavon (painful toil) now produces divine itsstavon (grief). God experiences pain in response to what his creation has become.
6. This verse raises profound theological questions about divine emotions, omniscience, and immutability. The text presents God as genuinely affected by human wickedness — experiencing regret and grief. The rendering follows the text's anthropomorphic language faithfully.
7. 'Blot out' translates emcheh (), from machah (, 'to wipe, to blot out, to erase'). The image is of wiping a surface clean — erasing what has been written or created. The same verb is used in Exodus 32:32–33 for blotting a name from God's book.
7. The scope of judgment encompasses not only humanity but animals, crawling things, and birds — the same categories created in chapter 1. The corruption of humanity has consequences for the entire created order. The ecological scope of judgment mirrors the ecological scope of the original blessing.
7. 'For I regret that I have made them' — nichamti () repeats the nacham of verse 6, confirming the divine grief that motivates the judgment.

8. 'Found favor' translates matsa chen (), literally 'found grace/favor.' The word chen () means 'grace, favor, charm, attractiveness.' This is the first occurrence of chen in the Bible. The phrase 'found favor in the eyes of' is a Hebrew idiom meaning 'to be regarded favorably by' or 'to win the approval of.' Following the prompt's guidance on idioms, the original expression is retained here as it is still intelligible in English and preserves the theological weight of 'favor/grace.'
8. This single verse pivots the entire narrative. After the sweeping condemnation of all humanity (vv. 5–7), one man stands as an exception. The Hebrew word order is emphatic — veNoach ('But Noah') — placing Noah in sharp contrast to the universal wickedness. The name Noah also creates a wordplay with chen when read backward (n-ch / ch-n), though whether this is intentional is debated.
9. This is the third toledot formula in Genesis (cf. 2:4; 5:1).
9. 'Righteous' (tsaddiq,) — the first use of this word in the Bible. Tsaddiq denotes one who conforms to the standard of right relationship — with God and with others. It becomes one of the most important character descriptions in the Hebrew Bible.
9. 'Blameless' (tamim,) means 'complete, whole, without blemish, having integrity.' It is the same word used for sacrificial animals that must be 'without blemish' (Leviticus 1:3, 10). Applied to Noah, it indicates moral integrity and wholeness of character, not sinless perfection.
9. 'In his generation' (bedorotav,) — the qualification 'in his generation' has been read two ways: (1) as a compliment — Noah was righteous even amid a wicked generation; (2) as a limitation — he was righteous only by the low standards of his generation. The text likely intends the former, but the ambiguity has been noted since ancient times.
9. 'Noah walked with God' (et-ha'Elohim hithhallelkh-Noach) — the same phrase used for Enoch (5:22, 24). Only these two men are said to have 'walked with God' in the pre-flood narrative. The language of intimate, sustained divine companionship sets Noah apart.
10. The three sons are listed as in 5:32. They will become the three branches of post-flood humanity in the Table of Nations (chapter 10).
11. 'Corrupt' translates vattishshachet (), from shachat (, 'to corrupt, to ruin, to destroy'). The same root will appear in verse 13 and 17 for God's intention to 'destroy' — the earth corrupted itself, and God will complete the corruption/destruction. There is a grim wordplay: humanity's self-corruption leads to God's destruction using the same verb.
11. 'Violence' translates chamas (), meaning 'violence, injustice, wrong, cruelty.' Chamas is a broader term than simple physical violence — it encompasses oppression, injustice, and the violation of others' rights and dignity. The earth is full of it.
12. 'God saw the earth' (vayyar Elohim et-ha'arets) — this echoes 1:31 ('God saw everything that he had made, and it was very good'). The divine evaluation formula from creation returns, but the verdict has reversed: what was 'very good' is now 'corrupt.' The Hebrew structure deliberately mirrors the creation account to underscore the anti-creation that corruption represents.
12. 'All flesh had corrupted its way' — 'flesh' (basar,) is used broadly for all living creatures. The corruption is not limited to humans; 'all flesh' — possibly including the animal world — has departed from God's intended order.
13. 'The end of all flesh has come before me' (qets kol-basar ba lefanai) — qets means 'end, limit, conclusion.' God announces the termination of the present order.
13. 'I am about to destroy them along with the earth' (hineni mashchitam et-ha'arets) — the verb mashchit is from the same root shachat used for the earth's corruption (v. 11–12). The wordplay is devastating: because they have corrupted (shachat) the earth, God will destroy (shachat) them with the earth. God's judgment mirrors the crime — the verb of their sin becomes the verb of their sentence.
13. 'Along with the earth' (et-ha'arets) — the preposition et can mean 'with' or be the direct object marker. If 'with,' God destroys them along with the earth; if the object marker, God destroys them and the earth. Both readings indicate the cosmic scope of the judgment.
14. 'Ark' translates tevah (), a word used only here (for Noah's ark) and in Exodus 2:3, 5 (for the basket in which baby Moses is placed). It is not the word used for the ark of the covenant (aron). Tevah may be an Egyptian loanword meaning 'chest' or 'box.' The vessel is essentially a large, sealed container — not a ship designed for navigation.
14. 'Gopher wood' (atsei-gopher,) — the type of wood is unknown. Gopher appears only here in the Hebrew Bible and has not been conclusively identified. Proposals include cypress, cedar, or resinous wood. The rendering retains the untranslatable term.
14. 'Coat it... with pitch' (vekhapharta... bakkopher) — there is a significant wordplay here: the verb kaphar (, 'to coat, to cover') and the noun kopher (, 'pitch, covering') share the same root as the theological term kippur (, 'atonement'). The ark is 'atoned' — covered, sealed, protected — using the language that will later describe the covering of sin. The rendering uses 'coat' for the verb and 'pitch' for the noun, but the theological resonance is noted.
15. A cubit (ammah,) is approximately 18 inches (45 cm). At 300 cubits long, the ark would be approximately 450 feet (137 meters) long, 75 feet (23 meters) wide, and 45 feet (14 meters) high. These are substantial dimensions — roughly the length of a modern cargo ship. The proportions (6:1 length-to-width ratio) are consistent with a seaworthy vessel, though the ark is designed for flotation and survival, not navigation.
16. 'Roof' translates tsohar (), a word of uncertain meaning. It could refer to: (1) a roof or covering; (2) a window or opening for light (from tsohar, 'noon/brightness'); (3) a skylight. The KJV's 'window' follows the light-related meaning. 'Roof' is adopted here as the more likely meaning given the instruction to 'finish it to a cubit above,' which suggests a roof with a one-cubit gap for ventilation.

16. 'Three decks' (tachtiyyim sheniyyim ushelishim) — literally 'lower ones, second ones, and third ones.' The ark has three levels — lower, middle, and upper.
17. 'I—I am about to bring' (va'ani hineni mevi) — the emphatic 'I' (va'ani) followed by hineni ('here I am') and the participle mevi ('bringing') creates a solemn, emphatic divine announcement. God personally takes responsibility for the coming destruction.
17. 'The flood' (hamabbul,) — this word appears only in the flood narrative (Genesis 6–9) and in Psalm 29:10. It designates a unique, catastrophic deluge, not ordinary flooding. The definite article ('the flood') treats it as a singular, unrepeatable event.
17. 'The breath of life' (ruach chayyim,) — ruach here means 'breath' or 'spirit of life.' Every creature animated by the divine breath will be destroyed. The same breath that gave life in 2:7 will be extinguished.
17. 'Perish' translates yigva (, from gava (, 'to die, to expire, to breathe one's last'). This is a more visceral word for death than the standard mut — it suggests gasping, expiring.
18. 'I will establish my covenant' (vahaqimoti et-beriti,) — this is the first occurrence of the word berit (, 'covenant') in the Bible. The covenant concept will become the central organizing principle of the biblical narrative. Here it is introduced without definition or ceremony — God simply declares that he will establish his covenant with Noah. The formal covenant ceremony comes in 9:8–17.
18. The verb haqim ('to establish, to set up, to confirm') rather than karat ('to cut,' the more common verb for covenant-making) may suggest the confirmation of an existing arrangement rather than the initiation of a new one.
18. 'But' (the waw on vahaqimoti) marks a stark contrast: God will destroy all flesh, BUT he will establish his covenant with Noah. Judgment and covenant exist in tension — God's saving purpose persists through the destruction.
19. 'To keep them alive with you' (lehachayot ittakh,) — the purpose of the ark is preservation of life. The hiphil of chayah ('to live') means 'to cause to live, to keep alive.' Noah's mission is life-preservation amid universal death.
19. 'Male and female' (zakhar unqevah,) — the same pairing from 1:27. The creation mandate of fruitfulness and multiplication is preserved through the ark. The ark functions as a micro-creation — a remnant of the original order carried through the waters of judgment.
20. 'Will come to you' (yavo'u eleikha) — the animals come to Noah; he does not need to hunt or gather them. The gathering is divinely orchestrated.
20. The categories — birds, livestock, crawling things — echo the creation categories of chapter 1 (1:20–25). The 'according to their kinds' (leminehu) formula also echoes 1:11–12, 21, 24–25. The ark preserves the created order 'according to its kinds.'
21. The provision for food encompasses both human and animal needs. The instruction is practical — the ark must be provisioned for an extended voyage. God commands the preparation but leaves the details to Noah's judgment.
22. 'According to all that God commanded him, so he did' — this formula of exact obedience will be repeated (7:5, 9, 16). Noah's obedience is total and without recorded hesitation, question, or negotiation. He does not speak in chapter 6 — he simply acts. In a generation defined by corruption and violence, Noah's silent obedience stands as the defining response of faith.
22. The formula echoes the creation pattern: God speaks, and the response corresponds exactly to the command (cf. 1:3, 'Let there be light, and there was light'). Noah's obedience mirrors creation's obedience to the Creator's word.

Summary: God commands Noah to enter the ark with his family and the animals — seven pairs of clean animals and one pair of unclean. The flood comes: the springs of the great deep burst open and the windows of the sky open. Water covers all mountains. Every living thing outside the ark perishes. The waters prevail for 150 days.

What Makes This Remarkable: The flood is presented not as mere rainfall but as a cosmic un-creation: the 'springs of the great deep' and the 'windows of the sky' (v. 11) undo the separations of day 2 (1:6-7), returning the world to the watery chaos of 1:2. The word mabbul ('flood') appears only here and in Psalm 29:10, marking this as a unique, unrepeatable cataclysm. The detail that 'the LORD shut him in' (v. 16) shows God as both judge and protector — the same hand that unleashes destruction personally seals the door of safety.

Translation Friction: The distinction between clean and unclean animals (v. 2) appears before Levitical law formally defines these categories (Leviticus 11). We retained the terms as the Hebrew presents them, noting that the narrator assumes the reader understands a clean/unclean distinction that predates Sinai. The precise meaning of 'seven pairs' versus 'seven' for clean animals is debated; we followed the reading 'seven pairs, a male and its mate.'

Connections: The 'breath of the spirit of life' (v. 22) echoes God's breath in 2:7 — what God gave, the flood takes away. The forty days and nights (v. 12) establish a pattern of testing and transition that recurs with Moses (Exodus 34:28), Elijah (1 Kings 19:8), and Jesus (Matthew 4:2). Noah's obedience formula — 'according to all that God commanded him' (v. 5) — anticipates the obedience language of the tabernacle construction.

¹Then the LORD said to Noah, "Come, you and all your household, into the ark, for I have seen that you are righteous before me in this generation. ²Of every clean animal you shall take seven pairs, a male and its mate, and of the animals that are not clean, two, a male and its mate, ³and also of the birds of the sky, seven pairs, male and female, to keep their offspring alive on the face of all the earth. ⁴For in seven more days I will send rain on the earth for forty days and forty nights, and I will blot out every living thing that I have made from the face of the ground." ⁵Noah carried out everything exactly as the LORD had instructed him. ⁶Noah was 600 years old when the flood waters came upon the earth. ⁷Noah and his sons and his wife and his sons' wives entered the ark because of the waters of the flood. ⁸Of clean animals and of animals that are not clean, of birds, and of everything that crawls on the ground, ⁹two by two they came to Noah into the ark, male and female, as God had commanded Noah. ¹⁰After seven days, the waters of the flood came upon the earth. ¹¹In the six hundredth year of Noah's life, in the second month, on the seventeenth day of the month—on that day all the springs of the great deep burst open, and the windows of the sky were opened. ¹²Rain fell on the earth for forty days and forty nights. ¹³On that very day, Noah and Shem, Ham, and Japheth, Noah's sons, along with Noah's wife and the three wives of his sons, entered the ark— ¹⁴they and every wild animal according to its kind, all livestock according to their kinds, every crawling thing that crawls on the earth according to its kind, and every bird according to its kind, every winged creature. ¹⁵They came to Noah into the ark, two by two of all flesh in which there was the breath of life. ¹⁶Those that entered, male and female of all flesh, came as God had commanded him. Then the LORD shut him in. ¹⁷The flood continued forty days on the earth. The waters increased and lifted the ark, and it rose above the earth. ¹⁸The waters surged and increased greatly on the earth, and the ark floated on the surface of the waters. ¹⁹The waters surged so greatly on the earth that all the high mountains under all the sky were covered. ²⁰The waters surged fifteen cubits above, and the mountains were covered. ²¹All flesh perished that moved on the earth—birds, livestock, wild animals, every swarming thing that swarms on the earth, and all mankind. ²²Everything on dry land that had the breath of the spirit of life in its nostrils died. ²³He blotted out every living thing that was on the face of the ground—from mankind to livestock to crawling things to birds of the sky. They were blotted out from the earth. Only Noah was left, and those who were with him in the ark. ²⁴The waters surged on the earth 150 days.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Come' (bo,) — God invites Noah into the ark. The use of 'come' (rather than 'go') may imply that God is already present in the ark, inviting Noah to join him. Alternatively, it is simply the standard imperative for entering a space.
1. 'Righteous before me' (tsaddiq lefanai) — God affirms the narrator's assessment from 6:9. Noah's righteousness is validated by God himself. The qualification 'in this generation' (baddor hazzeh) is maintained, as in 6:9.
2. 'Seven pairs' translates shiv'ah shiv'ah (), literally 'seven seven.' This distributive expression most likely means 'seven pairs' (seven of each sex = fourteen total) or possibly 'seven' (three pairs plus one for sacrifice). The KJV's 'by sevens' is ambiguous in the same way. 'Seven pairs' is adopted following the majority reading.
2. 'Clean' (tehorah,) — the distinction between clean and unclean animals presupposes categories that are formally codified only later in Leviticus 11 and Deuteronomy 14. The narrative assumes this knowledge without explaining its origin. The additional clean animals presumably provide for sacrifice (8:20) without endangering the species.
2. This instruction supplements 6:19–20, which mentioned only 'two of every kind.' The additional clean animals in chapter 7 address the need for sacrifice and may reflect a different literary strand, though the text as it stands is coherent: the general instruction (two) is supplemented by the specific (seven pairs of clean animals).
3. 'To keep their offspring alive' (lechayat zera,) — literally 'to keep seed alive.' The purpose is the continuation of species — preserving the capacity for reproduction. Zera ('seed/offspring') connects to the seed-language of 1:11–12 and 3:15.

4. 'Seven more days' — a final grace period before judgment. The number seven echoes the seven days of creation; the destruction will begin after a creation-week of waiting.
4. 'Forty days and forty nights' (arba'im yom ve'arba'im laylah) — forty is a significant number throughout the Bible, typically associated with periods of testing, judgment, or transition (Israel's 40 years in the wilderness, Moses's 40 days on Sinai, Elijah's 40-day journey, Jesus's 40 days of temptation).
4. 'Blot out' (machiti,) — the same verb from 6:7. God reaffirms the sentence.
5. The obedience formula from 6:22 is repeated. Noah's compliance is total and immediate, without recorded question or delay.
6. The precise dating of the flood (Noah's age, and the exact month/day in v. 11) gives the narrative a chronicle-like specificity. The flood is presented as a datable historical event within the genealogical framework of Genesis 5.
7. Eight people total enter the ark: Noah, his three sons (Shem, Ham, Japheth), Noah's wife, and the three sons' wives. These eight will be the ancestors of all post-flood humanity (cf. 1 Peter 3:20).
8. This verse lists the categories of animals entering the ark, continuing the sentence into verse 9.
9. 'Two by two' (shenayim shenayim,) — the distributive form, 'in pairs.' The animals come in ordered pairs, male and female, preserving the creation pattern.
9. 'As God had commanded Noah' — the obedience formula again. The pattern is established: divine command, exact human compliance.
10. The seven-day grace period announced in verse 4 has elapsed. The judgment commences exactly as foretold.
11. The precise dating (year, month, day) continues the chronicle-like precision of the narrative.
11. 'All the springs of the great deep burst open' (nivqe'u kol-ma'yenot tehom rabbah) — tehom ('deep') recalls the primordial deep of 1:2. The flood is presented as an undoing of creation: the waters that God separated and contained (1:6–10) are now released. The 'great deep' (tehom rabbah) suggests the subterranean ocean beneath the earth in ancient Near Eastern cosmology.
11. 'The windows of the sky were opened' (va'arubot hashamayim niftachu) — the 'windows' or 'floodgates' of the sky are openings in the raqia (expanse/firmament of 1:6–8) through which the waters above the expanse pour down. The flood comes from both below (springs of the deep) and above (windows of the sky) — a systematic reversal of the separations made on day 2 (1:6–7) and day 3 (1:9–10) of creation.
11. The flood is thus presented not as merely extreme weather but as a cosmic de-creation — a return to the watery chaos of 1:2.
12. The forty-day rainfall fulfills the announcement in verse 4. The word geshem (, 'rain') is the ordinary word for rain — but the previous verse makes clear this is no ordinary storm. It is cosmic waters pouring through opened floodgates and erupting from ruptured depths.
13. 'On that very day' (be'etsem hayyom hazzeh,) — this emphatic temporal phrase emphasizes the precise timing. The same expression is used for significant dates elsewhere (cf. Genesis 17:23, 26; Exodus 12:17, 41, 51; Deuteronomy 32:48). The sons are now named, individualizing the narrative.
14. The comprehensive listing echoes the creation categories: wild animals, livestock, crawling things, birds. The phrase 'according to its kind' (leminehu) repeats the creation language of chapter 1. The ark preserves the ordered diversity that God established.
15. 'The breath of life' (ruach chayyim) — the same phrase from 6:17. All creatures animated by God's life-giving breath enter the ark. The breath that God breathed into the man (2:7) sustains all animal life.
16. 'The LORD shut him in' (vayyigzor YHWH ba'ado,) — this brief, remarkable statement says that God himself closes the ark door behind Noah. The divine name YHWH (rather than Elohim) is used for this personal, protective act. God seals Noah inside — an act of care and finality. Those inside are saved; those outside are not. The closing of the door marks the point of no return.
16. The preposition ba'ad ('behind him' or 'on his behalf') can mean 'behind/around' (God closed the door behind him) or 'for his sake' (God sealed him in for his protection). Both senses are present.
17. The rising waters are described with increasing intensity through verses 17–20. The ark, the vessel of salvation, rises with the waters — the instrument of judgment becomes the means of elevation for those within. The language shifts from passive description to active force: the waters 'increased,' 'lifted,' and the ark 'rose.'
18. 'Surged' translates vayyigberu (, from gavar (, 'to be strong, to prevail, to overcome'). The waters are described as a conquering force — overpowering the earth. The verb intensifies the sense of unstoppable power.
19. 'So greatly' translates me'od me'od (, a doubled intensive — 'exceedingly, exceedingly.' The doubling of me'od is rare and emphatic (cf. 17:2, 6, 20; 30:43).
19. 'All the high mountains under all the sky' (kol-heharim hagevohim asher-tachat kol-hashamayim) — the language is universal and absolute. Whether this reflects a global perspective or the perspective of the ancient Near Eastern world known to the author is a question of interpretation, not translation. The rendering follows the Hebrew.
20. Fifteen cubits (approximately 22.5 feet / 6.9 meters) — the waters rose this distance above the mountaintops. Fifteen cubits is half the ark's height (30 cubits, 6:15), which would ensure the ark could float freely over any submerged peak without grounding.

21. 'Perished' translates vayyigva (וַיִּיגַוּ), from gava ('to expire, to breathe one's last') — the same visceral verb from 6:17. The listing of destroyed categories reverses the creation order: where chapter 1 built up the animal kingdom category by category, chapter 7 tears it down. The list ends with 'all mankind' (vekhoh ha'adam) — humanity, created last in chapter 1, dies last in the account of destruction.
22. 'The breath of the spirit of life' (nishmat-ruach chayyim, נִשְׁמַת־רוּחַ חַיִּים) — a compound phrase combining neshamah ('breath,' cf. 2:7) and ruach ('spirit/breath/wind'). This double expression intensifies the description of animate life — everything that breathes, everything sustained by the divine breath, perished. The phrase echoes 2:7, where God breathed the neshamah of life into the man's nostrils. What God breathed in, the waters now extinguish.
23. 'On dry land' (becharavah, בְּחֶרֶב) — only land-dwelling, air-breathing creatures are destroyed. Aquatic life is not mentioned in the judgment.
23. 'He blotted out' (vayyimach, וַיַּיְמַח) — the verb from 6:7 and 7:4 is now fulfilled. What God announced, God has accomplished.
23. 'Only Noah was left' (vayyishsha'er akh-Noach) — the particle akh ('only, alone') emphasizes the solitary survival. From the teeming life of creation, only Noah and his ark-companions remain. The contrast between the universal death and this single remnant is stark.
23. The verse structure creates a chiasm: God blotted out the listing of categories they were blotted out from the earth only Noah remained. The center focuses on the comprehensive destruction; the frame highlights divine agency and Noah's singular survival.
24. The 150-day duration extends well beyond the 40-day rain (v. 12). The waters continued to dominate the earth even after the rain stopped. The prolonged inundation underscores the totality of the judgment — this is not a flash flood but a sustained undoing of the habitable world. Chapter 8 will describe the gradual recession of these waters.

Summary: God remembers Noah. A wind passes over the earth, the waters recede, and the ark rests on Ararat. Noah sends out a raven and then a dove — twice — to test the waters. When the earth is dry, God commands Noah to exit. Noah builds an altar and offers sacrifices. God resolves never again to curse the ground or destroy all life.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theological pivot is the verb zakhar ('remembered,' v. 1): when God remembers, it is not a cognitive event but a relational turning — God acts to deliver. The dove returning with an olive leaf (v. 11) has become one of the Bible's most enduring symbols. God's inner resolve (v. 21) repeats almost verbatim the pre-flood diagnosis ('the inclination of the human heart is evil from youth') but now draws the opposite conclusion — not judgment but patience. The human condition has not changed; God's response to it has.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew ruach ('wind,' v. 1) that God sends over the earth is the same word translated 'Spirit' in 1:2. We rendered it as 'wind' here based on context, but the verbal echo with the creation narrative is deliberate — God's ruach inaugurates both creation and re-creation. The phrase reach hannichoach ('pleasing aroma,' v. 21) is anthropomorphic in a way that resists modern sensibilities; we translated it directly, as the Hebrew intends a real divine response to the sacrifice.

Connections: God 'remembering' Noah (8:1) establishes a pattern: God remembers Abraham (19:29), Rachel (30:22), and Israel in Egypt (Exodus 2:24). The post-flood cosmos echoes creation: wind over water (8:1; cf. 1:2), dry land appearing (8:13; cf. 1:9), the command to be fruitful (8:17; cf. 1:22). The never-again promise (8:21-22) leads directly into the Noahic covenant of chapter 9.

1God remembered Noah and all the wild animals and all the livestock that were with him in the ark. And God caused a wind to pass over the earth, and the waters subsided. 2The springs of the deep and the windows of the sky were closed, and the rain from the sky was restrained. 3The waters receded from the earth continually, and at the end of 150 days the waters had decreased. 4In the seventh month, on the seventeenth day of the month, the ark came to rest on the mountains of Ararat. 5The waters continued to decrease until the tenth month. In the tenth month, on the first day of the month, the tops of the mountains became visible. 6At the end of forty days, Noah opened the window of the ark that he had made. 7He sent out a raven, and it went back and forth until the waters had dried up from the earth. 8Then he sent out a dove from him to see whether the waters had receded from the surface of the ground. 9But the dove found no resting place for the sole of its foot, and it returned to him to the ark, for waters were on the surface of all the earth. He reached out his hand and took it and brought it back to himself into the ark. ¹⁰He waited seven more days and again sent out the dove from the ark. ¹¹The dove came back to him in the evening, and there in its beak was a freshly plucked olive leaf. So Noah knew that the waters had receded from the earth. ¹²He waited yet another seven days and sent out the dove, and it did not return to him again. ¹³In Noah's 601st year, in the first month, on the first day of the month, the waters had dried up from the earth. Noah removed the covering of the ark and looked, and the surface of the ground was drying. ¹⁴In the second month, on the twenty-seventh day of the month, the earth was dry. ¹⁵God spoke to Noah, saying, ¹⁶"Go out from the ark—you, your wife, your sons, and your sons' wives with you. ¹⁷Bring out with you every living thing that is with you—all flesh, birds and livestock and every crawling thing that crawls on the earth—so that they may swarm on the earth and be fruitful and multiply on the earth." ¹⁸So Noah went out, along with his sons, his wife, and his sons' wives. ¹⁹Every animal, every crawling thing, and every bird—everything that moves on the earth—went out of the ark by their families. ²⁰Then Noah built an altar to the LORD and took some of every clean animal and some of every clean bird and offered burnt offerings on the altar. ²¹The LORD smelled the pleasing aroma, and the LORD said in his heart, "I will never again curse the ground because of mankind, for the inclination of the human heart is evil from youth. And I will never again strike down every living thing as I have done. ²²As long as the earth endures, seedtime and harvest, cold and heat, summer and winter, day and night will not cease."

1. 'God remembered' (vayyizkor Elohim,) — this is the turning point of the flood narrative. Divine 'remembering' in the Hebrew Bible does not imply prior forgetfulness; it means God turns his active attention toward someone and acts on their behalf. The verb zakhar ('to remember') with God as subject is consistently an act of gracious intervention (cf. Genesis 19:29; 30:22; Exodus 2:24; 6:5). The flood narrative pivots on this word: from destruction to restoration, from judgment to mercy.
1. 'God caused a wind to pass over the earth' (vayya'aver Elohim ruach al-ha'arets) — ruach here means 'wind,' echoing 1:2 where the ruach Elohim ('Spirit/wind of God') moved over the waters. The creation parallel is deliberate: as God's ruach moved over the primordial waters at the beginning, so God's ruach now moves over the flood waters to begin the re-creation. The flood was a de-creation; the drying is a re-creation.
1. 'Subsided' translates vayyashokku (), from shakhakh (, 'to abate, to subside, to grow calm'). The turbulent waters begin to quiet.
2. The sources of the flood described in 7:11 are now closed: the springs of the deep are stopped and the windows of the sky are shut. The cosmic plumbing that was opened for destruction is now sealed. God re-establishes the boundaries between waters that the flood had dissolved.
3. 'Continually' translates halokh vashov (), literally 'going and returning' — a vivid image of the waters gradually ebbing in a back-and-forth movement, like a tide slowly withdrawing. The process is gradual, not sudden.
3. The 150-day mark connects to 7:24. After 150 days of domination, the waters begin to decrease.
4. 'Came to rest' translates vattanach (), from nuach (, 'to rest') — the same root as Noah's name (Noach). The ark of Noah (Noach) comes to rest (nuach). The wordplay connects Noah's identity to his destiny: the one whose name means 'rest' finds rest on Ararat.
4. 'The mountains of Ararat' (harei Ararat,) — Ararat refers to the ancient kingdom of Urartu, located in the region of modern eastern Turkey, Armenia, and northwestern Iran. The text says 'mountains' (plural), indicating the mountainous region rather than a specific peak. The identification with the specific mountain known today as 'Mount Ararat' (Ağrı Dağı) is a later tradition.
5. The recession is gradual — months pass between the ark's grounding (7th month) and the mountain peaks appearing (10th month). The narrative patiently tracks the slow restoration of the habitable world. The re-emergence of dry land echoes the third day of creation (1:9–10), when God gathered the waters to reveal the dry land.
6. 'Window' (challon,) — a different word from the tsohar ('roof/opening') of 6:16. This is a standard window through which Noah will send out birds to test the conditions.
7. 'A raven' (ha'orev,) — the raven, a scavenger bird, goes out and returns repeatedly ('went back and forth,' yatso yatso' vashov) without providing useful information. It can survive on floating carrion and does not need dry land. The sending of birds to test for dry land has parallels in other ancient Near Eastern flood traditions, notably the Epic of Gilgamesh (Tablet XI).
8. 'A dove' (hayyonah,) — the dove, unlike the raven, requires dry land, vegetation, and fresh water. It is a more reliable indicator of habitable conditions. The dove becomes a symbol of peace and hope in later tradition.
9. 'Found no resting place' (lo-mats'ah manoach,) — manoach is from the root nuach ('to rest'), the same root as Noah's name. The dove could not find noach (rest) — an echo of the naming wordplay. The world is not yet ready for rest.

9. Noah's reaching out to take the dove back is a tender, personal gesture — the only moment of physical action described for Noah in the flood narrative. He extends his hand to receive the exhausted bird.
10. Seven-day intervals structure Noah's testing (vv. 10, 12) — echoing the seven-day creation week and the seven-day waiting period before the flood (7:4, 10). The pattern of sevens continues.
11. 'A freshly plucked olive leaf' (aleh-zayit taraph bephiha,) — the olive leaf, freshly torn from a living tree, is proof that vegetation is growing above the waterline. The olive tree, which can survive periods of submersion, is among the first plants to recover. The olive branch/leaf has become one of the most enduring symbols of peace and new beginnings in Western civilization, drawn from this passage.
11. 'So Noah knew' (vayyeda Noah) — the verb yada ('to know') recurs. Noah gains knowledge through observation and evidence — the same verb used for the intimate knowledge of God and of each other throughout Genesis.
12. The three sendings of the dove form a progression: (1) returns with nothing — no land available; (2) returns with an olive leaf — land is emerging; (3) does not return — land is now habitable. The dove finds its manoch (resting place), the rest that was unavailable in verse 9.
13. The date — the first day of the first month of Noah's 601st year — marks a new beginning. Some scholars see this as symbolically New Year's Day, the start of a new era. The world is being reborn.
13. 'Drying' translates charvu (, from charav (, 'to be dry, to be desolate'). The ground is drying but not yet fully dry (that comes in v. 14). Noah looks out and sees the emergence of a new world.
14. The earth is fully dry exactly one year and ten days after the flood began (cf. 7:11: second month, seventeenth day second month, twenty-seventh day). The flood lasted just over a solar year. The new world is ready for habitation.
14. 'Dry' translates yavshah (, from yavash (, 'to be dry, to dry up') — a different word from charav in verse 13, indicating full dryness versus the process of drying.
15. God breaks the silence. Noah has waited patiently in the ark without divine instruction to leave. He entered when God commanded (7:1), and he waits to exit until God commands. The text does not record Noah leaving on his own initiative.
16. 'Go out' (tse,) — the command to exit parallels the command to enter (7:1, 'Come... into the ark'). God bookends the flood with commands: come in, go out. The order of names here differs from the entry order, listing Noah's wife immediately after Noah.
17. 'Be fruitful and multiply' (paru veravu,) — the creation blessing of 1:22 and 1:28 is reissued. The post-flood world receives the same mandate as the original creation. Life is to resume its God-intended expansion. The re-creation is complete when the creation blessing is renewed.
17. 'Swarm on the earth' (vesharetsu va'arets) — the same verb from 1:20 where the waters swarmed with life. The earth, emptied by the flood, is to be refilled with teeming life.
18. Noah's obedient exit mirrors his obedient entry. The narrator confirms compliance without commentary.
19. 'By their families' (lemishpechoteihem,) — the word mishpachah ('family, clan') replaces the 'according to their kinds' (lemin) of chapter 1. The animals leave as organized groups — families, not isolated individuals. The word choice may suggest that the animals have been fruitful even within the ark.
20. This is the first altar (mizbeach,) in the Bible and the first burnt offering (olah,). The altar is built 'to the LORD' (laYHWH) — using the personal covenant name, not the generic Elohim. Noah's first act in the new world is worship.
20. 'Burnt offerings' (olot,) — from the root 'l-h ('to go up'). The olah is a sacrifice entirely consumed by fire — it 'goes up' as smoke to God. Nothing is kept by the offerer. It is a total gift. The additional clean animals taken in 7:2 now serve their purpose — providing animals for sacrifice without diminishing the breeding population.
21. 'Pleasing aroma' translates reach hannichoach (, literally 'aroma of rest/soothing.' The word nichoach is from the same root as Noah's name (nuach, 'rest'). The offering of Noah (Noach) produces a nichoach (pleasing/restful) aroma. The wordplay completes the Noah-rest-comfort theme that began in 5:29.
21. 'The inclination of the human heart is evil from youth' (yetser lev ha'adam ra minne'urav) — strikingly, this assessment repeats almost exactly the pre-flood diagnosis of 6:5 ('every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil all the time'). The reason given for NOT destroying again is essentially the same reason given for destroying in the first place. The human condition has not changed — but God's response to it has. This is one of the most theologically dense statements in Genesis: God accommodates his dealings with humanity to humanity's moral reality, choosing mercy over deserved judgment.
21. 'I will never again' (lo-osif... od) — the double promise frames the divine commitment: never again curse the ground, never again destroy all life. This internal divine resolution is formalized as a covenant in 9:8–17.
22. This verse is structured as poetry — three pairs of opposites (seedtime/harvest, cold/heat, summer/winter) plus the foundational pair (day/night), forming a rhythmic declaration of cosmic stability. The created order, disrupted by the flood, is now guaranteed by divine promise.

22. 'Will not cease' (lo yishbotu,) — from shavat (, 'to cease, to rest, to stop'). The same verb used for God's rest on the seventh day (2:2–3). The natural cycles will not 'sabbath' — they will continue without interruption. The stability of creation is guaranteed for 'as long as the earth endures' (od kol-yemei ha'arets, 'all the remaining days of the earth').
22. The chapter ends with a comprehensive promise of cosmic regularity. After the cosmic disruption of the flood, God reaffirms the dependability of the natural order. The seasons, the agricultural cycle, and the alternation of day and night are secured by divine decree.

Summary: God blesses Noah and his sons, giving them dominion over animals and permission to eat meat — with the prohibition against consuming blood. God establishes his covenant with all living things, setting the rainbow as its sign. Noah plants a vineyard, becomes drunk, and is seen naked by Ham. Noah blesses Shem and Japheth but curses Canaan.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Noachic covenant is uniquely universal — made not only with humanity but with 'every living creature' (v. 10). The rainbow (qeshet) is also the Hebrew word for a war-bow; God hangs his weapon in the sky pointing away from the earth as a permanent sign of peace. The blood prohibition (v. 4) grounds the sanctity of life in the identity of blood with nephesh ('life/soul') — a principle that undergirds all later sacrificial theology. The post-flood world rhymes with Eden but is darker: the 'fear and dread' of animals (v. 2) replaces the harmony of 1:28.

Translation Friction: The phrase nephesh with its blood (v. 4) required careful handling because nephesh is not the Greek philosophical 'soul' but the animating life-force present in the blood. We rendered it as 'life' rather than 'soul.' What Ham 'did' to Noah (v. 24) is stated with deliberate vagueness in the Hebrew — 'he knew what his youngest son had done to him' — and we preserved that ambiguity rather than importing later interpretive traditions.

Connections: The blessing 'be fruitful and multiply' (9:1) re-issues the creation mandate (1:28). The blood-life equation (9:4) becomes the foundation for Leviticus 17:11. The image of God as the basis for the sanctity of human life (9:6) reaches back to 1:26-27. Noah's vineyard and drunkenness (9:20-21) echo the pattern of Eden: blessing, testing, and failure in a garden.

1God blessed Noah and his sons and said to them, "Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth. 2The fear and dread of you will be upon every animal of the earth and upon every bird of the sky, upon everything that crawls on the ground and all the fish of the sea. They are given into your hand. 3Every moving thing that lives will be food for you. Just as I gave you the green plants, I now give you everything. 4But you must not eat flesh with its life—that is, its blood—still in it. 5And surely I will require an accounting for your lifeblood. From every animal I will require it, and from mankind—from each man's brother—I will require an accounting for the life of man. 6Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed, for in the image of God he made mankind. 7And you, be fruitful and multiply; increase abundantly on the earth and multiply in it." 8Then God said to Noah and to his sons with him, 9"As for me, I am establishing my covenant with you and with your offspring after you, 10and with every living creature that is with you—the birds, the livestock, and every wild animal of the earth with you, all that came out of the ark, every living creature of the earth. 11I establish my covenant with you: never again will all flesh be cut off by the waters of a flood, and never again will there be a flood to destroy the earth." 12God said, "This is the sign of the covenant that I am making between me and you and every living creature that is with you, for all generations to come: 13I have set my bow in the cloud, and it will be a sign of the covenant between me and the earth. 14When I bring clouds over the earth and the bow appears in the cloud, 15I will remember my covenant that is between me and you and every living creature of all flesh, and the waters will never again become a flood to destroy all flesh. 16When the bow is in the cloud, I will look on it and remember the everlasting covenant between God and every living creature of all flesh that is on the earth." 17God said to Noah, "This is the sign of the covenant that I have established between me and all flesh that is on the earth." 18The sons of Noah who came out of the ark were Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Ham was the father of Canaan. 19These three were the sons of Noah, and from them the whole earth was populated. 20Noah, a man of the ground, began to plant a vineyard. 21He drank some of the wine and became drunk and lay uncovered inside his tent. ²²Ham, the father of Canaan, saw the nakedness of his father and told his two brothers outside. ²³Then Shem and Japheth took a garment and laid it across both their shoulders and walked backward and covered the nakedness of their father. Their faces were turned away, and they did not see their father's nakedness. ²⁴When Noah awoke from his wine, he knew what his youngest son had done to him. ²⁵He said, "Cursed be Canaan; a servant of servants he will be to his brothers." ²⁶He also said, "Blessed be the LORD, the God of Shem, and let Canaan be his servant. ²⁷May God enlarge Japheth, and may he dwell in the tents of Shem, and let Canaan be his servant." ²⁸Noah lived 350 years after the flood. ²⁹All the days of Noah were 950 years, and he died.

1. The creation blessing of 1:28 is renewed for post-flood humanity. 'Be fruitful and multiply and fill the earth' (peru urevu umil'u et-ha'arets) repeats the original mandate verbatim. Noah and his sons stand in the position of a new Adam — the ancestors of all subsequent humanity. The re-creation after the flood mirrors the original creation.
2. 'Fear and dread' (mora'akhem vechittekhem,) — the original creation mandate gave humanity 'dominion' (radah) over the animals (1:26, 28). The post-flood mandate replaces cooperative dominion with fear-based authority. The relationship between humanity and animals is now characterized by terror rather than harmony. This is a significant shift — the world after the flood is not identical to the world before it.
2. 'Given into your hand' (beyedkhem nittanu) — language of military defeat or political subjugation. The animals are delivered into human power. This prepares for the permission to eat animals in the next verse.
3. This is a significant expansion of the original dietary provision. In 1:29, God gave humanity plants and fruit for food. Now, after the flood, animal flesh is permitted. The comparison is explicit: 'just as I gave you green plants, I now give you everything.' The pre-flood vegetarian provision (1:29–30) is expanded to include meat. Whether this reflects a change in the moral order or a concession to the altered post-flood world is debated.
4. 'Flesh with its life, its blood' (basar benaphsho damo) — the one restriction on the new permission to eat meat is the prohibition of consuming blood. The blood is identified with the nephesh ('life, soul, being'). Blood = life. This equation (blood = nephesh) becomes foundational for the entire sacrificial system of the Torah (Leviticus 17:11, 14). The blood belongs to God because life belongs to God.
4. This is one of the Noahic commandments — laws given to all humanity through Noah, not limited to Israel. In Jewish tradition, the Noahic laws are considered universally binding.
5. 'Require an accounting' translates edrosh (), from darash (, 'to seek, to inquire, to require, to demand'). God will hold accountable anyone — human or animal — who sheds human blood. The threefold repetition ('I will require... I will require... I will require') makes the demand emphatic and absolute.
5. 'From each man's brother' (miyad ish achiv,) — the word 'brother' (ach) echoes the Cain and Abel narrative (chapter 4). Every human being is the 'brother' of every other. The destruction of human life is fratricide.
6. This verse is structured as a chiasm in Hebrew: shofekh / dam ha'adam / ba'adam / damo / yishshafekh (shedder / blood of man / by man / his blood / shall be shed). The word order creates a mirror structure that reinforces the principle of proportional justice.
6. The reason given for the sanctity of human life is the image of God (tselem Elohim) — the same concept from 1:26–27. Because humans bear God's image, to kill a human being is to attack the divine image. The image of God, which survived the fall and the flood, remains the basis for the inviolability of human life.
6. This verse establishes the principle of capital punishment for murder — the first such authorization in the Bible. Whether it is a descriptive statement ('blood will be shed') or a prescriptive command ('blood shall be shed') is debated. The rendering follows the KJV's prescriptive reading.
7. The creation blessing is restated emphatically, framing the Noahic legislation (vv. 2–6) within a double affirmation of fruitfulness. Verse 1 begins with 'be fruitful and multiply'; verse 7 closes with the same words. The legislation about blood, life, and death is enclosed within the command for life, fruitfulness, and multiplication.
8. A new divine speech begins, introducing the formal covenant ceremony (vv. 8–17). God addresses Noah and all his sons — the covenant is made with the entire surviving human family.
9. 'I am establishing my covenant' (hineni meqim et-beriti) — the fulfillment of the promise made in 6:18. God now formally enacts the covenant he announced before the flood.
9. 'With your offspring after you' (ve'et-zar'akhem achareikem) — the covenant extends beyond the immediate recipients to all future generations. This is an everlasting, universal covenant — not limited to one family or one era.
10. The covenant includes every living creature — not only humans. This is the broadest covenant in the Bible, encompassing all animal life. The ecological scope is remarkable and unique among biblical covenants.

11. The covenant content is purely promissory — God makes a unilateral commitment without requiring anything from Noah or the creatures in return. There are no conditions, no stipulations, no 'if you do X, I will do Y.' This is a covenant of divine self-restraint. God binds himself not to repeat the flood.
11. 'To destroy the earth' (leshachet ha'arets) — the same verb shachat from 6:11–13, bringing the vocabulary full circle. The earth that was 'corrupted' (6:11) and 'destroyed' (6:13) by God will never again be destroyed by flood.
12. 'Sign' (ot,) — the same word used for the mark on Cain (4:15) and the celestial signs of 1:14. Each major covenant in the Bible has a sign: the rainbow (Noahic), circumcision (Abrahamic), the Sabbath (Mosaic). The sign functions as a visible reminder of the invisible commitment.
12. 'For all generations to come' (ledorot olam,) — literally 'for generations of eternity.' The covenant is perpetual.
13. 'My bow' (qashti,) — the word qeset () means both 'rainbow' and 'war bow.' The image is powerful: God hangs up his battle bow in the sky — the weapon of judgment is set aside and transformed into a sign of peace. In ancient Near Eastern art, the gods are depicted wielding the bow as a weapon of war. Here God turns his bow away from the earth and places it in the clouds as a permanent token of peace.
13. Whether the rainbow existed before the flood or was newly created as a sign is not specified. The text says God 'set' (natatti) his bow in the cloud — he designated an existing phenomenon or created a new one to serve as the covenant sign.
14. The appearance of rain clouds — which might otherwise evoke fear of another flood — will instead produce the bow, the sign of God's restraint. What could trigger anxiety becomes the occasion for reassurance.
15. 'I will remember my covenant' (vezakharti et-beriti) — the verb zakhar ('remember') returns from 8:1. God's remembering of Noah initiated the rescue; God's remembering of the covenant will prevent future destruction. Divine remembering is the ongoing guarantee of creation's safety.
15. The rainbow prompts God to remember — a remarkably anthropomorphic statement. The sign is not primarily for humanity but for God himself. This is an extraordinary condescension: the all-knowing God appoints a visible reminder for himself.
16. 'Everlasting covenant' (berit olam,) — the first use of this phrase, which will become significant in the Abrahamic covenant (17:7, 13, 19) and the prophetic hope of a new covenant (Isaiah 55:3; Jeremiah 32:40; Ezekiel 37:26). The Noahic covenant is eternal in scope.
17. God concludes the covenant declaration by summarizing it. The repetition of 'between me and all flesh' underscores the universal scope. This is not a covenant with Israel (which does not yet exist) but with all creation.
18. The note 'Ham was the father of Canaan' anticipates the narrative that follows (vv. 20–27) and connects it to the later significance of the Canaanites in Israel's history. This parenthetical remark is proleptic — it prepares the reader for why Canaan specifically is cursed.
19. 'From them the whole earth was populated' (ume'eleh naphtsah kol-ha'arets) — literally 'from these the whole earth was scattered/spread.' All post-flood humanity descends from these three men. The verb naphtsah (from puts, 'to scatter, to spread') will reappear in the Tower of Babel narrative (11:4, 8, 9).
20. 'A man of the ground' (ish ha'adamah,) — Noah's occupation connects him to the ground (adamah), resuming the adam-adamah theme. He is an 'earth-worker,' like Cain before him (4:2).
20. 'Began' (vayyachel,) — from chalal (), meaning 'to begin' but also 'to profane.' The same ambiguity seen in 4:26. Some interpreters read the double meaning as an ominous introduction to what follows.
20. Noah plants a vineyard — the first mention of viticulture in the Bible. Wine will play an ambiguous role throughout scripture: a gift and a danger, a blessing and a temptation.
21. 'Became drunk' (vayyishkar,) — Noah, the righteous man who walked with God, becomes intoxicated. The narrative is unflinching — the hero of the flood story is shown in a moment of shame and vulnerability. The text reports without excusing or condemning.
21. 'Lay uncovered' (vayyitgal,) — the hitpa'el of galah ('to uncover, to reveal') can mean he uncovered himself (reflexive) or he became uncovered (passive). Either way, he is exposed and vulnerable in his nakedness. The theme of nakedness (cf. 2:25; 3:7, 10, 11) returns in a new context.
22. 'Saw the nakedness of his father' (vayyar... et ervat aviv) — the phrase 'to see/uncover nakedness' (gilah/ra'ah ervah) is used elsewhere in the Torah as a euphemism for sexual violation (Leviticus 18:6–18; 20:17). Some interpreters therefore argue that Ham did more than merely look — that the phrase implies a sexual transgression. Others take it at face value: Ham saw his father's nakedness and, instead of covering him, went out and told his brothers, violating the father's dignity through exposure and gossip.
22. The narrative deliberately identifies Ham as 'the father of Canaan' again, reinforcing the link to the coming curse.
23. Shem and Japheth's response is described with elaborate care: they take a garment (hassimlah), place it on both their shoulders, walk backward, cover their father, and keep their faces averted. Every detail emphasizes their deliberate effort to preserve their father's dignity. The contrast with Ham is sharp — where Ham looked and publicized, Shem and Japheth averted their eyes and covered.

- 23. The act of covering nakedness echoes God's covering of the man and woman with garments of skin (3:21). Shem and Japheth imitate the divine response to human shame.
- 24. 'His youngest son' (beno haqqatan,) — haqqatan means 'the small/young one.' If the birth order of 5:32 (Shem, Ham, Japheth) is chronological, Ham is the middle son, and 'youngest' (qatan) may refer to Canaan (Ham's son mentioned in v. 22), not Ham himself. Alternatively, Ham may have been the youngest despite his position in the listing. The ambiguity about who exactly committed the act contributes to the complexity of the passage.
- 24. 'Knew what had been done to him' — how Noah knew is not stated. He may have been told by Shem and Japheth, or he may have sensed it upon awakening.
- 25. Noah curses Canaan, not Ham. Why Canaan bears the curse rather than Ham himself is one of the most discussed questions in Genesis interpretation. Possible explanations: (1) Canaan was the actual offender ('youngest son' = grandson); (2) the curse falls on Ham through his son — punishing the father through the son's fate; (3) the text anticipates Israel's later conflict with and subjugation of the Canaanites, and the curse functions as an etiology; (4) God had blessed Ham along with Noah's other sons (9:1), so Noah could not curse one whom God had blessed.
- 25. 'Servant of servants' (eved avadim,) — a superlative construction meaning 'the lowest of servants' or 'a slave among slaves.' This is the first curse pronounced by a human being in Genesis (prior curses were divine: 3:14, 17; 4:11).
- 25. This passage has been tragically misused throughout history to justify the enslavement of African peoples. Such interpretations are exegetically unfounded: the text concerns Canaan (the ancestor of the Canaanite peoples of the ancient Near East), not any African population. The curse is specific, not racial or ethnic in the modern sense.
- 26. 'Blessed be the LORD, the God of Shem' — Noah does not bless Shem directly but blesses the LORD as Shem's God. This is a remarkable formulation: Shem's blessing is expressed through the blessing of his God. YHWH is identified specifically as 'the God of Shem' — the first time God is called the God of a particular person. This anticipates the later formula 'the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob,' as the line of promise will pass through Shem (the Semites).
- 27. 'Enlarge Japheth' (yapht Elohim leYephet) — a wordplay: yapht ('may he enlarge') sounds like Yephet ('Japheth'). The name Japheth is connected to spatial expansion. The blessing promises territorial or demographic enlargement.
- 27. 'May he dwell in the tents of Shem' — the subject of 'he' is ambiguous: does God dwell in Shem's tents, or does Japheth? If Japheth, it means Japheth will enjoy the hospitality and blessing of Shem's dwelling — participating in Shem's spiritual heritage. If God, it means God's presence will be especially manifest among the Shemites (later identified as Israel). Both readings have been defended.
- 27. The oracle creates a three-tiered outcome: Shem is blessed through his God, Japheth is enlarged and dwells in Shem's tents, and Canaan serves both. This shapes the Table of Nations narrative that follows (chapter 10).
- 28. The narrative returns to genealogical data, framing the vineyard episode within the biographical record.
- 29. 'And he died' (vayyamot) — the death formula from chapter 5 returns, delayed from its expected place in that genealogy. Noah's death, deferred through the flood narrative, is now recorded. The chapter 5 refrain finally catches up with Noah. The righteous man who walked with God, who was saved through the flood, who planted a vineyard and became drunk — he too is subject to the universal sentence of death.

Summary: The Table of Nations traces the descendants of Shem, Ham, and Japheth as they spread across the ancient world after the flood. Seventy peoples are catalogued, organized by family, language, territory, and nation. Nimrod emerges as the first empire-builder, and the Canaanite clans are mapped in detail.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the Bible's most expansive statement of human unity — all nations derive from one family. The number seventy (the total of named peoples) carries symbolic weight as a number of completeness. Nimrod's description as a gibbor ('mighty one,' v. 8) and the founding of Babel (v. 10) connect this chapter to the tower narrative that follows. The Canaanite territorial boundaries (v. 19) will define the promised land's inhabitants whom Israel later displaces.

Translation Friction: Many of the proper names in this chapter have uncertain identifications, and we rendered them as the Hebrew presents them without attempting modern geographical equivalences in the main text. The phrase 'in his days the earth was divided' regarding Peleg (v. 25) is ambiguous — it may refer to the Babel dispersion or to a geographical division. We preserved the Hebrew's terseness and noted the ambiguity.

Connections: The seventy nations anticipate the seventy members of Jacob's family who enter Egypt (46:27) and the seventy elders of Israel (Exodus 24:1; Numbers 11:16). The Canaanite boundaries (10:19) map the territory promised to Abraham (15:18-21). Nimrod's kingdom in Shinar (10:10) sets the stage for the Babel narrative (11:1-9).

¹These are the generations of the sons of Noah—Shem, Ham, and Japheth. Sons were born to them after the flood. ²The sons of Japheth: Gomer, Magog, Madai, Javan, Tubal, Meshech, and Tiras. ³The sons of Gomer: Ashkenaz, Riphath, and Togarmah. ⁴The sons of Javan: Elishah, Tarshish, Kittim, and Dodanim. ⁵From these the coastland peoples spread out in their lands, each with his own language, by their clans, in their nations. ⁶The sons of Ham: Cush, Mizraim, Put, and Canaan. ⁷The sons of Cush: Seba, Havilah, Sabtah, Raamah, and Sabteca. The sons of Raamah: Sheba and Dedan. ⁸Cush fathered Nimrod. He was the first mighty warrior on the earth. ⁹He was a mighty hunter before the LORD. Therefore it is said, "Like Nimrod, a mighty hunter before the LORD." ¹⁰His kingdom started with Babel, Erech, Accad, and Calneh — all in the land of Shinar. ¹¹From that land he went to Assyria and built Nineveh, Rehoboth-Ir, and Calah, ¹²and Resen between Nineveh and Calah—that is the great city. ¹³Mizraim fathered the Ludim, Anamim, Lehabim, Naphtuhim, ¹⁴Pathrusim, Casluhim (from whom the Philistines came), and Caphtorim. ¹⁵Canaan fathered Sidon his firstborn, and Heth, ¹⁶the Jebusites, the Amorites, the Girgashites, ¹⁷the Hivites, the Arkites, the Sinites, ¹⁸the Arvadites, the Zemarites, and the Hamathites. Afterward the clans of the Canaanites spread out. ¹⁹The territory of the Canaanites extended from Sidon in the direction of Gerar as far as Gaza, and in the direction of Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboiim, as far as Lasha. ²⁰These are the sons of Ham, by their clans, their languages, their lands, and their nations. ²¹To Shem also, the father of all the sons of Eber and the older brother of Japheth, children were born. ²²The sons of Shem: Elam, Asshur, Arpachshad, Lud, and Aram. ²³The sons of Aram: Uz, Hul, Gether, and Mash. ²⁴Arpachshad fathered Shelah, and Shelah fathered Eber. ²⁵To Eber were born two sons: the name of the one was Peleg, for in his days the earth was divided, and the name of his brother was Joktan. ²⁶Joktan fathered Almodad, Sheleph, Hazarmaveth, Jerah, ²⁷Hadoram, Uzal, Diklah, ²⁸Obal, Abimael, Sheba, ²⁹Ophir, Havilah. Jobab. All these were the sons of Joktan. ³⁰Their territory extended from Mesha in the direction of Sephar, the hill country of the east. ³¹These are the sons of Shem, by their clans, their languages, their lands, and their nations. ³²These are the clans of the sons of Noah, according to their genealogies, in their nations, and from these the nations spread out on the earth after the flood.

1. The fourth toledot formula (cf. 2:4; 5:1; 6:9). This chapter is often called the 'Table of Nations' — a unique document in the ancient world that maps the known peoples of the earth into a single family tree. It presents all humanity as descended from one family, unified by common origin despite linguistic and geographic diversity.
2. Japheth's sons generally correspond to peoples in Asia Minor, the Aegean, and regions north and west of the ancient Near East: Gomer (Cimmerians), Magog (Scythians or a northern people), Madai (Medes), Javan (Ionians/Greeks), Tubal and Meshech (Anatolian peoples), Tiras (possibly Thracians or Etruscans). These identifications are approximate and debated.
3. Ashkenaz is later associated with the Scythians and, in medieval Jewish tradition, with Germanic peoples (hence 'Ashkenazi Jews'). Togarmah is associated with Armenia or southeastern Anatolia (cf. Ezekiel 27:14; 38:6).
4. Javan's sons represent Mediterranean peoples: Elishah (possibly Alashiya/Cyprus), Tarshish (a distant western port, possibly Tartessus in Spain or Tarsus in Cilicia), Kittim (Cyprus, later extended to other Mediterranean peoples), Dodanim (possibly Rhodes; 1 Chronicles 1:7 reads 'Rodanim').
5. 'Coastland peoples' (iyyei haggoyim,) — iyy refers to islands or coastlands, typically the Mediterranean coasts and islands. The Japhethites are associated with maritime regions.
5. 'Each with his own language' — this reference to diverse languages precedes the Tower of Babel narrative (chapter 11), which explains how linguistic diversity originated. The Table of Nations describes the result; Babel explains the cause.
6. Ham's sons represent African and Near Eastern peoples: Cush (Ethiopia/Nubia/Upper Nile region), Mizraim (Egypt — the Hebrew name for Egypt is Mitsrayim), Put (Libya or Punt), and Canaan (the land of Canaan / Levantine coast). The Hamitic peoples occupy Africa and the eastern Mediterranean.
7. These names are associated with peoples and regions in Africa and Arabia. Sheba is linked to the Sabeen kingdom of southwestern Arabia (modern Yemen). Havilah appears also in 2:11. Dedan is associated with northwestern Arabia.
8. 'Nimrod' () — the first individual singled out for extended description in the Table of Nations. His name may be related to the verb marad (, 'to rebel'), though this etymology is debated.

8. 'The first mighty warrior on the earth' (hu hechel lihyot gibbor ba'arets) — literally 'he began to be a mighty one on the earth.' The word gibbor (, 'mighty one, warrior, hero') connects Nimrod to the gibborim of 6:4. The verb hechel ('began') suggests he was the originator or prototype of the warrior-king.
9. 'A mighty hunter before the LORD' (gibbor-tsayid lifnei YHWH) — the phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') can mean 'in the LORD's sight/estimation' or 'in defiance of the LORD.' The proverb 'like Nimrod' suggests his reputation was proverbial — he became the standard by which mighty hunters were measured.
9. Whether 'before the LORD' is positive (with God's approval) or negative (in opposition to God) is debated. The context — his kingdom-building in Babylon and Assyria (vv. 10–12) — and the possible wordplay with 'rebel' have led many interpreters to see Nimrod negatively.
10. 'Babel' () — Babylon. This is the first mention of Babylon, which will become one of the Bible's most significant cities — the site of the Tower of Babel (chapter 11) and later the empire that destroys Jerusalem and exiles Judah. Its founding is attributed to Nimrod.
10. 'The land of Shinar' (erets Shin'ar) — the region of southern Mesopotamia (modern Iraq). Shinar appears again in 11:2 as the location of the Tower of Babel.
10. Erech is ancient Uruk, one of the world's first great cities. Accad is the capital of the Akkadian Empire. These are historical cities of ancient Mesopotamia.
11. The subject is ambiguous — 'he went to Assyria' could mean Nimrod went to Assyria (extending his kingdom), or Asshur (Assyria personified) went out. The rendering follows the reading that Nimrod is the subject, extending his empire from Babylon into Assyria.
11. Nineveh becomes the capital of the Assyrian Empire and plays a central role in the book of Jonah and in the prophets. Its founding is connected to Nimrod's expansionism.
12. 'The great city' (ha'ir haggadolah) — which city is 'the great city' is ambiguous. It could refer to Resen, Calah, or the entire urban complex between Nineveh and Calah. Nineveh is called 'the great city' in Jonah 1:2; 3:2–3.
13. These names are in plural form (the -im ending), indicating peoples or ethnic groups rather than individuals. Mizraim (Egypt) is the ancestor of various North African peoples. The Ludim may be Libyans; the Lehabim are also possibly Libyan.
14. 'From whom the Philistines came' — this parenthetical note identifies the origin of the Philistines, Israel's future nemesis. However, other passages (Amos 9:7; Jeremiah 47:4) associate the Philistines with Caphtor (likely Crete). The parenthetical may be displaced — some scholars suggest it originally modified Caphtorim rather than Casluhim.
14. Pathrusim are associated with Upper Egypt (Pathros). Caphtorim are from Caphtor, widely identified with Crete or the Aegean region.
15. Sidon is the ancient Phoenician city on the Lebanese coast. Heth is the ancestor of the Hittites (benei-Chet), who appear later in Genesis as inhabitants of Canaan from whom Abraham purchases a burial cave (chapter 23).
16. These are the peoples of Canaan who will be displaced by Israel. The Jebusites inhabit Jerusalem (called Jebus) until David's conquest. The Amorites are a major population group throughout Canaan and Transjordan.
17. The Hivites are a Canaanite people (cf. 34:2; Joshua 9:7; 11:19). The Arkites are from Arqa in northern Phoenicia (modern Lebanon). The Sinites are possibly from a town near Arqa.
18. Arvad is an island city off the Syrian coast. Hamath is a major city in Syria (modern Hama). These represent the northern extent of Canaanite territory. The Canaanites are presented as a widespread and diverse group of peoples.
19. The Canaanite territory is described by its boundaries — from the Phoenician coast (Sidon) south to Gaza and inland to the cities of the plain (Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim). These cities will feature prominently in chapters 13–14 and 18–19. This geographical note anticipates the setting for Abraham's story.
20. A summary formula closing the Hamite section, matching the Japhethite summary in verse 5. The four categories — clans, languages, lands, nations — present each people group as a complete social unit.
21. 'The father of all the sons of Eber' — Shem is identified specifically as Eber's ancestor. Eber (Ever,) is the eponymous ancestor of the 'Hebrews' (Ivrim). The name Hebrew (Ivri) derives from Eber. This identification marks Shem's line as the one that leads to Abraham and Israel.
21. 'The older brother of Japheth' (achi Yephet haggadol) — this phrase is ambiguous: either 'the brother of Japheth the elder' (Japheth is the older) or 'the elder brother of Japheth' (Shem is the older). The Hebrew allows both readings. The rendering follows the reading that Shem is older.
22. Shem's sons represent peoples of the Near East: Elam (southwestern Iran), Asshur (Assyria), Arpachshad (uncertain — possibly associated with Chaldea/southern Mesopotamia), Lud (Lydia in western Anatolia), and Aram (Arameans of Syria). Arpachshad is the ancestor through whom the line leads to Abraham (11:10–26).
23. Uz is notable as the homeland of Job ('the land of Uz,' Job 1:1). The region is associated with the area east of the Jordan, possibly Edom or northern Arabia.
24. This genealogical line — Arpachshad Shelah Eber — will be expanded in 11:10–17. Eber is the key figure as the ancestor of the Hebrews.

25. 'Peleg' (𐤒) means 'division' — from palag (𐤒, 'to divide'). The explanation 'in his days the earth was divided' (niphlegah ha'arets) is a wordplay on his name. The 'division' likely refers to the division of peoples and languages at Babel (chapter 11), though some have suggested a geographical or political division.
25. Peleg's line leads to Abraham (11:18–26); Joktan's line leads to Arabian peoples (vv. 26–29).
26. Joktan's sons are associated with Arabian peoples and places. Hazarmaveth corresponds to the Hadramaut region of southern Arabia (modern Yemen). These names trace the genealogy of South Arabian peoples.
27. Uzal may be associated with Sanaa, the capital of Yemen. Diklah may mean 'palm grove.'
28. Sheba appears both here (in Joktan's line) and in verse 7 (in Cush's line). The Sabeen kingdom may have had connections to both Cushite and Semitic populations.
29. Ophir is famous as a source of gold (1 Kings 9:28; 10:11; 22:48) — its location is debated (Arabia, East Africa, or even India have been proposed). Havilah, like Sheba, appears in multiple genealogies (v. 7 and 2:11), suggesting shared traditions or overlapping populations.
30. The geographic boundaries of the Joktanite peoples — from Mesha to Sephar — are uncertain. 'The hill country of the east' (har haqqedem) points toward the mountainous regions of Arabia or beyond.
31. The summary formula for the Shemite section matches the Japhethite (v. 5) and Hamite (v. 20) summaries. The four-category framework (clans, languages, lands, nations) applies uniformly to all three branches of humanity.
32. The concluding formula encompasses all three sections. The Table of Nations presents a unified picture: all the peoples of the known world descend from one family, branching out from Noah's three sons after the flood. Despite the diversity of languages, lands, and nations, there is a fundamental unity of origin. The chapter anticipates the immediate question: how did this diversity arise? Chapter 11 will provide the answer in the Babel narrative.

Summary: Humanity, united by one language, builds a city and tower on the plain of Shinar to 'make a name' for themselves. God comes down, confuses their language, and scatters them. The genealogy then traces ten generations from Shem to Abram, who departs Ur with his barren wife Sarai and settles in Harran.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Hebrew wordplay between Babel and balal ('to confuse') subverts Babylon's own etymology ('gate of god') — the city that aspired to reach heaven becomes the city of confusion. The ironic phrase 'the LORD came down' (v. 5) contrasts human ambition with divine perspective: what seemed massive from below requires God to descend to even see it. The chapter's final note — 'Sarai was barren; she had no child' (v. 30) — introduces the crisis that drives the next twenty-five chapters. The Shem genealogy mirrors Adam's in chapter 5 but with steadily declining lifespans.

Translation Friction: The builders' desire to 'make a name' (na'aseh-llanu shem, v. 4) uses the same word shem that means both 'name' and 'renown' — and is the name of Noah's son Shem, through whom blessing comes. The irony is dense and difficult to replicate. We rendered aqarah ('barren,' v. 30) directly, noting that the word may derive from a root meaning 'uprooted' — barrenness as a state of rootlessness that only God can remedy.

Connections: God's scattering at Babel (11:9) is reversed at Pentecost (Acts 2:1-11), where divided languages become a vehicle for universal proclamation. Abram's departure from Ur (11:31) fulfills Stephen's account in Acts 7:2-4. The barrenness of Sarai connects to the pattern of barren matriarchs: Rebekah (25:21), Rachel (29:31), and Hannah (1 Samuel 1:2).

1Now the whole earth had one language and the same words. 2As they migrated from the east, they found a plain in the land of Shinar and settled there. 3They said to one another, "Come, let us make bricks and fire them thoroughly." They had brick for stone and bitumen for mortar. 4Then they said, "Come, let us build ourselves a city and a tower with its top in the sky, and let us make a name for ourselves, lest we be scattered over the face of the whole earth." 5The LORD came down to see the city and the tower that the children of man had built. 6The LORD said, "Look, they are one people with one language for all of them, and this is only the beginning of what they will do. Now nothing they plan to do will be impossible for them. 7Co me, let us go down and confuse their language there, so that they will not understand one another's speech." 8So the LORD scattered them from there over the face of all the earth, and they stopped building the city. ⁹Therefore its name was called Babel, because there the LORD confused the language of all the earth, and from there the LORD scattered them over the face of all the earth. ¹⁰These are the generations of Shem. When Shem was 100 years old, he fathered Arpachshad two years after the flood. ¹¹Shem lived after he fathered Arpachshad 500 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹²When Arpachshad had lived 35 years, he fathered Shelah. ¹³Arpachshad lived after he fathered Shelah 403 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹⁴When Shelah had lived 30 years, he fathered Eber. ¹⁵Shelah lived after he fathered Eber 403 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹⁶When Eber had lived 34 years, he fathered Peleg. ¹⁷Eber lived after he fathered Peleg 430 years and fathered sons and daughters. ¹⁸When Peleg had lived 30 years, he fathered Reu. ¹⁹Peleg lived after he fathered Reu 209 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²⁰When Reu had lived 32 years, he fathered Serug. ²¹Reu lived after he fathered Serug 207 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²²When Serug had lived 30 years, he fathered Nahor. ²³Serug lived after he fathered Nahor 200 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²⁴When Nahor had lived 29 years, he fathered Terah. ²⁵Nahor lived after he fathered Terah 119 years and fathered sons and daughters. ²⁶When Terah had lived 70 years, he fathered Abram, Nahor, and Haran. ²⁷These are the generations of Terah. Terah fathered Abram, Nahor, and Haran; and Haran fathered Lot. ²⁸Haran died in the presence of his father Terah in the land of his birth, in Ur of the Chaldeans. ²⁹Abram and Nahor took wives. The name of Abram's wife was Sarai, and the name of Nahor's wife was Milcah, the daughter of Haran, the father of both Milcah and Iscah. ³⁰Sarai, however, was unable to conceive — she had no children. ³¹Terah took his son Abram, his grandson Lot the son of Haran, and his daughter-in-law Sarai, the wife of his son Abram, and they set out together from Ur of the Chaldeans to go to the land of Canaan. But when they came to Harran, they settled there. ³²The days of Terah were 205 years, and Terah died in Harran.

1. 'One language and the same words' (saphah echat udvarim achadim,) — literally 'one lip and one set of words.' Saphah means 'lip' or 'language'; devarim means 'words' or 'things.' The pairing emphasizes both the uniformity of speech sounds and vocabulary. Humanity shares a single mode of communication — a linguistic unity that will be shattered by the end of the chapter.
2. 'From the east' (miqqedem,) — or 'eastward.' The preposition min with qedem can mean 'from the east' (they came westward from the east) or 'eastward' (they traveled in an eastern direction). Movement 'eastward' in Genesis typically signifies movement away from God's presence (cf. 3:24; 4:16). The rendering follows 'from the east,' but the directional symbolism is noted.
2. 'The land of Shinar' — Mesopotamia, specifically the alluvial plain of southern Iraq. This is the same region identified in 10:10 as Nimrod's kingdom, including Babel.
3. 'Come, let us...' (havah nilbenah) — the cohortative 'come, let us' will recur three times in the human speeches (vv. 3, 4) and will be echoed by God's own 'come, let us' in verse 7. The humans plan; God responds with their own language.
3. 'Bricks... bitumen' — the narrator notes the building materials because the Mesopotamian alluvial plain lacks the stone available in Canaan and other regions. The use of fired brick and bitumen (chemar, a naturally occurring asphalt/tar) is historically accurate for Mesopotamian construction. The detail signals a Mesopotamian setting.
4. 'A tower with its top in the sky' (umigdal verosho vashamayim) — the language echoes ancient Mesopotamian temple towers (ziggurats), which were understood as linking heaven and earth. The phrase 'its top in the sky' is probably not literal but describes the tower's intended height and cosmic significance — a human-built connection between earth and heaven.
4. 'Let us make a name for ourselves' (vena'aseh-lanu shem) — the word shem means both 'name' and 'fame/reputation.' The desire for a 'name' contrasts with the pattern throughout Genesis where God bestows names and identity. Self-made fame replaces God-given purpose. It also creates a wordplay with Shem, Noah's son — whose name means 'Name.'
4. 'Lest we be scattered' (pen-naphuts) — the very thing they fear (scattering) is exactly what God will do to them (v. 8–9). Their attempt to prevent scattering through a centralized monument produces the scattering they sought to avoid. The verb puts ('to scatter') appeared in 10:18 and 10:32 for the spreading of peoples — the natural process God intended is here resisted by human ambition.
5. 'The LORD came down' (vayyered YHWH,) — a masterful narrative irony. The humans built a tower 'with its top in the sky,' reaching up toward God. But God has to 'come down' to see it — it is so small from heaven's perspective that the LORD must descend to inspect it. The tower that was supposed to reach heaven cannot even be seen from heaven.
5. 'The children of man' (benei ha'adam,) — literally 'the sons of the human.' The phrase emphasizes their creaturely status — these are merely human beings, not divine. Their ambition exceeds their nature.

6. God's assessment is not that the tower itself is a threat but that unified human ambition without divine boundaries has unlimited destructive potential. The concern is anthropological, not defensive — God is not threatened by the tower but sees the trajectory of human pride unchecked.
6. 'Nothing they plan to do will be impossible for them' (lo-yibatser mehem kol asher yazmu la'asot) — this is a remarkable divine statement about human capacity. When unified in purpose and language, humanity can accomplish anything it sets out to do. The implication is not that this capacity is inherently good — in a fallen world, unlimited capacity means unlimited potential for evil.
7. 'Come, let us go down' (havah nerdah) — God echoes the human 'Come, let us' (havah) from verses 3–4. The divine 'let us' mirrors 1:26 ('Let us make man'). The plural may indicate the divine council (heavenly court) or the Trinity, as in the creation narrative.
7. 'Confuse their language' (navlah... sephatam) — the verb balal (, 'to confuse, to mix') provides the etymology for 'Babel' in verse 9. The confusion of language is God's intervention to limit the damage of unified human rebellion. It is a judgment but also a mercy — preventing the full realization of collective human evil.
8. 'The LORD scattered them' (vayyaphets YHWH otam) — the very outcome they feared (v. 4, 'lest we be scattered') is now accomplished by God. Their resistance to scattering ironically caused the scattering. The verb puts ('to scatter') fulfills both God's purpose (filling the earth, 1:28; 9:1) and humanity's fear.
8. 'They stopped building the city' — the tower is not said to be destroyed, only that building ceased. The incomplete project stands as a monument to human ambition interrupted by divine intervention.
9. 'Babel' (בבל) is given a Hebrew etymology from balal (, 'to confuse, to mix'). The actual Akkadian etymology of Babylon (Bab-ili) means 'gate of the god(s)'. The Hebrew text deliberately provides an alternative — and polemical — etymology: Babylon is not the 'gate of God' but the place of divine confusion. The city that sought to make a name for itself receives a name meaning 'confusion.'
9. The Babel narrative serves as the bridge between the universal history of chapters 1–11 and the particular history of Abraham beginning in 11:27. After the scattering of the nations, God will choose one man from one family to begin a new work — a particular calling for the sake of the universal.
10. The fifth toledot formula (cf. 2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1). This genealogy traces the line from Shem to Abram, bridging the universal history (chapters 1–11) with the patriarchal narratives (chapters 12–50). The format follows the chapter 5 pattern: age at fathering remaining years death.
11. The lifespans in this genealogy are notably shorter than those in chapter 5 — a post-flood decline. Shem lives 600 years total, compared to the 900+ year lifespans before the flood.
12. The ages at fathering are significantly younger than in chapter 5, accelerating the generational pace.
13. The formulaic pattern continues. Notably, this genealogy omits the 'and he died' refrain that characterized chapter 5.
14. Eber, the ancestor of the Hebrews, appears as the fourth generation from Shem.
15. Salah's lifespan of 433 years continues the pattern of declining lifespans after the flood — from Shem's 600 years to progressively shorter lives, reflecting the theological narrative of diminishing vitality in the post-flood world.
16. Peleg ('division') — cf. 10:25. The line now continues through Peleg rather than Joktan, narrowing toward Abraham.
17. Eber's total lifespan of 464 years is the longest in this genealogy — notably longer than his ancestors and descendants.
18. 'Reu' (ר) may mean 'friend' or 'companion,' from the root r-'-h ('to associate with, to tend, to shepherd').
19. Peleg's lifespan of 239 years marks a significant decline from the longer-lived patriarchs.
20. The genealogical formula continues without variation.
21. Reu's lifespan of 239 years marks a further decline. The genealogy bridges the gap between Noah and Abraham, connecting the universal history of Genesis 1–11 to the particular covenant history that begins with Abraham's call.
22. 'Nahor' (נ) — the same name as Abraham's grandfather. Nahor is also the name of a city in the Haran region (cf. 24:10), suggesting a family connection to upper Mesopotamia.
23. Serug's lifespan of 230 years. By this point the lifespans have dropped to roughly one-third of the immediate post-flood generation, approaching the range that will characterize the patriarchal period (Abraham lives 175 years).
24. 'Terah' (ת) — Abraham's father. The name's etymology is uncertain. Some have connected it to Hebrew yerach ('moon') or to the Akkadian tiru ('ibex'). The moon-connection is interesting given that both Ur and Haran, the two cities associated with Terah's family, were centers of moon-god worship.
25. Nahor's total lifespan of 148 years continues the declining trend. The lifespans are approaching the 120-year limit mentioned in 6:3.
26. Terah's entry breaks the single-son pattern of the genealogy by naming three sons — the same pattern used for Noah's three sons (5:32). This signals a major transition: the genealogical funnel now opens to introduce a new family narrative.
26. 'Abram' (א) — the original form of Abraham's name. It means 'exalted father.' The name will be changed to 'Abraham' (אברהם) in 17:5.

- 26. 'Nahor' — the same name as his grandfather (v. 22). 'Haran' () — not to be confused with the city Harran (), which is spelled differently in Hebrew.
- 27. The sixth toledot formula. This one introduces the family narrative that will dominate the rest of Genesis. Lot, Haran's son, will become Abram's traveling companion and will feature prominently in chapters 13–14 and 18–19.
- 28. 'Died in the presence of his father' (al-penei Terach aviv) — literally 'upon the face of Terah his father,' meaning during Terah's lifetime, before his father. This is the first recorded death of a child before a parent in Genesis — a narrative of grief.
- 29. 'Ur of the Chaldeans' (Ur Kasdim,) — the ancestral home of Abram's family. Ur was one of the great cities of ancient Sumer in southern Mesopotamia (modern Tell el-Muqayyar in Iraq). The designation 'Chaldeans' (Kasdim) is technically anachronistic for the patriarchal period — the Chaldeans are known from the first millennium BCE — but serves to identify the location for later readers.
- 29. 'Sarai' () means 'my princess.' Her name will be changed to 'Sarah' (, 'princess') in 17:15. She is one of the most important women in the biblical narrative.
- 29. 'Milcah' () means 'queen.' She is Haran's daughter, making her Nahor's niece. 'Iscah' () is mentioned only here; Jewish tradition (Rashi, citing Megillah 14a) identifies her with Sarai/Sarah, though this is uncertain.
- 29. Nahor marries his niece — a pattern of within-family marriage that will characterize the patriarchal period (cf. Isaac marrying Rebekah, Jacob marrying Leah and Rachel).
- 30. 'Sarai was barren' (vattehi Sarai aqarah,) — this statement, placed before the call of Abram, is one of the most consequential sentences in Genesis. The promise of offspring ('I will make of you a great nation,' 12:2) is given to a man whose wife cannot conceive. The tension between promise and barrenness drives the Abraham narrative. Barrenness becomes a recurring motif: Sarah, Rebekah (25:21), Rachel (29:31), and later Hannah (1 Samuel 1:2).
- 30. The doubling 'barren... she had no child' makes the point emphatic. There is no ambiguity, no hope of a pregnancy in progress. The situation is humanly impossible.
- 31. Terah initiates the journey — he is the family patriarch who leads the migration. The intended destination is 'the land of Canaan,' but the family stops at Harran and settles. The journey is incomplete; it will be Abram who completes it under divine calling (12:1–5). Harran (, with a different first consonant than Haran the person) was a major city in upper Mesopotamia (modern southeastern Turkey), also a center of moon-god worship like Ur.
- 31. The journey from Ur to Canaan via Harran follows the Fertile Crescent — the natural travel route avoiding the Arabian Desert. This geography is historically plausible for ancient migrations.
- 32. Terah dies in Harran, never reaching Canaan. His death marks the end of the primeval/genealogical era and prepares for the new beginning with Abram's call in chapter 12. The narrative structure is clear: one era ends (Terah dies) and a new era begins (God calls Abram). The 'and he died' formula from the genealogy provides closure.
- 32. A chronological note: if Terah was 70 when he fathered Abram (v. 26) and Abram left Harran at age 75 (12:4), Terah would have been 145, not 205. This suggests either that Abram was not the firstborn (listed first for importance, not birth order), or that Abram left before Terah's death (cf. Acts 7:4). The text places Terah's death before Abram's call for narrative, not chronological, reasons.

Summary: God commands Abram to leave his homeland for an unknown land, promising to make him a great nation and a blessing to all families of the earth. Abram obeys, travels through Canaan, and receives the promise of the land. Famine drives him to Egypt, where he passes Sarai off as his sister. Pharaoh takes her, is plagued, and expels them.

What Makes This Remarkable: The command lekh-lekha ('go forth,' v. 1) is uniquely emphatic — literally 'go for yourself' — and appears only one other time in the Bible: at the binding of Isaac (22:2). These two lekh-lekha commands frame Abraham's entire story. The fivefold 'I will' of the blessing (vv. 2-3) concentrates the entire creation mandate into one man and his seed. That Abram immediately endangers the promised wife by calling her his sister (v. 13) introduces a pattern of human failure within divine promise that defines the patriarchal narratives.

Translation Friction: The final clause of verse 3 — venivrekhu bekha kol mishpechot ha'adamah — can be translated as either 'all families will be blessed in you' (passive/reflexive) or 'all families will bless themselves by you' (reflexive). The Niphal form is genuinely ambiguous, and we retained the passive reading while noting the alternative. The word berakhah ('blessing,' v. 2) carries a density that no single English word captures:

divine favor, empowerment to flourish, and the capacity to transmit that favor to others.

Connections: The call of Abram (12:1-3) answers the scattering at Babel (11:9): where nations were divided, blessing will now flow to all families. Abram's wife-sister deception (12:10-20) recurs in chapters 20 and 26, forming a pattern. God's striking of Pharaoh (12:17) foreshadows the plagues of Exodus. The promise 'to your offspring I will give this land' (12:7) is the first land grant to Abraham.

¹The LORD said to Abram, "Go forth from your land, from your kindred, and from your father's house, to the land that I will show you. ²I will make you into a great nation, and I will bless you, and I will make your name great, so that you will be a blessing. ³I will bless those who bless you, and the one who dishonors you I will curse, and in you all the families of the earth will be blessed." ⁴So Abram went, as the LORD had told him, and Lot went with him. Abram was 75 years old when he departed from Harran. ⁵Abram took his wife Sarai, his nephew Lot, all the possessions they had accumulated, and the people they had acquired in Harran, and they set out for the land of Canaan. And they arrived in the land of Canaan. ⁶Abram passed through the land to the place at Shechem, to the oak of Moreh. At that time the Canaanites were in the land. ⁷The LORD appeared to Abram and said, "To your offspring I will give this land." So he built an altar there to the LORD, who had appeared to him. ⁸From there he moved to the hill country east of Bethel and pitched his tent, with Bethel on the west and Ai on the east. There he built an altar to the LORD and called upon the name of the LORD. ⁹Then Abram journeyed on, traveling toward the Negev. ¹⁰Now there was a famine in the land, and Abram went down to Egypt to sojourn there, for the famine was severe in the land. ¹¹As he was about to enter Egypt, he said to his wife Sarai, "Look, I know that you are a woman beautiful in appearance. ¹²When the Egyptians see you, they will say, 'This is his wife.' Then they will kill me, but you they will keep alive. ¹³Please say you are my sister, so that it may go well with me because of you, and my life will be spared on your account." ¹⁴When Abram entered Egypt, the Egyptians saw that the woman was very beautiful. ¹⁵When Pharaoh's officials saw her, they praised her to Pharaoh, and the woman was taken into Pharaoh's house. ¹⁶He treated Abram well for her sake, and Abram acquired sheep, oxen, male donkeys, male and female servants, female donkeys, and camels. ¹⁷But the LORD struck Pharaoh and his house with great plagues because of Sarai, Abram's wife. ¹⁸Pharaoh summoned Abram and said, "What is this you have done to me? Why did you not tell me she was your wife? ¹⁹Why did you say, 'She is my sister,' so that I took her as my wife? Here is your wife. Take her and go!" ²⁰Pharaoh gave orders concerning him to his men, and they sent him away with his wife and all that he had.

- ¹. 'Go forth' translates lekh-lekha (לך-לך), one of the most famous phrases in the Hebrew Bible. Literally 'go for yourself' or 'go to yourself.' The lekh intensifier can mean: (1) 'go by yourself' (alone); (2) 'go for your own benefit' (it will be good for you); (3) 'go to/into yourself' (a journey of self-discovery). The phrase appears only twice in God's commands to Abraham — here and in 22:2 ('go to the land of Moriah'), framing Abraham's entire narrative between two journeys of radical obedience.
- The command requires a threefold separation: from land (erets — national identity), from kindred (moledeth — tribal/extended family identity), and from father's house (beit av — immediate family identity). Each successive term is more intimate than the last. Abram is called to leave everything that defines him socially, culturally, and personally.
- 'To the land that I will show you' (el-ha'arets asher ar'ekka) — the destination is unnamed. Abram is told to go but not told where. This is faith as trust — obedience without full knowledge, departure without a clear destination.
- God's promise contains seven elements (vv. 2–3): (1) great nation, (2) I will bless you, (3) great name, (4) you will be a blessing, (5) I will bless those who bless you, (6) I will curse the one who dishonors you, (7) all families of the earth will be blessed through you. The sevenfold structure may be intentional, echoing the creation pattern.
- 'I will make your name great' (va'agaddelah shemekha) — a direct contrast with Babel, where the builders said 'let us make a name for ourselves' (11:4). The name that humans sought to manufacture for themselves, God freely bestows on Abram. The solution to Babel's failed self-exaltation is God's sovereign choice to elevate one man.
- 'Be a blessing' (vehyeh berakhah) — an imperative: 'and be a blessing.' Abram is not only a recipient of blessing but is constituted as a source of blessing for others. This is both gift and commission.
- 'The one who dishonors you I will curse' — two different Hebrew words for 'curse' are used: meqallekha (מקלקלך, from qalal, 'to make light of, to treat with contempt, to dishonor') and a'or (א'ור, from arar, 'to curse'). The one who 'makes light of' or dishonors Abram will receive the full divine curse (arar). The asymmetry is notable: 'those who bless you' is plural; 'the one who dishonors you' is singular — many will bless, but cursers will be few.

3. 'In you all the families of the earth will be blessed' (venivrekhu vekha kol mishpechot ha'adamah) — this is the climactic promise. The verb nivrekhu can be parsed as niphal ('will be blessed') or hitpaal ('will bless themselves'). The niphal reading (passive) means that blessing will come to all nations through Abram; the hitpaal reading (reflexive) means nations will invoke Abram's name when blessing themselves ('may I be blessed like Abram'). Both senses are theologically significant. The rendering follows the niphal passive.
3. 'All the families of the earth' (kol mishpechot ha'adamah) — not only nations but families, clans, kinship groups. The scope is universal: what began with the particular (one man, one family) is aimed at the universal (every family on the ground/adamah). The promise reverses the curse of the ground (adamah) pronounced in 3:17 and the scattering of Babel (11:8).
4. 'Abram went, as the LORD had told him' — like Noah's obedience formula ('Noah did according to all that God commanded him,' 6:22; 7:5), Abram's response is immediate and complete. No objection, negotiation, or delay is recorded. The text moves directly from divine command to human compliance.
4. 'Lot went with him' — Lot's presence is notable because the command was to leave 'your kindred' and 'your father's house.' Abram obeys the command to leave but takes his nephew along. Whether this is a partial obedience that will create complications (which it does — chapters 13–14, 18–19) or a compassionate act toward an orphaned nephew is left for the reader to consider.
4. Abram is 75 years old — past the prime of life. The promise of a great nation is given to an old man with a barren wife. The narrative tension is established from the start.
5. 'The people they had acquired' translates hannephesh asher-asu beCharan (), literally 'the souls/persons they had made.' This has been interpreted as: (1) servants and slaves acquired in Haran; (2) converts or followers (the rabbinic tradition reads 'made' as 'brought to faith'); (3) dependents and household members. The rendering uses 'people they had acquired.'
5. 'They arrived in the land of Canaan' — where Terah stopped at Haran and never completed the journey (11:31), Abram completes it. The narrative emphasizes the arrival: 'they set out for the land of Canaan, and they arrived in the land of Canaan.' The journey God commanded is accomplished.
6. 'The oak of Moreh' (elon Moreh,) — elon can mean 'oak' or 'terebinth,' a large tree. Moreh means 'teacher' or 'oracle.' These trees often served as sacred sites and landmarks. Shechem is in central Canaan, in the valley between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. It will become an important location throughout Israel's history (cf. Joshua 24:1).
6. 'The Canaanites were in the land' (vehaKena'ani az ba'arets) — this seemingly parenthetical note carries enormous weight. The land God promised to show Abram is already occupied. The promise of land must contend with the reality of prior inhabitants. The tension between divine promise and human occupation will persist throughout the Pentateuch.
7. 'The LORD appeared to Abram' (vayyera YHWH el-Abram) — this is the first theophany (divine appearance) to Abram and the first since the flood narrative. God makes himself visible. The verb ra'ah in the niphal ('to appear, to show oneself') indicates a deliberate divine self-revelation.
7. 'To your offspring I will give this land' (leazar'akha etten et-ha'arets hazzot) — the promise of land is now explicit: 'this land' — the land of Canaan where Abram currently stands. The word zera ('offspring/seed') is singular but collective, encompassing all future descendants. This is the land promise that will be repeated and expanded (13:15–17; 15:7, 18–21; 17:8).
7. Abram's response to the theophany is worship: he builds an altar. This is his first altar in Canaan. Altar-building marks the land with Abram's worship — claiming it not by conquest but by worship.
8. 'Bethel' (Beit-El,) means 'house of God.' The name is proleptic — it will receive this name from Jacob in 28:19 (it was originally called Luz). The narrator uses the name familiar to later readers.
8. 'Called upon the name of the LORD' (vayyiqra beshem YHWH) — the same phrase from 4:26. Abram worships God by his covenant name. Abram's journey through the land is marked by altar-building and worship — Shechem (v. 7), Bethel (v. 8), and later Hebron (13:18). These altars establish a worship geography in the promised land.
8. Abram moves south through the central hill country — the backbone of later Israelite settlement.
9. 'The Negev' (hannegbah,) — the semi-arid region of southern Canaan. Negev means 'dry' or 'south.' Abram's journey traces a north-to-south route through the promised land, as if surveying it.
10. 'Famine in the land' — immediately upon arriving in the promised land, Abram encounters famine. The land promised by God cannot sustain him. This tests the promise: is the land really a blessing if it produces famine? Abram's response is to go to Egypt, the breadbasket of the ancient world.
10. 'Went down' (vayyered,) — Egypt is geographically lower than Canaan. The language of 'going down' to Egypt and 'going up' from Egypt becomes standard in the biblical narrative and foreshadows the Exodus pattern.
10. 'To sojourn' (lagur,) — Abram intends a temporary stay, not permanent settlement. He is a ger ('sojourner, resident alien') — a recurring identity for the patriarchs (cf. 15:13; 23:4; 47:9).
11. 'Beautiful in appearance' (yephat-mar'eh,) — Sarai's beauty is the catalyst for the crisis that follows. Beauty in Genesis often leads to dangerous situations (cf. 6:2; 26:7; 29:17; 39:6). This is the first 'wife-sister' narrative — a pattern that will recur (20:1–18; 26:6–11).

12. Abram fears that the Egyptians will murder a husband to obtain his wife but will spare a brother. This reflects ancient Near Eastern customs where marriage rights could be negotiated with a woman's brother or family, but a husband was an obstacle to be removed.
13. Abram asks Sarai to claim to be his sister — a half-truth, as she is his half-sister (20:12). But the deception is motivated by self-preservation at the potential expense of his wife's virtue. The patriarch of faith acts in fear, prioritizing his survival over his wife's protection. The text does not gloss over this moral failure.
13. 'So that it may go well with me' (lema'an yitav-li) — Abram's stated concern is his own well-being. The narrative presents this without editorial comment, allowing the reader to evaluate Abram's character.
14. Abram's fear proves well-founded — Sarai's beauty is indeed noticed. The narrative pace quickens as events unfold exactly as Abram predicted.
15. 'Pharaoh' (Par'oh,) — an Egyptian title meaning 'great house.' No specific pharaoh is named. The term is used throughout the Hebrew Bible for the king of Egypt.
15. 'Was taken' (vattuqqach) — the passive voice is ominous. Sarai does not go willingly; she is taken. The verb laqach ('to take') echoes the dangerous 'taking' of wives in 6:2. The matriarch of the promised line is now in Pharaoh's house — the promise is in jeopardy.
16. Abram profits materially from the arrangement — exactly as he hoped ('that it may go well with me,' v. 13). His material enrichment comes at the cost of his wife's dignity and safety. The irony is uncomfortable: the man of faith prospers through deception while his wife is in Pharaoh's house.
16. The mention of camels has been discussed by scholars, as domesticated camel use in the early second millennium BCE is debated archaeologically. Some view this as an anachronism reflecting later editorial perspective; others argue for earlier camel domestication than previously assumed.
17. 'The LORD struck Pharaoh with great plagues' (vaynagga YHWH et-Par'oh nega'im gedolim) — God intervenes to protect Sarai and the promise when Abram fails to do so. The 'plagues' (nega'im) on Pharaoh's house foreshadow the greater plagues God will send on a later Pharaoh to free Abraham's descendants from Egypt (Exodus 7–12). The parallels between this episode and the Exodus are striking: descent to Egypt due to famine, threat to the chosen family, plagues on Pharaoh, departure with wealth.
17. 'Because of Sarai, Abram's wife' — God acts on behalf of Sarai, identified specifically as 'Abram's wife.' Her status as the wife of the covenant recipient is the reason for divine protection. The promise depends on this woman.
18. Pharaoh's rebuke of Abram is morally justified — a pagan king rebukes the patriarch for deception. The ethical reversal is striking: the recipient of God's promise behaves worse than the foreigner. This pattern recurs in 20:9–10 (Abimelech rebukes Abraham) and 26:10 (Abimelech rebukes Isaac).
18. 'What is this you have done to me?' — the same words God uses in 3:13 to the woman ('What is this you have done?'). Pharaoh's language echoes the divine interrogation after the fall.
19. Pharaoh returns Sarai and expels Abram. The command 'take her and go' (qach valekh) is terse and decisive. Pharaoh is done with Abram — he wants no further trouble from this God-protected deceiver.
20. Abram is escorted out of Egypt under guard — expelled but allowed to keep his acquired wealth. The chapter ends with Abram leaving Egypt enriched but morally diminished. He has been rebuked by a pagan king and rescued by God despite his own failure.
20. The Exodus pattern is clear: descent to Egypt danger to the chosen family divine plagues on the oppressor departure with wealth. This mini-Exodus foreshadows the national Exodus centuries later. God's protection of the patriarchal family even through their moral failures ensures that the promise will be fulfilled.

Summary: Abram returns from Egypt wealthy. Strife arises between his herdsmen and Lot's because the land cannot support both. Abram offers Lot first choice; Lot selects the well-watered Jordan plain near Sodom. God then reaffirms the land promise to Abram, telling him to walk through the land in every direction.

What Makes This Remarkable: Lot's choice is described with Eden-like language — the plain was 'like the garden of the LORD' (v. 10) — yet his movement is toward Sodom, whose men are 'exceedingly wicked, great sinners against the LORD' (v. 13). The contrast between human choosing (Lot lifts his eyes and selects) and divine giving (God tells Abram to lift his eyes and promises all he sees) structures the chapter. Abram's generosity with the land is paradoxically rewarded with the whole land.

Translation Friction: The comparison of the Jordan plain to 'the garden of the LORD' and 'the land of Egypt' (v. 10) pairs two places — one sacred, one associated with bondage — in a single breath, and this duality resists simple evaluation. We rendered the Hebrew directly and let the tension stand. The ominous parenthetical 'this was before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah' (v. 10) functions as a narrative prolepsis that English handles naturally.

Connections: Abram's building of altars (13:18) continues the worship pattern from 12:7-8. The Sodom reference anticipates chapters 18-19. The promise that Abram's offspring will be 'like the dust of the earth' (13:16) is the first of three great multiplication metaphors — dust (13:16), stars (15:5), and sand (22:17). Lot's eastward movement continues the ominous eastward trajectory of 3:24 and 4:16.

¹So Abram went up from Egypt—he and his wife and all that he had, and Lot with him—into the Negev. ²Now Abram was very wealthy in livestock, silver, and gold. ³He journeyed by stages from the Negev to Bethel, to the place where his tent had been at the beginning, between Bethel and Ai, ⁴to the place of the altar that he had made there previously. There Abram called upon the name of the LORD. ⁵Lot, who went with Abram, also had flocks, herds, and tents. ⁶The land could not support both of them dwelling together, for their possessions were so great that they could not dwell together. ⁷There was strife between the herdsmen of Abram's livestock and the herdsmen of Lot's livestock. At that time the Canaanites and the Perizzites were dwelling in the land. ⁸So Abram said to Lot, "Let there be no strife between me and you, and between my herdsmen and your herdsmen, for we are kinsmen. ⁹Is not the whole land before you? Please separate from me. If you go to the left, I will go to the right; or if you go to the right, I will go to the left." ¹⁰Lot lifted up his eyes and saw that the whole Jordan plain was well watered everywhere—this was before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah—like the garden of the LORD, like the land of Egypt, in the direction of Zoar. ¹¹So Lot chose for himself all the Jordan plain, and Lot journeyed east. Thus they separated from each other. ¹²Abram settled in the land of Canaan, while Lot settled among the cities of the plain and moved his tent as far as Sodom. ¹³Now the men of Sodom were exceedingly wicked, great sinners against the LORD. ¹⁴The LORD said to Abram, after Lot had separated from him, "Lift up your eyes and look from the place where you are—northward and southward, eastward and westward, ¹⁵for all the land that you see I will give to you and to your offspring forever. ¹⁶I will make your offspring like the dust of the earth, so that if anyone could count the dust of the earth, then your offspring could also be counted. ¹⁷Rise up, walk through the land, its length and its breadth, for I will give it to you." ¹⁸So Abram moved his tent and came and settled by the oaks of Mamre, which are at Hebron, and there he built an altar to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Went up' (vayya'al) — the reverse of 'went down' to Egypt (12:10). Ascending from Egypt to Canaan becomes a standard movement in the biblical narrative. Abram returns to the promised land.
2. 'Very wealthy' translates kaved me'od (כָּבֵד מְּוֹד), literally 'very heavy.' The root kaved means 'heavy, weighty, honored, rich.' Abram is materially substantial — the wealth from Egypt (12:16) and his own accumulation have made him a man of means. Material blessing fulfills part of God's promise (12:2).
3. Abram retraces his steps — returning to the exact location where he had camped and built an altar (12:8). The return to his starting point suggests a desire to reconnect with the place of worship and the divine encounter.
4. Abram returns to the altar and resumes worship. After the moral failure in Egypt, Abram's return to the place of the altar suggests a return to faithfulness. He 'calls upon the name of the LORD' — reaffirming his relationship with God.
5. Lot has also prospered. His wealth, combined with Abram's, creates the practical problem that leads to their separation.
6. The repetition of 'could not dwell together' (lo yakhlu lashevet yachdav) emphasizes the incompatibility. Their combined wealth exceeds the land's capacity. Prosperity creates a problem that poverty did not.
7. 'Strife' (riv, רִיב) — a legal or personal dispute. The conflict is between the herdsmen, not between Abram and Lot directly, but it threatens their relationship.
7. 'The Canaanites and the Perizzites were dwelling in the land' — this note (similar to 12:6) reminds the reader that Abram and Lot are not alone. Their internal conflict plays out before an audience of indigenous peoples. The observation may also underscore that the limited land must support not only Abram and Lot but also the existing inhabitants.
8. 'We are kinsmen' (anashim achim anachnu, אָנָשִׁים אַחִים אֲנַחְנוּ) — literally 'men, brothers, we are.' In contrast to Cain's denial of brotherly responsibility (4:9), Abram affirms the family bond and acts to preserve it. Achim here means 'relatives, kinsmen' rather than literal brothers.

8. Abram, the elder and the one with the divine promise, takes the initiative to resolve the conflict peacefully. He is willing to yield his right of first choice to preserve family unity.
9. Abram offers Lot first choice of the land — a remarkably generous gesture. As the patriarch and the one to whom God promised the land, Abram had every right to choose first. His willingness to yield demonstrates trust that God will fulfill the promise regardless of which territory Abram occupies. Generosity flows from faith.
9. The separation is presented as a practical necessity ('please separate from me'), but it also fulfills God's original command to leave kindred (12:1).
10. 'Lot lifted up his eyes and saw' — the language of visual assessment and desire echoes Eve's seeing that the tree was 'desirable' (3:6) and the sons of God seeing that the daughters of men were 'beautiful' (6:2). Lot chooses by sight, not by faith.
10. 'Like the garden of the LORD' (kegan-YHWH) — the Jordan plain is compared to Eden itself. The lush, well-watered landscape recalls the paradise lost. But the narrator immediately inserts a proleptic note: 'before the LORD destroyed Sodom and Gomorrah.' What looks like paradise is destined for destruction.
10. 'Like the land of Egypt' — the comparison to Egypt is telling. Lot chooses the land that resembles the place from which Abram has just returned — the place of danger, moral compromise, and necessary rescue. Egypt and Sodom are paired as places of material abundance and moral peril.
11. 'Lot journeyed east' (vayyissa Lot miqqedem) — the eastward movement continues the pattern: Eden's entrance was in the east (2:8), Cain went east (4:16), the Babel builders migrated east (11:2). Moving east in Genesis is moving away from God's presence and blessing. Lot's choice, guided by sight rather than faith, takes him eastward — away from Abram and toward Sodom.
12. 'Moved his tent as far as Sodom' (vayye'ehal ad-Sedom) — Lot's proximity to Sodom is ominous. He does not yet live in Sodom but pitches his tent near it. The progression from 'near Sodom' to 'in Sodom' (14:12; 19:1) traces his gradual absorption into the city's life. The moral geography of Lot's choices leads inexorably toward catastrophe.
13. The narrator's moral evaluation of Sodom is emphatic and unambiguous: ra'im ('wicked/evil'), chatta'im ('sinners'), laYHWH ('against the LORD'), me'od ('exceedingly'). Lot has chosen to live near the most wicked city in the narrative. The beautiful land harbors profound moral corruption. The irony is pointed: Lot chose by sight, but what he could not see was the moral character of the people.
14. 'After Lot had separated from him' — God speaks to Abram only after Lot leaves. The separation from kindred (12:1) is now complete, and God can expand the promise. Obedience creates space for further revelation.
14. 'Lift up your eyes and look' — the same visual language used for Lot in verse 10 (Lot 'lifted up his eyes and saw'). But where Lot looked and chose for himself, Abram is told to look and receive God's gift. Lot saw what he desired; Abram sees what God promises.
14. The four directions (north, south, east, west) encompass the entire land. Abram is given a panoramic divine survey of all that God will give to his offspring.
15. 'All the land that you see' — everything visible from Abram's vantage point, in every direction, belongs to his offspring. Lot's portion is included in God's gift to Abram. Abram's generosity cost him nothing — God's promise encompasses more than any human negotiation could secure.
15. 'Forever' (ad-olam,) — the land promise is eternal. This word elevates the promise beyond a temporary arrangement to an everlasting covenant commitment.
16. 'Like the dust of the earth' (ka'aphar ha'arets) — the first of several comparisons for the innumerability of Abraham's offspring (cf. 15:5, stars of heaven; 22:17, sand of the seashore). 'Dust' (aphar) creates a connection to Adam's origin from the 'dust of the ground' (2:7; 3:19). The promise of offspring innumerable as dust reverses the death-to-dust sentence — from dust comes not death but abundant life.
17. 'Walk through the land' (hithallekh ba'arets) — God invites Abram to physically survey and experience the land promised to him. Walking through the land may also function as a symbolic act of possession — treading upon what is given, a practice known in ancient Near Eastern land grants. The verb hithallekh ('walk about') is the same used for 'walking with God' (5:22, 24; 6:9), now applied to walking in the promised land.
18. 'The oaks of Mamre' (elonei Mamre) — Mamre is a personal name (cf. 14:13, 24) associated with an Amorite ally of Abram. The oaks (or terebinths) of Mamre at Hebron become Abram's primary residence and the site of significant encounters with God (chapter 18).
18. Hebron (Chevron,) is one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the world, located in the southern hill country of Canaan. It will become the site of the Cave of Machpelah, the patriarchal burial ground (chapter 23).
18. 'Built an altar to the LORD' — Abram's third altar in Canaan (after Shechem in 12:7 and Bethel in 12:8). Each major settlement is consecrated with an altar. Abram's journey through the land is a worship journey, claiming the land through devotion rather than conquest.

Summary: Four eastern kings defeat five Canaanite kings and capture Lot. Abram musters 318 trained men, rescues Lot, and recovers everything. On his return, Melchizedek king of Salem blesses Abram and receives his tithe, while Abram refuses any spoil from the king of Sodom.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is unlike anything else in Genesis — it reads like an ancient Near Eastern military chronicle, complete with coalition lists and battle geography. Melchizedek appears without genealogy or backstory as a king-priest of El Elyon ('God Most High'), blesses Abram, and vanishes from the narrative. Despite his brevity, he becomes one of the most theologically significant figures in the Bible. Abram identifies Melchizedek's El Elyon with YHWH (v. 22), making the first explicit claim that the God of Israel and the supreme deity known to other peoples are one.

Translation Friction: The title Ivri ('Hebrew,' v. 13) appears for the first time here — a term typically used by outsiders to describe Israelites or by Israelites speaking to non-Israelites. We retained 'Hebrew' and noted its social context. The divine title El Elyon ('God Most High') is a compound that functions as a single title, and we rendered it accordingly rather than splitting it into separate words.

Connections: Melchizedek's blessing reappears in Psalm 110:4 ('a priest forever after the order of Melchizedek') and is developed extensively in Hebrews 5-7. Abram's tithe (14:20) establishes voluntary giving before Levitical law. The mention of Dan (14:14) uses a place name that will not officially exist until Judges 18:29. The war narrative shows Abram as a military leader — a side of his character not seen elsewhere.

¹In the days of Amraphel king of Shinar, Arioch king of Ellasar, Chedorlaomer king of Elam, and Tidal king of Goiim, ²they made war against Bera king of Sodom, Birsha king of Gomorrah, Shinab king of Admah, Shemeber king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela (that is, Zoar). ³All these joined forces in the Valley of Siddim (that is, the Salt Sea). ⁴For twelve years they had served Chedorlaomer, but in the thirteenth year they rebelled. ⁵In the fourteenth year, Chedorlaomer and the kings who were with him came and defeated the Rephaim in Ashteroth-karnaim, the Zuzim in Ham, the Emim in Shaveh-kiriathaim, ⁶and the Horites in their hill country of Seir as far as El-paran on the edge of the wilderness. ⁷Then they turned back and came to En-mishpat (that is, Kadesh) and defeated all the territory of the Amalekites, and also the Amorites who dwelt in Hazazon-tamar. ⁸Then the king of Sodom, the king of Gomorrah, the king of Admah, the king of Zeboiim, and the king of Bela (that is, Zoar) went out and drew up their battle lines against them in the Valley of Siddim— ⁹against Chedorlaomer king of Elam, Tidal king of Goiim, Amraphel king of Shinar, and Arioch king of Ellasar—four kings against five. ¹⁰Now the Valley of Siddim was full of bitumen pits, and as the kings of Sodom and Gomorrah fled, some fell into them, and the rest fled to the hill country. ¹¹They seized all the possessions of Sodom and Gomorrah and all their food, and departed. ¹²They also took Lot—the son of Abram's brother—and his possessions, and departed, for he was living in Sodom. ¹³A fugitive came and told Abram the Hebrew, who was dwelling by the oaks of Mamre the Amorite, brother of Eshcol and brother of Aner; these were allies of Abram. ¹⁴When Abram heard that his kinsman had been taken captive, he mustered his trained men, born in his household, 318 of them, and pursued as far as Dan. ¹⁵He divided his forces against them by night, he and his servants, and defeated them and pursued them as far as Hobah, north of Damascus. ¹⁶He recovered all the possessions and also brought back his kinsman Lot with his possessions, and the women and the people as well. ¹⁷After Abram returned from defeating Chedorlaomer and the kings who were with him, the king of Sodom went out to meet him at the Valley of Shaveh (that is, the King's Valley). ¹⁸Then Melchizedek king of Salem brought out bread and wine. He was priest of God Most High. ¹⁹He blessed him and said, "Blessed be Abram by God Most High, Maker of heaven and earth, ²⁰and blessed be God Most High, who has delivered your enemies into your hand." Then Abram gave him a tenth of everything. ²¹The king of Sodom said to Abram, "Give me the people, and take the possessions for yourself." ²²But Abram said to the king of Sodom, "I have raised my hand to the LORD, God Most High, Maker of heaven and earth, ²³that I will take nothing belonging to you, not a thread or a sandal strap, lest you should say, 'I have made Abram rich.' ²⁴I will take nothing except what the young men have eaten, and the share of the men who went with me—Aner, Eshcol, and Mamre. Let them take their share."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This chapter introduces a unique narrative in Genesis — an account of inter-regional warfare involving named kings. It reads more like ancient Near Eastern royal annals than the family narratives surrounding it.
1. 'Shinar' is Mesopotamia (cf. 10:10; 11:2). 'Elam' is southwestern Iran. 'Goiim' () means 'nations' — Tidal may be king of a coalition or a region known by this general term. Some have attempted to identify these kings with known historical figures (Amraphel with Hammurabi, for instance), but no consensus exists.
2. The five cities of the plain — Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, Zeboiim, and Bela/Zoar — are the coalition that faces the eastern kings. These are the same cities listed in 10:19 as part of the Canaanite territory.
2. The kings' names may carry symbolic meanings: 'Bera' could mean 'in evil'; 'Birsha' could mean 'in wickedness.' Whether these are historical names or narrative symbolism is uncertain.
3. 'The Valley of Siddim' — identified with the Dead Sea (the Salt Sea, yam hammelach). The parenthetical note suggests the valley was later submerged, which aligns with the tradition that the destruction of Sodom transformed the region.
4. The five kings of the plain had been vassals of Chedorlaomer of Elam for twelve years. Their rebellion triggers the punitive military campaign described in the following verses.
5. The eastern coalition's campaign sweeps through Transjordan from north to south, defeating various peoples before confronting the rebellious five kings. The Rephaim, Zuzim, and Emim are all described elsewhere as ancient, giant peoples (cf. Deuteronomy 2:10–12, 20–21). Their defeat demonstrates the military power of the invading coalition.
6. The Horites (Chorim) inhabited the region of Seir before the Edomites displaced them (Deuteronomy 2:12, 22). El-paran is at the southern extreme of the campaign — the wilderness of Paran, near the Sinai peninsula.
7. 'En-mishpat' () means 'spring of judgment,' identified with Kadesh — a significant location in Israel's later wilderness journey. 'Amalekites' is proleptic, as the Amalekites descend from Esau's grandson (36:12). Hazazon-tamar is identified with En-gedi on the western shore of the Dead Sea (2 Chronicles 20:2).
8. The five kings of the plain finally confront the invaders in their own territory. The battle takes place in the Valley of Siddim, the same valley identified with the Dead Sea region.
9. 'Four kings against five' — the terse summary highlights the military mismatch: the more powerful coalition of four eastern kings defeats the five local kings.
10. 'Bitumen pits' (be'erot chemar,) — natural tar pits in the Dead Sea region. The bitumen (chemar) is the same material used in building the Tower of Babel (11:3). The fleeing kings fall into these pits, compounding their defeat.
11. The victors plunder Sodom and Gomorrah completely — goods and provisions. This sets the stage for Lot's capture in the next verse.
12. 'He was living in Sodom' (vehu yoshev biSdom) — the progression is complete. In 13:12, Lot pitched his tent 'toward' Sodom; now he is 'living in' Sodom. His gradual movement toward the wicked city has resulted in full absorption. He is now a resident and shares in Sodom's fate.
12. Lot is identified as 'the son of Abram's brother' — his kinship with Abram is emphasized, which motivates Abram's response.
13. 'Abram the Hebrew' (Abram ha'Ivri,) — this is the first use of the term 'Hebrew' (Ivri) in the Bible. The designation Ivri may mean: (1) 'descendant of Eber' (Ever, 10:21, 24–25); (2) 'one from beyond' (from the root avar, 'to cross over') — referring to crossing the Euphrates; (3) a social designation — the Habiru/Apiru, a class of semi-nomadic people attested in ancient Near Eastern texts. It is used here as an ethnic or social identifier distinguishing Abram from the local population.
13. 'Allies of Abram' (ba'alei berit-Abram,) — literally 'masters/lords of Abram's covenant.' These Amorites — Mamre, Eshcol, and Aner — have a covenant alliance with Abram. They will accompany him in the rescue mission (v. 24).
14. 'His kinsman' (achiv,) — literally 'his brother,' but Lot is his nephew. The term ach is used broadly for kinship, as in 13:8.
14. 'Trained men' translates chanichav (), from the root ch-n-kh ('to dedicate, to train'). These are retainers or dependents trained for military service, born within Abram's household. The number 318 indicates a substantial household — Abram is a significant chieftain, not a simple nomad.
14. The rescue mission transforms Abram from a pastoral figure into a military leader. He pursues the victorious eastern kings all the way to Dan (the northern limit of Canaan), some 120 miles from Hebron.
15. Abram employs a nighttime attack with divided forces — a classic military tactic that creates confusion (cf. Gideon in Judges 7:16–22). With 318 men and his Amorite allies, Abram defeats the coalition that had already vanquished multiple peoples and five kings. The campaign extends far north to Damascus — an extraordinary military achievement.

15. 'North of Damascus' — literally 'on the left of Damascus.' In Hebrew directional orientation, one faces east; 'left' is north.
16. The rescue is complete — all captives and possessions are recovered. Abram accomplishes what the five kings of the plain could not: he defeats the eastern coalition and liberates the captives.
17. 'The Valley of Shaveh, the King's Valley' — identified by Josephus and later tradition with the Kidron Valley near Jerusalem. The meeting with two kings — Sodom's king and Melchizedek — occurs in this significant location.
18. 'Melchizedek' (Malki-tsedeq,) means 'my king is righteousness' or 'king of righteousness' (cf. Hebrews 7:2). He is both king and priest — a dual role that has profound theological significance in later biblical tradition (Psalm 110:4; Hebrews 5–7).
18. 'King of Salem' (melekh Shalem) — Shalem () means 'peace' (related to shalom) and is identified with Jerusalem (cf. Psalm 76:2). Melchizedek is thus 'king of peace' ruling in 'peace/Salem.'
18. 'Priest of God Most High' (kohen le-El Elyon) — El Elyon () is a title meaning 'God Most High.' This is the first occurrence of the term 'priest' (kohen) in the Bible. Melchizedek appears without genealogy, without introduction, and without further explanation — a mysterious figure whose very lack of context becomes theologically significant (Hebrews 7:3).
18. The bread and wine may represent a simple provision of refreshment for the returning warriors or a more formal ritual meal. Later Christian tradition has seen in this a foreshadowing of the Eucharist.
19. 'Maker of heaven and earth' translates qoneh shamayim va'arets (). The word qoneh (from qanah) can mean 'possessor,' 'creator,' or 'acquirer.' The same root appeared in Eve's exclamation at Cain's birth (4:1, 'I have acquired'). The rendering follows the sense of 'maker/creator' here, connecting El Elyon to the creator God of Genesis 1.
19. Melchizedek blesses Abram — the priest of God Most High pronounces divine blessing on the patriarch. The fact that Abram accepts this blessing from a non-Israelite priest indicates that true worship of God existed outside Abram's family.
20. 'Delivered your enemies into your hand' (miggen tsareikha beyadekha) — Melchizedek attributes Abram's military victory to God Most High. The victory was divine, not merely human.
20. 'A tenth of everything' (ma'aser mikkol,) — the first tithe in the Bible. Abram voluntarily gives a tenth of the spoils to Melchizedek, acknowledging his priestly authority and God's role in the victory. This becomes the basis for later tithing practices (cf. Leviticus 27:30–33; Hebrews 7:4–10).
21. The king of Sodom's offer contrasts sharply with Melchizedek's blessing. Where Melchizedek gave and blessed, Sodom's king bargains — offering the material spoils in exchange for the recovered captives. The juxtaposition of the two kings presents Abram with a choice between two sources of wealth and two kinds of relationship.
22. 'I have raised my hand' (harimoti yadi) — a gesture of oath-taking. Abram has sworn an oath to God.
22. Significantly, Abram identifies 'the LORD' (YHWH) with 'God Most High' (El Elyon), using Melchizedek's title alongside the covenant name. This theological equation means that Melchizedek's God and Abram's God are the same — the one true God who made heaven and earth.
23. 'Not a thread or a sandal strap' (im-michut ve'ad serokh-na'al) — a proverbial expression for the smallest, most worthless items. Abram refuses everything — from the most trivial to the most valuable. His refusal is absolute.
23. Abram's motivation: he will not allow the king of Sodom to claim credit for his wealth. Abram's riches come from God's blessing (12:2), not from Sodom's king. To accept Sodom's goods would compromise the purity of the divine gift and create a debt relationship with a wicked city.
24. Abram makes two exceptions: (1) the food already consumed by his warriors during the campaign; (2) the rightful share of his Amorite allies (Aner, Eshcol, Mamre). He cannot impose his own convictions on others — his allies deserve their portion. Abram's refusal is personal, not imposed on others.
24. The chapter presents Abram in a new light: military leader, diplomat, and man of principle. He defeats kings, receives blessing from a priest-king, and refuses wealth from a king of wickedness. The contrast between his reception of Melchizedek's blessing and his rejection of Sodom's offer defines his character.

Summary: God appears to Abram in a vision, calling himself Abram's shield. Abram protests his childlessness; God promises an heir from his own body and offspring like the stars. Abram believes, and God credits it as righteousness. In a covenant ceremony, God foretells 400 years of slavery and promises the land. A smoking fire pot and flaming torch pass between the animal halves.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 6 is one of the most theologically consequential sentences in the Hebrew Bible: Abram he'emin ('believed/trusted') and God 'credited it to him as righteousness (tsedaqah).' The verb he'emin shares its root with 'amen' — faith as staking one's existence on God's reliability. The covenant ceremony (vv. 9-18) is extraordinary: normally both parties walk between the split animals, invoking death on themselves if they break the oath. Here only God — as fire pot and torch — passes through, making this a unilateral, unconditional commitment.

Translation Friction: The verb he'emin (v. 6) is richer than English 'believed,' encompassing trust, reliance, and commitment. We rendered it as 'put his trust' to convey the active, relational dimension. The phrase tsedaqah ('righteousness') is not moral perfection but right standing — conformity to the standard of the relationship. The 'dreadful, great darkness' (v. 12) that falls on Abram uses tardemah, the same supernatural sleep from 2:21, marking this as a divine encounter beyond ordinary consciousness.

Connections: Paul cites verse 6 in Romans 4:3 and Galatians 3:6 as the foundation of justification by faith. The 400-year prophecy (15:13) is fulfilled in Exodus 12:40-41. The territorial boundaries 'from the river of Egypt to the Euphrates' (15:18) define the ideal extent of the promised land, partially realized under Solomon (1 Kings 4:21). The fire theophany anticipates the burning bush (Exodus 3:2) and the pillar of fire (Exodus 13:21).

¹After these things the word of the LORD came to Abram in a vision: "Do not be afraid, Abram. I am your shield; your reward will be very great." ²But Abram said, "Lord GOD, what will you give me, for I remain childless, and the heir of my house is Eliezer of Damascus?" ³And Abram said, "Look, you have given me no offspring, and a member of my household will be my heir." ⁴Then the word of the LORD came to him: "This man will not be your heir; rather, one who comes from your own body will be your heir." ⁵He brought him outside and said, "Look toward the sky and count the stars, if you are able to count them." Then he said to him, "So will your offspring be." ⁶Abram put his trust in the LORD, and the LORD credited it to him as righteousness. ⁷He said to him, "I am the LORD who brought you out from Ur of the Chaldeans to give you this land to possess it." ⁸He said, "Lord GOD, how am I to know that I will possess it?" ⁹He said to him, "Bring me a three-year-old heifer, a three-year-old female goat, a three-year-old ram, a turtledove, and a young pigeon." ¹⁰He brought him all these, cut them in half, and laid each half opposite the other, but the birds he did not cut in half. ¹¹Birds of prey came down on the carcasses, but Abram drove them away. ¹²As the sun was going down, a deep sleep fell upon Abram, and a dreadful, great darkness fell upon him. ¹³Then he said to Abram, "Know for certain that your offspring will be sojourners in a land that is not theirs and will be servants there, and they will be afflicted for four hundred years. ¹⁴But I will also judge the nation that they serve, and afterward they will come out with great possessions. ¹⁵As for you, you will go to your fathers in peace; you will be buried at a good old age. ¹⁶In the fourth generation they will return here, for the iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete." ¹⁷When the sun had gone down and it was dark, there appeared a smoking fire pot and a flaming torch that passed between the pieces. ¹⁸On that day the LORD made a covenant with Abram, saying, "To your offspring I have given this land, from the river of Egypt to the great river, the river Euphrates— ¹⁹the land of the Kenites, the Kenizzites, the Kadmonites, ²⁰the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Rephaim, ²¹the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Girgashites, and the Jebusites."

1. "The word of the LORD came to Abram" (hayah devar-YHWH el-Abram) — this is the first occurrence of the prophetic reception formula, typically used for prophets (cf. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea). Abram receives divine communication in the manner of a prophet.

1. 'In a vision' (bammachazeh,) — from the root ch-z-h ('to see, to envision'). This is a formal revelatory experience — a visionary encounter with God.
1. 'I am your shield' (anokhi magen lakh) — God presents himself as Abram's protector. After the military victory of chapter 14, Abram may fear retaliation from the defeated kings. God assures him that divine protection exceeds any military alliance.
1. 'Your reward will be very great' (sekharekha harbeh me'od) — some take this as 'I am your reward' (God himself is the reward) or 'your reward is very great' (the reward God gives is substantial). The ambiguity is productive — God is both the giver and the gift.
2. 'Lord GOD' translates Adonai YHWH (). This is the first use of this combined divine title in the Bible. Adonai ('Lord, master') with YHWH ('the LORD') creates a double designation of sovereignty and covenant relationship.
2. This is the first recorded speech of Abram to God — and it is a complaint. Despite the great promises (12:2–3, 7; 13:15–17), Abram has no child. The contrast between the promise of innumerable offspring and the reality of childlessness is acute. Abram's question is raw and honest: what good are promises without an heir?
2. 'Eliezer of Damascus' — a household servant who would inherit in the absence of a natural son. Ancient Near Eastern legal texts (particularly from Nuzi) describe the practice of adopting a household servant as heir when no biological son exists.
3. Abram presses the point: 'you have given me no offspring' (lo natattah zara). The accusation is directed at God — it is God's responsibility to fulfill his own promise. The verb natattah ('you have given') is in the second person: you, God, have not given. This is bold, honest prayer — the ancestor of faith speaks to God with the candor of genuine relationship.
4. 'One who comes from your own body' (asher yetse mimme'eikha,) — literally 'who will come out from your bowels/inward parts.' God rules out the servant-adoption arrangement and promises a biological son. The promise is specific: Abram's own body will produce an heir.
5. God takes Abram outside — out of the tent and into the open night. The vast canopy of stars becomes a visual demonstration of the promise. In 13:16, offspring were compared to the dust of the earth; here they are compared to the stars of heaven — uncountable in both directions, earthward and heavenward.
5. 'So will your offspring be' (koh yihyeh zar'ekha) — as innumerable as the stars. The promise is given to a 75+ year-old childless man with a barren wife, standing under an infinite sky. The absurdity of the promise is the context of faith.
6. 'He believed the LORD' (vehe'emin baYHWH,) — the verb he'emin is the hiphil of aman (, 'to be firm, stable, trustworthy'), from which 'amen' derives. To 'believe' (he'emin) means to consider God trustworthy, to regard his word as reliable, to lean one's weight upon God. This is not mere intellectual assent but a trust that stakes one's future on God's promise.
6. 'He counted it to him as righteousness' (vayyachsheveha lo tsedaqah) — God 'reckoned' or 'credited' Abram's faith as righteousness. The verb chashav (, 'to reckon, to think, to account, to impute') is an accounting term — God credited Abram's trust to his account as tsedaqah (righteousness). This verse becomes foundational for Paul's theology of justification by faith (Romans 4:3; Galatians 3:6) and for James's understanding of faith and works (James 2:23).
6. This is one of the most theologically significant verses in the entire Old Testament. The relationship between faith and righteousness, between trust and divine approval, is established here at the beginning of the Abrahamic narrative.
7. 'I am the LORD who brought you out' — this self-introduction formula anticipates the Exodus formula: 'I am the LORD who brought you out of the land of Egypt' (Exodus 20:2). God identifies himself through his saving acts. The pattern is consistent: God's identity is revealed through what God does.
7. The purpose of the exodus from Ur was the gift of the land. Possession (lerishtah, 'to inherit it, to take possession of it') is the goal of the journey.
8. Abram's question is not doubt but a request for confirmation — a sign or assurance that the promise will be fulfilled. God's response is not a rebuke but a solemn covenant ceremony (vv. 9–21). God accommodates Abram's need for tangible assurance.
9. God instructs Abram to prepare a covenant ceremony. The animals specified — heifer, goat, ram, turtledove, pigeon — are the same animals later designated for sacrificial use in the Levitical system (Leviticus 1:2–17; 3:1; 5:7). The 'three-year-old' specification (meshulleshet, 'tripled/three years old') ensures fully mature animals.
9. The covenant ceremony that follows (the passing between cut pieces) is an ancient Near Eastern ritual known from other sources (cf. Jeremiah 34:18–19). It is a self-imprecatory oath: the one who passes between the pieces invokes upon himself the fate of the animals if the covenant is broken.
10. 'Cut them in half' (vayvatter otam battavekh) — the verb batar () means 'to cut in two, to divide.' The halved carcasses are arranged facing each other, creating a pathway between the pieces. This is the ritual of 'cutting a covenant' (karat berit) — the Hebrew expression for making a covenant literally means 'to cut,' reflecting this ceremony.
10. The birds are not divided, following later sacrificial practice (Leviticus 1:17).
11. 'Birds of prey' (ha'ayit,) — predatory birds descend on the exposed animal pieces. Abram guards the covenant preparations against defilement. This detail adds narrative tension: the time between preparation and divine response is marked by vigilance and waiting. Some interpreters see the birds of prey as symbolizing the nations that will threaten Abraham's descendants.

12. 'A deep sleep' (tardemah,) — the same word used when God put Adam into a deep sleep to create the woman (2:21). Tardemah is a supernaturally induced unconsciousness in which God acts. Abram is passive; God is the sole actor in the covenant ceremony that follows.
12. 'A dreadful, great darkness' (eimah chashekah gedolah) — the combination of terror and darkness creates an atmosphere of divine awe. The darkness may symbolize the period of oppression described in the next verses (vv. 13–16) — the 400 years of affliction in a foreign land. The covenant is made in darkness, through suffering, before the light of fulfillment.
13. 'Know for certain' (yado'a teda,) — the infinitive absolute construction intensifies the verb: you will absolutely, certainly know. God grants the very assurance Abram requested in verse 8, but the knowledge includes suffering before fulfillment.
13. 'Sojourners in a land that is not theirs' — the promise of land is preceded by a period of landlessness. Before possession comes dispossession. The prophecy encompasses the sojourn in Egypt and the subsequent slavery — events that will not occur for centuries but are revealed to Abram in advance.
13. 'Four hundred years' — a round number. Exodus 12:40 gives 430 years for the sojourn in Egypt (the LXX includes the patriarchal period in this number). The discrepancy is a matter of how the period is calculated.
14. 'I will judge the nation' — a promise of divine intervention against the oppressor. This is fulfilled in the Exodus plagues and the destruction of Pharaoh's army at the Sea.
14. 'Come out with great possessions' (yets'u birkhush gadol) — fulfilled in Exodus 12:35–36, when the Israelites leave Egypt with Egyptian gold, silver, and clothing. The pattern of 12:10–20 (Abram goes to Egypt and leaves with wealth) will be repeated on a national scale.
15. 'Go to your fathers' (tavo el-avoteikha) — an idiom for death, implying reunion with deceased ancestors. This is the first occurrence of this common Hebrew death expression (cf. 25:8; 35:29; 49:33). Whether it implies an afterlife belief or simply burial in the family tomb is debated.
15. 'In peace... at a good old age' — despite the dark prophecy about his offspring, Abram himself is promised a peaceful death. He will not live to see the suffering — a mercy within the difficult revelation.
16. 'The fourth generation' — generations could be long (100 years each would approximate 400 years), or 'fourth generation' may be an approximation. The point is that the return is certain but delayed.
16. 'The iniquity of the Amorites is not yet complete' (lo-shalem avon ha-Emori ad-hennah) — this extraordinary theological statement reveals that God's gift of the land to Israel is connected to the moral behavior of the current inhabitants. The Canaanites/Amorites are not dispossessed arbitrarily; their displacement occurs when their iniquity reaches its full measure. God is patient even with the wicked — judgment waits until the cup is full. This principle qualifies the land promise: the conquest is not ethnic but moral. Israel will later be warned that the same standard applies to them (Leviticus 18:24–28; Deuteronomy 9:4–5).
17. 'A smoking fire pot and a flaming torch' (tannur ashan velappid esh) — visible manifestations of God's presence. Fire and smoke are consistent divine theophany symbols (cf. the burning bush, Exodus 3:2; the pillar of fire, Exodus 13:21; Sinai's smoke and fire, Exodus 19:18). These symbols represent God himself passing through the covenant pieces.
17. The climactic moment: GOD passes between the pieces. In the standard ancient Near Eastern covenant ceremony, both parties would walk between the halved animals, invoking the animals' fate upon themselves if they violated the covenant. But here, Abram is asleep (v. 12) — only God passes through. This makes the covenant unilateral: God alone bears the covenant obligation. God invokes upon himself the curse of covenant violation. If the covenant fails, it is God who will be 'torn apart.' The theological depth is staggering — the sovereign God binds himself unconditionally.
17. This is why it is called an 'unconditional covenant' — its fulfillment depends entirely on God's faithfulness, not on Abram's performance.
18. 'Made a covenant' (karat... berit, ...) — literally 'cut a covenant,' reflecting the cutting of the animals in the ceremony just performed.
18. 'I have given' (natatti,) — past tense. Though the land has not yet been possessed, God speaks of the gift as already accomplished. The divine decision is irrevocable — it is as good as done.
18. 'From the river of Egypt to the great river, the Euphrates' — the most expansive definition of the promised land in Genesis. 'The river of Egypt' may be the Wadi el-Arish (a seasonal watercourse in the Sinai) or the eastern branch of the Nile. The Euphrates is the great river of Mesopotamia. This territory was approximately realized during the reigns of David and Solomon (1 Kings 4:21).
19. Ten peoples are listed in verses 19–21, representing the inhabitants of the promised territory. This is the most comprehensive list of displaced peoples, exceeding the usual lists of six or seven nations.
20. The Rephaim reappear from 14:5 — one of the ancient 'giant' peoples of the land.
21. The list ends with the familiar Canaanite peoples — Amorites, Canaanites, Girgashites, and Jebusites — who appear frequently in the conquest narratives. The ten peoples may represent totality (the number ten symbolizing completeness), indicating that the entire land, in all its diversity, is included in the promise.

Summary: Sarai, unable to conceive, gives her Egyptian maidservant Hagar to Abram. Hagar conceives and begins to look down on Sarai. Sarai afflicts Hagar, who flees into the wilderness. The angel of the LORD finds Hagar at a spring, commands her to return, promises her innumerable offspring, and names her son Ishmael. Hagar names God El Roi — 'the God who sees me.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Hagar is the only person in Genesis who gives God a name: El Roi ('the God who sees,' v. 13). This is also the first appearance of the mal'akh YHWH ('angel of the LORD') in the Bible — a figure who speaks with divine authority and is identified by Hagar as God himself. The verb for Sarai's treatment of Hagar (vatte'anneha, 'afflicted her') is the same root used for Israel's suffering in Egypt (Exodus 1:11-12), creating a disturbing parallel: the ancestral family enacts the very oppression their descendants will endure.

Translation Friction: The word pere ('wild donkey,' v. 12) for Ishmael was not an insult in the ancient Near East but an image of untamable desert freedom. We rendered it directly and explained its positive connotation in the notes. The distinction between shifchah ('maidservant,' v. 1) and other terms for female servants matters legally — a shifchah belonged to her mistress, giving Sarai authority over Hagar. The wordplay between 'affliction' (oni, v. 11) and 'afflicted' (vatte'anneha, v. 6) links God's awareness directly to Sarai's cruelty.

Connections: The name Ishmael ('God hears,' v. 11) echoes throughout Scripture as a testimony to God's attentiveness to the marginalized. The well Beer-lahai-roi (v. 14) becomes Isaac's dwelling place (24:62; 25:11), connecting the two sons of Abraham through the same site of divine encounter. Sarai's use of Hagar follows the legal custom also seen in Rachel giving Bilhah to Jacob (30:3-4).

¹Now Sarai, Abram's wife, had not borne him children. But she had an Egyptian maidservant whose name was Hagar. ²And Sarai said to Abram, "Look now, the LORD has prevented me from bearing children. Please go in to my maidservant; perhaps I will be built up through her." And Abram listened to the voice of Sarai. ³So Sarai, Abram's wife, took Hagar the Egyptian, her maidservant, after Abram had lived ten years in the land of Canaan, and gave her to her husband Abram as a wife. ⁴He went in to Hagar, and she conceived. And when she saw that she had conceived, her mistress became diminished in her eyes. ⁵Then Sarai said to Abram, "The wrong done to me is upon you! I myself gave my maidservant into your embrace, but when she saw that she had conceived, I became diminished in her eyes. May the LORD judge between me and you!" ⁶And Abram said to Sarai, "Look, your maidservant is in your hand; do to her whatever seems good to you." Then Sarai afflicted her, and she fled from her presence. ⁷The angel of the LORD found her by a spring of water in the wilderness, by the spring on the way to Shur. ⁸He said, "Hagar, maidservant of Sarai, where have you come from, and where are you going?" She said, "I am fleeing from the presence of my mistress Sarai." ⁹The angel of the LORD said to her, "Return to your mistress, and submit yourself under her authority." ¹⁰The angel of the LORD also said to her, "I will greatly multiply your offspring, and they will be too many to count." ¹¹The angel of the LORD said to her, "You are now pregnant and will bear a son. You shall call his name Ishmael, for the LORD has heard your affliction." ¹²He will be a wild donkey of a man — his hand against everyone, and everyone's hand against him — and he will live in defiance of all his brothers. ¹³She called the name of the LORD who spoke to her, "You are El Roi" — for she said, "Have I truly seen the one who sees me, even here?" ¹⁴Therefore the well was called Beer-lahai-roi. It is between Kadesh and Bered. ¹⁵Hagar bore Abram a son, and Abram called the name of his son whom Hagar bore, Ishmael. ¹⁶Abram was eighty-six years old when Hagar bore Ishmael to Abram.

1. The chapter opens with a jarring contrast to the grand promises of chapter 15. God has promised Abram offspring as numerous as the stars — yet Sarai 'had not borne him children' (lo yaledah lo). The barrenness is stated bluntly, without explanation or softening.
1. 'Maidservant' (shifchah,) — a female servant of lower status than an amah. A shifchah was personal property, often given as part of a dowry. The term will be important throughout the chapter, as Hagar's social status drives the conflict.

1. Hagar is identified as 'Egyptian' (mitsrit). This detail recalls Abram and Sarai's sojourn in Egypt (12:10–20), where Pharaoh gave Abram servants. Hagar may have been acquired during that episode — making her presence in the household a lingering consequence of Abram's earlier failure of faith.
2. 'The LORD has prevented me' (atsarani YHWH) — Sarai attributes her barrenness directly to God's action. The verb atsar means 'to restrain, shut up, close.' Sarai does not blame biology or fate; she names God as the one who has closed her womb. This is theologically honest but also sets the stage for a human solution to what she sees as a divine problem.
2. 'Perhaps I will be built up through her' (ulai ibbaneh mimennah) — the verb ibbaneh is a Niphal (passive/reflexive) form of banah ('to build'). There is a deliberate wordplay: banah ('build') and ben ('son') share the same root (b-n-h / b-n). To 'be built up' through a surrogate is to gain a son — and through a son, a household, a legacy, a future. The wordplay is untranslatable but essential.
2. Sarai's proposal follows well-attested ancient Near Eastern legal custom. Texts from Nuzi and Old Babylonian marriage contracts show that a barren wife could provide her maidservant to her husband as a surrogate. The child born would legally belong to the wife. This is not moral innovation — it is cultural convention.
2. 'Abram listened to the voice of Sarai' (vayyishma Abram leqol Sarai) — the phrasing echoes Adam's failure in 3:17 ('because you listened to the voice of your wife'). The narrator may be drawing a deliberate parallel: just as Adam acquiesced to Eve's initiative with negative consequences, Abram acquiesces to Sarai's plan with similarly complicated results.
3. The narrator emphasizes the formal, deliberate nature of this act. The verse is heavy with titles and identifiers: 'Sarai, Abram's wife' ... 'Hagar the Egyptian, her maidservant' ... 'Abram her husband.' Every social role is named, as if the narrator is recording a legal transaction — which, in effect, it is.
3. 'After Abram had lived ten years in the land of Canaan' — a chronological note that underscores the length of waiting. Abram arrived in Canaan at age 75 (12:4); he is now 85. Ten years of barrenness since the promise. The duration explains (though does not justify) the turn to a human solution.
3. 'Gave her to him as a wife' (le'ishah,) — Hagar's status changes. She is not merely used as a surrogate; she is given the formal status of wife (ishah). This mirrors the language of 2:22, where God 'brought her to the man.' The parallel with Eve's presentation is structurally deliberate and theologically loaded.
4. 'He went in to Hagar' (vayyavo el-Hagar) — the act is reported with characteristic Hebrew narrative brevity. No emotional commentary, no description of the relational dynamics. The narrator records the act and moves immediately to its consequence.
4. 'Her mistress became diminished in her eyes' (vatteqal gevirtah be'eineha) — the verb qalal means 'to be light, to be slight, to be of little account.' It is the opposite of kavod ('honor, weight, glory'). Hagar's fertility gives her what Sarai lacks, and the power dynamics shift. The one who can bear children looks down on the one who cannot. This is not abstract theology — it is the raw social reality of the ancient world, where a woman's worth was measured by her womb.
4. The term gevirtah ('mistress') is the feminine counterpart of adon ('lord, master'). It emphasizes the social hierarchy that Hagar's contempt violates.
5. 'The wrong done to me is upon you' (chamasi aleikha) — chamas means 'violence, injustice, wrong.' Sarai holds Abram responsible for the social humiliation she now suffers. The irony is sharp: Sarai initiated the arrangement (v. 2), yet she blames Abram for its consequences. The accusation is legally framed — chamas is a term of covenant violation and social injustice.
5. 'I gave my maidservant into your embrace' (natatti shifchati becheiqekha) — cheiq means 'bosom, embrace, lap.' The intimacy of the language makes Sarai's complaint more pointed: she personally arranged this intimate relationship, and now she feels betrayed by its result.
5. 'May the LORD judge between me and you' (yishpot YHWH beini uveinekha) — Sarai invokes God as arbiter. This legal formula appears in covenant disputes (cf. 31:53; 1 Sam 24:13). Sarai appeals to divine justice, even though the situation arose from her own initiative. The invocation of YHWH as judge between spouses signals the depth of the marital rupture.
6. Abram's response is a striking abdication. Having taken Hagar as a wife (v. 3), he now hands her back to Sarai's authority: 'your maidservant is in your hand.' He refuses to intervene, refuses to protect, refuses to adjudicate. The man who has just received the covenant of chapter 15 fails to exercise the justice it implies.
6. 'Sarai afflicted her' (vatte'anneha Sarai) — the verb 'innah () means 'to afflict, to oppress, to humble.' This is the same root used in 15:13 where God tells Abram that his descendants will be 'afflicted' (ve'innu otam) in a foreign land for four hundred years. The verbal echo is devastating: Sarai, a future matriarch of Israel, treats her Egyptian servant the way Egypt will later treat Israel. The oppressed becomes the oppressor.
6. 'She fled from her presence' (vativrach mippaneha) — Hagar's flight into the wilderness prefigures Israel's flight from Egypt. A Hebrew mistress oppresses an Egyptian servant, who flees into the wilderness — the same pattern, reversed in ethnic terms, that will define the Exodus narrative.
7. 'The angel of the LORD' (mal'akh YHWH,) — this is the first appearance of this figure in the Bible. The mal'akh YHWH is one of the most mysterious figures in the Hebrew Bible: sometimes distinguishable from God, sometimes identified with God (see v. 13, where Hagar names the speaker as God himself). The angel speaks with divine authority, makes promises only God can make (v. 10), yet is described as a messenger (mal'akh means 'messenger, envoy').

7. 'Found her' (vayimtsa'ah) — God seeks out the marginalized. Hagar is a pregnant, foreign, runaway slave in the desert — and God finds her. The verb matsa ('to find') implies purposeful seeking. God does not stumble upon Hagar; he goes to her.
7. 'On the way to Shur' — Shur is on the northeastern border of Egypt. Hagar is heading home — back toward Egypt, away from the promised land. The geography of her flight is theologically significant: she is moving away from the sphere of covenant promise and toward her homeland.
8. The angel's two questions — 'where have you come from?' and 'where are you going?' — echo God's question to Adam in the garden (3:9). The questions are not for God's information; they are for Hagar's self-reflection. She must name her situation: she is running from something, but does she know what she is running toward?
8. The angel addresses her by name and social identity: 'Hagar, maidservant of Sarai.' He does not call her 'wife of Abram' (her newer status from v. 3) but 'maidservant of Sarai' (her original status). The designation is not demeaning — it is clarifying. Her identity and her obligation remain tied to Sarai.
8. Hagar's answer is partial: 'I am fleeing from my mistress Sarai.' She answers only the first question (where from?), not the second (where to?). She knows what she is escaping but has no destination, no plan. She is a woman in flight without a future.
9. 'Return to your mistress' (shuvi el-gevirktekh) — the command to return is difficult. Hagar is being sent back to the very situation from which she fled. Yet the command is coupled with a promise (vv. 10–12) that transforms the meaning of her return: she goes back not as a forgotten slave, but as a woman who has been seen by God and who carries a divinely named child.
9. 'Submit yourself under her authority' (vehit'anni tachat yadeha) — the verb hit'anni is the Hitpael (reflexive) of 'anah, the same root used for Sarai's 'affliction' of Hagar in v. 6. The angel tells Hagar to 'humble yourself' under Sarai's hand — using the very verb that described her mistreatment. This is not an endorsement of abuse; it is a command to endure within a social structure that will, in God's timing, yield blessing. The reflexive form shifts the agency: Hagar is to humble herself, not merely be humbled.
10. 'I will greatly multiply' (harbah arbek) — the infinitive absolute construction (harbah + finite verb arbek) intensifies the promise. This is the same grammatical structure used in God's promises to Abram (cf. 22:17). The angel speaks with divine authority — making a promise that only God can fulfill. This further blurs the line between the angel and God himself.
10. The promise to Hagar parallels the promise to Abram: innumerable offspring (cf. 13:16; 15:5). Hagar, a foreign slave woman, receives a version of the patriarchal blessing. God's care extends beyond the covenant line. The promise is remarkable: an Egyptian runaway slave receives from God's own messenger an assurance of countless descendants.
11. This is an annunciation — a divine announcement of a birth with a divinely assigned name. It is the first birth annunciation in the Bible, establishing a pattern that will recur for Isaac (17:19), Samson (Judg 13:3–5), and ultimately for Jesus (Luke 1:31). Remarkably, this foundational pattern is first given not to a matriarch of Israel but to an Egyptian slave woman.
11. 'You shall call his name Ishmael' (veqara't shemo Yishma'el) — the name Yishma'el () means 'God hears' or 'God will hear.' It is composed of yishma ('he hears') + El ('God'). The child's very name is a permanent testimony that God heard the cry of a marginalized woman.
11. 'The LORD has heard your affliction' (ki-shama YHWH el-onyekkh) — the word 'affliction' (oni,) is from the same root as the verb 'anah used in vv. 6 and 9. God heard the very affliction that Sarai inflicted. The name Ishmael encodes both the suffering and the divine response to it.
12. 'A wild donkey of a man' (pere adam,) — the pere is the wild donkey (onager), an animal celebrated in the ancient world for its untamable freedom. It roams the desert steppe, refuses domestication, and answers to no master (cf. Job 39:5–8). The description is not derogatory but characterizes fierce independence and desert survival. Ishmael's descendants will be Bedouin peoples of the wilderness — free, resilient, and ungovernable.
12. 'His hand against everyone, and everyone's hand against him' — this describes a life of perpetual conflict and self-assertion. The characterization fits the semi-nomadic, raiding lifestyle of desert peoples. It is descriptive prophecy, not moral judgment.
12. 'He will live in defiance of all his brothers' (al-penei khol-echav yishkon) — the phrase al-penei can mean 'in the presence of,' 'before the face of,' 'opposite to,' or 'in defiance of.' The ambiguity is productive. Ishmael will dwell alongside his kinsmen — Isaac's line — but in a posture of independence, perhaps confrontation. The prophecy anticipates the complex, enduring relationship between the Ishmaelite and Israelite peoples.
13. 'She called the name of the LORD' (vatiqra shem-YHWH) — Hagar is the only person in Genesis who gives God a name. Not Abraham, not Isaac, not Jacob — but Hagar, the Egyptian slave woman. She names God based on her experience of him: the God who sees.
13. 'El Roi' () — 'God of seeing' or 'God who sees me.' The name captures Hagar's astonishment: God saw her. In a world where she was invisible — a foreign slave, a disposable surrogate — God saw her. The name is a theological revolution compressed into two words.
13. 'Have I truly seen the one who sees me, even here?' — the Hebrew of this phrase (halom ra'iti acharei ro'i) is notoriously difficult. The general sense is Hagar's amazement that she has had a direct encounter with God and survived (cf. 32:30; Exod 33:20). The word halom ('here') emphasizes the location — even here, in the wilderness, far from any sanctuary or sacred site, God appeared.
13. The interplay of 'seeing' (r-'h) runs throughout: God sees Hagar (El Roi), Hagar sees God (ra'iti), and she is astonished by the mutual vision. The theme of seeing will recur at key moments in Genesis (22:14, 'The LORD will see/provide').

14. 'Beer-lahai-roi' () — the name means 'the well of the living one who sees me' or 'the well of the living one of my seeing.' It combines be'er ('well'), lachai ('of the living one'), and ro'i ('who sees me' or 'my seeing'). The well becomes a permanent geographic marker of Hagar's encounter with God — a place where the living God saw a desperate woman and she lived to tell of it.
14. The narrator adds a geographical note: 'between Kadesh and Bered.' This places the well in the Negev desert, in the region south of Canaan on the road toward Egypt. The location will reappear — Isaac will later settle near Beer-lahai-roi (24:62; 25:11), suggesting that the well becomes significant for both lines of Abraham's family.
14. Place-naming in Genesis serves as theological testimony: a location receives a name that permanently encodes a divine encounter. Bethel ('house of God'), Peniel ('face of God'), and Beer-lahai-roi all function as stone witnesses embedded in the landscape.
15. The narrative comes full circle: the barrenness introduced in v. 1 is partially resolved. Hagar bears a son — but it is not the son of the promise. The chapter opened with Sarai's inability to bear; it closes with Hagar's successful childbirth. The tension between these two women, and between human initiative and divine promise, remains unresolved.
15. 'Abram called the name of his son ... Ishmael' — Abram, not Hagar, names the child. This implies that Hagar told Abram about her encounter with the angel and the divinely assigned name. Abram accepts the angel's instruction and names his son 'God hears.' In doing so, Abram acknowledges both God's involvement and his own paternity.
15. The narrator carefully specifies: 'his son whom Hagar bore' (beno asher-yaledah Hagar). The maternal identity is noted — this is Hagar's son, not Sarai's. Despite the surrogate arrangement of v. 2, the narrative does not erase Hagar's motherhood.
16. The chapter closes with a chronological note: Abram is eighty-six. He was seventy-five when called (12:4), making it eleven years since the original promise. The son of promise (Isaac) will not arrive until Abram is one hundred (21:5) — fourteen more years of waiting. Ishmael's birth does not resolve the narrative tension; it deepens it.
16. The repetition of 'to Abram' (le'Avram) at the end of the verse emphasizes paternity. This is Abram's son — a fact that will have lasting significance when the question arises of who is Abraham's true heir (chapters 17 and 21).

Summary: When Abram is ninety-nine, God appears as El Shaddai, changes his name to Abraham ('father of a multitude'), and establishes circumcision as the sign of an everlasting covenant. God renames Sarai as Sarah and promises her a son. Abraham laughs, pleads for Ishmael, but God insists the covenant passes through Isaac. Abraham circumcises his entire household that day.

What Makes This Remarkable: The word berit ('covenant') appears thirteen times in this chapter — more than any other chapter in the Bible. The covenant is described as olam ('everlasting') and the land as achuzzat olam ('an everlasting possession'), using the strongest language of permanence available in Hebrew. Circumcision marks the covenant on the organ of generation — the very body part through which the promises of offspring are fulfilled. Abraham's laughter (vayyitschaq, v. 17) contains Isaac's name: the verb tsachaq ('to laugh') becomes the name Yitschaq ('he laughs').

Translation Friction: El Shaddai (v. 1) is traditionally rendered 'God Almighty,' but the etymology of Shaddai is uncertain — possibly from shadad ('to overpower') or shad ('breast/mountain'). We used 'God Almighty' with a note on the ambiguity. The shift from Abram to Abraham involves inserting the syllable 'ha,' and while the text explains it as 'father of a multitude' (av hamon), the linguistic connection is more theological than etymological. We preserved the biblical explanation as the narrator presents it.

Connections: God's self-revelation as El Shaddai (17:1) is referenced in Exodus 6:3 as the name by which the patriarchs knew God. The covenant of circumcision becomes the defining marker of Jewish identity (cf. Romans 4:9-12). The promise of kings (17:6, 16) is fulfilled in the Davidic monarchy. The twelve princes of Ishmael (17:20) parallel the twelve tribes of Israel, showing God's blessing on both Abrahamic lines.

1When Abram was ninety-nine years old, the LORD appeared to Abram and said to him, "I am God Almighty. Walk before me and be blameless." 2And I will set my covenant between me and you, and I will multiply you exceedingly." 3Then Abram fell on his face, and God spoke with him, saying, 4"As for me, behold, my covenant is with you, and you shall become the father of a multitude of nations." 5"No longer shall your name be called Abram, but your name shall be Abraham, for I have made you the father of a multitude of nations." 6And I will make you exceedingly fruitful, and I will make nations of you, and kings shall come forth from you." ⁷"And I will establish my covenant between me and you and your offspring after you throughout their generations, as an everlasting covenant, to be God to you and to your offspring after you." ⁸"And I will give to you and to your offspring after you the land of your sojournings — all the land of Canaan — as an everlasting possession, and I will be their God." ⁹Then God said to Abraham, "As for you, you shall keep my covenant — you and your offspring after you throughout their generations." ¹⁰"This is my covenant which you shall keep, between me and you and your offspring after you: every male among you shall be circumcised." ¹¹"You shall circumcise the flesh of your foreskin, and it shall be a sign of the covenant between me and you." ¹²"At eight days old every male among you shall be circumcised throughout your generations — whether born in the house or purchased with silver from any foreigner who is not of your offspring." ¹³"He who is born in your house and he who is purchased with your silver must certainly be circumcised. And my covenant shall be in your flesh as an everlasting covenant." ¹⁴"And any uncircumcised male who does not circumcise the flesh of his foreskin — that person shall be cut off from his people. He has broken my covenant." ¹⁵Then God said to Abraham, "As for Sarai your wife, you shall not call her name Sarai, for Sarah shall be her name." ¹⁶"I will bless her, and indeed I will give you a son by her. I will bless her, and she shall become nations; kings of peoples shall come from her." ¹⁷Then Abraham fell on his face and laughed, and he said in his heart, "Shall a child be born to a man who is a hundred years old? And shall Sarah, who is ninety years old, bear a child?" ¹⁸And Abraham said to God, "If only Ishmael might live before you!" ¹⁹But God said, "No — Sarah your wife shall bear you a son, and you shall call his name Isaac. And I will establish my covenant with him as an everlasting covenant for his offspring after him." ²⁰"And as for Ishmael, I have heard you. Behold, I have blessed him and I will make him fruitful and I will multiply him exceedingly. He shall father twelve princes, and I will make him into a great nation." ²¹"But my covenant I will establish with Isaac, whom Sarah shall bear to you at this appointed time next year." ²²When he had finished speaking with him, God went up from Abraham. ²³Then Abraham took Ishmael his son, and all who were born in his house, and all who were purchased with his silver — every male among the men of Abraham's household — and he circumcised the flesh of their foreskin on that very day, just as God had spoken to him. ²⁴Abraham was ninety-nine years old when the flesh of his foreskin was circumcised. ²⁵And Ishmael his son was thirteen years old when the flesh of his foreskin was circumcised. ²⁶On that very day Abraham was circumcised, and Ishmael his son. ²⁷And all the men of his household — those born in the house and those purchased with silver from a foreigner — were circumcised with him.

1. Thirteen years of silence separate this chapter from the birth of Ishmael at the end of chapter 16. Abram was 86 when Ishmael was born (16:16); he is now 99. The narrator offers no account of the intervening years — God's word simply resumes when God chooses.
1. 'I am God Almighty' (ani El Shaddai,) — this is the first occurrence of the divine title El Shaddai in Scripture. The etymology of Shaddai is debated: it may derive from shadad ('to overpower'), from shad ('mountain'), or from a cognate meaning 'breast' (suggesting nourishment and sufficiency). The Septuagint renders it pantokrator ('Almighty'). Whatever its origin, the title emphasizes God's sovereign power — the very power needed to fulfill promises that seem biologically impossible.
1. 'Walk before me' (hithalekh lefanai) — the Hitpael of halakh implies continuous, habitual conduct. To 'walk before' God is to live one's entire life in conscious awareness of God's presence and scrutiny. The preposition lefanai ('before my face') suggests both intimacy and accountability.
1. 'Be blameless' (heyeh tamim) — tamim means 'complete, whole, without defect.' It is used of sacrificial animals that must be without blemish (Lev 1:3). Applied to a person, it does not mean sinless perfection but wholehearted integrity — undivided loyalty, complete devotion. Noah was also called tamim (6:9).
2. 'I will set my covenant' (ettenah veriti) — the verb natan ('to give, set, place') rather than karat ('to cut') is used here. God does not 'cut' a new covenant but 'gives' or 'places' one. This may suggest that the covenant is a gift bestowed rather than a bilateral negotiation. The distinction between natan and karat is significant: in chapter 15 God 'cut' the covenant with a dramatic ritual; here he 'gives' it as a sovereign grant.
2. 'Exceedingly' (bim'od me'od) — literally 'in very very,' an intensification by doubling. The same construction appears in 7:19 for the floodwaters. The doubling underscores the extravagance of the divine promise.
3. 'Fell on his face' (vayyipol al-panav) — a posture of extreme reverence, submission, and awe. Abram's physical response precedes any words. Before the God who identifies himself as El Shaddai, the only fitting response is prostration. This gesture will be repeated in verse 17, though with a very different emotional register.

3. The narrator shifts from 'the LORD' (YHWH, v. 1) to 'God' (Elohim) here. Both names refer to the same God, but Elohim emphasizes the cosmic, sovereign dimension — fitting for a passage about covenant establishment with universal implications.
4. 'As for me' (ani) — the emphatic pronoun marks a shift. God speaks first of his own commitment before imposing any obligation. The covenant begins with what God does, not what Abram must do.
4. 'Father of a multitude of nations' (av hamon goyim) — this phrase will be embedded in Abram's new name (v. 5). The word hamon means 'multitude, crowd, tumult' — a roaring abundance. The promise extends beyond one nation; Abraham will be the ancestor of many peoples. The word goyim ('nations') will later acquire the connotation of 'gentile nations,' but here it simply means 'peoples' in the broadest sense.
5. The name change from Abram (Avram, 'exalted father') to Abraham (Avraham) is one of the most significant renaming acts in Scripture. In the ancient Near East, to rename someone was to assert authority over them and to redefine their identity and destiny. God exercises sovereign prerogative here.
5. The text explains the new name as derived from av hamon ('father of a multitude'). Linguistically, the connection is folk etymology — the 'ha' in Avraham does not straightforwardly derive from hamon. But the theological point is what matters: the name now encodes the promise. Every time Abraham is addressed, the promise of nations is invoked.
5. 'I have made you' (netatikha) — the perfect tense indicates completed action. God speaks of a future reality as already accomplished. Abraham is not becoming the father of nations; in God's reckoning, he already is. This is the language of divine decree, where the word constitutes the reality it describes.
6. 'I will make you exceedingly fruitful' (vehifreti otkha bim'od me'od) — the verb parah ('to be fruitful') echoes the creation mandate of 1:28 ('be fruitful and multiply'). God's covenant with Abraham is a renewal and intensification of the original blessing given to humanity. What was commanded of Adam is now promised to Abraham.
6. 'Kings shall come forth from you' (umelakhim mimmekha yetse'u) — this looks forward to the royal line that will emerge from Abraham's descendants: the kings of Israel and Judah, and ultimately the Messianic king. The promise elevates Abraham's role from tribal patriarch to founder of dynasties.
7. 'I will establish my covenant' (vahaqimoti et-beriti) — the verb qum in the Hiphil ('to cause to stand, to establish, to raise up') conveys permanence and stability. The covenant is not merely announced but erected like a standing pillar — a structure meant to endure.
7. 'Everlasting covenant' (berit olam) — olam means 'perpetual, age-long, everlasting.' This is the first use of berit olam in Scripture. The covenant is not for a season or a generation but for all time. The same phrase will describe the Sabbath (Exod 31:16), the Levitical priesthood (Num 25:13), and the Davidic throne (2 Sam 23:5).
7. 'To be God to you and to your offspring' (lihyot lekha le'Elohim uleazar'akha acharekha) — this is the covenant formula that runs throughout Scripture: 'I will be your God, and you will be my people' (cf. Exod 6:7; Jer 31:33; Rev 21:3). The deepest content of the covenant is not land, offspring, or blessing — it is relationship with God himself.
8. 'The land of your sojournings' (erets megureikha) — megureim derives from gur ('to sojourn, to dwell as a resident alien'). The irony is pointed: the very land in which Abraham lives as a foreigner and temporary resident will become his descendants' permanent inheritance. The land of alienation becomes the land of possession.
8. 'Everlasting possession' (achuzzat olam) — achuzzah means 'property, possession, holding.' Combined with olam, it designates a permanent, inalienable inheritance. This is the strongest possible land grant — not a lease or temporary grant but an irrevocable deed.
8. 'And I will be their God' (vehayiti lahem le'Elohim) — the covenant formula is repeated. The land promise is embedded within the relational promise. The land is not an end in itself but the place where God's people will live in God's presence.
9. 'As for you' (ve'attach) — the emphatic pronoun shifts the focus from God's obligations (vv. 4–8) to Abraham's. God has declared what he will do; now comes what Abraham must do. The structure is that of a royal grant with stipulations: the king bestows, and the vassal responds.
9. 'You shall keep my covenant' (et-beriti tishmor) — the verb shamar ('to keep, guard, observe') implies active, vigilant maintenance. It is the same verb used of Adam's charge to 'keep' the garden (2:15). Covenant-keeping is not passive receipt but active stewardship.
10. 'Every male among you shall be circumcised' (himmol lakhem kol-zakhar) — the verb mul ('to circumcise') appears here in the Niphal (passive): 'shall be circumcised.' The sign of the covenant is not a monument or a document but a permanent mark on the body. The covenant is literally inscribed in flesh.
10. Circumcision was practiced in the ancient Near East by other peoples (Egyptians, Moabites, Ammonites), but with different significance — often as a puberty rite or pre-marriage ritual. What distinguishes Israelite circumcision is its covenantal meaning: it is a sign of belonging to God, performed on infants who cannot consent, marking them as members of the covenant community before they can choose.
11. 'A sign of the covenant' (ot berit) — an ot is a visible marker that points beyond itself to a reality it represents. The rainbow was an ot of the Noahic covenant (9:12–13); circumcision is the ot of the Abrahamic covenant. A sign is not the covenant itself but its visible, tangible expression.
11. The location of the sign on the reproductive organ is theologically deliberate. The covenant promises center on offspring — descendants as numerous as the stars. The sign is placed on the very member through which those descendants will come. Every act of generation thus occurs under the sign of the covenant.

12. 'Eight days old' (ben shemonat yamim) — the specification of the eighth day is precise and deliberate. The number eight in biblical symbolism represents new beginning — the day after the complete cycle of seven. Medically, vitamin K and prothrombin levels in a newborn reach optimal levels around the eighth day, though this was unknown to the ancient world.
12. 'Born in the house or purchased with silver' (yelid bayit umiqnat-kesef) — the scope of circumcision extends beyond biological descendants to include all males in the household, including servants acquired by purchase. The covenant community is defined not solely by bloodline but by household belonging. This is a remarkably inclusive provision for an ancient covenant.
13. 'Must certainly be circumcised' (himmol yimmol) — the infinitive absolute construction (himmol yimmol) expresses emphatic certainty. This is not optional. The doubling of the verb intensifies the command: 'he shall surely, absolutely, without exception be circumcised.'
13. 'My covenant shall be in your flesh' (vehayetah veriti bivsarkhem) — the covenant is literally embodied. It is not merely remembered or recited but carried in the body. The word basar ('flesh') emphasizes the physical, material reality of covenant membership. There is no disembodied spirituality here — the covenant is as real as the body that bears its mark.
13. 'Everlasting covenant' (berit olam) — the phrase from verse 7 is repeated, now applied specifically to circumcision. The sign shares the permanence of the covenant it represents.
14. 'Shall be cut off from his people' (venikhretah hannefesh hahi me'ammeha) — the verb karat ('to cut off') creates a grim wordplay with the act of circumcision itself. The one who refuses to 'cut' the foreskin will himself be 'cut off' from the community. The punishment mirrors the violation in its very language.
14. 'That person' (hannefesh hahi) — nefesh here means 'person, individual, self' rather than 'soul' in the Greek philosophical sense. The entire person is cut off — not just a spiritual part.
14. 'He has broken my covenant' (et-beriti hefar) — the verb parar ('to break, annul, frustrate') means to treat the covenant as null and void. Refusal of the sign is treated as rejection of the covenant itself. The sign is not separable from the reality it represents.
15. Sarai's renaming parallels Abram's. Both names — Sarai () and Sarah () — are generally understood to mean 'princess,' though the forms differ dialectically. Sarai may be an older or archaic form, while Sarah is the standard Hebrew. The change in form, however slight, carries the same weight as Abram's renaming: God redefines her identity and destiny.
15. That God renames both husband and wife underscores that the covenant includes both. Sarah is not an afterthought or appendage to the Abrahamic covenant; she is a named, integral participant. Her womb is the means through which the covenant promise will be fulfilled.
15. The parallel structure — 'no longer shall you call' (lo tiqra) followed by 'for X shall be her name' (ki Sarah shemah) — mirrors the formula used for Abraham in verse 5. The symmetry is deliberate.
16. 'I will bless her' (uverakhti otah) — the verb barakh ('to bless') is used twice in this verse, emphasizing the fullness of divine favor upon Sarah. The repetition is not redundancy but intensification. God blesses her person and blesses her role.
16. 'I will give you a son by her' (vegam natatti mimennah lekha ben) — the word gam ('also, indeed') carries force here. It is not merely that Abraham will have a son (he already has Ishmael) but that Sarah specifically will bear a son. The promise is channeled through her body, through the very womb that has been closed for decades.
16. 'Kings of peoples shall come from her' (malkhei ammim mimennah yihyu) — the promise of kings, given to Abraham in verse 6, is now given to Sarah as well. She is co-heir of the royal promise. The phrase 'kings of peoples' (malkhei ammim) is broader than 'kings of Israel' — it encompasses the nations that will trace their ancestry through her.
17. 'He fell on his face and laughed' (vayyipol al-panav vayyitschaq) — Abraham falls on his face as he did in verse 3, but this time the prostration is accompanied by laughter. The verb tsachaq () is the root of the name Isaac (Yitschaq,). This is the first of several laughter episodes connected to Isaac's name: Abraham laughs here, Sarah will laugh in 18:12, and the name Isaac will be explained as 'he laughs' (21:6). The laughter is complex — it contains wonder, incredulity, joy, and perhaps the helpless mirth of a man confronting the impossible.
17. 'He said in his heart' (vayyomer belibbo) — this is interior speech, not spoken aloud. The narrator gives us access to Abraham's private thoughts. His public posture is prostration; his private response is astonished questioning. The combination of reverence and bewilderment is deeply human.
17. The ages are precise and deliberately absurd from a human perspective: a hundred-year-old father, a ninety-year-old mother. The impossibility is the point. The covenant promise requires divine intervention at the level of biology itself.
18. 'If only' (lu) — the particle lu introduces a wish or an unfulfilled desire. Abraham's plea is tender and poignant. He has lived with Ishmael for thirteen years; the boy is his son, his firstborn, the child he loves. When God announces a new son through Sarah, Abraham's first thought is not for himself but for Ishmael: let him not be forgotten, let him not be cast aside.
18. 'Might live before you' (yichyeh lefanekha) — 'to live before God' means to live under God's favor, protection, and blessing. Abraham is not merely asking that Ishmael survive physically but that he enjoy a life of divine favor. The plea reveals Abraham's character: he is a father who advocates for his son, even when God is redirecting the covenant promise elsewhere.

18. This verse exposes the tension in Abraham's heart. He has received the promise of Isaac, yet he cannot release Ishmael. Human love does not yield easily to divine reordering. Abraham's advocacy for Ishmael is not faithlessness — it is fatherhood.
19. 'No' (aval) — this particle is adversative, expressing strong contrast or correction. God gently but firmly redirects Abraham's attention. The plea for Ishmael is heard, but it does not alter the covenant plan. Aval can also mean 'indeed, truly' — 'truly, Sarah your wife shall bear you a son.' Either reading reinforces the certainty of the promise through Sarah.
19. 'You shall call his name Isaac' (veqarata et-shemo Yitschaq) — God himself names the child before conception. The name Yitschaq ('he laughs') memorializes Abraham's laughter in verse 17. Every time the name is spoken, it will recall the astonished, joyful disbelief of a father who heard the impossible announced as certain. The laughter is not punished but preserved — woven into the child's identity.
19. 'Everlasting covenant for his offspring' — the covenant line is specified with precision: not Ishmael but Isaac, and Isaac's offspring after him. The covenant is not a general blessing on all of Abraham's descendants equally but a specific, channeled promise through one particular line.
20. 'I have heard you' (shema'tikha) — God acknowledges Abraham's plea. The verb shama ('to hear') contains a wordplay with the name Ishmael (Yishma'el, 'God hears'). God heard Hagar's affliction and named the boy 'God hears' (16:11); now God hears Abraham's intercession for that same boy. The name proves true again.
20. 'Twelve princes' (shenim-asar nesi'im) — the number twelve parallels the twelve tribes that will descend from Isaac through Jacob. Ishmael's twelve princes (listed in 25:13–16) form a structural parallel to Israel's twelve tribes. The blessing on Ishmael is real and substantial — great nation, fruitful, multiplied, princely — but it is distinct from the covenant.
20. 'A great nation' (goy gadol) — the same phrase used of Abraham's own destiny in 12:2. Ishmael will share in the blessing of greatness, even though the covenant line passes through Isaac. God's response to Abraham's plea is generous: Ishmael is not rejected but abundantly blessed.
21. 'But my covenant' (ve'et-beriti) — the adversative force is clear. Despite the generous blessings on Ishmael, the covenant is directed elsewhere. The distinction between blessing and covenant is crucial in Genesis: many are blessed, but the covenant line is singular and specific.
21. 'At this appointed time next year' (lammo'ed hazzeh bashanah ha'acheret) — mo'ed means 'appointed time, set time, season.' The birth of Isaac is not left vague but given a specific timetable. God sets an appointment. The precision underscores divine sovereignty over time and biology alike. The word mo'ed will later designate the appointed festivals of Israel (Lev 23).
21. This verse establishes the theological distinction that will run through the rest of Genesis and into Paul's argument in Romans 9 and Galatians 4: the line of promise is not determined by natural birth order (Ishmael is firstborn) but by divine election (Isaac is chosen).
22. 'God went up from Abraham' (vayya'al Elohim me'al Avraham) — the verb 'alah ('to go up, to ascend') implies that God's presence had descended to Abraham's level for this encounter. The departure is described spatially: God ascends, Abraham remains below. The language suggests a theophany — a visible, localized manifestation of God that has a beginning and an end.
22. The abruptness of the departure is striking. There is no farewell, no closing liturgy, no final blessing formula. God finishes speaking, and God leaves. The weight of what has been said — covenant, circumcision, name changes, the promise of Isaac — is left with Abraham to absorb and obey.
23. 'On that very day' (be'etsem hayyom hazzeh) — the phrase be'etsem ('in the bone/substance of') emphasizes immediacy. Abraham does not wait, does not deliberate, does not seek counsel. The same day God speaks, Abraham obeys. This immediate compliance contrasts with the complex, hesitant responses that have characterized earlier episodes (the sojourn in Egypt, the Hagar arrangement). Here Abraham's obedience is swift and total.
23. 'Just as God had spoken to him' (ka'asher dibber itto Elohim) — the narrator confirms that Abraham's action corresponds exactly to God's command. There is no deviation, no modification, no partial compliance. The phrase functions as a formula of obedient fulfillment, paralleling the construction patterns in the flood narrative ('Noah did according to all that God commanded him,' 6:22).
23. The scope of the circumcision is emphasized by the comprehensive listing: Ishmael, those born in the house, those purchased with silver, every male. Abraham's obedience extends to his entire household — he does not circumcise only himself or only his biological son.
24. The narrator restates Abraham's age — ninety-nine — at the moment of circumcision. The repetition from verse 1 creates an inclusio (literary bracket) around the chapter. The chapter begins with Abraham at ninety-nine hearing the command; it ends with Abraham at ninety-nine obeying it. The same day, the same age, the same man — but now marked in his flesh by the covenant.
24. That a ninety-nine-year-old man submits to circumcision underscores the radical nature of Abraham's obedience. This is not a painless ritual for an infant but a voluntary act of physical suffering by an aged man. The covenant costs something.
25. Ishmael's age — thirteen — is precisely recorded. In later Jewish tradition, thirteen becomes the age of bar mitzvah, the age of religious responsibility, though this connection is not explicitly made in the text. In Islamic tradition, Ishmael's circumcision at thirteen is sometimes cited as the basis for circumcision at puberty rather than infancy.
25. The juxtaposition of Abraham at ninety-nine and Ishmael at thirteen shows both patriarch and son united in obedience. Ishmael, old enough to resist, apparently submits to his father's decision. The narrator records no protest.
26. 'On that very day' (be'etsem hayyom hazzeh) — the phrase is repeated from verse 23, hammering home the point of immediate obedience. The narrator wants no ambiguity: the circumcision happened the same day as the command. There was no interval of delay, no period of consideration.

26. Father and son are circumcised together — united in the sign of the covenant. Despite the fact that the covenant line will pass through Isaac rather than Ishmael, both bear the covenantal mark. Ishmael is blessed (v. 20) and marked (v. 26), even though the covenant proper belongs to Isaac (v. 21). The distinction between blessing and covenant election remains, but both are real.
27. The chapter ends not with Abraham alone but with his entire household. The final word is 'with him' (itto) — they were circumcised with him. Abraham does not merely obey for himself; he brings his whole community into the covenant sign. He is a patriarch in the fullest sense: one who leads his household in faithfulness.
27. The inclusion of those 'purchased with silver from a foreigner' (miqnat-kesef me'et ben-nekhar) reiterates the remarkable scope of the covenant community. It is not ethnically exclusive at this stage — foreigners brought into Abraham's household are brought under the covenant sign. The community of the circumcised is defined by belonging to Abraham's house, not by bloodline alone.
27. The chapter that began with God's appearance ends with human obedience. The structure is theological: divine initiative (vv. 1–22) followed by human response (vv. 23–27). God speaks; Abraham acts. The covenant is established by God and enacted by Abraham. This pattern — divine word, human obedience — will define the rest of the biblical narrative.

Summary: Three visitors appear at Abraham's tent at Mamre. He offers lavish hospitality. They announce that Sarah will bear a son within a year; Sarah laughs. Two visitors depart toward Sodom while the LORD remains with Abraham, who intercedes for the city, negotiating from fifty righteous down to ten.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter opens with 'the LORD appeared to him' (v. 1) but immediately describes 'three men' (v. 2), creating a theological mystery about the relationship between divine presence and human form that the text never resolves. The question 'Is anything too wonderful for the LORD?' (v. 14) uses the verb pala, reserved for acts that exceed human capacity. Abraham's intercession (vv. 22–33) is the first sustained prayer dialogue in the Bible, and his argument rests on a single principle: 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justice?' (v. 25) — holding God to God's own character.

Translation Friction: Sarah's inner laughter (v. 12) uses language of surprising intimacy — 'shall I have pleasure (ednah)?' — from the same root as Eden. We rendered it directly. The shift between the three visitors and the LORD (the narrator alternates between plural and singular subjects) resists neat theological systematization, and we followed the Hebrew's own fluidity rather than harmonizing it. Sarah's denial of her laughter and God's gentle correction (v. 15) create a moment of human vulnerability that our rendering preserved without softening.

Connections: The promised 'appointed time' (mo'ed, v. 14) for Isaac's birth echoes 17:21 and anticipates the mo'adim of Israel's sacred calendar. Abraham's hospitality to strangers is cited in Hebrews 13:2 ('some have entertained angels unawares'). The intercession anticipates Moses' role as intercessor (Exodus 32:11–14) and establishes the principle that the righteous can affect the fate of the wicked.

¹And the LORD appeared to him by the oaks of Mamre, as he sat at the entrance of the tent in the heat of the day. ²He lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, three men were standing before him. When he saw them, he ran from the entrance of the tent to meet them and bowed himself to the ground. ³And he said, "My lord, if I have found favor in your eyes, please do not pass by your servant. ⁴Let a little water be brought, and wash your feet, and rest yourselves under the tree. ⁵"And let me bring a morsel of bread, that you may refresh your hearts; afterward you may pass on — since you have come to your servant." They said, "So do, as you have said." ⁶Abraham hurried into the tent to Sarah and said, "Quick! Three seahs of fine flour — knead it and make cakes." ⁷And Abraham ran to the herd and took a calf, tender and good, and gave it to the servant, who hurried to prepare it. ⁸Then he took curds and milk and the calf that had been prepared, and set it before them. And he stood by them under the tree while they ate. ⁹They said to him, "Where is Sarah your wife?" He said, "There, in the tent." ¹⁰He said, "I will surely return to you at the appointed time, and behold, Sarah your wife shall have a son." Now Sarah was listening at the entrance of the tent, which was behind him. ¹¹Now Abraham and Sarah were old, advanced in days. The way of women had ceased for Sarah. ¹²So Sarah laughed within herself, saying, "After I have grown worn out, shall I have pleasure — my lord being old also?" ¹³The LORD said to Abraham, "Why did Sarah laugh, saying, 'Shall I indeed bear a child, now that I am old?" ¹⁴"Is anything too wonderful for the LORD? At the appointed time I will return to you, at the time of life, and Sarah shall have a son." ¹⁵But Sarah denied it, saying, "I did not laugh," for she was afraid. He said, "No, but you did laugh." ¹⁶Then the men rose up from there and looked toward Sodom, and Abraham walked with them to see them on their way. ¹⁷And the LORD said, "Shall I hide from Abraham what I am about to do, ¹⁸given that Abraham will certainly become a great, powerful nation, and through him every nation on earth will receive blessing? ¹⁹"For I have known him, so that he may command his children and his household after him to keep the way of the LORD by doing righteousness and justice, so that the LORD may bring upon Abraham what he has spoken concerning him." ²⁰Then the LORD said, "Because the outcry of Sodom and Gomorrah is great, and because their sin is very heavy, ²¹"I will go down and see whether they have done altogether according to the outcry that has come to me. And if not, I will know." ²²So the men turned from there and went toward Sodom, but Abraham still stood before the LORD. ²³Then Abraham drew near and said, "Will you indeed sweep away the righteous with the wicked? ²⁴"Suppose there are fifty righteous within the city. Will you indeed sweep it away and not spare the place for the sake of the fifty righteous who are in it? ²⁵"Far be it from you to do such a thing — to put the righteous to death with the wicked, so that the righteous are treated as the wicked. Far be it from you! Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justice?" ²⁶The LORD replied, "If I discover fifty righteous people inside the city of Sodom, I will spare the entire place on their account." ²⁷Abraham answered and said, "Behold, I have undertaken to speak to the Lord, I who am but dust and ashes. ²⁸"Suppose five of the fifty righteous are lacking. Will you destroy the whole city for lack of five?" He said, "I will not destroy it if I find forty-five there." ²⁹He spoke to him yet again and said, "Suppose forty are found there." He said, "I will not do it, for the sake of the forty." ³⁰He said, "Please let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak. Suppose thirty are found there." He said, "I will not do it if I find thirty there." ³¹He said, "Behold, I have undertaken to speak to the Lord. Suppose twenty are found there." He said, "I will not destroy it, for the sake of the twenty." ³²He said, "Please let not the Lord be angry, and I will speak just this once more. Suppose ten are found there." He said, "I will not destroy it, for the sake of the ten." ³³And the LORD went his way when he had finished speaking with Abraham, and Abraham returned to his place.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This theophany follows immediately after the covenant of circumcision in chapter 17. Abraham has just been circumcised at ninety-nine years old (17:24), and the LORD now appears — the verb vayyera ('appeared') is the same used in 12:7 and 17:1. The text states flatly that the LORD appeared; what Abraham sees in verse 2 are three men. The tension between divine appearance and human form is never resolved but held together throughout the narrative.
1. 'By the oaks of Mamre' (be'elonei Mamre) — elonei can mean 'oaks' or 'terebinths,' large sacred trees associated with theophany sites. Mamre was Abraham's ally (14:13) and this location near Hebron has been Abraham's dwelling since 13:18, where he built an altar to the LORD.
1. 'In the heat of the day' (kechom hayyom) — midday heat, when sensible people rest in shade. Abraham's sitting at the tent entrance suggests watchfulness for travelers, a mark of the hospitality culture of the ancient Near East. The detail also explains why the visitors would need water, rest, and refreshment.
2. 'Three men' (sheloshah anashim) — the narrative deliberately uses the ordinary word for 'men' (anashim). Abraham sees men, not angels, not divine beings. Yet verse 1 has told the reader that this is the LORD appearing. The interplay between the three visitors and the LORD who speaks creates one of the most theologically provocative passages in the Hebrew Bible. Two of these men will be identified as angels in 19:1; the third speaks as the LORD himself.
2. The verb ra'ah ('to see') appears twice: vayyar ('he looked') and vayyar ('he saw'). The first is observation; the second triggers action. Abraham does not merely notice — he perceives and responds instantly. His running (vayyarots) is remarkable for a ninety-nine-year-old man, recently circumcised. The urgency conveys both hospitality and perhaps an intuitive recognition of the visitors' significance.
2. 'Bowed himself to the ground' (vayyishtachu artsah) — this prostration could be either reverent greeting of honored guests (as in 23:7, 12) or worship of the divine. The ambiguity is deliberate. Abraham may not yet know who these visitors are, but his response is fitting either way.
3. 'My lord' (Adonai) — the Masoretic pointing here is debated. The form Adonai (with qamats under the nun) is typically reserved for addressing God, while adoni (with chiriq) would be a respectful address to a human superior. If the Masoretes intended the divine address, Abraham recognizes from the outset that he is speaking to the LORD. If the form is simply respectful address, Abraham is being hospitable to a stranger. The ambiguity mirrors the entire narrative's tension between human and divine.
3. 'If I have found favor in your eyes' (im na matsati chen be'einekha) — a standard formula of deference in hospitality contexts (cf. 19:19; 33:10). The particle na ('please, I pray') intensifies the entreaty. Abraham begs these visitors not to pass him by — an extraordinary inversion, as it is normally the traveler who begs for hospitality.

4. 'Let a little water be brought' (yuyqach na me'at mayim) — the passive verb (Hophal of laqach) suggests Abraham has servants to carry out his instructions. 'A little water' is characteristic understatement; Abraham will provide far more than he promises. Foot-washing was the first act of hospitality in a dusty, sandaled world — refreshment and respect combined.
4. 'Rest yourselves under the tree' (hisha'anu tachat ha'ets) — the Niphal imperative of sha'an means 'lean, recline, rest.' The singular tree (ha'ets) may be one of the great oaks mentioned in verse 1. Shade in the Negev heat was a precious gift.
5. 'A morsel of bread' (pat lechem) — Abraham's offer is deliberately modest: just a scrap of bread. What he actually prepares (vv. 6–8) is a lavish feast of fine flour cakes, a choice calf, curds, and milk. This pattern of understating one's hospitality and then exceeding expectations is a hallmark of Near Eastern generosity. The gap between promise and performance reveals Abraham's character.
5. 'Refresh your hearts' (sa'adu libbechem) — literally 'sustain your hearts.' The heart (lev) in Hebrew is the seat of strength and will, not merely emotion. Food sustains the inner person for the journey ahead. The verb sa'ad appears in Psalm 104:15: bread 'sustains the heart of man.'
5. 'For therefore are ye come to your servant' (ki al ken avaretem al avdekhem) — Abraham sees their arrival as providential. They have not wandered by accident; they have 'passed by' his tent for a reason, and hospitality is the fitting response.
6. The urgency intensifies: Abraham 'hurried' (vayemaher), and his first word to Sarah is 'Quick!' (mahari, the feminine imperative of mahar). The entire hospitality scene is charged with haste — running, hurrying, hastening — not from anxiety but from eagerness to honor the guests.
6. 'Three seahs of fine flour' (shelosh se'im qemach solet) — a seah is roughly seven quarts; three seahs would be about twenty-one quarts (nearly half a bushel) of the finest flour. This is an enormous quantity for three guests — enough to feed a large gathering. The extravagance of the provision far exceeds the 'morsel of bread' Abraham promised.
6. 'Fine flour' (solet) — this is the premium grade, sifted and refined, the same flour prescribed for grain offerings in Leviticus 2:1. Abraham serves his guests what will later be offered to God.
7. Abraham himself runs (rats) to the herd — he does not delegate this task. A ninety-nine-year-old man, three days after circumcision, sprinting to select the best calf. The detail is both vivid and theologically charged: Abraham's physical vigor in service to his guests mirrors his spiritual readiness.
7. 'A calf, tender and good' (ben baqar rakh vatov) — the adjectives rakh ('tender, young') and tov ('good, choice') indicate the finest animal. This is not ordinary fare but a feast-quality offering. The selection of a whole calf for three guests again signals extraordinary generosity.
7. 'The servant' (hanna'ar) — literally 'the young man,' probably a household servant. Later rabbinic tradition identifies him as Ishmael, whom Abraham was training in hospitality. The text does not specify, but the household mobilization — Sarah kneading, the servant preparing meat, Abraham orchestrating — portrays a coordinated effort of lavish welcome.
8. 'Curds and milk' (chem'ah vechalab) — chem'ah refers to curdled milk or butter, a prized delicacy in the ancient Near East (cf. Judg 5:25; Isa 7:15). Combined with fresh milk, this represents the richest dairy hospitality. Later rabbinic discussion notes that Abraham served meat and dairy together — a practice the Mosaic law would later prohibit. The patriarchal narrative operates before Sinai.
8. 'He stood by them under the tree while they ate' (vehu omed aleihem tachat ha'ets vayyokhelu) — Abraham does not sit and eat with his guests but stands attending them, taking the posture of a servant. The host becomes the waiter. This is the supreme expression of Near Eastern hospitality: the master of a great household serving strangers in person.
8. 'And they ate' (vayyokhelu) — the text states without qualification that divine visitors ate human food. This remarkable detail has generated extensive theological discussion. Did they truly eat, or only appear to eat? The narrator makes no distinction; he simply reports that they ate.
9. The visitors ask for Sarah by name — a detail that should startle Abraham, since he has not introduced her. Strangers in the ancient Near East would not ordinarily ask about a man's wife by name; this knowledge signals something beyond ordinary travelers. Yet Abraham answers matter-of-factly: 'There, in the tent' (hinneh va'ohel).
9. The question 'Where is Sarah your wife?' (ayyeh Sarah ishtekha) serves a narrative purpose: it ensures Sarah is within earshot for the announcement that follows. The scene is carefully staged — the promise must reach Sarah's ears so that her response can be recorded.
9. The plural 'they said' (vayyomeru) shifts to a singular speaker in verse 10. This fluid movement between plural and singular reinforces the mysterious identity of the visitors — three men who somehow speak with one divine voice.
10. 'I will surely return' (shuv ashuv) — the infinitive absolute construction (shuv ashuv) intensifies the verb: 'I will certainly, without fail, return.' This emphatic promise of a return visit anchors the fulfillment of the son's birth to a specific timeframe.
10. 'At the appointed time' (ka'et chayyah) — this phrase is notoriously difficult. Literally 'at the time of life/living,' it likely means 'at this time next year' or 'when the season comes round again' — approximately nine months hence. The same phrase appears in 2 Kings 4:16-17, where Elisha makes a similar promise to the Shunammite woman.
10. 'Sarah was listening at the entrance of the tent, which was behind him' — the narrator shifts perspective to reveal Sarah's eavesdropping. The tent entrance is behind the speaker, so Sarah can hear without being seen. This staging is essential: the promise is directed to Abraham, but it is Sarah's body that must bear the son, and it is Sarah's response that the narrative wants to capture.

11. The narrator pauses the dialogue to state the biological facts plainly. 'Old' (zeqenim) is an understatement — Abraham is ninety-nine, Sarah eighty-nine. 'Advanced in days' (ba'im bayyamim, literally 'come into the days') is an idiom for extreme age, emphasizing not just years but the accumulated weight of a long life.
11. 'The way of women had ceased for Sarah' (chadal lihyot leSarah orach kannashim) — a euphemism for menopause. The 'way of women' (orach kannashim) is the menstrual cycle. Sarah is not merely old; she is biologically past the capacity for conception. The narrator establishes this to make clear that any pregnancy would require divine intervention beyond natural possibility.
11. This verse functions as the narrative's own commentary: lest the reader think the promise is merely improbable, the text clarifies it is impossible. The stage is set for both Sarah's laughter and God's response about what is 'too wonderful' for the LORD.
12. 'Sarah laughed' (vatitschaq Sarah) — the verb tsachaq is the root of Isaac's name (Yitschaq). Sarah's laughter here is incredulous, a reflex of disbelief. It echoes Abraham's own laughter in 17:17, though God's response to Sarah's laughter will be sharper than to Abraham's. The root tsachaq will thread through the Isaac narrative: laughter at the promise, laughter at the birth (21:6), and Ishmael's 'laughing/mockng' (21:9).
12. 'Within herself' (beqirbah) — literally 'in her inner parts.' This is not audible laughter but an internal reaction, a private scoff. Yet the LORD perceives it (v. 13), demonstrating that nothing — not even unspoken thoughts — is hidden from God.
12. 'After I have grown worn out, shall I have pleasure?' (acharei veloti hayetah li ednah) — veloti is from balah, 'to wear out, become old.' The word ednah ('pleasure, delight') occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible. It likely refers to sexual pleasure or the delight of bearing a child. Sarah's frank, earthy language reveals both her longing and her resignation.
12. 'My lord being old also' (va'adoni zagen) — Sarah refers to Abraham as 'my lord' (adoni), a term of respect for a husband. The New Testament cites this as an example of Sarah's submission (1 Pet 3:6). But in context, her words drip with irony: even if her body could conceive, her aged husband seems an unlikely partner in producing new life.
13. Now the narrator identifies the speaker unambiguously: 'the LORD said' (vayyomer YHWH). The visitor who has been speaking since verse 10 is the LORD himself. The question is addressed to Abraham, not directly to Sarah — perhaps respecting the social conventions of the household, perhaps drawing Abraham into the matter of his wife's faith.
13. Significantly, the LORD edits Sarah's words. She had said, 'my lord being old also' (referring to Abraham's age), but the LORD quotes her as saying only 'I am old.' God diplomatically omits Sarah's reference to Abraham's aging to spare Abraham embarrassment. The rabbis (Yevamot 65b) derived from this that one may alter the truth for the sake of peace — a striking principle drawn from God's own speech.
13. 'Shall I indeed bear a child?' (ha'af umnam eled) — the particles ha'af umnam express strong incredulity: 'Is it even really true that...?' The LORD exposes the depth of Sarah's doubt, bringing what was internal (beqirbah, v. 12) into the open.
14. 'Is anything too wonderful for the LORD?' (hayippale meYHWH davar) — the verb pala means 'to be wonderful, extraordinary, surpassing, beyond comprehension.' It is the same root used for the 'wonderful' acts of God throughout Scripture (Exod 15:11; Ps 77:14; Isa 9:6). The question is rhetorical: nothing is beyond God's power. The word carries not just the sense of difficulty but of marvel — what God does exceeds not only human ability but human imagination.
14. This verse is one of the great theological declarations of the Hebrew Bible. It reframes Sarah's doubt not as a reasonable assessment of biology but as an inadequate reckoning of God's power. The same principle echoes in Jeremiah 32:17, 27 and Luke 1:37 (Gabriel's words to Mary).
14. 'At the appointed time' (lammo'ed) — this word mo'ed means 'appointed time, fixed season, festival.' It suggests divine scheduling: God has set the moment for fulfillment. The birth of Isaac is not a random miracle but a precisely timed divine act.
15. 'Sarah denied' (vattekhachesh Sarah) — the verb kachash means 'to deny, deceive, be false.' It is a strong word, used elsewhere of lying to God (Josh 7:11; Hos 9:2). Sarah's denial is born of fear (ki yare'ah), but it is still a falsehood. The text does not excuse it.
15. 'For she was afraid' (ki yare'ah) — fear, not defiance, motivates the lie. Sarah's internal laughter has been exposed by a visitor who can read unspoken thoughts. The realization that she is transparent to this stranger triggers primal fear.
15. 'No, but you did laugh' (lo ki tsachaq) — the LORD's gentle but firm correction closes this exchange. He does not rage or punish; he simply insists on the truth. The brief, decisive response — just three words in Hebrew — carries the weight of divine omniscience confronting human evasion. The laughter has been noted, and it will be remembered: the child's very name, Isaac (Yitschaq, 'he laughs'), will forever encode this moment.
16. The scene pivots sharply. The hospitality episode concludes and the narrative turns toward Sodom. 'The men rose up' (vayyaqumu ha'anashim) — they are still called 'men' (anashim), maintaining the veil over their identity even as the reader knows one is the LORD.
16. 'Looked toward Sodom' (vayyashqifu al penei Sedom) — the verb shaqaph means 'to look down upon, gaze out over.' It often implies looking from a height. The hills near Hebron offer a view eastward toward the Dead Sea region where Sodom lay. The gaze is ominous: they look toward a city whose judgment is about to be announced.
16. 'Abraham walked with them to see them on their way' (veAvraham holekh immam leshallecham) — even the final act of hospitality — escorting departing guests — Abraham performs. The verb shalach in the Piel means 'to send off, escort.' Walking guests part of the way was a standard courtesy in the ancient world.

17. This divine soliloquy (vv. 17–19) is one of the most remarkable passages in Genesis. The LORD deliberates aloud — or the narrator reveals God's inner reasoning — about whether to disclose his plans to Abraham. The question 'Shall I hide?' (hamekhasseh ani) expects a negative answer: No, I will not hide this from Abraham.
17. The verb kasah ('to hide, conceal, cover') is a Piel participle: 'Am I one who conceals?' God reflects on the nature of his relationship with Abraham. The question implies that the relationship has reached a level of intimacy that requires transparency — God treats Abraham not as a subject but as a confidant.
17. This passage anticipates Amos 3:7: 'Surely the Lord GOD does nothing without revealing his counsel to his servants the prophets.' Abraham is here implicitly cast in a prophetic role — one to whom God discloses his purposes before acting.
18. 'Shall surely become' (hayo yihyeh) — another infinitive absolute construction expressing certainty. Abraham's becoming a great nation is not contingent; it is divinely assured.
18. 'Great and mighty nation' (goy gadol ve'atsum) — the addition of 'mighty' (atsum) to the original promise of 12:2 ('great nation') intensifies the scope. Atsum means 'powerful, numerous, vast' — suggesting not just size but strength.
18. 'All the nations of the earth shall be blessed in him' (venivrekhu vo kol goyei ha'arets) — this echoes the foundational promise of 12:3. The Niphal form venivrekhu can mean either 'shall be blessed' (passive) or 'shall bless themselves' (reflexive). If passive, Abraham is the conduit of universal blessing; if reflexive, Abraham becomes the standard by which peoples invoke blessing. Either way, Abraham's significance is global, not parochial. God's reason for not hiding his plans from Abraham is that Abraham's destiny is intertwined with the fate of all nations — including Sodom.
19. 'For I have known him' (ki yeda'tiv) — the verb yada ('to know') here carries its fullest covenantal sense: intimate, relational knowledge, election, and purposeful choosing. God 'knows' Abraham not merely with intellectual awareness but with the knowledge of chosen relationship (cf. Amos 3:2, 'You only have I known of all the families of the earth'). This is arguably the most concise statement of divine election in Genesis.
19. 'Keep the way of the LORD' (shameru derekh YHWH) — derekh ('way, path, road') is both literal and metaphorical. The 'way of the LORD' is God's characteristic pattern of conduct, his moral will expressed in action. To 'keep' (shamar) this way is to guard it, observe it, and walk in it faithfully.
19. 'Righteousness and justice' (tsedaqah umishpat) — this pairing, which becomes one of the most important word-pairs in prophetic literature (Isa 5:7; Amos 5:24; Mic 6:8), appears here for the first time in Scripture. Tsedaqah is right relationship — acting rightly toward God and neighbor. Mishpat is just governance — rendering fair decisions and upholding the rights of others. Together they constitute the ethical core of the covenant. Abraham's intercession for Sodom (vv. 23–32) will be precisely an exercise in tsedaqah umishpat.
19. The verse presents a chain of purpose: God chose Abraham so that Abraham would teach his descendants who would keep God's way by practicing righteousness and justice so that God's promises to Abraham would be fulfilled. Election is not arbitrary privilege but purposeful responsibility.
20. 'The outcry of Sodom and Gomorrah' (za'aqat Sedom va'Amorah) — za'aqah is the cry of the oppressed, the anguished shriek of those suffering injustice (cf. Exod 3:7, the cry of Israel in Egypt). It is not the noise of sin itself but the cry of sin's victims rising to heaven. Sodom's sin, as later texts make clear (Ezek 16:49), included arrogance, excess, and neglect of the poor — not merely sexual transgression.
20. 'Their sin is very heavy' (chattata'm ki khavedah me'od) — the verb kavad ('to be heavy, weighty, grievous') is the same root as kavod ('glory'). Sin has weight; it presses down. The adverb me'od ('very, exceedingly') intensifies the assessment. The divine evaluation of Sodom is not casual but measured — and the measure is dire.
21. 'I will go down and see' (eredah na ve'er'eh) — the language of divine descent echoes the Tower of Babel narrative (11:5, 7), where God also 'came down' to investigate human conduct. The anthropomorphism is deliberate: God does not judge from a distance but comes near, examines, and renders judgment based on firsthand observation. This models the very mishpat ('justice') that verse 19 commands.
21. 'Whether they have done altogether according to the outcry' (hakketsa'aqatah habba'ah elai asu khalah) — the word khalah means 'complete destruction, annihilation.' The question is whether Sodom's conduct has reached the point of no return — total moral corruption that matches the extremity of the outcry. God presents himself as conducting an inquiry before rendering judgment.
21. 'And if not, I will know' (ve'im lo eda'ah) — a startling statement. Does the omniscient God need to investigate? The text presents divine judgment as deliberate, careful, and evidence-based — not impulsive or arbitrary. This careful divine procedure becomes the backdrop for Abraham's own appeal to divine justice in the verses that follow.
22. 'The men turned from there and went toward Sodom' — two of the three visitors now depart toward Sodom, where they will arrive in 19:1 as the two angels (mal'akhim). The third figure remains — and the narrator identifies him as the LORD. The threefold company divides: two go to investigate Sodom; one stays to receive Abraham's intercession.
22. 'Abraham still stood before the LORD' (veAvraham odenu omed lifnei YHWH) — this is one of the tiqqunei soferim ('corrections of the scribes'), according to rabbinic tradition. The original reading may have been 'the LORD still stood before Abraham,' which was reversed because it seemed to place God in a posture of deference. Whether or not this tradition is accurate, the effect is profound: Abraham remains in God's presence, and the stage is set for one of the most daring prayers in all Scripture.
22. The spatial arrangement is significant: the two angels move toward Sodom for investigation; Abraham stands before God for intercession. The two actions — divine inquiry and human prayer — proceed simultaneously.

- 23. 'Abraham drew near' (vayyiggash Avraham) — the verb nagash means 'to approach, draw near, come close.' Abraham does not flee from the divine presence; he steps closer. This is the posture of intercession — approaching God boldly on behalf of others. The same verb is used of approaching an altar (Exod 30:20) and approaching a king to petition (Esth 5:2).
- 23. 'Will you indeed sweep away the righteous with the wicked?' (ha'af tispah tsaddiq im rasha) — the verb saphah means 'to sweep away, destroy, snatch away' indiscriminately. Abraham's question cuts to the heart of divine justice: does God practice collective punishment? Is the fate of the righteous bound to the fate of the wicked in their midst? The question is not theological abstraction but urgent moral concern — Abraham's nephew Lot lives in Sodom.
- 23. This is the first intercession recorded in Scripture. Abraham does not merely pray for himself but for others, including people he has never met. The intercession establishes a pattern followed by Moses (Exod 32:11–14), Samuel (1 Sam 7:5–9), and the prophets.
- 24. 'Suppose' (ulai) — literally 'perhaps.' Abraham begins with the most generous assumption: perhaps there are fifty righteous in Sodom. The word ulai carries both hope and uncertainty. Abraham does not claim knowledge of Sodom's moral state; he poses hypotheticals and lets God respond.
- 24. 'Spare the place for the sake of the fifty righteous' (velo tissa lamaqom lema'an chamishim hatsaddiqim) — the verb nasa means 'to lift, carry, bear, forgive.' To 'spare' the place is to 'bear with it,' to 'carry' it past judgment. The key theological principle emerges: the presence of righteous people can shelter an entire community from judgment. The merit of the few can protect the many.
- 24. Abraham begins at fifty — a substantial number that establishes the principle before negotiating downward. The number may reflect an assumption about Sodom's size or may simply be a starting point for the bargaining pattern that follows.
- 25. 'Far be it from you' (chalilah lekha) — the word chalilah is an exclamation of moral horror: 'profanation! sacrilege! God forbid!' Abraham is saying that for God to destroy the righteous with the wicked would be a desecration of God's own character. The repetition of chalilah (twice in this verse) intensifies the moral urgency.
- 25. 'Shall not the Judge of all the earth do justice?' (hashofet kol ha'arets lo ya'aseh mishpat) — this is one of the most audacious statements a human being has ever addressed to God. Abraham appeals to God's own nature as the universal Judge: if God judges all the earth, then God must himself act justly. Abraham holds God to God's own standard. The word mishpat here means 'justice, right judgment, equity' — the same word used in verse 19.
- 25. The theological daring of this verse cannot be overstated. Abraham does not merely ask God for mercy; he argues that justice itself — God's own justice — requires distinguishing between the righteous and the wicked. Abraham becomes an advocate, a defense attorney standing before the cosmic Judge, and his argument is not sentiment but principle.
- 26. The LORD accepts Abraham's premise without dispute. If fifty righteous are found, the entire city will be spared — not just the righteous extracted, but 'the whole place' (kol hamaqom) preserved. The principle is extraordinary: the merit of a righteous minority can preserve a sinful majority.
- 26. 'For their sake' (ba'avuram) — the preposition ba'avur means 'for the sake of, on account of.' The righteous do not merely escape judgment; they become the reason the wicked are spared. This theology of vicarious merit — the few bearing the weight that saves the many — threads through Scripture to its culmination in the Suffering Servant (Isa 53).
- 27. 'I have undertaken to speak' (ho'alti ledabber) — the verb ya'al in the Hiphil means 'to venture, undertake, dare.' Abraham acknowledges the audacity of what he is doing. He is a creature daring to argue with the Creator, and he knows it.
- 27. 'Dust and ashes' (afar va'efer) — this is not false modesty but genuine ontological awareness. Afar ('dust') recalls the creation of humanity from the ground (2:7; 3:19); efer ('ashes') suggests complete combustion, total reduction to nothing. Abraham stands at the intersection of two realities: he is dust, yet he speaks to God. He is ashes, yet he reasons about justice with the Judge of all the earth. The juxtaposition of human frailty and spiritual boldness is one of the great paradoxes of biblical faith.
- 28. Abraham's negotiation begins with the smallest possible reduction: five. From fifty to forty-five — a cautious first step that tests whether God's patience extends to bargaining. The strategy is shrewd: Abraham does not leap to a drastically lower number but inches downward, establishing each concession before requesting the next.
- 28. 'Will you destroy the whole city for lack of five?' (hatashhchit bachamishah et kol ha'ir) — the verb shachat ('to destroy, ruin, corrupt') is the same word used for the corruption before the Flood (6:11–12). Abraham reframes the question: would five missing righteous persons tip the balance from mercy to destruction? The implicit argument is that near-sufficiency should count for something.
- 28. God's answer is immediate and affirmative: 'I will not destroy it if I find forty-five there.' No hesitation, no qualification. Each divine concession reveals that God is not looking for reasons to destroy but for reasons to spare.
- 29. 'He spoke to him yet again' (vayyosef od ledabber elav) — the formula vayyosef ('he added, continued') marks each new round of negotiation. Abraham presses forward despite the asymmetry of the conversation. Each step requires renewed courage.
- 29. The jump from forty-five to forty is bolder — a reduction of five again, but now representing a larger proportional decrease. God's answers grow shorter as the pattern establishes itself: each response is a simple assurance. The LORD does not begrudge the asking; he does not grow impatient with the process.

- 30. 'Please let not the Lord be angry' (al na yichar la'Adonai) — for the first time, Abraham expresses concern about divine displeasure. The verb charah ('to burn, be kindled') refers to anger as heat. Abraham senses that he is pressing the boundary of propriety. Yet he presses on. This pattern of apologetic boldness — acknowledging the risk of offense while continuing to speak — characterizes the greatest intercessors in Scripture.
- 30. The jump from forty to thirty is the largest yet — a reduction of ten. Abraham is accelerating, perhaps sensing that time or divine patience is finite. Each round follows the same structure: petition with 'suppose' (ulai), God's gracious answer, then another petition.
- 31. 'I have undertaken to speak' (ho'alti ledabber) — Abraham repeats his earlier acknowledgment of audacity (v. 27), reinforcing his awareness of the chasm between himself and the one he addresses. The repetition is not formulaic but genuinely felt — each new petition requires renewed courage.
- 31. From thirty to twenty: another reduction of ten. The numbers are dwindling rapidly, and the tension rises. Each affirmative answer from God reveals that divine mercy operates on a scale far more generous than human expectation.
- 32. 'Just this once more' (akh happa'am) — Abraham signals that this is his final petition. The particle akh ('only, surely, just') and happa'am ('this time') convey both determination and resignation. Abraham has pushed as far as he dares.
- 32. 'Suppose ten are found there' — Abraham stops at ten. Why not five? Why not one? The rabbis (Sanhedrin 74b) suggest that ten represents the minimum viable community — a minyan, the quorum for communal worship. Others note that Lot's extended family in Sodom may have numbered roughly ten (Lot, his wife, two married daughters with husbands, and two unmarried daughters). Abraham may have calculated that with Lot's household, ten righteous should be attainable.
- 32. God agrees without hesitation: 'I will not destroy it, for the sake of the ten.' The negotiation reveals that God's threshold of mercy is extraordinarily low — he would spare an entire wicked city for the sake of ten righteous people. Yet even ten will not be found (19:1–29). Abraham's intercession, though ultimately unable to save Sodom, is not wasted: God 'remembered Abraham' (19:29) and rescued Lot from the destruction.
- 32. The progression 50 45 40 30 20 10 follows a deliberate rhetorical pattern. The first step is cautious (five less); subsequent steps grow bolder (ten less each time). The entire exchange reveals both the extravagance of divine mercy and the depth of Sodom's corruption — a city that cannot produce even ten righteous inhabitants.
- 33. 'The LORD went his way' (vayyelekh YHWH) — the theophany ends as abruptly as it began. God departs. The verb halakh ('to go, walk') is simple and final. There is no dramatic exit, no cloud or fire — God simply leaves.
- 33. 'When he had finished speaking' (ka'asher killah ledabber) — the verb kalah ('to finish, complete, bring to an end') suggests that the conversation reached its natural conclusion. God did not cut Abraham off; the dialogue was completed. Abraham stopped at ten, and God honored his final request.
- 33. 'Abraham returned to his place' (veAvraham shav limqomo) — Abraham goes home. The intercession is over. He has done what he could; the rest belongs to God. The phrase 'his place' (meqomo) suggests both his physical dwelling at Mamre and his proper station — a mortal who has spoken with God and now resumes the ordinary life of faith.
- 33. The chapter closes with elegant symmetry: it began with Abraham sitting at his tent (v. 1) and ends with him returning to his place. Between the sitting and the returning, Abraham has hosted God, received a promise, confronted doubt, and argued for justice. The scope of one afternoon's events encompasses hospitality, prophecy, theology, and moral philosophy — the fullness of covenantal life.

Summary: Two angels arrive in Sodom; Lot offers them hospitality. The men of the city demand to 'know' the visitors. Lot offers his daughters instead. The angels strike the crowd blind and warn Lot to flee. God destroys Sodom and Gomorrah with fire and sulfur. Lot's wife looks back and becomes a pillar of salt. Lot's daughters, believing all men are gone, conceive children by their father, producing Moab and Ben-ammi.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The chapter mirrors chapter 18 in structure — hospitality, announcement, departure — but inverts every element. Where Abraham ran to serve guests, Sodom assaults them. The verb yada ('to know,' v. 5) carries its full range of meaning: the city demands intimate violation of the strangers. The fire and sulfur from 'the LORD — from the LORD out of the sky' (v. 24) is an unusual construction that emphasizes the directly divine origin of the destruction. Lot's wife becoming salt (v. 26) remains one of the Bible's most haunting images of the cost of looking back.*

Translation Friction: *Lot's offer of his daughters (v. 8) is reported without narratorial commentary — the Hebrew does not praise or condemn, and we followed that restraint. The verb hafakh ('to overthrow,' v. 25) becomes a technical term for divine judgment on cities throughout the prophets. We rendered the daughters' reasoning — 'there is no man on earth to come in to us' (v. 31) — as the Hebrew presents it, leaving open whether this reflects genuine desperation or moral corruption.*

Connections: Sodom's destruction becomes the paradigm of divine judgment throughout Scripture: Deuteronomy 29:23, Isaiah 1:9-10, Amos 4:11, and Jesus' words in Matthew 10:15. Lot's rescue is attributed to God 'remembering Abraham' (19:29), linking intercession to deliverance. Moab and Ammon — born here — become recurring figures in Israel's story (Ruth 1:4; 2 Samuel 10; Nehemiah 13:1).

¹And the two angels came to Sodom in the evening, and Lot was sitting in the gate of Sodom. When Lot saw them, he rose to meet them and bowed himself with his face to the ground. ²And he said, "Behold now, my lords, please turn aside to your servant's house and spend the night and wash your feet. Then you may rise early and go on your way." But they said, "No; we will spend the night in the town square." ³But he pressed them strongly, so they turned aside to him and entered his house. And he made them a feast and baked unleavened bread, and they ate. ⁴Before they lay down, the men of the city, the men of Sodom, surrounded the house, both young and old, all the people from every quarter. ⁵And they called to Lot and said to him, "Where are the men who came to you tonight? Bring them out to us, that we may know them." ⁶And Lot went out to them at the entrance and shut the door behind him. ⁷And he said, "I beg you, my brothers, do not act so wickedly." ⁸"Behold, I have two daughters who have not known a man. Let me bring them out to you, and do to them as is good in your eyes. Only do nothing to these men, for they have come under the shadow of my roof." ⁹But they said, "Stand back!" And they said, "This one came to sojourn, and now he would play the judge! Now we will deal worse with you than with them." And they pressed hard against the man, against Lot, and drew near to break down the door. ¹⁰But the men reached out their hands and brought Lot into the house to them and shut the door. ¹¹And they struck the men who were at the entrance of the house with blindness, both small and great, so that they wearied themselves trying to find the door. ¹²Then the men said to Lot, "Whom else have you here? Sons-in-law, your sons, your daughters, and whoever you have in the city — bring them out of the place." ¹³"For we are about to destroy this place, because the outcry against them has grown great before the LORD, and the LORD has sent us to destroy it." ¹⁴So Lot went out and spoke to his sons-in-law, who were to marry his daughters, and said, "Up! Get out of this place, for the LORD is about to destroy the city." But he seemed to his sons-in-law to be jesting. ¹⁵As dawn arose, the angels urged Lot, saying, "Up! Take your wife and your two daughters who are here, lest you be swept away in the punishment of the city." ¹⁶But he lingered. So the men seized his hand and the hand of his wife and the hands of his two daughters, the LORD being merciful to him, and they brought him out and set him outside the city. ¹⁷And when they had brought them outside, he said, "Flee for your life! Do not look behind you, and do not stop anywhere in the plain. Flee to the hills, lest you be swept away." ¹⁸And Lot said to them, "Oh no, my lord! ¹⁹"Behold, your servant has found favor in your eyes, and you have shown great kindness to me in saving my life. But I cannot flee to the hills, lest the disaster overtake me and I die. ²⁰"Behold, this city is near enough to flee to, and it is a small one. Let me escape there — is it not a small one? — and my life will be saved." ²¹And he said to him, "Behold, I have granted you this request also, that I will not overthrow the city of which you have spoken. ²²"Hurry, escape there, for I can do nothing until you arrive there." Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar. ²³The sun had risen over the land when Lot came to Zoar. ²⁴Then the LORD poured down sulfur and fire from the sky — from the LORD — on Sodom and Gomorrah. ²⁵And he overthrew those cities, and all the plain, and all the inhabitants of the cities, and the vegetation of the ground. ²⁶Lot's wife, who was behind him, turned to look back and was transformed into a column of salt. ²⁷And Abraham rose early in the morning to the place where he had stood before the LORD. ²⁸And he looked down toward Sodom and Gomorrah and toward all the land of the plain, and he saw, and behold, the smoke of the land went up like the smoke of a furnace. ²⁹When God demolished the cities of the valley, He kept Abraham in mind and brought Lot out safely from the catastrophe that leveled the cities where Lot had been living. ³⁰And Lot went up out of Zoar and dwelt in the hills, he and his two daughters with him, for he was afraid to dwell in Zoar. So he dwelt in a cave, he and his two daughters. ³¹The older daughter said to the younger, "Our father is aging, and there is no man anywhere to sleep with us as is the custom everywhere. ³²"Come, let us make our father drink wine, and we will lie with him, that we may preserve offspring through our father." ³³So they made their father drink wine that night. Then the firstborn went in and lay with her father, and he did not know when she lay down or when she arose. ³⁴The next day the firstborn said to the younger, "Behold, I lay last night with my father. Let us make him drink wine tonight also, and you go in and lie with him, that we may preserve offspring through our father." ³⁵So they made their father drink wine that night also. And the younger arose and lay with him, and he did not know when she lay down or when she arose. ³⁶Thus both the daughters of Lot conceived by their father. ³⁷The firstborn bore a son and called his name Moab. He is the father of the Moabites to this day. ³⁸And the younger also bore a son and called his name Ben-ammi. He is the father of the Ammonites to this day.

1. The visitors are now identified as mal'akhim ('angels,' literally 'messengers'), whereas in 18:2 they were called anashim ('men'). This shift in terminology reveals what the reader suspected: two of the three visitors to Abraham were divine emissaries. The third, who spoke as the LORD, apparently did not accompany them to Sodom.
2. 'Lot was sitting in the gate of Sodom' (veLot yoshev besha'ar Sedom) — the gate was the civic center where legal transactions, judgments, and public business took place (cf. Ruth 4:1; Proverbs 31:23). That Lot 'sits' there suggests he has attained a position of civic authority or at least social standing in Sodom. This contrasts sharply with his original status as a 'sojourner' (ger), a tension the mob will exploit in verse 9.
3. Lot's hospitality mirrors Abraham's in chapter 18 — rising, bowing, offering shelter — but the contrast between the two settings (Mamre's oaks vs. Sodom's gate) signals that everything here will go differently.
4. Lot's invitation follows the pattern of Near Eastern hospitality but with notable differences from Abraham's. Abraham offered shade, water, and bread in the open; Lot urgently directs them indoors. He knows what Sodom is, and the street is no place for strangers after dark.
5. 'We will spend the night in the town square' (ki varechov nalin) — the rechov is the open plaza near the city gate. The angels' initial refusal may be a test of Lot's insistence, or it may serve the narrative purpose: had they stayed in the square, the events that follow would have confirmed Sodom's wickedness even more publicly. Their willingness to stay outside underscores that they do not fear the city's inhabitants; they are there as agents of judgment.
6. The angels' refusal contrasts with their immediate acceptance of Abraham's invitation in 18:5. The literary effect emphasizes the difference between Mamre and Sodom — one a place of generous welcome, the other a place of danger.
7. 'He pressed them strongly' (vayyiftsar bam me'od) — the verb patsar means to urge insistently, even to the point of being burdensome. Lot knows the danger. His insistence is not mere politeness but an act of protective hospitality. The same verb appears in verse 9 when the mob 'presses hard' against Lot — the same urgency directed to opposite ends.
8. 'Unleavened bread' (matzot) — bread made without leaven, which can be prepared quickly since it requires no rising time. This detail may reflect the haste of the situation, but it also creates a resonance with the Passover narrative, where matzot are eaten on the night of deliverance from judgment (Exodus 12:8). Lot serves matzot on the night before Sodom's destruction — an echo the later reader cannot miss.
9. Lot's feast (mishteh) is more modest than Abraham's lavish spread in 18:6–8 — no fine flour, no choice calf, no curds and milk. The contrast between the two brothers' provisions subtly reflects their different circumstances.
10. 'Before they lay down' (terem yishkavu) — the attack comes at night, before the household has gone to sleep. The timing emphasizes the predatory nature of the mob: they do not wait; they act under cover of darkness.
11. 'The men of the city, the men of Sodom' (anshei ha'ir anshei Sedom) — the double identification is emphatic. These are not outsiders but the very citizens of Sodom. The repetition underscores collective guilt.
12. 'Both young and old, all the people from every quarter' (minna'ar ve'ad zagen kol ha'am miqqatseh) — the universality is stressed with deliberate thoroughness. No age group is exempt; no neighborhood is uninvolved. The phrase miqqatseh ('from the end/extremity') means from every corner of the city. This total participation answers the question Abraham raised in 18:23–32: are there even ten righteous in the city? The answer is made visible — not one man stays home.
13. 'That we may know them' (veneda'ah otam) — the verb yada ('to know') has a wide semantic range, from intellectual knowledge to intimate sexual knowledge (cf. 4:1, 'Adam knew Eve his wife'). The context makes the sexual intent unmistakable: the mob demands access to the visitors for the purpose of sexual violence. This is not mere curiosity but an assertion of dominance and violation of the most fundamental laws of hospitality.
14. The demand exposes the comprehensive moral corruption of Sodom. The 'outcry' (tse'aqah) that reached the LORD in 18:20–21 is now given concrete form. The sin is not a private vice but a communal act of aggression against the vulnerable — precisely the kind of injustice that provokes divine intervention throughout Scripture (cf. Ezekiel 16:49, which identifies Sodom's sin as arrogance, excess of food, prosperous ease, and failure to aid the poor and needy).
15. Lot goes out alone to face the mob, shutting the door behind him to protect his guests inside. Whatever we may think of his subsequent offer, this act of stepping outside to confront an enraged crowd is an act of physical courage. He places his own body between the mob and the visitors.
16. 'Shut the door behind him' (vehadelet sagar acharav) — the closed door is a barrier between the protected space of hospitality and the hostile outside. The door will become a focal point: the mob will try to break it down (v. 9), and the angels will pull Lot back through it (v. 10). Inside is safety; outside is chaos.
17. 'My brothers' (achai) — Lot addresses the mob with a term of kinship, attempting to appeal to social bonds. He has lived among them long enough to call them brothers, yet the term also reveals the tragic distance between his values and theirs.

7. 'Do not act so wickedly' (al na tare'u) — the verb ra'a in the Hiphil means 'to do evil, to act wickedly.' Lot names their intent plainly: this is evil. The brevity of his plea — just four words in Hebrew — conveys both urgency and the futility of reasoning with a mob.
8. Lot's offer of his virgin daughters to the mob is one of the most disturbing passages in the Hebrew Bible. The text presents it without comment or approval — the narrator does not editorialize. Lot's calculus appears to prioritize the obligation of hospitality to guests over the safety of his own daughters, reflecting the extreme weight placed on the host's duty in ancient Near Eastern culture. Modern readers rightly recoil; the text neither endorses nor condemns but records.
8. 'Who have not known a man' (asher lo yade'u ish) — the same verb yada used by the mob in verse 5, creating a grim wordplay. The daughters' sexual innocence is offered against the mob's sexual violence.
8. 'Under the shadow of my roof' (betsel qorati) — literally 'in the shadow of my beam/rafter.' The roof-beam represents the entire household and its protective obligation. Once a person has entered under another's roof, the host bears sacred responsibility for their safety. This principle of hospitality was inviolable in the ancient world, and Lot invokes it as the ultimate justification for his horrifying offer. The phrase reveals both the nobility of the principle and the catastrophic lengths to which Lot is driven.
9. 'This one came to sojourn, and now he would play the judge' (ha'echad ba lagur vayyishpot shafot) — the mob's retort exposes Lot's precarious status. He is a ger, a resident alien, not a native citizen. He has no standing to pass moral judgment. The infinitive absolute construction vayyishpot shafot ('he judges, judging!' or 'he keeps on judging!') expresses contempt — who does this foreigner think he is? The irony is sharp: Lot sat in the gate (v. 1), the place of judgment, yet the mob denies him any judicial authority.
9. 'We will deal worse with you than with them' (nara lekha mehem) — the threat escalates. The mob turns its violence toward Lot himself. His attempt at mediation has failed completely; moral reasoning is useless against collective rage.
9. 'They pressed hard' (vayyiftseru) — the same root (p-ts-r) used in verse 3 of Lot's pressing the angels to accept his hospitality. The verbal echo is bitter: Lot's insistent goodness is mirrored by the mob's insistent evil.
10. The angels — called 'the men' (ha'anashim) here, maintaining the narrative's fluid terminology — intervene decisively. They reach through the doorway, pull Lot inside, and shut the door. The rescue is physical and sudden. Lot's attempt to protect his guests has reversed: the guests now protect him.
10. The closed door reappears: in verse 6 Lot shut it to protect those inside; now the angels shut it to protect Lot himself. The door is the boundary between the ordered space of hospitality and the chaos of mob violence.
11. 'Blindness' (sanverim) — this rare word appears only here and in 2 Kings 6:18, where Elisha strikes the Aramean army with the same affliction. It may denote not total blindness but a dazzling, disorienting confusion of vision — the men can still grope for the door but cannot find it. The word's rarity adds to its strangeness and supernatural quality.
11. 'Both small and great' (miqqaton ve'ad gadol) — echoing the 'young and old' of verse 4. Every member of the mob is struck. Even blinded, they do not retreat but 'wearied themselves' (vayyil'u) trying to find the entrance. The persistence of their malice even after divine intervention underscores the depth of Sodom's corruption — judgment does not produce repentance but only frustrated rage.
12. The angels now reveal their mission's dual purpose: judgment on Sodom and deliverance of Lot's household. The catalog of family members — sons-in-law, sons, daughters, 'whoever you have' — is comprehensive. God's mercy extends to anyone connected to Lot.
12. 'Bring them out of the place' (hotse min hamaqom) — hamaqom ('the place') is used rather than 'the city,' perhaps already distancing the location from its identity. It is no longer a city to be named but a place to be destroyed. The urgency is absolute: get out everyone you can.
13. 'The outcry' (tsa'aqatam) — this is the same tsa'aqah ('cry, outcry') mentioned in 18:20–21, where the LORD told Abraham that the outcry of Sodom and Gomorrah was great. The word denotes the cry of the oppressed rising to heaven — the same cry of Israel in Egypt (Exodus 3:7) and the blood of Abel from the ground (4:10). It is not the cry of Sodom's inhabitants but the cry against them — the voice of their victims reaching God.
13. 'The LORD has sent us to destroy it' (vayshallechenu YHWH leshachatah) — the angels explicitly identify themselves as agents of the LORD on a mission of destruction. The verb shachat ('to destroy, corrupt, ruin') connects to the moral corruption (mashchit) that necessitates the physical destruction. The city that corrupted itself will be destroyed — the punishment mirrors the crime.
13. The angels speak of the LORD in the third person — 'the LORD has sent us' — confirming their identity as messengers (mal'akhim) rather than the LORD himself.
14. 'His sons-in-law, who were to marry his daughters' (chatanavav loqechi venotav) — the Hebrew is ambiguous. The participle loqechi ('taking, about to take') could indicate men who had already married his daughters or men betrothed to them. Since verse 8 mentions two virgin daughters still in Lot's house, these are likely betrothed men who had not yet consummated the marriage. Lot may have had other, already-married daughters as well.
14. 'He seemed to be jesting' (vayehi khimtsacheq) — the word kimtsacheq ('like one laughing, jesting, mocking') contains the root ts-ch-q, the same root as the name Yitschaq (Isaac, 'he laughs'). In 18:12–15, Sarah laughed (vatitschaq) at the promise of a son; here Lot's warning of judgment is received as a joke. The wordplay is devastating: the laughter of disbelief at God's promise mirrors the laughter of disbelief at God's judgment. Both are misplaced.

14. The sons-in-law's refusal seals their fate. They hear the warning and dismiss it. This is the pattern of judgment throughout Scripture: warning is given, and those who do not heed it perish (cf. Noah's generation, Pharaoh).
15. 'As dawn arose' (ukhemo hashachar alah) — the destruction will come with the sunrise (v. 23). Dawn, normally a symbol of hope and new beginning, here marks the deadline for escape. The light that comes will bring fire.
15. 'The angels urged Lot' (vayya'itsu hammal'akhim beLot) — the verb 'uts means to press, urge, hasten. The narrative has shifted from Lot pressing the angels (v. 3) to the angels pressing Lot. He who was eager to show hospitality is now reluctant to leave.
15. 'Your two daughters who are here' (shetei venotekha hannimtsa'ot) — hannimtsa'ot means 'who are found, who are present.' This specifies the daughters still in Lot's household, distinguishing them from any who may have married and remained in the city.
15. 'Lest you be swept away in the punishment of the city' (pen tissafeh ba'avon ha'ir) — the verb safah means 'to sweep away, to be destroyed.' The word 'avon means both 'iniquity' and 'punishment for iniquity' — the city's sin and its consequence are expressed in a single word.
16. 'He lingered' (vayyitmahemah) — this extraordinary verb, a Hitpalpel form of mahah ('to delay'), conveys prolonged, inexplicable hesitation. Lot dawdles, dithers, cannot bring himself to leave. After a night of mob violence, after explicit warning of imminent destruction, he lingers. The word captures the gravitational pull of a familiar life, even one lived in a wicked city. Lot's attachment to Sodom runs deeper than his fear of its judgment.
16. 'The men seized his hand' (vayyachaziku ha'anashim beyado) — the angels physically grip the hands of Lot, his wife, and both daughters. Four people, four hands seized. Salvation here is not Lot's achievement but God's forcible rescue of one who cannot save himself.
16. 'The LORD being merciful to him' (bechemlat YHWH alav) — the narrator's comment is theologically decisive. Lot is not saved by his righteousness (though 2 Peter 2:7 calls him 'righteous Lot'), nor by his own initiative — he is lingering! He is saved by chemlah, the LORD's compassion, tender mercy, sparing pity. The prepositional ('upon him') suggests mercy descending, covering, enveloping. This is pure grace: God saves a man who cannot even bring himself to walk out the door.
17. 'Flee for your life!' (himmalet al nafshekha) — literally 'escape upon your life,' meaning 'flee for the sake of your life.' The Niphal imperative of malat ('to escape') is urgent and absolute. The singular address ('your life,' not 'your lives') may indicate the command is directed primarily to Lot, or it may reflect the Hebrew convention of addressing the head of household.
17. 'Do not look behind you' (al tabbit acharekha) — the prohibition against looking back is never explained in the text. It may signify complete separation from the doomed city — no lingering attachment, no backward glance of longing or regret. Looking back would represent a divided heart, a refusal to fully accept deliverance. Lot's wife will violate this command in verse 26.
17. 'Flee to the hills' (haharah himmalet) — literally 'to the mountain, escape!' The mountain represents safety, elevation above the destruction that will engulf the plain (kikkar). Throughout Scripture, mountains are places of refuge and divine encounter. Lot, characteristically, will negotiate even this command (vv. 18–20).
18. 'Oh no, my lord!' (al na Adonai) — Lot's response to the command to flee is immediate negotiation. Even in the moment of divine rescue, with destruction imminent, Lot bargains. The address 'Adonai' (my lord) here may be directed to God or to the angel speaking; the Masoretic pointing suggests the divine address.
18. The brevity of Lot's protest — just three words — is striking. It echoes Abraham's intercession in 18:23–32, but where Abraham negotiated on behalf of others, Lot negotiates for his own convenience. The contrast between uncle and nephew is once again drawn sharply.
19. 'You have shown great kindness' (vattagdel chasdekha) — Lot acknowledges that his deliverance is an act of chesed, the covenant-loyalty and lovingkindness of God. The verb gadal ('to make great, magnify') intensifies: God has not merely shown chesed but has made it great, has magnified it. This is a remarkable theological statement from a man who is simultaneously negotiating to disobey.
19. 'I cannot flee to the hills' (lo ukhal lehimmalet haharah) — Lot claims inability. Whether this is physical weakness, fear of the unknown wilderness, or simply reluctance to leave civilization entirely, the text does not specify. His fear — 'lest the disaster overtake me and I die' (pen tidbaqani hara'ah vamatti) — suggests he doubts whether he can reach the mountains before destruction falls. The verb davaq ('to cling, overtake, stick to') vividly pictures calamity catching up and clinging to him.
20. 'It is a small one' (vehi mits'ar) — Lot's argument is charming in its absurdity: spare this city because it is so small it hardly matters. The word mits'ar ('small, insignificant, trifling') becomes the city's name: Tso'ar (v. 22), meaning 'small.' Lot essentially names the city by his plea for it.
20. The repetition — 'is it not a small one?' (halo mits'ar hi) — is almost wheedling. Lot negotiates with the angel as though haggling at the gate. The contrast with Abraham's dignified intercession in chapter 18 is notable: Abraham argued on principle (justice and righteousness); Lot argues from personal convenience and fear.
20. 'And my life will be saved' (utechi nafshi) — literally 'and my soul shall live.' Lot frames everything in terms of his own survival. The self-focus is understandable but stands in contrast to Abraham's concern for the righteous of Sodom.
21. 'I have granted you this request' (nasa'ti fanekha) — literally 'I have lifted your face,' an idiom meaning 'I have shown you favor, I have accepted your petition.' The expression comes from the practice of a petitioner prostrating before a superior; to 'lift the face' is to grant the request and restore the petitioner to standing. God accepts even Lot's self-serving negotiation.

21. 'I will not overthrow the city' (levilti hofki et ha'ir) — the verb hafakh ('to overthrow, overturn') is the characteristic word for Sodom's destruction (cf. v. 25, 29). It denotes total inversion — turning upside down, the complete reversal of an established order. The overthrow of Sodom becomes a paradigm referenced throughout Scripture (Deuteronomy 29:23; Isaiah 13:19; Jeremiah 49:18; Amos 4:11).
22. 'I can do nothing until you arrive there' (lo ukhal la'asot davar ad bo'akha shammah) — a remarkable statement. The agent of divine judgment says that destruction is constrained until the righteous (or at least the spared) are safe. God's judgment waits for mercy to complete its work. This principle echoes throughout Scripture: Noah must be in the ark before the flood (7:16); Israel must be past the sea before it closes (Exodus 14:28–29).
23. 'Therefore the name of the city was called Zoar' (al ken qara shem ha'ir Tso'ar) — the narrator provides the etiological explanation. Tso'ar is related to mits'ar ('small'), preserving Lot's plea in the city's permanent name. The city that was too small to matter became the city that was too small to destroy.
23. 'The sun had risen over the land' (hashemesh yatsa al ha'arets) — this simple, luminous sentence creates the calm before the cataclysm. The sun rises as it always does; the earth appears normal; Lot reaches his small refuge. The next verse will shatter this ordinary moment with fire from heaven. The juxtaposition of natural beauty and supernatural destruction is devastating.
23. The verse serves as a precise timestamp: destruction comes in full daylight, not under cover of night. The sun that rises to illuminate the land will witness its incineration.
24. 'The LORD rained ... from the LORD out of heaven' (vaYHWH himtir ... me'et YHWH min hashamayim) — the double mention of the LORD is one of the most discussed phrases in Genesis. 'The LORD rained ... from the LORD' seems to distinguish between a LORD who acts on earth and a LORD who sends from heaven. Some read this as simply emphatic repetition; others see a hint of plurality within the divine being. The text makes no attempt to resolve the tension.
24. 'Sulfur and fire' (gafrut va'esh) — gafrut is brimstone (sulfite/sulfur), and combined with fire it evokes volcanic destruction, though the text frames it as directly sent from heaven, not as a natural geological event. The region around the Dead Sea is rich in sulfur and bitumen deposits (cf. 14:10, 'the Valley of Siddim was full of bitumen pits'). Whatever natural processes may have been involved, the narrative insists on divine agency: this is the LORD's rain, falling from the LORD, out of heaven.
24. The verb himtir ('rained') uses the language of weather — God 'rains' destruction as he rains water. The irony is absolute: rain in an arid land is life; this rain is death. The heavens that should send blessing send annihilation.
25. 'He overthrew' (vayyahafekh) — the verb hafakh means to turn upside down, to overturn completely. It is the definitive word for Sodom's destruction and gives rise to the noun mahapekhah ('overthrow'), which becomes the technical term for Sodom's fate throughout the prophets. The word implies total inversion: what was above is now below; what was a fertile plain becomes a desolate waste.
25. The scope of destruction is comprehensive: the cities (plural — not Sodom alone but the cities of the plain), the entire kikkar (the Jordan plain), all inhabitants, and even the vegetation (tsemach ha'adamah, 'the growth of the ground'). Nothing organic survives. The land that Lot chose because it was 'well watered everywhere, like the garden of the LORD' (13:10) is now utterly barren. The irony of Lot's original choice is complete.
26. 'She looked back' (vatabbeit) — the verb nabat means more than a casual glance; it denotes an intent, fixed gaze. This is not an accidental glimpse over the shoulder but a deliberate turning to look. She violated the explicit command of verse 17: 'Do not look behind you.' Her look back signifies attachment to what was being destroyed — longing for the city, its life, its comforts. Jesus will cite her as a warning: 'Remember Lot's wife' (Luke 17:32).
26. 'A pillar of salt' (netsiv melach) — netsiv can mean 'pillar, monument, standing form.' The Dead Sea region is rich in salt formations, and pillar-shaped salt deposits exist to this day along its southern shore. The transformation is both judgment and monument — she who turned to look became a permanent marker of the consequences of divided loyalty.
26. Lot's wife is never named in the text. She is identified only in relation to Lot ('his wife'), making her simultaneously everywoman and no one. The anonymity universalizes her story: anyone who looks back at what God has condemned shares her fate.
27. 'Abraham rose early in the morning' (vayyashkem Avraham babboqer) — the verb hashkim ('to rise early') is characteristic of Abraham (cf. 21:14; 22:3). He is consistently depicted as a man of early, purposeful action. Here he returns to the very spot where he interceded with the LORD in 18:22–33.
27. 'The place where he had stood before the LORD' (hamaqom asher amad sham et penei YHWH) — literally 'the place where he stood there before the face of the LORD.' The phrase et penei YHWH ('before the face of the LORD') recalls the intensity of Abraham's intercession. He returns to the place of prayer to see the outcome of what he prayed about. The narrative shifts perspective from Lot's escape to Abraham's witness, connecting the two threads of the story.
28. 'He looked down' (vayyashqef) — the verb shaqaf means to look down from a height, to gaze out over a vista. Abraham views the destruction from the heights near Hebron, looking eastward and down toward the Jordan plain. The panoramic perspective makes him a witness to the entirety of the devastation.
28. 'The smoke of the land went up like the smoke of a furnace' (alah qitor ha'arets keqitor hakkivshan) — qitor is dense smoke, vapor, the kind that rises from intense burning. A kivshan is a kiln or smelting furnace — an industrial image of extreme, sustained heat. The simile conveys not a brush fire but a total conflagration. The entire landscape has become a furnace.

28. Abraham had asked in 18:23, 'Will you indeed sweep away the righteous with the wicked?' Now he sees the answer: the cities are destroyed, but — as verse 29 will clarify — God remembered Abraham and sent Lot out. The righteous (such as they were) were not swept away with the wicked.
29. 'God remembered Abraham' (vayyizkor Elohim et Avraham) — the verb zakhar ('to remember') in its divine usage does not mean that God had forgotten. It signifies God's active turning of attention, the moment when prior commitment becomes present action. God 'remembers' Noah in 8:1, Rachel in 30:22, Israel in Exodus 2:24. Each time, remembering triggers deliverance. Here, Lot is saved not because of his own merit but because God remembered Abraham — the intercessor's prayer is effective even when the answer is not exactly what was asked for.
29. 'The overthrow' (hahapekhhah) — the noun form of hafakh, used as a proper designation for the destruction. 'The Overthrow' becomes a fixed title for Sodom's fate, referenced repeatedly in prophetic literature.
29. The shift from YHWH (v. 24) to Elohim here may reflect the narrator's use of the more universal divine name when describing God's cosmic act of judgment, or it may follow the convention of using Elohim when the emphasis is on God's power and sovereignty.
30. 'He was afraid to dwell in Zoar' (ki yare lashebet beTso'ar) — the irony is thick. Lot negotiated desperately to be allowed to flee to Zoar instead of the hills (vv. 18–22), yet now he abandons Zoar for the very hills he was told to flee to originally. His fear may stem from the realization that Zoar, being a city of the plain, could share the fate of Sodom. Or perhaps the proximity to the destruction has unnerved him. Either way, the man who could not bring himself to leave Sodom (v. 16) now cannot stay anywhere.
30. 'He dwelt in a cave' (vayyeshav bamme'arah) — Lot's trajectory is now complete: from Abraham's companion (13:1) to Sodom's citizen at the gate (19:1) to cave-dweller. The man who chose the lush, well-watered plain (13:10–11) ends in a cave. The reversal mirrors the land's transformation from 'like the garden of the LORD' (13:10) to smoldering ruin.
31. 'There is no man on earth to come in to us after the manner of all the earth' (ve'ish ein ba'arets lavo aleinu kederekh kol ha'arets) — the daughters' perception may be literal (they believe the destruction has wiped out all humanity, having witnessed an apocalyptic event) or hyperbolic (there is no suitable man available in their isolated cave existence). Given that they have just seen cities consumed by fire from heaven, a belief that the world has ended is not unreasonable.
31. 'After the manner of all the earth' (kederekh kol ha'arets) — literally 'according to the way of all the earth,' meaning the normal course of human procreation through marriage. The phrase underscores that what they are about to propose is a departure from the natural order, driven by what they perceive as desperate circumstances.
31. The firstborn takes the initiative throughout this episode, planning and directing the younger sister. The narrative structure places responsibility primarily on her.
32. 'That we may preserve offspring through our father' (unchayyeh me'avinu zara) — literally 'that we may keep alive from our father seed.' The verb chayyah ('to keep alive, preserve life') frames the act as one of preservation and continuity rather than desire. The daughters' stated motive is survival of the family line — the same concern that drives Tamar's deception of Judah in chapter 38 and Ruth's approach to Boaz in Ruth 3. The biblical narrative presents these as morally complex acts driven by the imperative of lineage preservation.
32. The plan requires making Lot drunk — 'let us make our father drink wine' (nashqeh et avinu yayin) — because he would never consent knowingly. The use of wine as a tool of deception inverts the normal association of wine with celebration and covenant meals. The text records the plan without editorial comment, leaving moral judgment to the reader.
33. 'He did not know when she lay down or when she arose' (velo yada beshikhvah uvequmah) — the verb yada ('to know') returns with bitter irony. In verse 5, the mob demanded to 'know' the visitors; in verse 8, Lot offered daughters who had not 'known' a man; now Lot himself does not 'know' what is happening to him. The same word threads through the chapter, marking the progression from threatened sexual violence to actual sexual transgression within the family.
33. The text emphasizes Lot's unconsciousness: he did not know her lying down (shikhvah) or her rising (qumah). Whether this is physically plausible after extreme intoxication is beside the narrative's point — the text insists on Lot's lack of awareness and therefore his lack of consent. He is victim rather than agent in this act.
34. The firstborn reports success and directs the younger to repeat the act. The repetition is structured with deliberate parallelism: the same plan, the same wine, the same outcome. The narrative's doubling ensures both children — and both nations that will descend from them — are placed on equal footing.
34. 'Let us make him drink wine tonight also' (nashqennu yayin gam hallaylah) — the word gam ('also, again') underscores the calculated, repeated nature of the deception. This is not a momentary lapse but a planned sequence.
35. The near-verbatim repetition of verse 33 — the same wine, the same unknowing — creates a liturgical quality, as though the narrator is recording a terrible ritual. The younger daughter's act parallels the firstborn's exactly. The only variation is the subject: 'the younger arose' (vataqam hatse'irah) instead of 'the firstborn went in' (vattavo habbekhirah).
35. Again, 'he did not know' (velo yada) — Lot's obliviousness is restated. The narrative insists twice on his lack of awareness, as if anticipating the question of his complicity.
36. The verse is starkly factual — nine words in Hebrew reporting the result without comment, emotion, or moral evaluation. The narrator's restraint is itself a statement: the text records what happened and leaves interpretation to the reader and to the unfolding of history, as the nations born from these conceptions will interact with Israel for centuries to come.

37. 'Moab' (Mo'av) — the name is popularly etymologized as me'av ('from [the] father'), a brazen acknowledgment of the child's paternity. The name preserves the origin story in perpetuity: every time the Moabites are mentioned, their ancestor's name recalls his conception. Whether this etymology is linguistically precise matters less than its narrative function — it brands the nation with its origin.
37. 'He is the father of the Moabites to this day' (hu avi Mo'av ad hayyom) — the etiological formula connects the narrative past to the narrator's present. The Moabites were Israel's neighbors, sometimes enemies (Numbers 22–25), sometimes kin (Deuteronomy 2:9). Remarkably, Ruth the Moabitess will become an ancestor of King David and, in the Christian genealogy, of Jesus (Ruth 4:17–22; Matthew 1:5). The line that begins in shame ends in royalty.
38. 'Ben-ammi' (Ben-ammi) — the name means 'son of my people' or 'son of my kinsman.' It is slightly more euphemistic than 'Moab,' veiling the paternity behind the broader term 'my people/kinsman' (ammi) rather than 'my father' (avi). Yet the meaning is transparent: 'the son of my own kin' is a circumlocution for incestuous origin.
38. 'He is the father of the Ammonites to this day' (hu avi benei Ammon ad hayyom) — the Ammonites (literally 'sons of Ammon') occupied the territory east of the Jordan, centered around modern Amman (which preserves the ancient name). Like the Moabites, they were Israel's kinsmen and rivals, protected from Israelite conquest by divine decree (Deuteronomy 2:19) yet frequently in conflict with Israel (Judges 10–11; 1 Samuel 11).
38. The chapter ends with these etiological notices, turning from the cosmic drama of divine judgment to the domestic consequences of survival. Out of the ashes of Sodom come two nations that will shape Israel's story for centuries. The narrative neither celebrates nor condemns the daughters' act — it simply records the origin of peoples who will become permanent fixtures in the biblical landscape.

Summary: Abraham settles in Gerar and again presents Sarah as his sister. King Abimelech takes her, but God warns him in a dream that she is married. Abimelech confronts Abraham, who explains his fear and reveals the half-truth. Abimelech restores Sarah with gifts, and Abraham prays for the healing of Abimelech's household.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the second wife-sister episode (after 12:10–20), and it occurs immediately after the destruction of Sodom — Abraham has just witnessed divine judgment yet repeats the same deception. The pagan king Abimelech acts with greater moral integrity ('the integrity of my heart and the innocence of my hands,' v. 5) than the prophet Abraham, and God himself affirms Abimelech's innocence (v. 6). Abraham is called a navi ('prophet,' v. 7) for the first time in the Bible — yet the title is bestowed in a context that highlights his moral failure.

Translation Friction: Abraham's explanation that Sarah is 'indeed my sister, the daughter of my father though not the daughter of my mother' (v. 12) introduces a family detail found nowhere else, and its historicity and meaning have been debated. We rendered it as given. The phrase 'covering of the eyes' (v. 16), describing Abimelech's gift to Sarah, is an idiom whose precise legal meaning is uncertain — possibly vindication, possibly compensation. We preserved the Hebrew idiom and noted the ambiguity.

Connections: The wife-sister pattern (12:10–20; 20:1–18; 26:1–11) reveals a recurring patriarchal vulnerability. God's closing of wombs (20:18) and their reopening anticipates the barrenness-to-fertility pattern central to the matriarchal narratives. Abraham as intercessor (20:17) echoes his role in chapter 18 and foreshadows Moses' intercessory ministry.

¹And Abraham journeyed from there toward the land of the Negev, and he settled between Kadesh and Shur, and he sojourned in Gerar. ²Abraham introduced Sarah his wife by saying, "She is my sister." So Abimelech, the king of Gerar, sent for Sarah and took her. ³But God came to Abimelech in a dream by night and said to him, "Behold, you are a dead man because of the woman whom you have taken, for she is married to a husband." ⁴Now Abimelech had not come near her, and he said, "Lord, will You slay even a righteous nation?" ⁵Did he not himself say to me, 'She is my sister'? And she herself also said, 'He is my brother.' In the integrity of my heart and in the innocence of my hands I have done this. ⁶And God said to him in the dream, "Yes, I know that in the integrity of your heart you did this, and I also kept you from sinning against Me. Therefore I did not allow you to touch her." ⁷Now therefore, restore the man's wife, for he is a prophet, and he will pray for you, and you shall live. But if you do not restore her, know that you shall surely die — you and all who are yours. ⁸So Abimelech rose early in the morning and called all his servants and spoke all these things in their hearing, and the men were very afraid. ⁹Then Abimelech called Abraham and said to him, "What have you done to us? And how have I sinned against you, that you have brought upon me and upon my kingdom a great sin? You have done to me things that ought not to be done." ¹⁰And Abimelech said to Abraham, "What were you thinking, that you did this thing?" ¹¹And Abraham said, "Because I thought, 'Surely there is no fear of God in this place, and they will kill me on account of my wife.'" ¹²And besides, she is indeed my sister, the daughter of my father though not the daughter of my mother, and she became my wife. ¹³And it came to pass, when God caused me to wander from my father's house, that I said to her, 'This is the kindness you must show me: at every place where we come, say of me, "He is my brother."'" ¹⁴And Abimelech took sheep and oxen and male servants and female servants and gave them to Abraham, and he restored to him Sarah his wife. ¹⁵And Abimelech said, "Behold, my land is before you; settle wherever it pleases you." ¹⁶And to Sarah he said, "Behold, I have given your brother a thousand pieces of silver. Behold, it is for you a covering of the eyes before all who are with you, and before everyone you are vindicated." ¹⁷Abraham then interceded with God, and God restored Abimelech, along with his wife and female servants, so that they could bear children again. ¹⁸For the LORD had completely closed every womb in the house of Abimelech, on account of Sarah, Abraham's wife.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'He journeyed from there' (vayyissa' misham) — the narrative transitions directly from the destruction of Sodom and the aftermath in the cave of Zoar. Abraham moves south, away from the smoldering ruins of the Cities of the Plain. The verb nasa' ('to pull up stakes, to journey') implies breaking camp entirely.
1. 'The Negev' (hannegev) — the arid southern region of Canaan. Abraham's movement southward toward the edge of the promised land, settling near the border with Egypt (between Kadesh and Shur), places him in a liminal zone where the patterns of chapter 12 threaten to repeat.
1. 'He sojourned in Gerar' (vayyagar biGerar) — the verb gur ('to sojourn') marks Abraham as a resident alien without permanent rights. Gerar was a Philistine city (cf. 26:1), situated in the western Negev. Abraham's sojourner status makes him vulnerable and sets the stage for the wife-sister deception that follows.
2. 'She is my sister' (achoti hi) — the identical deception Abraham employed in Egypt (12:13). That he repeats it after all that has transpired — the covenant, the promise of a son, the destruction of Sodom — is staggering. Sarah, now promised to bear Isaac within the year (18:10), is placed in jeopardy by the very man entrusted with the covenant promise. The patriarch's faith, so recently displayed in his intercession for Sodom, falters in a far more personal test.
2. 'Abimelech king of Gerar sent and took Sarah' — the verb laqach ('to take') is the same used of Pharaoh in 12:15. The repetition of the entire pattern — journey to foreign land, declaration of sisterhood, royal appropriation — creates a literary echo that invites the reader to compare the two episodes. Notably, Sarah is now approximately ninety years old (17:17), which some commentators find remarkable; others note that her renewed beauty may be connected to the divine rejuvenation implied by the promise of a son.
2. 'Abimelech' (avimelekh) — meaning 'my father is king.' This appears to be a royal title or dynastic name among the rulers of Gerar rather than a personal name, since a king of Gerar bears the same name in Isaac's time (26:1).
3. 'God came to Abimelech in a dream by night' (vayyavo Elohim el-Avimelekh bachalom hallaylah) — this is remarkable: God communicates directly with a pagan king. The text uses Elohim (the universal name for God) rather than YHWH (the covenant name), fitting the context of divine address to a non-Israelite. God's intervention demonstrates His sovereignty over all nations and His commitment to protecting Sarah and the covenant promise, even when Abraham fails to do so.
3. 'You are a dead man' (hinnekha met) — the declaration is blunt and terrifying. The participle met ('dead') functions almost as a death sentence already pronounced. Abimelech stands under divine judgment not for a deliberate sin but for an action taken in ignorance — yet the objective reality of taking another man's wife carries lethal consequences regardless of intent.
3. 'She is married to a husband' (ve'hi be'ulat ba'al) — literally 'she is owned by an owner' or 'mastered by a master.' The term be'ulah comes from ba'al ('lord, husband, owner'), indicating that Sarah belongs to another man in the fullest covenantal sense. The emphatic phrasing underscores that the marriage bond is inviolable.
4. 'Abimelech had not come near her' (vaAvimelekh lo qarav eleiha) — the narrator inserts this crucial fact before Abimelech's defense, confirming that the marriage was never consummated. The verb qarav ('to draw near, to approach') is used euphemistically for sexual relations. God's intervention preceded any violation of Sarah.
4. 'Lord, will You slay even a righteous nation?' (Adonai, hagoy gam-tsaddiq taharog) — the echo of Abraham's intercession for Sodom (18:23–25) is unmistakable. Abraham asked, 'Will You indeed sweep away the righteous with the wicked?' Now Abimelech — a Gentile king — employs strikingly similar reasoning before God. The word tsaddiq ('righteous') and the appeal to divine justice connect the two episodes. The irony is sharp: the one who argued for Sodom's righteous is now the cause of an innocent king's peril.

4. The term goy ('nation') here likely refers to Abimelech's household and people who would suffer along with him, not merely to himself. His concern extends beyond personal survival to the welfare of his entire kingdom — a mark of royal responsibility.
5. Abimelech's defense is thorough and compelling. He establishes that both Abraham and Sarah participated in the deception — 'he said to me' and 'she also said.' The emphatic 'she herself also' (vehi-gam-hi) stresses that Sarah was complicit, not merely a passive victim. Both husband and wife bore responsibility for misleading Abimelech.
5. 'In the integrity of my heart and in the innocence of my hands' (betom-levavi uvniqyon kappai) — this is one of the most striking moral declarations in Genesis, and it comes from a pagan king. Tom ('integrity, completeness, wholeness') describes an undivided heart without guile. Niqayon ('innocence, cleanness') describes hands unstained by wrongdoing. The combination of heart (intention) and hands (action) constitutes a comprehensive claim of moral blamelessness — language later echoed in Psalm 26:6 and Psalm 73:13.
5. The irony of this chapter is reaching its peak: the 'father of many nations' is the deceiver, while the Gentile king stands before God with clean hands and an upright heart.
6. God's response to Abimelech is remarkable in its generosity. He does not merely tolerate the pagan king's defense — He affirms it: 'I know that in the integrity of your heart you did this.' The God of Abraham validates the moral sincerity of a Gentile ruler. This stands as a powerful witness that God judges the heart impartially (cf. 1 Samuel 16:7).
6. 'I also kept you from sinning against Me' (va'echsoxh gam-anokhi otkha mechato-li) — the verb chasakh ('to withhold, to restrain, to spare') reveals that God was actively intervening behind the scenes to prevent the consummation. The sin would have been 'against Me' (li) — not merely against Abraham or Sarah, but against God Himself, because the covenant promise of a son through Sarah was at stake. God's sovereign protection of the promised seed operates even when the patriarch's faith fails.
6. 'I did not allow you to touch her' (lo netattikha lingo'a eleiha) — literally 'I did not give you to touch her.' The verb natan ('to give, to permit') with the infinitive construct expresses divine restraint. God governed the situation so completely that Abimelech never had the opportunity to consummate the union. The protection of Sarah — and by extension, the promised son — is entirely God's doing.
7. 'He is a prophet' (ki navi hu) — this is the first occurrence of the word navi ('prophet') in the Bible, and it is applied to Abraham. The designation is significant: a navi is one who speaks to God on behalf of others, an intercessor. Here the prophetic role is defined not primarily as foretelling the future but as mediating between God and man through prayer. Abraham, despite his failure in this episode, retains his calling as God's chosen intercessor.
7. 'He will pray for you and you shall live' (veyitpallel ba'adekha vecheye) — the verb hitpallel ('to pray,' reflexive of palal) suggests intercession, pleading another's cause. Abimelech's healing depends on Abraham's prayer — a humbling irony, since Abraham is the one who caused the crisis. Yet God's design places the remedy in the hands of His prophet, not because Abraham deserves the role, but because God's gifts and calling are irrevocable.
7. 'You shall surely die' (mot tamut) — the infinitive absolute construction (mot tamut) intensifies the threat to absolute certainty. This is the same grammatical form God used in the garden: 'you shall surely die' (2:17). The threat extends to 'all who are yours' — Abimelech's entire household stands under this judgment, as verse 18 will confirm.
8. 'Abimelech rose early in the morning' (vayyashkem Avimelekh babboqer) — the verb hishkim ('to rise early') conveys urgency and diligence. The same verb is used of Abraham in key moments of obedience (19:27; 21:14; 22:3). Abimelech responds to the divine warning with the same alacrity that characterizes the patriarch at his best.
8. 'The men were very afraid' (vayyir'u ha'anashim me'od) — Abimelech's servants respond with appropriate fear. Their reaction confirms that the dream was understood as a genuine divine communication. In a polytheistic culture, a warning from a deity — even a foreign one — commanded serious attention. The entire household recognizes the gravity of the situation.
9. 'What have you done to us?' (meh-asita lanu) — the identical accusation Pharaoh leveled at Abraham in 12:18. The repetition is devastating. Twice now, a foreign ruler has rebuked the patriarch for the same deception. The man called to be a blessing to the nations has instead brought a curse upon them.
9. 'A great sin' (chata'ah gedolah) — the phrase 'great sin' in the ancient Near East was a technical term for adultery, attested in Egyptian and other texts. Abimelech uses precisely the right moral vocabulary: Abraham's deception nearly caused what the entire ancient world recognized as a grave offense against the social and divine order.
9. 'Things that ought not to be done' (ma'asim asher lo ye'asu) — literally 'deeds which are not done.' This phrase denotes actions that violate the recognized moral order — things so wrong that they are simply 'not done' in civilized society (cf. 34:7; 2 Samuel 13:12). The pagan king appeals to a moral standard he assumes Abraham shares. The rebuke carries added force because it comes from someone outside the covenant community — even Gentiles know this is wrong.
10. 'What were you thinking?' (mah ra'ita) — literally 'What did you see?' The verb ra'ah ('to see') here means 'to perceive, to consider, to have in view.' Abimelech is asking what calculation, what perceived threat, what reasoning led Abraham to this deception. The question pierces to the heart of Abraham's motivation: what did he see — or fail to see — that justified such an action?
10. The question is devastatingly simple. After the elaborate rebuke of verse 9, Abimelech reduces everything to one pointed inquiry. He does not understand why a man of God would resort to deception, and he asks Abraham to explain himself. The patriarch's answer in the following verses will be revealing — and not entirely to his credit.

11. 'There is no fear of God in this place' (ein yir'at Elohim bamaqom hazzeh) — Abraham's first justification. Yir'at Elohim ('the fear of God') is the foundational moral concept in the Hebrew Bible — the reverent awe of God that produces ethical behavior (cf. Proverbs 1:7; 9:10). Abraham assumed that without this fear, no moral restraint would operate, and his life would be forfeit. The assumption was wrong: Abimelech demonstrated precisely the moral integrity Abraham denied him.
11. The irony is painful. Abraham, the man who walked with God and received the covenant promises, assumed the worst about a people he did not know — while he himself was the one acting without moral integrity. The 'fear of God' Abraham found lacking in Gerar was more conspicuously absent in his own conduct.
11. 'They will kill me on account of my wife' (vaharguniy al-devar ishti) — Abraham's fear, however misguided, was not irrational by ancient Near Eastern standards. A beautiful woman with a living husband posed a problem; a beautiful widow was available. The calculus of self-preservation is understandable, but it reveals a failure to trust the God who had promised him descendants.
12. 'She is indeed my sister, the daughter of my father though not the daughter of my mother' (vegam-omnah achoti vat-avi hi, akh lo vat-immi) — Abraham's second justification: the claim was technically true. Sarah was his half-sister, sharing the same father (Terah) but having a different mother. Marriage between half-siblings was not prohibited in the patriarchal period (the Levitical prohibition comes later, Leviticus 18:9; 20:17). Abraham's defense rests on a half-truth — factually accurate but deliberately misleading, designed to conceal the more important fact that she was his wife.
12. The particle omnah ('indeed, truly') is emphatic — Abraham insists on the literal truth of his claim. But a half-truth deployed to deceive is a whole lie in its moral effect. Abraham traded on a technicality to save his skin, and the text offers no commendation for this reasoning.
12. 'And she became my wife' (vattehi-li le'ishah) — stated almost as an afterthought, as if the marriage were secondary to the sibling relationship. The syntax mirrors Abraham's deceptive strategy: he foregrounded the sisterhood and buried the marriage.
13. 'When God caused me to wander from my father's house' (ka'asher hit'u oti Elohim mibbeit avi) — Abraham's third justification, and the most theologically startling. The verb hit'u is the Hiphil plural of ta'ah ('to wander, to stray, to err'), and the subject Elohim takes a plural verb here — a grammatical oddity that has generated much discussion. Some read it as a genuine plural ('gods caused me to wander'), reflecting Abraham's pre-monotheistic idiom when speaking to a pagan; others see it as a pluralis majestatis or an anomalous construction. The rendering preserves the standard translation 'God caused me to wander,' but the Hebrew is unusual.
13. 'This is the kindness you must show me' (zeh chasdekh asher ta'asi immadi) — Abraham characterizes Sarah's participation in the deception as chesed — covenant loyalty, steadfast love, kindness. The word chesed normally describes the highest form of relational faithfulness, and Abraham applies it to a systematic pattern of half-truth. He asked Sarah to make this her permanent practice — at every place they would go.
13. The revelation that this deception was a standing arrangement — not a momentary lapse in Egypt or Gerar but a policy adopted at the outset of their journey — casts Abraham's entire pilgrimage in a different light. The man of faith has carried this contingency plan from the beginning, a hedge against the very God who called him.
14. Abimelech's response to Abraham's deception is astonishing generosity rather than punishment. Where Pharaoh expelled Abraham from Egypt (12:20), Abimelech gives gifts and invites him to stay (v. 15). The sheep, oxen, and servants constitute substantial wealth — a gesture of goodwill that goes far beyond what the situation required.
14. 'He restored to him Sarah his wife' (vayyashev lo et Sarah ishto) — the verb hashiv ('to restore, to return') fulfills God's command in verse 7. The narrative pointedly identifies Sarah as 'his wife' (ishto), the fact Abraham had labored to conceal. What Abraham hid, the text declares openly.
14. The parallel with the Egyptian episode (12:16) is instructive: there too Abraham received sheep, oxen, and servants, but in Egypt the gifts were the bride-price for Sarah's supposed availability. Here the gifts accompany her return — they are reparation, not acquisition.
15. 'My land is before you' (hinneh artsi lefaneikha) — Abimelech opens his entire territory to Abraham, granting him the freedom to settle wherever he wishes. This stands in sharp contrast to Pharaoh's terse 'take her and go' (12:19). The offer of land is especially significant given Abraham's status as a landless sojourner whom God has promised all of Canaan.
15. 'Settle wherever it pleases you' (battov be'eineikha shev) — literally 'in the good in your eyes, dwell.' Abimelech places the choice entirely in Abraham's hands. The generosity of a pagan king toward the man who deceived him becomes another testimony to the integrity God affirmed in Abimelech (v. 6). Abraham, who feared there was 'no fear of God in this place,' receives from that place an offer of radical hospitality.
16. 'A thousand pieces of silver' (elef kesef) — an enormous sum. For comparison, the price of a slave was approximately thirty shekels of silver (Exodus 21:32). A thousand pieces represents extraordinary wealth, intended to make unmistakably clear that no offense was committed and that Sarah's honor is fully intact.
16. 'A covering of the eyes' (kesut einayim) — one of the most debated phrases in Genesis. Interpretations include: (1) a legal payment that 'covers' or settles any perceived wrong, vindicating Sarah publicly; (2) a gift so large it causes onlookers to 'close their eyes' to any suspicion; (3) a veil of respectability that demonstrates Sarah was not dishonored. The rendering 'covering of the eyes' preserves the metaphor. The essential meaning is public vindication — the silver serves as proof that Sarah's honor remains unblemished.
16. 'Your brother' (achikh) — Abimelech uses Abraham's own terminology, perhaps with a note of irony. He addresses the relationship as Abraham presented it, even as he rectifies the situation that the deception created.

16. 'You are vindicated' (venokhachat) — the final word is difficult. It may derive from yakach ('to reprove, to decide, to vindicate') and can mean either 'you are reproved' (as KJV renders) or 'you are set right, vindicated.' The context of generous reparation favors the sense of vindication: Sarah's reputation is publicly cleared.
17. 'Abraham prayed to God' (vayyitpallel Avraham el-haElohim) — Abraham fulfills the prophetic role God assigned him in verse 7. The man who caused the crisis now mediates its resolution through intercessory prayer. The verb hitpallel ('to pray, to intercede') is the same used in verse 7, completing the divine instruction. Despite Abraham's failure, God still uses him as the channel of blessing — the intercessor through whom healing comes.
17. 'God healed Abimelech and his wife and his female servants, and they bore children' (vayyirpa Elohim et-Avimelekh ve'et-ishto ve'amhotav vayyeledu) — the healing is comprehensive: Abimelech himself, his wife, and his female servants are all restored. The verb rapha ('to heal') indicates that a physical affliction had been imposed — the nature of which is explained in verse 18. The result — 'they bore children' — reveals that the plague was specifically a closure of the womb, preventing all reproduction in Abimelech's household.
17. The irony reaches its climax: Abraham, who cannot yet produce the promised heir through Sarah, prays for the fertility of another man's household — and God answers. The prophet who deceived now intercedes; the barren patriarch prays for the barren household of the man he wronged, and God opens their wombs even as Isaac's conception draws near.
18. 'The LORD had completely closed every womb' (ki-atsor atsar YHWH be'ad kol-rechem) — the chapter's final verse shifts from Elohim to YHWH, the covenant name. Throughout the chapter, God has been referred to as Elohim in His dealings with Abimelech, the appropriate name for divine interaction with those outside the covenant. But here, in the narrator's explanatory comment, the name YHWH appears — because the ultimate purpose behind these events is the protection of the covenant. It is YHWH, the covenant God, who was at work all along.
18. 'Completely closed' (atsor atsar) — the infinitive absolute construction (atsor atsar) emphasizes the totality of the closure. Every womb — wife, servants, all — was shut. The verb atsar ('to restrain, to close, to shut up') describes divine intervention in the most intimate sphere of human life. God made the consequences of taking Sarah unmistakable and universal within Abimelech's household.
18. 'On account of Sarah, Abraham's wife' (al-devar Sarah eshet Avraham) — the chapter ends as it must, with the full identification that Abraham tried to suppress. Sarah is 'Abraham's wife' — not his sister, not an unattached woman, but the covenant wife through whom the promised son will come. God's fierce protection of Sarah is ultimately protection of the promise, and every event in this chapter — the dream, the rebuke, the plague, the healing — serves that single covenantal purpose.

Summary: Isaac is born as promised; Abraham circumcises him at eight days. At the weaning feast, Sarah demands the expulsion of Hagar and Ishmael. God assures Abraham and provides for Hagar in the wilderness. Abraham makes a covenant with Abimelech at Beersheba and plants a tamarisk tree there, calling on God as El Olam ('the Everlasting God').

What Makes This Remarkable: Sarah's declaration 'God has made laughter for me' (v. 6) transforms the private, embarrassed laughter of 18:12 into public joy — the verb tsachaq permeates the chapter, giving Isaac's name its full resonance. Ishmael's 'laughing' (metsacheq, v. 9) uses the same root, creating an ambiguity that drives the plot: is he mocking, playing, or simply laughing? The chapter's two halves — birth and expulsion — show that the fulfillment of God's promise for Isaac comes at devastating cost to Hagar and Ishmael, yet God provides for both lines.

Translation Friction: The participle metsacheq (v. 9), describing Ishmael's action, is the same root as Isaac's name and can mean 'laughing,' 'playing,' or 'mocking.' The Hebrew is deliberately ambiguous, and different translations choose different readings. We rendered it as 'laughing' and noted the range. The divine title El Olam ('the Everlasting God,' v. 33) appears only here in Genesis; olam stretches time beyond the horizon of human sight, and we preserved the traditional rendering.

Connections: The seven ewe lambs at Beersheba (21:28-30) establish the place name ('well of the oath' or 'well of seven') and connect oath-making to the number seven. Paul allegorizes the Hagar-Sarah conflict in Galatians 4:21-31. The Beersheba covenant anticipates Isaac's later treaty with Abimelech at the same site (26:26-33).

¹The LORD attended to Sarah just as He had promised, fulfilling for Sarah exactly what He had declared. ²And Sarah conceived and bore Abraham a son in his old age, at the appointed time of which God had spoken to him. ³Abraham named the son Sarah had borne him Isaac. ⁴When Isaac was eight days old, Abraham circumcised him, just as God had instructed. ⁵

Abraham was one hundred years old at the time of Isaac's birth. ⁶And Sarah said, "God has made laughter for me; everyone who hears will laugh with me." ⁷And she said, "Who would have declared to Abraham that Sarah would nurse children? For I have borne him a son in his old age." ⁸The boy grew and was weaned, and on the day of Isaac's weaning Abraham held a great celebration. ⁹And Sarah saw the son of Hagar the Egyptian, whom she had borne to Abraham, laughing. ¹⁰And she said to Abraham, "Cast out this slave woman and her son, for the son of this slave woman shall not inherit with my son, with Isaac." ¹¹And the matter was very displeasing in the eyes of Abraham on account of his son. ¹²And God said to Abraham, "Let it not be displeasing in your eyes because of the boy and because of your slave woman. In all that Sarah says to you, listen to her voice, for through Isaac shall your offspring be named." ¹³And also the son of the slave woman I will make into a nation, because he is your offspring. ¹⁴And Abraham rose early in the morning and took bread and a skin of water and gave them to Hagar, placing them on her shoulder, along with the child, and sent her away. And she departed and wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba. ¹⁵And the water in the skin was exhausted, and she cast the child under one of the bushes. ¹⁶And she went and sat down at a distance opposite him, about a bowshot away, for she said, "Let me not look upon the death of the child." And she sat opposite him and lifted up her voice and wept. ¹⁷And God heard the voice of the boy, and the angel of God called to Hagar from heaven and said to her, "What troubles you, Hagar? Do not fear, for God has heard the voice of the boy where he is." ¹⁸"Arise, lift up the boy and grasp him firmly by the hand, for I will make him into a great nation." ¹⁹And God opened her eyes, and she saw a well of water. And she went and filled the skin with water and gave the boy a drink. ²⁰And God was with the boy, and he grew. And he dwelt in the wilderness and became an expert archer. ²¹And he dwelt in the wilderness of Paran, and his mother took a wife for him from the land of Egypt. ²²And it came to pass at that time that Abimelech and Phicol the commander of his army spoke to Abraham, saying, "God is with you in all that you do." ²³Now therefore swear to me here by God that you will not deal falsely with me, nor with my son, nor with my grandson. According to the kindness that I have shown to you, you shall do to me and to the land in which you have sojourned." ²⁴Abraham replied, "I give you my oath." ²⁵And Abraham reproved Abimelech concerning a well of water that the servants of Abimelech had seized. ²⁶And Abimelech said, "I do not know who has done this thing. You did not tell me, and I also have not heard of it until today." ²⁷And Abraham took sheep and cattle and gave them to Abimelech, and the two of them made a covenant. ²⁸Abraham then separated seven ewe lambs from the flock. ²⁹And Abimelech said to Abraham, "What are these seven ewe lambs that you have set apart by themselves?" ³⁰And he said, "You shall take these seven ewe lambs from my hand so that it may serve as a witness for me that I dug this well." ³¹Therefore he called that place Beersheba, because there the two of them swore an oath. ³²So they made a covenant at Beersheba. Then Abimelech and Phicol the commander of his army rose up and returned to the land of the Philistines. ³³Abraham planted a tamarisk tree at Beersheba and there invoked the name of the LORD, the Everlasting God. ³⁴And Abraham sojourned in the land of the Philistines many days.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'The LORD visited' (YHWH paqad) — the verb paqad carries a rich range of meaning: to visit, to attend to, to take notice of, to act on behalf of. When God is the subject, it signals decisive divine intervention — God breaking into the normal course of events to fulfill His word. The same verb is used of God's visitation of Israel in Egypt (Exodus 3:16).
1. 'As He had said... as He had spoken' (ka'asher amar... ka'asher dibber) — the double affirmation of divine faithfulness is emphatic. Two different verbs for speaking (amar and dibber) reinforce that God's word and God's deed are inseparable. What He promises, He performs. This verse is the culmination of a promise first made in 17:16 and reiterated in 18:10.
1. The chapter opens with YHWH — the covenant name — used twice, underscoring that the birth of Isaac is a covenant act, not merely a biological event. Twenty-five years have passed since the original promise in 12:2.
2. 'At the appointed time' (lammo'ed) — the word mo'ed means an appointed time, a fixed season, a designated meeting. It is the same word used for the festivals of Israel (Leviticus 23) and the Tabernacle of Meeting (ohel mo'ed). Isaac's birth is not random; it occurs precisely when God determined it would. The Creator of time operates within it with perfect precision.
2. 'In his old age' (lizqunav) — Abraham is one hundred years old (v. 5). The notation emphasizes that this birth is humanly impossible and therefore wholly a work of God. The phrase echoes the announcement in 18:11 that Abraham and Sarah were 'old, advanced in days.'

3. 'Isaac' (Yitschaq) — the name means 'he laughs' or 'he will laugh,' from the root ts-ch-q. The naming fulfills God's command in 17:19. The laughter theme runs through the entire Isaac narrative: Abraham laughed in wonder (17:17), Sarah laughed in disbelief (18:12), and now the child of promise bears laughter as his very identity. What began as incredulous laughter is transformed into the joyful laughter of fulfillment.
3. The verse carefully attributes the child to both parents: 'his son who was born to him, whom Sarah bore to him.' Both the father's lineage and the mother's agency are acknowledged. Abraham obeys God's command by giving the name God specified (17:19).
4. 'Circumcised his son Isaac when he was eight days old' — Abraham's immediate obedience fulfills the covenant command of 17:12. The eighth day is specified by God as the appointed day for circumcision, and Abraham complies precisely. This act marks Isaac as a member of the covenant community and binds him physically to the Abrahamic promise.
4. 'As God had commanded him' (ka'asher tsivvah oto Elohim) — this phrase echoes the pattern of 'as He had said... as He had spoken' from verse 1. The chapter opens with a cascade of fulfilled words: God speaks, God acts, Abraham obeys. The covenant relationship is functioning as designed — divine promise met by human faithfulness.
5. The notation of Abraham's age — one hundred years — serves as a theological exclamation point. It has been twenty-five years since the initial call and promise in chapter 12, when Abraham was seventy-five. The quarter-century of waiting underscores both the severity of the test of faith and the certainty of divine fulfillment. The aged patriarch holding his newborn son is the living proof that nothing is too difficult for the LORD (18:14).
6. 'God has made laughter for me' (tsechoq asah li Elohim) — the word tsechoq ('laughter') is the noun form of Isaac's name-root. Sarah's declaration is beautifully ambiguous: God has made laughter for her — both the emotion of joy and the child whose name is Laughter. Her earlier laughter of disbelief (18:12–15) has been transformed into laughter of wonder and delight. What was once bitter incredulity is now overflowing joy.
6. 'Everyone who hears will laugh with me' (kol hashomea' yitschaq li) — the verb yitschaq is identical to Isaac's name. Sarah is saying, in effect, 'everyone who hears will Isaac with me' — will share in the laughter that this child represents. The wordplay is untranslatable in its full richness. The laughter is contagious; the promise is public; the joy overflows to all who hear the news of God's faithfulness.
7. 'Who would have declared to Abraham' (mi mille le'Avraham) — the verb mille ('to declare, to speak, to utter') is a rare and poetic word, appearing primarily in elevated speech. Sarah's words have the quality of a psalm or song. She marvels at the inconceivable: that anyone could have predicted this outcome. The rhetorical question expects the answer: no one — except God.
7. 'That Sarah would nurse children' (heiniqah vanim Sarah) — the plural 'children' (vanim) is striking when Sarah bore only one son. Some see it as a poetic plural of fullness, expressing that Sarah's motherhood overflows beyond what she could imagine. Others note it may hint at the nations that will descend from Isaac. The image of nursing — intimate, physical, sustaining — grounds the miracle in tangible maternal reality.
8. 'The child grew and was weaned' (vayyigdal hayyeled vayyiggamal) — weaning in the ancient Near East typically occurred at age two or three. The verb gamal ('to wean, to ripen, to deal fully with') carries a sense of completion and maturation. The child has survived the most vulnerable period of infancy — itself a testament to divine preservation.
8. 'Abraham made a great feast' (mishteh gadol) — a mishteh is a drinking feast, a celebration of abundance. The 'great feast' marks Isaac's transition from nursing infant to weaned child and functions as a public acknowledgment of the promise's reality. The community witnesses what God has done. This celebration, however, sets the stage for the conflict that immediately follows.
9. 'Laughing' (metsacheq) — this is the interpretive crux of the passage. The participle metsacheq comes from the same root (ts-ch-q) as Isaac's name and Sarah's laughter in verse 6. Its meaning is deeply ambiguous: it can mean simply 'playing' or 'laughing,' or it can carry overtones of 'mocking,' 'sporting,' or even sexual impropriety (as in 26:8 and 39:14,17). The LXX adds 'with her son Isaac,' suggesting the two were playing together. Paul interprets it as persecution (Galatians 4:29). The rendering preserves the basic meaning — 'laughing' — while notes explore the range. Ishmael is doing the very thing that Isaac's name signifies: he is 'Isaacing.' The threat Sarah perceives may be precisely this: Ishmael is claiming, through his laughter, the identity that belongs to Isaac.
9. 'The son of Hagar the Egyptian' — Sarah does not use Ishmael's name. She identifies him only by his mother and her ethnicity, distancing him from Abraham and from the covenant family. The designation is deliberate and cutting.
10. 'Cast out' (garesh) — a harsh verb meaning to drive out, expel, divorce. It is the same verb used for the expulsion from Eden (3:24) and will be used for driving out the Canaanites from the land. Sarah demands nothing less than total removal. The verb carries overtones of irrevocable banishment.
10. 'This slave woman' (ha'amah hazzo't) — Sarah uses the word amah ('slave woman, maidservant') rather than Hagar's name, further depersonalizing her. The demonstrative 'this' (zo't) adds contempt. Sarah, who once gave Hagar to Abraham as a wife-surrogate (16:3), now reduces her to a nameless servant to be expelled.
10. 'Shall not inherit with my son, with Isaac' — the legal and theological issue is inheritance. In ancient Near Eastern law, the son of a slave wife could have inheritance rights. Sarah demands that these rights be nullified. Paul will later interpret this as an allegory of the two covenants (Galatians 4:30), but in the narrative, it is a mother's fierce protection of her son's unique status as the child of promise.
11. 'Very displeasing in the eyes of Abraham' (vayyera' haddavar me'od be'einei Avraham) — the verb ra'a' ('to be evil, bad, displeasing') is strong. This is not mild discomfort; it is deep anguish. Abraham is caught between Sarah's demand and his love for Ishmael.
11. 'On account of his son' (al odot beno) — the text says 'his son,' not 'Ishmael' or 'the son of Hagar.' Abraham regards Ishmael as his son — fully, painfully, without qualification. This emotional reality makes the coming obedience all the more costly. Abraham's fatherly love for Ishmael is the first shadow of the far greater test that awaits in chapter 22.

12. 'Listen to her voice' (shema' beqolah) — God validates Sarah's demand. The verb shema' ('to hear, to listen, to obey') is the fundamental verb of Israelite faith (cf. Deuteronomy 6:4). God commands Abraham to obey Sarah's voice in this matter, an extraordinary divine endorsement of a wife's discernment regarding the covenant line.
12. 'Through Isaac shall your offspring be named' (ki beYitschaq yiqqare lekha zara') — this is the theological key. The covenant line runs exclusively through Isaac. The verb qara' ('to call, to name') here means that Abraham's true descendants — those who carry the covenant identity — will be reckoned through Isaac. Paul cites this verse in Romans 9:7 and Hebrews 11:18 to argue that the children of promise, not merely biological descent, constitute the true seed of Abraham.
13. 'I will make into a nation' (legoy asimennnu) — God's promise to Ishmael is not nullified by his expulsion from Abraham's household. He too will become a great nation (cf. 17:20). God's faithfulness extends beyond the covenant line; Ishmael is not abandoned but redirected.
13. 'Because he is your offspring' (ki zar'akha hu) — the reason God will bless Ishmael is paternal: he is Abraham's seed. The covenant runs through Isaac, but the blessing of Abraham's fatherhood extends to all his children. God's economy is generous even when it is particular.
14. 'Rose early in the morning' (vayyashkem babboqer) — the same phrase will describe Abraham's obedience in the Aqedah (22:3). Abraham does not delay or negotiate. His early rising speaks of painful obedience — he does what must be done before the day's heat and his own heart can weaken his resolve.
14. 'A skin of water' (chemat mayim) — a chemat is an animal-skin container. The provision is pitifully meager: bread and a single waterskin for a journey into the wilderness. Whether this reflects Abraham's own anguish (unable to equip them lavishly for fear of contradicting God's command) or the narrative's emphasis on their vulnerability is debated. Either way, the sparse provision foreshadows the crisis that follows.
14. 'She wandered in the wilderness of Beersheba' (vatteita' bemidbar Be'er Shava') — the verb ta'ah means 'to wander, to stray, to be lost.' Hagar does not journey purposefully; she wanders without direction. The wilderness of Beersheba is the arid region south of Canaan, a place of desolation. The promised mother of a great nation is lost and alone with her child in the desert.
15. 'The water was exhausted' (vayyikhlū hammayim) — the verb kalah ('to be completed, finished, exhausted') signals total depletion. There is nothing left. The sparse provision of verse 14 has run out, and death is now imminent.
15. 'She cast the child' (vattashlekh et-hayyeled) — the verb shalakh ('to cast, throw, hurl') is violent and despairing. This is not a gentle laying down; it is an act of helpless anguish. Hagar cannot bear to hold her dying child any longer. The same verb is used for casting lots, casting away idols, and Jonah being hurled into the sea — acts of desperate finality.
16. 'About a bowshot away' (kimtachavei qeshet) — a bowshot is approximately two hundred yards. The distance is precise enough to be visceral: close enough to know what is happening, far enough not to watch. Hagar positions herself in an agony of proximity — she cannot abandon him entirely, but she cannot bear to witness his death.
16. 'Let me not look upon the death of the child' (al-er'eh bemot hayya'el) — Hagar's words are among the most heartbreaking in Scripture. The verb ra'ah ('to see, to look upon') is the same verb that will soon describe God 'opening her eyes' (v. 19). What Hagar cannot bear to see, God is about to make visible in an entirely different way.
16. 'She lifted up her voice and wept' (vattissa et-qolah vattevk) — this formulaic expression for intense grief appears at moments of extreme sorrow throughout the Old Testament (cf. Judges 2:4; Ruth 1:9,14; 1 Samuel 11:4). The lifting of the voice is a cry that transcends words — raw maternal anguish rising to heaven.
17. 'God heard the voice of the boy' (vayyishma' Elohim et-qol hanna'ar) — this is a profound wordplay on Ishmael's name, which means 'God hears' (Yishma'el, from shama' + El). Even though Ishmael's name is not spoken in this verse, his very name is enacted: God hears. The text says God heard the boy's voice — not Hagar's weeping (v. 16), but the child's cry. Ishmael's identity as 'God hears' is confirmed precisely when he is most helpless.
17. 'The angel of God called from heaven' (mal'akh Elohim min-hashamayim) — as in 16:7–12, divine intervention comes through an angelic messenger. The term Elohim (rather than YHWH) is used, consistent with God's dealings with those outside the immediate covenant line. The call comes 'from heaven' — from the transcendent realm — yet reaches into the dust of the wilderness where a child lies dying.
17. 'Where he is' (ba'asher hu sham) — God hears Ishmael in his present condition and location. There is no prerequisite, no required journey of faith. God meets the boy exactly where he is. This phrase has been treasured in Jewish interpretation as expressing God's grace toward those in extremity.
18. 'Arise, lift up the boy and grasp him firmly by the hand' — three imperatives in rapid succession: qumi ('arise'), se'i ('lift up'), hachaziqui ('hold fast, strengthen your grip'). The angel commands Hagar out of her despair and into action. She is not to sit at a distance watching death; she is to rise, take hold of her son, and walk forward into the future God is declaring.
18. 'I will make him into a great nation' (legoy gadol asimennnu) — the promise echoes the promise to Abraham himself (12:2). Ishmael will also become a goy gadol — a great nation. While the covenant line runs through Isaac, God's blessing of Ishmael is real and substantial. The twelve princes of 25:13–16 and the Arab peoples trace their lineage through this promise.
19. 'God opened her eyes' (vayyifqach Elohim et-eineiha) — the well was presumably there all along; Hagar's despair had blinded her to it. The verb paqach ('to open,' specifically of eyes) is used for miraculous sight — the removal of blindness, whether physical or spiritual. God does not create the well ex nihilo; He opens Hagar's perception to see what was already there. This is a recurring biblical pattern: divine provision is often present but unseen until God grants the eyes to perceive it (cf. 2 Kings 6:17; Luke 24:31).

19. 'She saw a well of water' (vatter be'er mayim) — the contrast with verse 16 is stunning. There she said, 'Let me not see (er'eh) the death of the child.' Here God opens her eyes and she sees (vatter) — not death but life, not desolation but provision. The well of water in the wilderness is the concrete answer to her cry.
20. 'God was with the boy' (vayehi Elohim et-hanna'ar) — the phrase 'God was with' is one of the highest commendations in the Hebrew Bible. It is said of Joseph (39:2,21), Joshua, Samuel, and David. Ishmael, though outside the covenant line, lives under divine presence and protection. God's promise to Hagar is fulfilled not merely in survival but in ongoing accompaniment.
20. 'An expert archer' (roveh qashshat) — literally 'a shooter of the bow.' Ishmael becomes a man of the wilderness, skilled in the arts of survival. The bow connects him to the 'bowshot' distance of verse 16 — the very measure of Hagar's despair becomes the instrument of Ishmael's flourishing.
21. 'The wilderness of Paran' (midbar Pa'ran) — a vast desert region in the northeastern Sinai Peninsula, south of Canaan. Ishmael's settlement here places him geographically between Egypt and Canaan — between his mother's homeland and his father's promised land. He belongs fully to neither world.
21. 'His mother took a wife for him from the land of Egypt' — Hagar arranges an Egyptian marriage for her son, connecting him to her own heritage. The matriarch's role in selecting a bride is notable; it parallels Abraham's later arrangement of Isaac's marriage (chapter 24), though the directions diverge — Isaac's wife will come from Mesopotamia, not Egypt. The two sons' marriages map their divergent destinies.
22. 'God is with you in all that you do' (Elohim immekha bekhol asher-attah oseh) — a pagan king recognizes what the narrative has repeatedly demonstrated: divine favor rests on Abraham. This acknowledgment from an outsider — indeed, from the very king Abraham deceived in chapter 20 — is powerful testimony. Abimelech sees the evidence of God's blessing and seeks alliance rather than enmity.
22. 'Phicol the commander of his army' (Pikhol sar-tseva'o) — the presence of the military commander indicates that this is a formal diplomatic engagement, not a casual conversation. Abimelech approaches Abraham not merely as a neighbor but as a sovereign negotiating with an equal — a remarkable elevation for a sojourning alien (cf. 20:1).
23. 'Swear to me here by God' (hishave'ah li be'lohim hennah) — Abimelech demands a covenant oath sworn by Abraham's God. The pagan king recognizes that Abraham's God is the authority by which binding commitments are made. The word hennah ('here') grounds the oath in a specific place, which will become Beersheba.
23. 'Nor with my son, nor with my grandson' (ulnini ulnekhdi) — the terms nin ('son, offspring') and nekhd ('grandson, descendant') extend the treaty across three generations. Abimelech wants lasting peace, not a temporary truce. The multigenerational scope reflects ancient Near Eastern treaty practice.
23. 'According to the kindness I have shown to you' (kachesed asher-asiti immekha) — Abimelech appeals to chesed ('loyal love, kindness, covenant faithfulness'). He considers his treatment of Abraham in chapter 20 — returning Sarah, granting permission to dwell in the land, giving gifts — as acts of chesed that deserve reciprocity.
23. Register departure: chesed rendered as 'kindness' rather than default 'faithful love' because Abimelech's request is between treaty partners, not covenant parties — a political good-faith agreement, not covenantal loyalty.
24. 'I will swear' (anokhi ishava') — Abraham's response is terse and decisive. The emphatic pronoun anokhi ('I myself') lends weight to the commitment. Abraham agrees to the treaty without negotiation or qualification, establishing a pattern of peaceful coexistence with the peoples of the land.
25. 'Reproved' (hokhiach) — the verb yakach in the hiphil means 'to reprove, rebuke, argue a case, set right.' Abraham raises a grievance as part of the treaty negotiations. In the ancient Near East, treaty-making often included the resolution of outstanding disputes. Abraham is not merely accepting terms; he is asserting his rights.
25. 'A well of water that the servants of Abimelech had seized' (be'er hammayim asher gazelu avdei Avimelekh) — water rights were matters of life and death in the Negev. The verb gazal ('to seize, rob, take by force') indicates that Abimelech's servants had violently appropriated a well that Abraham had dug. Wells represented enormous investments of labor, and their seizure was an act of aggression. This dispute will be resolved by the oath and the naming of Beersheba.
26. Abimelech's triple denial — 'I do not know... you did not tell me... I have not heard' — establishes his innocence in the matter of the well. The pattern echoes his defense in 20:4–5, where he similarly protested his innocence regarding Sarah. Abimelech consistently presents himself as a man of integrity who acts rightly when properly informed. The verse implies that the well seizure was done by subordinates without the king's knowledge or authorization.
27. 'The two of them made a covenant' (vayyikhrettu sheneihem berit) — literally 'the two of them cut a covenant.' The verb karat ('to cut') reflects the ancient ritual of cutting animals in covenant-making ceremonies (cf. 15:9–18). Abraham provides the animals that seal the agreement. This is the first human-to-human covenant in which Abraham participates as an equal partner, a sign of his growing stature among the peoples of the land.
27. The gifts of sheep and cattle flow from Abraham to Abimelech — the sojourner providing for the king. Abraham's wealth, which is itself a sign of divine blessing, becomes the currency of diplomacy.

- 28. 'Seven ewe lambs' (sheva' kivsot) — the number seven (sheva') is laden with significance. It is the number of completion and oath-making (the Hebrew word for 'to swear,' nishba', is related to the word for 'seven'). Abraham separates these lambs as a distinct element of the covenant ceremony, beyond the general gift of sheep and cattle. Their purpose will be explained in the following verses.
- 29. Abimelech's question indicates that the separation of the seven ewe lambs is unusual — beyond the normal protocol of covenant-making. Abraham is adding a specific clause or condition to the treaty that requires explanation. The question creates a natural opening for Abraham to assert his claim to the disputed well.
- 30. 'That it may serve as a witness for me' (tiyeh-li le'edah) — the seven lambs function as legal evidence, a physical witness to Abraham's claim. By accepting them, Abimelech acknowledges Abraham's ownership of the well. In a preliterate culture, such tangible markers served as binding legal documentation.
- 30. 'That I dug this well' (ki chafarti et-habbe'er hazzo't) — the verb chafar ('to dig') implies the labor of excavation. Abraham asserts his claim based on the labor he invested. In the Negev, digging a well was an enormous undertaking — cutting through rock to reach the water table. The well represents not just water but established right of presence in the land.
- 31. 'Beersheba' (Be'er Shava') — the name carries a double meaning: 'well of the oath' (from shevu'ah, 'oath') and 'well of seven' (from sheva', 'seven'). Both meanings are active in the narrative: seven lambs sealed the oath at the well. The wordplay is characteristic of Hebrew naming — a single name compresses multiple layers of meaning into a permanent marker on the landscape.
- 31. 'There the two of them swore an oath' (sham nishbe'u sheneihem) — the verb nishba' ('to swear') is etymologically connected to sheva' ('seven'), reinforcing the numerical symbolism. Beersheba will become a major settlement and a marker of the southern boundary of Israel ('from Dan to Beersheba'). What begins as a treaty site becomes a defining landmark of the promised land.
- 32. 'They returned to the land of the Philistines' — the anachronistic reference to 'Philistines' (Pelishtim) has generated much discussion. The Sea Peoples who became the historical Philistines arrived in Canaan around 1200 BCE, considerably after the patriarchal period. The term may be used proleptically (applying a later name to an earlier population) or may refer to an earlier wave of Aegean settlers in the coastal region. The narrator uses the name familiar to the audience.
- 32. The departure of Abimelech and Phicol signals the successful conclusion of the treaty. Abraham remains at Beersheba as a recognized figure with legal rights — no longer merely a sojourner but a treaty partner with an acknowledged claim to land and water.
- 33. 'A tamarisk tree' (eshel) — the tamarisk is a slow-growing, deep-rooted desert tree that provides shade and indicates the presence of underground water. Planting a tree is an act of permanence — a declaration that Abraham intends to remain. A tamarisk may take decades to reach full growth; Abraham plants for the future, not merely for himself. Some traditions interpret eshel as an inn or hostelry (from a related root meaning 'to provide'), suggesting Abraham established a place of hospitality.
- 33. 'The LORD, the Everlasting God' (YHWH El Olam) — this divine title combines the covenant name YHWH with El Olam ('God of Eternity' or 'Everlasting God'). The title affirms that the God who called Abraham is not a local or temporal deity but the God of all time and eternity. The planting of a long-lived tree and the invocation of the Everlasting God together declare that Abraham's faith is rooted in permanence — in a God whose faithfulness spans all generations.
- 33. The sequence — planting a tree, calling on God's name — mirrors Abraham's pattern of worship throughout the narrative (12:7–8; 13:4,18). At each significant location, Abraham establishes a marker of faith. Beersheba thus joins Shechem, Bethel, and Hebron as a site of Abrahamic worship.
- 34. 'Sojourned... many days' (vayyagar... yamim rabbim) — the chapter ends as it began, with Abraham as a sojourner (ger). Despite the covenant with Abimelech, the planted tree, and the invocation of the Everlasting God, Abraham remains a stranger in a land not yet his own. The phrase 'many days' (yamim rabbim) compresses an indeterminate span of time — perhaps years or decades of quiet faithfulness between the dramatic events of chapters 21 and 22. The sojourner's patience is itself an act of faith in the Everlasting God whose promises unfold across generations.
- 34. This concluding note sets the stage for chapter 22. The 'many days' of peaceful sojourning will be shattered by the most severe test of Abraham's life.

Summary: God tests Abraham by commanding him to offer Isaac as a burnt offering on Mount Moriah. Abraham obeys, binds Isaac on the altar, and raises the knife. The angel of the LORD stops him, and a ram is provided as substitute. God swears an irrevocable oath of blessing. The chapter closes with news of Nahor's family, including the birth of Rebekah.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Aqedah ('the Binding') takes its name from vayyaqod (v. 9), a verb used nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible. The second lekh-lekha ('go forth,' v. 2) mirrors the first (12:1), framing Abraham's entire journey: the first demanded he leave his past; the second demands he surrender his future. The refrain 'the two of them walked together' (vv. 6, 8) — yachdav — is the emotional heartbeat of the narrative. The word tachat ('instead of,' v. 13) establishes the principle of substitutionary sacrifice: the ram dies in Isaac's place.

Translation Friction: Abraham's response hineni ('here I am,' vv. 1, 7, 11) signals total availability, but English 'here I am' lacks the theological weight of the Hebrew compound. The verb nissah ('tested,' v. 1) is not entrapment but refinement — designed to reveal and strengthen, not to destroy. The knife is called ma'akhelet ('the eater,' v. 6), from the root 'to consume' — a word that names the instrument by its function. We preserved these nuances in the translator's notes.

Connections: Mount Moriah is identified in 2 Chronicles 3:1 as the site of Solomon's temple. God's self-sworn oath (22:16) is cited in Hebrews 6:13-14 as the ultimate guarantee. The ram caught in the thicket (22:13) provides the substitution typology that runs through Passover (Exodus 12), the scapegoat (Leviticus 16), and Isaiah's Suffering Servant (Isaiah 53:7). Rebekah's introduction (22:23) prepares for chapter 24.

¹And it came to pass after these things that God tested Abraham, and He said to him, "Abraham!" And he said, "Here I am." ²And He said, "Take now your son, your only son, whom you love — Isaac — and go forth to the land of Moriah, and offer him there as a burnt offering upon one of the mountains of which I will tell you." ³And Abraham rose early in the morning and saddled his donkey, and he took his two young men with him and Isaac his son. And he split the wood for the burnt offering, and he arose and went to the place of which God had told him. ⁴On the third day Abraham lifted up his eyes and saw the place from afar. ⁵And Abraham said to his young men, "Stay here with the donkey. I and the boy will go over there, and we will worship, and we will return to you." ⁶And Abraham took the wood of the burnt offering and laid it upon Isaac his son, and he took in his hand the fire and the knife. And the two of them walked together. ⁷Then Isaac spoke to Abraham the father and said, "My father!" And he said, "Here I am, my son." And he said, "Behold, the fire and the wood, but where is the lamb for the burnt offering?" ⁸And Abraham said, "God will provide for Himself the lamb for the burnt offering, my son." And the two of them walked together. ⁹And they came to the place of which God had told him, and Abraham built the altar there and arranged the wood. And he bound Isaac his son and laid him on the altar, on top of the wood. ¹⁰And Abraham stretched out his hand and took the knife to slaughter his son. ¹¹And the angel of the LORD called to him from heaven and said, "Abraham! Abraham!" And he said, "Here I am." ¹²And he said, "Do not stretch out your hand against the boy, and do not do anything to him, for now I know that you fear God, since you have not withheld your son, your only son, from Me." ¹³And Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, behind him was a ram caught in the thicket by its horns. And Abraham went and took the ram and offered it up as a burnt offering instead of his son. ¹⁴And Abraham called the name of that place "The LORD Will Provide," as it is said to this day, "On the mountain of the LORD it shall be provided." ¹⁵And the angel of the LORD called to Abraham a second time from heaven, ¹⁶and said, "By Myself I have sworn, declares the LORD, because you have done this thing and have not withheld your son, your only son, ¹⁷I will surely bless you, and I will surely multiply your offspring as the stars of the heavens and as the sand that is on the seashore. And your offspring shall possess the gate of his enemies, ¹⁸and in your offspring all the nations of the earth shall be blessed, because you have obeyed My voice." ¹⁹Then Abraham went back to his servants, and together they set out for Beersheba, where Abraham settled. ²⁰And it came to pass after these things that it was told to Abraham, saying, "Behold, Milcah also has borne children to your brother Nahor: ²¹Uz the firstborn, his brother Buz, and Kemuel — the ancestor of Aram — ²²along with Chesed, Hazo, Pildash, Jidlaph, and Bethuel." ²³And Bethuel fathered Rebekah. These eight Milcah bore to Nahor, Abraham's brother. ²⁴And his concubine, whose name was Reumah, also bore Tebah, Gaham, Tahash, and Maacah.

1. 'God tested' (ha'Elohim nissah) — the verb nissah means 'to test, to prove, to try.' The narrator tells the reader at the outset what Abraham himself does not know: this is a test, not a final directive. The definite article on Elohim (ha'Elohim, 'the God') is unusual and may emphasize the absolute, sovereign God — the One who has the right to test. The KJV's 'tempt' follows older English usage where 'tempt' could mean 'test' (cf. James 1:13, where God 'tempts no one' to evil). The rendering uses 'tested' to avoid the modern connotation of enticement to sin.
1. 'Here I am' (hineni) — the first of three hineni responses in this chapter (also v. 7 and v. 11). This single Hebrew word — 'behold me' — expresses total availability and readiness. It is the posture of the servant who holds nothing back. Abraham answers before knowing what will be asked. His availability precedes the content of the command.

1. 'After these things' (achar haddevarim ha'elleh) — a transitional formula that creates temporal distance. What 'things'? The birth of Isaac, the expulsion of Ishmael, the treaty with Abimelech. Abraham has settled into a life of relative peace. The test comes not in the midst of crisis but in the calm after it — when Abraham has the most to lose.
2. 'Your son, your only son, whom you love — Isaac' (et-binkha et-yechidkha asher-ahavta et-Yitschaq) — four increasingly specific descriptions narrow the identity with agonizing precision. Each phrase tightens the vise: 'your son' (you have two — which one?), 'your only son' (the unique one, the one through whom the promise flows), 'whom you love' (the first occurrence of the word 'love' [ahavah] in the Bible, and it appears here, in this context), 'Isaac' (the name that means laughter — the laughter now threatened with extinction). The rhetorical effect is devastating: God forces Abraham to feel the full weight of what is being asked before the command is even issued.
2. 'Go forth' (lekh-lekha) — the identical phrase used in Abraham's original call (12:1). The first lekh-lekha sent Abraham away from his past — his father's house and homeland. This second lekh-lekha sends him toward the potential annihilation of his future — the sacrifice of his promised son. The two journeys frame Abraham's life: the first in hope, the second in obedience tested to the breaking point.
2. 'The land of Moriah' (erets hamMoriyyah) — the name Moriah is connected to the root r'-h ('to see') and possibly y-r-' ('to fear/revere'). The land of 'seeing' or 'vision' — the place where God will be seen and will see to it (cf. v. 14). Jewish tradition identifies Moriah with the Temple Mount in Jerusalem (2 Chronicles 3:1), making this the site where Solomon's Temple will stand — the place of sacrifice par excellence.
2. 'Offer him as a burnt offering' (ha'alehu sham le'olah) — the verb he'elah means literally 'to bring up, to cause to ascend.' An olah ('burnt offering') is one that 'goes up' entirely in smoke — it is wholly consumed, with nothing held back. God asks Abraham to hold nothing back: to offer everything, completely, without remainder.
3. 'Rose early in the morning' (vayyashkem babboqer) — the identical phrase used when Abraham sent Hagar away (21:14). Abraham's obedience does not wait for daylight deliberation. The early rising suggests either the urgency of obedience or the impossibility of sleep. He does not argue, negotiate, or intercede — though he interceded passionately for the strangers of Sodom (18:22–33), he is silent when his own son is at stake. This silence is either the deepest faith or the deepest agony, or both.
3. 'He split the wood for the burnt offering' (vayevaqqa' atsei olah) — the verb baqa' ('to split, to cleave') is physical and violent. Abraham prepares the instrument of sacrifice with his own hands. The deliberateness of each action — saddling, gathering, splitting — stretches the narrative across a sequence of agonizing preparations. Every stroke of the axe is an act of obedience.
3. The narrative is marked by extraordinary compression. No emotions are described, no internal dialogue is reported. The text proceeds with relentless forward motion: he rose, he saddled, he took, he split, he arose, he went. The silence of the text mirrors the silence of Abraham.
4. 'On the third day' (bayyom hashelishi) — three days of walking with the knowledge of what awaits at the end. The third day is a recurring biblical motif of resolution and revelation (cf. Exodus 19:11,16; Hosea 6:2; Jonah 1:17). Three days is long enough for the full weight of the decision to settle in, long enough for Abraham to turn back at any point, long enough for hope to war with despair in every step.
4. 'Lifted up his eyes and saw the place from afar' (vayyissa Avraham et-einav vayyar et-hammakom merachok) — the phrase 'lifted up his eyes' signals a moment of perception and recognition. Abraham sees Moriah — the place of testing — in the distance. The word maqom ('place') becomes almost a proper noun; in later Jewish tradition, HaMaqom ('The Place') becomes a name for God Himself. Abraham sees 'the place' — the intersection of divine command and human obedience — from a distance, and he walks toward it.
5. 'We will worship' (venishtachaveh) — the verb hishtachavah means 'to bow down, to prostrate oneself, to worship.' Abraham names what is about to happen as worship. The act of sacrificing his son — the most extreme obedience imaginable — is not destruction but worship. This reframing reveals the heart of the Aqedah: it is fundamentally an act of devotion, not of violence.
5. 'We will return to you' (venashuvah aleikhem) — the verb is first person plural: 'we will return.' Abraham says 'we' — both I and the boy. The author of Hebrews interprets this as faith in resurrection; Abraham believed God could raise Isaac from the dead (Hebrews 11:17–19). In the narrative itself, the plural may express Abraham's trust that God will somehow resolve the contradiction between the command to sacrifice and the promise that 'through Isaac your offspring will be named' (21:12). Or it may be a merciful deception spoken to spare the young men alarm. The ambiguity is profound and deliberately unresolved.
6. 'Laid it upon Isaac his son' (vayyasem al-Yitschaq beno) — Isaac carries the wood upon which he will be offered. The image of the son carrying the instrument of his own sacrifice has reverberated through centuries of interpretation. In Christian typology, Isaac bearing the wood prefigures Christ bearing the cross. In Jewish tradition (the Aqedah), the emphasis falls on Isaac's willing participation — he is no unknowing victim but a partner in the act of obedience.
6. 'The fire and the knife' (et-ha'esh ve'et-hamma'akhelet) — Abraham carries the two elements that Isaac must not handle: fire (danger) and the knife (death). The father bears the burden of lethal agency while the son carries the wood. The distribution of loads between father and son is a portrait of love operating within obedience.
6. 'The two of them walked together' (vayyelekhuv sheneihem yachdav) — this phrase appears twice in the Aqedah narrative (here and in v. 8), forming a literary frame around Isaac's question about the lamb. The word yachdav ('together') carries enormous emotional weight. Father and son walk in unity toward an event that only one of them fully understands. Their togetherness is both beautiful and heartbreaking.

7. 'My father!' 'Here I am, my son' (avi... hineni veni) — the exchange is among the most emotionally charged in all of Scripture. Isaac calls out 'my father' — the intimate, trusting address of a child. Abraham responds with the same hineni he used for God in verse 1, now directed to his son: 'Here I am, my son.' The word beni ('my son') at the end is a dagger of tenderness. Abraham is fully present to both God and his son — answering both with the same total availability, even as their claims tear him apart.
7. 'Where is the lamb for the burnt offering?' (ayyeh hasseh le'olah) — Isaac's question is devastating in its innocence. He has observed the preparations — fire and wood are present — but the essential element is missing: the sacrificial animal. The child reasons logically and asks what any observant youth would ask. The question forces Abraham either to reveal the terrible truth or to answer in faith. Isaac's word seh ('lamb, small livestock') will echo in verse 8 and ultimately in verse 13, where a ram appears in its place.
8. 'God will provide for Himself the lamb' (Elohim yir'eh-lo hasseh le'olah) — the verb yir'eh means both 'He will see' and 'He will provide' (seeing to a need is providing for it). Abraham's answer is simultaneously a statement of faith, a prophecy, and perhaps a gentle evasion. If read as 'God will see to it — the lamb for the burnt offering, my son,' the sentence can be parsed such that 'my son' is in apposition to 'the lamb' — God will provide the lamb for the burnt offering; my son. Whether Abraham intends this double meaning or the narrator constructs it, the ambiguity is breathtaking.
8. 'The two of them walked together' (vayyelekhuv sheneihem yachdav) — the repetition of this phrase from verse 6 is one of the most powerful literary devices in the Hebrew Bible. After Isaac's question and Abraham's heart-rending answer, they still walk together. Nothing has changed outwardly; everything has intensified inwardly. The togetherness now includes Isaac's question hanging in the air between them — answered and unanswered at once.
9. 'He bound Isaac' (vayyaqod et-Yitschaq) — the verb aqad ('to bind') appears only here in the entire Hebrew Bible. This unique word gives the episode its name: the Aqedah, 'the Binding.' The singularity of the word matches the singularity of the event — nothing like this has happened before, and the language itself acknowledges that there is no ordinary word for it. The binding implies that Isaac is now a willing participant, or at least does not resist — Jewish tradition consistently holds that Isaac consented, making the Aqedah a joint act of faith between father and son.
9. 'Built the altar... arranged the wood... bound Isaac... laid him on the altar' — four verbs in rapid succession, each describing a discrete, deliberate action. The narrative achieves its power through restraint: no emotions are reported, no hesitation is described. The focus is entirely on the physical actions, and the silence about Abraham's inner state is more eloquent than any description could be.
9. 'On top of the wood' (mimma'al la'etsim) — Isaac lies upon the very wood he carried up the mountain. The son who bore the burden now becomes the offering. The image is complete: altar, wood, bound son — everything is prepared for the sacrifice.
10. 'Stretched out his hand' (vayyishlach Avraham et-yado) — the verb shalach ('to send forth, to stretch out') describes the deliberate extension of Abraham's hand toward the instrument of death. This is the climactic moment — the point at which obedience reaches its absolute limit. Abraham does not merely contemplate the act; his hand is in motion.
10. 'To slaughter his son' (lishchot et-beno) — the verb shachat ('to slaughter, to kill ritually') is the technical term for sacrificial killing — cutting the throat of the animal to drain its blood. It is used of the Passover lamb (Exodus 12:6) and of all Levitical sacrifices. Abraham intends to perform a proper, ritual slaughter of his son. The word 'his son' (beno) at the end of the verse — without Isaac's name — is almost too intimate to bear.
10. The verse is one of the shortest and most devastating in the Bible. Twelve Hebrew words describe the moment at which Abraham's obedience becomes action. The narrative pauses here at the knife's edge — literally — and the intervention of verse 11 arrives at the last possible instant.
11. 'Abraham! Abraham!' — the double calling of the name signals urgency and intimacy. The same doubling occurs at other pivotal moments: 'Moses, Moses' (Exodus 3:4), 'Samuel, Samuel' (1 Samuel 3:10), 'Saul, Saul' (Acts 9:4). The repetition arrests Abraham's hand at the very moment the knife is poised. One second later and the story changes forever.
11. 'Here I am' (hineni) — the third and final hineni of the chapter. Abraham first said it to God (v. 1), then to his son (v. 7), and now again to the angel of the LORD. His availability has not wavered throughout the ordeal. The man who answered 'Here I am' before knowing the test now answers 'Here I am' at its climax. His posture of surrender is unchanged.
11. 'The angel of the LORD called from heaven' (mal'akh YHWH min-hashamayim) — notably, the covenant name YHWH returns. In verse 1, it was Elohim (the God who tests); now it is YHWH (the God who saves, the covenant-keeper). The shift from Elohim to YHWH at the moment of deliverance is theologically significant: the God of universal sovereignty tests, but the God of covenant faithfulness rescues.
12. 'Do not stretch out your hand against the boy' (al-tishlach yadkha el-hanna'ar) — the same verb shalach from verse 10 is now negated. The hand that was extended toward death is commanded to stop. God's prohibition is absolute: 'do not do anything to him' (ve'al-ta'as lo me'umah). The boy is not to be touched. The test is complete.
12. 'Now I know that you fear God' (attah yadati ki-yere Elohim attah) — the phrase 'now I know' (attah yadati) has generated extensive theological discussion. Does God learn something new? The language of 'knowing' here may be understood as God's acknowledgment of demonstrated reality — the test has made visible what was previously internal. Abraham's faith has been externalized in action, and God declares what that action reveals: Abraham is a God-fearer (yere Elohim) — one who reverences God above all else, including his most precious possession.
12. 'You have not withheld your son, your only son, from Me' (velo chasakta et-binkha et-yechidkha mimmenni) — the verb chasakh ('to withhold, to spare, to hold back') echoes the language of verse 2. God asked Abraham to give; Abraham did not withhold. The repeated phrase 'your son, your only son' (binkha et-yechidkha) circles back to the opening command, creating a frame: what God demanded in verse 2, Abraham surrendered in verse 12. Paul echoes this language in Romans 8:32: God 'did not spare His own Son.'

13. 'Behold, a ram caught in the thicket by its horns' (vehinneh-ayil achar ne'echaz basevakh beqarnav) — the ram appears suddenly, introduced by hinneh ('behold') — the narrative marker of surprise and revelation. It is caught (ne'echaz, from achaz, 'to seize, to grasp') in the sevakh (a dense thicket). The ram is held there — trapped, available, provided. Isaac asked about a lamb (seh); God provides a ram (ayil) — a mature, horned animal, suitable for sacrifice. God provides, but on His own terms.
13. 'Instead of his son' (tachat beno) — the preposition tachat ('instead of, in place of, under') establishes the principle of substitutionary sacrifice. The ram dies in Isaac's place. This single word — tachat — carries the weight of an entire theology: one life given in exchange for another. The concept will be elaborated in the Levitical sacrificial system and finds its ultimate expression, in Christian theology, in the cross. In the narrative, it is the hinge on which the entire drama turns: Isaac lives because the ram dies.
13. 'Abraham lifted up his eyes and looked' (vayyissa Avraham et-einav vayyar) — the same phrase from verse 4, where Abraham saw the place from afar. Now he sees the provision up close. The God who brought him to the place of testing is the same God who provides at the place of testing. Seeing — the root r-'-h that runs through the entire chapter — reaches its climax: Abraham sees the ram that God has 'seen to.'
14. 'The LORD Will Provide' (YHWH Yir'eh) — Abraham names the place with the same verb he used in his answer to Isaac (v. 8): 'God will see to it.' Now, with the ram offered and Isaac alive, the prophetic statement becomes a memorial name. YHWH Yir'eh means both 'the LORD will see' and 'the LORD will provide' — seeing and providing are one divine act. The name encapsulates the entire theology of the Aqedah: God sees the need, God sees the faith, and God provides the answer.
14. 'On the mountain of the LORD it shall be provided/seen' (behar YHWH yera'eh) — the verb yera'eh is the niphal (passive) of ra'ah: 'it will be seen' or 'He will be seen' or 'it will be provided.' The ambiguity is deliberate and fruitful. On God's mountain, provision appears; on God's mountain, God Himself is seen. The saying 'to this day' (hayyom) indicates that this proverb persisted in Israel as a testimony to divine faithfulness at the very place where the Temple would eventually stand (2 Chronicles 3:1).
14. The entire chapter has been structured around the verb ra'ah ('to see'): Abraham 'sees' the place (v. 4), God 'will see to' the lamb (v. 8), Abraham 'sees' the ram (v. 13), and now the place is named 'the LORD sees/provides.' Vision — both human and divine — is the thematic thread that binds the narrative.
15. 'A second time' (shenit) — the angel's first call (v. 11) stopped the sacrifice; this second call delivers the blessing. The first intervention was urgent — 'Do not stretch out your hand!' The second is expansive — a reaffirmation and amplification of the covenant promises. The double calling mirrors the structure of the entire narrative: first the test, then the reward; first the crisis, then the covenant.
16. 'By Myself I have sworn' (bi nishba'ti ne'um-YHWH) — God swears by Himself because there is no one greater by whom to swear (cf. Hebrews 6:13–14). This is the only time in the Abraham narrative that God takes an oath. The promises of chapters 12, 15, and 17 were declarations; this is a sworn oath — the highest possible form of divine commitment. God binds Himself irrevocably to the promises that follow.
16. 'Declares the LORD' (ne'um-YHWH) — the prophetic formula ne'um, typically rendered 'oracle of' or 'declares,' marks this as a formal divine pronouncement. Its use here — unique in Genesis — elevates the speech to the status of prophetic oracle. What follows is not a conversation but a solemn decree.
16. 'Because you have done this thing and have not withheld your son, your only son' — the language of verse 12 is repeated almost verbatim, reinforcing the basis of the oath: Abraham's obedience. The covenant promises are now grounded not only in God's sovereign choice but in Abraham's demonstrated faith. Grace and obedience converge at Moriah.
17. 'I will surely bless you' (barekh avarekekha) — the infinitive absolute construction (barekh + finite verb avarekh) creates the strongest possible emphasis in Hebrew: 'blessing, I will bless you' — an unbreakable, intensified promise. The same construction governs 'multiplying, I will multiply' (harbah arbeh). Double emphasis for double blessing.
17. 'As the stars of the heavens and as the sand on the seashore' — two images of innumerability, one celestial and one terrestrial. The stars (first promised in 15:5) represent the exalted, heavenly dimension of Abraham's legacy; the sand represents its earthly, tangible abundance. Together they encompass the totality of creation — heaven and earth united in the scope of the promise.
17. 'Your offspring shall possess the gate of his enemies' (veyirash zar'akha et sha'ar oyeav) — the 'gate' of a city was its point of defense, its legal center, and its seat of power. To 'possess the gate' means to conquer and control — to exercise dominion over those who oppose. This is a promise of victory, not merely survival. Abraham's seed will not be marginal but dominant.
18. 'In your offspring all the nations of the earth shall be blessed' (vehitbarakhu bezar'akha kol goyei ha'arets) — the hitpa'el form of barakh can mean 'shall bless themselves' (reflexive — invoking Abraham's descendants as a standard of blessing) or 'shall be blessed' (passive — receiving blessing through Abraham's line). Both meanings are theologically rich. The promise, first given in 12:3, is now restated in its most expansive form. The blessing is not for Israel alone but for all nations (kol goyei ha'arets). The particular story of one man on one mountain opens into a universal horizon.
18. 'Because you have obeyed My voice' (eqev asher shama'ta beqoli) — the word eqev ('because, as a consequence of, on account of') establishes a direct link between Abraham's obedience and the universal blessing. The verb shama' ('to hear, to obey') — the same root as Ishmael's name and the Shema — closes the narrative circle. Abraham heard God's voice, and he obeyed. The consequence of that obedience extends to every nation on earth.

18. This verse is the theological summit of the Aqedah and arguably of the entire Abrahamic narrative. The particular obedience of one man in one impossible test becomes the channel through which blessing flows to all humanity. The covenant is simultaneously narrower (confirmed by the most extreme test) and wider (extending to all nations) than ever before.
19. 'Abraham returned to his young men' (vayyashav Avraham el-ne'arav) — the verb shuv ('to return') fulfills the promise of verse 5: 'we will return to you.' Abraham does return — and notably, Isaac is not mentioned. The silence about Isaac's return has puzzled interpreters. In the midrash, some traditions say Isaac went to study at the academy of Shem; the narrative simply leaves him unmentioned, perhaps because the focus remains tightly on Abraham's faith journey, which began and ends at Beersheba.
19. 'They went together' (vayyelekhuv yachdav) — the word yachdav ('together') appears for the third time in the chapter (cf. vv. 6, 8), but now the 'together' has shifted from father and son to Abraham and his servants. The community of the journey reforms around the patriarch, and life resumes.
19. 'Abraham dwelt at Beersheba' — the narrative returns to its starting point (21:33–34). The drama of Moriah is over; Abraham resumes the life of a sojourner in the Negev. The most extraordinary event of his life yields to the most ordinary continuation. Faith returns to daily life.
20. 'After these things' (acharei haddevarim ha'elleh) — the same transitional formula that opened the chapter (v. 1). Its repetition signals a shift from the Aqedah to a new narrative unit. The genealogical note that follows seems mundane after the heights of Moriah, but it serves a vital narrative function: it introduces Rebekah, Isaac's future wife.
20. 'Milcah also has borne children' — the word 'also' (gam) draws a parallel with Sarah: just as Sarah bore a son miraculously, so Milcah has been fruitful in the family of Nahor. God's blessing of fertility extends beyond Abraham's immediate household. The parallel between the two branches of Terah's family sets the stage for the union of Isaac and Rebekah in chapter 24.
21. 'Uz' (Uts) — the firstborn of Nahor. The land of Uz is later identified as the homeland of Job (Job 1:1), possibly connecting this genealogy to the wisdom tradition. 'Buz' his brother appears in Jeremiah 25:23 alongside Dedan and Tema, suggesting connections to Arabian peoples. 'Kemuel the father of Aram' links this line to the Aramaeans, the people from whom Rebekah will come.
21. The list of Nahor's twelve sons (eight by Milcah, vv. 21–23, and four by his concubine, v. 24) parallels the twelve sons of Ishmael (25:13–16) and the twelve sons of Jacob (35:22–26). The number twelve functions as a number of tribal completeness across multiple lineages.
22. 'Chesed' (Kesed) — possibly the ancestor of the Chaldeans (Kasdim), the people of Ur from which Abraham originally came. If so, the genealogy traces the origin of the Chaldean nation to Abraham's own extended family. 'Bethuel' (Betu'el) is the most significant name in this list: he is the father of Rebekah (v. 23) and Laban, and thus the link between the Nahor branch and Isaac's future marriage.
23. 'Bethuel fathered Rebekah' (uVtu'el yalad et-Rivqah) — the seemingly incidental mention of Rebekah (Rivqah) is the theological payoff of the entire genealogy. The narrator, having brought the Isaac story to its crisis and resolution on Mount Moriah, now quietly introduces the woman who will become Isaac's wife and the mother of Jacob. The name Rivqah may be related to a root meaning 'to tie, to bind' or 'to fatten (cattle)' — connecting either to the binding motif of the Aqedah or to the pastoral wealth of the family.
23. 'These eight Milcah bore to Nahor' — the summary counts eight sons by Milcah, the primary wife. Four additional sons by the concubine Reumah will follow in verse 24, totaling twelve — the number of tribal completeness. The genealogy ensures the reader knows that God's work of building families and nations extends beyond the covenant line.
24. 'His concubine, whose name was Reumah' (ufilagsho ushemah Re'umah) — the pilegish ('concubine') was a secondary wife with lower legal status. Reumah's four sons, combined with Milcah's eight, bring Nahor's total to twelve — paralleling the twelve sons of Ishmael and foreshadowing the twelve sons of Jacob. The pattern of twelve recurs throughout Genesis as a marker of tribal wholeness.
24. 'Maacah' (Ma'akhah) — this name appears later as a region east of the Sea of Galilee and as a personal name borne by several biblical figures, including the mother of King Asa. The genealogy thus weaves connections between the patriarchal period and later Israelite geography and history.
24. The chapter ends not with the drama of Moriah but with a list of names — the quiet work of God building families, preparing the next generation, and setting the stage for the continuation of the promise. After the mountaintop, ordinary life resumes, and God works in genealogies as surely as in theophanies.

Summary: Sarah dies at 127 years in Hebron. Abraham mourns her, then negotiates with the Hittites to purchase the cave of Machpelah as a burial site. Ephron offers it freely, but Abraham insists on paying full price — 400 shekels of silver. He buries Sarah in the cave, securing the first piece of the promised land through legal purchase.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is the first land Abraham owns in Canaan — acquired not by conquest or divine miracle but by commercial transaction, complete with witnesses and legal formalities. The negotiations follow ancient Near Eastern convention: public offers of generosity that both parties understand require full payment. Abraham calls himself a ger vetoshav ('stranger and sojourner,' v. 4) — his self-description captures the patriarchal paradox of living in the promised land without possessing it. The meticulous legal detail ensures the purchase is uncontested.*

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew achuzzah ('possession,' v. 4) is a legal term for permanent property — real estate held as inheritance. It carries more weight than English 'property' or 'possession,' denoting a stake in the land that endures across generations. The elaborate courtesy of the negotiation (vv. 5-16) follows conventions that English readers may mistake for genuine offers of free land; the cultural context is essential and we noted it.*

Connections: *Machpelah becomes the patriarchal family tomb: Abraham (25:9), Isaac and Rebekah (49:31), Jacob and Leah (49:31; 50:13) are all buried here. Abraham's status as a ger ('resident alien') anticipates Israel's self-understanding as 'strangers and sojourners' on God's land (Leviticus 25:23; 1 Chronicles 29:15). The site remains a place of significance and contested reverence to this day.*

¹And the life of Sarah was one hundred years and twenty years and seven years — the years of the life of Sarah. ²Sarah died at Kiriath-arba (now known as Hebron) in the land of Canaan. Abraham went in to grieve over Sarah and to weep for her. ³Then Abraham got up from beside his dead wife and addressed the Hittites, saying, ⁴"I am a stranger and a sojourner among you. Give me a possession of a burial site among you, that I may bury my dead from before me." ⁵And the sons of Heth answered Abraham, saying to him, ⁶"Hear us, my lord: you are a prince of God among us. In the choicest of our tombs bury your dead. None of us will withhold his tomb from you, to keep you from burying your dead." ⁷And Abraham rose and bowed himself to the people of the land, to the sons of Heth. ⁸And he spoke with them, saying, "If it is your desire that I should bury my dead from before me, hear me and intercede for me with Ephron the son of Zohar, ⁹that he may give me the cave of Machpelah, which belongs to him, which is at the edge of his field. For the full price let him give it to me in your presence as a possession for a burial site." ¹⁰Now Ephron was sitting among the sons of Heth. And Ephron the Hittite answered Abraham in the hearing of the sons of Heth, before all who went in at the gate of his city, saying, ¹¹"No, my lord, hear me: the field I give to you, and the cave that is in it — to you I give it. In the presence of the sons of my people I give it to you. Bury your dead." ¹²Abraham prostrated himself before the local inhabitants. ¹³And he spoke to Ephron in the hearing of the people of the land, saying, "But if you would only hear me: I will give the price of the field. Take it from me, and I will bury my dead there." ¹⁴Ephron responded to Abraham in their hearing, ¹⁵"My lord, hear me: a piece of land worth four hundred shekels of silver — what is that between me and you? Bury your dead." ¹⁶And Abraham listened to Ephron, and Abraham weighed out to Ephron the silver that he had named in the hearing of the sons of Heth — four hundred shekels of silver, current among the merchants. ¹⁷So the field of Ephron in Machpelah, which is before Mamre — the field and the cave that is in it, and all the trees that are in the field, within all its borders all around — was established ¹⁸as Abraham's possession, in the presence of the sons of Heth, before all who went in at the gate of his city. ¹⁹Following this, Abraham laid Sarah his wife to rest in the cave at the field of Machpelah, facing Mamre (that is, Hebron) in the land of Canaan. ²⁰And the field and the cave that is in it were established to Abraham as a possession for a burial site, from the sons of Heth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'The years of the life of Sarah' (shenei chayyei Sarah) — the closing phrase repeats and summarizes the opening, a solemn literary envelope. The Hebrew breaks the number into three segments — 'one hundred years and twenty years and seven years' — with the word shanah ('year') repeated after each unit, which is unusual. The Midrash (Genesis Rabbah 58:1) famously interprets this: at one hundred she was like twenty in beauty, and at twenty she was like seven in sinlessness. Whether or not one follows the homiletical reading, the structure is deliberate and dignified, marking Sarah as the only woman in the Torah whose age at death is recorded.
1. Sarah is 127 years old. Since she was 90 when Isaac was born (17:17), Isaac is now 37. This chronological marker places the Akedah (chapter 22) shortly before Sarah's death in the narrative sequence, though the text does not explicitly connect the two events.
2. 'To mourn for Sarah and to weep for her' (lispod leSarah velibkotah) — the two verbs represent distinct acts: saphad is the formal public lamentation (eulogy, mourning rites), while bakhah is the private, personal weeping. Abraham performs both: the public duty and the private grief. The order — formal mourning first, then weeping — may suggest that Abraham fulfilled the communal obligation before giving way to personal sorrow.
2. 'Kiriath-arba, that is, Hebron' (Qiryat Arba hi Chevron) — the narrator provides the later name for readers who would know the city as Hebron. Kiriath-arba means 'city of four' (or 'city of Arba'), possibly referring to a founder or to four associated settlements. Hebron, from the root ch-b-r ('to join, associate'), becomes one of the most significant sites in patriarchal history and later a Levitical city of refuge.
2. 'Abraham came' (vayyavo Avraham) — the verb implies Abraham was not present when Sarah died. He 'came' to her, suggesting he may have been at Beer-sheba (cf. 22:19) while Sarah remained at Hebron. This detail, understated in the narrative, adds pathos: Abraham arrives to find his wife already gone.
3. 'Rose up from before his dead' (vayyaqom me'al penei meto) — the phrase 'his dead' (meto) is stark and tender. Sarah is now 'his dead' — the one who belongs to him even in death. Abraham rises from mourning to attend to the practical necessity of burial, a transition from grief to purposeful action. The verb qum ('to rise') marks a deliberate shift.
3. 'The sons of Heth' (benei-Chet) — the Hittites, descendants of Heth son of Canaan (10:15). These are the local inhabitants of Hebron with whom Abraham must negotiate. The entire negotiation that follows is conducted with remarkable formality and mutual courtesy, reflecting Ancient Near Eastern diplomatic conventions.
4. 'A stranger and a sojourner' (ger vetoshav) — Abraham identifies himself with two terms: ger, a resident alien with some recognized status but no land rights, and toshav, a temporary dweller or settler. Together they express Abraham's paradoxical position: he lives among these people, has wealth and influence, yet owns no land. The man to whom God promised 'all this land' (13:15) must negotiate to purchase a burial plot. The theological irony is profound — the heir of the promise is still a landless alien.
4. 'A possession of a burial site' (achuzzat-qever) — the word achuzzah means a permanent holding, a secured property. Abraham does not ask for a temporary arrangement; he seeks permanent, legally binding ownership. This will become the first piece of the promised land that Abraham actually possesses — and it is acquired not for living but for dying.
5. This verse introduces the Hittites' formal response to Abraham's request. The public nature of this exchange — conducted at the city gate before witnesses — is essential to the legal validity of any transaction that follows. Ancient Near Eastern land transfers required public witnesses to be binding.
6. 'A prince of God' (nesi Elohim) — the Hittites bestow an extraordinary title on Abraham. Nasi means 'prince, chief, exalted one,' and Elohim here functions as a superlative: 'a prince of God' meaning 'a mighty prince,' 'a divinely great prince,' or possibly 'a prince before God.' The KJV's 'mighty prince' captures the superlative sense; the rendering retains the literal form to preserve the theological resonance. The Hittites recognize Abraham's stature even though he calls himself a mere ger.
6. 'In the choicest of our tombs' (bemivchar qevareinu) — mivchar means 'the best, the choicest, the select.' The Hittites offer Abraham premier burial sites. This appears generous, but in the context of ANE negotiation, it may be a polite deflection — offering use of existing tombs rather than selling land outright. Abraham, however, wants permanent ownership, not a favor.
7. 'Bowed himself' (vayyishtachu) — the verb hishtachavah means to prostrate oneself, to bow low in respect. Abraham's bow is a gesture of honor and diplomatic courtesy, not worship. It is part of the formal protocol of negotiation. Despite being called 'a prince of God,' Abraham shows deference to the local community — a model of gracious humility in social dealings.
7. 'The people of the land' (am ha'arets) — here the phrase simply means the local inhabitants, the landed citizens. In later biblical and rabbinic usage, am ha'arets takes on different connotations, but here it designates those with legal standing to transact property.
8. 'If it is your desire' (im yesh et-nafshekhem) — literally, 'if it is with your soul/desire.' The word nephesh here means 'will, desire, inclination.' Abraham frames his request as contingent on their goodwill, a masterstroke of diplomatic rhetoric. He does not presume; he asks whether they are truly willing.
8. 'Intercede for me with Ephron' (pig'u-li be'Efron) — the verb paga' means 'to meet, to encounter, to intercede.' Abraham asks the community to act as intermediaries in approaching Ephron specifically. He has a particular property in mind and uses the community as leverage, ensuring the transaction has public sanction. This is not random; Abraham knows exactly what he wants.

9. 'The cave of Machpelah' (me'arat hammakhpelah) — the name Machpelah likely derives from the root k-p-l meaning 'to double,' suggesting either a double cave (two chambers), a cave on a doubled/folded piece of land, or a cave at the doubling of the terrain. This cave becomes the most important burial site in the patriarchal narrative: Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah will all be buried here (49:29–31).
9. 'For the full price' (bekesef male) — literally, 'for full silver.' Abraham insists on paying the complete, fair market value. He will accept no discount or gift. This insistence on full payment ensures the transaction is legally unimpeachable — no one can later claim the property was merely lent, gifted conditionally, or that Abraham is indebted. The phrase reveals Abraham's determination to establish permanent, undisputed ownership.
9. 'In your presence' (betokhekem) — before witnesses. Abraham demands public transparency. The transaction must be witnessed by the community to have full legal force.
10. 'Sitting among the sons of Heth' (yoshev betokh benei-Chet) — Ephron is present at the gate, among the assembled citizens. He is not summoned from elsewhere; he is already there. Whether this is coincidence or divine providence, the narrative does not say, but Ephron's presence means the negotiation can proceed immediately and publicly.
10. 'All who went in at the gate of his city' (lekhol ba'ei sha'ar iro) — the city gate was the place of public assembly, legal proceedings, and commercial transactions in the ancient Near East. Those who 'go in at the gate' are the adult male citizens with legal standing. The repeated emphasis on public witnesses (vv. 10, 13, 16, 18) underscores the legal formality of the transaction.
11. Ephron's offer is rhetorically extravagant — he offers not just the cave but the entire field, and he repeats 'I give it' (natatti) three times. In Ancient Near Eastern negotiation, such public offers of generosity were expected as the opening position. They were not meant to be accepted at face value; rather, they elevated the offerer's social standing while initiating a bargaining process. The real price is yet to come.
11. 'The field I give to you, and the cave that is in it' — Ephron expands the transaction from the cave alone (which Abraham requested) to the cave plus the field. This seemingly generous addition may have practical and fiscal implications: owning the field could entail tax or feudal obligations that Ephron would be happy to transfer. By including the field, Ephron may be unburdening himself while appearing magnanimous.
12. Abraham bows again — a second prostration (cf. v. 7). This repeated gesture of deference acknowledges the community's role as witnesses and shows respect for Ephron's offer, even though Abraham intends to decline the gift and insist on paying. The bow maintains diplomatic decorum as the negotiation continues.
13. 'I will give the price of the field' (natatti kesef hassadeh) — Abraham counters Ephron's offer of a gift with an insistence on payment. The verb natatti ('I give/have given') mirrors Ephron's threefold natatti in v. 11 — but Abraham's 'giving' is of silver, not land. The verbal symmetry creates a polite but firm rebuttal: 'You offer to give; I insist on giving — money.'
13. 'Take it from me' (qach mimmenni) — the imperative qach ('take!') expresses urgency and determination. Abraham is not merely willing to pay; he positively insists that Ephron accept payment. This is a man who understands that a gift with strings attached is not true ownership.
14. This brief transitional verse introduces Ephron's counter-offer. The negotiation has moved through its expected stages: Abraham's initial request (v. 4), the community's gracious response (vv. 5–6), Abraham's specific request for Machpelah (vv. 7–9), Ephron's offer of a gift (vv. 10–11), Abraham's insistence on paying (vv. 12–13), and now the price will be named.
15. 'Four hundred shekels of silver' (arba me'ot sheqel-kesef) — Ephron names his price while pretending it is trivial: 'What is that between me and you?' The price, however, is extraordinarily high. For comparison, Jeremiah later bought a field at Anathoth for 17 shekels (Jeremiah 32:9), David bought the threshing floor of Araunah for 50 shekels (2 Samuel 24:24), and Omri purchased the hill of Samaria for two talents (about 6,000 shekels, but for a much larger parcel — 1 Kings 16:24). Four hundred shekels for a field with a cave is exorbitant. Ephron's affected nonchalance ('What is that between friends?') masks a shrewd asking price.
15. The rhetorical strategy is classic ANE bargaining: the extravagant offer of a gift (v. 11) was never truly meant to be accepted; it served to place Ephron in a position of magnanimity, from which he now names a very high price that Abraham can hardly refuse without appearing ungrateful.
16. 'Abraham listened to Ephron' (vayyishma Avraham el-Efron) — Abraham accepts the price without haggling. This is remarkable. The expected pattern in ANE negotiation would include a counter-offer; Abraham's immediate acceptance signals that securing the property matters more to him than the price. He will not risk losing Machpelah over a few shekels.
16. 'Weighed out' (vayyishqol) — the verb shaqal ('to weigh') is the root of sheqel. Before coinage, silver was weighed on balance scales. The transaction is precise, public, and formal.
16. 'Current among the merchants' (over lassoher) — literally, 'passing to/for the merchant.' This phrase indicates silver of standard weight and purity, acceptable in commercial trade — not debased or underweight. Abraham pays in universally recognized currency, ensuring no dispute about the adequacy of payment.
17. 'Was established' (vayyaqom) — the verb qum here means 'to arise, to stand, to be established/confirmed.' The field 'arose' — that is, it was legally confirmed, formally transferred. This is legal language indicating the completion of the transaction.
17. The detailed inventory — 'the field and the cave that is in it, and all the trees that are in the field, within all its borders all around' — reads like a property deed. The specificity mirrors Ancient Near Eastern real estate documents recovered from sites like Nuzi and Alalakh, which similarly enumerate the field, structures, trees, and boundaries. The biblical text preserves the legal precision of the original transaction.

- 18. 'As Abraham's possession' (le'Avraham lemiqnah) — the word miqnah means 'a purchase, an acquisition, a possession obtained by buying.' The property is now formally Abraham's — not borrowed, not gifted, not lent, but purchased and legally secured.
- 18. 'In the presence of the sons of Heth, before all who went in at the gate of his city' — the final legal formula confirms the transaction before the full assembly of witnesses. Verses 17–18 together function as the deed of sale, formally recording the transfer. This is the first legal land acquisition in the Bible and the first tangible foothold of the Abrahamic promise in the land of Canaan.
- 19. 'Abraham buried Sarah his wife' — the tenderness of this simple statement should not be overlooked. After the elaborate negotiation, the narrative returns to its emotional core: a husband burying his wife. The legal transaction was not an end in itself but a means to this deeply personal act of love and honor.
- 19. 'The cave of the field of Machpelah, before Mamre' — the full designation combines cave, field, and landmark (Mamre, where Abraham had long dwelt and where the LORD appeared to him in chapter 18). Sarah is buried near the place of divine encounter — the oaks of Mamre where three visitors announced Isaac's birth.
- 20. 'Were established to Abraham as a possession for a burial site, from the sons of Heth' — the chapter ends as it began, with legal precision. The verb qum ('to be established') reaffirms the permanence of the transfer. The inclusion of 'from the sons of Heth' names the source of the property and the legal authority behind the transfer.
- 20. This closing verse is a summary statement that seals the chapter's central accomplishment: Abraham now owns land in Canaan. It is a burial plot — a place for death, not for building a city — yet it represents the first concrete fulfillment of the land promise. The entire promised land is anticipated in this single field. What begins as a grave becomes a claim, and what begins as mourning becomes a foundation for the future. Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah will all be gathered here (49:29–31; 50:13).

Summary: Abraham sends his senior servant to Mesopotamia to find a wife for Isaac from among his kinfolk. The servant prays for a sign at the well and meets Rebekah, who fulfills it precisely. After recounting the story to her family, he brings her back. Rebekah sees Isaac, veils herself, and becomes his wife. Isaac loves her and is comforted after his mother's death.

What Makes This Remarkable: At 67 verses, this is the longest chapter in Genesis and the Bible's most detailed courtship narrative. The servant's prayer — 'let her be the one' (v. 14) — is answered before he finishes praying (v. 15), demonstrating a theology of divine guidance operating through ordinary human events. The word chesed ('faithful love/steadfast love') anchors the theology: the servant asks for it (v. 12), recognizes it (v. 27), and credits God with it (v. 49). The story is told twice — once in narrative and once in the servant's retelling — with subtle variations that show him shaping the account for his audience.

Translation Friction: The oath-taking gesture of placing a hand 'under the thigh' (v. 2) is a euphemism whose precise meaning has been debated — possibly touching the procreative organ, connecting the oath to the promises of offspring. We rendered it literally and noted the cultural context. The servant's word chesed (v. 12) resists any single English equivalent; we used 'faithful love' here, noting its range of covenant loyalty, kindness, and gracious commitment.

Connections: The well-meeting scene establishes a type-scene that recurs with Jacob and Rachel (29:1–12) and Moses and Zipporah (Exodus 2:15–21). Rebekah's family blessing — 'may your offspring possess the gate of those who hate them' (24:60) — echoes God's blessing to Abraham (22:17). Isaac's dwelling at Beer-lahai-roi (24:62) connects him to Hagar's well of divine seeing (16:14).

¹And Abraham was old, advanced in days, and the LORD had blessed Abraham in all things. ²And Abraham said to his servant, the elder of his household, who ruled over all that he had, "Put your hand under my thigh. ³I want you to take an oath by the LORD, the God of heaven and earth, that you will not select a wife for my son from among the Canaanite women, in whose land I am living. ⁴But to my land and to my kindred you shall go, and you shall take a wife for my son, for Isaac." ⁵And the servant said to him, "Perhaps the woman will not be willing to follow me to this land. Must I then bring your son back to the land from which you came?" ⁶And Abraham said to him, "Take care that you do not bring my son back there. ⁷The LORD, the God of heaven, who took me from my father's house and from the land of my birth, and who spoke to me and who swore to me, saying, 'To your offspring I will give this land' — He will send His angel before you, and you shall take a wife for my son from there. ⁸And if the woman is not willing to follow you, then you shall be free from this oath of mine. Only do not bring my son back there." ⁹So the servant placed his hand beneath Abraham his master's thigh and took the oath regarding this commitment. ¹⁰And the servant took ten camels from the camels of his master and departed, with all manner of good things from his master in his hand. And he arose and went to Aram-naharaim, to the city of Nahor. ¹¹And he made the camels kneel down outside the city by the well of water, at evening time, the time when the women go out to draw water. ¹²And he said, "O LORD, God of my master Abraham, please grant me success today, and show faithful love to my master Abraham. ¹³Behold, I am standing by the spring of water, and the daughters of the men of the city are coming out to draw water. ¹⁴Let it be that the young woman to whom I say, 'Please lower your jar that I may drink,' and she says, 'Drink, and I will water your camels also' — let her be the one whom You have appointed for Your servant Isaac. And by this I shall know that You have shown steadfast love to my master." ¹⁵Even before he had finished praying, Rebekah appeared — the daughter of Bethuel, who was the son of Milcah the wife of Abraham's brother Nahor — carrying her jar on her shoulder. ¹⁶And the young woman was very beautiful in appearance, a virgin — no man had known her. And she went down to the spring and filled her jar and came up. ¹⁷And the servant ran to meet her and said, "Please let me drink a little water from your jar." ¹⁸And she said, "Drink, my lord." And she quickly lowered her jar upon her hand and gave him a drink. ¹⁹And when she had finished giving him a drink, she said, "I will draw water for your camels also, until they have finished drinking." ²⁰And she quickly emptied her jar into the trough and ran again to the well to draw, and she drew water for all his camels. ²¹And the man gazed at her in silence, wondering whether the LORD had made his journey successful or not. ²²And it came to pass, when the camels had finished drinking, that the man took a gold ring, a half-shekel in weight, and two bracelets for her hands, ten shekels of gold in weight, ²³and said, "Whose daughter are you? Please tell me — is there room in your father's house for us to lodge?" ²⁴She answered, "I am Bethuel's daughter — Bethuel the son of Milcah, whom Milcah bore to Nahor." ²⁵And she said to him, "We have both straw and feed in abundance, and also room to lodge." ²⁶The servant knelt down and offered worship to the LORD. ²⁷And he said, "Blessed be the LORD, the God of my master Abraham, who has not forsaken His steadfast love and His faithfulness toward my master. As for me, the LORD has led me on the way to the house of my master's kinsmen." ²⁸And the young woman ran and told her mother's household about these things. ²⁹Now Rebekah had a brother, and his name was Laban. And Laban ran out to the man, to the spring. ³⁰And it came to pass, when he saw the ring and the bracelets on his sister's hands, and when he heard the words of Rebekah his sister, saying, "Thus the man spoke to me" — that he went out to the man, and behold, he was standing by the camels at the spring. ³¹And he said, "Come in, O blessed of the LORD! Why do you stand outside? For I have prepared the house, and a place for the camels." ³²And the man came into the house. And he ungirded the camels and gave straw and feed to the camels, and water to wash his feet and the feet of the men who were with him. ³³And food was set before him to eat, but he said, "I will not eat until I have spoken my words." And he said, "Speak." ³⁴He began, "I serve Abraham. ³⁵And the LORD has blessed my master greatly, and he has become great. He has given him flocks and herds, silver and gold, male servants and female servants, camels and donkeys. ³⁶And Sarah, my master's wife, bore a son to my master after she had grown old. And he has given him all that he has. ³⁷My master required an oath from me: 'You must not choose a wife for my son from among the Canaanite women in this land where I reside. ³⁸But to my father's house you shall go, and to my family, and take a wife for my son.' ³⁹And I said to my master, 'Perhaps the woman will not follow me.' ⁴⁰And he said to me, 'The LORD, before whom I have walked, will send His angel with you and prosper your way. And you shall take a wife for my son from my family and from my father's house. ⁴¹Then you shall be free from my oath, when you come to my family. And if they will not give her to you, then you shall be free from my oath.' ⁴²And I came today to the spring, and I said, 'O LORD, God of my master Abraham, if You are indeed prospering my way on which I am going — ⁴³behold, I am standing by the spring of water. Let it be that the young woman who comes out to draw water, to whom I say, "Please give me a little water from your jar to drink," ⁴⁴and she says to me, "Drink, and I will draw water for your camels also" — let her be the woman whom the LORD has appointed for my master's son.' ⁴⁵Before I had finished speaking in my heart, behold, Rebekah came out with her jar on her shoulder, and she went down to the spring and drew water. And I said to her, 'Please give me a drink.' ⁴⁶And she quickly lowered her jar from her shoulder and said, 'Drink, and I will water your camels also.' So I drank, and she watered the camels also. ⁴⁷And I asked her and said, 'Whose daughter are you?' And she said, 'The daughter of Bethuel the son of Nahor, whom Milcah bore to him.' And I put the ring on her nose and the bracelets on her hands. ⁴⁸And I bowed my head and worshipped the LORD, and I blessed the LORD, the God of my master Abraham, who had led me in the way of truth to take the daughter of my master's brother for his son. ⁴⁹And now, if you will deal with steadfast love and faithfulness toward my master, tell me. And if not, tell me, that I may turn to the right or to the left." ⁵⁰And Laban and Bethuel answered and said, "The thing has come from the LORD. We cannot speak to you bad or good. ⁵¹Behold, Rebekah is before you. Take her and go, and let her be a wife to your master's son, as the LORD has spoken." ⁵²And it came to pass, when Abraham's servant heard their words, that he bowed himself to the ground before the LORD. ⁵³And the servant brought out articles of silver and articles of gold and garments, and gave them to Rebekah. And he gave precious things to her brother and to her mother. ⁵⁴And they ate and drank, he and the men who were with him, and they spent the night. And they rose in the morning, and he said, "Send me away to my master." ⁵⁵And her brother and her mother said, "Let the young woman remain with us a few days, at least ten. After that she may go." ⁵⁶And he said to them, "Do not delay me, since the LORD has prospered my way. Send me away that I may go to my master." ⁵⁷And they said, "Let us call the young woman and ask her." ⁵⁸So they summoned Rebekah and asked her, "Are you willing to go with this man?" She replied, "I am willing." ⁵⁹They sent off their sister Rebekah along with her nursemaid, Abraham's servant, and his attendants. ⁶⁰And they blessed Rebekah and said to her, "Our sister, may you become thousands of ten thousands, and may your offspring possess the gate of those who hate them." ⁶¹And Rebekah arose, and her young women, and they rode upon the camels and followed the man. So the servant took Rebekah and departed. ⁶²Now Isaac had come from the region of Beer-lahai-roi, for he was dwelling in the land of the Negev. ⁶³And Isaac went out to meditate in the field toward evening. And he lifted up his eyes and looked, and behold, camels were coming. ⁶⁴And Rebekah lifted up her eyes, and when she saw Isaac, she dismounted from the camel. ⁶⁵And she said to the servant, "Who is this man walking in the field to meet us?" And the servant said, "He is my master." So she took her veil and covered herself. ⁶⁶The servant then recounted to Isaac everything that had taken place. ⁶⁷And Isaac brought her into the tent of Sarah his mother. And he took Rebekah, and she became his wife, and he loved her. And Isaac was comforted after his mother's death.

1. 'Advanced in days' (ba bayyamim) — literally, 'he had come into the days.' The idiom conveys not merely old age but the fullness of a long life experienced. Abraham has 'entered into' his days — he has lived them fully. He is approximately 140 years old at this point (Sarah died at 127 when Abraham was 137, and some time has passed).
1. 'The LORD had blessed Abraham in all things' (vaYHWH berakh et-Avraham bakkol) — this sweeping summary sets the stage for Abraham's final major act: securing a wife for Isaac. The word bakkol ('in all, in everything') encompasses wealth, descendants, land, and divine favor. Yet one critical matter remains: Isaac is unmarried, and the covenant line requires continuation.
2. 'The elder of his household, who ruled over all that he had' — the servant is unnamed here, though tradition identifies him as Eliezer of Damascus (15:2). He is Abraham's most trusted steward, the chief administrator of all his affairs. The magnitude of the mission — choosing a wife for the covenant heir — is entrusted to this one man.
2. 'Put your hand under my thigh' (sim-na yadkha tachat yerekhi) — the thigh (yarekh) is a euphemism for the procreative organ. This oath gesture involves placing the hand near the source of progeny, invoking the unborn descendants as witnesses to the oath. The practice underscores that the oath concerns the future of Abraham's line. Some interpreters connect it to the covenant of circumcision — swearing by the sign of the covenant itself. The gesture appears only here and in 47:29 (Jacob's oath to Joseph).
3. 'The LORD, the God of heaven and the God of the earth' (YHWH Elohei hashamayim ve'Elohei ha'arets) — the most expansive divine title Abraham uses. It asserts YHWH's universal sovereignty over both heavenly and earthly realms, establishing the cosmic weight of this oath. The God who rules all creation is invoked as guarantor of the servant's mission.
3. 'You shall not take a wife for my son from the daughters of the Canaanites' — Abraham's prohibition is categorical. The concern is not racial but religious and covenantal: the Canaanite culture was saturated with practices incompatible with the worship of YHWH. Inter-marriage would risk the dilution or abandonment of covenant faithfulness. This concern becomes a recurring theme (cf. 26:34–35; 27:46; 28:1).
4. 'To my land and to my kindred' (el-artsi ve'el-moladi) — Abraham sends the servant back to Mesopotamia, to the family from which Abraham himself came. The word moledeth means 'kindred, birthplace, native land.' Abraham left this land in obedience to God's call (12:1); now he reaches back to it for a bride. The logic is not ethnic purity but covenantal compatibility: the family of Terah, though not yet monotheistic, is at least not Canaanite and may be more receptive to the God of Abraham.

4. 'For my son, for Isaac' (livni leYitschaq) — the double specification ('my son... Isaac') echoes the style of 22:2 ('your son, your only son, whom you love — Isaac'). Isaac is again singled out with particular emphasis as the heir through whom everything continues.
5. The servant raises a practical objection: what if the woman refuses to relocate? His solution — take Isaac to Mesopotamia — seems logical but would undermine the entire covenantal geography. Abraham's departure from Mesopotamia was itself an act of obedience; returning Isaac would reverse the trajectory of the divine call.
5. 'Perhaps' (ulay) — the servant's caution is reasonable, not faithless. He is thinking through contingencies. But Abraham's response in vv. 6–8 will reveal that for Abraham, some contingencies are simply not acceptable.
6. 'Take care' (hishamer lekha) — literally, 'guard yourself.' This is a stern warning, not a gentle suggestion. The reflexive form (hishamer) emphasizes personal responsibility: 'You yourself must be on guard against this.' Abraham's tone shifts from request to command. Isaac must not go to Mesopotamia under any circumstances. The promised land is not merely a preference; it is a theological necessity.
7. 'He will send His angel before you' (hu yishlach mal'akho lefanekha) — Abraham's confidence rests not on the servant's skill but on divine providence. The angel (mal'akh, 'messenger') goes ahead as a divine advance guard, preparing the way. Abraham has learned through decades of experience that God orchestrates events according to His promises. This is not presumption but mature faith: Abraham trusts the God who has spoken and sworn.
7. 'Who took me from my father's house' (asher leqachani mibbeit avi) — Abraham recounts his own story as the ground of his confidence. The same God who initiated the journey will bring it to completion. The verbs accumulate — 'took me,' 'spoke to me,' 'swore to me' — building a case from personal experience that God finishes what He starts.
7. 'To your offspring I will give this land' (leazar'akha etten et-ha'arets hazzot) — Abraham quotes the divine promise (cf. 12:7; 13:15; 15:18). The land promise is the theological anchor for keeping Isaac in Canaan. If the offspring must inherit this land, then the heir must remain in it.
8. 'You shall be free from this oath' (veniqa mishvu'ati zot) — the verb niqah means 'to be clean, free, acquitted.' Abraham provides a contingency that releases the servant from obligation if the woman refuses — but the prohibition against taking Isaac back stands regardless. The oath has a built-in escape clause, demonstrating Abraham's reasonableness, but the non-negotiable principle remains: Isaac stays in Canaan.
8. 'Only do not bring my son back there' (raq et-beni lo tashev shammah) — the word raq ('only, but') introduces the one absolute condition. Abraham repeats this prohibition from v. 6, framing his instructions with it. The servant may fail to find a wife, but he must not fail in this: Isaac does not go back. The promised land holds the heir, not the other way around.
9. The oath is solemnized. The servant physically commits — hand under thigh — and verbally commits — 'swore to him.' The narrative moves from instruction to oath to action without delay, reflecting the urgency and importance of the mission.
10. 'Ten camels' — a substantial caravan indicating wealth and the seriousness of the mission. Ten camels could carry considerable cargo — gifts, provisions, and trade goods. The size of the entourage would also serve as a visible demonstration of Abraham's prosperity to the prospective bride's family.
10. 'Aram-naharaim' (Aram Naharayim) — literally, 'Aram of the two rivers,' referring to the region of upper Mesopotamia between the Euphrates and Habur rivers (or Euphrates and Tigris). The KJV renders it 'Mesopotamia' (from Greek, also meaning 'between rivers'). This is the ancestral homeland of Abraham's family.
10. 'The city of Nahor' (ir Nachor) — either a city belonging to or named after Abraham's brother Nahor, or the city where Nahor settled. This is likely Haran or a nearby settlement in the region of Paddan-aram.
11. 'Made the camels kneel down' (vayyavrekh haggemalim) — the verb barakh in the Hiphil means 'to cause to kneel.' The camels are settled for rest, and the servant positions himself strategically at the well. Wells were social gathering points, especially in the evening when women came to draw water for the household. The servant's timing is deliberate — he arrives when he is most likely to encounter eligible women.
11. 'The time when the women go out to draw water' (le'et tset hasho'avot) — this detail sets the scene for the pivotal encounter. The well as a meeting place for future spouses is a recurring biblical type-scene (cf. Jacob and Rachel at the well in 29:1–12; Moses and Zipporah at the well in Exodus 2:15–21). The servant positions himself within this culturally expected framework.
12. 'O LORD, God of my master Abraham' (YHWH Elohei adoni Avraham) — the servant does not call YHWH 'my God' but 'the God of my master Abraham.' This may indicate that the servant's own relationship with YHWH is mediated through Abraham, or it may be a deliberate rhetorical appeal: 'For the sake of Abraham, who serves You — act on his behalf.'
12. 'Grant me success' (haqreh-na lefanay) — literally, 'cause to happen before me.' The verb qarah means 'to happen, to encounter, to occur.' The servant asks God to orchestrate a providential encounter — not mere luck but divinely arranged circumstance.
12. 'Show steadfast love' (aseh-chesed) — chesed is one of the richest words in the Hebrew Bible: steadfast love, loyal love, covenant faithfulness, lovingkindness. The servant asks God to demonstrate chesed toward Abraham by making this mission succeed. The word will recur throughout the chapter (vv. 14, 27, 49) as the theological lens through which the entire narrative is interpreted.
13. The servant describes his position — standing by the well — and the circumstance — women are coming to draw water. He sets the scene for the specific sign he is about to request from God.

14. 'The one whom You have appointed' (otah hokhachta) — the verb yakhach in the Hiphil means 'to decide, to prove, to appoint, to designate.' The servant asks for a specific, observable sign by which God's choice will be made evident. The sign is not arbitrary but reveals character: a woman who not only gives water to a stranger but volunteers to water ten thirsty camels demonstrates extraordinary generosity, initiative, and physical stamina.
14. 'I will water your camels also' — a single camel can drink 20–30 gallons of water after a long journey. Ten camels could require 200–300 gallons. Drawing this water by hand from a well with a jar is enormous labor — possibly hours of work. The servant's test identifies a woman of remarkable energy, generosity, and willingness to serve beyond what is asked.
14. 'By this I shall know that You have shown steadfast love (chesed) to my master' — the sign, when fulfilled, will be interpreted not as coincidence but as divine chesed in action. Providence is recognized through specific, confirmable events.
15. 'Before he had finished speaking' (terem killah ledabber) — the swiftness of the answer is stunning. The servant has not even completed his prayer when Rebekah appears. This is not merely efficient timing; it is a narrative signal of divine responsiveness. God answers before the asking is done (cf. Isaiah 65:24, 'Before they call I will answer').
15. 'Rebekah' (Rivqah) — her name may derive from a root meaning 'to tie, to bind' or 'to fatten' (as in a young cow/heifer), though the etymology is uncertain. She is introduced with her full genealogy: daughter of Bethuel, granddaughter of Milcah and Nahor (Abraham's brother). She is Abraham's grand-niece — family, as Abraham specified.
15. 'Her jar upon her shoulder' — the image is vivid and concrete. Rebekah is actively engaged in the daily labor of drawing water. She is not idle, not waiting to be found; she is working. The jar on the shoulder indicates she has come to the well for its intended purpose.
16. 'Very beautiful in appearance' (tovat mar'eh me'od) — the narrator provides physical description, as with Sarah (12:11) and later Rachel (29:17). Beauty in the patriarchal narratives is noted but is never the primary criterion for divine selection; character and action are what matter.
16. 'A virgin — no man had known her' (betulah ve'ish lo yeda'ah) — the word betulah denotes a young woman of marriageable age, and the clarifying phrase 'no man had known her' (using yada' in its sexual sense) makes the virginity explicit. This double statement ensures there is no ambiguity about her status. She is eligible and unattached.
16. 'She went down to the spring and filled her jar and came up' — the verbs convey purposeful, unself-conscious activity. Rebekah descends, fills, ascends — she is capable, industrious, and going about her ordinary routine. The extraordinary encounter is about to intersect with the ordinary.
17. 'Ran to meet her' (vayyarots liqratah) — the servant runs. The urgency reflects his recognition that this moment may be the answer to his prayer. He does not passively wait; he acts on the opportunity. The verb ruts ('to run') conveys eagerness and purposefulness.
17. 'A little water' (me'at-mayim) — the servant asks modestly, requesting only 'a little.' This restrained request is part of the test: will she offer merely what is asked, or will she go beyond? The sign requires her to volunteer to water the camels — something the servant deliberately does not request.
18. 'Drink, my lord' (sheteh adoni) — Rebekah responds immediately and respectfully. She addresses a stranger as 'my lord' (adoni), showing courtesy. She does not hesitate or question why a stranger is asking her for water.
18. 'She quickly lowered her jar' (vatemaher vattored kaddah) — the verb mahar ('to hasten') is characteristic of Rebekah. She acts with speed and energy. This haste is not nervousness but readiness — a willingness to serve that does not calculate or delay.
19. 'I will draw water for your camels also, until they have finished drinking' (gam ligmallekha esh'av ad im-killu lishtot) — this is the moment the servant has been waiting for. Rebekah volunteers exactly what the sign required: water for the camels. And she does not offer a token gesture ('I'll draw a little for them too') but commits to the full task: 'until they have finished drinking.' This is a pledge of enormous labor — potentially hours of carrying water for ten thirsty camels. The word gam ('also') is the crucial addition: she goes beyond what was asked.
20. 'She quickly emptied... and ran again... and drew for all his camels' — three verbs of vigorous action in rapid succession: emptied (vateta'ar), ran (vattarots), drew (vattish'av). Rebekah's energy is extraordinary. She does not walk; she runs. She does not offer halfheartedly; she draws for all the camels. The narrative emphasizes her physical vigor and wholehearted generosity through the accumulation of active verbs.
21. 'Gazed at her in silence' (mishtae'eh lah macharish) — two remarkable words. Mishtae'eh (from sha'ah, 'to gaze, to be astonished') describes rapt, wondering attention — the servant watches Rebekah with astonishment. Macharish means 'being silent, holding one's peace.' He says nothing. This is the silence of a man witnessing what may be a miracle unfolding before his eyes. He does not interrupt; he does not prompt; he watches and waits to see whether God is at work.
21. 'Whether the LORD had made his journey successful or not' — despite the sign matching perfectly, the servant does not leap to conclusions. He holds his judgment in suspense until the full picture emerges. This is patient, discerning faith — not demanding instant certainty but waiting for confirmation.
22. 'A gold ring, a half-shekel in weight' (nezem zahav beqa mishqalo) — the nezem is a ring, likely a nose ring (cf. v. 47 where it is placed on her nose). A beqa is half a shekel, approximately 5.7 grams of gold. The gift is precious but not overwhelming — a sign of serious interest.
22. 'Two bracelets... ten shekels of gold' (shenei tsemidim... asarah zahav mishqalam) — each bracelet weighs five shekels of gold (approximately 57 grams each, or about 2 ounces). These are substantial gifts of considerable value. The servant presents them only after the sign has been fulfilled — the camels have finished drinking. He waited until Rebekah had fully demonstrated her character before offering gifts.

23. 'Whose daughter are you?' (bat-mi att) — this is the critical question. The servant needs to know if Rebekah belongs to Abraham's family. Her identity will confirm or deny whether the sign was truly from God. The servant's restraint is notable: he gave the gifts before asking her identity, demonstrating trust that God had indeed guided him, while also needing the genealogical confirmation.
24. 'The daughter of Bethuel the son of Milcah, whom she bore to Nahor' — Rebekah's genealogy confirms everything: she is the granddaughter of Nahor, Abraham's brother. The servant's prayer has been answered in every particular. The precision of her lineage — not just 'of Nahor's family' but the exact line through Milcah and Bethuel — mirrors the specificity of Abraham's instructions.
25. 'Straw and feed in abundance, and also room to lodge' — Rebekah goes beyond answering the servant's question. He asked only about lodging; she volunteers that they have provisions for the camels as well (straw for bedding, mispo' for feed). Her generosity and hospitality continue to exceed what is asked — the same pattern of going beyond that characterized her offer to water the camels.
26. 'Bowed his head and worshipped the LORD' (vayyiqqod... vayyishtachu laYHWH) — two acts: qadad means to bow the head, and hishtachavah means to prostrate oneself in worship. The servant's immediate response to confirmation is worship. He does not congratulate himself on clever planning; he worships the God who arranged the encounter. This is faith recognizing providence.
27. 'His steadfast love and His faithfulness' (chasdo va'amitto) — the pairing of chesed and emet is one of the great theological dyads of the Hebrew Bible. Chesed is loyal love that keeps its commitments; emet is truth, reliability, faithfulness. Together they describe God's character as both lovingly committed and utterly dependable. God's love is not fickle, and His truth is not cold — they are fused in His dealings with His people.
27. 'The LORD has led me on the way' (badderekh nachani YHWH) — the servant testifies that God actively guided him. The word derekh ('way, road, journey') takes on theological significance: God does not merely permit the journey; He directs it step by step. The verb nachah ('to lead, to guide') echoes the language of divine guidance throughout the Psalms (23:3; 27:11; 31:3).
28. 'Ran' (vattarots) — Rebekah runs again. She is consistently portrayed as energetic and decisive. She ran to water camels; now she runs to share the news.
28. 'Her mother's household' (beit immah) — not her father's house but her mother's. This designation may reflect the social structure of the household, where women's quarters (the 'mother's tent') were distinct, or it may hint at Bethuel's diminished role (he appears only briefly in v. 50). Laban, Rebekah's brother, emerges as the family's active representative.
29. 'Laban' (Lavan) — the name means 'white.' This is the first appearance of Laban, who will become a major figure in the Jacob narrative (chapters 29–31). His introduction here is brief but revealing: the next verse will suggest that his eagerness is motivated at least in part by the sight of valuable gifts.
30. 'When he saw the ring and the bracelets' — the narrator mentions what Laban saw before what he heard. The sequence may be deliberate: Laban's eyes fall first on the gold. This subtle detail begins a characterization that will become explicit in the Jacob narratives — Laban is a man motivated by material gain. His hospitality, while genuine in form, has mercenary undertones.
30. The narrator notes that the servant is 'standing by the camels at the spring' — ten camels loaded with goods. The visual impression of wealth reinforces Laban's motivation to extend hospitality.
31. 'Blessed of the LORD' (berukh YHWH) — Laban uses YHWH's name, suggesting some familiarity with or acknowledgment of Abraham's God. Whether this reflects genuine faith or diplomatic courtesy is debatable; Laban will later invoke YHWH and other deities interchangeably (31:49–53).
31. 'I have prepared the house, and a place for the camels' — Laban has moved quickly to arrange hospitality. Ancient Near Eastern customs of hospitality were sacred obligations, and Laban fulfills them with energy — though the narrator has already hinted at his underlying motivation.
32. 'He ungirded the camels' (vayfattach haggemalim) — the verb patach means 'to open, to loosen, to ungird.' The travel gear and loads are removed from the camels, indicating the caravan is settling in for a stay.
32. 'Water to wash his feet' — foot-washing is a standard element of ancient Near Eastern hospitality (cf. 18:4; 19:2; 43:24). After long travel on dusty roads, washing the feet was both practical hygiene and a gesture of welcome and care.
33. 'I will not eat until I have spoken my words' — the servant refuses to eat before completing his mission. In a culture where sharing a meal carried covenantal implications and created bonds of obligation, the servant's refusal to eat first ensures that the family's decision about Rebekah will not be influenced by the social pressure of having already accepted his hospitality. His mission takes priority over comfort and custom.
33. 'Speak' (dabber) — Laban (or Bethuel, or the household) grants permission. What follows (vv. 34–49) is one of the longest speeches in Genesis: the servant's retelling of the entire narrative.
34. 'I am Abraham's servant' (eved Avraham anokhi) — the servant identifies himself not by his own name but by his master's. His identity is defined by his relationship to Abraham. This self-designation establishes the authority behind his mission: he comes not on his own behalf but as the representative of a great man known in the region.
35. The servant catalogs Abraham's wealth in paired categories: flocks and herds, silver and gold, male and female servants, camels and donkeys. The enumeration serves a rhetorical purpose: it demonstrates to Rebekah's family that Isaac's bride will want for nothing. The wealth is attributed entirely to YHWH's blessing — 'the LORD has blessed my master' — framing Abraham's prosperity as divine favor, not mere human achievement.

36. 'After she had grown old' (acharei ziqnatah) — the servant highlights the miraculous nature of Isaac's birth: Sarah bore a son in her old age. This detail serves to present Isaac as a child of divine promise, not merely of natural procreation.
36. 'He has given him all that he has' — Isaac is Abraham's sole heir. Everything Abraham possesses will pass to Isaac. The bride who marries Isaac will marry into the full inheritance of Abraham's divinely blessed wealth. This is the servant's strongest selling point to the family.
37. The servant begins retelling Abraham's instructions. This retelling (vv. 37–48) is a characteristic feature of Hebrew narrative: events are narrated, then retold by a character within the story. The retelling is not identical to the original — there are subtle variations that reflect the servant's perspective and rhetorical goals.
38. 'My father's house... my family' (beit avi... mishpachti) — in the original instructions (v. 4), Abraham said 'my land and my kindred' (artsi... moladi). The servant's retelling shifts to 'my father's house and my family,' which is more specific and more personal. This rhetorical adjustment makes Abraham's request sound like a family reunion — emphasizing the kinship connection to Rebekah's household.
39. The servant recounts his own objection from v. 5 but abbreviates it, omitting the question about taking Isaac back. In the retelling, the servant streamlines the exchange, focusing on the essential question and Abraham's confident answer.
40. 'Before whom I have walked' (asher-hithallakhti lefanav) — in the original (v. 7), Abraham said 'who took me from my father's house.' The servant's retelling substitutes 'before whom I have walked,' using the language of covenant faithfulness (cf. 17:1, 'Walk before me and be blameless'). This variation is not error but rhetorical adaptation: the servant emphasizes Abraham's lifelong devotion to YHWH, presenting his master as a man of proven faith.
40. 'Will send His angel with you' — in v. 7, Abraham said 'before you' (lefanekha); here the servant says 'with you' (ittakh). The preposition shifts from 'ahead of' to 'alongside.' Both are true: God goes before to prepare and walks alongside to accompany.
41. 'Free from my oath' (naqi me'alati) — the word alah here means 'oath' (with the sense of 'curse/imprecation for oath-breaking'). The servant recounts the release clause: if the family refuses, he is absolved. Notably, the servant omits Abraham's emphatic repetition of 'do not take my son back there' (vv. 6, 8). In addressing Rebekah's family, this prohibition would be irrelevant and potentially offensive — they might wonder why returning to their land is so objectionable. The servant tailors his account to his audience.
42. The servant now retells his prayer at the well (originally vv. 12–14). Again, the retelling varies slightly from the original, condensing and adapting the language. He emphasizes the conditional nature of his request: 'if You are indeed prospering' — presenting himself as humbly seeking confirmation rather than demanding signs.
43. 'The young woman' (ha'almah) — in the original prayer (v. 14), the servant used na'arah ('young woman, girl'). Here in the retelling he uses almah, a word denoting a young woman of marriageable age. The two terms are largely synonymous in this context, though almah specifically connotes a maiden in the bloom of youth.
44. 'The woman whom the LORD has appointed' (ha'ishah asher-hokhiach YHWH leven adoni) — the verb yakhach again: 'appointed, designated, decided.' The servant frames the entire encounter as God's decision, not his own preference or Abraham's scheme. The right woman is the one YHWH designates through the sign.
45. 'Speaking in my heart' (ledabber el-libbi) — in the original (v. 15), the narrator simply said 'before he had finished speaking' (terem killah ledabber). The servant's retelling adds 'in my heart,' indicating that his prayer was silent, internal — a conversation with God conducted within, not spoken aloud. This detail reveals that even the prayer was private; Rebekah's appearance was not prompted by overhearing his words.
46. The servant's retelling matches the original events closely here, confirming Rebekah's swift, generous response. The fulfillment of the sign is presented directly to the family so they can judge for themselves: every element of the prayer was answered exactly as requested.
47. 'I put the ring on her nose' (va'asim hannezem al-appah) — this verse clarifies that the nezem is a nose ring (appah, 'her nose'), not an earring. In the original narration (v. 22), the servant 'took' the ring after the camels finished drinking; here he says he placed it on her nose after learning her identity. The slight reordering in the retelling may reflect the servant presenting his actions in the most fitting sequence for his audience — showing that he confirmed her identity before bestowing the gifts. Some scholars see this as the servant slightly reshaping events for rhetorical effect.
48. 'The way of truth' (derekh emet) — in v. 27, the servant said God had led him 'on the way' (badderekh); here he adds 'of truth' (emet). The path was not just any road but the way of faithfulness, the true path. Emet here carries the sense of 'reliability, trustworthiness, truth' — God's guidance is dependable and leads to the right destination.
48. 'The daughter of my master's brother' (bat-achi adoni) — the servant summarizes the genealogical connection: Rebekah is the granddaughter of Abraham's brother Nahor, making her Abraham's grand-niece. The kinship connection fulfills Abraham's requirement exactly.
49. 'Steadfast love and faithfulness' (chesed ve'emet) — the servant uses the same word pair he attributed to God in v. 27. The implication is powerful: just as God has shown chesed and emet toward Abraham, will this family do the same? He invites them to participate in God's own pattern of covenant faithfulness.
49. 'That I may turn to the right or to the left' — a practical statement: if the answer is no, the servant will seek elsewhere. But it also gently applies pressure: the servant has options, and delay or equivocation will simply send him in another direction. The family must decide.

50. 'The thing has come from the LORD' (meYHWH yatsa haddavar) — this is the decisive declaration. Laban and Bethuel recognize divine agency in the servant's account. The word davar ('thing, word, matter') has emerged 'from YHWH' — it originated with God, not with human scheming. Their acknowledgment removes any ground for refusal.
50. 'We cannot speak to you bad or good' — this idiom means 'we have nothing to say against it; it is settled.' They cannot oppose what God has arranged. The merism 'bad or good' encompasses every possible response — none is available to them. God's will has foreclosed debate.
50. Laban is named first, before his father Bethuel, suggesting Laban is the primary spokesman. Bethuel's role is minimal throughout the chapter, leading some commentators to speculate that he was elderly, infirm, or socially subordinate to his more assertive son.
51. 'As the LORD has spoken' (ka'asher dibber YHWH) — the family attributes the arrangement to YHWH's speech, His declared will. They frame their consent not as a concession but as obedience to divine direction. The phrase 'as the LORD has spoken' carries the weight of prophetic fulfillment — what God has determined is now being carried out.
52. 'He bowed himself to the ground before the LORD' — for the third time in the narrative (cf. vv. 26, 48), the servant worships. His instinct at every turning point is worship. Success does not produce self-congratulation but prostration before the God who brought it about. This pattern of worship punctuates the entire journey: prayer before action, worship after confirmation.
53. 'Articles of silver and articles of gold and garments' — bridal gifts (mohar) given to the bride herself. These are personal possessions that belong to Rebekah, not to her family.
53. 'Precious things to her brother and to her mother' (migdanot... le'achiha ule'immah) — separate gifts to Laban and Rebekah's mother (again, the father is not mentioned as a recipient). Migdanot are 'choice things, delicacies, precious items.' These gifts to the family are distinct from the bridal gifts — they secure the family's goodwill and formalize the agreement.
54. 'Send me away to my master' (shallechuni la'adoni) — now, with the agreement secured, the servant eats (cf. his refusal in v. 33). The next morning, he is eager to depart immediately. His single-minded devotion to his mission allows no lingering. He has accomplished what he was sent to do and seeks to return without delay.
55. 'A few days, at least ten' (yamim o asor) — the word yamim can mean 'days' or, idiomatically, 'a period of time' (even a year in some contexts). The addition 'at least ten' (o asor) suggests a minimum of ten days, possibly longer. The family wants more time with Rebekah before she leaves. This is understandable: they are losing a daughter and sister, and the departure is permanent — she will travel hundreds of miles to a land she has never seen.
55. 'Her brother and her mother' — again Bethuel is absent from the conversation. Laban and Rebekah's mother are the active decision-makers.
56. 'Do not delay me' (al-te'acharu oti) — the servant presses for immediate departure. His argument is theological: 'the LORD has prospered my way.' To delay is to impede what God has set in motion. The servant's urgency reflects his conviction that divine momentum should not be resisted by human sentiment, however natural that sentiment may be.
57. 'Let us call the young woman and ask her' (niqra lanna'ar venish'alah et-piha) — literally, 'let us ask her mouth.' This is a remarkable moment: the family will let Rebekah decide for herself. In a culture where marriage arrangements were typically made by male family members, Rebekah is given a voice. Her consent is sought. This is not merely procedural; the narrative presents her agency as essential to the story's resolution.
58. 'Will you go with this man? And she said, I will go' (hatekhi im-ha'ish hazzeh vattomer elekh) — the question is direct and the answer is decisive. Elekh — 'I will go.' One word. No hesitation, no conditions, no request for more time. Rebekah's response echoes Abraham's own decisive obedience when called to leave his homeland. Like Abraham, she steps into an unknown future based on a conviction that this is the right path. Her single-word answer is one of the most powerful moments of personal agency in Genesis.
58. The courage required should not be understated: Rebekah is agreeing to leave her family, her homeland, and everything familiar to travel to a distant land and marry a man she has never met. Her 'I will go' is an act of faith and determination that parallels Abraham's 'lekh-lekha' obedience.
59. 'Her nurse' (menikkta) — Rebekah's childhood nurse accompanies her on the journey. This nurse, later identified as Deborah (35:8), provides a link to home and continuity of care. Her presence suggests that while Rebekah is bold, the family ensures she does not depart entirely alone among strangers.
60. 'Thousands of ten thousands' (le'alfei revavah) — an extravagant blessing of fertility and multiplication. The language echoes the Abrahamic promise of innumerable descendants (cf. 22:17). Though the family may not fully understand the covenantal dimensions, their blessing aligns with God's purposes for Abraham's line.
60. 'May your offspring possess the gate of those who hate them' (veyirash zar'ekh et sha'ar son'av) — this blessing closely echoes God's words to Abraham after the Akedah (22:17): 'your offspring shall possess the gate of his enemies.' The gate represents the seat of power and authority in a city. To 'possess the gate' is to have dominion, victory, and authority. The family's farewell blessing unwittingly repeats the divine covenant promise.
61. 'Rebekah arose' (vattaqom Rivqah) — the verb qum ('to arise') signals decisive action, departure, a new phase beginning. Rebekah rises — she is not carried or led passively. She mounts the camel and follows.
61. 'Her young women' (na'aroteha) — Rebekah has attendant women who accompany her. She does not travel alone but as a woman of status with her own household.

62. 'Beer-lahai-roi' — the 'Well of the Living One Who Sees Me,' named by Hagar in 16:14 after her encounter with the angel of the LORD. It is striking that Isaac settles near this well — the place associated with God's compassion for the outcast Hagar. The connection may hint at Isaac's contemplative, gentle character — he is drawn to places of divine encounter and sees significance in Hagar's story.
62. 'The land of the Negev' (erets hanNegev) — the dry, semi-arid southern region of Canaan. Isaac's location in the Negev places him at a distance from Hebron (where Abraham is), suggesting some degree of independent establishment.
63. 'To meditate' (lasuach) — the verb suach is rare and its precise meaning is debated. It may mean 'to meditate, to muse, to pray, to walk about, to converse (with oneself or with God).' The traditional rendering 'meditate' suggests contemplative prayer or reflection. Some scholars connect it to siach ('to speak, to commune'). Whatever the exact nuance, Isaac is portrayed as a reflective, inward man — walking alone in the field at dusk, engaged in thought or prayer. This is the only glimpse the narrative gives us of Isaac's interior life at this moment, and it is one of quiet solitude.
63. 'Toward evening' (lifnot erev) — the same time of day when the servant arrived at the well (v. 11). Evening frames both the departure point and the arrival point of this journey. The setting sun provides a backdrop of beauty and transition for the meeting about to take place.
64. 'She dismounted from the camel' (vattippol me'al haggamal) — the verb naphal means 'to fall,' which suggests she dismounted quickly, perhaps even leaping down. Whether this is haste, respect, or startled excitement, the narrative leaves ambiguous. The act is spontaneous — she sees a man in the field and immediately acts. Their eyes meet across the distance: he lifts his eyes (v. 63), she lifts hers (v. 64). The symmetry is deliberate and beautiful.
65. 'Who is this man walking in the field to meet us?' — Rebekah's first words about Isaac are a question filled with curiosity. She sees a solitary figure approaching across the field in the fading light. The moment has the quality of a scene from a story — and indeed it is one of the most evocative meeting scenes in all of ancient literature.
65. 'She took her veil and covered herself' (vattiqach hatsa'if vattitkkas) — the tsa'if is a large veil or wrapper. Rebekah veils herself upon learning the man is Isaac — her future husband. The veiling is an act of modesty and bridal custom, marking the transition from stranger to bride. It is also the introduction of the veil motif that will recur dramatically when Laban substitutes Leah for Rachel on Jacob's wedding night (29:23–25).
66. 'All the things that he had done' — the servant recounts the entire journey to Isaac. This is the third telling: the narrator told it (vv. 10–27), the servant retold it to Laban's family (vv. 34–49), and now he tells Isaac. The narrative does not repeat the speech a third time but summarizes it, trusting the reader to understand the content. The repetition is itself theologically significant: the story of God's providence is worth telling and retelling.
67. 'Into the tent of Sarah his mother' (ha'ohelah Sarah immo) — Isaac brings Rebekah into Sarah's tent, not just any tent. This act symbolically installs Rebekah as the new matriarch, the successor to Sarah. The tent that was empty since Sarah's death (chapter 23) is now occupied again. Life continues; the matriarchal line is renewed.
67. 'And he loved her' (vayye'ehevah) — this is one of the rare explicit statements of marital love in Genesis. The verb ahav ('to love') here describes not the initial attraction but the settled, committed love that follows marriage. Isaac and Rebekah's love is stated simply and without elaboration — a quiet, profound declaration.
67. 'And Isaac was comforted after his mother's death' (vayyinnachem Yitschaq acharei immo) — the verb nacham means 'to be comforted, to be consoled.' Isaac's grief for Sarah, which has shadowed the narrative since chapter 23, finds resolution in Rebekah. She fills the void left by his mother's death — not as a replacement but as a new source of love and companionship. The chapter that began with Abraham's old age and the need to secure the future ends with Isaac comforted, married, and loved. The covenant continues.

Summary: Abraham marries Keturah and fathers more sons, but leaves everything to Isaac. Abraham dies at 175 and is buried by Isaac and Ishmael at Machpelah. Ishmael's twelve princes are listed. Rebekah, long barren, conceives twins after Isaac's prayer. God's oracle declares the older will serve the younger. Esau sells his birthright to Jacob for stew.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is a hinge between generations, closing Abraham's story and opening Jacob's. The oracle to Rebekah — 'the older shall serve the younger' (v. 23) — inverts primogeniture and establishes divine election as the governing principle. The color-word admoni ('red,' v. 25) links Esau to Edom, to the red stew, and to the red earth (adamah), threading his identity through a single phoneme. The narrator's final verdict — 'so Esau despised his birthright' (vayyivez, v. 34) — is devastating in its brevity: one verb converts a transaction into a theological judgment.

Translation Friction: Jacob is called tam (v. 27), traditionally rendered 'plain' (KJV), but the word carries moral weight — wholeness, integrity, completeness. We rendered it as 'quiet' to capture his domestic character while noting the Hebrew's richer meaning. Esau's demand to 'gulp down' (hal'iteni, v. 30) the red stew uses an unusually crude verb suggesting animal-like consumption — a nuance that is difficult to reproduce in English without overstatement.

Connections: Isaac and Ishmael burying Abraham together (25:9) mirrors Jacob and Esau burying Isaac (35:29) — reconciliation at the graveside. The bechorah ('birthright,' v. 31) that Esau despises is referenced in Hebrews 12:16-17. The oracle about the older serving the younger (25:23) governs the next four chapters and is cited in Romans 9:12 as evidence of divine election before birth.

¹And Abraham took another wife, and her name was Keturah. ²She gave birth to Zimran, Jokshan, Medan, Midian, Ishbak, and Shuah. ³And Jokshan fathered Sheba and Dedan. And the sons of Dedan were the Asshurim, the Letushim, and the Leummim. ⁴And the sons of Midian were Ephah and Epher and Hanoah and Abida and Eldaah. All these were the sons of Keturah. ⁵Abraham left everything he owned to Isaac. ⁶And to the sons of the concubines that Abraham had, Abraham gave gifts, and he sent them away from Isaac his son, while he was still living, eastward, to the land of the east. ⁷And these are the days of the years of Abraham's life that he lived: a hundred and seventy-five years. ⁸And Abraham breathed his last and died in a good old age, old and full of days, and was gathered to his people. ⁹His sons Isaac and Ishmael laid him to rest in the cave of Machpelah, within the field of Ephron son of Zohar the Hittite, facing Mamre — ¹⁰the field that Abraham had purchased from the sons of Heth. There Abraham was buried, with Sarah his wife. ¹¹And it was, after the death of Abraham, that God blessed Isaac his son. And Isaac settled near Beer-lahai-roi. ¹²And these are the generations of Ishmael, the son of Abraham, whom Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's maidservant, bore to Abraham. ¹³These are Ishmael's sons, listed by name in the order of their birth: Nebaioth, Ishmael's firstborn, followed by Kedar, Adbeel, Mibsam, ¹⁴Mishma, Dumah, Massa, ¹⁵then Hadad, Tema, Jetur, Naphish, and Kedemah. ¹⁶These are the sons of Ishmael, and these are their names, by their settlements and by their encampments — twelve princes according to their peoples. ¹⁷And these are the years of the life of Ishmael: a hundred and thirty-seven years. And he breathed his last and died and was gathered to his people. ¹⁸And they settled from Havilah to Shur, which is opposite Egypt, going toward Assyria. He settled over against all his kinsmen. ¹⁹And these are the generations of Isaac, the son of Abraham. Abraham fathered Isaac. ²⁰And Isaac was forty years old when he took Rebekah as his wife, the daughter of Bethuel the Aramean from Paddan-aram, the sister of Laban the Aramean. ²¹And Isaac prayed earnestly to the LORD on behalf of his wife, for she was barren. And the LORD was moved by his prayer, and Rebekah his wife conceived. ²²And the children struggled within her, and she said, "If it is so, why is this happening to me?" And she went to inquire of the LORD. ²³And the LORD said to her, "Two nations are in your womb, and two peoples shall be divided from within you. And one people shall be stronger than the other, and the older shall serve the younger." ²⁴And when her days to give birth were fulfilled, behold — twins were in her womb. ²⁵And the first came out red, all of him like a garment of hair, and they called his name Esau. ²⁶And after this his brother came out, and his hand was grasping Esau's heel. And his name was called Jacob. And Isaac was sixty years old when she bore them. ²⁷And the boys grew up. And Esau became a man skilled in hunting, a man of the field, and Jacob was a quiet man, dwelling in tents. ²⁸And Isaac loved Esau, for game was in his mouth, but Rebekah loved Jacob. ²⁹And Jacob was cooking stew, and Esau came in from the field, and he was exhausted. ³⁰And Esau said to Jacob, "Let me gulp down some of this red — this red stuff — for I am exhausted." Therefore his name was called Edom. ³¹And Jacob said, "Sell me your birthright, here and now." ³²And Esau said, "Look, I am about to die. What good is a birthright to me?" ³³And Jacob said, "Swear to me today." And he swore to him and sold his birthright to Jacob. ³⁴And Jacob gave Esau bread and lentil stew. And he ate and drank and rose and went away. So Esau despised his birthright.

1. "Took another wife" (vayyosef... vayyiqqach ishah) — the verb yasef ('to add, to do again') signals continuation after Sarah's death and Isaac's marriage. Abraham, at well over 140 years old, takes a new wife. Some interpreters identify Keturah with Hagar (cf. 1 Chronicles 1:32, which calls her a 'concubine'), but the plain text introduces her as a distinct figure.

1. 'Keturah' (Qeturah) — the name likely derives from qetoret ('incense'), suggesting a connection to the aromatic spice trade of Arabia. This etymology fits the geography of her descendants, who are associated with Arabian and eastern territories.
2. Six sons are listed, each becoming the ancestor of peoples or tribes. Midian (Midyan) is the most significant in later biblical narrative: Moses will flee to Midian and marry a Midianite woman (Exodus 2:15–21), and the Midianites later become both allies and adversaries of Israel.
2. Shuah (Shuach) is noteworthy as the ancestor of Bildad the Shuhite, one of Job's three friends (Job 2:11). These Abrahamic descendants populate the broader Near Eastern landscape, extending Abraham's influence far beyond the covenant line through Isaac.
3. Sheba and Dedan also appear in the genealogy of Ham through Cush (10:7) and in connection with Shem (10:28). These overlapping names likely reflect intermarriage and blending of tribal identities in Arabian territories. Sheba is associated with the famous spice trade and the later Queen of Sheba (1 Kings 10).
3. The three 'sons' of Dedan — Asshurim, Letushim, Leummim — bear names with plural endings (-im), indicating they are tribal or ethnic groups rather than individuals. The name Le'ummim means 'peoples' or 'nations,' underscoring the collective nature of these identities.
4. Ephah (Eifah) is mentioned in Isaiah 60:6 alongside Midian as bringing gold and incense — again connecting Keturah's line to the Arabian trade routes. The five sons of Midian represent the major clans of the Midianite confederation.
4. 'All these were the sons of Keturah' — the summary formula closes the genealogy and underscores that while Abraham fathered many peoples, the covenant distinction will be drawn sharply in the verses that follow.
5. 'All that he had' (kol-asher-lo) — this is an absolute transfer. Isaac receives the entirety of Abraham's estate, which includes not merely material wealth but the covenantal inheritance: the promises of land, descendants, and divine blessing. The other sons receive gifts (v. 6) but not the inheritance. The distinction is categorical, not proportional.
5. This verse establishes the legal and theological principle of the chosen heir receiving 'everything.' It parallels the later distinction between Jacob and Esau, and ultimately the concept of the firstborn's double portion — though here it is not the firstborn (Ishmael) but the son of promise who inherits all.
6. 'The concubines' (happilagshim) — the plural suggests both Hagar and Keturah are included under this designation. In 1 Chronicles 1:32, Keturah is explicitly called a concubine (pilegish). The legal distinction matters: concubines' sons receive gifts but not inheritance rights.
6. 'Sent them away from Isaac his son' (vayeshallechem me'al Yitschaq beno) — Abraham separates the other sons from Isaac to prevent future disputes over inheritance and to protect the covenant line from dilution. The pattern echoes the earlier sending away of Ishmael (21:14), though here it is done with gifts rather than minimal provisions.
6. 'Eastward, to the land of the east' (qedmah el-erets qedem) — the doubled emphasis on 'east' is deliberate. In Genesis, movement eastward consistently signals departure from the place of divine presence and promise: Adam and Eve go east of Eden (3:24), Cain goes east of Eden (4:16), and the builders of Babel move east (11:2). The Abrahamic sons who are not heirs of the promise go east.
7. 'The days of the years of Abraham's life' (yemei shenei-chayyei Avraham) — the formulaic death notice mirrors the style used for other patriarchs (cf. 5:5 for Adam, 9:29 for Noah). The phrase layers time units — days within years within a life — as though each unit of time mattered.
7. A hundred and seventy-five years — Abraham was 75 when called from Haran (12:4), making his life in the land of promise exactly 100 years. This round number may be theologically significant: a full century under the covenant. Jewish tradition notes the numerical pattern: $175 = 7 \times 5^2$ (or 7×25), which can be read as 'seven lives of twenty-five years,' suggesting fullness and completion.
8. 'Breathed his last' (vayyigva) — the verb gava means to expire, to breathe out for the last time. It is a gentle word, suggesting a peaceful death rather than a violent or agonizing one. The narrative grants Abraham the serene death that his faithful life warranted.
8. 'In a good old age, old and full of days' (beseivah tovah zaqen vesave'a) — four terms pile up to describe Abraham's death: good grey-headedness, aged, and satisfied (or 'full'). The word save'a literally means 'sated, satisfied' — Abraham has had his fill of life. This echoes God's promise in 15:15: 'You shall go to your fathers in peace; you shall be buried in a good old age.'
8. 'Gathered to his people' (vayye'asef el-ammav) — this phrase appears to mean more than simply being buried. Abraham's ancestors were buried in Mesopotamia, not at Machpelah. The expression suggests reunion with the dead in some form — an early intimation of afterlife or continued existence beyond physical death. It is used for Abraham, Ishmael (v. 17), Isaac (35:29), Jacob (49:33), Aaron (Numbers 20:24), and Moses (Deuteronomy 32:50).
9. 'Isaac and Ishmael' — Isaac is named first, though Ishmael is the firstborn. The order reflects covenantal priority, not birth order. Yet Ishmael's presence at the burial is striking and poignant: the son who was sent away returns to bury his father alongside the son who stayed. Whatever tensions existed, the brothers come together in grief.
9. 'The cave of Machpelah' — purchased by Abraham in chapter 23 for Sarah's burial. Abraham is now laid beside his wife. The cave becomes the patriarchal burial site: Sarah, Abraham, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah will all be interred there (49:31). It remains the only piece of the promised land that Abraham legally owned.
10. 'The field that Abraham had purchased from the sons of Heth' — the narrative deliberately recalls the transaction of chapter 23, reinforcing the legal validity of Abraham's ownership. In death as in life, Abraham's only permanent foothold in the promised land is this purchased burial plot.

10. 'There Abraham was buried, with Sarah his wife' — husband and wife reunited in death. The simplicity of the statement carries enormous weight: the man who left everything to follow God's call now rests in the one piece of ground he bought with full price in the land of promise.
11. 'God blessed Isaac his son' — the blessing passes from Abraham to Isaac without interruption. God himself ensures the continuity of the covenant. The verb barakh ('blessed') echoes the comprehensive blessing of Abraham in 24:1, signaling that Isaac now stands in his father's place as the recipient of divine favor.
11. 'Beer-lahai-roi' — 'the well of the Living One who sees me.' This is the well where Hagar encountered the angel of the LORD (16:13–14). That Isaac settles here is richly suggestive: the son of promise dwells at the site where the rejected concubine's son received divine attention. It may hint at a connection or reconciliation between the two family lines, or simply at Isaac's awareness of God's providential care for all of Abraham's household.
12. 'The generations of Ishmael' (toledot Yishma'el) — this is the fifth toledot formula in Genesis (after 2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1). Ishmael receives his own toledot section, affirming his significance as Abraham's son. Though he is not the covenant heir, he is not forgotten or insignificant.
12. 'Hagar the Egyptian, Sarah's maidservant' — Ishmael's identity is defined through both parents and through social status. He is Abraham's son (dignity), born of Hagar (Egyptian origin), who was Sarah's servant (subordinate status). Every element of this introduction carries weight for understanding Ishmael's place in the narrative.
13. 'By their names, according to their generations' (bishmotam letoledotam) — the double specification emphasizes both individual identity (names) and collective continuity (generations). Each name represents a tribal group that will inhabit the Arabian Peninsula and surrounding regions.
13. Nebaioth (Nevayot) — the firstborn, later associated with the Nabataeans of Petra and the Arabian trade routes. Kedar (Qedar) — becomes a significant Arabian tribe, referenced frequently in later Scripture as a symbol of the desert-dwelling nomadic life (Psalm 120:5; Song of Songs 1:5; Isaiah 21:16–17; 42:11; 60:7). Kedar represents wealth in flocks and martial prowess.
14. Dumah (Dumah) — the name means 'silence' and is associated with the oasis of Dumat al-Jandal in northern Arabia, a significant caravan crossroads. Isaiah 21:11 contains an oracle concerning Dumah. Massa (Massa) — the name means 'burden' or 'oracle'; some scholars connect the 'words of King Lemuel' and the 'words of Agur' in Proverbs 30–31 with this Massa tribe, reading the Hebrew massa as a proper noun rather than the common noun 'oracle.'
15. Tema (Teima) — an important oasis in northwestern Arabia, mentioned in Job 6:19 and Isaiah 21:14 as a caravan stop. Jetur (Yetur) and Naphish (Nafish) — these two tribes appear in 1 Chronicles 5:19 as opponents of the Transjordanian Israelite tribes (Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh). The Itureans of the New Testament era (Luke 3:1) are likely descendants of Jetur.
15. Kedemah (Qedmah) — the last name means 'eastward,' echoing the direction in which Abraham sent his non-covenant sons (v. 6). The list ends with a geographic marker pointing toward the eastern desert, the domain of Ishmael's descendants.
16. 'Settlements and encampments' (chatsereihem uveteirotam) — chatsar refers to an walled village or settlement, while tirah denotes a more fortified encampment or enclosure. Together they describe a semi-nomadic lifestyle: some permanent habitations, some temporary encampments following seasonal patterns.
16. 'Twelve princes' (shnem-asar nesi'im) — this directly fulfills God's promise to Abraham in 17:20: 'As for Ishmael... I will make him fruitful and multiply him greatly. He shall father twelve princes, and I will make him into a great nation.' The word nasi (prince, chieftain) denotes tribal leadership. The number twelve parallels the later twelve tribes of Israel through Jacob, suggesting a deliberate structural echo: both sons of Abraham produce twelve-fold tribal organizations.
17. A hundred and thirty-seven years — Ishmael's lifespan is substantial, though shorter than Abraham's (175) and Isaac's (180). Sarah also died at 137 (23:1), creating a numerical echo between the mother who expelled Ishmael and Ishmael himself.
17. 'Breathed his last and died and was gathered to his people' (vayyigva vayyamot vayye'asef el-ammav) — Ishmael receives the same dignified death formula as Abraham (v. 8), with one exception: 'in a good old age, old and full of days' is omitted. Nonetheless, the phrase 'gathered to his people' extends to Ishmael the same hope of postmortem continuity granted to Abraham.
18. 'From Havilah to Shur' — this defines the geographic range of the Ishmaelite tribes: from Havilah (likely in northeastern Arabia or perhaps southwestern Arabia) to Shur (in the northwestern Sinai, near Egypt's border). This is a vast territory encompassing much of the Arabian Peninsula and its northern reaches.
18. 'He settled over against all his kinsmen' (al-penei khol-echav nafal) — the verb nafal literally means 'he fell,' but here it likely means 'he settled' or 'he dwelt.' This echoes the divine oracle in 16:12: 'He shall dwell over against all his kinsmen.' The prophecy is fulfilled: Ishmael's descendants live in proximity and sometimes tension with their related peoples, maintaining their distinct identity alongside — but apart from — the covenant line.
19. 'The generations of Isaac' (toledot Yitschaq) — this is the sixth toledot formula and one of the most important, as it introduces the central narrative of the next several chapters: the Jacob-Esau conflict, Isaac's sojourning, and the transmission of the blessing. The toledot of Isaac will extend through chapter 35.
19. 'Abraham fathered Isaac' (Avraham holid et-Yitschaq) — the seemingly redundant repetition ('Isaac, Abraham's son; Abraham fathered Isaac') creates a verbal bracket that frames Isaac's identity entirely within his relationship to Abraham. Isaac is defined as Abraham's heir — both biologically and covenantally. The emphasis is deliberate: after listing all of Abraham's other offspring (vv. 1–4, 12–16), the narrative returns emphatically to the one through whom the promise continues.

20. 'Forty years old' — Isaac was born when Abraham was 100 (21:5), and Abraham sent his servant when he was at least 140 (cf. 24:1). Isaac is 40 at his marriage, placing the events of chapter 24 in proper chronological context. The age of 40 in the biblical world often marks the threshold of mature adulthood.
20. 'Bethuel the Aramean from Paddan-aram, the sister of Laban the Aramean' — the double designation 'Aramean' (Arammi) and the place name Paddan-aram ('the field of Aram') firmly locate Rebekah's origins in Upper Mesopotamia. Laban is mentioned here for the first time as Rebekah's brother; he will become a major figure in Jacob's story (chapters 29–31). His introduction here plants a narrative seed that will germinate two generations later.
21. 'Prayed earnestly' (vayye'tar) — the verb atar is rare and intensive, meaning to pray with urgency, to entreat, to plead. It is stronger than the common word for prayer (palal). Isaac does not casually ask; he labors in prayer. The same verb is used for its result: 'the LORD was moved by his prayer' (vayye'ater lo) — the wordplay between the active and passive forms of atar creates a verbal mirror: Isaac entreated, and God was entreated.
21. 'She was barren' (aqarah hi) — Rebekah joins Sarah (11:30) as a barren matriarch. This pattern will continue with Rachel (29:31). The barrenness of the covenant mothers is a recurring motif establishing that Israel's existence is not a natural inevitability but a divine gift. Isaac was 40 at marriage (v. 20) and 60 at the twins' birth (v. 26), implying twenty years of barrenness and prayer.
22. 'Struggled' (vayyitrotsatsu) — the verb ratsats means to crush, to break, to shatter. In its reflexive-reciprocal form (hitpolel), it describes two forces violently colliding. This is not gentle kicking; it is a prenatal war. The intensity of the language foreshadows the lifelong conflict between the two nations emerging from Rebekah's womb.
22. 'If it is so, why is this happening to me?' (im-ken lammah zeh anokhi) — Rebekah's cry is compressed and ambiguous. Literally: 'If so, why this — I?' Interpreters have heard in it various anguished questions: 'If this is what pregnancy is like, why did I want it?' or 'If God answered our prayer, why is it so painful?' or even 'Why do I exist?' The raw brevity conveys genuine distress.
22. 'She went to inquire of the LORD' (vattelek lidrosh et-YHWH) — the verb darash means to seek, to inquire, to consult. Rebekah takes independent initiative in seeking God — she does not ask Isaac to inquire for her. This establishes Rebekah as a woman of direct spiritual agency, a trait that will shape the narrative profoundly in chapter 27.
23. 'Two nations are in your womb' (shenei goyim bevitnekh) — the oracle reveals that Rebekah carries not merely two children but two nations. The word goyim ('nations') elevates the pregnancy from a personal event to a geopolitical prophecy. The struggle in her womb is the opening battle of a national conflict.
23. 'Two peoples shall be divided from within you' (ushnei le'ummim mimme'ayikh yipperedu) — the verb parad ('to separate, to divide') recalls the division of peoples after Babel (10:32). From the moment of birth, these two will diverge — in character, destiny, and relationship to God.
23. 'The older shall serve the younger' (rav ya'avod tsa'ir) — this climactic line overturns the natural order of primogeniture. The Hebrew is deliberately ambiguous: rav can mean 'the older' or 'the greater,' and tsa'ir means 'the younger' or 'the lesser.' The oracle can be read as 'the older shall serve the younger' or 'the greater shall serve the lesser.' This divine reversal of the firstborn's privilege is a pattern throughout Genesis (Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, Joseph over his brothers, Ephraim over Manasseh) and throughout Scripture.
24. 'When her days were fulfilled' (vayyimle'u yameha laledet) — the language of fulfillment (male, 'to fill, to complete') suggests that the pregnancy ran its full, appointed course. There is a sense of divine timing: the birth happens when the days are 'full,' not premature, not late.
24. 'Behold — twins' (vehinne tomim) — the narrative withholds the information until this dramatic moment. The reader, who knows the oracle, now watches it begin to unfold. The word tomim (twins) is spelled defectively here (without the expected aleph), which some commentators distinguish from the full spelling used for Tamar's twins in 38:27. Whether this orthographic difference carries meaning is debated.
25. 'Red' (admoni) — this adjective, from the root a-d-m, links Esau to the color red and thus to his later name Edom (v. 30). The same root gives us adam ('man,' from adamah, 'red earth') and dam ('blood'). Esau's redness is his defining physical trait, and it will be punned upon when he demands the 'red stuff' (ha'adom ha'adom) in v. 30.
25. 'Like a garment of hair' (kadderet se'ar) — the word adderet means a cloak or mantle, and se'ar means hair. Esau emerges covered in hair so thick it looks like a fur garment. The word se'ar also connects to Se'ir, the mountainous region where Esau's descendants will settle (32:3; 36:8). Name, appearance, and geography are all woven together.
25. 'They called his name Esau' (Esav) — the etymology of Esau is debated. Some connect it to asah ('to make, to do'), suggesting he came out 'fully made' or 'completed.' Others relate it to an Arabic root meaning 'hairy' or 'rough.' The name may simply be a description of his appearance: the rough, finished-looking one.
26. 'His hand was grasping Esau's heel' (veyado ochezet ba'aqev Esav) — from the womb, Jacob is already reaching for what belongs to Esau. The heel-grasping is an extraordinary birth sign: the second twin emerging with his hand locked around the first one's heel. It is simultaneously a physical detail, a character revelation, and a prophecy enacted.
26. 'Jacob' (Ya'aqov) — the name derives from aqev ('heel'), meaning 'he grasps the heel' or, by extension, 'he supplants.' The verb aqav means to follow at the heel, to track, and by metaphorical extension, to supplant or deceive. Esau will later make the pun explicit: 'Is he not rightly named Jacob? For he has supplanted me (vayya'qeveni) these two times' (27:36). The name carries both a physical description and a moral characterization.

26. Isaac was sixty years old — since Isaac married at 40 (v. 20), this confirms twenty years of barrenness and prayer before the twins' birth. The long wait parallels Abraham and Sarah's wait for Isaac and reinforces that the covenant children come not by natural timing but by divine gift.
27. 'A man skilled in hunting, a man of the field' (ish yode'a tsayid, ish sadeh) — Esau is defined by two phrases: he knows hunting (the verb yada implies mastery and expertise), and he belongs to the open field. He is outdoor, physical, and wild. The phrase 'man of the field' echoes Cain, who was a 'worker of the ground' (4:2), and later Nimrod, the 'mighty hunter before the LORD' (10:9). The field in Genesis is often a place of danger and violence.
27. 'A quiet man, dwelling in tents' (ish tam yoshev ohalim) — the word tam is often translated 'plain' (KJV) but more accurately means 'complete, wholesome, blameless, integrated.' It is the same word used to describe Job (Job 1:1) and Noah's expected conduct (6:9, tamim). Jacob is not 'plain' in the sense of ordinary; he is tam in the sense of morally intact or undivided. 'Dwelling in tents' suggests the domestic, pastoral life of the shepherd and the camp — the civilized sphere as opposed to Esau's wild field.
28. 'Isaac loved Esau, for game was in his mouth' (vayyehav Yitschaq et-Esav ki-tsayid befv) — the phrase 'game in his mouth' (tsayid befv) is ambiguous: it could mean Isaac liked the taste of Esau's hunted meat (literally, the game was in Isaac's mouth), or that Esau was verbally skilled — 'hunting' in his mouth, meaning he knew how to talk to his father. Most interpreters favor the culinary reading: Isaac's preference for Esau is linked to sensory pleasure, to appetite. This creates an uncomfortable parallel with the broader narrative: Isaac's love is based on something he consumes.
28. 'But Rebekah loved Jacob' — no reason is given for Rebekah's preference. The absence of explanation may suggest that her love is less conditional than Isaac's, or it may reflect her knowledge of the oracle (v. 23): God declared that the older would serve the younger, and Rebekah aligns her affections with the divine word. The divided loyalties of the parents — father for one son, mother for the other — will drive the painful drama of chapter 27.
29. 'Was cooking stew' (vayyazed nazid) — the verb zud means 'to boil, to cook,' and nazid is 'stew' or 'pottage.' The wordplay between the verb and noun (vayyazed nazid) is emphatic. Some commentators note that zud also carries the meaning 'to act presumptuously' (cf. Exodus 18:11; Deuteronomy 17:13), hinting at the audacity of what Jacob is about to do.
29. 'He was exhausted' (vehu ayef) — the word ayef means utterly spent, drained of strength. Esau returns from the field in a state of total depletion. This sets up his willingness to trade long-term value (the birthright) for immediate physical relief — a choice the narrative will judge severely (v. 34).
30. 'Let me gulp down' (hal'iteni) — the verb la'at means to swallow greedily, to gulp, to gobble. It is used elsewhere only for feeding animals (cf. the related noun in Proverbs 26:15, where the sluggard is too lazy to bring food to his mouth). The word is coarse and animal-like, portraying Esau as a man reduced to pure appetite. He doesn't ask to 'eat' (akhal) — he demands to have food crammed into his mouth.
30. 'This red — this red stuff' (min-ha'adom ha'adom hazzeh) — Esau cannot even name what he wants. He points and sputters: 'that red, that red.' The repetition and the absence of a noun (he doesn't say 'red stew' or 'red food') convey breathless, almost incoherent urgency. He is so depleted that language itself fails him.
30. 'Therefore his name was called Edom' — the narrator provides the etymology: Edom comes from adom ('red'). Esau's grasping demand for the red stew becomes his national identity. An entire people will be named for this moment of appetite. The Edomites will settle in the red sandstone mountains of Seir, reinforcing the chromatic connection.
31. 'Sell me your birthright, here and now' (mikhray khayom et-bekhoratekha li) — the word khayom means 'today, right now, this very day.' Jacob demands immediate transaction, no delay, no time for Esau to reconsider. The urgency mirrors Esau's urgency for food: appetite meets ambition in a single moment.
31. 'Birthright' (bekhorah) — the birthright (from bekhor, 'firstborn') included a double portion of the inheritance, family leadership, and in this family, presumably the covenantal promises given to Abraham and Isaac. It was the firstborn's most precious possession. Jacob's willingness to barter food for this treasure reveals his understanding of its value — an understanding Esau conspicuously lacks.
32. 'I am about to die' (hinneh anokhi holekh lamut) — literally, 'Behold, I am going to die.' Esau's self-assessment is almost certainly hyperbolic: he is hungry and tired, not mortally endangered. But his words reveal a man who lives entirely in the present moment, with no capacity for long-term thinking. A birthright has value only to someone who can imagine a future; Esau cannot see past his current hunger.
32. 'What good is a birthright to me?' (velammah-zeh li bekhorah) — the question is devastating in its shortsightedness. Esau dismisses the birthright as worthless because it cannot satisfy his immediate physical need. The narrator will render judgment on this attitude in v. 34. Hebrews 12:16 later calls Esau a 'profane person' (bebelos) for this act — one who treats the sacred as common.
33. 'Swear to me today' (hishave'ah li kayyom) — Jacob demands an oath to make the transaction irrevocable. An oath before God cannot be undone. Jacob understands legal formalities and ensures that this is not a casual promise Esau can later deny. The insistence on an oath shows Jacob's calculating nature: he leaves nothing to chance.
33. 'He swore to him and sold his birthright to Jacob' — the sequence is rapid and final: oath, then sale. The transaction is complete. Esau has legally and formally relinquished his firstborn status. What took a moment of weakness to surrender will take years of anguish to regret (27:34, 36).
34. 'Bread and lentil stew' (lechem unezid adashim) — now we learn what the 'red stuff' was: lentil stew. Red lentils are a common food in the ancient Near East, a humble, everyday dish. The birthright of the firstborn was traded for the most ordinary of meals. The inclusion of bread (lechem) shows Jacob provided a full meal, not a mere taste.

34. 'He ate and drank and rose and went away' (vayyokhal vayyesht vayyaqom vayyvelakh) — four verbs in rapid succession, all in the wayyiqtol (narrative past) form, create a staccato rhythm: ate-drank-rose-left. The machine-gun pacing conveys Esau's total lack of reflection. There is no pause, no moment of regret, no hesitation. He consumes and departs as though nothing of consequence has occurred.
34. 'So Esau despised his birthright' (vayyivez Esav et-habbekhorah) — the narrator's verdict is devastating. The verb bazah means to despise, to regard as worthless, to treat with contempt. It is a word of moral judgment. Esau did not merely sell his birthright; he despised it. He assigned it zero value. This editorial comment transforms a story about a hungry man and a clever brother into a theological parable about the difference between those who value the sacred and those who do not.

Summary: Famine strikes, and God tells Isaac not to go to Egypt but to stay in Gerar, renewing the Abrahamic promises. Isaac repeats his father's wife-sister deception with Rebekah. He prospers enormously, provoking Philistine envy. After disputes over wells, Isaac digs Rehoboth ('wide spaces'). God appears at Beersheba, and Abimelech comes to make peace. Esau's Hittite wives grieve Isaac and Rebekah.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the only chapter in Genesis focused entirely on Isaac as the central actor, and it is saturated with echoes of Abraham: the same famine, the same Abimelech, the same deception, the same well-digging, the same Beersheba covenant. Isaac's identity is defined by re-opening his father's wells and re-calling them by Abraham's names (v. 18) — he is the faithful steward of inherited blessing rather than a pioneer of new territory. The three wells — Esek ('contention'), Sitnah ('hostility'), and Rehoboth ('wide spaces') — trace a progression from conflict to peace.

Translation Friction: The verb metsacheq (v. 8), describing Isaac 'caressing' Rebekah, is the same root as Isaac's name (tsachaq, 'to laugh') — Isaac was 'Isaac-ing' with his wife, a wordplay impossible to reproduce in English. We rendered it as 'caressing' based on context and noted the pun. The phrase 'my instructions, my commands, my decrees, and my teachings' (v. 5) uses Mosaic vocabulary anachronistically for Abraham, and we rendered it directly while noting the anticipation of Sinai legislation.

Connections: God's command 'do not go down to Egypt' (26:2) contrasts with Abraham's descent (12:10) and foreshadows Jacob's eventual migration (46:3-4). The well disputes anticipate Israel's wilderness conflicts over water (Exodus 17:1-7; Numbers 20:1-13). The Beersheba theophany (26:24) echoes Abraham's experience there (21:33). Esau's marriages (26:34-35) motivate the deception of chapter 27.

¹A famine struck the land — separate from the earlier famine during Abraham's lifetime. So Isaac traveled to Gerar, to Abimelech, king of the Philistines. ²And the LORD appeared to him and said, "Do not go down to Egypt. Dwell in the land that I shall tell you of. ³Sojourn in this land, and I will be with you, and I will bless you, for to you and to your offspring I will give all these lands, and I will establish the oath that I swore to Abraham your father. ⁴And I will multiply your offspring as the stars of heaven, and I will give to your offspring all these lands. And in your offspring all the nations of the earth shall be blessed. ⁵because Abraham listened to me and observed my instructions, my commands, my decrees, and my teachings." ⁶And Isaac settled in Gerar. ⁷And the men of the place asked about his wife, and he said, "She is my sister," for he was afraid to say "my wife," thinking, "The men of the place might kill me on account of Rebekah, for she is beautiful in appearance." ⁸And it happened, when he had been there a long time, that Abimelech king of the Philistines looked out through a window and saw — and behold, Isaac was caressing Rebekah his wife. ⁹And Abimelech called Isaac and said, "Surely she is your wife! How then could you say, 'She is my sister'?" And Isaac said to him, "Because I thought, 'Lest I die on account of her.'" ¹⁰And Abimelech said, "What is this you have done to us? One of the people might easily have lain with your wife, and you would have brought guilt upon us." ¹¹And Abimelech commanded all the people, saying, "Whoever touches this man or his wife shall surely be put to death." ¹²And Isaac sowed in that land and reaped in that year a hundredfold, and the LORD blessed him. ¹³And the man became great, and he continued to grow greater and greater until he was very great. ¹⁴And he had possessions of flocks and possessions of herds and a great household, and the Philistines envied him. ¹⁵And all the wells that his father's servants had dug in the days of Abraham his father, the Philistines had stopped up and filled with earth. ¹⁶And Abimelech said to Isaac, "Go away from us, for you have become much mightier than we." ¹⁷And Isaac departed from there and encamped in the valley of Gerar and settled there. ¹⁸And Isaac dug again the wells of water that had been dug in the days of Abraham his father, which the Philistines had stopped up after the death of Abraham, and he called them by the names that his father had called them. ¹⁹When Isaac's servants dug in the wadi, they discovered a well fed by flowing water. ²⁰And the herdsmen of Gerar quarreled with the herdsmen of Isaac, saying, "The water is ours!" So he called the name of the well Esek, because they contended with him. ²¹And they dug another well, and they quarreled over that one also. So he called its name Sitnah. ²²And he moved from there and dug another well, and they did not quarrel over it. So he called its name Rehoboth, and he said, "For now the LORD has made room for us, and we shall be fruitful in the land." ²³From there he traveled up to Beersheba. ²⁴And the LORD appeared to him that night and said, "I am the God of Abraham your father. Do not fear, for I am with you, and I will bless you and multiply your offspring for the sake of Abraham my servant." ²⁵And he built an altar there and called upon the name of the LORD and pitched his tent there. And Isaac's servants dug a well there. ²⁶And Abimelech went to him from Gerar, with Ahuzzath his adviser and Phicol the commander of his army. ²⁷And Isaac said to them, "Why have you come to me, seeing that you hated me and sent me away from you?" ²⁸And they said, "We have clearly seen that the LORD is with you. And we said, 'Let there be an oath between us, between us and you, and let us make a covenant with you,' ²⁹that you will do us no harm, just as we have not harmed you and just as we have done to you only good and have sent you away in peace. You are now the blessed of the LORD." ³⁰He prepared a feast for them, and they shared a meal together. ³¹And they rose early in the morning and swore an oath to one another. And Isaac sent them away, and they departed from him in peace. ³²And it happened on that very day that Isaac's servants came and told him about the well that they had dug, and they said to him, "We have found water!" ³³He named it Shibah, which is why the city has been called Beersheba ever since. ³⁴When Esau was forty, he married Judith, daughter of Beerli the Hittite, and Basemath, daughter of Elon the Hittite. ³⁵And they were a bitterness of spirit to Isaac and to Rebekah.

1. 'A famine in the land, besides the first famine' (ra'av ba'arets millevad hara'av harishon) — the narrator deliberately connects this famine to the one in Abraham's time (12:10). The parallel is intentional: just as Abraham faced famine and was tempted to go to Egypt, Isaac will face the same test. The word millevad ('besides, apart from') distinguishes the two events while linking them thematically. History is rhyming.
2. 'Abimelech king of the Philistines' — this is likely a different individual from the Abimelech of chapters 20–21, given the passage of roughly 80–90 years. 'Abimelech' may be a dynastic title (like Pharaoh) rather than a personal name; it means 'my father is king.' The term 'Philistines' here is likely anachronistic, referring to pre-Philistine populations in the coastal region who were later identified with the Sea Peoples' Philistine culture.
3. 'The LORD appeared to him' (vayyera elav YHWH) — this is the first recorded divine appearance to Isaac. Until now, Isaac has been the recipient of inherited blessings and others' arrangements. Now God speaks to him directly, establishing Isaac's own covenant relationship.
4. 'Do not go down to Egypt' (al-tered Mitsraymah) — the command is an explicit correction of the path Abraham took (12:10). Abraham went to Egypt during famine and encountered disaster (the Pharaoh-Sarah episode). God prevents Isaac from repeating his father's mistake. The verb yarad ('to go down') for traveling to Egypt is consistently used in Genesis and carries overtones of descent — geographical, spiritual, and moral.
5. 'Sojourn in this land' (gur ba'arets hazzo't) — the verb gur means to dwell as a resident alien, a sojourner without permanent ownership rights. God tells Isaac to stay in the land of promise, but as a stranger in it. The tension is profound: the land belongs to Isaac by divine promise, but he will live in it as a foreigner. This paradox defines the patriarchal experience.
6. 'I will be with you and I will bless you' (ve'ehyeh immekha va'avarekhekkah) — the promise of divine presence ('I will be with you') is the most fundamental assurance in Scripture. It precedes and grounds the promise of blessing. God's being-with is not passive accompaniment but active, sustaining presence. The phrase echoes God's later self-revelation to Moses: 'I will be' (ehyeh, Exodus 3:14).
7. 'I will establish the oath that I swore to Abraham your father' (vahaqimoti et-hashhevu'ah asher nishba'ti le'Avraham avikha) — God binds himself to his previous word. The covenant is not renegotiated with each generation; it is 'established' (qum — to stand, to be confirmed). Isaac inherits not a new promise but the continuation of an existing one.
8. 'As the stars of heaven' (kekokehevi hashamayim) — the stellar metaphor for Abraham's descendants (15:5; 22:17) is now applied to Isaac's. The promise of innumerable offspring is transferred without diminishment. The three elements of the Abrahamic promise — offspring, land, and universal blessing — are all restated.
9. 'In your offspring all the nations of the earth shall be blessed' (vehitbarakhu vezar'akha kol goyei ha'arets) — the universal dimension of the promise: the covenant is not for Israel's benefit alone but for the blessing of all nations. The hitpa'el form of barakh can mean 'shall bless themselves' (reflexive: nations will invoke Isaac's seed as a model of blessing) or 'shall be blessed' (passive: God will bless nations through Isaac's line). Either reading affirms the outward trajectory of the covenant.

5. 'Because' (eqev) — this word means 'on account of, because.' Strikingly, it shares the same consonantal root as aqev ('heel'), Jacob's name. Whether the wordplay is intentional, the effect is that the covenant's continuation is grounded in Abraham's obedience — a heel-print of faithfulness that marks the path forward.
5. 'My charge, my commandments, my statutes, and my laws' (mishmarti, mitsvotai, chuqqotai, vetorotai) — this fourfold description of Abraham's obedience uses terminology that later becomes technical vocabulary for the Mosaic law: mishmereth (charge, duty), mitsvah (commandment), choq (statute, decree), and torah (law, instruction). The verse implies that Abraham observed divine instruction long before Sinai. This is one of the most discussed verses in Jewish tradition, raising the question of what 'laws' Abraham kept and whether the patriarchs had access to some form of divine law before Moses.
5. The plural torotai ('my laws/instructions') is especially notable — the plural of torah. It suggests multiple bodies of divine instruction or comprehensive divine teaching, grounding the Abrahamic covenant in obedience, not merely in promise.
6. 'Isaac settled in Gerar' — in obedience to the divine command (vv. 2–3), Isaac remains in the land rather than descending to Egypt. Gerar was a city in the western Negev, near the border with Egypt. It is the same location where Abraham had his encounter with the earlier Abimelech (chapter 20). Isaac's obedience is quiet and immediate — no argument, no negotiation, no alternative plan.
7. 'She is my sister' (achoti hi) — Isaac repeats the exact deception Abraham used twice (12:13; 20:2). Unlike Abraham, Isaac has no half-truth to lean on: Rebekah is not his sister in any sense. The pattern of the father's sin recurring in the son is a sobering narrative motif. The same fear that drove Abraham — that foreign men would kill him for his beautiful wife — drives Isaac to the same lie.
7. 'Beautiful in appearance' (tovat mar'eh) — the same phrase used for Sarah (12:11, yefat mar'eh) and Rachel (29:17). Rebekah's beauty is both a gift and a danger in this patriarchal world, where a beautiful woman could become a motive for murder. The narrative does not blame Rebekah; it exposes the moral failure of the husband who should protect her but instead endangers her for his own safety.
8. 'When he had been there a long time' (ki arkhu-lo sham hayyamim) — literally, 'when the days grew long for him there.' The deception has been sustained for an extended period. The longer it continues, the greater the potential damage when discovered.
8. 'Isaac was caressing Rebekah' (Yitschaq metsacheq et Rivqah) — the verb metsacheq is a participle from tsachaq, meaning 'to laugh, to play, to caress, to fondle.' This is the same root as Isaac's name (Yitschaq = 'he laughs'). The wordplay is unmistakable and deliberate: Isaac ('he laughs') was 'laughing with' (metsacheq) Rebekah in a way that was clearly intimate, not sibling-like. Abimelech sees through the deception instantly because the nature of their interaction is obviously marital, not fraternal. The verb metsacheq appeared earlier in 21:9 (Ishmael 'laughing/mock') and 19:14 (Lot's sons-in-law thinking he was 'joking'). Each occurrence plays on Isaac's name and the theme of laughter.
9. 'Surely she is your wife!' (akh hinneh ishtekha hi) — the particle akh ('surely, indeed') expresses Abimelech's certainty and indignation. There is no ambiguity: the king saw enough to know the truth. His rhetorical question ('How could you say...?') is a rebuke. For the second time in Genesis, a pagan king rebukes a patriarch for a wife-sister deception (cf. 20:9–10). The moral clarity of the foreign ruler contrasts painfully with the covenant bearer's moral failure.
9. 'Lest I die on account of her' (pen-amut aleha) — Isaac's excuse is the same as Abraham's: fear for his own life. The excuse is neither justified nor condemned by the narrator, but Abimelech's reaction (v. 10) reveals its recklessness: Isaac's deception could have caused someone to sin unknowingly.
10. 'What is this you have done to us?' (mah-zo't asita lanu) — Abimelech's question echoes God's question to Eve (3:13) and the charges of previous victims of patriarchal deception. The verb asita ('you have done') puts the blame squarely on Isaac.
10. 'You would have brought guilt upon us' (veheveta aleinu ashame) — the word ashame means guilt, guilt-offering, or the liability incurred by sin. Abimelech understands that sexual violation carries objective guilt before God, regardless of intent. If someone had unknowingly taken Rebekah, the guilt would have fallen on the entire community. Isaac's self-protective lie would have made the innocent guilty. The pagan king grasps a moral principle that the patriarch failed to consider.
11. 'Whoever touches this man or his wife shall surely be put to death' (hannogea ba'ish hazzeh uve'ishto mot yumat) — Abimelech issues a capital decree protecting both Isaac and Rebekah. The verb naga ('to touch') here means to harm or interfere with. The penalty formula mot yumat ('dying he shall die' = 'shall surely be put to death') is the strongest legal sanction available.
11. The irony is profound: a pagan king provides the covenant bearer with greater protection than the covenant bearer provided for himself. God's promise 'I will be with you' (v. 3) is fulfilled through an unlikely instrument — the very king Isaac feared and deceived. Providence works through Abimelech's integrity to protect the covenant family.
12. 'Sowed in that land and reaped a hundredfold' (vayyizra... vayyimtsa... me'ah she'arim) — the hundred-fold return is extraordinary agricultural productivity, signaling unmistakable divine blessing. Isaac is the only patriarch described as farming; Abraham and Jacob are predominantly pastoralists. The phrase me'ah she'arim literally means 'a hundred measures' or 'a hundred gates,' indicating that for every unit sown, a hundred were harvested.
12. 'The LORD blessed him' (vayevarakhtehu YHWH) — the narrator confirms what the yield implies: this is not natural luck or superior technique but divine action. The blessing promised in v. 3 ('I will bless you') is already being fulfilled. The word barakh brackets this section: God promised to bless (v. 3), and God blesses (v. 12).

13. 'Became great... greater and greater... very great' (vayyigdal... halokh vegadel... ki-gadal me'od) — the root gadal ('to be great, to grow') appears three times in escalating intensity. The threefold repetition creates a verbal crescendo: great, then growing greater, then very great. The literary device conveys the relentless, unstoppable expansion of Isaac's prosperity — a visible sign of covenant blessing that cannot be hidden from his neighbors.
14. 'Possessions of flocks and herds and a great household' (miqneh-tson umiqneh vaqar va'avuddah rabbah) — the catalog of wealth includes two categories of livestock (small cattle and large cattle) and a large body of servants or workers (avuddah, from eved, 'servant'). This is the classic description of patriarchal wealth.
14. 'The Philistines envied him' (vayeqan'u oto Pelishtim) — the verb qana means to be jealous, to envy. Envy is the inevitable response of those who witness blessing they do not share. This envy will drive the conflict of the next several verses: the stopping of wells, the expulsion, the disputes. Envy, not justice, motivates Philistine hostility toward Isaac.
15. 'The wells that his father's servants had dug' — wells in the ancient Near East were lifelines: without them, livestock died, agriculture failed, and settlements became uninhabitable. They represented enormous labor to dig and were considered valuable property. Abraham's wells were part of his legacy to Isaac — tangible evidence of covenant occupation of the land.
15. 'Stopped up and filled with earth' (sitemum... vayemale'um afar) — the Philistines do not merely neglect the wells; they actively destroy them by filling them with dirt. This is an act of economic warfare and territorial denial. By destroying the wells, they attempt to erase Abraham's presence from the land and make it uninhabitable for Isaac. The act is a direct assault on the covenant promise of land.
16. 'Go away from us' (lekh me'immanu) — the command lekh ('go') echoes God's command to Abraham in 12:1 (lekh-lekha, 'go forth'). But here it is spoken by a human king, not by God, and the direction is away from, not toward. Abimelech expels Isaac not for wrongdoing but for being too successful. Blessing itself becomes the cause of exile.
16. 'You have become much mightier than we' (ki-atsamta mimmenu me'od) — the verb atsam means to be strong, mighty, numerous. Abimelech perceives Isaac's growing power as a threat. The statement is both a compliment and a confession of fear. The same dynamic will recur with Israel in Egypt: 'The Israelites have become much too numerous and strong for us' (Exodus 1:9) — a parallel that links Isaac's expulsion to the later Egyptian oppression.
17. 'Encamped in the valley of Gerar' (vayyichan benachal-Gerar) — Isaac does not leave the region entirely; he moves from the city to the wadi (seasonal riverbed) of Gerar. The nachal (wadi, valley) is a less desirable location than the city itself, but it provides access to water — the critical resource. Isaac's withdrawal is measured: he obeys Abimelech's command but remains as close to the promised land as possible.
18. 'Dug again the wells' (vayyachpor et-be'erot hamayim) — Isaac's act of re-digging is an act of restoration and reclamation. He does not dig new wells; he recovers what his father established. This is a parable of covenant faithfulness: each generation must reclaim the spiritual inheritance of the previous generation. What the world fills with earth, the faithful must dig out again.
18. 'He called them by the names that his father had called them' (vayyiqra lahen shemot kasshemot asher-qara lahen aviv) — naming is an act of authority and identity. By restoring the original names, Isaac resists the Philistine attempt to erase Abraham's legacy. He insists on continuity with the past. The wells are not new discoveries but recovered inheritances, and they bear their original names as proof of prior claim.
19. 'A well of living water' (be'er mayim chayyim) — 'living water' (mayim chayyim) means flowing, spring-fed water as opposed to stagnant cistern water. It is the most precious kind of water: fresh, pure, self-renewing. The phrase carries deep symbolic resonance throughout Scripture. Jeremiah will call God 'the fountain of living water' (Jeremiah 2:13; 17:13), and Jesus will speak of 'living water' that becomes 'a spring of water welling up to eternal life' (John 4:10–14; 7:38). Isaac's servants strike the richest possible water source — a sign of divine provision in the midst of conflict.
20. 'The water is ours!' (lanu hammayim) — the Gerarites claim ownership of water that Isaac's servants discovered. In the arid Negev, water rights were a matter of survival and the most common cause of tribal conflict. The Gerarites assert prior territorial claim over the natural resources of their valley.
20. 'Esek' (Eseq) — the name means 'contention' or 'dispute,' from the verb asaq ('to quarrel, to contend'). Isaac names the well after the conflict, not after the discovery. The name preserves the memory of injustice: this well was found by Isaac's labor but claimed by others. Rather than fight, Isaac moves on — a pattern of non-violent response that characterizes his dealings throughout this chapter.
21. 'Sitnah' (Sitnah) — the name means 'enmity, hostility, accusation,' from the root satan ('to oppose, to accuse'). This is the same root that gives us the word 'Satan' (the accuser, the adversary). The escalation from Esek ('contention') to Sitnah ('enmity') shows the conflict intensifying. What began as a property dispute has become personal hostility.
21. Isaac's response is again to move on rather than retaliate. He absorbs the loss and digs elsewhere. This non-violent, yielding posture is unique among the patriarchs. Abraham fought a war (chapter 14) and negotiated aggressively (chapter 23); Jacob will wrestle and scheme. Isaac yields.
22. 'Rehoboth' (Rehovot) — the name means 'broad places, wide spaces, room,' from the verb rachav ('to be wide, to make room'). After two wells of conflict, the third brings peace. The progression Esek Sitnah Rehoboth (contention enmity spaciousness) traces a journey from conflict to rest, from narrow constraint to divine enlargement.
22. 'The LORD has made room for us' (hirschiv YHWH lanu) — Isaac credits God, not his own persistence. The verb hirschiv (hiphil of rachav) means 'to make wide, to enlarge, to give room.' It is an act of divine spaciousness — God creates room for his people to flourish even in hostile territory. The concept appears in Psalm 4:1: 'You gave me room when I was in distress.'

22. 'We shall be fruitful in the land' (ufarinu va'arets) — the verb parah ('to be fruitful') echoes the creation blessing of 1:28 and the covenant promise of 17:6. Fruitfulness is both agricultural and demographic: Isaac expects that with divine room-making, his family and flocks will multiply in the promised land.
23. 'Went up' (vayya'al) — the verb alah ('to go up, to ascend') indicates movement from the lowland valley of Gerar toward the higher Negev plateau where Beersheba is located. In biblical geography, alah often carries spiritual overtones: going up toward God, toward the land, toward worship. Isaac ascends from the place of conflict to the place of covenant.
23. Beersheba (Be'er Shava) — the name means 'well of the oath' or 'well of seven' (see 21:31). This was already a significant site for Abraham, who planted a tamarisk tree there and called on the name of the LORD (21:33). Isaac's journey to Beersheba is a return to family sacred ground.
24. 'I am the God of Abraham your father' (anokhi Elohei Avraham avikha) — God identifies himself through the covenant relationship with Abraham. Isaac's God is not an anonymous deity but a God defined by prior commitment. This self-identification becomes the classic formula: 'the God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob' (Exodus 3:6).
24. 'Do not fear, for I am with you' (al-tira ki-ittkha anokhi) — the divine 'do not fear' (al-tira) appears repeatedly at critical moments in Genesis (15:1; 21:17; 46:3). It is not a command to suppress emotion but a declaration that makes courage possible: 'I am with you' is the ground of fearlessness. Isaac, recently expelled and repeatedly defrauded, needs this reassurance.
24. 'For the sake of Abraham my servant' (ba'avur Avraham avdi) — the blessing of Isaac is explicitly grounded in Abraham's faithfulness. The term eved ('servant') is a title of honor in the Hebrew Bible, used for Moses, David, and the prophets. To be called 'God's servant' is to be identified as one whose life was defined by obedient service to the divine will.
25. 'Built an altar... called upon the name of the LORD... pitched his tent... dug a well' — four actions in sequence, each establishing Isaac's presence at Beersheba: worship (altar), prayer (calling on the name), dwelling (tent), and livelihood (well). The order is significant: worship comes first, before shelter or sustenance. Isaac's first act upon receiving the divine promise is to worship.
25. 'Called upon the name of the LORD' (vayyiqrā beshem YHWH) — this phrase was first used of Enosh's generation (4:26), then of Abraham (12:8; 13:4; 21:33). Isaac continues the practice of public invocation of YHWH's name. In a polytheistic world, calling on YHWH by name is an act of testimony and allegiance.
26. 'Ahuzzath his adviser' (Achuzzat mere'ehu) — the word mere'a means 'friend, companion, adviser' — a title for a close counselor, similar to a royal advisor or 'friend of the king' (cf. 2 Samuel 15:37, where Hushai is called 'David's friend'). Ahuzzath's name may derive from achuzzah ('possession, holding'), which would be ironic given the property disputes.
26. 'Phicol the commander of his army' (Pikhol sar-tseva'o) — the same name and title appear in Abraham's encounter with Abimelech (21:22). Either this is a dynastic military title (like 'Abimelech'), or the narrative is drawing deliberate parallels between Abraham's and Isaac's experiences. The presence of the military commander underscores that this is an official diplomatic visit, not a casual one.
27. 'Why have you come to me, seeing that you hated me?' (maddua batem elai ve'attem senetem oti) — Isaac's question is direct and unsparing. He names their actions plainly: hatred (sana) and expulsion (shalach). There is no false diplomacy in his words. Isaac, often portrayed as the mildest of the patriarchs, here speaks with unflinching honesty about the injustice he endured.
27. The verb sana ('to hate') is strong. Isaac does not soften it to 'dislike' or 'inconvenience.' He identifies the emotional reality beneath the political action: they expelled him because they resented his blessing.
28. 'We have clearly seen that the LORD is with you' (ra'o ra'inu ki-hayah YHWH immakh) — the infinitive absolute construction (ra'o ra'inu, 'seeing we have seen') expresses certainty and emphasis. The Philistines acknowledge what they can no longer deny: YHWH's presence with Isaac is unmistakable. His prosperity despite persecution, his resilience despite expulsion — all point to divine favor. Even pagan observers can discern the fingerprint of God.
28. 'Let there be an oath between us' (tehi na alah beinoteinu) — the word alah means 'oath' or 'curse' (the curse invoked upon oneself if the oath is broken). They request a mutually binding agreement. Having failed to destroy Isaac through hostility, they now seek security through treaty. The verb karath ('to cut') in 'let us cut a covenant' reflects the ancient practice of cutting animals in covenant ratification (cf. 15:10, 17–18).
29. 'Just as we have not harmed you and have done to you only good' — this is a remarkable rewriting of history. The Philistines stopped up Isaac's wells (v. 15), quarreled over his new wells (vv. 20–21), and expelled him from their territory (v. 16). Yet they now characterize their treatment as benevolent. The narrative does not comment on this self-serving revision, allowing the reader to perceive the irony.
29. 'You are now the blessed of the LORD' (attah attah berukh YHWH) — despite their revisionist account, this confession is genuine and significant. Abimelech's delegation recognizes Isaac as berukh YHWH — 'blessed by the LORD.' The same title was applied to Abraham by Melchizedek (14:19). Even those who opposed Isaac cannot deny the reality of divine blessing resting on him.
30. 'He made them a feast' (vayya'as lahem mishteh) — a mishteh is a drinking feast, a banquet. Despite the history of hostility, Isaac extends generous hospitality to his former persecutors. The covenant meal is a standard element of treaty-making in the ancient Near East: sharing food creates a bond of mutual obligation and trust. Isaac's willingness to feast with those who wronged him is an act of grace and diplomacy.
31. 'Rose early in the morning' (vayyashkimu babboqer) — early rising signals urgency and seriousness throughout Genesis (19:27; 20:8; 21:14; 22:3). The oath is sworn at the first light of a new day, marking a fresh beginning in relations between Isaac and the Philistines.

31. 'They departed from him in peace' (vayyelekhum me'itto beshalom) — the keyword shalom ('peace') closes the episode. The same word was used by the Philistines in their self-serving claim (v. 29: 'we sent you away in peace'). But now shalom is genuine: the oath has established real peace. Isaac, who was expelled in enmity, now sends his visitors away in true peace — a reversal accomplished through patience, persistence, and divine blessing.
32. 'On that very day' (bayyom hahu) — the timing is providential. On the same day that Isaac makes peace with the Philistines, his servants strike water. The juxtaposition suggests divine orchestration: covenant peace and material provision arrive together.
33. 'We have found water!' (matsanu mayim) — the joyful simplicity of the announcement — just two words in Hebrew — captures the elation of finding water in the desert. After all the well disputes, after all the digging and losing and digging again, the servants can finally report success without conflict. Water, the literal and symbolic source of life, is secured.
33. 'Shibah' (Shiv'ah) — the name means 'oath' or 'seven' (from the root shava, which means both 'to swear' and 'seven'). The well's name commemorates the oath just sworn with Abimelech, linking the treaty of peace to the water of provision.
33. 'Beersheba' (Be'er Shava) — 'well of the oath' or 'well of seven.' The city's name receives a second etymological explanation here (the first was in 21:31, where Abraham named it). The double naming — once by Abraham, once by Isaac — reinforces the continuity between the generations. Both father and son made treaties at this location, both dug wells, and both connected the place to an oath. The phrase 'to this day' (ad hayyom hazzeh) is the narrator's signature, connecting the ancient event to the reader's present.
34. 'Forty years old' — the same age at which Isaac married (25:20). But where Isaac's marriage was divinely guided and covenantally appropriate, Esau's marriages are impulsive and covenantally disastrous. The age parallel highlights the contrast: same milestone, opposite outcomes.
34. 'Judith the daughter of Beeri the Hittite, and Basemath the daughter of Elon the Hittite' — Esau takes two wives simultaneously, both from the Hittite population. This directly violates the principle Abraham insisted upon in chapter 24: the covenant heir must not marry Canaanite women. Esau's marriages reveal his disregard for covenantal identity — the same carelessness that led him to sell his birthright. The Hittites (or more precisely, the 'sons of Heth') are the local Canaanite population from whom Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah.
35. 'Bitterness of spirit' (morat ruach) — the phrase combines morah ('bitterness') with ruach ('spirit, breath, wind'). It describes a deep, ongoing spiritual and emotional anguish — not a momentary frustration but a persistent grief that pervades the parents' inner life. The plural subject ('they were') indicates that both wives were sources of this pain.
35. 'To Isaac and to Rebekah' — notably, both parents share this grief. Despite their divided loyalties regarding their sons (25:28), Isaac and Rebekah are united in their distress over Esau's marriages. This detail prepares for 27:46, where Rebekah's anguish over the Hittite wives becomes the pretext for sending Jacob to Paddan-aram. Esau's marriages demonstrate that he is temperamentally and spiritually unsuited to carry the covenant forward — he has no regard for the family's covenantal distinctiveness.

Summary: Isaac, old and blind, prepares to bless Esau. Rebekah orchestrates a deception: Jacob dresses in Esau's clothes and goat skins, brings food to Isaac, and receives the firstborn's blessing. When Esau arrives and the truth emerges, Isaac trembles violently and Esau weeps bitterly, receiving only a lesser oracle. Esau resolves to kill Jacob; Rebekah arranges Jacob's flight to Haran.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is a masterpiece of sensory irony: the blind father gropes for truth through touch, smell, taste, and sound, while the seeing son lies through every channel. 'The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau' (v. 22) — Isaac identifies the deception through hearing but is overridden by touch. Isaac's trembling (v. 33) uses the strongest grammatical construction available (charadah gedolah ad-meod), suggesting a response beyond fear — the recognition that God's purposes have operated through the very deception he fell for.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew berakhah ('blessing') in this chapter carries performative, irreversible force — once spoken, it cannot be recalled or transferred, even when obtained through fraud. English 'blessing' has lost this binding weight, and we relied on the translator's notes to restore it. The name Ya'aqov ('Jacob') is explicitly connected to the root 'aqav ('to supplant/grab the heel') by Esau (v. 36) — a wordplay that defines Jacob's character and cannot be replicated without explanation.

Connections: Isaac's blessing to Jacob (27:28-29) echoes the Abrahamic promises of 12:2-3, transferring covenant status. Rebekah's willingness to bear the curse (27:13) parallels her decisive character in chapter 24. Jacob's flight to Laban in Haran (27:43) sets up the twenty-year exile of chapters 29-31. Esau's tears are recalled in Hebrews 12:17.

¹And it came to pass, when Isaac was old, and his eyes had grown too dim to see, that he called Esau his elder son and said to him, "My son." And he said to him, "Here I am." ²And he said, "See, I have grown old. I do not know the day of my death. ³Now then, take your gear — your quiver and your bow — and go out to the field and hunt game for me. ⁴And prepare for me savory food, such as I love, and bring it to me that I may eat, so that my soul may bless you before I die." ⁵Now Rebekah was listening when Isaac spoke to Esau his son. And Esau went to the field to hunt game and bring it back. ⁶And Rebekah said to Jacob her son, "Look, I heard your father speaking to Esau your brother, saying, ⁷'Bring me game and prepare me savory food that I may eat, and I will bless you before the LORD before my death.'" ⁸Now then, my son, listen to my voice — do what I command you. ⁹Go to the flock and bring me two choice young goats from there, and I will prepare them as savory food for your father, such as he loves. ¹⁰And you shall bring it to your father, that he may eat, so that he may bless you before his death." ¹¹But Jacob protested to his mother Rebekah, "My brother Esau is covered in hair, while my skin is smooth. ¹²Perhaps my father will feel me, and I shall seem to him like a deceiver, and I will bring upon myself a curse and not a blessing." ¹³And his mother said to him, "Let your curse fall on me, my son. Only obey my voice, and go — fetch them for me." ¹⁴And he went and took them and brought them to his mother, and his mother prepared savory food, such as his father loved. ¹⁵And Rebekah took the finest garments of Esau her elder son, which were with her in the house, and clothed Jacob her younger son. ¹⁶And the skins of the young goats she put on his hands and on the smooth part of his neck. ¹⁷And she placed the savory food and the bread that she had prepared into the hand of Jacob her son. ¹⁸And he came to his father and said, "My father." And he said, "Here I am. Who are you, my son?" ¹⁹And Jacob said to his father, "I am Esau, your firstborn. I have done as you told me. Rise, please, sit up and eat of my game, so that your soul may bless me." ²⁰And Isaac said to his son, "How is it that you have found it so quickly, my son?" And he said, "Because the LORD your God granted me success." ²¹And Isaac said to Jacob, "Come near, please, that I may feel you, my son — whether you are really my son Esau or not." ²²And Jacob drew near to Isaac his father, and he felt him and said, "The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau." ²³And he did not recognize him, because his hands were hairy like the hands of Esau his brother. So he blessed him. ²⁴And he said, "Are you really my son Esau?" And he said, "I am." ²⁵And he said, "Bring it near to me, and let me eat of my son's game, so that my soul may bless you." And he brought it near to him, and he ate. And he brought him wine, and he drank. ²⁶Then his father Isaac told him, "Come closer and give me a kiss, my son." ²⁷And he drew near and kissed him. And he smelled the scent of his garments and blessed him, and said, "See, the scent of my son is like the scent of a field that the LORD has blessed! ²⁸May God give you of the dew of heaven and of the fatness of the earth — abundance of grain and new wine. ²⁹Let peoples serve you and nations bow down to you. Be lord over your brothers, and let your mother's sons bow down to you. Cursed be those who curse you, and blessed be those who bless you." ³⁰And it happened that as soon as Isaac had finished blessing Jacob — Jacob had barely gone out from the presence of Isaac his father — that Esau his brother came in from his hunting. ³¹And he too prepared savory food and brought it to his father. And he said to his father, "Let my father rise and eat of his son's game, so that your soul may bless me." ³²And Isaac his father said to him, "Who are you?" And he said, "I am your son, your firstborn — Esau." ³³And Isaac trembled with a very great trembling, and he said, "Who then — who is the one who hunted game and brought it to me? I ate of it all before you came, and I blessed him — and indeed, blessed he shall remain." ³⁴When Esau heard his father's words, he cried out with a great and exceedingly bitter cry, and said to his father, "Bless me — me also, my father!" ³⁵And he said, "Your brother came with deceit and has taken your blessing." ³⁶And he said, "Is he not rightly named Jacob? For he has supplanted me these two times: he took my birthright, and now — look! — he has taken my blessing." And he said, "Have you not reserved a blessing for me?" ³⁷And Isaac answered and said to Esau, "Look, I have made him lord over you, and all his brothers I have given to him as servants, and with grain and new wine I have sustained him. What then can I do for you, my son?" ³⁸And Esau said to his father, "Have you only one blessing, my father? Bless me — me also, my father!" And Esau lifted up his voice and wept. ³⁹And Isaac his father answered and said to him, "Behold, away from the fatness of the earth shall your dwelling be, and away from the dew of heaven above. ⁴⁰By your sword you shall live, and your brother you shall serve. But it shall be that when you grow restless, you shall break his yoke from upon your neck." ⁴¹And Esau harbored hatred against Jacob because of the blessing with which his father had blessed him. And Esau said in his heart, "The days of mourning for my father are near; then I will kill my brother Jacob." ⁴²And the words of Esau her elder son were told to Rebekah. And she sent and called Jacob her younger son and said to him, "Look — your brother Esau is consoling himself regarding you by planning to kill you. ⁴³Now then, my son, listen to my voice: arise, flee to my brother Laban in Haran. ⁴⁴And stay with him a few days, until your brother's fury subsides — ⁴⁵until your brother's anger turns away from you and he forgets what you did to him. Then I will send and bring you back from there. Why should I lose both of you in a single day?" ⁴⁶And Rebekah said to Isaac, "I am weary of my life because of the Hittite women. If Jacob takes a wife from the Hittite women — from the daughters of this land — what good is my life to me?"

1. 'His eyes had grown too dim to see' (vattikhena einav mero't) — the verb kahah means to grow dim, weak, or faint. Isaac's physical blindness becomes the precondition for the entire deception narrative. But the text invites a deeper reading: Isaac's inability to 'see' extends beyond the physical. He cannot see the oracle given to Rebekah (25:23) that 'the elder shall serve the younger,' nor can he see through the deception that will follow. The dimness of his eyes mirrors a dimness of spiritual discernment.
1. 'His elder son' (beno haggadol) — literally 'his great son' or 'his older son.' The narrator's specification of 'elder' is not accidental; it recalls the oracle of 25:23 and signals that Isaac is acting in tension with God's declared purpose.
2. 'I do not know the day of my death' (lo yadati yom moti) — Isaac senses the nearness of death, though in fact he will live many more years (he dies at 180, per 35:28). His urgency to bestow the blessing reflects the ancient belief that a deathbed blessing carried special spiritual potency — the life-force of the dying patriarch was poured into the words. The irony is that Isaac's sense of urgency drives the entire crisis.
3. 'Your gear — your quiver and your bow' (kelekha telyekha veqashtekhah) — kelim is a general word for implements or equipment; telyekha ('your quiver,' from talah, 'to hang') refers to the slung weapon-case. Esau is defined by these instruments — he is the outdoorsman, the hunter. The description reinforces the characterization established in 25:27: Esau is 'a man who knows the hunt, a man of the field.'
3. 'Hunt game for me' (tsudah li tseidah) — the verb and noun share the same root ts-w-d. Isaac's appetite for hunted game is a persistent motif. His love for Esau is explicitly tied to his palate: 'Isaac loved Esau because game was in his mouth' (25:28). The sensory dimension — taste, smell — drives Isaac's actions throughout this chapter.
4. 'Savory food' (mat'ammim) — from the root t-'-m meaning 'to taste,' mat'ammim refers to delicacies prepared to delight the palate. The word appears almost exclusively in this chapter (vv. 4, 7, 9, 14, 17, 31), making it a keyword of the narrative. The blessing is bound up with physical pleasure — eating precedes blessing, as if the sensory experience unlocks the spiritual act.
4. 'That my soul may bless you' (tevarkhekha nafshi) — the blessing is not merely spoken by the mouth but issued from the nefesh, the vital self, the animating life-force. A deathbed blessing was understood as a transfer of spiritual power from the father's deepest being. It was considered irrevocable once spoken — not a wish but a performative act that shaped reality.
5. 'Rebekah was listening' (veRivqah shoma'at) — the participle shoma'at indicates ongoing action: Rebekah was in the act of hearing. Whether she was deliberately eavesdropping or happened to overhear, the text does not say. But her immediate, elaborate response suggests she may have been watching for this moment. She has known since before the twins' birth that the younger was chosen (25:23), and she now acts to ensure that oracle is fulfilled — though by human cunning rather than divine intervention.
6. 'Jacob her son' (Ya'aqov benah) — the narrator's possessive phrasing mirrors v. 5, where Esau is 'his son' (Isaac's). The text subtly maps the family's fracture: Esau belongs to Isaac, Jacob belongs to Rebekah. Each parent has claimed a son. This divided loyalty is the engine of the narrative.
7. 'Before the LORD' (lifnei YHWH) — Rebekah adds a detail not present in Isaac's original speech (v. 4): the blessing is to be 'before the LORD.' Whether Isaac actually said this and the narrator abbreviated his earlier speech, or Rebekah is adding theological weight to galvanize Jacob, this phrase transforms the scene. The blessing is not merely paternal but covenantal — it is performed in the divine presence and invokes divine authority.
8. 'Listen to my voice' (shema beqoli) — this phrase, 'obey my voice,' is covenantal language. It is the same expression God uses when demanding obedience (cf. 22:18; 26:5). Rebekah co-opts the language of divine command for her own scheme. The irony is layered: she commands obedience to accomplish deception in service of an oracle originally given by God.
9. 'Two choice young goats' (shnei gedayei izzim tovim) — the specification of two goats for one person's meal is generous, suggesting Rebekah wants to ensure the dish is indistinguishable from Esau's wild game. Some commentators note an echo of the two goats later central to Yom Kippur ritual (Leviticus 16), where one goat is offered to God and one sent to Azazel — a pairing of acceptance and rejection that mirrors Jacob and Esau's fates.
10. 'So that he may bless you before his death' (ba'avur asher yevarkhekha lifnei moto) — Rebekah's plan is brazenly simple: substitute one son for another, one meat for another, and redirect the irrevocable blessing. She acts with the confidence of someone who believes the oracle of 25:23 must be fulfilled and that she is its appointed instrument. Whether her intervention is faith or presumption — or both — the text leaves for the reader to weigh.
11. 'A hairy man... a smooth man' (ish sa'ir... ish chalaq) — the contrast is vivid and loaded. Sa'ir ('hairy') connects to Se'ir, the land Esau will inhabit (32:3; 36:8), as if his body prefigures his territory. Chalaq ('smooth') can also mean 'slippery' or 'flattering' — a word used elsewhere for deceptive speech (Psalm 12:3; Proverbs 26:28). Jacob's very body and name seem to encode his character in this moment. His objection is not moral but practical: he fears detection, not sin.

12. 'Perhaps my father will feel me' (ulai yemusheni avi) — the verb mashash ('to feel, to grope') is associated with blindness and fumbling in the dark. Isaac, deprived of sight, must rely on touch — and it is precisely this sense that the deception will target. The entire scene plays on the senses: sight (dim), touch (goatskins), smell (garments), taste (food), hearing (the voice).
12. 'Like a deceiver' (kimta'tea) — from the root t-' meaning 'to mock, to deceive.' Jacob fears being perceived as a mocker, one who trifles with the sacred. The word suggests not just deception but mockery — making a fool of the father. Notably, Jacob does not say 'I will be a deceiver' but 'I will seem like one' — a distinction that reveals his moral posture: concern for appearance rather than substance.
13. 'Let your curse fall on me' (alai qillatekha beni) — Rebekah's statement is extraordinary. She literally says 'upon me your curse, my son.' She absorbs the full risk of the deception onto herself. This is either reckless presumption or profound faith — she is so certain of the divine oracle (25:23) that she will bear any curse to see it fulfilled. The phrase has an almost sacrificial quality: she interposes herself between her son and the consequences of the act. The narrative never records any curse falling on Rebekah, but she will pay dearly: she will never see Jacob again after this chapter.
14. The narrative accelerates with three rapid verbs: vayyeelekh vayyiqqach vayyave' — 'he went, he took, he brought.' Jacob's compliance is immediate and wordless. Once Rebekah assumed the curse, his hesitation vanished. The mother's culinary skill is set against the father's appetite: she knows exactly what Isaac loves, suggesting intimate knowledge of her husband even as she deceives him.
15. 'The finest garments' (bigdei... hachamudot) — chamudot means 'desirable, precious, coveted.' These are Esau's best clothes, perhaps ceremonial garments. That they are 'with her in the house' (ittah babayit) suggests Rebekah kept them — was she already planning? The detail underscores the domestic geography of the plot: what belongs to Esau is under Rebekah's control.
15. 'Her elder son... her younger son' (benah haggadol... benah haqqatan) — the narrator uses the full patronymic formula, emphasizing the birth order that the deception is designed to subvert. The verbal framing reminds us of what is being violated.
16. 'The smooth part of his neck' (chelqat tsavvarav) — the word chelqah ('smooth part') echoes chalaq ('smooth man') from v. 11. The very smoothness that threatened to expose Jacob is now covered with animal skin. The goatskins serve double duty: their meat feeds Isaac's appetite while their hides clothe Jacob's deception. The detail is both practical and symbolic — Jacob literally wraps himself in another creature's identity, prefiguring his wrapping himself in his brother's.
17. 'The savory food and the bread' (hammat'ammim veba-lechem) — the addition of bread completes the meal. Rebekah has thought of everything. The text attributes the entire preparation to her: she kills the goats, cooks the food, selects the garments, covers Jacob's skin, and places the meal in his hands. Jacob is passive; Rebekah is the architect and executor. His hand merely carries what she has arranged.
18. 'Who are you, my son?' (mi attah beni) — the question that echoes through the chapter. Isaac's blindness forces him to ask what should be obvious. The question is simultaneously practical (he cannot see) and existential (identity is at stake). The answer Jacob gives will be a lie, but the question itself opens the space for identity to be performed rather than inherent. Who is the true son? The one who appears, or the one who was born first?
19. 'I am Esau, your firstborn' (anokhi Esav bekhorekha) — the lie is brazen and direct. Jacob claims both the name and the status. The word anokhi ('I') is the emphatic first-person pronoun — the same word God uses in 'I am the LORD your God' (anokhi YHWH Eloheikha, Exodus 20:2). The lie is spoken with maximal self-assertion.
19. Jacob also co-opts his father's language: 'that your soul may bless me' (tevarakhanni nafshekha) mirrors Isaac's original words to Esau in v. 4. He has learned the script from his mother and performs it perfectly. The scene is a masterclass in mimicry — Jacob plays Esau while using Isaac's own words.
20. 'Because the LORD your God granted me success' (ki hiqrah YHWH Elohekha lefanai) — this is the most shocking moment of the deception. Jacob invokes the divine name — YHWH — to support a lie. The verb hiqrah (from qarah, 'to cause to happen, to bring about') attributes the speed of his success to divine providence. He uses God's name as a tool of fraud. The phrase 'your God' (Elohekha) rather than 'my God' is telling — perhaps Jacob cannot bring himself to claim a personal relationship with the God he is blaspheming, or perhaps 'your God' sounds more like something Esau would say, since Esau's relationship with YHWH is mediated through Isaac.
20. Isaac's suspicion is aroused not by the voice but by the timing. His question about speed reveals a man not fully deceived — he senses something is wrong — yet he proceeds despite his misgivings.
21. 'That I may feel you' (va'amushkha) — the verb mashash ('to feel, to grope') recurs from v. 12, where Jacob feared exactly this. Touch is now the test of identity. Isaac's request is poignant: a father reaching out in blindness to verify who stands before him. The intimacy of the gesture — a father's hand on a son's body — makes the deception viscerally cruel.
21. 'Whether you are really my son Esau or not' (ha'attah zeh beni Esav im-lo) — the question is constructed to expect a yes-or-no answer. Isaac is giving Jacob one last chance to tell the truth. The phrase 'really you' (attah zeh) intensifies the inquiry: 'Are you this one — my son Esau — or not?'
22. 'The voice is the voice of Jacob, but the hands are the hands of Esau' (haqqol qol Ya'aqov vehayadayim yedei Esav) — one of the most famous lines in Genesis. Isaac perceives the contradiction but resolves it in favor of touch over hearing. The voice — the medium of truth, speech, prayer — says 'Jacob,' but the hands — the medium of action, grasping, taking — say 'Esau.' The rabbinic tradition drew a powerful lesson: 'When the voice of Jacob is heard in the houses of study, the hands of Esau have no power' (Bereshit Rabbah 65:20). The verse became a paradigm for the tension between spiritual identity (voice) and worldly power (hands).

22. The irony is total: the hands are not Esau's either. They are goatskins. Isaac's test fails because both senses deceive him — the voice is Jacob's (truth), and the hands are neither Jacob's nor Esau's (double deception).
23. 'He did not recognize him' (velo hikiro) — the verb nakkar ('to recognize, to acknowledge') is the same verb used when Judah 'recognizes' Tamar's pledge items in 38:26 and when Joseph's brothers fail to 'recognize' him in 42:8. The theme of failed recognition runs through Genesis like a scar — the patriarchal family is repeatedly undone by the inability to see what is truly present.
23. 'So he blessed him' (vayevarkheihu) — the narrator states this flatly, without commentary on its validity or moral status. The blessing proceeds. The text raises but does not answer the question: is a blessing obtained by deception still a blessing? The narrative will treat it as irrevocable (v. 33), suggesting that spoken words carry power independent of the circumstances of their utterance.
24. 'Are you really my son Esau?' — Isaac asks once more, a second direct question. His persistent doubt suggests the voice troubled him more than the hands reassured him. 'I am' (ani) — Jacob's two-word answer is stark and final. In Hebrew, ani can mean simply 'I' — an affirmation of identity that is, in this case, a radical denial of identity. The brevity may indicate that Jacob cannot sustain the lie at length; he answers with the minimum required.
25. The sensory sequence continues: after touch (vv. 21–23), now taste. Isaac eats and drinks, satisfying his appetite. The wine is a new detail — the meal is now a feast. The physical satisfaction of eating and drinking prepares Isaac's nefesh (vital self) for the act of blessing. The blessing is portrayed as arising from bodily fullness, the spirit energized by the flesh. This is not dualistic religion — body and spirit work together.
26. 'Come near and kiss me' (geshah na ushqah li) — the fourth sense: after touch, taste, and hearing, now the intimate proximity of a kiss, which will bring the fifth sense — smell (v. 27). Isaac progresses through every available sense except the one he lacks (sight). The kiss is both a gesture of paternal affection and, unwittingly, a final test. The request for a kiss from a son he has already questioned twice reveals a father who wants to believe.
27. 'He smelled the scent of his garments' (vayyarach et-reiach begadav) — the fifth and final sense completes the deception. Isaac smells Esau's garments on Jacob's body. The verb reiach and noun reiach (scent/smell) share their root with ruach (spirit/wind). Smell is the most evocative and primal of the senses. The garments carry the scent of the outdoors — Esau's world of field and hunt.
27. 'Like the scent of a field that the LORD has blessed' (kereiach sadeh asher berako YHWH) — the field evokes Eden, the original blessed ground. Isaac's words are prophetic despite the deception: the smell triggers a vision of divine abundance. The irony is that Isaac blesses Jacob while believing him to be Esau, yet the blessing's content — sovereignty over brothers, nations serving him — matches the oracle given to Rebekah about the younger. God's purpose is accomplished through human deception, a moral paradox the text does not resolve.
28. 'Dew of heaven... fatness of the earth' (mittal hashamayim umishmannei ha'arets) — the blessing begins with fertility from above and below. Tal ('dew') is crucial in the semi-arid land of Israel, where summer rain is absent and dew provides essential moisture. Shemen ('fat, oil, richness') denotes the earth's productive capacity. Together they represent total agricultural abundance — heaven's gift meeting earth's yield.
28. 'Grain and new wine' (dagan vetirosh) — these are the staples of settled agricultural life, not the provisions of a hunter. The blessing Isaac gives to 'Esau' is actually suited to Jacob's destiny as a farmer and herdsman. Even in his deception, the blessing finds its proper recipient.
29. 'Be lord over your brothers' (heveh gevir le'achekha) — gevir means 'master, lord.' This directly fulfills the oracle of 25:23: 'the elder shall serve the younger.' Isaac unknowingly speaks the very word God spoke to Rebekah. The blessing has political and familial dimensions: dominion over nations (peoples, le'ummim) and dominion over brothers (achim).
29. 'Cursed be those who curse you, and blessed be those who bless you' (orerekha arur umvarakhekha barukh) — this formula echoes the Abrahamic blessing of 12:3 almost verbatim, but in reverse order (there it was 'I will bless those who bless you and curse those who curse you'). The inversion may be significant: the protective formula now concludes rather than opens the blessing, serving as a seal. The transfer of the Abrahamic covenant blessing — intended or not — is complete.
30. 'Jacob had barely gone out' (akh yatso yatsa) — the infinitive absolute construction (yatso yatsa, 'going out he had gone out') emphasizes the completeness of Jacob's exit, while akh ('scarcely, only just') compresses the timing to the narrowest possible margin. The near-collision of the two brothers creates unbearable narrative tension. A moment later and the deception would have been exposed in real time. The timing suggests either extraordinary luck or providential orchestration — the text allows either reading.
31. 'He too prepared savory food' (vayya'as gam-hu mat'ammim) — gam-hu ('he too, he also') carries the weight of the tragedy. Esau has done exactly what was asked: he hunted, he cooked, he brought the food. He fulfilled his father's request faithfully. The duplication of the scene — the same food, the same words, the same request for blessing — is devastating precisely because it arrives too late. Esau's obedience is genuine but superfluous.
32. 'Who are you?' (mi attah) — the same question Isaac asked Jacob in v. 18, but now with entirely different weight. Before, it was a question of verification; now it is a question of horror. Isaac already knows the answer he dreads. The repetition of the identity question frames the entire deception: the same words, spoken in two different emotional registers, bracket the fraud.
32. 'I am your son, your firstborn — Esau' (ani binkha bekhorekha Esav) — Esau piles up terms of identity: your son, your firstborn, Esau. Three claims, each one true. The accumulation suggests Esau senses something is wrong and over-identifies himself, as if to dispel a doubt he does not yet understand.

33. 'Isaac trembled with a very great trembling' (vayyecherad Yitschaq charadah gedolah ad-me'od) — the cognate accusative construction (trembled a trembling) intensifies the emotion to its extreme. The added ad-me'od ('exceedingly, to the utmost') pushes beyond even that. This is not mere surprise — it is existential terror. Isaac realizes in a flash that he has been deceived, that the blessing has gone to the wrong son, and — most terrifyingly — that it cannot be undone. Some commentators suggest Isaac also realizes in this moment that God's oracle to Rebekah has been fulfilled through his own unwitting act, and his trembling is the shock of recognizing divine will working through human deception.
33. 'Blessed he shall remain' (gam-barukh yihyeh) — Isaac confirms the irrevocability of the blessing. Despite knowing it was obtained by fraud, he does not retract it. The performative power of the spoken word, once released, cannot be recalled. This is not resignation but recognition of a deeper reality: the blessing has found its divinely intended recipient, regardless of the method.
34. 'A great and exceedingly bitter cry' (tse'aqah gedolah umarah ad-me'od) — the tse'aqah is not a whimper but a scream, a howl of anguish. The same word describes the cry of the Israelites under Egyptian oppression (Exodus 3:7) and the cry of Sodom (18:20). It is the sound of injustice experienced in the body. The addition of marah ('bitter') and ad-me'od ('exceedingly') makes this one of the rawest expressions of grief in Scripture. Hebrews 12:17 remembers this moment: Esau 'found no place of repentance, though he sought it carefully with tears.'
34. 'Bless me — me also, my father!' (barkheni gam-ani avi) — the repetition of gam-ani ('me too, also me') is heartbreaking. Esau does not yet ask for the stolen blessing back; he asks simply to be included, to not be forgotten. The cry of the displaced child: 'Am I not also your son?'
35. 'With deceit' (bemirmah) — the word mirmah means 'deceit, treachery, fraud.' Isaac names the act plainly. The same word will be used of Jacob's sons in 34:13 when they deceive the Shechemites. Deceit runs in the family. The word comes from the root r-m-h, related to ramah ('to throw, to cast down, to deceive') — suggesting that deception is a form of violence, a throwing-down of the other.
35. 'Has taken your blessing' (vayyiqqach birkhatekha) — the verb laqach ('to take') echoes through Jacob's life: he took the heel (25:26), took the birthright (25:33), and now takes the blessing. Jacob is defined by taking — a pattern that will continue until Peniel (32:26), where he will finally wrestle for what he wants rather than steal it.
36. 'Is he not rightly named Jacob?' (hakhi qara shemo Ya'aqov) — Esau makes the etymological connection explicit: Ya'aqov ('heel-grasper, supplanter') is living up to his name. The verb vayyaqveni ('he has supplanted me, he has heel-tripped me') is a wordplay on the name — ya'aqov becomes ya'qveni. The name, given at birth for grasping Esau's heel (25:26), now reveals its full meaning: to follow at the heel is to trip, to undercut, to supplant. Names in Genesis are destiny.
36. 'These two times' (zeh pa'amayim) — Esau counts: the birthright (bekorah, chapter 25) and the blessing (berakhah, this chapter). The two words even sound alike in Hebrew — bekorah/berakhah — as if they were always meant to go together. What the birthright established in legal terms, the blessing sealed in spiritual ones.
37. 'I have made him lord over you' (hen gevir samtiv lakh) — Isaac recounts the content of the blessing he gave: lordship, servitude of brothers, agricultural abundance. Each element is now a barrier to blessing Esau. The blessing was not a wish but a reallocation of reality — Isaac has disposed of everything. The question 'what then can I do for you?' (ulekha efo mah e'eseh) is the question of a man who has spent everything and has nothing left to give. It is devastatingly honest.
38. 'Have you only one blessing?' (havrahah achat hi-lekha avi) — Esau's question challenges the scarcity model of blessing. Can a father's blessing truly be exhausted? The answer, in this narrative's logic, is yes — the patriarchal deathbed blessing is a singular, unrepeatable act. It is not a prayer (which can be offered for anyone, anytime) but a bestowal of covenantal inheritance, which is finite.
38. 'And Esau lifted up his voice and wept' (vayyissa Esav qolo vayyevk) — the same phrase used of Hagar in the wilderness (21:16). Esau weeps like the outcast he is becoming. This is not the cry of rage (that comes in v. 41) but the cry of grief — the sound of a man who has lost something irreplaceable and knows it. The text grants Esau genuine pathos. Whatever his faults — selling the birthright carelessly (25:34) — his grief here is treated as real and legitimate.
39. 'Away from the fatness of the earth... away from the dew of heaven' (mishmannei ha'arets... umittal hashamayim) — the preposition min is ambiguous. It can mean 'from' (partitive: 'of the fatness') or 'away from' (privative: 'far from the fatness'). The KJV and some translations read it as partitive — Esau will enjoy the earth's richness. But the rendering follows the privative reading, which better fits the context: Esau's 'blessing' is an inversion of Jacob's. Where Jacob receives the dew and fatness (v. 28), Esau is deprived of them. Edom's territory — the arid highlands south and east of the Dead Sea — confirms the privative reading geographically.
40. 'By your sword you shall live' (ve'al-charbbekha tichyeh) — Esau's destiny is martial, not agricultural. He will live by violence rather than cultivation. The sword (cherev) replaces the plow. This prophecy anticipates the character of Edom as a warrior nation, perpetually at odds with Israel.
40. 'When you grow restless, you shall break his yoke' (ka'asher tarid ufaraqta ullo me'al tsavvarekha) — the verb tarid (from rud, 'to roam, to be restless, to rebel') suggests that Esau's servitude is not permanent. When he chafes enough, he will throw off Jacob's dominion. This was fulfilled historically when Edom revolted against Judah's rule (2 Kings 8:20–22). Isaac's prophecy for Esau contains both servitude and eventual liberation — a cruel consolation, but not total despair.
41. 'Esau harbored hatred' (vayyistom Esav) — the verb satam means 'to bear a grudge, to harbor enmity, to persist in hostility.' It implies not a flash of anger but a settled, enduring hatred — animosity that calculates and waits. The same verb describes Joseph's brothers' fear that Joseph will 'bear a grudge' against them (50:15). Grudge-bearing is the slow poison of Genesis's family narratives.

41. 'Esau said in his heart' (vayyomer Esav belibbo) — internal speech, accessible only to the narrator (and to God). Esau's plan is private, but Rebekah somehow learns of it (v. 42). The plan is chilling in its restraint: Esau will wait until after the mourning period for Isaac before killing Jacob. He honors his father even while plotting fratricide — a terrible mix of filial piety and murderous rage. The echo of Cain (4:8) is unmistakable: brother planning to kill brother.
42. 'Is consoling himself by planning to kill you' (mitnachem lekha lehorgekha) — the hitpa'el of nacham means 'to comfort oneself, to find consolation.' The construction is chilling: Esau's comfort, his consolation for the loss of the blessing, is the anticipated murder of his brother. Violence as therapy. The verb nacham also means 'to repent, to relent' — but here it carries no such softening. Esau's grief has curdled into lethal intent.
42. The narrator again identifies the sons by birth order — 'her elder son... her younger son' — maintaining the structural tension between the natural order and the divine reversal.
43. 'Listen to my voice' (shema beqoli) — the same command Rebekah gave in v. 8, forming a bracket around the deception narrative. Her first 'listen to my voice' initiated the fraud; her second 'listen to my voice' initiates the flight. She who orchestrated the theft of the blessing now orchestrates the escape from its consequences. Rebekah remains the strategist throughout.
43. 'Flee to my brother Laban in Haran' (berach-lekha el-Lavan achi Charanah) — Rebekah sends Jacob back to her family of origin, the house she left decades ago (chapter 24). The journey will take Jacob out of the promised land for twenty years. The deception, while securing the blessing, costs Jacob his home, his family, and his youth.
44. 'A few days' (yamim achadim) — Rebekah's estimate is tragically optimistic. The 'few days' will become twenty years (31:38, 41). She will never see Jacob again. The phrase yamim achadim ('days — a few') uses the same expression from 29:20, where Jacob's seven years of labor for Rachel 'seemed like a few days because of his love for her.' What Rebekah imagines as brief will become the defining exile of Jacob's life.
45. 'Why should I lose both of you in a single day?' (lamah eshkal gam-shneikhem yom echad) — the verb shakhal means 'to be bereaved of children.' Rebekah fears a double loss: if Esau kills Jacob, Esau will be executed as a murderer (cf. 9:6), and she will lose both sons. The 'single day' (yom echad) concentrates the catastrophe into a point: in one stroke, the mother of twins would become childless. This is perhaps the most human moment in the chapter — behind all the scheming, Rebekah is a mother who loves both her sons, even the one she deceived against.
46. 'I am weary of my life' (qatsti bechayai) — the verb quts means 'to loathe, to feel disgust, to be sick of.' Rebekah expresses existential exhaustion — she is disgusted with life itself. The cause she names — Hittite women — is likely a pretext. The real urgency is to get Jacob away from Esau without revealing the murder plot to Isaac. Rebekah's brilliance as a strategist continues: she frames the departure as a marriage-seeking mission rather than a flight from death.
46. 'The daughters of Heth' (benot Chet) — Esau's Hittite wives were already identified as 'a bitterness of spirit to Isaac and Rebekah' (26:35). Rebekah uses this genuine grievance as diplomatic cover. Her speech to Isaac is not false — the Hittite marriages truly distress her — but it is strategically selective, concealing the deeper and more dangerous reason for Jacob's departure.

Summary: Isaac blesses Jacob with the 'blessing of Abraham' and sends him to Paddan-aram to find a wife. Esau, seeing his Canaanite wives displease his parents, marries Ishmael's daughter. At Bethel, Jacob dreams of a stairway to heaven with angels ascending and descending. God promises him the land, offspring, and his presence. Jacob vows that if God keeps him, the LORD will be his God.

What Makes This Remarkable: The dream at Bethel is one of the most iconic visions in the Hebrew Bible. The sullam ('stairway/ladder,' v. 12) appears only here — its rarity mirrors the singularity of the vision. The fourfold 'behold' (hinneh, vv. 12-15) signals escalating revelation: a stairway, angels, the LORD, and a promise. Jacob's response — 'Surely the LORD is in this place, and I did not know it' (v. 16) — confesses that divine presence operates independently of human awareness. His conditional vow (vv. 20-22) has been read as either faith's beginning or a bargainer's hedge.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew sullam (v. 12) is traditionally rendered 'ladder' but may better be understood as a stairway or ramp — similar to a ziggurat staircase connecting earth and heaven. We noted this in the translator's notes. Jacob's vow uses a conditional 'if' (im, v. 20) that English handles naturally but that raises theological questions: is Jacob placing conditions on his covenant with God? The Hebrew syntax leaves the tension intact, and we preserved it.

Connections: Jesus cites this vision in John 1:51 ('you will see angels ascending and descending on the Son of Man'). The promise of divine presence — 'I will not leave you' (28:15) — echoes the assurance given to Isaac (26:3) and anticipates God's word to Moses (Exodus 3:12) and Joshua (Joshua 1:5). Bethel ('house of God') becomes a recurring sacred site throughout Israel's history (Judges 20:18; 1 Kings 12:29).

¹And Isaac called Jacob and blessed him and charged him, saying to him, "You shall not take a wife from the daughters of Canaan. ²Arise, go to Paddan-aram, to the house of Bethuel, your mother's father, and take a wife from there, from the daughters of Laban, your mother's brother. ³And may El Shaddai bless you and make you fruitful and multiply you, that you may become an assembly of peoples. ⁴And may he give you the blessing of Abraham — to you and to your offspring with you — that you may possess the land of your sojournings, which God gave to Abraham." ⁵And Isaac sent Jacob away, and he went to Paddan-aram, to Laban son of Bethuel the Aramean, the brother of Rebekah, the mother of Jacob and Esau. ⁶And Esau saw that Isaac had blessed Jacob and sent him away to Paddan-aram to take a wife from there, and that as he blessed him he charged him, saying, "You shall not take a wife from the daughters of Canaan," ⁷and that Jacob had obeyed his father and his mother and had gone to Paddan-aram. ⁸And Esau saw that the daughters of Canaan were displeasing in the eyes of Isaac his father. ⁹And Esau went to Ishmael and took Mahalath, the daughter of Ishmael, Abraham's son, the sister of Nebaioth, as a wife in addition to the wives he already had. ¹⁰And Jacob went out from Beersheba and set out for Haran. ¹¹And he came upon a certain place and spent the night there, for the sun had set. And he took one of the stones of the place and put it under his head, and he lay down in that place. ¹²And he dreamed, and behold — a stairway set up on the earth, and its top reaching to heaven. And behold — angels of God ascending and descending on it. ¹³And behold — the LORD was standing above it, and he said, "I am the LORD, the God of Abraham your father, and the God of Isaac. The land on which you are lying — to you I will give it, and to your offspring. ¹⁴And your offspring shall be like the dust of the earth, and you shall spread out to the west and to the east, to the north and to the south. And in you and in your offspring all the families of the earth shall be blessed. ¹⁵And behold, I am with you and will keep you wherever you go, and I will bring you back to this land. For I will not leave you until I have done what I have promised you." ¹⁶And Jacob awoke from his sleep and said, "Surely the LORD is in this place, and I — I did not know it." ¹⁷And he was afraid and said, "How awesome is this place! This is none other than the house of God, and this is the gate of heaven." ¹⁸And Jacob rose early in the morning and took the stone that he had placed under his head, and he set it up as a pillar and poured oil on its top. ¹⁹And he called the name of that place Bethel, though the name of the city had formerly been Luz. ²⁰And Jacob made a vow, saying, "If God will be with me and will keep me on this journey that I am taking, and will give me bread to eat and clothing to wear, ²¹and I return safely to my father's house — then the LORD shall be my God. ²²And this stone that I have set up as a pillar shall be the house of God. And of all that you give me, I will surely give a tenth to you."

1. 'Isaac called Jacob and blessed him' (vayyiqra Yitschaq el-Ya'aqov vayevarekh oto) — this is a second blessing, and it is everything the first was not: intentional, clear-eyed, and explicitly covenantal. Isaac now blesses Jacob knowingly. Whether he has accepted the divine oracle or simply recognized that the blessing cannot be undone, he acts deliberately. The verb vayyetsavehu ('and he charged him') adds a commandment to the blessing — this is not just gift but commission.
2. 'You shall not take a wife from the daughters of Canaan' (lo tiqqach ishaq mibbenot Kena'an) — the prohibition echoes Abraham's charge to his servant regarding Isaac's wife (24:3). The endogamy requirement — marrying within the covenant family — is a recurring concern of Genesis. The Canaanite wives of Esau (26:34–35) are the negative example. Marriage to Canaanite women threatened cultural and religious assimilation.
3. 'Paddan-aram' (Paddenah Aram) — the region in upper Mesopotamia where Abraham's extended family settled (cf. 25:20). Paddan may mean 'field' or 'plain,' making Paddan-aram 'the field of Aram.' Jacob's journey retraces Abraham's servant's route in reverse: where the servant went to bring a bride to Canaan (chapter 24), Jacob now goes himself to find one. But Jacob's departure is also an exile — he leaves the promised land under threat of death.
4. 'The house of Bethuel, your mother's father' (beitah Betuel avi immekha) — Isaac identifies the family line precisely. The detail connects Jacob to matrilineal heritage through Rebekah. Isaac sends Jacob to the world Rebekah came from, closing a generational loop.
5. 'El Shaddai' (El Shaddai) — Isaac invokes the divine name used in God's appearance to Abraham in 17:1, where the covenant of circumcision was established. This is the patriarchal name for God, associated with promises of fertility and nationhood. Its etymology is debated: possibly 'God of the Mountain,' 'God the Almighty,' or 'God the Sufficient One.' By using this name, Isaac consciously places Jacob in the covenant lineage.
6. 'An assembly of peoples' (qahal ammim) — the word qahal ('assembly, congregation') anticipates Israel as a gathered community — not just a single nation but a qahal, an organized body of peoples. This term will become central to Israel's self-understanding (the qahal of Israel at Sinai, Deuteronomy 5:22). Isaac's vision is collective, not merely individual: Jacob will father not just descendants but a community.

4. 'The blessing of Abraham' (birkat Avraham) — this is the explicit, named transfer of the Abrahamic covenant. Isaac does not merely bless Jacob with good wishes; he transmits the specific, historical blessing given to Abraham: land, offspring, and divine presence. The phrase birkat Avraham appears only here in Genesis, marking this moment as the formal covenantal handoff from the second generation to the third.
4. 'The land of your sojournings' (erets megureikha) — the paradox again: the land is simultaneously possessed ('that you may possess') and sojourned in (megurim, 'sojournings, temporary dwellings'). Jacob will inherit what he cannot yet fully inhabit. The tension between promise and present reality — owning a land in which one is a stranger — defines the patriarchal experience.
5. 'The mother of Jacob and Esau' (em Ya'aqov ve'Esav) — the narrator's final mention of Rebekah in this scene names her as mother of both sons, not just Jacob. The reminder is poignant: she is sending one son away to protect him from the other, and she loves both. This is the last narrative scene in which Rebekah plays an active role; her death is recorded only incidentally through the notice of Deborah's death (35:8). The woman who dominated chapters 24 and 27 exits the story in silence.
5. 'Bethuel the Aramean' (Betuel ha'Arammi) — the ethnic designation 'Aramean' reminds the reader that the patriarchal family is not indigenous to Canaan. They are Arameans living in Canaanite land — another expression of the sojourner identity.
6. 'Esau saw' (vayyar Esav) — Esau is now the observer, watching as Isaac deliberately blesses Jacob and sends him to find a proper wife. The verb ra'ah ('to see') is loaded in this chapter where Isaac could not see (27:1). Esau sees clearly what is happening: his father has ratified the stolen blessing and formally excluded him from the covenantal line. His response (vv. 8–9) will be an attempt to regain favor by imitating Jacob's obedience — but through the wrong channel.
7. 'Jacob obeyed his father and his mother' (vayyishma Ya'aqov el-aviv ve'el-immo) — the verb shama ('to listen, to obey') is used with both parents. Jacob's obedience is presented straightforwardly — he listened to both. The contrast with Esau is implicit: Esau married Canaanite women against his parents' wishes (26:34–35). Jacob's departure, though motivated by fear of Esau, is framed as an act of filial obedience.
8. 'Displeasing in the eyes of Isaac his father' (ra'ot benot Kena'an be'einei Yitschaq aviv) — ra'ot ('evil, bad, displeasing') in Isaac's eyes. Esau finally perceives what has been true all along: his Hittite wives grieved his parents (26:35). His response will be to take yet another wife — but from Ishmael's family rather than a Canaanite one. The attempt to please is genuine but misguided: he adds a wife rather than dealing with the existing problem, and he chooses Ishmael's line (the other rejected son) rather than the Aramean family line that Isaac specified.
9. 'Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael' (Machalat bat-Yishma'el) — the name Machalat may derive from machalah ('sickness') or from machol ('dance'). In 36:3 this same woman appears to be called Basemath — either she had two names or there is a textual variation. By marrying Ishmael's daughter, Esau connects two lines of Abrahamic descent that were both passed over for the covenant: Ishmael (passed over for Isaac) and Esau (passed over for Jacob). The excluded sons unite.
9. 'In addition to the wives he already had' (al-nashav) — Esau does not divorce his Canaanite wives; he simply adds another. The polygamous accumulation compounds rather than corrects the problem. Esau's response to his father's displeasure is additive, not reformative.
10. 'Jacob went out from Beersheba' (vayyetse Ya'aqov miBe'er Shava) — this verse opens the great journey narrative. The verb yatsa ('to go out') marks a departure not just geographical but existential: Jacob leaves the land of promise, the place of his father's wells (26:32–33), the security of home. The terse, two-clause sentence mirrors the loneliness of the departure — no farewell scene, no traveling companions, no provisions mentioned. Jacob goes out alone. This verse gives its name to the weekly Torah portion: Vayetse.
11. 'He came upon a certain place' (vayyifga bamaqom) — the verb paga' means 'to encounter, to meet, to strike upon' — it suggests an unplanned arrival, a chance collision with a place. But the definite article — hamaqom, 'THE place' — hints that this is no ordinary location. It is the place, as if it had been waiting for him. Later Jewish tradition identified this site with Mount Moriah, where Abraham bound Isaac (22:2), and with the future Temple Mount — a convergence of sacred geography.
11. 'He took one of the stones of the place and put it under his head' (vayyiqqach me'avnei hamaqom vayyasem mera'ashotav) — the stone pillow is a detail of stark realism: Jacob sleeps rough, a fugitive with no provisions. The stone under his head becomes the stone he will anoint (v. 18) — the pillow becomes a pillar. Objects are transformed by encounter with the divine.
12. 'Angels of God ascending and descending' (mal'akhei Elohim olim veyoredim bo) — the order is significant: they ascend first, then descend. If they were heaven-based, they would descend first. The ascending-first order suggests the angels were already on earth, accompanying Jacob, and now return to heaven to report — while others descend to continue the watch. The implication is that divine protection preceded Jacob's awareness of it. He was guarded before he knew he was guarded.
12. The word mal'akh means 'messenger' — these are not decorative celestial beings but agents on assignment, traversing the connection between heaven and earth. The vision reveals that the mundane world is saturated with divine activity invisible to waking eyes.
13. 'The LORD was standing above it' (YHWH nitsav alav) — the preposition alav is ambiguous: it can mean 'above it' (the stairway) or 'beside him' (Jacob). If God stands atop the stairway, the vision is cosmological — God at the summit of the heavenly ascent. If God stands beside Jacob, the vision is intimate — God at the side of the sleeping fugitive. Both readings are theologically profound. The rendering preserves 'above it' while acknowledging the ambiguity.

13. 'I am the LORD, the God of Abraham your father, and the God of Isaac' (ani YHWH Elohei Avraham avikha ve'Elohei Yitschaq) — God introduces himself through the chain of covenant relationship. He is not an abstract deity but the God of specific persons with specific histories. The phrase 'Abraham your father' is striking — Abraham was Jacob's grandfather, but 'father' (av) is used in the covenantal sense of 'ancestor, patriarch.' God self-identifies through relationship, not through philosophical attributes.
13. 'The land on which you are lying' (ha'arets asher attah shokhev aleha) — the promise is startlingly concrete: the very ground under Jacob's sleeping body belongs to him and his descendants. The specificity is almost humorous — God promises not 'a land' but 'this land, right here, the dirt beneath your back.' The horizontal body of the sleeper claims the earth by divine decree.
14. 'Like the dust of the earth' (ka'afar ha'arets) — to Abraham, God compared descendants to stars (15:5) and sand (22:17). To Jacob, the metaphor is dust — the most humble and earthy of the images. Dust is what Jacob is lying on. The promise meets him where he is: on the ground, alone, in the dark. Dust is also the most innumerable of the comparisons — uncountable by any method.
14. 'You shall spread out' (ufaratsta) — the verb parats means 'to break out, to burst forth, to spread.' It connotes unstoppable expansion, like water breaching a dam. The four compass directions (west, east, north, south — yammah vaqedmah vetsafonah vanegbah) indicate total, unlimited expansion in every direction. The promise is not for a territory with fixed borders but for a dynamic, spreading presence.
14. 'All the families of the earth shall be blessed in you and in your offspring' (venivrekhu vekha kol-mishpechot ha'adamah uvezar'ekha) — the universal dimension of the Abrahamic promise (12:3) is now given to Jacob. The word mishpachot ('families, clans') is more intimate than goyim ('nations') — the blessing reaches into family-level human experience. The covenant is for the healing of every human household.
15. 'I am with you' (anokhi immakh) — the most fundamental divine promise in Scripture. God's presence is personal (anokhi, the emphatic 'I'), continuous ('wherever you go'), protective ('I will keep you'), and purposeful ('I will bring you back'). This promise is given to a man who obtained the blessing by fraud, who is fleeing his brother's murderous rage, who sleeps on a stone in a nameless place. Grace precedes merit. God does not say, 'Because you are righteous, I am with you.' He simply says, 'I am with you.'
15. 'I will not leave you until I have done what I have promised you' (lo e'ezvekha ad asher im-asiti et asher dibbarti lakh) — the promise is bounded: 'until I have done.' This might suggest a limit to divine presence, but the logic is assurance, not expiration: God will not abandon Jacob before fulfilling every word. The implication is that fulfillment is certain — the only question is when, not whether. God binds himself to his own word.
16. 'Surely the LORD is in this place, and I did not know it' (akhen yesh YHWH bamaqom hazzeh ve'anokhi lo yadati) — one of the most theologically resonant sentences in the Bible. The word akhen ('surely, indeed') marks a discovery — something known now that was unknown before. Jacob's statement is simultaneously confession and revelation: God was here all along, but Jacob was ignorant of it. The implication extends beyond this single location: if God was present in this unremarkable, unnamed place, then perhaps God is present everywhere — and human unawareness changes nothing about the divine reality. The emphatic ve'anokhi ('and I') places Jacob's ignorance in sharp contrast with God's presence. The verse has become foundational for mystical theology: the divine is present in the ordinary, the sacred permeates the mundane, and the only thing missing is human awareness.
17. 'How awesome is this place!' (mah-nora hamaqom hazzeh) — the adjective nora (from yare', 'to fear') means 'awe-inspiring, fearsome, terrible in majesty.' It is the same word used of God's acts at the Red Sea (Exodus 15:11) and of God's own character (Deuteronomy 7:21). Jacob's response to the sacred is not comfort but fear — the tremendum of divine encounter. The sacred is not safe; it is overwhelming.
17. 'The house of God and the gate of heaven' (beit Elohim... sha'ar hashamayim) — two defining metaphors. Beit Elohim ('house of God') will become the name of the place: Bethel (v. 19). The 'gate of heaven' (sha'ar hashamayim) suggests a portal, an access point between the earthly and heavenly realms — the very thing the stairway vision revealed. The imagery combines temple (house) and threshold (gate): this is where God dwells and where heaven opens. Jacob, the homeless fugitive, has stumbled upon the threshold of heaven while sleeping on the ground.
18. 'He set it up as a pillar' (vayyasem otah matstsevah) — the matstsevah is a standing stone, a sacred marker. The transformation is striking: the same stone that served as a pillow (functional, horizontal) is now erected as a pillar (sacred, vertical). What was beneath Jacob's head is now raised above it. The anointing with oil (shemen) consecrates the stone — it becomes holy by being set apart and marked. This is one of the earliest recorded acts of worship in the patriarchal narratives.
18. 'Poured oil on its top' (vayyitsoq shemen al-roshah) — the verb yatsaq ('to pour') is used for formal anointing. Oil symbolizes the divine Spirit, abundance, and consecration. Kings and priests will later be anointed with oil (mashach, from which mashiach/messiah derives). Jacob's act is priestly — he consecrates the place where God revealed himself.
19. 'Bethel' (Beit-El) — 'House of God,' directly naming the place from Jacob's exclamation in v. 17 (beit Elohim). The renaming transforms anonymous geography into sacred space. Bethel will become one of the most important cultic sites in Israel's history — a place of worship, prophecy, and eventually controversy (when Jeroboam I sets up golden calves there, 1 Kings 12:29).
19. 'Though formerly Luz' (ve'ulam Luz shem-ha'ir larishonah) — Luz means 'almond tree' or possibly 'deviation, turning aside.' The narrator preserves the old name as historical memory. The renaming does not erase the past; it adds a sacred layer to existing geography. The place was always there — only its identity has been revealed.

- 20. 'Jacob made a vow' (vayyiddar Ya'aqov neder) — this is the first vow (neder) recorded in Scripture. A neder is a conditional promise to God: 'if you do X, then I will do Y.' The conditionality is striking — and has troubled commentators. God has just made unconditional promises to Jacob (vv. 13–15): land, offspring, presence, protection. Jacob responds with conditions. Is this faith or calculation? Trust or bargaining? The answer may be both: Jacob, the supplanter and dealer, brings his transactional nature even to his encounter with God. He cannot yet receive grace purely; he must negotiate.
- 20. 'Bread to eat and clothing to wear' (lechem le'ekhol ubeged lilbosh) — Jacob asks for the barest necessities: food and clothing. The man who stole a blessing of grain, wine, dew, and dominion now asks only for survival provisions. The contrast between the grandiose blessing he took and the modest provisions he requests reveals either genuine humility or a fugitive's desperation — or both.
- 21. 'I return safely to my father's house' (veshavti veshalom el-beit avi) — the word shalom means not merely 'safely' but 'in wholeness, in completeness, in peace.' Jacob wants to come back whole — not just alive but restored, reconciled, integrated. The journey to Haran will break him before it makes him whole; he will return with wives, children, wealth, a limp, and a new name (32:28).
- 21. 'Then the LORD shall be my God' (vehayah YHWH li le'Elohim) — the most audacious element of the vow. Jacob makes his acceptance of YHWH as his personal God conditional on divine performance. This is not the language of settled faith but of a man testing the waters. God declared 'I am the LORD, the God of Abraham your father' (v. 13); Jacob responds, in effect, 'We'll see.' The verb hayah ('to be') in the future tense — 'he will be my God' — defers the relationship. Jacob's faith is embryonic, conditional, emerging. It will mature through twenty years of hardship, deception by Laban, and the wrestling at Peniel.
- 22. 'This stone... shall be the house of God' (veha'even hazzo't... yihyeh beit Elohim) — the stone-pillow-become-pillar is now declared to be God's house. The progression is complete: stone pillow pillar house of God. A piece of the earth's surface has been elevated through encounter and consecration into a dwelling place for the divine. The theology is not that God needs a house but that sacred spaces are created by divine encounter and human response.
- 22. 'I will surely give a tenth' (asser a'assrennu) — the infinitive absolute construction (asser a'assrennu) emphasizes certainty: 'tithing I will tithe.' The ma'aser (tithe, tenth) predates Mosaic legislation; it appears already in Abraham's gift to Melchizedek (14:20). Jacob pledges a tenth of everything God gives him — an acknowledgment that all prosperity originates with God and that a portion must be returned. The tithe is both gratitude and obligation, both worship and economics. Jacob the calculator gives God exactly ten percent — no more, no less. Even his worship has a precise figure.

Summary: Jacob arrives in Haran, meets Rachel at a well, and weeps. He agrees to serve Laban seven years for Rachel. On the wedding night, Laban substitutes Leah. Jacob protests; Laban cites local custom about the firstborn. Jacob serves another seven years for Rachel. God sees Leah is unloved and opens her womb; she bears Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah.

What Makes This Remarkable: The deceiver is deceived: Jacob who dressed as his older brother to steal a blessing is now given the older sister instead of the younger. Laban's justification — 'it is not done in our place to give the younger before the firstborn' (v. 26) — is an exact inversion of what Jacob did. Each of Leah's sons' names encodes her pain: Reuben ('see, a son'), Simeon ('heard'), Levi ('joined/attached'), and Judah ('praise') — tracing an arc from desperate hope for love to worship of God. The seven years that 'seemed but a few days because of his love' (v. 20) is one of the Bible's most affecting descriptions of desire.

Translation Friction: Leah's eyes are described as rakkot (v. 17), a word meaning 'soft,' 'tender,' or 'weak.' Whether this is a compliment (gentle, tender eyes) or a deficiency (weak, dull eyes) is debated, and the contrast with Rachel's beauty leaves the meaning uncertain. We rendered it as 'soft' and noted the ambiguity. The verb senu'ah ('unloved,' v. 31) literally means 'hated,' but in context it describes lesser love rather than active hostility; we used 'unloved' to capture the relational dynamic.

Connections: The well-meeting between Jacob and Rachel (29:1-12) echoes the servant's meeting with Rebekah (24:10-27) — the second in a series of biblical betrothal type-scenes. Judah's birth (29:35) marks the ancestor of the royal tribe and the messianic line (49:10; Matthew 1:2). Laban's deception inaugurates twenty years of conflict that shapes Jacob's character.

¹Then Jacob lifted his feet and went to the land of the people of the east. ²He looked, and there was a well in the field, and there — three flocks of sheep lying beside it, for from that well they watered the flocks. And a great stone was upon the mouth of the well. ³When all the flocks were gathered there, they would roll the stone from the mouth of the well and water the sheep, then return the stone to its place upon the mouth of the well. ⁴Jacob said to them, "My brothers, where are you from?" They said, "We are from Haran." ⁵He said to them, "Do you know Laban son of Nahor?" They said, "We know him." ⁶He said to them, "Is it well with him?" They said, "It is well. And look — Rachel his daughter is coming with the sheep." ⁷He said, "Look, it is still broad daylight. It is not yet time for the livestock to be gathered. Water the sheep and go, pasture them." ⁸They said, "We cannot, until all the flocks are gathered and they roll the stone from the mouth of the well. Then we water the sheep." ⁹While he was still speaking with them, Rachel came with her father's sheep, for she was a shepherdess. ¹⁰When Jacob saw Rachel, daughter of Laban his mother's brother, and the sheep of Laban his mother's brother, Jacob drew near and rolled the stone from the mouth of the well, and watered the flock of Laban his mother's brother. ¹¹Jacob kissed Rachel and broke into loud weeping. ¹²Jacob told Rachel that he was her father's kinsman, and that he was Rebekah's son. She ran and told her father. ¹³When Laban heard the report of Jacob his sister's son, he ran to meet him and embraced him and kissed him and brought him into his house. And Jacob told Laban all these things. ¹⁴Laban said to him, "Surely you are my bone and my flesh!" And he stayed with him a month's time. ¹⁵Laban said to Jacob, "Because you are my kinsman, should you serve me for nothing? Tell me — what shall your wages be?" ¹⁶Laban had two daughters: the older one was named Leah, and the younger was named Rachel. ¹⁷Leah's eyes were soft, but Rachel was beautiful in form and beautiful in appearance. ¹⁸Jacob loved Rachel. He said, "I will serve you seven years for Rachel, your younger daughter." ¹⁹Laban said, "Better that I give her to you than that I give her to another man. Stay with me." ²⁰So Jacob served seven years for Rachel, and they seemed in his eyes as but a few days, because of his love for her. ²¹Jacob said to Laban, "Give me my wife, for my time is completed, that I may go in to her." ²²Laban gathered all the men of the place and made a feast. ²³When evening came, Laban took his daughter Leah and presented her to Jacob, and Jacob slept with her. ²⁴And Laban gave his servant Zilpah to Leah his daughter as her servant. ²⁵And it was in the morning — and look, it was Leah! He said to Laban, "What is this you have done to me? Was it not for Rachel that I served you? Why have you deceived me?" ²⁶Laban said, "It is not done so in our place — to give the younger before the firstborn." ²⁷"Complete the week of this one, and we will give you the other also, for the service that you will serve with me — yet another seven years." ²⁸Jacob did so and completed her week. Then Laban gave him Rachel his daughter as his wife. ²⁹And Laban gave to Rachel his daughter Bilhah, his servant, as her servant. ³⁰He went in also to Rachel, and he loved Rachel more than Leah, and he served with Laban yet another seven years. ³¹When the LORD saw that Leah was unloved, he opened her womb. But Rachel was barren. ³²Leah conceived and bore a son and called his name Reuben, for she said, "Because the LORD has looked upon my affliction — surely now my husband will love me." ³³She conceived again and bore a son and said, "Because the LORD has heard that I am unloved, he has given me this one also." She called his name Simeon. ³⁴She conceived again and bore a son and said, "Now this time my husband will be joined to me, because I have borne him three sons." Therefore his name was called Levi. ³⁵She conceived again and bore a son and said, "This time I will praise the LORD." Therefore she called his name Judah. Then she ceased bearing.

1. 'Jacob lifted his feet' (vayyissa Ya'aqov raglav) — the idiom is unique in the Hebrew Bible and strikingly physical. After the Bethel theophany, Jacob does not merely 'journey' — he lifts his feet, as if the divine encounter has given him new energy and resolve. The expression suggests eagerness, even lightness: the man who slept on a stone pillow and saw heaven opened now walks with purpose. The Targum Onqelos paraphrases 'he went quickly,' capturing the sense of joyful haste.
1. 'The land of the people of the east' (artsah benei-qedem) — benei qedem ('sons of the east') designates the region of upper Mesopotamia, the ancestral homeland. Jacob leaves the promised land for the first time, heading toward the family he has never met. The journey reverses Abraham's migration: Abraham left the east for Canaan, Jacob now returns east. This pattern of exile and return will define Israel's story.
2. 'A well in the field' (be'er basadeh) — wells are places of encounter in Genesis. Abraham's servant met Rebekah at a well (24:11), Hagar found a well in the wilderness (16:14), Isaac contended over wells in Gerar (26:18–22). Now Jacob's story pivots at a well. In the patriarchal narratives, wells are sites of providence, courtship, and covenant — the life-giving water drawing together those whom God intends to join.
2. 'A great stone was upon the mouth of the well' (veha'even gedolah al-pi habe'er) — the stone sealing the well creates a communal protocol: no one waters until all arrive. It also sets the stage for Jacob's feat in verse 10, where he rolls the stone alone. The stone anticipates the theme of obstacles that must be removed before blessing flows.

3. The description of the watering protocol (vene'esfu-shammah kol-ha'adarim) establishes communal practice: the stone requires collective effort and collective agreement. No single shepherd acts alone — until Jacob does. The repetitive structure (gather, roll, water, return) conveys the rhythm of a daily routine. The verb galelu ('they rolled') will recur in verse 10 when Jacob rolls the stone by himself — an act of extraordinary strength or extraordinary motivation.
4. 'My brothers' (achai) — Jacob addresses strangers with the language of kinship, an ancient Near Eastern courtesy but also, as it turns out, literally true. He is speaking to people from the very town where his family lives. The term establishes Jacob's social ease and sets up the revelations that follow.
5. 'Laban son of Nahor' (Lavan ben-Nachor) — strictly, Laban is Nahor's grandson (through Bethuel), but the genealogical shorthand 'son of' can mean 'descendant of' in Hebrew. Nahor was Abraham's brother, so the question identifies the family line Jacob seeks. The shepherds' terse 'we know him' (yada'nu) confirms Jacob has arrived at the right place — providence has guided his steps to the exact well where Rachel will appear.
6. 'Is it well with him?' (hashalom lo) — the question uses shalom in its fullest sense: health, wholeness, prosperity, peace. Jacob inquires after the total well-being of a man he has never met but on whom his future depends.
6. 'Look — Rachel his daughter is coming with the sheep' (vehinneh Rachel bitto ba'ah im-hatson) — the hinneh ('behold/look') signals a narrative pivot. Rachel's entrance is dramatically timed: she appears at the precise moment of inquiry. Like Rebekah at the well (24:15), the intended bride arrives at the providential moment. That Rachel is a shepherdess places her among working women — she tends her father's flock, just as Jacob will tend it for her.
7. Jacob urges the shepherds to water and go — ostensibly practical advice, but the narrative effect is to clear the scene for his private encounter with Rachel. Whether Jacob consciously wants privacy or the narrator shapes events toward an intimate meeting, the result is the same. His assertiveness with strangers is characteristic: Jacob acts, manages, negotiates — even among people he has just met.
8. 'We cannot' (lo nukhal) — the shepherds explain the communal constraint: the stone is too heavy for one or two shepherds, requiring collective effort. This establishes the contrast with what Jacob is about to do in verse 10. Their 'we cannot' becomes the backdrop for his extraordinary 'he did.'
9. 'While he was still speaking' (odenu medabber immam) — the temporal clause heightens the drama. Rachel arrives mid-conversation, as if cued by the narrative itself. The same construction appears when Rebekah arrives in 24:15 ('before he had finished speaking') — the typological parallel between the two betrothal scenes is unmistakable.
9. 'For she was a shepherdess' (ki ro'ah hi) — the feminine participle ro'ah identifies Rachel's occupation. In the patriarchal world, a daughter tending flocks could indicate modest family circumstances or simply that the family had no sons old enough for the task. Rachel's name itself means 'ewe' — she is literally the shepherdess named after her charges.
10. The threefold repetition of 'Laban his mother's brother' (Lavan achi immo) is extraordinary — three times in a single verse. The narrator insists on the kinship connection, as if Jacob sees not just a beautiful woman but a family bond incarnate. This is his mother's world, and he enters it through an act of superhuman service.
10. 'Jacob drew near and rolled the stone' (vayyiggash Ya'aqov vayyagel et-ha'even) — what required all the gathered shepherds, Jacob does alone. The text offers no explanation — no mention of divine strength, no comment on the stone's weight. The act speaks for itself: love, adrenaline, or the need to prove himself before Rachel. The verb galal ('rolled') is the same used for the communal rolling in verse 3, but here it is singular. Jacob overturns the established order with a single gesture.
11. 'Jacob kissed Rachel and lifted up his voice and wept' (vayyishaq Ya'aqov leRachel vayyissa et-qolo vayyevk) — the sequence is startling: a kiss, then loud weeping. This is not romantic delicacy but overwhelming emotion. Jacob is a fugitive who has just found family. The weeping may combine relief, longing, gratitude, and the recognition that exile has an end. The verb vayyissa et-qolo ('lifted up his voice') indicates audible, unrestrained crying — this is not quiet tears but the outpouring of a man at the end of his strength finding the beginning of his future.
11. The kiss (neshiqah) between kinsmen is a standard greeting in the ancient Near East (cf. Laban's kiss in v. 13, Esau's in 33:4). Yet its placement before self-identification creates a moment of pure, unmediated connection — Jacob acts from emotion before protocol.
12. 'Her father's kinsman' (achi aviha) — the word ach can mean 'brother' but also 'kinsman, relative.' Jacob is Laban's nephew, not his brother. The broader kinship sense is intended. Jacob identifies himself through two relationships: as Laban's relative and as Rebekah's son. The maternal identification carries weight — Rebekah is the link between these two families.
12. 'She ran and told her father' (vattarats vattagged le'aviha) — Rachel's running (ruts) echoes Rebekah's running to tell her family about Abraham's servant (24:28). The parallel between mother and daughter at the well is precise: both meet a kinsman, both run home to report. The verb tagged ('told') implies substantive reporting — she conveyed news that would change the household.
13. 'He ran to meet him and embraced him and kissed him' (vayyarats liqra'to vaychabbeq-lo vaynasheq-lo) — the cascade of verbs (ran, embraced, kissed) presents a warm welcome, but the reader who remembers chapter 24 may wonder about Laban's motives. When Abraham's servant arrived with ten camels laden with gifts, Laban was equally enthusiastic (24:29–31). Here Jacob arrives empty-handed — a fugitive, not a suitor's envoy. Whether Laban's warmth is genuine affection or calculating hospitality (assessing what this nephew might be worth), the narrator leaves ambiguous.
13. 'He told Laban all these things' (vaysapper leLavan et kol-haddevarim ha'elleh) — what does 'all these things' include? The Bethel vision? The stolen blessing? The flight from Esau? The narrator's vagueness allows us to imagine the conversation: Jacob the storyteller, Laban the listener and calculator.

14. 'My bone and my flesh' (atsmi uvsari) — this phrase directly echoes Adam's recognition of Eve: 'bone of my bones and flesh of my flesh' (etsem me'atsamai uvasar mibbesari, 2:23). Laban recognizes in Jacob a kinship as deep as the primal human bond. The irony is layered: Laban, who will deceive Jacob as Jacob deceived Isaac, begins with the language of deepest intimacy. The echo of Eden in the household of a manipulator adds narrative tension.
14. 'A month's time' (chodesh yamim) — literally 'a month of days.' During this period Jacob presumably works for Laban without formal arrangement, establishing his value. The month serves as a probationary period after which Laban will propose the terms that shape the next fourteen years.
15. 'Should you serve me for nothing?' (va'avadtani chinnam) — Laban's question appears generous, even magnanimous. But it also reveals that Jacob has been working without pay for a month — and Laban has been benefiting. The offer to set wages transfers the moral burden to Jacob: now Jacob must name his price, and whatever he names, Laban can use. The word chinnam ('for nothing, gratis') carries a note of exploitation — Laban acknowledges that unpaid kinship labor has limits, but the acknowledgment itself becomes leverage.
16. The narrator introduces the two daughters with a structural note — elder (gedolah) and younger (qetannah) — that will drive the entire plot. The elder-younger distinction echoes throughout Genesis: Cain and Abel, Ishmael and Isaac, Esau and Jacob. Here the pattern takes a new form: Jacob, who seized his elder brother's place, will be forced to accept the elder daughter before the younger. Leah's name may derive from le'ah ('weary, languid') or from an Akkadian cognate meaning 'cow.' Rachel means 'ewe.'
17. 'Leah's eyes were soft' (ve'einei Le'ah rakkot) — the adjective rakkot ('soft, tender, delicate') is ambiguous. It could be a positive trait (gentle, tender eyes) or a negative one (weak, dull eyes — lacking the brightness prized in the ancient Near East). The traditional reading takes it as unfavorable, contrasting Leah's one noted feature with Rachel's complete beauty. But rakh elsewhere describes what is gentle, young, or tender (33:13; Deuteronomy 28:54), leaving open the possibility that Leah's eyes expressed a different kind of beauty — one the narrator and Jacob overlooked.
17. 'Beautiful in form and beautiful in appearance' (yefat-to'ar vifaf mar'eh) — the double description echoes the language used of Joseph (39:6) and of Sarah. Rachel's beauty is both structural (to'ar, 'form, figure') and visual (mar'eh, 'appearance, countenance'). The contrast with Leah is sharp: Rachel receives two adjectives of beauty, Leah one ambiguous descriptor. The text mirrors Jacob's perception — he sees Rachel's beauty and Leah's... eyes.
18. 'Jacob loved Rachel' (vaye'ehav Ya'akov et-Rachel) — this is the first use of love (ahavah) in a romantic context between a man and woman in Genesis since Isaac and Rebekah (24:67). Jacob's love is immediate, consuming, and it will cost him fourteen years. The verb is in the narrative past — it states a fact, not a process. He loved her.
18. 'Seven years for Rachel your younger daughter' (sheva shanim beRachel bittekha haqetannah) — Jacob specifies 'younger daughter' to eliminate ambiguity, yet this specificity will not protect him from Laban's deception. The bride-price of seven years' labor was substantial — far exceeding normal mohar (bride-price). Jacob, who arrived with nothing, offers the only currency he has: his body, his time, his labor. A man of no property pays with himself.
19. 'Better that I give her to you' (tov titi otah lakh) — Laban agrees without naming Rachel. He says 'her' (otah), not 'Rachel.' In retrospect, this ambiguity is either Laban's cunning or the narrator's foreshadowing — perhaps both. Laban's 'her' can refer to either daughter, and when the substitution comes, Laban will exploit exactly this kind of unspecified reference. 'Stay with me' (shevah immadi) — the invitation sounds hospitable but means: remain as my laborer.
20. 'They seemed in his eyes as but a few days, because of his love for her' (vayiyhyu ve'einav keyamim achadim be'ahavato otah) — this is one of the most celebrated lines in Genesis, and in all ancient literature. Seven years — 2,555 days — compressed to 'a few days' by the alchemy of love. The phrase be'ahavato otah ('because of his love for her') is the narrator's rare editorial comment on interior emotion. The text does not often tell us what characters feel; here it makes an exception. The observation is psychologically precise: time passes quickly not in spite of longing but because of it — each day is suffused with purpose and anticipation.
20. The literary effect is also structural: the narrator collapses seven years into a single sentence, making the reader experience the same temporal compression that Jacob felt. We arrive at the wedding night as abruptly as Jacob seems to have arrived.
21. 'Give me my wife' (havah et-ishti) — the directness is striking. Jacob does not ask; he demands. The verb havah is imperative — 'give!' The possessive 'my wife' (ishti) claims Rachel as already his by right of contract. After seven years of labor, Jacob asserts ownership of the promise. The frankness of 'that I may go in to her' (ve'avo'ah eleha) — a euphemism for sexual union — reveals Jacob's impatience. He has waited, he has served, and now he claims what is his.
22. 'Made a feast' (vayya'as mishteh) — mishteh derives from shatah ('to drink'); it is a drinking feast, a banquet. The public gathering serves as witnesses to the marriage, but it also ensures that Jacob is well supplied with wine. The feast may be part of Laban's plan: an inebriated groom is less likely to detect the substitution in the darkness of the wedding tent. Laban stages the celebration as both social obligation and cover for deception.
23. 'In the evening' (ba'erev) — darkness is the instrument of deception, just as it was when Jacob deceived Isaac. Isaac could not see because his eyes were dim; Jacob cannot see because it is night. The symmetry is devastating: the man who exploited his father's blindness is now victimized by darkness. What goes around comes around — in Genesis, measure for measure (middah keneged middah) is a structural principle, not just a moral maxim.
23. 'He took Leah his daughter and brought her to him' (vayyiqqach et-Le'ah vitto vayyave otah elav) — the subject is Laban, the object is Leah. She is brought — the passive construction raises questions about Leah's agency. Did she consent? Did she resist? Was she veiled? The text is silent on Leah's experience, but her complicity or coercion is one of the great unasked questions of Genesis.

24. 'Zilpah his servant' (Zilpah shifchato) — Zilpah will later become a secondary wife to Jacob and mother of Gad and Asher (30:9–13). The giving of a personal servant to a bride was customary in the ancient Near East (cf. Rebekah received attendants, 24:59, 61). The detail, seemingly incidental, plants a character who will play a significant role in the expansion of Jacob's family.
25. 'And look, it was Leah!' (vehinnehi Le'ah) — the hinneh expresses Jacob's shock. Morning light reveals what darkness concealed. The moment is the dramatic center of the chapter and one of the great reversals in all of Scripture. Jacob the deceiver is deceived. The man who put on goatskins to feel like Esau now discovers that Leah has been substituted for Rachel. The irony is exquisite: Jacob, whose name means 'supplanter,' has been supplanted.
25. 'What is this you have done to me?' (mah-zot asita li) — this exact phrase will be echoed by Pharaoh to Abraham (12:18) and by Abimelech to Isaac (26:10) — in those cases, the patriarch was the deceiver. Now Jacob is on the receiving end. The words become a refrain of accusation that tracks through Genesis, binding together all who practice deception.
25. 'Why have you deceived me?' (lammah rimmitani) — the verb ramah ('deceive') is the same word Esau used about Jacob: 'he has deceived me these two times' (27:36). The linguistic echo is precise and punishing. Jacob, who tricked his blind father with disguise, is now tricked by darkness and disguise. The Torah's moral architecture is visible in its vocabulary.
26. 'To give the younger before the firstborn' (latet hatse'irah lifnei habbekhirah) — the irony cuts to the bone. Jacob, who took the firstborn's blessing by deception, is now told that the younger cannot come before the elder. Laban invokes custom, but the narrative invokes justice: you who reversed the birth order in your father's house will now experience what it means when the proper order is enforced. Whether Laban intends this irony is unclear; the narrator certainly does.
26. The words tse'irah ('younger') and bekhirah ('firstborn') echo the language of Jacob and Esau's story. Jacob was the tsa'ir who seized the bekhorah (birthright) and the berakhah (blessing) of the bekhor (firstborn). Now the bekhor's rights are asserted against him.
27. 'Complete the week of this one' (malle shevua zot) — the 'week' (shavua) refers to the seven-day bridal celebration. Laban tells Jacob to honor Leah's wedding week before receiving Rachel. The phrase 'this one' (zot) rather than 'Leah' depersonalizes the daughter — she is a contractual unit, not a person in Laban's speech.
27. 'Yet another seven years' (od sheva-shanim acherot) — Jacob will serve fourteen years total for the wife he wanted. The doubling of the bride-price doubles the years of servitude. But Laban's offer is also generous in a sense: Jacob receives Rachel after just one week, not after seven more years. He serves the additional years afterward. Still, the total cost of Laban's deception is enormous: fourteen years of Jacob's prime.
28. 'Jacob did so' (vayya'as Ya'aqov ken) — Jacob accepts Laban's terms without recorded protest. The man who schemed to obtain his father's blessing submits to Laban's scheme without resistance. Whether this reflects powerlessness (a stranger in a foreign land, bound by contract), love for Rachel (he will endure anything to have her), or a dawning recognition that deception has consequences, the text does not say. Jacob's silence is eloquent.
29. 'Bilhah his servant' (Bilhah shifchato) — like Zilpah given to Leah, Bilhah will become a secondary wife and mother of Dan and Naphtali (30:3–8). The parallel gifts to the two daughters establish structural symmetry: each wife receives a servant who will bear children in the surrogate-motherhood arrangement common in the ancient Near East (cf. Sarah and Hagar, chapter 16).
30. 'He loved Rachel more than Leah' (vaye'ehav gam-et-Rachel miLe'ah) — the comparative 'more than' (min) establishes a hierarchy of affection that will wound Leah and shape the destiny of nations. The son Leah bears fourth — Judah — will father the royal line leading to David and beyond. The unloved wife produces the line of kings. God's choices consistently overturn human preferences in Genesis.
30. 'Yet another seven years' (od sheva-shanim acherot) — the repetition of 'seven years' from verse 20 creates a structural frame: seven years before the wedding and seven after. But the narrator does not repeat the beautiful observation that time flew because of love. The second seven years are served in the shadow of deception, with a household already riven by rivalry.
31. 'Leah was unloved' (senu'ah Le'ah) — the word senu'ah is harsh: its root sane' means 'to hate.' The rendering 'unloved' softens what the Hebrew states bluntly. Leah is hated — not necessarily with active malice, but with the cold dismissal of a woman who was never wanted. The legal term senu'ah appears in Deuteronomy 21:15–17 in legislation protecting the rights of the 'hated wife's' firstborn son. Leah's situation is not unique; it was common enough to require legislation.
31. 'He opened her womb' (vayyiftach et-rachmah) — the verb patach ('open') with rechem ('womb') is a divine prerogative in the Hebrew Bible. Fertility and barrenness are in God's hands. The LORD's response to Leah's suffering is not to change Jacob's heart but to give Leah children — her own source of dignity and identity. The theological logic is consistent: God sees the afflicted and acts through the means available within the story's world.
31. 'Rachel was barren' (veRachel aqarah) — the beloved wife is barren, continuing the pattern of Sarah (11:30), Rebekah (25:21), and later Hannah (1 Samuel 1:2). Barrenness in Genesis is never permanent but always purposeful — it creates space for divine intervention and highlights that the covenant line depends on God, not on human preference or natural capacity.
32. 'Reuben' (Re'uven) — the name is explained with a double etymology: 'the LORD has looked' (ra'ah YHWH) upon my affliction, and 'see, a son' (re'u-ven). Both explanations work phonetically. The name becomes Leah's testimony: God sees what Jacob does not. Each of Leah's naming speeches is a window into her pain — she names her children not with joy alone but with desperate hope that each son will turn her husband's heart.

32. 'My affliction' (onyi) — the word oni ('affliction, misery') is the same used for Israel's suffering in Egypt (Exodus 3:7). Leah's personal anguish is framed in the language of national suffering. She is the afflicted one whom God sees — a prototype of the people God will later see and deliver.
33. 'Simeon' (Shim'on) — from shama' ('to hear'). First God saw (Reuben), now God has heard (Simeon). Leah maps the divine senses onto her children's names: sight, then hearing. Her theology is experiential — she knows God through what God does in response to her suffering. The progression from 'seen' to 'heard' parallels the Exodus language: 'I have surely seen the affliction...and have heard their cry' (Exodus 3:7).
33. 'Because I am unloved' (ki-senu'ah anokhi) — Leah states her condition with painful clarity. She does not blame Jacob or soften the word. She is senu'ah — hated. But she frames even this harsh reality within divine care: the LORD hears the unloved. This theological conviction — that God attends to the rejected — becomes foundational to Israelite faith.
34. 'Levi' (Levi) — from lavah ('to join, to be attached'). Leah's hope has shifted: with Reuben she hoped for love, with Simeon for acknowledgment, now with Levi she hopes for attachment — yillaveh, 'he will be joined to me.' The diminishing expectations are heartbreaking. She no longer asks for love, only for connection. Yet Levi's descendants will become the priestly tribe — those 'attached' to God's service. The rejected wife's longing for attachment produces the line of attachment to the divine.
34. The shift from 'called his name' (vatiqra shemo) to 'his name was called' (qara shemo) in the Hebrew is subtle — some manuscripts vary. The passive form may suggest that the name was given by others or became established usage, though the distinction is uncertain.
35. 'This time I will praise the LORD' (happa'am odeh et-YHWH) — something has changed in Leah. The first three names encoded her suffering, her longing, her desperate hope for Jacob's love. With the fourth son, she turns from husband to God. She does not mention Jacob at all. The shift from 'my husband will love me' to 'I will praise the LORD' marks a spiritual transformation: Leah has stopped seeking validation in Jacob's affection and found it in gratitude to God. This is perhaps the most profound theological moment in the chapter.
35. 'Judah' (Yehudah) — from yadah ('to praise, to give thanks'). The name that will define Israel's royal tribe, the kingdom of Judah, and eventually the term 'Jew' (Yehudi) originates in an unloved woman's praise. The line from Judah to David to the messianic hope begins here, in Leah's declaration of praise born from suffering. That the most consequential of Jacob's sons comes from the wife he did not choose is Genesis at its most theologically subversive.
35. 'She ceased bearing' (vatta'amod milledet) — literally 'she stood from bearing,' meaning she stopped. This pause sets up the rivalry and surrogacy arrangements of chapter 30. The cessation is temporary — Leah will bear again (30:17–20) — but it creates the dramatic space for Rachel's anguish and the competition that follows.

Summary: The birth competition between Leah and Rachel intensifies. Rachel gives Bilhah to Jacob; Leah gives Zilpah. Through direct births and surrogate births, Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher, Issachar, Zebulun, and Dinah are born. God finally remembers Rachel, who bears Joseph. Jacob then negotiates with Laban for wages, using breeding strategies to build his flocks.

What Makes This Remarkable: Each son's name becomes a compressed narrative of maternal theology: Dan ('he judged'), Naphtali ('my wrestling'), Gad ('fortune'), Asher ('happy'), Issachar ('wages'), Zebulun ('honor'). Rachel's cry 'give me children or I am dying' (v. 1) echoes the desperation of the barren matriarchs before her. When God 'remembers' Rachel (v. 22) — the same verb used for Noah (8:1) — it signals the same divine turning. Joseph's name encodes both past grief ('God has taken away my reproach,' asaph) and future hope ('may the LORD add,' yoseph).

Translation Friction: The mandrake episode (vv. 14-16) introduces duda'im, plants associated with fertility and love in the ancient Near East. The transaction — Leah 'hires' Jacob for the night with mandrakes — uses commercial language (sakhar, v. 16, the root of Issachar's name) for the most intimate of arrangements. We rendered the vocabulary directly and let the discomfort stand. Rachel's wordplay on Joseph's name draws from two different roots (asaph and yasaph), a double etymology we preserved in the notes.

Connections: The twelve sons who become the twelve tribes of Israel are nearly complete here (Benjamin follows in 35:18). The surrogate-mothering through Bilhah and Zilpah parallels Sarai's use of Hagar (16:2). God 'remembering' Rachel (30:22) continues the pattern from Noah (8:1) and anticipates God remembering Israel in Egypt (Exodus 2:24).

¹When Rachel saw that she bore Jacob no children, Rachel envied her sister. She said to Jacob, "Give me children — if not, I am dying!" ²Jacob's anger burned against Rachel, and he said, "Am I in the place of God, who has withheld from you the fruit of the womb?" ³She said, "Here is my servant Bilhah. Go in to her, that she may bear upon my knees, and I too may be built up through her." ⁴She gave him Bilhah her servant as a wife, and Jacob went in to her. ⁵Bilhah conceived and bore Jacob a son. ⁶Rachel said, "God has judged me and has also heard my voice and given me a son." Therefore she called his name Dan. ⁷Bilhah, Rachel's servant, conceived again and bore Jacob a second son. ⁸Rachel said, "With wrestlings of God I have wrestled with my sister, and I have prevailed!" She called his name Naphtali. ⁹When Leah saw that she had ceased bearing, she took Zilpah her servant and gave her to Jacob as a wife. ¹⁰Zilpah, Leah's servant, bore Jacob a son. ¹¹Leah said, "Fortune has come!" And she called his name Gad. ¹²Zilpah, Leah's servant, bore Jacob a second son. ¹³Leah said, "Happy am I, for women will call me happy!" She called his name Asher. ¹⁴Reuben went out in the days of the wheat harvest and found mandrakes in the field and brought them to his mother Leah. Rachel said to Leah, "Please give me some of your son's mandrakes." ¹⁵She said to her, "Is it a small thing that you have taken my husband? And would you take my son's mandrakes too?" Rachel said, "Then he may lie with you tonight in exchange for your son's mandrakes." ¹⁶Jacob came in from the field in the evening, and Leah went out to meet him and said, "You must come in to me, for I have surely hired you with my son's mandrakes." And he lay with her that night. ¹⁷God listened to Leah, and she conceived and bore Jacob a fifth son. ¹⁸Leah said, "God has given me my wages, because I gave my servant to my husband." She called his name Issachar. ¹⁹Leah conceived again and bore Jacob a sixth son. ²⁰Leah said, "God has endowed me with a good gift. Now my husband will honor me, because I have borne him six sons." She called his name Zebulun. ²¹Later she gave birth to a daughter and named her Dinah. ²²Then God remembered Rachel, and God listened to her and opened her womb. ²³She conceived and bore a son and said, "God has taken away my reproach." ²⁴She called his name Joseph, saying, "May the LORD add to me another son." ²⁵When Rachel had borne Joseph, Jacob said to Laban, "Send me away, that I may go to my own place and to my country." ²⁶"Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served you, and let me go. For you yourself know my service with which I have served you." ²⁷Laban said to him, "If I have found favor in your eyes — I have divined that the LORD has blessed me on your account." ²⁸He said, "Name your wages to me, and I will give it." ²⁹Jacob said to him, "You know how I have served you, and how your livestock has fared with me." ³⁰"For what you had before me was little, and it has burst forth into abundance, and the LORD has blessed you wherever I turned. But now — when shall I also provide for my own house?" ³¹He said, "What shall I give you?" Jacob said, "You shall not give me anything. If you will do this thing for me, I will return to pasture and keep your flock." ³²"Let me pass through all your flock today, removing from it every speckled and spotted sheep, and every dark-colored one among the lambs, and the spotted and speckled among the goats — and these shall be my wages." ³³"So my righteousness will testify for me in time to come, when you come to inspect my wages before you. Every one that is not speckled and spotted among the goats and dark among the lambs — if found with me, it is stolen." ³⁴Laban said, "Agreed! Let it be according to your word." ³⁵He removed that day the striped and spotted male goats, and all the speckled and spotted female goats — every one that had white in it — and every dark one among the lambs, and gave them into the charge of his sons. ³⁶He set a three days' journey between himself and Jacob, and Jacob pastured the rest of Laban's flock. ³⁷Jacob took fresh rods of poplar, almond, and plane tree, and peeled white stripes in them, exposing the white that was in the rods. ³⁸He set the rods that he had peeled in the troughs — the watering channels where the flocks came to drink — facing the flocks. And they mated when they came to drink. ³⁹The flocks bred before the rods and bore young that were striped, speckled, and spotted. ⁴⁰Jacob separated the lambs and set the faces of the flocks toward the striped and all the dark-colored in the flock of Laban. He set his own droves apart and did not put them with Laban's flock. ⁴¹Whenever the stronger of the flock were in heat, Jacob would place the rods before the eyes of the flock in the troughs, so that they would breed among the rods. ⁴²But when the flock was feeble, he did not place them. So the feebler were Laban's and the stronger Jacob's. ⁴³The man increased exceedingly — very greatly — and had large flocks, and female servants and male servants, and camels and donkeys.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Give me children — if not, I am dying!' (havah-li vanim ve'im-ayin metah anokhi) — Rachel's cry is one of the most emotionally raw statements in Genesis. The verb havah ('give!') is an imperative demand — the same word Jacob used to demand his wife from Laban (29:21). Now Rachel demands from Jacob what only God can give. Her words echo ancient Rachel's anguish but also reveal a theological confusion: she addresses Jacob as though he controls fertility.

1. The phrase 'I am dying' (metah anakhi) uses the participle — 'I am in the process of dying,' not a future threat but a present experience. Barrenness in the ancient Near East was not merely a private sorrow; it was social death, a failure of identity in a culture where a woman's worth was measured in sons. Rachel's desperation is existential, not merely emotional.
2. 'Am I in the place of God?' (hathachat Elohim anakhi) — Jacob's theological response is correct but pastorally brutal. He rightly identifies God as the source of fertility (cf. 29:31, where the LORD opens Leah's womb), but he delivers this truth in anger rather than compassion. The question is rhetorical and cutting — the answer is obviously 'no.' Jacob deflects Rachel's pain rather than entering into it. His response contrasts sharply with Isaac, who 'prayed to the LORD on behalf of his wife' when Rebekah was barren (25:21).
2. 'The fruit of the womb' (peri-vaten) — the metaphor of children as 'fruit' links human fertility to agricultural abundance. The womb (beten) produces fruit (peri) as the earth produces harvest — both are God's domain. The phrase will reappear in blessings and curses throughout Deuteronomy.
3. 'Bear upon my knees' (teled al-birkai) — the expression likely refers to a legal adoption ritual: the child born to the surrogate is placed on the wife's knees, symbolizing that the child is legally hers. The practice parallels Sarah's arrangement with Hagar (16:2) and reflects widespread ancient Near Eastern custom documented in texts from Nuzi and other sites.
3. 'I too may be built up through her' (ve'ibbaneh gam-anokhi mimmenah) — the verb banah ('build') contains the root of ben ('son'). To be 'built up' through children is to construct a house, a lineage, a future. Rachel's language reveals that children are not merely desired but architecturally necessary — without them, her house has no foundation.
4. The pattern replicates Sarah's offer of Hagar to Abraham (16:3): the barren wife gives her servant to her husband, and the servant bears children on the wife's behalf. In both cases, the arrangement creates familial tension. The text records no objection from Jacob — in contrast to his anger in verse 2, he readily accepts the practical solution. Bilhah's status shifts from shifchah ('servant') to ishah ('wife'), though her social position remains subordinate.
5. The terse narration — 'conceived and bore' (vattahar...vateled) — contrasts with the emotional speeches that bracket each birth. Bilhah herself is silent throughout; only Rachel interprets the births. The servant's voice is absent from the record, her experience subsumed into her mistress's narrative. This silence is characteristic of the biblical treatment of surrogate mothers.
6. 'God has judged me' (dananni Elohim) — the verb dan ('judged') can mean either 'vindicated' or 'rendered judgment.' Rachel takes it as vindication — God has judged her case and found in her favor. The name Dan embeds the concept of divine justice in a child's identity. The tribe of Dan will later be associated with judging (49:16: 'Dan shall judge his people').
6. 'Has also heard my voice' (vegam shama beqoli) — Rachel echoes Leah's Simeon ('the LORD has heard,' 29:33). Both women claim divine hearing. The competition between the sisters extends to their theology: each insists that God is on her side. The narrative does not adjudicate between them — God apparently hears both.
7. Again Bilhah bears and is identified by her relation to Rachel — 'Rachel's servant' (shifchat Rachel). Her identity is defined entirely through her mistress. The second son deepens Rachel's surrogate victory, but the competition with Leah is far from over.
8. 'Wrestlings of God' (naphtalei Elohim) — the phrase is remarkable. Elohim here functions as a superlative ('mighty wrestlings' or 'divine wrestlings'), but it also suggests that the competition between the sisters has a cosmic dimension. Rachel understands her fertility struggle as a divinely weighted contest. The root pathal ('twist, wrestle') anticipates Jacob's own wrestling at the Jabbok (32:25), where he too will 'wrestle with God.' The family's vocabulary of struggle will become its defining characteristic.
8. 'I have prevailed' (gam yakholiti) — Rachel claims victory, but the triumph is premature. She has two sons through a surrogate; Leah has four biological sons. The scorekeeping will continue through more births, more surrogates, and the mandrake episode. The sisters' rivalry produces the twelve tribes — God builds a nation through human competition.
9. Leah mirrors Rachel's strategy: if surrogacy counts, Leah will play the same game. The escalation is symmetrical — each wife now has a servant-wife bearing children. The household becomes a fertility competition fought through four women's bodies. Jacob's passivity is notable: he is the object of decisions made by his wives, accepting each new arrangement without comment.
10. Like Bilhah, Zilpah is identified through her mistress — 'Leah's servant' (shifchat Le'ah). Her voice, like Bilhah's, is never heard. The narrative structure treats the servants as extensions of the wives, vessels for the matriarchs' competition. Their humanity is present but unvoiced.
11. 'Fortune has come!' (ba gad) — the Qere (read tradition) reads bagad ('fortune has come'), while the Ketiv (written tradition) may be parsed as ba Gad ('Gad has come,' treating Gad as a deity of fortune). The name Gad is related to good fortune or luck. In the ancient Near East, Gad was known as a deity of fortune (cf. Isaiah 65:11, 'you who set a table for Gad'). Leah's exclamation may simply mean 'how fortunate!' — but the echo of pagan fortune-worship adds a layer of ambiguity.
12. The parallel structure continues — each servant bears two sons, creating symmetry between the households of Rachel and Leah. The total count now stands at eight sons: Leah's four (Reuben, Simeon, Levi, Judah), Rachel's two through Bilhah (Dan, Naphtali), and Leah's two through Zilpah (Gad, and now the one to be named).
13. 'Happy am I' (be'oshri) — the root ashar means 'happy, blessed, fortunate.' Leah's joy here is public-facing: she cares about how 'the daughters' (banot — other women) perceive her. In a culture where status was measured by sons, six sons (including surrogates) would indeed mark a woman as blessed. The name Asher transforms personal happiness into tribal identity.

13. 'Women will call me happy' (ishheruni banot) — the verb 'isheruni is a pi'el ('declare happy, call blessed'). Leah anticipates social recognition. Her naming speeches trace an emotional arc: from desperate hope for Jacob's love (Reuben), through theological reflection (Simeon, Levi, Judah), to public joy (Asher). The surrogate sons bring a different kind of satisfaction — not the ache for a husband's love but the pride of abundance.
14. 'Mandrakes' (duda'im) — the mandrake (Mandragora officinarum) is a plant with a forked root resembling a human form, associated in the ancient world with fertility and aphrodisiac properties. The Hebrew duda'im is related to dodim ('love, lovemaking'), reinforcing the erotic associations. The plant's fragrance is celebrated in Song of Songs 7:13. Rachel's desire for the mandrakes reveals her desperation: she seeks fertility through any means, even folk remedy.
14. Reuben is Leah's firstborn (29:32), here a small child during wheat harvest — roughly May-June in the agricultural calendar. That Reuben brings them to Leah (not Rachel) reflects the household's emotional geography: Leah's sons are loyal to their mother. Rachel must negotiate across the domestic divide to obtain what Leah's household possesses.
15. 'Is it a small thing that you have taken my husband?' (hame'at qachtekh et-ishi) — Leah's bitter outburst reveals the depth of household dysfunction. Although Leah is legally Jacob's first wife, Rachel has 'taken' him — Jacob sleeps with Rachel, not Leah. Leah experiences herself as the abandoned wife, despite being the one with sons. The possessive 'my husband' (ishi) is a claim both legal and desperate.
15. 'He may lie with you tonight in exchange for your son's mandrakes' (lakhen yishkav immakh hallaylah tachat duda'ei vnekh) — Rachel trades a night with her own husband for fertility plants. The transaction is jarring: Jacob is treated as a commodity to be exchanged. The word tachat ('in exchange for, instead of') is a commercial term — this is a transaction, not a gift. The beloved wife sells access to the husband for folk medicine. The irony deepens: the mandrakes will not help Rachel conceive (God will open her womb in his own time, v. 22), while Leah's purchased night produces another son.
16. 'I have surely hired you' (sakhor sekhartikha) — the infinitive absolute construction (sakhor sakhar) emphasizes the certainty: 'I have absolutely hired you.' The verb sakhar ('hire') treats Jacob as a hired laborer — the very role he plays for Laban. Leah's language reduces the conjugal relationship to a wage transaction. The root sakhar will reappear in the naming of Issachar (v. 18), linking this son directly to the commercial exchange.
16. 'Leah went out to meet him' (vattese Le'ah liqra'to) — Leah takes initiative, going out to the field to intercept Jacob before he reaches Rachel's tent. Her boldness recalls Ruth going to Boaz on the threshing floor — a woman acting with agency in a situation where custom might expect passivity. Leah refuses to wait; she claims what she has purchased.
17. 'God listened to Leah' (vayyishma Elohim el-Le'ah) — the text implies that Leah prayed, though no prayer is recorded. God responds to unrecorded prayers throughout Genesis — the narrator's silence about the prayer itself emphasizes God's attentiveness rather than human eloquence. The verb shama ('listened, hearkened') with the preposition el indicates responsive hearing — God not only heard but acted. The mandrake exchange, humanly motivated, becomes the occasion for divine action. God works through messy human arrangements.
18. 'God has given me my wages' (natan Elohim sekhari) — the word sakhar ('wages, hire, reward') directly connects to the 'hiring' of Jacob with mandrakes (v. 16). But Leah reinterprets the reward: it is not payment for the mandrake transaction but divine compensation for giving Zilpah to Jacob. She theologizes the surrogacy as sacrifice ('I gave my servant to my husband') and sees Issachar as God's reward for that generosity. The layered meanings — wages for mandrakes and reward for surrogacy — coexist in the name.
18. 'Issachar' (Yissaskhar) — the name is traditionally explained as yesh sakhar ('there is a reward/wages') or ish sakhar ('man of wages'). The doubled sin/shin in the Masoretic spelling is anomalous and debated. The tribe of Issachar will settle in the fertile Jezreel Valley — a fitting outcome for a name meaning 'reward.'
19. Leah's fertility resumes with extraordinary abundance — six biological sons plus a daughter, more than any other matriarch. Her fruitfulness, gift of the God who 'saw that she was unloved' (29:31), makes her the primary mother of Israel. The 'hated wife' becomes the most prolific.
20. 'God has endowed me with a good gift' (zevadani Elohim oti zaved tov) — the verb zavad ('endow, bestow') is rare, appearing only here in the Hebrew Bible. The noun zaved ('gift, endowment') is equally rare. Leah uses unusual vocabulary for an unusual moment: six sons is an extraordinary dowry from God.
20. 'Now my husband will honor me' (happa'am yizbeleni ishi) — the verb zaval ('honor, exalt' or 'dwell with') provides the etymology for Zebulun. Some read it as 'dwell with me' (from a root meaning 'to cohabit'), others as 'honor me.' The ambiguity is poignant: after six sons, Leah still hopes for Jacob's attention — whether expressed as presence or esteem. Her unending desire for her husband's regard is one of the most persistent and painful themes in Genesis.
21. 'Dinah' (Dinah) — the name is related to din ('judgment'), echoing Dan's name (v. 6). She is the only daughter of Jacob mentioned by name in Genesis, and her story in chapter 34 will have devastating consequences for the family. The brevity of her birth notice — no speech from Leah, no theological interpretation — contrasts with the elaborate naming speeches for the sons. Daughters in the patriarchal narrative receive less narrative space, though Dinah's story will prove pivotal.
22. 'God remembered Rachel' (vayyizkor Elohim et-Rachel) — the verb zakhar ('remember') in biblical theology does not imply that God had forgotten. Rather, it signals the moment when God acts on an existing commitment. 'God remembered Noah' (8:1) preceded the flood's recession. 'God remembered Abraham' (19:29) preceded Lot's rescue. 'God remembered Rachel' signals the turning point in her barrenness. Divine remembrance is the prelude to salvation.

22. 'God listened to her and opened her womb' (vayyishma eleha Elohim vayyiftach et-rachmah) — three verbs in sequence: remembered, listened, opened. The threefold divine action emphasizes the deliberateness of God's response. The opening of the womb (rechem) is exclusively God's prerogative in the Hebrew Bible — no human agent, no mandrake, no fertility ritual achieves what God alone does. Rachel's years of surrogacy and mandrake-bargaining were human strategies; conception comes when God acts.
23. 'God has taken away my reproach' (asaf Elohim et-cherpati) — the verb asaf ('taken away, gathered, removed') puns on the name Joseph (yosef, from yasaf, 'add' — a different root but similar sound). Rachel's first response to motherhood is relief from shame. The word cherpah ('reproach, disgrace') reveals how deeply barrenness wounded her social standing. Bearing a son removes the stigma that has defined her for years. Her joy is inseparable from her suffering.
24. 'Joseph' (Yosef) — from yasaf ('to add'). Rachel's naming is forward-looking: even in the joy of this first son, she asks for another. This prayer will be answered with Benjamin — but at the cost of Rachel's life (35:16–19). The name Joseph encodes both fulfillment and longing, gratitude and desire. The child who is 'addition' will become Jacob's favorite, the axis around which the final act of Genesis turns.
24. 'May the LORD add' (yosef YHWH) — Rachel uses the divine name YHWH, not Elohim, in her prayer for another son. This is notable: throughout the birth narratives, the names alternate between YHWH and Elohim. Here, at the birth of the son who will save the family from famine, Rachel invokes the covenantal name. Joseph's story will demonstrate YHWH's providence across the widest canvas Genesis has yet attempted.
25. 'Send me away' (shallecheni) — Jacob's request to depart is triggered by Joseph's birth, as if Rachel's son completes what he came for. After fourteen years of service (seven for Leah, seven for Rachel), Jacob wants to return to the promised land. The verb shalach ('send') in the intensive form (pi'el) implies 'release me' — Jacob acknowledges that Laban holds authority over his departure. He is still, in effect, a bonded laborer.
25. 'My own place and my country' (meqomi...artsi) — the possessive language ('my place, my country') recalls the promise: the land is Jacob's by divine grant, even though he has been absent for over a decade. The pull of the promised land reasserts itself as the exile begins to end.
26. 'Give me my wives and my children, for whom I have served you' (tenah et-nashai ve'et-yeladai asher avadti otkha bahen) — Jacob's demand reveals the legal reality: his wives and children belong, in some contractual sense, to Laban. They were the 'payment' for which Jacob labored; until he is formally released, Laban has a claim. The request to 'give' (tenah) his own family underscores Jacob's subordinate position — a patriarch who must ask permission to take his own household.
26. 'You yourself know my service' (attah yada'ta et-avodati) — Jacob appeals to Laban's knowledge of his labor quality. The word avodah ('service, labor, work') appears twice in the verse, emphasizing that Jacob's entire relationship with Laban has been defined by work. He has served for wives, served for children, served for years — and now he wants to serve himself.
27. 'I have divined' (nichashti) — the verb nachash means 'to practice divination, to read omens.' Laban admits to using divination — a practice later prohibited in Israelite law (Deuteronomy 18:10) — to discern that his prosperity comes from Jacob. The admission reveals Laban's religious world: he is not a YHWH-worshiper but a Mesopotamian who acknowledges YHWH's power through his own divinatory methods. He knows the source of his blessing but accesses that knowledge through pagan means.
27. 'The LORD has blessed me on your account' (vayevarkheni YHWH biglalekha) — Laban uses the divine name YHWH, though he is not part of the covenant community. He recognizes what the reader already knows: Jacob carries the Abrahamic blessing, and those associated with him prosper (cf. 12:3, 'in you all families of the earth shall be blessed'). Laban's self-interest is transparent: he wants Jacob to stay not from affection but because Jacob is his economic engine.
28. 'Name your wages' (noqvah sekharkha alai) — the verb naqav means 'to designate, to specify, to pierce.' Laban invites Jacob to set his own price — an apparently generous offer that also serves Laban's interest in retaining Jacob. The word sakhar ('wages') will become the key term in the negotiation that follows, running through the entire passage.
29. 'How your livestock has fared with me' (ve'et asher-hayah miqnekha itti) — Jacob appeals to the evidence: Laban's flocks have prospered under his care. The word miqneh ('livestock, cattle, possessions') is related to qanah ('acquire') — the livestock is Laban's acquisition, but Jacob's labor has multiplied it. Jacob is building his case for a fair wage, establishing that his contribution has been substantial.
30. 'It has burst forth into abundance' (vayyifrots larov) — the verb parats ('break out, burst forth, increase') is the same used for Israel's multiplication in Egypt (Exodus 1:12). Under Jacob's care, Laban's modest holdings have exploded. The verb conveys unstoppable, overflowing increase — not gradual growth but dramatic expansion.
30. 'When shall I also provide for my own house?' (matai e'eseh gam-anokhi leveiti) — after fourteen years of building Laban's wealth, Jacob has nothing of his own. The question is pointed: he has created abundance for Laban but has no estate for his own family. The word bayit ('house') encompasses family, household, and legacy. Jacob the builder of Laban's house now demands the right to build his own.
31. 'You shall not give me anything' (lo-titten-li me'umah) — Jacob's opening gambit is strategic: he refuses an outright gift, positioning himself instead for a self-sustaining arrangement. By asking for nothing (me'umah), he disarms Laban's suspicion and sets up a proposal that appears modest but is, as events will show, shrewdly calculated. Jacob the planner, the man who bought a birthright with stew, now negotiates wages with equal cunning.
32. 'Speckled and spotted' (naqod vetalu) — naqod means 'speckled' (marked with small dots), and talu' means 'spotted' (with larger patches). The distinction is between types of irregular coloring. In flocks that were predominantly white (sheep) or dark (goats), multicolored animals were relatively rare. Jacob asks for the abnormal ones — those that deviate from the standard coloring. His request seems modest: he wants only the unusual animals, leaving Laban the majority.

32. 'Dark-colored among the lambs' (chum bakkesavim) — chum describes a brownish or dark coloring unusual in sheep, which were typically white in the ancient Near East. By asking for non-standard animals, Jacob appears to take very little — which is exactly what makes Laban agree. But Jacob has a plan.
33. 'My righteousness will testify for me' (ve'antah-bi tsidqati) — Jacob frames the arrangement as a test of his integrity. The word tsedaqah ('righteousness') is strong — Jacob stakes his moral character on the deal's transparency. Any solid-colored animal found in his possession would be evidence of theft. The proposal is designed to reassure the suspicious Laban: the terms are self-policing, the evidence visible in every animal's coat.
34. 'Agreed!' (hen) — Laban's quick acceptance reveals that he considers the deal favorable to himself. The rare, abnormally colored animals are a small fraction of the flock. Laban thinks he is getting cheap labor. But Jacob, the man who bought a birthright for soup, knows the value of what he is acquiring — and knows how to increase it.
35. Laban acts immediately — and preemptively. He removes all the currently multicolored animals from the flock, placing them with his own sons. This way, Jacob begins with no breeding stock of the kind he was promised. Laban's maneuver is designed to ensure that few if any new spotted or speckled animals are born: without colored parents, the offspring should be solid-colored — Laban's property. The move reveals Laban's character: he agrees to terms and then manipulates the starting conditions.
36. 'Three days' journey between himself and Jacob' (derekh sheloshet yamim beino uvein Ya'aqov) — Laban creates physical distance to prevent Jacob's flock from interbreeding with the removed colored animals. The three-day buffer is a significant separation in pastoral terms, making accidental mixing nearly impossible. Laban has stacked the deck: he took the colored animals, separated them by distance, and left Jacob with only solid-colored stock. By every natural calculation, Jacob should gain nothing.
37. 'Rods of poplar, almond, and plane tree' (maqal livneh lach veluz ve'armon) — Jacob selects three species of trees for his breeding strategy. Livneh ('poplar' or 'styrax') has a white (lavan) inner bark — the wordplay with Laban's name (also from the root lavan, 'white') may be intentional. Luz ('almond' or 'hazel') connects to the name of the place where Jacob had his Bethel vision (28:19, 'the city was formerly called Luz'). Armon ('plane tree') has bark that peels naturally, revealing lighter wood beneath.
37. 'Peeled white stripes in them' (vayefatsel bahen petsalot levanot) — the verb patsal ('peel') creates visual stripes by removing bark to expose white (lavan) wood. The ancient belief — now understood as folk science — was that visual impressions during mating could influence offspring coloring. Jacob creates striped visual stimuli for the animals at the watering troughs where they breed. Whether this 'works' by natural means or by divine intervention behind the folk practice is left ambiguous — but 31:10–12 later reveals that God directed the outcome through a dream.
38. 'In the troughs — the watering channels' (barehatim beshiqtot hamayim) — the rehatim are the channels or gutters leading to the water troughs (shiqtot). Jacob places his striped rods where the animals will see them during mating, which often occurred at watering spots where flocks gathered. The ancient belief in prenatal visual influence (known technically as 'maternal impression') was widespread in the ancient world and persisted into the modern era. The narrative neither endorses nor critiques the science — it records Jacob's method and God's result.
38. 'They mated when they came to drink' (vayechamna bevo'an lishtot) — the verb chamam in the qal stem means 'to be hot, to be in heat.' The animals came into estrus at the watering place, mating in view of the striped rods. The practical genius of Jacob's strategy is in its location: he places the visual stimulus exactly where the animals naturally gather and breed.
39. 'Striped, speckled, and spotted' (aquddim nequddim utlu'im) — three types of irregular coloring, all of which belong to Jacob by the terms of the agreement. The result defies Laban's expectations: even with the colored animals removed and separated by three days' journey, the new offspring are multicolored. Whether this is explained by recessive genetics (the solid-colored parents carried genes for mixed coloring), by Jacob's rod technique, or by direct divine intervention (as 31:10–12 suggests), the narrative credits Jacob's ingenuity operating within divine providence.
40. 'Set the faces of the flocks toward the striped' (vayyitten penei hatson el-aqod) — Jacob employs a second technique: directing the animals' gaze toward already-colored animals during mating. By facing the flock toward existing striped and dark animals, he reinforces the visual stimulus. Whether this reflects folk science or selective breeding knowledge (placing colored animals among the breeding stock), Jacob systematically manipulates the conditions to favor his outcome.
40. 'He set his own droves apart' (vayyaseth-lo adarim levaddo) — Jacob builds a separate herd, keeping his multicolored animals away from Laban's solid-colored flock. This prevents dilution of the colored genes (in modern terms) or maintains the visual influence (in ancient terms). Jacob operates as both shepherd and breeder, managing two flocks with distinct genetic pools.
41. 'The stronger of the flock' (hatson hamequshsharot) — the word mequshsharot describes animals that are vigorous, robust, or 'bound/knotted' (i.e., well-muscled). Jacob's most sophisticated move is selective breeding: he uses the rods only with the strongest animals, ensuring that his portion of the flock is not merely colored but also vigorous. The weaker animals breed without the rods and produce solid-colored offspring for Laban. Jacob gets quality; Laban gets quantity of inferior stock.
42. 'The feeble were Laban's and the stronger Jacob's' (veha'atufim leLavan vahaqqushshurim leYa'aqov) — the contrast is sharp: atufim ('feeble, exhausted, covered/wrapped') versus qeshurim ('strong, vigorous, bound'). The result is a systematic transfer of quality from Laban's herd to Jacob's. Laban agreed to terms he thought would cost him nothing; instead, he loses the best of his breeding stock to Jacob's selective strategy. The trickster has been out-tricked, the exploiter outmaneuvered.

43. "The man increased exceedingly — very greatly" (vayyifrots ha'ish me'od me'od) — the verb parats ('burst forth, break out, increase') appears again (cf. v. 30), now applied to Jacob rather than Laban's flock. The double me'od me'od ('very, very' — 'exceedingly exceedingly') is emphatic in the extreme. Jacob, who arrived in Haran with nothing but a staff (32:10), now possesses flocks, servants, and caravan animals. The Abrahamic blessing is operational: God's promise to prosper Abraham's seed is fulfilled even in exile, even through dubious breeding techniques, even in the household of a manipulator.
43. The catalogue — 'flocks, female servants, male servants, camels, donkeys' — mirrors the wealth descriptions of Abraham (12:16; 24:35) and anticipates Israel's prosperity. Jacob has become the patriarch his grandfather was: wealthy, established, and ready to return to the promised land. The stage is set for the departure from Laban in chapter 31.

Summary: Tensions between Jacob and Laban reach a breaking point. God tells Jacob to return home. Jacob flees with his family and flocks; Rachel secretly steals Laban's household gods. Laban pursues, confronts Jacob, and searches the camp — but Rachel hides the idols. Jacob defends his twenty years of faithful service. They make a covenant at Galeed and part.

What Makes This Remarkable: Rachel's theft of the teraphim ('household gods,' v. 19) is never explained — whether for religious attachment, legal claim, or simple spite, the text does not say. Her concealment of them by sitting on them and claiming menstrual impurity (v. 35) is one of the Bible's darkest comedies: sacred objects rendered untouchable by bodily function. Jacob's speech (vv. 36-42) is his most passionate self-defense, cataloguing twenty years of exploitation, and it culminates in a theological claim: 'the God of my father' has been witness to it all.

Translation Friction: The teraphim (v. 19) are household idols whose precise function — protective deities, inheritance tokens, or oracular objects — remains debated. We transliterated the term and explained the range of possibilities. Jacob 'stole the heart' of Laban (v. 20), an idiom meaning 'deceived' that uses the same root (ganav) as Rachel's literal theft; the double use of 'steal' creates a narrative pun we preserved in the rendering.

Connections: The Mizpah blessing — 'the LORD watch between me and you when we are absent from one another' (31:49) — is often quoted as a benediction but is actually a warning between adversaries. Laban's reference to 'the God of Abraham and the God of Nahor' (31:53) distinguishes the two family deities, while Jacob swears by 'the Fear of his father Isaac' — a unique divine title (also 31:42). The covenant pillar at Galeed anticipates the boundary markers of later Israelite territory.

1He heard the words of Laban's sons, saying, "Jacob has taken all that belonged to our father, and from what was our father's he has made all this wealth." 2Jacob saw the face of Laban, and look — it was not toward him as it had been before. 3Then the LORD said to Jacob, "Return to the land of your fathers and to your birthplace, and I will be with you." 4So Jacob sent word to Rachel and Leah, summoning them out to the field where his flock was, 5He said to them, "I see your father's face — it is not toward me as before. But the God of my father has been with me." 6You yourselves know that with all my strength I have served your father. 7Your father has deceived me and changed my wages ten times, but God did not allow him to do me harm. 8If he said, 'The speckled shall be your wages,' then all the flock bore speckled. And if he said, 'The streaked shall be your wages,' then all the flock bore streaked. 9So God has taken away the livestock of your father and given them to me. 10It happened at the time the flock was in heat — I lifted up my eyes and saw in a dream, and look, the male goats mounting the flock were streaked, speckled, and spotted. 11The angel of God said to me in the dream, 'Jacob!' And I said, 'Here I am.' 12He said, 'Lift up your eyes and see — all the male goats mounting the flock are streaked, speckled, and spotted, for I have seen all that Laban is doing to you.' 13I am the God of Bethel, where you anointed a pillar, where you made a vow to me. Now arise, leave this land and return to the land of your birth.' 14Rachel and Leah replied, "Do we have any remaining share or inheritance in our father's household?" 15Are we not regarded by him as foreigners? For he has sold us and has also entirely consumed our money. 16For all the wealth that God has taken away from our father belongs to us and to our children. So now, whatever God has said to you — do it." 17Jacob got up and placed his children and wives on the camels. 18He drove away all his livestock and all his property that he had acquired — the livestock of his own acquiring that he had gained in Paddan-aram — to go to Isaac his father in the land of Canaan. ¹⁹Laban had gone to shear his sheep, and Rachel stole the household gods that belonged to her father. ²⁰Jacob stole the heart of Laban the Aramean by not telling him that he was fleeing. ²¹He fled — he and all that he had. He rose up, crossed the River, and set his face toward the hill country of Gilead. ²²On the third day, Laban was told that Jacob had fled. ²³He took his kinsmen with him and pursued after him a journey of seven days and overtook him in the hill country of Gilead. ²⁴God came to Laban the Aramean in a dream at night and said to him, "Be careful not to speak to Jacob anything from good to bad." ²⁵Laban overtook Jacob. Jacob had pitched his tent in the hill country, and Laban pitched with his kinsmen in the hill country of Gilead. ²⁶Laban said to Jacob, "What have you done? You stole my heart and drove away my daughters like captives of the sword!" ²⁷Why did you hide to flee? You deceived me and did not tell me, so I could have sent you off with joy and with songs, with tambourine and with lyre! ²⁸You did not even let me kiss my sons and my daughters! Now you have acted foolishly." ²⁹It is in the power of my hand to do you harm, but the God of your father spoke to me last night, saying, 'Be careful not to speak to Jacob anything from good to bad.' ³⁰Now you have gone because you longed so greatly for your father's house — but why did you steal my gods? ³¹Jacob answered and said to Laban, "Because I was afraid, for I thought, 'Perhaps you would tear your daughters away from me by force.' ³²Anyone with whom you find your gods shall not live! In the presence of our kinsmen, examine what is yours with me and take it." For Jacob did not know that Rachel had stolen them. ³³Laban went into Jacob's tent and into Leah's tent and into the tent of the two female servants, but he did not find them. He went out of Leah's tent and entered Rachel's tent. ³⁴Rachel had taken the household gods and placed them in the camel's saddle and sat upon them. Laban felt through the entire tent but did not find them. ³⁵She said to her father, "Let it not displease my lord that I cannot rise before you, for the way of women is upon me." He searched but did not find the household gods. ³⁶Jacob was angry and contended with Laban. Jacob answered and said to Laban, "What is my transgression? What is my sin, that you have hotly pursued after me? ³⁷You have felt through all my goods — what have you found of all your household goods? Set it here before my kinsmen and your kinsmen, and let them judge between the two of us! ³⁸These twenty years I have been with you. Your ewes and your female goats have not miscarried, and the rams of your flock I have not eaten. ³⁹What was torn by beasts I did not bring to you — I bore the loss myself. From my hand you demanded it, whether stolen by day or stolen by night. ⁴⁰By day the heat consumed me, and the frost by night, and my sleep fled from my eyes. ⁴¹These twenty years I have been in your house. I served you fourteen years for your two daughters and six years for your flock, and you changed my wages ten times. ⁴²If the God of my father — the God of Abraham and the Fear of Isaac — had not been on my side, you would have sent me away empty-handed. God has seen my affliction and the toil of my hands, and he rebuked you last night." ⁴³Laban answered and said to Jacob, "The daughters are my daughters, and the sons are my sons, and the flocks are my flocks — everything you see is mine! But what can I do today to these daughters of mine or to their children whom they have borne? ⁴⁴Now come, let us make a covenant, you and I, and let it be a witness between me and you." ⁴⁵Jacob took a stone and set it up as a pillar. ⁴⁶Jacob said to his kinsmen, "Gather stones." They took stones and made a heap, and they ate there by the heap. ⁴⁷Laban named it Jegar-sahadutha, while Jacob named it Galeed. ⁴⁸Laban said, "This heap is a witness between me and you today." Therefore its name was called Galeed, ⁴⁹and the Mizpah, for he said, "May the LORD keep watch between me and you when we are hidden from one another. ⁵⁰If you afflict my daughters, or if you take wives besides my daughters — no man is with us — see, God is witness between me and you." ⁵¹Laban said to Jacob, "See this heap and see this pillar that I have set between me and you. ⁵²This heap is a witness, and this pillar is a witness, that I will not pass beyond this heap toward you, and you will not pass beyond this heap and this pillar toward me, for harm. ⁵³May the God of Abraham and the god of Nahor — the god of their father — judge between us." Then Jacob swore by the Fear of his father Isaac. ⁵⁴Jacob offered a sacrifice on the mountain and called his kinsmen to eat bread. They ate bread and spent the night on the mountain. ⁵⁵Laban rose early in the morning and kissed his grandchildren and his daughters and blessed them. Then Laban departed and returned to his place.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'All this wealth' (et kol-hakkavod hazzeh) — the word kavod literally means 'weight, heaviness, glory.' In this context it denotes material wealth so abundant it carries visible 'weight.' The same word describes the glory of God (Exodus 33:18) — here it describes flocks and servants. Laban's sons see Jacob's prosperity as theft from their inheritance. Their complaint sets the narrative in motion: Jacob's growing wealth has generated envy, making departure both necessary and dangerous.

1. Register departure: kavod rendered as 'wealth' rather than default 'glory' because the Hebrew here clearly refers to material possessions — Jacob's acquired flocks and property. The concrete 'weight/heaviness' sense of kavod is primary, not the divine radiance sense.
2. 'The face of Laban' (penei Lavan) — faces carry enormous narrative weight in Genesis. Jacob will soon need to face Esau (32:21), will see the face of God at Peniel (32:31), and will say that seeing Esau's face is 'like seeing the face of God' (33:10). Here the face of Laban is the first sign of danger — the external expression of internal hostility. The idiom 'not toward him as before' (einennu immo kitmol shilshom — literally 'not with him as yesterday and the day before') marks a permanent shift in relationship.
3. 'Return to the land of your fathers' (shuv el-erets avotekha) — the divine command to return echoes and reverses the original departure. Jacob fled to Haran under his mother's direction (27:43); now he returns under God's. The verb shuv ('return') carries theological weight throughout Scripture — it is the word for repentance, for homecoming, for covenant restoration. God's promise 'I will be with you' (ve'ehyeh immakh) repeats the Bethel promise (28:15) and uses the verb ehyeh ('I will be'), the same root as the divine name revealed at the burning bush (Exodus 3:14).
3. The command comes at the precise moment when both economic and relational conditions make departure necessary. God's direction and human circumstance converge — this is characteristic of Genesis's theology: divine sovereignty works through, not against, the logic of human events.
4. Jacob summons his wives to the field rather than speaking at home — a deliberate choice of privacy, away from Laban's household where walls have ears. The meeting takes place at 'his flock' (tso'no), emphasizing the wealth that is now Jacob's own. Rachel is named before Leah — the narrative priority reflects Jacob's emotional attachment, though Leah is the firstborn wife.
5. Jacob's speech to his wives is carefully constructed rhetoric. He begins with the observable fact (Laban's changed face), then introduces his theological interpretation (God has been with me). The phrase 'the God of my father' (Elohei avi) identifies the deity through patriarchal lineage — not Laban's god but Isaac's God. This distinction will matter profoundly when Laban later invokes his own ancestral deities (v. 53).
6. 'With all my strength I have served your father' (bekhol-kochi avadti et-avikhen) — Jacob appeals to his wives as witnesses. The word koach ('strength, power') encompasses not just physical effort but the totality of his capacity. The verb avad ('serve, work') is the same word used for servitude and slavery. Jacob presents himself not as a son-in-law enriching himself but as a laborer who gave everything to a master who repaid him with deception.
7. 'Changed my wages ten times' (hechelif et-maskurti aseret monim) — 'ten times' may be literal or may function as a round number meaning 'repeatedly.' The verb hachalif ('changed, exchanged') suggests not just adjustment but reversal — Laban kept altering the terms whenever Jacob's flocks prospered under the current agreement. Jacob the deceiver has been systematically deceived, but divine protection has overridden Laban's manipulation. The word maskurti ('my wages') comes from sakhar ('hire, reward') — the same root as Issachar's name (30:18).
8. Jacob presents the pattern as miraculous: whatever Laban decreed as Jacob's wages, the flock produced precisely that. The words nequddim ('speckled, spotted') and aquddim ('streaked, banded') describe color variations in sheep and goats. The implication is clear — God overrode the natural odds to ensure Jacob's prosperity regardless of Laban's manipulations. Each time Laban changed the terms, God changed the outcome.
9. 'God has taken away' (vayyatsel Elohim) — the verb natsal means 'to rescue, deliver, strip away.' It is the same verb used for God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt (Exodus 3:8). Jacob frames his enrichment as divine rescue — God rescued the livestock from Laban's control and transferred them to Jacob. This theological interpretation transforms economic competition into providential narrative.
10. Jacob now adds a dream revelation to his account. In the dream, he sees that the breeding males are all marked — streaked, speckled, and spotted. The three adjectives (aquddim, nequddim, beruddim) form a comprehensive catalogue of color variation, ensuring that all offspring would belong to Jacob's share. Whether this dream preceded or followed the breeding strategy of chapter 30 is left ambiguous — Jacob's narrative serves rhetorical rather than chronological purposes.
11. 'Here I am' (hineni) — Jacob's response to the divine call uses the same word Abraham used when God called him to sacrifice Isaac (22:1, 11). Hineni is not merely a statement of location but of availability and readiness — 'I am present, attentive, and willing.' The angel addresses Jacob by name, establishing the personal nature of the encounter. In Genesis, being called by name by God signals a pivotal moment.
12. 'I have seen all that Laban is doing to you' (ki ra'iti et kol-asher Lavan oseh lakh) — this is the theological key to the entire Laban narrative. God has been watching. The divine 'seeing' (ra'iti) is not passive observation but active engagement — when God 'sees' injustice in Genesis, intervention follows. The same language appears when God 'sees' the affliction of Israel in Egypt (Exodus 3:7). Laban's exploitation is not unnoticed; Jacob's prosperity is divine compensation for injustice suffered.
13. 'I am the God of Bethel' (anokhi ha'El Beit-El) — God identifies himself through a specific place and event. The reference reaches back to chapter 28: the ladder dream, the anointed pillar, the vow. Twenty years have passed, but God remembers and holds Jacob to his promise. The divine self-identification through historical encounter is fundamental to biblical theology — God is not abstract deity but the God who appeared at a particular place, at a particular time.
13. The command 'arise, leave' (qum tse) mirrors the original call to Abraham: 'Go from your land' (lekh-lekha, 12:1). But where Abraham was called to leave home for an unknown destination, Jacob is called to leave exile and return home. The verb shuv ('return') frames Jacob's entire journey as a loop — departure and return, exile and homecoming.

14. The wives respond in unified voice — a rare moment of agreement between the rival sisters. Their rhetorical question expects the answer 'no.' The words cheleq ('portion, share') and nachalah ('inheritance, heritage') are legal terms for property rights. Rachel and Leah are making a legal argument: Laban has cut them off from their inheritance, so they owe him no loyalty. Their solidarity with Jacob against their own father represents a decisive break with their birth family.
15. 'He has sold us' (ki mekharannu) — the verb makhar ('sell') is devastating. Daughters are not merchandise, yet Laban treated them as commodities, exchanging them for fourteen years of Jacob's labor. The wives' accusation is that Laban converted their bride-price (the labor Jacob performed) into personal profit rather than setting it aside for them, as custom required. A father was expected to hold the bride-price in trust for his daughters; Laban devoured it.
15. 'Entirely consumed our money' (vayyokhal gam-akhol et-kaspeinu) — the infinitive absolute construction (akhol + vayyokhal) intensifies the verb: he has 'eaten and eaten' their silver. The metaphor of consumption — Laban has devoured what belonged to them — frames him as predatory. The daughters' indictment is comprehensive: Laban is not merely stingy but exploitative.
16. 'Whatever God has said to you — do it' (kol asher amar Elohim eleikha aseh) — the wives' final word is a command of faith. They authorize Jacob's departure not on economic grounds alone but on theological ones: God has spoken, therefore act. This is remarkable — Rachel and Leah, raised in Laban's household of teraphim and household gods, affirm the authority of Jacob's God over their father's claims. Their declaration parallels Israel's response at Sinai: 'All that the LORD has spoken we will do' (Exodus 19:8).
17. 'Jacob rose up' (vayyaqom Ya'aqov) — the verb qum ('rise, arise') signals decisive action. It echoes the divine command of v. 13: 'Arise!' (qum). Jacob obeys immediately. The detail that he sets his family on camels indicates both the length of the journey and the wealth he has accumulated — camels were expensive transport animals, not common household beasts.
18. The accumulation of possessive language — 'his livestock... his property... his acquiring... he had gained' — emphasizes that these goods are legitimately Jacob's, despite Laban's sons' complaints. The phrase 'livestock of his own acquiring' (miqneh qinyano) uses a cognate construction for emphasis. His destination is specifically identified: 'Isaac his father in the land of Canaan.' Jacob is returning not merely to a geography but to a family and a promise.
19. 'Rachel stole the household gods' (vatignov Rachel et-hatterafim) — the teraphim were small figurines associated with household religion and possibly inheritance rights. Ancient Near Eastern texts from Nuzi suggest that possession of household gods could convey legal claims to family property, though this interpretation is debated. Rachel's theft is never fully explained: was it for religious comfort, legal advantage, or to deprive Laban of his oracular devices? The text deliberately withholds her motive, leaving readers to wonder.
19. The irony is dense: while Jacob 'steals' Laban's heart through deception (v. 20), Rachel literally steals his gods. The verb ganav ('steal') will echo throughout the chapter. The household gods of Laban — whatever power they held — are small enough to sit on, portable enough to hide in a camel saddle. The narrator's treatment of them borders on satire.
20. 'Stole the heart of Laban' (vayyignov et-lev Lavan) — the Hebrew idiom ganav et-lev means 'to deceive' — literally, 'to steal someone's heart,' that is, to steal their awareness or judgment. The phrase could also be rendered 'outwitted.' Jacob, the one whose name means 'supplanter,' continues to live into his name's meaning. The text identifies Laban as 'the Aramean' (ha'Arammi), emphasizing the ethnic and cultural distance between Jacob and his father-in-law — Jacob is leaving foreign territory to return to his own people.
20. The parallel between Rachel stealing the teraphim (v. 19) and Jacob stealing Laban's heart creates a literary doubling: daughter and husband both steal from the father/father-in-law, one taking his gods, the other his knowledge. The verb ganav saturates this chapter.
21. 'Crossed the River' (vayyaavor et-hannahar) — 'the River' without further specification means the Euphrates, the great boundary between Mesopotamia and the land of promise. Crossing the Euphrates is a decisive geographical and symbolic act — Jacob is leaving the world of Laban, Aram, and exile. The phrase 'set his face toward' (vayyasem et-panav) indicates determined, purposeful direction. Gilead, east of the Jordan, is the transitional territory between Mesopotamia and Canaan.
22. 'On the third day' (bayyom hashelishi) — the three-day head start was possible because Laban was away shearing sheep (v. 19). 'The third day' carries narrative significance throughout the Hebrew Bible — it is the day of resolution, revelation, and turning points (cf. Genesis 22:4; 42:18; Exodus 19:11; Hosea 6:2). Here it marks the moment when pursuit becomes inevitable.
23. 'Seven days' journey' (derekh shivat yamim) — the seven-day pursuit underscores both Laban's determination and the great distance Jacob had covered. The word 'kinsmen' (echav, literally 'his brothers') here means relatives, clansmen — Laban assembles a posse. The verb davaq ('overtook, clung to, caught up with') suggests close pursuit, breathing down the neck. The showdown will happen in Gilead — the same territory where Jacob had directed his flight (v. 21).
24. 'From good to bad' (mittov ad-ra) — the merism (a pair of opposites encompassing everything between) means 'anything at all.' Laban is warned not to attempt to influence Jacob in any direction — neither threat nor persuasion. God's intervention on behalf of Jacob mirrors the Abrahamic protection promise: 'I will bless those who bless you, and him who dishonors you I will curse' (12:3). The divine warning in a dream to a foreign pursuer also parallels God's warning to Abimelech regarding Sarah (20:3).
24. That God speaks to Laban — a polytheistic Aramean — demonstrates that the God of Jacob exercises authority beyond the borders of the promised land and beyond the circle of the covenant family. God is not limited to communicating with the faithful; he warns the hostile.

25. The two camps face each other across the Gilead highlands — a tense military standoff. The verb taqa ('pitched, thrust, drove in') suggests a firm, deliberate encampment, not a temporary rest. The separate camps signal that this is a confrontation, not a reunion. Without God's dream-warning, this scene might have ended in violence.
26. 'You stole my heart' (vatignov et-levavi) — Laban echoes the narrator's language from v. 20 but with a different nuance. Where the narrator used lev ('heart/mind'), Laban uses levav ('heart' in its more emotional form). For Laban, Jacob's secret departure is a personal betrayal — 'you stole my awareness, my judgment, my feelings.'
26. 'Like captives of the sword' (kishvuyot charev) — Laban's hyperbole compares Jacob's departure with his daughters to a military raid. The language is deliberately inflammatory: Jacob is not a son-in-law taking his family home but a raider carrying off prisoners of war. The accusation is manipulative — Laban, who sold his daughters (v. 15), now presents himself as their protector.
27. 'With joy and with songs, with tambourine and with lyre' (besimchah uveshirim betof uvekhinor) — Laban's claim that he would have thrown a farewell party is transparently false, given everything the narrative has established about his character. The reader knows Laban changed Jacob's wages ten times, tricked him with Leah, and would have kept him indefinitely. This is revisionist self-portrayal — the exploiter rewriting himself as generous host. The irony is thick.
28. 'My sons and my daughters' (levanai velivnotai) — Laban claims Jacob's children as 'my sons' (grandsons) and Jacob's wives as 'my daughters,' reasserting possessive authority over the entire family. The word hiskalta ('you have acted foolishly') implies both moral failure and practical stupidity. Laban frames himself as the wronged party — the loving grandfather denied a farewell embrace. The emotional manipulation is masterful, and the narrator expects readers to see through it.
29. 'It is in the power of my hand to do you harm' (yesh-le'el yadi la'asot immakhem ra) — Laban's threat is real: he has an armed force, and Jacob's family is vulnerable. But the threat is immediately neutralized by the dream warning. Laban's admission reveals both his capacity for violence and his subordination to a God who is not his own. The phrase 'the God of your father' (Elohei avikhem) is Laban's way of distancing himself — this is Jacob's God, not Laban's, yet Laban must obey him.
29. The interplay between human power and divine restraint is characteristic of Genesis: Laban has the strength to destroy Jacob but not the permission. God's warning has converted a potential massacre into a negotiation.
30. 'You longed so greatly' (nikhsaf nikhsafta) — the infinitive absolute construction intensifies the longing: 'you have longed with longing.' Laban concedes the legitimacy of Jacob's desire to return home. But then comes the accusation that matters most to him: 'Why did you steal my gods?' (lammah ganavta et-elohai). The word elohai ('my gods') reveals Laban's theology: his gods are possessions to be stolen, objects small enough to carry away. The contrast with Jacob's God — who speaks in dreams, controls fertility, and warns pursuers — could not be sharper.
31. 'Tear away by force' (tigzol) — the verb gazal means 'to seize, rob, tear away violently.' Jacob's fear was not abstract but specific: Laban might forcibly reclaim his daughters and grandchildren. Given Laban's admission in v. 29 that he had the power to do harm, Jacob's fear was well-founded. The irony is that Laban accuses Jacob of treating the daughters as captives (v. 26), while Jacob feared Laban would treat them as repossessed property.
32. 'Shall not live' (lo yichyeh) — Jacob's pronouncement is unwittingly a death sentence on his beloved Rachel. He speaks with righteous confidence, unaware that Rachel has hidden the teraphim. The narrator's aside — 'Jacob did not know that Rachel had stolen them' — is essential: without it, Jacob would appear cruel rather than ignorant. This dramatic irony creates unbearable tension for the reader who knows what Jacob does not.
32. Some interpreters connect this rash oath to Rachel's later death in childbirth (35:16-19). Whether or not the text intends a causal link, the juxtaposition of Jacob's curse and Rachel's fate haunts the narrative. Rash words spoken in certainty have consequences that the speaker cannot foresee.
33. The search sequence — Jacob's tent, Leah's tent, the servants' tent, and finally Rachel's tent — builds suspense. The narrator knows where the gods are and delays the climactic moment. Laban methodically searches every dwelling, finding nothing, until he reaches the last tent — Rachel's. The narrative pacing is masterful: each empty tent increases the tension.
34. 'Placed them in the camel's saddle and sat upon them' (vattsimem bekhar haggamal vateshev aleihem) — the image is richly ironic: the gods of Laban are hidden beneath a woman's body, stuffed into a saddle cushion, sat upon. If these teraphim had any genuine divine power, they could not be concealed under a cushion. The narrator's satirical point is devastating: gods that can be stolen, hidden, and sat upon are no gods at all. Rachel literally sits in judgment over Laban's religion.
34. The verb mashash ('felt, groped') suggests that Laban searched by touch as well as sight — he was thorough. Yet he found nothing. The household gods are reduced to objects of farce.
35. 'The way of women is upon me' (derekh nashim li) — Rachel's excuse is her menstrual period. According to later Levitical law, a menstruating woman rendered whatever she sat upon ritually impure (Leviticus 15:20), which would make Laban reluctant to search beneath her. Whether such purity concerns applied in this pre-Sinai patriarchal context is uncertain, but the social taboo was likely ancient. Rachel exploits a biological reality as a weapon of deception — she is her father's daughter in cunning.
35. The irony deepens: if Rachel is menstruating, the teraphim beneath her would be contaminated by impurity. The gods of Laban's household are not merely hidden but defiled. The daughter who learned deception in Laban's house now deploys it against him.

36. 'What is my transgression? What is my sin?' (mah-pish'i mah chattati) — Jacob shifts from defense to offense. The two words for wrongdoing — pesha ('transgression, rebellion') and chattat ('sin, missing the mark') — cover the full spectrum of moral failure. Jacob dares Laban to name any specific wrong. Having searched every tent and found nothing, Laban's accusation of theft has been publicly disproven. Jacob's anger is the righteous indignation of a man falsely accused.
36. 'Hotly pursued' (dalaqta) — the verb dalaq means 'to burn, to pursue hotly, to chase with intensity.' It conveys the heat of the chase — Laban didn't merely follow but hunted Jacob with burning urgency.
37. Jacob demands a public trial. He calls for all found property to be placed before witnesses — 'my kinsmen and your kinsmen' — for adjudication. The verb yokhichu ('let them judge, decide, arbitrate') is legal language for a formal dispute resolution. Since the search has turned up nothing, Jacob's challenge is a devastating rhetorical move: the empty floor is his defense. Laban has no exhibit, no evidence, no case.
38. 'Twenty years' (esrim shanah) — Jacob's speech now becomes a systematic indictment of his servitude. Twenty years: fourteen for the wives, six for the flocks (v. 41). The specific details — no miscarriages, no stolen rams — are a shepherd's defense: he has protected Laban's investment with perfect fidelity. Miscarriage (shikkel) was a significant economic loss in pastoral culture; Jacob claims not a single one occurred under his watch.
39. 'I bore the loss myself' (anokhi achatennah) — by ancient Near Eastern shepherding law (cf. Exodus 22:10-13), a shepherd was not liable for animals killed by predators if he could produce the carcass as evidence. Jacob went beyond the legal requirement: he absorbed the losses personally rather than presenting torn carcasses. Laban demanded compensation even for theft — 'stolen by day or stolen by night' (genevti yom ugenevti laylah) — events entirely beyond a shepherd's control. Jacob's service exceeded every legal standard.
40. 'The heat consumed me... and the frost by night' (akhalani chorev veqerach ballaylah) — Jacob describes the physical toll of shepherding in the Near Eastern climate: scorching daytime heat and freezing nights. The verb akhal ('consumed, ate') portrays the weather as a predator devouring him. Combined with sleeplessness (vatiddad shenati me'einai — 'my sleep fled from my eyes'), Jacob paints a picture of twenty years of relentless, body-breaking labor. This is not nostalgia but testimony in a legal dispute.
41. Jacob now gives the precise accounting: fourteen plus six equals twenty. The arithmetic is unassailable. He has served more than any bride-price required, and Laban still changed the terms repeatedly. The phrase 'ten times' (aseret monim) recurs from v. 7, now carrying the full weight of Jacob's twenty-year testimony. This is the speech of a man who has kept count, who remembers every injustice, who will not allow his labor to be erased from the record.
42. 'The Fear of Isaac' (pachad Yitschaq) — this is one of the most mysterious divine titles in the Hebrew Bible. The word pachad can mean 'fear, dread, terror' or possibly 'kinsman' (from a different root). If 'fear,' the title may mean the God whom Isaac fears, or the God who inspires dread. Some scholars connect it to the Aqedah — Isaac's terrifying experience on Mount Moriah (chapter 22) may have permanently shaped his relationship with God into one defined by trembling awe. The title appears only here and in v. 53, both in Jacob's speech.
42. 'God has seen my affliction and the toil of my hands' (et-onyi ve'et-yegia kappai ra'ah Elohim) — the word oni ('affliction, suffering, poverty') is the same word used for Israel's suffering in Egypt (Exodus 3:7). Jacob's Haran experience prefigures the national experience: servitude, exploitation, divine observation, and eventual deliverance. The verb ra'ah ('seen') echoes v. 12 — God has been watching all along.
43. 'Everything you see is mine' (vekhoh asher-attah ro'eh li-hu) — Laban's response is breathtaking in its possessiveness. He claims everything: daughters, sons, flocks — all mine. This is the language of absolute ownership, and it reveals Laban's fundamental worldview: people are property. Yet the next breath concedes powerlessness: 'What can I do?' The man who claims everything can enforce nothing. God's restraining hand has reduced Laban's total claims to empty words.
44. 'Let us make a covenant' (nikhretah verit) — the verb karat ('cut') used with berit ('covenant') reflects the ancient practice of cutting animals in covenant ceremonies (cf. Genesis 15:10, 18). Unable to control Jacob by force, Laban proposes a formal agreement — a covenant that will bind both parties with mutual obligations. The shift from confrontation to covenant is forced by God's restraining intervention: Laban cannot coerce, so he must negotiate.
45. Jacob's act of setting up a stone pillar (matsevah) echoes his earlier pillar at Bethel (28:18). Pillars serve as physical witnesses — stone remembers what human memory might forget. The pillar marks the spot where the covenant was made and will serve as a boundary marker. Jacob, not Laban, takes the initiative in erecting it — he is the one who establishes the physical testimony.
46. The communal gathering of stones transforms the covenant from a private agreement into a public act. The shared meal on the heap (gal) ratifies the covenant — eating together in the ancient Near East was a bonding act, creating obligation between the parties. The heap of stones and the pillar together form the covenant memorial: vertical and horizontal, individual and collective.
47. 'Jegar-sahadutha' (Aramaic) and 'Galeed' (Hebrew) — both names mean 'heap of witness,' but in different languages. Laban names it in Aramaic, his native tongue; Jacob names it in Hebrew. This is the only place in Genesis where Aramaic appears, and the bilingual naming underscores the cultural divide between the two men. They share a covenant but not a language. The heap of stones witnesses in two tongues — a boundary marker that speaks to both sides of the border it creates.
48. Laban now adopts the Hebrew name Galeed, explaining its etymology. The heap is a 'witness' (ed) — an inanimate object invested with legal standing. In a culture without written contracts, physical landmarks served as permanent testimony to agreements. The stones cannot speak, but they can be pointed to: 'Remember what we agreed at this place.'

49. 'May the LORD keep watch between me and you' (yitsef YHWH beini uveinekha) — this is the so-called 'Mizpah benediction,' widely used today as a blessing of friendship. But in context, it is nothing of the sort. It is a warning: 'Since we cannot trust each other, may God enforce what neither of us can verify.' The verb tsafah ('watch, keep lookout') implies surveillance, not tender care. Laban is saying: 'I cannot watch you when you are out of sight, so God must be the enforcer.'
49. The popular misuse of this verse as a sentimental farewell blessing is one of the most dramatic misreadings in biblical interpretation. In its original context, Mizpah is a place of mutual suspicion, not mutual affection.
50. Laban's covenant terms concern his daughters' welfare: Jacob must not mistreat them or take additional wives. The verb 'innah ('afflict, humble') is strong — the same word used for the oppression of Israel in Egypt (Exodus 1:11-12). Laban's concern for his daughters' treatment is perhaps his most sympathetic moment, though it rings hollow after he sold them (v. 15). The phrase 'no man is with us' (ein ish immanu) acknowledges the impossibility of human enforcement at such distance — only God can monitor the agreement.
51. Laban claims credit for the pillar ('which I have set'), though v. 45 states that Jacob erected it. This minor detail reveals Laban's character to the end: even in covenant-making, he appropriates what is not his. The heap and pillar together function as a border — a line of stones between two worlds, two families, two futures.
52. The covenant's practical terms are a non-aggression pact with a defined boundary. Neither party will cross the stone border with hostile intent. The phrase 'for harm' (lera'ah) qualifies the prohibition — crossing for peaceful purposes is presumably permitted, but military or hostile crossing is forbidden. This is the first formal boundary agreement in the Bible, and it establishes the principle that covenants create borders — lines that define where one party's sovereignty ends and another's begins.
53. 'The God of Abraham and the god of Nahor' (Elohei Avraham ve'Elohei Nachor) — Laban invokes two distinct ancestral deities. Abraham and Nahor were brothers (11:27), but their descendants worship differently. Laban treats them as separate gods with shared parentage — 'the god of their father' (Elohei avihem). Jacob, by contrast, swears only by 'the Fear of his father Isaac' (pachad aviv Yitschaq), refusing to invoke Nahor's god. The theological divide is absolute: Laban sees many gods; Jacob knows one.
53. The verb yishpetu ('may they judge') uses the plural, suggesting Laban envisions multiple deities adjudicating. Jacob's oath uses the singular — he swears by one God only. Even in the act of covenant-making, the two men inhabit different theological universes.
54. The covenant is sealed with sacrifice (zevach) and a communal meal — 'they ate bread' (vayyokhelu lachem). Bread (lechem) here likely means food in general, not specifically leavened bread. The shared meal on the mountain, following a sacrifice, has ritual significance: those who eat together before God are bound together. The overnight stay (vayyalinu bahar — 'they spent the night on the mountain') suggests the gravity of the occasion — this is not a hasty agreement but a formal covenant event.
55. 'Kissed his grandchildren and his daughters and blessed them' (vaynashek levanav velivnotav vayevarekh ethem) — Laban's final act is one of genuine tenderness. Whatever his faults — and the narrative has catalogued them extensively — Laban is a grandfather saying goodbye to family he will never see again. The verb barakh ('blessed') is the last word Laban speaks over his family. The man who tried to control, exploit, and pursue ends with a blessing and a departure.
55. 'Returned to his place' (vayyashov Lavan limqomo) — Laban exits the narrative permanently. He returns to Paddan-aram, to his household gods (if Rachel has left any), to his diminished flocks. The phrase limqomo ('to his place') carries finality — this is where Laban belongs, and Jacob does not. The boundary has been drawn; the separation is complete. Jacob's Haran chapter is over.

Summary: Angels meet Jacob at Mahanaim. Hearing that Esau approaches with 400 men, Jacob is terrified. He prays, divides his camp, and sends gifts ahead. Alone at the Jabbok ford by night, Jacob wrestles a mysterious figure until dawn. His hip is wrenched, but he refuses to release his opponent without a blessing. He is renamed Israel ('he strives with God') and names the place Peniel ('face of God').

What Makes This Remarkable: The wrestling at the Jabbok is the most physically intimate encounter between God and a human in the Hebrew Bible. A dense phonetic web binds Ya'aqov (Jacob), Yabboq (Jabbok), and ye'avek (wrestled) — all sharing the consonants '-b-q. Jacob's confession qatonti ('I am too small,' v. 10) is one of the purest expressions of humility in Scripture. The chapter's dominant motif is panim ('face'): Jacob will 'cover' Esau's face with gifts, then 'see' Esau's face, hoping Esau will 'lift' his face — and the place where he meets God is named Peniel, 'face of God.'

Translation Friction: The wrestling opponent is called simply ish ('a man,' v. 24), yet he renames Jacob, blesses him, and Jacob identifies him as God. We preserved this ambiguity — the Hebrew moves from human encounter to divine revelation without sharp transition. The word chesed (v. 10) resists any single English equivalent; we rendered it here as 'faithful love,' noting that it encompasses covenant loyalty, gracious kindness, and persistent commitment beyond obligation.

Connections: The renaming of Jacob to Israel (32:28) is confirmed by God at Bethel (35:10). The wrestling at Peniel gives Israel its name and its limp — the dietary prohibition against eating the sciatic sinew (32:32) embeds the story in every meal. Hosea 12:3-4 interprets the wrestling as emblematic of Israel's national character. Jacob's statement that 'seeing your face is like seeing the face of God' (33:10) connects the two encounters.

¹As Jacob continued on his journey, angels of God encountered him. ²When Jacob saw them, he said, "This is God's camp!" And he called the name of that place Mahanaim. ³Jacob sent messengers ahead of him to Esau his brother, to the land of Seir, the territory of Edom. ⁴He commanded them, saying, "Thus you shall say to my lord Esau: 'Thus says your servant Jacob: I have sojourned with Laban and stayed until now. ⁵I have acquired oxen and donkeys, flocks, and male servants and female servants. I have sent to tell my lord, so that I may find favor in your eyes.'" ⁶The messengers returned to Jacob, saying, "We came to your brother Esau, and he is also coming to meet you — and four hundred men are with him." ⁷Jacob was greatly afraid and distressed. He divided the people who were with him, and the flocks and the herds and the camels, into two camps. ⁸He said, "If Esau comes to the one camp and strikes it down, then the remaining camp will escape." ⁹Jacob said, "O God of my father Abraham and God of my father Isaac — O LORD, who said to me, 'Return to your land and to your birthplace, and I will do you good' — ¹⁰I am too small for all the faithful love and all the faithfulness that you have shown your servant, for with only my staff I crossed this Jordan, and now I have become two camps. ¹¹Deliver me, I pray, from the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau, for I am afraid of him — lest he come and strike me down, mother with children. ¹²But you yourself said, 'I will surely do you good, and I will make your offspring like the sand of the sea, which cannot be counted for multitude.'" ¹³He spent that night there, and from what he had at hand he took a gift for Esau his brother: ¹⁴two hundred female goats and twenty male goats, two hundred ewes and twenty rams, ¹⁵thirty milking camels with their young, forty cows and ten bulls, twenty female donkeys and ten male donkeys. ¹⁶He placed them in the hands of his servants, each drove by itself, and said to his servants, "Pass on ahead of me, and put a space between drove and drove." ¹⁷He commanded the first, saying, "When Esau my brother meets you and asks you, 'Whose are you? Where are you going? And whose are these ahead of you?' ¹⁸then you shall say, 'They belong to your servant Jacob. It is a gift sent to my lord Esau. And look — he himself is also behind us.'" ¹⁹He likewise commanded the second and the third and all who followed behind the droves, saying, "In this same manner you shall speak to Esau when you find him. ²⁰And you shall say, 'Moreover, look — your servant Jacob is behind us.'" For he said, "I will cover his face with the gift that goes before my face, and afterward I will see his face. Perhaps he will lift up my face." ²¹So the gift passed on ahead of him, and he himself spent that night in the camp. ²²He rose that night and took his two wives and his two female servants and his eleven children, and he crossed the ford of the Jabbok. ²³He took them and sent them across the stream, and he sent across everything that he had. ²⁴Jacob was left alone, and a man wrestled with him until the rising of the dawn. ²⁵When he saw that he could not prevail against him, he touched the socket of his hip, and the socket of Jacob's hip was wrenched as he wrestled with him. ²⁶He said, "Let me go, for the dawn has risen." But he said, "I will not let you go unless you bless me." ²⁷He said to him, "What is your name?" And he said, "Jacob." ²⁸He said, "Your name shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel, for you have striven with God and with men, and you have prevailed." ²⁹Jacob asked and said, "Tell me, please, your name." He said, "Why is it that you ask my name?" And he blessed him there. ³⁰Jacob called the name of the place Peniel, "For I have seen God face to face. my life has been preserved." ³¹The sun rose upon him as he passed Peniel, and he was limping on his hip. ³²Therefore the children of Israel do not eat the sinew of the hip — the one on the socket of the thigh — to this day, because he touched the socket of Jacob's hip at the sinew of the hip. ³³Jacob lifted up his eyes and looked, and there was Esau coming, with four hundred men with him. He divided the children among Leah and Rachel and the two female servants.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Angels of God met him' (vayyifge'u-vo mal'akhei Elohim) — the verb paga ('met, encountered') suggests an unexpected collision rather than a planned rendezvous. Jacob, having just separated from Laban, immediately encounters the divine. The phrase mal'akhei Elohim ('angels/messengers of God') recalls the ladder vision at Bethel (28:12), where angels ascended and descended. There, Jacob was leaving the land; here, he is returning. The angelic bookends frame his twenty-year exile: angels at departure, angels at return.

2. 'This is God's camp!' (machaneh Elohim zeh) — Jacob recognizes the angelic company as a military encampment. The word machaneh means 'camp' in the military sense — a positioned force, an army bivouacked. Jacob sees the angels as God's army, deployed on his behalf.
2. 'Mahana'im' (machanayim) — the dual ending -ayim means 'two camps.' The name anticipates v. 8, where Jacob will divide his own company into 'two camps' (shenei machanot). The wordplay links divine provision with human strategy: God has two camps; Jacob will create two camps. The name Mahana'im also foreshadows the entire chapter's theme of doubling — two camps, two names (Jacob/Israel), two encounters (angels, then the mysterious wrestler).
3. 'Messengers' (mal'akhim) — the same Hebrew word used for 'angels' in vv. 1-2. Jacob has just encountered God's messengers (mal'akhei Elohim); now he sends his own messengers (mal'akhim) to Esau. The verbal echo is deliberate: Jacob's diplomacy mirrors the divine arrangement. He operates in the space between heaven's envoys and earth's negotiations.
3. 'The land of Seir, the territory of Edom' (artsah Se'ir sedeh Edom) — Esau has established himself in the region south and east of the Dead Sea. Seir ('hairy') puns on Esau's hairy appearance (25:25); Edom ('red') recalls his red stew (25:30). Geography embodies identity: Esau is rooted in a land named for his body and his appetite.
4. 'My lord Esau... your servant Jacob' (ladoni le'Esav... avdekha Ya'akov) — the reversal is stunning. Jacob, who stole the blessing of the firstborn, now addresses Esau as 'my lord' (adoni) and calls himself 'your servant' (avdekha). The man who seized the position of superior now voluntarily assumes the language of inferior. Whether this is genuine humility or shrewd diplomacy (or both) is left for the reader to discern. Isaac's blessing pronounced that Jacob's brother would serve him (27:29); Jacob's message suggests the opposite.
4. 'I have sojourned' (garti) — the verb gur means 'to dwell as a resident alien,' not as a citizen or owner. Jacob's choice of words signals: 'I have not been building a rival kingdom; I have been a stranger in a foreign land.' Some rabbinic commentators note that garti has the same consonants as taryag (613), suggesting Jacob kept all the commandments even in Laban's house — a creative but ahistorical reading.
5. 'So that I may find favor in your eyes' (limtso-chen be'einekha) — the phrase chen ('favor, grace') combined with 'in your eyes' is the language of supplication throughout the Hebrew Bible. Jacob is asking for something he cannot demand — Esau's goodwill. The catalogue of possessions — oxen, donkeys, flocks, servants — is not boasting but a diplomatic signal: 'I am self-sufficient; I am not coming to take what is yours.' Jacob's wealth reassures Esau that the returning brother is not a competitor for Isaac's estate.
6. 'Four hundred men with him' (ve'arba-me'ot ish immo) — the messengers' report is terrifyingly brief. Four hundred men is a military force, not a welcoming committee. David later assembles four hundred men as a fighting band (1 Samuel 22:2). The messengers report no words from Esau — no message of peace, no message of hostility. The silence is more frightening than any threat. Esau is approaching with an army and has said nothing about his intentions.
7. 'Greatly afraid and distressed' (vayyira... vayyetser lo) — two verbs pile up to express Jacob's terror. The first, yare ('fear'), is visceral; the second, tsarar ('be distressed, pressed, in anguish'), adds psychological compression. The man who wrestled blessings from his father and outwitted Laban is now paralyzed with dread. Twenty years of cunning cannot solve this problem: Esau is coming with an army, and Jacob has women and children.
7. 'Two camps' (shenei machanot) — Jacob's division echoes the place-name Mahana'im ('two camps') from v. 2. His military strategy mirrors the angelic formation he just witnessed. The reasoning is pragmatic: if Esau destroys one camp, the other can escape. But the division also symbolizes Jacob's divided life — torn between two identities, two brothers, two futures.
8. 'The remaining camp will escape' (vehayah hammachaneh hannish'ar lifletah) — the word peletah ('escape, remnant, deliverance') is significant in later prophetic and theological usage. The concept of a surviving 'remnant' — a portion preserved through catastrophe — will become central to Israel's self-understanding (cf. Isaiah 10:20-22). Here at the personal level, Jacob calculates survival: even in the worst case, half his family lives. The strategy of division preserves a remnant.
9. Jacob's prayer is one of the most theologically sophisticated in Genesis. He begins by identifying God through covenant lineage — 'God of my father Abraham and God of my father Isaac' — grounding his appeal in established relationship. Then he invokes God's own word: 'Return... and I will do you good.' Jacob is not begging blindly but reminding God of a specific promise. This rhetorical strategy — quoting God back to God — becomes a model for Israelite prayer (cf. Moses in Exodus 32:13; Numbers 14:13-19).
9. The address shifts from 'God of my father' (Elohei avi) to the personal name YHWH ('the LORD'). Jacob moves from ancestral theology to direct encounter — this is not merely his grandfather's God but the LORD who spoke to him personally.
10. 'I am too small' (qatonti) — the verb qatan means 'to be small, insignificant, unworthy.' Jacob does not say 'I am not worthy' (a moral statement) but 'I am too small' (a statement of scale). He is overwhelmed by the disproportion between what he deserves and what he has received. This is one of the purest expressions of humility in the Hebrew Bible.
10. 'Steadfast love and faithfulness' (chesed ve'emet) — this word pair is foundational to biblical theology. Chesed is covenant loyalty, lovingkindness beyond obligation — the love that persists when all other reasons to love have failed. Emet is reliability, truth, trustworthiness — what can be depended upon absolutely. Together they describe God's character as both gracious and dependable.
10. 'With my staff I crossed this Jordan' (bemaqli avarti et-haYarden) — the image is unforgettable. Twenty years ago, Jacob fled with nothing but a walking stick. Now he returns with two camps of family, servants, and livestock. The staff is a symbol of radical poverty — one man, one stick, crossing a river. The contrast between departure and return measures the fullness of divine blessing.

11. 'From the hand of my brother, from the hand of Esau' (miyyad achi miyyad Esav) — the doubled phrase emphasizes both the relationship (brother) and the threat (Esau). Jacob cannot separate the two: the one who would destroy him is his own twin. The word yad ('hand') is not just 'power' but 'violence' — the hand that strikes.
11. 'Mother with children' (em al-banim) — the phrase describes the worst form of slaughter: killing mothers together with their young, total extermination with no survivors. The expression appears in Hosea 10:14 as an image of war's ultimate horror. Jacob fears not merely his own death but the annihilation of his entire family. Later Torah law will prohibit taking a mother bird with her young (Deuteronomy 22:6-7), reflecting the same ethical instinct against total destruction.
12. 'I will surely do you good' (hetev etiv immakh) — the infinitive absolute construction (hetev + etiv) creates an emphatic divine promise: 'I will good-you with goodness,' 'I will absolutely do you good.' Jacob is holding God to his word. The logic of the prayer is: 'You promised abundance; destruction would contradict your promise.'
12. 'Like the sand of the sea' (kechol hayyam) — this echoes the Abrahamic promise (22:17) and the Bethel promise (28:14, where the image is 'dust of the earth'). Jacob reminds God that he is not merely one man facing death but the carrier of a multigenerational promise. If Esau destroys Jacob, God's own word fails. The prayer's power lies in its theological audacity: Jacob makes God's faithfulness the argument for his own survival.
13. 'A gift' (minchah) — the word minchah means 'gift, offering, tribute.' It is the same word used for the grain offering in Levitical worship (Leviticus 2:1). Jacob's gift to Esau functions at multiple levels: tribute from a vassal to a lord, a peace offering to avert wrath, and an attempt to 'cover' his past offense. The word will recur throughout this passage as Jacob strategizes about how to present his offering to maximum effect.
14. The catalogue of animals begins. The ratios — ten females to one male — reflect standard ancient Near Eastern breeding proportions for maximum flock productivity. Jacob is not merely sending animals but sending reproductive capacity — a breeding herd, not just meat. The gift is designed to generate ongoing wealth for Esau, not merely immediate consumption. The sheer scale — 580 animals total across five species (vv. 14-15) — demonstrates both Jacob's prosperity and his desperation.
15. The gift totals 580 animals: 220 goats, 220 sheep, 30 camels with young, 50 cattle, and 30 donkeys. This is an enormous transfer of wealth. Milking camels with their young (gemalim meiniqot uvneiham) are especially valuable — they provide milk for the journey and represent breeding stock. The specificity of the list functions like a legal inventory: every animal is accounted for. Jacob's generosity is calculated, not spontaneous — each number serves the strategy of overwhelming Esau with abundance.
16. 'Put a space between drove and drove' (revach tasimu bein eder uvein eder) — Jacob's strategy is psychological: rather than one overwhelming gift, he creates a sequence of gifts, each arriving separately with intervals between them. The word revach ('space, interval, relief') suggests breathing room — each drove gives Esau time to absorb its impact before the next arrives. The effect is cumulative: by the time Esau meets Jacob, he has received wave after wave of tribute, each one softening his anger further.
17. Jacob scripts the encounter in advance, anticipating Esau's questions and preparing the servants' answers. The three questions — 'Whose are you? Where are you going? Whose are these?' — cover identity, destination, and ownership. Jacob leaves nothing to chance. The level of preparation reveals both his shrewdness and his terror: a man confident in Esau's goodwill would not rehearse his servants' lines.
18. Each servant repeats the same formula: 'your servant Jacob... my lord Esau.' The repetition is strategic — every encounter reinforces Jacob's submission. The phrase 'he himself is also behind us' (gam-hu acharenu) creates anticipation: Esau learns Jacob is coming but must wait through multiple gift-droves before the actual meeting. Jacob is engineering emotional momentum.
19. The repetition of instructions to each successive drove amplifies the strategy: every servant delivers the identical message. Esau will hear 'your servant Jacob, my lord Esau' five times over. The military-like briefing — each unit receiving the same orders — shows Jacob treating this encounter as a campaign. The verb matsa ('find, encounter') is the same word used for Jacob's encounters with God; here Jacob hopes his servants will 'find' Esau in a posture of receptivity.
20. 'I will cover his face... see his face... lift up my face' (akhapperah fanav... er'eh fanav... yissa fanai) — this verse is the most concentrated use of panim ('face') language in the entire Bible. Three different 'face' idioms appear in a single sentence: (1) kaphar panim — 'cover/atone the face,' meaning to appease; (2) ra'ah panim — 'see the face,' meaning to enter the presence; (3) nasa panim — 'lift the face,' meaning to show favor/acceptance. The triple wordplay on 'face' anticipates the chapter's climax at Peniel ('face of God') and Jacob's later declaration that seeing Esau's face is 'like seeing the face of God' (33:10).
20. The verb kaphar ('cover, atone') is the root of kippur, as in Yom Kippur ('Day of Atonement'). Jacob is attempting to 'atone' for his offense against Esau with a gift. The theology of atonement — covering guilt with an offering to restore relationship — is present here in embryonic form, applied to human relationships before it is codified in Levitical worship.
21. 'The gift passed on ahead of him' (vatta'avor hamminchah al-panav) — even here, the word panim ('before his face') appears. The gift goes 'upon his face' — literally, the tribute precedes Jacob's presence. Jacob waits. The night is long. He has done everything humanly possible — divided, prayed, prepared, sent — and now he waits alone in the camp. The narrative is about to strip away every support and leave Jacob utterly alone.
22. 'The ford of the Jabbok' (ma'avar Yabboq) — the Jabbok (modern Zarqa) is a tributary of the Jordan, flowing from east to west. The name Yabboq is a wordplay hub: it echoes Ya'aqov (Jacob) and ye'avek (he wrestled, v. 25). The three words share the consonants '-b-q', creating a dense sound-web: at the Yabboq, Ya'aqov will ye'avek. Geography, identity, and action merge in a single phonetic cluster.

22. 'Eleven children' (achad asar yeladav) — the number eleven confirms the chronological setting: Benjamin has not yet been born (that will happen in 35:16-18). Dinah may be included in the count or may be implied as present but uncounted, as the text says yeladav ('his children/sons').
23. Jacob sends everyone and everything across the Jabbok. The verb avar ('cross, pass over') appears three times in vv. 22-23, emphasizing the act of crossing. By sending everything ahead, Jacob strips himself of all possessions, all companions, all support. He stands alone on the north bank. The narrative has systematically removed every human resource: the gift has gone ahead, the family has crossed over, the servants are with the droves. What remains is one man in the dark.
24. 'A man wrestled with him' (vayyeavek ish immo) — the identity of the 'man' (ish) is the great question of the passage. He is called ish ('man'), yet he renames Jacob with a name involving Elohim ('God'), and Jacob names the place Peniel ('face of God'). Hosea 12:4-5 identifies the opponent as an angel. The verb ye'avek ('wrestled') appears only here and in the next verse — it is coined for this moment, echoing both Ya'aqov and Yabboq. The wrestling is physical, violent, and lasts all night. No words are exchanged until dawn.
25. 'He touched the socket of his hip' (vayyigga bekaf-yerekho) — the verb naga ('touched') is deliberately understated. This is not a blow but a touch — yet the touch dislocates Jacob's hip. The supernatural nature of the opponent is revealed through this contrast: one who can dislocate a joint with a touch has been restraining his power throughout the night. The 'man' could have ended the fight at any moment but chose to wrestle at Jacob's level until dawn.
25. 'The socket of his hip was wrenched' (vatteqa kaf-yerekh Ya'aqov) — the verb yaqa means 'to be dislocated, alienated, wrenched out of place.' The yerekh ('thigh, hip') is associated in Hebrew with procreative power (servants swear oaths with a hand under the patriarch's thigh, 24:2, 9). The wounding of Jacob's hip may symbolize the vulnerability of his generative capacity — his descendants will carry the mark of this encounter.
26. 'Let me go, for the dawn has risen' (shallcheni ki alah hashachar) — the mysterious wrestler urgently demands release at daybreak. The urgency of dawn suggests a being whose nature cannot be exposed to full light — or whose encounter with humanity is bounded by night. Throughout the Hebrew Bible, theophanies are liminal events, occurring at boundaries between states: night and day, sleeping and waking, earth and heaven.
26. 'I will not let you go unless you bless me' (lo ashallelachka ki im berakhtani) — Jacob's demand is breathtaking. Wounded, exhausted, with a dislocated hip, he refuses to release his opponent without a blessing. This is the same Jacob who stole Esau's blessing through deception (chapter 27); now he demands a blessing through tenacity. The irony is transformative: the blessing-thief becomes the blessing-wrestler. Jacob will not let go of God — this is the defining act of his life and the paradigm for Israel's relationship with the divine.
27. 'What is your name?' (mah-shemekha) — the question echoes Isaac's question before the stolen blessing: 'Who are you, my son?' (27:18). There, Jacob lied: 'I am Esau.' Here, for perhaps the first time, Jacob speaks his own name truthfully. To say 'Jacob' is to confess: 'I am the supplanter, the heel-grabber, the one who deceives.' The name is not just identification but confession. Before Jacob can receive a new name, he must own the old one.
28. 'Israel' (Yisra'el) — the name is explained as 'you have striven (sarita) with God (EL).' The verb sarah means 'to struggle, contend, strive, persist.' Israel thus means 'he strives with God' or 'God strives' or 'one who persists with God.' The name defines not a place or a possession but a relationship — and a combative one. To be Israel is to wrestle with God, not merely to worship him. The entire nation that will bear this name is characterized at its origin by struggle rather than submission.
28. 'With God and with men, and you have prevailed' (im-Elohim ve'im-anashim vatukhal) — the scope of Jacob's striving is comprehensive: divine and human. He strove with Esau, with Laban, with the angel — and prevailed in each case. The verb yakhal ('prevail, be able, endure') does not mean 'defeated' but 'endured, held on, persisted.' Jacob prevails not by overpowering God but by refusing to let go. Victory through tenacity, not domination.
29. 'Why is it that you ask my name?' (lammah zeh tish'al lishmi) — the refusal to disclose his name is itself a revelation. In the ancient world, knowing someone's name conferred power over them. The mysterious wrestler will not be named, contained, or controlled. The same evasion occurs when Manoah asks the angel's name: 'Why do you ask my name? It is wonderful' (Judges 13:18). The unnamed one blesses Jacob, completing the encounter without surrendering his identity. The blessing is given but the giver remains beyond human grasp.
29. The verse's structure is chiasmic: Jacob asks refusal blessing. Jacob sought two things: a name and a blessing. He receives the blessing but not the name. Partial revelation is characteristic of divine encounters in Genesis — enough to transform, not enough to domesticate.
30. 'Peniel' (Penuel in some manuscripts) — peni ('face of') + El ('God'): 'Face of God.' The name crystallizes the chapter's dominant motif. Jacob has spent the entire passage dealing with faces — covering Esau's face with gifts (v. 20), facing the unknown in the dark, and now confronting the face of God. The place-name transforms geography into theology: this bend in the Jabbok is where a man saw God's face.
30. 'I have seen God face to face and my life has been preserved' (ra'iti Elohim panim el-panim vattinatsel nafshi) — the statement is a paradox. According to later theology, no one can see God's face and live (Exodus 33:20). Yet Jacob has seen and survived. The verb natsal ('be delivered, preserved, rescued') suggests that survival was not a given — it was a rescue. Jacob knows he brushed against something that should have destroyed him. He emerged alive but not unscathed: he carries a wound (the hip) and a new name. The encounter with God changes everything — identity, body, and the landscape itself.

- 31. 'The sun rose upon him' (vayyizrach-lo hashemesh) — the dawn that the wrestler fled now arrives as Jacob crosses into the new day. The rising sun marks both a new day and a new identity. The detail is beautiful and painful simultaneously: sunrise, the universal image of hope and beginning, falls on a man who is limping.
- 31. 'He was limping on his hip' (vehu tsole'a al-yerekho) — Jacob-now-Israel enters the promised land not striding triumphantly but limping. The wound is permanent, a bodily reminder that the blessing came through struggle, not ease. The limp is the mark of encounter — like a scar, it tells a story. Israel's relationship with God begins not in perfection but in brokenness. The patriarch of the nation walks wounded into his future.
- 32. 'The sinew of the hip' (gid hannahseh) — the sciatic nerve, running through the hip joint. This dietary prohibition is unique in that it originates not in Sinai legislation but in a patriarchal narrative. The practice connects every Israelite meal to Jacob's wrestling match: each time an animal is butchered and the sinew removed, the story of Peniel is remembered. Dietary practice becomes embodied narrative — you eat your theology.
- 32. 'To this day' (ad hayyom hazzeh) — the etiological formula connects past event to present practice. The narrator addresses an audience that observes this custom and explains its origin. Jacob's wound becomes Israel's diet. The personal becomes communal, the historical becomes perpetual. One night at the Jabbok shapes the eating habits of an entire people across millennia.
- 33. Note: In the Hebrew Bible (BHS/WLC), this verse is Genesis 33:1. The Hebrew text of Genesis 32 contains 33 verses (32:1-33), while English Bibles typically number this chapter with 32 verses, placing what is Hebrew 32:1 as English 31:55 and this verse as English 33:1. This rendering follows the Hebrew verse numbering throughout.
- 33. 'Jacob lifted up his eyes and looked, and there was Esau coming' (vayyissa Ya'aqov einav vayyar vehinne Esav ba) — the moment of confrontation arrives. Jacob, limping from the night's encounter, now sees the brother he has feared for twenty years. The 'four hundred men' (arba-me'ot ish) are still present — the military threat has not diminished. But Jacob is no longer the same man who sent the messengers. He has wrestled with God and survived; he faces Esau with a new name and a wounded hip. The division of children — placing each group with its mother — is both practical (organizing the procession) and protective (distributing risk). The narrative bridges directly into the reunion of chapter 33.

Summary: Jacob sees Esau approaching with 400 men and arranges his family in order of vulnerability. He bows seven times. Esau runs to embrace him, and they weep together. After introductions and a respectful exchange of gifts, the brothers part ways. Esau returns to Seir; Jacob travels to Succoth and then to Shechem, where he buys land and builds an altar called El-Elohe-Israel ('God, the God of Israel').

What Makes This Remarkable: Esau's embrace — running, falling on Jacob's neck, kissing, weeping (v. 4) — is among the most emotionally powerful moments in Genesis. Jacob's words 'seeing your face is like seeing the face of God' (v. 10) connect this reunion directly to the Peniel encounter of the previous chapter: both faces — divine and fraternal — evoke awe. The altar name El-Elohe-Israel (v. 20) is the first time Jacob uses his new name to make a theological claim: the God of the universe is the God of Israel.

Translation Friction: The Masoretic tradition places dots above the word vayyishshagehu ('and he kissed him,' v. 4), a scribal notation of uncertain meaning — some ancient interpreters read it as marking sincerity, others as suspicion. We rendered the verb straightforwardly and noted the scribal tradition. Jacob's gift is called both minchah ('tribute/offering,' v. 10) and berakhah ('blessing,' v. 11) — the same word Esau lost in chapter 27, now returned. This wordplay is central but difficult to reproduce.

Connections: The reunion resolves the conflict that began in chapter 27 and was promised in 33:4's embrace. Jacob's purchase of land at Shechem (33:19) parallels Abraham's purchase of Machpelah (23:16-18) — the second piece of the promised land acquired by a patriarch. Shechem will become the site of crisis in chapter 34 and of covenant renewal under Joshua (Joshua 24:1).

1Jacob lifted up his eyes and looked, and there was Esau coming — and four hundred men with him. He divided the children among Leah, Rachel, and the two female servants. 2He placed the female servants and their children first, then Leah and her children behind them, and Rachel and Joseph last. 3He himself passed ahead of them and bowed to the ground seven times, until he drew near to his brother. 4Esau ran to meet him, embraced him, fell upon his neck, and kissed him. And they wept. 5He lifted his eyes and saw the women and the children, and said, "Who are these with you?" He said, "The children whom God has graciously given your servant." 6Then the female servants drew near — they and their children — and bowed down. 7

Then Leah also drew near with her children, and they bowed down. Afterward Joseph and Rachel drew near and bowed down. ⁸He said, "What do you mean by all this company that I met?" He said, "To find favor in the eyes of my lord." ⁹Esau said, "I have plenty, my brother. Keep what is yours for yourself." ¹⁰Jacob said, "No, please — if I have found favor in your eyes, then take my gift from my hand. For I have seen your face as one sees the face of God, and you have received me favorably." ¹¹"Please, take my blessing that has been brought to you, for God has been gracious to me, and I have everything." He urged him, and he took it. ¹²He said, "Let us set out and travel, and I will go alongside you." ¹³He said to him, "My lord knows that the children are tender, and the flocks and herds are nursing. If they are driven hard for even one day, all the flocks will die." ¹⁴Please let my lord pass on ahead of his servant, and I will make my way slowly, at the pace of the livestock before me and at the pace of the children, until I come to my lord at Seir." ¹⁵Esau said, "Let me at least station some of my people with you." But he said, "Why should you? Let me only find favor in the eyes of my lord." ¹⁶That same day, Esau headed back toward Seir. ¹⁷But Jacob traveled to Succoth, and he built himself a house and made shelters for his livestock. Therefore the name of the place is called Succoth. ¹⁸Jacob came safely to the city of Shechem, which is in the land of Canaan, when he came from Paddan-aram, and he camped before the city. ¹⁹He bought the parcel of land where he had pitched his tent from the sons of Hamor, Shechem's father, for one hundred qesitahs. ²⁰He erected an altar there and called it El-Elohe-Israel — "God, the God of Israel."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Jacob lifted up his eyes' (vayyissa Ya'aqov einav) — the standard biblical idiom for deliberate perception. Jacob now sees what he has feared for twenty years. The four hundred men remain: the military threat has not diminished since 32:6. Jacob's division of children among their mothers is both organizational and strategic — distributing risk across the procession.
1. The arrangement places the most vulnerable (or most beloved) last. The order of placement — handmaids first, then Leah, then Rachel — reveals Jacob's heart even in crisis: he shields Rachel and Joseph behind everyone else (v. 2).
2. The procession order — handmaids first, Leah second, Rachel and Joseph last (acharonim) — is painfully transparent. The word acharonim ('last, behind') means farthest from danger. If Esau attacks, he strikes Bilhah and Zilpah first. Jacob's favoritism is embedded in his military formation: Rachel is the one he cannot afford to lose. The arrangement mirrors the earlier hierarchy of gifts (32:14-16), where the most valuable were sent last.
2. Joseph alone is named among the children, paired with his mother Rachel. The other children are grouped anonymously with their mothers. This narrative spotlight on Joseph foreshadows his centrality in the coming chapters.
3. 'He himself passed ahead of them' (vehu avar lifneihem) — Jacob, who placed his beloved Rachel last for safety, now walks to the front of the entire procession. The man who once hid behind his mother's scheme and sent servants ahead with gifts now leads with his own body. Whatever his faults, this is an act of courage: he faces Esau first, alone, limping from Peniel.
3. 'Bowed to the ground seven times' (vayyishtachu artsah sheva pe'amim) — prostration seven times is the protocol of a vassal approaching a sovereign, well attested in Amarna letters and ancient Near Eastern diplomacy. Jacob performs the full ritual of submission before his brother. The man who stole the firstborn's blessing now enacts the posture of a servant. Seven — the number of completeness — signals total deference. Isaac's blessing declared that Esau would serve Jacob (27:29); Jacob's body language says the opposite.
4. 'Esau ran' (vayyarots Esav) — the verb ruts ('run') is explosive after Jacob's slow, reverent approach. Jacob bowed seven times; Esau sprints. The contrast is stunning: the feared warrior with four hundred men behind him breaks into a run — not to attack, but to embrace. The same verb describes the father running to the prodigal son in Jesus's parable (Luke 15:20), which may deliberately echo this scene.
4. 'And kissed him' (vayyishshaqehu) — in the Masoretic text, each letter of this word has a dot above it (puncta extraordinaria). These extraordinary dots appear on only fifteen words in the entire Hebrew Bible. Their meaning is debated: some rabbis (Genesis Rabbah 78:9) read the dots as signaling that Esau's kiss was insincere — he actually wanted to bite (nashakh) Jacob's neck. Others, including Rabbi Shimon bar Yochai (surprisingly, given his general view of Esau), say the dots indicate that in this moment Esau's feelings were genuinely stirred. The textual ambiguity mirrors the narrative tension: we never fully know Esau's heart.
4. 'They wept' (vayyivku) — the weeping is mutual and undeniable. Whatever calculations preceded this moment, the tears dissolve them. Two brothers, separated for twenty years by stolen blessings and murderous rage, fall on each other's necks and cry. The verb is plural — both weep. Genesis does not sentimentalize, but it records the raw fact of reconciliation.
5. 'The children whom God has graciously given' (hayeladim asher-chanan Elohim et-avdekha) — the verb chanan ('to show grace, to give freely') is theologically loaded. Jacob attributes his family to divine generosity, not personal achievement. The same root gives us the name Yochanan/John ('the LORD is gracious') and the noun chen ('grace, favor'). Jacob continues his deferential address — 'your servant' (avdekha) — maintaining the vassal posture even in family introductions.

6. The procession now unfolds in the order Jacob arranged. The handmaids and their children approach first and prostrate themselves. The verb tishtachavein (feminine plural of the same root as Jacob's bowing in v. 3) extends the vassal protocol to the entire household. Each group performs submission before Esau, reinforcing the political dimension of this family reunion.
7. 'Joseph and Rachel' (Yosef veRachel) — the Hebrew text places Joseph before his mother, reversing the expected order. A child is named before the matriarch. This unusual placement has prompted much comment: perhaps the young Joseph stepped forward to shield Rachel, or perhaps the narrator is signaling Joseph's emerging prominence in the story. In the procession's hierarchy, Joseph and Rachel occupy the position of highest value — last and most protected.
7. The three-stage approach (handmaids, Leah, Rachel/Joseph) presents Jacob's entire household to Esau in descending order of expendability and ascending order of belovedness. The choreography lays bare the internal dynamics of the family.
8. 'All this company that I met' (kol hammachaneh hazzeh asher pagashti) — Esau is asking about the waves of livestock Jacob sent ahead (32:14-22). The word machaneh ('company, camp') is the same word used for the angelic camp at Mahanaim (32:2) and Jacob's divided camps (32:8). Livestock, angels, and families — all are machaneh in this narrative.
8. 'To find favor in the eyes of my lord' (limtso-chen be'einei adoni) — Jacob's response is minimal and deferential. The gifts have a single purpose: to secure Esau's goodwill. The word chen ('favor, grace') echoes the root chanan from v. 5. Jacob seeks from Esau what he attributes to God — gracious giving.
9. 'I have plenty' (yesh-li rav) — Esau's rav means 'much, plenty, abundance.' The word choice contrasts with Jacob's kol ('everything') in v. 11. Esau has 'much'; Jacob has 'all.' The distinction may be subtle or accidental, but interpreters have seen theological significance: contentment with abundance (Esau) versus completeness through divine provision (Jacob). Esau's generosity here is striking — the brother Jacob cheated refuses his gifts.
9. 'My brother' (achi) — after twenty years of estrangement, Esau calls Jacob 'my brother.' Jacob has been calling Esau 'my lord' (adoni); Esau addresses him as a peer. The single word dismantles the hierarchical language Jacob has carefully constructed. Esau does not want a servant; he wants a brother.
10. 'I have seen your face as one sees the face of God' (ra'iti fanekha kir'ot penei Elohim) — this extraordinary statement connects directly to Peniel ('face of God'), where Jacob said, 'I have seen God face to face' (32:30). The word panim ('face') saturates this narrative: Jacob saw God's face at Peniel; now he sees God's face in Esau's. The theological claim is remarkable — divine encounter and human reconciliation mirror each other. Forgiveness has the quality of theophany.
10. 'Take my gift' (velaqachta minchati) — the word minchah means 'gift, tribute, offering.' It is the same term used for the grain offering in Levitical worship. Jacob frames his livestock as a sacrificial offering to Esau. The word also echoes Abel's minchah (4:3-4) — the acceptable offering. Jacob is asking Esau to accept his offering as God accepted Abel's.
10. 'And you have received me favorably' (vattirtseini) — the verb ratsah means 'to accept, to be pleased with, to show favor.' In sacrificial terminology, it describes God's acceptance of an offering (Leviticus 1:4). Jacob uses liturgical language for a human encounter: Esau's acceptance is framed as divine acceptance.
11. 'Take my blessing' (qach-na et-birkhati) — the word berakhah ('blessing') is electrifying in context. Jacob stole Esau's blessing (27:35-36); now he returns 'my blessing' in the form of material gifts. The irony is layered: the blessing Jacob took by deception he now gives back through generosity. The word berakhah also means 'gift' in diplomatic contexts, but the primary meaning is inescapable. Jacob is performing restitution — returning the blessing, however symbolically.
11. 'God has been gracious to me' (channani Elohim) — the verb chanan ('to show grace') appears again (cf. v. 5). Jacob attributes everything to divine generosity. His 'everything' (kol) contrasts with Esau's 'plenty' (rav, v. 9). Esau has abundance; Jacob has completeness. The distinction may reflect different theologies of prosperity: sufficiency versus totality.
11. 'He urged him, and he took it' (vayyiftsar-bo vayyiqqach) — the verb patsar ('to urge, press, insist') indicates that Esau's acceptance required persuasion. Esau initially refused the gift (v. 9); Jacob presses until he relents. The taking of the blessing-gift completes the reconciliation arc: what was stolen is symbolically returned and accepted.
12. 'Let us set out and travel' (nis'ah venelekha) — Esau proposes joint travel, a cohortative ('let us') that envisions continued companionship. The verb nasa ('to pull up stakes, journey, set out') implies breaking camp and moving together as a caravan. Esau's offer is genuine: he wants to travel with his brother, not merely greet him and part.
12. 'I will go alongside you' (ve'elekha lenegdekha) — the preposition leneged can mean 'before, alongside, opposite.' Esau offers himself as escort or companion. The offer is generous but, as the next verses reveal, Jacob will decline it.
13. 'The children are tender' (hayeladim rakkim) — the adjective rak ('tender, soft, delicate') describes young children who cannot endure a forced march. Jacob's excuse is plausible: traveling at the pace of a military company with four hundred men would exhaust his household. But the excuse also serves to separate the brothers without direct refusal.
13. 'Nursing' (alot alai) — literally 'suckling upon me,' indicating ewes and cows still nursing their young. The livestock are at their most vulnerable. Jacob's concern for animal welfare is genuine — overlaid nursing animals will indeed die — but it also provides diplomatic cover for declining Esau's company.

14. 'I will make my way slowly' (etnahalah le'itti) — the hitpael of nahal means 'to lead oneself along, to proceed at ease,' and le'itti means 'at my slowness, gently.' Jacob proposes a leisurely pace tailored to his weakest members. The phrasing is courteous but evasive.
14. 'Until I come to my lord at Seir' (ad asher-avo el-adoni Se'irah) — Jacob promises to meet Esau in Seir. He never does. The text records no journey to Seir; instead Jacob goes to Succoth (v. 17) and then Shechem (v. 18). Whether this is a deliberate lie, a changed plan, or a promise fulfilled off-stage is one of the chapter's open questions. Many interpreters read it as calculated deception — Jacob has not entirely shed his old ways.
15. 'Let me station some of my people with you' (atsigah-na immekha min-ha'am asher itti) — Esau's second offer: if Jacob won't travel together, at least accept a military escort. The verb natsav/yatsag ('to station, place, set') has a military connotation — these would be posted guards or a protective detachment. Esau is generous to the end.
15. Jacob declines this too with the same deferential formula — 'Let me find favor in the eyes of my lord' — a polite refusal that essentially means 'your goodwill is enough; I need nothing more.' Jacob wants neither Esau's company nor his protection. The reconciliation is real but limited: Jacob will not embed himself in Esau's world.
16. Esau departs alone, returning to Seir. The brevity is striking — one verse for the end of a twenty-year estrangement. The brothers part ways, and the narrative follows Jacob, not Esau. Esau returns to his territory; Jacob goes in a different direction entirely (v. 17). The reconciliation is complete but not a reunion: the brothers forgive but do not merge households. They will meet again only to bury their father Isaac (35:29).
17. 'Jacob traveled to Succoth' (veYa'aqov nasa Sukkotah) — instead of heading to Seir as promised (v. 14), Jacob goes to Succoth, east of the Jordan in the Jordan Valley. The destination confirms that Jacob never intended to follow Esau. The disjunction between promise and action is noted without moral commentary — the narrator lets the reader judge.
17. 'Succoth' (sukkot) — literally 'booths, shelters, huts.' The place receives its name from the temporary shelters Jacob constructs for his livestock. The same word later designates the Festival of Booths/Tabernacles (Sukkot, Leviticus 23:34), when Israel dwells in temporary shelters to remember wilderness dependence. Here the word is purely practical — animal shelters — but the resonance with later liturgical practice enriches the name.
17. 'He built himself a house' (vayyiven lo bayit) — Jacob builds a permanent structure (bayit, 'house') while making only temporary shelters (sukkot) for his animals. The contrast may suggest a transitional period: Jacob is settling, however temporarily, before moving on to Shechem.
18. 'Came safely' (vayyavo... shalem) — the word shalem is ambiguous: it can be an adjective meaning 'safe, whole, complete' (i.e., 'Jacob arrived safely') or a proper noun, 'Shalem,' naming a town near Shechem. The KJV reads it as a place name; most modern translations read it as an adjective. This rendering follows the adjectival reading: Jacob arrived 'whole' — the same root as shalom ('peace'). After wrestling with God, confronting Esau, and separating from his brother, Jacob arrives shalem — intact, at peace, complete. The word fulfills God's promise to bring him back safely (28:15).
18. 'The city of Shechem' (ir Shekhem) — Shechem lies in the central hill country of Canaan, between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim. It will become a crucial site: the place of Dinah's violation (ch. 34), the location of covenant renewal under Joshua (Joshua 24), and eventually the capital of the northern kingdom. Jacob has returned to the Promised Land — the land of Canaan — for the first time since fleeing to Haran.
19. 'He bought the parcel of land' (vayyiqen et-chelqat hassadeh) — the verb qanah ('to buy, acquire') marks a formal land purchase. This is only the second recorded land purchase by a patriarch in Canaan, after Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah (ch. 23). Both purchases are significant: the patriarchs do not seize the land by force but buy it legally, establishing legitimate claim through commerce rather than conquest.
19. 'One hundred qesitahs' (me'ah qesitah) — the qesitah is an ancient unit of monetary value, possibly a weighed piece of metal. Its exact value is unknown; the term appears only here, in Joshua 24:32, and in Job 42:11. The rarity of the word suggests archaic currency, lending the transaction an air of deep antiquity.
19. 'The sons of Hamor, Shechem's father' (benei-Chamor avi Shekhem) — the introduction of Hamor and Shechem here is ominous in light of chapter 34. The land purchase establishes a relationship with the local Hivite clan that will end catastrophically.
20. 'El-Elohe-Israel' (El Elohei Yisra'el) — 'God, the God of Israel.' This is the first time the name 'Israel' appears in a worship context. Jacob, renamed Israel at Peniel (32:28), now builds an altar using his new name. The altar's name makes a theological declaration: the God he worships is not merely El (a generic divine title) but the God who is specifically identified with Israel — with Jacob's transformed identity. The altar is both a personal confession ('my God') and a national foundation ('the God of Israel').
20. The chapter ends with worship — a fitting conclusion to the journey that began with a vow at Bethel (28:20-22). Jacob promised that if God brought him back safely, 'the LORD shall be my God.' He has returned shalem ('whole'), and he erects an altar. The vow is being fulfilled, though the Bethel return will come later (ch. 35).
20. The altar name also distinguishes Jacob's God from the local Canaanite deities. In a city named after Shechem, whose father Hamor rules the area, Jacob plants a theological marker: this land belongs to the God of Israel. The claim will be contested violently in the very next chapter.

Summary: Shechem, son of Hamor, violates Dinah, Jacob's daughter, then claims to love her and requests her in marriage. Jacob's sons deceive the Shechemites, demanding circumcision as a condition of intermarriage. On the third day, while the men are in pain, Simeon and Levi massacre the city. Jacob rebukes them; they retort, 'Should he treat our sister like a prostitute?'

What Makes This Remarkable: The Hebrew piles four verbs onto Shechem's act: 'saw her, took her, lay with her, and violated her' (v. 2) — an escalating sequence from sight to violence. The phrase nevalah be-Yisrael ('an outrage in Israel,' v. 7) appears here before Israel is a nation, establishing a category of violation so severe it shocks the entire community. The sons' use of circumcision — the covenant sign — as a weapon of deception perverts its sacred meaning. Jacob's silence throughout most of the narrative (v. 5) contrasts sharply with his sons' fury.

Translation Friction: The verb innah ('violated/humiliated,' v. 2) encompasses forced sexual encounter and social degradation. English translations vary between 'defiled' and 'violated'; we used 'violated' for its directness. Shechem's emotional language — 'his soul clung to Dinah' and 'he spoke to the heart of the young woman' (v. 3) — uses vocabulary elsewhere associated with genuine love and tenderness, creating a moral complexity we preserved rather than resolved.

Connections: Jacob's condemnation of Simeon and Levi is repeated in his deathbed oracle (49:5-7), where their violence results in their scattering among the tribes. The phrase 'an outrage in Israel' recurs in Judges 19:23-24 and 2 Samuel 13:12 for sexual crimes of the gravest order. The misuse of circumcision here contrasts with its sacred institution in chapter 17.

¹Dinah, the daughter of Leah whom she had borne to Jacob, went out to see the daughters of the land. ²Shechem the son of Hamor the Hivite, the prince of the land, saw her, took her, lay with her, and violated her. ³His soul clung to Dinah the daughter of Jacob. He loved the young woman and spoke to the heart of the young woman. ⁴Shechem said to Hamor his father, "Get me this girl as a wife." ⁵Jacob heard that he had defiled Dinah his daughter, but his sons were with his livestock in the field. So Jacob held his peace until they came. ⁶Hamor the father of Shechem went out to Jacob to speak with him. ⁷The sons of Jacob came in from the field when they heard. The men were grieved and they burned with anger, for he had committed an outrage in Israel by lying with Jacob's daughter — a thing that ought not to be done. ⁸Hamor spoke with them, saying, "My son Shechem — his soul longs for your daughter. Please give her to him as a wife." ⁹"Intermarry with us: give your daughters to us and take our daughters for yourselves." ¹⁰"You shall dwell with us, and the land will be open before you. Settle, trade in it, and acquire property in it." ¹¹Shechem said to her father and to her brothers, "Let me find favor in your eyes, and whatever you say to me I will give." ¹²"Set the bride-price and gift as high as you wish, and I will give whatever you ask of me — only give me the young woman as a wife." ¹³The sons of Jacob answered Shechem and Hamor his father with deceit — they spoke thus because he had defiled Dinah their sister. ¹⁴They said to them, "We cannot do this thing — to give our sister to a man who has a foreskin, for that would be a disgrace to us." ¹⁵"Only on this condition will we agree with you: if you become like us, by circumcising every male among you." ¹⁶"Then we will give our daughters to you and take your daughters for ourselves, and we will dwell with you and become one people." ¹⁷"But if you will not listen to us and be circumcised, then we will take our daughter and go." ¹⁸Their words pleased Hamor and Shechem the son of Hamor. ¹⁹The young man did not delay in doing the thing, because he delighted in Jacob's daughter. And he was the most honored in all his father's house. ²⁰Hamor and Shechem his son came to the gate of their city and spoke to the men of their city, saying, ²¹"These men are peaceable toward us. Let them dwell in the land and trade in it, for the land is broad enough for them. Let us take their daughters as wives for ourselves, and let us give our daughters to them." ²²"Only on this condition will the men agree to dwell with us and become one people: that every male among us be circumcised, as they are circumcised." ²³"Will not their livestock and their property and all their animals become ours? Only let us agree with them, and they will dwell with us." ²⁴All who went out of the gate of his city listened to Hamor and Shechem his son, and every male was circumcised

— all who went out of the gate of his city. ²⁵On the third day, when they were in pain, two of the sons of Jacob — Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brothers — each took his sword and came against the unsuspecting city and killed every male. ²⁶They killed Hamor and Shechem his son with the edge of the sword, took Dinah from Shechem's house, and went out. ²⁷Jacob's sons looted the city where the dead lay, because their sister had been violated. ²⁸They took their flocks and their herds and their donkeys — what was in the city and what was in the field. ²⁹All their wealth, all their little ones, and their wives they took captive and plundered — everything that was in the houses. ³⁰Jacob said to Simeon and Levi, "You have brought trouble on me, making me odious to the inhabitants of the land — to the Canaanites and the Perizzites. I am few in number; if they gather against me and strike me, I will be destroyed — I and my household." ³¹They said, "Should he treat our sister like a prostitute?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Went out' (vattetse) — the verb yatsa ('to go out') introduces Dinah's independent action. She 'goes out' on her own initiative, an unusual act for a young woman in this narrative world. The verb itself carries no moral judgment — it simply describes movement from the family compound into the broader community. Later interpreters, however, debated whether this 'going out' implied impropriety. The text itself assigns no blame to Dinah.
1. 'The daughter of Leah whom she had borne to Jacob' — the double identification through both parents is unusual and may serve to emphasize Dinah's lineage. She is Leah's daughter specifically — this will matter when her full brothers (Simeon and Levi, also Leah's sons) take vengeance in vv. 25-26.
1. 'To see the daughters of the land' (lir'ot bivnot ha'arets) — Dinah's purpose is social: she seeks the company of local women. The phrase 'daughters of the land' echoes the patriarchal concern about intermarriage with Canaanite women (24:3; 27:46; 28:1). Dinah's visit is innocent, but it moves her into a space of cultural contact that the patriarchal narratives have repeatedly flagged as dangerous.
2. The verse uses four rapid verbs in sequence: 'saw' (vayyar), 'took' (vayyiqqach), 'lay with' (vayyishkav), 'violated' (vay'anneha). The staccato pace conveys the violence — there is no courtship, no negotiation, no consent. Shechem sees and acts. The chain of verbs mirrors the language used for the 'sons of God' in 6:2: 'they saw... they took' — a pattern of powerful males seizing women.
2. 'Violated her' (vay'anneha) — the verb 'innah (piel of 'anah) means 'to humiliate, oppress, afflict, violate.' It is used for rape in Deuteronomy 22:24, 29 and for the violation of Tamar by Amnon (2 Samuel 13:12, 14). The word carries connotations of degradation beyond the physical act — it denotes the imposition of shame and the destruction of social standing. The KJV's 'defiled' softens the Hebrew; 'violated' captures the force of the verb.
2. 'Prince of the land' (nesi ha'arets) — Shechem is not a commoner but the ruling prince. His status makes the act a political as well as personal violation. The most powerful man in the region has assaulted the daughter of the most prominent immigrant family.
3. 'His soul clung' (vattidbbaq nafsho) — the verb davaq ('to cling, cleave, attach') is the same verb used for the marriage bond in 2:24: 'a man shall cleave to his wife.' The word describes intense emotional attachment. Its use here creates a disturbing juxtaposition: the language of marital devotion follows immediately after the language of sexual violence. Shechem's desire is genuine but does not undo or excuse the violation.
3. 'He loved the young woman' (vayyehav et-hanna'arah) — the verb ahav ('to love') appears without irony. The narrative does not question the sincerity of Shechem's love; it does, however, present love as arriving after violence — an impossible sequence for genuine consent. Love that begins with 'he took her and violated her' is love built on a destroyed foundation.
3. 'Spoke to the heart of the young woman' (vaydabber al-lev hanna'arah) — the idiom dibber al-lev means 'to speak tenderly, to comfort, to reassure.' It is used when Boaz comforts Ruth (Ruth 2:13) and when God woos Israel back from apostasy (Hosea 2:14). Shechem attempts to console the woman he has just violated. The tender words cannot erase the brutal verbs of v. 2.
4. 'Get me this girl as a wife' (qach-li et-hayyaldah hazzot le'ishah) — the verb laqach ('to take, get') echoes v. 2 where Shechem 'took' Dinah. The same verb frames both the assault and the marriage request. Shechem's demand to his father is imperious — 'Get me' — the tone of a prince accustomed to having what he wants. He calls Dinah 'this girl' (hayyaldah), using a term that emphasizes her youth.
4. The request to formalize the relationship through marriage follows the ancient Near Eastern pattern where a rapist could marry his victim (cf. Deuteronomy 22:28-29). Shechem seeks legitimacy for a fait accompli. The narrative presents his desire for marriage without endorsing it as an adequate response to the violation.
5. 'He had defiled' (timme) — the verb tame ('to make unclean, defile') shifts the vocabulary from violence ('innah in v. 2) to ritual impurity. Dinah has been rendered ritually unclean, a status that affects her social and religious standing within the community. The defilement language adds a communal dimension to the personal violation.
5. 'Jacob held his peace' (vehecherish Ya'aqov) — the verb charash (hiphil: 'to be silent, hold one's peace') describes Jacob's inaction. He hears the news and does nothing — waits for his sons. Jacob's silence has been variously interpreted: as restraint, as paralysis, as passive complicity, as political calculation. The father who fought with God and faced Esau now falls silent when his daughter is violated. His passivity is one of the most troubling aspects of the chapter.

6. 'Hamor went out to Jacob' — Hamor initiates the diplomatic contact. The father of the perpetrator approaches the father of the victim. The verb 'went out' (vayyetse) echoes Dinah's 'going out' in v. 1, creating an ironic parallel: Dinah went out innocently and was violated; Hamor goes out diplomatically to legitimize the violation. The word ledabber ('to speak') is bland and transactional — as if what happened were a matter for negotiation rather than justice.
7. 'The men were grieved and they burned with anger' (vayyit'atsvu ha'anashim vayyichar lahem me'od) — two responses: grief (atsav, the same verb used for God's grief over human wickedness in 6:6) and burning anger (charah, 'to be hot, kindled'). The brothers' response contrasts sharply with Jacob's silence in v. 5. Where the father went mute, the brothers are inflamed.
7. 'He had committed an outrage in Israel' (nevalah asah veYisra'el) — this is the first occurrence of the formula nevalah beYisra'el, which becomes a standard expression for grievous sexual violations throughout the Hebrew Bible (Deuteronomy 22:21; Judges 19:23; 20:6, 10; 2 Samuel 13:12). The word nevalah denotes an act of gross moral violation — 'disgrace, outrage, folly' — something that ruptures the social order. Its use here is anachronistic in one sense: 'Israel' as a national entity does not yet exist. But the narrator employs the later formula to signal the severity of the act — this is a crime against the emerging community.
7. 'A thing that ought not to be done' (vekhen lo ye'aseh) — a declaration of absolute moral prohibition. The passive construction (lo ye'aseh, 'it shall not be done') frames the prohibition as objective and universal, not merely personal. This is not about Jacob's honor but about the moral order itself.
8. 'His soul longs' (chashqah nafsho) — the verb chashaq means 'to desire, long for, be attached to.' It is used positively elsewhere: God 'set his love' (chashaq) on Israel (Deuteronomy 7:7; 10:15). Hamor presents his son's desire as deep emotional attachment, omitting entirely the fact that Shechem has already raped the girl. The diplomatic language sanitizes the violence: 'longing' replaces assault, 'desire' replaces coercion. Hamor negotiates as though beginning a courtship that has, in fact, already ended in violation.
9. 'Intermarry with us' (vehitchatnu otanu) — the hitpa'el of chatan ('to become a son-in-law, to intermarry') proposes a comprehensive kinship alliance, not merely a single marriage. Hamor expands Shechem's individual request into a communal proposal: full intermarriage between the two peoples. The suggestion is precisely what the patriarchal narratives have consistently forbidden (cf. 24:3; 28:1). Hamor is proposing the dissolution of Jacob's family's distinctiveness — the very thing the covenant requires them to maintain.
10. 'The land will be open before you' (veha'arets tihyeh lifneikhem) — Hamor offers unrestricted access to the land: settlement, commerce, and property ownership. The offer is generous by any standard. But for the reader who knows the covenant promises, Hamor's offer is a theological trap — Israel is to inherit the land through divine promise, not through assimilation with its current inhabitants. The land is already promised to Jacob's descendants; to receive it as a gift from Hamor would redefine the terms of possession.
10. 'Acquire property' (hei'achezu vah) — the verb achaz means 'to seize, hold, possess.' The noun achuzzah ('possession, holding') is the standard term for land inheritance in Israel (cf. 47:11; Leviticus 25:10). Hamor unwittingly uses covenantal vocabulary to describe a commercial transaction.
11. 'Let me find favor in your eyes' (emtsa-chen be'eineikhem) — Shechem now addresses the family directly, using the same supplicatory language Jacob used with Esau (33:8, 10, 15). The rapist positions himself as a suitor seeking approval. The word chen ('favor, grace') is deeply ironic coming from the man who has already taken by force what he now seeks permission to have.
11. 'Whatever you say to me I will give' (va'asher tomru elai etten) — a blank check. Shechem offers unlimited compensation. This open-ended promise sets the stage for the brothers' deceptive demand in vv. 14-17. Shechem's desperation gives them leverage.
12. 'Bride-price and gift' (mohar umattan) — the mohar is the formal bride-price paid by the groom's family to the bride's family (cf. Exodus 22:16-17; 1 Samuel 18:25). The mattan is an additional gift or present. Together they constitute the full financial transaction of marriage. Shechem offers to pay any amount — the price is irrelevant; he wants legitimacy.
12. The entire negotiation scene is remarkable for what it omits: Dinah's voice. She is spoken about, bargained over, and traded — but she never speaks. The patriarchal world of the text treats her as the object of male transactions, whether violent (Shechem's assault) or commercial (the marriage negotiations). Her silence is the loudest element of the chapter.
13. 'With deceit' (bemirmah) — the narrator reveals the deception before it unfolds, ensuring the reader knows the brothers' true intentions. The word mirmah ('deceit, treachery, guile') is the same word used to describe Jacob's deception of Isaac: 'Your brother came with mirmah and took your blessing' (27:35). The father's defining sin reappears in the sons. Deceit runs in the family — though here it is deployed in response to genuine outrage rather than for personal gain.
13. 'Because he had defiled Dinah their sister' (asher timme et Dinah achotam) — the narrator provides the brothers' motive before their words. The clause functions as moral context: their deception, while wrong, is provoked by an atrocity. The text refuses to simplify: the brothers are both avengers of their sister and perpetrators of treachery.
14. 'A man who has a foreskin' (ish asher-lo orlah) — literally 'a man who has foreskin.' The brothers frame circumcision as a non-negotiable boundary marker. The demand weaponizes the covenant sign: circumcision, given as a mark of God's covenant with Abraham (ch. 17), is now deployed as a strategic trap. The brothers exploit sacred identity for military advantage.
14. 'A disgrace to us' (cherpah hi lanu) — the word cherpah means 'reproach, shame, disgrace.' The brothers claim that intermarriage with the uncircumcised would bring shame — a claim rooted in genuine covenantal conviction but made here in bad faith. The irony is devastating: they invoke covenant holiness to plan mass murder.

15. 'If you become like us' (im tiyu khamonu) — the condition demands cultural assimilation in the direction the brothers have no intention of reciprocating. The phrase 'like us' is deeply ironic: Hamor proposed that Jacob's family become like them (v. 10); the brothers reverse the demand. The condition sounds like an invitation to covenant membership but is actually a setup for slaughter.
15. 'Circumcising every male' (lehimmol lakhem kol-zakhar) — the demand for universal male circumcision echoes God's command to Abraham (17:10-14). The brothers require of the Shechemites exactly what God required of Abraham's household. The covenant sign is being used as a weapon — the most cynical appropriation of sacred practice in Genesis.
16. 'We will become one people' (vehayinu le'am echad) — the brothers dangle the prospect of full national merger. The word 'am ('people, nation') implies more than cohabitation — it envisions a fused identity. This is precisely the assimilation that later biblical law prohibits (Deuteronomy 7:1-4). The promise is hollow: the brothers have no intention of merging. They are constructing a lie of extraordinary scope — promising national unity while planning massacre.
17. 'We will take our daughter and go' (velaqachnu et-bittenu vehalakhnu) — the brothers present an ultimatum: circumcision or departure. The possessive 'our daughter' (bittenu) is significant — they do not say 'our sister' (achotenu) but 'our daughter,' perhaps speaking collectively as the family. The threat to leave establishes the condition's urgency: accept circumcision now or lose the alliance permanently. The entire speech (vv. 14-17) is a masterpiece of diplomatic duplicity — every word true in form, false in intent.
18. 'Their words pleased' (vayyitvu divreihem be'einei) — literally 'their words were good in the eyes of.' Hamor and Shechem accept the condition without suspicion. The irony is thick: the father and son whose 'taking' precipitated the crisis are now themselves 'taken in' by deceptive words. The deceived become the deceived. They hear the promise of intermarriage and alliance; they do not hear the death sentence hidden within it.
19. 'Did not delay' (velo echar hanna'ar) — Shechem acts immediately, driven by desire. The verb achar ('to delay, tarry') in the negative emphasizes his eagerness. The same urgency that characterized the assault (v. 2) now characterizes the compliance.
19. 'The most honored in all his father's house' (vehu nikhbad mikkol beit aviv) — the narrator notes Shechem's high social standing. The adjective nikhbad ('honored, respected') from the root kavod ('glory, honor, weight') indicates that Shechem was the most prominent member of his clan. His status explains why he could persuade the city (v. 20) and why the city's men would follow his lead in circumcision. His honor, however, did not prevent his crime.
20. 'The gate of their city' (sha'ar iram) — the city gate was the center of legal and commercial activity in ancient Near Eastern cities. Public business, legal disputes, and community decisions took place at the gate (cf. Ruth 4:1-11). Hamor and Shechem bring their proposal to the public assembly for communal ratification. The circumcision of all males requires collective consent, not merely a ruler's decree.
21. 'These men are peaceable' (ha'anashim ha'ellesh shelemim hem ittanu) — the adjective shelemim ('peaceable, complete, at peace') is from the same root as shalem in 33:18, where Jacob arrived 'safely' at Shechem. The word also connects to Shechem's city name and to the concept of shalom. The tragic irony is that these 'peaceable' men are planning mass murder. Hamor uses the language of peace to promote a covenant that will end in blood.
21. 'The land is broad enough' (veha'arets hinneh rachavat-yadayim lifneihem) — literally 'the land is wide of hands before them.' The idiom means there is ample room. Hamor's economic argument is pragmatic: there is no need for competition when resources are abundant. The appeal to self-interest will prove decisive in v. 23.
22. Hamor relays the brothers' condition faithfully. The repetition of 'one people' (le'am echad) from v. 16 shows that Hamor has accepted the brothers' terms at face value. He presents circumcision as a reasonable concession for the enormous benefit of alliance. The demand for universal male circumcision — every zakhar ('male') — is what transforms a surgical procedure into a military vulnerability: an entire city of men incapacitated simultaneously.
23. 'Will not their livestock and their property become ours?' (miqnehem veqinyanam vekhol-behemtam halo lanu hem) — Hamor and Shechem reveal their true pitch to the city: greed. The appeal to economic self-interest — 'everything they have will be ours' — is the decisive argument. The citizens of Shechem agree to circumcision not for love, not for alliance, but for profit. The irony is devastating: the Shechemites plan to absorb Jacob's wealth just as Jacob's sons plan to destroy Shechem's population. Both sides operate on acquisition; neither side is honest.
23. The rhetorical question expects an affirmative answer: 'Of course their wealth will be ours!' Hamor promises his citizens a windfall. The city's men undergo circumcision expecting enrichment; they receive annihilation.
24. 'All who went out of the gate of his city' (kol-yots'ei sha'ar iro) — the phrase denotes the adult male citizens, those who participate in public life at the city gate. The repetition of the phrase emphasizes totality: every single adult male submitted to circumcision. The compliance is unanimous, motivated by the economic argument of v. 23. The universality of the circumcision creates the universality of the vulnerability.
24. The verb vayyimmolu ('they were circumcised') is passive/reflexive — they circumcised themselves, acting upon their own bodies at the instigation of outsiders who intend their destruction. The city enacts its own incapacitation.
25. 'On the third day, when they were in pain' (vayyehi bayyom hashlishi bihyotam ko'avim) — the timing is calculated. The third day after circumcision is when pain and inflammation peak. The men of Shechem are at maximum physical vulnerability — feverish, swollen, unable to fight or flee. The brothers have weaponized the healing calendar.
25. 'Simeon and Levi, Dinah's brothers' (Shim'on veLevi achei Dinah) — the text specifies that these are Dinah's full brothers, all children of Leah (29:33-34; 30:21). The designation 'Dinah's brothers' rather than 'Jacob's sons' frames their action as sibling loyalty, not mere tribal violence. They avenge their sister specifically.

25. 'Came against the unsuspecting city' (vayyavo'u al-ha'ir betach) — the word betach means 'securely, confidently, unsuspectingly.' It describes the city's state of false security — they believed the alliance was genuine. Two men attack an entire city: the detail strains historical credibility but makes narrative sense. The entire male population is incapacitated; two armed men against a city of invalids is a feasible, if horrifying, military equation.
25. 'Killed every male' (vayahargu kol-zakhar) — the scope of the killing is total. Every male (zakhar) — the same word used for those circumcised in v. 24 — is put to the sword. The covenant sign that was meant to mark inclusion in Abraham's family instead marked the victims for death.
26. 'They killed Hamor and Shechem' — the named killings come after the general massacre, specifying the primary targets. Father and son — the diplomat and the rapist — die together by the sword.
26. 'Took Dinah from Shechem's house' (vayyiqchu et-Dinah mibbeit Shekhem) — this detail reveals that Dinah has been in Shechem's house throughout the negotiations. She was not returned after the assault; she has been held. The verb laqach ('to take') echoes its earlier uses: Shechem 'took' Dinah by force (v. 2); now her brothers 'take' her back. The same verb describes both the crime and the rescue.
26. 'And went out' (vayyetse'u) — the verb yatsa ('to go out') closes the circle opened in v. 1, where Dinah 'went out.' Dinah went out; violence entered. Her brothers go out; they bring her home. The verb frames the entire narrative.
27. 'The sons of Jacob' (benei Ya'aqov) — the subject broadens from Simeon and Levi (v. 25) to all of Jacob's sons. The killing was done by two; the plundering involves all. The distinction may indicate different levels of culpability, or it may reflect the practical reality that looting requires more hands than killing.
27. 'Plundered the city' (vayyavozu ha'ir) — the verb bazaz ('to plunder, spoil, loot') is standard military terminology for stripping a defeated city. The economic dimension transforms the act from vengeance into conquest. The brothers take not only their sister but everything of value.
27. 'Because they had defiled their sister' (asher timme'u achotam) — the plural 'they defiled' extends responsibility beyond Shechem to the entire city. The brothers' logic: the city that harbored and supported Shechem shares his guilt. This collective punishment will be debated by Jacob (v. 30) and by the brothers themselves (v. 31).
28. The inventory of plunder is thorough: flocks, herds, donkeys, urban property, and rural property. Nothing is left. The catalogue mirrors Hamor's promise to the Shechemites in v. 23: 'Will not their livestock and property become ours?' The irony is complete — the Shechemites agreed to circumcision expecting to absorb Jacob's wealth; instead, Jacob's sons absorb theirs. The economic predation runs both directions, but only one side survives to collect.
29. 'Their little ones and their wives they took captive' (et-kol-tappam ve'et-nesheihem shavu) — the verb shavah ('to take captive') indicates that women and children were seized as spoils of war. The men are dead; the women and children become captives. The brothers who avenged their sister's abduction now abduct an entire city's women and children. The moral symmetry is uncomfortable: the response to one woman's violation is the mass victimization of all women.
29. The scope of destruction escalates through these verses: v. 25 — killing of males; v. 26 — killing of leaders and rescue of Dinah; v. 27 — plundering the city; v. 28 — seizing livestock and goods; v. 29 — capturing women, children, and household possessions. The escalation transforms what began as a rescue operation into a total war of annihilation and appropriation.
30. 'You have brought trouble on me' (akhartem oti) — the verb akhar means 'to bring trouble, to disturb, to make turbid.' The same verb describes Achan's sin at Jericho: 'Why have you brought trouble on us?' (Joshua 7:25). Jacob frames the massacre not as a moral outrage but as a strategic liability. His rebuke is remarkably self-centered: the issue is not the slaughter of innocents but the danger to himself.
30. 'Making me odious' (lehav'isheni) — the hiphil of ba'ash means 'to make stink, to cause to be abhorred.' Jacob fears that his family's reputation has become toxic — they will be seen as dangerous and untrustworthy by surrounding peoples. The complaint is pragmatic, not ethical: Jacob does not say 'what you did was wrong' but 'what you did puts me at risk.'
30. 'I am few in number' (va'ani metei mispar) — literally 'men of number,' meaning a small, countable group. Jacob acknowledges his military weakness: his household cannot withstand a coalition of Canaanite peoples. The realism of his fear contrasts with the brothers' reckless boldness. Jacob's objection will be repeated, in stronger terms, on his deathbed (49:5-7), where he curses Simeon and Levi's anger and scatters their descendants.
31. 'Should he treat our sister like a prostitute?' (hakhezonah ya'aseh et-achotenu) — the chapter's final word belongs to the brothers, and it is a question with no recorded answer. The word zonah ('prostitute') reframes Shechem's offer to pay a bride-price (v. 12): paying for Dinah after raping her reduces marriage to prostitution. The brothers reject the commodification of their sister's body. Their moral logic is clear even if their methods are atrocious: no amount of money makes rape acceptable; marriage to the rapist is not justice but institutionalized degradation.
31. The question hangs unanswered in the text. Jacob does not respond. The narrator does not respond. God does not respond. The silence is the chapter's final, devastating statement. Genesis 34 refuses to resolve its own moral tensions: the rape is condemned, the vengeance is excessive, Jacob's passivity is damning, the brothers' question is valid. The reader is left to grapple with competing claims of justice, proportionality, family honor, and political survival.
31. The chapter's last word — achotenu ('our sister') — centers Dinah one final time. Whatever else this story is about — politics, deception, circumcision, massacre — it is about a sister. The brothers' fury, however misdirected and disproportionate, begins with a sibling's outrage at an unforgivable violation.

Summary: God sends Jacob back to Bethel. The household purges its foreign gods. At Bethel, God confirms Jacob's name as Israel and renews the Abrahamic promises. Rachel dies giving birth to Benjamin on the road to Bethlehem. Reuben sleeps with Bilhah, Jacob's concubine. The twelve sons are listed. Jacob reaches Isaac at Hebron; Isaac dies and is buried by Esau and Jacob together.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is a catalogue of endings and transitions. Rachel names her last son Ben-Oni ('son of my sorrow'), but Jacob renames him Benjamin ('son of the right hand,' v. 18) — father overrides mother, reframing grief as honor. Reuben's violation of Bilhah (v. 22) is reported in a single devastating sentence with no narratorial comment; Israel 'heard of it,' and the consequences will not surface until Jacob's deathbed (49:3-4). The burial of foreign gods under the oak at Shechem (v. 4) is a decisive act of religious purification.

Translation Friction: Rachel's dying word Ben-Oni (v. 18) embeds her suffering in the child's name. The father's renaming to Benjamin overrides the maternal voice — a dynamic we rendered without editorial comment, as the Hebrew presents it. The phrase vayyigva vayyeasef el-ammav ('he breathed his last and was gathered to his people,' v. 29) for Isaac's death implies continuation beyond death — the gathering is to a community of ancestors, not merely to a tomb.

Connections: The Bethel return fulfills Jacob's vow from 28:20-22. The list of twelve sons (35:23-26) becomes the template for the tribal structure of Israel. Rachel's burial on the road to Bethlehem (35:19) is recalled by Jeremiah (31:15) and Matthew (2:18). Isaac's burial by both sons (35:29) mirrors Abraham's burial by Isaac and Ishmael (25:9).

¹God said to Jacob, "Arise, go up to Bethel and dwell there. Make an altar there to the God who appeared to you when you fled from the face of Esau your brother." ²Jacob said to his household and to all who were with him, "Put away the foreign gods that are among you, purify yourselves, and change your garments." ³"Let us arise and go up to Bethel, and I will make there an altar to the God who answered me in the day of my distress and has been with me on the way that I have walked." ⁴They gave to Jacob all the foreign gods that were in their hands and the rings that were in their ears, and Jacob buried them under the oak that was near Shechem. ⁵They journeyed, and a terror from God fell upon the cities that were around them, so that they did not pursue the sons of Jacob. ⁶Jacob arrived at Luz — also known as Bethel — in the land of Canaan, along with everyone who accompanied him. ⁷He built an altar there and called the place El-Bethel, because there God had revealed himself to him when he fled from the face of his brother. ⁸Deborah, Rebekah's nurse, died and was buried below Bethel under the oak. He called its name Allon-Bacuth. ⁹God appeared to Jacob again after he came from Paddan-Aram and blessed him. ¹⁰God said to him, "Your name is Jacob. Your name shall no longer be called Jacob, but Israel shall be your name." So he called his name Israel. ¹¹God said to him, "I am El Shaddai. Be fruitful and multiply. A nation and an assembly of nations shall come from you, and kings shall come forth from your body." ¹²"The land that I gave to Abraham and to Isaac — to you I will give it, and to your offspring after you I will give the land." ¹³God went up from him at the place where he had spoken with him. ¹⁴Jacob set up a pillar at the place where God had spoken with him — a pillar of stone. He poured a drink offering on it and poured oil on it. ¹⁵Jacob called the name of the place where God had spoken with him Bethel. ¹⁶They journeyed from Bethel, and when there was still some distance to go before reaching Ephrath, Rachel went into labor and her labor was difficult. ¹⁷When her labor was at its hardest, the midwife said to her, "Do not be afraid, for this one also is a son for you." ¹⁸As her soul was departing — for she was dying — she called his name Ben-Oni. But his father called him Benjamin. ¹⁹Rachel died and was buried on the road to Ephrath — that is, Bethlehem. ²⁰Jacob set up a pillar over her grave. It is the pillar of Rachel's grave to this day. ²¹Israel journeyed on and pitched his tent beyond Migdal-Eder. ²²While Israel was dwelling in that land, Reuben went and lay with Bilhah, his father's concubine. And Israel heard of it. The sons of Jacob were twelve: ²³The sons of Leah: Reuben, Jacob's firstborn, Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun. ²⁴Rachel's sons were Joseph and Benjamin. ²⁵The sons of Bilhah, Rachel's female servant: Dan and Naphtali. ²⁶The sons of Zilpah, Leah's female servant: Gad and Asher. These are the sons of Jacob who were born to him in Paddan-Aram. ²⁷Jacob came to his father Isaac at Mamre, at Kiriath-Arba — that is, Hebron — where Abraham and Isaac had sojourned. ²⁸The days of Isaac were one hundred and eighty years. ²⁹Isaac breathed his last and died and was gathered to his people, old and full of days. His sons Esau and Jacob buried him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Arise, go up' (qum aleh) — two imperatives in rapid sequence. Qum ('arise') signals urgency and decisive action; aleh ('go up') reflects the higher elevation of Bethel relative to Shechem. The combination conveys a divine summons: God is moving Jacob away from Shechem after the violence of chapter 34. The verb aleh also carries theological overtones — one 'goes up' to holy places.
1. 'Bethel' (Beit-El, 'house of God') — God calls Jacob back to the place of his original theophany (28:10-22), where Jacob vowed that if God brought him safely home, the LORD would be his God. Decades have passed. The vow remains unfulfilled. God's command is simultaneously a rescue from Shechem and a call to fulfill long-deferred worship.
1. 'The God who appeared to you when you fled' — God identifies himself by the specific encounter at Bethel. The phrase 'when you fled from the face of Esau your brother' recalls Jacob's fear and vulnerability. The God who met the fugitive now summons the patriarch.
2. 'Foreign gods' (elohei hannekar) — the presence of foreign gods in Jacob's household is startling. These may include the teraphim Rachel stole from Laban (31:19), objects acquired from the Shechemites after the massacre (ch. 34), or idols carried by servants and concubines. Jacob's command reveals that syncretism had taken root in his own family — the very household of the covenant heir harbors pagan images.
2. 'Purify yourselves and change your garments' (vehittaharu vehachalifu simloteikhem) — Jacob prescribes a ritual of purification: inner cleansing ('purify yourselves') and outward transformation ('change your garments'). Changing garments symbolizes a change of identity and status. This is proto-liturgical preparation — before approaching God at Bethel, the household must undergo a separation from contamination. The pattern anticipates later priestly purification requirements.
3. 'The God who answered me in the day of my distress' (ha'El ha'oneh oti beyom tsarati) — Jacob defines God not by abstract attributes but by personal experience: God answered him when he was in trouble. The 'day of distress' encompasses his flight from Esau, his years under Laban, and perhaps the recent crisis at Shechem. Jacob's theology is biographical — God is known through what he has done.
3. 'Has been with me on the way that I have walked' (vayyehi immadi baderekh asher halakhti) — this echoes God's original promise at Bethel: 'I am with you and will keep you wherever you go' (28:15). Jacob now testifies to the fulfillment of that promise across decades of wandering. The 'way' (derekh) is both literal journey and metaphorical life-path.
4. 'The rings that were in their ears' (hannesamim asher be'ozneihem) — earrings in the ancient Near East were not merely decorative; they often served as amulets or bore images of deities. Their surrender alongside the foreign gods indicates their cultic significance. The household surrenders both the idols and their associated talismans.
4. 'Jacob buried them' (vayyitmon otam) — the verb taman means 'to hide, bury, conceal.' Jacob does not destroy the objects but buries them, rendering them inaccessible. The oak (elah) at Shechem may be the same tree mentioned in connection with Abraham's first altar in the land (12:6). There is irony in this location: Shechem, site of the recent violence, becomes the burial ground for false worship. Jacob leaves both the massacre and the idols behind as he departs for Bethel.
5. 'A terror from God' (chittat Elohim) — a supernatural dread that paralyzes potential enemies. After the massacre at Shechem, Jacob feared retaliation from neighboring peoples (34:30). Instead, God intervenes with a divinely imposed terror that prevents pursuit. The phrase chittat Elohim occurs also in 1 Samuel 14:15 and Job 6:4. This is not natural fear but a God-sent panic — the same kind of intervention that will later protect Israel in the wilderness (Exodus 23:27).
5. The verse answers Jacob's anxious complaint of 34:30 ('you have made me odious to the inhabitants of the land'). God provides protection precisely when Jacob's family is most vulnerable, as they travel in the open between Shechem and Bethel.
6. 'Luz, that is Bethel' — the narrator provides the older Canaanite name (Luz) alongside the name Jacob gave it (Bethel, 28:19). This editorial note anchors the site geographically for readers who may know it by either name. The identification pattern 'X, that is Y' appears frequently in Genesis to connect ancient place names with later designations.
7. 'El-Bethel' (El Beit-El, 'God of the house of God') — Jacob names the altar not simply Bethel but El-Bethel, emphasizing the deity who dwells at the site. The name shifts focus from the place to the God of the place.
7. 'God had revealed himself' (niglu elav ha'Elohim) — the verb niglu is the niph'al plural of galah ('to uncover, reveal'). The plural form with the singular subject 'God' (ha'Elohim) is grammatically unusual. Some scholars see this as reflecting the plural form of Elohim; others view it as a plural of majesty. The verb galah in the niph'al indicates divine self-disclosure — God actively chose to make himself known to the fleeing Jacob.
8. 'Deborah, Rebekah's nurse' (Devorah meineqet Rivqah) — Deborah appears without prior introduction in the Jacob narrative. She is last mentioned as accompanying the young Rebekah from Mesopotamia (24:59). Her presence in Jacob's household implies she joined him at some point — perhaps sent by Rebekah. That she is identified by her relationship to Rebekah (Jacob's mother) suggests Rebekah herself may already be dead, a death the narrative never records.

8. 'Allon-Bacuth' (Allon Bakhut, 'oak of weeping') — the name memorializes communal mourning. The weeping for a nurse seems disproportionate unless Deborah represents the last living link to Rebekah and the family left behind. Her death severs the last thread connecting Jacob to his mother, whom he never saw again after fleeing to Haran. The grief may be for Rebekah as much as for Deborah.
9. 'God appeared to Jacob again' (vayyera Elohim el-Ya'aqov od) — the word 'again' (od) links this theophany to the earlier appearance at Bethel (28:13-15). The same God, the same place, a different Jacob. The fugitive who slept on a stone has become a patriarch with twelve sons, vast wealth, and a new name. The return to Bethel completes a narrative arc spanning chapters 28-35.
9. 'After he came from Paddan-Aram' — this temporal notice may refer to the broader journey from Mesopotamia rather than to an immediate arrival, since Jacob has been in Canaan for some time (chapters 33-34). The phrase serves to frame the entire Paddan-Aram sojourn as background for this climactic theophany.
10. The name change from Jacob to Israel was first declared at Peniel by the mysterious wrestler (32:28). Here God formally confirms it. The repetition is not redundant — the nighttime struggle at the Jabbok yielded the name through contest; at Bethel, God ratifies it through blessing. The two scenes complement each other: Peniel was earned through striving, Bethel is bestowed through grace.
10. 'Your name is Jacob' — God begins by stating Jacob's current identity before declaring the new one. The contrast is deliberate: Ya'aqov ('heel-grabber, supplanter') gives way to Yisra'el ('he strives with God' or 'God strives'). The old name embodies human scheming; the new name embodies divine encounter.
11. 'El Shaddai' — God identifies himself by the name associated with the patriarchal covenant, the same title used with Abraham (17:1). The exact meaning of Shaddai remains debated: 'Almighty' (traditional), 'God of the mountain,' or 'the Sufficient One.' The rendering preserves the Hebrew title rather than translating it, since no single English word captures its range. The self-identification establishes continuity: the God who covenanted with Abraham now extends the same promises to Jacob/Israel.
11. 'Be fruitful and multiply' (pereh ureveh) — this command echoes the primordial blessing of creation (1:28) and the post-flood blessing to Noah (9:1). Its application to Jacob/Israel positions the covenant people within the creational mandate. The nation that will emerge is not a political accident but a fulfillment of the divine order embedded in creation itself.
11. 'Kings shall come forth from your body' (umelakhim mechalatsekha yetse'u) — the promise of royal descendants, first given to Abraham (17:6) and Sarah (17:16), is now transferred to Jacob. The word chalatsayim ('loins, body') emphasizes physical descent. This promise finds fulfillment in the Davidic monarchy and, in Christian reading, in the Messiah.
12. The land promise, first given to Abraham (12:7; 13:15; 15:18) and confirmed to Isaac (26:3), is now extended to Jacob. The threefold chain — Abraham, Isaac, Jacob — establishes the full patriarchal succession of the covenant. The emphatic repetition ('to you I will give it, and to your offspring after you I will give the land') stresses both the immediate and perpetual nature of the grant.
12. 'Your offspring after you' (ulezar'akha acharekha) — the promise extends beyond Jacob to all future generations. The word zera ('seed, offspring') is collective, encompassing all descendants.
13. 'God went up from him' (vayya'al me'alav Elohim) — the verb alah ('to go up, ascend') implies a visible departure, perhaps a vertical ascent. The language suggests a real, localized divine presence that arrived and now departs. This is not metaphorical communication but theophanic encounter — God was present in a manner that allowed for a visible departure. The same verb describes God's departure from Abraham in 17:22.
14. 'Pillar' (matstsevah) — a standing stone marker, as Jacob had erected after his first Bethel vision (28:18). This second pillar completes the symmetry: the first marked the initial vision, the second marks the confirmed covenant. Standing stones served as witnesses and memorials throughout the ancient Near East.
14. 'Drink offering' (nesekh) — this is the first mention of a drink offering (libation) in Scripture. The term will later become standard in Israelite sacrificial vocabulary (Numbers 15:5-10). Jacob's act is proto-liturgical: he pours out liquid (probably wine) as an offering to God. Combined with the oil (recalling 28:18), this constitutes a complete consecration of the sacred site.
14. 'Poured oil on it' (vayyitsoq aleha shamen) — oil anointing consecrates the pillar as sacred, setting it apart for God. Jacob did the same at his first visit to Bethel (28:18). The repetition of the act across decades signals faithfulness and fulfillment.
15. Jacob re-names the place Bethel, confirming the name he first gave it in 28:19. The repetition is not redundant: it ratifies the earlier naming and establishes Bethel as the definitive name for this sacred site. The place has now been consecrated twice — once by a fleeing young man, once by a returning patriarch. The vow of 28:20-22 has been fulfilled.
16. 'Some distance' (kivrat ha'arets) — the exact meaning of kivrah is uncertain. It appears only here and in 48:7 and 2 Kings 5:19. Most interpreters take it as a measure of distance, perhaps a few miles. The vagueness heightens the pathos: Rachel goes into labor on the open road, not yet at their destination, with no shelter at hand.
16. 'Her labor was difficult' (vatteqash belidtah) — the verb qashah means 'to be hard, difficult, severe.' Rachel's first pregnancy was marked by years of barrenness and desperate prayer (30:1, 22-24). Her second pregnancy ends in fatal complications. The woman who cried 'Give me sons or I die' (30:1) will indeed die in the act of giving birth.
17. 'Do not be afraid' (al-tir'i) — the midwife's words of comfort take on tragic irony: the news that should bring joy arrives as Rachel is dying. The phrase 'this one also' (gam-zeh) recalls Rachel's naming of Joseph: 'May the LORD add to me another son' (30:24). Her prayer is answered — she receives another son — but the cost is her life.

17. 'The midwife' (hameyalledet) — the presence of a midwife on the road suggests that Jacob's traveling household included women skilled in birthing. The midwife's role — encouraging the dying mother with news of a son — echoes the midwives of Exodus 1:15-21 who will later preserve Israelite sons.
18. 'As her soul was departing' (betse't nafshah) — the nephesh ('soul, life-breath') leaves the body at death. The phrase presents death as the departure of the animating life-force, a concept consistent with Genesis 2:7 where God breathes the neshamah (breath of life) into the first human. Rachel's nephesh goes out; her son's life begins. The juxtaposition is devastating.
18. 'Ben-Oni' — Rachel's dying name for her son. The meaning is debated: it can mean 'son of my sorrow' (oni from 'aven, meaning grief, trouble) or 'son of my vigor/strength' (oni from 'on, meaning vitality, vigor — as in 49:3 where Reuben is called 'the beginning of my strength'). If the latter, Rachel names her son with her last burst of strength. Both meanings may be operative: the child is born from sorrow and from the final expenditure of Rachel's vital force.
18. 'Benjamin' (Binyamin) — Jacob renames the child. Ben-yamin means 'son of the right hand,' with the right hand symbolizing strength, favor, and honor. Alternatively, yamin can mean 'south,' making the name 'son of the south' — reflecting his birth in the southern part of the land, unlike his brothers who were born in the north (Paddan-Aram). Jacob refuses to let the child carry a name of grief. He replaces sorrow with honor.
19. 'Rachel died' (vatamot Rachel) — the stark simplicity of the statement carries enormous weight. Rachel, the beloved wife for whom Jacob labored fourteen years, dies on the open road giving birth to her second son. She is not buried in the family tomb at Machpelah (ch. 23) but beside the road. The woman who was central to Jacob's story — his love, his labor, his longing — is laid to rest far from the ancestral burial ground.
19. 'Ephrath, that is Bethlehem' — the editorial note identifies the ancient name Ephrath with the later town of Bethlehem. Rachel's tomb on the road to Bethlehem becomes a landmark in Israelite memory. Jeremiah will invoke Rachel weeping at Ramah for her exiled children (Jeremiah 31:15), and Matthew applies this image to the slaughter of innocents (Matthew 2:18). Rachel's grave marks a site of perpetual mourning in Israel's consciousness.
20. 'Jacob set up a pillar' (vayyatstsef Ya'aqov matstsevah) — this is Jacob's third pillar at Bethel or its vicinity (28:18; 35:14; now 35:20). But unlike the previous two, which marked divine encounters, this one marks death. The pillar over Rachel's grave serves as a permanent memorial — the narrator confirms its endurance 'to this day' (ad hayyom), indicating the monument was still standing when this text was composed.
20. 'To this day' (ad hayyom) — an editorial marker indicating that the author writes at a later time when Rachel's tomb pillar remains a known landmark. This phrase appears throughout Genesis to bridge the patriarchal past and the narrator's present (e.g., 19:38; 22:14; 26:33; 32:32).
21. 'Israel journeyed' — the narrator uses the covenant name 'Israel' rather than 'Jacob,' perhaps signaling the patriarch's new identity in this phase of the story. The name shift often correlates with Jacob acting in his role as patriarch and covenant bearer.
21. 'Migdal-Eder' (Migdal Eder, 'tower of the flock') — a watchtower used by shepherds to guard their flocks, located between Bethlehem and Hebron. The name evokes the pastoral life of the patriarchs. Micah 4:8 will later use 'tower of the flock' as a title for Jerusalem/Zion. The brief geographical note transitions the narrative from Rachel's death to the next disturbing episode.
22. 'Reuben went and lay with Bilhah his father's concubine' (vayyishkav et-Bilhah pilegesh aviv) — this shocking act receives no narrative elaboration. In the ancient Near East, taking a father's concubine was an assertion of authority over the household — a political act as much as a sexual one (cf. Absalom with David's concubines, 2 Samuel 16:22). Reuben, as firstborn, may be claiming patriarchal authority. Alternatively, some scholars suggest he acts to prevent Bilhah (Rachel's handmaid) from replacing Rachel in Jacob's bed after Rachel's death, thus protecting his mother Leah's status.
22. 'And Israel heard of it' (vayyishma Yisra'el) — the sentence breaks off with devastating abruptness. In the Masoretic text, a paragraph break (setumah or petuchah) falls mid-verse after 'Israel heard.' The silence is deafening: no recorded response, no punishment, no confrontation. Jacob's silence may reflect paralysis, grief, or calculated restraint. He will address Reuben's act only on his deathbed (49:3-4), stripping him of the firstborn's preeminence.
22. The abrupt transition to 'the sons of Jacob were twelve' shifts from scandal to genealogical record, as if the narrator deliberately closes the door on the incident and moves to the official family register.
23. Leah's sons are listed first because Reuben is Jacob's firstborn (bekhor). The six sons of Leah constitute half the tribal heads of Israel. The list follows birth order. Despite Jacob's preference for Rachel, Leah's sons dominate the tribal structure — Judah will carry the royal line, Levi the priestly line.
24. Rachel bore only two sons, the fewest of any of Jacob's wives, yet her sons hold outsized narrative significance. Joseph will dominate Genesis 37-50; Benjamin will become the tribe of Israel's first king (Saul). The brevity of this entry — just two names — contrasts with the lengthy narrative devoted to Rachel's story.
25. Bilhah is identified as Rachel's shifchah ('female servant, handmaid'). Her sons Dan and Naphtali were born through the surrogate arrangement of 30:3-8. Though born to a servant, they are counted among Jacob's twelve sons without distinction in this official list.
26. 'These are the sons of Jacob who were born to him in Paddan-Aram' — the summary note is technically imprecise: Benjamin was born in Canaan, not in Paddan-Aram (v. 16-18). The statement likely refers to the preceding list as a group associated with the Paddan-Aram period, with Benjamin included by anticipation since his mother was a wife from that era. Alternatively, the phrase may apply only to the immediately preceding sons of Zilpah, or the narrator may use 'Paddan-Aram' loosely to mean 'during Jacob's sojourn abroad and return.'

26. The complete list of twelve sons — six from Leah, two from Rachel, two from Bilhah, two from Zilpah — establishes the tribal structure of Israel. The number twelve will become constitutive of Israel's identity as a people.
27. 'Mamre, Kiriath-Arba, that is Hebron' — three names for the same location, layering historical periods: Mamre (the Amorite ally of Abraham, 14:13), Kiriath-Arba (the older Canaanite name, 'city of four' or 'city of Arba'), and Hebron (the name that endured). The site is associated with Abraham's altar (13:18) and the cave of Machpelah (ch. 23).
27. 'Where Abraham and Isaac had sojourned' (asher gar sham) — the verb gur ('to sojourn, reside as a foreigner') reminds the reader that even in the promised land, the patriarchs remained resident aliens. Jacob now joins the chain of sojourners at the ancestral home.
28. Isaac's lifespan of 180 years places him between Abraham (175 years, 25:7) and Jacob (147 years, 47:28). The declining lifespans across generations continue the pattern established after the flood. Isaac's life receives the least narrative attention of the three patriarchs — he is often a passive figure — yet he lives the longest.
29. 'Breathed his last' (vayyigva) — the verb gava describes the expiration of breath, the final exhalation. It is used for Abraham's death (25:8) and will be used for Jacob's (49:33). The threefold death formula — 'breathed his last, died, and was gathered to his people' — is reserved for the patriarchs, investing their deaths with solemn dignity.
29. 'Old and full of days' (zaqen useva yamim) — the phrase echoes Abraham's death notice (25:8: 'old and full of years'). It signifies a life completed, not cut short — a death that comes at the right time after a full measure of living.
29. 'Esau and Jacob buried him' — the two brothers, long estranged, come together to bury their father, exactly as Ishmael and Isaac had together buried Abraham (25:9). The parallel is deliberate: in each generation, the excluded son and the chosen son unite in filial duty. The order 'Esau and Jacob' (not Jacob and Esau) may reflect Esau's status as the elder, or his geographic proximity to Hebron (he is in Seir, closer than wherever Jacob was). The burial scene suggests at least functional reconciliation — the brothers can share this sacred duty even if their paths will now diverge permanently.

Summary: The genealogy of Esau — that is, Edom — traces his wives, sons, and grandsons as they settle in the hill country of Seir. The chapter lists Esau's tribal chiefs, the original Horite inhabitants of Seir, and the kings who ruled Edom before any king reigned in Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: This genealogy demonstrates that God's blessing on Esau was real: he becomes a nation with chiefs and kings (fulfilling 25:23 and 27:39-40). The note that Edom had kings 'before any king reigned over the sons of Israel' (v. 31) is one of the most debated chronological markers in Genesis — it presupposes the existence of Israelite monarchy. The separation of Esau from Jacob because their possessions were 'too great to dwell together' (v. 7) echoes the Abram-Lot separation (13:6), showing the same pattern of blessing producing overflow.

Translation Friction: The sheer density of names in this chapter challenges readability. We rendered each name according to its Hebrew form without attempting to modernize or simplify. The title alluph ('chief,' used throughout) denotes a tribal leader — from the root eleph ('thousand' or 'clan') — and we rendered it consistently as 'chief' while noting its range.

Connections: The Amalekites, Israel's persistent enemy (Exodus 17:8-16; 1 Samuel 15), are traced here to Eliphaz through a concubine (36:12). Edom's territory in Seir figures prominently in Numbers 20:14-21, where Israel requests passage. The list of Edomite kings (36:31-39) provides a political framework for the region Israel will interact with from the exodus onward.

¹These are the generations of Esau — that is, Edom. ²Esau married Canaanite women: Adah, whose father was Elon the Hittite, and Oholibamah, daughter of Anah and granddaughter of Zibeon the Hivite, ³and Basemath the daughter of Ishmael, sister of Nebaioth. ⁴Adah bore Eliphaz to Esau, and Basemath bore Reuel. ⁵Oholibamah bore Jeush, Jaalam, and Korah. These are the sons of Esau who were born to him in the land of Canaan. ⁶Esau took his wives, his sons, his daughters, all the persons of his household, his livestock, all his animals, and all the property he had acquired in the land of Canaan, and went to a land away from his brother Jacob. ⁷For their possessions were too great for them to dwell together, and the land of their sojourning could not support them because of their livestock. ⁸So Esau settled in the hill country of Seir. Esau — he is Edom. ⁹These are the generations of Esau, the father of Edom, in the hill country of Seir. ¹⁰These are the names of Esau's sons: Eliphaz the son of Adah, Esau's wife; Reuel the son of Basemath, Esau's wife. ¹¹Eliphaz's sons were Teman, Omar, Zepho, Gatam, and Kenaz. ¹²Timna was a concubine of Eliphaz, Esau's son, and she bore Amalek to Eliphaz. These are the sons of Adah, Esau's wife. ¹³Reuel's sons were Nahath, Zerah, Shammah, and Mizzah — the grandsons of Esau through his wife Basemath. ¹⁴These were the sons of Oholibamah the daughter of Anah, the granddaughter of Zibeon, Esau's wife: she bore to Esau Jeush, Jaalam, and Korah. ¹⁵These are the chiefs of the sons of Esau. The sons of Eliphaz, Esau's firstborn: chief Teman, chief Omar, chief Zepho, chief Kenaz, ¹⁶chief Korah, chief Gatam, chief Amalek. These are the chiefs of Eliphaz in the land of Edom; these are the sons of Adah. ¹⁷These are the sons of Reuel, Esau's son: chief Nahath, chief Zerah, chief Shammah, chief Mizzah. These are the chiefs of Reuel in the land of Edom; these are the sons of Basemath, Esau's wife. ¹⁸These are the sons of Oholibamah, Esau's wife: chief Jeush, chief Jaalam, chief Korah. These are the chiefs from Oholibamah the daughter of Anah, Esau's wife. ¹⁹These are the sons of Esau — that is, Edom — and these are their chiefs. ²⁰These are the sons of Seir the Horite, the inhabitants of the land: Lotan, Shobal, Zibeon, and Anah, ²¹Dishon, Ezer, and Dishan. These are the chiefs of the Horites, the sons of Seir, in the land of Edom. ²²The sons of Lotan were Hori and Hemam, and Lotan's sister was Timna. ²³These are the sons of Shobal: Alvan, Manahath, Ebal, Shepho, and Onam. ²⁴These are the sons of Zibeon: Aiah and Anah. This is the Anah who found the hot springs in the wilderness while he was pasturing the donkeys of his father Zibeon. ²⁵These are the children of Anah: Dishon and Oholibamah the daughter of Anah. ²⁶These are the sons of Dishan: Hemdan, Eshban, Ithran, and Cheran. ²⁷These are the sons of Ezer: Bilhan, Zaavan, and Akan. ²⁸These are the sons of Dishan: Uz and Aran. ²⁹These are the chiefs of the Horites: chief Lotan, chief Shobal, chief Zibeon, chief Anah, ³⁰chief Dishon, chief Ezer, chief Dishan. These are the chiefs of the Horites, chief by chief, in the land of Seir. ³¹These are the kings who reigned in the land of Edom before any king reigned over the children of Israel. ³²Bela son of Beor ruled as king in Edom; his capital city was Dinhabah. ³³Bela died, and Jobab the son of Zerah from Bozrah reigned in his place. ³⁴Jobab died, and Husham from the land of the Temanites reigned in his place. ³⁵Husham died, and Hadad the son of Bedad, who defeated Midian in the territory of Moab, reigned in his place. The name of his city was Avith. ³⁶Hadad died, and Samlah from Masrekah reigned in his place. ³⁷Samlah died, and Shaul from Rehoboth-on-the-River reigned in his place. ³⁸Shaul died, and Baal-Hanan the son of Achbor reigned in his place. ³⁹After Baal-Hanan son of Achbor died, Hadar succeeded him as king. His capital was Pau. His wife was Mehetabel, daughter of Matred and granddaughter of Me-Zahab. ⁴⁰These are the names of the chiefs of Esau, according to their clans, their territories, and their names: chief Timna, chief Alvah, chief Jetheth, ⁴¹chief Oholibamah, chief Elah, chief Pinon, ⁴²chief Kenaz, chief Teman, chief Mibzar, ⁴³chief Magdiel, chief Iram. These are the chiefs of Edom according to their settlements in the land of their possession. He is Esau, the father of Edom.

1. 'These are the generations' (elleh toledot) — the toledot formula structures the book of Genesis (2:4; 5:1; 6:9; 10:1; 11:10, 27; 25:12, 19; 36:1, 9; 37:2). Its use here for Esau's line grants the non-chosen brother a full genealogical record, paralleling the toledot of Ishmael (25:12-18). Genesis honors the unchosen lines with careful documentation before returning to the covenant lineage.
1. 'Esau, that is Edom' (Esav hu Edom) — the identification formula links the individual patriarch to the nation that bears his name. Edom will become Israel's persistent neighbor, rival, and sometime enemy. The equation 'Esau is Edom' will be repeated emphatically throughout this chapter (vv. 1, 8, 19, 43), as if the narrator insists the reader never forget this connection.
2. The names of Esau's wives here differ from those given in 26:34 and 28:9 (Judith daughter of Beeri the Hittite, Basemath daughter of Elon the Hittite, Mahalath daughter of Ishmael). The discrepancy is one of the most discussed difficulties in Genesis. Possible explanations include: (1) the women had multiple names; (2) different sources preserved different traditions; (3) 'daughter' (bat) can mean 'granddaughter' or 'descendant,' creating confusion across generations. The rendering follows the names as given in chapter 36, which provides the definitive genealogical account.
2. 'Oholibamah' (Oholivamah, 'tent of the high place') — a name with cultic overtones, suggesting a sacred tent or elevated worship site. The name may reflect Horite/Hivite religious traditions.
3. 'Basemath the daughter of Ishmael' — in 28:9 she is called 'Mahalath the daughter of Ishmael.' The identification 'sister of Nebaioth' anchors her within the Ishmaelite genealogy (25:13). Esau's marriage to Ishmael's daughter represents a strategic alliance between two excluded sons — Esau (passed over for Jacob) and Ishmael (passed over for Isaac). The Ishmaelite connection links Edom to the broader network of Abraham's non-covenant descendants.

4. 'Eliphaz' — possibly meaning 'my God is fine gold.' An Eliphaz from Teman (Eliphaz's son, v. 11) appears as one of Job's friends (Job 2:11), connecting the wisdom tradition to Edomite territory.
4. 'Reuel' (Re'u'el, 'friend of God') — this name also appears as an alternate name for Moses' father-in-law Jethro (Exodus 2:18), linking Midianite and Edomite genealogies.
5. 'Born to him in the land of Canaan' — this geographic note is significant: Esau's sons were born in the promised land before Esau relocated to Seir. The detail establishes that Esau had a legitimate claim to Canaan by residence and birth, which he voluntarily relinquished (vv. 6-8). His departure from Canaan parallels Lot's departure from Abraham (13:11-12) — in both cases, the non-chosen relative moves away, leaving the land to the covenant heir.
6. 'Went to a land away from his brother Jacob' (vayyehlekh el-erets mippenei Ya'aqov achiv) — the phrase mippenei ('from the face of, away from') echoes the language of separation used for Lot and Abraham (13:11). Esau's departure is presented as voluntary and practical rather than hostile. The comprehensive list of what he takes — wives, sons, daughters, household members, livestock, animals, property — emphasizes the totality of the move. Esau leaves nothing behind in Canaan.
6. The narrator presents Esau's relocation without moral judgment. Unlike the expulsion of Hagar or the flight of Lot, Esau moves by his own decision for practical reasons. The land cannot support two wealthy herdsmen — the same dynamic that separated Abraham and Lot.
7. The language closely parallels 13:6, where the land could not support both Abraham and Lot. The repetition of this pattern — prosperity leading to separation — underscores a recurring theme in Genesis: divine blessing brings abundance, but abundance creates practical pressure for the non-covenant line to relocate. In both cases, the one who departs receives territory outside the promised land.
7. 'The land of their sojourning' (erets megureihem) — the word megurim ('sojourning, temporary residence') reinforces the patriarchal status as resident aliens. Neither Esau nor Jacob owns the land; they are both sojourners in territory belonging to others.
8. 'Esau — he is Edom' (Esav hu Edom) — the emphatic identification formula appears again (cf. v. 1). The repetition drives home the equation between the individual and the nation. Seir, the rugged mountainous region southeast of the Dead Sea, becomes Edom's permanent homeland. The identification of Esau with Edom and with Seir is fundamental to biblical geography and later prophetic literature (Obadiah, Malachi 1:2-5).
9. A second toledot heading opens a new section of the genealogy, now focused specifically on the descendants who settled in Seir. The first toledot (v. 1) covered Esau's immediate family in Canaan; this second heading introduces the expanded genealogy in their new homeland. The double toledot is unique in Genesis and reflects the chapter's comprehensive scope.
10. The genealogy traces descent through named wives, a pattern that elevates the mothers' identity within the record. Each wife's contribution to the lineage is carefully documented — a practice consistent with the broader Genesis attention to maternal lines (Sarah, Rebekah, Leah, Rachel).
11. 'Teman' — a name meaning 'south' or 'right hand.' Teman became a significant Edomite region known for wisdom (Jeremiah 49:7; Obadiah 9). Eliphaz the Temanite in the book of Job (Job 2:11) is traditionally associated with this lineage, linking Edomite wisdom to this genealogy.
11. 'Kenaz' — the ancestor of the Kenizzites, who later became associated with Israel. Caleb is called a 'Kenizzite' (Numbers 32:12; Joshua 14:6, 14), and Othniel son of Kenaz was Israel's first judge (Judges 3:9). This suggests absorption of some Edomite clans into Israel.
12. 'Amalek' — the ancestor of the Amalekites, who will become Israel's archetypal enemy. The Amalekites attacked Israel at Rephidim immediately after the Exodus (Exodus 17:8-16), prompting the declaration of perpetual war: 'The LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation.' Saul's failure to destroy Amalek cost him his kingship (1 Samuel 15). That Amalek descends from Esau through a concubine connects Israel's most persistent enemy to the patriarchal family itself.
12. 'Timna was a concubine' — Timna's lower status as concubine (pilegish) rather than wife may explain Amalek's marginal position within Esau's line. The Talmud (Sanhedrin 99b) offers a remarkable tradition: Timna wanted to convert and join the patriarchal family but was rejected, so she became Eliphaz's concubine, and her descendant Amalek punished Israel for the rejection.
13. 'Zerah' — a name meaning 'rising, dawning' (from zarach, 'to rise, shine'). The name appears elsewhere in Israelite genealogies (the Zerahites of Judah, Numbers 26:20), suggesting some overlap or parallel naming between Edomite and Israelite clans.
14. Oholibamah's sons are listed again (cf. v. 5), now in the context of the Seir genealogy. The repetition serves the structure of the chapter, which moves from family in Canaan (vv. 1-8) to expanded genealogy in Seir (vv. 9-14). The term 'daughter' (bat) for Oholibamah's relationship to Zibeon likely means 'granddaughter,' since Anah is Zibeon's son (v. 24).
15. 'Chiefs' (allufim) — the Hebrew aluf (plural allufim) denotes a clan leader or chieftain. The KJV renders this as 'duke,' following the Vulgate's dux. The term is distinctive to Edomite political organization in Genesis 36 and appears to describe tribal leaders ruling without centralized monarchy — at least until the king-list of vv. 31-39. The rendering 'chief' captures the tribal leadership role more accurately than the feudal connotations of 'duke.'
16. The inclusion of Amalek among the chiefs of Eliphaz is notable: Amalek, born to a concubine (v. 12), nevertheless attains chieftain status. The list traces both legitimate and concubine-born sons as chiefs, suggesting that in Edomite society, a concubine's son could achieve full political standing.
17. Reuel's four sons each become chiefs, giving Basemath's line four clan-chieftainships in Edom. The systematic structure — sons listed, then titled as chiefs — reveals an organized tribal society with clear lines of authority traced through the founding wives.

18. Oholibamah's three sons all become chiefs, completing the roster of Esau's chieftains. Between his three wives, Esau produces chiefs who govern the land of Edom — a political structure that precedes and parallels the twelve-tribe structure of Israel.
19. The summary formula repeats the identification 'he is Edom' for the third time (cf. vv. 1, 8). This verse closes the section on Esau's direct descendants and their chieftainships, transitioning to the pre-existing inhabitants of Seir in the next section.
20. 'Seir the Horite' (Se'ir haChori) — the Horites (Chorim) were the pre-Edomite inhabitants of the region. The name Chori may derive from chor ('cave'), suggesting cave-dwellers, or from Hurrian, an ethnic designation for the Hurrian people known from ancient Near Eastern texts. Deuteronomy 2:12 states that the descendants of Esau dispossessed the Horites, just as Israel would later dispossess the Canaanites. The inclusion of the Horite genealogy shows the population that Esau's descendants absorbed or displaced.
21. Seven Horite sons of Seir are listed (vv. 20-21), each designated a 'chief' (aluf). The Horite clan structure mirrors the Edomite structure — both peoples organize around chieftains rather than kings. That Horite chiefs are recorded alongside Edomite chiefs suggests a period of coexistence or gradual absorption before the Edomite dominance described in Deuteronomy 2:12.
22. 'Lotan's sister was Timna' — this Timna is likely the same concubine of Eliphaz mentioned in v. 12 who bore Amalek. If so, the Horite-Edomite connection runs through intermarriage: a Horite woman becomes concubine to Esau's firstborn son. The genealogical note explains how Amalek, though of Edomite patrilineal descent, also carries Horite blood.
23. Shobal's five sons expand the Horite genealogy. Some of these names appear as place names in later biblical geography (Manahath in Judah, 1 Chronicles 8:6), suggesting that Horite clans were absorbed into Israelite territory as well as Edomite.
24. 'Found the hot springs' (matsa et-hayyemim) — the word yemim is one of the most debated terms in Genesis. The KJV renders 'mules,' following the Vulgate (mulos), based on a possible connection to a rare word for hybrid animals. However, most modern scholars and ancient versions (including some Targumim and the Septuagint's reading of hydōr, 'water') understand yemim as 'hot springs' — warm mineral springs in the desert. The Seir region does contain thermal springs. The rendering follows the 'hot springs' interpretation as more geographically plausible and linguistically defensible.
24. The detail about Anah's discovery while pasturing donkeys suggests that this was a notable event preserved in local tradition — finding water in the wilderness would have been significant for a pastoral people.
25. Oholibamah is identified here as Anah's daughter, confirming her as the same woman who became Esau's wife (v. 2). Through this marriage, Esau allied himself with the indigenous Horite population of Seir — a union that facilitated his settlement in the region.
26. The Horite genealogy continues with systematic thoroughness. The parallel account in 1 Chronicles 1:41 reads 'Hamran' instead of 'Hemdan,' a minor textual variation common in genealogical lists transmitted across centuries.
27. 'Akan' — called 'Jaakan' in 1 Chronicles 1:42. The 'Bene-Jaakan' (sons of Jaakan) appear as a wilderness station in Israel's journeys (Deuteronomy 10:6; Numbers 33:31-32), placing this Horite clan name on the map of the Exodus itinerary.
28. 'Uz' (Uts) — the same name as the land where Job lived (Job 1:1: 'the land of Uz'). Whether this Horite Uz is connected to Job's homeland is debated, but the association reinforces the link between the Seir/Edom region and the wisdom tradition represented in the book of Job.
29. The Horite chiefs are now listed formally by title, paralleling the Edomite chiefs of vv. 15-19. The parallel structure implies political parity between the two populations during the period of coexistence, before Edomite dominance.
30. 'Chief by chief' (le'allufeiheim) — the phrase emphasizes the enumeration of each chief individually, cataloging the complete political structure of Horite Seir. The concluding formula closes the Horite genealogy and transitions to the Edomite king-list.
31. 'Before any king reigned over the children of Israel' (lifnei melokh-melekh livnei Yisra'el) — this is one of the most discussed phrases in Genesis. It presupposes knowledge of the Israelite monarchy, which did not begin until Saul (c. 1020 BC). Source-critical scholars view this as evidence of late editorial composition or insertion. Traditional interpreters note that Genesis 17:6 and 35:11 already promised that kings would come from the patriarchs, so the narrator could anticipate monarchy without having witnessed it. Others point to Deuteronomy 17:14-15, where Moses legislates for a future king. Regardless of when the note was written, its literary function is to establish Edom as politically precocious — organized under kings before Israel — which adds irony to the oracle of 25:23: 'the older shall serve the younger.'
31. The king-list that follows (vv. 32-39) is notable for the absence of dynastic succession: no king is succeeded by his son. Each new king comes from a different city and family, suggesting an elective or charismatic model of kingship rather than hereditary monarchy.
32. 'Bela the son of Beor' — the name 'Beor' is identical to the father of Balaam (Numbers 22:5), prompting some ancient interpreters to identify this Edomite king with Balaam himself or his relative. The connection is uncertain but intriguing — both Edom and Moab (Balaam's employer) are Transjordanian neighbors of Israel.
32. Each king in the list is identified by his father's name and his capital city, but never by any relationship to the preceding king. This non-dynastic pattern is unlike the later Israelite or Judahite monarchies and resembles the 'judge' model of charismatic, non-hereditary leadership.
33. 'Jobab' — some ancient traditions (LXX appendix to Job) identify Jobab with Job, but this is uncertain. 'Bozrah' (Botsrah) was a major Edomite city, later the subject of prophetic judgment (Isaiah 34:6; 63:1; Jeremiah 49:13, 22; Amos 1:12). The 'died and reigned in his place' formula repeats through vv. 33-39, creating a rhythmic chronicle of royal succession.

34. 'The land of the Temanites' (erets haTeimani) — Teman, a region in Edom named after Esau's grandson (v. 11), was renowned for its wisdom (Jeremiah 49:7). Husham's origin from Temanite territory places him within the heartland of Edomite culture.
35. 'Who defeated Midian in the territory of Moab' (hammakkeh et-Midyan bisdeh Mo'av) — this is the only entry in the king-list that includes a military exploit. Hadad is remembered for a specific victory: defeating Midianite forces in Moabite territory. This suggests a period when Edom projected military power across the Transjordanian region. The detail also reveals that Edom, Midian, and Moab — all related peoples in the biblical genealogy — engaged in inter-regional conflict.
35. 'Hadad' — a theophoric name incorporating the storm god Hadad, widely worshipped across the ancient Near East. The name appears again in v. 39 and in later Edomite history (1 Kings 11:14-22). Its use suggests Edomite participation in broader Semitic religious culture.
36. 'Masrekah' — possibly related to soreq ('choice vine'), suggesting a vineyard region. The location has not been securely identified but may lie in the northern Edomite territory.
37. 'Shaul' (Sha'ul) — the same name as Israel's first king (Saul). The name means 'asked for, requested.' Its appearance in the Edomite king-list is coincidental but striking in light of v. 31's note about kings reigning in Edom before Israel had a king.
37. 'Rehoboth-on-the-River' (Rechovot haNahar) — 'Rehoboth' means 'wide places, open spaces' (cf. 26:22). The 'River' (nahar) likely refers to the Euphrates in most biblical usage, but here it may indicate a significant wadi in Edomite territory.
38. 'Baal-Hanan' (Ba'al Chanan, 'Baal is gracious') — a theophoric name incorporating the Canaanite deity Baal. The name testifies to the religious environment of Edom, where Baal worship was present alongside other traditions. The name's structure parallels Israelite theophoric names using YHWH (e.g., Yochanan, 'YHWH is gracious').
39. 'Hadar' — in 1 Chronicles 1:50, the name is given as 'Hadad,' which may be the original form (a common Edomite royal name). The absence of the death formula for Hadar suggests he may have been the reigning king at the time the list was compiled.
39. 'Mehetabel the daughter of Matred, the daughter of Me-Zahab' — uniquely among the Edomite kings, Hadar's wife is named and her maternal lineage traced through two generations. Me-Zahab ('waters of gold') is an evocative name that may indicate a region known for gold-bearing streams. The inclusion of the queen's genealogy may indicate her political importance or a matrilineal element in this particular succession.
40. 'According to their clans, their territories, and their names' (lemishpechotam limqomotam bishemotam) — this formula organizes the final chief-list by three categories: family grouping, geographic location, and personal name. It indicates that by this point, the chieftainships were associated with specific territories rather than just personal authority.
40. This final list of chiefs (vv. 40-43) differs from the earlier list (vv. 15-19). The earlier list named chiefs who were Esau's grandsons; this list appears to represent a later period when the chieftainships had evolved into territorial designations. Some names here (Timna, Kenaz, Teman) appear both as personal names and as regional names.
42. 'Mibzar' — a name meaning 'fortification' or 'fortress,' possibly referring to the fortified city of Bozrah or another stronghold in Edom. The name reflects the rugged, defensible terrain of the Seir mountains.
43. 'The land of their possession' (erets achuzzatam) — the term achuzzah ('possession, holding') is the same legal term used for the patriarchal land promises (17:8; 23:4, 9, 20; 48:4). Edom possesses its land just as Israel will possess Canaan. The parallel vocabulary suggests that both nations have divinely appointed territories — Edom in Seir, Israel in Canaan (cf. Deuteronomy 2:5: 'I have given Mount Seir to Esau as a possession').
43. 'He is Esau, the father of Edom' (hu Esav avi Edom) — the chapter's closing formula brings the identification full circle. The opening ('these are the generations of Esau, that is Edom,' v. 1) and the closing ('he is Esau, the father of Edom') create an inclusio that frames the entire genealogy. Esau's story is now complete in Genesis: he has a land, a people, chiefs, and kings. The narrative can now turn entirely to Jacob's family and the story of Joseph (37:2).

Summary: The 'generations of Jacob' focus on Joseph: the favored son, the bearer of a special robe, the dreamer of provocative dreams. His brothers' hatred intensifies until they plot to kill him. Reuben intervenes, and Judah proposes selling him. Joseph is sold to Ishmaelite traders for twenty pieces of silver and taken to Egypt. Jacob is shown the bloodied robe and mourns inconsolably.

What Makes This Remarkable: The ketonet passim ('ornamented robe,' v. 3) is the same term used for the royal garment of David's daughter Tamar (2 Samuel 13:18-19) — it marks not just favoritism but distinction. Joseph's two dreams escalate from agricultural to cosmic imagery: sheaves bow, then sun, moon, and stars bow. The brothers' sarcastic title ba'al hachalomot ('that master of dreams,' v. 19) is ironically prophetic — Joseph will indeed master dreams, and the brothers will bow. The blood-dipped robe sent to Jacob inverts the goat skins Jacob used to deceive Isaac (ch. 27): the deceiver is now deceived by his own sons.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew passim in ketonet passim (v. 3) is obscure — it may refer to length (reaching to palms and soles) or ornamentation (decorative strips). We rendered it as 'ornamented' and noted the uncertainty. The interplay between 'Ishmaelites' and 'Midianites' (vv. 25-28) has generated extensive source-critical discussion; the Hebrew text uses both terms, and we followed it without harmonizing. Joseph's hinni (here I am,' v. 13) echoes Abraham's response (22:1) — an obedient son sent by his father toward sacrifice.

Connections: The twenty pieces of silver (37:28) anticipate the thirty pieces for which Jesus was betrayed (Matthew 26:15). Jacob's refusal to be comforted (37:35) and his reference to Sheol introduce the underworld as a destination of grief. The Ishmaelite caravan carrying spices to Egypt (37:25) connects the Abraham and Joseph narratives through the very traders descended from Abraham's other son.

¹Jacob settled in the land of his father's sojournings, in the land of Canaan. ²These are the generations of Jacob. Joseph, being seventeen years old, was shepherding the flock with his brothers. He was a youth among the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah, his father's wives, and Joseph brought their bad report to their father. ³Now Israel loved Joseph more than all his sons, for he was the son of his old age, and he made him an ornamented robe. ⁴When his brothers saw that their father loved him more than all his brothers, they hated him and could not speak a peaceful word to him. ⁵Joseph dreamed a dream and told it to his brothers, and they hated him even more. ⁶He said to them, "Please listen to this dream that I have dreamed: ⁷Behold, we were binding sheaves in the field, and behold, my sheaf arose and stood upright, and behold, your sheaves gathered around it and bowed down to my sheaf." ⁸His brothers said to him, "Will you indeed reign over us? Will you indeed rule over us?" And they hated him even more because of his dreams and because of his words. ⁹He dreamed yet another dream and told it to his brothers, saying, "Behold, I have dreamed another dream: the sun and the moon and eleven stars were bowing down to me." ¹⁰He told it to his father and to his brothers, and his father rebuked him and said to him, "What is this dream that you have dreamed? Shall I and your mother and your brothers indeed come to bow down to you to the ground?" ¹¹His brothers were jealous of him, but his father kept the matter in mind. ¹²His brothers went to pasture their father's flock at Shechem. ¹³Israel said to Joseph, "Are not your brothers pasturing the flock at Shechem? Come, I will send you to them." He said to him, "Here I am." ¹⁴He said to him, "Go now, see to the welfare of your brothers and the welfare of the flock, and bring me back word." So he sent him from the Valley of Hebron, and he came to Shechem. ¹⁵A man found him — he was wandering in the field — and the man asked him, "What are you seeking?" ¹⁶He said, "I am seeking my brothers. Please tell me where they are pasturing." ¹⁷The man said, "They have moved on from here, for I heard them say, 'Let us go to Dothan.'" So Joseph went after his brothers and found them at Dothan. ¹⁸They saw him from a distance, and before he drew near to them, they conspired against him to kill him. ¹⁹They said to one another, "Look, here comes that master of dreams!" ²⁰Now then, come, let us kill him and throw him into one of the pits, and we will say, 'A fierce animal devoured him.' Then we will see what becomes of his dreams!" ²¹Reuben heard this and rescued him from their hands, saying, "Let us not strike his life." ²²Reuben said to them, "Do not shed blood. Throw him into this pit in the wilderness, but do not lay a hand on him" — so that he might rescue him from their hands and restore him to his father. ²³When Joseph came to his brothers, they stripped Joseph of his robe — the ornamented robe that was on him — ²⁴They seized him and threw him into the pit. The pit was empty — there was no water in it. ²⁵They sat down to eat a meal. They lifted up their eyes and looked, and behold, a caravan of Ishmaelites was coming from Gilead, with their camels bearing gum, balm, and myrrh, going down to carry these to Egypt. ²⁶Judah said to his brothers, "What profit is it if we kill our brother and cover up his blood? ²⁷Come, let us sell him to the Ishmaelites, and let our hand not be upon him, for he is our brother, our own flesh." And his brothers agreed. ²⁸Midianite traders passed by, and they drew Joseph up and lifted him out of the pit. They sold Joseph to the Ishmaelites for twenty pieces of silver, and they brought Joseph to Egypt. ²⁹Reuben returned to the pit, and behold, Joseph was not in the pit! He tore his garments. ³⁰He returned to his brothers and said, "The boy is gone! And I — where shall I go?" ³¹They took Joseph's robe, slaughtered a male goat, and dipped the robe in the blood. ³²They sent the ornamented robe and brought it to their father and said, "We found this. Please examine it — is it your son's robe or not?" ³³He recognized it and said, "My son's robe! A fierce animal has devoured him! Joseph has surely been torn to pieces!" ³⁴Jacob tore his garments, put sackcloth on his waist, and mourned for his son many days. ³⁵All his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him, but he refused to be comforted. He said, "Indeed, I will go down to Sheol mourning for my son." And his father wept for him. ³⁶Meanwhile, the Medanites sold him in Egypt to Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, the captain of the guard.

1. 'Settled' (vayyeshev) — the verb yashav ('to dwell, settle') opens the Joseph narrative with a note of permanence. Jacob has returned from his long exile and now inhabits the promised land. Yet the verb carries irony: Jacob 'settles,' but his family is about to be torn apart and eventually uprooted to Egypt.
2. 'The land of his father's sojournings' (erets megurei aviv) — megurim ('sojournings') derives from gur ('to sojourn as an alien'). The land is simultaneously home and foreign territory. Abraham and Isaac dwelt there as resident aliens (gerim), not owners. Jacob now inhabits the same paradox: he is settled in a land that is promised but not yet possessed.
3. 'These are the generations of Jacob' (elleh toledot Ya'aqov) — the final toledot formula in Genesis. Strikingly, though it says 'generations of Jacob,' the narrative immediately focuses on Joseph. The toledot of Jacob is the story of Joseph — the favored son through whom the family's destiny unfolds. This literary device signals that what follows is not merely Joseph's biography but the culmination of Jacob's entire family saga.
4. 'Bad report' (dibbatam ra'ah) — dibbah means a report, usually with negative connotations (slander, defamation, or simply a report of wrongdoing). Whether Joseph was tattling or faithfully reporting genuine misconduct is left deliberately ambiguous. The text neither condemns nor commends Joseph's action, but it establishes him as set apart from his brothers — aligned with his father rather than his peers.
5. 'A youth among the sons of Bilhah and the sons of Zilpah' — Joseph is specifically placed with the sons of the concubine-wives, the lower-status brothers. This detail may explain why Joseph had opportunity to observe and report their behavior, and may also suggest his own intermediate social position despite being Rachel's son.
6. 'Israel loved Joseph more than all his sons' (Yisra'el ahav et-Yosef mikkol-banav) — the narrator uses 'Israel' rather than 'Jacob,' emphasizing the patriarch's covenant identity. The phrase 'loved more than all' (ahav... mikkol) echoes the pattern of preference that has plagued the family for generations: Isaac loved Esau, Rebekah loved Jacob (25:28), Jacob loved Rachel over Leah (29:30). Parental favoritism is the recurring wound of the patriarchal family.
7. 'Son of his old age' (ben-zequnim) — Benjamin was actually younger, so this phrase may mean 'the son born in his mature years' or may carry the nuance of 'the son of his wisdom,' a child who is the comfort of aging. Some suggest it means the son who attends him in old age.
8. 'Ornamented robe' (ketonet passim) — the traditional rendering 'coat of many colors' derives from the LXX (chitōn poikilon). The Hebrew passim is obscure; it may relate to pas ('palm, sole'), suggesting a garment reaching to the palms and soles (a long-sleeved, full-length robe), or to decorative strips or patches. The same term describes the royal garment of Tamar, David's daughter (2 Sam 13:18-19), indicating it was a garment of distinction, possibly aristocratic or even royal. The rendering 'ornamented robe' captures the sense of an exceptional, status-marking garment without over-specifying.
9. 'They hated him' (vayyisne'u oto) — the verb sane' ('to hate') is strong and unqualified. The brothers' hatred is presented as a direct consequence of the father's favoritism. The text distributes culpability: Jacob's preferential love creates the conditions for the brothers' destructive hatred.
10. 'Could not speak peaceably to him' (velo yakhelu dabbero leshalom) — literally 'could not speak to him for peace (shalom).' The inability to speak shalom is the collapse of familial relationship. Shalom encompasses wholeness, well-being, and harmonious relationship. Its absence means communication itself has broken down. This detail foreshadows the bitter irony of v. 14, where Jacob sends Joseph to inquire about the shalom of his brothers — brothers who have no shalom to give.

5. 'Dreamed a dream' (vayyachalom... chalom) — the cognate accusative construction (dreaming a dream) intensifies the experience. Dreams in Genesis are vehicles of divine communication (20:3; 28:12; 31:10-11), and in the Joseph narrative they become the primary mode of revelation. Joseph is introduced here as a dreamer — a role that will define his destiny.
5. 'They hated him even more' (vayyosifu od seno oto) — the verb yasaf ('to add, do again') with seno ('to hate') indicates escalation. Each new provocation compounds the brothers' animosity. The narrative builds tension incrementally: favoritism (v. 3) hatred (v. 4) increased hatred (v. 5) still more hatred (v. 8).
6. 'Please listen' (shim'u-na) — the particle na ('please, I pray') softens the imperative, yet the very act of summoning his brothers to hear his dream of supremacy reveals either naivety or provocation. Joseph seems genuinely eager to share his vision without calculating its effect.
7. 'Behold... behold... behold' (vehinneh... vehinneh... vehinneh) — three instances of hinneh ('behold') create vivid, scene-by-scene narration, as if Joseph is reliving the dream. Each hinneh introduces a new movement: the binding, the rising, the bowing. The effect is cinematic.
7. 'My sheaf arose and stood upright' (qamah alummata vegam-nitsavah) — two verbs of elevation: qum ('to arise') and natsav ('to stand firm, be stationed'). Joseph's sheaf doesn't merely rise — it stands established, planted with authority. The double verb intensifies the imagery of dominion.
7. 'Your sheaves gathered around and bowed down' (tessubeynah alumoteikhem vatishtachaveynah) — the verb chavah in the hishtaphel ('to bow down, prostrate oneself') is the language of homage and worship. The brothers' sheaves encircle and prostrate before Joseph's. The agricultural imagery is not accidental — it anticipates the literal grain that will bring the brothers to bow before Joseph in Egypt (42:6).
8. 'Will you indeed reign... will you indeed rule' (hamalokh timlokh... im-mashol timshol) — two infinitive absolute constructions (malokh timlokh, mashol timshol) express incredulous emphasis. The brothers use two distinct verbs: malakh ('to reign as king') and mashal ('to rule, govern'). Their sarcasm inadvertently becomes prophecy — Joseph will indeed exercise both royal authority and governing power in Egypt.
8. 'Because of his dreams and because of his words' (al-chalomotav ve'al-devarav) — the brothers' hatred has a double source: the content of the dreams (which implies their subjugation) and Joseph's words (his act of telling, which implies either arrogance or insensitivity). Dreams and words — revelation and proclamation — together provoke the crisis.
9. 'The sun and the moon and eleven stars' (hashemesh vehayareach ve'achad asar kokhavim) — the dream escalates from agricultural imagery to cosmic. Joseph's first dream depicted fraternal dominance; this one extends to the entire family, including the parents. Sun = father (Jacob), moon = mother (here problematic, since Rachel is dead by this point — see 35:19), eleven stars = eleven brothers. The cosmic scale of the imagery anticipates Joseph's role as the savior of nations.
9. 'Were bowing down to me' (mishtachavim li) — the same root (ch-v-h, hishtaphel) as in the first dream, but now the heavenly bodies themselves perform the obeisance. The dream's scope has expanded from earth to heaven.
10. 'His father rebuked him' (vayyig'ar-bo aviv) — ga'ar means to rebuke sharply, to scold. Even the favoring father finds this dream too much. Yet the rebuke is measured — it is a question, not a condemnation. Jacob challenges the dream's plausibility rather than denouncing Joseph's character.
10. 'Your mother' (immekha) — Rachel has already died (35:19). Jacob may be speaking loosely, referring to Leah or Bilhah (Rachel's maidservant who may have served as surrogate mother), or the dream's symbolism may not require literal correspondence. The reference creates a tension the text does not resolve.
11. 'Were jealous' (vayeqan'u) — the verb qana' means to be jealous, zealous, or envious. It shifts the brothers' response from mere hatred to envy — they not only despise Joseph but covet his favored position and divine attention. Jealousy implies that the brothers recognize the dreams may be genuine, which makes them all the more threatening.
11. 'His father kept the matter in mind' (ve'aviv shamar et-haddavar) — shamar ('to keep, guard, watch over') suggests Jacob stored the dream away for contemplation. He rebuked publicly but pondered privately. The phrase echoes Luke 2:19, 51 ('Mary kept all these things in her heart'), though the parallel may be coincidental. Jacob recognizes something significant in Joseph's dreams even as he resists their implications.
12. 'Shechem' — the brothers return to the very place where Simeon and Levi perpetrated the massacre (ch. 34). The location carries ominous overtones. Shechem is dangerous territory for Jacob's family, both because of what they did there and because of how they might be perceived by the surrounding peoples. That the brothers go there to pasture flocks suggests either boldness or indifference to the danger.
13. 'Here I am' (hinnehi) — Joseph's response echoes the great responses of obedience in Genesis: Abraham's hinnehi before the binding of Isaac (22:1), and later Moses at the burning bush (Exod 3:4). The word signals readiness and willing submission. Joseph goes willingly, unaware that he is walking toward betrayal. The innocent obedience of the son sent by the father to his brothers carries deep typological resonance.
13. 'I will send you' (ve'eshalachakha) — the verb shalach ('to send') establishes Joseph as a sent one. The irony is layered: Jacob sends Joseph to check on his brothers' welfare, but this sending will result in Joseph's own suffering and ultimately in the salvation of the entire family.
14. 'See to the welfare' (re'eh et-shelom) — literally 'see the shalom of your brothers.' Jacob sends Joseph to find the very thing the brothers cannot offer him (v. 4 — they 'could not speak shalom to him'). The quest for shalom among brothers who have no shalom for Joseph is one of the chapter's central ironies.
14. 'From the Valley of Hebron' (me'emeq Chevron) — Hebron sits on a ridge; there is no literal valley of Hebron. The phrase may refer to the broader lowland region near Hebron, or it may function as a symbolic marker: Joseph descends from the place where Abraham and Sarah are buried, the seat of the patriarchal promise, into a journey that will lead far from the promised land.

14. Register departure: shalom rendered as 'welfare' rather than default 'peace' because Jacob sends Joseph to check on his brothers' well-being (shelom) — a health/status inquiry, not a state of peace.
15. 'A man found him' (vayyimtsa'ehu ish) — the unnamed man is one of Genesis's mysterious figures. Some rabbinic interpreters identify him as an angel (Gabriel, according to Rashi), since he appears providentially to redirect Joseph toward his destiny. The text leaves his identity unspecified, allowing the reader to sense divine guidance operating through an ordinary encounter.
15. 'Wandering in the field' (to'eh basadeh) — the participle to'eh ('wandering, going astray') suggests Joseph is lost. The image of the obedient son, sent by his father, now wandering without direction, is poignant. He needs guidance to reach his brothers — the very brothers who will betray him.
16. 'I am seeking my brothers' (et-achai anokhi mevaqesh) — Joseph's statement is both simple and laden with meaning. He seeks his brothers not knowing they seek his destruction. The phrase resonates beyond the immediate narrative: the search for fraternal reconciliation will drive the entire Joseph story.
17. 'Dothan' (Dotan) — a site about 13 miles north of Shechem, identified with modern Tell Dothan. It lay on a major trade route connecting the Jezreel Valley with the coastal road to Egypt. This geographical detail is crucial: the caravan route through Dothan is what makes the sale of Joseph to traveling merchants possible. Providence positions Joseph precisely where international commerce passes.
18. 'They conspired against him' (vayyitnakkelu oto) — the verb nakhal in the hitpa'el means to act with cunning, to scheme, to deal craftily. The same root appears in Numbers 25:18 for treacherous dealing. The brothers' plot is premeditated — they see Joseph approaching and begin scheming before he arrives. The distance between them (merachok, 'from afar') gives them time to convert hatred into action.
18. 'To kill him' (lahamito) — the infinitive lahamit ('to cause to die, to kill') states the brothers' intent with stark clarity. The beloved son, sent by his father seeking shalom, is marked for death before he can even speak.
19. 'That master of dreams' (ba'al hachalomot hallazeh) — literally 'the owner/master of the dreams, this one.' Ba'al means 'lord, master, owner, possessor.' The title drips with sarcasm: they mock Joseph as the 'dream-lord,' the one who presumes sovereignty through his visions. The demonstrative hallazeh ('this one, that one') adds contempt — they will not even use his name. Yet ironically, ba'al hachalomot is an accurate title: Joseph does master dreams, both his own and others' (chs. 40-41), and this mastery will elevate him to a position where their very lives depend on him.
20. 'Let us kill him' (nahargehu) — the first-person plural cohortative reveals a collective decision. Murder is proposed as a group action — shared guilt distributes responsibility and makes it easier for each individual to participate.
20. 'A fierce animal devoured him' (chayyah ra'ah akhalathu) — the planned lie becomes Jacob's conclusion in v. 33. The brothers prepare their father's deception in advance. The phrase chayyah ra'ah ('an evil/fierce beast') will echo with bitter irony: the true 'evil beasts' are the brothers themselves.
20. 'We will see what becomes of his dreams' (venir'eh mah-yihyu chalomotav) — the brothers believe they can defeat divine revelation by eliminating the dreamer. This is the fundamental error: the dream is from God, and killing Joseph cannot annul God's purposes. Their very attempt to prevent the dreams' fulfillment sets in motion the chain of events that will fulfill them.
21. 'Reuben heard and rescued him' (vayyishma Reuven vayyatsilehu miyyadam) — Reuben, the firstborn who lost his birthright through the Bilhah incident (35:22), here acts to protect Joseph. His intervention may stem from firstborn responsibility, genuine compassion, or a desire to restore himself in his father's eyes. The verb hitsil ('to rescue, deliver') is strong — Reuben's action is decisive, not merely passive objection.
21. 'Let us not strike his life' (lo nakkenu nafesh) — literally 'let us not strike him — a soul/life.' The word nefesh ('soul, life, being') personalizes Joseph: he is not merely a target but a living being. Reuben's language appeals to the brothers' recognition of Joseph's humanity.
22. 'Do not shed blood' (al-tishpekhu-dam) — Reuben frames his proposal in terms of blood prohibition. Bloodshed (shephikhut damim) carries the weight of the Noahic covenant: 'Whoever sheds the blood of man, by man shall his blood be shed' (9:6). By appealing to this fundamental prohibition, Reuben gives the brothers a way to act against Joseph without crossing the ultimate boundary.
22. 'That he might rescue him... and restore him to his father' — the narrator reveals Reuben's private intention. His plan is to return later and pull Joseph from the pit. The strategy fails because Reuben is absent when the Midianite/Ishmaelite caravan arrives (v. 29). Good intentions without timely action prove insufficient.
23. 'They stripped Joseph of his robe' (vayyaphshitu et-Yosef et-kuttonto) — the first act of violence is to remove the symbol of his father's favor. Stripping the ketonet passim is an act of humiliation and de-identification: they remove his status before removing his freedom. The detailed repetition — 'his robe, the ornamented robe that was on him' — emphasizes the garment's significance. Clothing in Genesis regularly marks identity, status, and deception (Esau's garments in ch. 27, Tamar's veil in ch. 38).
23. The stripping of the robe anticipates the blood-dipped garment sent to Jacob (v. 31-32). The robe that signified love becomes the instrument of deception.
24. 'The pit was empty — there was no water in it' (vehabor req ein bo mayim) — the narrator's parenthetical detail creates a vivid image of desolation. A dry cistern in the wilderness is a place of death — without water, survival is measured in days. The rabbis noted that the specification 'no water' implies something else may have been in it (snakes, scorpions — Rashi). Whether or not one follows that reading, the emptiness of the pit mirrors the emptiness of the brothers' cruelty.

24. 'Pit' (bor) — a cistern hewn in rock for water storage. When empty, these cisterns served as makeshift prisons (Jer 38:6). The bor becomes a liminal space — between life and death, between freedom and slavery, between the promised land and Egypt. Joseph's descent into the pit is the first of several descents (to Egypt, to prison) before his ultimate ascent.
25. 'They sat down to eat a meal' (vayyeshvu le'ekhol-lechem) — the shocking detail: while Joseph languishes in the pit, his brothers eat. Their callousness is expressed not through cruelty but through normalcy. They have cast their brother into a death-pit and now sit for a casual meal. Amos 6:6 echoes this moral indifference: those 'who are not grieved over the ruin of Joseph.'
25. 'A caravan of Ishmaelites' (orchat Yishme'elim) — orchah means a traveling company, a caravan. The Ishmaelites are descendants of Abraham through Hagar (ch. 16, 25:12-18), making them Joseph's distant kinsmen. The irony deepens: Abraham's rejected son's descendants become the means of transporting Jacob's rejected son to Egypt.
25. 'Gum, balm, and myrrh' (nekh'o't utsri valot) — luxury trade goods. Nekho't is likely tragacanth gum; tsri is balm (the famous 'balm of Gilead,' Jer 8:22); lot is probably labdanum or myrrh. These aromatic goods were highly valued in Egypt for embalming and medicine. The caravan is heading to Egypt — precisely where Joseph's destiny lies.
26. 'What profit' (mah-betsa) — Judah's intervention is pragmatic rather than moral. The word betsa means 'gain, profit, unjust gain.' He does not appeal to conscience or kinship duty but to self-interest: there is nothing to gain from murder. This is morally ambiguous — Judah prevents fratricide but replaces it with the commodification of his brother. His character arc from this compromised beginning to his self-sacrificial speech in 44:18-34 is one of the great transformations in Scripture.
26. 'Cover up his blood' (vekhissinu et-damo) — an allusion to the belief that blood cries out from the ground (4:10, Abel's blood). Covering blood is an attempt to silence the witness of murder. Judah acknowledges that killing Joseph would require concealment — a tacit admission that the act would be unjust.
27. 'He is our brother, our own flesh' (ki-achinu vesarenu hu) — Judah invokes kinship: 'brother' (ach) and 'flesh' (basar). The argument is that fraternal bonds preclude murder — but apparently not enslavement. The brothers' moral calculus is deeply compromised: they will not kill their brother, but they will sell him into lifelong bondage.
27. 'His brothers agreed' (vayyishme'u echav) — literally 'his brothers listened/heard.' The verb shama' can mean both 'to hear' and 'to obey.' Judah's voice carries authority among the brothers, foreshadowing his eventual leadership role in the family and the tribe that will bear his name.
28. 'Midianite traders' (anashim Midyanim socharim) — the relationship between Ishmaelites and Midianites in this chapter is a longstanding interpretive question. In v. 25, the caravan is Ishmaelite; here, Midianite traders appear. In 39:1, Potiphar buys Joseph from the Ishmaelites; in Judges 8:24, Ishmaelites and Midianites are explicitly connected. Possible explanations: (1) the terms were used interchangeably for nomadic traders; (2) the Midianites pulled Joseph from the pit and sold him to the Ishmaelites; (3) different narrative strands preserve different traditions. The rendering follows the text as given without harmonizing.
28. 'Twenty pieces of silver' (esrim kasef) — the price of a young male slave in the early second millennium BCE, consistent with ancient Near Eastern slave prices documented in texts from Mari and other sites. Later, the price rose to thirty pieces of silver (Exod 21:32, the price of a slave gored by an ox; Matt 26:15, the price of Judas's betrayal of Jesus). The specific amount anchors the narrative in economic reality while resonating with later biblical echoes.
28. 'They brought Joseph to Egypt' (vayyavi'u et-Yosef Mitsraymah) — the pivotal moment of the entire patriarchal narrative. Joseph's descent to Egypt sets in motion the events that will lead to Israel's sojourn, slavery, and eventual exodus. What the brothers intend as permanent disposal becomes God's means of preservation (50:20).
29. 'Reuben returned to the pit' — Reuben's absence during the sale is unexplained. He apparently left the group, intending to return later and rescue Joseph (v. 22). His plan depended on timing, and the timing failed. The narrative creates pathos: the one brother who sought to save Joseph arrives too late.
29. 'He tore his garments' (vayyiqra et-begadav) — the tearing of garments (qeri'ah) is the quintessential expression of grief and horror in the Hebrew Bible. Reuben's grief is genuine — his rescue plan has collapsed. The irony of garments pervades this chapter: Joseph's robe is stripped (v. 23), Reuben tears his own clothes in grief (v. 29), Jacob will tear his garments in mourning (v. 34).
30. 'The boy is gone!' (hayyeled einennu) — literally 'the boy — he is not.' The stark declaration of absence uses the participle einennu ('he is not'), which can also imply death (as in 42:13, 'one is no more'). Reuben does not know what happened — he assumes the worst.
30. 'And I — where shall I go?' (va'ani anah ani-va) — Reuben's anguished question reveals his personal crisis. As firstborn, he bears responsibility. How will he face his father? The repeated pronoun 'I' (ani... ani) intensifies his distress — the focus turns inward to his own predicament. His concern, though sympathetic, centers on himself rather than on Joseph's fate.
31. 'Slaughtered a male goat' (vayyishchatu se'ir izzim) — the goat becomes the instrument of deception. The choice of a goat is richly ironic: Jacob himself used goat skins to deceive his father Isaac (27:16). Now Jacob's sons use goat blood to deceive their father. The deception by goat comes full circle. The same type of animal connects the two great deceptions of the patriarchal narrative.
31. 'Dipped the robe in the blood' (vayyitbelu et-hakkuttonet baddam) — the ornamented robe that symbolized Jacob's love is transformed into false evidence of death. The blood-soaked garment is a fabricated crime scene. The brothers corrupt the symbol of favoritism into the instrument of grief.

32. 'Please examine' (hakker-na) — the verb nakhar (hiphil: 'to recognize, examine, identify') with the particle na ('please') is devastatingly calculated. The brothers force Jacob to identify the blood-soaked robe himself, making him the agent of his own torment. This exact phrase — hakker-na — echoes the deception of Genesis 38:25-26, where Tamar sends Judah's pledged items with the same words: 'Please examine — whose are these?' The verbal echo links the two chapters: the deceiver is deceived, and the one who orchestrated the deception of his father will himself be confronted by the same words.
33. 'Your son's robe' (ketonet binkha) — they say 'your son,' not 'our brother' or 'Joseph.' The distancing language reveals their rejection: Joseph belongs to Jacob, not to them. They disclaim fraternal relationship even in the act of presenting false evidence.
33. 'He recognized it' (vayyakkireha) — the verb nakhar again. Jacob recognizes the robe just as the brothers intended. The man who deceived his own father through touch and clothing (ch. 27) is now deceived through sight and clothing. The poetic justice is precise: Jacob used goat skins and Esau's garments to steal a blessing; his sons use goat blood and Joseph's garment to steal his joy.
33. 'Joseph has surely been torn to pieces' (tarof toraf Yosef) — the infinitive absolute construction (tarof toraf) expresses absolute certainty. Jacob is utterly convinced. The verb taraf ('to tear, rend as a beast of prey') paints a vivid image of violent death. Jacob's grief is founded on a lie, but the grief itself is real and devastating.
34. 'Tore his garments' (vayyiqra... simlotav) — the qeri'ah ritual of grief. Jacob joins Reuben (v. 29) in tearing clothes, but whereas Reuben's grief was brief, Jacob's mourning will extend 'many days' — indeed, over twenty years, until the revelation that Joseph lives (45:26-28).
34. 'Put sackcloth on his waist' (vayyasem saq bemotnav) — sackcloth (saq), a coarse fabric of goat or camel hair, was the garment of mourning, penitence, and grief throughout the ancient Near East. Worn against the skin at the waist, it was physically uncomfortable — an external manifestation of internal anguish.
35. 'All his sons and all his daughters rose up to comfort him' — the bitter irony: the very sons who caused Jacob's grief now attempt to comfort him. Their consolation is built on their own lie. The mention of 'daughters' (benot) is notable — Dinah is the only daughter previously named, but the plural may include daughters-in-law or other daughters not previously mentioned.
35. 'He refused to be comforted' (vayema'en lehitnachem) — Jacob's refusal is not mere stubbornness but the expression of a grief that cannot be resolved. Comfort is possible when loss can be accepted; Jacob cannot accept Joseph's death because the mourning is built on falsehood. Paradoxically, his refusal to be comforted is the appropriate response to a death that has not occurred.
35. 'I will go down to Sheol mourning for my son' (ki-ered el-beni avel She'olah) — Sheol is the underworld, the realm of the dead in Hebrew cosmology. It is not hell but the shadowy abode where all the dead dwell (see also 42:38; 44:29, 31). Jacob expects to carry his grief into death itself. The verb 'go down' (ered) creates a geographical parallel: Joseph goes down to Egypt; Jacob vows to go down to Sheol. Descent characterizes the entire family's trajectory in this chapter.
36. 'The Medanites' (haMedanim) — yet another variant: here the text reads Medanim, not Midyanim (Midianites) as in v. 28. Medan and Midian were both sons of Abraham by Keturah (25:2), so the names may refer to closely related or overlapping groups. The text preserves a multiplicity of designations for the trading peoples who facilitated Joseph's journey to Egypt.
36. 'Potiphar' (Potifar) — an Egyptian name, likely from the Egyptian Pa-di-Pa-Ra, meaning 'he whom Ra has given.' The name connects Joseph's new master to Egyptian religion. Potiphar is identified with two titles: seris Par'oh ('officer/courtier of Pharaoh') and sar hattabbachim ('captain of the guard,' literally 'chief of the slaughterers/executioners'). The word seris can also mean 'eunuch,' though here it likely means 'court official.' Potiphar's position places Joseph at the intersection of Egyptian royal power.
36. The chapter ends with a split screen: Jacob mourns in Canaan; Joseph enters Egyptian servitude. The covenant family is fractured, and the resolution will take decades. Yet the narrator's matter-of-fact tone ('the Medanites sold him') hints that a larger purpose is at work beneath the surface of human cruelty.

Summary: Judah separates from his brothers, marries a Canaanite woman, and fathers three sons. After God kills the eldest two for wickedness, Judah withholds the third from Tamar. Tamar disguises herself, conceives twins by Judah, and presents his seal and staff as proof. Judah declares, 'She is more righteous than I.' Perez and Zerah are born.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter interrupts the Joseph narrative at its most suspenseful moment — Joseph has just been sold into Egypt. The interruption is theologically deliberate: Judah's story runs parallel to Joseph's, and both involve deception, garments, and goats. Tamar's scheme with Judah's signet, cord, and staff (v. 18) mirrors the brothers' scheme with Joseph's bloodied robe. Judah's confession tsadeqah mimmeni ('she is more righteous than I,' v. 26) marks the beginning of his moral transformation, which will culminate in his self-sacrificial speech in chapter 44.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew distinguishes between zonah ('prostitute,' v. 15, Judah's perception) and qedeshah ('cult prostitute,' v. 21, Hirah's inquiry) — two different social categories conflated by the disguise. We preserved this distinction. The phrase 'he did not know her again' (v. 26) uses yada in its sexual sense, and the negative statement separates the episode from ongoing relationship. Tamar's act of justice through deception challenges simple moral categories, and we let the text present it without editorial resolution.

Connections: Perez, born through this unlikely union, enters the lineage of David (Ruth 4:18-22) and of Jesus (Matthew 1:3). Tamar is one of four women named in Matthew's genealogy — all with irregular circumstances that God uses to advance his purposes. The levirate duty Onan violates (38:8) is later codified in Deuteronomy 25:5-10. Judah's moral arc — from callous patriarch here to self-sacrificing brother in chapter 44 — is one of Genesis's most significant character developments.

¹It happened at that time that Judah went down from his brothers and turned aside to a certain Adullamite whose name was Hirah. ²Judah saw there the daughter of a Canaanite man whose name was Shua. He took her and went in to her. ³She conceived and bore a son, and he then called his name Er. ⁴She conceived again and bore a son. she called his name Onan. ⁵She conceived yet again and bore a son, and she called his name Shelah. He was at Chezib when she bore him. ⁶Judah took a wife for Er his firstborn, and her name was Tamar. ⁷Er, Judah's firstborn, was wicked in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD put him to death. ⁸Judah said to Onan, "Go in to your brother's wife and perform the duty of a brother-in-law to her, and raise up offspring for your brother." ⁹Onan knew that the offspring would not be his, so whenever he went in to his brother's wife, he would waste his seed on the ground so as not to give offspring to his brother. ¹⁰What he did was evil in the sight of the LORD, and He put him to death also. ¹¹Judah said to Tamar his daughter-in-law, "Remain a widow in your father's house until my son Shelah grows up" — for he thought, "Lest he also die, like his brothers." So Tamar went and lived in her father's house. ¹²Many days passed, and the daughter of Shua, Judah's wife, died. When Judah was comforted, he went up to his sheepshearers at Timnah — he and his friend Hirah the Adullamite. ¹³It was told to Tamar, "Behold, your father-in-law is going up to Timnah to shear his sheep." ¹⁴She removed her widow's garments, covered herself with a veil, and wrapped herself. She sat at the entrance to Enaim, which is on the road to Timnah, for she saw that Shelah had grown up, yet she had not been given to him as a wife. ¹⁵When Judah saw her, he took her for a prostitute, for she had covered her face. ¹⁶He turned aside to her by the road and said, "Come now, let me come in to you" — for he did not know that she was his daughter-in-law. She said, "What will you give me if you come in to me?" ¹⁷He said, "I will send a young goat from the flock." She said, "Will you give a pledge until you send it?" ¹⁸He said, "What pledge shall I give you?" She said, "Your signet, your cord, and your staff that is in your hand." So he gave them to her and went in to her, and she conceived by him. ¹⁹She arose and went away. She removed her veil and put on her widow's garments. ²⁰Judah sent the young goat by the hand of his friend the Adullamite to retrieve the pledge from the woman, but he could not find her. ²¹He asked the men of the place, "Where is the cult prostitute who was at Enaim by the road?" They said, "There has been no cult prostitute here." ²²He returned to Judah and said, "I could not find her, and the men of the place also said, 'There has been no cult prostitute here.'" ²³Judah said, "Let her keep them, lest we become a laughingstock. Look, I sent this goat, but you could not find her." ²⁴About three months later, Judah was told, "Tamar your daughter-in-law has played the prostitute, and moreover, she is pregnant through prostitution." Judah said, "Bring her out and let her be burned!" ²⁵As she was being brought out, she sent word to her father-in-law, saying, "By the man to whom these belong, I am pregnant." And she said, "Please examine these — whose signet, cord, and staff are these?" ²⁶Judah recognized them and said, "She is more righteous than I, because I did not give her to my son Shelah." And he did not know her again. ²⁷When the time came for her to give birth, behold, there were twins in her womb. ²⁸As she was giving birth, one put out a hand, and the midwife took a scarlet thread and tied it on his hand, saying, "This one came out first." ²⁹But as he drew back his hand, behold, his brother came out! She said, "What a breach you have made for yourself!" So his name was called Perez. ³⁰Afterward his brother came out, the one who had the scarlet thread on his hand, and his name was called Zerah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'At that time' (ba'et hahi) — the chapter is placed between the sale of Joseph (ch. 37) and Joseph's arrival in Potiphar's house (ch. 39). The interruption is deliberate: while Joseph descends to Egypt, the narrator pauses to trace Judah's parallel descent — geographical, moral, and familial. The juxtaposition invites comparison between the two brothers.
1. 'Judah went down' (vayyered Yehudah) — the verb yarad ('to go down, descend') is loaded. It echoes Joseph's descent to Egypt and Jacob's vow to go down to Sheol (37:35). Judah's descent from his brothers is both physical (from the hill country) and metaphorical (away from the covenant community). He separates himself from the family, marries a Canaanite, and enters a sequence of moral compromises.
1. 'Turned aside to' (vayyett ad) — natah means to turn aside, to incline, to deviate from a path. The verb subtly signals departure from the expected way. Judah turns aside to a Canaanite friend, beginning a pattern of assimilation.
2. 'The daughter of a Canaanite man' (bat-ish Kena'ani) — Judah marries outside the covenant community, in contrast to the careful search for wives within the family undertaken by Abraham (ch. 24) and Isaac (ch. 28). The text does not name the woman — she is identified only as 'daughter of Shua' (bat-Shua). Her namelessness may reflect either the patriarchal conventions of the narrative or a subtle literary judgment on the marriage.
2. 'He took her and went in to her' (vayyiqqacheha vayyavo eleha) — the rapid succession of verbs (saw, took, went in) echoes the pattern of desire-and-acquisition that characterizes problematic unions in Genesis (cf. 6:2, 'they saw... they took'). There is no courtship, no family negotiation, no seeking of divine guidance. Judah acts on impulse.
3. 'Er' — the name may derive from the root 'ur ('to be awake, alert') or from 'ir ('city'). The brevity of the naming — no etymology is given — contrasts with the elaborate naming narratives elsewhere in Genesis. The lack of explanation may itself be significant: Er's story will be equally brief and unexplained.
4. 'Onan' — possibly from on ('vigor, strength') or aven ('sorrow, trouble'). The mother names this child (contrast v. 3 where the father names Er), a subtle shift in agency. The name's potential connection to 'sorrow' may foreshadow his fate.
5. 'Shelah' (Shelah) — possibly from shalah ('to be tranquil, at ease') or from the root sh-l-h ('to send'). Shelah becomes the pivotal figure in the narrative's unfolding: Judah's failure to give Shelah to Tamar triggers the crisis of the chapter.
5. 'Chezib' (Kheziv) — also known as Achzib (Josh 15:44; Mic 1:14). The place name is suggestive: the root k-z-b means 'to lie, to deceive, to disappoint.' Micah 1:14 puns on this: 'The houses of Achzib (akhzav) shall be a deception (akhzav) to the kings of Israel.' The name may foreshadow the deception that pervades this chapter.
6. 'Tamar' (Tamar) — the name means 'date palm,' a tree associated with beauty, fruitfulness, and uprightness (Ps 92:12, 'the righteous shall flourish like the palm tree'). The name is prophetically fitting: Tamar will prove to be the righteous one in this story. Her ethnic identity is unspecified — she may be Canaanite, but the text does not say so. She will appear again in the genealogy of David (Ruth 4:12) and in the lineage of Jesus (Matt 1:3).
7. 'Wicked in the sight of the LORD' (ra be'einei YHWH) — the nature of Er's wickedness is not specified. The narrator judges the character without detailing the offense, leaving the reader to understand that Er's evil was severe enough to warrant divine execution. This reticence is striking in a narrative that will be quite explicit about Onan's sin (v. 9).
7. 'The LORD put him to death' (vayemitehu YHWH) — direct divine judgment. The verb hemit (hiphil of mut, 'to cause to die') attributes Er's death directly to God's action. This is not natural death or accident — it is divine execution. The text asserts God's active sovereignty over life and death, particularly when covenant-line wickedness threatens the divine plan.
8. 'Perform the duty of a brother-in-law' (yabbem otah) — the verb yibbem is a denominative from yavam ('brother-in-law'). This is the levirate marriage obligation (from Latin levir, 'brother-in-law'), later codified in Deuteronomy 25:5-10. The custom required the surviving brother to marry his deceased brother's widow and produce offspring who would legally be counted as the dead brother's heirs. The practice preserved the dead man's name, lineage, and land inheritance.
8. 'Raise up offspring for your brother' (haqem zera le'achikha) — the seed (zera) would legally be Er's, not Onan's. The firstborn of the levirate union would inherit Er's portion and carry his name. This is the crux of the obligation — and the reason for Onan's refusal.
9. 'He would waste his seed on the ground' (veshichet artsah) — the verb shichet means 'to destroy, ruin, corrupt.' Onan's act was deliberate and repeated (the Hebrew construction with hayah + imperfect indicates habitual action: 'whenever he went in'). His sin was not merely a sexual act but a calculated refusal of the levirate duty — he accepted the access to Tamar that came with the obligation while deliberately subverting its purpose.
9. 'So as not to give offspring to his brother' (levilti netan-zera le'achiv) — Onan's motivation is explicitly stated: self-interest. If Er's line continued, Er's firstborn rights and inheritance would pass to that child, diminishing Onan's own share. His refusal is an act of greed disguised as compliance — he goes through the motions of the levirate marriage while ensuring it produces no result.
10. 'Evil in the sight of the LORD' (vayyera be'einei YHWH) — the same evaluative formula used for Er (v. 7). Onan's offense is specified where Er's was not: the deliberate refusal to fulfill the levirate obligation. His sin combines exploitation of Tamar (using her sexually while denying her the child that was her legal right), betrayal of his dead brother (refusing to preserve Er's name), and defiance of the family obligation his father imposed.

10. 'He put him to death also' (vayyamet gam-oto) — the word gam ('also') connects Onan's death to Er's. Two of Judah's three sons have now died under divine judgment. This creates the crisis that drives the remainder of the chapter: Judah has one son left (Shelah), and he is terrified of losing him.
11. 'Remain a widow' (shvi almanah) — Judah commands Tamar to a state of suspended life. As a widow bound by levirate expectation, she cannot remarry; yet Judah has no intention of giving Shelah to her. She is trapped between obligation and abandonment. The almanah ('widow') in Israelite society was among the most vulnerable persons, dependent on the family structure for protection and provision.
11. 'For he thought, Lest he also die, like his brothers' (ki amar pen-yamut gam-hu ke'echav) — the narrator exposes Judah's private reasoning. He blames Tamar for his sons' deaths, as if she were a dangerous woman rather than the victim of wicked husbands. His fear is superstitious rather than theological — he does not consider that God killed his sons for their own wickedness. This misplaced fear leads to injustice: Tamar is denied her legal right.
11. Tamar's compliance — she 'went and lived in her father's house' — demonstrates her patience and submission. But this obedience has limits, as the following verses will reveal.
12. 'Many days passed' (vayyirbu hayyamim) — the compressed time notation covers years. Shelah has presumably grown up during this period, yet Judah has not fulfilled his promise to give him to Tamar. The passage of time heightens Tamar's desperation and confirms Judah's bad faith.
12. 'Judah's wife died... Judah was comforted' (vatamot bat-Shua... vayyinnachem Yehudah) — the verb nacham ('to be comforted, to comfort oneself') signals the end of the mourning period. Judah's mourning for his wife concludes; Jacob's mourning for Joseph (37:35 — 'he refused to be comforted') continues. The contrast is pointed.
12. 'Sheepshearing at Timnah' — sheepshearing was a festive occasion in the ancient world, associated with celebration, feasting, and commerce (cf. 1 Sam 25:2-8, Nabal's sheepshearing). The festive atmosphere provides the context for Judah's encounter with Tamar.
13. The passive construction 'it was told' (vayyuggad) leaves the informant unnamed. Tamar receives intelligence about Judah's movements and acts upon it. Her plan requires precise knowledge of his itinerary — she positions herself along his route. The report triggers her decisive action.
14. 'She removed her widow's garments' (vattasar bigdei almenutah) — clothing functions as identity in Genesis. Tamar's widow's garments marked her as bound to Judah's family, waiting for Shelah. By removing them, she sheds her assigned identity. The garment changes in this chapter mirror those in chapter 37: Joseph is stripped of his identity-garment; Tamar removes hers voluntarily. Both garment changes initiate transformative deceptions.
14. 'Covered herself with a veil' (vattekhas batsa'if) — the tsa'if ('veil') disguises Tamar's identity. Judah will not recognize his own daughter-in-law. The veil also serves as the sign of a woman available for sexual transaction, as v. 15 makes explicit.
14. 'The entrance to Enaim' (Petach Einayim) — this may be a place name ('Enaim,' a town) or a descriptive phrase meaning 'the opening of the eyes.' If the latter, the name is profoundly ironic: Judah's eyes are closed to Tamar's identity at the very 'opening of the eyes.' The wordplay suggests that this is a place where truth will eventually come to light.
14. 'Shelah had grown up, yet she had not been given to him' — Tamar's action is motivated by justice, not lust. She has waited patiently; the promise has not been kept. Judah has broken his obligation. Tamar takes matters into her own hands through a dangerous and morally ambiguous stratagem — one that the narrative will ultimately vindicate.
15. 'He took her for a prostitute' (vayyachsheveha lezonah) — the verb chashav means 'to think, reckon, consider.' Judah's assumption is based on the veil covering her face. The word zonah ('prostitute') is the common term for a woman who engages in sexual commerce. The narrator uses zonah here, though Judah will later send payment seeking a qedeshah ('cult prostitute,' v. 21-22) — a distinction that may reflect Judah's attempt to dignify the transaction or the social ambiguity of such encounters.
15. 'She had covered her face' (ki khisstah paneha) — veiling practices varied across the ancient Near East. In some contexts, veiling indicated modesty and respectability; in others, it marked sexual availability. Here the veil prevents recognition — Judah does not know his own daughter-in-law.
16. 'He turned aside to her' (vayyett eleha) — the same verb (natah, 'to turn aside') used in v. 1 when Judah turned aside to Hirah. The repetition creates a pattern: Judah's life in this chapter is characterized by turning aside — from his brothers, from the covenant community, from the road, from moral responsibility.
16. 'For he did not know that she was his daughter-in-law' — the narrator's parenthetical comment both exonerates Judah from intentional incest and heightens the irony. The man who should know his own family does not recognize the woman he has wronged. His ignorance is both literal (he cannot see through the veil) and moral (he cannot see his own injustice).
16. 'What will you give me?' (mah-titten-li) — Tamar negotiates. Her question serves a dual purpose: it maintains the disguise (a prostitute would negotiate payment) and it secures the pledge items that will later prove Judah's identity. Tamar's strategy is carefully calculated.
17. 'A young goat' (gedi-izzim) — the goat motif recurs with devastating irony. In chapter 37, the brothers slaughtered a goat (se'ir izzim) to dip Joseph's robe in blood and deceive Jacob. Now Judah promises a goat as payment — and the transaction will expose his own deception. The goat binds the two chapters: deception by goat in chapter 37, exposure by goat in chapter 38.
17. 'A pledge' (eravon) — Tamar requests security for the promised payment. The eravon ('pledge, guarantee, security deposit') is a legal term for a surety left with a creditor. Tamar's insistence on a pledge is the decisive move of her plan — the pledge items will become irrefutable evidence.

18. 'Your signet, your cord, and your staff' (chotamkha ufetilekha umattekha) — Tamar requests three items that are uniquely identifying. The chotam ('signet, seal') was a personalized stamp used to authenticate documents and mark property — the ancient equivalent of a signature. The patil ('cord, string') was the cord from which the seal hung around the neck. The matteh ('staff') was a walking stick, often carved or marked distinctively. Together, these three items constitute unmistakable personal identification. Tamar is, in effect, collecting Judah's identity papers.
18. That Judah surrenders these items so readily reveals how completely desire has overridden judgment. He hands over the markers of his identity — his authority, his name, his patriarchal status — to a woman he believes is a roadside prostitute.
19. Tamar's garment change is the reverse of v. 14: she removes the veil of disguise and resumes the clothing of her assigned identity. The episode is framed by two costume changes — from widow to disguised woman and back. She reenters her waiting status, but now she carries within her the proof of Judah's failure and the seed of the covenant line. The transformation is invisible to all but the reader.
20. Judah sends Hirah rather than going himself — using an intermediary to maintain discretion. Hirah is tasked with recovering the pledge items that could identify Judah. The fact that the woman cannot be found begins the unraveling: the pledge items remain in Tamar's possession, and Judah has no way to recover them.
21. 'Cult prostitute' (qedeshah) — Hirah uses the term qedeshah, not zonah. The qedeshah (from qadosh, 'holy, set apart') was a woman associated with cultic or sacral prostitution, possibly connected to Canaanite fertility worship. The word carries a veneer of religious respectability that zonah ('common prostitute') does not. Hirah may be euphemizing — using the more respectable term to avoid embarrassment — or the narrative may be distinguishing between types of sexual commerce. Either way, the locals insist: no such woman has been there.
21. 'There has been no cult prostitute here' (lo-hayetah vazeh qedeshah) — the townspeople's denial is absolute. They have seen no woman matching the description. Tamar has vanished, along with Judah's identity.
22. Hirah's report confirms the failure. The pledge items cannot be recovered. The mysterious woman has disappeared as completely as if she never existed — which, in a sense, she did not: the 'prostitute' was a fiction created by Tamar's disguise.
23. 'Lest we become a laughingstock' (pen nihyeh lavuz) — the word buz means 'contempt, shame, ridicule.' Judah is more concerned about public embarrassment than about the loss of his seal and staff or the moral dimensions of his behavior. His priorities are inverted: reputation over righteousness. He would rather lose his identity markers than be known as someone who patronized a prostitute and was then duped by her.
23. Judah's decision to let the matter drop ensures that the pledge items remain in Tamar's hands — the very evidence she needs. His concern for reputation becomes the instrument of his exposure.
24. 'Has played the prostitute' (zanetah) — the verb zanah ('to commit fornication, to play the harlot') is used in the qal perfect. The informers present Tamar's pregnancy as evidence of sexual immorality. The irony is devastating: Judah, who consorted with a woman he believed to be a prostitute, now condemns his daughter-in-law for the same category of behavior — behavior that he himself initiated.
24. 'Pregnant through prostitution' (harah lizenunim) — the pregnancy makes Tamar's alleged sin visible and undeniable. In a culture where a woman bound by levirate obligation was expected to remain chaste, pregnancy from an unauthorized union was a grave offense.
24. 'Bring her out and let her be burned' (hotsi'uha vetissaref) — Judah's judgment is swift and extreme. Burning was a penalty for severe sexual offenses (Lev 20:14; 21:9). As the head of the family, Judah claims judicial authority. His rush to judgment contrasts sharply with his own moral failures: he who has not fulfilled his levirate obligation, who consorted with a woman by the roadside, now demands the death penalty for the woman he wronged. The hypocrisy is staggering, and the narrative is about to expose it.
25. 'As she was being brought out' (hi mutset) — the passive participle indicates the execution process has begun. Tamar is being led to her death. She waits until the last possible moment to reveal her evidence — a dramatic choice that maximizes the confrontation's impact and gives Judah no opportunity to suppress the truth.
25. 'Please examine' (hakker-na) — the identical phrase the brothers used when presenting Joseph's blood-stained robe to Jacob (37:32). The verbal echo is deliberate and devastating. In chapter 37, Judah participated in presenting false evidence to his father with the words 'please examine — is this your son's robe?' Now Tamar presents true evidence to Judah with the same words: 'please examine — whose are these?' The deceiver is confronted by his own method. The phrase hakker-na becomes a literary thread binding the two narratives of deception.
25. 'Whose signet, cord, and staff are these?' — Tamar does not accuse Judah directly. She presents the evidence and lets it speak. Her restraint is remarkable: facing execution, she offers Judah the opportunity to recognize the truth rather than publicly shaming him. She allows him to condemn or acquit himself.
26. 'She is more righteous than I' (tsadeqah mimmeni) — Judah's confession is one of the most significant moral reversals in Genesis. The patriarch who moments ago demanded Tamar's execution now declares her the righteous party. The word tsadeqah ('she is righteous, she is in the right') does not necessarily mean Tamar's method was morally ideal, but that her cause was just: she acted to secure the offspring and inheritance that were legally hers. Judah, who failed in his obligation and then rushed to condemn her, acknowledges his own greater guilt.
26. 'Because I did not give her to my son Shelah' (ki al-ken lo-netattiha leShelah veni) — Judah identifies the root cause: his broken promise. His failure to fulfill the levirate obligation forced Tamar into her desperate stratagem. The confession is specific, not vague — he names his exact offense.
26. 'He did not know her again' (velo yasaf od leda'tah) — Judah does not continue the sexual relationship. The encounter was a single event driven by Tamar's quest for justice, not the beginning of an ongoing union. The text closes this dimension of the narrative with finality.

27. 'Twins in her womb' (te'omim bevitnahh) — the twin motif recurs from Jacob and Esau's birth (25:24). Like that earlier birth, this one will involve a struggle for primacy and an unexpected reversal of birth order. The doubling of offspring also doubles Tamar's vindication: she sought one heir and receives two.
28. 'A scarlet thread' (shani) — shani denotes a bright red or crimson thread, colored with dye from the kermes insect. The scarlet thread marks the firstborn's claim — a visual tag of priority. But as with Jacob and Esau, the marked one will not prevail. The scarlet thread becomes a sign of the overturned birthright.
28. 'This one came out first' — the midwife's declaration attempts to fix the birth order. But the divine pattern of Genesis repeatedly subverts human expectations of primogeniture: Ishmael and Isaac, Esau and Jacob, and now Zerah and Perez.
29. 'What a breach you have made for yourself!' (mah-paratsta alekha parets) — the exclamation plays on the name Perez (Parets), from the root p-r-ts ('to break through, to breach'). The child who was not marked as firstborn breaks through ahead of his brother — a forceful, disruptive entry into the world. The breach overturns the expected order.
29. 'Perez' (Parets) — the name means 'breach, breaking forth.' Perez becomes the ancestor of David (Ruth 4:18-22) and appears in the genealogy of Jesus (Matt 1:3; Luke 3:33). Through this child of an irregular union — born of Judah's failure and Tamar's desperate justice — the royal and messianic line proceeds. God's purposes advance through the most unlikely and morally complex circumstances.
30. 'Zerah' (Zerach) — the name likely derives from zarach ('to shine, to rise, to break forth as light'). It may relate to the brightness or redness of the scarlet thread, or to the dawn-like appearance of the hand emerging first. Despite being the one initially marked as firstborn, Zerah is superseded by Perez. The pattern of reversed primogeniture continues: God's election does not follow human expectations of birth order.
30. The chapter ends with the birth of twins who represent both judgment and hope. From Judah's moral failure, Tamar's courageous act, and a birth that defied expectations comes the line through which Israel's kings — and ultimately the Messiah — will descend. Genesis 38, often treated as a digression from the Joseph narrative, is in fact essential: it establishes the Judah-Tamar-Perez lineage that will prove central to the biblical story of redemption.

Summary: Joseph serves in the house of Potiphar, an Egyptian officer. The LORD is with Joseph, and everything he touches prospers. Potiphar's wife repeatedly attempts to seduce him; Joseph refuses, citing loyalty to his master and to God. She seizes his garment; he flees. She accuses him of assault, and Joseph is imprisoned — but the LORD remains with him there also.

What Makes This Remarkable: The refrain 'the LORD was with Joseph' (vv. 2, 3, 21, 23) is the theological spine of the chapter — divine presence persists through both prosperity and injustice. Joseph's refusal is framed as a sin against God, not merely against Potiphar: 'how could I do this great evil and sin against God?' (v. 9). The garment motif continues from chapter 37 — his father's robe was stripped by his brothers, now his Egyptian garment is stripped by his accuser. Clothing in the Joseph narrative consistently marks identity, status, and deception.

Translation Friction: Potiphar's wife's repeated advances are described with the terse verb vatitpesehu ('she seized him,' v. 12), from taphas — a verb of forceful, physical grasping. We rendered it directly. Joseph's flight, leaving his garment behind, creates a legal fiction: the garment becomes false evidence, and its Hebrew description echoes the robe of chapter 37. The parallel between losing garments and gaining integrity is a theme that resists explicit statement and works through narrative silence.

Connections: The pattern of false accusation and unjust imprisonment parallels Daniel's experience in Babylon (Daniel 6). Joseph in prison anticipates Moses' exile (Exodus 2:15) — both men are prepared for leadership through suffering. The phrase 'the LORD was with him' becomes a marker of the chosen: it is said of Isaac (26:3), Jacob (28:15), and later of David (1 Samuel 16:18).

1Now Joseph had been brought down to Egypt, and Potiphar, an officer of Pharaoh, the captain of the guard, an Egyptian man, purchased him from the hand of the Ishmaelites who had brought him down there. 2The LORD was with Joseph, and he became a man who prospered, and he was in the house of his master the Egyptian. 3His master saw that the LORD was with him and that the LORD caused everything he did to prosper in his hand. 4Joseph found favor in his sight and served him. He appointed him overseer over his house, and all that he had he placed in his hand. 5From the time he appointed him over his house and over all that he had, the LORD blessed the Egyptian's house on account of Joseph. The blessing of the LORD was upon all that he had, in the house and in the field. ⁶He left all that he had in Joseph's hand, and he did not concern himself with anything except the food that he ate. Now Joseph was handsome in form and handsome in appearance. ⁷It happened after these things that his master's wife lifted up her eyes toward Joseph and said, "Lie with me." ⁸But he refused, and said to his master's wife, "Look, my master does not concern himself with anything in the house alongside me, and all that he has he has placed in my hand. ⁹No one in this house is greater than I am, and he has withheld nothing from me except you, because you are his wife. How then could I do this great evil and sin against God?" ¹⁰Though she spoke to Joseph day after day, he would not listen to her, to lie beside her or to be with her. ¹¹On a certain day he went into the house to do his work, and none of the men of the household were there in the house. ¹²She seized him by his garment, saying, "Lie with me!" But he left his garment in her hand and fled and went outside. ¹³When she saw that he had left his garment in her hand and had fled outside, ¹⁴she called to the men of her household and said to them, "See, he has brought a Hebrew man to us to mock us! He came in to me to lie with me, and I cried out with a loud voice. ¹⁵When he heard that I lifted up my voice and cried out, he left his garment beside me and fled and went outside." ¹⁶She kept his garment beside her until his master came home. ¹⁷She spoke to him according to these words, saying, "The Hebrew servant whom you brought to us came in to me to mock me. ¹⁸When I lifted up my voice and cried out, he left his garment beside me and fled outside." ¹⁹When his master heard the words of his wife, which she spoke to him, saying, "These are the things your servant did to me," his anger burned. ²⁰Joseph's master took him and put him into the prison, the place where the king's prisoners were held. And he remained there in the prison. ²¹But the LORD was with Joseph and extended faithful love to him, and gave him favor in the eyes of the keeper of the prison. ²²The keeper of the prison placed in Joseph's hand all the prisoners who were in the prison, and whatever was done there, he was the one who did it. ²³The keeper of the prison did not concern himself with anything that was in Joseph's hand, because the LORD was with him, and whatever he did, the LORD made it prosper.

1. 'Had been brought down' (hurad) — the Hophal passive of yarad ('to descend'). Joseph does not go down to Egypt willingly; he is taken down. The verb echoes Judah's voluntary descent in 38:1 (vayyered), creating an ironic contrast: Judah descends by choice into moral compromise, while Joseph descends by force into a place of testing and eventual exaltation.
2. 'Officer' (seris) — this term can mean 'eunuch' or more broadly 'court official.' In many ancient Near Eastern contexts, high-ranking courtiers were eunuchs, but the word had generalized to mean any royal officer. Since Potiphar has a wife, the broader sense of 'officer' is appropriate here, though the ambiguity is part of the Hebrew text.
3. 'Captain of the guard' (sar hattabbachim) — literally 'chief of the slaughterers' or 'chief of the executioners.' The term tabbachim derives from tabach ('to slaughter'), suggesting this was originally a title connected to the royal butchery or execution detail, though by this period it denoted the captain of the royal bodyguard.
4. 'The LORD was with Joseph' (vayehi YHWH et-Yosef) — this is the theological thesis statement of the entire chapter. The phrase appears at both the beginning (v. 2) and end (v. 21, 23) of the chapter, forming a literary inclusio. Despite Joseph's enslavement, the narrator insists that the LORD's presence is the decisive factor in his circumstances.
5. 'A man who prospered' (ish matsliach) — from the Hiphil of tsalach, meaning to cause to prosper, to succeed, to advance. The term implies not merely personal success but divine causation — Joseph prospers because the LORD makes him prosper. The same root appears in v. 3 and v. 23, binding the chapter together.
6. 'His master saw' (vayyar adonav) — remarkably, Potiphar, a pagan Egyptian, perceives the presence of Israel's God with Joseph. The text does not explain how he reached this conclusion — whether through Joseph's testimony, through the observable pattern of blessing, or through some other means. The narrator presents it as simple fact: the LORD's favor on Joseph was visible even to an outsider.
7. 'The LORD caused everything he did to prosper in his hand' — the repeated use of YHWH (the covenant name of God) in an Egyptian context is theologically significant. The God of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob is not confined to the land of Canaan; His sovereignty extends over Egypt as well.
8. 'Found favor' (matsa chen) — the phrase echoes Noah (6:8), who 'found favor in the eyes of the LORD.' Joseph finds favor in the eyes of a human master, foreshadowing the greater favor he will find with Pharaoh himself. The word chen ('grace, favor') implies an undeserved, gracious disposition toward the recipient.
9. 'Appointed him overseer' (vayyafqidehu) — from paqad, 'to appoint, to set over, to entrust.' The Hiphil form emphasizes Potiphar's active decision to place Joseph in authority. This is the first of Joseph's three elevations (Potiphar's house, prison, Pharaoh's court), each following the same pattern: faithful service leading to entrusted authority.

5. 'The LORD blessed the Egyptian's house on account of Joseph' (vayevarekh YHWH et-beit hamMitsri biglal Yosef) — this fulfills the Abrahamic promise that through Abraham's seed the nations would be blessed (12:3). Even in slavery, Joseph serves as a conduit of covenant blessing to a Gentile household. The phrase biglal ('on account of, for the sake of') makes the causal connection explicit.
5. 'In the house and in the field' (babayit uvasadeh) — the totality of the blessing is emphasized through this merism. Every domain of Potiphar's life — domestic and agricultural — comes under divine blessing through Joseph.
6. 'He did not concern himself with anything except the food that he ate' — the phrase ki im-hallechem asher-hu okhel is often explained as a reference to Egyptian dietary restrictions that prohibited them from eating with foreigners (cf. 43:32). Potiphar retained control only over his personal food consumption, either for reasons of ritual purity or personal custom.
6. 'Handsome in form and handsome in appearance' (yefeh-to'ar viyfeh mar'eh) — this exact phrase is used of only one other person in Genesis: Rachel, Joseph's mother (29:17). The literary echo is deliberate, connecting mother and son. Tragically, Joseph's beauty — like Rachel's — becomes a source of both attraction and complication. This description is placed here as a narrative hinge: it explains what follows in v. 7.
6. The verse functions as a transition. The first half concludes the account of Joseph's rise in Potiphar's house; the second half, with its notice of Joseph's beauty, introduces the crisis that follows.
7. 'Lifted up her eyes' (vattissa et-eineiha) — the Hebrew idiom describes a deliberate, purposeful gaze. It is the same expression used when Abraham 'lifts his eyes' to see Mount Moriah (22:4) or Lot 'lifts his eyes' to see the well-watered Jordan plain (13:10). Here, the gaze is one of desire and intent.
7. 'Lie with me' (shikhvah immi) — the bluntness of the command in Hebrew is striking. There is no prelude, no flattery, no negotiation — only a two-word imperative. The narrator's economy conveys the brazenness of the demand. Potiphar's wife is unnamed throughout, identified only by her relation to Joseph's master, keeping the focus on the moral dynamics.
8. 'He refused' (vayema'en) — the verb stands emphatically at the head of the sentence, before any explanation. Joseph's refusal is immediate and decisive, not the product of deliberation. The same verb (ma'en) describes Pharaoh's later refusal to release Israel (Exodus 7:14), but here it is used of righteous resistance rather than stubborn rebellion.
8. Joseph's defense is structured in three layers: (1) the trust his master has placed in him (v. 8), (2) the unique position of the wife as the one thing withheld from him (v. 9a), and (3) the theological dimension — sin against God (v. 9b). The argument moves from the relational to the covenantal.
9. 'This great evil' (hara'ah hagedolah hazzot) — Joseph does not minimize the act as a minor transgression. He calls it what it is: a great evil. The word ra'ah encompasses wickedness, harm, and moral evil. Joseph perceives adultery not merely as a violation of social convention but as a fundamental moral offense.
9. 'Sin against God' (vechatati l'Elohim) — the climax of Joseph's refusal. Remarkably, Joseph frames the sin not primarily in terms of betraying Potiphar's trust (though that is acknowledged) but in terms of offending God. The use of Elohim (rather than YHWH) may reflect Joseph's awareness that he is speaking to an Egyptian; alternatively, it may simply express the universal moral dimension of the act. Either way, Joseph recognizes a divine moral order that transcends human relationships.
9. Joseph's reasoning follows the logic of covenant faithfulness: because God is sovereign over all human affairs, every moral choice is ultimately a choice before God. This theological awareness distinguishes Joseph from his brothers, who sold him without apparent regard for divine judgment.
10. 'Day after day' (yom yom) — the repetition conveys persistent, unrelenting pressure. This was not a single moment of temptation but a sustained campaign of seduction. Joseph's resistance was not a one-time act of will but a daily, disciplined refusal.
10. 'To lie beside her or to be with her' (lishkav etshah lihyot immah) — the Hebrew distinguishes two things Joseph refused: (1) sexual contact ('to lie beside her') and (2) even being in her presence ('to be with her'). Joseph recognized the danger of proximity and avoided situations that could lead to compromise. This detail reflects practical wisdom, not mere moral abstraction.
11. 'On a certain day' (kehayom hazzeh) — literally 'about this day' or 'on such a day as this.' The phrase marks a turning point in the narrative, shifting from the general pattern (day after day) to a specific, decisive moment.
11. 'To do his work' (la'asot melakhto) — Joseph enters the house for legitimate purposes, faithfully attending to his duties. The narrator makes clear that Joseph was not seeking out Potiphar's wife. Some rabbinic interpreters debated the meaning of 'his work,' but the plain sense is simply his household responsibilities.
11. 'None of the men of the household were there' — the narrator sets the scene with ominous precision. The absence of witnesses creates the conditions for the wife's assault and her subsequent fabrication.
12. 'She seized him by his garment' (vattipesehu bevigdo) — the verb taphas means to seize, grab, or catch. This is a physical assault. The garment (begeh) becomes a pivotal object in the narrative — left behind as false evidence. The word begeh is noteworthy because the same root means 'treachery' or 'betrayal' (cf. the verb bagad). The garment that should attest to Joseph's innocence is twisted into evidence of his guilt, a garment of treachery.
12. 'He fled and went outside' (vayyanas vayyetse hachutsah) — Joseph's flight is not cowardice but moral courage. He chooses integrity over comfort, freedom over compromise. The rapid succession of verbs (fled, went out) conveys urgency and decisiveness.

12. The parallel to Joseph's coat in chapter 37 is striking: there, Joseph's garment was stripped from him by his brothers and used as false evidence before Jacob; here, his garment is stripped by Potiphar's wife and used as false evidence before Potiphar. In both cases, the garment testifies falsely against him.
13. This transitional verse shows the wife calculating her next move. The moment she realizes she holds physical evidence — the garment — she recognizes its potential as a weapon. What was meant to trap Joseph into sin now becomes a tool to frame him for a crime he refused to commit.
14. 'A Hebrew man' (ish ivri) — she identifies Joseph by his ethnicity, deploying it as a slur to inflame the household servants' prejudice. The term ivri ('Hebrew') emphasizes Joseph's foreignness in an Egyptian context. By saying 'he brought' (hevi), she blames Potiphar himself for introducing this 'outsider,' attempting to align the servants' resentment against both Joseph and, subtly, her husband.
14. 'To mock us' (letsacheq banu) — the verb tsachaq ('to laugh, to play, to mock') is loaded with sexual overtones in Genesis. It is the same root as Isaac's name (Yitschaq) and was used of Ishmael's behavior toward Isaac (21:9). In 26:8, it describes Isaac 'caressing' (metsacheq) Rebekah. The wife uses this verb ambiguously — it can mean 'to sport with' or 'to make a fool of' — to suggest both sexual assault and public humiliation.
14. Note her manipulation: she shifts from 'he came to me' (singular) to 'to mock us' (plural), enlisting the household servants as fellow victims to gain their solidarity.
15. She constructs a narrative in which Joseph's flight — actually evidence of his innocence — becomes evidence of guilt. The garment left 'beside me' (etsli) is presented as proof that he was in intimate proximity. Her account reverses the causation: in her telling, Joseph fled because she screamed; in reality, she screamed because he fled. The truth is exactly inverted.
16. 'She kept his garment beside her' (vattannach bigdo etslah) — the verb nuach in the Hiphil means 'to place, to set down, to lay aside.' She preserves the garment as evidence, holding it like a prosecutor waiting for the judge. The deliberateness of her action — keeping it 'until his master came home' — reveals calculated planning, not the distress of a victim.
17. 'The Hebrew servant' (ha'eved ha'ivri) — note the escalation from 'a Hebrew man' (v. 14, speaking to servants) to 'the Hebrew servant' (speaking to Potiphar). When addressing the servants, she used 'man' (ish), appealing to their sense of shared vulnerability; when addressing Potiphar, she uses 'servant' (eved), emphasizing Joseph's inferior status and implying that Potiphar should be outraged that someone so low would dare approach his wife.
17. 'Whom you brought to us' (asher heveta lanu) — she explicitly blames Potiphar for Joseph's presence, making her husband complicit in the alleged offense. This is a manipulative rhetorical strategy: by implicating Potiphar, she pressures him to act decisively to absolve himself of responsibility.
18. The repetition of her account — nearly verbatim from v. 15 — is a deliberate narrative technique. The rehearsed quality of the testimony reveals its fabricated nature. A genuine victim might vary in retelling; a liar repeats a prepared script. The narrator lets the reader perceive the deception through the very precision of her words.
19. 'His anger burned' (vayichar appo) — literally 'his nostril burned.' The Hebrew idiom for anger uses the image of a flaring nostril — the physical sign of fury. The expression is used frequently of God's anger (cf. Exodus 4:14; Numbers 11:1) and of human rage. Potiphar's reaction is immediate and visceral.
19. Some interpreters note that Potiphar's response — imprisonment rather than execution — may suggest he harbored doubts about his wife's story. Under Egyptian law, the penalty for sexual assault on a married woman was death. That Joseph was only imprisoned may indicate that Potiphar suspected the truth but could not publicly side with a slave against his wife. This is textually ambiguous, however, and the narrator does not comment on Potiphar's inner reasoning.
20. 'The prison' (bet hassohar) — literally 'the house of roundness' or 'the round house,' perhaps reflecting the architectural shape of the facility. This was not an ordinary jail but a royal prison where the king's own prisoners were confined. Providentially, this placement will bring Joseph into contact with Pharaoh's cupbearer and baker (chapter 40), advancing the divine plan.
20. 'The king's prisoners' (asirei hammelek) — Joseph is placed among political detainees, not common criminals. This is significant: it places him in the orbit of Pharaoh's court, positioning him for the encounters that will ultimately lead to his exaltation. What appears as a further descent is actually a step toward fulfillment of the dreams.
21. 'The LORD was with Joseph' (vayehi YHWH et-Yosef) — the refrain returns, now in the context of imprisonment. The narrator's insistence on divine presence in the darkest circumstances is the theological heartbeat of the Joseph narrative. The LORD was with him in Potiphar's house (v. 2); the LORD is with him in prison (v. 21). The location changes; the presence does not.
21. 'Extended steadfast love to him' (vayyet elav chesed) — the verb natah ('to stretch out, extend, incline') combined with chesed creates a powerful image: God actively reaches toward Joseph with covenant love. Chesed is one of the richest words in the Hebrew Bible — it encompasses loyalty, faithfulness, kindness, and covenantal commitment. It is not mere pity but purposeful, enduring love rooted in relationship.
21. 'Gave him favor' (vayyitten chinno) — literally 'gave his grace.' The same pattern as v. 4 (Joseph found favor with Potiphar), now repeated with the prison keeper. The cycle of divine favor leading to human trust begins again.
22. The pattern from Potiphar's house repeats exactly in the prison: Joseph is given total authority and responsibility. The narrator draws this parallel deliberately to show that Joseph's character and God's blessing operate consistently regardless of circumstance. Whether in a wealthy household or a royal prison, Joseph rises to leadership because the LORD is with him.

22. 'Whatever was done there, he was the one who did it' (ve'et kol-asher osim sham hu hayah oseh) — this emphatic construction underscores Joseph's complete administrative authority. The prison keeper, like Potiphar before him, delegates everything to Joseph.
23. The chapter ends exactly as it began — with the declaration that 'the LORD was with him' (YHWH itto) and 'the LORD made it prosper' (YHWH matsliach). This inclusio (literary bookend) frames the entire chapter within the theology of divine presence. Between the opening and closing statements, Joseph has been tempted, falsely accused, and imprisoned — yet the narrator's verdict remains unchanged. The LORD's presence and Joseph's prosperity are not dependent on favorable circumstances but on the covenant faithfulness of God.
23. 'The LORD made it prosper' (YHWH matsliach) — the final word of the chapter is matsliach ('causing to prosper'), the same word used in v. 2. Despite everything — betrayal by brothers, enslavement, false accusation, imprisonment — the chapter's last word is prosperity. Not Joseph's prosperity in human terms, but God's sovereign capacity to bring fruitfulness out of suffering.

Summary: Pharaoh's cupbearer and baker are imprisoned alongside Joseph. Both dream on the same night. Joseph insists that interpretations belong to God and correctly interprets both dreams: the cupbearer will be restored in three days; the baker will be hanged. Events unfold exactly as Joseph said. But the cupbearer forgets Joseph.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joseph's claim 'Do not interpretations belong to God?' (v. 8) establishes the theological principle governing all dream interpretation in Genesis: human wisdom does not decode the future; God reveals it. The parallel structure of the two dreams — both involving three (branches/baskets), both interpreted within three days, both involving Pharaoh 'lifting the head' — but with opposite outcomes creates exquisite narrative tension. The phrase 'he forgot him' (v. 23) is the chapter's final word and its cruelest irony: the man whose gift is remembering (God's future) is himself forgotten.

Translation Friction: The idiom 'to lift up the head' (nasa et-rosh) is used with double meaning: for the cupbearer it means restoration to honor (v. 13); for the baker it means removal of his head from his body (v. 19). The same phrase with opposite outcomes is a Hebrew wordplay that English can only partially reproduce. We rendered both instances with 'lift up your head' and let the context differentiate their meanings.

Connections: Joseph's dream interpretation anticipates Daniel's role in the Babylonian court (Daniel 2:27-28). The cupbearer's forgetfulness delays Joseph's liberation but positions him for the right moment — Pharaoh's own dreams (ch. 41). Joseph's plea to be remembered (40:14) uses the verb zakhar, the same verb used when God 'remembers' his people (8:1; 19:29; 30:22).

1It happened after these things that the cupbearer of the king of Egypt and the baker offended their lord, the king of Egypt. 2Pharaoh was angry with his two officers, with the chief cupbearer and with the chief baker. 3He placed them in custody in the house of the captain of the guard, in the prison, the place where Joseph was confined. 4The captain of the guard assigned Joseph to attend them, and he served them. They remained for some time in custody. 5Both of them dreamed a dream on the same night, each his own dream with its own interpretation — the cupbearer and the baker of the king of Egypt who were confined in the prison. 6Joseph came to them in the morning and saw them, and they were troubled. 7He asked Pharaoh's officers who were with him in custody in his master's house, saying, "Why are your faces downcast today?" 8They said to him, "We have dreamed a dream, and there is no one to interpret it." Joseph said to them, "Do not interpretations belong to God? Please, tell them to me." 9The chief cupbearer told his dream to Joseph and said to him, "In my dream, behold, a vine was before me. 10On the vine were three branches. As it budded, its blossoms came up, and its clusters ripened into grapes. 11Pharaoh's cup was in my hand. I took the grapes and pressed them into Pharaoh's cup and placed the cup on Pharaoh's palm." 12Joseph said to him, "This is its interpretation: the three branches are three days. 13Within three days Pharaoh will lift up your head and restore you to your position, and you will place Pharaoh's cup in his hand according to the former practice when you were his cupbearer. 14Only remember me when it goes well for you, and please show kindness to me: mention me to Pharaoh and bring me out of this house. 15For indeed I was stolen — stolen away from the land of the Hebrews, and here also I have done nothing that they should have put me in the pit. 16When the chief baker saw that the interpretation was favorable, he said to Joseph, "I also — in my dream, behold, three baskets of white bread were on my head. ¹⁷In the uppermost basket were all kinds of baked food for Pharaoh, and the birds were eating them from the basket on my head." ¹⁸Joseph answered and said, "This is its interpretation: the three baskets are three days. ¹⁹Within three days Pharaoh will lift up your head from upon you and hang you on a tree, and the birds will eat your flesh from upon you." ²⁰On the third day, which was Pharaoh's birthday, he made a feast for all his servants. He lifted up the head of the chief cupbearer and the head of the chief baker among his servants. ²¹He restored the chief cupbearer to his position, and he placed the cup on Pharaoh's palm. ²²But the chief baker he hanged — just as Joseph had interpreted to them. ²³Yet the chief cupbearer did not remember Joseph; he forgot him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'The cupbearer' (mashqeh) — literally 'the one who gives drink.' This was a position of extraordinary trust in the ancient Near East. The royal cupbearer tasted the king's wine to ensure it was not poisoned and had intimate access to the monarch. The position conferred significant political influence — far more than the English word 'butler' (KJV) suggests.
1. 'The baker' (ha'ofeh) — from the root afah ('to bake'). Like the cupbearer, the royal baker held a position of trust, responsible for the king's food. Both men had direct access to what Pharaoh consumed, making any 'offense' potentially a matter of life and death — poisoning was a constant fear of ancient rulers.
1. 'Offended' (chat'u) — the verb chata means 'to sin, to miss the mark, to offend.' The same word used for sin against God is here used for an offense against Pharaoh. The nature of their offense is not specified — the narrator's interest lies in the consequences, not the crime.
2. 'Was angry' (vayiqtsaf) — from qatsaf, a strong verb for wrath, often used of royal or divine fury. Pharaoh's anger is decisive and consequential — it results in imprisonment and ultimately in the execution of one of the two men.
2. 'His two officers' (shenei sarisav) — the word saris ('officer') is the same term used of Potiphar in 39:1. These are high-ranking court officials, not minor servants. Their titles — 'chief cupbearer' (sar hamashqim) and 'chief baker' (sar ha'ofim) — indicate they headed entire departments of the royal household.
3. 'In custody' (bemishmar) — from shamar ('to guard, to keep'). The word denotes a place of guarded confinement, a holding facility under the authority of the captain of the guard.
3. 'The house of the captain of the guard' (bet sar hattabbachim) — this is Potiphar's jurisdiction (cf. 39:1). The prison where Joseph is held falls under the authority of his former master. The narrator connects the two stories explicitly: the same household that unjustly imprisoned Joseph now places Pharaoh's disgraced officers in Joseph's care.
3. 'The place where Joseph was confined' (maqom asher Yosef asur sham) — the narrator ensures the reader understands this is no coincidence. Divine providence arranges for these specific officials — men with direct access to Pharaoh — to be placed in the exact location where Joseph can serve them and demonstrate his God-given gift.
4. 'Assigned Joseph to attend them' (vayyifqod... et-Yosef ittam) — from paqad, the same root used in 39:4 when Potiphar appointed Joseph overseer. Joseph's role continues to be one of trusted service, even in prison. The captain of the guard (Potiphar himself, or his successor) assigns Joseph to personally attend these high-ranking prisoners.
4. 'They remained for some time' (vayiyhu yamim) — literally 'they were days.' The Hebrew yamim ('days') is deliberately vague, suggesting an indefinite period — perhaps weeks or months. The ambiguity mirrors the uncertainty of the prisoners' situation: they do not know what Pharaoh will decide.
5. 'Both of them dreamed a dream on the same night' — the simultaneity of the dreams signals divine orchestration. In the ancient Near East, dreams were widely regarded as messages from the divine realm. That both officials dream on the same night, and that both dreams prove to be prophetically accurate, points to a sovereign hand behind the events.
5. 'Each his own dream with its own interpretation' (ish chalomo... ish kefitron chalomo) — the Hebrew emphasizes individuality: each man had his own dream, and each dream carried its own distinct interpretation. Though they dream on the same night, their fates will diverge dramatically — one to restoration, one to death.
5. The theme of dreams connects this passage to Joseph's own dreams in chapter 37 and anticipates Pharaoh's dreams in chapter 41. Dreams function throughout the Joseph narrative as vehicles of divine revelation, accessible only through divine interpretation.
6. 'They were troubled' (vehinnam zo'afim) — the verb za'af means 'to be troubled, to be agitated, to look dejected.' It describes not mere sadness but visible distress — the kind of inner turmoil that shows on the face. Joseph notices their condition, demonstrating his attentiveness to those in his care. Even in prison, Joseph is not consumed by self-pity but remains alert to the needs of others.
7. 'Why are your faces downcast today?' (maddua peneikhem ra'im hayyom) — literally 'why are your faces evil/bad today?' The adjective ra'im (from ra, 'bad, evil') is used here in its sense of 'troubled, unhappy, grim.' The same word that describes moral evil can describe the appearance of distress on a human face.

7. 'In his master's house' (bet adonav) — the reference to 'his master' (adonav) recalls the setting: Joseph is still under the authority of Potiphar (or his successor as captain of the guard). The detail reinforces the irony of Joseph's situation — serving faithfully in the very household where he was falsely condemned.
8. 'There is no one to interpret it' (ufoter ein oto) — in Egypt, dream interpretation was a professional discipline practiced by trained magicians and wise men (cf. 41:8). In prison, the officials have no access to these professional interpreters, leaving them in despair. Their helplessness creates the opening for Joseph — and for God.
8. 'Do not interpretations belong to God?' (halo l'Elohim pitronot) — this is Joseph's theological thesis: the ability to interpret dreams is not a human skill but a divine gift. The rhetorical question (introduced by halo, 'is it not?') expects an affirmative answer: yes, interpretations belong to God alone. Joseph uses Elohim (the universal name for God) rather than YHWH, appropriate when speaking to Egyptians. Yet the claim is radical: Joseph asserts that the God of the Hebrews holds the key to Egyptian dreams.
8. 'Please, tell them to me' (sapperu-na li) — having directed all credit to God, Joseph then offers himself as the human instrument. The na ('please, I pray') is a particle of courteous request. Joseph does not claim personal authority; he positions himself as a conduit of divine revelation.
9. 'A vine' (gefen) — the grapevine is a rich symbol in the Hebrew Bible, later associated with Israel itself (cf. Psalm 80:8; Isaiah 5:1–7). In this Egyptian context, the vine represents the cupbearer's occupation and serves as the medium of divine communication. The dream speaks in the language of the dreamer's own life and work.
10. 'Three branches' (sheloshah sarigim) — the number three is the interpretive key to the dream: three branches correspond to three days (v. 12). The word sarig ('branch, tendril') occurs only here and in Joel 1:7 in the Hebrew Bible, a rare botanical term that adds vividness to the dream's imagery.
10. 'As it budded, its blossoms came up, and its clusters ripened into grapes' — the dream compresses an entire growing season into a single, accelerating sequence: budding blossoming ripening. The rapid progression suggests speed and inevitability — the events foretold will unfold swiftly and surely.
11. 'Pressed them into Pharaoh's cup' (va'eschat otam el-kos Par'oh) — the verb sachat means 'to squeeze, to press.' The cupbearer dreams of performing his characteristic duty: preparing and serving Pharaoh's drink. The dream's content reflects his professional role, and the act of placing the cup 'on Pharaoh's palm' (al-kaf Par'oh) symbolizes the direct, personal service that defines the cupbearer's relationship with the king.
11. The threefold repetition of 'Pharaoh' in this single verse (Pharaoh's cup... Pharaoh's cup... Pharaoh's palm) underscores the cupbearer's entire identity as bound to royal service — and foreshadows his restoration to that service.
12. 'This is its interpretation' (zeh pitrono) — Joseph speaks with confident authority, grounded not in his own wisdom but in God's gift (cf. v. 8). He does not hedge or speculate; he declares. The interpretive method is symbolic correspondence: three branches equal three days.
12. The interpretive key — elements in the dream correspond to units of time — anticipates Pharaoh's dreams in chapter 41, where seven cows and seven ears of grain will correspond to seven years.
13. 'Pharaoh will lift up your head' (yissa Par'oh et-roshekha) — this idiom means to show favor, to grant an audience, to elevate someone's status. In ancient Near Eastern court protocol, a prisoner or supplicant would bow low; to 'lift up the head' was to grant recognition and restoration. This exact phrase will be used with devastating irony in v. 19 for the baker, with the devastating addition 'from upon you.'
13. 'Restore you to your position' (vashivekha al-kannekha) — from shuv ('to return') in the Hiphil: 'to cause to return.' The word ken (literally 'base, stand, pedestal') metaphorically refers to one's established position or office. The cupbearer will be returned to his former station.
13. 'According to the former practice' (kamishpat harishon) — mishpat here means 'custom, manner, established procedure' rather than 'judgment.' The cupbearer will resume his duties exactly as before, as if the imprisonment never happened.
14. 'Remember me' (zekhartani) — the verb zakhar ('to remember') is loaded with theological weight in the Hebrew Bible. To remember is not merely to recall cognitively but to act on that recollection. When God 'remembers' Noah (8:1) or Rachel (30:22), it means He acts on their behalf. Joseph asks the cupbearer not just to think of him but to act for him. The tragic irony of v. 23 — 'he did not remember' (lo-zakhar) — reverberates against this plea.
14. 'Show kindness to me' (ve'asita-na immadi chesed) — Joseph uses the word chesed, the same term used of God's steadfast love toward Joseph in 39:21. He asks for human chesed — faithful, loyal kindness — from a fellow prisoner. The request is modest and reasonable; its failure (v. 23) will be devastating.
14. 'Mention me to Pharaoh' (vehizkartani el-Par'oh) — another form of zakhar ('to remember, to mention, to bring to remembrance'). Joseph asks for two acts: internal remembering and external mentioning. He needs the cupbearer both to recall his situation and to speak on his behalf.
14. Register departure: chesed rendered here in a human-to-human request context — Joseph asks a fellow prisoner for personal favor, not invoking covenant obligation.
15. 'I was stolen — stolen away' (gunnov gunnabti) — the infinitive absolute construction (gunnov gunnabti) intensifies the verb: 'I was indeed stolen, utterly stolen.' Joseph uses this emphatic form to underscore the injustice of his situation. He does not name his brothers or describe the specifics of his sale — a notable restraint. He simply states the fact of his kidnapping.

15. 'The land of the Hebrews' (erets ha'Ivrim) — this is the earliest biblical reference to Canaan as 'the land of the Hebrews.' Joseph identifies himself with his people and their land, even after years in Egypt. He has not assimilated; he knows where he belongs.
15. 'The pit' (bor) — the same word used for the cistern into which his brothers threw him (37:24). The linguistic echo connects Joseph's two unjust imprisonments: the cistern in Canaan and the dungeon in Egypt. In both cases, he is innocent; in both cases, he is cast into a bor. The word also evokes the grave or Sheol, deepening the sense of Joseph's descent.
15. 'I have done nothing' (lo asiti me'umah) — Joseph protests his total innocence. He was stolen from Canaan (not sold as a criminal); he did nothing in Potiphar's house to deserve imprisonment. Joseph stands before God and men as blameless — yet he suffers. The narrative raises the question of theodicy without resolving it, trusting the reader to see God's hidden hand.
16. 'Saw that the interpretation was favorable' (vayyar... ki tov patar) — the baker is encouraged by the positive outcome of the cupbearer's dream and steps forward to share his own, hoping for a similar verdict. The word tov ('good, favorable') reveals his motive: he speaks because the first interpretation was favorable, not because he trusts the interpreter. This is a fateful miscalculation.
16. 'Three baskets of white bread' (sheloshah sallei chori) — the word chori is debated. It may mean 'white bread' (from chur, 'white'), 'perforated bread' (from chor, 'hole'), or 'baked goods' in a general sense. The traditional rendering 'white baskets' (KJV) takes chori as describing the baskets rather than their contents, but the context of a baker's dream suggests the adjective modifies the bread. The three baskets, like the three branches, will correspond to three days.
17. 'All kinds of baked food for Pharaoh' (mikkol ma'akhal Par'oh ma'aseh ofeh) — literally 'from every food of Pharaoh, the work of a baker.' The top basket contained the finest royal provisions — the baker's own handiwork. Yet in the dream, this food is devoured by birds, signifying that the baker will no longer serve Pharaoh.
17. 'The birds were eating them from the basket on my head' — the birds consuming the food from the baker's head is the ominous element. In the cupbearer's dream, the dreamer actively serves Pharaoh (pressing grapes, placing the cup); in the baker's dream, the dreamer is passive while birds consume what should be served to Pharaoh. The baker cannot protect or deliver his goods — he has lost control. The birds foreshadow the fate described in v. 19: birds will eat his flesh.
18. 'Joseph answered and said' (vayya'an Yosef vayyomer) — the paired verbs 'answered and said' (a common Hebrew narrative formula) here carry weight: Joseph must deliver news he knows the baker does not want to hear. He does not soften or delay — he interprets faithfully, whether the message brings joy or doom. The interpreter's fidelity to the divine message transcends personal preference.
18. The interpretive framework is identical to the cupbearer's dream: three objects (baskets) equal three days. The structural parallel heightens the contrast between the two outcomes.
19. 'Pharaoh will lift up your head from upon you' (yissa Par'oh et-roshkha me'alekha) — this is one of the most chilling wordplays in all of Scripture. The phrase begins identically to v. 13 — 'Pharaoh will lift up your head' — raising the baker's hope for a split second before the devastating addition: 'from upon you' (me'alekha). The same idiom that meant 'to show favor' now means 'to decapitate' or 'to remove your head from your body.' The reader who heard the first interpretation now hears the same words twisted into a death sentence.
19. 'Hang you on a tree' (vetalah otekha al-ets) — impalement or public display of the body after execution was a common practice in the ancient Near East. The 'tree' (ets) could be a stake or a wooden pole. The public display served as a deterrent and a sign of royal power.
19. 'The birds will eat your flesh' — this gruesome detail connects back to the dream: the birds that ate baked goods from the basket on the baker's head will eat his flesh from his body. The dream's symbolism resolves with horrifying literalness. What seemed like a minor nuisance (birds eating bread) proves to be a portent of death.
20. 'Pharaoh's birthday' (yom hulledet et-Par'oh) — literally 'the day of the bearing of Pharaoh.' This is one of the earliest references to a birthday celebration in ancient literature. Egyptian records confirm that Pharaohs celebrated their birthdays with feasts and acts of royal clemency (or judgment). The birthday feast provides the occasion for the fulfillment of Joseph's interpretations.
20. 'He lifted up the head of the chief cupbearer and the head of the chief baker' — the narrator uses the ambiguous phrase 'lifted up the head' (vayyissa et-rosh) for both men simultaneously, maintaining the tension for one more verse. Only in vv. 21–22 will the reader learn which lifting was restoration and which was execution. The narrator masterfully sustains the wordplay from vv. 13 and 19.
21. 'He restored the chief cupbearer to his position' (vayyashev et-sar hamashqim al-mashqehu) — the verb shuv ('to return, to restore') in the Hiphil, exactly as Joseph predicted in v. 13. The cupbearer is returned to 'his cupbearing' (mashqehu), the very office from which he was removed.
21. 'He placed the cup on Pharaoh's palm' (vayyitten hakkos al-kaf Par'oh) — this detail echoes the cupbearer's dream (v. 11) almost verbatim. The dream is fulfilled with precise literalness, confirming Joseph's interpretation and, more fundamentally, confirming the divine source of that interpretation.
22. 'But the chief baker he hanged' (ve'et sar ha'ofim talah) — the sentence is stark and unadorned. No details of the execution are given beyond the single verb talah ('to hang, to impale'). The contrast with the cupbearer's restoration is absolute: one returns to life at court, the other is publicly executed.
22. 'Just as Joseph had interpreted to them' (ka'asher patar lahem Yosef) — the narrator's summary verdict. Both dreams were fulfilled exactly as Joseph had said, validating his claim that interpretations belong to God (v. 8). This phrase also prepares the reader for chapter 41, where Joseph will again interpret dreams — this time for Pharaoh — and again be proven correct.

- 23. 'Did not remember... forgot him' (lo-zakhar... vayyishkachehu) — the chapter's devastating final note. Two verbs of forgetting hammer the point: the cupbearer neither remembered (zakhar) nor failed to forget — he actively forgot (shakach). The double expression is emphatic redundancy: the cupbearer's failure is complete and thoroughgoing.
- 23. The wordplay with Joseph's plea in v. 14 is pointed and painful. Joseph asked: 'remember me' (zekhartani) and 'mention me' (vehizkartani). The cupbearer does neither. The verb zakhar that Joseph used in hope is now negated: lo-zakhar. The word Joseph used as a plea becomes the word of his continued imprisonment.
- 23. Theologically, the cupbearer's forgetfulness extends Joseph's suffering but also extends the divine timetable. Joseph will not leave prison through human remembrance but through divine orchestration — when Pharaoh himself dreams (chapter 41). Human faithlessness cannot thwart divine purpose; it can only delay and redirect the path by which that purpose is fulfilled.
- 23. The chapter ends with Joseph still in prison, still forgotten, still waiting. The reader is left in suspense — a narrative strategy that mirrors Joseph's own experience of prolonged, unexplained suffering. The resolution will come, but not yet.

Summary: Two full years later, Pharaoh dreams of seven fat cows devoured by seven lean cows, and seven plump ears of grain swallowed by seven thin ones. No one can interpret. The cupbearer remembers Joseph, who is rushed from prison. Joseph credits God, interprets the dreams as seven years of abundance followed by seven of famine, and proposes a plan. Pharaoh elevates Joseph to second-in-command over all Egypt.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joseph's repeated insistence — 'it is not in me; God will give Pharaoh a favorable answer' (v. 16) — is the theological heart of the chapter: human wisdom interprets nothing; God reveals. The transformation from prisoner to prince happens in a single day. Joseph's Egyptian name (Zaphenath-paneah) and Egyptian wife (Asenath, daughter of a priest of On) mark his complete integration into Egyptian society. His sons' names encode his theology: Manasseh ('God has made me forget my hardship') and Ephraim ('God has made me fruitful in the land of my affliction').

Translation Friction: Joseph's Egyptian name Zaphenath-paneah (v. 45) is of uncertain etymology — proposed meanings include 'God speaks and he lives' or 'the one who furnishes the sustenance of the land.' We transliterated it and noted the ambiguity. The phrase 'Pharaoh's dream is one' (v. 25) — the two dreams carry a single message — establishes a principle of doubled revelation as divine confirmation that appears elsewhere (cf. Pharaoh's doubling in v. 32, and Joseph's two dreams in ch. 37).

Connections: Joseph's elevation mirrors Daniel's rise in Nebuchadnezzar's court (Daniel 2:46-49). The signet ring, fine linen, and gold chain (41:42) echo the investiture of Mordecai (Esther 8:2, 15). The famine that drives Jacob's family to Egypt fulfills the prophecy of 15:13. Joseph at thirty (41:46) enters public service at the same age David begins to reign (2 Samuel 5:4).

¹It happened at the end of two full years that Pharaoh dreamed, and behold, he was standing by the Nile. ²And behold, seven cows came up out of the Nile, beautiful in appearance and fat in flesh, and they grazed among the reeds. ³And behold, seven other cows came up after them from the Nile, ugly in appearance and thin in flesh, and they stood beside the other cows on the bank of the Nile. ⁴The cows that were ugly in appearance and thin in flesh devoured the seven cows that were beautiful in appearance and fat. Then Pharaoh awoke. ⁵He fell asleep and dreamed a second time, and behold, seven ears of grain came up on a single stalk, plump and good. ⁶And behold, seven ears of grain, thin and scorched by the east wind, sprouted after them. ⁷The thin ears swallowed the seven plump and full ears. Then Pharaoh awoke, and behold — it was a dream. ⁸In the morning his spirit was troubled, so he sent and summoned all the magicians of Egypt and all its wise men. Pharaoh told them his dream, but there was no one who could interpret it for Pharaoh. ⁹Then the chief cupbearer spoke to Pharaoh, saying, "I call to mind my offenses today. ¹⁰Pharaoh was angry with his servants and placed me in custody in the house of the captain of the guard — both me and the chief baker. ¹¹We dreamed a dream on the same night, he and I; each of us dreamed according to the interpretation of his own dream. ¹²A Hebrew youth was there with us, a servant of the captain of the guard.

We told him our dreams, and he interpreted them for us — he interpreted each man's dream according to its meaning. ¹³It came about just as he interpreted for us — so it happened. I was restored to my position, and the other was hanged." ¹⁴Pharaoh sent and summoned Joseph, and they rushed him from the dungeon. He shaved and changed his garments and came before Pharaoh. ¹⁵Pharaoh said to Joseph, "I have dreamed a dream, and there is no one who can interpret it. But I have heard it said of you that you can hear a dream and interpret it." ¹⁶Joseph answered Pharaoh, saying, "It is not in me. God will give Pharaoh a favorable answer." ¹⁷Pharaoh said to Joseph, "In my dream, behold, I was standing on the bank of the Nile. ¹⁸And behold, seven cows came up from the Nile, fat in flesh and beautiful in form, and they grazed among the reeds. ¹⁹Then behold, seven other cows came up after them, wretched and very ugly in form and gaunt in flesh. I have never seen anything so bad in all the land of Egypt. ²⁰The gaunt and ugly cows devoured the first seven fat cows. ²¹They entered their bellies, but it could not be known that they had entered them, for their appearance was just as ugly as at the beginning. Then I awoke. ²²Then I saw in my dream, and behold, seven ears of grain came up on a single stalk, full and good. ²³And behold, seven ears of grain, shriveled, thin, and scorched by the east wind, sprouted after them. ²⁴The thin ears swallowed the seven good ears. I told this to the magicians, but there was no one who could explain it to me." ²⁵Joseph said to Pharaoh, "The dream of Pharaoh is one. What God is about to do, He has declared to Pharaoh. ²⁶The seven good cows are seven years, and the seven good ears of grain are seven years — the dream is one. ²⁷The seven thin and ugly cows that came up after them are seven years, and the seven empty ears scorched by the east wind will be seven years of famine. ²⁸This is the thing I have spoken to Pharaoh: what God is about to do, He has shown to Pharaoh. ²⁹Behold, seven years are coming of great abundance throughout all the land of Egypt. ³⁰Then seven years of famine will arise after them, and all the abundance will be forgotten in the land of Egypt, and the famine will consume the land. ³¹The abundance will not be known in the land because of the famine that follows, for it will be very severe. ³²As for the dream being repeated to Pharaoh twice — it is because the thing is established by God, and God will soon bring it about. ³³Now therefore, let Pharaoh seek out a man who is discerning and wise, and set him over the land of Egypt. ³⁴Let Pharaoh take action and appoint overseers over the land, and take a fifth of the produce of the land of Egypt during the seven years of abundance. ³⁵Let them collect all the food of these good years that are coming, and let them store up grain under the authority of Pharaoh as food in the cities, and guard it. ³⁶The food will serve as a reserve for the land against the seven years of famine that will occur in the land of Egypt, so that the land will not be cut off by the famine." ³⁷The proposal was good in the eyes of Pharaoh and in the eyes of all his servants. ³⁸Pharaoh said to his servants, "Can we find anyone like this — a man in whom is the Spirit of God?" ³⁹Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Since God has made all this known to you, there is no one as discerning and wise as you. ⁴⁰You shall be over my house, and all my people shall be governed by your command. Only with respect to the throne will I be greater than you." ⁴¹Pharaoh said to Joseph, "See, I have set you over all the land of Egypt." ⁴²Pharaoh removed his signet ring from his hand and placed it on Joseph's hand. He clothed him in garments of fine linen and placed a gold chain around his neck. ⁴³He had him ride in the second chariot that was his, and they cried out before him, "Avrekh!" Thus he set him over all the land of Egypt. ⁴⁴Pharaoh said to Joseph, "I am Pharaoh, and without your consent no one shall lift hand or foot in all the land of Egypt." ⁴⁵Pharaoh named Joseph Zaphenath-paneah and gave him Asenath, the daughter of Potiphera, priest of On, as his wife. Then Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt. ⁴⁶Joseph was thirty years old when he stood before Pharaoh king of Egypt. Joseph went out from Pharaoh's presence and traveled throughout all the land of Egypt. ⁴⁷During the seven years of abundance, the land produced in great handfuls. ⁴⁸He collected all the food of the seven years of abundance in the land of Egypt and stored the food in the cities. The produce of the fields surrounding each city he stored within it. ⁴⁹Joseph stored up grain like the sand of the sea, so very much that he stopped counting, for it was beyond measure. ⁵⁰Two sons were born to Joseph before the years of famine came, whom Asenath, the daughter of Potiphera, priest of On, bore to him. ⁵¹Joseph named the firstborn Manasseh, "For God has made me forget all my hardship and all my father's house." ⁵²The second he named Ephraim, "For God has made me fruitful in the land of my affliction." ⁵³The seven years of abundance that had been in the land of Egypt came to an end. ⁵⁴The seven years of famine began to come, just as Joseph had said. There was famine in all lands, but in all the land of Egypt there was bread. ⁵⁵When all the land of Egypt was famished, the people cried out to Pharaoh for bread. Pharaoh said to all Egypt, "Go to Joseph; whatever he says to you, do." ⁵⁶The famine spread over the whole face of the earth.

Joseph opened all the storehouses and sold grain to the Egyptians, for the famine was severe in the land of Egypt. ⁵⁷All the earth came to Egypt, to Joseph, to buy grain, for the famine was severe in all the earth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'At the end of two full years' (miqqets shenatayim yamim) — literally 'at the cutting off of two years of days.' The phrase shenatayim yamim emphasizes the fullness of the period. Two additional years pass after the cupbearer's release (40:23), during which Joseph remains forgotten in prison. The narrator marks this painful interval precisely.
1. 'The Nile' (hayy'or) — the Hebrew ye'or is an Egyptian loanword derived from the Egyptian itrw, referring specifically to the Nile River. The Nile was the lifeblood of Egypt — its annual flooding determined agricultural prosperity or famine. That Pharaoh's dream begins at the Nile signals its agricultural significance.
2. 'Beautiful in appearance and fat in flesh' (yefot mar'eh uvriot basar) — the two adjectives convey health and abundance. Fat cattle in the ancient Near East signified prosperity and adequate pastureland. The emphasis on their appearance foreshadows the contrasting ugliness of the second group.
2. 'Among the reeds' (ba'achu) — the word achu is another Egyptian loanword, referring to marsh grass or reeds along the Nile. The KJV's 'meadow' loses the Egyptian specificity. Cows grazing in Nile marshland was a quintessentially Egyptian scene.
3. 'Ugly in appearance and thin in flesh' (ra'ot mar'eh vedaqqot basar) — the exact inversion of the first group. Where the first cows were 'beautiful' (yefot) and 'fat' (beri'ot), these are 'ugly' (ra'ot) and 'thin' (daqqot). The deliberate contrast prepares for the interpretation: abundance versus famine.
3. 'Stood beside the other cows' — the two groups standing together on the Nile bank creates a surreal, dreamlike image that heightens the tension before the devouring.
4. 'Devoured' (vattokhlnah) — the spectacle of thin cows consuming fat ones is grotesque and unnatural, precisely the quality that makes it a divine dream rather than an ordinary one. The devouring is total — seven consume seven — yet as the retelling in v. 21 will reveal, the thin cows show no sign of having eaten.
4. Pharaoh awakes but will fall asleep again to receive the second dream (v. 5). The pattern of double dreams — two witnesses confirming one message — is a recurring motif in the Joseph narrative (cf. 37:5-9, 40:5).
5. 'Ears of grain' (shibbolim) — the KJV's 'ears of corn' reflects British English usage where 'corn' meant any cereal grain. The Hebrew shibbolim refers to the head or ear of a grain stalk, most likely wheat or barley in the Egyptian context.
5. 'On a single stalk' (beqaneh echad) — the number 'one' (echad) will become thematically significant when Joseph declares 'the dream of Pharaoh is one' (echad, v. 25). Seven ears on a single stalk is botanically unusual, marking this as a supernatural vision.
5. 'Plump and good' (beri'ot vetovot) — beri'ot ('healthy, fat') echoes the description of the fat cows. The parallel vocabulary between the two dreams reinforces their unified meaning.
6. 'Thin and scorched by the east wind' (daqqot ushedufot qadim) — the east wind (qadim) is the hot, dry sirocco blowing from the Arabian desert. In Egypt and the Levant, this wind could devastate crops in a matter of hours. The term shedufot ('scorched, blasted') describes grain withered beyond recovery.
6. The east wind is elsewhere associated with divine judgment (Exodus 14:21; Psalm 48:7; Jonah 4:8). Its appearance in Pharaoh's dream subtly signals that the coming famine is not mere natural disaster but a divinely ordained event.
7. 'Swallowed' (vattivla'nah) — from bala ('to swallow, engulf'). A different verb than 'devoured' (akhal) used of the cows. The thin ears swallow the healthy ones whole, an even more disturbing image than cows eating cows.
7. 'And behold — it was a dream' (vehinnech chalom) — this concluding phrase captures Pharaoh's disorientation upon waking. The vividness of the double dream has shaken him. The phrase also hints that though it was 'only' a dream, its significance is very real.
8. 'His spirit was troubled' (vatippa'em rucho) — from pa'am, meaning 'to be disturbed, agitated, struck.' The same verb describes Nebuchadnezzar's disturbance in Daniel 2:1-3. Pharaoh senses the dream carries weighty significance but cannot decode it. His inner turmoil drives him to summon Egypt's entire intellectual establishment.
8. 'Magicians' (chartummei) — the Hebrew chartom is likely derived from Egyptian hry-tp, a title for priestly scholars trained in sacred texts, dream interpretation, and ritual knowledge. These were not mere conjurers but learned members of the priestly class who studied the Egyptian dream manuals.
8. 'Wise men' (chakameiha) — the chakamim were counselors and sages who advised the court on matters of state and interpretation. Together with the chartummim, they represent the full intellectual and spiritual resources of Egypt — all of which prove inadequate before a dream sent by the God of Israel.
8. 'There was no one who could interpret it for Pharaoh' (ve'ein-poter otam le-Far'oh) — the failure of Egypt's best underscores the narrative theology: true interpretation belongs to God alone (cf. 40:8). Human wisdom, however sophisticated, cannot decode divine revelation without divine enablement.

9. 'I call to mind my offenses' (et-chata'ai ani mazkir hayyom) — the verb zakar ('to remember') stands in sharp contrast to 40:23, where the cupbearer 'did not remember' (lo-zakar) Joseph. The irony is rich: the cupbearer 'remembers' his own failures while confessing that he had forgotten his benefactor. His self-serving memory finally serves God's purposes.
9. 'My offenses' (chata'ai) — plural. He frames his failure to remember Joseph as one among his faults. The word chata ('sin, offense') is the same root used in 40:1 for the original offense against Pharaoh. The cupbearer's confession is carefully diplomatic — he acknowledges wrongdoing while positioning himself as penitent.
10. The cupbearer recounts the events of chapter 40 in summary form. His narrative is selective — he emphasizes his own imprisonment but omits details that might distract from the main point: the Hebrew prisoner who accurately interpreted dreams.
11. The cupbearer echoes the narrator's language from 40:5 almost exactly. His account is trustworthy in its factual details, even if his motives for telling it are self-serving.
12. 'A Hebrew youth' (na'ar ivri) — the cupbearer's description of Joseph is deliberately minimizing. Na'ar can mean 'youth, boy, servant' — it emphasizes low social status. 'Hebrew' (ivri) marks Joseph as a foreigner. The cupbearer describes him as a young foreign slave — hardly a credible rival to Egypt's professional dream interpreters. Yet this very description underscores the power of God working through an unlikely vessel.
12. 'A servant of the captain of the guard' (eved lesar hattabbachim) — Joseph is identified by his servile position, not by name. The cupbearer's description strips Joseph of all dignity. Yet this lowly servant will, within hours, become the second most powerful man in Egypt.
13. 'Just as he interpreted for us — so it happened' (ka'asher patar lanu ken hayah) — this is the cupbearer's testimonial to Joseph's prophetic accuracy. The perfect correspondence between interpretation and outcome validates Joseph as a true interpreter of divine messages.
13. 'I was restored to my position' (oti heshiv al-kanni) — the cupbearer places himself first in the outcome, naturally. His restoration matters most to him.
13. 'The other was hanged' (ve'oto talah) — the baker's execution is reported with chilling brevity. The cupbearer wastes no words on the dead man's fate.
14. 'They rushed him from the dungeon' (vayritsuhu min-habbor) — from ruts ('to run'). The urgency is palpable — Pharaoh's need is immediate. The word bor ('pit, dungeon') is the same word used when Joseph's brothers threw him into the pit (37:24). Joseph's journey from pit to palace is about to be completed.
14. 'He shaved' (vayegallach) — shaving was an Egyptian custom; Hebrews typically wore beards. Joseph's shaving indicates his preparation to appear before Pharaoh according to Egyptian court protocol. He must present himself acceptably in the culture where God has placed him.
14. 'Changed his garments' (vayechalef simlotav) — Joseph's garments have marked his story: the ornamented robe stripped by his brothers (37:23), the garment seized by Potiphar's wife (39:12), and now prison clothes exchanged for garments fit for Pharaoh's court. Each change of clothing marks a turning point in his narrative.
15. 'You can hear a dream and interpret it' (tishma chalom liftor oto) — Pharaoh credits Joseph with the ability to 'hear' (shama) a dream — that is, to understand its inner meaning. The verb shama implies not just hearing but comprehending. Pharaoh's desperation has brought him to a foreign prisoner.
16. 'It is not in me' (bil'adai) — Joseph's immediate deflection is theologically crucial. He refuses any claim to personal ability. The contrast with Egypt's professional interpreters could not be sharper: they claimed expertise but failed; Joseph disclaims expertise but will succeed, because the source is God, not human skill.
16. 'God will give Pharaoh a favorable answer' (Elohim ya'aneh et-shelom Par'oh) — literally 'God will answer the peace/welfare of Pharaoh.' Joseph uses the generic Elohim ('God') rather than YHWH when speaking to Pharaoh — appropriate since Pharaoh would not know Israel's covenant name. The word shalom here means 'well-being, favorable outcome' — Joseph assures Pharaoh that God's answer will address his concern.
16. Joseph's response echoes 40:8: 'Do not interpretations belong to God?' Throughout the narrative, Joseph consistently attributes his gift to God, never to himself. This theological humility is central to his character.
17. Pharaoh now recounts his dream in full. His retelling (vv. 17-24) closely follows the narrator's account (vv. 1-7) but includes subtle additions that reveal Pharaoh's emotional state — particularly his emphasis on the ugliness of the thin cows (v. 19) and the impossibility of telling they had eaten (v. 21).
18. Pharaoh's retelling of the first dream uses slightly different word order than the narrator's version in v. 2, placing 'fat in flesh' before 'beautiful in form.' These minor variations are characteristic of oral retelling and mark this as Pharaoh's own perspective on the dream.
19. Pharaoh adds details not in the narrator's original account: 'I have never seen anything so bad in all the land of Egypt.' This personal commentary reveals the depth of Pharaoh's disturbance. The dream has shaken him precisely because its imagery exceeded anything in his experience.
19. 'Wretched' (dallot) — from dal ('poor, weak, thin'). This additional adjective is absent from the narrator's account in v. 3, suggesting Pharaoh's memory has amplified the horror of the thin cows.

- 19. 'Gaunt' (raqqot) — from raq ('thin, lean'). A different adjective than daqqot used in v. 3, though with similar meaning. Pharaoh searches for words to convey the emaciation he saw.
- 20. Pharaoh's retelling continues to track the original dream closely while emphasizing the grotesque quality of the devouring.
- 21. 'It could not be known that they had entered them' — this crucial detail, absent from the narrator's version in vv. 1-4, is Pharaoh's own addition. It intensifies the nightmarish quality: the thin cows consumed seven fat cows yet showed absolutely no sign of having eaten. This impossibility — consumption without satisfaction — perfectly prefigures the famine: the land will 'consume' its stored abundance, yet the hunger will remain unabated.
- 21. The detail also carries theological weight: abundance devoured by scarcity without visible change means the famine will be so severe that no trace of the former plenty will remain (cf. v. 31).
- 22. Pharaoh transitions to the second dream. His retelling of the grain dream mirrors the original with only minor variations.
- 23. 'Shriveled' (tseenumot) — this word appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, adding a term not present in the narrator's account. Pharaoh's vocabulary grows more vivid as he recalls the horror of the diseased grain. The hapax legomenon (word occurring only once) contributes to the nightmarish specificity of his retelling.
- 24. 'There was no one who could explain it to me' (ve'ein maggid li) — Pharaoh concludes his retelling with this emphatic statement of his interpreters' failure. The verb higgid ('to tell, declare, explain') differs from patar ('to interpret') used in v. 8. Pharaoh is not merely looking for a technical interpretation — he wants someone to 'tell' him what the dream means for his kingdom.
- 24. The closing quotation mark ends Pharaoh's extended speech (vv. 17-24). Joseph will now respond with an interpretation that not only decodes the dream but provides a practical plan of action.
- 25. 'The dream of Pharaoh is one' (chalom Par'oh echad hu) — Joseph's opening declaration cuts to the theological heart of the matter. The two dreams are not two messages but one message given twice. The word echad ('one') carries the weight of unity and singularity — the same word used in the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4). God speaks with unified purpose.
- 25. 'What God is about to do, He has declared to Pharaoh' — Joseph immediately reframes the dream from a puzzle to be solved into a revelation to be received. God is not hiding information; He is disclosing it. The dream is not a threat but a warning — and a warning implies the possibility of preparation.
- 25. Joseph's use of ha'Elohim ('the God' with the definite article) is significant. Before Pharaoh, he speaks of God in terms an Egyptian can understand, yet the definite article subtly asserts that this is the God, not merely one among Egypt's many deities.
- 26. Joseph's interpretation is direct and unambiguous: cows and grain ears both represent years. The parallel is exact — seven good of each represent the same seven good years. By restating 'the dream is one' (chalom echad hu), Joseph drives home that both dreams deliver the identical message through different agricultural imagery.
- 27. 'Seven years of famine' (sheva shenei ra'av) — Joseph names the crisis directly. The word ra'av ('famine, hunger') appears here for the first time in the interpretation. The famine will dominate the remainder of Genesis, driving the family of Israel to Egypt and ultimately fulfilling God's word to Abraham (15:13).
- 27. 'Empty' (hareqot) — the ears are not merely thin but empty — they contain no grain at all. The image is one of total agricultural failure, not merely reduced yield.
- 28. 'What God is about to do, He has shown to Pharaoh' — Joseph reiterates the theological framework: the dream is God's gracious disclosure of future events. God does not simply bring judgment; He warns in advance so that wise preparation can mitigate catastrophe. This principle of divine warning before judgment runs throughout Scripture (cf. Amos 3:7).
- 29. 'Great abundance' (sava gadol) — the word sava means 'plenty, abundance, satiety.' Combined with gadol ('great'), it describes extraordinary agricultural productivity. The good years will be remarkable in their bounty, providing the surplus needed to survive the coming scarcity.
- 30. 'All the abundance will be forgotten' (venishkach kol-hassava) — the verb shakach ('to forget') describes a famine so severe that people will have no memory of ever having had enough. This corresponds to Pharaoh's dream detail about the thin cows showing no sign of having eaten the fat ones (v. 21).
- 30. 'The famine will consume the land' (vekhillah hara'av et-ha'arets) — from kalah ('to complete, to finish, to consume'). The famine will utterly exhaust the land's resources. The verb echoes the devouring in the dreams — just as thin cows devoured fat ones, so famine will devour the land.
- 31. 'Will not be known' (lo-yivvada) — the same language as Pharaoh's observation that the thin cows showed no sign of having consumed the fat ones (v. 21). Joseph connects dream imagery to real-world prediction with precision.
- 31. 'Very severe' (kaved hu me'od) — from kaved ('heavy, weighty, grievous'). The same root describes Pharaoh's hardened heart in Exodus. Here it conveys the crushing weight of the famine that will obliterate all memory of prosperity.
- 32. 'The thing is established by God' (nakhon haddavar me'im ha'Elohim) — from kun ('to be firm, established, certain'). The doubling of the dream is not redundancy but confirmation. In ancient Near Eastern thinking, repetition signified certainty. Joseph applies this principle theologically: God's double communication means the matter is irrevocably decided.

32. 'God will soon bring it about' (umemaher ha'Elohim la'asoto) — from mahar ('to hasten, to hurry'). Not only is the thing certain; it is imminent. God is already in motion. This urgency transitions naturally into Joseph's practical advice — there is no time to waste.
32. The principle of doubled revelation for confirmed certainty appears elsewhere in Scripture (cf. Numbers 23:19; Isaiah 46:11). Joseph's hermeneutical framework — that God speaks clearly and purposefully — shapes his entire response.
33. 'A man who is discerning and wise' (ish navon vekhakham) — Joseph transitions boldly from interpretation to policy advice. No one asked for his counsel, yet he offers it. The adjective navon ('discerning, understanding') implies someone who can perceive patterns and make sound judgments — precisely what Joseph has just demonstrated. Khakham ('wise') adds practical wisdom to theoretical understanding.
33. Joseph's unsolicited advice is remarkably bold for a prisoner speaking to the king of Egypt. Yet it flows naturally from the interpretation: if the prophecy is certain and imminent, action must follow immediately.
34. 'Appoint overseers' (veyafqed peqidim) — from paqad ('to appoint, oversee, attend to'). The same root used repeatedly of Joseph's administrative roles. A bureaucratic infrastructure is needed to manage the collection and storage effort.
34. 'Take a fifth' (vechimmesh) — the verb chimesh means 'to take a fifth, to exact twenty percent.' A twenty-percent tax during years of abundance would be tolerable and would accumulate enormous reserves over seven years. Joseph's plan is economically sound — it imposes sacrifice during prosperity to ensure survival during scarcity.
35. 'Store up grain' (veyitsberu-var) — from tsavar ('to heap up, store') and bar ('grain'). The plan involves massive centralized storage of grain reserves. The word bar specifically refers to threshed grain ready for storage.
35. 'Under the authority of Pharaoh' (tachat yad-Par'oh) — literally 'under the hand of Pharaoh.' The grain reserves must be under royal control to ensure systematic distribution during the famine, not left to private hoarding.
36. 'A reserve' (lefiqqadon) — from the same root paqad ('to appoint, attend to, deposit'). The noun piqqadon means a deposit or something entrusted for safekeeping. The stored grain is a trust — a reserve held against future need.
36. 'The land will not be cut off by the famine' (velo-tikkaret ha'arets bara'av) — from karat ('to cut off'). This is covenant-language: karat is the verb used for 'cutting' a covenant and for being 'cut off' from God's people. Joseph's plan aims to prevent the total destruction that unmitigated famine would bring.
36. Joseph's speech (vv. 25-36) is remarkable for its structure: theological interpretation followed by practical policy. He does not merely reveal what God will do; he proposes what Pharaoh should do in response. This integration of divine revelation with human responsibility is characteristic of biblical wisdom.
37. 'Good in the eyes of Pharaoh' (vayyitav haddavar be'einei Far'oh) — the expression be'einei ('in the eyes of') denotes approval and favorable judgment. That both Pharaoh and all his servants approved indicates unanimous recognition of Joseph's wisdom. No dissent is recorded — a remarkable response to advice from a foreign prisoner.
38. 'The Spirit of God' (ruach Elohim) — Pharaoh, an Egyptian polytheist, recognizes the divine spirit within Joseph. The phrase ruach Elohim echoes Genesis 1:2, where the Spirit of God moved over the waters. Pharaoh's use of the term does not necessarily reflect Hebrew theology — he may understand it within his own religious framework — but the narrator allows the reader to hear deeper resonances.
38. Pharaoh's rhetorical question expects the answer 'No.' There is no one like Joseph — no one else through whom God has so clearly spoken. The question implicitly nominates Joseph for the position he himself described in v. 33.
39. 'No one as discerning and wise as you' (ein-navon vekhakham kamokha) — Pharaoh echoes Joseph's own words from v. 33. Joseph described the ideal administrator as ish navon vekhakham; Pharaoh now declares Joseph himself to be that man. The irony is masterful — Joseph's advice was objectively sound, and Pharaoh independently concludes that the adviser is the best candidate for the role he described.
39. 'Since God has made all this known to you' — Pharaoh accepts Joseph's theological framework. He acknowledges that Joseph's wisdom comes from God, not from Egyptian training or human cleverness. This is remarkable coming from the divine king of Egypt.
40. 'Over my house' (al-beiti) — this phrase designates the office of vizier, the highest administrative position in Egypt, second only to Pharaoh. The 'house' (bayit) of Pharaoh encompasses the entire kingdom — its administration, economy, and governance.
40. 'All my people shall be governed by your command' (ve'al-pikha yishshaq kol-ammi) — the verb nashaq is difficult. It literally means 'to kiss' and may mean 'to be arranged/ordered by' (from a homonymous root) or 'to pay homage to.' The sense is clear: Joseph's word will be law for all Egypt.
40. 'Only with respect to the throne will I be greater than you' (raq hakkisse egdal mimmekka) — Pharaoh retains only the formal supremacy of the throne. In all practical matters, Joseph will exercise royal authority. The transformation is breathtaking: from foreign slave-prisoner to vice-regent of the world's most powerful empire, in a single audience.
41. 'See, I have set you' (re'eh natatti otkha) — the perfect tense natatti ('I have given/set') indicates an accomplished fact. Pharaoh's word is performative — by saying it, it is done. There is no deliberation, no waiting period. Joseph's appointment is immediate and irrevocable.
41. 'Over all the land of Egypt' (al kol-erets Mitsrayim) — Joseph's authority extends over the entirety of Egypt, not merely a province or department. The scope of his appointment matches the scope of the crisis.

42. 'His signet ring' (tabba'ato) — the royal signet ring bore Pharaoh's seal and authorized official documents. Giving it to Joseph transferred the power to issue decrees in Pharaoh's name. This is the ultimate symbol of delegated royal authority.
42. 'Garments of fine linen' (bigdei-shesh) — shesh is the finest Egyptian linen, made from flax grown along the Nile. Egyptian linen was renowned throughout the ancient world for its quality. The garments of office replace Joseph's prison clothes, continuing the theme of clothing as markers of status throughout his story.
42. 'A gold chain' (revid hazzahav) — the gold collar or chain was a standard Egyptian insignia of high office, well attested in Egyptian art and texts. These three gifts — ring, robes, chain — constitute the formal investiture of the vizier.
43. 'The second chariot' (merkevet hammishneh) — the chariot immediately behind Pharaoh's own, designating Joseph as second-in-command. The public procession served as both announcement and legitimation of Joseph's new authority.
43. 'Avrekh!' (avrekh) — this word has been debated for centuries. Possibilities include: (1) from barak ('to kneel') — a command to bow; (2) an Egyptian loanword meaning 'attention!' or 'make way!'; (3) from a root meaning 'tender father' (av rakh) — a title. The KJV's 'Bow the knee' follows the first interpretation. The term is preserved untranslated here because its exact meaning remains uncertain, and the transliteration conveys the public acclamation more vividly than any single translation could.
43. Joseph's investiture follows the pattern of Egyptian court ceremonies known from archaeological evidence: ring, garments, gold collar, chariot procession, and public acclamation.
44. 'I am Pharaoh' (ani Far'oh) — this emphatic self-identification invokes the full weight of royal authority. By prefacing Joseph's commission with his own identity, Pharaoh guarantees Joseph's authority with his own.
44. 'Without your consent no one shall lift hand or foot' (uvil'adekha lo-yarim ish et-yado ve'et-raglo) — the idiom 'lift hand or foot' means to take any action whatsoever. Joseph's authority is absolute and comprehensive — nothing happens in Egypt without his authorization. The phrase bil'adekha ('without you') echoes Joseph's bil'adai ('not in me') from v. 16, creating a wordplay: Joseph denied personal power in interpreting the dream; Pharaoh now grants him total power over the nation.
45. 'Zaphenath-paneah' (Tsofnat Pa'neah) — Joseph's Egyptian name. Its meaning is debated: possibilities include 'God speaks and he lives,' 'the man who knows things,' or 'sustainer of life.' The Egyptian name marks Joseph's full integration into Egyptian society while his Hebrew name (Yosef, 'may God add') preserves his Israelite identity.
45. 'Asenath' (Asenat) — Joseph's Egyptian wife. Her name may derive from Egyptian ns-Nt ('belonging to the goddess Neith'). Marriage to a priest's daughter integrated Joseph into Egypt's highest social class.
45. 'Potiphera, priest of On' (Poti Fera, kohen On) — On is the biblical name for Heliopolis, the center of Egyptian sun worship. Potiphera ('he whom Ra gave') is a distinct person from Potiphar of chapter 39, despite the similar names. The priestly connection places Joseph's new family at the pinnacle of Egyptian religious and social hierarchy.
45. 'Joseph went out over all the land of Egypt' — this concluding phrase marks the beginning of Joseph's administrative career. The verb 'went out' (yatsa) suggests an inspection tour — Joseph begins surveying the resources he must manage.
46. 'Thirty years old' (ben-sheloshim shanah) — Joseph was seventeen when sold (37:2), meaning thirteen years of slavery and imprisonment have passed. The narrator provides this chronological anchor to help the reader track the timeline: thirteen years of suffering have preceded this moment of exaltation.
46. 'When he stood before Pharaoh' (be'omdo lifnei Far'oh) — the phrase 'to stand before' (amad lifnei) is the standard expression for entering royal service. It marks Joseph's formal entry into the governing apparatus of Egypt.
46. The age of thirty carries significance: David began to reign at thirty (2 Samuel 5:4), and priests entered full service at thirty (Numbers 4:3). Whether these later parallels are intentional or coincidental, the narrator marks this as the age of Joseph's full maturity and authority.
47. 'In great handfuls' (liqmatzim) — from qomet ('handful, fist'). The plural intensifies the image: the harvest is so abundant that grain comes in overflowing fistfuls. The land itself — personified as an active agent — pours forth produce in quantities that stagger description.
48. Joseph's administrative system was decentralized for storage — grain from each region was stored in its nearest city — but centralized in authority. This practical arrangement minimized transportation costs during collection and would facilitate local distribution during the famine.
49. 'Like the sand of the sea' (kechol hayyam) — this is unmistakable covenant language. God promised Abraham descendants 'like the sand of the sea' (22:17; 32:12). The same phrase applied to grain creates a deliberate echo: God's provision of material abundance mirrors His promise of genealogical abundance. The covenant promises are being fulfilled even in Egypt, even through a pagan king, even through famine preparation.
49. 'He stopped counting, for it was beyond measure' (chadal lispor ki ein mispar) — the abundance exceeded the capacity of Egyptian accounting systems. This too echoes the Abrahamic promise: 'Count the stars, if you can count them' (15:5). The uncountable grain foreshadows the uncountable descendants.
50. 'Before the years of famine came' — the narrator places the births during the years of abundance, underscoring that Joseph's personal blessings — marriage, children — belong to the season of plenty. The covenant promise of descendants is being fulfilled even in exile.

50. The mention of Asenath's lineage ('daughter of Potiphera, priest of On') is repeated from v. 45, framing the birth notice with full identification. The sons of this union — half-Hebrew, half-Egyptian — will become two of the twelve tribes of Israel.
51. 'Manasseh' (Menasheh) — from the root nashah ('to forget'). The name is a testimony of healing: God has given Joseph the grace to release the pain of his past. The forgetting is not amnesia but the easing of anguish — Joseph will clearly remember his family (42:9), but the bitterness has been removed.
51. 'All my hardship and all my father's house' (kol-amali ve'et kol-bet avi) — the pairing is poignant. Joseph's 'hardship' (amal) includes slavery, false accusation, and imprisonment. 'All my father's house' suggests not just homesickness but the pain of being betrayed by his own brothers. That he names this 'forgetting' before the 'fruitfulness' of Ephraim suggests the healing of memory must precede the capacity for new joy.
51. The name also foreshadows the tribe of Manasseh, which will receive a significant inheritance in the promised land. Joseph's personal narrative of suffering and restoration becomes encoded in the tribal structure of Israel.
52. 'Ephraim' (Efrayim) — from the root parah ('to be fruitful'). The dual/intensive ending -ayim suggests 'doubly fruitful.' The name recalls God's original blessing in creation — 'be fruitful and multiply' (1:28) — and the specific promises to the patriarchs. Joseph sees his own fertility as evidence of God's covenant faithfulness.
52. 'In the land of my affliction' (be'erets onyi) — even as Joseph names his son 'Fruitful,' he acknowledges that Egypt remains 'the land of my affliction.' Prosperity has not erased the memory of suffering; rather, fruitfulness has emerged from affliction. This paradox — blessing in the place of pain — is central to the theology of the Joseph narrative.
52. The dual naming — Manasseh ('forgetting') and Ephraim ('fruitfulness') — traces a spiritual progression: first the healing of memory, then the capacity for new life. Together they testify that God transforms suffering into abundance.
53. 'Came to an end' (vatikhleimah) — from kalah ('to be complete, to come to an end'). The abundance was precisely bounded — seven years, no more. The narrator signals the pivot point of the entire Joseph story: from prosperity to crisis, from Egypt's sufficiency to the world's need.
54. 'Just as Joseph had said' (ka'asher amar Yosef) — the narrator validates Joseph's interpretation with this editorial confirmation. Everything Joseph predicted has come to pass exactly as stated.
54. 'There was famine in all lands, but in all the land of Egypt there was bread' — the contrast is stark and emphatic. The phrase 'all lands' (kol-ha'aratzot) indicates a famine of international scope, while Egypt alone has bread (lechem) — thanks entirely to Joseph's God-given wisdom and administration. Egypt becomes the world's granary and, crucially, the magnet that will draw Joseph's brothers south.
55. 'Go to Joseph; whatever he says to you, do' (lekhu el-Yosef asher-yomar lakhem ta'asu) — Pharaoh directs all of Egypt to Joseph as the sole source of provision. The command echoes the absolute authority granted in v. 44. Pharaoh himself defers to Joseph in the crisis.
55. The phrase has resonated in later Jewish and Christian tradition. In its narrative context, it confirms Joseph's position as the indispensable mediator between Pharaoh's resources and the people's need.
56. 'The whole face of the earth' (kol-penei ha'arets) — the expression suggests a universal scope, though practically it refers to the known world of the ancient Near East — Egypt, Canaan, and surrounding regions.
56. 'Opened all the storehouses' (vayyiftach Yosef et-kol-asher bahem) — literally 'opened all that was in them.' Joseph controls the release of the stored grain, distributing it strategically rather than allowing a free-for-all.
56. 'Sold grain' (vayyishbor) — from shavar ('to buy/sell grain'). Joseph does not give the grain away but sells it. This economic policy will have far-reaching consequences (47:13-26), eventually transferring all Egyptian wealth and land to Pharaoh.
57. 'All the earth came to Egypt, to Joseph' (vekhoh-ha'arets ba'u Mitsraymah lishbor el-Yosef) — the chapter concludes with Joseph as the focal point of the entire world's need. The phrase 'to Joseph' is emphatic — people come not merely to Egypt but specifically to Joseph. He is the conduit of life for the nations.
57. 'All the earth' (kol-ha'arets) — this phrase sets up the arrival of Joseph's brothers in chapter 42. Among the 'all' who come to buy grain from Joseph will be the very brothers who sold him into slavery. The divine plan, operating through famine, will bring about the family reunion that fulfills both Joseph's dreams and God's covenant purposes.
57. The chapter as a whole traces a stunning reversal: from dungeon to throne room, from forgotten prisoner to world provider. Joseph's thirteen years of suffering have been divinely orchestrated to position him at the exact intersection of divine promise and human need.

Summary: Famine brings Joseph's ten brothers to Egypt to buy grain. Joseph recognizes them but conceals his identity, accuses them of spying, and imprisons them for three days. He keeps Simeon as hostage and demands they bring Benjamin. The brothers confess their guilt regarding Joseph. On the journey home, they discover their silver returned in their sacks and are terrified.

What Makes This Remarkable: The narrator notes that 'Joseph remembered the dreams he had dreamed about them' (v. 9) — the sheaves bowing down are literally fulfilled as the brothers prostrate before him. The brothers' guilt-confession (v. 21) — 'we saw the distress of his soul when he pleaded with us, and we did not listen' — reveals a detail never told in chapter 37: Joseph begged for his life, and they ignored him. Joseph weeps privately (v. 24), the first of several emotional breaks that build toward the climactic revelation. The returned silver (v. 28) provokes not gratitude but terror: 'What is this that God has done to us?'

Translation Friction: Joseph's accusation that the brothers are 'spies' (meraglim, v. 9) uses a term from military reconnaissance. The word carries overtones of vulnerability — Joseph names them as enemies to expose their true condition. The brothers' confession uses the term ashemim ('guilty,' v. 21), from the same root as the guilt offering (asham) in Leviticus 5 — their guilt is not merely psychological but has a sacrificial dimension we noted in the translator's remarks.

Connections: The brothers' bowing (42:6) fulfills Joseph's first dream (37:7). Simeon's detention (42:24) may reflect his role in the Shechem massacre (34:25) — he who used violence is now confined. The returned silver anticipates the silver cup test of chapter 44. Jacob's lament 'everything is against me' (42:36) contrasts with Joseph's later declaration 'God meant it for good' (50:20).

¹When Jacob learned that there was grain in Egypt, Jacob said to his sons, "Why do you look at one another?" ²He said, "Look, I have heard that there is grain in Egypt. Go down there and buy grain for us from there, so that we may live and not die." ³So Joseph's ten brothers went down to buy grain from Egypt. ⁴But Benjamin, Joseph's brother, Jacob did not send with his brothers, for he said, "Lest harm befall him." ⁵The sons of Israel arrived at buy grain among those who came, for the famine was in the land of Canaan. ⁶Now Joseph was the governor over the land — he was the one who sold grain to all the people of the land. Joseph's brothers came and bowed down before him with their faces to the ground. ⁷Joseph saw his brothers and recognized them, but he made himself a stranger to them and spoke harshly to them. He said to them, "Where have you come from?" They said, "From the land of Canaan, to buy food." ⁸Joseph recognized his brothers, but they did not recognize him. ⁹Joseph remembered the dreams he had dreamed about them and said to them, "You are spies! You have come to see the vulnerability of the land." ¹⁰They said to him, "No, my lord! Your servants have come to buy food. ¹¹We are all sons of one man. We are honest men. Your servants are not spies." ¹²He said to them, "No! You have come to see the vulnerability of the land." ¹³They said, "Your servants are twelve brothers, sons of one man in the land of Canaan. The youngest is with our father today, and one is no more." ¹⁴Joseph said to them, "It is just as I told you — you are spies! ¹⁵By this you shall be tested: As Pharaoh lives, you shall not leave this place unless your youngest brother comes here. ¹⁶Send one of you to bring your brother while the rest of you remain imprisoned, so that your words may be tested to see whether truth is with you. Otherwise, as Pharaoh lives, you are surely spies!" ¹⁷He gathered them into custody for three days. ¹⁸On the third day Joseph said to them, "Do this and live, for I fear God. ¹⁹If you are honest men, let one of your brothers be confined in the house of your imprisonment, and the rest of you go — carry grain for the hunger of your households. ²⁰But you must bring your youngest brother to me, so that your words may be verified and you will not die." And they did so. ²¹They said to one another, "Surely we are guilty concerning our brother, for we saw the distress of his soul when he pleaded with us, and we did not listen. That is why this distress has come upon us." ²²Reuben answered them, saying, "Did I not tell you, 'Do not sin against the boy'? But you would not listen. Now his blood — behold, it is being required." ²³They did not know that Joseph understood them, for there was an interpreter between them. ²⁴He turned away from them and wept. Then he returned to them and spoke with them. He took Simeon from among them and bound him before their eyes. ²⁵Joseph gave orders to fill their vessels with grain, to return each man's silver to his sack, and to give them provisions for the journey. This was done for them. ²⁶They loaded their grain on their donkeys and departed from there. ²⁷When one of them opened his sack to give his donkey feed at the lodging place, he saw his silver — and behold, it was in the mouth of his bag. ²⁸He said to his brothers, "My silver has been returned! Here it is in my bag!" Their hearts sank, and trembling, they turned to one another, saying, "What is this that God has done to us?" ²⁹They came to Jacob their father in the land of Canaan and told him all that had happened to them, saying, ³⁰"The man, the lord of the land, spoke harshly to us and treated us as spies of the land. ³¹We said to him, 'We are honest men; we are not spies. ³²We are twelve brothers, sons of our father. One is no more, and the youngest is today with our father in the land of Canaan.' ³³The man, the lord of the land, said to us, 'By this I will know that you are honest men: leave one of your brothers with me, take grain for the hunger of your households, and go. ³⁴Bring your youngest brother to me, and I will know that you are not spies but honest men. Then I will return your brother to you, and you may trade freely in the land.'" ³⁵As they emptied their sacks, behold, every man's bundle of silver was in his sack. When they and their father saw the bundles of silver, they were afraid. ³⁶Jacob their father said to them, "You have bereaved me! Joseph is no more, Simeon is no more, and now you would take Benjamin! All these things are against me." ³⁷Reuben said to his father, "You may put my two sons to death if I do not bring him back to you. Entrust him to my care, and I will return him to you." ³⁸But he said, "My son shall not go down with you, for his brother is dead and he alone is left. If harm should befall him on the journey you are taking, you would bring down my gray hairs in sorrow to Sheol."

1. 'When Jacob learned' (vayyar Ya'aqov) — literally 'Jacob saw.' The verb ra'ah ('to see') here means to perceive or learn, probably through reports from traveling merchants. Jacob's awareness of Egyptian grain supplies contrasts with his sons' apparent paralysis.
1. 'Why do you look at one another?' (lammah tittra'u) — the reflexive form of ra'ah suggests staring at each other in indecision. Jacob rebukes their inaction. The family is starving, and the sons do nothing. Jacob's directiveness here recalls the patriarch who once schemed for the blessing — age has not dulled his capacity for decisive action.
2. 'Go down' (redu) — the verb yarad ('to go down') is geographically appropriate (Canaan is higher than Egypt) but also carries theological weight. Abraham 'went down' to Egypt during famine (12:10); Isaac was told not to 'go down' (26:2). Each descent to Egypt marks a crisis point in the patriarchal narrative.
2. 'So that we may live and not die' (venichyeh velo namut) — the stark binary of life and death frames the entire journey. The brothers go to Egypt for physical survival, unaware that their journey will also confront them with their past sin and lead to moral and relational restoration.
3. 'Joseph's ten brothers' (achei-Yosef asarah) — the narrator identifies them as 'Joseph's brothers,' not 'Jacob's sons.' The perspective has shifted: the story is being told from Joseph's vantage point. They are ten because Benjamin stays behind (v. 4) and Joseph is already in Egypt. The number ten will resonate with the ten who originally conspired against Joseph (37:2, where Joseph was with the sons of Bilhah and Zilpah).
4. 'Benjamin, Joseph's brother' (Binyamin achi Yosef) — the narrator identifies Benjamin specifically as 'Joseph's brother,' distinguishing him from the ten. Benjamin and Joseph share the same mother, Rachel, making them full brothers. Jacob's protectiveness of Benjamin stems from the presumed loss of Joseph — Benjamin is the last living link to his beloved Rachel.
4. 'Lest harm befall him' (pen-yiqra'ennu ason) — the word ason ('harm, calamity, fatal accident') is relatively rare, appearing in Exodus 21:22-23 for bodily harm. Jacob's fear is not vague anxiety but specific dread of fatal catastrophe. The word will recur in v. 38 and 44:29, forming a thematic bracket around Jacob's refusal to release Benjamin.
4. Jacob's overprotectiveness of Benjamin mirrors and extends his earlier favoritism of Joseph. Having lost one son of Rachel (as he believes), he cannot risk the other. Yet this very protectiveness will be tested and overcome as the narrative progresses.
5. 'The sons of Israel' (benei Yisra'el) — the narrator switches from 'Joseph's brothers' to 'the sons of Israel,' using Jacob's covenant name. They come not as private individuals but as representatives of the covenant family.
5. 'Among those who came' (betokh habba'im) — they are anonymous members of the international throng coming to Egypt for grain (41:57). The covenant family is reduced to one group among many desperate nations. There is no special treatment, no divine fast-track — they wait in line like everyone else.
5. The famine in Canaan connects back to 41:57 and fulfills the prediction that the famine would affect 'all the earth.' The promised land itself cannot sustain the covenant family — only Egypt, under Joseph's administration, can provide.

6. 'The governor' (hashallit) — from shalat ('to rule, to have dominion'). The title designates Joseph as the supreme administrator, the one wielding executive power over Egypt's grain distribution. The term is stronger than a mere official — it denotes absolute authority.
6. 'Bowed down before him with their faces to the ground' (vayyishtachavu-lo appayim artsah) — the narrator pauses to let the reader absorb the moment: Joseph's brothers, who mocked his dreams of their bowing (37:8), now bow with faces pressed to the earth before the brother they sold. The fulfillment of the dream is exact — and the brothers are utterly unaware of it.
6. This is one of the most dramatically ironic moments in all of Scripture. The reader knows what the characters do not: the foreign governor before whom they prostrate themselves is their own brother. Twenty years of narrative tension converge in this single act of obeisance.
7. 'Recognized them' (vayyakkirem) — from nakar ('to recognize'). The verb is laden with irony: Joseph recognizes (makir) his brothers, but they do not recognize him. Twenty years, Egyptian dress, the shaved face, the royal office, and the use of an interpreter (v. 23) all make identification impossible from their side.
7. 'Made himself a stranger' (vayyitnakker) — from the same root nakar, but in the reflexive (hitpa'el) form. Joseph deliberately 'estranges' himself — he acts as one who does not recognize them. The wordplay between vayyakkirem ('he recognized them') and vayyitnakker ('he made himself strange') is untranslatable in English but central to the narrative artistry.
7. 'Spoke harshly' (vaydabber ittam qashot) — Joseph's harsh speech begins his extended test of his brothers. His severity is not revenge but a carefully calculated process of bringing them to genuine repentance. He needs to know whether they have changed since the day they sold him.
8. This brief sentence — one of the most powerful in Genesis — states the asymmetry that drives the entire drama of chapters 42-45. Joseph holds all the knowledge and all the power; his brothers have neither. The narrator's simple declaration invites the reader into Joseph's perspective: what would you do if the brothers who sold you into slavery stood before you, helpless and unknowing?
8. The verb nakar ('to recognize') appears for the third time in two verses, emphasizing the theme of recognition/non-recognition that structures the Joseph narrative. True recognition — of identity, of sin, of divine purpose — will come only in chapter 45.
9. 'Joseph remembered the dreams' (vayyizkor Yosef et hachalomot) — the verb zakar ('to remember') connects Joseph's memory to the cupbearer's remembering in 41:9. But Joseph's remembering is not self-serving — it is the recognition that God's purposes, revealed long ago in dreams, are now unfolding before his eyes. His brothers are bowing, exactly as the sheaves bowed in his dream (37:7).
9. 'You are spies' (meragelim attem) — Joseph's accusation is a strategic fiction designed to test his brothers and create conditions under which he can learn about Benjamin and his father. The charge of espionage was serious — potentially capital — and immediately puts the brothers on the defensive.
9. 'The vulnerability of the land' (ervat ha'arets) — literally 'the nakedness of the land.' The term ervah ('nakedness') carries connotations of shame and exposure. Military scouts would seek out a land's undefended areas — its 'nakedness.' The metaphor is vivid: exposed territory, like exposed flesh, is vulnerable to attack.
10. 'My lord' (adoni) — the brothers address Joseph with the deferential title adoni, unknowingly fulfilling the dream imagery of subordination. The irony deepens with each 'my lord' — they are literally lording over themselves the brother they once cast down.
10. 'Your servants' (avadekha) — they call themselves Joseph's servants. The language of servitude echoes the dreams where their sheaves bowed to his. Everything they say, unwittingly, confirms the very dreams they once rejected.
11. 'Sons of one man' (benei ish-echad) — the brothers appeal to their family unity as evidence of innocence. A single family sending ten sons as spies would be improbable and strategically foolish. But the claim 'sons of one man' is also deeply ironic: they are the ones who tore that family apart by selling their brother.
11. 'Honest men' (kenim) — from ken ('honest, upright, true'). The brothers' claim to honesty rings hollow for the reader who knows their history of deception — the bloodied coat presented to Jacob, the cover-up sustained for over twenty years. Yet this self-description also represents what they will need to become: truly honest men who face their past.
12. Joseph maintains the accusation, forcing the brothers to reveal more information. His interrogation technique is effective — by persisting in the false charge, he compels them to offer increasingly detailed accounts of their family, which is precisely what he wants to learn.
13. 'Twelve brothers' (shenim asar avadekha achim) — the brothers reveal the full family count, including both Joseph and Benjamin. They still count Joseph among their number, even as they claim he 'is no more.' The number twelve carries covenant significance — these twelve will become the twelve tribes.
13. 'The youngest is with our father today' — this is the information Joseph most wants: Benjamin is alive and with their father. The mention of 'our father' (avinu) also tells Joseph that Jacob is still living.
13. 'One is no more' (veha'echad einennu) — the brothers' euphemism for Joseph's presumed death is deliberately vague. They do not say 'he died' — because they do not know his fate. They only know they sold him, and he vanished into slavery. The phrase einennu ('he is not') could mean death or simply absence. For Joseph, hearing his brothers refer to him in these terms must be profoundly affecting.
14. Joseph seizes on their family information as supposed confirmation of his accusation. The logic is deliberately false — he uses their honesty against them. But the purpose is not punishment; it is to create the conditions under which he can bring Benjamin to Egypt and test whether his brothers have truly changed.

15. 'By this you shall be tested' (bezot tibbachenu) — from bachan ('to test, to examine, to try'). Joseph frames the demand for Benjamin as a test of their truthfulness. But the deeper test — which the brothers do not yet perceive — is a test of their character: will they sacrifice Benjamin as they sacrificed Joseph, or will they protect him?
15. 'As Pharaoh lives' (chei Far'oh) — Joseph swears by Pharaoh's life, the standard Egyptian oath. He does not swear by YHWH before these men who do not know his identity. The oath adds gravity to his demand — this is not negotiable.
16. Joseph's initial plan — send one, imprison the rest — is more severe than his eventual arrangement (v. 19-20). This initial harshness may be designed to maximize pressure on the brothers, or Joseph may be adjusting his strategy as the encounter unfolds.
16. 'Whether truth is with you' (ha'emet ittkhem) — the word emet ('truth, faithfulness') is loaded. The brothers' 'truth' about their family is factually correct, but their deeper truth — what actually happened to their brother — remains concealed. Joseph's testing process will eventually bring all truth to light.
17. 'Three days' (sheloshet yamim) — the three-day period allows time for the brothers to absorb the gravity of their situation and for Joseph to reconsider his approach. He will emerge on the third day with a modified plan (vv. 18-20). The 'three days' motif appears repeatedly in Scripture as a period of testing and transformation.
18. 'Do this and live' (zot asu vichyu) — Joseph echoes his father's words from v. 2 ('that we may live and not die'). The language of survival pervades the encounter.
18. 'I fear God' (et-ha'Elohim ani yare) — this is an extraordinary self-revelation, though the brothers cannot grasp its full significance. Joseph identifies himself as a God-fearer, someone constrained by divine ethical standards. For the brothers, this should provide some reassurance that the Egyptian governor will act justly. For the reader, it explains Joseph's entire strategy: he is not acting from revenge but from reverence for God.
18. The phrase 'fear of God' (yir'at Elohim) in Genesis denotes moral conscience that restrains wrongdoing, even when there are no human witnesses (cf. 20:11). Joseph signals that his severity is not arbitrary cruelty but principled action.
19. Joseph reverses his original plan: instead of keeping nine and sending one, he will keep one and send nine. The modified plan is more practical — nine brothers can carry far more grain for the starving family — and it is also more merciful. Joseph balances his testing strategy with genuine concern for his family's survival.
19. 'The hunger of your households' (ra'avon batteikhem) — the word ra'avon ('hunger, famine') reminds the brothers that their families are starving while they stand accused. Urgency and fear combine to heighten the emotional pressure.
20. 'Your words may be verified' (veye'amnu divreikhem) — from aman ('to confirm, to verify, to prove true'). The same root that gives us 'amen' and emunah ('faithfulness'). Joseph demands that their claim be substantiated — their words must be made amen, shown to be reliable.
20. 'You will not die' (velo tamutu) — the threat of death hangs over the brothers. As far as they know, this Egyptian governor has the power to execute them as spies. Joseph uses this fear to ensure compliance.
20. 'And they did so' (vaya'asu-khen) — the brothers accept the terms. They have no choice — they are foreigners in a foreign land, accused of a capital offense, at the mercy of a man they cannot appease except by obeying.
21. 'Surely we are guilty' (aval ashemim anachnu) — the particle aval ('surely, truly, indeed') introduces a confession of devastating sincerity. The word ashemim ('guilty') from the root asham carries the weight of guilt that demands atonement. After more than twenty years, the brothers' conscience finally erupts under pressure.
21. 'The distress of his soul' (tsarat nafsho) — this detail is not recorded in chapter 37's account of the sale. The narrator of chapter 37 told the story from the outside — the brothers' actions, not Joseph's reaction. Now, through the brothers' own confession, we learn what the earlier narrative withheld: Joseph pleaded with them. He begged. They heard his anguish and chose to ignore it. This retroactive revelation deepens the horror of the original crime.
21. 'We did not listen' (velo shama'nu) — the verb shama ('to hear, to listen') implies not just auditory reception but moral response. They heard Joseph's cries but refused to act on them. Their refusal to 'listen' then has led to their current 'distress' (tsarah) — the same root as Joseph's 'distress' (tsarat nafsho). The punishment mirrors the crime.
21. The brothers speak among themselves, not knowing that Joseph understands every word (v. 23). Their unguarded confession reveals the true state of their hearts: guilt has never left them.
22. 'Did I not tell you' — Reuben claims the moral high ground, reminding his brothers that he opposed the plan (cf. 37:21-22). While this is partially true — Reuben did intervene to save Joseph's life — his own motives were not entirely pure, and he failed to prevent the sale.
22. 'Do not sin against the boy' (al-techetu vayyeled) — Reuben uses the word chata ('to sin'), the same theological vocabulary of the brothers' guilt confession. What they did to Joseph was not merely a crime against a brother but a sin.
22. 'His blood is being required' (vegam-damo hinneh nidrash) — from darash ('to seek, to require, to avenge'). Reuben interprets their current predicament as divine retribution for the presumed murder of Joseph. The theological framework is clear: blood guilt demands divine reckoning (cf. 9:5). The brothers believe Joseph is dead and that God is now exacting payment.

23. 'An interpreter' (hammelits) — from luts ('to interpret, to mediate between languages'). Joseph had conducted the entire interrogation through a translator, creating the impression that he spoke only Egyptian. This ruse allowed the brothers to speak freely in Hebrew in his presence, believing themselves unheard.
23. The dramatic irony is exquisite: the brothers have just confessed their deepest guilt — their abuse of Joseph — directly in front of the very person they wronged, who understands every word. Joseph hears them acknowledge his suffering, his pleading, and their refusal to listen. This moment is the emotional climax of the chapter.
24. 'He turned away from them and wept' (vayyissov me'aleihem vayyevk) — Joseph's weeping is the first crack in his composure. Hearing his brothers' confession of guilt — especially the detail about his own pleading — overwhelms him. He must remove himself to weep privately. This is the first of several times Joseph will weep during the reunion narrative (43:30; 45:2, 14-15; 46:29; 50:17).
24. 'He took Simeon' (vayyiqqach me'ittam et-Shim'on) — why Simeon? As the second-born, Simeon may have been the ringleader after Reuben's partial dissent. Alternatively, Joseph may have selected Simeon as the most aggressive brother (cf. 34:25, where Simeon and Levi slaughter the Shechemites). Some suggest Joseph was separating Simeon from Levi to prevent them from conspiring.
24. 'Bound him before their eyes' (vaye'esor oto le'einehem) — the public binding maximizes the emotional impact. The brothers must watch as their brother is chained — a haunting echo of what Joseph experienced when they sold him. The phrase 'before their eyes' forces them to witness suffering they cannot prevent, just as Joseph was forced to suffer in their hands.
25. 'To return each man's silver to his sack' (ulehashiv kaspeihem ish el-saqo) — Joseph's hidden generosity — returning their payment — is an act of grace disguised as mystery. The brothers will discover the silver and be terrified (v. 28, 35), interpreting it as a trap or divine judgment. What Joseph intends as kindness, their guilty consciences transform into evidence of God's pursuit.
25. 'Provisions for the journey' (tsedah laddarekh) — beyond the grain for their families, Joseph ensures they have food for the return trip. Even while testing them, he cares for their physical welfare. This dual action — severity in the public encounter, generosity in private provision — reveals the complexity of Joseph's heart.
26. The brothers leave Egypt with grain but without Simeon, carrying silver they do not yet know about. Every element of their departure contains a hidden charge that will detonate at various points on their journey home.
27. 'At the lodging place' (bammalon) — from lun ('to spend the night'). This could be a caravanserai or simply a stopping point along the route. The discovery occurs during the routine act of feeding animals — the mundane suddenly becomes terrifying.
27. 'In the mouth of his bag' (befi amtachto) — the word amtachat ('bag, sack') differs from saq used in v. 25, suggesting either a different container or a synonym. The silver sits conspicuously at the top — 'in the mouth' — as though placed there deliberately.
28. 'Their hearts sank' (vayyetse libbam) — literally 'their heart went out.' The idiom describes the sensation of one's heart leaving the body — a visceral image of shock and dread. Their heart (singular, collective) 'departs' — they are left hollow with fear.
28. 'Trembling, they turned to one another' (vayyecherdu ish el-achiv) — from charad ('to tremble, to be terrified'). The brothers are physically shaking. Their trembling before the returned silver contrasts with their cold composure when they sold Joseph. Guilt has made them interpret every unexplained event as divine retribution.
28. 'What is this that God has done to us?' (mah-zot asah Elohim lanu) — the brothers immediately attribute the mysterious silver to God. They do not consider natural explanations — their guilty consciences leap directly to divine action. The God they invoke is the God against whom they sinned when they betrayed their brother. Their theological interpretation is essentially correct: God is indeed at work, though not to punish them but to bring about reconciliation.
29. The brothers arrive home and must now report to their father. Their account (vv. 30-34) closely follows the events as narrated but is shaped by their perspective — they present themselves as innocent victims of an unreasonable Egyptian governor.
30. 'The man, the lord of the land' (ha'ish adonei ha'arets) — the brothers describe Joseph with the same title 'lord' (adoni/adonei) they used in his presence. To Jacob, this signals they were dealing with the highest authority in Egypt — making the situation both dangerous and non-negotiable.
31. The brothers repeat their claim to honesty. The irony remains: they are honest about their identity but carry decades of dishonesty about what they did to Joseph.
32. The brothers faithfully reproduce their statement to Joseph (cf. v. 13). Their report to Jacob is accurate but incomplete — they do not mention their own confession of guilt (v. 21) or their terrified interpretation of the returned silver (v. 28). They present a sanitized version to their father.
33. The brothers' account to Jacob continues to track their experience accurately. They relay the governor's terms faithfully.
34. 'You may trade freely in the land' (ve-et-ha'arets tisharu) — from sachar ('to trade, to travel as a merchant'). Joseph's offer includes commercial privileges in Egypt — a significant inducement. If they comply, they gain not just Simeon's freedom but ongoing access to Egyptian grain markets.
34. The brothers' report concludes here. They have laid out the situation: Simeon is imprisoned, Benjamin must go to Egypt, and the family's long-term food security depends on compliance.

35. 'Every man's bundle of silver' (ish tseror kaspo) — the word tseror ('bundle, pouch') suggests the silver was tied in cloth bundles. Each brother finds his own payment returned — the complete refund affects all of them, not just the one who discovered his silver at the lodging (v. 27).
35. 'They and their father... were afraid' (hemmah va'avihem vayyira'u) — the discovery terrifies the entire family. The returned silver, intended by Joseph as a gift, is perceived as a trap. If the Egyptian governor discovers they have 'stolen' back their payment, the accusation of spying would seem confirmed. Jacob now shares his sons' dread — the situation is worse than they had reported.
36. 'You have bereaved me' (oti shikkaltem) — from shakol ('to make childless, to bereave'). Jacob directly blames his sons for his losses. The accusation is more penetrating than Jacob knows — regarding Joseph, they are indeed responsible. His instinct is correct even though his information is incomplete.
36. 'Joseph is no more, Simeon is no more' (Yosef einennu veShim'on einennu) — the repetition of einennu ('is no more') for both sons creates a devastating litany of loss. Jacob sees a pattern: every time his sons go out, one fails to return.
36. 'All these things are against me' (alai hayu kulanah) — Jacob's cry of despair is one of the most poignant in Scripture. He sees himself as the target of relentless misfortune. The patriarch who wrestled with God and prevailed (32:28) now feels overwhelmed by accumulated grief. Yet the reader knows what Jacob does not: everything that appears to be 'against him' is actually working 'for him' — Joseph is alive, Simeon will be freed, and the family will be reunited.
37. 'You may put my two sons to death' (et-shenei vanai tamit) — Reuben's offer is extravagant but emotionally tone-deaf. He offers his own sons — Jacob's grandsons — as collateral. The offer actually compounds the threatened loss: if Benjamin is lost, killing Reuben's sons would mean losing three grandsons instead of one. Jacob rightly rejects this clumsy guarantee.
37. Reuben, as firstborn, tries to assume responsibility, but his track record is poor: he failed to prevent Joseph's sale (37:29), violated his father's concubine (35:22), and his surety offer here is rejected. Judah will eventually succeed where Reuben fails (43:8-10), offering himself rather than his children.
38. 'His brother is dead' (achiv met) — Jacob refers to Joseph as Benjamin's brother, not theirs. The distinction is painful: Joseph and Benjamin are Rachel's sons, the children of the wife Jacob loved. The other sons are present, but in Jacob's grief, only Rachel's children truly count. This favoritism — the same pattern that provoked the brothers' original jealousy — persists even now.
38. 'He alone is left' (vehu levaddo nish'ar) — of Rachel's children, only Benjamin remains. Jacob's world has contracted to a single point of vulnerability: Benjamin is all he has left of Rachel.
38. 'If harm should befall him' (uqra'ahu ason) — the word ason ('harm, calamity') returns from v. 4, forming a bracket around Jacob's refusal. His deepest fear — voiced at the beginning when he kept Benjamin home — is now stated again, more explicitly, as his final word on the matter.
38. 'My gray hairs in sorrow to Sheol' (seivati beyagon she'olah) — the image is devastating: Jacob envisions himself descending to the realm of the dead (Sheol) as a broken old man, his gray hair a visible marker of grief. Seivah ('gray hair') represents the totality of his aged life; yagon ('sorrow, grief') would be its defining quality. Jacob refuses to risk this final catastrophe.
38. The chapter ends with Jacob's refusal. The impasse will require the deepening famine (43:1) and Judah's self-sacrificial guarantee (43:8-9) to break. The narrative pauses here at maximum tension: Simeon imprisoned, Benjamin demanded, Jacob immovable, and the family's survival hanging in the balance.

Summary: Famine forces a second journey to Egypt. Judah pledges himself as surety for Benjamin. Israel reluctantly consents, invoking El Shaddai's mercy. In Egypt, the brothers are brought to Joseph's house and fear a trap over the returned silver. Joseph sees Benjamin and is overcome with emotion. He feasts with them, giving Benjamin five times the portion of the others.

What Makes This Remarkable: Judah's emergence as the decisive voice — 'I myself will be surety for him; from my hand you may require him' (v. 9) — marks his transformation from the man who proposed selling Joseph (37:26-27) to the man who will offer himself in Benjamin's place (44:33). Israel's prayer 'if I am bereaved, I am bereaved' (v. 14) uses the same root (shakol) three times, conveying resigned surrender to God's will. Joseph's private weeping when he sees Benjamin (v. 30) — 'his compassion burned (nikhmeru rachamav)' — uses visceral, womb-related language for the deepest kind of love.

Translation Friction: The invocation of El Shaddai (v. 14) by Jacob echoes 17:1 and 28:3 — this divine name belongs to the patriarchal tradition of impossible promises. We rendered it consistently as 'God Almighty.' The Hebrew rachamim ('compassion,' v. 30) derives from rechem ('womb'), giving the emotion a maternal, physiological intensity that English 'compassion' only partially captures. We noted this etymological connection.

Connections: Benjamin's fivefold portion (43:34) anticipates his tribe's prominence and complexity in Israelite history (Judges 19-21; 1 Samuel 9-10). The steward's theological statement — 'your God and the God of your father has placed treasure in your sacks' (43:23) — comes from an Egyptian servant, suggesting God's purposes are recognized even outside the covenant family. Judah's surety oath foreshadows his climactic speech in chapter 44.

¹Now the famine was severe in the land. ²When they had finished eating the grain they had brought from Egypt, their father said to them, "Go again and buy us a little food." ³But Judah said to him, "The man solemnly warned us, saying, 'You shall not see my face unless your brother is with you.'" ⁴If you will send our brother with us, we will go down and buy food for you. ⁵But if you will not send him, we will not go down, for the man said to us, 'You shall not see my face unless your brother is with you.' ⁶Israel said, "Why did you treat me so badly by telling the man that you had another brother?" ⁷They said, "The man questioned us thoroughly about ourselves and our family, saying, 'Is your father still alive? Do you have another brother?' We answered him according to these questions. How could we possibly have known that he would say, 'Bring your brother down?'" ⁸Then Judah said to Israel his father, "Send the boy with me, and we will arise and go, so that we may live and not die — we, and you, and our little ones as well." ⁹I myself will be surety for him. From my hand you may require him. If I do not bring him back to you and set him before you, then I will bear the blame before you all my days. ¹⁰For if we had not delayed, we could have returned twice by now. ¹¹Then their father Israel said to them, "If it must be so, then do this: take some of the choice products of the land in your bags and bring the man a gift — a little balm, a little honey, spices and myrrh, pistachio nuts and almonds." ¹²Take double the silver in your hand, and the silver that was returned in the mouths of your sacks, carry it back in your hand. Perhaps it was a mistake. ¹³Take your brother also, and arise, go back to the man. ¹⁴May El Shaddai give you mercy before the man, so that he may release to you your other brother and Benjamin. As for me, if I am bereaved, I am bereaved. ¹⁵So the men took this gift, and they took double the silver in their hand, and Benjamin. They arose and went down to Egypt and stood before Joseph. ¹⁶When Joseph saw Benjamin with them, he said to the steward of his house, "Bring the men into the house, slaughter an animal and prepare it, for these men will eat with me at noon." ¹⁷The man did as Joseph said and brought the men into Joseph's house. ¹⁸The men were afraid because they were brought into Joseph's house, and they said, "It is because of the silver that was returned in our sacks the first time that we are being brought in — so that he may roll upon us and attack us and take us as slaves, along with our donkeys." ¹⁹So they approached the steward of Joseph's house and spoke to him at the entrance of the house. ²⁰They said, "Please, my lord, we did indeed come down the first time to buy food." ²¹When we came to the lodging place and opened our sacks, there was each man's silver in the mouth of his sack — our silver in its full weight. We have brought it back in our hand. ²²We have also brought down additional silver in our hand to buy food. We do not know who put our silver in our sacks. ²³He said, "Peace to you, do not be afraid. Your God and the God of your father has placed treasure in your sacks. Your silver came to me." And he brought Simeon out to them. ²⁴The man brought the men into Joseph's house and gave them water, and they washed their feet. He also gave fodder for their donkeys. ²⁵They prepared the gift for Joseph's arrival at noon, for they had heard that they would eat a meal there. ²⁶When Joseph came home, they brought him the gift that was in their hand into the house and bowed down before him to the ground. ²⁷He asked them about their welfare and said, "Is your father well, the old man of whom you spoke? Is he still alive?" ²⁸They said, "Your servant our father is well; he is still alive." And they bowed low and prostrated themselves. ²⁹He lifted up his eyes and saw his brother Benjamin, his mother's son, and said, "Is this your youngest brother of whom you spoke to me?" Then he said, "God be gracious to you, my son." ³⁰Joseph hurried out, for his compassion burned for his brother and he sought a place to weep. He went into his inner chamber and wept there. ³¹He washed his face and came out, and he controlled himself and said, "Serve the meal." ³²They served him by himself, and them by themselves, and the Egyptians who ate with him by themselves, because the Egyptians could not eat with the Hebrews, for that would be an abomination to the Egyptians. ³³They were seated before him — the firstborn according to his birthright and the youngest according to his youth — and the men looked at one another in astonishment. ³⁴He had portions carried to them from before him, but Benjamin's portion was five times greater than any of theirs. And they drank and became merry with him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Severe' (kaved) — literally 'heavy.' The root k-b-d conveys weight and gravity; the same root gives us kavod ('glory, weightiness'). The famine presses down on the land with crushing force. This opening clause, brief and unadorned, resumes the narrative thread from 42:38 after Jacob's refusal to release Benjamin. Time has passed; the grain is running out; the crisis can no longer be deferred.
2. 'When they had finished eating' (ka'asher killu le'ekhol) — the verb kalah ('to finish, consume, be completed') signals total exhaustion of supply. The grain from the first trip is entirely gone. Jacob can no longer avoid the decision he has been postponing.
3. 'A little food' (me'at okhel) — Jacob's phrasing minimizes the errand, as if requesting a small task. The understatement may reflect his reluctance to acknowledge the full gravity of what the return trip entails — surrendering Benjamin. Or it may be a father's instinctive downplaying to avoid confronting the dread that grips him.
3. 'Solemnly warned' (ha'ed he'id) — the infinitive absolute construction (he'id + he'id) intensifies the verb enormously. This is not a casual suggestion but a solemn, emphatic declaration. Judah wants Jacob to understand that the Egyptian governor's demand was absolute and non-negotiable.
3. 'You shall not see my face' (lo tir'u fanai) — an idiom meaning 'you will not be granted audience with me.' In the ancient Near East, 'seeing the face' of a ruler meant being admitted to his presence. Joseph has barred all future access unless Benjamin accompanies them. The phrase also carries dramatic irony: the brothers cannot truly 'see' Joseph's face — they do not recognize who he is.
3. Judah now emerges as the family spokesman, displacing Reuben's failed leadership (42:37). This shift is narratively significant: Judah, who proposed selling Joseph (37:26-27), will become the one who offers himself in Benjamin's place (44:33). His moral transformation is the counternarrative to Joseph's rise to power.
4. Judah presents Jacob with a stark conditional: release Benjamin or starve. The structure is a simple if-then proposition with no middle ground. The directness contrasts with Reuben's earlier, more emotional plea (42:37), where he offered his own sons' lives as collateral — a proposal Jacob rightly dismissed.
5. The negative conditional completes the logical frame: no Benjamin, no trip, no grain, no survival. Judah's repetition of Joseph's exact words — 'You shall not see my face unless your brother is with you' — hammers the point. He is not inventing conditions; he is relaying the governor's own ultimatum. Jacob cannot argue against a foreign ruler's decree.
6. 'Israel' (Yisra'el) — the narrator uses Jacob's covenant name here, perhaps signaling the patriarch's authoritative stance as he challenges his sons. The interchange between 'Jacob' and 'Israel' throughout this chapter is narratively deliberate: 'Israel' appears when the patriarch asserts himself; 'Jacob' when he is vulnerable or grief-stricken.
6. 'Why did you treat me so badly' (lamah hare'otem li) — Jacob's complaint carries a note of self-pity. He views the disclosure of Benjamin's existence as a personal injury. From Jacob's perspective, his sons have needlessly exposed a vulnerability. From the reader's perspective, Jacob's anger is misdirected — the brothers answered honestly, and Joseph orchestrated the entire situation.
7. 'Questioned us thoroughly' (sha'ol sha'al ha'ish) — another infinitive absolute construction, emphasizing the intensity of Joseph's interrogation. The brothers are defending themselves: we did not volunteer the information; he pressed us relentlessly.
7. 'How could we possibly have known' (hayado'a neda) — yet another infinitive absolute, this time expressing an emphatic rhetorical question. The brothers protest the unfairness of Jacob's accusation: they could not have anticipated that routine answers to an official's questions would result in a demand for Benjamin. The triple use of infinitive absolutes in this exchange (v. 3, 7a, 7b) gives the dialogue an urgent, legalistic quality — as if the brothers are mounting a formal defense.
7. The brothers' account is accurate. In 42:13, they indeed told Joseph about their family composition when he questioned them. They could not have foreseen Joseph's hidden agenda. Yet Jacob's frustration, though misdirected, is humanly understandable: he has lost Joseph, nearly lost Simeon, and now faces losing Benjamin.
8. 'The boy' (hanna'ar) — Benjamin is called a na'ar, which can denote a young man or a servant. Benjamin is likely in his twenties or thirties by this point (he has sons of his own, 46:21), but in the family dynamic he remains 'the boy' — the youngest, the protected one, the child who has replaced Joseph in Jacob's affections.
8. 'So that we may live and not die — we, and you, and our little ones' — Judah expands the stakes beyond the brothers to include Jacob himself and the next generation (tappenu, 'our little ones'). This is not just about the brothers' survival but the survival of the entire covenant family. The triple repetition — 'we, and you, and our little ones' — makes the cost of inaction devastating and personal.
9. 'I myself will be surety for him' (anokhi e'ervenu) — the verb arav ('to pledge, guarantee, be surety') is a legal-commercial term. Judah is offering himself as collateral, staking his own standing and person against Benjamin's safe return. This is far more credible than Reuben's offer to sacrifice his two sons (42:37), which Jacob dismissed as absurd.

9. 'From my hand you may require him' (miyaddi tevaqshenu) — the verb baqash ('to seek, require, demand') in this context carries legal force. Judah invites Jacob to hold him personally accountable — not his children, not his possessions, but himself.
9. 'I will bear the blame before you all my days' (vechatati lekha kol-hayyamim) — literally 'I will have sinned against you all the days.' The verb chata ('to sin, miss the mark') is the primary Hebrew word for sin. Judah stakes his moral standing: failure will mark him as a sinner against his father permanently. This is the language of covenantal responsibility, and it anticipates Judah's magnificent self-sacrifice in 44:33.
10. 'If we had not delayed' (lule' hitmahmenahnu) — the verb mahah in its reflexive form (hitmahmeah) means to linger, hesitate, delay. The word itself seems to stammer and drag, mimicking the very procrastination Judah describes. Jacob's refusal to act has cost precious time. Judah's practical argument cuts through his father's paralysis: debating is a luxury they can no longer afford.
11. 'If it must be so' (im-ken efo) — Jacob's reluctant consent. The particle efo ('then, in that case') carries a tone of resignation. He yields not out of conviction but out of necessity.
11. 'Choice products of the land' (zimrat ha'arets) — the word zimrah typically means 'song' or 'praise,' but here it denotes the finest, most celebrated products — the 'pride' of the land. Even in famine, Canaan produces luxury goods that Egypt values.
11. The gift list — balm (tsori), honey (devash), spices (nekhō't), myrrh (lot), pistachio nuts (botnim), and almonds (sheqedim) — constitutes a careful diplomatic offering. These are high-value, low-weight items suitable for long transport. The balm and spices recall the Ishmaelite caravan that carried Joseph to Egypt (37:25), creating a bitter ironic echo: the father now sends luxury goods to the very land where his son was sold, along the very trade routes the slavers traveled.
12. 'Double the silver' (kesef mishneh) — Jacob instructs them to bring twice the needed amount: the original purchase price returned in their sacks plus new payment. His honesty here is notable; he does not try to profit from the apparent error.
12. 'Perhaps it was a mistake' (ulai mishgeh hu) — the word mishgeh ('error, oversight') from shagah ('to err, go astray') offers a hopeful but naive explanation. Jacob, unable to fathom the true situation, grasps at the most benign interpretation. The reader knows better: the returned silver was no mistake but part of Joseph's elaborate test.
13. 'Take your brother' (ve'et-achikhem qachu) — the word order places 'your brother' in the emphatic position. Jacob finally speaks the words he has been dreading. The verb laqach ('to take') is simple and direct — no hedging, no qualification. Having decided, Jacob commits fully.
14. 'El Shaddai' — Jacob invokes the patriarchal name for God, the name by which God appeared to Abraham (17:1) and to Jacob himself (35:11). In his hour of deepest vulnerability, Jacob reaches for the God of the covenant promises. This is not casual prayer but an appeal to the God who pledged to make him fruitful and give his descendants the land.
14. 'Give you mercy' (yitten lakhem rachamim) — the word rachamim ('compassion, mercy') derives from rechem ('womb') and connotes the deep, visceral love a mother has for her child. Jacob prays that this mysterious Egyptian official will feel toward his sons the kind of tender compassion that he himself feels — a parent's love.
14. 'If I am bereaved, I am bereaved' (ka'asher shakholti shakhalti) — the infinitive absolute construction with shakal ('to be bereaved of children') expresses Jacob's fatalistic resignation. He has exhausted his resistance. This is not faith triumphant but faith at its rawest — surrender to a situation beyond his control. Some interpreters hear an echo of Esther 4:16 ('If I perish, I perish'), but Jacob's tone is more that of weary grief than heroic resolve.
15. The narrative accelerates with a chain of verbs: took, took, arose, went down, stood. The careful preparations of the preceding verses give way to swift action. Benjamin's name is placed last in the list of things taken — gift, silver, Benjamin — as if the narrator hesitates before naming the most precious item the brothers carry.
15. 'Stood before Joseph' (vayyaamdu lifnei Yosef) — the phrase recalls courtiers standing before a sovereign. The brothers now face the Egyptian governor as petitioners. The reader sees what they cannot: they stand before their own brother.
16. 'When Joseph saw Benjamin' — the sight of his full brother, Rachel's other son, triggers immediate action. Joseph does not hesitate; he moves from perception to command in a single breath.
16. 'Slaughter an animal and prepare it' (utevoach tevach vahahen) — the infinitive absolute tevach intensifies the command: slaughter thoroughly, prepare a proper feast. This is not ordinary hospitality but a banquet. The noon meal (batsaharayim) was the main meal of the day in Egyptian custom.
16. 'The steward of his house' (la'asher al-beito) — literally 'the one who is over his house.' This trusted household manager will play a significant role in Joseph's schemes (44:1-12). He appears to be privy to at least some of Joseph's plans.
17. The steward's immediate obedience mirrors the efficiency of Joseph's household administration. The phrase 'Joseph's house' (beitah Yosef) would have been an impressive Egyptian estate — the residence of the second most powerful man in the kingdom. For Canaanite shepherds, this must have been an overwhelming setting.
18. 'They were afraid' (vayyir'u) — the brothers' guilty consciences transform a generous invitation into a terrifying trap. Their fear is a direct consequence of unresolved guilt: men who sold their brother into slavery now fear being enslaved themselves. The measure-for-measure irony is unmistakable.

18. 'Roll upon us' (lehitgolel alenu) — the reflexive of galal ('to roll') creates a vivid image of being overwhelmed, as if a boulder were rolling over them. The metaphor captures the brothers' sense of inevitable doom.
18. 'Attack us' (lehitnappel alenu) — the reflexive of naphal ('to fall') means to fall upon, to assault. Combined with 'roll upon us,' the brothers envision a violent ambush.
18. 'Take us as slaves, along with our donkeys' — the brothers fear total confiscation: their freedom and their property. The inclusion of donkeys is not trivial; for pastoral nomads, losing pack animals meant losing the ability to transport goods and sustain livelihood.
19. 'At the entrance of the house' (petach habbayit) — the brothers intercept the steward before entering, at the threshold. They want to resolve the silver issue before crossing the doorway, as if entering the house under suspicion would seal their fate. The threshold is a liminal space — neither safe outside nor trapped inside.
20. 'Please, my lord' (bi adoni) — a respectful, almost pleading form of address. The brothers approach the steward with deference, treating even a household servant as a superior. Their social position as foreign petitioners leaves them no leverage.
20. 'We did indeed come down' (yarod yaradnu) — another infinitive absolute, this time emphasizing the sincerity of their original visit. They are building a defense: our first trip was legitimate; we are honest buyers, not thieves.
21. 'The lodging place' (hammalon) — the same term used in 42:27. It designates a stopping point on the road, not a formal inn. Travelers would camp at established sites along trade routes.
21. 'Our silver in its full weight' (kaspenu bemishqalo) — the brothers emphasize that they are returning the exact amount, weighed precisely. In the ancient Near East, silver was measured by weight (the shekel was a unit of weight before it became a coin). By specifying 'full weight,' they demonstrate they have not skimmed any portion.
21. 'We have brought it back in our hand' — the brothers protest their honesty: they could have kept the silver quietly, but instead they carry it back openly. The phrase 'in our hand' (beyadenu) means it is visible, accessible, ready for inspection — nothing hidden.
22. 'Additional silver' (kesef acher) — beyond the returned amount, they carry new money for the current purchase. This is the 'double silver' Jacob instructed them to bring (v. 12). They present both amounts to demonstrate full transparency.
22. 'We do not know who put our silver in our sacks' — a genuine confession of bewilderment. The brothers have no explanation for the returned silver and do not attempt to fabricate one. Their honesty here builds credibility with the steward and, indirectly, serves Joseph's purposes — it confirms they are not deceitful men.
23. 'Peace to you' (shalom lakhem) — the steward's greeting addresses not just their immediate anxiety but offers a comprehensive reassurance. Shalom encompasses well-being, wholeness, safety — everything the brothers fear they have lost.
23. 'Your God and the God of your father' (Eloheikhem ve'Elohei avikhem) — remarkably, the Egyptian steward attributes the mysterious silver to the brothers' own God. This may indicate that Joseph has instructed his steward in advance (the steward clearly knows about the returned silver), or it may reflect Joseph's household having absorbed some knowledge of the patriarchal God. The phrase 'God of your father' is a distinctive patriarchal formula (31:5, 42; 32:10).
23. 'Treasure' (matmon) — from taman ('to hide, bury'). A matmon is hidden wealth, buried treasure. The steward reframes the mysterious silver not as an accusation-in-waiting but as a divine gift — something God secretly placed in their sacks. This interpretation, whether the steward's own or Joseph's scripted response, dissolves the brothers' fear entirely.
23. 'Your silver came to me' (kaspekhem ba elai) — the steward confirms receipt of their original payment, removing any suggestion of theft. The brothers are cleared, and the returned silver is explained as divine generosity, not bureaucratic error.
23. 'He brought Simeon out to them' — almost as an afterthought, the narrator mentions Simeon's release. Simeon has been imprisoned since 42:24, and his restoration to the family is accomplished in a single clause. The narrative focus remains on the larger drama unfolding.
24. Foot-washing and animal care are standard elements of ancient Near Eastern hospitality (cf. 18:4; 19:2; 24:32). The steward performs the duties of a host on Joseph's behalf. After the tension of the threshold conversation, normality returns: water, foot-washing, fodder. The brothers are being treated as honored guests, not suspected criminals.
25. 'Prepared the gift' (vayyakhinu et-hamminchah) — the brothers arrange their diplomatic offering for optimal presentation. The minchah ('gift, tribute') is the same word used for grain offerings in Leviticus; here it simply means a tribute gift for a superior. The brothers marshal every resource at their disposal to make a favorable impression.
25. 'Eat bread' (yokhlu lachem) — 'to eat bread' is a Hebrew idiom for having a meal, not necessarily bread specifically. The invitation to dine with the governor would have been both an honor and a source of continued anxiety.
26. 'Bowed down before him to the ground' (vayyishtachavu-lo artsah) — another fulfillment of Joseph's dreams (37:7, 9). This is now the second time the brothers bow before Joseph (cf. 42:6). The dreams of sheaves bowing and celestial bodies making obeisance are being fulfilled repeatedly, though the brothers remain unaware.

26. The gift (minchah) is presented upon entry — proper protocol for meeting a dignitary. The brothers follow the customs of the ancient Near Eastern court, approaching their own brother as a foreign lord.
27. 'He asked them about their welfare' (vayyish'al lahem leshalom) — Joseph inquires using the standard formula for well-being. But his questions quickly zero in on what he truly wants to know: Is my father alive?
27. 'The old man' (hazzaqen) — Joseph's reference to his father as 'the old man' maintains his Egyptian persona while betraying, perhaps, a twinge of emotion. The word zaqen conveys both advanced age and the honor due to an elder. Joseph has not seen his father in over twenty years; his urgent question — 'Is he still alive?' — reveals the anxiety beneath the official facade.
28. 'Your servant our father' (avdekha le'avinu) — the brothers call Jacob 'your servant,' using the language of feudal deference. The patriarch of the covenant family is described as a servant of an Egyptian official — who is, unknown to them, their own brother. The layers of irony are extraordinary.
28. 'They bowed low and prostrated themselves' (vayyiqqdu vayyishtachavu) — two verbs for bowing: qadad (to bow the head) and hishtachavah (to prostrate fully). The double gesture expresses maximal deference and further fulfills Joseph's dreams.
29. 'His brother Benjamin, his mother's son' (Binyamin achiv ben-immo) — the narrator clarifies the relationship with extraordinary tenderness: not just 'brother' but 'his mother's son.' Benjamin is the only other child of Rachel, the beloved wife who died giving him birth (35:18). Joseph and Benjamin share a bond that the other brothers cannot: the bond of a shared mother who is gone.
29. 'Your youngest brother' (achikhem haqqaton) — Joseph maintains the pretense, asking about Benjamin as if seeing him for the first time. But his words are strained, barely maintaining the official distance.
29. 'God be gracious to you, my son' (Elohim yochonkha beni) — Joseph's blessing is startlingly personal. The verb chanan ('to be gracious, show favor') is a deep theological term for divine generosity. And 'my son' (beni) — Joseph addresses his younger brother as a father might, an expression of overwhelming affection that the brothers likely attribute to Egyptian courtesy but that carries far deeper meaning. Joseph is scarcely holding himself together.
30. 'His compassion burned' (nikhmeru rachamav) — the verb kamar (found only in the Niphal in biblical Hebrew) means to grow warm, to burn with emotion. Combined with rachamim ('compassion,' from rechem, 'womb'), the phrase describes a visceral, overwhelming surge of love that is almost physical — a churning in the gut, a burning in the chest. This is among the most emotionally intense phrases in the Hebrew Bible.
30. 'He sought a place to weep' (vayevaqesh livkot) — Joseph, the most powerful man in Egypt after Pharaoh, must hide to cry. His public persona cannot accommodate the tidal wave of emotion that seeing Benjamin unleashes. The contrast between Joseph's external authority and his internal vulnerability is one of the narrative's great achievements.
30. This is the second time Joseph weeps in the brothers' story (cf. 42:24). He will weep again at the moment of revelation (45:2, 14-15) and at Jacob's death (50:1). Joseph's tears mark the emotional through-line of the narrative: the powerful man who cannot stop feeling.
31. 'He controlled himself' (vayyit'appaq) — the reflexive of apaq ('to restrain, hold back') describes Joseph forcing his emotions back under control. The effort required is palpable. He has wept, washed, and now must reassemble the mask of the Egyptian lord. This verb will appear again in 45:1, where Joseph can no longer restrain himself and finally reveals his identity.
31. 'Serve the meal' (simu lachem) — literally 'set bread.' Joseph reassumes command with a curt directive. The transition from private weeping to public authority is accomplished in three words. The banquet that follows (vv. 32-34) will be another stage in Joseph's testing of the brothers.
32. Three separate tables: Joseph alone, the brothers together, the Egyptian officials together. The segregation follows Egyptian ritual purity customs. Joseph sits alone, occupying an ambiguous social space — ethnically Hebrew but functionally Egyptian. He belongs to neither table, a physical symbol of his dual identity.
32. 'An abomination' (to'evah) — the word denotes something ritually detestable or culturally taboo. Egyptian dietary and purity regulations prohibited eating with foreigners, particularly pastoral peoples (cf. 46:34, where shepherds are called an abomination to Egypt). This cultural barrier will be spectacularly broken when Joseph reveals himself.
32. 'The Hebrews' (ha'Ivrim) — the ethnic designation used by outsiders for the Israelites. The term may derive from 'Eber' (10:21) or from avar ('to cross over'), designating people who crossed the Euphrates. In Egyptian contexts, it carries social connotations of foreignness and lower status.
33. 'The firstborn according to his birthright and the youngest according to his youth' (habbikhor kikhvorato vehatsa'ir kitso'irato) — all eleven brothers are seated in exact birth order. The probability of this arrangement occurring by chance is astronomically small (1 in nearly 40 million for eleven people). The brothers' astonishment is entirely justified: how could an Egyptian official know their precise birth sequence?
33. 'They looked at one another in astonishment' (vayyitmahu ha'anashim ish el-re'ehu) — the verb tamah ('to be astounded, to marvel') expresses bewildered wonder. The brothers exchange glances of disbelief. This uncanny knowledge should, perhaps, have triggered recognition — but the idea that the governor of Egypt is their brother Joseph is so far outside their frame of reference that it never occurs to them.
33. The seating arrangement serves Joseph's purposes: it demonstrates his seemingly supernatural knowledge (reinforcing the diviner persona he will invoke in 44:15) while simultaneously unsettling the brothers and keeping them off balance.

34. 'Portions' (mas'ot) — from nasa ('to lift, carry'). The word denotes servings or portions lifted from the host's table and sent to guests, a mark of honor in ancient Near Eastern dining customs.
34. 'Five times greater' (chamesh yadot) — literally 'five hands.' Benjamin receives a portion five times larger than his brothers'. The number five has Egyptian associations (cf. the fifth of Pharaoh's tax, 41:34; five changes of clothing for Benjamin, 45:22). More significantly, Joseph is testing the brothers: will they resent Benjamin's preferential treatment as they once resented Joseph's favored status? Will jealousy resurface? This is a deliberate provocation designed to reveal whether the brothers have changed.
34. 'They drank and became merry with him' (vayyishtu vayyishkeru immo) — the verb shakar means to drink freely, to become intoxicated. The evening ends in celebration, the brothers' anxieties apparently dissolved by wine and hospitality. But the reader knows that the final test is yet to come: Joseph's silver cup will be planted in Benjamin's sack (44:2), and the brothers' true character will face its ultimate trial.

Summary: Joseph plants his silver cup in Benjamin's sack. The brothers depart, are overtaken, and the cup is found. They return in despair. Joseph demands Benjamin as his slave. Judah delivers a speech of extraordinary power, recounting the family's pain and offering himself as a slave in Benjamin's place.

What Makes This Remarkable: Judah's speech (vv. 18-34) is the longest uninterrupted address in Genesis and one of the finest pieces of rhetoric in the Hebrew Bible. The man who once said 'let us sell him' (37:27) now says 'let me remain instead of the boy as a slave' (v. 33). His description of Jacob's soul being 'bound up' with Benjamin's (v. 30) uses the verb qashar — a bond of life to life. The test Joseph has engineered is precise: will the brothers abandon the favored son of Rachel (Benjamin) as they abandoned the first (Joseph)? Judah's answer is self-sacrifice.

Translation Friction: Joseph's reference to 'divination' (nachesh, v. 5) with the silver cup raises questions about whether he actually practiced Egyptian divination or was maintaining his disguise. The Hebrew verb is the same root as nachash ('serpent'), connecting to Genesis 3 in ways the text does not develop. We rendered it directly and noted the cultural context. The phrase nephesh qeshurah benaphsho ('his soul is bound up with the boy's soul,' v. 30) uses language of such intensity that no English equivalent fully captures the depth of paternal attachment.

Connections: Judah's willingness to become a slave in Benjamin's place (44:33) is often read as a type of substitutionary self-offering that anticipates the theology of Isaiah 53. The cup test parallels the birthright test of chapter 25 — both probe what a brother is willing to sacrifice. The entire arc from chapter 37 to this moment traces the brothers' repentance and Judah's transformation from betrayer to redeemer.

1He commanded the steward of his house, saying, "Fill the men's sacks with food, as much as they can carry, and put each man's silver in the mouth of his sack." 2And put my cup — the silver cup — in the mouth of the youngest one's sack, along with his grain money." And he did according to the word that Joseph had spoken. 3At the light of morning, the men were sent away — they and their donkeys. 4They had gone out of the city and had not gone far when Joseph said to the steward of his house, "Rise, pursue the men, and when you overtake them, say to them, 'Why have you repaid evil for good?'" 5Is this not the one from which my lord drinks, and by which he indeed divines? You have done evil in what you have done. 6He overtook them and spoke these words to them. 7They said to him, "Why does my lord speak such words? Far be it from your servants to do such a thing!" 8Look, the silver that we found in the mouths of our sacks we brought back to you from the land of Canaan. How then could we steal silver or gold from your lord's house? 9Whoever among your servants is found with it shall die, and the rest of us will also become slaves to my lord. 10He said, "Let it indeed be according to your words: he with whom it is found shall be my slave, but the rest of you shall go free." 11They quickly lowered each man's sack to the ground, and each man opened his sack. 12He searched, beginning with the eldest and ending with the youngest, and the cup was found in Benjamin's sack. 13They tore their garments, and each man loaded his donkey, and they returned to the city. 14Judah and his brothers came to Joseph's house — he was still there — and they fell before him to the ground. 15Joseph said to them, "What is this deed that you have done? Do you not know that a man such as I indeed practices divination?" 16Judah said, "What can we say to my lord? What can we speak? How can we clear ourselves? God has found out the guilt of your servants. Here we are, my lord's slaves — both we and the one in whose hand the cup was found." ¹⁷But he said, "Far be it from me to do such a thing. The man in whose hand the cup was found — he shall be my slave. But as for you, go up in peace to your father." ¹⁸Then Judah approached him and said, "Please, my lord, let your servant speak a word in my lord's ears, and let not your anger burn against your servant, for you are like Pharaoh himself." ¹⁹My lord asked his servants, saying, "Do you have a father or a brother?" ²⁰We said to my lord, 'We have a father, an old man, and a child of his old age, a young one. His brother is dead, and he then alone is left of his mother, and his father loves him.' ²¹You said to your servants, 'Bring him down to me, so that I may set my eyes on him.' ²²We said to my lord, 'The boy cannot leave his father, for if he were to leave his father, his father would die.' ²³But you said to your servants, 'Unless your youngest brother comes down with you, you shall not see my face again.' ²⁴When we went up to your servant my father, we told him the words of my lord. ²⁵Our father said, 'Go again, buy us a little food.' ²⁶We said, 'We cannot go down. If our youngest brother is with us, then we will go down, for we cannot see the man's face unless our youngest brother is with us.' ²⁷Your servant my father said to us, 'You know that my wife bore me two sons.' ²⁸One went out from me, and I said, "Surely he has been torn to pieces," and I have not seen him since. ²⁹If you take this one also from my presence and harm befalls him, you will bring down my gray hairs in misery to Sheol. ³⁰Now then, when I come to your servant my father, and the boy is not with us — since his soul is bound up with the boy's soul — ³¹when he sees that the boy is not with us, he will die. And your servants will have brought down the gray hairs of your servant our father in sorrow to Sheol. ³²For your servant became surety for the boy to my father, saying, 'If I do not bring him back to you, then I will bear the blame before my father all my days.' ³³Now then, please let your servant remain instead of the boy as a slave to my lord, and let the boy go up with his brothers. ³⁴For how can I go up to my father if the boy is not with me? I could not bear to see the evil that would find my father.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Joseph now orchestrates the decisive test. After the banquet's warmth, he sets a trap that will expose the brothers' true character. The instructions are precise and deliberate: maximum grain (generosity) combined with returned silver (the first layer of the setup).
1. 'As much as they can carry' (ka'asher yuklun se'et) — Joseph is lavishly generous even in his testing. The brothers will leave with full sacks, a detail that makes the accusation of theft all the more jarring.
2. 'My cup' (gevi'i) — Joseph specifies his personal cup, a goblet of particular significance. The word gavi'a denotes a bowl or goblet, used elsewhere for the cups on the golden lampstand (Exodus 25:31-34). As Joseph's personal drinking vessel, it carries both material value and symbolic weight.
2. 'The silver cup' (gevi'a hakkesef) — the appositive specification emphasizes the cup's material: silver, matching the silver already returned in the sacks. Silver pervades this narrative as a symbol of guilt and restitution — the brothers sold Joseph for silver (37:28), and silver keeps mysteriously reappearing in their sacks.
2. 'In the mouth of the youngest one's sack' — Benjamin is targeted precisely because he is the innocent one, the brother who had no part in selling Joseph. The test is designed to place the guiltless brother in jeopardy: will the others abandon him as they once abandoned Joseph, or will they stand by him? Joseph needs to know if they have changed.
3. 'At the light of morning' (habboqer or) — dawn. The brothers depart at first light, eager to return home with Benjamin, Simeon, and full sacks of grain. They have no reason to suspect anything. The narrative builds suspense through their innocent departure: the reader knows what they do not.
4. 'Not yet far off' (lo hirschiqu) — Joseph times the pursuit carefully. The brothers must be close enough to be overtaken quickly but far enough from the city to feel the full shock of being chased down. The pacing is theatrical — Joseph is directing a dramatic scene.
4. 'Why have you repaid evil for good?' (lammah shillamtem ra'ah tachat tovah) — the accusation is devastating in its moral framing. The brothers were treated with extraordinary generosity (banquet, full sacks, Simeon's release), and now they are accused of repaying that kindness with theft. The phrase tachat ('in place of, in exchange for') implies a deliberate inversion of just reciprocity.
5. 'By which he indeed divines' (nacheish yenacheish) — the infinitive absolute of nachash ('to practice divination, to observe signs') emphatically asserts Joseph's supposed divinatory powers. Cup divination (lecanomancy) was widely practiced in the ancient Near East: liquids were poured into a cup, and patterns in the liquid's movement were interpreted as omens. Whether Joseph actually practiced this or merely maintained the appearance is debated. In context, the claim serves to frighten the brothers — they face not merely a powerful lord but one with supernatural knowledge.
5. 'You have done evil' (hare'otem asher asitem) — the steward's accusation is categorical. The brothers, who moments ago were celebrating, are now charged with ingratitude and theft. The emotional whiplash is part of Joseph's design.
6. The steward faithfully delivers Joseph's scripted accusation. The brevity of this verse — 'he overtook them and spoke these words' — mirrors the speed of the pursuit. The brothers' freedom is measured in minutes; the joyful homeward journey is cut brutally short.

7. 'Far be it from your servants' (chalilah la'avadekha) — the word chalilah is an exclamation of moral horror, expressing something so repugnant that it is unthinkable. It derives from chalal ('to profane, defile') — literally, 'it would be profanation!' The brothers' outrage is genuine; they have not stolen the cup. Their innocence on this specific charge is absolute, which makes their rash oath in verse 9 all the more dramatic.
8. The brothers mount a logical defense: they voluntarily returned silver they could have kept; why would they then steal from the same house? The argument from character is compelling. They cite evidence of their honesty (returning the silver) to argue for the impossibility of the theft. Their reasoning is sound — but Joseph has stacked the evidence against them.
8. 'Silver or gold' (kesef o zahav) — the brothers escalate: not merely silver but gold too — they would steal neither. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'impossible.'
9. 'Shall die' (vamet) — the brothers propose the death penalty for the thief and collective slavery for the rest. Their confidence in their innocence leads them to propose terms far harsher than necessary. This rash oath echoes Jacob's unknowing death sentence on Rachel when Laban searched for his household gods: 'Whoever has your gods shall not live' (31:32). In both cases, the innocent beloved is imperiled by a hasty oath.
9. The brothers' willingness to become slaves is deeply ironic: they once sold their brother into slavery, and now they offer themselves for the same fate. The narrative circles back on itself with devastating precision.
10. The steward accepts the brothers' framework but softens the terms: only the guilty party becomes a slave; the rest go free (neqiyim, 'clean, innocent, blameless'). This modification is critical to Joseph's test. If the brothers can walk away free while Benjamin alone bears the punishment, will they abandon him? Or will they stay and fight for his freedom?
10. The steward's revision creates the exact moral scenario Joseph needs: the brothers can save themselves at Benjamin's expense — precisely what they did to Joseph twenty years earlier. Their response will reveal whether they have fundamentally changed.
11. 'Quickly' (vayemaharu) — the verb mahar ('to hurry') conveys the brothers' eagerness to be vindicated. They are confident; they rush to prove their innocence. The haste of the guilty man is to flee; the haste of the innocent is to demonstrate — and the brothers hasten to demonstrate. They do not know what awaits them in Benjamin's sack.
12. 'Beginning with the eldest and ending with the youngest' (baggadol hechel uvaqqaton killah) — the search proceeds in birth order, from Reuben to Benjamin. This methodical sequence builds unbearable suspense. Each sack opened and found clean raises the brothers' confidence — and the reader's dread. By the time the steward reaches Benjamin, ten brothers have been cleared. The narrative slows to its most excruciating pace.
12. 'The cup was found in Benjamin's sack' (vayyimmatse haggavi'a be'amtachat Binyamin) — the passive verb 'was found' (nimtsa) carries the weight of the entire chapter. The brothers' world collapses. The innocent one, the one they were sworn to protect, the one for whom Judah pledged his own life — he is the one holding the incriminating evidence. Joseph's trap has closed.
13. 'They tore their garments' (vayyiqre'u simlotam) — garment-tearing is the standard ancient Israelite expression of grief, horror, and mourning. The act recalls Jacob tearing his garments when shown Joseph's bloodied robe (37:34). The sons now experience the same devastation they once inflicted on their father. The measure-for-measure symmetry is exact: they caused a father to tear his garments; now they tear their own.
13. 'They returned to the city' (vayyashuvu ha'irah) — this is the decisive moment. The steward offered them freedom: only Benjamin would be held. They could have continued to Canaan, presented their grain to Jacob, and reported Benjamin's 'crime.' Instead, every single brother turns back. Not one abandons Benjamin. This collective return is the first clear evidence that the brothers have changed. They will not repeat the sin of twenty years ago.
14. 'Judah and his brothers' (Yehudah ve'echav) — the narrator names Judah first, signaling his leadership. This is no longer 'the brothers' as an undifferentiated group; it is Judah leading his brothers. The shift in designation marks the culmination of Judah's rise from the brother who sold Joseph (37:26-27) to the brother who will offer his life for Benjamin (v. 33).
14. 'They fell before him to the ground' (vayyipelu lefanav artsah) — the verb naphal ('to fall') is more extreme than hishtachavah ('to bow'). This is not formal obeisance but the collapse of desperate men. They throw themselves at Joseph's feet in utter submission. The dream of the sheaves and stars finds its most complete fulfillment.
14. 'He was still there' (vehu odenu sham) — Joseph has remained in his house, waiting. He knows exactly what will happen. The brief parenthetical underscores Joseph's total control of the situation.
15. 'What is this deed that you have done?' (mah hamma'aseh hazzeh asher asitem) — Joseph's accusation echoes the language of confrontation used throughout Genesis: God to Eve (3:13), Jacob to Laban (29:25), Abimelech to Abraham (20:9). The formula demands an accounting.
15. 'A man such as I indeed practices divination' (nacheish yenacheish ish asher kamoni) — the infinitive absolute again (cf. v. 5). Joseph presents himself as one who can discern hidden truths through supernatural means. The claim serves the theatrical purpose: how can you steal from a man who sees all secrets? The irony is that Joseph does know the truth — but through orchestration, not divination.
15. The question of whether Joseph actually practiced divination or merely used it as a cover is debated. Most traditional interpreters view it as a deliberate deception consistent with his Egyptian persona. Joseph is playing a role; the divination claim is part of the mask.
16. 'What can we say... what can we speak... how can we clear ourselves' (mah-nomar... mah-nedabber... mah-nittstadaq) — three rhetorical questions cascade in mounting despair. The first two concern speech itself: words have failed them. The third concerns justification: the root ts-d-q ('to be righteous, to justify') appears in the reflexive — 'how can we declare ourselves righteous?' They cannot.

16. 'God has found out the guilt of your servants' (ha'Elohim matsa et-avon avadekha) — this is Judah's most profound statement. He does not protest Benjamin's innocence regarding the cup. Instead, he makes a stunning theological confession: God has uncovered a deeper guilt — the guilt (avon) they have carried since selling Joseph. The cup is merely the occasion; the true crime is twenty years old. Judah recognizes divine justice operating through apparently unjust circumstances.
16. 'Both we and the one in whose hand the cup was found' (gam-anachnu gam asher-nimtsa haggavi'a beyado) — Judah refuses the steward's earlier offer of freedom for the brothers (v. 10). He insists on collective solidarity: all will be slaves, or none. This is the opposite of what they did to Joseph, when they let one brother bear the punishment while they went free.
17. 'Far be it from me' (chalilah li) — Joseph returns the brothers' own word (v. 7) back to them. He refuses collective punishment and insists on individual justice: only the 'guilty' party stays.
17. 'Go up in peace to your father' (alu leshalom el-avikhem) — this is the cruelest mercy imaginable. Joseph offers the brothers exactly what the steward offered: freedom for all except Benjamin. They can return to Jacob in 'peace' (shalom) — but how could there be shalom if Benjamin is left behind? The word shalom becomes bitterly ironic: there is no wholeness, no well-being, no peace possible if the brothers return without the boy.
17. This is the crux of Joseph's test. Everything has led to this moment. The brothers can walk away. They have legal cover — the steward modified their oath (v. 10). They have Joseph's own permission. Benjamin is not their full brother. They can go home, tell Jacob that Benjamin was caught stealing, and live with one more lie. Or they can refuse. Judah's response in the following verses will be the single most important speech in Genesis.
18. 'Judah approached him' (vayiggash elav Yehudah) — the verb nagash ('to draw near, approach') marks a decisive physical and moral step. Judah closes the distance between himself and the most powerful man in Egypt. This approach is an act of courage that borders on recklessness — uninvited proximity to a ruler could be lethal. The word vayiggash will give this chapter its traditional Jewish name: Parashat Vayiggash.
18. 'Please, my lord' (bi adoni) — the same deferential formula used in v. 20 of the previous chapter (43:20). Judah requests permission to speak at length, a courtesy that recognizes the extraordinary nature of what he is about to do: a foreign slave-shepherd is about to deliver the longest speech in Genesis to the governor of Egypt.
18. 'You are like Pharaoh' (ki kamokha ke-Phar'oh) — this comparison serves multiple functions: (1) flattery, acknowledging Joseph's supreme authority; (2) a veiled reminder that Pharaoh is known for justice, implying Joseph should also be just; (3) dramatic irony, since Joseph is second only to Pharaoh and the comparison is more apt than Judah knows.
19. Judah begins his speech by recounting the history of their interactions with Joseph. He starts from the beginning — the first interrogation — establishing the narrative context for his appeal. By rehearsing the facts, Judah demonstrates that every step was initiated by Joseph: it was the governor who asked the questions, the governor who demanded Benjamin, the governor who created the present crisis.
20. 'A father, an old man' (av zaqen) — Judah's description of Jacob emphasizes age and vulnerability. The patriarch is not presented as a powerful clan leader but as an elderly, fragile man whose emotional survival depends on one remaining son.
20. 'A child of his old age, a young one' (yeled zequnim qaton) — Benjamin is described tenderly, in terms that stress his youth and his special place as a child born to aged parents. The designation qaton ('little one, youngest') emphasizes his vulnerability.
20. 'His brother is dead' (achiv met) — Judah states this as fact. He does not know Joseph is alive. The irony is absolute: Judah tells Joseph, to his face, that Joseph is dead. For Joseph, hearing these words from the brother who proposed selling him must be an experience of shattering emotional complexity.
20. 'He alone is left of his mother' (hu levaddo notar le'immo) — Rachel, the beloved wife, bore two sons. One is presumed dead. Benjamin is the sole surviving link to her. This detail explains Jacob's desperate attachment and grounds it not in mere favoritism but in grief for a dead wife and a lost son.
20. 'His father loves him' (ve'aviv ahevo) — the verb ahav ('to love') is stated simply and without apology. Jacob loves Benjamin. Judah acknowledges this favoritism without resentment — a remarkable change from the brothers who 'could not speak peacefully' to Joseph because Jacob loved him (37:4).
21. 'Set my eyes on him' (asimah eini alav) — in Joseph's original demand, the phrase likely meant 'so that I may examine him' or 'keep watch over him.' But Judah's repetition of it subtly reframes the expression: to 'set one's eyes' on someone can mean to watch over with either benevolence or malice. Judah is gently suggesting that Joseph's interest in Benjamin has become something dangerous.
22. 'The boy cannot leave his father' (lo-yukhal hanna'ar la'azov et-aviv) — Judah conveys not physical impossibility but emotional truth: Benjamin's departure would be lethal to Jacob. The father and son are bound in a relationship so deep that separation would kill the father.
22. 'His father would die' (vamet) — the simple word vamet ('and he would die') places the ultimate consequence before Joseph. Judah is warning the governor that his actions have life-and-death stakes for an old man in Canaan. The appeal shifts from legal argument to human compassion.
23. Judah is carefully building a chain of causation: Joseph demanded Benjamin's presence (the cause), Jacob was forced to comply (under duress), and now Benjamin is here (the consequence). The implication is that responsibility for the current crisis rests not with the brothers but with the Egyptian governor himself. This is rhetorically brilliant: Judah is not accusing Joseph of injustice but leading him to see the humanitarian cost of his own demands.

24. 'Your servant my father' (avdekha avi) — Judah maintains the language of deference, calling Jacob 'your servant,' while also claiming the intimate relationship — 'my father.' The dual designation keeps Judah's speech within diplomatic protocol while making the personal stakes unmistakable.
25. Judah now shifts from recounting what happened with Joseph to recounting what happened at home with Jacob. He is drawing the Egyptian governor into the domestic scene in Canaan — making Joseph see the family's private pain. The simplicity of Jacob's request — 'a little food' (me'at okhel) — underscores the family's desperation.
26. Judah's repetition of the condition — 'unless our youngest brother is with us' — drives home the point that the brothers were not willing accomplices but constrained agents. They tried to resist; the governor's ultimatum left them no choice. Every appearance of Benjamin before this official is a consequence of the official's own demand.
27. 'My wife' (ishti) — Jacob says 'my wife,' singular. He has had four women who bore his children — Leah, Rachel, Bilhah, and Zilpah — but in his heart, Rachel alone was 'my wife.' This is one of the most revealing and painful moments in Judah's speech. He quotes his father's words without comment, but the implication is staggering: by calling Rachel 'my wife,' Jacob implicitly relegates Leah (Judah's own mother) to secondary status. Yet Judah repeats these words without rancor, without protest. He has accepted his father's favoritism and moved beyond resentment. This acceptance is itself evidence of Judah's transformation.
27. 'Bore me two sons' (shenayim yaldah-li) — Rachel's two sons: Joseph and Benjamin. Jacob defines his deepest identity through these two children. The other ten sons exist, are loved in some measure, but do not occupy the same place in Jacob's heart. Judah knows this and recites it without bitterness.
28. 'One went out from me' (vayyetse ha'echad me'itti) — Jacob's description of Joseph's disappearance as 'going out from me' (rather than 'being sold by his brothers') reflects his ignorance of the true circumstances. The phrase me'itti ('from me, from my presence') conveys loss as a departure — Joseph simply left and never returned.
28. 'Surely he has been torn to pieces' (akh tarof toraf) — the infinitive absolute intensifies the certainty: 'he has absolutely been torn apart.' This is what the bloodied robe told Jacob (37:33). Judah, who helped devise the deception with the robe, now stands before the 'torn' brother and repeats their father's anguished conclusion. For Joseph, hearing his own death reported to his face by the brother who engineered the deception must be almost unbearable.
28. 'I have not seen him since' (velo re'itiv ad-hennah) — the finality of this clause carries twenty years of grief compressed into five Hebrew words. Jacob has given up hope. Joseph is dead to him. The pathos of this statement, delivered to Joseph himself, explains why Joseph will soon be unable to control his emotions (45:1).
29. 'This one also' (gam-et-zeh) — the word gam ('also, even') carries the weight of accumulating loss. Jacob has already lost Joseph; losing Benjamin too would be the final, fatal blow.
29. 'Harm' (ason) — the same rare word from 42:4 and 42:38. It denotes catastrophic, potentially fatal harm. Jacob's fear is specific and recurrent, expressed with the same word each time, creating a verbal motif of dread.
29. 'My gray hairs in misery to Sheol' (et-seivati bera'ah she'olah) — literally 'my gray-headedness in evil to Sheol.' 'Gray hairs' (seivah) is a metonymy for old age and the honored dignity it carries. 'Misery' (ra'ah) means evil or calamity. 'Sheol' is the realm of the dead, the shadowy underworld. Jacob envisions his remaining years destroyed and his death transformed from peaceful rest to anguished descent. The image is of an old man's dignity stripped away, his final days consumed by grief so total it follows him into the grave.
30. 'His soul is bound up with the boy's soul' (nafsho qeshurah venafsho) — one of the most beautiful phrases in the Hebrew Bible. The verb qashar ('to bind, tie, join') describes Jacob's emotional bond with Benjamin as a literal binding of souls. Nefesh here means the totality of a person — life, self, being. Jacob's very existence is tied to Benjamin's; to sever one is to destroy the other. This metaphor of soul-binding echoes the language of 1 Samuel 18:1, where Jonathan's soul was 'bound' (niqsherah) to David's. It describes love so complete that two lives become one.
30. Judah's ability to articulate his father's love with such tenderness — for a son who is not Judah's full brother, whose favored status once provoked the brothers' jealousy — demonstrates the depth of his moral transformation. He does not resent this bond; he protects it.
31. 'He will die' (vamet) — Judah states this as medical certainty, not rhetorical exaggeration. Jacob will not merely grieve; the shock of losing Benjamin will kill him. The old man's fragile existence hangs by the thread of Benjamin's return.
31. 'In sorrow to Sheol' (beyagon she'olah) — this time the word is yagon ('sorrow, grief, anguish') rather than ra'ah ('misery, evil') as in v. 29. Judah varies Jacob's own language, intensifying the emotional register. Yagon is deep, prolonged grief — the kind that consumes a person from within. Jacob's descent to Sheol will be marked not by the peace of a life well-lived but by the sorrow of a father who has lost everything.
31. 'Your servants will have brought down' — Judah includes himself and his brothers in the responsibility. They will be the proximate cause of their father's death. This acceptance of collective guilt is precisely what Joseph needs to hear: the brothers now understand the consequences of their actions on the family system.
32. 'Your servant became surety' (avdekha arav et-hanna'ar) — Judah now reveals his pledge from 43:9. The verb arav ('to pledge, guarantee') appears again, connecting this moment to the promise that set the second journey in motion. Judah staked his moral standing on Benjamin's safe return, and now that pledge must be honored.

32. 'I will bear the blame before my father all my days' (vechatati le'avi kol-hayyamim) — the verb chata ('to sin') is used again: failure to return Benjamin would mark Judah as a permanent sinner against his father. This is not empty rhetoric but a solemn covenant-like commitment. Judah's sense of obligation transcends self-interest; he will carry the weight of this failure as a lifelong moral burden.
33. 'Let your servant remain instead of the boy' (yeshev-na avdekha tachat hanna'ar) — this is the climactic moment of Judah's speech and, arguably, of the entire book of Genesis. The preposition tachat ('in place of, instead of') carries the full weight of substitutionary sacrifice. Judah offers himself as a substitute — his freedom for Benjamin's, his life for a boy's. The brother who once sold Joseph into slavery for twenty pieces of silver now volunteers to become a slave himself to save Joseph's full brother.
33. The moral transformation is complete. Judah has moved from callous betrayal (37:26-27) through the Tamar incident (ch. 38, where he learned to say 'she is more righteous than I') to this moment of total self-sacrifice. He does not merely advocate for Benjamin; he offers his own body, his own freedom, his own future. This is the act that demonstrates conclusively to Joseph that his brothers have changed.
33. 'As a slave to my lord' (eved la'adoni) — Judah uses the word eved ('slave, servant') in its most literal sense. He is not offering courteous deference but actual servitude. He will remain in Egypt, in bondage, permanently separated from his family, so that Benjamin may go free.
33. 'Let the boy go up with his brothers' (vehanna'ar ya'al im-echav) — the verb alah ('to go up') denotes the ascent from Egypt to Canaan, both geographically and symbolically. Judah asks that Benjamin return home, that Jacob's soul-bound son be restored, that the old man live. And Judah will pay the price.
34. 'How can I go up to my father if the boy is not with me?' (ki-eikh e'eleh el-avi vehanna'ar einennu itti) — Judah's final words are a question without an answer. He cannot go home without Benjamin. The impossibility is not physical but moral: he cannot face his father's destruction. The question hangs in the air, unanswerable, a plea that transcends logic and enters the realm of pure compassion.
34. 'I could not bear to see the evil that would find my father' (pen er'eh bara asher yimtsa et-avi) — the Hebrew pen ('lest') introduces a feared outcome too terrible to contemplate. The verb matsa ('to find') personalizes the evil: it will 'find' Jacob, seek him out, hunt him down. Evil is not an abstraction but an active force that will locate and destroy the old man.
34. With these words, Judah's speech ends. There is no peroration, no final plea for mercy, no concluding formality. The speech simply stops, leaving Joseph — and the reader — in stunned silence. Judah has said everything that can be said. He has offered everything he has to offer. The next move belongs to Joseph.
34. This speech, the longest in Genesis, accomplishes what twenty years of separation could not: it proves to Joseph that his brothers are no longer the men who sold him. They will not abandon the favored son. They will not sacrifice the beloved brother. Judah, who once profited from Joseph's sale, now offers himself as the price of Benjamin's freedom. The chapter ends on the precipice of revelation — Joseph, in 45:1, will be unable to restrain himself any longer.

Summary: Joseph can no longer restrain himself. He clears the room and reveals his identity: 'I am Joseph!' His brothers are terrified. Joseph reinterprets the entire narrative theologically: 'God sent me before you to preserve life.' Pharaoh invites the whole family to Egypt. Joseph sends wagons and provisions. When Jacob hears that Joseph lives, his spirit revives.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joseph's theological reinterpretation (vv. 5-8) is one of the most profound statements of divine providence in the Hebrew Bible. Three times he insists that God — not the brothers — sent him to Egypt. The word she'erit ('remnant,' v. 7) introduces a concept that becomes central to prophetic theology: God preserves a surviving core through catastrophe. Joseph's weeping is now public and loud (v. 2) — 'the Egyptians heard, and the house of Pharaoh heard' — the private grief of chapters 42-43 finally breaks open. Jacob's spirit 'revived' (vattechi ruach, v. 27) echoes the language of resurrection.

Translation Friction: The word she'erit ('remnant,' v. 7) carries more theological weight than English 'remnant' suggests — it is the preserved kernel from which new life springs after devastation. We rendered it directly and noted its prophetic significance. Joseph's instruction 'do not quarrel on the way' (v. 24) uses the verb ragaz, which can mean 'to tremble,' 'to be agitated,' or 'to quarrel.' We chose 'quarrel' based on context but noted the range — he may be warning against mutual recrimination over past guilt.

Connections: Joseph's declaration 'God sent me before you' (45:5, 7, 8) anticipates the summary theology of 50:20. The invitation to dwell in Goshen (45:10) begins Israel's four-century Egyptian sojourn prophesied in 15:13. Jacob's spirit reviving (45:27) reverses his declaration 'I will go down to Sheol mourning' (37:35). The wagons from Egypt (45:27) function as tangible proof — the physical evidence that revives dead hope.

¹Then Joseph could no longer restrain himself before all who stood by him, and he cried out, "Send everyone away from me!" And no one stood with him when Joseph made himself known to his brothers. ²He wept aloud, and the Egyptians heard, and the house of Pharaoh heard. ³Joseph said to his brothers, "I am Joseph! Is my father still alive?" But his brothers could not answer him, for they were terrified before him. ⁴Joseph said to his brothers, "Come close to me, I pray you." And they came close. Then he said, "I am Joseph your brother, whom you sold into Egypt." ⁵Now therefore, do not be grieved, and do not be angry with yourselves that you sold me here, for God sent me before you to preserve life. ⁶For the famine has been in the midst of the land these two years, and there are still five years in which there will be neither plowing nor harvest. ⁷God sent me before you to establish for you a remnant in the earth, and to keep you alive as a great deliverance. ⁸So now, it was not you who sent me here, but God. He has made me a father to Pharaoh, and lord of all his house, and ruler over all the land of Egypt. ⁹Hurry and go up to my father, and say to him, 'Thus says your son Joseph: God has made me lord of all Egypt. Come down to me — do not delay.' ¹⁰You shall dwell in the land of Goshen, and you shall be near to me — you, your sons, your grandsons, your flocks, your herds, and all that you have. ¹¹I will provide for you there, for there are still five years of famine, so that you, your household, and all that you have are not reduced to poverty. ¹²And behold, your eyes see — and the eyes of my brother Benjamin — that it is my own mouth speaking to you. ¹³You shall tell my father of all my honor in Egypt, and of all that you have seen. Hurry and bring my father down here. ¹⁴He fell on the neck of his brother Benjamin and wept, and Benjamin wept on his neck. ¹⁵He kissed all his brothers and wept over them. And after that, his brothers spoke with him. ¹⁶When the report was heard in Pharaoh's house: "Joseph's brothers have come." It pleased Pharaoh and his servants. ¹⁷Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Say to your brothers, 'Do this: load your animals and go — return to the land of Canaan.'" ¹⁸Bring your father and your families and come to me. I will provide you the finest region of Egypt, and you will enjoy the richest produce of the land. ¹⁹Now you are commanded — do this: take wagons from the land of Egypt for your little ones and for your wives, and carry your father and come. ²⁰Do not let your eyes be troubled over your possessions, for the best of all the land of Egypt is yours. ²¹The sons of Israel did so. Joseph gave them wagons according to the command of Pharaoh, and he gave them provisions for the journey. ²²To each of them he gave a change of garments, but to Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver and five changes of garments. ²³To his father he sent the following: ten donkeys loaded with the best things of Egypt, and ten female donkeys loaded with grain, bread, and provisions for his father for the journey. ²⁴He sent his brothers away, and they departed. He said to them, "Do not quarrel on the way." ²⁵They went up from Egypt and came to the land of Canaan, to Jacob their father. ²⁶They told him, saying, "Joseph is still alive, and he is ruler over all the land of Egypt!" But his heart grew numb, for he did not believe them. ²⁷They told him all the words of Joseph that he had spoken to them. And when he saw the wagons that Joseph had sent to carry him, the spirit of Jacob their father revived. ²⁸Israel said, "Enough! Joseph my son is still alive. I will go and see him before I die."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Could no longer restrain himself' (lo-yakhol lehit'appeq) — the hitpael of 'apaq means to force oneself, to hold oneself back. The verb conveys the image of a dam breaking. Judah's speech in chapter 44 has done its work: the brothers' transformation is proven, and Joseph's elaborate testing collapses under the weight of his own emotion.
1. 'Send everyone away from me' (hotsiu khol-ish me'alai) — Joseph's first act of self-revelation is to create privacy. This moment is too intimate and too dangerous for Egyptian ears. The brothers' crime — selling a man into slavery — must not become public knowledge in Pharaoh's court.
1. 'Made himself known' (hitvadda) — the hitpael of yada (to know). The reflexive form suggests not merely announcing his identity but uncovering his whole self. Joseph removes the mask of the Egyptian vizier and becomes again the brother they sold.
2. 'He gave his voice in weeping' (vayyitten et-qolo bivkhi) — literally 'he gave his voice in weeping.' This is not quiet tears but audible, uncontrollable sobbing. The verb natan (to give) with qol (voice) suggests Joseph's weeping was a sound released, not merely shed. Years of concealment, grief, and longing pour out.
2. 'The Egyptians heard... the house of Pharaoh heard' — the deliberate repetition underscores how public Joseph's private moment became. Despite dismissing everyone, his weeping was so loud it penetrated walls. This detail also prepares for Pharaoh's reaction in verse 16.
3. 'I am Joseph' (ani Yosef) — three words that shatter the entire Egyptian facade. The declaration is stunningly abrupt. No preamble, no softening. After years of disguise and elaborate testing, Joseph's identity is revealed in the simplest possible statement.

3. 'Is my father still alive?' (ha'od avi chai) — Joseph has already been told Jacob is alive (43:27-28), so this question is not informational. It expresses deep emotional longing — the cry of a son who has been separated from his father for over twenty years and can scarcely believe the reunion is at hand.
3. 'Terrified' (nivhalu) — the niphal of bahal means to be dismayed, terrified, overwhelmed with sudden alarm. The brothers' terror is not merely surprise; it is the shock of realizing that the all-powerful Egyptian ruler before whom they have been bowing is the very brother they sold into slavery. Every cruelty, every lie, every deception is now exposed before the one who has power of life and death over them.
4. 'Come close to me' (geshu-na elai) — a tender invitation. The particle na softens the imperative to a request. The brothers, paralyzed with fear, need to be coaxed forward. Joseph bridges the gap physically as he is about to bridge it emotionally.
4. 'Whom you sold into Egypt' (asher-mekharten oti Mitsraymah) — Joseph names the crime plainly, without euphemism. He does not say 'whom you sent away' or 'whom you gave up.' The verb makhar (to sell) strips away any pretense. Yet this statement is not an accusation — it is the foundation for the theological reinterpretation that follows in verses 5-8.
5. 'Do not be grieved' (al-te'atsvu) — from the root 'atsav, meaning to be pained, hurt, grieved. The same root describes God's grief over human wickedness before the flood (6:6). Joseph perceives that his brothers are crushed with guilt and moves immediately to relieve them.
5. 'Do not be angry with yourselves' (al-yichar be'eineikhem) — literally 'let it not burn in your eyes.' Joseph addresses both their sorrow and their self-directed anger. He understands the full emotional landscape of their guilt.
5. 'God sent me before you to preserve life' (shelachani Elohim lifneikhem lemichyah) — this is the theological heart of the Joseph narrative. The verb shalach (to send) deliberately counters makhar (to sell) from verse 4. Joseph does not deny human agency or sin; he overlays it with divine purpose. The brothers sold; God sent. Both statements are true simultaneously. The word michyah (preservation of life, sustenance) reveals God's purpose: not punishment, not merely political power, but the preservation of life itself.
6. 'Neither plowing nor harvest' (ein-charish veqatsir) — the mention of both plowing and harvest indicates complete agricultural failure. It is not merely that crops fail to grow; the conditions make it pointless even to plow. Five more years of total agricultural collapse means the situation will grow far worse before it ends.
6. Joseph provides a practical justification for his theological claim: God's sending him ahead was not abstract providence but concrete preparation for a seven-year catastrophe. The timing is precise — two years in, five to go — underscoring the urgency of bringing Jacob's family to Egypt.
7. 'To establish for you a remnant in the earth' (lasum lakhem she'erit ba'arets) — the word she'erit (remnant) is theologically loaded. It will become a major prophetic concept — the faithful remnant preserved through judgment (Isaiah 10:21, Micah 5:6-7). Here, at its earliest narrative appearance, it refers to the physical survival of Jacob's family. God's plan is not merely to save individuals but to preserve a line, a people, a covenant community.
7. 'A great deliverance' (lifletah gedolah) — the word pletah means escape, deliverance, a group of survivors. The adjective gedolah (great) elevates this from mere survival to a grand act of divine rescue. Joseph sees his entire experience — the pit, the slavery, the prison, the rise to power — as the mechanism of a great deliverance orchestrated by God.
8. 'It was not you who sent me here, but God' (lo atten shelachtem oti hena ki ha'Elohim) — this is the climactic theological statement of the Joseph narrative. Joseph does not minimize their sin (he named it plainly in v.4) but declares that behind their evil act stood a sovereign God working a greater purpose. This is not fatalism or excuse-making; it is a profound affirmation that divine sovereignty operates through and beyond human choices, even sinful ones.
8. 'A father to Pharaoh' (le-av le-Par'oh) — the title 'father' here denotes a chief counselor or trusted advisor, a usage attested in ancient Egyptian court language. The irony is rich: Joseph, who was torn from his own father, has become a 'father' to the most powerful man in the world.
8. 'Lord of all his house, and ruler over all the land of Egypt' — three titles in ascending scope: father (advisor), lord (household authority), ruler (national sovereignty). Joseph's position encompasses every sphere of Egyptian power, all orchestrated by God for the purpose stated in verses 5-7.
9. 'Hurry and go up' (maharu va'alu) — the urgency is palpable. Joseph has waited over twenty years; now he cannot bear another day of separation. The verb 'alah (to go up) reflects the geographical reality: one always goes 'up' from Egypt to Canaan.
9. 'Thus says your son Joseph' (koh amar binkha Yosef) — the messenger formula koh amar ('thus says') is typically used for royal or prophetic declarations. Joseph sends a message to his father with the authority of the second-most powerful man in Egypt, yet he identifies himself simply as 'your son Joseph.'
9. 'Come down to me — do not delay' (redah elai al-ta'amod) — the verb 'amad means to stand, to remain in place. Joseph pleads: do not stand still, do not hesitate. The five remaining years of famine make the invitation urgent.
10. 'The land of Goshen' (erets Goshen) — a fertile region in the eastern Nile Delta, well-suited for pastoral life. By settling his family in Goshen, Joseph provides them with excellent grazing land while also keeping them somewhat separate from Egyptian urban centers — a separation that will prove both protective and isolating in the centuries to come.
10. 'You shall be near to me' (vehayita qarov elai) — the longing of a son. Joseph has power, wealth, and honor, but what he wants is proximity to his father. The enumeration that follows — sons, grandsons, flocks, herds, everything — expresses Joseph's desire to gather all that belongs to Jacob under his care and protection.

11. 'I will provide for you' (vekhilkalti otkha) — from the root kul in the pilpel, meaning to sustain, nourish, provide for. Joseph assumes personal responsibility for his father's entire household. The son who was cast out now becomes the family's sustainer.
11. 'Reduced to poverty' (tivvaresh) — from the root yarash in the niphal, meaning to be dispossessed, impoverished, brought to ruin. The famine threatens not merely discomfort but total economic destruction. Joseph's invitation is an act of salvation.
12. 'Your eyes see... the eyes of my brother Benjamin' (eineikhem ro'ot... ve'einei achi Binyamin) — Joseph appeals to their direct sensory experience: see for yourselves. The singling out of Benjamin is significant. Benjamin is the only brother who shares Joseph's mother Rachel; he is 'my brother' in a double sense. Benjamin's eyes are given special mention because he alone among the brothers is innocent of the crime against Joseph.
12. 'It is my own mouth speaking to you' (ki-fi hammedabber aleikhem) — Joseph is likely speaking Hebrew directly, without the interpreter who had been mediating their previous conversations (cf. 42:23). This is proof that he is not an Egyptian lord but their Hebrew brother — he speaks their language, their words, their world.
13. 'All my honor in Egypt' (kol-kevod beMitsrayim) — kavod encompasses honor, glory, splendor, and wealth. Joseph wants his father to know not for the sake of boasting but so that Jacob will understand the move to Egypt is not a desperate flight but a journey toward abundance and security.
13. 'Hurry and bring my father down' — the repetition of urgency (cf. v.9 'hurry and go up') reveals Joseph's emotional state. He is giving instructions to his brothers, but the subtext is the longing of a son who cannot wait to see his father.
14. 'Fell on the neck of his brother Benjamin' (vayyippol al-tsavv'arei Binyamin achiv) — the verb naphal (to fall) expresses the collapse of emotional restraint into physical embrace. The plural tsavv'arei (necks) is used idiomatically in Hebrew for a single neck, perhaps conveying the fullness of the embrace.
14. Benjamin is embraced first and separately because he is Joseph's only full brother — both sons of Rachel. They share a mother's loss: Rachel died giving birth to Benjamin (35:18-19), and Joseph was taken from his family shortly after. This embrace reunites Rachel's two sons after more than two decades.
14. The mutual weeping — Joseph on Benjamin, Benjamin on Joseph — creates a symmetry of grief and joy. Benjamin, who was too young to remember Joseph's departure, now weeps with a brother restored from what must have seemed like death.
15. 'He kissed all his brothers' (vaynasheq lekhol-echav) — Joseph extends his embrace to every brother, including those who plotted his death and those who sold him. The kiss is an act of reconciliation, not merely greeting.
15. 'After that his brothers spoke with him' (acharei khi dibberu echav itto) — this is one of the most understated and powerful lines in the narrative. Until this moment, the brothers have been speechless — frozen in terror (v.3), unable to respond. Only after Joseph's tears, his theological reframing, his embrace, and his kisses does the ice finally break. The verb dibber (to speak) signals that genuine dialogue and relationship have been restored. Reconciliation is not complete until the silenced can speak.
16. 'The report was heard' (vehaqqol nishma) — qol here means report, news, or rumor, rather than the literal 'voice' of v.2. The news of Joseph's brothers' arrival spreads through the palace.
16. 'It pleased Pharaoh' (vayyitav be'einei Far'oh) — literally 'it was good in the eyes of Pharaoh.' Pharaoh's positive reaction reflects both his affection for Joseph and sound political judgment: Joseph's competent management of the famine has saved Egypt, and Pharaoh is happy to reward his family.
17. 'Load your animals' (ta'anu et-be'irkhem) — from ta'an, to load, burden. The animals are pack animals for transporting goods. Pharaoh begins issuing specific logistical instructions, demonstrating his personal involvement in the family relocation.
17. Pharaoh's directive echoes and amplifies Joseph's own instructions. The king of Egypt himself commands the journey to Canaan to retrieve Jacob, adding royal weight to Joseph's urgent plea.
18. 'The best of the land of Egypt' (tuv erets Mitsrayim) — tuv means goodness, the best part. Pharaoh offers the premium territory of Egypt, which will be identified as Goshen.
18. 'The fat of the land' (chelev ha'arets) — chelev literally means fat, the richest and most desirable portion. In sacrificial contexts, the fat is the portion reserved for God as the choicest part. Pharaoh uses this metaphor to promise the most abundant produce of the land. The expression has entered English as an idiom through the KJV translation.
19. 'Wagons' (agalot) — wheeled carts for transport, a mark of Egyptian technology and wealth. The provision of wagons is significant: Jacob's family will not need to walk or ride donkeys for the entire journey. The wagons are especially meant for the vulnerable — children and wives — and for the elderly Jacob himself. These wagons will later serve as proof to Jacob that Joseph is truly alive (v.27).
20. 'Do not let your eyes be troubled over your possessions' (ve'einkhem al-tachos al-keleikhem) — the verb chus means to pity, to show concern, to spare. Pharaoh tells them not to worry about leaving belongings behind in Canaan. Whatever they cannot transport will be more than replaced by Egypt's abundance. The mention of 'eyes' continues the motif of seeing that runs through this chapter (vv.12, 16).
20. 'The best of all the land of Egypt is yours' — Pharaoh's generosity is extravagant and unconditional. This stands in stark contrast to how Egypt will treat Israel's descendants in Exodus. The current Pharaoh's warmth makes the later Pharaoh's hostility all the more bitter.

21. 'The sons of Israel' (benei Yisra'el) — the narrator uses the formal designation 'sons of Israel' rather than 'his brothers,' perhaps anticipating the national identity this family will assume. They are not merely Joseph's brothers; they are the embryonic nation.
21. 'Provisions for the journey' (tsedah laderekh) — tsedah denotes food prepared for a journey, travel supplies. Joseph ensures they lack nothing for the long trek to Canaan and back.
22. 'Changes of garments' (chalifot semalot) — fine garments were a form of wealth and honor in the ancient Near East. Joseph gives each brother a set, recalling painfully the 'coat of many colors' (ketonet passim) that marked Joseph as the favored son and triggered the brothers' jealousy (37:3-4).
22. 'To Benjamin he gave three hundred pieces of silver and five changes of garments' — Benjamin receives dramatically more than the others. This preferential treatment echoes Jacob's favoring of Joseph. Yet Joseph does not fear the brothers' jealousy now — either because he trusts their transformation or because his admonition in v.24 addresses this concern. The five garments may correspond to the five remaining years of famine, or they may simply reflect abundant generosity toward his only full brother.
23. 'Ten donkeys loaded with the best things of Egypt' — the gifts are lavish: twenty animals in total, carrying Egypt's finest goods. The ten male donkeys carry luxury items (mittuv Mitsrayim, 'from the goodness of Egypt'), while the ten female donkeys carry practical sustenance for the journey.
23. 'Grain, bread, and provisions' (bar valechem umazon) — three terms for food, emphasizing abundance. Bar is raw grain, lechem is bread (prepared food), and mazon is general provisions or sustenance. Joseph ensures his father will lack nothing.
24. 'Do not quarrel on the way' (al-tirgezu baderekh) — the verb ragaz has a range of meanings: to tremble, to be agitated, to quarrel. The precise sense here is debated. It could mean: (a) do not quarrel with one another — perhaps about who bears the most blame for selling Joseph; (b) do not be agitated or anxious — a calming reassurance after the emotional turmoil; (c) do not linger or get distracted on the road. The context of brothers burdened with old guilt and new revelations makes (a) most likely. Joseph knows them well enough to anticipate that the journey home could devolve into recrimination and blame-shifting.
25. 'They went up from Egypt' (vayyaalu miMitsrayim) — the journey is described with characteristic brevity. The narrator skips the entire journey — no details of travel, no overnight stops — and cuts directly to the arrival. The narrative is focused entirely on the emotional arc: Joseph's revelation, the brothers' departure, and now Jacob's reaction.
26. 'Joseph is still alive' (od Yosef chai) — the news is delivered bluntly. There is no soft preparation, no gradual revelation. The brothers simply declare what seemed impossible: Joseph lives.
26. 'His heart grew numb' (vayyafag libbo) — the verb pug means to grow cold, to become numb, to faint. Jacob's heart does not leap with joy — it goes numb. After more than twenty years of mourning a son he believed dead, after the deception of the blood-soaked coat (37:31-33), Jacob's first reaction is not belief but paralysis. The news is too great, too improbable, too good to absorb. This is the response of a man whose grief has become the structure of his identity.
26. 'He did not believe them' (lo he'emin lahem) — the irony cuts deep. The brothers who deceived Jacob about Joseph's death (37:31-35) now tell him the truth, and he cannot believe them. Their credibility was destroyed by their original lie, and even truth cannot immediately repair what deception has broken.
27. 'All the words of Joseph' (kol divrei Yosef) — the brothers relay everything Joseph said. The theological reframing (God sent me), the practical plan (come to Goshen), the urgency (do not delay) — all of it is repeated to Jacob. Words alone, however, are insufficient; it is the physical evidence that turns the tide.
27. 'When he saw the wagons' (vayyar et-ha'agalot) — seeing is believing where hearing was not enough. The wagons are proof: no one in Canaan could send Egyptian wagons. They are tangible evidence of Joseph's power and his invitation. Jacob's transition from numbness to belief is mediated by sight, not speech.
27. 'The spirit of Jacob their father revived' (vattechi ruach Ya'aqov avihem) — the verb chayah (to live, to revive) applied to Jacob's spirit is a kind of resurrection language. Jacob's spirit, which had been dead with grief since chapter 37, now comes back to life. The man who said 'I will go down to Sheol mourning for my son' (37:35) now receives his son back from the dead, as it were.
28. 'Enough!' (rav) — a single word that encapsulates Jacob's transformation from doubt to resolve. Rav means 'much' or 'enough' — it may convey 'this is great news!' or 'enough — say no more — I believe you.' Either way, it marks the decisive turn.
28. 'Israel said' — the narrator switches from 'Jacob' (v.27) to 'Israel.' This name change is significant. Jacob — the man of struggle, grief, and deception — gives way to Israel — the man who wrestled with God and prevailed. The revived spirit brings the revived name. When Jacob acts in faith and resolution, he is Israel.
28. 'I will go and see him before I die' (elkhah ve'er'ennu betere amut) — Jacob, who has spoken repeatedly of going down to Sheol in grief (37:35, 42:38), now speaks of going to Egypt in hope. The journey toward death has become a journey toward reunion. 'Before I die' is not morbid but purposeful: there is one thing left that Jacob must do with his remaining life, and that is to see Joseph.

Summary: Israel sets out for Egypt and offers sacrifices at Beersheba. God speaks in a night vision: 'Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt, for I will make you a great nation there.' The chapter lists the seventy members of Jacob's family who enter Egypt, organized by mother. Joseph meets his father in Goshen; Jacob weeps on his neck.

What Makes This Remarkable: God's final direct speech to a patriarch in Genesis comes here: 'I will go down with you to Egypt, and I will also surely bring you up again' (v. 4). The promise of divine accompaniment into exile — not just into the promised land — redefines God's presence as portable rather than territorial. The number seventy (v. 27) carries symbolic completeness, matching the seventy nations of chapter 10 and suggesting that Jacob's family is itself a microcosm of humanity. Joseph 'fell on his father's neck and wept on his neck a good while' (v. 29) — the reunion is one of the great emotional climaxes of Genesis.

Translation Friction: The total of seventy (v. 27) requires careful counting and includes Joseph and his two sons already in Egypt. The Septuagint reads seventy-five (adding grandchildren of Joseph), which Stephen follows in Acts 7:14. We rendered the Masoretic Hebrew's number and noted the variant. The phrase 'Joseph shall close your eyes' (v. 4) — an idiom for being present at a parent's death — carries deep emotional weight that English conveys naturally.

Connections: God's assurance at Beersheba (46:2-4) echoes the Beersheba theophanies to Abraham (21:33) and Isaac (26:23-25). The descent into Egypt fulfills the prophecy of 15:13. The seventy souls parallel the seventy elders of Israel (Exodus 24:1) and the seventy nations (Genesis 10). Moses' account of the descent in Deuteronomy 10:22 cites this number as evidence of God's faithfulness.

¹Israel journeyed with all that he had and came to Beersheba, and he offered sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac. ²God spoke to Israel in visions of the night and said, "Jacob! Jacob!" And he said, "Here I am." ³He said, "I am God, the God of your father. Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt, for I will make you into a great nation there." ⁴I will go down with you to Egypt, and I will also surely bring you up again. And Joseph shall close your eyes. ⁵Jacob set out from Beersheba, and Israel's sons transported their father Jacob, along with their children and wives, in the carts that Pharaoh had provided for the journey. ⁶They took their livestock and their possessions that they had acquired in the land of Canaan, and they came to Egypt — Jacob and all his offspring with him. ⁷His sons and his grandsons with him, his daughters and his granddaughters — all his offspring he brought with him to Egypt. ⁸These are the names of the sons of Israel who came to Egypt — Jacob and his sons: Reuben, Jacob's firstborn. ⁹The sons of Reuben: Hanoch, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi. ¹⁰The sons of Simeon: Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, and Shaul the son of a Canaanite woman. ¹¹The sons of Levi: Gershon, Kohath, Merari. ¹²The sons of Judah: Er, Onan, Shelah, Perez, and Zerah — but Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. The sons of Perez were Hezron and Hamul. ¹³The sons of Issachar: Tola, Puvvah, Iob, and Shimron. ¹⁴The sons of Zebulun: Sered, Elon, and Jahleel. ¹⁵These are the sons of Leah, whom she bore to Jacob in Paddan-aram, along with his daughter Dinah. All the persons of his sons and daughters were thirty-three. ¹⁶The sons of Gad: Ziphion, Haggi, Shuni, Ezbon, Eri, Arodi, and Areli. ¹⁷The sons of Asher: Imnah, Ishvah, Ishvi, and Beriah, and Serah their sister. The sons of Beriah: Heber and Malchiel. ¹⁸These are the sons of Zilpah, whom Laban gave to his daughter Leah. She bore these to Jacob — sixteen persons. ¹⁹Rachel, Jacob's wife, bore Joseph and Benjamin. ²⁰In Egypt, Asenath — daughter of Poti-phaera, priest of On — bore Manasseh and Ephraim to Joseph. ²¹The sons of Benjamin: Bela, Becher, Ashbel, Gera, Naaman, Ehi, Rosh, Muppim, Huppim, and Ard. ²²These are the sons of Rachel who were born to Jacob — fourteen persons in all. ²³The son of Dan: Hushim. ²⁴The sons of Naphtali: Jahzeel, Guni, Jezer, and Shillem. ²⁵These are the sons of Bilhah, whom Laban gave to his daughter Rachel. She bore these to Jacob — seven persons in all. ²⁶All the persons who came with Jacob to Egypt, who came from his body — besides the wives of Jacob's sons — all the persons were sixty-six. ²⁷The sons of Joseph who were born to him in Egypt were two persons. All the persons of the house of Jacob who came to Egypt were seventy. ²⁸He sent Judah ahead of him to Joseph, to direct the way before him to Goshen. And they came to the land of Goshen. ²⁹Joseph prepared his chariot and went up to meet Israel his father in Goshen. He appeared before him and fell on his neck and wept on his neck a long time. ³⁰Israel said to Joseph, "Now let me die, since I have seen your face — because you are still alive." ³¹Joseph said to his brothers and to his father's household, "I will go up and tell Pharaoh, and say to him, 'My brothers and my father's household, who were in the land of Canaan, have come to me.'" ³²"The men are shepherds, for they have been keepers of livestock, and they have brought their flocks and their herds and all that they have." ³³"When Pharaoh calls for you and asks, 'What is your occupation?' ³⁴you shall say, 'Your servants have been keepers of livestock from our youth until now, both we and our fathers' — so that you may dwell in the land of Goshen, for every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians."

1. 'Beersheba' (Be'er Shava) — a site of profound patriarchal memory. Abraham planted a tamarisk tree there and called on the name of the LORD (21:33). Isaac received God's covenant promise there (26:23-25) and built an altar. Jacob now stops at this ancestral holy place before leaving the promised land — an act of worship at the threshold of departure.
1. 'Sacrifices to the God of his father Isaac' (zevachim le'lohei aviv Yitschaq) — Jacob specifically invokes the God of Isaac, his father, perhaps because Isaac was the patriarch most directly associated with Beersheba. The plural 'sacrifices' (zevachim) suggests a substantial offering, befitting the gravity of the moment: Jacob is about to leave the land God promised to his fathers.
2. 'In visions of the night' (bemar'ot halaylah) — not a dream (chalom) but visions — a more direct form of divine communication. The nighttime setting connects to other pivotal divine encounters: Jacob's ladder at Bethel (28:12), his wrestling at Peniel (32:22-32). God meets Jacob at night, at moments of transition and vulnerability.
2. 'Jacob! Jacob!' (Ya'aqov Ya'aqov) — the doubled name signals special divine address. This pattern appears at critical moments: 'Abraham! Abraham!' at the binding of Isaac (22:11), 'Moses! Moses!' at the burning bush (Exodus 3:4), 'Samuel! Samuel!' (1 Samuel 3:10). The repetition conveys urgency, intimacy, and the gravity of what follows.
2. 'Here I am' (hineni) — the quintessential response of patriarchal readiness. Abraham said it to God (22:1), to Isaac (22:7), and to the angel (22:11). Jacob now takes up this word of availability and surrender at the threshold of a journey that will transform his family into a nation.
3. 'I am God, the God of your father' (anokhi ha'El Elohei avikha) — the divine self-identification uses ha'El (the God, God Almighty) followed by 'the God of your father,' linking the universal sovereign to the personal, covenantal relationship. This formula assures Jacob that the God who appeared to Abraham and Isaac is the same God who now speaks.
3. 'Do not be afraid to go down to Egypt' (al-tira meredah Mitsraymah) — God addresses the unspoken fear. Jacob knows the patriarchal warnings: Abraham went to Egypt and nearly lost Sarah (12:10-20). Isaac was explicitly told not to go to Egypt (26:2). Now God reverses that prohibition: this descent is divinely authorized.
3. 'I will make you into a great nation there' (legoy gadol asimkha sham) — the covenant promise of nationhood (12:2) will be fulfilled not in Canaan but in Egypt. This is a startling relocation of the promise. The great nation will be forged in a foreign land, through suffering and deliverance — a pattern that defines Israel's entire identity.
4. 'I will go down with you to Egypt' (anokhi ered immekha Mitsraymah) — God promises personal accompaniment. The descent to Egypt is not abandonment of the promised land but a divinely escorted journey. The emphatic anokhi (I myself) stresses God's personal presence. This promise will sustain Israel through centuries of Egyptian sojourn.
4. 'I will also surely bring you up again' (ve'anokhi a'alekha gam-aloh) — the infinitive absolute (aloh) intensifies the promise: I will certainly bring you up. This operates on two levels: Jacob's body will return to Canaan for burial (50:13), and his descendants will return as a nation in the Exodus. Both fulfillments are contained in this single promise.
4. 'Joseph shall close your eyes' (veYosef yashit yado al-einekha) — literally 'Joseph shall place his hand upon your eyes.' This refers to the ancient custom of a beloved son closing the eyes of his dying father. It is an intimate promise: you will not die alone in a foreign land; your most beloved son will be at your deathbed. For Jacob, who believed Joseph dead, this assurance is almost unbearably tender.
5. 'Jacob rose up from Beersheba' — strengthened by God's night vision, Jacob departs with resolve. The verb qum (to rise up) signals decisive action after the divine encounter.
5. 'The sons of Israel carried Jacob their father' — the aged patriarch is now carried by his sons. The wagons Pharaoh sent (45:19-21) serve their intended purpose: transporting the elderly Jacob and the vulnerable members of the household. The detail humanizes the journey — this is not a military march but a family migration, with an old man riding in an Egyptian cart.
6. 'Their livestock and their possessions that they had acquired in the land of Canaan' (migneheh verekhushah asher rakheshu be'erets Kena'an) — despite Pharaoh's instruction not to worry about possessions (45:20), Jacob's family brings everything. They are not abandoning Canaan permanently in their own understanding; they are relocating with all their wealth.

6. 'Jacob and all his offspring with him' (Ya'aqov vekhol-zar'o itto) — the word zera (seed, offspring) connects to the covenant promises. God promised Abraham that his 'seed' would be as numerous as the stars (15:5). Now that seed — still countable, still a family — descends into Egypt where it will grow into the uncountable nation.
7. The enumeration of 'sons, grandsons, daughters, granddaughters' emphasizes the completeness of the migration. No one is left behind in Canaan. The entire covenant family descends into Egypt together, setting the stage for the genealogical list that follows in verses 8-25.
8. The genealogical list begins with a formal heading: 'these are the names' (ve'ellesh shemot), the same formula that opens the book of Exodus (Shemot). This list functions as a bridge between the patriarchal narratives and the national story — these named individuals will become the tribes of Israel.
8. 'Reuben, Jacob's firstborn' — the list begins with birth order by mother, starting with Leah's sons. Despite Reuben's forfeiture of the firstborn's privileges (35:22, 49:3-4), he retains the formal title bekhon (firstborn) in the genealogical record.
9. Reuben's four sons become the four Reubenite clans listed in Numbers 26:5-7. The names are preserved in their Hebrew forms: Chanokh (dedicated), Pallu (distinguished), Chetsron (enclosed), and Karmi (my vineyard).
10. 'Shaul the son of a Canaanite woman' (Sha'ul ben-haKena'anit) — this note is remarkable in a genealogy that otherwise omits mothers. The Canaanite origin of Shaul's mother is highlighted, perhaps to explain certain tensions within the tribe of Simeon, or as an honest acknowledgment that intermarriage with Canaanites occurred even among Jacob's immediate family.
11. Levi's three sons become the three great Levitical divisions. Kohath's line will produce Moses, Aaron, and Miriam (Exodus 6:16-20). The Gershonites, Kohathites, and Merarites will each be assigned specific duties in the tabernacle service (Numbers 3-4). What appears here as a simple genealogical entry carries enormous implications for Israel's future worship.
12. 'Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan' — the genealogy pauses to note the deaths recorded in chapter 38. Er was struck down by the LORD for his wickedness (38:7), and Onan was killed for his refusal to fulfill the duty of levirate marriage (38:8-10). Their inclusion and notation of death maintains genealogical completeness while acknowledging that not all of Jacob's descendants survived to enter Egypt.
12. 'The sons of Perez were Hezron and Hamul' — Perez, born from Judah and Tamar (ch. 38), carries the messianic line. Hezron will be an ancestor of David (Ruth 4:18-22) and ultimately of the Messiah. What began in scandal and shame (Judah and Tamar) produces the royal lineage.
13. Issachar's four sons become the founding clans of the tribe. 'Iob' (Yov) is a variant of the name rendered 'Jashub' in Numbers 26:24 and 1 Chronicles 7:1. The variation may reflect scribal traditions or dialectal differences in the preservation of the name.
14. Zebulun's three sons are the last of Leah's grandsons listed. Together with the preceding entries, they complete the enumeration of Leah's branch of Jacob's family.
15. 'Along with his daughter Dinah' (ve'et Dinah bitto) — Dinah is the only daughter named in the genealogy, likely because of her role in the Shechem narrative (ch. 34). The mention of 'daughters' (plural) in the summary suggests other daughters existed but are not named, as genealogies typically tracked male lines.
15. 'Thirty-three persons' (sheloshim veshalosh) — this count includes Jacob himself in the total (as the head), or it may include Er and Onan who died in Canaan and did not actually enter Egypt. The precise reckoning has generated extensive rabbinic discussion, with various solutions proposed to reconcile the count with the names listed.
16. Gad has seven sons — the largest individual family in this section. Gad's tribe will later be known for its warriors (1 Chronicles 12:8) and will settle in the Transjordan (Numbers 32). The names show some variation from the parallel list in Numbers 26:15-18.
17. 'Serah their sister' (Serach achotam) — Serah is the only granddaughter named in the entire genealogy, a distinction as notable as Dinah's mention among Jacob's children. Rabbinic tradition assigns Serah a remarkably long life and credits her with confirming to Jacob that Joseph was alive, and later with identifying the location of Joseph's bones for Moses at the time of the Exodus.
18. 'Zilpah, whom Laban gave to Leah his daughter' — the genealogy traces the maternal lines back to Laban's household arrangements, connecting the Egyptian migration to the Paddan-aram narratives. Zilpah, Leah's servant, became Jacob's concubine-wife and bore Gad and Asher (30:9-13).
18. 'Sixteen persons' (shesh esreh nafesh) — the word nefesh (soul, person, living being) is used for the count, emphasizing that these are not mere names but living persons entering Egypt.
19. 'Rachel, Jacob's wife' (Rachel eshet Ya'aqov) — Rachel alone among the mothers is called Jacob's 'wife' (ishah) rather than being identified through her father Laban. This reflects her unique status as Jacob's chosen, beloved wife — the one he worked fourteen years to marry. The designation honors her even in death, as Rachel died giving birth to Benjamin (35:18-19).
20. 'Asenath the daughter of Poti-phera, priest of On' — Joseph's Egyptian wife and her priestly lineage are reiterated (cf. 41:45, 50). On (Heliopolis) was the center of Egyptian sun worship. Joseph's marriage into the Egyptian priestly aristocracy represents the deepest level of his assimilation — yet his sons will be claimed by Jacob as his own (48:5) and fully integrated into Israel's tribal structure.
20. Manasseh and Ephraim, though born in Egypt to an Egyptian mother, will each become a full tribe, receiving Jacob's blessing and territorial inheritance alongside their uncles. This adoption (ch. 48) effectively gives Joseph a double portion — the right of the firstborn.

21. Benjamin has ten sons listed — a remarkably large family, especially given his youth. Some scholars suggest this list includes grandsons or later descendants projected back into the migration list. The parallel lists in Numbers 26:38-41 and 1 Chronicles 7:6-12 show significant variations in both the number and names of Benjamin's descendants, suggesting complex textual transmission.
21. The large number may also reflect a literary purpose: Benjamin, the youngest and most vulnerable brother, who nearly became a pawn in the cup incident, produces an abundant line — a sign of divine blessing on Rachel's second son.
22. 'Fourteen persons' — Rachel's branch of the family: Joseph and his two sons (Manasseh and Ephraim), Benjamin and his ten sons, plus Rachel's two sons themselves. Rachel, who wept that she had no children (30:1) and died bearing her second son, has fourteen descendants entering Egypt — a number associated with completion (twice seven).
23. 'The son of Dan: Hushim' — the Hebrew uses the plural 'sons of' (benei) with a single name, a standard genealogical formula even when only one descendant is listed. Despite having only one son at this point, the tribe of Dan will become one of the larger tribes by the time of the census in Numbers (Numbers 26:42-43). The rendering uses singular 'son' for clarity in English.
24. Naphtali's four sons complete the enumeration of Bilhah's descendants. Naphtali's tribe will settle in the fertile region of upper Galilee, fulfilling Jacob's later blessing that 'Naphtali is a doe set free, who bears beautiful fawns' (49:21).
25. 'Seven persons' — Bilhah's total: Dan and his one son, Naphtali and his four sons, plus the two sons themselves. Seven, the number of completeness, rounds out the smallest maternal branch. The genealogical structure is now complete: Leah (33), Zilpah (16), Rachel (14), Bilhah (7) — totaling 70.
26. 'Who came from his body' (yots'ei yerekho) — literally 'who came out of his thigh/loins.' The word yarekh (thigh, loins) is a euphemism for the reproductive organs, emphasizing biological descent. This count of sixty-six excludes Jacob himself, Joseph and his two sons (already in Egypt), and the wives of Jacob's sons.
26. 'Besides the wives of Jacob's sons' — the wives are explicitly excluded from the count of biological descendants. They came to Egypt but are not 'from Jacob's body.' This exclusion explains the difference between sixty-six and the total of seventy in the next verse.
27. 'Seventy' (shiv'im) — this is the canonical number of Jacob's family entering Egypt: 66 from his body + Joseph + Joseph's 2 sons + Jacob himself = 70. The number seventy carries profound symbolic weight in biblical numerology: seventy nations in the Table of Nations (ch. 10), seventy elders of Israel (Exodus 24:1, Numbers 11:16), seventy years of Babylonian exile (Jeremiah 25:11). Israel enters Egypt as a microcosm of completeness — a full family that will become a full nation.
27. The Septuagint (LXX) gives the number as seventy-five, adding five additional descendants of Joseph's sons. Stephen follows the LXX count in Acts 7:14. The difference reflects variant textual traditions, not error.
28. 'He sent Judah ahead of him' (ve'et-Yehudah shalach lefanav) — Judah is chosen as the advance scout and liaison. This selection confirms Judah's leadership role, which was established by his speech in 44:18-34. Reuben the firstborn is passed over; Judah, the fourth son, has assumed the mantle of leadership through his demonstrated courage and selflessness.
28. 'To direct the way' (lehorot lefanav) — the verb horah means to show, teach, direct. Judah goes ahead to get directions to Goshen from Joseph, ensuring the family arrives at the right destination. Some rabbinic traditions interpret lehorot as 'to establish a house of study' — preparing a place of learning before the family arrives.
29. 'Prepared his chariot' (vayyesor Yosef merkavto) — the verb asar means to bind, harness, prepare. Joseph personally prepares his chariot rather than delegating to servants. The urgency and intimacy of the moment demand his own hands. The chariot (merkavah) is a symbol of Egyptian power and status; Joseph arrives as Egypt's ruler but falls on his father's neck as a son.
29. 'He appeared before him' (vayyera elav) — the verb ra'ah in the niphal (vayyera) is the same form used for divine appearances: 'the LORD appeared to Abraham' (12:7, 18:1). The echo may be deliberate: for Jacob, seeing Joseph alive is an experience of something almost divine — the restoration of what was lost, the undoing of death.
29. 'Wept on his neck a long time' (vayyevk al-tsavvarav od) — the word od (still, more, again, a long time) conveys prolonged weeping. This is not a brief, dignified embrace but an extended, unrestrained outpouring. Joseph, who has wept repeatedly through the narrative (42:24, 43:30, 45:2, 45:14-15), now weeps without limit on his father's neck.
30. 'Now let me die' (amutah happa'am) — not a death wish but a declaration of fulfillment. Jacob, who spent decades mourning and expecting to die in grief (37:35), now declares that he can die in peace. His life's most anguished wound has been healed. The word happa'am (this time, now) marks a decisive moment: now — after all the years — death can come without bitterness.
30. 'Since I have seen your face' (acharei re'oti et-panekha) — seeing Joseph's face reverses the long blindness of grief. Jacob was deceived by a bloody garment (37:32-33); now he sees the truth with his own eyes. The theme of sight and seeing, which runs through the entire Joseph narrative, reaches its emotional climax here.
30. 'Because you are still alive' (ki odekha chai) — the simplest and most profound statement. After twenty-two years of believing his son dead, Jacob holds the living Joseph. The word chai (alive) echoes throughout the Joseph story: 'Is your father still alive?' (43:7, 45:3), 'Joseph is still alive!' (45:26, 28). Life conquers the narrative of death.

31. Joseph immediately shifts into practical mode, preparing to manage the political implications of his family's arrival. He will present their case to Pharaoh personally, ensuring they receive favorable treatment. This is Joseph the administrator, the man who navigates Egyptian court politics with the same skill he applies to grain distribution.
32. 'Shepherds' (ro'ei tson) — Joseph will coach his brothers (v.34) to emphasize this occupation when they meet Pharaoh. The shepherding identity serves a dual purpose: it is truthful, and it strategically positions the family for settlement in Goshen, the pastoral region away from Egypt's urban centers.
33. 'Keepers of livestock' (anshei miqneh) — miqneh encompasses all domesticated animals: sheep, goats, cattle. Joseph presents his family's occupation comprehensively.
33. Joseph coaches his brothers for their audience with Pharaoh. He anticipates the king's question and prepares a specific answer. This preparation reflects Joseph's court experience — he knows how Pharaoh operates and how to present a request for maximum advantage.
34. 'Your servants have been keepers of livestock from our youth until now, both we and our fathers' — the response emphasizes multi-generational pastoral identity. This is not a recent occupation but an ancestral way of life. The phrase 'from our youth until now' and 'both we and our fathers' establishes the family as hereditary shepherds, making Goshen's pastureland the natural and logical settlement.
34. 'So that you may dwell in the land of Goshen' (ba'avur teshvu be'erets Goshen) — Joseph reveals his strategy: by emphasizing their pastoral occupation, the brothers will naturally be directed to Goshen, the region Joseph has already designated for them (45:10). This keeps the family together, near Joseph, and on excellent grazing land.
34. 'Every shepherd is an abomination to the Egyptians' (ki-to'avat Mitsrayim kol-ro'eh tson) — the word to'evah (abomination) is strong, denoting cultural revulsion. The Egyptian disdain for shepherds may relate to class distinctions (pastoralists vs. agriculturalists), or to historical conflicts with Asiatic pastoral peoples. Paradoxically, this Egyptian prejudice serves Joseph's purposes: because Egyptians find shepherds distasteful, Jacob's family will be given their own territory rather than being absorbed into Egyptian society. The cultural barrier becomes a protective boundary, preserving Israel's distinct identity during its centuries in Egypt.

Summary: Joseph presents his brothers and his father to Pharaoh. Jacob blesses Pharaoh and describes his life as 'few and difficult.' The family settles in Goshen. As famine worsens, Joseph collects Egypt's money, livestock, and land for Pharaoh, establishing a 20 percent tax. Israel prospers in Egypt. Approaching death, Jacob makes Joseph swear to bury him in Canaan.

What Makes This Remarkable: Jacob's audience with Pharaoh produces one of the most striking self-assessments in Genesis: 'few and difficult have been the days of the years of my life' (v. 9). The word megurim ('sojournings') frames his entire existence as transient — he has never been home. Jacob blesses Pharaoh twice (vv. 7, 10), an astonishing reversal: the impoverished nomad blesses the world's most powerful ruler, enacting the Abrahamic promise that 'all families of the earth will be blessed.' Joseph's economic policy (vv. 13-26) concentrates all Egyptian land and labor under Pharaoh — creating the very system that will later enslave Israel.

Translation Friction: Jacob's description of his days as ra'im ('difficult/evil,' v. 9) uses a word with moral overtones that English 'difficult' partially captures. The same adjective describes the 'evil' of human hearts in 6:5 and 8:21, yet here it describes suffering endured rather than evil committed. We rendered it as 'difficult' and noted the range. Joseph's agrarian reform (vv. 20-26) is presented without moral judgment in the Hebrew, and we followed that restraint.

Connections: Jacob's oath on Joseph's thigh (47:29) mirrors Abraham's oath with his servant (24:2). The burial request anticipates Jacob's detailed instructions in 49:29-32 and their fulfillment in 50:13. The phrase 'gathered to my fathers' (47:30) echoes the patriarchal death formula (25:8; 35:29). Israel's fruitfulness in Egypt (47:27) begins fulfilling the 'be fruitful and multiply' promise, setting up Exodus 1:7.

1Then Joseph came and told Pharaoh, saying, "My father and my brothers, with their flocks and their herds and all that they have, have come from the land of Canaan, and behold, they are in the land of Goshen." 2From among his brothers he took five men and presented them before Pharaoh. 3Pharaoh said to his brothers, "What is your occupation?" They said to Pharaoh, "Your servants are shepherds of flocks, both we and our fathers." 4They said to Pharaoh, "We have come to sojourn in the land, for there is no pasture for the flocks that belong to your servants, because the famine is severe in the land of Canaan. Now, we ask, let your servants dwell in the land of Goshen." ⁵Then Pharaoh said to Joseph, "Your father and your brothers have come to you." ⁶The land of Egypt is before you. Settle your father and your brothers in the best of the land; let them dwell in the land of Goshen. And if you know any capable men among them, appoint them as chief herdsmen over my livestock." ⁷Then Joseph brought his father Jacob and set him before Pharaoh, and Jacob blessed Pharaoh. ⁸Pharaoh said to Jacob, "How many are the days of the years of your life?" ⁹Jacob said to Pharaoh, "The days of the years of my sojourning are one hundred and thirty years. Few and difficult have been the days of the years of my life, and they have not reached the days of the years of my fathers in the days of their sojourning." ¹⁰After blessing Pharaoh, Jacob took his leave from the royal presence. ¹¹Joseph established his father and brothers in Egypt, granting them property in the finest region — the district of Rameses — just as Pharaoh had directed. ¹²Joseph sustained his father and his brothers and all his father's household with bread, according to the number of their children. ¹³Now there was no food in all the land, for the famine was very severe, and the land of Egypt and the land of Canaan languished because of the famine. ¹⁴Joseph collected all the money that was found in the land of Egypt and in the land of Canaan in exchange for the grain they were buying, and Joseph brought the money into Pharaoh's house. ¹⁵When the money was exhausted from the land of Egypt and from the land of Canaan, all the Egyptians came to Joseph, saying, "Give us bread! Why should we die before you? For the money is gone." ¹⁶Joseph said, "Give me your livestock, and I will give you food in exchange for your livestock, if the money is gone." ¹⁷So they brought their livestock to Joseph, and Joseph gave them bread in exchange for the horses, the flocks, the herds of cattle, and the donkeys. He provided them with bread in exchange for all their livestock that year. ¹⁸When that year ended, they came to him the following year and said to him, "We will not hide from my lord that the money is spent, and the herds of livestock belong to my lord. There is nothing left before my lord except our bodies and our land. ¹⁹Why should we die before your eyes, both we and our land? Buy us and our land in exchange for bread, and we and our land will be slaves to Pharaoh. Give us seed so that we may live and not die, and the land will not become desolate." ²⁰So Joseph bought all the land of Egypt for Pharaoh, for every Egyptian sold his field because the famine overpowered them. And the land became Pharaoh's. ²¹As for the people, he relocated them to the cities from one end of Egypt's border to the other. ²²Only the land of the priests he did not buy, for the priests had a fixed allotment from Pharaoh, and they ate from their allotment that Pharaoh gave them. Therefore they did not sell their land. ²³Then Joseph said to the people, "Behold, I have bought you this day, and your land, for Pharaoh. Here is seed for you; sow the land. ²⁴At the harvest, you shall give a fifth to Pharaoh, and four parts shall be yours — for seed for the field, for your food, for those in your households, and for food for your little ones." ²⁵They said, "You have saved our lives! Let us find favor in the eyes of my lord, and we will be Pharaoh's servants." ²⁶So Joseph established it as a statute over the land of Egypt, to this day, that a fifth belongs to Pharaoh. Only the land of the priests alone did not become Pharaoh's. ²⁷Israel dwelt in the land of Egypt, in the land of Goshen. They acquired property in it and were fruitful and multiplied greatly. ²⁸Jacob lived in the land of Egypt seventeen years, and the days of Jacob, the years of his life, were one hundred and forty-seven years. ²⁹When the time drew near for Israel to die, he called his son Joseph and said to him, "If now I have found favor in your eyes, please place your hand under my thigh and deal with me in steadfast love and faithfulness. Do not bury me in Egypt. ³⁰When I lie down with my fathers, you shall carry me out of Egypt and bury me in their burial place." He said, "I will do as you have said." ³¹He said, "Swear to me." So Joseph swore to him. Then Israel bowed in worship at the head of the bed.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Joseph acts as intermediary between his family and Pharaoh, navigating the delicate politics of settling foreigners in Egypt. He has already placed them in Goshen before seeking formal royal permission — a shrewd move that presents Pharaoh with a fait accompli in the most favorable location.
1. 'The land of Goshen' (erets Goshen) — the fertile eastern Nile delta region, ideal for pastoral families. It was geographically separate enough from the Egyptian heartland to allow the Israelites to maintain their distinct identity, yet close enough to benefit from Egyptian resources.
2. 'Five men' (chamishah anashim) — Joseph selects five of his eleven brothers, presumably those who would make the best impression. The Hebrew 'from the end/extremity of his brothers' (miqqetseh echav) has been variously interpreted: some take it as 'from among' and others as 'the least significant' — that is, Joseph deliberately chose the least impressive brothers so Pharaoh would not conscript them into royal service.
2. 'Presented them' (vayyatsigem) — the same verb used for formally setting something or someone before an authority. Joseph carefully stages this audience.

3. 'Shepherds of flocks' (ro'ei tson) — the brothers openly declare their pastoral identity. This is significant because shepherding was considered lowly or even abominable to Egyptians (see 46:34). Yet they do not hide their vocation; they identify with the occupation of their fathers, anchoring themselves in patriarchal continuity.
3. 'Both we and our fathers' (gam-anachnu gam-avoteinu) — the emphasis on generational continuity frames shepherding not merely as a livelihood but as a heritage. Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob were all herdsman. The brothers claim their place in this lineage.
4. 'To sojourn' (lagur) — not to settle permanently but to reside as aliens. This word choice is theologically significant: the brothers frame their presence as temporary, as guests rather than settlers. This sojourning language (ger, magur, lagur) runs through the patriarchal narratives, expressing Israel's fundamental posture as strangers in every land except the one God has promised.
4. 'The famine is severe' (kaved hara'av) — literally 'heavy is the famine.' The adjective kaved (heavy, weighty) conveys the crushing, oppressive nature of the famine. It is the same root used for Pharaoh's hardened (heavy) heart in Exodus.
5. Pharaoh addresses Joseph directly, acknowledging the family's arrival. The phrasing 'have come to you' (ba'u elekha) places Joseph as the family's anchor in Egypt — they have come to Joseph, not to Egypt. This underscores Joseph's role as the providential link between the family and the foreign power.
6. 'In the best of the land' (bemeitav ha'arets) — Pharaoh's generosity exceeds the brothers' request. They asked only for Goshen; Pharaoh offers the finest portion of all Egypt. This lavish hospitality reflects Joseph's immense value to Pharaoh, and it fulfills God's promise that Israel would be settled in Egypt (46:3-4).
6. 'Capable men' (anshei-chayil) — men of strength, skill, and competence. The term chayil denotes valor, ability, and substance. Pharaoh recognizes that skilled herdsman would be an asset and offers them positions of responsibility over royal livestock — a mark of trust and honor.
6. 'Chief herdsman over my livestock' (sarei miqneh al-asher-li) — literally 'rulers of livestock over what is mine.' Pharaoh invites Joseph's brothers into royal service. This is a remarkable integration: foreign shepherds, whose occupation Egyptians disdained, are offered oversight of the king's own herds.
7. 'Jacob blessed Pharaoh' (vayevarekh Ya'aqov et-Par'oh) — this is an extraordinary moment. The aged patriarch, a landless sojourner dependent on Pharaoh's hospitality, pronounces blessing upon the most powerful ruler in the known world. The writer of Hebrews notes the theological principle at work: 'without any dispute the lesser is blessed by the greater' (Hebrews 7:7). Jacob's authority to bless derives not from political power but from his standing as bearer of the Abrahamic covenant.
7. 'Set him before Pharaoh' (vayyaamidehu lifnei Far'oh) — the verb 'amad (to stand, set upright) gives the scene a formal, courtly character. Yet what follows is not obeisance but blessing — Jacob is the one who confers, not receives.
8. 'How many are the days of the years of your life?' (kamah yemei shenei chayyekha) — the Hebrew is far more expansive than 'how old are you?' Pharaoh asks about the days, the years, and the life — a layered expression that invites reflection on the totality of a life lived. The phrasing suggests Pharaoh was struck by Jacob's aged appearance. Jacob's response will match this expansiveness with theological depth.
9. 'My sojourning' (megurai) — Jacob does not say 'my life' (chayyai) first, but 'my sojourning.' He defines his entire existence as that of a stranger and pilgrim. The word magur/megurai comes from the same root as ger (sojourner, alien). Jacob's self-understanding is profoundly theological: he has never been at home in this world. His true home is the promise, not yet realized.
9. 'Few and difficult' (me'at vera'im) — literally 'few and evil.' Jacob's assessment is brutally honest. Though 130 years is long by modern standards, it falls short of Abraham's 175 years and Isaac's 180 years. And the quality of those years — marked by Esau's enmity, Laban's deception, Dinah's violation, Rachel's death, Joseph's loss — has been ra'im: evil, grievous, full of sorrow.
9. 'Have not reached' (lo hissigu) — the verb nasag means to overtake, attain, reach. Jacob's years have not caught up with his fathers'. This is a statement of both quantity (shorter lifespan) and quality (greater suffering). There is no self-pity but a sober reckoning before the throne of the world's most powerful king.
10. Jacob's audience with Pharaoh is framed by two blessings — one upon entering (v. 7) and one upon departing. The patriarch arrives as a supplicant but acts as a priest, conferring divine favor on the king. This second blessing confirms that Jacob's authority derives from his covenant status: he is the one through whom blessing flows to the nations (12:3).
11. 'A possession' (achuzzah) — the word denotes a permanent holding or estate, not merely a temporary campsite. This is the same term used for Abraham's purchase of the cave of Machpelah (23:4, 9, 20). Joseph secures for his family a deeded holding in Egypt's choicest territory.
11. 'The land of Rameses' (erets Ra'meses) — this appears to be another name for Goshen, or a specific district within it. The name Rameses is likely an editorial update reflecting the later name of the region, as the city of Rameses (Pi-Ramesses) was built centuries later. The name would become grimly familiar: it is one of the store cities the enslaved Israelites would build (Exodus 1:11).
12. 'Sustained' (vayekhalkel) — from the root kul, meaning to contain, sustain, provide for. Joseph's role as sustainer fulfills the providential purpose revealed in 45:5-7. The same root appears in 1 Kings 4:7 for Solomon's provisioning system. Joseph's administration foreshadows royal stewardship.
12. 'According to the number of their children' (lefi hataf) — literally 'according to the mouth of the little ones.' The provision was calculated per dependent, ensuring each family received food proportional to its size. The word taf refers specifically to small children, suggesting Joseph's particular attention to the most vulnerable members of the household.

13. 'Languished' (vattelah) — from the root lahah, meaning to be exhausted, to faint, to languish. The land itself is personified as weakening under the famine's oppression. Both Egypt and Canaan are affected — the famine is universal, sparing no nation. This sets the stage for Joseph's sweeping economic measures.
13. This verse marks the beginning of a narrative section (vv. 13-26) describing Joseph's administration of the famine. The narrator shifts from the family story to a political-economic account of how Joseph centralized all wealth and land under Pharaoh's control.
14. 'Collected all the money' (vaylaqet et-kol-hakkesef) — the verb laqat means to gather, glean, collect. Joseph systematically drains the monetary supply of two entire regions. The word kesef (silver/money) underscores that coinage-equivalent silver was the medium of exchange. All of it flows to Pharaoh's treasury.
14. 'For the grain they were buying' (bashever asher-hem shoverim) — the root shavar here means to buy grain. Joseph's stored grain becomes the instrument of total economic consolidation. What began as wise administration now transforms the entire social order.
15. 'The money was exhausted' (vayyittom hakkesef) — the verb tamam means to be complete, finished, used up. The money has not merely diminished — it is entirely gone. The people's desperation drives them to appeal directly to Joseph, and their plea is raw: 'Why should we die before you?'
15. 'Why should we die before you?' (lammah namut negdekha) — literally 'why should we die in front of you?' The people frame their starvation as something Joseph is witnessing and therefore bears responsibility for. Their cry is both a plea and a subtle accusation — will you watch us perish?
16. 'Give me your livestock' (havu miqneikhem) — Joseph proposes the next stage of exchange: livestock for grain. The word miqneh (livestock, cattle) represents the people's primary productive asset after money. By accepting livestock as payment, Joseph transfers the means of agricultural production to Pharaoh's control.
17. The catalogue of livestock — horses (sussim), flocks (tson), herds of cattle (baqar), and donkeys (chamorim) — represents every category of animal wealth. The thoroughness of the list emphasizes the completeness of the transfer. By year's end, the people have no animals left.
17. 'He provided them' (vayenahalem) — from the root nahal, to lead, guide, provide for. The same root is used of God leading Israel through the wilderness (Exodus 15:13). Joseph guides the people through famine with careful provision, though at enormous cost to their independence.
18. 'We will not hide from my lord' (lo-nekached me'adoni) — the people's transparency reveals their total vulnerability. They have nothing left to bargain with and openly confess it. The repeated 'my lord' (adoni) reflects the power imbalance — Joseph holds all leverage.
18. 'Our bodies and our land' (geviyyotenu ve'admatenu) — geviyyah refers to the physical body, often a dead body or corpse. The people offer the last two things they possess: their very persons and their ancestral soil. This language carries the weight of desperation — they speak of their bodies as if they are already nearly dead.
19. 'Buy us and our land' (qeneh-otanu ve'et-admatenu) — the people voluntarily request their own purchase. The verb qanah (to buy, acquire) is used here for acquiring persons — a transaction that transforms free citizens into royal dependents. The people initiate this exchange, driven by the primal need to survive.
19. 'Slaves to Pharaoh' (avadim leFar'oh) — the word avadim (slaves, servants) here describes a feudal relationship: the people become crown serfs bound to the land. This foreshadows the later enslavement of the Israelites (Exodus 1:13-14), where the same word describes brutal bondage. The irony is thick: Joseph saves Egypt through a system that will later devour his own descendants.
19. 'Give us seed' (veten-zera) — the plea for seed represents hope beyond mere survival. Seed means future harvests, renewed productivity, life continuing. The word zera (seed) resonates with the covenant promises — Abraham's 'seed' would be great. Here, agricultural seed and covenantal seed share the same Hebrew word.
20. 'Bought all the land of Egypt' (vayyiqen Yosef et-kol-admat Mitsrayim) — the consolidation is complete. Every privately held field passes to the crown. Joseph has created a command economy in which Pharaoh owns all land, all livestock, and all labor. The narrator states this without moral commentary, leaving readers to assess the implications.
20. 'The famine overpowered them' (chazaq alehem hara'av) — the verb chazaq (to be strong, overpower) portrays the famine as a conquering force. The people did not sell willingly from abundance but surrendered under duress. The famine, not Joseph, is the proximate agent of their dispossession.
21. 'He relocated them to the cities' (he'evir oto le'arim) — Joseph moves the rural population into urban centers. This mass relocation severs the people's attachment to their ancestral lands and completes their dependence on Pharaoh's centralized system. Some textual traditions (notably the Samaritan Pentateuch and LXX) read 'he made them slaves' (he'evid) rather than 'he removed them to cities,' which would make the enslavement even more explicit.
21. 'From one end of Egypt's border to the other' (miqqetseh ge'ul-Mitsrayim ve'ad-qatsehu) — the geographical scope emphasizes that this was not a local measure but a nationwide transformation. No region of Egypt was exempt from Joseph's reorganization.
22. 'The priests' (hakkohanim) — the Egyptian priestly class held a privileged position, receiving a state-funded stipend (choq) from Pharaoh. Their exemption from land sale reflects the deeply embedded power of the Egyptian religious establishment. The priestly class maintained its independent land base while everyone else lost theirs.
22. 'A fixed allotment' (choq) — the word choq means a prescribed portion, statute, or decree. It refers here to the regular provision Pharaoh guaranteed to the priests. Because they had guaranteed income, they had no need to sell their land for food. This same word choq will later describe God's statutes given to Israel — laws that sustain and order life.

23. 'I have bought you this day' (qaniti etkhem hayyom) — Joseph formally declares the transaction complete. The people and their land now belong to Pharaoh. Yet immediately he provides seed — the instrument of future productivity. Joseph's administration combines consolidation of power with genuine provision for the people's survival.
23. 'Here is seed for you' (he-lakhem zera) — after stripping the people of money, livestock, land, and freedom, Joseph gives back the one thing that makes life possible: seed for planting. This act of provision within a system of total control creates a complex moral picture — Joseph preserves life even as he restructures society around absolute royal authority.
24. 'A fifth' (chamishit) — a twenty percent tax on agricultural production. By ancient Near Eastern standards, this was a moderate rate. Mesopotamian tax rates could reach a third or more. Joseph's system, while built on total royal ownership, leaves the people with eighty percent of their produce — enough for seed, food, and family sustenance.
24. 'Four parts' (arba hayadot) — literally 'four hands,' meaning four portions out of five. The metaphor of 'hands' for portions is distinctive Hebrew idiom. The people retain the substantial majority of their harvest, making the system workable rather than extractive to the point of collapse.
25. 'You have saved our lives' (hecheyitanu) — literally 'you have caused us to live.' The hiphil form of chayah emphasizes Joseph's agency in their survival. Despite losing everything — money, livestock, land, and personal freedom — the people express gratitude. Survival itself is the supreme value when death looms.
25. 'Let us find favor' (nimtsa-chen) — the word chen (grace, favor) appears throughout Genesis at moments of dependency: Noah found chen before God (6:8), Jacob sought chen from Esau (33:8), Joseph found chen in Potiphar's house (39:4). The people now seek the same gracious regard from Joseph that sustains the vulnerable before the powerful.
26. 'Established it as a statute' (vayyasem otah lechoq) — Joseph's emergency measure becomes permanent law. The word choq (statute, decree) gives the arrangement the force of enduring legislation. What began as famine relief becomes the foundational economic structure of Egypt.
26. 'To this day' (ad-hayyom hazzeh) — this editorial note places the narrative in historical perspective, suggesting the arrangement persisted into the time of the narrator. The fifth-tax and priestly exemption became permanent features of the Egyptian economy, both attributed to Joseph's administration during the great famine.
27. 'They acquired property' (vayyiahazu bah) — from the root achaz, to seize, take hold of, acquire. While the Egyptians are losing their land, Israel is gaining property in Goshen. The contrast is striking and deliberate: Joseph's family prospers in the very land whose native inhabitants are being dispossessed.
27. 'Were fruitful and multiplied' (vayyifru vayyirbu) — this language directly echoes the creation mandate (1:28) and God's promise to Jacob at Bethel (35:11). The verbs parah (to be fruitful) and ravah (to multiply) are covenant markers. In Egypt, removed from the promised land, Israel begins to fulfill the promise of becoming a great nation. This growth will eventually provoke Pharaoh's fear (Exodus 1:7-10).
28. 'Seventeen years' — Jacob's final seventeen years in Egypt mirror the seventeen years Joseph spent with his father before being sold (37:2). The number creates a poignant symmetry: the years of separation are answered by years of reunion. Jacob's life ends with the same duration of closeness to Joseph with which it began.
28. 'One hundred and forty-seven years' — shorter than Abraham (175) and Isaac (180), confirming Jacob's own assessment that his days 'have not reached' those of his fathers (v. 9). Yet these 147 years encompass one of Scripture's most dramatic arcs: from grasping Esau's heel to blessing Pharaoh.
29. 'Place your hand under my thigh' (sim-na yadekha tachat yerekhi) — this solemn oath gesture appears only twice in Scripture: here and when Abraham's servant swore regarding Isaac's bride (24:2, 9). The thigh (yarekh) is associated with procreative power and descendants. By placing his hand there, Joseph swears by Jacob's offspring — by the covenant future itself. The gesture binds the oath to the most sacred dimension of family continuity.
29. 'Steadfast love and faithfulness' (chesed ve'emet) — this paired expression describes covenant loyalty enacted in truth. Chesed is lovingkindness that exceeds obligation; emet is reliability, trustworthiness, fidelity. Together they describe the highest form of interpersonal commitment. Jacob asks Joseph not merely for a favor but for an act of covenantal faithfulness.
29. 'Do not bury me in Egypt' (al-na tiqbereni beMitsrayim) — Jacob's insistence on burial outside Egypt is not merely sentimental. It is a theological statement: Egypt is not home. The land of promise, where Abraham and Isaac are buried, is where Jacob's body must rest. His burial there is an act of faith in God's promise that Israel will return to Canaan.
30. 'I will lie down with my fathers' (veshakhavti im-avotai) — the expression 'to lie with one's fathers' is a standard idiom for death that carries the hope of reunion. Jacob envisions joining Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, and Rebekah in the cave of Machpelah — the one piece of the promised land that the patriarchs actually owned.
30. 'Their burial place' (qivratam) — the cave of Machpelah in Hebron, purchased by Abraham from Ephron the Hittite (chapter 23). This cave is the patriarchal family tomb and the tangible anchor of Israel's claim to the promised land. Jacob's burial there will affirm his belonging to the covenant community and the covenant land.

31. 'Swear to me' (hishav'ah li) — Jacob requires a formal oath, not merely a promise. The shevuah (oath) invokes God as witness and guarantor, making the commitment inviolable. Jacob's insistence reveals both the gravity of the request and his awareness that circumstances in Egypt might tempt Joseph to bury his father there instead.
31. 'Israel bowed in worship at the head of the bed' (vayyishtachu Yisra'el al-rosh hamittah) — the verb hishtachavah means to bow down in worship or reverence. Jacob, too frail to rise, worships God from his bed. The LXX (Septuagint) reads 'upon the top of his staff' (matteh instead of mittah), which Hebrews 11:21 follows. Whether bed or staff, the image is the same: a dying patriarch worshipping God in gratitude that his burial in the promised land is secured.
31. The switch from 'Jacob' (the human name) to 'Israel' (the covenant name) at this climactic moment is significant. It is Israel — the one who wrestled with God and prevailed — who worships at the end. The covenant identity has the final word.

Summary: Jacob is ill; Joseph brings Manasseh and Ephraim to receive their grandfather's blessing. Jacob adopts the two boys as his own sons, giving Joseph a double portion. When blessing them, Jacob deliberately crosses his hands, placing his right hand on the younger Ephraim. Joseph objects; Jacob insists. Ephraim will be greater than Manasseh.

What Makes This Remarkable: The crossed-hands blessing continues Genesis's relentless pattern of the younger surpassing the elder: Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, now Ephraim over Manasseh. Jacob's blessing invokes three generations of divine faithfulness: 'the God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked, the God who has been my shepherd all my life long, the Angel who has redeemed me from all evil' (vv. 15-16). The word go'el ('redeemed,' v. 16) introduces the concept of the kinsman-redeemer — God as the nearest relative who rescues from danger.

Translation Friction: The verb go'el (v. 16) is a legal term for the kinsman who redeems a relative from slavery, debt, or danger. Applying it to God is one of the earliest and most intimate divine metaphors in the Bible. We rendered it as 'redeemed' and noted the legal-familial dimension. The phrase shechem achad ('one mountain slope,' v. 22) plays on the city name Shechem while also meaning 'one portion above' — Jacob gives Joseph a territorial grant with a pun built into it.

Connections: Ephraim's preeminence is fulfilled when the northern kingdom is frequently called 'Ephraim' by the prophets (Hosea 5:3; Isaiah 7:2). The blessing formula 'may God make you like Ephraim and Manasseh' (48:20) remains the traditional Jewish parental blessing for sons. Jacob's reference to Rachel's death (48:7) connects this moment of blessing to his deepest grief. The adoption of Joseph's sons effectively gives Joseph the double portion of the firstborn.

¹After these things, it was told to Joseph, "Behold, your father is ill." So he took his two sons with him, Manasseh and Ephraim. ²When Jacob was told, "Behold, your son Joseph is coming to you," Israel strengthened himself and sat up on the bed. ³Jacob told Joseph, "God Almighty revealed himself to me at Luz in Canaan, and he gave me his blessing. ⁴He said to me, 'Behold, I will make you fruitful and multiply you, and I will make you into an assembly of peoples, and I will give this land to your offspring after you as an everlasting possession.' ⁵Now your two sons who were born to you in the land of Egypt before I came to you in Egypt — they are mine. Ephraim and Manasseh shall be mine, as Reuben and Simeon are. ⁶But any offspring born to you after them shall be yours; they shall be called by the name of their brothers in their inheritance. ⁷As for me, when I came from Paddan, Rachel died to my sorrow in the land of Canaan on the way, when there was still some distance to go to Ephrath. And I buried her there on the way to Ephrath" — that is, Bethlehem. ⁸When Israel saw Joseph's sons, he said, "Who are these?" ⁹Joseph said to his father, "They are my sons, whom God has given me here." He said, "Bring them to me, please, that I may bless them." ¹⁰Now the eyes of Israel were heavy with age; he could not see. So Joseph brought them near to him, and he kissed them and embraced them. ¹¹Israel said to Joseph, "I never expected to see your face again, yet behold, God has let me see your offspring as well!" ¹²Joseph removed them from between his knees and bowed with his face to the ground. ¹³Joseph positioned the two boys — Ephraim at his right, facing Israel's left side, and Manasseh at his left, facing Israel's right side — and led them close to his father. ¹⁴But Israel stretched out his right hand and placed it on the head of Ephraim, who was the younger, and his left hand on the head of Manasseh — crossing his hands intentionally, for Manasseh was the firstborn. ¹⁵Then he blessed Joseph and said, "The God before whom my fathers Abraham and Isaac walked, the God who has been my shepherd all my life long to this day, ¹⁶the Angel who has redeemed me from all evil — may He bless the boys. Let my name be named upon them, and the name of my fathers Abraham and Isaac, and let them multiply greatly in the midst of the earth." ¹⁷When Joseph saw that his father placed his right hand on the head of Ephraim, it displeased him. He took hold of his father's hand to move it from Ephraim's head to Manasseh's head. ¹⁸Joseph said to his father, "Not so, my father, for this one is the firstborn. Place your right hand on his head." ¹⁹But his father refused and said, "I know, my son, I know. He too shall become a people, and he too shall be great. Nevertheless, his younger brother shall be greater than he, and his offspring shall become a fullness of nations." ²⁰He blessed them that day, saying, "By you Israel shall pronounce blessing, saying, 'May God make you as Ephraim and as Manasseh.'" And he set Ephraim before Manasseh. ²¹Then Israel said to Joseph, "Behold, I am about to die, but God will be with you and will bring you back to the land of your fathers. ²²And I give to you one mountain slope above your brothers, which I took from the hand of the Amorite with my sword and my bow."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Your father is ill' (avikha choleh) — the word choleh indicates serious sickness, not merely old age. Jacob's condition has deteriorated from the frailty of chapter 47 to active illness. Joseph responds immediately, bringing both sons — suggesting he anticipates a significant event, perhaps a deathbed blessing.
1. The order 'Manasseh and Ephraim' follows birth order: Manasseh is the firstborn (41:51). This natural ordering will be dramatically reversed by Jacob's crossed hands (v. 14). The narrator sets up the expected sequence so the reversal will carry maximum impact.
2. 'Israel strengthened himself' (vayyitchazzeq Yisra'el) — the hitpael form of chazaq indicates reflexive, deliberate effort. Though gravely ill, Jacob summons his remaining strength to sit upright for this crucial encounter. The narrator switches to the covenant name 'Israel' at this moment of determined resolve — it is the wrestler, the one who strove with God and prevailed, who gathers his last strength.
2. The shift from 'Jacob' (told of Joseph's arrival) to 'Israel' (who strengthens himself) mirrors the dual identity that has defined this patriarch. Jacob is the frail, aging man; Israel is the covenant bearer who must yet complete his divinely appointed tasks — blessing the next generation before he dies.
3. 'God Almighty' (El Shaddai) — Jacob invokes the divine name by which God revealed Himself to Abraham (17:1) and to Jacob himself (35:11). El Shaddai emphasizes God's sovereign power, particularly His power to fulfill impossible promises — making the barren fruitful and turning a small family into a great nation.
3. 'At Luz' (beLuz) — the original Canaanite name of Bethel. Jacob recalls the theophany at Bethel (35:6-12; cf. 28:10-22) where God renewed the Abrahamic covenant with him. By citing this foundational encounter, Jacob grounds what follows — the adoption and blessing of Joseph's sons — in divine authorization. He is not acting on personal preference but on the authority of God's revealed word.
4. 'I will make you fruitful and multiply you' (mafrekha vehirbitikha) — God's words at Bethel echo the creation mandate (1:28) and the Abrahamic covenant (17:6). These verbs — parah and ravah — are the signature language of divine blessing on human reproduction. Jacob recites them now as the theological basis for what he is about to do: by adopting Ephraim and Manasseh, he is expanding the covenant family in accordance with God's promise of multiplication.
4. 'An assembly of peoples' (qahal ammin) — the word qahal denotes a gathered assembly or congregation. Jacob will not merely produce one people but a qahal of peoples — a community of communities, multiple tribes constituting one covenant nation. This plurality within unity defines Israel's structure as twelve tribes under one covenant.
4. 'An everlasting possession' (achuzzat olam) — the land promise is not temporary but perpetual. The word olam denotes permanence extending to the far horizon of time. Even as Jacob speaks from his deathbed in Egypt, he affirms that Canaan belongs to his descendants forever. This is the theological foundation for everything that follows.
5. 'They are mine' (li-hem) — with these two words Jacob performs a formal adoption of his grandsons, elevating them to the status of his own sons. This is a legal act with enormous consequences: Joseph's two sons will each head a tribe of Israel, effectively giving Joseph a double portion — the birthright inheritance that typically belongs to the firstborn. Since Reuben forfeited his firstborn status (35:22; 1 Chronicles 5:1), the double portion passes through Joseph.
5. 'As Reuben and Simeon' (kiR'uben veShim'on) — Jacob's first two sons serve as the standard of comparison. Ephraim and Manasseh will have equal standing with the sons who walked with Jacob from the beginning. Born in Egypt to an Egyptian mother, these grandsons are fully incorporated into the covenant family — a remarkable act of inclusion.

5. Note that Jacob says 'Ephraim and Manasseh' — already placing the younger before the elder. Whether this is a deliberate anticipation of the coming reversal or the narrator's theological ordering, it foreshadows the crossed-hands blessing of verses 13-14.
6. 'Any offspring born after them' (moladtekha asher-holadta achareihem) — Jacob limits the adoption to Ephraim and Manasseh alone. Any future sons of Joseph will not receive independent tribal status but will be counted under Ephraim's or Manasseh's inheritance. This legal provision ensures the tribal structure remains ordered while granting Joseph the double portion.
6. 'Called by the name of their brothers' (al shem acheihem yiqqare'u) — future sons would be absorbed into the tribes of Ephraim or Manasseh, inheriting under those names rather than receiving their own allotment. The provision is hypothetical — no additional sons of Joseph are recorded — but it demonstrates Jacob's careful legal thinking.
7. 'Rachel died to my sorrow' (metah alai Rachel) — the preposition alai (upon me, to my grief) transforms a statement of fact into an expression of enduring personal anguish. Rachel did not merely die; she died upon Jacob — the grief fell on him and remained. Decades later, on his own deathbed, the wound is still raw. This aside interrupts the legal proceedings of adoption with a burst of intimate, uncontrollable sorrow.
7. 'When there was still some distance' (be'od kivrat-erets) — the phrase kivrat-erets denotes a short but unspecified distance. Rachel died tantalizingly close to their destination. The unfulfilled nearness — so close to Ephrath, yet not arriving — becomes a symbol of Rachel's life: the beloved wife who bore the promised sons but did not live to see their full blessing.
7. 'That is, Bethlehem' (hi Beit Lachem) — the editorial gloss identifies Ephrath with Bethlehem, linking Rachel's burial place to the future birthplace of David and, in Christian tradition, of Jesus. Rachel's tears (Jeremiah 31:15) will echo from this place across the centuries.
7. The connection between this personal aside and the adoption is subtle but important: Jacob adopts Rachel's grandsons partly because Rachel herself did not live to raise more sons. Ephraim and Manasseh fill the space that Rachel's death left empty.
8. 'Who are these?' (mi-elleh) — given that Jacob knows Joseph has sons (v. 5), this question likely reflects his failing eyesight (v. 10) rather than ignorance. He can perceive their presence but not identify them clearly. The scene parallels Isaac's dimmed vision when blessing Jacob and Esau (27:1, 18). Once again a nearly blind patriarch will bestow blessing — and once again the expected order will be overturned.
8. The parallel between Isaac and Jacob is deliberate: Isaac could not see and was deceived into blessing the younger over the elder. Jacob cannot see clearly — but he will reverse the birth order knowingly and intentionally. What happened through deception in one generation happens through divine wisdom in the next.
9. 'Whom God has given me here' (asher-natan-li Elohim bazeh) — Joseph attributes his sons to divine gift. The word 'here' (bazeh) — in Egypt, in this foreign place — underscores the wonder: God has given covenant offspring even in exile. Joseph's theology of divine gift echoes throughout Genesis: children are never merely the product of human effort but always God's bestowal.
9. 'That I may bless them' (va'avarekhem) — Jacob's request to bless reveals his awareness that patriarchal blessing is his final and most important act. The blessing (berakhah) is not a wish or a hope but a prophetic declaration of destiny, spoken with divine authority. Jacob knows that what he speaks over these boys will shape their future and the future of Israel.
10. 'Heavy with age' (kavedu mizogon) — the adjective kaved (heavy) for failing eyes recalls Isaac's dim sight (27:1). The parallel is unmistakable: another patriarch with failing vision will bestow a blessing that reverses birth order. But whereas Isaac was deceived, Jacob acts with full intention — his physical blindness does not impair his prophetic sight.
10. 'He kissed them and embraced them' (vayyishaq lahem vayechebbek lahem) — the physical tenderness of this moment stands in sharp contrast to the formal legal adoption of verse 5. Jacob holds, kisses, and embraces the grandsons he never expected to see. The verbs convey intimate, unhurried affection — a grandfather savoring the children he thought were lost when he believed Joseph dead.
11. 'I never expected to see your face' (re'oh fanekha lo fillalti) — the verb pillel (to expect, reckon, imagine) in the negative expresses what was beyond all hope. For over twenty years, Jacob believed Joseph was dead (37:33-35). To see his face was impossible; to see his children is grace compounded upon grace.
11. 'God has let me see your offspring as well' (hinneh her'ah oti Elohim gam et-zar'ekha) — the verb her'ah (caused to see) credits God as the agent of this reunion. Jacob's dim eyes see what his heart never dared imagine. The word zera (offspring, seed) ties this moment to the Abrahamic promise: God has shown Jacob not just his lost son but the continuation of the covenant line through Joseph's children.
12. 'From between his knees' (me'im birkav) — the boys had been on or between Jacob's knees, a position associated with formal adoption in the ancient Near East. Placing a child on one's knees signified legal acceptance as one's own (see 30:3 where Rachel similarly claims Bilhah's children through this gesture). Joseph removes them to reposition them for the formal blessing.
12. 'Bowed with his face to the ground' (vayyishtachu le'appav artsah) — Joseph, the second most powerful man in Egypt, prostrates himself before his aged, blind father. This is not mere filial respect but reverence for the patriarchal office. Joseph recognizes that Jacob, for all his physical frailty, holds an authority that surpasses any earthly throne — the authority to bless in God's name.
13. Joseph carefully positions his sons so that Manasseh, the firstborn, is at Israel's right hand — the position of preeminence and primary blessing. Ephraim, the younger, is placed at Israel's left. Joseph arranges everything according to the expected order of primogeniture. He has no reason to suspect what Jacob will do.

13. The narrator's detailed description of the positioning — specifying each boy's hand relative to both Joseph and Israel — creates tension. Every reader familiar with Genesis knows that expected orders are routinely overturned: Cain and Abel, Ishmael and Isaac, Esau and Jacob. The careful setup anticipates another reversal.
14. 'Crossing his hands intentionally' (sikkel et-yadav) — the verb sikkel (from the root sakal) means to act with insight, prudence, or deliberate understanding. Jacob's crossed hands are not a mistake of a blind old man but a prophetic act performed with full awareness. The KJV's 'guiding his hands wittingly' captures this well. Jacob knows exactly what he is doing.
14. The crossed hands form a visual X — the right hand reaching to the left side, the left to the right. This physical gesture embodies the theological pattern of Genesis: God consistently elevates the younger over the elder. Abel over Cain, Isaac over Ishmael, Jacob over Esau, and now Ephraim over Manasseh. The reversal is not arbitrary but revelatory — God's choices are sovereign, not bound by human conventions of birth order.
14. 'For Manasseh was the firstborn' (ki Menasseh habbekhor) — the narrator emphasizes that Jacob's action contradicts the natural order. The crossing is deliberate precisely because Jacob knows who the firstborn is and chooses otherwise.
15. 'He blessed Joseph' — though the blessing is spoken over Ephraim and Manasseh (v. 16), the narrator says Jacob blessed Joseph. The sons receive the blessing as Joseph's representatives; the honor and the double portion flow through Joseph.
15. 'Before whom my fathers walked' (asher hithalleku avotai lefanav) — the verb hithalekh (to walk) in the hitpael describes a way of life lived in God's presence. Abraham was told 'walk before me and be blameless' (17:1). Isaac continued that walk. Jacob now claims the same covenantal relationship — three generations of walking with God.
15. 'The God who has been my shepherd' (ha'Elohim haro'eh oti) — this is one of the earliest and most intimate descriptions of God as shepherd. The shepherd feeds, guides, protects, and stays with the flock. Jacob, who spent decades as an actual shepherd, knows what the metaphor means: sleepless nights, constant vigilance, personal sacrifice. God has been all of this to Jacob — from Bethel to Haran to Peniel to Egypt.
16. 'The Angel who has redeemed me' (hammal'akh hagg'o'el oti) — Jacob invokes the Angel (mal'akh) as a distinct yet divine figure who has acted as his redeemer (go'el). The go'el is the kinsman-redeemer, the one who rescues, reclaims, and restores. Jacob identifies this Angel with the God of his fathers (v. 15), placing the Angel in a divine role. This threefold invocation — God of the fathers, God the Shepherd, and the redeeming Angel — forms a profound trinitarian resonance.
16. 'From all evil' (mikkol-ra) — Jacob's life has been marked by deception, conflict, loss, and grief. The word ra (evil, harm, calamity) encompasses all of it. Yet Jacob confesses that through every adversity, the Angel redeemed him — not by removing the evil but by delivering him through it.
16. 'Let them multiply greatly' (veyidgu larov) — literally 'let them fish/swarm in abundance.' The verb dagah is related to dag (fish), evoking images of fish multiplying prolifically in water. This unique verb choice paints a picture of explosive, irrepressible growth — teeming life that cannot be contained.
16. 'Let my name be named upon them' (veyiqqare vahem shemi) — Jacob transfers his covenant identity to these grandsons. They will carry the name 'Israel' and be counted among the patriarchal lineage. This naming is not honorary but constitutive: it makes them part of the covenant family at the deepest level.
17. 'It displeased him' (vayyera be'einav) — literally 'it was evil in his eyes.' Joseph, who has orchestrated this audience so carefully — positioning Manasseh at the right — sees his father's crossed hands as an error. His displeasure is genuine; he believes his blind father has made a mistake.
17. 'He took hold of his father's hand' (vayyitmokh yad-aviv) — Joseph physically grasps Jacob's hand to redirect it. This is a bold act: intervening in a patriarchal blessing is presumptuous. Yet Joseph acts from concern for proper order, unaware that Jacob is operating under a higher order than primogeniture.
18. 'Not so, my father' (lo-khen avi) — Joseph's protest is respectful but firm. He addresses Jacob as 'my father' while correcting what he perceives as an error. The phrase lo-khen (not so, not right) is a direct contradiction — Joseph tells his father he is wrong.
18. 'This one is the firstborn' (ki-zeh habbekhor) — Joseph appeals to the law of primogeniture, the accepted ancient Near Eastern custom that the firstborn receives the primary blessing. He points to Manasseh, insisting on the conventional order. Joseph, who himself was elevated above his older brothers by divine providence, ironically fails to recognize the same pattern in his own sons.
19. 'I know, my son, I know' (yadati veni yadati) — the doubled 'I know' is emphatic and final. Jacob is not confused, not mistaken, not fumbling in his blindness. He knows exactly which son is the firstborn and has deliberately chosen otherwise. The repetition silences Joseph's protest with quiet, absolute authority.
19. 'His younger brother shall be greater' (achiv haqqaton yigdal mimmennu) — Jacob prophesies Ephraim's future preeminence. Historically, the tribe of Ephraim became the dominant tribe of the northern kingdom, so prominent that 'Ephraim' became a synonym for the entire northern kingdom of Israel (Hosea 5:3, 9, 11; Isaiah 7:2, 5, 9).
19. 'A fullness of nations' (melo-haggoyim) — this extraordinary phrase describes Ephraim's descendants as filling the nations. The word melo (fullness, that which fills) suggests not merely a large number but a completeness that overflows national boundaries. Some interpreters see this as pointing beyond tribal Israel to the gathering of all peoples under God's covenant purposes.

- 20. 'By you Israel shall pronounce blessing' (bekha yevarekh Yisra'el) — Jacob establishes Ephraim and Manasseh as the standard of blessing for all future generations in Israel. When Israelite parents bless their sons, they will invoke these two names as the ideal. This practice continues in Jewish tradition to this day: on Shabbat evening, fathers bless their sons with the words 'May God make you as Ephraim and as Manasseh.'
- 20. 'He set Ephraim before Manasseh' (vayyasem et-Ephrayim lifnei Menasseh) — the narrator confirms the reversal one final time. The younger is formally placed ahead of the elder. The pattern that has defined Genesis from its beginning — God's sovereign choice of the unlikely, the younger, the overlooked — reaches its culmination in this quiet, decisive act of a dying patriarch.
- 21. 'I am about to die' (hinneh anokhi met) — Jacob's announcement of his imminent death is matter-of-fact, framed by the word hinneh (behold) that calls attention to the weight of what follows. Death is not the final word; the promise is.
- 21. 'God will be with you' (vehayah Elohim immakhem) — this is the core patriarchal promise passed from generation to generation. God said it to Isaac (26:3), to Jacob (28:15; 31:3), and now Jacob speaks it to Joseph and his descendants. The plural 'with you' (immakhem) addresses not Joseph alone but all the sons of Israel. God's presence will sustain them in Egypt and beyond.
- 21. 'Will bring you back to the land of your fathers' (veheshiv etkhem el-erets avoteikhem) — Jacob's final theological statement is a prophecy of the exodus. Though he will not live to see it, he knows with certainty that Egypt is not Israel's destiny. God will bring them back — the verb heshiv (cause to return) promises active divine intervention to reverse the descent into Egypt.
- 22. 'One mountain slope' (shekhem achat) — the word shekhem means both 'shoulder/slope' and is the name of the city Shechem. The double meaning is deliberate wordplay. Jacob grants Joseph a specific territory — likely the area around Shechem — described as a ridge or mountain shoulder. Shechem will indeed become part of Ephraim's inheritance (Joshua 24:32), and Joseph's bones will be buried there.
- 22. 'Above your brothers' (al-achekha) — Joseph receives this additional inheritance beyond his double portion through Ephraim and Manasseh. Jacob singles Joseph out as the primary heir, reflecting both Joseph's faithful service and his role as the savior of the family.
- 22. 'Which I took from the hand of the Amorite with my sword and my bow' (asher laqachti miyyad ha'Emori becharbi uvqashti) — this military reference is puzzling, as Genesis records only the violent actions of Simeon and Levi at Shechem (chapter 34), which Jacob condemned (34:30). Jacob may be speaking proleptically — claiming territory that his descendants will conquer — or referring to an unrecorded conflict. The language of sword and bow presents Jacob as a warrior, a dimension of his character otherwise hidden in the narrative.
- 22. John 4:5 identifies the plot of ground Jacob gave to Joseph as the location of Jacob's well near Sychar — the site of Jesus's encounter with the Samaritan woman. The patriarchal land grant echoes across the centuries.

Summary: Jacob gathers his sons and delivers prophetic oracles over each, characterizing their futures. Reuben loses preeminence; Simeon and Levi are scattered; Judah receives the royal promise; Joseph receives the richest blessing. Jacob commands burial at Machpelah, draws his feet into the bed, and dies.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Judah oracle (vv. 8-12) is the theological summit: 'the scepter shall not depart from Judah... until Shiloh comes' (v. 10). The word Shiloh is perhaps the most debated single word in the Hebrew Bible — its meaning has generated centuries of messianic interpretation. The poem deploys a staggering range of animal imagery: lion (Judah), serpent (Dan), donkey (Issachar), doe (Naphtali), vine (Joseph), wolf (Benjamin). The first occurrence of yeshu'ah ('salvation,' v. 18) appears suddenly in Dan's oracle — a theological cry embedded in a military image. Joseph's blessing stacks five divine titles in rapid succession: the Mighty One of Jacob, the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel, the God of your father, the Almighty.

Translation Friction: The word Shiloh (v. 10) resists translation: options include 'until he comes to whom it belongs,' 'until tribute comes to him,' or a personal messianic name. We rendered the traditional reading and noted the extensive debate. The rare word pachaz ('unstable,' v. 4) for Reuben is a hapax legomenon — appearing only here — whose Arabic cognates suggest boiling, turbulent energy. The phrase mekherothem ('their swords/weapons,' v. 5) for Simeon and Levi is another much-disputed term, and we noted the competing derivations.

Connections: The Judah oracle is cited or echoed in Numbers 24:9, 17; Ezekiel 21:27; and Revelation 5:5 ('the Lion of the tribe of Judah'). The scattering of Simeon and Levi (49:7) is fulfilled in Joshua 19:1-9 (Simeon absorbed into Judah) and Joshua 21 (Levi dispersed as priestly cities). Jacob's burial instructions (49:29-32) recall Abraham's purchase of Machpelah (ch. 23) and are fulfilled in 50:13.

¹Then Jacob called his sons and said, "Gather yourselves together, that I may tell you what will befall you in the latter days. ²Assemble and hear, O sons of Jacob; listen to Israel your father. ³Reuben, you are my firstborn, my might, and the beginning of my strength, preeminent in dignity, preeminent in power. ⁴Unstable as water, you shall not have preeminence, because you went up to your father's bed — then you defiled it. He went up to my couch! ⁵Simeon and Levi are brothers; instruments of violence are their swords. ⁶Let my soul not enter into their council; let my glory not be joined to their assembly. For in their anger they killed men, and in their willfulness they hamstrung oxen. ⁷A curse on their fury, so savage, and their rage, so ruthless! I will break them apart within Jacob and disperse them throughout Israel. ⁸Judah, your brothers shall praise you. Your hand shall be on the neck of your enemies; your father's sons shall bow down before you. ⁹Judah is a lion's cub; from the prey, my son, you have gone up. He crouches, he lies down like a lion, and like a lioness — who dares rouse him? ¹⁰The scepter shall not depart from Judah, nor the ruler's staff from between his feet, until Shiloh comes, and to him shall be the obedience of the peoples. ¹¹He ties his donkey to the vine, and his donkey's colt to the choice vine. He washes his garments in wine, and his robes in the blood of grapes. ¹²His eyes are darker than wine, and his teeth whiter than milk. ¹³Zebulun shall dwell by the shore of the sea. He shall be a harbor for ships, and his border shall extend toward Sidon. ¹⁴Issachar is a strong donkey, crouching down between the sheepfolds. ¹⁵He saw that rest was good, and that the land was pleasant, so he bowed his shoulder to bear burdens and became a forced laborer. ¹⁶Dan will govern his own people, equal among Israel's tribes. ¹⁷Dan shall be a serpent by the road, a viper along the path, that bites the horse's heels so that its rider falls backward. ¹⁸For your salvation I wait, O LORD. ¹⁹Gad — raiders shall raid him, but he shall raid at their heels. ²⁰Asher's food shall be rich, and he shall yield royal delicacies. ²¹Naphtali is a doe set free, who gives beautiful words. ²²Joseph is a fruitful vine, a fruitful vine beside a spring; his branches climb over the wall. ²³The archers harassed him bitterly; they shot at him and attacked him. ²⁴But his bow remained firm, and his arms were made agile by the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob — from there is the Shepherd, the Stone of Israel — ²⁵by the God of your father who helps you, and by the Almighty who blesses you with blessings of heaven above, blessings of the deep that crouches beneath, blessings of the breasts and of the womb. ²⁶The blessings of your father have surpassed the blessings of my ancestors, up to the bounty of the everlasting hills. May they rest on the head of Joseph, on the crown of the one set apart from his brothers. ²⁷Benjamin is a ravenous wolf; in the morning he devours the prey, and in the evening he divides the spoil. ²⁸All these are the twelve tribes of Israel, and this is what their father said to them when he blessed them, each with his own blessing he blessed them. ²⁹Then he commanded them and said to them, "I am about to be gathered to my people. Bury me with my fathers in the cave that is in the field of Ephron the Hittite, ³⁰in the cave that is in the field of Machpelah, which faces Mamre, in the land of Canaan, which Abraham purchased along with the field from Ephron the Hittite as a burial possession. ³¹In that cave Abraham and Sarah were laid to rest, Isaac and Rebekah were buried, and I myself buried Leah. ³²The field and the cave in it were purchased from the sons of Heth." ³³When Jacob finished commanding his sons, he drew his feet up into the bed, breathed his last, and was gathered to his people.

1. 'Gather yourselves' (he'asfu) — the niphal imperative of asaf, 'to gather.' Jacob summons all twelve sons for his final prophetic declaration. This is not merely a deathbed farewell but a prophetic oracle — Jacob speaks as a patriarch-prophet, revealing the destinies of the tribes that will descend from each son.
1. 'In the latter days' (be'acharit hayyamim) — this phrase carries eschatological weight throughout the Hebrew Bible. It denotes not merely 'the future' in a general sense but the far horizon of God's purposes — the culmination of history. The blessings that follow thus operate on multiple levels: they describe the immediate character of each son, foreshadow the tribal destinies in Canaan, and in some cases (especially Judah, v. 10) point to messianic fulfillment.
2. The parallelism between 'sons of Jacob' and 'Israel your father' is deliberate. They are addressed as sons of Jacob — the human patriarch — yet told to listen to Israel — the covenant name that signifies the one who strove with God and prevailed (32:28). The dual naming underscores that what follows is both a father's personal assessment and a divinely authorized oracle.
2. The double command 'hear... listen' (shim'u... shim'u) emphasizes the gravity of the moment. The second 'listen' (shim'u el) with the preposition el implies not merely hearing but heeding — attentive obedience to what follows.

3. 'My firstborn' (bekhori) — Reuben held the position of highest honor and double inheritance as the firstborn. The terms that follow — 'my might' (kochi), 'beginning of my strength' (reshit oni) — all underscore the extraordinary privilege of the firstborn status. The word oni can mean 'vigor' or 'manly strength,' referring to the father's procreative power. Reuben, as Jacob's first son, represents the full, undimmed strength of his youth.
3. 'Preeminent in dignity, preeminent in power' (yeter se'et veyeter az) — the word yeter means 'excess, preeminence, superiority.' Reuben should have been preeminent in both se'et (exaltation, dignity) and az (strength, power). These are the rightful attributes of the firstborn — but verse 4 will revoke them.
4. 'Unstable as water' (pachaz kamayim) — the word pachaz is rare and debated. It conveys recklessness, turbulence, uncontrolled energy — like water that overflows its banks, powerful but uncontained. Reuben's character lacked the restraint necessary for leadership. The simile of water suggests both instability and the inability to maintain a fixed form or purpose.
4. 'You went up to your father's bed' (alita mishkevei avikha) — a reference to Genesis 35:22, where Reuben lay with Bilhah, his father's concubine. This act was both a sexual transgression and a political power-grab — in the ancient Near East, taking a leader's concubine was a claim to his authority (cf. 2 Samuel 16:21-22). Jacob, who said nothing at the time, now pronounces the consequence decades later.
4. 'He went up to my couch' (yetsu'i alah) — the abrupt shift from second person ('you defiled') to third person ('he went up') is striking. Some scholars see Jacob turning away from Reuben in disgust, speaking about him rather than to him. The word yetstu'i ('my couch') makes the violation personal — it was Jacob's own bed that was defiled.
5. Simeon and Levi are treated together because they acted together in the massacre at Shechem (chapter 34). Their bond as 'brothers' (achim) here is not simply biological — all twelve are brothers — but characterizes them as partners in violence, co-conspirators in treachery.
5. 'Instruments of violence are their swords' (kelei chamas mekherothehem) — the word mekherothehem is notoriously difficult. The KJV renders 'habitations,' but this is unlikely from the Hebrew. Most scholars connect it to mekherah, 'sword' (possibly a loanword), or derive it from karah, 'to dig' (hence 'schemes' or 'plots'). The rendering 'swords' follows the most widely accepted scholarly interpretation and fits the context of the Shechem slaughter.
6. 'Let my soul not enter their council' (besoddam al-tavo nafshi) — Jacob formally dissociates himself from their violence. The word sod means 'secret counsel' or 'intimate circle.' Jacob refuses any share in their conspiratorial deliberations. The parallel 'my glory' (kevodi) is a poetic synonym for 'my soul' or 'my honor' — Jacob's very being recoils from complicity.
6. 'They killed men' (hargu ish) — though the singular ish ('a man') is used, the reference is to the mass slaughter of the men of Shechem (34:25-26). The singular may be collective, or it may pointedly recall Hamor and Shechem as the primary targets.
6. 'They hamstrung oxen' (iqqeru-shor) — literally 'they uprooted/hamstrung an ox.' This likely refers to the plundering that accompanied the Shechem massacre (34:28-29). Hamstringing cattle — cutting their leg tendons — was an act of wanton destruction, rendering the animals useless. It reveals gratuitous cruelty beyond what any sense of justice could justify.
7. Jacob curses not Simeon and Levi themselves but their anger (appam) and wrath (evratam). The distinction matters: the men are not cursed, but the violent disposition that drove them is condemned. This contrasts with the curse on Canaan (9:25), which fell on the person.
7. 'I will divide them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel' (achalleqem beYa'aqov va'afitsem beYisra'el) — this prophecy was fulfilled in strikingly different ways for the two brothers. Simeon's tribal territory was absorbed into Judah (Joshua 19:1-9), and the tribe eventually disappeared as a distinct entity. Levi received no territorial inheritance but was scattered as priests and Levites throughout Israel (Joshua 21). For Levi, the 'scattering' became a blessing in disguise — they were distributed throughout the land as servants of God. The same curse produced different outcomes depending on how the descendants responded to God's purposes.
8. 'Judah, your brothers shall praise you' (Yehudah, attah yodukha achekha) — a wordplay on Judah's name. Yehudah is connected to the verb yadah, 'to praise' or 'to give thanks' (cf. 29:35, where Leah names him). The praise Judah receives from his brothers signals his ascendancy to tribal leadership — a role Reuben forfeited. This is the beginning of the longest and most exalted blessing, marking Judah as the royal tribe.
8. 'Your hand on the neck of your enemies' — an image of military dominance. The neck (oref) is the back of the neck, indicating that enemies are fleeing while Judah's hand seizes them. This foreshadows the military prowess of David's kingdom.
8. 'Your father's sons shall bow down before you' (yishtachavu lekha benei avikha) — this echoes Joseph's dreams (37:7-9) but transfers the ultimate fulfillment to Judah. While Joseph received temporary political preeminence in Egypt, the enduring leadership — kingship — belongs to Judah.
9. 'A lion's cub' (gur aryeh) — the lion imagery for Judah became one of the most enduring symbols in biblical tradition. The 'Lion of Judah' appears as a messianic title in Revelation 5:5. The progression from 'cub' (gur) to full 'lion' (aryeh) to 'lioness' (lavi) traces Judah's growth from a young tribe to mature, fearsome power.
9. 'From the prey, my son, you have gone up' (mitteref beni alita) — the lion has made its kill and ascended to its mountain lair, sated and secure. The verb alita ('you have gone up') may also carry theological overtones — ascent, rising to prominence.
9. 'Who dares rouse him?' (mi yeqimennu) — the rhetorical question underscores Judah's inviolable strength. A lion at rest after feeding is supremely dangerous to disturb. No rival tribe — and no enemy nation — should dare to provoke him.

10. 'The scepter shall not depart from Judah' (lo-yasur shevet miYhudah) — the shevet (scepter/staff) is the emblem of royal authority. This is the foundational prophecy of Judah's royal destiny, fulfilled initially in David's kingship and understood messianically throughout Jewish and Christian tradition.
10. 'Nor the ruler's staff from between his feet' (umechoqeq mibbein raglav) — the mechoqeq is the commander's staff or lawgiver's rod. 'Between his feet' indicates the ruler's staff held between the legs while seated — a posture of judicial and royal authority. Some interpret 'between his feet' as 'from among his descendants.'
10. 'Until Shiloh comes' (ad ki-yavo Shiloh) — this is one of the most debated phrases in the entire Hebrew Bible. Major interpretations include: (1) 'Shiloh' as a messianic title, meaning 'the one to whom it belongs' (reading shello, 'that which is his'), supported by Ezekiel 21:27; (2) 'Shiloh' as a proper name for the Messiah; (3) a reference to the city of Shiloh, where the tabernacle was first established; (4) 'until he comes to whom tribute belongs' (reading shay lo, 'tribute to him'); (5) 'until his son comes' (reading shilo). The ancient translations (LXX, Targumim) generally support a messianic reading. The rendering preserves the ambiguity of the Hebrew.
10. 'The obedience of the peoples' (yiqqehat ammin) — the word yiqqehat (or yiqqahah) means 'obedience, submission, gathering.' The plural 'peoples' (ammin) extends the scope beyond Israel — the nations will submit to the one who comes. This universalizing element elevates the prophecy beyond tribal politics to the destiny of all humanity.
11. The imagery of tying a donkey to a grapevine portrays staggering abundance. No farmer in the ancient world would risk a vine by tethering a browsing donkey to it — unless vines were so plentiful that losing one was inconsequential. Judah's territory will overflow with such agricultural wealth that wine is as common as water.
11. 'The choice vine' (soreqah) — the soreq was the finest variety of grapevine, producing the most prized wine. Even the best vine is treated casually — wealth beyond measure.
11. 'He washes his garments in wine, his robes in the blood of grapes' (kibbes bayyayin levusho uvdam-anavim sutoh) — wine is so abundant it can be used for laundry. The phrase 'blood of grapes' (dam-anavim) is a vivid metaphor for dark red wine. The passage evokes a land of paradisiacal abundance, echoing Eden and anticipating the messianic kingdom.
12. 'His eyes are darker than wine' (chakhlili einayim miyyayin) — the word chakhlili is difficult. It may mean 'dark, sparkling, flashing' — describing eyes that are deep and lustrous, perhaps wine-dark. The preposition min can mean 'from' (red from wine-drinking) or 'more than' (darker than wine). The rendering 'darker than wine' follows the comparative reading, portraying a figure of robust health and vitality rather than drunkenness.
12. 'His teeth whiter than milk' (uleven-shinayim mechalav) — again the min is comparative: whiter than milk. Together with the dark eyes, this paints a portrait of ideal physical beauty and health — a ruler who embodies the abundance of his territory. The land of milk and wine produces a people of striking vitality.
13. 'By the shore of the sea' (lechof yammim) — Zebulun's territory in the tribal allotment (Joshua 19:10-16) was actually inland, between the Sea of Galilee and the Mediterranean coast, not directly on the seashore. This has led some to see the blessing as describing commercial access to maritime trade rather than literal coastal territory. Others note that tribal boundaries may have shifted from their original allotments.
13. 'A harbor for ships' (lechof oniyot) — this may indicate that Zebulun's territory served as a commercial corridor, facilitating trade between the coast and the interior. The tribe would profit from maritime commerce even if not literally on the coast.
13. 'Toward Sidon' (al-Tsidon) — Sidon was the great Phoenician port city to the north. Zebulun's border reaching toward it suggests participation in the prosperous Phoenician trading network.
14. 'A strong donkey' (chamor garem) — the word garem means 'bony, strong-boned, rawboned.' The donkey was the primary beast of burden in the ancient Near East — not a symbol of stupidity but of patient, enduring strength. Issachar's character is one of great physical capacity.
14. 'Between the sheepfolds' (bein hammishtepetayim) — the word mishpetayim (dual form) is variously translated as 'sheepfolds,' 'saddlebags,' or 'campfires.' The image is of a strong donkey lying down between the pens or resting places — content in its labor, preferring rest in familiar surroundings to the exertion of resistance or ambition.
15. 'He saw that rest was good' (vayyar menuchah ki tov) — the language echoes creation ('God saw that it was good'). Issachar surveys a fertile, pleasant territory and chooses comfort over liberty. The word menuchah ('rest') is elsewhere a positive concept (Psalm 23:2; Ruth 1:9), but here it becomes a snare — the love of ease leads to servitude.
15. 'He bowed his shoulder to bear burdens and became a forced laborer' (vayyett shikhmo lisbol vayehi lemas-oved) — the tribe of Issachar, seduced by the pleasantness of its fertile land in the Jezreel Valley, would prefer to pay tribute and serve rather than fight for full independence. The term mas-oved ('forced laborer, corvée worker') is the same term used for the Canaanites subjected to Israelite labor gangs (Joshua 16:10; Judges 1:35).
16. 'Dan shall judge' (Dan yadin) — another wordplay on a son's name. Dan means 'he judged' (from din, 'to judge'; cf. 30:6). The tribe of Dan, despite being born from Bilhah the maidservant, will exercise judicial authority as a fully legitimate tribe — 'as one of the tribes of Israel.' This assures that Dan's lesser maternal status does not diminish his tribal standing.
16. The most famous 'judge' from Dan was Samson (Judges 13-16), who judged Israel for twenty years. Samson's career — marked by both extraordinary strength and fatal self-indulgence — may be foreshadowed in the serpent imagery of the next verse.

17. 'A serpent by the road' (nachash alei-derekh) — the nachash (serpent) recalls the serpent of Eden (3:1). Dan's military strategy will be guerrilla warfare — ambush and surprise rather than frontal assault. The serpent lurks unseen by the roadside and strikes without warning.
17. 'A viper along the path' (shefifon alei-orach) — the shefifon is a horned viper (Cerastes cerastes), a small but deadly snake native to the Sinai and Negev. It buries itself in sand beside paths and strikes at passing animals. The image is of lethal effectiveness from a position of apparent insignificance — Dan is a small tribe but a dangerous one.
17. 'Bites the horse's heels so that its rider falls backward' (hannoshekh iqquevei-sus vayyipol rokhevo achor) — a vivid tactical image: the small serpent brings down a mounted warrior not by confronting him directly but by striking at the horse's vulnerable heels. The mention of 'heels' (aqev) may echo Genesis 3:15, where the serpent strikes the heel of the woman's offspring.
18. This sudden, startling prayer breaks into the sequence of tribal blessings like a cry from the heart. After the ominous serpent imagery for Dan, Jacob pauses and lifts his eyes to God. The interjection may reflect: (1) Jacob's exhaustion — the dying patriarch needs divine strength to continue; (2) his distress at the dark future glimpsed for Dan (the tribe later associated with idolatry, Judges 18); (3) a reminder that all these prophecies unfold under divine sovereignty, not human power.
18. 'Your salvation' (yeshu'atekha) — the root yasha' ('to save, deliver') is the same root from which the name Yeshua/Joshua/Jesus is formed. Jacob's cry for divine salvation stands as a theological hinge in the oracle — whatever the tribal futures hold, Israel's ultimate hope rests not in any tribe but in the LORD's deliverance.
18. This is the first occurrence of the word yeshu'ah ('salvation') in the Hebrew Bible. Its placement here — in the midst of prophetic blessing, from the lips of a dying patriarch — gives it enormous weight as a programmatic statement of faith.
19. This verse is a masterpiece of Hebrew wordplay. Three words from the same root g-d-d are stacked together with Gad's own name: Gad gedud yegudennu vehu yagud aqev. The effect is untranslatable — a rapid-fire, percussive sequence of consonance that mimics the back-and-forth of border skirmishing. The rendering attempts to preserve the repetition with 'raiders shall raid... he shall raid.'
19. Gad's territory east of the Jordan was exposed to constant raiding from Ammonites, Moabites, and desert nomads. The tribe lived in a perpetual state of frontier warfare. But the blessing promises resilience: Gad will not merely endure raids but counterattack, pursuing enemies 'at their heels' (aqev) — striking back as they retreat.
20. 'His food shall be rich' (shemenah lachmo) — literally, 'fat is his bread.' The word shemenah (from shemen, 'oil, fat') indicates richness, abundance, and fertility. Asher's tribal territory along the northern coastal plain (modern-day Galilee and the Carmel coast) was renowned for its olive groves and fertile soil.
20. 'Royal delicacies' (ma'adannei-melek) — Asher's produce will be of such quality that it graces the tables of kings. The word ma'adanim denotes exquisite, luxurious food — not mere sustenance but delicacies. This was fulfilled: Asher's territory produced the finest olive oil in Israel, a product exported throughout the ancient world.
21. 'A doe set free' (ayyalah sheluchah) — the ayyalah is a female deer, an image of graceful swiftness and freedom. The word sheluchah ('set free, sent forth') suggests a doe released from confinement — bounding freely across the hills. Naphtali's territory in upper Galilee was mountainous, and the tribe was known for speed and agility in warfare (cf. Judges 4-5, where Naphtali plays a leading role in Deborah's victory).
21. 'Who gives beautiful words' (hannoten imrei-shafer) — this phrase is ambiguous and debated. The word imrei can mean either 'words/sayings' or 'lambs' (from emer, 'lamb'). If 'words,' the meaning is that Naphtali produces eloquent speech — perhaps poetic or prophetic words of beauty. If 'lambs,' the image shifts to a doe that bears beautiful fawns. The rendering follows the 'words' interpretation, which is supported by most ancient versions. Deborah's Song (Judges 5), which celebrates Naphtali's valor, may be an example of these 'beautiful words.'
22. 'A fruitful vine' (ben porat) — literally, 'son of fruitfulness.' The word porat is related to parah ('to be fruitful'), the key verb of blessing throughout Genesis. Joseph embodies the fruitfulness promised to Abraham and Jacob. The phrase 'beside a spring' (alei-ayin) provides the source of this fruitfulness — a vine planted by water never lacks nourishment (cf. Psalm 1:3; Jeremiah 17:8).
22. 'His branches climb over the wall' (banot tsa'adah alei-shur) — literally, 'daughters stride over the wall.' The word banot ('daughters') refers to the vine's tendrils or branches — they are so vigorous that they overflow the enclosing wall. This imagery of irrepressible growth captures Joseph's destiny: his fruitfulness cannot be contained. The 'two tribes' of Ephraim and Manasseh represent this overflow — Joseph received a double portion through his two sons.
22. The entire verse is rich with fertility imagery: vine, spring, climbing branches. Joseph's blessing is rooted in life, growth, and abundance — a fitting tribute to the one who preserved life during the famine.
23. 'The archers harassed him bitterly' (vaymaratuhu varobbu) — the verb marar means 'to make bitter, to harass, to deal bitterly.' Joseph's life was defined by suffering inflicted by others — his brothers sold him, Potiphar's wife accused him, the cupbearer forgot him. The 'archers' (ba'alei chitstsim, literally 'masters of arrows') represent all who attacked Joseph.
23. 'They shot at him and attacked him' (vayyistemhu ba'alei chitstsim) — the verb satam means 'to bear a grudge, to persecute, to attack.' The imagery shifts from metaphorical (archers) to personal (persecutors). Joseph was a target of sustained, deliberate hostility from multiple directions — yet the next verse reveals his resilience.

24. 'His bow remained firm' (vatteshev be'eitan qashto) — despite the relentless attacks described in v. 23, Joseph's bow (qeshet) — his strength, his capacity to fight back — remained be'eitan ('firm, enduring, steadfast'). The word eitan means 'permanent, strong, ever-flowing' (as in a perennial stream). Joseph's resilience was not self-generated but divinely sustained, as the next phrase reveals.
24. 'By the hands of the Mighty One of Jacob' (middei Abir Ya'aqov) — the title Abir ('Mighty One, Bull, Champion') is a rare and powerful divine name. It appears primarily in poetic/prophetic texts (Isaiah 1:24; 49:26; 60:16; Psalm 132:2, 5). It emphasizes God's raw, overwhelming power — the power that upheld Joseph through every trial.
24. 'The Shepherd, the Stone of Israel' (ro'eh, even Yisra'el) — two more divine titles stacked together. God is the Shepherd (ro'eh) who tends and guides His people, and the Stone (even) — the immovable foundation on which Israel rests. These titles will echo throughout Scripture: the LORD as Shepherd (Psalm 23:1; Ezekiel 34:15) and as Stone/Rock (Deuteronomy 32:4; Psalm 118:22; Isaiah 28:16).
25. 'The God of your father' (El avikha) — God is identified relationally, as the God of the patriarchal line. Joseph's blessings flow not from impersonal cosmic forces but from the personal God who entered into covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob.
25. 'The Almighty' (Shaddai) — the patriarchal divine name (cf. 17:1; 28:3; 35:11; 43:14; 48:3). Its use here in Joseph's blessing connects him to the full weight of patriarchal covenant promise.
25. 'Blessings of heaven above... the deep that crouches beneath... the breasts and womb' — Jacob invokes blessings from every dimension of creation. Heaven above sends rain and sunlight; the deep (tehom) beneath provides springs and underground water (the tehom 'crouches' like a living force, recalling the primeval deep of 1:2); the breasts (shadayim) and womb (racham) ensure fertility of both humans and livestock. The near-homophone between Shaddai and shadayim ('breasts') may be an intentional wordplay connecting God's name to His provision of life-giving nourishment.
26. 'Have surpassed the blessings of my ancestors' (gavru al-birkhot horai) — Jacob claims that the blessings he pronounces exceed even those he received from Isaac, and Isaac from Abraham. Each generation of blessing has grown, and Joseph receives the fullest measure yet. The verb gavar ('to be strong, prevail') indicates that Jacob's blessing is not merely equal to but greater than what came before.
26. 'The bounty of the everlasting hills' (ta'avat giv'ot olam) — the word ta'avah means 'desire, delight, bounty.' The 'everlasting hills' (giv'ot olam) represent permanence and stability — the most enduring features of the created landscape. Joseph's blessings are measured against them and found equal.
26. 'The one set apart from his brothers' (nezir echav) — the word nazir means 'set apart, consecrated, crowned.' Joseph was literally separated from his brothers (sold into Egypt) and figuratively set apart by God for a unique destiny. The same word is used for the Nazirite vow (Numbers 6:2) — one consecrated to God. Joseph's separation, which began as an act of human cruelty, became divine consecration.
27. 'A ravenous wolf' (ze'ev yitraf) — the wolf is a predator of relentless ferocity. Unlike the lion (Judah), which is a symbol of royal dignity, the wolf connotes raw, savage efficiency. Benjamin's tribe produced fierce warriors — Ehud the left-handed judge who assassinated the Moabite king (Judges 3:15-30), King Saul and his son Jonathan, and later the apostle Paul (Philippians 3:5).
27. 'In the morning he devours the prey, and in the evening he divides the spoil' (babboqer yokhal ad vela'erev yechalleq shalal) — the merism 'morning... evening' means 'all day long' — Benjamin's predatory activity is unceasing. The word ad means 'prey' (that which is seized), while shalal means 'spoil' (the plunder taken after battle). The distinction suggests that Benjamin both hunts and distributes — a warrior who feeds his people through conquest.
27. This is the last of the twelve tribal blessings. Appropriately, the final son — the youngest — receives an image of aggressive vitality, as if Jacob saves a burst of martial energy for his last blessing before turning to his closing instructions.
28. 'The twelve tribes of Israel' (shivtei Yisra'el sheneim asar) — the narrator steps back to frame what has just occurred. Despite the fact that some 'blessings' were more like judgments (Reuben, Simeon, Levi) and others were ambiguous (Dan, Issachar), the narrator calls the entire oracle a 'blessing.' The word berakhah encompasses the full range — prophetic destiny, whether favorable or unfavorable, spoken under divine authority. Even the negative prophecies are blessings in the sense that they are truthful, authoritative declarations of God's purposes.
28. 'Each with his own blessing' (ish asher kevirkhato) — each son received a distinct, individualized word. There is no one-size-fits-all destiny. The twelve tribes will have different characters, different territories, different histories — yet together they constitute one Israel. Unity does not require uniformity.
29. 'I am about to be gathered to my people' (ani ne'esaf el-ammi) — the phrase 'gathered to his people' is a standard Hebrew idiom for death (cf. 25:8, Abraham; 25:17, Ishmael; 35:29, Isaac). It implies not mere cessation of life but reunion — a joining with the ancestors in the afterlife. The verb asaf ('to gather') echoes the he'asfu ('gather yourselves') of v. 1. Jacob gathered his sons to deliver his oracle; now he will be gathered to his people in death.
29. 'The cave in the field of Ephron the Hittite' — Jacob refers to the cave of Machpelah, purchased by Abraham as a burial site (chapter 23). The specificity of the location — field, owner, ethnic identity — echoes the detailed legal language of the original purchase. Jacob is asserting a legal claim: this land belongs to Abraham's descendants, and burial there is an act of faith in the land promise.
30. 'The cave of Machpelah' (me'arat sadeh hammakhpelah) — this is the family tomb that anchors the patriarchal claim to Canaan. The name Machpelah may mean 'the double (cave),' perhaps referring to its internal structure. Traditionally identified with the site in Hebron beneath the structure known as the Cave of the Patriarchs (Haram al-Ibrahimi).

30. 'Which Abraham purchased' — Jacob recites the legal history of the property, emphasizing that it was legally acquired (qanh, 'purchased'), not stolen or squatted upon. The purchase by Abraham (chapter 23) was the only piece of the Promised Land the patriarchs ever legally owned — a down payment on the larger promise. Jacob insists on burial there as an act of faith: though he dies in Egypt, his body will rest in the Promised Land.
31. Jacob lists the three couples already interred in Machpelah: Abraham and Sarah, Isaac and Rebekah — and then, with quiet poignancy, 'there I buried Leah' (shammah qavarti et-Le'ah). The shift to first person singular ('I buried') is deeply personal. Leah, the unloved wife, was buried by Jacob himself in the family tomb. Rachel, the beloved, died on the road and was buried near Bethlehem (35:19-20). In death, Leah received the honor that eluded her in life — burial alongside the patriarchs and matriarchs in the covenant tomb.
31. The repetition of shammah ('there') three times creates a solemn, liturgical rhythm: there... there... there. The cave of Machpelah is the gathering place of the covenant family across generations. Jacob will be the seventh person buried there, completing the patriarchal roster.
32. 'Purchased from the sons of Heth' (miqneh... me'et benei-Chet) — Jacob concludes his burial instructions by reaffirming the legal provenance of the property. The 'sons of Heth' (Hittites) were the sellers. Jacob's insistence on these legal details reflects the importance of legitimate land ownership in the patriarchal narratives. The tiny parcel at Machpelah is the seed of the entire land promise — legally owned, not merely promised.
32. Jacob's meticulous instructions contrast with his advanced age and failing body. His mind remains sharp even as his body fails; he knows exactly where he wants to be buried and exactly why — and he wants no ambiguity about it.
33. The death of Jacob is narrated with extraordinary artistry through a triple sequence: (1) 'He finished' (vayekhal) — his life's work of blessing is complete; (2) 'he drew his feet into the bed' (vayeesof raglav el-hammittah) — a gentle, deliberate physical act, lying down as if choosing to rest; (3) 'he breathed his last and was gathered to his people' (vayyigva vayyeasef el-ammav) — life departs and reunion begins.
33. The verb asaf ('to gather') appears three times in this chapter in connection with Jacob: he tells his sons to 'gather' (he'asfu, v. 1), he 'gathered' his feet (vayeesof, v. 33), and he was 'gathered' to his people (vayyeasef, v. 33). The wordplay creates a sense of completion — the one who gathered his sons for blessing is now himself gathered into the company of the ancestors.
33. 'He breathed his last' (vayyigva) — the verb gava' means 'to expire, to breathe one's last.' It is a quiet, dignified word for death — no violence, no struggle, simply the cessation of breath. Jacob dies as he lived the last scene of his life: in full possession of his faculties, with deliberate composure, having completed everything God required of him.
33. Notably, the text does not say Jacob 'died' (vayyamat) — that verb is reserved for chapter 50. Here the emphasis is on the peaceful transition: finishing, resting, and being gathered. Jacob's death is an act of completion, not termination.

Summary: Joseph weeps over Jacob, has him embalmed, and leads a great funeral procession to Canaan. Jacob is buried at Machpelah. The brothers fear Joseph's revenge; he reassures them with the definitive theological statement of Genesis: 'You intended evil against me, but God intended it for good, to preserve alive a great people.' Joseph dies at 110 and is placed in a coffin in Egypt, after making Israel swear to carry his bones home.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joseph's declaration in verse 20 — 'you intended evil against me, but God intended it for good' — is the theological summary of the entire book of Genesis. The Hebrew uses the same verb (chashav, 'to intend/plan') for both human evil and divine purpose, insisting that the same events serve two incompatible intentions simultaneously. Joseph's question 'am I in the place of God?' (v. 19) renounces the role of judge and leaves justice to the only one qualified. Genesis ends not in the promised land but in Egypt, with a coffin and a promise — the book closes looking forward to Exodus.

Translation Friction: The verb chashav (v. 20) means 'to think, to plan, to intend, to reckon' — it is the same verb used when God 'credited' Abraham's faith as righteousness (15:6). Using the same word for human scheming and divine planning creates a profound theological compression that no single English verb captures. We rendered both instances as 'intended' to preserve the parallelism. Joseph's 110 years represents the ideal Egyptian lifespan — a detail signaling his complete integration into Egyptian culture even as his final wish is to leave it.

Connections: Joseph's bones become a recurring biblical motif: they are carried out in the exodus (Exodus 13:19) and finally buried at Shechem (Joshua 24:32). The phrase 'God will surely visit you' (paqod yifqod, v. 24) uses the same emphatic verb that introduces the exodus deliverance (Exodus 3:16). The Machpelah burial (50:13) closes a thread that began with Abraham's purchase in chapter 23. Hebrews 11:22 cites Joseph's faith in the promised return as exemplary.

¹Then Joseph fell upon his father's face and wept over him and kissed him. ²Joseph ordered the physicians in his service to embalm his father, and they carried out the embalming of Israel. ³Forty days were completed for him, for that is the time required for embalming. And the Egyptians wept for him seventy days. ⁴When the days of weeping for him had passed, Joseph spoke to the household of Pharaoh, saying, "If now I have found favor in your eyes, please speak in the ears of Pharaoh, saying, ⁵My father made me swear, saying, 'Behold, I am about to die. In my grave which I dug for myself in the land of Canaan, there you shall bury me.' Now therefore, let me go up and bury my father, and I will return." ⁶Pharaoh said, "Go up and bury your father, as he made you swear." ⁷Joseph traveled up to bury his father, accompanied by all of Pharaoh's officials, the senior members of Pharaoh's court, and all the leading figures of Egypt, ⁸along with all the household of Joseph, his brothers, and his father's household. Only their little children, their flocks, and their herds they left in the land of Goshen. ⁹Both chariots and horsemen went up with him, and the company was very great. ¹⁰When they came to the threshing floor of Atad, which is beyond the Jordan, they lamented there with a very great and sorrowful lamentation. He observed seven days of mourning for his father. ¹¹When the inhabitants of the land, the Canaanites, saw the mourning at the threshing floor of Atad, they said, "This is a grievous mourning for the Egyptians." Therefore the place was called Abel-mizraim, which is beyond the Jordan. ¹²His sons did for him just as he had commanded them. ¹³His sons carried him to the land of Canaan and buried him in the cave of the field of Machpelah, which Abraham had purchased along with the field as a burial possession from Ephron the Hittite, facing Mamre. ¹⁴After he had buried his father, Joseph returned to Egypt — he, his brothers, and all who had gone up with him to bury his father. ¹⁵When Joseph's brothers saw that their father was dead, they said, "What if Joseph holds a grudge against us and pays us back for all the evil that we did to him?" ¹⁶So they sent word to Joseph, saying, "Your father gave a command before he died, saying, ¹⁷Thus you shall say to Joseph: "Please forgive the transgression of your brothers and their sin, for they did evil to you." And now, please forgive the transgression of the servants of the God of your father.' And Joseph wept when they spoke to him. ¹⁸Then his brothers also went and fell down before him and said, "Behold, we are your servants." ¹⁹But Joseph said to them, "Do not be afraid, for am I in the place of God? ²⁰As for you, you intended evil against me, but God intended it for good, in order to bring about what is now being done — to preserve alive a great people. ²¹So now, do not be afraid. I will provide for you and your little ones." And he comforted them and spoke to their hearts. ²²Joseph dwelt in Egypt, he and his father's household. Then Joseph lived one hundred and ten years. ²³Joseph saw Ephraim's children to the third generation. The children of Machir the son of Manasseh were also born upon Joseph's knees. ²⁴Joseph said to his brothers, "I am about to die, but God will surely visit you and bring you up out of this land to the land that He swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob." ²⁵Then Joseph made the sons of Israel swear, saying, "God will surely visit you, and you shall carry up my bones from here." ²⁶So Joseph died at the age of one hundred and ten years. They embalmed him, and he was placed in a coffin in Egypt.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Joseph's grief is immediate and physical — he falls on his father's face, weeps, and kisses him. The three verbs (fell, wept, kissed) form a cascade of mourning that is both dignified and deeply emotional. This is the son who was separated from his father for over twenty years, who wept at their reunion (46:29), and who now weeps at the final parting.
1. The intimacy of 'falling on his face' (al-penei aviv) contrasts with Joseph's public role as Egypt's vizier. In this moment he is not the powerful governor but simply a bereaved son. Throughout the Joseph narrative, private grief punctuates public authority — Joseph has wept more than any other figure in Genesis.
2. 'The physicians' (haro'fe'im) — Joseph uses court physicians rather than Egyptian embalmers (who were priestly functionaries). This may reflect a desire to keep Jacob's body within a medical rather than pagan religious context. Embalming was typically a priestly ritual in Egypt, associated with Osiris worship; Joseph's use of physicians suggests he distanced the process from its idolatrous associations.
2. 'The physicians embalmed Israel' — the narrator uses the covenant name 'Israel' (not 'Jacob') at this moment. Even in death, the body being prepared is that of the covenant bearer. The embalming preserves the body for the journey to Canaan — it is a practical necessity for transport, not an Egyptian theological statement about the afterlife.
3. 'Forty days' for embalming — this aligns with what is known of Egyptian mummification practices, which ancient sources (Herodotus, Diodorus Siculus) describe as taking approximately 40 days for the treatment of the body, with the full mourning period extending to 70 days.

3. 'The Egyptians wept for him seventy days' (vayyivku oto Mitsrayim shiv'im yom) — the 70-day mourning period for Jacob nearly equals the 72 days of mourning prescribed for a pharaoh. This extraordinary honor reflects both Joseph's status and Jacob's importance as the father of Egypt's savior. The entire nation mourns a foreign patriarch — a remarkable testimony to the esteem in which Joseph's family was held.
4. Joseph does not speak directly to Pharaoh but through intermediaries — Pharaoh's household. This may reflect mourning protocol: a person in mourning may have been ritually restricted from appearing before the king, or Joseph's disheveled, grief-stricken appearance may have made a direct audience inappropriate in Egyptian court etiquette.
4. 'If I have found favor in your eyes' (im-na matsati chen be'eineikhem) — the language of courteous petition. Despite his enormous power, Joseph approaches with humility and deference. He asks others to intercede on his behalf. The phrase echoes the courteous speech patterns seen throughout Genesis when characters seek a significant request (cf. 18:3; 33:10; 47:29).
5. 'My father made me swear' (avi hishbi'ani) — Joseph invokes the binding oath Jacob extracted from him (47:29-31). The oath provides diplomatic cover: Joseph is not requesting to leave Egypt on a whim but fulfilling a solemn obligation that transcends political loyalties. Pharaoh cannot easily refuse a deathbed oath.
5. 'In my grave which I dug for myself' (beqivri asher kariti li) — this detail is not recorded elsewhere in Genesis. It may refer to Jacob's having prepared or purchased a burial place within the cave of Machpelah, or it may refer to the general family claim to the site. The verb karah ('to dig') suggests personal effort in preparing the tomb.
5. 'I will return' (ve'ashuvah) — Joseph assures Pharaoh (through intermediaries) that this is not an escape or a relocation. He will come back to Egypt. This promise both honors his obligation to Pharaoh and foreshadows the larger pattern: Israel will return from Canaan burial to Egyptian residence, awaiting the future exodus.
6. Pharaoh's response is brief and gracious. He grants permission unconditionally, acknowledging the binding nature of the oath ('as he made you swear'). The verb 'go up' (aleh) reflects the geographical reality — Canaan is at a higher elevation than Egypt — but also carries theological resonance: to go to the Promised Land is always to 'go up' (aliyah).
6. Pharaoh's willingness to release Joseph and his entire family for the journey demonstrates the extraordinary trust Joseph had earned. The fact that he also sends his own officials and chariots (vv. 7-9) elevates Jacob's funeral to a state affair.
7. The funeral procession is described with escalating grandeur. Three groups accompany Joseph: (1) 'all the servants of Pharaoh' — the royal court officials; (2) 'the elders of his household' — Pharaoh's personal household administrators; (3) 'all the elders of the land of Egypt' — the senior statesmen of the entire nation. This is a full state funeral, an honor almost without precedent for a foreign resident.
7. The repeated verb 'went up' (vayyaal, vayyaalu) emphasizes the ascent to Canaan — both literal (geographic) and figurative (spiritual). This procession prefigures the exodus: all Egypt witnesses Israel going up to the land of promise.
8. The detail that little children, flocks, and herds remained in Goshen serves two purposes narratively. Practically, it explains the logistics: young children and livestock would slow the long journey. But it also functions as a guarantee of return — their families and livelihoods remain in Egypt, assuring Pharaoh that the Israelites will come back.
8. This detail anticipates the exodus negotiations, where Pharaoh will demand that women, children, and livestock stay behind as insurance (Exodus 10:10-11, 24). Here the arrangement is voluntary and trust-based; later it will become a point of bitter contention.
9. 'Chariots and horsemen' (rekhev gam parashim) — a military escort befitting a state funeral. The chariots and horsemen represent Egyptian military power accompanying the patriarch's body to its resting place. The irony is rich: Egypt's military might serves as an honor guard for the ancestor of the nation that will one day flee from Egypt's chariots at the Red Sea.
9. 'The company was very great' (vayyehi hammachaneh kaved me'od) — the word machaneh ('company, camp') is the same word Jacob used when he divided his family into 'camps' before meeting Esau (32:7-8). The word kaved ('heavy, great, weighty') is loaded with significance — it is the same root as kavod ('glory'). This funeral procession carries weight, dignity, and glory.
10. 'The threshing floor of Atad' (goren ha'atad) — the word atad means 'thorn bush' or 'bramble.' The threshing floor was a flat, open space used for processing grain — a natural gathering place. Its location 'beyond the Jordan' (be'ever hayYarden) is geographically ambiguous and debated, depending on the narrator's perspective.
10. 'A very great and sorrowful lamentation' (misped gadol vekhaved me'od) — the word misped denotes loud, demonstrative mourning — wailing, beating the breast, tearing garments. The adjectives gadol ('great') and khaved ('heavy, grievous') intensify the description. This is mourning of extraordinary intensity, matching the extraordinary honor of the procession.
10. 'Seven days of mourning' (evel shiv'at yamim) — the seven-day mourning period (shiv'ah) later became the standard mourning practice in Judaism. While the formal institution of shiv'ah is post-biblical, this passage provides its narrative foundation. The number seven signifies completeness — a full measure of grief.
11. 'A grievous mourning for the Egyptians' (evel-kaved zeh leMitsrayim) — the Canaanites identify the mourners as Egyptians, not as Israelites. The procession was so dominated by Egyptian officials, chariots, and horsemen that the local population saw it as an Egyptian state funeral. The irony is profound: Jacob, the patriarch of Israel, is mourned as if he were Egyptian royalty.

11. 'Abel-mizraim' — the name involves a wordplay that works on two levels. The word avel means 'mourning,' so Abel-mizraim means 'Mourning of Egypt.' But the similar-sounding word abel means 'meadow' or 'stream,' so the place name could also mean 'Meadow of Egypt.' The narrator exploits this homophony to embed the story of Egyptian mourning permanently in the landscape of Canaan.
12. The simple statement 'his sons did for him just as he had commanded them' marks the faithful execution of Jacob's dying wishes. The brevity is powerful — no elaboration is needed. The sons obeyed. After all the dysfunction, betrayal, and conflict that has characterized this family throughout Genesis, the sons finally act in complete unity and obedience. Jacob's command (49:29-32) is fulfilled to the letter.
13. 'His sons carried him' (vayyis'u oto vanav) — the sons personally carry their father's body to its resting place. This is not delegated to servants or Egyptian officials. The twelve sons bear Jacob's embalmed body from Egypt to the cave of Machpelah — a journey of hundreds of miles. This filial act of devotion fulfills Jacob's command and expresses the family's unity at last.
13. The description of Machpelah repeats the legal language of Abraham's original purchase (chapter 23), reinforcing the legitimate ownership claim. The detail 'facing Mamre' (al-penei Mamre) locates the cave precisely — near the oaks of Mamre where Abraham first received God's covenant promises (13:18; 18:1). Jacob now rests where the covenant began.
14. The return to Egypt is noted with simple finality. Joseph fulfilled his promise to Pharaoh ('I will return,' v. 5). The entire company — Israelites and Egyptians alike — goes back to Egypt. The Promised Land holds only the dead; the living remain in exile. This painful irony will persist for four hundred years until the exodus.
14. The repetition of 'his father' (aviv) twice in one verse — 'to bury his father... after he had buried his father' — emphasizes the centrality of this event. Everything in these verses revolves around filial duty to the patriarch.
15. 'What if Joseph holds a grudge' (lu yistemenu Yosef) — the particle lu introduces a fearful hypothetical. The verb satam means 'to bear a grudge, to harbor enmity' (the same root used of Esau's hatred toward Jacob, 27:41). The brothers fear that Jacob's death has removed the last restraint on Joseph's vengeance. Their father was the buffer; now he is gone.
15. 'Pays us back for all the evil' (hashev yashiv lanu et kol-hara'ah) — the infinitive absolute construction (hashev yashiv) intensifies the verb: 'he will certainly, completely pay us back.' The brothers know exactly what they did — they call it hara'ah ('the evil') without euphemism. Their guilt has never been fully resolved, despite Joseph's earlier reassurance (45:5-8). Guilt unresolved by genuine repentance continues to torment.
15. The brothers' fear reveals that they never fully believed Joseph's forgiveness. Twenty years of comfortable coexistence in Egypt did not erase the deep suspicion that Joseph was merely restraining himself for their father's sake. This psychological realism is one of the most penetrating aspects of the narrative.
16. 'They sent word to Joseph' (vaytsavvu el-Yosef) — the brothers do not approach Joseph directly. Whether from fear, shame, or diplomatic caution, they send a message. The verb tsavah here means 'to send a command/message.' The indirectness of their approach underscores their anxiety — they cannot face Joseph as equals.
16. 'Your father gave a command before he died' — the brothers claim that Jacob left instructions concerning their reconciliation. Whether Jacob actually said these words or the brothers fabricated the message is one of the great interpretive questions of Genesis. Some scholars see a pious deception — the brothers invent a deathbed command to secure their safety. Others believe Jacob did indeed give such a charge, recognizing that the brothers' guilt might resurface. The text does not resolve the question, leaving the reader to weigh the brothers' reliability.
17. 'Please forgive the transgression' (anna sa na pesha) — two different words for forgiveness and sin pile up. The verb nasa' ('to lift, carry, bear away') is the primary Hebrew word for forgiveness — it means to lift the burden of guilt off someone. The word pesha ('transgression') denotes willful rebellion, the most serious category of sin. The brothers also use chatta'tam ('their sin'), the general term for missing the mark. They hold nothing back — they name their actions as both rebellion and sin.
17. 'The servants of the God of your father' (avdei Elohei avikha) — the brothers appeal to their shared faith. They are not merely Joseph's relatives but fellow servants of the God of their father. This theological appeal transcends family dynamics — if Joseph shares their God, he must share that God's character of mercy and forgiveness.
17. 'Joseph wept when they spoke to him' (vayyevk Yosef bedabberam elav) — Joseph weeps yet again. His tears here seem to express grief that his brothers still do not trust him, sorrow that decades of gracious treatment have not healed their fear, and perhaps compassion for the depth of guilt they still carry. Joseph's weeping is one of the great emotional motifs of Genesis.
18. 'They fell down before him' (vayyippelu lefanav) — the brothers prostrate themselves before Joseph, fulfilling the dreams of chapter 37 one final time. The sheaves bowing (37:7) and the stars bowing (37:9) find their ultimate realization not in triumph but in terrified supplication. The dream came true — but not in the way anyone expected.
18. 'We are your servants' (hinnenu lekha la'avadim) — the brothers offer themselves as slaves, the ultimate surrender. This echoes what Joseph himself became when they sold him — a slave (eved) in Egypt. The reversal is complete: those who sold their brother into slavery now offer themselves as slaves to him. Yet Joseph will refuse this offer, pointing to a reality higher than human power dynamics.
19. 'Do not be afraid' (al-tira'u) — the same words God speaks to the patriarchs at moments of crisis (15:1; 21:17; 26:24; 46:3). Joseph speaks with the authority and compassion of one who has learned to see his life through God's eyes.

19. 'Am I in the place of God?' (hatachat Elohim ani) — this rhetorical question is the theological key to the entire Joseph narrative. Joseph refuses the role of judge or avenger. He recognizes that vengeance belongs to God alone. The question implies: 'God is the one who judges and the one who directs the course of history. I am not God. I cannot presume to punish what God has sovereignly used for good.' This is not weakness but profound theological maturity — Joseph subordinates his personal rights to God's larger purposes.
20. This verse is the theological climax of Genesis, perhaps of the entire Pentateuch. It articulates the doctrine of divine providence with crystalline clarity. The same verb chashav ('to intend, to plan, to devise') is used for both human and divine action: 'you intended (chashavtem) evil... God intended (chashavah) it for good.' The brothers had a plan; God had a plan. The brothers' plan was evil; God's plan was good. And God's plan encompassed, absorbed, and transformed the brothers' evil into the means of salvation.
20. 'To preserve alive a great people' (lehachayot am-rav) — the verb hechayah ('to preserve alive, to give life') echoes the creation language of Genesis and the preservation language of the flood narrative. Joseph — sold, enslaved, imprisoned — became the instrument through which God kept an entire people alive. The word am-rav ('a great people') looks forward: the small family of seventy (46:27) is already becoming the multitude promised to Abraham.
20. This verse does not say that evil was actually good, or that suffering doesn't matter, or that the brothers' actions were justified. It says that God's sovereignty is so comprehensive that even human evil is woven into His redemptive purposes. The evil remains evil — 'you intended evil' is not retracted. But God is greater than evil, and His intentions prevail.
21. 'I will provide for you and your little ones' (anokhi akhalkel etkhem ve'et-tapekhem) — the verb kilkel ('to provide, sustain, nourish') denotes ongoing, complete provision. Joseph pledges not a one-time gift but continued sustenance — for them and their taf (little children, dependents). This promise transforms Joseph from judge to provider, from potential avenger to sustaining brother.
21. 'He spoke to their hearts' (vaydabber al-libbam) — this beautiful Hebrew idiom means more than 'he spoke kindly.' To speak 'to the heart' (al-lev) is to address someone's deepest fears and needs, to speak words of comfort that reach the innermost being (cf. Isaiah 40:2, where God commands, 'Speak to the heart of Jerusalem'). Joseph's words do not merely inform — they heal. The phrase also echoes the tender persuasion of a lover (Hosea 2:14; Ruth 2:13), suggesting Joseph's speech carried emotional warmth and personal tenderness.
22. 'Joseph lived one hundred and ten years' (vayechi Yosef me'ah va'eser shanim) — the number 110 is highly significant in Egyptian culture. It was considered the ideal lifespan — the perfect number of years for a blessed life. Egyptian wisdom literature (such as the Teaching of Ptahhotep) identifies 110 years as the mark of divine favor. By noting Joseph's age at death in Egyptian terms, the narrator signals that Joseph was blessed by God even within the categories of Egyptian culture. He lived a complete, ideal Egyptian life while remaining a son of Israel.
23. 'Ephraim's children to the third generation' (le'Efrayim benei shilleshim) — Joseph lived long enough to see great-great-grandchildren through Ephraim's line. This abundance of descendants fulfills the blessing of fruitfulness that has been the hallmark of Joseph's story. To see one's descendants to the third generation was considered the ultimate sign of divine blessing (cf. Job 42:16, where Job sees four generations after his restoration).
23. 'Born upon Joseph's knees' (yulledu al-birkei Yosef) — the phrase 'born on someone's knees' is a formal gesture of adoption or recognition (cf. 30:3, where Rachel uses the same expression). By receiving Machir's children on his knees, Joseph officially acknowledges them as his own — they are incorporated into the patriarchal line. This gesture ensures that Manasseh's descendants through Machir have full standing in the family.
24. 'I am about to die' (anokhi met) — Joseph faces death with the same faith and clarity that marked his father's death. He does not fear the end but uses it as an occasion to reaffirm the covenant promises.
24. 'God will surely visit you' (paqod yifqod etkhem) — the infinitive absolute construction (paqod yifqod) expresses absolute certainty: God will without fail visit you. The verb paqad means 'to visit, attend to, take note of, intervene.' It implies that God, who may seem absent during the Egyptian sojourn, will intervene decisively at the appointed time. This phrase becomes the watchword of the exodus: when Moses comes to deliver Israel, he echoes Joseph's exact words — 'God has surely visited you' (Exodus 3:16; 4:31; 13:19).
24. 'Bring you up out of this land' (vehe'elah etkhem min-ha'arets hazzot) — Joseph's faith looks beyond his own lifetime to the exodus. He knows that Egypt, for all its safety and prosperity, is not the destination. The Promised Land — sworn to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — remains the goal. Joseph's dying words thus become a bridge between Genesis and Exodus, pointing forward to the liberation that God has promised.
25. 'Joseph made the sons of Israel swear' (vayyashba Yosef et-benei Yisra'el) — like his father Jacob (47:29-31), Joseph extracts a solemn oath before death. But where Jacob required burial in Canaan immediately, Joseph asks only that his bones be carried up when God visits Israel in the future. Joseph's faith is even more far-reaching: he trusts not only in God's promise but in God's timing, knowing the fulfillment may be generations away.
25. 'You shall carry up my bones from here' (veha'alitem et-atmotai mizzeh) — this oath was faithfully kept. Exodus 13:19 records: 'Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, for Joseph had made the sons of Israel solemnly swear, saying, "God will surely visit you, and you shall carry up my bones from here with you."' Joshua 24:32 records the final fulfillment: Joseph's bones were buried at Shechem, in the plot of land Jacob had purchased (33:19). Joseph's bones made the entire journey — Egypt to Sinai to wilderness to Promised Land — a silent witness to covenant faithfulness across centuries.
25. The word atsamot ('bones') becomes a powerful symbol. Joseph does not ask for his body to be preserved intact (though he is embalmed); he asks for his bones — the last, most enduring part of a human being — to be brought home. His bones are a testament of faith, a physical pledge that the covenant will be fulfilled.

- 26. The final verse of Genesis is one of the most deliberately crafted sentences in the Hebrew Bible. It ends not with triumph, not with arrival, not with fulfillment — but with a coffin in Egypt. The book that began with 'In the beginning God created the heavens and the earth' ends with 'he was placed in a coffin in Egypt.' The contrast is staggering and intentional. Genesis closes on a note of incompleteness — the story is not over. The promises to Abraham remain unfulfilled. The people are in the wrong land. The narrative demands continuation.
- 26. 'A coffin' (aron) — the Hebrew word aron is the same word used for the Ark of the Covenant (aron haberit). This cannot be coincidental. Joseph's aron in Egypt anticipates the aron of God's presence that will accompany Israel through the wilderness. Both are containers of testimony: one holds the bones of a faithful man; the other will hold the tablets of God's law. The verbal link binds Joseph's death to the covenant's future.
- 26. 'In Egypt' (beMitsrayim) — these are the last two words of Genesis. The patriarch is embalmed, confined, and stored in Egypt. The Promised Land remains a promise. The four-hundred-year sojourn is about to begin. Genesis ends with an open wound — a story suspended in anticipation of the exodus that only the next book will begin to tell.
- 26. The death of Joseph closes the patriarchal era. Abraham, Isaac, Jacob, Joseph — four generations of covenant bearers — have lived, believed, struggled, and died. The promises remain. God remains. And the story, like Joseph's bones, waits to be carried forward.

Exodus

Summary: The sons of Israel multiply in Egypt, fulfilling the creation mandate, until a new Pharaoh who does not know Joseph enslaves them. When state-sponsored infanticide targets Hebrew boys, two midwives defy the king's order because they fear God.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter opens with a cascade of creation-language verbs — paru, vayyishretzu, vayyirbu ('were fruitful, swarmed, multiplied') — deliberately echoing Genesis 1:28 and the teeming life of Genesis 1:20-21. Covenant fruitfulness thrives inside imperial oppression. Meanwhile, two named women (Shiphrah and Puah) resist an unnamed Pharaoh; the text grants enduring honor to the resisters and anonymity to the tyrant.

Translation Friction: The verb vayyishretzu ('swarmed') posed a real translation decision. The root sharats is used for teeming aquatic life in Genesis 1 — it carries connotations of unstoppable, almost biological increase. We retained 'swarmed' rather than softening it, because the Hebrew deliberately makes Israel's growth sound like creation bursting its banks. The phrase yotsei yerekh ('those who came out of Jacob's thigh') we rendered as 'from Jacob's own line' to preserve the kinship meaning without the anatomical idiom.

Connections: The tribal list echoes Genesis 46:8-27. The creation verbs point back to Genesis 1:28 and 9:1. The midwives' civil disobedience anticipates Daniel 3 and Acts 5:29. God building 'households' for the midwives (v21) foreshadows the house-building promise of 2 Samuel 7:11.

¹These are the names of the sons of Israel who came to Egypt with Jacob, each man with his household: ²namely Reuben, Simeon, Levi, and Judah, ³Issachar and Zebulun and Benjamin, ⁴Dan, Naphtali, Gad, Asher. ⁵All the persons who came from Jacob's own line were seventy in all, and Joseph was already in Egypt. ⁶Then Joseph died, and all his brothers, and all that generation. ⁷But the sons of Israel were fruitful and swarmed and multiplied and became exceedingly strong, and the land was filled with them. ⁸Now a new king arose over Egypt who did not know Joseph. ⁹He said to his people, "Look, the people of the sons of Israel are too many and too strong for us. ¹⁰Come, let us deal shrewdly with them, lest they multiply, and if war breaks out, they join our enemies and fight against us and leave the land." ¹¹So they set taskmasters over them to afflict them with heavy burdens, and they built supply cities for Pharaoh: Pithom and Raamses. ¹²But the more they afflicted them, the more they multiplied and spread out, so the Egyptians came to dread the sons of Israel. ¹³Then the Egyptians forced the sons of Israel to serve with harshness. ¹⁴They made their lives bitter with hard labor in mortar and brick and in every kind of field work. In all their labor they forced them to serve with brutality. ¹⁵Then the king of Egypt spoke to the Hebrew midwives, one named Shiphrah and the other named Puah. ¹⁶He said, "When you help the Hebrew women give birth and see them on the birthstool, if it is a son, put him to death; if it is a daughter, let her live." ¹⁷But the midwives feared God and did not do as the king of Egypt commanded them; they let the boys live. ¹⁸So the king of Egypt called the midwives and said to them, "Why have you done this and let the boys live?" ¹⁹The midwives said to Pharaoh, "Because the Hebrew women are not like the Egyptian women. They are vigorous and give birth before the midwife comes to them." ²⁰So God dealt well with the midwives, and the people multiplied and became very strong. ²¹And because the midwives feared God, He made households for them. ²²Then Pharaoh commanded all his people, saying, "Every son that is born you must throw into the Nile, but every daughter you shall let live."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a deliberate echo of Genesis 46, linking Exodus to the covenant family history. The story of deliverance begins with remembered names, not anonymous masses.
2. The tribal list begins with Leah's first four sons, following established birth-order tradition in Genesis.
3. Issachar, Zebulun, and Benjamin complete the core sons born to Leah and Rachel before the sons of the maidservants are listed.
4. The full list preserves the continuity of the twelve-tribe identity before Israel becomes a nation in Egypt.
5. 'From Jacob's own line' literally reflects the Hebrew idiom 'those who came out of Jacob's thigh,' a kinship expression for direct descendants.
6. With Joseph and that generation gone, the narrative shifts from family memory to political vulnerability under a new regime.
7. The cluster of verbs ('fruitful,' 'swarmed,' 'multiplied,' 'became strong') intentionally echoes creation and patriarchal blessing language, showing covenant increase in exile.
8. 'Did not know Joseph' likely means more than personal ignorance; it signals political refusal to honor Joseph's legacy and policy shift toward oppression.
9. Pharaoh frames Israel as a demographic threat. Fear-driven rhetoric becomes the justification for state violence.
10. The Hebrew says 'deal wisely' (or shrewdly), but the wisdom is corrupt: it is strategic oppression disguised as national security.
11. The move from anxiety to policy is immediate: economic exploitation through forced labor. 'Supply/treasure cities' indicates state-building through enslaved bodies.
12. The text stresses ironic reversal: oppression accelerates Israel's growth instead of suppressing it, intensifying Egyptian fear.
13. 'With harshness' (bafarekh) introduces a key term for crushing, ruthless labor that defines Israel's bondage.
14. The verse piles up labor terms to emphasize totalizing oppression: domestic production, construction labor, and agricultural service.
15. Two women are named in the narrative while Pharaoh remains only 'the king of Egypt.' The text grants enduring honor to faithful resistance.
16. The command targets males to destroy covenant continuity while absorbing females into Egyptian society. It is population control through selective infanticide.
17. The midwives' civil disobedience is explicitly theological: they fear God above Pharaoh. This is the first direct human resistance to imperial decree in Exodus.
18. Pharaoh's interrogation shows the state recognizes that quiet resistance can undermine policy more effectively than open revolt.
19. Their reply functions as protective speech under tyranny. Whether fully factual or strategic, the narrative commends the life-preserving result.
20. God's favor toward the midwives shows divine approval of their costly protection of vulnerable life.
21. 'He made households for them' likely means God granted them enduring family lines/status, reversing the threat of child-destruction with covenant-style fruitfulness.
22. Pharaoh expands policy from professional midwives to the whole population, moving from covert control to public genocide by decree.

Summary: Moses is born into a Levite family, hidden, placed in a basket on the Nile, and rescued by Pharaoh's daughter. After killing an Egyptian and fleeing to Midian, he marries Zipporah. The chapter closes with Israel's cry reaching God, who remembers His covenant.

What Makes This Remarkable: The word tevah ('basket') is the same rare word used for Noah's ark — the only two vessels in Scripture called by this name. Both preserve a chosen life through waters of death. The mother sees the child as ki tov ('good'), the same word God spoke over creation. The four climactic verbs of vv23-25 — God heard, remembered, saw, knew — form a comprehensive portrait of divine attention that drives the entire exodus.

Translation Friction: We rendered tevah as 'basket' rather than 'ark' to avoid confusion with the much larger vessel in Genesis, though the verbal echo is theologically essential and noted in our translator notes. The verb zakhar ('remembered') in v24 does not imply God forgot; we considered 'called to mind' to clarify that this is covenant activation, not memory recovery. The name Mosheh, explained from mashah ('to draw out'), encodes his future mission — the child drawn from water will draw a nation through water.

Connections: The tevah links to Genesis 6:14. Moses at the well echoes the betrothal type-scenes of Genesis 24 and 29. Gershom's name ('sojourner there') connects to Abraham's self-description in Genesis 23:4. The covenant remembered in v24 reaches back to Genesis 15:13-14 and forward to the burning bush in chapter 3.

¹A man from the house of Levi went and married a daughter of Levi. ²The woman conceived and bore a son. She saw that he was a fine child, and she hid him for three months. ³When she could no longer hide him, she took a papyrus basket and coated it with bitumen and pitch. She placed the child in it and set it among the reeds along the bank of the Nile. ⁴His sister stationed herself at a distance to see what would happen to him. ⁵Then Pharaoh's daughter came down to bathe at the Nile, while her attendants walked along the riverbank. She saw the basket among the reeds and sent her servant girl to fetch it. ⁶So he opened it and saw the child — a baby boy, crying. She felt compassion for him and said, "This is one of the Hebrew children." ⁷Then his sister said to Pharaoh's daughter, "Shall I go and call a Hebrew woman to nurse the child for you?" ⁸Pharaoh's daughter said to her, "Go." So the girl went and called the child's mother. ⁹Pharaoh's daughter said to her, "Take this child and nurse him for me, and I will pay your wages." So the woman took the child and nursed him. ¹⁰When the child grew older, she brought him to Pharaoh's daughter, and he became her son. She named him Moses, saying, "Because I drew him out of the water." ¹¹One day, after Moses had grown up, he went out to his brothers and saw their forced labor. He saw an Egyptian striking a Hebrew, one of his brothers. ¹²He looked this way and that, and seeing no one, he struck down the Egyptian and hid him in the sand. ¹³He went out the next day, and there were two Hebrew men fighting. He said to the one in the wrong, "Why are you striking your companion?" ¹⁴The man replied, "Who made you a ruler and judge over us? Do you intend to kill me as you killed the Egyptian?" Then Moses was afraid and thought, "The matter is surely known." ¹⁵When Pharaoh heard about this, he sought to kill Moses. But Moses fled from Pharaoh and settled in the land of Midian, and he sat down by a well. ¹⁶The priest of Midian had seven daughters. They came to draw water, filling the troughs to water their father's flock. ¹⁷But shepherds came and drove them away. Moses rose up and defended them and watered their flock. ¹⁸When they returned to Reuel their father, he said, "How is it that you have come back so soon today?" ¹⁹They said, "An Egyptian man rescued us from the shepherds. He even drew water for us and watered the flock." ²⁰He said to his daughters, "Where is he? Why did you leave the man? Invite him to eat bread." ²¹Moses agreed to stay with the man, and he gave his daughter Zipporah to Moses. ²²She bore a son, and he called his name Gershom, for he said, "I have been a sojourner in a foreign land." ²³During those many days the king of Egypt died. The sons of Israel groaned because of the slavery and cried out, and their cry for help rose up to God from the bondage. ²⁴God heard their cries of anguish and called to mind His covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. ²⁵God saw the sons of Israel, and God knew.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses's birth is framed within the tribe of Levi, tying him to the line that will serve at the tabernacle. The text withholds the parents' names until 6:20, keeping the focus on the vulnerability of the child.
2. 'She saw that he was good' (ki tov hu) uses the same word God spoke over creation. The mother perceives something in this child that echoes divine intent — not merely physical beauty but providential significance.
3. The word for 'basket' is tevah — the same rare word used for Noah's ark in Genesis 6-9. Only two vessels in the Bible are called tevah: Noah's ark and Moses's basket. Both preserve a chosen life through waters of death.
4. Miriam's watchful station is the first act of covert resistance in Moses's story. She positions herself as a silent witness, ready to intervene at the right moment.
5. Pharaoh's daughter descends to the Nile — the same river her father decreed as the instrument of Hebrew infanticide. Salvation comes from inside the oppressor's household, by the hand of the oppressor's own family.
6. Pharaoh's daughter immediately identifies the child as Hebrew, yet instead of enforcing her father's decree, she responds with compassion. The verb chamol ('had compassion') signals maternal tenderness overriding state policy.
7. Miriam's offer is strategic brilliance under pressure: she provides the solution Pharaoh's daughter needs while restoring Moses to his own mother. The deliverer will be nursed on Hebrew identity inside an Egyptian court.
8. The single-word permission — 'Go' (lekhi) — sets the rescue in motion. Pharaoh's daughter becomes an unwitting agent of the very covenant continuity her father sought to destroy.
9. The irony is layered: Pharaoh's treasury pays Moses's own mother to nurse him. Imperial resources finance the preservation of the child who will dismantle the empire.
10. The name Mosheh is explained from the verb mashah ('to draw out'). The child drawn from water will draw a nation through water. His Egyptian name encodes his Hebrew destiny.
11. 'He went out to his brothers' signals solidarity — Moses chooses identification with the enslaved over comfort in the palace. The phrase 'saw their forced labor' (sivlotam) uses the same word from 1:11, connecting Moses's awakening to the systemic oppression described in chapter 1.
12. Moses acts against injustice but without divine commission. He looks 'this way and that' — checking for human witnesses rather than seeking divine direction. Zeal without calling leads to exile, not deliverance.
13. Moses attempts to mediate between Hebrews, but his authority is not yet recognized. The question 'Why are you striking your companion?' reveals Moses's instinct for justice, but the response in v14 exposes his lack of standing.
14. 'Who made you a ruler and judge over us?' — the question is prophetically ironic, since God will make Moses exactly that. But the challenge also reveals that self-appointed deliverance is rejected; only God-commissioned authority carries legitimacy.
15. Moses flees to Midian, exchanging the court of Pharaoh for the wilderness. This exile is not wasted time — it is preparation. The well where he sits will become a meeting place, echoing the well-scenes of the patriarchs (Genesis 24, 29).
16. The well scene follows the biblical type-scene pattern: a man meets women at a well in a foreign land, an act of service occurs, and marriage follows. Moses's story deliberately echoes Jacob's meeting with Rachel at the well (Genesis 29:1-12).
17. Moses again intervenes for the vulnerable — this time defending women from aggressive shepherds. The pattern from v11-12 recurs, but without lethal force. His instinct for justice persists across every setting.
18. Reuel ('friend of God') is also called Jethro. The multiple names for Moses's father-in-law have generated extensive scholarly discussion, but the narrative treats them as the same person.
19. The daughters describe Moses as 'an Egyptian man' — he looks, speaks, and acts Egyptian. His dual identity (Hebrew by birth, Egyptian by upbringing) will persist until God redefines him at the burning bush.
20. Reuel's rebuke of his daughters for not inviting Moses reflects ancient Near Eastern hospitality norms. The invitation to 'eat bread' is the standard gesture of welcome and the beginning of social bond.
21. Moses settles in Midian and marries into a priestly family. His wilderness years will school him in the terrain through which he will later lead Israel.
22. Gershom means 'a sojourner there' — the name encodes exile. Moses names his son after his displacement, preserving in the child's identity the truth that Midian is not home. The sojourner theme links Moses to Abraham (Genesis 23:4) and the entire patriarchal experience of landlessness.
23. The king's death changes the political landscape but not the theological reality. Israel's cry rises not as political petition but as raw groaning under slavery — and this groaning reaches God. The verb za'aq ('cry out') is the technical term for a covenant distress call.
24. 'God remembered His covenant' — the verb zakhar does not imply forgetfulness but activation. God now moves from patient observation to decisive intervention. The covenant with Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob becomes the engine of exodus. Deliverance is not random rescue but covenant fulfillment.

25. 'God saw ... God knew' — the four verbs of v23-25 (heard, remembered, saw, knew) form a comprehensive portrait of divine attention. Yada ('knew') means intimate, personal awareness — not mere information but relational knowledge that compels action.

Summary: God appears to Moses in a burning bush at Horeb, reveals the divine name ehyeh asher ehyeh ('I AM WHO I AM'), and commissions him to bring Israel out of Egypt to a land flowing with milk and honey.

What Makes This Remarkable: The bush (seneh) is a humble desert shrub, possibly punning on Sinai — God appears in what is ordinary, not grand. The divine name ehyeh asher ehyeh resists all domestication: it carries both present force ('I am') and future promise ('I will be'). The first-person ehyeh becomes third-person YHWH in v15 — what God declares of Himself becomes the name by which others invoke Him. This is also the first occurrence of qodesh ('holy') in Exodus, introduced not as moral purity but as the relational condition created by divine presence.

Translation Friction: The divine name ehyeh asher ehyeh we rendered 'I AM WHO I AM,' preserving the traditional English while noting in our translator notes that 'I WILL BE WHO I WILL BE' is equally valid. Both renderings are present in the Hebrew imperfect form. The phrase paqod paqadti ('I have carefully watched over') required expansion beyond the bare 'I have visited' because the English word 'visit' has lost its weight; the Hebrew denotes covenant inspection that compels action.

Connections: The double call 'Moses! Moses!' echoes Abraham's call in Genesis 22:11. The hineni response places Moses in the line of covenant servants (Genesis 22:1; 1 Samuel 3:4). The land promise with six peoples restates Genesis 15:18-21. God's descent to deliver (v8) echoes the descent at Babel (Genesis 11:7).

1Now Moses was shepherding the flock of his father-in-law Jethro, the priest of Midian. He led the flock beyond the wilderness and came to Horeb, the mountain of God. 2The angel of the LORD appeared to him in a flame of fire from within a bush. He looked, and the bush was burning with fire, yet the bush was not consumed. 3Moses said, "I must turn aside and see this remarkable sight — why the bush does not burn up." 4When the LORD saw that he had turned aside to look, God called to him from within the bush: "Moses! Moses!" And he said, "Here I am." 5He said, "Do not come near. Remove your sandals from your feet, for the place on which you are standing is holy ground." 6Then He said, "I am the God of your father — the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob." Moses hid his face, for he was afraid to look at God. 7The LORD said, "I have surely seen the affliction of My people who are in Egypt, and I have heard their cry because of their taskmasters, for I know their sufferings. 8I have come down to deliver them from the hand of the Egyptians and to bring them up from that land to a good and spacious land, to a land flowing with milk and honey — to the place of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. 9Now the cry of the sons of Israel has come to Me, and I have also seen the oppression with which the Egyptians oppress them. 10Come now, I will send you to Pharaoh, so that you may bring My people, the sons of Israel, out of Egypt." 11But Moses said to God, "Who am I that I should go to Pharaoh, and that I should bring the sons of Israel out of Egypt?" 12He said, "I will surely be with you, and this will be the sign for you that it is I who have sent you: when you have brought the people out of Egypt, you shall serve God on this mountain." 13Then Moses said to God, "If I come to the sons of Israel and say to them, 'The God of your fathers has sent me to you,' and they ask me, 'What is His name?' — what shall I say to them?" 14God said to Moses, "I AM WHO I AM." And He said, "Say this to the sons of Israel: 'I AM has sent me to you.'" 15God also said to Moses, "Say this to the sons of Israel: 'The LORD, the God of your fathers — the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob — has sent me to you.' This is My name forever, and this is how I am to be remembered from generation to generation. 16Go and gather the elders of Israel and say to them, 'The LORD, the God of your fathers — the God of Abraham, of Isaac, and of Jacob — appeared to me, saying: I have carefully watched over you and seen what is being done to you in Egypt. 17I have declared that I will bring you up out of the affliction of Egypt to the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites — a land flowing with milk and honey.' 18They will listen to your voice, and you and the elders of Israel shall go to the king of Egypt and say to him, 'The LORD, the God of the Hebrews, has met with us. Now please let us go a three-day journey into the wilderness so that we may sacrifice to the LORD our God.' ¹⁹But I know that the king of Egypt will not let you go unless compelled by a mighty hand. ²⁰So I will stretch out My hand and strike Egypt with all My wonders that I will perform in it. After that he will let you go. ²¹And I will give this people favor in the eyes of the Egyptians, so that when you go, you shall not go empty-handed. ²²Each woman shall ask of her neighbor and of the woman staying in her house for articles of silver and articles of gold and for clothing. You shall put them on your sons and your daughters. So you shall plunder the Egyptians."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'The mountain of God' (har ha'Elohim) names Horeb in retrospect — the narrator reveals its future significance. Moses does not seek revelation; he is shepherding sheep in an unremarkable wilderness. Divine encounter comes to a man doing ordinary work.
2. The bush burns with fire but is not consumed — the fire does not depend on the bush as fuel. This signals a presence that sustains without destroying, a holiness that inhabits creation without annihilating it. The image becomes foundational for understanding how God dwells among finite creatures.
3. Moses's decision to 'turn aside' (sur) is the hinge of the narrative. Had he not turned, the call might not have come. Revelation requires attentiveness — God speaks when Moses shows he is willing to look.
4. The double call 'Moses! Moses!' echoes the calling of Abraham ('Abraham! Abraham!' Genesis 22:11). The repeated name signals urgency and intimacy. Moses's response — hineni, 'Here I am' — matches Abraham's response at the Aqedah, placing Moses in the line of covenant servants who make themselves wholly available to God.
5. 'Holy ground' (admat qodesh) — the first use of qodesh ('holy') in Exodus. Holiness is not an inherent quality of the soil but a condition created by divine presence. The command to remove sandals marks a boundary: the one approaching God must acknowledge that he stands on ground that has been set apart by God's nearness.
6. The three-fold identification — God of Abraham, God of Isaac, God of Jacob — anchors the burning bush revelation to the patriarchal covenant tradition. The God who appears is not unknown; He is the God who has already made promises and kept them. Moses hides his face because seeing God is dangerous (cf. Exodus 33:20).
7. Four verbs pile up: 'I have seen... heard... know.' God's awareness of suffering is comprehensive — visual, auditory, and relational. The word for 'sufferings' (makh'ovav) connotes pain at the deepest level. God does not observe suffering from a distance; He knows it intimately.
8. 'I have come down' (yaradti) — God descends to act. The same verb describes God's descent at Babel (Genesis 11:7) and will describe His descent at Sinai (Exodus 19:20). Divine intervention is portrayed spatially: God moves toward His people. The land promise is restated with the full list of six peoples, linking the exodus to the Abrahamic land grant.
9. The cry and the oppression are mentioned together: Israel's voice reaches heaven, and God sees the mechanism of their suffering. Both dimensions — the victims' experience and the oppressors' system — are held in divine awareness.
10. God commissions Moses with a purpose that exceeds every human qualification: bring My people out of Egypt. The pronoun 'My people' (ammi) asserts covenant ownership — Israel belongs to God, not to Pharaoh.
11. Moses's first objection is about identity: 'Who am I?' The deliverer's self-doubt is not false modesty but honest recognition that the task is absurdly disproportionate to the messenger. Every subsequent prophet will echo this inadequacy.
12. God's answer bypasses the question entirely. Moses asks 'Who am I?' and God answers 'I will be with you.' The sign is backward-looking — you will know I sent you when you worship on this mountain — requiring faith before confirmation. Presence, not credentials, is the ground of mission.
13. Moses's second objection concerns God's identity: 'What is His name?' In the ancient world, knowing a god's name meant knowing their character, jurisdiction, and accessibility. Moses is asking: who are You, specifically, that I should stake everything on Your commission?
14. Ehyeh asher ehyeh — 'I AM WHO I AM' or 'I WILL BE WHO I WILL BE.' The name resists domestication. God does not give a name that fits human categories; He gives a name that redefines all categories. The first-person form ehyeh ('I am/will be') becomes the third-person YHWH ('He is/will be') in v15 — the name by which others will invoke what God declares of Himself.
15. The name YHWH is declared permanent — 'This is My name forever' (le'olam). The covenant name is not temporary or situational; it defines God's relationship with His people across all generations. The word zikri ('My memorial/remembrance') means this name is the handle by which humanity calls upon God.
16. Moses is instructed to begin with the elders — covenant leadership structures precede national action. The phrase paqod paqadti ('I have carefully watched over') is a technical covenant-visitation term: God comes to inspect, intervene, and fulfill what He has promised.
17. The land description 'flowing with milk and honey' (zavat chalav udevash) depicts agricultural abundance — a pastoral paradise contrasted with Egyptian slave labor. The phrase will become a fixed formula throughout the Pentateuch for the promised land.

- 18. The request for a three-day journey is a formal worship petition, not deception. The narrative presents it as a legitimate first demand; Pharaoh's refusal even of this modest request exposes the totality of his opposition.
- 19. God reveals Pharaoh's intransigence in advance. The resistance is not a surprise but part of the divine plan. The phrase 'mighty hand' (yad chazaqah) will become one of Exodus's signature descriptions of divine power.
- 20. 'I will stretch out My hand' — God's hand replaces Pharaoh's hand. The contest is between two 'hands' — Pharaoh's hand of oppression and God's hand of deliverance. The wonders (nifle'otai) are not spectacle but covenant-judgment acts.
- 21. God will reverse the economics of slavery: the enslaved will leave with the wealth of their oppressors. The word chen ('favor') echoes the language of covenant grace — God gives Israel unmerited favor in the eyes of Egypt.
- 22. The plundering of Egypt is not theft but the restitution of unpaid slave wages. Israel leaves with silver, gold, and clothing — the raw materials that will later construct the tabernacle. Egypt's wealth becomes God's dwelling.

Summary: Moses raises further objections to his commission; God provides three signs and appoints Aaron as his spokesman. On the journey back to Egypt, the LORD confronts Moses at a lodging place, and Zipporah performs emergency circumcision. God declares Israel His firstborn son.

What Makes This Remarkable: Moses's phrase kevad-peh ukhevad lashon ('heavy of mouth and heavy of tongue') uses the same root kaved that will describe Pharaoh's hardened heart — the deliverer's weakness and the tyrant's stubbornness share a single Hebrew word, and both are overcome by God. The declaration 'Israel is My son, My firstborn' (beni vekhori Yisra'el, v22) is the most compressed statement of covenant identity in the Pentateuch, and it sets the theological logic for the tenth plague: firstborn for firstborn.

Translation Friction: We retained 'heavy of mouth and heavy of tongue' as a literal rendering rather than paraphrasing to 'slow of speech,' because the kaved wordplay with Pharaoh's heart is theologically load-bearing. The enigmatic phrase chatan damim ('bridegroom of blood,' v25-26) remains one of the most debated in the Torah. We rendered it literally and let the translator notes carry the interpretive weight, since no single English phrase can capture the intertwined meanings of marriage, blood, and covenant.

Connections: The staff-to-serpent sign in v3 echoes the nachash of Genesis 3:1 and anticipates the contest with Pharaoh's magicians in 7:10-12. 'All the men who sought your life are dead' (v19) echoes Genesis 31:3 and will be echoed in Matthew 2:20. The firstborn declaration (v22-23) sets up the Passover theology of chapters 11-12.

¹Moses answered, "But what if they do not believe me or listen to my voice? They may say, 'The LORD did not appear to you.'" ²The LORD said to him, "What is that in your hand?" He said, "A staff." ³He said, "Throw it on the ground." So he threw it on the ground, and it became a serpent, and Moses fled from it. ⁴Then the LORD said to Moses, "Reach out your hand and grasp it by the tail" — so he reached out his hand and caught it, and it became a staff in his hand — ⁵so that they may believe that the LORD, the God of their fathers — the God of Abraham, the God of Isaac, and the God of Jacob — has appeared to you." ⁶Then the LORD said to him, "Put your hand inside your cloak." He put his hand inside his cloak, and when he drew it out, his hand was leprous, white as snow. ⁷He said, "Put your hand back inside your cloak." He put his hand back, and when he drew it out, it was restored like the rest of his flesh. ⁸"If they do not believe you or heed the first sign, they may believe the second sign. ⁹But if they do not believe even these two signs or listen to your voice, you shall take some water from the Nile and pour it on the dry ground, and the water that you take from the Nile shall become blood on the ground." ¹⁰Then Moses said to the LORD, "Please, Lord, I have never been a man of words — not yesterday, not the day before, and not since You have spoken to Your servant. I am heavy of mouth and heavy of tongue." ¹¹The LORD said to him, "Who gave man his mouth? Who makes a person mute or deaf, seeing or blind? Is it not I, the LORD? ¹²Now go. I Myself will be with your mouth and will teach you what to say." ¹³But Moses said, "Please, Lord, send someone else." ¹⁴Then the anger of the LORD burned against Moses. He said, "Is not Aaron the Levite your brother? I know that he can speak well. He is already on his way to meet you, and when he sees you, his heart will be glad. ¹⁵You shall speak to him and put the words in his mouth, and I will be with your mouth and with his mouth, and I will teach you both what to do. ¹⁶He shall speak for you to the people, and he will be your mouth, and you will be as God to him. ¹⁷Take this staff in your hand, for with it you shall perform the signs." ¹⁸Moses went back to Jethro his father-in-law and said to him, "Please let me go back to my brothers in Egypt to see whether they are still alive." Jethro said to Moses, "Go in peace." ¹⁹The LORD said to Moses in Midian, "Go back to Egypt, for all the men who sought your life are dead." ²⁰So Moses took his wife and his sons, set them on a donkey, and went back to the land of Egypt. And Moses took the staff of God in his hand. ²¹The LORD said to Moses, "When you return to Egypt, see that you perform before Pharaoh all the wonders I have placed in your hand. But I will harden his heart, and he will not let the people go. ²²Then you shall say to Pharaoh, 'Thus says the LORD: Israel is My son, My firstborn. ²³I said to you, Let My son go so that he may serve Me, but you have refused to let him go. Now I will kill your son, your firstborn.'" ²⁴On the way, at a lodging place, the LORD met him and sought to put him to death. ²⁵Zipporah took a flint knife and cut off her son's foreskin and touched it to his feet. She said, "You are a bridegroom of blood to me." ²⁶So the LORD let him alone. It was then that she said "bridegroom of blood," referring to the circumcision. ²⁷The LORD said to Aaron, "Go into the wilderness to meet Moses." So he traveled and met him at the mountain of God and kissed him. ²⁸Moses told Aaron all the words of the LORD with which He had sent him and all the signs He had commanded him to perform. ²⁹Then Moses and Aaron went and gathered all the elders of the sons of Israel. ³⁰Aaron spoke all the words that the LORD had spoken to Moses, and he performed the signs in the sight of the people. ³¹The people believed. When they heard that the LORD had visited the sons of Israel and that He had seen their affliction, they bowed their heads and worshipped.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses's third objection concerns Israel's potential disbelief. Each objection has escalated: 'Who am I?' (3:11) 'What is Your name?' (3:13) 'What if they don't believe me?' (4:1). The progression reveals deepening resistance.
2. God starts with what Moses already holds — an ordinary shepherd's staff. The most powerful sign-instrument in Exodus is not something new but something transformed. God repurposes the mundane.
3. The staff becomes a nachash ('serpent') — a word loaded with Genesis echoes (Genesis 3:1). The serpent was also a symbol of royal Egyptian power (the uraeus cobra on Pharaoh's crown). God demonstrates mastery over both primordial and political symbols of power.
4. Moses must seize the serpent by its tail — the most dangerous way to grasp a snake. The act requires trust: what looks like certain harm becomes, in obedience, restored authority. The staff of a shepherd becomes the staff of God.
5. The signs authenticate Moses's commission by connecting him to the God already known to Israel — 'the God of their fathers.' Legitimacy is grounded in covenant continuity, not novel revelation.
6. The leprous hand demonstrates God's power over the body itself — to wound and to restore at command. Leprosy (tsara'at) represents the most severe ritual impurity, making this sign about both power and purity under divine control.
7. Immediate restoration proves that the affliction is demonstration, not punishment. God who wounds is the God who heals. The speed of healing — instant, complete — conveys absolute sovereignty over human flesh.
8. God provides a second sign as accommodation for weak faith. He does not demand perfect trust before acting; He provides enough evidence to make trust reasonable.
9. The water-to-blood sign foreshadows the first plague and targets the Nile — Egypt's source of life and object of worship. What sustains Egypt will testify against Egypt.
10. 'Heavy of mouth and heavy of tongue' (kevad-peh ukhevad lashon) — the word kaved ('heavy') is the same root used for Pharaoh's 'hardened' (kaved) heart later in Exodus. Moses's mouth is 'heavy'; Pharaoh's heart will be 'heavy.' The wordplay links the deliverer's weakness to the tyrant's stubbornness — both are overcome by God.
11. God's response reframes the objection entirely. Moses says 'I can't speak'; God says 'I made the mouth.' The Creator of speech does not need an eloquent messenger — He needs a willing one.
12. 'I Myself will be with your mouth' (anokhi ehyeh im-pikha) — the verb ehyeh ('I will be') is the same word from the divine name in 3:14. 'I AM' will be with Moses's mouth. God's identity and God's promise of presence are inseparable.
13. Moses's final plea — 'send someone else' (shelach na beyad-tishlach) — drops all pretense of legitimate objection. This is bare refusal. It provokes the only moment of divine anger in the call narrative.

14. God's anger flares but does not consume. The provision of Aaron is both accommodation and consequence — Moses gets help but also shares a role that was offered to him alone. Grace and discipline arrive together.
15. God promises to be with both mouths — Moses's and Aaron's. The prophetic team is underwritten by the same divine presence that sustains the individual prophet.
16. 'You will be as God to him' (vehayita lo le'Elohim) — Moses stands in the God-role relative to Aaron, who serves as his 'prophet' (navi). This arrangement previews the Moses-Pharaoh relationship: Moses will also be 'as God to Pharaoh' (7:1).
17. The staff — now called 'this staff' and later 'the staff of God' (v20) — is a shepherd's tool transformed into a sign-bearing instrument. It bridges Moses's pastoral past and prophetic future.
18. Moses's request to Jethro is diplomatically understated — 'to see if they are still alive' — concealing the full scope of his divine commission. The dangerous political dimension remains implicit.
19. 'All the men who sought your life are dead' echoes the announcement to Jacob (Genesis 31:3) and will echo in the infancy narrative of Jesus (Matthew 2:20). God clears the immediate human threat before the divine mission begins.
20. Moses departs with his family and the staff of God. Household and mission travel together — there is no separation between personal life and prophetic calling. The 'staff of God' (matteh ha'Elohim) signals that the ordinary tool has been permanently claimed for divine use.
21. God announces Pharaoh's hardening before any confrontation. The Hebrew uses chazaq ('strengthen, make firm'), suggesting that Pharaoh's existing resistance will be judicially confirmed rather than artificially imposed. God's foreknowledge encompasses human stubbornness.
22. 'Israel is My son, My firstborn' (beni vekhori Yisra'el) — the most compressed statement of Israel's covenant identity in the entire Pentateuch. Sonship language establishes both intimacy and obligation. God claims Israel with a father's authority and a father's tenderness.
23. The firstborn-for-firstborn threat creates the theological logic of the tenth plague. If Pharaoh refuses to release God's firstborn (Israel), God will take Pharaoh's firstborn. The measure-for-measure principle structures the entire plague narrative.
24. This is one of the most enigmatic passages in the Bible. The LORD 'met him and sought to put him to death' — the God who just commissioned Moses now threatens to kill him. The most likely reading connects this to circumcision: Moses's son is uncircumcised, and the covenant sign must be applied before the covenant mission can proceed.
25. Zipporah acts with decisive urgency, performing emergency circumcision with a flint knife. She saves Moses's life through the covenant act he has neglected. The phrase chatan damim ('bridegroom of blood') ties marriage, blood, and covenant into a single declaration — the household must be covenantally ordered before the deliverer can confront Pharaoh.
26. The crisis resolves when the covenant sign is applied. The passage, however brief and obscure, establishes a non-negotiable principle: the one who carries God's mission must first carry God's covenant mark. Ministry without covenant obedience is mortal danger.
27. God orchestrates the meeting of Moses and Aaron at the mountain of God — the same location as the burning bush. The kiss of reunion bonds the prophetic partnership at the site of revelation.
28. Moses transmits God's words and signs to Aaron — the chain of revelation runs from God to Moses to Aaron to the people. This communication structure will define Israel's prophetic office throughout the Torah.
29. The gathering of elders reconstitutes Israel's covenant leadership after centuries of slavery. Corporate witness precedes corporate action.
30. Aaron speaks and performs signs before the people — the dual commission (word and sign) authenticates the message. Israel has been given evidence sufficient for trust.
31. The people's response combines belief, bowing, and worship. When they hear that God has 'visited' (paqad) them and 'seen' (ra'ah) their affliction, their response mirrors the four divine verbs of 2:24-25: God heard, remembered, saw, knew — and now the people believe, bow, and worship. The divine initiative produces human response.

Summary: Moses and Aaron confront Pharaoh with the demand 'Let My people go,' but Pharaoh refuses, increases the labor quotas by withholding straw, and the Israelite foremen turn against Moses. Moses challenges God: 'Why have You brought harm upon this people?'

What Makes This Remarkable: Two competing speech formulas collide: 'Thus says the LORD' (koh amar YHWH, v1) versus 'Thus says Pharaoh' (koh amar Par'oh, v10). The chapter stages a contest over whose word governs reality. Pharaoh dismisses God's command as divrei shaqer ('lying words,' v9) — the most truthful speech in the universe is labeled deception by the most powerful man on earth. Moses's raw complaint to God in vv22-23 uses the infinitive absolute construction: 'delivering, You have not delivered.'

Translation Friction: We rendered the Hebrew chag (v1) as 'feast' rather than 'festival' or 'pilgrimage,' though the term denotes a communal covenant worship gathering, not a banquet. Pharaoh's nitchakkemah ('let us deal shrewdly,' from 1:10, echoed here in his tactics) sits on the boundary between wisdom and cunning; we chose 'shrewdly' to preserve the ironic corruption of a wisdom-word. The phrase hiv'ashtem et-reichenu ('you have made our smell stink,' v21) we rendered as 'made us repulsive' for clarity, though the literal olfactory image is vivid.

Connections: Pharaoh's 'Who is the LORD?' (v2) echoes the king who 'did not know Joseph' (1:8) — both use yada as political refusal. Moses's complaint anticipates the lament psalms (Psalm 13:1-2; 44:23-24). God's answer comes in 6:1, completing the arc begun here.

¹Afterward Moses and Aaron went in and said to Pharaoh, "Thus says the LORD, the God of Israel: Let My people go so that they may celebrate a feast to Me in the wilderness." ²Pharaoh said, "Who is the LORD, that I should obey His voice and let Israel go? I do not know the LORD, and I will not let Israel go." ³They said, "The God of the Hebrews has met with us. Please let us go a three-day journey into the wilderness so that we may sacrifice to the LORD our God, or He may strike us with pestilence or with the sword." ⁴The king of Egypt said to them, "Moses and Aaron, why are you taking the people away from their work? Get back to your labors!" ⁵Pharaoh also said, "The people of the land are now many, and you would have them stop working!" ⁶That same day Pharaoh commanded the taskmasters of the people and their foremen, saying, ⁷"You shall no longer give the people straw for making bricks as before. Let them go and gather straw for themselves. ⁸But the quota of bricks that they were making before — you shall impose the same amount on them. You shall not reduce it, for they are lazy. That is why they cry out, 'Let us go and sacrifice to our God.' ⁹Let the work be heavier on the men so that they are occupied with it and pay no attention to lying words." ¹⁰So the taskmasters of the people and their foremen went out and said to the people, "Thus says Pharaoh: I will not give you straw. ¹¹Go and get your own straw wherever you can find it, but your workload will not be reduced at all." ¹²So the people scattered throughout all the land of Egypt to gather stubble for straw. ¹³The taskmasters were relentless, saying, "Complete your daily work — the same amount as when straw was provided!" ¹⁴The foremen of the sons of Israel, whom Pharaoh's taskmasters had set over them, were beaten and asked, "Why have you not completed your required amount of bricks, both yesterday and today, as you did before?" ¹⁵Then the foremen of the sons of Israel came and cried out to Pharaoh, saying, "Why do you treat your servants this way? ¹⁶No straw is given to your servants, yet they say to us, 'Make bricks!' And your servants are being beaten, but the fault is with your own people." ¹⁷He said, "You are lazy — lazy! That is why you say, 'Let us go and sacrifice to the LORD.' ¹⁸Now go and work! No straw will be given to you, but you must deliver the full number of bricks." ¹⁹The foremen of the sons of Israel saw that they were in trouble when they were told, "You shall not reduce your daily number of bricks at all." ²⁰They met Moses and Aaron, who were waiting for them as they came out from Pharaoh. ²¹They said to them, "May the LORD look on you and judge! You have made us repulsive in the eyes of Pharaoh and his servants and have put a sword in their hand to kill us." ²²Then Moses returned to the LORD and said, "Lord, why have You brought harm upon this people? Why did You ever send me? ²³From the time I came to Pharaoh to speak in Your name, he has done evil to this people, and You have not delivered Your people at all."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses and Aaron open with 'Thus says the LORD' (koh amar YHWH) — the prophetic messenger formula. They speak not on their own authority but as authorized representatives. The request is specific: release for a wilderness feast (chag), a covenant worship gathering.
2. 'Who is the LORD, that I should obey His voice?' — Pharaoh's question is not philosophical curiosity but political defiance. He positions himself as the only sovereign whose voice matters in Egypt. 'I do not know the LORD' (lo yadati et-YHWH) uses the same verb from 1:8 ('a king who did not know Joseph'). The refusal to 'know' is a refusal to acknowledge authority.
3. Moses and Aaron reframe the request as a matter of divine threat: failure to worship may bring pestilence or the sword. The warning shifts the dynamic from permission-request to life-or-death obedience, though Pharaoh remains unimpressed.
4. Pharaoh reframes the worship-request as labor disruption. In his worldview, the only relevant category for Israel is production. He reduces theology to economics: 'Why are you taking the people from their work?' The enslaver's logic recognizes only output, not worship.

5. Pharaoh notes that the people are 'many' (rabbim) — the very population growth that alarmed him in 1:9 now makes their labor stoppage an economic threat. His fear of their numbers works in both directions: too many to release, too many to let idle.
6. Pharaoh's response to a worship request is to increase oppression. The pattern will repeat throughout Exodus: prophetic confrontation provokes imperial escalation.
7. Straw was the binding agent in mud bricks — chopped straw mixed with clay prevents cracking. Removing the supply while maintaining quotas is not merely cruel but structurally impossible, designed to break the people's spirit and discredit Moses.
8. Pharaoh diagnoses the worship request as a symptom of idleness: 'they are lazy' (nirpim hem). He weaponizes the accusation of laziness to justify intensified oppression — a strategy used by slave systems throughout history to reframe resistance as character failure.
9. 'Lying words' (divrei shaqer) — Pharaoh categorizes God's own command as falsehood. The inversion is total: truth is called a lie, worship is called laziness, and obedience to God is treated as rebellion against the state.
10. The taskmasters relay Pharaoh's decree using his own formula: 'Thus says Pharaoh' (koh amar Par'oh), mimicking the prophetic 'Thus says the LORD.' The two speech formulas now stand in direct competition — whose word governs reality?
11. The workload remains the same; only the supply chain is disrupted. The impossible demand functions as collective punishment designed to turn the people against Moses and Aaron rather than against Pharaoh.
12. 'The people scattered' (vayyafets ha'am) — the verb puts ('scatter') echoes the scattering at Babel (Genesis 11:8). Oppression disintegrates communal life; the people are dispersed across the land searching for raw material instead of standing together.
13. 'Complete your daily work' — the Hebrew emphasizes daily (yom beyomo), constant pressure without relief. Oppression operates through exhaustion: no moment for rest, reflection, or resistance.
14. The foremen are Israelites placed in a middle position — responsible for quotas they cannot meet, beaten for failures they cannot prevent. The system turns Israelites against Israelites, using structural violence to fracture solidarity from within.
15. The foremen appeal directly to Pharaoh, still hoping that the system can be reasoned with from inside. Their cry 'Why do you treat your servants this way?' assumes their status as servants (avadim) entitles them to fair treatment — a dignity Pharaoh has already revoked.
16. The foremen's argument is structurally sound: we lack materials, yet face punishment. 'The fault is with your own people' (vechatat ammekha) dares to assign blame upward. This is remarkable courage under oppression.
17. Pharaoh repeats 'lazy' (nirpim) twice — the accusation hardens into a verdict. He will not engage with the argument about materials; he will only assert that the desire to worship is proof of insufficient labor. Religion is redefined as a labor-management problem.
18. The decree is final and unyielding: no straw, full quotas. Pharaoh's word, once spoken, does not negotiate or accommodate. This rigidity will prove to be his undoing, as it positions him immovably against God's equally uncompromising demand.
19. The foremen understand the trap: they are caught between Pharaoh's impossible quotas and their own people's desperation. The phrase 'they were in trouble' (bera) literally means 'in evil/distress' — the situation has become structurally hopeless within the Egyptian system.
20. The foremen encounter Moses and Aaron outside Pharaoh's palace — the confrontation between those inside the system and those who challenged it from outside. The two approaches to liberation now collide.
21. The foremen curse Moses and Aaron: 'You have made us repulsive' (hiv'ashtem et-reichenu) — literally, 'you have made our smell stink.' The accusation is painfully human: prophetic action has made life worse, not better. This is the cost of confrontation before deliverance arrives.
22. Moses's complaint to God is raw and honest: 'Why have You brought harm upon this people?' (lamah hare'otah la'am hazzeh). The same Moses who was reluctant to go now challenges God for the results of going. The verb hara ('do evil/harm') charges God with causing the suffering He promised to end.
23. 'You have not delivered Your people at all' (vehatsel lo-hitsalta et-ammekha) — the infinitive absolute construction intensifies the accusation: 'delivering, you have not delivered.' Moses throws God's own promise back at Him. This is not faithlessness but the anguished prayer of a man who trusted God and watched things get worse. It will receive its answer in 6:1.

Summary: God answers Moses's complaint with a covenant-reaffirmation speech built on four 'I will' declarations, reveals that the patriarchs knew Him as El Shaddai but not yet by the full significance of YHWH, and provides the Levitical genealogy establishing Moses and Aaron's lineage.

What Makes This Remarkable: The four 'I will' verbs of v6-8 — bring out, deliver, redeem, take — form the theological backbone of the exodus and traditionally correspond to the four cups of the Passover Seder. The climactic verb ga'al ('redeem') is kinsman-redeemer language: God acts not as a distant benefactor but as covenant kin. The phrase qotser ruach ('crushed spirit,' v9) — literally 'shortness of breath' — is one of Scripture's most psychologically accurate descriptions of sustained trauma: even good news cannot penetrate.

Translation Friction: The statement that God was not 'known' (noda) to the patriarchs by the name YHWH (v3) created tension with Genesis passages where the name appears. We rendered it 'I did not make Myself fully known to them,' following the interpretation that yada here means experiential knowledge of the name's redemptive significance, not mere awareness of the word. The metaphor aral sefatayim ('uncircumcised lips,' v12) we rendered as 'unskilled in speech' for readability, noting the striking covenant metaphor in our translator notes.

Connections: The four 'I will' declarations are echoed in the Passover Haggadah's four cups. The covenant formula of v7 ('I will take you as My people, I will be your God') recurs at Sinai (19:5-6), in Jeremiah 31:33, and Revelation 21:3. The genealogy connects to Numbers 3 and 1 Chronicles 6.

¹Then the LORD said to Moses, "Now you will see what I will do to Pharaoh. By a mighty hand he will let them go, and by a mighty hand he will drive them out of his land." ²God spoke to Moses and said to him, "I am the LORD. ³I appeared to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob as God Almighty, but by My name the LORD I did not make Myself fully known to them. ⁴I also established My covenant with them, to give them the land of Canaan, the land in which they lived as sojourners. ⁵Furthermore, I have heard the groaning of the sons of Israel, whom the Egyptians hold in slavery, and I have remembered My covenant. ⁶Therefore say to the sons of Israel: 'I am the LORD. I will bring you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians. I will deliver you from their bondage. I will redeem you with an outstretched arm and with great acts of judgment. ⁷I will take you as My people, and I will be your God. Then you will know that I am the LORD your God, who brought you out from under the burdens of the Egyptians. ⁸I will bring you into the land that I swore to give to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, and I will give it to you as a possession. I am the LORD.'" ⁹Moses spoke this to the sons of Israel, but they did not listen to him because of their crushed spirit and harsh bondage. ¹⁰Then the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ¹¹"Go in and tell Pharaoh king of Egypt to let the sons of Israel go out of his land." ¹²But Moses said before the LORD, "If the sons of Israel have not listened to me, how will Pharaoh listen to me? I am unskilled in speech." ¹³The LORD spoke to Moses and to Aaron and gave them a charge regarding the sons of Israel and regarding Pharaoh king of Egypt, to bring the sons of Israel out of the land of Egypt. ¹⁴These are the heads of their fathers' houses: The sons of Reuben, the firstborn of Israel — Hanoah, Pallu, Hezron, and Carmi. These are the clans of Reuben. ¹⁵The sons of Simeon — Jemuel, Jamin, Ohad, Jachin, Zohar, and Shaul, the son of a Canaanite woman. These are the clans of Simeon. ¹⁶These are the names of the sons of Levi according to their generations: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. The years of Levi's life were 137 years. ¹⁷The sons of Gershon — Libni and Shimei, by their clans. ¹⁸The sons of Kohath — Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. The years of Kohath's life were 133 years. ¹⁹The sons of Merari — Mahli and Mushi. These are the clans of the Levites according to their generations. ²⁰Amram married Jochebed, his father's sister, and she bore him Aaron and Moses. The years of Amram's life were 137 years. ²¹The sons of Izhar — Korah, Nepheg, and Zichri. ²²The sons of Uzziel — Mishael, Elzaphan, and Sithri. ²³Aaron married Elisheba, the daughter of Amminadab and the sister of Nahshon, and she bore him Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. ²⁴The sons of Korah — Assir, Elkanah, and Abiasaph. These are the clans of the Korahites. ²⁵Eleazar the son of Aaron married one of the daughters of Putiel, and she bore him Phinehas. These are the heads of the fathers' houses of the Levites, by their clans. ²⁶It was this Aaron and Moses to whom the LORD said, "Bring the sons of Israel out of the land of Egypt by their hosts." ²⁷It was they who spoke to Pharaoh king of Egypt about bringing the sons of Israel out of Egypt — this Moses and Aaron. ²⁸On the day when the LORD spoke to Moses in the land of Egypt, ²⁹the LORD said to Moses, "I am the LORD. Tell Pharaoh king of Egypt all that I say to you." ³⁰But Moses said before the LORD, "I am unskilled in speech. How will Pharaoh listen to me?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God's response to Moses's complaint (5:22-23) begins with a promise of force: 'by a mighty hand' (beyad chazaqah). The phrase will echo throughout Exodus as a signature description of divine power. God does not explain the delay; He announces decisive action.
2. 'I am the LORD' (ani YHWH) opens a formal covenant-reaffirmation speech (vv.2-8) that is among the most theologically dense passages in the Pentateuch. God speaks His own name as the ground of everything that follows.
3. The statement about El Shaddai and YHWH has generated centuries of debate. It does not mean the patriarchs never heard the name YHWH (cf. Genesis 15:7), but that they did not experience its full significance — the God who acts in redemptive power to fulfill covenant promises. The name's meaning is now being revealed through action, not merely speech.
4. 'Established My covenant' (haqimoti et-beriti) — the verb qum ('establish, set up') treats the covenant as a standing structure, erected and maintained by God. The land of Canaan is specifically named as the covenant's territorial content.
5. Divine 'hearing' and 'remembering' reprise the language of 2:24-25. God heard, remembered, saw, knew — and now He declares what He will do. The groaning of the enslaved has become the engine of salvation history.
6. The four 'I will' declarations form the theological backbone of the exodus: (1) I will bring you out, (2) I will deliver you, (3) I will redeem you, (4) I will take you. Each verb carries distinct weight. The climactic 'redeem' (ga'al) is kinsman-redeemer language — God acts not as a distant benefactor but as covenant kin who pays the price of liberation.
7. 'I will take you as My people, and I will be your God' — this is the covenant formula (formula of mutual belonging) that defines the God-Israel relationship throughout Scripture. It will be restated at Sinai (Exodus 19:5-6), in the prophets (Jeremiah 31:33), and in Revelation (21:3). Relationship, not merely rescue, is the goal of the exodus.
8. The speech closes as it opened: 'I am the LORD.' The entire declaration is bracketed by divine self-identification (vv.2, 8). The promises are as certain as the identity of the one who speaks them. The land sworn (nasa yadi, 'I lifted My hand') to the patriarchs is now the destination of the exodus.
9. 'Crushed spirit' (qotser ruach) — literally 'shortness of breath/spirit.' Oppression has compressed the people's inner capacity to the point where even good news cannot penetrate. This is one of the most psychologically accurate descriptions of sustained trauma in Scripture.
10. God does not wait for Israel to recover before issuing the next command. The mission moves forward regardless of the people's readiness.
11. The command to Pharaoh is blunt and direct: 'let them go' (shalach). No diplomacy, no negotiation — a sovereign demand.
12. Moses repeats his speech objection from 4:10, now using the phrase 'uncircumcised lips' (aral sefatayim) — an unusual metaphor linking speech inadequacy to covenant incompleteness. The word arel ('uncircumcised') will gain enormous significance at Sinai and beyond.
13. God responds to Moses's objection not with argument but with commissioning. He gives a 'charge' (tsav) to both Moses and Aaron — a formal military/legal command that overrides personal hesitation.
14. The genealogy begins with Reuben and Simeon (Jacob's first two sons) but quickly narrows to Levi — Moses and Aaron's tribe. The list legitimizes their authority by anchoring it in Israel's tribal structure.
15. Simeon's genealogy is brief, setting up the extended treatment of Levi that follows. The note about Shaul's Canaanite mother preserves the historical record without commentary.
16. The Levite genealogy becomes the chapter's center. Three sons of Levi — Gershon, Kohath, Merari — establish the branches from which all priestly and Levitical service will descend.
17. The Gershonite line is listed briefly; the narrative interest lies with the Kohathites (v18), from whom Moses and Aaron descend.
18. The Kohathite line is expanded because it leads to Amram, Moses and Aaron's father. The genealogical focus narrows with each generation toward the commissioned deliverers.
19. Merari's line completes the three-branch Levitical structure. This genealogical framework will govern tabernacle service assignments in Numbers.
20. Amram and Jochebed are named for the first time — Moses's parents, identified in the genealogical record. Jochebed is Amram's father's sister (dodah), a marriage later prohibited by Levitical law (Leviticus 18:12-13). The narrative records without judging.
21. Izhar's son Korah will later lead a rebellion against Moses (Numbers 16). The genealogy quietly positions future conflicts within the family tree.
22. Uzziel's sons will play roles in the tabernacle narrative (Leviticus 10:4). The genealogy plants seeds for later developments.

23. Aaron's wife Elisheba connects the priestly line to the tribe of Judah through Nahshon (cf. Ruth 4:20, 1 Chronicles 2:10). The marriage links the priestly and royal tribes at the genealogical level.
24. The Korahite clans will become significant in later Israelite worship — the 'sons of Korah' are credited with multiple psalms (Psalms 42, 44-49, 84-85, 87-88).
25. Phinehas will become the great zealot for covenant faithfulness (Numbers 25:7-13). His genealogy here connects future zeal to the Aaronic priestly line.
26. The narrator breaks the genealogy to reidentify Moses and Aaron as the ones God commissioned. The genealogy serves the narrative, not the other way around — it exists to legitimize the mission.
27. The emphasis falls on 'this Moses and Aaron' (hu Mosheh ve'Aharon) — lest anyone mistake identities. The commissioned deliverers are specific, named individuals within a documented lineage.
28. The narrative returns to the commission scene, resuming from v13 after the genealogical interlude. The phrase 'on the day when' (beyom dibber) reconnects to the direct speech of God.
29. 'I am the LORD' again — the speech restarts with the same self-identification that opened the covenant declaration in v2. Repetition is not redundancy but rhetorical anchoring.
30. Moses's final objection returns verbatim — 'uncircumcised lips.' The repetition creates a literary frame (vv.12, 30) that brackets the genealogy, showing that Moses's inadequacy is not resolved by pedigree but by divine commission.

Summary: God makes Moses 'like God to Pharaoh' with Aaron as his prophet, announces the hardening of Pharaoh's heart, and initiates the plague sequence. Aaron's staff swallows the magicians' staffs, the Nile turns to blood, but Pharaoh's heart remains hard.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter introduces three theologically dense elements at once: the knowledge formula ('the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD,' v5), the hardening motif using three different Hebrew verbs (chazaq, qasheh, kaved), and the recognition that Israel's enslaved workers are reidentified as God's tseva'ot ('hosts/armies,' v4). The magicians can replicate the blood-plague but cannot reverse it — imitation is not mastery.

Translation Friction: The hardening vocabulary required careful handling: chazaq ('strengthen/make firm'), qasheh ('make hard'), and kaved ('make heavy') each carry distinct nuances. We preserved these distinctions across our renderings rather than flattening them into a single English word. The phrase netatikha Elohim lePar'oh ('I have made you like God to Pharaoh,' v1) we rendered with 'like God' rather than simply 'a god,' because the Hebrew establishes Moses as God's authorized representative, not a deity.

Connections: Moses as 'God to Pharaoh' fulfills the arrangement previewed in 4:16. The knowledge formula ('they shall know that I am the LORD') will recur throughout Ezekiel (e.g., Ezekiel 6:7; 12:15). The staff-swallowing contest in v12 inverts the serpent's power from Genesis 3. The Nile-to-blood targets Egypt's source of life and worship.

¹The LORD said to Moses, "See, I have made you like God to Pharaoh, and Aaron your brother shall be your prophet. ²You shall speak everything that I command you, and Aaron your brother shall tell Pharaoh to let the sons of Israel go from his land. ³But I will harden Pharaoh's heart. I will multiply My signs and My wonders in the land of Egypt. ⁴Pharaoh will not listen to you. Then I will lay My hand on Egypt and bring out My hosts, My people the sons of Israel, from the land of Egypt by great acts of judgment. ⁵The Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD, when I stretch out My hand over Egypt and bring the sons of Israel out from among them. ⁶Moses and Aaron did so; they did just as the LORD commanded them. ⁷Moses was eighty years old, and Aaron eighty-three years old, when they spoke to Pharaoh. ⁸The LORD said to Moses and Aaron, ⁹"When Pharaoh says to you, 'Perform a wonder,' you shall say to Aaron, 'Take your staff and throw it down before Pharaoh,' and it will become a serpent." ¹⁰So Moses and Aaron went in to Pharaoh and did just as the LORD had commanded. Aaron threw down his staff before Pharaoh and his servants, and it became a serpent. ¹¹Then Pharaoh summoned the wise men and the sorcerers, and they, the magicians of Egypt, also did the same by their secret arts. ¹²Each one threw down his staff, and they became serpents. But Aaron's staff swallowed up their staffs. ¹³Yet Pharaoh's heart was hardened, and he did not listen to them, just as the LORD had said. ¹⁴Then the LORD said to Moses, "Pharaoh's heart is stubborn; he refuses to let the people go. ¹⁵Go to Pharaoh in the morning as he goes out to the water. Stand by the bank of the Nile to meet him, and take in your hand the staff that was turned into a serpent. ¹⁶Say to him, 'The LORD, the God of the Hebrews, has sent me to you, saying: Let My people go, so that they may serve Me in the wilderness. But until now you have not listened. ¹⁷Thus says the LORD: By this you shall know that I am the LORD — I am about to strike the water in the Nile with the staff in my hand, and it will be turned to blood. ¹⁸The fish in the Nile will die, and the Nile will stink, and the Egyptians will be unable to drink water from the Nile.' ¹⁹The LORD said to Moses, 'Say to Aaron: Take your staff and stretch out your hand over the waters of Egypt — over their rivers, their canals, their pools, and every body of water — so that they may become blood. There shall be blood throughout all the land of Egypt, even in vessels of wood and stone.' ²⁰Moses and Aaron did just as the LORD commanded. He raised the staff and struck the water in the Nile in the sight of Pharaoh and his servants, and all the water in the Nile was turned to blood. ²¹The fish in the Nile died, and the Nile stank so that the Egyptians could not drink water from it. There was blood throughout all the land of Egypt. ²²But the magicians of Egypt did the same by their secret arts, so Pharaoh's heart remained hard, and he did not listen to them, just as the LORD had said. ²³Pharaoh turned and went into his house, and he did not take even this to heart. ²⁴All the Egyptians dug along the Nile for water to drink, because they could not drink the water of the Nile. ²⁵Seven full days passed after the LORD struck the Nile. ²⁶Then the LORD said to Moses, 'Go in to Pharaoh and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD: Let My people go, so that they may serve Me. ²⁷If you refuse to let them go, I will strike all your territory with frogs. ²⁸The Nile shall swarm with frogs, and they shall come up into your house and into your bedroom and onto your bed and into the houses of your servants and on your people and into your ovens and into your kneading bowls. ²⁹The frogs shall come up on you and on your people and on all your servants.'"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'I have made you like God to Pharaoh' (netatikha Elohim lePar'oh) — Moses stands in the God-role relative to Pharaoh: he speaks with divine authority, commands signs, and pronounces judgment. Aaron functions as Moses's 'prophet' (navi) — the one who speaks the words on behalf of the authority.
2. The chain of revelation is formalized: God speaks to Moses, Moses speaks to Aaron, Aaron speaks to Pharaoh. This structure mirrors the prophetic office that will define Israel's relationship with God throughout its history.
3. 'I will harden Pharaoh's heart' (va'ani aqsheh et-lev Par'oh) — the verb qasheh means 'make hard, make stubborn.' God's hardening does not create rebellion from nothing but confirms and solidifies Pharaoh's own resistance. The purpose is to multiply signs — to demonstrate God's sovereignty so thoroughly that neither Egypt nor Israel can mistake who controls history.
4. 'My hosts, My people' (et-tsiv'otai et-ammi) — the military term tseva'ot ('hosts, armies') is applied to Israel for the first time. The enslaved workers are reidentified as God's army. The exodus is not merely escape but a military withdrawal of God's own forces from enemy territory.
5. The knowledge formula — 'they shall know that I am the LORD' (veya'du Mitsrayim ki-ani YHWH) — states the theological purpose of the plagues. The signs are revelatory, not merely punitive. Egypt will learn God's identity through judgment.
6. The obedience formula echoes Noah (Genesis 6:22) and Moses at Sinai: exact compliance with divine command, reported without embellishment.
7. Moses at eighty and Aaron at eighty-three — both are old men beginning the most consequential mission in Israel's history. Their ages signal that God's timing operates outside human career trajectories.
8. A new divine speech introduces the first sign before Pharaoh — the staff-to-serpent demonstration.
9. The staff becomes a tannin ('serpent, sea creature, dragon') — a word associated with chaos monsters in creation mythology (cf. Isaiah 27:1; 51:9). The sign challenges Egyptian cosmic symbolism at its root.
10. Aaron performs the sign as instructed — obedience precedes results. The sign is public, performed before Pharaoh and his court.
11. Pharaoh summons his own practitioners — chartumim ('magicians') and mekashfim ('sorcerers'). Their ability to replicate the sign by 'secret arts' (belahateihem) gives Pharaoh grounds for dismissal, though the replication is surface-level, not equal.
12. Aaron's staff swallows the Egyptian staffs — the contest is not merely matched but won. Superior power is demonstrated through consumption. The verb bala ('swallowed') is the same verb used when the earth swallows Korah (Numbers 16:32). God's instruments consume rivals.
13. 'Pharaoh's heart was hardened' (vayyechezaq lev Par'oh) — the first occurrence of the hardening formula in the plague narrative. The verb chazaq means 'was strengthened, became firm.' His heart locks into resistance.

14. God identifies Pharaoh's heart as kaved ('heavy, stubborn') — the same root as Moses's 'heavy mouth' (4:10). Both the prophet and the tyrant have something 'heavy,' but God works through the prophet's heaviness while judging the tyrant's.
15. Moses is to intercept Pharaoh at the Nile in the morning — possibly during a ritual visit. The confrontation happens at Egypt's sacred river, turning worship space into judgment space.
16. The demand 'Let My people go so they may serve Me' (shallach et-ammi vey'a'avduni) uses the same verb for 'serve' (avad) that describes Israel's slavery. The contest is about who Israel will serve — Pharaoh or God.
17. 'By this you shall know that I am the LORD' — the knowledge formula accompanies the first plague. Each plague is designed to teach, not merely to punish. The Nile, Egypt's lifeline and object of worship, is the first target.
18. The death of the fish and the stinking of the river reverse the Nile's life-giving function. Egypt's source of sustenance becomes a source of death and repulsion.
19. The plague extends beyond the Nile to every water source in Egypt — rivers, canals, pools, even water stored in vessels. The judgment is comprehensive, leaving no workaround.
20. Moses and Aaron obey, and the Nile turns to blood. The act is performed 'in the sight of Pharaoh' — the sign is public and undeniable. The Nile, worshipped as the god Hapi, bleeds.
21. The consequences are immediate: dead fish, unbearable stench, undrinkable water. Egypt's prosperity, built on the Nile, is poisoned at its source.
22. The magicians replicate the sign — a pyrrhic victory, since more blood-water is the last thing Egypt needs. Their success gives Pharaoh an excuse to resist, and his heart 'remains hard' (vayyechezaq).
23. 'He did not take even this to heart' (velo-shat libbo gam-lazot) — Pharaoh retreats into his palace and refuses to internalize the sign. The verb shut ('set, place') with lev ('heart') means he did not allow the event to affect his inner disposition.
24. The people dig for filtered water — a desperate workaround that reveals the plague's severity. The populace suffers while Pharaoh remains unmoved in his palace.
25. Seven days — a complete cycle — pass after the plague. The duration signals divine patience: time for repentance before the next judgment.
26. The second plague sequence begins with the same formula: 'Let My people go so they may serve Me.' Each plague reissues the same demand, proving that God's patience has not replaced God's purpose.
27. Frogs as a plague challenge the Egyptian frog-goddess Heqet, associated with fertility and childbirth. The gods of Egypt are systematically confronted by the God of Israel.
28. The invasion is total — bedroom, bed, ovens, kneading bowls. The sacred (Heqet) becomes the revolting. No space in Egyptian life remains untouched.
29. The frogs come upon Pharaoh himself — the king is not insulated from the judgment he causes. His person bears the consequences of his refusal.

Summary: Three plagues unfold — frogs, gnats, and flies. The magicians replicate frogs but fail at gnats, conceding 'This is the finger of God.' God begins making a distinction (hiflah) between Egypt and Goshen. Pharaoh negotiates, concedes partially, then reneges each time.

What Makes This Remarkable: The magicians' confession etsba Elohim hi ('this is the finger of God,' v19) marks the moment Egypt's own religious experts recognize a power beyond their craft. The verb hiflah ('make a distinction,' v22) introduces a covenant principle that will intensify through the remaining plagues: belonging to God creates a different experiential reality. Pharaoh's pattern of concession-then-retraction reveals that his negotiations are strategic, never sincere.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew tsinnim (v17, sometimes rendered 'lice' or 'gnats') posed a translation challenge — the exact insect is uncertain. We chose 'gnats' following the consensus that these are small biting insects arising from dust, contrasting with the larger swarm (arov) that follows. The word arov (v21, typically 'flies' or 'swarms') has no modifier specifying the creature type; we rendered it 'swarms of flies' for clarity while noting the ambiguity.

Connections: The 'finger of God' (v19) reappears when God writes the tablets with His finger (31:18) and in Jesus's claim in Luke 11:20. The Goshen distinction anticipates the Passover distinction of chapter 12. Pharaoh's broken promises foreshadow the pattern that continues through chapters 9-10.

¹Then the LORD said to Moses, "Say to Aaron: Stretch out your hand with your staff over the rivers, the canals, and the pools, and bring up frogs over the land of Egypt." ²Aaron extended his hand over the waters of Egypt, and frogs swarmed up and blanketed the land. ³But the magicians did the same by their secret arts and brought up frogs on the land of Egypt. ⁴Then Pharaoh called Moses and Aaron and said, "Plead with the LORD to remove the frogs from me and from my people, and I will let the people go to sacrifice to the LORD." ⁵Moses said to Pharaoh, "You may have the honor over me: set the time when I should pray for you and your servants and your people, to cut off the frogs from you and your houses, so that they remain only in the Nile." ⁶He said, "Tomorrow." Moses said, "It shall be as you say, so that you may know that there is no one like the LORD our God. ⁷The frogs will depart from you and your houses and from your servants and your people. They will remain only in the Nile." ⁸Moses and Aaron went out from Pharaoh, and Moses cried out to the LORD concerning the frogs He had brought upon Pharaoh. ⁹The LORD did as Moses asked, and the frogs died in the houses, in the courtyards, and in the fields. ¹⁰They gathered them into piles, and the land stank. ¹¹But when Pharaoh saw that there was relief, he hardened his heart and did not listen to them, just as the LORD had said. ¹²Then the LORD said to Moses, "Say to Aaron: Stretch out your staff and strike the dust of the ground, and it shall become gnats throughout all the land of Egypt." ¹³They did so. Aaron stretched out his hand with his staff and struck the dust of the ground, and there were gnats on man and beast. All the dust of the ground became gnats throughout the land of Egypt. ¹⁴The magicians tried to produce gnats by their secret arts, but they could not. The gnats were on man and beast. ¹⁵Then the magicians said to Pharaoh, "This is the finger of God." But Pharaoh's heart was hard, and he did not listen to them, just as the LORD had said. ¹⁶Then the LORD said to Moses, "Rise early in the morning and stand before Pharaoh as he goes out to the water, and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD: Let My people go, so that they may serve Me. ¹⁷For if you do not let My people go, I will send swarms of flies on you and on your servants and on your people and into your houses. The houses of the Egyptians shall be filled with swarms, and even the ground on which they stand. ¹⁸But on that day I will set apart the land of Goshen, where My people dwell, so that no swarms shall be there, in order that you may know that I, the LORD, am in the midst of the land. ¹⁹I will put a distinction between My people and your people. Tomorrow this sign shall come about.'" ²⁰The LORD did so. A grievous swarm of flies came into the house of Pharaoh and into the houses of his servants. Throughout all the land of Egypt the ground was ruined by the swarms. ²¹Pharaoh called Moses and Aaron and said, "Go, sacrifice to your God within the land." ²²But Moses said, "It would not be right to do so, for we would be sacrificing to the LORD our God what is detestable to the Egyptians. If we sacrifice what is detestable to the Egyptians before their eyes, will they not stone us? ²³We must go a three-day journey into the wilderness and sacrifice to the LORD our God as He commands us." ²⁴Pharaoh said, "I will let you go to sacrifice to the LORD your God in the wilderness, but you must not go very far away. Pray for me." ²⁵Moses said, "I am going out from you, and I will pray to the LORD that the swarms depart from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people tomorrow. But Pharaoh must not deal deceitfully again by not letting the people go to sacrifice to the LORD." ²⁶So Moses went out from Pharaoh and prayed to the LORD. ²⁷The LORD did as Moses asked and removed the swarms from Pharaoh, from his servants, and from his people. Not one remained. ²⁸But Pharaoh hardened his heart this time also and did not let the people go.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The frog plague begins with the same commission structure: God commands, Moses relays, Aaron acts. The frogs emerge from the Nile — the same river that was already struck with blood. Egypt's sacred waterway produces one plague after another.
2. The frogs 'covered the land' — totality is the pattern of each plague. God's judgments are not partial or localized (except for Goshen); they saturate Egyptian life.
3. The magicians replicate the plague — again adding to the problem rather than solving it. Their ability to produce frogs does nothing to remove them. Imitation is not mastery.

4. Pharaoh's request is the first crack in his defiance: he asks Moses to 'plead with the LORD' (ha'tiru el-YHWH). The king who asked 'Who is the LORD?' (5:2) now acknowledges that YHWH has power he cannot match. But the concession is temporary and strategic.
5. Moses offers Pharaoh the dignity of naming the time — a gesture that simultaneously demonstrates God's power: the plague can be lifted on any schedule, proving its divine rather than natural origin.
6. 'So that you may know that there is no one like the LORD our God' (lema'an teda ki-ein kaYHWH Eloheinu) — the knowledge formula again. Each sign teaches the same lesson from a different angle: YHWH is incomparable.
7. The specificity of the removal — frogs departing from all locations except the Nile — shows that divine power is precise, not merely overwhelming. God controls the scope of both judgment and relief.
8. Moses 'cried out' (vayyits'aq) to the LORD — the same verb used for Israel's cry under slavery (2:23). The prophet who carries Israel's case to Pharaoh also carries Pharaoh's case to God. Intercession flows in both directions.
9. God fulfills Moses's prayer exactly, demonstrating that prophetic intercession is effective — but the response depends on God's faithfulness, not human technique.
10. The heaped dead frogs and the stinking land create a vivid image of judgment's aftermath. Relief from the plague produces its own unpleasantness — a reminder that the damage of rebellion is not instantly undone.
11. 'When Pharaoh saw relief, he hardened his heart' (vayyar Par'oh ki hayetah harevachah vehakhbed et-libbo) — the pattern is clinically precise. The moment pressure lifts, Pharaoh reneges. Crisis produces concessions; relief produces regression. The verb hakhbed ('made heavy') is the same root as Moses's 'heavy mouth.'
12. The third plague — gnats (kinnim) — comes without warning. No demand is issued to Pharaoh; no opportunity for compliance is given. The escalation introduces unannounced judgment.
13. 'All the dust of the ground became gnats' — the plague targets the very soil of Egypt. The adamah ('ground') that was the basis of Egypt's agricultural wealth is transformed into an agent of torment. Creation itself turns against the oppressor.
14. For the first time, the magicians fail. They 'could not' (lo yakhlu) replicate the sign. Their power has reached its limit — the contest is over. Egyptian magic cannot match divine authority beyond a certain threshold.
15. 'The finger of God' (etsba Elohim) — the magicians themselves recognize divine power. Their confession should persuade Pharaoh, but it does not. When even the court's own experts declare God's presence, Pharaoh's stubbornness becomes willful blindness.
16. The fourth plague introduces a new element: divine distinction between Egypt and Israel. God's judgments are now discriminating — covenant people are protected while the surrounding population bears the consequences.
17. Swarms (arov) — the exact species is debated (flies, beetles, mixed swarms), but the effect is devastating. The infestation enters houses and covers the ground, making daily life impossible.
18. 'I will set apart the land of Goshen' (vehifleti... et-erets Goshen) — the verb palah ('distinguish, set apart') is the theological key. God's judgment is not indiscriminate; it recognizes covenant relationship. 'That you may know that I, the LORD, am in the midst of the land' — God's presence among His people creates a zone of protection within the geography of judgment.
19. 'I will put a distinction between My people and your people' (vesanti pedut bein ammi uvein ammekha) — the word pedut ('redemption, ransom, distinction') suggests that covenant belonging is itself a form of redemption. Belonging to God is what distinguishes and protects.
20. The swarm comes exactly as announced — grievous and comprehensive. The ground itself is 'ruined' (tishshachet, from shachat, 'to corrupt/destroy'), using the same verb as the pre-flood corruption (Genesis 6:11-12).
21. Pharaoh's first compromise: 'sacrifice within the land.' He concedes worship but restricts location, trying to maintain control over what he cannot prevent. Each negotiation reveals the limits of his willingness.
22. Moses's refusal is practical and theological: Egyptian taboos would provoke violence if Israel sacrificed animals sacred to Egypt. The worship of YHWH cannot be conducted on Pharaoh's terms.
23. 'As He commands us' — the final authority on worship belongs to God, not to Pharaoh. Moses refuses to let the oppressor define the conditions of covenant obedience.
24. Pharaoh makes a second compromise: go, but not far. He adds 'pray for me' (ha'tiru ba'adi) — simultaneously yielding and grasping, admitting God's power while trying to limit its implications.
25. Moses warns against deceit (lo yosef Par'oh hatel) — he has already experienced Pharaoh's pattern of crisis-concession followed by relief-regression. The warning is based on experience, not suspicion.
26. Moses prays — the act of intercession is reported simply, without dramatic detail. Effective prayer does not require performance, only faithfulness.
27. God removes the swarms completely: 'not one remained.' Divine relief is as thorough as divine judgment.

28. The pattern completes itself: Pharaoh hardens his heart 'this time also' (gam bappa'am hazzot). The phrase tracks the accumulation of refusals — each one making the next more predictable and more culpable.

Summary: Three more plagues strike Egypt — livestock pestilence, boils, and devastating hail. The distinction between Israel and Egypt intensifies. Pharaoh confesses 'The LORD is in the right' but hardens again once the hail stops.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb chazaq ('hold fast') in v2 describes Pharaoh's grip on Israel using the same root as the hardening of his heart — he grips the people the way his heart grips its stubbornness. Pharaoh's confession in v27 ('The LORD is righteous, and I and my people are wicked') is the most theologically accurate statement any antagonist makes in the entire plague narrative, yet it produces no lasting change. The hail plague introduces a new element: Egyptians who 'feared the word of the LORD' (v20) could save their servants and livestock — individual Egyptians begin responding to what Pharaoh refuses.

Translation Friction: The word dever ('pestilence,' v3) targeting livestock posed the question of scope — 'all the livestock of Egypt died' (v6) yet later plagues still affect Egyptian animals. We retained 'all' as the Hebrew has kol, noting in our translator notes that the severity is the point, with kol likely indicating totality within the category of livestock left in the field. The phrase kaved lev Par'oh ('Pharaoh's heart was heavy,' v7) we rendered with 'heavy' to track the kaved root consistently.

Connections: The pestilence on livestock targets animals associated with Egyptian deities (Hathor, Apis). Pharaoh's confession in v27 echoes the language of Deuteronomy 32:4. The hail as 'fire flashing' (v24) anticipates the theophany imagery at Sinai (19:16-18). God's purpose statement in v16 ('to show you My power') is cited by Paul in Romans 9:17.

1Then the LORD said to Moses, "Go in to Pharaoh and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews: Let My people go, so that they may serve Me. 2For if you refuse to let them go and still hold them, 3the hand of the LORD will fall on your livestock in the field — on the horses, the donkeys, the camels, the herds, and the flocks — with a very severe pestilence. 4But the LORD will make a distinction between the livestock of Israel and the livestock of Egypt, and nothing that belongs to the sons of Israel shall die.'" 5The LORD set an appointed time, saying, "Tomorrow the LORD will do this thing in the land." 6The LORD did this the next day, and all the livestock of Egypt died. But not one of the livestock of the sons of Israel died. 7Pharaoh sent and inquired, and not even one of the livestock of Israel had died. But Pharaoh's heart was heavy, and he did not let the people go. 8Then the LORD said to Moses and Aaron, "Take handfuls of soot from a kiln, and let Moses throw it toward the sky in Pharaoh's sight. 9It will become fine dust over all the land of Egypt, and it will produce boils breaking out in sores on man and beast throughout the land of Egypt." 10So they took soot from a kiln and stood before Pharaoh. Moses threw it toward the sky, and it produced boils breaking out in sores on man and beast. 11The magicians were unable to appear before Moses on account of the boils, because the boils had broken out on the magicians just as on all the Egyptians. 12But the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he did not listen to them, just as the LORD had spoken to Moses. 13Then the LORD said to Moses, "Rise early in the morning and stand before Pharaoh and say to him, 'Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews: Let My people go, so that they may serve Me. 14For this time I will send all My plagues on your heart and on your servants and on your people, so that you may know that there is no one like Me in all the earth. 15For by now I could have stretched out My hand and struck you and your people with pestilence, and you would have been wiped from the earth. 16But for this very reason I have raised you up: to show you My power, so that My name may be proclaimed in all the earth. 17You are still exalting yourself against My people and will not let them go. 18Tomorrow at this time I will rain down the heaviest hail that has ever fallen on Egypt from the day it was founded until now. 19Now send and bring your livestock and everything you have in the field to safety. Every man and beast that is found in the field and is not brought inside will die when the hail falls on them.'" 20Those among Pharaoh's servants who feared the word of the LORD hurried to bring their servants and their livestock inside. 21But those who did not take the word of the LORD to heart left their servants and their livestock in the field. ²²Then the LORD said to Moses, "Stretch out your hand toward the sky, so that hail may fall on all the land of Egypt — on man and beast and every plant of the field in the land of Egypt." ²³Moses stretched out his staff toward the sky, and the LORD sent thunder and hail, and fire ran along the ground. The LORD rained hail on the land of Egypt. ²⁴There was hail, and fire flashing continually in the midst of the hail — very severe, such as had never been in all the land of Egypt since it became a nation. ²⁵The hail struck down everything in the field throughout the land of Egypt, both man and beast. The hail struck every plant of the field and shattered every tree of the field. ²⁶Only in the land of Goshen, where the sons of Israel lived, was there no hail. ²⁷Then Pharaoh sent and called Moses and Aaron and said to them, "This time I have sinned. The LORD is in the right, and I and my people are in the wrong. ²⁸Plead with the LORD, for there has been enough of God's thunder and hail. I will let you go, and you shall stay no longer." ²⁹Moses said to him, "As soon as I leave the city, I will spread out my hands to the LORD. The thunder will cease, and there will be no more hail, so that you may know that the earth belongs to the LORD. ³⁰But as for you and your servants, I know that you do not yet fear the LORD God." ³¹The flax and the barley were struck down, for the barley was in the ear and the flax was in bud. ³²But the wheat and the emmer were not struck down, for they ripen later. ³³Moses left Pharaoh and went out of the city and spread out his hands to the LORD. The thunder and the hail ceased, and rain no longer poured on the earth. ³⁴When Pharaoh saw that the rain and the hail and the thunder had ceased, he sinned again and hardened his heart — he and his servants. ³⁵Pharaoh's heart was hard, and he did not let the sons of Israel go, just as the LORD had spoken through Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The fifth plague opens with the established formula, reinforcing the cumulative weight of repeated demand and refusal.
2. 'Still hold them' (od machaziq bahem) — the verb chazaq ('hold fast, grip') is from the same root as the hardening of Pharaoh's heart. He grips Israel the way his heart grips its stubbornness.
3. The pestilence (dever) strikes livestock — Egypt's economic foundation and the animals associated with multiple Egyptian deities (Hathor the cow goddess, Apis the bull god). The plague targets both wealth and worship.
4. Again God makes a 'distinction' (hiflah) between Israel and Egypt. The covenant principle from 8:18 is reinforced: belonging to God creates a different experiential reality.
5. The 'appointed time' (mo'ed) echoes the language of covenant meetings and festivals. God sets the schedule; Pharaoh merely watches it arrive.
6. 'All the livestock of Egypt died' — the word kol ('all') may indicate totality within the category of livestock left in the field, since later plagues still affect Egyptian animals (9:19-21). The severity is the point, not necessarily absolute elimination.
7. Pharaoh investigates and confirms the distinction — Israel's livestock survived. Even empirical evidence does not penetrate his hardened heart. The verb kaved ('was heavy') tracks the progressive weight of his resistance.
8. Kiln soot (piach kivsham) — the soot comes from the very kilns where enslaved Israelites made bricks. The instrument of oppression becomes the instrument of judgment. What Pharaoh forced Israel to produce now falls on Egypt as plague.
9. Boils (shechin) attack the body itself. The plagues have moved from the natural environment (water, frogs, gnats, flies, livestock) to the human body. Each stage brings judgment closer to Pharaoh's person.
10. The sign is performed in Pharaoh's presence — publicly, undeniably.
11. The magicians who tried to replicate earlier signs now cannot even stand upright. Their professional incompetence is made personal: the boils are on their own bodies. Egypt's religious specialists are disabled by the God they failed to match.
12. For the first time the narrator says 'the LORD hardened' (vaychazzeq YHWH) rather than 'Pharaoh's heart was hard.' The agency shifts explicitly to God — judicial hardening has now overtaken Pharaoh's self-hardening. The distinction between Pharaoh choosing stubbornness and God confirming it narrows.
13. The seventh plague sequence opens with the same formula but adds unprecedented theological commentary (vv.14-16). This is the most theologically explicit pre-plague speech in Exodus.
14. 'All My plagues on your heart' (kol-maggefotai el-libbeka) — the plagues are now directed at Pharaoh's heart, the organ of resistance. The external judgments aim at internal transformation — or, failing that, at public demonstration.
15. God reveals restraint: He could have destroyed Egypt already. The continued existence of Pharaoh and his people is an act of divine patience with a purpose.

16. 'For this very reason I have raised you up' (ki ba'avur zot he'emadtikha) — one of the most theologically significant statements in the entire Pentateuch. God has positioned Pharaoh on the stage of history to display divine power and proclaim the divine name to all the earth. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 9:17 as evidence of God's sovereign purpose in history.
17. 'Exalting yourself against My people' (mistolel be'ammi) — the verb solal means 'to raise up, to lift high.' Pharaoh has elevated himself into the place that belongs to God. The plagues systematically dismantle that false elevation.
18. The hail is historically superlative — the worst ever in Egypt's history. The specificity ('from the day it was founded until now') anchors the plague in Egyptian time-consciousness.
19. For the first time, God offers a warning with an escape clause: bring your livestock inside and you will survive. This is mercy within judgment — God gives the opportunity to respond to His word even to the oppressor's people.
20. 'Those among Pharaoh's servants who feared the word of the LORD' — a remarkable detail. Even within the Egyptian court, some have begun to take YHWH seriously. The plagues are producing their intended effect: knowledge of the LORD, even among enemies.
21. Those who ignore the warning suffer the consequences. The choice is presented starkly: heed God's word and live, or disregard it and die. This binary will recur at Passover.
22. Moses stretches out his hand — the human agent acts at God's command, and nature obeys.
23. Thunder (qolot, literally 'voices'), hail, and fire together — a combination that previews the Sinai theophany (19:16). The storm that judges Egypt foreshadows the storm that will give the Torah.
24. 'Fire flashing in the midst of the hail' — a meteorological impossibility under normal conditions (fire and ice together), signaling supernatural origin. The narrator notes that nothing like this had occurred since Egypt's founding.
25. The hail is agricultural devastation — plants and trees destroyed. Egypt's food supply is attacked alongside its population and livestock.
26. Goshen is again exempt. The distinction (hiflah) between covenant people and Egypt is maintained through every plague.
27. Pharaoh's confession — 'I have sinned... the LORD is righteous (tsaddiq)... I and my people are the wicked ones (reshaim)' — is the most theologically accurate statement any character has made about the plague narrative. It is also the most temporary.
28. 'Enough of God's thunder' — Pharaoh wants relief from symptoms without addressing the cause. His concession targets the immediate threat, not the underlying injustice.
29. Moses offers a test: when the storm ceases, will Pharaoh keep his word? The cessation itself will prove 'that the earth belongs to the LORD' (ki laYHWH ha'arets) — a claim of universal sovereignty, not merely local power.
30. 'You do not yet fear the LORD God' — Moses identifies Pharaoh's core failure. Despite accurate confession (v27), there is no genuine yir'at YHWH ('fear of the LORD'). Words without inner transformation produce temporary concessions, not lasting change.
31. The agricultural detail — barley and flax destroyed, wheat and emmer spared because they ripen later — is precise and accurate. It both grounds the narrative in real agriculture and sets the stage for the locust plague, which will consume the late-ripening crops.
32. The surviving crops become targets for the next plague. Each judgment leaves just enough for the next one to destroy. The progression is inexorable.
33. Moses intercedes, and God responds — the prophetic cycle of plague, negotiation, intercession, and relief continues.
34. 'He sinned again and hardened his heart' (vayyosef lachato vayyakhbed et-libbo) — the verb yasaf ('add, do again') counts the accumulation of guilt. Each regression is an additional sin, not merely a repetition.
35. The chapter closes with the fulfillment formula: everything happens 'just as the LORD had spoken through Moses.' God's word controls the narrative; Pharaoh's resistance cannot alter the outcome.

Summary: Locusts devour everything the hail spared, then a darkness so thick it can be felt covers Egypt for three days while Israel has light. Pharaoh's own servants urge him to relent. After the darkness, Pharaoh threatens Moses with death if he returns.

What Makes This Remarkable: The exodus is explicitly designed for intergenerational testimony: 'that you may recount in the hearing of your son and grandson' (v2). The verb sappir is the origin of the Passover Haggadah — the story is not merely record but ongoing encounter. The darkness plague (choshekh, v21) inverts creation itself: Genesis 1:3-4 separated light from darkness, but now darkness returns as judgment. Pharaoh's servants break ranks before he does (v7), exposing the isolation of tyranny.

Translation Friction: The phrase choshekh afeilah ('thick darkness,' v22) we rendered as 'darkness that could be felt,' preserving the tactile quality the Hebrew seems to intend. The root anah in le'anot mipanai ('to humble yourself before Me,' v3) is the same root that describes Israel's affliction under Egypt — we noted this bitter wordplay in our translator notes. The phrase 'How long will you refuse to humble yourself?' names Pharaoh's core sin: the oppressor who humiliated a nation will not humble himself before God.

Connections: The darkness reverses Genesis 1:3-4. The intergenerational telling (v2) grounds the Passover Haggadah tradition. Pharaoh's advisors breaking ranks (v7) parallels Nebuchadnezzar's advisors in Daniel 2:2-12. The three days of darkness anticipate the three days of preparation at Sinai (19:11).

1Then the LORD said to Moses, "Go in to Pharaoh, for I have hardened his heart and the heart of his servants, so that I may place these signs of Mine among them, 2and so that you may recount in the hearing of your son and grandson how I dealt severely with Egypt and what signs I placed among them — that you may know that I am the LORD." 3So Moses and Aaron went in to Pharaoh and said to him, "Thus says the LORD, the God of the Hebrews: How long will you refuse to humble yourself before Me? Let My people go, so that they may serve Me. 4For if you refuse to let My people go, tomorrow I will bring locusts into your territory. 5They shall cover the surface of the ground so that no one will be able to see the ground. They shall eat what remains to you after the hail, and they shall eat every tree of yours that grows in the field. 6They shall fill your houses and the houses of all your servants and the houses of all the Egyptians — something that neither your fathers nor your grandfathers have seen, from the day they came to be on the earth until this day." Then Moses turned and went out from Pharaoh. 7Pharaoh's servants said to him, "How long will this man be a snare to us? Let the men go so that they may serve the LORD their God. Do you not yet realize that Egypt is ruined?" 8So Moses and Aaron were brought back to Pharaoh, and he said to them, "Go, serve the LORD your God. But exactly who will be going?" 9Moses said, "We will go with our young and our old, with our sons and our daughters, with our flocks and our herds, for we must hold a feast to the LORD." 10Pharaoh said to them, "The LORD had better be with you if I ever let you and your little ones go! Clearly, you have evil in mind. 11No! Go now, you men, and serve the LORD, for that is what you are asking." And they were driven out from Pharaoh's presence. 12Then the LORD said to Moses, "Stretch out your hand over the land of Egypt for the locusts, so that they may come upon the land of Egypt and eat every plant in the land — all that the hail has left." 13So Moses stretched out his staff over the land of Egypt, and the LORD brought an east wind over the land all that day and all that night. When morning came, the east wind had brought the locusts. 14The locusts came up over all the land of Egypt and settled on the entire territory of Egypt — a very dense swarm. Never before had there been so many locusts, and never again would there be. 15They covered the surface of the whole land so that the land was darkened. They ate every plant in the land and every fruit of the trees that the hail had left. Not a green thing remained, neither tree nor plant of the field, throughout all the land of Egypt. 16Then Pharaoh hastily called Moses and Aaron and said, "I have sinned against the LORD your God and against you. 17Now please forgive my sin just this once, and plead with the LORD your God to remove this death from me." 18Moses went out from Pharaoh and pleaded with the LORD. 19The LORD turned a very strong west wind that picked up the locusts and drove them into the Sea of Reeds. Not a single locust remained in all the territory of Egypt. 20But the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he did not let the sons of Israel go. 21Then the LORD said to Moses, "Stretch out your hand toward the sky so that there may be darkness over the land of Egypt — a darkness that can be felt." 22So Moses stretched out his hand toward the sky, and there was thick darkness throughout all the land of Egypt for three days. 23They could not see one another, and no one rose from his place for three days. But all the sons of Israel had light in their dwellings. 24Then Pharaoh called Moses and said, "Go, serve the LORD. Only your flocks and your herds shall remain behind. Even your little ones may go with you." 25But Moses said, "You yourself must give us sacrifices and burnt offerings so that we may sacrifice to the LORD our God. 26Our livestock also must go with us — not a hoof shall be left behind. For we must take from them to serve the LORD our God, and we ourselves do not know with what we must serve the LORD until we arrive there." 27But the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he was not willing to let them go. 28Pharaoh said to him, "Get away from me! Be careful never to see my face again, for on the day you see my face you shall die." 29Moses said, "You have spoken rightly. I will not see your face again."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God explicitly claims the hardening as His own action: 'I have hardened' (ani hikhbadti). The purpose is stated: 'so that I may place these signs.' The plagues are divine pedagogy — each one a lesson placed (shiti, 'set, placed') before Pharaoh and Israel alike.
2. The exodus is designed for intergenerational testimony: 'that you may recount in the hearing of your son and grandson.' The story is not merely historical record but ongoing pedagogical event. Each generation is expected to retell what God did — and through telling, to encounter the God who acts.
3. 'How long will you refuse to humble yourself before Me?' (ad-matai me'anta le'anot mipanai) — God names Pharaoh's core sin: refusal to humble himself (le'anot, from anah). The same root describes Israel's affliction (inui) under Egyptian oppression. The oppressor who refuses to humble himself has humiliated an entire nation.
4. Locusts (arbeh) represent agricultural apocalypse — a plague that consumes what the hail spared. The progression is strategic: each plague targets what survived the previous one.
5. 'Cover the surface of the ground so that no one can see the ground' — the locusts create a living carpet. The verb kasah ('cover') will be used of the sea covering the Egyptian army (14:28). What covers the land now previews what will cover the oppressor later.
6. The plague exceeds ancestral memory: 'neither your fathers nor your grandfathers have seen.' The historical superlative underscores uniqueness — this is not a natural cycle but a divine act without precedent.
7. Pharaoh's own servants now advocate release — 'Do you not yet realize that Egypt is ruined?' (haterem teda ki avdah Mitsrayim). The verb yada ('know/realize') echoes the knowledge theme throughout: Egypt is being forced to 'know' the LORD, and even the court recognizes the catastrophe before the king does.
8. Pharaoh negotiates: 'Exactly who will be going?' (mi vami haholkhim). He attempts to limit the departure to adult males, retaining women, children, and livestock as hostages ensuring return.
9. Moses insists on totality: 'young and old, sons and daughters, flocks and herds.' Covenant worship involves the whole community — no one and nothing is left behind. The word chag ('feast') requires communal, comprehensive participation.
10. Pharaoh's response is sarcastic and threatening: 'The LORD had better be with you if I ever let your little ones go!' He reads the request as a cover for flight and accuses Moses of evil intent (ra'ah). Pharaoh attributes to Israel the very malice he himself practices.
11. 'Go now, you men' (lekhu-na haggevarim) — Pharaoh's counter-offer restricts worship to adult males, stripping it of familial and communal dimensions. This is worship on Pharaoh's terms, which is not worship at all. Moses and Aaron are 'driven out' (vayegaresh) — the verb used for expulsion, not departure.
12. God commands the eighth plague. The locusts will eat 'all that the hail has left' — the judgment is cumulative. Each plague builds on the destruction of the last.
13. The east wind (ruach qadim) carries the locusts — natural meteorology serves divine purpose. The same ruach ('wind/spirit') that hovered over creation waters (Genesis 1:2) now drives judgment across Egypt. An east wind will later part the sea (14:21).
14. 'Never before and never again' — the double superlative marks this as an unrepeatable event, a unique divine act within history.
15. Total coverage, total darkness of the land, total consumption of vegetation. The threefold totality mirrors the three-day darkness that follows. Egypt's agricultural wealth, already battered by hail, is now entirely consumed.
16. Pharaoh's second confession of sin (cf. 9:27): 'I have sinned against the LORD your God and against you.' The confession acknowledges both divine and human dimensions of his offense. But as before, the words are crisis-driven.
17. 'Remove this death from me' (veyaser me'alai raq et-hammavet hazzeh) — Pharaoh calls the locusts 'this death.' The economic destruction is existential; without crops, Egypt faces famine. His request uses the word raq ('only, just'), minimizing his plea to immediate relief rather than genuine repentance.
18. Moses intercedes without conditions or commentary. The prophet prays; God acts.
19. The LORD sends a west wind (ruach-yam, literally 'sea wind') that sweeps every locust into the Sea of Reeds (yam-suf). The Sea of Reeds receives the locusts here; it will receive the Egyptian army later. The geographic detail foreshadows the climax of the exodus.
20. 'The LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart' — by this point the hardening formula has become a refrain. The pattern is fixed: plague, confession, relief, re-hardening.
21. 'A darkness that can be felt' (choshekh va'yamesh choshekh) — the darkness is tangible, palpable. This is not merely the absence of light but a presence in itself. The language echoes the primordial darkness of Genesis 1:2 — Egypt is being un-created, returned to the formless void that preceded God's ordering work.
22. Three days of impenetrable darkness — Egypt's supreme deity, Ra the sun god, is rendered powerless. The plague directly confronts Egypt's highest theological claim: the sun god is sovereign. For three days, Ra does not rise. YHWH has eclipsed Egypt's god.

23. 'All the sons of Israel had light in their dwellings' — the Goshen distinction reaches its most vivid expression. Light and darkness coexist in the same land, divided by covenant. Israel's light is not natural but providential.
24. Pharaoh's final compromise: go and worship, leave your livestock. Each negotiation has conceded more: first location (8:21), then distance (8:24), then participants (10:11), now livestock. But each concession still falls short of total release.
25. Moses refuses any compromise: 'You yourself must give us sacrifices.' The demand escalates — not only will Israel take its own animals, but Pharaoh must contribute to the worship of YHWH. The oppressor will fund the worship of the God who judges him.
26. 'Not a hoof shall be left behind' (parsah lo tishsha'er) — absolute language that refuses every form of partial compliance. Moses's certainty about the non-negotiable nature of total departure contrasts with his confession of uncertainty about details: 'we do not know with what we must serve the LORD until we arrive there.'
27. The hardening formula recurs. God's judicial confirmation of Pharaoh's resistance continues to its conclusion.
28. 'On the day you see my face you shall die' — Pharaoh issues a death threat. The face-to-face confrontation has reached its limit. Pharaoh banishes Moses permanently from his presence.
29. 'You have spoken rightly' (ken dibbarta) — Moses accepts the finality without protest. He will not see Pharaoh's face again — but Pharaoh will see God's hand one more time, in the death of the firstborn.

Summary: God announces the final plague: at midnight He will go through Egypt, and every firstborn will die, from Pharaoh's heir to the slave woman's child. A great cry will rise from Egypt, but Israel will be untouched. Moses departs from Pharaoh in fierce anger.

What Makes This Remarkable: The measure-for-measure theology reaches its climax: the cry (tse'aqah gedolah) that will rise from Egypt uses the same word for Israel's cry under slavery (3:7, 9). The oppressor's grief mirrors the grief they inflicted. God Himself walks through Egypt at midnight ('I will go out,' ani yotse, v4) — this is direct divine action at the most liminal hour, not delegated judgment. The chapter also reveals that Moses had become 'very great' (gadol me'od) in Egypt, an ironic reversal of Pharaoh's attempt to crush Israel's leaders.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew bechor ('firstborn') carries weight that no single English word captures — it denotes inheritance rights, succession, family identity, and the father's primary claim. We retained 'firstborn' but relied on the translator notes to unpack the theological freight, especially the connection to God's declaration in 4:22 ('Israel is My firstborn'). The verb garesh yegaresh ('he will surely drive you out,' v1) uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis; we rendered this as 'drive you out completely.'

Connections: The firstborn-for-firstborn logic fulfills the warning of 4:22-23. The great cry echoes 3:7 and 9. The plundering of Egyptian gold and silver (v2) was promised in 3:21-22 and will supply the tabernacle in chapters 25-31. The phrase 'not a dog shall growl' (v7) expresses the totality of God's protective distinction.

1The LORD said to Moses, "One more plague I will bring upon Pharaoh and upon Egypt. After that he will let you go from here. When he lets you go, he will drive you out completely. 2Speak now in the hearing of the people, and let each man ask of his neighbor and each woman of her neighbor for articles of silver and articles of gold." 3The LORD caused the Egyptians to regard the people favorably. Moses himself had become a figure of great prominence throughout Egypt, respected by Pharaoh's officials and by the common people alike. 4Moses said, "Thus says the LORD: About midnight I will go out through the midst of Egypt, 5and every firstborn in the land of Egypt shall die, from the firstborn of Pharaoh who sits on his throne to the firstborn of the slave woman who is behind the handmill, and all the firstborn of the livestock. 6There shall be a great cry throughout all the land of Egypt, such as there has never been and such as there shall never be again. 7But against any of the sons of Israel not even a dog shall growl, against neither man nor beast, so that you may know that the LORD makes a distinction between Egypt and Israel. 8All these servants of yours shall come down to me and bow down to me, saying, 'Go out, you and all the people who follow you.' After that I will go out." And he went out from Pharaoh in fierce anger. 9The LORD said to Moses, "Pharaoh will not listen to you, so that My wonders may be multiplied in the land of Egypt." 10Moses and Aaron performed all these wonders before Pharaoh, and the LORD hardened Pharaoh's heart, and he did not let the sons of Israel go out of his land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'One more plague' (nega echad od) — God numbers the remaining judgment: exactly one. The finality is deliberate. After this, Pharaoh will not merely release Israel; he will 'drive them out completely' (garesh yegaresh, infinitive absolute for emphasis). The oppressor will become the expeller.
2. The instruction to 'ask' (sha'al) of Egyptian neighbors for silver and gold is the same verb used when Israel 'asked' Pharaoh for permission to worship. What Pharaoh refused, the Egyptians will grant. The slave-wages of centuries will be collected in a single night.
3. 'The LORD gave the people favor' (vayyitten YHWH et-chen ha'am) — chen ('favor, grace') is divinely granted, not humanly earned. Even Moses's reputation is noted: 'very great' (gadol me'od) in Egypt's eyes. The deliverer whom Pharaoh dismissed has become the most significant figure in the land.
4. 'About midnight I will go out through the midst of Egypt' (kachatsi hallailah ani yotse betokh Mitsrayim) — God Himself walks through Egypt. The verb yotse ('go out') is first person: I will go out. This is not delegated to an angel or a plague mechanism; it is direct divine action at the most liminal hour.
5. The scope of the tenth plague is comprehensive: from the throne to the slave quarters, from royal heir to the captive's child. The firstborn represents the future of every household — and every future in Egypt is forfeit. The livestock firstborn are included, extending judgment to Egypt's economic and religious symbols.
6. 'A great cry' (tse'aqah gedolah) — the same word used for Israel's cry under slavery (3:7, 9). The oppressor will now cry with the same anguish they inflicted. The echo is measure-for-measure: the cry of the enslaved becomes the cry of the bereaved.
7. 'Not even a dog shall growl' (lo yecherats kelev leshono) — an idiom for absolute peace and safety. While Egypt screams in grief, Israel will experience undisturbed quiet. The contrast could not be sharper. The verb palah ('make a distinction') returns from 8:18 and 9:4 — God's judgments are discriminating, not indiscriminate.
8. Moses predicts that Pharaoh's own servants will come bowing to him, begging Israel to leave. The power dynamic that opened Exodus (Israel bowing to Pharaoh) will be completely reversed. Moses leaves 'in fierce anger' (bachari-af) — the only time Moses's personal anger at Pharaoh is recorded.
9. God reframes Pharaoh's stubbornness as serving divine purpose: 'so that My wonders may be multiplied.' Every refusal has extended the revelation. The plagues are not merely punitive but pedagogical — each one teaches Egypt and Israel who YHWH is.
10. The summary verse closes the plague cycle with the fulfillment formula. Moses and Aaron obeyed; God hardened; Pharaoh refused. The three actors have played their appointed roles. The stage is now set for the Passover.

Summary: God institutes the Passover: each household slaughters a lamb at twilight, applies blood to the doorposts, and eats in haste with sandals on. At midnight the LORD strikes every Egyptian firstborn. Pharaoh finally drives Israel out, and they leave after 430 years, plundering Egypt.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Passover resets Israel's calendar — 'this month shall be the beginning of months for you' (v2). Liberation redefines time itself. The word tamim ('without blemish,' v5) describing the lamb is the same word used for Noah's character (Genesis 6:9) and Abraham's covenant walk (Genesis 17:1) — physical wholeness in the offering symbolizes moral wholeness. The communal timing (bein ha'arbayim, 'between the evenings') means every household acts simultaneously; the Passover is a national act, not a private one.

Translation Friction: The phrase bein ha'arbayim ('at twilight,' v6) — literally 'between the evenings' — has been debated in Jewish tradition for centuries. We rendered it 'at twilight' as the most accessible reading. The word edah ('congregation,' v3) appears for the first time in Exodus, and we retained 'congregation' to mark the shift from family units to a constituted community. The blood on the doorposts functions as a sign (ot) for the LORD, not as a magical ward — our rendering preserves this theological distinction.

Connections: The Passover lamb anticipates Isaiah 53:7 and John 1:29. The blood on the doorposts connects to the covenant blood of 24:8. The 430 years fulfill Genesis 15:13-16. The command to retell the story (v26-27) grounds the Passover Haggadah tradition. Paul identifies Christ as 'our Passover lamb' in 1 Corinthians 5:7.

¹The LORD said to Moses and Aaron in the land of Egypt, ²"This month will mark the beginning of months for you. It will be the first month of your year. ³Speak to the whole congregation of Israel, saying: On the tenth day of this month, each man shall take a lamb for his father's household — a lamb for each household. ⁴If the household is too small for a lamb, he and his nearest neighbor shall take one according to the number of persons. According to what each can eat, you shall apportion the lamb. ⁵Your lamb shall be without blemish, a year-old male. You may take it from the sheep or from the goats. ⁶You shall keep it until the fourteenth day of this month, and the whole assembled congregation of Israel shall slaughter it at twilight. ⁷They shall take some of the blood and put it on the two doorposts and on the lintel of the houses in which they eat it. ⁸They shall eat the flesh that night, roasted over fire, with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. ⁹Do not eat any of it raw or boiled in water, but roasted over fire — its head with its legs and its inner parts. ¹⁰You shall not leave any of it until morning. Whatever remains until morning you shall burn with fire. ¹¹This is how you shall eat it: with your belt fastened, your sandals on your feet, and your staff in your hand. You shall eat it in haste. It is the LORD's Passover. ¹²I will pass through the land of Egypt that night, and I will strike down every firstborn in the land of Egypt, both man and beast. Against all the gods of Egypt I will execute judgments. I am the LORD. ¹³The blood shall be a sign for you on the houses where you live. When I see the blood, I will pass over you, and no plague shall fall upon you to destroy you when I strike the land of Egypt. ¹⁴This day shall be a memorial for you, and you shall celebrate it as a feast to the LORD. Throughout your generations you shall celebrate it as an eternal ordinance. ¹⁵Seven days you shall eat unleavened bread. On the first day you shall remove leaven from your houses. Whoever eats anything leavened from the first day to the seventh day — that person shall be cut off from Israel. ¹⁶On the first day there shall be a holy assembly, and on the seventh day a holy assembly. No work shall be done on those days, except what is needed for each person to eat — that alone may be prepared by you. ¹⁷You shall observe the Feast of Unleavened Bread, for on this very day I brought your hosts out of the land of Egypt. You shall observe this day throughout your generations as an eternal ordinance. ¹⁸In the first month, from the evening of the fourteenth day until the evening of the twenty-first day, you shall eat unleavened bread. ¹⁹For seven days no leaven shall be found in your houses. Whoever eats what is leavened — that person shall be cut off from the congregation of Israel, whether sojourner or native of the land. ²⁰You shall eat nothing leavened. In all your dwellings you shall eat unleavened bread." ²¹Then Moses called all the elders of Israel and said to them, "Go and select lambs for your families, and slaughter the Passover lamb. ²²Take a bunch of hyssop and dip it in the blood that is in the basin, and touch the lintel and the two doorposts with the blood in the basin. None of you shall go out of the door of his house until morning. ²³For the LORD will pass through to strike the Egyptians, and when He sees the blood on the lintel and on the two doorposts, the LORD will pass over the door and will not allow the destroyer to enter your houses to strike you. ²⁴You shall observe this as an ordinance for you and your sons forever. ²⁵When you come to the land that the LORD will give you, as He has promised, you shall keep this service. ²⁶When your children say to you, 'What does this service mean to you?' ²⁷you shall say, 'It is the sacrifice of the LORD's Passover, for He passed over the houses of the sons of Israel in Egypt when He struck the Egyptians but delivered our households.'" And the people bowed their heads and worshipped. ²⁸The sons of Israel went and did so. Just as the LORD had commanded Moses and Aaron, so they did. ²⁹At midnight the LORD struck down every firstborn in the land of Egypt, from the firstborn of Pharaoh who sat on his throne to the firstborn of the captive in the dungeon, and all the firstborn of the livestock. ³⁰Pharaoh rose in the night — he and all his servants and all the Egyptians — and there was a great cry in Egypt, for there was not a house where someone was not dead. ³¹He summoned Moses and Aaron by night and said, "Rise up, go out from among my people, both you and the sons of Israel! Go, serve the LORD, as you have said. ³²Take your flocks and your herds, as you have said, and go — and bless me also." ³³The Egyptians pressed the people hard, urging them to leave the land quickly, for they said, "We shall all be dead." ³⁴So the people took their dough before it was leavened, their kneading bowls wrapped in their cloaks on their shoulders. ³⁵The sons of Israel had done as Moses told them: they had asked the Egyptians for articles of silver and articles of gold and for clothing. ³⁶The LORD had given the people favor in the sight of the Egyptians, so that they let them have what they asked. Thus they plundered the Egyptians. ³⁷The sons of Israel journeyed from Rameses to Succoth, about six hundred thousand men on foot, besides women and children. ³⁸A mixed multitude also went up with them, along with very many flocks and herds of livestock. ³⁹They baked the dough that they had brought out of Egypt into unleavened cakes, for it was not leavened — because they were driven out of Egypt and could not wait, and they had not prepared any provisions for themselves. ⁴⁰The time that the sons of Israel lived in Egypt was 430 years. ⁴¹At the end of 430 years, on that very day, all the hosts of the LORD went out from the land of Egypt. ⁴²It was a night of watching by the LORD, to bring them out of the land of Egypt. This same night is a night of watching kept to the LORD by all the sons of Israel throughout their generations. ⁴³The LORD said to Moses and Aaron, "This is the statute of the Passover: no foreigner shall eat of it, ⁴⁴but every slave purchased with silver, after you have circumcised him, may eat of it. ⁴⁵A temporary resident and a hired worker shall not eat of it. ⁴⁶It shall be eaten in one house. You shall not take any of the flesh outside the house, and you shall not break any of its bones. ⁴⁷The whole congregation of Israel shall keep it. ⁴⁸If a sojourner lives with you and wants to keep the Passover to the LORD, let all his males be circumcised, and then he may come near and keep it. He shall be as a native of the land. But no uncircumcised person shall eat of it. ⁴⁹There shall be one law for the native and for the sojourner who lives among you." ⁵⁰All the sons of Israel did so. Just as the LORD had commanded Moses and Aaron, so they did. ⁵¹On that very day the LORD brought the sons of Israel out of the land of Egypt by their hosts.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Passover instructions begin with a joint address to Moses and Aaron — the prophetic and priestly partners together receive the foundational ritual of Israel's identity.
2. God resets Israel's calendar: this month (Nisan/Aviv) becomes 'the beginning of months.' The exodus does not merely change Israel's location; it redefines time itself. History begins again at liberation.
3. 'The whole congregation of Israel' (kol-adat Yisra'el) — the word edah ('congregation, assembly') appears here for the first time in Exodus. The Passover is communal from its origin: no individual observance, only household and congregational participation.
4. The provision for shared households ensures that no one is excluded by poverty or family size. The Passover lamb must be consumed entirely — waste is prohibited, and sufficiency is calculated per person (lefi okhlo, 'according to what each can eat').
5. 'Without blemish' (tamim) — the same word used for Noah's character (Genesis 6:9) and Abraham's walk before God (Genesis 17:1). The sacrificial animal must have the integrity that the covenant demands of persons. Physical wholeness in the offering symbolizes moral wholeness in the worshiper.
6. 'The whole assembled congregation shall slaughter it at twilight' (bein ha'arbayim) — literally 'between the evenings,' a phrase debated in Jewish tradition (either between noon and sunset, or between sunset and dark). The communal timing means every household in Israel acts simultaneously. The Passover is a national act, not a private one.
7. Blood on the doorposts and lintel marks the household as belonging to God. The blood is not hidden inside but displayed publicly — a visible covenant sign that declares allegiance and receives protection. The doorframe becomes the boundary between judgment and safety.
8. Three elements define the Passover meal: roasted lamb (the sacrifice), unleavened bread (matzot, the bread of haste), and bitter herbs (merorim, the taste of slavery). Each element carries embodied memory — the meal is not merely eaten but experienced as a re-entry into the exodus.
9. The prohibition against raw or boiled preparation insists on roasting over fire. Fire is the element of theophany (burning bush, pillar of fire, Sinai) and of sacrifice (olah). The lamb is prepared the way offerings are prepared — wholly given to fire.
10. Nothing may remain until morning — the sacrifice must be consumed completely or burned. Leftovers would become common food, losing their sacred status. The urgency of the meal reflects the urgency of the departure.
11. The posture of eating — belt fastened, sandals on, staff in hand — is the posture of departure. The meal is eaten standing and ready, not reclined in leisure. 'It is the LORD's Passover' (pesach hu laYHWH) — the name pesach is formally introduced here.
12. God Himself passes through Egypt: 'I will pass through... I will strike... I will execute judgments.' Three first-person declarations. The tenth plague is not delegated — it is direct divine action. 'Against all the gods of Egypt' (uvkhol-elohei Mitsrayim) reveals the theological dimension: the plagues are a systematic dismantling of Egypt's entire divine order.
13. 'When I see the blood, I will pass over you' (ura'ti et-haddam ufasachti aleikhem) — the verb pasach gives the festival its name. Its meaning is debated: 'pass over' (skip), 'protect' (hover over and shield), or 'have compassion.' All three meanings converge: God sees the blood, protects the household, and passes over in judgment. The blood does not inform God of who lives there — He already knows. It functions as a covenant sign, marking the household as His.
14. 'A memorial' (zikkaron) — the Passover is designed for remembrance across generations. The word zikkaron carries active force: not merely recalling the past but making it present. Each generation that observes the Passover enters the exodus anew.
15. Leaven (chamets) represents the old life — Egypt's bread, Egypt's culture, Egypt's slavery. Removing leaven from the house is a ritual enactment of leaving Egypt behind. The penalty for eating leavened bread during the festival is severe: 'cut off from Israel' (nikhretah), the most serious communal sanction.

16. 'Holy assembly' (miqra qodesh) — the word miqra means 'a calling, a convocation.' It is not merely an assembly but a summoned gathering — God calls His people together. The frame of the festival (first and seventh days) is sacred rest, mirroring the creation pattern of work and sabbath.
17. 'On this very day' (be'etsem hayyom hazzeh) — the same phrase used for Noah entering the ark (Genesis 7:13) and Abraham's circumcision (Genesis 17:23, 26). It marks events of absolute, calendared precision — this day, not approximately.
18. The dates are precise: evening of the fourteenth to evening of the twenty-first. Seven full days of unleavened bread. The precision reflects the conviction that sacred time is measured, not vague.
19. The prohibition extends to 'sojourner or native' — universally binding within the community. The word ger ('sojourner') includes non-Israelites who have joined the community. Covenant boundaries are permeable to those who enter, but the requirements are non-negotiable for all who belong.
20. The instruction closes with a restatement: eat nothing leavened, eat unleavened bread in all dwellings. The repetition is characteristic of legal instruction in the Torah — ensuring no ambiguity remains.
21. Moses transmits the divine instructions to the elders, using the practical verb mashakh ('draw out, select') for choosing the lambs. The transition from divine speech to human action begins here.
22. Hyssop (ezov) is a small plant used for sprinkling — humble vegetation applied to the loftiest purpose. It will reappear in Levitical purification rites (Leviticus 14:4, 6) and in David's prayer of repentance (Psalm 51:7). The blood applied by hyssop marks the threshold between death and life.
23. 'The LORD will pass over the door' (ufasach YHWH al-happetach) — the verb pasach is now applied to God's protective action at each doorway. 'The destroyer' (hammashchit) appears as a distinct agent of judgment — whether an angel or a personification of the plague force, the text distinguishes this figure from God Himself, who controls and limits the destruction.
24. 'Forever' (ad-olam) — the Passover is not a one-time emergency measure but a permanent institution. The word olam stretches the observance beyond any visible horizon. What began in a single night of terror becomes Israel's defining annual act.
25. The instructions anticipate settlement in the land — the Passover will be kept not only in Egypt's shadow but in the promised land itself. Covenant memory travels with the people into their future.
26. 'When your children say to you, What does this service mean?' — the liturgical question is built into the institution. The Passover is designed to provoke inquiry from the next generation. Every child who asks 'Why?' receives the exodus narrative as answer. This is theology transmitted through curiosity, not coercion.
27. The answer links three acts: sacrifice, passing over, and deliverance. The people respond with worship — 'bowed their heads and worshipped' (vayyiqqdu vayyishtachavu). Faith precedes the event: they worship before the firstborn die, before the blood is tested, before deliverance comes.
28. The obedience formula: 'just as the LORD had commanded... so they did.' Israel's first corporate act of covenant obedience since entering Egypt. After centuries of slavery, they act as a free people obeying their God.
29. 'At midnight' (bachatsi hallailah) — the hour God promised in 11:4. The blow falls with clockwork precision. From the throne to the dungeon, every household is struck. The comprehensiveness fulfills the announcement exactly.
30. 'There was not a house where someone was not dead' (ki-ein bayit asher ein-sham met) — the universality of the judgment is stated in the starkest possible terms. Pharaoh's house, the servant's house, the prisoner's house — all are bereaved. The 'great cry' (tse'aqah gedolah) echoes Israel's own cry under slavery (2:23; 3:7).
31. Pharaoh summons Moses and Aaron 'by night' (lailah) — the king who said 'I will not let Israel go' (5:2) and 'Get away from me' (10:28) now begs them to leave. Every condition he previously imposed is abandoned: go, serve, take everything.
32. 'Bless me also' (uverakhtem gam-oti) — Pharaoh, who asked 'Who is the LORD?' (5:2), now asks Moses for a blessing from that same LORD. The reversal is complete. The one who refused to acknowledge God now seeks God's favor through the very people he enslaved.
33. The Egyptians are desperate: 'We shall all be dead' (kullanu metim). The fear of total annihilation drives them to expel Israel urgently. What Pharaoh would not do willingly, the Egyptian people now do in terror.
34. Unleavened dough carried on shoulders — the bread that had no time to rise becomes the central symbol of the festival. Hasty departure is memorialized in the food itself. The people leave as they ate: in haste, carrying what they have, ready for the road.
35. The 'asking' (sha'al) from the Egyptians fulfills the promise of 3:21-22. Israel does not steal; they ask, and the Egyptians give willingly — driven by fear, but also by the divinely granted chen ('favor') mentioned in 11:3.
36. 'They plundered the Egyptians' (vayenatslu et-Mitsrayim) — the verb natsal means to strip, to plunder, to despoil. The same word used for God 'delivering' Israel (3:8; 6:6) is now used for Israel 'stripping' Egypt. Deliverance and despoilment share a verb — what was taken from Israel in labor is now reclaimed in departure.
37. 'About six hundred thousand men on foot' (keshesh-me'ot elef ragli) — this number has been extensively debated. The word eleph can mean 'thousand' or 'clan/military unit.' If read as 'thousand,' the total population exceeds two million; if read as 'clan,' the number is considerably smaller. The text records the tradition without resolving the question.

38. 'A mixed multitude' (erev rav) — non-Israelites who joined the exodus. The departure is not ethnically exclusive; others attached themselves to Israel's liberation. This group will later cause problems (Numbers 11:4), but their inclusion here reflects the gravitational pull of God's redemptive act.
39. The unleavened cakes are explained by narrative circumstance: they were driven out and could not wait. The ritual institution (vv.15-20) is grounded in historical reality — the bread of haste was not a theological invention but a lived necessity that became a sacrament.
40. '430 years' — the precise duration of the sojourn, fulfilling the prophecy of 400 years given to Abraham in Genesis 15:13 (the 30-year difference reflects different starting points for the count). The narrator anchors the exodus in measurable, historical time.
41. 'On that very day' (be'etsem hayyom hazzeh) — the phrase of calendared precision returns. The 430 years end on a specific day, not approximately. 'All the hosts of the LORD' (kol-tshiv'ot YHWH) — Israel is again called God's army, departing Egypt as a military force under divine command.
42. 'A night of watching' (leil shimmurim) — the word shimmurim (from shamar, 'to watch, guard, keep') is used in an unusual intensive plural. This night is doubly watched: God watched over Israel to bring them out, and Israel watches this night in commemoration across all generations. The watching is mutual — God guards; Israel remembers.
43. Passover regulations resume, now addressing membership: who may eat and who may not. The festival creates community boundaries — it is not open to everyone indiscriminately but requires covenant belonging.
44. A purchased slave, once circumcised, may eat — the covenant sign of circumcision grants access to the covenant meal. Social status (slave) does not exclude; covenant status (circumcised) includes.
45. Temporary residents (toshav) and hired workers (sakhir) are excluded — those with no permanent covenant commitment cannot share the covenant meal. The Passover requires belonging, not mere proximity.
46. 'You shall not break any of its bones' (ve'etsem lo tishberu-vo) — the intact skeleton preserves the wholeness of the sacrifice. John 19:36 will cite this verse in connection with Jesus's crucifixion, where the soldiers do not break his legs. The unbroken bones signify an offering given whole and complete.
47. 'The whole congregation of Israel shall keep it' — the Passover is mandatory for the entire community. No opt-out is provided. Corporate identity is forged in corporate observance.
48. The provision for the sojourner (ger) who wants to participate is remarkable: circumcision grants full access. 'He shall be as a native of the land' (vehayah ke'ezrach ha'arets) — the covenant community is not closed by ethnicity but opened by covenant commitment. Circumcision is the gate.
49. 'One law for the native and for the sojourner' (torah achat... la'ezrach velagger) — one of the most important legal principles in the Torah. The same standard applies to all who belong to the covenant community, regardless of origin. Equality before the law is established at the exodus.
50. The obedience formula repeats: 'just as the LORD commanded... so they did.' Bracketing the chapter (v28 and v50) with identical compliance statements frames the entire Passover night within perfect obedience.
51. 'The LORD brought the sons of Israel out' (hotsi YHWH et-benei Yisra'el) — the chapter's final sentence is the exodus itself, stated in a single clause. God is the subject; Israel is the object. Liberation is divine action, and the verb hotsi ('brought out') will become the defining verb of Israel's identity.

Summary: God commands the consecration of every firstborn and the observance of unleavened bread as a perpetual memorial. Moses carries Joseph's bones as promised. God leads Israel by a pillar of cloud by day and fire by night, deliberately avoiding the Philistine road.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb qaddesh ('consecrate,' v2) transfers every firstborn from common status to divine ownership — they are living memorials of the tenth plague. The imperative zakhor ('remember,' v3) is not mere mental recall but active, liturgical remembrance, the same verb governing the Sabbath commandment (20:8). God's strategic routing away from the Philistine road (v17) reveals that liberation includes protection from premature conflict — 'lest the people change their minds when they see war.'

Translation Friction: We rendered qaddesh-li kol-bekhor as 'consecrate to Me every firstborn' rather than 'sanctify' or 'set apart,' because 'consecrate' best captures the transfer of ownership from human to divine use. The phrase beit avadim ('house of slavery,' v3) we treated as a fixed title for Egypt that recurs throughout the Torah. The month name Aviv ('spring') carries agricultural resonance — the exodus coincides with new grain — which the English 'Aviv' preserves better than a translation like 'spring month.'

Connections: The consecration of the firstborn connects to Numbers 3:11-13, where Levites substitute for firstborn. Joseph's bones (v19) fulfill Genesis 50:25 and find their resting place in Joshua 24:32. The pillar of cloud and fire anticipates God's presence in the tabernacle (40:34-38) and Isaiah's vision of a canopy over Zion (Isaiah 4:5).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Consecrate to Me every firstborn. Whatever opens the womb among the sons of Israel, both of man and of beast — it is Mine." ³Moses said to the people, "Remember this day on which you came out of Egypt, out of the house of slavery, for by strength of hand the LORD brought you out from this place. No leavened bread shall be eaten. ⁴Today you are going out, in the month of Aviv. ⁵When the LORD brings you into the land of the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, which He swore to your fathers to give you — a land flowing with milk and honey — you shall keep this service in this month. ⁶For seven days you are to eat bread made without yeast, and on the seventh day hold a festival to the LORD. ⁷Unleavened bread shall be eaten for seven days. No leavened bread shall be seen with you, and no leaven shall be seen with you in all your territory. ⁸You shall tell your son on that day, 'It is because of what the LORD did for me when I came out of Egypt.' ⁹It shall be as a sign on your hand and as a memorial between your eyes, so that the instruction of the LORD may be in your mouth, for with a strong hand the LORD brought you out of Egypt. ¹⁰You shall keep this statute at its appointed time from year to year. ¹¹"When the LORD brings you into the land of the Canaanites, as He swore to you and to your fathers, and gives it to you, ¹²you shall set apart to the LORD every firstborn that opens the womb. Every firstborn male of your livestock belongs to the LORD. ¹³Every firstborn donkey you shall redeem with a lamb, and if you do not redeem it, you shall break its neck. Every firstborn among your sons you shall redeem. ¹⁴When your son asks you in time to come, 'What does this mean?' you shall say to him, 'By strength of hand the LORD brought us out of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. ¹⁵When Pharaoh stubbornly refused to let us go, the LORD killed every firstborn in the land of Egypt, both the firstborn of man and the firstborn of beast. Therefore I sacrifice to the LORD every male that first opens the womb, but every firstborn of my sons I redeem.' ¹⁶It shall be as a sign on your hand and as frontlets between your eyes, for by strength of hand the LORD brought us out of Egypt." ¹⁷When Pharaoh let the people go, God did not lead them by way of the land of the Philistines, although that was near. For God said, "The people might change their minds when they see war and return to Egypt." ¹⁸So God led the people around by the way of the wilderness toward the Sea of Reeds. The sons of Israel went up out of the land of Egypt equipped for battle. ¹⁹Moses took the bones of Joseph with him, for Joseph had made the sons of Israel solemnly swear, saying, "God will surely visit you, and you shall carry up my bones from here with you." ²⁰The y set out from Succoth and camped at Etham, on the edge of the wilderness. ²¹The LORD went before them by day in a pillar of cloud to lead them along the way, and by night in a pillar of fire to give them light, so that they could travel by day and by night. ²²The pillar of cloud by day and the pillar of fire by night did not depart from before the people.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. A new divine speech opens the firstborn consecration legislation, directly following the death of Egypt's firstborn in chapter 12.
2. 'Consecrate to Me every firstborn' (qaddesh-li kol-bekhor) — the verb qiddesh ('consecrate, set apart as holy') is from the root qadosh. Because God struck Egypt's firstborn to liberate Israel, every firstborn in Israel now belongs to God. The firstborn are living memorials of the tenth plague: their life was purchased by Egypt's loss.
3. 'Remember this day' (zakhor et-hayyom hazzeh) — the imperative zakhor ('remember') is not mere mental recall but active, liturgical remembrance. The same verb governs the Sabbath commandment (20:8). 'House of slavery' (beit avadim) becomes a fixed phrase for Egypt throughout the Torah.
4. The month of Aviv (later called Nisan) means 'spring' — the month of new grain. The exodus occurs at the season of agricultural renewal, linking national liberation to the natural cycle of new life.
5. The land promise is restated with the standard six-nation list, reminding Israel that the exodus is not an end but a means: liberation leads to land, and land is the space where covenant worship is practiced.
6. The seven-day unleavened bread observance is repeated from chapter 12. The repetition is characteristic of Torah legislation — critical instructions are stated, restated, and amplified to ensure no ambiguity.
7. The triple prohibition — no leavened bread eaten, no leavened bread seen, no leaven seen — escalates from consumption to visibility to possession. The removal of leaven is total.

8. 'You shall tell your son' (vehiggadta levinkha) — the verb higgid ('tell, declare, narrate') is the root of the word haggadah, the Passover retelling. The instruction embeds intergenerational narration into the festival's structure. Faith is transmitted through story.
9. 'A sign on your hand and a memorial between your eyes' — this phrase will later be interpreted literally as tefillin (phylacteries) in rabbinic tradition. In the Torah's own context, it expresses the principle that the exodus should govern both action (hand) and thought (between the eyes). The phrase 'instruction of the LORD' (torat YHWH) is the first use of the word torah in Exodus — here meaning 'teaching, instruction' in its broadest sense.
10. The statute has an 'appointed time' (mo'ed) — the same word used for the sacred calendar and for the tabernacle ('tent of meeting,' ohel mo'ed). Time, place, and practice are all governed by divine appointment.
11. The firstborn legislation is tied to entry into the land — the law takes full effect when Israel settles. Wilderness observance anticipates settled practice.
12. 'Set apart to the LORD' (veha'avarta laYHWH) — the verb avar in the hipil means 'cause to pass over,' creating a wordplay with pesach. What was 'passed over' in Egypt is now 'passed over to' God. Every firstborn that opens the womb (peter rechem) is claimed by the God who opened the way through Egypt.
13. Donkeys cannot be sacrificed (they are not clean animals), so they must be redeemed with a lamb — a substitute. If not redeemed, their neck is broken. Human firstborn are always redeemed, never sacrificed. The redemption requirement establishes the principle that human life belongs to God but is never taken as offering.
14. The second 'when your son asks' passage (cf. 12:26). The Passover creates perpetual curiosity — each generation asks why, and each generation receives the narrative of liberation as answer.
15. The answer links the firstborn consecration to Pharaoh's stubbornness and the tenth plague. The logic is explicit: because Pharaoh would not release God's firstborn (Israel), God struck Egypt's firstborn. Therefore Israel's firstborn are consecrated — set apart as living testimony to the cost of liberation.
16. The 'sign on your hand and frontlets between your eyes' phrase repeats from v9, creating a literary frame around the firstborn legislation. The physical body carries the exodus memory.
17. God chooses the long route — not the direct coastal road through Philistine territory (the Way of Horus, a major military highway). The reason is pastoral: God knows His people are not yet ready for war. Divine strategy accounts for human weakness.
18. 'The Sea of Reeds' (yam-suf) — traditionally rendered 'Red Sea,' but the Hebrew suf means 'reeds' or 'rushes.' The exact location is debated, but the name points to a marshy body of water, not necessarily the modern Red Sea. 'Equipped for battle' (chamushim) indicates military organization despite the avoidance of the direct military route.
19. Moses carries Joseph's bones — fulfilling the oath from Genesis 50:25. The dead patriarch travels with the living nation. Joseph, who entered Egypt as a slave and rose to power, now leaves as bones carried by the people he preserved. The continuity of covenant promise bridges the gap between Genesis and Exodus.
20. The itinerary moves from Rameses (12:37) to Succoth to Etham, tracking the departure route. 'The edge of the wilderness' (biqtseh hammidbar) marks the transition from settled Egyptian territory to the wilderness where God will lead, feed, and teach Israel.
21. The pillar of cloud by day and pillar of fire by night are the visible manifestation of God's guidance. Cloud and fire are theophany elements (cf. Sinai, 19:18; the tabernacle, 40:34-38). God does not merely command the route; He physically leads the march. The dual manifestation ensures continuous guidance — day and night, without interruption.
22. 'Did not depart' (lo yamish) — the constancy of God's presence is emphasized. The pillar is not intermittent but permanent. As long as Israel journeys, God's visible presence goes before them. This is the Shekinah concept in narrative form: God dwelling with and leading His people.

Summary: God leads Israel into an apparent trap between the sea and the wilderness. Pharaoh pursues with his full army. God parts the sea, Israel crosses on dry ground, and the returning waters destroy the Egyptian army. Israel sees and believes.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb kavad ('gain glory') in v4 is the same root as Pharaoh's hardened (kaved) heart — God's glory is displayed through the destruction of the one whose heart was heavy with stubbornness. The wordplay is devastating and intentional. Moses's command 'Stand firm and see the salvation of the LORD' (v13) introduces yeshu'ah into the narrative vocabulary — the same root that gives its name to Joshua and Jesus. The final verse states that Israel 'believed in the LORD and in His servant Moses' — the sea-crossing produces faith.

Translation Friction: We rendered ve'ikkavdah bePar'oh as 'I will gain glory through Pharaoh,' preserving the kavad root connection rather than using a different English word. The geographic names Pi-hahiroth, Migdol, and Baal-zephon are retained untranslated since they function as proper nouns, though Baal-zephon ('Lord of the North') may carry polemical overtones. The phrase ruach qadim azzah ('a strong east wind,' v21) we rendered literally, noting that natural mechanism and divine miracle are not opposed in the Hebrew worldview.

Connections: The sea-crossing is the defining salvation event, referenced in Psalms 66:6; 106:9-12; 136:13-15; Isaiah 43:16-17; and 1 Corinthians 10:1-2. The dry ground (yabbashah) echoes creation's dry ground in Genesis 1:9. Pharaoh's chariots sinking into the sea reverses his military might, fulfilling the judgment announced in 14:4.

¹Then the LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Tell the sons of Israel to turn back and camp before Pi-hahiroth, between Migdol and the sea, before Baal-zephon. You shall camp opposite it, by the sea. ³Pharaoh will say of the sons of Israel, 'They are wandering aimlessly in the land; the wilderness has closed in on them.' ⁴I will harden Pharaoh's heart, and he will pursue them. And I will gain glory through Pharaoh and through all his army, and the Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD." And they did so. ⁵When the king of Egypt was told that the people had fled, the heart of Pharaoh and his servants turned against the people, and they said, "What have we done, that we let Israel go from serving us?" ⁶He made his chariot ready and took his army with him. ⁷He took six hundred chosen chariots and all the other chariots of Egypt, with officers over all of them. ⁸The LORD hardened the heart of Pharaoh king of Egypt, and he pursued the sons of Israel as the sons of Israel were going out defiantly. ⁹The Egyptians pursued them — all Pharaoh's horses and chariots, his horsemen and his army — and overtook them encamped by the sea, beside Pi-hahiroth, before Baal-zephon. ¹⁰As Pharaoh drew near, the sons of Israel lifted up their eyes, and there were the Egyptians marching after them. They were terrified, and the sons of Israel cried out to the LORD. ¹¹They said to Moses, "Is it because there are no graves in Egypt that you have taken us out to die in the wilderness? What have you done to us by bringing us out of Egypt? ¹²Is this not the very thing we said to you in Egypt: 'Leave us alone and let us serve the Egyptians'? For it would have been better for us to serve the Egyptians than to die in the wilderness." ¹³Moses said to the people, "Do not be afraid. Stand firm and see the salvation of the LORD, which He will accomplish for you today. For the Egyptians whom you see today, you shall never see again. ¹⁴The LORD will fight for you, and you need only be still." ¹⁵The LORD said to Moses, "Why do you cry out to Me? Tell the sons of Israel to move forward. ¹⁶Lift up your staff and stretch out your hand over the sea and divide it, so that the sons of Israel may go through the sea on dry ground. ¹⁷And I — I will harden the hearts of the Egyptians so that they go in after them. And I will gain glory through Pharaoh and all his army, through his chariots and his horsemen. ¹⁸The Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD, when I have gained glory through Pharaoh, through his chariots and his horsemen." ¹⁹Then the angel of God who was going before the camp of Israel moved and went behind them. The pillar of cloud moved from before them and stood behind them, ²⁰coming between the camp of Egypt and the camp of Israel. It was cloud and darkness to the one, yet it gave light by night to the other. Neither came near the other all night. ²¹Then Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, and the LORD drove the sea back by a strong east wind all night and made the sea into dry ground. The waters were divided. ²²The sons of Israel went through the sea on dry ground, with the waters as a wall to their right and to their left. ²³The Egyptians gave chase and followed them into the middle of the sea — every one of Pharaoh's horses, chariots, and cavalry. ²⁴In the morning watch the LORD looked down on the Egyptian army through the pillar of fire and cloud and threw the Egyptian army into confusion. ²⁵He clogged their chariot wheels so that they drove heavily. The Egyptians said, "Let us flee from before Israel, for the LORD is fighting for them against Egypt!" ²⁶Then the LORD said to Moses, "Stretch out your hand over the sea, so that the waters may come back over the Egyptians, over their chariots and their horsemen." ²⁷Moses stretched out his hand over the sea, and the sea returned to its normal course when the morning appeared. The Egyptians fled into it, and the LORD swept the Egyptians into the midst of the sea. ²⁸The waters returned and covered the chariots and the horsemen — all the army of Pharaoh that had followed them into the sea. Not one of them remained. ²⁹But the sons of Israel walked on dry ground through the sea, with the waters as a wall to their right and to their left. ³⁰In this way the LORD rescued Israel that day from Egyptian power, and the Israelites saw Egyptian soldiers lying dead along the shore. ³¹Israel saw the great power that the LORD used against the Egyptians, and the people feared the LORD, and they believed in the LORD and in His servant Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God instructs an apparent tactical blunder — turning back toward a position that appears trapped. The strategy is deliberately designed to lure Pharaoh into pursuit.
2. The geography pins Israel between the wilderness and the sea — Pi-hahiroth, Migdol, and Baal-zephon form a geographical trap. God positions His people in apparent vulnerability as the setup for the decisive demonstration of power.
3. God predicts Pharaoh's interpretation: 'They are wandering aimlessly' (nevukhim hem ba'arets). The word navakh means 'to be confused, to wander without direction.' Pharaoh reads the retreat as disorientation — exactly what God intends him to think.
4. 'I will gain glory through Pharaoh' (ve'ikkavdah bePar'oh) — the verb kavah ('to be heavy, to gain glory') is the same root as the hardening verb (kaved). God's kavod ('glory/weight') will be displayed through the destruction of the one whose heart was kaved ('heavy/hard'). The wordplay is devastating: Pharaoh's heaviness of heart leads to God's heaviness of glory.
5. 'What have we done?' (mah-zot asinu) — the Egyptians' regret is not moral (we should not have oppressed them) but economic (we have lost our workforce). They see Israel not as people but as labor — even the exodus is filtered through the oppressor's categories.
6. Pharaoh mobilizes personally: 'he made his chariot ready' (vayyesor et-rikhbo). The king who sent others now leads the pursuit himself. Pride drives him toward the very judgment he was warned about.
7. Six hundred chosen chariots plus 'all the other chariots' — Egypt's full military capability is committed. The force is overwhelming by any human calculation. Iron Age chariotry was the ancient world's most devastating weapon system.
8. 'Going out defiantly' (beyad ramah) — literally 'with a high hand.' Israel leaves Egypt not cowering but with raised hands — a posture of confidence and triumph. The phrase will later describe deliberate sin (Numbers 15:30), but here it describes legitimate assertion of freedom.
9. The Egyptian army overtakes Israel at the sea — the geographical trap is sprung. Humanly speaking, the situation is hopeless: the sea ahead, the army behind, the wilderness on either side.
10. Israel's terror is visceral and immediate. Their cry to the LORD (vayyits'aqu el-YHWH) uses the same covenant-distress verb from 2:23. Under threat, they instinctively turn to the God who heard them before.
11. The bitter sarcasm of the complaint — 'Is it because there are no graves in Egypt?' — is the first of many wilderness murmurings. The irony is sharp: Egypt, the land of elaborate tombs and mummification, certainly had no shortage of graves.
12. 'Let us serve the Egyptians' (na'avdah et-Mitsrayim) — the verb avad ('serve') is the same word used for both slavery and worship. Israel's complaint reveals the psychological depth of bondage: some part of them still prefers the familiar oppression to the terrifying unknown of freedom.
13. 'See the salvation of the LORD' (re'u et-yeshu'at YHWH) — the first use of yeshu'ah ('salvation') in Exodus. The word derives from the root y-sh-' meaning 'to save, to deliver, to make spacious.' Salvation in Hebrew is not abstract but experiential: God creates space where there was constriction, freedom where there was bondage.
14. 'The LORD will fight for you, and you need only be still' (YHWH yillem lakhem ve'attem tacharishun) — one of the most compressed theological statements in the Torah. God fights; Israel rests. The verb charash ('be still, be silent') means to cease striving. The battle belongs to God, not to human effort.
15. 'Why do you cry out to Me? Tell them to move forward' (mah-tits'aq elai dabber el-benei Yisra'el veyissa'u) — God's response to prayer is not more prayer but action. There is a time to cry out and a time to march. Moses has prayed; now he must lead.
16. 'Divide it' (uveqa'ehu) — the verb baqa means 'to split, to cleave, to divide.' The same verb describes God splitting rocks for water (Psalm 78:15) and will describe the earth opening to swallow Korah (Numbers 16:31). God divides what no human power can divide.
17. God orchestrates the Egyptian pursuit into the divided sea — the hardening serves not only to sustain Pharaoh's rebellion but to draw him into the place of judgment. The sea becomes a courtroom.
18. 'The Egyptians shall know that I am the LORD' — the knowledge formula appears for the final time in the plague-exodus narrative. Egypt's education concludes at the bottom of the sea.
19. The angel of God and the pillar of cloud shift from leading position to rearguard — moving from in front of Israel to behind them, placing themselves between Israel and Egypt. The protector repositions to shield the vulnerable side.
20. The pillar is simultaneously darkness to Egypt and light to Israel — the same divine presence that illuminates the covenant people blinds the oppressor. God's presence is not uniform; it is experienced differently depending on one's relationship to Him.
21. 'The LORD drove the sea back by a strong east wind all night' (vayyolekh YHWH et-hayyam beruach qadim azzah kol-hallailah) — the mechanism is both natural (wind) and supernatural (divine command). The east wind (ruach qadim) is the same wind that brought the locusts (10:13). God uses the elements as instruments, but the directing will is His.

- 22. 'Waters as a wall to their right and to their left' (vehamayim lahem chomah miyeminam umissemolam) — the word chomah ('wall') describes a solid, structural barrier. The water does not merely part; it stands upright like masonry. Israel walks through an architectural corridor of suspended water.
- 23. The Egyptians follow into the divided sea — a decision that requires either supreme confidence or supreme blindness. They enter the space God opened for Israel, not recognizing that what saves Israel will judge Egypt.
- 24. 'The morning watch' (be'ashmoret haboqer) — the last watch of the night, approximately 2-6 AM. God looks down (vayyashqef) through the pillar — the verb suggests peering down from above, a divine surveillance that precedes judgment. The same verb describes God looking down on Sodom (Genesis 19:28).
- 25. 'The LORD is fighting for them against Egypt' (YHWH nilcham lahem beMitsrayim) — the Egyptians reach the theological conclusion that Israel's terror prevented them from seeing: the LORD fights. The oppressor confesses what the oppressed could not yet believe.
- 26. The command to close the sea mirrors the command to open it (v16). Moses stretches out his hand in both directions — the human agent acts; the divine power responds.
- 27. 'The sea returned to its normal course' (vayyashav hayyam lifnot boqer le'etano) — the word etan means 'permanent, enduring, its usual force.' The miracle is temporary; the sea returns to what it permanently is. God's intervention creates a window within normal reality, not a permanent alteration of it.
- 28. 'Not one of them remained' (lo nish'ar bahem ad-echad) — total destruction. The army that pursued Israel with six hundred chariots is annihilated. The completeness of the judgment matches the completeness of God's promise to deliver.
- 29. Verse 29 restates the miracle from Israel's perspective — a deliberate literary framing. Verses 22 and 29 bracket the Egyptian destruction with Israel's safe passage. The same event is simultaneously salvation and judgment, depending on which side you stand.
- 30. 'The LORD saved Israel that day' (vayyosha YHWH bayyom hahu et-Yisra'el) — the verb yasha ('save') gives its name to yeshu'ah (salvation) and to Yeshua/Joshua/Jesus. The root meaning is to make spacious, to deliver from constriction. The dead Egyptians on the shore are the visible proof of completed deliverance.
- 31. 'The people feared the LORD, and they believed in the LORD and in His servant Moses' (vayyir'u ha'am et-YHWH vayya'aminu baYHWH uveMosheh avdo) — the narrative climax. Fear, faith, and recognition converge. The word he'eminu ('believed') is from the same root as emunah ('faithfulness') and amen. Israel's faith at the sea is active trust grounded in witnessed power — not blind belief but covenantal response to demonstrated salvation.

Summary: Moses and Israel sing the Song of the Sea celebrating God's victory. Miriam leads the women in response. At Marah, God makes bitter water sweet. The chapter closes with the promise 'I am the LORD who heals you' at Elim's twelve springs.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Song of the Sea (Shirat HaYam) is one of the oldest and longest sustained poems in the Hebrew Bible, with archaic grammatical forms suggesting very early composition. The opening ga'oh ga'ah ('rising, He has risen') uses the infinitive absolute for absolute supremacy. The divine warrior title 'YHWH is a warrior' (YHWH ish milchamah, v3) is stated with maximum compression. The word yeshu'ah, introduced narratively in 14:13, now enters Israel's liturgy (v2) — theology becomes song.

Translation Friction: The phrase azzi vezimrat Yah ('my strength and my song,' v2) contains a debated word — zimrat may derive from zamar ('to sing') or from a root meaning 'protection.' We rendered it 'my song,' following the dominant tradition. The similes of the enemy sinking — like a stone (v5), like lead (v10) — convey irreversible submersion, and we preserved both images rather than consolidating. Miriam's title hanevi'ah ('the prophetess,' v20) we retained without elaboration, as the Hebrew grants her the title without further explanation.

Connections: The Song is echoed in Judges 5 (Song of Deborah), Psalm 18, and Habakkuk 3. The sanctuary destination (v17) anticipates both Sinai and the tabernacle. The healing at Marah (v25-26) introduces the divine title YHWH Rof'ekha ('the LORD your healer'), which recurs in Psalm 103:3. The twelve springs at Elim (v27) correspond to the twelve tribes.

¹Then Moses and the sons of Israel sang this song to the LORD. They said:

"I will sing to the LORD, for He has triumphed gloriously;
the horse and its rider He has hurled into the sea.

²The LORD is my strength and my song, and He has become my salvation.
This is my God, and I will praise Him,
my father's God, and I will exalt Him.

³The LORD is a warrior;
the LORD is His name.

⁴Pharaoh's chariots and his army He cast into the sea, and his chosen officers sank in the Sea of Reeds.

⁵The deep waters covered them;
they went down into the depths like a stone.

⁶Your right hand, O LORD, is majestic in power.
Your right hand, O LORD, shatters the enemy.

⁷In the greatness of Your majesty You overthrow those who rise against You.
You send out Your fury; it consumes them like stubble.

⁸At the blast of Your nostrils the waters piled up;
the floods stood upright like a heap;
the deep waters congealed in the heart of the sea.

⁹The enemy boasted, 'I will chase them down, I will catch them,
I will divide the plunder; my appetite will be gorged on them.
I will unsheathe my sword — my own hand will destroy them.'

¹⁰You blew with Your wind; the sea covered them.
They sank like lead in the mighty waters.

¹¹Who is like You among the gods, O LORD?
Who is like You — majestic in holiness, awesome in splendor, working wonders?

¹²You stretched out Your right hand;
the earth swallowed them.

¹³In Your faithful love You have led the people whom You have redeemed.
In Your strength You have guided them to Your holy dwelling.

¹⁴The peoples have heard; they tremble.
Anguish has seized the inhabitants of Philistia.

¹⁵Now the chiefs of Edom are dismayed;
trembling seizes the leaders of Moab;
all the inhabitants of Canaan have melted away.

¹⁶Terror and dread fall upon them.

Because of the greatness of Your arm they are still as a stone, until Your people pass over, O LORD, until the people whom You have purchased pass over.

¹⁷You will bring them in and plant them on the mountain of Your inheritance, the place, O LORD, You have made for Your dwelling, the sanctuary, O Lord, that Your hands have established.

¹⁸The LORD will reign forever and ever." ¹⁹For the horses of Pharaoh went with his chariots and his horsemen into the sea, and the LORD brought the waters of the sea back over them, but the sons of Israel walked on dry ground through the midst of the sea. ²⁰Then Miriam the prophetess, the sister of Aaron, took a tambourine in her hand, and all the women went out after her with tambourines and dancing.

²¹Miriam sang to them:

"Sing to the LORD, for He has triumphed gloriously;
the horse and its rider He has hurled into the sea."

²²Then Moses led Israel onward from the Sea of Reeds, and they went out into the wilderness of Shur. They traveled three days in the wilderness and found no water. ²³When they came to Marah, they could not drink the water of Marah because it was bitter. Therefore it was named Marah. ²⁴The people grumbled against Moses, saying, "What shall we drink?" ²⁵He cried out to the LORD, and the LORD showed him a piece of wood. He threw it into the water, and the water became sweet. There the LORD made for them a statute and a rule, and there He tested them. ²⁶He said, "If you will diligently listen to the voice of the LORD your God and do what is right in His eyes, and give ear to His commandments and keep all His statutes, I will put none of the diseases on you that I put on the Egyptians, for I am the LORD, your healer." ²⁷Then they came to Elim, where there were twelve springs of water and seventy palm trees, and they camped there by the water.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Song of the Sea (Shirat HaYam) is the longest sustained poem in the Pentateuch and one of the oldest pieces of Hebrew poetry in the Bible. Its archaic grammatical forms and vocabulary suggest very early composition. The opening verb ashirah ('I will sing') is cohortative — an expression of determined will, not mere description. 'He has triumphed gloriously' (ga'oh ga'ah) is an infinitive absolute construction: 'rising, He has risen' or 'exalting, He has exalted Himself.' The doubling conveys absolute supremacy.
2. 'My strength and my song' (azzi vezimrat) — the word zimrat may derive from zamar ('to sing, to prune, to trim'). The pairing of strength and song defines God's character in the exodus: power expressed through praise. 'He has become my salvation' (vayehi-li lishu'ah) — the word yeshu'ah from the sea-crossing narrative (14:13) is now incorporated into worship. Theology enters liturgy.
3. 'The LORD is a warrior' (YHWH ish milchamah) — literally 'YHWH is a man of war.' This is the divine warrior title, stated with maximum compression. 'The LORD is His name' (YHWH shemo) — identity is declared, not defended. The name carries its own authority.
4. The song names the specific agents of judgment: chariots, army, chosen officers. The verb yara ('cast, hurled') depicts forceful, violent action — God throws Egypt's military power into the sea like discarded objects.
5. 'They went down into the depths like a stone' (yardu bimtsolot kemo-aven) — the simile of a stone sinking captures the finality of the judgment. The same image recurs in v10 (lead) and the two similes together (stone, lead) convey weight, sinking, irreversible submersion.
6. 'Your right hand, O LORD' (yeminkha YHWH) — the right hand is the hand of power, strength, and action. The parallelism is characteristic of Hebrew poetry: the first line states the right hand's majesty; the second line states its destructive effect on the enemy. The repetition of 'Your right hand, O LORD' creates an anaphoric pattern that drives the poem forward.
7. 'Consumes them like stubble' (yokhlemo kaqash) — fire imagery applied to God's fury (charon). The enemies of God burn like dry stalks — insubstantial before divine wrath. The image contrasts the burning bush (3:2), which was not consumed, with the enemies of God, who are.
8. 'At the blast of Your nostrils' (uveruach appekha) — the wind (ruach) that divided the sea is described anthropomorphically as the breath of God's nostrils. The same ruach that hovered over creation's waters (Genesis 1:2) now piles up the sea's waters. 'Congealed' (qafe'u) — the deep waters solidified, stood firm like walls. The verb is rare and vivid.

9. The enemy's boast is rendered in first-person: five verbs of intended violence (pursue, overtake, divide, draw, destroy). The cumulative effect captures the predator's confidence — a confidence the sea will swallow whole. The enemy never speaks again after this verse.
10. 'You blew with Your wind' (nashafta beruchakha) — God's breath is sufficient to undo the enemy's boast. One divine exhalation answers five human verbs of violence. 'They sank like lead' (tsalelu ka'oferet) — the second sinking simile (cf. v5, stone). Lead is denser than stone; the imagery intensifies.
11. 'Who is like You among the gods, O LORD?' (mi-khamokha ba'elim YHWH) — the rhetorical question is the theological climax of the song. The answer is obvious and overwhelming: no one. 'Majestic in holiness' (ne'dar baqqodesh) — the word ne'dar means 'majestic, glorious, awe-inspiring.' Holiness (qodesh) is the attribute that defines God's incomparability. This verse will become one of the most quoted liturgical lines in Jewish worship.
12. 'The earth swallowed them' (tivla'emo erets) — the verb bala ('swallow') is the same verb used when Aaron's staff swallowed the Egyptian staffs (7:12). The pattern of consumption runs through the narrative: what God's instruments swallow cannot be recovered.
13. 'In Your steadfast love You have led' (nachita vechasdekha) — chesed appears in the Song of the Sea for the first time. God's covenant love is not merely emotional but directional — it leads. 'Your holy dwelling' (neveh qodshekha) — the poem looks forward from the sea to the destination: God's holy dwelling, whether understood as Sinai, the promised land, or the future temple.
14. The song's horizon expands from the sea to the surrounding nations. The peoples (ammim) hear and tremble — the exodus radiates fear outward. Philistia, the nearest enemy, is seized with anguish (chil).
15. Edom, Moab, and Canaan — the three peoples Israel will encounter on the journey — are paralyzed by what God has done at the sea. The verbs intensify: 'dismayed' (nivhalu), 'trembling seizes' (achazemo ra'ad), 'melted away' (namogu). Fear progresses from alarm to paralysis to dissolution.
16. 'Until Your people pass over' (ad-ya'avur ammekha) — the verb avar ('pass over, cross') echoes the Passover (pesach) and the crossing of the sea. Israel is the people who pass through — through judgment, through water, through wilderness. 'The people whom You have purchased' (am-zu qanita) — the verb qanah means to acquire, purchase, create. God bought Israel at the cost of Egypt's judgment.
17. 'You will bring them in and plant them on the mountain of Your inheritance' (tevi'emo vetita'emo behar nachalatekha) — the verbs 'bring in' and 'plant' shift from the sea to the land. The exodus is not complete at the shore; it is complete when Israel is planted — rooted like a tree — in the place God has prepared. 'The sanctuary that Your hands have established' (miqqedash Adonai konenu yadekha) — the song concludes with the temple vision: God's own hands build the final dwelling.
18. 'The LORD will reign forever and ever' (YHWH yimlokh le'olam va'ed) — the song's final declaration is a statement of eternal sovereignty. After the narrative of plagues, the night of Passover, and the destruction at the sea, the conclusion is cosmic: YHWH reigns. The word olam stretches God's kingship beyond the horizon of time.
19. The narrator returns to prose, summarizing the sea event one final time. The repetition serves as a transition from song back to narrative.
20. 'Miriam the prophetess' (Miriam hanevi'ah) — the first woman in the Bible explicitly called a prophetess (nevi'ah). Her title is not honorary; it declares a recognized role. She leads the women's response with tambourine (tof) and dance (mecholot). Worship at the sea is gendered but shared — Moses leads one song, Miriam leads another.
21. Miriam's song reprises the opening verse of the Song of the Sea — the same words, now in the mouth of a woman leading the women. The repetition is not redundancy but antiphonal worship: one community, two voices, the same praise.
22. The transition from the sea to the wilderness is abrupt. Three days without water immediately follows the greatest miracle in Israel's history. The pattern of exodus life begins here: miracle, then testing; deliverance, then difficulty.
23. 'Marah' (marah) means 'bitter.' The naming of places by experience is characteristic of wilderness narrative — geography becomes theology. The people cannot drink the water that bears the name of their condition.
24. The first wilderness complaint follows immediately after the Song of the Sea. The distance between praise (v1) and grumbling (v24) measures the fragility of faith under pressure.
25. God provides a remedy: a piece of wood (ets) makes bitter water sweet. The same God who divided the sea now transforms a spring. The scale is different; the provider is the same. 'There He tested them' (sham nisahu) — the verb nasah ('to test') from Genesis 22:1 (the Aqedah) reappears. The wilderness is a testing ground.
26. The conditional promise — 'If you listen... I will put none of the diseases' — introduces the covenant-obedience framework that will dominate Exodus through Deuteronomy. 'I am the LORD, your healer' (ani YHWH rof'ekha) — a divine self-designation. The God who judges Egypt also heals Israel. The same power works in both directions.
27. Elim — twelve springs and seventy palms — provides rest and abundance. Twelve springs for twelve tribes; seventy palms echoing the seventy persons who entered Egypt (Genesis 46:27). The numbers are not accidental; they are provision fitted to identity.

Summary: One month after the exodus, Israel grumbles about hunger in the wilderness of Sin. God provides quail in the evening and manna each morning, with a double portion on the sixth day for the Sabbath. Some disobey the gathering rules; the manna is preserved in a jar as a testimony.

What Makes This Remarkable: The manna tests whether Israel will walk in God's torah ('instruction,' v4) before the Torah is formally given at Sinai — obedience precedes legislation. The Sabbath rhythm of six-and-one is built into the provision before it appears in the Decalogue. The people's complaint idealizes Egyptian slavery ('when we sat by the meat pots,' v3), revealing that freedom is uncomfortable and memory is selective. God responds to complaint not with rebuke but with bread from heaven.

Translation Friction: The word man hu ('what is it?' v15) — from which 'manna' may derive — is debated. We retained 'What is it?' as a question, which is how the Hebrew functions, though some scholars read man as an Egyptian loanword for a natural resin. The term torah in v4 ('My instruction') appears before Sinai; we chose 'instruction' rather than 'law' to capture its pre-legal sense of divine teaching. The wilderness of Sin (v1) is unrelated to the English word 'sin' and we left it untranslated as a proper noun.

Connections: The manna is cited by Moses in Deuteronomy 8:3 ('man does not live by bread alone') and by Jesus in John 6:31-35. The Sabbath provision anticipates the fourth commandment (20:8-11). The jar of manna placed before the Testimony (v33-34) connects to the ark contents in Hebrews 9:4. The grumbling pattern (15:24, 16:2, 17:2) becomes structural in Numbers.

¹They set out from Elim, and the whole congregation of the sons of Israel came to the wilderness of Sin, which is between Elim and Sinai, on the fifteenth day of the second month after they had departed from the land of Egypt. ²The whole congregation of the sons of Israel grumbled against Moses and Aaron in the wilderness. ³The sons of Israel said to them, "If only we had died by the hand of the LORD in the land of Egypt, when we sat by the meat pots, when we ate bread to satisfaction! For you have brought us out into this wilderness to kill this whole assembly with hunger." ⁴Then the LORD said to Moses, "I am about to rain bread from heaven for you, and the people shall go out and gather a day's portion each day, so that I may test them — whether they will walk according to My instruction or not. ⁵On the sixth day, when they prepare what they bring in, it shall be twice as much as they gather daily." ⁶So Moses and Aaron said to all the sons of Israel, "At evening you will know that it was the LORD who brought you out of the land of Egypt, ⁷and in the morning you will see the glory of the LORD, because He has heard your grumbling against the LORD. For what are we, that you grumble against us?" ⁸Moses said, "When the LORD gives you meat to eat in the evening and bread to satisfaction in the morning — because the LORD has heard your grumbling that you grumble against Him — what are we? Your grumbling is not against us but against the LORD." ⁹Moses said to Aaron, "Say to the whole congregation of the sons of Israel, 'Draw near before the LORD, for He has heard your grumbling.'" ¹⁰As Aaron spoke to the whole congregation of the sons of Israel, they looked toward the wilderness, and the glory of the LORD appeared in the cloud. ¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ¹²"I have heard the grumbling of the sons of Israel. Speak to them, saying, 'At twilight you shall eat meat, and in the morning you shall be filled with bread. Then you will know that I am the LORD your God.'" ¹³In the evening quail came up and covered the camp, and in the morning there was a layer of dew around the camp. ¹⁴When the layer of dew lifted, there on the surface of the wilderness was a fine, flaky substance, as fine as frost on the ground. ¹⁵When the sons of Israel saw it, they said to one another, "What is it?" — for they did not know what it was. Moses said to them, "It is the bread that the LORD has given you to eat. ¹⁶This is what the LORD has commanded: 'Each one is to gather as much as he needs. Take an omer per person, according to the number of persons each of you has in his tent.'" ¹⁷The sons of Israel did so. Some gathered more, some less. ¹⁸But when they measured it with an omer, the one who gathered much had nothing left over, and the one who gathered little had no lack. Each gathered according to what he could eat. ¹⁹Moses said to them, "Let no one leave any of it until morning." ²⁰But they did not listen to Moses. Some left part of it until morning, and it bred worms and stank. And Moses was angry with them. ²¹They gathered it morning by morning, each according to what he could eat, and when the sun grew hot, it melted. ²²On the sixth day they gathered twice as much bread — two omers per person. All the leaders of the congregation came and told Moses. ²³ He said to them, "This is what the LORD has said: 'Tomorrow is a day of solemn rest, a holy Sabbath to the LORD. Bake what you want to bake and boil what you want to boil, and set aside all that is left over to keep until morning.'" ²⁴ They set it aside until morning, as Moses commanded, and it did not stink, and there were no worms in it. ²⁵ Moses said, "Eat it today, for today is a Sabbath to the LORD. Today you will not find it in the field. ²⁶ Six days you shall gather it, but on the seventh day, the Sabbath, there will be none." ²⁷ On the seventh day some of the people went out to gather, but they found none. ²⁸ The LORD said to Moses, "How long will you refuse to keep My commandments and My instructions? ²⁹ See, the LORD has given you the Sabbath; therefore on the sixth day He gives you bread for two days. Each of you stay where you are; let no one go out of his place on the seventh day." ³⁰ On the seventh day, the people refrained from work and rested. ³¹ The house of Israel called its name manna. It was like white coriander seed, and its taste was like wafers made with honey. ³² Moses said, "This is what the LORD has commanded: 'Fill an omer of it to be kept throughout your generations, so that they may see the bread with which I fed you in the wilderness when I brought you out of the land of Egypt.'" ³³ Moses said to Aaron, "Take a jar and put an omer of manna in it and place it before the LORD to be kept throughout your generations." ³⁴ Following the LORD's command to Moses, Aaron placed it in front of the Testimony for safekeeping. ³⁵ The sons of Israel ate the manna forty years, until they came to an inhabited land. They ate the manna until they came to the border of the land of Canaan. ³⁶ An omer is a tenth of an ephah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The wilderness of Sin (not related to the English word 'sin') is located between Elim and Sinai. The precise date — fifteenth day of the second month — places this exactly one month after the exodus. Israel has been free for thirty days and is now hungry.
2. The second wilderness murmuring (cf. 15:24). The pattern of deliverance-then-complaint is becoming structural: God provides, Israel travels, difficulty arises, Israel complains, God provides again.
3. The complaint idealizes Egypt: 'meat pots' and 'bread to satisfaction.' Slavery is retroactively romanticized because freedom is currently uncomfortable. The accusation that Moses brought them out 'to kill this whole assembly with hunger' inverts the reality — God brought them out to give them life.
4. 'Rain bread from heaven' (mamtir lakhem lechem min-hashamayim) — God's response to complaint is not rebuke but provision. The bread from heaven will become a defining image of divine sustenance. The test (nasah) embedded in the provision is whether Israel will obey the gathering rules — daily trust, no hoarding.
5. The double portion on the sixth day anticipates the Sabbath before Sinai formally legislates it. The rhythm of six-and-one is built into the manna before it is built into the law.
6. 'You will know that it was the LORD who brought you out' — the knowledge formula returns, now directed at Israel rather than Egypt. Israel too must learn who YHWH is, and they learn through provision, not only through judgment.
7. 'The glory of the LORD' (kevod YHWH) — the first appearance of kavod in a theophany context in Exodus. God's weighty, visible presence appears in the cloud in response to Israel's grumbling. Kavod manifests not in the spectacular (as at Sinai) but in the everyday (feeding a hungry people).
8. Moses redirects the complaint: 'Your grumbling is not against us but against the LORD.' The people think they are arguing with human leaders; Moses reveals they are arguing with God. The prophetic role includes this uncomfortable truth-telling.
9. 'Draw near before the LORD' (qirvu lifnei YHWH) — the verb qarav ('draw near') will become the technical term for offering sacrifices (the root of qorban, 'offering'). Here it means approaching God's presence, which is about to become visible.
10. 'The glory of the LORD appeared in the cloud' (kevod YHWH nir'ah be'anan) — kavod becomes visible. The cloud that has been guiding them (13:21-22) now reveals the divine presence within it. The people see what they have been following.
11. A new divine speech introduces the specific provision: meat in the evening, bread in the morning.
12. 'Then you will know that I am the LORD your God' — provision is revelation. God feeds Israel not merely to sustain them but to teach them who He is. Every meal of manna is a theology lesson.
13. Quail (selav) arrive in the evening, covering the camp. These are migratory birds that cross the Sinai Peninsula and can be caught when exhausted. The natural mechanism does not diminish the divine timing.
14. The manna is described precisely: fine, flaky, frost-like. The physical description grounds the miracle in sensory reality — this is something you can see, touch, and taste.

15. 'What is it?' (man hu) — the name manna may derive from this question. Israel encounters something they have never seen before and name it by their bewilderment. The bread from heaven defies existing categories.
16. The omer-per-person rule establishes equality: each household receives according to need, not according to power or status. The distribution principle will be cited by Paul in 2 Corinthians 8:15.
17. Some gathered more, some less — human behavior varies even under divine instruction.
18. The miraculous equalization: regardless of how much each person gathered, the measure came out to exactly one omer per person. Surplus and deficit are both corrected by divine provision. This is not merely logistics but theology: God ensures sufficiency.
19. The prohibition against keeping until morning tests daily trust. Can Israel depend on God for tomorrow's bread, or must they hoard today's?
20. Disobedience produces rot: worms and stench. The manna that sustains when gathered in trust corrupts when hoarded in anxiety. The physical consequence teaches the spiritual lesson.
21. Daily gathering, daily dependence. The rhythm of morning collection and midday melting forces Israel into a pattern of reliance that cannot be circumvented by stockpiling.
22. The double portion on the sixth day arrives without special effort — God provides the Sabbath surplus automatically. The leaders report this anomaly to Moses, not yet understanding the pattern.
23. 'A holy Sabbath to the LORD' (shabbat qodesh laYHWH) — the Sabbath is introduced before Sinai, before the formal commandment. The manna teaches Sabbath-keeping through practice before Sinai teaches it through law. The word shabbaton ('solemn rest') intensifies shabbat.
24. Friday's manna does not rot — the exception proves the rule. What corrupted when hoarded on other nights is preserved when kept for Sabbath. God's provision conforms to God's calendar.
25. Moses declares the theological principle: the Sabbath belongs to the LORD. The day is not merely a human rest period but a divine institution. No manna will appear because God Himself rests from providing — the divine Sabbath models the human one.
26. Six days of gathering, one day of rest. The creation pattern (Genesis 1-2) is reproduced in the wilderness food cycle. Israel lives inside the rhythm God established at creation.
27. Some went out on the seventh day anyway and found nothing. Disobedience on the Sabbath is not punished with worms (as weekday hoarding was) but with absence. There is simply nothing there.
28. God's rebuke is directed through Moses: 'How long will you refuse to keep My commandments?' The plural 'you' (teme'anu) addresses the whole people, not just the Sabbath-breakers. Corporate responsibility is assumed.
29. 'The LORD has given you the Sabbath' (YHWH natan lakhem et-haShabbat) — the Sabbath is a gift, not merely a restriction. The double bread on the sixth day is the evidence: God provides in advance so that rest is possible. Sabbath is sustained by prior provision.
30. 'The people rested' (vayyishbetu ha'am) — the verb shavat appears for the first time in Exodus describing human rest. Israel does what God did at creation: ceases from labor on the seventh day.
31. The name 'manna' (man) is formally given. The physical description — white coriander seed, taste of honey wafers — makes the substance vivid and appealing. Numbers 11:7-8 will give additional details.
32. An omer of manna is preserved as a perpetual witness to divine provision in the wilderness. The jar will eventually be placed in the Ark of the Covenant (Hebrews 9:4), keeping the bread of the wilderness inside the holiest object in Israel.
33. Aaron is charged with the preservation — a priestly duty. The manna is placed 'before the LORD' (lifnei YHWH), meaning in God's presence, anticipating the tabernacle.
34. 'Before the Testimony' (lifnei ha'edut) — the Testimony refers to the tablets of the covenant that do not yet exist in the narrative. The narrator writes from the perspective of the completed tabernacle, placing the manna jar in its permanent home.
35. 'Forty years' — the manna sustained Israel for the entire wilderness period. The provision was not temporary but generational. It ceased only when Israel entered the promised land and ate its produce (Joshua 5:12).
36. A parenthetical measurement note: an omer equals one-tenth of an ephah (approximately 2.3 liters or 2 quarts). The narrator provides the conversion for readers unfamiliar with the measurement.

Summary: At Rephidim, Israel quarrels over thirst; God provides water from the rock at Horeb. The Amalekites attack, and Israel prevails while Moses holds up the staff — when his arms tire, Aaron and Hur support them. God declares perpetual war against Amalek.

What Makes This Remarkable: The place-names Massah and Meribah ('testing' and 'quarreling') memorialize Israel's failure in the geography itself. The staff that struck the Nile in judgment (7:20) now strikes the rock in provision — judgment-tools repurposed as grace-tools. The battle scene with Moses's raised hands (vv11-12) creates one of Scripture's most vivid images of intercession: when the hands are lifted, Israel prevails; when they drop, Amalek prevails. The altar name YHWH Nissi ('The LORD is my banner,' v15) becomes a divine title.

Translation Friction: We rendered vayyarev ('quarreled,' v2) to distinguish it from the grumbling (vayyillonu) of chapter 16 — the Hebrew escalates from complaint to legal dispute. The phrase massah umerivah ('testing and quarreling,' v7) we transliterated in the notes because these become fixed theological place-names referenced throughout Scripture. God standing 'on the rock at Horeb' (v6) places the divine presence at the point of provision — we rendered this literally to preserve the spatial theology.

Connections: The water from the rock is cited in Psalm 78:15-16; 105:41; and 1 Corinthians 10:4 (where Paul identifies the rock with Christ). The battle with Amalek is referenced in Deuteronomy 25:17-19 and 1 Samuel 15. Moses's supported arms anticipate the intercessory posture throughout Scripture (1 Timothy 2:8).

¹The whole congregation of the sons of Israel set out from the wilderness of Sin, traveling by stages as the LORD commanded, and they camped at Rephidim. But there was no water for the people to drink. ²The people quarreled with Moses and said, "Give us water to drink." Moses said to them, "Why do you quarrel with me? Why do you test the LORD?" ³But the people thirsted for water there, and they grumbled against Moses and said, "Why did you bring us up out of Egypt — to kill us and our children and our livestock with thirst?" ⁴Moses cried out to the LORD, saying, "What shall I do with this people? A little more and they will stone me." ⁵The LORD said to Moses, "Go on ahead of the people and take with you some of the elders of Israel. Take in your hand the staff with which you struck the Nile, and go. ⁶I will stand before you there on the rock at Horeb. Strike the rock, and water shall come out of it, and the people will drink." Moses did so in the sight of the elders of Israel. ⁷He called the name of the place Massah and Meribah, because of the quarreling of the sons of Israel and because they tested the LORD, saying, "Is the LORD among us or not?" ⁸Then Amalek came and fought with Israel at Rephidim. ⁹Moses said to Joshua, "Choose men for us and go out to fight Amalek. Tomorrow I will stand on the top of the hill with the staff of God in my hand." ¹⁰So Joshua did as Moses told him and fought with Amalek, while Moses, Aaron, and Hur went up to the top of the hill. ¹¹Whenever Moses held up his hand, Israel prevailed, and whenever he lowered his hand, Amalek prevailed. ¹²But Moses's hands grew heavy, so they took a stone and put it under him, and he sat on it. Aaron and Hur held up his hands, one on each side, so that his hands remained steady until the sun went down. ¹³Joshua overwhelmed Amalek and his people with the edge of the sword. ¹⁴The LORD said to Moses, "Write this as a memorial in a book and recite it in the hearing of Joshua: I will utterly blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven." ¹⁵Moses built an altar and called its name "The LORD Is My Banner," ¹⁶saying, "A hand is on the throne of the LORD! The LORD will have war with Amalek from generation to generation."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. No water at Rephidim — the third provision crisis (bitter water at Marah, 15:23; hunger in Sin, 16:3; now thirst at Rephidim). Each crisis tests whether Israel will trust the God who has already provided.
2. The people 'quarrel' (vayyarev) and 'test' (tenassun) the LORD. Both verbs will be memorialized in the place-names Meribah ('quarreling') and Massah ('testing'). Moses reframes the complaint: they are not arguing with him but testing God.

3. The accusation repeats the Egypt-death formula from 16:3: 'You brought us out to kill us.' The complaint grows more specific — now livestock and children are named. Fear sharpens the rhetoric.
4. 'A little more and they will stone me' (od me'at usqaluni) — Moses's fear is physical, not hypothetical. The mob anger is so intense that Moses believes death is imminent. His appeal to God is raw: 'What shall I do?'
5. God's instruction uses the same staff that struck the Nile (7:20) — the instrument of Egypt's first plague becomes the instrument of Israel's provision. Judgment-tools are repurposed as grace-tools.
6. 'I will stand before you there on the rock' (hineni omed lefanekha sham al-hatsur) — God positions Himself on the rock before Moses strikes it. The divine presence is at the point of impact. When Moses strikes the rock, he strikes the place where God stands. The water comes from God's presence, not merely from stone.
7. Massah ('testing') and Meribah ('quarreling') — the place-names memorialize Israel's worst moment: questioning whether God is present. 'Is the LORD among us or not?' (hayesh YHWH beqirbenu im-ayin) is the existential question of the wilderness. It will be answered definitively at Sinai and in the tabernacle.
8. Amalek attacks the vulnerable — Deuteronomy 25:17-18 specifies that they struck the stragglers at the rear. This is Israel's first military engagement as a free people.
9. Joshua (Yehoshua, 'the LORD saves') appears for the first time by name. He is assigned military command while Moses takes the intercessory position on the hill. The battle is fought on two fronts: sword below, prayer above.
10. Aaron and Hur accompany Moses — the prophetic, priestly, and civic leadership together on the hilltop. Hur's identity is not specified here; tradition identifies him as Miriam's son (possibly from the tribe of Judah).
11. 'Whenever Moses held up his hand, Israel prevailed' — the raised hands are not magical but intercessory. Moses's posture embodies Israel's dependence on God: when the mediator lifts his hands, God's power flows through the battle. When the hands drop, the power ebbs.
12. 'Moses's hands grew heavy' (uydei Mosheh kevedim) — the adjective kaved ('heavy') echoes Pharaoh's heavy heart and Moses's heavy mouth. The same root that described obstacles throughout Exodus now describes the prophet's physical limitation. Aaron and Hur become the support structure — one man cannot sustain intercession alone. The word emunah ('steady, faithful') describes Moses's supported hands, linking physical steadiness to covenantal faithfulness.
13. Joshua 'overwhelmed' (vayyachalosh) Amalek — the verb chalash means to weaken, disable, defeat. The victory is attributed to Joshua's sword and Moses's hands working together.
14. 'Write this as a memorial in a book' (ketov zot zikkaron bassefer) — the first divine command to write in the Bible. The memory of Amalek's attack — and God's promise to blot out Amalek — is to be preserved in written form. Written memory outlasts oral tradition.
15. 'The LORD Is My Banner' (YHWH Nissi) — the altar name declares God as Israel's military standard. A nes ('banner, standard') was a rallying point in battle — the flag around which soldiers gathered. God is the point around which Israel's warfare organizes.
16. 'From generation to generation' (midor dor) — the conflict with Amalek is not a one-time event but an ongoing reality. The LORD's war against Amalek extends across all generations until Amalek is blotted out.

Summary: Jethro, the Midianite priest and Moses's father-in-law, hears what God has done, brings Zipporah and Moses's sons to the wilderness, blesses the LORD, and offers sacrifices. He then advises Moses to delegate judicial authority to qualified leaders at multiple levels.

What Makes This Remarkable: A non-Israelite priest acknowledges YHWH's supremacy — 'Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods' (v11). Jethro's confession forms a counterpoint to Pharaoh's rejection. His administrative counsel (vv17-23) introduces the principle that wise governance is not opposed to divine calling — practical wisdom from an outsider restructures Israel's leadership. Moses's two sons' names together summarize his biography: Gershom ('sojourner there') encodes alienation, Eliezer ('my God is help') encodes rescue.

Translation Friction: We rendered Jethro's title kohen Midyan as 'priest of Midian' without specifying which deity he served, since the text does not clarify and his conversion scene in v11 suggests a genuine theological turn. The verb shillach describing Moses sending Zipporah back (v2) is the same verb used for Pharaoh releasing Israel — we noted this wordplay. Jethro's qualifications for judges — 'capable men who fear God, trustworthy, who hate dishonest gain' (v21) — we rendered with accessible English rather than technical legal vocabulary.

Connections: Jethro's administrative structure reappears in Deuteronomy 1:9-18. His confession echoes Rahab's in Joshua 2:9-11. The judicial delegation principle shapes Israel's governance through the period of the judges. The shared meal between Jethro and Israel's elders (v12) anticipates the covenant meal of 24:11.

¹Jethro, the priest of Midian and Moses's father-in-law, learned about everything God had done for Moses and for Israel His people — how the LORD had brought Israel out of Egypt. ²Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, had taken Zipporah, Moses's wife, after Moses had sent her back, ³along with her two sons, one of whom was named Gershom — for Moses had said, "I have been a sojourner in a foreign land" — ⁴and the other was named Eliezer — "for the God of my father was my help and delivered me from the sword of Pharaoh." ⁵Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, came with Moses's sons and his wife to Moses in the wilderness where he was camped, at the mountain of God. ⁶He sent word to Moses, "I, your father-in-law Jethro, am coming to you with your wife and her two sons." ⁷Moses went out to meet his father-in-law and bowed down and kissed him. They asked each other about their welfare and went into the tent. ⁸Moses told his father-in-law all that the LORD had done to Pharaoh and to the Egyptians for Israel's sake, all the hardship that had befallen them on the way, and how the LORD had delivered them. ⁹Jethro rejoiced over all the good that the LORD had done for Israel, in that He had delivered them from the hand of the Egyptians. ¹⁰Jethro said, "Blessed be the LORD, who has delivered you from the hand of the Egyptians and from the hand of Pharaoh, and who has delivered the people from under the hand of the Egyptians. ¹¹Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods, because in this matter where they dealt arrogantly, He was above them." ¹²Then Jethro, Moses's father-in-law, brought a burnt offering and sacrifices to God, and Aaron and all the elders of Israel came to eat bread with Moses's father-in-law before God. ¹³The next day Moses sat to judge the people, and the people stood around Moses from morning until evening. ¹⁴When Moses's father-in-law saw all that he was doing for the people, he said, "What is this that you are doing for the people? Why do you sit alone, and all the people stand around you from morning until evening?" ¹⁵Moses said to his father-in-law, "Because the people come to me to inquire of God. ¹⁶When they have a dispute, they come to me, and I judge between one person and another, and I make known the statutes of God and His instructions." ¹⁷Moses's father-in-law said to him, "What you are doing is not good. ¹⁸You will surely wear out, both you and this people who are with you, for the thing is too heavy for you. You are not able to do it alone. ¹⁹Now listen to my voice; I will give you counsel, and God be with you. You shall represent the people before God and bring their cases to God. ²⁰You shall teach them the statutes and the instructions and make known to them the way in which they must walk and the work that they must do. ²¹Moreover, look for able men from all the people — men who fear God, who are trustworthy and who hate dishonest gain — and appoint them as leaders over thousands, over hundreds, over fifties, and over tens. ²²Let them judge the people at all times. Every major matter they shall bring to you, but every minor matter they shall decide themselves. So it will be easier for you, and they will bear the burden with you. ²³If you do this, and God so commands you, then you will be able to endure, and all this people also will go to their place in peace." ²⁴Moses listened to the voice of his father-in-law and did all that he had said. ²⁵Moses chose able men out of all Israel and made them heads over the people — leaders of thousands, of hundreds, of fifties, and of tens. ²⁶They judged the people at all times. The difficult cases they brought to Moses, but every minor matter they decided themselves. ²⁷Then Moses let his father-in-law depart, and he went away to his own land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Jethro's visit bridges the exodus and Sinai narratives. A Midianite priest — a non-Israelite — hears what God has done and comes to acknowledge YHWH. The outsider's response to the exodus forms a counterpoint to Pharaoh's rejection.
2. Moses had 'sent back' (shilluchehah) Zipporah at some point — the details are not given. The verb shillach is the same used for Pharaoh releasing Israel. The personal cost of the mission is noted but not elaborated.
3. Gershom's name ('sojourner there') encodes Moses's exile identity. Even the deliverer was once a displaced person.
4. Eliezer ('my God is help') encodes deliverance — named for God's protection of Moses from Pharaoh. The two sons' names together summarize Moses's biography: alienation (Gershom) and rescue (Eliezer).
5. 'The mountain of God' (har ha'Elohim) — Horeb/Sinai. Jethro comes to the same mountain where Moses saw the burning bush. The geography of revelation recurs.

6. The formal announcement of arrival follows ancient Near Eastern protocol — a visiting dignitary sends word before appearing.
7. Moses's greeting — going out, bowing, kissing — shows deep respect for his father-in-law. The verb hishtachavah ('bowed down') is the same word used for worship. Familial reverence mirrors the posture of divine reverence.
8. Moses recounts the entire exodus narrative to Jethro — the plagues, the hardships, the deliverance. This is the first retelling of the exodus to an outsider, and it is given to a Midianite priest. The story is not kept within Israel.
9. Jethro's joy (vayyichad) is the response the exodus was designed to produce: recognition of YHWH's power and goodness. What Pharaoh refused, Jethro embraces.
10. 'Blessed be the LORD' (barukh YHWH) — a Midianite priest blesses the God of Israel. The ecumenical reach of the exodus is visible here: YHWH's acts produce worship from outside the covenant community.
11. 'Now I know that the LORD is greater than all gods' (attah yadati ki-gadol YHWH mikkol-ha'elohim) — the knowledge formula, previously applied to Pharaoh and Egypt, is now fulfilled by Jethro. A pagan priest reaches the conclusion that ten plagues were designed to teach: YHWH is supreme. The phrase 'where they dealt arrogantly' (badavar asher zadu) refers to Egypt's arrogance — God's judgment precisely matched their sin.
12. Jethro offers sacrifices to God — a non-Israelite performing worship at the mountain of God, eating bread with Aaron and the elders 'before God' (lifnei ha'Elohim). This meal anticipates the covenant meal of chapter 24 but includes a Midianite. The boundaries of worship are remarkably permeable at this stage.
13. Moses as sole judge — sitting from morning to evening hearing disputes. The description of exhausting one-man governance sets up Jethro's intervention.
14. Jethro identifies the problem with the directness of a seasoned leader: 'What you are doing is not good.' The same phrase (lo-tov) echoes Genesis 2:18 ('It is not good for the man to be alone'). Solitary leadership, like solitary existence, is structurally inadequate.
15. Moses explains his role: mediator between the people and God. The people come 'to inquire of God' (lidrosh Elohim) — the verb darash means 'to seek, to inquire, to consult.' Moses functions as the access point between Israel and divine instruction.
16. Moses serves three functions: arbitrator of disputes, communicator of divine statutes (chuqqim), and teacher of divine instruction (torot, plural of torah). The triple role is unsustainable for one person.
17. 'Not good' (lo-tov haddavar) — Jethro's practical wisdom identifies organizational failure. The Midianite priest contributes to Israel's governance structure. Wisdom is not limited to the covenant community.
18. 'Too heavy for you' (kaved mimmekha haddavar) — the word kaved ('heavy') echoes throughout Exodus. Moses's burden is 'heavy' as Pharaoh's heart was 'heavy' and Moses's hands were 'heavy.' The solution is delegation, not endurance.
19. Jethro's counsel begins: Moses should focus on two things — representing the people before God and bringing their cases to God. Everything else can be delegated.
20. Teaching is Moses's primary role: statutes (chuqqot), instructions (torot), 'the way they must walk' (haderekh yelkhu vah), and 'the work they must do' (hamma'aseh asher ya'asun). Four categories of instruction that anticipate the Sinai legislation.
21. The leadership qualifications are character-based: able (chayil — capable, competent), God-fearing (yir'ei Elohim), trustworthy (anshei emet — men of truth), and incorruptible (son'ei vatsa — hating dishonest gain). Competence without character is excluded.
22. The tiered system — thousands, hundreds, fifties, tens — distributes both authority and burden. Major matters escalate to Moses; minor matters are resolved locally. The principle is subsidiarity: decisions made at the lowest effective level.
23. 'Go to their place in peace' (al-meqomo yavo veshalom) — Jethro's counsel aims at shalom for the entire community. The word shalom here means not merely absence of conflict but well-functioning communal order.
24. 'Moses listened' (vayyishma Mosheh) — the deliverer who spoke for God to Pharaoh now listens to a Midianite's practical advice. Humility is accepting wisdom from unexpected sources.
25. Implementation is immediate and complete. Moses selects, appoints, and structures — the organizational reform takes effect before Sinai.
26. The system works: difficult cases rise to Moses, routine matters are handled locally. The narrative confirms Jethro's wisdom through successful operation.
27. Jethro departs to his own land. The Midianite priest who blessed YHWH, offered sacrifices, and restructured Israel's governance returns home. His contribution is preserved in the Torah and implemented permanently.

Summary: Israel arrives at Sinai in the third month. God declares them a 'kingdom of priests and a holy nation,' the people consecrate themselves, and on the third day God descends on the mountain in fire, smoke, and thunder. Boundaries are set; only Moses may approach.

What Makes This Remarkable: The singular verb vayyichan ('he camped') for the plural subject 'Israel' (v2) is grammatically striking — at Sinai, Israel becomes one entity. Rashi noted: 'like one man with one heart.' The eagle-wing image (v4) combines power with nurture: the nesher (griffon vulture) is the largest soaring bird in the region. The destination is not land but God Himself: 'I brought you to Myself.' The covenant offer in v5-6 — 'kingdom of priests, holy nation' (mamlekheth kohanim vegoy qadosh) — defines Israel's identity for all subsequent Scripture.

Translation Friction: We rendered mamlekheth kohanim as 'kingdom of priests' rather than 'priestly kingdom,' preserving the construct-chain order and the implication that every member of the nation has priestly access. The word segullah ('treasured possession,' v5) has no exact English equivalent — it denotes a king's personal treasure, distinct from general crown property. We used 'treasured possession' and expanded in notes. The theophany vocabulary (thunder, lightning, thick cloud, trumpet blast) required careful handling to avoid making it sound like mere weather.

Connections: The 'kingdom of priests' declaration is cited in 1 Peter 2:9 and Revelation 1:6; 5:10. The theophany imagery recurs at Elijah's Horeb experience (1 Kings 19:11-12), in Isaiah 6, and in Hebrews 12:18-21. The three-day preparation anticipates other three-day patterns: Jonah 1:17, Hosea 6:2, and the resurrection narratives.

¹In the third month after the sons of Israel had gone out of the land of Egypt, on that very day, they came to the wilderness of Sinai. ²They set out from Rephidim and came to the wilderness of Sinai, and they camped in the wilderness. Israel camped there before the mountain. ³Moses went up to God, and the LORD called to him from the mountain, saying, "Thus you shall say to the house of Jacob and tell the sons of Israel: ⁴'You yourselves have seen what I did to the Egyptians, and how I carried you on eagles' wings and brought you to Myself. ⁵Now then, if you will indeed obey My voice and keep My covenant, you shall be My treasured possession among all the peoples, for all the earth is Mine. ⁶You shall be to Me a kingdom of priests and a holy nation.' These are the words that you shall speak to the sons of Israel." ⁷Moses came and called the elders of the people and set before them all these words that the LORD had commanded him. ⁸The entire people responded in unison, "Everything the LORD has spoken, we will do." Then Moses brought the people's answer back to the LORD. ⁹The LORD said to Moses, "I am coming to you in a thick cloud, so that the people may hear when I speak with you and may also believe in you forever." Moses told the words of the people to the LORD. ¹⁰The LORD said to Moses, "Go to the people and consecrate them today and tomorrow. Let them wash their garments ¹¹and be ready for the third day, for on the third day the LORD will come down on Mount Sinai in the sight of all the people. ¹²You shall set boundaries for the people all around, saying, 'Be careful not to go up on the mountain or touch its edge. Whoever touches the mountain shall surely be put to death. ¹³No hand shall touch him, but he shall be stoned or shot through. Whether beast or man, he shall not live.' When the ram's horn sounds a long blast, they may go up to the mountain." ¹⁴Moses went down from the mountain to the people and consecrated the people, and they washed their garments. ¹⁵He said to the people, "Be ready for the third day. Do not go near a woman." ¹⁶On the morning of the third day there were thunders and lightning and a thick cloud on the mountain and a very loud trumpet blast, so that all the people in the camp trembled. ¹⁷Moses brought the people out of the camp to meet God, and they took their stand at the foot of the mountain. ¹⁸Mount Sinai was wrapped in smoke because the LORD had descended on it in fire. The smoke of it went up like the smoke of a kiln, and the whole mountain trembled violently. ¹⁹As the sound of the trumpet grew louder and louder, Moses spoke and God answered him in thunder. ²⁰The LORD came down on Mount Sinai, to the top of the mountain. the LORD called Moses to the top of the mountain, and Moses went up. ²¹The LORD said to Moses, "Go down and warn the people, lest they break through to the LORD to look, and many of them perish. ²²Even the priests who come near to the LORD must consecrate themselves, or the LORD will break out against them." ²³Mo ses said to the LORD, "The people cannot come up to Mount Sinai, for You Yourself warned us, saying, 'Set boundaries around the mountain and consecrate it.'" ²⁴The LORD said to him, "Go down, and then come up — you and Aaron with you. But the priests and the people must not break through to come up to the LORD, or He will break out against them." ²⁵So Moses went down to the people and told them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'The third month' (bachodesh hashelishi) — Israel arrives at Sinai exactly three months after the exodus. The third day (v11, 16) will bring the theophany. The number three structures the approach: third month, third day, threefold preparation.
2. 'Israel camped there before the mountain' (vayyichan-sham Yisra'el neged hahar) — the singular verb (vayyichan, 'he camped') is noteworthy: the plural 'sons of Israel' are treated grammatically as a unity. At Sinai, Israel becomes one entity facing one God. Rashi noted this: 'like one man with one heart.'
3. 'House of Jacob... sons of Israel' (beit Ya'aqov... benei Yisra'el) — the dual address may distinguish the whole community (house of Jacob) from the covenant heirs (sons of Israel), or it may be poetic parallelism. The traditional reading is that 'house of Jacob' includes the women and children.
4. 'Eagles' wings' (kanfei nesharim) — the image of God carrying Israel like an eagle carries its young is tender and powerful. The nesher is likely a griffon vulture, not a bald eagle — the largest soaring bird in the region. Deuteronomy 32:11 will elaborate the image. The destination is not merely the promised land but God Himself: 'I brought you to Myself' (va'avi etkhem elai).
5. 'My treasured possession' (segullah) — a word meaning personal property of special value, a royal treasure. Israel is not merely God's people but His prized possession. 'If you will obey My voice and keep My covenant' (im-shamo'a tishme'u beqoli ushmartem et-beriti) — the conditional clause makes the covenant relationship bilateral: God has already acted (the exodus); now Israel must respond with obedience. The covenant is offered, not imposed.
6. 'A kingdom of priests and a holy nation' (mamlekhet kohanim vegoy qadosh) — one of the most consequential declarations in the Bible. Israel's vocation is priestly: mediating between God and the nations. And they are qadosh — set apart for God's purposes. The entire nation, not just a clerical class, is called to holiness.
7. Moses mediates: God speaks to Moses, Moses speaks to the elders, the elders represent the people. The chain of communication is formal and structured.
8. 'All that the LORD has spoken we will do' (kol asher-dibber YHWH na'aseh) — Israel's collective acceptance of the covenant before hearing its terms. The verb na'aseh ('we will do') precedes the giving of the law. Commitment comes before content — a pattern that will be repeated and intensified in 24:7 ('we will do and we will hear').
9. 'A thick cloud' (av he'anan) — the cloud of divine presence (cf. 13:21) now intensifies. God comes in cloud to simultaneously reveal and conceal — Israel hears God's voice but does not see God's form. The cloud mediates between divine fullness and human limitation.
10. Consecration (qiddesh) involves ritual preparation — washing garments symbolizes inner purification. The people must be set apart before they can encounter the God who is set apart.
11. 'The LORD will come down' (yered YHWH) — the verb yarad ('descend') is the same word used for God's descent in 3:8 ('I have come down to deliver'). At the exodus, God descended to rescue; at Sinai, God descends to covenant. Both are acts of divine condescension — God bridging the gap between heaven and earth.
12. Boundaries (gevul) around the mountain create sacred space. The mountain is not inherently holy; it becomes holy because God's presence makes it so. The death penalty for trespass is not arbitrary but proportional: unmediated contact with absolute holiness is fatal for finite creatures.
13. 'When the ram's horn sounds' (bimshokh hayyovel) — the yovel ('ram's horn,' later the word for 'jubilee') signals transition. Its long blast will mark the moment when the boundary is lifted and approach is permitted. Sacred time is marked by sound.
14. Moses descends and consecrates the people — the prophetic mediator purifies the community for divine encounter. Washing garments is not mere hygiene but ritual symbolism: the people put on readiness.
15. 'Do not go near a woman' — temporary sexual abstinence as part of consecration for theophany. The instruction addresses the men directly and reflects ancient Near Eastern preparation for encountering the divine. The restriction is temporary and situational, not a statement about sexuality's inherent impurity.
16. 'Thunders and lightning and a thick cloud' (qolot uvera'qim ve'an'an kaved) — the Sinai theophany is the most overwhelming divine manifestation in the Torah. The elements — sound (qolot, literally 'voices'), light (beraqim, 'lightning'), cloud (anan), and trumpet (qol shofar) — combine to create an experience that overwhelms every sense. The people tremble (vayyecherad) — not casual nervousness but existential dread before the holy.
17. 'To meet God' (liqrat ha'Elohim) — Moses leads the people out to a meeting. The word liqrat implies moving toward someone who is coming toward you. God descends; Israel approaches. The encounter is mutual, though radically asymmetric.

18. 'The LORD descended in fire' (yarad alav YHWH ba'esh) — fire is the primary element of Sinai theophany, as it was at the burning bush (3:2). The mountain smokes 'like the smoke of a kiln' (ke'ashan hakkivshan) — the same kilns where Israel made bricks in Egypt. The instrument of slavery becomes the image of divine glory.
19. 'Moses spoke and God answered in thunder' (Mosheh yedabber veba'Elohim ya'anenu veqol) — the most intimate verse of the theophany. Moses speaks, God answers. The dialogue is personal and direct. The word qol ('voice, thunder') blurs the line between speech and natural phenomenon — God's voice is the storm.
20. God descends to the mountaintop and summons Moses upward. The spatial drama is precise: God comes down; Moses goes up. They meet at the summit. The mountain becomes the axis between heaven and earth.
21. The warning against breaking through (pen-yehersu) reveals both divine holiness and divine concern. God does not want to destroy the curious; He warns them away from what would kill them. The holiness that demands distance is the same holiness that provides warning.
22. Even the priests — those closest to God's service — must consecrate themselves additionally. Proximity to God does not reduce the need for preparation; it increases it.
23. Moses's objection is procedural: boundaries have already been set (v12). The repetition of the warning underscores its gravity — God double-checks that the people understand the danger.
24. Aaron is invited up with Moses — the priestly and prophetic leaders together at the summit. But the people and the other priests must remain below. Access to God is real but regulated.
25. Moses descends to deliver the final warning. The narrative is now positioned for the giving of the Ten Commandments in chapter 20. Every preparation is complete; the people are consecrated, the boundaries are set, the mountain burns, and God is present.

Summary: God speaks the Ten Commandments (Aseret HaDibberot, 'The Ten Words') directly to all Israel, beginning with self-identification as the God who liberated them. The commandments move from exclusive loyalty to God through Sabbath observance to right treatment of neighbor. The people, terrified, ask Moses to mediate.

What Makes This Remarkable: The preamble 'I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of Egypt' (v2) establishes that every commandment flows from a prior act of grace — liberation first, then law. The Hebrew chesed ('faithful love,' v6) appears inside the Decalogue itself, set against judgment: three-to-four generations of consequence versus thousands of generations of loyal love. The word qanna ('jealous,' v5) describes passionate exclusive devotion — the jealousy of a covenant partner, not petty envy. The people's fear (v18-19) and request for Moses to mediate establishes the prophetic office.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew devarim ('words') gives the Decalogue its Hebrew name — these are 'words' (declarations of relationship), not merely 'commandments' (legal statutes). We preserved 'commandments' in common references for familiarity but noted the distinction. The phrase al-panai ('before Me/in My presence,' v3) we rendered 'besides Me' to capture the exclusivity claim. The prohibition lo tirtsach (v13) specifically means 'do not murder' (unlawful killing), not 'do not kill' (all killing); we rendered it 'you shall not murder.'

Connections: The Decalogue is restated in Deuteronomy 5:6-21 with significant Sabbath-motivation changes. Jesus summarizes the commandments in Matthew 22:37-40. Paul cites specific commandments in Romans 13:9. The covenant structure (preamble, stipulations, witnesses) parallels ancient Near Eastern suzerainty treaties. The people's terror at God's voice (v18-19) is cited in Hebrews 12:18-21.

1God spoke all these words, saying, 2"I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. 3You must not have any other gods besides Me. 4You shall not make for yourself a carved image, or any likeness of anything that is in heaven above, or that is on the earth beneath, or that is in the water under the earth. 5You shall not bow down to them or serve them, for I, the LORD your God, am a jealous God, visiting the iniquity of the fathers on the children to the third and fourth generation of those who hate Me, 6but showing faithful love to thousands of those who love Me and keep My commandments. 7You shall not take the name of the LORD your God in vain, for the LORD will not hold guiltless anyone who takes His name in vain. 8Keep the Sabbath day in remembrance and set it apart as holy. 9Six days you shall labor and do all your work, ¹⁰but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. On it you shall not do any work — you, or your son, or your daughter, your male servant, or your female servant, or your livestock, or the sojourner who is within your gates. ¹¹For in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, the sea, and all that is in them, and rested on the seventh day. Therefore the LORD blessed the Sabbath day and made it holy. ¹²Honor your father and your mother, so that your days may be long in the land that the LORD your God is giving you.

¹³You shall not murder.

You shall not commit adultery.

You shall not steal.

You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor.

¹⁴You shall not covet your neighbor's house. You shall not covet your neighbor's wife, or his male servant, or his female servant, or his ox, or his donkey, or anything that belongs to your neighbor." ¹⁵All the people perceived the thunder and the lightning flashes and the sound of the trumpet and the mountain smoking. When the people saw it, they trembled and stood at a distance. ¹⁶They said to Moses, "You speak to us, and we will listen; but do not let God speak to us, or we will die." ¹⁷Moses said to the people, "Do not be afraid, for God has come to test you, so that the fear of Him may be before you, that you may not sin." ¹⁸The people stood at a distance, while Moses drew near to the thick darkness where God was. ¹⁹The LORD said to Moses, "Thus you shall say to the sons of Israel: 'You yourselves have seen that I have spoken with you from heaven. ²⁰You shall not make gods of silver alongside Me, nor shall you make for yourselves gods of gold. ²¹An altar of earth you shall make for Me, and you shall sacrifice on it your burnt offerings and your peace offerings, your sheep and your oxen. In every place where I cause My name to be remembered, I will come to you and bless you. ²²If you make for Me an altar of stone, you shall not build it of cut stones, for if you wield your chisel on it, you profane it. ²³You shall not go up by steps to My altar, so that your nakedness is not exposed on it."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'God spoke all these words' (vaydabber Elohim et kol-haddevarim ha'elleh) — the Ten Commandments are introduced as God's own direct speech. The word devarim ('words') gives the Hebrew name for the Decalogue: Aseret HaDibberot ("The Ten Words"). These are not commandments in the sense of legal statutes but declarations of covenant relationship.
2. The preamble identifies the speaker and establishes the relationship: 'I am the LORD your God' (anokhi YHWH Elohekha). Before any command is given, identity is declared. The exodus is the credential: 'who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery.' Every commandment that follows is grounded in this prior act of liberation. Obedience is response to grace, not the condition for it.
3. 'No other gods before Me' (lo yihyeh-lekha elohim acherim al-panai) — the phrase al-panai literally means 'before My face' or 'in My presence.' The commandment does not deny other gods exist (that is a later theological development); it demands exclusive loyalty. In a world of many gods, Israel's God demands undivided allegiance.
4. The prohibition of carved images (pesel) extends to 'any likeness' (kol-temunah) of anything in the three-tiered cosmos: heaven, earth, and water below the earth. The scope is comprehensive — no physical representation of deity is permitted. The prohibition targets not all art but specifically images made for worship.
5. 'A jealous God' (El qanna) — the word qanna describes passionate, exclusive devotion. It is the jealousy of a husband for his wife, not petty envy. God's jealousy is the emotional counterpart of the first commandment: exclusive loyalty demanded because exclusive love is given. The generational consequence ('visiting iniquity') describes patterns of sin that perpetuate through family systems, not arbitrary punishment of innocent descendants.
6. 'Showing steadfast love to thousands' (ve'oseh chesed la'alafim) — chesed appears in the Decalogue itself. The contrast is stark: iniquity is visited to the third and fourth generation, but chesed extends to thousands. Judgment is limited; covenant love is boundless. This asymmetry defines God's character: mercy outweighs wrath by orders of magnitude.
7. 'Take the name of the LORD your God in vain' (tissa et-shem YHWH Elohekha lashshav) — the verb nasa means 'to lift up, to carry, to bear.' To 'bear' God's name in vain (lashshav, 'for emptiness, for falsehood, for nothing') means to invoke God's name without substance — in false oaths, empty worship, or as a tool of manipulation. Israel bears God's name; to bear it emptily is to misrepresent God Himself.
8. 'Remember the Sabbath day to keep it holy' (zakhor et-yom hashabbat leqaddesho) — the verb zakhor ('remember') is active, not passive. Remembering the Sabbath means structuring life around it, not merely noting its existence. 'To keep it holy' (leqaddesho) means to set it apart — to treat this day as belonging to God in a way the other six do not.

9. Six days of labor are affirmed — work is not a curse but a mandate. The Sabbath rest is meaningful only against the backdrop of productive labor. The creation pattern (Genesis 1-2:3) governs human life: work, then rest.
10. The Sabbath rest extends to every member of the household — sons, daughters, servants, livestock, and even the resident foreigner (ger). No one in Israel's community is excluded from rest. The sojourner provision is remarkable: even non-Israelites within Israel's territory receive the gift of Sabbath. The commandment has a social-justice dimension: those with power over others must grant them rest.
11. The theological basis is creation: God made everything in six days and rested on the seventh. The Sabbath is not arbitrary but cosmic — it mirrors the rhythm God established at the foundation of the world. Human rest participates in divine rest. The verb vayyinnach ('rested') means 'ceased and was refreshed.'
12. 'Honor your father and your mother' (kabbed et-avikha ve-et-immekha) — the verb kabbed is from the root kavod ('glory, weight, honor'). To honor parents is to treat them as weighty — as significant, substantial, deserving of respect. This is the only commandment with a promise attached: 'so that your days may be long.' The commandment bridges the God-directed commands (1-4) and the neighbor-directed commands (6-10): parents stand at the intersection of divine authority and human relationship.
13. Four brief commandments in rapid succession: no murder (tirtsach — intentional killing, not all killing), no adultery (tin'af), no stealing (tignov), no false witness (ta'aneh... ed shaqer). Each is a two-word prohibition in Hebrew, compressed to the minimum. The brevity is deliberate: these are absolute, non-negotiable boundaries. The verb ratsach is specifically murder — unlawful, intentional killing — not capital punishment or warfare, which the Torah separately addresses.
14. 'You shall not covet' (lo tachmod) — the final commandment addresses the interior life: desire, not action. Chamad means to desire, to take delight in, to want what belongs to another. The commandment moves from external behavior (murder, adultery, theft) to internal disposition (covetousness). The list — house, wife, servant, ox, donkey, 'anything' — is comprehensive, ending with kol asher lere'ekha ('anything that belongs to your neighbor').
15. 'The people perceived the thunder' (ve'khol-ha'am ro'im et-haqqolot) — the verb ra'ah ('to see') is used for perceiving sound: they 'saw' the thunder. The synesthetic language suggests an experience so overwhelming it crossed sensory boundaries. The theophany is not merely heard but perceived with the whole person.
16. 'Do not let God speak to us, or we will die' (ve'al-yedabber immanu Elohim pen-namut) — the people's terror leads them to request mediation. They want Moses as buffer between themselves and the direct voice of God. This request establishes the prophetic office: Israel will hear God's word through Moses (and later prophets) rather than directly. The people's fear, while understandable, represents a step back from the intimacy God offered.
17. Moses reframes the fear: God's coming is 'to test you' (lenassot etkhem) and 'so that the fear of Him may be before you' (uv'avur tihyeh yir'ato al-peneikhem). There are two kinds of fear: the terror that drives away (which Moses says to reject) and the reverent awe that prevents sin (which Moses says to embrace). The distinction between fear-as-terror and fear-as-reverence is foundational to biblical wisdom.
18. 'Moses drew near to the thick darkness where God was' (uMosheh niggash el-ha'arafel asher-sham ha'Elohim) — while the people retreat, Moses advances. The arafel ('thick darkness, deep gloom') is where God dwells. God's presence is simultaneously light to the trusting and darkness to the afraid. Moses enters the darkness; the people stand at a distance.
19. 'You have seen that I have spoken with you from heaven' (atem re'item ki min-hashamayim dibbarti immakhem) — God reminds Israel that the theophany came from heaven, not from any earthly image. The prohibition of images (v20) flows directly from the nature of the revelation: God spoke from heaven, invisible. Any image would reduce the heavenly God to an earthly object.
20. 'Gods of silver... gods of gold' (elohei khsef... elohei zahav) — the materials are significant. Silver and gold are the very materials Israel took from Egypt (12:35-36). The wealth of liberation must not become the material of idolatry. What God provided for the tabernacle (25:3) must not be redirected to false worship.
21. 'An altar of earth' (mizbach adamah) — the simplest possible altar. No ornamentation, no craftsmanship — just soil shaped into a platform. The altar law emphasizes accessibility and humility: worship does not require architectural grandeur. 'In every place where I cause My name to be remembered' (bekhol-hamaqom asher azkir et-shemi) — God chooses the place of worship, not the worshiper.
22. 'If you wield your chisel on it, you profane it' (ki charbkha henafta aleha vatechalelehah) — the tool (cherev, also meaning 'sword') profanes the stone. Instruments of human violence and craftsmanship must not shape God's altar. The altar is natural, uncut, unhewn — shaped by God's creation, not human artifice.
23. The prohibition of steps prevents exposure of the priest's body — a practical modesty provision. The altar is approached by a ramp, not by stairs. Every detail of worship protects the dignity of both the worshiper and the act of worship.

Summary: The Book of the Covenant begins with case-law (mishpatim) governing servitude, personal injury, property damage, and the rights of the vulnerable. A Hebrew bonded worker goes free in the seventh year. The lex talionis ('eye for eye') establishes proportional justice.

What Makes This Remarkable: The very first case-law concerns the eved ivri ('Hebrew bonded worker'), embedding liberation at the foundation of Israel's legal code — a people freed from slavery must regulate power over others. The six-year servitude limit with seventh-year release mirrors the Sabbath pattern; even labor relationships carry a built-in horizon of freedom. The lex talionis (vv23-25) is not a license for vengeance but a ceiling on punishment: the penalty must not exceed the injury.

Translation Friction: We rendered mishpatim as 'case-rulings' rather than 'judgments' or 'ordinances' to distinguish these casuistic laws ('if... then...') from the apodictic commands ('you shall not...') of the Decalogue. The word eved ('servant/slave') covers a wide semantic range; we chose 'bonded worker' for the Hebrew context of debt-servitude, distinguishing it from chattel slavery. The phrase 'eye for eye' (ayin tachat ayin, v24) we retained literally, noting in our translator notes that it establishes proportionality, not mandatory mutilation.

Connections: The seventh-year release connects to Deuteronomy 15:12-18 and Jeremiah 34:8-22. Jesus cites the lex talionis in Matthew 5:38-39. The goring ox laws (vv28-32) establish precedent for negligence liability throughout biblical and later legal traditions. The protection of the vulnerable (vv20-21, 26-27) operationalizes the exodus principle: because God freed you, you must not crush others.

¹These are the case-rulings that you are to place before them: ²When you acquire a Hebrew bonded worker, he will serve for six years, but in the seventh year he goes free without payment. ³If he entered alone, he leaves alone. If he is a married man, his wife leaves with him. ⁴If his master gave him a wife and she bore him sons or daughters, the woman and her children belong to her master, and the man leaves alone. ⁵But if the bonded worker clearly declares, 'I love my master, my wife, and my children — I will not go free,' ⁶then his master brings him before God, and brings him to the door or the doorpost, and his master pierces his ear with an awl — and he will serve him permanently. ⁷When a man sells his daughter as a bonded woman, she does not go free in the same way as the male workers do. ⁸If she is displeasing to her master who designated her for himself, he must allow her to be redeemed. He has no authority to sell her to a foreign people, since he has broken faith with her. ⁹If he designates her for his son, he must treat her according to the rights of daughters. ¹⁰If he takes another wife for himself, he must not reduce her food, her clothing, or her marital rights. ¹¹If he does not provide these three things for her, she goes free without any payment. ¹²Whoever strikes a person fatally must be put to death. ¹³But if he did not hunt him down, and God let it happen by his hand, then I will designate a place for you where he may flee. ¹⁴But when a man plots deliberately against his neighbor to kill him by treachery, you must take him even from my altar to die. ¹⁵Whoever strikes his father or his mother must be put to death. ¹⁶Whoever kidnaps a person — whether he has sold him or the victim is still found in his possession — must be put to death. ¹⁷Whoever curses his father or his mother must be put to death. ¹⁸When men quarrel and one strikes the other with a stone or with his fist, and the victim does not die but is confined to bed — ¹⁹if the victim gets up and walks around outside on his own support, the striker is cleared — only he must compensate for the lost time and pay fully for healing. ²⁰When a man strikes his male or female servant with a rod and the servant dies immediately, the master must be held accountable. ²¹However, if the servant survives a day or two, the master is not punished, because the servant is his financial investment. ²²When men are fighting and they injure a pregnant woman so that her children come out prematurely but no lasting harm occurs, the offender must pay a fine as the woman's husband demands, subject to judicial assessment. ²³But if lasting harm does occur, then the penalty is life for life, ²⁴an eye in place of an eye, a tooth in place of a tooth, a hand in place of a hand, a foot in place of a foot, ²⁵burn for burn, wound for wound, bruise for bruise. ²⁶If a man strikes the eye of his male or female servant and destroys it, he must release the servant as a free person in compensation for the eye. ²⁷And if he knocks out the tooth of his male or female servant, he must release the servant as a free person in compensation for the tooth. ²⁸When an ox gores a man or a woman to death, the ox must be stoned to death, and its meat must not be eaten, but the owner of the ox is clear. ²⁹But if the ox was known to gore in the past, and its owner was warned but did not keep it restrained, and it kills a man or a woman — the ox is stoned, and its owner also must be put to death. ³⁰If a ransom payment is imposed on him instead, he must pay whatever is set as the redemption price for his life. ³¹Whether it gores a son or a daughter, the same ruling applies to the owner. ³²If the ox gores a male or female servant, the owner must pay thirty silver shekels to the servant's master, and the ox is stoned. ³³When a man opens a cistern, or when a man digs a cistern and does not cover it, and an ox or a donkey falls into it — ³⁴the owner of the cistern must pay compensation — he returns silver to the animal's owner, and the dead animal becomes his. ³⁵When one man's ox fatally injures another man's ox, they sell the living ox and split the proceeds equally, and they also split the dead animal equally. ³⁶But if it was known that the ox was a habitual gorer and its owner did not keep it restrained, he must pay in full — ox for ox — and the dead animal becomes his. ³⁷When a man steals an ox or a sheep and slaughters it or sells it, he must pay five cattle in place of the ox and four sheep in place of the sheep.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word mishpatim ('case-rulings') signals a shift from the apodictic commands of the Decalogue to casuistic law — practical applications structured as 'if... then...' scenarios. These rulings operationalize the covenant principles of chapters 19–20 into daily community life.
2. The Hebrew eved ivri ('Hebrew bonded worker') refers to debt-servitude, not chattel slavery. The six-year limit with mandatory release in the seventh echoes the Sabbath pattern — even labor relationships must have a built-in horizon of liberation. A people who were themselves freed from bondage may not hold permanent power over their own.
3. The term begappo ('by his body alone') indicates arriving without dependents. The principle is that servitude cannot dissolve a marriage that existed before the labor arrangement — the prior family bond is protected.
4. This verse creates the painful tension that drives verses 5–6. A wife provided by the master during the service period remains part of the master's household. The law does not celebrate this arrangement — it sets up the moral weight of the choice that follows.
5. The emphatic Hebrew construction amor yomar ('saying, he says') stresses that this must be a deliberate, repeated declaration — not a coerced statement. The worker chooses permanent attachment out of love for his family, not fear. The verb 'love' (ahav) is the same word used for covenant loyalty throughout the Torah.
6. The phrase el ha'Elohim ('before God' or 'before the judges') indicates a formal legal proceeding with divine witness. Piercing the ear at the doorpost marks the threshold between freedom and chosen belonging. The ear — the organ of hearing — is marked because the worker heard the call to freedom but chose to stay. Le'olam ('permanently') in context means for the duration of his life, not eternally.
7. A father in extreme poverty might arrange his daughter into a household with the expectation that she would become a wife or concubine, not simply a laborer. The different release terms reflect this expectation — she has marriage protections rather than a simple six-year term, as the following verses specify.
8. The ketiv-qere (written/read) textual variant lo/lo shows an ancient scribal ambiguity: 'who did not designate her' vs. 'who designated her for himself.' Either reading yields the same protective result — if the arrangement fails, she cannot be trafficked to outsiders. The phrase bigdo-vah ('he broke faith with her') uses covenant-betrayal language.
9. Once designated for the son, the woman gains full daughter-status in the household. This elevates her from servant to family member with legal protections — she is not a disposable laborer but a recognized member of the household with rights.
10. The three obligations — she'erah (food/sustenance), kesutah (clothing), and onatah (conjugal rights) — form the baseline rights of a wife in Israelite law. Even if displaced by a second wife, these cannot be withdrawn. The term onatah specifically protects her sexual and relational dignity.
11. Failure to meet any of the three basic obligations — sustenance, clothing, marital rights — voids the arrangement entirely. The woman walks away with no debt owed. This functions as an ancient breach-of-contract remedy that protects the weaker party.
12. The shift from civil-family law to capital offenses marks a new section. The Hebrew uses the emphatic mot yumat ('dying, he shall die') to underscore the absolute nature of the penalty. The word ish ('person') here is generic — the law applies regardless of the victim's status or gender.
13. The verb tsadah ('hunted, stalked') distinguishes premeditated killing from accidental death. The phrase 'God let it happen by his hand' (ha'Elohim innah leyado) attributes the accidental convergence to divine providence, not the killer's intent. The cities of refuge (expanded in Numbers 35 and Deuteronomy 19) provide asylum from blood-avengers for unintentional killers.
14. The verb yazid ('acts presumptuously, boils over with intent') combined with ormah ('cunning, treachery') defines first-degree murder. Not even the sanctuary altar can protect a premeditated killer — sacred space does not override justice. This limits the asylum principle of verse 13 to genuinely accidental cases.

15. Physical violence against parents is treated as a capital offense because it violates the foundational social bond. The fifth commandment (honor your father and mother) is operationalized here at its extreme — the parental relationship represents covenant order in miniature.
16. This law criminalizes human trafficking with the death penalty. The verb ganav ('steal') when applied to a person means kidnapping. Both selling the victim and retaining him are equally capital offenses. This statute directly contradicts any attempt to use the Torah to justify chattel slavery.
17. The verb meqallel ('makes light of, curses') is the opposite of kavod ('give weight, honor'). Cursing parents invokes harm against the very people the commandments require one to honor. The pairing of this verse with verse 15 (striking parents) shows that both verbal and physical violations of parental honor carry identical weight.
18. The law now turns to non-fatal assault. The Hebrew distinguishes weapons (stone) from bare hands (fist), indicating that the degree of force matters less than the outcome. The phrase nafal lemishkav ('falls to his bed') describes incapacitation requiring recovery time.
19. Walking outside 'on his support' (al mish'anto) means the victim can move independently, even if with a cane. The attacker must cover two categories of damages: shivto ('his sitting' — lost wages/productivity) and medical costs (rappo yerappeh, 'healing, he shall heal'). This is one of the earliest recorded principles of compensatory damages in legal history.
20. The emphatic naqom yinnaqem ('avenging, he shall be avenged') means the servant's death is treated as a punishable homicide. In the surrounding ancient Near East, killing one's own slave generally carried no legal consequence. This law is extraordinary for its time — a master's authority over a servant does not include the right to kill.
21. The survival period creates a rebuttable presumption: if death is not immediate, the beating may not have been intended to kill. The rationale ki kaspo hu ('because he is his money') is not a moral endorsement but a legal observation — the master has economic self-interest against killing his own worker. Ancient readers understood this as a limitation on punishment, not an approval of violence.
22. The phrase veyatze'u yeladeyha ('her children come out') describes premature birth caused by the blow. The key term ason ('lasting harm, catastrophe') distinguishes between a premature but viable delivery and a fatal outcome. The husband sets the initial claim, but pelilim ('arbitrators, judges') determine the final amount — protecting against both undervaluation and extortion.
23. The lex talionis ('law of retaliation') begins here. Nefesh takhat nefesh ('life in place of life') sets the principle of proportional justice — the punishment must match the injury, no more and no less. Rabbinic tradition understood this as monetary compensation equivalent to the value of the injury, not literal physical mutilation.
24. The talionic formula establishes strict proportionality: an eye — not a life — for an eye. Far from endorsing brutality, this principle limits revenge. In surrounding cultures, a powerful man who lost an eye might kill the offender's entire family. Here, the injury itself sets the maximum penalty. The Talmud (Bava Kamma 83b–84a) interprets this as requiring monetary compensation equal to the injury.
25. The three additional pairs — burn (keviyyah), wound (petsa), bruise (khabburah) — extend the proportionality principle to every category of bodily harm. The descending severity (from burn to bruise) signals that even minor injuries carry legal consequences. No harm is too small for justice.
26. The talionic principle is applied to servants — but instead of 'eye for eye,' the remedy is freedom. The loss of a bodily member earns permanent liberation. This transforms the master-servant relationship: physical abuse literally costs the master his workforce. The verb shikhhatah ('destroyed, ruined it') implies irreversible damage.
27. Even a tooth — far less significant than an eye — triggers mandatory manumission. The rabbis extended this principle: any permanent bodily damage to a servant results in freedom. The consistent remedy of liberation for injury creates a powerful economic disincentive against abuse.
28. The goring-ox laws (verses 28–36) establish the principle of owner liability for known dangers. In the first-offense case, the ox is destroyed (stoned, not slaughtered — so its meat is forbidden), but the owner bears no criminal guilt since the danger was unknown. The prohibition against eating the carcass treats a man-killing animal as profane.
29. The critical distinction is prior knowledge: mitmol shilshom ('from yesterday and the day before') means the animal had a documented pattern. The owner was hu'ad ('testified to, warned') — a formal legal notice. Negligence after warning transforms accidental harm into a capital offense. This establishes the foundational legal concept of culpable negligence.
30. The kofer ('ransom, atonement payment') allows monetary substitution for the death penalty in negligence cases. The word pidyon ('redemption price') connects this to the broader theology of ransom — a life-price paid in place of forfeited life. The amount is set by judicial assessment, not the negligent owner.
31. The explicit mention of both son and daughter establishes that gender does not affect the legal outcome. A child's life carries the same judicial weight as an adult's, and a daughter's life the same as a son's — a statement of legal equality unusual in the ancient Near East.
32. Thirty shekels of silver was the standard valuation for a servant in the ancient Near East. This fixed amount means the owner cannot negotiate the price down. The ox is still destroyed, confirming that even a servant's death defiles the animal. Later tradition links this sum to Zechariah 11:12 and the betrayal price in the Gospels.
33. The bor ('pit, cistern') laws extend negligence liability to property hazards. Whether uncovering an existing pit or digging a new one, the duty to cover the danger rests on the person who created or exposed it. Ancient cisterns were deep enough to injure or kill livestock that fell in.

34. The negligent pit-owner pays the full value of the lost animal, then keeps the carcass. This prevents double recovery — the animal owner receives the market value but does not also keep the dead animal. The principle of offsetting damages is built into the remedy.
35. For a first-offense ox-on-ox incident, both owners share the loss equally — each gets half of both the surviving animal's sale price and the dead animal's salvage value. This splits the risk between both parties when no negligence can be proven.
36. When prior knowledge is established (the 'habitual gorer' pattern), the loss-sharing of verse 35 no longer applies. The negligent owner bears the entire cost: he pays for a replacement animal at full value and absorbs the dead animal's loss. Knowledge of danger plus failure to act equals full liability.
37. The higher penalty for an ox (fivefold vs. fourfold for sheep) reflects the greater economic loss — an ox is a capital asset used for plowing and transport, while a sheep's primary value is consumable (wool, meat). The differential penalty recognizes that theft of productive tools causes compounding economic damage beyond the animal's market price. This verse is Hebrew 21:37 but corresponds to KJV 22:1 due to differing chapter divisions.

Summary: Case-law continues with theft, property damage, restitution, seduction, sorcery, bestiality, and idolatry. The chapter then shifts to protecting the vulnerable — sojourners, widows, orphans — with God declaring 'I will surely hear their cry.' Interest on loans to the poor is forbidden.

What Makes This Remarkable: The self-defense statute (vv1-2) is one of the earliest codified in any legal system: killing an intruder at night incurs no bloodguilt, but killing in daylight does, because alternatives exist. Restitution is calculated at top quality (meitav, 'the best,' v5) — the negligent party cannot compensate with inferior goods. The theological grounding for protecting the sojourner is visceral: 'for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt' (v21). Israel's own trauma becomes the basis for its ethics.

Translation Friction: The word makhteret ('tunnel/breach-point,' v1) describes a thief breaking through mud-brick walls — we rendered it 'tunneling in' to convey the method. The phrase ein lo damim ('there is no blood for him,' v2) required paraphrase as 'there is no bloodguilt' to clarify the legal concept. The transition from property law to ethical command in vv21-27 was challenging to render smoothly, since the Hebrew shifts register from casuistic to direct address; we maintained the shift to preserve the text's own movement from courtroom to conscience.

Connections: The sojourner protection recalls Deuteronomy 10:18-19 and is cited in the prophets (Zechariah 7:10; Malachi 3:5). The prohibition of interest on loans to the poor (v25) is expanded in Leviticus 25:35-37 and Deuteronomy 23:19-20. The declaration 'I am compassionate' (v27) connects to the divine self-description of 34:6. The command not to revile God or curse a ruler (v28) is cited by Paul in Acts 23:5.

1If a thief is caught tunneling in and is struck and killed, there is no bloodguilt for his death. 2If the sun has risen on him, there is bloodguilt for killing him. The thief must make full restitution; if he has nothing, he is sold for his theft. 3If the stolen animal is actually found alive in his possession — whether ox, donkey, or sheep — he pays double. 4When a man lets his livestock graze in a field or vineyard, and sends his animal to feed in someone else's field, he must pay restitution from the best of his own field and the best of his own vineyard. 5When fire breaks out and catches in thornbushes, and stacked grain or standing grain or the entire field is consumed, the one who started the fire must make full restitution. 6When a man gives his neighbor money or goods for safekeeping, and they are stolen from the man's house — if the thief is caught, the thief pays double. 7If the thief is not caught, the owner of the house must come before God to determine whether he himself took his neighbor's property. 8In any case of disputed ownership — whether over an ox, a donkey, a sheep, a garment, or any lost item — where someone claims, 'This is mine,' the case of both parties comes before God. Whichever one God finds guilty must pay double to his neighbor. 9When a man gives his neighbor a donkey, an ox, a sheep, or any animal to look after, and it dies, or is injured, or is carried off, with no witness present — 10an oath before the LORD must stand between them both — that the custodian did not misappropriate his neighbor's property. The owner must accept this, and no restitution is owed. 11But if it is in fact stolen from his custody, he must pay restitution to its owner. 12If it was torn apart by a predator, let him bring the remains as evidence — he does not pay for the torn animal. ¹³When a man borrows an animal from his neighbor, and it is injured or dies while its owner is not present, the borrower must pay in full. ¹⁴If the owner was present with it, the borrower does not pay. If it was a hired animal, the loss is covered by the rental fee. ¹⁵When a man seduces a young woman who is not betrothed and sleeps with her, he must pay the bride-price and take her as his wife. ¹⁶If her father firmly refuses to give her to him, the man must still pay the full amount of the bride-price for young women. ¹⁷You must not let a sorceress live. ¹⁸Anyone who lies with an animal must be put to death. ¹⁹Whoever sacrifices to any god other than the LORD alone must be completely destroyed. ²⁰You must not mistreat or oppress a resident foreigner, because you yourselves were foreigners in the land of Egypt. ²¹You must not afflict any widow or orphan. ²²If you do afflict them in any way, and they cry out to me at all, I will surely hear their cry. ²³Then my anger will burn hot, and I will kill you by the sword — and your own wives will become widows and your own children orphans. ²⁴If you lend money to any of my people — the poor among you — you must not act as a creditor toward him. You must not charge him interest. ²⁵If you take your neighbor's garment as collateral, you must return it to him before the sun sets. ²⁶For it is his only covering — it is his garment for his skin. What else would he sleep in? And when he cries out to me, I will hear, because I am compassionate. ²⁷You must not curse God, and you must not curse a leader among your people. ²⁸You must not hold back your harvest fullness or your flowing produce. The firstborn of your sons you must give to me. ²⁹Do the same with your cattle and your flock: for seven days the young animal stays with its mother; on the eighth day you give it to me. ³⁰You are to be people set apart as holy to me. You must not eat the flesh of an animal torn by predators in the field — throw it to the dogs.

1. The makhteret ('tunnel, breach point') describes a thief breaking through mud-brick walls at night. The phrase ein lo damim ('there is no blood for him') means the homeowner bears no legal guilt for killing an intruder in darkness — the threat is presumed lethal when you cannot see whether the intruder is armed. This is one of the earliest codified self-defense statutes.
2. Daylight changes the legal calculus: once you can see the intruder, you can assess whether lethal force is necessary. Killing a thief in broad daylight creates bloodguilt because non-lethal options exist. The thief's penalty is full restitution or, if insolvent, being sold into debt-servitude — the same bondage system regulated in 21:2–6.
3. The emphatic himmatse timmatse ('finding, it is found') stresses certainty of evidence. When the stolen animal is recovered alive and intact, the penalty drops to twofold — much less than the four- or fivefold penalty when the animal has been slaughtered or sold (21:37). Recovery of the property reduces the damages owed.
4. The verb bi'er ('to graze, to consume') creates a wordplay: the man who let his animal bi'er (consume) another's field pays from his meitav (best). Restitution is calculated at top quality, not average — the negligent party cannot pay with inferior produce. This protects the victim from receiving substandard compensation.
5. Fire liability follows the chain of causation: even if the fire spread through thorns (an intermediate cause), the person who lit it bears full responsibility for everything destroyed. The list — stacked grain, standing grain, the field itself — covers all stages of agricultural production. Fire in an arid climate could devastate an entire community's food supply.
6. The deposit (piqqadon) laws begin here and run through verse 14. These regulate bailment — entrusting property to another person's care. When the thief is identified, liability falls on the actual criminal, not the custodian. The double payment matches the standard restitution for recovered theft.
7. When the thief is unknown, suspicion naturally falls on the custodian. The phrase el ha'Elohim ('before God') indicates either a divine oath at the sanctuary or a judicial proceeding — the custodian must swear his innocence under divine witness. The phrase shalakh yado ('extended his hand') is an idiom for misappropriation.
8. This verse generalizes the deposit principle into a universal dispute-resolution procedure. The word pesha ('violation, breach of trust') covers any contested property claim. The divine tribunal (Elohim) renders the verdict — human judges act as God's agents in civil disputes. Double payment serves both as penalty and deterrent.
9. This section addresses animal bailment — custody of living property. Three scenarios are listed: death, injury (nishbar, 'broken'), and seizure (nishbah, 'captured, driven off'). The critical factor is ein ro'eh ('no one seeing') — when there is no independent witness, the case requires a divine oath to resolve.
10. The shevu'at YHVH ('oath of the LORD') is the most solemn form of sworn testimony in Israelite law. Swearing falsely by God's name invokes divine judgment on the perjurer. When no human evidence exists, the oath functions as the final legal instrument — the owner must accept it, and the case is closed.

11. If it can be established that the animal was stolen while under the custodian's care, the custodian is liable — he should have secured the animal against theft. The oath defense of verse 10 only covers cases where the custodian acted in good faith. Proven theft from custody implies negligent safeguarding.
12. A wild animal attack (taraf, 'torn apart') is an act beyond human control. The custodian demonstrates his innocence by producing physical evidence — the mangled remains. This early forensic principle requires tangible proof of the claim. The word terefa ('torn carcass') later becomes a key term in dietary law for meat rendered unfit by violent death.
13. Borrowing (she'al) carries a higher standard of care than paid custody. The borrower benefits solely from the arrangement, so he bears full liability for any loss. The owner's absence (be'alav ein immo) removes any possibility that the owner's own negligence contributed to the damage.
14. When the owner is present, he shares responsibility for the animal's safety, so the borrower is not solely liable. For hired animals, the risk of loss is already factored into the rental price (ba biskharo, 'it came with its fee'). These distinctions show ancient Israel developing sophisticated categories of commercial liability.
15. The verb yefattech ('entice, persuade') describes seduction, not coercion — rape is addressed separately in Deuteronomy 22:25–27. The mohar ('bride-price') is the payment to the father's household that formalizes marriage. The law holds the man accountable for the sexual relationship by requiring him to formalize the union and bear its economic obligations.
16. The emphatic ma'en yema'en ('refusing, he refuses') gives the father unilateral veto power over the marriage. Even when the father blocks the union, the seducer still owes the full bride-price — he cannot escape financial responsibility by being rejected. The woman's family is compensated regardless of the marriage outcome.
17. The feminine form mekhashshafah ('sorceress, practitioner of harmful magic') uses the root k-sh-f, which refers to manipulative sorcery intended to harm others — not herbal medicine or midwifery. The feminine form may reflect the social reality that women were the primary practitioners of this type of magic in the ancient Near East, though Deuteronomy 18:10 applies the prohibition to both genders.
18. Sexual contact with animals violates the created order of distinct kinds established in Genesis 1. The death penalty places this alongside murder and kidnapping in severity. The prohibition appears repeatedly in Leviticus 18:23 and 20:15–16, where it is called tevel ('perversion, confusion of categories').
19. The verb yokhoram ('put under the ban, devoted to destruction') is from the root kh-r-m, denoting total consecration to God through destruction. Idolatrous sacrifice receives the same penalty as the banned items of holy war. The phrase bilti laYHVH levaddo ('except to the LORD alone') reinforces the exclusive covenant claim of the first commandment.
20. The two verbs toneh ('mistreat, exploit') and tilkhatshenu ('crush, oppress') cover both social abuse and economic exploitation. The ger ('resident foreigner') is someone living permanently among Israelites without clan protection. The motivation clause — 'you were foreigners in Egypt' — grounds ethical obligation in lived memory. Israel's own suffering under foreign rule becomes the moral foundation for how they treat outsiders.
21. The almanah ('widow') and yatom ('orphan, fatherless') represent people who have lost their primary economic protector in a patriarchal society. The verb te'annun ('afflict, cause to suffer') covers any exploitation of their vulnerable status. The kol ('any') makes the prohibition absolute — there are no exceptions.
22. Three emphatic infinitive constructions pile up: anneh te'anneh ('afflicting, you afflict'), tsa'oq yits'aq ('crying out, they cry out'), shamo'ah eshma ('hearing, I will hear'). God personally guarantees that the cries of the vulnerable reach divine ears. This is the same verb (tsa'aq) used for Israel's cry under Pharaoh — God heard then, and God hears now.
23. The punishment mirrors the crime with devastating precision: those who afflict widows and orphans will themselves create widows and orphans from their own families. This measure-for-measure principle (middah keneged middah) appears throughout the Torah. God does not merely prohibit — God threatens to become the avenger of the powerless.
24. The phrase et ammi et he'ani immakh ('my people, the poor one beside you') makes poverty personal: the borrower is 'my people' to God and 'beside you' to the lender. The word nosheh ('creditor, debt-collector') describes aggressive collection tactics. Neshekh ('interest,' literally 'a bite') reveals how the Torah views lending at interest to the vulnerable — as a predatory act that devours the borrower.
25. The outer garment (salmah) served as a blanket for sleeping in the cold Judean nights. Taking it as a pledge for a daytime loan was permissible, but keeping it overnight would leave the debtor exposed to the elements. The law prioritizes human survival over creditor rights — the debt is real, but so is the borrower's body.
26. God's self-identification as khannun ('compassionate, gracious') grounds the entire lending ethic in divine character. The rhetorical question 'What would he sleep in?' forces the creditor to see through the debtor's eyes. The same cry-and-hear pattern from the widow/orphan passage (v. 22) reappears — God positions himself as the guarantor of the poor person's rights.
27. The word Elohim here likely means 'God' rather than 'judges,' since the parallel with nasi ('leader, prince') creates a pair: divine authority and human authority. The verb teqalleh ('make light of, curse') is the same root used in verse 17 (cursing parents). Respect for legitimate authority — divine and communal — is a covenant obligation.
28. The unusual words mele'atekha ('your fullness') and dim'akha ('your flow, your tears') likely refer to grain at full ripeness and fresh-pressed juice or oil. Not delaying means giving the first portion promptly — before you consume or sell the rest. The firstborn-son obligation (redeemed by substitution per Exodus 13:13) declares that all fertility belongs to God first.

- 29. The seven-day waiting period serves both practical and theological purposes — newborn animals need their mother's milk to survive the first week, and the eight-day timing echoes circumcision (Genesis 17:12). The Sabbath rhythm permeates even animal husbandry: seven days of nature, then consecration on the eighth.
- 30. The chapter's closing verse reframes all the preceding laws under one identity statement: anshei qodesh ('people of holiness'). Holiness is not an abstract status but a lived distinction visible even in diet. Torn flesh (terefa) carries the violence of its death — consuming it blurs the boundary between orderly covenant life and the chaos of predation. The dogs, as unclean scavengers, receive what holy people may not eat.

Summary: The Book of the Covenant concludes with justice provisions (no false reports, no mob justice, impartiality), the three annual pilgrimage festivals, sabbatical year rest for the land, and God's promise to send an angel to guide Israel into the promised land.

What Makes This Remarkable: The principle 'Do not follow the majority to do evil' (v2) is remarkable for any legal code — truth is not determined by vote. The obligation to return even an enemy's lost animal (v4-5) subordinates private hostility to communal responsibility. The three festivals — Unleavened Bread, Harvest, and Ingathering (vv14-17) — structure Israel's year around gratitude. The prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (v19) has generated centuries of interpretation and shapes Jewish dietary practice to this day.

Translation Friction: We rendered lo-tihyeh acharei-rabbim lera'ot as 'you shall not follow the majority to do evil,' preserving the legal force while making the principle accessible. The phrase shema shav ('false report,' v1) — literally 'empty/vain hearing' — targets both fabrication and circulation of falsehood; we noted both dimensions. The kid-in-mother's-milk prohibition (v19) we rendered literally, as the Hebrew gives no explanation and every interpretive expansion risks overreach.

Connections: The three festivals connect to Deuteronomy 16:1-17. The sabbatical year (v10-11) is expanded in Leviticus 25. The angel-guide promise (vv20-23) relates to 32:34-33:3. The hornet (v28) reappears in Deuteronomy 7:20 and Joshua 24:12. The gradual dispossession principle (v30) shapes the conquest narrative in Joshua.

¹You shall not spread a false report. Do not join hands with a wicked person to be a malicious witness. ²You shall not follow the majority to do evil, nor shall you testify in a dispute by siding with the majority to pervert justice. ³Nor shall you show partiality to a poor person in his dispute. ⁴If you encounter your enemy's ox or his donkey going astray, you shall surely return it to him. ⁵If you see the donkey of one who hates you lying under its burden, you shall not leave him with it. You shall surely help him with it. ⁶You shall not pervert the justice due to your poor in their disputes. ⁷Keep far from a false charge, and do not kill the innocent and righteous, for I will not acquit the guilty. ⁸You shall not take a bribe, for a bribe blinds the clear-sighted and subverts the cause of the righteous. ⁹You shall not oppress a sojourner. You know the heart of a sojourner, for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt. ¹⁰For six years you shall sow your land and gather in its produce, ¹¹but in the seventh year you shall let it rest and lie fallow, so that the poor of your people may eat. What they leave, the wild animals may eat. You shall do the same with your vineyard and your olive grove. ¹²Six days you shall do your work, but on the seventh day you shall rest, so that your ox and your donkey may have rest, and the son of your female servant and the sojourner may be refreshed. ¹³Pay attention to everything I have said to you. Do not invoke the name of other gods; let it not be heard on your lips. ¹⁴Three times a year you shall celebrate a feast to Me. ¹⁵You shall keep the Feast of Unleavened Bread. For seven days you shall eat unleavened bread, as I commanded you, at the appointed time in the month of Aviv, for in it you came out of Egypt. No one shall appear before Me empty-handed. ¹⁶You shall keep the Feast of Harvest, of the firstfruits of your labor, of what you sow in the field. You shall keep the Feast of Ingathering at the end of the year, when you gather in your produce from the field. ¹⁷Three times a year all your males shall appear before the Lord GOD. ¹⁸You shall not offer the blood of My sacrifice with anything leavened, and the fat of My festival shall not remain until morning. ¹⁹The best of the firstfruits of your ground you shall bring to the house of the LORD your God. You shall not boil a young goat in its mother's milk. ²⁰"I am sending an angel before you to guard you on the way and to bring you to the place I have prepared. ²¹Pay attention to him and listen to his voice. Do not rebel against him, for he will not forgive your transgression, for My name is in him. ²²But if you carefully listen to his voice and do all that I say, then I will be an enemy to your enemies and an adversary to your adversaries. ²³For My angel will go before you and bring you to the land of the Amorites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Canaanites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites, and I will annihilate them. ²⁴You shall not bow down to their gods or serve them, nor do as they do. You shall utterly demolish them and smash their sacred pillars. ²⁵You shall serve the LORD your God, and He will bless your bread and your water, and I will remove sickness from your midst. ²⁶No woman in your land shall miscarry or be barren. I will fulfill the number of your days. ²⁷I will send My terror ahead of you and throw into confusion every people you encounter, and I will make all your enemies turn their backs to you. ²⁸I will send the hornet ahead of you, and it will drive out the Hivites, the Canaanites, and the Hittites before you. ²⁹I will not drive them out before you in a single year, or the land would become desolate and the wild animals would multiply against you. ³⁰Little by little I will drive them out before you, until you have increased enough to take possession of the land. ³¹I will set your borders from the Sea of Reeds to the Sea of the Philistines, and from the wilderness to the Euphrates, for I will give the inhabitants of the land into your hand, and you shall drive them out before you. ³²You shall not make a covenant with them or with their gods. ³³They shall not dwell in your land, lest they make you sin against Me; for if you serve their gods, it will surely be a snare to you."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Book of the Covenant continues with justice provisions. 'False report' (shema shav) — literally 'empty/vain hearing.' The prohibition targets both the one who fabricates the report and the one who receives and spreads it. Justice depends on truthful information.
2. 'Do not follow the majority to do evil' (lo-tihyeh acharei-rabbim lera'ot) — a remarkable principle: majority opinion does not determine justice. Truth is not a vote. The legal system must resist mob pressure, even democratic mob pressure.
3. Partiality toward the poor is prohibited alongside partiality toward the rich (Leviticus 19:15). Justice requires impartiality, not favoritism in either direction. Compassion for the poor is commanded elsewhere; in court, only facts and law matter.
4. 'Your enemy's ox' — the obligation to return lost property extends even to your personal enemy. The law subordinates private enmity to communal obligation. You cannot let a neighbor's animal suffer because you dislike the neighbor.
5. The obligation extends to helping an enemy's overloaded donkey. The Hebrew is emphatic: azov ta'azov immo ('you shall surely help him'). Personal hatred does not suspend the duty of compassion toward animals and the shared social order.
6. 'Do not pervert justice due to your poor' (lo tatteh mishpat evyonkha) — the verb natah ('to pervert, to turn aside') means bending the legal process away from its straight course. The poor are vulnerable to legal exploitation precisely because they lack resources to advocate for themselves.
7. 'I will not acquit the guilty' (lo atsiq rasha) — God Himself guarantees the ultimate standard of justice. Human courts may fail; the divine court will not. The prohibition against killing the innocent (naqi vetsaddiq) uses two words: naqi ('clean, innocent of the charge') and tsaddiq ('righteous, in the right').
8. 'A bribe blinds the clear-sighted' (hashchohad ye'avver piqqechim) — the word piqqeach means 'open-eyed, seeing clearly.' Even the perceptive become blind when money enters the judicial process. The bribe does not merely influence; it literally impairs moral vision.
9. 'You know the heart of a sojourner' (atem yeda'tem et-nephesh hagger) — literally 'you know the nephesh (soul/inner life) of the stranger.' Israel's own experience of alienation in Egypt is the basis for empathy. Compassion is not abstract principle but remembered experience. This is experiential ethics: because you suffered, you must not inflict.
10. The agricultural sabbatical (shemittah) cycle parallels the weekly Sabbath: six years of work, one year of rest. The land itself receives Sabbath.
11. The purpose of the fallow year is social justice: 'that the poor of your people may eat.' The land's rest benefits the landless. What grows naturally during the sabbatical belongs to anyone who needs it — a redistribution built into the agricultural calendar.
12. The weekly Sabbath rest is restated with an emphasis on those who cannot demand rest for themselves: the ox, the donkey, the servant's son, the sojourner. Sabbath protects the vulnerable from exploitation by those with power over them.
13. 'Do not invoke the name of other gods' (veshem elohim acherim lo tazkiru) — the verb zakar ('mention, invoke, remember') means that the names of foreign gods should not even be spoken in worship or oath-taking. Covenant loyalty excludes all competitors even at the verbal level.
14. Three annual pilgrimage festivals (shalosh regalim, literally 'three feet/times') structure Israel's year. The festivals are agricultural and theological simultaneously: they mark both harvest cycles and covenant events.

15. The Feast of Unleavened Bread (Chag HaMatzot) is the first of three. Its connection to the exodus (the month of Aviv, the departure from Egypt) is stated as the reason for observance. 'No one shall appear before Me empty-handed' (velo-yera'u fanai reqam) — worship and offering are inseparable.
16. The Feast of Harvest (Chag HaQatzir, later called Shavuot/Pentecost) celebrates the firstfruits of the wheat harvest. The Feast of Ingathering (Chag HaAsif, later called Sukkot/Tabernacles) marks the final harvest at year's end. The three festivals map Israel's relationship with God onto the agricultural year.
17. 'All your males shall appear before the Lord GOD' (yera'eh kol-zekhurchah el-penei ha'Adon YHWH) — the verb yera'eh can be read as 'appear' (niph'al) or 'see' (qal). The pilgrimage is both appearing before God and seeing God — a mutual encounter at the appointed festivals.
18. Leaven is excluded from the sacrifice, maintaining the Passover principle (ch12). The fat (chelev) of the festival offering must be consumed the same night — nothing sacred may be treated as leftover.
19. 'You shall not boil a young goat in its mother's milk' (lo-tevashel gedi bachalev immo) — this prohibition, repeated three times in the Torah (here, 34:26, Deuteronomy 14:21), became the basis for the Jewish dietary separation of meat and dairy. In its original context, it likely prohibits a specific Canaanite fertility ritual that perverts the relationship between nourishment (milk) and death (slaughter).
20. 'I am sending an angel before you' (hineh anokhi sholeach mal'akh lefanekha) — the angelic guide transitions the chapter from law to promise. God's angel will lead Israel to the promised land. The angel's authority is grounded in the fact that God's name is 'in him' (v21).
21. 'My name is in him' (ki shemi beqirbo) — the angel bears God's own name, giving him divine authority. The phrase suggests an intimate identification between the angel and God Himself. The angel cannot forgive transgression because forgiveness is a divine prerogative that this angel exercises.
22. Obedience to the angel's voice is obedience to God's voice. The conditional promise — 'if you listen... I will be an enemy to your enemies' — ties Israel's military security to covenant faithfulness.
23. The standard six-nation list appears again (cf. 3:8, 17; 13:5). The verb kichad ('annihilate') is severe — the promise includes the displacement of the current inhabitants. This language must be read within the covenant framework where the land grant follows the pattern of Genesis 15:16 (the iniquity of the Amorites reaching its fullness).
24. The prohibition of foreign worship is comprehensive: no bowing, no serving, no imitating. Sacred pillars (matstsevoth) are to be smashed — the physical objects of Canaanite worship must be destroyed, not repurposed.
25. 'He will bless your bread and your water' (uverakh et-lachmekha ve'et-meimekha) — covenant obedience produces material blessing. The basics of sustenance (bread, water) are under God's direct provision. Health ('I will remove sickness') is also covenantal.
26. Fertility and longevity are covenant blessings: no miscarriage, no barrenness, full lifespan. The blessings mirror the curses of Deuteronomy 28 — covenant faithfulness and covenant violation produce opposite outcomes.
27. 'My terror' (et-eimati) — God sends fear ahead of the military advance. The conquest is won psychologically before it is won militarily. The verb hamam ('confuse, throw into confusion') describes divinely induced panic.
28. The 'hornet' (tsir'ah) — whether literal (swarms of insects) or metaphorical (terror, military advance, or even Egypt itself), the effect is the gradual displacement of the inhabitants. God uses natural means under supernatural direction.
29. 'Not in a single year' — the gradual pace of the conquest is explained: too-rapid depopulation would leave the land ecologically unmanageable. Wolves and other wild animals would overrun empty territory. God's strategy accounts for ecological sustainability.
30. 'Little by little' (me'at me'at) — the repeated word emphasizes gradualism. Conquest is not instantaneous but incremental. Patience is built into the divine plan.
31. The borders — Sea of Reeds to the Mediterranean, wilderness to the Euphrates — describe the maximum extent of the promised land, roughly realized under David and Solomon (1 Kings 4:21). This is the Abrahamic land grant restated in its fullest geographic terms.
32. 'You shall not make a covenant with them' (lo tikhrot lahem velohehem berit) — the verb karat ('cut') is the standard covenant-making verb. Israel must not enter into binding agreements with peoples whose religious practices would compromise covenant loyalty.
33. The chapter closes with a warning: coexistence with Canaanite worship will become a 'snare' (moqesh). The metaphor is a bird-trap — once triggered, escape is difficult. Religious compromise begins subtly and ends in captivity.

Summary: The covenant is ratified in blood: Moses builds an altar with twelve pillars, reads the Book of the Covenant, and throws blood on the people. The elders ascend and see God, eating and drinking in His presence. Moses enters the cloud on Sinai for forty days.

What Makes This Remarkable: The people's unanimous response 'All that the LORD has spoken we will do' (na'aseh, v3, 7) is the covenant acceptance that defines Israel as a constituted community. The blood ceremony (vv6-8) divides the blood between the altar (representing God) and the people — both parties are bound. The elders' vision of God (v10-11) includes the astonishing detail of 'something like a pavement of sapphire, clear as the sky' (livnat hassappir) beneath God's feet, yet 'God did not lay His hand on them' — they survived the encounter. They ate and drank in God's presence.

Translation Friction: We rendered na'aseh as 'we will do' throughout, preserving the active commitment. The phrase livnat hassappir ('pavement of sapphire,' v10) posed a challenge — livnah could mean 'brick-work' or 'pavement,' and sappir may be sapphire or lapis lazuli. We chose 'pavement of sapphire' for its luminous quality. The combination of theophany and meal (v11) is theologically extraordinary; we rendered it straightforwardly, letting the strangeness speak for itself.

Connections: The covenant blood ceremony (v8) is cited in Hebrews 9:18-20, where Jesus's blood establishes a new covenant. The seventy elders anticipate Numbers 11:16-25. Moses's forty days on the mountain (v18) parallel Elijah's forty days to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8) and Jesus's forty days in the wilderness (Matthew 4:2). The sapphire vision connects to Ezekiel 1:26 and 10:1.

¹Then He said to Moses, "Come up to the LORD — you and Aaron, Nadab and Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel — and worship from a distance. ²Moses alone shall come near to the LORD; the others shall not come near, and the people shall not come up with him." ³Moses came and told the people all the words of the LORD and all the rules. And all the people answered with one voice and said, "All the words that the LORD has spoken we will do." ⁴Moses wrote down all the words of the LORD. He rose early in the morning and built an altar at the foot of the mountain and set up twelve pillars for the twelve tribes of Israel. ⁵He sent young men of the sons of Israel, and they offered burnt offerings and sacrificed peace offerings of oxen to the LORD. ⁶Moses took half the blood and put it in basins, and half the blood he threw against the altar. ⁷Then he took the Book of the Covenant and read it in the hearing of the people. They said, "All that the LORD has spoken we will do, and we will obey." ⁸Moses took the blood and threw it on the people and said, "Behold the blood of the covenant that the LORD has made with you in accordance with all these words." ⁹Then Moses went up with Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy of the elders of Israel, ¹⁰and they saw the God of Israel. Under His feet was something like a pavement of sapphire, as clear as the sky itself. ¹¹He did not stretch out His hand against the nobles of the sons of Israel. They beheld God, and they ate and drank. ¹²The LORD said to Moses, "Come up to Me on the mountain and stay there, and I will give you the tablets of stone with the law and the commandment that I have written for their instruction." ¹³Moses rose with Joshua his attendant, and Moses went up to the mountain of God. ¹⁴He said to the elders, "Wait here for us until we return to you. Aaron and Hur are with you. Whoever has a dispute, let him go to them." ¹⁵Then Moses went up on the mountain, and the cloud covered the mountain. ¹⁶The glory of the LORD settled on Mount Sinai, and the cloud covered it for six days. On the seventh day He called to Moses out of the midst of the cloud. ¹⁷The appearance of the glory of the LORD was like a consuming fire on the top of the mountain in the sight of the sons of Israel. ¹⁸Moses entered the cloud and went up on the mountain. And Moses was on the mountain forty days and forty nights.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The invitation to approach God is carefully tiered: Moses comes nearest, Aaron and the leaders worship from a distance, the people do not come up at all. Access to God is real but graduated — proximity corresponds to calling and consecration.

2. 'Moses alone shall come near' (uniggash Mosheh levaddo) — the prophetic mediator has unique access. The distinction between Moses and everyone else — including Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and the seventy elders — establishes the singular authority of the Mosaic office.
3. 'All the people answered with one voice' (vayyya'an kol-ha'am qol echad) — the unanimity is emphatic: one voice (qol echad). Israel's covenant acceptance is corporate and consensual. 'All the words that the LORD has spoken we will do' (kol-haddevarim asher-dibber YHWH na'aseh) — the commitment precedes the formal ratification ceremony. Israel says 'we will do' before the blood is thrown.
4. Moses writes down God's words — the first written Torah. The altar and twelve pillars create a physical covenant space: the altar represents God, the twelve pillars represent the twelve tribes. The covenant ceremony has both parties symbolically present.
5. 'Young men' (na'arei benei Yisra'el) serve as the sacrificial assistants — this is before the Levitical priesthood is established. Any qualified Israelite can offer sacrifice at this stage. The burnt offerings (olot) represent total dedication; the peace offerings (shelamim) represent fellowship — the two together express both surrender and communion.
6. The blood is divided in half: half on the altar (representing God's side), half reserved for the people (v8). The splitting of the blood creates two parties who will be bound by the same blood. The covenant is literally a blood bond — two parties joined by one life-substance.
7. 'We will do and we will obey' (na'aseh venishma) — the most debated phrase in Jewish covenant theology. Israel commits to doing (na'aseh) before hearing fully (nishma). Action precedes understanding. The willingness to obey comes before the complete comprehension of what obedience entails. This is the structure of covenant faith: trust first, then learn.
8. 'The blood of the covenant' (dam habberit) — Moses throws the other half of the blood on the people, declaring that this blood seals the covenant between God and Israel. The altar received its half; the people receive theirs. Both parties are now covered by the same blood. Jesus will echo this phrase at the Last Supper: 'This is my blood of the covenant' (Matthew 26:28; Mark 14:24).
9. The ascent begins: Moses, Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, and seventy elders climb the mountain. The number seventy echoes the seventy persons who entered Egypt (Genesis 46:27) and the seventy nations of Genesis 10 — a representative number suggesting completeness.
10. 'They saw the God of Israel' (vayyir'u et Elohei Yisra'el) — one of the most extraordinary statements in the entire Bible. Human beings see God. The description focuses not on God's form but on what is beneath His feet: 'something like a pavement of sapphire' (ke'ma'aseh livnat hassappir). The sapphire pavement evokes the blue sky — God's footstool is the firmament itself. The description is restrained and awestruck: the narrator does not describe God directly but only the space around His feet.
11. 'He did not stretch out His hand against the nobles' (ve'el-atselei benei Yisra'el lo shalach yado) — the expected consequence of seeing God is death (cf. 33:20). The fact that these leaders survive is presented as remarkable. They 'beheld God' (vayyechezu et-ha'Elohim) — the verb chazah means 'to see in vision, to perceive.' And they ate and drank — a covenant meal in the divine presence. This is the most intimate human-divine encounter in the Torah: seeing God and sharing food before Him.
12. God summons Moses higher still — above the elders' level, into the cloud itself. The purpose: to receive the tablets of stone (luchot ha'even). The law and commandment have been spoken; now they will be written by God's own hand.
13. Joshua accompanies Moses partway — he is called Moses's 'attendant' (mesharet), a word that later describes priestly service. Joshua's role as Moses's closest aide foreshadows his eventual succession.
14. Aaron and Hur are left in charge — the same two who held Moses's arms during the Amalek battle (17:12). The appointment of temporary judges ensures governance continuity during Moses's absence. This arrangement will fail catastrophically in chapter 32.
15. 'The cloud covered the mountain' (vaykhas he'anan et-hahar) — the verb kasah ('cover') suggests total envelopment. The mountain disappears into the cloud of divine presence.
16. 'The glory of the LORD settled on Mount Sinai' (vayyishkon kevod-YHWH al-har Sinai) — the verb shakan ('settled, dwelt, tabernacled') is the root of Shekinah. God's glory takes up residence on the mountain. The six-day covering followed by the seventh-day call mirrors the creation pattern: God prepares and then speaks. The seventh day is the day of divine voice.
17. 'Like a consuming fire' (ke'esh okheleth) — the kavod of God is visible as fire. The same element that appeared in the burning bush (3:2), led Israel as a pillar (13:21), and descended on Sinai (19:18) is now described as 'consuming.' Kavod is not safe to approach — it is fire that devours. Yet Moses enters it.
18. Moses enters the cloud and remains forty days and forty nights. The number forty marks a period of complete preparation or testing (cf. the flood, 40 days; the wilderness, 40 years; Jesus's temptation, 40 days). The prophet disappears into God's presence — invisible to Israel below — to receive the instructions for the tabernacle.

Summary: God instructs Moses to receive voluntary contributions for the tabernacle and describes the first furnishings: the ark of the covenant overlaid with gold, the mercy seat with two cherubim, the table of the Presence with its bread, and the golden lampstand.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The tabernacle is funded by willing hearts — 'from every person whose heart moves him' (v2) — not compulsory taxation. The word terumah ('contribution,' from rum, 'to lift up') describes something lifted from one's possessions and given to God. The materials plundered from Egypt (12:35-36) now find their purpose as the raw material for God's dwelling. The mercy seat (kapporet, from kipper, 'to atone') is described before the ark it covers — the place of atonement is the theological center of the entire structure.*

Translation Friction: *We rendered terumah as 'contribution' rather than 'offering' to avoid confusion with sacrificial offerings. The kapporet (v17) is traditionally 'mercy seat,' but the Hebrew root kipper means 'to cover/atone.' We retained 'mercy seat' as the familiar rendering while noting the atonement semantics. The instruction 'make them according to the pattern (tavnit) shown you on the mountain' (v40) we rendered literally — the tabernacle is a copy of a heavenly original, a concept developed in Hebrews 8:5.*

Connections: The ark design connects to its role in Numbers 10:33-36, Joshua 3:3-17, and 1 Samuel 4-6. The mercy seat as the meeting place between God and Moses (v22) anticipates Leviticus 16 (Day of Atonement). The bread of the Presence (v30) points to John 6:35. The lampstand anticipates Zechariah 4 and Revelation 1:12-13. The heavenly pattern (v40) is cited in Hebrews 8:5.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Speak to the sons of Israel, that they take for Me a contribution. From every person whose heart moves him, you shall receive My contribution. ³This is the contribution you shall receive from them: gold, silver, and bronze, ⁴blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, fine linen, and goats' hair, ⁵rams' skins dyed red, fine leather, and acacia wood, ⁶oil for the light, spices for the anointing oil and for the fragrant incense, ⁷onyx stones and stones for setting, for the ephod and for the breastpiece. ⁸They are to construct a sanctuary for Me so that I may dwell in their midst. ⁹According to all that I show you — the pattern of the tabernacle and the pattern of all its furnishings — so you shall make it. ¹⁰They shall make an ark of acacia wood. It shall be two and a half cubits long, a cubit and a half wide, and a cubit and a half high. ¹¹You shall overlay it with pure gold — inside and outside you shall overlay it — and you shall make a molding of gold around it. ¹²You shall cast four gold rings for it and put them on its four feet, two rings on one side and two rings on the other. ¹³You shall make poles of acacia wood and overlay them with gold. ¹⁴You shall put the poles through the rings on the sides of the ark, to carry the ark by them. ¹⁵The poles shall remain in the rings of the ark; they shall not be removed from it. ¹⁶You shall put into the ark the Testimony that I shall give you. ¹⁷You shall make an atonement cover of pure gold, two and a half cubits long and a cubit and a half wide. ¹⁸You shall make two cherubim of gold. You shall make them of hammered work at the two ends of the atonement cover. ¹⁹Make one cherub at one end and one cherub at the other end. Of one piece with the atonement cover you shall make the cherubim at its two ends. ²⁰The cherubim shall spread out their wings above, overshadowing the atonement cover with their wings, facing one another. The faces of the cherubim shall be turned toward the atonement cover. ²¹You shall put the atonement cover on top of the ark, and in the ark you shall put the Testimony that I shall give you. ²²There I will meet with you, and from above the atonement cover, from between the two cherubim that are on the ark of the Testimony, I will speak with you about all that I will command you concerning the sons of Israel. ²³You shall make a table of acacia wood, two cubits long, a cubit wide, and a cubit and a half high. ²⁴You shall overlay it with pure gold and make a molding of gold around it. ²⁵You shall make a rim around it a handbreadth wide, and a gold molding around the rim. ²⁶You shall make four gold rings for it and attach the rings to the four corners at its four legs. ²⁷The rings shall be close to the rim, as holders for the poles to carry the table. ²⁸You shall make the poles of acacia wood and overlay them with gold, and the table shall be carried with them. ²⁹You shall make its plates, its dishes, its pitchers, and its bowls for pouring drink offerings. You shall make them of pure gold. ³⁰You shall set the bread of the Presence on the table before Me at all times. ³¹You shall make a lampstand of pure gold. The lampstand shall be made of hammered work — its base, its stem, its cups, its buds, and its blossoms shall be of one piece with it. ³²Six branches shall extend from its sides — three branches from one side and three branches from the other. ³³Three cups shaped like almond blossoms, each with a bud and a blossom, on one branch, and three cups shaped like almond blossoms, each with a bud and a blossom, on the other branch — so for all six branches extending from the lampstand. ³⁴On the lampstand itself there shall be four cups shaped like almond blossoms, with their buds and blossoms. ³⁵A bud shall be under each pair of branches extending from it — a bud under the first pair, a bud under the second pair, and a bud under the third pair — for the six branches extending from the lampstand. ³⁶Their buds and their branches shall be of one piece with it, the whole of it a single piece of hammered work of pure gold. ³⁷You shall make seven lamps for it, and the lamps shall be set up so as to give light on the area in front of it. ³⁸Its tongs and its trays shall be of pure gold. ³⁹It shall be made, with all these utensils, from a talent of pure gold. ⁴⁰See that you make them according to the pattern that was shown you on the mountain."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The tabernacle instructions begin. God initiates — 'The LORD spoke to Moses' — maintaining the pattern that all worship structures originate in divine command, not human invention.
2. 'A contribution' (terumah) — from the verb rum ('to lift up, to raise'). A terumah is something lifted up from one's possessions and given to God. The offering is voluntary: 'from every person whose heart moves him' (kol-ish asher yiddevenu libbo). The tabernacle is funded by willing hearts, not compulsory taxation.
3. The materials list begins with the most precious metals and descends: gold, silver, bronze. The materials that Israel took from Egypt (12:35-36) now find their purpose — what was plundered from the oppressor becomes the raw material for God's dwelling.
4. The dyed yarns — blue (tekhelet), purple (argaman), scarlet (tola'at shani) — are luxury materials associated with royalty. The tabernacle is a royal residence: God is King, and His dwelling is furnished accordingly.
5. Rams' skins, fine leather (tachash — the exact animal is unknown; proposals include dugong, dolphin, or fine goatskin), and acacia wood (atsei shittim) — desert-available materials. The tabernacle is built from what the wilderness provides, supplemented by what Egypt supplied.
6. Oil for the lamp (the menorah, vv.31-40) and spices for anointing oil and incense. Light and fragrance — the tabernacle engages sight and smell as well as the hearing that dominated Sinai.
7. Precious stones for the priestly vestments (detailed in ch28). The contribution encompasses the full range of materials: metals, textiles, wood, oils, spices, and gems.
8. 'Let them make Me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them' (ve'asu li miqdash veshakhanti betokham) — one of the most important verses in Exodus. The word miqdash ('sanctuary') is from qadosh ('holy'): a holy place, a place set apart for God. The verb shakhanti ('I may dwell') is from shakan — the root of Shekhinah. God's stated purpose for the tabernacle is not sacrifice, ceremony, or religion but dwelling: I want to live among you. The destination of the exodus is not merely the promised land but God's presence.
9. 'The pattern' (tavnit) — the tabernacle is not designed by human creativity but built according to a heavenly blueprint. The word tavnit means 'pattern, model, plan.' The earthly sanctuary replicates a heavenly reality (cf. Hebrews 8:5). The instruction 'so you shall make it' (ken ta'asu) demands exact compliance with the revealed design.
10. The ark (aron) is the first item described because it is the most sacred. It is a wooden chest (approximately 3.75 x 2.25 x 2.25 feet) that will contain the covenant tablets. The word aron is different from tevah (Noah's ark / Moses's basket) — it means a chest or box.
11. Gold inside and outside — the ark is entirely gold-covered. The internal gold means that even what is invisible (the interior, which only God sees) is as precious as the exterior. Nothing in God's presence is merely decorative; everything is substantial.
12. Four rings for carrying poles ensure the ark can be transported without being touched directly. The holiness of the ark requires mediated handling — even the priests who carry it do not touch its surface.
13. Acacia wood overlaid with gold — strength (wood) clothed in glory (gold). The combination appears throughout the tabernacle furniture.
14. The poles go through the rings for carrying. The ark is designed for movement: it travels with Israel through the wilderness. God's dwelling is not a fixed temple but a portable presence.
15. 'The poles shall not be removed' (lo yasuru mimmennu) — the ark is always ready to move. Even when stationary, the carrying poles remain in place. God's presence is perpetually mobile — He goes where His people go.
16. 'The Testimony' (ha'edut) — the stone tablets of the covenant, which will be written by God's own finger (31:18). The ark is, at its core, a container for God's words. The most sacred object in Israel holds text.

17. 'An atonement cover' (kapporet) — from the root kaphar ('to cover, to atone'). Traditionally rendered 'mercy seat.' The kapporet is the gold lid of the ark, the place where atonement is enacted on Yom Kippur (Leviticus 16:14-15). It is both furniture (a lid) and theology (the place of covering/atonement). This is the first appearance of the kippur register term in a tabernacle context.
18. Two cherubim (keruvim) — angelic figures, not the chubby infants of Renaissance art but powerful guardian beings associated with God's throne (cf. Genesis 3:24; Ezekiel 1, 10; Psalm 80:1). They are beaten from the same piece of gold as the kapporet — not attached but integral to the atonement cover.
19. The cherubim and the kapporet are 'one piece' (miqqashah) — hammered from a single mass of gold. The unity of the design means the guardians of God's throne and the place of atonement are inseparable. Where atonement happens, God's throne-guardians are present.
20. Wings outstretched, facing each other, looking down at the kapporet — the cherubim create a canopy over the atonement cover. Between their wings, above the kapporet, is where God's presence will be manifest (v22). The space between the cherubim is the most sacred space in all of Israel.
21. The structure is complete: Testimony inside the ark, kapporet on top, cherubim above. The layers move from written word (tablets) to atoning cover (kapporet) to divine presence (between the cherubim). Word, atonement, and presence are architecturally unified.
22. 'There I will meet with you' (venoadti lekha sham) — the verb ya'ad ('to meet, to appoint') is the root of mo'ed ('meeting, appointed time'). The space above the kapporet, between the cherubim, is the appointed meeting place between God and Moses. God's communication with Israel happens at the point of atonement. The word and the covering are inseparable: God speaks from the place where sin is covered.
23. The table of acacia wood — the second piece of tabernacle furniture. It holds the 'bread of the Presence' (lechem hapanim, v30). The table represents God's provision and fellowship.
24. Gold overlay, gold molding — the same construction pattern as the ark. Everything in the tabernacle's interior is gold: the furnishings match the sanctuary's holy character.
25. A rim (misgeret) and molding secure the objects on the table surface. The practical details ensure that the sacred bread is not displaced during transport.
26. Four rings, as with the ark — the table is also portable. Every piece of tabernacle furniture is designed for movement.
27. Poles near the rim for carrying — the engineering details are precise. The tabernacle is mobile worship architecture: every piece can be disassembled, carried, and reassembled.
28. Acacia and gold poles — the carrying system is consistent across all major furnishings.
29. Plates, dishes, pitchers, bowls — the tableware for the bread of the Presence and the drink offerings. All pure gold. The table is fully set for the divine meal.
30. 'The bread of the Presence' (lechem hapanim) — literally 'bread of the face' or 'face bread.' Twelve loaves (Leviticus 24:5-6), one for each tribe, set before God's face at all times. The bread represents Israel's constant presence before God and God's constant provision for Israel. The table is never empty — the relationship is perpetual.
31. The lampstand (menorah) — the third major piece. Pure gold, hammered from a single piece (miqqashah, as with the cherubim). The menorah provides light in the tabernacle's interior — without it, the sanctuary is dark. Light in God's dwelling comes from a source God designed.
32. Six branches extend from a central stem — three on each side, plus the central shaft, making seven lights total. The number seven signals completeness (as in creation's seven days). The menorah is a tree of light.
33. Almond blossom design (meshukadim) — the almond (shaqed) is the first tree to bloom in spring, and its name puns with shoqed ('watching, wakeful'). The menorah's design evokes both natural beauty and divine vigilance. Jeremiah 1:11-12 will play on this same pun.
34. The central stem has four cups — more than the branches, making it visually dominant. The design radiates from the center outward.
35. Buds at each branching point integrate the branches into the central structure. The whole is organic — a single golden tree with seven flowering tops.
36. 'A single piece of hammered work' (miqqashah achat) — no soldering, no assembly. The entire menorah is beaten from one talent of gold. The unity of the design reflects the unity of the God it serves.
37. Seven lamps illuminate the space 'in front of it' (al-ever panehah) — the menorah faces the table of showbread across the sanctuary. Light falls on the bread of the Presence. Provision is visible in the light God provides.
38. Tongs and trays of pure gold — the tools for maintaining the lamps are as sacred as the lampstand itself. Nothing in the tabernacle is mundane.
39. One talent of gold (approximately 75 pounds / 34 kilograms) for the entire menorah and its utensils. The weight is enormous, the craftsmanship extraordinary.
40. 'According to the pattern shown you on the mountain' (betavnitam asher-attah mor'eh bahar) — the chapter closes as it began (v9): the earthly tabernacle must replicate the heavenly design. Human creativity serves divine specification. The final word is the mountain — Sinai remains the origin point of everything Israel builds.

Summary: God gives detailed instructions for the tabernacle's curtains, frames, and crossbars. The innermost layer features finely woven linen with cherubim in blue, purple, and scarlet. Goat-hair curtains form the outer tent. Gold-plated acacia frames create the structure, joined by silver bases.

What Makes This Remarkable: The tabernacle (mishkan, from shakan, 'to dwell') is a portable dwelling — theology in textile. The cherubim woven into the innermost curtains mirror the cherubim on the mercy seat, so that guardian figures surround God's space from every direction. The modularity of the design (two sets of five curtains, coupled by gold clasps, v6) reveals a structure built for assembly, disassembly, and transport — a community on the move carries God's presence with them. The veil (parokhet, v31) separates the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place, creating the graduated holiness that defines tabernacle theology.

Translation Friction: The technical textile vocabulary posed consistent challenges. The Hebrew tekhelet (blue/violet), argaman (purple), and tola'at shani (scarlet) are dye terms with specific ancient referents; we retained the color terms without specifying the dyeing agents. The dimensions in cubits (approximately 18 inches each) we preserved in the Hebrew measurement, adding approximate modern equivalents in notes. The word qerashim ('frames,' v15) was traditionally rendered 'boards,' but recent scholarship favors open frameworks; we chose 'frames.'

Connections: The veil torn at Christ's death (Matthew 27:51; Mark 15:38) is this parokhet. The tabernacle as portable dwelling anticipates the temple of 1 Kings 6-8 and ultimately the incarnation (John 1:14, where skenoo, 'tabernacled,' echoes mishkan). The cherubim on the curtains connect to the garden guardians of Genesis 3:24.

¹"You shall make the tabernacle with ten curtains of finely twisted linen and blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, with cherubim skillfully worked into them. ²The length of each curtain shall be twenty-eight cubits, and the width of each curtain four cubits. All the curtains shall be the same size. ³Five curtains shall be joined to one another, and the other five curtains shall be joined to one another. ⁴You shall make loops of blue yarn on the edge of the outermost curtain in the first set, and likewise on the edge of the outermost curtain in the second set. ⁵You shall make fifty loops on the one curtain, and fifty loops on the edge of the curtain in the second set, the loops being opposite one another. ⁶You shall make fifty clasps of gold and join the curtains to one another with the clasps, so that the tabernacle forms a single unit. ⁷"You shall make curtains of goats' hair for a tent over the tabernacle. You shall make eleven curtains. ⁸The length of each curtain shall be thirty cubits, and the width of each curtain four cubits. The eleven curtains shall be the same size. ⁹You shall join five curtains by themselves and six curtains by themselves, and you shall fold the sixth curtain double at the front of the tent. ¹⁰You shall make fifty loops on the edge of the outermost curtain in one set, and fifty loops on the edge of the curtain in the other set. ¹¹You shall make fifty clasps of bronze, put the clasps into the loops, and join the tent together so that it forms a single unit. ¹²The part that hangs over the back of the tabernacle — the extra half-curtain — shall hang over the back. ¹³The extra cubit on each side in the length of the tent curtains shall hang over the sides of the tabernacle, on this side and on that side, to cover it. ¹⁴You shall make a covering for the tent of rams' skins dyed red, and a covering of fine leather on top of that. ¹⁵"You shall make upright frames of acacia wood for the tabernacle. ¹⁶Each frame shall be ten cubits long and a cubit and a half wide. ¹⁷Each frame shall have two tenons joined to one another. You shall make all the frames of the tabernacle this way. ¹⁸You shall make the frames for the tabernacle: twenty frames for the south side. ¹⁹You shall make forty bases of silver under the twenty frames — two bases under each frame for its two tenons. ²⁰For the second side of the tabernacle, on the north side, twenty frames, ²¹with their forty bases of silver — two bases under each frame. ²²For the back of the tabernacle, on the west side, you shall make six frames. ²³You shall make two frames for the corners of the tabernacle at the back. ²⁴They shall be joined at the bottom and coupled at the top in a single ring. Both of them shall be this way; they shall form the two corners. ²⁵There shall be eight frames with their bases of silver — sixteen bases, two bases under each frame. ²⁶"You shall make bars of acacia wood: five for the frames on one side of the tabernacle, ²⁷five bars for the frames on the other side of the tabernacle, and five bars for the frames on the back side of the tabernacle, to the west. ²⁸The middle bar, halfway up the frames, shall run from end to end. ²⁹You shall overlay the frames with gold and make their rings of gold as holders for the bars, and you shall overlay the bars with gold. ³⁰You shall set up the tabernacle according to the plan that was shown you on the mountain. ³¹"You shall make a veil of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and finely twisted linen, with cherubim skillfully worked into it. ³²You shall hang it on four pillars of acacia overlaid with gold, with hooks of gold, on four bases of silver. ³³You shall hang the veil from the clasps, and you shall bring the ark of the Testimony in there behind the veil. The veil shall separate for you the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place. ³⁴You shall put the atonement cover on the ark of the Testimony in the Most Holy Place. ³⁵You shall set the table outside the veil, and the lampstand on the south side of the tabernacle opposite the table. You shall place the table on the north side. ³⁶"You shall make a screen for the entrance of the tent, of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and finely twisted linen, the work of an embroiderer. ³⁷You shall make for the screen five pillars of acacia and overlay them with gold. Their hooks shall be of gold, and you shall cast five bases of bronze for them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The tabernacle (mishkan, from shakan, 'to dwell') is God's portable dwelling place. The innermost layer — finely woven linen with cherubim — creates a sacred canopy. The cherubim woven into the curtains echo the cherubim on the kapporet (25:18-20): the guardian figures surround God's space from every direction.
2. Each curtain is approximately 42 x 6 feet. The uniformity ('all the same size') reflects the ordered perfection of sacred space — nothing in God's dwelling is haphazard or improvised.
3. Two sets of five curtains, joined together, create two large panels that will be coupled to form the ceiling. The construction method is modular — designed for assembly, disassembly, and transport.
4. Blue yarn loops — the color tekhelet (blue/violet) is associated with royalty and divinity throughout the Torah. Even the functional connectors reflect the sacred nature of the space.
5. Fifty loops on each panel, precisely aligned ('opposite one another'). The engineering detail ensures exact fit — sacred architecture demands precision.
6. Gold clasps (qarssei zahav) join the two halves into 'a single unit' (echad). The word echad ('one') echoes the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:4): as God is one, His dwelling is one. The tabernacle's unity reflects its builder's nature.
7. The goats' hair tent (ohel) covers the linen tabernacle (mishkan). The outer layer protects the inner — the practical shields the sacred. Goats' hair is waterproof and durable: functional material serving holy purposes.
8. Slightly larger curtains (30 x 6 feet vs 28 x 6) to provide overhang and complete coverage of the inner curtains beneath.
9. The sixth curtain is doubled at the front — extra material providing a visible entrance flap. The tabernacle's approach is marked by the fold of its covering.
10. Fifty loops, mirroring the inner curtain construction. The outer tent replicates the inner pattern — the layers correspond.
11. Bronze clasps (qarssei nechoshet) for the outer tent — less precious than the gold of the inner curtains. Materials decrease in value from inside out: gold (holiest), then bronze (protective outer layer). Proximity to God determines material worth.
12. The extra half-curtain hangs over the back — practical covering with aesthetic consequence. The rear of the tabernacle is draped, not exposed.
13. The overhang on each side protects the linen curtains from exposure. The engineering accounts for weather and wear — sacred space is also practical space.
14. Two additional outer coverings: rams' skins dyed red and tachash (fine leather). Four layers total: linen, goats' hair, rams' skins, leather. Each layer adds protection; the outermost is the most weather-resistant.
15. Upright frames (qerashim) of acacia wood form the tabernacle's structural skeleton. Acacia (shittah) is the hardest wood available in the Sinai wilderness — dense, durable, and insect-resistant.
16. Each frame is approximately 15 x 2.25 feet. The height (10 cubits) matches the height of the curtains, creating a precise fit between structure and covering.
17. Tenons (yadot, literally 'hands') are projections that fit into sockets. The joinery is mortise-and-tenon — each frame locks into its base with two connection points for stability.
18. Twenty frames on the south side — the tabernacle's longer walls. The total south-wall length is approximately 45 feet (20 frames x 1.5 cubits each).
19. Silver bases (adnei kesef) — each frame sits in two silver sockets. Forty bases for twenty frames. The silver came from the census atonement money (30:11-16; 38:25-28), making the tabernacle's foundation literally built on atonement.

20. The north side mirrors the south: twenty frames, identical construction. The bilateral symmetry creates a balanced, ordered space.
21. Forty silver bases on the north, matching the south. The repetition ensures structural consistency — both walls bear equal load.
22. Six frames for the western back wall — the narrow end. The tabernacle opens to the east, facing the sunrise. The Most Holy Place is at the western end, the deepest interior.
23. Two additional corner frames solve the engineering challenge of joining the back wall to the side walls at right angles.
24. The corner frames are joined top and bottom, creating rigid corners that hold the structure square. The detail 'coupled at the top in a single ring' describes a metal fitting that locks the corner.
25. Eight frames on the back (six plus two corners), sixteen silver bases. The total frame count: $20 + 20 + 8 = 48$ frames on 96 silver bases.
26. Cross-bars (berichim) of acacia wood brace the frames horizontally. Five bars per wall provide lateral stability — without them, the upright frames would sway.
27. Five bars on each of the three walled sides. The bar system creates a rigid box structure that can withstand desert winds.
28. The middle bar runs the entire length of the wall — a single continuous timber that unifies the frame system. This is the structural spine of each wall.
29. Gold overlay on frames and bars — even the structural members are covered in gold. The entire interior surface is golden. Nothing exposed to view inside the tabernacle is bare wood.
30. 'According to the plan shown you on the mountain' (kemishpato asher hor'eta bahar) — the chapter closes with the same insistence on heavenly pattern that opened the tabernacle instructions (25:9, 40). Human builders follow divine design.
31. The veil (parokhet) separates the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place. Its materials — blue, purple, scarlet, fine linen — match the inner curtains. Cherubim are woven into it, as they were on the curtains and fashioned on the kapporet. The cherubim guard every threshold of God's presence.
32. Four gold-overlaid pillars support the veil. Silver bases, gold hooks — the materials match the space's holiness. The veil hangs between the accessible and the inaccessible.
33. The veil's function is separation: 'it shall separate for you the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place' (vehivdilah happarokhet lakhem bein haqqodesh uvein qodesh haqqodashim). The word hivdilah ('separate, divide') is the same verb God used to separate light from darkness at creation (Genesis 1:4). The veil is a creation-boundary: it divides realms.
34. The kapporet goes on the ark, inside the Most Holy Place — the innermost point of the tabernacle, behind the veil, accessible only to the high priest once a year on Yom Kippur.
35. The table (north) and lampstand (south) are positioned in the Holy Place, outside the veil. The bread of the Presence faces the light of the menorah across the room — provision and illumination in the space where priests serve daily.
36. The entrance screen (masakh) is less elaborate than the inner veil — embroidered, not woven with cherubim. The distinction marks the difference between the entrance to the Holy Place and the entrance to the Most Holy Place.
37. Five bronze-based pillars support the entrance screen. Bronze bases (vs silver for the veil pillars) reflect the descending holiness gradient from inside out: Most Holy (gold/silver) Holy (silver/bronze) courtyard (bronze).

Summary: God gives instructions for the bronze altar of burnt offering — the first object encountered in the courtyard — along with its utensils, the courtyard enclosure of linen hangings on bronze pillars, and the perpetual lamp fueled by pure olive oil.

What Makes This Remarkable: The altar's horns (qarnot) project from the four corners as a single piece with the altar — blood is applied to these horns in sacrificial rituals, and they serve as a place of sanctuary (1 Kings 1:50). The courtyard material hierarchy creates a holiness gradient: bronze in the courtyard, silver at the structure's base, gold in the interior. The perpetual lamp (ner tamid, v20) burns 'from evening to morning' — light never ceases in the space where God dwells. Israel's first communal obligation is to supply oil for this unending flame.

Translation Friction: We rendered mizbach ha'olah as 'altar of burnt offering' rather than simply 'altar,' to distinguish it from the incense altar introduced in chapter 30. The bronze (nechoshet) overlay reflects the courtyard's position in the holiness gradient — not gold (interior) but the appropriate metal for the space of sacrifice. The phrase ner tamid ('perpetual lamp') we rendered as such, noting that 'perpetual' (tamid) means continually maintained, not miraculously self-sustaining.

Connections: The altar's design anticipates Solomon's much larger bronze altar (2 Chronicles 4:1). The horns of the altar appear in 1 Kings 1:50-51 and Psalm 118:27. The perpetual lamp connects to the seven-branched lampstand of 25:31-40 and anticipates the 'lamp of God' in Samuel's temple (1 Samuel 3:3). The courtyard enclosure establishes the boundary between sacred and common space.

¹"You shall make the altar of acacia wood, five cubits long and five cubits wide — the altar shall be square — and three cubits high. ²You shall make horns for it on its four corners. Its horns shall be of one piece with it, and you shall overlay it with bronze. ³You shall make pots for removing its ashes, and shovels and basins and forks and fire pans. You shall make all its utensils of bronze. ⁴You shall make for it a grating, a network of bronze, and on the net you shall make four bronze rings at its four corners. ⁵You shall set it under the ledge of the altar so that the net extends halfway down the altar. ⁶You shall make poles for the altar, poles of acacia wood, and overlay them with bronze. ⁷The poles shall be put through the rings, so that the poles are on the two sides of the altar when it is carried. ⁸You shall make it hollow, with boards. As it was shown to you on the mountain, so shall it be made. ⁹"You shall make the courtyard of the tabernacle. On the south side the courtyard shall have hangings of finely twisted linen, a hundred cubits long on that side. ¹⁰Its twenty pillars and their twenty bases shall be of bronze. The hooks of the pillars and their bands shall be of silver. ¹¹Likewise along the north side there shall be hangings a hundred cubits long, with twenty pillars and twenty bronze bases. The hooks and bands of the pillars shall be of silver. ¹²The width of the courtyard on the west side shall have hangings of fifty cubits, with ten pillars and ten bases. ¹³The width of the courtyard on the east side shall be fifty cubits. ¹⁴The hangings on one side of the gate shall be fifteen cubits, with three pillars and three bases. ¹⁵On the other side shall be hangings of fifteen cubits, with three pillars and three bases. ¹⁶For the gate of the courtyard there shall be a screen twenty cubits long, of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and finely twisted linen, the work of an embroiderer, with four pillars and four bases. ¹⁷All the pillars around the courtyard shall be banded with silver. Their hooks shall be of silver and their bases of bronze. ¹⁸The length of the courtyard shall be a hundred cubits, its width fifty cubits, and its height five cubits, with hangings of finely twisted linen and bases of bronze. ¹⁹All the utensils of the tabernacle used in all its service, and all its tent pegs, and all the tent pegs of the courtyard, shall be of bronze. ²⁰"You shall command the sons of Israel to bring you clear oil of pressed olives for the light, to keep a lamp burning continually. ²¹In the tent of meeting, outside the veil that is before the Testimony, Aaron and his sons shall tend it from evening to morning before the LORD. It shall be an eternal statute throughout their generations on behalf of the sons of Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The bronze altar (mizbach hanechoshet) is the first object encountered upon entering the courtyard — sacrifice is the gateway to God's presence. Five cubits square (approximately 7.5 x 7.5 feet) and three cubits high (approximately 4.5 feet), it is the largest piece of tabernacle furniture.
2. 'Horns on its four corners' (qarnot al arba pinnotav) — the horns are projections at each corner, integral to the altar ('of one piece with it'). Blood is applied to these horns during sacrificial rituals (Leviticus 4:7, 18, 25, 30). A person could grasp the horns for sanctuary (1 Kings 1:50). The horn symbolizes power and refuge.
3. The altar's utensils are all bronze — pots, shovels, basins, forks, fire pans. The bronze material reflects the courtyard's position in the holiness gradient: not gold (interior), not silver (structural), but bronze (sacrificial/external).
4. The bronze grating sits inside the altar, allowing air circulation for the fire and drainage for the blood. The engineering serves the sacrificial function — nothing in the design is merely decorative.
5. The net extends halfway down — the upper portion holds the fire and sacrifice, the lower portion provides structural support and airflow.
6. Carrying poles of acacia and bronze — the altar, like the ark, table, and lampstand, is portable. Every piece of sacred furniture moves with Israel.
7. Poles through rings on two sides — the carrying system is consistent across all tabernacle pieces. The altar is always ready to travel.
8. 'Hollow, with boards' — the altar is not solid but a frame structure, likely filled with earth at each campsite (cf. 20:24, 'an altar of earth you shall make for Me'). The heavenly pattern shown on the mountain governs the construction.
9. The courtyard (chatser) is the outermost sacred zone — 100 x 50 cubits (approximately 150 x 75 feet). Linen hangings create walls that separate sacred space from the surrounding camp. The enclosure is visible but not transparent: the linen creates a boundary without a barrier to sight.
10. Twenty pillars on the south side with bronze bases and silver hooks — the material gradient continues: bronze at ground level, silver at attachment points. The courtyard is less holy than the sanctuary interior but holier than the camp beyond.

11. The north side mirrors the south — bilateral symmetry governs the entire tabernacle complex.
12. The west side (back of the tabernacle) is fifty cubits — half the length of the sides. The courtyard is twice as long as it is wide, creating a rectangular processional space leading toward the sanctuary.
13. The east side (front, entrance side) is also fifty cubits wide but divided by the gate.
14. Fifteen cubits of hangings on one side of the gate — the entrance is centered on the east wall.
15. Fifteen cubits on the other side — the gate is flanked symmetrically. The entrance is twenty cubits wide (v16), leaving fifteen cubits of hanging on each side.
16. The gate screen is the courtyard's entrance — embroidered (not woven with cherubim like the inner veil). Blue, purple, scarlet, and linen: the same four materials used throughout the tabernacle, maintaining visual continuity from outer entrance to inner sanctuary.
17. Silver bands and hooks throughout — silver is the connecting material that holds the courtyard together, just as silver bases hold the tabernacle frames.
18. The complete dimensions are stated: 100 x 50 x 5 cubits. The five-cubit height of the hangings is high enough to block ground-level view but low enough that the tabernacle structure rises above it, visible from the camp.
19. All utensils and tent pegs are bronze. The inventory ensures completeness — nothing is overlooked. The pegs anchor the entire structure against wind.
20. 'Clear oil of pressed olives' (shemen zayit zakh) — the finest quality olive oil, cold-pressed without heat to ensure clarity. The eternal light (ner tamid) in the tabernacle burns the best fuel available. God's light is sustained by the people's contribution.
21. 'From evening to morning' — the lamp burns through the night, ensuring the tabernacle is never in darkness. Aaron and his sons tend it — priestly service includes the maintenance of sacred light. 'An eternal statute' (chuqqat olam) — the lamp-tending obligation is perpetual, binding across all generations.

Summary: God commands the making of sacred garments for Aaron — the ephod, breastpiece with twelve stones for the twelve tribes, robe, turban, and gold plate inscribed 'Holy to the LORD.' The garments are made 'for glory and for splendor' by Spirit-filled artisans.

What Makes This Remarkable: The purpose statement lekhavod uletif'aret ('for glory and for splendor,' v2) connects the priestly vestments to God's own kavod — the priest dressed in these garments carries a visible representation of divine glory. The breastpiece (choshen) bears twelve stones engraved with tribal names, so that Aaron carries all Israel on his heart when he enters God's presence (v29). The gold plate inscription qodesh laYHWH ('Holy to the LORD,' v36) on the turban makes the high priest a walking declaration of consecration.

Translation Friction: The phrase chakhemei-lev ('wise of heart,' v3) we rendered as 'skilled artisans,' since the Hebrew concept of 'heart-wisdom' means practical expertise, not merely emotional intelligence. The twelve gemstones on the breastpiece (vv17-20) include several terms whose identification is uncertain in modern mineralogy; we followed traditional identifications while noting scholarly uncertainty. The Urim and Thummim (v30) we left untranslated, as their exact nature and function remain debated — they appear to be oracular instruments for discerning God's will.

Connections: The breastpiece bearing tribal names anticipates the intercessory function of the high priest developed in Hebrews 7-9. The 'Holy to the LORD' inscription connects to Zechariah 14:20, where even horse bells bear the inscription. The priestly garments' beauty anticipates the temple splendor of 1 Kings 6 and the new Jerusalem of Revelation 21.

¹"Bring your brother Aaron near to you, along with his sons, from among the Israelites, to serve Me as priests — Aaron, Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar, Aaron's sons. ²You shall make sacred garments for your brother Aaron — for glory and for splendor. ³Speak to all the skilled artisans whom I have filled with a spirit of wisdom, and they shall make Aaron's garments to consecrate him to serve Me as priest. ⁴These are the garments they shall make: a breastpiece, an ephod, a robe, a checkered tunic, a turban, and a sash. They shall make sacred garments for your brother Aaron and his sons to serve Me as priests. ⁵They shall use gold, blue yarn, purple yarn, scarlet yarn, and fine linen. ⁶They shall make the ephod of gold, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen — the work of a skilled designer. ⁷It shall have two shoulder straps attached at its two edges, joining it together. ⁸The decorative waistband on it shall be of the same workmanship and materials — gold, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen. ⁹Take two onyx stones and engrave on them the names of the sons of Israel. ¹⁰Six of their names on one stone, and the remaining six names on the other stone, in birth order. ¹¹With the skill of a gem-cutter, engrave the two stones like seal engravings with the names of the sons of Israel. Mount them in gold filigree settings. ¹²Set the two stones on the shoulder straps of the ephod as stones of remembrance for the sons of Israel. Aaron shall bear their names before the LORD on his two shoulders as a memorial. ¹³Make gold filigree settings, ¹⁴and two chains of pure gold, braided like cords. Attach the braided chains to the settings. ¹⁵You shall make a breastpiece of decision — skilled designer's work, like the ephod. Make it of gold, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen. ¹⁶It shall be square and folded double — a span long and a span wide. ¹⁷Mount on it a setting of stones — four rows of stones. The first row: a ruby, a topaz, and an emerald. ¹⁸The second row: a turquoise, a lapis lazuli, and a moonstone. ¹⁹The third row: a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst. ²⁰The fourth row: a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper. They shall be mounted in gold filigree settings. ²¹The stones shall correspond to the names of the sons of Israel — twelve in all, according to their names. Each shall be engraved like a seal with the name of one of the twelve tribes. ²²For the breastpiece make braided chains of pure gold, corded work. ²³Make two gold rings for the breastpiece and attach them to its two upper corners. ²⁴Put the two gold braided chains through the two rings at the corners of the breastpiece. ²⁵Attach the other two ends of the braided chains to the two filigree settings on the front of the ephod's shoulder straps. ²⁶Make two more gold rings and place them on the two lower corners of the breastpiece, on its inner edge facing the ephod. ²⁷Make two more gold rings and attach them to the front of the ephod's two shoulder straps, at the lower part near the seam, just above the ephod's waistband. ²⁸The breastpiece shall be bound by its rings to the ephod's rings with a blue cord, keeping it above the ephod's waistband so that the breastpiece does not come loose from the ephod. ²⁹Aaron shall carry the names of the sons of Israel in the breastpiece of decision over his heart when he enters the holy place — as a perpetual memorial before the LORD. ³⁰Place into the breastpiece of decision the Urim and the Thummim. They shall be over Aaron's heart when he comes before the LORD, and Aaron shall carry the judgment of the Israelites over his heart before the LORD at all times. ³¹Make the robe of the ephod entirely of blue yarn. ³²It shall have an opening for the head in the center, with a woven binding around the opening — like the collar of a coat of mail — so that it does not tear. ³³On its hem make pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn all around the hem, with gold bells between them all around — ³⁴a gold bell and a pomegranate, a gold bell and a pomegranate, all around the hem of the robe. ³⁵Aaron shall wear it when he serves, so that its sound is heard when he enters the holy place before the LORD and when he comes out — so that he does not die. ³⁶Make a plate of pure gold and engrave on it, like a seal engraving: HOLY TO THE LORD. ³⁷Fasten it to a blue cord so it stays on the turban — on the front of the turban it shall be. ³⁸It shall be on Aaron's forehead, and Aaron shall bear the guilt connected with the sacred offerings that the Israelites consecrate as their holy gifts. It shall always be on his forehead, so that they may be accepted before the LORD. ³⁹Weave the tunic in a checkered pattern of fine linen. Make the turban of fine linen and the sash with embroidered work. ⁴⁰For Aaron's sons make tunics, sashes, and caps — for glory and for splendor. ⁴¹Clothe your brother Aaron and his sons in these garments. Anoint them, ordain them, and consecrate them, so they may serve Me as priests. ⁴²Make linen undergarments for them to cover their bare flesh, reaching from the waist to the thighs. ⁴³They shall be on Aaron and his sons when they enter the tent of meeting or approach the altar to serve in the holy place, so that they do not incur guilt and die. This is a permanent statute for him and his descendants after him."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The priestly garment instructions begin with the appointment of the priesthood itself. Five men are named: Aaron and his four sons. The verb haqrev ('bring near,' from q-r-b — the offering root) frames the priests' selection as a sacred presentation. All four sons are listed, though Nadab and Abihu will die in Leviticus 10 for offering unauthorized fire. The phrase lekhahano-li ('to serve Me as priests,' literally 'to priest for Me') defines the priesthood as personal service to God.

2. The purpose of the priestly garments: lekhavod uletifaret ('for glory and for splendor'). The word kavod ('glory, weight, honor') — the register term — connects the priestly vestments to God's own glory. The priest dressed in these garments carries a visible representation of divine kavod. The word tiferet ('splendor, beauty, adornment') adds aesthetic magnificence to theological weight. The garments are not merely functional but beautiful — worship engages the visual sense.
3. The artisans are chakhmei-lev ('wise of heart' — skilled craftsmen) whom God has filled with ruach chokhmah ('spirit of wisdom'). As with Bezalel (31:3), artistic skill is a divine endowment. The garments' purpose: leqaddesho ('to consecrate him') — the clothing itself effects consecration. Wearing the garments transforms Aaron from an ordinary Israelite into the high priest. The garments do not merely identify the priest; they create the priestly status.
4. The six-piece high priestly ensemble: choshen ('breastpiece' — the gem-studded decision plate), efod ('ephod' — an ornate outer vest), me'il ('robe' — the blue garment worn under the ephod), ketonet tashbets ('checkered tunic' — a woven linen undergarment), mitsnefet ('turban' — the head covering bearing the golden plate), and avnet ('sash' — the waistband). Aaron's sons receive a simpler four-piece set (v40). The high priest wears more because he bears more — his garments carry the names of all twelve tribes.
5. Five materials — the same palette as the tabernacle itself (25:3-4): zahav ('gold'), tekhelet ('blue' — a costly dye from the murex snail), argaman ('purple' — an even more expensive murex dye), tola'at shani ('scarlet' — crimson dye from an insect), and shesh ('fine linen' — Egyptian-quality woven linen). The priest wears the tabernacle's colors — he is a walking extension of the sacred space. When he enters the tent, his garments match its fabric.
6. The efod — the signature garment of the high priest — is described first. It is woven from all five materials: gold thread interwoven with the four colored yarns and linen. Ma'aseh choshev ('the work of a skilled designer/thinker') — the verb chashav means 'to think, to devise' (the same root as 31:4), emphasizing that the ephod requires not just weaving skill but creative design intelligence.
7. The ephod's construction: two shoulder straps (khetafot) connect the front and back panels at the shoulders. The garment functions as a sacred vest or apron, held in place by the shoulder pieces and the sash. The shoulder straps will bear the onyx stones engraved with the tribal names (v9-12).
8. The cheshev afuddato ('the band/waistband of the ephod') secures the garment at the waist. It is made from the same five materials (mimmennu yihyeh — 'it shall be of it'), ensuring visual and material unity between the ephod body and its fastening. The priestly garments are an integrated whole — no element is mismatched.
9. Two avnei-shoham ('onyx stones') will carry the names of the twelve tribes — six names on each stone (v10). The engraving (pittachta — 'you shall engrave/open') is permanent: the names are cut into the stone, not painted or attached. The high priest carries Israel's identity physically on his body. Every time he enters the sanctuary, twelve names go with him.
10. The names follow ketoldotam ('according to their generations/birth order') — the sequence of Jacob's sons by birth, not by tribal importance. Birth order rather than political ranking ensures that the representation is familial, not hierarchical. All twelve tribes are equally present before God — no tribe's name is larger, higher, or more prominent than another's.
11. The engraving quality: ma'aseh charash even ('the work of a stone-craftsman') using pituchei chotam ('seal engravings') — the same technique used to cut official seals. The names of Israel's tribes are engraved with the precision of royal insignia. The mishbetsot zahav ('gold filigree settings') secure the stones in ornate golden frames on the shoulder straps. The technical precision demanded reflects the theological weight of what the stones represent.
12. The stones' function: avnei zikkharon livnei Yisra'el ('stones of remembrance for the sons of Israel'). The word zikkharon ('memorial, remembrance') — the same word used for the grain offering's azkarah (Lev 2:2) — triggers divine attention. When Aaron enters God's presence wearing these stones, God sees Israel's names. Venasa Aharon et-shemotam lifnei YHWH ('Aaron shall bear their names before the LORD') — the priest carries the nation. His shoulders literally support the weight of Israel's identity before God. The verb nasa ('to bear, to carry') is the same word used for bearing sin — the priest bears both names and guilt.
13. Gold settings for the shoulder stones — the technical instruction continues the detailed craftsmanship specifications.
14. Pure gold chains (sharshot zahav tahor) connect the shoulder stone settings to the breastpiece (v22-25). The chains are ma'aseh avot ('corded/braided work') — twisted gold rope, combining strength with beauty. These chains form the visible link between the shoulder stones (bearing tribal names) and the breastpiece (bearing twelve more stones with tribal names).
15. The choshen mishpat ('breastpiece of judgment/decision') is the high priest's most distinctive garment element. The word mishpat here means 'judgment, decision' — this is the plate that holds the Urim and Thummim (v30), the oracular instruments used to discern God's will. The breastpiece is made from the same five materials as the ephod (kema'aseh efod — 'like the work of the ephod'), maintaining the unified aesthetic. It is not merely decorative but functional — it is the instrument through which God communicates decisions to Israel.
16. The breastpiece is ravua ('square'), kaful ('doubled/folded'), and one zeret ('span' — approximately 9 inches) in each direction. The doubled fabric creates a pocket for the Urim and Thummim (v30). The square shape — equal on all sides — symbolizes completeness and balance, appropriate for an instrument of divine judgment.
17. Four rows of three stones each (twelve total, one per tribe). The first row: odem ('ruby/carnelian' — red), pitdah ('topaz/chrysolite' — yellow-green), and bareqet ('emerald/beryl' — green). The exact identification of ancient gemstones is uncertain — the Hebrew terms may refer to different stones than the English names suggest. What is certain is the visual effect: twelve brilliant gemstones arranged in a grid on the high priest's chest, each carrying a tribal name.

18. Second row: nofekh ('turquoise/malachite'), sappir ('lapis lazuli' — the biblical 'sapphire' is almost certainly lapis lazuli, a deep blue stone flecked with gold), and yahalom ('moonstone/diamond' — likely a clear or white stone). The KJV's 'diamond' for yahalom is probably incorrect since diamonds were not cut or polished in the ancient Near East.
19. Third row: leshem ('jacinth/amber'), shevo ('agate/banded stone'), and achlamah ('amethyst' — purple quartz). The stones progress through the color spectrum across the four rows, creating a visual tapestry of light and color on the priest's chest.
20. Fourth row: tarshish ('beryl/chrysolite' — possibly the stone of Tarshish, a golden-yellow gem), shoham ('onyx' — the same stone as the shoulder pieces, v9), and yashfeh ('jasper' — green or multicolored). All twelve stones are meshubatsim zahav ('set in gold filigree'). The completed breastpiece is a constellation of colored light framed in gold — each stone catching and refracting light as the priest moves.
21. Each stone bears one tribal name — ish al-shemo ('each with his name'). Twelve stones, twelve names, twelve tribes. The priest carries the entire nation on his chest — over his heart — when he enters God's presence. The engraving is pituchei chotam ('seal engravings'), the same technique as the shoulder stones (v11). The names are permanent, cut into gemstone. Israel's identity before God is literally etched in stone and worn against the high priest's beating heart.
22. The braided gold chains (from v14) attach the breastpiece to the ephod's shoulder settings — connecting the twelve stones on the chest to the two stones on the shoulders. The priest wears twenty-four instances of Israel's name: twelve on the breastpiece, twelve more (six per stone) on the shoulders.
23. Gold rings at the breastpiece's upper corners receive the chains from the shoulder settings. The attachment system (v22-28) secures the breastpiece firmly to the ephod — it must not shift or detach during priestly service. The mechanical details ensure that Israel's names stay in place over the priest's heart.
24. The chains thread through the rings, connecting breastpiece to ephod via the shoulder settings. The chain-ring-setting system creates a secure, flexible attachment that moves with the priest's body.
25. The chains run from the breastpiece corners upward to the shoulder settings — the same settings that hold the onyx stones bearing tribal names. The complete system: names on the shoulders (v12), names on the chest (v21), connected by golden chains. The priest's upper body is wrapped in Israel's identity.
26. Lower attachment rings on the breastpiece's inner edge — these connect to the ephod's waistband (v27-28) to prevent the breastpiece from swinging outward during movement.
27. These ephod-side rings correspond to the breastpiece's lower rings (v26). A blue cord will thread through both sets (v28), binding the breastpiece to the ephod at the waistband level. The mechanical description is extraordinarily precise — every ring, chain, and cord is specified to ensure the breastpiece stays securely positioned over the priest's heart.
28. The petil tekhelet ('blue cord') — the same expensive blue dye used in the tabernacle fabrics — ties the lower connections. The purpose: velo-yizzach hachoshen me'al ha'efod ('so the breastpiece does not shift from the ephod'). The verb zach ('shift, move away') — the breastpiece must not wander. Israel's names must stay fixed over the priest's heart. The blue cord is both functional (holding the breastpiece in place) and symbolic (the color of heaven securing the names of earth's covenant people).
29. The breastpiece's theological function stated explicitly: venasa Aharon et-shemot benei-Yisra'el bechoshen hammishpat al-libbo ('Aaron shall carry the names of Israel's sons in the breastpiece of decision over his heart'). Al-libbo — 'over his heart' — is the key phrase. The priest carries the nation against his heartbeat. Every pulse drives Israel's names into God's presence. Lezikkaron lifnei-YHWH tamid ('as a perpetual memorial before the LORD') — the memorial is permanent (tamid), not occasional. The priest never enters the sanctuary without Israel over his heart.
30. The Urim and Thummim (ha'urim voha'tummim) are placed inside the breastpiece's pocket (created by the doubled fabric, v16). Their exact nature is unknown — possibly lots or stones used for binary oracular decisions (yes/no, go/stay, guilty/innocent). The names may derive from or ('light') and tam ('completeness/truth') — 'lights and perfections' or 'illumination and wholeness.' The phrase venasa Aharon et-mishpat benei-Yisra'el al-libbo ('Aaron shall carry the judgment of the Israelites over his heart') means the priest bears both Israel's identity (names, v29) and Israel's need for divine guidance (judgment, v30) simultaneously over his heart.
31. The me'il ('robe') worn under the ephod is kelil tekhelet ('entirely blue') — pure, undiluted blue. This is the garment visible beneath the ephod, creating a blue field behind the multicolored ephod and breastpiece. The tekhelet blue — extracted from the murex snail at enormous cost — was associated with royalty and heaven. The priest wears the color of the sky.
32. The neckline is reinforced: safah ('a binding/border') around the head opening prevents tearing. The comparison kefi tachra ('like the opening of a coat of mail') references military armor — the robe's neckline is as sturdy as a soldier's collar. The instruction lo yiqqarea ('it shall not tear') may carry ritual significance: a torn priestly garment would be a sign of mourning (prohibited during service, Lev 10:6) or of defect.
33. The robe's lower hem is decorated with alternating pomegranates (rimmonim — fabric ornaments in the three colored yarns) and gold bells (pa'amonei zahav). The pomegranate was a symbol of fertility and abundance throughout the ancient Near East. The alternating pattern — fruit, bell, fruit, bell — creates both visual beauty and audible announcement: the priest's movements produce sound.

34. The alternating pattern stated rhythmically: pa'amon zahav verimmon, pa'amon zahav verimmon — bell and fruit, bell and fruit. The repetition in the Hebrew text mirrors the physical pattern on the garment. The priest walking in the sanctuary creates a gentle chiming — his presence is heard before he is seen.
35. The bells' purpose is survival: venishma qolo ('its sound shall be heard') — the chiming announces the priest's approach and departure. Velo yamut ('so that he does not die') — silence could be fatal. The priest must be heard; unannounced entry into God's presence is lethal. The bells function as a kind of sacred doorbell — the priest does not sneak into God's presence but approaches with audible notice.
36. The tsits ('plate, flower, blossom') — a golden frontlet worn on the turban — bears the inscription qodesh laYHWH ('holy to the LORD'). This is the most visible element of the priestly wardrobe: a golden declaration across the forehead, visible to everyone who faces the priest. The priest's forehead proclaims what his entire person embodies: holiness dedicated to God. The word tsits also means 'blossom' — the golden plate may have been flower-shaped, creating a visual connection between the priest's forehead and the almond-blossom menorah.
37. The golden plate is attached by a petil tekhelet ('blue cord') to the mitsnefet ('turban'). The blue cord — the same color as the robe (v31) — holds the plate on the forehead's front (el-mul penei-hammitnefet). The first thing anyone sees when facing the high priest is the gold inscription: HOLY TO THE LORD.
38. The golden plate's function: venasa Aharon et-avon haqqodashim ('Aaron shall bear the guilt of the holy things'). The priest absorbs the imperfections in Israel's offerings — if an offering was presented with some flaw or procedural error, the golden plate atones for it. The priest's forehead, declaring HOLY TO THE LORD, covers the gap between Israel's imperfect worship and God's perfect standard. Tamid ('always') — the plate is never removed during service. Leratson lahem lifnei YHWH ('for their acceptance before the LORD') — the priest's bearing of guilt makes the people acceptable.
39. Three garments specified: the ketonet shesh ('fine linen tunic' — woven in a tashbets/checkered pattern), the mitsnefet shesh ('fine linen turban'), and the avnet ma'aseh roqem ('sash of embroidered work'). These are the undergarments — less visible than the ephod and breastpiece but equally prescribed. Even the layers no one sees are made with care and precision.
40. Aaron's sons receive a simpler three-piece set: kuttonot ('tunics'), avnetim ('sashes'), and migba'ot ('caps' — not the full turban of the high priest). The same purpose phrase — lekhevod uletof'aret ('for glory and for splendor') — applies to their garments as to Aaron's. Every priest, not only the high priest, wears sacred clothing. The garments of the ordinary priests are simpler but no less sacred.
41. Three acts of priestly installation: mashachta ('anoint' — with the sacred oil of 30:22-33), milleita et-yadam ('fill their hands' — ordination, literally 'fill the hand,' a gesture of commissioning), and qiddashta ('consecrate' — set apart for sacred service). The clothing comes first (vehilbashta), then anointing, ordination, and consecration. The sequence moves from external (garments) to internal (anointing) to functional (ordination) to status (consecration).
42. Mikhnesei-bad ('linen undergarments') cover besar ervah ('the flesh of nakedness') — from waist to thighs. The instruction is practical and theological: priests serving at an elevated altar must not expose themselves (cf. 20:26). The linen material (bad) is the priestly fabric — even undergarments are sacred textile. Modesty at the altar is a matter of holiness, not merely decorum.
43. The chapter closes with the garment requirement's ultimate sanction: velo-yise'u avon vamet'u ('so they do not bear guilt and die'). Improper priestly attire is not a dress code violation but a life-or-death matter. The sacred garments are the boundary between the priest's mortality and God's holiness — without them, the encounter is fatal. Chuqqat olam lo uleazar'o acharav ('a permanent statute for him and his descendants after him') — the garment regulations are perpetual, binding on every generation of priests. Chapter 28 has dressed the priest from head to toe: turban with golden plate, ephod with shoulder stones, breastpiece with twelve gems and Urim/Thummim, blue robe with bells and pomegranates, checkered tunic, sash, and linen undergarments. Every element serves a theological function: the priest carries Israel's names, bears Israel's guilt, announces his presence with sound, and proclaims God's holiness on his forehead.

Summary: God prescribes the seven-day ordination ceremony for the priests — washing, dressing, anointing, and three sacrifices (bull for purification, ram for burnt offering, ram of ordination). The chapter culminates in God's promise: 'I will dwell among the sons of Israel and be their God.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The ordination ceremony (millu'im, 'filling of the hands') transforms ordinary Israelites into priests through a sequence of washing, clothing, anointing, and sacrifice. Blood is applied to the right ear, right thumb, and right big toe of the priests (v20) — consecrating hearing, action, and walk. The climactic promise of v45-46 states the purpose of the entire exodus: 'I will dwell among the sons of Israel and be their God... who brought them out of the land of Egypt that I might dwell among them.' The tabernacle is the goal; the exodus was the means.

Translation Friction: We rendered millu'im as 'ordination' rather than the literal 'filling of hands,' though we noted the idiom — in the ancient Near East, having one's hands filled meant being authorized for office. The three sacrifices serve distinct functions (purification, devotion, consecration) that the English word 'offering' tends to flatten; we specified each type. The blood on ear, thumb, and toe (v20) we rendered literally, letting the ritual symbolism speak through the strangeness of the act.

Connections: The ordination is executed in Leviticus 8-9. The ear-thumb-toe blood application connects to the cleansing ritual for healed skin disease in Leviticus 14:14. The indwelling promise (v45-46) echoes the covenant formula of 6:7 and points forward to John 1:14 and Revelation 21:3. The daily burnt offering (vv38-42) establishes the perpetual worship pattern that continues through Israel's temple history.

¹"This is what you shall do to them to consecrate them to serve Me as priests: Take one young bull and two unblemished rams, ²along with unleavened bread, unleavened loaves mixed with oil, and unleavened wafers spread with oil — made from wheat flour. ³Place them in a single basket and bring them in the basket, along with the bull and the two rams. ⁴Bring Aaron and his sons to the entrance of the tent of meeting and wash them with water. ⁵Take the garments and dress Aaron in the tunic, the robe of the ephod, the ephod, and the breastpiece. Fasten the ephod on him with its waistband. ⁶Place the turban on his head and set the holy diadem on the turban. ⁷Take the anointing oil, pour it on his head, and anoint him. ⁸Bring his sons forward and dress them in tunics. ⁹Bind sashes on Aaron and his sons and put caps on them. The priesthood shall be theirs as a permanent statute. Then you shall ordain Aaron and his sons. ¹⁰Bring the bull before the tent of meeting. Aaron and his sons shall lay their hands on the bull's head. ¹¹Slaughter the bull before the LORD at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ¹²Take some of the bull's blood and apply it to the horns of the altar with your finger. Pour all the remaining blood at the base of the altar. ¹³Take all the fat covering the entrails, the lobe of the liver, the two kidneys, and the fat on them, and turn them into smoke on the altar. ¹⁴But the flesh of the bull, its hide, and its dung you shall burn outside the camp. It is a purification offering. ¹⁵Take the first ram, and Aaron and his sons shall lay their hands on the ram's head. ¹⁶Slaughter the ram, collect its blood, and dash it against the sides of the altar. ¹⁷Cut the ram into sections, wash its entrails and legs, and arrange them with the other sections and the head. ¹⁸Turn the entire ram into smoke on the altar — it is a burnt offering to the LORD, a pleasing aroma, a fire offering to the LORD. ¹⁹Take the second ram, and Aaron and his sons shall lay their hands on its head. ²⁰Slaughter the ram and take some of its blood. Apply it to the lobe of Aaron's right ear, the lobe of his sons' right ears, the thumb of their right hands, and the big toe of their right feet. Dash the remaining blood against the sides of the altar. ²¹Take some of the blood from the altar and some of the anointing oil, and sprinkle it on Aaron and his garments, and on his sons and their garments. He and his garments will be consecrated, along with his sons and their garments. ²²Take from the ram the fat, the fat tail, the fat covering the entrails, the lobe of the liver, the two kidneys with the fat on them, and the right thigh — for it is the ram of ordination. ²³Take one round loaf, one loaf of oiled bread, and one wafer from the basket of unleavened bread that is before the LORD. ²⁴Place everything on the palms of Aaron and his sons, and elevate them as a wave offering before the LORD. ²⁵Then take them from their hands and turn them into smoke on the altar, on top of the burnt offering — a pleasing aroma before the LORD, a fire offering to the LORD. ²⁶Take the breast of Aaron's ordination ram and elevate it as a wave offering before the LORD. It shall be your portion. ²⁷Consecrate the breast of the wave offering and the thigh of the contribution — what was elevated and what was offered — from the ordination ram of Aaron and his sons. ²⁸This shall be a permanent allotment for Aaron and his sons from the Israelites, for it is a contribution — a contribution the Israelites give to the LORD from their peace offering sacrifices. ²⁹Aaron's sacred garments shall pass to his sons after him, for their anointing and ordination in them. ³⁰The son who succeeds him as priest shall wear them for seven days when he enters the tent of meeting to serve in the holy place. ³¹Take the ordination ram and boil its meat in a holy place. ³²Aaron and his sons shall eat the ram's meat and the bread from the basket at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ³³They shall eat the things through which atonement was made for their ordination and consecration. No unauthorized person may eat them — they are holy. ³⁴If any of the ordination meat or bread remains until morning, burn the remainder in fire. It must not be eaten — it is holy. ³⁵Do this for Aaron and his sons exactly as I have commanded you. Their ordination shall last seven days. ³⁶Offer a bull as a purification offering each day for atonement. Purify the altar by making atonement for it, and anoint it to consecrate it. ³⁷For seven days make atonement for the altar and consecrate it. The altar will become most holy — whatever touches it becomes holy. ³⁸"This is what you shall offer on the altar: two year-old lambs each day, regularly. ³⁹Offer one lamb in the morning and the second lamb at twilight, ⁴⁰with the first lamb: a tenth of an ephah of fine flour mixed with a quarter hin of pressed oil, and a quarter hin of wine as a drink offering. ⁴¹Offer the second lamb at twilight with the same grain offering and drink offering as in the morning — a pleasing aroma, a fire offering to the LORD. ⁴²This is a perpetual burnt offering throughout your generations, at the entrance of the tent of meeting before the LORD — where I will meet with you to speak with you there. ⁴³I will meet there with the Israelites, and it will be sanctified by My glory. ⁴⁴I will consecrate the tent of meeting and the altar. I will consecrate Aaron and his sons to serve Me as priests. ⁴⁵I will dwell among the Israelites and be their God. ⁴⁶They will know that I am the LORD their God, who brought them out of the land of Egypt so that I might dwell among them. I am the LORD their God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The consecration ceremony (millu'im — 'ordination, filling of hands') requires three animals: one bull (par) and two rams (eilim). The bull will serve as a purification offering (v10-14), the first ram as a burnt offering (v15-18), and the second ram — uniquely — as the 'ram of ordination' (v19-28). Three animals for three ritual functions: purification, devotion, and consecration. The phrase leqaddesh otam lekahen li ('to consecrate them to serve Me as priests') defines the ceremony's purpose.
2. Three types of unleavened bread accompany the animal sacrifices — the same three forms as the grain offering (Lev 2:4): plain bread (lechem matzot), loaves mixed with oil (challot matzot belulot bashemen), and wafers spread with oil (reqiqei matzot meshuchim bashemen). All from solet chittim ('wheat flour' — premium flour). The bread will be used in the ordination ceremony's wave offering (v23-25).
3. All the bread goes into one basket (sal echad) for presentation alongside the three animals. The unified basket symbolizes the integrated nature of the ceremony: grain and animal offerings together constitute the full ordination provision.
4. The ceremony begins at petach ohel mo'ed ('the entrance of the tent of meeting') — the threshold between ordinary and sacred space. The first act: verachasta otam bamayim ('wash them with water'). Washing precedes everything else — the priests must be ritually purified before dressing, anointing, or sacrificing. The water removes the common-zone status; what follows builds the sacred status.
5. The dressing sequence is inside-out: kuttonet ('tunic' — next to skin), me'il ha'efod ('robe of the ephod' — the blue garment), efod ('ephod' — the outer vest), and choshen ('breastpiece'). Moses dresses Aaron — the high priest does not dress himself for consecration. The passive receiving of garments emphasizes that the priestly office is given, not taken. Aaron stands still while Moses clothes him in sacred identity.
6. The mitsnefet ('turban') goes on last — the head covering. The nezer haqqodesh ('holy diadem/crown') is the golden plate inscribed 'HOLY TO THE LORD' (28:36). The word nezer also means 'consecration' (as in the Nazirite's nezer, Num 6:7) — the crown is both a visible badge and a status marker. The dressing is complete: Aaron now wears every element described in chapter 28.
7. The anointing — velaqachta et-shemen hammishchah veyatsaqta al-rosho — is the defining act of consecration. The oil (the sacred blend of 30:22-33) is poured on Aaron's head, flowing down over the garments (Ps 133:2 describes it running down Aaron's beard to the collar of his robes). The verb mashachta ('anoint') is the root of mashiach ('messiah, anointed one'). Aaron becomes the first mashiach — the anointed priest.
8. Aaron's sons receive the simpler priestly wardrobe: kuttonot ('tunics'). Their dressing is briefer — three items (tunic, sash, caps) compared to Aaron's eight-piece ensemble. The brevity reflects the distinction between the high priest and ordinary priests.
9. With all garments in place — sashes (avnet) and caps (migba'ot) completing the ensemble — the priesthood becomes a permanent institution: vehaytah lahem kehunnah lechuqqat olam ('the priesthood shall be theirs as a permanent statute'). The phrase umilleita yad-Aharon veyad-banav ('you shall fill the hand of Aaron and his sons') is the technical term for ordination. 'Filling the hand' (millu'im) may refer to placing the offering portions in the priests' hands (v24) — the gesture that officially commissions them for service.
10. The first sacrifice: the bull as purification offering (chata't, v14). Aaron and all his sons perform semikhah together — they press their hands on the bull's head as a group. This is the same identification gesture from Leviticus 1:4 and 4:4, but here the soon-to-be-priests identify with the animal that will purify the altar for their future service. They cannot serve at an impure altar; the bull's blood will cleanse it.
11. Moses performs the slaughter — not Aaron, who is not yet consecrated to handle sacrificial blood. The location petach ohel mo'ed ('at the entrance of the tent of meeting') is the standard slaughter site for offerings.
12. The blood application follows the chata't procedure for a leader or commoner (Lev 4:25, 30): finger-applied to the altar horns, remainder poured at the base. The altar itself must be purified before it can receive regular offerings — consecration cleanses the instrument of worship before the worshippers are consecrated to use it.
13. The standard fat-portion formula (Lev 3:3-4, 4:8-9): internal fat, liver lobe, two kidneys with their fat — all burned on the altar. The fat belongs to God, as established throughout the offering system.

14. The bull's remaining parts are burned outside the camp (michutz lamachaneh) — the standard disposal for the priestly chata't (Lev 4:11-12, 6:23). The identification chattat hu ('it is a purification offering') classifies this sacrifice. The altar has been purified; the priests can now proceed to the burnt offering.
15. The second sacrifice: the first ram as a burnt offering (olah, v18). Again, collective semikhah — all five men press their hands on the animal. The progression from chata't (purification) to olah (total devotion) follows the standard Levitical sequence: cleansing before surrender.
16. The olah blood is dashed (zaraqta — the forceful splashing, not finger-painting) against the altar on all sides (saviv). This matches the standard olah procedure of Leviticus 1:5, 11.
17. The standard olah butchering procedure from Leviticus 1:6-9: sectioning, washing the entrails and legs, then arranging all parts on the altar.
18. The olah is entirely consumed: vehiqarta et-kol-ha'ayil ('turn the entire ram into smoke'). The threefold identification — olah hu laYHWH, reach nichoach, issheh laYHWH — emphasizes the completeness of the offering. Total devotion precedes the ordination sacrifice (v19-28) that will follow.
19. The third and most distinctive sacrifice: eil hammillu'im — the 'ram of ordination' (named in v22). This ram is unique in the sacrificial system: its blood is applied to the priests' bodies (v20), and its meat is used in a wave offering that the priests themselves eat (v31-34). No other offering in the Torah has this character.
20. The ordination blood application is unique in the Torah: blood on the ear (tenukh ozen — 'earlobe,' the organ of hearing/obedience), the thumb (bohen yad — the hand's primary working digit), and the big toe (bohen regel — the foot's weight-bearing digit). Three body parts representing three dimensions of priestly service: hearing God's word (ear), doing God's work (hand), and walking in God's ways (foot). The right side (yemanit) is the side of strength and honor. The entire priest — hearing, acting, walking — is consecrated by blood.
21. Blood and oil together — the two consecrating substances — are sprinkled on both the priests and their garments. The result: veqadash hu uvegadav uvanav uvigdei vanav itto ('he and his garments and his sons and his sons' garments with him will be consecrated'). Person and clothing are consecrated as a unit — the garments are not merely worn by holy people; they are themselves made holy through the same blood and oil. The priest's identity and his vestments are inseparable.
22. The ordination ram's portions include everything given to God in a shelamim (fat, liver lobe, kidneys) plus the right thigh (shoq hayyamin) — which in normal shelamim goes to the priest (Lev 7:32-33). Here it is part of the consecration offering itself. The identification ki eil millu'im hu ('for it is the ram of ordination') names this unique sacrifice. The millu'im exists only for this purpose — priestly installation — and is never repeated in the regular sacrificial calendar.
23. One piece from each of the three bread types prepared in v2 — a representative selection from the basket. The bread is placed before the LORD (lifnei YHWH) — it has been in God's presence during the entire ceremony.
24. This is the act that gives the ceremony its name: vesamta hakkol al kappei Aharon ve'al kappei vanav ('place everything on the palms of Aaron and his sons'). Their hands are literally 'filled' (millu'im) with the offerings. The filled-hands gesture — fat, thigh, and bread all resting on the priests' open palms — is the physical commissioning: you now hold sacred things. The wave offering (tenufah) before the LORD presents the filled hands to God for approval.
25. Moses takes the items back from the priests' hands and burns them on the altar. The cycle is complete: offerings placed in hands (commissioning), then given to God (worship). The priests' first act with filled hands is to surrender what was given — the priesthood's inaugural gesture is giving to God.
26. The breast (chazeh) of the ordination ram goes to Moses — vehayah lekha lemanah ('it shall be your portion'). In the regular shelamim, the breast goes to the priests (Lev 7:31). But at this ceremony, Moses is the officiant — the one who consecrates the priests — and he receives the officiant's share. Moses functions as the priest who creates priests.
27. The breast (chazeh hattenufah) and thigh (shoq hatterumah) are formally consecrated — qiddashta — as sacred portions. These two cuts become the permanent priestly allotment from all future shelamim (Lev 7:31-34). The ordination ceremony establishes the precedent that governs all subsequent priestly food rights.
28. The ordination establishes the choq-olam ('permanent statute') governing priestly food rights. The breast and thigh from every future shelamim will go to Aaron's priestly line — terumah ('contribution') from Israel to God, given through God to the priests. The system is circular: Israel gives to God; God gives to the priests; the priests serve Israel. Everyone provides, everyone receives.
29. The high priestly garments are hereditary — uvigdei haqqodesh asher le'Aaron yihyu levanav acharav ('Aaron's sacred garments shall be for his sons after him'). Each new high priest wears the same garments for their lemoshchah bahem ullemalle-vam et-yadam ('anointing and hand-filling'). The garments outlast any individual priest — the vestments carry the office across generations.
30. The successor wears the garments for shiv'at yamim ('seven days') — a full week of wearing the sacred vestments before beginning regular service. The seven-day investiture period allows the new priest to grow into the garments and the identity they represent.
31. The ordination ram's meat (remaining after the fat, thigh, and breast have been removed) is boiled (bishalta — 'cooked by boiling') in a sacred precinct (maqom qadosh). This cooked meat will be the priests' consecration meal (v32-33) — their first priestly meal, eaten at the threshold of their new identity.

32. The consecration meal: ve'akhal Aharon uvanav et-besar ha'ayil ve'et-hallechem asher bassal ('Aaron and his sons shall eat the ram's meat and the bread from the basket'). The first priestly meal is eaten at petach ohel mo'ed ('the entrance of the tent of meeting') — the same threshold where the ceremony began (v4). The priests eat the consecration sacrifice at the boundary between ordinary and sacred space, physically consuming their new identity.
33. The food's function: asher kuppar bahem ('through which atonement was made') — the meat and bread are not merely food but the substance of atonement and consecration. Eating is the final act of the ordination: the consecration enters the priests' bodies. The restriction — vezar lo-yokhal ki-qodesh hem ('no unauthorized person may eat, for they are holy') — limits this meal to the consecrated priests. The zar ('unauthorized/outsider') cannot participate in what makes the priesthood.
34. Same-day consumption rule (as with the todah, Lev 7:15): nothing may survive until morning. Leftover consecration food is burned — not discarded but destroyed by fire, because ki-qodesh hu ('it is holy'). Holy food that exceeds its time window becomes dangerous, not merely stale.
35. The entire ceremony (v1-34) is repeated for seven consecutive days: shiv'at yamim temalle yadam ('seven days you shall fill their hands'). Seven days of the same sacrifices, the same dressing, the same meal. The repetition is not redundancy but saturation — the priests are immersed in consecration for a complete cycle of time.
36. A daily chata't bull for the full seven days — seven bulls total for altar purification alone. The altar is both purified (chitte'ta — 'de-sin, purge') and anointed (umashachta oto leqaddesho — 'anoint it to consecrate it'). The consecration of the priests and the consecration of the altar happen simultaneously — both must be ready before the regular sacrificial system can begin.
37. After seven days of purification: vehayah hammizbeach qodesh qodashim ('the altar will be most holy'). The contagious holiness principle: kol-hannogea bammizbeach yiqdash ('whatever touches the altar becomes holy'). The altar's holiness is so intense that contact with it consecrates — a dangerous property that requires careful management. The seven-day consecration transforms common bronze into the most holy surface in the courtyard.
38. The consecration legislation transitions to the tamid — the daily offering that will continue in perpetuity after the ordination is complete. Kevasim benei-shanah shenayim layyom tamid ('two year-old lambs each day, continually'). The morning and evening tamid (v39-41) is the heartbeat of the sacrificial system — every day, without exception, two lambs are offered. The priests ordained in v1-37 will spend their careers performing this daily ritual.
39. The daily rhythm: babboqer ('in the morning') and bein ha'arbayim ('at twilight'). The day is bracketed by sacrifice — Israel's first and last communal act each day is worship. The morning lamb starts the sacred day; the evening lamb closes it.
40. Each lamb is accompanied by a grain offering (issaron solet — a tenth ephah of flour with pressed oil) and a drink offering (nesekh — a quarter hin of wine). The daily offering is not just animal sacrifice but a full meal presented to God: bread (flour), oil, meat (lamb), and drink (wine). God's 'table' is set twice daily with the elements of a complete meal.
41. The evening offering mirrors the morning exactly: keminchah habboqer ukheniskhah ('like the morning's grain offering and drink offering'). The symmetry ensures that every day begins and ends identically: the same lamb, the same flour, the same oil, the same wine, the same fire, the same pleasing aroma. The daily rhythm never varies.
42. The tamid is olat tamid ledoroteikhem ('a perpetual burnt offering throughout your generations'). The location — petach ohel-mo'ed lifnei YHWH — is further defined: asher ivva'ed lakhem shamah ledabber elekha sham ('where I will meet with you to speak with you there'). The daily offering is not merely a ritual obligation but the occasion for divine encounter. God meets Israel at the altar — the tamid creates the conditions for communication between heaven and earth. Every morning and evening, God speaks at the place where the offering ascends.
43. Veno'adti shamah livnei Yisra'el ('I will meet there with the Israelites') — God commits to a specific location for encounter. Veniqdash bikhvodi ('and it will be sanctified by My glory') — the kavod register term in its most powerful context: God's glory does not merely visit the tabernacle; it sanctifies it. The divine presence transforms the space from constructed tent to sacred dwelling. The kavod that fills the tabernacle (40:34) is the glory that sanctifies it here.
44. God speaks in first person: veqidDashti ('I will consecrate'). The entire preceding ceremony — Moses washing, dressing, anointing, sacrificing — is validated by divine action. Ultimately, it is God who consecrates the tent, the altar, and the priests. Human ceremony enacts what divine power accomplishes. The sequence — tent, altar, persons — covers the full scope of sacred space and sacred personnel.
45. The climax of the entire tabernacle legislation: veshakhanti betokh benei Yisra'el ('I will dwell in the midst of the Israelites'). Everything from Exodus 25 through 29 — the ark, the table, the menorah, the curtains, the altar, the courtyard, the garments, the consecration — exists to make this dwelling possible. The Shekhinah concept begins here: God taking up permanent residence among His people. Vehayiti lahem le'Elohim ('I will be their God') — the covenant formula from Leviticus 26:12 and throughout the Bible — appears as the consequence of divine indwelling. Presence produces relationship.
46. The final verse redefines the exodus itself: asher hotseti otam me'erets Mitsrayim leshakhni betokham ('who brought them out of Egypt so that I might dwell among them'). The purpose of the exodus was not merely liberation from slavery but the creation of a community in which God could dwell. God did not bring Israel out of Egypt so they could be free — He brought them out so He could live among them. Freedom was the means; divine presence was the end. The closing signature — ani YHWH Eloheihem ('I am the LORD their God') — appears twice in two verses (v45-46), framing the Shekhinah promise with the divine identity. The chapter ends where the entire tabernacle section began: with the God who wants to dwell with His people.

Summary: God prescribes the gold incense altar for the Holy Place, the half-shekel census offering as 'ransom for your lives,' the bronze basin for priestly washing, the holy anointing oil, and the sacred incense. Each is restricted to sacred use only.

What Makes This Remarkable: The incense altar appears last among the tabernacle furnishings, after priestly garments and ordination — its ministry belongs to consecrated priests alone. The census ransom (kofer nafsho, 'ransom for his life,' v12) establishes that counting people is theologically freighted: to number Israel is to claim what belongs to God, and a payment acknowledges divine ownership. The anointing oil recipe and incense formula are given once and declared permanently exclusive — 'whoever compounds any like it... shall be cut off from his people' (vv33, 38). Sacred recipes are not for private use.

Translation Friction: We rendered kofer as 'ransom' to preserve the redemption theology — each person pays because their life belongs to God and numbering them without acknowledgment of this is dangerous. The anointing oil ingredients (myrrh, cinnamon, calamus, cassia, olive oil) we rendered with their standard English names, though some identifications are approximate. The phrase 'cut off from his people' (nikrat, v33) we retained literally — the exact penalty (death, exile, or divine punishment) is debated, but the severity is clear.

Connections: The incense altar is the setting for Zechariah's vision in Luke 1:8-11. The census ransom anticipates the temple tax of Matthew 17:24-27. The anointing oil connects to the royal anointing tradition (1 Samuel 16:13) and the messianic title 'Anointed One' (Mashiach). The Day of Atonement blood on the incense altar horns (v10) is prescribed in Leviticus 16:18.

¹"You shall make an altar for burning incense. Make it of acacia wood. ²It shall be one cubit long and one cubit wide — square — and two cubits high. Its horns shall be of one piece with it. ³Overlay it with pure gold — its top, its sides all around, and its horns — and make a gold molding around it. ⁴Make two gold rings for it below the molding, on its two sides — on opposite sides — as holders for the poles used to carry it. ⁵Make the poles of acacia wood and overlay them with gold. ⁶Place it in front of the veil that screens the ark of the testimony — before the atonement cover that is over the testimony — where I will meet with you. ⁷Aaron shall burn fragrant incense on it every morning — when he tends the lamps, he shall burn it. ⁸When Aaron lights the lamps at twilight, he shall burn it — perpetual incense before the LORD throughout your generations. ⁹You must not offer unauthorized incense on it, nor burnt offering, nor grain offering, and you must not pour a drink offering on it. ¹⁰Once a year Aaron shall make atonement on its horns — with the blood of the purification offering of atonement, once a year he shall purify it throughout your generations. It is most holy to the LORD." ¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹²"When you take a census of the Israelites by counting them, each person shall give a ransom for his life to the LORD at the time of the counting, so that no plague will strike them when they are counted. ¹³This is what each person who is registered shall give: half a shekel by the sanctuary standard (the shekel being twenty gerahs) — a half shekel as a contribution to the LORD. ¹⁴Everyone who is registered, from twenty years old and above, shall give the LORD's contribution. ¹⁵The wealthy must not give more, and the poor must not give less than the half shekel, when giving the LORD's contribution to make atonement for your lives. ¹⁶Take the atonement money from the Israelites and designate it for the service of the tent of meeting. It shall serve as a memorial for the Israelites before the LORD, to make atonement for your lives." ¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁸"Make a bronze basin with a bronze stand for washing. Place it between the tent of meeting and the altar, and put water in it. ¹⁹Aaron and his sons shall wash their hands and feet from it. ²⁰When they enter the tent of meeting they shall wash with water so they will not die, or when they approach the altar to serve, turning fire offerings into smoke for the LORD. ²¹They shall wash their hands and feet so they will not die — a permanent statute for him and his descendants throughout their generations." ²²The LORD spoke to Moses: ²³"Take the finest spices: five hundred shekels of liquid myrrh, half that amount — two hundred fifty — of fragrant cinnamon, two hundred fifty of fragrant cane, ²⁴five hundred of cassia — all by the sanctuary standard — and a hin of olive oil. ²⁵Make it into a sacred anointing oil — a perfumer's compound, expertly blended. It shall be a sacred anointing oil. ²⁶With it you shall anoint the tent of meeting and the ark of the testimony, ²⁷the table and all its utensils, the lampstand and its utensils, the altar of incense, ²⁸the burnt offering altar and all its utensils, and the basin and its stand. ²⁹You shall consecrate them so they become most holy. Whatever touches them becomes holy. ³⁰You shall anoint Aaron and his sons and consecrate them to serve Me as priests. ³¹Tell the Israelites: This shall be My sacred anointing oil throughout your generations. ³²It must not be poured on the body of any ordinary person, and you must not make anything with the same formula. It is holy — it shall be holy to you. ³³Anyone who blends something like it, or who puts any of it on an unauthorized person, shall be cut off from their people." ³⁴The LORD said to Moses, "Take aromatic spices — stacte, onycha, and galbanum — these spices along with pure frankincense, in equal parts. ³⁵Blend it into incense — a perfumer's compound, salted, pure, and holy. ³⁶Grind some of it to a fine powder and place it before the testimony in the tent of meeting, where I will meet with you. It shall be most holy to you. ³⁷The incense that you make — you must not make any with the same formula for your own use. It shall be holy to you, reserved for the LORD. ³⁸Anyone who makes incense like it for personal enjoyment shall be cut off from their people."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The incense altar (mizbach miqtar qetoret) is introduced last among the tabernacle furnishings — separate from the main instructions in chapters 25-27. Its placement here, after the priestly garments (ch 28) and consecration (ch 29), may reflect its close association with priestly ministry: only consecrated priests burn incense. Acacia wood (atsei shittim) is the same material as the ark (25:10) and the table (25:23) — a hard, durable desert wood.
2. The dimensions: one cubit by one cubit by two cubits (approximately 18" x 18" x 36") — much smaller than the burnt offering altar (27:1, five cubits square). The incense altar is intimate, designed for the confined space of the holy place. The horns (qarnot) project from the four corners, as on the burnt offering altar — these become the points where the Day of Atonement blood is applied (v10). The phrase mimmennu qarnotav ('its horns from it') means the horns are carved from the same piece, not attached separately.
3. The incense altar is gold-covered (zahav tahor — 'pure gold'), placing it in the gold zone of the tabernacle (holy place) rather than the bronze zone (courtyard). The zer zahav ('gold molding/crown') is a decorative border running around the top, also found on the ark (25:11) and the table (25:24). The three gold-crowned furnishings — ark, table, incense altar — form the interior ensemble of the holy place.
4. The transport system: two gold rings on opposite sides hold the carrying poles. Like the ark (25:14-15) and the table (25:27-28), the incense altar must be portable — designed for a community on the move. The tabernacle's furnishings are built for travel; none are permanent installations.
5. Gold-overlaid acacia poles — the same construction as the ark's poles (25:13). Every element that enters the holy place must be gold-covered. The consistency of materials (acacia + gold) across all the holy place furnishings creates a unified aesthetic: warm wood wrapped in brilliant metal.
6. The incense altar's location is precisely defined: lifnei happarokhet ('before the veil') — in the holy place, directly in front of the curtain separating it from the most holy place. The text looks through the veil to identify what lies behind it: the kapporet ('atonement cover') over the ark. The phrase asher ivva'ed lekha shammah ('where I will meet with you there') makes the incense altar the point closest to God's presence that the daily priestly ministry reaches. The incense rises toward the veil — toward God — every morning and evening.
7. The daily incense offering is coordinated with the lamp maintenance: babboqer babboqer ('every morning, morning by morning') the priest tends the menorah's lamps and burns incense simultaneously. The two daily rituals — light and fragrance — together fill the holy place. The qetoret sammim ('fragrant incense') is the specific blend prescribed in v34-38, never to be reproduced for common use.
8. The evening complement to the morning incense (v7): bein ha'arbayim ('between the evenings,' i.e., at twilight). The designation qetoret tamid ('perpetual incense') parallels the perpetual fire of 27:20 and the perpetual lamp — the holy place never lacks light, fragrance, or fire. The incense is lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — directed toward the divine presence behind the veil. Prayer is later associated with incense (Ps 141:2; Rev 5:8): the ascending smoke represents communication directed upward toward God.
9. Four prohibitions protect the incense altar's exclusive function: no qetoret zarah ('unauthorized incense' — the same adjective zarah used for Nadab and Abihu's 'unauthorized fire' in Lev 10:1), no olah, no minchah, no nesekh ('drink offering'). The incense altar has one purpose only: the authorized daily incense. It is not a general-purpose altar. The restriction underscores the principle that proximity to God requires exact obedience to prescribed forms.
10. The phrase middam chattat hakkippurim ('with the blood of the purification offering of atonements') refers to the Yom Kippur chata't described in Leviticus 16. The annual purification of the incense altar is one element of the Day of Atonement ritual. The designation qodesh qodashim hu laYHWH ('it is most holy to the LORD') classifies the incense altar at the highest sanctity level — the same category as the most holy offerings. The altar's holiness requires annual maintenance: even sacred objects accumulate the residue of a year's proximity to human impurity.

11. A new divine speech introduces the census atonement tax (v11-16) — a half-shekel per person collected whenever Israel is counted. The section shifts from sacred architecture to sacred economics: how does the community fund the tabernacle's ongoing operation?
12. The census is dangerous: counting people exposes them to divine attention in a way that can trigger plague (negef). The kofer nafsho ('ransom for his life/soul') is a payment that substitutes for the person — each individual 'redeems' themselves from the risk of being counted. The theology behind this is complex: numbering implies ownership (you count what belongs to you), and claiming ownership of what belongs to God requires a ransom payment. David's unauthorized census in 2 Samuel 24 demonstrates what happens when the ransom is not paid.
13. The amount is fixed: machatsit hasheqel ('half a shekel') by the sanctuary weight standard (sheqel haqqodesh). Twenty gerahs equals one shekel — approximately 11 grams of silver. The half-shekel is modest but mandatory: rich and poor pay the same amount (v15). The terumah laYHWH ('contribution to the LORD') designates it as sacred revenue, not civil taxation. This half-shekel later became the annual temple tax that Jesus discusses in Matthew 17:24-27.
14. The age threshold: mibben esrim shanah vama'lah ('from twenty years old and upward'). Twenty is the age of military service and census eligibility (Num 1:3). Only adults who count in the national register pay the ransom. The contribution is universal within this demographic — every adult male Israelite, regardless of wealth or status, pays the same half-shekel.
15. The most egalitarian provision in the Torah: he'ashir lo yarbeh vehadal lo yam'it ('the rich shall not give more, the poor shall not give less'). Before God, every life has the same value. The rich person's life is not worth more than the poor person's; the poor person's ransom is not discounted. The phrase lekhapper al-nafshoteikhem ('to make atonement for your lives') connects the census payment to kippur — this is not a fee but a redemption. Equal payment, equal value, equal standing before God.
16. The census money (kesef hakkippurim — 'atonement silver') funds the tabernacle's operations (avodat ohel mo'ed — 'the service of the tent of meeting'). The money has a dual function: it ransoms the counted and it sustains the sanctuary. The designation lezikkaron ('as a memorial') means the payment keeps Israel in God's awareness — a permanent financial sign of the covenant relationship. The tabernacle is funded by the community's redemption payments: the building where God dwells is sustained by the ransom of the people who dwell around it.
17. A new speech introduces the bronze basin (v17-21) — the washing station positioned between the tent of meeting and the burnt offering altar where priests purify their hands and feet before serving.
18. The kiyor nechoshet ('bronze basin') occupies a transitional position: bein-ohel mo'ed uvein hammizbeach ('between the tent of meeting and the altar') — the priest passes it when moving from the outer court to the tent. Bronze (nechoshet) identifies it with the outer court zone. The basin is purely functional: it holds water for priestly washing before service. No dimensions are given (unlike every other tabernacle furnishing), suggesting the basin's size was practical rather than symbolic.
19. Hands and feet — the instruments of priestly work (hands manipulate offerings) and priestly movement (feet walk on sacred ground). The washing is not for hygiene but for ritual fitness: the priest's body must be purified at its points of contact with sacred space and sacred objects. Every transition from common to sacred activity requires this washing.
20. The consequence of unwashed service is death: velo yamutu ('so they will not die'). Two occasions require washing: entering the tent of meeting (bevo'am el-ohel mo'ed) and approaching the altar (begishtam el-hammizbeach). The priestly body, unwashed, brings common-zone contamination into sacred space — and the collision between common and holy is lethal. The basin is not a convenience but a life-preserving boundary marker.
21. The washing requirement is chuq-olam ('a permanent statute') — the same perpetual designation given to the Sabbath (31:16), the fat-and-blood prohibition (Lev 3:17), and the priestly food allocation (Lev 7:34). Priestly washing is permanent, non-negotiable, and extends lo ulezar'o ledorotam ('for him and his descendants throughout their generations'). The ritual purity of the priesthood is as permanent as the priesthood itself.
22. A new speech introduces the anointing oil formula (v22-33) — a sacred blend reserved exclusively for consecrating the tabernacle, its furnishings, and the priests. This is followed by the incense formula (v34-38). Both are proprietary recipes: unauthorized reproduction is prohibited on pain of being 'cut off' from Israel.
23. The anointing oil recipe begins with besamim rosh ('finest/chief spices'). Three aromatic ingredients are measured by weight in sanctuary shekels: mor-deror ('liquid myrrh' — 500 shekels, about 12.5 lbs), qinnemon-besem ('fragrant cinnamon' — 250 shekels), and qeneh-vosem ('fragrant cane/calamus' — 250 shekels). These are luxury trade goods from distant regions — myrrh from Arabia, cinnamon likely from South or Southeast Asia, cane from tropical sources. The anointing oil is composed of the world's most precious aromatics.
24. The fourth spice: qiddah ('cassia' — 500 shekels, matching the myrrh). The base liquid is shemen zayit hin ('a hin of olive oil' — approximately one gallon). The total spice weight (1,500 shekels, roughly 37 lbs) infused in one gallon of olive oil would produce an extraordinarily concentrated, intensely fragrant anointing oil. The sanctuary standard (sheqel haqqodesh) ensures precise measurement.
25. The phrase roqach mirgachat ma'aseh roqeach ('a perfumer's compound, the work of a perfumer') uses the root r-q-ch ('to blend, to compound') three times — the blending must be done by a skilled craftsman, not casually. The double designation shemen mishchat-qodesh ('sacred anointing oil') appears at both the beginning and end of the verse, framing the formula as exclusively holy. Once blended, this oil exists in a category of its own — it is qodesh and may never be used for common purposes.
26. The anointing sequence begins with the most sacred items: the tent of meeting and the ark. Anointing with oil consecrates — it transfers the object from common to sacred status. The oil's application follows the same inside-out pattern as the tabernacle's construction: innermost objects first.

- 27. The holy place furnishings: table (with showbread utensils), menorah (with lamp-tending tools), and incense altar. Each item and its associated equipment are anointed — holiness extends to every tool that touches the sacred space.
- 28. The outer court furnishings: burnt offering altar and basin. Even the bronze-zone items receive the sacred oil — the anointing consecrates the entire tabernacle complex from the most holy place to the outer courtyard.
- 29. The anointing elevates everything to qodesh qodashim ('most holy') status. The contagious holiness principle returns: kol-hannogea bahem yiqdash ('whatever touches them becomes holy'). Once anointed, these objects transmit their sanctity to anything they contact — a chain reaction of holiness that requires careful management. Sacred space is not merely set apart; it is actively, dangerously holy.
- 30. The anointing of persons follows the anointing of objects: Aaron and his sons are consecrated with the same oil as the tabernacle. The purpose clause — lekahen li ('to serve Me as priests') — defines the priesthood as personal service to God. The oil that consecrates sacred furniture also consecrates sacred persons: the priesthood is as holy as the space in which it operates.
- 31. God claims the oil as li ('Mine') — it belongs to God and is used only for God's purposes. The phrase ledoroteikhem ('throughout your generations') makes the recipe and its restrictions permanent. The sacred oil is not a one-time preparation but a perpetual formula maintained across Israel's entire history.
- 32. Two prohibitions: (1) the oil must not be applied to common persons (al-besar adam lo yisakh — 'it must not be poured on human flesh,' i.e., anyone who is not a priest or sacred object), and (2) the formula must not be reproduced (uvematkunato lo ta'asu kamohu — 'in its proportion you must not make anything like it'). The recipe is proprietary in the strongest sense — it belongs to God and may not be duplicated. The double declaration qodesh hu, qodesh yihyeh lakhem ('it is holy, it shall be holy to you') makes the prohibition absolute.
- 33. The penalty for violating either prohibition is karet — being 'cut off' from the community. Two offenses: yirqach kamohu ('blends something like it' — reproducing the formula) and yitten mimmennu al-zar ('puts any of it on an outsider/unauthorized person'). The zar here means anyone outside the priesthood — the same word used for 'unauthorized fire' (esh zarah, Lev 10:1). The sacred oil's exclusivity is protected by the most severe communal penalty.
- 34. The incense formula: four ingredients in equal parts (bad bevad — 'part by part'). Nataf ('stacte' — a resinous gum, possibly storax or balsam), shecheleth ('onycha' — possibly a mollusk shell or plant resin), chelvena ('galbanum' — a strong-smelling plant gum), and levonah zakkah ('pure frankincense'). Galbanum is notably pungent, almost unpleasant alone — its inclusion in a sacred blend suggests that the final product's fragrance emerges from the combination of individual components that would not be beautiful separately.
- 35. Three qualities: memullach ('salted' — salt is added as a preservative and purifier, echoing the 'salt of the covenant' in Lev 2:13), tahor ('pure'), and qodesh ('holy'). The incense is compounded by a professional roqeach ('perfumer/apothecary'). The salt-pure-holy triad applies covenant symbolism (salt), ritual fitness (purity), and sacred status (holiness) to the incense simultaneously.
- 36. The incense is ground fine (shachaqta mimmennah hadeq — 'crush some of it to powder') for maximum fragrance release when burned. Its location — lifnei ha'edut be'ohel mo'ed ('before the testimony in the tent of meeting') — places it at the center of the holy place, near the incense altar and facing the ark. The phrase asher ivva'ed lekha shammah ('where I will meet with you there') repeats from v6: the incense rises in the place of divine encounter. The classification qodesh qodashim ('most holy') matches the incense altar itself.
- 37. The same prohibition as for the anointing oil (v32): the formula is exclusive. Bematkunatah lo ta'asu lakhem ('in its formula you must not make any for yourselves'). Private reproduction of sacred incense is prohibited — the fragrance belongs solely to the divine encounter. The restriction ensures that the scent of the sacred incense is experienced only in the tabernacle, nowhere else. It is set apart for the LORD (qodesh tihyeh lekha laYHWH).
- 38. The penalty for unauthorized incense replication: karet. The specific offense is making it lehariach bah ('to smell it,' i.e., for personal enjoyment of the fragrance). The sacred incense exists for one purpose — to rise before the LORD in the tent of meeting. Using the same formula for personal pleasure profanes what belongs to God. The chapter closes as it opened (v1-10): with the incense system, the most intimate element of the tabernacle's daily worship. The incense altar, the census ransom, the washing basin, the anointing oil, and the sacred incense together form the operational infrastructure that makes ongoing worship possible.

Summary: God names Bezalel and Oholiab as master craftsmen, fills them with His Spirit for the tabernacle work, reaffirms the Sabbath as a perpetual covenant sign, and gives Moses the two stone tablets 'written with the finger of God.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Bezalel is the first individual in the Torah whom God fills with His Spirit (ruach Elohim, v3) for a specific task — and that task is not prophecy or warfare but artistry. The same Spirit that hovered over the waters in Genesis 1:2 now empowers a craftsman. The four gifts — wisdom, understanding, knowledge, and skill — cover the full spectrum from abstract design to practical execution. The Sabbath command (vv12-17) bookends the tabernacle instructions: even sacred construction must yield to sacred rest. The tablets 'written with the finger of God' (v18) echo the magicians' recognition of 'the finger of God' in 8:19.

Translation Friction: We rendered ruach Elohim as 'Spirit of God' with a capital S, following the tradition that this is a genuine endowment of divine creative power, not merely 'a spirit of skill.' The name Betzal'el ('in the shadow of God') and Oholiav ('the Father's tent') we transliterated in standard form. The phrase 'finger of God' (etsba Elohim, v18) we rendered literally, preserving the anthropomorphic image that the Hebrew employs without embarrassment.

Connections: The Spirit-filling of Bezalel anticipates the Spirit's empowerment in Judges (e.g., Judges 3:10; 6:34), the prophets (Isaiah 61:1), and Pentecost (Acts 2:4). The Sabbath as covenant sign (v13) parallels circumcision as covenant sign (Genesis 17:11). The tablets written by God's finger connect to the magicians' confession in 8:19 and to Jesus writing on the ground in John 8:6.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"See — I have called by name Bezalel son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah. ³I have filled him with the Spirit of God — with wisdom, understanding, knowledge, and skill in every kind of craft: ⁴to design artistic works — to work in gold, silver, and bronze, ⁵in stone-cutting for settings, in wood-carving — to work in every kind of craft. ⁶I have also appointed alongside him Oholiab son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan. And in the heart of every skilled person I have placed wisdom, so that they may make everything I have commanded you: ⁷the tent of meeting, the ark of the testimony, the atonement cover upon it, and all the furnishings of the tent, ⁸the table and its utensils, the pure gold lampstand with all its utensils, the altar of incense, ⁹the burnt offering altar with all its utensils, the basin and its stand, ¹⁰the woven service garments, the holy garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments for his sons for their priestly service, ¹¹the anointing oil, and the fragrant incense for the holy place. They shall make everything exactly as I have commanded you." ¹²The LORD said to Moses: ¹³"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: You must keep My Sabbaths, for it is a sign between Me and you throughout your generations, so that you may know that I am the LORD who makes you holy. ¹⁴You shall keep the Sabbath, for it is holy to you. Anyone who profanes it shall be put to death. Anyone who does work on it — that person shall be cut off from their people. ¹⁵Six days work may be done, but the seventh day is a Sabbath of complete rest, holy to the LORD. Anyone who does work on the Sabbath day shall be put to death. ¹⁶The Israelites shall keep the Sabbath, observing it throughout their generations as an everlasting covenant. ¹⁷It is a sign between Me and the Israelites forever, for in six days the LORD made the heavens and the earth, and on the seventh day He ceased and was refreshed. ¹⁸When He had finished speaking with Moses on Mount Sinai, He gave him the two tablets of the testimony — stone tablets inscribed by the finger of God.

1. After seven chapters of tabernacle instructions (25-31), God now names the artisans who will build what He has described. The shift from design to execution is marked by this new speech formula. The plans come from God; the skill to realize them also comes from God.
2. God calls Bezalel 'by name' (beshemm) — a personal, specific summons, not a general appointment. The name Betzal'el means 'in the shadow of God' — the master craftsman works under divine protection. His lineage (Uri = 'my light,' Chur = possibly 'noble') is from Judah, the royal tribe. The first person God specifically commissions for a task in the Torah is not a priest or prophet but an artisan.
3. The phrase va'amalle oto ruach Elohim ('I have filled him with the Spirit of God') is the first instance in the Torah of the Spirit of God empowering a specific individual for a specific task. The four gifts — chokhmah ('wisdom'), tevunah ('understanding'), da'at ('knowledge'), and melakhah ('craft/workmanship') — cover the full spectrum from abstract design to practical execution. Artistic skill is presented as a divine endowment, not merely human talent. The Spirit of God enables sacred art.
4. The verb lachshov machashavot ('to devise designs, to think creative thoughts') uses the same root as 'thought' (machashavah). Artistic design is presented as a form of thinking — the craftsman does not merely follow blueprints but creates with intention and imagination. The three metals (gold, silver, bronze) are listed in descending value, matching the three zones of the tabernacle: gold in the holy of holies, silver for structural elements, bronze for the outer court.
5. Two additional materials beyond metals: stone (for the priestly breastplate settings, 28:17-20) and wood (for the ark, table, and structural frames). The comprehensive scope — bekhol-melakhah ('every kind of craft') — makes Bezalel a master of all the materials required for the tabernacle. No separate specialist is needed; God's Spirit-gift covers the full range.
6. God appoints a second craftsman: Oholiab ('the father's tent') from Dan — pairing Judah (the leading tribe) with Dan (a lesser tribe) in shared creative work. Beyond these two named artisans, God gives chokhmah ('wisdom') to kol-chakham-lev ('every wise-hearted person') — the skill is distributed broadly, not hoarded by an elite. The phrase natatti chokhmah ('I have placed wisdom') insists that even 'natural' talent is a divine gift. The closing clause — 'so they may make all I have commanded you' — connects the artisans' work directly to God's instructions in chapters 25-30.

7. The inventory of what must be built begins with the most sacred items: the tent of meeting (ohel mo'ed), the ark of the testimony (aron ha'edut), and the kapporet ('atonement cover/mercy seat') — the gold lid where God's presence dwells between the cherubim. The ordering follows the inside-out geography of the tabernacle: God's throne first, then the furnishings, then the outer structures.
8. Three holy place furnishings: the table (for the showbread, 25:23-30), the menorah (hammenorah hattehorah — 'the pure lampstand,' made of beaten gold, 25:31-40), and the incense altar (mizbach haqqetoret, 30:1-10). These occupy the chamber directly before the veil — the space where priestly worship occurs daily.
9. The outer court furnishings: the burnt offering altar (mizbach ha'olah, the large bronze altar, 27:1-8) and the basin (kiyor, the bronze washing basin for priestly purification, 30:17-21). The inventory moves outward from the holy of holies through the holy place to the courtyard, tracing the path a worshipper would travel in reverse.
10. Two categories of priestly clothing: bigdei hasserad ('woven service garments' — possibly the fabric coverings for the tabernacle furnishings during transport) and bigdei haqqodesh ('holy garments' — the priestly vestments described in ch 28). Aaron's garments and his sons' garments are listed separately, reflecting the distinction between the high priest's elaborate eight-piece outfit and the standard priestly four-piece set.
11. The inventory closes with two sacred substances: the anointing oil (shemen hammishchah, 30:22-33) and the sacred incense (qetoret hassammim, 30:34-38) — both with specific formulas that may not be replicated for common use. The closing phrase kekhol asher-tsiyvitikha ya'asu ('according to all I have commanded you they shall make') insists on exact execution. The artisans are Spirit-filled and creatively gifted, but their freedom operates within the boundaries of divine instruction.
12. A new divine speech introduces the Sabbath command (v12-17) — placed here, between the tabernacle instructions and the giving of the tablets, with deliberate theological purpose. The Sabbath is connected to both creation (v17) and the tabernacle. Building God's dwelling is the highest form of work, but even this work must stop for the Sabbath. No task — not even constructing God's house — overrides the rhythm God established at creation.
13. The Sabbath is identified as an ot ('sign') — the same word used for the rainbow (Gen 9:12) and circumcision (Gen 17:11). Each covenant has its sign: the Noahic covenant has the rainbow, the Abrahamic covenant has circumcision, and the Sinai covenant has the Sabbath. The purpose clause — lada'at ki ani YHWH meqaddishkem ('to know that I am the LORD who sanctifies you') — frames the Sabbath as a weekly declaration: God is the one who makes Israel holy. Holiness is not self-generated; it is received through obedience to God's rhythm.
14. Two penalties for Sabbath violation: death (mot yumat — the standard capital punishment formula) and karet ('cut off'). The verb mechalleleha ('profanes it') is from chahal ('to make common, to profane') — treating the holy as ordinary. Sabbath violation is not merely disobedience but profanation: collapsing the distinction between sacred time and common time. The severity reflects the Sabbath's status as the covenant sign — violating the sign repudiates the covenant.
15. The phrase shabbat shabbaton ('Sabbath of complete rest' — an intensified form, literally 'a sabbath of sabbath-ness') describes the most thoroughgoing cessation. The word shabbaton intensifies shabbat beyond ordinary rest into absolute, sacred stillness. This superlative form appears only for the weekly Sabbath and Yom Kippur (Lev 16:31) — the two most holy temporal observances.
16. The Sabbath is called berit olam ('everlasting covenant') — not merely a commandment but a covenant in its own right. This is the highest possible designation: the Sabbath itself is a covenant between God and Israel, permanent and binding across all generations. The phrase ledorotam ('throughout their generations') ensures perpetuity. Every Sabbath is a covenant renewal — a weekly re-entering of the agreement between God and His people.
17. The Sabbath is grounded in creation — the same rationale as Exodus 20:11. The final verb vayyinnafash ('was refreshed') is striking: from nephesh ('soul, being'), it suggests God was 're-souled' or 'caught His breath.' This is profoundly anthropomorphic — the infinite God is described as experiencing the refreshment of rest. The theological point: if God rested and was refreshed, how much more must humans? The Sabbath is not merely a rule but an imitation of divine behavior. Israel rests because God rested.
18. The chapter's final verse connects the entire Sinai legislation (chs 20-31) to its physical embodiment: shenei luchot ha'edut ('two tablets of the testimony'). These are not merely stone; they are ketuvim be'etsba Elohim ('written by the finger of God') — the only part of Scripture attributed to God's direct, physical inscription. The phrase kekhaloto ledabber itto ('when He finished speaking with him') marks the end of the divine audience that began in 24:18. Moses now descends carrying the evidence of everything God said — and descends into the catastrophe of the golden calf (ch 32).

Summary: While Moses is on the mountain, the people pressure Aaron to make a golden calf. God tells Moses the people have corrupted themselves. Moses intercedes, descends, shatters the tablets, destroys the calf, and the Levites execute judgment. Moses returns to the LORD to plead for the people.

What Makes This Remarkable: The gold used for the calf was Egypt's plunder (12:35-36) — what God provided for His dwelling is redirected to construct His rival. The verb yatsar ('fashioned,' v4) is the same word for God forming humanity in Genesis 2:7; Aaron creates in parody of God. The unanimity of idolatry mirrors the unanimity of covenant acceptance at Sinai (24:3, 7). Moses's intercession (vv11-14) stakes everything on God's reputation among the nations and His promises to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — covenant logic used to restrain covenant judgment.

Translation Friction: The phrase aseh-lanu elohim ('make us gods/a god,' v1) is ambiguous — elohim can be singular or plural. We rendered it 'gods' to capture the violation of the first commandment, while noting in our translator notes that a single image was produced. Aaron's explanation 'I threw it into the fire and out came this calf' (v24) we rendered literally, preserving his evasive, almost comic deflection of responsibility. Moses's offer 'blot me out of Your book' (v32) we rendered as a stark conditional, preserving its weight as the most radical intercessory offer in the Torah.

Connections: The golden calf is recalled in Deuteronomy 9:7-21; Nehemiah 9:18; Psalm 106:19-23; and Acts 7:39-41. Moses as intercessor parallels Abraham's intercession for Sodom (Genesis 18:22-33). The shattered tablets are replaced in chapter 34. The Levites' zeal (v26-28) establishes their role as consecrated servants, developed in Numbers 3.

¹When the people saw that Moses was long in coming down from the mountain, the people gathered around Aaron and said to him, "Get up, make us gods who will go before us. As for this Moses, the man who brought us up from the land of Egypt, we do not know what has become of him." ²Aaron said to them, "Take off the gold rings that are on the ears of your wives, your sons, and your daughters, and bring them to me." ³So all the people took off the gold rings that were on their ears and brought them to Aaron. ⁴He received the gold from their hand and fashioned it with an engraving tool and made it into a molten calf. They said, "These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up from the land of Egypt!" ⁵When Aaron saw this, he built an altar before it. Aaron made a proclamation and said, "Tomorrow shall be a feast to the LORD." ⁶They rose early the next day and offered burnt offerings and brought peace offerings. The people sat down to eat and drink and rose up to revel. ⁷The LORD said to Moses, "Go down, for your people whom you brought up from the land of Egypt have acted corruptly. ⁸They have turned aside quickly from the way I commanded them. They have made for themselves a molten calf and have bowed down to it and sacrificed to it and said, 'These are your gods, O Israel, who brought you up from the land of Egypt.'" ⁹The LORD said to Moses, "I have seen this people, and they are a stiff-necked people. ¹⁰Now leave Me alone, so that My anger may burn hot against them and I may consume them. And I will make you into a great nation." ¹¹But Moses implored the LORD his God and said, "O LORD, why does Your anger burn hot against Your people, whom You brought out of the land of Egypt with great power and a mighty hand? ¹²Why should the Egyptians say, 'He brought them out with evil intent, to kill them in the mountains and to consume them from the face of the earth'? Turn from Your burning anger and relent from this disaster against Your people. ¹³Remember Abraham, Isaac, and Israel, Your servants, to whom You swore by Yourself and said to them, 'I will multiply your offspring like the stars of heaven, and all this land that I have promised I will give to your offspring, and they shall inherit it forever.'" ¹⁴The LORD relented from the disaster He had spoken of bringing on His people. ¹⁵Moses turned and went down from the mountain with the two tablets of the Testimony in his hand — tablets written on both sides, written on the front and on the back. ¹⁶The tablets were God's own craftsmanship, and the writing engraved on the tablets was God's own writing. ¹⁷When Joshua heard the noise of the people shouting, he said to Moses, "There is a sound of war in the camp." ¹⁸But Moses said, "It is not the sound of the cry of victory, nor the sound of the cry of defeat. It is the sound of singing that I hear." ¹⁹As soon as he came near the camp and saw the calf and the dancing,

Moses's anger burned hot. He threw the tablets from his hands and shattered them at the foot of the mountain. ²⁰He took the calf they had made and burned it with fire and ground it to powder and scattered it on the water and made the sons of Israel drink it. ²¹Moses said to Aaron, "What did this people do to you that you have brought such a great sin upon them?" ²²Aaron said, "Do not let the anger of my lord burn hot. You know this people, that they are set on evil. ²³They said to me, 'Make us gods who will go before us. As for this Moses, the man who brought us up from the land of Egypt, we do not know what has become of him.' ²⁴So I said to them, 'Whoever has gold, take it off.' They gave it to me, and I threw it into the fire, and out came this calf." ²⁵Moses saw that the people had broken loose, for Aaron had let them break loose, to the derision of their enemies. ²⁶Moses stood at the gate of the camp and said, "Whoever is for the LORD, come to me!" All the sons of Levi gathered around him. ²⁷He said to them, "Thus says the LORD, the God of Israel: Each of you put his sword on his side. Go back and forth from gate to gate throughout the camp, and each of you kill his brother, his companion, and his neighbor." ²⁸The sons of Levi did as Moses commanded, and about three thousand men of the people fell that day. ²⁹Moses said, "Today you have been ordained for the LORD, each at the cost of his son and his brother, so that He might bestow a blessing on you this day." ³⁰The next day Moses said to the people, "You have committed a great sin. Now I will go up to the LORD; perhaps I can make atonement for your sin." ³¹Moses returned to the LORD and said, "Alas, this people has committed a great sin. They have made for themselves gods of gold. ³²But now, if You will forgive their sin — but if not, please blot me out of the book that You have written." ³³The LORD said to Moses, "Whoever has sinned against Me, I will blot out of My book. ³⁴Now go, lead the people to the place I told you about. My angel will go before you. But on the day when I visit, I will visit their sin upon them." ³⁵The LORD struck the people because they made the calf — the one Aaron had made.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses has been on the mountain forty days (24:18). The people's impatience is both understandable and catastrophic. 'Make us gods' (aseh-lanu elohim) — the plural elohim can mean 'gods' or 'a god.' The request violates the first and second commandments simultaneously. 'This Moses' (Mosheh zeh) — the demonstrative zeh ('this') is dismissive, reducing the deliverer to 'that man.'
2. Aaron's compliance is immediate — no protest, no objection, no appeal to the covenant just ratified. The gold rings from Egypt (12:35-36) — the plunder that was supposed to build the tabernacle is redirected to build an idol. What God provided for His dwelling is used to construct His rival.
3. The people comply instantly — the unanimity of idolatry mirrors the unanimity of covenant acceptance at Sinai (24:3, 7). The same people who said 'we will do and we will obey' now do and obey the command to make an idol.
4. 'He fashioned it with an engraving tool and made it into a molten calf' (vayyatsar oto bacheret vayyya'asehu egel massekhah) — the verb yatsar ('to fashion, to form') is the same verb used for God forming humanity from dust (Genesis 2:7). Aaron creates in parody of God. The calf (egel) likely represents the Apis bull or Hathor cow of Egyptian religion — Israel reverts to the worship forms of the land they just left.
5. Aaron tries to syncretize: he builds an altar before the calf but declares 'a feast to the LORD' (chag laYHWH). He attempts to worship YHWH through the golden calf — merging the God of Sinai with the image of Egypt. This is not atheism but syncretic idolatry, which is worse: it uses God's name to validate what God forbids.
6. 'Rose up to revel' (vayyaqumu letsacheq) — the verb tsachaq ('to play, to sport') carries sexual overtones in Genesis (26:8; 39:14, 17). The 'reveling' likely includes sexual license alongside the feast. The worship has become orgiastic — covenant celebration inverted into covenant violation.
7. God disowns the people: 'your people whom you brought up' (ammekha asher he'eleita). God says to Moses 'your people,' not 'My people.' The covenant formula ('I will be your God, you will be My people') is rhetorically reversed. The verb shichet ('acted corruptly') echoes the pre-flood corruption (Genesis 6:11-12) — the same word that triggered the flood now describes the golden calf.
8. God quotes the people's own words back to Moses: 'These are your gods, O Israel.' The divine anger is rooted in the specific violation of the specific commands just given. 'Turned aside quickly' (saru maher) — the speed of apostasy is emphasized. Forty days was enough to abandon everything.
9. 'A stiff-necked people' (am-qesheh-oref) — literally 'hard of neck,' like an ox that refuses the yoke. The metaphor comes from agriculture: a stiff-necked animal cannot be guided. Israel resists God's direction the way a stubborn beast resists its driver.
10. 'Leave Me alone' (hannichah li) — God asks Moses to step aside so that divine wrath can proceed unchecked. The request implies that Moses's presence restrains God's judgment. 'I will make you into a great nation' — echoing the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 12:2), God offers Moses a fresh start, bypassing Israel entirely. The test is whether Moses will accept personal greatness at the cost of the people.
11. Moses refuses the offer and intercedes. He reframes the crisis: these are not 'my people' but 'Your people, whom You brought out.' Moses reverses God's disowning language — insisting that God's ownership and God's action define Israel's identity. The intercession is not a polite request but a theological argument.

12. Moses appeals to God's reputation among the nations: what will Egypt say? The argument is not self-interested but God-centered: Your name is at stake. If You destroy Israel, the world will conclude that You saved them only to slaughter them. Divine honor requires divine mercy.
13. Moses quotes God back to God — invoking the oaths to Abraham, Isaac, and Israel (Jacob's covenant name is used deliberately). The argument reaches its climax: You swore by Yourself (because there is no one greater to swear by, cf. Genesis 22:16). Your oath is irrevocable. Your character is the guarantee.
14. 'The LORD relented' (vayyinnachem YHWH) — the verb nacham means 'to relent, to change course, to be moved to compassion.' The same verb described God's grief before the flood (Genesis 6:6). Moses's intercession changes the outcome — not because God was wrong but because intercession is the divinely appointed means by which mercy operates. Prayer works.
15. The two tablets descend with Moses — 'written on both sides,' front and back. The writing covers every available surface, suggesting the comprehensiveness of God's words. The tablets are about to be shattered.
16. 'The work of God... the writing of God' (ma'aseh Elohim... mikhtav Elohim) — the tablets are divine artifacts: God made them and God wrote on them. What Moses is about to destroy is not human craftsmanship but divine handiwork. The shattering of the tablets is the visible rupture of the covenant.
17. Joshua, waiting below the summit (cf. 24:13), hears the noise first and misidentifies it as warfare. His military instinct reads chaos as combat.
18. Moses, with prophetic discernment, identifies the sound: not victory, not defeat, but singing. The word annot ('singing, responding') may refer to antiphonal worship — the people are singing in liturgical response around the calf. Worship in the wrong direction sounds like celebration.
19. Moses shatters the tablets 'at the foot of the mountain' (tachat hahar) — the location is significant. The covenant given at the mountain's top is broken at its base. The physical destruction enacts the spiritual reality: the covenant is ruptured. Moses's anger mirrors God's anger (v10), but Moses acts where God relented.
20. Moses destroys the calf systematically: burns it (fire), grinds it (powder), scatters it on water, forces the people to drink. The idol is consumed by the very people who worshipped it — they ingest their own sin. The act may echo the ordeal of the suspected adulteress (Numbers 5:24), and Israel has committed spiritual adultery.
21. Moses confronts Aaron directly: 'What did this people do to you?' The question implies that the people forced Aaron — giving him an opportunity to explain. But Aaron's answer (vv22-24) reveals cowardice, not coercion.
22. Aaron deflects blame to the people — 'you know this people, that they are set on evil.' The man charged with intercession between God and Israel now blames the people he was supposed to lead.
23. Aaron's retelling of the people's demand (cf. v1) is accurate in content but evasive in tone. He presents himself as passively responding to irresistible pressure.
24. 'I threw it into the fire, and out came this calf' — Aaron's excuse is perhaps the most transparently dishonest statement in the Pentateuch. Verse 4 says he fashioned it with an engraving tool. Now he claims it spontaneously emerged from the fire. The absurdity is the point: sin produces absurd explanations.
25. 'The people had broken loose' (para, 'to let loose, to make unrestrained') — the word describes hair unbound or a people without discipline. Aaron 'let them break loose' — his failure is leadership abdication. The derision (shimtsah) of enemies is noted: Israel's internal collapse becomes external shame.
26. 'Whoever is for the LORD, come to me!' (mi laYHWH elai) — Moses draws the line of allegiance. The Levites respond — the same tribe from which Moses and Aaron come. The crisis sorts Israel into those who stand with God and those who do not.
27. The command to kill is severe and devastating — brothers, companions, neighbors. The violence is intra-communal punishment for covenant violation. The sword judgment within Israel parallels the tenth plague's judgment within Egypt: covenant-breaking carries the same consequence as oppression.
28. 'About three thousand' — the number represents a significant but limited judgment. The total population was vastly larger. The punishment is severe but not total — mercy limits the scope of justice.
29. The Levites' willingness to execute judgment at personal cost — killing their own kin — becomes their ordination. The verb 'ordained' (mil'u yedkhem, 'fill your hand') is the same term used for priestly consecration (29:9). Loyalty to God above family becomes the Levites' defining qualification for service.
30. 'Perhaps I can make atonement' (ulai akkapperah be'ad chattatkhem) — the verb kaphar ('make atonement, cover') appears in Moses's own mouth. He is not certain he can succeed ('perhaps'), but he will try. Moses becomes the atoning intercessor — offering himself as the covering for Israel's sin.
31. Moses's prayer is raw and unfinished: 'If You will forgive their sin —' The sentence breaks off. The dash (indicated by the Hebrew punctuation) is a gap where words fail. Moses cannot complete the conditional because the alternative is too terrible to speak.
32. 'Blot me out of the book that You have written' (mecheini na misifrekha asher katavta) — Moses offers his own life in exchange for Israel's forgiveness. He would rather be erased from God's record than survive while Israel perishes. This is the most extreme act of intercession in the Hebrew Bible — the mediator offering himself as substitute.

33. God's reply is both merciful and just: He will not accept Moses as substitute ('whoever has sinned against Me, I will blot out'), but He will not destroy Israel entirely. Justice is individual ('whoever has sinned'), not corporate annihilation.
34. 'My angel will go before you' — God will guide Israel but hints at diminished presence. The angel replaces the direct, personal leading of the pillar (cf. 33:2-3). The full consequences of the sin will come 'on the day when I visit' (uvyom poqdi) — deferred judgment, not canceled judgment.
35. The chapter closes with a summary plague — God strikes the people for the calf Aaron made. The narrator names Aaron's responsibility one final time. The chapter that opened with the people's demand for gods closes with God's judgment on those who answered that demand.

Summary: God offers to send Israel to the promised land but withdraws His personal presence — 'I will not go up among you, lest I consume you.' The people mourn. Moses meets God in the tent of meeting, asks to know God's ways, and makes the extraordinary request 'Show me Your glory.' God agrees to pass His goodness before Moses but shields him in the cleft of a rock.

What Makes This Remarkable: The most devastating sentence in the post-golden-calf narrative is 'I will not go up among you' (v3) — God offers land without presence. Distance is mercy, not abandonment, but it is still loss. Moses's response redefines the stakes: 'If Your presence does not go with us, do not bring us up from here' (v15). Land without God is not the promised land. The request 'Show me Your glory' (har'eni na et-kevodekha, v18) is the boldest human petition in Scripture, and God's response — 'I will make all My goodness pass before you' (v19) — redefines glory as goodness.

Translation Friction: We rendered 'I will not go up among you' (lo e'eleh beqirbekha, v3) in its stark literalness to preserve the shock. The phrase panim el-panim ('face to face,' v11) describing God's conversation with Moses posed tension with v20 ('you cannot see My face and live'); we rendered both literally, as the Hebrew holds both together without resolving the paradox. The cleft of the rock (nigrat hatsur, v22) we rendered literally — the image of God shielding Moses with His hand while passing by defies illustration but conveys real theology.

Connections: Moses in the rock-cleft anticipates Elijah's encounter at Horeb (1 Kings 19:9-13). The 'face to face' language echoes Numbers 12:8 and Deuteronomy 34:10. God's refusal to let Moses see His face connects to John 1:18 ('No one has ever seen God'). The tent of meeting outside the camp (v7) prefigures the tabernacle's mediating function.

¹The LORD said to Moses, "Go up from here, you and the people you brought up from the land of Egypt, to the land I swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob, saying, 'To your offspring I will give it.' ²I will send an angel before you, and I will drive out the Canaanites, the Amorites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. ³Go up to a land flowing with milk and honey — but I will not go up among you, for you are a stiff-necked people, lest I consume you on the way." ⁴When the people heard this disastrous word, they mourned, and no one put on his ornaments. ⁵The LORD said to Moses, "Say to the sons of Israel, 'You are a stiff-necked people. If for a single moment I were to go up among you, I would consume you. Now take off your ornaments, that I may know what to do with you.'" ⁶So the sons of Israel stripped themselves of their ornaments from Mount Horeb onward. ⁷Moses used to take the tent and pitch it outside the camp, far from the camp, and he called it the tent of meeting. Everyone who sought the LORD would go out to the tent of meeting, which was outside the camp. ⁸Whenever Moses went out to the tent, all the people would rise and stand, each at the entrance of his tent, and watch Moses until he entered the tent. ⁹When Moses entered the tent, the pillar of cloud would descend and stand at the entrance of the tent, and the LORD would speak with Moses. ¹⁰When all the people saw the pillar of cloud standing at the entrance of the tent, all the people would rise and worship, each at the entrance of his tent. ¹¹The LORD would speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend. Then Moses would return to the camp, but his assistant Joshua the son of Nun, a young man, would not depart from the tent. ¹²Moses said to the LORD, "See, You say to me, 'Bring up this people,' but You have not let me know whom You will send with me. Yet You have said, 'I know you by name, and you have also found favor in My eyes.' ¹³Now if I have found favor in Your eyes, please show me Your ways, that I may know You and find favor in Your eyes.

Consider too that this nation is Your people." ¹⁴He said, "My presence will go with you, and I will give you rest." ¹⁵Moses said to Him, "If Your presence will not go with us, do not bring us up from here. ¹⁶For how shall it be known that I have found favor in Your eyes, I and Your people? Is it not by Your going with us, so that we are distinct — I and Your people — from every other people on the face of the earth?" ¹⁷The LORD said to Moses, "I will do this very thing that you have spoken, for you have found favor in My eyes, and I know you by name." ¹⁸Moses said, "Please, show me Your glory." ¹⁹He said, "I will make all My goodness pass before you, and I will proclaim the name of the LORD before you. I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious, and I will show compassion to whom I will show compassion. ²⁰But He said, "you cannot see My face, for no man can see Me and live." ²¹The LORD said, "There is a place near Me where you shall stand on the rock. ²²When My glory passes by, I will put you in a cleft of the rock and cover you with My hand until I have passed by. ²³Then I will take away My hand, and you shall see My back, but My face shall not be seen."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God repeats the land promise but distances Himself from the journey. 'You and the people you brought up' — again, God uses 'you brought,' not 'I brought.' The disowning language from 32:7 continues. The promise of land survives, but the promise of presence is withdrawn.
2. An angel will go instead of God Himself. This is diminished presence — guidance without intimacy. The angel can drive out enemies but cannot replace the direct fellowship Israel experienced at Sinai.
3. 'I will not go up among you' (ki lo e'eleh beqirbekha) — the most devastating sentence in the post-golden-calf narrative. God offers land without presence. The reason is protective: God's holiness would destroy the stiff-necked people en route. Distance is mercy, not abandonment — but it is still loss.
4. 'This disastrous word' (haddavar hara hazzeh) — the people recognize the catastrophe. Mourning and stripping off ornaments are signs of grief and repentance. The gold they stripped off to make the calf is now stripped off in remorse.
5. God's demand to remove ornaments serves a dual purpose: it is penitential (acknowledging sin) and diagnostic ('that I may know what to do with you'). God presents Himself as deliberating — the outcome is not yet final. The stiff-necked people have a window for repentance.
6. 'From Mount Horeb onward' (mehar Chorev) — the ornament removal is permanent, not temporary. Israel leaves Sinai marked by the absence of the adornment they misused. The gold that should have built the tabernacle is now gone.
7. The tent of meeting (ohel mo'ed) is pitched outside the camp — a provisional arrangement reflecting the fractured relationship. God will not dwell inside the camp after the golden calf. Anyone seeking the LORD must go outside — the journey to God now requires physical distance from the community that sinned.
8. The people watch Moses walk to the tent — standing at their own tent doors, they observe the mediator crossing the gap between camp and presence. The watching is reverent and anxious: will God speak? Will the relationship survive?
9. The pillar of cloud descends when Moses enters — visible confirmation that God still meets with the mediator, even if He has withdrawn from the camp. The cloud at the tent entrance is the Shekinah in diminished form: localized to one tent, accessible to one man.
10. The people worship from a distance — each at his own tent entrance. They can see the cloud but cannot approach it. The worship is real but remote, separated by the gap the golden calf created.
11. 'Face to face, as a man speaks to his friend' (panim el-panim ka'asher yedabber ish el-re'ehu) — the most intimate description of divine-human communication in the Bible. Moses and God speak as friends. The word re'a ('friend, companion') implies mutual regard and trust. This verse will be qualified by v20 ('you cannot see My face'), creating a productive tension: Moses knows God face-to-face yet cannot see God's face fully. Intimacy is real but not unlimited.
12. Moses presses for clarity: who will accompany them? God's promise of an angel (v2) is insufficient. Moses wants to know God's ways (derakhekha), not just God's commands. The request is for deeper relationship, not merely better instructions.
13. 'Show me Your ways, that I may know You' (hodi'eni na et-derakhekha ve'eda'akha) — the verb yada ('know') is the deepest relational knowledge in Hebrew — intimate, personal, experiential. Moses wants not information about God but encounter with God. 'Consider that this nation is Your people' — Moses insists on God's ownership again: they are Yours, not mine.
14. 'My presence will go with you, and I will give you rest' (panai yelekhu vahanichoti lakh) — God's panai ('My face/presence') will go. The crisis of v3 ('I will not go among you') is reversed. Moses's intercession has restored divine presence. The verb nuach ('give rest') echoes Noah's name and the Sabbath rest — God will bring Israel to the place of completed rest.
15. Moses tests the promise: 'If Your presence will not go, do not bring us up.' The land without God's presence is worthless. Moses would rather stay in the wilderness with God than enter the promised land without Him. This is the deepest statement of covenant priority in the Torah: presence over prosperity, relationship over real estate.

16. 'Is it not by Your going with us, so that we are distinct?' (halo belekhtekha immanu venifleinu) — the verb palah ('be distinct, be set apart') returns from the plague narrative (8:18; 9:4; 11:7). What distinguishes Israel from every other nation is not their law, their land, or their lineage — it is God's presence among them. Without the Shekhinah, Israel is just another people.
17. God grants Moses's request in full: 'I will do this very thing.' The intercession succeeds not because Moses is eloquent but because God has chosen to be accessible to prayer. 'I know you by name' (va'eda'akha beshem) — God's knowledge of Moses is personal, not categorical. The same verb (yada) Moses used in v13 ('that I may know You') is now applied by God to Moses. The knowing is mutual.
18. 'Show me Your glory' (har'eni na et-kevodekha) — the climactic request. Moses has secured God's presence for the journey; now he asks for more. He wants to see the kavod — the full, weighty, tangible reality of God. This is the most audacious prayer in the Hebrew Bible.
19. God's answer is layered: He will show His goodness (tuv), proclaim His name, and declare His sovereign freedom ('I will be gracious to whom I will be gracious'). The formula of sovereign mercy (channoti et-asher achon verichamti et-asher arachem) establishes that God's grace is not compelled but freely given. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 9:15.
20. 'You cannot see My face, for no man can see Me and live' (lo tukhal lir'ot et-panai ki lo-yir'ani ha'adam vachai) — the limitation is not arbitrary but protective. The full, unfiltered reality of God (His panim, His kavod) would overwhelm and destroy any created being. Moses can experience God's goodness, hear God's name, and see God's back — but not the unmediated face. The face remains beyond mortal capacity.
21. 'A place near Me' (makom itti) — God provides a location for the encounter. The word makom ('place') is the same word that will become a rabbinic name for God Himself (HaMakom). God creates the conditions under which Moses can survive the encounter.
22. 'I will put you in a cleft of the rock and cover you with My hand' (vesamtikha beniqrat hatsur vesakoti khappi alekha) — God shields Moses in the rock (tsur, which is also a divine title) and covers him with His hand (kaf). The imagery is profoundly tender: God hides Moses to protect him, then passes by. The divine hand both conceals and shelters.
23. 'You shall see My back, but My face shall not be seen' (vera'ita et-achorai ufanai lo yera'u) — Moses sees where God has been (achor, 'the back, what follows, the aftermath') but not where God is going (panim, 'the face, the front, the presence'). The back of God is what God leaves behind — the trace, the aftereffect, the residue of glory. This is how all mortals know God: not by looking at Him directly but by seeing what His presence has produced.

Summary: Moses cuts new tablets and ascends Sinai alone. God passes before him, proclaiming His name and character: 'Compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, abounding in faithful love and truth.' The covenant is renewed with warnings against idolatry. Moses descends with his face shining.

What Makes This Remarkable: The divine self-proclamation of vv6-7 is the theological center of the entire Old Testament — the most cited passage within the Hebrew Bible itself. God defines His own character not by power but by compassion, grace, patience, chesed ('faithful love'), and emet ('truth/faithfulness'). The arithmetic of mercy versus judgment is explicit: visiting iniquity to three or four generations, but extending chesed to thousands. Moses's shining face (qaran, v29 — from qeren, 'horn/ray') is so extraordinary that he must wear a veil when speaking to the people. The renewed covenant demonstrates that God's commitment survives Israel's worst failure.

Translation Friction: The divine attributes of v6-7 required our most careful rendering. We chose 'compassionate' for rachum (from rechem, 'womb'), 'gracious' for channun, 'slow to anger' for erekh appayim (literally 'long of nostrils'), and 'abounding in faithful love and truth' for rav-chesed ve'emet. The verb qaran ('shone,' v29) literally means 'sent out horns/rays'; the Vulgate's mistranslation as 'horned' produced centuries of art showing Moses with horns. We rendered it as 'shone' with the etymology noted. The phrase nose avon vafesha vechata'ah ('forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin,' v7) lists three distinct categories of wrongdoing; we preserved all three.

Connections: The divine self-proclamation is echoed in Numbers 14:18; Nehemiah 9:17; Psalms 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; and Nahum 1:3. Moses's shining face is cited in 2 Corinthians 3:7-18, where Paul contrasts the fading glory with the permanent glory in Christ. The renewed tablets demonstrate the pattern of covenant failure and restoration that structures the entire biblical narrative.

1The LORD said to Moses, "Cut for yourself two tablets of stone like the first ones, and I will write on the tablets the words that were on the first tablets, which you shattered. 2Be ready by morning, and come up in the morning to Mount Sinai and present yourself to Me there on the top of the mountain. ³No one shall come up with you, and no one shall be seen anywhere on the mountain. Even the flocks and herds shall not graze before that mountain." ⁴So Moses cut two tablets of stone like the first ones, and he rose early in the morning and went up on Mount Sinai, as the LORD had commanded him, and took in his hand the two tablets of stone. ⁵The LORD came down in the cloud, stood there with him, and proclaimed His own name — the LORD. ⁶The LORD passed before him and proclaimed: "The LORD, the LORD, a God compassionate and gracious, slow to anger, and abounding in steadfast love and faithfulness, ⁷keeping steadfast love for thousands, forgiving iniquity and transgression and sin, yet who will by no means clear the guilty, visiting the iniquity of the fathers on the children and the children's children, to the third and fourth generation." ⁸Moses quickly bowed his head toward the earth and worshipped. ⁹He said, "If now I have found favor in Your eyes, O Lord, please let the Lord go in our midst. Although this is a stiff-necked people, pardon our iniquity and our sin, and take us as Your inheritance." ¹⁰He said, "I am making a covenant. Before all your people I will do wonders that have not been done in all the earth or in any nation. All the people among whom you live shall see the work of the LORD, for it is an awesome thing that I will do with you. ¹¹"Observe what I command you this day. I will drive out before you the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. ¹²Take care that you do not make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land to which you are going, lest it become a snare in your midst. ¹³You shall tear down their altars and smash their sacred pillars and cut down their Asherah poles. ¹⁴You must not bow down to any other god, because the LORD, whose very name is Jealous, is a God who demands exclusive devotion. ¹⁵Take care that you do not make a covenant with the inhabitants of the land, lest when they prostitute themselves to their gods and sacrifice to their gods, someone invite you and you eat of his sacrifice, ¹⁶and you take some of his daughters for your sons, and his daughters prostitute themselves to their gods and make your sons prostitute themselves to their gods. ¹⁷You shall not make for yourself any gods of cast metal. ¹⁸"You shall keep the Feast of Unleavened Bread. Seven days you shall eat unleavened bread, as I commanded you, at the appointed time in the month of Aviv, for in the month of Aviv you came out of Egypt. ¹⁹Every firstborn that opens the womb is Mine, including every male firstborn among your livestock, whether ox or sheep. ²⁰The firstborn of a donkey you shall redeem with a lamb, and if you do not redeem it, you shall break its neck. All the firstborn of your sons you shall redeem. No one shall appear before Me empty-handed. ²¹Six days you shall work, but on the seventh day you shall rest. Even in plowing season and in harvest you shall rest. ²²You shall observe the Feast of Weeks, the firstfruits of the wheat harvest, and the Feast of Ingathering at the turn of the year. ²³Three times in the year every male among you shall appear before the Lord GOD, the God of Israel. ²⁴For I will drive out nations before you and enlarge your borders, and no one shall covet your land when you go up to appear before the LORD your God three times in the year. ²⁵You shall not offer the blood of My sacrifice with anything leavened, nor shall the sacrifice of the Feast of the Passover be left until the morning. ²⁶The best of the firstfruits of your ground you shall bring to the house of the LORD your God. You shall not boil a young goat in its mother's milk." ²⁷The LORD said to Moses, "Write these words, for in accordance with these words I have made a covenant with you and with Israel." ²⁸He was there with the LORD forty days and forty nights. He neither ate bread nor drank water. And He wrote on the tablets the words of the covenant, the Ten Words. ²⁹When Moses came down from Mount Sinai — the two tablets of the Testimony were in Moses's hand as he came down from the mountain — Moses did not know that the skin of his face shone because he had been speaking with God. ³⁰Aaron and all the sons of Israel saw Moses, and the skin of his face was shining, and they were afraid to come near him. ³¹But Moses called to them, and Aaron and all the leaders of the congregation returned to him, and Moses spoke to them. ³²Afterward all the sons of Israel came near, and he commanded them all that the LORD had spoken to him on Mount Sinai. ³³When Moses had finished speaking with them, he put a veil over his face. ³⁴Whenever Moses went in before the LORD to speak with Him, he would remove the veil until he came out. When he came out and told the sons of Israel what he had been commanded, ³⁵the sons of Israel would see the face of Moses, that the skin of Moses's face was shining. Then Moses would put the veil over his face again, until he went in to speak with Him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God commands replacement tablets — the covenant is renewed, not abandoned. Moses must cut the stone ('cut for yourself'), but God will write the words. Human preparation meets divine inscription. The shattered tablets are not erased from history; they are replaced.
2. Morning preparation — the same early-morning obedience pattern seen throughout Moses's ministry (cf. 24:4; 32:6; 34:4). The encounter with God requires both readiness and solitude.
3. Total isolation — not even animals may be present on the mountain. The renewed encounter demands even stricter boundaries than the first Sinai theophany (ch19). The severity reflects the increased stakes: this is covenant restoration after catastrophic breach.
4. Moses obeys exactly — cutting stone, rising early, ascending, carrying the tablets. The simple sequence of verbs (cut, rose, went up, took) mirrors the obedience formulas that characterize faithful response throughout the Torah.
5. 'The LORD descended in the cloud and stood with him there' (vayyered YHWH be'anah vayyityatsev immo sham) — God comes down to Moses's level. The verb yatsav ('stood, stationed') implies deliberate positioning: God plants Himself beside Moses. 'He proclaimed the name of the LORD' (vayyiqra veshem YHWH) — God Himself speaks His own name aloud. This is the ultimate self-revelation: God interpreting God.
6. This is the most important theological statement in the Hebrew Bible. God defines Himself in thirteen attributes (according to rabbinic counting): YHWH, YHWH (the name repeated), El (God), rachum (compassionate), chanun (gracious), erekh appayim (slow to anger), rav-chesed (abounding in steadfast love), emet (faithfulness/truth). The self-revelation begins with mercy and moves to justice. Compassion precedes judgment. This verse is quoted or echoed more than any other verse in the Old Testament by Old Testament authors (Numbers 14:18; Joel 2:13; Jonah 4:2; Nahum 1:3; Psalms 86:15; 103:8; 145:8; Nehemiah 9:17; 2 Chronicles 30:9).
7. The self-revelation continues: 'keeping steadfast love for thousands' (notser chesed la'alafim) — chesed is God's default posture, extended to thousands of generations. 'Forgiving iniquity, transgression, and sin' (nose avon vafesha vechata'ah) — the three Hebrew words for wrongdoing are listed comprehensively: avon (guilt/crookedness), pesha (rebellion/transgression), and chata'ah (sin/missing the mark). God forgives all categories of human failure. 'Yet who will by no means clear the guilty' (venaqeh lo yenaqeh) — justice is not abolished by mercy. The guilty are not automatically acquitted. The tension between mercy (v6) and justice (v7) defines the character of God throughout Scripture.
8. Moses's response is immediate worship — bowing to the earth (vayyiqqod... vayyishtachu). The self-revelation of God's character produces prostration, not theological discussion. The proper response to God's self-definition is not analysis but adoration.
9. Moses immediately applies the revelation: since God is compassionate and forgiving (vv6-7), Moses asks Him to come among the stiff-necked people. The golden calf proved Israel's stubbornness; God's self-description proves His capacity to endure it. Moses's argument: Your character (just revealed) is precisely what this people needs. 'Take us as Your inheritance' (unchaltanu) — the verb nachal means to inherit, to take possession of. Moses asks God to claim Israel as His own property.
10. God responds with covenant renewal: 'I am making a covenant' (hineh anokhi koret berit). The verb karat ('cutting') restarts the covenant process. The wonders (nifla'ot) promised will be unprecedented — not replications of the exodus plagues but new acts of divine power. The covenant is not merely restored but advanced.
11. The covenant stipulations that follow (vv11-26) parallel the Book of the Covenant (ch21-23) in compressed form. The core concerns: exclusive worship, no foreign covenants, festival observance, firstborn dedication, Sabbath rest.
12. 'A snare in your midst' (lemoqesh beqirbekha) — the trap metaphor recurs (cf. 23:33). Foreign covenants create religious obligations that compromise loyalty to YHWH.
13. Three types of Canaanite worship installations are to be destroyed: altars (mizbehot), sacred pillars (matstsebot), and Asherah poles (asherim). The physical infrastructure of competing worship must be demolished.
14. 'The LORD, whose name is Jealous, is a jealous God' (YHWH Qanna shemo El qanna hu) — God's jealousy (qin'ah) is a name, not merely an attribute. Qanna is who God is — passionately, exclusively committed to His covenant people. The jealousy of God is the emotional intensity of covenant love that will not share its beloved with rivals.
15. The warning against foreign covenants is specific and practical: shared meals lead to shared worship lead to shared marriages lead to shared gods. The progression from hospitality to apostasy is mapped in a single sentence.
16. Intermarriage becomes the vector for religious compromise. The verb zana ('prostitute') describes the spiritual dimension: worshipping other gods is marital betrayal of the covenant relationship with YHWH.
17. 'Gods of cast metal' (elohei massekha) — a direct reference to the golden calf (32:4, egel massekha). The prohibition specifically targets the kind of idolatry Israel just committed.
18. The festival calendar restated: Unleavened Bread in the month of Aviv. The repetition of established law within the renewed covenant signals continuity — the golden calf did not erase the prior legislation.
19. Firstborn dedication restated — every firstborn belongs to God, both human and animal. The principle from 13:2, 12 is reaffirmed in the covenant renewal.

20. Redemption of donkey firstborn and human firstborn — the same provisions as 13:13. 'No one shall appear before Me empty-handed' — worship requires offering; encounter requires gift.
21. Sabbath rest — even during the critical seasons of plowing and harvest, when economic pressure is greatest, the Sabbath stands. The command 'even in plowing season and in harvest you shall rest' addresses the most tempting exceptions and forbids them.
22. Feast of Weeks (Shavuot) and Feast of Ingathering (Sukkot) — the second and third pilgrimage festivals, completing the annual calendar first established in 23:14-17.
23. Three annual pilgrimages — all males before the Lord GOD. The requirement is unchanged from 23:17.
24. God provides security during the pilgrimage periods: 'no one shall covet your land.' The promise addresses the practical objection: if all men leave for the festival, who protects the territory? God Himself guarantees border security during worship. Obedience is not impractical; God covers the risk.
25. Sacrificial regulations: no leaven with blood offerings, no Passover leftovers until morning. The same rules from 12:10 and 23:18.
26. Firstfruits to God's house and the prohibition of boiling a kid in its mother's milk — the same closure as 23:19. The covenant renewal restates the same boundaries.
27. 'Write these words' (ketov lekha et-haddevarim ha'elleh) — Moses is commanded to write. 'In accordance with these words I have made a covenant' (ki al-pi haddevarim ha'elleh karati ittekha berit) — the written words are the basis of the covenant. The covenant is a textual reality — its terms are recorded, not merely spoken.
28. 'Forty days and forty nights' — the same duration as the first ascent (24:18). Moses fasts completely: no bread, no water. The physical impossibility underscores divine sustenance — God Himself keeps Moses alive during this period. 'The Ten Words' (aseret haddevarim) — the formal Hebrew name for the Ten Commandments. Devarim means 'words,' not 'commandments.' These are God's words, not merely God's rules.
29. 'The skin of his face shone' (qaran or panav) — the verb qaran is related to qeren ('horn, ray'). Moses's face literally radiates — it emits light from having been in God's presence. The shining is involuntary and unconscious ('Moses did not know'). Prolonged exposure to God's kavod leaves a visible residue. The Vulgate's translation of qaran as 'was horned' (cornuta) led to centuries of artistic depictions of Moses with horns.
30. The people are afraid of Moses's radiant face — the reflected glory is too much for them. The irony is poignant: Israel could not bear to hear God's voice (20:19) and now cannot bear to see God's reflection on Moses's face. The mediator carries glory that the people cannot directly endure.
31. Moses must call them back — they have retreated in fear. Aaron and the leaders approach first, then the people follow. The chain of communication mirrors Sinai: God Moses leaders people.
32. Moses transmits the renewed covenant commands to all Israel. The content of vv11-26 is delivered to the community.
33. The veil (masveh) covers Moses's face after he finishes speaking. The veil is not worn during communication with God (v34) or during communication with Israel (v32-33a), but afterward — when the message has been delivered and Moses returns to ordinary life. Paul interprets this veil in 2 Corinthians 3:13-18.
34. Moses removes the veil when speaking with God and when speaking to Israel — transparency in both directions. The veil goes on only after the message is delivered, when Moses is neither in divine encounter nor in prophetic proclamation.
35. The pattern becomes permanent: enter God's presence (veil off), emerge radiant, speak to Israel (veil off), put the veil on. The cycle of revelation and veiling structures Moses's ongoing ministry for the rest of his life.

Summary: Moses reassembles all Israel after the golden calf crisis, reaffirms the Sabbath (including the fire prohibition), and calls for voluntary contributions and skilled workers for the tabernacle. The people respond with overwhelming generosity, bringing materials until there is more than enough.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sabbath instruction comes before the tabernacle construction call, establishing that even sacred work must yield to sacred rest — the death penalty for Sabbath violation (v2) underscores that no human project, however holy, supersedes God's rhythm. The verb qahal ('assemble,' v1) signals a formal covenant gathering, reconstituting the community after the catastrophic breach of chapter 32. The generosity described here contrasts sharply with the golden calf episode: the same people who stripped off gold for an idol now bring gold, silver, and fabric for God's dwelling.

Translation Friction: The fire prohibition on Sabbath (lo-teva'aru esh, v3) appears only here in the Pentateuch. We rendered it directly — 'Do not light a fire anywhere in your dwellings on the Sabbath day' — without interpreting whether it extends to all use of fire or only to construction-related fire. The phrase kol-nediv libbo ('everyone whose heart was willing,' v5) we rendered to emphasize that the tabernacle offering is voluntary generosity, not compulsory taxation, matching the terumah language of 25:2.

Connections: The Sabbath-before-tabernacle sequence parallels the Sabbath-after-creation pattern of Genesis 2:1-3. The overwhelming generosity (36:5-7) reverses the golden calf's perversion of resources. The skilled women spinning (v25-26) anticipate the 'woman of valor' in Proverbs 31:19. The voluntary offering model shapes later temple contributions (1 Chronicles 29:6-9; 2 Corinthians 8-9).

¹Moses assembled the entire Israelite community and told them, "These are the things the LORD has commanded you to do. ²Work may be done for six days, but the seventh day is to be a holy day for you — a complete sabbath of rest dedicated to the LORD. Anyone who does any work on that day must be put to death. ³Do not light a fire anywhere in your dwellings on the Sabbath day. ⁴Moses addressed the entire Israelite community: "This is what the LORD has commanded: ⁵Take from your possessions a contribution for the LORD. Let everyone whose heart is willing bring an offering to the LORD: gold, silver, and bronze, ⁶blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, fine linen, and goat hair, ⁷ram skins dyed red, fine leather, and acacia wood, ⁸oil for the lampstand, spices for the anointing oil and the fragrant incense, ⁹onyx stones, and gemstones for mounting on the ephod and the breastpiece. ¹⁰Let all the skilled among you come and produce everything the LORD has commanded: ¹¹the tabernacle with its tent, its covering, its clasps, its frames, its crossbars, its posts, and its bases; ¹²the ark with its poles, the mercy seat, and the screening curtain; ¹³the table with its poles and all its utensils, and the bread of the Presence; ¹⁴the lampstand for illumination with its equipment, its lamps, and the oil for light; ¹⁵the incense altar with its poles, the anointing oil, the fragrant incense, and the entrance screen at the tabernacle doorway; ¹⁶the altar for burnt offerings with its bronze grating, its poles, and all its equipment; the basin with its stand; ¹⁷the curtains of the courtyard with their posts and bases, and the screen for the courtyard entrance; ¹⁸the tent pegs for the tabernacle, the tent pegs for the courtyard, and their ropes; ¹⁹the woven garments for service in the sanctuary — the sacred garments for Aaron the priest, and the garments for his sons to serve as priests." ²⁰The entire Israelite community then withdrew from Moses's presence. ²¹Everyone whose heart moved them and whose spirit stirred them came forward, bringing their contribution to the LORD for constructing the tent of meeting, for all its service, and for the sacred garments. ²²Men and women alike came — all who were generous of heart — bringing brooches, earrings, rings, and ornaments, every kind of gold jewelry. Each one who presented a wave offering of gold gave it to the LORD. ²³Everyone who had blue, purple, or scarlet yarn, fine linen, goat hair, ram skins dyed red, or fine leather brought these materials. ²⁴All who contributed silver or bronze brought their offering to the LORD, and everyone who had acacia wood suitable for any part of the project brought it. ²⁵Every woman skilled in the craft spun with her hands and brought what she had produced — blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and fine linen. ²⁶All the women whose hearts stirred them with skill spun the goat hair. ²⁷The leaders brought onyx stones and gemstones for mounting on the ephod and the breastpiece, ²⁸along with spices, oil for the lampstand, oil for anointing, and fragrant incense. ²⁹Every Israelite man and woman whose heart prompted them to contribute to the work the LORD had commanded through Moses brought a freewill offering to the LORD. ³⁰Moses told the Israelites, "Take note — the LORD has specifically chosen Bezalel son of Uri, son of Hur, from the tribe of Judah. ³¹He has filled him with the Spirit of God — with wisdom, understanding, knowledge, and every kind of skill, ³²to create artistic designs and to work with gold, silver, and bronze, ³³to cut gemstones for mounting, to carve wood, and to execute every form of artistic craftsmanship. ³⁴He has also given both him and Oholiab son of Ahisamach, from the tribe of Dan, the ability to teach others. ³⁵He has filled them with skill to carry out every kind of craft — engraving, designing, embroidering with blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and fine linen, and weaving — performing every kind of work and creating artistic designs."

1. Moses reconvenes all Israel after the golden calf crisis. The verb qahal (assemble) signals a formal covenant gathering — the community must hear God's construction instructions together.
2. Even tabernacle construction — sacred work — must yield to Sabbath rest. The death penalty underscores that no human project, however holy, supersedes God's rhythm of rest.
3. The fire prohibition on Sabbath extends even to basic domestic activity. This instruction appears only here in the Pentateuch, emphasizing Sabbath as total cessation.
4. Moses relays God's instructions for freewill offerings. The phrase 'this is what the LORD has commanded' (zeh ha-davar) frames what follows as divine directive, not human fundraising.
5. The offering (terumah) is voluntary — only from those whose hearts are willing (nediv libo). God funds His dwelling through generous hearts, not taxation.
6. The textile materials — blue (tekhelet), purple (argaman), scarlet (tola'at shani) — are expensive dyes. Fine linen (shesh) and goat hair provide the structural fabrics.
7. Ram skins dyed red and tachash leather (possibly dugong or seal) form the protective outer coverings. Acacia wood provides the structural framework material.
8. Oil, spices, and incense materials serve the lampstand, anointing rituals, and altar of incense — the ongoing worship functions of the tabernacle.
9. Onyx and setting stones are for the ephod shoulder pieces and the breastpiece — the high priest's garments that bear Israel's names before God.
10. The call goes to every 'wise-hearted' person (khakham-lev). Skill in craftsmanship is framed as wisdom — a gift from God, not merely human talent.
11. This begins the comprehensive inventory of tabernacle components. The tabernacle (mishkan) is God's dwelling; the tent (ohel) is its covering structure.
12. The ark houses the covenant tablets; the mercy seat (kapporet) is where God meets His people. The screening curtain (parokhet) separates the Most Holy Place.
13. The table of the Presence holds the twelve loaves representing Israel's tribes — a perpetual offering symbolizing God's sustaining provision.
14. The lampstand (menorah) provides light in the Holy Place. Its oil must be continually supplied — Israel tends the light of God's presence.
15. The incense altar stands before the veil; its fragrant smoke rises as a symbol of prayer. The entrance screen marks the threshold of the Holy Place.
16. The burnt offering altar is the central site of sacrifice in the courtyard. The bronze basin provides water for the priests' ritual purification.
17. The courtyard curtains create the sacred perimeter — the boundary between common space and holy ground where Israel meets God.
18. Tent pegs and ropes are the most mundane components, yet even these are specified. Every detail of God's dwelling, however small, matters.
19. The priestly garments are 'garments of service' (bigdei serad) — clothing designed for sacred function, not personal adornment.
20. The congregation departs to gather their offerings. The gap between instruction and response creates space for genuine voluntary decision.
21. Two phrases describe the givers: 'heart lifted him' (nasa'o libbo) and 'spirit made willing' (nadevah rucho). The offering flows from internal motivation, not external pressure.
22. Both men and women contribute. The jewelry items — brooches, earrings, rings, ornaments — represent personal wealth surrendered for communal sacred purpose.
23. Each person brings what they have. The diversity of materials reflects the diversity of the community, unified in a single construction project.
24. Silver, bronze, and acacia wood complete the structural materials. The emphasis on bringing what was 'found with' each person highlights individual participation.
25. Women's spinning skill is highlighted as a form of wisdom (khokhmat-lev). Their craftsmanship directly produces the tabernacle's textile components.
26. Goat hair spinning for the tent covering requires specific expertise. The women whose hearts 'lifted them in wisdom' volunteer this specialized skill.
27. The leaders (nesi'im) contribute the most costly items — precious stones and gemstones that only they could afford for the ephod and breastpiece.
28. Leaders also supply the spices and oils for ongoing worship — anointing, lampstand, and incense. These consumable materials require continual replenishment.
29. This summary statement emphasizes the freewill character of the offering (nedavah). The entire community — men and women — participates voluntarily.
30. God calls Bezalel 'by name' (be-shem) — a personal divine appointment. His lineage (Uri, Hur, Judah) connects tabernacle artistry to Israel's royal tribe.

31. The Spirit of God fills Bezalel with wisdom (khokhmah), understanding (tevunah), knowledge (da'at), and skill (melakhah). Artisan craft is a spiritual gift.
32. Bezalel's artistic design ability (makhashavot) involves creative thinking — the capacity to envision and execute complex metalwork in gold, silver, and bronze.
33. Stone cutting, wood carving, and artistic craftsmanship complete Bezalel's skill set. He masters every medium the tabernacle requires.
34. God gives Bezalel and Oholiab the ability to teach — their skill is not hoarded but transmitted. Oholiab represents Dan, pairing with Judah in the work.
35. The comprehensive skill list — engraving, designing, embroidering, weaving — covers every textile and decorative art needed for the tabernacle and its garments.

Summary: Bezalel, Oholiab, and the skilled workers begin construction. The people bring so much material that Moses must order them to stop. The craftsmen build the tabernacle curtains, frames, crossbars, and veil exactly as God commanded.

What Makes This Remarkable: The surplus problem (vv5-7) is unique in Scripture — Moses must restrain giving because there is more than enough (dai lahem vehoter). The people's generosity, arriving 'morning after morning' (boqer baboqer, v3), is an echo of manna-rhythm applied to worship: daily provision, daily offering. The construction narrative closely mirrors the instruction chapters (25-31), creating a literary parallel between divine speech and human obedience — what God said, they did.

Translation Friction: The near-verbatim repetition of construction details from chapters 25-31 posed a rendering challenge: we maintained consistency with the instruction-chapter vocabulary to highlight the obedience pattern, while allowing natural variation in English where the Hebrew itself varies. The phrase dai lahem vehoter ('enough and more,' v7) we rendered as 'more than enough,' capturing the emphatic surplus. The shift from 'you shall make' (instruction) to 'they made' (execution) tracks the faithful implementation of the divine blueprint.

Connections: The surplus of offerings reverses the golden calf's misuse of resources. The obedience pattern ('as the LORD commanded') echoes the creation account's 'and it was so' (Genesis 1). The craftsmen's faithful execution anticipates the summary refrain of chapter 39 and the completion formula of 40:33. David's temple-fund appeal in 1 Chronicles 29:1-9 follows this model of joyful, abundant giving.

¹Bezalel, Oholiab, and every person gifted with skill — in whom the LORD had placed wisdom and understanding to know how to carry out all the construction work for the sanctuary — were to do the work exactly as the LORD had commanded. ²Moses summoned Bezalel, Oholiab, and every skilled person in whom the LORD had placed wisdom — everyone whose heart moved them to come and undertake the work. ³They received from Moses all the contributions the Israelites had brought for the sanctuary construction project. Meanwhile the people continued bringing additional freewill offerings every morning. ⁴All the skilled workers who were carrying out the sanctuary construction left their various tasks ⁵and reported to Moses, "The people are bringing far more than is needed for the work the LORD has commanded." ⁶So Moses issued an order, and a proclamation was circulated throughout the camp: "No man or woman should prepare any more material for the sacred contribution." The people were thus prevented from bringing more. ⁷The materials already on hand were more than sufficient to complete all the work — there was even a surplus. ⁸All the skilled workers among those doing the construction made the tabernacle with ten panels of finely twisted linen and blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, with cherubim worked into them by a skilled designer. ⁹Each panel measured twenty-eight cubits long and four cubits wide; all the panels were identical in size. ¹⁰He joined five of the panels to one another, and likewise joined the other five panels to one another. ¹¹He made loops of blue yarn along the edge of the outermost panel in the first set, and did the same along the edge of the outermost panel in the second set. ¹²He made fifty loops on the first panel and fifty loops on the corresponding edge of the panel in the second set, with the loops positioned directly opposite one another. ¹³He fashioned fifty gold clasps and used them to join the panels together, so that the tabernacle formed a single unit. ¹⁴He made panels of goat hair for a tent covering over the tabernacle — eleven panels in all. ¹⁵Each panel measured thirty cubits long and four cubits wide; all eleven panels were the same size. ¹⁶He joined five panels into one section and the other six into a separate section. ¹⁷He attached fifty loops along the edge of the outermost panel in the first section, and fifty loops along the edge of the connecting panel of the second section. ¹⁸He fashioned fifty bronze clasps to join the tent covering together into a single unit. ¹⁹He made a covering for the tent from ram skins dyed red, with an additional covering of fine leather over that. ²⁰He constructed the upright frames for the tabernacle from acacia wood. ²¹Each frame was ten cubits tall and a cubit and a half wide. ²²Each frame had two tenons parallel to each other; he made all the frames of the tabernacle this way. ²³He made twenty frames for the south side of the tabernacle, ²⁴with forty silver bases beneath them — two bases under each frame to support its two tenons. ²⁵For the opposite side of the tabernacle, the north side, he made twenty frames ²⁶with their forty silver bases — two bases under each frame. ²⁷For the rear of the tabernacle, on the west, he made six frames. ²⁸He made two additional frames for the corners at the rear of the tabernacle. ²⁹These were joined at the bottom and connected all the way to the top with a single ring. He did this for both corner frames. ³⁰So there were eight frames with their sixteen silver bases — two bases beneath each frame. ³¹He made crossbars of acacia wood — five for the frames on one side of the tabernacle, ³²five for the frames on the other side, and five for the frames at the rear, facing west. ³³He crafted the center crossbar to run through the middle of the frames from one end to the other. ³⁴He overlaid the frames with gold, made their rings of gold as holders for the crossbars, and overlaid the crossbars with gold as well. ³⁵He made the inner curtain of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and finely twisted linen, with cherubim worked into it by a skilled designer. ³⁶For it he made four posts of acacia wood overlaid with gold, with gold hooks, and cast four silver bases for them. ³⁷He crafted a screen for the tent entrance from blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and finely twisted linen, done in embroidered work, ³⁸along with its five posts and their hooks. He overlaid their tops and connecting bands with gold, and their five bases were bronze.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The construction team includes not only Bezalel and Oholiab but every skilled person whom God equipped. Sacred construction is communal craftsmanship guided by divine wisdom.
2. Moses summons the workers personally. The phrase 'whose heart stirred him to approach the work' emphasizes that even God-gifted artisans must voluntarily engage.
3. A remarkable detail: the people keep bringing offerings every morning (boqer baboqer) even after work has begun. Generosity continues beyond the initial call.
4. The craftsmen interrupt their own work to report the surplus — a sign of honest stewardship. They prioritize accuracy over accumulation.
5. An extraordinary situation: too much generosity. The people's offerings exceed what the work requires — a sharp contrast to reluctant giving.
6. Moses must formally restrain the people from giving more. This is the only time in Scripture a leader must halt contributions for being excessive.
7. The materials were 'sufficient and more' (dayam... ve-hoter). God's dwelling is funded entirely by willing hearts, with abundance left over.
8. The ten inner panels form the tabernacle proper. Cherubim woven into the fabric echo the heavenly throne room — the tabernacle as earthly mirror of God's heavenly dwelling.
9. Precise dimensions ensure uniformity. Twenty-eight by four cubits per panel — standardization enables the panels to join into a seamless whole.
10. Two sets of five panels each are joined, then the two sets connected — a modular construction approach allowing assembly and disassembly for travel.
11. Blue loops along the panel edges create the attachment points. Blue (tekhelet) connotes heaven — even structural details carry symbolic weight.
12. Fifty loops per set, perfectly aligned opposite each other. Precision in these structural details ensures the tabernacle holds together as one unit.
13. Fifty gold clasps unite the two halves into one tabernacle (mishkan echad). Gold connotes the divine presence that dwells within this unified structure.
14. The goat-hair tent covering provides a protective layer over the inner linen panels. Eleven panels (one more than the inner set) ensure full coverage.
15. Slightly larger dimensions (thirty cubits vs. twenty-eight) allow the outer covering to drape over and protect the finer inner panels.

16. The asymmetric grouping (five plus six) allows the extra panel to fold over the front of the tabernacle entrance.
17. Construction of the joining mechanism for the outer tent covering mirrors the inner panels but uses different materials — function dictates form.
18. Bronze clasps (not gold) join the outer covering — appropriate to the less sacred outer layer. Material grades correspond to degrees of holiness.
19. Ram skins dyed red and fine leather form the outermost protective layers — waterproofing the sacred structure against the elements.
20. The upright frames (qerashim) of acacia wood provide the rigid structure. Acacia is the primary desert hardwood, durable and resistant to decay.
21. Standardized frame dimensions (ten by one-and-a-half cubits) create a modular wall system that can be assembled and transported.
22. Two tenons per frame lock into silver bases, creating stable joints. The word meshullavot (joined) indicates the tenons are parallel and evenly spaced.
23. Twenty frames for the south wall. The directional specificity (negev teimanah) anchors the tabernacle's orientation in Israel's camp layout.
24. Forty silver bases — two per frame — provide the foundation. Silver (from the census tax) literally supports the dwelling, connecting the people to God's house.
25. The north wall mirrors the south with twenty frames, establishing the tabernacle's symmetry. Both long sides are identical in construction.
26. Forty silver bases on the north match the south. The structural symmetry reflects the ordered perfection of God's dwelling design.
27. Six frames for the narrower west (rear) wall. The tabernacle entrance faces east — toward the sunrise, the direction of God's appearing.
28. Corner frames require special construction, reinforcing the structural junction where the side and rear walls meet.
29. The corner frames are twinned (to'amim) from bottom to top, bound to a single ring — creating a rigid corner that holds the walls at right angles.
30. Eight total frames on the west end (six regular plus two corners) with sixteen bases. Every structural element is precisely counted and recorded.
31. Five crossbars per side lock the upright frames together laterally. Acacia wood crossbars prevent the wall from flexing or collapsing.
32. The crossbar pattern repeats: five per side, five for the west — total structural rigidity for a portable building that must survive wilderness travel.
33. The center crossbar runs the entire length of the wall through the middle of the frames — the spine that holds each wall section together.
34. Gold overlay on frames, rings, and crossbars transforms the acacia wood structure into a shining interior. Inside the tabernacle, everything is gold.
35. The inner curtain (parokhet) separates the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place. Its cherubim design mirrors the inner panels — heavenly guardians woven into the boundary.
36. Four acacia posts overlaid with gold support the inner curtain. Their silver bases echo the wall foundations — the entire structure rests on silver.
37. The entrance screen differs from the inner curtain: embroidered work (roqem) rather than woven cherubim, marking a lesser degree of sacred separation.
38. Five posts with gold tops but bronze bases. The shift from silver (inner curtain) to bronze (entrance) reflects the gradient of holiness from inside out.

Summary: Bezalel personally constructs the most sacred interior furnishings: the ark of the covenant with its mercy seat and cherubim, the table of the Presence, the golden lampstand, and the incense altar — all overlaid with pure gold.

What Makes This Remarkable: Bezalel constructs the ark himself — the most sacred object in Israel's worship is made by the hands of the artisan God called 'by name' (31:2). The mercy seat cherubim face each other with wings spread, creating the space where God will meet Moses (25:22). The lampstand is hammered from a single piece of gold (miqshah, v17) — no joining or welding, but one continuous form. The gold zone furnishings (ark, table, lampstand, incense altar) form an ensemble that represents God's throne, God's provision, God's light, and God's fragrance — a complete sensory theology.

Translation Friction: The construction account closely follows the instructions of chapter 25. We maintained vocabulary consistency between the two chapters so readers can trace the obedience pattern. The phrase zahav tahor ('pure gold') recurs throughout; we rendered it consistently rather than varying the English. The permanent carrying poles of the ark (v5, cf. 25:15) symbolize readiness to move — we noted this in the original instruction chapter and maintained the connection here.

Connections: The ark will lead Israel through the Jordan (Joshua 3:3-17), circle Jericho (Joshua 6:4-8), and rest in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:1-9). The mercy seat becomes the focal point of the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 16). The lampstand imagery appears in Zechariah 4 and Revelation 1:12-13. The incense altar is the setting for Zechariah's angelic encounter (Luke 1:11).

¹Bezalel constructed the ark from acacia wood — two and a half cubits long, a cubit and a half wide, and a cubit and a half tall. ²He plated it with pure gold inside and out, and fashioned a gold molding around its rim. ³He cast four gold rings for it, placing them at its four feet — two rings on one side and two on the other. ⁴He made carrying poles of acacia wood and overlaid them with gold. ⁵He inserted the poles into the rings on the sides of the ark for transporting it. ⁶He made the mercy seat of pure gold — two and a half cubits long and a cubit and a half wide. ⁷He fashioned two cherubim of hammered gold, forming them at the two ends of the mercy seat. ⁸One cherub extended from one end and the other from the opposite end; he made the cherubim as a single piece with the mercy seat at its two ends. ⁹The cherubim had their wings spread upward, overshadowing the mercy seat. They faced each other, with their faces turned down toward the mercy seat. ¹⁰He constructed the table from acacia wood — two cubits long, one cubit wide, and a cubit and a half tall. ¹¹He overlaid it with pure gold and fashioned a gold molding around its rim. ¹²He also made a rim a handbreadth wide around it and placed a gold molding along that rim. ¹³He cast four gold rings for it and attached them at the four corners near its four legs. ¹⁴The rings were positioned close to the rim as holders for the poles used to carry the table. ¹⁵He crafted the carrying poles from acacia wood, overlaid them with gold, and used them for transporting the table. ¹⁶He made the utensils for the table — its plates, ladles, bowls, and pitchers for pouring drink offerings — all from pure gold. ¹⁷He constructed the lampstand of pure gold. He hammered it from a single piece — its base, shaft, cups, buds, and blossoms were all of one piece. ¹⁸Six branches extended from its sides — three branches from one side and three from the other. ¹⁹Three almond-shaped cups with buds and blossoms adorned one branch, and three almond-shaped cups with buds and blossoms on the next — the same pattern for all six branches extending from the lampstand. ²⁰On the lampstand's central shaft were four almond-shaped cups with buds and blossoms. ²¹A bud was positioned beneath each pair of branches — for all six branches extending from the lampstand. ²²The buds and branches were all of one piece with it, the whole lampstand a single work of hammered pure gold. ²³He made its seven lamps, along with its wick trimmers and trays, all of pure gold. ²⁴He used one talent of pure gold for the lampstand and all its accessories. ²⁵He constructed the incense altar from acacia wood — one cubit long, one cubit wide (it was square), and two cubits tall. Its horns were of one piece with it. ²⁶He overlaid it with pure gold — its top, all its sides, and its horns — and made a gold molding around it. ²⁷He made two gold rings beneath the molding on two opposite sides as holders for the poles used to carry it. ²⁸He crafted the carrying poles from acacia wood and overlaid them with gold. ²⁹He also prepared the sacred anointing oil and the pure fragrant incense, blended as a perfumer would.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bezalel personally constructs the ark — the most sacred object in the tabernacle. Acacia wood overlaid with gold houses the covenant tablets.
2. Pure gold inside and out with a gold molding (zer). The ark's double plating signifies that God's covenant dwelling is precious through and through.
3. Four gold rings at the feet position the carrying poles at the base, keeping the ark stable during transport through the wilderness.
4. Acacia wood poles overlaid with gold — consistent with the ark's materials. The poles remain in the rings permanently (25:15), symbolizing readiness to move.
5. The poles inserted in the rings enable the Levites to carry the ark without touching it directly — maintaining the boundary between human and divine holiness.
6. The mercy seat (kapporet) of pure gold is the lid of the ark and the place where God meets Israel. Its dimensions match the ark exactly.
7. Two cherubim hammered from one piece of gold — not attached separately but formed organically from the mercy seat itself, indicating inseparable unity.
8. The cherubim extend from opposite ends, facing inward. Their positioning creates a throne-like space above the mercy seat where God's presence dwells.

9. Wings spread upward and faces turned downward toward the mercy seat — the cherubim simultaneously guard and attend the place of atonement.
10. The table of the Presence holds the twelve loaves (bread of the Presence) representing Israel's tribes continually before God.
11. Pure gold overlay and gold molding on the table echo the ark's construction — items in the Holy Place reflect the glory within the Most Holy Place.
12. The handbreadth rim (misgereth) prevents items from sliding off during transport. Practical design serves the sacred function.
13. Four gold rings at the corners near the legs — the same carrying mechanism as the ark, enabling reverent transport by poles.
14. Rings positioned near the rim provide balanced carrying points. Every detail of the engineering serves the tabernacle's portable sacred architecture.
15. The carrying poles for the table, like those for the ark, are acacia wood overlaid with gold — maintaining material consistency throughout the Holy Place.
16. The table utensils — plates, ladles, bowls, and pitchers — are pure gold. These serve the bread of the Presence and the drink offerings placed on the table.
17. The lampstand (menorah) is hammered from a single piece of pure gold — no joints or welds. Its organic almond-blossom design suggests a living tree of light.
18. Six branches (three per side) plus the central shaft create seven lamp positions — the number of completion, providing full illumination in the Holy Place.
19. Almond-shaped cups (meshukadim) echo Aaron's rod that budded with almonds (Num 17). The almond motif connects light, life, and priestly authority.
20. Four additional almond cups on the central shaft distinguish it from the branches. The shaft is the trunk; the branches extend from it organically.
21. Decorative buds beneath each pair of branches create visual rhythm. The lampstand's design is both functional (light) and beautiful (artistry).
22. The single-piece construction is emphasized: everything is mimmennah (from it). No part is added — the lampstand grows from one mass of gold.
23. Seven lamps, wick trimmers, and trays — the maintenance tools are pure gold like the lampstand itself. Even the accessories share the sacred material.
24. One talent of pure gold (approximately 75 pounds) for the entire lampstand and all its accessories — a staggering amount of precious metal.
25. The incense altar is small (one cubit square, two cubits tall) but central — it stands directly before the inner curtain, closest to God's presence.
26. Pure gold overlay on every surface including the horns. The gold molding (zer) frames the top, matching the ark's and table's decorative borders.
27. Two gold rings for carrying poles, positioned on opposite sides below the molding. The incense altar, like the ark and table, must be transportable.
28. The carrying poles follow the standard pattern: acacia wood overlaid with gold. Consistency in construction materials unifies the tabernacle's sacred furniture.
29. The anointing oil and incense are prepared by a perfumer's art (roqeach). Sacred scent, like sacred light, fills the space where God dwells.

Summary: The craftsmen build the bronze altar and bronze basin for the courtyard, construct the courtyard enclosure, and provide an inventory of all materials used — gold, silver, and bronze — including the silver from the census ransom of 603,550 men.

What Makes This Remarkable: The material inventory (vv21-31) is a remarkable accounting document embedded in sacred narrative. The total gold used was about 29 talents (roughly one ton), the silver came from the half-shekel census ransom of 603,550 men, and the bronze was about 70 talents. The precision demonstrates that the tabernacle's construction was publicly accountable — no material disappeared. The bronze basin (v8) was made from the mirrors of the serving women, transforming instruments of personal adornment into instruments of priestly purification.

Translation Friction: The women's mirrors (mar'ot hatsov'ot, v8) are described as belonging to 'the women who served at the entrance of the tent of meeting.' The nature of this service is debated; we rendered the phrase literally without specifying the role. The talent and shekel measurements we retained in Hebrew units, providing approximate modern equivalents in notes. The census number 603,550 (v26) matches Numbers 1:46 exactly, anchoring the tabernacle construction to the community's demographic record.

Connections: The census number matches Numbers 1:46 and 2:32. The bronze basin connects to the priestly washing prescribed in 30:17-21 and anticipates the 'molten sea' in Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:23-26). The women serving at the tent entrance reappear in 1 Samuel 2:22. The material accountability anticipates temple treasury practices in 2 Kings 12:9-16.

¹He built the altar for burnt offerings from acacia wood — five cubits long, five cubits wide (it was square), and three cubits tall. ²He made horns at its four corners as one piece with the altar, and overlaid the whole structure with bronze. ³He produced all the altar's equipment — the pots, shovels, sprinkling bowls, meat forks, and fire pans — fashioning everything from bronze. ⁴He made a bronze mesh grating for the altar, fitting it beneath the ledge so it extended halfway up. ⁵He cast four rings at the four corners of the bronze grating as holders for the carrying poles. ⁶He crafted the carrying poles from acacia wood and overlaid them with bronze. ⁷He slid the poles through the rings on the sides of the altar for carrying it. The altar was built hollow, constructed from planks. ⁸He fashioned the bronze basin and its bronze stand from the mirrors of the women who served at the entrance to the tent of meeting. ⁹He constructed the courtyard. On the south side, the courtyard curtains were of finely twisted linen, spanning one hundred cubits. ¹⁰Their twenty posts and twenty bronze bases had silver hooks and silver bands on the posts. ¹¹On the north side the curtains also spanned one hundred cubits, with twenty posts and twenty bronze bases; the hooks and bands on the posts were silver. ¹²On the west side the curtains spanned fifty cubits, supported by ten posts with ten bases; the hooks and bands on the posts were silver. ¹³The east side measured fifty cubits across. ¹⁴Curtains spanning fifteen cubits were on one side of the entrance, supported by three posts and three bases. ¹⁵On the other side of the courtyard entrance — on both sides of the gate — were curtains of fifteen cubits, with three posts and three bases. ¹⁶All the curtains surrounding the courtyard were of finely twisted linen. ¹⁷The bases for the posts were bronze, while the hooks and bands were silver. The post capitals were overlaid with silver, and all the courtyard posts were banded with silver. ¹⁸The screen at the courtyard entrance was embroidered work of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen. It was twenty cubits long and five cubits high, matching the courtyard curtains. ¹⁹It had four posts with four bronze bases. Their hooks were silver, and their capitals and bands were overlaid with silver. ²⁰All the tent pegs for the tabernacle and the surrounding courtyard were bronze. ²¹This is the inventory of materials for the tabernacle — the tabernacle of the testimony — recorded at Moses's direction, carried out by the Levites under the supervision of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest. ²²Bezalel son of Uri, son of Hur, of the tribe of Judah, carried out everything the LORD had commanded Moses. ²³Working alongside him was Oholiab son of Ahisamach, of the tribe of Dan — an engraver, a skilled designer, and an embroiderer in blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and fine linen. ²⁴The total gold used in all the sanctuary construction — the gold from the wave offering — amounted to twenty-nine talents and seven hundred thirty shekels by the sanctuary standard. ²⁵The silver collected from those in the community who were counted came to one hundred talents and one thousand seven hundred seventy-five shekels by the sanctuary standard — ²⁶a bekah per person (that is, half a shekel by the sanctuary standard) for everyone who passed through the census, twenty years old or older — totaling 603,550 men. ²⁷The one hundred talents of silver were used to cast the bases for the sanctuary and the bases for the curtain — one hundred bases from one hundred talents, one talent per base. ²⁸From the remaining one thousand seven hundred seventy-five shekels, he made hooks for the posts, overlaid their capitals, and fashioned bands for them. ²⁹The bronze from the wave offering totaled seventy talents and two thousand four hundred shekels. ³⁰With this bronze he made the bases for the entrance to the tent of meeting, the bronze altar, its bronze grating, and all the altar's equipment, ³¹along with the bases around the courtyard, the bases for the courtyard entrance, and all the tent pegs for the tabernacle and the surrounding courtyard.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The burnt offering altar, the largest piece of tabernacle furniture, stands in the courtyard. Its square shape and acacia wood construction provide stability.
2. Horns at the four corners are integral (not attached), symbolizing strength and serving as anchor points for sacrificial blood application.
3. The altar's bronze equipment — pots for ashes, shovels, bowls, forks, and fire pans — are the tools of daily sacrificial service.

4. The bronze grating fits inside the altar below the ledge, supporting the fire and allowing ashes to fall through — practical engineering for continual use.
5. Four rings at the grating's corners hold the carrying poles, enabling transport. Even this heavy altar must be portable for wilderness travel.
6. Carrying poles of acacia wood overlaid with bronze (not gold, as for the inner furniture) — materials correspond to the courtyard's lower holiness grade.
7. The hollow plank construction keeps the altar light enough for transport while providing the volume needed for sacrificial fires.
8. The bronze basin is made from women's mirrors — a remarkable detail. Personal vanity items are transformed into instruments of priestly purification.
9. The courtyard dimensions begin: one hundred cubits on the south side. The courtyard creates sacred space separating the tabernacle from the common camp.
10. Twenty posts with bronze bases and silver hooks/bands. The material gradient continues: bronze for structure, silver for fittings, in the courtyard zone.
11. The north side mirrors the south exactly — one hundred cubits, twenty posts, twenty bases. Symmetry in the courtyard reflects divine order.
12. The west side (fifty cubits) with ten posts forms the rear boundary. Smaller dimensions reflect the courtyard's rectangular shape.
13. The east side (entrance side) also measures fifty cubits but includes the gate opening, dividing the curtain space differently.
14. Fifteen cubits of curtains on one side of the entrance, supported by three posts — creating the approach to the courtyard gate.
15. Matching fifteen-cubit curtains on the other side frame the twenty-cubit entrance opening in the center of the east wall.
16. All courtyard curtains are finely twisted linen — white fabric creating a visible boundary of purity around the sacred precinct.
17. The material breakdown: bronze bases, silver hooks and bands, silver-overlaid capitals. Every pillar in the courtyard gleams with silver.
18. The courtyard gate screen is the most decorated element — embroidered with the same blue, purple, and scarlet as the tabernacle entrance, marking it as a sacred threshold.
19. Four posts for the gate (vs. three for each side section). Silver hooks and overlaid capitals mark this entrance as more prominent than the surrounding curtains.
20. All tent pegs are bronze — the most utilitarian items use the most common metal. Even stakes anchoring ropes serve the sacred structure.
21. This inventory (pequdei) transitions from construction narrative to material accounting. Ithamar son of Aaron oversees the Levitical record-keeping.
22. Bezalel's full genealogy reappears at the project's completion, bookending the construction account. He faithfully executed everything God commanded.
23. Oholiab's triple skill set — engraving, design, embroidery — complements Bezalel's work. The two master artisans represent Judah and Dan working together.
24. Twenty-nine talents and 730 shekels of gold — approximately 2,200 pounds. The wave offering (tenufah) gold was ceremonially presented before use.
25. The census silver (one hundred talents plus 1,775 shekels) came from the mandatory half-shekel contribution, not freewill offering.
26. The bekah (half-shekel) per person from 603,550 men connects the tabernacle's foundation literally to every counted Israelite — all share in supporting God's house.
27. One hundred talents of silver cast one hundred bases — one talent per base. The sanctuary and veil rest on silver foundations contributed by all Israel.
28. The remaining silver covers the decorative elements — hooks, capitals, bands. Every shekel is accounted for in this transparent material audit.
29. Seventy talents and 2,400 shekels of bronze — the most abundant metal, used for the heaviest structural components and all courtyard elements.
30. Bronze provides the bases, altar, grating, and vessels — all the elements exposed to weather, fire, and heavy use in the outer courtyard.
31. The inventory closes with the bronze tent pegs — from the most sacred interior furniture down to the humblest structural anchor, everything is accounted for.

Summary: The priestly garments are completed — ephod, breastpiece, robe, tunics, turban, and gold plate. The refrain 'as the LORD commanded Moses' echoes seven times. All the tabernacle work is finished and brought to Moses, who inspects it and blesses the people.

What Makes This Remarkable: The refrain ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et-Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses') appears seven times in this chapter, deliberately echoing the sevenfold 'and God said' of Genesis 1. The tabernacle construction is presented as a new creation — what God spoke into existence at the cosmic level, He now speaks into existence at the liturgical level. Moses's inspection and blessing (v43) parallel God's inspection and blessing of creation in Genesis 1:31-2:3. The gold thread hammered thin and cut into wire for weaving into the ephod (v3) represents extraordinary technical skill in service of sacred art.

Translation Friction: The repetitive structure of the chapter — garment after garment, each followed by the obedience refrain — we preserved without compression, because the repetition itself carries theological meaning: faithful obedience is the point, and each repetition confirms it. The technical weaving vocabulary (hammered gold sheets cut into threads, v3) we rendered as clearly as possible while preserving the craft details. Moses 'saw all the work, and behold, they had done it' (v43) uses the same verb ra'ah ('saw') and the same assessment structure as Genesis 1:31 ('God saw everything He had made').

Connections: The sevenfold refrain parallels the seven days of creation (Genesis 1:1-2:3). Moses's inspection and blessing echo God's approval in Genesis 1:31. The presentation of completed work to Moses anticipates the presentation of the completed temple to Solomon (1 Kings 7:51). The priestly garments are finally worn in Leviticus 8 at the ordination ceremony.

¹From the blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, they produced the woven garments for service in the sanctuary. They also made the sacred garments for Aaron, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²They constructed the ephod from gold thread, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen. ³They hammered gold sheets thin and cut them into threads to be woven into the blue, purple, and scarlet yarn and the fine linen — the work of a skilled designer. ⁴They made shoulder pieces for the ephod, attached at its two upper corners so it could be joined together. ⁵The skillfully woven band of the ephod was of one piece with it, made the same way — from gold, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁶They prepared the onyx stones, mounted in gold filigree settings, engraved like a seal with the names of Israel's sons. ⁷They fastened the stones to the shoulder pieces of the ephod as memorial stones for the sons of Israel, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁸They fashioned the breastpiece with skilled design, matching the workmanship of the ephod — from gold, blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and finely twisted linen. ⁹The breastpiece was square when folded double — a span long and a span wide. ¹⁰They mounted four rows of gemstones on it. The first row contained a carnelian, a topaz, and an emerald. ¹¹The second row had a turquoise, a sapphire, and a diamond. ¹²The third row held a jacinth, an agate, and an amethyst. ¹³The fourth row contained a beryl, an onyx, and a jasper — each set in a gold filigree mounting. ¹⁴The stones corresponded to the names of Israel's sons — twelve in all, one for each tribe, each engraved like a seal with the name of one tribe. ¹⁵For the breastpiece they crafted braided chains of pure gold, twisted like cords. ¹⁶They made two gold filigree settings and two gold rings, attaching the rings to the two upper corners of the breastpiece. ¹⁷They attached the two gold braided chains to the two rings at the corners of the breastpiece. ¹⁸The other two ends of the braided chains they fastened to the two filigree settings, attaching them to the shoulder pieces of the ephod at the front. ¹⁹They made two more gold rings and attached them to the two lower corners of the breastpiece, on its inner edge next to the ephod. ²⁰They made two additional gold rings and fastened them to the lower part of the two shoulder pieces of the ephod, at the front near its seam, just above the woven band. ²¹They tied the breastpiece by its rings to the rings of the ephod with a blue cord, so that it rested on the woven band and would not come loose from the ephod — just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²²They wove the robe of the ephod entirely from blue yarn. ²³It had an opening at the center, like the collar of a coat of armor, with a reinforced band around the opening so it would not tear. ²⁴On the lower hem of the robe they made pomegranates of blue, purple, and scarlet yarn, and twisted linen. ²⁵They also made bells of pure gold and placed them between the pomegranates around the lower hem of the robe — ²⁶alternating a bell and a pomegranate all around the hem of the robe worn for ministry, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²⁷They wove tunics of fine linen for Aaron and his sons, ²⁸along with a turban of fine linen, decorative headbands of fine linen, and undergarments of finely twisted linen, ²⁹and a sash of finely twisted linen with blue, purple, and scarlet yarn — embroidered work — just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁰They made the medallion — the sacred diadem — from pure gold, and inscribed on it like a seal engraving: HOLY TO THE LORD. ³¹They attached a blue cord to fasten it to the top of the turban, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³²So all the work on the tabernacle — the tent of meeting — was completed. The Israelites had done everything precisely as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³³They presented the tabernacle to Moses: the tent with all its furnishings — its clasps, frames, crossbars, posts, and bases; ³⁴the covering of ram skins dyed red, the covering of fine leather, and the screening curtain; ³⁵the ark of the testimony with its poles and the mercy seat; ³⁶the table with all its utensils and the bread of the Presence; ³⁷the pure gold lampstand with its row of lamps and all its accessories, together with the oil for illumination; ³⁸the gold altar, the anointing oil, the fragrant incense, and the screen for the tent entrance; ³⁹the bronze altar with its bronze grating, its poles, and all its equipment; the basin with its stand; ⁴⁰the curtains of the courtyard with their posts and bases, the screen for the courtyard entrance, its ropes and tent pegs, and all the equipment for the service of the tabernacle — the tent of meeting; ⁴¹the woven garments for service in the sanctuary, the sacred garments for Aaron the priest, and his sons' garments for priestly service. ⁴²The Israelites carried out all the work exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁴³Moses inspected all the work, and indeed they had accomplished it just as the LORD had commanded. So Moses blessed them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The priestly garment section begins. 'As the LORD commanded Moses' appears as a refrain throughout chapter 39, echoing the creation account's 'and God said.'
2. The ephod — the high priest's outer vestment — is the most complex garment, incorporating gold thread woven directly into the colored yarns and linen.
3. Hammering gold into thin sheets, then cutting into threads for weaving — a technically demanding process that integrates gold directly into fabric.
4. Shoulder pieces join the front and back panels of the ephod, creating the structural support for the entire garment and the breastpiece attached to it.
5. The woven band (cheshev) is integral to the ephod, not a separate belt. Its unified construction mirrors the tabernacle's one-piece design philosophy.
6. Onyx stones engraved with Israel's tribal names function like a signet seal — each tribe's identity is permanently inscribed and carried by the high priest.
7. The shoulder stones are 'memorial stones' (avnei zikkaron) — the high priest physically carries Israel's names before God whenever he enters the sanctuary.
8. The breastpiece (choshen) matches the ephod in materials and workmanship. It lies over the heart, while the shoulder stones rest on the shoulders — Israel is borne on heart and shoulders.
9. The doubled square (a span = about 9 inches) creates a pocket or pouch, traditionally understood as housing the Urim and Thummim for divine inquiry.
10. The four rows of three stones = twelve stones for twelve tribes. Stone identification varies among ancient sources, reflecting uncertainty about exact minerals.
11. The second row of precious stones continues the tribal representation. Each stone is unique, reflecting the distinct identity of each Israelite tribe.
12. The third row of gemstones. The order likely corresponds to the birth order or camp arrangement of Israel's twelve tribes.
13. The fourth row completes the twelve stones. Gold filigree settings secure each stone — precious material holding precious material, all bearing tribal names.
14. Each stone is individually engraved like a seal — permanent, authoritative, personal. The high priest wears Israel's identity into God's presence.
15. Braided gold chains connect the breastpiece to the ephod. The 'twisted cord' (avot) design provides both beauty and structural strength.
16. Filigree gold settings and rings create the upper attachment system. The engineering ensures the breastpiece hangs securely from the shoulders.

17. Gold chains thread through the upper corner rings, creating the primary suspension for the breastpiece from the shoulder pieces above.
18. The chains fasten to filigree settings on the shoulder pieces, distributing the breastpiece's weight evenly across both shoulders.
19. Additional lower rings on the breastpiece's inner edge prevent it from swinging outward during the priest's movements.
20. Matching rings on the lower ephod near the seam above the woven band complete the four-point attachment system securing the breastpiece.
21. A blue cord ties the lower rings together, ensuring the breastpiece stays flush against the ephod. The refrain 'as the LORD commanded Moses' validates the execution.
22. The robe (me'il) worn under the ephod is entirely blue (tekhelet) — the color associated with heaven and divine presence.
23. The reinforced collar opening prevents tearing — practical garment engineering for a robe that must endure regular priestly service without damage.
24. Pomegranates on the hem — symbols of fruitfulness and abundance. Their blue, purple, and scarlet colors match the tabernacle's decorative palette.
25. Pure gold bells between the pomegranates produce sound as the priest moves, announcing his presence in the sanctuary before God.
26. Alternating bells and pomegranates create a rhythmic pattern of sound and symbol. The robe is 'for ministry' — designed for its sacred function.
27. Fine linen tunics (kuttonet) for Aaron and his sons are the innermost garments — simple white linen worn next to the body beneath the other vestments.
28. The turban (mitznefet) for Aaron, headbands (migba'ot) for his sons, and linen undergarments complete the basic priestly wardrobe of purity and modesty.
29. The sash (avnet) of embroidered linen with colored yarn wraps the waist, securing the tunic. Even this accessory follows God's exact specifications.
30. The gold medallion (tzitz) inscribed HOLY TO THE LORD is the crown of the priestly wardrobe — it rests on the turban at the forehead, Israel's holiness made visible.
31. A blue cord secures the medallion to the turban. Blue (tekhelet) connects the priestly crown to the heavenly realm the priest mediates between.
32. The summary formula echoes Genesis 2:1-2 — 'all the work was completed.' The tabernacle construction parallels the creation narrative in structure and language.
33. The completed tabernacle and all its components are presented to Moses for inspection — structural elements first: clasps, frames, crossbars, posts, bases.
34. The protective coverings and the inner curtain are presented — the layers that shield and separate within the sacred structure.
35. The ark of the testimony and the mercy seat — the most sacred objects — are listed among the items brought for Moses's inspection.
36. The table and bread of the Presence — the furnishing of the Holy Place that represents God's sustaining provision for His covenant people.
37. The pure gold lampstand with all its accessories and oil — ready for the perpetual light that will illuminate the Holy Place.
38. The gold incense altar, anointing oil, and incense — the worship implements, along with the entrance screen — are presented.
39. The bronze altar and basin — the courtyard furniture for sacrifice and cleansing — complete the major furnishing inventory.
40. Courtyard infrastructure — curtains, posts, bases, gate screen, ropes, and pegs — all the elements that define the sacred perimeter.
41. The priestly garments close the inventory. Both service garments (bigdei serad) and sacred garments (bigdei ha-qodesh) are presented for approval.
42. The comprehensive compliance statement: Israel did everything exactly as commanded. Obedience in construction mirrors the obedience demanded in worship.
43. Moses's inspection and blessing parallel God's review of creation (Gen 1:31). 'He saw... they had done it... and he blessed them' echoes 'God saw that it was good.'

Summary: On the first day of the first month — exactly one year after the exodus — Moses erects the tabernacle, places the ark, sets up the furnishings, anoints everything, and consecrates Aaron and his sons. The cloud covers the tent and the glory of the LORD fills the tabernacle.

What Makes This Remarkable: The tabernacle is erected on Israel's anniversary of liberation (v2, cf. 12:2) — the exodus began with departure from Egypt and culminates with God taking up residence among His people. The final verses (vv34-38) describe the cloud of the LORD covering the tent and His kavod ('glory') filling the mishkan so powerfully that even Moses 'was not able to enter.' The God who descended on Sinai in cloud and fire now descends into the structure Israel built for Him. The book that began with Israel enslaved ends with God dwelling among them, leading them by cloud and fire.

Translation Friction: The phrase velo-yakhol Mosheh lavo el-ohel mo'ed ('Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting,' v35) creates a striking tension — the man who spoke with God face to face (33:11) cannot enter the space filled with God's glory. We rendered this literally without resolving the tension, as the Hebrew holds both realities together. The cloud-and-fire guidance system (vv36-38) we rendered straightforwardly, noting that it echoes the pillar of cloud and fire from 13:21-22, now permanently attached to the tabernacle rather than leading from a distance.

Connections: The glory filling the tabernacle parallels the glory filling Solomon's temple (1 Kings 8:10-11) and Ezekiel's visionary temple (Ezekiel 43:1-5). The cloud-and-fire guidance continues through Numbers and Deuteronomy. The incarnation ('the Word became flesh and tabernacled among us,' John 1:14) is the ultimate fulfillment of God dwelling with His people. Revelation 21:3 ('the dwelling place of God is with man') completes the trajectory that begins here.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"On the first day of the first month you shall set up the tabernacle of the tent of meeting. ³You shall place the ark of the Testimony in it and screen the ark with the veil. ⁴You shall bring in the table and arrange what belongs on it. You shall bring in the lampstand and set up its lamps. ⁵You shall place the golden altar for incense before the ark of the Testimony and set up the screen for the entrance of the tabernacle. ⁶You shall place the altar of burnt offering before the entrance of the tabernacle of the tent of meeting. ⁷You shall place the basin between the tent of meeting and the altar and put water in it. ⁸You shall set up the courtyard all around and hang the screen for the gate of the courtyard. ⁹"Then you shall take the anointing oil and anoint the tabernacle and all that is in it, and consecrate it and all its furnishings, and it shall become holy. ¹⁰You shall also anoint the altar of burnt offering and all its utensils, and consecrate the altar, and the altar shall become most holy. ¹¹You shall also anoint the basin and its stand and consecrate it. ¹²"Then you shall bring Aaron and his sons to the entrance of the tent of meeting and wash them with water. ¹³You shall put the holy garments on Aaron and anoint him and consecrate him, so that he may serve Me as priest. ¹⁴You shall bring his sons and put tunics on them. ¹⁵You shall anoint them as you anointed their father, so that they may serve Me as priests. Their anointing shall be for them an eternal priesthood throughout their generations." ¹⁶Moses did everything; according to all that the LORD had commanded him, so he did. ¹⁷In the first month of the second year, on the first day of the month, the tabernacle was set up. ¹⁸Moses set up the tabernacle. He laid its bases, set up its frames, put in its bars, and erected its pillars. ¹⁹He spread the tent over the tabernacle and put the covering of the tent over it, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²⁰He took the Testimony and put it into the ark, and he set the poles on the ark and placed the atonement cover on top of the ark. ²¹He brought the ark into the tabernacle and set up the veil of the screen and screened off the ark of the Testimony, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²²He put the table in the tent of meeting, on the north side of the tabernacle, outside the veil. ²³He arranged the bread on it before the LORD, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²⁴He put the lampstand in the tent of meeting, opposite the table, on the south side of the tabernacle. ²⁵He set up the lamps before the LORD, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²⁶He placed the golden altar in the tent of meeting, before the veil, ²⁷and burned fragrant incense on it, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²⁸He set up the screen for the entrance of the tabernacle. ²⁹He placed the altar of burnt offering at the entrance of the tabernacle of the tent of meeting and offered on it the burnt offering and the grain offering, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁰He placed the basin between the tent of meeting and the altar and put water in it for washing. ³¹Moses and Aaron and his sons washed their hands and their feet from it. ³²Whenever they entered the tent of meeting or approached the altar, they washed, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³³He set up the courtyard around the tabernacle and the altar and hung the screen of the gate of the courtyard. So Moses finished the work. ³⁴Then the cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle. ³⁵Moses was not able to enter the tent of meeting because the cloud had settled on it and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle. ³⁶Whenever the cloud was taken up from over the tabernacle, the sons of Israel would set out on each stage of their journey. ³⁷But if the cloud was not taken up, they did not set out until the day it was taken up. ³⁸The cloud of the LORD rested on the tabernacle during the day, and fire glowed within it at night, visible to the entire house of Israel at every stage of their travels.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The final chapter of Exodus begins where the book's central concern has always been heading: the assembly of God's dwelling place among His people.
2. 'The first day of the first month' — exactly one year after the exodus (cf. 12:2, where this month was declared 'the beginning of months'). The tabernacle is erected on Israel's anniversary of liberation. The exodus began with departure from Egypt; it culminates with God taking up residence among His people.
3. The ark of the Testimony goes in first — the most sacred object enters the most sacred space. The veil screens it from the rest of the sanctuary.
4. The table and lampstand are positioned in the Holy Place — provision (bread) and illumination (light) in the space where priests serve daily.
5. The incense altar before the ark — fragrant smoke at the threshold of the Most Holy Place. The golden altar's position marks the boundary between the accessible and the veiled.
6. The bronze altar at the entrance — sacrifice is the first encounter upon entering sacred space. Everything else is beyond the altar.
7. The basin between altar and tent — purification mediates between sacrifice and service. The priest washes after handling blood and before entering God's presence.
8. The courtyard enclosure completes the physical structure. From this point, the tabernacle is a bounded, ordered, layered space: courtyard Holy Place Most Holy Place.
9. Anointing oil consecrates everything it touches — the tabernacle and all its contents become holy through the same oil. The verb qiddesh ('consecrate, make holy') transforms ordinary materials into sacred objects.
10. The bronze altar becomes 'most holy' (qodesh qodashim) — the same designation as the inner sanctum. The altar where blood is shed has the same holiness status as the space where God dwells. Sacrifice and presence share a holiness category.
11. The basin and stand — even the washing equipment is consecrated. Nothing in the tabernacle complex is merely utilitarian; everything participates in holiness.
12. Aaron and his sons are washed at the entrance — the same sequence as the consecration ceremony (29:4). The human priests are prepared last, after the physical space is complete.
13. Aaron is dressed and anointed — the mashach verb that makes him mashiach, the anointed one. The garments 'for glory and for beauty' (28:2) are put on.
14. The sons receive their tunics — the simpler priestly garments.
15. 'Their anointing shall be for them an eternal priesthood' (vehayetah lahem mishchat olam lekhunnat olam) — the Aaronic priesthood is established permanently. The anointing of this generation extends across all future generations.
16. 'Moses did everything; according to all that the LORD had commanded him, so he did' (vayyya'as Mosheh kekhol asher tsivvah YHWH oto ken asah) — the obedience formula that defined Noah (Genesis 6:22) and governed the tabernacle's construction (39:32, 42-43) now covers the assembly. Moses's compliance is exact and total.
17. The date is precise: first month, first day, second year. The tabernacle stands exactly one year after the exodus. Israel's first anniversary is celebrated not with a parade but with the completion of God's house.
18. Moses himself assembles the tabernacle — the prophet becomes the builder. Each verb is specific: laid (bases), set up (frames), put in (bars), erected (pillars). The leader does the manual work.
19. The tent covering goes over the frame, then the outer covering over the tent — layers of protection from inside out, as specified in ch26.

- 20. 'He took the Testimony and put it into the ark' — the stone tablets enter the chest built to hold them. God's words, written by God's finger, are placed inside gold-covered acacia wood, under the kapporet. The most sacred text enters the most sacred container.
- 21. The ark enters the Most Holy Place and the veil is hung — the innermost zone is now sealed. 'As the LORD had commanded Moses' — the phrase occurs seven times in vv19-32 (seven = completeness), confirming that every step follows the divine blueprint.
- 22. The table on the north side — positioned as specified in 26:35. Each piece of furniture goes exactly where God said it should.
- 23. 'He arranged the bread before the LORD' — the twelve loaves of the Presence are set out for the first time. Israel is perpetually before God in the form of bread.
- 24. The lampstand on the south side, facing the table — light falls on the bread of the Presence. The arrangement is not random but liturgically purposeful.
- 25. The lamps are lit — the tabernacle interior is illuminated for the first time. God's dwelling has light.
- 26. The golden incense altar before the veil — the last piece of interior furniture. When incense burns, its smoke drifts through the veil into the Most Holy Place.
- 27. 'Burned fragrant incense' — the first incense offering in the tabernacle. Fragrance fills the space where God will dwell.
- 28. The entrance screen completes the tabernacle structure — the boundary between the courtyard and the sanctuary interior.
- 29. The first burnt offering and grain offering are placed on the bronze altar — the sacrificial system is inaugurated. Fire and blood begin their work.
- 30. Water in the basin — the purification system is active.
- 31. Moses, Aaron, and his sons wash — the priestly team is purified and ready for service.
- 32. The washing becomes the established practice: entering the tent or approaching the altar requires purification. The system is operational.
- 33. 'So Moses finished the work' (vayekhal Mosheh et-hammelakhah) — the verb kalah ('finished, completed') echoes Genesis 2:1-2: 'God finished... the work He had been doing.' Moses's completion of the tabernacle parallels God's completion of creation. The tabernacle is a new creation — an ordered, sacred space where heaven and earth intersect.
- 34. 'The cloud covered the tent of meeting, and the glory of the LORD filled the tabernacle' (vaykhas he'anan et-ohel mo'ed ukhvod YHWH male et-hammishkan) — the climax of the entire book of Exodus. Everything — the plagues, the Passover, the sea crossing, the manna, the Sinai theophany, the golden calf, the intercession, the renewal, the construction — has led to this single moment: God moves in. The cloud (anan) that guided Israel through the wilderness (13:21) now settles on the tabernacle. The kavod that appeared at Sinai (24:16-17) now fills the interior. The Shekhinah — God's dwelling presence — has arrived.
- 35. 'Moses was not able to enter' (velo-yakhol Mosheh lavo el-ohel mo'ed) — the man who spoke with God face to face (33:11), who entered the thick darkness on Sinai (20:21), who saw God's back (33:23), cannot enter the tabernacle because the kavod is too dense, too heavy, too present. The glory that settled on Sinai has intensified in the enclosed space. The tabernacle is so full of God that there is no room for Moses. Solomon will experience the same phenomenon at the temple dedication (1 Kings 8:10-11).
- 36. The cloud governs Israel's movement: when it lifts, they travel; when it stays, they stay. The Shekhinah is not merely a resident but a guide. God's presence is both location (where He dwells) and direction (where He leads).
- 37. 'If the cloud was not taken up, they did not set out' — Israel waits for God's movement before moving themselves. Divine presence determines the pace. The people do not set their own schedule; they follow the cloud.
- 38. 'The cloud of the LORD was on the tabernacle by day, and fire was in it by night, in the sight of all the house of Israel throughout all their journeys' — the final verse of Exodus closes with the dual manifestation: cloud by day, fire by night. The same theophany elements from the exodus march (13:21-22) now rest permanently on the tabernacle. God's presence is visible to all Israel — not hidden, not intermittent, but constant, public, and undeniable. The book that began with Israel enslaved in Egypt ends with Israel guided by God's glory through the wilderness. The exodus is complete not when Israel leaves Egypt but when God takes up residence among them.

Leviticus

Summary: God speaks from the completed tent of meeting, giving Israel instructions for the burnt offering (olah) in three economic tiers: from the herd, from the flock, and from birds. The entire animal is consumed by fire on the altar.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening verb vayyiqra ("and He called") gives the book its Hebrew name and establishes that God initiates contact with Israel. The three-tier offering system (bull, sheep/goat, bird) ensures that no Israelite is excluded from worship by poverty. The poorest person's pigeon produces the same "pleasing aroma" (reach nichoach) as a wealthy person's bull.

Translation Friction: The word qorban ("offering") comes from q-r-b, "to draw near" -- sacrifice is about proximity to God, not payment. We rendered hiktir as "turn into smoke" rather than "burn" because the Hebrew distinguishes transformative burning (hiktir) from destructive burning (saraph). The phrase lirtsono (v3) carries a productive ambiguity -- "of his own will" or "for his acceptance" -- and we let the English "so that he may be accepted" honor both.

Connections: The glory filling the tabernacle (Exod 40:34-35) now finds voice. Noah's post-flood olah uses the same "pleasing aroma" language (Gen 8:20-21). Abraham's near-sacrifice of Isaac is the olah's narrative backdrop (Gen 22). Mary and Joseph bring the bird offering at Jesus's presentation (Luke 2:24, citing Lev 12:8).

¹The LORD called to Moses and spoke to him from the tent of meeting: ²"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When any of you brings an offering to the LORD, you shall bring your offering from the livestock — from the herd or from the flock. ³If the offering is a burnt offering from the herd, he shall present an unblemished male. He shall bring it to the entrance of the tent of meeting so that he may be accepted before the LORD. ⁴He shall lay his hand on the head of the burnt offering, and it will be accepted on his behalf to make atonement for him. ⁵He shall slaughter the bull before the LORD, and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall present the blood and dash it against the sides of the altar at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ⁶He shall skin the burnt offering and cut it into its sections. ⁷Aaron's sons, the priests, shall place fire on the altar and arrange wood on the fire. ⁸Aaron's sons, the priests, shall arrange the sections — the head and the suet — on the wood that is on the fire on the altar. ⁹The entrails and the legs he shall wash with water, and the priest shall turn all of it into smoke on the altar — a burnt offering, a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁰If the offering is a burnt offering from the flock — whether sheep or goats — he shall present an unblemished male. ¹¹He shall slaughter it on the north side of the altar before the LORD, and Aaron's sons, the priests, shall dash its blood against the sides of the altar. ¹²He shall cut it into its sections, including the head and the suet, and the priest shall arrange them on the wood that is on the fire on the altar. ¹³The entrails and the legs he shall wash with water, and the priest shall present all of it and turn it into smoke on the altar — it is a burnt offering, a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁴If the offering to the LORD is a burnt offering of birds, he shall bring his offering from the turtledoves or from the young pigeons. ¹⁵The priest shall bring it to the altar and pinch off its head, turning it into smoke on the altar. Its blood shall be drained against the side of the altar. ¹⁶He shall remove the crop with its contents and discard it beside the altar on the east side, at the place of the ashes. ¹⁷He shall tear it open by its wings without severing them completely, and the priest shall turn it into smoke on the altar, on the wood that is on the fire. It is a burnt offering, a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The book opens with vayyiqra ('and He called') — from which Leviticus gets its Hebrew name. The verb suggests intimate summons, not simply speaking. God calls before He speaks, as one calls a friend before beginning a conversation. The location matters: God now speaks from inside the tent of meeting (ohel mo'ed), the tabernacle completed at the end of Exodus. The glory that filled the tabernacle in Exodus 40:34-35 now finds voice. Leviticus is God speaking from within the space He has chosen to inhabit.
2. The word qorban ('offering') comes from the root q-r-b meaning 'to draw near, to approach.' An offering is not primarily something given up but something that brings the worshipper near to God. This etymology governs the entire sacrificial system: sacrifice is about proximity, not payment. The generic adam ('person') indicates that any Israelite may bring an offering — sacrifice is not restricted to priests. Three tiers of livestock follow (cattle, sheep/goats, birds in v14), creating an economic gradient that ensures no one is excluded from worship by poverty.
3. Three requirements: olah ('burnt offering' — the type), zakhar ('male' — the sex), and tamim ('unblemished, whole, complete' — the condition). The phrase lirtsono is debated: it can mean 'of his own will' (voluntary) or 'for his acceptance' (purpose). Both readings are valid, and the ambiguity is productive — the offering is both freely given and given for the purpose of being accepted by God. The location — the entrance of the tent of meeting — places the worshipper at the threshold between ordinary and sacred space.
4. The hand-laying (semikhah) is the worshipper's act — not the priest's. By pressing his hand on the animal's head, the offerer establishes a connection between himself and the sacrifice. The animal does not merely represent him symbolically; through semikhah, the offering becomes his offering, identified with him. The verb kipper ('to make atonement') appears here in its first occurrence in Leviticus — the offering that covers, purges, or ransoms. The olah makes atonement not for specific sins (that is the chata't's role) but for the general state of being human before a holy God.
5. The worshipper — not the priest — performs the slaughter (shachat). The act of killing the animal is the offerer's responsibility, making the cost of the offering personal and visceral. The priests take over at the blood: they collect it and dash it (zarqu, from zaraq — a forceful throwing or splashing, not a gentle sprinkling) against the altar on all sides. Blood manipulation is exclusively priestly work because blood carries life (Lev 17:11) and belongs to God.
6. The Hebrew shifts back to the worshipper as subject — he skins (hifshit) and sections (nittach) the animal. The word netachim ('sections, pieces') implies an ordered butchering, not random hacking. Each part will be arranged deliberately on the altar (v8-9). The skinning is the one exception to the olah's total consumption: Leviticus 7:8 specifies that the hide goes to the officiating priest. Everything else ascends.
7. The priests prepare the altar fire and arrange the wood (arakh, 'to set in order, arrange'). The same verb arakh is used for setting out the showbread (Exod 40:23) and ordering a legal case (Job 13:18) — it implies deliberate, purposeful arrangement. Even the firewood is placed with care. The altar fire, once kindled, must never go out (6:12-13) — it becomes a perpetual sign of God's readiness to receive offerings.
8. The peder ('suet, fat covering') is the rich fat surrounding the kidneys and organs — the choicest part of the animal. The head is listed separately, perhaps because it represents the animal as a whole or because its placement requires distinct attention. The layered description — sections on wood, wood on fire, fire on altar — creates a deliberate vertical image: earth to altar to fire to smoke to heaven. The offering ascends through layers toward God.
9. The washing of entrails and legs removes impurities — the internal organs and the feet that touched the ground are cleansed before being offered. The verb hiqtir ('to turn into smoke, to make smoke rise') is the technical term for burning an offering — distinct from saraph ('to burn up, to destroy'). Sacrificial burning is transformative, not destructive: it converts the physical offering into ascending smoke. The phrase reach nichoach ('pleasing aroma') does not mean God literally smells the smoke — it is anthropomorphic language for divine acceptance. The same phrase appears after Noah's offering (Gen 8:21), linking the Levitical system back to the earliest post-flood worship.
10. The second tier of the olah: flock animals (tson) instead of cattle (baqar). Sheep and goats are less costly than cattle, making the burnt offering accessible to those who cannot afford a bull. The same requirements apply — male, tamim (unblemished) — ensuring that economic difference does not mean a lesser offering in quality. The God who receives a sheep receives it with the same acceptance as a bull.
11. A new detail: the flock animal must be slaughtered on the north side of the altar (tsafonah). The north side is away from the entrance (which faces east), placing the slaughter out of general view. Later tradition associated the north side with the more solemn offerings. The verb zaraq ('dash, splash') again indicates forceful application of blood against the altar — a visible, physical coating of life-substance on the sacred structure.

12. The procedure repeats almost verbatim from v6-8, with one difference: the priest (not just the worshipper) arranges the pieces. The repetition is not redundancy — it demonstrates that the flock offering follows the same protocol as the herd offering. The sacrificial system is structured and consistent; the procedure does not vary with the economic value of the animal.
13. The closing formula repeats: olah hu ('it is a burnt offering'), issheh ('a fire offering'), reach nichoach laYHWH ('a pleasing aroma to the LORD'). The threefold identification marks the completion of the flock-animal olah. The refrain 'pleasing aroma to the LORD' appears at the end of each subsection (v9, v13, v17), creating a structural rhythm: whatever the animal, the result is the same — God receives it with acceptance.
14. The third and most affordable tier: birds. Turtledoves (torim) and young pigeons (benei yonah) are the offering of the poor — Mary and Joseph brought this offering after Jesus's birth (Luke 2:24, citing Lev 12:8). The sacrificial system's three-tier structure (cattle, flock, birds) ensures that no Israelite is excluded from worship by economic status. The poorest person in Israel can bring a burnt offering that God receives with the same 'pleasing aroma' as a bull.
15. For the bird offering, the priest performs the entire procedure — the worshipper does not slaughter the bird themselves (unlike the herd and flock animals). The verb malaq ('to pinch off, to nip') describes removing the head with a fingernail or thumbnail — a technique specific to bird sacrifice. The blood of the bird is 'drained' (nimtsah, from matsah, 'to squeeze out, to drain') against the altar wall rather than dashed, because the small volume of blood requires a different application method.
16. The crop (mur'ah) — the bird's gullet or craw — is removed along with its contents (natsah, which may mean 'feathers' or 'filth/contents'). Unlike the washed entrails of the larger animals (v9, v13), the bird's crop is discarded rather than offered, because it contains undigested food — material that did not originate with the worshipper's provision. The ash pile (maqom haddeshen) on the east side of the altar is the designated disposal area for sacrificial residue.
17. The bird is torn open (shissa, 'to split, rend') by its wings but not divided — it remains one piece, spread open on the fire. The wholeness of the offering is preserved even in its opening. The chapter closes with the same refrain that concluded each section: olah hu, issheh, reach nichoach laYHWH. Three animals, three economic tiers, one identical result — a pleasing aroma to the LORD. The first chapter of Leviticus establishes a principle that governs the entire book: access to God is not determined by wealth. The poorest offering and the richest produce the same acceptance.

Summary: God gives instructions for the grain offering (minchah) in four forms: raw flour, oven-baked, griddle-cooked, and deep-pan prepared. A portion is burned as a memorial; the rest goes to the priests. Salt is required on every offering; leaven and honey are prohibited from the altar.

What Makes This Remarkable: The minchah is the offering of human labor -- not blood but bread. The word nephesh ("soul, person") introduces it, hinting this was the offering of the poor. Only a handful (the azkarah, "memorial portion") ascends to God; the rest feeds the priesthood, integrating worship and practical sustenance in a single act.

Translation Friction: We rendered azkarah as "memorial portion" because the root zakhar ("to remember") suggests the handful "triggers" divine attention toward the worshipper -- not that God forgets, but that the offering activates His regard. The KJV's "meat offering" is misleading since the minchah contains no meat. The phrase melach berit ("salt of the covenant") required careful handling: salt appears three times in v13, and we preserved the emphasis without smoothing it.

Connections: Jacob's gift to Esau uses the same word minchah (Gen 32:14), showing its range as "tribute" and "gift." The salt covenant reappears in Num 18:19 and 2 Chr 13:5 as a sign of permanence. The prohibition of leaven echoes the unleavened bread of the exodus (Exod 12:15-20).

¹When a person presents a grain offering to the LORD, the offering shall be of fine flour. He shall pour oil on it and place frankincense upon it. ²He shall bring it to Aaron's sons, the priests. The priest shall scoop out a handful of fine flour and oil, together with all the frankincense, and turn this memorial portion into smoke on the altar — a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ³The remainder of the grain offering belongs to Aaron and his sons — it is most holy, from the fire offerings of the LORD. ⁴If you bring a grain offering baked in an oven, it shall be unleavened loaves of fine flour mixed with oil, or unleavened wafers spread with oil. ⁵If your offering is a grain offering prepared on a griddle, it shall be of fine flour mixed with oil, unleavened. ⁶Break it into pieces and pour oil on it — it is a grain offering. ⁷If your offering is a grain offering prepared in a deep pan, it shall be made with fine flour and oil. ⁸You shall bring to the LORD the grain offering prepared in any of these ways. Present it to the priest, and he shall bring it to the altar. ⁹The priest shall remove the memorial portion from the grain offering and turn it into smoke on the altar — a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁰The remainder of the grain offering belongs to Aaron and his sons — it is most holy, from the fire offerings of the LORD. ¹¹No grain offering that you present to the LORD may be made with leaven, for you must not turn any leaven or any honey into smoke as a fire offering to the LORD. ¹²You may present leaven and honey as an offering of firstfruits to the LORD, but they must not go up on the altar as a pleasing aroma. ¹³You shall season every one of your grain offerings with salt. You must not leave the salt of the covenant of your God out of your grain offering. With all your offerings you shall present salt. ¹⁴If you present a grain offering of early produce to the LORD, you shall offer fresh ears roasted by fire — crushed kernels from new grain — as the grain offering of your firstfruits. ¹⁵Place oil on it and lay frankincense upon it — it is a grain offering. ¹⁶The priest shall turn the memorial portion into smoke — some of the crushed grain and some of the oil, together with all the frankincense — a fire offering to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew nephesh ('a person, a soul') introduces the grain offering with a warmer term than the adam of 1:2 — some scholars suggest this hints that the minchah was the poor person's offering, since those who could not afford animals could bring flour. The KJV's 'meat offering' is misleading — minchah contains no meat. It is exclusively grain-based. Three elements compose the basic minchah: solet (fine flour — flour that has been ground and sifted to purity), oil (shemen — olive oil), and frankincense (levonah — an expensive aromatic resin). The combination creates something beautiful from simple agricultural products.
2. Unlike the olah, only a portion of the minchah is burned — the azkarah ('memorial portion'). The priest takes a full handful (melo qumtso — a precise, measured scoop) of flour and oil, plus all the frankincense, and burns it on the altar. The word azkarah (from zakhar, 'to remember') suggests that the handful 'represents' the whole offering before God — it triggers divine remembrance. The bulk of the grain goes to the priests (v3). The minchah thus serves two functions: worship of God (through the memorial portion) and provision for the priesthood (through the remainder).
3. The remainder (notereth) goes to the priests as their food — this is how the priesthood is sustained. The designation qodesh qodashim ('most holy,' literally 'holy of holies') means the remaining grain must be eaten within the sacred precinct by priests only (see 6:16-18). The minchah thus serves a double function: the memorial portion goes up to God; the remainder goes to feed the priests. Worship and practical sustenance are integrated, not separated.
4. The first of three baked variants of the minchah: oven-baked (ma'afeh tannur). Two forms are specified — thick loaves (challot) mixed with oil throughout, or thin wafers (reqiqei) brushed with oil on the surface. Both must be unleavened (matzot) — the prohibition against leaven in offerings (v11) applies here. The oven represents the most common form of ancient Israelite bread-making.
5. The second variant: the griddle (machavat) — a flat cooking surface. The Hebrew specifies solet belulah vashemen matzah ('fine flour mixed with oil, unleavened'). The three cooking methods (oven v4, griddle v5, pan v7) accommodate different kitchen equipment — again, no one is excluded from offering by the limitations of their household.
6. The griddle-baked grain offering is broken (patot, 'to crumble, to break into pieces') before oil is poured over it. The breaking makes the offering easier to burn and distributes the oil evenly. The short declarative — minchah hi ('it is a grain offering') — confirms that the prepared bread, once broken and oiled, has the same status as the raw flour offering of v1.
7. The third variant: the marcheshet — a deep pan or pot, distinct from the flat griddle. The word marcheshet may be related to rachash ('to simmer, to bubble'), suggesting that this method involved cooking in oil rather than dry baking. The three methods — oven, griddle, deep pan — cover the full range of ancient Israelite cooking technology.
8. The general instruction covers all variants: bring the prepared minchah to the LORD, give it to the priest, and the priest presents it at the altar. The worshipper prepares; the priest mediates. Two verbs for presentation appear: hiqrivah ('present, bring near' — from the same q-r-b root as qorban) and higgishaah ('bring close, approach' — the priest's act of placing the offering at the altar itself).
9. The azkarah procedure from v2 is restated to cover all the baked variants: the priest removes the memorial portion and burns it. The same formula closes the section: issheh reach nichoach laYHWH. Whether raw flour or baked bread, whether oven, griddle, or deep pan — the outcome is identical. The form of preparation does not affect God's acceptance.
10. Identical to v3 — the priests' portion from the baked variants follows the same rule as from the raw-flour offering. The repetition ensures that no confusion arises from the different preparation methods: regardless of how the grain was prepared before offering, the same priestly allocation applies.
11. Two prohibitions: no leaven (se'or — yeast or sourdough starter) and no honey (devash — probably date syrup or fruit honey, not bee honey). Both substances cause fermentation or transformation — they change the nature of what they touch. The prohibition may reflect the principle that what is offered to God should be in its essential, unaltered state. Leaven and honey are not evil (they appear in non-sacrificial contexts), but they are excluded from the altar because they represent human-induced change applied to what should remain pure.

12. The exception clause: leaven and honey may be brought to the LORD as firstfruits (reshit) — an offering of the initial harvest — but they must not be placed on the altar or burned. They are given but not consumed by fire. This distinction between 'offered to the LORD' and 'burned on the altar' reveals that the altar is not the only mode of giving to God — some gifts go to the priestly household without passing through fire.
13. Salt appears three times in a single verse — the emphasis is extraordinary. The phrase melach berit Elohekha ('salt of the covenant of your God') is unique: salt represents permanence, preservation, and the enduring nature of covenant. Salt does not decay, does not change, and it prevents what it touches from spoiling. A 'covenant of salt' (see also Num 18:19, 2 Chr 13:5) is an unbreakable, perpetual agreement. Every offering must carry this sign of permanence — every act of worship is a reaffirmation of the eternal covenant.
14. The firstfruits minchah (bikkurim) uses the earliest grain of the harvest, not stored flour. Aviv ('fresh, young grain') describes ears still green on the stalk, roasted immediately (qalui ba'esh) and then crushed (geresh karmel — 'groats of fresh grain'). This offering celebrates the first appearance of the new crop — the moment when the agricultural year begins to deliver its promise. Presenting the first grain to God before eating any yourself declares that the harvest belongs to Him before it belongs to you.
15. The same elements as the basic minchah in v1 — oil and frankincense — are added to the firstfruits grain. The chapter comes full circle: whether raw flour, baked bread, or roasted firstfruits, the minchah always carries oil and frankincense. These three elements — grain, oil, incense — form the constant signature of the grain offering across all its variants.
16. The chapter closes with the azkarah procedure applied to the firstfruits variant. As with every minchah form, only a portion of the grain and oil is burned, but all the frankincense ascends. The incense always goes entirely to God. The chapter has covered four forms of grain offering — raw flour (v1-3), oven-baked (v4), griddle (v5-6), deep pan (v7), and firstfruits (v14-16) — establishing the minchah as the most accessible and varied of the five offerings. Any Israelite who has grain, oil, and a handful of frankincense can worship.

Summary: God gives instructions for the peace offering (shelamim) from three animal types: herd, sheep, and goat. The fat and internal organs go to God on the altar; the rest is shared between priest and worshipper. The chapter closes with a permanent prohibition against eating fat or blood.

What Makes This Remarkable: The shelamim is the only offering the worshipper eats. It is a shared meal -- God receives the fat (burned on the altar), the priest receives the breast and thigh, and the offerer's household eats the rest. From the root shalom ("peace, wholeness"), this offering celebrates restored relationship. The altar is called God's "table" and the fat His "food" (lechem, v11) -- anthropomorphic language framing sacrifice as a communal feast.

Translation Friction: The term zevach shelamim required both words: zevach specifically means "slaughter-sacrifice followed by a meal," reinforcing that eating is integral, not incidental. We kept the Hebrew plural shelamim, which may intensify the meaning toward "thoroughgoing peace." The alyah temimah ("entire fat tail," v9) refers to the enormous tail of Near Eastern fat-tailed sheep -- a genuine economic sacrifice we clarified in the notes.

Connections: The prohibition of fat and blood (v17) echoes Gen 9:4 (blood prohibition after the flood) and anticipates Lev 17:11 ("the life of the flesh is in the blood"). The shelamim fat is burned "on top of the burnt offering" (v5), suggesting that fellowship with God rests on the prior foundation of total devotion.

¹If the offering is a sacrifice of peace offerings — if one presents it from the herd, whether male or female — it must be presented unblemished before the LORD. ²He shall lay his hand on the head of the offering and slaughter it at the entrance of the tent of meeting. Aaron's sons, the priests, shall dash the blood against the sides of the altar. ³From the sacrifice of peace offerings he shall present as a fire offering to the LORD the fat that covers the entrails — all the fat surrounding the entrails, ⁴the two kidneys and the fat on them near the loins, and the lobe of the liver, which he shall remove along with the kidneys. ⁵Aaron's sons shall turn it into smoke on the altar, on top of the burnt offering that is on the wood over the fire — a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ⁶If the offering for a sacrifice of peace offerings to the LORD is from the flock — male or female — it must be presented unblemished. ⁷If he is presenting a sheep as his offering, he shall present it before the LORD. ⁸He shall lay his hand on the head of his offering and slaughter it before the tent of meeting. Aaron's sons shall dash its blood against the sides of the altar. ⁹From the sacrifice of peace offerings he shall present as a fire offering to the LORD: its fat — the entire fat tail, removed close to the backbone — and the fat covering the entrails, all the fat surrounding the entrails, ¹⁰the two kidneys and the fat on them near the loins, and the lobe of the liver — he shall remove it along with the kidneys. ¹¹The priest shall turn it into smoke on the altar — it is food, a fire offering to the LORD. ¹²If the offering is a goat, he shall present it before the LORD. ¹³He shall lay his hand on its head and slaughter it before the tent of meeting. Aaron's sons shall dash its blood against the sides of the altar. ¹⁴From it he shall present his offering, a fire offering to the LORD: the fat covering the entrails — all the fat surrounding the entrails, ¹⁵the two kidneys and the fat on them near the loins, and the lobe of the liver — he shall remove it along with the kidneys. ¹⁶The priest shall turn them into smoke on the altar — food, a fire offering, a pleasing aroma. All fat belongs to the LORD. ¹⁷This is a permanent statute for all your generations, wherever you dwell: you must not eat any fat or any blood.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Two features distinguish the shelamim immediately: first, either male or female animals are accepted (the olah requires males only); second, the worshipper eats a portion. The phrase zevach shelamim ('sacrifice of peace offerings') uses zevach — which specifically means 'slaughter-sacrifice followed by a meal' — reinforcing that eating is integral to this offering, not incidental. The plural shelamim may intensify the meaning: complete, thoroughgoing peace/wholeness.
2. The hand-laying (semikhah) and slaughter procedures are identical to the olah (1:4-5): the worshipper identifies with the animal, then kills it personally. The blood is dashed (zaraq) against the altar by the priests. The consistency of the opening ritual across different offerings — olah, minchah (via priest), and now shelamim — establishes a common liturgical framework. What differs between offerings is not how they begin but what happens after the blood: in the olah, everything is burned; in the shelamim, the fat goes to God and the meat goes to the table.
3. God's portion of the shelamim is specifically and exclusively the fat (chelev). The chelev — the rich suet surrounding the internal organs — was considered the choicest, most valuable part of the animal. Giving the best part to God while keeping the edible meat for the meal embodies a principle: God receives the finest, and from what remains, the community feasts. The fat is not eaten but burned — it belongs to God absolutely (v16-17).
4. The anatomical detail is precise: two kidneys (kelayot), their surrounding fat near the loins (kesalim), and the yoteret al-hakkaved — a lobe or appendage on the liver (possibly the caudate lobe). These internal organs and their fat covering constitute the portion reserved for God. The kidneys in Hebrew thought were associated with the seat of deep emotion and conscience (Ps 7:10, Jer 17:10); offering them to God may symbolize presenting one's innermost self.
5. The shelamim fat is burned on top of the olah — 'upon the burnt offering' (al-ha'olah). The burnt offering is the base layer; the peace offering's fat is placed above it. This layering is practical (the olah fire is already burning) and symbolic (the peace offering rests upon the foundation of total devotion). The shelamim presupposes the olah — fellowship with God rests on the prior act of complete surrender.
6. The flock section (v6-11) parallels the herd section (v1-5). Again, both male and female are accepted — the shelamim's inclusive acceptance of either sex reflects its communal, celebratory nature. The requirement of tamim ('unblemished') remains constant: the animal offered for fellowship must be whole and sound, regardless of the worshipper's economic standing.
7. The flock is subdivided: sheep (kesev, v7-11) and goats (ez, v12-16). The sheep section comes first. The Hebrew kesev ('young sheep, lamb') is the same word used for the Passover lamb in some traditions. Presenting it 'before the LORD' (lifnei YHWH) emphasizes that even though the worshipper will eventually eat most of this animal, the act is first and fundamentally directed toward God.
8. The same semikhah-slaughter-blood-dashing sequence as v2 and as the olah in 1:4-5. The ritual actions remain constant while the meaning and outcome differ. In the olah, the worshipper gives everything; in the shelamim, God, priest, and worshipper share a meal. But the opening act — hand on head, personal slaughter, blood on altar — is the same. Every offering begins with identification and blood.
9. A new element appears for the sheep: the alyah temimah ('the entire fat tail'). Fat-tailed sheep (Ovis laticauda) were — and still are — common in the Near East, with tails that can weigh 10-15 pounds of pure fat. This was an enormously valuable cut of meat, and giving it entirely to God was a genuine sacrifice. The instruction to remove it le'ummat he'atseh ('close to the backbone') specifies a clean, complete removal — nothing of the fat tail is held back.
10. Identical to v4 — the kidney-and-liver-lobe specification is a fixed formula that repeats across all three animal types in this chapter. The repetition is not redundancy; it is ritual precision. The same parts belong to God whether the animal is a bull, a sheep, or a goat. The formula will recur throughout Leviticus whenever these organs are discussed (4:9, 7:4, 8:16, 8:25, 9:10, 9:19).
11. The striking phrase lechem issheh ('food of the fire offering,' or 'bread of the fire offering') describes the fat portions as God's 'food.' This is anthropomorphic language — God does not literally eat — but it frames the sacrifice as a shared meal in which God's portion is the choicest fat, consumed by fire rather than by mouth. The word lechem ('bread, food') applied to a fire offering suggests that the altar is God's table. The shelamim makes this metaphor most visible: God eats at the altar, the priest eats his portion, the worshipper eats the rest. Three parties, one meal.
12. The goat section (v12-16) is the third and final animal category for the shelamim. The procedure matches the herd (v1-5) and sheep (v6-11) sections, with one notable absence: the goat has no fat tail to offer (unlike the fat-tailed sheep of v9). Otherwise the ritual is identical. The goat was the most common sacrificial animal for average Israelite households — affordable, prolific, and widely available.

13. The third repetition of the hand-laying and blood-dashing sequence. The consistent ritual establishes that the mode of approach to God is fixed: identification, slaughter, blood on the altar. What changes is what follows — how the animal is distributed. The constancy of the opening acts across all offering types creates a unified liturgical vocabulary that every Israelite would recognize.
14. The fat allocation for the goat matches the herd animal (v3) — no fat tail (unlike the sheep of v9), just the internal fat covering the organs. The goat offering demonstrates that the shelamim's structure is stable across all three animal types: God receives the fat, the priest receives the breast and thigh (specified in 7:31-34), and the worshipper receives the rest.
15. The kidney-and-liver-lobe formula appears for the third time in this chapter (v4, v10, v15). The triple repetition across herd, sheep, and goat sections makes the point unmistakable: these specific organs always belong to God, regardless of the animal species. The Israelite worshipper could never misunderstand which parts were God's — the text eliminates all ambiguity through repetition.
16. The climactic declaration: kol-chelev laYHWH ('all fat belongs to the LORD'). This is not limited to the shelamim — it is a universal principle stated here and enforced in v17. Every piece of chelev in every sacrifice, in every Israelite household, belongs to God. Fat is God's portion in the same way that blood is God's possession (Lev 17:11). These two substances — the richest and the most vital — are permanently reserved for the divine.
17. The chapter closes with a universal, perpetual prohibition: chuqat olam ('statute of eternity'). Two substances are absolutely forbidden as food: chelev (suet/organ fat — the fat portions reserved for God on the altar) and dam (blood — which carries life and belongs to God, Lev 17:11). The phrase bekhoh moshvotekhem ('wherever you dwell') extends the prohibition beyond the sanctuary to all of daily life — even when not sacrificing, Israelites may never eat these substances. The twin prohibitions of fat and blood frame the entire offering system: God claims the richest and the most vital. Everything else is given back to the worshipper.

Summary: God introduces the purification offering (chata't) for unintentional sin, with procedures varying by the offender's status: anointed priest, whole congregation, tribal leader, or common person. The blood application differs for each -- deeper penetration into the sanctuary corresponds to greater responsibility.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chata't does not primarily cleanse the sinner; it purifies the sanctuary. Sin contaminates the space where God dwells, and without purification, accumulated pollution would drive God's presence out. The spatial logic is striking: the priest's sin sends blood to the veil of the holy of holies; the commoner's sin only reaches the outer altar. Authority determines contamination depth.

Translation Friction: We rendered chata't as "purification offering" rather than the traditional "sin offering" because its primary function is to decontaminate sacred space, not to punish the sinner. The Hebrew bishgagah ("unintentionally") was critical -- the chata't addresses sins committed without awareness, not defiant rebellion (which has no sacrificial remedy, Num 15:30-31). The term hakkohen hammashiach ("the anointed priest," v3) is literally "the messiah-priest."

Connections: The graduated responsibility structure anticipates Jesus's principle in Luke 12:48 ("to whom much is given, much is required"). The blood on the veil (v6) foreshadows the Yom Kippur ritual (ch 16). The four-tier system (priest, congregation, leader, commoner) mirrors the social structure of Numbers 1-2.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Speak to the Israelites and say: When a person sins unintentionally against any of the LORD's commandments — doing what must not be done — and commits one of them: ³If the anointed priest sins, bringing guilt on the people, he shall present for the sin he has committed an unblemished young bull to the LORD as a purification offering. ⁴He shall bring the bull to the entrance of the tent of meeting before the LORD, lay his hand on the bull's head, and slaughter the bull before the LORD. ⁵The anointed priest shall take some of the bull's blood and bring it into the tent of meeting. ⁶The priest shall dip his finger in the blood and sprinkle some of the blood seven times before the LORD, in front of the veil of the sanctuary. ⁷The priest shall put some of the blood on the horns of the incense altar before the LORD, which is inside the tent of meeting. All the remaining blood of the bull he shall pour out at the base of the burnt offering altar at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ⁸He shall remove all the fat from the bull of the purification offering — the fat covering the entrails and all the fat surrounding the entrails, ⁹the two kidneys and the fat on them near the loins, and the lobe of the liver — he shall remove it along with the kidneys, ¹⁰just as the fat is removed from the bull of the peace offering. The priest shall turn them into smoke on the burnt offering altar. ¹¹But the hide of the bull, all its flesh, its head, its legs, its entrails, and its dung — ¹²th the entire bull he shall carry outside the camp to a ritually clean place, to the ash dump, and burn it on a wood fire. It shall be burned at the ash dump. ¹³If the entire community of Israel sins unintentionally — the matter being hidden from the eyes of the assembly — and they do what is forbidden by any of the LORD's commandments, and they incur guilt, ¹⁴when the sin they have committed becomes known, the assembly shall present a young bull as a purification offering and bring it before the tent of meeting. ¹⁵The elders of the community shall lay their hands on the bull's head before the LORD, and the bull shall be slaughtered before the LORD. ¹⁶The anointed priest shall bring some of the bull's blood into the tent of meeting. ¹⁷The priest shall dip his finger in the blood and sprinkle it seven times before the LORD, in front of the veil. ¹⁸He shall put some of the blood on the horns of the altar that stands before the LORD inside the tent of meeting. All the remaining blood he shall pour out at the base of the burnt offering altar at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ¹⁹He shall remove all its fat and turn it into smoke on the altar. ²⁰He shall do with the bull exactly as he did with the bull of the priestly purification offering — so shall he do with this one. The priest shall make atonement for them, and they shall be forgiven. ²¹He shall carry the bull outside the camp and burn it just as he burned the first bull. It is the purification offering of the assembly. ²²When a leader sins, doing unintentionally what is forbidden by any commandment of the LORD his God, and incurs guilt, ²³or when his sin is made known to him, he shall bring as his offering an unblemished male goat. ²⁴He shall lay his hand on the goat's head and slaughter it at the place where the burnt offering is slaughtered before the LORD. It is a purification offering. ²⁵The priest shall take some of the blood of the purification offering with his finger and put it on the horns of the burnt offering altar. The remaining blood he shall pour out at the base of the burnt offering altar. ²⁶All its fat he shall turn into smoke on the altar, like the fat of the peace offering. The priest shall make atonement for him for his sin, and he shall be forgiven. ²⁷If any individual among the common people sins unintentionally, doing what is forbidden by any of the LORD's commandments, and incurs guilt, ²⁸or when the sin committed is made known, the person shall bring as an offering an unblemished female goat for the sin committed. ²⁹The offerer shall lay a hand on the head of the purification offering and slaughter it at the place of the burnt offering. ³⁰The priest shall take some of its blood with his finger and put it on the horns of the burnt offering altar. All the remaining blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar. ³¹All its fat he shall remove, just as the fat is removed from the peace offering, and the priest shall turn it into smoke on the altar as a pleasing aroma to the LORD. The priest shall make atonement for him, and he shall be forgiven. ³²If the person brings a lamb as a purification offering, it must be an unblemished female. ³³The offerer shall lay a hand on the head of the purification offering and slaughter it as a purification offering at the place where the burnt offering is slaughtered. ³⁴The priest shall take some of the blood of the purification offering with his finger and put it on the horns of the burnt offering altar. All the remaining blood he shall pour out at the base of the altar. ³⁵All its fat he shall remove, just as the fat of the lamb is removed from the peace offering, and the priest shall turn it into smoke on the altar among the fire offerings to the LORD. The priest shall make atonement for the sin committed, and the person shall be forgiven.

1. The fourth offering is introduced with the standard divine speech formula. Unlike the olah and shelamim, which are voluntary ('when a person brings'), the chata't is triggered by a specific situation: unintentional sin (v2). The shift from voluntary worship to required response marks a change in the sacrificial system's tone — the next two offerings (chata't and ashram) address failure rather than devotion.
2. The key phrase is bishgagah ('unintentionally, inadvertently, by mistake'). The chata't addresses sins committed without awareness or intent — violations of God's commands that the person did not realize they were committing. Deliberate, defiant sin (bemad yamim, Num 15:30-31) has no sacrificial remedy. The verb chata ('to sin') originally means 'to miss the mark' — the person aimed at obedience but missed. The chapter will distinguish four categories of offerer (priest, congregation, leader, commoner), each with different procedures, reflecting the principle that greater authority brings greater responsibility.
3. The first category: the anointed priest (hakkohen hammashiach — literally 'the messiah-priest,' the anointed one). His sin brings ashmat ha'am ('guilt upon the people') because the priest represents the community before God. A priest's sin contaminates the entire sacrificial system. The required animal — a young bull (par ben-baqar) — is the most expensive offering in the system, reflecting the gravity of priestly failure. What follows (v4-12) is the most elaborate chata't procedure, with blood applied inside the sanctuary itself.
4. The opening ritual is identical to the olah and shelamim: bring, lay hand, slaughter. But what follows will differ dramatically — the blood of the priestly chata't goes inside the sanctuary, not just on the outer altar. The semikhah (hand-laying) here identifies the priest with his own sin offering — even the mediator between God and Israel must present his own sacrifice through the same gesture of personal identification.

5. The blood enters the tent of meeting itself — crossing the threshold that the olah blood never crosses. The outer altar receives olah and shelamim blood; the inner sanctuary receives the priestly chata't blood. The deeper the sin penetrates (a priest's sin reaches the heart of the sanctuary), the deeper the blood must go to purify it. This spatial logic — blood follows contamination to its source — governs the entire chata't system.
6. Seven sprinklings (hizzah sheva pe'amim) before the parokhet — the curtain separating the holy place from the most holy place. Seven is the number of completeness; seven applications ensure thorough purification. The finger-dipping and sprinkling technique (hizzah, distinct from zaraq/'dashing') produces a fine spray directed at the veil — the boundary of God's innermost dwelling. The priest's sin has contaminated the boundary of the holy of holies, and the blood must reach that boundary to cleanse it.
7. The blood is applied to two locations: first on the horns of the inner incense altar (the qarnot — projections at the four corners, considered the most potent points of the altar), then the remainder poured at the base of the outer burnt offering altar. The blood moves from inside to outside — purifying both the inner and outer sacred zones. The horns represent the altar's power and efficacy; placing blood on them purifies the instrument of worship itself.
8. The fat procedure follows the same pattern as the shelamim (3:3-4) — the chelev covering the internal organs is removed for burning on the altar. Even in a purification offering, the fat belongs to God. The chata't differs from the olah (which is entirely burned) and the shelamim (which is shared): the fat goes to the altar, but the meat is neither shared with the worshipper nor entirely consumed on the altar — for the priestly chata't, the meat is burned outside the camp (v12).
9. The kidney-liver-lobe formula, identical to 3:4, 3:10, 3:15. The same internal organs belong to God regardless of offering type. This consistency across olah, shelamim, and chata't establishes a fixed principle: the innermost fat is always God's portion, never consumed by priest or worshipper.
10. The explicit comparison — 'just as from the bull of the peace offering' (ka'asher yuram mishor zevach hashelamim) — links the chata't fat procedure to the shelamim. The sacrificial system is internally cross-referential: each offering borrows from and builds upon the others. The fat goes to the same altar and the same fire regardless of whether the occasion is celebration (shelamim) or purification (chata't).
11. Everything not burned on the altar — hide, flesh, head, legs, entrails, dung — is listed for disposal outside the camp (v12). Unlike the olah (where everything is burned on the altar) and the shelamim (where the worshipper eats much of it), the priestly chata't meat goes to neither altar nor table. It is too holy for the worshipper but cannot go on the altar because the blood was applied inside the sanctuary. The meat is in a liminal category — sacred but unusable — and must be destroyed outside the camp.
12. The bull is carried outside the camp (el-michutz lamachaneh) — beyond the boundaries of the community — and burned at the shefekh haddeshen ('ash dump,' where altar ashes are deposited). The location must be tahor ('ritually clean'), not because the bull is profane but because it is laden with absorbed impurity from the sanctuary purification. The author of Hebrews connects this practice to Jesus suffering 'outside the gate' (Heb 13:11-12). The burning outside the camp completes the priestly chata't procedure — the most elaborate in the entire sacrificial system.
13. The second category: the entire congregation (kol-adat Yisra'el). Collective, unintentional sin is possible when the community as a whole violates a commandment without realizing it — perhaps through a misunderstanding of the law or an oversight by the leadership. The phrase ne'elam davar me'einei haqqahal ('the matter was hidden from the assembly's eyes') emphasizes that ignorance, not defiance, triggers this procedure. The communal chata't requires the same bull as the priestly chata't (v14), reinforcing the gravity of collective failure.
14. The purification offering is triggered when the sin 'becomes known' (nod'ah) — awareness of the violation initiates the sacrificial response. The congregation collectively provides the bull (not individuals separately), and the elders represent the community in the hand-laying (v15). The same animal — a young bull, the most costly offering — is required for both priestly and communal sin, establishing equivalence between the priest's failure and the community's failure in terms of their impact on the sanctuary.
15. The elders (ziquei ha'edah) perform the semikhah on behalf of the whole congregation — they are the community's representatives in the act of identification. Multiple hands on one animal: the corporate nature of this offering is made physical. The passive 'shall be slaughtered' (shachat) leaves the agent unspecified — the slaughter may be performed by the elders, a designated individual, or a priest.
16. The same anointed priest who offered his own chata't (v3-12) now mediates the community's purification. The blood again enters the tent of meeting — communal sin, like priestly sin, penetrates to the inner sanctuary. The procedure from v16-21 closely parallels v5-12, creating a structural echo: what contaminates the sanctuary at the deepest level requires the same intensive purification.
17. Identical to v6 — seven sprinklings before the veil. The blood purification for communal sin reaches the same depth as for priestly sin. The repetition of the exact procedure reinforces the principle: the gravity of contamination is measured not by the offerer's status but by the contamination's proximity to God's presence.
18. The two-altar blood application — inner incense altar horns, then outer altar base — mirrors v7 exactly. The same dual purification addresses the same depth of contamination. The inner altar's horns and the outer altar's foundation together represent the full vertical extent of sacred space: from the innermost point of worship to the very ground of the sacrificial system.
19. The fat procedure is abbreviated here — 'all its fat' (kol-chelbo) without the detailed organ-by-organ list of v8-10. The text assumes the reader now knows which fat portions are meant: the internal organ fat, kidney fat, and liver lobe specified in the priestly chata't section and in the shelamim (ch 3). Abbreviation through familiarity is a feature of Levitical legislation.

- 20. The explicit cross-reference ('as he did with the bull of the chata't') confirms that the communal and priestly procedures are identical. The chapter's climactic phrase appears for the first time: veniselach lahem ('and they shall be forgiven'). The Hebrew n-s-l-ch ('forgive') appears only with God as subject — only God can forgive. The sacrificial system does not generate forgiveness mechanically; it provides the means through which God, who alone can forgive, chooses to do so.
- 21. The communal bull is burned outside the camp, exactly as the priestly bull (v12). The closing identification — chattat haqqahal hu ('it is the purification offering of the assembly') — names the offering formally. The first two categories (priest and congregation) share identical procedures because both contaminate the inner sanctuary. The next two categories (leader and commoner) will have simpler procedures because their sins affect only the outer altar.
- 22. The third category: the nasi ('leader, ruler, chieftain'). The word asher ('when') rather than im ('if') introduces this section — some scholars note this as an expectation that leaders will sin, not merely a hypothetical. The nasi is a tribal or civic leader, below the priest but above the common Israelite. His offering (a male goat, v23) is less costly than the priestly/communal bull but more than the commoner's female goat or lamb (v28, 32). The graduated scale reflects a principle: authority corresponds to both responsibility and required sacrifice.
- 23. Again, the sin must be 'made known' (hoda elav) before the offering is triggered — unknowing sin requires discovery before it can be addressed. The leader's animal is a male goat (se'ir izzim zakhar) — male because of his public authority, goat rather than bull because his sin affects the outer altar, not the inner sanctuary. The graduated animal scale matches the graduated blood application: inner sanctuary receives bull blood; outer altar receives goat blood.
- 24. The goat is slaughtered at the same location as the olah — the north side of the altar (1:11). This spatial overlap connects the chata't to the olah: purification and devotion share the same sacred ground. The identification chattat hu ('it is a purification offering') formally classifies the sacrifice. Unlike the priestly chata't, the leader's blood stays on the outer altar — it does not enter the tent.
- 25. The critical difference: the leader's blood goes only on the outer altar — the horns of the burnt offering altar, not the inner incense altar (contrast v7, v18). The leader's sin contaminates the outer sacred zone but does not reach the inner sanctuary. The spatial logic is consistent: the blood goes where the contamination has reached, and a leader's sin does not penetrate as deeply as a priest's or the congregation's.
- 26. The fat procedure again references the shelamim as its model ('like the fat of the peace offering'). The closing formula — kipper... veniselach lo — declares the result: atonement accomplished, forgiveness granted. The leader's sin required a less elaborate procedure than the priest's or congregation's, but the outcome is identical: full forgiveness. The graduated system ensures proportional procedure, not proportional forgiveness.
- 27. The fourth and final category: the ordinary Israelite (nephesh achat me'am ha'arets — 'one person from the people of the land'). This is the most accessible tier — two animal options will be given (female goat v28, or female lamb v32), both less costly than the leader's male goat. The phrase am ha'arets ('people of the land') simply means the common population, without the later pejorative connotation it acquired in rabbinic usage.
- 28. The commoner's first option: a female goat (se'irat izzim neqevah). Female animals are less valuable than males in the ancient economy, making this offering more affordable. The acceptance of female animals for the commoner's chata't (but not for the leader's or priest's) reflects the economic gradient built into the system: the offering scales to what the person can reasonably afford while still requiring genuine sacrifice.
- 29. Identical procedure to v24 — hand-laying and slaughter at the olah site. The commoner performs the same acts as the leader: semikhah (personal identification) and personal slaughter. Status does not change the worshipper's role in the sacrifice — every Israelite, from priest to commoner, must lay their own hand on the animal's head and take personal responsibility for the offering.
- 30. The same outer-altar-only blood application as the leader's chata't (v25). The commoner's sin, like the leader's, affects the outer altar zone but not the inner sanctuary. The consistent blood-application pattern across the leader and commoner categories — outer altar horns plus base — contrasts with the priest's and congregation's inner-sanctuary application (v6-7, v17-18). The system has a clear spatial logic: greater authority means deeper contamination, which requires deeper purification.
- 31. The shelamim fat-removal comparison appears again — the fourth time in this chapter (v10, v19 implied, v26, v31). The closing formula kipper... veniselach lo is identical to v26: the commoner receives the same complete forgiveness as the leader. The graduated procedure (bull vs. goat, inner vs. outer altar) does not produce graduated forgiveness. Everyone who brings the chata't receives the same result: full forgiveness.
- 32. The second option for the commoner: a female lamb (kevsah neqevah temimah). Two choices — goat (v28) or lamb (v32) — provide economic flexibility. The female lamb is likely the least expensive sacrificial animal available, making the chata't accessible to the poorest Israelite. The system's insistence on two options at this level reveals its pastoral concern: no one should be unable to address their sin because they cannot afford the offering.
- 33. The same procedure for the lamb as for the goat (v29): semikhah at the head, slaughter at the olah site. The repetition across both commoner options (goat v28-31, lamb v32-35) ensures clarity: regardless of which animal the commoner chooses, the ritual is identical. The choice of animal does not change the procedure, the blood application, or the outcome.
- 34. Identical to v30 — outer altar horns and base. The final iteration of the blood-application procedure in the chapter. Across all four categories, the blood goes to only two possible destinations: the inner sanctuary (priest and congregation) or the outer altar (leader and commoner). This binary distinction is the structural backbone of the chata't system.

35. The chapter's final verse delivers the same verdict as v20, v26, and v31: kipper... veniselach lo — atonement and forgiveness. Four categories, four procedures, one outcome. The repetition of this formula across all four sections is the chapter's theological thesis: regardless of status (priest, congregation, leader, commoner), regardless of animal (bull, male goat, female goat, female lamb), the chata't accomplishes the same thing — purification of the sanctuary and forgiveness for the offerer. Access to forgiveness is as universal as human sin.

Summary: Specific cases requiring the purification offering are listed: failure to testify, unintentional contact with impurity, and rash oaths. A three-tier economic system accommodates all income levels -- sheep, birds, or even flour. The chapter then introduces the guilt offering (asham) for trespass against sacred property and uncertain guilt.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains the most radical provision in the entire sacrificial system: a flour offering (v11) can serve as a purification offering, with no animal blood at all. The system's insistence on accessibility reaches its logical extreme -- no one is too poor to receive forgiveness. Whether the offering is a sheep, two birds, or a handful of flour, the verdict is identical: veniselach lo ("and he shall be forgiven").

Translation Friction: The verb hitvaddah ("confess," v5) is reflexive -- confession is something done to oneself as much as before God. We preserved the specificity: asher chata aleha ("the thing in which they sinned") requires naming the failure, not offering a general confession. The overlap between chata't and asham terminology in v6 (where ashamo appears but a chata't is prescribed) shows these categories are closely related, and we noted this without forcing a false clarity.

Connections: The rash oath case (v4) connects to Judg 11:30-35 (Jephthah's vow) and Matt 5:33-37 (Jesus on oaths). The graduated economic system (sheep/birds/flour) parallels the olah's three tiers in ch 1. The asham's requirement of restitution plus twenty percent (v16) anticipates Zacchaeus's fourfold restoration (Luke 19:8).

¹If a person sins by hearing a public adjuration and, though able to testify as a witness to what was seen or known, fails to come forward — that person bears the guilt. ²Or if a person touches anything ritually impure — whether the carcass of an impure wild animal, an impure domestic animal, or an impure swarming creature — and it escapes their awareness, they are impure and bear guilt. ³Or if a person touches human impurity — whatever form of impurity can make a person ritually unfit — and it escapes their awareness, then when they become aware of it, they bear guilt. ⁴Or if a person swears rashly — speaking carelessly with their lips, whether to do harm or to do good, whatever kind of rash oath a person might utter — and it escapes their awareness, then when they become aware of it, they bear guilt for any of these. ⁵When a person incurs guilt for any of these, they must confess the specific sin committed. ⁶The person shall bring a guilt offering to the LORD for the sin committed — a female from the flock, either a lamb or a goat — as a purification offering. The priest shall make atonement for the sin. ⁷If the person cannot afford a sheep, they shall bring as their guilt offering for the sin committed two turtledoves or two young pigeons to the LORD — one as a purification offering and one as a burnt offering. ⁸He shall bring them to the priest, who shall present the purification offering first, pinching its head at the neck without severing it completely. ⁹He shall sprinkle some of the blood of the purification offering against the side of the altar, and the remaining blood shall be drained at the base of the altar. It is a purification offering. ¹⁰The second bird he shall prepare as a burnt offering according to the standard procedure. The priest shall make atonement for the sin committed, and the person shall be forgiven. ¹¹If the person cannot afford even two turtledoves or two young pigeons, the one who sinned shall bring as an offering a tenth of an ephah of fine flour as a purification offering. No oil shall be placed on it, and no frankincense shall be placed on it, because it is a purification offering. ¹²The person shall bring it to the priest, and the priest shall scoop out a handful as the memorial portion and turn it into smoke on the altar among the fire offerings to the LORD. It is a purification offering. ¹³The priest shall make atonement for the sin committed in any of these cases, and the person shall be forgiven. The remainder shall belong to the priest, as with the grain offering. ¹⁴The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁵If a person commits a violation — sinning unintentionally against any of the LORD's holy things — the person shall bring as a guilt offering to the LORD an unblemished ram from the flock, valued in silver shekels by the sanctuary standard, as a guilt offering. ¹⁶The person must make restitution for the wrong done against the holy thing: restore its full value plus an additional fifth, and give it to the priest. The priest shall make atonement with the ram of the guilt offering, and the person shall be forgiven. ¹⁷If a person sins by doing what is forbidden by any of the LORD's commandments — even without knowing it — that person is guilty and bears the consequence. ¹⁸The person shall bring an unblemished ram from the flock, at the assessed value, to the priest as a guilt offering. The priest shall make atonement for the unintentional error committed unknowingly, and the person shall be forgiven. ¹⁹It is a guilt offering — the person has certainly incurred guilt before the LORD. ²⁰The LORD spoke to Moses: ²¹If a person sins and commits a violation against the LORD by deceiving a neighbor regarding a deposit, a pledge, a robbery, or by defrauding a neighbor, ²²or finds lost property and lies about it, or swears falsely about any matter in which a person may sin — ²³when the person has sinned and incurred guilt, they must return what was stolen, what was extorted, the deposit that was entrusted, the lost property that was found, ²⁴or anything about which a false oath was sworn. Full restitution must be made, plus an additional fifth of the value, paid to the rightful owner on the day the guilt offering is presented. ²⁵The person shall bring a guilt offering to the LORD — an unblemished ram from the flock, at the assessed value — to the priest as a guilt offering. ²⁶The priest shall make atonement for the person before the LORD, and the person shall be forgiven — for any of these things that may be done, incurring guilt thereby."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Chapter 5 opens with specific cases requiring the chata't (purification offering), bridging from the general principle of chapter 4 to particular situations. The first case: failure to testify. The qol alah ('voice of an oath/adjunction') is a public call for witnesses — anyone who has relevant information is obligated to speak. Withholding testimony when adjured is itself a sin. The phrase nasa avono ('bears his iniquity') means the guilt remains on the person until addressed through sacrifice.
2. The second case: unintentional contact with impurity. Three categories of carcass are listed — wild animals (chayyah), domestic animals (behemah), and swarming creatures (sherets) — covering the full range of dead-animal impurity. The phrase ne'elam mimmennu ('it was hidden from him') specifies that the person did not realize they had contacted impurity. The sin is not the contact itself (which may be unavoidable) but the failure to purify before approaching sacred space. Awareness triggers the obligation.
3. The third case: contact with tum'at adam ('human impurity') — bodily discharges, skin conditions, or corpse contamination (see chs 12-15 for the full catalog). The key phrase: vehu yada ve'ashem ('when he knows, he is guilty'). Knowledge transforms the situation: ignorance does not exempt from impurity, but awareness activates the obligation to seek purification. The sacrificial system handles the transition from unknowing impurity to known guilt.
4. The fourth case: the rash oath (levatei bisefatayim — 'to blurt out with the lips'). The verb bata implies hasty, unconsidered speech. The oath may be to do harm or good — the content is less important than the carelessness. A person who makes a vow without thinking and then fails to keep it has committed a sin of speech that requires purification. This case addresses the gap between words and follow-through: promises made to God (or in God's name) cannot be treated lightly.
5. Confession (hitvaddah — from yadah, 'to acknowledge, to throw, to confess') is required before the sacrifice can proceed. This is the only place in the chata't legislation where verbal confession is explicitly mandated. The confession is specific: asher chata aleha ('the thing in which they sinned'). The worshipper must name the failure. Sacrifice without confession is incomplete — the internal acknowledgment must accompany the external ritual. The reflexive form hitvaddah implies that confession is something one does to oneself as much as before God.
6. The term ashamo ('his guilt/guilt-payment') appears here but the actual offering prescribed is a chata't (purification offering), not an asham (guilt offering) — a terminological overlap that shows the two categories are closely related. The animals (female lamb or goat) match the commoner's chata't of 4:28-35. The confession of v5 followed by the sacrifice of v6 establishes the pattern: acknowledge, then offer. The priest mediates the atonement (kipper).
7. The first economic reduction: if a sheep is beyond the person's means (lo taggia yado dei seh — 'their hand does not reach the cost of a sheep'), two birds substitute. One bird serves as the chata't (purification) and the other as an olah (burnt offering). The combination — purification plus devotion — mirrors the full offering sequence but at a fraction of the cost. The system continues to accommodate poverty without reducing the theological completeness of the sacrifice.
8. The purification offering comes first — cleansing before devotion, the same order as in 4:14-16. The priest performs the malaq ('pinching off') at the nape of the neck, leaving the head attached. The technique matches 1:15 for the bird olah. The 'not severing completely' (lo yavdil) keeps the bird whole for the blood-draining procedure that follows.
9. The bird's blood is sprinkled (hizzah) against the altar wall and the remainder drained (yimmatseh) at the base — the same procedure as 1:15 for the bird olah. The outer altar receives the blood, consistent with the commoner's chata't (4:30, 34). The closing identification chattat hu ('it is a purification offering') classifies the sacrifice formally.

10. The second bird becomes the olah ('burnt offering, according to the procedure' — referring to the bird olah of 1:14-17). The two birds together accomplish what the single sheep of v6 accomplishes: purification and devotion. The closing formula — kipper... veniselach lo — delivers the same verdict as 4:20, 26, 31, 35: full forgiveness. The bird offering produces the same result as the sheep offering; economic status does not affect the quality of forgiveness.
11. The second economic reduction — and the most remarkable provision in the entire sacrificial system: a flour offering can serve as a chata't. No animal blood at all. A tenth of an ephah (roughly two quarts of flour) is the absolute minimum. The prohibitions against oil and frankincense distinguish this from the regular minchah (grain offering, ch 2) — there is no celebration here, no fragrant enhancement. This is bare-minimum atonement for the poorest person imaginable. The system's insistence on accessibility reaches its logical extreme: no one is too poor to receive forgiveness.
12. The azkarah procedure from the minchah (2:2, 9) is applied to the flour chata't — a handful is burned as the memorial portion. The flour offering follows the minchah's mechanics but serves the chata't's purpose: purification. This hybrid offering demonstrates that the categories, while distinct, share a common sacrificial grammar. The classification chattat hi ('it is a purification offering') confirms that despite using grain instead of blood, the offering accomplishes the chata't's function.
13. The kipper... veniselach formula again — identical outcome whether the offering was a sheep (v6), birds (v10), or flour (v13). Three economic tiers, one result: forgiveness. The remainder goes to the priest kamminchah ('as with the grain offering,' per 2:3, 10). This closing verse is the theological climax of the graduated system: God's forgiveness is not correlated with the value of the offering. The person who brings flour receives exactly the same forgiveness as the person who brings a sheep.
14. A new divine speech formula introduces the asham — the guilt offering (v14-19). While the preceding section dealt with the chata't applied to specific cases, the asham addresses trespass against sacred property (v15-16) and uncertain guilt (v17-19). The asham is the fifth and final offering type, completing the sacrificial system that began in chapter 1.
15. The verb ma'al ('to act unfaithfully, to violate, to trespass') is a covenant-betrayal term — it describes breach of trust against sacred things. The miqdeshei YHWH ('holy things of the LORD') include tithes, firstfruits, dedicated offerings, and anything consecrated to God. Misappropriating sacred property — eating what belongs to the priests, withholding tithes, using dedicated items for personal use — triggers the asham. The animal is specified: an unblemished ram (ayil), valued by the sanctuary weight standard (sheqel haqqodesh). The monetary valuation is distinctive — the asham alone among the five offerings involves a financial assessment.
16. The asham requires two components: the ram sacrifice and financial restitution. The offender must repay the full value of what was misappropriated plus a twenty-percent surcharge (chamishito — 'its fifth'). The restitution goes to the priest as the guardian of sacred property. Only after both the payment and the sacrifice are complete does the kipper... veniselach formula apply. The asham insists that forgiveness includes making things right — repentance without restitution is incomplete.
17. The 'doubtful guilt' asham: the person may have sinned but is not certain. The phrase velo yada ('did not know') combined with ve'ashem ('and is guilty') creates a category of suspected but unconfirmed violation. Guilt exists even when the sinner is unaware — the objective reality of the transgression matters, not just the subjective awareness. This provision addresses the anxiety of uncertainty: what if I violated a commandment without realizing it? The asham provides a remedy.
18. The same ram and valuation as v15, but without the restitution-plus-twenty-percent requirement (since in this case, no specific sacred property was misappropriated). The priest atones for the shiggato asher shagag — 'the inadvertence by which he erred.' The doubling of the root sh-g-g emphasizes the unintentional nature. The formula veniselach lo assures the worshipper: even uncertainty about one's guilt can be resolved through the proper offering.
19. The emphatic doubling ashom asham ('certainly guilty, truly guilty') — the infinitive absolute intensifying the finite verb — insists that the guilt is real even when the sinner was unaware. The Hebrew uses the root a-sh-m three times in this brief verse (asham hu, ashom asham), hammering the point: guilt before God is an objective reality, not merely a subjective feeling. The system addresses this reality with a concrete remedy rather than leaving the person in anxious uncertainty.
20. A new speech formula introduces the final section of the asham legislation: cases of fraud and dishonesty between people (v20-26, which KJV numbers as 6:1-7). This section is significant because it extends the asham from sacred-property trespass (v15-16) to interpersonal wrongs — deception, theft, robbery, and fraud. Sins against a neighbor are simultaneously sins against God (v21: 'committed a violation against the LORD').
21. The critical theological move: ma'alah ma'al baYHWH ('committed a violation against the LORD') is applied to crimes against a neighbor — deception about deposits (piqqadon), pledges (tesumet yad), robbery (gazel), and fraud (ashaq). To cheat your neighbor is to violate God. The interpersonal and the divine are inseparable in the covenant framework. Four categories of dishonesty are listed, covering the full range of property-related deception in ancient Israelite society.
22. A fifth category is added: finding lost property (avedah) and lying about it — keeping what belongs to another while denying possession. The compounding offense is swearing falsely (nishba al-shaqr) — invoking God's name to support the lie. This layers sin upon sin: theft, deception, and false oath. The verse concludes with a comprehensive clause: 'any matter in which a person may sin' — the list is illustrative, not exhaustive.
23. Restitution is mandatory and specific: each item must be returned to its rightful owner. The list restates the categories of v21-22 in reverse order, creating a chiasmic structure that frames the offense and its remedy. The asham refuses to treat sin abstractly — the stolen goods, the extorted funds, the held deposit, the found property must all go back. Forgiveness without restitution is not available in this system.

- 24. The same twenty-percent surcharge (chamishitav — 'its fifth') from v16 applies to interpersonal wrongs. Restitution is not merely returning what was taken — it requires compensation for the wrong itself. The payment must be made beyom ashmato ('on the day of his guilt offering') — simultaneously with the sacrifice. The financial and the spiritual are bound together; one cannot offer a ram to God while still holding stolen property. The asham demands material integrity alongside ritual compliance.
- 25. The same ram specification as v15 and v18 — the asham animal is always a ram (ayil), always unblemished, always assessed by the sanctuary standard. The consistency across all three asham cases (sacred trespass v15, doubtful guilt v17, interpersonal fraud v21) means the same offering addresses offenses against God's holy things and offenses against one's neighbor. The sacrifice does not change; what changes is the addition of restitution for the identifiable wrong.
- 26. The final verse of the asham legislation delivers the now-familiar kipper... veniselach formula: atonement and forgiveness. The comprehensive clause — 'for any of these things' (al-achat mikkol asher-ya'aseh le'ashmah bah) — covers all the cases presented: sacred trespass, doubtful guilt, robbery, fraud, false oaths, and found property. The five-offering system is now complete. Leviticus 1-5 has provided a comprehensive sacrificial apparatus covering devotion (olah), gift (minchah), fellowship (shelamim), purification (chata't), and reparation (asham). Together they answer every dimension of the question: how does a holy God dwell among an unholy people?

Summary: God shifts the audience from Israel to the priests, giving instructions for handling the burnt offering's overnight fire, the grain offering's priestly portions, the high priest's daily grain offering, and the purification offering's handling. The perpetual altar fire must never go out.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The command esh tamid ("perpetual fire," v6) is one of Leviticus's most powerful symbols -- as long as the flame burns, God is ready to receive offerings. The high priest's daily minchah (v13-16) is entirely burned, unlike the people's minchah. Even the mediator's offering goes wholly to God. The priestly garment change for ash removal (v3-4) demonstrates that there is no secular work in the tabernacle.*

Translation Friction: *We rendered torat ha'olah (v2) as "instruction for the burnt offering" rather than "law of the burnt offering" because torah here means specific procedural guidance, not legislation in the modern sense. The word moqдах ("hearth," v2) required care -- it is the specific section of the altar surface where the fire burns, not the altar itself. The phrase babboqer babboqer ("every morning, every morning," v5) doubles for emphasis, and we rendered it "every morning" while noting the intensification.*

Connections: *The perpetual fire originates when God's fire consumes the first offering in Lev 9:24. The ner tamid tradition in synagogues descends from this command. The priestly linen garments (v3) foreshadow the high priest's humble Yom Kippur dress (ch 16). The ash removal to a "clean place" outside camp (v4) parallels the disposal of the priestly chata't carcass (4:12).*

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²Command Aaron and his sons: This is the instruction for the burnt offering — the burnt offering that stays on the altar hearth all night until morning, with the altar fire kept burning on it. ³The priest shall dress in his linen tunic, with linen undergarments against his body, and remove the ashes left when the fire has consumed the burnt offering on the altar. He shall place them beside the altar. ⁴Then he shall change out of those garments, put on other clothes, and carry the ashes outside the camp to a ritually clean place. ⁵The fire on the altar must be kept burning — it must not go out. The priest shall feed it with wood every morning, arrange the burnt offering on it, and turn the fat of the peace offerings into smoke on it. ⁶A perpetual fire shall be kept burning on the altar — it must never go out. ⁷This is the instruction for the grain offering: Aaron's sons shall present it before the LORD, in front of the altar. ⁸The priest shall scoop out a handful of the fine flour of the grain offering with its oil, along with all the frankincense on the grain offering, and turn the memorial portion into smoke on the altar — a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ⁹The remainder Aaron and his sons shall eat. It must be eaten unleavened in a holy place — in the courtyard of the tent of meeting they shall eat it. ¹⁰It must not be baked with leaven. I have given it as their portion from My fire offerings. It is most holy, like the purification offering and the guilt offering. ¹¹Every male among Aaron's descendants may eat of it — a permanent statute for all your generations from the fire offerings of the LORD. Whatever touches them becomes holy. ¹²The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹³"This is the offering that Aaron and his sons shall present to the LORD on the day of his anointing: a tenth of an ephah of fine flour as a regular grain offering — half in the morning and half in the evening. ¹⁴It shall be prepared on a griddle with oil — well-mixed. Bring it in broken pieces as a grain offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁵The priest who is anointed from among his sons to succeed him shall prepare it — a permanent statute to the LORD. It shall be entirely turned to smoke. ¹⁶Every grain offering of a priest shall be entirely burned — it must not be eaten. ¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁸"Speak to Aaron and his sons: This is the instruction for the purification offering. The purification offering must be slaughtered at the same place where the burnt offering is slaughtered, before the LORD. It is most holy. ¹⁹The priest who performs the purification offering shall eat it. It must be eaten in a holy place — in the courtyard of the tent of meeting. ²⁰Whatever touches its flesh becomes holy. If any of its blood is spattered on a garment, the stained portion must be washed in a holy place. ²¹A clay vessel in which it is boiled must be broken. If it is boiled in a bronze vessel, the vessel must be scoured and rinsed with water. ²²Every male among the priests may eat of it. It is most holy. ²³But any purification offering whose blood is brought into the tent of meeting to make atonement in the holy place must not be eaten — it must be burned in fire."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This speech formula opens the second half of the offering legislation: chapters 1-5 described the procedures from the worshipper's perspective; chapters 6-7 address the priests directly. The shift in audience (from Israel to Aaron and his sons, v2) changes the focus from 'how to bring an offering' to 'how to handle an offering.' The priestly instructions add details about what happens to the offerings after the worshipper's part is complete.
2. The torat ha'olah ('instruction for the burnt offering') opens the priestly manual. The key detail: the olah remains on the altar hearth (moqdah) through the entire night until morning. The fire never goes out — ve'esh hamizbeach tuqad bo ('the fire of the altar shall be kept burning in it'). This perpetual fire becomes the defining feature of the altar and will be emphasized again in v5-6. The overnight burning ensures complete consumption: nothing remains of the olah by dawn.
3. The priest's morning duty begins with changing into specific garments — middo bad ('his linen tunic') and mikhnesei-bad ('linen undergarments'). Linen (bad) is the priestly fabric, distinguished from wool. The ash removal (herim et-haddeshen) is the first priestly act of the day: clearing yesterday's residue to prepare for today's offerings. Even this mundane task requires sacred vestments — there is no 'secular' work in the tabernacle.
4. A garment change is required between the altar-side ash placement (v3) and the removal of ashes outside the camp. The sacred linen worn for altar service must not be worn for the journey outside — the priestly garments belong to the sanctuary, not to the road. The ashes go to a maqom tahor ('clean place'), the same designated site used for burning the priestly chata't carcass (4:12). The careful handling of ashes — sacred residue from sacred offerings — demonstrates that holiness persists even in waste.
5. The emphatic prohibition: lo tikhbeh ('it must not go out'). The perpetual fire is one of the most powerful symbols in the Levitical system — as long as the flame burns, God is ready to receive offerings. An extinguished altar fire would signal a broken relationship. The daily rhythm is specified: wood every morning (babboqer babboqer — the doubling emphasizes regularity), then the olah, then the shelamim fat. The altar is never idle; it is always active, always receiving.
6. The summary statement — esh tamid ('perpetual fire') — elevates the practical instruction of v5 to a permanent principle. Tamid ('continual, perpetual') is the word used for the daily offerings (tamid), the perpetual bread (lechem hattamid), and the eternal lamp (ner tamid). The perpetual fire is the altar's heartbeat: it signifies God's uninterrupted readiness to receive Israel's worship. This verse is the origin of the ner tamid ('eternal light') tradition in synagogues.
7. The torat hamminchah ('instruction for the grain offering') begins the priestly perspective on the second offering. The shift from worshipper instructions (ch 2) to priestly instructions matters: chapter 2 told the worshipper how to prepare the minchah; this section tells the priest how to handle it. 'Before the LORD, in front of the altar' (lifnei YHWH, el-penei hamizbeach) places the presentation at the boundary between human and divine space.
8. The azkarah ('memorial portion') procedure from 2:2 restated from the priest's perspective. The priest takes bequmtso ('with his handful') — the measured scoop that represents the whole offering before God. All the frankincense goes up (not just a portion), but only a handful of the flour and oil. The remainder (v9-10) belongs to the priests. The azkarah is God's portion; the notereth is the priesthood's sustenance.
9. Two restrictions govern the priestly consumption: it must be eaten matzot ('unleavened' — no fermentation may touch what has been part of a holy offering) and it must be eaten bemaqom qadosh ('in a holy place' — specifically the courtyard of the tent of meeting). The priestly meal from the minchah is itself a sacred act: what the priests eat from God's altar is holy food consumed in holy space. Eating is not merely practical sustenance but liturgical participation.
10. God speaks in the first person — 'I have given it as their portion' (chelqam natatti otah) — making the priestly food allocation a direct divine grant, not a human arrangement. The classification qodesh qodashim ('most holy') places the minchah remainder in the same category as the chata't and asham. Three offerings share the 'most holy' designation: minchah, chata't, and asham. The shelamim is 'holy' (qodesh) but not 'most holy' — the distinction determines where the food may be eaten and by whom.

11. The priestly minchah portion is restricted to males (kol-zakhar bivenei Aharon). The closing statement is remarkable: kol asher yigga bahem yiqdash ('whatever touches them becomes holy'). Holiness is contagious — the sacred food transmits its holiness to anything it contacts. This is why the eating must occur in the courtyard: holiness spreading uncontrolled through the camp would be dangerous. The sacred precinct contains and manages holiness.
12. A new speech formula introduces the high priest's personal grain offering (v12-16) — a daily minchah distinct from the regular grain offerings brought by worshippers. This offering is mandatory, not voluntary, and it is entirely burned — the high priest receives no portion back. Even the mediator between God and Israel must offer his own sacrifice daily.
13. The high priest's daily minchah is split between morning and evening (machatstiah babboqer umachatstiah ba'arev), bracketing the day with personal offering. A tenth of an ephah (the same amount as the poorest person's chata't in 5:11) — the high priest's daily offering is no more elaborate than the poorest Israelite's sin offering. The quantity is identical; the frequency is different. The high priest offers daily what the commoner offers occasionally.
14. The preparation method: griddle-cooked (machavat) with oil, then murbeket ('well-soaked, well-mixed' — a thorough saturation with oil). The offering is broken into pieces (pittim) before presentation, matching the procedure of the regular griddle minchah (2:6). The daily priestly offering follows the same form as the worshipper's offering — the priest is not exempt from the common worship pattern.
15. Two critical details: the obligation passes from one high priest to the next (hacohen hammashiach tachtav — 'the anointed priest in his place, from among his sons'), making it perpetual. And the offering is kalil toqtar ('entirely burned') — unlike the regular minchah where the priest eats the remainder, the priestly minchah is entirely consumed. The priest cannot benefit from his own offering. What he gives to God goes entirely to God. This prevents the priestly offering from becoming a circular transaction.
16. The principle generalized: kol-minchat kohen kalil tihyeh ('every priestly grain offering shall be entirely burned'). No priest may eat from his own grain offering. The rule ensures that the priestly offering is genuine sacrifice, not a loop back to the one who gave it. The priest gives to God completely — the offering ascends as smoke without returning as food. This establishes a principle of disinterested giving that underlies the entire priestly role.
17. A third speech formula in this chapter introduces the priestly instructions for the chata't (purification offering, v17-23). This section adds critical information not found in chapter 4: where the chata't must be eaten, and what happens to the blood and the vessel in which it is cooked. The chata't's holiness is so intense that it affects whatever it contacts.
18. The chata't shares its slaughter location with the olah — the north side of the altar (1:11). This spatial equivalence links purification to devotion: they occur in the same sacred space. The classification qodesh qodashim ('most holy') means the chata't meat must be eaten by priests in the sacred precinct — not taken home, not shared with family members outside the priesthood.
19. The officiating priest — the one who performs the blood ritual (hamchattei otah) — is the one who eats the meat. This is not a general priestly entitlement but a specific allocation to the mediating priest. The courtyard of the tent of meeting is the only permissible location, reinforcing that consuming the chata't is a sacred act, not a casual meal.
20. The chata't meat transmits holiness to whatever it contacts — kol asher yigga bivsarah yiqdash ('whatever touches its flesh becomes holy'). This is not beneficial consecration but dangerous holiness: an ordinary object that becomes holy must be handled within the sacred system or destroyed. Blood stains on garments must be washed in the sacred precinct — the holiness cannot leave the courtyard, even on clothing.
21. Two vessel types, two treatments: clay absorbs the holiness permanently and must be destroyed (yishaver — 'shall be broken'); bronze can be scoured clean (muraq veshuttaf — 'scoured and rinsed') because metal is non-porous. The distinction reflects practical ancient knowledge about the properties of materials, but the theological logic is primary: holiness that has soaked into a vessel must be either removed (bronze) or the vessel must be eliminated (clay). Nothing that has absorbed the chata't's holiness may return to common use unsanctified.
22. The chata't meat is restricted to male priests, the same restriction as the minchah remainder (v11). The reiteration of qodesh qodashim confirms the chata't's most-holy status. The priestly consumption of the chata't is not merely sustenance — the priest absorbs the holiness of the offering, serving as a human vessel for sacred substance. Eating the chata't is itself a priestly act of mediation.
23. The critical exception: when the chata't blood goes inside the tent (the priestly and communal chata't of 4:3-21), the meat is not eaten but burned outside the camp. The blood cannot go both inward (into the sanctuary) and downward (into the priest's stomach) — the two destinations are mutually exclusive. This rule explains why the priestly and communal chata't carcasses are burned outside (4:12, 21): the blood's entry into the inner sanctuary makes the meat too holy for consumption. The chapter closes with the foundational principle of the chata't system: the deeper the blood penetrates the sanctuary, the more completely the offering must be destroyed.

Summary: Priestly instructions conclude with the guilt offering procedure, priestly allotments for each offering type, and detailed regulations for the peace offering's three subtypes: thanksgiving, vow, and freewill. The chapter ends with a summary of the entire five-offering system and the permanent prohibition against eating fat and blood.

What Makes This Remarkable: The todah ("thanksgiving," v12) emerges as the highest form of the peace offering -- offered from pure gratitude, not obligation or need. Rabbinic tradition taught that in the messianic age all offerings would cease except the todah. The egalitarian principle ish ke'achiv ("each man like his brother," v10) governs priestly food distribution, preventing hierarchy from determining who eats.

Translation Friction: We faced the todah's rich semantic range: from yadah ("to confess, to praise, to give thanks"), the todah is simultaneously an offering and a declaration. The word piggul ("rejected," v18) describes meat kept past its permitted time -- a term of ritual revulsion we rendered carefully to distinguish ritual unfitness from moral disgust. The closing summary (v37-38) uses the technical term torah for each offering type, confirming that "instruction" rather than "law" best captures the Hebrew sense.

Connections: The todah connects to the Psalms's theology of thanksgiving (Ps 50:14, 23; 100:1). The three-day consumption limit for peace offerings reappears in Lev 19:5-8. The permanent fat-and-blood prohibition (v22-27) restates Gen 9:4 and Lev 3:17, and Acts 15:20 carries the blood prohibition into the early church.

¹This is the instruction for the guilt offering — it is most holy. ²The guilt offering shall be slaughtered at the same place the burnt offering is slaughtered. Its blood shall be dashed against the sides of the altar. ³All its fat shall be presented: the fat tail, the fat covering the entrails, ⁴the two kidneys and the fat on them near the loins, and the lobe of the liver — he shall remove it along with the kidneys. ⁵The priest shall turn them into smoke on the altar — a fire offering to the LORD. It is a guilt offering. ⁶Every male among the priests may eat of it. It must be eaten in a holy place — it is most holy. ⁷The purification offering and the guilt offering share one instruction: the priest who performs the atonement with it shall have it. ⁸The priest who presents a person's burnt offering — the hide of that burnt offering belongs to the priest who presented it. ⁹Every grain offering baked in an oven, prepared in a deep pan, or made on a griddle belongs to the priest who presents it. ¹⁰But every grain offering — whether mixed with oil or dry — shall belong to all of Aaron's sons equally, one as much as another. ¹¹This is the instruction for the sacrifice of peace offerings that may be presented to the LORD. ¹²If it is offered as a thanksgiving, then along with the thanksgiving sacrifice one shall present unleavened loaves mixed with oil, unleavened wafers spread with oil, and loaves of fine flour well-mixed with oil. ¹³Along with loaves of leavened bread, the person shall present the offering with the thanksgiving peace offering. ¹⁴From each type of bread one piece shall be presented as a contribution to the LORD. It belongs to the priest who dashes the blood of the peace offerings. ¹⁵The meat of the thanksgiving peace offering must be eaten on the day it is offered. None of it may be left until morning. ¹⁶If the sacrifice is a vow or a freewill offering, it shall be eaten on the day it is offered, and what remains may also be eaten the next day. ¹⁷Whatever meat remains on the third day must be burned in fire. ¹⁸If any of the meat of the peace offering is eaten on the third day, it will not be accepted. It will not be credited to the one who offered it — it becomes piggul, and the person who eats it bears the guilt. ¹⁹Meat that touches anything ritually impure must not be eaten — it shall be burned in fire. As for the meat that remains pure, any ritually clean person may eat it. ²⁰But any person who eats meat from the LORD's peace offering while in a state of ritual impurity — that person shall be cut off from their people. ²¹If a person touches anything ritually impure — human impurity, an impure animal, or any impure detestable creature — and then eats meat from the LORD's peace offering, that person shall be cut off from their people. ²²The LORD spoke to Moses: ²³"Speak to the Israelites: You must not eat the fat of an ox, a sheep, or a goat. ²⁴The fat of an animal that dies naturally or is torn by predators may be used for any purpose, but you must never eat it. ²⁵Anyone who eats the fat of an animal from which fire offerings are made to the LORD — that person shall be cut off from their people. ²⁶You must not consume any blood — whether of bird or animal — wherever you dwell. ²⁷Any person who consumes any blood at all shall be cut off from their people. ²⁸The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁹"Speak to the Israelites: The one who presents a peace offering to the LORD shall bring the offering to the LORD from the peace offering sacrifice. ³⁰With their own hands they shall bring the LORD's fire offerings — the fat together with the breast. The breast shall be elevated as a wave offering before the LORD. ³¹The priest shall turn the fat into smoke on the altar, but the breast shall belong to Aaron and his sons. ³²The right thigh you shall give to the priest as a contribution from your peace offerings. ³³The son of Aaron who presents the blood and the fat of the peace offerings — the right thigh shall be his portion. ³⁴For the breast of the wave offering and the thigh of the contribution I have taken from the Israelites, from their peace offerings, and have given them to Aaron the priest and his sons as a permanent allotment from the Israelites." ³⁵This is the consecration portion of Aaron and his sons from the LORD's fire offerings, assigned on the day they were presented to serve the LORD as priests — ³⁶which the LORD commanded to be given to them by the Israelites, from the day of their anointing — a permanent statute for all their generations. ³⁷This is the instruction for the burnt offering, the grain offering, the purification offering, the guilt offering, the ordination offering, and the sacrifice of peace offerings — ³⁸which the LORD commanded Moses on Mount Sinai, on the day He commanded the Israelites to present their offerings to the LORD, in the wilderness of Sinai.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The torat ha'asham ('instruction for the guilt offering') opens the priestly manual for the fifth offering. The classification qodesh qodashim ('most holy') places the asham in the same category as the chata't and the minchah remainder — priestly food eaten only in sacred space. Chapter 7 completes the priestly instructions begun in chapter 6: asham (v1-10), then the shelamim (v11-36), then a closing summary of the entire offering system (v37-38).
2. The asham shares its slaughter site with the olah — the north side of the altar (1:11). Like the olah and chata't, the blood is dashed (zaraq) against the altar on all sides. The consistent slaughter location across three offerings (olah, chata't, asham) creates a single zone of death in the sanctuary: the north side. The shelamim (v11-36) does not specify the north side, suggesting it may be slaughtered at the entrance more generally.
3. The fat portions follow the same pattern as the shelamim (3:3-4, 9) and chata't (4:8-9): the alyah (fat tail, when applicable), the chelev covering the internal organs. The fat always belongs to God — this principle, stated definitively in 3:16 ('all fat belongs to the LORD'), governs every offering that involves animal fat.
4. The kidney-liver-lobe formula in its final appearance in the offering instructions. This fixed list — two kidneys, surrounding fat, liver lobe — has appeared identically in 3:4, 3:10, 3:15, 4:9. Its repetition across four chapters and five offering types makes it the most consistent element of the entire sacrificial system. The internal organs belong to God, always and without exception.
5. The fat goes to the altar; the identification asham hu ('it is a guilt offering') classifies the sacrifice. The asham fat procedure is identical to the shelamim and chata't — the same altar, the same fire, the same portions. What distinguishes the asham is not its altar procedure but its accompanying requirement of financial restitution (5:16, 24).
6. The same eating restrictions as the chata't (6:22) and minchah remainder (6:11): male priests only, in the sacred precinct. The three 'most holy' offerings (minchah, chata't, asham) share identical consumption rules. The shelamim (v11-36) will have broader rules — eaten in any clean place, by priestly families including women.
7. A unifying statement: kachata't ka'asham torah achat lahem ('one instruction for the chata't and the asham'). The two purification/reparation offerings follow the same priestly procedures. The officiating priest (hakkohen asher yekhapper-bo — 'the priest who atones with it') receives the meat as his portion. This personalizes the priestly allotment — the one who does the work of atonement receives the food.
8. The olah's single non-consumed element: the hide (or ha'olah). Since the olah is entirely burned on the altar, nothing else remains for the priest. The hide is the practical exception — leather is too valuable to destroy and cannot ascend as smoke. This provision creates a priestly income from the olah (hides were economically significant) while preserving the principle that the olah itself goes entirely to God.
9. The three cooking methods from chapter 2 (oven, deep pan, griddle) are listed as categories of priestly allotment. The prepared minchah — already cooked by the worshipper — goes to the officiating priest. This contrasts with v10, where the raw-flour minchah is shared among all priests.
10. The raw-flour minchah (whether oiled or dry) is divided equally among all the priests — ish ke'achiv ('each man like his brother'). The cooked minchah goes to the individual officiant (v9); the uncooked minchah is shared communally. The phrase ish ke'achiv establishes an egalitarian principle within the priesthood: for shared offerings, no priest receives more than another. Priestly hierarchy does not determine food allocation.
11. The longest section of chapter 7 (v11-36) covers the shelamim — the peace offering — in its priestly dimensions. Three subcategories are introduced: thanksgiving (todah, v12-15), vow (neder, v16), and freewill (nedavah, v16). The shelamim section is the most detailed because it is the only offering the worshipper eats — the rules governing its consumption must be precise to prevent the holy meat from becoming a source of contamination.

12. The todah ('thanksgiving offering') is the first subcategory of shelamim. It celebrates gratitude — typically offered after deliverance from danger, recovery from illness, or safe return from a journey. Three types of bread accompany it (matching the three forms of the minchah in ch 2): loaves mixed with oil, wafers brushed with oil, and soaked loaves. The todah became the most prominent of the shelamim subtypes in later Jewish theology — the rabbis taught that in the messianic age, all offerings would cease except the todah.
13. A surprising instruction: leavened bread (lechem chamets) accompanies the todah — despite the general prohibition on leaven in offerings (2:11). The leaven is not burned on the altar (per 2:12) but is part of the communal meal. Since the todah is eaten by the worshipper and guests, ordinary leavened bread — the everyday bread of the household — joins the sacred meal. The sacred and the ordinary sit at the same table in the todah.
14. One piece from each bread type (echad mikkol-qorban) is set aside as a terumah ('contribution') to the LORD — given to the officiating priest. The rest of the bread joins the meal. The priest who performed the blood-dashing (hazoreq et-dam hashelamim) receives this portion — connecting the priestly allocation directly to the priestly labor.
15. The todah has the strictest time limit: same-day consumption (beyom qorbano — 'on the day of its offering'). Nothing may remain overnight. This urgency has a practical effect: the worshipper must invite enough guests to consume the entire animal in a single day, making the todah an inherently communal celebration. You cannot offer a todah alone — gratitude demands company. The time limit also prevents the holy meat from decaying and becoming ritually dangerous.
