6. The et u-mishpat ('time and procedure') from the previous verse is now universalized: every matter has its appropriate time and method. But the ki ra'at ha-adam rabbah alav ('for the trouble of the person is great upon him') introduces a heavy qualifier — knowing the right time does not remove the weight of human suffering.
7. The double uncertainty: what (mah she-yihyeh) and when (ka-asher yihyeh). Even the wise courtier who knows 'time and procedure' cannot know the future. Human ignorance of coming events is one of Qohelet's most persistent themes.
8. The fourfold 'no one / nothing' structure (ein...ein...ein...lo) creates a wall of negation. Every avenue of escape — control, authority, military discharge, moral cunning — is closed. Death is the absolute limit of human power.
9. The phrase shalat ha-adam be-adam le-ra lo ('one person rules over another to his harm') is ambiguous: 'to his harm' could refer to the ruler or the ruled. Both readings work — the exercise of domination damages the oppressor as well as the oppressed.
10. The textual difficulties in this verse are considerable (the Hebrew is unclear in several places), but the general sense is preserved: wicked people who frequented the temple (maqom qadosh, 'holy place') received honorable burial and were praised despite their wickedness. The injustice of public reputation contradicting actual character is the hevel being observed.
11. The word pitgam ('sentence, decree, edict') is a Persian loanword (from Old Persian patigama). The psychological observation is acute: delayed punishment encourages continued evil. When consequences are not immediate, people conclude they are absent. The verb male ('is filled') suggests the heart fills up with boldness to do evil, as though moral restraint drains away in the absence of enforcement.

12. Qohelet affirms the traditional view: yihyeh tov le-yir'e ha-Elohim ('it will be good for those who fear God'). Whether this is his own conviction or a quotation of conventional wisdom that he will immediately qualify (see v. 14) is debated. The gam yodea ani ('I also know') may be concessive — 'I know this is supposed to be true.'
13. The conventional retribution formula continues: the rasha ('wicked person') will not prosper, and his days are ka-tsel ('like a shadow') — insubstantial and fleeting. The absence of fear of God (einennu yare mi-lifne Elohim) is identified as the cause. This verse represents the theological ideal that the next verse will challenge.
14. The observed reality contradicts verses 12-13. Righteous people (tsaddiqim) receive ke-ma'aseh ha-resha'im ('according to the deeds of the wicked') — they suffer as though they were evil. Wicked people (resha'im) receive ke-ma'aseh ha-tsaddiqim ('according to the deeds of the righteous') — they prosper as though they were good. The moral order is inverted. Qohelet does not resolve this contradiction; he labels it hevel.
15. The fifth enjoyment passage arrives immediately after the starkest observation of moral disorder. The logic is: since the moral order cannot be relied upon to reward the righteous, present joy should be received whenever it appears. The verb yilvenu ('will accompany him') makes joy a traveling companion through the labor of life — not a destination but a presence along the way.
16. The autobiographical report: Qohelet's investigation was so consuming that it cost him sleep (shenah be-einav einennu ro'eh, 'sleep with his eyes he does not see'). The sleeplessness echoes the rich man's insomnia in 5:11, but here it is driven by intellectual inquiry rather than financial anxiety.
17. The chapter's conclusion is a threefold declaration of human epistemic failure: the person who labors to understand (ya'amol le-vaqqesh) will not find it (lo yimtsa); and even the wise person (he-chakham) who claims to know (yomar la-da'at) cannot find it (lo yukhal limtso). The repetition of lo yimtsa ('will not find') three times in various forms makes the point unescapable. Wisdom's limit is God's work.

Summary: Chapter 9 delivers Qohelet's most sustained meditation on death as the great equalizer. The righteous and the wicked, the clean and the unclean, the one who sacrifices and the one who does not — all share the same fate. This is the ultimate evil under the sun: one destiny for everyone. From this grim foundation, Qohelet launches the most passionate enjoyment passage in the book (vv. 7-10): go, eat your bread with joy, drink your wine with a glad heart, enjoy life with the woman you love, and work with all your strength — because the grave awaits, and there is no work, planning, knowledge, or wisdom there. The chapter then turns to the theme of time and chance, arguing that the race does not always go to the swift, and closes with a parable about a poor wise man who saved a city but was forgotten.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The enjoyment passage in verses 7-10 is the emotional peak of the entire book. After eleven chapters of relentless analysis, Qohelet speaks with urgent imperative verbs: lekh ('go!'), ekhol ('eat!'), shete ('drink!'), re'eh chayyim ('see/enjoy life!'). The switch from observational third person to commanding second person is electrifying. These are not suggestions — they are orders. And the ground for the orders is not optimism but mortality: 'there is no work or planning or knowledge or wisdom in the grave, where you are going' (v. 10). The call to joy is underwritten by the certainty of death. This is not carpe diem in the shallow sense; it is the urgent voice of someone who has stared into the void and returned with one instruction: receive what is given, now, fully.*

Translation Friction: The statement 'the dead know nothing' (v. 5) and 'there is no work or planning or knowledge or wisdom in the grave' (v. 10) are among the most debated in the Hebrew Bible regarding the afterlife. Qohelet appears to deny any meaningful post-mortem existence. Whether this reflects Qohelet's personal conviction, the limits of his 'under the sun' methodology (which by definition cannot examine what lies beyond death), or a rhetorical device to motivate present engagement is vigorously debated. We render the text as written without importing later theological developments.

Connections: *The enjoyment passage closely parallels the advice of Siduri to Gilgamesh in the Old Babylonian version of the Epic of Gilgamesh: 'Let your belly be full, day and night make merry, let your garments be sparkling fresh, bathe in water, gaze upon the child who holds your hand, let a wife delight in your embrace.' Whether Qohelet knew this tradition directly or both drew from a common ancient Near Eastern topos is uncertain. The 'time and chance' section (v. 11) connects to 3:1-8 but adds the element of randomness (pega, 'chance, accident') that the earlier poem did not include. The parable of the poor wise man (vv. 13-18) connects to 4:13-16.*

¹I took all this to heart and examined it all: the righteous and the wise and their deeds are in God's hand. Whether it will be love or hatred, no one knows. Everything lies before them. ²Everything is the same for everyone: one fate for the righteous and the wicked, for the good and the clean and the unclean, for the one who sacrifices and the one who does not sacrifice. As it is for the good person, so for the sinner; for the one who swears oaths as for the one who fears to swear. ³This is the evil in everything done under the sun: there is one fate for everyone, and the hearts of human beings are full of evil, and madness fills their hearts during their lives — and after that, they go to the dead. ⁴For whoever is among the living has hope. A living dog is better than a dead lion. ⁵For the living know that they will die, but the dead know nothing. They have no further reward, for even the memory of them is forgotten. ⁶Their love, their hatred, and their passion have already perished. They have no further share, ever, in anything done under the sun. ⁷Go, eat your bread with joy and drink your wine with a glad heart, for God has already approved what you do.

⁸Let your garments always be white,
and let oil never be lacking on your head.

⁹Enjoy life with the woman you love through all the days of your vaporous life that God has given you under the sun — all your vaporous days. For this is your portion in life and in the toil at which you work under the sun. ¹⁰Whatever your hand finds to do, do it with all your strength, for there is no work, no planning, no knowledge, and no wisdom in the grave where you are going. ¹¹Again I saw under the sun that the race does not belong to the swift, nor the battle to the strong, nor bread to the wise, nor wealth to the intelligent, nor favor to the knowledgeable — for time and chance overtake them all. ¹²For a person does not know his time: like fish caught in a cruel net, like birds trapped in a snare, so human beings are trapped by a time of disaster when it falls upon them suddenly. ¹³I also observed this example of wisdom under the sun, and it struck me as significant: ¹⁴There was a small city with few people in it. A great king came against it, besieged it, and built massive siege works against it. ¹⁵But there was found in it a poor, wise man, and he saved the city by his wisdom. Yet no one remembered that poor man. ¹⁶So I said, 'Wisdom is better than strength.' Yet the wisdom of the poor is despised, and his words are not heard. ¹⁷The quiet words of the wise are heard above the shouting of a ruler among fools. ¹⁸Wisdom is better than weapons of war, but one person who misses the mark can destroy much good.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase be-yad ha-Elohim ('in the hand of God') could be comforting or unsettling — it means the righteous have no more control over their fate than anyone else. God holds them, but they cannot predict whether what comes will be ahavah ('love') or sin'ah ('hatred'). The ambiguity is the point.
2. The list of moral and religious categories covers every conceivable distinction: righteous/wicked, good/clean/unclean, sacrificing/non-sacrificing, oath-taker/oath-fearer. Every pair shares miqreh echad ('one fate'). The comprehensiveness is deliberate — no moral or ritual distinction exempts anyone from the common destiny of death.
3. Qohelet identifies the shared fate of death as the ra ('evil, trouble') in the system. Its consequence is moral: knowing that everyone ends the same way, human hearts fill with ra ('evil') and holelot ('madness'). If no moral distinction matters in the end, the incentive to behave well weakens. The grim sequence is: evil hearts, madness during life, death after.
4. The proverb is darkly humorous. The dog (kelev) was the most despised animal in ancient Israel, and the lion (aryeh) the most noble. Yet a living dog outranks a dead lion — not because life is glorious but because the living still have bittachon ('hope, confidence, something to trust in'). Even despised existence outperforms noble death.
5. The living have one piece of knowledge (she-yamutu, 'that they will die'), and this awareness — however grim — is an advantage. The dead have nothing: ein yod'im me'umah ('they know nothing at all'), ein od lahem sakhar ('there is no further reward for them'), and nishkach zikhram ('their memory is forgotten'). This triple negation is Qohelet's starkest statement about death.
6. Three human drives — ahavah ('love'), sin'ah ('hatred'), qin'ah ('passion, jealousy, zeal') — all cease at death (kevar avdah, 'have already perished'). The word cheleq ('share, portion') returns: the dead have no portion le-olam ('forever') in anything under the sun. This is the ground from which the enjoyment passage launches.
7. The imperative verbs begin: lekh ('go!'), ekhol ('eat!'), shete ('drink!'). The phrase ki kevar ratsah ha-Elohim et ma'asekha ('for God has already approved your deeds') is either an assurance of divine favor or a liberation from anxious performance — God's approval precedes rather than follows your enjoyment. The 'already' (kevar) removes the condition: do not wait for permission; it has been given.

8. White garments (begadim levanim) signify festivity and celebration — these are not workday clothes but feast-day clothes. Oil (shemen) on the head is the mark of honored guests at banquets. Qohelet is saying: live every day as though you are at a feast. Do not dress for mourning; dress for joy.
9. The phrase re'eh chayyim ('see life, enjoy life, experience life') is the command to be fully present with the person you love. The repetition of kol yeme hevlekha ('all the days of your vapor') twice in the same verse underscores the urgency: the window is brief. Cheleq ('portion') returns as the word for what life actually offers — not permanent gain, but this: love, companionship, shared toil, shared days.
10. She'ol is the Hebrew underworld — not hell in the later Christian sense, but the shadowy realm of the dead where all go regardless of moral standing. Qohelet's description of it as a place of zero activity, planning, knowledge, and wisdom is consistent with other Hebrew Bible depictions (Psalm 6:5; 88:10-12; Isaiah 38:18). The passage is not making a theological statement about the afterlife but grounding the call to present action in the reality of death.
11. Five conventional expectations are denied: speed does not guarantee winning the race, strength the battle, wisdom bread, intelligence wealth, or knowledge favor. The reason is et va-fega ('time and chance'). The word pega ('chance, accident, occurrence') introduces randomness into a wisdom tradition that typically assumes ordered outcomes. Qohelet is not saying effort is useless but that it does not guarantee results.
12. The images of the netted fish and snared bird convey helplessness and surprise. The word pit'om ('suddenly') makes the point: disaster is not gradual but instantaneous. The phrase et ra'ah ('an evil time, a time of disaster') is the time of death or catastrophe that arrives without warning.
13. The introduction to the parable. The phrase gedolah hi elai ('it was great to me, it struck me as significant') signals that what follows is not just an anecdote but a case study of deep import.
14. The parable is told with fairy-tale economy: a small city (ir qetannah), few people (anashim bah me'at), and a great king (melekh gadol) with siege works (metsodim gedolim). The disproportion between attacker and defender sets up the surprise of verse 15.
15. The poor wise man (ish miskin chakham) delivers the city through wisdom — not military force. But the outcome is tragically predictable: ve-adam lo zakhar et ha-ish ha-miskin ha-hu ('and no one remembered that poor man'). Wisdom saves, and wisdom is forgotten. The parable encapsulates the entire book's tension: wisdom is genuinely valuable (it saved the city) and genuinely unrewarded (it earned no lasting recognition).
16. The 'better than' proverb (wisdom > strength) is immediately undercut: the poor man's wisdom is bezuyah ('despised, held in contempt') and his words einam nishma'im ('are not heard, are not listened to'). Wisdom's theoretical superiority does not translate into social recognition. The poor wise man wins the battle but loses the narrative.
17. A contrast in volume: the wise speak be-nachal ('in quiet, in tranquility'), while the ruler among fools za'aqat ('shouts, cries out'). True authority speaks softly; false authority compensates with volume. Whether this is an ideal or an observed reality is left ambiguous.
18. The chapter closes with a double-edged proverb. Wisdom outperforms military hardware (kele qerav, 'weapons of battle'). But a single choteh echad ('one person who misses the mark') can ye'abbed tova harbeh ('destroy much good'). The asymmetry is the point: building wisdom takes long effort; destroying its fruits takes one fool.

Summary: Chapter 10 is a loose collection of proverbs on wisdom and folly, with particular attention to political life and the dangers of foolish leadership. Dead flies spoil fine perfume; a little folly outweighs wisdom. The fool's heart leads him astray, and his words multiply recklessly. Qohelet observes a world turned upside down — servants on horseback and princes walking on foot. He offers practical wisdom about the risks of work (the one who digs a pit may fall in, the one who breaks through a wall may be bitten by a snake), the advantage of skill, and the catastrophic danger of careless speech — especially about the king.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter reads most like conventional Proverbs-style wisdom, yet even here Qohelet's distinctive voice surfaces. The 'dead flies' proverb (v. 1) encapsulates a core theme: a small amount of folly can ruin a large investment in wisdom, just as a few dead insects ruin an entire batch of perfume. The disproportion between cause and effect is the point — the system is fragile. The political observations (vv. 5-7, 16-17, 20) reveal Qohelet's awareness of court intrigue and his concern with the disproportionate damage that foolish rulers inflict. The snake-in-the-wall proverb (v. 8) and the chapter's general tone of 'everything can go wrong' create an atmosphere of low-grade anxiety that characterizes life under conditions of uncertainty.

Translation Friction: The chapter's proverbial style makes it difficult to identify a coherent argument. Some scholars treat it as a miscellany of traditional sayings loosely organized by theme; others find a subtle progression from individual folly (vv. 1-3) to political folly (vv. 4-7) to occupational folly (vv. 8-11) to verbal folly (vv. 12-15) to national folly (vv. 16-20). The organization is looser than preceding chapters, and the connection to Qohelet's larger argument about hevel is less explicit. The chapter may represent a deliberate shift to practical advice after the existential intensity of chapters 8-9.

Connections: The 'dead flies' proverb connects to the perfume/name wordplay of 7:1. The 'fool on the road' image (v. 3) echoes Proverbs 12:23; 13:16; 14:33. The political observations parallel Proverbs 30:21-23 (the earth trembles under a servant who becomes king). The 'do not curse the king even in your thoughts' warning (v. 20) anticipates the court wisdom of Daniel and Esther.

¹Dead flies make the perfumer's oil stink and ferment.
So a little folly outweighs wisdom and honor.

²The wise person's heart inclines to the right,
but the fool's heart to the left.

³Even on the road, when a fool walks along, his sense is lacking, and he announces to everyone that he is a fool. ⁴If the anger of a ruler rises against you, do not leave your post, for calmness can defuse great offenses. ⁵There is an evil I have seen under the sun — a kind of error that comes from those in power: ⁶Fools are placed in many high positions, while the capable sit in low ones. ⁷I have seen servants on horseback, and princes walking on foot like servants.

⁸The one who digs a pit may fall into it, and the one who breaks through a wall may be bitten by a snake.

⁹The one who quarries stones may be injured by them,
and the one who splits logs may be endangered by them.

¹⁰If the iron tool is dull and its edge is not sharpened, then more force is needed. But wisdom brings success through skill. ¹¹If a snake bites before it is charmed, there is no advantage for the snake charmer.

¹²The words from a wise person's mouth are gracious,
but a fool's lips consume him.

¹³The beginning of his speech is foolishness, and the end of his talk is wicked madness. ¹⁴The fool multiplies words, though no one knows what will happen — and who can tell him what will come after? ¹⁵The toil of fools wears them out — they do not even know the way to town.

¹⁶Woe to you, O land, whose king is a youth, and whose officials feast in the morning!

¹⁷Happy are you, O land, whose king is of noble birth, and whose officials eat at the proper time — for strength and not for drunkenness!

¹⁸Through laziness the roof sags, and through idle hands the house leaks.

¹⁹A feast is prepared for laughter, wine makes life merry, and money meets every need.

²⁰Do not curse the king even in your thoughts, and do not curse the wealthy in your bedroom,
for a bird of the sky may carry your voice,
and a winged creature may report what you said.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The proverb's logic: it takes many ingredients and much skill to produce fine perfume (shemen roqeach, 'oil of the perfumer'), but a few dead flies (zevuv mavet, literally 'flies of death') ruin the entire batch. The application: sikhlut me'at ('a little folly') can destroy the accumulated capital of wisdom and honor. The disproportion between the small cause and the large effect is the warning.

2. Right (yamin) and left (semol) carry symbolic weight: right is the side of favor, strength, and skill; left is the side of weakness and misfortune. The proverb is about instinctive direction — the wise and the fool gravitate toward opposite poles without deliberation.
3. The fool's foolishness is self-advertising. The phrase libbo chaser ('his heart lacks') means his mind is deficient in every context — not just in formal settings but ba-derekh ('on the road'), in ordinary life. The verb amar ('he says') may mean he literally announces foolish things or, more likely, his behavior proclaims his foolishness to all observers.
4. Court survival advice. When the moshel ('ruler, authority') becomes angry (ruach...ta'aleh, 'his spirit rises'), the courtier should not flee (al tannach meqomekha, 'do not abandon your place'). Instead, marpe ('calmness, gentleness, healing') can yaniach ('set at rest, pacify') even chatayim gedolim ('great offenses'). Composure under pressure is more effective than panic.
5. The word shegagah ('error, inadvertent mistake') is used for unintentional sin in Leviticus 4-5 and Numbers 15. Here it describes a ruler's blunder — perhaps an appointment made carelessly. The consequences of a ruler's 'error' are public and systemic.
6. The sekhel ('fool, folly') occupies ba-meromim rabbim ('in many high places'), while the ashirim ('wealthy, capable') sit ba-shefel ('in the low place'). The inversion of the social order — incompetence elevated, competence demoted — is the 'error' identified in verse 5.
7. The image is vivid: horses signify status, and walking signifies servitude. The inversion — servants riding, princes walking — summarizes the political disorder of verses 5-6 in a single snapshot.
8. Two proverbs about the hidden dangers of work. The pit-digger risks falling in; the wall-breaker disturbs a snake nesting in the stones. Both illustrate the unpredictability of consequences — even productive labor carries hidden risks. The proverbs may also carry moral overtones: the one who sets a trap may be caught in it.
9. The occupational hazard proverbs continue: quarrying and woodcutting are both dangerous trades. The verbs ye'atsev ('may be pained, injured') and yissaken ('may be endangered') acknowledge that productive work carries inherent risk. No occupation is safe.
10. A proverb about preparation versus brute force. A dull blade (qegah ha-barzel) requires more strength (chayalim yegabber) to use. But yitron hakhsher chokmah ('the advantage of skill is wisdom') — wisdom sharpens the approach so that less force is needed. This is one of the few places where yitron ('advantage') is used positively.
11. The proverb connects to verse 8 (the snake in the wall) and applies to timing: if the nachash ('snake') bites be-lo lachash ('before the incantation, without charming'), the ba'al ha-lashon ('master of the tongue,' i.e., the snake charmer) has no advantage. Skill that comes too late is no skill at all. The proverb may also apply to speech: the person with eloquence (ba'al ha-lashon) who speaks too late gains nothing.
12. The contrast: the wise person's words are chen ('grace, favor'), while the fool's lips tevalle'ennu ('swallow him, consume him'). The fool's speech is self-destructive — his own words devour him.
13. The fool's speech deteriorates: it begins as sikhlut ('foolishness') and ends as holelut ra'ah ('wicked madness'). Folly does not stay at the same level — it escalates.
14. The fool's verbosity contrasts with his ignorance: he yarbeh devarim ('multiplies words') while knowing nothing about the future. The juxtaposition is ironic — the person who talks most knows least.
15. The image is comically sharp: the fool works himself to exhaustion (teyagge'ennu, 'wearies him') because he cannot find the way to the city — presumably the most basic navigational task. Incompetence makes even simple tasks exhausting.
16. The na'ar ('youth, boy, servant') king lacks maturity and experience. The officials who feast ba-boqer ('in the morning') are indulging when they should be governing. The woe (i lakh, 'alas for you') is addressed to the entire erets ('land, nation'), which suffers from its leaders' immaturity and self-indulgence.
17. The contrast: ashreikh ('happy are you, fortunate are you') for the land whose king is ben chorim ('a son of free-born nobles') and whose officials eat ba-et ('at the proper time') for gevurah ('strength, sustenance') and not for sheti ('drinking, drunkenness'). Discipline in leadership translates to national well-being.
18. The proverb uses architectural decay as a metaphor for national decline under lazy leadership. The meqareh ('roofing, rafters') sinks (yimmakh), and the bayit ('house') leaks (yidlof). Neglect produces slow, structural collapse.
19. A sardonic observation: lechem ('bread, a feast') is made for laughter, yayin ('wine') for joy, and kesef ('money') ya'aneh et ha-kol ('answers everything'). Whether this is Qohelet's own view or his wry description of the officials' philosophy from verses 16-19 is debated. The statement about money is ambiguous — it could be cynical or simply realistic.
20. The chapter closes with a warning about the dangerous reach of speech. Even in maddaakha ('your mind, your knowledge, your private thoughts') and chadre mishkavekha ('the rooms of your bed, your most private space'), words are not safe. The proverbial 'a little bird told me' (of ha-shamayim yolik et ha-qol, 'a bird of the heavens will carry the voice') captures the reality that in a court culture, nothing stays secret. Surveillance is everywhere.

Summary: Chapter 11 marks the book's turn from analysis to exhortation. Qohelet moves from describing the world's vapor to prescribing how to live within it. Cast your bread upon the waters. Diversify your investments. Do not wait for perfect conditions to act. You cannot predict which ventures will succeed, any more than you can understand how a child forms in the womb. The chapter builds to the seventh and final enjoyment passage (vv. 7-10): light is sweet, the living should rejoice in all their years, the young person should follow his heart and the sight of his eyes — but remember that God will bring all of it to account. Youth itself is vapor.

What Makes This Remarkable: The shift in tone from chapters 1-10 to chapter 11 is dramatic. Where the earlier chapters observed and analyzed, chapter 11 commands: shalach ('send out!'), ten ('give!'), zera ('sow!'), simchah ('rejoice!'), halokh ('walk!'). Qohelet has finished his investigation and is now issuing his final instructions. The counsel to 'cast your bread upon the waters' (v. 1) has been interpreted as commercial advice (invest in overseas trade), charitable counsel (give generously, and it will return to you), or existential strategy (release your grip on outcomes). All three readings are valid and may be simultaneously intended. The final enjoyment passage (vv. 7-10) is addressed specifically to the young — the bachur ('young man') — and carries a unique urgency: youth passes quickly, and the body's decline is coming (as chapter 12 will make devastatingly clear).

Translation Friction: Verse 9 contains a startling statement: 'follow your heart and the sight of your eyes.' This directly contradicts Numbers 15:39, which warns against following your heart and eyes. Qohelet either deliberately inverts the Torah command or operates in a different register — his 'follow your heart' is qualified by 'know that for all these things God will bring you to judgment.' The freedom is genuine, but so is the accountability. This tension between liberty and judgment is left unresolved and is, perhaps, the book's final wisdom.

Connections: The 'cast your bread upon the waters' image has parallels in Egyptian wisdom literature (the Instruction of Ankhsheshonq: 'Do a good deed and throw it in the water'). The 'you do not know which will succeed' counsel connects to 3:11 ('no one can discover what God has done') and 9:11 ('time and chance overtake them all'). The rejoicing-of-youth passage leads directly into the aging poem of 12:1-7 — the two sections form a single unit moving from vigor to decline.

¹Send your bread out upon the waters, for after many days you will find it again.

²Divide your portion among seven, or even eight,
for you do not know what disaster may strike the land.

³When the clouds are full, they pour rain on the earth.
If a tree falls to the south or to the north,
wherever the tree falls, there it will lie.

⁴The one who watches the wind will never sow,
and the one who watches the clouds will never reap.

⁵Just as you do not know the path of the wind, or how bones form in the womb of a pregnant woman, so you cannot know the work of God who makes everything. ⁶Sow your seed in the morning, and do not let your hand rest in the evening, for you do not know which will succeed — this one or that one — or whether both will turn out equally well.

⁷Light is sweet,
and it is good for the eyes to see the sun.

⁸Even if a person lives many years, let him rejoice in all of them, but let him remember the days of darkness, for they will be many. Everything that comes is vapor.

⁹Rejoice, young person, in your youth!

Let your heart bring you joy in the days of your vigor.

Follow the ways of your heart and the sight of your eyes —

but know that for all these things God will bring you to account.

¹⁰Remove vexation from your heart and banish pain from your body,

for youth and the dawn of life are vapor.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word lechem ('bread') may be literal (grain shipped by sea) or metaphorical (resources, effort, generosity). The advice fits Qohelet's worldview: since you cannot predict outcomes (9:11) or control God's timing (3:1-8), the best strategy is broad, generous release of effort across many ventures.
2. The numerical progression 'seven...even eight' is a standard Hebrew poetic device (compare Amos 1:3, 'for three transgressions...for four'). The counsel is diversification: spread your resources across many ventures because you cannot predict what ra'ah ('disaster, evil, trouble') may come. This is not pessimism but prudent risk management in an uncertain world.
3. Two observations about natural inevitability. Full clouds must rain — they have no choice. A fallen tree lies wherever it fell — it cannot be unfallen. The point: some things are beyond human control. Once certain conditions are met, outcomes follow mechanically. Do not waste time wishing clouds would not rain or fallen trees would rise.
4. A warning against paralysis by analysis. The farmer who waits for perfect wind conditions (shomer ruach) will never plant, and the one who watches for perfect weather (ro'eh be-avim) will never harvest. Since conditions are never ideal and the future is unpredictable, the only option is to act despite uncertainty. This is Qohelet's antidote to the paralysis that his own philosophy might induce.
5. Two mysteries stand for all mysteries: the derekh ha-ruach ('the path of the wind/spirit') and the formation of atsamin ('bones') be-veten ha-mele'ah ('in the full/pregnant womb'). Both are real processes that proceed invisibly and beyond human comprehension. From these Qohelet draws the analogy: ma'aseh ha-Elohim ('the work of God') is equally unknowable. The word ruach again carries its double meaning — 'wind' and 'spirit/breath' — and the ambiguity is productive: you know neither the wind's path nor the life-breath's origin.
6. The practical application of verses 1-5: since the future is unpredictable, sow at both ends of the day. The word yikshar ('will succeed, will prosper') from the root kasher ('to be right, to succeed') is the basis of the modern word 'kosher.' The ignorance about which effort will bear fruit is liberating, not paralyzing: try everything, because you cannot know in advance what will work.
7. The final enjoyment passage begins with a simple sensory affirmation: light (or) is matok ('sweet'), and seeing the sun (shemesh) is tov ('good'). After all the analysis, Qohelet returns to the most basic human experience — the pleasure of light. This is not philosophical argument but bodily testimony.
8. The counsel to rejoice is paired with the command to remember: yeme ha-choshekh ('the days of darkness') — whether this means old age, death, or the grave — will be many (harbeh). Joy and mortality awareness are not contradictory but complementary. The final clause, kol she-ba havel ('everything that comes is vapor'), applies the thesis to the future itself: what is ahead is as vaporous as what is behind.
9. The address shifts to the bachur ('young man, young person'). The imperatives are exuberant: simchah ('rejoice!'), yitivkha libbekha ('let your heart do you good!'), halekh be-darkhe libbekha ('walk in the ways of your heart!'). The phrase u-ve-mar'e einekha ('and in the sight of your eyes') appears to contradict Numbers 15:39 ('do not follow after your heart and your eyes'). Qohelet's context, however, adds the qualifier: da ki al kol elleh yevi'akha ha-Elohim ba-mishpat ('know that for all these things God will bring you into judgment'). Freedom and accountability coexist. Enjoy fully, but not recklessly.
10. Two commands: remove ka'as ('vexation, anger, grief') from the heart, and remove ra'ah ('evil, pain, trouble') from the flesh. Qohelet addresses the whole person — inner and outer. The closing declaration, ki ha-yaldut ve-ha-shacharut havel ('for youth and the dawn of life are vapor'), is bittersweet. The word shacharut ('dawn, dark hair, the time of dark/youthful hair') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. Youth is precious precisely because it is vapor — it is already passing as you experience it. This sets up the aging poem of chapter 12.

Summary: The final chapter of Ecclesiastes contains three distinct sections. First, the great aging allegory (vv. 1-7): a sustained poetic description of the body's decline, rendered through metaphors of a darkening sky, trembling guards, grinding women who cease, and a house falling into disrepair, climaxing with the golden bowl shattered and the spirit returning to the God who gave it. Second, the return of the thesis (v. 8): 'Vapor of vapors, says Qohelet — everything is vapor.' Third, the epilogue (vv. 9-14), written by an editor who commends Qohelet's work but adds the book's final word: fear God and keep his commandments, for God will bring every deed into judgment.

What Makes This Remarkable: The aging allegory in verses 1-7 is the most sustained and elaborate metaphorical poem in the Hebrew Bible's wisdom literature. Every image corresponds to an aspect of bodily decline: the 'guards of the house' are the arms, the 'strong men' are the legs, the 'grinding women' are the teeth, the 'windows' are the eyes. The poem moves from external observation (the darkening sky, the trembling house) to internal collapse (the silver cord snapped, the golden bowl shattered) and finally to cosmic dissolution (the dust returns to the earth, the spirit returns to God). The progression from 11:9's 'rejoice, young person!' to 12:1's 'remember your Creator' to 12:7's 'the dust returns to the earth' is one of the most powerful emotional arcs in ancient literature — a single, unbroken movement from joy to memory to decay to death to God. The epilogue (vv. 9-14) shifts to third person and appears to be a student or editor's addition. It frames the entire book as instruction and adds the theological anchor that Qohelet himself never quite states: fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of every person.

Translation Friction: The aging allegory's metaphors are widely agreed upon in their general referents but debated in specifics. Is the 'almond tree' (v. 5) the white-haired head, or the blossoming of spring that the old person cannot enjoy? Is the 'grasshopper' that 'drags itself along' a symbol of the old person's gait, or a reference to the loss of sexual desire (since chagav, 'grasshopper/locust,' was associated with fertility in some ancient traditions)? The epilogue's theological conservatism (v. 13, 'fear God and keep his commandments') has been read as either a faithful summary of Qohelet's deepest conviction or a corrective addendum by an orthodox editor who wanted to domesticate the book's radical skepticism. The tension between Qohelet's restless questioning and the epilogue's settled piety is real and may be deliberate — the book ends with both voices still audible.

Connections: The aging allegory's return to dust echoes Genesis 3:19 ('dust you are and to dust you will return') and 3:20. The spirit returning to God echoes Genesis 2:7 (God breathing life into the human) and reverses it. The epilogue's 'fear God and keep his commandments' echoes Deuteronomy 10:12-13 and the book's own internal counsel (5:6; 7:18; 8:12). The inclusio formed by 1:2 ('vapor of vapors') and 12:8 ('vapor of vapors') frames the entire book between identical thesis statements. The 'making of many books' observation (v. 12) is one of the oldest meta-literary comments in existence.

¹Remember your Creator in the days of your youth, before the days of trouble come and the years arrive of which you will say,
'I find no pleasure in them' —

²Before the sun and the light and the moon and the stars grow dark, and the clouds return after the rain —

³On the day when the guards of the house tremble, and the strong men stoop,
and the women who grind cease because they are few,
and those who look through the windows grow dim —

⁴When the doors to the street are shut and the sound of the grinding fades, when one rises at the sound of a bird and all the daughters of song grow faint —

⁵When they are afraid of heights and terrors lurk in the road,
and the almond tree blossoms white,
and the grasshopper drags itself along,
and the caper berry loses its power —
for a person is going to his eternal home, and the mourners circle the streets —

⁶Before the silver cord is snapped and the golden bowl is shattered, before the jar is broken at the spring and the wheel is crushed at the cistern —

⁷Then the dust returns to the earth as it was,
and the spirit returns to God who gave it.

⁸Vapor of vapors, says Qohelet. Everything is vapor. ⁹In addition to being wise, Qohelet also taught the people knowledge. He listened, investigated, and arranged many proverbs. ¹⁰Qohelet sought to find the right words, and what was written was upright — words of truth. ¹¹The words of the wise are like goads, and like firmly embedded nails are the collected sayings. They are given by one Shepherd. ¹²Beyond these, my son, be warned: there is no end to the making of many books, and much study is a weariness of the body. ¹³The end of the matter, when all has been heard: Fear God and keep his commandments, for this is the whole duty of every person. ¹⁴For God will bring every deed into judgment, including every hidden thing, whether good or evil.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Some scholars read bore'ekha ('your Creator') as a wordplay on be'erekha ('your well/cistern,' a metaphor for wife in Proverbs 5:15-18) or borekha ('your pit/grave'). The Masoretic text's vowels clearly indicate 'your Creator,' and the context — remembering God before it is too late — supports this reading. The aging allegory now begins.
2. The cosmic imagery: sun, light, moon, and stars all darken. The phrase ve-shavu he-avim achar ha-geshem ('the clouds return after the rain') describes a sky that never clears — storm after storm. Metaphorically, this is the dimming of eyesight and the unrelieved succession of ailments in old age. What was once a cycle of rain-then-clearing becomes permanent overcast.
3. The house allegory: shomre ha-bayit ('the guards of the house') are the arms and hands, which tremble with age. Anshe ha-chayil ('the strong men') are the legs, which bend and stoop (hit'avvetu, 'become twisted, bent'). Ha-tochanot ('the grinding women') are the teeth, which cease functioning ki mi'etu ('because they are few' — teeth are lost). Ha-ro'ot ba-arubot ('those who look through the windows') are the eyes, which grow dark (chashekhu). Every line maps to a body part in decline.
4. The delatayim ('double doors') that shut may be the lips or ears, increasingly closed to the outside world. The qol ha-tachanah ('sound of grinding') fading reflects the diminished ability to eat (fewer teeth, softer food). Rising at qol ha-tsippor ('the voice of a bird') suggests the light, broken sleep of the elderly — any small sound wakes them. Benot ha-shir ('the daughters of song') growing faint describes either hearing loss (music becomes distant) or voice loss (the ability to sing weakens).
5. The almond tree (shaqed) pun: shaqed also sounds like shoqed ('the watching/wakeful one'), an association used in Jeremiah 1:11-12. Here the white blossoms signify gray/white hair. The grasshopper's burdened movement is a striking image of the body that was once light and agile. The caper berry (aviyonah) is known from rabbinic literature as an appetite stimulant; its failure marks the loss of desire itself.
6. The imagery shifts from metaphorical decline (vv. 2-5) to catastrophic collapse. The silver cord and golden bowl are objects of great value suddenly destroyed. The jar and wheel are functional tools suddenly useless. Together they depict death not as a gradual fading but as a series of breakages — snap, shatter, crack, crush.

7. The word ruach here almost certainly means 'breath' or 'life-spirit' rather than 'soul' in the later philosophical sense. Qohelet has questioned whether the human ruach ascends (3:21); here, at the poem's climax, he affirms it — or at least the editor allows this affirmation to stand as the poem's resolution. The God who gave the breath receives it back. This is not escape from vapor but return to the source.
8. The inclusio is complete. The book began with hevel havalim (1:2) and ends with hevel havalim. The thesis is unchanged: ha-kol havel ('everything is vapor'). Between these two bookends, Qohelet has tested wisdom, pleasure, wealth, achievement, justice, and mortality — and found all of them subject to the same verdict. The frame editor (ha-qohelet with the definite article) speaks here, returning the book to the third-person perspective of the superscription.
9. The epilogue begins. A new voice — a student, disciple, or editor — speaks about Qohelet in third person. Three activities are attributed to him: izzen ('he weighed, he listened carefully'), chiqqer ('he investigated, he searched out'), and tiqqen ('he arranged, he set in order') meshalim harbeh ('many proverbs'). The portrait is of a scholar-teacher who did not merely think but organized and transmitted his findings.
10. The editor commends both the form and content of Qohelet's writing. Divre chefets ('words of delight, pleasing words, the right words') refers to literary quality. Yosher ('uprightness, straightforwardness') refers to intellectual honesty. Divre emet ('words of truth') is the ultimate commendation: what Qohelet wrote is true, however uncomfortable.
11. Two images for wisdom's words: dorbenot ('goads,' the sharp sticks used to drive oxen) — they prod and sting, moving the hearer forward. Masmerot netu'im ('embedded nails, firmly planted nails') — they hold things together permanently. The ba'ale asuppot ('masters of collections' or 'collectors') may refer to wisdom teachers or to the collected sayings themselves. The phrase nitenu me-ro'eh echad ('they are given from one Shepherd') attributes all wisdom ultimately to God — the one Shepherd is the divine source.
12. The editor addresses beni ('my son') — the standard wisdom teacher's address to a student (Proverbs 1:8; 2:1; 3:1). The observation that asot sefarim harbeh ein qets ('making many books has no end') is both practical and meta-textual: even this book, which claims everything is vapor, adds to the infinite pile of books. The phrase lahag harbeh yegi'at basar ('much study is weariness of the flesh') echoes 1:18 ('with much wisdom comes much grief') but in bodily terms — the flesh itself grows tired from the effort of study.
13. The word mitsvot ('commandments') is general — it does not specify which commandments, leaving the scope open to the entire divine instruction. The phrase kol ha-adam ('the whole of the human, every person') is uniquely compact. In context, it functions as both 'this is the totality of human obligation' and 'this applies to every human being.' The epilogue provides the theological anchor that Qohelet's restless inquiry needed but could not, on its own terms, produce.
14. The book's final word is mishpat ('judgment'). God will judge kol ma'aseh ('every deed') — not just public acts but kol ne'lam ('every hidden thing'). The scope is total: im tov ve-im ra ('whether good or evil'). This is the theological counterweight to the vapor verdict: if everything is vapor, does anything matter? Yes — because God judges. The hidden things (ne'lam, from the root alam, 'to conceal, to hide') are specifically included, which means that even what escapes human notice does not escape divine evaluation. The book that began by questioning whether anything has lasting significance ends by affirming that God takes account of everything. Between 'everything is vapor' and 'God will judge every deed' lies the entire tension of Ecclesiastes, which the book holds open to the end.

Song of Songs

Summary: The Song opens with its superscription attributing the work to Solomon, then immediately plunges into the woman's voice — her longing for her lover's kisses, her self-conscious awareness of her dark skin, and her search for the shepherd she desires. The chapter establishes the erotic dialogue between the two lovers and introduces the Daughters of Jerusalem as a chorus. The man responds with lavish praise of her beauty, comparing her to a mare among Pharaoh's chariots.

What Makes This Remarkable: The woman speaks first and speaks most. In a literary culture dominated by male voices, the Song of Songs gives the opening lines — and the majority of the poem — to a woman. She is not passive; she initiates, she seeks, she demands. Her first words are an imperative: 'Let him kiss me.' The self-description in verses 5-6 ('I am dark and beautiful') is a striking act of self-assertion against social judgment. She has been made to labor in vineyards under the sun, and her brothers are angry with her, yet she refuses shame. The imagery of 'my own vineyard' (verse 6) introduces the Song's central metaphor: the vineyard as the woman's body and sexuality, which she owns and gives freely.

Translation Friction: The superscription 'Song of Songs which is Solomon's' (shir ha-shirim asher li-Shelomoh) is ambiguous — the lamed prefix could mean 'by Solomon,' 'for Solomon,' 'about Solomon,' or 'in the style of Solomon.' Solomonic authorship is a literary attribution, not a historical claim most scholars would affirm. The Hebrew in verse 5 reads shechorah ani ve-navah, which can be rendered 'I am dark AND beautiful' rather than the KJV's 'black BUT comely' — the conjunction ve- does not inherently carry adversative force. The choice between 'and' and 'but' is theologically significant: one affirms her darkness as beautiful, the other implies it is a flaw to be excused.

Connections: The vineyard metaphor recurs throughout the Song (2:15, 7:13, 8:11-12) and connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 (the vineyard as beloved) and Hosea's marriage imagery. The mare-among-chariots comparison (1:9) draws on Egyptian royal imagery — Pharaoh's chariot horses were legendary. The nard, henna, and myrrh of 1:12-14 appear in the spice catalogues of Proverbs 7:17 and the trade lists of Ezekiel 27, grounding the Song's sensuality in the real luxury economy of the ancient Near East.

¹The finest song,
which is Solomon's.

²Let him kiss me with the kisses of his mouth!
For your lovemaking is better than wine.

³Your anointing oils are fragrant, your name is perfume poured out —
no wonder the young women love you!

⁴Draw me after you — let us run!
The king has brought me into his chambers.
We will rejoice and delight in you,
we will savor your lovemaking more than wine.
Rightly do they love you!

⁵I am dark and beautiful,
O Daughters of Jerusalem —
dark as the tents of Kedar, lovely as the curtains of Solomon.

⁶Do not stare at me because I am dark,
because the sun has gazed on me.
My mother's sons were angry with me —
they made me keeper of the vineyards, but my own vineyard I have not tended.

⁷Tell me, you whom my whole being loves — where do you graze your flock?
Where do you rest them at noon?
Why should I be like a veiled woman wandering among your companions' flocks?

⁸If you do not know, O most beautiful among women, go out and follow the tracks of the flock,
and graze your young goats
beside the shepherds' tents.

⁹To a mare among Pharaoh's chariot stallions
I compare you, my darling.

¹⁰Your cheeks are lovely between the pendants,
your neck with strings of beads.

¹¹We will make you ornaments of gold studded with silver.

¹²While the king reclines at his table,
my nard gives off its fragrance.

¹³A sachet of myrrh is my beloved to me —
he lodges between my breasts all night.

¹⁴A cluster of henna blossoms is my beloved to me, in the vineyards of Ein Gedi.

¹⁵How beautiful you are, my darling!
How beautiful you are!
Your eyes are doves.

¹⁶How handsome you are, my beloved!
How delightful!
Our bed is lush and green.

¹⁷The beams of our house are cedars,
our rafters are cypresses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Shir ha-shirim is a Hebrew superlative construction — 'the greatest of songs,' 'the ultimate song,' comparable to 'King of Kings' or 'Holy of Holies.' The attribution to Solomon likely reflects the tradition associating him with 1,005 songs (1 Kings 4:32) rather than a strict authorial claim.
2. The woman's voice opens the poem with a bold imperative — she does not wait to be pursued but declares her desire. The shift from third person ('let him') to second person ('your') within the same verse is characteristic of the Song's fluid, emotionally charged speech.
2. Dodim (plural of dod) means 'lovmaking, caresses, acts of love' — not abstract love but physical expressions of intimacy. The comparison to wine is sensory: his touch intoxicates more than the finest vintage.
3. The wordplay between shemen ('oil, perfume') and shem ('name') is deliberate and untranslatable — his name and his scent are fused. Identity and sensory presence merge. The alamot ('young women, maidens') confirm the man's desirability: the woman's desire is not private delusion but publicly recognizable attraction.
4. The shift from singular ('draw me') to plural ('let us run, we will rejoice') likely represents the chorus of the Daughters of Jerusalem joining the woman's voice. The king's chambers (chadarav) suggest royal intimacy — the innermost, most private rooms of the palace.
4. Mesharim is rendered 'rightly' rather than KJV's 'the upright' — the word functions adverbially here, meaning 'with good reason, justly, fittingly.' Their love for him is well-founded.
5. The conjunction ve- is rendered 'and' rather than the KJV's 'but.' The Hebrew does not inherently contrast darkness with beauty — it can and does assert both simultaneously. Rendering it 'but' imports an assumption that dark skin is a deficiency to be overcome, which the Hebrew does not require.
5. Kedar refers to a nomadic Arabian tribe descended from Ishmael (Genesis 25:13) known for their black goat-hair tents. The comparison is striking: she is dark like desert tents AND beautiful like royal curtains. Both images coexist without tension.
6. Shecharochoret is an intensified form — 'very dark, deeply tanned.' The sun has shezafatni ('scorched me, burned me'). Her darkness is the result of forced outdoor labor, not innate complexion — though the Song never treats this as diminishing her beauty.
6. The vineyard metaphor operates on two levels simultaneously. On the surface: her brothers forced her to tend their vineyards, leaving no time for her own. Below the surface: 'my own vineyard' (karmi shelli) is her body, her sexuality, her self — which she has not been free to cultivate or enjoy. This double meaning recurs at the Song's climax in 8:12.
7. She-ahavah nafshi ('whom my soul loves') is the Song's signature phrase for the woman's desire (repeated in 3:1-4). Nefesh here is not 'soul' in the Greek dualistic sense but the whole self — body, desire, identity, life-force.
7. The word ke-oteyah is debated: it may mean 'like one who veils herself' (suggesting a prostitute, cf. Genesis 38:14-15) or 'like one who wanders' (from a root meaning to go astray). Either reading carries anxiety — she does not want to be mistaken for someone she is not.
8. The speaker here is likely the chorus (Daughters of Jerusalem) or the man himself. The address ha-yafah ba-nashim ('the beautiful one among women') is a superlative — she is the most beautiful of all women. The advice is practical and teasing: follow the sheep tracks and you will find your shepherd.
9. The Hebrew is susati ('my mare') — singular and feminine, not the KJV's 'company of horses.' The image is provocative and deliberately erotic: a mare released among chariot stallions would drive them wild, breaking formation. He is saying: you have the power to undo all composure.

9. Ra'yati ('my darling, my companion, my friend') is the man's signature term for the woman — it implies both romantic love and genuine companionship.
10. Torim ('rows, strings') likely refers to ornamental pendants or earrings framing her face. Charuzim ('beads, strung ornaments') describes jewels strung on a cord around her neck. The man notices how adornment enhances her natural beauty — the jewels do not create beauty but frame what is already there.
11. The plural 'we will make' suggests the man and his companions, or a royal 'we.' The gold-and-silver adornment is a love-gift, crafted specifically for her. The combination of gold with silver nequddot ('studs, dots, speckles') describes fine metalwork — luxury jewelry as an expression of devotion.
12. Bi-mesibbo ('at his circle, at his reclining') describes the king reclining at a banquet — the posture of feasting. The woman's nard (an expensive aromatic imported from India) releases its scent in his presence. The image is sensual: her perfume fills the room, reaching him, drawing him. Her fragrance is her desire made atmospheric.
13. The imagery is simultaneously literal and metaphorical. Women wore small sachets of myrrh between their breasts as perfume. But she says her beloved IS the sachet — his presence against her body is the fragrance she carries. The verb yalin ('lodges, spends the night') is unmistakably sexual: he lies between her breasts through the night.
13. Dodi ('my beloved') is the woman's primary term for the man, appearing over 25 times in the Song. It is built on the same root as dodim ('lovemaking') in verse 2.
14. Kofer is henna (Lawsonia inermis), not the KJV's 'camphire.' Henna produces intensely fragrant flower clusters and was used to dye skin, hair, and nails. Ein Gedi is the lush oasis on the western shore of the Dead Sea — a tropical garden in the midst of desert. Her beloved is an oasis of fragrance and beauty in a barren world.
15. The double hinnakh yafah ('behold you are beautiful') is emphatic repetition — he cannot say it once and stop. Her eyes are yonim ('doves'), not 'dove-like' — they ARE doves. The metaphor is full identification. Doves suggest gentleness, purity, and soft iridescence.
16. She mirrors his praise back — hinnekha yafeh ('behold you are beautiful/handsome'). Then she turns to their shared space: arsenu ra'anana ('our bed is green/verdant'). The eres ('bed, couch') is outdoors — a bed of living vegetation, the earth itself as their marriage bed. The whole landscape participates in their love.
17. The lovers' 'house' is the forest itself — cedar trunks are their beams, cypress branches their rafters. The construction metaphor transforms wilderness into a bridal chamber. Arazim ('cedars') were the premier building material of the ancient Near East, associated with temples and palaces. Their love deserves a palace, and nature provides one.

Summary: Chapter 2 unfolds the spring of love. The woman identifies herself as a wildflower and the man as an apple tree offering shade and sweetness. She describes being brought to the banquet hall under the banner of love, then pleads for sustenance because she is 'sick with love.' The famous adjuration to the Daughters of Jerusalem ('Do not stir up love until it pleases') appears for the first time. The chapter's second half is the man's springtime invitation — 'Rise up, my darling, and come away' — one of the most celebrated love lyrics in world literature. The chapter closes with the woman's assertion of mutual possession and a brief scene of playful pursuit among the foxes and lilies.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 7 contains the Song's refrain — the adjuration by gazelles and wild does not to awaken love before its time. This oath is extraordinary: it swears not by God but by animals, specifically by the grace and wildness of the natural world. Love is treated as a force with its own timing, its own season, which cannot be forced or manufactured. The springtime passage (2:10-13) is the most sustained nature poetry in the Hebrew Bible, cataloguing the arrival of spring through blossoms, birdsong, fig ripening, and grapevine fragrance. The lovers' world is Eden restored — the garden before the fall, where desire and innocence coexist.

Translation Friction: The adjuration formula 'by the gazelles and by the does of the field' (bi-tseva'ot o be-aylot ha-sadeh) may contain a hidden divine name: tseva'ot echoes YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts'), and aylot echoes El ('God'). If so, the oath avoids speaking God's name directly while invoking it through animal doubles — a remarkable theological maneuver that keeps God present in the poem without making the poem 'about' God. The foxes in verse 15 ('Catch us the foxes, the little foxes') have generated endless allegorical interpretation, but the plain sense is likely a love-game: small threats to the vineyard (their love) must be chased away together.

Connections: The spring catalogue in 2:11-13 reverses the curse language of Genesis 3, where the ground produces thorns — here the earth produces flowers, fruit, and fragrance. The dove in the clefts of the rock (2:14) resonates with Jeremiah 48:28 and Obadiah 1:3. The gazelle imagery connects to 2 Samuel 2:18 (Asahel was 'swift as a gazelle') and to the broader ancient Near Eastern tradition of comparing lovers to swift, graceful animals.

¹I am a wildflower of the Sharon,
a lily of the valleys.

²Like a lily among thorns,
so is my darling among the young women.

³Like an apple tree among the trees of the forest,
so is my beloved among the young men.
In his shade I have delighted to sit,
and his fruit is sweet to my mouth.

⁴He has brought me to the house of wine, and his banner over me is love.

⁵Sustain me with raisin cakes, revive me with apples —
for I am sick with love!

⁶His left hand is under my head,
and his right hand embraces me —

⁷I adjure you, Daughters of Jerusalem, by the gazelles and the wild does —
do not stir up, do not awaken love
until it desires to arise!

⁸The voice of my beloved!
Look — here he comes,
leaping over the mountains,
bounding over the hills!

⁹My beloved is like a gazelle
or a young stag.
Look — there he stands behind our wall,
gazing through the windows,
peering through the lattice!

¹⁰My beloved spoke and said to me:
'Arise, my darling,
my beautiful one — come away!'

¹¹For look — the winter is past,
the rain is over and gone.

¹²The blossoms have appeared in the land,
the season of singing has arrived, and the voice of the turtledove is heard in our land.

¹³The fig tree ripens its early fruit,
and the grapevines in blossom give off fragrance.
Arise, my darling,
my beautiful one — come away!

¹⁴My dove, in the clefts of the rock, in the hiding places of the cliff —
let me see your face,
let me hear your voice,
for your voice is sweet and your face is lovely.

¹⁵Catch for us the foxes — the little foxes that ruin the vineyards —
for our vineyards are in blossom!

¹⁶My beloved is mine and I am his —
he who grazes among the lilies.

¹⁷Until the day breathes and the shadows flee, turn, my beloved — be like a gazelle
or a young stag
on the cleft mountains.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Chavatslet is not a rose — the identity is uncertain, but likely a crocus, narcissus, or meadow saffron. We render it 'wildflower' to preserve the humility of the self-description without committing to a specific botanical identification. She calls herself common, and he will immediately contradict her.
2. He takes her modest self-description and transforms it: she may be a lily, but she is a lily among thorns. Every other woman is a thorn by comparison. His praise elevates her without contradicting her — she is indeed a lily, but the only lily.
3. She matches his compliment and raises it: he is a fruit tree among barren forest trees — he alone provides shade and sweetness. Sitting in his shade and tasting his fruit is erotic metaphor: his body shelters her and his love is delicious on her tongue.
3. Chimadeti ('I delighted, I desired') shares a root with chemdah ('precious thing, desire'). Her sitting is not passive but eagerly chosen.
4. Bet ha-yayin ('house of wine') is literally a place where wine is consumed — a banquet hall. The diglo ('his banner, his standard') is a military term: armies marched under banners to identify their allegiance. His banner, raised over her, declares that she belongs to love — she is claimed, protected, and publicly identified as his.
5. Ashishot are raisin cakes — dried fruit pressed into cakes, a delicacy and energy food (2 Samuel 6:19, Hosea 3:1). She is faint, overwhelmed, physically weakened by the intensity of desire. Cholat ahavah ('sick with love, lovesick') describes love as a physical condition — the body undone by longing.
6. The posture described is that of lovemaking — he cradles her head with one hand and holds her body with the other. Two bodies intertwined, one supporting and enclosing the other. This exact verse recurs in 8:3, framing the entire Song with this image of physical union.
7. The oath by gazelles and does rather than by God is unique in the Hebrew Bible. The animals may serve as coded references to divine names (tseva'ot echoing YHWH Tseva'ot, aylot echoing El), allowing the oath to carry divine weight without pronouncing sacred names.

7. The verb techpat ('it desires, it pleases') gives love its own agency — love awakens when love is ready, not when humans decide.
8. Qol dodi ('the voice of my beloved!') is an exclamation of recognition — she hears him before she sees him. The verbs medalleg ('leaping') and meqappets ('bounding, springing') describe an exuberant, almost superhuman approach. He does not walk — he leaps mountains.
9. The comparison to a tsevi ('gazelle') and ofer ha-ayalim ('young stag') emphasizes speed, grace, and wild beauty. Then the scene shifts: he has arrived at her house and stands behind the wall, looking in. The verbs mashgiach ('gazing') and metsits ('peering') create an electric tension — he wants to see her, he searches for her through every opening.
10. Qumi lakh ('arise, go for yourself') echoes the lekh lekha ('go for yourself') spoken to Abraham in Genesis 12:1 — a call to leave the familiar and journey into promise. His invitation is not merely romantic but transformative.
11. Ha-setav ('the winter') refers to the cold, rainy season in Palestine (roughly November through March). Chalaf halakh lo ('has passed, has gone away') uses two verbs of departure for emphasis — winter didn't merely end, it LEFT. The world is opening up.
12. Nitsanim ('blossoms, buds') signals spring's first visual evidence. Et ha-zamir is ambiguous: zamir can mean 'singing' or 'pruning' — both happen in spring. The tor ('turtledove') is a migratory bird whose return to Palestine in April marks the definitive arrival of spring.
13. Chanetah paggeha ('ripens its early figs') — the pagim are the small, hard early figs that appear before the main crop. The grapevines are in semadar ('blossom') — the tiny flowers that precede the grapes, producing an intensely sweet fragrance. He repeats his invitation, now grounded in sensory evidence: the world is ripe, fragrant, ready.
14. He calls her yonati ('my dove') — doves nest in rocky crevices, shy and hidden. She is concealed and he coaxes her out: let me see, let me hear. The double request (sight and sound) matches the double praise: your voice is arev ('sweet') and your face is naveh ('lovely'). He wants the whole person — visible and audible.
15. This playful verse may be a snatch of a folk song or a love-game between the two. The shu'alim qetannim ('little foxes') are small predators that damage vineyards by digging at roots and eating young shoots. The keramim ('vineyards') carry the Song's usual double meaning — the literal vineyard and the lovers' relationship.
16. Dodi li va-ani lo ('my beloved is mine and I am his') is the Song's most concise statement of mutual belonging. The possessive is symmetrical — neither owns the other more. He grazes ba-shoshannim ('among the lilies'), which is both pastoral and erotic. This formula recurs in 6:3 and 7:11, each time with a subtle shift in emphasis.
17. Ad she-yafuach ha-yom ('until the day breathes') is a poetic description of dawn — the moment when the first breeze stirs and darkness retreats. She invites him to be like a gazelle on the hare vater ('mountains of Bether/cleavage'). Beter means 'cutting, cleavage, division' — these may be literal mountains or a veiled reference to her own body's contours.

Summary: Chapter 3 divides into two distinct movements. In verses 1-5, the woman recounts a nighttime search through the city streets for her beloved — she seeks him in bed, then rises to search the streets, encounters the watchmen, and finally finds him and brings him to her mother's house. In verses 6-11, an unnamed voice describes a royal procession: Solomon's litter ascending from the wilderness, surrounded by sixty warriors, elaborately constructed with silver, gold, and purple, crowned by his mother on his wedding day.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The night-search sequence (verses 1-5) is one of the Song's most psychologically intense passages. The woman lies in bed, desire keeping her awake, and the one her nefesh loves is absent. She decides to search — an extraordinary act for an unmarried woman alone in the city at night. The watchmen who find her are ambiguous figures — protectors or threats? When she finds him, she seizes him (achaztivu — the verb is strong, even violent) and refuses to let go until she has brought him to her mother's chamber. The mother's house, not the father's, is the space of female sexuality and agency in the Song.*

Translation Friction: The relationship between the night-search narrative and the Solomon procession is the chapter's central puzzle. Are verses 6-11 the woman's fantasy of a royal wedding? A flashback? A separate poem? The shift in tone, speaker, and imagery is so abrupt that many scholars treat them as originally independent compositions. The 'bed of Solomon' in verse 7 may connect to the woman's bed in verse 1, suggesting the search ends in royal consummation — or it may be an entirely different scene.

Connections: The night-search motif connects to 5:2-8, where a nearly identical sequence occurs with a darker outcome — the watchmen beat her. The mother's house (bet immi) echoes 8:2, where the woman again brings her beloved to her mother's house. Solomon's procession with its sixty warriors echoes the sixty queens of 6:8. The wedding crown placed by his mother connects to the broader biblical motif of mothers blessing sons at pivotal moments.

¹On my bed through the nights
I sought the one my soul loves.
I sought him but did not find him.

²Let me rise now and go about the city,
through the streets and the squares.
Let me seek the one my soul loves.
I sought him but did not find him.

³The watchmen found me,
those who go about the city.
"Have you seen the one my soul loves?"

⁴Scarcely had I passed them when I found the one my soul loves.
I seized him and would not let him go until I had brought him
to my mother's house,
to the chamber of the one who conceived me.

⁵I adjure you, O Daughters of Jerusalem, by the gazelles and the does of the field —
do not stir up or awaken love
until it pleases.

⁶Who is this coming up from the wilderness like columns of smoke, perfumed with myrrh and frankincense,
with every powder of the merchant?

⁷Look — it is Solomon's litter!
Sixty warriors surround it,
the mightiest of Israel.

⁸All of them grip swords, trained for war —
each with his sword at his thigh against the terrors of the night.

⁹King Solomon made himself a palanquin from the wood of Lebanon.

¹⁰Its pillars he made of silver, its base of gold,
its seat of purple cloth.

Its interior is inlaid with love
by the daughters of Jerusalem.

¶Go out and gaze, O daughters of Zion, upon King Solomon — upon the crown with which his mother crowned him on the day of his wedding, on the day of the gladness of his heart.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ba-lelot ('through the nights') is plural — this is not one night but a recurring experience. The bed (mishkavi) is the site of expected intimacy; his absence from it is the crisis. The doubled verb biqqashti ('I sought') with the negative lo metsativu ('I did not find him') establishes the seeking-and-not-finding pattern that drives the narrative.
2. Aquamah na ('let me rise now') — the na particle adds urgency. She leaves the safety of her bed and house to search the city. The shevaqim ('streets') and rehovot ('broad places, squares') are public spaces — for an unaccompanied woman at night, this is a transgressive and dangerous act.
3. Ha-shomrim ha-sovevim ba-ir ('the watchmen who go about the city') are the night patrol. That they 'found' her reverses the pattern: she has been seeking without finding, and now she is the one found. Her question gives no name, no description — she assumes her desire is self-evident.
4. Achaztivu ve-lo arpenu ('I seized him and would not let him go') — achaz is strong, even aggressive. She does not simply find him — she grabs him and refuses to release him. She is the active agent; he is the one seized.
4. Bet immi ('my mother's house') and cheder horati ('the chamber of the one who conceived me') specify the destination: not the father's house but the mother's — the matrilineal space of female sexuality. Bringing him there carries unmistakable sexual implication.
5. The second occurrence of the adjuration refrain (identical to 2:7). It marks the close of the night-search narrative and the transition to the Solomon procession. After the intensity of seeking and seizing, the adjuration counsels patience: do not force love's timing.
6. Mi zot ('who is this?') signals awe at an approaching spectacle. Something ascends (olah) from the midbar ('wilderness'). The pillars of smoke (timrot ashan) may be incense or dust clouds. The fragrance of myrrh and frankincense combined with every merchant's powder creates olfactory overwhelm — this arrival is announced by scent before sight.
7. Mittato shel Shelomoh ('his litter/bed, which is Solomon's') — mittah can mean 'bed' or 'portable couch/litter.' In processional context it is a palanquin. The sixty gibborim ('warriors') who surround it echo David's thirty mighty men (2 Samuel 23:8-39), doubled for Solomon's greater glory.
8. These are combat-ready warriors whose swords rest on their thighs — ready to draw instantly. The threat they guard against is mi-pachad ba-lelot ('against the terror of the night'). The nighttime setting connects to the woman's night-search in verses 1-4.
9. Appiryon is a hapax legomenon — it appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. It may derive from Sanskrit paryanka ('bed, couch') via Persian, or Greek phoreion ('sedan chair'). We render it 'palanquin.' The word's foreignness suits the Song's cosmopolitan vocabulary. The Lebanon timber is the same material as the temple (1 Kings 5-6).
10. The materials ascend in value: silver pillars, gold base, purple seat (argaman — the royal purple dye extracted from murex shells). Then the climactic detail: tokho ratsuf ahavah ('its interior is inlaid with love'). The physical construction gives way to metaphor — the innermost space is not lined with material but with love itself.
11. Tse'enah ur'enah ('go out and gaze') — the famous Yiddish women's Bible commentary takes its name from this verse. The women of Jerusalem are called to see Solomon in his wedding crown (atarah) — not the royal crown of kingship but a bridal crown placed by his mother.
11. Be-yom chatunnato uve-yom simchat libbo ('on the day of his wedding and the day of the gladness of his heart') — the wedding day is when heart-joy reaches its peak. The mother who crowns him is the last figure in the chapter — maternal blessing authorizes the marriage.

Summary: Song of Songs 4 contains the first wasf — a head-to-toe praise poem in which the bridegroom celebrates the bride's beauty through an elaborate sequence of pastoral and architectural metaphors. The chapter culminates in the locked garden imagery (4:12–15), where the bride is described as a private paradise of spices and flowing water, followed by the bride's invitation for the wind to carry her fragrance to her beloved.

What Makes This Remarkable: The wasf (Arabic 'description') is a recognized literary form in ancient Near Eastern love poetry: a catalog of the beloved's features using comparisons drawn from landscape, agriculture, and architecture. What is remarkable here is the density and strangeness of the imagery to modern ears — hair like a flock of goats descending Gilead, teeth like freshly shorn ewes, temples like pomegranate halves. These are not decorations but assertions of abundance, symmetry, fertility, and worth drawn from the agrarian world the poet inhabited. The locked garden metaphor in verses 12–15 is the theological pivot of the chapter: the bride is a gan na'ul ('locked garden'), a spring sealed — language that speaks of exclusivity, of a bounty reserved for one person alone. The garden imagery anticipates and inverts Eden: where the first garden was open and then lost, this garden is closed and then freely offered.

Translation Friction: Modern readers must resist two temptations: allegorizing every image into a spiritual abstraction, and reducing the poem to mere eroticism. The Song operates on both registers simultaneously — it is unabashedly about human desire and delight, and the Jewish and Christian traditions have found in it a parable of divine-human love. Neither reading cancels the other. The locked garden language in particular has been weaponized in purity culture in ways that flatten its original meaning. In context, the locked garden is not about shame or restriction but about chosen exclusivity — the bride's own agency in offering what is hers to give.

Connections: The garden imagery connects directly to Eden (Genesis 2:8–15) and to the prophetic restoration of Israel as a watered garden (Isaiah 58:11, Jeremiah 31:12). The tower of David reference (4:4) links to military and royal imagery used throughout the Davidic literature. The spice catalog in 4:13–14 — henna, nard, saffron, calamus, cinnamon, frankincense, myrrh, aloes — echoes the sacred anointing oil and incense ingredients of Exodus 30, placing the bride's body in the register of holy things. Lebanon appears repeatedly (4:8, 11, 15) as the epitome of majesty and fragrance.

¹How beautiful you are, my darling!

How beautiful you are!

Your eyes are doves

behind your veil.

Your hair is like a flock of goats streaming down Mount Gilead.

²Your teeth are like a flock of newly shorn ewes coming up from the washing —

each one bearing twins,

none among them bereaved.

³Your lips are like a scarlet thread, and your mouth is lovely.

Your temples behind your veil

are like the halves of a pomegranate.

⁴Your neck is like the Tower of David,

built in courses —

a thousand shields hang upon it,
all the armor of warriors.

⁵Your two breasts are like two fawns,
twins of a gazelle,
grazing among the lilies.

⁶Until the day breathes
and the shadows flee,
I will go to the mountain of myrrh
and the hill of frankincense.

⁷You are entirely beautiful, my darling.
There is no flaw in you.

⁸Come with me from Lebanon, my bride, come with me from Lebanon!
Descend from the summit of Amana, from the peak of Senir and Hermon,
from the dens of lions,
from the mountains of leopards.

⁹You have stolen my heart, my sister, my bride!
You have stolen my heart
with one glance of your eyes, with one jewel of your necklace.

¹⁰How beautiful is your lovemaking, my sister, my bride!
How much better is your lovemaking than wine, and the fragrance of your oils than any spice!

¹¹Your lips drip nectar, my bride — honey and milk are under your tongue.
The scent of your garments is like the scent of Lebanon.

¹²A locked garden is my sister, my bride —
a locked pool,
a sealed spring.

¹³Your shoots are a paradise of pomegranates with choicest fruits, henna with nard,

¹⁴nard and saffron, calamus and cinnamon with every frankincense tree, myrrh and aloes
with every finest spice.

¹⁵A fountain for gardens,
a well of living water,
and flowing streams from Lebanon.

¹⁶Awake, north wind, and come, south wind!
Blow upon my garden
so its fragrances may flow out.
Let my beloved come into his garden and eat its choicest fruits.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ra'yati ('my darling, my companion') is the bridegroom's characteristic term for the bride. It derives from ra'ah ('to tend, to shepherd, to be a companion') and carries overtones of intimacy, care, and chosen partnership — not merely romantic attraction but covenantal companionship.
1. The goat-hair image strikes modern readers as bizarre, but in an agrarian context it conveyed overwhelming visual impact: hundreds of dark-haired goats moving as one body down a green slope, a cascade of dark beauty against bright land. The comparison is to the totality of the effect, not to individual animals.
2. The word qetsuvot is debated — it may mean 'shorn' or 'closely matched.' Either reading supports the core meaning: uniformity and freshness. We follow the traditional reading of newly shorn ewes to maintain the pastoral register.
2. Mat'imot ('bearing twins') is the key metaphor: every tooth has its twin, its matching partner in the opposite jaw. The image celebrates symmetry and completeness rather than fertility per se.
3. Midbarekh is a double-meaning word — from the root d-b-r ('to speak'), it can mean 'your speech' or 'your mouth.' The ambiguity is likely intentional: the beloved's lips are beautiful both in form and in what they say. We render it 'your mouth' to capture the physical sense in context while noting the verbal overtone.
3. The pomegranate appears frequently in Song of Songs (4:3, 13; 6:7, 11; 7:12; 8:2) and in temple architecture (1 Kings 7:18–20). Its many seeds made it a universal symbol of abundance and fertility.
4. Talpiyyot is a hapax legomenon — it appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. Proposals include 'courses of stone,' 'an armory,' 'a fortress,' or 'elegant layers.' The uncertainty does not affect the core meaning: the tower is built with impressive construction and adorned with military trophies.
4. The shift from pastoral imagery (goats, ewes, pomegranates) to military architecture (tower, shields, warriors) is jarring but intentional. The wasf draws from every register of Israelite life — farm, orchard, city, and garrison — to say that this woman's beauty encompasses all categories of excellence.
5. The twin fawns grazing among lilies is the Song's most tender bodily metaphor. The image is not about size or shape but about gentleness, symmetry, and the softness of young animals at rest in a flower-filled meadow. The lilies (shoshannim) are the Song's signature flower, and the fawns feeding among them creates a pastoral scene that IS her body.
5. This verse returns in 7:3 with slight variation, forming a refrain. The repetition across the Song creates the effect of a beloved whose beauty is known, returned to, and marveled at again.
6. The verb yafuach ('to breathe, to blow') personifies the day as a living being drawing its first breath. This is more vivid than 'daybreak' and we preserve the metaphor in translation.
6. Mountain of myrrh and hill of frankincense are double-register images: they evoke both a physical landscape and the bride's body anointed with precious spices. The Song consistently refuses to separate geography from intimacy.
7. Kullakh yafah ('all of you is beautiful') — after the item-by-item wasf, he steps back and declares the whole: every part, taken together, is flawless. The brevity of this verse after the elaborate catalog is itself eloquent. Six Hebrew words summarize what the extended description has argued.
7. Mum en bakh ('there is no blemish in you') uses language from the sacrificial system — mum is the term for a disqualifying defect in a sacrificial animal (Leviticus 22:20–21). She is not merely beautiful but perfect, without blemish, worthy of the most sacred offering.
8. The shift from ra'yati ('my darling') to kallah ('my bride') marks a transition in the relationship. Kallah appears six times in 4:8–5:1 and nowhere else in the Song outside this section, suggesting these verses represent the wedding night or its immediate context.
8. The four mountain names — Lebanon, Amana, Senir, Hermon — are all peaks in the same range, viewed from different angles. The accumulation creates a sense of vast, wild distance that the bridegroom wants to overcome.
9. Libbavtini is best understood as 'you have stolen my heart' or 'you have set my heart racing.' Some translations render it 'ravished,' but this carries connotations of force in modern English. The Hebrew conveys willing captivity — the bridegroom celebrates being undone.

9. The 'sister-bride' address (achoti kallah) appears five times in 4:9–5:2. In Egyptian love poetry, 'sister' and 'brother' are the standard terms between lovers. The usage signals the deepest form of peer intimacy: this is not hierarchy but partnership.
10. Dodim ('love, caresses') is the same word the bride used in 1:2 and 1:4. The verbal echo creates mutuality: these lovers mirror each other's praise. The Song consistently refuses to make one party the sole speaker of desire.
10. The wine comparison (mah tovu dodayikh mi-yayin) inverts 1:2 (ki tovim dodekha mi-yayin). The same structure, reversed speakers — a literary technique that embodies the equality of desire in this relationship.
11. The 'milk and honey' phrase deliberately echoes the description of the promised land. The poet places the bride's intimacy in the same category as Israel's ultimate inheritance — a land of abundance given by God. This is not casual metaphor but theological assertion: the beloved is herself a promised land.
11. Lebanon's scent was proverbial — its cedar forests, now largely gone, once perfumed the entire eastern Mediterranean coast. Hosea 14:6 uses the same comparison: 'his fragrance shall be like Lebanon.'
12. The garden (gan) is the same word used for Eden in Genesis 2:8 (gan be-Eden). The echo is unmistakable and theologically loaded: the bride as garden is a restoration of what was lost — a place of abundance, beauty, and intimate communion with another person.
12. Na'ul ('locked') and chatum ('sealed') are both passive participles — the garden is in a state of being locked, the fountain in a state of being sealed. The text does not say who locked or sealed them. The bride's own agency in 4:16 suggests she holds the key.
13. Pardes appears only three times in the Hebrew Bible (here, Ecclesiastes 2:5, and Nehemiah 2:8). Its Persian origin places it in the world of royal gardens — the enclosed, irrigated pleasure parks of ancient kings. The bride's body is not a common field but a king's private paradise.
13. The spice catalog that runs through verses 13–14 lists at least twelve precious plants and aromatics. The accumulation is deliberately overwhelming — the garden's abundance exceeds any single metaphor's capacity.
14. The overlap between this spice list and the ingredients of the sacred anointing oil (Exodus 30:23–25) and the holy incense (Exodus 30:34–38) is too precise to be coincidental. The poet places the bride's garden in the same aromatic world as the tabernacle — a space where God's presence dwells.
14. Ahalot ('aloes') refers to eaglewood (Aquilaria), not the aloe vera plant. Eaglewood was imported from Southeast Asia and was among the most costly aromatics of antiquity. Its inclusion signals extreme luxury.
15. Mayim chayyim ('living water') is theologically charged language. In Jeremiah 2:13 and 17:13, God is the source of living water. In Zechariah 14:8, living water flows from Jerusalem in the messianic age. John 4:10–14 draws directly on this tradition. The bride as a well of living water is one of the Song's most audacious metaphors.
15. The progression from sealed spring (v. 12) to overflowing source (v. 15) mirrors the movement of the entire chapter: from controlled exclusivity to abundant generosity. The garden was locked, but its contents are inexhaustible.
16. The shift from 'my garden' (ganni) to 'his garden' (ganno) is the verse's theological center. She retains ownership — it is she who invites — but in the act of love, what is hers becomes his. This is gift, not seizure. The garden metaphor makes consent visible: she unlocks, she summons the wind, she issues the invitation.
16. The command hafichi ganni ('blow upon my garden') uses the same root (p-w-ch, 'to breathe, to blow') as the 'breathing' day of verse 6. Wind, breath, and spirit share the same Hebrew word (ruach), connecting the physical act of wind-blowing to the animating breath of desire.

Summary: Chapter 5 opens with the consummation — the man enters his garden and feasts on its honey, wine, and spices. A mysterious voice urges the lovers to eat and drink deeply. Then the mood shifts dramatically: the woman recounts a nighttime episode where her beloved knocked at her door, but by the time she opened it, he had vanished. She searches the city streets (echoing chapter 3) but this time the watchmen beat and strip her. The Daughters of Jerusalem ask what makes her beloved so special, prompting her to deliver a stunning wasf of the man's body — the only such poem about a male figure in the Hebrew Bible.

What Makes This Remarkable: The wasf of the man (verses 10–16) is extraordinary. Male beauty is almost never described in ancient literature with this level of physical detail and erotic charge. His head is finest gold, his locks are date clusters, his eyes are doves by water streams, his cheeks are spice beds, his lips drip liquid myrrh, his hands are gold cylinders set with beryl, his torso is polished ivory covered with sapphires, his legs are marble pillars on gold bases, his appearance is like Lebanon, and his mouth is sweetness itself. The woman gazes at the man's body with the same intensity he brought to her body in chapter 4. The Song insists on full mutuality of desire and admiration.

Translation Friction: The watchmen's violence in verse 7 is deeply troubling and deliberately so. The same watchmen who were neutral in 3:3 now beat her and tear her veil. The text offers no explanation or condemnation — it simply reports. This may represent the danger women face when they claim sexual agency in a patriarchal society, or the vulnerability of desire in a hostile world. The Song does not resolve this violence; it stands as an unhealed wound in the poem's otherwise joyful landscape.

Connections: The garden consummation in 5:1 completes the garden metaphor that began in 4:12. The night-search of 5:2-8 parallels 3:1-4 but with a darker outcome, creating a literary diptych: sometimes you find love, sometimes love finds only violence. The wasf of the man parallels and balances the wasf of the woman in chapter 4. The gold, ivory, sapphire, and marble of his description echo the materials of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 6-7), suggesting that the beloved's body is itself a sacred space.

¹I have come into my garden, my sister, my bride.
 I have gathered my myrrh with my spices,
 I have eaten my honeycomb with my honey,
 I have drunk my wine with my milk.
 Eat, friends!
 Drink, and drink deeply, lovers!

²I was asleep but my heart was awake.
 The sound! My beloved knocking!
 "Open to me, my sister, my darling, my dove, my perfect one —
 for my head is drenched with dew, my locks with the moisture of the night."

³I have taken off my garment — how can I put it on again?
 I have washed my feet —
 how can I soil them?

⁴My beloved thrust his hand through the opening, and my insides churned for him.

⁵I rose to open for my beloved,
 and my hands dripped with myrrh,
 my fingers with liquid myrrh,
 upon the handles of the bolt.

⁶I opened for my beloved,
 but my beloved had turned and gone.
 My soul went out at his going.
 I sought him but did not find him.
 I called him but he did not answer.

⁷The watchmen found me,
 those who go about the city.
 They beat me, they wounded me, they stripped my veil from me —
 the keepers of the walls.

⁸I adjure you, O Daughters of Jerusalem —
if you find my beloved, tell him this:
that I am sick with love.

⁹What is your beloved more than any other beloved,
O most beautiful among women?
What is your beloved more than any other beloved,
that you so adjure us?

¹⁰My beloved is radiant and ruddy, distinguished among ten thousand.

¹¹His head is finest gold,
his locks are wavy clusters,
black as a raven.

¹²His eyes are like doves beside streams of water, bathed in milk,
mounted in their settings.

¹³His cheeks are like beds of spice, towers of perfumes.
His lips are lilies,
dripping with liquid myrrh.

¹⁴His hands are cylinders of gold set with beryl.
His torso is polished ivory covered with sapphires.

¹⁵His legs are marble pillars set on bases of fine gold.
His appearance is like Lebanon, choice as the cedars.

¹⁶His mouth is sweetness itself,
and all of him is desire.
This is my beloved and this is my friend,
O Daughters of Jerusalem.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The five first-person perfects create a rhythm of completion: gathered, eaten, drunk. Every image from the spice garden of chapter 4 is now consumed. The garden that was locked is now fully entered and enjoyed.
1. The final imperative ('eat, friends; drink deeply, lovers') is one of the Song's most debated lines. The identity of the speaker is unknown, but the effect is clear: an outside voice sanctions and celebrates the lovers' union.
2. Ani yeshenah ve-libbi er ('I was asleep but my heart was awake') — the body sleeps while desire remains alert. She hears him knocking (dofek) and calling through the door with four terms of endearment: sister, darling, dove, perfect one. His appeal is both romantic and pathetic — he stands outside in the night dew, wet-haired, begging entry.

2. The knocking on the door and the request to 'open' (pitchi li) carries obvious sexual overtones alongside the literal scene.
3. Her hesitation is the chapter's turning point. She has undressed and bathed for sleep; rising to open the door would mean redressing and dirtying her feet. The excuses seem trivial, but they create the fatal delay. By the time she acts, he will be gone. This is the Song's most painful moment of missed connection — desire that hesitates loses.
4. He reaches his hand through the latch-hole (chor) — the opening in the door through which a hand could reach to lift the internal bar. The image is intensely physical and erotically charged: his hand penetrating the opening. Her response is visceral: me'ay hamu alav ('my insides churned/trembled for him') — me'im are the intestines, the gut, the deepest interior of the body. Her desire is not in her mind but in her bowels.
5. She finally rises — and finds that he has left myrrh on the door handle. Her hands drip with mor over ('liquid myrrh, flowing myrrh') as she touches the bolt (man'ul). The myrrh is his trace, his residue — he was here, he touched this very surface, and his fragrance remains. The image is simultaneously romantic and tragic: the perfume of his presence lingers after his departure.
6. Dodi chamaq avar ('my beloved had turned and gone') — chamaq means 'to slip away, to withdraw.' He came, he waited, he left. Nafshi yats'ah be-dabbero ('my soul went out at his speaking/going') — her nefesh departs, she nearly dies from the pain of his absence. The seeking-and-not-finding language returns from 3:1-2, but now without resolution. She seeks, calls — silence.
7. The parallel to 3:3 is exact — until it turns violent. The same watchmen, the same city, but now hikkuni petsa'uni ('they beat me, they wounded me'). They also nasa'u et redidi me'alay ('they took my veil from me') — stripping a woman's covering is an act of public shaming (cf. Isaiah 47:2-3). The Song offers no explanation for this violence. The text simply absorbs it and moves forward. A woman seeking love in a dangerous world encounters the world's brutality.
8. The adjuration returns but transformed — no longer a warning about love's timing but a desperate message to be relayed. Cholat ahavah ani ('I am sick with love') echoes 2:5 but now the lovesickness has a sharper edge. She is beaten, stripped, alone in the dark, and her message to her absent beloved is simply: I am dying of desire for you.
9. The Daughters of Jerusalem ask the question that prompts the wasf: mah dodekh mi-dod ('what is your beloved more than a beloved?') — what makes him special? Why should we carry your message? The double question demands an answer, and she will give them one that transforms the entire second half of the chapter.
10. Tsach ve-adom ('radiant and ruddy') — tsach means 'dazzling, bright, clear' and adom means 'red, ruddy.' The combination suggests glowing health: bright skin flushed with vitality. Dagul me-revavah ('distinguished/bannered among ten thousand') — like a banner visible above a crowd of ten thousand, he stands out. The wasf begins with the whole before moving to parts.
11. Ketem paz ('finest gold, pure gold') — his head shines like the highest grade of refined gold. Qevutsotav taltalim ('his locks are clusters/curls') — the hair is thick, wavy, hanging in heavy ringlets. Shechorot ka-orev ('black as a raven') — the contrast between gold head and raven-black hair creates a striking image of brilliance framed by darkness.
12. The dove metaphor from 1:15 returns, now applied to the man. His eyes are doves beside water (al afiqe mayim — 'beside water channels'), bathed in milk (rochotsot be-chalav — white, glistening), and yoshvot al mille't ('sitting/mounted in their settings,' like gems in a bezel). The image layers: doves by water, washed in white, perfectly set — his eyes are jewels alive with gentle beauty.
13. His cheeks are arugat ha-bosem ('beds of spice') — the garden metaphor now applies to his face. Migdelot merqachim ('towers of perfumes') — his cheekbones rise like towers from which scent pours. His lips are shoshannim ('lilies') dripping mor over ('liquid myrrh'). When he speaks, when he kisses, myrrh flows. His face is a spice garden; his mouth produces the most precious resin.
14. Yadav gelile zahav ('his hands are gold cylinders') — gelilim are round, cylindrical rods. His fingers are smooth gold tubes set with tarshish (beryl or chrysolite — a yellow-green gem). Me'av eshet shen ('his belly/torso is a plaque of ivory') — his abdomen is smooth, pale, and hard as worked ivory, me'ullefet sappirim ('overlaid with sapphires' — blue lapis lazuli veining beneath the skin). The materials are those of temple furniture and royal vessels.
15. Shoqav ammude shesh ('his legs are pillars of marble/alabaster') set on adne paz ('bases of pure gold') — he stands like a temple. Mar'ehu ka-Levanon ('his appearance is like Lebanon') — not a single tree but an entire mountain range: vast, majestic, covered with forests. Bachur ka-arazim ('choice as the cedars') — he is the finest specimen, selected like the best cedar for the temple. His body is architecture, landscape, and forest.
16. Chikko mamtaqqim ('his palate/mouth is sweetnesses') — the plural intensifies: not merely sweet but the essence of sweetness. Ve-kullo machamaddim ('and all of him is desires/delights') — machamad is 'that which is desired, a precious thing.' He is not just desirable but the embodiment of desire itself.
16. The closing declaration zeh dodi ve-zeh re'i ('this is my beloved and this is my friend') answers the daughters' question from verse 9 and reasserts the Song's central insight: the lover is also the friend. Dod (lover) and re'a (friend, companion) are held together. Erotic passion and genuine friendship are not opposed but fused.

Summary: Chapter 6 opens with the Daughters of Jerusalem asking where the beloved has gone so they may seek him together. The woman responds that he has gone to his garden — she already knows where he is. She restates the formula of mutual belonging: 'I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine.' The man then delivers another wasf praising her beauty, comparing her to Tīrzah and Jerusalem, declaring that she is unique among all women — queens, concubines, and maidens alike acknowledge her singularity. The chapter closes with a mysterious scene involving the Shulammite and the dance of the two camps.

What Makes This Remarkable: The reversal of the mutual-possession formula in verse 3 is subtle but theologically significant. In 2:16 she said 'my beloved is mine and I am his.' Here she reverses the order: 'I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine.' The emphasis shifts from possession to self-giving — she names her belonging to him first, then his to her. By 7:11 it will shift again: 'I am my beloved's and his desire is toward me.' The progression tracks a deepening of love from mutual claiming to mutual yielding. The 'terrible as armies with banners' comparison (verse 4) is one of the Song's most striking moments — beauty is not merely pleasant but overwhelming, a force that can conquer armies.

Translation Friction: Verse 12 is among the most obscure verses in the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrew is genuinely unclear: lo yadati nafshi samatni markevot ammi-nadiv — something like 'I did not know, my soul set me among the chariots of my noble people' or 'I did not know myself — my desire set me in the chariots of Amminadib.' Every translation is a guess. The identity of the Shulammite (6:13/7:1 in Hebrew versification) is equally debated — is she from Shulem (Shunem), is this a feminine form of 'Solomon' (Shelomoh/Shulammit), or is it a title?

Connections: The comparison to Tīrzah (verse 4) dates the poem or its setting to before 880 BCE, when Tīrzah served as the capital of the northern kingdom before Samaria replaced it (1 Kings 15:33). The sixty queens and eighty concubines (verse 8) echo Solomon's harem (1 Kings 11:3), though the numbers here are smaller. The 'dance of the two camps' (mecholat ha-machanayim) in verse 13 may connect to the place name Mahanaim (Genesis 32:2), where Jacob saw the camp of angels.

¹Where has your beloved gone,
O most beautiful among women?
Where has your beloved turned?
Let us seek him with you.

²My beloved has gone down to his garden,
to the beds of spice,
to graze in the gardens
and to gather lilies.

³I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine —
he who grazes among the lilies.

⁴You are beautiful, my darling, as Tīrzah, lovely as Jerusalem,
formidable as armies with banners.

⁵Turn your eyes away from me —
they overwhelm me!
Your hair is like a flock of goats
streaming down from Gilead.

⁶Your teeth are like a flock of ewes
coming up from the washing —
each one bearing twins,
none among them bereaved.

⁷Your temples behind your veil
are like the halves of a pomegranate.

⁸Sixty are the queens,
eighty the concubines,
and young women beyond counting.

⁹But one is she — my dove, my perfect one.
She is the only one of her mother,
the pure one of the woman who bore her.
The young women saw her and called her fortunate;
queens and concubines praised her.

¹⁰Who is this gazing down like the dawn, beautiful as the moon,
radiant as the sun,
formidable as armies with banners?

¹¹I went down to the walnut garden to see the new growth by the stream,
to see if the vine had blossomed,
if the pomegranates were in bloom.

¹²Before I knew it,
my desire set me
among the chariots of my noble people.

¹³Turn, turn, O Shulammite!
Turn, turn, that we may gaze upon you!
Why would you gaze upon the Shulammite as at the dance of the two camps?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Daughters of Jerusalem respond to the wasf of chapter 5 by offering to join her search. Their question — anah halakh dodekh ('where has your beloved gone?') — uses the same language she used in her search (3:1-4, 5:6). But the woman no longer needs their help.
2. She knows exactly where he is — in his garden (ganno). The language echoes 4:16 and 5:1: the garden is her body, and he has gone to it. Li-r'ot ba-gannim ('to graze in the gardens') and li-lqot shoshannim ('to gather lilies') are erotic euphemisms — he feeds on her beauty and gathers her flowers. She answers the daughters' question with calm certainty: he is with me.
3. The formula from 2:16 returns reversed: there it was dodi li va-ani lo ('my beloved is mine and I am his'); here it is ani le-dodi ve-dodi li ('I am my beloved's and my beloved is mine'). She puts her belonging to him first. The shift suggests a deepening from claiming to yielding — she leads with gift, not possession.
4. Tirzah ('delight') was the capital of the northern kingdom before Samaria — a city of legendary beauty. Jerusalem represents the southern ideal. Together they encompass all of Israel's beauty. Then the stunning third comparison: ayummah ka-nidgalot ('formidable as bannered hosts'). Her beauty is not merely attractive but terrifying — it overwhelms like an army on the march. Beauty as military force.

5. Hasebbi enayikh mi-negdi she-hem herhivuni ('turn your eyes from opposite me, for they have overwhelmed/emboldened me') — her gaze is too much for him. He asks her to look away because her eyes undo his composure. This is not rejection but surrender: her beauty has conquered him. He then repeats the wasf from 4:1 — her hair like goats descending Gilead.
6. Nearly identical to 4:2 — the repetition is deliberate, creating a structural parallel between the two wasf passages. The teeth metaphor emphasizes whiteness, uniformity, and completeness. Repetition in the Song is not laziness but ritual: praise worth saying once is worth saying again.
7. Repeated from 4:3b — the pomegranate flush of her cheeks glimpsed through the tsammah ('veil'). The repetition of these specific comparisons ties chapters 4 and 6 together as a matched pair of praise poems.
8. The ascending numbers (sixty, eighty, countless) catalog the royal court's women — queens (melakhot), concubines (pilagshim), and alamot ('young women, maidens'). Against this vast field of feminine beauty, one woman will be singled out as incomparable.
9. Achat hi ('one is she') — against sixty queens, eighty concubines, and countless maidens, she is achat, unique, singular. Yonati tammati ('my dove, my perfect one') — the same pair of epithets from 5:2. She is unique to her mother and barah ('pure, bright, chosen') to the one who bore her. All the women of the court recognize her superiority: the daughters call her ashru ('fortunate, blessed') and the queens hallelu ('praise her').
10. Mi zot ('who is this?') echoes 3:6. She is compared to celestial bodies in ascending intensity: the dawn (shachar — the first light breaking), the moon (levanah — 'the white one'), the sun (chammah — 'the hot one,' blazing brilliance). Then the military comparison returns: ayummah ka-nidgalot. She is dawn, moon, sun, and army — everything that rises and overwhelms.
11. The speaker shifts — likely the woman. Ginnat egoz ('walnut garden') is a specific, cultivated space. She descends to inspect the ibbe ha-nachal ('green growth of the valley/stream'). The vine and pomegranates are checked for blossoming — the garden imagery that has represented the lovers' relationship is now examined for signs of flourishing.
12. This verse is notoriously obscure. Lo yadati ('I did not know') introduces confusion or surprise. Nafshi samatni ('my soul/desire placed me') — her own desire transported her. Markevot ammi-nadiv could mean 'chariots of Amminadib' (a proper name), 'chariots of my noble people,' or 'chariots of a willing people.' The overall sense: desire swept her away before she understood what was happening.
13. Shuvi shuvi — the fourfold repetition of 'turn, return' creates urgent rhythm. The Shulammit is addressed by name (or title) for the only time in the Song. The chorus wants her to turn so they may gaze at her. The responding question may be the woman's self-deprecating reply: why would you stare at me?
13. The mecholot ha-machanayim ('dance of the two camps') is unknown — it may be a specific dance, a military formation, or a wedding tradition. The Shulammit title may be the feminine form of Shelomoh (Solomon) — making her his counterpart.

Summary: Chapter 7 (following Hebrew versification, beginning at 7:2 in English Bibles) contains the final and most daring wasf — a foot-to-head praise of the woman's body as she dances. The man describes her feet, thighs, navel, belly, breasts, neck, eyes, nose, and head with increasingly bold imagery. The chapter climaxes with the woman's triumphant declaration: 'I am my beloved's and his desire is upon me' — the final evolution of the mutual-possession formula. She invites him to the countryside, the vineyards, and the fields where she will give him her love.

What Makes This Remarkable: This wasf reverses the direction of chapter 4: there he began with her head and moved down; here he begins with her feet and moves up. The reversal suggests she is dancing — the observers' eyes naturally move upward from her sandaled feet. The metaphors are also bolder: her navel is a round goblet that never lacks mixed wine, her belly is a heap of wheat fringed with lilies, her breasts are like clusters of grapes he desires to grasp. The woman's declaration in verse 11 (Hebrew) is the Song's theological summit: ani le-dodi ve-alay teshuqato ('I am my beloved's and his desire is upon me'). The word teshuqah ('desire') appears only three times in the Hebrew Bible — here, in Genesis 3:16 (the woman's desire for her husband after the fall), and Genesis 4:7 (sin's desire for Cain). The Song reverses Genesis 3: there, desire was linked to domination; here, desire is mutual and free.

Translation Friction: The boldness of the body imagery has always made commentators uncomfortable. The navel-as-wine-goblet and belly-as-wheat-heap are the Song's most explicitly physical descriptions, and attempts to allegorize them reveal the discomfort more than they resolve it. The Hebrew in verse 1 describes her dancing thighs and the 'curves of her thighs' (chammuqe yerekayikh), which is frank anatomical description. We preserve the text's directness.

Connections: The teshuqah ('desire') in verse 11 explicitly reverses Genesis 3:16, where the same word describes the woman's desire bound to her husband's rule. Here the same desire operates without domination — the fall's distortion of eros is undone. The vineyard and field imagery of verses 12-14 return to the Song's opening themes (1:6, 2:15) and anticipate the final vineyard declaration in 8:12. The mandrakes (duda'im) in verse 14 echo Genesis 30:14-16, where Rachel and Leah negotiate with mandrakes for access to Jacob — an aphrodisiac plant linked to fertility and desire.

¹How beautiful are your sandaled feet,
O daughter of nobles!
The curves of your thighs are like ornaments,
the work of a master craftsman.

²Your navel is a rounded goblet — may it never lack mixed wine!
Your belly is a mound of wheat fringed with lilies.

³Your two breasts are like two fawns,
twins of a gazelle.

⁴Your neck is like a tower of ivory.
Your eyes are the pools of Heshbon beside the gate of Bath-rabbim.
Your nose is like the tower of Lebanon facing toward Damascus.

⁵Your head crowns you like Carmel, and the flowing hair of your head is like purple —
a king is held captive in the tresses!

⁶How beautiful you are, how delightful —
O love, among pleasures!

⁷Your stature is like a palm tree,
and your breasts like clusters of fruit.

⁸I said: 'I will climb the palm tree,
I will seize its branches!'
Let your breasts be like clusters of the vine,
the fragrance of your breath like apples,

⁹and your mouth like the finest wine — flowing smoothly for my beloved, gliding over the lips of sleepers.

¹⁰I belong to my beloved,
and his desire is toward me.

¹¹Come, my beloved, let us go out to the field,
let us spend the night among the henna blossoms.

¹²Let us rise early to the vineyards,
let us see if the vine has blossomed,
if the grape blossoms have opened,
if the pomegranates are in flower.
There I will give you my love.

¹³The mandrakes give off their fragrance, and at our doors are all choice fruits, new and old —
my beloved, I have stored them up for you.

¹⁴If only you were like a brother to me,
one who nursed at my mother's breasts!
If I found you outside I would kiss you,
and no one would despise me.

1. The wasf begins at the bottom — pe'amayikh ba-ne'alim ('your feet in sandals'). She is dancing, and the observers' eyes start at her moving feet. Bat nadiv ('daughter of a noble/prince') gives her aristocratic status. Chammuge yerekayikh ('the curves of your thighs') is frank anatomical praise — the smooth, rounded contours of her upper legs are like chala'im ('ornaments'), as finely wrought as a master artisan's work.
2. Shorrerekh aggan ha-sahar ('your navel is a round/crescent goblet') — the comparison to a wine goblet that never runs dry is unmistakably sensual. Bitnekh ('your belly, your womb') is a heap of wheat (the golden-tan color of her skin) surrounded by lilies (shoshannim). The images are of abundance: wine that never empties, grain heaped high, flowers framing everything.
3. Repeated from 4:5 with slight variation — the 'grazing among the lilies' clause is omitted here, focusing purely on the twin fawns. The repetition underscores the permanence of his admiration.
4. The neck moves from 'Tower of David' (4:4) to 'tower of ivory' (migdal ha-shen) — smooth, pale, and precious. Her eyes are berechot be-Cheshbon ('pools in Heshbon') — the still, deep pools near an ancient Transjordanian city. Her nose is ka-migdal ha-Levanon ('like the tower of Lebanon facing Damascus') — a watchtower on the heights, commanding and dignified.
5. Her head is like Carmel — the great headland jutting into the Mediterranean, majestic and commanding. Her flowing hair (dallat roshekh) is like argaman ('purple') — the royal color. Then the astonishing conclusion: melekh asur ba-rehatim ('a king is captured/bound in the tresses'). Her hair is a trap that snares kings. His whole wasf concludes with his own captivity — he, the king, is a prisoner of her beauty.
6. Mah yafit u-mah na'amt ('how beautiful you are and how pleasant') — the superlatives overflow. Ahavah ba-ta'anugot ('love among delights/pleasures') addresses her not by name but as ahavah itself — she IS love, embodied.
7. Qomatekh damtah le-tamar ('your height is like a palm tree') — the date palm is tall, straight, graceful, and fruitful. Her breasts are now compared to eshkolot ('clusters') — date clusters or grape clusters hanging from the palm. The shift from fawns to fruit clusters prepares for his intention in the next verse.
8. Amarti e'eleh ve-tamar ('I said, I will climb the palm tree') — he will ascend her body as one climbs a date palm to harvest fruit. Ochazah be-sansinnay ('I will seize its branches/fronds') — achaz ('to seize') is the same verb the woman used in 3:4 when she seized her beloved. Now he seizes her. The climbing and grasping are explicitly sexual.
9. Ve-chikkekh ke-yen ha-tov ('and your palate/mouth like the best wine') — her kisses intoxicate like the choicest vintage. The wine 'goes for my beloved smoothly' (holekh le-dodi le-mesharim) — the woman takes over mid-verse, speaking of 'my beloved.' The final image — dovev sifey yeshenim ('causing the lips of sleepers to murmur') — suggests wine so potent it makes even sleeping people speak, or kisses that penetrate even sleep.
10. The teshuqah wordplay with Genesis 3:16 is almost certainly deliberate. The Song presents itself as Eden restored — a garden where desire operates without shame, domination, or curse. His desire is upon her as gravity is upon the earth: natural, constant, joyful.
11. She takes the initiative: lekha dodi ('come, my beloved'). She invites him out of the city, into the sadeh ('field, countryside'). Nalinah ba-kefarim can mean 'let us lodge in the villages' or 'let us spend the night among the henna blossoms' (kofer/kefer). The henna reading connects to 1:14 and the Song's fragrance imagery.
12. The vineyard inspection from 6:11 returns, but now with an explicit purpose: sham etten et doday lakh ('there I will give you my lovemaking'). The vineyard that was 'mine' in 1:6 — the one she had not tended — is now the site of deliberate, chosen lovegiving. She will give him her dodim in the place where love and nature merge.

13. Duda'im ('mandrakes') are an aphrodisiac plant with a long history in love magic (Genesis 30:14-16). Their fragrance announces sexual readiness. At 'our doors' (petachenu) — the shared threshold — are kol megadim ('all choice fruits'), both new and old. She has been saving pleasures for him: chadashim gam yeshanim ('new and also old') — fresh experiences and familiar delights.
14. Mi yitenkha ke-ach li ('who would make you like a brother to me') — she wishes for the social freedom that siblings enjoy. In the ancient Near East, a sister could kiss her brother publicly without scandal. She wants to express her love openly, without social punishment. The verse exposes the constraint she lives under: their love, though right and mutual, is judged by the world outside.

Summary: The final chapter of the Song gathers its themes into a crescendo. The woman brings her beloved to her mother's house for instruction in love. The adjuration refrain sounds for the last time. Then comes the poem's theological summit: 'Set me as a seal upon your heart, for love is as strong as death, jealousy as fierce as the grave; its flames are the very flame of Yah. Many waters cannot quench love, nor rivers sweep it away.' The chapter closes with the brothers' speech about their little sister, the woman's assertion of sovereignty over her own vineyard, and a final exchange of longing between the lovers.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 6-7 contain what many scholars regard as the only direct theological statement in the Song of Songs. The word shalhevet-yah ('flame of Yah') is the sole occurrence of a divine name in the entire poem — and even this is debated, since the -yah suffix could be an intensifier ('a mighty flame') rather than a theophoric element ('the LORD's own flame'). Either reading is staggering: love is either identified with God's own fire or described as the most intense force in creation. The declaration that many waters cannot quench love echoes the primordial chaos-waters of Genesis 1 and the flood of Genesis 6-9 — love survives what destroys the world. The final vineyard scene (verses 11-12) brings the poem full circle: in 1:6 the woman lamented that her brothers made her tend their vineyards while her own went untended. Now she declares: 'My vineyard, which is mine, is before me.' She has reclaimed what was taken.

Translation Friction: The identity of the speakers in verses 8-9 is debated. 'Brothers' discuss their 'little sister' — but are these the same brothers from 1:6 who punished her? Are they protective or controlling? The woman's response in verse 10 ('I am a wall, and my breasts like towers') is either an assertion of sexual maturity or a claim of chaste inaccessibility. The vineyard parable in verses 11-12 introduces Solomon by name, but the woman's point seems to subvert his wealth: Solomon can keep his thousand silver pieces; she owns her own vineyard and gives it to whom she chooses.

Connections: The adjuration refrain (verse 4) appears for the third and final time (cf. 2:7, 3:5), forming a structural spine for the poem. The vineyard metaphor (verses 11-12) recalls 1:6. 'Love is strong as death' (verse 6) resonates with the covenant language of Deuteronomy and the prophetic marriage metaphors of Hosea. The 'seal upon your heart' connects to the signet ring imagery of Haggai 2:23 and Jeremiah 22:24, where the seal represents irrevocable personal identity. The mother's house (verse 2) echoes 3:4. The final call — 'Flee, my beloved' — returns to the gazelle imagery of 2:9, 2:17, bringing the poem to a circular close.

1If only you were like a brother to me,
one who nursed at my mother's breasts!
If I found you outside I would kiss you,
and no one would despise me.

2I would lead you, I would bring you to my mother's house — she who taught me.
I would give you spiced wine to drink,
the juice of my pomegranate.

³His left hand is under my head,
and his right hand embraces me.

⁴I adjure you, O Daughters of Jerusalem —
do not stir up, do not awaken love
until it pleases.

⁵Who is this coming up from the wilderness, leaning on her beloved?
Under the apple tree I awakened you.
There your mother labored with you,
there she who bore you labored.

⁶Set me as a seal upon your heart,
as a seal upon your arm —
for love is as fierce as death, passion as relentless as the grave.
Its flames are flames of fire,
the very blaze of Yah.

⁷Many waters cannot quench love,
nor can rivers sweep it away.
If a man offered all the wealth of his house for love,
he would be utterly scorned.

⁸We have a little sister who has no breasts yet.
What shall we do for our sister on the day she is spoken for?

⁹If she is a wall,
we will build upon her a battlement of silver.
If she is a door,
we will barricade her with planks of cedar.

¹⁰I am a wall,
and my breasts are like towers.
So in his eyes I have become one who brings peace.

¹¹Solomon had a vineyard at Baal-hamon.
He entrusted the vineyard to keepers;
each was to bring for its fruit
a thousand pieces of silver.

¹²My vineyard, which is mine, is before me.
The thousand are yours, Solomon, and two hundred for those who tend its fruit.

¹³You who dwell in the gardens, companions are listening for your voice — let me hear it!

¹⁴Flee, my beloved!
 Be like a gazelle
 or a young stag
 upon the mountains of spices.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Mi yitenkha ke-ach li ('who would make you like a brother to me') — she wishes for the social freedom that siblings enjoy. In the ancient Near East, a sister could kiss her brother publicly without scandal. She wants to express her love openly, without social punishment. The verse exposes the constraint she lives under: their love, though right and mutual, faces a hostile world.
2. Bet immi ('my mother's house') returns from 3:4 — the matrilineal space of female sexual knowledge. Telammedeni ('she who taught me') — the mother instructs the daughter in the arts of love. She will give him yayin ha-reqach ('spiced wine') and asis rimmoni ('the juice of my pomegranate'). The pomegranate is HER pomegranate — her body's offering. The spiced wine and fruit juice are erotic hospitality: she will intoxicate him with herself.
3. This verse repeats 2:6 exactly — the intimate embrace that frames the Song. The repetition creates an inclusio: the same posture of lovemaking that appeared early in the poem returns near its end. The lovers' bodies are intertwined in the same way, confirming that their love has not diminished but deepened.
4. The third and final occurrence of the adjuration refrain (cf. 2:7, 3:5). This time the oath formula ('by the gazelles and the does') is omitted — the charge is issued without the animal oath, as if by now the Daughters know the weight of the words. The refrain's final appearance seals the poem's wisdom: love has its own timing, and to force it is to destroy it.
5. Mi zot olah min ha-midbar ('who is this coming up from the wilderness?') echoes 3:6 but now she comes leaning on her beloved — mitrapeqet (from rafaq, 'to lean, to support oneself'), a posture of intimate dependence. The apple tree (tappuach) returns from 2:3 — under the same tree where she first sat in his shade, she now awakens him. The location is also where his mother gave birth: love and birth share the same sacred ground.
6. The four key terms in this verse — ahavah, mavet, qin'ah, shalhevet-yah — form the theological core of the entire Song. Love is placed alongside death and Sheol as a cosmic force. Its fire carries the divine name.
6. The seal (chotam) imagery connects to Haggai 2:23, where God makes Zerubbabel 'like a signet ring' — a sign of irrevocable choice. She asks to be his signet: chosen, irreplaceable, authoritative.
7. Mayim rabbim ('many waters') are the primordial chaos-waters — the tehom of Genesis 1:2, the flood-waters of Genesis 6-9, the sea that God subdued at creation. These cosmic forces cannot extinguish love's flame. Neharot lo yishtefuha ('rivers cannot sweep it away') — even the mightiest currents are powerless against love.
7. The second half shifts from cosmic to economic: if a man offered all the substance of his house (kol hon beto) for love, boz yavuzu lo ('they would utterly despise him'). Love cannot be purchased. It is not a commodity. The wealthiest man cannot buy what the poorest lover freely gives. This is the Song's final wisdom statement: love transcends death, water, and wealth.
8. The brothers speak — likely the same brothers from 1:6 who controlled the woman's labor. They discuss their 'little sister' (achot lanu qetannah) who has not yet reached puberty (shadayim en lah, 'she has no breasts'). Their question — mah na'aseh la-achotenu ('what shall we do for our sister') — reveals their assumption of authority over her sexuality. They will decide what happens to her body. The woman in the next verses will reject this authority entirely.
9. The brothers propose two scenarios. If she is a chomah ('wall') — sexually inaccessible, chaste — they will reward her with a silver battlement (tirat kesef), adorning and elevating her. If she is a delet ('door') — sexually accessible, open — they will barricade her with cedar planks (luach erez), closing her off. Either way, they control the outcome. The wall/door metaphor reduces her to architecture they can modify.
10. The woman responds with devastating authority. Ani chomah ('I am a wall') — she claims the identity the brothers proposed, but on her own terms. Ve-shaday ka-migdalot ('and my breasts are like towers') — she is no longer the 'little sister' without breasts. She is fully mature, fortified, and powerful. Az hayiti ve-enav ke-motse'et shalom ('then in his eyes I became one who finds/brings peace') — shalom ('peace, wholeness, completion') echoes both Shelomoh (Solomon) and Shulammit. She has found peace — not through her brothers' control but through her own agency and her beloved's recognition.
11. The vineyard parable begins. Solomon's vineyard at Ba'al Hamon ('lord of abundance' or 'possessor of a multitude') is leased to tenants (notrim, 'keepers' — the same word used of her vineyard-keeping in 1:6). Each tenant owes a thousand pieces of silver for its produce. The vineyard is vast, commercial, operated through intermediaries. Solomon never tends it himself — he owns it from a distance.

12. The vineyard metaphor completes its arc. In 1:6: 'my own vineyard I have not kept' — lament. In 8:12: 'my vineyard, which is mine, is before me' — triumph. Between these two statements lies the entire Song: the journey from controlled labor to free love, from others' vineyards to her own.
13. The man speaks: ha-yoshevet ba-gannim ('you who dwell in the gardens') — she lives in the garden that IS her. Chaverim maqshivim le-qolekh ('companions are listening for your voice') — others also want to hear her. But his request is personal and urgent: hashmi'ini ('let ME hear it!'). After all the seeking, finding, losing, and praising, his final desire is simply to hear her voice — the same request he made in 2:14. Love ends where it began: with longing for the beloved's presence.
14. The Song's final word belongs to the woman. Berach dodi ('flee, my beloved') — the verb barach can mean 'flee' or 'hurry.' She urges him to come quickly, like a gazelle or young stag, to the hare vesamim ('mountains of spices') — her fragrant body, the landscape of their love. The poem does not end with arrival but with invitation. Love is perpetual motion — always calling, always running, always seeking the next encounter. The Song closes not with consummation but with desire still in flight. The last sound is her voice, calling him onward.

Summary: *Isaiah chapter 1 opens the entire prophetic book with a covenant lawsuit (Hebrew riv) against Judah and Jerusalem. God summons heaven and earth as witnesses, indicts Israel as rebellious children who have abandoned the LORD, describes the nation as bruised and wounded from head to foot, and declares their sacrificial worship repulsive because it is unaccompanied by justice. The chapter closes with a choice — repentance leading to restoration, or continued rebellion leading to destruction — and a promise that Zion will ultimately be redeemed through justice and righteousness.*

What Makes This Remarkable: *The chapter functions as a miniature of the entire book of Isaiah: accusation, judgment, and eventual redemption all compressed into 31 verses. The opening summons to heaven and earth (1:2) echoes Deuteronomy 32:1, casting God as plaintiff in a formal covenant lawsuit. The metaphor of a diseased body (1:5-6) is one of the most vivid images in the prophets — not a single healthy spot remains. The agricultural imagery in 1:3 is devastating: an ox and a donkey recognize their owner, but Israel does not recognize the LORD. The Hebrew wordplay between tsedaqah ('righteousness') and tsedeq ('justice') in 1:21-27 frames the entire theology of Isaiah's message: the city that was once full of justice will be restored through justice. We rendered the sacrificial terms precisely because the indictment is not against sacrifice itself but against the disconnect between ritual and ethics.*

Translation Friction: *The sheer density of legal, agricultural, and cultic vocabulary in a single chapter forced several difficult decisions. We rendered mishpat as 'justice' throughout rather than alternating with 'judgment' to maintain the consistent theme that God's demand is social justice. The phrase qirya ne'emanah ('faithful city') in 1:21 presented a choice between 'faithful city' and 'trustworthy city' — we chose 'faithful' because the betrayal language (turned harlot) requires the covenant-loyalty connotation. The verb pasha ('rebel, transgress') in 1:2 we rendered as 'rebelled against me' rather than 'transgressed' to capture the personal nature of the covenant breach. The phrase 'Mighty One of Israel' for avir Yisra'el (1:24) is a distinct divine title from 'the Holy One of Israel' and we preserved this distinction.*

Connections: The heaven-and-earth summons connects to Deuteronomy 30:19 and 32:1 where Moses calls the same witnesses. The diseased-body metaphor reappears in Isaiah 53:4-5 applied to the Suffering Servant. The vineyard language in 1:8 anticipates the full vineyard parable in Isaiah 5:1-7. The refining imagery in 1:25 connects forward to Malachi 3:2-3. The phrase 'scarlet/crimson' becoming 'white as snow' (1:18) becomes one of the most widely quoted images in all of Scripture and connects conceptually to Psalm 51:7. The indictment of empty worship anticipates Amos 5:21-24 and Micah 6:6-8.

¹The vision of Isaiah son of Amoz, which he saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem in the days of Uzziah, Jotham, Ahaz, and Hezekiah — kings of Judah.

²Hear, O heavens, and give ear, O earth,
for the LORD has spoken:
"Children I raised and brought up,
but they have rebelled against me.

³An ox knows its owner, and a donkey its master's feeding trough —
but Israel does not know, my people do not understand."

⁴Woe, sinful nation, people weighed down with iniquity,
offspring of evildoers, children who deal corruptly!
They have abandoned the LORD,
they have despised the Holy One of Israel,
they have turned their backs.

⁵Why do you keep inviting more blows?
Why do you continue to rebel?
The whole head is diseased,
and the whole heart is faint.

⁶From the sole of the foot to the head,
there is no soundness in it — only wounds, welts, and raw, open sores.
They have not been pressed out,
nor bandaged,
nor softened with oil.

⁷Your land is desolate,
your cities burned with fire.
Your soil — right before your eyes, foreigners devour it,
and it lies desolate, as overthrown by invaders.

like a shelter in a vineyard, like a hut in a cucumber field,
like a city under siege.

⁹If the LORD of Hosts had not left us a few survivors,
we would have become like Sodom,
we would have resembled Gomorrah.

¹⁰Hear the word of the LORD, you rulers of Sodom!
Give ear to the instruction of our God, you people of Gomorrah!

¹¹"What are your many sacrifices to me?"
says the LORD.

"I have had enough of burnt offerings of rams and the fat of fattened cattle.
In the blood of bulls, lambs, and goats
I take no pleasure.

¹²When you come to appear before me, who asked this of you —
this trampling of my courts?

¹³Stop bringing worthless grain offerings!
Incense — it is an abomination to me.
New moons, Sabbaths, the calling of assemblies —
I cannot endure wickedness alongside sacred gathering.

¹⁴Your new moons and your appointed festivals —
my soul hates them.
They have become a burden to me;
I am weary of bearing them.

¹⁵When you spread out your hands in prayer,
I will hide my eyes from you.
Even when you multiply your prayers,
I am not listening — your hands are full of blood.

¹⁶Wash yourselves, make yourselves clean!
Remove the evil of your deeds from before my eyes.
Stop doing evil!

¹⁷Learn to do good.
Pursue justice,
set right the oppressor,
defend the orphan,
plead the cause of the widow.

¹⁸"Come now, let us settle this,"
says the LORD.
"Though your sins are like scarlet,
they will become white as snow.
Though they are red as crimson,
they will become like wool.

¹⁹If you are willing and obey,
you will eat the good of the land.

²⁰But if you refuse and rebel,
you will be devoured by the sword" —
for the mouth of the LORD has spoken.

²¹How the faithful city has become a prostitute!
She was once full of justice; righteousness lodged in her —
but now, murderers.

²²Your silver has become dross,
your wine diluted with water.

²³Your rulers are rebels, companions of thieves.
Every one of them loves a bribe and chases after payoffs.
They do not defend the orphan,
and the widow's case never reaches them.

²⁴Therefore — declares the Lord,
the LORD of Hosts,
the Mighty One of Israel —
"I will get relief from my adversaries and avenge myself on my enemies.

²⁵I will turn my hand against you and smelt away your dross as with lye, and remove all your impurities.

²⁶I will restore your judges as at the first and your counselors as at the beginning.
After that you will be called
'The City of Righteousness,'
'The Faithful City.'"

²⁷Zion will be redeemed through justice, and her repentant ones through righteousness.

²⁸But rebels and sinners will be shattered together, and those who abandon the LORD will perish.

²⁹For they will be ashamed of the sacred oaks
you desired,
and you will be humiliated
by the gardens you chose.

30For you will be like an oak whose leaves wither,
and like a garden with no water.

31The strong man will become tinder, and his work a spark —
they will both burn together, and no one will quench them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription spans roughly 740–686 BCE, covering four kings and at least five decades of prophetic activity. The verb chazah ('he saw') is the visionary cognate of the noun chazon — Isaiah did not merely hear a message but perceived a revealed reality. The four kings listed anchor the book historically across the Assyrian crisis period.
2. The summons to heaven and earth as witnesses invokes the covenant-lawsuit (riv) genre familiar from Deuteronomy 32:1. The verb pasha ('rebel') carries the specific connotation of breaking a treaty or covenant relationship — it is political and personal, not merely moral. The word order in Hebrew places 'children' (banim) first for emphasis: the indictment begins with the intimate family relationship that Israel has violated.
3. The comparison is intentionally humiliating: even the least intelligent domesticated animals recognize who feeds them, but Israel cannot recognize the LORD. The word evus ('feeding trough, manger') emphasizes provision — the donkey knows where its food comes from. The verb hitbonen ('consider, discern') implies intellectual failure: Israel has not reflected on the most basic facts of its existence.
4. The interjection hoi ('Woe!') opens a formal prophetic denunciation. Four parallel descriptions cascade in escalating intensity: sinful nation, guilt-laden people, offspring of evildoers, corrupt children. The verb ni'atsu ('they despised, spurned') is extremely strong — it means to treat with contempt, to consider worthless. The phrase nazoru achor ('turned backward') is the opposite of following the LORD.
5. The rhetorical question implies that further punishment is pointless because Israel simply adds rebellion to rebellion. The body-politic metaphor begins here: the nation is personified as a single body, sick from head to heart. The word sarah ('turning aside, rebellion') captures persistent deviation from the covenant path.
6. The medical imagery is graphic and precise: petsa ('wound'), chabbura ('bruise, welt'), and makkah teriyah ('fresh, raw wound'). The three untreated conditions — not pressed out (to drain), not bandaged, not softened with oil — indicate total neglect. This verse establishes that the nation's condition is not a minor ailment but a full-body collapse with no attempt at treatment.
7. The shift from metaphor (diseased body) to literal description (burned cities, foreign occupation) is abrupt and powerful. The word shemamah ('desolation') appears twice, framing the verse. The phrase le-negdekem ('before your eyes, in your presence') intensifies the humiliation — Israel watches helplessly as foreigners consume their inheritance. Some scholars read mahpekhat zarim as 'overthrow like that of Sodom' (comparing to mahpekhhah in Genesis 19:29), though the plain sense is devastation by foreign invaders.
8. The sukkah ('shelter, booth') and melunah ('hut, lodge') are temporary structures erected during harvest and abandoned afterward — fragile, isolated, and soon to collapse. The vineyard imagery here anticipates the vineyard song of chapter 5. The phrase 'ir netsurah ('besieged city') shifts from agricultural loneliness to military crisis. Daughter Zion stands alone in a stripped landscape.
9. The introduction of the Sodom/Gomorrah comparison here prepares for the direct address in verse 10. The word sarid ('survivor, remnant') introduces the remnant theology that becomes central to Isaiah's message. The divine title YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts') emphasizes God's sovereign command over all powers. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 9:29 as evidence of God's preserving grace.
10. The shock of directly addressing Jerusalem's leaders as 'rulers of Sodom' and 'people of Gomorrah' cannot be overstated — Sodom was the archetype of total destruction under divine judgment. The parallel structure (hear/give ear, word of the LORD/instruction of our God, Sodom/Gomorrah) is classic Hebrew poetry. The word qetsinim ('rulers, commanders') is a relatively rare term for leaders, perhaps chosen to avoid the more neutral melakhim ('kings').
11. God speaks in the first person, creating a direct confrontation between deity and worshipper. The verb sava'ti ('I am sated, I have had enough') uses the language of eating to excess — God is depicted as gorged and disgusted with the sacrificial meals. The catalogue of sacrificial animals (rams, cattle, bulls, lambs, goats) represents the full range of Israelite sacrifice. The indictment is not against sacrifice per se but against sacrifice divorced from ethical obedience.
12. The verb remos ('to trample') reframes worship attendance as desecration — the worshippers are not entering God's courts reverently but stomping through them. The phrase lera'ot panay ('to appear before my face') is the standard expression for Temple pilgrimage, but here it is stripped of its expected positive connotation. God does not merely reject the offerings; he questions whether he ever requested this kind of worship at all.
13. The minchah ('grain offering') is called shav ('worthless, empty, vain'). The word to'evah ('abomination') is the strongest term of revulsion in Hebrew — normally reserved for the most offensive practices of pagan worship, now applied to Israel's own incense. The final phrase is the theological center: God cannot tolerate the combination of aven ('wickedness, iniquity') with atsarah ('solemn assembly'). The problem is not worship itself but the coexistence of ritual piety and moral corruption.

14. The verb sane'ah ('hate') is applied to the very festivals God himself instituted in the Torah. The anthropomorphic language — 'my soul hates,' 'I am weary' — conveys emotional exhaustion. The word torach ('burden, trouble') depicts Israel's worship as a weight God must carry rather than a delight he receives. The word mo'adim ('appointed times, festivals') refers to the entire liturgical calendar prescribed in Leviticus 23.
15. The gesture of spreading hands (paras kappayim) was the standard Israelite prayer posture — hands open, palms upward. God responds by hiding his eyes, a devastating reversal of the priestly blessing where God's face shines upon his people (Numbers 6:25). The final clause delivers the reason with brutal conciseness: the hands lifted in prayer are the same hands dripping with blood. The word damim ('bloods,' plural) suggests not a single act of violence but systemic bloodshed.
16. A rapid series of imperatives shifts from accusation to demand. The washing language (rachatsu, hizzakku) draws on both ritual purification and moral cleansing. The progression moves from external (wash) to internal (stop doing evil). These are not ritual instructions but ethical demands — the 'washing' God wants is behavioral change, not ceremonial bathing.
17. The verb dirshu ('seek, pursue') combined with mishpat ('justice') makes justice an active pursuit, not a passive quality. The word chamots is debated — it may mean 'the oppressed' (one who is crushed) or 'the oppressor' (one who acts violently). We rendered 'set right the oppressor' following the reading that demands restraining wrongdoers. The orphan (yatom) and widow (almanah) are the paradigmatic vulnerable persons in ancient Israelite law.
18. The verb nivvakhechah ('let us reason together, argue our case') is legal language — God invites Israel to a courtroom negotiation. The color imagery is vivid: shanim ('scarlet') was a deep, permanent dye extracted from an insect, and tola ('crimson') was similarly indelible. The promise that such permanent stains can become white as snow is a declaration of radical grace. This verse is conditional — the context of verses 19–20 makes clear that the cleansing depends on willingness to obey.
19. The condition is twofold: willingness (inner disposition) and obedience (outward action). The promise echoes Deuteronomy's land-blessing language — the covenant is still operative, and its blessings are still available. The brevity of this verse after the extended indictment makes the offer of grace startlingly simple.
20. The wordplay between to'khelu ('you will eat,' v. 19) and te'ukhlu ('you will be eaten/devoured,' v. 20) creates a devastating reversal: those who obey eat the land's goodness; those who rebel are eaten by the sword. The closing formula 'the mouth of the LORD has spoken' (pi YHWH dibber) seals the declaration as irrevocable divine speech. The choice between eating and being eaten encapsulates the covenant's two-way structure.
21. The lament formula eikhah ('how!') is the same word that opens the book of Lamentations — a cry of stunned grief. The image of a faithful wife turned prostitute is covenant-betrayal language (compare Hosea 1–3, Ezekiel 16). The word ne'emanah ('faithful, trustworthy') shares its root with 'amen' and implies covenant reliability. The final word — meratsechim ('murderers') — lands like a hammer blow after the elevated language of justice and righteousness.
22. Two metaphors of debasement: silver refined into worthless slag, and wine watered down. Both images convey the loss of essential quality. The silver metaphor anticipates the refining language in 1:25. In the ancient economy, debased silver and diluted wine were forms of commercial fraud — connecting the imagery to the justice theme.
23. The wordplay sarayikh sorerim ('your rulers are rebels') is a devastating sound-play in Hebrew — the words for 'ruler' and 'rebel' are nearly identical. The phrase 'companions of thieves' indicates systemic corruption, not individual bad actors. The bribe-taking (shochad) and payoff-chasing (shalmonim) describe a judicial system captured by the wealthy. The orphan and widow from verse 17 reappear — the very people God commanded them to protect are excluded from justice.
24. Three divine titles pile up to convey the weight of what follows: ha-Adon ('the Lord, the Sovereign'), YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts'), Avir Yisra'el ('the Mighty One of Israel'). The shocking element is that God's adversaries and enemies are his own people — the ones he raised as children (v. 2). The verb ennachem ('I will relieve myself, get comfort') suggests that punishing the corrupt is a form of divine relief from an intolerable situation.
25. The refining metaphor reverses the debasement of verse 22: the silver that has become dross will be smelted clean. The word bor ('lye, alkali') is a refining agent — God's judgment is not destruction for its own sake but purification. The word bedilayikh ('your tin, your alloy') refers to base metals mixed into the silver. This is restorative judgment: the goal is to recover the pure metal, not to discard it.
26. The promise reverses the accusation of verse 21 point by point: the city that became a prostitute will again be called 'faithful' (ne'emanah); the city emptied of justice will be renamed 'City of Righteousness' (ir ha-tsedek). The restoration of judges and counselors means that justice will flow from reformed leadership. The phrase 'as at the first' and 'as at the beginning' points back to an idealized Davidic-Solomonic era when justice was administered properly.
27. This is one of the most theologically dense verses in Isaiah. The verb tippadeh ('she will be redeemed') uses redemption language — the same root (p-d-h) used for the redemption of the firstborn and the exodus from Egypt. But the instruments of redemption are mishpat ('justice') and tsedaqah ('righteousness'), not military power or cultic ritual. The word shaveyha is debated: it could mean 'her returnees' (those who repent and return) or 'her captives' (those carried away). We chose 'her repentant ones' to emphasize the volitional return.
28. The word shever ('breaking, shattering, destruction') is violent and final. The verse pairs posh'im ('rebels,' from the same root as v. 2) with chatta'im ('sinners') — willful covenant-breakers and habitual wrongdoers alike face the same end. The verb yikhlu ('they will be consumed, come to an end') indicates total destruction. This is the dark counterpart to verse 27's redemption promise.

29. The 'oaks' (elim) and 'gardens' (gannot) refer to sites of pagan worship — sacred trees and cultic gardens where fertility rites were performed. The verbs yevoshu ('be ashamed') and tachperu ('be humiliated, disgraced') describe the coming exposure of these practices. The shift from third person ('they') to second person ('you') is characteristic of prophetic poetry, drawing the audience directly into the accusation.
30. The ironic reversal is complete: those who worshipped among sacred oaks will themselves become withered oaks; those who chose pagan gardens will become waterless gardens. The objects of false worship become images of the worshippers' own ruin. The verb novelet ('withering, fading') depicts slow, irreversible decay.
31. The final verse delivers an image of self-destruction: the strong man (chason) and his work (po'alo) — likely referring to the idol and its maker — ignite each other. The ne'oret ('tow, oakum') is the waste fiber from flax processing, extremely flammable. The idol-maker and the idol become fuel for the same fire. The phrase ve'ein mekhabeah ('and no one quenching') means the destruction is irreversible — there is no fire brigade for divine judgment.

Summary: Isaiah 2 opens with the stunning eschatological vision of the mountain of the LORD's house exalted above all mountains, with nations streaming to it for instruction and the famous oracle of swords beaten into plowshares. The chapter then pivots sharply to the Day of the LORD — a day of terrifying judgment against everything exalted by human pride, when people will flee into caves to hide from the splendor of the LORD's majesty.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter contains one of the most recognized passages in all of Scripture: the swords-into-plowshares oracle (2:2-4), which also appears with minor variations in Micah 4:1-3, raising the question of which prophet originated it or whether both drew from a common liturgical source. The structural contrast is extraordinary — the chapter moves from the highest hope (all nations learning peace) to the most devastating judgment (humanity hiding in rock clefts). The sevenfold repetition of proud and lofty things that will be brought low (2:12-16) creates a catalogue of human achievement that God finds intolerable when it displaces him. The Hebrew wordplay between nasa ('exalted') applied to the mountain of the LORD and nasa applied to human pride creates a theological contrast: only what God exalts remains exalted. We rendered the Day of the LORD language with consistent intensity, preserving the terror that this phrase carried for Isaiah's audience — it was not a day of national victory but of divine confrontation with all human pretension.

Translation Friction: The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days,' 2:2) resisted easy rendering. 'In the last days' implies strict eschatology; 'in days to come' is too vague. We chose 'in the days to come' as a compromise that preserves the forward-looking orientation without forcing a specific eschatological timeline. The verb naharu ('stream, flow') in 2:2 literally means to flow like a river — we rendered 'stream' to preserve the water imagery of nations flowing uphill to a mountain, a deliberately impossible image conveying supernatural attraction. The repeated refrain about entering rocks and caves (2:10, 19, 21) required consistent language to mark it as a structural device. The word elim ('worthless things, idols') in 2:8, 18, 20 is a contemptuous diminutive — we rendered it 'worthless idols' to capture both the reference and the mockery.

Connections: The swords-into-plowshares oracle parallels Micah 4:1-3 almost verbatim. Joel 3:10 reverses the image: 'Beat your plowshares into swords.' The Day of the LORD theme connects to Amos 5:18-20 (the earliest prophetic use), Zephaniah 1:14-18, and Joel 2:1-11. The cave-hiding imagery reappears in Revelation 6:15-17 where kings and generals hide from the Lamb's wrath. The exaltation of the LORD's mountain connects forward to Isaiah 11:9 ('the earth will be full of the knowledge of the LORD') and Isaiah 25:6-8 (the feast on the mountain).

¹The word that Isaiah son of Amoz saw concerning Judah and Jerusalem:

²In the days to come,
the mountain of the LORD's house will be established as the highest of the mountains, raised above the hills —
and all the nations will stream to it.

³Many peoples will go and say,
"Come, let us go up to the mountain of the LORD,
to the house of the God of Jacob,
that he may teach us his ways and we may walk in his paths."
For instruction will go out from Zion, and the word of the LORD from Jerusalem.

⁴He will judge between the nations and arbitrate for many peoples.
They will beat their swords into plowshares and their spears into pruning hooks.
Nation will not lift up sword against nation,
and they will no longer learn war.

⁵O house of Jacob,
come — let us walk in the light of the LORD!

⁶For you have abandoned your people, the house of Jacob, because they are filled with practices from the east and practice divination like the Philistines, and they clasp hands with foreigners.

⁷His land is filled with silver and gold,
and there is no end to his treasures.
His land is filled with horses,
and there is no end to his chariots.

⁸His land is filled with worthless idols;
they bow down to the work of their hands,
to what their fingers have made.

⁹So humanity is brought low, and each person is humbled —
do not forgive them!

¹⁰Enter the rock and hide in the dust
from the terror of the LORD
and from the splendor of his majesty!

¹¹The haughty eyes of humanity will be brought low,
and the pride of mortals will be humbled.
The LORD alone will be exalted on that day.

¹²For the LORD of Hosts has a day against all that is proud and lofty, against all that is lifted up — it will be brought low:

¹³against all the cedars of Lebanon, tall and lofty,
and against all the oaks of Bashan;

¹⁴against all the high mountains and against all the lofty hills;

¹⁵against every high tower and against every fortified wall;

¹⁶against all the ships of Tarshish and against every beautiful vessel.

¹⁷The pride of humanity will be brought down,
and the arrogance of mortals will be humbled.
The LORD alone will be exalted on that day.

¹⁸And the worthless idols will vanish entirely.

¹⁹They will enter the caves of the rocks and the holes in the ground,
from the terror of the LORD
and from the splendor of his majesty,
when he rises to terrify the earth.

²⁰On that day, people will throw away their silver idols and their gold idols — which they made for themselves to worship — to the moles and the bats.

²¹to enter the crevices of the rocks and the clefts of the crags,
from the terror of the LORD
and from the splendor of his majesty,
when he rises to terrify the earth.

²²Stop trusting in mere mortals, who have only breath in their nostrils.
Of what account are they?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. A second superscription within the book, suggesting this section (chapters 2-4) may have circulated independently. The verb chazah ('saw') again links prophetic reception to visual perception — the word is 'seen,' not merely heard.
2. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days / in the days to come') is an eschatological time marker pointing to a future era of divine fulfillment. The mountain of the LORD's house is Mount Zion / the Temple mount. The verb nakhon ('established, firm') implies permanence and stability. The parallel in Micah 4:1 is nearly identical, suggesting a shared prophetic tradition. The verb naharu is specifically the flowing of a river or stream — nations move toward Zion like water courses.
3. The nations voluntarily ascend — they are not conquered or compelled but drawn by desire for God's instruction. The verb yorenu ('he will teach us') shares the root y-r-h with torah. We rendered torah as 'instruction' per project decision for general prophetic contexts. The parallelism between 'instruction from Zion' and 'word of the LORD from Jerusalem' equates torah with divine speech. The 'house of the God of Jacob' is the Temple, but the use of 'Jacob' rather than 'Israel' may evoke the patriarch's original encounter with God.

4. The verb shafat ('judge') here means to arbitrate disputes — God becomes the supreme court for international conflicts, making war unnecessary. The verb hokhiach ('rebuke, decide, arbitrate') reinforces the legal-arbitration function. The transformation of weapons into agricultural tools (cherev to et, chanit to mazmerah) reverses the arms economy. The final line — 'they will no longer learn war' — envisions not just the end of fighting but the end of military training and culture. Joel 3:10 famously reverses this image.
5. This transitional verse pivots from the eschatological vision to a present-tense exhortation. If the nations will one day stream to Zion for instruction, Israel should already be walking in that light. The phrase 'light of the LORD' (or YHWH) connects illumination with divine presence and guidance. The imperative creates urgency: why wait for the future when the LORD's light is available now?
6. The shift is jarring — from the glorious vision to the present reality of apostasy. God has 'abandoned' (natashta) his people because they have first abandoned him. The 'practices from the east' (miqqedem) refer to Mesopotamian divination and astrology. The verb onenim ('practicing divination, reading omens') describes forbidden occult practices (Deuteronomy 18:10). The phrase 'clasp hands with foreigners' (yaldei nakhrim yaspiku) likely refers to making alliances sealed by handshake, or possibly to the embrace of foreign customs and children born from mixed marriages.
7. The repetition of 'filled' (vatimmale) and 'no end' (ein qetseh) creates a sense of excess. The catalogue violates Deuteronomy 17:16-17, which forbids the king from multiplying horses, silver, and gold. The material prosperity is not celebrated but indicted — it represents self-reliance replacing trust in God. The horses and chariots are specifically military assets, indicating trust in military power rather than in the LORD.
8. The third 'filled' (vatimmale) completes a devastating trilogy: silver, horses, idols. The progression implies causation — material excess leads to military self-reliance, which leads to idolatry. The word elilim ('worthless things, nothings') is a contemptuous pun — it sounds like elohim ('gods') but means 'worthless, nothing.' The absurdity is underscored: they worship what their own fingers made.
9. The verbs vayyishach ('is bowed down') and vayyishpal ('is brought low') anticipate the Day of the LORD theme that will dominate the rest of the chapter. The plea 'do not forgive them' (al tissa lahem) is startling — it is either the prophet's prayer or a divine declaration that the idolatry has passed the point of pardon. The verb nasa here means 'lift up, bear, forgive' — the same root used for God 'lifting' sins away.
10. The first occurrence of the cave-hiding refrain (repeated in vv. 19, 21). The word pachad ('terror, dread') combined with hadar ge'ono ('splendor of his majesty') creates a paradox: God's beauty and God's terror are the same experience for those in rebellion. The rock and dust are not shelters — they are the only places left for those fleeing divine presence. Revelation 6:15-16 directly echoes this imagery.
11. This verse states the chapter's thesis: human exaltation and divine exaltation are mutually exclusive. The phrase 'the LORD alone' (YHWH levaddo) is emphatic — no rival, human or divine, will share the stage. The 'haughty eyes' (einei gavhut) make pride a visual metaphor — eyes that look down on others and up at self will be forced downward. The verse functions as a refrain, repeated in variant form in verse 17.
12. The 'Day of the LORD' (yom la-YHWH) is the central concept of prophetic eschatology — a future moment when God acts decisively against all opposition. Here it is directed not against foreign nations but against pride itself, wherever it is found. The three synonyms for pride (ge'eh, ram, nissa) create a cumulative effect of height that will be leveled.
13. The catalogue of proud things begins with the greatest trees of the ancient Near East. The cedars of Lebanon were the most prized timber in the region — symbols of royal power and wealth (Solomon's Temple was built of them). The oaks of Bashan (the Golan Heights region) were similarly renowned. These may function literally (deforestation as judgment) or metaphorically (great powers cut down).
14. Mountains and hills served as high places for pagan worship throughout Israel and Judah. The judgment against 'high' and 'lofty' terrain uses the same vocabulary applied to human pride in verse 12, collapsing the distinction between natural landscape and spiritual rebellion — anything that is 'high' apart from God will be brought low.
15. The catalogue shifts from nature to architecture — human constructions designed for military defense and civic pride. Towers and fortified walls represent trust in human engineering for security. The judgment implies that no fortification can withstand the Day of the LORD.
16. The 'ships of Tarshish' were the largest oceangoing vessels of the ancient world — the supertankers of antiquity, used for long-distance trade (possibly to Spain or Sardinia). The word sekhyyot (possibly 'vessels, crafts, images') is rare and debated. Some render it 'beautiful images' or 'fine craftsmanship.' We chose 'beautiful vessel' to maintain the maritime/trade context. The catalogue ends with commerce — wealth, military power, and trade are all targets of divine judgment.
17. This verse nearly repeats verse 11, forming an inclusio (literary bracket) around the catalogue of proud things (vv. 12-16). The repetition is structural — everything between the two refrains is contained within the single theological claim: the LORD alone will be exalted. The slight variation in word order between v. 11 and v. 17 is typical of Hebrew refrains.
18. The wordplay between elilim ('worthless idols') and kalil ('entirely, completely') creates a sound echo: the 'nothings' will become completely nothing. The verb yachalof ('pass away, vanish') implies that the idols do not need to be defeated — they simply cease to exist in the presence of the real God.
19. The cave-hiding refrain from verse 10 is expanded. The verb la'arots ('to terrify, cause to tremble') is applied to the entire earth — not just humanity but the physical planet shudders at God's arising. The phrase be-qumo ('when he rises') implies that God has been seated (enthroned, patient) and now stands to act. Revelation 6:15-17 draws directly on this passage.
20. The precious metals that filled the land (v. 7) and the idols made from them (v. 8) are now discarded in panic. The moles and bats are creatures of darkness and underground spaces — the idols end up in the domain of the very creatures associated with uncleanness and death. The irony is savage: objects of worship are flung into holes where blind, burrowing animals live. The phrase 'which they made for themselves' emphasizes the self-referential absurdity of idol worship.

21. The third iteration of the cave-hiding refrain intensifies the imagery — now people crawl into niqrot ('crevices, fissures') and se'ifim ('clefts, cracks') in the rock faces. Each repetition narrows the hiding place: first caves (v. 10), then holes (v. 19), now cracks in the rock (v. 21). The spaces shrink as the terror grows. The refrain 'when he rises to terrify the earth' is identical to verse 19.
22. The chapter closes with a proverb-like command that summarizes the entire argument. The word neshamah ('breath') in the nostrils is the same breath God breathed into Adam (Genesis 2:7) — humans are fragile, dependent creatures whose life hangs on a single breath. The rhetorical question 'of what account is he?' (bammeh nechshav hu) dismisses the entire catalogue of human achievement — silver, horses, towers, ships — as ultimately weightless. This verse transitions into chapter 3's detailed judgment on human leadership.

Summary: Isaiah 3 announces God's systematic removal of every pillar of Jerusalem's social order — military leaders, judges, prophets, elders, craftsmen. The resulting power vacuum produces anarchy where boys and infants rule, social hierarchy collapses, and people seize any man with a cloak and demand he become their leader. The chapter then shifts to a formal legal indictment of the elders and princes who have plundered the poor, and concludes with a devastating catalogue of the luxury items worn by the daughters of Zion, all of which will be stripped away and replaced with shame.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The chapter is a masterclass in prophetic social criticism. The list of removed leaders in verses 2-3 is the most comprehensive catalogue of Judean social roles anywhere in the Hebrew Bible — it functions as an X-ray of the power structure. The trial scene in verses 13-15 places God as both prosecutor and judge, rising to 'enter into judgment' with the elders, using the language of a formal riv (lawsuit). The luxury catalogue in verses 18-23 is the longest itemized list of women's adornments in Scripture — at least 21 items, many of which are hapax legomena (words appearing only once in the Bible) whose precise meaning we can only approximate from archaeological and cognate evidence. The rhetorical structure creates a pointed contrast: the leaders' plunder of the poor has funded the extravagant wardrobes of the elite women. We preserved the catalogue in full without abbreviation because its sheer length is part of its rhetorical force — the excess of the list mirrors the excess it describes.*

Translation Friction: *The luxury catalogue (vv. 18-23) presented the most significant translation challenge in this chapter. Many terms are hapax legomena with uncertain meanings. We relied on cognate languages (Akkadian, Aramaic, Arabic) and archaeological parallels to render each item as specifically as possible, noting uncertainty in translator notes. The word qesem ('divination') in the removed-leaders list (v. 2) was difficult — it appears in a list of otherwise legitimate roles, raising the question of whether Isaiah is describing actual Judean practice or using the term loosely for 'one who gives counsel.' We rendered it straightforwardly and noted the tension. The indictment of the 'daughters of Zion' (vv. 16-24) required care: the prophetic critique targets luxury funded by injustice, not femininity itself — we ensured our notes clarify that the judgment is economic and ethical, not gendered.*

Connections: The removal of leaders connects to 2 Kings 24:14-16 where Nebuchadnezzar literally deports Jerusalem's skilled population. The trial-of-the-elders scene (3:13-15) parallels Micah 3:1-4 and anticipates Ezekiel 34 (shepherds who devour the flock). The vineyard imagery in 3:14 anticipates Isaiah 5's vineyard parable. The luxury-to-shame reversal (3:24) connects to Lamentations 4:1-5 where Jerusalem's elite are degraded. The phrase 'grinding the face of the poor' (3:15) has become proverbial in English, though its origin here is often unrecognized.

‡For look — the Lord, the LORD of Hosts, is removing from Jerusalem and from Judah every support and every prop:
the entire supply of bread and the entire supply of water;

²the warrior and the soldier,
the judge and the prophet,
the diviner and the elder;

³the captain of fifty, the dignitary, the counselor, the skilled craftsman,
and the expert in charms.

⁴"I will make boys their leaders, and children will rule over them.

⁵The people will oppress one another — each person against another, each against his neighbor.
The young will act insolently toward the old,
the despised toward the honored.

⁶When a man grabs his brother in his father's house:
'You have a cloak —
you be our leader!
Take charge of this heap of ruins!'

⁷On that day he will protest:
'I am no healer!
In my house there is neither bread nor cloak — do not make me leader of this people!'

⁸For Jerusalem has stumbled and Judah has fallen, because their speech and their deeds are against the LORD, defying the eyes of his glory.

⁹The expression on their faces testifies against them;
they parade their sin like Sodom — they do not hide it.
Woe to them!
For they have brought disaster on themselves.

¹⁰Tell the righteous it will go well with them,
for they will eat the fruit of their deeds.

¹¹Woe to the wicked — it will go badly!
For what their hands have done will be done to them.

¹²My people — children oppress them,
and creditors rule over them.
My people, your guides mislead you and confuse the direction of your paths.

¹³The LORD takes his stand to press charges;
he rises to judge the peoples.

¹⁴The LORD enters into judgment with the elders of his people and their princes:
"It is you who have devoured the vineyard!
The plunder of the poor is in your houses.

¹⁵What gives you the right to crush my people and grind the faces of the poor?" — declares the Lord GOD of Hosts.

¹⁶And the LORD said:
"Because the daughters of Zion are haughty and walk with outstretched necks, flirting with their eyes,
walking with dainty steps,
jingling the anklets on their feet —

¹⁷the Lord will afflict the scalps of the daughters of Zion with sores, and the LORD will lay bare their foreheads.

¹⁸On that day the Lord will strip away the finery:
the anklets, the headbands, and the crescent pendants;

¹⁹the earrings, the bracelets, and the veils;

²⁰the headdresses, the ankle chains, the sashes,
the perfume bottles, and the amulets;

²¹the signet rings and the nose rings; ²²the fine robes, the cloaks, the shawls, and the purses; ²³the mirrors, the linen garments, the turbans, and the outer veils.

²⁴And it will be:
instead of perfume — rotteness;
instead of a sash — a rope;
instead of styled hair — baldness;
instead of fine clothing — sackcloth;
branding instead of beauty.

²⁵Your men will fall by the sword, and your warriors in battle.

²⁶Her gates will lament and mourn;
she will sit on the ground, emptied out.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double divine title ha-Adon YHWH Tseva'ot ('the Lord, the LORD of Hosts') signals maximum authority. The wordplay mash'en u-mash'enah ('support and prop') uses masculine and feminine forms of the same root to mean 'every kind of support whatever.' The most basic supports — bread and water — are named first, indicating siege conditions. This verse introduces the comprehensive stripping that follows.
2. The catalogue begins with military and civil leadership. The inclusion of qosem ('diviner') in this list is surprising — divination was prohibited in Deuteronomy 18:10. Either Isaiah is describing actual Judean practice (divination existed despite the prohibition) or the term is used loosely for someone who gives guidance. The navi ('prophet') and the qosem ('diviner') are paired, perhaps contrasting legitimate and illegitimate spiritual counsel.

3. The 'captain of fifty' (sar chamishim) is a mid-level military officer. The nesu panim ('one lifted in face,' i.e., dignitary, respected person) refers to someone of social standing. The chakham charashim ('skilled craftsman') includes both artisans and possibly those skilled in secret arts. The nevon lachash ('expert in charms/whispers') may refer to a snake charmer, an enchanter, or simply one skilled in persuasive speech. The breadth of the list — from generals to charmers — means every social role that holds society together will be removed.
4. God now speaks in first person, claiming direct agency in the social collapse. The ne'arim ('boys, youths') and ta'alulim ('children, infants, capricious ones') replacing competent leaders is the ultimate sign of societal inversion. The word ta'alulim may also carry the sense of 'capricious, arbitrary' — leaders who act on whim rather than wisdom.
5. Social order collapses into mutual oppression. The verb niggas ('be oppressed, be driven') describes a society of universal exploitation. The reversal of age-based hierarchy (young over old) and status-based hierarchy (despised over honored) represents total social inversion. In ancient Israelite culture, respect for elders was foundational to communal life — its loss signals civilizational collapse.
6. The scene is grimly comic: leadership is so depleted that anyone with a decent garment is pressed into service. The simlah ('cloak, outer garment') is the minimum qualification — merely appearing to have resources. The word makhshelah ('ruin, stumbling block, heap of rubble') is what the reluctant leader is asked to govern. The desperation of the request reveals the depth of the crisis.
7. The verb yissa ('he will lift up [his voice]') introduces a formal refusal. The word chovesh ('one who binds up, healer') is the man's protest that he cannot repair what is broken. The absence of bread and cloak in his own house means he was pressed into service on false pretenses — he has nothing. The refusal to lead is itself a symptom of social collapse: no one wants responsibility for the ruins.
8. The verbs kashla ('stumble') and nafil ('fall') form a progression from staggering to collapse. The phrase lamrot einei khevodo ('to defy/rebel against the eyes of his glory') is extraordinarily bold — they sin directly in the face of God's manifest presence (kavod). The word kavod ('glory, weight, presence') is one of Isaiah's central theological terms, referring to the visible manifestation of God's reality.
9. The hakkarat peneihem ('the recognition/expression of their faces') means their guilt is written on their faces — they cannot conceal it. The Sodom comparison from 1:10 returns: like Sodom, they flaunt their sin publicly. The verb higgidu ('they declared, announced') combined with lo khichedu ('they did not conceal') creates a picture of brazen, unembarrassed wickedness. The final clause gamelu lahem ra'ah ('they dealt evil to themselves') states the self-destructive nature of sin.
10. A brief word of assurance amid the judgment: the tsaddiq ('righteous person') will experience the outcome of their choices. The agricultural metaphor (eating fruit) connects actions to consequences organically — righteousness produces life-giving results. This verse and the next create a compact wisdom saying embedded in the prophetic oracle.
11. The mirror-structure with verse 10 is precise: righteous/good versus wicked/bad, eating fruit versus receiving the work of their hands. The principle of measure-for-measure (middah ke-neged middah) underlies both verses. The gemul ('recompense, dealing') of their hands will return upon them — their own actions become their punishment.
12. The Hebrew me'olel could mean 'child' or 'gleaners/those who deal severely.' The word nashim could be 'women' or a participle from nashah ('creditors'). Given the context of economic exploitation, we rendered as 'creditors' rather than 'women' — the verse indicts economic oppressors, not gender. The me'ashrim ('those who call you blessed, guides') are false leaders who encourage the nation on a destructive path. The verb bille'u ('swallow up, confuse') means they have devoured the way forward.
13. The verbs nitsav ('takes his stand') and omed ('stands, rises') are courtroom language — the plaintiff rises to present his case. The riv ('lawsuit') connects back to 1:2 where heaven and earth were summoned as witnesses. Now the formal trial begins. The word amim ('peoples') may refer to Israel's own internal groups (tribes, classes) rather than foreign nations.
14. The elders and princes — the leadership class — are the defendants. The kerem ('vineyard') represents the people of Israel (as Isaiah 5 will make explicit). The leaders were supposed to tend the vineyard; instead they consumed it. The word gezelat ('plunder, robbery') is violent language — the poor have not merely been neglected but actively robbed, and the evidence (their stolen goods) is in the leaders' own houses.
15. The verb tedake'u ('you crush') describes physical destruction. The phrase penei aniyyim tit-chanu ('you grind the faces of the poor') is one of Isaiah's most visceral images — the poor are put through a mill, their faces ground like grain. The indictment is personal: 'my people' (ammi) — the leaders are destroying people who belong to God. The triple divine title ne'um Adonai YHWH Tseva'ot seals the verdict with maximum authority.
16. The 'daughters of Zion' (benot Tsiyon) are the elite women of Jerusalem. The description is deliberately visual: necks stretched high in pride, eyes fluttering (mesaqerot means 'deceiving, flashing, flirting'), steps deliberately dainty (tafof means 'tripping along, taking small steps'), and anklets jingling (te'akkasnah from ekhes, 'anklet'). The critique targets not women in general but the conspicuous display of wealth extracted from the poor (connecting to vv. 14-15). Their luxury is built on plunder.
17. The verb sippach ('to afflict with scabs/sores') targets the head — the very part held high in pride (v. 16). The word pathhen ('their foreheads' or 'their secret parts') is debated — it may refer to the forehead (exposed by shaving) or to nakedness. Either way, the punishment matches the crime: what was displayed in pride will be displayed in shame. The stripping of hair was a mark of captivity and humiliation in the ancient Near East.
18. The luxury catalogue begins. The akhasim ('anklets') were the jingling ornaments of verse 16. The shevissim ('headbands, sun-ornaments') and saharonim ('crescents, crescent-shaped pendants') may have had associations with sun and moon worship. Each item removed represents a layer of constructed identity peeled away. Archaeological finds from Judean sites confirm the existence of crescent-shaped jewelry in this period.

19. The netifot ('pendants, earrings') literally means 'drops' — hanging jewelry. The sherot ('bracelets, chains') were arm ornaments. The re'alot ('veils, shawls') were face coverings or flowing scarves. The rapid listing without verbs creates a breathless catalogue effect.
20. The pe'erim ('headdresses, turbans') are elaborate head wrappings. The tse'adot ('ankle chains, step-chains') connected the anklets to restrict stride length, enforcing the dainty walk. The qishurim ('sashes, bands') were decorative waist ties. The battei ha-nefesh ('houses of the soul/breath') are almost certainly perfume containers — small bottles worn at the neck holding scented oil. The lechashim ('whispered charms, amulets') were objects inscribed with incantations.
21. The tabba'ot ('rings, signet rings') were both decorative and functional — signet rings were used to seal documents and represented legal authority. The nizmei ha-af ('nose rings') were common adornment in the ancient Near East, worn in the nostril or on the septum.
22. The machalatsot ('fine garments, festal robes') were clothing reserved for special occasions. The ma'atafot ('cloaks, outer wraps') were heavy outer garments. The mitpachot ('shawls, wide garments') were large wrapping cloths. The charitim ('purses, bags') were small carriers for valuables. The catalogue moves from jewelry to clothing to accessories, covering the entire wardrobe.
23. The gilyonim ('mirrors' or 'transparent garments') is debated — either polished metal mirrors or see-through linen. The sedinim ('fine linen undergarments') were luxury fabrics. The tsenifot ('turbans, wrapped headgear') were elaborate head wrappings. The redidim ('outer veils, wide scarves') were flowing outer garments. The catalogue concludes with 21+ items, the sheer length functioning as a rhetorical indictment of excess.
24. Five reversals deliver the punishment: perfume becomes decay (maq, 'rotteness, stench'), the decorative sash becomes a prisoner's rope (niqpah), elaborate hairstyling becomes the shaved head of a captive (qarchah), rich garments become the sackcloth of mourning, and beauty (yofi) is replaced by ki ('branding, burning') — the mark seared onto slaves and prisoners. Each reversal precisely targets one of the luxuries catalogued above. The five-fold structure is complete and devastating.
25. The address shifts back to Daughter Zion personified. The metayikh ('your men') and gevuratek ('your strength, your warriors') will be destroyed in warfare — the luxury funded by injustice cannot be defended when judgment comes. The military collapse connects back to the removal of warriors in 3:2.
26. The personification reaches its climax: Zion's gates — the places of commerce, law, and social gathering — mourn as if alive. The final image is of a woman stripped of everything, sitting in the dirt. The verb niqqatah ('emptied, cleaned out, desolate') describes total depletion. The seated posture on the ground is the classic mourning position (compare Lamentations 1:1, 2:10). The chapter that began with God removing every support ends with the city sitting in the dust with nothing.

Summary: Isaiah 4 opens with the desperate aftermath of the judgment described in chapter 3: seven women seize one man, offering to provide their own food and clothing if he will only let them bear his name and remove their disgrace. The chapter then pivots dramatically to the eschatological hope of the Branch of the LORD, the cleansing of Jerusalem's bloodguilt through a spirit of judgment and burning, and the restoration of God's protective glory-presence — a cloud by day and fire by night — over Mount Zion.

What Makes This Remarkable: This short chapter executes one of the most dramatic rhetorical pivots in Isaiah: from the absolute nadir of judgment (women begging for a husband's name) to the absolute summit of hope (God's glory canopy over Zion). The 'Branch of the LORD' (tsemach YHWH) in verse 2 introduces a term that becomes a major messianic title in Jeremiah 23:5 and Zechariah 3:8, 6:12. The cloud-and-fire imagery in verse 5 deliberately echoes the Exodus pillar of cloud and fire (Exodus 13:21-22), casting the future restoration as a new Exodus. The word chuppah ('canopy') in verse 5 is the same word used for a wedding canopy, suggesting that the restored relationship between God and Zion is nuptial — God remarries the city that had become a prostitute (1:21). The phrase 'written for life' (katuv lachayyim, v. 3) anticipates the concept of the Book of Life that appears in Daniel 12:1 and Revelation 20:12. We rendered this chapter with particular attention to the Exodus typology, ensuring the cloud/fire/tabernacle language clearly evokes the wilderness period.

Translation Friction: The tsemach YHWH ('Branch of the LORD') in verse 2 required a decision about whether to render it as a messianic title or as agricultural imagery. The Hebrew allows both — tsemach literally means 'sprout, growth, what springs up.' We capitalized 'Branch' to signal its theological weight as a title while preserving the organic imagery in the notes. The phrase ruach mishpat ve-ruach ba'er ('spirit of judgment and spirit of burning,' v. 4) could mean 'a wind of judgment and a wind of burning' (natural phenomena) or 'the Spirit of judgment and the Spirit of burning' (divine action). We rendered with lowercase 'spirit' and noted the ambiguity, since the Hebrew ruach does not distinguish between wind, spirit, and Spirit.

The rare word chuppah ('canopy,' v. 5) and sukkah ('shelter,' v. 6) required notes clarifying their Exodus and festival associations.

Connections: The Branch of the LORD connects forward to Jeremiah 23:5 ('a righteous Branch'), Zechariah 3:8 and 6:12, and is widely read as messianic in both Jewish and Christian traditions. The cloud and fire echo Exodus 13:21-22 and the glory-cloud over the tabernacle in Exodus 40:34-38. The washing of Zion's blood (v. 4) connects to Ezekiel 16:9 where God washes Jerusalem. The sukkah ('shelter') in verse 6 evokes the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot) and the wilderness period. The 'Book of Life' concept in verse 3 connects to Exodus 32:32-33, Daniel 12:1, Philippians 4:3, and Revelation 20:12. The seven women of verse 1 complete the women's judgment from 3:16-4:1, creating a continuous literary unit.

¹On that day seven women will seize one man, saying,
"We will eat our own bread and wear our own clothing — just let us be called by your name.
Take away our disgrace!"

²On that day the Branch of the LORD will be beautiful and glorious, and the fruit of the land will be the pride and splendor of the survivors of Israel.

³And the one who remains in Zion and the one who is left in Jerusalem will be called holy — everyone written for life in Jerusalem.

⁴When the Lord has washed away the filth of the daughters of Zion and rinsed the bloodstains of Jerusalem from her midst by a spirit of judgment and a spirit of burning.

⁵Then the LORD will create over every site on Mount Zion and over her assemblies a cloud of smoke by day and the glow of a blazing fire by night.
For over all the glory there will be a canopy.

⁶And there will be a shelter for shade from the heat by day,
and a refuge and a hiding place from the storm and the rain.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse concludes the judgment section of chapter 3 rather than beginning a new theme. The number seven represents completeness — the male population has been so devastated (3:25) that seven women compete for one surviving man. Their offer to provide their own food and clothing waives the husband's legal obligations under Exodus 21:10, revealing extreme desperation. The cherpah ('disgrace, reproach') is the social shame of being unmarried and childless in ancient Israelite culture. The verse functions as the absolute low point before the redemptive pivot in verse 2.
2. The phrase tsemach YHWH ('Branch of the LORD') operates on two levels simultaneously: agricultural (the land's produce will again be bountiful after devastation) and messianic (a future figure will 'sprout' from the LORD). Jeremiah 23:5, 33:15, and Zechariah 3:8, 6:12 develop tsemach as a royal messianic title. The words tsevi ('beauty, ornament'), kavod ('glory'), ga'on ('pride, majesty'), and tif'eret ('splendor, glory') pile up four terms of magnificent description. The peleitat Yisra'el ('survivors, escapees of Israel') is the remnant — those who survive the judgment described in chapters 1-3.

3. The surviving remnant is described with the same word — qadosh ('holy') — used for God himself. This is a remarkable theological claim: the purified community will share God's defining attribute. The phrase katur lachayyim ('written for life') introduces the concept of a divine register of the living — a proto-Book of Life. The passive voice ('will be called') indicates that this holiness is divinely conferred, not self-achieved. The double reference to Zion and Jerusalem emphasizes the specific geographic location of the restoration.
4. The washing imagery reverses 1:15 ('your hands are full of blood') and 1:16 ('wash yourselves'). God does for Jerusalem what she could not do for herself. The tso'ah ('filth, excrement') is the strongest word for impurity — the luxury that masked corruption is now named for what it truly was. The demei Yerushalayim ('bloodstains of Jerusalem') refers to the social violence of 1:15, 21. The instruments of cleansing — ruach mishpat ('spirit/wind of justice') and ruach ba'er ('spirit/wind of burning') — combine legal and purificatory imagery. The ambiguity of ruach (wind? spirit? the Spirit?) is intentional in the Hebrew; we preserve it with lowercase 'spirit.'
5. The verb bara ('create') is the same verb used in Genesis 1:1 — God does not merely restore but creates something new over Zion. The cloud by day and fire by night directly echo the Exodus pillar (Exodus 13:21-22), casting the restoration as a new Exodus. The word makhon ('site, established place') may refer to every household or every foundation on Mount Zion — the glory-presence covers the entire community, not just the Temple. The miqra'eha ('her assemblies, her convocations') suggests that the gathered worship community is the occasion for the manifestation. The chuppah ('canopy') over all the kavod ('glory') means that God's manifest presence is both displayed and sheltered — visible but protected.
6. The sukkah ('shelter, booth') recalls the temporary structures of the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot) and the wilderness wandering shelters. In 1:8, Daughter Zion was compared to a lonely sukkah in a vineyard — now God himself provides the sukkah. The reversal is complete: what was an image of vulnerability becomes an image of divine protection. The four functions (shade from heat, refuge, hiding place from storm and rain) describe comprehensive protection from every threat. The chapter ends not with a dramatic climax but with domestic comfort — God's restored people are simply safe. This quiet ending after three chapters of escalating judgment is itself a profound theological statement: the goal of all God's work is a sheltered people at home with their God.

Summary: Isaiah sings a love song on behalf of his Beloved about a vineyard that, despite every advantage, produced only worthless fruit. God identifies the vineyard as Israel and Judah, then pronounces six woe oracles against the social sins corroding the nation — land-grabbing, drunkenness, moral inversion, self-conceit, perversion of justice, and heroism in vice. The chapter climaxes with a terrifying vision of a distant nation summoned by God's whistle to execute judgment.

What Makes This Remarkable: The vineyard song (vv. 1-7) is a masterpiece of prophetic rhetoric: Isaiah draws the audience in as sympathetic judges before springing the trap — they are the failed vineyard. Verse 7 contains one of the most celebrated wordplays in the Hebrew Bible: God looked for mishpat (justice) but found mispach (bloodshed), for tsedaqah (righteousness) but heard tse'eqah (a cry of anguish). The six woe oracles (hoy) form a devastating catalog of covenant violation. The outstretched hand refrain (v. 25, repeated from 9:12, 17, 21; 10:4) links this chapter to a larger literary unit. The final imagery of the approaching army (vv. 26-30) is among the most cinematic in prophetic literature.

Translation Friction: The central wordplay of verse 7 is untranslatable: the near-homophone pairs mishpat/mispach and tsedaqah/tse'eqah produce a devastating phonetic shock in Hebrew that no English equivalent can reproduce. We preserved the wordplay in transliteration within the notes and rendered the semantic contrast as clearly as possible. The term sorek (v. 2), a choice variety of vine, carries agricultural specificity that modern readers may miss. The woe oracles use hoy, which is simultaneously a funeral cry and a curse — 'woe' captures the judgment dimension but loses the funeral connotation.

Connections: The vineyard metaphor recurs in Isaiah 27:2-6 (the restored vineyard) and is taken up by Jesus in the Parable of the Wicked Tenants (Matt 21:33-46, Mark 12:1-12), which directly echoes Isaiah 5. The woe oracles anticipate the more extensive woe series in Isaiah 28-33. The outstretched hand refrain connects to Isaiah 9:8-10:4. Psalm 80:8-16 uses the same vine/vineyard imagery for Israel. The 'whistle for nations' motif (v. 26) reappears in Isaiah 7:18.

Let me sing for my beloved — a song of my loved one about his vineyard.
My beloved had a vineyard on a fertile hillside.

²He dug it up and cleared its stones,
and planted it with the choicest vines.
He built a watchtower in its center
and even cut out a winepress.
He waited for it to yield good grapes —
but it yielded worthless ones.

³And now, inhabitants of Jerusalem and people of Judah,
judge between me and my vineyard.

⁴What more could have been done for my vineyard that I have not already done?
Why, when I waited for good grapes,
did it yield worthless ones?

⁵And now, let me tell you what I am about to do to my vineyard:
I will remove its hedge,
and it will be devoured.
I will break down its wall,
and it will be trampled.

⁶I will make it a wasteland —
it will not be pruned or hoed, and thorns and briars will overrun it.
I will command the clouds to withhold their rain from it.

⁷For the vineyard of the LORD of Hosts is the house of Israel, and the people of Judah are the planting of his delight.
He waited for justice — but look: bloodshed!
For righteousness — but listen: a cry of anguish!

⁸Woe to those who join house to house,
who add field to field,
until there is no space left and you dwell alone in the land.

⁹In my hearing, the LORD of Hosts has declared:
"Surely many houses will become desolate, great and fine houses left without anyone living in them."

¹⁰For ten acres of vineyard will produce only one bath of wine, and a homer of seed will yield but an ephah of grain.

¹¹Woe to those who rise early in the morning
chasing strong drink, who linger late into the evening
while wine inflames them!

¹²Lyre and harp, tambourine and flute and wine fill their feasts —
but the work of the LORD they do not regard,
and the deeds of his hands they do not see.

¹³Therefore my people go into exile for lack of understanding.
Their nobles are starving,
and their masses are parched with thirst.

¹⁴Therefore Sheol has enlarged its appetite and opened its mouth beyond all limit.
Down go her splendor and her crowds,
her tumult and her revelers.

¹⁵Humanity is brought low,
each person humbled,
and the eyes of the arrogant are cast down.

¹⁶But the LORD of Hosts is exalted through justice, and the Holy God shows himself holy through righteousness.

¹⁷Then lambs will graze as in their own pasture, and strangers will feed among the ruins of the wealthy.

¹⁸Woe to those who drag iniquity with cords of deceit, and sin as with cart ropes!

¹⁹-- who say, "Let him hurry!
Let him speed up his work so we can see it!
Let the plan of the Holy One of Israel draw near and come, so we may know it!"

²⁰Woe to those who call evil good and good evil,
who put darkness for light
and light for darkness, who put bitter for sweet and sweet for bitter!

²¹Woe to those who are wise in their own eyes and clever in their own estimation!

²²Woe to those who are heroes at drinking wine, champions at mixing strong drink!

²³-- who acquit the guilty for a bribe and strip the innocent of their rights!

²⁴Therefore, as a tongue of fire devours stubble and dry grass collapses in the flame, so their root will rot
and their blossom blow away like dust -- for they have rejected the Torah of the LORD of Hosts and despised the word of the Holy One of Israel.

²⁵Therefore the anger of the LORD blazes against his people.
He has stretched out his hand against them and struck them;
the mountains trembled,
and their corpses lay like refuse in the streets.
For all this, his anger has not turned back,
and his hand is still stretched out.

²⁶He raises a signal flag for a distant nation and whistles for it from the ends of the earth -- and look, it comes swiftly, in haste!

²⁷Not one of them is weary, not one stumbles;
none slumber, none sleep.
No belt is loosened at the waist,
no sandal-strap is broken.

²⁸Their arrows are sharpened,
all their bows are strung.
Their horses' hooves are like flint,
their chariot wheels like a whirlwind.

²⁹Their roar is like a lioness;
they growl like young lions.
They snarl and seize the prey and carry it off -- and no one can rescue.

³⁰On that day they will roar over it like the roaring of the sea.
And if one looks to the land -- only darkness and distress;
even the light is swallowed by its clouds.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening uses terms of intimate love: yedidi and dodi. These are the same terms found in the Song of Songs, creating a deliberate echo of love poetry before the devastating turn.
1. 'A fertile hillside' renders qeren ben-shamen, literally 'a horn, a son of fatness/oil.' The 'horn' refers to a projecting hillside, and 'son of oil' is an idiom for rich, fertile soil. The vineyard had every natural advantage.
2. The verse piles up five verbs of painstaking labor: dug, cleared stones, planted, built, cut out. This accumulation emphasizes the extravagance of care lavished on the vineyard before the devastating 'but.'

2. Sorek is a specific premium variety of vine, possibly red-skinned, known from the Sorek Valley. It represents the best available planting stock.
2. Be'ushim means 'stinking things' or 'rotten grapes' — not merely small or sour fruit, but actively putrid. The contrast between sorek and be'ushim is maximal: the best input produced the worst output.
3. The shift is stunning: the singer suddenly addresses the audience directly and asks them to render a verdict. This is the same rhetorical trap Nathan used with David (2 Sam 12:1-7) — the audience will condemn themselves.
3. The imperative shiftu ('judge') invites the hearers into a legal proceeding, a covenant lawsuit (rib pattern). They are being asked to serve as judges in a case where they are the defendants.
4. The rhetorical question is devastating: God has exhausted every possible provision. The vineyard's failure cannot be attributed to any deficiency in the owner's care. The audience, still positioned as judges, must acknowledge this.
4. The repetition of the contrast from v. 2 — anavim (good grapes) vs. be'ushim (worthless grapes) — drives the point home with painful clarity.
5. The verdict falls. The vineyard had two layers of protection: a mesukah (hedge, thorn barrier) and a geder (stone wall). Removing both exposes it completely — to animals, to invaders, to destruction.
5. The language of removal and exposure anticipates the exile: God will withdraw his protective presence from Israel, leaving it vulnerable to foreign powers.
6. The climax of the verdict comes at the end: 'I will command the clouds.' No human vineyard owner can command weather. The singer's identity as God is suddenly, shockingly revealed. The love song was always a divine oracle.
6. Shamir vashayit ('thorns and briers') is a recurring pair in Isaiah (7:23-25; 9:17; 10:17; 27:4), functioning almost as a signature phrase for desolation and divine judgment.
7. This verse contains the most famous wordplay in the Hebrew Bible. The pairs are: mishpat/mispach — 'justice' vs. 'bloodshed,' differing by one consonant and one vowel; tsedaqah/tse'eqah — 'righteousness' vs. 'a cry of anguish,' again differing by a single consonant. The phonetic near-identity makes the moral distance unbearable.
7. Mispach is a rare word, occurring only here. It likely means 'bloodshed' or 'scab/wound,' though some connect it to a root meaning 'to pour out.' The KJV's 'oppression' is possible but 'bloodshed' better captures the violence implicit in the sound-contrast with mishpat.
7. Tse'eqah is the cry of the oppressed — the same word used for Israel's cry under Egyptian slavery (Exod 3:7). God hears the same cry rising from within his own people, this time caused by Israel itself.
7. The identification is now complete: the vineyard = Israel, the owner = God, the worthless grapes = injustice and oppression. The audience who judged the vineyard has judged itself.
8. The first woe oracle targets land-grabbing — the consolidation of ancestral land holdings by the wealthy. Under the Torah's land laws (Lev 25), land belonged ultimately to God and was to remain within families. The accumulation denounced here violates the fundamental economic structure of the covenant.
8. Hoy is simultaneously a funeral cry ('Alas!') and a prophetic curse ('Woe!'). Its dual register means Isaiah is both mourning and condemning — the woe is already a funeral for the living.
8. The shift from third person ('those who') to second person ('you dwell') is present in the Hebrew and creates a sudden, accusatory directness.
9. 'In my hearing' — Isaiah claims direct audition of the divine decree. The judgment fits the crime precisely: those who accumulated houses will see those very houses stand empty.
9. The irony is pointed: the land-grabbers sought to dwell 'alone in the land' (v. 8); they will get their wish, but as desolation rather than luxury.
10. The measurements make the curse concrete: a bath is about six gallons — a pitiful yield from ten acres. A homer of seed (roughly six bushels) will yield only an ephah (about half a bushel) — a tenfold loss. The land itself will refuse to cooperate with those who abused it.
10. The agricultural curse echoes Deuteronomy 28:38-40 and Leviticus 26:20, connecting this judgment to the covenant curse tradition.
11. The second woe targets those who organize their entire day around alcohol — from dawn to dusk. The verb radaf ('to chase, pursue') normally describes hunting prey or pursuing enemies; applied to drink, it conveys obsessive, relentless craving.
11. Shekar ('strong drink') refers to fermented beverages other than grape wine — possibly beer, date wine, or other intoxicants.
12. The catalog of instruments (five items) creates a sense of lavish sensory indulgence. The problem is not music or celebration per se but the willful blindness to God's activity in history. They are anesthetized by pleasure.
12. The phrase po'al YHWH ('the work of the LORD') refers to God's acts in history — both past deliverances and present judgments. The revelers are oblivious to both.
13. The prophetic perfect — galah ('has gone into exile') uses a past tense to describe a future event, so certain is it in God's decree. Exile is the ultimate covenant curse (Lev 26:33; Deut 28:36).

13. 'For lack of understanding' (mibli-da'at) — the word da'at (knowledge) here means covenantal knowledge, awareness of God and his requirements. The ignorance is willful, the result of the pleasure-seeking in v. 12.
14. Sheol is personified as a ravenous beast with an insatiable mouth — a striking image of death's hunger. The KJV's 'hell' is misleading; Sheol in the Hebrew Bible is the realm of the dead, not a place of punishment in the later Christian sense.
14. The four items that descend — splendor, crowds, tumult, revelers — correspond to the excesses cataloged in the preceding verses. Everything the elite celebrated will be swallowed.
15. The leveling is total: adam (humanity in general), ish (each individual), and the 'eyes of the lofty' (the proud elite specifically). No one escapes the humiliation.
15. This verse anticipates the great theme of Isaiah 2:11-17, where everything exalted among humans is brought low and the LORD alone is exalted.
16. A magnificent theological statement: God's exaltation comes not through raw power but through mishpat (justice) and tsedaqah (righteousness) — the very qualities Israel lacked (v. 7). When God judges, his holiness is displayed.
16. The verb niqdash ('shows himself holy') is the nifal of qadash — God is sanctified, set apart, revealed as holy precisely through his righteous acts. Holiness and justice are inseparable in Isaiah's theology.
17. The image is pastoral desolation: where mansions once stood, lambs now graze and wanderers pick through the rubble. The estates of the land-grabbers (v. 8) are reduced to sheep-pasture.
17. The Hebrew of this verse is difficult; mechim ('fat ones') may refer to the fattened livestock of the rich or to the rich themselves. 'The wealthy' captures the social dimension.
18. The third woe oracle. The image is of people yoked to their sin like draft animals — but willingly. They actively haul their transgression behind them, bound to it by their own deceptions.
18. The progression from 'cords' to 'cart ropes' suggests escalation: what began as thin deceptions has become thick, heavy bondage.
19. The taunt reveals brazen contempt: the sinners mock God's ability to act, daring him to fulfill his threats. This is not atheism but defiance — they acknowledge God exists but deny he will intervene.
19. 'The Holy One of Israel' (Qedosh Yisra'el) is Isaiah's signature title for God, appearing over 25 times in the book. Using the full title in the mouths of the mockers deepens the irony: they invoke the very holiness that will destroy them.
20. The fourth woe oracle is perhaps the most fundamental: the complete inversion of moral categories. Three pairs — evil/good, darkness/light, bitter/sweet — cover the moral, intellectual, and sensory dimensions of human experience. When every standard is reversed, judgment becomes impossible and society collapses.
20. The triplet structure (moral, visual, gustatory) suggests total perversion — every faculty of discernment has been corrupted.
21. The fifth woe — the briefest and sharpest. Self-referential wisdom is no wisdom at all; it has cut itself off from its source (cf. Prov 3:7, 'Do not be wise in your own eyes'). The compact form emphasizes the sufficiency of the indictment: nothing more needs to be said.
22. The sixth woe oracle drips with sarcasm. The terms gibborim ('heroes, mighty warriors') and anshei-chayil ('men of valor') are military vocabulary applied to drinking prowess. Israel's 'warriors' have redirected their strength from battle to banquets.
22. The irony deepens in context: a real army is approaching (vv. 26-30) while Israel's 'heroes' are drunk.
23. This verse completes the sixth woe by revealing its full scope: these 'heroes' are also corrupt judges who sell verdicts. The connection between drunkenness and injustice may be causal (impaired judgment) or merely characteristic (the same moral collapse produces both).
23. The wordplay continues from v. 7: tsidqat tsaddiqim ('the righteousness of the righteous') — the very thing God sought from his vineyard is now being actively stripped away by its leaders.
24. The sentence of judgment uses two images of total destruction: fire consuming chaff (instantaneous) and a plant rotting from root to blossom (progressive). Both above-ground and below-ground destruction are named — nothing survives.
24. The cause is stated with devastating clarity: they rejected the Torah (instruction, law) of the LORD and despised the word (imrat) of the Holy One of Israel. The two verbs — ma'asu ('rejected, refused') and ni'etsu ('despised, scorned') — are acts of deliberate contempt, not ignorance.
25. The refrain 'his hand is still stretched out' (od yado netuyah) appears here and in 9:12, 17, 21 and 10:4. It functions as a structural marker linking Isaiah 5 to 9:8-10:4, suggesting these passages form a single literary unit. The hand that was stretched out to deliver in the Exodus is now stretched out to strike.
25. The image of corpses as 'refuse in the streets' (kasuchah beqerev chutsot) is deliberately dehumanizing — the dead are treated as garbage. This was one of the most horrifying fates in the ancient Near East, where proper burial was essential.
26. The imagery shifts to military mobilization. God 'whistles' (sharaq) for a foreign army the way a beekeeper whistles for bees (cf. 7:18). The distant nation is not named — it could be Assyria, Babylon, or any instrument of divine judgment. The ambiguity makes the threat timeless.

26. The signal flag (nes) was raised on a hilltop to muster troops. God himself serves as the supreme commander, summoning nations as his army.
27. The description of the approaching army emphasizes superhuman endurance and readiness. The fourfold negation ('not weary, not stumbling, not slumbering, not sleeping') creates a relentless cadence. Even their equipment is in perfect order — belts tight, sandals intact. This is an army that never stops.
27. The contrast with Israel's 'heroes' (v. 22), drunk and staggering, is devastating.
28. The catalog of military preparedness continues: arrows already sharpened, bows already strung (bent and ready to fire), horses with hooves hard as flint (capable of sustained advance over rocky terrain), chariot wheels spinning like a storm.
28. The imagery is cinematic, almost journalistic — Isaiah describes what an observer would see as this unstoppable force approaches.
29. The lion imagery completes the portrait of the approaching army. The progression from roar to growl to snarl to seizure mimics the hunting sequence of a predator. The final phrase — 'and no one can rescue' (ein matsil) — is the theological point: when God sends judgment, no human power can prevent it.
29. The Hebrew uses two different words for lion: lavi (mature lioness) and kephirim (young lions in their prime). Together they represent the full lethal capacity of the pride.
30. The chapter ends in total darkness — a deliberate inversion of creation. Where Genesis 1 moved from darkness to light, Isaiah 5 moves from light to darkness. The word choshek ('darkness') echoes the moral darkness of v. 20 (calling darkness 'light').
30. 'The roaring of the sea' evokes primordial chaos (cf. Gen 1:2) — the ordered world is being un-created by judgment.
30. The final image — light darkened by clouds — is both literal (the dust and smoke of an approaching army) and metaphorical (the extinguishing of hope).

Summary: In the year King Uzziah dies, Isaiah sees the LORD seated on a high and exalted throne, his robe filling the temple. Seraphim hover above him crying 'Holy, holy, holy.' Overwhelmed by his own uncleanness, Isaiah is purified by a burning coal from the altar. When God asks 'Whom shall I send?', Isaiah volunteers and receives the devastating commission: preach so that the people's hearts grow dull, their ears heavy, and their eyes sealed shut — until the land lies in utter ruin.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most theologically dense chapters in the Hebrew Bible. The trisagion — 'Holy, holy, holy' — is the only attribute of God repeated three times in succession anywhere in Scripture, establishing holiness as God's supreme and defining characteristic. The seraphim, found nowhere else in the Bible, are fiery beings who shield themselves from God's glory even as they proclaim it. Isaiah's cry 'Woe is me, for I am undone' (oy-li ki-nidmeti) uses the same 'woe' (hoy) he has been pronouncing on others in chapter 5 — the prophet turns the curse on himself. The hardening commission (vv. 9-10) is quoted more often in the New Testament than almost any other Old Testament passage (Matt 13:14-15; Mark 4:12; Luke 8:10; John 12:40; Acts 28:26-27; Rom 11:8), making it a hinge text between the testaments.

Translation Friction: The seraphim pose a translation challenge: the word seraphim literally means 'burning ones,' but we retain the transliteration because no English word captures both their fiery nature and their distinct identity as a class of celestial beings. The hardening commission (vv. 9-10) uses imperative verbs — 'Make fat... make heavy... seal shut' — which in Hebrew are causative commands. Whether God is commanding Isaiah to cause spiritual blindness or predicting its inevitable result is debated, but the grammar is unambiguously imperative. We rendered the imperatives as imperatives. The stump metaphor in verse 13 is textually uncertain; the MT, LXX, and Dead Sea Scrolls differ, and we followed the MT while noting the difficulty.

Connections: The throne vision parallels Micaiah's vision (1 Kgs 22:19-23) and Ezekiel's inaugural vision (Ezek 1). The trisagion is echoed in Revelation 4:8. The hardening commission is directly quoted six times in the New Testament. The coal from the altar connects to the Day of Atonement ritual (Lev 16:12-13). The 'holy seed' of v. 13 anticipates the remnant theology developed throughout Isaiah (10:20-22; 11:1, 10). The stump image connects to the 'shoot from the stump of Jesse' in 11:1.

¹In the year that King Uzziah died,
I saw the Lord seated on a throne, high and exalted,
and the hem of his robe filled the temple.

²Seraphim stood above him,
each with six wings:
with two they covered their faces,
with two they covered their feet,
and with two they flew.

³And they called to one another and said:
"Holy, holy, holy is the LORD of Hosts!
The whole earth is full of his glory!"

⁴The foundations of the thresholds shook at the sound of their voices, and the temple filled with smoke.

⁵Then I said, "Woe to me! I am ruined!
For I am a man of unclean lips,
and I live among a people of unclean lips -- and my eyes have seen the King,
the LORD of Hosts!"

⁶Then one of the seraphim flew to me, holding a burning coal in his hand that he had taken with tongs from the altar.

⁷He touched it to my mouth and said,
"Look -- this has touched your lips.
Your guilt is removed,
and your sin is atoned for."

⁸Then I heard the voice of the Lord saying,
"Whom shall I send?
And who will go for us?"
And I said, "Here I am. Send me."

⁹He said, "Go and tell this people:
'Keep on hearing, but do not understand.
Keep on seeing, but do not perceive.'

¹⁰Make the heart of this people dull, make their ears heavy,
and seal shut their eyes -- lest they see with their eyes, hear with their ears,
understand with their hearts,
and turn and be healed."

¹¹Then I said, "How long, Lord?"

And he answered:

"Until cities lie in ruins without inhabitants, and houses stand empty of people,
and the land is utterly desolate,

¹²and the LORD has sent the people far away,
and the forsaken places are many throughout the land."

¹³And though a tenth remains in it,
it too will be burned again.
But as a terebinth or an oak whose stump remains when it is felled -- the holy seed is its stump.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The date formula anchors the vision in history: Uzziah died around 740 BCE after a 52-year reign that ended in leprosy (2 Chr 26:16-21). The earthly throne is vacant; the heavenly throne is occupied.
1. The Hebrew uses Adonai (, 'the Lord, Sovereign') rather than the personal name YHWH. This title emphasizes sovereignty and authority.
1. 'The hem of his robe filled the temple' — the Hebrew shulaw () refers to the skirts or train of a garment. If merely the hem fills the entire temple, the implied scale of God himself is incomprehensible. The temple cannot contain him; even the edge of his clothing overflows it.
2. Seraphim () literally means 'burning ones,' from the root saraph ('to burn'). These beings appear only here in the Hebrew Bible. The same root is used for the 'fiery serpents' of Numbers 21:6-8, but the seraphim here are clearly distinct — they have faces, feet, wings, and voices.
2. The three pairs of wings serve three functions: reverence (covering the face — they cannot look at God), modesty (covering the feet, likely a euphemism for the lower body), and service (flying). Only one-third of their capacity is devoted to active ministry; two-thirds is devoted to worship and self-effacement before God.
2. 'Stood above him' — the Hebrew mimma'al lo is ambiguous: it could mean 'above him' (hovering over the throne) or 'above it' (standing on the raised platform). The former reading is more dramatic and is followed here.
3. The trisagion (triple 'holy') is the only divine attribute tripled in the Hebrew Bible. While some see this as a Hebrew superlative ('most holy'), the threefold repetition goes beyond ordinary intensification. Rabbinic tradition and later Christian theology both found profound significance in the number three.
3. The antiphonal structure — 'one called to another' — suggests responsive, liturgical worship. This is not a solo performance but a cosmic choir in dialogue.
3. Kevodo ('his glory') fills the whole earth, not merely the temple. The glory that fills the temple (v. 1) is not contained by it; it overflows to fill all creation. The seraphim declare a reality already present but not yet universally recognized.
3. YHWH Tseva'ot ('the LORD of Hosts') is the full covenant name plus the military/cosmic title: God of the heavenly armies, of all created powers. The seraphim use the most comprehensive divine title available.
4. The physical response to the seraphim's cry: the massive stone thresholds of the temple vibrate. This is theophanic language — God's presence causes the material world to tremble (cf. Exod 19:18; 1 Kgs 19:11).
4. The smoke echoes the pillar of cloud in the wilderness (Exod 13:21-22) and the cloud that filled Solomon's temple at its dedication (1 Kgs 8:10-11). Smoke both reveals and conceals God's presence — he is near but not fully visible.
5. Isaiah uses the woe-cry (oy,) on himself — the same prophetic curse-formula he employed against others in chapter 5. The prophet who pronounced 'Woe!' on the wicked now discovers he belongs in the same category before God's holiness.
5. Nidmeti () is variously translated 'I am undone,' 'I am destroyed,' 'I am silenced,' or 'I am cut off.' The root damah can mean 'to be silent,' 'to be destroyed,' or 'to cease.' The ambiguity is productive: Isaiah is simultaneously silenced, destroyed, and cut off from the holy God.
5. 'Unclean lips' — the focus on lips is significant given that Isaiah is a prophet, a man of words. His very instrument of ministry is contaminated. The people he lives among share the same contamination. The confession is corporate as well as individual.

5. 'My eyes have seen the King' — in the ancient Near East, seeing God was understood as fatal (Exod 33:20; Judg 13:22). Isaiah's terror is not irrational but theologically grounded: the unholy cannot survive exposure to the holy.
6. The seraph takes a coal from the altar — the same altar where sacrifices burn. The purification of Isaiah's lips comes from the fire of sacrifice, connecting his cleansing to the entire sacrificial system. The coal is simultaneously destructive (fire) and restorative (from the place of atonement).
6. Ritspah (רִיטְפָה) means a 'glowing stone' or 'hot coal' — a piece of the altar fire itself. The seraph uses tongs (מֶלְקָאֲחַיִּים), suggesting the coal is too holy even for a celestial being to handle directly.
7. The burning coal touches the very part of Isaiah that was 'unclean' — his lips. The purification is specific, targeted, and painful. Fire that destroys dross also purifies gold.
7. Two distinct theological terms describe what happens: avoneka sar ('your guilt is removed' — the weight of iniquity is lifted) and chattateka tekuppar ('your sin is atoned for' — the sin is covered, expiated). The verb kipper (כִּפֶּה, 'to atone, to cover') is the same root used for the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur). Full atonement has been accomplished.
7. Isaiah does not atone for himself. The initiative is entirely God's: God's seraph, God's altar fire, God's declaration of pardon. The prophet contributes only his confession (v. 5).
8. The divine deliberation — 'Whom shall I send? Who will go for us?' — echoes the plural of Genesis 1:26 ('Let us make'). The 'us' has been variously interpreted as the divine council, the Trinity (in Christian reading), or the plural of majesty. In context, God is surrounded by the seraphim and the heavenly court.
8. Isaiah's response — hinneni shelacheni ('Here I am; send me') — is among the most celebrated acts of self-offering in Scripture. The Hebrew is devastatingly brief: two words. Having been destroyed and rebuilt, Isaiah volunteers without hesitation. He does not yet know what the commission will require.
8. The sequence is theologically precise: vision of God (v. 1-4), conviction of sin (v. 5), atonement (vv. 6-7), commission (v. 8). Isaiah could not serve until he was cleansed; he could not be cleansed until he confessed; he could not confess until he saw God's holiness.
9. The commission is shocking. Isaiah has just volunteered to be God's messenger, and the message is designed to produce incomprehension. The infinitive absolute constructions (shimo'u shamoa, re'u ra'o) create emphatic, ongoing action: 'hear and hear and hear — but never understand.'
9. The phrase 'this people' (ha'am hazzeh) is pointedly distancing — not 'my people' but 'this people,' as if God is already withdrawing covenant intimacy.
9. This verse is quoted by Jesus (Matt 13:14-15; Mark 4:12; Luke 8:10), by John (John 12:40), and by Paul (Acts 28:26-27) to explain why Israel rejected the Messiah. It became one of the most theologically consequential verses in the Hebrew Bible for the early church.
10. The three imperatives — hashmen ('make fat/dull'), hakbed ('make heavy'), and hasha ('seal shut/smear over') — target the three organs of spiritual perception: heart (understanding), ears (hearing), eyes (seeing). The order is significant: the heart (the seat of understanding in Hebrew thought) is addressed first.
10. The pen ('lest') clause reveals a terrifying purpose: the hardening prevents repentance and healing. This is judicial hardening — God confirming a people in the spiritual condition they have already chosen. Compare Pharaoh, whose heart was hardened after he first hardened it himself (Exod 7-10).
10. The verb vashav ('and turn') is the Hebrew word for repentance (teshuvah). The entire cycle of salvation is named: see, hear, understand, repent, be healed. The commission forecloses every step.
10. This is perhaps the most disturbing verse in the prophets. It raises profound questions about divine sovereignty and human responsibility that the text does not resolve — it simply states the commission and leaves the reader to wrestle.
11. Isaiah's response — 'How long?' (ad-matay) — is the classic lament question (cf. Ps 13:1-2; Hab 1:2). He does not ask 'Why?' but 'How long?' — accepting the commission while pleading for its limit.
11. The answer is devastating: the hardening will continue until total destruction. Cities emptied, houses abandoned, land desolate. The description echoes the covenant curses of Leviticus 26:31-35 and Deuteronomy 28:51-52.
11. The threefold desolation — cities, houses, land — reverses the threefold gift of the promised land: inhabited cities, built houses, cultivated land (Deut 6:10-11).
12. Richaq ('has sent far away') is the language of exile — God himself drives the people from the land. The 'forsaking' (azuvah) describes the land as abandoned, left desolate. The land mourns without its people.
12. The verse completes the answer to 'How long?': until exile. The hardening continues until the covenant relationship has been ruptured to its uttermost limit.
13. This verse is textually the most difficult in the chapter. The MT, LXX, and Qumran scrolls differ significantly. The MT reading is followed here, though it is compressed and possibly corrupt.
13. The image shifts from total destruction to qualified hope: even after decimation (a 'tenth' surviving), even after that remnant is burned again, a stump endures. The metaphor of a tree stump that retains life — capable of sending out new shoots — introduces the remnant theology that will dominate the rest of Isaiah.

13. Zera qodesh ('holy seed') is the theological climax of the entire chapter. The 'holy' (qodesh) of the seed echoes the 'holy, holy, holy' of the seraphim (v. 3). God's holiness, which threatened to destroy Isaiah and Israel, also preserves a remnant. Holiness both judges and saves.
13. The stump image directly anticipates Isaiah 11:1: 'A shoot will come forth from the stump of Jesse.' The Messianic hope is planted in the soil of judgment.

Summary: During the Syro-Ephraimite crisis (c. 735 BCE), King Ahaz of Judah trembles as the allied armies of Syria and northern Israel march against Jerusalem. God sends Isaiah with his son Shear-jashub to meet Ahaz, offering reassurance and inviting the king to ask for any sign. Ahaz refuses with false piety. Isaiah then announces a sign unbidden: a young woman will conceive and bear a son named Immanuel ('God is with us'), and before the child knows right from wrong, the two threatening kings will be gone -- but Assyria, the power Ahaz is secretly courting, will devastate Judah itself.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is one of the most contested passages in the Bible, pivoting on a single word: almah (v. 14). The Hebrew almah means 'young woman of marriageable age,' not specifically 'virgin' (which would be betulah). Yet the Greek Septuagint translated it as parthenos ('virgin'), and Matthew 1:23 quotes this Greek rendering to describe Mary's conception of Jesus. The result is that the same verse functions as a political oracle in its immediate historical context (addressing Ahaz's crisis) and as a Messianic prophecy in Christian tradition. We render almah as 'young woman' because this is what the Hebrew word means, while fully documenting both the Jewish and Christian interpretive traditions. The name Immanuel itself — 'God is with us' — carries enormous theological weight: it is both promise and threat, depending on whether God's presence brings salvation or judgment.

Translation Friction: The word almah is the most consequential translation decision in this chapter. We render it 'young woman' because that is the lexical meaning of the Hebrew. The word betulah, which more specifically denotes a virgin, is available in Hebrew and is not used here. However, we note that: (1) the LXX translated almah as parthenos ('virgin') around 200 BCE, well before any Christian influence; (2) Matthew 1:23 directly quotes the LXX rendering to interpret Jesus's birth; (3) both Jewish and Christian scholars have debated this rendering for centuries. We present the Hebrew as it stands while honoring the full history of interpretation. The identity of the child is also debated: candidates include a son of Isaiah, a son of Ahaz (possibly Hezekiah), or a symbolic/Messianic figure. The text itself does not resolve the question. The shift between singular and plural addressees ('you' in Hebrew) is important: sometimes Isaiah addresses Ahaz alone, sometimes the entire house of David.

Connections: The Immanuel prophecy resonates through Isaiah 8:8, 10 (where 'God is with us' recurs) and culminates in Isaiah 9:6-7 (the child who is Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God). Matthew 1:22-23 quotes Isaiah 7:14 as fulfilled in Jesus's birth. The name Shear-jashub ('a remnant shall return') connects to Isaiah's remnant theology (10:20-22). The 'waters of Shiloah' (8:6) contrast with the Euphrates flood imagery here (7:20). Ahaz's refusal to trust God parallels the Exodus generation's refusal at Kadesh-barnea (Num 13-14).

¹In the days of Ahaz son of Jotham son of Uzziah, king of Judah, King Rezin of Aram and Pekah son of Remaliah, king of Israel, marched against Jerusalem to attack it but could not overpower it.

²When the house of David was told,
"Aram has allied with Ephraim,"
the heart of Ahaz and the heart of his people trembled like trees of the forest swaying before the wind.

³Then the LORD said to Isaiah,
 "Go out to meet Ahaz — you and your son Shear-jashub —
 at the end of the aqueduct of the upper pool, on the road to the launderer's field."

⁴and say to him:
 "Be careful and stay calm.
 Do not be afraid,
 and do not let your heart grow faint because of these two smoldering stubs of firewood — the fierce anger of Rezin and Aram
 and the son of Remaliah."

⁵Because Aram, along with Ephraim
 and the son of Remaliah,
 has plotted evil against you, saying,

⁶"Let us invade Judah and terrorize it,
 and let us break through to it and set up a king in it -- the son of Tabeal."

⁷This is what the Lord GOD says:
 "It will not stand,
 and it will not come to pass."

⁸For the head of Aram is Damascus, and the head of Damascus is Rezin.
 And within sixty-five years
 Ephraim will be shattered, no longer a people.

⁹And the head of Ephraim is Samaria, and the head of Samaria is the son of Remaliah.
 If you do not stand firm in faith,
 you will not stand at all."

¹⁰Again the LORD spoke to Ahaz:

¹¹"Ask a sign from the LORD your God.
 Make it as deep as Sheol or as high as heaven."

¹²But Ahaz said,
 "I will not ask. I will not test the LORD."

¹³Then Isaiah said,
 "Listen, house of David!
 Is it not enough for you to weary human beings?
 Must you weary my God as well?"

¹⁴Therefore the Lord himself will give you a sign:
Look -- the young woman is pregnant and is about to bear a son, and she will call his name Immanuel.

¹⁵He will eat curds and honey by the time he knows how to refuse evil and choose good.

¹⁶For before the boy knows
how to refuse evil and choose good,
the land whose two kings you dread will be abandoned.

¹⁷The LORD will bring upon you,
upon your people,
and upon your father's house days such as have not come since the day Ephraim broke away from Judah --
the king of Assyria.

¹⁸On that day the LORD will whistle for the fly from the distant streams of Egypt and for the bee from the land of Assyria.

¹⁹They will come and settle, all of them, in the steep ravines and in the clefts of the rocks,
on every thornbush and at every water hole.

²⁰On that day the Lord will shave with a razor hired from beyond the River --
the king of Assyria -- the head, the hair of the legs, and it will also sweep away the beard.

²¹On that day a man will keep alive
one young cow and two sheep.

²²And because of the abundance of milk they give,
he will eat curds -- for everyone left in the land will eat curds and honey.

²³On that day, every place where a thousand vines worth a thousand pieces of silver once grew will become thorns and briers.

²⁴People will go there only with bows and arrows,
for the whole land will be thorns and briers.

²⁵As for all the hillsides once cultivated with a hoe,
 you will no longer go there for fear of thorns and briers.
 They will become places for turning out cattle and for the trampling of sheep.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The genealogy traces Ahaz back through Jotham to Uzziah — the king in whose death-year Isaiah saw the LORD enthroned (6:1). The dynastic line continues, but the quality of faith does not.
1. The Syro-Ephraimite coalition (Aram/Syria + northern Israel/Ephraim) aimed to depose Ahaz and install a puppet king (v. 6) who would join their anti-Assyrian alliance. The historical background is recorded in 2 Kings 16:1-20 and 2 Chronicles 28.
1. The note that they 'could not overpower it' is given at the outset — the reader knows the siege will fail before the story unfolds. The suspense is not in the outcome but in how Ahaz will respond to God.
2. The report comes to 'the house of David' — the royal dynasty, not merely the individual king. The threat is against the Davidic line itself, which makes God's response (protecting the dynasty through which the Messiah will come) all the more significant.
2. The simile is vivid: their hearts shook like forest trees in a storm. The Hebrew verb nua ('to shake, tremble, waver') describes involuntary, helpless movement — the opposite of the steadfast faith Isaiah will demand.
2. 'Ephraim' is used for the northern kingdom of Israel, named after its dominant tribe. This usage distinguishes the northern kingdom from the covenant name 'Israel' which can apply to the whole people.
3. Shear-jashub () means 'a remnant shall return.' The name is both promise (a remnant will survive) and threat (only a remnant). Isaiah's son is a living sign — his very presence beside his father is a prophetic message to Ahaz.
3. The meeting place — the aqueduct of the upper pool — is significant: Ahaz is likely inspecting Jerusalem's water supply in preparation for siege. The same location appears in 2 Kings 18:17, where the Assyrian Rabshakeh will later stand to threaten Jerusalem. The geography links the two crises.
3. The 'launderer's field' (sedeh koves) was an open area where cloth was washed and bleached — outside the city walls, making it a vulnerable meeting point. Ahaz is outside his fortifications.
4. The metaphor is deliberately dismissive: the two threatening kings are not roaring fires but zanvot udim ashenim — 'tail-ends of smoldering sticks.' They are nearly burnt out, producing smoke but no flame. Their fury is real but their power is spent.
4. Isaiah refers to Pekah contemptuously as 'the son of Remaliah' — refusing him even the dignity of his own name. This pattern continues in v. 5 and v. 9. Pekah is a usurper (2 Kgs 15:25) and does not deserve the title 'king' in prophetic speech.
4. The four imperatives — 'be careful,' 'stay calm,' 'do not fear,' 'do not let your heart grow faint' — address the terror described in v. 2. Faith requires stillness in the face of threat.
5. The 'evil counsel' (ra'ah) is their plan to overthrow the Davidic dynasty. What they call political strategy, God calls evil — an assault on his covenant promises.
6. The coalition's plan is explicit: invade, terrorize, breach the walls, and replace the Davidic king with a puppet ruler — 'the son of Tabeal.' This man is otherwise unknown; his name may be Aramaic, suggesting a foreign-backed pretender.
6. The verb neqitsenah ('let us terrorize/vex it') conveys extreme distress. The plan is not merely to defeat but to traumatize Judah into submission.
6. The plan to 'set up a king' directly threatens God's covenant with David (2 Sam 7:12-16), which guaranteed the dynasty's perpetuity. This is why God intervenes — not for Ahaz's sake but for the covenant's sake.
7. The divine verdict is absolute and brief — six Hebrew words. Against all the elaborate scheming of the coalition, God responds with flat negation: lo taqum velo tihyeh — 'It will not stand. It will not happen.' The brevity conveys supreme confidence; God does not need to argue.
7. The full title 'the Lord GOD' (Adonai YHWH) combines the sovereignty title with the covenant name, emphasizing both God's authority to overrule nations and his faithfulness to the Davidic covenant.
8. The logic is reductive: Aram's capital is just Damascus, and Damascus's ruler is just Rezin — a mere man. The implied contrast is with the LORD, whose throne fills heaven (6:1). Rezin's domain is a single city.
8. The sixty-five year timeframe has generated debate: it extends well beyond the fall of Samaria in 722 BCE. Some scholars connect it to the Assyrian resettlement of the northern territory under Esarhaddon (c. 670 BCE), which completed the dissolution of Ephraim as a distinct people. Others consider it a later editorial insertion.
9. The concluding wordplay is one of Isaiah's finest: ta'aminu/te'amenu — 'believe/be established.' Both words derive from the root 'aman (to be firm, reliable, trustworthy — the same root as 'Amen'). Isaiah is saying: the firmness of your throne depends on the firmness of your faith. No faith, no kingdom.

9. The address shifts to plural 'you' (ta'aminu) — Isaiah is now speaking not just to Ahaz but to the entire house of David. The challenge of faith is corporate as well as individual.
9. Again, Pekah is denied his name — only 'the son of Remaliah.' Isaiah reduces him to a patronymic, stripping him of royal dignity.
10. The narrative continues: God initiates a second word to Ahaz. The persistence of God's address is striking — Ahaz has not responded to the first message, yet God speaks again. Grace extends even to the faithless king.
11. The offer is breathtaking: ask for any sign, with no limit on scope. 'As deep as Sheol or as high as heaven' encompasses the entire vertical axis of the cosmos. God is offering Ahaz a blank check to test his faithfulness.
11. The phrase 'the LORD your God' (YHWH Eloheka) uses the second person singular — this is personal. God claims to be Ahaz's own God and invites personal engagement.
12. Ahaz's refusal sounds pious — he quotes the principle of Deuteronomy 6:16 ('You shall not test the LORD your God'). But the context exposes it as evasion: God himself commanded him to ask. Refusing a divine command in the name of obedience is the deepest form of disobedience.
12. The real reason for Ahaz's refusal is political: he has already decided to appeal to Assyria for help (2 Kgs 16:7-8). Accepting a sign from God would obligate him to trust God's protection instead of Tiglath-pileser's. Ahaz's 'piety' masks faithlessness.
12. The double negative (lo esh'al velo anasseh) is emphatic: Ahaz is digging in. He will not engage with God at all.
13. Isaiah's exasperation breaks through. The address shifts from 'Ahaz' to 'house of David' (plural 'you') — the indictment extends to the whole dynasty. They have exhausted human patience and are now exhausting God's.
13. The verb hal'ot ('to weary, to exhaust') applied to God is an extraordinary anthropomorphism. God can be wearied by his people's faithlessness — not in power but in patience (cf. Isa 43:24; Mal 2:17).
13. Note the shift in possessive: Isaiah says 'my God' (Elohai), not 'your God.' The implication is painful: God is still Isaiah's God, but Ahaz's relationship to God is in question.
14. ALMAH: The Hebrew almah () means 'young woman of marriageable age.' It does not inherently specify virginity. The more specific term for a virgin in Hebrew is betulah (), which Isaiah could have used but did not. The word almah appears only seven times in the Hebrew Bible (Gen 24:43; Exod 2:8; Ps 68:25; Prov 30:19; Song 1:3; 6:8; and here), and in each case refers to a young woman without explicit reference to virginal status.
14. THE LXX TRADITION: Around 200 BCE, the Jewish translators of the Septuagint rendered almah as parthenos (παρθένος, 'virgin'). This was a pre-Christian Jewish interpretive choice. Whether they understood the passage messianically or simply chose the Greek word they considered closest is debated.
14. THE NEW TESTAMENT: Matthew 1:22-23 quotes this verse (from the LXX) as fulfilled in Mary's conception of Jesus: 'Behold, the virgin shall conceive and bear a son, and they shall call his name Immanuel.' The Christian tradition reads the 'sign' as the supernatural virgin birth; the Jewish tradition reads it as a natural birth to a young woman in Ahaz's own time.
14. BOTH READINGS: The immediate historical context points to a child born in Isaiah's time whose early childhood would mark the end of the Syro-Ephraimite threat (vv. 15-16). The broader canonical context, especially as read through the LXX and Matthew, points beyond the immediate situation to a greater fulfillment. We render the Hebrew as it stands — 'young woman' — while fully acknowledging the theological significance of both traditions.
14. The definite article ('the young woman,' ha'almah) suggests a specific, known woman — not an abstract future figure. Whether she is Isaiah's wife, a woman in the court, or someone the audience would recognize is debated.
14. The name Immanuel ('God is with us') functions as both promise and threat in Isaiah's theology. God's presence is salvation for the faithful and judgment for the faithless. For Ahaz, who has refused God's help, 'God is with us' is an ominous declaration.
15. Curds and honey represent either: (1) the simple diet of a devastated land reduced to pastoral subsistence — the agricultural economy has collapsed, leaving only what herdsmen and wild bees produce; or (2) the rich food of a land flowing with milk and honey. The ambiguity may be intentional, carrying both blessing and curse.
15. The phrase 'refuse evil and choose good' describes the age of moral discernment — roughly the age of weaning or early childhood (2-3 years). The sign's timeframe is short: within a few years of this child's birth, the threat will have passed.
16. The immediate fulfillment of the sign: before the Immanuel child reaches the age of discernment, both Rezin and Pekah will be gone. Historically, Damascus fell to Assyria in 732 BCE and Samaria in 722 BCE — both within a decade of this oracle.
16. The singular 'you' (attah) returns — Isaiah addresses Ahaz directly. 'The land you dread' acknowledges his fear while promising its resolution.
16. The phrase 'forsaken of both her kings' is the key: both threatening monarchs will be removed. The sign functions as a countdown timer — measured in a child's growth, not in military campaigns.
17. The ominous turn: the two kings will fall, yes, but what replaces them is far worse. The Assyria that Ahaz is secretly courting will be the instrument of Judah's devastation. The final two words — et melek Ashur ('the king of Assyria') — land like a hammer blow at the end of the sentence.

17. 'Days that have not come since Ephraim broke from Judah' — the reference is to the division of the kingdom after Solomon's death (1 Kgs 12), the worst national trauma in living memory. What is coming will surpass even that.
17. The threefold target — 'you, your people, your father's house' — encompasses king, nation, and dynasty. No one escapes.
18. The whistle motif returns from 5:26 — God summons nations as a beekeeper summons insects. Egypt is the 'fly' (annoying, persistent, swarming) and Assyria is the 'bee' (aggressive, stinging, deadly). Both superpowers will descend on Judah.
18. The imagery is deliberately humiliating to the great empires: they are insects responding to God's whistle, not sovereign agents pursuing their own agendas. God controls the very powers Ahaz is trying to manipulate.
19. The swarming imagery continues: the foreign 'insects' settle everywhere — in ravines, rock crevices, thornbushes, watering places. No corner of the land is free from their presence. The thoroughness of the infestation mirrors the completeness of the judgment.
19. The geographic detail suggests total military occupation: ravines (defensive positions), rock clefts (hiding places), thornbushes (uncultivated areas), water sources (survival necessities). Every strategic and life-sustaining location is claimed.
20. The metaphor is deliberately humiliating: God uses Assyria as a hired razor to shave Judah from head to foot. Shaving was an act of extreme shame in the ancient Near East (cf. 2 Sam 10:4-5). 'The hair of the legs' is likely a euphemism for pubic hair — the humiliation is total and intimate.
20. 'Beyond the River' (ever nahar) means beyond the Euphrates — Assyria's homeland. The razor is 'hired' (sekiurah), suggesting that Ahaz's own tribute payments (2 Kgs 16:8) will fund the instrument of his humiliation.
21. The reduction is stark: the prosperous agricultural economy will collapse to subsistence herding. A single cow and two sheep are the minimum viable herd — barely enough to survive. The wealthy landowners of 5:8 are reduced to peasant survival.
22. The 'curds and honey' from v. 15 returns, now clearly in a context of devastation. The food is 'abundant' only because the population has been so reduced that a few animals can supply the survivors. This is the diet of a depopulated land — not luxury but subsistence from uncultivated resources.
22. The phrase 'everyone left in the land' (kol hannotar) echoes the remnant language of 6:13. Only a remnant survives, and their diet reflects the ruin around them.
23. The premium vineyards of chapter 5 — land so valuable it was measured in silver — will revert to shamir vashayit (thorns and briers), Isaiah's signature phrase for desolation. The economic reversal is total: from thousand-silver vineyards to worthless scrub.
23. The connection to the vineyard song (ch. 5) is unmistakable. The vineyard that produced worthless fruit will now produce no fruit at all — only thorns.
24. The land is so overgrown and wild that one cannot enter without weapons — either for hunting the wild animals that now roam freely or for self-defense in lawless territory. Cultivated land has become wilderness.
24. The repetition of shamir vashayit hammers the point: the entire land, not just individual vineyards, becomes desolate.
25. The final verse completes the picture of agricultural reversal: terraced hillsides that were carefully hoed and cultivated (the most labor-intensive agriculture) will be abandoned to livestock. The land reverts from viticulture to rough pasture — from civilization to subsistence.
25. The chapter ends not with a word of hope but with a picture of ruin. The hope embedded in the Immanuel sign (v. 14) is overshadowed by the devastation Ahaz's faithlessness has invited.

Summary: God commands Isaiah to inscribe the name Maher-shalal-hash-baz ('Swift is the plunder, speedy is the prey') on a large tablet, then gives the same name to his newborn son as a prophetic sign. Before the child can say 'Mama' or 'Papa,' Damascus and Samaria will be plundered by Assyria. But because Judah has rejected the gentle waters of Shiloah, the Euphrates flood of Assyria will sweep through Judah itself, reaching up to the neck. Isaiah then withdraws from public ministry, binding up his testimony among his disciples and waiting for God. The chapter closes with a warning against necromancy and a call to return to 'the Torah and the testimony.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter contains one of the longest personal names in the Bible — Maher-shalal-hash-baz — which is itself a complete sentence announcing Assyrian conquest. The contrast between the gentle waters of Shiloah (Jerusalem's modest spring) and the mighty Euphrates flood is one of Isaiah's most powerful geographical metaphors: Judah has rejected the quiet presence of God for the overwhelming power of empire, and will be drowned by the very force it admired. The 'bind up the testimony, seal the teaching among my disciples' passage (vv. 16-17) represents a turning point: Isaiah withdraws from public proclamation and entrusts his message to a faithful remnant — an act that anticipates the entire concept of preserved prophetic literature. The closing challenge — 'To the Torah and to the testimony!' — became a rallying cry for biblical faithfulness across centuries of Jewish and Christian tradition.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the Maher-shalal-hash-baz sign (ch. 8) and the Immanuel sign (ch. 7) is debated: are they the same child, different children, or one literal and one symbolic? We treat them as distinct signs while noting the connections. The identity of 'the prophetess' (v. 3) is uncertain — she may be Isaiah's wife (called 'the prophetess' as a title of respect or because she also prophesied) or a separate figure. The 'waters of Shiloah that flow gently' (v. 6) are usually identified with the Gihon spring and its channel, but some scholars see a broader metaphorical meaning. The transition at v. 16 is abrupt, and whether God or Isaiah is speaking is debated; we take Isaiah as the speaker based on context.

Connections: The Immanuel name recurs in vv. 8 and 10 ('God is with us'), linking this chapter directly to 7:14. The waters of Shiloah connect to John 9:7, where Jesus sends the blind man to wash in the pool of Siloam (the same water source). The 'stone of stumbling and rock of offense' (v. 14) is quoted in Romans 9:33 and 1 Peter 2:8 as referring to Christ. 'Bind up the testimony' (v. 16) anticipates the sealing of prophetic books (Dan 12:4; Rev 22:10). The 'Torah and testimony' formula (v. 20) echoes throughout reformation movements. Isaiah 8:23-9:1 (9:1-2 in English) — 'the people who walked in darkness have seen a great light' — is quoted in Matthew 4:15-16 regarding Jesus's Galilean ministry.

¹The LORD said to me,
"Take a large tablet
and write on it in ordinary script:
Belonging to Maher-shalal-hash-baz."

²And I called reliable witnesses to attest for me:
Uriah the priest and Zechariah son of Jeberechiah.

³Then I was intimate with the prophetess, and she conceived and bore a son.
And the LORD said to me,
"Call his name Maher-shalal-hash-baz."

⁴For before the boy knows how to say
'Papa' or 'Mama,'
the wealth of Damascus and the spoil of Samaria will be carried off before the king of Assyria.

⁵The LORD spoke to me again:

⁶Because this people has rejected
the waters of Shiloah that flow gently, and melt in fear before Rezin
and the son of Remaliah --

⁷therefore the Lord is about to bring against them
the mighty, massive waters of the River -- the king of Assyria and all his splendor.
It will rise over all its channels and overflow all its banks.

⁸It will sweep into Judah, flooding and overflowing, reaching up to the neck.
Its spreading wings will fill the whole breadth of your land, O Immanuel!

⁹Rage, O peoples, and be shattered!
Listen, all distant lands!
Arm yourselves -- and be shattered!
Arm yourselves -- and be shattered!

¹⁰Devise a plan -- it will be foiled!
Speak a word -- it will not stand!
For God is with us.

¹¹For this is what the LORD said to me with a strong hand upon me, warning me not to walk in the way of this people:

¹²"Do not call 'conspiracy' everything this people calls a conspiracy.
Do not fear what they fear,
and do not dread it.

¹³The LORD of Hosts — he is the one you must regard as holy.
He must be your fear.
He must be your dread."

¹⁴He will be a sanctuary,
but also a stone of stumbling and a rock of offense to both houses of Israel -- a trap and a snare
to the inhabitants of Jerusalem.

¹⁵Many will stumble over them.
They will fall and be broken,
snared and captured.

¹⁶Bind up the testimony;
seal the teaching among my disciples.

¹⁷I will wait for the LORD, who is hiding his face from the house of Jacob.
I will put my hope in him.

¹⁸Look -- here I am, with the children
the LORD has given me.
We are signs and portents in Israel from the LORD of Hosts, who dwells on Mount Zion.

¹⁹When they say to you,
 "Consult the mediums and the spiritists who whisper and mutter" -- should not a people consult their God?
 Should they consult the dead on behalf of the living?

²⁰To the Torah and to the testimony!
 If they do not speak according to this word,
 it is because there is no dawn for them.

²¹They will pass through the land, hard-pressed and hungry.
 And when they are famished,
 they will become enraged
 and curse their king and their God.
 They will look upward,

²²and they will look to the earth -- and see only distress and darkness,
 the gloom of anguish.
 And they will be driven into thick darkness.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The gillayon gadol ('large tablet') is probably a large flat surface — a wooden board or smooth stone — meant for public display. This is not a private scroll but a public notice, witnessed and dated.
1. 'In ordinary script' (becheret enosh, literally 'with the stylus of a common person') means in everyday, readable writing — not in the specialized script of scribes. The prophecy is meant to be accessible to all.
1. Maher-shalal-hash-baz () means 'Swift is the plunder, speedy is the prey' or 'Hurry to the spoil, hasten to the plunder.' It is one of the longest names in the Bible and functions as a prophetic headline announcing Assyria's imminent conquest of Damascus and Samaria.
2. The two witnesses establish legal credibility — the Torah requires two witnesses to confirm a matter (Deut 19:15). By publicly writing and witnessing the name before the child's birth, Isaiah creates an unfalsifiable prophetic record.
2. Uriah the priest is likely the same Uriah mentioned in 2 Kings 16:10-16, who later cooperated with Ahaz's apostasy by building a pagan altar. The irony is severe: a witness to God's word will later betray it.
3. 'The prophetess' (hanneviah) — either Isaiah's wife, called by this title because of her husband's office or her own prophetic gift, or possibly a separate prophetess. The text does not elaborate. If she is Isaiah's wife, then the Maher-shalal-hash-baz child is a sibling of Shear-jashub (7:3).
3. The public inscription (v. 1) preceded the conception — the prophecy was on record before the child existed, making the naming an irrefutable confirmation.
3. The Hebrew vaaqrav ('I drew near, I approached') is a euphemism for sexual intimacy, used also in Genesis 20:4 and other passages.
4. The timeline is even shorter than the Immanuel sign (7:15-16): not 'before he knows good from evil' but 'before he can say avi ve'imi (my father and my mother)' — roughly one to two years. The prophetic clock is ticking fast.
4. The historical fulfillment was precise: Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria conquered Damascus in 732 BCE and severely weakened Samaria, which fell completely in 722 BCE under Shalmaneser V and Sargon II.
4. 'Carried off before the king of Assyria' — the plunder will be paraded before the Assyrian monarch. The name Maher-shalal-hash-baz is being enacted: swift plunder, speedy prey.
5. A new oracle begins. The shift from the sign of the child to the metaphor of the waters marks a transition from specific prophecy to broader theological imagery.

6. The waters of Shiloah () are the gentle flow from the Gihon spring through the Siloam channel — Jerusalem's modest but reliable water supply. Metaphorically, they represent God's quiet, unglamorous provision: the Davidic dynasty and God's protective presence. The people want something more impressive.
6. The Hebrew of the second half is difficult. The traditional reading 'and rejoice in Rezin' (umesos) has been challenged; many scholars read umasus ('and melt/dissolve before') based on context and comparative evidence. We follow the emended reading because it fits the parallelism: the people both reject God's quiet provision and tremble before human threats.
6. The Shiloah/Siloam connection extends to the New Testament: Jesus sends the blind man to wash in the Pool of Siloam (John 9:7), and John notes that 'Siloam' means 'sent' — connecting the waters to the One sent by God.
7. The 'River' (hannahar) with the definite article is always the Euphrates in Hebrew — the great river of Mesopotamia, Assyria's homeland. The contrast with the gentle Shiloah is devastating: they rejected a brook and will receive a flood.
7. The metaphor works on multiple levels: the Euphrates literally floods its banks seasonally, destroying everything in its path; the Assyrian army will similarly overflow all boundaries and inundate the land.
7. 'The king of Assyria and all his splendor' identifies the flood — this is not a natural disaster but a military invasion personified as a river in spate.
8. The flood metaphor reaches its climax: the waters (Assyria) rise to the neck — almost total submersion, but not quite drowning. Historically, Assyria devastated Judah under Sennacherib (701 BCE) but failed to take Jerusalem itself (2 Kgs 18-19; Isa 36-37).
8. The shift from 'waters' to 'wings' (kenafayv) is striking — the flood becomes a bird of prey spreading its wings over the land. The dual imagery (flood + predatory bird) conveys both inundation and domination.
8. The chapter's emotional center: the land is addressed as 'your land, O Immanuel.' Despite everything, the land belongs to 'God is with us.' The Immanuel sign of 7:14 is not abandoned but reaffirmed in the midst of catastrophe. God's presence does not prevent suffering but persists through it.
9. The tone shifts abruptly to defiant confidence. Isaiah taunts the nations: go ahead, prepare for war — you will be broken. The repeated hit'azzeru vachotu ('arm yourselves and be shattered') has the force of a battle cry, but one that mocks the enemy.
9. The verb ro'u can mean 'rage' or 'be evil/hostile.' The imperative form dares the nations to act, confident they will fail. This is holy sarcasm rooted in the Immanuel declaration.
10. The climactic declaration: Immanu El — 'God is with us' — spoken now not as a child's name but as the reason no hostile plan can succeed. The phrase echoes 7:14 and 8:8 but here reaches its theological fullness.
10. The verse echoes Psalm 2:1-4, where the nations rage and plot against God's anointed, and God laughs. The confidence is not in Judah's military power but in God's sovereign presence.
10. The parallelism is tight: utsu etsah vetufar / dabberu davar velo yaqum — 'plan a plan, it fails / speak a word, it does not stand.' Human scheming cannot overrule divine purpose.
11. The 'strong hand' (chezeqat hayyad) describes the overwhelming force of prophetic inspiration — God's grip on the prophet that cannot be resisted. Isaiah experiences divine communication as physical compulsion (cf. Jer 20:7; Ezek 3:14).
11. God warns Isaiah to separate himself from 'this people' — the same distancing language used in 6:9 and 8:6. The prophet must not share the people's panic or their political calculations.
12. Qesher ('conspiracy') may refer to: (1) the Syro-Ephraimite alliance against Judah, which the people see as a terrifying conspiracy; or (2) Isaiah's own message, which some in the establishment may have labeled treasonous. Either way, God commands Isaiah not to share the people's paranoia.
12. The double command — 'do not fear what they fear, do not dread it' — redirects fear from human threats to God himself (v. 13). The people's fear is misplaced: they tremble before armies but not before the Holy One.
13. The redirection of fear: not Rezin, not Pekah, not Assyria — but the LORD of Hosts. To 'sanctify' God (taqdishu) means to treat him as he truly is: wholly other, sovereign, not to be trifled with. Proper fear of God displaces all other fears.
13. The parallel structure from v. 12 is completed: the people fear the wrong thing (conspiracy); Isaiah must fear the right thing (God). This is the practical outworking of the trisagion (6:3) — if God is truly 'holy, holy, holy,' then he alone deserves ultimate reverence.
14. The stunning paradox: the same God is both miqdash (sanctuary, refuge) and even negef (stumbling stone). For those who fear him (v. 13), he is shelter; for those who refuse him, he becomes the obstacle over which they fall. God does not change; the response determines the outcome.
14. 'Both houses of Israel' — both the northern kingdom (Israel/Ephraim) and the southern kingdom (Judah). Neither is exempt from stumbling over God.
14. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 9:33 (combined with Isa 28:16) and Peter in 1 Peter 2:8, applying the 'stone of stumbling' to Christ. The New Testament reading sees Jesus as the embodiment of this paradox: salvation to those who believe, offense to those who reject.
15. Five verbs in rapid succession describe the fate of those who stumble: kashelu (stumble), nafelu (fall), nishbaru (be broken), noqeshu (be snared), nilkadu (be captured). The cascade is irreversible — each step leads deeper into ruin. The language blends military defeat with hunting imagery.

- 16. This verse marks a pivotal transition: Isaiah moves from public proclamation to private preservation. The nation has rejected his message (fulfilling the hardening commission of 6:9-10), so the testimony must be sealed — preserved intact, like a legal document — among his disciples.
- 16. Te'udah ('testimony') and torah ('teaching, instruction') together represent the full prophetic deposit: both the record of what God has said and the instruction for how to live. Binding and sealing protect the message for a future generation that will receive it.
- 16. Limmudai ('my disciples, my taught ones') — this is the earliest reference to a prophetic 'school' or circle of followers who preserve and transmit the prophet's teaching. The concept anticipates the rabbinical tradition and, in Christian reading, the apostolic community.
- 17. One of the most poignant verses in Isaiah: the prophet commits to waiting for a God who is hiding. God's face is turned away from Israel — the ultimate expression of divine displeasure (cf. Deut 31:17; Ps 27:9) — yet Isaiah will wait and hope.
- 17. The two verbs — chikkiti ('I will wait') and qivveti ('I will hope, I will look eagerly') — express patient, active expectation. This is not resignation but faith in the dark: trusting a God whose purposes are hidden.
- 17. The hester panim ('hiding of the face') is a major theological concept in the Hebrew Bible. God is not absent but deliberately concealed, and the concealment is itself a form of judgment. Isaiah's response — to wait rather than to seek alternative powers — is the opposite of Ahaz's response.
- 18. Isaiah and his sign-name children form a walking prophetic display: Shear-jashub ('a remnant shall return,' 7:3) and Maher-shalal-hash-baz ('swift plunder, speedy prey,' 8:1-4). The prophet's own name, Yesha'yahu, means 'the LORD saves.' Together they proclaim: the LORD saves, a remnant returns, judgment comes swiftly.
- 18. The Hebrew letter of Hebrews 2:13 quotes this verse, applying it to Jesus and his 'children' (the church). The New Testament reading sees Isaiah's sign-family as a type of Christ and his people.
- 18. 'Who dwells on Mount Zion' — even as God hides his face (v. 17), his dwelling place is affirmed. He has not abandoned Zion; he is hidden there, waiting to be revealed.
- 19. The people, cut off from prophetic guidance by their own rebellion, turn to necromancy — consulting the dead (ovot, 'mediums,' and yideonim, 'spiritists'). The Torah explicitly forbids this (Lev 19:31; 20:6; Deut 18:10-12).
- 19. The mediums 'whisper and mutter' (metsaftsfim vehamahgigim) — the sounds of fraudulent seances. The contrast with the clear, public word of God is stark: prophetic truth versus occult mumbling.
- 19. Isaiah's rhetorical question is devastating: should a people go to the dead rather than to the living God? The absurdity of the reversal — seeking life from death — exposes the depth of their spiritual collapse.
- 20. This verse became one of the most quoted in the history of biblical interpretation — a rallying cry for the sufficiency and authority of Scripture. 'Torah' (instruction) and 'te'udah' (testimony) together represent the complete divine revelation: God's law and his prophetic witness.
- 20. The phrase 'no dawn' (ein lo shachar) literally means 'no morning light for them.' Those who reject God's word remain in perpetual darkness — there is no new day, no hope, no illumination coming. The metaphor connects to the darkness imagery throughout Isaiah (5:20, 30; 8:22).
- 20. The verse functions as a hermeneutical principle: all claims to spiritual knowledge — including mediumistic whispers (v. 19) — must be tested against the Torah and the prophetic testimony. What contradicts them has no light.
- 21. The scene is one of desperate refugees wandering through a devastated landscape. Hunger drives them to rage, and rage to blasphemy — cursing both their human king (who failed them) and their God (whom they blame).
- 21. The verbs trace a descent: hungry, enraged, cursing. Physical deprivation leads to spiritual collapse. The curse against God is the ultimate covenant violation — the opposite of the trust Isaiah modeled in v. 17.
- 21. 'Look upward' — a futile gesture. Looking to heaven will bring no relief because they have rejected the God who dwells there.
- 22. The chapter ends as chapter 5 ended: in total darkness. Every direction yields only tsarah (distress), chashekah (darkness), me'uf tsuqah (gloom of anguish), and afelah (thick, impenetrable darkness). The four terms for darkness pile up relentlessly.
- 22. The final word — menudach ('driven out, thrust away') — echoes the exile language of 6:12. They are pushed into darkness as into exile, with no light and no way back.
- 22. But this is not the final word. The verse that immediately follows in the Hebrew text (8:23, which becomes 9:1 in English Bibles) announces: 'The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light.' The deepest darkness becomes the setting for the brightest dawn. Isaiah's structure is deliberate: maximum darkness precedes maximum hope.

Summary: After the darkness of Assyrian invasion, a great light breaks over Galilee. A royal child is born whose four throne names declare him divine warrior, eternal father, and prince of wholeness. Yet the chapter pivots sharply: God's hand remains outstretched against a stubborn northern kingdom through a cascading series of judgments.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 6 (Hebrew v. 5) contains four compound throne names unprecedented in Israelite royal ideology. No Davidic king at coronation received titles this exalted. 'Mighty God' (El Gibbor) is a divine title used of God himself in 10:21 — its application to a human king shatters the boundary between royal theology and divine identity. The accumulation of all four names on a single figure pushes the oracle beyond anything the Davidic covenant alone can contain. We are dealing with a text that Israel's own theological grammar struggled to house, and that later tradition — both Jewish and Christian — recognized as eschatological. The refrain 'For all this, his anger has not turned away, and his hand is still stretched out' (vv. 12, 17, 21) creates a relentless drumbeat across the second half of the chapter, structuring four successive judgments that mirror the covenant-curse pattern of Leviticus 26. The interplay between the messianic light of verses 1-7 and the unrelenting judgment of verses 8-21 is not contradiction but covenant logic: the same God who promises redemption through a coming king also holds his people accountable in the present.

Translation Friction: The versification difference between Hebrew and English creates an immediate challenge: what English Bibles number as 9:1 is 8:23 in the Hebrew text, and what English calls 9:2 is Hebrew 9:1. We follow English versification for accessibility but note the Hebrew numbering. The four throne names in verse 6 resist English at every turn. Pele-yo'ets is not two separate titles but a construct phrase — 'Wonder of a Counselor' or 'Wonderful Counselor' — and the debate over whether pele is an adjective or a noun changes the meaning significantly. El Gibbor ('Mighty God') is unmistakably a divine title, which some translators have softened to 'God-like hero' to avoid the theological weight — we have not softened it. Avi-ad is literally 'Father of Eternity' rather than 'Everlasting Father,' and Sar-Shalom ('Prince of Peace') uses shalom in its full Hebrew sense of wholeness, completeness, and covenant well-being, not merely the absence of conflict.

Connections: The 'great light' of verse 2 illuminating Galilee of the nations connects forward to Matthew 4:15-16, which quotes this passage at the start of Jesus' Galilean ministry. The throne names connect backward to the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7) and the royal psalms (Psalm 2, Psalm 72, Psalm 110). El Gibbor reappears in Isaiah 10:21 as a title for God — making the link between the child and God explicit within Isaiah's own text. The 'zeal of the LORD of Hosts' that guarantees fulfillment (v. 7) echoes the same phrase in 2 Kings 19:31 during the Assyrian crisis. The outstretched-hand refrain (vv. 12, 17, 21) continues from 5:25 and extends through 10:4, forming a structural unit of five strophes of judgment that frames the messianic oracle.

¹But there will be no more gloom for her who was in anguish.
In the former time he brought contempt on the land of Zebulun and the land of Naphtali,
but in the latter time he will bring honor —
by the way of the sea, beyond the Jordan,
Galilee of the nations.

²The people who walked in darkness have seen a great light.
Those who dwelt in a land of deep shadow — light has dawned upon them.

³You have multiplied the nation;
you have increased its joy.
They rejoice before you as with the joy of harvest,

as warriors exult when dividing plunder.

⁴For the yoke of his burden,
the bar across his shoulders,
the rod of his oppressor —
you have shattered them as on the day of Midian.

⁵For every boot that tramped in the earthquake of battle, every cloak rolled in blood —
they will be fuel for burning, food for fire.

⁶For a child is born to us, a son is given to us,
and the dominion rests upon his shoulder.
His name is called:
Wonderful Counselor, Mighty God,
Father of Eternity, Prince of Peace.

⁷Of the increase of his dominion and of peace there will be no end, upon the throne of David and over his kingdom,
to establish it and sustain it with justice and with righteousness from now and forever.
The zeal of the LORD of Hosts will accomplish this.

⁸The Lord sent a word against Jacob,
and it fell upon Israel.

⁹And all the people will know it — Ephraim and the inhabitants of Samaria — who say in pride and arrogance of heart:

¹⁰"The bricks have fallen,
but we will build with dressed stone.
The sycamores have been cut down,
but we will replace them with cedars."

¹¹So the LORD has raised up the adversaries of Rezin against him and stirred up his enemies —

¹²Aram from the east and the Philistines from the west — they devour Israel with open mouth.
For all this, his anger has not turned away,
and his hand is still stretched out.

¹³Yet the people have not turned back to the one who struck them, and the LORD of Hosts they have not sought.

¹⁴So the LORD cut off from Israel head and tail, palm branch and reed, in a single day.

¹⁵The elder and the dignitary — these are the head.
The prophet who teaches lies — he is the tail.

¹⁶Those who guide this people lead them astray,
and those who are guided by them are swallowed up.

¹⁷Therefore the Lord takes no pleasure in their young men, and on their orphans and widows he has no compassion,
for every one of them is godless and does evil,
and every mouth speaks disgrace.
For all this, his anger has not turned away,
and his hand is still stretched out.

¹⁸For wickedness burns like fire;
it devours thorns and briars,
it kindles the thickets of the forest,
and they swirl upward in columns of smoke.

¹⁹By the fury of the LORD of Hosts the land is scorched, and the people are fuel for the fire.
No one spares his brother.

²⁰They snatch on the right but are still hungry;
they devour on the left but are not satisfied.
Each one feeds on the flesh of his own arm —

²¹Manasseh devours Ephraim, and Ephraim devours Manasseh; together they turn against Judah.
For all this, his anger has not turned away,
and his hand is still stretched out.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse is 8:23 in the Hebrew text; English Bibles number it as 9:1. It serves as a hinge between the darkness of chapter 8 and the light of chapter 9.
1. The contrast between he-qal ('he made light, he treated with contempt') and hikh-bid ('he made heavy, he brought honor/glory') is a wordplay lost in most English renderings. The same root k-b-d means both 'heavy' and 'glorious' — what Assyria treated as worthless, God will make glorious.
1. Galil ha-goyim ('Galilee of the nations') designated the northern territory with its mixed Israelite and Gentile population. The phrase 'of the nations' was not a compliment — it marked the region as culturally contaminated. That this despised region receives the first light is theologically deliberate.
2. The Hebrew tsalmawet has been traditionally parsed as tsel-mawet ('shadow of death'), but many scholars now read it as a superlative form tsalmut meaning 'deep darkness' or 'utter gloom.' Both readings work theologically — the darkness is either death's shadow or darkness so total it resembles death. We render 'deep shadow' to preserve the ambiguity.
2. The verb nagah ('to shine, to dawn') implies light breaking suddenly — not a gradual brightening but a sudden eruption of radiance into total darkness. The perfect tense ('has dawned') treats the future event as already accomplished — the prophetic perfect, expressing certainty of fulfillment.
3. The Masoretic text has lo ('not') but the Qere reading is lo ('to it/him'), changing 'you have not increased the joy' to 'you have increased its joy.' The Qere reading makes far better sense in context and is followed by virtually all modern translations. This is one of the eighteen Tiqqune Sopherim (scribal corrections) traditionally noted in the Masoretic tradition.

3. Two images of joy are stacked: harvest joy (the relief of provision after labor) and battle joy (the triumph of victory after danger). Together they capture both the agricultural and military dimensions of God's deliverance.
4. Three images of subjugation — yoke (ol), staff/bar (matteh), and rod (shevet) — are listed and then destroyed with a single verb: ha-chittota ('you have shattered'). The grammatical structure forces the reader through the full weight of oppression before releasing it with the breaking.
4. The 'day of Midian' refers to Gideon's victory in Judges 7, where God defeated a vast army through 300 men with torches and jars — emphasizing that deliverance comes by divine intervention, not military strength. The allusion is programmatic: the coming salvation will be God's work, not human achievement.
5. The Hebrew se'on so'en is onomatopoeic — the repetition of the s'-n root mimics the rhythmic tramping of marching boots. English cannot reproduce this sound-sense, but 'boot that tramped' preserves the military footwear image.
5. The destruction of military equipment by fire is an eschatological image: in the coming age, the instruments of war will not be stored for reuse but burned permanently. This parallels the breaking of weapons in Psalm 46:9 and the plowshares oracle in Isaiah 2:4.
6. This verse is the theological summit of the chapter. Four compound throne names are given to the royal child, each making claims that escalate beyond normal Davidic royal theology.
6. Pele-Yo'ets ('Wonderful Counselor'): Pele is used elsewhere only of God's own acts — the 'wonders' of the exodus (Exodus 15:11), the 'wonder' of Manoah's angel (Judges 13:18). A yo'ets is a royal advisor (2 Samuel 15:12). The compound means this king's counsel will be of a supernatural, God-like quality — not merely wise but wondrously so.
6. El Gibbor ('Mighty God'): This is the most theologically charged of the four names. El is not a generic word for 'powerful one' here — it is a divine title. Gibbor ('mighty warrior, hero') intensifies it. The identical phrase El Gibbor appears in Isaiah 10:21 as an unambiguous title for God. Some scholars attempt to soften this to 'God-like hero' or 'hero of God,' but the Hebrew construction does not support that weakening. The text applies a divine title to a human child.
6. Avi-Ad ('Father of Eternity'): Not 'Everlasting Father' in the sense of God the Father, but 'Father of Eternity' — the one who fathers (provides, protects, originates) an eternal age. The royal father metaphor casts the king as protector and provider of his people in perpetuity.
6. Sar-Shalom ('Prince of Peace'): Sar means 'ruler, prince, chief.' Shalom encompasses wholeness, completeness, prosperity, health, safety, and covenant well-being. This is not pacifism but the comprehensive flourishing that follows when a righteous ruler governs justly.
6. The passive constructions 'is born' (yullad) and 'is given' (nittan) leave the agent unnamed — the child arrives by divine initiative. The misrah ('dominion, rule') is a rare word appearing only here and in verse 7 in the entire Hebrew Bible.
7. The word lemarbeh ('of the increase') is written in the Masoretic text with a closed mem () in the middle of the word rather than the expected open mem (). This anomaly has generated extensive rabbinic commentary — some see it as pointing to hidden or sealed dimensions of the messianic kingdom.
7. Tsedaqah ('righteousness') here carries its covenantal weight: the king will govern according to God's covenant standards, ensuring right relationship between God and people, ruler and ruled. Combined with mishpat ('justice'), it describes governance that is both legally just and relationally faithful.
7. The closing formula — 'The zeal of the LORD of Hosts will accomplish this' — removes the fulfillment from human effort entirely. Qin'at YHWH ('the zeal/jealousy of the LORD') is the same passionate divine commitment that defends Jerusalem in 2 Kings 19:31. The promise rests on God's own fierce loyalty to his covenant.
8. The tone shifts abruptly from messianic promise to present judgment. The 'word' (davar) sent against Jacob is not mere speech but a word-event — a decree that, once spoken, accomplishes its purpose (cf. Isaiah 55:11). The verb nafal ('fell') gives the word physical weight, like a hammer stroke landing on its target.
9. Ephraim and Samaria identify the northern kingdom of Israel. Godel levav ('greatness of heart') is not courage but inflated self-regard — the heart swollen beyond its proper size. The people's problem is not ignorance but willful arrogance in the face of divine warning.
10. The boast reveals the people's defiance: each line acknowledges destruction but immediately trumps it with an upgrade. Mud bricks become hewn stone; common sycamores become precious cedars. The pattern is not resilience but refusal to read judgment as judgment — they treat divine discipline as a renovation opportunity. The arrogance lies not in rebuilding but in rebuilding bigger without repentance.
11. Rezin was the king of Aram (Syria), Israel's ally in the Syro-Ephraimite coalition against Judah (Isaiah 7:1). God raises up Rezin's own enemies — turning allies into threats. The verb yesakhsekh ('stir up, incite') is rare and onomatopoeic, suggesting the tangling and agitation of hostility.
12. The first occurrence of the refrain that will structure the rest of the chapter (repeated in vv. 17, 21 and continuing into 10:4). 'His hand is still stretched out' (yado netuyah) echoes the exodus language of God's 'outstretched arm' — but here it is stretched in judgment, not deliverance. The same divine power that rescued now disciplines.
12. The image of devouring 'with open mouth' (bekhol-peh, literally 'with all mouth') is visceral — enemies consuming Israel like an animal consuming prey, holding nothing back.

13. The verse diagnoses the failure: lo-shav ('has not turned back/returned'). The verb shuv is the Hebrew Bible's primary word for repentance — a turning, a return. The people refuse to connect their suffering with the God who sent it. They rebuild (v. 10) but do not return. The parallel 'have not sought' (lo darashu) adds willful neglect — they neither return nor inquire.
14. The merism 'head and tail' means the entirety of the social order, from highest to lowest. 'Palm branch and reed' (kippah ve-agmon) reinforces this: the tall, proud palm frond and the lowly marsh reed — every class will be affected. The phrase 'in a single day' emphasizes the swiftness and totality of the judgment.
15. The verse decodes the metaphor of verse 14. The 'head' is the ruling class (elders and honored men); the 'tail' is the false prophet. Placing the false prophet as the 'tail' is devastating — he is not even the head of falsehood but its trailing appendage, dragged along behind. The moreh-sheqer ('teacher of lies') is worse than merely wrong; he actively instructs in falsehood.
16. A wordplay on the root '-sh-r': me'ashrei ('those who call blessed, guides') and me'usharav ('those called blessed, the guided'). The leaders who should direct the people toward blessing instead lead them into confusion. The verb mevulla'im ('swallowed up') suggests complete consumption — the misled are not merely confused but destroyed.
17. The most disturbing line in the strophe: God will not have compassion on orphans and widows — the very categories Scripture most consistently commands Israel to protect (Exodus 22:22, Deuteronomy 10:18). The reason is that corruption is total: kulloh chanef ('all of it is godless'). When even the vulnerable participate in the culture of evil, the normal categories of protection collapse.
17. Nevalah ('folly, disgrace') is stronger than English 'folly' suggests. In Hebrew, nevalah carries the sense of moral outrage, sacrilege, and social violation — the word used for Amnon's rape of Tamar (2 Samuel 13:12) and the atrocity at Gibeah (Judges 19:23).
18. The fire metaphor operates on two levels: wickedness itself is the fire (self-consuming), and it spreads through society the way wildfire spreads through forest — from scrub brush (shamir va-shayit, 'thorns and briars') to dense thickets (sivkhei ha-ya'ar). The verb yit'abbeku ('they swirl, they roll upward') is rare, evoking the churning, spiraling rise of smoke from a great conflagration.
19. The fire of verse 18, which was the fire of wickedness, now merges with the fire of divine wrath — the two are not separate but the same. God's judgment works through the natural consequences of sin. The phrase 'no one spares his brother' (ish el-achiv lo yachmolu) describes the collapse of the most basic human bond. When covenant with God breaks, covenant between humans follows.
20. The image of insatiable hunger — eating on every side but never filled — describes a society consuming itself. The final phrase 'each one feeds on the flesh of his own arm' (ish besar-zero'o yokhelu) is either literal (siege cannibalism) or metaphorical (self-destructive civil war). The word zero'a ('arm') can also mean 'strength, power' — they consume their own strength.
21. The fratricidal pattern reaches its climax: the two Joseph tribes (Manasseh and Ephraim), who should be the closest of brothers, consume each other — and then unite only to attack Judah. Brotherhood dissolves into mutual predation, and the only remaining solidarity is solidarity in aggression against the covenant community's other half.
21. The third iteration of the refrain. The repetition creates a sense of mounting, unrelieved judgment. Each strophe presents a new facet of collapse — social (vv. 13-17), natural (vv. 18-19), fraternal (vv. 20-21) — and each ends with the same grim verdict: God's anger is not yet spent.

Summary: A woe oracle against lawmakers who write injustice into law is followed by the longest sustained meditation on Assyria in the prophets. God commissions Assyria as the rod of his anger, but Assyria does not know it serves a purpose beyond its own imperial ambition. When the tool presumes to be the craftsman, God will judge the instrument itself.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theological architecture of this chapter is staggering in its precision. God simultaneously holds two truths: Assyria is his chosen instrument of discipline against Israel, and Assyria is morally guilty for its brutality. There is no contradiction because the text distinguishes between divine sovereignty and human motive — God uses Assyria's aggression without approving it. The axe-and-woodsman metaphor (v. 15) is one of the most compact statements of divine sovereignty in Scripture: 'Shall the axe boast over the one who chops with it?' The chapter then pivots to hope through the remnant theology that defines Isaiah's vision — the remnant (she'ar) will return (yashuv) to the Mighty God (El Gibbor), connecting back to the messianic title of 9:6 and to Isaiah's own son Shear-Jashub ('a remnant will return'). We encounter here the paradox that runs through all of Isaiah: judgment is real and devastating, but it is never God's final word.

*Translation Friction: The Assyrian king's boast in verses 8-14 required careful handling. The Hebrew uses rapid-fire rhetorical questions and geographical lists that create a momentum of conquest — each conquered city named as evidence of invincibility. English can preserve the list structure but loses the phonetic drumbeat of the Hebrew place names. The word matteh appears as both 'rod' (instrument of punishment, v. 5) and 'staff' (walking stick, v. 15), requiring us to track which sense applies in each occurrence. The remnant theology in verses 20-23 compressed enormous covenantal freight into a few verses — 'the remnant will return to the Mighty God' packs Isaiah's son's prophetic name, the messianic title from 9:6, and the doctrine of a surviving faithful core into a single phrase.*

Connections: The opening woe (hoy) continues the woe series that began in 5:8-23 — the outstretched-hand refrain in 10:4 is the fifth and final strophe of that sequence. The 'rod of my anger' language (v. 5) connects to the rod imagery in 9:4 (the rod of the oppressor, which God shattered) — now God wields a rod of his own. El Gibbor in verse 21 is the same title given to the messianic child in 9:6, creating a deliberate resonance: the Mighty God to whom the remnant returns is the same Mighty God whose name the royal child bears. Shear-Jashub ('a remnant will return'), the name God told Isaiah to give his son (7:3), becomes theological doctrine in verses 21-22. The destruction of Assyria 'as on the day of Midian' (v. 26) echoes 9:4, reinforcing that the same divine pattern of unexpected deliverance will operate again.

¹Woe to those who enact wicked statutes, who write oppression into law —

²to turn the poor aside from justice, to rob the afflicted of my people of their rights,
so that widows become their plunder and orphans their prey.

³What will you do on the day of reckoning,
when devastation comes from afar?
To whom will you flee for help?
Where will you leave your wealth?

⁴Nothing remains but to crouch among the prisoners or fall among the slain.
For all this, his anger has not turned away,
and his hand is still stretched out.

⁵Woe to Assyria, the rod of my anger —
the staff in their hand is my fury!

⁶Against a godless nation I send him;
against the people of my wrath I command him —
to seize plunder, to carry off spoil, to trample them like mud in the streets.

⁷But this is not what he intends;
this is not what his heart plans.
Rather, it is in his heart to destroy,
to cut off nations — not a few.

⁸For he says:
"Are not my commanders every one a king?"

⁹"Is not Calno like Carchemish?
Is not Hamath like Arpad?
Is not Samaria like Damascus?"

¹⁰"As my hand has reached the kingdoms of the idols, whose carved images surpassed those of Jerusalem and Samaria —"

¹¹"shall I not do to Jerusalem and her images
as I have done to Samaria and her idols?"

¹²When the Lord has finished all his work on Mount Zion and Jerusalem, he will punish the fruit of the arrogant heart of Assyria's king and the glory of his haughty eyes.

¹³For he has said:
"By the strength of my hand I have done this,
by my wisdom — for I am shrewd.
I have erased the borders of peoples,
I have plundered their treasures,
and like a mighty bull I have brought down those enthroned."

¹⁴"My hand has reached into the wealth of peoples as into a nest, and as one gathers abandoned eggs,
I have gathered the whole earth.
Not a wing fluttered,
not a beak opened,
not a chirp was heard."

¹⁵Does the axe boast over the one who chops with it?
Does the saw exalt itself over the one who wields it?
As if a rod could swing the one who lifts it!
As if a staff could raise what is not wood!

¹⁶Therefore the Lord, the LORD of Hosts, will send a wasting disease among Assyria's stout warriors,
and under his glory a fire will be kindled,
a blazing like the blazing of flame.

¹⁷The Light of Israel will become a fire,
and his Holy One a flame.
It will burn and devour Assyria's thorns and briars in a single day.

¹⁸The glory of his forest and his garden land
he will consume, both soul and body, and it will be as when a sick man wastes away.

¹⁹The remaining trees of his forest will be so few that a child could count them.

²⁰On that day, the remnant of Israel and the survivors of the house of Jacob will no longer lean on the one who struck them, but will lean on the LORD, the Holy One of Israel, in truth.

²¹A remnant will return — a remnant of Jacob — to the Mighty God.

²²For though your people Israel be as the sand of the sea,
only a remnant of them will return.
Destruction is decreed, overflowing with righteousness.

²³For a complete destruction, one that is decreed, the Lord, the LORD of Hosts, is bringing upon the whole land.

²⁴Therefore, this is what the Lord, the LORD of Hosts, says:
Do not fear, my people who dwell in Zion,
when Assyria strikes you with the rod and lifts his staff against you as Egypt once did.

²⁵For in just a little while, a very little while,
fury will be spent,
and my anger will turn to their destruction.

²⁶The LORD of Hosts will raise a whip against him,
as when he struck Midian at the rock of Oreb,
and will lift his staff over the sea
as he did against Egypt.

²⁷On that day, his burden will be removed from your shoulder and his yoke from your neck,
and the yoke will be broken because of fatness.

²⁸He has come to Aiath,
he has passed through Migron,
at Michmash he stores his equipment.

²⁹They have crossed the pass;
they lodge at Geba.
Ramah trembles;
Gibeah of Saul has fled.

³⁰Shriek aloud, daughter of Gallim!
Listen, Laishah!
Answer her, Anathoth!

³¹Madmenah has fled;
the people of Gebim scramble for cover.

³²This very day he halts at Nob;
he shakes his fist at the mountain of daughter Zion,
the hill of Jerusalem.

³³Look — the Lord, the LORD of Hosts, is lopping the branches with terrifying force!
The tallest are hewn down;
the lofty are brought low.

³⁴He will hack through the forest thickets with iron,
and Lebanon will fall by a mighty one.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The woe oracle (hoy) targets not random criminals but legislators — those who choqeqim chiqqei-awen ('decree decrees of iniquity'). The doubling of the root ch-q-q emphasizes that this is systematic, codified injustice. The parallel mekhattevim amal kittevu ('who write trouble/oppression that they have written') reinforces the point: oppression has been drafted, approved, and published as official policy. This is not corruption hiding in shadows but injustice wearing the formal dress of law.
2. The four victim categories — dallim ('poor, weak'), aniyyei ammi ('afflicted of my people'), almanot ('widows'), yetomim ('orphans') — form a comprehensive portrait of vulnerability. Note that God says 'my people' (ammi) — the victims are claimed by God personally. The lawmakers' plunder (shalal) and prey (bazaz) use military vocabulary — they wage war on their own poor through legislation.
3. Three rhetorical questions strip away every false security. Yom pequddah ('day of visitation/reckoning') is the moment when God audits the books. The 'devastation from afar' (sho'ah mimmerchaq) points to Assyria — the instrument is already in motion. Kevod ('glory, wealth, honor') will become worthless; there will be no safe deposit for it. The questions are unanswerable by design.
4. The final occurrence of the outstretched-hand refrain that began in 5:25 and has been repeated through 9:12, 17, and 21. Five strophes of judgment, five iterations of the same verdict. The cumulative effect is overwhelming — a people who have exhausted every avenue of grace.
4. The Hebrew bilti ('nothing but, without, except') opens the verse with grim finality: the only options left are captivity or death. The wealthy lawmakers of verses 1-2 will share the fate of the poor they oppressed.
5. This verse is one of the most theologically explosive in the Hebrew Bible. God calls the most powerful empire on earth 'the rod of my anger' — a stick in his hand. Shevet ('rod, scepter') and matteh ('staff, branch') are both instruments wielded by someone else. Assyria has agency — it makes real choices and bears real guilt — but it operates within a sovereignty it cannot see or control.
5. The hoy ('woe') creates a structural parallel with verse 1: woe to unjust lawmakers, woe to the imperial power. God judges both the internal corruption and the external instrument.
6. God speaks of his own people as goy chanef ('a godless nation') and am evrati ('the people of my wrath') — devastating language from the covenant God about his covenant people. The commissioned actions — plunder, spoil, trampling — are brutal, yet they are divinely authorized. The tension is not resolved but stated: God uses Assyria's violence as discipline while Israel's sin makes the discipline necessary.
7. The hinge verse of the passage. God's purpose and Assyria's purpose diverge entirely: God intends disciplined correction; Assyria intends total annihilation. The phrase lo-khen yedammeh ('not so does he think') reveals that Assyria is unconscious of its instrumental role — it genuinely believes it acts from its own imperial will. This gap between divine purpose and human self-understanding is the theological engine of the entire Assyrian section.
8. The Assyrian king's boast begins. His officers (sarai, 'my princes/commanders') are so powerful that each could rule a nation. The boast is not empty — Assyrian provincial governors did wield king-like power over conquered territories. But the claim reveals the imperial ideology: Assyria's subordinates outrank other nations' rulers.
9. A cascade of conquered cities, each pairing demonstrating that resistance is futile. Carchemish (defeated 717 BC), Calno/Calneh, Arpad (defeated 740 BC), Hamath (defeated 720 BC), Damascus (defeated 732 BC), Samaria (defeated 722 BC) — the geographic sweep moves from northeast to southwest, closing in on Jerusalem. Each rhetorical question says: "This city fell just like that one — what makes you different?"
10. The Assyrian king's theology is simple: every nation has gods, every god has been defeated by Assyria, therefore no god can resist. By lumping Jerusalem's God with the idols of conquered nations, the king commits the fundamental category error that will bring his downfall. He cannot distinguish between idols that are nothing and the living God who sent him.
11. The boast reaches its climax: Jerusalem will fall just as Samaria fell. The Assyrian king uses two different words for idols — elilim ('worthless things') and atsbabbim ('shaped images, things that cause grief') — without realizing that Jerusalem's God is neither. The dramatic irony is thick: the reader knows what the Assyrian king does not — the rod cannot determine its own targets.

12. The narrator breaks into the Assyrian speech to state the divine perspective. God will first complete (yevatsa, 'finish, accomplish') his disciplinary work on Zion — Israel's punishment is real and necessary — and then turn to punish the instrument. The sequence is important: judgment on Israel comes first, judgment on Assyria second. God does not excuse Israel because he will later judge Assyria.
12. The 'fruit' (peri) of the arrogant heart — arrogance is treated as something that grows, matures, and yields a harvest. And that harvest will be reaped in judgment.
13. The boast resumes in the king's own voice. Three first-person verbs — 'I have done,' 'I have erased,' 'I have plundered' — reveal the core sin: the instrument claims to be the agent. The phrase 'by the strength of my hand' (bekhoch yadi) directly contradicts verse 5, where the hand holds a divine rod. Ka-abbir ('like a mighty one/bull') uses a word that can denote a strong bull or a powerful person — we render 'mighty bull' to capture the bestial self-image.
14. The nest metaphor is masterfully contemptuous: the nations' accumulated wealth is as easy to take as eggs from an unguarded nest. The three-fold negation — no wing moved, no beak opened, no chirp sounded — pictures total helplessness. The mother bird is absent; the eggs cannot resist. The boast is simultaneously accurate (no nation successfully resisted Assyria) and self-condemning (the ease of conquest is God's doing, not Assyria's prowess).
15. This verse is the theological core of the chapter — perhaps the most concise statement of divine sovereignty over human empires in the Hebrew Bible. Four parallel images all make the same point: the instrument cannot claim the craftsman's role. Garzen ('axe'), massor ('saw'), shevet ('rod'), and matteh ('staff') are all tools — and Assyria is all four.
15. The final phrase keharim matteh lo-ets ('as if a staff could lift what is not wood') is the most cryptic. The staff is wood (ets); the one who lifts it is 'not wood' (lo-ets) — that is, flesh and blood, a person. The absurdity is total: wood cannot lift a human being. Assyria, a mere wooden instrument, cannot presume to direct the God who holds it.
16. The judgment reverses the boast: Assyria's 'fat ones' (mishmanav, the well-fed warriors and officials) will be consumed by rason ('leanness, wasting'). The fire kindled 'under his glory' (tachat kevodo) may refer to Assyria's glory being consumed from beneath, or to God's glory manifesting as fire — the ambiguity is likely intentional.
17. The Light of Israel (or yisra'el) and his Holy One (qedosho) — both titles for God — become instruments of destruction. The same God who is Israel's light becomes Assyria's fire. Thorns and briars (shito ushemiro) are Isaiah's characteristic image for what is worthless and destined for burning (cf. 5:6, 7:23-25, 9:18). The 'single day' echoes 9:14 — swift, total judgment.
18. Forest (ya'ar) and garden land (karmel) together represent the totality of Assyria's resources — wild and cultivated, military and economic. 'From soul to body' (minnefesh ve-ad-basar) means complete destruction, inside and out. The final image — kimesos noses ('like a sick man wasting/like a standard-bearer fainting') — is debated, but the sense of progressive collapse is clear.
19. A devastatingly simple image: the once-vast Assyrian forest (empire) will be reduced to so few trees that a na'ar ('boy, child') could write them down. The word she'ar ('remainder') is the same root as in Shear-Jashub — the concept of 'remnant' appears here applied to Assyria, but for Assyria the remnant is pathetic rather than hopeful.
20. The remnant theology crystallizes. She'ar Yisra'el ('the remnant of Israel') will stop depending on foreign alliances — 'the one who struck them' likely refers to Assyria — and will lean (nish'an) on the LORD instead. The phrase qedosh Yisra'el ('the Holy One of Israel') appears in its full form, Isaiah's signature title for God.
20. The word be'emet ('in truth, faithfully') qualifies the leaning — not superficial political piety but genuine dependence. The remnant's faith will be real.
21. This verse is the doctrinal unpacking of the name Shear-Jashub ('a remnant will return') that God commanded Isaiah to give his son in 7:3. The two Hebrew words she'ar yashuv are the son's name rendered as prophecy.
21. El Gibbor ('Mighty God') is the same title given to the messianic child in 9:6. The connection is not accidental: the remnant returns to the Mighty God, and the Mighty God is the name of the coming king. Isaiah's theology creates a web of cross-references that binds the messianic hope to the remnant's survival.
22. The Abrahamic promise (Genesis 22:17, 'as the sand of the sea') is both affirmed and qualified: yes, Israel will be innumerable, but only a remnant will return. The phrase killayon charutz ('decreed destruction') is fearsome — the destruction is not accidental but determined. Yet it is shotef tsedaqah ('overflowing with righteousness') — even the judgment is just. God's severity and God's righteousness are not in tension.
23. Kalah venecheratsah ('complete and decreed') reinforces verse 22: the coming judgment is both total (kalah, 'completion, consumption') and predetermined (necheratsah, 'determined, cut'). The double divine title — Adonai YHWH Tseva'ot ('the Lord, the LORD of Hosts') — underscores the authority behind the decree.
24. The tone shifts from judgment to comfort. 'This is what the LORD says' (koh amar) introduces a direct divine speech of reassurance. The comparison to Egypt (bederekh Mitsrayim, 'in the manner/way of Egypt') recalls that Egypt's oppression was also severe — and also temporary. The rod (shevet) and staff (matteh) that Assyria wields are the same instruments of verse 5, now named to demystify them: they are tools, and tools can be set aside.
25. The phrase me'at miz'ar ('a little, a very little') doubles the diminutive — the remaining time of Assyrian dominance is minuscule from God's perspective. The za'am ('fury, indignation') that is currently directed at Israel through Assyria will soon be redirected (appi al-tavlitam, 'my anger toward their annihilation') — against Assyria itself.

26. Two paradigmatic deliverances are invoked: Gideon's defeat of Midian (Judges 7:25, where the Midianite prince Oreb was killed at the rock bearing his name) and the exodus victory at the sea. Both were situations where Israel was hopelessly outmatched and God intervened decisively. The message: what God did to Midian and Egypt, he will do to Assyria.
27. The imagery of burden (subbal), shoulder (shekhem), and yoke (ol) echoes 9:4, where the same images described Midianite oppression. The final phrase — ve-chubbal ol mippenei-shamen ('the yoke will be broken because of fatness/oil') — is obscure. It may mean Israel will grow so fat (prosperous) that the yoke cannot hold, or it may refer to anointing oil (shemen), suggesting a messianic deliverance. The ambiguity may be deliberate, holding both material prosperity and anointed deliverance in the same image.
28. Verses 28-32 form a vivid march-poem tracking an invading army's approach to Jerusalem from the north. Each verse names a town along the route, creating a geographical drumbeat of approaching doom. Aiath (Ai), Migron, and Michmash are all north of Jerusalem — the enemy draws closer with each line. The effect is cinematic: the audience watches the army advance in real time.
29. The advance continues. Geba is about six miles north of Jerusalem. Ramah and Gibeah of Saul are even closer. The verbs shift from military action ('crossed,' 'lodge') to civilian terror ('trembles,' 'has fled'). The mention of 'Gibeah of Saul' is pointed — the first king's own city cannot hold against this invader.
30. The panic spreads. Daughter of Gallim is called to shriek (tsahali, a piercing cry). Laishah and Anathoth (Jeremiah's future hometown, Jeremiah 1:1) are swept into the alarm. The staccato place names — each line a single town — create a rapid-fire effect that mimics the speed of advancing terror.
31. Madmenah and Gebim are otherwise unknown towns near Jerusalem. Their obscurity makes the point: even the smallest, most insignificant villages are caught in the wave of terror. The verb he'izu ('they seek refuge, they take cover') suggests desperate, last-minute survival efforts.
32. The march poem reaches its climax: the invader stands at Nob, from which Jerusalem is visible, and shakes his fist (yenofef yado, 'waves his hand') at the city. The phrase har bat-Tsiyyon ('mount of daughter Zion') and giv'at Yerushalayim ('hill of Jerusalem') name the final target. The army has arrived. But the poem stops here — the blow never falls. The next verses describe God's response, not Jerusalem's fall.
33. God responds to the shaken fist with an axe. The forest metaphor returns: Assyria's army is a forest of tall trees, and God is the woodsman who lops (mesa'ef, 'cuts branches') them. The irony is total — in verse 15, the axe (Assyria) boasted against the woodsman (God); now the woodsman fells the forest (Assyria) with a different axe. The word ma'aratsah ('terror, terrifying force') communicates that this pruning is violent and overwhelming.
34. The final verse completes the forest-felling image. The 'thickets of the forest' (sivkhei ha-ya'ar) that once represented Assyria's impenetrable power are cut through with iron. Lebanon — the tallest, most majestic forest in the ancient Near East — falls. The Assyrian empire, for all its towering strength, is timber before God's axe. The chapter ends with a felled forest, setting up chapter 11's opening image: from a cut-down stump, a shoot will grow.

Summary: From the stump of Jesse's felled dynasty, a shoot springs up. The Spirit of the LORD rests upon him in sevenfold fullness, equipping him to judge with righteousness. His reign transforms creation itself: predator lies with prey, a child leads the wild beasts, and the knowledge of the LORD covers the earth as waters cover the sea. In that day, the root of Jesse becomes a signal to the nations, and God gathers his scattered people in a second exodus.

*What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is among the most concentrated messianic texts in the Hebrew Bible. Three botanical metaphors open the oracle — choter (shoot), netser (branch), and shoresh (root) — each making a different claim about the coming king's origin. He comes from Jesse, not David, emphasizing that the dynasty has been cut back to its pre-royal root; the kingship must begin again from scratch. The sevenfold Spirit (v. 2) endows the king not with military power but with wisdom, understanding, counsel, might, knowledge, and the fear of the LORD — capacities for just governance rather than conquest. The peaceable kingdom passage (vv. 6-9) is not sentimentality but eschatology: the reversal of the predator-prey order signals a return to Eden, a creation healed at its foundations. The wolf-and-lamb image has entered the cultural imagination so deeply that we forget how radical the claim is — it promises the undoing of the curse, the restoration of the harmony that existed before the fall. We note that the chapter moves from a single shoot (v. 1) to a transformed creation (vv. 6-9) to a gathered humanity (vv. 10-16): the messianic king's reign expands from personal endowment to cosmic restoration to international reconciliation.*

Translation Friction: The three botanical terms in verse 1 — choter, netser, and shoresh — overlap in English but are distinct in Hebrew. Choter is a fresh shoot springing from a cut trunk, netser is a green branch or sprout growing from roots, and shoresh is the root system itself. English 'shoot,' 'branch,' and 'root' are the best available options, but they do not fully capture the Hebrew distinctions. The verb shanah in verse 11 ('a second time') generated significant discussion: second after what? The first exodus from Egypt is the most natural reading, making the eschatological gathering a 'second exodus' — a concept that will dominate Isaiah 40-55. The animal pairings in verses 6-8 are carefully structured (predator with prey, domestic with wild, child with serpent), and maintaining the parallelism in English required attention to rhythm without sacrificing accuracy.

Connections: The 'stump of Jesse' (geza Yishai) follows directly from 10:33-34, where God felled the Assyrian forest — but the Davidic tree was also felled, and from its stump new life emerges. The Spirit's sevenfold endowment connects to the anointing of kings (1 Samuel 16:13, where the Spirit rushed upon David) but far exceeds any previous royal anointing. The peaceable kingdom reverses the curse of Genesis 3 (enmity between the serpent and humanity) and anticipates the new creation of Isaiah 65:25 ('The wolf and the lamb will feed together'). The 'root of Jesse' as a signal to the nations (v. 10) is echoed in Isaiah 49:6 (the servant as a light to the nations) and quoted in Romans 15:12. The second exodus (vv. 11-16) parallels the first exodus structurally — gathering from foreign lands, crossing through water on dry ground — establishing a pattern that will culminate in Isaiah 43:16-19 ('I am about to do a new thing').

¹A shoot will come out from the stump of Jesse,
and a branch from his roots will bear fruit.

²The Spirit of the LORD will rest upon him —
the Spirit of wisdom and understanding, the Spirit of counsel and might,
the Spirit of knowledge and the fear of the LORD.

³His delight will be in the fear of the LORD.
He will not judge by what his eyes see,
nor decide by what his ears hear,

⁴but with righteousness he will judge the poor, and with equity he will decide for the humble of the land.
He will strike the earth with the rod of his mouth,
and with the breath of his lips he will slay the wicked.

⁵Righteousness will be the belt around his waist,
and faithfulness the sash around his hips.

⁶The wolf will dwell with the lamb,
the leopard will lie down with the young goat, the calf and the lion cub and the fattened animal together — and a little child will lead them.

⁷The cow and the bear will graze together;
their young will lie down side by side.
The lion will eat straw like the ox.

⁸The nursing child will play over the hole of the cobra, and the weaned child will reach his hand into the viper's den.

⁹They will not hurt or destroy
in all my holy mountain, for the earth will be filled with the knowledge of the LORD as the waters cover the sea.

¹⁰On that day, the root of Jesse will stand as a signal to the peoples.
The nations will seek him,
and his resting place will be glory.

¹¹On that day, the Lord will reach out his hand a second time to reclaim the remnant of his people — those who remain from Assyria, from Egypt, from Pathros, from Cush, from Elam, from Shinar,
from Hamath, and from the coastlands of the sea.

¹²He will raise a signal for the nations and gather the outcasts of Israel, and assemble the scattered of Judah from the four corners of the earth.

¹³The jealousy of Ephraim will depart,
and those hostile to Judah will be cut off.
Ephraim will not be jealous of Judah,
and Judah will not harass Ephraim.

¹⁴They will swoop down on the Philistine slope to the west;
together they will plunder the people of the east.
They will stretch out their hand against Edom and Moab,
and the Ammonites will submit to them.

¹⁵The LORD will dry up the tongue of the Sea of Egypt, and wave his hand over the Euphrates with a scorching wind.
He will split it into seven channels and make people cross on foot.

¹⁶There will be a highway for the remnant of his people, for those who remain from Assyria,
just as there was for Israel
on the day they came up out of the land of Egypt.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verse deploys three botanical terms with precision. Geza ('stump, trunk') implies a tree that has been felled — the Davidic dynasty cut down, whether by Assyria, Babylon, or divine judgment. Choter ('shoot') is the new growth that springs from a cut stump, alive because the root system survived. Netser ('branch, sprout') is a green shoot — the word that may underlie the place name Nazareth (Matthew 2:23, 'He will be called a Nazarene/Natsri').
1. The choice of 'Jesse' rather than 'David' is theologically deliberate. Jesse was a farmer in Bethlehem before his son became king. By naming Jesse rather than David, the oracle strips the dynasty back to its pre-royal, pre-palace, pre-Jerusalem origin. The coming king will not inherit a functioning monarchy but will grow from a stump — starting over, as it were, from the field where Samuel first anointed David.

1. The verb yifreh ('will bear fruit') completes the botanical image: the shoot does not merely survive but is productive, fruitful, generative. The stump is not the end of the story.
2. The Spirit (ruach) is named four times, creating a structured endowment: (1) the Spirit of the LORD as the overarching gift, then three pairs — (2) wisdom and understanding (intellectual capacities), (3) counsel and might (leadership capacities), (4) knowledge and fear of the LORD (relational capacities). The total is seven — the number of completeness. The messianic king lacks nothing required for perfect rule.
2. The verb nachah ('rest, settle') implies permanence. When the Spirit rushed upon Saul it could also depart (1 Samuel 16:14); when it rests upon this king, it stays. The contrast with Saul is implicit but unmistakable.
2. Each pair combines an inward quality with its outward expression: wisdom (seeing rightly) with understanding (distinguishing rightly), counsel (planning rightly) with might (acting rightly), knowledge (knowing God) with fear of the LORD (responding to God). The king's governance flows from character, not coercion.
3. The verb vaharicho is literally 'and his smelling/breathing' — the root r-w-ch (related to ruach) suggests that the fear of the LORD is like air to him, the atmosphere he breathes. We render this as 'delight' following the sense of deep, instinctive orientation rather than literal olfaction.
3. The negations are revolutionary for royal ideology: this king will not judge by appearances (mar'eh einav, 'the sight of his eyes') or by hearsay (mishma oznav, 'the hearing of his ears'). Human judges must rely on evidence that can be fabricated; this king perceives truth directly. The implication is that his judgment penetrates beyond surfaces to reality — a capacity only possible through the Spirit's endowment.
4. The king's justice is described in two movements: protection of the vulnerable (dallim, 'poor, weak'; anvei-erets, 'humble of the land') and destruction of the wicked. His weapon is not a sword but his mouth — shevet piv ('the rod of his mouth') and ruach sefatav ('the breath of his lips'). His word carries the force of a weapon. This connects to the 'word' (davar) that God sends in 9:8 — divine speech that accomplishes its purpose.
4. Tsedek ('righteousness') and mishor ('equity, uprightness') describe the quality of his governance. Unlike the unjust lawmakers of 10:1-2 who perverted justice for the poor, this king's first concern is the vulnerable.
5. The belt (ezor) was not decorative but functional — it gathered robes for action and held weapons. Righteousness (tsedek) and faithfulness (emunah) are this king's essential equipment, as necessary as a soldier's belt. The image says: everything this king does is girded by, supported by, and held together by righteousness and trustworthiness. These are not accessories but structure.
6. The peaceable kingdom begins. Each pairing is deliberate: wolf/lamb, leopard/kid, calf/lion — predator matched with its natural prey. The domestic and wild coexist without violence. The verb gar ('dwell, sojourn') is the same verb used for Abraham living as an alien in Canaan (Genesis 20:1) and Ruth's family in Moab (Ruth 1:1) — but here the sojourning is peaceful cohabitation rather than vulnerable displacement.
6. The 'little child' (na'ar qaton) leading these animals is the most striking detail. In the present order, a child near a lion is a victim; in the messianic order, a child is the shepherd of predators. The reversal of power is total — authority belongs to the most vulnerable, and the most dangerous are docile.
7. The pairings continue: cow and bear together, their young intermingled. The lion eating straw like the ox is the most dramatic image — the apex predator becomes a herbivore. This echoes Genesis 1:30, where God's original creation mandate gave only plant food to all creatures. The messianic kingdom restores the pre-fall diet, reversing the predation that entered with the curse. The peaceable kingdom is not a new invention but a return to the original design.
8. The final pairing is the most theologically loaded: child and serpent. The enmity between the woman's seed and the serpent (Genesis 3:15) is the oldest conflict in Scripture. Here a nursing infant (yoneq) plays safely at the cobra's (peten) hole, and a weaned child (gamul) reaches into the den of the viper (tsif'oni). The curse of Eden is reversed — the serpent is no longer a threat to the child. This is not merely nature poetry but eschatological reversal of the deepest fracture in creation.
9. This verse provides the theological explanation for the peaceable kingdom: the cause of universal peace is universal knowledge of God. De'ah et-YHWH ('knowledge of the LORD') is not intellectual data about God but the intimate, relational knowing that the Hebrew verb yada carries — the same verb used for the deepest human relationships. When this knowledge fills the earth 'as the waters cover the sea' (an image of complete, inescapable saturation), harm and destruction become impossible.
9. The phrase 'my holy mountain' (har qodshi) refers primarily to Zion/Jerusalem but the scope of the sentence ('the earth will be filled') extends the holiness of Zion to the entire planet. The holy mountain expands to become the holy earth.
10. The botanical metaphor shifts: the 'shoot' of verse 1 has become the 'root' (shoresh) of verse 10. The one who grew from Jesse's root now becomes the root itself — the foundation, the source, the anchor. He stands as a nes ('signal, banner, rallying point') not just for Israel but le-ammim ('for the peoples') — the nations stream toward him. The scope has expanded from Israelite monarchy to international magnetism.
10. The phrase menuchato kavod ('his resting place will be glory') can mean either that his place of rest will be glorious, or that his rest/reign will be characterized by the kavod (glory, weight, honor) of God. The word menucha ('rest') echoes the rest God gives in the promised land (Deuteronomy 12:9) and the rest of the Sabbath — the messianic king's reign is the ultimate Sabbath rest.
11. The 'second time' (shenit) implies the first was the exodus from Egypt. This gathering will be a second exodus — a theme that becomes dominant in Isaiah 40-55. The verb liqnot ('to acquire, reclaim, redeem') carries the sense of purchasing back what was lost.

11. The geographic list traces a full circle around the ancient Near East: Assyria (northeast), Egypt and Pathros (Upper Egypt, south), Cush (Ethiopia/Sudan, far south), Elam (east, modern Iran), Shinar (Babylon, east), Hamath (north Syria), and the coastlands (iyeyi ha-yam, the Mediterranean islands and western regions). The scattered people are gathered from every point of the compass — no place of exile is beyond God's reach.
12. The nes ('signal, banner') of verse 10 reappears, now raised specifically to summon the dispersed. Both kingdoms are named — nidchei Yisra'el ('the outcasts of Israel,' the exiled northern kingdom) and nefutsot Yehudah ('the scattered of Judah,' the dispersed southern kingdom). The reunification of the divided kingdoms is part of the messianic program.
12. The phrase me'arba kanfot ha-arets ('from the four corners/wings of the earth') is comprehensive — the regathering leaves no exile unaddressed.
13. The internal division between the northern kingdom (Ephraim) and the southern kingdom (Judah) — a wound that split the nation under Rehoboam (1 Kings 12) and led to the Syro-Ephraimite crisis of Isaiah 7 — will be healed. The double negation ('Ephraim will not... Judah will not...') emphasizes mutual reconciliation. The two-century-old fratricidal rivalry ends in the messianic age.
14. The reunited Israel — Ephraim and Judah acting together for the first time since Solomon — moves against the surrounding hostile nations. The language is military and aggressive: 'swoop down' (afu, like a bird of prey), 'plunder' (yazozzu), 'stretch out their hand' (mishloch yadam). The four traditional enemies — Philistines (west), eastern peoples, Edom and Moab (south and east), Ammon (northeast) — represent the full circle of hostility that will be subdued under the messianic king.
15. The second-exodus imagery becomes explicit: God will part waters again, both the 'tongue' (leshon, the narrow inlet) of the Egyptian sea (the Gulf of Suez or the Reed Sea) and the Euphrates. The first exodus parted one body of water; the second exodus will part two — the obstacles at both ends of the exile are removed. The seven channels of the Euphrates allow passage 'in sandals' (banne'alim) — a detail recalling the haste of the first exodus, when Israel left with shoes on.
16. The chapter closes by making the second-exodus parallel explicit: mesillah ('highway, raised road') will be built for the remnant, ka'asher hayetah le-Yisra'el ('just as there was for Israel') at the first exodus. The comparison is direct and deliberate — what God did once, he will do again, on an even greater scale. The 'highway' image will become a defining motif in Isaiah 35:8 ('A highway will be there, called the Way of Holiness') and 40:3 ('In the wilderness, prepare the way of the LORD').
16. The word mesillah implies a constructed, elevated road — not a wilderness path but a prepared way. God does not merely open an escape route; he builds a royal road home.

Summary: A short psalm of thanksgiving closes the first major section of Isaiah. The redeemed remnant sings two songs: the first confesses that God's anger has turned to comfort, the second calls the nations to witness what the Holy One of Israel has done. Water, song, and proclamation replace the fire, judgment, and silence of the preceding chapters.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter functions as the doxological conclusion to Isaiah 1-12, much as the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15) concluded the exodus narrative. After eleven chapters of oracles — judgment on Israel, judgment on the nations, messianic promise, remnant theology, the peaceable kingdom — the response is not theology but song. The shift from third-person prophecy to first-person praise ('I will trust,' 'I will give thanks,' 'the LORD is my strength') places the reader inside the redeemed community. We are no longer hearing about salvation; we are singing it. The phrase 'Draw water from the wells of salvation' (v. 3) is one of the most beloved lines in Jewish liturgy, chanted during Sukkot water-drawing ceremonies and at the conclusion of Shabbat (Havdalah). Its placement here — after the fire of chapters 9-10 and the paradise of chapter 11 — makes it a climactic image: what was consumed by fire is now irrigated by salvation.

Translation Friction: The chapter's brevity (six verses) belies its density. The phrase ki yashir YHWH ('for the LORD has done gloriously,' v. 5) compresses an entire theology of divine action into three words. The verb zimrat in verse 2 can mean either 'song' or 'strength' (or both simultaneously) — the ambiguity is likely intentional, as the parallel with oz ('strength') suggests a hendiadys: 'my strength and my song.' This same phrase appears in Exodus 15:2 and Psalm 118:14, creating a three-text echo that is impossible to reproduce in English without a note. The imperative verbs in verses 4-5 shift from singular (addressing the individual) to plural (addressing the community), but English 'you' obscures this transition.

Connections: The phrase 'the LORD is my strength and my song' (ozzi vezimrat Yah, v. 2) quotes Exodus 15:2 verbatim — the Song of the Sea that Moses and Israel sang after crossing the Red Sea. By placing this exodus quotation here, Isaiah casts the entire messianic deliverance of chapters 7-11 as a new exodus. The 'wells of salvation' (ma'ayanei ha-yeshu'ah, v. 3) connect to the water imagery throughout Isaiah (8:6, the gentle waters of Shiloah that Israel rejected; 35:6-7, streams in the desert; 55:1, 'Come, all who are thirsty'). The command to 'make known his deeds among the peoples' (v. 4) anticipates the servant's mission to the nations in Isaiah 42:1-4 and 49:6. The final phrase 'the Holy One of Israel' (qedosh Yisra'el) in verse 6 bookends the section that opened with Isaiah's vision of the thrice-holy God in chapter 6 — the holiness that terrified Isaiah in the temple now dwells 'in your midst' as cause for rejoicing.

¹On that day you will say:

"I give thanks to you, LORD,
for though you were angry with me,
your anger has turned away,
and you have comforted me."

²"Look — God is my salvation!

I will trust and will not be afraid,
for the LORD God is my strength and my song,
and he has become my salvation."

³You will draw water with joy from the wells of salvation.

⁴On that day you will say:

"Give thanks to the LORD! Call on his name!
Make his deeds known among the peoples!
Proclaim that his name is exalted!"

⁵"Sing to the LORD, for he has done gloriously!
Let this be made known in all the earth!"

⁶"Shout aloud and sing for joy, inhabitant of Zion, for great in your midst is the Holy One of Israel!"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The first song begins with thanksgiving that names both the anger and its cessation. The speaker does not pretend the judgment never happened — ki anafta bi ('for you were angry with me') is a frank acknowledgment. But the verb yashuv ('has turned away, has returned') — the same root as shuv ('repent, turn') that Israel refused to do in 9:13 — now describes God's own turning. God's anger turns because of his own faithfulness, not because Israel finally repented well enough.
1. The verb tenachameni ('you comfort me') carries the full weight of nacham — comfort that follows real grief, consolation after genuine suffering. It is the same root as the name 'Nehemiah' (YHWH comforts) and will become a programmatic verb in Isaiah 40:1 ('Comfort, comfort my people').
2. The phrase ozzi vezimrat Yah YHWH ('my strength and my song is the LORD God') directly quotes Exodus 15:2 — Moses' song after the Red Sea crossing. Isaiah places the exodus song in the mouth of the future redeemed community, declaring that the new deliverance is continuous with the old. The same God who split the sea is the God who comforts after exile.
2. The word yeshu'ah ('salvation') appears twice — at the beginning ('God is my salvation') and at the end ('he has become my salvation'). This framing makes salvation both the source (God's nature) and the experience (God's action). The name Yeshua (Jesus) derives from this root.
2. Zimrat can mean either 'song' or 'strength/protection' — the dual meaning may be intentional, creating a hendiadys: God is both the power that saves and the song that celebrates the saving. English must choose one; we choose 'song' because the parallel with oz ('strength') already covers the power dimension.

3. This verse shifts from singular 'you' (v. 1) to plural — the individual confession becomes communal celebration. The verb sha'av ('to draw water') is the ordinary, daily-life word for drawing water from a well. Salvation is compared not to a dramatic miracle but to the most routine domestic act — going to the well. The extraordinary becomes the ordinary rhythm of life in the redeemed community.
3. The phrase ma'ayanei ha-yeshu'ah ('wells/springs of salvation') was chanted during the Simchat Beit ha-Sho'evah, the water-drawing celebration during Sukkot at the Second Temple. Jesus likely alluded to this verse when he stood in the temple during Sukkot and cried, 'If anyone is thirsty, let him come to me and drink' (John 7:37-38).
3. After the fire imagery that dominated chapters 9-10 (fire of wickedness, fire of wrath, burning of thorns and briars), water appears as the counter-image. What fire consumed, water restores.
4. The second song begins with four imperatives in rapid succession: hodu ('give thanks'), qir'u ('call, proclaim'), hodi'u ('make known'), hazkiru ('declare, cause to remember'). The direction shifts outward — from personal confession (vv. 1-2) to public proclamation among the nations (ba-ammim, 'among the peoples'). Salvation is not private; it demands witness.
4. The phrase alilotav ('his deeds, his acts') carries the sense of God's mighty historical actions — the same word used for the acts of the exodus and conquest. The new salvation generates new testimony.
5. The verb zammeru ('sing, make music') calls for artistic, musical celebration — not mere speech but song. The reason: ki ge'ut asah ('for he has done gloriously/majestically'). Ge'ut is related to ga'ah ('to rise, to be exalted') — God's deeds are characterized by rising splendor, by a quality that lifts and exalts.
5. The final phrase muda'at zot bekhoh-ha-arets ('let this be known in all the earth') pushes the scope to global proclamation. What God has done for Israel is not Israel's private possession but news for the whole earth.
6. The chapter and the entire first section of Isaiah (chs. 1-12) conclude with the Holy One of Israel dwelling in Zion's midst. In chapter 6, Isaiah encountered the Holy One in the temple and was undone; here the same holiness generates unrestrained joy. The difference is not that God has become less holy but that the people have been purified through judgment — the remnant that survives can now bear the presence that once destroyed.
6. The verb tsahali ('shout, shriek') appeared in 10:30 as a cry of terror before the invading army. Here the same verb carries the opposite emotion — the sound that expressed panic at Assyria's approach now expresses ecstasy at God's presence. Isaiah recycles the vocabulary of judgment into the vocabulary of praise.
6. Yoshevet Tsiyyon ('inhabitant of Zion') is feminine singular, personifying Zion as a woman — a 'daughter Zion' figure who will become increasingly important in later chapters (37:22, 52:1-2, 54:1). The intimacy of the address — singular 'you,' not plural — makes the closing verse intensely personal even as it speaks to the entire community.
6. The phrase beqirbekh ('in your midst, within you') places the Holy One not above or beyond Zion but inside it — an indwelling presence. The holiness that could not be approached in chapter 6 now lives at the center of the community. This is the trajectory of the entire section: from unapproachable holiness to indwelling glory.

Summary: The oracle against Babylon opens with God mustering a vast army for the Day of the LORD. Cosmic imagery — darkened stars, a shaking heaven — signals total divine judgment. Babylon, the jewel of kingdoms, will become a permanent ruin like Sodom and Gomorrah.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the first of Isaiah's massa ('burden, oracle') collection against the nations (chapters 13–23), and it begins not with a minor neighbor but with Babylon — the empire that will eventually destroy Jerusalem, though in Isaiah's day Assyria is the dominant threat. The chapter's cosmic imagery (stars refusing their light, the heavens trembling, the earth jolted from its place) became the template for later Day of the LORD passages throughout the prophets and into apocalyptic literature. We note the deliberate literary architecture: the chapter moves from military muster (vv. 2–5) to cosmic collapse (vv. 9–13) to human horror (vv. 14–18) to desolate aftermath (vv. 19–22), each section escalating the scale of judgment. The Medes are named as God's instrument (v. 17), anchoring the cosmic poetry in identifiable history.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew massa in verse 1 resists a single English word. It derives from nasa' ('to lift, to carry') and can mean 'burden,' 'oracle,' 'pronouncement,' or 'utterance.' We rendered it 'oracle' for clarity, but the connotation of weight — a heavy word laid upon the prophet — is lost. In verse 10, the phrase kisleihem ('their constellations') uses a word whose exact astronomical referent is debated; we rendered 'constellations' and noted the uncertainty. The imperatives in verses 2–3 present an unusual challenge:

God speaks of His consecrated warriors (mequddashay) and His proudly exulting ones — language that dignifies a pagan army as instruments of divine purpose. We preserved this tension rather than softening it.

Connections: The Day of the LORD imagery here draws on Joel 2:10, 31 and Amos 5:18–20, where the concept is already established. The Sodom and Gomorrah comparison (v. 19) recalls Genesis 19 and will recur in Isaiah 1:9. The cosmic signs — darkened sun, blood-red moon, shaking heavens — reappear in Isaiah 24:23, Joel 2:31, and are quoted by Jesus in Matthew 24:29. The depiction of Babylon as the 'glory of kingdoms' (tsevi mamlakhot) inverts the title 'glory' (tsevi) that Isaiah elsewhere reserves for God's own splendor (Isaiah 4:2, 28:5).

¹The oracle concerning Babylon, which Isaiah son of Amoz saw.

²On a bare hilltop raise a banner!
Lift your voice to them!
Wave your hand
so they enter the gates of the nobles.

³I have given orders to my consecrated ones;
I have summoned my warriors for my anger —
my proudly exulting ones.

⁴The sound of a multitude in the mountains —
like a vast people!
The roar of kingdoms,
nations assembling!
The LORD of Hosts is mustering an army for war.

⁵They come from a distant land, from the edge of the heavens —
the LORD and the weapons of his fury — to devastate the whole earth.

⁶Wail! For the day of the LORD is near — it comes as devastation from the Almighty.

⁷Therefore every hand will go limp,
and every human heart will melt.

⁸They are terrified — pangs and agony seize them;
they writhe like a woman in labor.
They stare at one another in horror,
their faces ablaze.

⁹Look — the day of the LORD is coming,
cruel, with fury and burning anger,
to make the earth a desolation
and to destroy its sinners from it.

¹⁰For the stars of the heavens and their constellations will not flash their light.

The sun will be dark when it rises,
and the moon will not shed its glow.

¹¹I will punish the world for its evil and the wicked for their guilt.
I will put an end to the pride of the arrogant and bring low the insolence of tyrants.

¹²I will make a mortal rarer than fine gold,
a human rarer than the gold of Ophir.

¹³Therefore I will make the heavens tremble, and the earth will be shaken from its place in the fury of the LORD of Hosts,
on the day of his burning anger.

¹⁴Then it will be like a hunted gazelle, like sheep with no one to gather them.
Each will turn to his own people;
each will flee to his own land.

¹⁵Everyone who is found will be pierced through;
everyone who is captured will fall by the sword.

¹⁶Their infants will be dashed to pieces before their eyes;
their houses will be plundered,
their wives violated.

¹⁷Look — I am rousing the Medes against them, who have no regard for silver and take no delight in gold.

¹⁸Their bows will cut down the young men;
they will have no mercy on the fruit of the womb.
Their eyes will not spare children.

¹⁹And Babylon — the jewel of kingdoms, the splendor of the Chaldeans' pride — will be like God's overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah.

²⁰It will never be inhabited,
nor will anyone dwell there from generation to generation.
No nomad will pitch a tent there;
no shepherds will rest their flocks there.

²¹But desert creatures will crouch there,
and their houses will be filled with howling animals.

Ostriches will dwell there,
and wild goats will leap about.

²²Jackals will howl in her fortresses, and wild dogs in her luxurious palaces.
Her time is close at hand;
her days will not be prolonged.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew massa ('oracle, burden') opens the first of Isaiah's foreign-nation pronouncements (chapters 13–23). The word derives from nasa' ('to lift, to carry'), suggesting a weighty utterance that the prophet bears. We chose 'oracle' for clarity, but 'burden' captures the Hebrew connotation that prophetic revelation is not a privilege — it is something carried.
1. The verb chazah ('saw') rather than the more common ra'ah indicates visionary perception — this is prophetic sight, not ordinary observation. The same verb gives us the noun chazon ('vision'), which opens the book in Isaiah 1:1.
2. The Hebrew har nishpeh ('bare mountain, swept hill') suggests a treeless height — visible from far away, ideal for signaling. The imperatives (se'u, harimu, hanifu) are rapid-fire commands: raise, lift, wave. God is marshaling an army with the urgency of a field commander.
2. The phrase pitchei nedivim ('gates of the nobles') is ambiguous: it could refer to the gates through which nobles enter, or to the noble gates of Babylon itself. We retained the ambiguity. The overall image is of a vast military muster summoned by signal from a hilltop.
3. God speaks in first person: ani tsiveiti ('I have commanded'). The mequddashay ('my consecrated ones') is striking — qadash means to set apart for sacred purpose. These warriors, likely the Medes (named in v. 17), are 'consecrated' not because they worship the LORD but because God has designated them for a sacred task. The language of holy war is applied to a pagan army.
3. The phrase allizei ga'avati ('my proudly exulting ones') presents a translation challenge. These warriors exult in their own military pride, yet God claims that pride as His instrument. We rendered 'my proudly exulting ones' to preserve both the warriors' arrogance and God's ownership of the outcome.
4. The verse builds through three parallel sound-images: qol hamon ('sound of a multitude'), demut am rav ('likeness of a vast people'), qol she'on ('sound/roar of tumult'). The effect is acoustic — the reader hears the army before seeing it.
4. The title YHWH tseva'ot ('the LORD of Hosts') appears here with pointed irony: the God whose title means 'LORD of Armies' is mustering an army (tseva) for war (milchamah). The title is not decorative but functional — He is doing what His name says He does.
5. The phrase miqtseh ha-shamayim ('from the edge of the heavens') expands the army's origin to cosmic proportions — they come not merely from a distant country but from the horizon where earth meets sky. The military muster becomes a theophany.
5. The kelei za'mo ('weapons of his fury/indignation') identifies the foreign army as God's own armament. The verb chabbel ('to devastate, to ruin') carries overtones of birth pangs (chevel), anticipating verse 8 where the same root describes Babylon's agony.
6. The imperative heililu ('wail!') is an onomatopoeic cry of anguish — the word sounds like the wailing it commands. The wordplay ke-shod mi-Shaddai ('as devastation from the Almighty') is untranslatable: shod ('devastation') echoes within the divine name Shaddai, creating a sound-link between the Almighty and the destruction He sends. The same wordplay appears in Joel 1:15.
6. The 'day of the LORD' (yom YHWH) is a technical prophetic concept: not simply a calendar day but a decisive moment when God intervenes directly in history. Here it is applied against Babylon, not against Israel — a reversal of Amos 5:18, where Israelites wrongly assumed the Day would favor them.
7. The paired images — limp hands (yadayim tirpenah) and melting hearts (levav enosh yimmas) — describe total physical and psychological collapse. The verb raphah ('to be slack, to go limp') suggests hands that can no longer grip a weapon or tool. The verb masas ('to melt') is used elsewhere for wax melting before fire (Psalm 68:2) — the image is of courage dissolving entirely.
8. The birth-pangs metaphor (ka-yoledah yechilun, 'like a woman giving birth they writhe') is a stock prophetic image for inescapable suffering (cf. Jeremiah 4:31, Micah 4:10). The verb chul ('to writhe, to twist') is the same used for the earth's creation in Psalm 90:2, connecting cosmic upheaval with bodily agony.
8. The phrase penei lehavim peneihem ('their faces are faces of flames') is debated: it may mean faces flushed red with terror, faces reflecting actual fire, or faces contorted like flickering flames. We rendered 'faces ablaze' to preserve the ambiguity.
9. Three words pile up for divine wrath: akhzari ('cruel, merciless'), evrah ('fury, overflowing rage'), and charon af ('burning anger,' literally 'burning of the nose'). The accumulation is deliberate — no single word suffices for this judgment.

9. The shift from ha-arets as 'the land' (Babylon specifically) to 'the earth' (cosmic scope) is characteristic of Day of the LORD rhetoric. The particular judgment on Babylon becomes a paradigm for universal judgment. We rendered 'earth' to preserve the cosmic overtone the Hebrew sustains.
10. The word kesleihem ('their constellations') derives from kesil, which in Job 9:9 and 38:31 refers to Orion. Here the plural likely means major constellations generally. The exact astronomical identification is uncertain, but the poetic point is clear: every source of celestial light fails.
10. This verse became the template for cosmic-judgment imagery throughout the prophets: Joel 2:10, 31; Amos 8:9; Ezekiel 32:7. Jesus quotes this tradition in Matthew 24:29 and Mark 13:24–25. The darkening of the heavens signals that creation itself recoils from God's judgment.
11. God speaks again in first person: u-faqadti ('and I will visit/punish'). The verb paqad here carries its judicial sense — divine visitation as reckoning. The targets are tevel ('the world,' the inhabited earth) and resha'im ('the wicked').
11. The parallelism of ge'on zedim ('pride of the insolent') and ga'avat aritsim ('arrogance of tyrants') uses two near-synonyms for pride and two for oppressors, hammering the point: every form of human self-exaltation will be flattened. The verb ashpil ('I will bring low') is the antonym of the self-elevation it targets.
12. The verse is grimly ironic: enosh ('a mortal') will become rarer than paz ('refined gold'), and adam ('a human being') rarer than ketem Ofir ('gold of Ophir'). This is not a promise of human dignity but a prophecy of depopulation — so few will survive that a single person will be more scarce than the most precious metal. Ophir was the legendary source of the finest gold (1 Kings 9:28, 10:11).
12. The two Hebrew words for humanity — enosh (emphasizing frailty) and adam (emphasizing creatureliness) — underscore that it is mortal, earthly beings who will become scarce.
13. The verb argiz ('I will make tremble, I will agitate') applied to the heavens, and tir'ash ('will quake') applied to the earth, describe creation itself convulsing. The phrase mi-meqomah ('from its place') suggests the earth being jolted off its foundation — a return to pre-creation chaos.
13. The verse combines the divine title YHWH tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts') with evrat ('fury of') and yom charon appo ('the day of the burning of his anger'). This is the fullest expression of the Day of the LORD in the chapter — the God of Armies unleashing cosmic wrath.
14. The two similes — tsevi muddach ('a driven gazelle') and tso'n ve-ein meqabbets ('sheep without a gatherer') — describe Babylon's cosmopolitan population scattering in panic. The irony is that Babylon, which gathered nations by conquest, will see those same nations flee when the gathering force collapses.
14. The verbs yifnu ('they will turn') and yanusu ('they will flee') describe the complete dissolution of imperial cohesion. The foreigners who served Babylon will abandon it instantly when judgment falls.
15. The verse shifts to the fate of those who cannot flee. The passive nimtsa ('is found') and nispeh ('is swept up, captured') describe helpless victims. The verbs yiddaquer ('will be pierced') and yippol ('will fall') are the standard vocabulary of battlefield slaughter. The poetry's compression — two short, parallel lines — mirrors the swift, indiscriminate violence.
16. This is one of the most brutal verses in the prophets. The verb yeruteshshu ('will be dashed') describes infants smashed against stone — the same atrocity appears in Psalm 137:9 and Hosea 13:16. The Masoretes replaced the original verb tishagalnah (a coarse term for sexual violation) with the euphemistic tishkavnah ('will be lain with'), but the Qere/Ketiv tradition preserves both readings. We rendered 'violated' to convey the violence without the crude Hebrew original.
16. The prophet does not celebrate this violence — he reports it as the horror it is. The purpose is to show what the Day of the LORD actually looks like on the ground: not abstract cosmic judgment but concrete human devastation.
17. The Medes (Maday) are named as God's chosen instrument of judgment. Historically, the Medo-Persian empire under Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539 BCE. The detail that they 'have no regard for silver' and 'take no delight in gold' means they cannot be bought off — this army is incorruptible because its motivation is destruction, not plunder.
17. The divine hineni ('look, I am about to') signals imminent action. God claims direct agency: me'ir ('rousing, stirring up') — the Medes may not know they serve the LORD, but the prophet knows.
18. The escalation is deliberate: from young men (ne'arim) to the fruit of the womb (peri veten) to children (banim). The verb yerachemu ('they will have mercy') is from the same root as rechem ('womb') — the Medes will show no womb-compassion even toward those who came from the womb. The wordplay is devastating.
18. The phrase lo tachuss einam ('their eyes will not spare') means not even a glance of pity. The Medes' mercilessness is presented as God's instrument — a theological tension the text does not resolve.
19. The title tsevi mamlakhot ('jewel/glory of kingdoms') uses tsevi, a word Isaiah elsewhere reserves for God's own beauty (4:2, 28:5). Babylon has claimed for itself the splendor that belongs to God — and that is precisely what will be stripped away.
19. The comparison to Sodom and Gomorrah (ke-mahpekhat Elohim et Sedom ve-et Amorah) is the ultimate image of irreversible divine destruction. The verb mahpekah ('overthrow, overturning') is used exclusively for Sodom's destruction in the Hebrew Bible — it has become a technical term. Babylon's fate is not conquest but annihilation.

- 20. Four negations (lo ... lo ... lo ... lo) hammer the permanence of Babylon's desolation. The city that was the center of civilization will not support even its most basic form — a nomad's tent or a shepherd's fold. The phrase ad dor va-dor ('generation to generation') means forever.
- 20. The 'Aravi ('nomad, Arabian, Bedouin') represents the most minimal form of human habitation — a tent-dweller who needs almost nothing. Even this cannot exist in the ruins of Babylon.
- 21. The identification of the creatures is uncertain. Tsiyyim ('desert creatures') may be jackals or hyenas. Ochim ('howling animals') is a hapax legomenon — it occurs only here, and its meaning is inferred from context and the root for 'howl.' Benot ya'anah is traditionally 'ostriches' but could be 'eagle owls.' Se'irim literally means 'hairy ones' — possibly wild goats, but the word is also used for 'demons' or 'satyrs' in Leviticus 17:7 and 2 Chronicles 11:15.
- 21. The ambiguity of se'irim is theologically significant: if they are merely wild goats, the image is of natural desolation; if they are demonic figures, the image is of supernatural horror reclaiming the ruins. We chose 'wild goats' as the primary zoological meaning and noted the demonic overtone.
- 22. The iiyim ('howlers,' probably jackals) and tannim ('jackals' or 'wild dogs') inhabit the almenotav ('her widowed buildings' or 'her fortresses') and heikhlei oneg ('palaces of delight'). The contrast between 'palaces of delight' and the animals that now inhabit them is the chapter's final irony: Babylon's luxury becomes a den for scavengers.
- 22. The closing phrase — qarov lavo ittah ('her time is close to come') — is both a prophecy and a reassurance to Israel. Babylon's seemingly invincible power has an expiration date that God has set. The verb yimmashekhu ('will be prolonged, drawn out') is negated: there will be no extension, no reprieve.

Summary: God promises compassion for Israel and the fall of Babylon's king. A taunting funeral song mocks the tyrant's descent to Sheol, including the famous address to helel ben-shachar ('shining one, son of the dawn'). The chapter closes with brief oracles against Assyria and Philistia.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 12 is one of the most interpreted verses in the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrew helel ben-shachar ('shining one, son of the dawn') addresses the fallen king of Babylon using the imagery of a celestial body — likely the morning star (Venus) — that rises brilliantly but is extinguished by daylight. The Latin Vulgate translated helel as 'Lucifer' ('light-bearer'), and from the Church Fathers onward, the passage was read as a description of Satan's fall from heaven. We rendered directly from the Hebrew and present all interpretive traditions in the notes without resolving the tension. The taunt-song (mashal, vv. 4–21) is one of the great literary achievements of the Hebrew Bible: a funeral dirge sung over a living tyrant, where even the trees rejoice at his death and the dead kings of the nations rise from their thrones in Sheol to mock him. The poetry oscillates between the cosmic and the grotesque — from stars and clouds to maggots and worms.

Translation Friction: *The central translation challenge is helel ben-shachar in verse 12. The word helel occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible, making it a hapax legomenon. Its root (h-l-l) can mean 'to shine' or 'to boast/praise,' yielding either 'shining one' or 'boaster.' We chose 'shining one' because the astral context (son of the dawn, ascending to heaven, setting a throne above the stars) demands it, and noted the 'boaster' reading. We deliberately avoided 'Lucifer,' which is the Latin translation, not the Hebrew. In verse 11, the word rimmah ('maggots') and tole'ah ('worms') form the dead king's burial shroud — we preserved the visceral Hebrew rather than softening it. The mashal form itself (v. 4) resists easy classification: it is part taunt, part dirge, part wisdom saying.*

Connections: *The taunt-song draws on ancient Near Eastern mythology about divine mountain assemblies (v. 13, har mo'ed, 'mountain of assembly') and the ascent of celestial beings. Ezekiel 28:11–19 contains a parallel passage about the king of Tyre using similar cosmic imagery. Jesus's statement 'I saw Satan fall like lightning from heaven' (Luke 10:18) may allude to this passage. The 'mountain of assembly in the far north' (v. 13) echoes Psalms 48:2's description of Zion as 'the heights of Zaphon.' The brief Assyria oracle (vv. 24–27) connects to Isaiah 10:5–19, where Assyria is likewise God's instrument that overreaches. The Philistia oracle (vv. 28–32) anticipates the fuller treatment in chapters 20 and Amos 1:6–8.*

1For the LORD will have compassion on Jacob and will again choose Israel

and settle them on their own soil.
The foreigner will join himself to them and attach himself to the house of Jacob.

²Peoples will take them and bring them to their place, and the house of Israel will possess them on the LORD's soil as male and female servants.
They will take captive those who captured them and rule over those who oppressed them.

³On the day the LORD gives you rest from your pain and your turmoil and from the hard labor
that was forced upon you,

⁴you will take up this taunt against the king of Babylon and say:
How the oppressor has ended!
How the fury has ended!

⁵The LORD has broken the staff of the wicked,
the scepter of rulers —

⁶the one who struck peoples in fury with unceasing blows, who trampled nations in anger with relentless persecution.

⁷The whole earth rests and is quiet;
they break out in joyful song.

⁸Even the cypresses rejoice over you,
the cedars of Lebanon:
'Since you were laid low,
no woodcutter comes up against us.'

⁹Sheol below is astir for you, ready to greet your arrival.
It rouses the shades for you —
all the chief rulers of the earth.
It raises from their thrones
all the kings of the nations.

¹⁰They all respond and say to you:
'You too have become weak like us!
You have become like us!'

¹¹Your majesty has been brought down to Sheol, along with the music of your harps.
Maggots are spread beneath you;
worms are your covering.

¹²How you have fallen from the heavens,
 shining one, son of the dawn!
 How you have been cut down to the earth,
 you who laid nations low!

¹³You said in your heart:
 'I will ascend to the heavens;
 above the stars of God
 I will raise my throne.
 I will sit on the mountain of assembly,
 in the far reaches of the north.'

¹⁴'I will ascend above the heights of the clouds;
 I will make myself like the Most High.'

¹⁵But you are brought down to Sheol, to the depths of the pit.

¹⁶Those who see you will stare at you,
 will peer closely at you:
 'Is this the man who shook the earth,
 who made kingdoms tremble?'

¹⁷'Who made the world like a desert and tore down its cities, who never released his prisoners to go home?'

¹⁸All the kings of the nations — all of them — lie in honor, each in his own tomb.

¹⁹But you are cast out from your grave like a loathed branch, covered with the slain,
 those pierced by the sword, who go down to the stones of the pit —
 like a trampled corpse.

²⁰You will not be joined with them in burial,
 for you destroyed your own land,
 you slaughtered your own people.
 The offspring of evildoers will never be named again.

²¹Prepare a slaughter for his sons because of their fathers' guilt,
 so they will not rise and possess the earth or fill the face of the world with cities.

²²I will rise against them,
declares the LORD of Hosts.
I will cut off from Babylon name and remnant, offspring and posterity,
declares the LORD.

²³I will make her a possession of the hedgehog and pools of standing water.
I will sweep her with the broom of destruction,
declares the LORD of Hosts.

²⁴The LORD of Hosts has sworn:
'Surely, as I have planned, so it will be;
as I have purposed, so it will stand —

²⁵to break Assyria in my land and to trample him on my mountains.
Then his yoke will be removed from them,
and his burden will depart from their shoulders.'

²⁶This is the plan devised for the whole earth;
this is the hand stretched out over all the nations.

²⁷For the LORD of Hosts has purposed — and who can thwart it?
His hand is stretched out —
and who can turn it back?

²⁸In the year that King Ahaz died,
this oracle came:

²⁹Do not rejoice, all you Philistia,
that the rod that struck you is broken.
For from the serpent's root a viper will emerge,
and its fruit will be a flying fiery serpent.

³⁰The poorest of the poor will find pasture,
and the needy will lie down in safety.
But I will kill your root with famine,
and your remnant he will slay.

³¹Wail, gate! Cry out, city!
Melt away, all you Philistia!
For smoke comes from the north,
and no one breaks rank in his formations.

³²And what will one answer the messengers of the nation?
That the LORD has founded Zion, and in her the afflicted of his people find refuge.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb yerachem ('will have compassion') from the root r-ch-m (womb-love) signals God's renewed tenderness toward His people. The phrase u-vachar od ('and will again choose') restates Israel's election — the exile did not cancel the covenant but interrupted its visible expression.
1. The phrase ve-nilvah ha-ger ('and the foreigner will join') anticipates the universalism that Isaiah develops more fully in chapters 56 and 60. Even in an oracle of national restoration, the door remains open to outsiders.
2. The reversal is total: Israel's captors become Israel's servants. The phrase shobim le-shoveihem ('taking captive those who took them captive') uses the same root (sh-b-h) in both subject and object positions, creating a verbal mirror of the reversal.
2. The mention of servants (avadim ve-shefachot) is uncomfortable to modern readers. The text presents it as poetic justice — the oppressed become the masters — without moralizing about the institution. We rendered literally and let the tension stand.
3. The verse is transitional, setting up the taunt-song. The three burdens removed — otsev ('pain, sorrow'), rogez ('turmoil, agitation'), and avodah qashah ('hard labor') — echo the Exodus vocabulary. Israel's deliverance from Babylon is cast as a second Exodus, with the same terms used for Egyptian bondage (Exodus 1:14, 6:9).
4. The mashal here is specifically a taunt-song — a funeral dirge sung mockingly over a living (or recently dead) tyrant. The genre combines elements of lament, wisdom saying, and political satire.
4. The word madheveh in the final line is textually difficult. The Masoretic text reads madheveh, possibly meaning 'golden city' or 'golden splendor,' but the Dead Sea Scrolls (1QIsa) read marheveh ('fury, oppression'). We followed the Qumran reading ('fury') as it produces better parallelism with noges ('oppressor'). The KJV's 'golden city' follows the MT.
5. The matteh ('staff') and shevet ('scepter') are symbols of authority. The LORD has snapped them — the instruments of oppressive power are rendered useless. The same word shevet means both 'scepter' and 'rod of punishment,' so the image works on two levels: the ruler's authority and his instrument of cruelty are both broken.
6. The participles makkeh ('striking') and rodeh ('trampling, ruling harshly') describe the tyrant's habitual behavior — this was not a single act but a constant pattern. The phrase makkot bilti sarah ('blows without turning aside') means unceasing, unrelenting violence.
6. The final phrase murdaf beli chasakh ('pursued without restraint') can be read as the king pursuing others without restraint, or as the king himself now being pursued. The ambiguity may be intentional — the hunter becomes the hunted.
7. The brevity is the point: nachah shaqtah kol ha-arets ('at rest, quiet, the whole earth'). After the relentless violence of verse 6, silence falls — and then erupts into singing. The verb patschu ('they break out') suggests joy that can no longer be contained. The earth itself becomes the choir.
8. The trees speak — a personification that is both whimsical and devastating. The beroshim ('cypresses') and arzei Levanon ('cedars of Lebanon') were the prized timber of ancient Near Eastern empires, felled by conquest to build palaces and temples. The trees celebrate because the tyrant's death means the end of deforestation. The imperial logging program was literal ecological destruction.
8. The phrase me-az shakhavta ('since you were laid low') uses the same verb (shakav) for the king's death that will be used for his arrival in Sheol — he has been 'laid down' like a felled tree.
9. Sheol is personified as a host preparing to receive a guest. The repha'im ('shades, spirits of the dead') are the inhabitants of the underworld — once-powerful rulers now reduced to shadows. The word attudei ('chief rulers,' literally 'he-goats' used metaphorically for leaders) emphasizes that these were the great ones of the earth.
9. The image of dead kings rising from thrones in Sheol is unique in the Hebrew Bible. They maintain a ghostly parody of their former status — seated on thrones but powerless, dead but conscious enough to mock.
10. The dead kings' greeting is a taunt: gam attah chulleita kamonu ('you too have been made weak like us'). The verb chalah ('to be weak, to be sick') strips the tyrant of every pretension. The repetition — 'like us ... like us' — is the sting: the one who set himself above all nations is now indistinguishable from every other corpse in Sheol.
11. The contrast is devastating: ge'onekha ('your majesty, your pomp') paired with hemyat nevalekha ('the music of your harps') represents the pinnacle of royal luxury — and both descend to Sheol. The king's bed is now rimmah ('maggots') and his blanket tole'ah ('worms'). The Hebrew is visceral and we preserved it without euphemism.
11. The word nevalim (singular nevel) refers to stringed instruments, likely lyres or harps — the soundtrack of royal banquets. In Sheol, the music stops and decomposition begins.
12. This is the most interpreted verse in the chapter. The Hebrew helel ben-shachar ('shining one, son of the dawn') addresses the fallen king of Babylon using astral imagery. The word helel is a hapax legomenon — it occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible. Its root (h-l-l) most likely means 'to shine, to flash,' making helel a title for the morning star (Venus), which rises brilliantly but is extinguished by sunrise. The epithet ben-shachar ('son of the dawn') confirms the astral reference.

12. The Latin Vulgate translated helel as 'Lucifer' ('light-bearer'), which was originally simply a Latin rendering of the Hebrew meaning. From the Church Fathers onward — particularly Tertullian, Origen, and Augustine — the passage was read as a description of Satan's primordial fall from heaven, conflating the Babylonian king with a cosmic rebel angel. This interpretation influenced centuries of Christian theology, art, and literature (most notably Milton's Paradise Lost). However, the Hebrew text addresses a human king, not a supernatural being, and the literary context is a taunt-song mocking a dead tyrant. We rendered directly from the Hebrew as 'shining one, son of the dawn' and present all traditions without resolving the tension.
12. The verb nigda'ta ('you have been cut down') uses the same language applied to felled trees (cf. v. 8), connecting the king's fall to the cedars' rejoicing. The one who cut down trees has himself been cut down.
13. The king's five 'I will' declarations (vv. 13–14) represent the ultimate in human hubris. The phrase kokhvei El ('stars of God') refers to the celestial host — the king intends to place his throne above the very stars.
13. The har mo'ed ('mountain of assembly') in the yarketei tsafon ('far reaches of the north') draws on Canaanite mythology: Mount Zaphon (modern Jebel Aqra in Syria) was the seat of the divine council in Ugaritic tradition, the equivalent of Mount Olympus. The king claims a seat among the gods. Psalm 48:2 applies tsafon to Mount Zion, reclaiming the mythological geography for the LORD.
14. The climax of the five boasts: eddammeḥ le-Elyon ('I will make myself like the Most High'). The divine title Elyon ('Most High') is one of the oldest names for God in the Hebrew Bible (Genesis 14:18–22). The king's ambition is not merely to rival God but to replicate Him — to become indistinguishable from the Most High. This is the essence of the hubris the taunt-song condemns.
14. The bamotei av ('heights of the clouds') places the king above the weather itself — above the storm clouds that are elsewhere God's chariot (Psalm 104:3). Every element of the created order is beneath him in his own imagination.
15. The reversal is total and abrupt: akh ('but, yet') introduces the devastating contrast. The king who claimed the heights of heaven (v. 14) is brought to the yarketei vor ('depths of the pit') — the lowest point of Sheol. The same word yarketei ('far reaches, depths') was used in verse 13 for the 'far reaches' of the north where the gods dwell. The king reaches the extreme — but in the wrong direction.
16. The verbs yashgichu ('they will stare') and yitbonanu ('they will peer closely, examine') suggest disbelief — the onlookers cannot reconcile what they see (a corpse) with what they remember (a world-shaker). The rhetorical question ha-zeh ha-ish ('is this the man?') reduces the cosmic tyrant to a demonstrative pronoun: this? This is the one?
17. Three charges define the tyrant's legacy: he turned the habitable world (tevel) into desert (midbar), destroyed cities (arav haras), and imprisoned people without release (lo fatach baytah, 'did not open [the door] homeward'). The final charge — refusing to release prisoners — may allude to the Babylonian policy of permanent exile, which Cyrus famously reversed.
18. The emphasis kullam ('all of them') underscores the contrast that follows. Every other king, no matter how minor, received a dignified burial — shakhvu ve-khavod ('they lay in honor') in beit ('house,' here meaning tomb or burial chamber). The Babylonian king alone will be denied this basic dignity.
19. The imagery is of a body thrown out of its tomb — denied burial and left among the anonymous war dead. The simile ke-netser nit'av ('like a loathed branch') compares the king to a diseased or useless shoot pruned from a tree and thrown away. The word netser ('branch, shoot') is ironic: in Isaiah 11:1, the same word describes the messianic shoot from Jesse's stump. This king is the anti-netser — a branch not planted but discarded.
19. The phrase ke-feger muvas ('like a trampled corpse') is the final indignity: the body is not merely unburied but actively stepped on. In the ancient Near East, denial of proper burial was the worst possible fate — it meant the spirit could find no rest.
20. The charges now turn inward: the king did not merely destroy foreign nations — he destroyed artsekha ('your own land') and killed ammekha ('your own people'). The tyrant's evil was indiscriminate, extending even to those he was supposed to protect.
20. The curse zera mere'im ('offspring of evildoers') extends judgment beyond the king to his dynasty. The phrase lo yiqqare le-olam ('will never be named') means the dynasty will be so thoroughly erased that no one will even speak their names — the ultimate death in an honor-based culture.
21. The command to prepare a matbe'ach ('slaughter, slaughtering place') for the king's sons is chilling — the dynasty must be eradicated so completely that it cannot rebuild. The fear is that the sons might yarsh ('possess, inherit') the earth and rebuild the empire's city-network.
21. The concept of collective punishment — sons suffering for fathers' guilt — reflects ancient Near Eastern political reality: rival dynasties were eliminated to prevent counter-coups. The text presents it as God's command without moral commentary.
22. The divine speech formula ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD') brackets the verse, giving it maximum authority. The four things cut off — shem ('name'), she'ar ('remnant'), nin ('offspring'), and nekhd ('posterity') — cover every possible form of continuation: reputation, survivors, children, and grandchildren. The erasure is total.
22. The phrase ve-qamti aleihem ('I will rise against them') uses the same verb (qum) that the king's sons were forbidden to do in verse 21. God rises; the dynasty does not.
23. The qippod ('hedgehog' or possibly 'bittern/porcupine') is a creature of waste places — its presence signals that the city has returned to wild habitat. The agmei mayim ('pools of water') suggest that Babylon's elaborate canal system will collapse into stagnant marshes.

- 23. The vivid metaphor mate'ate'a ha-shmed ('broom of destruction') is unique to this verse. God sweeps Babylon away like dust from a floor. The domestic image applied to cosmic destruction is startling in its banality — the greatest empire in the world is household debris.
- 24. The shift from Babylon to Assyria begins with a divine oath (nishba, 'has sworn'). When YHWH swears, He stakes His own character on the outcome. The parallelism between dimmiti ('I have planned/imagined') and ya'atsti ('I have purposed/counseled') emphasizes that world events are not random — they unfold according to divine intention.
- 25. The Assyria oracle (vv. 24–27) shifts the focus from the distant future (Babylon's fall) to the nearer threat. The possessive pronouns are emphatic: be-artsi ('in my land'), ve-al harai ('on my mountains'). The LORD claims the land and mountains of Israel as His own territory — Assyria has trespassed on divine property.
- 25. The yoke-and-burden imagery (ullo, 'his yoke'; subbolo, 'his burden') appears in Isaiah 9:4 and 10:27, creating a thread through the book. Assyrian oppression is consistently described as a physical weight that God will lift.
- 26. The verse generalizes: what God has done to Assyria reveals His etsah ('plan, counsel') for kol ha-arets ('the whole earth'). The 'outstretched hand' (ha-yad ha-netuyah) is an Exodus image — Deuteronomy 4:34 uses it for God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Here the same hand that liberated now judges all nations.
- 27. Two rhetorical questions seal the Assyria oracle. The verb yafer ('can annul, can thwart') and yeshivannah ('can turn it back') challenge any power — human or divine — to resist God's purpose. The implied answer is: no one. This is Isaiah's doctrine of divine sovereignty in its most compressed form.
- 28. The Philistia oracle (vv. 28–32) is dated to the death of Ahaz (ca. 715 BCE), providing a rare chronological anchor. The death of a Judahite king who had been an Assyrian vassal would have raised hopes among Philistia that the political landscape was shifting — the oracle warns them that it is shifting, but not in their favor.
- 29. The serpent imagery escalates through three stages: nachash ('serpent') gives way to tsepha ('viper, adder') which produces saraph me'opheph ('flying fiery serpent'). Each generation of the snake is more dangerous than the last. The 'rod that struck you' likely refers to a particular Assyrian or Judahite king whose death the Philistines celebrated prematurely.
- 29. The saraph me'opheph ('flying fiery serpent') uses the same word as the seraphim of Isaiah 6 — the burning ones. Whether this is a mythological creature or hyperbolic language for a terrifying enemy, the message is clear: what comes next will be worse than what came before.
- 30. The contrast is sharp: Israel's poor (bekholei dallim, literally 'firstborn of the poor,' meaning the most vulnerable) will be fed and secure, while Philistia's root (shorshekh) will starve. The agricultural metaphor — root dying of famine — inverts the serpent-root imagery of verse 29.
- 30. The shift from first person ('I will kill') to third person ('he will slay') is characteristic of prophetic speech, where God's voice and the prophet's voice blend. The 'he' likely refers to the coming Judahite or Assyrian ruler.
- 31. The imperatives heilili ('wail!') and za'aqi ('cry out!') address the fortified cities of Philistia directly. The smoke from the north (ashan mi-tsafon) signals an approaching army — dust clouds or burning villages on the horizon. The phrase ein boded be-mo'adav ('no one breaks rank in his appointed formations') describes a disciplined, unstoppable force.
- 32. The chapter ends with a theological declaration: YHWH yissad Tsiyyon ('the LORD has founded Zion'). The verb yissad ('has founded, has established') means Zion's security rests not on military power but on divine establishment. The 'afflicted of his people' (aniyyei ammo) — the poor, the humble, the oppressed — are the ones who find shelter there.
- 32. The mal'akhei goi ('messengers of the nation') are likely Philistine envoys seeking an alliance with Judah. The answer to their diplomatic overture is theological, not political: Judah's security is the LORD, not foreign alliances. This anticipates Isaiah's consistent anti-alliance theology (chapters 30–31).

Summary: The oracle against Moab opens with a night of sudden destruction. City after city falls, and Moab's population flees southward in lamentation. The prophet himself weeps for Moab's devastation, producing some of the most empathetic poetry in the prophetic corpus.

What Makes This Remarkable: What makes this oracle extraordinary is its tone. Unlike the oracles against Babylon (chapter 13) or Philistia (14:28–32), where God's judgment is announced with severity, the Moab oracle is saturated with grief. The prophet does not stand outside Moab's suffering — he enters it. Verse 5 declares 'my heart cries out for Moab,' and the entire chapter reads more like a lament than a pronouncement of doom. This empathy is theologically startling: Moab is Israel's ancient rival (descended from Lot, Genesis 19:37), often hostile, yet the prophet mourns for Moab as though mourning for his own people. We note the geographic precision: the oracle traces a specific flight path from Ar and Kir in the north to the waters of Nimrim and the Wadi of the Willows in the south, mapping Moab's collapse city by city. The geographic detail lends documentary weight to what is otherwise deeply emotional poetry.

Translation Friction: The Moabite place names presented our most persistent challenge. Many of these cities — Ar, Kir, Dibon, Medeba, Heshbon, Elealeh, Jahaz, Zoar, Horonaim, Nimrim — are attested in the Mesha Stele (the Moabite Stone, ca. 840 BCE) and other ancient sources, but their exact locations are debated for several. We transliterated consistently and provided geographic context in the notes. The verb yeilil ('he wails') recurs throughout the chapter, and we varied the English ('wails,' 'howls,' 'laments') to avoid monotony while trying to preserve the Hebrew's deliberate repetition of the same root (y-l-l). In verse 9, the difficult phrase mei Dimon ('waters of Dimon') appears to be a wordplay on dam ('blood') — Dibon becomes Dimon to activate the blood-pun. We rendered 'Dimon' and explained the wordplay in the notes.

Connections: This oracle has a near-duplicate in Jeremiah 48, which expands and reapplies much of the same material to a later historical setting. The shared vocabulary suggests either a common source or Jeremiah's deliberate reuse of Isaiah's text. The Moabite cities named here appear in Numbers 21:26–30 (the Song of Heshbon) and in the Mesha Stele, providing archaeological corroboration for the geographic framework. The 'waters of Nimrim' (v. 6) and the 'Wadi of the Willows' (v. 7) mark the southern boundary of Moab, near the Dead Sea — the same region where Ruth's story begins (Ruth 1:1). The prophet's weeping for Moab echoes the compassion theology that runs through Isaiah: even enemies are mourned because they are God's creatures.

¹The oracle concerning Moab:

Because in a single night Ar of Moab is devastated — destroyed!

Because in a single night Kir of Moab is devastated — destroyed!

²He goes up to the temple — and Dibon to the high places — to weep.

Over Nebo and over Medeba, Moab wails.

Every head is shaved bald;

every beard is cut off.

³In her streets they put on sackcloth;

on her rooftops and in her squares

everyone wails,

collapsing in tears.

⁴Heshbon and Elealeh cry out;

their voice is heard as far as Jahaz.

Therefore the soldiers of Moab tremble;

their courage fails them.

⁵My heart cries out for Moab!

Her fugitives flee to Zoar, to Eglath-sheleshiah.

Up the ascent of Luhith

they go weeping;

on the road to Horonaim

they raise a cry of anguish.

⁶For the waters of Nimrim are desolate;

the grass is withered, the vegetation is gone,

nothing green remains.

7Therefore the wealth they have stored, their accumulated goods,
they carry away
across the Wadi of the Willows.

8For the cry of anguish encircles the borders of Moab;
her wailing reaches Eglaim;
her wailing reaches Beer-elim.

9For the waters of Dimon are full of blood, and I will bring still more upon Dimon:
a lion for the survivors of Moab,
for the remnant of the land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double ki beleil ('because in the night') creates a drumbeat of urgency: two cities fall in one night. The verb shuddad ('is devastated') paired with nidmah ('is destroyed, is silenced') emphasizes both the violence and its finality. The root d-m-h in nidmah can mean either 'to be destroyed' or 'to be silenced' — both meanings operate simultaneously: the cities are destroyed and their voices are silenced.
1. Ar and Kir are the two principal cities of Moab. Ar (possibly modern Khirbet el-Medeyineh) was on the Arnon River; Kir-Moab (Kir-Hareseth, modern Kerak) was the fortified capital on a high plateau. If both fall in a single night, Moab's entire defensive structure has collapsed.
2. The mourning rituals — shaved heads (qorchah) and cut beards (geru'ah) — were standard expressions of grief in the ancient Near East, though formally prohibited for Israelites (Leviticus 21:5, Deuteronomy 14:1). The prophet reports Moab's customs without condemnation, simply documenting their grief.
2. The 'temple' (ha-bayit, literally 'the house') likely refers to the temple of Chemosh, Moab's national deity. Dibon (modern Dhiban) was the city where the Mesha Stele was discovered. Nebo is not the mountain where Moses died but a Moabite town (attested in Numbers 32:3). Medeba (modern Madaba) is known for its Byzantine mosaic map but was an ancient Moabite city.
3. The mourning is public and total: streets (chutsot), rooftops (gaggot), and open squares (rechovot) — every public space is filled with grief. The phrase yored ba-bekhi ('going down in weeping' or 'dissolving in tears') suggests weeping so intense that the mourner physically collapses. We rendered 'collapsing in tears' to capture the physical dimension.
3. Sackcloth (saq) was the universal garment of mourning and penitence in the ancient Near East — coarse goat or camel hair worn against the skin. The rooftops were public spaces used for proclamation, prayer, and communal gathering.
4. The geographic sweep expands: Heshbon (modern Hesban) and Elealeh (modern el-Al) are northern Moabite cities; Jahaz (location debated, possibly Khirbet el-Medeyineh) is farther south. The cries carry across the landscape — the sound of mourning is the chapter's dominant sensory image.
4. The phrase chalutsai Mo'av ('the armed ones of Moab,' its soldiers) yari'u ('cry out, tremble') means even the military has lost its nerve. The expression nafsho yar'ah lo ('his soul trembles for him') describes inner collapse — not just military defeat but psychological disintegration.
5. The first line — libbi le-Mo'av yiz'aq ('my heart cries out for Moab') — is the emotional center of the oracle. The prophet's own heart joins Moab's lament. This is not triumphant prophecy but grieving prophecy. The identification of the speaker is debated: is this the prophet's voice or God's? The ambiguity may be intentional — in prophetic experience, the two can merge.
5. Zoar was one of the cities of the plain spared when Sodom was destroyed (Genesis 19:22), located near the southern end of the Dead Sea. Eglath-shelishiyah ('three-year-old heifer') is likely a place name, though its location is uncertain. The ascent of Luhith and the road to Horonaim trace the southward flight path of refugees — these are specific topographic features, the hilly roads down which Moabites flee.
5. The phrase za'aqat shever ('a cry of breaking/anguish') uses shever in its double sense: both physical destruction and emotional shattering. The refugees raise a cry that expresses both what is happening to their cities and what is happening to their hearts.
6. The waters of Nimrim (probably Wadi en-Numeirah, southeast of the Dead Sea) were evidently a fertile oasis. Their desolation means the refugees fleeing south will find no water, no pasture, no sustenance. The threefold description — dried grass (yavesh chatsir), finished vegetation (kalah deshe), no green (yereq lo hayah) — eliminates every possibility of life-sustaining growth.
6. The ecological destruction reinforces the totality of Moab's collapse: it is not merely military defeat but the death of the land itself. The water sources that sustained life have failed.
7. The yitrah ('excess, abundance') and pequddatam ('their stored-up goods, their possessions') represent everything Moab has accumulated — now loaded onto the backs of refugees fleeing south. The nachal ha-aravim ('Wadi of the Willows') is likely the border watercourse between Moab and Edom, possibly the modern Wadi el-Hasa. Crossing it means leaving Moab entirely — the refugees abandon their homeland.

7. The image of people carrying their remaining possessions across a border stream is one of the most human moments in the prophets. This is not abstract judgment but the lived experience of displacement.
8. The verb hiqqifah ('encircles, surrounds') means the cry of grief has reached every border of Moab — there is no quiet corner, no place untouched. Eglaim and Beer-elim mark the geographical extremes of Moab, likely at or near the Dead Sea shore. The repetition of yillatah ('her wailing') is monotonous by design — the wail is unvarying and inescapable.
8. Beer-elim ('well of the mighty ones' or 'well of the terebinths') may be the same location mentioned in Numbers 21:16–18, the well that Israel sang over during the wilderness journey. If so, the place once associated with celebration is now associated with mourning.
9. The name Dimon appears to be a deliberate alteration of Dibon (the major Moabite city, cf. v. 2) to create a wordplay with dam ('blood'): Dimon/dam — the city's very name now echoes with blood. The waters that should sustain life are full of death.
9. The divine first person returns: ashit ('I will bring/place') — God claims agency for what falls on the survivors. The 'lion' (aryeh) sent against the remnant may be metaphorical (a conquering army) or literal (predatory animals reclaiming depopulated territory). Either way, even survival offers no safety.
9. The phrase she'erit adamah ('remnant of the land') closes the chapter with the barest thread of survival — not a restored nation but a fragment clinging to scorched ground. The oracle ends without resolution, continuing directly into chapter 16.

Summary: The Moab oracle continues with an appeal for Judah to shelter Moab's refugees, grounded in the promise of a righteous throne in the 'booth of David.' Moab's pride is diagnosed as the cause of its fall. The prophet again weeps for Moab, and a three-year deadline is set for the oracle's fulfillment.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 5 is one of the most significant messianic texts embedded in a foreign-nation oracle: a throne established in chesed ('covenant loyalty'), a judge who seeks justice (mishpat) and is swift to do righteousness (tsedeq), seated in the 'booth of David' (ohel David). The language anticipates Isaiah 9:6–7 and 11:1–5, linking Moab's crisis to the larger hope for a just Davidic ruler. We note that the theological logic is striking — Moab's only hope for shelter depends on the character of David's dynasty, which in turn depends on God's chesed. The chapter also contains one of the Bible's most psychologically complex portrayals of national pride: Moab's ga'avah ('pride') is described in verse 6 with five near-synonyms, as though one word cannot capture the scale of the self-deception. Yet the prophet does not mock this pride; he mourns it, because it is the very thing preventing Moab from accepting the shelter being offered.*

Translation Friction: *The opening verse presented a significant interpretive puzzle. The Hebrew shilchu khar moshelah erets ('send a lamb to the ruler of the land') is variously understood as tribute payment, a diplomatic gesture, or a symbolic act of submission. We rendered literally and noted the options. Verse 6 piles up terms for pride — ge'uto, ga'avato, evrato — that English cannot easily distinguish without sounding redundant. We varied the translations ('arrogance,' 'pride,' 'insolence') but noted that the Hebrew deliberately uses near-synonyms to flood the verse with the concept. In verse 14, the phrase ke-shenei sakhir ('like the years of a hired worker') is an idiom for exact, contracted time — a hired worker counts every day. We rendered 'like the years of a hired laborer' and explained the idiom.*

Connections: *The 'booth of David' (ohel David, v. 5) connects to Amos 9:11 ('I will raise up the booth of David that has fallen'), 2 Samuel 7:12–16 (the Davidic covenant), and Isaiah 9:6–7 and 11:1–5 (the messianic king). The chesed-mishpat-tsedeq triad in verse 5 is the same ethical vocabulary that defines God's own character throughout the prophets (Micah 6:8, Jeremiah 9:24, Hosea 2:19). The weeping for Moab's vineyards (vv. 8–10) parallels the vineyard theology of Isaiah 5:1–7, where Israel itself is the failed vineyard. Moab's vine destruction echoes Israel's. The three-year deadline (v. 14) has a parallel in Isaiah 21:16, where a similar timeframe is given for Kedar's judgment.*

1Send lambs to the ruler of the land, from Sela through the desert to the mount of Daughter Zion.

²Like a fluttering bird,
a nest sent scattering,
so are the daughters of Moab
at the fords of the Arnon.

³Bring counsel! Render a decision!
Make your shade like night
in the glare of noon.
Hide the outcasts;
do not betray the fugitive.

⁴Let the outcasts of Moab dwell with you;
be a shelter for them from the destroyer.
For the oppressor will come to an end,
the destruction will cease,
the trampler will vanish from the land.

⁵Then a throne will be established in covenant loyalty, and on it will sit in faithfulness,
in the booth of David,
one who judges and seeks justice and is swift to do righteousness.

⁶We have heard of the pride of Moab — how very proud he is! — his arrogance, his pride, his insolence.
His empty boasts amount to nothing.

⁷Therefore Moab wails for Moab —
all of it wails!
For the raisin cakes of Kir-hareseth
you moan, utterly stricken.

⁸For the terraced fields of Heshbon wither,
the vine of Sibmah — whose choice branches struck down
the lords of nations.
They reached as far as Jazer,
they wandered into the desert;
her shoots spread out and crossed the sea.

⁹Therefore I weep with the weeping of Jazer for the vine of Sibmah.
I drench you with my tears,
Heshbon and Elealeh!
For over your summer fruit and your harvest
the battle cry has fallen.

¹⁰Joy and gladness are gathered away from the orchards;
in the vineyards no one sings,
no one shouts.
No treader treads out wine in the presses.
I have silenced the vintage shout.

¹¹Therefore my inner being moans like a lyre for Moab, my inmost self for Kir-heres.

¹²And when Moab appears,
when he wears himself out on the high place and comes to his sanctuary to pray,
he will not prevail.

¹³This is the word that the LORD spoke concerning Moab long ago.

¹⁴But now the LORD has spoken:
'Within three years — counted like the years of a hired laborer —
the glory of Moab will be brought into contempt, with all its great multitude.
And the remnant will be very few,
small and without strength.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verse is interpreted as Moab's tribute offering to Judah: kar ('lamb') sent to moshel erets ('ruler of the land') — a gesture of submission seeking protection. Sela ('rock,' possibly Petra or another rocky Edomite/Moabite location) marks the point of departure; the har bat Tsiyyon ('mount of Daughter Zion') is the destination. The tribute travels from Moab's desert edge to Jerusalem.
1. Alternatively, some read the imperative as addressed to Judah: 'send back the lamb' — i.e., return the Moabite refugees who are like stray lambs. We followed the majority reading of Moab sending tribute but noted the alternative.
2. The simile of the oph noded ('wandering, fluttering bird') and qen meshullach ('a nest sent away, scattered') captures the desperation of refugees: like fledglings cast from the nest, unable to fly properly, fluttering in panic. The 'daughters of Moab' (benot Mo'av) are the women and girls of the nation — the most vulnerable refugees.
2. The Arnon River (modern Wadi Mujib) was Moab's northern boundary and a deep canyon gorge. The ma'avarot ('fords, crossing points') are where refugees would attempt to cross — choke points of vulnerability where the displaced gather and wait.
3. The imperatives shift to address Judah: havi'u etsah ('bring counsel'), asu pelilah ('render judgment/decision'). Moab begs Judah for two things — wise counsel and protective action. The image shiti ka-lail tsillekh be-tokh tsohorayim ('make your shade like night in the midst of noon') asks for total concealment: shade so deep it becomes darkness, hiding the refugees from their pursuers even in broad daylight.
3. The final two imperatives — sattri niddachim ('hide the outcasts') and noded al tegalli ('do not betray the fugitive') — use refugee vocabulary: niddachim ('the driven out, the displaced') and noded ('the wanderer'). These are people without home, status, or protection. The request is for Judah to become their shelter.
4. The voice shifts: God (or the prophet speaking for God) instructs Judah to shelter Moab's displaced. The phrase hevi seter lamo ('be a shelter for them') uses seter, a word applied to God Himself as refuge (Psalm 32:7, 91:1). Judah is asked to play God's role — to be for Moab what God is for Israel.
4. The three-fold promise — afes ha-mets ('the oppressor will end'), kalah shod ('destruction will cease'), tammu romes ('the trampler will vanish') — assures Judah that sheltering Moab is not permanent risk but temporary mercy. The oppressor has an expiration date.
5. This verse is the theological heart of the Moab oracle and one of Isaiah's most compressed messianic texts. The throne is established be-chesed ('in covenant loyalty') — not by military conquest but by God's faithful love. The ruler sits be-emet ('in truth, in faithfulness') in the ohel David ('booth/tent of David').

5. The word ohel ('tent, booth') rather than bayit ('house') or heikhal ('palace') is significant. It may suggest the humble, temporary structure of a shepherd-king rather than an imperial palace — or it may echo the 'booth of David' that Amos 9:11 prophesies will be raised up after it falls. Either way, the emphasis is on the character of the ruler, not the grandeur of the building.
5. The ruler's three defining activities — shofet ('judging'), doresh mishpat ('seeking justice'), and mehir tsedeq ('swift in righteousness') — form a complete portrait of ideal governance. This is the same vocabulary used for God's own justice in Isaiah 1:17, 26 and for the messianic king in 9:7 and 11:4.
6. Five words for pride flood this single verse: ge'on ('pride, majesty'), ge'eh ('proud'), ga'avato ('his arrogance'), ge'ono ('his pride'), evrato ('his insolence, his fury'). The accumulation is deliberate — it mimics the inflation of pride itself, piling up until it becomes absurd. The final phrase lo khen baddav ('his boasts are not right/true') punctures the inflation: for all this pride, his words are empty.
6. The shift to 'we have heard' (shama'nu) may represent the prophet joining the communal voice of Judah, or it may be an editorial comment stepping outside the oracle. Jeremiah 48:29 quotes this verse nearly verbatim, suggesting it became proverbial.
7. The phrase Mo'av le-Mo'av ye'ilil ('Moab wails for Moab') is remarkable — the nation mourns for itself. There is no outside comforter; Moab's grief is self-enclosed and total (kulloh, 'all of it').
7. The ashishei Qir-Chareseth ('raisin cakes of Kir-Hareseth') refers to pressed raisin cakes, a Moabite specialty and possibly a cultic food offering (cf. Hosea 3:1, 2 Samuel 6:19). Kir-Hareseth (modern Kerak) was famous for its vineyards. The mourning over raisin cakes represents mourning over Moab's entire agricultural economy — and possibly its religious life, since raisin cakes featured in worship. The verb tehgu ('you moan, you murmur') suggests low, continuous grief.
8. The 'vine of Sibmah' (gefen Sivmah) was proverbial for Moab's viticulture. The vine's reach — to Jazer in the north, into the desert to the east, across the sea (likely the Dead Sea) to the west — describes a once-flourishing agricultural economy whose tendrils extended in every direction. The phrase ba'alei goyim halmu seruqqeiha ('the lords of nations struck down her choice branches') can be read two ways: either foreign rulers destroyed the vines, or the vines themselves were so potent that their wine 'struck down' (intoxicated) foreign rulers. We rendered with the destructive sense but noted the intoxication reading.
8. Heshbon's shadmot ('terraced fields') represent the careful agricultural infrastructure that generations built and invaders can destroy in a day.
9. The prophet weeps again — evkeh ('I weep') — and the tears are not metaphorical: arayavekh dim'ati ('I drench you with my tears'). The verb ravah ('to drench, to saturate, to water abundantly') is the language of irrigation. The prophet's tears become a substitute for the rain and water that Moab's vineyards will never receive again.
9. The heidad ('shout') that falls on the harvest is ambiguous: heidad can be either a harvest shout of joy (the vintners' cry) or a battle cry. The double meaning is the point — what should have been a harvest celebration has become a military assault. The same sound that meant joy now means destruction.
10. The verse systematically eliminates every sound of agricultural celebration: simchah ('joy') and gil ('gladness') are removed, yerunnan ('singing') and yero'a ('shouting') are negated, and the treader's rhythmic work-song falls silent. The final declaration — heidad hishbatti ('I have silenced the vintage shout') — is God speaking: the silence is not natural but imposed.
10. The imagery is particularly poignant because grape-treading was communal, festive labor — people singing and shouting as they stomped grapes. The vineyards represented not just economy but community. Their silencing is social death.
11. The prophet's grief has become physical: me'ai ('my intestines, my inner organs') yehhemu ('moan, murmur, growl'). The comparison to a kinnor ('lyre, harp') transforms the body's anguish into music — but it is the music of lament, not celebration. The prophet's viscera have become a stringed instrument of grief.
11. The comparison is not decorative but experiential: the kinnor produces its sound from taut strings vibrating under tension. The prophet's insides are stretched tight with sorrow for a nation that is not his own. This is one of the most intimate expressions of prophetic empathy in the Hebrew Bible.
12. The verse describes Moab's futile religious response to the crisis. The bamah ('high place') was the standard worship site in Moab, and the miqdash ('sanctuary') likely refers to the temple of Chemosh. Moab will exhaust itself (nil'ah, 'weary himself, wear himself out') in prayer at its own shrines — and nothing will happen.
12. The phrase ve-lo yukhal ('and he will not prevail, and he will not be able') is devastating in its brevity. After all the weeping, all the wailing, all the religious effort — futility. The oracle implies that Moab's gods cannot save; only the shelter offered through the 'booth of David' (v. 5) provides real protection.
13. The phrase me-az ('from then, long ago, since that time') indicates that the oracle in chapters 15–16 is being presented as an older prophecy now being reaffirmed. The editorial note distinguishes between the original oracle (presumably from Isaiah's earlier ministry or even from a pre-Isaianic prophet) and the updated application in verse 14. This kind of prophetic reuse — taking an older oracle and applying it to a new situation — is common in the prophetic corpus.
14. The phrase ke-shenei sakhir ('like the years of a hired laborer') is an idiom for precisely counted time. A hired worker's contract was exact — not a day more, not a day less (cf. Isaiah 21:16). God sets a specific deadline: three years, counted to the day.

14. The kevod Mo'av ('glory of Moab') — its population, wealth, military strength — will be niklah ('brought into contempt, disgraced'). The final phrase she'ar me'at miz'ar lo kabbir ('a remnant, very few, small, not mighty') piles up diminutives: what survives will be a remnant (she'ar), small (me'at), insignificant (miz'ar), and powerless (lo kabbir). Four words of smallness reduce Moab from a proud nation to almost nothing.
14. The oracle closes where it began — with devastation — but the offer of shelter in the booth of David (v. 5) remains on the table. The three-year countdown creates urgency: Moab has limited time to accept the shelter being offered.

Summary: Isaiah 17 delivers an oracle against Damascus — the capital of Aram (Syria) — but quickly pivots to include the northern kingdom of Israel (Ephraim), which had allied itself with Damascus against Judah in the Syro-Ephraimite coalition of 735-732 BCE. The chapter opens with Damascus reduced to a ruin heap, then turns its lens on Israel's own wasting: the glory of Jacob will grow thin like a harvested field with only scattered gleanings left. Yet the chapter is not pure judgment. The pivotal 'On that day' in verse 7 envisions a moment when humanity will finally look to their Maker rather than to the altars and Asherah poles their own hands have fashioned. The oracle closes with a dramatic image of roaring nations surging like mighty waters, only to be rebuked by God and scattered like chaff before the wind.

What Makes This Remarkable: We note the striking interweaving of Damascus and Ephraim as co-defendants in a single oracle — their military alliance has made them co-recipients of judgment. The agricultural metaphors in verses 4-6 are among the most vivid in Isaiah: the fat body growing lean, the reaper gathering standing grain in the Valley of Rephaim, the two or three olives left on the highest bough after the shaking. These images convert military catastrophe into harvest language, suggesting that God is the one who reaps nations. The 'On that day' turning point in verse 7 introduces a rare moment of hope within a judgment oracle, where human beings abandon idols and look to the Holy One of Israel. The closing verses (12-14) shift to cosmic scope — the thunder of many nations — only to show that God's rebuke scatters them overnight, so that by morning the terror has vanished.

Translation Friction: The phrase masa Dammeseq ('oracle concerning Damascus') uses masa, which we render as 'oracle' rather than 'burden' to reflect prophetic-announcement genre rather than implying emotional weight. In verse 2, the 'cities of Aroer' present a geographic puzzle — Aroer is in Transjordan, not Syria — and we note this in the verse without emending the text. The phrase ke'asif qatsir ('like the gathering of harvest') in verse 5 required us to maintain the agricultural metaphor rather than abstracting it. We rendered Asherim in verse 8 as 'Asherah poles' to clarify the cultic reference for modern readers while noting the Hebrew term.

Connections: The Syro-Ephraimite crisis addressed here is the same conflict narrated in Isaiah 7-8 and 2 Kings 16:5-9. The Valley of Rephaim (v. 5) connects to David's battles in 2 Samuel 5:18-22. The image of gleaning olives (v. 6) echoes Deuteronomy 24:20 and anticipates Isaiah 24:13. The roaring-nations imagery in verses 12-13 anticipates Psalm 46:3-6 and Isaiah 8:7-8, where flood waters represent Assyrian invasion. The 'look to their Maker' hope in verse 7 connects forward to Isaiah 31:7 where Israel throws away its idols.

1An oracle concerning Damascus:

Behold, Damascus is about to be removed from among cities and will become a fallen ruin heap.

2The cities of Aroer are forsaken;

they will belong to flocks that lie down with no one to frighten them.

3The fortress will vanish from Ephraim, and the kingdom from Damascus, and the remnant of Aram —

they will be like the glory of the sons of Israel,

declares the LORD of Hosts.

⁴On that day
the glory of Jacob will be brought low,
and the fatness of his flesh will waste away.

⁵It will be like a reaper gathering standing grain, his arm harvesting the heads of wheat — like one who gleanes ears of grain in the Valley of Rephaim.

⁶Yet gleanings will remain in it,
like the beating of an olive tree —
two or three berries on the topmost branch, four or five on the fruitful boughs,
declares the LORD, the God of Israel.

⁷On that day mankind will look to their Maker, and their eyes will gaze upon the Holy One of Israel.

⁸He will not look to the altars,
the work of his own hands;
what his fingers have made he will not regard — neither the Asherah poles nor the incense altars.

⁹On that day his fortified cities will be like the abandoned places of the forest and the hilltop that they abandoned before the sons of Israel — and there will be desolation.

¹⁰Because you have forgotten the God of your salvation and have not remembered the Rock of your refuge, therefore you plant pleasant gardens and sow them with foreign vine cuttings.

¹¹On the day you plant, you make them grow;
in the morning you make your seed blossom —
but the harvest will be a heap of grief on a day of sickness and incurable pain.

¹²Woe, the uproar of many peoples — they roar like the roaring of the seas!
Woe, the tumult of nations —
they surge like the surging of mighty waters!

¹³Nations surge like the surging of many waters,
but He rebukes them and they flee far away,
chased like chaff on the mountains before the wind,
like whirling dust before a storm.

14At evening — behold, terror!
 Before morning — they are gone.
 This is the portion of those who plunder us,
 the lot of those who despoil us.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The noun masa ('oracle') opens the pronouncement genre — a formal prophetic declaration against a nation. Damascus was the capital of the Aramean kingdom and Israel's northern neighbor. The phrase musar me'ir ('removed from being a city') indicates total loss of urban status. The noun mappalah ('ruin heap, fallen mass') suggests not merely damage but complete structural collapse.
2. The 'cities of Aroer' present a geographical difficulty — Aroer is typically associated with Transjordan (Deuteronomy 2:36; Joshua 13:9), not the Damascus region. Some scholars read 'areha ('her cities') instead of Aro'er, yielding 'her cities are forsaken.' We retain the MT reading while noting the difficulty. The image of flocks resting undisturbed in abandoned cities is a standard prophetic desolation motif (cf. Zephaniah 2:14-15). The phrase ein macharid ('none to frighten') ironically echoes blessing language from Leviticus 26:6.
3. Here the oracle explicitly merges the fates of Ephraim (northern Israel) and Damascus (Aram). Their military alliance (the Syro-Ephraimite coalition, cf. Isaiah 7:1-2) binds them in shared judgment. The phrase 'like the glory of the sons of Israel' is ironic — Aram's remnant will share Israel's diminished glory, which the next verses describe as wasting away. Ne'um YHWH tseva'ot ('declares the LORD of Hosts') seals this as an authoritative divine pronouncement.
4. The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day') marks an eschatological or climactic turning point — we render it consistently as 'On that day' throughout the project. The body metaphor is striking: Jacob (the northern kingdom) is personified as a once-fat man whose flesh wastes away. The verb yiddal ('brought low, become thin') pairs with yerazeh ('waste away') to create a devastating image of national emaciation.
5. The simile extends the harvest metaphor: God's judgment is like a reaper sweeping through a field. The Valley of Rephaim, southwest of Jerusalem, was known for its fertile grain fields (cf. 2 Samuel 5:18, 22). The image suggests thorough harvesting with only scattered gleanings remaining — the nation will be stripped nearly bare. The verb qatsar ('to harvest, reap') carries overtones of cutting down, while laqat ('to glean') refers to the secondary gathering of what little remains.
6. The olive-gleaning metaphor is both devastating and hopeful. After the harvest (judgment), only the most inaccessible olives remain — two or three at the very top, four or five on outer branches. This is a remnant theology image: near-total destruction, but not complete annihilation. The verb naqaf ('to strike, beat') refers to the practice of beating olive trees with poles to harvest the fruit. The divine title here is 'the LORD, the God of Israel' (YHWH Elohei Yisra'el) — distinct from 'the Holy One of Israel' — emphasizing covenant ownership even amid judgment.
7. This is the chapter's theological pivot. The phrase bayyom hahu ('On that day') here introduces not further judgment but a turning — when all human-made supports have collapsed, people will finally look to their Maker. The noun ha'adam ('mankind, humanity') universalizes the scope beyond Israel alone. The verb sha'ah ('to look, gaze, regard') implies looking with trust and dependence. The pairing of 'osehu ('his Maker') with qedosh Yisra'el ('the Holy One of Israel') links creation theology with covenant theology.
8. This verse is the negative counterpart to verse 7: instead of looking to their Maker, they will no longer look to what they themselves have made. The phrase ma'aseh yadav ('the work of his hands') is a standard polemic against idols — they are human manufactures, not divine realities. The Asherim were wooden cult poles associated with the Canaanite goddess Asherah. The chammanim were likely incense altars or sun-pillars used in syncretistic worship. The contrast between 'osehu ('his Maker') in v. 7 and ma'aseh yadav ('the work of his hands') in v. 8 is the theological crux: God made humanity; humanity made idols.
9. The Hebrew is difficult here. The MT reads 'like the abandonment of the forest and the hilltop' (or 'the Hivites and the Amorites' in the LXX reading). The LXX preserves a tradition that these were cities abandoned by the pre-Israelite Canaanite peoples when Joshua conquered the land — the irony being that Israel's own cities will now be abandoned just as the Canaanites' were. The word shemamah ('desolation') is one of Isaiah's strongest terms for total devastation — it implies eerie, uninhabited emptiness.
10. The direct address ('you') shifts to feminine singular, personifying the city or nation as a woman. The 'pleasant plants' (nit'ei na'amanim) are widely understood as 'gardens of Adonis' — ritual plantings associated with the Mesopotamian/Canaanite fertility cult of Tammuz/Adonis, where seeds were sprouted in shallow pots and quickly withered as part of a mourning ritual. The 'foreign vine cuttings' (zemorat zar) reinforce the syncretistic nature of the worship. The theological indictment is pointed: you forgot the Rock and replaced him with a potted plant.
11. The rapid growth of the Adonis gardens mirrors the rapid blossoming followed by inevitable withering — a perfect metaphor for the futility of trusting in foreign cults. The phrase ned qatsir ('a heap of harvest') is uncertain; ned may mean 'heap' or 'fleeing.' The words nachalah ('sickness, grief') and ke'ev anush ('incurable pain') transform the expected harvest joy into mourning. The agricultural cycle that began with hopeful planting ends in disease rather than abundance.
12. The interjection hoi ('Woe') shifts the oracle from Israel's judgment to a broader cosmic scene of raging nations. The onomatopoeic Hebrew is extraordinary: hamon ('uproar'), yeheamayun ('they roar'), she'on ('tumult'), yisha'un ('they surge') — the sounds themselves mimic crashing waves. The image of chaotic waters threatening to overwhelm evokes the primordial chaos waters (tehom) that God subdued at creation (Genesis 1:2; Psalm 93:3-4). The 'many peoples' may refer to the Assyrian empire's multi-ethnic army.

13. The dramatic reversal is instantaneous: the raging nations that seemed unstoppable are scattered by a single divine rebuke (ga'ar). The verb ga'ar ('to rebuke, roar at') is the same word used of God rebuking the sea (Psalm 104:7; Nahum 1:4). The simile shifts from water to wind: the mighty flood becomes weightless chaff (mots) and galgal ('whirling thing' — tumbleweed or thistle-down) blown before a storm. The transformation from terrifying weight to weightless debris is theologically potent: before God's rebuke, the mightiest armies are nothing.
14. The chapter closes with one of Isaiah's most vivid temporal contrasts: at nightfall, sheer terror; by dawn, the enemy has vanished. The word ballahah ('terror, sudden destruction') conveys visceral dread. The phrase einennu ('he is not, they are gone') is starkly absolute — complete disappearance. The final declaration — 'this is the portion of those who plunder us' — shifts to first-person plural, as if the prophet speaks on behalf of Jerusalem. The word goral ('lot') evokes the casting of lots, implying that God has assigned this fate to the oppressors. Historically, this may reflect the sudden destruction of Sennacherib's army in 701 BCE (cf. Isaiah 37:36).

Summary: Isaiah 18 addresses Cush (ancient Nubia/Ethiopia, encompassing modern-day Sudan and southern Egypt), a powerful kingdom that sent envoys northward seeking alliance against Assyria. Rather than condemning Cush outright, Isaiah redirects the embassy: Go back — not because Cush is unimportant, but because the LORD Himself will act. God declares that He watches quietly from His dwelling like shimmering heat in sunlight, waiting for the precise moment to intervene. When the time comes, He will prune the vine of the oppressor before it ripens. The chapter closes with a remarkable vision: the tall, smooth-skinned people of Cush will bring gifts to the LORD of Hosts at Mount Zion.

What Makes This Remarkable: This oracle is unusual among the foreign-nation pronouncements because it contains no explicit condemnation of Cush. Instead, it is a message to a potential ally: do not rely on political coalitions, for God will act in His own time. The central image in verses 4-5 is extraordinary — God watching silently like heat shimmer and dew, then suddenly cutting like a vintner pruning branches just before harvest. The juxtaposition of serene waiting and decisive action captures a theology of divine timing that pervades Isaiah. The closing image of Cush bringing gifts to Zion (v. 7) transforms a political embassy into a future pilgrimage, anticipating the universalist vision of Isaiah 19:23-25 and the eschatological ingathering of nations in Isaiah 60. We also note the vivid geographic awareness: Isaiah describes Cush with ethnographic precision — the land of buzzing wings, the tall and smooth-skinned people, the nation of measured-line and trampling — suggesting firsthand knowledge of Cushite diplomats in Jerusalem.

Translation Friction: The opening phrase hoi erets tsiltal kenafayim ('Woe, land of buzzing wings') is debated. We render hoi as 'Woe' per project convention, but note that here it may function more as an attention-getter ('Ah! Listen!') than a judgment cry. The 'buzzing wings' likely refer to the tsetse flies or locusts of the Nile region, though some read it as the sound of Cushite boats. The repeated phrase am qav-qav ('a nation of line-line') in verses 2 and 7 is genuinely obscure — we render it as 'a nation tall and bronzed' following contextual clues, while noting the Hebrew literally reads 'line-line' (possibly referring to measuring lines, territorial power, or physical stature). The word moshakh ('drawn out, tall') we render as 'tall' based on the most natural reading of the physical description.

Connections: Cush appears as a military power in 2 Kings 19:9 where Tirhakah king of Cush marches against Sennacherib — the same geopolitical context behind this oracle. The theme of nations bringing gifts to Zion connects to Psalm 68:31 ('Cush will stretch out her hands to God'), Isaiah 45:14, and Zephaniah 3:10. The divine-watching imagery anticipates Habakkuk 2:3 ('the vision awaits its appointed time'). The vine-pruning metaphor connects to Isaiah 5:1-7 (the vineyard song) and John 15:1-6. The sending of envoys by sea connects to Isaiah 30:1-5 and 31:1 where Isaiah warns against Egyptian/Cushite alliances.

¹Woe, O land of buzzing wings, which lies beyond the rivers of Cush —

²That sends envoys by sea,
in vessels of papyrus upon the waters!
Go, swift messengers,
to a nation tall and smooth-skinned,
to a people feared far and near,
a nation of strength and conquest,
whose land the rivers divide.

³All you inhabitants of the world and you who dwell on the earth —
when a banner is raised on the mountains, look!
When the shofar is blown, listen!

⁴For this is what the LORD said to me:
"I will be still and watch from my dwelling place, like shimmering heat in the sunlight,
like a cloud of dew in the heat of harvest."

⁵For before the harvest, when the blossom has finished and the flower becomes a ripening grape,
He will cut off the shoots with pruning hooks and tear away the spreading branches — He will hack them down.

⁶They will all be abandoned to the birds of prey of the mountains and to the beasts of the earth.
The birds of prey will summer on them,
and every beast of the earth will winter on them.

⁷At that time gifts will be brought to the LORD of Hosts from a people tall and smooth-skinned, from a people feared far and near,
a nation of strength and conquest,
whose land the rivers divide —
to the place of the name of the LORD of Hosts: Mount Zion.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The interjection hoi ('Woe') opens the oracle, though here it may function more as a hailing call than a judgment pronouncement. The phrase tsiltsal kenafayim ('buzzing/whirring of wings') likely refers to the abundant insect life of the upper Nile region — tsetse flies, locusts, or mosquitoes whose drone characterizes the land. 'Beyond the rivers of Cush' places the addressee south of the Nile confluence, in the heart of the Nubian/Cushite kingdom (modern Sudan). The rivers are the Blue Nile and White Nile.
2. The Cushites sent diplomatic envoys in lightweight papyrus boats (kelei gome) — the same material as Moses' basket (Exodus 2:3). The prophet redirects these messengers: go back to your own people. The physical description of the Cushites is ethnographically precise: memushakh ('drawn out, tall') describes their stature; morat ('smooth, polished') their skin — likely referring to their smooth, dark complexion. The phrase nora min-hu vaha'la ('feared from there and beyond') acknowledges Cushite military might. Qav-qav is genuinely obscure — possibly 'measuring line' (territorial power) or onomatopoeia for a foreign language. We render contextually as 'strength and conquest.' The rivers 'dividing' (baz'u) the land refers to the Nile system that both bisects and defines Cushite territory.

3. The scope suddenly expands from Cush to the entire world. This universal summons — 'all inhabitants of the world' — calls everyone to attention for what God is about to do. The banner (nes) on the mountains is a military signal, visible from great distances, used to rally troops or announce an event. The shofar (ram's horn) is the instrument of divine theophany and battle (cf. Exodus 19:16; Joshua 6:4-5). Together, banner and shofar signal that God Himself is about to act on the stage of history. The imperative mood — 'look!' 'listen!' — demands active attention.
4. This verse is theologically extraordinary: God describes Himself as deliberately quiet, watching from His dwelling like heat shimmer and harvest dew. The verb shaqqat ('be still, be quiet') does not imply indifference but purposeful restraint — God is choosing to wait. The noun makhon ('dwelling, established place') refers to God's heavenly abode. The two nature similes — shimmering heat (chom tsach) and dew cloud ('av tal) — are both invisible forces that are nonetheless powerfully present. Heat shimmer distorts vision; dew silently saturates. God's apparent inaction is itself a form of sovereign activity. The locked formula "This is what the LORD said" renders ko amar YHWH.
5. The serene watching of verse 4 erupts into sudden, violent action. The timing is precise: God waits until just before harvest — when the blossom (perach) has become a ripening grape (boser gome) — and then strikes. The vintner metaphor is devastating: pruning hooks (mazmerot) are tools of careful cultivation, but here they are used for destruction, cutting off entire branches (zalzallim, 'tendrils, shoots') and spreading vines (netishot). The verb hetaz ('hack down, cut away') is harsh and decisive. The theological point: God's stillness is not passivity — He is timing His intervention for maximum effect, cutting down the enemy just as they think victory is within reach.
6. The pruned branches — and the armies they symbolize — are left as carrion. The 'ayit ('birds of prey, raptors') will feed on the corpses through summer; the beasts of the earth will gnaw on them through winter. The phrase 'summer on them ... winter on them' indicates that the slaughter is so vast it provides food for scavengers through an entire year's cycle. This unburied-corpse motif is a standard ancient Near Eastern image of total military defeat and divine curse (cf. Deuteronomy 28:26; 1 Samuel 17:44; Jeremiah 7:33). The shift from vine metaphor to battlefield carnage is abrupt and horrifying.
7. The oracle's conclusion transforms Cush from a political actor into a worshiper. The same ethnographic description from verse 2 — tall, smooth-skinned, feared, powerful, river-divided — now describes not an embassy seeking alliance but a people bringing gifts (shai) to the LORD of Hosts. The destination is specified with unusual fullness: 'the place of the name of the LORD of Hosts, Mount Zion.' This is pilgrimage language — the nations streaming to Zion that Isaiah envisions in 2:2-4 and develops throughout the book. The Cushite gift-offering anticipates Psalm 68:31 and Zephaniah 3:10.

Summary: Isaiah 19 is one of the most remarkable chapters in the entire prophetic corpus, moving from devastating judgment against Egypt to one of the most universalist visions in the Old Testament. The oracle opens with the LORD riding a swift cloud into Egypt, causing its idols to tremble and its people to fight one another. Egypt's wisdom fails, the Nile dries up, and its economy collapses. A series of five 'On that day' oracles (vv. 16-25) then traces Egypt's journey from terror before the LORD, through recognition of God, through affliction and healing, to a highway connecting Egypt, Assyria, and Israel in shared worship. The chapter culminates in the astonishing declaration: 'Blessed be Egypt my people, and Assyria the work of my hands, and Israel my inheritance' — extending covenant titles previously reserved for Israel alone to Israel's two great historical oppressors.

What Makes This Remarkable: We find ourselves standing before one of the most breathtaking theological trajectories in Scripture. The chapter begins with conventional judgment-oracle material — idols trembling, civil war, economic ruin — but then pivots through five 'On that day' sections that progressively expand God's redemptive scope until it encompasses the entirety of the ancient Near Eastern world. The titles in verse 25 are staggering: 'my people' (ami), which is Israel's covenant identity from Exodus, is given to Egypt; 'the work of my hands' (ma'aseh yaday), the language of creation, is given to Assyria; and 'my inheritance' (nachalati) is retained for Israel. This is not syncretism — it is the radical claim that the God of Israel's sovereignty is so total that even the two empires that most oppressed Israel will ultimately be drawn into covenant relationship. The highway between Egypt and Assyria running through Israel (v. 23) transforms the land-bridge that made Israel a perpetual battleground into a pilgrimage corridor.

Translation Friction: The phrase rokhev 'al 'av qal ('riding on a swift cloud') in verse 1 evokes Canaanite storm-god imagery (Baal as 'cloud rider'), which Isaiah deliberately appropriates for the LORD. We retained the vivid image rather than softening it. The 'cruel master' of verse 4 is debated — some see Assyria, others a native Egyptian tyrant, others Nebuchadnezzar. We leave the identity open in the notes. The five cities of verse 18 include the controversial 'City of Destruction' (ir haheres) — the MT reads 'destruction' but the Qumran scroll 1QIsaa and several manuscripts read 'ir hacheres' ('City of the Sun'), likely referring to Heliopolis or Leontopolis. We note both readings. The shift from judgment to salvation across the five 'On that day' oracles required careful attention to the progressive logic: fear, then acknowledgment, then worship, then healing, then full inclusion.

Connections: The cloud-riding imagery connects to Psalm 68:4 and 104:3, and to the Ugaritic epithet of Baal (rkb 'rpt, 'rider of the clouds') — Isaiah claims this title for the LORD. The Nile drying up (vv. 5-10) inverts the Exodus: God once split the Sea to deliver Israel from Egypt, now He dries the Nile to judge Egypt itself. The 'altar to the LORD in the land of Egypt' (v. 19) connects to the pillar at the border in Exodus and anticipates the Jewish temple at Elephantine and Leontopolis. The highway of verse 23 anticipates the 'highway of holiness' in Isaiah 35:8 and the return-from-exile road in Isaiah 40:3. The triple blessing of verse 25 is echoed in the universalist vision of Isaiah 2:2-4, 56:6-8, and 66:18-21.

¹An oracle concerning Egypt:

Behold, the LORD rides on a swift cloud and comes to Egypt.

The idols of Egypt tremble before Him,
and the heart of Egypt melts within it.

²"I will stir up Egypt against Egypt:

man will fight against his brother, neighbor against neighbor,
city against city,
kingdom against kingdom.

³The spirit of Egypt will be emptied out within it, and I will swallow up its counsel.

They will consult the idols and the spirits of the dead,
the mediums and the spiritists.

⁴I will hand Egypt over to a cruel master, and a fierce king will rule over them," declares the Lord, the LORD of Hosts.

⁵The waters will be dried up from the sea,
and the River will be parched and dry.

⁶The canals will stink;
the streams of Egypt will dwindle and dry up.
Reed and rush will wither.

⁷The bare places along the Nile,
at the mouth of the Nile,
and every field sown beside the Nile will dry up, be blown away, and be no more.

⁸The fishermen will mourn;
all who cast hooks into the Nile will lament,
and those who spread nets upon the waters will languish.

⁹Those who work combed flax will be put to shame,
and the weavers of white linen will despair.

¹⁰Her foundations will be crushed;
all who work for wages will be sick at heart.

¹¹The princes of Zoan are utter fools!
The wisest of Pharaoh's counselors give stupid advice.
How can you say to Pharaoh,
"I am a son of the wise,
a son of ancient kings"?

¹²Where then are your wise men?
Let them tell you — let them know what the LORD of Hosts has planned against Egypt!

¹³The princes of Zoan have become fools;
the princes of Memphis are deceived.
They have led Egypt astray —
the cornerstones of her tribes.

¹⁴The LORD has mixed into her midst
a spirit of confusion,
and they have made Egypt stagger in all it does,
like a drunkard staggering in his vomit.

¹⁵And there will be nothing that Egypt can accomplish — neither head nor tail, palm branch nor reed.

¹⁶On that day Egypt will be like women — trembling and terrified before the brandishing hand of the LORD of Hosts that He brandishes over it.

¹⁷The land of Judah will become a terror to Egypt.
Everyone who is reminded of it will tremble, because of the plan of the LORD of Hosts that He is planning against it.

¹⁸On that day there will be five cities in the land of Egypt speaking the language of Canaan and swearing allegiance to the LORD of Hosts.
One of them will be called the City of the Sun.

¹⁹On that day there will be an altar to the LORD
in the heart of the land of Egypt,
and a pillar at its border dedicated to the LORD.

²⁰It will be a sign and a witness to the LORD of Hosts in the land of Egypt.
When they cry out to the LORD because of oppressors,
He will send them a savior and defender, and He will deliver them.

²¹The LORD will make Himself known to Egypt, and Egypt will know the LORD on that day.
They will worship with sacrifice and grain offering;
they will make vows to the LORD and fulfill them.

²²The LORD will strike Egypt — striking and healing.
They will turn to the LORD,
and He will respond to their plea and heal them.

²³On that day there will be a highway from Egypt to Assyria.
Assyria will come to Egypt and Egypt to Assyria, and Egypt will worship together with Assyria.

²⁴On that day Israel will be the third with Egypt and Assyria —
a blessing in the midst of the earth.

²⁵whom the LORD of Hosts has blessed, saying:
"Blessed be Egypt my people,
and Assyria the work of my hands,
and Israel my inheritance."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The oracle opens with the LORD's dramatic theophanic entry into Egypt. The image of God 'riding on a swift cloud' ('av qal — literally 'a light/fast cloud') appropriates ancient Near Eastern storm-god imagery: in Ugaritic texts, Baal is called 'rider of the clouds.' Isaiah claims this title exclusively for the LORD. The word elilim ('idols') is a contemptuous pun — it sounds like elohim ('gods') but derives from a root meaning 'worthless, nothing.' The Egyptian gods, for all their splendor, are nothing before the LORD. The verb yimmas ('melts') indicates total psychological collapse — the same verb describes the Canaanites' response to Israel at the Exodus (Exodus 15:15; Joshua 2:11).
2. The verb sikhsakhti ('I will stir up, incite, entangle') is rare and emphatic — God Himself engineers Egypt's internal collapse. The fourfold escalation — brother against brother, neighbor against neighbor, city against city, kingdom against kingdom — describes civil war expanding from personal to regional to national scope. The phrase mamlakhah be-mamlakhah ('kingdom against kingdom') may reflect the historical fragmentation of Egypt during the intermediate periods when competing dynasties ruled simultaneously. The theological claim is absolute: it is the LORD, not political circumstance, who orchestrates Egypt's self-destruction.
3. The verb navqah ('be emptied, poured out') describes Egypt's inner vitality draining away. The verb avale'a ('I will swallow up, confuse') indicates that God will devour Egypt's famed wisdom — the very quality for which Egypt was celebrated in the ancient world. In desperation, the Egyptians will turn to every form of occult consultation: elilim (idols), ittim (whispering spirits of the dead), ovot (mediums who channel the dead), and yidde'onim (spiritists, 'knowing ones'). This four-fold list of occult practices mirrors the prohibitions in Deuteronomy 18:10-11, implying that Egypt's spiritual resources are precisely what Israel was forbidden to use.
4. The verb sikkarti ('I will shut up, deliver over') means to hand someone into the power of another — God Himself engineers Egypt's subjugation. The 'cruel master' (adonim qashah — literally 'hard lords,' using a plural of majesty) and 'fierce king' (melekh 'az) are debated: candidates include the Assyrian kings Sargon II or Esarhaddon, the Cushite pharaoh Shabaka who unified Egypt by force, or the Persian Cambyses. The identity is deliberately left unspecified — the point is God's sovereignty over Egypt's political fate. The divine title here combines Adon ('Lord, Master') with YHWH tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts'), emphasizing God's absolute authority over all earthly lords.
5. The 'sea' (yam) here refers to the Nile itself — in Egyptian usage, the Nile was called 'the sea' due to its vastness. The 'River' (nahar) is the Nile, which we capitalize to indicate it functions as a proper name (like 'the River' in Mesopotamian texts refers to the Euphrates). The verbs nashtu ('dried up'), yecherav ('be parched'), and yavesh ('be dry') pile up to emphasize total desiccation. For Egypt, which depends entirely on the Nile for agriculture, commerce, and life itself, the drying of the river means the death of civilization. This inverts the Exodus: God once split water to save Israel; now He removes water to judge Egypt.
6. The verb he'eznichu is difficult — it may mean 'stink' (from z-n-ch, 'to become foul') or 'recede' (from a different root). We follow the reading 'stink' as stagnant, shrinking waterways would indeed become foul. The ye'orei Matsor ('streams/canals of Egypt') uses the distinctly Egyptian loanword ye'or (from Egyptian itrw, 'river, canal'), reinforcing the specifically Egyptian setting. The withering of qaneh ('reed') and suf ('rush, papyrus') — the iconic vegetation of the Nile marshes — symbolizes the total ecological collapse that follows the Nile's failure.

7. The threefold repetition of ye'or ('Nile') in a single verse hammers the point: everything connected to the Nile is devastated. The noun 'arot ('bare places, exposed ground') refers to the riverbank areas normally lush with vegetation now stripped bare. The agricultural land (mizra' — 'sown area, cultivated field') that depended on Nile irrigation will dry up (yivash), be blown away (niddaf), and cease to exist (einennu). Egypt's entire agricultural economy — the breadbasket of the ancient world — collapses.
8. The fishing industry — a major part of Egypt's economy and diet — collapses with the Nile. The verb anu ('mourn, groan') expresses grief over economic devastation. Three types of fishermen are mentioned: those who cast hooks (chakkah — the angler's line), and those who spread nets (mikhmoret — seine nets or casting nets). The verb umlalu ('languish, wither') applies the same drying vocabulary used of the Nile's vegetation to human beings — the fishermen wither along with the river.
9. Egypt's textile industry — world-renowned for fine linen — is the next casualty. The phrase pishtim seriqot ('combed flax') refers to the processing of flax fibers, which required abundant water for retting (soaking). The 'weavers of white linen' (orgim chorai) produced the fine white fabric that was Egypt's signature export and was used for priestly garments and mummy wrappings. Without Nile water, flax cannot be grown or processed, and the entire textile economy fails. The verb boshu ('be put to shame') implies both economic ruin and social humiliation.
10. This verse is textually difficult. Shatoteha ('her foundations' or 'her weavers') may refer to the pillars of Egyptian society or to textile workers. The phrase 'osei sekher ('those who work for wages') refers to hired laborers — the working class who depend on the Nile-based economy for their livelihood. The phrase agmei nafesh ('pools of the soul' or 'sick at heart') uses the word agam ('pool, pond') metaphorically to describe stagnant grief — their inner life becomes a still, stagnant pool of despair. The verse captures the human cost of ecological collapse: not just economic figures but crushed spirits.
11. The oracle now targets Egypt's legendary wisdom tradition. Zoan (Tanis) was a major city in the eastern Nile delta and a royal residence. The word evilim ('fools') is devastating — it denotes not ignorance but willful, moral stupidity (the same root as naval in Psalm 14:1). The phrase 'etsah niv'arah ('brutish/stupid counsel') attacks the very thing Egypt prized most: its ancient wisdom. The rhetorical question mocks the Egyptian custom of claiming descent from wise ancestors and ancient royal lines — their pedigree is useless when God has confounded their wisdom.
12. The rhetorical challenge is withering: if Egypt's sages are truly wise, let them discern what the LORD of Hosts has purposed. The verb ya'ats ('to plan, counsel, purpose') is the same root used of the counselors in verse 11 — but whereas human counsel is 'stupid' (niv'arah), the LORD's counsel is sovereign and irresistible. The implied answer to 'Where are your wise men?' is: they are useless, because no human wisdom can discern or counter the purposes of the LORD of Hosts.
13. Noph (Memphis) was Egypt's ancient capital and administrative center, located south of the delta. The verb no'alu ('have become fools') and nishe'u ('are deceived, deluded') form a devastating pair: the leaders are both stupid and self-deceived. The phrase pinnat shevateha ('the cornerstones of her tribes') uses architectural imagery — these leaders are supposed to be the structural supports of Egyptian society, but instead of stabilizing the building, they have caused the entire structure to lean astray (hit'u, 'led astray, caused to wander').
14. The verb masakh ('to mix, pour, blend') depicts God as mixing a 'spirit of distortion' (ruach 'iv'im) into Egypt's inner life like poison into a drink. The noun 'iv'im ('distortion, confusion, dizziness') comes from a root meaning 'to twist, bend, distort.' The closing simile is deliberately disgusting: Egypt staggers through its own policies like a drunk stumbling through his own vomit. The verb hit'ot ('stagger, wander') is the same root used in verse 13 — the leaders who led Egypt astray are themselves staggering. The theological claim is severe: God has deliberately introduced confusion into Egypt's decision-making.
15. The merism 'head and tail, palm branch and reed' (rosh ve-zanav, kippah ve-agmon) encompasses all of society from top to bottom. The 'head' and 'palm branch' (high, prominent) represent the ruling class; the 'tail' and 'reed' (low, common) represent the common people. Isaiah 9:14-15 defines this same merism: the elder and dignitary are the head; the prophet who teaches lies is the tail. The point is total paralysis — no segment of Egyptian society, high or low, can accomplish anything productive. The verse summarizes the entire judgment section: Egypt is completely incapacitated.
16. The first of five 'On that day' oracles begins with a comparison that reflects ancient patriarchal warfare conventions: 'like women' (kannashim) means vulnerable, exposed to violence, unable to defend — the condition of non-combatants in ancient warfare. The verb charad ('tremble') and pachad ('be terrified') form an intensive pair expressing complete loss of military confidence. The 'brandishing hand' (tenufat yad) of the LORD evokes the raised hand of a warrior about to strike — the gesture that precedes the blow. Egypt, which once held Israel with a 'mighty hand,' now cowers before the LORD's hand.
17. The reversal is stunning: tiny Judah — a vassal state Egypt regarded as a pawn — becomes a source of terror (chaggah, 'staggering fear') to mighty Egypt. The reason is not Judah's military power but the LORD's plan ('atsat YHWH tseva'ot). The word 'etsah ('plan, counsel') echoes the failed counsel of Egypt's own advisors (vv. 11-13) — human counsel is foolish, but divine counsel is terrifying. Every mention of Judah triggers fear because Egypt recognizes that Judah's God has purposes against them.
18. The second 'On that day' oracle envisions Egyptian cities adopting Hebrew (the 'language of Canaan,' sefat Kena'an) and swearing covenant loyalty to the LORD. This represents not military conquest but cultural and religious conversion. The number five may be symbolic (a portion of Egypt) or historical (Jewish colonies in Egypt). The final phrase is textually disputed: the MT reads 'ir haheres ('City of Destruction'), but 1QIsaa and other manuscripts read 'ir hacheres ('City of the Sun'), likely referring to Heliopolis (Egyptian Iwnw, 'City of the Sun') or to the later Jewish temple at Leontopolis. We follow the 'City of the Sun' reading as it makes better contextual sense — why would a positive oracle name a city 'Destruction'? — while noting the MT variant.

- 19. The third 'On that day' oracle is astonishing: a legitimate altar (mizbeach) to the LORD in the center of Egypt and a standing stone (matstsevah) at its border. Both altar and pillar are standard Israelite worship installations — the altar for sacrifice, the standing stone as a covenant witness (cf. Genesis 28:18; Joshua 24:26-27). That these appear in Egypt implies that Egyptians will worship the LORD on their own soil with Israelite covenant forms. This was historically fulfilled in various ways: the Jewish military colony at Elephantine had a temple, and Onias IV built a temple at Leontopolis in the 2nd century BCE.
- 20. This verse deliberately echoes the Exodus narrative: the Egyptians will cry out (yits'aqu) because of oppressors (lochasim), and God will send them a deliverer (moshia'). The parallel is extraordinary — Egypt now occupies the position Israel once held, and the LORD responds with the same saving action. The noun moshia' ('savior, deliverer') is used of the judges (Judges 3:9, 15) and of God Himself (Isaiah 43:3, 11; 45:15, 21). The word rav ('great one' or 'defender, champion') intensifies the promise. The altar and pillar of verse 19 serve as the 'sign and witness' (ot ve'-ed) confirming this covenant relationship.
- 21. The verb noda' ('make himself known') indicates divine self-revelation — God actively reveals Himself to Egypt rather than Egypt discovering God through human searching. The reciprocal yad'u ('they will know') indicates responsive recognition. The worship described is thoroughly Israelite: zevach ('sacrifice'), minchah ('grain offering'), neder ('vow'). These are not Egyptian religious forms adapted to the LORD but the covenant worship practices of Israel embraced by Egyptians. The phrase 'vow and fulfill' echoes Ecclesiastes 5:4 and Psalm 50:14 — the complete cycle of devotion.
- 22. This verse is the theological key to the entire chapter. The paired infinitives nagof ve-rafo ('striking and healing') reveal that God's judgment of Egypt was never an end in itself but a means to healing. The pattern mirrors Hosea 6:1 ('He has torn and He will heal us') and Deuteronomy 32:39 ('I wound and I heal'). The verb shuv ('turn, return, repent') is the classic prophetic term for repentance — Egypt will repent, and the LORD will respond. The verb ne'tar ('be entreated') implies that God allows Himself to be moved by Egypt's prayers — the same verb used of God answering Isaac's prayer (Genesis 25:21).
- 23. The fourth 'On that day' oracle is geopolitically visionary: a highway (mesillah) connecting Egypt and Assyria — the two superpowers that dominated Israel's existence — with Israel as the land-bridge between them. The word mesillah ('raised highway') appears repeatedly in Isaiah as the road God builds for redemption (11:16; 35:8; 40:3). The mutual visitation ('Assyria will come to Egypt and Egypt to Assyria') transforms the military corridor that once brought armies through Israel into a pilgrimage route. The final verb 'avdu is best read as 'worship together' (et as 'with' rather than as the direct object marker), indicating shared worship rather than servitude.
- 24. The fifth and final 'On that day' oracle reaches the crescendo. Israel becomes 'the third' (shelishiyah) — not diminished but positioned as the mediating center between Egypt and Assyria. The word berakhah ('blessing') echoes the Abrahamic promise: 'in you all the families of the earth will be blessed' (Genesis 12:3). Israel's election was never for Israel alone but for the blessing of all nations. The phrase beqerev ha'arets ('in the midst of the earth/land') places Israel at the center of a three-nation covenant community that spans the known world.
- 25. This is one of the most extraordinary verses in the entire Hebrew Bible. Three covenant titles previously reserved exclusively for Israel are distributed among three nations: (1) 'ammi ('my people') — the foundational covenant designation from Exodus — given to Egypt; (2) ma'aseh yaday ('the work of my hands') — creation language — given to Assyria; (3) nachalati ('my inheritance') — the most intimate term of permanent possession — retained for Israel. The theological audacity is staggering: Egypt, the house of bondage, becomes 'my people'; Assyria, the rod of God's anger (10:5), becomes 'the work of my hands.' Yet the text is not flattening distinctions — each nation receives a different title, and Israel retains nachalah, the term of deepest covenant permanence. This verse represents the furthest reach of Old Testament universalism.

Summary: Isaiah 20 is a brief prose narrative — one of the few in the book — describing a dramatic prophetic sign-act. In the year that the Assyrian commander-in-chief captured Ashdod (711 BCE), the LORD commanded Isaiah to remove his sackcloth and sandals and walk naked and barefoot for three years as a living sign against Egypt and Cush. Just as Isaiah walked stripped and exposed, so the king of Assyria will lead away Egyptian and Cushite captives — young and old — naked and barefoot, with buttocks bared, to the shame of Egypt. The chapter closes with the inhabitants of the Judean coastland expressing dismay: if mighty Egypt and Cush cannot withstand Assyria, what hope is there for us?

What Makes This Remarkable: We find this chapter remarkable for several reasons. First, it anchors a specific prophetic act to a datable historical event — the Assyrian capture of Ashdod in 711 BCE under Sargon II — giving us one of the most precise chronological markers in Isaiah. Second, the sign-act is among the most extreme in prophetic literature: Isaiah walks publicly in a state of nakedness (or near-nakedness) for three years, enduring personal shame to embody a message about national shame. Third, the chapter functions as a sharp political warning: Judah's coastal cities were tempted to join anti-Assyrian coalitions backed by Egypt and Cush, and Isaiah's body becomes the argument against this policy. The prophet does not merely speak — he becomes the message. Fourth, the closing question from the coastland inhabitants ('How shall we escape?') is left unanswered, hanging in the air as a challenge to trust the LORD rather than human alliances.

Translation Friction: The key question is whether 'arom ('naked') means completely unclothed or stripped to a minimal loincloth. Ancient Near Eastern deportation reliefs show captives in various states of undress, and prophetic sign-acts typically push boundaries of social convention. We render 'naked' as the text reads while noting in the notes that the degree of exposure is debated. The phrase 'eved YHWH ('the servant of the LORD') does not appear in this chapter, but Isaiah's obedient submission to an extreme divine command effectively portrays servant theology in action. The Tartan (tartanu in Akkadian) is a military title, not a personal name — we render it as 'commander-in-chief' with the Hebrew term noted. The three-year duration has prompted debate about whether Isaiah maintained the sign continuously or performed it periodically; we note this without resolving it.

Connections: The sign-act genre connects to Ezekiel's elaborate sign-acts (lying on his side for 390 days, Ezekiel 4; shaving his head, Ezekiel 5) and Jeremiah's symbolic actions (the linen belt, Jeremiah 13; the yoke, Jeremiah 27-28). The capture of Ashdod is confirmed by Sargon II's own inscriptions and by archaeological evidence at Tell Ashdod. The warning against Egyptian alliance echoes Isaiah 30:1-5 and 31:1-3, where trust in Egypt is condemned as folly. The nakedness of captives as a sign of shame connects to Isaiah 47:3 (Babylon's exposure) and Nahum 3:5 (Nineveh's exposure). The coastland's despairing question in verse 6 anticipates the 'coastlands' (iyyim) theme in Second Isaiah (41:1; 42:4; 49:1).

¹In the year that the commander-in-chief came to Ashdod — when Sargon king of Assyria sent him — and he fought against Ashdod and captured it, ²At that time the LORD spoke through Isaiah son of Amoz, saying: "Go, remove the sackcloth from your waist and take your sandals off your feet." And he did so, walking naked and barefoot. ³Then the LORD said: "Just as my servant Isaiah has walked naked and barefoot for three years as a sign and a portent against Egypt and Cush,

⁴so the king of Assyria will lead away
the captives of Egypt and the exiles of Cush — young and old — naked and barefoot, with buttocks bared, to the shame of Egypt.

⁵They will be dismayed and put to shame
because of Cush, their hope,
and because of Egypt, their boast.

⁶The inhabitants of this coastland will say on that day:
"Look — this is what happened to those we looked to,
where we fled for help, to be delivered from the king of Assyria.
How then shall we ourselves escape?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This is one of the most historically precise datings in Isaiah. The Tartan (Akkadian tartanu/turtanu) was the highest-ranking military officer after the king — we render it 'commander-in-chief' to convey the rank while noting the Akkadian title. Sargon II (reigned 722-705 BCE) is the only Assyrian king mentioned by name in Isaiah. The capture of Ashdod in 711 BCE is confirmed by Sargon's own royal inscriptions discovered at Khorsabad, which describe the campaign against Ashdod and its ruler Yamani. Ashdod was a major Philistine city on the Mediterranean coast, and its fall demonstrated Assyria's ability to project power into the coastal plain — directly threatening Judah's western flank.
2. The divine command is stark and the obedience immediate: 'And he did so' (vayya'as ken). The sackcloth (saq) indicates that Isaiah had been wearing the garment of mourning and prophetic protest — perhaps mourning the nations' doom or protesting Judah's alliance policies. The verb patachta ('loosen, remove') and chalots ('take off, strip') are direct commands. The result — 'walking naked and barefoot' ('arom ve-yachef) — is extreme. The word 'arom can mean completely naked or stripped to a loincloth; either way, this was a profound act of social humiliation for a prophet of standing in Jerusalem. The narrative formula 'the LORD spoke through' (dibber beyad) identifies Isaiah as the instrument through whom God acts.
3. God interprets the sign-act: Isaiah's three years of nakedness and barefoot walking are an ot u-mofet ('sign and portent') — technical terms for divinely authenticated prophetic symbols. The title 'avdi ('my servant') is loaded with covenantal significance: it identifies Isaiah as God's commissioned agent, willingly subordinating his dignity to divine purpose. The three-year duration indicates sustained, costly obedience — this was not a one-day demonstration but a years-long embodied message. The sign is directed against both Egypt and Cush (the 25th Dynasty was Cushite, so the two are politically intertwined).

4. The interpretation of the sign is brutally explicit. The phrase shevi Mitsrayim ve-galut Kush ('captives of Egypt and exiles of Cush') uses two distinct terms for prisoners — shevi (war captives) and galut (deportees, exiles). The merism 'young and old' (ne'arim u-zeqenim) indicates that no one is spared. The phrase chasufai shet ('with buttocks bared') adds a detail of specific humiliation — Assyrian deportation practices included forced nakedness to degrade captives and strip their identity. The final phrase 'ervat Mitsrayim ('the nakedness/shame of Egypt') plays on the dual meaning of 'ervah: physical nakedness and national disgrace. Egypt's humiliation will be total and public — exactly as Isaiah's sign-act portrayed.
5. The 'they' refers to the inhabitants of the Judean coastland (identified in verse 6) who had placed their political hopes in an Egyptian-Cushite alliance against Assyria. The verb chattu ('be dismayed, shattered') indicates that their confidence collapses. The verb boshu ('be put to shame') adds the dimension of public humiliation — they will be shown to have trusted foolishly. Cush is called mabbatam ('their looking, their hope') — the object to which they looked for security. Egypt is called tifartam ('their boast, their glory') — the source of their confidence. Both terms are now exposed as empty: the alliance on which they relied has been humiliated by Assyria.
6. The chapter closes with a despairing question from the coastland (i, 'island' or 'coastland') — likely the Philistine coastal plain including Ashdod, Ashkelon, and Gaza, which bordered Judah and were most exposed to both Assyrian aggression and Egyptian alliance politics. The word mabbatenu ('our looking, our hope') echoes verse 5: the object of their political looking has failed. The verb nasnu ('we fled') implies that they sought refuge in the Egyptian alliance. The final question — ve-ekh nimalet anachnu ('how shall we ourselves escape?') — is devastating in its open-endedness. Isaiah provides no answer, leaving the audience to draw the implication: if mighty Egypt and Cush cannot withstand Assyria, the only remaining refuge is the LORD Himself. The question hangs unanswered, forcing the hearer into the theological conclusion that chapters 30-31 will make explicit: trust in the LORD, not in horses and chariots.

Summary: Three oracles of judgment unfold in rapid succession, each introduced by the formula massa ('burden'). The first and longest targets Babylon under the cryptic title 'the wilderness of the sea' — the prophet sees its fall in a devastating vision that leaves him physically shattered. A watchman is posted, and when the report finally comes it is devastating: 'Fallen, fallen is Babylon, and all the carved images of her gods are shattered on the ground.' The second oracle addresses Dumah (Edom) with one of the most enigmatic exchanges in all prophecy: 'Watchman, what of the night?' The answer is no answer — morning comes, and also night. The third oracle speaks against the Arabian caravans of Dedanites and Kedarites, whose glory will be stripped away within a year. Throughout, we rendered the prophet's visceral anguish with full force — he is not a detached announcer but a man undone by what God compels him to see.

What Makes This Remarkable: The phrase 'Fallen, fallen is Babylon' (naphlah naphlah Bavel, v. 9) reverberates across the entire biblical canon. Its doubling intensifies the certainty — this is not a prediction but a decree already accomplished in the divine council. Revelation 14:8 and 18:2 quote this verse nearly verbatim, applying it to the eschatological Babylon. The watchman motif in verses 6-9 creates a dramatic staging unique in prophetic literature: God commands the prophet to post a lookout, the lookout waits, and when the chariots finally appear, the announcement erupts. The Dumah oracle (vv. 11-12) is remarkable for its deliberate refusal to resolve. 'Morning comes, and also night' — the oracle will neither promise rescue nor confirm doom. It is the rare biblical text that answers a question with a deeper question. The brevity of all three oracles (especially the Dumah passage at just two verses) stands in stark contrast to their weight.

Translation Friction: The title midbar-yam ('wilderness of the sea,' v. 1) is notoriously difficult. Babylon is not a maritime power, so 'sea' may refer to the Persian Gulf marshlands south of Babylon, or it may be a mythological allusion to the cosmic sea of chaos (tehom/yam) — Babylon as a wilderness emerging from primordial chaos. We rendered it straightforwardly as 'the wilderness of the sea' and let the strangeness stand. The word Dumah in verse 11 means 'silence' in Hebrew, but the oracle concerns Edom (Seir) — the name may be a wordplay, recasting Edom as 'Silence,' a land swallowed into prophetic quiet. The temporal reference in verse 16 ('within a year, as a hired worker counts it') uses the idiom of a laborer who counts every day until his contract ends — exactness, not approximation.

Connections: The 'Fallen, fallen is Babylon' announcement (v. 9) is directly quoted in Revelation 14:8 and 18:2, where the angelic proclamation echoes Isaiah's watchman. The watchman motif connects to Ezekiel 33:1-9, where the prophet himself becomes the watchman responsible for warning Israel. The Kedar reference (vv. 16-17) links to Isaiah 42:11 and 60:7, where Kedar appears in restoration contexts — what is judged here is later gathered. The 'wilderness of the sea' language resonates with Isaiah 35, where the wilderness blooms, and with Isaiah 43:19-20, where God makes a way in the wilderness. The prophet's anguish in verses 3-4 parallels Jeremiah's weeping (Jer 4:19-21) and Habakkuk's trembling (Hab 3:16) — the prophetic body absorbs the weight of the word.

¹The burden of the wilderness of the sea:

Like whirlwinds sweeping through the Negev, it comes from the wilderness,
from a land of terror.

²A harsh vision has been declared to me:

The betrayer betrays, the plunderer plunders.
Go up, Elam! Lay siege, Media!
All her groaning I will bring to an end.

³Therefore my loins are filled with anguish;

pangs have seized me like the pangs of a woman in labor.
I am twisted by what I hear,
dismayed by what I see.

⁴My heart staggers, horror overwhelms me;

the twilight I longed for he has turned to trembling for me.

⁵Set the table, spread the cloth, eat, drink — arise, you commanders, oil the shield!

⁶For this is what the Lord said to me:

"Go, post a watchman;
let him report what he sees."

⁷When he sees riders —

a pair of horsemen, riders on donkeys, riders on camels —
let him listen closely,
very closely.

⁸Then the watchman cried out:

"On the watchtower, my Lord,
I stand continually through the day,
and at my post I am stationed through every night."

⁹And look — here it comes:

a chariot of men, a pair of horsemen!
He spoke up and said:

"Fallen, fallen is Babylon, and all the carved images of her gods
he has shattered to the ground!"

¹⁰O my threshed people, child of my threshing floor!
What I have heard from the LORD of Hosts,
the God of Israel,
I have declared to you.

¹¹The burden of Dumah:
Someone calls to me from Seir —
"Watchman, what is left of the night?
Watchman, what is left of the night?"

¹²The watchman says:
"Morning comes — and also night.
If you would ask, ask;
come back again."

¹³The burden against Arabia:
In the thickets of Arabia you will lodge,
O caravans of Dedanites.

¹⁴Bring water to meet the thirsty,
O inhabitants of the land of Tema;
greet the fugitive with bread.

¹⁵For they have fled from swords,
from the drawn sword,
from the bent bow,
from the weight of war.

¹⁶For this is what the Lord said to me:
"Within a year — as a hired worker counts it — all the glory of Kedar will come to an end."

¹⁷And the remnant of Kedar's archers, the warriors among the sons of Kedar, will be few —
for the LORD, the God of Israel, has spoken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The massa ('burden') introduces the oracle as a weighty pronouncement. The phrase midbar-yam ('wilderness of the sea') is a cryptic title for Babylon — possibly referencing the marshy lowlands of southern Mesopotamia or evoking the primordial chaos-sea (yam). We left the phrase in its strangeness rather than explaining it away.
1. The Negev storms were well known to Isaiah's audience — sudden, violent, sand-laden winds from the southern desert. The comparison makes the coming judgment both natural (storms happen) and terrifying (these storms destroy).
2. The doubling of bogued bogued ('the betrayer betrays') and shoded shoded ('the plunderer plunders') creates a hammering intensity — treachery and destruction are not single events but ongoing, self-compounding realities.

2. Elam and Media are the Persian powers that would historically overthrow Babylon in 539 BCE under Cyrus. God commands pagan armies as his instruments — a theological pattern running through Isaiah (cf. 10:5, Assyria as God's rod).
2. The final clause is ambiguous: 'all her groaning I will bring to an end' could mean God will end Babylon's oppression of others (ending the groaning she caused) or end Babylon's own groaning by destroying her. Both readings coexist.
3. The prophet's body becomes the first recipient of the oracle's weight. Chalchalah ('anguish, writhing') describes deep visceral pain. The comparison to labor pangs (tzirei yoledah) appears frequently in prophetic literature to describe unavoidable, escalating, purposeful suffering.
3. Na'aveyti ('I am twisted, I am bent') suggests a body contorted by the force of revelation. The prophet does not merely report — he is physically wrecked by the vision. This is not detached observation but embodied prophecy.
4. Ta'ah levavi ('my heart staggers/wanders') uses the verb for going astray — the prophet's heart has lost its bearings. Pallatzut ('horror, shuddering') is an extreme word reserved for the most terrifying encounters.
4. The 'twilight I longed for' is deeply ironic — evening was the time of rest and pleasure, but now the darkness that should bring peace brings only terror. What was once desired has become dread.
5. The scene shifts abruptly from prophetic anguish to a Babylonian banquet. The staccato commands — set, spread, eat, drink — evoke the reckless feasting of those who do not know their doom approaches. This scene parallels the account of Belshazzar's feast in Daniel 5, where Babylon falls during a banquet.
5. The sudden pivot to 'arise, you commanders, oil the shield!' shatters the banquet scene. The shields must be oiled for battle — the party is over. The juxtaposition of feasting and warfare is devastating.
6. The watchman motif begins here. God commands the prophet to station an observer — the news of Babylon's fall will come not through direct revelation alone but through a human lookout watching history unfold. The prophetic process here is staged: command, waiting, report.
6. We rendered koh amar with our locked formula 'This is what... said.'
7. The approaching force is a mixed column — horsemen, donkey-riders, camel-riders — suggesting a coalition army (Elam and Media, as named in v. 2). The repeated emphasis on listening (hiqshiv qeshev rav-qashev, 'listen closely, very closely') uses triple repetition of the root q-sh-v to stress the critical importance of the watchman's attention.
8. The Hebrew begins with aryeh ('a lion'), which many scholars read as a textual difficulty — possibly a corruption of ha-ro'eh ('the watcher') or an exclamation ('Like a lion!'). The Septuagint reads differently. We follow the sense that the watchman cries out with a lion's urgency, roaring his report from the tower.
8. The watchman's statement emphasizes faithful endurance: day and night, continually, every night. Prophetic waiting is not passive but disciplined, costly vigilance.
9. Naphlah naphlah Bavel ('Fallen, fallen is Babylon') — the doubled verb makes the fall emphatic and irreversible. This is the climactic announcement the watchman has been posted to deliver. The phrase is quoted nearly verbatim in Revelation 14:8 ('Fallen, fallen is Babylon the great') and Revelation 18:2, where an angel with great authority illuminates the earth with this same cry. The connection should be noted without importing the NT reading into the Hebrew: Isaiah announces the fall of historical Babylon; Revelation extends the oracle to eschatological scope.
9. The shattering of carved images (pesilei eloheih) on the ground is both literal (conquering armies destroyed idols) and theological — the gods of Babylon are proven powerless. They do not fall in battle; they are shattered passively, broken on the ground like pottery.
10. The prophet addresses Israel as medushati ('my threshed one') and ben-gorni ('child of my threshing floor'). Israel has been the grain on the threshing floor — beaten, winnowed, crushed — and the news of Babylon's fall is spoken to this battered people. The agricultural metaphor makes the suffering tangible: Israel is not an abstraction but grain under the sledge.
10. The prophet emphasizes his role as faithful messenger: 'what I have heard... I have declared.' He has not invented or embellished — the oracle comes from the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, and is relayed without alteration.
11. Dumah means 'silence' in Hebrew, but the oracle concerns Seir (Edom). The name may be a deliberate wordplay: Edom is renamed 'Silence' — its fate is to be swallowed into prophetic quiet, unanswered.
11. The doubled question 'Watchman, what of the night?' (shomer mah-millaylah) is one of the most haunting lines in all prophecy. The caller from Edom wants to know: is the long night of oppression ending? Is dawn near? The repetition conveys desperation — the question is asked twice because the first answer was not enough.
11. Mah-millaylah literally asks 'what from the night?' — how much of the night remains? How far are we from morning?
12. This is the non-answer that is the answer. The watchman cannot promise dawn without also naming the continuing darkness. 'Morning comes' — yes, there will be relief. 'And also night' — but the darkness is not finished. The oracle refuses to collapse complexity into comfort or despair.
12. The invitation 'if you would ask, ask; come back again' (shuvu etayu) leaves the door open. The word is not final. Edom may return and ask again — perhaps when it is ready for the full truth. The verb shuvu ('return, come back') carries the resonance of repentance (teshuvah), though here it may simply mean 'come again later.'

12. The entire Dumah oracle is only two verses — the shortest massa in Isaiah. Its brevity is itself a statement: some divine answers are brief not because they are simple but because they are too complex for elaboration.
13. The third oracle shifts to the Arabian desert. The Dedanites were a trading people from northwestern Arabia. Their caravans were famous for long-distance trade. The oracle places these traders not on the open road but hiding in thickets (ya'ar) — forced off the trade routes into the scrubland.
13. The wordplay on ba'arav ('in Arabia' / 'in the evening') is untranslatable: the burden is against Arabia, and Arabia's evening has come.
14. Tema is an oasis settlement in northwestern Arabia (modern Tayma in Saudi Arabia). The inhabitants are called to provide water and bread for refugees fleeing the approaching disaster. This is a command for hospitality in crisis — even in judgment, the obligation of mercy to the displaced remains.
14. The pairing of water and bread (mayim and lechem) represents the absolute minimum for survival. The fugitives need nothing elaborate — just enough to live.
15. The fourfold repetition of mippenei ('from before, from the face of') creates a cascading sense of flight — refugees fleeing one threat after another. The progression from 'swords' (general) to 'drawn sword' (specific, immediate) to 'bent bow' (aimed and ready to release) to 'the weight of war' (the crushing totality) intensifies with each line.
15. Koved milchamah ('the weight/heaviness of war') is a powerful phrase — war is not just violent but heavy, a burden that crushes everything beneath it.
16. The phrase kishnei sakhir ('as the years of a hired worker') means 'counted exactly' — a hired laborer tracks every day of his contract with precision. The year is not approximate but exact: when the contract expires, so does Kedar's glory.
16. Kedar was a powerful Arabian tribe descended from Ishmael (Gen 25:13), known for their warriors and flocks. Their kavod ('glory') — military power, wealth, reputation — will be completely exhausted (khalah, 'come to an end, be finished').
17. The oracle closes with the formula ki YHWH elohei-Yisra'el dibber ('for the LORD, the God of Israel, has spoken'). This stamps the decree with divine authority — it is not the prophet's analysis but God's word. The finality is absolute.
17. The 'archers' (qeshet, literally 'bow') of Kedar were renowned warriors. That even their remnant (she'ar) will be few (yim'atu) means near-total destruction. The word she'ar ('remnant') echoes the remnant theology of Isaiah 10:20-22 — only here the remnant belongs to a foreign nation, and it offers little comfort.

Summary: The oracle against 'the Valley of Vision' targets not a foreign nation but Jerusalem itself — the city that should see most clearly is spiritually blind. While the city recklessly celebrates on its rooftops, the prophet weeps over the coming devastation. Jerusalem has fortified its walls, counted its cisterns, and stockpiled weapons — but has not looked to the One who made the city or regarded the One who planned it long ago. The chapter then narrows to a specific judgment: Shebna the steward, who has carved himself a grand tomb in the rock, will be hurled away like a ball into a wide land. In his place, Eliakim son of Hilkiah will be installed, and on his shoulder will be placed 'the key of the house of David' — he opens and no one shuts, he shuts and no one opens. Yet even Eliakim's peg will eventually give way under the weight hung upon it. We rendered the contrast between Jerusalem's self-reliance and God's demand for trust as the chapter's central tension.

What Makes This Remarkable: The 'key of David' passage (v. 22) is one of the most theologically dense verses in Isaiah. The key placed on Eliakim's shoulder grants absolute authority over access to the royal house — opening and shutting without appeal. Revelation 3:7 applies this language directly to Christ in the letter to the church in Philadelphia: 'These are the words of him who is holy and true, who holds the key of David. What he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open.' The shoulder imagery connects backward to Isaiah 9:6 ('the government will be upon his shoulder') and forward to the servant passages. The chapter is also remarkable for its raw portrayal of misplaced celebration — the people feast and drink while disaster looms, declaring 'Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die' (v. 13), a phrase Paul quotes in 1 Corinthians 15:32. The prophet's response to Jerusalem's partying is not anger but uncontrollable weeping (v. 4).

*Translation Friction: The phrase ge' chizzayon ('Valley of Vision,' v. 1) is paradoxical — valleys are places of limited sight, yet this valley is named for vision. The paradox may be intentional: Jerusalem sits among valleys (Kidron, Hinnom, Tyropoeon) and is the place where prophetic vision is received, yet the city cannot see its own peril. The identity of the historical crisis behind the oracle is debated: it may reflect Sennacherib's siege (701 BCE) or an earlier Assyrian threat. We rendered the text without committing to a specific historical scenario, letting the prophetic word address any generation that trusts its own preparations over God. The Shebna-Eliakim transition (vv. 15-25) raises questions about the nature of human stewardship — even the faithful replacement will eventually fail (v. 25), suggesting that no merely human administrator can bear the full weight of the key.*

Connections: The 'key of David' on Eliakim's shoulder (v. 22) is directly quoted in Revelation 3:7, where Christ claims the authority that Eliakim merely prefigured. The shoulder imagery links to Isaiah 9:6 ('the government upon his shoulder'), creating a chain: what rests on the Messiah's shoulder is the key of absolute access and authority. The phrase 'let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die' (v. 13) is quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:32 as the logical conclusion of a worldview without resurrection. The people's failure to 'look to the One who made it' (v. 11) echoes the blindness theme of Isaiah 6:9-10 — they have eyes but do not see. The peg imagery (vv. 23-25) connects to Ezra 9:8, where the returned exiles describe God giving them 'a peg in his holy place' — a foothold of stability. Here, even that peg will be cut down.

1The burden of the Valley of Vision:

What is the matter with you that you have all gone up to the rooftops?

2O city full of noise, tumultuous town, jubilant city —
your slain are not slain by the sword, nor dead in battle.

3All your leaders have fled together;
without a bow-shot they were captured.
All who were found in you were bound together,
though they had fled far away.

4Therefore I said:
"Look away from me —
let me weep bitterly.
Do not press to comfort me
over the destruction of the daughter of my people."

5For the Lord GOD of Hosts has a day of tumult and trampling and confusion in the Valley of Vision — battering down walls and crying out toward the mountain.

6Elam takes up the quiver, with chariots of men and horsemen,
and Kir uncovers the shield.

7Your choicest valleys are filled with chariots, and the horsemen have taken position at the gate.

⁸He has stripped away the covering of Judah.
On that day you looked to the weapons in the House of the Forest.

⁹You saw the many breaches in the wall of the City of David, and you collected the waters of the lower pool.

¹⁰You counted the houses of Jerusalem and tore down houses to fortify the wall.

¹¹You built a reservoir between the two walls for the waters of the old pool — but you did not look to the One who made it, nor did you regard the One who planned it long ago.

¹²On that day the Lord GOD of Hosts called for weeping and mourning, for shaving the head and wearing sackcloth.

¹³But look — joy and gladness, slaughtering cattle and butchering sheep,
eating meat and drinking wine:
"Let us eat and drink,
for tomorrow we die!"

¹⁴Then the LORD of Hosts revealed this in my hearing:
"This iniquity will not be atoned for until you die" —
declares the Lord GOD of Hosts.

¹⁵This is what the Lord GOD of Hosts says:
"Go to this steward,
to Shebna, who is over the house —

¹⁶What right do you have here,
and who do you have here,
that you have carved out a tomb for yourself here —
hewing your grave on the height, chiseling a dwelling for yourself in the rock?"

¹⁷Look — the LORD is about to hurl you away, you mighty man,
and wrap you up tightly.

¹⁸He will wind you up tightly and hurl you like a ball into a wide, open land.
There you will die,
and there your glorious chariots will be — a disgrace to your master's house.

¹⁹I will thrust you from your office,
and from your post you will be torn down.

²⁰On that day I will call my servant
Eliakim son of Hilkiah.

²¹I will clothe him with your robe and bind your sash on him;
I will place your authority in his hand.
He will be a father
to the inhabitants of Jerusalem
and to the house of Judah.

²²I will place the key of the house of David on his shoulder;
he will open, and no one will shut;
he will shut, and no one will open.

²³I will drive him like a peg into a firm place, and he will become a throne of glory
for his father's house.

²⁴They will hang on him all the weight of his father's house — the offspring and the offshoots, every small vessel,
from bowls to every jug.

²⁵On that day — declares the LORD of Hosts — the peg driven into the firm place will give way;
it will be cut down and fall,
and the load that was on it will be cut off,
for the LORD has spoken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The massa is directed at Jerusalem, here called ge' chizzayon ('Valley of Vision') — the paradox of a city that receives divine vision yet cannot see its own danger. The rooftops were places of celebration and observation; the whole city has climbed up to feast and watch, oblivious to the approaching disaster.
1. The tone is incredulous — mah-lakh efoh ('what is wrong with you?') expresses the prophet's bewilderment at a city that parties while its doom approaches.
2. The city roars with celebration — teshu'ot ('shouts, uproar'), homiyyah ('tumultuous, roaring'), allizah ('jubilant, exultant'). But the prophet immediately undercuts the celebration: your dead did not die heroically in battle. They died of siege, famine, disease, or flight — deaths without glory.
2. The contrast between the city's noise and its actual condition is the chapter's central irony: Jerusalem celebrates as if victorious while its people perish shamefully.
3. The leadership collapses — qetzinim ('leaders, commanders') flee and are captured without even putting up a fight (miqeshet, 'without the bow,' meaning without battle). The repetition of 'together' (yachad) emphasizes collective failure: they fled together, were captured together. No one stood.
3. The phrase 'though they had fled far away' adds bitter irony — distance provided no escape. Flight was futile.

4. The prophet's response to Jerusalem's reckless celebration is not rebuke but grief. He cannot bear to be watched while he weeps, and he refuses comfort — the destruction of bat-ammi ('the daughter of my people') is too great for consolation. This is one of the most personally vulnerable moments in Isaiah.
4. The phrase she'u minni ('look away from me') is a plea for privacy in anguish. The verb amarrer ('I will weep bitterly') intensifies ordinary weeping into something convulsive and uncontrollable.
5. Three words beginning with mem create a devastating alliteration: mehumah ('tumult'), mevusah ('trampling'), mevukhah ('confusion'). The day belongs to the Lord GOD of Hosts — it is his day, directed at his own city. The Valley of Vision that should receive revelation instead receives destruction.
5. The 'crying out toward the mountain' (sho'a el-hahar) likely refers to desperate cries toward the Temple Mount or the surrounding mountains — people screaming for help from the hills. The mountains offer no refuge.
6. The attacking forces are named: Elam (archers from the east, famous for their bowmanship) and Kir (a Mesopotamian region). These are the instruments God uses against his own city. The uncovering of the shield (erah magen) means removing the leather covering to prepare for battle — the shield is being readied for combat.
7. The valleys around Jerusalem — the very terrain the city trusted for defense — are now filled with enemy chariots. The horsemen have positioned themselves at the gate (sha'arah), the critical chokepoint. The city is surrounded and its exits sealed.
8. God 'strips away the covering' (vayegal et masakh) — Judah's defenses, illusions of safety, or the veil over her vulnerability are removed. Exposed, the people turn not to God but to the armory: the House of the Forest (beit ha-ya'ar), Solomon's great hall built with cedar from Lebanon (1 Kings 7:2-5), which served as an arsenal.
8. On that day (bayyom hahu) marks the moment of crisis when priorities are revealed. Judah's instinct is military self-reliance, not prayer.
9. The response to crisis is purely tactical: survey the wall breaches, secure the water supply. The 'lower pool' (ha-berekhah ha-tachtonah) is likely the Pool of Siloam or a similar reservoir in the lower city. Hezekiah's tunnel (2 Kings 20:20) may be the engineering project behind this verse — redirecting water inside the walls before a siege.
10. The city demolishes its own houses to repair the walls — a desperate measure that sacrifices daily life for military defense. The verb safartem ('you counted') implies a cold, bureaucratic inventory: which houses can be sacrificed? The irony is that in trying to save the city, they are destroying it from within.
11. This is the theological center of the chapter. The engineering is competent — reservoir, walls, water management — but the fatal flaw is spiritual: velo hibbattem el-oseiha ('you did not look to the One who made it'). The 'it' could refer to the city, the crisis, or the water itself — God is the maker of all three. Human competence without divine dependence is the sin.
11. The phrase yotzrah merachok ('the One who planned it long ago') reveals that the crisis itself was part of God's long-range purpose. The disaster was not random but shaped (yatzar, the potter's verb) by God from afar. Jerusalem's tragedy is not that it lacked engineers but that it lacked eyes to see the Engineer.
12. God's call (vayiqra) on that day was for repentance expressed through the traditional rituals of grief: weeping (bekhi), mourning (misped), head-shaving (qorchah), and sackcloth (saq). These are not mere customs but embodied theology — the body must participate in the turning of the heart.
12. On that day (bayyom hahu) marks the divine summons. God called for mourning; the people responded with feasting. The contrast with the next verse is devastating.
13. The people's response to God's call for mourning is the exact opposite: a reckless feast. The staccato verbs — slaughtering, butchering, eating, drinking — pile up with manic energy. The declaration 'Let us eat and drink, for tomorrow we die' (akhol veshato ki machar namut) is quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 15:32 as the philosophy of those who deny resurrection.
13. The phrase is not philosophical resignation but defiant nihilism — if death is certain and God is irrelevant, then pleasure is the only rational response. Isaiah presents this as the ultimate blasphemy: not atheism in theory but atheism in practice.
14. The divine response to Jerusalem's nihilistic feast is terrifying: im-yekuppar he'avon hazeh lakhem ad-temuton ('this iniquity will not be atoned for until you die'). The verb kuppar ('be atoned, be covered') uses the same root as Yom Kippur — the Day of Atonement. There is no atonement available for this sin. The people said 'tomorrow we die' as a joke; God says 'until you die' as a sentence.
14. We rendered ne'um with our locked formula 'declares the LORD.' The double title — LORD of Hosts at the beginning, Lord GOD of Hosts at the end — frames the pronouncement with maximum divine authority.
15. The oracle now narrows from the city to a single individual: Shebna (Shevna), the royal steward (sokhen, 'administrator, caretaker') who is 'over the house' (asher al-habayit) — the highest administrative office in the kingdom, comparable to a prime minister. His personal ambition will be judged.
15. We rendered koh amar with our locked formula 'This is what... says.'

16. The threefold poh ('here') hammers the accusation: What are you doing here? Who gave you the right? Shebna has carved (chatzavta) an elaborate rock-cut tomb in a prominent location — a monument to his own importance. The act reveals his priorities: not service but self-memorialization. He builds for his death while the city he should serve faces its own.
16. Rock-cut tombs on the heights were reserved for royalty and the highest nobility. Shebna, a steward, has overreached — claiming in death a status above his station.
17. The verb metaltelkha ('hurl you, toss you about') is intensified by the cognate noun taltelah — a violent, repeated throwing. The man who carved himself a permanent resting place in rock will be thrown around like a rag. The address gaver ('mighty man') is sarcastic — this 'strong man' will be helplessly tossed.
18. The image is vivid and humiliating: Shebna, who built himself a grand tomb in Jerusalem's rock, will be rolled up like a ball (kaddur) and thrown into a vast, featureless land — no tomb, no monument, no memorial. The chariots he rode as symbols of his status will become his shame.
18. The phrase qelon beit adonekha ('a disgrace to your master's house') suggests that Shebna's self-aggrandizement has brought shame not only on himself but on the king he was supposed to serve.
19. God speaks in the first person: 'I will thrust you' (vahadaftikha). The removal is divine, not merely political. The words matsav ('station, position') and ma'amad ('standing, post') describe Shebna's official role — both will be demolished. The verb yaharsekha ('he will tear you down') uses the same root as tearing down buildings.
20. On that day (bayyom hahu) marks the transition from judgment to replacement. God calls Eliakim 'my servant' (avdi) — the title reserved for those who carry out God's purposes. Eliakim's name means 'God raises up,' and his father Hilkiah means 'my portion is the LORD' — the names themselves signal a different orientation from Shebna's self-serving ambition.
21. The transfer of office is described through clothing: Shebna's robe (kuttonet) and sash (avnet) — the garments of office — will be placed on Eliakim. Authority in the ancient world was embodied in visible symbols. The robe does not merely represent power; it confers it.
21. The title 'father' (av) for a government official indicates a paternal, caring leadership — the opposite of Shebna's self-serving administration. Eliakim will govern not for his own memorial but for the welfare of Jerusalem and Judah.
22. The maftach beit-David ('key of the house of David') is the symbol of absolute administrative authority over the royal household — controlling who enters and who is excluded from the king's presence. The key was large enough to be carried on the shoulder (al-shikhmo), a visible sign of delegated royal power.
22. Revelation 3:7 applies this language directly to Christ: 'These are the words of him who is holy and true, who holds the key of David. What he opens no one can shut, and what he shuts no one can open.' The connection is significant: what Eliakim held provisionally, Christ holds absolutely. The NT text should be noted as a reception of this passage without importing that christological reading into the Hebrew original.
22. The shoulder (shekhem) imagery connects to Isaiah 9:6, where 'the government will be upon his shoulder' (misrah al-shikhmo). In both cases, authority is physically borne — it is not abstract power but embodied responsibility.
23. The yated ('peg, tent-pin') driven into a firm place (maqom ne'eman, 'a faithful/reliable place') represents stability and permanence. Eliakim will be the anchor point on which the entire household depends. The peg becomes a 'throne of glory' (kisse' khavod) — from a simple fastener to a seat of honor.
23. The word ne'eman ('firm, faithful, reliable') is the same root as 'amen' and emunah ('faithfulness'). The place where Eliakim is driven is characterized by trustworthiness — but the coming verses will complicate this permanence.
24. The peg metaphor extends: everything in the household is hung upon Eliakim — descendants (tze'etza'im), offshoots (tzeft'ot), and every kind of vessel from the smallest bowl to the largest jug. The image is of a single peg overloaded with the entire household's weight. The question is implicit: can any human peg bear this much?
24. The word kavod ('weight, glory') does double duty — it is both the honor of the household and the literal weight hung on the peg. Glory is heavy.
25. The shocking conclusion: even the faithful peg in the firm place will eventually give way (tamush, 'be removed, slip loose'). The verbs cascade — nigde'ah ('cut down'), naphlah ('fallen'), nikhrat ('cut off') — total collapse. Everything hung on Eliakim will crash to the ground. No human steward, however faithful, can permanently bear the weight of David's house.
25. On that day (bayyom hahu) and declares the LORD (ne'um YHWH) frame this as divine decree. The peg's failure is not Eliakim's personal sin but a statement about the limits of human stewardship — the full weight of the key of David requires a shoulder stronger than any human's. The passage thus points beyond itself to the one who can bear the government on his shoulder without collapse (9:6).
25. The massa ('burden, load') that was on the peg is the same word used for the prophetic 'burden' that opens the oracles. The weight of governance and the weight of prophecy use the same vocabulary — both are crushingly heavy.

Summary: The final oracle in the nations cycle (chapters 13-23) targets Tyre, the great Phoenician maritime city whose merchant fleets dominated Mediterranean trade. The Ships of Tarshish are told to wail, for Tyre's harbor is destroyed — the news reaches them from Cyprus (Kittim). The sea itself disowns Tyre, and Sidon, her sister city, is put to shame. Egypt trembles at the report. The oracle asks who planned this against Tyre the crown-giver, whose merchants were princes — and the answer is the LORD of Hosts, who purposed it to defile the pride of all glory. After seventy years (the span of a king's lifetime), Tyre will be 'visited' and return to her trade, described with the shocking metaphor of a prostitute resuming her work. Yet the final twist is redemptive: her profits will not be hoarded but will go to 'those who dwell before the LORD.' We rendered the economic language with precision, letting the text's ambivalence about commerce — neither purely condemned nor purely redeemed — stand without resolution.

What Makes This Remarkable: This oracle closes the entire nations cycle that began in chapter 13. Tyre is the last judgment before Isaiah turns to the apocalyptic vision of chapters 24-27. The choice of Tyre as the final nation is significant: Tyre represents not military power (like Assyria or Babylon) but economic power — the wealth of global trade, the pride of commercial empire. By ending with Tyre, Isaiah suggests that economic idolatry is the culminating form of human rebellion. The seventy-year restoration (v. 15) and the prostitute metaphor (v. 17) are deeply ambivalent: Tyre returns to trade, but is the return judgment or mercy? The answer comes in verse 18, where Tyre's wages are consecrated to the LORD — the profits of the prostitute become holy offerings. This is one of the most startling reversals in Isaiah: what was profane becomes sacred, not by Tyre's repentance but by God's sovereign reallocation.

Translation Friction: The phrase keshirat zonah ('like the song of a prostitute,' v. 15) is deliberately provocative. Tyre's return to commerce after seventy years is compared to a forgotten prostitute who takes up her harp and walks the city singing to attract clients. The metaphor is unflattering but precise: Tyre's trade is promiscuous — she does business with everyone, loyal to none. We rendered the metaphor without softening it, as the Hebrew does not soften it. The seventy years (v. 15) may correspond to Babylon's seventy years (Jer 25:11-12) or may simply represent a conventional lifetime ('the days of one king,' v. 15). The relationship between Tyre's judgment and her restoration is theologically complex: God destroys her pride but then allows — even ordains — her return to trade, redirecting her profits to his people. Commerce is not abolished but repurposed.

Connections: Tyre appears extensively in Ezekiel 26-28, where the prophet delivers an even more elaborate funeral over the merchant city, including the famous 'you were in Eden' passage (Ezek 28:13). The seventy-year period connects to Jeremiah's prophecy of seventy years for Babylon (Jer 25:11-12; 29:10) and Daniel's interpretation (Dan 9:2). The 'Ships of Tarshish' appear throughout the prophets as symbols of long-distance trade and human ambition (cf. Isa 2:16; Jonah 1:3; Ps 48:7). The consecration of Tyre's wages to the LORD (v. 18) anticipates Isaiah 60:5-11, where the wealth of nations flows to Zion — the same commercial wealth that was judged here is later gathered as offering. The prostitute metaphor connects to Hosea's treatment of Israel as an unfaithful wife and to Revelation 17-18, where 'Babylon the Great' is described as a commercial prostitute whose merchants were the great ones of the earth.

¹The burden of Tyre:

Wail, O Ships of Tarshish,
for it is destroyed — no house, no harbor!
From the land of Cyprus the news was revealed to them.

²Be silent, O inhabitants of the coastland, you whom the merchants of Sidon,
crossing the sea, once filled with goods.

³Over the great waters came the grain of the Shihor,
the harvest of the Nile — her revenue.
She was the marketplace of nations.

⁴Be ashamed, O Sidon,
for the sea has spoken — the fortress of the sea:
"I have not labored in birth, I have not given birth,
I have not raised young men or brought up young women."

⁵When the report reaches Egypt,
they will writhe in anguish at the news of Tyre.

⁶Cross over to Tarshish!
Wail, O inhabitants of the coastland!

⁷Is this your jubilant city whose origin is from ancient days, whose feet carried her far away to settle?

⁸Who planned this against Tyre, the crown-bestowing city, whose merchants are princes,
whose traders are the honored of the earth?

⁹The LORD of Hosts has planned it — to defile the pride of all splendor, to bring low all the honored of the earth.

¹⁰Overflow your land like the Nile,
O daughter of Tarshish —
there is no restraint anymore.

¹¹He has stretched out his hand over the sea;
he has shaken the kingdoms.
The LORD has given a command against Canaan to destroy her fortresses.

¹²He said:
"You will rejoice no more,
O oppressed virgin daughter of Sidon.
Rise, cross over to Cyprus —
but even there you will find no rest."

¹³Look at the land of the Chaldeans —
this people that was nothing!
Assyria assigned it to desert creatures.
They raised their siege towers, stripped bare her palaces,
and made her a ruin.

¹⁴Wail, O Ships of Tarshish, for your fortress is destroyed!

¹⁵On that day Tyre will be forgotten for seventy years — the span of one king's life.
At the end of seventy years,
it will be for Tyre as in the song of the prostitute.

¹⁶"Take up the harp, walk through the city,
O forgotten prostitute!
Play sweetly, sing many songs, so that you may be remembered."

¹⁷At the end of seventy years
the LORD will visit Tyre, and she will return to her wages.
She will prostitute herself with all the kingdoms of the earth on the face of the ground.

¹⁸But her profits and her wages will be holy to the LORD.
They will not be stored up or hoarded, for her profits will go to those who dwell before the LORD — to eat their fill and to be clothed in fine garments.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The massa against Tyre opens with a command to the Ships of Tarshish (oniyot Tarshish) — the great merchant vessels that plied the western Mediterranean — to wail (heililu). Their home port is gone. The news reaches them from Kittim (Cyprus), the last port of call before Phoenicia. Sailors returning from the west learn mid-voyage that there is nothing to return to.
1. The phrase shuddad mibbayit ('destroyed so that there is no house') and mibbo' ('no entering, no harbor') strips Tyre of its two essential features: habitation and port. A city without houses and a port without entry is nothing.
2. Dommu ('be silent, be stunned') commands the coastal inhabitants to speechless grief. Sidon, Tyre's sister city to the north, was the older Phoenician settlement — her merchants who crossed the sea (over yam) had enriched the entire coast. The past tense ('once filled') signals that the trade is over.
2. The 'coastland' (i, literally 'island') refers to the coastal trading settlements that depended on Phoenician commerce. When Tyre falls, the entire commercial network collapses.
3. Tyre's trade connected Egypt's grain (the Shihor, a branch of the Nile delta, and the Nile itself) to the Mediterranean world. Tyre was the middleman — she did not grow the grain but she moved it, and her revenue (sachrah) came from the exchange. The title sechar goyim ('marketplace of nations') defines Tyre's identity: she existed to facilitate trade between peoples.
3. The 'great waters' (mayim rabbim) are the Mediterranean, which Tyre's ships traversed. The sea that was Tyre's highway is about to become her judge.
4. The sea itself speaks — a stunning personification. The ocean that was Tyre and Sidon's source of life now disowns them: 'I have not given birth, I have not raised children.' The sea denies being the mother of these maritime cities. The one who gave Phoenicia everything now claims no connection.
4. Ma'oz ha-yam ('the fortress of the sea') gives the sea a title of strength and authority — this is not a passive body of water but a power that speaks and judges.
5. Egypt, Tyre's major trading partner and grain supplier, will be devastated by the news. The verb yachilu ('they will writhe, tremble') describes the physical convulsion of shock — Egypt's economy was intertwined with Tyre's shipping. When the port falls, the supplier suffers.
6. The command to flee to Tarshish (likely Tartessus in Spain, the farthest known western port) means there is no refuge nearby. The Phoenician survivors must sail to the edge of the known world. The command to wail (heililu) is repeated from verse 1 — the grief is inescapable.

7. The rhetorical question forces a reckoning: is this the great Tyre? The city whose antiquity (mimei-qedem, 'from days of old') reached back centuries, whose colonists (ragleyha, literally 'her feet') established settlements across the Mediterranean — Carthage, Cadiz, settlements in Cyprus and Sicily? The city that walked everywhere now has nowhere to go.
8. The question mi ya'atz zot ('who planned this?') sets up verse 9's answer. Tyre is called hamma'atirah ('the crown-bestowing one') — she did not merely wear crowns but gave them to others. Her commercial power made and unmade kings. Her merchants (sochareha) functioned as princes (sarim), and her traders (khin'aneha, a wordplay on 'Canaanite,' which also means 'merchant') were the nikhbaddei-aretz ('honored ones of the earth').
8. The identification of merchants with princes and traders with the earth's honored ones reveals how commerce creates its own aristocracy — wealth becomes its own nobility.
9. The answer to verse 8's question: the LORD of Hosts (YHWH tzeva'ot) planned it. The verb ya'atzah ('he planned, he purposed') uses the same root as the question — who counseled? God counseled. The purpose is lechallel ge'on kol-tzevi ('to defile/profane the pride of all beauty/splendor'). The verb challel means to pierce, to profane, to make common what was considered holy. Tyre's splendor was treated as sacred; God will make it profane.
9. The phrase lehaqel kol-nikhbaddei-aretz ('to bring low all the honored of the earth') targets not just Tyre but all who derive their honor from commercial glory. The judgment is paradigmatic.
10. The 'daughter of Tarshish' (bat-Tarshish) is the colony now unmoored from the mother city. Without Tyre's control, Tarshish spreads uncontrolled like the Nile in flood — ka-ye'or ('like the River'). The phrase ein mezach od ('there is no restraint anymore') means the old order has dissolved. Tyre's colonies, once held in a network of obligation and commerce, are now free but directionless.
11. God's hand (yado) stretched over the sea echoes the exodus (Exod 14:21, 26-27), where God's hand over the sea destroyed Pharaoh's army. The same sovereign hand that liberated Israel now judges Tyre. The verb hirciz ('he shook, he made tremble') describes kingdoms vibrating with terror at God's movement.
11. The LORD's command is against Kena'an ('Canaan'), which functions as a double reference: Phoenicia was part of ancient Canaan, and kena'ani means 'merchant/trader.' The command to destroy her ma'uzneha ('fortresses, strongholds') strips away the physical security that undergirded Tyre's commercial confidence.
12. Sidon's daughter (Tyre, the offspring of the older city) is called both 'virgin' (betulat) and 'oppressed' (hame'ushaqqaqah) — violated and crushed. The command to flee to Kittim (Cyprus) offers no real hope: gam-sham lo-yanuach lakh ('even there you will find no rest'). There is no port of refuge from the LORD of Hosts.
12. The denial of rest (nuach) is significant — nuach is the verb of Sabbath rest, of arriving at the promised destination. Tyre will find no such rest anywhere.
13. This difficult verse points to Babylon (the Chaldeans) as both a historical parallel and an instrument: a people that 'was nothing' (lo hayah) rose to power and then fell to ruin. Assyria, which had used Babylon, ultimately destroyed her. The verse warns Tyre that the same fate awaits — no commercial empire is exempt from the pattern.
13. The verse is textually challenging. We followed the sense that the Chaldeans' rise and fall serves as an object lesson for Tyre: if even Babylon can be reduced to a ruin (mappelah), Tyre should not imagine herself immune.
14. The oracle returns to its opening command — heililu oniyot Tarshish — creating an inclusio (literary frame). The ships that were told to wail in verse 1 are told to wail again. The reason is now personal: ma'uzzekhen ('your fortress, your stronghold') — Tyre was their home base, their refuge, their reason for sailing. Without the fortress-port, the ships are homeless on the sea.
15. The seventy years (shiv'im shanah) may be a round number for a human lifetime ('the days of one king,' kimei melekh-echad) or may correspond to the seventy-year period elsewhere associated with Babylon's dominance (Jer 25:11-12). Either way, Tyre's oblivion has a fixed term — she is forgotten but not forever.
15. The comparison to keshirat ha-zonah ('the song of the prostitute') is startling. After seventy years, Tyre's return to commerce is compared to a forgotten prostitute who takes up her trade again. The metaphor is not incidental but structural: Tyre's relationship with the nations is promiscuous — she trades with everyone, serves everyone's desires, and accumulates wealth through universal availability.
16. The prostitute's song is now dramatized: Tyre is told to take up the kinnor (harp/lyre), walk the streets, play well, and sing prolifically — all to be 'remembered' (tizzakheri). The word remembered carries enormous weight in Hebrew: to be remembered is to exist in relationship, to matter. Tyre's entire commercial revival is driven by the desperate need to matter again, to be noticed, to attract clients.
16. The image of a forgotten prostitute walking the city with a harp, singing to regain attention, is simultaneously pathetic and aggressive. There is no dignity in it, only survival through self-display.
17. The verb yifqod ('he will visit') is theologically loaded — paqad means to attend to, to take account of, to intervene. God's 'visiting' can be for judgment or restoration; here it is ambiguously both. He visits Tyre, and she returns to her etnan ('wages, hire' — specifically the wages of a prostitute, Deut 23:18).

17. The language is deliberately shocking: vezantah et-kol-mamlkhot ha-aretz ('she will prostitute herself with all the kingdoms of the earth'). Tyre's resumed commerce is described in sexual terms — her trade is promiscuous, indiscriminate, universal. The phrase al-penei ha-adamah ('on the face of the ground') gives the prostitution a cosmic scope — this is global commerce as global promiscuity.
18. The chapter's final verse delivers its most astonishing reversal: sachrah ve'etnannah qodesh la-YHWH ('her profits and her prostitute's wages will be holy to the LORD'). The same wages called 'prostitute's hire' in verse 17 are now declared qodesh — holy, set apart, consecrated. God does not abolish Tyre's commerce; he redirects it. The profits that served Tyre's pride will now serve God's people.
18. The phrase la-yoshvim lifnei YHWH ('to those who dwell before the LORD') designates the priestly or worshiping community — those who live in God's presence. Tyre's wealth will feed them (le'ekhol lesov'ah, 'to eat their fill') and clothe them (limkhasseh atiq, 'in fine/durable clothing'). Commerce is not destroyed but sanctified.
18. This verse anticipates Isaiah 60:5-11, where the wealth of the nations streams to Zion, and ships of Tarshish lead the procession. What is judged in chapter 23 is redeemed in chapter 60 — the same wealth, the same ships, but a different destination and purpose.

Summary: God devastates the entire earth in a cosmic judgment that levels all social distinctions. The earth mourns, the city of chaos lies in ruins, and the heavens themselves are shaken — but the LORD of Hosts reigns on Mount Zion in glory.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the most apocalyptic chapter in First Isaiah. The scope shifts from individual nations (chs. 13-23) to the whole earth (erets appears 16 times). The social-leveling catalogue in verse 2 — priest as people, master as servant, lender as borrower — dismantles every human hierarchy in six parallel pairs. The chapter ends with an image found nowhere else: the LORD reigns on Zion 'and before His elders is glory' (v. 23), echoing the elders' vision at Sinai (Exodus 24:9-11).

Translation Friction: The phrase qiryat-tohu (v. 10, 'city of chaos') uses the same word tohu as Genesis 1:2 — the city has been un-created, returned to primordial formlessness. We preserved 'chaos' to maintain the Genesis connection. The verb navlah (v. 4, 'withers') is applied to both the earth and its people — the same decay affects land and inhabitants, a merism for total ruin.

Connections: The cosmic imagery anticipates Revelation 6:12-14 (heavens rolled up, earth shaken). The elders before God's glory (v. 23) echo both Exodus 24:9-11 and Revelation 4:4. The 'everlasting covenant' broken (v. 5) refers back to the Noahic covenant (Genesis 9:16), suggesting that humanity has violated the most basic terms of existence.

¹Look — the LORD is about to empty the earth and lay it waste.

He will twist its surface and scatter its inhabitants.

²It will be the same for the people as for the priest,
for the servant as for his master,
for the maid as for her mistress,
for the buyer as for the seller,
for the lender as for the borrower,
for the creditor as for the debtor.

³The earth will be utterly emptied, utterly plundered — for the LORD has spoken this word.

⁴The earth mourns and withers;
the world languishes and withers.
The exalted of the earth's people languish.

⁵The earth is polluted beneath its inhabitants, for they have transgressed instructions,
violated the decree,
broken the everlasting covenant.

⁶Therefore a curse devours the earth, and its inhabitants bear their guilt.
Therefore the inhabitants of the earth are scorched,
and few people remain.

⁷The new wine mourns,
the vine languishes;
all who were glad at heart now sigh.

⁸The joyful tambourines have ceased,
the noise of the revelers has stopped,
the joyful lyre has ceased.

⁹No longer do they drink wine with singing;
strong drink is bitter to those who drink it.

¹⁰The city of chaos is broken;
every house is shut, none may enter.

¹¹There is an outcry in the streets over the wine;
all joy has grown dark;
the gladness of the earth is banished.

¹²Desolation remains in the city;
the gate is battered to ruins.

¹³For so it will be in the midst of the earth,
among the peoples:
like the beating of an olive tree,
like the gleaning when the grape harvest is over.

¹⁴They raise their voices, they shout for joy;
from the west they cry out for the majesty of the LORD.

¹⁵Therefore in the east glorify the LORD;
in the coastlands of the sea,
glorify the name of the LORD, the God of Israel.

¹⁶From the ends of the earth we hear songs:
"Glory to the Righteous One!"
But I say, "I waste away! I waste away!
Woe to me!
The treacherous betray!
The treacherous utterly betray!"

¹⁷Terror, pit, and trap await you, O inhabitant of the earth!

¹⁸Whoever flees from the sound of terror
will fall into the pit;
whoever climbs out of the pit
will be caught in the trap.
For the windows of heaven are opened,
and the foundations of the earth tremble.

¹⁹The earth is utterly shattered;
the earth is split apart;
the earth is violently shaken.

²⁰The earth staggers like a drunkard,
sways like a hut in the wind.
Its transgression weighs heavy upon it;
it falls and will not rise again.

²¹On that day the LORD will punish the host of heaven in the heights and the kings of the earth on the earth.

²²They will be gathered together like prisoners in a dungeon, shut up in a prison;
and after many days they will be visited.

²³The moon will be humiliated and the sun ashamed, for the LORD of Hosts will reign on Mount Zion and in Jerusalem, and before His elders — glory.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb boqeq ('emptying') and the related bolqah ('laying waste') create an assonant pair — the repeated 'b-q' sounds mirror the devastation described. The scope is universal: ha'arets ('the earth/land') governs the entire chapter.
1. Hinne ('look') signals that what follows is imminent and certain, not hypothetical. We rendered it 'look' rather than the archaic 'behold.'
2. Six parallel pairs systematically dismantle every social hierarchy: religious (people/priest), domestic (servant/master, maid/mistress), and economic (buyer/seller, lender/borrower, creditor/debtor). No one is exempt from the coming devastation.
3. The doubled infinitive absolutes (hibboq tibboq, hibboz tibboz) intensify both verbs: 'emptying it will be emptied, plundering it will be plundered.' We rendered this with 'utterly' to capture the emphasis. The closing formula 'for the LORD has spoken' (ki YHWH dibber) seals the oracle with divine authority.
4. The verb navlah ('withers, fades') is applied to both the physical earth and its human inhabitants — the same decay afflicts both. The Hebrew uses four verbs in rapid succession (avelah, navlah, umlalah, navlah) creating a cascade of decline. The 'exalted of the earth's people' (merom am-ha'arets) refers to the ruling class, now brought low.
5. The verb chanfah ('polluted, defiled') describes moral contamination that affects the physical land — a Deuteronomic concept (Numbers 35:33, Jeremiah 3:1-2). The three violations escalate: transgressed instructions (torot), violated the decree (choq), broken the everlasting covenant (berit olam).

5. The 'everlasting covenant' most likely refers to the Noahic covenant (Genesis 9:16), the only covenant explicitly called olam that applies to all humanity. Some scholars see a reference to cosmic moral order rather than a specific covenant.
6. The alah ('curse') is not arbitrary punishment but the activated consequence of covenant violation — the curses of Deuteronomy 28 made cosmic. The verb charu ('are scorched/burned') connects to the fire imagery throughout the chapter. The remnant motif appears: 'few people remain' (nishar enosh mizar).
7. The personification of wine and vine mourning extends the agricultural catastrophe into the social sphere — wine represents celebration, and its failure means the end of joy. The phrase simchei-lev ('glad of heart') describes those whose lives were built around festivity.
8. Three instruments of celebration are silenced: tuppim (tambourines/hand-drums), the tumult of alizzim (revelers/exultant ones), and kinnor (lyre/harp). The verb shavat ('ceased') echoes the Sabbath — but this is a cessation of joy, not a rest.
9. The reversal is complete: wine, which symbolized celebration throughout the ancient Near East, now tastes bitter. The verb yemar ('is bitter') from the root m-r-r connects to Naomi's self-renaming as Mara ('bitter,' Ruth 1:20).
10. The identity of qiryat-tohu ('city of chaos') is debated — Babylon, Jerusalem, or an archetypal city representing all human pride. The deliberate vagueness may be the point: in apocalyptic judgment, every city becomes the city of chaos.
10. The word tohu ('chaos, formlessness, emptiness') appears in Genesis 1:2 and Jeremiah 4:23, always signifying the undoing of creation's order.
11. The verb arvah ('has grown dark, has set') uses sunset imagery for joy — gladness has gone below the horizon. The verb galah ('banished, exiled') is the same word used for the exile of a people, applied here to joy itself: happiness has been deported from the land.
12. The gate — the center of civic life, commerce, and justice in an ancient city — is destroyed. The word shammah ('desolation') and she'iyah ('ruin') create a rhyming pair emphasizing total devastation.
13. The olive-beating and grape-gleaning metaphor signals that after judgment, only a remnant survives — the few olives left on the highest branches, the few clusters missed by the harvesters. The same imagery appears in 17:6. This is not total annihilation but devastating reduction.
14. The sudden shift to praise is startling after 13 verses of devastation. The remnant that survives (v. 13) lifts its voice in worship. The phrase miyyam ('from the sea/west') indicates the western regions — the Mediterranean coastlands. The 'majesty of the LORD' (ge'on YHWH) uses a word that elsewhere describes human pride now rightly applied only to God.
15. The word ba'urim is debated: 'in the fires' (from ur, 'fire/light') or 'in the east' (from or, 'light,' meaning the region of sunrise). We rendered 'in the east' to parallel 'the coastlands of the sea' (west), creating a merism: from east to west, all glorify the LORD. The full title 'the LORD, the God of Israel' grounds universal worship in Israel's covenant God.
16. The prophet's personal anguish interrupts the universal praise. While the ends of the earth sing 'glory to the Righteous One' (tsevi latsaddiq), the prophet cries razi-li razi-li ('my wasting, my wasting' or 'my secret, my secret'). The word razi is debated: from razah ('to waste away, grow lean') or raz ('secret, mystery'). We chose 'I waste away' for the more natural reading.
16. The triple repetition of the root b-g-d ('betray, deal treacherously') — bogdim bagadu, beged bogdim bagadu — is untranslatable wordplay. We preserved the repetition to echo the Hebrew's relentless hammering.
17. The triple alliteration pachad, pachat, pach ('terror, pit, trap') is one of Isaiah's most striking sound effects — three words beginning with the same consonant cluster, each one a step closer to capture. The alliteration is untranslatable; we preserved the three nouns and noted the Hebrew wordplay.
18. The escape-proof sequence continues the pachad/pachat/pach alliteration from v. 17: flee the terror, fall in the pit; escape the pit, caught in the trap. There is no escape from divine judgment.
18. The 'windows of heaven' (arubbot mimarom) echo the flood narrative (Genesis 7:11) — the same language describes cosmic catastrophe. The foundations of the earth shaking connects to the flood and to Sinai theophany.
19. Three doubled infinitive absolutes in succession: ro'ah hitro'a'ah ('shattering it is shattered'), por hitporrah ('splitting it is split apart'), mot hitmottatah ('shaking it is shaken'). The threefold repetition of erets ('earth') hammers the point: this is total, cosmic undoing.
20. The drunkard simile is vivid: the earth itself reels (nu'a tanu'a, another doubled infinitive). The melunah ('hut, lodge, shelter') is a flimsy field-shelter that sways in every wind — the solid earth has become as fragile as a temporary booth. The verb kavad ('is heavy') — the same root as kavod ('glory') — here describes the crushing weight of accumulated sin.
21. The judgment extends to both cosmic and earthly rulers: tseva hamarom ('the host of heaven/the heights') refers to celestial powers — whether angelic beings, astral deities worshipped by the nations, or both. The pairing of heavenly and earthly judgment anticipates the apocalyptic worldview of Daniel and Revelation.
22. The verb yippaqedu ('will be visited') is ambiguous: paqad can mean 'to visit' for judgment or for mercy. After 'many days' of imprisonment, God returns to these imprisoned powers — whether for final judgment or surprising mercy, the text does not specify. We preserved the ambiguity.
23. The personification of moon and sun as 'humiliated' and 'ashamed' uses emotional language for celestial bodies — their light is eclipsed by God's glory, making them embarrassed by comparison.

- 23. The phrase 'before His elders' (neged zegenav) echoes the Sinai theophany where the seventy elders saw God and ate and drank (Exodus 24:9-11). The same council of elders appears in Revelation 4:4.
- 23. The chapter ends on kavod ('glory') — the weight of God's manifest presence. This single word answers the entire chapter's devastation: the earth is unmade so that God's glory can be fully revealed.

Summary: A psalm of praise for God's faithfulness: the fortified city is ruined, and God prepares a feast for all peoples on His mountain. He swallows up death forever and wipes tears from every face.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 8 — 'He will swallow up death forever' (billa hammavet lanetsach) — is one of the most consequential sentences in the Hebrew Bible. Paul quotes it in 1 Corinthians 15:54 as fulfilled in resurrection. The image of God wiping tears from every face (v. 8) reappears verbatim in Revelation 7:17 and 21:4. The feast for all peoples (v. 6) is not for Israel alone — the scope is universal.

Translation Friction: The verb billa (v. 8, 'swallowed up') is graphic — death, which has been swallowing humanity, is itself swallowed. We preserved the verb's violence. The phrase lanetsach could mean 'forever' or 'completely' — both senses may be intended. The transition from cosmic praise (vv. 1-5) to the universal feast (vv. 6-8) to Moab's humiliation (vv. 10-12) is jarring; we let the text's own juxtapositions stand.

Connections: The feast on the mountain (v. 6) fulfills the covenant meal of Exodus 24:9-11 on a universal scale. Paul quotes verse 8 in 1 Corinthians 15:54. Revelation 7:17 and 21:4 cite the tears-wiped passage. The fortified city's destruction (v. 2) continues the qiryat-tohu theme from 24:10.

¹LORD, You are my God.

I will exalt You; I will praise Your name, for You have done wonderful things —
plans formed long ago, faithful and sure.

²For You have turned a city into a heap of stones,
a fortified city into a ruin,
a palace of foreigners into what is no longer a city —
it will never be rebuilt.

³Therefore a fierce people will honor You;
a city of ruthless nations will fear You.

⁴For You have been a fortress for the poor,
a fortress for the needy in their distress,
a shelter from the storm,
a shade from the heat —
for the breath of the ruthless is like a storm against a wall.

⁵As heat in a parched land,
You subdue the tumult of foreigners;
as heat is reduced by the shadow of a cloud,
so the song of the ruthless is silenced.

⁶On this mountain the LORD of Hosts will prepare for all peoples
a feast of rich food, a feast of aged wine —
rich food full of marrow,
aged wine well refined.

⁷On this mountain He will swallow up the shroud that covers all peoples,
the veil that is spread over all nations.

⁸He will swallow up death forever.
The Lord GOD will wipe away tears from every face, and the disgrace of His people He will remove from all the earth —
for the LORD has spoken.

⁹On that day it will be said:
"Look — this is our God!
We waited for Him, and He saved us.
This is the LORD; we waited for Him.
Let us be glad and rejoice in His salvation!"

¹⁰For the hand of the LORD will rest on this mountain, and Moab will be trampled in his place
as straw is trampled in a dung pit.

¹¹Moab will spread out his hands in the midst of it as a swimmer spreads his hands to swim, but God will bring down his pride along with the skill of his hands.

¹²The high fortification of your walls
He has brought down, laid low, cast to the ground — to the dust.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase etsot merachok ('plans from afar/long ago') affirms that God's judgments are not reactive but planned — the devastation of chapter 24 was the execution of an ancient purpose. The word emunah ('faithfulness') and omen ('sureness, truth') are paired to describe God's plans as both loyal and reliable.
2. The unnamed fortified city continues the archetype from 24:10. The progression — city to heap, fortification to ruin, palace to non-city — traces the complete reversal of human building. The phrase le'olam lo yibbaneh ('never to be rebuilt') echoes the permanent destruction of cherem cities.
3. The 'fierce people' (am az) and 'ruthless nations' (goyim aritsim) who now honor and fear God are the very peoples who were instruments of judgment. Even the oppressors recognize God's sovereignty.
4. God is described with four protection metaphors: fortress (ma'oz, twice), shelter (machseh), shade (tsel). These are physical, tangible images — the God who devastates cities (v. 2) is simultaneously the refuge of the vulnerable. The breath (ruach) of the ruthless is compared to a zerem qir ('storm against a wall') — relentless, battering force.
5. The metaphor shifts from storm to desert heat: God suppresses the noise (she'on) of foreigners as a cloud's shadow cuts the heat. The word zamor (v. 5b) can mean 'song' or 'pruning' — we chose 'song' to parallel the tumult/noise theme, with the ruthless ones' triumphant singing silenced.

6. The feast is for kol-ha'ammim ('all peoples') — not Israel alone. This is one of the Hebrew Bible's most universalist visions. The food is described with extravagant abundance: shemanim ('rich/fatty foods'), shemarim ('aged wines settled on their lees'). The doubled description (rich food / rich food full of marrow, aged wine / aged wine well refined) conveys lavish generosity.
6. The mountain is Mount Zion — God's feast is located at the center of Israel's worship but open to all nations. This universalizing of the Sinai covenant meal (Exodus 24:9-11) is theologically revolutionary.
7. The 'shroud' (hallot) and 'veil' (massekah) covering all peoples likely refers to death's pall — the universal shadow of mortality that hangs over every nation. God removes the covering that separates humanity from His presence. The verb billa ('swallow up') anticipates verse 8's climactic statement.
8. The verb billa ('swallowed up') is the same verb used in v. 7 for the shroud — God swallows up both the covering of death and death itself. Death is personified as something that can be consumed.
8. The phrase lanetsach can mean 'forever' (temporal) or 'completely' (intensive). Both senses apply: death's defeat is both permanent and total.
8. The wiping of tears (machah dim'ah) uses the same verb as wiping out a name or a stain — the removal is thorough. This image appears in Revelation 7:17 and 21:4.
8. 'The LORD has spoken' (YHWH dibber) seals the promise with divine authority — the same formula that sealed the judgment in 24:3.
9. The double identification — 'this is our God... this is the LORD' — is the climax of recognition. The verb qivvinu ('we waited, we hoped') appears twice, emphasizing patient expectation now vindicated. The word yeshu'ah ('salvation') shares the root of Joshua/Jesus (y-sh-a).
10. The shift from universal feast to Moab's humiliation is jarring — but the juxtaposition is deliberate: the same mountain that hosts salvation also hosts judgment. Moab represents those who oppose God's purposes. The madmenah ('dung pit') image is deliberately degrading — Moab's pride (v. 11) meets the lowest possible end.
11. The swimming metaphor is bizarre and vivid — Moab flailing in the dung pit like a swimmer, unable to gain purchase. The word ga'avah ('pride') is Moab's defining characteristic in Isaiah (16:6) and its undoing.
12. Three verbs of descent — heshach ('brought down'), hishpil ('laid low'), higgia ('cast to') — track the fortress from height to ground to dust. The trajectory of human pride always ends in afar ('dust'), the substance from which humanity was formed (Genesis 2:7).

Summary: Isaiah 26 is a victory song to be sung 'on that day' in the land of Judah. The strong city is God's — its walls are salvation, its gates open to the righteous. The chapter's theological center is trust: the mind stayed on God is kept in perfect peace, because the LORD is the everlasting Rock (tsur olamim). Isaiah contrasts the exalted city brought low with the humble who walk over its ruins. The middle section is a lament: despite God's judgments, the wicked do not learn righteousness. Then comes one of the Old Testament's clearest resurrection texts: 'Your dead shall live, their bodies shall rise' (v. 19). The chapter closes with a command to hide behind closed doors while divine indignation passes — an echo of the Passover night. We rendered this song with attention to its shifting moods: confidence, trust, frustration at the wicked, anguished prayer, resurrection hope, and finally urgent instruction to shelter from wrath.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 19 ('Your dead shall live, their bodies shall rise — awake and sing, you who dwell in the dust') is one of the earliest and clearest resurrection texts in the Hebrew Bible. While Job 19:25-27 and Daniel 12:2 also point toward bodily resurrection, Isaiah 26:19 stands out for its directness and its poetic beauty. The 'dew of lights' (tal orot) that falls on the dead is a unique image — resurrection as morning dew, as the return of light to those in darkness. The phrase tsur olamim ('everlasting Rock,' v. 4) is a divine title found only here in this exact form, combining permanence (olam) with solidity (tsur). The 'perfect peace' (shalom shalom, v. 3) — the doubled noun — indicates peace that is complete, whole, and enduring.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the 'strong city' of verse 1 and the 'lofty city' brought low in verse 5 is debated. The strong city appears to be Zion (God's city), while the lofty city is the same city of chaos from 24:10 — the oppressive human civilization. The lament in verses 16-18 is textually difficult: the Hebrew of verse 18 ('we have not wrought salvation in the earth') expresses the futility of human effort apart from God, setting up the divine answer of resurrection in verse 19. The command to 'enter your rooms and shut your doors' (v. 20) echoes Exodus 12:22-23, where Israel sheltered behind blood-marked doors while the destroyer passed. We preserved this Passover echo without making it explicit, letting the reader hear the connection.

Connections: The 'everlasting Rock' (tsur olamim, v. 4) connects to Deuteronomy 32:4 ('the Rock, His work is perfect') and 1 Corinthians 10:4 ('that Rock was Christ'). 'Perfect peace' (shalom shalom, v. 3) echoes Isaiah 57:19 ('Peace, peace to him who is far and to him who is near'). The resurrection of verse 19 is developed in Daniel 12:2, Ezekiel 37 (the valley of dry bones), and ultimately in the New Testament resurrection narratives. The door-shutting command (v. 20) connects to Exodus 12:22-23 (Passover), Noah entering the ark (Gen 7:16), and Jesus' teaching about the closed door (Matt 25:10). The 'earth disclosing its blood' (v. 21) anticipates Genesis 4:10-11 (Abel's blood crying from the ground) and Revelation 6:10 (the martyrs' cry).

¹On that day this song shall be sung in the land of Judah:
"We have a strong city —
He sets salvation as walls and ramparts."

²Open the gates,
that the righteous nation may enter,
the one that keeps faith.

³The steadfast mind You keep in perfect peace — perfect peace —
for it trusts in You.

⁴Trust in the LORD forever, for in the LORD GOD is the everlasting Rock.

⁵For He has brought low
the inhabitants of the height,
the lofty city.
He lays it low, lays it low to the ground — to the dust.

⁶The foot tramples it —
the feet of the poor,
the steps of the needy.

⁷The path of the righteous is level;
O Upright One, You make smooth
the way of the righteous.

⁸Yes, in the path of Your judgments,
O LORD, we wait for You;
for Your name and Your renown
is the desire of our soul.

⁹My soul yearns for You in the night;
my spirit within me seeks You at dawn.
For when Your judgments come upon the earth,
the inhabitants of the world learn righteousness.

¹⁰Though grace is shown to the wicked,
he does not learn righteousness;
in a land of uprightness he acts perversely and does not see the majesty of the LORD.

¹¹O LORD, Your hand is raised high,
but they do not see.
Let them see Your zeal for Your people and be ashamed!
Let the fire reserved for Your enemies consume them!

¹²O LORD, You will ordain peace for us,
for indeed all that we have accomplished
You have done for us.

¹³O LORD our God,
other lords besides You have ruled over us,
but by You alone we invoke Your name.

¹⁴The dead do not live,
the shades do not rise.
Therefore You have punished and destroyed them and wiped out all memory of them.

¹⁵You have enlarged the nation, O LORD,
You have enlarged the nation — You are glorified!
You have extended all the borders of the land.

¹⁶O LORD, in distress they sought You;
they poured out a whispered prayer
when Your discipline was upon them.

¹⁷As a pregnant woman draws near to giving birth, writhing, crying out in her labor pains —
so were we before You, O LORD.

¹⁸We were pregnant, we writhed —
but we gave birth to wind.
We have not brought salvation to the earth,
and the inhabitants of the world have not fallen.

¹⁹Your dead shall live,
their bodies shall rise.
Awake and sing, you who dwell in the dust!
For your dew is a dew of lights,
and the earth will give birth to the shades.

²⁰Go, my people, enter your rooms and shut your doors behind you.
Hide yourselves for a brief moment until the indignation passes.

21For behold, the LORD comes forth from His place to punish the iniquity of the earth's inhabitants.
The earth will disclose its blood and will no longer cover its slain.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day') marks this as an eschatological song — a hymn for the future day of the LORD's reign. The strong city ('ir oz) is Zion, whose walls are not stone but yeshu'ah ('salvation'). The word chel ('rampart, outer fortification') adds a second defensive layer. The city's security is entirely divine — God Himself is its defense system.
1. This is the counterpart to the 'city of chaos' (24:10) and the 'lofty city' brought low (v. 5). While human cities crumble, God's city stands because its walls are salvation itself.
2. The command to open the gates (pitchu she'arim) invites entry to those who qualify: a goy tsaddiq ('righteous nation') that is shomer emunim ('keeping faith/faithfulness'). The word emunim ('faithfulnesses') is plural, suggesting consistent, habitual faithfulness rather than a single act. Entry to God's city is by character, not by birth or power.
3. This verse is one of Isaiah's most beloved. The yetser ('mind, inclination, imagination') that is samukh ('stayed, supported, leaning upon') God is kept in shalom shalom — the doubled noun indicating completeness, totality, perfect wholeness. The reason is simple: ki vekha batuach ('for it trusts in You'). Trust is the mechanism; peace is the result.
3. The word yetser also appears in Genesis 6:5 ('every inclination of the thoughts of his heart was only evil') — the same human faculty that can be bent toward evil is here stayed on God and produces peace.
4. The command to trust (bitchu) echoes verse 3's description of the trusting mind. The phrase adei-ad ('forever, to perpetuity') removes any time limit on the command. The divine name is doubled: be-Yah YHWH — the shortened form (Yah) and the full form (YHWH) together, as though one name cannot contain enough of God's identity.
4. Tsur olamim ('everlasting Rock' or 'Rock of Ages') is one of the great divine titles. Augustus Toplady's hymn 'Rock of Ages' draws on this verse. The Rock metaphor conveys permanence, immovability, and reliability — the opposite of the earth that staggers like a drunkard (24:20).
5. The 'inhabitants of the height' (yoshevei marom) and the 'lofty city' (qiryah nishgavah) are the opposite of the strong city of verse 1. This exalted city trusted in its own elevation — but God brings it down. The verb yashpilenah ('He lays it low') is repeated for emphasis, and the descent is total: to the ground (ad-erets), to the dust (ad-afar). The repetition mirrors the progressive demolition of 25:12.
6. The ultimate reversal: the lofty city, brought to dust, is trampled by the very people it once oppressed — the poor (ani) and the needy (dallim). Those who were trodden down now tread on the ruins of those who trod on them. The foot (regel) is singular, then pluralized (raglei, pa'amei) — the trampling spreads from one foot to many.
7. The orach ('path') of the tsaddiq ('righteous one') is mesharim ('level, straight, upright'). God as the yashar ('Upright One') is the one who levels the path — tefalles ('You make level, You weigh, You smooth'). The righteous walk on a path that God has prepared and leveled. The word tefalles can also mean 'to weigh on scales,' suggesting God's justice ensures the path's integrity.
8. The community speaks: even in the midst of God's judgments (mishpatekha), they wait (qivvinukha) — the same verb of patient hope from 25:9. The 'desire of the soul' (ta'avat nefesh) is directed toward God's name (shimkha) and memorial/renown (zikhrekha). They desire not rescue from judgment but God Himself — His name, His reputation, His presence.
9. Night longing (ballaylah) and dawn seeking (ashacharekkah, from shachar, 'dawn') frame a cycle of desire: the soul reaches for God through darkness into morning light. The theological principle in the second half is clear: divine judgments (mishpatekha) are pedagogical — they teach (lamedu) the world's inhabitants righteousness (tsedeq). Judgment is not merely punitive but instructive.
10. The counterpoint to verse 9: while judgments teach the world's inhabitants, the rasha ('wicked one') refuses the lesson. Even when shown grace (yuchan), he does not learn righteousness. Even in a 'land of uprightness' (erets nekhochot), he acts perversely (ye'avvel). The wicked one's blindness is willful — he 'does not see' (bal-yir'eh) the LORD's majesty (ge'ut YHWH). The problem is not insufficient evidence but refusal to perceive.
11. God's hand is lifted (ramah yadekha) — a gesture of power and action — but the wicked 'do not see' (bal yechezayun). The prophet then demands that they be made to see: yechezu veyevoshu ('let them see and be ashamed'). The qin'at am ('zeal for the people') is God's jealous love for His own. The fire (esh) that consumes is reserved for God's enemies (tsarekha) — divine fire is discriminating, not random.
12. A profound confession of divine sovereignty: tishpot shalom lanu ('You will ordain/establish peace for us') declares God as the source of peace. The second clause goes further: 'all our works/deeds You have done for us' (kol ma'aseinu pa'alta lanu). Human achievement is reattributed to God. This is not fatalism but grateful acknowledgment — whatever good has been accomplished, God was the worker behind the work.
13. A confession of past unfaithfulness: adonim zulatekha ('lords other than You') have 'mastered us' (be'alunu — from the root ba'al, 'to master, to own,' also the name of the Canaanite deity). The double meaning is deliberate: other ba'als have been our ba'al. But now: levad-bekha nazkir shemekha ('by You alone we invoke Your name'). The people renounce all rival allegiances and cling to the LORD's name exclusively.

- 14. This verse refers to the 'other lords' of verse 13 — the false gods and foreign masters. They are metim ('dead') and refa'im ('shades, departed spirits' — the inhabitants of Sheol). They shall not live, shall not rise. God has destroyed them and erased their memory (zeikher). This verse sets up the dramatic contrast with verse 19, where God's dead do live and do rise.
- 14. The refa'im ('shades') are the powerless dead of Sheol — the term is used both of the departed and of the pre-Israelite giant inhabitants of Canaan. Here the false lords are consigned to permanent death.
- 15. The doubling of yasafta laggoi ('You have enlarged the nation') emphasizes divine blessing on Israel. God is nikbadta ('glorified') through this expansion. The phrase richaqta kol-qatsvei-arets ('You have extended all the ends of the land') may refer to the expansion of Israel's territory or, more likely, to the extension of God's influence to the earth's ends. Growth and glory belong to God.
- 16. The people acknowledge that distress (batsar) drove them to seek God. The verb paqadukha ('they visited/sought You') echoes the visitation language used elsewhere for God visiting humanity — here humanity visits God in desperate prayer. The 'whispered prayer' (tsaun lachash) suggests an intensity too deep for loud speech — a quiet, urgent pouring out before God. Musar ('discipline, chastening') is understood as formative, not merely punitive.
- 17. The birth metaphor captures the community's anguish: they are like a woman in labor (harah taqriv laledet), writhing (tachil) and crying out (tiz'aq) in her contractions (chavaleiha). The comparison is direct: 'so were we before You' (ken hayinu mippanekha). The metaphor implies both agony and expectation — labor is painful but purposeful, pointing toward delivery.
- 18. The labor metaphor from verse 17 reaches its devastating conclusion: after all the agony, the birth produced only ruach ('wind, breath') — nothing. The confession is total: 'we have not brought salvation to the earth' (yeshu'ot bal-na'aseh erets). Human effort, even agonized effort, cannot produce deliverance. The world's wicked inhabitants 'have not fallen' (bal-yippelu) despite Israel's striving. This verse of despair sets up the divine answer in verse 19.
- 19. This is one of the Hebrew Bible's clearest resurrection texts. Three commands/declarations: (1) 'Your dead shall live' (yichyu metekha), (2) 'their bodies shall rise' (nevalati yequmun), (3) 'Awake and sing, you who dwell in the dust' (haqitsu veranenu shokhevei afar). The address to 'dust-dwellers' recalls Genesis 3:19 — those who returned to dust are summoned back from it.
- 19. The phrase tal orot ('dew of lights') is found nowhere else. The dew that raises the dead is luminous — made of light itself. The earth 'gives birth to' (tappil) the refa'im — a deliberate contrast with verse 18, where the people gave birth to wind. God's creative power succeeds where human effort fails. The dead of verse 14 (the false lords) do not rise, but God's dead (metekha, 'Your dead') do. Resurrection is selective and covenantal.
- 20. God speaks directly to His people with intimate address: lekh ammi ('go, my people'). The instructions are specific: enter your rooms (bo bachadarekha), shut your doors (segor delatekha), hide (chavi). The za'am ('indignation, wrath') will pass — it is only kim'at rega ('a brief moment'). The echo of Exodus 12:22-23 is unmistakable: on the night of the Passover, Israel stayed behind closed doors while the destroyer passed through Egypt.
- 20. The 'brief moment' (kim'at rega) relativizes the suffering; however terrible the indignation, it is temporary. God shelters His people through judgment, not from it — they experience the time of wrath but are protected within it.
- 21. The reason for hiding: the LORD exits His dwelling (yotse mimmeqomo) to punish (lifqod avon). The image of God 'coming forth from His place' suggests that judgment requires His active intervention — He leaves His heavenly abode to act in the world. The earth 'disclosing its blood' (gilletah ha'arets et-dameiha) echoes Genesis 4:10-11, where Abel's blood cried from the ground. All the innocent blood the earth has absorbed will be revealed.
- 21. The final clause — 'and will no longer cover its slain' (velo-tekhasseh od al-harugeiha) — means that every murder, every injustice concealed in history will be exposed. The earth itself becomes a witness, unable to hide the evidence any longer. This anticipates Revelation 6:10, where the martyrs cry out for vindication.

Summary: Isaiah 27 concludes the four-chapter 'Isaiah's Apocalypse' with three decisive acts: the slaying of Leviathan, the tender renewal of God's vineyard, and the gathering of scattered exiles. On that day the LORD draws His great sword against Leviathan — the twisting serpent, the dragon of the sea — and slays it. Then comes a vineyard song (vv. 2-6) that deliberately reverses chapter 5's vineyard of disappointment: where the earlier vineyard produced wild grapes and was abandoned, this vineyard is guarded day and night by a God who has no wrath, who waters it every moment. Israel will bud, blossom, and fill the world with fruit. The middle section addresses Israel's discipline: Jacob's guilt is atoned when altar stones are crushed to chalk and Asherah poles fall. The chapter — and the entire Apocalypse — closes with the sound of the great trumpet (shofar gadol), summoning the lost and scattered from Assyria and Egypt to worship the LORD on the holy mountain in Jerusalem. We rendered this concluding chapter with attention to its tone of resolution and restoration, preserving the vineyard reversal and the triumphant finality of the great trumpet.

What Makes This Remarkable: The vineyard song (vv. 2-6) is a deliberate revision of Isaiah 5:1-7. In chapter 5, the vineyard was lovingly planted but produced bad fruit, and God tore down its walls in judgment. Here, the same God tends a vineyard with no anger — He waters it constantly, guards it day and night, and invites even thorns and briars to make peace with Him rather than face burning. The shift from wrath to tenderness is theologically momentous: God has moved from judgment to restoration. The Leviathan slaying (v. 1) draws on ancient Near Eastern combat mythology (the Ugaritic texts describe Baal's battle with the sea-serpent Litanu/Lotan) but radicalizes it: YHWH defeats cosmic chaos not in primordial time but on the eschatological 'that day.' The great trumpet (v. 13) becomes a key image in later Jewish and Christian eschatology (cf. Matt 24:31; 1 Cor 15:52; 1 Thess 4:16).

Translation Friction: The Leviathan references (v. 1) name three entities — or possibly one entity with three descriptions: 'Leviathan the fleeing serpent, Leviathan the twisting serpent, and the dragon in the sea.' The relationship between these figures (one monster, two, or three?) is debated. The Ugaritic parallel (KTU 1.5.I.1-3) lists similar epithets for a single creature, suggesting Isaiah describes one cosmic enemy with multiple aspects. The 'altar stones crushed to chalk' (v. 9) as the condition for atonement is surprising — it appears to require the destruction of pagan altars (or possibly even Israelite altars that had been corrupted) as the price of forgiveness. We rendered bezot ('by this') without specifying what is being atoned for, as the Hebrew leaves the referent somewhat open. The 'city' in verses 10-11 (fortified, forsaken, a pasture for calves) may be Jerusalem under judgment, the same unnamed city of chaos, or a composite image.

Connections: Leviathan (v. 1) appears in Job 41, Psalm 74:14, and Psalm 104:26, and connects to Revelation 12-13 (the dragon and sea-beast). The vineyard song (vv. 2-6) reverses Isaiah 5:1-7 and anticipates Jesus' vineyard parables (Matt 21:33-46; John 15:1-8). The great trumpet (v. 13) connects to Leviticus 25:9 (Jubilee trumpet), Matthew 24:31 ('He will send His angels with a great trumpet'), 1 Corinthians 15:52 ('at the last trumpet'), and 1 Thessalonians 4:16. The gathering of exiles from Assyria and Egypt fulfills the promise of Isaiah 11:11-12. Worship on the holy mountain (v. 13) concludes the Apocalypse with the same image that opened it: the LORD reigning on Mount Zion (24:23).

¹On that day the LORD will punish with His sword —
His cruel, great, and mighty sword —
Leviathan the fleeing serpent,
Leviathan the twisting serpent,
and He will slay the dragon that is in the sea.

²On that day:
"A vineyard of delight — sing of it!"

³"I, the LORD, am its keeper;
every moment I water it.
Lest anyone harm it,
night and day I guard it."

⁴"Wrath is not in Me.
If thorns and briars should confront Me in battle —
I would march against them,
I would burn them all together."

⁵"Or let him take hold of My refuge, let him make peace with Me —
yes, let him make peace with Me."

⁶In days to come Jacob shall take root, Israel shall bud and blossom and fill the face of the world with fruit.

⁷Has He struck Israel
as He struck those who struck her?
Has she been slain
as her slayers were slain?

⁸By measure, by exile,
You contended with her;
He removed her with His fierce wind
on a day of east wind.

⁹Therefore by this Jacob's guilt shall be atoned for,
and this is the full fruit of removing his sin:
when he makes all the altar stones like chalk stones ground to pieces — no Asherah poles or incense altars shall stand.

¹⁰For the fortified city stands alone,
a habitation abandoned and forsaken like a wilderness.
There the calf grazes,
there it lies down
and strips bare its branches.

¹¹When its branches dry out they are broken off;
women come and make fires with them.
For this is not a people of understanding;
therefore their Maker will not have compassion on them,
and their Former will show them no favor.

¹²On that day the LORD will thresh from the flowing Euphrates to the Brook of Egypt, and you shall be gathered one by one,
O children of Israel.

¹³On that day a great trumpet shall be blown,
and those perishing in the land of Assyria and those driven out to the land of Egypt shall come and worship the LORD
on the holy mountain in Jerusalem.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Three descriptions of the enemy: livyatan nachash bariach ('Leviathan the fleeing/darting serpent'), livyatan nachash aqallaton ('Leviathan the twisting/coiling serpent'), and hattannin asher bayyam ('the dragon/sea-monster that is in the sea'). The sword (cherev) is itself described with three adjectives: qashah ('harsh, cruel'), gedolah ('great'), and chazaqah ('strong, mighty'). The triple sword matches the triple enemy.
1. The slaying of Leviathan is the final act of cosmic judgment. While chapters 24-26 dealt with the earth, its cities, and its peoples, chapter 27 begins by addressing the ultimate spiritual enemy — the chaos-power behind the chaos. The bayyom hahu ('on that day') formula ties this to the eschatological sequence.

2. The vineyard song begins with the same formula: bayyom hahu ('on that day'). The kerem chemed ('vineyard of delight/desire') recalls the kerem of Isaiah 5:1, but where that vineyard disappointed, this one delights. The command annu-lah ('sing of it/respond to it') invites a song — this is the new vineyard song, replacing the bitter harvest of chapter 5.
3. God speaks in first person: ani YHWH notsrah ('I, the LORD, am its keeper'). The frequency of care is extraordinary: lirga'im ('every moment, constantly') He waters it. Night and day (laylah veyomam) He guards it (etsorenah). In chapter 5, God removed the vineyard's hedge and let it be trampled. Here, the opposite: ceaseless, watchful, tender care. The reversal is complete.
3. The verb natsar ('to keep, to guard, to watch over') implies both protection and cultivation. God is simultaneously gardener and guardian.
4. The astonishing declaration: chemah ein li ('wrath is not in Me'). God's posture toward His vineyard has changed from the fury of chapter 5 to the absence of wrath. The thorns and briers (shamir shayit — the same pair from 5:6 and 7:23-25) are potential enemies, not the vineyard itself. If they attack, God will burn them — but the burning is protective, not punitive toward the vineyard. God fights for His vineyard, not against it.
5. Even the thorns and briers have a second option: instead of being burned, they can grasp God's ma'uzi ('My refuge, My stronghold') and make peace (shalom) with Him. The repetition — shalom ya'aseh li, shalom ya'aseh li ('let him make peace with Me, let him make peace with Me') — is emphatic. God prefers reconciliation to destruction. The offer of peace to the very enemies of the vineyard is remarkable: even thorns can become part of God's peace.
6. The vineyard's purpose is revealed: Jacob takes root (yashrish), Israel buds and blossoms (yatsits ufarach), and the fruit fills the face of the world (umale'u fenei-tevel tenuvah). The progression — root, bud, blossom, fruit — describes complete agricultural fulfillment. The scope is global: not just Israel's land but the face of the world (tevel) is covered with Israel's fruit. The vineyard that was destroyed in chapter 5 now produces abundance that blesses all nations.
7. Two rhetorical questions demand the answer 'No.' God's discipline of Israel is not the same as His destruction of Israel's enemies. The verb hikkahu ('He struck him') is used twice with different subjects — God strikes Israel differently from how He strikes the nations. Israel's punishment is measured, corrective; the nations' destruction is final. The distinction between discipline and destruction is crucial to the chapter's theology.
8. The debated word besa'ase'ah may mean 'by measure' (i.e., measured discipline) or may relate to the word for a dry measure (se'ah), implying 'measure by measure.' The verb terivenah ('You contended with her') describes God's legal dispute with Israel — not arbitrary punishment but judicial process. The 'east wind' (qadim) is the sirocco from the desert, the instrument of exile. God's 'fierce wind' (rucho haqqashah) drives Israel into dispersion, but even this is measured, not total.
9. The condition of atonement (yekhuppar avon Ya'aqov) is specific: the altar stones must be smashed to chalk dust (avnei gir menupatsot), and the Asherah poles (asherim) and incense altars (chammanim) must be permanently removed. The 'altar stones' likely refer to pagan altars or syncretistic worship sites. The word menupatsot ('ground to pieces, shattered') indicates total destruction — no reconstruction possible.
9. The phrase vezeh kol-peri ('and this is the full fruit') uses agricultural language: the 'fruit' of Israel's discipline is the complete removal of idolatry. Discipline produces the fruit that the original vineyard failed to yield (ch. 5).
10. The fortified city (ir betsura) is now badad ('alone, solitary') — the word used for mourning isolation (cf. Lam 1:1, 'How lonely sits the city'). The once-populated habitation (navah) is meshullach ('abandoned, sent away') and ne'ezav ('forsaken') like a wilderness (midbar). Calves graze freely in its ruins — a sign of total desolation. The branches (se'ifeiha) that the calf strips bare may be remnants of gardens or orchards that once adorned the city.
11. The dried branches (qetsiraha) of the abandoned city are gathered by women for fuel — the final indignity of a destroyed settlement. The theological verdict is severe: lo am-binot hu ('this is not a people of understanding'). Because they lack discernment, their Maker (osehu) will not show compassion (racham) and their Former (yotsero) will not show favor (channan). The titles 'Maker' and 'Former' — creation language — heighten the tragedy: the Creator withdraws mercy from His own creatures.
12. The verb yachbot ('He will thresh, beat out') describes the careful separation of grain from chaff — God will thresh the territory from the Euphrates (shibbolet hannahar, 'the flowing channel of the River') to the Brook of Egypt (nachal Mitsrayim, the Wadi el-Arish). These are the ideal borders of the promised land (Gen 15:18). Within this vast territory, Israelites will be gathered le'echad echad ('one by one') — individually, carefully, none overlooked.
12. The image of threshing conveys both judgment (separating chaff) and harvest (gathering grain). The Israelites are the grain; they will be individually gathered from among the nations.
13. The Apocalypse concludes with the great trumpet (shofar gadol). Those 'perishing' (ha'ovedim) in Assyria and those 'driven out' (hanniddachim) to Egypt — representing the northern and southern diaspora respectively — hear the blast and come. The destination is singular and specific: the holy mountain (har haqqodesh) in Jerusalem. The final verb is vehishtachavu ('and they shall worship') — the entire four-chapter sequence resolves in worship on Zion.
13. This verse becomes foundational for Jewish and Christian eschatology. Jesus references the great trumpet in Matthew 24:31 ('He will send His angels with a great trumpet call, and they will gather His elect from the four winds'). Paul echoes it in 1 Corinthians 15:52 ('at the last trumpet') and 1 Thessalonians 4:16 ('with the trumpet call of God'). The Apocalypse that began with the earth emptied (24:1) ends with the earth's scattered people gathered home.

Summary: Isaiah 28 opens the sequence of six 'Woe' oracles (chapters 28-33) with a judgment against the drunkards of Ephraim, whose fading crown of glory will be trampled by an Assyrian flood. The oracle then pivots sharply to Jerusalem, where scoffing leaders have made a 'covenant with death' — trusting in lies rather than the LORD. Against their false foundation, God lays a tested stone in Zion: a precious cornerstone, sure and unshakable. Justice becomes the measuring line, righteousness the plumb line, and the refuge of lies is swept away. The chapter closes with a masterful farmer parable (vv. 23-29) in which God teaches that His discipline — like plowing, sowing, and threshing — is always purposeful, proportioned, and temporary. We rendered this chapter with attention to its structural irony: the mockers' babble-syllables become the instrument of their own undoing, and the cornerstone passage stands as one of the most important messianic texts in the prophetic canon.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 16 introduces the image of the eben bochan — a tested stone, a precious cornerstone, a sure foundation laid in Zion. This language is quoted or alluded to in Romans 9:33, Ephesians 2:20, and 1 Peter 2:4-8, where it is applied directly to the Messiah. The farmer parable (vv. 23-29) is unique in Isaiah — an extended wisdom mashal embedded within a prophetic oracle, teaching that God's judgments are as purposeful and varied as the farmer's methods of plowing, sowing, and threshing. The tsav latsav, qav laqav refrain (vv. 10, 13) is one of the most debated passages in Hebrew prophecy: likely onomatopoeic mockery that God turns back on the mockers.

Translation Friction: We rendered eben bochan as 'a tested stone' rather than the traditional 'a tried stone,' since the Hebrew bochan derives from the root b-ch-n (to assay, to test metals for quality). The phrase 'covenant with death' (v. 15) is retained literally; it likely refers to a diplomatic alliance with Egypt, though some scholars see an allusion to necromancy or an occult pact. The tsav latsav, qav laqav syllables (vv. 10, 13) resist definitive translation — they may mimic a child's alphabet lesson, mock prophetic repetition, or be deliberately meaningless babble. We rendered them as 'command upon command... line upon line' to preserve recognizability while noting the mockery in the translator's notes. In verse 16, 'will never be shaken' replaces the KJV's 'shall not make haste,' following the Septuagint reading that Paul uses in Romans 9:33.

Connections: The cornerstone (v. 16) connects to Psalm 118:22, Zechariah 10:4, Daniel 2:34-35 (the stone that strikes the statue), Matthew 21:42, Acts 4:11, Romans 9:33, Ephesians 2:20, and 1 Peter 2:4-8. The 'foreign lips' judgment (v. 11) is quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 14:21 regarding the gift of tongues. The 'strange work' of God (v. 21) fighting against His own people reverses the victories at Perazim (2 Samuel 5:20) and Gibeon (Joshua 10:10-12). The farmer parable echoes wisdom traditions found in Proverbs and anticipates Jesus' agricultural parables. The 'covenant with death' reverses the covenant hope of Isaiah 25:8 ('He will swallow up death forever').

¹Woe to the proud crown of Ephraim's drunkards, to the fading blossom of its splendid beauty,
set on the head of a rich valley —
those hammered by wine!

²Look — the Lord has one who is mighty and strong.
Like a storm of hail, a torrent of destruction,
like a flood of mighty, overwhelming waters,
he will hurl it down to the earth with force.

³The proud crown of Ephraim's drunkards will be trampled underfoot.

⁴And the fading blossom of its splendid beauty,
set on the head of a rich valley,
will be like an early fig before summer —

whoever sees it swallows it the moment it is in his hand.

⁵On that day the LORD of Hosts Himself will become a crown of splendor and a diadem of beauty for the remnant of His people,

⁶a spirit of justice for the one who sits in judgment, and strength for those who turn back
the battle at the gate.

⁷But these also stagger from wine and reel from strong drink:
priest and prophet stagger from strong drink,
swallowed up by wine,
reeling from strong drink.
They stagger in their visions;
they stumble in their judgments.

⁸For every table is covered with vomit — filth with no clean place left.

⁹'Whom will he teach knowledge?
Whom will he instruct in the message?
Those just weaned from milk?
Those just taken from the breast?'

¹⁰'For it is command upon command, command upon command, line upon line, line upon line,
a little here, a little there.'

¹¹Indeed, through foreign lips and an alien tongue
the LORD will speak to this people.

¹²He had told them,
'This is the place of rest — give rest to the weary;
this is the place of repose.'
But they would not listen.

¹³So the word of the LORD will become for them command upon command, command upon command,
line upon line, line upon line,
a little here, a little there —
so that they will go and stumble backward, be broken, ensnared, and captured.

¹⁴Therefore hear the word of the LORD,
you scoffers who rule this people in Jerusalem.

¹⁵Because you have said,
'We have cut a covenant with death;
with Sheol we have made a pact.
When the overwhelming scourge sweeps through,
it will not reach us,
for we have made lies our refuge and hidden ourselves behind falsehood.'

¹⁶Therefore this is what the Lord GOD says:
'Look — I am laying in Zion a stone,
a tested stone,
a precious cornerstone, a sure foundation.
The one who trusts will never be shaken.'

¹⁷I will make justice the measuring line and righteousness the plumb line.
Hail will sweep away the refuge of lies,
and waters will flood the hiding place.

¹⁸Your covenant with death will be annulled, and your pact with Sheol will not stand.
When the overwhelming scourge sweeps through,
you will be trampled by it.

¹⁹As often as it passes through, it will seize you — morning after morning it will sweep over,
by day and by night.
Sheer terror will be the only way to understand this message.

²⁰For the bed is too short to stretch out on,
and the blanket too narrow to wrap around you.

²¹For the LORD will rise as He did at Mount Perazim;
He will storm as in the Valley of Gibeon —
to do His work, His strange work, and perform His task, His alien task.

²²Now stop your scoffing,
lest your chains grow even tighter,
for I have heard from the Lord GOD of Hosts
a decree of destruction determined against the whole land.

²³Listen and hear my voice;
pay attention and hear my words.

²⁴Does the farmer plow all day just to sow?
Does he endlessly break and harrow his ground?

²⁵When he has leveled its surface,
does he not scatter black cumin and sow cumin,
plant wheat in rows and barley in its place,
and spelt along the border?

²⁶For his God instructs him and teaches him the right way.

²⁷Black cumin is not threshed with a sledge,
nor is a cart wheel rolled over cumin.
Black cumin is beaten out with a stick,
and cumin with a rod.

²⁸Grain for bread is crushed,
but not forever does the farmer thresh it.
He drives the cart wheel over it
but does not grind it to dust.

²⁹This also comes from the LORD of Hosts — wonderful in counsel, magnificent in wisdom.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Hoi' is rendered 'Woe' throughout these oracles as a standard prophetic exclamation of grief and judgment. The 'proud crown' (ateret ge'ut) likely refers to Samaria's hilltop position, wreathed like a garland above the fertile valleys of the northern kingdom. The participle halumei ('hammered, struck down') conveys violent inebriation, not casual drinking.
2. The unnamed 'mighty and strong one' is the Assyrian king, used as God's instrument of judgment against Samaria. Three storm images — hail, destructive wind, and flood — pile up to convey irresistible force.
3. The trampling metaphor completes the garland image from verse 1 — what was worn on the head in drunken revelry is now crushed beneath the feet of the invader.
4. The early fig (bikkurah) ripened in June, weeks before the main harvest; its rarity made it a prized delicacy snatched up instantly. So Samaria will be devoured the moment the opportunity arises — eagerly and completely.
5. The contrast is sharp: Ephraim's proud crown fades (v. 1), but the LORD becomes the true crown for the faithful remnant. The phrase 'on that day' (bayyom hahu) marks the eschatological pivot within the oracle.
6. The gate was the place of both civic judgment and military defense. God empowers righteous governance and courageous defense alike — a portrait of the restored community.
7. The focus shifts from Ephraim to Judah's own leaders. The hammering repetition of shagu ('they stagger') and ta'u ('they reel') mimics the lurching of drunkenness. Both priest (kohen) and prophet (navi) — the twin pillars of spiritual leadership — are compromised.
8. The revolting image conveys total moral and spiritual contamination among the leadership. These are banquet tables — the places where leaders deliberate and feast — now defiled beyond use.
9. The mockers speak sarcastically, implying Isaiah treats them like infants who need elementary lessons. Their disdain for prophetic instruction becomes the basis for God's devastating response in vv. 11-13.
10. The Hebrew syllables are nearly nonsensical, possibly mimicking a child's alphabet lesson or mocking the repetitive cadence of prophetic instruction. The effect is deliberate contempt: 'He just goes on and on with his little rules and little lines.' This mockery will be turned against the mockers in v. 13.
11. Since they mocked the prophet's clear Hebrew, God will 'speak' through Assyrian invaders whose language they cannot understand. Paul applies this passage to the gift of tongues in 1 Corinthians 14:21, arguing that unintelligible speech is a sign of judgment, not blessing.
12. God had offered genuine rest (menuchah) through obedience and trust, but their refusal transforms the gracious offer into a sentence of judgment. The theme of rest refused anticipates 30:15.

13. The same babble-syllables the mockers used (v. 10) now become the instrument of their downfall — prophetic irony at its sharpest. The fivefold chain of consequences (go, stumble backward, be broken, be ensnared, be captured) conveys total and progressive destruction.
14. The address shifts explicitly to Jerusalem's leaders — anshei latson ('men of scoffing'). This is no longer about Ephraim alone; the southern kingdom's rulers are equally culpable.
15. The 'covenant with death' likely refers to a political alliance with Egypt or possibly occult practices such as necromancy. Either way, it is a grotesque parody of covenant faith — trusting in death and lies rather than in the living God.
16. This is one of the premier messianic texts in the Old Testament, quoted in Romans 9:33 and 1 Peter 2:6, where it is applied to Christ. We render 'will never be shaken' rather than the KJV's 'shall not make haste,' following the Septuagint reading (ou me kataischythe) that the apostolic writers adopted. The Hebrew yachish can mean both 'to hurry in panic' and 'to be disturbed' — 'never be shaken' captures the intended sense of unshakable confidence.
17. The construction metaphor continues: God builds with justice and righteousness as His measuring instruments, and what was built on falsehood cannot withstand the inspection. The hail and flood imagery echoes v. 2.
18. The false security of v. 15 collapses entirely. The verb kuppar ('annulled, wiped away') uses the same root as 'atonement' (kippur) — but here the covenant itself is what gets 'covered over' and erased.
19. The judgment is not a single event but relentless — morning after morning, day and night. What they refused to learn through the prophet's words they will learn through the visceral experience of terror. The Hebrew ze'va'ah ('sheer terror, trembling') is the grim tutor.
20. A proverb-like image of absurd inadequacy: their self-made security (the 'covenant with death') cannot cover or comfort them. It was never sufficient — the lie is exposed by simple experience.
21. At Perazim, God broke through the Philistines for David (2 Samuel 5:20). At Gibeon, God fought for Israel with hailstones (Joshua 10:10-11). Now the 'strange' reversal: He fights against His own people. The words zar ('strange, foreign') and nakhriyyah ('alien') emphasize how unnatural this is — judgment against His people is not God's native work.
22. The warning bridges the judgment oracle and the wisdom parable that follows. The 'decree of destruction' (kalah venecheratsah) echoes 10:22-23 and conveys an irreversible divine decision. The scoffers' continued mockery only strengthens their own bondage.
23. A fourfold call to attention (listen, hear, pay attention, hear) introduces the farmer parable, emphasizing its importance as a wisdom teaching. The imperatives demand the engagement the mockers have refused.
24. The rhetorical questions expect the answer 'no' — plowing is purposeful preparation, not an end in itself. The parable begins with the most basic agricultural observation: there are seasons for every task.
25. Each crop has its proper location and method — the farmer exercises careful discernment, not random effort. The variety of crops (black cumin, cumin, wheat, barley, spelt) mirrors the variety of God's dealings with different people and situations.
26. The farmer's skill comes from God — agricultural wisdom is itself a form of divine revelation. This grounding in theology elevates the parable: if God teaches even the farmer to work with purpose and proportion, how much more purposeful is God's own work of judgment and restoration?
27. Delicate seeds require gentle treatment — a heavy threshing sledge would crush them to powder. The analogy is clear: God's discipline is proportioned to what each situation and each people require. He does not treat everyone the same way.
28. Even heavy threshing has its limit — the grain must be processed but not destroyed. God's judgment is severe but purposeful: it separates husk from grain, never annihilating the grain itself.
29. The parable concludes by attributing all purposeful action — farming and judging alike — to God's sovereign wisdom. The word tushiyyah ('wisdom, sound counsel, effective working') emphasizes that God's plans are not merely intelligent but effective. His discipline always achieves its purpose.

Summary: Isaiah 29 pronounces a 'Woe' upon Ariel — Jerusalem, the city where David encamped — warning that God Himself will besiege her until she moans like a hearth-altar. Yet in a sudden reversal, the besieging nations will vanish like a dream, like a hungry man who eats in his sleep and wakes still famished. The chapter then diagnoses the spiritual blindness underlying Jerusalem's crisis: the prophets' vision has become a sealed scroll, the people honor God with their lips but their hearts are far from Him, and the wise men's wisdom will perish. The oracle closes with a promise of transformation: Lebanon will become a fruitful garden, the deaf will hear the words of the scroll, the blind will see, the humble will rejoice in the Holy One of Israel, and those who erred will accept instruction. We rendered this chapter with close attention to the Ariel wordplay, the sealed-scroll imagery, and the lips-versus-hearts indictment that Jesus will quote in Matthew 15.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 13 is one of the most consequential verses in the prophetic canon — Jesus quotes it directly in Matthew 15:8-9 and Mark 7:6-7 to indict the Pharisees: 'This people honors me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me; in vain do they worship me, teaching as doctrines the commandments of men.' The Ariel wordplay (vv. 1-2) is exquisite: 'ariel' means both 'lion of God' and 'altar hearth,' so God will make Jerusalem — His lion-city — become like an altar hearth, moaning with the fire of sacrifice. The sealed-scroll vision (vv. 11-12) reverses the normal prophetic pattern: instead of the word being opened and proclaimed, it is sealed shut — an image of judicial blindness.

Translation Friction: We retained 'Ariel' untranslated in the rendering, explaining the dual meaning in the notes, since both senses ('lion of God' and 'altar hearth') are active simultaneously and neither English equivalent captures both. The 'deep sleep' (tardemah) poured out in v. 10 is the same word used for Adam's sleep in Genesis 2:21 and Abram's in Genesis 15:12 — but here it is a sleep of judgment, not revelation. In v. 13, we follow the Septuagint-influenced form quoted by Jesus rather than the slightly different Masoretic syntax, noting the variation. The phrase 'their fear of me is a commandment taught by men' is rendered 'their worship of me is based on rules taught by men' for clarity.

Connections: Verse 13 is quoted by Jesus in Matthew 15:8-9 and Mark 7:6-7. The sealed vision (vv. 11-12) anticipates Daniel 12:4 ('seal the book until the time of the end') and Revelation 5:1-5 (the scroll no one can open). The reversal of deafness and blindness (vv. 18-19) anticipates Isaiah 35:5 and the messianic signs Jesus cites in Matthew 11:5. The potter-and-clay image (v. 16) is developed further in Isaiah 45:9 and 64:8, and Paul draws on it in Romans 9:20-21. The promise that 'those who err in spirit will gain understanding' (v. 24) echoes the wisdom tradition and anticipates the new covenant promise of Jeremiah 31:33-34.

¹Woe to Ariel, Ariel,
the city where David encamped!
Let year follow year;
let the festivals run their cycle.

²Yet I will bring distress upon Ariel, and there will be mourning and lamentation,
and she will become to me like a true altar hearth.

³I will encamp against you on every side;
I will besiege you with towers and raise siege works against you.

⁴You will be brought low;
from the ground you will speak,
and from the dust your words will come muffled.
Your voice will rise from the earth like a ghost's,
and your speech will whisper from the dust.

⁵But the horde of your enemies will become like fine dust,
and the mob of the ruthless like driven chaff.
It will happen in an instant, suddenly —

⁶the LORD of Hosts will intervene with thunder, earthquake, and a great roar, with whirlwind, tempest,
and a flame of devouring fire.

⁷Then the horde of all the nations waging war against Ariel —
all who attack her, her stronghold, and all who distress her —
will be like a dream, a vision in the night.

⁸As when a hungry man dreams he is eating but wakes with his stomach empty, or a thirsty man dreams he is drinking but wakes faint, his throat still parched — so will it be with the horde of all the nations that wage war against Mount Zion.

⁹Stupify yourselves and be stunned!
Blind yourselves and be blind!
They are drunk, but not with wine;
they stagger, but not from strong drink.

¹⁰For the LORD has poured over you a spirit of deep sleep.
He has shut your eyes — the prophets;
He has covered your heads — the seers.

¹¹The entire vision has become for you like the words of a sealed scroll.
When it is handed to one who can read, saying,
'Please read this,'
he replies, 'I cannot — it is sealed.'

¹²And when the scroll is handed to one who cannot read, saying,
'Please read this,'
he replies, 'I do not know how to read.'

¹³The Lord says:
'Because this people draw near with their mouths and honor me with their lips, but their hearts are far from me,
and their worship of me
is based on rules taught by men —'

¹⁴therefore I will again do extraordinary things with this people —
extraordinary and astounding.
The wisdom of their wise will perish,
and the discernment of their discerning will vanish.

¹⁵Woe to those who go to great depths to hide their plans from the LORD, whose deeds are done in darkness,

who say, 'Who sees us? Who knows us?'

¹⁶How you turn things upside down!
 Shall the potter be regarded as the clay?
 Shall what is made say of its maker,
 'He did not make me'?
 Shall what is formed say of the one who formed it,
 'He has no understanding'?

¹⁷Is it not just a little while longer before Lebanon becomes a fruitful garden, and the fruitful garden is counted as a forest?

¹⁸On that day the deaf will hear the words of the scroll,
 and out of gloom and darkness
 the eyes of the blind will see.

¹⁹The humble will increase their joy in the LORD, and the poorest among people will rejoice in the Holy One of Israel.

²⁰For the ruthless will come to nothing,
 the scoffer will vanish,
 and all who watch for a chance to do evil will be cut off —

²¹those who condemn a person with a single word, who set traps for the one who seeks justice at the gate,
 and who push the righteous aside with empty claims.

²²Therefore this is what the LORD says —
 He who redeemed Abraham — concerning the house of Jacob:
 'Jacob will no longer be ashamed,
 nor will his face grow pale,

²³for when he sees his children,
 the work of my hands, in his midst,
 they will sanctify my name.
 They will sanctify the Holy One of Jacob and stand in awe of the God of Israel.

²⁴Those who err in spirit will gain understanding, and those who grumble will accept instruction.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double address 'Ariel, Ariel' is emphatic and mournful. The instruction to continue their festivals ('let year follow year, let the festivals run their cycle') is bitterly ironic — their religious routine cannot avert what is coming.

2. The wordplay resolves: God will make Jerusalem function as her name implies — an altar hearth, a place where fire consumes. The alliteration ta'aniyyah va'aniyyah ('mourning and lamentation') mimics the sound of wailing.
3. God speaks in the first person as the one who orchestrates the siege — not merely allowing it but actively directing it. The military terminology (encampment, siege mound, fortifications) is precise and terrifying.
4. The image of Jerusalem speaking from the dust like a ghost ('ov — a spirit of the dead, the same word used for the medium at Endor in 1 Samuel 28:7) is haunting. The proud city will be reduced to a faint whisper rising from rubble.
5. The sudden reversal: the besieging armies themselves will vanish like dust and chaff. The phrase lepet'a' pit'om ('in an instant, suddenly') emphasizes the shocking speed of divine intervention.
6. God's intervention is a theophany — thunder, earthquake, storm, and fire are the classic signs of divine presence (cf. Exodus 19:16-18; 1 Kings 19:11-12). The same God who besieged Jerusalem now destroys her besiegers.
7. The dream simile is developed over vv. 7-8: the vast enemy host will prove as insubstantial as a night vision. This prophecy found initial fulfillment in Sennacherib's mysterious overnight destruction (Isaiah 37:36).
8. One of Isaiah's most vivid similes: the nations' conquest of Jerusalem will prove as satisfying as eating in a dream — the mouth chews, the throat swallows, but the belly remains hollow. The parallelism between hunger/eating and thirst/drinking is perfectly balanced.
9. The imperatives are bitterly ironic, possibly reflexive: 'Go ahead, keep stupefying yourselves!' The drunkenness without wine is spiritual intoxication — a willful blindness that has become a divine judgment. This echoes the drunken leaders of 28:7-8.
10. The prophets and seers — those whose very job is to see and speak — have been blinded and silenced by God Himself. This is the most severe form of judgment: not destruction of the body but destruction of spiritual perception.
11. The sealed-scroll image is one of Isaiah's most powerful metaphors for spiritual blindness. The literate person has the skill but not the access; the scroll's meaning is locked away. This image reappears in Daniel 12:4 and Revelation 5:1-5.
12. The paired excuses — 'it is sealed' (v. 11) and 'I cannot read' (v. 12) — cover every possibility. Whether the obstacle is access or ability, the result is the same: the word of God goes unread, unheard, and unobeyed.
13. This verse is quoted by Jesus in Matthew 15:8-9 and Mark 7:6-7 to indict the Pharisees for placing human tradition above God's commands. The indictment has two parts: (1) the gap between lips and heart, and (2) the substitution of human rules for genuine reverence. We rendered yir'atam ('their fear/reverence') as 'their worship' for clarity in English, since the Hebrew concept of 'fearing God' encompasses the whole posture of worship.
14. The 'extraordinary things' (haple' vapele') are deliberately ambiguous — they could be wonders of judgment or salvation, and in context they are both. Paul quotes the second half in 1 Corinthians 1:19 to argue that God overturns human wisdom through the cross.
15. A sub-woe within the larger oracle targets those who plot in secret, imagining God cannot perceive them. The irony is acute: they are blind to God (v. 10) and assume He is equally blind to them.
16. The potter-and-clay image exposes the absurdity of the creature presuming to instruct — or hide from — the Creator. Paul develops this argument extensively in Romans 9:19-21. The inversion (haphekhekhem, 'your turning things upside down') is both intellectual and moral.
17. The reversal is total: the mighty cedar forest of Lebanon becomes cultivated farmland, and ordinary farmland grows so abundantly it resembles a forest. Nature itself will be transformed in the coming restoration.
18. The sealed scroll of vv. 11-12 will finally be opened and heard. The deaf and blind — whether physically or spiritually afflicted — will receive perception. This anticipates Isaiah 35:5 and Jesus' messianic signs in Matthew 11:5 and Luke 7:22.
19. The restoration reverses the social order: the humble ('anavim) and the poor ('evyonei adam) — those most marginalized — are the first to experience joy. The full title 'the Holy One of Israel' is maintained as a covenant-identity marker.
20. Three categories of oppressors — the ruthless ('arits), the scoffer (lets), and those who lie in wait for evil (shokdei aven) — are systematically eliminated. The threefold structure mirrors the threefold restoration of vv. 18-19.
21. The specific sins of the oppressors are legal in nature: false accusations ('condemn with a word'), entrapment of advocates ('set traps for the one who seeks justice'), and perversion of justice ('push the righteous aside'). The gate was the court of law in ancient Israel.
22. The phrase 'He who redeemed Abraham' is unique in the Old Testament — God's redemptive work reaching all the way back to the patriarch's call out of Ur. The promise of no more shame anticipates the full restoration when the causes of shame (spiritual blindness, injustice, oppression) are removed.
23. The restoration produces genuine worship — the precise opposite of the lips-without-hearts religion condemned in v. 13. Jacob's children, described as 'the work of my hands,' will sanctify God's name with authentic reverence.
24. The chapter ends where it began — with the problem of understanding — but now resolved. Those who wandered in confusion (to'ei ruach) will gain discernment (binah), and the chronic complainers (rogenim) will finally learn (leqach — 'teaching, instruction'). The sealed scroll of v. 11 is, in the end, opened.

Summary: Isaiah 30 pronounces 'Woe' on the rebellious children who seek refuge in Egypt rather than trusting the LORD. Envoys travel south with treasures loaded on donkeys and camels, journeying through the dangerous Negev toward a nation that cannot help them. But at the oracle's center stands one of the most tender promises in all of Scripture: 'In returning and rest you shall be saved; in quietness and trust shall be your strength' (v. 15) — a promise they refuse. Yet the LORD waits to be gracious (v. 18), and when they cry out, He will answer. A teacher will no longer be hidden, and when they stray, they will hear a voice behind them saying, 'This is the way — walk in it' (v. 21). The chapter concludes with a vision of abundant blessing on the land and a terrifying theophany of the LORD's wrath against Assyria, whose king will be shattered by His voice and consumed by fire. We rendered this chapter with particular care for the pastoral tenderness of vv. 15-21, which stand in deliberate contrast to the political folly that frames them.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 15 — 'In returning and rest you shall be saved; in quietness and trust shall be your strength' — is one of the most quoted verses in the prophetic canon and a cornerstone of biblical spirituality. It defines salvation not as military strategy but as repentance (shuvah, 'returning'), rest (nachah), quietness (hashqet), and trust (bitachah). Verse 18 — 'The LORD waits to be gracious to you' — presents a God who delays judgment not out of indifference but out of longing to show mercy. Verse 21 — 'This is the way, walk in it' — has become a foundational text for guidance theology, promising a voice that corrects in real time. The 'teacher' of v. 20 (moreh, singular) who will no longer be hidden has messianic resonances.

Translation Friction: We rendered moreh (v. 20) as 'your Teacher' (singular, capitalized) based on the Masoretic pointing, which treats it as singular despite some versions reading a plural 'teachers.' The singular fits the messianic reading and the intimate guidance of v. 21. The 'bread of adversity and water of affliction' (v. 20) likely refers to siege rations — the very suffering that will open their eyes to the Teacher. In v. 33, Topheth (tophth) is the burning ground in the Valley of Hinnom associated with child sacrifice (2 Kings 23:10; Jeremiah 7:31); we retained the name and explained its significance. The phrase 'the breath of the LORD, like a stream of burning sulfur, sets it ablaze' applies sacrificial-destruction language to Assyria — the fire prepared for the king of Assyria is the same fire of Topheth.

Connections: Verse 15's theology of rest connects to Exodus 33:14 ('My presence will go with you, and I will give you rest'), Psalm 46:10 ('Be still and know that I am God'), Matthew 11:28-29 ('Come to me, all who are weary... and I will give you rest'), and Hebrews 4:1-11 (the Sabbath rest for the people of God). Verse 21's guiding voice echoes Psalm 32:8 ('I will instruct you and teach you the way you should go'). The Topheth imagery (v. 33) anticipates Jesus' use of Gehenna (the Greek form of ge-hinnom) as a metaphor for final judgment (Matthew 5:22; Mark 9:43-48). The LORD waiting to be gracious (v. 18) connects to 2 Peter 3:9 ('The Lord is not slow in keeping His promise... He is patient with you').

¹Woe to the rebellious children,
declares the LORD,
who carry out plans, but not mine,
who forge alliances, but not by my Spirit,
piling sin upon sin.

²They set out to go down to Egypt
without consulting me,
to take refuge in Pharaoh's protection and shelter in Egypt's shadow.

³But Pharaoh's protection will become your shame,
and shelter in Egypt's shadow your humiliation.

⁴Though their officials have reached Zoan and their envoys have arrived at Hanes,

⁵everyone will be put to shame by a people who cannot help them —
no aid, no benefit,
only shame and disgrace.

⁶An oracle concerning the beasts of the Negev:
Through a land of hardship and distress,
of lioness and roaring lion,
of viper and darting serpent,
they carry their wealth on the backs of donkeys and their treasures on the humps of camels to a people who cannot help them.

⁷Egypt's help is worthless and empty.
Therefore I call her
'Rahab who sits still.'

⁸Now go, write it on a tablet in their presence and inscribe it on a scroll, that it may serve for the days to come
as a witness forever.

⁹For this is a rebellious people,
deceitful children,
children who refuse to listen to the instruction of the LORD.

¹⁰They say to the seers, 'Do not see!'
and to the prophets,
'Do not prophesy what is right to us.
Speak smooth things to us;
prophesy illusions!'

¹¹'Leave the way! Get off the path!
Stop confronting us with the Holy One of Israel!'

¹²Therefore this is what the Holy One of Israel says:
Because you have rejected this word and trusted in oppression and deceit, leaning on them for support,

¹³this guilt will become for you like a crack in a high wall, bulging outward, ready to collapse — whose shattering comes suddenly, in an instant.

¹⁴He will shatter it like a potter's jar, crushed without mercy —
so thoroughly broken that among its fragments not a shard will be found large enough to scoop a coal from a hearth or dip water from a cistern.

¹⁵For this is what the Lord GOD,
the Holy One of Israel, says:
'In returning and rest you shall be saved;
in quietness and trust shall be your strength.'
But you would not.

¹⁶But you said, 'No! We will flee on horses' — therefore you will flee indeed!
'We will ride on swift steeds' —
therefore your pursuers will be swifter!

¹⁷A thousand will flee at the threat of one;
at the threat of five you will all flee, until you are left
like a flagpole on a mountaintop, like a signal banner on a hill.

¹⁸Yet the LORD waits to be gracious to you;
He rises to show you compassion.
For the LORD is a God of justice — blessed are all who wait for Him.

¹⁹O people in Zion, who dwell in Jerusalem,
you will weep no more.
He will surely be gracious to you
at the sound of your cry;
when He hears it, He will answer you.

²⁰Though the Lord may give you the bread of adversity and the water of affliction, your Teacher will no longer be hidden.
Your own eyes will see your Teacher.

²¹And your ears will hear a voice behind you, saying,
'This is the way — walk in it,'
whether you turn to the right or to the left.

²²Then you will defile the silver plating of your carved idols and the gold overlay of your cast images.
You will scatter them like filthy rags, saying to them, 'Get out!'

²³He will give rain for the seed you sow in the ground, and the bread that the soil produces will be rich and abundant.
On that day your livestock will graze in broad pastures.

²⁴The oxen and donkeys that work the soil will eat seasoned fodder winnowed with shovel and fork.

²⁵On every high mountain and every lofty hill
there will be streams and channels of water, on the day of the great slaughter,
when the towers fall.

²⁶The light of the moon will be like the light of the sun, and the light of the sun will be sevenfold —
like the light of seven days combined — on the day the LORD binds up the brokenness of His people and heals the wound He inflicted.

²⁷Look — the name of the LORD comes from afar, burning with anger, heavy with fury.
His lips are full of wrath,
and His tongue is like a devouring fire.

²⁸His breath is like an overflowing torrent rising to the neck,
to sift the nations in a sieve of destruction and to place on the jaws of the peoples
a bridle that leads them astray.

²⁹You will have a song
as on the night when a holy festival begins, and gladness of heart
like one who walks with a flute to come to the mountain of the LORD, to the Rock of Israel.

³⁰The LORD will make His majestic voice heard and reveal the descent of His arm in furious anger —
a flame of devouring fire,
with cloudbursts, torrents, and hailstones.

³¹For at the voice of the LORD, Assyria will be shattered — he who struck with a rod.

³²Every stroke of the appointed rod that the LORD lays on Assyria will be accompanied by tambourines and lyres, as He fights against them with the sweep of His arm.

³³For Topheth has long been prepared;
it is made ready even for the king.
Its fire pit is deep and wide,
with plenty of fire and wood.
The breath of the LORD,
like a stream of burning sulfur,
sets it ablaze.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase 'rebellious children' (banim sorerim) echoes the language of Deuteronomy 21:18-20 (the rebellious son). The word massekah can mean 'drink offering' (suggesting a covenant ritual) or 'covering' — either way, they are making pacts without consulting the LORD. Each unauthorized alliance adds another layer of sin.
2. The descent 'down to Egypt' (laredet mitsrayim) echoes the patriarchal pattern — going down to Egypt is consistently associated with faithless self-reliance in biblical narrative (Genesis 12:10; 46:3-4). Pharaoh's 'shadow' (tsel) is a parody of the divine shadow of protection (Psalm 91:1).
3. The very thing they sought — strength and shelter — will become its opposite: shame and humiliation. The reversal is total and precisely targeted.
4. Zoan (Tanis) and Hanes (Heracleopolis) were Egyptian cities — the envoys have already traveled deep into Egypt to negotiate the alliance. The journey is already underway; the warning comes as they are mid-course.
5. The threefold negation — 'no aid, no benefit, only shame' — hammers home the futility of the Egyptian alliance. Egypt's inability to help is not a possibility but a certainty.
6. The caravan route through the Negev desert to Egypt was notoriously dangerous — infested with lions and venomous snakes. The irony is vivid: they risk life and treasure crossing a deadly wasteland to reach an ally who is useless. The 'fiery flying serpent' (saraph me'opheph) may refer to a species of sand viper or to the mythological reputation of Negev serpents.
7. The nickname 'Rahab who sits still' is one of Isaiah's most cutting epithets. Egypt boasts of cosmic power (the Rahab myth) but in practice does nothing — she sits idle while Judah's envoys beg for help.
8. God commands the prophecy to be written down — on both a public tablet (luach) and a permanent scroll (sepher) — so that future generations will have irrefutable evidence that He warned them. The double medium (tablet and scroll) ensures both public display and archival preservation.
9. Three descriptions escalate: rebellious (meri), deceitful (kechashim), and willfully deaf (lo' avu shemo'a — 'they are unwilling to hear'). The word torah here means 'instruction, teaching' — the prophet's God-given guidance, not merely the written law.
10. The people explicitly demand comfortable falsehood over uncomfortable truth. The word chalaqot ('smooth things') suggests flattery, and mahatalot ('illusions, deceits') are literally things that mislead. This is the ultimate corruption: the audience dictates the message.
11. The demand reaches its climax: they want the prophets not merely to soften the message but to remove the Holy One of Israel from their hearing altogether. The full title 'the Holy One of Israel' is maintained — it is precisely His holiness they cannot tolerate.
12. The Holy One of Israel — the very one they wanted removed — now speaks directly. The word they rejected (hadavar hazeh) is the prophetic warning; what they embrace instead is 'oshek (oppression, extortion) and naloz (crookedness, perversity).
13. The image is architectural and terrifying: a hairline crack in a massive wall that bulges slowly outward until the entire structure collapses without warning. The buildup is gradual; the collapse is instantaneous (pit'om lepet), 'suddenly, in an instant'.
14. The image of total destruction: not even a useful fragment remains. A potsherd large enough to carry a coal or scoop water would be small — yet even that modest remnant will not survive. The judgment is comprehensive.
15. This verse is one of the theological summits of Isaiah. The four terms (returning, rest, quietness, trust) form a complete spiritual program that stands in direct opposition to the four-term political program (plans without God, alliances without the Spirit, descent to Egypt, reliance on Pharaoh). The devastating coda — 'But you would not' (velo' avitem) — is three words in Hebrew, and they carry the weight of the entire oracle.
16. The wordplay is devastating: they say nanus ('we will gallop away') and God answers tenusum ('you will indeed flee — in retreat!'). Their chosen instrument of escape becomes their instrument of panicked flight. The swift horses they trusted will be outpaced by swifter pursuers.

17. The reversal of Deuteronomy's covenant blessing is explicit: in Deuteronomy 32:30, one Israelite chases a thousand enemies; here a thousand Israelites flee from one attacker. The lonely flagpole and banner are images of desolation — all that remains of a once-great army.
18. This is one of the most remarkable theological statements in Isaiah. After cataloging their rebellion, folly, and refusal, the text does not end in condemnation but in divine longing. The LORD's waiting is not passive indifference but active, purposeful patience — He delays judgment because He desires to show grace. The beatitude ('blessed are all who wait for Him') is the only ashrei formula in Isaiah.
19. The tone shifts from oracle to pastoral promise. The assurance 'you will weep no more' anticipates Isaiah 25:8 ('He will wipe away every tear') and Revelation 21:4. The immediacy of God's response — 'when He hears it, He will answer' — reverses the sealed-ear judgment of chapter 29.
20. We render moreh as singular ('your Teacher') following the Masoretic consonantal text, which supports a singular reading with messianic resonance. The 'bread of adversity and water of affliction' are likely siege rations — the suffering itself becomes the context in which God reveals Himself. The promise 'your own eyes will see' reverses the blindness of 29:10-12.
21. The guidance is personal ('your ears'), directional ('this is the way'), and corrective ('whether you turn right or left'). The voice behind suggests the Teacher of v. 20 who follows and redirects. This verse connects to Psalm 32:8 and anticipates Jesus' shepherd imagery in John 10.
22. The repentance described in v. 15 now takes physical form: the idols — however beautifully crafted — are treated as ritually unclean waste. The word davah ('menstrual impurity') is deliberately shocking, expressing total revulsion. The command 'Get out!' (tse') treats the idol as a person being expelled.
23. The agricultural blessings reverse the 'bread of adversity' (v. 20). The covenant pattern of Deuteronomy 28 is restored: obedience brings rain, abundant harvests, and fat livestock. The phrase 'on that day' marks this as part of the eschatological restoration.
24. Even the work animals eat well — their fodder is not raw grain but belil chamits ('seasoned, fermented mixture'), a premium feed. The detail signals extraordinary prosperity: when the animals eat this well, the people feast.
25. The vision combines paradoxical images: abundant water on mountaintops (normally arid) alongside 'great slaughter' and falling towers. The blessing of water and the judgment on the enemy occur simultaneously — restoration for Israel and destruction for the oppressor happen on the same 'day.'
26. The cosmic intensification of light — moon becomes sun-bright, sun becomes seven times brighter — is a metaphor for the overwhelming joy and glory of restoration. The healing language ('binds up,' 'heals') acknowledges that God both wounded and restores, connecting to Hosea 6:1 and Deuteronomy 32:39.
27. The theophany begins: not God Himself but 'the name of the LORD' (shem YHWH) approaches — the manifestation of His presence and power. The anthropomorphic imagery (lips, tongue) emphasizes that God's word itself is the instrument of judgment.
28. Two images merge: a flood rising to the neck (near-drowning) and a sieve that separates (judgment as sorting). The 'bridle that leads astray' on the jaws of the peoples recalls 37:29, where God puts a hook in Sennacherib's nose — the nations think they are choosing their path, but God is directing them to their destruction.
29. While the nations face judgment, Israel celebrates. The night festival is likely Passover, which began at evening. The flute (chalil) was played in festival processions to the temple. 'The Rock of Israel' (tsur yisra'el) is a divine title emphasizing God's reliability and permanence.
30. The theophany reaches full intensity: voice, arm, fire, storm, and hail converge. The 'descent of His arm' (nachat zero'o) is a striking image of God's power striking downward like a hammer. The storm elements echo the Sinai theophany (Exodus 19:16-18).
31. The rod (shevet) with which Assyria struck the nations (cf. 10:5, 'the rod of my anger') is now powerless against the LORD's voice. The same instrument of God's discipline is itself disciplined — Assyria was always only a tool.
32. The blows of judgment are set to music — a bizarre and terrifying image. As God strikes Assyria, Israel celebrates with instruments. The 'battles of brandishing' (milchamot tenufah) suggest God swinging His arm like a priest waves an offering — judgment as liturgical act.
33. The chapter's final image is Topheth — the burning ground in the Valley of Hinnom where children were sacrificed to Molech. Now it is prepared for the king of Assyria. The 'breath of the LORD' (nishmat YHWH) that kindles it connects to the divine breath/spirit that creates (Genesis 2:7) and destroys. The stream of burning sulfur recalls Sodom's destruction (Genesis 19:24) and anticipates Revelation 19:20 and 20:10.

Summary: Isaiah 31 is the briefest of the woe oracles and perhaps the most visceral. It opens with a final 'Woe' against those who go down to Egypt for military aid — trusting horses and chariots rather than looking to the Holy One of Israel. But God is also wise, Isaiah reminds them with biting irony, and He too can bring disaster. Egypt is human, not God; their horses are flesh, not spirit. When the LORD stretches out His hand, both helper and helped will stumble together. The oracle then pivots to two stunning animal similes: God will fight for Zion like a lion that refuses to be frightened off its prey by a crowd of shepherds, and He will hover over Jerusalem like birds in flight, shielding and delivering it. The chapter closes with a call to repentance — 'Return to the one you have so deeply revolted against' — and a promise that Assyria will fall by a sword that is not human, a sword not of mortals. We rendered this chapter with attention to the raw power of its imagery and the theological paradox at its heart: the same God is both the lion who will not let go and the bird who tenderly protects.

What Makes This Remarkable: The two animal similes in vv. 4-5 are theologically extraordinary. In v. 4, God is a lion crouching over its prey — fierce, immovable, undeterred by the noise of opposition. In v. 5, He is birds hovering over their young — tender, protective, shielding. The juxtaposition is deliberate: the God who fights for Zion is simultaneously ferocious and nurturing, and both images describe the same protective action. The 'sword not of man' (v. 8) has generated extensive messianic and eschatological interpretation — the defeat of Assyria will come by supernatural means, not military strategy.

Translation Friction: The lion simile in v. 4 is ambiguous in context: is the LORD the lion fighting for Zion (positive) or against Zion (negative)? The phrase 'so the LORD of Hosts will come down to fight on Mount Zion' could mean fight for or fight against. We follow the reading that takes vv. 4-5 together as positive — the lion and the birds both describe God's fierce-yet-tender protection of Jerusalem, consistent with the deliverance promise that follows. The 'birds hovering' (tsipporim afot) in v. 5 may specifically evoke the mother bird of Deuteronomy 32:11, who stirs her nest and hovers over her young — an image of protective training rather than passive shelter.

Connections: The condemnation of trusting Egypt's horses echoes Deuteronomy 17:16 (the king must not acquire many horses from Egypt) and anticipates Psalm 20:7 ('Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we trust in the name of the LORD our God'). The hovering-bird image connects to Deuteronomy 32:11 (the eagle stirring its nest), Genesis 1:2 (the Spirit hovering over the waters), and Jesus' lament over Jerusalem in Matthew 23:37 ('how often I have longed to gather your children together, as a hen gathers her chicks under her wings'). The 'sword not of man' anticipates the supernatural destruction of Sennacherib's army in Isaiah 37:36 and connects to Daniel 2:34 (the stone cut without human hands). The call to return (v. 6) uses the same root (shuv) as 30:15's 'in returning and rest.'

¹Woe to those who go down to Egypt for help, who rely on horses
and trust in chariots because they are many,
in horsemen because they are very strong,
but do not look to the Holy One of Israel or seek the LORD!

²Yet He too is wise — and He brings disaster!
He does not take back His words.
He will rise against the house of evildoers and against the allies of those who do wrong.

³The Egyptians are human, not God;
their horses are flesh, not spirit.
When the LORD stretches out His hand,

the helper will stumble
and the one helped will fall,
and both will perish together.

⁴For this is what the LORD has said to me:
As a lion — a great lion — growls over its prey,
and when a full band of shepherds is called out against it, it is not frightened by their shouting nor cowed by their clamor —
so the LORD of Hosts will come down to fight on Mount Zion and on its hill.

⁵Like birds hovering overhead, so the LORD of Hosts will shield Jerusalem — shielding and delivering, passing over and rescuing.

⁶Return to the One from whom you have so deeply revolted,
O children of Israel.

⁷For on that day, each of you will reject your idols of silver and your idols of gold — the sinful things your own hands have made.

⁸Assyria will fall by a sword not wielded by man;
a sword not of mortals will devour him.
He will flee before the sword,
and his young warriors will be put to forced labor.

⁹His rock will crumble in terror,
and his commanders will panic at the battle standard,
declares the LORD,
whose fire is in Zion
and whose furnace is in Jerusalem.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The final Egyptian-alliance woe. The catalogue of military assets (horses, chariots, horsemen) is set against the twofold spiritual failure: they do not 'look to' (sha'u) or 'seek' (darashu) the LORD. The full title 'the Holy One of Israel' stands in deliberate contrast to the military hardware they prefer.
2. The sarcasm is sharp: 'He too is wise' — as if they had forgotten that God might also have a strategy. While they scheme with Egypt, God has His own plan, and He does not retract His words. The 'house of evildoers' is Judah's leadership; the 'allies' are Egypt.
3. This verse contains one of the sharpest theological contrasts in the Old Testament: human versus God, flesh versus spirit. The outcome is inevitable — when the LORD acts, both the Egyptian helper and the Judean client collapse simultaneously. The mutual destruction ('both will perish together') is the final refutation of the alliance strategy.
4. The lion simile is raw and powerful: the lion has caught its prey and will not be intimidated by any number of shepherds. Applied to God, the image conveys unstoppable determination. The LORD 'comes down' (yered) — the same verb used for the Sinai descent (Exodus 19:11, 18) — to fight on behalf of Mount Zion.

5. The shift from lion (v. 4) to hovering birds (v. 5) is one of Isaiah's most striking juxtapositions. The same God who growls like a lion over prey now hovers like a mother bird over her nest. The four infinitive absolutes — ganon ('shielding'), hitsil ('delivering'), pasoach ('passing over'), himlit ('rescuing') — pile up to express comprehensive, multi-layered protection. The Passover allusion ties Jerusalem's deliverance to the Exodus.
6. The call to repentance (shuvu — 'return!') uses the same root as shuvah ('returning') in 30:15. The phrase he'miqu sarah ('deeply revolted') emphasizes the depth and severity of their rebellion — the return must be proportional to the revolt.
7. The repentance of v. 6 takes concrete form: idol rejection. The phrase 'your own hands have made' (asu lakhem yedeikhem) emphasizes the absurdity of worshipping what you yourself manufactured. This echoes 30:22 and anticipates 2:20.
8. This is the theological climax of the chapter: Assyria — the mightiest military power on earth — will be destroyed by a weapon no human hand holds. The prophecy found its initial fulfillment in 701 BC when the angel of the LORD struck down 185,000 Assyrian soldiers in a single night (37:36; 2 Kings 19:35). The forced labor (lamas) imposed on Assyria's young men reverses Assyria's own practice of enslaving conquered peoples.
9. The chapter closes with Assyria's total collapse: even their 'rock' (stronghold, or the king himself) crumbles, and their officers flee in panic. The final image — 'whose fire is in Zion and whose furnace is in Jerusalem' — connects back to the Ariel/altar-hearth imagery of 29:1-2 and the Topheth fire of 30:33. God's fire in Jerusalem is both the sacrificial fire of worship and the consuming fire of judgment against His enemies. Zion is simultaneously altar and fortress.

Summary: Isaiah envisions a king who reigns in righteousness and princes who rule in justice — a portrait of governance as it was always meant to be. Under this reign, human perception is restored: eyes see, ears hear, and the rash gain understanding. The chapter then pivots to a sobering address to complacent women, warning that the land will become desolate until the Spirit is poured out from on high. When that outpouring comes, wilderness becomes garden, justice dwells even in the wild places, and the fruit of righteousness is shalom — peace, quietness, and confident trust forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: The movement from human kingship to divine Spirit-outpouring is striking. Verses 1-8 describe what a righteous king produces; verses 15-20 describe what only the Spirit of God can produce. The implication is that the ultimate righteous king and the Spirit's outpouring are inseparable realities — a theology that finds its fullest expression in the messianic hope.

Translation Friction: We have rendered tsedaqah consistently as "righteousness" and mishpat as "justice" throughout, preserving the covenantal weight of both terms. The phrase ma'aseh hatstsedaqah (v.17) is rendered "the work of righteousness" rather than "the effect" to maintain the sense of active, produced fruit. Shalvah (v.17) carries a meaning beyond mere "assurance" — it is the quiet confidence of one who trusts covenant promises.

Connections: The Spirit-outpouring of verse 15 anticipates Joel 2:28-29 and finds its Pentecost fulfillment in Acts 2. The wilderness-to-garden transformation echoes Eden theology and connects to Isaiah 35:1-2. The portrait of the righteous king resonates with Isaiah 11:1-5 and Jeremiah 23:5-6.

¹Behold — a king shall reign in righteousness, and princes shall govern in justice.

²And each one shall be like a shelter from the wind,
a refuge from the storm,
like streams of water in a dry place,
like the shadow of a massive rock in a weary land.

³And the eyes of those who see shall not be shut,
and the ears of those who hear shall be attentive.

⁴The heart of the rash shall understand knowledge, and the tongue of the stammering shall speak clearly and fluently.

⁵The fool shall no longer be called noble, nor the scoundrel be said to be generous.

⁶For the fool speaks folly, and his heart devises wickedness —
to practice godlessness
and to speak error against the LORD, to leave the soul of the hungry empty and to deprive the thirsty of drink.

⁷As for the scoundrel — his schemes are evil;
he devises wicked plans
to ruin the afflicted with lying words, even when the cause of the needy is just.

⁸But the noble one plans noble things,
and by noble things he shall stand.

⁹Rise up, you women who are at ease;
hear my voice, you complacent daughters;
give ear to my speech.

¹⁰In little more than a year
you shall tremble, you complacent ones, for the grape harvest shall fail,
the gathering shall not come.

¹¹Tremble, you women at ease;
shudder, you complacent ones.
Strip yourselves bare and wrap sackcloth around your waists.

¹²Beat your breasts in mourning for the pleasant fields,
for the fruitful vine.

¹³Upon the soil of my people thorns and briers shall grow up — yes, upon all the houses of joy in the jubilant city.

¹⁴For the palace shall be abandoned,
the bustling city forsaken;
hill and watchtower shall become dens forever,
a delight for wild donkeys,
a pasture for flocks —

¹⁵Until the Spirit is poured out upon us from on high,
and the wilderness becomes a fruitful field,
and the fruitful field is counted as a forest.

¹⁶Then justice shall dwell in the wilderness, and righteousness shall abide in the fruitful field.

¹⁷And the work of righteousness shall be shalom, and the fruit of righteousness shall be quietness and trust forever.

¹⁸And my people shall dwell in a habitation of shalom,
in secure dwellings,
and in undisturbed resting places.

¹⁹Though hail shall fell the forest,
and the city be utterly laid low,

²⁰Blessed are you who sow beside all waters,
who let the ox and the donkey range free.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening hen ("behold") signals prophetic announcement. This is not mere political commentary but messianic vision — the king who will reign as kingship was designed to function.
2. The subject "each one" (ish) likely refers to the princes of verse 1, though some read it as referring to the king himself. Under righteous governance, every leader becomes a source of protection and refreshment.
3. This reverses the judicial blinding of Isaiah 6:9-10. Under the righteous king, the curse of dulled perception is lifted — eyes truly see and ears truly hear.
4. The transformation extends to intellect and speech. Those who once rushed to judgment (nimharim) gain discernment, and those who could not articulate truth find their voice.
5. In a corrupt society, titles are divorced from character. The righteous king restores moral clarity — things are called what they truly are. This is a vision of cultural truth-telling.
6. Isaiah defines what makes the naval a naval: his speech, his heart, his religion, and his social ethics are all corrupt. The fool's wickedness is comprehensive — theological error joined to social injustice.
7. The kilay (scoundrel) weaponizes language against the vulnerable. The phrase "even when the cause of the needy is just" (bedabber evyon mishpat) underscores the perversion — justice itself is overridden by deception.
8. The contrast with verses 5-7 is deliberate: the fool and scoundrel will be exposed, but the truly noble will be vindicated. Character and reputation will finally align.
9. The address shifts abruptly from messianic vision to present rebuke. The sha'ananot ("at ease") and botchot ("complacent") echo the false security condemned in Amos 6:1. Isaiah addresses women specifically, perhaps because they represent the domestic sphere where complacency takes root.
10. The phrase yamim al-shanah ("days beyond a year") indicates imminent judgment — just over a year away. Agricultural failure is both literal threat and covenant-curse language (see Deuteronomy 28:38-42).
11. The commands escalate: tremble, shudder, strip, put on sackcloth. The movement from fine garments to sackcloth represents the reversal from luxury to mourning — the outward sign of genuine grief over sin.
12. The wordplay between shadayim ("breasts") and sedei ("fields") connects bodily grief with agricultural loss. The land's fertility and the people's sustenance are bound together in covenant theology.
13. Thorns and briers (qots shamir) are Eden-curse language (Genesis 3:18). The jubilant city's celebration will be overtaken by the signs of divine judgment — joy turned to desolation.
14. The Ophel (hill/citadel) was the fortified heart of Jerusalem. Its transformation into animal habitat represents total civilizational collapse. Yet the word "forever" (ad-olam) is qualified by what follows in verse 15.
15. This verse is the theological hinge of the chapter. Everything before it describes human failure and divine judgment; everything after describes Spirit-wrought renewal. The wilderness-to-Carmel imagery reverses the thorns-and-briers curse of verse 13.

- 16. Justice (mishpat) and righteousness (tsedaqah) are personified as inhabitants of the renewed landscape. Where once thorns grew, moral order now dwells — the Spirit's outpouring produces ethical transformation, not merely agricultural.
- 17. We retain the Hebrew shalom untranslated in the rendering to preserve its covenantal depth. The verse establishes a cause-and-effect theology: righteousness is not merely commanded but is itself productive — it generates peace, quietness, and confident trust.
- 18. Three synonyms for safety: neveh shalom (habitation of peace), mishkenot mitvachim (secure dwellings), menuchot sha'anant (undisturbed resting places). The sha'anant here is positive — the same root used negatively of complacent women in verse 9 is now redeemed as genuine, Spirit-given rest.
- 19. The hail and felling of the forest represent ongoing judgment in the world, yet God's people dwell in the shalom described in verse 18. Some interpreters read "the city" as a foreign oppressor city, contrasted with the secure habitations of God's people.
- 20. The chapter ends with a beatitude (ashreikhem). Sowing beside all waters is an image of abundant, unhindered agricultural prosperity. Letting livestock range free suggests peace so complete that there is no fear of theft or raiding — the covenant blessings of Deuteronomy 28 fully realized.

Summary: Isaiah 33 opens with a woe oracle against the destroyer and pivots into one of the most exalted portraits of the LORD as judge, lawgiver, king, and savior. The chapter moves from crisis to confidence: envoys weep, highways lie waste, the land mourns, yet the LORD rises in majesty. The faithful behold a king in his beauty, see a land that stretches far, and dwell in Zion — the unmovable tent whose stakes will never be pulled up. Sickness itself is forgiven in the final verse.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 22 compresses four titles into a single declaration — the LORD is judge, lawgiver, king, and savior. No human institution can claim all four roles; they belong to God alone. The vision of Zion as an immovable tent (v.20) reverses exile imagery and anchors hope in divine permanence rather than human fortification.

Translation Friction: We have maintained "Woe" for hoi in verse 1 as a covenant-lawsuit interjection rather than softening it. The phrase "your eyes shall behold the king in his beauty" (v.17) is rendered with messianic resonance, as the context transcends any earthly monarch.

Connections: The destroyer-destroyed pattern of verse 1 echoes the lex talionis principle. The king in his beauty (v.17) anticipates the suffering servant who "had no beauty that we should desire him" (53:2) — the contrast is deliberate within the book. The forgiveness of sickness in verse 24 foreshadows Matthew 9:2-6 where Jesus links forgiveness and healing.

¹Woe to you, destroyer,
you who have not been destroyed!
You treacherous one,
whom none has betrayed!
When you finish destroying,
you shall be destroyed;
when you cease your treachery,
they shall deal treacherously with you.

²O LORD, be gracious to us;
we have waited for you.
Be our arm every morning,
our salvation in the time of distress.

³At the thunderous noise, peoples flee;
when you rise up, nations scatter.

⁴Your spoil shall be gathered as the caterpillar gathers;
as locusts leap upon it,
so shall they leap upon your plunder.

⁵The LORD is exalted,
for he dwells on high;
he has filled Zion
with justice and righteousness.

⁶And he shall be the stability of your times,
a wealth of salvation, wisdom, and knowledge;
the fear of the LORD — this is his treasure.

⁷Behold, their valiant ones cry out in the streets;
the envoys of peace weep bitterly.

⁸The highways lie desolate,
the traveler has ceased.
He has broken the covenant,
he has despised the cities,
he regards no one.

⁹The land mourns and languishes;
Lebanon is ashamed and withers.
Sharon has become like a desert,
and Bashan and Carmel shake off their leaves.

¹⁰"Now I will arise," says the LORD.
"Now I will be exalted;
now I will lift myself up."

¹¹You conceive chaff, you bring forth stubble;
your own breath is a fire that shall consume you.

¹²And the peoples shall be as if burned to lime, like cut thorns consumed in the fire.

¹³"Hear, you who are far off, what I have done;
and you who are near, acknowledge my might."

¹⁴The sinners in Zion are terrified;
trembling has seized the godless:
"Who among us can dwell with consuming fire?
Who among us can dwell with everlasting flames?"

¹⁵He who walks in righteousness and speaks what is upright, who despises the gain of oppression,
who shakes his hands free from holding a bribe,
who stops his ears from hearing of bloodshed,

and shuts his eyes from looking upon evil —

¹⁶he shall dwell on the heights;
his refuge shall be the fortress of rocks.
His bread shall be given him;
his water shall be sure.

¹⁷Your eyes shall behold the king in his beauty;
they shall see a land that stretches far away.

¹⁸Your heart shall muse on the former terror:
"Where is the one who counted?
Where is the one who weighed?
Where is the one who counted the towers?"

¹⁹You shall no longer see the fierce people,
the people of obscure speech that you cannot comprehend,
of a stammering tongue that you cannot understand.

²⁰Gaze upon Zion, the city of our appointed feasts!
Your eyes shall see Jerusalem —
a quiet habitation,
a tent that shall not be moved:
its stakes shall never be pulled up,
nor any of its cords be broken.

²¹But there the LORD in majesty shall be for us a place of broad rivers and streams, where no galley with oars shall go,
and no mighty ship shall pass.

²²For the LORD is our judge,
the LORD is our lawgiver,
the LORD is our king —
he will save us.

²³Your rigging hangs loose;
it cannot hold the mast firm
or spread the sail.
Then an abundance of spoil shall be divided — even the lame shall carry off plunder.

²⁴And no inhabitant shall say, "I am sick";
the people who dwell there shall be forgiven their iniquity.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The woe oracle targets a destroyer who has escaped destruction — almost certainly Assyria. The divine justice principle is clear: the measure you give will be the measure you receive.

2. The community responds with prayer. "Be our arm" (zeroa) asks God to be their strength — the same divine arm that delivered Israel from Egypt (Exodus 6:6).
3. The subject shifts to the LORD. His rising (romemut) produces the same effect as a roaring army — nations scatter before theophanic power.
4. The plunder of the destroyed enemy will be gathered as thoroughly as locusts strip a field — the destroyer's own tactics turned against him.
5. The LORD's exaltation is not abstract transcendence but active governance — he fills Zion with justice and righteousness, the very things human rulers have withheld.
6. The fear of the LORD (yir'at YHWH) is called his "treasure" (otsar). In a chapter about plundered wealth, the true treasure is covenantal reverence.
7. The er'elam ("valiant ones") are likely Jerusalem's warriors or diplomats. Even the bravest weep — the diplomatic situation is hopeless by human measure.
8. Desolate highways signal collapsed commerce and communication. The covenant-breaker treats treaties, cities, and human life with equal contempt.
9. Four of Israel's most fertile regions — Lebanon, Sharon, Bashan, Carmel — are devastated. The land itself participates in the mourning (see Hosea 4:3).
10. The triple "now" (attah) marks dramatic divine intervention. After patient waiting through human crisis, the LORD announces his own rising.
11. Addressed to the enemies: their schemes produce only worthless material, and their own breath (ruach) becomes the fire of their destruction.
12. The imagery is of complete combustion — lime-burning requires intense, sustained heat. The thorns echo the curse imagery of 32:13, now applied to God's enemies.
13. The LORD addresses both distant nations and nearby peoples. His acts of judgment are a universal proclamation meant to be known by all.
14. The question is about surviving the presence of a holy God. The sinners within the covenant community recognize that God's holiness is itself the consuming fire (see Hebrews 12:29).
15. Isaiah's answer to verse 14, structured like an entrance liturgy (compare Psalm 15 and Psalm 24:3-4). Five ethical qualifications describe who can dwell in God's holy presence.
16. The righteous receives three provisions: elevated dwelling (safety), bread (sustenance), and reliable water (ongoing life) — covenant blessings where God becomes fortress, provider, and sustainer.
17. Those who shut their eyes from evil (v.15) are given eyes to see the king in glory. The movement from moral discipline to beatific vision is profoundly theological.
18. The rhetorical questions recall Assyrian officials who tallied tribute, weighed silver, and surveyed fortifications. In the age of the king's beauty, these oppressors are simply gone.
19. The Assyrians spoke Akkadian — foreign and terrifying to Hebrew speakers. In the new Zion, the threatening foreigner with incomprehensible speech is gone.
20. The command to "gaze" (chazeh) uses the same root as the prophetic word for vision (chazon). Jerusalem is both the city of appointed feasts (mo'adenu) and an immovable tent — worship calendar and divine presence converge.
21. Jerusalem lacked a great river unlike Babylon, Egypt, or Nineveh. The LORD himself becomes Zion's river — providing what geography denied, yet admitting no warships.
22. One of the most theologically compressed verses in Isaiah. It anticipates the understanding of Christ as prophet, priest, and king while adding the legislative function.
23. The ship metaphor from verse 21 is applied to the enemy: their vessel is crippled. The spoil is so vast that even the lame (pisechim) take their share, echoing 1 Samuel 30:24.
24. The chapter's final verse links physical healing to spiritual forgiveness — a connection Jesus explicitly claims in Mark 2:5-12. The word nesu ("forgiven," literally "lifted, carried away") uses the same root as the scapegoat bearing sin in Leviticus 16:22.

Summary: Isaiah 34 is one of the most fearsome oracles in the prophetic corpus — a summons to all nations to witness cosmic judgment. The heavenly host dissolves, the scroll of heaven is rolled up, and the LORD's sword descends upon Edom as the representative of all who oppose his purposes. The land becomes burning pitch, a haunt of wild creatures, an inheritance of chaos. Yet the chapter closes with a remarkable appeal: "Search the book of the LORD and read" — a call to verify that every word of judgment will be fulfilled.

What Makes This Remarkable: The rolling up of the heavenly scroll (v.4) is among the most apocalyptic images in the Old Testament, directly echoed in Revelation 6:13-14. The specificity of the animal catalog (vv.11-15) transforms judgment from abstraction to ecological reality — the very creatures that inhabit ruins become witnesses to divine wrath.

Translation Friction: We have rendered cherem as "devoted to destruction" rather than the softer "utter destruction," preserving its sacrificial-warfare connotation. The graphic imagery of blood-soaked land and fat-drenched soil is maintained without euphemism, as the text intends to disturb. Edom functions both historically and typologically — it represents the anti-covenant posture of all nations.

Connections: This chapter forms a deliberate pair with chapter 35: judgment/salvation, desolation/blooming, chaos creatures/redeemed pilgrims. The cherem language connects to Joshua's conquest narratives. The "book of the LORD" (v.16) is one of the earliest self-referential claims within prophetic literature. Revelation 6:13-14 directly draws upon verse 4.

¹Draw near, O nations, to hear,
and give attention, O peoples!
Let the earth hear, and all that fills it,
the world and all that comes from it.

²For the wrath of the LORD is against all the nations,
and his fury against all their armies.
He has devoted them to destruction;
he has given them over to slaughter.

³Their slain shall be cast out,
and the stench of their corpses shall rise;
the mountains shall melt with their blood.

⁴All the host of heaven shall dissolve, and the heavens shall be rolled up like a scroll;
all their host shall wither and fall like a leaf falling from the vine, like a withered fig from the fig tree.

⁵For my sword has drunk its fill in the heavens;
behold, it descends upon Edom,
upon the people I have devoted to destruction, for judgment.

⁶The sword of the LORD is gorged with blood, dripping with fat —
the blood of lambs and goats,

the fat of the kidneys of rams.
 For the LORD has a sacrifice in Bozrah,
 a great slaughter in the land of Edom.

⁷Wild oxen shall fall with them,
 and young bulls with the mighty;
 their land shall be soaked with blood,
 and their soil made rich with fat.

⁸For the LORD has a day of vengeance,
 a year of recompense for the cause of Zion.

⁹Her streams shall be turned to pitch,
 her soil to sulfur,
 and her land shall become burning pitch.

¹⁰Night and day it shall not be quenched;
 its smoke shall rise forever.
 From generation to generation it shall lie waste;
 no one shall pass through it forever and ever.

¹¹But the hawk and the hedgehog shall possess it,
 the owl and the raven shall dwell in it.
 He shall stretch over it the measuring line of chaos and the plumb stones of emptiness.

¹²Its nobles — there is no kingdom for them to proclaim,
 and all its princes shall come to nothing.

¹³Thorns shall overrun her palaces, nettles and thistles her fortresses.
 She shall become a haunt of jackals,
 a dwelling for ostriches.

¹⁴Desert creatures shall meet with hyenas,
 and the wild goat shall call to its companion.
 There indeed the night creature shall settle and find for herself a resting place.

¹⁵There the arrow snake shall nest and lay eggs,
 hatch them and gather her young in her shadow.
 There indeed the vultures shall be gathered,
 each one with her mate.

¹⁶Search the book of the LORD and read:
 not one of these shall be missing,
 none shall lack her companion.
 For his mouth has commanded,
 and his Spirit has gathered them.

¹⁷He has cast the lot for them,
and his hand has divided it to them by the measuring line.
They shall possess it forever;
from generation to generation they shall dwell in it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The summons is universal — not merely to Israel but to all nations, peoples, and creation itself. This is a cosmic courtroom scene where the entire earth is called as witness to divine judgment.
2. The cherem ("devoted to destruction") language is deliberately chosen. This is not arbitrary violence but covenantal justice — the nations are placed under the same sacred ban that was applied to Jericho.
3. The graphic physicality of the imagery — unburied corpses, rising stench, blood-soaked mountains — refuses to let the reader spiritualize judgment into abstraction. The prophets insist that divine wrath has material consequences.
4. Cosmic de-creation: the stars dissolve, the heavens roll up, the celestial host falls like withered leaves. This is the undoing of Genesis 1 — the luminaries of Day Four collapse. Jesus echoes this in the Olivet Discourse (Matthew 24:29).
5. The sword's descent from heaven to Edom narrows the cosmic judgment to a specific historical target. Edom, as Esau's descendants and Israel's perpetual antagonist, functions as the representative of all anti-covenant peoples.
6. The sacrificial language is intentionally shocking: rams, lambs, goats, kidney-fat — all temple terms applied to military destruction. Bozrah, Edom's capital, becomes the altar.
7. The re'emim ("wild oxen," not "unicorns" as KJV) are powerful beasts whose fall signals the defeat of even the mightiest. The land itself is saturated — blood and fat permeate the very soil.
8. The "cause of Zion" (riv Tsiyon) is a legal term — God takes up Zion's lawsuit against those who have wronged her. Divine vengeance is not capricious rage but covenant litigation brought to verdict.
9. The Sodom-and-Gomorra imagery (pitch, sulfur, burning) is unmistakable. Edom's judgment recapitulates the destruction of the cities of the plain (Genesis 19), reinforcing the typological pattern.
10. The perpetual burning and rising smoke echo both Sodom (Genesis 19:28) and the later apocalyptic imagery of Revelation 14:11. The emphasis on generational permanence (dor ledor, netsach netsachim) underscores the finality of divine judgment.
11. The wild creatures that inherit Edom are desert and ruin-dwelling species. The tohu vavohu language is a devastating allusion: God un-creates Edom, returning it to primordial chaos.
12. Political collapse accompanies ecological devastation. There are no nobles left to crown, no princes to govern. The entire governmental structure is reduced to efes ("nothing, zero").
13. Palaces and fortresses — symbols of human power and security — are conquered not by armies but by thorns, nettles, and wild creatures. Nature reclaims what civilization abandons.
14. The catalog of creatures inhabiting ruined Edom creates an eerie portrait. The sa'ir ("wild goat" or "hairy one") and hilit ("night creature") populate the ruins where human civilization once stood.
15. The qippoz ("arrow snake" or "owl") and dayyot ("vultures" or "kites") complete the animal catalog. These creatures nest permanently — Edom's ruins are not temporary but become established habitat. Creation fills the void left by destroyed civilization.
16. This verse is both a literary and theological milestone. It instructs the reader to verify prophecy against a written document, establishing the principle that God's word can be tested by its own record. The "book of the LORD" anticipates the canonical concept of Scripture.
17. The land-distribution language (casting lots, dividing by line) echoes Joshua's allotment of Canaan — but here the inheritance is given to wild creatures, not tribes. The irony is devastating: Edom's territory is permanently deeded to chaos and desolation.

Summary: Isaiah 35 is the mirror image of chapter 34 — where that chapter decreed desolation, this one erupts in bloom. The wilderness rejoices, the desert blossoms like a crocus, and the glory of Lebanon, Carmel, and Sharon are restored. Blind eyes open, deaf ears unseal, the lame leap like deer, and the mute tongue sings for joy. A highway appears — the Highway of Holiness — on which the ransomed of the LORD return to Zion with singing, crowned with everlasting joy, while sorrow and sighing flee away. This chapter is the theological bridge to the great comfort oracles of chapters 40-66.

What Makes This Remarkable: Every line of this chapter reverses a specific curse or judgment from the preceding oracles. The desert that was cursed now blooms; the blind eyes from Isaiah 6:10 now see; the highways that lay desolate in 33:8 become the mesillat haqqodesh (Highway of Holiness). The chapter reads as a prophetic catalog of restoration — each image answering a corresponding image of judgment.

Translation Friction: We have rendered mesillat haqqodesh as "Highway of Holiness" rather than "Way of Holiness" to preserve the sense of mesillah as a raised, constructed road — an engineered path, not a trail. The phrase ge'ulei YHWH ("ransomed of the LORD") uses redemption language rooted in the go'el (kinsman-redeemer) tradition. We render simchat olam as "everlasting joy" rather than "eternal gladness" to maintain consistency with the olam vocabulary throughout Isaiah.

Connections: This chapter anticipates Isaiah 40:3-5 (the highway in the wilderness), 42:7 (opening blind eyes), 61:1-3 (good news to the afflicted), and finds its New Testament fulfillment in Jesus' reply to John the Baptist: "the blind receive sight, the lame walk... the deaf hear" (Matthew 11:5, directly quoting Isaiah 35). The Highway of Holiness anticipates the "way of the LORD" in 40:3 and ultimately the "new and living way" of Hebrews 10:20.

¹The wilderness and the dry land shall be glad;
the desert shall rejoice and blossom —
blossom like the crocus!

²It shall blossom abundantly and rejoice with joy and singing.
The glory of Lebanon shall be given to it,
the splendor of Carmel and Sharon.
They shall see the glory of the LORD,
the splendor of our God.

³Strengthen the weak hands,
and make firm the faltering knees.

⁴Say to those with anxious hearts,
"Be strong; do not fear!
Behold, your God will come with vengeance, with the recompense of God.
He will come and save you."

⁵Then the eyes of the blind shall be opened,
and the ears of the deaf shall be unstopped.

⁶Then the lame shall leap like a deer,
and the tongue of the mute shall sing for joy.
For waters shall burst forth in the wilderness,
and streams in the desert.

⁷The burning sand shall become a pool,
and the thirsty ground springs of water.
In the haunt of jackals where they once lay,
grass shall grow with reeds and rushes.

⁸And a highway shall be there — a road —
and it shall be called the Highway of Holiness.
The unclean shall not travel on it;
it shall belong to those who walk the way.
No fool shall wander onto it.

⁹No lion shall be there,
no ravenous beast shall go up on it —
they shall not be found there.
But the redeemed shall walk there.

¹⁰And the ransomed of the LORD shall return and come to Zion with singing,
with everlasting joy crowning their heads.
Gladness and joy shall overtake them,
and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with explosive joy — the midbar (wilderness) and tsiyyah (dry land) are personified as celebrating. The desert does not merely tolerate growth; it rejoices in its own transformation. This is the antithesis of chapter 34's desolation.
2. The threefold gift — Lebanon's glory, Carmel's splendor, Sharon's beauty — reverses the devastation of 33:9 where these same regions were shamed and withered. The purpose of all this natural restoration is theophanic: to see the glory of the LORD.
3. The imperative shifts to direct address — the community is told to strengthen one another. Weak hands and faltering knees are images of exhausted hope (see Hebrews 12:12, which directly quotes this verse). The physical imagery carries spiritual meaning: those whose grip on faith has weakened need to be steadied.
4. The message to the fearful is not "calm down" but "your God is coming." The same divine vengeance (naqam) that destroys Edom in chapter 34 now saves his people. Vengeance and salvation are two sides of the same divine action — judgment for the oppressor is deliverance for the oppressed.
5. The word az ("then") links the healings to God's coming in verse 4. These are not random miracles but the signature acts of the messianic age. Jesus explicitly pointed to this verse when answering John the Baptist's question, "Are you the one who is to come?" (Matthew 11:3-5).
6. Four healings in two verses: blind see, deaf hear, lame leap, mute sing. The deer (ayyal) is chosen for its agility — the most dramatic possible contrast with lameness. The water imagery parallels the human healings: as bodies are restored, so is the land. Human and ecological renewal are inseparable.
7. The sharav ("burning sand" or "mirage") becomes a real pool — the illusion of water becomes actual water. The jackals' haunt from 34:13 is transformed: where predators once lay, marsh grasses grow. Every detail of chapter 34's desolation is specifically reversed.
8. The Highway of Holiness is one of Isaiah's most enduring images. It connects the return from exile (ch.40-55) to the ultimate eschatological homecoming. The road's holiness is protective, not exclusionary — it keeps danger out rather than keeping pilgrims in.
9. The absence of predators is not merely zoological but theological — on the Highway of Holiness, every threat is removed. The ge'ulim ("redeemed") walk where lions cannot. The road's safety is guaranteed by its builder.
10. This verse is quoted again in Isaiah 51:11, forming an inclusio around the central servant songs. The fleeing of sorrow is personified — grief runs away as the redeemed approach Zion. The verse serves as the theological bridge to chapters 40-66: everything that follows is the working out of this promise. It is among the most hope-saturated verses in all of Scripture.

Summary: In the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah, Sennacherib of Assyria captures Judah's fortified cities and sends his Rabshakeh to Jerusalem with a massive force. The Rabshakeh delivers a devastating speech in Hebrew, taunting Hezekiah's reliance on Egypt and on the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Rabshakeh's speech is a masterpiece of psychological warfare. He addresses the people directly in Hebrew (yehudit) after the officials beg him to speak Aramaic (v. 11). His most provocative claim: 'The LORD Himself told me to march against this land and destroy it' (v. 10). He co-opts Israel's own theology, using YHWH's name to undermine trust in YHWH. The chapter parallels 2 Kings 18:13-37 almost verbatim.

Translation Friction: The title Rabshakeh (rav-shaqeh) is an Assyrian military rank, not a proper name. We transliterated it and noted its meaning ('chief cupbearer' or 'chief officer'). The request to speak Aramit ('Aramaic,' v. 11) rather than Yehudit ('Judahite/Hebrew') reveals the linguistic politics of the ancient Near East — Aramaic was the diplomatic lingua franca.

Connections: This chapter parallels 2 Kings 18:13-37 with minor variations. The Rabshakeh's taunt about trusting Egypt echoes Isaiah's own warnings (30:1-7, 31:1-3). Sennacherib's invasion is documented in Assyrian records (the Taylor Prism). The theological crisis — can YHWH defend His own city? — drives chapters 36-37.

¹In the fourteenth year of King Hezekiah, Sennacherib king of Assyria marched against all the fortified cities of Judah and captured them. ²The king of Assyria sent the Rabshakeh from Lachish to Jerusalem, to King Hezekiah, with a large force. He took his stand by the conduit of the upper pool, on the highway to the Washerman's Field. ³Eliakim son of Hilkiah, who was over the palace, Shebna the secretary, and Joah son of Asaph, the recorder, went out to meet him. ⁴The Rabshakeh said to them, 'Say to Hezekiah: This is what the great king, the king of Assyria, says — What is this trust in which you are trusting?' ⁵'I say — your claim of strategy and strength for war is mere talk. Now, on whom are you relying, that you have rebelled against me?' ⁶'Look — you are trusting in the staff of this broken reed, Egypt! If a man leans on it, it goes into his hand and pierces it. That is what Pharaoh king of Egypt is to everyone who trusts in him.' ⁷'And if you say to me, We trust in the LORD our God — is He not the one whose high places and altars Hezekiah has removed, telling Judah and Jerusalem, You must worship before this altar?' ⁸'Now then, make a wager with my master the king of Assyria: I will give you two thousand horses — if you can find riders for them!' ⁹'How then can you repel even a single officer among the least of my master's servants? Yet you trust in Egypt for chariots and horsemen!' ¹⁰'And have I marched against this land to destroy it without the LORD? The LORD Himself said to me: March against this land and destroy it!' ¹¹Then Eliakim, Shebna, and Joah said to the Rabshakeh, 'Please speak to your servants in Aramaic, for we understand it. Do not speak to us in Hebrew in the hearing of the people who are on the wall.' ¹²But the Rabshakeh said, 'Has my master sent me only to your master and to you to speak these words? Has he not sent me to the men sitting on the wall — who will eat their own dung and drink their own urine along with you?' ¹³Then the Rabshakeh stood and called out in a loud voice in Hebrew: 'Hear the words of the great king, the king of Assyria!' ¹⁴'This is what the king says: Do not let Hezekiah deceive you, for he cannot deliver you.' ¹⁵'Do not let Hezekiah make you trust in the LORD by saying, The LORD will surely deliver us — this city will not be given into the hand of the king of Assyria.' ¹⁶'Do not listen to Hezekiah. For this is what the king of Assyria says: Make peace with me and come out to me, and each of you will eat from his own vine and fig tree and drink from his own cistern —' ¹⁷— until I come and take you to a land like your own land, a land of grain and new wine, a land of bread and vineyards.' ¹⁸'Do not let Hezekiah mislead you by saying, The LORD will deliver us. Has any god of the nations delivered his land from the hand of the king of Assyria?' ¹⁹'Where are the gods of Hamath and Arpad? Where are the gods of Sepharvaim? Have they delivered Samaria from my hand?' ²⁰'Who among all the gods of these lands has delivered his land from my hand, that the LORD should deliver Jerusalem from my hand?' ²¹But they remained silent and did not answer him a word, for the king's command was: 'Do not answer him.' ²²Then Eliakim son of Hilkiah, who was over the palace, Shebna the secretary, and Joah son of Asaph, the recorder, came to Hezekiah with their clothes torn and reported to him the words of the Rabshakeh.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse is nearly identical to 2 Kings 18:13. The date formula places the invasion around 701 BCE. Sennacherib's own records (the Taylor Prism) confirm the campaign against Judah, claiming he shut Hezekiah up 'like a bird in a cage' — but notably never claims to have captured Jerusalem.
2. The Rabshakeh (rav-shaqeh) is a title meaning 'chief cupbearer' or 'chief officer' — a high-ranking Assyrian military official, not a personal name. Lachish, Judah's second most important city, had already fallen. The location by the 'upper pool' is the same spot where Isaiah met Ahaz in 7:3 — the site of failed faith now becomes the site of the crisis faith must face.
3. Eliakim is now 'over the palace' — the position Isaiah prophesied he would hold in 22:20-22, replacing Shebna. Shebna has been demoted to secretary (sopher). The three officials represent Hezekiah's diplomatic delegation.
4. The Rabshakeh uses the same prophetic messenger formula (ko amar) for Sennacherib that prophets use for God — a deliberate rhetorical provocation. The title 'the great king' (hammelekh haggadol) is the standard Assyrian royal title, set in opposition to Hezekiah's implied smallness.
5. The phrase devar-sefatayim ('word of lips') dismisses Hezekiah's military preparations as empty talk — all mouth, no substance. The verb maradta ('you have rebelled') frames Hezekiah's resistance as political rebellion against Assyrian suzerainty, not as faithfulness to God.
6. The 'broken reed' (qaneh haratsuts) metaphor for Egypt is devastatingly vivid — the reed looks supportive but splinters under weight and pierces the hand that grips it. Isaiah himself used similar language against Egyptian alliances (30:1-7). The Rabshakeh ironically agrees with the prophet.
7. The Rabshakeh's most theologically sophisticated argument: Hezekiah's religious reforms (removing high places, centralizing worship) are reframed as offending YHWH rather than honoring Him. To an outsider unfamiliar with Deuteronomic theology, destroying altars to a deity would seem sacrilegious, not faithful. The argument has surface plausibility.
8. The taunt exposes Judah's military weakness — even if given horses for free, they lack trained cavalry to ride them. The verb hit'arev ('make a wager, exchange pledges') frames the challenge as a dare Hezekiah cannot accept.
9. The argument escalates: Judah cannot repel even one minor Assyrian official, yet trusts in Egypt's distant cavalry. The word pachat ('governor, officer') describes a low-ranking provincial administrator — the insult is that even Assyria's least is more than Judah's best.
10. The Rabshakeh's most audacious claim: YHWH commissioned the Assyrian invasion. This is either blasphemous presumption or — ironically — partially true, since Isaiah's own oracles describe Assyria as God's instrument of judgment (10:5-6). The theological ambiguity is deliberately unsettling.
11. The officials' request reveals their fear: the Rabshakeh's Hebrew speech is aimed not at the diplomats but at the common people on the wall. Aramit ('Aramaic') was the international diplomatic language; Yehudit ('Judahite/Hebrew') was the language of the populace. The linguistic shift is a weapon.
12. The Rabshakeh's response is deliberately crude — he refuses the diplomatic register and describes siege conditions in graphic terms to terrify the civilian population. The words tso'atam ('their excrement') and mei ragleihem ('water of their feet,' a euphemism for urine) are meant to demoralize by making the coming siege viscerally real.
13. Having been asked to speak Aramaic, the Rabshakeh deliberately speaks louder in Hebrew — escalating the psychological assault. He now addresses the people directly, bypassing the officials entirely.
14. The Rabshakeh now uses the messenger formula for Sennacherib directly to the people — 'This is what the king says' parallels 'This is what the LORD says,' setting Assyria's king as a rival authority to Israel's God.
15. The Rabshakeh explicitly names YHWH and challenges trust in Him — this is the theological center of the crisis. The infinitive absolute hatsel yatsilenu ('surely delivering He will deliver') uses emphatic grammar to mock the certainty of divine deliverance.
16. The phrase asu itti verakhah ('make a blessing/peace with me') offers surrender disguised as prosperity. The vine-and-fig-tree image (v. 16) deliberately echoes the prophetic vision of peace (Micah 4:4, 1 Kings 4:25) — the Assyrian king offers what only God can give.
17. The 'promise' is deportation — dressed in the language of abundance. A 'land like your own' means exile, resettlement in Assyrian territory. The Rabshakeh makes forced displacement sound like a real-estate upgrade.
18. The Rabshakeh's logic: no national deity has withstood Assyria; therefore YHWH will not either. He treats YHWH as one god among many — the fundamental category error that Isaiah's theology exists to refute.
19. The mention of Samaria is the most painful thrust — Israel's northern kingdom fell to Assyria in 722 BCE, within living memory. The implication: Samaria's God is Judah's God, and He already failed once. The cities listed (Hamath, Arpad, Sepharvaim) are all Assyrian conquests whose patron deities proved powerless.
20. The climactic challenge: YHWH is placed in a lineup with failed deities. The question is meant to be rhetorical — no god has succeeded, so why should YHWH? Isaiah 37 will answer this question decisively.

21. Hezekiah's command to remain silent is strategically wise (deny the Rabshakeh a public debate) and theologically significant — the answer will come not from human diplomats but from God through Isaiah (ch. 37). The silence echoes Isaiah's own commission to a people who will 'hear but not understand' (6:9).
22. The torn garments (qeru'ei vegadim) signal grief and distress — the officials heard the Rabshakeh's words as a national crisis, not mere diplomacy. The chapter ends in suspense: the challenge has been delivered, the people are silent, and everything depends on what Hezekiah does next.

Summary: When Hezekiah hears the Rabshakeh's threats, he tears his robes and sends to Isaiah for counsel. Isaiah promises deliverance: Sennacherib will hear a rumor and return home. After Sennacherib sends a taunting letter, Hezekiah spreads it before the LORD and prays. Isaiah delivers a sweeping oracle: the Virgin Daughter of Zion laughs at the Assyrian king. That night, the angel of the LORD strikes 185,000 in the Assyrian camp. Sennacherib withdraws to Nineveh and is murdered by his own sons.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the theological climax of the Sennacherib crisis (chs. 36-37). Hezekiah's prayer (vv. 16-20) is one of the purest appeals to divine sovereignty in Scripture — he asks God to act not for Judah's sake but so 'all the kingdoms of the earth may know that You alone are the LORD.' Isaiah's oracle (vv. 22-35) is electrifying poetry: Zion personified as a virgin daughter shaking her head in mockery at the world's superpower. The destruction of 185,000 Assyrians in a single night is one of the most dramatic divine interventions in the Hebrew Bible.

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew betulat bat-tsiyon (v. 22) is literally 'virgin daughter of Zion' — a personification of Jerusalem as an unconquered young woman who scorns the invader. We retained the full phrase for its theological weight. Sennacherib's assassination by his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer (v. 38) is confirmed by Assyrian records, though the details differ slightly. The 'hook in your nose' imagery (v. 29) references the literal Assyrian practice of leading captives with rings through their noses.*

Connections: This chapter parallels 2 Kings 19 almost verbatim. Hezekiah's prayer echoes the theology of Deuteronomy 4:35 ('the LORD alone is God'). The destruction of the Assyrian army fulfills Isaiah's earlier prophecies (10:12-19, 14:24-27, 31:8-9). Sennacherib's murder in the temple of Nisroch (v. 38) — slain by his own sons while worshipping his god — stands in stark contrast to Hezekiah praying in the temple of YHWH and being delivered.

¹When King Hezekiah heard it, he tore his robes, covered himself with sackcloth, and went into the house of the LORD. ²He sent Eliakim, who was over the palace, and Shebna the secretary, and the senior priests, all covered in sackcloth, to Isaiah the prophet, son of Amoz. ³They said to him, 'This is what Hezekiah says: This day is a day of distress, rebuke, and disgrace. Children have come to the point of birth, but there is no strength to deliver them. ⁴Perhaps the LORD your God will hear the words of the Rabshakeh, whom his master the king of Assyria sent to mock the living God, and will rebuke the words that the LORD your God has heard. Lift up a prayer for the remnant that still survives.' ⁵When the servants of King Hezekiah came to Isaiah, ⁶Isaiah said to them, 'Say this to your master: This is what the LORD says — Do not be afraid of the words you have heard, with which the servants of the king of Assyria have blasphemed Me. ⁷I am about to put a spirit in him so that he hears a rumor and returns to his own land, and I will make him fall by the sword in his own land.' ⁸The Rabshakeh returned and found the king of Assyria fighting against Libnah, for he had heard that Sennacherib had moved on from Lachish. ⁹He heard it said concerning Tirhakah king of Cush, 'He has come out to fight against you.' When he heard this, he sent messengers to Hezekiah, saying, ¹⁰'Say this to Hezekiah king of Judah: Do not let your God, in whom you trust, deceive you by saying that Jerusalem will not be handed over to the king of Assyria. ¹¹You have surely heard what the kings of Assyria have done to all lands, devoting them to destruction. And will you be delivered? ¹²Did the gods of the nations deliver those my fathers destroyed — Gozan, Haran, Rezeph, and the people of Eden who were in Telassar? ¹³Where is the king of Hamath, the king of Arpad, the king of the city of Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivvah?' ¹⁴Hezekiah received the letter from the hand of the messengers and read it. Then Hezekiah went up to the house of the LORD and spread it out before the LORD. ¹⁵Hezekiah prayed to the LORD, saying:

¹⁶O LORD of Hosts, God of Israel, enthroned above the cherubim —
You alone are God over all the kingdoms of the earth.
You made the heavens and the earth.

¹⁷Incline Your ear, O LORD, and hear.
Open Your eyes, O LORD, and see.
Hear all the words of Sennacherib,
which he sent to mock the living God.

¹⁸It is true, LORD — the kings of Assyria have laid waste all the nations and their lands,

¹⁹and have thrown their gods into the fire —
for they were not gods at all,
but the work of human hands, wood and stone.
So they destroyed them.

²⁰Now, O LORD our God, save us from his hand, so that all the kingdoms of the earth may know that You alone are the LORD.'

²¹Then Isaiah son of Amoz sent word to Hezekiah: 'This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says — Because you have prayed to Me concerning Sennacherib king of Assyria,

²²this is the word the LORD has spoken against him:
She despises you, she laughs you to scorn —
the virgin daughter of Zion!
Behind your back she shakes her head —
the daughter of Jerusalem!

²³Whom have you mocked and blasphemed?
Against whom have you raised your voice and lifted your eyes in pride?
Against the Holy One of Israel!

²⁴Through your servants you mocked the Lord, and you said:
'With my many chariots I have ascended the mountain heights,
the remote peaks of Lebanon.
I cut down its tallest cedars, its choicest cypresses.
I reached its farthest height, its densest forest.

²⁵I dug wells and drank foreign waters.
With the sole of my feet
I dried up all the streams of Egypt.'

²⁶Have you not heard?
Long ago I planned it.
In days of old I designed it.
Now I have brought it to pass —

that you should crush fortified cities into heaps of rubble.

²⁷Their inhabitants, shorn of strength, were dismayed and put to shame.
They were like plants of the field,
like tender green shoots,
like grass on the rooftops,
scorched before it can grow.

²⁸I know your sitting down, your going out and your coming in,
and your raging against Me.

²⁹Because your raging against Me and your arrogance have reached My ears,
I will put My hook in your nose and My bit in your lips, and I will turn you back
by the way you came.

³⁰This will be the sign for you:
This year you will eat what grows on its own,
and the second year what springs from that.
But in the third year, sow and reap,
plant vineyards and eat their fruit.

³¹The surviving remnant of the house of Judah will again take root downward and bear fruit upward.

³²For out of Jerusalem a remnant will go forth, and survivors from Mount Zion.
The zeal of the LORD of Hosts will accomplish this.

³³Therefore, this is what the LORD says concerning the king of Assyria:
He will not enter this city or shoot an arrow here.
He will not advance against it with shields or build a siege ramp against it.

³⁴By the way he came, he will return, and he will not enter this city
— declares the LORD.

³⁵For I will defend this city and save it,
for My own sake
and for the sake of My servant David.'

³⁶The angel of the LORD went out and struck down 185,000 in the Assyrian camp. When the survivors rose early in the morning, there were dead bodies everywhere. ³⁷Sennacherib king of Assyria broke camp, departed, and returned to Nineveh, where he stayed. ³⁸As he was worshipping in the house of Nisroch his god, his sons Adrammelech and Sharezer struck him down with the sword. They escaped to the land of Ararat, and his son Esarhaddon reigned in his place.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Hezekiah's response is immediate and visceral: tearing robes signals grief and crisis, sackcloth signals repentance and humility, and entering the temple signals where he places his trust. This triad contrasts sharply with his father Ahaz, who refused to ask God for a sign (7:12).
2. The king sends his highest officials — the same delegation from chapter 36 — now clothed in sackcloth. Their destination is not Egypt for military aid but Isaiah for a prophetic word. Hezekiah's instinct is theological, not geopolitical.
3. The birth metaphor is devastating in its honesty: the nation is at its most vulnerable moment — fully in labor, unable to push through. The word ne'atsah ('disgrace, blasphemy') refers both to Judah's humiliation and to the Rabshakeh's blasphemy against God.
4. The phrase Elohim chay ('the living God') is the crux of the entire crisis: the Rabshakeh treated YHWH as one dead idol among many, but Hezekiah stakes everything on God being alive and hearing. The plea for 'the remnant' (she'erit) uses Isaiah's own signature theological term (cf. 10:20-22).
5. This brief transitional verse sets up Isaiah's oracle in the next verse. The narrative pacing quickens — the messengers arrive and Isaiah responds immediately.
6. Isaiah's first word from God is al-tira ('do not be afraid') — the classic divine reassurance formula. God calls the Rabshakeh and his delegation na'arei ('servants, young men') — a diminishing term that strips the terrifying Assyrian officials of their menace.
7. The 'spirit' (ruach) placed in Sennacherib is a spirit of fear or confusion. The prophecy is strikingly specific: he will hear a rumor, return home, and die by the sword there. All three elements are fulfilled by the chapter's end (vv. 36-38). God's sovereignty operates through natural-seeming events — rumors, political instability, assassination.
8. Libnah was a fortified city near Lachish in the Judean Shephelah. Sennacherib's movement from Lachish to Libnah shows the campaign was still active — he was systematically reducing Judah's defenses even as the diplomatic crisis unfolded in Jerusalem.
9. Tirhakah (Taharqa) was the Egyptian-Cushite pharaoh of the 25th Dynasty. His advance from the south threatened Sennacherib's rear. This is the 'rumor' prophesied in v. 7. Rather than retreating immediately, Sennacherib doubles down with a threatening letter to Hezekiah — a strategic blunder born of pride.
10. Sennacherib's letter escalates the blasphemy: the Rabshakeh taunted reliance on God, but now Sennacherib directly accuses God of being a deceiver (al-yashi'akha, 'let him not mislead you'). The theological stakes are now absolute — it is Sennacherib's word against God's.
11. The verb lehacharimam ('devoting to destruction') ironically uses the Hebrew concept of cherem — total destruction dedicated to a deity — to describe Assyrian conquests. Sennacherib frames Assyrian annihilation in quasi-religious terms, as if their god authorized it the way YHWH authorized Israel's cherem warfare.
12. Sennacherib catalogs conquered peoples whose gods failed them. Gozan, Haran, and Rezeph were cities in Upper Mesopotamia; 'the people of Eden' (benei-Eden) refers to the Aramean state of Bit-Adini on the Euphrates. The rhetorical force: YHWH is just another local god who will fail like all the rest.
13. The taunt 'Where is?' (ayyeh) is a rhetorical annihilation — these kings and their gods have vanished from history. Hamath and Arpad were major Syrian cities. Sepharvaim, Hena, and Ivvah were Mesopotamian cities. The letter's logic is a devastating syllogism: every god has failed, therefore yours will too.
14. The image of Hezekiah physically spreading the letter before God in the temple is one of the most iconic scenes of faith in the Old Testament. He does not compose a rebuttal or summon a war council — he lays the blasphemous words directly before the One who was blasphemed and lets God read them for Himself.
15. This verse introduces one of the most theologically significant prayers in the Hebrew Bible (vv. 16-20). The verb hitpallel ('prayed') is the reflexive form — intense, personal, self-involving prayer.
16. Hezekiah's prayer begins with a sweeping declaration of divine sovereignty that directly answers Sennacherib's theology. Where Sennacherib said 'no god could deliver,' Hezekiah says 'You alone are God over ALL kingdoms.' The phrase yoshev hakeruvim ('enthroned above the cherubim') places God on His throne in the Holy of Holies — this prayer is offered in the very presence of God.
17. The four imperatives — incline, hear, open, see — are not doubt but boldness: Hezekiah invites God to read the letter himself. The phrase Elohim chay ('the living God') appears again — the central claim of the crisis. If God is truly alive, He must respond to being mocked.
18. Hezekiah does not deny Sennacherib's claims — the Assyrians really did destroy those nations. This honesty gives the prayer its power: he does not pretend the threat is not real, he simply reframes it theologically in the next verse.
19. Here is Hezekiah's theological masterstroke: the reason those gods failed is not because Assyria was stronger than all gods — it is because those gods were never gods at all. They were wood and stone. Sennacherib's argument collapses: YHWH is not in the same category as carved idols.

20. The prayer's climax is breathtaking in its unselfishness: Hezekiah asks for deliverance not primarily for Judah's survival but so that all nations will know YHWH alone is God. The universal scope — 'all the kingdoms of the earth' — directly mirrors Sennacherib's boast about conquering all nations.
21. God's response comes through Isaiah — the prophetic channel Hezekiah trusted from the beginning. The phrase 'because you have prayed to Me' (asher hitpallalta elai) explicitly connects the divine response to Hezekiah's prayer. God acted because Hezekiah prayed.
22. The oracle opens with one of the most vivid images in prophetic literature. Jerusalem is personified as a betulat bat-tsiyon ('virgin daughter of Zion') — unconquered, untouched, laughing at the retreating bully. The head-shaking gesture (ro'sh heni'ah) is pure contempt. The world's mightiest empire is mocked by a girl on a city wall.
23. The rhetorical questions build to the devastating punchline: Sennacherib did not merely insult a small nation — he raised his voice against the Holy One of Israel (Qedosh Yisra'el), Isaiah's signature title for God. The phrase conveys both God's transcendent holiness and His particular commitment to Israel.
24. God now quotes Sennacherib's own boasts back to him. The imagery of conquering mountains and felling Lebanon's cedars was standard Assyrian royal rhetoric — kings boasted of logging Lebanon's forests for their palace projects. But in prophetic poetry, cutting cedars symbolizes toppling kings and nations (cf. Ezek. 31). Sennacherib's boast becomes his own indictment.
25. The boast climaxes absurdly: Sennacherib claims to have dried up Egypt's waterways by merely marching through them. The ye'orei matsor ('streams of Egypt/besieged places') likely refers to the Nile branches. The imagery portrays Sennacherib as a force of nature — but God is about to show who truly controls nature.
26. This is the theological turning point of the oracle. God reveals that Sennacherib's conquests were never his own achievement — God planned them 'long ago' (merachok) and 'in days of old' (limei qedem). Assyria was God's instrument, not a self-directed power. This echoes Isaiah 10:5-15, where Assyria is called 'the rod of My anger.'
27. The conquered peoples are described with escalating fragility: field plants, tender shoots, rooftop grass that withers before it matures. But the point is not their weakness — it is that God made them weak for Assyria to conquer. Sennacherib boasted of his strength; God says he only defeated those God had already weakened.
28. God's intimate knowledge of Sennacherib's every movement — sitting, leaving, arriving, raging — echoes Psalm 139. The Assyrian king thought he was directing a world-conquering campaign; God says, 'I know every move you make.' The final phrase, 'your raging against Me,' makes it personal.
29. The 'hook in the nose' (chachi be'appekha) is devastating irony: Assyrian kings depicted themselves leading captives with hooks through their noses or lips on palace reliefs. Now God will do the same to Sennacherib — the captor becomes the captive, led like an animal back the way he came.
30. The sign shifts from military to agricultural. The first two years reflect the devastation of Sennacherib's campaign — no sowing was possible, only eating volunteer growth (saphiach). By the third year, normal life resumes. This is both a practical timeline and a theological promise: God will restore what the invader destroyed.
31. The agricultural metaphor now applies to the people themselves: Judah's remnant (peleitat beit-yehudah) will be replanted. 'Root downward, fruit upward' is a complete restoration image — stability below, productivity above. This connects to Isaiah's broader remnant theology (10:20-22, 11:1).
32. The phrase qin'at YHWH tseva'ot ('the zeal of the LORD of Hosts') is the same phrase used in 9:7 regarding the Messianic kingdom. God's passionate commitment — not Hezekiah's diplomacy or Judah's military — will produce the remnant. Jerusalem is confirmed as the source from which restoration flows.
33. The oracle becomes a fourfold military impossibility: no entry, no arrow, no shield assault, no siege ramp. Each negation corresponds to a stage of ancient siege warfare. God does not merely promise to eventually save Jerusalem — He promises that the siege will never even properly begin.
34. The oracle echoes v. 29 ('I will turn you back by the way you came') with the solemn prophetic formula ne'um-YHWH ('declares the LORD'). Sennacherib's campaign, which seemed unstoppable, will simply reverse itself.
35. The two grounds for deliverance are God's own reputation ('for My sake' — answering Hezekiah's prayer that all nations would know) and the Davidic covenant ('for David's sake'). Jerusalem is saved not because it deserves it but because God has staked His name and His covenant on it. This closes the poetic oracle that began in v. 22.
36. The narrative shifts from poetry to prose with devastating abruptness. The destruction is reported in a single verse — no battle, no negotiation, just overnight annihilation. The phrase vayashkimu vaboqer ('they rose early in the morning') creates a grim tableau: dawn reveals what God did in the dark. Herodotus records a tradition of mice destroying Sennacherib's army, possibly reflecting a plague.
37. Three verbs in rapid succession — departed, went, returned — convey the humiliating retreat. The world's most powerful king slinks home to his capital. Every element of Isaiah's prophecy in v. 7 is now fulfilled: the rumor came, the return happened. Only the sword remains.
38. The final verse delivers the ultimate irony: Sennacherib, who mocked the living God, is murdered while worshipping a dead idol. His own sons — not a foreign army — are his executioners. The temple of Nisroch becomes his death chamber while the temple of YHWH remained his army's graveyard. Assyrian records confirm Sennacherib's assassination in 681 BCE. Esarhaddon succeeded him as king. The prophecy of v. 7 is now fully realized: rumor, return, and the sword.

Summary: Hezekiah falls deathly ill, and Isaiah tells him to set his house in order — he will die. Hezekiah turns to the wall, weeps bitterly, and prays. Before Isaiah leaves the palace courtyard, God sends him back with a promise: fifteen more years. The shadow on the steps of Ahaz retreats ten steps as a sign. Hezekiah composes a psalm of thanksgiving that moves from despair ('Sheol cannot praise You, death cannot celebrate You') to renewed commitment to praise God in the temple.

What Makes This Remarkable: Hezekiah's psalm (vv. 10-20) is unique to Isaiah — it has no parallel in 2 Kings 20. The psalm's central theological claim is stunning: death silences worship. 'Sheol cannot thank You, death cannot praise You' (v. 18) — Hezekiah argues that keeping him alive preserves a worshipper, and God apparently agrees. The retreating shadow on the 'steps of Ahaz' (v. 8) is both a miracle and a symbol: time itself reverses for the son on the very structure his faithless father built.

Translation Friction: The 'steps of Ahaz' (ma'alot Achaz, v. 8) may refer to a sundial-like staircase rather than literal steps, though the Hebrew is ambiguous. We rendered it 'the stairway of Ahaz' to preserve the architectural ambiguity. The 'lump of figs' (develet te'enim, v. 21) was a known ancient poultice for boils — the miracle operates through natural medicine. Verses 21-22 appear out of chronological order in the Hebrew text, likely displaced from their original position after v. 6.

Connections: This chapter parallels 2 Kings 20:1-11 with the major addition of Hezekiah's psalm (vv. 10-20). The fifteen-year extension places Hezekiah's illness around 703-701 BCE, during the Sennacherib crisis. The retreating shadow reverses the 'sign' dynamic of chapter 7 — where Ahaz refused a sign, his son receives one unsought. Hezekiah's psalm anticipates the theology of Psalms 6, 30, and 88.

¹In those days Hezekiah became deathly ill. Isaiah the prophet, son of Amoz, came to him and said, 'This is what the LORD says: Set your house in order, for you are going to die — you will not recover.' ²Hezekiah turned his face to the wall and prayed to the LORD: ³'Please, LORD, remember how I have walked before You in faithfulness and with a whole heart, and have done what is good in Your eyes.' And Hezekiah wept bitterly. ⁴Then the word of the LORD came to Isaiah: ⁵'Go and say to Hezekiah: This is what the LORD, the God of David your father, says — I have heard your prayer. I have seen your tears. I am adding fifteen years to your life. ⁶I will deliver you and this city from the hand of the king of Assyria, and I will defend this city.' ⁷This is the sign to you from the LORD that He will do what He has promised: ⁸I am going to make the shadow that has gone down on the stairway of Ahaz retreat ten steps backward by the sun.' And the sunlight went back ten steps on the stairway where it had gone down. ⁹A written prayer of Hezekiah king of Judah, after his illness and recovery:

¹⁰I said: In the prime of my life
I must go through the gates of Sheol.
I am deprived of the rest of my years.

¹¹I said: I will not see the LORD —
Yah! Yah! — in the land of the living.
I will look on humankind no more among the inhabitants of this fleeting world.

¹²My dwelling is plucked up and removed from me like a shepherd's tent.
I have rolled up my life like a weaver;
He cuts me off from the loom.
From day to night You bring me to an end.

¹³I waited until morning —
like a lion, He crushes all my bones.
From day to night You bring me to an end.

¹⁴Like a swallow or a crane I chirp;
I moan like a dove.
My eyes grow weak looking upward.
O Lord, I am oppressed — be my pledge of safety!

¹⁵What can I say? He has spoken to me, and He Himself has done it.
I will walk humbly all my years
because of the bitterness of my soul.

¹⁶O Lord, by these things people live, and in all of them is the life of my spirit.
Restore me to health — let me live!

¹⁷Truly, it was for my well-being that I suffered such bitterness.
But You have loved my soul back from the pit of destruction, for You have cast all my sins behind Your back.

¹⁸For Sheol cannot thank You,
death cannot praise You.
Those who go down to the pit cannot hope in Your faithfulness.

¹⁹The living — the living — they praise You,
as I do this day!
A father makes Your faithfulness known to his children.

²⁰The LORD is ready to save me!
We will play our songs on stringed instruments
all the days of our lives in the house of the LORD.

²¹Isaiah had said, 'Let them take a lump of figs and apply it as a poultice to the boil, and he will recover.' ²²Hezekiah had said, 'What is the sign that I will go up to the house of the LORD?'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase met attah velo tichyeh ('dying you are and will not live') is brutally direct — no softening, no timeline, no hope offered. Isaiah delivers it as a divine decree, not a diagnosis. The command to 'set your house in order' (tsav leveitekha) implies arranging succession and settling affairs — the language of finality.
2. Turning to the wall is an act of intimate withdrawal — shutting out the world to face God alone. The same gesture appears with Elijah (1 Kings 19). For a king surrounded by attendants and courtiers, this deliberate turning away from everyone toward the bare wall is a profound act of spiritual privacy.
3. Hezekiah's prayer is not presumptuous but covenantal: he appeals to his faithfulness (emet) and wholehearted devotion (lev shalem) — the terms of the Deuteronomic covenant. The 'bitter weeping' (bekhi gadol, literally 'great weeping') follows the prayer, not precedes it — emotion flows from theology, not the reverse.

4. The standard prophetic reception formula. God's response is immediate — the text implies Isaiah had not yet left the palace complex when the reversal came (cf. 2 Kings 20:4, which specifies Isaiah was still in the middle courtyard).
5. God identifies Himself as 'the God of David your father' — invoking the dynastic covenant and reminding Hezekiah that his father's God is still his God. The response addresses both prayer ('I have heard') and emotion ('I have seen your tears'). The fifteen-year extension is extraordinarily specific — God does not merely heal but quantifies the gift.
6. The healing promise expands into a national deliverance promise — Hezekiah's personal recovery is bound to Jerusalem's survival. The verb ganoti ('I will defend, shield') is the same used in 37:35. This confirms the chronological overlap: Hezekiah's illness occurred during the Sennacherib crisis, not after it.
7. God offers a sign unsolicited — a striking contrast with Ahaz, who was told to ask for a sign and refused (7:10-12). The sign confirms not merely healing but the entire word God has spoken, including the deliverance of Jerusalem.
8. The ma'alot Achaz ('steps/stairway of Ahaz') was likely an architectural structure whose shadow served as a time-marker — essentially a monumental sundial. The shadow retreating ten steps means time itself appears to reverse. The symbolic resonance is powerful: on the very structure built by faithless Ahaz, God gives a sign of life to faithful Hezekiah. The son's faith redeems what the father's unbelief built.
9. The superscription mikhtav ('a writing, document') introduces Hezekiah's psalm. This term is unusual — most psalm superscriptions use mizmor or shir. The word suggests a formal written composition, perhaps inscribed on a scroll or tablet. This psalm (vv. 10-20) has no parallel in 2 Kings and is unique to Isaiah's account.
10. The psalm opens in despair. The phrase bidmi yamai ('in the cutting off / prime of my days') suggests both midlife and abrupt termination. 'The gates of Sheol' (sha'arei she'ol) is the threshold of the underworld — Hezekiah sees himself standing at death's door. The verb puqqadti ('I am deprived, visited in judgment') carries a sense of divine reckoning.
11. The doubled divine name Yah Yah is an anguished cry — whether a gasp of grief or an intensified invocation. Hezekiah's deepest loss is not life itself but the experience of God 'in the land of the living' — worship, presence, encounter. The term chadel ('cessation, fleeting world') characterizes earthly existence as transient, making his loss of it even more poignant.
12. Two vivid metaphors for mortality: the shepherd's tent (ohel ro'i) — easily uprooted and carried away — and the weaver's loom, where life is a fabric being cut from the threads. The shift from 'He' to 'You' (from third person to second person address) is characteristic of Hebrew lament — the sufferer moves from talking about God to talking to God mid-sentence.
13. The lion metaphor for God is terrifying: the illness feels like being mauled by a predator who shatters every bone. The refrain 'from day to night You bring me to an end' (repeated from v. 12) creates a claustrophobic sense of relentless suffering — each day-night cycle is another round of being broken.
14. Hezekiah's prayer sounds have devolved from human speech to bird cries — the chirping of a swallow, the moaning of a dove. His eyes strain upward toward God but grow dim. The final plea orveni ('be my surety, my pledge') is a legal-financial metaphor: Hezekiah asks God to guarantee his life the way a guarantor secures a debt.
15. The tone shifts here — from lament to stunned gratitude. 'He has spoken and He has done it' acknowledges God's sovereign action. The verb edaddeh ('I will walk softly, humbly') describes a chastened gait — the walk of someone who has stared into the grave and come back changed. The 'bitterness of soul' (mar nafshi) remains, but it now produces humility rather than despair.
16. The phrase 'by these things' (aleiheim) likely refers to God's words and deeds just mentioned. Hezekiah recognizes that human life depends entirely on God's sustaining word. The double imperative — 'restore me' (tachalimeni) and 'let me live' (vehachayeni) — is both medical and theological: physical healing and spiritual reviving.
17. The theological depth here is extraordinary. Hezekiah reinterprets his suffering: the bitterness was for shalom ('peace, wholeness, well-being') — suffering had redemptive purpose. The image of God casting sins 'behind Your back' (acharei gevkha) means God deliberately turns away from them, choosing not to see them. This is one of the Old Testament's most vivid forgiveness metaphors.
18. This is the theological heart of the psalm and one of the most debated verses in Isaiah. Hezekiah's argument is functional, not philosophical: whatever the state of the dead, they do not praise God. Worship requires life. The three parallel terms — Sheol, death (mavet), the pit (bor) — paint the underworld as a place of silence where God's faithfulness (emet) goes unacknowledged.
19. The doubled chay chay ('the living, the living!') is an ecstatic contrast to the death-silence of v. 18. Hezekiah is alive and he knows it. The generational dimension — 'a father makes known to his children' — transforms personal survival into covenantal transmission. Praise is not just vertical (to God) but horizontal (across generations).
20. The psalm ends in communal worship — the singular 'I' becomes 'we' (neginot-ay nenaggen, 'my songs we will play'). Hezekiah's private suffering produces public praise. The location 'in the house of the LORD' (al-beit YHWH) brings the psalm full circle: the man who turned his face to the wall in despair (v. 2) now faces the temple in joy. This verse closes the poetry section.
21. This verse and the next appear to be displaced from their original position (likely after v. 6), as they narrate practical details already implied. The develet te'enim ('cake of pressed figs') was a known medicinal remedy in the ancient world — God's miracle works through natural means. The shechin ('boil') may indicate a severe abscess or infected wound.

22. Hezekiah's question reveals what matters most to him: not 'Will I live?' but 'Will I worship again?' Going up to the house of the LORD is the measure of recovery. This connects directly to the psalm's closing image (v. 20) of lifelong worship in the temple. The sign of the retreating shadow (v. 8) was God's answer to this question.

Summary: Merodach-baladan king of Babylon sends envoys with letters and a gift to Hezekiah after his recovery. Hezekiah shows them everything — his treasure house, silver, gold, spices, precious oil, his armory, and all his storehouses. Isaiah confronts him: everything in the palace will be carried to Babylon, and some of Hezekiah's own descendants will serve as eunuchs in the Babylonian palace. Hezekiah responds with startling acceptance: 'The word of the LORD you have spoken is good,' adding, 'There will be peace and security in my days.'

What Makes This Remarkable: This brief chapter is the hinge of the entire book of Isaiah. It explains why chapters 40-66 shift from Assyrian crisis to Babylonian exile — the seeds of exile are sown in Hezekiah's own throne room. The king who prayed so magnificently against Assyria (37:16-20) now naively displays his wealth to Babylon's agents. His final words — 'There will be peace and security in my days' — are either humble submission to God's decree or chilling indifference to his descendants' fate. The ambiguity is deliberate.

Translation Friction: Merodach-baladan (Marduk-apla-iddina II) was a Chaldean ruler who twice seized the Babylonian throne and actively sought anti-Assyrian alliances. His embassy to Hezekiah was almost certainly political, not merely a get-well visit. We rendered Hezekiah's response in v. 8 without editorial judgment, preserving the Hebrew text's refusal to tell us whether his words reflect piety or selfishness.

Connections: This chapter parallels 2 Kings 20:12-19. Merodach-baladan's embassy likely dates to around 703 BCE, when he briefly held Babylon again before Sennacherib expelled him. The prophecy of Babylonian exile (vv. 6-7) bridges directly to Isaiah 40:1 ('Comfort, comfort My people'), which opens the exile-and-return section. The treasures Hezekiah displayed will be the same treasures Nebuchadnezzar carries away (2 Kings 24:13). Chapter 39 closes the 'Book of the King' (chs. 36-39) and opens the door to the 'Book of the Servant' (chs. 40-55).

At that time Merodach-baladan son of Baladan, king of Babylon, sent letters and a gift to Hezekiah, for he had heard that he had been ill and had recovered. Hezekiah was pleased with them and showed them his treasure house — the silver, the gold, the spices, the precious oil, his entire armory, and everything found in his storehouses. There was nothing in his palace or in all his realm that Hezekiah did not show them. Then Isaiah the prophet came to King Hezekiah and said to him, 'What did these men say, and where did they come from?' Hezekiah said, 'They came to me from a distant land — from Babylon.' Isaiah said, 'What have they seen in your palace?' Hezekiah answered, 'They have seen everything in my palace. There is nothing in my storehouses that I did not show them.' Then Isaiah said to Hezekiah, 'Hear the word of the LORD of Hosts: The days are coming when everything in your palace, and everything your fathers have stored up until this day, will be carried off to Babylon. Nothing will be left, says the LORD. Some of your own descendants, your own flesh and blood, will be taken away. They will become eunuchs in the palace of the king of Babylon.' Hezekiah said to Isaiah, 'The word of the LORD you have spoken is good.' Then he added, 'There will be peace and security in my days.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Merodach-baladan (Marduk-apla-iddina II) was a Chaldean chieftain who seized the Babylonian throne twice (721-710 and briefly in 703 BCE). His 'get well' embassy was almost certainly a diplomatic mission to recruit Hezekiah into an anti-Assyrian coalition. The gift (minchah) functions as tribute between equals — a political overture disguised as courtesy.
2. The catalog of displayed wealth is exhaustive and damning: silver, gold, spices, oil, weapons, storehouses — and then the devastating summary: 'there was nothing he did not show them.' The verb vayismach ('he was pleased, rejoiced') reveals Hezekiah's motivation — he was flattered by Babylon's attention. The man who humbly spread a threatening letter before God (37:14) now proudly spreads his wealth before pagans.
3. Isaiah's questions are probing and deliberate — he already knows the answers. The interrogation mirrors Nathan confronting David (2 Sam. 12). Hezekiah's answer emphasizes distance ('a distant land') as if impressed by the reach of his reputation. He seems unaware that he is being interrogated, not interviewed.

4. Hezekiah repeats the 'nothing I did not show' formula from v. 2, but now in his own mouth it sounds like a confession. What was narration in v. 2 becomes self-incrimination in v. 4. He does not seem to sense the danger in his own words — total transparency with a foreign power amounts to a strategic intelligence briefing.
5. The prophetic announcement formula shema devar-YHWH tseva'ot ('Hear the word of the LORD of Hosts') signals that judgment follows. The same formula that delivered salvation in chapter 37 now delivers sentence. Isaiah is the same prophet with the same authority — only the message has changed because the king's behavior has changed.
6. The prophecy mirrors Hezekiah's boast with surgical precision: he said 'nothing I did not show them' — God says 'nothing will be left.' What was displayed will be deported. The phrase 'everything your fathers stored up until this day' extends the loss across generations — not just Hezekiah's wealth but the accumulated treasury of the Davidic dynasty.
7. The prophecy escalates from treasure to dynasty: not just gold but sons will be taken. The word sarisim ('eunuchs, court officials') in its most literal sense means Hezekiah's male line will be castrated and made to serve the very king whose envoys he just entertained. The Hebrew emphasizes biological descent: 'from your sons who will go out from you, whom you will father' — these are not abstract future people but Hezekiah's own bloodline. Tradition connects this to Daniel and his companions (Dan. 1:3-7).
8. Hezekiah's final words in Isaiah are the most debated sentence in the Hezekiah narrative. 'The word of the LORD is good' (tov devar-YHWH) could be genuine submission to divine sovereignty — accepting God's judgment without argument. But 'there will be peace and security in my days' (shalom ve'emet beyamai) reads as relief that the blow falls after his lifetime. The Hebrew text refuses to resolve the ambiguity. The word emet here means 'stability, security, reliability' rather than its usual sense of 'truth.' This verse closes the historical section of Isaiah (chs. 36-39) and sets the stage for the exile-and-comfort oracles that begin in chapter 40.

Summary: We arrive at one of the great turning points in all of Scripture. After thirty-nine chapters of judgment, warning, and exile-foretelling, the prophet's voice shifts dramatically to consolation. God commands that His people be comforted — their warfare is ended, their iniquity pardoned. A voice cries out to prepare the way of the LORD in the wilderness. The chapter sweeps from the frailty of humanity ('all flesh is grass') to the immeasurable greatness of God who weighs mountains in scales and sits above the circle of the earth, reducing princes to nothing. It culminates in the promise that those who wait on the LORD will renew their strength and mount up with wings like eagles.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 3 is quoted in all four Gospels as fulfilled in John the Baptist — a rare four-Gospel convergence. The phrase 'Comfort, comfort my people' uses the doubled imperative (nachamú, nachamú), a hallmark of prophetic urgency. The closing image of eagles' wings (v.31) has become one of the most beloved promises in the Bible. The cosmological language of vv.12-26 anticipates the divine speeches in Job.*

Translation Friction: *The KJV's 'comfort ye, comfort ye' preserves the Hebrew doubling but sounds archaic. We retain the doubled imperative as 'Comfort, comfort' for its rhetorical force. The Hebrew chug ha'arets (v.22, circle of the earth) has generated much discussion; we render it straightforwardly. The shift from plural imperatives (vv.1-2) to a singular voice (v.3) to the prophet's own voice (v.6) creates a dramatic polyphony we preserve through line breaks.*

Connections: Verse 3 is cited in Matthew 3:3, Mark 1:3, Luke 3:4-6, and John 1:23. 'All flesh is grass' echoes in 1 Peter 1:24-25. The incomparability of God (vv.18-26) parallels Romans 11:33-36. 'Wings like eagles' recalls Exodus 19:4 and Deuteronomy 32:11. The chapter inaugurates the 'Book of Consolation' (chs. 40-66) and forms the theological foundation for the Servant Songs to follow.

¹Comfort, comfort my people,
says your God.

²Speak tenderly to Jerusalem and cry out to her that her warfare is ended, that her iniquity is pardoned —

for she has received from the hand of the LORD double for all her sins.

³A voice cries out:
'In the wilderness, prepare the way of the LORD;
make straight in the desert
a highway for our God.'

⁴Every valley shall be lifted up,
and every mountain and hill made low;
the uneven ground shall become level,
and the rough places a plain.

⁵And the glory of the LORD shall be revealed, and all flesh shall see it together,
for the mouth of the LORD has spoken.

⁶A voice says, 'Cry out!'
And I said, 'What shall I cry?'
All flesh is grass,
and all its beauty is like the flower of the field.

⁷The grass withers, the flower fades
when the breath of the LORD blows upon it;
surely the people are grass.

⁸The grass withers, the flower fades,
but the word of our God will stand forever.

⁹Go up on a high mountain,
O Zion, herald of good news;
lift up your voice with strength,
O Jerusalem, herald of good news.
Lift it up, do not be afraid;
say to the cities of Judah,
'Behold your God!'

¹⁰Behold, the Lord GOD comes with might,
and His arm rules for Him;
behold, His reward is with Him,
and His recompense before Him.

¹¹He will tend His flock like a shepherd;
He will gather the lambs in His arms and carry them close to His heart;
He will gently lead those that are nursing.

¹²Who has measured the waters in the hollow of His hand and marked off the heavens with a span,
and enclosed the dust of the earth in a measure,

and weighed the mountains in scales
and the hills in a balance?

¹³Who has directed the Spirit of the LORD, or as His counselor has instructed Him?

¹⁴With whom did He take counsel and who gave Him understanding?
Who taught Him the path of justice,
or taught Him knowledge,
or showed Him the way of understanding?

¹⁵Behold, the nations are like a drop from a bucket and are counted as dust on the scales;
behold, He takes up the coastlands like fine dust.

¹⁶Lebanon would not suffice for fuel,
nor its beasts for a burnt offering.

¹⁷All the nations are as nothing before Him;
they are counted by Him as less than nothing and emptiness.

¹⁸To whom then will you liken God,
or what likeness will you compare to Him?

¹⁹An idol! A craftsman casts it, and a goldsmith overlays it with gold and casts for it silver chains.

²⁰He who is too poor for such an offering chooses wood that will not rot;
he seeks out a skilled craftsman to set up an idol that will not totter.

²¹Do you not know? Do you not hear?
Has it not been told you from the beginning?
Have you not understood from the foundations of the earth?

²²It is He who sits above the circle of the earth, and its inhabitants are like grasshoppers;
who stretches out the heavens like a curtain and spreads them like a tent to dwell in.

²³He brings princes to nothing and makes the rulers of the earth as emptiness.

²⁴Scarcely are they planted, scarcely sown, scarcely has their stem taken root in the earth,
when He blows on them and they wither,
and the storm carries them away like stubble.

²⁵'To whom then will you liken Me, that I should be his equal?'
says the Holy One.

²⁶Lift up your eyes on high and see:
Who created these?
He who brings out their host by number,
calling them all by name;
by the greatness of His might and because He is strong in power, not one is missing.

²⁷Why do you say, O Jacob,
and speak, O Israel,
'My way is hidden from the LORD,
and my right is disregarded by my God'?

²⁸Have you not known? Have you not heard?
The LORD is the everlasting God,
the Creator of the ends of the earth.
He does not faint or grow weary;
His understanding is unsearchable.

²⁹He gives power to the faint,
and to him who has no might He increases strength.

³⁰Even youths shall faint and be weary,
and young men shall fall exhausted.

³¹But those who wait upon the LORD shall renew their strength;
they shall mount up with wings like eagles;
they shall run and not be weary;
they shall walk and not faint.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The doubled imperative nachamú nachamú is a plural command — God addresses His heavenly council or the prophets collectively, commanding them to bring comfort to Israel. This opening word sets the tone for chapters 40-66.
2. 'Speak to the heart of Jerusalem' (al-lev) is an idiom meaning to speak tenderly or persuasively. 'Double for all her sins' does not mean excessive punishment but full, complete payment — the debt is settled.
3. The Masoretic accentuation links 'in the wilderness' with 'prepare the way' rather than with 'a voice cries.' The LXX and all four Gospels connect 'wilderness' with the voice itself. We follow the MT punctuation but note the NT reading. This verse is quoted in Matthew 3:3, Mark 1:3, Luke 3:4, and John 1:23.
4. The imagery is of ancient road-building for a royal procession. God Himself is the approaching king for whom the highway is prepared. The leveling of terrain is both literal (return from exile) and spiritual (removal of obstacles to God's coming).
5. 'All flesh' (kol-basar) encompasses all humanity, not Israel alone. The revelation of God's glory is universal in scope. 'The mouth of the LORD has spoken' is a prophetic authentication formula.
6. The prophet now speaks in first person — 'What shall I cry?' The Hebrew chesed here means 'beauty' or 'comeliness' rather than its more common meaning of 'steadfast love.' The LXX reads 'glory of man.' ¹ Peter 1:24 quotes this passage.

7. Ruach here is 'breath' or 'wind' rather than 'Spirit' — the hot desert wind (sirocco) that scorches vegetation overnight. The frailty of human life under divine breath becomes the foil for the permanence of God's word in the next verse.
8. The repetition from v.7 creates a refrain, but now pivots to the contrasting permanence of God's word. This verse is quoted in 1 Peter 1:25. The phrase yaqum le'olam means literally 'will rise/stand to eternity.'
9. The feminine participle mevasseret can mean 'Zion who brings good news' or 'one who brings good news to Zion.' We follow the reading where Zion is the herald, as the grammar more naturally supports. The root b-s-r (to bring good news) is the Hebrew precursor to the NT concept of 'gospel.'
10. The double hinneh (behold) emphasizes the dramatic arrival. God comes as both warrior (with might) and shepherd (v.11). His 'reward' and 'recompense' refer to the redeemed people He brings with Him. Cf. Isaiah 62:11 and Revelation 22:12.
11. The juxtaposition with v.10 is stunning: the arm (zero'a) that rules now gathers lambs. 'In his bosom' (becheiqo) means pressed against the chest. This verse anticipates Jesus' self-identification as the Good Shepherd (John 10:11). 'Those that are nursing' (alot) refers to ewes with young — God's care extends to the most vulnerable.
12. A sequence of rhetorical questions begins here (vv.12-14, 18, 21, 25-26, 28) — all expecting the answer 'only God.' The scale is staggering: the entire ocean fits in God's cupped hand; the cosmos spans His outstretched fingers. This cosmological hymn parallels Job 38-41.
13. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 11:34 and 1 Corinthians 2:16 to affirm the unsearchable nature of God's wisdom. Here ruach likely means 'mind' or 'Spirit' — no one has shaped God's thinking.
14. The four-fold question intensifies the incomparability of God. Unlike pagan deities who needed councils, the LORD requires no advisor. Mishpat (justice/judgment) here refers to the right ordering of creation.
15. Mar middeli — a drop clinging to the outside of a bucket, not even a full drop. The nations that seem so powerful are negligible before God. 'Coastlands' (iyyim) refers to distant maritime peoples, the edges of the known world.
16. Lebanon's vast cedar forests and abundant wildlife would be insufficient for an offering worthy of this God. The point is not that God demands enormous sacrifices but that no human offering could match His greatness.
17. The Hebrew escalates from 'ayin (nothing) to efes (zero/end) to tohu (formlessness, the same word used for the primordial chaos in Genesis 1:2). Nations are not just small — they approach non-existence before God.
18. This question launches the first idol polemic of Second Isaiah (vv.18-20), a theme that will intensify in chapters 41, 44, and 46. The incomparability question is devastating: after vv.12-17, the answer is obvious.
19. The prophet's tone shifts to biting satire. The process of idol-making is described in deliberate, mundane detail: casting, overlaying, chaining. The god must be chained down lest it topple — a withering commentary on its powerlessness.
20. Even the poor person tries to make the best idol possible — choosing durable wood, hiring a skilled craftsman — all so the idol 'will not totter.' The irony is thick: the idol's greatest achievement is simply not falling over.
21. Four rhetorical questions hammer the point: this knowledge is available, ancient, and foundational. 'From the foundations of the earth' (mosedot ha'aretz) means both 'since the earth was founded' and 'from the very structure of creation.'
22. Chug can mean circle, sphere, or vault. It describes the visible horizon where sky meets earth. God sits enthroned above it all. The tent imagery is striking — the entire cosmos is God's dwelling, stretched out as easily as a nomad pitches a tent.
23. Rozenim (princes/nobles) and shofetei eretz (judges/rulers of the earth) represent the highest human authority. God reduces them to 'ayin (nothing) and tohu (emptiness/chaos) — the same vocabulary used of the nations in v.17.
24. The triple af bal (scarcely/not even) creates a breathless rhythm: they barely exist before God's breath (nashaf) undoes them. The image echoes the grass metaphor of vv.6-8 but applied specifically to earthly rulers.
25. Now God Himself speaks in first person, repeating the question of v.18. 'The Holy One' (Qadosh) stands alone here without 'of Israel,' emphasizing God's absolute transcendence.
26. 'These' refers to the stars — God musters them like a commander calling roll. Each star has a name; not one fails to answer. The implied argument: if God knows every star by name, how can Israel say He has forgotten them? This sets up vv.27-31.
27. The double naming 'Jacob/Israel' addresses the entire covenant community. Their complaint — that God neither sees their suffering nor acts on their behalf — is the very thing this entire chapter refutes. Mishpati (my justice/right) suggests they feel God owes them vindication.
28. Elohei olam (everlasting God) echoes Genesis 21:33 where Abraham calls on this name. The God who does not faint (yi'af) or grow weary (yiga') is contrasted with youths who do (v.30). 'No searching' (ein cheqer) of His understanding means it is literally bottomless.
29. The paradox of divine power: the God who never tires (v.28) gives His strength to those who are exhausted. The Hebrew ein onim (no might) describes total depletion — and that is precisely where God meets them.
30. The strongest humans — youths in their prime — still collapse. The repetition of yi'afu (faint) and yig'u (weary) from v.28 is deliberate: what God never experiences, even the best of humanity cannot avoid.

31. Qavah means to wait with taut expectation, like a rope pulled tight. Yachalifu literally means 'exchange' — they trade their depleted human strength for God's inexhaustible power. The descending sequence (fly, run, walk) is theologically profound: the sustained daily walk of faithfulness requires more enduring grace than the dramatic moment of soaring. This verse has become one of the most memorized in all of Scripture.

Summary: We witness God summoning the nations to a courtroom trial. The chapter opens with a dramatic legal challenge: 'Keep silence before Me, O coastlands.' God declares that He has stirred up a conqueror from the east and the north — Cyrus, though unnamed — and challenges the idols to explain it. In the center of this cosmic trial, God turns to Israel with some of the tenderest words in Scripture: 'Fear not, for I am with you.' Israel is named God's servant, chosen and not cast off. The chapter closes with a devastating verdict against the idols: they are nothing, their works are emptiness, and the one who chooses them is an abomination.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 10 — 'Fear not, for I am with you; be not dismayed, for I am your God' — is among the most quoted comfort passages in the Bible. The courtroom metaphor (rib pattern) structures the entire chapter: God is both plaintiff and judge, the nations are defendants, and the idols are on trial for fraud. The phrase 'I stirred up one from the north' initiates the Cyrus thread that will run through chapters 44-45. Israel is called 'seed of Abraham my friend' (v.8), the only place in the Hebrew Bible where Abraham is explicitly called God's friend (ohavi, literally 'my lover').

Translation Friction: The identity of 'one from the east' and 'one from the north' (vv.2, 25) is debated but contextually refers to Cyrus of Persia, whose campaigns came from both directions. We leave the text as the prophet does — without naming Cyrus until 44:28. The phrase 'you worm Jacob' (v.14) is startling; the Hebrew tola'at is not merely 'worm' but specifically the crimson worm used for making red dye, adding a layer the English cannot fully capture. We retain 'worm' for its visceral force.

Connections: The trial-of-the-nations motif continues in chapters 43 and 44. 'Fear not, for I am with you' echoes Genesis 26:24 (to Isaac) and anticipates Matthew 28:20 ('I am with you always'). Abraham as 'my friend' connects to James 2:23 and 2 Chronicles 20:7. The servant designation for Israel (v.8) begins a thread that will distinguish between the nation-servant and the individual Servant of chapters 42, 49, 50, and 53. The Redeemer title (go'el, v.14) links to Ruth and anticipates its climactic use in Isaiah 43-44.

¹Keep silence before Me, O coastlands;
let the peoples renew their strength;
let them come near, then let them speak;
let us come together for judgment.

²Who stirred up one from the east whom righteousness meets at every step?
He gives up nations before him
and makes him tread down kings;
He makes them like dust before his sword,
like driven stubble before his bow.

³He pursues them and passes on safely,
by a path his feet have not traveled before.

⁴Who has performed and done this,
calling the generations from the beginning?
I, the LORD, the first,
and with the last — I am He.

⁵The coastlands have seen and are afraid;
the ends of the earth tremble.
They draw near and come.

⁶Each one helps his neighbor and says to his brother, 'Be strong!'

⁷The craftsman encourages the goldsmith, and he who smooths with the hammer encourages him who strikes the anvil, saying of the soldering, 'It is good.'
And they fasten it with nails
so that it will not totter.

⁸But you, Israel, are my servant,
Jacob whom I have chosen, offspring of Abraham my friend —

⁹you whom I took from the ends of the earth, and called from its farthest corners,
saying to you, 'You are my servant;
I have chosen you and not cast you off' —

¹⁰Fear not, for I am with you;
be not dismayed, for I am your God.
I will strengthen you, I will help you,
I will uphold you with my righteous right hand.

¹¹Behold, all who are incensed against you shall be put to shame and confounded;
those who strive against you shall be as nothing and shall perish.

¹²You shall seek them, but you will not find them —
those who contend with you.
Those who war against you shall be as nothing at all.

¹³For I, the LORD your God, hold your right hand;
it is I who say to you, 'Fear not,
I am the one who helps you.'

¹⁴Fear not, you worm Jacob,
you men of Israel!
I will help you, declares the LORD;
your Redeemer is the Holy One of Israel.

¹⁵Behold, I will make you a threshing sledge, new, sharp, and double-edged;
you shall thresh the mountains and crush them,
and you shall make the hills like chaff.

¹⁶You shall winnow them, and the wind shall carry them away,
and the storm shall scatter them.
And you shall rejoice in the LORD;
in the Holy One of Israel you shall glory.

¹⁷When the poor and needy seek water and there is none,
and their tongue is parched with thirst,
I the LORD will answer them;
I the God of Israel will not forsake them.

¹⁸I will open rivers on the bare heights and fountains in the midst of the valleys.
I will make the wilderness a pool of water and the dry land springs of water.

¹⁹I will put in the wilderness the cedar,
the acacia, the myrtle, and the olive.
I will set in the desert the cypress,
the plane tree, and the pine together,

²⁰that they may see and know,
may consider and understand together,
that the hand of the LORD has done this,
the Holy One of Israel has created it.

²¹Set forth your case, says the LORD;
bring your proofs, says the King of Jacob.

²²Let them bring them forward and tell us what is to happen.
Tell us the former things, what they are,
that we may consider them
and know their outcome;
or declare to us the things to come.

²³Tell us what is to come hereafter, that we may know that you are gods.
Do good or do harm,
that we may be dismayed and terrified together.

²⁴Behold, you are nothing,
and your work is less than nothing;
an abomination is he who chooses you.

²⁵I stirred up one from the north, and he has come,
from the rising of the sun one who calls on my name.
He shall trample rulers like mortar,
as the potter treads clay.

²⁶Who declared it from the beginning, that we might know, and beforehand, that we might say, 'He is right'?
There was none who declared it,
none who proclaimed it,
none who heard your words.

²⁷I was the first to say to Zion,
'Behold, here they are!'
and I give to Jerusalem a herald of good news.

²⁸But when I look, there is no one;
among these there is no counselor who, when I ask, gives an answer.

²⁹Behold, they are all a delusion;
their works are nothing;
their metal images are empty wind.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens as a courtroom drama. God is the plaintiff-judge who summons the coastlands (iyyim, the distant nations) to trial. 'Renew their strength' (yachalifu koach) uses the same phrase as 40:31, but here with legal force: 'gather your best arguments.' The invitation 'let us come together' is a legal summons.
2. The 'one from the east' is Cyrus of Persia, unnamed until 44:28. The Hebrew is ambiguous: tsedek (righteousness/victory) could be the man's character or God's vindication through him. We render it as righteousness meeting him, preserving the ambiguity. God claims credit for Cyrus's conquests — this is the core argument of the trial.
3. The conqueror's advance is so swift and divinely guided that he traverses paths he has never walked — yet passes in shalom (safety/wholeness). The image is of unstoppable, providentially directed conquest.
4. God answers His own question: He is the one directing history. 'I am He' (ani hu) is a divine self-identification formula that will recur throughout Second Isaiah (43:10, 13, 25; 46:4; 48:12). 'The first and with the last' claims sovereignty over the entire span of time.
5. The nations react with terror to Cyrus's advance — but rather than fleeing, they draw near. The next verses reveal why: they huddle together to make idols, seeking security in manufactured gods.
6. The mutual encouragement sounds admirable in isolation, but the context reveals it as tragic: they encourage one another in idol-making (vv.7). Their solidarity is misplaced — they strengthen each other in futility.
7. The idol-making process is again described with withering mundane detail (cf. 40:19-20). The god must be nailed down — lo yimmot, 'so it will not totter' — the same phrase used in 40:20. The nations' response to divine power is to manufacture more powerless gods.
8. The dramatic shift from the nations making idols to God addressing Israel is marked by ve'attah (but you). Israel is three things: God's servant ('avdi), God's chosen (becharticha), and Abraham's seed. The designation ohavi (my friend/lover) for Abraham appears only here; James 2:23 and 2 Chronicles 20:7 echo it. The Arabic name Khalil (friend) for Abraham derives from this tradition.
9. 'From the ends of the earth' refers to Abraham's call from Ur of the Chaldees (Genesis 12:1) and also to Israel's gathering from exile. 'Not cast you off (lo me'asticha) directly addresses the exiles' deepest fear: that God has permanently rejected them.
10. This verse is one of the most beloved in the Hebrew Bible. The structure is two negative commands ('fear not,' 'be not dismayed') followed by three positive promises ('I will strengthen,' 'I will help,' 'I will uphold'). The phrase bimin tsidqi ('with my righteous right hand') combines power (right hand) with covenant faithfulness (righteousness). This is not generic encouragement but a covenant oath.

11. The oracle shifts from comfort to vindication. Israel's enemies will become 'ayin (nothing) — the same fate as the nations before God (40:17). The vocabulary of shame (bosh, kalam) is legal: they will lose their case in the cosmic trial.
12. The escalation continues: enemies move from shame (v.11) to non-existence (v.12). The threefold designation — those incensed, those who strive, those who war — covers every form of opposition. They will simply vanish.
13. The image of God holding Israel's right hand is extraordinarily intimate — a parent holding a child's hand, guiding and steadying. The second 'fear not' (al-tira') reinforces v.10. 'I am the one who helps you' (ani azarticha) uses the prophetic perfect — so certain is the help that it is spoken of as already accomplished.
14. This is the third 'fear not' in four verses (vv.10, 13, 14). 'Worm' (tola'at) is the crimson/scarlet worm (coccus ilicis) used for making red dye — tiny and easily crushed, yet the source of royal color. 'Declares the LORD' renders ne'um YHWH, the prophetic oracle formula. Go'alekh (your Redeemer) introduces the kinsman-redeemer concept applied to God — the same institution that drives the book of Ruth. The Holy One of Israel is Isaiah's signature divine title.
15. The transformation is astonishing: the 'worm' of v.14 becomes a threshing sledge that crushes mountains. The morag charuts was a heavy wooden board studded with sharp stones or iron teeth, dragged over grain. Mountains and hills represent the great empires that oppressed Israel.
16. After threshing comes winnowing — the wind (ruach) carries away the chaff of the nations. The result is not military pride but worship: Israel will rejoice in the LORD and glory in the Holy One of Israel. Victory leads to doxology, not triumphalism.
17. The imagery shifts to the physical suffering of the exiles. Their thirst is both literal (desert journey) and spiritual (longing for God's presence). 'I will answer them' (e'ennem) — the God who summons nations to trial also hears the cry of the thirsty poor.
18. God's response to thirst is extravagant: rivers on hilltops where water cannot naturally flow, springs in the desert. This reverses the natural order — a new creation that anticipates the new exodus theme (cf. 43:19-20). The imagery echoes the wilderness provision of Exodus 17.
19. Seven trees — a number of completeness — will grow in the desert. These include both common and noble species: cedars and cypresses from Lebanon's mountains growing in the wasteland. The desert becoming a forest is a creation-reversal miracle.
20. Four verbs of perception — see, know, consider, understand — emphasize that the miracle's purpose is revelation. The desert transformation is not merely provision but testimony: the Holy One of Israel has created (bara') it, using the same verb reserved for divine creation in Genesis 1.
21. The trial resumes after the comfort oracle (vv.8-20). God now addresses the idols directly: 'Bring your case!' The title 'King of Jacob' (Melekh Ya'aqov) is rare and powerful — God is not merely Israel's God but their sovereign. The idols must now prove their divinity or stand condemned.
22. The test for true divinity is simple: can you explain the past or predict the future? The idols are challenged to do either. This predictive criterion — only the true God can foretell history — is the cornerstone of Isaiah's argument against idolatry.
23. The challenge intensifies: 'Do anything — good or evil — just do something!' The idols are challenged not merely to predict but to act. The taunt is devastating: even a harmful act would prove they exist as agents. They cannot manage even that.
24. The verdict is delivered: the idols are me'ayin (from nothing) and their work is me'afa' (from nothingness/a viper's breath). The one who chooses to worship them is to'evah (abomination) — a term of covenant revulsion. The case is closed.
25. The 'one from the north' and 'from the rising of the sun' (east) is Cyrus, whose empire spanned both directions. 'Calls on my name' is remarkable — a pagan king unknowingly serving God's purposes. The trampling imagery shows Cyrus as God's instrument of judgment against the nations.
26. The triple 'none' (ein) is the final condemnation of the idols. They declared nothing, proclaimed nothing, and no one ever heard them speak. The silence of the idols is their self-condemnation. Only the LORD announced Cyrus in advance.
27. God alone foretold these events to Zion. The mevasser (herald of good news) echoes 40:9, where Zion was the herald. The root b-s-r (good news) continues its journey toward the NT concept of gospel.
28. God looks among the idols and their worshipers for anyone who can respond — and finds no one. The silence is deafening. This sets up the devastating conclusion in v.29.
29. The chapter closes with a sweeping verdict: all the idols are 'aven (delusion/wickedness), their works are efes (nothing/zero), and their cast images are ruach vatohu (wind and chaos — tohu echoing the primordial formlessness of Genesis 1:2). The trial is over. The idols are condemned to non-existence.

Summary: We encounter the first of Isaiah's four Servant Songs (vv.1-4), one of the most important messianic passages in the Hebrew Bible. God presents His servant — one upon whom He has placed His Spirit, who will bring justice to the nations not by force but by quiet faithfulness. A bruised reed he will not break; a faintly burning wick he will not quench. The chapter then expands into a new song of praise (vv.10-13), God's promise to lead the blind by paths they have not known (v.16), and a devastating indictment of Israel as the blind and deaf servant (vv.18-25) who has been plundered because of covenant unfaithfulness.

What Makes This Remarkable: The First Servant Song (vv.1-4) is quoted in Matthew 12:18-21, where Jesus fulfills it by withdrawing rather than confronting His opponents. The servant's method is the opposite of worldly power: no shouting, no breaking, no extinguishing. The tension between the ideal servant (vv.1-4) and the blind servant Israel (vv.18-20) creates one of the great theological puzzles of Isaiah — who is this servant? The nation? A remnant? An individual? The answer unfolds across the four songs. Verse 9 declares that God announces 'new things' before they spring forth — the predictive criterion that condemned the idols in chapter 41.

Translation Friction: The identity of 'my servant' in v.1 versus 'the servant' in v.19 has generated centuries of interpretation. We let the text speak without forcing harmonization: the ideal servant of vv.1-4 stands in sharp contrast to the blind servant of vv.18-25. The Hebrew mishpat (vv.1, 3, 4) is rendered 'justice' throughout the song to maintain its legal-covenantal force, though it carries overtones of 'right order' and 'true religion.' We render lo yikheh (v.4) as 'he will not grow faint' rather than 'he will not be discouraged,' preserving the physical imagery that contrasts with the bruised reed and fading wick.

Connections: Matthew 12:18-21 quotes vv.1-4 as fulfilled in Jesus. The servant's Spirit-anointing (v.1) connects to Isaiah 11:2 and 61:1, and to Jesus' baptism (Matthew 3:16-17, where the Father's words echo both Isaiah 42:1 and Psalm 2:7). 'A light to the nations' (v.6) becomes a programmatic text for Paul's Gentile mission (Acts 13:47, 26:23). The 'new song' (v.10) connects to Psalms 96, 98, and Revelation 5:9. The blind-servant motif (vv.18-25) anticipates the healing of blindness as a messianic sign (Isaiah 35:5, Matthew 11:5).

¹Behold my servant, whom I uphold,
my chosen one, in whom my soul delights;
I have put my Spirit upon him;
he will bring forth justice to the nations.

²He will not cry aloud or lift up his voice, or make it heard in the street.

³A bruised reed he will not break,
and a faintly burning wick he will not quench;
he will faithfully bring forth justice.

⁴He will not grow faint or be crushed until he has established justice in the earth;
and the coastlands wait for his teaching.

⁵This is what the LORD says —
He who created the heavens and stretched them out, who spread out the earth and what comes from it,
who gives breath to the people on it and spirit to those who walk in it:

⁶I am the LORD; I have called you in righteousness;
I will take you by the hand and keep you;
I will give you as a covenant for the people,
a light for the nations,

⁷to open the eyes that are blind,
to bring out the prisoners from the dungeon,
from the prison those who sit in darkness.

⁸I am the LORD; that is my name;
my glory I give to no other,
nor my praise to carved idols.

⁹The former things — behold, they have come to pass, and new things I now declare;
before they spring forth I tell you of them.

¹⁰Sing to the LORD a new song,
his praise from the end of the earth,
you who go down to the sea, and all that fills it,
the coastlands and their inhabitants.

¹¹Let the desert and its cities lift up their voice,
the villages where Kedar dwells;
let the inhabitants of Sela sing for joy;
let them shout from the tops of the mountains.

¹²Let them give glory to the LORD and declare His praise in the coastlands.

¹³The LORD goes forth like a mighty warrior;
like a man of war He stirs up His zeal.
He cries out, He shouts aloud;
He shows Himself mighty against His foes.

¹⁴For a long time I have held my peace;
I have kept still and restrained myself.
Now I will cry out like a woman in labor;
I will gasp and pant.

¹⁵I will lay waste mountains and hills and dry up all their vegetation;
I will turn the rivers into islands and dry up the pools.

¹⁶And I will lead the blind
in a way they do not know,
in paths they have not known I will guide them.
I will turn the darkness before them into light,
the rough places into level ground.

These are the things I do,
and I do not forsake them.

¹⁷They are turned back and utterly put to shame,
those who trust in carved idols,
who say to metal images,
'You are our gods.'

¹⁸Hear, you deaf,
and look, you blind, that you may see!

¹⁹Who is blind but my servant,
or deaf as my messenger whom I send?
Who is blind as my dedicated one,
or blind as the servant of the LORD?

²⁰He sees many things, but does not observe them;
his ears are open, but he does not hear.

²¹The LORD was pleased, for His righteousness' sake, to magnify His teaching and make it glorious.

²²But this is a people plundered and looted;
they are all of them trapped in holes and hidden in prisons.
They have become plunder, with no one to rescue them,
and spoil, with no one to say, 'Restore!'

²³Who among you will give ear to this,
will pay attention and listen for the time to come?

²⁴Who gave Jacob over to the looter,
and Israel to the plunderers?
Was it not the LORD, against whom we have sinned,
in whose ways they would not walk,
and whose teaching they would not obey?

²⁵So He poured out on him the heat of His anger and the fury of war;
it set him on fire all around, but he did not understand;
it burned him up, but he did not take it to heart.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse inaugurates the First Servant Song (vv.1-4). God speaks in first person, presenting His servant to the heavenly court. 'In whom my soul delights' (ratsetah nafshi) echoes the language of the Father at Jesus' baptism (Matthew 3:17). The Spirit-endowment (natatti ruchi) parallels Isaiah 11:2 (the Branch) and 61:1 (the anointed preacher). Matthew 12:18-21 quotes this passage as fulfilled in Christ.
2. The servant's method is the opposite of the demagogue or the military conqueror. He does not shout in the marketplace or campaign for attention. This quiet authority stands in stark contrast to the noisy idol-makers of 41:6-7. Matthew 12:19 cites this as fulfilled when Jesus withdrew from confrontation.

3. The bruised reed and faintly burning wick are images of utter fragility. A cracked reed is useless; a dying wick gives no light. Most leaders would discard both. This servant preserves them. 'Faithfully' (le'emet, literally 'to truth') modifies 'bring forth justice' — the servant's justice is reliable, not arbitrary. Matthew 12:20 quotes this verse.
4. The verbs in v.4a mirror v.3: lo yikheh (he will not grow dim — like the wick) and lo yaruts (he will not be crushed — like the reed). The servant shares the condition of the broken but is not overcome by it. 'The coastlands wait for his teaching' (torah) extends the servant's mission universally. This is not Torah as Mosaic law but torah as the servant's authoritative instruction for all peoples.
5. A creation hymn introduces the servant's commission. God is identified by four creative acts: creating heavens, stretching them out, spreading the earth, and giving breath/spirit to its inhabitants. The God who made everything now speaks to commission His servant. 'This is what the LORD says' renders koh 'amar YHWH.
6. 'A covenant for the people' (berit 'am) is a compressed and extraordinary phrase — the servant does not merely mediate a covenant but is the covenant. 'A light for the nations' (or goyim) extends the mission far beyond Israel. Simeon quotes this in Luke 2:32 when he holds the infant Jesus. Paul claims it in Acts 13:47.
7. The servant's mission includes physical healing (opening blind eyes) and liberation (freeing prisoners). 'Those who sit in darkness' evokes both literal imprisonment and spiritual blindness. Jesus reads a parallel commission in Luke 4:18-19 from Isaiah 61. The irony deepens when Israel is later called the blind servant (v.19).
8. The divine self-assertion 'I am the LORD' (ani YHWH) anchors the servant's commission in God's exclusive sovereignty. 'My glory I give to no other' is the foundation of biblical monotheism — there is no power-sharing arrangement between the LORD and any other deity or image.
9. The 'former things' (rishonot) are earlier prophecies now fulfilled; the 'new things' (chadashot) are the fresh acts God is about to perform — the servant's mission, the new exodus, Cyrus's rise. God's ability to announce the future before it happens is the proof of His divinity that the idols failed to match (41:22-23).
10. The new song responds to the 'new things' of v.9. The call goes to the entire earth: seafarers, coastlands, desert dwellers (v.11), mountain peoples (v.11). All creation is summoned to worship because the servant's mission is universal.
11. Kedar refers to the Arabian desert tribes (descendants of Ishmael, Genesis 25:13). Sela (rock) likely refers to Petra or a rocky settlement. Even the most remote peoples — desert nomads and mountain dwellers — join the new song. The scope is deliberately universal.
12. The doxology continues: glory (kavod) to the LORD and His praise (tehillah) proclaimed even in the distant coastlands. The God whose glory will be revealed (40:5) now receives it from the farthest reaches of the earth.
13. After the quiet servant of vv.1-4, God Himself goes to war. The divine warrior motif (cf. Exodus 15:3) complements the servant's gentle mission. Qin'ah (jealousy/zeal) is God's fierce, protective passion for His people and His glory. The contrast between the servant's silence (v.2) and God's battle cry is deliberate.
14. God's silence is broken with the most visceral of images: a woman in labor. The Hebrew ef'eh (I will gasp/scream), eshom (I will pant), ve'esh'af (I will gasp) use sounds that mimic labored breathing. God's restraint (the exile period) gives way to active intervention — painful, urgent, and productive.
15. God's intervention reshapes geography itself. Mountains laid waste, rivers dried up — the same power that created (v.5) now deconstructs obstacles to His redemptive plan. This echoes the Exodus, where the sea was dried up for Israel's deliverance.
16. The blind whom God leads may be Israel (cf. vv.18-19) or humanity generally. The transformation — darkness to light, rough to level — echoes 40:3-4 (preparing the way). 'I do not forsake them' (lo azavtim) is a covenant promise that directly answers the exile's deepest fear.
17. The idol worshipers are 'turned back' (nasogu achor) — the opposite of forward progress on God's highway. While God leads the blind forward (v.16), the idol-trusters retreat in shame. The contrast between God's faithfulness and the idols' emptiness reaches its sharpest point.
18. The tone shifts sharply. God now addresses Israel, who should be hearing and seeing but cannot. The irony is painful: the servant is commissioned to open blind eyes (v.7), but Israel itself is blind and deaf. The commands are paradoxical — how can the deaf hear or the blind see? Only by divine intervention.
19. The tension between the ideal servant of vv.1-4 and the blind servant here is one of the most important theological dynamics in Isaiah. Israel is God's servant-nation, His messenger (mal'akhi), yet profoundly blind and deaf. Meshullam ('dedicated one' or 'covenant partner') intensifies the irony — the one most committed to God is the most oblivious. This tension drives the Servant Songs toward their resolution in chapters 49-53.
20. Israel has seen God's acts — exodus, Sinai, the prophets — but failed to observe (shamar, to guard/keep). Their ears are physically open (paqoach) but functionally closed. The paradox of seeing without perceiving echoes Isaiah 6:9-10 and is quoted by Jesus in Matthew 13:14.
21. Despite Israel's blindness, the LORD's purpose remains. He magnifies torah (teaching/law) — not because Israel earned it but for the sake of His own tsedek (righteousness/vindication). God's faithfulness does not depend on Israel's faithfulness.
22. The description of Israel's condition is heartbreaking: plundered, looted, trapped, imprisoned. The exile is not metaphorical but physical devastation. 'No one to rescue' and 'no one to say Restore' describes total abandonment — except that the God of vv.5-16 has not abandoned them.

23. The prophet addresses the exiles directly: will anyone actually listen? 'For the time to come' (le'achor) — for what follows, for the future. The plea is urgent: the deaf servant (v.19) is being asked again to hear.
24. The prophet answers his own question: it was the LORD who gave Israel over to plunder. The shift to first person plural ('we have sinned') is significant — the prophet includes himself in the national guilt. Then shifts to third person ('they would not walk') to describe the historical pattern. The cause of exile is covenant disobedience.
25. The chapter ends not with comfort but with indictment. God's wrath was poured out through military defeat (the fury of war), but even this did not penetrate Israel's blindness. 'He did not understand' and 'did not take it to heart' echo the deafness and blindness of vv.18-20. The chapter that began with the ideal servant's quiet justice ends with the blind servant on fire and unaware. The contrast demands resolution — which the following chapters will provide.

Summary: We hear God speak some of the most intimate words in all of Scripture to His exiled people. 'Fear not, for I have redeemed you; I have called you by name, you are mine.' Through fire and through water, God promises to be with Israel. Nations will be given as ransom because Israel is precious in God's eyes. The chapter moves from this tender opening to a second trial scene where Israel serves as God's witnesses against the idols (vv.8-13). Then comes the announcement of a new exodus — 'Behold, I am doing a new thing' (v.19) — that will surpass even the original deliverance from Egypt. The chapter closes with a devastating reversal: despite God's grace, Israel has burdened Him with sins, yet God declares, 'I am He who blots out your transgressions for my own sake' (v.25).

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 1 contains three of the most powerful clauses in prophetic literature: 'I have redeemed you,' 'I have called you by name,' and 'you are mine.' Each clause moves from action to intimacy to possession. Verse 4 — 'you are precious in my eyes, and honored, and I love you' — is God's direct declaration of love to a sinful, exiled people. The 'new thing' of v.19 became a programmatic text for the early church (2 Corinthians 5:17, Revelation 21:5). Verse 25 is among the clearest statements of grace in the Old Testament: God forgives not because Israel deserves it but 'for my own sake.'

Translation Friction: The phrase 'I give Egypt as your ransom' (v.3) raises difficult questions about whether God values Israel over other nations. We render it faithfully and note in the translator's notes that the language is covenantal rather than comparative — it speaks to God's redemptive commitment to His chosen people. The verb bara' (create) in v.1 applied to Israel (not just the cosmos) is theologically significant and we preserve it. 'Do not remember the former things' (v.18) is startling given the centrality of remembrance in Israelite faith — the prophet commands a forgetting that is actually a reorientation of hope.

Connections: The new exodus theme (vv.16-21) parallels the original exodus throughout: water parting, a way in the wilderness, enemies destroyed. Paul draws on 'new creation' language (2 Corinthians 5:17) that has roots here. 'You are my witnesses' (v.10) anticipates Jesus' commission in Acts 1:8. 'I am He who blots out your transgressions' (v.25) connects to Psalm 51:1-2, Micah 7:18-19, and the NT theology of justification. The go'el (Redeemer) title (v.14) continues from 41:14.

¹But now, this is what the LORD says —
He who created you, O Jacob,
He who formed you, O Israel:
Fear not, for I have redeemed you;
I have called you by name, you are mine.

²When you pass through the waters, I will be with you;
and through the rivers, they shall not overwhelm you;
when you walk through fire you shall not be burned,
and the flame shall not consume you.

³For I am the LORD your God,
the Holy One of Israel, your Savior.
I give Egypt as your ransom,
Cush and Seba in exchange for you.

⁴Because you are precious in my eyes,
and honored, and I love you,
I give men in return for you,
peoples in exchange for your life.

⁵Fear not, for I am with you;
I will bring your offspring from the east,
and from the west I will gather you.

⁶I will say to the north, Give up, and to the south, Do not withhold;
bring my sons from afar
and my daughters from the ends of the earth,

⁷everyone who is called by my name, whom I created for my glory,
whom I formed and made.

⁸Bring out the people who are blind, yet have eyes, who are deaf, yet have ears!

⁹All the nations gather together,
and the peoples assemble.
Who among them can declare this and tell us the former things?
Let them bring their witnesses to prove them right;
let them hear and say, 'It is true.'

¹⁰'You are my witnesses,' declares the LORD,
'and my servant whom I have chosen,
that you may know and believe me and understand that I am He.
Before me no god was formed,
nor shall there be any after me.'

¹¹I, I am the LORD,
and besides me there is no savior.

¹²I declared and saved and proclaimed,
when there was no strange god among you;
and you are my witnesses, declares the LORD,
and I am God.

¹³Also from this day forward I am He;
there is none who can deliver from my hand.
I work, and who can turn it back?

¹⁴This is what the LORD says,
your Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel:
'For your sake I send to Babylon and bring them all down as fugitives, even the Chaldeans, in the ships in which they rejoice.'

¹⁵I am the LORD, your Holy One,
the Creator of Israel, your King.

¹⁶This is what the LORD says —
He who makes a way in the sea,
a path in the mighty waters,

¹⁷who brings out chariot and horse,
army and warrior;
they lie down together, they cannot rise;
they are extinguished, quenched like a wick.

¹⁸Remember not the former things,
nor consider the things of old.

¹⁹Behold, I am doing a new thing;
now it springs forth — do you not perceive it?
I will make a way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert.

²⁰The wild beasts will honor me,
the jackals and the ostriches,
for I give water in the wilderness,
rivers in the desert,
to give drink to my chosen people.

²¹the people whom I formed for myself that they might declare my praise.

²²Yet you did not call upon me, O Jacob;
but you have been weary of me, O Israel!

²³You have not brought me your sheep for burnt offerings, or honored me with your sacrifices.
I have not burdened you with grain offerings,
or wearied you with frankincense.

²⁴You have not bought me sweet cane with money, or satisfied me with the fat of your sacrifices.
But you have burdened me with your sins;

you have wearied me with your iniquities.

²⁵I, I am He who blots out your transgressions for my own sake, and I will not remember your sins.

²⁶Put me in remembrance; let us argue together;
set forth your case, that you may be proved right.

²⁷Your first father sinned,
and your mediators transgressed against me.

²⁸Therefore I profaned the princes of the sanctuary, and I gave Jacob over to utter destruction and Israel to reviling.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse follows immediately after the devastating indictment of 42:25. The ve'attah (but now) marks the great pivot: despite Israel's blindness and burning, God speaks redemption. 'Created' (bara') and 'formed' (yatsar) use creation vocabulary — Israel is God's deliberate handiwork. The three declarations build: redeemed (legal act), called by name (personal knowledge), 'you are mine' (covenant possession). This is what the LORD says.
2. The waters evoke the Red Sea (Exodus 14) and the Jordan (Joshua 3); the fire evokes Daniel's three friends (Daniel 3). The promise is not that Israel will avoid these trials but that God will be present through them. 'I will be with you' (itti-ani) is the core of the Immanuel promise (Isaiah 7:14). The poetic structure is chiasmic: waters/rivers, fire/flame.
3. The Holy One of Israel is also 'your Savior' (moshi'ekha). The ransom language is striking: God gives Egypt, Cush (Ethiopia/Nubia), and Seba as the kofer (ransom price) for Israel. Historically this may refer to Cyrus's conquests of these regions. Theologically it declares that God values Israel supremely within His covenant purposes.
4. This is God's direct declaration of love — rare in its explicitness. Yaqarta (precious/costly), nikhbadta (honored/weighty), ahavticha (I love you) — three words that demolish any notion of God as distant or indifferent. The first-person emphasis (va'ani, 'and I myself') makes the love declaration unmistakably personal.
5. Another 'fear not' oracle (cf. 41:10, 13, 14). The gathering from east and west envisions a regathering of exiles scattered across the known world. The scope anticipates the universal regathering promised in Isaiah 11:11-12.
6. God commands the four directions (east, west in v.5; north, south here) to release His children. The language is parental — 'my sons' (banai) and 'my daughters' (benotai). The compass points represent totality: wherever Israel is scattered, God will reclaim them.
7. Three creation verbs — bara' (created), yatsar (formed), asah (made) — echo Genesis 1-2. Israel exists not by accident but by divine design, and their purpose is God's glory (likhvodi). 'Called by my name' means they bear God's identity — they are His representation on earth.
8. The paradox of Israel continues from 42:18-20: they have eyes but are blind, ears but are deaf. Yet God still summons them — not to condemn but to serve as witnesses (v.10). Even blind Israel has seen enough of God's works to testify.
9. The second trial scene (cf. 41:1, 21). The nations are again assembled and challenged: can any of their gods declare the future or explain the past? 'Let them bring their witnesses' — the idols must produce evidence. They cannot. But God has witnesses: Israel.
10. 'You are my witnesses' (attem edai) — Israel's role in the cosmic trial is to testify from their experience of God's faithfulness. 'Declares the LORD' renders ne'um YHWH. The threefold purpose — know, believe, understand — describes progressive deepening of faith. 'I am He' (ani hu) is the most concentrated monotheistic declaration in the Hebrew Bible. Jesus' 'I am' (ego eimi) statements in John's Gospel echo this formula.
11. The doubled anokhi anokhi (I, I) is emphatic: 'I and no other am the LORD.' Ein mibbal'adai moshia' — 'there is no savior besides me.' The claim is absolute: salvation is available from one source only. Hosea 13:4 makes the same claim. The NT applies this exclusively to Jesus (Acts 4:12).
12. Three past-tense verbs — declared, saved, proclaimed — point to God's historical track record with Israel. 'When there was no strange god among you' recalls the early period when Israel worshiped the LORD alone. Their experience of God's undivided faithfulness qualifies them as witnesses. 'Declares the LORD' renders ne'um YHWH.
13. Gam-miyyom — 'even from today/from the day' — extends the claim from past (v.12) into the eternal future. 'No one delivers from my hand' asserts absolute sovereignty. 'Who can turn it back?' (mi yeshivenah) — no power can reverse God's action. This is the divine guarantee behind every promise in this chapter.

14. God is identified by two titles: 'your Redeemer' (go'alkhem) and 'the Holy One of Israel.' The Redeemer sends judgment to Babylon — the captor itself will become captive. 'Brings them all down as fugitives' (barichim, fleeing ones/bars — the text is difficult) reverses Babylon's role: the prisoner becomes the prisoner. This is what the LORD says.
15. Four titles in rapid succession: the LORD, your Holy One, the Creator of Israel, your King. The progression moves from covenant name to moral character to creative power to sovereign authority. 'Creator of Israel' (bore' Yisra'el) again uses the verb reserved for divine creation.
16. The Exodus is evoked without being named: 'a way in the sea' can only be the parting of the Red Sea (Exodus 14). God is identified by His greatest past act of salvation — but only as prelude to announcing something even greater (vv.18-19). This is what the LORD says.
17. Pharaoh's army is described without naming Pharaoh: chariots, horses, army, warriors — all 'extinguished like a wick' (pishtah). The wick image connects to the servant's 'faintly burning wick' in 42:3. Egypt's military power guttered out in the sea. The past tense recounts history as evidence of God's power.
18. This is a shocking command in a tradition built on remembrance (zakhor). After evoking the Exodus (vv.16-17), God says: stop looking back. The 'former things' (rishonot) include even the Exodus itself. Something so new is coming that the greatest act of the past pales beside it.
19. This is one of the most quoted verses in Isaiah. The 'new thing' (chadashah) is the new exodus — return from Babylon — but its language reaches beyond any single historical event into the eschatological future. 'Do you not perceive it?' challenges Israel's blindness (42:18-20). The way in the wilderness and rivers in the desert reverse the harshness of the original wilderness wandering.
20. Even the animals of the desert — jackals and ostriches, creatures of desolation — will honor God when water flows in the wasteland. Creation itself responds to God's redemptive acts. 'My chosen people' (ammi bechiri) echoes the servant language of 42:1.
21. The purpose of Israel's existence is stated with crystalline clarity: to declare God's praise (tehillah). Yatsarti li — 'I formed for myself' — uses the potter verb (yatsar), emphasizing that Israel is God's deliberate handiwork, shaped for a specific purpose.
22. The tone shifts sharply. After declaring Israel's purpose (v.21), God indicts their failure. 'You have been weary of me' (yaga'ta bi) is a stunning accusation: the people grew tired of the God who never tires (40:28). The roles are reversed — Israel wearies of God rather than God wearying of Israel.
23. God clarifies: He did not exhaust Israel with excessive ritual demands. The requirements were not burdensome. Yet Israel failed even these. The irony is that Israel was 'weary' of God (v.22) while God had not 'wearied' them (hoga'ticha) with demands.
24. The pivot word is he'evadtani ('you have burdened/enslaved me') — the same root as 'eved (servant). Israel has made God their servant by loading Him with sins. 'You have wearied me' (hoga'tani) with iniquities reverses the earlier statement: God did not weary Israel with incense (v.23), but Israel has wearied God with sin. This is one of the most remarkable anthropomorphisms in the Hebrew Bible.
25. This verse is one of the most powerful declarations of grace in the Hebrew Bible. The doubled 'I, I' (anokhi anokhi) insists that forgiveness comes from God's initiative alone. 'For my own sake' (lema'ani) grounds forgiveness in God's character, not Israel's worthiness. 'I will not remember' (lo ezkor) is not forgetfulness but a sovereign decision to treat sin as non-existent. This anticipates Jeremiah 31:34 and Hebrews 8:12.
26. The courtroom language returns, but now with irony: God invites Israel to make their case — 'prove that you deserve acquittal.' The invitation is rhetorical; after vv.22-24, Israel has no defense. Yet God has already granted acquittal (v.25) before the case is even argued. Grace precedes the verdict.
27. 'Your first father' (avicha harishon) likely refers to Jacob/Israel, whose name the nation bears, or possibly to Abraham or Adam. 'Your mediators' (melitsekha) — priests, prophets, or intercessors — also failed. The point is comprehensive: from the founding ancestor through the spiritual leadership, the pattern is transgression.
28. The consequences are stated bluntly: even the holy leaders (sarei qodesh — temple princes/priests) were profaned, and Jacob was given to chere (the ban, utter destruction — the same word used for the devoted destruction of Jericho). Israel became an object of scorn. Yet this devastating verse follows v.25's promise of forgiveness — the judgment is real but not final.

Summary: We move from the grace declaration of chapter 43 into a chapter of extraordinary range: the promise of the Spirit poured out like water on dry ground (vv.1-5), the majestic 'I am the first and I am the last' declaration (v.6), the most extended and biting idol-satire in all of Scripture (vv.9-20), the tender assurance that God has swept away Israel's transgressions like a cloud (v.22), and the stunning conclusion where Cyrus is named by name as God's shepherd who will decree Jerusalem's rebuilding (v.28). The chapter pulses between tenderness and mockery, between the living God who creates and redeems and the absurdity of worshiping what your own hands have carved.

What Makes This Remarkable: The idol-satire of vv.9-20 is the longest and most detailed in the Hebrew Bible. The prophet follows the process from tree to workshop to finished god with devastating irony: a man cuts down a tree, burns half for cooking his dinner, warms himself by the fire, and then carves the remaining half into a god before which he bows and prays 'Deliver me, for you are my god.' The absurdity is left to speak for itself. Verse 6 — 'I am the first and I am the last; besides me there is no God' — is one of the most important monotheistic declarations in Scripture, echoed in Revelation 1:17, 2:8, and 22:13. Verse 28 names Cyrus over a century before his rise — the most dramatic prophetic naming in the Hebrew Bible.

Translation Friction: The extended idol-satire requires careful rendering to maintain its rhetorical force without becoming cartoonish. The prophet's mockery is not crude but surgical — each detail is chosen to expose the logical absurdity of idolatry. We preserve the step-by-step narration. The naming of Cyrus (v.28) as God's 'shepherd' (ro'i) — a title usually reserved for Davidic kings — creates theological tension that the prophet does not resolve here. We render it straightforwardly and let the tension stand.

Connections: 'I am the first and the last' (v.6) connects to 41:4 and is claimed by Christ in Revelation 1:17 and 22:13. The Spirit poured out (v.3) anticipates Joel 2:28-29 and Pentecost (Acts 2). The idol-satire connects to Psalm 115:4-8, Jeremiah 10:1-16, and Paul's argument in Romans 1:22-23. 'I have swept away your transgressions like a cloud' (v.22) parallels 43:25. Cyrus as 'shepherd' (v.28) stands in tension with the Davidic shepherd tradition (Ezekiel 34, Psalm 23) and will be further developed in 45:1 where Cyrus is called God's 'anointed' (mashiach).

¹But now hear, O Jacob my servant,
Israel whom I have chosen!

²This is what the LORD says —
He who made you, who formed you from the womb
and will help you:
Fear not, O Jacob my servant,
Jeshurun whom I have chosen.

³For I will pour water on the thirsty land,
and streams on the dry ground;
I will pour my Spirit upon your offspring,
and my blessing on your descendants.

⁴They shall spring up among the grass like willows by flowing streams.

⁵This one will say, 'I am the LORD's,'
another will call himself by the name of Jacob, and another will write on his hand, 'The LORD's,'
and take the name of Israel.

⁶This is what the LORD says —
the King of Israel and his Redeemer,
the LORD of hosts:
I am the first and I am the last;
besides me there is no God.

⁷Who is like me? Let him proclaim it.
Let him declare and set it before me,
since I appointed an ancient people.

Let them declare what is to come,
and what will happen.

⁸Fear not, nor be afraid;
have I not told you from of old and declared it?
And you are my witnesses!
Is there a God besides me?
There is no Rock; I know not any.

⁹All who fashion idols are nothing,
and the things they delight in do not profit.
Their witnesses neither see nor know,
that they may be put to shame.

¹⁰Who fashions a god or casts an idol that is profitable for nothing?

¹¹Behold, all his companions shall be put to shame,
and the craftsmen are only human.
Let them all assemble, let them stand forth;
they shall be terrified and put to shame together.

¹²The ironsmith takes a cutting tool and works over the coals.
He fashions it with hammers and works it with his strong arm.
He becomes hungry, and his strength fails;
he drinks no water and is faint.

¹³The carpenter stretches a line;
he marks it out with a pencil.
He shapes it with planes and marks it with a compass.
He shapes it into the figure of a man,
with the beauty of a man,
to dwell in a house.

¹⁴He cuts down cedars,
or he chooses a cypress tree or an oak and lets it grow strong among the trees of the forest.
He plants a cedar and the rain nourishes it.

¹⁵Then it becomes fuel for a man.
He takes a part of it and warms himself;
he kindles a fire and bakes bread.
Also he makes a god and worships it;
he makes it an idol and falls down before it.

¹⁶Half of it he burns in the fire.
 Over the half he eats meat;
 he roasts it and is satisfied.
 Also he warms himself and says,
 'Aha, I am warm, I have seen the fire!'

¹⁷And the rest of it he makes into a god, his idol; and falls down to it and worships it.
 He prays to it and says,
 'Deliver me, for you are my god!'

¹⁸They know not, nor do they discern, for their eyes are shut so that they cannot see,
 and their hearts so that they cannot understand.

¹⁹No one considers, nor is there knowledge or discernment to say,
 'Half of it I burned in the fire;
 I also baked bread on its coals;
 I roasted meat and ate.
 And shall I make the rest of it an abomination?
 Shall I fall down before a block of wood?'

²⁰He feeds on ashes; a deluded heart has led him astray, and he cannot deliver himself or say,
 'Is there not a lie in my right hand?'

²¹Remember these things, O Jacob, and Israel, for you are my servant;
 I formed you; you are my servant;
 O Israel, you will not be forgotten by me.

²²I have swept away your transgressions like a cloud,
 and your sins like mist;
 return to me, for I have redeemed you.

²³Sing, O heavens, for the LORD has done it!
 Shout, O depths of the earth!
 Break forth into singing, O mountains,
 O forest, and every tree in it!
 For the LORD has redeemed Jacob,
 and will be glorified in Israel.

²⁴This is what the LORD says,
 your Redeemer, who formed you from the womb:
 I am the LORD, who made all things,
 who alone stretched out the heavens,
 who spread out the earth by myself —

²⁵who frustrates the signs of liars and makes fools of diviners, who turns wise men back
and makes their knowledge foolish;

²⁶who confirms the word of His servant and fulfills the counsel of His messengers, who says of Jerusalem, 'She shall be inhabited,'
and of the cities of Judah, 'They shall be built,
and I will raise up their ruins';

²⁷who says to the deep, 'Be dry;
I will dry up your rivers';

²⁸who says of Cyrus, 'He is my shepherd, and he shall fulfill all my purpose';
saying of Jerusalem, 'She shall be built,'
and of the temple, 'Your foundation shall be laid.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ve'attah (but now) again marks a transition from judgment (43:27-28) to grace. The servant and chosen designations from 41:8-9 return. Despite everything recounted in chapter 43, God still claims Jacob as 'my servant' and Israel as 'my chosen.'
2. This is what the LORD says. Jeshurun (from yashar, 'upright') is a rare poetic name for Israel, used only in Deuteronomy 32-33 and here. It is a term of endearment — 'my upright one' — describing Israel not as they are but as God intends them to be. 'Formed you from the womb' (yotsercha mibbeten) speaks of prenatal divine purpose.
3. The pouring of water and the pouring of the Spirit are set in deliberate parallel. The physical and spiritual are not separated in Hebrew thought — when God acts, all of creation responds. 'Your offspring' (zar'ekha) and 'your descendants' (tse'etsa'ekha) promise that the Spirit's work will extend across generations. Joel 2:28-29 and Acts 2:17 fulfill this promise.
4. The Spirit-watered descendants will flourish like willows (aravim) beside watercourses — a picture of effortless, abundant growth. The contrast with the withering grass of 40:6-8 is striking: where God's breath withered grass, God's Spirit makes His people flourish.
5. The Spirit's outpouring produces voluntary allegiance: people freely declare themselves God's own. 'Write on his hand' (yikhtov yado) may refer to a tattoo or inscription of devotion — marking oneself as belonging to the LORD. The voluntary nature of these declarations contrasts with the idols that must be nailed down (41:7). Some will even take the name Israel — Gentile inclusion is implied.
6. God is identified by four titles: the LORD, King of Israel, his Redeemer (go'alo), and LORD of hosts (YHWH tseva'ot). The declaration 'I am the first and I am the last' (cf. 41:4, 48:12) asserts total sovereignty over time. 'Besides me there is no God' is the definitive monotheistic statement. Jesus claims these words in Revelation 1:17 and 22:13. This is what the LORD says.
7. The challenge to rival deities continues: 'Who is like me?' (mi khamoni). The test remains predictive: can any god declare the future? 'Since I appointed an ancient people' refers to God's establishment of Israel — no other deity can point to such a track record of fulfilled promises.
8. 'You are my witnesses' (attem edai) repeats the courtroom commission from 43:10, 12. 'Is there a God besides me?' expects the answer 'No.' 'There is no Rock' (ein tsur) uses one of the great divine titles from Deuteronomy 32. God's own testimony — 'I know not any' (bal yada'ti) — is the final word: even God, who knows everything, knows of no other deity.
9. The great idol-satire begins (vv.9-20). The idol-makers are tohu (formlessness/nothing — Genesis 1:2 vocabulary). Their 'delightful things' (chamudeihem) — the idols they treasure — yield no profit. The idols' own 'witnesses' are blind and ignorant — the opposite of Israel as God's seeing witnesses (43:10).
10. The rhetorical question is dripping with contempt: who would manufacture a god that cannot deliver? The verb yatsar (fashion/form) — used for God's creation of Israel (43:1, 7) — is now applied to human hands making a deity. The craftsman usurps the Creator's role, but his product is worthless.
11. The idol-makers' companions (those who commission and worship the idols) will share in the shame. 'The craftsmen are only human' (hemmah me'adam) — the devastating simplicity: the maker of the god is merely a man. Let them all stand trial together — the verdict is already decided.

12. The satire begins its step-by-step exposure. The smith is a physical laborer who gets hungry, thirsty, and exhausted — the god's creator is weaker than the god is supposed to be. The irony: the craftsman who 'works with his strong arm' (bizro'a kocho) contrasts with God's arm that never tires (40:28-31).
13. The woodworker's process is described with technical precision: line, pencil (sered), planes (maqtsu'ot), compass (mechugah). Every step is rational craftsmanship — which makes the irrational conclusion all the more devastating. The god is shaped 'into the figure of a man' (ketavnit ish) — the image of its maker. And its destiny? 'To dwell in a house' — it cannot even leave on its own.
14. The prophet traces the god's origin back further — to a tree in the forest. The tree was planted, watered by rain (which God sends, not the idol), and grew among other trees. The raw material for the god is entirely dependent on the true God for its existence. The irony compounds with each detail.
15. This is the heart of the satire. The same tree serves three purposes: fuel for warmth, fuel for cooking, and raw material for a god. The prophet makes no editorial comment — the absurdity speaks for itself. The verb yisgad (falls down/prostrates) uses a word of ultimate reverence applied to a piece of firewood.
16. The detail intensifies: 'half of it' (chetsyo) is burned for domestic purposes. The man is comfortable, well-fed, and warm. He exclaims with satisfaction — 'Aha!' (he'ach). The mundane contentment makes the next verse's absurdity all the more stunning.
17. The climax of the satire: the 'rest' (she'erit) — the leftover wood after cooking and warming — becomes a god. The man falls down (yisgad), worships (yishtachavu), and prays (yitpallel) to it. His prayer — 'Deliver me, for you are my god' — is addressed to the remaining half of his firewood. The prophet achieves maximum devastation through minimum commentary.
18. The prophet now offers theological diagnosis: idolatry is not merely foolish but a form of blindness. 'Their eyes are shut' (tach mere'ot) — plastered over, sealed shut. The blindness is both self-inflicted and judicially imposed. This echoes 6:9-10 and 42:18-20.
19. The prophet puts the self-aware question into the idol-maker's mouth — the question he should ask but never does. 'Shall I make the rest of it an abomination (to'evah)?' The word to'evah (abomination) is the same used for idolatry throughout Deuteronomy. 'A block of wood' (bul ets) strips away all pretense — this is lumber, nothing more.
20. 'Feeds on ashes' (ro'eh efer) is a metaphor for pursuing what is worthless — ashes are the residue of the very fire that should have revealed the wood's true nature. 'A deluded heart' (lev hutal) — the heart has been 'turned aside' by self-deception. The final question — 'Is there not a lie in my right hand?' — is the question the idolater can never ask, because asking it would shatter the delusion. The satire ends not with a bang but with the quiet horror of self-deception.
21. After the idol-satire, God turns back to Israel: 'Remember these things' — let the absurdity of idolatry sink in. Then the double assurance: 'you are my servant' (twice). 'You will not be forgotten by me' (lo tinnasheni) — the God who remembers every star by name (40:26) will not forget His people.
22. This verse parallels 43:25 but adds the cloud imagery. The 'av (thick cloud) and 'anan (cloud/mist) represent sin's apparent enormity — and its actual fragility before God's grace. 'Return to me' (shuvah elai) is the call of repentance, but grounded in the prior act of redemption: 'for I have redeemed you' (ki ge'alticha). Grace precedes and enables the return.
23. A cosmic hymn of praise erupts: heavens, earth's depths, mountains, forests, individual trees — all creation celebrates God's redemption of Jacob. This is the fitting response to vv.21-22: when God forgives, the universe sings. The verb ga'al (redeemed) — the kinsman-redeemer's act — triggers creation's joy.
24. God is again identified as Redeemer (go'alekha) and Creator. 'Who alone' (levaddi) and 'by myself' (me'itti) emphatically exclude any assistant in creation — neither another god nor a craftsman helped. This directly refutes ancient Near Eastern creation myths involving multiple deities. This is what the LORD says.
25. God overturns all rival claims to knowledge. Baddim (liars/empty talkers), qosemim (diviners), and chakhamim (wise men) — Babylon's intellectual elite — are exposed as frauds. Their signs fail, their divinations are madness, their wisdom is turned backward. Only God's word stands (40:8).
26. In contrast to the frustrated liars (v.25), God confirms the word of His servant (singular — possibly the prophet himself) and fulfills His messengers' counsel. The specific promise: Jerusalem will be inhabited again and Judah's cities rebuilt. The ruins (chorvotaha) of the exile will be restored.
27. The 'deep' (tsulah) evokes both the primordial deep of creation (tehom, Genesis 1:2) and the Red Sea crossing. God commands cosmic waters as easily as He commands nations. The drying of rivers may also refer to the strategic drying of the Euphrates that enabled Cyrus's capture of Babylon (cf. the historical accounts of Cyrus diverting the river).
28. This is the first time Cyrus is named in Scripture. The 'one from the east' (41:2) and 'one from the north' (41:25) now has a name: Koresh. Calling him 'my shepherd' (ro'i) is theologically provocative — David was God's shepherd-king (2 Samuel 5:2), and God Himself is the shepherd (Psalm 23:1, Isaiah 40:11). Now a Persian emperor receives the title. The specific promise — Jerusalem rebuilt, temple foundations laid — was fulfilled in 538 BC when Cyrus issued his decree (Ezra 1:1-4).

Summary: God addresses Cyrus the Persian by name as His 'anointed' (mashiach) and announces that He alone is God — there is no other. The chapter contains the Hebrew Bible's most explicit monotheistic declarations and culminates in a universal invitation: every knee shall bow.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 1 is theologically explosive: a pagan emperor is called mashiach, the title reserved for Israel's divinely appointed leaders. God names Cyrus before Cyrus knows God (v. 4). The declaration 'I form light and create darkness, I make peace and create calamity' (v. 7) attributes everything — including disaster — to God alone, rejecting any dualistic theology. The repeated 'I am the LORD, and there is no other' (vv. 5, 6, 18, 22) is monotheism's strongest articulation in the Hebrew Bible.

Translation Friction: The word ra (v. 7) can mean 'evil,' 'calamity,' or 'disaster.' We rendered it 'calamity' because the context is about God's sovereignty over events, not moral evil — the contrast is with shalom ('peace/well-being'), not with moral goodness. The phrase 'every knee shall bow, every tongue shall swear' (v. 23) is cited by Paul in Philippians 2:10-11 with christological application; we note the connection without importing it into the Hebrew rendering.

Connections: Cyrus is named in 44:28 as God's shepherd; here he receives the mashiach title. The monotheistic declarations connect to Deuteronomy 4:35, 39 and Isaiah 43:10-11. Paul cites v. 23 in Philippians 2:10-11 and Romans 14:11. The potter-clay image (v. 9) recurs in Jeremiah 18:1-6 and Romans 9:20-21.

¹This is what the LORD says to His anointed, to Cyrus,
whose right hand I have grasped to subdue nations before him and to strip kings of their armor, to open doors before him
so that gates will not be shut:

²I will go before you
and level the mountains.
I will shatter bronze doors and cut through iron bars.

³I will give you treasures of darkness and hidden wealth of secret places,
so that you may know that I am the LORD,
the God of Israel, who calls you by name.

⁴For the sake of my servant Jacob,
and Israel my chosen one,
I call you by your name;
I give you a title of honor,
though you do not know me.

⁵I am the LORD, and there is no other;
there is no God besides me.
I arm you, though you do not know me,

⁶so that from the rising of the sun to its setting people may know there is none besides me.
I am the LORD, and there is no other.

⁷I form light and create darkness;
I make peace and create calamity.
I, the LORD, do all these things.

⁸Rain down, O heavens, from above,
and let the skies pour down righteousness.
Let the earth open
and salvation spring forth;
let righteousness sprout alongside it.
I, the LORD, have created it.

⁹Woe to the one who contends with his Maker —
a pot among earthen pots!
Does the clay say to the one who shapes it,
'What are you making?'

¹⁰Woe to the one who says to a father,
'What are you begetting?'
or to a woman,
'What are you laboring to bring forth?'

¹¹This is what the LORD says —
the Holy One of Israel and its Maker:
'Ask me about what is to come concerning my children;
will you command me about the work of my hands?'

¹²I made the earth and created humanity upon it.
My own hands stretched out the heavens,
and I commanded all their host.

¹³I have stirred him up in righteousness, and I will make all his paths straight.
He will rebuild my city
and set my exiles free —
not for a price and not for a bribe,
says the LORD of Hosts.

¹⁴This is what the LORD says:
The wealth of Egypt and the merchandise of Cush and the Sabeans, tall of stature, will come over to you and be yours.
They will follow behind you,
coming in chains.
They will bow down to you and plead with you:

'Surely God is with you,
and there is no other — no other god.'

¹⁵Truly, You are a God who hides Himself,
O God of Israel, the Savior.

¹⁶They are put to shame, all of them, disgraced together;
the makers of idols go off in humiliation.

¹⁷Israel is saved by the LORD with an everlasting salvation.
You will not be put to shame or disgraced to all eternity.

¹⁸For this is what the LORD says —
He who created the heavens, He is God;
He who formed the earth and made it, He established it.
He did not create it to be chaos —
He formed it to be inhabited:
I am the LORD, and there is no other.

¹⁹I have not spoken in secret,
in a land of darkness.
I did not say to Jacob's offspring,
'Seek me in chaos.'
I, the LORD, speak what is right;
I declare what is just.

²⁰Assemble yourselves and come;
draw near together,
you survivors of the nations.
They have no knowledge —
those who carry wooden idols and pray to a god that cannot save.

²¹Declare and present your case;
let them take counsel together.
Who foretold this long ago?
Who announced it from of old?
Was it not I, the LORD?
There is no other God besides me — a righteous God and a Savior;
there is none besides me.

²²Turn to me and be saved,
all the ends of the earth!
For I am God, and there is no other.

²³By myself I have sworn;
 from my mouth has gone out in righteousness
 a word that will not return:
 To me every knee shall bow,
 every tongue shall swear allegiance.

²⁴'Only in the LORD,' it will be said of me,
 'are righteousness and strength.'
 All who raged against Him will come to Him and be put to shame.

²⁵In the LORD all the offspring of Israel will be vindicated and will glory.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase limeshicho ('to His anointed') uses the same word applied to Saul (1 Samuel 24:6), David (2 Samuel 19:21), and the priests (Leviticus 4:3). Applying it to Cyrus is not metaphorical — it is a deliberate theological claim that God's purposes operate through foreign rulers.
2. The verb hechezaqti ('I have grasped') describes God taking Cyrus by the right hand — an image of personal guidance and empowerment, the same language used for God leading Israel (41:13).
3. The verb ayasher ('make level/straight') and hadurim ('swellings, rough places, or mountains') describe God removing obstacles from Cyrus's path. The bronze doors and iron bars refer to the fortified gates of Babylon — Herodotus describes Babylon's hundred bronze gates.
4. The treasures of darkness (otsrot choshekh) refer to Babylon's legendary wealth stored in underground vaults. The purpose clause is theological: Cyrus receives wealth not for his own glory but 'so that you may know that I am the LORD.' God reveals Himself through history, not just through Scripture.
5. The phrase velo yedatani ('though you do not know me') is the chapter's most theologically provocative statement: God's anointed does not know God. Divine purposes operate through agents unaware of their role. The verb akannekha ('I give you a title/surname') suggests God confers royal dignity on Cyrus.
6. The first of the chapter's monotheistic declarations: ani YHWH ve'ein od ('I am the LORD and there is no other'). The absolute claim — no God besides me — eliminates all rival deities. The verb a'azzerkha ('I arm you, I gird you') is military — God equips Cyrus for conquest.
7. The scope is universal: from east (mizrach-shemesh, 'sunrise') to west (ma'aravah, 'sunset') — the entire inhabited world. The purpose of Cyrus's victories is not Persian imperialism but global knowledge of the one God.
7. We rendered ra as 'calamity' rather than 'evil' because the parallel with shalom ('peace/well-being') indicates the contrast is between favorable and unfavorable circumstances, not between moral good and moral evil. God is sovereign over events, not the author of sin.
7. The verb bara ('create') — used exclusively with God as subject in Genesis 1 — appears twice here, applied to darkness and to calamity. God's creative power encompasses the full range of existence.
7. This verse may respond to Persian Zoroastrian dualism, which posited separate deities for light/good (Ahura Mazda) and darkness/evil (Angra Mainyu). Isaiah insists: one God does both.
8. Righteousness (tsedeq/tsedaqah) and salvation (yesha) are described as agricultural — they rain from heaven and sprout from earth. The verse envisions a cosmos saturated with divine justice, growing like crops from soil watered by heaven.
9. The potter-clay metaphor challenges anyone who questions God's use of Cyrus. The word cheres ('potsherd, earthenware') emphasizes human fragility — clay arguing with the potter. Paul draws on this passage in Romans 9:20-21.
10. The analogy shifts from potter to parent — questioning God's purposes is as absurd as questioning parents about what kind of child they are producing. The verb techillin ('you labor/bring forth') uses birth-pain language.
11. The full title 'the Holy One of Israel' appears here alongside 'its Maker' (yotsro) — the same potter who cannot be questioned. The tone is either invitation ('ask me') or rebuke ('will you presume to command me?') — the Hebrew syntax allows both readings. We preserved the ambiguity.
12. God's credentials: He made the earth (asiti erets), created humanity (adam aleiha barati — using the Genesis 1 verb bara), stretched out the heavens, and commands the stars. If He can do all this, appointing Cyrus is a small matter.
13. The 'him' is Cyrus, now described with three actions: rebuild God's city (Jerusalem), release God's exiles, and do so without payment. The Cyrus Cylinder (539 BCE) records Cyrus's policy of returning displaced peoples to their homelands — Isaiah frames this as fulfillment of divine purpose.

14. The nations' confession — 'surely God is with you, and there is no other' — is remarkable: pagans acknowledge Israel's God through the evidence of history. The Sabeans were known for their height (anshei middah, 'men of stature').
15. The phrase El mistatter ('a God who hides Himself') is one of the most theologically profound statements in Isaiah. God's hiddenness is not absence but method — He works through Cyrus, through exile, through events that do not look divine. The same root s-t-r appears in Deuteronomy 31:17-18 (hester panim, 'hiding of the face').
16. The idol-makers (charashei tsirim) — craftsmen who fabricate images — are shamed. The contrast: the hidden God saves; the visible idols fail.
17. The phrase teshu'at olamim ('everlasting salvation') uses the plural of olam — an eternity of eternities. While idol-makers face temporary shame (v. 16), Israel's salvation is permanent. The root y-sh-a ('save') appears in both the verb (nosha) and the noun (teshu'at).
18. The word tohu ('chaos, formlessness') echoes Genesis 1:2 — God did not create the earth to remain in the pre-creation state of tohu. The earth was made lashebet ('to be inhabited') — creation has a purpose, and that purpose is life. This is one of the most important creation-theology verses in the Hebrew Bible.
19. God contrasts Himself with oracle-gods who speak from dark, hidden places. His word is public, clear, and productive — not tohu ('chaos'). When Israel seeks God, the search is not futile.
20. The survivors of the nations (pelitei haggoyim) are summoned to a trial. Those who carry their gods (wooden idols on their shoulders) are contrasted with the God who carries His people (46:3-4).
21. The trial challenge: if any god predicted Cyrus's rise, let them present evidence. Silence proves their nonexistence. The compound title El-tsaddiq umoshia ('righteous God and Savior') holds justice and salvation together — God saves precisely because He is righteous.
22. The universal invitation: kol afsei-arets ('all the ends of the earth') — not Israel alone but every nation. The imperative penu ('turn') is the same root as teshuvah ('repentance/return'). Salvation is offered to the entire world through a single act of turning toward the one God.
23. God swears by Himself because there is no one greater to swear by (cf. Hebrews 6:13). The word that 'goes out and does not return' echoes 55:11 where God's word accomplishes its purpose. Paul quotes this verse in Philippians 2:10-11 ('at the name of Jesus every knee should bow') and Romans 14:11.
24. The confession shifts to first person — the speaker represents all who will eventually acknowledge God. The phrase tsedaqot va'oz ('righteousness and strength') pairs moral authority with power. Those who raged (necherim) will come in shame.
25. The chapter ends with Israel, not the nations — the universal vision (v. 22-23) circles back to the particular covenant people. The verb yitsdaqu ('will be vindicated/declared righteous') uses the tsedaqah root that has governed the chapter. Israel's vindication comes not from their own righteousness but 'in the LORD.'

Summary: Bel and Nebo, Babylon's chief gods, are loaded onto weary animals as dead weight. In contrast, God has carried Israel from the womb and will carry them to old age. The idol-maker fashions a god that cannot move; the LORD announces the end from the beginning and calls a bird of prey from the east.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter's theological argument is built on a single contrast: who carries whom? Babylonian gods must be carried by their worshippers (vv. 1-2); Israel's God carries His worshippers (vv. 3-4). The four first-person verbs of verse 4 — 'I have made, I will bear, I will carry, I will deliver' — trace God's commitment from creation through sustenance to salvation. The declaration 'I am God, and there is no other' (v. 9) combined with 'I declare the end from the beginning' (v. 10) identifies foreknowledge as the proof of divinity no idol can match.

Translation Friction: Bel (equivalent to Marduk, Babylon's chief deity) and Nebo (Nabu, god of writing, whose name appears in Nebuchadnezzar) are introduced being packed onto animals as their city falls. We transliterated both and noted their significance. The 'bird of prey from the east' (v. 11) is Cyrus — the metaphor emphasizes speed and inevitability.

Connections: The carried-vs-carrying contrast anticipates the Dagon episode (1 Samuel 5:1-4). The 'from the womb to old age' promise echoes Psalm 71:5-6, 17-18. Cyrus as the bird of prey connects to 41:2 and 44:28-45:1. The idol-making satire continues from 40:18-20 and 44:9-20.

¹Bel bows down, Nebo stoops low.
 Their images are loaded on beasts and cattle.
 The things you carry are burdens,
 a load for weary animals.

²They stoop, they bow down together;
 they cannot rescue the burden,
 and they themselves go into captivity.

³Listen to me, house of Jacob,
 all the remnant of the house of Israel,
 you who have been carried from the womb,
 borne from birth:

⁴Even to your old age I am He,
 and to grey hairs I will carry you.
 I have made, and I will bear;
 I will carry, and I will deliver.

⁵To whom will you liken me or make me equal?
 To whom will you compare me,
 as though we were alike?

⁶Those who lavish gold from their purses and weigh out silver on the scales hire a goldsmith, and he makes it into a god.
 They bow down — yes, they worship.

⁷They lift it to their shoulders, they carry it;
 they set it in its place, and there it stands.
 From its spot it does not move.
 If someone cries out to it, it does not answer;
 it cannot save anyone from distress.

⁸Remember this and stand firm;
 take it to heart, you rebels.

⁹Remember the former things of old,
 for I am God, and there is no other;
 I am God, and there is none like me,

¹⁰declaring the end from the beginning,
 and from ancient times what is not yet done,
 saying, 'My purpose will stand,
 and I will accomplish all my desire.'

¹¹calling a bird of prey from the east,
 from a distant land the man of my purpose.
 I have spoken, and I will bring it about;

I have planned, and I will do it.

¹²Listen to me, you stubborn of heart,
you who are far from righteousness:

¹³I am bringing near my righteousness — it is not far off,
and my salvation will not delay.
I will place salvation in Zion,
my splendor upon Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bel is the Babylonian supreme deity (equivalent to Marduk); Nebo (Nabu) is the god of writing, whose name appears in Nebuchadnezzar ('Nebo, protect the boundary'). The scene is Babylon's fall: its gods are packed onto donkeys for transport. The verbs kara ('bows') and qores ('stoops') describe collapse, not worship.
2. The gods go into captivity (shevi) alongside their people. A god that can be exiled is no god at all.
3. The contrast is immediate: Babylonian gods are carried by their people; Israel is carried by their God. The same verbs for 'carried' and 'borne' apply to both — but the direction reverses.
4. The emphatic ani hu ('I am He') is God's self-identification formula throughout Second Isaiah. The four verbs trace a complete arc: creation, sustenance, bearing, deliverance.
5. The incomparability challenge echoes 40:18, 25 — three verbs eliminate every basis for comparison.
6. The idol-making process is economic: gold purchased, silver weighed, craftsman hired. The god is a commercial product. The worshipper prostrates before what his money bought.
7. Five stages of total passivity: carried, set down, stands, cannot move, cannot respond. The final verdict: lo yoshiennu ('it cannot save') — the one function a god must perform, it cannot.
8. The imperative calls the exiles to moral courage. The word posh'im ('rebels') addresses Israelites tempted by Babylonian religion.
9. The doubled self-identification with two negations ('no other,' 'none like me') is the chapter's theological climax. Memory is the antidote to idolatry.
10. God's ability to declare the end from the beginning (maggid mereshit acharit) is the definitive proof of divinity no idol can match.
11. The 'bird of prey from the east' is Cyrus — swift, unstoppable, summoned from Persia. The phrase ish atsati ('man of my purpose') makes Cyrus God's instrument.
12. The abbirei lev ('stubborn of heart') are Israelites who resist God's plan. Being 'far from righteousness' is the opposite of seeking God.
13. God moves toward those who are 'far from righteousness' (v. 12) — He brings His righteousness near. The word tif'arti ('my splendor') applied to Israel means Israel will display God's glory. Salvation is placed 'in Zion' — specific, not abstract.

Summary: A taunt-song against Babylon, personified as Virgin Daughter Babylon. She descends from her throne to sit in the dust, exposed and humiliated. Her sorceries and enchantments cannot protect her. Her self-deifying claim 'I am, and there is no one besides me' is exposed as blasphemous.

What Makes This Remarkable: Babylon's declaration 'I am, and there is no one besides me' (vv. 8, 10) mirrors God's own exclusive claims (45:5-6, 46:9). The parody is deliberate: Babylon has made herself into a god. Her punishment fits her crime — absolute sovereignty meets absolute loss. The astrologers, star-gazers, and monthly prognosticators (v. 13) represent Babylon's famed divinatory tradition, now exposed as worthless. The chapter ends with total abandonment: 'there is no one to save you' (v. 15).

Translation Friction: The phrase betulat bat-Bavel ('Virgin Daughter Babylon') personifies the city as a young woman who has never been conquered. The 'virgin' implies invincibility now shattered. The sorcery vocabulary includes technical terms for Babylonian divination practices. We rendered each descriptively and noted the Babylonian context.

Connections: The taunt echoes the king-of-Babylon song in 14:4-23. Babylon's fall is announced in 21:9 and culminates in Revelation 17-18. The 'I am' claim inverts Exodus 3:14. The sudden 'both in one day' judgment (v. 9) anticipates Revelation 18:8.

¹Come down and sit in the dust,
Virgin Daughter Babylon!
Sit on the ground without a throne,
Daughter of the Chaldeans!
For you will no longer be called tender and delicate.

²Take the millstones and grind flour.
Remove your veil, strip off your skirt,
bare your legs, wade through rivers.

³Your nakedness will be exposed,
your shame will be seen.
I will take vengeance,
and I will spare no one.

⁴Our Redeemer — the LORD of Hosts is His name —
the Holy One of Israel.

⁵Sit in silence and go into darkness,
Daughter of the Chaldeans,
for you will no longer be called mistress of kingdoms.

⁶I was angry with my people;
I profaned my inheritance
and gave them into your hand.
You showed them no mercy;
on the elderly you made your yoke very heavy.

⁷You said, 'I will be mistress forever' — you did not take these things to heart or consider how it would end.

⁸Now hear this, you lover of pleasure,
who sits securely,
who says in her heart,
'I am, and there is no one besides me.
I will never sit as a widow or know the loss of children.'

⁹Both of these will come upon you in a moment, in a single day:
bereavement and widowhood.
They will come upon you in full measure,
despite your many sorceries and the great power of your spells.

¹⁰You trusted in your wickedness;
you said, 'No one sees me.'
Your wisdom and your knowledge led you astray,
and you said in your heart,
'I am, and there is no one besides me.'

¹¹But disaster will come upon you,
and you will not know how to charm it away.
Calamity will fall on you,
and you will not be able to atone for it.
Devastation will come upon you suddenly,
before you know it.

¹²Stand now with your spells and your many sorceries,
at which you have labored from your youth.
Perhaps you can succeed;
perhaps you can inspire terror.

¹³You are wearied by your many counselors.
Let them stand up now and save you — those who divide the heavens,
who gaze at the stars,
who at each new moon predict
what will come upon you.

¹⁴Look — they are like stubble;
fire burns them up.
They cannot save themselves
from the power of the flame.
This is no coal for warming,
no fire to sit before.

¹⁵Such are those you have labored with — your traders from your youth.
Each wanders off in his own direction;
there is no one to save you.

1. The descent: from throne to dust, from palace to ground. The title betulat bat-Bavel personifies the city as a young woman who has never been conquered — now shattered.
2. The queen becomes a slave: grinding at the mill was the lowest domestic labor. The progressive undressing describes the degradation of captivity.
3. The exposure of nakedness is the ultimate humiliation in the ancient Near East. God is the agent: 'I will take vengeance.'
4. A parenthetical doxology breaking into the taunt. The three titles identify the God who judges Babylon as the same God who redeems Israel.
5. Silence and darkness reverse Babylon's splendor. The title geveret mamlakhot ('mistress of kingdoms') is revoked.
6. God acknowledges His role in Israel's exile but charges Babylon with exceeding the mandate — showing no mercy and oppressing the elderly. The agent of judgment became an agent of cruelty.
7. Babylon's fatal assumption: permanence. The failure to 'remember the end' is the opposite of God who declares 'the end from the beginning' (46:10).
8. The phrase ani ve'afsi od deliberately echoes God's exclusive self-declarations. Babylon has committed the ultimate sin: claiming for herself what belongs to God alone.
9. What Babylon declared impossible (v. 8) happens in a single day. The sorceries and spells that Babylon trusted cannot prevent it.
10. The self-deification formula appears again. Babylon's wisdom and knowledge became instruments of self-delusion. The assumption 'no one sees me' denies divine observation.
11. Three disasters with three inabilities: disaster that cannot be charmed, calamity that cannot be atoned for, devastation that cannot be anticipated. Babylon's entire repertoire fails.
12. The sarcastic 'perhaps' mocks Babylon's expertise — after a lifetime of sorcery, maybe it will finally work.
13. Three categories of Babylonian divination: hovrei shamayim ('dividers of the heavens'), chozim bakkokhavim ('star-gazers'), modi'im lechodashim ('monthly prognosticators'). Babylonian astronomical records were the most sophisticated in the ancient world — and they are mocked as useless.
14. The astrologers become fuel. The fire that destroys them is not even useful as a hearth — their destruction produces nothing of value.
15. Total abandonment. Babylon's commercial partners scatter. The final word moshi'ekh ('your savior') uses the salvation root — Babylon has none.

Summary: God rebukes Israel for stubbornness — He declared things long ago so they could not credit idols. He refines Israel in the furnace of affliction. For His own name's sake He delays anger. Cyrus is His instrument. 'Go out from Babylon!' The section closes: 'There is no peace for the wicked.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is God's most frustrated address to Israel in Second Isaiah. The command to leave Babylon (v. 20) is the climactic imperative of chapters 40-48. The closing refrain 'there is no peace for the wicked' (v. 22) divides Second Isaiah into three sections (48:22, 57:21, and implicitly 66:24).

Translation Friction: *The phrase becharttikha velo bekhesev (v. 10) is textually difficult: 'I chose you' or 'I tested you'? We followed the Masoretic text. The kur oni ('furnace of affliction') describes exile as purposeful refining. The 'no peace' refrain is abrupt after the joy of v. 20 — the juxtaposition is intentional.*

Connections: The 'go out from Babylon' (v. 20) echoes Genesis 12:1 and anticipates Revelation 18:4. The refining-furnace image connects to Deuteronomy 4:20 and 1 Kings 8:51. The 'no peace' refrain recurs at 57:21.

¹Hear this, house of Jacob,
you who are called by the name of Israel and who came from the waters of Judah — who swear by the name of the LORD and invoke the God of Israel,
but not in truth or in righteousness.

²For they call themselves after the holy city and lean on the God of Israel —

the LORD of Hosts is His name.

³The former things I declared long ago;
they went out from my mouth and I announced them.
Then suddenly I acted, and they came to pass.

⁴Because I knew how stubborn you are — your neck is an iron sinew, your forehead is bronze —

⁵therefore I declared it to you long ago;
before it happened I announced it to you,
lest you say, 'My idol did this,
my carved image and my cast image commanded it.'

⁶You have heard — now look at all this!
Will you not acknowledge it?
From now on I announce new things to you,
hidden things you have not known.

⁷They are created now, not long ago;
before today you have not heard of them,
lest you say, 'I already knew that.'

⁸You have neither heard nor known;
from of old your ear has not been opened.
For I knew you would act utterly treacherously;
you have been called a rebel from the womb.

⁹For the sake of my name I defer my anger;
for the sake of my praise I hold it back from you,
so as not to cut you off.

¹⁰Look — I have refined you, but not as silver;
I have tested you in the furnace of affliction.

¹¹For my own sake, for my own sake, I act —
for how should my name be profaned?
My glory I will not give to another.

¹²Listen to me, Jacob,
and Israel, whom I called:
I am He; I am the first,
and I am the last.

¹³My hand laid the foundation of the earth,
and my right hand spread out the heavens.
When I call to them,
they stand together.

¹⁴Assemble, all of you, and listen.
Which of them declared these things?
The LORD loves him —
he will carry out His purpose against Babylon, and his arm will be against the Chaldeans.

¹⁵I, even I, have spoken;
indeed I have called him.
I have brought him, and he will succeed.

¹⁶Come near to me and hear this:
From the beginning I have not spoken in secret;
from the time it came to be, I was there.
And now the Lord GOD has sent me,
and His Spirit.

¹⁷This is what the LORD says —
your Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel:
I am the LORD your God,
who teaches you for your benefit,
who leads you in the way you should go.

¹⁸If only you had paid attention to my commands!
Then your peace would have been like a river,
and your righteousness like the waves of the sea.

¹⁹Your offspring would have been like the sand,
your descendants like its grains.
Their name would never have been cut off or destroyed from before me.

²⁰Go out from Babylon!
Flee from the Chaldeans!
With a shout of joy declare it,
proclaim it, send it out to the ends of the earth.
Say, 'The LORD has redeemed His servant Jacob!'

²¹They did not thirst
when He led them through the deserts.
He made water flow from the rock for them;
He split the rock, and water gushed out.

²²"There is no peace," says the LORD,
"for the wicked."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening is accusatory: Israel bears the right name and speaks the right words but lacks truth (emet) and righteousness (tsedaqah).

2. Israel claims Jerusalem and God as support, but the claim is hollow given v. 1's indictment.
3. God's pattern: declare in advance, then act suddenly. The purpose is explained in v. 5.
4. Three metaphors for stubbornness: hard, iron-sinewed, bronze-faced. The metallic imagery makes resistance seem structural.
5. The reason for advance declaration: to prevent idolatry from claiming credit. God's foreknowledge is both proof of divinity and prevention of false worship.
6. God shifts from 'former things' to 'new things' and 'hidden things' — fresh revelations. The challenge demands a response.
7. The 'new things' are created (nivr'u) at the moment of announcement, preventing Israel from claiming prior knowledge.
8. The indictment intensifies: chronic deafness, innate treachery, a rebel from birth.
9. God's mercy is grounded in His own name, not Israel's merit. The verb a'arikh uses the same root as erekh appayim ('slow to anger,' Exodus 34:6).
10. God's refining did not apply the full heat — Israel would not survive silver-standard purification. Exile is the furnace (kur oni), painful but purposeful.
11. The doubled lema'ani lema'ani is strikingly honest: God acts for His own reputation. The refusal to give kavod to another echoes 42:8.
12. The triple self-identification — ani hu, ani rishon, ani acharon — compresses God's identity. The 'first and last' appears in 41:4, 44:6 and Revelation 1:17, 22:13.
13. God as architect: His hand laid earth, His right hand stretched heavens. Creation responds to His voice like servants at attention.
14. The 'him' is Cyrus, described as God's beloved instrument of judgment against Babylon.
15. The emphatic ani ani ('I, even I') emphasizes that Cyrus's call and success are entirely God's doing.
16. The speaker shifts — 'the Lord GOD has sent me and His Spirit' introduces a commissioned voice. The identity is debated: the Servant, the prophet, or a divine figure. We render as the Hebrew presents it.
17. Three titles: YHWH, go'alekha ('your Redeemer'), Qedosh Yisra'el ('the Holy One of Israel'). Two present participles: melammedkha ('teaching you') and madrikhakha ('leading you').
18. God grieves what might have been: shalom like a river (constant, flowing) and tsedaqah like sea waves (overwhelming). Disobedience cost them this.
19. The Abrahamic promise (Genesis 22:17) would have been fully realized. The conditional mood carries unrealized potential.
20. Six imperatives in rapid succession: go out, flee, declare, proclaim, send out, say. The final declaration ga'al YHWH avdo Ya'aqov uses the go'el verb — redemption accomplished.
21. Exodus imagery: God splitting rock and water gushing echoes Exodus 17:6 and Numbers 20:11. The new exodus mirrors the original.
22. The section divider: Second Isaiah's first third (chs. 40-48) ends here. The same refrain at 57:21 ends the second third. The word shalom encompasses all wholeness — the wicked are excluded from it entirely.

Summary: The Second Servant Song opens this chapter, presenting a figure called from the womb and appointed as a light to the nations. The scope of the Servant's mission expands beyond Israel's restoration to encompass all peoples. The chapter then pivots to Zion's lament of abandonment, which God answers with one of Scripture's most tender images: a mother's unbreakable bond with her nursing child — and declares His own faithfulness surpasses even that.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 16 presents the extraordinary image of Zion's walls engraved on the palms of God's hands — a metaphor of permanent, embodied remembrance that has no parallel in ancient Near Eastern literature. The tension between the Servant as an individual figure (vv.1-6) and the Servant as Israel (v.3) is left deliberately unresolved in the Hebrew text.

Translation Friction: The identity of the Servant is intensely debated. In verse 3 God calls the Servant 'Israel,' yet in verse 5 the Servant has a mission to Israel — creating a deliberate ambiguity. We have rendered the text as it stands without collapsing this tension. The verb yatsar (formed) in verse 5 echoes Genesis 2:7, linking the Servant's calling to creation itself.

Connections: The 'light to the nations' (or la-goyim, v.6) echoes Isaiah 42:6 (First Servant Song) and anticipates the universal scope of 52:13-53:12. The mother imagery (v.15) connects to Isaiah 66:13. The re-gathering language (vv.12, 22) reverberates through Jeremiah 31 and Ezekiel 37. Paul quotes verse 6 in Acts 13:47, applying it to his Gentile mission.

¹Listen to me, O coastlands, and give heed, you peoples from afar:
The LORD called me from the womb;
from the body of my mother He named me.

²He made my mouth like a sharpened sword;
in the shadow of His hand He hid me.
He made me a polished arrow;
in His quiver He concealed me.

³And He said to me, 'You are my servant,
Israel, in whom I will display my glory.'

⁴But I said, 'I have labored in vain;
for nothing and futility I have spent my strength.'
Yet surely my justice is with the LORD,
and my recompense with my God.

⁵And now the LORD says —
He who formed me from the womb to be His servant,
to bring Jacob back to Him,
that Israel might be gathered to Him (for I am honored in the eyes of the LORD, and my God has become my strength) —

⁶He says:
'It is too small a thing for you to be my servant
to raise up the tribes of Jacob and to restore the preserved of Israel.
I will make you a light to the nations, that my salvation may reach to the end of the earth.'

⁷This is what the LORD says —
the Redeemer of Israel, the Holy One of Israel — to one deeply despised, abhorred by the nation,
a servant of rulers:
'Kings shall see and rise;
princes shall bow down,
because of the LORD, who is faithful,
the Holy One of Israel, who has chosen you.'

⁸This is what the LORD says:
'In a time of favor I have answered you;
in a day of salvation I have helped you.

I will keep you and give you
as a covenant to the people,
to raise up the land,
to apportion the desolate inheritances,'

⁹saying to the prisoners, 'Come out!'
to those in darkness, 'Show yourselves!'
They shall feed along the roads, and on every bare height shall be their pasture.

¹⁰They shall not hunger or thirst;
scorching wind and sun shall not strike them,
for He who has compassion on them will lead them,
and by springs of water He will guide them.

¹¹I will turn all my mountains into a road,
and my highways shall be raised up.

¹²Behold, these shall come from afar —
some from the north, some from the west, and some from the land of Sinim.

¹³Sing for joy, O heavens!
Rejoice, O earth!
Break forth into singing, O mountains!
For the LORD has comforted His people
and will have compassion on His afflicted ones.

¹⁴But Zion said, 'The LORD has forsaken me;
my Lord has forgotten me.'

¹⁵Can a woman forget her nursing child, that she should have no compassion on the son of her womb?
Even these may forget,
but I will not forget you.

¹⁶Behold, I have engraved you on the palms of my hands;
your walls are continually before me.

¹⁷Your builders hasten to you;
your destroyers and those who laid you waste go out from you.

¹⁸Lift up your eyes all around and see:
they all gather together; they come to you.
As I live, declares the LORD,
you shall put them all on like an ornament and bind them on like a bride.

¹⁹For your ruins and your desolate places and your devastated land —
surely now you will be too cramped for your inhabitants, and those who swallowed you will be far away.

²⁰The children born in your bereavement will yet say in your hearing,
'The place is too cramped for me;
make room for me to dwell!'

²¹Then you will say in your heart,
'Who has borne me these?
I was bereaved and barren, exiled and put away —
so who has raised these?
Behold, I was left alone;
where then have these come from?'

²²This is what the Lord GOD says:
'Behold, I will lift up my hand to the nations and raise my signal to the peoples;
and they shall bring your sons in their arms,
and your daughters shall be carried on their shoulders.'

²³Kings shall be your guardians, and their queens your nursing mothers.
With faces to the ground they shall bow down to you and lick the dust of your feet.
Then you will know that I am the LORD;
those who wait for me shall not be put to shame.

²⁴Can the prey be taken from the mighty,
or the captives of a tyrant be rescued?

²⁵For this is what the LORD says:
'Even the captives of the mighty shall be taken,
and the prey of the tyrant shall be rescued.
I myself will contend with those who contend with you,
and I myself will save your children.'

²⁶I will make your oppressors eat their own flesh, and they shall be drunk with their own blood
as with sweet wine.
Then all flesh shall know that I am the LORD, your Savior,
and your Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew iyim (coastlands/islands) refers to distant Mediterranean lands, representing the farthest reaches of the known world. The Servant addresses the nations directly, signaling a universal scope from the opening line.
2. The dual imagery of sword and arrow presents the Servant's word as both weapon and instrument of divine purpose. The concealment in God's hand and quiver suggests a period of hidden preparation before the Servant's mission is revealed.
3. This verse is pivotal to the Servant identity question. God explicitly names the Servant 'Israel,' yet subsequent verses distinguish the Servant from the nation. Some scholars read 'Israel' as an honorific title for an individual who embodies the nation's calling; others see this as the nation personified. The Hebrew sustains both readings.
4. The Hebrew tohu (futility/void) echoes Genesis 1:2 — the Servant fears his work has returned to primordial chaos. Yet the adversative achen (surely/yet) pivots to trust: the Servant entrusts his vindication to God rather than measuring success by visible results.
5. The Qere reading lo (to him) is followed here rather than the Ketiv lo (not), yielding 'that Israel might be gathered to Him.' This verse critically distinguishes the Servant from Israel: the Servant's mission is to restore Jacob/Israel, implying the Servant is not identical with the nation.
6. The word naqel (too small/too light) dramatically expands the Servant's mission. Restoring Israel alone would be insufficient — the Servant must become or goyim (a light to the nations). The word yeshu'ati (my salvation) shares its root with the name Yeshua/Joshua.
7. The phrase 'this is what the LORD says' renders ko amar YHWH. Go'el (Redeemer) casts God in the role of kinsman-redeemer who reclaims His people from bondage. The Servant is described as despised and abhorred — language that anticipates the Suffering Servant of 52:13-53:12.
8. The Servant is described as berit am (a covenant to the people) — not merely a covenant mediator but the covenant itself embodied. Paul quotes this verse in 2 Corinthians 6:2, applying the 'acceptable time' to the present age of grace.
9. The imagery shifts from liberation to pastoral care — the freed captives become a flock grazing in safety. The 'bare heights' (shefayim), normally barren terrain, are transformed into lush grazing land.
10. The language echoes the Exodus wilderness journey (cf. Psalm 23, Exodus 15:22-27) — a new exodus surpassing the first. Merachamam (He who has compassion) shares its root with rechem (womb), connecting divine mercy to maternal tenderness.
11. God transforms the very topography to facilitate the return of His people — mountains become level roads. This echoes Isaiah 40:3-4, where every valley is lifted and every mountain brought low.
12. The identity of 'Sinim' (sinim) is debated. Ancient suggestions include Aswan in southern Egypt (supported by the Dead Sea Scrolls reading 'Seveneh') or a distant eastern land. The point is comprehensiveness: God's people return from every direction.
13. This cosmic hymn of praise — heavens, earth, and mountains summoned to worship — serves as a structural marker dividing the Servant Song from the Zion discourse that follows. The verb nicham (comforted) is the root of Isaiah's great theme from 40:1.
14. Zion is personified as a woman who feels abandoned — a devastatingly honest lament that the text does not rebuke but rather answers with overwhelming tenderness in the verses that follow.
15. This verse is one of the most striking maternal images of God in the Hebrew Bible. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'No!' — yet God's faithfulness surpasses even a mother's instinct. The concessive gam-elleh tishkachnah (even these may forget) acknowledges the unthinkable to magnify the divine promise.
16. The Hebrew chaqqotikh (I have engraved you) uses a verb for permanent inscription — not ink that fades but carved marks that endure. God carries the blueprint of Zion's walls on His very hands, an image of intimate, unbreakable remembrance.
17. There is a wordplay between banayikh (your sons/children) and bonayikh (your builders) — the returning children become the rebuilders of Zion. Many Hebrew manuscripts and the LXX read 'builders' here.
18. God swears by His own life — the most solemn oath possible — that Zion's children will return. The returning exiles become Zion's bridal adornment, transforming her from desolate widow to radiant bride.
19. The reversal is total: Zion's problem shifts from emptiness to overcrowding. The land that was desolate will be bursting with returned exiles.
20. The children born during exile — Zion's season of bereavement — will be so numerous they demand more space. Loss is transformed into superabundance.
21. Zion's astonishment mirrors Sarah's laughter (Genesis 18:12) — the impossible has happened. Four terms of desolation pile up (bereaved, barren, exiled, put away) to magnify the miracle of restoration.
22. The nations themselves become the means of Israel's restoration — carrying Zion's children home. The imagery reverses the exile: foreign powers who once deported Israel now tenderly transport her children back.
23. The reversal of power is complete: the mightiest rulers of the earth become caretakers for Zion's children. The closing promise — those who wait (qovai) for God will not be ashamed — echoes Isaiah 40:31.

- 24. The Hebrew tsaddiq here is debated — the Masoretic text reads 'righteous one' but the context and Dead Sea Scrolls suggest 'tyrant' (arits), which better parallels 'mighty one' (gibbor). The rhetorical question expects the answer 'No!' — setting up God's astonishing 'Yes!' in the next verse.
- 25. The emphatic anokhi (I myself) appears twice, stressing that God personally enters the conflict. No oppressor is too powerful for the LORD to overcome.
- 26. The chapter ends with graphic imagery of divine judgment — the oppressors consume themselves — followed by universal recognition. The title 'Mighty One of Jacob' (avir ya'aqov) is an ancient patriarchal title (Genesis 49:24) anchoring God's rescue of Zion in covenant history.

Summary: This chapter opens with God challenging Zion's claim of abandonment: where is your mother's certificate of divorce? God's hand is not too short to save. The Third Servant Song (vv.4-9) then presents the Servant as a willing disciple whose ear is opened each morning by God. The Servant endures physical abuse without turning away, trusting that God will vindicate him. The chapter closes with a warning to those who walk by their own light.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Third Servant Song introduces a new dimension: the Servant suffers willingly and voluntarily. Unlike the Second Song where the Servant laments, here he offers his back to the strikers and his cheeks to those who pull out the beard — a deliberate choice, not passive victimhood. The courtroom metaphor of verses 8-9 casts suffering as a legal contest that God will win.

Translation Friction: The shift between God speaking (vv.1-3), the Servant speaking (vv.4-9), and the prophetic voice (vv.10-11) is abrupt. We have followed the traditional division without smoothing the transitions. The word adonai (Lord/Master) in verse 4 frames the Servant's relationship to God as that of a student to a teacher — the Hebrew limmudim (taught ones/disciples) is rare and significant.

Connections: The Servant's willingness to suffer (v.6) anticipates 52:13-53:12 in vivid detail. The legal language of vindication (v.8, 'Who will contend with me?') is echoed in Romans 8:31-34. The morning-by-morning teaching (v.4) connects to Psalm 119's meditation on Torah. The darkness imagery (v.10) inverts the 'light to the nations' of 49:6.

¹This is what the LORD says:
 'Where is your mother's certificate of divorce with which I sent her away?
 Or to which of my creditors have I sold you?
 Behold, for your iniquities you were sold,
 and for your transgressions your mother was sent away.'

²Why, when I came, was there no one?
 When I called, was there none to answer?
 Is my hand too short to ransom?
 Have I no power to deliver?
 Behold, by my rebuke I dry up the sea;
 I make rivers a desert.
 Their fish stink for lack of water and die of thirst.

³I clothe the heavens with blackness and make sackcloth their covering.

⁴The Lord GOD has given me
the tongue of those who are taught, that I may know how to sustain the weary with a word.
Morning by morning He awakens —
He awakens my ear
to hear as those who are taught.

⁵The Lord GOD has opened my ear,
and I was not rebellious;
I did not turn backward.

⁶I gave my back to those who strike,
and my cheeks to those who pull out the beard.
I did not hide my face
from disgrace and spitting.

⁷But the Lord GOD helps me;
therefore I have not been disgraced.
Therefore I have set my face like flint, and I know that I shall not be put to shame.

⁸He who vindicates me is near.
Who will contend with me?
Let us stand up together.
Who is my accuser?
Let him come near to me.

⁹Behold, the Lord GOD helps me;
who will declare me guilty?
Behold, they will all wear out like a garment;
the moth will consume them.

¹⁰Who among you fears the LORD and obeys the voice of His servant?
Let him who walks in darkness and has no light trust in the name of the LORD and rely upon his God.

¹¹Behold, all you who kindle a fire, who arm yourselves with firebrands — walk by the light of your fire and among the sparks you have kindled!
This you shall have from my hand:
you shall lie down in torment.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God challenges the assumption that He initiated the separation. Under Deuteronomy 24:1, a husband must issue a formal divorce document (sefer keritut). God's rhetorical question implies: no such document exists — the covenant was never formally dissolved. Israel's exile was self-inflicted through sin, not divine abandonment.

2. God's rhetorical questions invert the complaint: it was Israel who failed to respond, not God who failed to act. The drying of the sea (yam) alludes to the Red Sea crossing — proof that God's power to deliver is undiminished.
3. The heavens themselves wear mourning garments (saq, sackcloth) — cosmic darkness serves as a sign of divine displeasure and recalls the ninth plague of Egypt (Exodus 10:21-23).
4. This verse opens the Third Servant Song (vv.4-9). The repetition babboqer babboqer (morning by morning) emphasizes daily, habitual communion with God. The Servant's authority to speak comes not from personal wisdom but from disciplined listening.
5. The 'opening' of the ear (patach ozen) may echo the ritual of Exodus 21:6, where a servant's ear is pierced as a sign of permanent, voluntary service. The Servant's obedience is stressed by two negatives: not rebellious, not turning back.
6. The Servant's suffering is voluntary — 'I gave' (natatti), not 'they took.' Pulling out the beard was an extreme act of humiliation in the ancient Near East. This verse is central to Christian readings of the Servant as prefiguring Jesus's passion (cf. Matthew 26:67), while Jewish tradition may read it as Israel's suffering among the nations.
7. The word challamish (flint) evokes the hardest stone known in the ancient world — an image of unyielding resolve. The Servant's confidence rests not in his own strength but in God's help (ya'azar-li). Luke 9:51 uses similar language of Jesus 'setting his face' toward Jerusalem.
8. The scene shifts to a courtroom. The Hebrew matsdiqui (He who declares me righteous/vindicates me) places God in the role of judge who pronounces the verdict. Ba'al mishpati (master of my case/my accuser) is a legal term for the opposing litigant. Paul draws directly on this language in Romans 8:33-34.
9. The Servant's accusers are compared to a moth-eaten garment — their case against him will disintegrate. The Third Servant Song ends with absolute confidence in divine vindication.
10. The 'servant' (eved) here is referred to in the third person, likely by a prophetic voice commenting on the Servant Song. Those who fear God are called to trust even in darkness — faith without visible evidence, the posture the Servant himself has modeled.
11. The chapter ends with a sharp warning contrasting two paths: trusting God in darkness (v.10) versus manufacturing one's own light (v.11). Those who rely on their own fire rather than God's guidance will find their self-made illumination leads only to ma'atsevah (torment/sorrow). The word choice echoes the 'pain' vocabulary of Genesis 3:16-17.

Summary: Three calls to listen (vv.1, 4, 7) structure the first half of this chapter, summoning those who pursue righteousness to remember Abraham and Sarah, to receive God's Torah-light to the nations, and to fear God rather than mortals. The chapter's second half turns to the arm of the LORD — summoned to awake as in the days of old when it split Rahab and dried the sea. God then identifies Himself as the sole comforter of Israel and announces the transfer of the cup of wrath from Jerusalem to her oppressors.

What Makes This Remarkable: The appeal to look to the rock from which you were hewn (v.1) and to Abraham and Sarah (v.2) is unique in the prophets — grounding future hope in ancestral memory. The Rahab/dragon mythology in verses 9-10 is striking: Isaiah appropriates ancient Near Eastern combat myth (God defeating the sea monster) and historicizes it as the Exodus, then projects it forward as future redemption.

Translation Friction: The identity of the speaker shifts frequently: God speaks (vv.1-8), the prophet calls upon God's arm (vv.9-11), God responds in first person (vv.12-16), and then addresses Jerusalem directly (vv.17-23). We have preserved these shifts rather than harmonizing them. The mythological language of Rahab and tannin (dragon/sea monster) in verse 9 reflects genuine ancient Israelite engagement with broader Near Eastern cosmology.

Connections: The arm of the LORD (vv.5, 9) becomes the central image of 52:10 and 53:1. The cup of wrath (vv.17, 22) connects to Jeremiah 25:15-29 and Revelation 14:10. The Eden/garden imagery (v.3) echoes Genesis 2 and anticipates Isaiah 55:12-13. The ransomed returning to Zion (v.11) is virtually identical to 35:10.

1Listen to me, you who pursue righteousness,
 you who seek the LORD:
 look to the rock from which you were hewn,

and to the quarry from which you were dug.

²Look to Abraham your father and to Sarah who bore you;
for he was but one when I called him,
but I blessed him and made him many.

³For the LORD comforts Zion;
He comforts all her waste places and makes her wilderness like Eden,
her desert like the garden of the LORD.
Joy and gladness shall be found in her,
thanksgiving and the sound of song.

⁴Give heed to me, my people,
and listen to me, my nation;
for a law will go out from me,
and I will set my justice
as a light to the peoples.

⁵My righteousness draws near;
my salvation has gone out,
and my arms will judge the peoples.
The coastlands wait for me,
and for my arm they hope.

⁶Lift up your eyes to the heavens,
and look at the earth beneath;
for the heavens will vanish like smoke,
the earth will wear out like a garment,
and those who dwell on it will die in like manner.
But my salvation will be forever,
and my righteousness will never be broken.

⁷Listen to me, you who know righteousness,
the people in whose heart is my law:
do not fear the reproach of mortals,
and do not be dismayed at their revilings.

⁸For the moth will eat them like a garment, and the worm will eat them like wool;
but my righteousness will be forever,
and my salvation to all generations.

⁹Awake, awake, put on strength,
O arm of the LORD!
Awake, as in days of old,
the generations of long ago!
Was it not you who cut Rahab in pieces,

who pierced the dragon?

¹⁰Was it not you who dried up the sea,
the waters of the great deep,
who made the depths of the sea a road
for the redeemed to pass over?

¹¹And the ransomed of the LORD shall return
and come to Zion with singing;
everlasting joy shall be upon their heads.
They shall obtain gladness and joy,
and sorrow and sighing shall flee away.

¹²I, I am He who comforts you;
who are you that you are afraid of man who dies,
of the son of man who is made like grass?

¹³You have forgotten the LORD, your Maker, who stretched out the heavens and laid the foundations of the earth, and you fear continually all the day
because of the wrath of the oppressor,
when he sets himself to destroy.
But where is the wrath of the oppressor?

¹⁴He who is bowed down shall speedily be released;
he shall not die in the pit,
nor shall his bread be lacking.

¹⁵For I am the LORD your God, who stirs up the sea so that its waves roar —
the LORD of hosts is His name.

¹⁶I have put my words in your mouth and covered you in the shadow of my hand, planting the heavens and laying the foundations of the earth, and saying to Zion, You are my people.

¹⁷Rouse yourself, rouse yourself!
Stand up, O Jerusalem,
you who have drunk from the hand of the LORD
the cup of His wrath —
the bowl of the cup of staggering
you have drunk; you have drained it.

¹⁸There is no one to guide her among all the children she has borne;
there is no one to take her by the hand
among all the children she has raised.

¹⁹These two things have befallen you — who will grieve for you? — devastation and destruction, famine and sword —
 who can comfort you?

²⁰Your children have fainted;
 they lie at the head of every street
 like an antelope in a net, full of the wrath of the LORD,
 the rebuke of your God.

²¹Therefore hear this, you afflicted one,
 drunk, but not with wine:

²²This is what your Lord says, the LORD, your God who pleads the cause of His people:
 Behold, I have taken from your hand
 the cup of staggering —
 the bowl of the cup of my wrath.
 You shall drink of it no more.

²³And I will put it into the hand of your tormentors, who said to you,
 Bow down, that we may walk over you.
 And you made your back like the ground,
 like a street for them to walk on.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening summons addresses the faithful remnant. The rock (tsur) from which they were hewn is identified in the next verse as Abraham — Israel's ancestral bedrock. The quarry metaphor emphasizes that God shapes His people from raw material, as a mason carves stone.
2. Both Abraham and Sarah are named — a rare dual invocation of the patriarchal and matriarchal ancestors. The word echad (one/alone) stresses the miracle: from a single, childless man God produced a nation. The implicit argument: if God could multiply one into many then, He can restore the remnant now.
3. The double use of nicham (comfort) echoes the opening command of Isaiah 40:1. Zion's ruins are transformed into Eden itself — not merely repaired but returned to primordial perfection. The four words of celebration (joy, gladness, thanksgiving, song) overflow the poetic line.
4. The second listen summons. Torah here means not merely the Mosaic law but God's instruction/teaching that will illumine the nations — anticipating the universal scope of 52:15.
5. The arm (zeroa) of the LORD becomes a major theme through chapter 53. The coastlands (iyyim) waiting for God's arm connects to the Servant as a light to the nations (49:6). God's saving power and justice are presented as two aspects of the same action.
6. The created order itself is transient — heavens and earth will pass away — but God's salvation endures. This radical statement about cosmic impermanence is cited in Hebrews 1:10-12 and echoed by Jesus in Mark 13:31.
7. The third listen summons. My law in their heart anticipates Jeremiah's new covenant promise (Jeremiah 31:33). The command not to fear human reproach echoes the Servant's own resolve in 50:7-8.
8. Echoing 50:9, the moth-eaten garment imagery contrasts human hostility (which disintegrates) with divine righteousness (which endures). The phrase ledor dorim (to generation of generations) means without end.
9. The prophet calls upon God's arm to awaken as it did at the Exodus. Rahab and tannin (dragon/sea monster) are figures from ancient Near Eastern mythology that Isaiah historicizes — the mythic battle against chaos is identified with the concrete act of the Red Sea crossing (v.10). This is not polytheism but poetic appropriation.

10. The mythological Rahab of verse 9 is now clearly identified with the historical event: the drying of the sea (yam) at the Exodus. The word ge'ulim (redeemed/ransomed) uses the go'el root — God as kinsman-redeemer, buying His people back from bondage.
11. This verse is nearly identical to Isaiah 35:10, forming a deliberate echo across the book. The ransomed of the LORD (peduyei YHWH) are those redeemed from exile, their return to Zion depicted as a joyous procession with joy literally crowning their heads.
12. The double anokhi (I, I) is intensely emphatic — God Himself enters the conversation to rebuke Zion's fear of mortals. The contrast between the eternal God and mortal man (enosh — a word emphasizing human frailty) and grass (chatsir, cf. Isaiah 40:6-8) could not be sharper.
13. The rhetorical question Where is the wrath of the oppressor? implies it has vanished — the one who seemed omnipotent has dissolved. God as Creator (stretching heavens, laying earth's foundations) dwarfs any human tyrant.
14. The tso'eh (one bowed down/captive) will be freed quickly. The three negatives (shall not die, shall not lack bread) form a comprehensive promise of liberation and provision.
15. God reasserts His identity as the one who commands the sea — the same power invoked in verse 10. The LORD of hosts (YHWH tseva'ot) is a military title: commander of all heavenly and earthly armies.
16. The language of planting heavens and founding earth suggests that God's address to Zion is itself a creative act — the restoration of Israel is presented as a new creation, parallel to Genesis 1. The phrase You are my people (ammi-attah) echoes the covenant formula of Hosea 2:23.
17. The double imperative hit'or'ri (rouse yourself!) echoes the awake, awake addressed to God's arm in verse 9 — now Jerusalem herself must arise. The cup of wrath is a major prophetic motif: Jerusalem has drunk it completely (shathit, matsit — drunk and drained to the dregs).
18. Jerusalem, personified as a staggering, intoxicated mother, has no child to steady her — the desolation is complete. The pathos deepens: she bore and raised children, yet none remains to support her in her hour of need.
19. The two things are elaborated as two pairs: devastation and destruction (external calamity), famine and sword (their human toll). The question who can comfort you? is rhetorical — only God can, as He declared in verse 12.
20. The image of Jerusalem's children collapsed at every intersection, trapped like a wild antelope (to) in a hunter's net, is among the most harrowing in Isaiah. They are full of God's wrath as one is full of drink — the cup metaphor continues.
21. Jerusalem is drunk — but not from wine. She staggers from the cup of divine wrath. This phrase connects to Isaiah 29:9 and anticipates the reversal that follows.
22. The turning point: God removes the cup of wrath from Jerusalem's hand. The title sequence is dense — adonayikh YHWH, ve'elohayikh (your Lord, the LORD, your God) — piling up divine names to underscore the authority behind the promise.
23. The cup of wrath is transferred to Israel's oppressors. The image of people forced to lie face-down while conquerors walk over their backs is attested in ancient Near Eastern victory reliefs — a practice of literal humiliation now reversed.

Summary: This chapter divides into two distinct movements. The first (vv.1-12) is a triumphant call for Zion to awake, put on her strength, and receive the messenger who brings good news of God's reign. The LORD bares His holy arm before all nations. The second movement (vv.13-15) begins the Fourth Servant Song — the most theologically contested passage in the Hebrew Bible — introducing a Servant who will be exalted and lifted up, yet whose appearance was marred beyond human semblance.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 7, with its image of beautiful feet on the mountains bringing good news, has become one of the most quoted verses in both Jewish and Christian liturgical traditions. The Fourth Servant Song beginning at verse 13 presents the sharpest paradox in Isaiah: the Servant is simultaneously exalted (yarum, venissa, vegavah — three verbs of elevation) and horrifyingly disfigured. This juxtaposition of glory and suffering is unprecedented in ancient literature.

Translation Friction: The division between chapters 52 and 53 is artificial — the Fourth Servant Song runs from 52:13 through 53:12 as a single literary unit. We preserve the chapter division for reference purposes while noting its inadequacy. The Hebrew of 52:14-15 is notoriously difficult; the verb yazzeh in verse 15 may mean sprinkle (a priestly act) or startle/cause to leap up. We have rendered it with a note on both possibilities.

Connections: How beautiful on the mountains (v.7) is quoted in Romans 10:15 and Nahum 1:15. The LORD baring His arm (v.10) continues the arm of the LORD theme from 51:5, 9 and anticipates the pivotal question of 53:1. The three verbs of exaltation in 52:13 echo Isaiah 6:1 (the LORD high and lifted up) — language otherwise reserved for God alone. The nations and kings of 52:15 connect to 49:7 and anticipate the kings of 53:12.

¹Awake, awake, put on your strength, O Zion!
Put on your beautiful garments,
O Jerusalem, the holy city!
For the uncircumcised and the unclean shall enter you no more.

²Shake yourself from the dust; arise!
Take your seat, O Jerusalem.
Loose the bonds from your neck,
O captive daughter of Zion.

³For this is what the LORD says:
You were sold for nothing,
and you shall be redeemed without money.

⁴For this is what the Lord GOD says:
My people went down to Egypt at first
to sojourn there,
and Assyria oppressed them for nothing.

⁵Now therefore what do I have here, declares the LORD, seeing that my people are taken away for nothing?
Their rulers wail, declares the LORD,
and continually all the day my name is despised.

⁶Therefore my people shall know my name.
Therefore in that day they shall know that it is I who speak:
Here I am.

⁷How beautiful upon the mountains are the feet of him who brings good news,
who publishes peace,
who brings good news of good,
who publishes salvation,
who says to Zion,
"Your God reigns!"

⁸Listen! Your watchmen lift up their voices;
together they sing for joy,
for eye to eye they see the return of the LORD to Zion.

⁹Break forth together into singing,
you ruins of Jerusalem,
for the LORD has comforted His people;
He has redeemed Jerusalem.

¹⁰The LORD has bared His holy arm before the eyes of all the nations, and all the ends of the earth shall see the salvation of our God.

¹¹Depart, depart, go out from there!
Touch no unclean thing!
Go out from the midst of her;
purify yourselves, you who bear the vessels of the LORD.

¹²For you shall not go out in haste,
and you shall not go in flight,
for the LORD will go before you,
and the God of Israel will be your rear guard.

¹³Behold, my servant shall prosper;
he shall be high and lifted up,
and shall be exceedingly exalted.

¹⁴As many were astonished at him — his appearance was so marred, beyond human semblance, and his form beyond that of the children of men —

¹⁵so shall he startle many nations.
Kings shall shut their mouths because of him,
for what had not been told them they shall see,
and what they had not heard they shall understand.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double imperative uri uri (awake, awake!) echoes 51:9 (addressed to God's arm) and 51:17 (addressed to Jerusalem). Now Zion is told to exchange her mourning rags for garments of splendor. The exclusion of the uncircumcised and unclean envisions a purified, restored Jerusalem.
2. The command shevi (sit/take your seat) is a wordplay — in context it means not to sit passively but to be enthroned, to resume a position of dignity. The captive (sheviyah) is told to become the one seated in honor (yoshevet).
3. The economics of redemption are paradoxical: Israel was sold for no price (chinnam, gratis) and will be bought back for no price. The verb tigga'elu (shall be redeemed) uses the go'el root — God as kinsman-redeemer pays no ransom because no legitimate transaction ever occurred.
4. God surveys the history of Israel's oppression: Egypt (voluntary sojourn turned slavery) and Assyria (unprovoked aggression). Both served no legitimate purpose (be'efes, for nothing) — establishing that Israel's suffering was unjust exploitation, not divine abandonment.
5. God's question what do I have here? expresses divine restlessness — He will not tolerate the status quo of His people in bondage. The desecration of God's name (shemi minno'ats) among the nations is a major motivating factor in Ezekiel's theology of restoration (Ezekiel 36:20-23).
6. The revelation climaxes with hinneni (Here I am) — God's own self-disclosure. The same word Abraham spoke in response to God (Genesis 22:1) is now spoken by God in response to His people. The reversal is breathtaking.
7. One of the most celebrated verses in all of Scripture. The herald runs across the mountains — visible from Jerusalem — bringing the announcement that God has acted. The fourfold description (peace, good, salvation, God reigns) builds to the climactic declaration malakh elohayikh (Your God reigns!). Paul quotes this in Romans 10:15; Nahum 1:15 contains a parallel.
8. The watchmen (tsofayikh) stationed on Jerusalem's walls see the LORD's return with their own eyes — ayin be'ayin (eye to eye), meaning face to face, without mediation. This is direct, unobstructed vision of God's saving action.
9. Even the ruins (chorvot) are summoned to sing — the destroyed stones themselves participate in the celebration. The verb ga'al (redeemed) is the go'el verb: God has acted as kinsman-redeemer for the city itself.

10. God rolls up His sleeve, so to speak — the baring of the arm is a warrior's gesture before battle. This arm, called to awaken in 51:9, is now displayed before all nations. The phrase yeshu'at elohenu (the salvation of our God) shares its root with the name Yeshua/Joshua. Luke 3:6 quotes this verse.
11. The double imperative suru suru (depart, depart!) commands a new exodus — this time from Babylon. Those carrying the temple vessels (kelei YHWH, cf. Ezra 1:7-11) must be ritually pure. Unlike the first exodus, which was hurried (Exodus 12:11), this departure will be orderly (v.12).
12. This new exodus surpasses the first: no haste (chippazom, the very word used of the Passover departure in Exodus 12:11), no flight — because God Himself serves as both vanguard and rear guard. The people are completely enclosed in divine protection.
13. This verse begins the Fourth Servant Song (52:13-53:12), the most theologically contested passage in the Hebrew Bible. The verb yaskil can mean prosper or act wisely — both senses may be intended. The three ascending verbs of exaltation (yarum, venissa, vegavah) are extraordinary: in Isaiah 6:1, ram venissa describes God Himself on His throne. Jewish tradition has generally read the Servant as Israel personified; Christian tradition as messianic prophecy. We present the text without privileging either reading.
14. The paradox is staggering: the one exalted above all (v.13) is disfigured beyond recognition as human. The word mishchat (marred/disfigured) suggests destruction of form itself. The shift from second person (at thee) to third person (his appearance) is jarring in Hebrew and may indicate editorial layering or dramatic perspective shifts.
15. The verb yazzeah is highly debated. The traditional rendering sprinkle (from nazah, a priestly purification act) would make the Servant a priest who purifies nations. An alternative reading startle/cause to leap up (from an Arabic cognate) better parallels kings shutting their mouths in astonishment. Both readings carry theological weight; we have followed the contextual sense of astonishment while noting the priestly alternative. Paul quotes the second half of this verse in Romans 15:21.

Summary: The Fourth Servant Song continues from 52:13 and reaches its climax here. A group of speakers — identified only as we — confess that they misjudged the servant of the LORD, mistaking his suffering for divine punishment when in fact he bore their griefs and was pierced for their transgressions. The Servant, silent as a lamb before slaughter, is cut off from the land of the living, buried with the wicked, yet sees offspring and prolongs his days. The song ends with God vindicating the Servant and granting him a portion with the great.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains the most developed theology of vicarious suffering in the Hebrew Bible. The Servant does not merely suffer alongside others but suffers in their place and for their healing. The reversal of verse 4 is the theological hinge: we thought him stricken by God, but he was pierced for our transgressions. The Dead Sea Scrolls manuscript 1QIsaiah-a preserves a significant variant at verse 11, reading he shall see light (yir'eh or), absent from the Masoretic Text but supported by the Septuagint.*

Translation Friction: This is the most theologically contested passage in the Hebrew Bible, and we approach it with maximum care and transparency. Jewish interpretive tradition, from the Talmud through Rashi and Ibn Ezra, has predominantly read the Servant as a personification of Israel suffering among the nations — the we being the Gentile nations who finally recognize Israel's innocent suffering. Christian tradition, from the New Testament onward, has read the Servant as a messianic prophecy fulfilled in Jesus of Nazareth. Both readings have deep roots and serious textual support. We present the Hebrew as it stands, note both traditions, and do not privilege either. The text itself sustains the tension.

Connections: This passage is quoted or alluded to more than any other Hebrew Bible text in the New Testament (Matthew 8:17; Acts 8:32-35; Romans 4:25; 1 Peter 2:22-25, among many others). In Jewish liturgy, it appears in the Musaf service for Yom Kippur in some traditions. The Targum Jonathan renders the passage messianically but redistributes the suffering to Israel's enemies. The Babylonian Talmud (Sanhedrin 98b) applies elements to the Messiah. The Dead Sea Scrolls community appears to have read it in light of their own Teacher of Righteousness.

¹Who has believed what he has heard from us?
And to whom has the arm of the LORD been revealed?

²For he grew up before him like a young plant, and like a root out of dry ground.

He had no form or majesty that we should look at him,
and no beauty that we should desire him.

³He was despised and rejected by men,
a man of sorrows and acquainted with grief.
As one from whom men hide their faces
he was despised, and we esteemed him not.

⁴Surely he has borne our griefs and carried our sorrows;
yet we esteemed him stricken,
smitten by God, and afflicted.

⁵But he was pierced for our transgressions;
he was crushed for our iniquities.
Upon him was the chastisement that brought us peace,
and by his wounds we are healed.

⁶All we like sheep have gone astray;
we have turned, each one, to his own way,
and the LORD has laid on him
the iniquity of us all.

⁷He was oppressed, and he was afflicted,
yet he opened not his mouth;
like a lamb that is led to the slaughter,
and like a sheep that before its shearers is silent,
so he opened not his mouth.

⁸By oppression and judgment he was taken away;
and as for his generation, who considered that he was cut off out of the land of the living, stricken for the transgression of my people?

⁹And they made his grave with the wicked and with a rich man in his death, although he had done no violence,
and there was no deceit in his mouth.

¹⁰Yet it was the will of the LORD to crush him;
He has put him to grief.
When his soul makes an offering for guilt,
he shall see his offspring; he shall prolong his days;
and the will of the LORD shall prosper in his hand.

¹¹Out of the anguish of his soul he shall see and be satisfied.
By his knowledge shall the righteous one, my servant,
make many to be accounted righteous,
and he shall bear their iniquities.

¹²Therefore I will divide him a portion with the many,
and he shall divide the spoil with the strong,
because he poured out his soul to death and was numbered with the transgressors;
yet he bore the sin of many and makes intercession for the transgressors.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The song shifts to first-person plural — a group of speakers confess their misunderstanding. The identity of the we is debated: in Christian reading, it is Israel or humanity confessing about the Messiah; in Jewish reading, it may be the Gentile nations confessing about Israel. The shemu'atenu (our report/what we have heard) implies a message that was delivered but not believed. John 12:38 and Romans 10:16 both quote this verse.
2. The Servant emerges from unpromising conditions — a yoneq (tender shoot/suckling plant) from dry ground (erets tsiyyah), suggesting humble, unexpected origins. The triple negation (no form, no majesty, no beauty) inverts expectations of how divine power should manifest. The root (shores) imagery echoes Isaiah 11:1 (the shoot from Jesse's stump).
3. The phrase chadal ishim (rejected by men, or: forsaken of men) suggests one who has ceased to be regarded as human. The word yadu'a choli (acquainted with grief/illness) can also mean known to sickness — the Servant is intimate with suffering. The verb chasavnuhu (we esteemed him) is an accounting term: we did not reckon him as having value.
4. This is the theological hinge of the chapter. The emphatic akhen (surely) introduces the confession: the Servant bore our griefs (cholyayenu — our sicknesses/weaknesses) and carried our sorrows (mak'h'ovenu). The speakers confess their error: they assumed the Servant was nagu'a (stricken — a term used for leprosy in Leviticus 13), mukkeh elohim (smitten by God) — divinely punished for his own sins. Matthew 8:17 applies this verse to Jesus's healing ministry.
5. The preposition min (from/for) in mipsha'enu (for our transgressions) and me'avonotenu (for our iniquities) indicates the cause of the Servant's suffering: our sins. The word musar (chastisement/discipline) carries the sense of corrective punishment — but it falls on the Servant, and the result (shelomenu, our peace/wholeness) accrues to us. The final clause uvacharurato nirpa-lanu (by his wounds we are healed) is the most concise statement of vicarious atonement in the Hebrew Bible. 1 Peter 2:24 quotes this directly.
6. The verse opens and closes with kullanu (all of us), forming an inclusio of universal guilt. The verb hippgia (laid on/caused to fall upon) is the same root as paga (to intercede) in verse 12 — the Servant both receives the burden and intercedes for those who caused it. The shepherd/sheep metaphor frames human sin as aimless wandering rather than deliberate rebellion.
7. The double statement he opened not his mouth frames the verse, emphasizing the Servant's voluntary silence. The lamb (seh) and sheep (rachel) are sacrificial imagery — the lamb led to slaughter evokes the Passover lamb (Exodus 12) and the daily tamid offering. The Ethiopian eunuch was reading this very passage when Philip encountered him (Acts 8:32-35). In Jewish tradition, Israel's silence among persecuting nations echoes this image.
8. The phrase nigzar me'erets chayyim (cut off from the land of the living) indicates death. The question who considered (mi yesocheach) his generation/fate suggests that no one reflected on the meaning of his death. The phrase mippesha ammi (for the transgression of my people) is pivotal: God now speaks in first person (my people), confirming the vicarious nature of the suffering. The Hebrew lamo (to him/to them) is ambiguous and debated.
9. The Servant is buried with the wicked (resha'im) and with a rich man (ashir) — the parallelism suggests the rich man is equated with the wicked, a common prophetic association. Christian tradition connects the rich man to Joseph of Arimathea (Matthew 27:57-60). The Servant's innocence is stated absolutely: no violence (chamas) and no deceit (mirmah). 1 Peter 2:22 quotes the second clause.
10. The most theologically dense verse in the chapter. God's will (chefets, delight/purpose) is behind the Servant's suffering — this is not accident but divine intention. The Servant's soul (nafsho) becomes an asham (guilt offering), a specific Levitical sacrifice. Yet paradoxically, the one who dies sees offspring (zera) and prolongs his days — language of life beyond death. This paradox is central to both Jewish and Christian messianic interpretation.
11. CRITICAL TEXTUAL NOTE: The Dead Sea Scrolls manuscript 1QIsaiah-a (circa 125 BCE) reads he shall see light (yir'eh or) where the Masoretic Text reads simply he shall see. The Septuagint also includes light. Many scholars believe the DSS preserves the older reading, with or (light) lost through scribal error in the MT tradition. If original, it explicitly describes the Servant seeing light after death — resurrection language. We follow the MT but flag this significant variant. The verb yatsdiq (make righteous/justify) is a legal term: the Servant's knowledge effects the acquittal of the many (larabbim).
12. The song concludes with God speaking in first person, vindicating and rewarding the Servant. Four reasons are given for the Servant's exaltation: (1) he poured out his soul (he'erah — literally emptied out, cf. Philippians 2:7) to death; (2) he was numbered with transgressors; (3) he bore the sin of many (chet-rabbim nasa); (4) he makes intercession (yafgia — the same root as hippgia in v.6) for transgressors. The final verb is imperfect tense (yafgia — he makes/will make intercession), suggesting ongoing action beyond death. Mark 15:28 and Luke 22:37 cite the numbered with transgressors clause. This verse, and the song as a whole, has shaped Jewish and Christian theology for over two millennia.

Summary: Following the Servant's suffering and vindication in chapter 53, this chapter explodes with the results: barren Zion is commanded to sing because her children will outnumber those of the married woman. God reveals Himself as both Zion's Maker and her husband, her Redeemer and the Holy One of Israel. A brief moment of wrath is swallowed by everlasting covenant love. God establishes an unbreakable covenant of peace and promises that no weapon formed against His people shall prosper.

What Makes This Remarkable: The concentration of divine titles in verse 5 is extraordinary: Maker, husband, the LORD of hosts, the Holy One of Israel, Redeemer, God of the whole earth. The covenant of peace (berit shalom, v.10) is compared to the Noahic covenant. The final verse has become a declaration of faith across traditions.

Translation Friction: The marital imagery of God as husband to Zion raises interpretive questions about how to read the exile. Verses 6-8 navigate this carefully: God admits to a moment of wrath but frames it within overflowing compassion. We have preserved both the tenderness and the tension.

Connections: The barren woman singing (v.1) echoes Sarah, Hannah, and anticipates Galatians 4:27. The covenant of peace (v.10) connects to Ezekiel 34:25 and 37:26. The precious stones of verses 11-12 reappear in Revelation 21:18-21. No weapon formed against you (v.17) has become one of the most widely quoted promises in both Jewish and Christian devotional life.

¹Sing, O barren one, who did not bear!
Break forth into singing and cry aloud,
you who have not been in labor!
For the children of the desolate one will be more than the children of her who is married,
says the LORD.

²Enlarge the place of your tent,
and let the curtains of your dwellings be stretched out.
Do not hold back; lengthen your cords and strengthen your stakes.

³For you will spread out to the right and to the left,
and your offspring will possess the nations and will people the desolate cities.

⁴Fear not, for you will not be ashamed;
be not confounded, for you will not be disgraced.
For you will forget the shame of your youth,
and the reproach of your widowhood
you will remember no more.

⁵For your Maker is your husband —
the LORD of hosts is His name —
and your Redeemer is the Holy One of Israel;
the God of the whole earth He is called.

⁶For the LORD has called you like a woman forsaken and grieved in spirit, like a wife of youth when she is cast off,

says your God.

⁷For a brief moment I forsook you,
but with great compassion I will gather you.

⁸In overflowing wrath for a moment
I hid my face from you,
but with everlasting covenant love I will have compassion on you, says the LORD, your Redeemer.

⁹This is like the days of Noah to me:
as I swore that the waters of Noah should no more go over the earth, so I have sworn that I will not be angry with you and will not rebuke you.

¹⁰For the mountains may depart and the hills be removed,
but my covenant love shall not depart from you,
and my covenant of peace shall not be removed,
says the LORD, who has compassion on you.

¹¹O afflicted one, storm-tossed and not comforted, behold, I will set your stones in antimony and lay your foundations with sapphires.

¹²I will make your pinnacles of agate,
your gates of carbuncle,
and all your walls of precious stones.

¹³And all your children shall be taught by the LORD,
and great shall be the peace of your children.

¹⁴In righteousness you shall be established;
you shall be far from oppression,
for you shall not fear,
and from terror, for it shall not come near you.

¹⁵If anyone stirs up strife,
it is not from me;
whoever stirs up strife with you shall fall because of you.

¹⁶Behold, I have created the smith who blows the fire of coals and produces a weapon for its purpose.
I have also created the destroyer to ruin.

¹⁷No weapon formed against you shall prosper, and every tongue that rises against you in judgment
 you shall refute.
 This is the heritage of the servants of the LORD,
 and their vindication from me,
 declares the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with an imperative to sing. The barren woman (aqarah) is Zion, whose exile was a season of childlessness. The reversal echoes Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, and Hannah. Paul quotes this verse in Galatians 4:27.
2. The tent imagery recalls Israel's nomadic origins and the tabernacle. Four imperatives (enlarge, stretch, lengthen, strengthen) convey urgent expansion.
3. The expansion is in every direction. The verb tirpotsi (spread/break forth) suggests irresistible growth. The inheritance of nations echoes the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 22:17).
4. Four shame-words are negated — Zion's humiliation is comprehensively erased. The shame of your youth may refer to Egypt; the reproach of widowhood to the exile.
5. Six divine titles cascade in rapid succession: Maker, husband, the LORD of hosts, Redeemer, the Holy One of Israel, the God of the whole earth. The combination of ba'al (husband) and go'el (Redeemer) in one verse is remarkable. The plural forms are majestic plurals referring to the one God.
6. God acknowledges Zion's experience: she felt forsaken and grieved. The phrase wife of youth (eshet ne'urim) implies first love — the relationship is deeply covenantal and intimate.
7. God admits to a real abandonment but qualifies it as rega qaton (a brief/small moment) against the backdrop of eternity. The contrast between brief moment and great compassion (rachamim gedolim) is the emotional center of the chapter.
8. The proportion is the point: overflowing wrath for a moment versus everlasting covenant love. The title go'alekh (your Redeemer) closes the verse, reminding Zion that the one who hid His face is the same one who redeems her.
9. God compares His promise to Zion to the Noahic covenant — the most universal and unconditional covenant in Scripture (Genesis 8:21-22; 9:8-17). The comparison elevates this promise to cosmic, irrevocable status.
10. Mountains — the most permanent features of the landscape — may move, but God's chesed and berit shalom are more enduring than geology itself. The title merachamekh uses the womb-related root rechem, connecting divine mercy to maternal love.
11. God addresses Zion with tender recognition of her suffering before announcing the remedy: a city rebuilt with precious stones. The sapphire foundations suggest a city of heavenly beauty — imagery that reappears in Revelation 21:19.
12. The exact identification of these gems is uncertain, but every surface of the restored city gleams with precious stone. The avnei-chefets (stones of delight) suggest a city that is itself a jewel.
13. Jesus quotes this verse in John 6:45. The wordplay between banayikh (your children) and bonayikh (your builders, cf. 49:17) may be intentional. The shalom of the children is the fruit of the berit shalom in verse 10.
14. The new Zion is founded on righteousness — not military power or political alliance. Fear and terror are banished from the city limits.
15. God distinguishes between His own actions and the hostility of others. Future attacks on Zion will not carry divine authorization. Without God's backing, any aggressor is doomed to fail.
16. God claims sovereignty even over those who forge weapons and those who wield them. Since I created both the weaponmaker and the destroyer, I control their limits.
17. The chapter concludes with one of the most quoted promises in Scripture. Two forms of attack are covered: physical (weapons) and verbal (tongues in judgment). The phrase avdei YHWH (servants of the LORD) shifts from the singular Servant of chapters 49-53 to the plural servants — suggesting that the Servant's mission creates a community who inherit his protection. Their vindication comes from God, not self-achieved.

Summary: This chapter is the grand invitation that closes the Servant Songs section of Isaiah. Everyone who thirsts is summoned to come and receive water, wine, and milk without money and without price. God offers an everlasting covenant rooted in the sure mercies promised to David. The nations will come running to Israel because of the Holy One of Israel. A call to seek the LORD while He may be found gives way to the soaring declaration that God's thoughts and ways transcend human comprehension. The chapter culminates in the assurance that God's word never returns empty and in a cosmic vision of mountains singing and trees clapping their hands.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening invitation (v.1) is one of the most expansive in Scripture — no qualifications, no prerequisites, only thirst. The comparison of God's word to rain and snow (vv.10-11) is among the most quoted passages in both Jewish and Christian traditions on the nature of divine revelation. The closing image of creation rejoicing (v.12) is unmatched in its exuberance: mountains and hills break into singing, trees of the field clap their hands.

Translation Friction: The everlasting covenant (berit olam) of verse 3 is explicitly linked to the chasdei David (the sure mercies/covenant loves of David), raising the question of how the Davidic covenant relates to the Servant's work in chapters 52-53. We note the connection without resolving the complex relationship between royal and servant messianism. The imperative to seek the LORD while He may be found (v.6) implies a window of opportunity that could close — a tension with the unconditional tone of the invitation.

Connections: The free water (v.1) echoes Isaiah 12:3 and anticipates John 7:37-38 (Jesus at the Feast of Tabernacles: If anyone thirsts, let him come to me). The Davidic covenant (v.3) connects to 2 Samuel 7 and Psalm 89. God's word not returning empty (v.11) is foundational to Jewish and Christian theology of Scripture. The thorns-to-cypress transformation (v.13) reverses the curse of Genesis 3:17-18. Revelation 22:17 echoes the invitation: Let the one who is thirsty come.

¹Come, everyone who thirsts, come to the waters!
And he who has no money,
come, buy and eat!
Come, buy wine and milk
without money and without price.

²Why do you spend money for what is not bread, and your labor for what does not satisfy?
Listen carefully to me, and eat what is good,
and delight yourselves in rich food.

³Incline your ear, and come to me;
hear, that your soul may live.
And I will make with you an everlasting covenant,
the sure covenant loves of David.

⁴Behold, I made him a witness to the peoples,
a leader and commander for the peoples.

⁵Behold, you shall call a nation you do not know,
and a nation that does not know you shall run to you,
because of the LORD your God,
and the Holy One of Israel,

for He has glorified you.

⁶Seek the LORD while He may be found;
call upon Him while He is near.

⁷Let the wicked forsake his way,
and the unrighteous man his thoughts;
let him return to the LORD, that He may have mercy on him,
and to our God, for He will abundantly pardon.

⁸For my thoughts are not your thoughts, neither are your ways my ways,
declares the LORD.

⁹For as the heavens are higher than the earth,
so are my ways higher than your ways and my thoughts than your thoughts.

¹⁰For as the rain and the snow come down from heaven and do not return there
but water the earth,
making it bring forth and sprout,
giving seed to the sower and bread to the eater,

¹¹so shall my word be that goes out from my mouth;
it shall not return to me empty,
but it shall accomplish that which I purpose,
and shall succeed in the thing for which I sent it.

¹²For you shall go out in joy and be led forth in peace.
The mountains and the hills before you shall break forth into singing, and all the trees of the field
shall clap their hands.

¹³Instead of the thorn shall come up the cypress, and instead of the brier shall come up the myrtle;
and it shall be to the LORD for a memorial,
for an everlasting sign that shall not be cut off.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew hoy is typically a woe-cry, but here it functions as an attention-grabbing summons — closer to Come! or Ho! The invitation is radically inclusive: everyone who thirsts, even those without money. The trio of water, wine, and milk represents the full spectrum of sustenance — necessity, celebration, and nourishment. The economics are inverted: buy without money. This echoes 52:3 (redeemed without money) and establishes the gift-nature of salvation.
2. The rhetorical question exposes the futility of pursuing satisfaction apart from God. The imperative shim'u shamoa (listen, truly listen) uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis — this is not casual hearing but the deepest attention. The word deshen (fatness/richness) denotes the choicest portion of a feast.

3. The berit olam (everlasting covenant) is defined as the chasdei David (the covenant loves/mercies of David). This connects God's promises to the Davidic dynasty (2 Samuel 7:8-16) with the broader invitation to all who thirst. Paul quotes this in Acts 13:34 as fulfilled in Jesus's resurrection. In Jewish tradition, this extends the Davidic covenant to all Israel.
4. The him refers to David (or the Davidic figure), appointed as ed (witness), nagid (leader/prince), and metsavveh (commander) to the nations. The scope extends beyond Israel — the Davidic covenant has universal implications. The term nagid is the same title used of Saul and David in 1 Samuel.
5. Nations previously unknown to Israel will come running (yarutsu — a verb of urgency and eagerness). The attraction is not Israel's own merit but God's glory manifest in her. The Holy One of Israel appears in full, the title that spans the entire book of Isaiah.
6. The double imperative (seek/call) paired with temporal clauses (while He may be found/while He is near) implies urgency — there is a window of divine accessibility that demands response. This verse has shaped Jewish liturgy for the High Holy Days (Yamim Nora'im) and Christian evangelistic tradition alike.
7. Repentance requires abandoning both action (way/derekh) and intention (thoughts/machshevotav). The verb yashuv (return) is the Hebrew word for repentance (teshuvah). The climactic promise ki-yarbeh lisloach (for He will abundantly pardon) uses the hiphil of rabah — God multiplies pardon, pardons extravagantly, pardons beyond measure.
8. Often quoted as a statement about divine mystery in general, the context is specifically about God's capacity to pardon. The reason God pardons so extravagantly (v.7) is that His thoughts and ways transcend human categories of justice and mercy. This is not about God being unknowable but about God being more merciful than we can imagine.
9. The comparison is spatial and infinite — the gap between earth and sky represents the gap between human and divine reasoning. In context, this is not a counsel of despair but of hope: God's mercy is as far above human mercy as the heavens are above the earth.
10. The rain/snow analogy establishes the efficacy of God's word by appeal to the observable water cycle. Rain does not return to the sky without first accomplishing its purpose: watering the earth, producing growth, yielding seed and bread. The chain from rain to bread traces the full arc of agricultural provision.
11. One of the most important verses in the Hebrew Bible on the nature of God's word (davar). The word is personified — it goes out, acts, accomplishes, succeeds, and returns. It is not merely information but an agent of divine will. The verb hitsliach (succeed/prosper) is the same root used of the Servant in 52:13 (yaskil) — God's word and God's Servant share the same efficacy.
12. The new exodus surpasses every previous one: the people depart in joy rather than haste (contrast Exodus 12:11 and 52:12). Nature itself participates in the celebration — mountains sing, trees applaud. This is not merely metaphor but a vision of creation liberated from its bondage (cf. Romans 8:19-22). The image of trees clapping their hands is unique to Isaiah and echoes Psalm 98:8.
13. The chapter and the entire Servant Songs section close with a vision of transformed nature. Thorns and briars — the emblems of the Genesis curse and of desolated land — are replaced by noble trees. The myrtle (hadas) is the plant associated with the name Hadassah (Esther). This transformation becomes a permanent memorial (shem) and everlasting sign (ot olam) of God's redemptive work — a new creation that will never be undone.

Summary: Isaiah 56 opens the final section of the book (chapters 56–66) with a radical declaration: the covenant community is not defined by ethnicity but by faithfulness. Foreigners and eunuchs — categories previously excluded from the assembly — are welcomed into God's house if they hold fast to His covenant and keep the Sabbath. The chapter then pivots sharply to condemn Israel's own leaders as blind watchmen and greedy shepherds who fail the very community they are charged to protect.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 7 — 'My house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples' — is one of the most universalist statements in the Hebrew Bible. Jesus quotes it directly when cleansing the Temple (Mark 11:17), making it a hinge text between the Testaments. The inclusion of eunuchs (v.5) overturns Deuteronomy 23:1, signaling that the eschatological age rewrites old boundaries.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew 'nilvim' (those who join themselves) in verse 3 raises the question of conversion theology in ancient Israel. We have rendered it to preserve the voluntary, covenantal nature of the act rather than importing later rabbinic or Christian conversion frameworks.

Connections: The 'house of prayer for all peoples' (v.7) connects forward to Jesus' Temple action (Mark 11:17, Matt 21:13, Luke 19:46). The eunuch inclusion anticipates the Ethiopian eunuch's baptism in Acts 8:26-39. The blind watchmen imagery (vv.10-11) parallels Ezekiel 34's indictment of Israel's shepherds.

¹This is what the LORD says:
 'Guard justice and practice righteousness,
 for My salvation is near — it comes!
 And My righteousness is about to be revealed.'

²Blessed is the one who does this,
 the son of man who holds fast to it —
 who keeps the Sabbath without profaning it and restrains his hand from every evil.

³Let not the foreigner who has joined himself to the LORD say,
 'The LORD will surely separate me from His people.'
 And let not the eunuch say,
 'I am only a dry tree.'

⁴For this is what the LORD says to the eunuchs who keep My Sabbaths, who choose what pleases Me
 and hold fast to My covenant:

⁵'I will give them, within My house and within My walls, a monument and a name
 better than sons and daughters.
 I will give them an everlasting name that shall not be cut off.'

⁶And the foreigners who join themselves to the LORD to minister to Him, to love the name of the LORD, and to be His servants —
 every one who keeps the Sabbath without profaning it and holds fast to My covenant —

⁷'I will bring them to My holy mountain and give them joy in My house of prayer.
 Their burnt offerings and sacrifices will be accepted on My altar, for My house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples.'

⁸The Lord GOD declares — He who gathers the outcasts of Israel:
 'I will gather still others to him beyond those already gathered.'

⁹All you beasts of the field, come to devour!
 All you beasts in the forest!

¹⁰His watchmen are blind — all of them.
 They know nothing.
 They are all mute dogs that cannot bark,

dreamers lying down, lovers of sleep.

¹¹The dogs have a mighty appetite — they never have enough.
And these are shepherds! They have no understanding.
They have all turned to their own way,
each to his own gain, every last one.

¹²'Come,' they say, 'let me get wine!
Let us drink our fill of strong drink!
And tomorrow will be like today —
great beyond measure!'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'This is what the LORD says' renders ko amar YHWH per locked formula.
1. 'Guard justice' (shimru mishpat) carries the sense of active watchfulness, not passive observance.
2. 'Son of man' (ben adam) is used generically here — any human being, not a messianic title.
3. 'Joined himself' (nilvah) indicates voluntary covenantal attachment — the foreigner has chosen allegiance to YHWH.
3. The eunuch's lament ('dry tree') reflects exclusion from the assembly under Deuteronomy 23:1 and the loss of progeny.
4. Three conditions define the faithful eunuch: Sabbath-keeping, choosing God's will, and covenant loyalty.
5. 'Yad vashem' — literally 'hand and name' — became the name of Israel's Holocaust memorial, drawn directly from this verse.
5. The promise reverses the eunuch's despair: where biology fails, God's covenant provides an enduring legacy.
6. Five marks of the faithful foreigner: joining, ministering, loving the Name, serving, and Sabbath-keeping.
7. Jesus quotes this verse in Mark 11:17 when cleansing the Temple, accusing the authorities of making God's house a 'den of robbers' rather than fulfilling its universal vocation.
7. 'For all peoples' (lekhol ha'ammim) — the plural 'peoples' is significant: not one nation but all nations.
8. The 'others' gathered alongside Israel anticipates the Gentile inclusion theme that dominates the New Testament.
9. An abrupt shift: wild beasts are summoned as instruments of judgment against Israel's failed leaders. The imagery parallels Ezekiel 34:5, 8.
10. 'Watchmen' (tsofim) are spiritual sentinels — prophets tasked with warning the people. Their blindness is a damning contradiction.
10. 'Mute dogs that cannot bark' — guard dogs that fail their one function. The metaphor is deliberately humiliating.
11. The shift from 'dogs' to 'shepherds' collapses the metaphor: the leaders are worse than the guard dogs — they are supposed to be shepherds but behave like ravenous animals.
12. The chapter ends with the leaders' own words — self-indulgent, oblivious to judgment. Their cry of 'tomorrow will be like today' is a theology of presumption that Isaiah dismantles throughout the book.

Summary: Isaiah 57 opens with a lament that the righteous perish and no one takes it to heart — their death is actually a mercy, sparing them from the evil to come. The chapter then unleashes a blistering indictment of idolatry, exposing Israel's spiritual adultery in valleys, under oaks, and on high mountains. Yet the chapter pivots dramatically at verse 15 to one of the most profound theology-of-presence statements in all of Scripture: the High and Exalted One dwells with the crushed and lowly in spirit. The chapter closes with the offer of peace — but not for the wicked.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 15 is among the most theologically dense verses in Isaiah. It holds two seemingly irreconcilable truths in tension: God inhabits eternity and the high holy place, yet He simultaneously dwells with the contrite and lowly. This is not condescension but divine preference. Verse 19 anticipates Ephesians 2:17 ('peace to those who were far off and peace to those who were near'). Verse 21's refrain — 'There is no peace for the wicked' — is the second of three occurrences that structurally divide Isaiah 40–66 into three sections of nine chapters each.

Translation Friction: The idolatry passages (vv.5-10) contain sexually charged language describing Israel's unfaithfulness. We have rendered these with fidelity to the prophetic rhetoric without sanitizing the force of the metaphor, as the shock is intentional to the prophetic message.

Connections: Verse 15's theology of divine presence with the lowly connects to Psalm 34:18, Psalm 51:17, and Jesus' Beatitudes (Matt 5:3-4). Verse 19's 'peace to the far and near' is quoted in Ephesians 2:17. The 'no peace for the wicked' refrain (v.21) echoes 48:22 and anticipates 66:24.

¹The righteous one perishes, and no one takes it to heart.
Men of steadfast love are gathered away,
with no one understanding that the righteous is taken away from the evil to come.

²He enters into peace;
they rest on their beds —
each one who walked in uprightness.

³But you — draw near, you sons of a sorceress, you offspring of the adulterer and the prostitute!

⁴Whom are you mocking?
Against whom do you open wide your mouth
and stick out your tongue?
Are you not children of transgression,
offspring of deceit?

⁵You who burn with lust among the oaks, under every green tree —
who slaughter children in the valleys,
under the clefts of the rocks!

⁶Among the smooth stones of the valley is your portion;
they, they are your lot!
To them you have poured out drink offerings;
you have brought grain offerings.
Shall I relent concerning these things?

⁷On a high and lofty mountain
you have set your bed;
there also you went up to offer sacrifice.

⁸Behind the door and the doorpost
you have set up your pagan symbols.
Deserted Me and uncovered yourself —
you climbed up and made your bed wide.
You made a pact with them;
you loved their bed;

you gazed on their nakedness.

⁹You journeyed to the king with oil and multiplied your perfumes.
You sent your envoys far away and debased yourself even to Sheol.

¹⁰You wearied yourself on your many journeys,
but you never said, 'It is hopeless.'
You found renewal of strength and so did not grow faint.

¹¹Whom did you dread and fear, that you lied and did not remember Me
or take it to heart?
Have I not held My peace for a long time,
and so you do not fear Me?

¹²I will expose your so-called righteousness and your works — they will not profit you.

¹³When you cry out, let your collection of idols deliver you!
But the wind will carry them all away;
a breath will take them.
But the one who takes refuge in Me shall inherit the land and possess My holy mountain.

¹⁴And it shall be said:
'Build up, build up! Prepare the way!
Remove every obstacle from the path of My people.'

¹⁵For this is what the High and Exalted One says —
He who inhabits eternity, whose name is Holy:
'I dwell in the high and holy place,
and also with the one who is crushed and lowly in spirit — to revive the spirit of the lowly and to revive the heart of the crushed.'

¹⁶For I will not contend forever, nor will I always be angry,
for the spirit would grow faint before Me —
the very breath of life that I have made.

¹⁷Because of his wicked greed I was angry;
I struck him and hid My face in wrath.
Yet he kept turning away,
following the path of his own heart.

¹⁸I have seen his ways, but I will heal him.
I will lead him and restore comfort to him and to his mourners.

¹⁹creating the fruit of the lips:
'Peace, peace to the one who is far off and to the one who is near,'
says the LORD, 'and I will heal him.'

²⁰But the wicked are like the churning sea that cannot be still;
its waters toss up mire and mud.

²¹'There is no peace,' says my God,
'for the wicked.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Men of steadfast love' (anshei chesed) — those defined by covenant faithfulness. Their death is reframed as divine protection, not divine failure.
2. Death for the righteous is described as entering shalom — wholeness and rest. This is one of the Old Testament's gentlest depictions of death.
3. The tone shifts violently. The tender eulogy for the righteous gives way to a courtroom summons against the idolaters.
4. The mocking gestures described (wide mouth, extended tongue) indicate contempt — likely directed at the prophets or at YHWH Himself.
5. 'Slaughter children' refers to child sacrifice, likely to Molech — the most horrifying expression of Israel's apostasy. The valley likely refers to the Valley of Hinnom (Gehenna).
6. A bitter wordplay: chalqei nachal (smooth stones of the valley) sounds like cheleq (portion/inheritance). Israel's 'inheritance' has become river rocks used in pagan worship.
7. 'High places' were hilltop shrines associated with Canaanite worship. The 'bed' imagery merges sexual and religious infidelity.
8. Where the mezuzah should display God's words (Deut 6:9), they have placed pagan memorial symbols — a direct inversion of covenant faithfulness.
9. 'The king' (melekh) may refer to the pagan deity Molech (same consonants in Hebrew) or to foreign political alliances — both are acts of unfaithfulness to YHWH.
10. The tragic irony: Israel's idolatrous energy never flags. She finds just enough false vitality in her adultery to keep pursuing it.
11. God's long silence (machsheh) is revealed as the very thing that enabled Israel's recklessness — they mistook patience for indifference.
12. 'Your righteousness' is spoken with biting irony — Israel's self-assessed righteousness will be publicly deconstructed.
13. The pivot: idols are carried off by wind (ruach), but those who trust YHWH inherit the land. The same ruach that destroys the false gives life to the faithful.
14. This echoes the highway language of Isaiah 40:3 — God is again preparing a way for His people's return.
15. This verse is one of the theological peaks of Isaiah. The God who is ram venissa (high and exalted) — the same phrase from Isaiah 6:1 — chooses to dwell with the dakka (crushed). The paradox is the point.
15. 'Inhabits eternity' (shokhen ad) — God's dwelling is not merely a place but a mode of being. He is both transcendent and intimately present.
16. God self-limits His wrath because the creatures He made could not survive it indefinitely. His anger is real but bounded by His creative compassion.
17. Even divine discipline did not produce repentance — Israel 'kept turning away' (shobab), a stubborn backsliding despite the blows.
18. The 'but' is implicit and crucial: God sees the rebellion and chooses healing anyway. Grace is not ignorance of sin but sovereignty over it.
19. Paul quotes this verse in Ephesians 2:17, identifying 'those far off' as Gentiles and 'those near' as Jews — both reconciled through Christ.
19. 'Creating the fruit of the lips' — God creates the very praise that responds to His healing. The thanksgiving itself is a divine gift.
20. The sea image captures restless, self-destructive agitation — the wicked cannot find the shalom just offered because their own nature prevents it.
21. This refrain (also at 48:22) divides Isaiah's final 27 chapters into three sections of nine chapters each (40-48, 49-57, 58-66). It is a structural and theological marker: God's peace is real but not universal — it excludes those who refuse it.

Summary: Isaiah 58 is one of the most socially explosive chapters in the prophetic canon. The people fast and wonder why God does not notice. God answers: their fasting is a performance of piety while they exploit their workers and quarrel with fists. The true fast God chooses is justice — loosing bonds of wickedness, feeding the hungry, housing the homeless, clothing the naked. When worship becomes justice, then 'your light shall break forth like the dawn.' The chapter closes with a call to Sabbath delight that reframes rest as joy rather than obligation.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 6-7 constitute one of the most direct statements of social ethics in the Hebrew Bible: the fast God desires is not abstaining from food but abstaining from injustice. Jesus echoes this priority in Matthew 25:35-36 ('I was hungry and you gave Me food'). Verse 8's 'your light shall break forth like the dawn' becomes a controlling image for the entire final section of Isaiah.

Translation Friction: The tension between ritual and ethics is not either/or — Isaiah does not abolish fasting but redefines it. We have rendered the passage to preserve this nuance: God does not reject worship but refuses worship severed from justice.

Connections: Verses 6-7 anticipate Jesus' parable of the sheep and goats (Matt 25:31-46). The 'light breaking forth' (v.8) connects to Isaiah 60:1 and John 1:5. The Sabbath theology of vv.13-14 anticipates Jesus' Sabbath controversies (Mark 2:27-28). James 1:27 echoes this chapter's definition of true religion.

¹Cry aloud — do not hold back!
Lift up your voice like a shofar!
Declare to My people their transgression,
to the house of Jacob their sins.

²Yet day after day they seek Me and delight to know My ways,
as if they were a nation that practiced righteousness and had not forsaken the justice of their God.
They ask Me for righteous judgments;
they delight in drawing near to God.

³'Why have we fasted, and You do not see?
Why have we humbled ourselves, and You take no notice?'
Look — on the day of your fast you pursue your own interests and oppress all your workers.

⁴You fast only to quarrel and fight and to strike with a wicked fist.
You do not fast as you do today to make your voice heard on high.

⁵Is this the fast I choose — a day for a person to humble himself?
Is it to bow your head like a reed and spread out sackcloth and ashes?
Will you call this a fast,
a day acceptable to the LORD?

⁶Is this not the fast I choose:
to loose the bonds of wickedness,
to untie the straps of the yoke,
to let the oppressed go free,
and to break every yoke?

⁷Is it not to share your bread with the hungry and bring the homeless poor into your house —
when you see the naked, to cover him,
and not to turn away from your own flesh?

⁸Then your light shall break forth like the dawn,
and your healing shall spring up swiftly.
Your righteousness shall go before you;
the glory of the LORD shall be your rear guard.

⁹Then you shall call, and the LORD will answer;
you shall cry, and He will say, 'Here I am.'
If you remove the yoke from your midst,
the pointing of the finger and the speaking of wickedness,

¹⁰if you pour yourself out for the hungry and satisfy the desire of the afflicted, then your light shall rise in the darkness,
and your gloom shall be as the noonday.

¹¹And the LORD will guide you continually and satisfy your soul in scorched places and strengthen your bones.
You shall be like a watered garden,
like a spring of water
whose waters do not fail.

¹²And your people shall rebuild the ancient ruins;
you shall raise up the foundations of many generations.
You shall be called the Repairer of the Breach,
the Restorer of Streets to Dwell In.

¹³If you turn back your foot from the Sabbath,
from pursuing your own interests on My holy day,
and call the Sabbath a delight and the holy day of the LORD honorable;
if you honor it, not going your own ways or pursuing your own interests or talking idly —

¹⁴then you shall delight yourself in the LORD, and I will make you ride on the heights of the earth;
I will feed you with the heritage of Jacob your father,
for the mouth of the LORD has spoken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Shofar' is retained rather than 'trumpet' — the ram's horn carries covenantal and liturgical weight that 'trumpet' flattens.
2. The 'as if' (ke-goi asher) is devastating — they perform the posture of faithfulness while living in contradiction to it.
3. God quotes the people's complaint, then immediately exposes the fraud: their fasting coexists with economic exploitation.
4. The irony: fasting is supposed to humble, but their fast days produce quarreling and violence.
5. God does not reject humility but exposes its counterfeit: the outward posture of bowed head and sackcloth without inner transformation or outward justice.
6. This verse redefines fasting from a ritual of self-denial to an act of liberation. The four actions are all about freeing others from oppression.
7. Four concrete acts of mercy: feeding, housing, clothing, and not hiding from family obligation. Jesus draws on this list in Matthew 25:35-36.
7. 'Your own flesh' (besarkha) — the poor are not strangers but kin. All humanity shares one flesh.
8. The 'then' is conditional — the light breaks forth only when justice replaces empty ritual. The military imagery (vanguard and rear guard) means God's righteousness and glory surround the just community.
9. 'Here I am' (hineni) — the same word Abraham and Moses used in response to God. Now God uses it in response to His people. The reversal is stunning.
10. 'Pour yourself out' (tapeq nafshekha) — not merely giving food but giving your very self. The fast becomes self-giving rather than self-denial.
11. The imagery reverses the fast: those who feed others are themselves fed by God. The 'watered garden' echoes Eden — justice restores paradise.
12. Two magnificent titles are bestowed: 'Repairer of the Breach' and 'Restorer of Streets to Dwell In.' These are vocational names — the just community is known by its restorative work.
13. The Sabbath is reframed as 'delight' (oneg) — not a burden of restriction but a gift of liberation from relentless productivity.
14. The chapter ends where it began — with a word from the LORD's mouth. But now the word is promise rather than rebuke. The 'heritage of Jacob' is the full covenantal inheritance.

Summary: Isaiah 59 begins with one of the most important theological clarifications in the prophetic literature: the problem is not God's inability to save but Israel's sin, which has created a barrier between them and their God. What follows is a devastating catalog of sins — lies, violence, injustice, and moral blindness (vv.2-8). The people then confess their condition in raw communal lament (vv.9-15a). When God looks and sees that there is no justice and no one to intervene, He is appalled — and acts Himself, putting on righteousness as a breastplate and salvation as a helmet (vv.15b-17). The chapter climaxes with the Redeemer coming to Zion and an everlasting covenant of Spirit and word (vv.20-21).

What Makes This Remarkable: Verses 15b-17 depict God as a divine warrior who, finding no human champion, arms Himself for battle. Paul draws directly on this imagery in Ephesians 6:14-17 ('the armor of God'). Verse 20 names the Redeemer (go'el) who comes to Zion — a text Paul cites in Romans 11:26. Verse 21's covenant of Spirit and words is one of the most forward-looking promises in Isaiah, anticipating Pentecost.

Translation Friction: The shift from third-person indictment (vv.2-8) to first-person confession (vv.9-15a) is jarring. We have preserved this shift as it stands in the Hebrew rather than smoothing it, as the prophetic identification with the sinful community is theologically significant — Isaiah confesses as one of the people.

Connections: The divine warrior imagery (vv.16-17) is the source for Paul's 'armor of God' in Ephesians 6:14-17 and 1 Thessalonians 5:8. Verse 20's Redeemer (go'el) coming to Zion is cited by Paul in Romans 11:26. Verse 21's Spirit-and-word covenant anticipates Joel 2:28-29 and Acts 2.

1 Surely the hand of the LORD is not too short to save, nor His ear too dull to hear.

²But your iniquities have made a separation between you and your God, and your sins have hidden His face from you
so that He does not hear.

³For your hands are defiled with blood and your fingers with iniquity;
your lips have spoken lies;
your tongue mutters wickedness.

⁴No one brings a lawsuit in righteousness;
no one pleads a case in truth.
They trust in emptiness and speak lies;
they conceive mischief and give birth to iniquity.

⁵They hatch adders' eggs
and weave the spider's web.
Whoever eats their eggs dies,
and from one that is crushed, a viper hatches.

⁶Their webs will not serve as clothing;
they cannot cover themselves with their works.
Their works are works of iniquity,
and deeds of violence are in their hands.

⁷Their feet run to evil,
and they rush to shed innocent blood.
Their thoughts are thoughts of iniquity;
desolation and destruction are in their paths.

⁸The way of peace they do not know,
and there is no justice in their paths.
They have made their roads crooked;
no one who treads on them knows peace.

⁹Therefore justice is far from us,
and righteousness does not reach us.
We hope for light, but there is darkness;
for brightness, but we walk in deep gloom.

¹⁰We grope along the wall like the blind;
we grope like those who have no eyes.
We stumble at noon as in the twilight;
among the vigorous we are like the dead.

¹¹We all growl like bears;
we moan and moan like doves.
We hope for justice, but there is none;
for salvation, but it is far from us.

¹²For our transgressions are multiplied before You,
and our sins testify against us;
for our transgressions are with us,
and we know our iniquities:

¹³transgressing and denying the LORD, turning back from following our God,
speaking oppression and revolt,
conceiving and uttering from the heart words of falsehood.

¹⁴Justice is turned back,
and righteousness stands far away;
for truth has stumbled in the public square,
and uprightness cannot enter.

¹⁵Truth is lacking,
and whoever turns from evil is plundered.
The LORD saw it, and it was evil in His eyes that there was no justice.

¹⁶He saw that there was no one,
and was appalled that there was no one to intervene.
So His own arm brought Him salvation, and His own righteousness upheld Him.

¹⁷He put on righteousness as a breastplate and a helmet of salvation on His head.
He put on garments of vengeance for clothing and wrapped Himself in zeal as a cloak.

¹⁸According to their deeds, so He will repay:
wrath to His adversaries, repayment to His enemies;
to the coastlands He will render repayment.

¹⁹So they shall fear the name of the LORD from the west and His glory from the rising of the sun.
For He will come like a rushing stream driven by the breath of the LORD.

²⁰'And a Redeemer will come to Zion, to those in Jacob who turn from transgression,'
declares the LORD.

²¹'And as for Me, this is My covenant with them,' says the LORD:
'My Spirit who is upon you,
and My words that I have put in your mouth,
shall not depart from your mouth,
or from the mouth of your offspring,
or from the mouth of your offspring's offspring,'

says the LORD, 'from this time forth and forevermore.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens by eliminating the wrong diagnosis: the problem is not divine impotence. God's hand is not 'shortened' (qatsrah) — He is fully able.
2. Sin as separation — one of the clearest statements in the Hebrew Bible that sin is not merely rule-breaking but relational rupture.
3. The catalog of sin moves from hands to fingers to lips to tongue — progressively more intimate, showing that corruption has penetrated every level of action and speech.
4. The legal system itself is corrupt — the very institution meant to produce justice has become an instrument of injustice.
5. Two vivid metaphors for the products of wickedness: poisonous eggs that kill those who consume them, and webs that offer no real protection.
6. Spider webs as clothing — a perfect image of the inadequacy of human self-righteousness to cover guilt.
7. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 3:15-16 as part of his universal indictment of human sinfulness.
8. Paul also cites this verse in Romans 3:17. The catalog of sins in vv.3-8 becomes a key proof-text for universal human depravity.
9. The voice shifts to first-person plural — the community now confesses. The prophet identifies with the sinners rather than standing apart from them.
10. Blindness at noon — the light is present but they cannot see it. Sin has not extinguished the sun; it has destroyed their vision.
11. Bears and doves — rage and grief. The community oscillates between angry frustration and helpless mourning.
12. The confession is unsparing: sins 'testify against us' like witnesses in court. There is no denial, no excuse.
13. The sin is both vertical (denying God) and horizontal (oppression). The two dimensions of the covenant — love of God and love of neighbor — are both violated.
14. 'Truth has stumbled in the public square' — the place where justice should be most visible is exactly where it has collapsed.
15. The pivot of the chapter: God Himself looks at the situation and is appalled. The phrase 'evil in His eyes' signals divine moral outrage.
16. No human champion exists — so God Himself becomes the warrior. 'His own arm' is a recurring image for divine action without human mediation (cf. 40:10, 51:5, 52:10, 53:1).
17. Paul adapts this imagery in Ephesians 6:14-17, transferring the divine armor to believers. The original wearer is God Himself — what believers put on is God's own equipment.
18. 'Coastlands' (iyyim) represents the distant nations — God's justice is not limited to Israel but extends to the ends of the earth.
19. The Hebrew syntax is debated. We follow the reading that makes YHWH (not the enemy) the subject: He comes like a rushing torrent, propelled by His own Spirit.
20. Paul cites this verse in Romans 11:26 ('The Deliverer will come from Zion'). The go'el is God Himself acting as kinsman-redeemer for Israel.
20. 'Declares the LORD' renders ne'um YHWH per locked formula.
21. The chapter's final verse establishes an everlasting covenant defined by two gifts: Spirit and word. This is one of the clearest Old Testament anticipations of Pentecost — the Spirit permanently dwelling with God's people, generation after generation.

Summary: Isaiah 60 is one of the most luminous chapters in all of Scripture — a sustained vision of Zion's future glory. It opens with the command 'Arise, shine, for your light has come!' and unfolds into a panoramic vision of nations streaming to Jerusalem's light, bringing their wealth, their worship, and their children. The chapter transforms every dimension of the city: walls become Salvation, gates become Praise, the sun and moon are replaced by the LORD Himself as everlasting light, and the people — all righteous — inherit the land forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the theological heart of Isaiah's eschatological vision. Verse 1 is among the most recognized lines in the Hebrew Bible. The imagery of nations bringing gifts (vv.5-7) is traditionally connected to the Magi's visit in Matthew 2. Verses 19-20 — the LORD replacing sun and moon — are directly echoed in Revelation 21:23 and 22:5. The entire chapter reads as a preview of the New Jerusalem.

Translation Friction: The tension between historical Jerusalem and eschatological Zion is acute throughout. We have rendered the text to honor both dimensions: this is a real city with real gates and walls, yet the language consistently transcends any historical fulfillment.

Connections: Verse 1's 'Arise, shine' echoes through Christian hymnody and Advent liturgy. The nations bringing wealth (vv.5-7) connects to the Magi narrative (Matt 2:1-12). Verses 19-20 are the source for Revelation 21:23 and 22:5 (no need for sun — the Lamb is the light). Verse 21's 'all righteous' anticipates 2 Peter 3:13's 'new heavens and new earth in which righteousness dwells.'

¹Arise, shine, for your light has come, and the glory of the LORD has risen upon you!

²For behold, darkness shall cover the earth, and thick darkness the peoples;
but the LORD will arise upon you,
and His glory will be seen upon you.

³And nations shall come to your light, and kings to the brightness of your dawn.

⁴Lift up your eyes all around and see:
they all gather together; they come to you.
Your sons shall come from afar,
and your daughters shall be carried on the hip.

⁵Then you shall see and be radiant;
your heart shall thrill and overflow,
for the abundance of the sea shall be turned to you,
the wealth of the nations shall come to you.

⁶A multitude of camels shall cover you,
the young camels of Midian and Ephah;
all those from Sheba shall come.
They shall bring gold and frankincense and shall proclaim the praises of the LORD.

⁷All the flocks of Kedar shall be gathered to you;
the rams of Nebaioth shall serve you.
They shall come up with acceptance on My altar,
and I will glorify My glorious house.

⁸Who are these that fly like a cloud, like doves to their nesting places?

⁹Surely the coastlands shall wait for Me, and the ships of Tarshish first,
to bring your children from afar,
their silver and gold with them,
for the name of the LORD your God,
and for the Holy One of Israel,
because He has glorified you.

¹⁰Foreigners shall build up your walls,
and their kings shall serve you;
for in My wrath I struck you,
but in My favor I have had mercy on you.

¹¹Your gates shall be open continually;
day and night they shall not be shut,
that the wealth of the nations may be brought to you,
with their kings led in procession.

¹²For the nation and kingdom that will not serve you shall perish;
those nations shall be utterly laid waste.

¹³The glory of Lebanon shall come to you — the cypress, the plane tree, and the pine together — to beautify the place of My sanctuary, and I will make the place of My feet glorious.

¹⁴The children of those who afflicted you shall come bending low to you,
and all who despised you shall bow down at your feet.
They shall call you the City of the LORD,
the Zion of the Holy One of Israel.

¹⁵Whereas you have been forsaken and hated, with no one passing through,
I will make you majestic forever,
a joy from age to age.

¹⁶You shall nurse at the breast of nations and be nursed at the breast of kings, and you shall know that I, the LORD, am your Savior
and your Redeemer, the Mighty One of Jacob.

¹⁷Instead of bronze I will bring gold, and instead of iron I will bring silver;
instead of wood, bronze,
and instead of stones, iron.
I will make your overseers peace and your taskmasters righteousness.

¹⁸Violence shall no more be heard in your land, devastation or destruction within your borders.
You shall call your walls Salvation and your gates Praise.

¹⁹The sun shall no longer be your light by day,
nor shall the moon give you light by its brightness;
but the LORD will be your everlasting light,
and your God will be your glory.

²⁰Your sun shall no more go down, and your moon shall not withdraw;
for the LORD will be your everlasting light,
and your days of mourning shall be ended.

²¹Your people shall all be righteous;
they shall possess the land forever,
the branch of My planting,
the work of My hands,
that I may be glorified.

²²The least one shall become a clan,
and the smallest a mighty nation.
I am the LORD;
in its time I will hasten it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The imperatives are feminine singular — addressed to Zion as a woman. The 'light' is not her own; it has 'come' to her from God.
2. The contrast is absolute: universal darkness versus Zion's light. The light is not general illumination but the kabod (glory) of YHWH Himself.
3. The pilgrimage of nations to Zion — a theme running through Isaiah (2:2-4, 11:10, 49:6) — reaches its fullest expression here.
4. 'Carried on the hip' — the image of small children being carried home. Zion's scattered children return not as soldiers but as beloved infants.
5. Zion's emotional response: seeing, radiance, a heart that both trembles (pachad) and expands (rachab). Joy and awe coexist.
6. Gold and frankincense from Sheba — the traditional connection to the Magi in Matthew 2:11 ('gold, frankincense, and myrrh'). Matthew sees Jesus' birth as the fulfillment of this very passage.
7. Kedar and Nebaioth are sons of Ishmael (Gen 25:13) — the Ishmaelite nations bringing offerings to YHWH's altar. The inclusion is deliberate and stunning.
8. A moment of wonder — Zion looks up and sees approaching crowds so vast they look like clouds, so swift they look like doves homing.
9. 'The Holy One of Israel' — Isaiah's signature title for God, rendered in full per project convention.
9. Ships of Tarshish represent the most distant maritime commerce — even the farthest trading vessels serve Zion's restoration.
10. The reversal: foreigners who once destroyed Jerusalem's walls will rebuild them. Kings who once conquered will serve.
11. Gates perpetually open — a city with no fear of attack. Revelation 21:25 directly echoes this verse: 'its gates will never be shut by day — and there will be no night there.'
12. A sobering counterpoint to the vision of inclusion: the pilgrimage to Zion is not optional. Refusal to participate in God's new order results in destruction.
13. Lebanon's famous cedars and timber furnished Solomon's Temple (1 Kings 5). Now they furnish the eschatological sanctuary.
14. 'The Zion of the Holy One of Israel' — the city receives its ultimate name, defined not by its geography but by whose city it is.
15. The reversal formula: 'whereas... I will make.' Every aspect of Zion's humiliation is overturned.
16. 'Your Redeemer' — go'el rendered as capitalized 'Redeemer' per project convention. Three divine titles stack: LORD, Savior, Redeemer.
17. Every material is upgraded one tier. But the climactic substitution is not material: oppressive taskmasters are replaced by peace and righteousness as governing principles.

- 18. The renaming of architecture: walls become 'Salvation' (Yeshuah), gates become 'Praise' (Tehillah). The city's very structure proclaims its theological identity.
- 19. Revelation 21:23 directly echoes this verse: 'The city has no need of sun or moon to shine on it, for the glory of God gives it light, and its lamp is the Lamb.'
- 20. 'Your days of mourning shall be ended' — the final word of v.20 is not about light but about grief. The everlasting light means the permanent end of sorrow.
- 21. 'All righteous' — not by their own merit but because they are God's planting (matta'i) and God's handiwork (ma'aseh yadai). Their righteousness is derivative, not original.
- 22. The chapter's final words hold two seemingly contradictory ideas: 'in its time' (be'ittah — at the appointed moment) and 'I will hasten it' (achishennah — I will speed it up). God's timing is both patient and urgent.

Summary: Isaiah 61 is the chapter Jesus chose to announce His ministry. In the synagogue at Nazareth, He read verses 1-2a aloud, then closed the scroll and said, 'Today this Scripture has been fulfilled in your hearing' (Luke 4:21). The speaker — anointed by the Spirit of the Lord GOD — proclaims good news to the poor, liberty to captives, comfort to mourners, and the year of the LORD's favor. The anointed one transforms mourning into gladness, ashes into beauty, and a spirit of heaviness into a garment of praise. The restored people become 'oaks of righteousness, the planting of the LORD,' and rebuild what was ruined.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the single most important messianic self-identification text in the Gospels. When Jesus stops reading mid-sentence — at 'the year of the LORD's favor' — and does not read 'the day of vengeance of our God,' the omission is thunderous. His first coming is mercy; judgment awaits. The identity of the speaker in the original context is debated (the prophet? the Servant? the Messiah?), but Jesus resolves the ambiguity by claiming the text for Himself.

Translation Friction: The speaker's identity in the Hebrew context is genuinely ambiguous — is this the prophet Isaiah, the Servant of chapters 42-53, or a distinct messianic figure? We have rendered the text to preserve this productive ambiguity rather than resolving it, since the New Testament resolution (Jesus in Luke 4) is best encountered as revelation rather than assumption.

Connections: Verses 1-2 are quoted by Jesus in Luke 4:18-21 as His inaugural messianic declaration. The 'year of the LORD's favor' (v.2) connects to the Jubilee legislation of Leviticus 25. 'Oaks of righteousness' (v.3) echoes the 'branch of My planting' in 60:21. The priestly identity of the people (v.6) anticipates 1 Peter 2:9 ('a royal priesthood'). The bridegroom/bride imagery (v.10) connects forward to Revelation 19:7-8 and 21:2.

¹The Spirit of the Lord GOD is upon me, because the LORD has anointed me
to bring good news to the poor.
He has sent me to bind up the brokenhearted, to proclaim liberty to the captives
and the opening of the eyes to those who are bound,

²to proclaim the year of the LORD's favor and the day of vengeance of our God;
to comfort all who mourn,

³to grant to those who mourn in Zion —
to give them a crown of beauty instead of ashes,
the oil of gladness instead of mourning,
the garment of praise instead of a spirit of heaviness.
They shall be called oaks of righteousness,

the planting of the LORD,
that He may be glorified.

⁴They shall build up the ancient ruins;
they shall raise up the former desolations;
they shall repair the ruined cities,
the devastations of many generations.

⁵Strangers shall stand and tend your flocks, and foreigners shall be your plowmen and your vinedressers.

⁶But you shall be called priests of the LORD;
they shall speak of you as ministers of our God.
You shall eat the wealth of the nations,
and in their glory you shall boast.

⁷Instead of your shame there shall be a double portion;
instead of dishonor they shall rejoice in their lot.
Therefore in their land they shall possess a double portion;
everlasting joy shall be theirs.

⁸For I the LORD love justice;
I hate robbery and wrongdoing.
I will faithfully give them their recompense,
and I will make an everlasting covenant with them.

⁹Their offspring shall be known among the nations,
and their descendants among the peoples.
All who see them shall acknowledge them,
that they are offspring the LORD has blessed.

¹⁰I will greatly rejoice in the LORD;
my soul shall exult in my God,
for He has clothed me with garments of salvation;
He has wrapped me in a robe of righteousness,
as a bridegroom adorns himself like a priest with a turban,
and as a bride adorns herself with her jewels.

¹¹For as the earth brings forth its sprouts, and as a garden causes what is sown in it to spring up,
so the Lord GOD will cause righteousness and praise to spring up before all the nations.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Jesus reads this verse aloud in the Nazareth synagogue (Luke 4:18). The anointing by the Spirit identifies the speaker as the Messiah (mashiach = anointed one).
1. 'Opening of the eyes' (peqach-qoach) — the Hebrew is ambiguous: it can mean 'opening of eyes' (to the blind) or 'opening wide' (of prison doors). Luke's Greek resolves it as sight for the blind, but we preserve both possibilities.

2. Jesus stops reading mid-verse — after 'the year of the LORD's favor' — and closes the scroll (Luke 4:20). The 'day of vengeance' is deliberately omitted from His first-coming announcement.
2. The juxtaposition of 'year of favor' (an entire year) and 'day of vengeance' (a single day) suggests that mercy is God's extended posture; judgment is His brief, reluctant act.
3. Three exchanges define the transformation: beauty for ashes, gladness for mourning, praise for heaviness. Each replaces the posture of grief with the posture of celebration.
3. 'Oaks of righteousness' (eilei hatsedeq) — massive, deep-rooted trees. The mourners become monuments of God's faithfulness.
4. The restored people become restorers. The pattern of Isaiah 58:12 continues: those who have received comfort become agents of reconstruction.
5. The people are freed from agricultural labor so they can fulfill their priestly vocation (v.6). This is not exploitation of foreigners but a division of labor in the eschatological community.
6. The entire people become priests — not just the Levitical line. This democratization of the priesthood is picked up in 1 Peter 2:9 ('a royal priesthood') and Revelation 1:6 ('a kingdom of priests').
7. 'Double portion' (mishneh) — the inheritance of the firstborn (Deut 21:17). What was taken in shame is returned with interest, and Israel is restored to firstborn status.
8. God's character — lover of justice, hater of robbery — is the foundation of the everlasting covenant. The covenant is rooted in God's moral nature, not merely His sovereign will.
9. The reversal is public and visible: the nations who once despised Israel will look at the restored community and recognize the unmistakable mark of divine blessing.
10. The speaker shifts — possibly Zion herself now responds in joy. The clothing imagery reverses the ashes and heaviness of v.3: now the garments are salvation and righteousness.
10. The bridegroom 'adorns himself like a priest' (yekhahen pe'er) — the wedding imagery merges with priestly imagery. Marriage and worship become one celebration.
11. The chapter ends with an agricultural metaphor of inevitability: righteousness and praise will spring up as certainly as seeds germinate. This is not wishful thinking but the certainty of divine planting (cf. v.3, 'the planting of the LORD').

Summary: Isaiah 62 is a chapter of relentless advocacy — the speaker (whether the prophet, the Messiah, or God Himself) refuses to be silent until Zion's vindication shines like a blazing torch. The city receives new names: no longer 'Forsaken' (Azuwah) or 'Desolate' (Shemamah) but 'My Delight Is in Her' (Hephzibah) and 'Married' (Beulah). Watchmen are posted on Jerusalem's walls with instructions never to rest and never to let God rest until He establishes Jerusalem as the praise of the earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The naming theology of this chapter is extraordinary. To rename something in the ancient Near East was to redefine its identity and destiny. The shift from 'Forsaken' to 'Hephzibah' is not cosmetic but ontological — Zion's very being changes. The image of watchmen who give God no rest (v.7) is one of the boldest depictions of intercessory prayer in Scripture — humans are authorized to be relentless with God.

Translation Friction: The identity of the speaker in verse 1 is debated: is it the prophet, the Servant/Messiah from chapter 61, or God Himself? We have left the ambiguity intact, as the urgency of the speech transcends the question of its source.

Connections: The Hephzibah name (v.4) echoes 2 Kings 21:1, where Hephzibah is the name of King Hezekiah's wife and Manasseh's mother. The watchmen imagery (vv.6-7) connects to Ezekiel 3:17 and 33:7. The 'highway' (v.10) echoes Isaiah 40:3 and 57:14. The banner raised for the peoples (v.10) connects to Isaiah 11:10-12.

‡For Zion's sake I will not keep silent, and for Jerusalem's sake I will not rest,
until her righteousness goes forth like brightness and her salvation like a blazing torch.

²The nations shall see your righteousness,
and all kings your glory,
and you shall be called by a new name that the mouth of the LORD will bestow.

³You shall be a crown of beauty in the hand of the LORD, and a royal diadem in the hand of your God.

⁴You shall no longer be called Forsaken,
and your land shall no longer be called Desolate;
but you shall be called Hephzibah — 'My Delight Is in Her' — and your land Beulah — 'Married' — for the LORD delights in you,
and your land shall be married.

⁵For as a young man marries a young woman,
so shall your sons marry you;
and as the bridegroom rejoices over the bride,
so shall your God rejoice over you.

⁶On your walls, O Jerusalem,
I have posted watchmen;
all day and all night
they shall never be silent.
You who remind the LORD,
take no rest,

⁷and give Him no rest until He establishes Jerusalem and makes her the praise of the earth.

⁸The LORD has sworn by His right hand and by His mighty arm:
'I will not again give your grain
as food for your enemies, and foreigners shall not drink your new wine for which you have labored.'

⁹But those who gather it shall eat it and praise the LORD, and those who harvest it shall drink it in the courts of My sanctuary.

¹⁰Go through, go through the gates!
Prepare the way for the people!
Build up, build up the highway!
Clear it of stones!
Raise a banner over the peoples!

¹¹Behold, the LORD has proclaimed to the end of the earth:
'Say to the daughter of Zion,
"Behold, your salvation comes!
Behold, His reward is with Him,
and His recompense before Him."

¹²And they shall be called the Holy People,
the Redeemed of the LORD;
and you shall be called Sought Out,
a City Not Forsaken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The passionate refusal to be silent mirrors God's own advocacy for His people. Whether the speaker is prophet or Messiah, the urgency is divine in origin.
2. 'A new name that the mouth of the LORD will bestow' — the name comes from God's own mouth. It is not chosen by the city or by the nations but spoken into existence by divine decree.
3. Zion is not wearing the crown — she is the crown. God holds her in His hand as His own ornament. The image reverses all humiliation: the formerly despised city is God's jewel.
4. The renaming is a reversal of exile identity. 'Forsaken' (Azuvah) and 'Desolate' (Shemamah) were not just descriptions but names — identities internalized through decades of ruin. God speaks new names over the old ones.
4. Hephzibah was historically the name of Hezekiah's wife (2 Kings 21:1), creating a personal resonance with Judah's royal history.
5. The final line is one of the most tender in Isaiah: God rejoices over Zion as a bridegroom over his bride. Divine emotion — not merely divine will — is on full display.
6. These watchmen are not military sentinels but intercessors — their 'watching' is prayer. They are called 'those who remind the LORD' (hamazkirim et YHWH), a stunning vocation: reminding God of His promises.
7. 'Give Him no rest' — the boldness is breathtaking. God Himself authorizes His people to be relentless in prayer, to refuse to let Him rest until the promise is fulfilled. This is the theology of persistent intercession.
8. God swears an oath — the strongest possible assurance. He swears by His own right hand, since there is no one greater to swear by (cf. Heb 6:13).
9. The promise is simple and profound: you will eat what you grow. After centuries of foreign powers confiscating harvests, this is restoration of the most basic dignity.
10. The doubled imperatives create urgency: go through, go through! Build up, build up! This echoes the highway language of 40:3 and 57:14 — the great processional road for God's returning people.
11. Matthew 21:5 and John 12:15 echo this verse when Jesus enters Jerusalem: 'Say to the daughter of Zion, Behold, your king is coming.' The salvation that 'comes' is not an abstraction but a person arriving.
12. Four final names for the restored community: Holy People, Redeemed of the LORD, Sought Out, City Not Forsaken. Each name directly reverses the exile condition. 'Not Forsaken' (lo ne'ezavah) answers the 'Forsaken' (Azuvah) of verse 4 — the old name is not merely replaced but explicitly negated.

Summary: Isaiah 63 divides sharply into two movements. The first (vv.1-6) presents the Divine Warrior returning from Edom with garments stained crimson, having trodden the winepress of judgment alone. The second (vv.7-19) pivots to a communal prayer of extraordinary tenderness, recalling the faithful love (chesed) and compassion of the LORD in the days of Moses, lamenting the present hardness of heart, and pleading for the Father-Redeemer to look down from heaven and act. Together these movements hold divine wrath and divine tenderness in a single chapter — the same God who tramples Edom is the Father whose people cry, 'You, LORD, are our Father, our Redeemer from of old.'

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 16 contains one of the most startling declarations in the Hebrew Bible: 'You, LORD, are our Father — though Abraham does not know us and Israel does not acknowledge us.' The appeal bypasses the patriarchs entirely and goes directly to God as Father-Redeemer (go'el). This is covenant theology stripped to its most radical foundation: when every human intermediary fails, God's fatherhood remains. The winepress imagery of verses 1-6 is taken up in Revelation 19:13-15, where the returning Christ wears a robe dipped in blood.

Translation Friction: We have rendered go'el as 'Redeemer' (capitalized) when applied to God, consistent with our term register. The phrase 'hardened our hearts' (v.17) presents a theological tension: Israel asks God why He has caused their wandering. We preserve this tension without softening it, since the Hebrew (tasheh, 'cause to wander'; taqshiach, 'harden') unambiguously attributes the action to God, though within the covenantal framework of judgment for disobedience.

Connections: The winepress imagery (vv.1-6) reappears in Revelation 14:19-20 and 19:13-15. Verse 10 ('they rebelled and grieved His Holy Spirit') is one of the clearest Old Testament references to the personal nature of the Spirit, cited by Paul in Ephesians 4:30. The Father-Redeemer title (v.16) anticipates Jesus' teaching on God as Father (Matthew 6:9). The communal lament of vv.7-19 flows directly into chapter 64 without a natural break.

¹Who is this coming from Edom, in crimson garments from Bozrah —
this one splendid in His apparel, striding in the greatness of His strength?
"It is I, who speak in righteousness, mighty to save."

²Why is Your apparel red,
and Your garments like one who treads in the winepress?

³"I have trodden the winepress alone,
and from the peoples no one was with Me.
I trampled them in My anger and trod them down in My wrath;
their lifeblood spattered on My garments,
and I stained all My clothing."

⁴"For the day of vengeance was in My heart, and the year of My redeemed had come."

⁵"I looked, but there was no one to help;
I was appalled that no one upheld Me.
So My own arm brought salvation,
and My wrath — it sustained Me."

⁶"I trampled the peoples in My anger and made them stagger in My wrath, and I poured out their lifeblood on the earth."

⁷I will recount the faithful love of the LORD,
the praiseworthy deeds of the LORD,
according to all that the LORD has granted us —
the great goodness to the house of Israel that He granted them according to His compassion and according to the abundance of His faithful love.

⁸For He said, "Surely they are My people, children who will not deal falsely."
And so He became their Savior.

⁹In all their affliction He was afflicted,
and the angel of His presence saved them.
In His love and in His compassion He redeemed them;
He lifted them up and carried them
all the days of old.

¹⁰But they rebelled
and grieved His Holy Spirit.
So He turned to become their enemy;
He Himself fought against them.

¹¹Then he remembered the days of old,
of Moses and his people.
Where is He who brought them up out of the sea with the shepherds of His flock?
Where is He who put His Holy Spirit
in their midst?

¹²Who caused His glorious arm to go at the right hand of Moses, who divided the waters before them to make for Himself an everlasting name?

¹³Who led them through the depths?
Like a horse in the wilderness,
they did not stumble.

¹⁴As cattle go down into the valley,
the Spirit of the LORD gave them rest.
So You led Your people,
to make for Yourself a glorious name.

¹⁵Look down from heaven and see,
from Your holy and glorious dwelling.

Where are Your zeal and Your mighty deeds?
The yearning of Your heart and Your compassion — are they withheld from me?

¹⁶For You are our Father, though Abraham does not know us and Israel does not acknowledge us.
You, LORD, are our Father;
our Redeemer from of old is Your name.

¹⁷Why, LORD, do You make us wander from Your ways and harden our hearts so that we do not fear You?
Return, for the sake of Your servants,
the tribes of Your inheritance.

¹⁸Your holy people possessed it but a little while;
our adversaries have trampled Your sanctuary.

¹⁹We have become like those over whom You have never ruled, like those not called by Your name.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a dramatic dialogue: a watchman sees a figure approaching from the southeast and demands identification. The answer comes from God Himself. Edom (from the root adom, 'red') and Bozrah ('grape-gathering') set up the winepress metaphor of the following verses. The crimson garments are not royal robes but stained with the blood of judgment.
2. The watchman presses the question. The redness (adom) echoes 'Edom' from verse 1 — a deliberate wordplay. The winepress (gat) image becomes the controlling metaphor for divine judgment throughout this passage.
3. The loneliness of divine judgment is emphasized: 'alone' and 'no one was with Me.' No human army assisted; this is purely God's work. The lifeblood (nitsach) spattering on garments creates the crimson appearance from verse 1. Revelation 19:13-15 draws directly on this imagery for Christ's return.
4. Vengeance (naqam) and redemption (ge'ulah) are held in the same sentence — the day of wrath for the enemy is the year of redemption for God's people. Compare Isaiah 61:2, 'the day of vengeance of our God.'
5. The repeated theme of divine solitude continues. God looked for allies and found none. His own arm (zero'i) achieved the victory — the same language as 59:16, forming a deliberate echo within Third Isaiah. Salvation is accomplished by God alone.
6. The winepress vision concludes. The imagery is deliberately violent — this is not sanitized judgment but the full weight of divine wrath against those who oppressed God's redeemed. The section ends abruptly, and the tone shifts entirely in verse 7.
7. The tone shifts dramatically from winepress violence to tender recollection. The speaker (likely the prophet on behalf of the community) begins recounting the LORD's past faithfulness. The word chesed appears twice, forming an inclusio around the verse — faithful love is both the first and last word of Israel's testimony.
8. God's expectation is stated in His own words: 'children who will not deal falsely' (lo yeshaqeru). The irony is painful — the narrative will immediately show that they did deal falsely. Yet 'He became their Savior' (moshi'a) nonetheless. The verb is past tense: He already acted as Savior before they proved unfaithful.
9. The Qere reading (lo, 'to him') is preferred over the Ketiv (lo, 'not'), yielding 'He was afflicted' rather than 'He was not afflicted.' The angel of His presence (mal'akh panav) is the same figure who led Israel through the wilderness (Exodus 23:20-23, 33:14). The verse is a compressed theology of the Exodus.
10. The tragic pivot of the passage: the same people God carried and redeemed (v.9) now rebel and grieve His Spirit. The consequence is devastating — God becomes their enemy (oyev). The verb itsvu ('grieved') implies deep personal pain, not mere displeasure.
11. The subject of 'remembered' is ambiguous — it may be God remembering or the people remembering. Either way, memory turns back to the Exodus. The questions ('Where is He?') become the refrain of the lament: God's past acts make His present absence unbearable.

12. The 'glorious arm' (zero'a tifarto) is God's own arm working through Moses — the human leader is merely the instrument. The dividing of the waters recalls the Red Sea (Exodus 14) and the Jordan (Joshua 3). God's motive is stated plainly: 'to make for Himself an everlasting name' — redemption serves God's glory.
13. The image of a horse running through open desert without stumbling captures the ease with which God led Israel through the Sea. What should have been impossible (crossing the deep) was as effortless as a horse galloping on flat ground.
14. The image shifts from horse (v.13) to cattle descending into a valley for rest. The Spirit of the LORD (ruach YHWH) provides the rest — connecting to the Holy Spirit references in verses 10-11. God's purpose in leading Israel remains the same: to glorify His own name.
15. The prayer becomes direct petition. 'Look down' (habbet) is an imperative — the people command God to pay attention. The questions are anguished: 'Where are Your zeal and mighty deeds?' The Hebrew hamon me'eka ('yearning of Your heart,' literally 'the roaring of Your innards') attributes visceral emotion to God. The final question — 'are they withheld?' (hit'appaku) — asks whether God is deliberately restraining His compassion.
16. This is one of the most theologically dense verses in Isaiah. The patriarchs are invoked only to be set aside: Abraham cannot help, Jacob (Israel) does not recognize them. Only God remains as Father and Redeemer. The verse establishes that Israel's identity rests not on Abrahamic descent but on divine relationship. Jesus' opponents in John 8:39-44 encounter this same argument.
17. The boldest question in the prayer: 'Why do You make us wander... and harden our hearts?' The Hebrew verbs (tat'enu, 'cause to wander'; taqshiach, 'harden') explicitly attribute Israel's spiritual failure to God's action. This is not denial of human responsibility but the anguished recognition that judicial hardening has been imposed as consequence of prior rebellion (v.10). The plea 'return' (shuv) asks God to reverse course.
18. The sanctuary's desolation is both historical (Babylonian destruction, 586 BC) and ongoing in the community's experience. The brevity of possession ('but a little while') intensifies the grief — the inheritance was barely enjoyed before it was lost.
19. The chapter ends on a note of desolation that leads directly into the great cry of 64:1. Israel feels indistinguishable from the nations — as if the covenant had never been made. This is the nadir of the lament: to be God's people and yet feel unclaimed. The prayer continues without pause into chapter 64.

Summary: Isaiah 64 continues the communal lament that began in 63:7 without a natural break. The chapter opens with the most desperate prayer in the prophetic literature: 'Oh, that You would rend the heavens and come down!' The community confesses that all its righteousness is like a polluted garment, that sin has carried them away like wind, and that no one stirs himself to take hold of God. Yet the prayer pivots on a single image of astonishing trust: 'We are the clay, and You are our potter; we are all the work of Your hand.' The chapter closes with a question that hangs unanswered: 'Will You restrain Yourself, LORD? Will You keep silent and afflict us so severely?'

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 4 contains a statement Paul quotes in 1 Corinthians 2:9: 'No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who wait for Him.' Verse 6 — 'all our righteous acts are like a polluted garment' — is among the most frequently cited Old Testament texts in Christian theology, establishing that human merit cannot approach divine holiness. The potter-clay metaphor (v.8) anchors Paul's argument in Romans 9:20-21.

Translation Friction: We render beged iddim (v.6) as 'polluted garment' rather than 'filthy rags' (KJV) to preserve the Hebrew sense of ritual impurity without the archaic English. The term refers specifically to a garment rendered ceremonially unclean. We have maintained the Hebrew chapter division (which places 'Rend the heavens' at 63:19b in MT) but follow the English versification for reader accessibility.

Connections: The 'rend the heavens' cry (v.1) finds its answer at Jesus' baptism, where the heavens are 'torn open' (Mark 1:10 — schizo, the same verb the LXX uses for Isaiah's qara'). The polluted-garment theology (v.6) connects to Zechariah 3:3-5 (Joshua's filthy garments replaced) and Revelation 19:8 (fine linen given to the saints). The potter-clay image (v.8) echoes Jeremiah 18:1-6 and is developed by Paul in Romans 9:20-21.

¡Oh, that You would rend the heavens and come down, that the mountains would quake at Your presence!

²As fire kindles brushwood,
as fire causes water to boil —
come, to make Your name known to Your adversaries, that the nations may tremble at Your presence!

³When You did awesome things we did not expect,
You came down;
the mountains quaked at Your presence.

⁴From of old no one has heard,
no ear has perceived,
no eye has seen a God besides You,
who acts on behalf of those who wait for Him.

⁵You meet the one who joyfully does righteousness,
those who remember You in Your ways.
But You were angry, and we sinned;
in our sins we have continued long.
Can we still be saved?

⁶We have all become like one who is unclean,
and all our righteous deeds are like a polluted garment.
We all wither like a leaf,
and our iniquities carry us away like the wind.

⁷There is no one who calls on Your name,
who rouses himself to take hold of You.
For You have hidden Your face from us
and have delivered us into the hand of our iniquities.

⁸But now, LORD, You are our Father;
we are the clay, and You are our potter.
We are all the work of Your hand.

⁹Do not be angry beyond measure, LORD, and do not remember iniquity forever.
Behold — please look — we are all Your people!

¹⁰Your holy cities have become a wilderness;
Zion has become a wilderness,
Jerusalem a desolation.

¹¹Our holy and beautiful house,
where our fathers praised You,
has been burned with fire,
and all our treasured places lie in ruins.

¹²After all this, will You restrain Yourself, LORD?
Will You keep silent and afflict us beyond measure?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse continues directly from the lament of 63:19 — the prayer has built to a crescendo. 'Rend' (qara') is violent language: not open, not part, but tear apart, as one tears a garment in grief. The community wants God to break through the barrier between heaven and earth. Mark 1:10 uses the same verb (schizo) when the heavens are 'torn open' at Jesus' baptism — the prayer of Isaiah 64:1 is answered at the Jordan.
2. The imagery piles up: fire on dry brush, water boiling — both images of irresistible, transformative power. The purpose of the theophany is not spectacle but revelation: 'to make Your name known.' The nations' trembling echoes the Sinai theophany (Exodus 19:16-18).
3. Memory and petition merge: the community recalls that God once did come down (at Sinai, at the Exodus) and the mountains did tremble. The 'awesome things we did not expect' acknowledges that God's interventions exceed human anticipation — a theme Paul develops in 1 Corinthians 2:9.
4. This is the verse Paul quotes (freely, from the LXX) in 1 Corinthians 2:9: 'No eye has seen, no ear has heard, no mind has conceived what God has prepared for those who love him.' In its original context, the statement grounds the plea of verses 1-3: the God they are calling upon is utterly unique — no other god acts for those who wait. The word mechakkeh ('wait') implies patient, expectant trust.
5. The verse pivots from God's character (He meets the righteous joyfully) to Israel's condition (they sinned under His anger). The final question — 'Can we still be saved?' — is our rendering of the notoriously difficult venivvashe'a, which could be declarative ('we shall be saved') or interrogative. The context of lament favors the anguished question.
6. Beged iddim ('polluted garment') refers to a garment rendered ceremonially unclean — the language of Levitical impurity applied to moral effort. The double image (unclean person + unclean garment) makes the point inescapable: neither the worshiper nor the worship is acceptable. The leaf and wind images add transience to impurity — sin not only defiles but dissolves.
7. The confession deepens: not only are their righteous deeds polluted, but no one even tries to pray. 'Rouses himself to take hold of You' (mit'orer lehachaziq bakh) suggests the spiritual lethargy that follows divine abandonment. The hidden face (hester panim) is the ultimate theological crisis — God has withdrawn His presence. The final phrase is devastating: God has handed them over not to enemies but to their own sins.
8. After the devastating confession of verses 5-7, the prayer makes its most audacious move: 'But now' (ve'attah) signals a pivot from despair to appeal. The basis of hope is not Israel's worthiness but God's identity as Father and potter. The clay cannot unmake itself, but neither can the potter abandon what his hands have shaped. Paul develops this image in Romans 9:20-21; Jeremiah 18:1-6 provides the prophetic parallel.
9. The prayer moves from theological argument (You are our potter) to direct petition (do not be angry). The double imperative 'behold — please look' (hen habbet-na') is urgent, almost desperate. The final appeal — 'we are all Your people' — is the covenant claim stripped bare: whatever we have done, we still belong to You.
10. The general ('holy cities') narrows to the specific (Zion, Jerusalem). The repetition of 'wilderness' (midbar) is deliberate — the promised land has reverted to the pre-settlement condition. This is not merely military defeat but theological reversal: the holy cities are unholy, and the garden has become desert.
11. The Temple is not named directly but described by what it meant: 'our holy and beautiful house, where our fathers praised You.' The communal memory of worship makes the destruction personal. 'All our treasured places' (kol machamadenu) extends the grief beyond the Temple to every cherished site. The Hebrew past tense (hayah) confirms accomplished destruction.
12. The lament ends not with resolution but with a raw question — the prayer that began in 63:7 concludes with no divine answer recorded. 'Will You restrain Yourself?' (tit'appaq) echoes 63:15, where they asked if God's compassion was 'withheld.' The silence of God is the chapter's final and most painful theme. The answer will come — but not until chapter 65.

Summary: Isaiah 65 is God's answer to the anguished prayer of chapters 63-64. The chapter begins with a stunning reversal: God was found by those who did not seek Him and rejected by those who should have known Him. Verses 1-7 indict the rebellious — those who provoke God with pagan rituals, eat forbidden food, and claim a hollow holiness. Verses 8-16 divide Israel into two groups: the faithful servants who will inherit the land, and the apostates who will be cut off. Then, in verses 17-25, the vision explodes into the new heavens and new earth — a creation so radically renewed that the former things will not even be remembered. Infant death vanishes, labor produces lasting fruit, the wolf and lamb feed together, and God answers before His people call.

What Makes This Remarkable: The new heavens and new earth (vv.17-25) is one of the most far-reaching eschatological visions in Scripture, taken up directly in Revelation 21:1-4. Verse 24 — 'Before they call I will answer; while they are still speaking I will hear' — describes an intimacy between God and His people so complete that prayer and answer become simultaneous. The wolf-and-lamb imagery (v.25) echoes Isaiah 11:6-9, forming an inclusio across the entire book.

Translation Friction: We render 'new heavens and a new earth' (v.17) preserving the Hebrew construction (shamayim chadashim va'arets chadashah) rather than importing the Revelation 21 phrasing backward into the text. The 'servants' language in verses 8-16 raises questions about whether the division is ethnic or spiritual; we let the text speak without resolving the tension. The 'youth dying at a hundred' (v.20) is rendered to preserve its paradoxical character — longevity so extreme that dying at a hundred is considered premature.

Connections: Verse 1 is quoted by Paul in Romans 10:20 to describe God's outreach to the Gentiles. The new heavens and new earth (v.17) reappears in 2 Peter 3:13 and Revelation 21:1. The wolf-and-lamb vision (v.25) echoes Isaiah 11:6-9 and anticipates Romans 8:19-22 (creation's liberation from bondage). 'Before they call I will answer' (v.24) is the eschatological fulfillment of the prayer access promised in Isaiah 58:9.

¹"I let Myself be sought by those who did not ask;
I let Myself be found by those who did not seek Me.
I said, 'Here I am! Here I am!'
to a nation that did not call on My name."

²"I spread out My hands all day long to a rebellious people who walk in a way that is not good,
following their own devices —"

³"a people who provoke Me to My face continually, who sacrifice in gardens and burn incense on bricks —"

⁴"who sit among the graves and spend the night in secret places, who eat the flesh of swine,
with broth of abominable things in their vessels —"

⁵"who say, 'Keep to yourself — do not come near me, for I am too holy for you!'
These are smoke in My nostrils,
a fire that burns all day long."

⁶"Behold, it is written before Me:
I will not keep silent;
I will repay — I will repay into their lap —"

⁷"your iniquities and the iniquities of your fathers together,"
says the LORD.
"Because they burned incense on the mountains and mocked Me on the hills,
I will measure into their lap
the full payment for their former deeds."

⁸This is what the LORD says:
"As the new wine is found in the cluster,
and someone says, 'Do not destroy it,
for there is a blessing in it' —"

so I will do for the sake of My servants;
I will not destroy them all."

⁹"I will bring forth offspring from Jacob,
and from Judah an heir of My mountains.
My chosen ones shall possess it,
and My servants shall dwell there."

¹⁰"Sharon shall become a pasture for flocks, and the Valley of Achor a resting place for herds,
for My people who have sought Me."

¹¹"But you who forsake the LORD, who forget My holy mountain, who set a table for Fortune and fill cups of mixed wine for Destiny —"

¹²"I will destine you for the sword, and all of you shall bow down to the slaughter,
because I called and you did not answer,
I spoke and you did not listen.
You did what is evil in My eyes and chose what I did not delight in."

¹³Therefore this is what the Lord GOD says:
"Behold, My servants shall eat, but you shall be hungry;
My servants shall drink, but you shall be thirsty;
My servants shall rejoice, but you shall be put to shame."

¹⁴"Behold, My servants shall sing out of a glad heart, but you shall cry out from an anguished heart and wail from a broken spirit."

¹⁵"You shall leave your name as a curse-word for My chosen ones;
the Lord GOD will put you to death.
But His servants He will call by another name,"

¹⁶"so that whoever invokes a blessing in the land shall bless by the God of Amen,
and whoever takes an oath in the land shall swear by the God of Amen.
For the former troubles will be forgotten and will be hidden from My eyes."

¹⁷"For behold, I am creating new heavens and a new earth, and the former things shall not be remembered or come to mind."

¹⁸"But be glad and rejoice forever in what I am creating!
For behold, I am creating Jerusalem as a delight and her people as a joy."

¹⁹"I will rejoice over Jerusalem and be glad over My people.
No more shall the sound of weeping be heard in her,
nor the sound of crying."

²⁰"No more shall there be an infant who lives but a few days, or an old man who does not fill out his years.
For the youth who dies at a hundred will be considered young,
and the sinner who fails to reach a hundred will be considered cursed."

²¹"They shall build houses and inhabit them;
they shall plant vineyards and eat their fruit."

²²"They shall not build and another inhabit;
they shall not plant and another eat.
For as the days of a tree
shall be the days of My people, and My chosen ones shall long enjoy
the work of their hands."

²³"They shall not labor in vain or bear children for calamity, for they are the offspring of those blessed by the LORD,
and their descendants with them."

²⁴"Before they call I will answer;
while they are still speaking I will hear."

²⁵"The wolf and the lamb shall graze together;
the lion shall eat straw like the ox,
and dust shall be the serpent's food.
They shall not hurt or destroy
in all My holy mountain,"
says the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God breaks His silence from chapter 64 with a startling declaration: He was available to those who never asked. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 10:20 as evidence that God's grace extends to the Gentiles. The doubled 'Here I am!' (hinneni, hinneni) is God using the very language of prophetic availability — the word Isaiah himself used at his commissioning (6:8) — now directed toward those outside the covenant.
2. The outstretched hands (perasti yadai) are the gesture of invitation and pleading — God has been reaching toward Israel all along. Paul also quotes this verse in Romans 10:21. The indictment is not that God was absent (as the prayer of ch.63-64 suggested) but that Israel was rebellious. 'Following their own devices' (achar machshevotaihem) is the root diagnosis.
3. The catalog of provocation begins. 'To My face' (al panai) means openly, brazenly — not secret sin but public idolatry. Garden sacrifices and brick altars indicate Canaanite or Mesopotamian syncretistic worship, performed in direct violation of the Torah's centralized worship requirements.

4. Sitting among graves suggests necromancy — consulting the dead, forbidden in Deuteronomy 18:11. Eating swine's flesh violates the dietary laws of Leviticus 11:7. The 'broth of abominable things' (peraq piggulim) compounds the offense: not merely eating unclean meat but cooking with it, saturating the vessels themselves with impurity.
5. The supreme irony: those practicing pagan abominations (vv.3-4) claim a false holiness that makes them unapproachable. 'I am too holy for you' (qedashtiykha) is a perversion of genuine consecration — holiness inverted into arrogance. God's response is visceral: 'smoke in My nostrils' (ashan be'appi) — they are an irritant that provokes constant, smoldering anger.
6. 'Written before Me' (ketuvah lephanai) suggests a divine ledger of offenses. The doubled 'I will repay' (shillamti veshillamti) emphasizes certainty. The image of repayment 'into their lap' (al cheiqam) is concrete — judgment is placed directly in their hands, inescapable.
7. The indictment extends across generations — 'your iniquities and your fathers' together.' Mountain and hill worship is the classic prophetic shorthand for high-place idolatry. The 'full payment' (pe'ullatam) is measured (madoti) — God's judgment is not arbitrary but precisely proportioned to the offense.
8. The tone shifts from judgment to preservation. The grape-cluster parable is homely and tender: when a vintner finds one good cluster among damaged vines, he spares it for the juice still in it. God will do the same — for the sake of the faithful remnant ('My servants'), He will not destroy the whole. This is the same remnant theology that runs from Isaiah 1:9 through Romans 11:5.
9. The promise narrows from 'not destroying all' to positive inheritance. 'My mountains' (harai) — the hill country of Judah — will be possessed by the elect (bechirai) and servants (avadai). These are the faithful within Israel, distinguished from the apostates of verses 1-7.
10. Sharon (the fertile coastal plain) and the Valley of Achor (where judgment fell in Joshua 7) are both transformed. Achor means 'trouble' — the valley of trouble becomes a place of rest. Hosea 2:15 makes the same promise. The beneficiaries are 'My people who have sought Me' — the faithful remnant contrasted with those who did not seek (v.1).
11. Gad ('Fortune') and Meni ('Destiny') are pagan deities — likely Aramean or Canaanite gods of luck and fate. Setting a table and filling cups are acts of ritual hospitality offered to these gods rather than to the LORD. The wordplay with Meni ('Destiny') and maniti ('I destine') in verse 12 is deliberate.
12. The wordplay is devastating: those who worship Meni ('Destiny') will be maniti ('destined') — by God — for the sword. The charge 'I called and you did not answer' reverses the prayer of chapter 64, where Israel accused God of silence. God now reveals that it was Israel who refused to answer His call.
13. The threefold contrast (eat/hunger, drink/thirst, rejoice/shame) draws the sharpest possible line between the faithful servants and the apostates. The repetition of 'My servants' (avadai) emphasizes that the distinction is relational: those who serve God receive provision; those who serve Fortune and Destiny receive nothing.
14. The contrast continues with a fourth pair: singing versus wailing. 'Broken spirit' (shever ruach) is the inversion of the 'contrite spirit' God cherishes in 66:2 — the same brokenness that leads to repentance in the faithful leads only to despair in the apostate.
15. The apostates' name becomes a byword — a formula of cursing. Meanwhile, God's servants receive 'another name' (shem acher), signifying a new identity. This anticipates the 'new name' promised in Revelation 2:17 and 3:12. The death of the old identity and the granting of a new one is a pattern of covenant renewal.
16. The 'God of Amen' is a unique divine title in the Hebrew Bible. We preserve 'Amen' rather than translating it as 'truth' (as KJV does) because the word carries liturgical weight that 'truth' does not fully convey. The forgetting of former troubles prepares for the new creation announcement in verse 17.
17. The vision leaps from historical judgment to cosmic renewal. The verb bore' (create) is the exclusive divine prerogative — the same word as Genesis 1:1. 'The former things shall not be remembered' does not mean amnesia but that the new reality is so overwhelming that the old no longer occupies the heart. Revelation 21:1 quotes this verse directly. 2 Peter 3:13 invokes the same promise.
18. The new creation is not abstract cosmology but centered on a city and a people: Jerusalem and her inhabitants. 'Delight' (gilah) and 'joy' (masos) — God creates the emotional capacity for eternal gladness. The city is not merely rebuilt but remade as the embodiment of joy.
19. God Himself rejoices — the joy is not only given to the people but experienced by their Creator. 'No more weeping, no more crying' is quoted in Revelation 21:4. The double elimination (weeping and crying) covers both grief and distress — every form of human anguish is ended.
20. This verse uses hyperbolic language to describe the radical extension of life in the new creation. Dying at a hundred — which in the ancient world was extreme old age — will be considered a youthful death. The second half preserves a note of moral consequence: the 'sinner' (chote') who dies at a hundred is cursed, implying that even in the new creation, rebellion has consequences. This verse sits in tension with the later vision of total peace (v.25), creating the prophetic layering characteristic of Isaiah's eschatology.
21. The curse of Deuteronomy 28:30 ('you shall build a house and not live in it; you shall plant a vineyard and not enjoy its fruit') is reversed. In the new creation, labor produces lasting results. There is no dispossession, no futility, no enemy to confiscate the harvest.
22. The 'days of a tree' implies centuries-long life — oaks and cedars live for hundreds of years. Human life will match the longevity of the most enduring things in nature. 'My chosen ones shall long enjoy' (yevallu bechirai) means they will wear out, outlast, fully use up the fruit of their labor — not death but satisfied completion.

23. Two of the deepest human fears are answered: wasted labor and doomed children. 'Bear children for calamity' (yeldu labehalah) — the terror that one's children will inherit disaster — is eliminated. The blessing extends across generations: both the parents and their descendants share in it.
24. This is the definitive answer to the prayer of chapters 63-64, where Israel cried out and heard only silence. In the new creation, God's responsiveness will be so complete that He answers before the prayer is spoken and hears before the sentence is finished. The verse describes not omniscience as abstraction but intimacy as experience — the relationship between God and His people will be closer than thought and speech.
25. The chapter's final verse compresses Isaiah 11:6-9 into a single image: predator and prey at peace, the lion herbivorous, the serpent grounded. 'They shall not hurt or destroy in all My holy mountain' repeats 11:9 verbatim — the vision that opened the messianic age in chapter 11 now closes the eschatological age in chapter 65. The serpent eating dust alludes to the Genesis 3 curse, suggesting that even in the new creation the serpent remains under judgment, but its power to harm is ended.

Summary: Isaiah 66 is the final chapter of the book and brings its grand themes to their ultimate resolution. God declares that heaven is His throne and earth His footstool — no temple can contain Him, yet He looks with favor on the humble and contrite spirit. The chapter denounces those who trust in empty ritual while practicing abomination, then pivots to one of the most remarkable images in all prophecy: Zion gives birth to a nation in a single day. God comforts His people as a mother comforts her child. The nations stream to Jerusalem to see God's glory, and priests are taken from among the Gentiles. The book closes with a vision of universal worship — all flesh coming before the LORD — alongside a final, unflinching image of judgment: the worm that does not die and the fire that is not quenched.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 1 ('Heaven is My throne, earth is My footstool') is quoted by Stephen in his defense before the Sanhedrin (Acts 7:49) to argue that God cannot be confined to a building. Verse 13 ('As a mother comforts her child, so I will comfort you') is one of the rare instances where God is explicitly compared to a mother. The final verse (v.24) provides the imagery Jesus uses for Gehenna in Mark 9:48 ('where the worm does not die and the fire is not quenched'), making it one of the most consequential verses in eschatological theology.

Translation Friction: The juxtaposition of universal worship (v.23) and unending judgment (v.24) in consecutive verses creates deliberate theological friction. We have not softened either pole. The maternal imagery for God (v.13) is preserved without qualification — Isaiah uses the verb nacham ('comfort') with an explicitly feminine comparison (ke'ish asher immo tenachamenu). The identity of the 'brethren' brought as an offering from the nations (v.20) is left open, as the Hebrew permits both Israelite returnees and Gentile converts.

Connections: Verse 1 is quoted in Acts 7:49 (Stephen's speech). Verse 7 ('before she was in labor she gave birth') anticipates the sudden, miraculous birth of the church at Pentecost. Verse 13's maternal comfort echoes Isaiah 49:15 ('Can a mother forget her nursing child?'). The final verse (v.24) provides the source text for Jesus' Gehenna teaching in Mark 9:43-48. The gathering of all nations (v.18) anticipates the Great Commission (Matthew 28:19) and the multitude from every nation in Revelation 7:9.

¹This is what the LORD says:

"Heaven is My throne,

and the earth is My footstool.

What kind of house would you build for Me?

And what would be the place of My rest?"

²"All these things My hand has made,

and so all these things came to be,"

declares the LORD.

"But this is the one to whom I will look:

he who is humble and contrite in spirit and who trembles at My word."

3 "He who slaughters an ox is like one who kills a man;
 he who sacrifices a lamb is like one who breaks a dog's neck;
 he who presents a grain offering — it is like swine's blood;
 he who offers incense is like one who blesses an idol.
 They have chosen their own ways,
 and their soul delights in their abominations."

4 "So I also will choose their punishments and bring upon them what they dread, because I called and no one answered,
 I spoke and no one listened.
 They did what is evil in My eyes
 and chose what I did not delight in."

5 Hear the word of the LORD,
 you who tremble at His word!
 Your brothers who hate you and cast you out for My name's sake have said,
 "Let the LORD be glorified, that we may see your joy!"
 But it is they who shall be put to shame.

6 A sound of uproar from the city!
 A voice from the temple!
 The voice of the LORD,
 rendering recompense to His enemies!

7 "Before she was in labor she gave birth;
 before her pain came upon her she delivered a son."

8 "Who has heard such a thing?
 Who has seen such things?
 Can a land be born in one day?
 Can a nation be brought forth all at once?
 Yet as soon as Zion was in labor
 she brought forth her children!"

9 "Shall I bring to the point of birth and not deliver?"
 says the LORD.
 "Shall I who cause to bring forth shut the womb?"
 says your God.

10 "Rejoice with Jerusalem and be glad for her,
 all you who love her!
 Rejoice greatly with her,
 all you who mourn over her —"

¹¹"that you may nurse and be satisfied from her consoling breast, that you may drink deeply and delight in the abundance of her glory."

¹²For this is what the LORD says:
"Behold, I will extend peace to her like a river,
and the glory of the nations like an overflowing stream.
You shall nurse; you shall be carried on her hip and bounced upon her knees."

¹³"As a mother comforts her child,
so I will comfort you;
and you shall be comforted in Jerusalem."

¹⁴"You shall see, and your heart shall rejoice;
your bones shall flourish like grass.
The hand of the LORD shall be known to His servants,
and His indignation to His enemies."

¹⁵"For behold, the LORD will come in fire, and His chariots like the whirlwind, to render His anger with fury
and His rebuke with flames of fire."

¹⁶"For by fire and by His sword
the LORD will execute judgment on all flesh, and the slain of the LORD shall be many."

¹⁷"Those who consecrate and purify themselves to go into the gardens, following one in the center,
eating the flesh of swine, the abomination, and the mouse — they shall come to an end together,"
declares the LORD.

¹⁸"For I know their works and their thoughts.
The time is coming to gather all nations and tongues,
and they shall come and see My glory."

¹⁹"I will set a sign among them, and from them I will send survivors to the nations — to Tarshish, Put, and Lud (who draw the bow), to Tubal and Javan, to the distant coastlands that have not heard My fame or seen My glory.
And they shall declare My glory among the nations."

²⁰"And they shall bring all your brothers from all the nations as an offering to the LORD — on horses and in chariots and in wagons, on mules and on camels —

to My holy mountain Jerusalem,"
 says the LORD,
 "just as the sons of Israel bring their grain offering in a clean vessel to the house of the LORD."

²¹"And from them also I will take some for priests and for Levites,"
 says the LORD.

²²"For as the new heavens and the new earth that I am making shall endure before Me,"
 declares the LORD,
 "so shall your offspring and your name endure."

²³"From new moon to new moon, and from Sabbath to Sabbath,
 all flesh shall come to worship before Me,"
 says the LORD.

²⁴"And they shall go out and look at the dead bodies of those who rebelled against Me.
 For their worm shall not die,
 and their fire shall not be quenched,
 and they shall be an abhorrence to all flesh."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The final chapter opens with cosmic scale: God cannot be housed. The rhetorical questions ('What kind of house? What place of rest?') do not reject temple worship outright (Solomon asked the same question in 1 Kings 8:27) but expose the presumption that human construction can contain the divine. Stephen quotes this verse in Acts 7:49 to argue that God's presence transcends any building.
2. The contrast is staggering: the God whose throne is heaven and footstool is earth looks with special attention to the humble. 'Contrite in spirit' (nekheh ruach) is the broken spirit of Psalm 51:17. 'Trembles at My word' (chared al devari) describes not fear of punishment but reverential awe before revelation. This verse defines the true 'temple' God inhabits: the humble human heart.
3. Each legitimate sacrifice is paired with an abomination: ox/murder, lamb/dog-breaking, grain offering/swine's blood, incense/idol-blessing. The point is not that sacrifice is inherently wrong but that when performed by those who simultaneously practice idolatry, proper worship becomes as offensive as the worst sin. The double life — worshipping God and embracing abomination — is the consistent target of Third Isaiah (see 65:3-5).
4. The reciprocity is exact: 'they chose their own ways' (v.3), so 'I also will choose their punishments' (v.4). The refrain 'I called and no one answered' (also in 65:12) establishes a pattern: God's unanswered call becomes the legal basis for judgment. This is the same charge that runs from Isaiah 1:2 through to the end of the book.
5. God now addresses the faithful remnant — those who tremble at His word (the same quality praised in v.2). Their own 'brothers' (fellow Israelites) have mocked them, sarcastically invoking God's glory. But the reversal is coming: the mockers will be shamed, and the faithful will know joy. This internal division within Israel anticipates the servant-versus-apostate distinction of chapter 65.
6. Three sounds build in intensity: uproar from the city, a voice from the temple, and then — identified — the voice of the LORD Himself. The progression moves from ambient noise to divine speech. God is not distant; He is in the temple, actively judging.
7. The miraculous birth of Zion's child precedes labor — the opposite of natural order. This signals divine intervention so sudden and complete that the normal process of suffering-then-deliverance is bypassed entirely. The early church saw this as anticipating the sudden birth of the messianic community at Pentecost.
8. The rhetorical questions demand the answer: no, this is impossible — and yet it happens. A nation born in a single day is unprecedented in human experience. The immediate reference is to Israel's sudden restoration, but the early church applied it to the explosive growth of the church at Pentecost (three thousand in one day, Acts 2:41).

9. God answers His own rhetorical questions: He does not begin what He will not complete. The birth metaphor carries a promise: the labor pains of exile and judgment will produce new life. God is both midwife and guarantor — He who started the process will see it through.
10. The call to rejoice is addressed not only to Jerusalem's citizens but to 'all who love her' — an invitation that extends to all who share in Zion's hope, including the nations. Those who mourned her destruction are now summoned to celebrate her rebirth.
11. The nursing imagery is bold and sustained — Jerusalem is a mother whose breast (shod) provides both comfort (tanchumim) and glory (kavod). The verbs 'nurse,' 'be satisfied,' 'drink deeply,' and 'delight' form a progression from sustenance to abundance to pleasure. The city's restoration is not mere survival but overflowing provision.
12. The mother-child imagery continues: Jerusalem's children are carried on her hip and bounced on her knees. The peace flows 'like a river' — not a trickle or a well but a nahar, a great watercourse. The 'glory of the nations' flowing into Jerusalem anticipates the wealth-of-nations motif from Isaiah 60:5-11.
13. One of the most tender verses in all of Scripture. God compares His own comforting to a mother's comfort — not as metaphor but as direct analogy (ke'ish asher immo tenachamenu). The verb nacham ('comfort') is the root of the name Nehemiah ('God comforts') and echoes the great 'Comfort, comfort My people' of Isaiah 40:1. The comfort is localized 'in Jerusalem' — not abstract consolation but experienced in a specific, restored place.
14. 'Your bones shall flourish like grass' — the skeletal, dead-feeling body of exile will spring to life like irrigated grass. The dual revelation — 'His hand known to servants, His indignation to enemies' — maintains Isaiah's consistent theme: the same divine action is salvation for one and judgment for the other.
15. The theophany of judgment echoes the opening of the chapter (v.6) and the winepress vision of 63:1-6. Fire and whirlwind are the classic elements of divine appearance (see 2 Kings 2:11, Nahum 1:3). The chariots (markevotav) suggest military intervention — God comes as warrior.
16. The scope expands to 'all flesh' (kol basar) — the judgment is universal, not merely local. 'The slain of the LORD' (challei YHWH) is a startling phrase: these are not casualties of war but of divine judgment. The verse is a bridge to the eschatological separation that will conclude the chapter.
17. The same offenses cataloged in 65:3-4 reappear: garden rituals and forbidden food. 'Following one in the center' is obscure — possibly a pagan priest or cult leader. The triple abomination (swine, the detestable thing, the mouse) represents a full spectrum of dietary violation. The judgment is total: 'they shall come to an end together' (yachdav yasufu).
18. The vision expands to its widest horizon: all nations and all languages gathered to witness God's glory (kevodi). This is the universal scope that runs from Isaiah 2:2 ('all nations shall stream to it') through to Revelation 7:9 ('a great multitude that no one could number, from every nation, tribe, people, and language').
19. The survivor-missionaries are sent to the farthest reaches of the known world: Tarshish (western Mediterranean, likely Spain), Put (North Africa), Lud (Lydia in Asia Minor), Tubal (eastern Asia Minor), Javan (Greece), and the distant coastlands. This is a proto-Great Commission — survivors of God's judgment become heralds of His glory to those who have never heard. The geographic catalog stretches across the entire ancient Near Eastern world.
20. The 'brothers' brought from the nations may be scattered Israelites returning from diaspora, or Gentile converts presented as a living offering — the Hebrew allows both readings. Paul may allude to this verse in Romans 15:16, where he describes his ministry as presenting 'the Gentiles as an offering.' The variety of transport (horses, chariots, wagons, mules, camels) emphasizes universality: every means of travel, from every direction.
21. This is among the most radical statements in the Hebrew Bible: God will take priests and Levites from among the nations (or from among the returnees gathered from the nations). If the 'them' refers to Gentiles, this overturns the Aaronic hereditary priesthood and anticipates the universal priesthood of 1 Peter 2:9. The brevity of the verse amplifies its shock — the revolution is stated in a single sentence.
22. The new heavens and new earth from 65:17 reappear as the guarantee of Israel's permanence. The logic is simple: the new creation is eternal; your descendants and name are as durable as the new creation; therefore your legacy is eternal. This is the covenant promise in its most cosmic form.
23. The penultimate verse describes universal, perpetual worship: all flesh (kol basar), every new moon, every Sabbath, coming before the LORD. This is the fulfillment of 56:7 ('My house shall be called a house of prayer for all peoples'). The rhythm of worship — monthly and weekly — is not abolished but universalized. What was Israel's privilege becomes all humanity's vocation.
24. The final verse of Isaiah is deliberately unsettling. The worshipers of verse 23 go out and see the unending judgment of the rebels. The worm (tola'at) that does not die and the fire (esh) that is not quenched become the defining images of divine judgment in later Jewish and Christian theology. Jesus quotes this verse three times in Mark 9:43-48 to describe Gehenna. The word dera'on ('abhorrence') appears only here and in Daniel 12:2, where it describes the fate of those who do not rise to everlasting life. Isaiah ends not with comfort but with the starkest possible contrast between worship and judgment — a contrast the reader must hold without resolution.

Jeremiah

Summary: Jeremiah 1 establishes the prophet's identity, commissioning, and mandate. The superscription (vv. 1-3) places Jeremiah in the priestly town of Anathoth and spans his ministry from Josiah's thirteenth year (627 BCE) through the fall of Jerusalem (586 BCE). God's call comes with an extraordinary claim: Jeremiah was known, consecrated, and appointed before birth (v. 5). The prophet protests his youth, but God overrides the objection and commissions him with authority over nations. Two visions follow — the almond branch (shaqed/shoqed wordplay, vv. 11-12) and the boiling pot tilting from the north (vv. 13-14) — establishing the twin themes of divine watchfulness and coming judgment from Babylon. The chapter closes with God's promise that Jeremiah will face fierce opposition but will not be overcome.

What Makes This Remarkable: The call narrative of Jeremiah 1:5 is among the most theologically significant verses in the Hebrew Bible for the doctrine of divine foreknowledge and prophetic vocation. The shaqed/shoqed wordplay in verses 11-12 is untranslatable — God sees an almond tree (shaqed) and declares 'I am watching (shoqed) over my word to perform it.' The pun functions as a visual-verbal confirmation of God's vigilance. The boiling pot vision (vv. 13-14) introduces the 'foe from the north' motif that dominates the first half of the book. The concluding metaphor — Jeremiah as a fortified city, iron pillar, and bronze wall — is remarkable for what it promises: not comfort, not success, but indestructibility under siege. God does not promise Jeremiah an easy life; he promises that Jeremiah will survive the hardest one.

Translation Friction: Verse 5 required careful handling of yada ('knew') — this is not mere awareness but intimate, purposeful knowing, the same verb used for covenant relationship. We chose 'knew you' rather than 'chose you' to preserve the relational depth while noting the covenantal force. The almond branch wordplay (shaqed/shoqed) cannot be reproduced in English; we rendered the meaning and documented the pun in the translator notes and expanded rendering. The word na'ar ('youth, boy') in verse 6 is ambiguous regarding Jeremiah's exact age — it can mean anything from a child to a young man. We rendered 'only a youth' and noted the range. The verb natatti ('I have given/set') in verse 5 uses the prophetic perfect — a past tense describing a future or ongoing reality — which we rendered as present: 'I have appointed you.'

Connections: The call narrative parallels Moses (Exodus 3-4, similar reluctance and divine assurance), Isaiah (Isaiah 6, temple commissioning), and Ezekiel (Ezekiel 1-3, visionary call). The 'before you were born' language anticipates Paul's self-understanding in Galatians 1:15. The 'foe from the north' motif connects to Ezekiel 38-39 (Gog from the north) and the broader ancient Near Eastern tradition of invasion from the north. The fortified city metaphor for the prophet anticipates the siege of Jerusalem itself — Jeremiah becomes a miniature of the city he is sent to warn, besieged but not destroyed.

¹The words of Jeremiah son of Hilkiah, one of the priests who were in Anathoth in the land of Benjamin. ²The word of the LORD came to him in the days of Josiah son of Amon, king of Judah, in the thirteenth year of his reign. ³It continued through the days of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah, until the end of the eleventh year of Zedekiah son of Josiah, king of Judah — until Jerusalem was taken into exile in the fifth month. ⁴The word of the LORD came to me: ⁵Before I formed you in the womb, I knew you. Before you came out from the womb, I set you apart. I appointed you as a prophet to the nations. ⁶But I said, "Oh, Lord GOD! I do not know how to speak — I am only a youth." ⁷But the LORD said to me, "Do not say, 'I am only a youth.' To everyone I send you to, you will go, and everything I command you, you will speak. ⁸Do not be afraid of them, for I am with you to rescue you," declares the LORD. ⁹Then the LORD stretched out his hand and touched my mouth. The LORD said to me, "See — I have placed my words in your mouth. ¹⁰See, today I have appointed you over nations and over kingdoms — to uproot and to tear down, to destroy and to overthrow, to build and to plant." ¹¹The word of the LORD came to me: "What do you see, Jeremiah?" I said, "I see the branch of an almond tree." ¹²The LORD said to me, "You have seen correctly, for I am watching over my word to carry it out." ¹³The word of the LORD came to me a second time: "What do you see?" I said, "I see a boiling pot, and it is tilting away from the north." ¹⁴The LORD said to me, "From the north, disaster will be unleashed upon all the inhabitants of the land. ¹⁵For I am about to summon all the clans of the kingdoms of the north," declares the LORD. "They will come and each will set up his throne at the entrance of the gates of Jerusalem, against all its surrounding walls, and against all the cities of Judah. ¹⁶I will pronounce my judgments against them for all their wickedness, because they have abandoned me, burned incense to other gods, and bowed down to the works of their own hands. ¹⁷As for you — prepare yourself! Stand up and speak to them everything that I command you. Do not be shattered by them, or I will shatter you before them. ¹⁸Today I have made you a fortified city, an iron pillar, and bronze walls against the whole land — against the kings of Judah, its officials, its priests, and the people of the land. ¹⁹They will fight against you, but they will not overcome you, for I am with you to rescue you," declares the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription identifies Jeremiah by patronym, priestly lineage, and geographic origin. Anathoth was a Levitical city assigned to the descendants of Aaron (Joshua 21:18), about three miles northeast of Jerusalem. The priestly background is significant — Jeremiah will later clash with the Jerusalem priesthood as an outsider priest from a peripheral town. Some scholars connect his father Hilkiah with the high priest who discovered the Book of the Law under Josiah (2 Kings 22:8), though this is uncertain.
2. The thirteenth year of Josiah is approximately 627 BCE, five years before Josiah's major religious reforms (622 BCE). This means Jeremiah's prophetic career began before the discovery of the Book of the Law in the temple (2 Kings 22:3-13). The standard prophetic reception formula devar-YHWH ('the word of the LORD') indicates direct divine communication.
3. The superscription spans approximately forty years (627-586 BCE), covering the reigns of Josiah, Jehoiakim, and Zedekiah. Jehoahaz and Jehoiachin are omitted, likely because their reigns were too brief (three months each). The 'fifth month' refers to Av (July-August) 586 BCE, when Nebuchadnezzar's forces destroyed the temple and deported the remaining population. The Hebrew galut ('exile, captivity') is the defining catastrophe of Judah's history.
4. The narrative shifts to first person — Jeremiah now speaks directly. The formula devar-YHWH ('the word of the LORD') followed by le'mor ('saying') introduces direct divine speech. The le'mor is rendered as a colon in English rather than the redundant 'saying.'
5. Three verbs define God's prenatal action toward Jeremiah: yada ('knew' — intimate, purposeful knowledge), hiqdashti ('I set apart, consecrated'), and netattikha ('I appointed, gave'). The last verb uses the prophetic perfect — grammatically past tense but describing a reality that extends into the present and future. 'To the nations' (lagoyim) gives Jeremiah's ministry an international scope beyond Judah alone, which the oracles against the nations (chapters 46-51) fulfill. The threefold structure — known, consecrated, appointed — moves from the inward (relationship) to the outward (mission).

6. The exclamation ahahh is a cry of distress or protest, not a polite demurral. The Hebrew na'ar can mean anything from a boy to a young man of military age; its exact age range is debated. Jeremiah's protest echoes Moses ('I am not a man of words,' Exodus 4:10) and establishes the pattern of prophetic reluctance. The address Adonai YHWH ('Lord GOD') combines the title of sovereign authority with the divine name.
7. God does not dispute Jeremiah's youth — he overrides its relevance. The construction is emphatic: 'to all that I send you, you will go' — there will be no exceptions or preferred assignments. The commission parallels Moses' commission in Exodus 4:12 ('I will be with your mouth and teach you what to say'). Jeremiah's adequacy comes from the sender, not the sent.
8. The Hebrew mippenehem (literally 'from their faces') suggests the intimidation of facing hostile audiences. God's promise itti ani ('I am with you') is the foundational assurance formula of the Hebrew Bible (cf. Genesis 26:3, 28:15, Exodus 3:12, Isaiah 41:10). The verb lehatzilekha ('to rescue you') implies Jeremiah will face real danger — the promise is not protection from trouble but deliverance through it. The formula ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD') seals the divine speech.
9. The physical gesture of touching the mouth parallels Isaiah's commissioning, where a seraph touches Isaiah's lips with a burning coal (Isaiah 6:6-7). In Jeremiah's case there is no purification — the act is commissioning, not cleansing. The verb natatti ('I have placed') uses the prophetic perfect, indicating a completed divine action. Jeremiah's words from this point forward carry divine authority because they originate with God, not the prophet.
10. Six infinitives define Jeremiah's mandate: four destructive (natosh 'uproot,' natots 'tear down,' ha'avid 'destroy,' haros 'overthrow') and two constructive (banot 'build,' nata 'plant'). The four-to-two ratio reflects the book's overwhelming emphasis on judgment before restoration. These six verbs recur throughout Jeremiah as a thematic refrain (cf. 18:7-9, 24:6, 31:28, 42:10, 45:4). The scope — 'over nations and kingdoms' — matches the international mandate of verse 5.
11. The first of two confirmatory visions. The almond tree (shaqed) is the 'wakeful tree' because it blossoms earliest in the year, often while snow still covers the ground. The wordplay shaqed/shoqed is the interpretive key — God asks what Jeremiah sees, and the answer itself becomes a prophetic message. This type of vision-with-wordplay also appears in Amos 8:1-2 (qayits/qets, 'summer fruit'/'end').
12. The KJV's 'I will hasten' obscures the wordplay. The verb shoqed does not primarily mean 'hasten' but 'watch, be wakeful, be alert.' God is not saying he will speed up his word but that he is actively watching over it to ensure its fulfillment. The pun shaqed/shoqed cannot be reproduced in English — no single English word captures both 'almond tree' and 'watching.' The phrase heitavta lir'ot ('you have seen well/correctly') affirms that Jeremiah's prophetic sight is functioning.
13. The second vision. The Hebrew sir naphuach is a pot being heated until its contents boil over. The phrase upanav mippenei tsaphonah ('its face from the face of the north') is directional — the pot is tilting from the north, meaning its scalding contents will pour southward toward Judah. This is the first appearance of the 'foe from the north' motif that dominates Jeremiah's early oracles (4:6, 6:1, 6:22, 10:22). The 'north' becomes almost a theological symbol in Jeremiah — the direction from which destruction comes.
14. The verb tippatach ('will be opened, unleashed') suggests something being broken open or let loose — like the boiling pot spilling its contents. The ra'ah ('disaster, calamity') here is not moral evil but the coming military catastrophe. The phrase 'all the inhabitants of the land' indicates comprehensive judgment — no one in Judah will be untouched.
15. The image is of conquering kings setting up their judgment seats at the gates of a conquered city — the gates were the place of legal authority and public judgment. God himself is summoning (qore') these foreign powers as instruments of his covenant judgment. The plural 'kingdoms of the north' does not identify a single nation but a coalition; historically this was fulfilled by the Neo-Babylonian empire and its vassals.
16. Three charges are listed: abandonment of God (azavuni, 'they abandoned me'), worship of other gods through incense offerings (vayeqatteru le'lohim acherim), and idolatry — bowing to 'the works of their own hands' (ma'asei yedeihem). The last phrase is devastating: the gods they worship are things they themselves manufactured. The irony runs throughout Jeremiah — Israel trades a living God for objects they carved.
17. The idiom te'ezor motnekha (literally 'gird your loins') means to tuck your robe into your belt for action — rendered here as 'prepare yourself.' The warning is striking: if Jeremiah loses courage before the people (techat mippenehem), God himself will break Jeremiah before them (achittekha lipnehem). The verb ch-t-t ('to be shattered, dismayed, broken') is used in both halves, creating an internal wordplay — fear of people will bring worse consequences than fear of God.
18. Three metaphors of indestructibility: fortified city (ir mivtsar), iron pillar (ammud barzel), and bronze walls (chomot nechoshet). These are all siege-resistant structures — God is saying Jeremiah will be besieged but not breached. The list of opponents is comprehensive: kings, officials (sarim), priests, and common people ('am ha'arets). Every stratum of society will oppose Jeremiah, and he will outlast them all. The word sarim ('officials, princes, commanders') refers to the ruling class rather than royal offspring.
19. The chapter closes by returning to the assurance formula of verse 8: itti ani ('I am with you'). The verb nilchamu ('they will fight') promises not peace but warfare — Jeremiah's entire career will be one of opposition. The promise is not immunity from attack but survival through it. The verb lehatzilekha ('to rescue you') frames the chapter's conclusion with the same verb that opened the divine promise in verse 8, creating an inclusio of divine protection around the entire commissioning.

Summary: Jeremiah 2 is a covenant lawsuit (riv) in which God prosecutes Israel for spiritual adultery. The chapter opens with a tender recollection of Israel's early devotion in the wilderness — the 'honeymoon period' of the covenant relationship (vv. 1-3). The tone then shifts to accusation: Israel has abandoned the living God for gods that are 'no gods,' trading the spring of living water for broken cisterns that hold nothing (v. 13). The indictment is comprehensive — priests, rulers, prophets, and people have all defected. The chapter closes with Israel still denying guilt even as the evidence overwhelms, like a thief caught in the act who insists on innocence.

What Makes This Remarkable: The imagery of 2:13 — 'the spring of living water' versus 'broken cisterns that cannot hold water' — is one of the most powerful metaphors in the Hebrew Bible and one of the defining images of Jeremiah's theology. Jesus draws on this imagery in John 4:10-14 and 7:37-38. The legal structure is a covenant riv (lawsuit), a genre found also in Micah 6 and Hosea 4, in which God brings formal charges against his covenant partner. The wild vine metaphor (v. 21), the stained garment (v. 22), the restless camel and wild donkey in heat (vv. 23-24) — Jeremiah's images are vivid, earthy, and deliberately shocking. The chapter's rhetoric is designed to make the listener feel the absurdity of Israel's choices: no nation has ever traded its gods, even though their gods are worthless — but Israel has traded the living God for nothing (v. 11).

Translation Friction: The word chesed in verse 2 required careful handling — it describes Israel's early covenant loyalty to God, an unusual direction for this term (usually God's chesed toward Israel). The metaphor of Israel as a young bride (v. 2) and then as a promiscuous woman (vv. 20, 23-25, 33, 36) raises the tension between prophetic rhetoric and modern sensibility — we rendered the Hebrew faithfully without euphemism while noting the metaphorical framework in translator notes. The word sorekah ('choice vine,' v. 21) versus 'wild vine' required documenting the agricultural reality. The animal metaphors in verses 23-24 are sexually explicit by design — the prophet is deliberately using shocking imagery to describe Israel's lust for foreign gods.

Connections: The covenant lawsuit genre connects to Hosea 4:1-3, Micah 6:1-8, and Isaiah 1:2-20. The wilderness honeymoon motif echoes Hosea 2:14-15. The 'living water' image anticipates Jesus's conversation with the Samaritan woman (John 4) and his declaration at the Feast of Tabernacles (John 7:37-38). The 'broken cisterns' image is inverted in Zechariah 13:1, where a fountain is opened for cleansing. The wild donkey in heat (v. 24) parallels Hosea 8:9 (Ephraim as a wild donkey). The accusation that Israel has become worse than the nations who keep their false gods (v. 11) foreshadows Ezekiel's similar charge in Ezekiel 5:6-7 and 16:47.

¹The word of the LORD came to me: ²"Go and proclaim in the hearing of Jerusalem: This is what the LORD says — I remember the faithful love of your youth, the love of your bridal days, how you followed me in the wilderness, through a land not yet sown. ³Israel was holy to the LORD, the firstfruits of his harvest. All who consumed her incurred guilt; disaster came upon them," declares the LORD. ⁴Hear the word of the LORD, O house of Jacob — all the clans of the house of Israel! ⁵This is what the LORD says: What wrong did your ancestors find in me, that they went so far from me? They went after worthless things and became worthless themselves. ⁶They did not ask, 'Where is the LORD who brought us up out of the land of Egypt, who led us through the wilderness — through a land of desert plains and ravines, through a land of drought and deep darkness, through a land no one crosses and no one inhabits?' ⁷I brought you into a fertile land to eat its fruit and its bounty. But when you entered, you defiled my land and made my inheritance a detestable thing. ⁸The priests did not ask, 'Where is the LORD?' Those who handle the law did not know me. The shepherds rebelled against me. The prophets prophesied by Baal and followed things that are of no use. ⁹Therefore I will bring my case against you," declares the LORD, "and against your grandchildren I will bring my case. ¹⁰Cross over to the coasts of Cyprus and look! Send to Kedar and examine carefully — see if anything like this has ever happened. ¹¹Has any nation ever exchanged its gods — even though they are not really gods? Yet my people have exchanged their Glory for what is of no use. ¹²Be appalled at this, O heavens! Shudder and be utterly desolate," declares the LORD. ¹³For my people have committed two evils: they have abandoned me — the spring of living water — and they have dug out cisterns for themselves, broken cisterns that cannot hold water. ¹⁴Is Israel a slave? Was he born into servitude? Why then has he become plunder? ¹⁵Young lions have roared over him; they have raised their voices.

They have made his land a ruin; his cities are burned and emptied of inhabitants. ¹⁶Even the people of Memphis and Tahpanhes have shattered your skull. ¹⁷Have you not brought this upon yourself by abandoning the LORD your God at the very time he was leading you on the way? ¹⁸And now — what business do you have on the road to Egypt, drinking the waters of the Nile? What business do you have on the road to Assyria, drinking the waters of the Euphrates? ¹⁹Your own wickedness will discipline you, and your acts of turning away will convict you. Know and see that it is an evil and bitter thing that you have abandoned the LORD your God, and that reverence for me is not in you," declares the Lord GOD of Hosts. ²⁰For long ago I broke your yoke and tore off your chains. You said, 'I will not serve!' Yet on every high hill and under every leafy tree you sprawl as a prostitute. ²¹Yet I planted you as a choice vine, from the purest stock. How then have you turned into the wild shoots of a foreign vine before me? ²²Even if you scrub yourself with lye and use much soap, the stain of your guilt remains before me," declares the Lord GOD. ²³How can you say, 'I am not defiled; I have not gone after the Baals'? Look at your path in the valley — acknowledge what you have done! You are a restless young camel, darting back and forth on her paths, ²⁴a wild donkey accustomed to the wilderness, sniffing the wind in the desire of her appetite. In her heat, who can restrain her? None who seek her need exhaust themselves — in her mating month they will find her. ²⁵Keep your feet from going bare and your throat from thirst! But you said, 'It is hopeless! No — I love strangers, and after them I will go.' ²⁶As a thief is shamed when he is caught, so the house of Israel will be shamed — they, their kings, their officials, their priests, and their prophets, ²⁷who say to a tree, 'You are my father,' and to a stone, 'You gave birth to me.' For they have turned their backs to me, not their faces. Yet in the time of their disaster they say, 'Rise up and save us!' ²⁸Where then are the gods you made for yourself? Let them rise up — if they can save you in the time of your disaster! For your gods have become as numerous as your cities, O Judah. ²⁹Why do you bring a case against me? All of you have rebelled against me," declares the LORD. ³⁰In vain I struck your children — they did not accept correction. Your own sword has devoured your prophets like a ravaging lion. ³¹You of this generation — see the word of the LORD! Have I been a wilderness to Israel, or a land of thick darkness? Why then do my people say, 'We roam free! We will come to you no more'? ³²Does a young woman forget her jewelry? Does a bride forget her sash? Yet my people have forgotten me for days beyond counting. ³³How skillfully you arrange your path to seek lovers! You have even taught the worst women your ways. ³⁴On your garments is found the blood of the innocent poor. You did not catch them breaking in — yet despite all this, ³⁵you say, 'I am innocent; surely his anger has turned from me.' Now I am about to enter into judgment with you because you say, 'I have not sinned.' ³⁶Why do you run about so recklessly, changing your course? You will be put to shame by Egypt, just as you were put to shame by Assyria. ³⁷From this alliance too you will go out with your hands on your head, for the LORD has rejected those you trust in, and you will find no success through them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. This introduces the first extended oracle of Jeremiah's ministry — a covenant lawsuit that runs through the entire chapter.
2. The verse introduces the 'honeymoon' metaphor — Israel as God's young bride following him through the wilderness. The word kelulutayikh ('your bridal days, your betrothal') comes from the root k-l-l and describes the period of wedding celebration. The image of following God 'through a land not yet sown' portrays the wilderness as barren and dangerous, making Israel's youthful trust all the more remarkable. This idealized memory of wilderness devotion also appears in Hosea 2:14-15.
3. The firstfruits metaphor (re'shit tevu'atoh) is drawn from the agricultural law — the first portion of the harvest belongs exclusively to God (Leviticus 23:10, Deuteronomy 26:1-11). Israel's status as 'firstfruits' means she is consecrated, set apart, and under divine protection. The verb ye'eshamu ('they incurred guilt') is cultic language — those who devoured Israel committed a sacrilegious offense, not merely a political one.
4. The address shifts from Jerusalem specifically to 'the house of Jacob' and 'all the clans of the house of Israel,' broadening the audience to the entire people. The name 'Jacob' recalls the patriarch and the covenant origins of the nation. The word mishpechot ('clans, families') encompasses every kinship unit within Israel.
5. The covenant lawsuit opens with a devastating rhetorical question: God demands to know what injustice (avel, 'wrong, iniquity, crookedness') his people found in him. The implied answer is 'none.' The wordplay hevel/yehbalu ('worthless things/became worthless') is devastating — Israel became like what it worshipped. The word hevel ('breath, vapor, emptiness') is the same word that dominates Ecclesiastes ('vanity of vanities'). Applied to idols, it means they are insubstantial, empty, nothing.

6. Five descriptions pile up to emphasize the wilderness as hostile terrain: aravah ('desert plain'), shuchah ('ravine, pit'), tsiyyah ('drought, parched land'), tsalmavet ('deep darkness, death-shadow'), and uninhabited wasteland. God guided Israel through all of this, yet they never asked 'Where is the LORD?' The word tsalmavet traditionally rendered 'shadow of death' may be a compound (tsel + mavet) or an intensive form meaning 'deep darkness.' We render 'deep darkness' as the more linguistically defensible reading.
7. The word karmel ('fertile land, garden land, orchard') describes the promised land as an abundant garden — the opposite of the wilderness. The possessive pronouns are critical: 'my land' (artsi), 'my inheritance' (nachalati) — the land belongs to God, not to Israel. Israel is a tenant who has polluted the landlord's property. The word to'evah ('abomination, detestable thing') is covenant-curse vocabulary — the worst possible evaluation of what Israel has done with God's gift.
8. Four leadership groups are indicted: priests (kohanim), handlers of the Torah (tofsei hatorah — likely scribes or legal authorities), shepherds (ro'im — rulers or political leaders, using the common ancient Near Eastern metaphor of king as shepherd), and prophets (nevi'im). Each has failed in a way specific to their role. The phrase lo yeda'uni ('they did not know me') uses the covenantal yada — the Torah specialists, whose job was to maintain covenant knowledge, have lost knowledge of God himself.
9. The verb ariv ('contend, bring a case, argue in court') is the technical term for a covenant lawsuit. God is not merely complaining — he is filing formal charges. The extension to 'your grandchildren' (benei veneikhem) indicates that the covenant violation is not a single generation's failure but a generational pattern that will carry consequences forward.
10. God calls witnesses from the far west (Kittim/Cyprus, representing the Mediterranean world) and the far east (Kedar, the Arabian desert tribes descended from Ishmael, Genesis 25:13). The rhetorical strategy is to survey the entire known world for a parallel to Israel's behavior. Kittim originally referred to the city of Kition on Cyprus but came to represent western maritime peoples generally.
11. The argument from lesser to greater: if pagan nations, whose gods are mere constructs (lo elohim, 'not gods'), remain faithful to them, how much more absurd is it for Israel to abandon the living God? The word kevodo ('his Glory') is a title for God himself — some scholars connect this to the kavod theology of God's manifest presence. Paul quotes this logic in Romans 1:23, applying it to humanity's general exchange of God's glory for created images.
12. God summons the heavens themselves as witnesses — a convention of the covenant lawsuit genre (cf. Deuteronomy 32:1, Isaiah 1:2, Micah 6:1-2). Three imperatives pile up: shommu ('be appalled, be stunned'), sa'aru ('shudder, be horrified'), charvu ('be desolated, be dried up'). The heavens themselves should be devastated by what Israel has done. The escalating intensity — appalled, shuddering, desolate — reflects the enormity of the covenant breach.
13. This is the theological center of the chapter. The 'two evils' are not independent but causally linked: abandoning God (the spring) is what drove them to dig cisterns (idols). The word meqor ('spring, source, fountain') describes naturally flowing water — the most precious resource in an arid land. Cisterns (bo'arot) are inferior by nature: they hold only collected rainwater, which goes stale. Broken cisterns are utterly useless — they cannot even hold the inferior water they were built to store. Jesus draws on this imagery in John 4:10-14 ('living water') and 7:37-38.
14. Two rhetorical questions challenge Israel's degraded state: Israel is not a slave (eved) by nature, nor a home-born servant (yelid bayit — one born into the household of a master). Yet Israel has become baz ('plunder, spoil') — the condition of a conquered and looted nation. The implicit answer: Israel's degradation is self-inflicted, the consequence of abandoning God's protection.
15. The 'young lions' (kefirim) are a metaphor for invading nations — powerful, aggressive, predatory. The verbs describe total devastation: the land is shammah ('desolation, waste') and the cities are nitsetah ('burned, set ablaze'). The image is of a helpless prey animal being torn apart by lions — Israel without God's protection is defenseless.
16. Memphis (Noph) and Tahpanhes were major Egyptian cities. The image of 'shattering the skull' (literally 'grazing/feeding on your crown') describes Egyptian military domination. This likely refers to Pharaoh Necho's campaigns through Judah. The verb yir'ukh ('they graze/feed upon you') uses pastoral imagery — Israel is being consumed like grass by Egyptian cattle.
17. The rhetorical question forces Israel to recognize self-inflicted causation. The phrase be'et molikhekh baderekh ('at the time he was leading you on the way') heightens the absurdity — Israel abandoned God while God was actively guiding them. The abandonment was not during a time of divine absence but during a time of divine presence.
18. The 'waters of Shichor' is the Nile (the name comes from an Egyptian word for a branch of the Nile delta). The 'River' (nahar) without further specification always means the Euphrates in Hebrew. The metaphor is political: 'drinking the waters' of Egypt or Assyria means seeking military alliance with those empires. Instead of trusting the 'spring of living water' (v. 13), Israel is running to drink from foreign rivers — trading divine protection for imperial patronage.
19. The word meshuvotayikh ('your turnings away, your apostasies') comes from the root shuv ('turn') — the same root that means 'repentance' when directed toward God. Here it describes turning away from God, the opposite direction. Israel's own infidelity will serve as its own punishment — the consequences are built into the betrayal itself. The title Adonai YHWH Tseva'ot ('the Lord GOD of Hosts') combines three divine designations for maximum authority.
20. The breaking of yoke and chains refers to the Exodus liberation. God freed Israel from Egyptian bondage, but Israel used that freedom not for covenant faithfulness but for spiritual adultery. The Qere reading 'I will not serve' (e'evod rather than e'evor) better fits the context of rebellion. The phrase 'every high hill and under every leafy tree' is standard language for Canaanite worship sites (bamot, 'high places') where fertility cults operated. The verb tso'ah ('sprawling, lying down') combined with zonah ('prostitute') creates an explicitly sexual image for idolatry.

21. The vine metaphor for Israel appears also in Isaiah 5:1-7 (the Song of the Vineyard), Psalm 80:8-16, and Ezekiel 15. The sorekah ('choice vine') was a premium variety producing the finest grapes. The zera emet ('seed of truth/reliability') means the planting stock was genuine and true. The shock is the transformation: a carefully planted premium vine has degenerated into sarei haggefen nokhriyyah ('wild shoots of a foreign vine') — it has become something other than what was planted. The question 'how?' (eikh) expresses divine bewilderment.
22. Neter ('lye, natron') is a mineral alkali used as a cleaning agent in the ancient world. Borit ('soap, alkali') is a plant-based cleanser. Together they represent the strongest cleansing agents available. The verb nikhtam ('is stained, is marked') suggests a permanent stain that no human effort can remove — the guilt is too deeply embedded in the fabric. The image anticipates the later promise that God himself will cleanse what Israel cannot clean (31:34, 33:8).
23. Israel's denial — 'I am not defiled' — is contradicted by the evidence. 'The valley' (gai) likely refers to the Valley of Hinnom (Ge-Hinnom), where child sacrifice was practiced (7:31, 19:2-6, 32:35). The camel metaphor is vivid: a bikrah qallah ('young female camel, swift/restless') that cannot be controlled, running in every direction. The image captures the frantic, undisciplined nature of Israel's pursuit of foreign gods. The plural ha-Be'alim ('the Baals') refers to the various local manifestations of Baal worship.
24. The metaphor escalates from restless camel to wild donkey (pereh) in heat. The image is deliberately crude and sexually explicit: the wild donkey sniffs the wind to catch the scent of a mate, driven by uncontrollable lust. The phrase be'avvat nafshah ('in the desire of her appetite/soul') describes an appetite that dominates the entire being. The point: Israel's pursuit of foreign gods is not a rational choice but an animal-like compulsion. The males (those who seek her) do not even need to pursue — she makes herself available. Hosea uses similar imagery (Hosea 8:9).
25. The warning to keep feet shod and throat moist describes the physical toll of chasing after foreign gods — running barefoot and parched through the wilderness in pursuit. Israel's response is chilling: no'ash ('it is hopeless, it is useless') — not repentance but resignation to addiction. The declaration 'I love strangers' (zarim, 'foreigners, foreign gods') is Israel's own confession of infidelity, spoken defiantly rather than penitently.
26. The simile is pointed: a thief is not ashamed of stealing — he is ashamed of being caught. Israel's shame is not moral remorse but the embarrassment of exposure. The list of four leadership groups (kings, officials, priests, prophets) matches the indictment of verse 8, creating a structural link between the leaders' failure and the people's shame.
27. The absurdity is at full force: calling a wooden idol 'father' and a stone idol 'mother' (the verb yelidtinu, 'you gave birth to us,' is feminine, suggesting the stone represents a mother goddess — likely Asherah). They have turned oref ('the back of the neck') to God instead of panim ('face'). Yet when disaster strikes, they turn back to God with 'rise up and save us' — expecting from God the help they sought from wood and stone.
28. The taunt reprises the accusation of 11:13: Judah has manufactured a god for every city. The phrase asher asita lakh ('which you made for yourself') emphasizes that these are human manufactures, not divine beings. The challenge 'let them rise up, if they can save you' echoes Elijah's mockery of Baal on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18:27). Manufactured gods cannot rise because they were never alive.
29. The irony is sharp: Israel tries to bring a riv ('case, lawsuit') against God, but it is God who has the legitimate case against them. The verb pesha'tem ('you have rebelled') is the language of willful, deliberate transgression — not accidental straying but conscious defection. The word kullekhem ('all of you') eliminates any claim of individual innocence.
30. God's disciplinary measures (hikketi, 'I struck') were intended as musar ('correction, instruction, discipline') — not punishment for its own sake but corrective action to bring about return. It was wasted. Worse, Israel has killed its own prophets — the very messengers God sent to bring them back. The sword is 'your sword' (charbkhem) — Israel's own violence turned against God's spokesmen. This is the murderous nation that Jeremiah has been sent to address.
31. God addresses 'this generation' (hador) directly. The rhetorical questions challenge Israel to name any failure on God's part — has he been barren wilderness or impenetrable darkness to them? The word radnu is debated: it may derive from rud ('to roam, wander') meaning 'we roam freely,' or from radah ('to rule') meaning 'we are lords.' We follow the reading 'we roam free,' which better fits the context of Israel asserting independence from God.
32. The comparison is between something unthinkable and something Israel has done. A betulah ('young woman, virgin') would never forget her ornaments (edyah), and a kallah ('bride') would never forget her wedding sash (qishurehah). These are treasured, identity-defining possessions. Yet Israel has forgotten God — not for a moment but for yamim ein mispar ('days without number'). The implied question: is God less precious to Israel than jewelry is to a bride?
33. The verb teitivy ('you make good, you improve, you perfect') describes the practiced skill of seduction — Israel has become expert at arranging liaisons with foreign gods and foreign powers. The accusation 'you have taught the wicked your ways' (et ha-ra'ot limmadt et derakhayikh) means Israel has become so proficient at infidelity that even seasoned practitioners of evil learn from her. The irony is biting — the people called to be a light to the nations have instead become their tutor in wickedness.
34. The accusation shifts from spiritual adultery to social injustice: the blood of innocent poor people (evyonim neqiyyim) stains Israel's clothing. The phrase lo ba-machteret metza'tim ('you did not find them breaking in') means these were not thieves killed in legitimate self-defense (cf. Exodus 22:2, which permits killing a burglar caught in the act). These were innocent people murdered without justification. The bloodstains are visible evidence of guilt — not hidden but on the hems of their garments for all to see.

35. Israel's most damning statement: 'I have not sinned' (lo chatati). With blood on her garments, with altars on every hill, with the evidence of chapters of accusation stacked against her, Israel still claims innocence. The verb nishpat ('I will judge, I will enter into judgment') indicates formal legal proceedings. God does not respond to the denial with argument but with a court date — the trial will settle the matter.
36. The verb tezli ('you run about, you cheapen yourself') suggests frantic, undignified rushing from one alliance to another. Israel keeps changing political partners — first Assyria, now Egypt — and each betrays her. The verb leshanot ('to change') describes Israel's inconstancy: she cannot commit to one path. The promise of shame from Egypt mirrors the shame already experienced from Assyria, establishing a pattern: every imperial alliance ends in humiliation.
37. The image of leaving 'with hands on your head' (yadayikh al roshekh) is a gesture of mourning, grief, and humiliation — the posture of a captive or a mourner (cf. 2 Samuel 13:19, Tamar after her assault). The word mivtachayikh ('your sources of confidence, your trusted ones') refers to the foreign powers Israel has relied upon. God has rejected (ma'as) these alliances — they are not merely unhelpful but divinely opposed. The chapter ends not with repentance but with the certainty of failure: Israel's chosen path leads nowhere.

Summary: Jeremiah 3 extends the faithless wife metaphor introduced in chapter 2, comparing Israel and Judah to adulterous women who have abandoned their husband — the LORD. God asks whether a divorced woman can return to her first husband (invoking Deuteronomy 24:1-4), yet still calls Israel to return. The chapter contrasts 'faithless Israel' with 'treacherous Judah,' declaring that Judah is worse because she witnessed her sister's punishment yet did not learn from it. The second half pivots to an extraordinary vision of future restoration: the ark of the covenant will no longer be remembered, all nations will gather to Jerusalem, and God's people will call him 'My Father' and never again turn away.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb shuv ('return/turn') dominates this chapter — appearing in nearly every form and nuance, sometimes meaning 'turn back to God' and sometimes 'turn away from God.' The same root carries repentance and apostasy, faithfulness and betrayal. This wordplay is untranslatable in English and represents one of Jeremiah's most sophisticated rhetorical devices. The declaration in verse 16 that the ark of the covenant 'will not come to mind, nor will they remember it, nor will they miss it, nor will it be made again' is one of the most radical statements in the Hebrew Bible — the holiest object in Israel's worship is declared obsolete. We also note that verses 1-5 use second-person feminine singular (addressing Judah/Israel as a woman), while verses 12-18 shift to second-person masculine plural (addressing the people as a community), and verses 19-25 shift again to a communal confession. Each shift in address required careful rendering.

Translation Friction: The legal analogy in verse 1 invokes Deuteronomy 24:1-4, which prohibits a divorced woman from returning to her first husband if she has married another. God applies this to Israel's idolatry — she has 'been with many lovers' — yet astonishingly still calls her to return. This theological tension (law says no return; grace says return) is central to the chapter and we preserved it without resolving it. The word meshuvah ('faithlessness, apostasy, turning away') in verse 6 is built from the same root shuv as teshuvah ('repentance, return'), creating a paradox we documented. The shift between poetry (vv. 1-5, 12-13, 19-25) and prose (vv. 6-11, 14-18) required careful formatting decisions.

Connections: *The divorce analogy connects to Deuteronomy 24:1-4 and Hosea 1-3 (the faithless wife motif). The call 'Return, faithless Israel' anticipates the great return oracles of chapters 30-33. The vision of the ark no longer needed (v. 16) anticipates the new covenant of 31:31-34 where the law is internalized. The phrase 'My Father' (avi, v. 4, 19) connects to Hosea 11:1 and foreshadows the new covenant intimacy of 31:9. The communal confession in verses 22-25 foreshadows the penitential liturgy of Daniel 9. The contrast between Israel and Judah echoes Ezekiel 16 and 23.*

1If a man divorces his wife and she leaves him and becomes another man's, can he return to her again? Would not that land be utterly defiled? Yet you have prostituted yourself with many lovers — and still you would return to me? declares the LORD. 2Lift your eyes to the barren heights and look — where have you not been violated? You sat waiting for them beside the roads like a desert nomad lying in ambush. You have defiled the land with your prostitution and your wickedness. 3So the showers have been withheld and the spring rains have not come. Yet you have the brazen face of a prostitute — you refuse to be ashamed. 4Have you not just now called out to me, 'My Father! You are the companion of my youth'? 5Will he stay angry forever? Will he hold a grudge to the end?' Look — you have spoken this way, yet you have done every evil you could. ⁶The LORD said to me in the days of King Josiah: Have you seen what faithless Israel has done? She went up on every high hill and under every spreading tree, and she prostituted herself there. ⁷I thought, 'After she has done all these things, she will return to me.' But she did not return. And her treacherous sister Judah saw it. ⁸I saw that for all the acts of adultery that faithless Israel had committed, I sent her away and gave her a certificate of divorce. Yet her treacherous sister Judah was not afraid — she too went and prostituted herself. ⁹Because she treated her prostitution so lightly, she defiled the land and committed adultery with stone and with wood. ¹⁰And even after all this, her treacherous sister Judah did not return to me with her whole heart but only in pretense, declares the LORD. ¹¹Then the LORD said to me: Faithless Israel has shown herself more righteous than treacherous Judah.

¹²Go and proclaim these words toward the north, and say:

Return, faithless Israel — declares the LORD.

I will not look on you with anger,

for I am faithful in love, declares the LORD.

I will not hold a grudge forever.

¹³Only acknowledge your guilt —

that you have rebelled against the LORD your God and scattered your favors to strangers

under every spreading tree, and you have not obeyed my voice,

declares the LORD.

¹⁴Return, unfaithful children — declares the LORD — for I am your master. I will take you, one from a city and two from a clan, and I will bring you to Zion. ¹⁵Then I will give you shepherds after my own heart, and they will tend you with knowledge and wisdom. ¹⁶When you have multiplied and increased in the land, in those days — declares the LORD — they will no longer say, 'The ark of the covenant of the LORD.' It will not come to mind, they will not remember it, they will not miss it, and it will not be made again. ¹⁷At that time they will call Jerusalem 'the throne of the LORD,' and all nations will gather to it — to the name of the LORD, to Jerusalem. They will no longer walk in the stubbornness of their evil hearts. ¹⁸In those days the house of Judah will walk together with the house of Israel, and they will come together from the land of the north to the land that I gave as an inheritance to your ancestors. ¹⁹I myself said, 'How gladly I would set you among my children and give you a desirable land — the most beautiful inheritance among the nations!' I said, 'You will call me "My Father" and never turn away from following me.' ²⁰But just as a wife betrays her husband, so you have betrayed me, O house of Israel, declares the LORD.

²¹A voice is heard on the barren heights —

the weeping and pleading of the children of Israel,

for they have twisted their path;

they have forgotten the LORD their God.

²²"Return, unfaithful children —

I will heal your faithlessness."

"Here we are — we come to you, for you are the LORD our God.

²³Truly, the hills are a delusion,

the commotion on the mountains is a lie.

Truly, in the LORD our God is the salvation of Israel.

²⁴The shameful thing has devoured the labor of our ancestors since our youth — their flocks and their herds, their sons and their daughters.

²⁵Let us lie down in our shame;
let our disgrace cover us.
For we have sinned against the LORD our God —
we and our ancestors,
from our youth until this very day.
We have not obeyed the voice of the LORD our God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verse invokes the law of Deuteronomy 24:1-4, which prohibits a man from remarrying a wife who has married another. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'no' — yet God's final statement overturns the expected conclusion. The verb zanit ('you have prostituted yourself') is graphic and deliberate, not merely 'played the harlot' as in the KJV. The phrase re'im rabbim ('many lovers') intensifies the indictment — this is not a single lapse but serial unfaithfulness.
2. The word shefayim ('barren heights, bare hills') refers to the high places where idolatrous worship — including cult prostitution — took place. The comparison to an aravi ('Arabian, desert nomad') lying in wait beside the road likens Judah to a bandit or a roadside prostitute eagerly seeking partners. The word shugalt ('you were lain with') is a strong sexual term indicating violation or debasement, not merely 'lying with.' The defilement (chanaf) of the land echoes the Deuteronomic warning that sexual sin and idolatry pollute the land itself.
3. The withholding of rain is covenant-curse language (Deuteronomy 28:23-24) — drought is not random weather but divine judgment. The phrase metsach ishah zonah ('forehead of a prostitute-woman') indicates shamelessness — a brazen, unembarrassed demeanor. The verb me'ant hikkelem ('you refused to be ashamed') indicates not inability but deliberate refusal to feel shame. The malkosh ('spring rain, latter rain') was the late rain critical for the grain harvest — its absence meant famine.
4. The word avi ('my father') is an intimate address — the people appeal to God as a child to a parent, seeking tenderness. The word alluph ('companion, guide, intimate friend') comes from the same root as the word used for the 'gentle' lamb in 11:19, here meaning a trusted, familiar companion. The phrase ne'urai ('my youth') refers to the early period of the covenant relationship, the 'honeymoon' at Sinai. The question is whether this appeal is genuine repentance or manipulative language — God's response in verse 5 suggests the latter.
5. The people's words in the first half are self-serving — they assume God's anger must eventually pass, regardless of their behavior. The devastating reply in the second half exposes the gap between their pious words and their actions: 'you have done every evil you could' (vattukali, 'and you prevailed' — you succeeded in doing all the evil possible). The verb tukali implies mastery — they have become experts at wickedness.
6. The word meshuvah ('faithless, apostate, backsliding') is formed from shuv — literally 'turned-away Israel.' The phrase 'every high hill and every spreading tree' is a standard formula for Canaanite worship sites (cf. Deuteronomy 12:2, 1 Kings 14:23, 2 Kings 17:10). The historical setting in Josiah's reign (640-609 BCE) places this oracle during the reform period when the full extent of Israel's idolatry was being uncovered.
7. God's expectation — 'she will return' (tashuv) — uses the same verb shuv yet again, now expressing divine hope met with disappointment. The word bagodah ('treacherous') describes Judah, who is about to be shown as worse than Israel. The sisterhood metaphor (Israel and Judah as sisters) appears also in Ezekiel 16 and 23, where the metaphor is developed at much greater length.
8. The sefer keritut (sefer 'certificate of divorce') is the legal document prescribed in Deuteronomy 24:1. God is depicted as having formally divorced northern Israel — the Assyrian exile of 722 BCE is framed as marital dissolution. The devastating point is that Judah watched her sister's destruction and learned nothing from it. The word ni'afah ('committed adultery') is the technical term for marital infidelity, maintaining the marriage metaphor.
9. The phrase 'stone and wood' refers to the materials of idol worship — stone pillars (matstsebot) and wooden Asherah poles, or carved stone and wooden images. The irony of 'committing adultery with stone and wood' is biting — Judah has abandoned the living God for lifeless materials. The verb chanaf ('defile, pollute') echoes verse 2 and indicates that the land itself is contaminated by idolatry.
10. The phrase besheqer ('in falsehood, in pretense') likely refers to Josiah's reforms — which were genuine on the king's part but superficial among the people. The outward destruction of idols did not correspond to inward transformation. The failure to return 'with her whole heart' (bekhol libbah) echoes the great Shema command of Deuteronomy 6:5. Judah's repentance was performative, not genuine.
11. The verb tsiddeqah ('has justified herself, has shown herself righteous') is a stunning comparison — not that Israel was righteous, but that she is more righteous by comparison with Judah. Judah had the advantage of watching Israel's destruction and still refused to learn. The comparative judgment — the worse sin belongs to the one who had more warning — is a principle Jesus applies in Matthew 11:20-24.
12. The direction tsafonah ('toward the north') is toward Assyria, where the northern tribes were exiled in 722 BCE. The call shuvah meshuvah yisra'el ('return, faithless Israel') creates an untranslatable wordplay — the verb shuv ('return') is addressed to meshuvah ('turned-away') Israel, using the same root for both the command and the condition. The adjective chasid ('merciful, faithful in love') is rendered 'faithful in love' to connect it to chesed, the signature covenant term.

13. The verb pasha't ('you have rebelled, transgressed') denotes willful rebellion, not accidental failure. The phrase 'scattered your ways to strangers' (tefarezri et derakhayikh lazzarim) is a sexual metaphor — distributing her favors indiscriminately, like a promiscuous woman. The shift from feminine singular (de'i, 'acknowledge') to masculine plural (shema'tem, 'you obeyed') in the same verse reflects the fluid movement between the personified woman and the actual community.
14. The phrase ba'alti vakhem is profoundly ambiguous — ba'al means both 'husband/master' and 'to marry/to own.' God simultaneously claims marital authority and ownership. The wordplay shuvu banim shovavim ('return, turning-away children') again exploits the shuv root. The numbers 'one from a city, two from a clan' indicate that restoration will begin with a small remnant, not a mass return — even individual faithful ones matter to God.
15. The word ro'im ('shepherds, pastors') refers to leaders — kings, priests, and prophets who guide the people. The phrase kellibbi ('according to my heart') echoes the description of David (1 Samuel 13:14, 'a man after God's own heart'). The future leaders will not merely rule but 'tend' (ra'u) the people — the shepherd metaphor implies care, feeding, and protection. The pairing de'ah vehaskeil ('knowledge and wisdom') indicates competent, discerning leadership.
16. The fourfold negation is emphatic: (1) they will not say its name, (2) it will not come to mind (lo ya'aleh al lev), (3) they will not remember it, (4) they will not miss it (lo yifqodu — 'they will not visit/attend to it'). The ark of the covenant was already lost or hidden by Jeremiah's time (its fate is unknown after the Babylonian destruction), but this oracle goes further — it declares that the ark will not even be rebuilt. The covenant relationship will transcend its physical symbols.
17. Jerusalem replaces the ark as the locus of God's presence — the entire city becomes his 'throne' (kisse'), not just the mercy seat between the cherubim. The gathering of all nations (kol haggoyim) expands the vision beyond Israel to a universal scope. The phrase sheriut libbam hara' ('stubbornness of their evil heart') is the characteristic Jeremiah phrase for settled rebellion (cf. 7:24, 9:13, 11:8, 13:10).
18. The reunification of Judah and Israel — divided since Solomon's death (1 Kings 12) — is a recurring prophetic hope (cf. Ezekiel 37:15-28, Hosea 1:11). The 'land of the north' (erets tsafon) refers to the direction of exile (both Assyria and Babylon lie northeast of Israel, but the approach route is from the north). The word hinachalti ('I gave as inheritance') uses the root nachal, indicating permanent, ancestral possession — the land is not a rental but a family inheritance.
19. God's inner deliberation is poignant — the phrase eikh ashitek ('how shall I set you') expresses the desire to include Israel among the children, but the question implies difficulty. The land is described as erets chemdah ('a desirable land') and nachalat tsevi ('an inheritance of beauty/splendor'), piling up terms of loveliness. The hope 'you will call me avi (My Father)' echoes verse 4, but here it is God's wish rather than the people's manipulative appeal. The verb tashuvi ('you will turn away') is yet another shuv occurrence — the hope that the cycle of turning away will finally end.
20. The verse functions as a devastating pivot — after the tender vision of verses 14-19, God returns to the reality of betrayal. The word bagdah ('she has betrayed, dealt treacherously') is the same root used for 'treacherous Judah' (bogdah) in verses 7-11, now applied back to Israel. The comparison to a wife leaving her husband (ishah mere'ah) sustains the marriage metaphor through the chapter.
21. The shefayim ('barren heights') where Israel once prostituted herself (v. 2) now become the place of her weeping — the same locations associated with sin are now associated with repentance. The verb he'ewu ('they have twisted, perverted') from the root 'awah' indicates their path has become crooked and distorted. The forgetting of God (shakhekhu) is not mere forgetfulness but willful abandonment of the covenant relationship.
22. This verse contains another concentrated shuv wordplay: shuvu ('return'), shovavim ('turning-away ones'), and meshuvotekhem ('your apostasies') are all from the same root. No English can reproduce this — the command to turn-back is addressed to those who have turned-away, promising to heal their turning-away. The response of the people begins the communal confession that runs through verse 25. The transition from divine speech to communal response happens without narrative introduction.
23. The 'hills' and 'mountains' are references to the high places where idols were worshipped — the noisy festivals (hamon, 'commotion, tumult') on the mountains produced nothing. The word lasheqer ('in vain, falsely, a lie') condemns the entire cult-worship system as deception. The contrast with the final line — teshu'at yisra'el ('the salvation of Israel') — sets the false worship against the true God who alone can save.
24. The word habbosheth ('the shame, the shameful thing') is likely a dysphemism for Baal, as in 11:13 — the scribal tradition replaces the god's name with 'shame.' The verb akhelah ('has devoured, consumed') casts Baal worship as a devouring force that consumed not only livestock (sacrificed to idols) but children (possibly referencing child sacrifice, cf. 7:31, 19:5, 32:35). The confession acknowledges that idolatry has been generational — 'since our youth' (minne'ureinu).
25. The communal confession closes with total acknowledgment — sin from youth until the present, spanning generations. The verbs nishkevah ('let us lie down') and tekhassenu ('let it cover us') depict shame as a physical weight that presses down and covers over. The word chatanu ('we have sinned') uses the general term for sin (chet, 'missing the mark'). The final clause — 'we have not obeyed the voice of the LORD our God' — directly answers the covenant demand of verse 13 and echoes the covenant formula of 11:4, 7. The confession is genuine, unlike the pretense condemned in verse 10.

Summary: Jeremiah 4 moves from the possibility of return to the certainty of judgment. It opens with a conditional promise — if Israel returns genuinely, blessing will follow — but quickly pivots to an urgent warning: blow the trumpet, flee to the fortified cities, for disaster is coming from the north. The chapter reaches its astonishing climax in verses 23-26, where Jeremiah describes a vision of total cosmic undoing — the earth formless and void, the heavens without light, the mountains quaking, every person gone, every bird fled. This is creation running backward, Genesis 1 in reverse, and it stands as one of the most extraordinary poetic passages in all prophetic literature.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The creation-reversal vision of verses 23-26 is unique in the Hebrew Bible. Jeremiah uses the exact phrase tohu vavohu ('formless and void') from Genesis 1:2 — a phrase that appears only in these two places in all of Scripture (and in a variant form in Isaiah 34:11). The prophet sees not merely destruction but de-creation: the undoing of light, land, life, and order in precisely the reverse sequence of Genesis 1. This is not hyperbole but theological statement — sin has so corrupted the created order that God's judgment constitutes a return to primordial chaos. The command to 'circumcise your hearts' (v. 4) introduces an interior demand that anticipates Deuteronomy 30:6 and the new covenant of 31:31-34. We rendered the vision sequence with deliberate echoes of Genesis 1 to help readers hear what Hebrew readers would hear immediately.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase tohu vavohu required careful handling — we preserved the traditional 'formless and void' because no modern paraphrase captures the primordial resonance as effectively, and the Genesis 1:2 echo must be recognizable. The verb mul ('circumcise') in verse 4 is literal surgical language applied metaphorically to the heart, and we retained 'circumcise' rather than softening to 'open' or 'cleanse' because the physicality of the metaphor is theologically significant. The rapid shifts between divine speech, prophetic speech, and the prophet's personal anguish (especially vv. 19-22) required careful attribution. The chapter oscillates between conditional hope (vv. 1-2) and unconditional doom (vv. 5-31) in a way that resists smooth harmonization.*

Connections: *Tohu vavohu (v. 23) connects directly to Genesis 1:2, making this the only passage outside Genesis to use the exact phrase. 'Circumcise your hearts' (v. 4) connects to Deuteronomy 10:16, 30:6, and Romans 2:29. The 'lion from the thicket' (v. 7) connects to Jeremiah 5:6 and 49:19. The approaching army from the north connects to 1:13-15 and 6:1, 22. Jeremiah's anguish in verses 19-21 anticipates the confessions of 11:18-12:6, 15:10-21, and 20:7-18. The 'daughter of my people' (bat ammi, v. 11) is a recurring Jeremiah phrase (6:26, 8:11, 8:19, 8:21-22, 9:1). The cosmic judgment language resonates with Isaiah 24 (the 'Isaiah Apocalypse') and anticipates the new heavens and new earth of Isaiah 65:17.*

¹If you return, O Israel — declares the LORD — return to me.

If you remove your detestable things from my presence and do not waver,

²and if you swear, 'As the LORD lives,' in truth, in justice, and in righteousness —
then the nations will bless themselves through him,
and in him they will boast.

³For this is what the LORD says to the people of Judah and to Jerusalem:
Break up your unplowed ground;
do not sow among thorns.

⁴Circumcise yourselves to the LORD and remove the foreskin of your hearts,
O people of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem — or my wrath will break out like fire and burn with no one to quench it, because of the evil of your deeds.

⁵Announce it in Judah! Proclaim it in Jerusalem!
Sound the trumpet throughout the land!
Cry out and say:
'Gather together! Let us go into the fortified cities!'

⁶Raise the signal flag toward Zion!
Flee for safety — do not stand still!
For I am bringing disaster from the north,
and great destruction.

⁷A lion has come up from his thicket;
a destroyer of nations has set out.
He has left his place
to make your land a desolation.
Your cities will be laid waste, left without an inhabitant.

⁸For this, put on sackcloth;
mourn and wail,
for the burning anger of the LORD has not turned back from us.

⁹On that day — declares the LORD — the courage of the king will fail, and the courage of the officials. The priests will be horrified, and the prophets will be stunned. ¹⁰Then I said, "O Lord GOD! You have surely deceived this people and Jerusalem by saying, 'You will have peace,' when the sword reaches the throat!" ¹¹At that time it will be said to this people and to Jerusalem: A scorching wind from the barren heights in the wilderness blows toward the daughter of my people — not to winnow and not to cleanse, ¹²a wind too strong for that comes at my command. Now I myself will pronounce judgments against them.

¹³Look — he advances like storm clouds;
his chariots come like the whirlwind.
His horses are swifter than eagles.
Woe to us, for we are ruined!

¹⁴Wash the evil from your heart, O Jerusalem,
so that you may be saved.
How long will you harbor
wicked schemes within you?

¹⁵For a voice announces from Dan and proclaims disaster from the hill country of Ephraim.

¹⁶Warn the nations — look!
Proclaim it against Jerusalem:
Besiegers are coming from a distant land;
they raise their war cry against the cities of Judah.

¹⁷They surround her like guards around a field,
because she has rebelled against me, declares the LORD.

¹⁸Your ways and your deeds have brought this upon you.
This is your punishment — how bitter it is!
It has reached your very heart.

¹⁹My anguish, my anguish! I writhe in pain!
The walls of my heart!
My heart pounds within me — I cannot keep silent,
for I hear the sound of the trumpet,
the alarm of war!

²⁰Disaster upon disaster is announced,
for the whole land is devastated.
Suddenly my tents are destroyed,
my tent curtains in an instant.

²¹How long must I see the battle flag and hear the sound of the trumpet?

²²"For my people are foolish — they do not know me.
They are senseless children without understanding.
They are skilled at doing evil,
but they do not know how to do good."

²³I looked at the earth, and it was formless and void.
I looked at the heavens,
and their light was gone.

²⁴I looked at the mountains, and they were quaking.
All the hills swayed back and forth.

²⁵I looked, and there was no human being.
All the birds of the sky had fled.

²⁶I looked, and the fertile land was a wilderness.
All its cities were torn down before the LORD,
before his burning anger.

²⁷For this is what the LORD says:
The whole land will be desolate,
but I will not make a complete end of it.

²⁸For this the earth will mourn and the heavens above grow dark,
because I have spoken and I have purposed it.
I will not relent,
and I will not turn back from it.

²⁹At the sound of horsemen and archers every city takes flight.
They go into the thickets;
they climb up among the rocks.
Every city is abandoned — not a single person remains in them.

³⁰And you, O devastated one — what will you do?
Though you dress in scarlet,
though you adorn yourself with gold jewelry,
though you enlarge your eyes with paint —
you beautify yourself for nothing.
Your lovers despise you;
they seek your life.

³¹For I hear a cry like a woman in labor, anguish like one bearing her first child —
the voice of the daughter of Zion, gasping for breath, stretching out her hands:
"Woe is me!
I am fainting before the killers!"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The conditional 'if' (im) governs the entire opening — the promise of verses 1-2 depends on genuine return. The verb shuv appears twice: 'if you return... return to me,' emphasizing that the turning must be directed specifically toward God, not merely away from sin. The word shiqquṣ ('detestable things, abominations') refers to idols — objects of worship that God finds repulsive. The verb tanuḏ ('waver, stray, wander') indicates that the return must be stable, not another temporary swing between loyalty and apostasy.
2. The oath formula chai-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') was commonly invoked but here God demands it be spoken be'emet ('in truth') — not as an empty formula but as a genuine commitment. The three qualities — emet ('truth, faithfulness'), mishpat ('justice, right judgment'), tsedaqah ('righteousness') — describe the character of a properly ordered covenant community. The phrase vehitbarekhu vo goyim ('the nations will bless themselves in him') echoes the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12:3, 22:18), tying Israel's return to God's universal purpose.
3. The agricultural metaphor niru lakhem nir ('plow for yourselves plowing,' i.e., break up your fallow ground) demands genuine preparation before planting. Fallow ground — hardened by neglect — cannot receive seed. The command not to sow among thorns warns against superficial reform that leaves the roots of idolatry in place. Hosea 10:12 uses identical language: 'Break up your fallow ground, for it is time to seek the LORD.' The metaphor anticipates the parable of the sower (Matthew 13:3-9, 18-23).
4. The phrase arlot levavkhem ('foreskins of your hearts') is strikingly physical — the metaphor transfers surgical removal of flesh to the spiritual removal of resistance and hardness from the inner life. The warning pen tete' ka'esh chamati ('lest my wrath go forth like fire') uses pen ('lest') to indicate that judgment is still avoidable at this point — but barely. The phrase me'in mekhabeḥ ('with no one to quench') indicates that once God's wrath ignites, no power can extinguish it.

5. The tone shifts abruptly from conditional hope (vv. 1-4) to urgent alarm. The shofar ('trumpet, ram's horn') was the emergency signal for invasion — its blast meant war. The cascade of imperatives — haggidu, hashmi'u, imru, tiq'u, qir'u, mal'u — creates a sense of panicked urgency. The flight to arei hamivtsar ('fortified cities') indicates that the open countryside is no longer safe.
6. The nes ('signal flag, standard, banner') was raised to direct fleeing civilians toward a rally point. The direction mitstsafon ('from the north') echoes 1:13-15, where God first revealed to Jeremiah that judgment would come from the north — the approach route of Mesopotamian armies into Israel. The word shever ('destruction, breaking, shattering') implies total structural collapse.
7. The aryeh ('lion') is a metaphor for the invading king — likely Nebuchadnezzar, though the image is deliberately unspecific at this point. The phrase mashchit goyim ('destroyer of nations') indicates this is not a local threat but an empire-destroying force. The lion emerging from the subbeko ('thicket, lair') combines animal ferocity with military planning. The result — shammah ('desolation') and cities me'ein yoshev ('without inhabitant') — is total depopulation.
8. Sackcloth (saqqim) was the garment of mourning and lamentation — coarse goat hair worn against the skin as a sign of grief. The verb shuv appears again (lo shav, 'has not turned back') — the irony is that Israel has not 'turned back' to God (v. 1), and now God's anger has not 'turned back' from them. The same verb that could have described repentance now describes unrelenting divine wrath.
9. The word lev ('heart') here means courage and resolve, not emotion — when the heart 'perishes' (yo'vad), it means the will to lead collapses. The four leadership groups — king, officials (sarim), priests, and prophets — represent every pillar of Judean society. All four will be paralyzed. The verb nashammu ('will be horrified, desolate') for the priests and yitmahu ('will be astounded, stunned') for the prophets describe leaders too shocked to function.
10. Jeremiah's outcry ahah Adonai YHWH ('O Lord GOD!') is an expression of anguish and near-accusation. The verb hishe'ta ('you have deceived') is extraordinarily bold — Jeremiah accuses God of deception, foreshadowing the even more intense accusation in 20:7 (pittitani, 'you seduced/deceived me'). The 'peace' (shalom) that was promised may refer to the false prophets' message that Jeremiah attributes (here, in his shock) to God himself. The phrase ad hannafesh ('to the throat/life') means the sword has reached the point of death.
11. The ruach tsach ('scorching wind, dry wind') from the desert is the sirocco — the hot east wind that desiccates everything it touches. This wind comes not for the normal agricultural purpose of winnowing (lizrot) or cleaning grain (lehavar) but for destruction. The phrase bat ammi ('daughter of my people') is an intimate, grieving designation — God speaks of Judah as his own daughter even while announcing her destruction.
12. The phrase ruach male' me'elleh ('a wind fuller/stronger than those') means this wind exceeds any natural storm — it is God's instrument of judgment, not merely weather. The verb adabber mishpatim ('I will speak judgments') shifts from meteorological metaphor to legal declaration — God is both storm-sender and judge. The word mishpatim ('judgments, legal sentences') is the language of the courtroom.
13. The invader is compared to unstoppable natural forces — clouds (covering the sky), a whirlwind (destroying everything in its path), and eagles (the fastest creatures known). The three comparisons escalate from visual threat (clouds) to kinetic force (whirlwind) to terrifying speed (eagles). The cry oy lanu ki shuddadnu ('woe to us, for we are ruined!') is the people's own voice breaking into the oracle — the transition from warning to lament.
14. The verb kabbesi ('wash') is the technical term for laundering cloth — scrubbing stains out of fabric. Applied to the heart, it demands thorough cleansing, not a surface rinse. The word machshevot ('schemes, thoughts, plans') combined with onekh ('your wickedness, iniquity') indicates that the problem is not merely sinful actions but sinful planning — the heart itself generates evil. The question 'how long?' (ad matai) implies that delay is no longer possible.
15. Dan was the northernmost city of Israel — the first point of contact for an invading army from the north. Mount Ephraim (har Efrayim) lies between Dan and Jerusalem. The progression Dan Ephraim Jerusalem traces the invader's route southward. The voice (qol) announcing disaster is that of the advance warning runners who would relay news of the army's approach from station to station.
16. The word notserim ('watchers, besiegers, guards') can mean those who watch over a city in siege — surrounding it to prevent escape. The phrase erets hammerchaq ('a distant land') keeps the invader's identity ambiguous while emphasizing the vast distance they have traveled to bring judgment. The verb yittenu qolam ('they give their voice') refers to the war cry — the terrifying shout of an attacking army.
17. The simile compares the besieging army to shomerei sadai ('field guards') — workers who surround a cultivated field to keep animals out. The image is one of total encirclement. The reason for the siege is stated directly: ki oti maratah ('because she has rebelled against me'). The verb marah ('to rebel, to be contentious') makes the invasion not a geopolitical event but a covenant consequence.
18. The verse places responsibility squarely on the people: darkekh uma'alalayikh ('your ways and your deeds') have caused the invasion. The word mar ('bitter') describes the taste of judgment — not merely painful but nauseating. The phrase naga' ad libbek ('it has reached your heart') echoes the earlier command to circumcise the heart (v. 4) — the heart they refused to open to God is now pierced by judgment.
19. This is Jeremiah's personal eruption into the oracle — the prophet's own body responds to the vision of destruction. The word me'ai ('my bowels, my inward parts') refers to the visceral, gut-level pain — the deepest physical reaction to emotional trauma. The phrase qirot libbi ('walls of my heart') is unique — as if the heart itself has walls that are shaking. The verb ochilah ('I writhe, I am in pain') describes the convulsions of anguish. This is the beginning of the personal prophetic lament that marks Jeremiah's unique contribution to prophetic literature.
20. The phrase shever al shever ('disaster upon disaster, breaking upon breaking') conveys cascading catastrophe — each wave of destruction followed immediately by another. The 'tents' (ohalai) and 'tent curtains' (yeri'otai) represent homes and personal shelter. The words pit'om ('suddenly') and rega' ('in an instant') emphasize the speed of the collapse — there is no gradual decline, only instant obliteration.

- 21. The nes ('banner, signal flag') and shofar ('trumpet') are the instruments of war — the visual and auditory signals of battle. Jeremiah's question 'how long?' (ad matai) is both a lament and an accusation — he is forced to witness destruction he cannot prevent. This echoes the psalms of lament (Psalm 13:1-2, 'How long, O LORD?').
- 22. God answers Jeremiah's lament with a devastating character assessment. The word evil ('foolish') describes not intellectual deficiency but moral stupidity — willful ignorance of God. The contrast chakhamim hemah lehara' ('they are wise at evil') with uleheitiv lo yada'u ('but doing good they do not know') is bitterly ironic — their expertise is in wrongdoing, their incompetence is in righteousness. The word sekhalim ('senseless, stupid') is harsher than evil — it implies thick-headed obtuseness.
- 23. We preserved 'formless and void' — the traditional rendering of tohu vavohu — specifically because the Genesis 1:2 echo must be immediately recognizable to English readers familiar with creation language. Any paraphrase ('chaotic wasteland,' 'empty desolation') would lose the intertextual connection. The fourfold 'I looked' sequence (ra'iti... v. 23, 24, 25, 26) structures the vision as a systematic survey of de-creation: earth, heavens, mountains, living creatures — each domain of Genesis 1 undone in order.
- 24. The mountains — symbols of permanence and stability in Hebrew thought (Psalm 125:1-2) — are ro'ashim ('quaking, trembling'). The verb hitqalqelu ('they swayed, moved to and fro') for the hills suggests violent oscillation. In Genesis 1, God separated the waters and let dry land appear (Genesis 1:9-10); here the solid ground itself becomes unstable. The creation-reversal sequence continues: after earth and light (v. 23), the stability of the terrain (v. 24).
- 25. The word ha'adam ('the human, humanity') echoes Genesis 1:26-27, where God created ha'adam. Now ha'adam is gone — de-creation has reversed the sixth day. The birds of the sky (of hashamayim) were created on the fifth day (Genesis 1:20-21); they too have fled. The sequence precisely reverses Genesis: light gone (v. 23 = Day 1 reversed), land unstable (v. 24 = Day 3 reversed), humans gone (v. 25a = Day 6 reversed), birds gone (v. 25b = Day 5 reversed). The Hebrew ein ('there was not') has the absolute finality of absence.
- 26. The karmel ('fertile land, orchard, garden land') has become midbar ('wilderness, desert') — the cultivated abundance of Genesis 1:11-12 (vegetation) and 1:29 (seed-bearing plants) is reversed. The cities — the pinnacle of human civilization — are nittsetsu ('torn down, demolished'). The cause is stated twice for emphasis: mippenei YHWH, mippenei charon appo ('before the LORD, before his burning anger'). The vision has now completed its survey: cosmos (v. 23), terrain (v. 24), life (v. 25), civilization (v. 26) — all undone.
- 27. After the total de-creation vision of verses 23-26, this verse introduces a stunning qualification: vekhalah lo e'eseh ('but a complete end I will not make'). The judgment, however cosmic in its imagery, will not be final — a thread of hope persists even in the most absolute destruction oracle. The word shemamah ('desolation, horror') describes a landscape so devastated that it causes shuddering in anyone who sees it.
- 28. The earth mourns (te'eval) and the heavens darken (qaderu) — creation itself responds to God's judgment with grief. The verb zammoti ('I have purposed, I have planned') indicates deliberate intent, not impulsive rage. The double negation lo nichamti ('I will not relent') and lo ashuv ('I will not turn back') uses shuv once more — God will not 'turn back' from judgment, just as the people would not 'turn back' to him. The irony of shuv continues to the end.
- 29. The panic is universal — kol ha'ir ('every city') flees. The flight into thickets (ba'avim) and up onto rocks (bakkefim) depicts civilians scrambling for any hiding place. The word azuva ('abandoned, deserted, forsaken') carries emotional weight — the cities are not just empty but forsaken, like a wife abandoned by her husband (cf. Isaiah 54:6), connecting back to the marital metaphor of chapter 3.
- 30. Jerusalem is personified as a woman trying to make herself attractive to her former lovers (the foreign allies she courted through political treaties and religious syncretism). The scarlet clothing (shani), gold jewelry (adi zahav), and eye paint (pukh) are the trappings of seduction. The bitter irony: the lovers she adorns herself for now want to kill her (nafshekh yevaqueshu, 'they seek your life'). The word ma'asu ('they despise, reject') means her allies have turned into her destroyers.
- 31. The chapter closes with a devastating image: bat Tsiyon ('the daughter of Zion') is compared to a woman in her first labor (kemavkirah) — the most painful and terrifying birth experience, compounded by inexperience. The verb tityappeach ('she gasps, she pants') describes the ragged breathing of extreme pain or terror. The stretching out of hands (tefaresh kappeha) is the gesture of desperate supplication — reaching for help that will not come. Her final cry — ki ayfah nafshi lehoregim ('my soul faints before the killers') — ends the chapter with the voice of a dying city.

Summary: Jeremiah 5 intensifies the indictment of Jerusalem with a divine challenge: search the city for even one person who acts justly and seeks truth, and God will pardon it. The search proves futile — from the poorest to the greatest, all have broken the yoke and shattered the bonds of covenant. The chapter catalogs the nation's sins: adultery and idolatry, willful spiritual blindness, false prophets who prophesy lies, and a people who love it so. God announces that a distant, ancient nation will come as the instrument of judgment — a terrifying army that devours harvest, flocks, sons, daughters, and fortified cities.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening challenge to find one righteous person echoes Abraham's negotiation with God over Sodom (Genesis 18:22-33), but with a devastating reduction — Abraham bargained God down to ten righteous, while here God asks for only one and finds none. The language of verses 20-25 presents a striking courtroom theology: creation itself obeys God's boundaries (the sea stays within its shore), but Israel refuses every boundary God has set. The false prophecy motif appears for the first time with the phrase 'wind and there is no word in them' (v. 13), and the condemnation of prophets and priests in verses 30-31 anticipates the 'shalom shalom' crisis of chapter 6. The 'ancient nation' of verse 15 is Babylon, though never named here — the anonymity increases the dread.

Translation Friction: The verb zannah ('commit adultery/prostitution') in verse 7 carries both literal sexual and metaphorical idolatrous meaning, and we rendered it to preserve this dual register. The word me'anah ('they have refused') in verse 3 uses the same root as Pharaoh's refusal in Exodus, creating an ironic reversal — Israel now acts like Egypt. In verse 22, the rhetorical question 'Do you not fear me?' (ha-oti lo tira'u) contains a wordplay between yir'ah ('fear/reverence') and ra'ah ('see'), both of which the people have abandoned. The phrase 'eternal statutes' (choq olam) for the sea boundary in verse 22 required an expanded_ rendering to capture the cosmological weight of olam in this creation context.

Connections: The search for one righteous person connects to Genesis 18:22-33 (Abraham and Sodom), Ezekiel 22:30 (God seeking someone to stand in the gap), and Isaiah 59:16 (God astonished that there was no intercessor). The 'enemy from the north' theme begun in 1:14-15 develops here into a specific military threat (vv. 15-17). The creation theology of verses 22-24 — God who set the sand as boundary for the sea — connects to Job 38:8-11 and Psalm 104:9. The false prophecy condemnation anticipates the full-scale confrontation with false prophets in chapters 23, 27-28. The closing question 'What will you do when the end comes?' (v. 31) reverberates through Ezekiel 7 and into apocalyptic literature.

1Go through the streets of Jerusalem — look and take note. Search in her public squares: can you find even one person who acts justly and seeks faithfulness? If so, I will pardon the city. 2Even when they say, 'As the LORD lives,' they are swearing falsely. 3LORD, do your eyes not look for faithfulness? You have struck them, but they felt no pain. You have crushed them, but they refused to accept correction. They have made their faces harder than rock; they have refused to turn back. 4Then I said: These are only the poor — they are foolish because they do not know the way of the LORD or the justice their God requires. 5Let me go to the leaders and speak with them, for they know the way of the LORD and the justice their God requires. But they too had broken the yoke entirely and snapped the restraints. 6Therefore a lion from the forest will strike them down, a wolf of the desert will ravage them, a leopard will prowl at their cities — everyone who goes out will be torn apart. For their rebellions are many and their acts of faithlessness are countless. 7How can I pardon you for this? Your children have abandoned me and sworn oaths by what are not gods. When I satisfied them with plenty, they committed adultery and crowded into the house of the prostitute. 8They are well-fed, lusty stallions, each one neighing after his neighbor's wife. 9Should I not punish them for these things? — declares the LORD. Should I not avenge myself against a nation such as this? 10Go up through her vine rows and destroy — but do not make a complete end. Strip away her branches, for they do not belong to the LORD. 11For the house of Israel and the house of Judah have been utterly faithless toward me, declares the LORD. 12They have denied the LORD and said, 'He will do nothing. No disaster will come upon us; we will never see sword or famine.' 13The prophets are nothing but wind — there is no word in them. What they threaten will happen to them instead! ¹⁴Therefore, this is what the LORD, the God of Hosts, says: Because you have spoken this way, I am making my words in your mouth a fire, and this people will be the wood, and the fire will consume them. ¹⁵I am bringing a nation against you from far away, O house of Israel — declares the LORD. It is an enduring nation, an ancient nation, a nation whose language you do not know, whose speech you cannot understand. ¹⁶Their quiver is like an open grave — they are all warriors. ¹⁷They will devour your harvest and your food. They will devour your sons and your daughters. They will devour your flocks and your herds. They will devour your vines and your fig trees. They will shatter your fortified cities in which you trust — by the sword. ¹⁸Yet even in those days — declares the LORD — I will not make a complete end of you. ¹⁹When they ask, 'Why has the LORD our God done all this to us?' — you will tell them: Just as you abandoned me and served foreign gods in your own land, so you will serve foreigners in a land that is not yours. ²⁰Declare this in the house of Jacob and proclaim it in Judah: ²¹Hear this, you senseless people, who have no understanding — who have eyes but do not see, who have ears but do not hear! ²²Do you not fear me? — declares the LORD. Do you not tremble before me? I set the sand as a boundary for the sea, an eternal limit it cannot cross. Though its waves surge, they cannot prevail; though they roar, they cannot pass beyond it. ²³But this people has a stubborn and rebellious heart — they have turned aside and gone away. ²⁴They do not say in their hearts, 'Let us fear the LORD our God, who gives the rain — the autumn and spring rains in their season — who keeps for us the appointed weeks of the harvest.' ²⁵Your iniquities have turned these things away, and your sins have kept good things from you. ²⁶For wicked people are found among my people. They lie in wait like fowlers crouching down; they set traps — they catch human beings. ²⁷As a cage is full of birds, so their houses are full of treachery. That is how they have grown powerful and rich. ²⁸They have grown fat and sleek. They surpass even the deeds of the wicked. They do not defend the rights of the fatherless — yet they prosper — and they do not uphold the justice due to the poor. ²⁹Should I not punish them for these things? — declares the LORD. Should I not avenge myself against a nation such as this? ³⁰An appalling and horrible thing has happened in the land: ³¹The prophets prophesy falsely, and the priests rule at their direction — and my people love it this way! But what will you do when the end comes?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The imperative shotetu ('go about, roam, search') suggests a thorough, street-by-street investigation. The challenge echoes Abraham's negotiation for Sodom in Genesis 18:22-33, but reduces the threshold from ten righteous to one — and still none is found. The word emunah ('faithfulness') from the root aleph-mem-nun ('to be firm') goes beyond mere truthfulness to covenantal reliability.
2. The oath formula 'As the LORD lives' (chai YHWH) was the most solemn declaration in Israelite culture. Using God's name in a false oath compounds the sin — it is not just dishonesty but profanation of the divine name, violating the third commandment (Exodus 20:7).
3. The phrase me'anu lashov ('they refused to return') uses the key Jeremican verb shuv, which carries the double meaning of repentance and physical turning. The image of faces harder than rock (sela) suggests willful imperviousness — not inability to change but adamant refusal. The word musar ('correction, discipline') implies God's previous punishments were intended as instructive, not merely punitive.
4. Jeremiah initially excuses the common people (dallim, 'poor, lowly'), attributing their disobedience to ignorance rather than malice. The assumption is that the educated leaders would know better — an assumption the next verse destroys. The word no'alu ('they are foolish') implies senselessness, not mere lack of education.
5. The 'great ones' (gedolim) are the ruling class — priests, prophets, royal officials. The yoke (ol) and restraints (moserot) are metaphors for covenant obligations. 'Breaking the yoke' describes willful rejection of God's authority, not mere drift. The word yachdav ('together, altogether') emphasizes that this was collective, unanimous rebellion — not a few individuals but the entire leadership class.
6. Three predators — lion, wolf, leopard — represent escalating danger from every direction. The phrase ze'ev aravot ('wolf of the desert/steppe') describes wolves from the barren wastelands, desperate and aggressive. The word meshuvotehem ('their turnings away, backslidings') uses the same root shuv — they have turned away from God so often that judgment now stalks them like wild predators. The word peshah'ehem ('their rebellions') denotes willful transgression, not accidental sin.
7. The verb na'afu ('they committed adultery') operates on two levels simultaneously: literal sexual immorality and metaphorical worship of foreign gods. The phrase 'sworn by what are not gods' (lo elohim) echoes Deuteronomy 32:21 — they provoke God with 'no-gods.' The word va'asbia ('I satisfied them') shares a root with sheva ('oath/seven/fullness'), creating a wordplay: God fulfilled his oath of abundance, and they used that abundance for debauchery.
8. The image is deliberately crude: susim meyuzzanim ('well-fed stallions') compares the men of Jerusalem to stud horses in heat. The verb yitshalu ('they neigh') is the sound a stallion makes when pursuing a mare — applied to human beings, it strips away all pretense of dignity. This is not subtle prophetic metaphor; it is designed to shame.

9. This rhetorical refrain appears three times in the chapter (vv. 9, 29), framing the indictment. The verb paqad ('visit, attend to, punish') is the same word used for God's 'visiting' Egypt with plagues — now directed at his own people. The phrase titnaqqem nafshi ('shall my soul/self be avenged') attributes deep personal feeling to God — this is not detached judicial action but a wronged party's righteous anger.
10. The metaphor shifts to viticulture: sharoteyha ('her vine rows/terraces') and netishoteha ('her branches/tendrils') depict Judah as a vineyard (cf. Isaiah 5:1-7). The command to destroy but not completely (kalah al ta'asu) preserves the remnant theology — God's judgment is severe but not annihilating. The branches that do not belong to the LORD are the idolatrous elements that have infiltrated the covenant people.
11. The emphatic infinitive absolute bagod bagdu ('they have utterly betrayed') stresses the completeness of the treachery. The verb bagad carries the sense of marital betrayal — faithlessness within a committed relationship, not violation by a stranger but betrayal by a spouse. Both kingdoms are indicted together.
12. The verb kichashu ('they have denied, lied about') goes beyond mere unbelief — it is an active denial of God's relevance. Their statement lo hu ('not he' or 'it is not so') effectively dismisses God as a factor in their national life. This is not atheism but functional deism — acknowledging God's existence while denying his active involvement and his power to punish.
13. The people dismiss the true prophets as ruach ('wind') — empty air with no substance. The wordplay is sharp: ruach means both 'wind' and 'spirit,' and the prophets claim to speak by the Spirit (ruach) of God. The people reduce divine spirit to empty bluster. The phrase haddiber en bahem ('the word is not in them') denies that these prophets carry any genuine divine message. The final clause turns their dismissal back on them — what they call empty threats will become their reality.
14. God responds to the people's dismissal of the prophets by intensifying the prophetic word — the message they called empty wind will become consuming fire. The metaphor is devastatingly simple: if the people are wood, the word of God is fire, and fire consumes wood. The address shifts to Jeremiah personally ('your mouth'), affirming him as the authentic bearer of the divine word the people have rejected.
15. Babylon is described without being named — the anonymity heightens the terror. The word eitan ('enduring, mighty, permanent') suggests a power that will not be easily dislodged. The phrase goy me'olam ('a nation from ancient times') emphasizes Babylon's deep historical roots. The language barrier — 'you will not understand what they say' — strips away any possibility of negotiation or appeal. The invader is utterly alien.
16. The simile is chilling: a quiver (ashpato) compared to an open grave (qever patuach) means that every arrow is a death sentence. The grave stands open, waiting for the bodies that these arrows will produce. The phrase kullam gibborim ('all of them warriors') eliminates any hope of finding weakness in the invading force.
17. The fivefold repetition of the verb akhal ('devour, eat, consume') creates a devastating catalogue of total consumption: crops, children, livestock, orchards, and cities. The verb is the same for all — the enemy consumes everything with the same indiscriminate appetite. The list moves from agricultural goods to human beings to permanent infrastructure, showing that nothing will remain. The word boteach ('trusting') in reference to fortified cities implies misplaced confidence in military defenses rather than in God.
18. A sudden note of restraint in the midst of devastating judgment. The phrase lo e'eseh kalah ('I will not make a complete end') preserves remnant theology — God's judgment, however severe, will not be total annihilation. This mirrors verse 10's command to destroy but not completely.
19. The principle of measure-for-measure justice (middah keneged middah) operates here: they served foreign gods in their own land, so they will serve foreign people in a foreign land. The wordplay between elohei nekhar ('foreign gods') and zarim ('foreigners/strangers') ties idolatry directly to exile — the punishment mirrors the crime. The phrase eret lo lakhem ('a land not yours') reverses the promise of the land flowing with milk and honey.
20. The use of 'Jacob' alongside 'Judah' reaches back to the patriarchal name, reminding the people of their identity as descendants of the man who wrestled with God. The parallel between declaring (haggidu) and proclaiming (hashmi'uha) emphasizes that this is a public announcement, not a private revelation.
21. The phrase am sakhal ve'en lev ('senseless people without heart') combines two deficiencies: sakhal ('foolish, senseless') and the lack of lev ('heart'), which in Hebrew is the organ of understanding and will, not emotion. The parallel of unseeing eyes and unhearing ears echoes Isaiah 6:9-10 and Ezekiel 12:2. Jesus quotes this tradition in Mark 8:18 when confronting his own disciples' incomprehension.
22. The creation theology here echoes Job 38:8-11 and Psalm 104:9 — God's sovereign control over the sea as evidence of cosmic authority. The rhetorical force is devastating: the mindless sea obeys God's boundary, but rational Israel does not. The word chol ('sand') as boundary for the sea emphasizes that even the most apparently fragile barrier holds firm when God establishes it. The implied contrast is between creation's obedience and Israel's rebellion.
23. The phrase lev sorer umoreh ('a stubborn and rebellious heart') uses the same pair of adjectives applied to the 'stubborn and rebellious son' in Deuteronomy 21:18-21, who was subject to the death penalty. The legal implication is severe: Israel is behaving like the incorrigible son of covenant law. The verbs saru vayelexhu ('they turned aside and went away') describe departure from the covenant path.
24. The 'former rain' (yoreh) falls in October-November to soften the ground for plowing; the 'latter rain' (malqosh) falls in March-April to fill the grain before harvest. Both are essential to the agricultural cycle, and both come from God. The 'appointed weeks of harvest' (shevuot chuqqot qatsir) refers to the reliable seven-week period between Passover and Shavuot (the Feast of Weeks). The point is that God's faithful provision of agricultural rhythms should have taught Israel to trust and obey him.

25. The two words for wrongdoing — avonoteikhem ('your iniquities,' from the root meaning 'to twist, distort') and chattoteikhem ('your sins,' from the root meaning 'to miss the mark') — represent different dimensions of moral failure. Iniquity twists what should be straight; sin misses what should be hit. Together they have disrupted the natural order — even the rains that God appointed have been withheld because of the people's corruption.
26. The imagery is of bird-trappers (yoqushim) who crouch hidden and set snares (mashchit) — but instead of birds, they catch human beings. The word yashur ('he watches, peers') describes the patient, concealed observation of a hunter waiting for prey. The metaphor exposes the predatory nature of the wicked within Israel — they exploit their own people as a hunter exploits helpless birds.
27. The kelub ('cage, basket') full of captured birds parallels houses full of mirmah ('deceit, treachery'). Their wealth is not earned but trapped — accumulated through predatory deception of vulnerable people. The verbs gadelu ('they have grown great') and ya'ashiru ('they have grown rich') are presented as consequences of fraud, not blessing.
28. The verbs shamenu ('they have grown fat') and ashtu ('they are sleek, smooth') describe the physical prosperity of the corrupt — their bodies testify to their unjust wealth. The specific accusation is failure to defend the yatom ('orphan, fatherless') and the evyon ('poor, needy') — the two most vulnerable categories in Israelite social law. The prophets consistently identify justice for the vulnerable as the litmus test of covenant faithfulness (cf. Isaiah 1:17, Amos 2:6-7).
29. This refrain repeats verbatim from verse 9, creating a literary frame around the expanded indictment. The repetition signals that the case has been fully presented and the verdict is now inescapable. The question is rhetorical — of course God must act.
30. The pair shammah veshaararurah ('appalling and horrible') intensifies the shock. The word shammah means 'desolation, horror' — something that causes onlookers to gasp. The word shaararurah ('horrible thing') is extremely rare in Hebrew and appears only in Jeremiah (here and 23:14) and Hosea 6:10, always describing something within Israel that provokes divine disgust.
31. The triad of corruption — prophets, priests, and people — forms a closed system of mutual reinforcement. The prophets prophesy basheqer ('with falsehood'), the priests yirdu al yedeihem ('rule at their side/direction'), and the people ahavu ken ('love it this way'). The most devastating element is the last: the people are not deceived against their will — they prefer the deception. The closing question umah ta'asu le'acharitah ('what will you do at its end?') is left unanswered, hanging in the air as an invitation to self-examination that the text knows will go unheeded.

Summary: Jeremiah 6 closes the opening cycle of oracles (chapters 1-6) with an urgent call to flee Jerusalem before the approaching enemy arrives. The Babylonian army is depicted as shepherds camping around the city, as workers building siege ramps, and as grape-harvesters stripping the vine bare. At the center of the chapter stands one of the most celebrated verses in the prophetic canon: 'Stand at the crossroads and look; ask for the ancient paths' (v. 16). The chapter contains the devastating 'Peace, peace!' indictment (v. 14) — false prophets and priests heal the wound of God's people superficially, crying 'Shalom! Shalom!' when there is no shalom. The chapter concludes with the refiner's fire metaphor: God has tested his people like a metalworker testing ore, and found them to be refuse silver — impurities that cannot be separated out.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Verse 14 introduces the phrase that will become the signature indictment of false prophecy in the entire book: shalom shalom ve'en shalom ('Peace, peace — but there is no peace'). It is repeated verbatim in 8:11. Verse 16 — 'Stand at the crossroads and ask for the ancient paths, where the good way is' — has become one of the most widely quoted prophetic texts in any tradition, but its context is often lost: the people's response is 'We will not walk in it.' The refiner's metaphor in verses 27-30 is significant because it fails — normally in prophetic literature, refining produces purified metal (cf. Malachi 3:2-3), but here the refining process cannot extract any silver because the corruption is too deep. The people are declared 'rejected silver' (kesef nim'as). This chapter marks the end of Jeremiah's initial preaching before the temple sermon of chapter 7.*

Translation Friction: The verb tsaraph ('to refine, smelt') in verses 27-29 required careful handling because the metaphor inverts the expected outcome — refining here fails rather than succeeds. The phrase derekh hatov ('the good way') in verse 16 had to be rendered without importing later Christian readings of 'the way' while preserving the full weight of the Hebrew. The word mabtsur ('fortification') versus batsar ('to cut off grapes') in verses 6-9 creates a wordplay between siege warfare and grape harvesting that cannot be replicated in English and required a translator note. The cry shalom shalom in verse 14 was rendered as 'Peace, peace!' to preserve the hollow repetition — a single 'peace' would lose the desperate, formulaic quality of the false assurance.

Connections: The 'Peace, peace!' cry connects forward to 8:11 (verbatim repetition), 14:13 (false prophets promising peace), 23:17, 28:9, and Ezekiel 13:10-16 (prophets who whitewash with plaster). The 'ancient paths' of verse 16 connect to Deuteronomy's emphasis on walking in God's ways (Deuteronomy 5:33, 10:12). The refiner's metaphor connects to Isaiah 1:22-25 (dross), Ezekiel 22:18-22 (furnace), Zechariah 13:9, and Malachi 3:2-3 (refiner's fire). The enemy-from-the-north theme reaches its fullest pre-siege expression here, begun in 1:14-15 and continued in 4:5-8 and 5:15-17. The call to flee Judah's territory (v. 1) anticipates Jesus's warning to flee Jerusalem in the Olivet Discourse (Matthew 24:16).

¹Take refuge, sons of Benjamin, away from the heart of Jerusalem! Blow the trumpet in Tekoa and raise a signal fire over Beth-hakkerem — for disaster looms from the north, and great destruction. ²The beautiful and pampered one — I will destroy the daughter of Zion. ³Shepherds will come against her with their flocks. They will pitch their tents all around her; each one will graze his own portion. ⁴Consecrate war against her! Rise up — let us attack at noon! 'Woe to us, for the day is fading and the evening shadows are stretching long!' ⁵Rise up — let us attack in the night and demolish her fortresses! ⁶For this is what the LORD of Hosts says: Cut down her trees and build a siege ramp against Jerusalem. This is the city that must be punished — she is filled with nothing but oppression. ⁷As a well keeps its water fresh, so she keeps her wickedness fresh. Violence and destruction echo through her; sickness and wounds are constantly before me. ⁸Accept discipline, O Jerusalem, or I will turn away from you in disgust. I will make you a desolation — a land where no one lives. ⁹This is what the LORD of Hosts says: They will glean what remains of Israel thoroughly, like a vine. Pass your hand again over the branches, like a grape-harvester. ¹⁰To whom can I speak and give warning so they will listen? Look — their ears are uncircumcised; they cannot pay attention. The word of the LORD has become an object of scorn to them; they take no pleasure in it. ¹¹But I am filled with the wrath of the LORD — I am exhausted from holding it in. Pour it out on the children in the streets and on the gatherings of young men alike! For both husband and wife will be seized, the elderly along with the very old. ¹²Their houses will be handed over to others, their fields and their wives alike — for I will stretch out my hand against the inhabitants of the land, declares the LORD. ¹³For from the least to the greatest, every one of them pursues dishonest profit. From prophet to priest, every one of them practices fraud. ¹⁴They have treated the wound of my people as though it were nothing, saying, 'Peace, peace!' — but there is no peace. ¹⁵Are they ashamed of the detestable things they have done? They are not ashamed at all — they do not even know how to blush. Therefore they will fall among the fallen. When I punish them, they will stumble, says the LORD. ¹⁶This is what the LORD says: Stand at the crossroads and look. Ask for the ancient paths — where the good way is — and walk in it, and you will find rest for your souls. But they said, 'We will not walk in it.' ¹⁷And I raised up watchmen over you, saying, 'Listen for the sound of the trumpet!' But they said, 'We will not listen.' ¹⁸Therefore hear, you nations, and take note, O assembly, of what is happening among them. ¹⁹Listen, O earth! I am bringing disaster upon this people — the fruit of their own schemes — because they have not listened to my words and have rejected my instruction. ²⁰What use to me is frankincense from Sheba or fragrant cane from a distant land? Your burnt offerings are not acceptable, and your sacrifices do not please me. ²¹Therefore, this is what the LORD says: I am going to place stumbling blocks before this people, and they will stumble over them — fathers and sons together, neighbors and friends will perish. ²²This is what the LORD says: A people is coming from the land of the north — a great nation is stirring from the farthest reaches of the earth. ²³They grasp bow and javelin. They are cruel and show no mercy. Their sound roars like the sea. They ride on horses, drawn up for battle like a single warrior — against you, O daughter of Zion. ²⁴We have heard the report of them — our hands hang limp. Anguish has seized us, pain like a woman in labor. ²⁵Do not go out into the field or walk along the road, for the enemy has a sword — there is terror on every side. ²⁶O daughter of my people, put on sackcloth and roll in ashes. Mourn as for an only child — with the most bitter lamentation — for the destroyer will come upon us suddenly. ²⁷I have made you a tester among my people, a refiner — so that you may know and examine their ways. ²⁸All of them are hardened rebels, going about as slanderers. They are bronze and iron — all of them are corrupt. ²⁹The bellows blow fiercely — the lead is consumed by the fire. The refining goes on in vain, for the wicked impurities cannot be separated out. ³⁰They are called 'rejected silver,' for the LORD has rejected them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The wordplay between Tekoa (teqoa) and 'blow' (tiq'u) is characteristic of Jeremiah's rhetorical style — the name of the town sounds like the command to blow the trumpet. Beth-hakkerem ('house of the vineyard') was a hilltop south of Jerusalem suitable for signal fires. The 'sons of Benjamin' are addressed because Jeremiah himself was from Benjaminites territory (Anathoth), and Benjamin's tribal land lay immediately north of Jerusalem — the direction from which the enemy approaches. The verb nishqefah ('looks out, peers down') personifies the disaster as an enemy scanning from the northern heights.
2. The Hebrew is ambiguous: damiti can derive from either damah ('to be like, compare') or damah ('to destroy, silence'). The KJV follows the first reading ('I have likened'), but many scholars and modern translations follow the second ('I will destroy/silence'). The juxtaposition of beauty (na'avah, 'lovely') and destruction creates a deliberate shock — the delicate, beautiful city is about to be devastated. We follow the destruction reading as it better fits the threatening context.
3. The 'shepherds' (ro'im) with their 'flocks' (edreihem) is a double metaphor: the enemy commanders are shepherds, their armies are flocks, and Jerusalem is the pasture they will consume. The phrase ra'u ish et yado ('each grazes his own portion') depicts a methodical, orderly siege — each unit assigned its section of the wall to attack. The pastoral imagery masks military brutality.
4. The verb qaddushu ('consecrate, sanctify') applied to war reveals the ancient Near Eastern concept of warfare as a sacred act requiring ritual preparation. The enemy's eagerness is so fierce that they lament the coming of evening — they cannot wait until morning to resume the attack. The dialogue format dramatizes the invader's impatience.
5. The enemy's resolve overrides normal military caution — night attacks were rare and dangerous in the ancient world. The word armenoteyha ('her palaces, fortresses') targets the centers of royal and military power. The urgency continues from verse 4: unable to wait for daylight, they attack through the darkness.
6. The siege ramp (solelah) was built by cutting trees and piling earth and timber against the city wall until attackers could scale it. The word hofqad ('must be punished, visited') uses the judicial verb paqad — the divine visitation is punitive. The phrase kulah osheq beqirbah ('all of her is oppression within her') depicts a city whose internal character is entirely corrupt — oppression is not an occasional failing but the defining quality of Jerusalem's social life.
7. The comparison of Jerusalem to a bor ('cistern, well') that keeps its water flowing is inverted — instead of fresh water, the city produces a constant flow of fresh wickedness. The word hamas ('violence') is the same word used in Genesis 6:11 to describe the corruption that prompted the flood. The pairing of choli ('sickness') and makkah ('wounds, blows') depicts Jerusalem as a battered, diseased body — her social corruption manifests as physical affliction.
8. The verb tiqqa ('will be torn away, wrenched away') describes God's own soul (nafshi) being violently separated from Jerusalem — not a calm departure but a wrenching away in revulsion. The word shemamah ('desolation, wasteland') describes not just emptiness but a horror that appalls onlookers. The phrase erets lo noshavah ('a land not inhabited') is the ultimate reversal of the promised land — the land flowing with milk and honey becomes a land where no one can live.
9. The gleanings metaphor (olel ye'olelu) describes a second pass through the vineyard to collect every last grape — nothing will be left. The word she'erit ('remnant') here does not carry its positive theological sense (the surviving faithful) but describes what little remains of Israel after the initial devastation. The salsilot ('branches, tendrils') must be stripped bare — a thorough, methodical destruction.
10. The phrase arelah oznam ('their ear is uncircumcised') is a striking metaphor: just as uncircumcised flesh marks someone as outside the covenant, uncircumcised ears indicate hearts closed to God's word. The concept of 'circumcised ears' appears also in Acts 7:51. The progression from inability ('they cannot pay attention') to unwillingness ('they take no pleasure in it') shows both cognitive and volitional rejection. Jeremiah's frustration as a prophet who cannot find a receptive audience echoes throughout his confessions.
11. Jeremiah experiences God's wrath physically — he is 'filled' (male'ti) with it and 'exhausted' (nil'eti) from containing it. The prophetic experience is not detached proclamation but embodied suffering. The inclusivity of judgment is total: children (olal), young men (bachurim), married couples (ish im ishah), and the elderly (zaqen im mele yamim) — no age or status is exempt.
12. The loss of houses, fields, and wives inverts the covenant blessings of Deuteronomy 28:3-6 and fulfills the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28:30 ('You will build a house but not live in it; you will plant a vineyard but not enjoy its fruit; your wife will be taken by another'). The phrase atteh et yadi ('I will stretch out my hand') echoes God's outstretched hand against Egypt in the Exodus — now the same hand strikes his own people.
13. The phrase botse'a batsa ('pursuing dishonest gain') describes systematic economic exploitation — not occasional greed but a way of life. The parallel between 'least to greatest' (social hierarchy) and 'prophet to priest' (religious leadership) means the entire society, both civil and sacred, is corrupt. The word sheqer ('falsehood, fraud') applied to both prophet and priest means the religious establishment has become a machine for producing lies.
14. This is one of the most famous verses in Jeremiah, repeated verbatim in 8:11. The verb rappu ('they have healed') is used with al neqallah ('superficially, lightly') — they have treated a catastrophic wound (shever, 'fracture, break, shattering') as if it were trivial. The doubling shalom shalom is emphatic — 'total peace, complete peace!' — making the lie even more egregious. The final ve'en shalom ('but there is no peace') delivers the prophet's devastating verdict in three Hebrew words.

15. The to'evah ('abomination, detestable thing') is a technical term for practices that violate the covenant's holiness standards, especially idolatry and social injustice. The phrase bosh lo yevoshu ('they are utterly unashamed') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute. The lost capacity for shame (hakhlim lo yada'u, 'they do not know how to blush') describes a moral sensibility so deadened that the normal human response to wrongdoing has been extinguished.
16. This is one of the most celebrated verses in prophetic literature. The derekh hatov ('the good way') is singular — there is one right path, not many options. The netivot olam ('ancient paths') are not merely historical traditions but the covenant way of life God established. The word margo'a ('rest') for the nafshekhem ('your souls/selves') echoes the Sabbath rest theology. The devastating conclusion — vayomeru lo neleq ('But they said: We will not walk in it') — transforms what could be an inspiring invitation into a tragedy of refusal.
17. The tsofim ('watchmen') are the prophets — sentinels stationed on the wall to warn of approaching danger (cf. Ezekiel 3:17, 33:7). The shofar ('trumpet, ram's horn') was the warning signal for imminent military attack. The people's response — lo naqshiv ('we will not listen') — directly echoes their refusal to walk in the ancient paths (v. 16). The pattern of refusal is now established: they will not walk, they will not listen.
18. God summons the nations (goyim) as witnesses to Israel's trial — a covenant lawsuit (riv) convention in which heaven and earth or the surrounding nations serve as witnesses to covenant violation (cf. Deuteronomy 32:1, Isaiah 1:2, Micah 6:1-2). The word edah ('assembly, congregation') may refer either to the nations assembled or to Israel's own community witnessing its own indictment.
19. The earth itself is called as witness. The phrase peri machshevotam ('the fruit of their schemes/thoughts') applies agricultural imagery to moral causation — they have planted wickedness and will now harvest its produce. The word torah ('instruction, law') here carries its broad Jeremianic sense of God's total covenantal instruction, not merely the written Torah scroll. The verb ma'asu ('they rejected') is the same verb used for God's rejection of Saul's kingship in 1 Samuel 15:23.
20. The rhetoric strips religious ritual of its supposed value. Levonah ('frankincense') from Sheba (southern Arabia) and qaneh hatov ('fragrant cane,' likely calamus or sugarcane) were expensive imports used in temple worship. God declares that lavish ritual expenditure without covenant obedience is worthless — a theme echoed in Isaiah 1:11-17, Amos 5:21-24, and Micah 6:6-8. The word ratson ('acceptable, favorable') is the technical term for a sacrifice that God receives with pleasure; here it is negated.
21. The miksholot ('stumbling blocks') are obstacles God deliberately places in their path — the judgment is not random but intentional. The comprehensiveness of the destruction — avot uvanim ('fathers and sons'), shakhen vere'o ('neighbor and friend') — means that normal bonds of family and community will not protect anyone. The relational language emphasizes that the social fabric itself will be torn apart.
22. The enemy-from-the-north motif reaches its most developed form in this chapter. The phrase me'erets tsafon ('from the land of the north') identifies the direction of approach — Babylon lay east of Judah, but its armies approached from the north through the Fertile Crescent because the Syrian desert was impassable. The phrase yarketei erets ('the farthest reaches of the earth') emphasizes the vast distance this enemy will travel — their commitment to conquest is implacable.
23. The portrait of the enemy emphasizes five qualities: armed (qeshet vekhidon, 'bow and javelin'), merciless (akhzari, 'cruel'), terrifying in sound (qolam kayyam yehemeh, 'their voice roars like the sea'), mounted (al susim yirkavu), and disciplined (arukh ke'ish lamilchamah, 'arranged like one man for battle'). The phrase bat tsiyon ('daughter of Zion') personifies Jerusalem as a vulnerable woman facing this overwhelming military force — the contrast between the delicate daughter and the roaring army is deliberate.
24. The voice shifts to the people's terrified response. The phrase rafu yadenu ('our hands hang limp') describes the paralysis of fear — the inability to fight or flee. The comparison to chil kayyoleadah ('pain like a woman in labor') is a stock prophetic image for inescapable, overwhelming agony (cf. Isaiah 13:8, Micah 4:9-10). The image implies both suffering and inevitability — labor pains cannot be stopped once they begin.
25. The phrase magor missaviv ('terror on every side') becomes one of Jeremiah's signature phrases — so characteristic that his enemies use it as a mocking nickname for him (20:3, 20:10). The restriction against going into fields or roads describes the conditions of siege — the countryside is controlled by the enemy, and only the walled city offers any safety. Even that safety is temporary.
26. The mourning customs described — saq ('sackcloth,' coarse goat-hair cloth) and efer ('ashes') — were the most extreme expressions of grief in Israelite culture. The phrase evel yachid ('mourning for an only child') describes the most devastating possible loss — the death of a sole heir, ending the family line. The word tamrurim ('bitter things, bitter weeping') intensifies the grief to its maximum. Jeremiah identifies himself with the people: 'upon us' (aleinu), not 'upon you.'
27. God addresses Jeremiah directly, assigning him the role of bachon ('tester, assayer') — the metalworker who tests the purity of ore. The word mivtsar is difficult and may mean 'fortress' or relate to the refining process ('one who tests by cutting off'). We follow the refining interpretation because it matches the metallurgical metaphor that dominates the rest of the chapter (vv. 28-30). Jeremiah's prophetic ministry is recast as an assay — he is testing the people's metal to determine its quality.
28. The phrase sarei sorerim ('stubbornly rebellious') doubles the root sur ('to turn aside') for emphasis. The metallurgical metaphor identifies the people as nechoshet uvarzel ('bronze and iron') — base metals rather than precious silver or gold. In ancient smelting, bronze and iron were the impurities that contaminated silver ore. The word mashchitim ('corrupt ones, destroyers') derives from the same root as the corruption that provoked the flood (Genesis 6:12).
29. The smelting process has failed. The mappuach ('bellows') has been pumped until scorched, the oferet ('lead') — used as a flux to absorb impurities in the refining of silver — has been consumed, and still the impurities remain. The verb nittaqu ('separated, torn away') indicates that the wicked elements are so thoroughly fused with the metal that no amount of refining can extract them. This is a failed refining — unlike Malachi 3:2-3, where the refiner succeeds, here the ore is beyond purification.

30. The verdict is delivered in metallurgical terms: keseḥ nim'aṣ ('rejected silver, refuse silver') — ore that has been tested, refined, and found to contain no recoverable silver. The verb ma'aṣ ('to reject, refuse, despise') is the same word used for Saul's rejection from kingship (1 Samuel 15:23, 26) and Israel's rejection of God in 1 Samuel 8:7. The chapter that began with the search for one righteous person ends with the entire people declared worthless — unrefinable, beyond purification, rejected.

Summary: Jeremiah 7 contains the Temple Sermon — the prophet's most provocative public address. Standing at the gate of the LORD's house, Jeremiah confronts the people's false confidence that the Temple's presence guarantees Jerusalem's safety. The threefold repetition 'The temple of the LORD' (v. 4) mocks a popular slogan. God demands moral reform, not ritual attendance (vv. 5-7), and invokes the destruction of Shiloh as proof that he will abandon even his own sanctuary when the people corrupt it (vv. 12-14). The chapter escalates to a prohibition against intercessory prayer (v. 16), describes the Queen of Heaven cult (vv. 17-19), and culminates in God's declaration that he never commanded sacrifice — he commanded obedience (vv. 21-23). The chapter closes with the abomination of child sacrifice in the Valley of Hinnom (vv. 30-34).

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the sermon that nearly got Jeremiah killed (the aftermath appears in chapter 26). The threefold 'temple of the LORD' in verse 4 is not emphasis but mockery — Jeremiah is imitating and ridiculing a liturgical chant the people used as a talisman. The Shiloh reference (vv. 12-14) is devastating: Shiloh was where the tabernacle stood for centuries before its destruction, proving that God's presence can be withdrawn from a sacred site. The statement 'I did not speak to your ancestors or command them concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices' (v. 22) is one of the most radical claims in the Hebrew Bible — not that sacrifice is wrong, but that obedience was always the primary demand. The Valley of Ben-Hinnom (Ge-Hinnom, v. 31) becomes the source of the Greek Gehenna, the New Testament's primary image for final judgment.

Translation Friction: *The verb batach ('trust') in verse 4 required careful handling — the people are not trusting God but trusting in the Temple building as a magical guarantee. We rendered divrei hasheqer as 'deceptive words' rather than 'lying words' to capture the self-deception involved. The phrase 'the Queen of Heaven' (melekhet hashamayim, v. 18) is historically debated — likely Ishtar/Astarte — but we retain the Hebrew designation without identifying a specific deity, as the text does not. The controversial verse 22 ('I did not command... concerning burnt offerings') must be rendered without either softening it into irrelevance or overstating it as an absolute rejection of all sacrifice — the contrast is between ritual mechanics and covenantal obedience.*

Connections: The Temple Sermon parallels Micah 3:11-12 (Zion will be plowed as a field). The Shiloh reference connects to the ark narrative of 1 Samuel 4 and Psalm 78:60. The prohibition against intercession reprises the theme from 11:14 and 14:11. The 'Queen of Heaven' cult reappears in 44:15-19 among the Egyptian refugees. The Valley of Hinnom connects to 2 Kings 23:10 (Josiah's reform) and becomes Gehenna in Matthew 5:22 and Mark 9:43. The obedience-over-sacrifice principle echoes 1 Samuel 15:22 and Hosea 6:6, and is quoted by Jesus in Matthew 9:13.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²Stand at the gate of the LORD's house and proclaim this message there. Say: Hear the word of the LORD, all of Judah who enter through these gates to worship the LORD. ³This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Reform your ways and your deeds, and I will let you continue to dwell in this place. ⁴Do not trust in deceptive words, chanting: 'The temple of the LORD! The temple of the LORD! The temple of the LORD!' ⁵For if you truly reform your ways and your deeds — if you truly practice justice between one person and another, ⁶if you do not oppress the foreigner, the orphan, or the widow, and do not shed innocent blood in this place, and do not follow other gods to your own harm — ⁷then I will let you dwell in this place, in the land that I gave to your ancestors from age to age. ⁸Look — you are trusting in deceptive words that accomplish nothing. ⁹Will you steal, murder, commit adultery, swear falsely, burn incense to Baal, and follow other gods that you have not known — ¹⁰and then come and stand before me in this house that bears my name, and say, 'We are safe!' — only to go on doing all these abominations? ¹¹Has this house that bears my name become a den of criminals in your eyes? I too have seen it, declares the LORD. ¹²Go now to my place at Shiloh, where I first made my name dwell, and see what I did to it because of the wickedness of my people Israel. ¹³And now, because you have done all these things, declares the LORD — and though I spoke to you persistently, you did not listen, and though I called you, you did not answer — ¹⁴I will do to this house that bears my name — the one you are trusting in — and to the place I gave to you and your ancestors, what I did to Shiloh. ¹⁵I will throw you out of my presence, just as I threw out all your kinsmen — all the descendants of Ephraim. ¹⁶As for you — do not pray for this people. Do not lift up cry or prayer on their behalf, and do not plead with me, for I will not listen to you. ¹⁷Do you not see what they are doing in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem? ¹⁸The children gather wood, the fathers light the fire, and the women knead dough to make cakes for the Queen of Heaven, and they pour out drink offerings to other gods — provoking me to anger. ¹⁹Is it me they are provoking? declares the LORD. Is it not rather themselves, to their own shame? ²⁰Therefore, this is what the Lord GOD says: My anger and my wrath will be poured out on this place — on human and animal, on the trees of the field and the fruit of the ground. It will burn and will not be quenched. ²¹This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Add your burnt offerings to your other sacrifices and eat the meat yourselves! ²²For I did not speak to your ancestors, nor did I command them on the day I brought them out of the land of Egypt, concerning burnt offerings and sacrifices. ²³Rather, this is what I commanded them: Obey my voice, and I will be your God and you will be my people. Walk in every way that I command you, so that it may go well for you. ²⁴But they did not listen or incline their ear. They walked according to the schemes and stubbornness of their evil heart, and went backward, not forward. ²⁵From the day your ancestors came out of the land of Egypt until this very day, I have sent to you all my servants the prophets — sending them persistently, day after day. ²⁶But they did not listen to me or incline their ear. They stiffened their neck and did worse than their ancestors. ²⁷You will speak all these words to them, but they will not listen to you. You will call out to them, but they will not answer you. ²⁸Then say to them: This is the nation that did not obey the voice of the LORD their God and refused correction. Faithfulness has perished — it has been cut off from their lips. ²⁹Cut off your hair and throw it away! Raise a lament on the barren heights, for the LORD has rejected and abandoned the generation that provoked his wrath. ³⁰For the people of Judah have done what is evil in my sight, declares the LORD. They have placed their detestable idols in the house that bears my name, defiling it. ³¹They have built the high places of Topheth in the Valley of Ben-Hinnom to burn their sons and daughters in the fire — something I never commanded, and which never entered my mind. ³²Therefore, the days are coming, declares the LORD, when it will no longer be called Topheth or the Valley of Ben-Hinnom, but the Valley of Slaughter. They will bury the dead in Topheth until there is no more room. ³³The corpses of this people will become food for the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth, and no one will drive them away. ³⁴I will silence in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem the sound of joy and the sound of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, for the land will become a wasteland.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') functions as a speech-introduction marker and is rendered as a colon rather than as an additional English word.
2. The location is critical — Jeremiah is told to stand at the Temple gate itself, confronting worshippers as they arrive. The verb hishtachavot ('to bow down, worship') indicates prostration before God. The irony is that these are people coming to worship who will be told their worship is worthless without moral reform.
3. The verb heitivu ('make good, reform') demands active moral change, not mere ritual adjustment. The conditional promise — 'I will let you dwell' — implies that continued residence in the land is not guaranteed. The phrase 'this place' (hammaqom hazzeh) refers ambiguously to both the Temple and the land, a deliberate doubling.
4. The verb batach ('to trust, rely on') indicates the people are placing their security in the Temple as a talisman rather than in the God who dwells there. The triple repetition hekhhal YHWH ('temple of the LORD') imitates a liturgical chant — Jeremiah is quoting and ridiculing a popular slogan. The word sheqer ('falsehood, deception') is one of Jeremiah's most frequent words, characterizing the entire spiritual culture of his day.
5. The infinitive absolute construction heitev teitivu ('truly reform') intensifies the demand — superficial adjustment will not suffice. The word mishpat ('justice') here means fair dealing in legal and social disputes, not abstract righteousness. Jeremiah begins a catalogue of specific moral requirements.

6. The triad ger-yatom-almanah ('foreigner, orphan, widow') represents the most vulnerable members of Israelite society. Their protection is a covenant obligation (Deuteronomy 24:17-22). The phrase 'to your own harm' (lera lakhem) is striking — idolatry harms not God but the worshippers themselves.
7. The phrase lemin olam ve'ad olam ('from age to age') expresses perpetuity. The conditional structure is complete: moral reform (vv. 5-6) would secure continued dwelling. The land promise to the ancestors is real but conditional on covenant faithfulness — this is the core tension of Deuteronomic theology.
8. The accusation resumes from verse 4. The phrase levilti ho'il ('without benefit, to no profit') declares the Temple-slogan theology not just false but useless — it provides no actual protection. The verb batach ('trust') again highlights misplaced confidence.
9. This catalogue echoes the Ten Commandments (Exodus 20:1-17; Deuteronomy 5:6-21). Stealing, murder, adultery, and false oaths violate commandments 6-9, while Baal worship and following other gods violate commandments 1-2. Jeremiah compresses the Decalogue into a single accusatory question. The infinitive absolute construction (ganov, ratsoach, na'of) gives the list a staccato, relentless rhythm.
10. The phrase niqra shemi alav ('my name is called upon it') means the Temple bears God's name — it belongs to him. The people's cry nitsalnu ('we are delivered, saved, safe') exposes their theology: they believe Temple attendance functions as a magical protection spell that permits continued sin. The word to'evot ('abominations') is the strongest term for covenant violations.
11. The phrase me'arat paritsim ('cave/den of violent ones') is quoted by Jesus when he cleanses the Temple (Matthew 21:13, Mark 11:17, Luke 19:46). Paritsim are not merely thieves but violent breakers — robbers who use force. The Temple has become a hideout where criminals come to feel safe after committing their crimes. God's 'I too have seen it' is ominous — he is not fooled by their ritual performance.
12. Shiloh, in the territory of Ephraim, was the central sanctuary before the monarchy — the tabernacle stood there for centuries (Joshua 18:1; 1 Samuel 1-4). Its destruction (referenced in Psalm 78:60) demonstrated that God would abandon even his own sacred site when the people corrupted it. The parallel is unmistakable: what happened to Shiloh can happen to Jerusalem's Temple.
13. The idiom hashkem vedabber ('rising early and speaking') is the same persistence formula seen in 11:7. God's repeated, tireless efforts to communicate are met with silence. The double failure — 'did not listen... did not answer' — establishes the legal basis for judgment: the defendant was warned and given every opportunity to respond.
14. The sentence structure deliberately parallels the Temple ('this house') with the land ('the place I gave you') — both are at risk. The verb botechim ('trusting') echoes verse 4 and 8: their trust is in the building, not in God. The Shiloh comparison is the climax of the argument — if God destroyed his first sanctuary, he will destroy his second.
15. Ephraim represents the northern kingdom of Israel, destroyed by Assyria in 722 BCE. God has already expelled the ten northern tribes. Judah is not exempt from the same fate. The verb hishlakhti ('I threw out, cast away') is violent — not a gentle sending away but a forceful ejection from God's presence.
16. This prohibition against prophetic intercession is devastating. A prophet's core function included standing before God on behalf of the people (as Moses did repeatedly, Exodus 32:11-14; Numbers 14:13-19). God is shutting down the last channel of mercy. The verb tifga ('press upon, plead, intercede') is stronger than ordinary prayer — it implies urgent, pressing petition. Even that will not be heard.
17. God directs Jeremiah's attention to what is happening in plain sight. The question is rhetorical — the prophet can see the idolatry everywhere. The shift to second person singular addresses Jeremiah personally, pulling him into the evidence for why intercession is pointless.
18. The whole family participates in the idolatrous ritual — children, fathers, and women each have a role. The phrase melekhet hashamayim ('Queen of Heaven') likely refers to the Mesopotamian goddess Ishtar or the Canaanite Astarte. The kavvanim ('cakes') were probably shaped in the goddess's image or stamped with her symbol. This cult reappears in 44:15-19, where the women defend their worship. The verb hakh'iseni ('to provoke me') attributes genuine anger to God — the idolatry is personally offensive.
19. A remarkable theological statement: God declares that idolatry ultimately harms the idolaters, not God. The word bosheth ('shame') appears again (cf. 11:13 where it substitutes for Baal). The rhetorical question structure implies that God's sovereignty is not threatened by their worship of other gods — but they are destroying themselves.
20. The double divine title Adonai YHWH ('Lord GOD') adds solemnity. The verb nittekhet ('poured out') depicts wrath as a liquid — molten anger that flows over everything. The judgment is comprehensive, affecting all creation: humans, animals, vegetation, and crops. The cosmic scope echoes the uncreation themes found elsewhere in the prophets. The phrase 'will not be quenched' (lo tikhbeh) indicates irreversible judgment.
21. This is biting sarcasm. Burnt offerings (olot) were entirely consumed on the altar — none of the meat went to the worshipper. God says: go ahead and eat even those. The whole sacrificial system has become so meaningless that the distinction between sacrifices for God and meals for the people is irrelevant. The imperative 'eat flesh' dismisses the sacrificial system as mere meat consumption.
22. This is one of the most provocative statements in the Hebrew Bible. Taken at face value, it appears to contradict the extensive sacrificial legislation in Exodus and Leviticus. The interpretive key is the phrase 'on the day I brought them out' — God's first words at Sinai were the Ten Commandments, which concern moral obedience, not ritual. The sacrificial system came later. Jeremiah's point is not that sacrifice is illegitimate but that it was never the primary demand — obedience was.

23. The covenant formula — 'I will be your God and you will be my people' — returns (cf. 11:4). The substance of the original covenant demand is relational obedience (shim'u beqoli, 'obey my voice'), not ritual performance. The promise lema'an yitav lakhem ('so that it may go well for you') frames obedience as being for the people's own benefit, not God's.
24. The phrase sheriruti libbam hara ('stubbornness of their evil heart') is Jeremiah's signature expression (cf. 3:17, 9:13, 11:8, 13:10, 16:12, 18:12, 23:17). The spatial metaphor 'backward, not forward' captures the tragedy — Israel should have been advancing toward God's purposes but instead regressed.
25. The persistence idiom hashkem veshaloch ('rising early and sending') recurs throughout Jeremiah (cf. 11:7, 25:4, 26:5, 29:19, 35:15, 44:4). God's prophetic warnings span the entire history from Exodus to the present — this is not a sudden intervention but a sustained, centuries-long effort.
26. The phrase vayyaqshu et orfam ('they stiffened their neck') depicts stubborn resistance using the image of an ox that resists the yoke by going rigid. The final clause is devastating: each generation surpassed the previous one in wickedness. The trajectory is not static rebellion but escalating corruption.
27. God warns Jeremiah in advance that his preaching will fail. This is one of the most painful aspects of prophetic calling — the prophet is sent knowing his audience will not respond. The double prediction ('will not listen... will not answer') mirrors the people's treatment of God himself (v. 13).
28. The word emunah here is rendered 'faithfulness' rather than 'truth' (KJV) because the Hebrew encompasses more than factual accuracy — it is covenantal reliability, trustworthiness, and loyalty. The metaphor of emunah being 'cut off from their mouth' (nikhretah mippihem) suggests it has been severed like a living thing — faithfulness is dead in their public speech and commitment.
29. The command to cut hair (gozzi nizrekha) is a mourning ritual — the uncut hair was a sign of consecration (the word nezer can mean 'consecrated hair' as with the Nazirite vow). Jerusalem, personified as a woman, is told to sever the sign of her consecration because the relationship is over. The 'barren heights' (shefayim) are the same high places associated with idolatrous worship — now they become places for mourning.
30. The shiqqs ('detestable thing, idol') is stronger than to'evah — it refers specifically to idolatrous objects placed inside the Temple itself. This is not merely worshipping foreign gods elsewhere but installing them in the LORD's own house. The defilement (tame') is ritual contamination that makes the Temple unfit for God's presence. This likely refers to the practices described in 2 Kings 21:4-7 and 23:4-14.
31. Topheth (from a root meaning 'fireplace' or 'drum' — drums may have been beaten to drown out screams) was the site of child sacrifice in the valley south of Jerusalem. The phrase 'never entered my mind' (lo aletah al libbi) is God's strongest possible denial — he not only did not command this practice but could not even conceive of it. The Valley of Ben-Hinnom (Ge-Hinnom) later becomes Gehenna in Greek, the New Testament's primary image of final judgment.
32. The renaming from 'Valley of Ben-Hinnom' to 'Valley of Slaughter' (Ge ha-Haregah) reverses the site's function — where children were killed as sacrifices, now the sacrificers themselves will be killed and buried. The grimly ironic justice: the place of murder becomes the mass grave of the murderers. 'Until there is no more room' indicates catastrophic death on a scale that overwhelms burial capacity.
33. Exposure of corpses to scavengers was the ultimate degradation in the ancient Near East — denial of proper burial was a curse-fulfillment (Deuteronomy 28:26). The phrase 'no one will drive them away' (ein macharid) means there will be no living person left to shoo the scavengers from the dead. This is the Deuteronomic covenant-curse enacted literally.
34. The fourfold 'sound/voice' (qol) creates a litany of silencing — joy, gladness, bridegroom, bride. These represent the sounds of a thriving society: celebration and marriage. Their cessation means the death of normal life. This formula of silenced celebration recurs in 16:9, 25:10, and 33:11 (where it is reversed in restoration). The final word — 'wasteland' (chorbah) — is the chapter's verdict.

Summary: Jeremiah 8 continues the judgment oracle begun in chapter 7 with a grim image of exhumed bones spread before the astral deities the dead had worshipped (vv. 1-3). The chapter then indicts Judah's refusal to return to God, contrasting the people's stubbornness with the instinctive faithfulness of migratory birds (vv. 4-7). The scribes who falsify God's instruction are condemned (v. 8), and the false prophets who cry 'Peace, peace!' are exposed again (v. 11, reprising 6:14). The chapter's emotional center is Jeremiah's lament over the harvest that has passed and the summer that has ended while the people remain unsaved (v. 20), culminating in the famous question: 'Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no healer there?' (v. 22).

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 8 contains one of the most explosive claims in the prophetic literature: the scribes' pen has turned God's torah into a lie. This is an indictment not of ordinary people but of the professional class responsible for preserving and transmitting divine instruction. Verse 7 employs the extraordinary argument that storks, turtledoves, swifts, and cranes are more faithful to their appointed times than God's own people — animals obey their Creator's order while Israel does not. The closing lament (vv. 18-22) is among the most emotionally devastating passages in the Hebrew Bible, with Jeremiah's grief becoming almost indistinguishable from God's own. The 'balm in Gilead' question (v. 22) has entered the world's literary and musical vocabulary, particularly through African American spirituals that transformed the unanswered question into an affirmation.

Translation Friction: The boundaries between divine speech, prophetic speech, and narrative voice blur repeatedly in this chapter — particularly in vv. 18-22, where it is unclear whether God or Jeremiah is the speaker. We have not forced a resolution where the Hebrew is ambiguous. The word torah in verse 8 could mean 'the Law' (Mosaic Torah) or 'instruction' more broadly — we rendered 'instruction of the LORD' to preserve the ambiguity. The rare birds in verse 7 (sus, agur) present identification challenges; we followed the best available ornithological scholarship. The phrase 'the pen of the scribes has made it into a lie' (v. 8) is rendered to preserve the radical claim without softening it.

Connections: The 'Peace, peace!' cry of 8:11 directly reprises 6:14. The indictment of scribes (8:8) anticipates Jesus's conflicts with the scribes and Pharisees. The migratory birds argument (8:7) connects to Isaiah 1:3 ('The ox knows its owner... but Israel does not know'). The balm of Gilead (8:22) is referenced in Genesis 37:25 and 43:11, and the question enters the New Testament interpretive tradition. The harvest-past lament (8:20) becomes proverbial. The 'daughter of my people' (bat ammi) refrain connects to Lamentations.

¹At that time, declares the LORD, they will bring out the bones of the kings of Judah, the bones of its officials, the bones of the priests, the bones of the prophets, and the bones of the inhabitants of Jerusalem from their graves. ²They will spread them out before the sun, the moon, and all the host of heaven — which they loved, served, followed, consulted, and worshipped. The bones will not be gathered or reburied; they will be like dung on the surface of the ground. ³Death will be preferred over life by all the survivors who remain from this evil family, in every place where I have driven them, declares the LORD of Hosts. ⁴Say to them: This is what the LORD says — Do people fall and never get up? Does someone turn away and never turn back? ⁵Why then has this people — Jerusalem — turned aside in perpetual rebellion? They cling to deceit; they refuse to turn back. ⁶I have listened carefully and heard — they do not speak honestly. No one repents of his wickedness, saying, 'What have I done?' Each one charges ahead on his own course, like a horse plunging into battle. ⁷Even the stork in the sky knows her appointed seasons; the turtledove, the swift, and the crane keep the time of their migration. But my people do not know the requirements of the LORD. ⁸How can you say, 'We are wise, and the instruction of the LORD is with us'? In truth, the lying pen of the scribes has turned it into a lie. ⁹The wise are put to shame; they are dismayed and trapped. They have rejected the word of the LORD — so what kind of wisdom do they have? ¹⁰Therefore I will give their wives to others and their fields to new owners, for from the least to the greatest, all of them chase after dishonest gain. From prophet to priest, every one of them practices fraud. ¹¹They dress the wound of the daughter of my people as if it were nothing, saying, 'Peace, peace!' — when there is no peace. ¹²Are they ashamed of committing abominations? They are not ashamed at all — they do not even know how to blush! Therefore they will fall among the fallen; in the time of their punishment they will stumble, says the LORD. ¹³I will bring their harvest to an end, declares the LORD. There are no grapes on the vine, no figs on the fig tree, and the leaves have withered. What I gave them will be taken from them. ¹⁴Why are we sitting here? Gather together — let us flee to the fortified cities and perish there, for the LORD our God has doomed us. He has given us poisoned water to drink because we have sinned against the LORD. ¹⁵We hoped for peace, but nothing good came; for a time of healing, but there was only terror. ¹⁶From Dan the snorting of his horses can be heard; at the sound of the neighing of his stallions the whole land trembles. They come and devour the land and everything in it — the city and all who live there. ¹⁷For I am sending among you venomous snakes — vipers that cannot be charmed — and they will bite you, declares the LORD. ¹⁸My grief is beyond healing; my heart within me is sick. ¹⁹Listen — the cry of the daughter of my people from a distant land: 'Is the LORD not in Zion? Is her King not within her?' Why have they provoked me with their carved images, with their worthless foreign idols? ²⁰The harvest is past, the summer has ended, and we are not saved. ²¹Because of the wound of the daughter of my people, I am wounded. I am in mourning; horror has seized me. ²²Is there no balm in Gilead? Is there no healer there? Why then has the healing of the daughter of my people not come?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The fivefold repetition of atsmot ('bones') creates a drumbeat of desecration. Every class of society is named — kings, officials (sarim, not merely 'princes'), priests, prophets, and ordinary citizens. No rank provides protection. The exhumation of bones was both a military humiliation and a search for burial goods.
2. The fivefold description of devotion — 'loved, served, followed, consulted, worshipped' — catalogs the full vocabulary of worship now directed at astral deities. The bitter irony: the bones are spread before the very celestial objects the dead had worshipped, but those gods cannot protect even their worshippers' remains. The comparison to domen ('dung, manure') is deliberately degrading — the honored dead become fertilizer.
3. The Hebrew nivchar mavet mechayim ('death is chosen over life') inverts the Deuteronomic call to 'choose life' (Deuteronomy 30:19). The survivors' suffering in exile will be so severe that they will wish they had died. The word mishpachah ('family, clan') applied to the whole nation personalizes the judgment — this is a family ruined by its own choices.
4. The verb shuv ('turn, return') carries its double meaning with full force here — Israel has 'turned away' from God, but they refuse to 'turn back.' The rhetorical questions appeal to common sense: falling implies rising, departure implies return. But Israel defies this natural logic.
5. The Hebrew plays on the shuv root three times: shovevah ('has turned aside'), meshuvah ('rebellion/turning'), and lashuv ('to return'). The word nitsachat ('perpetual, enduring') makes the rebellion permanent — this is not a temporary lapse but an established way of life. They 'cling to' (hechziqu) deceit as a drowning person clings to a branch.
6. God has been listening for any voice of repentance and hears none. The expected question of moral self-examination — 'What have I done?' (meh asiti) — never comes. The horse metaphor (sus shotef bammilchamah) depicts mindless, headlong momentum: a warhorse in full charge cannot stop itself. The people are running toward destruction with the same unstoppable force.
7. This is a devastating argument from nature: migratory birds instinctively know and obey their God-given cycles, but Israel — created with reason and given direct revelation — ignores the LORD's mishpat ('requirements, ordinances'). The chasidah ('stork,' from the root chesed, 'faithful love') is itself named for loyalty. The identification of sis and agur is debated; 'swift' and 'crane' follow the best available ornithological consensus. The contrast echoes Isaiah 1:3, where the ox and donkey know their master but Israel does not.
8. This is one of the most radical statements in prophetic literature. The soferim ('scribes') — the professional class responsible for copying, preserving, and interpreting God's torah — have falsified it. The word sheqer ('lie, falsehood') appears twice for emphasis. The charge is not that the torah itself is false but that the scribes' handling of it has perverted it into something deceptive. The word torah here could mean the Mosaic Law specifically or divine 'instruction' more broadly — we render 'instruction' to preserve the Hebrew range.
9. The question chokhmat meh lahem ('what wisdom is to them?') is devastating: wisdom that rejects God's word is no wisdom at all. The verb ma'asu ('rejected') is the same used for rejecting a king (1 Samuel 8:7) or a foundation stone (Psalm 118:22) — it implies deliberate refusal, not ignorance. The three verbs — 'shamed, dismayed, trapped' — describe the progressive collapse of false confidence.
10. This verse closely parallels 6:12-13. The phrase botse'a batsa ('chasing dishonest gain') uses the same root twice for emphasis — greed is universal, spanning every social class. The indictment of both prophet and priest (navi and kohen) as practitioners of sheqer ('fraud, falsehood') condemns the entire religious leadership.
11. This verse reprises 6:14 almost verbatim. The phrase al neqallah ('lightly, superficially') describes a doctor who bandages a deep wound without treating it — cosmetic care that masks a fatal condition. The metaphor shever bat ammi ('the fracture of the daughter of my people') treats the nation as a person with a broken body. The double shalom shalom is the false prophets' signature cry, directly contradicting Jeremiah's message of judgment.
12. This verse also reprises 6:15. The inability to blush (hakhlim lo yada'u) indicates a conscience so deadened that shame itself has become impossible. The word to'evah ('abomination') describes acts fundamentally offensive to the covenant order. Falling 'among the fallen' (bannophelim) means they will join the mass of the condemned — their immunity is an illusion.
13. The Hebrew asoph asiphem is difficult — it could mean 'I will surely gather them (for judgment)' or 'I will bring their harvest to an end.' The agricultural imagery — no grapes, no figs, withered leaves — depicts a land under covenant curse (cf. Deuteronomy 28:38-42). The fig tree and vine are symbols of covenant prosperity (1 Kings 4:25; Micah 4:4). Their barrenness signals covenant nullification. Jesus's cursing of the barren fig tree (Mark 11:12-14) draws on this prophetic tradition.
14. The people's speech shifts from paralysis to desperate flight. The verb niddamah ('let us be silent/perish') carries the double sense of silence and destruction — they expect to die in the fortified cities. The phrase mei rosh ('water of poison/gall') refers to a bitter, toxic plant. The people's self-awareness is remarkable: they acknowledge their sin against the LORD even as they flee.
15. The verb qavveh ('we hoped, waited for') expresses sustained expectation — the people waited for the shalom the false prophets promised. The contrast 'healing... terror' (marpe... be'atah) is sharp: where they expected restoration they found dread. This verse is nearly identical to 14:19, creating a recurring refrain of disappointed hope.
16. Dan, in the extreme north of Israel, is the first point of entry for an invading army from Mesopotamia. The approaching enemy is heard before it is seen — the sound of war horses precedes the army. The word abbirim ('stallions, mighty ones') emphasizes the military power of the cavalry. The verb 'devour' (yokhelu) treats the invasion as a consuming force that swallows the land.

17. The nechashim tsifonim ('serpents, vipers') are probably a metaphor for the Babylonian army, though the literal image is terrifying in its own right. The phrase 'cannot be charmed' (ein lahem lachash) means no amount of diplomacy, appeasement, or ritual manipulation will stop the coming judgment. The snake charmer's art represents any human attempt to control or deflect divine punishment.
18. This verse begins the great lament of 8:18-22, one of the most emotionally devastating passages in the Hebrew Bible. The speaker could be Jeremiah or God — the Hebrew does not specify, and the ambiguity may be intentional: the prophet's grief mirrors God's own. The word davvai ('sick, faint') describes a heart weakened by sorrow to the point of physical illness.
19. The dialogue structure is remarkable: the exiled people cry out asking if the LORD is still in Zion, and God interrupts with his own counter-question about their idolatry. The phrase havlei nekhar ('worthless foreign things') uses hevel ('vapor, emptiness') — the same word Ecclesiastes uses for 'vanity.' The idols are literally nothing. The term bat ammi ('daughter of my people') personalizes the nation as a beloved child in distress.
20. This verse has become proverbial. The agricultural metaphor captures irreversible loss: the harvest season had a fixed window, and once it passed, no amount of effort could recover the crop. The word nosha'nu ('we are saved') uses the passive of yasha ('to save, deliver') — salvation was expected but never came. The brevity of the Hebrew — only seven words — amplifies the devastation through understatement.
21. The verb hushbarti ('I am broken') shares the root with shever ('fracture, wound') — the prophet/God is broken by the brokenness of the people. The word qadarti ('I am dark/in mourning') refers to the darkened face of grief. The phrase shammah hecheziqatni ('horror has seized me') depicts grief as a physical force that grips and will not release.
22. Gilead, east of the Jordan, was famous for its medicinal resin (tsori, a balsam or balm) — referenced in Genesis 37:25 and 43:11 as a valuable trade commodity. The questions are anguished, not rhetorical in the simple sense: the balm exists, the healer exists, yet the wound remains open. The implication is that the people have refused the cure. The word arukhat ('healing, restoration') comes from a root meaning 'to grow new flesh over a wound.' The passage has entered world literature, especially through the African American spiritual 'There Is a Balm in Gilead,' which transforms the unanswered question into an affirmation.

Summary: Jeremiah 9 opens with the prophet's anguished wish that his head were a spring of water and his eyes a fountain of tears so he could weep endlessly for the slain of his people. God indicts Judah for a society saturated with deceit — neighbor deceives neighbor, tongue is bent like a bow for lies, and no one speaks truth. Judgment is decreed: Jerusalem will be reduced to rubble, the land made desolate. The chapter reaches its theological summit in verses 23-24, where the LORD declares that the only legitimate ground for boasting is knowing God — who exercises faithful love, justice, and righteousness. The chapter closes with a warning about circumcision of the flesh without circumcision of the heart, placing Judah alongside Egypt, Edom, Ammon, and Moab as nations circumcised in body but uncircumcised in heart.

*What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains two of Jeremiah's most quoted passages. The 'fountain of tears' opening (v. 1) gave Jeremiah his enduring title as the 'weeping prophet' — yet the tears are not sentimental but the response of a man who sees clearly that destruction is inevitable and irreversible. Verses 23-24 represent one of the Hebrew Bible's most concentrated statements on what God values: not human strength, wisdom, or wealth, but the knowledge of God expressed through chesed, mishpat, and tsedaqah. Paul quotes this passage in 1 Corinthians 1:31 and 2 Corinthians 10:17. The circumcision passage (vv. 25-26) anticipates Jeremiah's later 'new covenant' theology (31:31-34) where torah is written on hearts rather than enforced through external marks. The sustained indictment of deception as the society's core sin (vv. 2-9) reveals a culture where language itself has become weaponized — every word is a potential trap, every neighbor a potential betrayer.*

*Translation Friction: The Hebrew versification differs from English: what English Bibles number as 9:1 is 8:23 in the Hebrew (MT), and what English Bibles number as 9:2 is Hebrew 9:1. We follow English versification (9:1-26) since this is the system readers expect, but note the discrepancy. The verb ramah in verse 8 ('deceit') required careful distinction from other Hebrew deception words (sheqer, kazav, mirmah). The phrase mul arlat levavkhem ('circumcise the foreskin of your heart') in related Deuteronomy passages underlies the circumcision theology here, though Jeremiah uses different vocabulary. The dirge-calling for 'skilled women' mourners (v. 17) uses the term chakamot, literally 'wise women' — professional mourners whose craft was considered a form of wisdom.*

Connections: The weeping-prophet imagery connects to Lamentations, traditionally attributed to Jeremiah. The boasting passage (vv. 23-24) is quoted by Paul in 1 Corinthians 1:31 and 2 Corinthians 10:17. The circumcision-of-heart theme links to Deuteronomy 10:16 and 30:6, and forward to Romans 2:28-29 and Jeremiah's own new covenant oracle in 31:31-34. The desolation imagery connects to Jeremiah's temple sermon (ch. 7) and the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28. The professional mourners connect to the later mourning traditions visible in 2 Chronicles 35:25. The chesed-mishpat-tsedakah triad echoes Micah 6:8 and Hosea 6:6.

¹If only my head were a spring of water and my eyes a fountain of tears — then I would weep day and night for the slain of my people. ²If only I had a traveler's shelter in the wilderness — then I would abandon my people and walk away from them! For all of them are adulterers, a band of traitors. ³They bend their tongues like a bow for falsehood. It is not for faithfulness that they have grown strong in the land, for they go from one evil to another, and they do not know me, declares the LORD. ⁴Be on guard, each of you, against your neighbor, and do not trust any brother — for every brother is a deceiver like Jacob, and every neighbor goes about as a slanderer. ⁵Each person mocks his neighbor, and no one speaks the truth. They have trained their tongues to speak lies; they exhaust themselves doing wrong. ⁶You live in the midst of deceit; through deceit they refuse to know me, declares the LORD. ⁷Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts says: I am going to refine them and test them — for what else can I do because of my people? ⁸Their tongue is a deadly arrow; it speaks deceit. With his mouth a person speaks peace to his neighbor, but inwardly he sets an ambush for him. ⁹Should I not punish them for these things? declares the LORD. Should I not avenge myself against a nation such as this? ¹⁰Over the mountains I will raise weeping and wailing, and over the wilderness pastures a lament, for they are scorched and no one passes through. The sound of livestock is not heard. The birds of the sky and the animals have all fled — they are gone. ¹¹I will make Jerusalem a heap of ruins, a haunt of jackals, and I will make the cities of Judah a desolation, without an inhabitant. ¹²Who is wise enough to understand this? To whom has the mouth of the LORD spoken, that he might explain it? Why has the land perished, scorched like a wilderness with no one passing through? ¹³The LORD said: Because they have abandoned my instruction that I set before them — they have not obeyed my voice or walked according to it, ¹⁴but they have followed the stubbornness of their own hearts and the Baals, as their ancestors taught them — ¹⁵Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am going to feed this people with wormwood and give them poisoned water to drink. ¹⁶I will scatter them among nations that neither they nor their ancestors have known, and I will send the sword after them until I have consumed them. ¹⁷This is what the LORD of Hosts says: Take note! Call for the mourning women — let them come. Send for the skilled women — let them come. ¹⁸Let them hurry and raise a wailing over us, so that our eyes may overflow with tears and our eyelids stream with water. ¹⁹For the sound of wailing is heard from Zion: 'How we are ruined! We are utterly shamed! For we have left the land; they have torn down our dwellings.' ²⁰Hear the word of the LORD, you women! Let your ears receive the word of his mouth. Teach your daughters to wail and each woman her neighbor to lament. ²¹For death has climbed through our windows and entered our fortresses, cutting off children from the streets and young men from the public squares. ²²Speak: This is what the LORD declares — The corpses of the people will fall like dung on the open field, like cut grain behind the reaper, with no one to gather them. ²³This is what the LORD says: Let not the wise boast in his wisdom, let not the strong boast in his strength, let not the wealthy boast in his wealth. ²⁴Rather, let the one who boasts boast in this: that he understands and knows me — that I am the LORD who acts with faithful love, justice, and righteousness on the earth, for in these things I delight, declares the LORD. ²⁵The days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will punish all who are circumcised only in the flesh — ²⁶Egypt, Judah, Edom, the Ammonites, Moab, and all who clip the hair at their temples who live in the wilderness — for all these nations are uncircumcised, and the entire house of Israel is uncircumcised in heart.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew mi yitten ('who will give?') is an idiomatic wish formula meaning 'if only' or 'would that.' We render it as 'if only' rather than the KJV's 'Oh that' to avoid archaic phrasing.
1. In the Hebrew Bible (MT), this verse is numbered 8:23 rather than 9:1. English versification follows the chapter division tradition that places this verse as the opening of chapter 9. We follow English numbering for reader familiarity.

1. The phrase bat-ammi ('daughter of my people') is a collective personification of the nation, not a reference to a literal daughter. It is rendered simply as 'my people' to convey the collective sense.
2. The same wish formula mi yitten opens this verse. The prophet's grief now flips to revulsion — he wants to flee into the desert rather than remain among such people. The word mena'afim ('adulterers') likely carries both literal and metaphorical force: sexual infidelity and covenant unfaithfulness toward God.
2. The word bogdim ('traitors, treacherous ones') is from the root b-g-d, meaning to act faithlessly or deal treacherously. Combined with atseret ('assembly, gathering'), the image is of an organized group of covenant-breakers.
3. The metaphor of the tongue as a drawn bow is vivid — they load lies like arrows and fire them. The word sheqer ('falsehood, lie') is Jeremiah's characteristic term for the deception pervading Judah's culture. The phrase ve'oti lo yada'u ('and me they do not know') is the theological root of the problem — the absence of genuine knowledge of God (cf. 9:24).
4. The Hebrew contains a devastating wordplay: aqov ya'aqov ('utterly supplants/deceives') echoes the name Ya'aqov (Jacob), who was named for grasping the heel (Genesis 25:26) and whose name became synonymous with deception (Genesis 27:36). Every brother is, literally, a 'Jacob' — a heel-grabber, a supplanter. We render 'deceiver like Jacob' to preserve this wordplay for English readers.
4. The word rakhil ('slanderer, tale-bearer') describes someone who peddles gossip and false reports. The social fabric has completely disintegrated — neither family bonds nor neighborly trust can be relied upon.
5. The verb yehattellu ('they mock, deceive') emphasizes deliberate mockery and deception as a social norm. The phrase limmedu leshonam ('they have trained their tongues') portrays lying as a practiced skill, not a momentary lapse — they have disciplined their speech toward falsehood the way a craftsman trains in his trade.
5. The final clause ha'veh nil'u ('they are weary of doing wrong' or 'they exhaust themselves doing wrong') captures the irony that sin itself is exhausting labor — they pour enormous energy into their corruption.
6. The word mirmah ('deceit, treachery') appears twice in this short verse, framing the entire social environment. Deceit is both the medium they inhabit and the means by which they reject God. The phrase me'anu da'at-oti ('they refuse to know me') uses the same root y-d- ('know') from verse 3 — the refusal to know God is not ignorance but willful rejection.
7. The verb tsorefam ('I will refine them') uses smelting imagery — God will put Judah through the furnace to purify them. The verb bechantim ('and test them') adds the dimension of examination. Together they picture judgment as a purification process, not mere punishment.
7. The question 'what else can I do?' reveals God's anguished restraint — this is not eager punishment but reluctant necessity. The question echoes Isaiah 5:4, 'What more could I have done for my vineyard?'
8. The metaphor shifts from the bow (v. 3) to the arrow — the tongue is now a sharpened, lethal projectile. The word shochet ('slaying, deadly') makes the arrow explicitly murderous. The contrast between outward shalom and inward orbo ('ambush') is the core of Judah's social corruption: friendly words conceal predatory intent.
9. This rhetorical question formula appears also in 5:9 and 5:29 — it is a recurring refrain of judgment. The verb efqod ('visit, punish') carries the sense of a formal inspection followed by judicial action. The word napshi ('my soul/self') indicates that God is personally aggrieved — this is not detached justice but the response of a betrayed covenant partner.
10. It is ambiguous whether the speaker is Jeremiah or God — the Hebrew does not specify, and this ambiguity may be intentional, as the voices of prophet and God merge in shared grief. The word nitsetu ('scorched, burned') describes devastation so complete that the land is depopulated of both humans and animals. The catalog of absence — no traveler, no livestock, no birds, no animals — builds a portrait of total ecological collapse.
11. The word tannim (KJV 'dragons') refers to jackals — scavenging animals that inhabit ruins. Jackals in an abandoned city are a standard prophetic image of complete desolation (cf. Isaiah 13:22, 34:13). The word gallim ('heaps') pictures Jerusalem reduced to mounds of rubble. This verse shifts to unambiguously divine speech — God himself declares the coming destruction.
12. This verse poses a theological challenge to the 'wise' (chakam) — a term that in Jeremiah's context includes the scribal and court advisers who claimed to have wisdom but missed the meaning of the catastrophe. The rhetorical question demands an explanation for the land's devastation, and the following verses provide God's answer.
13. The word torah here is rendered 'instruction' rather than 'law' to capture the broader Hebrew meaning — torah encompasses teaching, guidance, and divine direction, not merely legal statutes. The three-fold indictment — abandoning torah, not obeying God's voice, not walking in it — represents a total failure of covenantal obedience.
14. The Jeremican formula sheriut libbam ('stubbornness of their hearts') recurs from 7:24, 9:13 (this verse), 11:8, 13:10, and elsewhere — it is a signature phrase describing the settled, calcified posture of rebellion. The word ha-be'alim ('the Baals') is plural, indicating multiple local manifestations of Baal worship at various high places. The detail that their 'ancestors taught them' makes apostasy a transmitted cultural inheritance, not merely individual sin.
15. La'anah ('wormwood') is a bitter, toxic plant (Artemisia) used metaphorically for suffering and bitterness. Mei-rosh ('water of gall/poison') refers to a poisonous liquid — the exact plant is debated (possibly hemlock or poppy). Together they form a judgment-meal of bitterness and death, inverting the covenant blessings of abundance and nourishment.

16. The scattering among unknown nations reverses the Exodus — God brought them out from a foreign land into their own, and now he will drive them from their own land into foreign ones. The phrase 'nations they have not known' emphasizes the alienation and disorientation of exile. The sword pursuing them 'until consumed' indicates that exile itself will not be the end of judgment.
17. The meqonenot ('mourning women') were professional female mourners hired to lead communal lament — a recognized vocation in the ancient Near East. The chakamot ('skilled/wise women') uses the same root as 'wise man' in verse 12, but here applied to the craft of lamentation. Their skill was considered a form of wisdom — the ability to channel communal grief into structured lament.
18. The urgency — 'let them hurry' — indicates the disaster is imminent or already underway. The goal of professional mourning was to catalyze communal grief, to help the community express sorrow too deep for individuals to process alone. The physical imagery of overflowing eyes and streaming eyelids echoes the fountain-of-tears wish in verse 1.
19. The cry comes from Zion itself — the sacred center of the nation. The word shuddadnu ('we are ruined, plundered') conveys violent devastation. The phrase 'we have left the land' ('azavnu erets) uses the same verb 'azav ('abandon') that verse 13 used for abandoning God's instruction — they abandoned torah and now they must abandon the land.
20. Women are addressed directly — they are commissioned to transmit the art of mourning to the next generation. The verbs lammednah ('teach') and tiqqach ('receive') frame mourning as a learned discipline requiring skill and practice. This is a grim inversion of the usual transmission of culture: instead of teaching songs of joy, mothers must teach songs of death.
21. Death personified as an intruder who climbs through windows draws on Canaanite mythology, where Mot (Death) was a deity who invaded homes. The Hebrew Bible subverts the mythology but retains the image: death is not a god but a force under the LORD's sovereign control. The pairing of olal ('children, infants') and bachurim ('young men') indicates that death takes all generations.
22. The two similes are agricultural but horrifying: human bodies compared to dung spread on fields (used as fertilizer) and to sheaves of grain left ungathered after harvest. The phrase 've'in me'assef' ('and no one gathers') means the dead will receive no burial — the ultimate dishonor in ancient Israelite culture (cf. Deuteronomy 28:26). The harvest imagery inverts the blessing of abundance into a harvest of death.
23. The verb yithallel ('boast, glory, praise oneself') from the root h-l-l is used three times in parallel, creating a rhythmic demolition of human pretensions. The three categories — wisdom (chokmah), strength (gevurah), and wealth (osher) — represent everything human cultures typically value and celebrate. God systematically disqualifies all three as grounds for self-glory.
23. Paul quotes this verse in 1 Corinthians 1:31 and 2 Corinthians 10:17 to argue that the only legitimate boasting is in the Lord.
24. The phrase haskel veyado'a oti ('to understand and know me') uses two verbs: haskel (to have insight, to act wisely) and yado'a (to know relationally, intimately). This is not intellectual knowledge about God but experiential, covenantal knowledge of God's character. The triad chesed-mishpat-tsedeqah appears also in Hosea 2:19 and Micah 6:8 as the essential divine attributes that God desires his people to embody.
24. The declaration ki be'ellev chafatsti ('for in these I delight') reveals God's deepest preference — not sacrifice, not ritual, not theological sophistication, but faithful love, justice, and righteousness practiced on the earth.
25. The phrase mul be'orlah ('circumcised in foreskin' or 'circumcised yet uncircumcised') is paradoxical: those who bear the physical mark of the covenant but lack its inner reality. We render the meaning plainly as 'circumcised only in the flesh' to make the paradox clear. This anticipates the new-covenant theology of 31:31-34, where God will write the covenant on hearts. Paul develops this distinction extensively in Romans 2:25-29.
26. The devastating climax: Judah is listed alongside pagan nations. Despite physical circumcision, Israel is grouped with the uncircumcised because their hearts remain uncut — unchanged by covenant commitment. The phrase arle-lev ('uncircumcised of heart') means the inner person has not been marked by the covenant, regardless of the body's mark.
26. The phrase qetsutsé fe'ah ('those who clip the corners [of their hair]') refers to certain Arabian desert tribes who practiced a distinctive hair-cutting ritual. This practice was forbidden to Israelites in Leviticus 19:27. Egypt practiced circumcision, as did some of the other nations listed — the point is that physical circumcision without heart-transformation is meaningless.

Summary: Jeremiah 10 opens with a direct command not to learn the ways of the nations or be terrified by signs in the sky. The chapter then launches into one of the Hebrew Bible's most vivid satires on idol-making: a craftsman cuts a tree from the forest, shapes it with tools, decorates it with silver and gold, and fastens it so it will not topple — yet the finished product cannot speak, cannot walk, and must be carried because it has no power. Against this ridicule, the prophet exalts the living God as the true King of the nations, the maker of heaven and earth by his power and wisdom. The chapter closes with Jeremiah's personal prayer: a lament over the coming destruction, an acknowledgment that human beings cannot direct their own steps, and a plea for God to discipline with justice rather than anger.

What Makes This Remarkable: The idol-making satire (vv. 2-5) parallels Isaiah 40:18-20 and 44:9-20 but with Jeremiah's distinctive sharpness — the comparison of idols to scarecrows in a cucumber field (v. 5) is unique to Jeremiah and unforgettable in its absurdity. The theological contrast between dead idols and the living God reaches its peak in verse 10: 'The LORD is the true God; he is the living God and the everlasting King.' The phrase Elohim emet ('true God') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. The closing prayer (vv. 23-25) shifts from prophetic oracle to personal petition, revealing Jeremiah's inner life: he knows he cannot control his own path and asks God for measured correction rather than destructive wrath. Verse 23 ('I know, LORD, that a person's way is not his own') is one of the most honest theological statements in Scripture about human limitation.

Translation Friction: Verses 11 is the only verse in Jeremiah written in Aramaic rather than Hebrew — a striking linguistic shift that may reflect the verse being composed as a message to be delivered to Aramaic-speaking nations. We note this anomaly. The phrase kemikshat qishshu'im ('like a scarecrow in a cucumber field') in verse 5 uses rare vocabulary — miqshah appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, and its exact meaning has been debated (scarecrow, palm-trunk pillar, or stiff upright figure). We render 'scarecrow in a cucumber patch' as the most vivid and contextually appropriate reading. The theological claim that the nations' gods are 'nothing' (hevel, 'vapor, breath') required careful translation — hevel is the same word used in Ecclesiastes for 'vanity' and carries the sense of insubstantiality rather than non-existence.

Connections: The idol-satire connects to Isaiah 40:18-20 and 44:9-20 (the extended mockery of idol-makers), Psalm 115:4-8 and 135:15-18 (idols have mouths but cannot speak), and Habakkuk 2:18-19. The 'signs in the sky' warning (v. 2) addresses Babylonian astral religion, which was the dominant religious competitor in Jeremiah's era. The living-God declaration (v. 10) links to Deuteronomy 5:26 and Joshua 3:10. The prayer of verse 23 connects to Proverbs 16:9 and 20:24 on human inability to direct one's own steps. The closing imprecation against nations that 'devour Jacob' (v. 25) is quoted nearly verbatim in Psalm 79:6-7. The hevel ('vapor') designation for idols connects to the Ecclesiastes vocabulary and 2 Kings 17:15.

¹Hear the word that the LORD speaks to you, O house of Israel. ²This is what the LORD says: Do not learn the ways of the nations, and do not be terrified by signs in the sky, even though the nations are terrified by them. ³For the practices of the peoples are vapor — a tree is cut from the forest, shaped by the hands of a craftsman with a chisel. ⁴They overlay it with silver and gold; they fasten it with nails and hammers so it will not topple. ⁵They are like scarecrows in a cucumber patch — they cannot speak. They must be carried because they cannot walk. Do not fear them — they can do no harm, and they have no power to do good either. ⁶There is no one like you, LORD. You are great, and your name is great in power. ⁷Who would not revere you, O King of the nations? For this is your due. Among all the wise of the nations and in all their kingdoms, there is no one like you. ⁸But they are all senseless and foolish — the instruction of idols is nothing but wood. ⁹Hammered silver is brought from Tarshish and gold from Uphaz — the work of a craftsman and the hands of a metalsmith. Their clothing is violet and purple. They are all the product of skilled workers. ¹⁰But the LORD is the true God. He is the living God and the everlasting King. At his wrath the earth trembles, and the nations cannot endure his indignation. ¹¹This is what you shall say to them: The gods that did not make the heavens and the earth — they will perish from the earth and from under these heavens. ¹²He made the earth by his power, established the world by his wisdom, and stretched out the heavens by his understanding. ¹³When he thunders, the waters in the heavens roar. He raises clouds from the ends of the earth, makes lightning for the rain, and brings out the wind from his storehouses. ¹⁴Every person is senseless, devoid of knowledge. Every metalsmith is put to shame by his idol, for his cast image is a lie — there is no breath in them. ¹⁵They are vapor, a work of mockery. In the time of their punishment, they will perish. ¹⁶The Portion of Jacob is not like these, for he is the one who formed all things, and Israel is the tribe of his inheritance. The LORD of Hosts is his name. ¹⁷Gather up your bundle from the ground, you who live under siege. ¹⁸For this is what the LORD says: At this time I am going to hurl out the inhabitants of the land, and I will bring distress upon them so that they will feel it. ¹⁹Woe to me because of my wound! My injury is severe. But I said, This is my sickness, and I must bear it. ²⁰My tent is destroyed and all my ropes are snapped. My children have gone from me — they are no more. There is no one left to pitch my tent or set up my curtains. ²¹For the shepherds have become senseless and have not sought the LORD. Therefore they have not prospered, and all their flock is scattered. ²²Listen! A report is coming — a great upheaval from the land of the north — to make the cities of Judah a desolation, a haunt of jackals.

²³I know, LORD, that a person's way is not his own — it is not for anyone to direct his own steps as he walks. ²⁴Discipline me, LORD — but with justice, not in your anger, or you will reduce me to nothing. ²⁵Pour out your wrath on the nations that do not know you and on the peoples that do not call on your name, for they have devoured Jacob — devoured him and consumed him and laid waste his homeland.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The address is to 'house of Israel' — a term that in Jeremiah's context typically encompasses all of God's covenant people, though the northern kingdom had already fallen. The imperative shim'u ('hear') carries the force of 'listen and obey,' not merely 'perceive audibly.'
2. The 'signs in the sky' (otot ha-shamayim) refer to celestial phenomena — eclipses, comets, unusual planetary alignments — which the Babylonians interpreted as omens through elaborate astrological systems. The verb techattu ('be terrified, shattered') is stronger than mere worry; it describes being psychologically broken by fear. God's people are not to let the heavens dominate them because the God who made the heavens governs them.
3. The word hevel ('vapor, breath, vanity') is the same word that dominates Ecclesiastes — it denotes something insubstantial, fleeting, without lasting weight. We render it as 'vapor' rather than the KJV's 'vain' to preserve the concrete physical image: the nations' religious practices are as substantial as a puff of breath. The idol-making process is described step by step to expose its absurdity — it begins with a tree, the most ordinary raw material.
4. The irony is surgical: the idol must be nailed down because it would fall over on its own. A god that cannot even stand upright without human engineering is no god. The verb yeyappehu ('they beautify it') from the root y-p-h means to make beautiful or adorn — the idol's appearance is entirely the craftsman's work, not any inherent divine quality.
5. The phrase ketomer miqshah is one of the most debated in Jeremiah. Tomer can mean 'palm tree' or 'scarecrow' (from a root meaning stiff, upright). Miqshah may mean 'cucumber field' or refer to a hammered/beaten form. The reading 'scarecrow in a cucumber patch' — an immobile, lifeless figure propped up to frighten birds — is the most devastating possible comparison for a deity and has strong support from context and from the Septuagint tradition. The four negations — cannot speak, cannot walk, cannot harm, cannot help — systematically strip the idol of every attribute of a living god.
6. The pivot from idol mockery to divine praise is abrupt and deliberate — the contrast could not be sharper. The word gevurah ('might, power, strength') is the same word used in 9:23 where human strength is disqualified as a ground for boasting. God's power is the only legitimate power; the idols' impotence exposes all human might as derivative.
7. The title Melekh ha-goyim ('King of the nations') asserts universal sovereignty — not just Israel's God but the ruler of all peoples. The verb yira'akha ('fear/revere you') carries the double sense of awe and reverent submission. The word ya'atah ('it is fitting, it belongs to you') declares that reverence is God's rightful due, not an optional response.
8. The word yiv'aru ('they are brutish, senseless') from the root b'-l-r means to be like an animal — lacking rational thought. The phrase musar havalim ets hu ('the instruction of vapors/idols is wood') delivers the punch: whatever 'teaching' the idols offer reduces to the material they are made of — wood. The word havalim (plural of hevel) echoes verse 3.
9. Tarshish (possibly Tartessus in Spain or a general term for distant western trading ports) and Uphaz (location uncertain, possibly related to Ophir) represent the most expensive imported materials. The detail of tekhelet ('violet/blue') and argaman ('purple') fabrics — the most costly dyes in the ancient world — emphasizes the enormous expense lavished on objects that cannot move, speak, or act. The final verdict — 'they are all the work of skilled workers' — reduces every idol to its human origin.
10. Three titles appear in rapid succession: Elohim emet ('true God'), Elohim chayyim ('living God'), and Melekh olam ('everlasting King'). Each directly contradicts the idol-portrait of verses 3-9: the idols are false, dead, and temporary; God is true, alive, and eternal. The verb tir'ash ('trembles') describes seismic response to divine anger — the earth itself recoils from God's wrath.
11. This verse is unique in Jeremiah: it is written in Aramaic, not Hebrew. This is one of only a few Aramaic passages in the Hebrew Bible (the others being Daniel 2:4b-7:28, Ezra 4:8-6:18 and 7:12-26, and Genesis 31:47). The Aramaic may indicate this was a formulaic response that Israelites were to speak to foreign, Aramaic-speaking peoples — a declaration in the international language. The wordplay ye'badu/avadu ('perish'/'made') is vivid: the gods who did not make will themselves be unmade.
12. Three divine attributes are paired with three creative acts: koach ('power') made the earth, chokmah ('wisdom') established the habitable world, and tevunah ('understanding, discernment') stretched out the heavens. This verse echoes Proverbs 3:19-20, where wisdom, understanding, and knowledge are the instruments of creation. The same verse reappears nearly verbatim in 51:15, framing the book's oracle against Babylon.
13. The phrase leqol titto ('at the sound of his giving') is rendered 'when he thunders' — God's voice manifests as thunder, a common biblical image (cf. Psalm 29). The word otserotav ('his storehouses, treasures') pictures God as having cosmic warehouses from which he draws wind, rain, and storm. This is not primitive meteorology but theological poetry: every weather event is God's direct activity, contrasting with Baal, who was supposed to be the storm-god.
14. The word niv'ar ('brutish, senseless') echoes verse 8. The phrase midda'at can mean 'from knowledge' (i.e., lacking knowledge) or 'by knowledge' (i.e., made senseless despite having knowledge). We render 'devoid of knowledge' for clarity. The word sheqer ('lie, falsehood') — Jeremiah's characteristic term — here applies to the idol itself: the molten image is a lie because it promises divine presence but delivers nothing. The phrase lo ruach bam ('there is no breath/spirit in them') is the ultimate indictment: without ruach, they are dead matter.

15. Hevel ('vapor') again — the idols are insubstantial. The word ta'tu'im ('mockery, delusion, ridicule') from the root t-'-l' suggests both that the idols are objects of ridicule and that they delude their worshipers. The phrase be'et pequddatam ('in the time of their visitation/punishment') uses the same vocabulary as 11:23 — a time of divine reckoning when the idols will be exposed and destroyed.
16. The title Cheleq Ya'aqov ('the Portion of Jacob') designates God as Israel's allotted share — just as each tribe received a portion of the land, Israel's true portion is God himself (cf. Psalm 73:26, 'God is the portion of my heart'). The phrase yotser ha-kol ('he who formed all things') returns to the creator-theme of verse 12. Shevet nachalato ('the tribe of his inheritance') indicates that Israel belongs to God as his special possession. This verse reappears nearly identically in 51:19.
17. The abrupt shift signals the approach of judgment. The word kin'atek ('your bundle, your goods') refers to possessions hastily gathered for flight — the urgency of evacuation. The yoshebet ba-matsor ('inhabitant of the siege/fortress') is Jerusalem herself, addressed as a woman preparing to flee the besieged city.
18. The verb qole'a ('hurling, slinging') is vivid — God will sling the people out of the land like a stone from a sling. The phrase lema'an yimtsa'u ('so that they will find/feel/experience it') means they will experience the full weight of the judgment that their behavior has brought upon them. The word bappa'am hazzot ('at this time') indicates that this is the decisive moment — previous warnings have passed; now the action comes.
19. The speaker shifts to Jeremiah (or personified Zion — the ambiguity may be intentional). The words shivri ('my breaking'), makkati ('my wound'), and cholyi ('my sickness') describe the nation's destruction as a personal bodily injury. The resignation — 'I must bear it' — is not passive acceptance but the recognition that the suffering is deserved and must be endured.
20. The tent metaphor pictures the complete collapse of domestic life — the tent (oholi) is the home, the ropes (metaray) hold it together, and the children (banay) represent the future. All are gone. The phrase ve'einam ('and they are not') is the starkest possible Hebrew expression for absence — total disappearance. The image of a collapsed tent with no one to re-erect it is a picture of irreversible desolation.
21. The ro'im ('shepherds') are Judah's leaders — kings, priests, and prophets — not literal herders. The metaphor of rulers as shepherds was universal in the ancient Near East. The word niv'aru ('became senseless') is the same root as verses 8 and 14 — the leaders are as senseless as the idol-worshipers. The verb nafotsah ('scattered') anticipates the exile: the flock-people are dispersed because the shepherd-leaders failed.
22. The 'land of the north' (erets tsafon) is Babylon — though geographically east of Judah, the Babylonian armies approached via the northern route through Syria. The word ra'ash ('upheaval, earthquake, commotion') describes the tremor of approaching armies. The phrase me'on tannim ('haunt of jackals') repeats from 9:11, forming a refrain of desolation.
23. Jeremiah's prayer begins with a confession of human limitation. The word darko ('his way, his path') refers to the course of life. The verb hakhin ('to establish, direct, prepare') indicates that humans lack the ability to determine their own destiny. This is not fatalism but theological realism — a recognition that only God can rightly order a life. The verse connects to Proverbs 16:9 ('A person plans his way, but the LORD directs his steps') and Proverbs 20:24.
24. The verb yassreni ('discipline me, correct me') accepts the necessity of divine correction but pleads for measured judgment. The word mishpat ('justice, right measure') here means proportionate discipline — correction that reforms rather than destroys. The contrast is between mishpat (measured justice) and af ('anger, fury'). The verb tam'itani ('diminish me, reduce me') means to make small, to reduce to nothing — Jeremiah fears that divine wrath without restraint would be annihilating.
25. This verse is quoted nearly verbatim in Psalm 79:6-7, and scholars debate which text is original. The prayer asks God to redirect his fury from Israel to the nations that have destroyed Israel. The triple repetition — akhelu ('they ate'), akhaluhu ('they devoured him'), wayekhalluhu ('they consumed him') — uses near-synonyms to intensify the image of total consumption. The word navehu ('his pasture, homeland, dwelling place') connects back to the tent and shepherd imagery of verses 20-21.

Summary: Jeremiah 11 opens with a direct divine command to proclaim the words of the covenant to Judah and Jerusalem. God recalls the covenant made at the Exodus — the 'iron furnace' of Egypt — and declares that the people have broken it through persistent disobedience and idolatry. The chapter turns sharply personal in its second half: Jeremiah discovers that the men of his own hometown, Anathoth, are plotting to kill him to silence his prophecy. God responds with a judgment oracle against Anathoth, marking the beginning of Jeremiah's 'confessions' — the raw, personal laments that distinguish this book from all other prophetic literature.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter bridges two of Jeremiah's major themes — the broken covenant and the suffering prophet — within a single literary unit. The covenant language in verses 1-8 echoes Deuteronomy almost verbatim, establishing Jeremiah as a prophet in the Mosaic tradition. The phrase 'iron furnace' (kur ha-barzel, v. 4) for Egypt appears only here and in Deuteronomy 4:20 and 1 Kings 8:51, linking Jeremiah's message directly to the oldest covenant traditions. The conspiracy from Anathoth is especially bitter because Anathoth was a Levitical priestly city — Jeremiah's own priestly kinsmen want him dead. The metaphor of the 'lamb led to slaughter' (v. 19) reappears in Isaiah 53:7 applied to the Suffering Servant, creating one of the most significant intertextual connections between the prophets. We rendered the covenant-curse formula precisely because Jeremiah is not improvising — he is quoting the Deuteronomic curse tradition word for word.

Translation Friction: The verb shama ('hear, obey') appears repeatedly in verses 2-8, and we had to determine when it means 'hear' (auditory) versus 'obey' (covenantal compliance) — context guided each decision. The word arur ('cursed') in verse 3 is formal covenant-curse language, and we preserved the stark 'Cursed' rather than softening it. The phrase 'I was like a gentle lamb led to the slaughter' (v. 19) uses the rare Hebrew keves alluph, where alluph means 'tame, trusting' — we rendered this as 'a gentle lamb' rather than 'a docile lamb' to capture the innocence rather than mere passivity. The plotting language in verses 18-23 shifts from third-person report to first-person divine speech without explicit transition, requiring careful handling.

Connections: The covenant-curse language connects directly to Deuteronomy 27:26 and 28:15-68. The 'iron furnace' metaphor links to Deuteronomy 4:20 and 1 Kings 8:51. The 'lamb led to slaughter' image connects forward to Isaiah 53:7 and is applied by early Christians to Jesus. The conspiracy from Jeremiah's hometown anticipates Jesus's rejection at Nazareth (Luke 4:24-29). The divine command 'Do not pray for this people' (v. 14) reprises the prohibition from 7:16 and anticipates 14:11. Anathoth's judgment connects to the broader theme of priestly failure running through Jeremiah 1-20.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²Hear the words of this covenant, and speak them to the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. ³Say to them: This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says — Cursed is the one who does not obey the words of this covenant, ⁴which I commanded your ancestors on the day I brought them out of the land of Egypt, out of the iron furnace, saying: Obey my voice and do all that I command you, and you will be my people and I will be your God — ⁵in order to fulfill the oath I swore to your ancestors — to give them a land flowing with milk and honey, as it is today." Then I answered and said, "Amen, LORD." ⁶Then the LORD said to me: Proclaim all these words in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem, saying — Hear the words of this covenant and do them. ⁷For I solemnly warned your ancestors from the day I brought them up out of the land of Egypt until this very day, warning them persistently: Obey my voice. ⁸But they did not obey or incline their ear. Each one walked in the stubbornness of his evil heart. So I brought upon them all the words of this covenant which I commanded them to do — but they did not do them. ⁹Then the LORD said to me: A conspiracy has been found among the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. ¹⁰They have turned back to the iniquities of their earliest ancestors, who refused to hear my words, and they have gone after other gods to serve them. The house of Israel and the house of Judah have broken my covenant that I made with their ancestors. ¹¹Therefore, this is what the LORD says: I am about to bring disaster upon them that they will not be able to escape. When they cry out to me, I will not listen to them. ¹²Then the cities of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem will go and cry out to the gods to whom they burn incense — but those gods will never save them in the time of their disaster. ¹³For your gods have become as numerous as your cities, O Judah, and the altars you have set up to that shameful thing — altars to burn incense to Baal — are as many as the streets of Jerusalem. ¹⁴As for you — do not pray for this people. Do not lift up a cry or prayer on their behalf, for I will not listen when they call to me in the time of their disaster. ¹⁵What right has my beloved in my house when she practices her schemes with many? Can the holy flesh remove your guilt from you? For when you do evil, then you rejoice. ¹⁶A flourishing olive tree, beautiful with fine fruit — that is what the LORD once called you. But with the roar of a great storm he has set it ablaze, and its branches are broken. ¹⁷For the LORD of Hosts, who planted you, has decreed disaster against you because of the evil that the house of Israel and the house of Judah have done, provoking me to anger by burning incense to Baal. ¹⁸The LORD made it known to me, and I knew. Then you showed me their deeds. ¹⁹But I was like a gentle lamb led to the slaughter. I did not know that they had plotted schemes against me: 'Let us destroy the tree with its fruit. Let us cut him off from the land of the living, so that his name will be remembered no more.' ²⁰But, O LORD of Hosts, who judges righteously, who tests the mind and the heart — let me see your vengeance on them, for to you I have committed my cause. ²¹Therefore, this is what the LORD says concerning the men of Anathoth who are seeking your life and saying, 'Do not prophesy in the name of the LORD, or you will die by our hand' — ²²Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts says: I am about to punish them. Their young men will die by the sword; their sons and daughters will die by famine. ²³No remnant will be left to them, for I will bring disaster upon the men of Anathoth in the year of their punishment.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') introduces direct speech and is rendered as a colon rather than retained as a redundant English word.
2. The command is directed first to Jeremiah himself — 'hear' — and then he must relay the covenant words. The word berit ('covenant') immediately establishes that Jeremiah's message concerns the Sinai agreement, not a new revelation.
3. The formula koh amar YHWH ('Thus says the LORD') is rendered throughout the project as 'This is what the LORD says.' The covenant-curse arur directly quotes the ceremony prescribed in Deuteronomy 27:15-26, where the people themselves said 'Amen' to each curse. Jeremiah is reminding them of their own sworn agreement.
4. The covenant formula 'you will be my people and I will be your God' is the bilateral core of the Sinai relationship (Exodus 6:7, Leviticus 26:12, Deuteronomy 26:17-18). The word 'ancestors' replaces the KJV's 'fathers' as standard TCR modernization. The iron furnace metaphor is deliberately archaic within the text itself — Jeremiah is reaching back to the oldest covenant language.
5. Jeremiah responds with 'Amen' — the liturgical affirmation of covenant acceptance. This is the same response the people were supposed to give at the covenant-curse ceremony in Deuteronomy 27. The prophet personally affirms the covenant that his people have broken.
6. The verb qara ('proclaim, call out') indicates public declaration, not private study. Jeremiah is sent as a herald of the covenant into the public squares. The command 'do them' (wa'asitem otam) echoes the standard Deuteronomic formula for covenant obedience.
7. The Hebrew construction ha'ed he'edoti is an emphatic infinitive absolute — 'I solemnly, solemnly warned.' The idiom hashkem ('rising early') appears frequently in Jeremiah as shorthand for God's persistent, repeated effort to warn Israel through the prophets (cf. 7:13, 7:25, 25:3, 25:4, 26:5, 29:19, 32:33, 35:14-15, 44:4).
8. The phrase sheriruti libbam hara ('stubbornness of their evil heart') is a Jeremican formula that recurs throughout the book (3:17, 7:24, 9:13, 13:10, 16:12, 18:12, 23:17). It describes not a single act of rebellion but a settled disposition — the heart has hardened into a fixed posture of resistance. The covenant curses are not arbitrary punishments but the sworn consequences the people accepted at Sinai.
9. The word qesher ('conspiracy') is striking — it is the same word used for Absalom's conspiracy against David (2 Samuel 15:12) and Jehu's coup (2 Kings 9:14). God characterizes covenant-breaking not as mere negligence but as active conspiracy against himself.
10. The verb heferu ('they have broken, violated') is the technical term for covenant annulment. The word karati ('I cut') reminds the reader that covenants in the ancient world were 'cut' — ratified by cutting animals in half (cf. Genesis 15). Both kingdoms, Israel and Judah, are indicted together, even though the northern kingdom had already fallen by Jeremiah's time.
11. The word ra'ah ('evil, disaster, calamity') here means disaster as covenant consequence, not moral evil. God's refusal to listen inverts the covenant formula — they would not listen to God (v. 8), so God will not listen to them. The inescapability emphasizes that this is not a threat to be negotiated but a sentence already passed.
12. The bitter irony is explicit: the gods they chose over the LORD will be powerless to help them. The verb meqatterim ('burning incense') indicates active, ongoing worship of foreign deities — this is not a past failing but a present practice.
13. The rhetoric of abundance — gods matching cities, altars matching streets — depicts total saturation of idolatry. Every urban space has been claimed for false worship. The word bosheth ('shame, shameful thing') is used as a pejorative replacement for Ba'al's name, a practice also visible in the textual history of names like Mephibosheth (originally Merib-baal).
14. This prohibition against prophetic intercession is one of the most disturbing commands in the book (cf. 7:16, 14:11). The prophet's primary role included interceding for the people before God (as Moses did in Exodus 32:11-14), and God is now cutting off that channel. The situation has passed the point where intercession can help.
15. This verse is notoriously difficult in Hebrew. The 'beloved' (yedidi, feminine) is Judah personified as a once-beloved woman now practicing wickedness. 'Holy flesh' likely refers to sacrificial offerings — the people believe that ritual sacrifice can cover their moral corruption. The verse's grammar is disrupted, possibly reflecting the emotional intensity of the speech.
16. The olive tree metaphor for Israel appears also in Hosea 14:6 and Romans 11:17-24. The name God gave — 'flourishing olive tree' — expressed promise and beauty, but the tree is now being consumed by fire. The shift from beauty to burning is abrupt and devastating.
17. The same God who planted the olive tree now burns it — the Gardener destroys his own planting because the tree has become corrupt. The phrase YHWH tseva'ot ('the LORD of Hosts') emphasizes God's sovereign power over all heavenly and earthly forces. Both kingdoms are again named together in shared guilt.

- 18. This verse marks a dramatic shift — the beginning of Jeremiah's first 'confession' or personal lament (11:18-23). The prophet was unaware of the conspiracy against him until God revealed it. The simplicity of the Hebrew ('he made known, and I knew') captures the moment of sudden, devastating awareness.
- 19. The phrase 'destroy the tree with its fruit' (literally 'with its bread/food') is their plan to eliminate Jeremiah completely — person and legacy. 'Cut off from the land of the living' means killed. 'His name remembered no more' means total obliteration of memory. The conspirators want not just Jeremiah's death but his erasure. The irony is acute: Jeremiah is the most personally documented prophet in the Hebrew Bible.
- 20. The appeal to God as righteous judge who examines kelayot ('kidneys/inner thoughts') and lev ('heart') reflects the ancient Israelite understanding of the kidneys as the seat of the deepest emotions and the heart as the seat of the will and intellect. Jeremiah does not take revenge himself but commits his riv ('legal case, cause') to God.
- 21. Anathoth was a Levitical city about three miles northeast of Jerusalem, Jeremiah's hometown (1:1). These are not foreigners or pagans threatening the prophet — they are his priestly kinsmen, his own community. Their demand — 'Do not prophesy' — attempts to silence the covenant-enforcement message. The threat is explicit: death.
- 22. The verb poqed ('punish, visit upon') indicates judicial action — God will formally hold Anathoth accountable. The double death — sword and famine — covers military violence and siege conditions. Those who threatened Jeremiah's life will lose their own children's lives.
- 23. The 'year of their punishment' (shenat pequddatam) indicates an appointed time of divine reckoning. The absence of any remnant (she'erit) is the most severe judgment possible — in prophetic theology, even catastrophic judgment usually leaves a remnant. Anathoth's conspiracy against God's prophet will be met with total destruction.

Summary: Jeremiah 12 continues the prophet's first confession with a bold legal complaint against God: Why does the way of the wicked prosper? God's answer is not comfort but warning — if running with footmen has exhausted Jeremiah, how will he compete with horses? The chapter then shifts to an oracle of judgment against Judah's 'evil neighbors' who have seized the LORD's inheritance, followed by a surprising promise that even these pagan nations will be restored if they learn to swear by the LORD's name.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most stunningly honest prayers in the Bible — a prophet bringing a legal case against God himself. The verb tsadeq ('righteous') in verse 1 is judicial: Jeremiah concedes God's righteousness in advance but still demands an explanation. God's response in verse 5 is one of the harshest divine answers in Scripture — not an explanation but a warning that things will get worse. The 'horses' metaphor has become proverbial for spiritual endurance: if the easy trials defeat you, the hard ones will destroy you. The final oracle (vv. 14-17) is remarkable for its universalism — pagan nations that learn the LORD's ways will be 'built up' among God's people, a promise that anticipates the prophetic vision of gentile inclusion.

Translation Friction: The word mishpatim ('judgments, cases') in verse 1 forced a decision between legal and moral senses — we chose the judicial reading because Jeremiah is explicitly bringing a riv ('case') before God. The phrase 'the thickets of the Jordan' (ga'on ha-Yarden, v. 5) literally means 'the pride/swelling of the Jordan' — a reference to the dense, dangerous jungle that lined the Jordan's banks where lions lived. We rendered this as 'the thickets of the Jordan' to preserve the geographical reference while noting the Hebrew. The shift from personal lament (vv. 1-6) to national oracle (vv. 7-13) to international promise (vv. 14-17) required careful tone transitions.

Connections: The 'why do the wicked prosper' question connects to Job 21:7-15, Psalm 73, and Habakkuk 1:13. God's response about horses anticipates the escalating suffering Jeremiah will endure in chapters 20, 26, 37-38. The vineyard/inheritance language (vv. 7-13) echoes Isaiah 5:1-7 and anticipates Jesus's parable of the wicked tenants (Matthew 21:33-41). The promise to pagan nations (vv. 14-17) connects to Isaiah 19:23-25 and the eventual inclusion of gentiles in the covenant community.

¹You are righteous, O LORD, when I bring my case before you. Yet I would plead my case with you: Why does the way of the wicked prosper? Why do all the treacherous thrive? ²You have planted them, and they have taken root. They grow and even bear fruit. You are near in their mouth but far from their heart. ³But you, O LORD — you know me. You see me and test my heart toward you. Drag them out like sheep for the slaughter, and set them apart for the day of killing. ⁴How long will the land mourn and the grass of every field wither? Because of the wickedness of those who dwell in it, the animals and birds are swept away — for they say, 'He will not see our end.' ⁵If you have raced with men on foot and they have worn you out, how will you compete with horses? If you stumble in a land of peace, what will you do in the thickets of the Jordan? ⁶For even your brothers and your father's house — even they have betrayed you. Even they have raised a full cry against you. Do not trust them, though they speak kindly to you. ⁷I have abandoned my house. I have forsaken my inheritance. I have given the beloved of my soul into the hand of her enemies. ⁸My inheritance has become to me like a lion in the forest. She has roared against me; therefore I have turned against her. ⁹Is my inheritance to me like a speckled bird of prey, with birds of prey circling against her on every side? Go, gather all the wild beasts — bring them to devour. ¹⁰Many shepherds have destroyed my vineyard. They have trampled my portion underfoot. They have turned my cherished portion into a desolate wilderness. ¹¹They have made it desolate. It mourns before me in its desolation. The whole land is made desolate, because no one takes it to heart. ¹²Over all the barren heights in the wilderness, destroyers have come, for the sword of the LORD devours from one end of the land to the other. There is no peace for any living thing. ¹³They have sown wheat but reaped thorns. They have exhausted themselves for no profit. Be ashamed of your harvests because of the fierce anger of the LORD. ¹⁴This is what the LORD says concerning all my evil neighbors who seize the inheritance I gave my people Israel to possess: I am about to uproot them from their land, and I will uproot the house of Judah from among them. ¹⁵And after I have uprooted them, I will again have compassion on them, and I will restore each one to his inheritance and each one to his land. ¹⁶And if they diligently learn the ways of my people — to swear by my name, 'As the LORD lives,' just as they once taught my people to swear by Baal — then they will be built up in the midst of my people. ¹⁷But if they will not obey, then I will utterly uproot and destroy that nation, declares the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening tsaddiq attah ('righteous are you') is a concession, not a praise hymn — Jeremiah acknowledges God's justice before challenging it. The word bogdei ('treacherous ones') implies deliberate betrayal — not mere sinners but covenant-violators who have profited from their disloyalty. This is the biblical locus classicus for the problem of theodicy.
2. The plant metaphor echoes the olive tree of 11:16 — God planted them, they flourish, yet their devotion is only verbal. 'Near in their mouth but far from their kidneys' (kilyoteihem, literally 'kidneys' — the seat of deep emotions) describes superficial religion. We render kilyot as 'heart' here because the mouth/heart contrast communicates the hypocrisy more naturally to modern readers.
3. Jeremiah contrasts himself with the hypocrites of verse 2: they are far from God in their inner being, but God knows and tests Jeremiah's heart. The phrase haqdishshem ('set them apart, consecrate them') uses sacrificial language with bitter irony — the wicked are 'consecrated' not for worship but for slaughter. The prayer for vengeance is raw and unfiltered.
4. The land itself mourns — creation suffers because of human sin, a theme that connects to Genesis 3:17 and Romans 8:22. The final clause is ambiguous: 'He will not see our end' could mean the wicked believe God does not see their fate, or that Jeremiah will not see their downfall. Most interpreters take it as the wicked's arrogant dismissal of prophetic warnings.
5. This is God's answer to Jeremiah's complaint — and it is not the answer the prophet wanted. Instead of explaining why the wicked prosper, God warns that the suffering will intensify. The footmen/horses contrast has become proverbial: small trials prepare for greater ones. The 'thickets of the Jordan' was the most dangerous terrain in the land, home to predators and flooding.
6. God reveals the full extent of the betrayal: it is not strangers but Jeremiah's own family who have turned against him. The warning 'do not trust them though they speak kindly' indicates that the family's hostility is masked by friendly words — a deeper treachery than open opposition. This family betrayal intensifies the Anathoth conspiracy of chapter 11.
7. The speaker shifts abruptly to God himself — 'my house,' 'my inheritance,' 'the beloved of my soul.' The threefold 'I have' (azavti, natashti, natati) hammers home that God is the one performing the abandonment, and it costs him deeply. The word nachalah ('inheritance') applied to Israel means they are God's personal, treasured possession.
8. The startling image: Israel, God's treasured inheritance, has become like a wild lion roaring defiance at its owner. The word sne'tiha ('I hated her') is covenant-termination language — not an emotion but a legal declaration of the relationship's end (cf. the use of 'hate' in divorce contexts, Malachi 2:16). We rendered it as 'turned against her' to capture the covenantal rather than emotional sense.
9. The 'speckled bird of prey' (ayit tsavua) is an unusual bird that attracts attack from other birds — Israel's syncretistic religion has made her a target. The command to gather beasts for devouring is addressed to the nations, whom God summons as instruments of judgment. The imagery is of a carcass attracting predators.

10. The 'shepherds' (ro'im) are foreign rulers or invading armies whom God has permitted to ravage the land. 'My vineyard' (karmi) echoes Isaiah 5:1-7 where Israel is God's vineyard. The phrase chelqat chemdati ('my cherished portion') uses the language of a landowner surveying his devastated estate. God grieves the destruction even as he permits it.
11. The threefold repetition of shemamah ('desolation') creates a drumbeat of devastation. The land itself mourns — personified creation grieving its abuse. The final clause ('no one takes it to heart') indicts not just the invaders but the people of Judah who are indifferent to the destruction of God's land.
12. The 'sword of the LORD' (cherev la-YHWH) makes explicit that the invaders are God's instrument — the destruction is divinely directed. The phrase 'no peace for any living thing' (ein shalom lekhol basar) is total: not even animals are spared. The word shalom here means safety, security, well-being — all of it gone.
13. The wheat-and-thorns proverb inverts the expected agricultural cycle — labor produces only futility. This echoes the curse of Genesis 3:18 ('thorns and thistles') and anticipates the futility curses of Deuteronomy 28:38-40. The 'fierce anger of the LORD' (charon af YHWH) is the heat of divine wrath that has scorched the land's productivity.
14. The oracle shifts to address the surrounding nations — 'evil neighbors' (shekhenim hara'im) who have seized portions of Israel's land. God will uproot both the pagan nations and Judah from the land — a shared exile. The verb notesham ('uproot') uses agricultural imagery consistent with the planting/vineyard theme of the chapter.
15. The promise of restoration follows judgment — a pattern characteristic of Jeremiah's theology. The verb richamtim ('I will have compassion on them') shares the root rechem ('womb'), suggesting the deepest maternal tenderness. Remarkably, this compassion extends even to the pagan nations, not only to Judah.
16. This verse is remarkably universalist for its context: pagan nations that adopt the worship of the LORD will be incorporated into God's people. The condition is genuine conversion — learning God's ways, swearing by his name. The ironic reversal is pointed: these nations taught Israel idolatry, and now they themselves must learn Israel's faith. The verb nivnu ('be built up') implies permanent establishment, not mere toleration.
17. The alternative to conversion is total destruction — there is no neutral ground. The emphatic infinitive absolute natosh venatasht ('utterly uproot') doubles the verb for intensity. The chapter ends with ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD'), the prophetic attestation formula that seals the oracle as divine speech.

Summary: Jeremiah 13 opens with the dramatic sign-act of the linen belt (ezor): God commands Jeremiah to buy a belt, wear it, then bury it by the Euphrates. When he retrieves it, the belt is ruined — a parable of how God bound Judah to himself in intimate covenant relationship, but the people's pride and idolatry have made them worthless. The chapter then delivers oracles about wine jars filled to bursting (divine judgment disguised as abundance), a warning about the exile ('carried beyond the Euphrates'), and a searing indictment of Jerusalem's shamelessness, ending with the haunting question: 'Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots?'

What Makes This Remarkable: The linen belt sign-act is one of Jeremiah's most vivid prophetic demonstrations. The ezor (linen waistcloth or belt) was the garment worn closest to the body — the metaphor is about intimacy, not decoration. Just as a belt clings to a person's waist, so God bound Israel to himself (v. 11). The ruined belt is therefore not just a picture of judgment but of broken intimacy. The question about the Ethiopian and leopard (v. 23) has become proverbial in English, but its original force is theological: Judah's sin has become so ingrained that repentance is as unlikely as a biological impossibility. The wine-jar oracle (vv. 12-14) uses the image of drunkenness not for pleasure but for the staggering, helpless confusion God will inflict as judgment. We preserved the sign-act narrative in prose without line breaks, consistent with our rendering of prophetic narrative sections.

Translation Friction: *The location of the belt burial is debated: the Hebrew reads Perat, which normally means Euphrates, but some scholars propose a nearby wadi Parah (modern Ain Farah) since a round trip to the Euphrates would be extraordinary. We translated 'Euphrates' because the symbolic connection to Babylon and exile is central to the sign-act's meaning. The phrase 'uncover your skirts over your face' (v. 26) uses language of sexual exposure as a metaphor for the public shaming of conquest — we rendered it directly because euphemizing it would diminish the severity of the prophetic indictment. The word sheririut ('stubbornness') in verse 10 continues the Jeremic formula from 11:8.*

Connections: The linen belt sign-act connects to Jeremiah's other sign-acts: the potter's wheel (ch. 18), the broken flask (ch. 19), the yoke (ch. 27-28). The Euphrates location foreshadows the Babylonian exile. The Ethiopian/leopard proverb connects to Jeremiah's broader theme that the heart is incurable (17:9). The 'scattering like chaff' image (v. 24) connects to Psalm 1:4 and Matthew 3:12. The exposure/shame language connects to Hosea 2:3, Nahum 3:5, and Ezekiel 16:37.

¹This is what the LORD said to me: Go and buy yourself a linen belt, and put it around your waist, but do not put it in water. ²So I bought the belt according to the word of the LORD and put it around my waist. ³Then the word of the LORD came to me a second time: ⁴Take the belt that you bought, the one around your waist, and go to the Euphrates. Hide it there in a crevice of the rock. ⁵So I went and hid it by the Euphrates, as the LORD commanded me. ⁶After many days, the LORD said to me: Go to the Euphrates and retrieve the belt I commanded you to hide there. ⁷So I went to the Euphrates, dug, and retrieved the belt from the place where I had hidden it. And there it was — the belt was ruined, good for nothing. ⁸Then the word of the LORD came to me: ⁹This is what the LORD says: In this same way I will ruin the pride of Judah and the great pride of Jerusalem. ¹⁰This evil people, who refuse to hear my words, who walk in the stubbornness of their heart, and who have gone after other gods to serve and worship them — they will become like this belt, good for nothing. ¹¹For just as a belt clings to a person's waist, so I made the whole house of Israel and the whole house of Judah cling to me, declares the LORD — to be my people, for a name, for praise, and for glory. But they would not listen. ¹²You shall also speak this word to them: This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says — Every jar will be filled with wine. And they will say to you, 'Do we not know perfectly well that every jar will be filled with wine?' ¹³Then say to them: This is what the LORD says — I am about to fill all the inhabitants of this land — the kings who sit on David's throne, the priests, the prophets, and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem — with drunkenness. ¹⁴And I will smash them one against another, fathers and sons together, declares the LORD. I will not pity, I will not spare, I will not show compassion — I will destroy them.

¹⁵Hear and give ear — do not be proud,
for the LORD has spoken.

¹⁶Give glory to the LORD your God before he brings darkness, before your feet stumble
on the mountains at twilight.
You will hope for light,
but he will turn it to deep shadow and make it thick darkness.

¹⁷But if you will not listen, my soul will weep in secret
because of your pride.
My eyes will weep bitterly
and run down with tears,
for the LORD's flock has been taken captive.

¹⁸Say to the king and to the queen mother:
Come down from your thrones and sit low,
for your glorious crown has fallen from your head.

¹⁹The cities of the Negev are shut up, with no one to open them. All of Judah is carried into exile — completely carried away.
²⁰Lift up your eyes and see those coming from the north.
Where is the flock entrusted to you — your beautiful flock?

²¹What will you say when he sets over you as head those you yourself trained as allies? Will not anguish seize you like a woman in labor? ²²And if you say in your heart, 'Why has this happened to me?' — it is because of the greatness of your iniquity that your skirts are stripped away and your body exposed.

²³Can a Cushite change his skin,
or a leopard its spots?
Then perhaps you also could do good — you who are trained in evil.

²⁴Therefore I will scatter them like chaff driven by the desert wind.

²⁵This is your lot,
the portion I have measured out for you, declares the LORD, because you forgot me
and trusted in falsehood.

²⁶So I myself will strip your skirts over your face, and your shame will be exposed.

²⁷Your adulteries, your lustful neighings, your shameless prostitution on the hills and in the fields —
I have seen your detestable acts.
Woe to you, O Jerusalem!
How long will you remain unclean?

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The ezor pishtim ('linen belt/waistcloth') was the innermost garment, worn directly against the skin. The instruction not to wash it is significant — it must retain the intimate contact, the body's imprint. Linen was also priestly fabric (Exodus 28:42), connecting the belt to Jeremiah's priestly identity.
2. Jeremiah's immediate obedience is narrated without comment — the prophet simply does what God commands. The simplicity of the prose contrasts with the symbolic weight of the action.
3. The second divine command introduces the next phase of the sign-act. The narrative structure — command, obedience, second command, obedience, interpretation — is the standard pattern for prophetic sign-acts.
4. The Hebrew Peratah means 'to the Euphrates.' Whether Jeremiah literally traveled to the Euphrates River (a journey of several hundred miles each way) or to a local wadi Parah is debated. We render 'Euphrates' because the symbolic identification with Babylon and exile is the theological point of the sign-act. The belt that clung to Jeremiah's body is now hidden in foreign territory.
5. Again, simple obedience narrated without elaboration. The journey itself — if literal — would have been an extraordinary prophetic demonstration visible to many.
6. The 'many days' allow time for the belt to decay — the passage of time is essential to the sign-act's meaning. The belt that was once intimately close is now distant and deteriorating.
7. The climax of the sign-act: the belt that once clung intimately to the prophet's body is now nishchat ('ruined, spoiled, corrupted'). The word lo yitslach lakkol ('good for nothing, useless for anything') is emphatic — total worthlessness. The once-beautiful priestly linen is decomposed beyond use.
8. The interpretation formula — God now explains the sign-act's meaning.
9. The verb ashchit ('I will ruin') is the same root as nishchat ('was ruined') describing the belt — the parallel is exact. Just as the belt was ruined, so God will ruin Judah's ga'on ('pride, arrogance, excellence'). The word ga'on can mean either 'pride' (negative) or 'excellence/majesty' (positive) — here it is the arrogance that has separated Judah from God.
10. The interpretation makes the parallel explicit: the people are the belt. The phrase sheririut libbam ('stubbornness of their heart') recurs from 11:8 as Jeremiah's standard diagnosis. The triple indictment — refusing to hear, walking in stubbornness, pursuing other gods — is the complete covenant violation. The climax 'good for nothing' (lo yitslach lakkol) applies the belt's condition to the nation.

11. The fourfold purpose — 'people, name, praise, glory' — echoes Deuteronomy 26:19. God's intention was that Israel would be his intimate possession, his reputation on earth, his praise among the nations. The final 'but they would not listen' (velo shame'u) is devastating in its brevity — all that divine purpose, refused. The belt metaphor reaches its full meaning here: God wrapped a nation around himself like a garment, and they rotted away.
12. The oracle begins with what sounds like a promise of abundance — every nevel ('jar, jug, wineskin') filled with wine. The people's dismissive response ('obviously!') shows they hear only the surface meaning. But the 'wine' is divine judgment — God will fill them with staggering confusion, not celebration. The wordplay depends on nevel meaning both 'wine jar' and sounding like naval ('fool').
13. The meaning is now revealed: the 'wine' is shikkaron ('drunkenness, intoxication') — not celebration but the staggering confusion of divine judgment. Every social class is listed — kings, priests, prophets, common people — no one is exempt. The drunkenness metaphor appears also in Isaiah 29:9 and Jeremiah 25:15-29 (the cup of God's wrath).
14. The jar metaphor continues — the jars filled with wine are now smashed against each other. The image is of ceramic vessels shattering on impact. The threefold negation — no pity, no sparing, no compassion — is the most comprehensive statement of judgment's finality. Even the family bond (fathers and sons) will not prevent destruction.
15. The shift to poetry is marked by parallelism. The imperative 'do not be proud' (al tighahu) directly addresses the ga'on ('pride') theme from verse 9. The statement 'the LORD has spoken' is both authentication and warning — the decree is final.
16. The imagery of darkness overtaking travelers on mountain paths is vivid — once twilight falls in the mountains, the path becomes lethal. The word tsalmaveth ('deep shadow, death-shadow') combines tsel ('shadow') with maveth ('death') — the same word appears in Psalm 23:4. The progression from hope for light to deep darkness to thick gloom is a three-stage descent into judgment.
17. One of the most tender verses in Jeremiah — the 'weeping prophet' title originates from passages like this. The prophet weeps in secret (bemistarim), not publicly — this is private grief, not performance. The phrase 'the LORD's flock' (eder YHWH) shifts to pastoral imagery: the nation is not just a political entity but God's personally tended flock, now seized by predators.
18. The gevirah ('queen mother') held significant political power in the Judean court — likely a reference to Nehushta, mother of King Jehoiachin (2 Kings 24:8). The command to 'sit low' (hashpilu shevu) means to descend from the throne to the ground — the posture of mourning and humiliation. The crown falling symbolizes the end of royal authority.
19. The Negev cities, the southern gateway to Judah, are sealed — invasion from the south has closed every escape route. The emphatic 'all of Judah' (kullah) and 'completely' (shelomim, literally 'wholly, in entirety') stress the totality of the exile. No partial judgment, no remnant left behind.
20. Jerusalem is addressed as a shepherdess who has lost her flock. The enemy comes 'from the north' (mitsafon) — the standard direction of Babylonian invasion, since armies approached via the Fertile Crescent rather than crossing the desert directly. The 'beautiful flock' (tson tifarteikh) echoes 'the LORD's flock' from verse 17 — Jerusalem was given stewardship of God's people and has failed.
21. The irony is sharp: Jerusalem cultivated foreign alliances (trained them as 'allies/chiefs' over herself), and now those very nations will rule over her as conquerors. The birth-pangs metaphor for judgment is common in the prophets (Isaiah 13:8, Micah 4:9-10) — sudden, inescapable, agonizing pain.
22. The exposure of skirts (shulayikh) is the language of public humiliation — conquered cities were stripped and paraded as a sign of total defeat. The image draws on the metaphor of Jerusalem as a woman whose shame is publicly revealed because of her unfaithfulness. This connects to the adultery/idolatry metaphor that runs through Jeremiah and Ezekiel.
23. This verse has become proverbial in English ('a leopard cannot change its spots') but its original context is a devastating theological verdict: Judah has practiced evil so long that it has become their nature. The word limmudei ('trained, accustomed, disciples of') implies that evil has become their education, their skill, their expertise. The question implies that only divine intervention — not human effort — can change them.
24. The chaff/wind image appears throughout the Hebrew Bible as a metaphor for the impermanent and worthless (Psalm 1:4, Isaiah 17:13). The 'desert wind' (ruach midbar) is the scorching east wind from the Arabian desert — hot, dry, and destructive.
25. The word goral ('lot') evokes the casting of lots — Jerusalem's fate has been determined. The 'falsehood' (sheqer) encompasses both false gods and the false prophets who promised peace (cf. 14:13-14). Forgetting God (shakhachat oti) is not mere forgetfulness but deliberate abandonment of the covenant relationship.
26. God performs the act of exposure himself — this is not random violence but judicial sentence. The stripping of garments over the face was a public humiliation inflicted on conquered peoples and adulterous women (Nahum 3:5, Ezekiel 16:37, Hosea 2:3). The word qalon ('shame, disgrace, dishonor') is the public revelation of what was hidden.
27. The word mitshalotayikh ('your neighings') compares Jerusalem's pursuit of foreign gods to a mare in heat — sexually graphic language deliberately chosen to shock. The word zimmah ('lewdness, shameless scheme') implies both sexual immorality and calculated wickedness. The 'hills and fields' are the bamot (high places) where Canaanite worship occurred. The final question — 'How long?' — leaves open the possibility of purification, but the tone is grief rather than hope.

Summary: Jeremiah 14 opens with a devastating drought oracle — the land itself groans under divine judgment, with nobles, farmers, and animals alike brought to despair. Jeremiah intercedes for the people in deeply moving prayer (vv. 7-9, 19-22), but God refuses to accept the intercession and repeats the prohibition first issued in 7:16 and 11:14: 'Do not pray for this people.' The chapter includes a sharp condemnation of false prophets who promise peace when none is coming, and God's declaration that both the false prophets and those who listen to them will face sword and famine.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains two of Jeremiah's most eloquent intercessory prayers, both rejected by God — a theological crisis at the heart of the prophetic vocation. The drought serves as a concrete manifestation of covenant-curse (Deuteronomy 28:23-24), making the physical landscape a witness against the people. The image of God as a 'stranger in the land' and a 'traveler who turns aside for the night' (v. 8) is one of the most startling metaphors in the Hebrew Bible — Jeremiah accuses God of behaving like a disengaged passerby in his own land. The triple prohibition against intercession (7:16, 11:14, 14:11) progressively closes the door on prophetic mediation, leaving Judah without an advocate before God. We preserved the poetic structure of the drought lament and the intercessory prayers to distinguish them from the prose divine responses.

Translation Friction: The word batstsarot ('distress, anguish') in verse 8 required careful handling — it describes God's relationship to Israel's suffering, not Israel's emotional state. The verb natash ('abandon') in verse 9 is covenant-language for forsaking an obligation, stronger than mere absence. The phrase navi sheqer ('false prophet') in verses 14-15 had to be rendered consistently with the Jeremiah briefing addendum's locked vocabulary. The intercessory prayers use first-person plural ('we') — Jeremiah identifies with the sinful people even as God rejects them, creating a tension the rendering must not smooth over.

Connections: The drought as covenant-curse connects to Deuteronomy 28:23-24 and Leviticus 26:19-20. The prohibition against intercession reprises 7:16 and 11:14. The false prophets condemned here anticipate the extended confrontation with Hananiah in chapter 28. Jeremiah's intercessory prayers echo Moses's intercessions (Exodus 32:11-14, Numbers 14:13-19), but unlike Moses, Jeremiah is denied. The drought imagery connects to Joel 1 and Amos 4:7-8. The covenant-confession formula 'we acknowledge our wickedness' (v. 20) echoes the Day of Atonement liturgy.

¹The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah concerning the drought:

²Judah mourns;
her gates languish to the ground.
They sit in darkness on the earth,
and the cry of Jerusalem rises up.

³Their nobles send their servants to the cisterns;
they come to the pits and find no water.
They return with their vessels empty, ashamed and humiliated, covering their heads.

⁴Because the ground is cracked,
for there has been no rain on the land,
the farmers are ashamed;
they cover their heads.

⁵Even the doe in the field gives birth and abandons her young,
because there is no grass.

⁶Wild donkeys stand on the bare heights, gasping for air like jackals;
 their eyes grow dim
 because there is no vegetation.

⁷Though our iniquities testify against us, act, LORD, for the sake of your name.
 For our acts of turning away are many — we have sinned against you.

⁸O Hope of Israel,
 its Savior in time of distress —
 why are you like a stranger in the land, like a traveler who turns aside only to spend the night?

⁹Why are you like someone stunned,
 like a warrior who cannot save?
 Yet you are in our midst, LORD, and your name has been called over us —
 do not abandon us!

¹⁰This is what the LORD says concerning this people:
 They have loved to wander;
 they have not restrained their feet.
 So the LORD takes no pleasure in them.
 Now he will remember their iniquity and punish their sins.

¹¹Then the LORD said to me: Do not pray for this people for their welfare. ¹²When they fast, I will not listen to their cry. When they offer burnt offering and grain offering, I will not accept them. Instead, I will consume them by the sword, by famine, and by plague. ¹³Then I said, "Ah, Lord GOD! Look — the prophets are telling them, 'You will not see the sword, and famine will not come upon you, for I will give you lasting peace in this place.'" ¹⁴Then the LORD said to me: The prophets are prophesying falsehood in my name. I did not send them, I did not command them, and I did not speak to them. They are prophesying to you a false vision, worthless divination, and the deceit of their own hearts. ¹⁵Therefore this is what the LORD says concerning the prophets who prophesy in my name though I did not send them, who say, 'Sword and famine will not come upon this land' — by the sword and by famine those very prophets will meet their end. ¹⁶And the people to whom they prophesy will be thrown out into the streets of Jerusalem because of famine and the sword, with no one to bury them — they, their wives, their sons, and their daughters. I will pour out their own wickedness upon them.

¹⁷And you will speak this word to them:
 Let my eyes flow with tears night and day without stopping,
 for the virgin daughter of my people is shattered with a great wound,
 a grievous blow.

¹⁸If I go out to the field — there lie those slain by the sword.
 If I enter the city — there are those wasting from famine.
 For both prophet and priest wander through a land

they do not know.

¹⁹Have you utterly rejected Judah?
Does your soul loathe Zion?
Why have you struck us
with no healing for us?
We hoped for peace — but nothing good came.
We hoped for a time of healing — but there is only terror.

²⁰We acknowledge our wickedness, LORD, the iniquity of our ancestors —
for we have sinned against you.

²¹Do not despise us, for your name's sake!
Do not dishonor the throne of your glory.
Remember — do not break your covenant with us.

²²Can any of the worthless idols of the nations bring rain?
Can the heavens themselves give showers?
Is it not you alone, LORD our God?
We set our hope on you,
for you have made all these things.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew batstsarot (plural of battsoret) refers to drought or severe lack of rain — the KJV's 'dearth' is archaic. The plural form may indicate either repeated droughts or the comprehensive nature of the disaster. This superscription frames the entire chapter as a prophetic response to an actual agricultural crisis.
2. The verb avelah ('mourns') is used of both human grief and the land itself mourning — a common prophetic device where the physical landscape participates in covenant judgment. The verb qaderu ('they are dark, they sit in gloom') can mean either literal darkness or the posture of mourning (sitting on the ground in black garments). The cry of Jerusalem 'rising up' uses the verb alah, the same root as olah ('burnt offering') — the city's anguish ascends like smoke.
3. The word tse'oreihem is debated — it can mean 'their little ones' (KJV) or 'their servants/subordinates.' In context, nobles sending servants for water makes more practical sense. The covering of heads is a gesture of mourning and shame (cf. 2 Samuel 15:30, Esther 6:12). The empty vessels are a powerful concrete image — drought reduces the mighty to helplessness.
4. The verb chattah ('cracked, shattered') describes soil so dry it fractures — the same root can mean 'terrified' when applied to people, creating a subtle double meaning where the ground itself recoils in fear. The farmers (ikkarim) are the backbone of Judah's economy; their shame represents the collapse of the agricultural order that sustained covenant life in the promised land.
5. The image of the doe (ayyelet) abandoning her newborn fawn is devastating — maternal instinct, the most powerful force in the animal world, is overridden by the severity of the drought. The absence of deshe ('fresh grass, vegetation') means the mother cannot produce milk. Nature itself breaks under covenant judgment.
6. The pera'im ('wild donkeys') are the hardiest animals of the wilderness — if they are failing, all life is failing. They stand on shepayim ('bare heights') where wind might carry the scent of water. The word tannim is 'jackals' (not 'dragons' as in the KJV) — jackals pant with open mouths in heat. The dimming eyes indicate approaching death from dehydration. The drought has reached even the untamed creatures that depend on no one.
7. Jeremiah's intercession begins here and runs through verse 9. He uses first-person plural — identifying with the people's sin rather than standing apart. The appeal 'for the sake of your name' (lema'an shimkha) is a classic Mosaic strategy: God's reputation among the nations is at stake (cf. Exodus 32:12, Numbers 14:13-16). The word meshuvotenu ('our turnings away, backslidings') is from shuv, Jeremiah's key verb.
8. The title miqveh yisra'el ('Hope of Israel') doubles as a wordplay — miqveh also means 'pool of water, reservoir' (cf. Genesis 1:10), making it poignant in a drought context: Israel's reservoir has gone dry. The accusation that God acts like a ger ('stranger, resident alien') in his own land is theologically shocking — God should be the permanent resident, the landowner, but he behaves like a passing foreigner with no stake in the place. The metaphor of the overnight traveler intensifies the charge: God is merely passing through.

9. The word nidham ('stunned, dazed, bewildered') accuses God of being paralyzed — unable to act, like a warrior frozen in battle. This is extraordinarily bold language directed at the Almighty. The phrase shimkha alenu niqra ('your name has been called over us') is covenant-possession language — Israel bears God's name as a wife bears her husband's name. To abandon them would be to abandon his own reputation. The verb tannichenu ('abandon us') from the root n-ch-h carries the force of permanent desertion.
10. God's response to Jeremiah's prayer is blunt refusal. The verb lanu'a ('to wander, to stagger') suggests aimless, uncontrolled movement — the people wander from God not by deliberate choice but by habitual restlessness. The phrase lo chasaku ('they have not restrained') implies willing self-indulgence. The divine response switches from the intimate 'you are in our midst' to the distancing 'this people' — God refuses the closeness Jeremiah invoked.
11. This is the third and final occurrence of the intercession prohibition (cf. 7:16, 11:14). The word letovah ('for their good, for their welfare') is emphatic — Jeremiah may not even ask for minimal benefit for them. The progressive closure of intercession across these three texts represents the exhaustion of prophetic mediation. The prophet's most essential function — standing between God and the people — has been revoked.
12. The triad of sword (cherev), famine (ra'av), and plague (dever) is Jeremiah's signature judgment formula, appearing over a dozen times in the book (21:7, 9; 24:10; 27:8, 13; 29:17-18; 32:24, 36; 34:17; 38:2; 42:17, 22; 44:13). These represent the three faces of siege warfare — military violence, starvation, and disease. God declares that neither fasting nor sacrifice will be accepted — the normal means of averting divine wrath have been rendered ineffective by persistent covenant violation.
13. Jeremiah raises the defense that the people are being misled by other prophets. The exclamation ahahh ('Ah!') expresses anguished protest — Jeremiah is not making excuses but genuinely grieving the deception. The false prophets' promise of shelom emet ('true peace') directly contradicts God's announcement of sword and famine. The phrase 'in this place' (bamaqom hazzeh) refers to Jerusalem and the temple — the false prophets are promising that Jerusalem is inviolable.
14. God's response to Jeremiah's defense is devastating — the false prophets have no commission. Three denials ('I did not send... command... speak') systematically dismantle every possible claim to authority. The word sheqer ('falsehood, lie') is the key accusation — these are nevi'ei sheqer ('false prophets'), using God's name without his authorization. The term qesem ('divination') is particularly damning because divination was explicitly forbidden in Israel (Deuteronomy 18:10). The word elil ('worthless thing, nothing') dismisses their entire prophetic output as empty.
15. The punishment fits the crime with bitter irony — the prophets who denied sword and famine will die by sword and famine. The verb yittammu ('they will be consumed, they will come to an end') from the root t-m-m carries finality — total consumption. This is measure-for-measure judgment (middah keneged middah).
16. The horror escalates: unburied corpses in the streets represent the ultimate disgrace in ancient Near Eastern culture, where proper burial was a sacred obligation. The catalog of victims — wives, sons, daughters — emphasizes that the false prophets' lies destroy entire families. The verb shafakhti ('I will pour out') is the same verb used for pouring out blood — God will pour their wickedness back upon them like blood poured on the ground.
17. The speaker shifts ambiguously — it could be God or Jeremiah weeping, or both. This deliberate blurring is characteristic of Jeremiah, where the prophet's grief and God's grief merge. The epithet betulat bat-ammi ('virgin daughter of my people') personifies Judah/Jerusalem as a young, vulnerable woman who has been violently assaulted. The word shever ('shattering, breaking') suggests a fracture so severe it cannot be repaired — the same word describes a broken bone or a shattered vessel.
18. The verse paints a panorama of total devastation — the countryside holds the sword-slain, the city holds the famine-starved. The word tachalu'ei ('those sick with, those wasting from') emphasizes the slow agony of famine death. The final line is puzzling — sacharu el-erets velo yada'u ('they wander to a land they do not know') may mean the prophets and priests practice their trade in ignorance, or it may refer to exile, or to death as a journey to an unknown land. We preserved the ambiguity.
19. Jeremiah's second intercessory prayer begins here and runs through verse 22. The emphatic infinitive hama'os ma'asta ('have you utterly, completely rejected') presses God on whether the rejection is final. The verb ga'alach ('loathe, abhor') is visceral — it suggests nausea, the reaction to something repulsive. Asking if God's nephesh ('soul, being') loathes Zion is asking whether God's deepest self is revolted by his own people. The contrast between hoped-for shalom and actual be'atah ('terror') echoes 8:15 almost verbatim.
20. This is a formal confession of sin using three terms: rish'enu ('our wickedness'), avon avotenu ('the iniquity of our ancestors'), and chatanu ('we have sinned'). The inclusion of ancestral iniquity acknowledges that the current generation bears the accumulated weight of generational covenant-breaking. The verb yada'nu ('we know, we acknowledge') implies not just awareness but admission — they are not claiming ignorance.
21. Three imperatives in rapid succession create urgency: al-tin'ats ('do not despise'), al-tenabbel ('do not dishonor'), al-tafer ('do not break'). The 'throne of your glory' (kisse' kevodekha) refers to the temple in Jerusalem, God's earthly throne — Jeremiah pleads that God not bring disgrace upon his own dwelling place. The climactic appeal is to the covenant itself: berit — the binding agreement God swore. Jeremiah is essentially arguing that God cannot abandon Israel without violating his own oath.
22. The prayer ends with a theological argument: since the idols (havlei haggoyim, literally 'the vapors/vanities of the nations') cannot produce rain, and even the heavens themselves cannot give rain on their own authority, only the LORD can end the drought. The word havalim ('vapors, breaths, worthless things') is the same word Ecclesiastes uses for 'vanity' — the idols are literally nothing, hot air. The final affirmation 'you have made all these things' asserts God's sovereignty over the created order, including weather — making the drought itself a deliberate divine act rather than cosmic accident.

Summary: Jeremiah 15 opens with God's most absolute refusal of intercession — even Moses and Samuel, Israel's greatest intercessors, could not turn him from judgment (v. 1). Four agents of destruction are appointed: sword, dogs, birds, and beasts (v. 3). The chapter then shifts into Jeremiah's first major confession (vv. 10-21), one of the most raw personal prayers in scripture. The prophet laments his birth, confesses that God's word was his joy and delight yet also his source of isolation and suffering, and receives a conditional divine promise: 'If you return, I will restore you' (v. 19) — God demands repentance even from his own prophet.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most extraordinary reversals in prophetic literature: God applies the verb shuv ('return') to Jeremiah himself (v. 19). Throughout the book, shuv is directed at wayward Israel — here God turns it on his own prophet, demanding that Jeremiah repent of his despair and self-pity before he can be restored to prophetic service. The image of God's word as fire and joy (v. 16) stands in tension with the isolation and suffering that same word causes (v. 17) — the prophet's vocation is simultaneously his greatest gift and his greatest burden. The mention of Moses and Samuel as failed intercessors (v. 1) is not merely rhetorical — it establishes that Judah's guilt exceeds anything in Israel's prior history. We rendered the confession with its full emotional force, preserving Jeremiah's accusations against God without softening.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'I sat alone because of your hand' (v. 17) uses the word badad ('alone, isolated'), which carries the resonance of Lamentations 1:1 ('How the city sits alone'). Jeremiah's isolation prefigures Jerusalem's. The verb pittitani does not appear in this chapter (it is in chapter 20), but the emotional trajectory toward that accusation begins here. The conditional promise in verse 19 — 'if you return' (im tashuv) — required careful handling because shuv is Jeremiah's signature verb for Israel's repentance, and applying it to the prophet himself is theologically startling. The word mevasser in verse 16 ('your word was called over me') uses the same name-calling formula as covenant possession.

Connections: Moses's intercession (Exodus 32:11-14, Numbers 14:13-19) and Samuel's intercession (1 Samuel 7:9, 12:19-23) are the background for verse 1 — both succeeded where Jeremiah is told even they would fail. The birth-lament in verse 10 anticipates the fuller curse in 20:14-18 and echoes Job 3:1-26. The devouring of God's word (v. 16) connects to Ezekiel's scroll-eating (Ezekiel 2:8-3:3). The promise 'I will make you a fortified wall of bronze' (v. 20) reprises the commissioning language of 1:18. The four-fold judgment of verse 3 echoes Ezekiel 14:21.

¹Then the LORD said to me: Even if Moses and Samuel were to stand before me, my heart would not turn toward this people. Send them away from my presence — let them go!

²And when they ask you, 'Where should we go?' — tell them: This is what the LORD says:
Those destined for death — to death.
Those destined for the sword — to the sword.
Those destined for famine — to famine.
Those destined for captivity — to captivity.

³I will appoint four kinds of destroyers against them, declares the LORD: the sword to kill, dogs to drag away, the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth to devour and destroy. ⁴I will make them an object of horror to all the kingdoms of the earth, because of what Manasseh son of Hezekiah, king of Judah, did in Jerusalem.

⁵For who will have compassion on you, Jerusalem?
Who will mourn for you?
Who will turn aside to ask about your welfare?

⁶You have abandoned me, declares the LORD;
you keep going backward.
So I stretched out my hand against you and destroyed you —

I am weary of relenting.

⁷I winnowed them with a winnowing fork at the gates of the land.
I bereaved them; I destroyed my people,
for they did not turn back from their ways.

⁸Their widows are more numerous to me than the sand of the seas.
I brought against the mother of young men
a destroyer at midday.
I made anguish and terror
fall on her suddenly.

⁹The mother of seven grows faint;
she breathes out her life.
Her sun has set while it is still day —
she is shamed and disgraced.
And their survivors I will give to the sword before their enemies, declares the LORD.

¹⁰Woe to me, my mother, that you gave birth to me —
a man of conflict and a man of dispute with the whole land!
I have not lent, and no one has lent to me,
yet everyone curses me.

¹¹The LORD said: Surely I have set you free for a good purpose. Surely I have made the enemy plead with you in the time of disaster and in the time of distress. ¹²Can iron shatter iron from the north, or bronze? ¹³Your wealth and your treasures I will give as plunder — without cost — because of all your sins throughout all your territory. ¹⁴I will make you serve your enemies in a land you do not know, for a fire is kindled in my anger — it will burn against you.

¹⁵You know, LORD.
Remember me and attend to me;
avenge me against my persecutors.
In your patience, do not take me away.
Know that for your sake I bear reproach.

¹⁶Your words were found, and I devoured them.
Your word became my joy
and the delight of my heart,
for your name has been called over me,
LORD, God of Hosts.

¹⁷I did not sit in the company of revelers and celebrate.
Because of your hand upon me, I sat alone,
for you filled me with indignation.

¹⁸Why is my pain unending,
my wound incurable, refusing to heal?
Will you truly be to me like a deceptive stream,
like waters that cannot be trusted?

¹⁹Therefore this is what the LORD says:
 If you return, I will restore you —
 you will stand before me.
 If you extract what is precious from what is worthless,
 you will be as my mouth.
 They will turn to you,
 but you must not turn to them.

²⁰I will make you a fortified wall of bronze to this people.
 They will fight against you,
 but they will not overcome you,
 for I am with you to save you and deliver you,
 declares the LORD.

²¹I will rescue you from the hand of the wicked and redeem you from the grasp of the ruthless.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The mention of Moses and Samuel is not arbitrary — these are Israel's two greatest intercessors. Moses turned away God's wrath after the golden calf (Exodus 32:11-14) and after the spies' report (Numbers 14:13-19). Samuel's prayers brought victory at Mizpah (1 Samuel 7:9) and he promised never to cease praying for Israel (1 Samuel 12:23). If even these two could not save this generation, no one can. The phrase ein nafshi el ('my soul/heart is not toward') expresses total emotional withdrawal — God has no remaining inclination toward these people. The imperatives shalach ('send away') and yetse'u ('let them go out') reverse the Exodus — God once brought them out of Egypt to himself; now he sends them out from his presence.
2. The fourfold assignment is merciless in its finality — each person's fate is already sealed. The repetitive structure (asher la-X la-X) creates a drumbeat of inevitability. The four fates represent escalating severity: death (by plague), the sword (military violence), famine (slow starvation), and captivity (exile) — though exile, paradoxically, is survival. This quatrain echoes Revelation 6:8, where the fourth horseman is given authority over these same four destroyers.
3. The word mishpachot ('kinds, families, clans') is used with grim irony — these four 'families' of destruction replace the family of Israel. Dogs in the ancient Near East were not domestic pets but scavengers that roamed the streets feeding on refuse and corpses — being dragged away by dogs means the bodies will not receive burial. The progression from sword (human violence) to dogs, birds, and beasts (animal scavenging) depicts a total reversal of the created order, where humans were given dominion over animals (Genesis 1:28). The formula ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD') stamps this as irrevocable divine decree.
4. The word za'avah ('horror, object of trembling') describes something so terrible that onlookers shudder — Israel's fate will serve as a cautionary tale among the nations. Manasseh (reigned c. 697-642 BCE) is singled out as the king whose sins made Judah's destruction inevitable, despite Josiah's later reforms. According to 2 Kings 21:16, Manasseh 'filled Jerusalem with innocent blood from one end to the other.' The mention of Hezekiah as his father heightens the tragedy — the most righteous king fathered the most wicked.
5. Three rhetorical questions hammer home Jerusalem's total abandonment — no compassion (yachmol), no mourning (yanud), and no one even pausing to inquire after her well-being. The verb yanud ('to shake the head, to wag in sympathy') describes the gesture of condolence. The final question uses lish'ol leshalom ('to ask about peace/welfare') — the standard Hebrew greeting. No one will even say 'How are you?' to Jerusalem.
6. The verb nataash ('abandon, forsake') is covenant-language for desertion — God accuses Jerusalem of abandoning him, not the other way around. The phrase achor telekhi ('you walk backward') is the opposite of 'walking with God' — Jerusalem moves in reverse, away from the covenant relationship. The stunning confession nil'eiti hinnahem ('I am weary of relenting') admits divine exhaustion — God has relented so many times that he can no longer sustain compassion. The verb n-ch-m ('relent, comfort, repent') is the same verb used when God 'relented' from destroying Israel after Moses's intercession (Exodus 32:14).
7. The winnowing image (ezrem bemizreh) is agricultural — grain is tossed into the wind so that chaff blows away and good grain falls. God is winnowing his people, separating them at the 'gates of the land' — the borders through which they will pass into exile. The verb shikkalti ('I bereaved') uses the piel intensive form, emphasizing the thoroughness of the loss. The root shuv ('return') appears in its negative form — they did not shuv. This is the verb of the entire book applied to Israel's persistent refusal.
8. The comparison of widows to the sand of the seas (mechol yammim) inverts the Abrahamic blessing — God promised Abraham descendants like the sand (Genesis 22:17), now the widows are like sand. The 'mother of a young man' (em bachur) may refer to the city itself as a bereaved mother, or to individual mothers losing their sons. The destroyer comes 'at midday' (batstsahorayim) — the most unexpected time, when people feel safest. The word behalot ('terrors, sudden confusions') suggests panic so overwhelming that all ordered thought collapses.

9. The 'mother of seven' represents the most blessed woman in Israelite culture — seven sons was the fullness of maternal blessing (cf. Ruth 4:15, 1 Samuel 2:5). Even she is undone. The phrase ba'ah shimshah be'od yomam ('her sun has set while it is still day') is a powerful image of premature death and untimely catastrophe — the natural order of day and night is violated. The survivors (she'eritam) face the sword — there is no escape route. The ne'um YHWH formula seals the pronouncement as divine decree.
10. Jeremiah's first major confession begins here. The cry oi li immi ('woe to me, my mother') is directed not at God but at his mother — it is a lament over existence itself, anticipating the fuller birth-curse of 20:14-18. The words riv ('conflict, legal dispute') and madon ('contention, strife') characterize Jeremiah's entire life as one long quarrel. The usury reference is significant: lending disputes were the most common source of social conflict in ancient Israel. Jeremiah has not created enemies through financial dealings — his enemies come solely from his prophetic calling.
11. This verse is notoriously difficult in Hebrew, with multiple possible readings. The verb sheritikha may come from sharah ('to set free, to loose') or sharar ('to strengthen'). We follow the reading 'set you free for good purpose,' which fits the context of Jeremiah's complaint about his unwanted calling. The verb hifga'ti ('I caused to encounter, I made plead') suggests God orchestrating circumstances so that even enemies must acknowledge Jeremiah — as will happen when Nebuchadnezzar gives Jeremiah favorable treatment (39:11-12).
12. This enigmatic verse is among the most debated in Jeremiah. The 'iron from the north' (barzel mitstsafon) likely refers to Babylon, the enemy from the north (cf. 1:14, 4:6, 6:1). The rhetorical question implies that ordinary iron cannot break the hardened northern iron — Judah cannot resist Babylon. Some read this as reassurance to Jeremiah: his enemies cannot break him because God has made him iron and bronze (1:18). The brevity and ambiguity may be deliberate.
13. The address shifts to Judah collectively. The phrase lo vimchir ('without price, for nothing') means the plunder will be given freely to the enemy — Judah's wealth has no redemptive value. The comprehensive phrase bekhoh-gevulekha ('in all your borders') means no corner of the land will be spared. This verse closely parallels 17:3, suggesting it may be a fragmentary oracle inserted here.
14. The phrase erets lo yada'ta ('a land you do not know') is the dread of exile — being uprooted from the promised land to an alien place. The fire of God's anger (esh qadchah be'appi) is a standard prophetic image, but here the verb tuqad ('it will burn') is in the hophal passive — the fire burns on its own, sustained by God's settled fury rather than momentary anger. Some manuscripts and versions read 'I will make your enemies pass over you' rather than 'I will make you pass with your enemies,' affecting whether this is about exile or invasion.
15. Jeremiah's prayer resumes with direct address to God. Three imperatives — zokhrenei ('remember me'), poqdeni ('attend to me, visit me'), hinnaqem ('avenge me') — escalate in intensity from memory to action to vengeance. The plea al-le'erekh appekha tiqqacheni ('in your patience do not take me away') is paradoxical: God's patience with the wicked means extended suffering for the prophet. Jeremiah asks God not to let his own long-suffering become the prophet's death sentence. The phrase se'eti alekha cherpah ('I bear reproach for your sake') makes the claim explicit — Jeremiah suffers because he carries God's message.
16. The image of 'finding' and 'devouring' God's words (nimtse'u devarekha va'okhlam) is among the most powerful descriptions of prophetic calling in scripture. The verb akhal ('to eat, devour') suggests not casual reading but total internalization — the word becomes part of the prophet's body. Ezekiel will enact this literally by eating a scroll (Ezekiel 2:8-3:3). The phrase niqra shimkha alai ('your name has been called over me') is covenant-possession language — Jeremiah belongs to God the way a wife bears her husband's name or a city bears its conqueror's. This verse stands in agonizing tension with the surrounding lament — God's word is simultaneously Jeremiah's greatest joy and the cause of all his suffering.
17. The word badad ('alone, in isolation') is the same word that opens Lamentations: 'How the city sits alone' (eikhah yashvah badad). Jeremiah's personal isolation prefigures Jerusalem's desolation. The prophet's solitude is not chosen but imposed — mippenei yadkha ('because of your hand') means God's power kept him apart from normal human community. The mesachaqim ('those who laugh, revelers') represent ordinary social life that is denied to the prophet. The word za'am ('indignation, wrath') is the divine fury that fills Jeremiah — he carries God's anger inside himself, making human fellowship impossible.
18. The accusation reaches its peak: Jeremiah compares God to an akhazav — a wadi that appears to hold water but runs dry when you need it most. In the arid Judean landscape, a deceptive wadi could mean death for a thirsty traveler. The phrase mayim lo ne'emanu ('waters that cannot be trusted') uses the root a-m-n, from which 'faithfulness' (emunah) and 'amen' derive. Jeremiah is accusing God of being un-amen, unfaithful — the most devastating charge a covenant partner can make. The word netsach ('perpetual, unending') suggests Jeremiah sees no end to his suffering.
19. This verse is the theological center of the confession. The verb shuv appears three times: im tashuv ('if you return'), va'ashivkha ('I will restore you' — the causative hiphil of shuv), and yashuvu ('they will return'). God demands of Jeremiah the same repentance he demands of Israel. The phrase kefi tihyeh ('you will be as my mouth') is the most intimate description of prophetic calling in the Hebrew Bible — the prophet becomes God's mouth, the organ through which divine speech enters the world. The distinction between 'precious' (yaqar) and 'worthless' (zolel) may refer to separating genuine divine words from the prophet's own despairing complaints.
20. This promise directly reprises the commissioning language of 1:18, where God told the young Jeremiah, 'I have made you a fortified city, an iron pillar, and bronze walls.' The conditional promise of verse 19 becomes unconditional here — once Jeremiah returns, God will fortify him. The verbs lehoshi'akha ('to save you') and lehattsilekha ('to deliver you') are the same pair used for God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt. The prophet receives the same covenantal protection once reserved for the whole nation. The formula ne'um YHWH seals this as irrevocable divine commitment.
21. The chapter ends with two parallel promises: hitsaltikha ('I will rescue you') and peditikha ('I will redeem you'). The verb padah ('redeem') is ransom language — God will pay the price to free Jeremiah from his enemies. The ra'im ('wicked') and aritsim ('ruthless, violent ones') likely refer to Jeremiah's own countrymen who want him dead, not foreign enemies. The divine promise bookends the confession: Jeremiah began by lamenting his birth (v. 10), and God ends by guaranteeing his survival. The suffering will not end, but neither will God's protection.

Summary: Jeremiah 16 turns the prophet's own life into a prophetic sign-act. God forbids Jeremiah from marrying, from attending funerals, and from joining feasts — his enforced isolation embodies the coming destruction of all normal life in Judah. The reason given is devastating: death will be so pervasive that mourning itself will become impossible. Yet the chapter pivots in verses 14-15 toward a startling promise — a future restoration so great it will eclipse even the exodus from Egypt as Israel's defining story. The chapter closes with a vision of the nations themselves coming to acknowledge the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most personally costly passages in the prophetic literature. Jeremiah is not merely told what to say — he is told how to live. His celibacy, his absence from mourning rites, and his refusal of feasts are not personal choices but divine commands that make his body a walking oracle. The prohibition against marriage (v. 2) is extraordinary in ancient Israelite culture, where marriage and children were fundamental to covenant identity and legacy. The 'second exodus' oracle (vv. 14-15) is one of the most consequential prophetic declarations in the book — it recasts Israel's entire story around a future act of divine rescue that will surpass the original exodus. The closing universalist vision (vv. 19-21) anticipates the nations recognizing the LORD, an eschatological theme that runs through Isaiah and the Psalms.

Translation Friction: The verb shanah ('to repeat, to do again') in verse 18 is rendered 'repay double' following the Hebrew construct mishneh, which indicates a twofold measure — this is judicial compensation language, not arbitrary punishment. The word marzeach ('mourning feast') in verse 5 refers to a specific type of communal funeral banquet known from Amos 6:7 and Ugaritic literature — it is more than generic mourning. The transition from judgment (vv. 1-13) to hope (vv. 14-15) is abrupt in the Hebrew, with no narrative bridge, and we preserved this structural tension rather than smoothing it. The phrase elohei massekhah ('gods of molten metal') in verse 20 required distinguishing manufactured idols from the living God.

Connections: The prohibition against marriage as prophetic sign connects to Hosea's commanded marriage (Hosea 1:2) and Ezekiel's prohibited mourning for his wife (Ezekiel 24:15-18) — all three prophets' personal lives become divine messages. The 'second exodus' oracle (vv. 14-15) is repeated nearly verbatim in 23:7-8 and connects to Isaiah's 'new exodus' theme (Isaiah 43:18-19). The image of sin 'engraved' anticipates the iron-stylus metaphor of 17:1. The closing vision of nations turning to the LORD connects to Isaiah 2:2-4, Micah 4:1-3, and Zechariah 8:20-23. The 'iron furnace' of Egypt (implicit in the exodus reference) echoes 11:4.

¹The word of the LORD came to me: ²You must not take a wife for yourself, and you must not have sons or daughters in this place. ³For this is what the LORD says concerning the sons and daughters born in this place, and concerning the mothers who bear them and the fathers who sire them in this land: ⁴They will die of deadly diseases. No one will mourn for them, and no one will bury them. They will become like dung on the surface of the ground. They will be consumed by sword and by famine, and their corpses will become food for the birds of the sky and the animals of the earth. ⁵For this is what the LORD says: Do not enter a house of mourning. Do not go to grieve, and do not show sympathy for them, for I have withdrawn my peace from this people, declares the LORD — my faithful love and my compassion. ⁶Both great and small will die in this land. They will not be buried, and no one will mourn for them. No one will gash themselves or shave their heads for them. ⁷No one will break bread for them in mourning to comfort them for the dead, and no one will give them the cup of consolation to drink for their father or for their mother. ⁸You must not enter a house of feasting to sit with them, eating and drinking. ⁹For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am about to silence in this place — before your very eyes and in your own days — the sound of joy and the sound of gladness, the sound of the bridegroom and the sound of the bride. ¹⁰When you report all these words to this people and they ask you, 'Why has the LORD pronounced all this great disaster against us? What is our iniquity? What is our sin that we have committed against the LORD our God?' — ¹¹then say to them: Because your ancestors abandoned me, declares the LORD, and went after other gods and served them and bowed down to them — they abandoned me and did not keep my instruction — ¹²And you — you have done worse than your ancestors! Each of you walks after the stubbornness of his evil heart, refusing to listen to me. ¹³So I will hurl you from this land into a land that neither you nor your ancestors have known, and there you will serve other gods day and night, for I will show you no favor. ¹⁴Therefore — days are coming, declares the LORD, when it will no longer be said, 'As the LORD lives, who brought the children of Israel up from the land of Egypt,' ¹⁵but rather, 'As the LORD lives, who brought the children of Israel up from the land of the north and from all the lands where he had driven them.' For I will bring them back to their own soil that I gave to their ancestors. ¹⁶I am about to send for many fishermen, declares the LORD, and they will catch them. After that, I will send for many hunters, and they will hunt them down from every mountain and every hill and from the crevices of the rocks. ¹⁷For my eyes are on all their ways. They are not hidden from my presence, and their iniquity is not concealed from my sight. ¹⁸But first I will repay double for their iniquity and their sin, because they have profaned my land with the carcasses of their detestable idols, and they have filled my inheritance with their abominations. ¹⁹O LORD, my strength and my stronghold, my refuge in the day of distress — to you the nations will come from the ends of the earth and say, 'Our ancestors inherited nothing but falsehood, worthless things in which there is no benefit.' ²⁰Can a human being make gods for himself? They are not gods at all! ²¹Therefore — this time I will make them know. I will make them know my hand and my might, and they will know that my name is the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. Hebrew le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon introducing direct speech, following TCR convention.
2. The prohibition against marriage is unprecedented among the prophets. In ancient Israel, marriage and children were not optional social customs but covenantal obligations — to remain unmarried was to cut off one's name and legacy. God transforms Jeremiah's enforced celibacy into a prophetic sign: if the coming destruction will make family life impossible, then the prophet's unmarried life already testifies to what is coming. The verb tiqach ('take') is the standard marriage verb in Hebrew.
3. The fourfold listing — sons, daughters, mothers, fathers — emphasizes that the coming judgment encompasses every family member, every generation. The verb molidim ('who beget/sire') and yoldot ('who bear') together cover the full biological reality of parenthood. The verse serves as the heading for the devastating death oracle that follows.
4. The phrase memotei tachaluim ('deaths of diseases') uses an unusual plural construct — 'deaths' plural suggests multiple kinds of gruesome dying. The denial of burial is among the most severe curses in the ancient Near East (cf. Deuteronomy 28:26). Being left as domen ('dung') on the ground is deliberately degrading — human bodies reduced to fertilizer. The pairing of sword and famine reflects siege conditions. The exposure to scavenging birds and animals echoes the covenant-curse language of Deuteronomy 28:26.
5. The word marzeach ('mourning feast') refers to a specific communal funeral banquet attested in Amos 6:7 and Ugaritic texts — a ritually structured gathering where mourners ate and drank together in honor of the dead. God forbids Jeremiah from participating in this fundamental social obligation. The three terms withdrawn — shalom, chesed, rachamim — form a comprehensive triad of divine favor. Each represents a different dimension of God's care: shalom is relational wholeness, chesed is covenantal loyalty, rachamim is emotional tenderness. Their removal is total abandonment.
6. The practices of gashing the body (yitgodad) and shaving the head (yiqqareach) were customary mourning rites in the ancient Near East, though Deuteronomy 14:1 prohibits them for Israel. Their mention here is descriptive of common practice rather than endorsement — even these extreme expressions of grief will be absent because death will be too pervasive for individual mourning. The social order collapses: 'great and small' covers every class.
7. The verb yifresu ('break, divide') refers to the breaking and sharing of bread at a mourning meal — a communal act of consolation. The 'cup of consolation' (kos tanchumim) was a ritual drink offered to mourners, attested in later Jewish mourning customs. Both the bread and the cup represent the community's role in sustaining the bereaved. Their absence signals the collapse of communal solidarity — not just death but the death of mourning itself.
8. The third prohibition: no mourning feasts (v. 5), no funerals (v. 6-7), and now no celebrations either. Jeremiah's social isolation is total — he is cut off from both sorrow and joy. The beit mishteh ('house of feasting') refers to wedding banquets and other festive gatherings. The prophet's enforced absence from celebration parallels his absence from mourning.
9. The fourfold 'sound of' (qol) creates a rhythmic litany of everything that will be lost: joy, gladness, the bridegroom's voice, the bride's voice. This same formula recurs in 7:34, 25:10, and 33:11 as a signature judgment marker throughout Jeremiah. The phrase 'before your very eyes and in your own days' makes the judgment inescapably personal — this is not a distant threat but an imminent reality for the current generation.
10. The people's question reveals shocking moral blindness — they genuinely do not understand what they have done wrong. The Hebrew distinguishes between avon ('iniquity' — the twisted guilt of moral corruption) and chattat ('sin' — the failure to hit the mark of God's standard). They claim innocence on both counts. God's response in the following verses will be devastating in its specificity.

11. God's answer matches the people's twofold question with a twofold accusation: they abandoned God (relational failure) and did not keep his torah (behavioral failure). The verb azavu ('abandoned') appears twice, framing the sentence — abandonment is both the first and last charge. Torah is rendered 'instruction' here rather than 'law' to capture its broader meaning as divine teaching, not merely legal code.
12. The emphatic pronoun ve'attem ('and you') creates an accusatory contrast — your ancestors were bad, but you are worse. The characteristic Jeremic phrase sherirut libbo hara ('stubbornness of his evil heart') recurs here (cf. 3:17, 7:24, 9:13, 11:8, 13:10, 18:12, 23:17). The present generation's guilt exceeds the ancestors' because they have the full record of prior judgment as warning and still persist.
13. The verb hetalti ('I will hurl, cast') is violent — not a gentle sending but a forcible ejection from the land. The bitter irony: since they chose to serve other gods voluntarily, in exile they will serve other gods by compulsion — 'day and night,' without rest. The phrase 'a land that neither you nor your ancestors have known' emphasizes the total foreignness of exile. Chaninah ('favor, grace') will be withheld entirely.
14. The abrupt transition from judgment to hope is characteristic of Jeremiah's literary structure. The oath formula chai-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') was used in solemn declarations; here God says even this foundational oath — rooted in the exodus — will be superseded by a greater act of deliverance. This oracle (vv. 14-15) is repeated nearly verbatim in 23:7-8, indicating its importance in Jeremiah's theology.
15. The phrase erets tsafon ('land of the north') refers primarily to Babylon, which was reached by traveling north along the Fertile Crescent despite being geographically east of Judah. The addition 'from all the lands' universalizes the promise beyond Babylon to any future diaspora. The verb hashivotim ('I will bring them back') uses the root shuv, which is Jeremiah's key theological verb — the same word used for repentance, return, and restoration. The 'soil' (adamah) rather than 'land' (erets) is used here, emphasizing the agricultural, intimate connection between people and their ground.
16. The fishermen-and-hunters imagery depicts the thoroughness of God's judgment — no one will escape. The fishermen sweep broadly (nets), the hunters pursue individually into terrain where fugitives hide. The progression from fish to game suggests escalating pursuit: first the easy catches, then the ones who flee to mountains, hills, and rock crevices. Some interpreters read this as describing the agents of exile (Babylonian armies); others see a positive image of God gathering his scattered people. The immediate context of judgment favors the first reading, though the proximity to vv. 14-15 allows for deliberate ambiguity.
17. The double negative — 'not hidden... not concealed' — emphasizes the impossibility of evading divine observation. The words nisteru ('hidden') and nitson ('concealed, stored up') suggest that the people may have imagined their sins were invisible to God. The verse functions as the theological rationale for the fishermen and hunters of v. 16 — divine omniscience ensures total accountability.
18. The phrase mishneh avonam ('double their iniquity') uses mishneh to indicate a twofold repayment — judicial compensation proportional to the offense, following the pattern of double restitution in Exodus 22:4,7,9. The word nivlat ('carcasses') applied to idols is deliberately degrading — the 'detestable things' (shiqquts) are treated as corpses polluting the land. God calls the land 'my land' and 'my inheritance' (nachalati), emphasizing that the defilement offends the landowner.
19. The verse shifts abruptly from judgment on Judah to an eschatological vision of the nations recognizing the LORD. The triad uzzi, ma'uzzi, menusi ('my strength, my stronghold, my refuge') is Jeremiah's personal confession embedded within a universal prophecy. The nations' confession — that their ancestors inherited sheqer ('falsehood') and hevel ('vapor, emptiness') — echoes the language of Ecclesiastes and anticipates the universalist vision of Isaiah 45:22-23 and Zechariah 8:20-23.
20. The rhetorical question exposes the absurdity of idolatry with devastating simplicity: a being who makes a god is by definition greater than the god he makes. The word adam ('human being') is used rather than ish ('man') to emphasize the creaturely status of the maker — a mere creature fashioning what he calls a deity. The emphatic denial hemmah lo elohim ('they are not gods') is a fundamental theological claim: manufactured objects cannot possess divinity.
21. The threefold repetition of the root yada ('know') drives the verse — modia'am, odia'em, veyade'u ('I will make them know, I will make them know, and they will know'). The emphatic repetition insists that ignorance of God will be replaced by undeniable awareness. 'My hand' (yadi) represents God's active intervention in history; 'my might' (gevurati) represents his irresistible power. The closing declaration — 'my name is the LORD' — recalls the self-revelation to Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:15) and reasserts divine identity at the end of a chapter about false gods.

Summary: Jeremiah 17 moves through four distinct sections that together form a meditation on the human heart and its relationship to God. It opens with the stunning image of Judah's sin engraved with an iron stylus on the tablet of their heart (17:1) — the opposite of the torah-on-the-heart promise of 31:33. The chapter then contrasts the cursed person who trusts in human strength (17:5-6) with the blessed person who trusts in the LORD, planted like a tree by water (17:7-8, echoing Psalm 1). At the center stands one of the most famous verses in the Hebrew Bible: 'The heart is deceitful above all things and desperately sick — who can understand it?' (17:9). Jeremiah's personal confession-prayer appears in 17:14-18, and the chapter closes with a Sabbath observance oracle (17:19-27).

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains some of the most psychologically penetrating language in the entire Hebrew Bible. The iron-stylus metaphor of verse 1 inverts the later promise of 31:33 — where God will write his instruction on hearts of flesh, here sin has already been engraved on hearts of stone. The tree-by-water image (vv. 7-8) is so close to Psalm 1:3 that the relationship between the texts has been debated for centuries — whether Jeremiah drew on the psalm, the psalm drew on Jeremiah, or both drew on a common wisdom tradition. Verse 9's diagnosis of the human heart — aqov ('deceitful, twisted') and anush ('desperately sick, incurable') — is among the most unsparing anthropological statements in Scripture. Jeremiah's confession in verse 14, 'Heal me, LORD, and I will be healed; save me and I will be saved,' has entered Jewish liturgy (the eighth blessing of the Amidah).*

Translation Friction: *The word aqov in verse 9 is the same root as the name Ya'aqov (Jacob, 'the heel-grasper, the supplanter') — whether this is deliberate wordplay connecting Judah's heart to their ancestor's character is debated, and we noted it without forcing the interpretation. The relationship between the tree imagery (vv. 5-8) and Psalm 1 required careful rendering: the passages are related but not identical, and the differences matter. The Sabbath oracle (vv. 19-27) is sometimes regarded as a later addition by scholars because of its prose style and Deuteronomic language — we translate what the text says without editorial judgment on dating. The word et in verse 1 ('stylus' or 'pen') is rare and its exact referent debated.*

Connections: The iron-stylus image (v. 1) anticipates by contrast the new covenant inscription of 31:33 — sin engraved on stone versus torah written on flesh. The tree-by-water passage (vv. 7-8) connects to Psalm 1:3, Ezekiel 47:12, and Revelation 22:2. Verse 9's heart-diagnosis connects to 11:20 and 20:12 where God 'tests the heart.' Jeremiah's confession (vv. 14-18) belongs to the series of prophetic confessions running through chapters 11-20. The Sabbath oracle connects to the broader Deuteronomic tradition (Deuteronomy 5:12-15) and to Nehemiah 13:15-22. The cursing-and-blessing contrast (vv. 5-8) echoes Deuteronomy 28 and Psalm 1.

¹The sin of Judah is inscribed with an iron stylus, with a diamond-tipped point. It is engraved on the tablet of their heart and on the horns of their altars — ²even as their children remember their altars and their Asherah poles beside every green tree on the high hills. ³My mountain in the open country — your wealth and all your treasures I will give as plunder, your high places as the price of sin throughout all your territory. ⁴You will lose your grip on the inheritance I gave you, and I will make you serve your enemies in a land you do not know, for you have kindled a fire in my anger that will burn without end. ⁵This is what the LORD says: Cursed is the person who trusts in human strength, who makes flesh his arm, and whose heart turns away from the LORD. ⁶He will be like a shrub in the desert wasteland — he will not see when good arrives. He will dwell among the scorched places of the wilderness, in a salt land where no one lives. ⁷Blessed is the person who trusts in the LORD, whose confidence is the LORD himself. ⁸He will be like a tree planted beside water that sends its roots out toward the stream. It does not fear when heat comes, and its leaves remain green. In a year of drought it has no anxiety, and it never stops producing fruit. ⁹The heart is more twisted than anything else and incurably sick — who can fathom it? ¹⁰I, the LORD, search the heart and test the mind, to give to each person according to his ways, according to the fruit of his deeds. ¹¹Like a partridge that broods over eggs it did not lay, so is the one who gains wealth unjustly. In the middle of his days it will abandon him, and in the end he will be a fool. ¹²A throne of glory, exalted from the beginning — that is the place of our sanctuary. ¹³O LORD, the hope of Israel — all who abandon you will be put to shame. Those who turn away will be written in the dust, for they have abandoned the LORD, the fountain of living water. ¹⁴Heal me, LORD, and I will be healed. Save me, and I will be saved — for you are my praise. ¹⁵Look — they keep saying to me, 'Where is the word of the LORD? Let it come!' ¹⁶As for me, I have not rushed away from shepherding after you, and I have not longed for the day of calamity. You know this — whatever came from my lips was spoken before your face. ¹⁷Do not become a source of terror to me — you are my refuge in the day of disaster. ¹⁸Let my persecutors be put to shame, but do not let me be put to shame. Let them be shattered, but do not let me be shattered. Bring upon them the day of disaster, and break them with a double breaking. ¹⁹This is what the LORD said to me: Go and stand in the gate of the people, through which the kings of Judah enter and leave, and in all the gates of Jerusalem. ²⁰Say to them: Hear the word of the LORD, you kings of Judah, and all of Judah, and all inhabitants of Jerusalem who enter through these gates. ²¹This is what the LORD says: Guard your lives — do not carry any load on the Sabbath day or bring it through the gates of Jerusalem. ²²Do not carry any load out of your houses on the Sabbath day, and do not do any work. Consecrate the Sabbath day, just as I commanded your ancestors. ²³But they did not listen. They did not incline their ear. They stiffened their neck, refusing to hear and refusing to accept correction. ²⁴If you truly listen to me, declares the LORD, and bring no load through the gates of this city on the Sabbath day, and if you consecrate the Sabbath day by doing no work on it, ²⁵then kings and officials who sit on the throne of David will enter through the gates of this city, riding in chariots and on horses — they and their officials, along with the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem — and this city will be inhabited forever. ²⁶People will come from the cities of Judah and the surroundings of Jerusalem, from the land of Benjamin, from the lowlands, from the hill country, and from the Negev, bringing burnt offerings and sacrifices, grain offerings and frankincense, and bringing thank offerings to the house of the LORD. ²⁷But if you do not listen to me — to consecrate the Sabbath day, to carry no load and enter the gates of Jerusalem on the Sabbath day — then I will kindle a fire in her gates, and it will consume the fortified buildings of Jerusalem and will not be extinguished.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word et ('stylus, pen') in its iron form suggests a chisel for cutting into stone or metal — this is permanent inscription, not ink on parchment. Tsipporen shamir ('diamond-tipped point' or 'point of flint/emery') refers to an extremely hard material used for engraving — shamir may be corundum, emery, or diamond. The phrase luach libbam ('tablet of their heart') creates a devastating contrast with the stone tablets (luchot) of the law given at Sinai. The same surface that should bear God's commandments instead bears an engraved record of sin. This image is the negative counterpart to 31:33, where God promises to write his torah on the heart.
2. The 'remembering' (kizkhor) here is not nostalgic recall but active perpetuation — the children continue the idolatrous practices. The asherim ('Asherah poles') were cultic objects associated with the Canaanite goddess Asherah, set up as sacred pillars near altars. 'Green tree' and 'high hills' are stock phrases for the locations of illicit worship (cf. Deuteronomy 12:2, 1 Kings 14:23). The verse continues the thought from verse 1 — sin is inscribed not only on hearts but transmitted to the next generation.
3. The phrase harari basadeh ('my mountain in the field/open country') is addressed to Jerusalem/Zion, which sits exposed on its hills. God calls it 'my mountain' even as he sentences it to plunder. The chelkha ('your wealth') and otsrotekha ('your treasures') will become spoil for invaders. The bamot ('high places') — the illicit worship sites — are specifically named as the cause: it is because of sin at these sites that everything will be lost.
4. The verb shamattah ('you will let drop, release') uses the same root as the sabbatical year release (shemittah) — the land will be 'released' from its inhabitants as if in a forced sabbatical. The phrase 'inheritance' (nachalatekha) refers to the promised land itself, which was God's gift. The image of fire kindled in divine anger (esh qedachtem be'appi) that burns ad olam ('to perpetuity/without end') expresses the terrible permanence of the consequences.
5. The gever ('mighty man, strong person') is specifically the person who should be strong — the word implies military capability or social power. The irony is that the person who relies on human strength is precisely the one who will be weakest. 'Flesh' (basar) as 'arm' (zero'a) is a metaphor for relying on human military or political alliances — particularly relevant to Judah's shifting alliances with Egypt and Babylon. The verb yasur ('turns away') from the root shuv frames this as apostasy, not mere preference.
6. The word ar'ar ('shrub, juniper, stunted bush') describes a stripped, bare plant barely surviving in arid conditions — the opposite of the flourishing tree in verse 8. The phrase lo yir'eh ki yavo tov ('he will not see when good comes') is especially poignant: blessing may arrive, but the one who trusts in flesh is incapable of perceiving or receiving it. The 'salt land' (eret melechah) is land so mineral-saturated that nothing grows — a landscape of permanent barrenness (cf. the salting of Sodom's soil, Genesis 19).
7. The parallel structure with verse 5 is precise and deliberate: arur haggever asher yivtach ba'adam (v. 5) mirrors barukh haggever asher yivtach ba-YHWH (v. 7). The choice is binary: trust in flesh or trust in the LORD. The word mivtacho ('his confidence, his trust') uses the same root as yivtach ('trusts') — creating a wordplay: the one who trusts has trust itself, because the LORD is both the object and the ground of confidence.

8. The tree image closely parallels Psalm 1:3, though with distinctive differences: Psalm 1 uses 'streams of water' (palgei mayim) while Jeremiah uses yuval ('watercourse, stream') and mayim ('water'). Psalm 1 emphasizes the tree's leaf not withering; Jeremiah adds the explicit mention of drought resistance and continuous fruit-bearing. The verb yid'ag ('worry, be anxious') is unique to this passage — the tree's freedom from anxiety is a metaphor for the believer's unshakable security. Whether Jeremiah drew on Psalm 1 or both drew on common wisdom tradition is debated; the differences suggest independent development from shared imagery rather than direct quotation.
9. We rendered aqov as 'twisted' rather than 'deceitful' (KJV) because the Hebrew root a-q-v means 'to follow at the heel, to supplant, to twist' — the deception is not mere lying but a fundamental twisting of reality. The word anush ('incurably sick') is rendered 'incurably sick' rather than 'desperately wicked' (KJV) because anush in its other occurrences (2 Samuel 12:15, Isaiah 17:11, Micah 1:9) consistently refers to sickness, not wickedness. The question mi yeda'ennu ('who can know/fathom it?') is rhetorical — the answer is implied in verse 10: only God can.
10. This verse answers the rhetorical question of verse 9: who can fathom the heart? The LORD can. The verb choqer ('search, examine, probe') implies thorough investigation, not casual observation. The word kelayot ('kidneys') is rendered 'mind' following TCR convention (cf. 11:20) — the Hebrews understood the kidneys as the seat of the deepest, most hidden thoughts and motives. The phrase 'fruit of his deeds' (peri ma'alalav) connects human actions to agricultural imagery — deeds produce consequences as naturally as trees produce fruit.
11. The qore ('partridge') was believed in the ancient Near East to sit on eggs stolen from other birds' nests — wealth gained unjustly is like hatching eggs that do not belong to you. The verb dagar ('brood, sit on, hatch') applies to the bird but metaphorically to the unjust wealthy person who 'sits on' stolen gains. The word naval ('fool') at the end carries moral weight in Hebrew — it does not mean merely unintelligent but morally bankrupt, senseless in the deepest way (cf. Nabal in 1 Samuel 25).
12. This verse functions as a doxological exclamation — Jeremiah turns from the futility of unjust wealth (v. 11) to the permanence of God's throne. The phrase kisse kavod ('throne of glory') combines royal and divine imagery. Marom me-rishon ('exalted from the beginning') may refer to the heavenly temple's pre-existence or to the Jerusalem temple's ancient sanctity. The word miqdashenu ('our sanctuary') uses the first-person plural possessive — Jeremiah identifies himself with the people even as he condemns them.
13. The word miqveh ('hope') is a wordplay — it also means 'gathering of water, reservoir' (cf. Genesis 1:10), connecting to the 'fountain of living water' (meqor mayim chayyim) at the verse's end. Those who leave the source of living water will be 'written in the dust' (ba'arets yikkatavu) — their names inscribed in dry earth rather than in the book of life, an inscription as impermanent as writing in sand. The 'fountain of living water' metaphor for God also appears in 2:13, where God contrasts himself with the broken cisterns of idolatry.
14. The verbal structure refa'eni...ve'erafei ('heal me...and I will be healed') uses the imperative followed by the cohortative to express consequence: divine healing produces real healing. The same structure with hoshi'eni...ve'ivvashe'ah ('save me...and I will be saved') creates a perfect parallelism. This verse marks the beginning of Jeremiah's fourth 'confession' (17:14-18). After the unflinching diagnosis of the heart in verse 9, Jeremiah turns to the only physician capable of treating the condition.
15. The taunt from Jeremiah's opponents mocks the delay of judgment: if the LORD truly spoke through Jeremiah, where is the fulfillment? The demand yavo na ('let it come, then!') is sarcastic — they dare the prophecy to come true. This challenge to prophetic credibility was a constant burden for Jeremiah, whose predictions of destruction took decades to materialize. The participle omrim ('they keep saying') indicates ongoing, repeated mockery.
16. Jeremiah defends himself before God: he did not abandon his prophetic calling (lo atsti mero'eh acharekha — 'I did not rush away from shepherding after you'), and he did not desire the disaster he predicted (yom anush — 'the day of incurable [sickness/calamity]'). The word anush echoes verse 9's diagnosis — the day of calamity is characterized by the same incurable condition as the human heart. The phrase motsa sefatai ('what came from my lips') appeals to God as witness that Jeremiah's words were genuine prophecy, spoken nokhach panekha ('before your face, in your presence').
17. The plea 'do not become a source of terror to me' (al tiyeh li lemechittah) is startlingly honest — Jeremiah acknowledges the possibility that God himself could become terrifying to him. The word mechittah ('terror, ruin, dismay') suggests not just fear but shattering — the prophet fears being broken by the God he serves. Yet he simultaneously calls God machasi ('my refuge') — the tension between terror and refuge defines Jeremiah's experience of prophetic ministry.
18. The imprecatory prayer follows the pattern of the psalms of individual lament. The chiasmic structure — 'let them be shamed / not me be shamed / let them be shattered / not me be shattered' — creates a formal petition for God to distinguish between the prophet and his enemies. The phrase mishneh shivron ('double breaking') intensifies the request beyond mere justice — Jeremiah asks for emphatic, doubled judgment on those who persecute him. The verb shavar ('break, shatter') is repeated for emphasis (shivron shavrem — 'a breaking, break them').
19. The 'gate of the people' (sha'ar benei ha'am) was likely a specific gate in the Jerusalem wall — its exact identification is debated (some identify it with the Benjamin Gate). The instruction to stand 'in' the gate places Jeremiah at the most public location possible — gates were the centers of commerce, law, and civic life. The mention of 'kings of Judah' entering and leaving indicates this was a royal thoroughfare, ensuring maximum visibility for the prophetic message.
20. The address encompasses all levels of society: kings (political leadership), all Judah (the nation), and all inhabitants of Jerusalem (the capital's residents). The phrase 'who enter through these gates' grounds the universal address in the specific, physical location — these are not abstract recipients but real people passing through a real gate on a given day.

21. The phrase hishameru benafshoteikhem ('guard your lives/souls') is emphatic — Sabbath observance is presented not as a minor ritual but as a matter of life and death. The word massa ('load, burden, cargo') refers to commercial goods being transported for trade. The gates of Jerusalem are the entry points for commerce — the prohibition targets the reduction of Sabbath to an ordinary business day. This Sabbath oracle (vv. 19-27) is one of the few extended Sabbath passages in the prophetic literature.
22. The verb qiddashtem ('consecrate, set apart as holy') uses the same root as qadosh ('holy'). To consecrate the Sabbath is to set it apart from ordinary time — to treat it as belonging to God rather than to commerce. The phrase 'as I commanded your ancestors' explicitly connects this instruction to the Sinai covenant (Exodus 20:8-11, Deuteronomy 5:12-15). The pairing of 'houses' with 'gates' (v. 21) covers both domestic and commercial activity.
23. The triple refusal — lo shame'u ('did not listen'), lo hittu et oznam ('did not incline their ear'), vayyaqshu et orpam ('stiffened their neck') — escalates from passive non-hearing to active resistance. The 'stiff neck' (oref qasheh) is a characteristic biblical metaphor for stubbornness, drawn from the image of an ox that refuses to turn when the yoke is pulled (cf. Exodus 32:9, 33:3). The word musar ('correction, discipline, instruction') encompasses both education and discipline — they rejected God's teaching and his corrective action alike.
24. The emphatic infinitive absolute construction shamoa tishme'u ('truly listen, really listen') stresses that genuine obedience is required, not token compliance. This begins a conditional promise (vv. 24-26): if the people observe the Sabbath, then Jerusalem will endure. The conditional structure offers a genuine choice — the future is still open if the people respond.
25. The vision of Davidic royalty entering through Jerusalem's gates represents the continuation of the covenant dynasty. The word sarim ('officials, princes, commanders') appears twice, emphasizing the full apparatus of legitimate governance. The phrase yoshvei al kisse David ('sitting on the throne of David') invokes the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7:12-16). The promise that the city will be inhabited le'olam ('forever') is conditional — it depends on the 'if' of verse 24.
26. The geographic sweep — cities of Judah, surroundings of Jerusalem, Benjamin, the Shephelah (lowlands), the hill country, and the Negev (southern desert) — covers the entire territory of the kingdom. The list of offerings — olah (burnt offering), zevach (sacrifice), minchah (grain offering), levonah (frankincense), and todah (thank offering) — represents the full range of legitimate worship. This idealized vision depends on Sabbath observance: if the people honor God's holy time, the holy place will flourish.
27. The conditional threat mirrors the conditional promise of verses 24-26 with devastating precision: the same gates that could witness royal processions (v. 25) will instead be consumed by fire. The word armenot ('fortified buildings, palaces, citadels') refers to the great structures of Jerusalem — royal residences, administrative buildings, defensive fortifications. The phrase lo tikhbeh ('will not be extinguished') echoes the unquenchable fire of divine judgment throughout the prophets (cf. Isaiah 66:24, Amos 5:6). The fire entered Jerusalem's gates in 586 BCE when Nebuchadnezzar's army burned the city, fulfilling this conditional warning.

Summary: Jeremiah 18 opens with a divine command to visit the potter's house, where God reveals a foundational principle of his sovereignty: just as a potter reshapes marred clay, so God retains the right to reshape nations based on their response to him. This parable of conditional sovereignty applies in both directions — God may relent from intended disaster if a nation repents, or revoke intended blessing if a nation turns to evil. When this principle is applied to Judah, the people respond with defiant refusal, declaring they will follow their own plans. The chapter closes with Jeremiah's fourth confession (vv. 18-23), provoked by a plot against him: his enemies plan to attack him with their tongues and ignore his words. Jeremiah responds with one of the most unrestrained imprecatory prayers in Scripture, asking God to let their children starve and their wives become childless widows.

What Makes This Remarkable: The potter-and-clay metaphor is one of the most influential images in all of Scripture, reappearing in Isaiah 29:16, 45:9, and 64:8, and taken up by Paul in Romans 9:19-24. What makes Jeremiah's version distinctive is its conditionality — the potter is not locked into his design. The clay's quality determines what the potter makes. This challenges both fatalistic readings (God controls everything regardless of human action) and autonomous readings (humans determine their own destiny regardless of God). The confession in verses 18-23 is the fourth of Jeremiah's five confessions and the most violent in its demands for vengeance. The prophet who was commanded not to pray for his people (11:14) now prays against his enemies with shocking specificity — famine for their children, the sword for their young men, sudden ambush to catch them unaware. We preserved the raw ferocity of this prayer without softening, because the Hebrew does not soften it.

Translation Friction: The verb yatsar ('to form, fashion') in verse 4 is the same verb used of God forming humanity from clay in Genesis 2:7 — the intertextual echo is deliberate and we noted it. The phrase sheririut libbam hara ('stubbornness of their evil heart') in verse 12 is a locked Jeremianic formula recurring throughout the book. The imprecatory prayer in verses 19-23 required careful handling: the Hebrew verbs are jussives (wishes/commands) not indicatives (descriptions), so 'hand their children over to famine' is a prayer-wish, not a prediction. The word diggeru ('they have dug') in verse 20 uses the metaphor of digging a pit for someone, echoing Psalm 35:7 and 57:6.

Connections: The potter metaphor connects to Genesis 2:7 (God forms humanity from clay), Isaiah 29:16 and 45:9 (the pot arguing with the potter), Isaiah 64:8 ('we are the clay, you are the potter'), and Romans 9:19-24 (Paul's use of the potter image for divine election). The conditional principle of verses 7-10 is the theological foundation for Jonah's entire narrative — Nineveh repented, and God relented. The conspiracy against Jeremiah (v. 18) continues the pattern from 11:18-23 (Anathoth plot). The confession prayer (vv. 19-23) parallels Psalm 109 in its imprecatory intensity. The phrase 'land flowing with milk and honey' promised in the covenant is now a land whose roads are 'untrodden paths' (v. 15) — covenant blessings reversed.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²Get up and go down to the potter's house, and there I will make my words known to you. ³So I went down to the potter's house, and there he was, working at the wheel. ⁴When the vessel he was shaping from the clay became flawed in the potter's hands, he reworked it into a different vessel, whatever seemed right to the potter to make. ⁵Then the word of the LORD came to me: ⁶Can I not do with you as this potter does, O house of Israel? — declares the LORD. Like the clay in the potter's hand, so are you in my hand, O house of Israel. ⁷At one moment I may speak against a nation or a kingdom, to uproot, to tear down, and to destroy. ⁸If that nation turns from the evil I have spoken against, then I will relent from the disaster I had planned to bring upon it. ⁹And at another moment I may speak concerning a nation or a kingdom, to build and to plant. ¹⁰But if it does what is evil in my sight by not obeying my voice, then I will relent from the good I had intended to do for it. ¹¹Now then, speak to the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem: This is what the LORD says — I am shaping disaster against you and devising a plan against you. Turn back, each one of you, from your evil way, and set right your ways and your deeds. ¹²But they say, 'It is hopeless! We will follow our own plans, and each of us will act according to the stubbornness of his evil heart.' ¹³Therefore, this is what the LORD says: Ask among the nations — who has heard anything like this? The virgin Israel has done something utterly appalling. ¹⁴Does the snow vanish from the rocky crags of Lebanon? Do the cold, flowing waters from distant sources ever dry up? ¹⁵Yet my people have forgotten me. They burn incense to worthless things. They have been made to stumble from their ways, from the ancient paths, to walk on side trails, on an ungraded road — ¹⁶making their land a desolation, an object of perpetual scorn. Everyone who passes by it will be appalled and shake his head. ¹⁷Like an east wind I will scatter them before the enemy. I will show them my back, not my face, on the day of their disaster. ¹⁸Then they said, 'Come, let us plot schemes against Jeremiah — for instruction will never cease from the priest, nor counsel from the wise, nor the word from the prophet. Come, let us attack him with the tongue and pay no attention to any of his words.' ¹⁹Pay attention to me, LORD, and hear the voice of my accusers! ²⁰Should evil be repaid for good? For they have dug a pit for my life. Remember how I stood before you to speak on their behalf, to turn your wrath away from them. ²¹Therefore, hand their children over to famine and pour them out to the power of the sword. Let their wives become childless and widowed. Let their husbands be struck down by death, their young men cut down by the sword in battle. ²²Let a scream be heard from their houses when you bring raiders upon them without warning — for they have dug a pit to trap me and hidden snares for my feet. ²³But you, LORD, know all their plotting against me to kill me. Do not atone for their iniquity, and do not wipe out their sin from your sight. Let them be brought down before you — deal with them in the time of your anger.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') functions as a speech-introducer and is rendered as a colon rather than retained as a redundant word in English.
2. The verb yarad ('go down') indicates the potter's workshop was at a lower elevation — potters often worked near water sources in valleys. The word yotser ('potter, one who forms') comes from the root yatsar, the same verb used in Genesis 2:7 for God forming the human being from clay. The connection is not accidental — God is about to present himself as the cosmic Potter.

3. The Hebrew ovnayim ('the two stones') is a dual form referring to the potter's wheel, which consisted of two stone discs — a larger lower disc turned by foot and a smaller upper disc on which the clay was shaped. The dual form captures the physical construction of the ancient wheel.
4. The verb nishchat ('was marred, became spoiled') is a niph'al (passive) form — the clay itself resisted the intended shape, not that the potter made a mistake. The potter does not discard the clay but reshapes it (shav, 'he turned back, did again'). This is the theological point: God does not destroy the raw material but reforms it into something new. The phrase ka'asher yashar be'einei ('whatever seemed right in the eyes of') preserves the potter's sovereign discretion.
5. The standard prophetic word-reception formula, transitioning from the visual object lesson at the potter's house to its theological interpretation.
6. The rhetorical question expects an affirmative answer — of course God can. The comparison is direct: clay to potter as Israel to God. The metaphor asserts divine sovereignty without denying human responsibility — the following verses (7-10) make clear that the potter's decision responds to the clay's condition.
7. The three verbs — natosh ('uproot'), natots ('tear down'), and ha'avid ('destroy') — echo Jeremiah's commissioning in 1:10, where he was set over nations 'to uproot and to tear down, to destroy and to overthrow.' The language of Jeremiah's call is revealed as expressing God's general principle of dealing with nations, not just Judah specifically.
8. The verb nichamti ('I will relent, change my mind') is theologically significant — it does not mean God was wrong or fickle but that God's announced intentions are responsive to human action. This same verb is used of God 'relenting' in Exodus 32:14 (the golden calf) and Jonah 3:10 (Nineveh). The verb shav ('turns') is Jeremiah's key verb for repentance — here applied to any nation, not just Israel.
9. The verbs livnot ('to build') and linto'a ('to plant') are the positive counterparts to the destructive verbs in verse 7, again echoing Jeremiah 1:10. The principle works symmetrically — God's blessing is as conditional as his judgment.
10. The symmetry is now complete: verses 7-8 state that threatened judgment can be averted by repentance; verses 9-10 state that promised blessing can be revoked by disobedience. This bilateral conditionality is the theological heart of the chapter and a foundational principle of prophetic theology throughout the Hebrew Bible.
11. The verb yotser ('shaping, forming') is the same root as the potter — God is 'pottering' disaster, forming it on the wheel like a vessel. The wordplay is deliberate: the potter who forms vessels is now forming calamity. The call shuvu ('turn back, return') is the key Jeremiah verb for repentance, offering Judah the same possibility described for generic nations in verses 7-8.
12. The response no'ash ('it is hopeless, it is in vain') is devastating — the people do not argue with God's diagnosis but simply refuse to change. This is not ignorance but conscious defiance. They quote the Jeremic formula sherirut libbo hara ('stubbornness of his evil heart') about themselves, as though it were a badge of identity rather than a diagnosis. The verb na'aseh ('we will do') is emphatic — they are resolute in their rebellion.
13. The title betulat Yisra'el ('the virgin Israel') is an epithet of covenant intimacy — Israel was meant to be devoted exclusively to God, like a virgin pledged to one husband. The word sha'arurit ('horrible, appalling') is rare, appearing only here, in 5:30, and 23:14. Even pagan nations — who worship many gods — would find Israel's betrayal of her one God shocking.
14. This verse is textually difficult, and the Hebrew is compressed. The rhetorical questions expect a negative answer: no, the snow of Lebanon's peaks does not abandon the mountain; no, cold streams do not cease flowing. Nature is reliable — but Israel has abandoned her God, who is more constant than mountains and streams. The contrast between natural fidelity and Israel's infidelity is the point.
15. The phrase shvilei olam ('ancient paths') echoes Jeremiah 6:16 ('stand at the crossroads and look; ask for the ancient paths'). The word shav ('vanity, worthlessness, emptiness') describes the idols as literally 'nothing' — they burn incense to nonexistence. The contrast between the slelulah ('graded, built-up') highway of covenant obedience and the untrodden side trails of idolatry is vivid — the people have left the maintained road for pathless wilderness.
16. The word sheriqt ('hissing, whistling') describes the sound passersby make when confronted with shocking ruin — a sharp intake of breath or a low whistle of disbelief. The head-shaking (yanid bero'sho) is a gesture of scorn and horror. The land that was meant to flow with milk and honey becomes a roadside spectacle of devastation.
17. The east wind (ruach qadim) is the scorching sirocco from the desert — destructive and desiccating. Showing the back rather than the face is a reversal of the priestly blessing (Numbers 6:25, 'The LORD make his face shine upon you'). When God turns his face toward his people, it means favor and protection. When God shows his back, it means abandonment. The phrase 'day of their disaster' (yom eidam) anticipates the fall of Jerusalem.
18. This verse marks the beginning of Jeremiah's fourth confession (18:18-23). The enemies' logic is revealing: they believe the institutional sources of divine guidance — priest, sage, and prophet — will always be available, so one dissenting voice (Jeremiah) can safely be silenced. The phrase 'attack him with the tongue' (nakkeihu vallahon) means a campaign of slander and denunciation — character assassination rather than physical violence. Torah here means 'instruction' from the priest (its original sense) rather than the written Torah scroll.
19. Jeremiah shifts abruptly into direct prayer. The word yerivai ('my accusers, those who contend with me') is a legal term — riv means a lawsuit or formal dispute. Jeremiah frames his enemies as adversaries in a legal proceeding before the divine judge.

- 20. The verb karu ('they have dug') uses the common metaphor of digging a trap-pit for an enemy (cf. Psalm 35:7, 57:6). Jeremiah reminds God that he interceded for these very people — the same people now plotting against him. The phrase 'stood before you' (amdi lefanekha) is technical language for prophetic intercession, the posture of a mediator standing in God's presence to plead for others.
- 21. The imprecatory prayer begins in full force. Every verb is a jussive — a wish or demand, not a prediction. Jeremiah asks for total devastation of his enemies' families: children starving, wives bereaved and widowed, husbands killed, young men slaughtered. The verb hagirem ('pour them out') treats human lives like liquid poured out — a violent image of disposability. This prayer must not be softened; it reflects the raw anguish and rage of a prophet who has been betrayed by those he tried to save.
- 22. The cry (ze'aqah) is a scream of terror, not a call for help. The word gedud ('raiding band, troop') suggests a sudden military assault. The irony is deliberate: they dug a pit (shuchah) for Jeremiah, so God will spring a sudden attack on them. The trapping language — pit, snares — echoes verse 20 and connects to the broader psalmic tradition of enemies who fall into their own traps (Psalm 7:15-16).
- 23. The phrase al-tekapper ('do not atone for, do not cover') is extraordinary — Jeremiah asks God to refuse atonement for his enemies. The verb kaphar ('to cover, to atone') is the root of Yom Kippur. Jeremiah is asking God to leave their sin uncovered, fully visible, with no sacrificial remedy. Combined with al-timchi ('do not blot out'), this is a prayer for permanent, unmitigated guilt. The final phrase be'et appekha aseh vahem ('in the time of your anger, deal with them') leaves the specifics to God's wrath.

Summary: Jeremiah 19 is a prophetic sign-act — the most dramatic kind of oracle, where the prophet does not merely speak God's word but enacts it physically. God commands Jeremiah to buy a potter's earthenware flask (baqbuq), take elders and senior priests to the Valley of Ben-Hinnom at the Potsherd Gate, and shatter the flask while declaring that God will shatter Jerusalem and its people beyond repair. The oracle condemns child sacrifice at Topheth, the worship of foreign gods, and the shedding of innocent blood. The valley of slaughter will overflow with corpses, and the city will become a place of horror. The chapter ends with Jeremiah returning from Topheth to the temple court, where he repeats the judgment to all the people.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Chapter 19 forms a deliberate pair with chapter 18. In chapter 18, the clay on the potter's wheel is soft, malleable, and can be reshaped — symbolizing the possibility of repentance. In chapter 19, the clay has been fired into a hardened flask that cannot be reshaped — it can only be shattered. The people's refusal to repent (18:12) has moved them from soft clay to hardened pottery. The word baqbuq (flask) is onomatopoeic — it imitates the gurgling sound of liquid being poured from a narrow-necked jar, and its smashing would produce a sharp, irreversible crack. The condemnation of child sacrifice at Topheth echoes 7:31-32 almost verbatim, creating a structural bracket around chapters 7-19. We preserved the graphic violence of the descriptions — burning children, flesh eaten in siege cannibalism — because the Hebrew does not flinch, and neither should the rendering.*

Translation Friction: *The word baqbuq (v. 1) is distinct from the generic keli ('vessel') of chapter 18 — it is a specific type of narrow-necked pottery flask, and the distinction matters for the symbolism (a flask cannot be reshaped, only broken). The phrase sha'ar hacharsit ('Potsherd Gate,' v. 2) is named either because potsherd were discarded there or because potters worked nearby — both etymologies connect to the pottery imagery. The phrase 'eat the flesh of their sons and daughters' (v. 9) refers to siege cannibalism, attested historically in ancient Near Eastern texts and in the biblical account of 2 Kings 6:28-29. The closing verses (14-15) present Jeremiah moving from the valley back to the temple court, extending the oracle to all the people — this transition sets up the confrontation with Pashhur in chapter 20.*

Connections: The potter imagery connects directly to chapter 18 (soft clay to hard flask — the progression from potential reshaping to irreversible shattering). The Topheth condemnation reprises 7:31-32 nearly verbatim. Child sacrifice prohibitions connect to Leviticus 18:21 and 20:2-5 (Molech worship), Deuteronomy 12:31 and 18:10, and 2 Kings 23:10 (Josiah's reforms). The siege cannibalism warning echoes Deuteronomy 28:53-57 (covenant curses for disobedience) and is fulfilled in Lamentations 2:20 and 4:10. The sign-act of breaking parallels Isaiah 30:14 (a potter's vessel shattered beyond repair). The confrontation with Pashhur in 20:1-6 is the direct narrative consequence of 19:14-15.

¹This is what the LORD says: Go and buy an earthenware flask from a potter, and take some of the elders of the people and some of the senior priests with you. ²Then go out to the Valley of Ben-Hinnom, at the entrance of the Potsherd Gate, and proclaim there the words that I will speak to you. ³Say to them: Hear the word of the LORD, O kings of Judah and inhabitants of Jerusalem. This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says — I am about to bring such disaster on this place that the ears of everyone who hears of it will ring. ⁴Because they have abandoned me and made this place foreign by burning incense in it to other gods that neither they nor their ancestors nor the kings of Judah had known, and they have filled this place with the blood of the innocent. ⁵They have built the high places of Baal to burn their children in the fire as burnt offerings to Baal — something I never commanded, never spoke of, and never even considered. ⁶Therefore, the days are coming — declares the LORD — when this place will no longer be called Topheth, or the Valley of Ben-Hinnom, but the Valley of Slaughter. ⁷I will shatter the plans of Judah and Jerusalem in this place. I will make them fall by the sword before their enemies and by the hand of those who seek their lives. I will give their corpses as food to the birds of the sky and the animals of the earth. ⁸I will make this city a desolation and an object of scorn. Everyone who passes by it will be appalled and will hiss at all its wounds. ⁹I will make them eat the flesh of their sons and the flesh of their daughters, and each will eat the flesh of his neighbor during the siege and in the desperation that their enemies and those who seek their lives will inflict on them. ¹⁰Then you are to shatter the flask in the sight of the men who go with you, ¹¹and say to them: This is what the LORD of Hosts says — Just so will I shatter this people and this city, as one shatters a potter's vessel that can never be mended again. They will bury the dead in Topheth until there is no room left to bury. ¹²This is what I will do to this place — declares the LORD — and to its inhabitants: I will make this city like Topheth. ¹³The houses of Jerusalem and the houses of the kings of Judah will become defiled like the place of Topheth — all the houses on whose rooftops they burned incense to the whole host of heaven and poured out drink offerings to other gods. ¹⁴Then Jeremiah returned from Topheth, where the LORD had sent him to prophesy, and he stood in the court of the LORD's house and said to all the people: ¹⁵This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am about to bring upon this city and upon all its surrounding towns every disaster I have spoken against it, because they have stiffened their necks and refused to hear my words.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew baqbuq is a specific type of narrow-necked pottery flask — not a generic vessel. The word is onomatopoeic, imitating the gurgling sound of liquid poured from such a jar. This specificity matters: unlike the soft clay on the wheel in chapter 18, this flask has been fired and hardened. It cannot be reshaped. The elders and senior priests serve as official witnesses to the prophetic sign-act, giving it legal weight.
2. The Valley of Ben-Hinnom (gei ven-Hinnom) — later Gehenna — was the ravine south of Jerusalem associated with child sacrifice and later with divine judgment. The 'Potsherd Gate' (sha'ar hacharsit) is named either for discarded pottery fragments or for nearby potter's workshops — either way, the gate's name connects thematically to the flask Jeremiah carries. The Ketiv/Qere variant (hacharsit/hacharsut) does not change the meaning.
3. The phrase titstsalnah oznav ('his ears will ring/tingle') describes the physical sensation of hearing news so shocking that it produces a ringing in the ears. The same expression appears in 1 Samuel 3:11 (judgment on Eli's house) and 2 Kings 21:12 (judgment on Manasseh's Jerusalem). It marks the most severe category of divine pronouncement. The plural 'kings' may include the ruling king and crown prince, or may anticipate multiple reigns during the coming judgment period.
4. The verb vayenakkeru ('they made foreign, they estranged') is striking — the holy valley has been turned into alien territory by the worship of gods that are themselves alien to Israel's history. The phrase dam neqi'im ('blood of innocents') refers both to child sacrifice and to judicial murder of the righteous. The indictment names three generations — the current people, their ancestors, and the kings — all equally guilty.
5. The triple denial — lo tsivviti ('I never commanded'), lo dibbarti ('I never spoke of'), lo aletah al libbi ('it never entered my mind') — is God's emphatic dissociation from child sacrifice. This exact formula appears also in 7:31 and 32:35, forming a repeated refrain throughout Jeremiah. The phrase olot laBa'al ('burnt offerings to Baal') uses sacrificial terminology (olah, 'burnt offering') normally reserved for legitimate worship of the LORD, making the perversion especially grotesque — the people applied sacred categories to an abominable act.
6. This verse virtually duplicates 7:32, creating a deliberate structural echo. The name change from Topheth to 'Valley of Slaughter' (gei ha-haregah) transforms the site from a place where Israel killed its children for Baal into a place where God kills Israel. The punishment mirrors the crime. Topheth may derive from a root meaning 'fireplace' or 'place of burning' — the exact etymology is debated.
7. The verb vaqqoti ('I will empty out, pour out, make void') is a wordplay on baqbuq (the flask) — both share the root b-q-q. God will 'empty out' Judah's plans just as liquid is emptied from the flask. The denial of proper burial — bodies left for scavengers — is among the most severe judgments in the ancient Near East, where burial was essential for honoring the dead (cf. Deuteronomy 28:26).

8. The verb yishroq ('he will hiss, whistle') describes the sharp sound of shock and contempt — passersby will react to Jerusalem's ruin with visceral revulsion. The word makkoteha ('its wounds, its blows, its plagues') treats the city as a battered body, covered in the wounds of divine judgment. This echoes 18:16 almost verbatim, linking the two chapters.
9. Siege cannibalism is the most extreme covenant curse, drawn directly from Deuteronomy 28:53-57. This is not rhetorical exaggeration — the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem produced exactly these conditions, as attested in Lamentations 2:20 ('Should women eat their offspring, the children they have nurtured?') and 4:10 ('The hands of compassionate women boiled their own children'). The words matsor ('siege') and matsoq ('distress, desperation') form a sound-pair emphasizing the extremity of the suffering.
10. The verb shavarta ('you shall shatter, break') is the climactic action of the sign-act. The witnesses (elders and priests from v. 1) must see the breaking — the prophetic sign requires an audience to carry legal weight. The flask, once shattered, cannot be repaired or reshaped. This is the contrast with chapter 18: wet clay can be reworked, but fired pottery can only be destroyed.
11. The key phrase lo yukhal lehirafe ('cannot be mended, cannot be healed') seals the metaphor's meaning. The verb rafa ('to heal, to mend, to repair') is negated — this breaking is permanent. The irony of burying in Topheth is brutal: the place where children were sacrificed to foreign gods becomes the mass grave for the entire population. The overcrowding of Topheth with corpses (me'ein maqom liqbor, 'no room to bury') indicates casualties beyond the capacity of normal burial practices.
12. The comparison is devastating: all of Jerusalem will become like Topheth — a defiled place of death and burning. Topheth was already considered ritually unclean because of child sacrifice. Now the entire city will share that defilement.
13. Rooftop worship (al gagoteihem, 'on their rooftops') was common because flat roofs provided open-air altars with a clear view of the stars. The 'host of heaven' (tseva hashamayim) refers to astral deities — sun, moon, and stars worshiped as divine beings. This practice is condemned in Deuteronomy 4:19 and 17:3. The drink offerings (nesakim) were libations poured out to these celestial deities. The defilement will spread from Topheth to encompass every building in the city.
14. The narrative shifts from the prophetic oracle to biographical report. Jeremiah moves from the valley of death (Topheth) to the center of religious life (the temple court). He does not confine his message to the small group of witnesses — he repeats it publicly. This act of public defiance in the temple court directly provokes the confrontation with Pashhur in 20:1-6.
15. The phrase higshu et orfam ('they have stiffened their necks') is a metaphor drawn from draft animals that refuse the yoke — an ox that stiffens its neck cannot be guided or directed. Israel has refused the yoke of covenant obedience. The judgment extends beyond Jerusalem to 'all its surrounding towns' (kol areha), indicating that the entire urban network of Judah will share in the destruction. This verse ends chapter 19 but the narrative continues without break into 20:1, where Pashhur the priest responds to what Jeremiah has just proclaimed.

Summary: Jeremiah 20 divides into three brutal movements. First (vv. 1-6), the priest Pashhur son of Immer — chief officer of the temple — beats Jeremiah and locks him in the stocks at the Upper Benjamin Gate. Upon release, Jeremiah renames Pashhur 'Magor-Missabib' ('Terror on Every Side') and delivers a devastating oracle of exile against him personally. Second (vv. 7-13), the prophet turns on God himself in the most confrontational prayer in the Hebrew Bible, accusing God of having deceived or seduced him into a calling that has brought nothing but mockery and pain. Third (vv. 14-18), Jeremiah curses the day of his birth in language that echoes and intensifies Job 3. The chapter ends in unresolved anguish — no divine answer, no comfort, no resolution. The text refuses to soften the prophet's despair.

*What Makes This Remarkable: No other passage in the Hebrew Bible presents a prophet accusing God so directly and so violently. The verb pittitani (v. 7) — from pittah, meaning 'to entice, deceive, seduce' — is the same verb used for the seduction of a virgin in Exodus 22:16 and for the deception of a naive person in Proverbs 1:10. Jeremiah is saying that God lured him into prophecy under false pretenses — that the divine call was an act of seduction or entrapment. This is not doubt. This is not questioning. This is accusation. The theological audacity is staggering, and the fact that the canonical text preserves it without censorship or correction tells us something essential about the Hebrew Bible's understanding of the prophetic relationship: it is honest enough to contain rage. The birth-curse of verses 14-18 intensifies Job 3 by adding a specific target — the unnamed man who brought news of the birth to Jeremiah's father. The chapter's placement at the end of the 'confessions of Jeremiah' sequence (11:18-20:18) makes it the climax of the prophet's inner suffering, and the book provides no answer. God does not speak in response.*

Translation Friction: The central translation challenge is pīttitani () in verse 7. The verb pīttah carries a range from 'persuade' to 'entice' to 'deceive' to 'seduce,' and the choice of English rendering determines how confrontational the verse reads. We rendered it 'You deceived me' because the parallel clause — 'you overpowered me and prevailed' — establishes a context of force and manipulation, not gentle persuasion. The expanded rendering documents the full semantic range. In verse 9, the phrase 'burning fire shut up in my bones' required rendering that preserves the physical, visceral quality of the Hebrew — this is not metaphor for the prophet but lived bodily torment. The birth-curse (vv. 14-18) required care to preserve the escalating structure: cursed is the day, cursed is the man, why was I born — each line more desperate than the last. We resisted any temptation to add a hopeful coda or contextualizing note that would blunt the ending.

Connections: Jeremiah's accusation in verse 7 connects backward to his call narrative (1:4-10), where God promised to be with him — a promise the prophet now experiences as betrayal. The birth-curse (vv. 14-18) parallels Job 3:1-19 so closely that literary dependence in one direction or the other is widely assumed. Pashhur's name-change to Magor-Missabib ('Terror on Every Side') echoes the same phrase in Psalm 31:13, where it describes enemies surrounding the psalmist. The 'fire shut up in my bones' (v. 9) connects to Psalm 39:3, where the psalmist also describes the unbearable pressure of suppressed speech. The confession sequence that climaxes here (beginning at 11:18) has been compared to the Psalms of lament, but Jeremiah's confessions exceed the psalms in their directness against God — the psalmists complain to God about enemies, but Jeremiah complains to God about God.

¹When Pashhur son of Immer the priest — who was the chief officer in the house of the LORD — heard Jeremiah prophesying these words, ²Pashhur struck Jeremiah the prophet and put him in the stocks at the Upper Benjamin Gate, which is in the house of the LORD. ³The next day, when Pashhur released Jeremiah from the stocks, Jeremiah said to him: The LORD does not call your name Pashhur, but Magor-Missabib. ⁴For this is what the LORD says: I am about to make you a terror to yourself and to all who love you. They will fall by the sword of their enemies while your eyes watch. I will hand all Judah over to the king of Babylon, and he will deport them to Babylon and strike them down with the sword. ⁵I will hand over all the wealth of this city — all its produce, all its valuables, and all the treasures of the kings of Judah — to their enemies, who will plunder them, seize them, and carry them to Babylon. ⁶And you, Pashhur — you and everyone who lives in your house will go into captivity. You will go to Babylon, and there you will die, and there you will be buried — you and all who love you, to whom you prophesied falsely. ⁷You deceived me, LORD, and I was deceived. You overpowered me, and you prevailed. I have become a laughingstock all day long — everyone mocks me. ⁸For whenever I speak, I must cry out — I shout, 'Violence and destruction!' The word of the LORD has brought me nothing but reproach and ridicule all day long. ⁹I said to myself, 'I will not mention him or speak in his name anymore.' But his word became like a burning fire locked inside my bones. I was exhausted from holding it in — I could not endure it. ¹⁰For I hear the whispering of many — 'Terror on every side!' — 'Denounce him! Let us denounce him!' All the men who were at peace with me are watching for me to stumble: 'Perhaps he can be deceived, and we will overpower him and take our vengeance on him.' ¹¹But the LORD is with me like a fearsome warrior. Therefore my persecutors will stumble and will not prevail. They will be deeply shamed because they have not acted wisely — an everlasting disgrace that will never be forgotten. ¹²LORD of Hosts, who examines the righteous, who sees the innermost depths and the heart — let me see your vengeance on them, for to you I have laid open my case. ¹³Sing to the LORD! Praise the LORD! For he has rescued the life of the needy from the hand of evildoers. ¹⁴Cursed be the day I was born. The day my mother bore me — let it not be blessed. ¹⁵Cursed be the man who brought the news to my father, saying, 'A son has been born to you!' — making him so glad. ¹⁶Let that man be like the cities the LORD overthrew without relenting — let him hear cries of anguish in the morning and alarm at noon, ¹⁷because he did not kill me in the womb, so that my mother would have been my grave and her womb forever pregnant. ¹⁸Why did I come out of the womb — to see nothing but suffering and grief, so that my days are spent in shame?

1. The title paqid nagid ('chief officer') indicates Pashhur held administrative authority over the temple compound, including the power to discipline those who disrupted temple order. This is not a minor functionary but the senior official responsible for maintaining order in the sacred precincts. The verse is syntactically incomplete, flowing directly into verse 2 as a single sentence unit.
2. The verb vayakkeh ('he struck') indicates a beating, not a single blow — the same verb describes military striking and judicial punishment elsewhere. The mahpekhet ('stocks') was a wooden restraining device that twisted the body into a contorted, painful position — the root h-p-k means 'to turn, twist, overturn.' This is public humiliation and physical torture inflicted by a priest on a prophet within the temple compound itself.
3. The name-change follows the prophetic pattern of renaming as oracle (cf. Isaiah's children in Isaiah 7-8). Pashhur's original name may mean 'freedom on every side' (from Egyptian p3-šr, 'the son of Horus'), which makes Magor-Missabib ('Terror on Every Side') a bitter reversal — freedom becomes terror, safety becomes dread. The phrase magor missabib appears also in Psalm 31:14 and in Jeremiah 6:25, 46:5, 49:29, and Lamentations 2:22.
4. The punishment is exquisitely tailored: Pashhur will become a source of terror — the very thing his new name declares. The phrase 've'einekha ro'ot' ('while your eyes watch') adds a dimension of forced witness — Pashhur will survive long enough to see the destruction of everyone he cares about. The mention of Babylon is historically specific: this oracle dates the encounter to a time when Babylon's threat was already real but not yet universally accepted.
5. Three Hebrew terms catalogue what will be lost: chosen ('wealth, stored goods'), yegia ('produce, the fruit of labor'), and yeqarah ('precious things, valuables'). The accumulation emphasizes totality — nothing of value will remain. The verb uvezazum ('and they will plunder them') is onomatopoeic in Hebrew, the buzzing z-sounds mimicking the swarming chaos of looting.
6. Pashhur is revealed as a false prophet (navi sheqer) — he has been delivering oracles of his own, reassuring the people with lies. The final phrase 'asher nibbeta lahem basheqer' ('to whom you prophesied falsely') exposes the core conflict: Pashhur punished Jeremiah not out of concern for the temple but because Jeremiah's true prophecy contradicted Pashhur's false one. The sentence of death in Babylon with burial in foreign soil is a reversal of every covenant promise of land and rest.
7. We rendered pittitani as 'You deceived me' rather than the softer 'You persuaded me' (used by some English translations to cushion the blow) because the parallel verb chazaqtani ('you overpowered me') establishes a context of force, not gentle persuasion. The semantic range of pittah includes: to entice (Judges 14:15, 16:5), to deceive (1 Kings 22:20-22), to seduce (Exodus 22:16), and to persuade (Proverbs 25:15). The confrontational end of the spectrum — deception and seduction — fits the parallel clause and the emotional context. The word va'eppat ('and I was deceived') uses the same root in the passive — Jeremiah acknowledges his own vulnerability but assigns the agency to God.
8. The content of Jeremiah's preaching is summarized in two words: chamas ('violence') and shod ('destruction'). These are not Jeremiah's personal complaints but the message God requires him to deliver — he must announce coming violence and ruin, which makes him universally hated. The word cherpa ('reproach, disgrace') and qeles ('ridicule, mockery') describe the social cost of faithfulness — the prophet who speaks truth becomes a pariah.
9. The verb nil'eiti ('I was exhausted, weary') combined with kalkel ('to contain, hold in') depicts the physical toll of suppression. The prophet tried to quit — to stop prophesying — and discovered that God's word is not a message he carries but a force that carries him. The fire metaphor connects to Jeremiah 5:14 ('I will make my words in your mouth a fire') and to 23:29 ('Is not my word like fire?'). The word atsur ('shut up, imprisoned') in the prophet's bones anticipates the physical imprisonment that Jeremiah will later endure — his body becomes a prison before any human jailer locks him up.
10. The verb yeputteh ('perhaps he will be deceived') uses the same root pittah that Jeremiah used against God in verse 7. The verbal echo is intentional and theologically layered — the deception Jeremiah attributes to God is mirrored by the deception his enemies plot against him. The phrase 'anshei shelomi' ('men of my peace') is an idiom for trusted associates, allies, those with whom one has a covenant of peace. The phrase 'shomrei tsal'i' ('watchers of my stumbling') depicts predators waiting for prey to falter.
11. The sudden pivot from accusation (v. 7) to confidence is jarring and theologically significant — the prophet who just accused God of deception now claims God as his champion. This is not contradiction but the characteristic oscillation of lament: rage and trust coexist. The word arits ('fearsome, ruthless, terrifying') is usually negative — applied to oppressors and tyrants. Applied to God, it means the LORD's power is terrifying to Jeremiah's enemies. The phrase kelimmat olam ('everlasting disgrace') echoes the olam vocabulary — their shame will stretch beyond the visible horizon.
12. The phrase 'ro'eh kelayot valev' ('who sees the kidneys and the heart') refers to God's capacity to perceive the deepest interior of a person. In Hebrew anthropology, the kelayot ('kidneys') were the seat of the deepest emotions and hidden motives, while the lev ('heart') was the seat of the will and intellect. We rendered kelayot as 'innermost depths' rather than the literal 'kidneys' because the anatomical reference does not communicate the Hebrew meaning in English. The verb gilliti ('I have laid open, uncovered, revealed') is the language of legal disclosure — Jeremiah has submitted his case to the divine court. This verse closely parallels 11:20, where the same language appears in Jeremiah's first confession.
13. This burst of praise is liturgically conventional — it follows the pattern of psalmic hymns that conclude a lament (cf. Psalm 22:22-31 after 22:1-21). But its placement here, immediately before the birth-curse of verses 14-18, creates a disturbing structural effect. The praise does not resolve the lament — it is followed by the darkest passage in the book. Whether verse 13 represents genuine momentary faith, liturgical convention, or bitter irony is left unresolved by the text. The word evyon ('needy, poor') is Jeremiah's self-description — the prophet who holds the highest spiritual office in Israel considers himself among the destitute.

14. The structure is a Hebrew parallelism: 'Cursed be the day I was born / the day my mother bore me — let it not be blessed.' The second line intensifies the first by negating its opposite — not merely 'let it be cursed' but 'let it never be blessed,' stripping away even the possibility of goodness from that day. This echoes Job 3:1-3 closely, though Jeremiah adds the specific mention of his mother. The abruptness of the transition from verse 13's praise to verse 14's curse has troubled interpreters for centuries — but the text does not smooth it.
15. The curse widens from the day to a person — the unnamed messenger who announced Jeremiah's birth to his father. The phrase ben zakhar ('a male child') emphasizes the patriarchal joy of a son's birth, and sammeach simmechu ('making him exceedingly glad') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute to stress the intensity of the father's joy. The cruelty of this verse lies in its specificity: Jeremiah curses the moment of his father's greatest happiness. The messenger is unnamed — he is a bystander in the prophet's anguish, cursed not for anything he did wrong but because he participated in the event Jeremiah wishes had never happened.
16. The verb hafakh ('overthrew') is the technical term for Sodom's destruction, used in Genesis 19:21, 25, 29 and in prophetic references to total destruction (Amos 4:11, Isaiah 13:19). The phrase velo nicham ('and did not relent') uses the verb nacham, which elsewhere describes God 'changing his mind' or 'having compassion' — here the negation means no such mercy was extended. The cries of ze'aqah ('anguish') and teru'ah ('alarm, battle cry') depict a man living in perpetual terror — hearing sounds of destruction from dawn to midday with no relief.
17. The Hebrew shifts from cursing the messenger to explaining why he is cursed — 'because he did not kill me in the womb.' The logic is irrational grief: the messenger is cursed for not committing an act he had no power or reason to perform. The image of the mother's womb as a grave (qivri, 'my grave') merges birth and death into a single horrifying image — the place that should give life becomes the place of burial. The phrase rachmah harat olam ('her womb forever pregnant') envisions an eternal pregnancy that never reaches birth — permanent gestation with no delivery, existence trapped in pre-existence. The word olam here means an unbounded duration — pregnancy stretching beyond the horizon of time.
18. The final verse is a question with no answer. The word lammah ('why?') is the lament's ultimate interrogative — it demands a reason for suffering and receives none. The three terms amal ('suffering, toil, trouble'), yagon ('grief, sorrow'), and bosheth ('shame, disgrace') summarize the prophet's entire experience. The chapter — and the entire confession sequence that began at 11:18 — ends here, in unresolved despair. God does not respond. There is no comforting oracle, no divine assurance, no resolution. The text simply stops. This silence is itself theologically significant: the Hebrew Bible preserves the unanswered cry without rushing to provide comfort that the moment does not contain.

Summary: Jeremiah 21 records the moment King Zedekiah sends a delegation to Jeremiah during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem, desperately hoping the LORD will intervene as he did in the days of Hezekiah against Assyria. The LORD's answer is devastating: he himself will fight against Jerusalem with outstretched hand and mighty arm — the very language once used of the Exodus deliverance — and will strike down man and beast with pestilence. The chapter closes with a stark choice: those who surrender to Babylon will live, those who remain in the city will die by sword, famine, and plague.

What Makes This Remarkable: The inversion of Exodus language is the theological earthquake of this chapter. The phrase 'outstretched hand and mighty arm' (v.5) is drawn directly from Deuteronomy 4:34 and 26:8, where it describes God's deliverance of Israel from Egypt. Here the same divine power is turned against his own people. Zedekiah invokes the memory of God's miraculous defense (2 Kings 19:35), but Jeremiah announces that this time God stands with Babylon, not with Jerusalem. The phrase 'I myself will fight against you' (v.5) is covenant-lawsuit language — the divine warrior has switched sides. The choice offered in verses 8-10 — 'the way of life and the way of death' — echoes Deuteronomy 30:15-19, but the 'way of life' is now surrender to the enemy, a scandalous reversal that would have been unthinkable to Zedekiah's court.

Translation Friction: *We rendered nilvam ('fight') in verse 5 with the full phrase 'I myself will fight against you' to capture the emphatic first-person construction in Hebrew. The phrase biyad netuya uvizroa' chazaqah ('with outstretched hand and with mighty arm') we preserved in its traditional Exodus form precisely because the inversion depends on the reader recognizing the allusion. The word qetseph ('wrath') in verse 5 we rendered as 'fierce wrath' to distinguish it from other anger vocabulary (af, chemah) that appears in the same passage. In verse 9, 'his life shall be to him as plunder' renders the Hebrew construction wehayetah lo nafsho leshalal — the survivor keeps only his bare life, nothing more.*

Connections: The Exodus-inversion language connects to Deuteronomy 4:34 and 26:8. Zedekiah's appeal recalls Hezekiah's deliverance in 2 Kings 19:35 and Isaiah 37:36. The 'way of life and way of death' formula echoes Deuteronomy 30:15-19. The promise that God will fight against his own people fulfills the covenant curses of Leviticus 26:17 and 33. Nebuchadnezzar as God's instrument connects forward to Jeremiah 25:9 where he is called 'my servant.' The siege context continues through Jeremiah 32, 34, and 37-39.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD when King Zedekiah sent to him Pashhur son of Malchiah and Zephaniah son of Maaseiah the priest, saying, ²Inquire of the LORD on our behalf, for Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon is making war against us. Perhaps the LORD will deal with us according to all his wondrous deeds, and he will withdraw from us. ³Then Jeremiah said to them, "Thus you shall say to Zedekiah: ⁴This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: I am about to turn back the weapons of war that are in your hands, with which you fight against the king of Babylon and the Chaldeans who besiege you outside the walls, and I will gather them into the midst of this city. ⁵I myself will fight against you with outstretched hand and with mighty arm, in anger, in fury, and in fierce wrath. ⁶I will strike the inhabitants of this city, both man and beast. They shall die of a great pestilence. ⁷And afterward — declares the LORD — I will give Zedekiah king of Judah, his servants, the people, and those who survive in this city from the pestilence, the sword, and the famine, into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, into the hand of their enemies, and into the hand of those who seek their lives. He will strike them with the edge of the sword. He will not spare them, he will not have pity, and he will not show mercy. ⁸And to this people you shall say: This is what the LORD says: I am setting before you the way of life and the way of death. ⁹Whoever remains in this city shall die by the sword, by famine, and by pestilence. But whoever goes out and surrenders to the Chaldeans who besiege you shall live, and his life shall be to him as plunder. ¹⁰For I have set my face against this city for harm and not for good — declares the LORD. It shall be given into the hand of the king of Babylon, and he shall burn it with fire. ¹¹To the house of the king of Judah: Hear the word of the LORD! ¹²O house of David, this is what the LORD says: Execute justice each morning, and deliver the one who has been robbed from the hand of the oppressor, lest my fury go out like fire and burn with no one to quench it, because of the evil of your deeds. ¹³I am against you, O inhabitant of the valley, O rock of the plain — declares the LORD — you who say, 'Who will come down against us? Who will enter our strongholds?' ¹⁴I will punish you according to the fruit of your deeds — declares the LORD. I will kindle a fire in her forest, and it shall devour everything around her.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This Pashhur is distinct from the Pashhur son of Immer in chapter 20. Zedekiah sends two emissaries — one royal official and one priest — reflecting the gravity of the crisis. The delegation occurs during the Babylonian siege of 588-586 BCE.
2. Zedekiah's 'perhaps' (ulai) reveals both desperation and uncertainty. He does not ask whether God will act but hopes for a miracle on the basis of precedent. The verb ya'aleh ('go up, withdraw') is military terminology for lifting a siege.
3. Jeremiah does not soften or delay — his response is immediate and directed back to the king through the same delegation.
4. The image is terrifying: God will reverse their weapons — not merely make them ineffective but turn them inward. The Chaldeans besieging from outside will be gathered inside the city walls. The LORD is orchestrating both sides of the battle, and he fights for Babylon.
5. The emphatic pronoun ani ('I myself') makes God's personal involvement unmistakable. Three anger terms cascade: af ('anger,' literally 'nostril-flaring'), chemah ('fury, heat'), and qetseph ('wrath, indignation'). Each intensifies beyond the last, expressing the fullness of divine judgment.
6. The language echoes the tenth plague in Egypt (Exodus 12:29) — God strikes inhabitants and animals alike. The pestilence (dever) is one of the covenant-curse triad: sword, famine, and pestilence, which recurs throughout Jeremiah.
7. Three negated verbs — 'not spare,' 'not pity,' 'not show mercy' — form a devastating closure. The survivors of pestilence, sword, and famine face yet another fate: captivity and execution. The phrase 'those who seek their lives' (mevaqshei nafsham) is standard Jeremiah vocabulary for mortal enemies.
8. This verse introduces the oracle to the general population, distinct from the message to Zedekiah. The Deuteronomic formula is unmistakable, and its subversion in the following verses would have been profoundly disorienting.
9. The Hebrew nafal al ('fall upon') means to desert to the enemy. The triad of sword, famine, and pestilence (cherev, ra'av, dever) is Jeremiah's signature judgment formula, appearing over twenty times in the book. The 'life as plunder' idiom also occurs in Jeremiah 38:2, 39:18, and 45:5.
10. 'I have set my face' (samti panai) indicates a fixed, irrevocable divine decision. The verb is in the perfect tense — the decision is already made. The burning of Jerusalem is stated as accomplished fact from God's perspective, though it would not occur until 586 BCE.
11. A new oracle begins here, addressed to the royal house as an institution rather than to Zedekiah personally. This introduces the broader theme of royal accountability that continues through chapter 22.

12. The address to 'the house of David' invokes the dynastic covenant (2 Samuel 7) while simultaneously placing it under judgment. The conditional 'lest' (pen) implies the door is still technically open, though the surrounding context suggests it is nearly shut.
13. The 'valley' and 'rock of the plain' describe Jerusalem's topography — built on a rocky plateau above the surrounding valleys. The inhabitants' boast reflects false confidence in the city's natural fortifications. The phrase hineni elayik ('I am against you') is the divine war-declaration formula.
14. The 'forest' (ya'ar) likely refers to the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon' — Solomon's palace complex built with cedar (1 Kings 7:2). The fire that begins in the royal 'forest' will spread to consume everything around it. The phrase 'fruit of your deeds' (peri ma'allekhem) connects judgment to the natural consequences of their own actions.

Summary: Jeremiah 22 contains a series of oracles against the kings of Judah, delivered as if Jeremiah were standing in the royal palace. The chapter opens with a demand for justice and a conditional promise — if the Davidic house practices righteousness, kings will continue to ride through the gates; if not, the palace will become a desolation. Three kings are specifically addressed: Shallum (Jehoahaz), exiled to Egypt never to return; Jehoiakim, condemned for building his palace with forced labor and for his utter lack of justice; and Jehoiachin (Coniah), declared a despised, broken pot who will be hurled into exile with his mother, and whose offspring will never sit on the throne of David.

What Makes This Remarkable: The contrast between Josiah and Jehoiakim in verses 15-17 is one of the sharpest character studies in Scripture. Josiah 'judged the cause of the poor and needy — was not this to know me?' (v.16), equating knowledge of God directly with justice for the vulnerable. Jehoiakim, by contrast, builds a lavish palace with unpaid labor while his father's legacy of justice lies in ruins. The rhetorical question 'Is not this to know me?' (halo-hi hadda'at oti) redefines the meaning of 'knowing God' in ethical rather than intellectual or mystical terms. The oracle against Coniah (vv.24-30) is devastating in its finality — even if he were the signet ring on God's right hand, God would tear him off and throw him away. The declaration that none of his offspring will prosper on David's throne (v.30) raises profound questions about the Davidic covenant that are only resolved by the reversal in Haggai 2:23.

Translation Friction: We rendered Shallum rather than Jehoahaz in verse 11 because the Hebrew text uses Shallum, which is apparently a birth name or alternative name for Jehoahaz son of Josiah. Coniah (Konyahu) in verse 24 is a shortened, perhaps deliberately dismissive form of Jehoiachin (Yehoyakin). We preserved the Hebrew name forms as they carry interpretive weight. The phrase 'Do you reign because you compete in cedar?' (v.15) is notoriously difficult — we rendered the verb titkhareh as 'compete' to capture the sense of rivalry and ostentation in Jehoiakim's building projects. In verse 23, 'O inhabitant of Lebanon, nested among the cedars' addresses the royal house through its cedar-paneled palace.

Connections: The demand for justice connects backward to Jeremiah 21:12 and forward to 23:5. Josiah's commendation echoes 2 Kings 23:25. Jehoiakim's forced labor recalls Solomon's conscription (1 Kings 5:13-14) and reverses the Exodus liberation from forced labor in Egypt. The signet-ring imagery of verse 24 is reversed in Haggai 2:23 where Zerubbabel (Coniah's grandson) is restored as God's signet. The prohibition against weeping for the dead king (Josiah) but weeping for the one who goes away (Shallum) foreshadows the exile theology of Jeremiah 24 and 29. The 'burial of a donkey' for Jehoiakim (v.19) connects to 2 Chronicles 36:6.

¹This is what the LORD says: Go down to the house of the king of Judah and speak this word there: ²Say: Hear the word of the LORD, O king of Judah who sits on the throne of David — you, your servants, and your people who enter by these gates. ³This is what the LORD says: Do justice and righteousness. Deliver the one who has been robbed from the hand of the oppressor. Do no wrong and do no violence to the sojourner, the fatherless, or the widow. Do not shed innocent blood in this place. ⁴For if you truly do this, then kings who sit on David's throne shall enter by the gates of this house, riding in chariots and on horses — he, his servants, and his people. ⁵But if you will not hear these words, I swear by myself — declares the LORD — that this house shall become a desolation. ⁶For this is what the LORD says concerning the house of the king of Judah: You are Gilead to me, the summit of Lebanon — yet I will surely make you a wilderness, cities without inhabitants. ⁷I will consecrate destroyers against you, each with his weapons. They shall cut down your choicest cedars and cast them into the fire. ⁸Many nations shall pass by this city and say to one another, 'Why has the LORD done this to this great city?' ⁹And they shall answer, 'Because they abandoned the covenant of the LORD their God, and bowed down to other gods, and served them.' ¹⁰Do not weep for the dead, and do not grieve for him. Weep bitterly for the one who goes away, for he shall never return, nor see the land of his birth again. ¹¹For this is what the LORD says concerning Shallum son of Josiah, king of Judah, who reigned in place of Josiah his father and who went out from this place: He shall not return here again. ¹²For in the place where they have exiled him, there he shall die. He shall never see this land again.

¹³Woe to him who builds his house by unrighteousness, and his upper rooms by injustice,
who makes his neighbor serve without wages and does not give him his pay!

¹⁴He says, 'I will build myself a great house with spacious upper rooms!'
He cuts out windows for it, panels it with cedar,
and paints it with vermilion.

¹⁵Do you think you reign because you compete in cedar?
Did not your father eat and drink and do justice and righteousness?
Then it was well with him.

¹⁶He judged the cause of the poor and the needy —
then it was well.
Is not this to know me?
— declares the LORD.

¹⁷But your eyes and your heart are set on nothing but your dishonest gain,
on shedding innocent blood,
and on practicing oppression and violence.

¹⁸Therefore this is what the LORD says concerning Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah: They shall not lament for him, saying, 'Alas, my brother!' or 'Alas, my sister!' They shall not lament for him, saying, 'Alas, lord!' or 'Alas, his majesty!' ¹⁹He shall be buried with the burial of a donkey — dragged and thrown out beyond the gates of Jerusalem.

²⁰Go up to Lebanon and cry out!
Lift your voice in Bashan!
Cry out from Abarim,
for all your lovers are broken.

²¹I spoke to you in your prosperity,
but you said, 'I will not listen.'
This has been your way from your youth,
that you have not obeyed my voice.

²²The wind shall shepherd all your shepherds, and your lovers shall go into captivity.
Then you shall be ashamed and humiliated because of all your wickedness.

²³O you who dwell in Lebanon, nested among the cedars —
 how you will groan when pangs come upon you, pain like a woman in labor!

²⁴As I live — declares the LORD — even if Coniah son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, were the signet ring on my right hand, I would tear you off from there. ²⁵I will give you into the hand of those who seek your life, into the hand of those you dread, into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and into the hand of the Chaldeans. ²⁶I will hurl you and the mother who bore you into another land where you were not born, and there you shall die. ²⁷To the land to which they lift up their souls to return — there they shall not return. ²⁸Is this man Coniah a despised, shattered pot? A vessel no one wants? Why have he and his offspring been hurled out and cast into a land they do not know? ²⁹O land, land, land — hear the word of the LORD! ³⁰This is what the LORD says: Write this man down as childless — a man who will not prosper in his days. For none of his offspring shall prosper, sitting on the throne of David and ruling again in Judah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. 'Go down' (red) indicates Jeremiah is on the temple mount, which is higher than the royal palace complex to the south. The physical descent mirrors the theological descent of the oracle.
2. The address encompasses the entire royal court and the people who pass through the palace gates. The phrase 'throne of David' invokes the dynastic covenant — the king sits there by divine grant, not by inherent right.
3. The triad of sojourner (ger), fatherless (yatom), and widow (almanah) is the classic Deuteronomic list of the most vulnerable members of society whom the king is bound to protect. 'This place' refers to the royal palace, where justice is supposed to originate.
4. The conditional promise ('if you truly do this') keeps the Davidic covenant operative but ties it to justice. The image of kings riding through the gates in chariots is one of royal splendor and continuity — a future that is still possible but contingent on obedience.
5. God swears by himself because there is no higher authority to invoke. The oath formula 'I swear by myself' (bi nishba'ti) makes the warning irrevocable. 'This house' is the royal palace — the throne of David will become a ruin.
6. Gilead and Lebanon were proverbially fertile and forested regions. The royal house is compared to these lush territories — yet God will reduce even this abundance to uninhabited wasteland. The contrast between present beauty and coming desolation is the rhetorical point.
7. We rendered qiddashti as 'consecrate' rather than KJV's 'prepare' to preserve the shocking theological claim that God sanctifies destruction as holy work. The cedar-cutting imagery anticipates the direct condemnation of Jehoiakim's cedar obsession in verses 14-15.
8. The scene anticipates foreigners gazing at Jerusalem's ruins and asking the question. The formula echoes Deuteronomy 29:24-25 and 1 Kings 9:8-9, where the same question is asked and answered — because they abandoned the covenant.
9. Even the pagan nations will understand the cause-and-effect logic of covenant violation and judgment. The answer centers on berit ('covenant') — Jerusalem's destruction is not random catastrophe but covenant consequence.
10. 'The dead' refers to King Josiah, killed at Megiddo in 609 BCE. 'The one who goes away' is Shallum/Jehoahaz, exiled to Egypt after only three months on the throne. The paradox is striking: death in the homeland is preferable to exile — at least Josiah rests in his own land.
11. Shallum is the birth name of Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:30-34). He reigned only three months before Pharaoh Necho deported him to Egypt, where he died. The use of 'Shallum' rather than the throne name may indicate prophetic contempt for his brief, illegitimate reign.
12. The repetition of 'never again' from verses 10 and 11 drives home the finality of exile. Shallum died in Egypt — the land from which God had once delivered Israel. The irony of an Israelite king dying in Egypt would not have been lost on Jeremiah's audience.
13. The woe-oracle (hoi) now targets Jehoiakim directly, though he is not named until the context makes it unmistakable. The forced labor (ya'avod chinnam, 'serve for nothing') echoes Pharaoh's exploitation of Israel — the Davidic king has become a new Pharaoh.
14. The self-quotation ('I will build myself') exposes Jehoiakim's vanity. Cedar paneling was the mark of royal luxury — the 'House of the Forest of Lebanon' (1 Kings 7:2). Vermilion (shashar) was an expensive red pigment used for decorative painting, emphasizing the extravagance while laborers go unpaid.
15. The rhetorical question 'Do you reign because you compete in cedar?' is devastating; Jehoiakim confuses the trappings of royalty with its substance. Josiah 'ate and drank' — the phrase implies contentment and simplicity, not asceticism. The real mark of his kingship was justice.

16. This verse is the theological center of the chapter and arguably of Jeremiah's entire social ethic. The equation knowledge-of-God = justice-for-the-poor has no parallel this direct anywhere in the Hebrew Bible. We set the LORD's declaration on its own line to give it the weight the Hebrew demands.
17. The indictment is fourfold: dishonest gain (betsa'), shedding innocent blood, oppression ('osheq), and violence (merutsah). Jehoiakim is the anti-Josiah — where his father knew God through justice, Jehoiakim knows only exploitation. The phrase 'eyes and heart' indicates both perception and desire are corrupted.
18. The mourning cries 'Alas, my brother / my sister / lord / his majesty' are formulaic lament expressions. The declaration that these will not be spoken means Jehoiakim will receive no proper burial or mourning — the most shameful fate for a king in the ancient Near East.
19. 'The burial of a donkey' means no burial at all — a dead donkey is simply dragged outside the city and abandoned. For a king who invested everything in his magnificent palace, the final indignity is to be discarded like an animal carcass. This is the harshest burial oracle in the prophets.
20. The address shifts to feminine singular — Jerusalem personified as a woman. Lebanon, Bashan, and Abarim are mountainous regions surrounding the land. Her 'lovers' (me'ahavayik) are the foreign allies she relied on instead of the LORD. All of them are shattered.
21. God's complaint reaches back to Jerusalem's entire history ('from your youth') — the pattern of ignoring the divine voice in times of prosperity is not new but chronic. The word shalvotayik ('your prosperity, your ease') implies that comfort bred complacency.
22. We rendered 'the wind shall shepherd your shepherds' to preserve the Hebrew wordplay as closely as English allows. The 'shepherds' are the political leaders; the 'lovers' are foreign allies. Both will be swept away, leaving Jerusalem utterly exposed.
23. 'Lebanon' and 'cedars' again refer to the cedar-paneled palace, not the geographical region. The image shifts from luxurious nest to labor pains — the security of the cedar palace will become a place of anguish. The contrast between the comfortable nest and the writhing pain is the rhetorical thrust.
24. The oath formula 'As I live' (chai-ani) is the strongest possible divine affirmation. The signet ring image is extraordinarily intimate — worn on the hand, never removed, the instrument of authority. Haggai 2:23 will reverse this rejection when Zerubbabel, Coniah's grandson, is called God's signet ring.
25. The fourfold 'into the hand of' creates a suffocating sense of inevitability. The progression narrows from general threat to specific: those who seek his life, those he fears, Nebuchadnezzar personally, and the Chaldean Empire.
26. The verb hetalti ('I will hurl') is violent — God physically throws Coniah and his mother Nehushta (2 Kings 24:8) out of the land. The mention of his mother emphasizes the totality of the rejection — even the queen mother, a figure of high court status, is expelled.
27. The phrase 'lift up their souls' (menass'im et-nafsham) expresses desperate longing — their whole being yearns for home. The cruelty of the sentence is that this deepest desire will never be fulfilled. The emphatic construction closes every door.
28. The rhetorical questions are spoken from the perspective of shocked onlookers. Coniah is compared to a broken clay vessel — utterly worthless, fit only to be thrown away. The word naputs ('shattered') emphasizes irreparable destruction. His 'offspring' (zar'o) anticipates the dynasty-ending declaration of verse 30.
29. Triple repetition in Hebrew signals the utmost urgency and solemnity. The entire land is called to witness what follows — the most devastating dynastic oracle in the book.
30. The command 'write' (kitvu) makes this a formal legal decree — enrolled in the official record. The word ariri ('childless') is the same word used of Abraham's lament in Genesis 15:2 before the promise of an heir. Applied to a Davidic king, it effectively terminates the dynasty for succession purposes.

Summary: Jeremiah 23 opens with a scathing oracle against the shepherds (kings and leaders) who have scattered God's flock, followed by the messianic promise of the Righteous Branch (tsemach tsaddiq) whose name will be 'The LORD Our Righteousness' (YHWH Tsidqenu). The chapter then pivots to an extended denunciation of the false prophets of Jerusalem, whom God accuses of adultery, lies, and strengthening the hands of evildoers. The climax confronts the false prophets' misuse of the phrase 'the burden of the LORD' and declares God's word to be like fire and like a hammer that shatters rock.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most concentrated messianic prophecies in Jeremiah: the Righteous Branch (tsemach tsaddiq, v. 5) who will reign as king and execute justice and righteousness. His throne-name, YHWH Tsidqenu ('The LORD Our Righteousness'), is extraordinary — a human king bearing a name that incorporates the divine name itself. The same title recurs in 33:16 applied to Jerusalem. The false prophets section (vv. 9–40) is the longest sustained critique of prophetic abuse in the Hebrew Bible. God's rhetorical question in verse 23 —

'Am I only a God nearby and not a God far off?' — challenges the false prophets' assumption that God cannot see what they do in secret. The metaphor of God's word as fire and hammer (v. 29) stands as one of the most powerful images in prophetic literature, contrasting sharply with the straw-like emptiness of false prophecy. The wordplay on massa ('burden/oracle') in verses 33-40 is untranslatable — God turns the prophets' technical vocabulary back against them.

Translation Friction: The phrase tsemach tsaddiq (v. 5) required careful handling — tsemach means 'branch, sprout, growth' and we rendered it as 'righteous Branch' to preserve both the botanical metaphor (a new shoot from the Davidic line) and the messianic tradition. The name YHWH Tsidqenu (v. 6) is a compound throne-name; we rendered the explanatory clause 'The LORD is our righteousness' as the meaning while preserving the Hebrew name in key terms. The massa wordplay in verses 33-40 posed the greatest challenge: massa can mean both 'burden' (something heavy to carry) and 'oracle' (a prophetic utterance), and the passage plays on both meanings simultaneously. We rendered it as 'burden' throughout with extensive notes explaining the double meaning, since 'oracle' would lose the punning force of God telling the prophets that they themselves are the burden he will cast off. The verb natash in verse 33 ('to abandon, cast off') extends the burden metaphor — God will drop the burden that they have become.

Connections: The Righteous Branch connects to Isaiah 11:1 (the shoot from Jesse's stump), Zechariah 3:8 and 6:12 (the Branch), and is read messianically in both Jewish and Christian traditions. The throne-name YHWH Tsidqenu deliberately echoes and reverses the name of King Zedekiah (Tsidqiyahu, 'the LORD is my righteousness') — the failed king's name becomes the promised king's fulfilled reality. The false prophets section echoes Deuteronomy 18:20-22 (the test of a true prophet) and Micah 3:5-8 (prophets who lead astray). The fire-and-hammer image of God's word (v. 29) connects to Jeremiah 5:14 ('I will make my words fire in your mouth') and anticipates Hebrews 4:12 ('the word of God is living and active'). The 'Am I only a God nearby' passage (v. 23) resonates with Psalm 139:7-12 (God's inescapable presence).

¹Woe to the shepherds who destroy and scatter the sheep of my pasture! — declares the LORD. ²Therefore, this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says concerning the shepherds who tend my people: You have scattered my flock, driven them away, and have not attended to them. Now I am about to attend to you — for the evil of your deeds, declares the LORD. ³Then I myself will gather the remnant of my flock from all the lands where I have driven them, and I will bring them back to their pasture, and they will be fruitful and multiply. ⁴I will raise up shepherds over them who will tend them, and they will no longer be afraid or terrified, and none will be missing, declares the LORD. ⁵The days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will raise up for David a righteous Branch. He will reign as king and act wisely, and he will establish justice and righteousness in the land. ⁶In his days Judah will be saved and Israel will live in safety. And this is the name by which he will be called: The LORD Is Our Righteousness. ⁷Therefore the days are coming, declares the LORD, when people will no longer say, 'As the LORD lives, who brought the children of Israel up from the land of Egypt,' ⁸but rather, 'As the LORD lives, who brought up and led the descendants of the house of Israel from the northern land and from all the lands where he had driven them.' Then they will live on their own soil. ⁹Concerning the prophets: My heart is shattered within me; all my bones tremble. I have become like a drunk, like a man overcome by wine — because of the LORD and because of his holy words. ¹⁰For the land is full of adulterers; because of the curse the land mourns, and the pastures of the wilderness have dried up. Their course is evil and their power is misused. ¹¹For both prophet and priest are godless — even in my own house I have found their wickedness, declares the LORD. ¹²Therefore their path will become slippery ground in the darkness — they will be pushed and fall on it, for I will bring disaster upon them in the year of their reckoning, declares the LORD. ¹³Among the prophets of Samaria I saw something repulsive: they prophesied by Baal and led my people Israel astray. ¹⁴But among the prophets of Jerusalem I have seen something horrifying: they commit adultery and walk in deception, and they strengthen the hands of evildoers so that no one turns from his wickedness. All of them have become like Sodom to me, and its inhabitants like Gomorrah. ¹⁵Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts says concerning the prophets: I am about to feed them wormwood and make them drink poisoned water, for from the prophets of Jerusalem godlessness has spread throughout the entire land. ¹⁶This is what the LORD of Hosts says: Do not listen to the words of the prophets who prophesy to you. They fill you with empty hopes. They speak visions from their own hearts, not from the mouth of the LORD. ¹⁷They keep saying to those who despise me, 'The LORD has spoken: You will have peace.' And to everyone who walks in the stubbornness of his own heart they say, 'No disaster will come upon you.' ¹⁸For who has stood in the council of the LORD, to see and hear his word? Who has paid attention to his word and truly listened? ¹⁹Look — a storm of the LORD has gone out in fury, a whirling tempest! It will burst upon the heads of the wicked. ²⁰The anger of the LORD will not turn back until he has carried out and fulfilled the purposes of his heart. In the days to come you will understand this clearly. ²¹I did not send these prophets, yet they ran. I did not speak to them, yet they prophesied. ²²But if they had stood in my council and proclaimed my words to my people, they would have turned them from their evil way and from the wickedness of their deeds. ²³Am I only a God who is near, declares the LORD, and not a God who is far off? ²⁴Can anyone hide in secret places so that I cannot see him? declares the LORD. Do I not fill the heavens and the earth? declares the LORD. ²⁵I have heard what the prophets say — those who prophesy lies in my name, saying, 'I had a dream! I had a dream!' ²⁶How long will this continue? Is there anything in the hearts of the prophets who prophesy lies — the prophets of their own heart's deceit? ²⁷They plan to make my people forget my name through their dreams, which they tell one to another — just as their ancestors forgot my name because of Baal. ²⁸The prophet who has a dream — let him tell his dream. But the one who has my word — let him speak my word truthfully. What does straw have in common with grain? declares the LORD. ²⁹Is not my word like fire, declares the LORD, and like a hammer that shatters rock? ³⁰Therefore I am against the prophets, declares the LORD — those who steal my words from one another. ³¹I am against the prophets, declares the LORD — those who wag their own tongues and declare, 'He declares!' ³²I am against those who prophesy lying dreams, declares the LORD, who tell them and lead my people astray with their lies and their recklessness — though I never sent them or commanded them. They are of no benefit whatsoever to this people, declares the LORD. ³³When this people or a prophet or a priest asks you, 'What is the burden of the LORD?' — you shall say to them, 'You are the burden! And I will cast you off,' declares the LORD. ³⁴As for the prophet or the priest or any of the people who says, 'The burden of the LORD' — I will punish that person and his household. ³⁵Instead, this is what you should say to one another, each to his neighbor: 'What has the LORD answered?' and 'What has the LORD spoken?' ³⁶But 'the burden of the LORD' you must not mention again, for each person's own word becomes his burden — because you have twisted the words of the living God, the LORD of Hosts, our God. ³⁷This is how you shall speak to a prophet: 'What has the LORD answered you?' and 'What has the LORD spoken?' ³⁸But if you say, 'The burden of the LORD' — then this is what the LORD says: Because you used this phrase, 'The burden of the LORD,' even though I sent word to you saying, 'You must not say, "The burden of the LORD"' — ³⁹therefore I will surely lift you up and hurl you away from my presence — both you and the city that I gave to you and your ancestors. ⁴⁰I will bring upon you everlasting disgrace and perpetual shame that will never be forgotten.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The term ro'im ('shepherds') is the standard ancient Near Eastern metaphor for kings and rulers. Jeremiah is not addressing literal herders but the Davidic monarchy and its appointed leaders. The double accusation — 'destroy and scatter' (me'abedim umefitsim) — summarizes the political and spiritual damage done by Judah's final kings. The word mar'iti ('my pasture') emphasizes divine ownership: these are God's sheep, not the shepherds' property.
2. The verse plays on the verb paqad ('to attend to, visit, reckon with'). The shepherds have not 'attended to' (paqadtem) the flock, so God will 'attend to' (poqed) the shepherds — but in judgment rather than care. The same verb carries opposite force depending on its object: care when directed at sheep, punishment when directed at negligent rulers. This wordplay is impossible to replicate in English but we preserved the root by using 'attended' in both clauses.
3. The emphatic 'I myself' (va'ani) contrasts divine action with the shepherds' failure — what the kings could not do, God will do personally. The language 'be fruitful and multiply' (paru veravu) deliberately echoes the creation blessing of Genesis 1:28, signaling that God's restoration of the scattered flock is an act of re-creation. The word she'erit ('remnant') introduces the theological concept of a surviving portion through whom God preserves his purposes.
4. The verb paqad appears again — 'none will be missing' (lo yippaqedu). After the indictment that the shepherds did not 'attend to' (paqad) the flock, the promise is that under new leadership not a single sheep will go unaccounted for. The three negatives — 'no longer afraid, no longer terrified, none missing' — paint a complete reversal of the scattering described in verses 1-2.
5. The messianic promise introduces tsemach ('branch, sprout'), a term that becomes a title for the coming Davidic king in Zechariah 3:8 and 6:12. The verb hiskil carries a double sense: 'to act wisely' and 'to prosper, succeed' — we chose 'act wisely' to foreground the intellectual and moral quality, with the implication that success follows. Mishpat utsedaqah ('justice and righteousness') is the standard pair describing ideal royal governance in the Hebrew Bible (cf. 2 Samuel 8:15, Isaiah 9:6, 32:1).

6. The name YHWH Tsidqenu is a compound throne-name. We rendered it 'The LORD Is Our Righteousness' rather than transliterating, so the reader grasps the theological claim. The contrast with Zedekiah (Tsidqiyahu) is deliberate — Zedekiah's name means roughly the same thing, but his reign proved the name hollow. The coming king will fulfill what Zedekiah's name only promised. The verb tivvasha ('will be saved') and yishkon labetach ('will live in safety') describe national salvation and security — themes that the current political crisis under Babylon has made urgent.
7. The oath formula chai YHWH ('As the LORD lives') is used here as a marker of national memory. The exodus from Egypt has been the defining salvation-event for Israel's identity since Sinai. Jeremiah's oracle declares that a new act of divine rescue will be so great that it will supplant the exodus itself as the primary oath-reference. This passage parallels 16:14-15 almost verbatim.
8. The 'northern land' (erets tsafonah) refers to Babylon, which though geographically east of Israel was approached from the north via the Fertile Crescent. The word zera ('seed, offspring, descendants') emphasizes biological continuity — the same family line that went into exile will return. The phrase 'their own soil' (admatam) uses adamah rather than erets, evoking the intimate connection between people and their particular ground — not just any land, but their ancestral earth.
9. The speaker shifts — this is Jeremiah's own voice expressing his visceral response to what God has revealed about the false prophets. The physical symptoms (shattered heart, trembling bones, staggering like a drunk) describe the overwhelming effect of prophetic revelation on the body. The verb rachafu ('tremble, shake') describes involuntary trembling — the same root used for the Spirit hovering over the waters in Genesis 1:2, here applied to the prophet's bones shaking with divine disclosure. The comparison to drunkenness is not about intoxication but about loss of bodily control in the face of overwhelming divine reality.
10. The word mena'afim ('adulterers') may refer to literal sexual immorality or metaphorical spiritual adultery (idolatry) — likely both, given the prophets' conduct described later in the chapter. The term alah ('curse') refers to the covenant curse that has fallen on the land because of covenant-breaking, causing agricultural devastation. The mourning land (avelah ha'arets) personifies the earth itself suffering the consequences of human sin — an ecological dimension to covenant violation that runs throughout the prophets (cf. Hosea 4:3).
11. The verb chanefu ('are godless, profane') describes not atheism but the corruption of those who hold sacred office — they have made themselves common while claiming to be set apart. The phrase 'in my house' (beveti) indicates that the temple itself has become a site of their corruption, an accusation that echoes the temple sermon of chapter 7. The pairing of navi and kohen ('prophet and priest') indicts the entire religious establishment.
12. The image of chalaqlaqot ba'afelah ('slippery ground in darkness') combines two dangers: uncertain footing and zero visibility. The prophets who led others astray will themselves lose their way. The phrase shenat pequddatam ('year of their reckoning') uses paqad again — the same verb from verse 2, now applied to the false prophets. God's 'attending to' them means judgment.
13. The word tiflah ('unseemliness, offensiveness, repulsive folly') is stronger than the KJV's 'folly' — it carries a sense of something tasteless, offensive, indecent. The prophets of Samaria (the fallen northern kingdom) serve as a comparison point: what happened in Samaria was bad, but what is happening in Jerusalem (v. 14) is worse. Prophesying 'by Baal' (ba-Ba'al) means claiming Baal as the source of prophetic authority.
14. The word sha'arurah ('horrifying thing, something that causes shuddering') is even stronger than the tiflah of Samaria (v. 13) — an intentional escalation. Three charges are leveled: adultery (na'of), deception (halokh basheqer), and enabling evil (chizzequ yedei mere'im). The last charge is the most damning — the false prophets do not merely fail to condemn evil, they actively empower evildoers by removing the motivation to repent. Comparing Jerusalem to Sodom and Gomorrah invokes the ultimate paradigm of divine judgment (Genesis 19). The verb shuv ('turn, return, repent') appears here as the key verb of the book — the false prophets have prevented repentance.
15. Wormwood (la'anah) is a bitter plant associated with suffering and divine punishment (cf. Deuteronomy 29:17, Lamentations 3:15, 19). 'Poisoned water' (mei rosh) literally means 'water of a poisonous plant' — the combination of wormwood and poison-water reverses the prophetic role of nourishing the people with God's word. Instead of feeding truth, these prophets have fed lies, so God will feed them bitterness and poison. The word chanuppah ('godlessness, profaneness') indicates that the corruption originating from Jerusalem's prophets has contaminated the whole land — the infection started at the center.
16. The verb mahbilim ('make empty, fill with vanity') is from the root h-b-l, related to hevel ('vapor, breath, vanity') — the same word that dominates Ecclesiastes. The false prophets are pumping their audience full of insubstantial vapor. The contrast between 'their own hearts' (libbam) and 'the mouth of the LORD' (pi YHWH) is the diagnostic test for false prophecy: the source. True prophecy originates from God's mouth; false prophecy originates from the prophet's own imagination.
17. The false prophets deliver two poisonous assurances: shalom ('peace') to those who despise God, and immunity from disaster to the stubborn-hearted. The phrase sheriruti libbo ('stubbornness of his heart') is Jeremiah's signature phrase for willful rebellion (cf. 7:24, 9:13, 11:8, 13:10, 16:12, 18:12). The false prophets are telling the most rebellious people exactly what they want to hear — the opposite of prophetic responsibility. This is the 'Peace, peace, when there is no peace' theme from 6:14 and 8:11.
18. The word sod ('council, counsel, secret assembly') refers to the divine council — the heavenly assembly where God deliberates and dispatches his decrees (cf. 1 Kings 22:19-23, Isaiah 6, Job 1-2). The rhetorical question implies that the false prophets have not been admitted to God's heavenly court, so they have no authentic message to relay. A true prophet is one who has 'stood in the council' and received divine communication firsthand. The distinction between seeing, hearing, and truly listening (hiqshiv) creates a hierarchy of attentiveness — mere hearing is insufficient.

19. The word sa'arat ('storm, tempest') depicts divine judgment as an uncontrollable force of nature. The verb mitcholel ('whirling, swirling') intensifies the image — this is not a passing shower but a cyclonic force. The rendering 'burst upon' captures the violent impact of yachul ('to whirl, fall upon'). This storm image recurs in verse 19 and at the end of the chapter (v. 19), framing the false prophet material.
20. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days, in the days to come') carries eschatological weight — it looks forward to a time when current events will make sense in retrospect. The verb titbonenu ('you will understand, comprehend') promises future clarity: what now seems incomprehensible will become plain. The 'purposes of his heart' (mezimmot libbo) attributes intentionality to God's anger — this is not blind rage but deliberate execution of planned consequences.
21. The parallelism is devastating in its simplicity. Two paired denials — 'not sent / they ran' and 'not spoken / they prophesied' — expose the entire false prophetic enterprise in two lines. The verb ratsu ('they ran') implies eager, zealous activity — they were enthusiastic about delivering messages they had never received. The contrast between divine commissioning and self-appointment is the heart of the false prophecy problem.
22. The conditional 'if they had stood' (im amdu) uses the divine council language from verse 18. The logic is clear: access to God's true council produces authentic words, and authentic words produce repentance (shuv — 'turning'). The false prophets failed at the first step (no divine access), which guaranteed failure at every subsequent step. The verb veyashivu ('would have turned them') uses the hiphil of shuv — the causative form, meaning 'caused to repent.' True prophecy causes people to turn; false prophecy prevents it (v. 14).
23. This rhetorical question challenges the false prophets' operating assumption — that God is limited in spatial awareness. If God were only 'near' (miqarov), he could be avoided by distance. But as a God who is also 'far off' (merachok), nothing is beyond his sight. The question anticipates the next verse's expansion. The structure is a self-predication — God defining himself against inadequate conceptions — similar to 'I AM WHO I AM' (Exodus 3:14) in form.
24. The verb yissater ('hide oneself') in the mistrim ('hidden places, concealed spots') creates an emphatic double use of the root s-t-r ('to hide'). God's response is not merely that he sees hidden things but that his presence fills (male') all of heaven and earth — there is nowhere outside his awareness. This is one of the most explicit statements of divine omnipresence in the Hebrew Bible, rivaling Psalm 139:7-12. The false prophets operate as if God cannot observe their conduct; this verse demolishes that assumption.
25. The repeated chalamti chalamti ('I dreamed, I dreamed!') mimics the eager, breathless claims of the false prophets. Dreams were considered a legitimate channel of divine revelation (cf. Genesis 37, 40-41; Numbers 12:6), but the false prophets have turned dream-claims into a tool of deception. God emphasizes that he has heard (shamati) their claims — returning to the omniscience theme of verses 23-24. They cannot hide their lies from the one who fills heaven and earth.
26. The phrase nevi'ei tarmit libbam ('prophets of their heart's deceit') defines false prophecy precisely: these men are prophets of their own deception, not prophets of God. The word tarmit ('deceit, fraud') comes from the root r-m-h, implying deliberate misleading rather than innocent error. The exasperated 'How long?' (ad matay) voices God's impatience with the continuing fraud.
27. The verb lehashkiach ('to cause to forget') is a hiphil (causative) — the false prophets are actively engineering the erasure of God's name from Israel's memory. The parallel to the ancestors who 'forgot my name because of Baal' (shakechu avotam et shemi ba-Ba'al) draws a direct line between the current prophetic fraud and the old Baal worship. The method has changed (dreams instead of altars), but the result is the same: displacement of YHWH from Israel's consciousness.
28. God draws a sharp distinction: dream-prophets may report their dreams, but they must not confuse dreams with God's direct word (devari). The question 'What does straw have in common with grain?' (mah latteven et habbar) is a riddle with an obvious answer: nothing. Straw (teven) is the worthless husk; grain (bar) is the nutritious kernel. The false prophets' dreams are straw; God's word is grain. The two should never be confused or mixed.
29. The two metaphors — fire and hammer — work together but on different registers. Fire (esh) purifies and destroys simultaneously; a hammer (pattish) breaks through resistant material. The verb yefotsetz ('shatters, breaks apart') is intensive, describing not a tap but a violent fragmentation. The sela ('rock, cliff, crag') represents the most unyielding material imaginable. God's word overcomes what nothing else can penetrate. This verse has become one of the most frequently quoted descriptions of God's word in both Jewish and Christian tradition.
30. The verb meganevei ('stealing') accuses the false prophets of plagiarism — they copy phrases from each other rather than receiving words directly from God. The image is of prophets who cobble together convincing-sounding oracles by borrowing God-language from other prophets, creating a circular echo chamber of stolen terminology with no divine origin. This is the first of three 'I am against' (hineni al) declarations (vv. 30, 31, 32) forming a triple indictment.
31. The phrase haloqechim leshonam ('those who take their own tongues') suggests prophets who deploy their tongues as instruments without divine authorization. The biting irony of vayyine'amu ne'um ('and they declare a declaration') is that they use the very formula ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD') without having received any declaration from God. They mimic the authentic prophetic formula as a stamp of false authority. We rendered 'He declares!' to capture the audacity of claiming divine speech.
32. The word pachazutam ('recklessness, wantonness, boastfulness') describes the false prophets' cavalier attitude toward truth. They treat prophecy as performance rather than solemn divine commission. The triple denial — 'never sent, never commanded, no benefit' — builds to a comprehensive dismissal. The emphatic construction ho'il lo yo'ilu ('they absolutely do not benefit') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis: these prophets are utterly useless to the people they claim to serve.

33. The massa wordplay is the most difficult translation challenge in the chapter. The word simultaneously means 'oracle/utterance' (the prophetic sense, from nasa, 'to lift up' the voice) and 'burden/load' (the physical sense, from nasa, 'to carry'). We rendered it as 'burden' throughout to preserve the pun: the people ask for an 'oracle' (massa) and God responds that they themselves are the 'burden' (massa) he will cast off. The verb natashti ('I will cast off, abandon') extends the burden metaphor — God will drop the weight they have become.
34. God bans the use of the phrase massa YHWH ('the burden of the LORD') as a prophetic formula. The verb paqadti ('I will punish, attend to, reckon with') continues the paqad theme from earlier in the chapter. The punishment extends to the household (beto), indicating corporate consequences for individual prophetic fraud.
35. God prescribes acceptable language: instead of the loaded massa formula, the people should ask neutral questions — 'What has the LORD answered?' (meh anah YHWH) and 'What has the LORD spoken?' (mah dibber YHWH). These questions focus on content rather than claiming the prophetic authority that the massa formula implies. The replacement language is deliberately plain, stripping away the pretension that accompanied the original terminology.
36. The massa wordplay reaches its climax: the phrase itself is now banned because the people have corrupted it. The ironic reversal — 'each person's own word becomes his burden' — means that the false prophets' own fabricated oracles will become the weight that crushes them. The title 'the living God' (Elohim chayyim) contrasts sharply with the dead words of the false prophets. The verb hafaktem ('you have twisted, overturned, perverted') comes from the same root used for the 'overturning' of Sodom (Genesis 19:25), linking the vocabulary corruption to the Sodom comparison in verse 14.
37. The prescribed language from verse 35 is repeated specifically for addressing prophets. The instruction forces the prophet to claim direct divine communication ('answered you') rather than hiding behind the vague massa formula. This puts the prophet on record — he must either claim he has received a direct answer from God or fall silent.
38. The syntax becomes complex as the massa ban is reiterated. The conditional 'if you say' (im...toomeru) sets up the threat: continued use of the banned phrase after explicit prohibition constitutes defiance of a direct divine command. The sentence structure — an extended protasis awaiting its apodosis in the next verse — mirrors the building tension of the ultimatum.
39. The verb nashiti ('I will lift up') creates a final devastating massa pun: God 'lifts up' (nasa) the people as one lifts a burden (massa) — only to throw them away. The same root that gave them the prophetic word now describes their expulsion. The verb natashti ('I will cast off, abandon') completes the judgment. The city (Jerusalem) is included in the exile — God gave both the people and the city, and both will be removed from his presence (me'al panay, literally 'from before my face').
40. The closing verse pairs two synonyms for public disgrace: cherpah ('reproach, disgrace, taunting') and kelimmut ('shame, humiliation, dishonor'). Both are modified by olam ('everlasting, perpetual'), and the final clause 'which will not be forgotten' (lo tishshakech) drives home the permanence. The irony is pointed: the prophets who wanted to make the people forget God's name (v. 27) will themselves be remembered — but only for their shame. The chapter ends not with restoration but with judgment, leaving the weight of the false prophecy indictment standing.

Summary: Jeremiah 24 records a vision of two baskets of figs set before the temple of the LORD after Nebuchadnezzar had deported King Jeconiah (Jehoiachin), the officials, the craftsmen, and the smiths from Jerusalem to Babylon. One basket contains very good figs, like early-ripening figs; the other contains figs so rotten they cannot be eaten. God interprets the vision: the good figs represent the exiles in Babylon, toward whom God will turn with favor, bring back to the land, and give a heart to know him. The bad figs represent King Zedekiah and those remaining in Jerusalem or fleeing to Egypt — they will be made a horror, a reproach, and a byword, pursued by sword, famine, and plague until they are consumed.

What Makes This Remarkable: This short chapter overturns the common assumption that those who remained in Jerusalem after 597 BCE were the fortunate ones and the exiles were the cursed. Jeremiah reverses this entirely: the future belongs to the deportees, not the survivors. The promise to the exiles — 'I will give them a heart to know me' (v. 7) — anticipates the new covenant language of 31:33-34, where God will write his torah on their hearts. The vision format places this chapter alongside the great visionary passages of Amos (7:1-9, 8:1-3) and Zechariah (1-6), where God shows the prophet an ordinary object and then reveals its deeper meaning. The fig baskets are not symbolic props but real agricultural produce near the temple, transformed by divine interpretation into a theological judgment on the entire nation's future.

Translation Friction: The phrase te'anim hashskoqadot (v. 2) posed a lexical question — we rendered it as 'early figs' since bikkurah figs ripen first and are considered the choicest (cf. Hosea 9:10, Micah 7:1). The word sha'arurah (v. 9) also appeared in 23:14 and we maintained consistency by rendering it 'horror.' The covenant promise in verse 7 — 'they will be my people and I will be their God' — is the bilateral covenant formula, and we rendered it identically to its occurrence in 11:4 and throughout the project. The phrase leqelalah ('as a curse-word') in verse 9 required care: it does not mean God curses them but that their name becomes an expression others use when pronouncing curses.

Connections: The deportation of Jeconiah (597 BCE) is narrated in 2 Kings 24:10-17. The vision of figs connects to the fig tree as a symbol of Israel and Judah elsewhere (Hosea 9:10, Joel 1:7, Micah 7:1). The promise 'I will give them a heart to know me' (v. 7) anticipates the new covenant of 31:31-34 and connects to Ezekiel's parallel promise of a new heart (Ezekiel 11:19, 36:26). The judgment formula of sword, famine, and plague (v. 10) is one of Jeremiah's most characteristic triads, recurring throughout the book (14:12, 21:7, 27:8, 29:17-18, 32:24, 34:17, 38:2). The fate of those who flee to Egypt anticipates the narratives of chapters 42-44, where a remnant disobeys Jeremiah and flees to Egypt despite this warning.

¹The LORD showed me a vision: two baskets of figs placed before the temple of the LORD. This was after Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had deported Jeconiah son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, along with the officials of Judah, the craftsmen, and the metalworkers from Jerusalem, and brought them to Babylon. ²One basket had very good figs, like early-ripening figs, and the other basket had very bad figs — so bad they could not be eaten. ³Then the LORD said to me, 'What do you see, Jeremiah?' And I said, 'Figs. The good figs are very good, and the bad figs are very bad — too rotten to eat.' ⁴Then the word of the LORD came to me: ⁵This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: Like these good figs, so I will regard the exiles of Judah — whom I sent away from this place to the land of the Chaldeans — with favor. ⁶I will set my eyes on them for good and bring them back to this land. I will build them up and not tear them down; I will plant them and not uproot them. ⁷I will give them a heart to know me — that I am the LORD. They will be my people and I will be their God, for they will return to me with their whole heart. ⁸But like the bad figs, so bad they cannot be eaten — this is what the LORD says — so I will treat Zedekiah king of Judah, his officials, and the remnant of Jerusalem who remain in this land, as well as those living in the land of Egypt. ⁹I will make them a horror and a disaster to all the kingdoms of the earth — a disgrace, a byword, a taunt, and a curse-word in every place where I drive them. ¹⁰I will send sword, famine, and plague against them until they are consumed from the land that I gave to them and their ancestors.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The vision formula hir'ani YHWH ('the LORD showed me') establishes this as a divinely initiated vision, not a natural observation. The word dudaei ('baskets') refers to containers used for carrying fruit, likely woven. The deportation described here is the 597 BCE exile under Jehoiachin/Jeconiah (the same king under two names — Jeconiah is the shortened form). The charash ('craftsman') and masger ('metalworker, locksmith') were specifically targeted for deportation because of their military utility — Babylon stripped Jerusalem of its skilled labor force. We use 'Nebuchadnezzar' as the standard English form, though the Hebrew here reads Nevukhadretsar.
2. The comparison to bikkurot ('early-ripening figs, firstfruits') marks the good figs as premium quality. Early figs ripen in June, before the main August harvest, and were prized as a delicacy (cf. Isaiah 28:4, Hosea 9:10, Micah 7:1). The Hebrew emphasizes the extreme quality contrast with tovot me'od ('very good') and ra'ot me'od ('very bad') — there is no middle category. The phrase lo te'akhalnah mero'a ('they could not be eaten because of their rottenness') describes figs beyond salvage, a metaphor that will prove devastating in its application.
3. The question-and-answer format ('What do you see?') is the standard prophetic vision dialogue, paralleling Amos 7:8, 8:2 and Zechariah 4:2, 5:2. God asks not because he needs information but to draw the prophet into active participation in the revelation. Jeremiah's answer is deliberately plain — he reports exactly what he sees without interpretation. The interpretation belongs to God (vv. 4-10).
4. The standard prophetic reception formula marks the transition from vision to interpretation. The le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon introducing direct speech, consistent with project conventions.
5. The verb akkir ('I will regard, acknowledge, recognize') means more than neutral observation — it implies favorable recognition, choosing to look upon with goodwill. The startling claim is that God himself 'sent' (shillachti) the exiles to Babylon — the deportation was not merely Nebuchadnezzar's political act but God's purposeful relocation of his people. The phrase letovah ('for good, for their benefit') reframes exile as a divine act of preservation rather than punishment. This reversal of expectations — exile as grace — is the theological core of the chapter.

6. The five divine promises cascade: (1) favorable attention, (2) return to the land, (3) building, (4) planting, and (5) permanence (the negatives 'not tear down, not uproot'). The verbs 'build' (banah) and 'plant' (nata) echo Jeremiah's original commission in 1:10, where God appointed him 'to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant.' Here the destructive phase gives way to the constructive. The phrase 'set my eyes on them for good' (samti eini alehem letovah) uses the intimate language of personal attention — God watching over the exiles with active benevolence.
7. This verse is the theological climax of the chapter, foreshadowing the new covenant of 31:31-34. The verb natatti ('I will give') makes the heart a divine gift, not a human achievement — God himself enables the knowing. The bilateral covenant formula 'they will be my people and I will be their God' (vehayu li le'am ve'anokhi ehyeh lahem le'lohim) appears throughout the Pentateuch and prophets as the definition of covenant relationship (Exodus 6:7, Leviticus 26:12, Deuteronomy 26:17-18, Jeremiah 11:4, 30:22, 31:33, 32:38, Ezekiel 36:28). The verb yashuvu ('they will return') is the key Jeremiah verb shuv — the return is both physical (from exile) and spiritual (to God). The phrase bekol libbam ('with their whole heart') contrasts with the sheriut lev ('stubbornness of heart') that characterized the earlier generation.
8. The condemned group includes three categories: (1) Zedekiah and his court, (2) those remaining in Jerusalem, and (3) those who fled to Egypt. All three groups chose to avoid or escape Babylon, yet it was precisely the Babylonian exile that God designated as the path to renewal. The mention of Egypt is significant — fleeing to Egypt represents a return to the place of original bondage, a theological regression. The word she'erit ('remnant') here carries no positive connotation — unlike its usual usage as a term of hope, these are merely leftovers, not a faithful core.
9. Five terms of shame accumulate: za'avah ('horror, object of trembling'), cherep ('disgrace, reproach'), mashal ('byword, proverb used as a cautionary tale'), sheninah ('taunt, sharp saying'), and qelalah ('curse-word' — their name becomes a formula used in cursing, as in 'May you become like Jerusalem'). The phrase sha'arurah (rendered 'horror') appeared also in 23:14 describing the false prophets of Jerusalem — the same word now describes the destiny of those who listened to them. The scope 'all the kingdoms of the earth' universalizes the disgrace.
10. The triad cherev, ra'av, dever ('sword, famine, plague') is Jeremiah's signature judgment formula, recurring more than a dozen times throughout the book (14:12, 21:7, 27:8, 29:17-18, 32:24, 34:17, 38:2, 42:17, 22, 44:13). These three represent the comprehensive destruction of war: violence, deprivation, and disease. The verb tummam ('until they are consumed, until their complete end') signals total removal, not mere suffering. The land that was given (natatti) as covenant promise now becomes the ground from which they are expelled — the gift revoked. The word adamah ('soil, ground, land') rather than erets ('land, country') emphasizes the agricultural, intimate connection between people and their particular soil, making the loss more personal.

Summary: Jeremiah 25 marks a dramatic pivot in the book — from oracles directed at Judah to a vision encompassing all the nations of the earth. The chapter opens with a precise date (the fourth year of Jehoiakim, the first year of Nebuchadnezzar) and a summary of Jeremiah's twenty-three years of rejected prophetic ministry. God announces that Judah will serve Babylon for seventy years, after which Babylon itself will be judged. The second half of the chapter introduces the terrifying image of the cup of God's wrath — a goblet of wine that Jeremiah is commanded to pass to nation after nation, from Jerusalem to Egypt, Uz, Philistia, Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, Sidon, Arabia, Elam, Media, and finally Babylon ('Sheshach'). The chapter closes with an oracle of cosmic judgment: the LORD roars from on high like a lion against all flesh, and a slaughter stretches from one end of the earth to the other.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains two of Jeremiah's most consequential oracles. First, the seventy-year prophecy (v. 11-12) became the foundation for Daniel's prayer in Daniel 9:2 and the entire eschatological tradition of seventy weeks. The number seventy may represent a literal generation count or a symbolic period of completeness — the text does not resolve this, and we preserve the ambiguity. Second, the cup-of-wrath image (v. 15-29) is one of the most imitated metaphors in biblical literature, echoed in Isaiah 51:17, Ezekiel 23:31-34, Habakkuk 2:16, and ultimately Revelation 14:10 and 16:19. The Hebrew kos hayayin hachema ('the cup of the wine of wrath') is a three-word construct chain — cup-of-wine-of-wrath — packing divine fury into a single drinking vessel. We rendered the atbash cipher 'Sheshach' (v. 26) transparently, noting it as a coded name for Babylon. The sweeping geographic scope of verses 18-26, moving systematically through every known nation, transforms Jeremiah from a prophet of Judah into a prophet over all the earth — fulfilling the commission of 1:10, 'I have appointed you over nations and kingdoms.'

Translation Friction: The date formula in verse 1 required careful handling — the Hebrew gives 'the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah king of Judah; that is the first year of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon.' We preserved both dating systems as the text presents them. The verb hashkem ('rising early') in verse 3 is the characteristic Jeremiah idiom for God's persistent effort; we rendered it as 'persistently' to capture the urgency without the literal English awkwardness. The word mashchit in verse 9 can mean 'destroy' or 'corrupt,' and we chose 'destroy' for the military context. The atbash cipher Sheshach () in verse 26

encodes Babel () by substituting the first letter of the alphabet for the last, the second for the second-to-last, and so on — we retained the name and explained the cipher in a note. The phrase 'uncircumcised and circumcised alike' (v. 29, implied) in the concluding judgment required careful contextual handling.

Connections: The seventy-year prophecy (v. 11-12) is directly cited in 2 Chronicles 36:21, Ezra 1:1, and Daniel 9:2, making it one of the most cross-referenced prophecies in the Hebrew Bible. The cup-of-wrath image connects to Isaiah 51:17-22 (Jerusalem has drunk the cup; now it passes to her oppressors), Lamentations 4:21 (Edom will also drink), Ezekiel 23:31-34, and Habakkuk 2:15-16. In the New Testament, Jesus's prayer in Gethsemane — 'Let this cup pass from me' (Matthew 26:39) — draws on this prophetic tradition of the cup of divine judgment. The roaring-lion imagery in verses 30-31 connects to Amos 1:2, Joel 3:16, and Hosea 11:10. The commission to be 'a prophet to the nations' (1:5, 1:10) reaches its fullest expression in this chapter's universal scope.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the people of Judah in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah — that was the first year of Nebuchadnezzar, king of Babylon — ²which Jeremiah the prophet spoke to all the people of Judah and all the inhabitants of Jerusalem: ³From the thirteenth year of Josiah son of Amon, king of Judah, to this very day — twenty-three years — the word of the LORD has come to me, and I have spoken to you persistently, but you have not listened. ⁴The LORD sent to you all his servants the prophets, sending them persistently, but you did not listen or incline your ear to hear. ⁵They said: Turn back, each of you, from your evil way and from the wickedness of your deeds, and remain on the land that the LORD gave to you and your ancestors from ancient times and into the future. ⁶Do not follow other gods to serve and bow down to them, and do not provoke me to anger with the work of your hands — then I will do you no harm. ⁷But you did not listen to me, declares the LORD, so as to provoke me to anger with the work of your hands, to your own harm. ⁸Therefore this is what the LORD of Hosts says: Because you have not listened to my words, ⁹I am about to send for and summon all the clans of the north, declares the LORD, and for Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, my servant. I will bring them against this land and its inhabitants and against all these surrounding nations. I will devote them to destruction and make them an object of horror and scorn, and ruins that last through the ages. ¹⁰I will banish from them the sound of joy and the sound of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride, the sound of the millstone and the light of the lamp. ¹¹This entire land will become a ruin and a wasteland, and these nations will serve the king of Babylon for seventy years. ¹²When the seventy years are complete, I will punish the king of Babylon and that nation for their iniquity, declares the LORD, and the land of the Chaldeans, and I will make it a permanent wasteland. ¹³I will bring upon that land all my words that I have spoken against it — everything written in this scroll, which Jeremiah prophesied against all the nations. ¹⁴For many nations and great kings will also make them serve, and I will repay them according to their deeds and the work of their hands. ¹⁵For this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, said to me: Take this cup of the wine of wrath from my hand, and make all the nations to whom I send you drink from it. ¹⁶They will drink and stagger and go mad because of the sword I am sending among them. ¹⁷So I took the cup from the LORD's hand and made all the nations drink — all those to whom the LORD had sent me: ¹⁸Jerusalem and the cities of Judah, its kings and its officials — to make them a ruin, a horror, an object of scorn, and a curse, as they are this day; ¹⁹Pharaoh king of Egypt, his servants, his officials, and all his people; ²⁰all the mixed peoples; all the kings of the land of Uz; all the kings of the land of the Philistines — Ashkelon, Gaza, Ekron, and the remnant of Ashdod; ²¹Edom, Moab, and the Ammonites; ²²all the kings of Tyre, all the kings of Sidon, and the kings of the coastlands across the sea; ²³Dedan, Tema, Buz, and all who shave their temples; ²⁴all the kings of Arabia and all the kings of the mixed peoples who live in the desert; ²⁵all the kings of Zimri, all the kings of Elam, and all the kings of Media; ²⁶all the kings of the north, near and far, one after another; and all the kingdoms of the world on the face of the earth. And the king of Sheshach will drink after them all. ²⁷Say to them: This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says — Drink, get drunk, vomit, and fall down never to rise, because of the sword I am sending among you. ²⁸If they refuse to take the cup from your hand and drink, say to them: This is what the LORD of Hosts says — You will certainly drink. ²⁹For look — I am beginning to bring disaster on the city that bears my name, and should you go entirely unpunished? You will not go unpunished, for I am summoning a sword against all the inhabitants of the earth, declares the LORD of Hosts.

³⁰You will prophesy all these words against them and say to them:

The LORD roars from on high;
from his holy dwelling he thunders.
He roars fiercely against his fold;
he shouts like those who tread the grapes against all the inhabitants of the earth.

³¹The uproar reaches to the ends of the earth,
for the LORD has a case against the nations.
He enters judgment against all flesh;
the wicked he gives over to the sword,
declares the LORD.

³²This is what the LORD of Hosts says:
Disaster is spreading from nation to nation;
a great storm is stirring from the farthest corners of the earth.

³³The slain of the LORD on that day will stretch from one end of the earth to the other. They will not be mourned, they will not be gathered, they will not be buried — they will be like dung on the surface of the ground.

³⁴Wail, you shepherds, and cry out!
Roll in the dust, you lords of the flock!
For your time for slaughter has come;
you will be shattered like a prized vessel.

³⁵There will be no escape for the shepherds,
no way out for the lords of the flock.

³⁶The sound of the shepherds' cry,
the wailing of the lords of the flock!
For the LORD is destroying their pasture.

³⁷The peaceful meadows are silenced
because of the burning anger of the LORD.

³⁸He has left his lair like a young lion, for their land has become a desolation
because of the raging sword and because of his burning anger.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The dual dating formula synchronizes Judah's calendar with Babylon's, placing this oracle at approximately 605 BCE. This is the year of the Battle of Carchemish, when Nebuchadnezzar defeated Egypt and established Babylonian dominance over the entire region. The Hebrew uses 'Nevukhadretsar,' a closer transliteration of the Akkadian Nabû-kudurri-ušur; we use the conventional English 'Nebuchadnezzar.'
2. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') functions as a speech-introduction marker and is rendered as a colon. The address is to 'all the people' — this is a public oracle, not a private word to the king or the priests.
3. The thirteen years of Josiah correspond to 627/626 BCE, the traditional date of Jeremiah's call (1:2). Twenty-three years of prophetic ministry had produced no repentance. The idiom hashkem vedabber ('rising early and speaking') is the characteristic Jeremiah expression for persistent, tireless effort — we render it as 'persistently' rather than the literally awkward 'rising early and speaking,' consistent with our rendering in 7:13 and 11:7.

4. Again the hashkem idiom, now applied to God sending prophets. The double refusal — 'did not listen' (lo shema'tem) and 'did not incline your ear' (lo hittitem et-oznekhem) — represents a willful refusal at every level: they neither heard the message nor positioned themselves to receive it.
5. The verb shuv ('turn back, return') is Jeremiah's central term for repentance — a spatial metaphor of returning to where one belongs. The phrase min-olam ve'ad-olam ('from eternity to eternity') describes the intended permanence of the land grant; we render olam as 'ancient times' and 'into the future' to capture the Hebrew sense of time stretching beyond view in both directions, rather than the philosophically loaded 'forever and ever.'
6. The phrase 'work of your hands' (ma'aseh yedeikhem) is double-edged — it refers both to the idols they have manufactured and to the deeds of idolatry they have performed. The conditional structure is implicit in the Hebrew: the promise of 'no harm' is contingent on obedience.
7. The Hebrew lema'an ('so as to, in order that') creates a jarring purpose clause — their refusal to listen functioned as if its purpose were to provoke God. Whether this implies deliberate intent or describes the inevitable result of their actions is ambiguous in the Hebrew; we preserve the ambiguity. Ne'um YHWH is rendered with the locked formula 'declares the LORD.'
8. The title YHWH tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts') invokes God as commander of heavenly armies — the military epithet appropriate to the announcement of invasion that follows. The shift from ne'um YHWH (v. 7) to koh amar YHWH tseva'ot signals an escalation in divine authority.
9. Hinneni ('look, I am about to') signals imminent divine action. The designation avdi ('my servant') for Nebuchadnezzar is extraordinary — the same title given to Moses, David, and the prophets is here applied to a foreign conqueror. The verb hacharamtim ('devote to destruction') is cherem vocabulary — total consecration to destruction, the same verb used for the conquest of Canaan. The three-fold result — shammah (horror), shreqah (hissing/scorn), charvot olam (perpetual ruins) — is a standard Jeremianic curse formula.
10. This verse catalogs the sounds and sights of normal life that will cease — celebration (joy, gladness), domestic life (bride, bridegroom), daily labor (millstone grinding), and basic illumination (lamp). The six items progress from festive to mundane, showing that everything from weddings to the grinding of daily grain will stop. This formula recurs in 7:34, 16:9, and 33:11, and is echoed in Revelation 18:22-23 describing Babylon's fall.
11. The phrase shiv'im shanah ('seventy years') appears here and in verse 12. The number generates debate: it may refer to the period from 605 (Nebuchadnezzar's first campaign) to 539 BCE (Cyrus's conquest of Babylon), roughly sixty-six years; or from 586 (temple destruction) to 516 (temple rededication), exactly seventy years. The text itself simply states the number without resolving the calculation. We preserve the number without interpretive comment in the rendering itself.
12. The verb paqad ('visit, attend to, punish') here means to call to account — God will 'visit' Babylon's guilt upon it. The term avon ('iniquity') implies accumulated guilt, not a single offense. The judgment on Babylon is framed as symmetrical justice — the instrument of punishment will itself be punished. The 'land of the Chaldeans' (erets kasdim) identifies Babylon by its ethnic-geographic name.
13. The reference to 'this scroll' (ha-sefer ha-zeh) is a rare self-referential moment in prophetic literature. It likely refers to an earlier collection of Jeremiah's oracles against the nations (chapters 46-51), which may have originally been placed here in some textual traditions. The Septuagint (LXX) actually positions the oracles against the nations after 25:13, confirming that different arrangements of Jeremiah circulated in antiquity. We render sefer as 'scroll' rather than 'book' to reflect the physical medium of the seventh century BCE.
14. The verse describes a chain of domination — Babylon enslaved nations, and in turn other nations and kings will enslave Babylon. The verb shillam ('repay, recompense') carries the sense of completing a transaction, settling a debt. The principle of symmetrical justice — the oppressor experiencing what it inflicted — runs through the prophetic tradition (cf. Obadiah 15).
15. The kos hayayin hachema ('cup of the wine of wrath') is a compound construct chain — literally 'cup-of wine-of wrath.' The image combines intoxication with divine fury: the nations will stagger and reel not from alcohol but from the overwhelming force of God's judgment. This cup-of-wrath image is foundational to the biblical tradition, echoed in Isaiah 51:17, Ezekiel 23:31-34, Habakkuk 2:16, and Revelation 14:10.
16. Three verbs describe the effect of the cup: shatu ('they will drink'), hitgo'ashu ('they will stagger/reel'), and hitholalu ('they will go mad'). The progression moves from drinking to physical disorientation to mental collapse. The sword (cherev) is the instrument — the cup is the metaphor for the experience of judgment; the sword is the literal reality behind it.
17. Jeremiah's compliance is immediate — no protest, no intercession. The prophetic act is described as if Jeremiah physically traveled to each nation with the cup, though this is visionary rather than literal. The verb va'ashqeh ('I made them drink') uses the causative stem — the nations do not drink voluntarily.
18. Jerusalem heads the list — judgment begins with God's own people (cf. 1 Peter 4:17). The four-fold curse formula — chorbah (ruin), shammah (horror), shreqah (scorn/hissing), qelalah (curse) — is a standard Jeremianic judgment formula. The phrase 'as they are this day' (ka-yom ha-zeh) indicates the prophecy is being recorded after the fall of Jerusalem, placing the editorial frame in the exilic or post-exilic period.
19. Egypt is listed first among the foreign nations because it was Judah's traditional ally and the power Judah foolishly relied on instead of trusting God (cf. 2:18, 37:5-7). The comprehensiveness — servants, officials, all his people — indicates that no level of Egyptian society escapes judgment.
20. The ha'erev ('mixed peoples') likely refers to diverse populations living in frontier or border regions — possibly mercenary groups or mixed ethnic communities. The land of Uz is traditionally associated with the setting of Job (Job 1:1), located in the region east of Palestine. The four Philistine cities named here omit Gath, which had already been destroyed by the time of this oracle. The 'remnant of Ashdod' (she'erit Ashdod) suggests that Ashdod had already suffered significant destruction, possibly by the Assyrians in 711 BCE.

21. These three nations east and southeast of Judah were traditionally connected to Israel through ancestral kinship — Edom through Esau (Genesis 36), Moab and Ammon through Lot (Genesis 19:36-38). Their inclusion in the judgment is particularly pointed: not even blood relatives escape God's reckoning.
22. Tyre and Sidon were the great Phoenician maritime powers. The 'coastlands across the sea' (ha'i asher be'ever hayam) refers to the Mediterranean islands and coastal settlements — possibly Cyprus, Crete, and other Phoenician colonies. The scope of judgment is expanding outward from Jerusalem in concentric circles.
23. Dedan, Tema, and Buz are Arabian tribes. The phrase qetsutsai fe'ah ('those who shave their temples') refers to a distinctive haircut practice of certain Arabian desert peoples — shaving or cropping the hair at the corners of the head. This practice is mentioned in 9:25 and 49:32 and was forbidden for Israelites (Leviticus 19:27).
24. The repetition of ha'erev ('mixed peoples,' cf. v. 20) alongside Arav ('Arabia') creates a wordplay — the similar-sounding words link the concept of ethnic mixing with the Arabian desert region. These are the semi-nomadic populations of the Arabian peninsula and the Syrian-Arabian desert.
25. Zimri is an otherwise unidentified kingdom, possibly in the Arabian or eastern region. Elam (modern southwestern Iran) and Media (modern northwestern Iran) represent the far eastern reaches of the known world. The inclusion of Media is significant — the Medes would later ally with Babylon under Cyrus to create the Persian Empire that would conquer Babylon itself.
26. Sheshach () is an atbash cipher for Babel (). Atbash substitutes the first letter of the Hebrew alphabet for the last, the second for the second-to-last, and so on: shin () replaces bet (), and kaph () replaces lamed (). Babylon drinks last — the instrument of judgment becomes the final object of judgment. The coded name may reflect either literary artistry or political caution in naming the reigning superpower directly. The phrase 'all the kingdoms of the world on the face of the earth' makes the scope unmistakably universal.
27. Four brutal imperatives — shetu ('drink'), shikru ('get drunk'), qi'u ('vomit'), niplu ('fall') — escalate from consumption to collapse. The physical effects of severe intoxication serve as a metaphor for the overwhelming nature of divine judgment. The command lo taqumu ('you will not rise') transforms the drinking metaphor into a death sentence — they will fall and never stand again.
28. The emphatic infinitive absolute shato tishtu ('drinking, you will drink') removes any possibility of refusal. The nations cannot opt out of God's judgment. The absolute certainty expressed by the Hebrew construction leaves no room for negotiation — this is not an offer but a decree.
29. The argument is from greater to lesser: if God punishes his own city — the one that 'bears his name' (niqra shemi aleha, lit. 'my name is called over it') — how much less will the nations escape? The phrase niqra shemi conveys ownership and patronage; Jerusalem belongs to God, and even belonging to God does not exempt it from judgment for covenant violation. The rhetorical question hinnageh tinnaqu ('will you be completely acquitted?') expects a negative answer, reinforced by the emphatic lo tinnaqu ('you will not be acquitted').
30. The text shifts from prose to poetry at this point. The verb sha'ag ('roar') is lion imagery — God is a roaring lion against the earth (cf. Amos 1:2, Hosea 11:10, Joel 3:16). The word naveh can mean both 'dwelling' and 'pasture/fold,' creating an ambiguity: God roars from his dwelling (heaven) against his fold (his people/the earth). The grape-treaders' shout (hedad) was a rhythmic cry used during harvest — here it becomes the war cry of divine judgment, turning the joyful harvest image into a scene of slaughter.
31. The word riv ('case, controversy, legal dispute') frames God's judgment as a lawsuit — a formal legal proceeding against the nations. This is the covenant lawsuit (riv) genre familiar from Micah 6:1-2 and Hosea 4:1. The verb nishpat ('enters judgment') reinforces the legal metaphor. God is both plaintiff and judge in this cosmic court.
32. The word se'ar ('storm, tempest, whirlwind') depicts God's judgment as a massive weather event sweeping across the entire world. The phrase yarketei-arets ('farthest corners of the earth') indicates the storm comes from the remote edges of the known world — from where one cannot see what is coming until it arrives. The disaster is not localized but cascading — migoi el goi ('from nation to nation') — like a chain reaction.
33. Chalelei YHWH ('the slain of the LORD') attributes the killing directly to God — these are not casualties of war but executions of divine judgment. The three negated verbs — lo yissafdu (not mourned), lo ye'asfu (not gathered), lo yiqqaveru (not buried) — deny the dead every dignity. Lack of burial was the ultimate horror in the ancient Near East; the body exposed as dung (domen) represents absolute debasement.
34. The 'shepherds' (ro'im) are rulers and leaders, and the 'lords of the flock' (addirei hatson) are the elite among them. The verb hitpalleshu ('roll in the dust') describes extreme mourning — throwing oneself on the ground and rolling in ashes or dirt. The simile 'like a prized vessel' (kikheli chemdah) compares their destruction to the shattering of an expensive ceramic piece — beautiful, valuable, and irreparably broken. Some manuscripts read utfutsoteikhem ('your dispersions') while others read utfutsoteikhem as 'your scatterings' — both indicate the leaders will be scattered like fragments.
35. The Hebrew expresses this as the 'perishing' (avad) of flight — escape itself has been destroyed. The parallel structure — manos (flight/refuge) for the shepherds, peleitah (escape) for the lords — reinforces the total closure of all exit routes for the ruling class.
36. The subject of the destruction is explicit — YHWH shoded ('the LORD destroys'). The word mar'it ('pasture') continues the shepherd-flock metaphor: the pasture is the kingdom, and God himself is laying waste to it. The reversal is complete: the shepherd God who 'makes me lie down in green pastures' (Psalm 23:2) is now the God who destroys the pasture.
37. The phrase ne'ot hashalom ('meadows of peace/the peaceful meadows') uses shalom in its fullest sense — these are places of wholeness, flourishing, well-being, now silenced. The verb nadamu ('are silenced, are devastated') carries both meanings — literal silence (the sounds of life cease) and destruction (they are laid waste). The cause is charon af YHWH ('burning anger of the LORD') — the fierceness of God's fury.

38. The subject 'he' most likely refers to God, who has emerged from his dwelling like a young lion (kefir) leaving its thicket to hunt. The word hayonah is textually difficult — it may derive from yanah ('to oppress,' hence 'the oppressor/oppressing sword') or may be an unusual form related to cherev ('sword'). The Septuagint reads 'the sword' and many modern translations follow this. We render 'raging sword' to capture the sense of violent instrument while acknowledging the textual difficulty. The final phrase charon appo ('his burning anger') confirms that the devastation flows from God's wrath.

Summary: Jeremiah 26 narrates the immediate aftermath of the Temple Sermon — the most dangerous moment in Jeremiah's prophetic career. At the beginning of Jehoiakim's reign, God commands Jeremiah to stand in the temple courtyard and warn that if Judah does not repent, God will make the temple like Shiloh — the former sanctuary destroyed centuries earlier. The priests and prophets seize Jeremiah and demand his execution for blasphemy against the temple. But the officials and the people intervene, and Jeremiah defends himself with a simple claim: the LORD sent him. The elders then cite the precedent of Micah of Moresheth, who prophesied Jerusalem's destruction under King Hezekiah, and Hezekiah did not kill him but repented. This precedent saves Jeremiah's life. The chapter closes with the counter-example of Uriah son of Shemaiah, who preached the same message but was hunted down in Egypt and executed by Jehoiakim — demonstrating what Jeremiah narrowly escaped.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is one of the finest examples of courtroom narrative in the Hebrew Bible. The legal proceedings follow a recognizable structure: accusation (v. 8-9, by priests and prophets), defense (v. 12-15, by Jeremiah), verdict (v. 16, by officials and people), and precedent citation (v. 17-19, by elders). The split between the religious establishment (priests and prophets demanding death) and the civil establishment (officials protecting Jeremiah) is a recurring pattern in the book — the institutional religion has become Jeremiah's enemy while secular officials sometimes prove more just. The Micah citation in verse 18 is remarkable: it quotes Micah 3:12 almost verbatim, providing one of the clearest examples of inner-biblical quotation and proving that prophetic texts were being preserved and cited as authoritative within a century of their composition. The Uriah episode (v. 20-23) is included precisely because it shows what normally happened to prophets who challenged the establishment — Jeremiah's survival was the exception, not the rule. We rendered Ahikam son of Shaphan's protection (v. 24) as the decisive factor, noting that the Shaphan family appears repeatedly in Jeremiah as allies of the prophet and of reform.

Translation Friction: The phrase ka'asher dibbarta be'ozneinu ('as you have spoken in our hearing,' v. 11) required care — the priests are making Jeremiah's own words the basis of the capital charge. The word mishpat mavet ('a sentence of death,' v. 11) is literally 'a judgment of death' — we rendered it as 'deserves the death sentence' to capture the legal force. The Micah quotation (v. 18) presented a translation consistency challenge: our rendering of Micah 3:12, if we had already translated Micah, would need to match; since Micah has not yet been generated, we rendered from the Hebrew as it appears here in Jeremiah and will ensure consistency when we reach Micah. The phrase chalah et-penei YHWH ('entreated the face of the LORD,' v. 19) is an idiom for seeking God's favor; we rendered it as 'sought the favor of the LORD.'

Connections: The Temple Sermon itself is given in full in chapter 7; chapter 26 narrates the consequences of that sermon. The Shiloh reference (v. 6, 9) connects to 7:12-14, 1 Samuel 4, and Psalm 78:60 — Shiloh was the pre-Jerusalem sanctuary destroyed by the Philistines, and its ruins were a visible warning in Jeremiah's day. The Micah quotation (v. 18 = Micah 3:12) is one of the most important examples of prophetic intertextuality in the Hebrew Bible. Ahikam son of Shaphan (v. 24) connects to 2 Kings 22:12-14, where Shaphan's family was involved in Josiah's reform; his son Gedaliah will later be appointed governor by Babylon (39:14, 40:5-41:3). The Uriah episode (v. 20-23) anticipates Jehoiakim's hostility toward prophetic scrolls (chapter 36). Jesus's trial before the Sanhedrin (Matthew 26:59-66) echoes this chapter's pattern of religious leaders bringing false charges against a prophet.

- ¹At the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah, this word came from the LORD: ²This is what the LORD says: Stand in the courtyard of the house of the LORD and speak to all the people of the cities of Judah who come to worship in the house of the LORD — all the words I have commanded you to speak to them. Do not hold back a single word. ³Perhaps they will listen and each turn back from his evil way, and I will relent of the disaster I am planning to bring on them because of the wickedness of their deeds. ⁴Say to them: This is what the LORD says — If you will not listen to me by walking in my instruction that I have set before you, ⁵and by heeding the words of my servants the prophets, whom I have sent to you persistently — though you have not listened — ⁶then I will make this house like Shiloh, and I will make this city a curse among all the nations of the earth. ⁷The priests and the prophets and all the people heard Jeremiah speaking these words in the house of the LORD. ⁸When Jeremiah had finished speaking everything the LORD had commanded him to speak to all the people, the priests and the prophets and all the people seized him, saying, "You must die!" ⁹"Why have you prophesied in the name of the LORD, saying, 'This house will become like Shiloh, and this city will be desolate, without inhabitant'?" And all the people crowded around Jeremiah in the house of the LORD. ¹⁰When the officials of Judah heard about these events, they came up from the royal palace to the house of the LORD and took their seats at the entrance of the New Gate of the LORD's house. ¹¹The priests and the prophets said to the officials and all the people, "This man deserves the death sentence, because he has prophesied against this city, as you have heard with your own ears." ¹²Then Jeremiah said to all the officials and all the people: "The LORD sent me to prophesy against this house and against this city all the words you have heard. ¹³Now therefore, reform your ways and your deeds, and obey the voice of the LORD your God, and the LORD will relent of the disaster he has pronounced against you. ¹⁴As for me — I am in your hands. Do with me whatever you consider right and just. ¹⁵But know this with certainty: if you put me to death, you will bring innocent blood upon yourselves and upon this city and its inhabitants, for in truth the LORD sent me to you to speak all these words in your hearing." ¹⁶Then the officials and all the people said to the priests and the prophets, "This man does not deserve the death sentence, for he has spoken to us in the name of the LORD our God." ¹⁷Then some of the elders of the land stood up and addressed the whole assembly of the people:

¹⁸"Micah of Moresheth prophesied in the days of Hezekiah king of Judah and said to all the people of Judah: This is what the LORD of Hosts says —

Zion will be plowed like a field,
Jerusalem will become a heap of rubble,
and the temple mount will become a wooded ridge."

¹⁹Did Hezekiah king of Judah and all Judah put him to death? Did he not fear the LORD and seek the favor of the LORD, so that the LORD relented of the disaster he had pronounced against them? But we are about to bring great disaster on ourselves! ²⁰There was also a man who prophesied in the name of the LORD — Uriah son of Shemaiah, from Kiriath-jearim — who prophesied against this city and this land in words just like Jeremiah's. ²¹When King Jehoiakim and all his warriors and all the officials heard his words, the king sought to put him to death. But Uriah heard of it and was afraid, and he fled to Egypt. ²²King Jehoiakim sent men to Egypt — Elnathan son of Achbor and men with him — to Egypt. ²³They brought Uriah out of Egypt and took him to King Jehoiakim, who struck him down with the sword and threw his body into the burial ground of the common people. ²⁴But the hand of Ahikam son of Shaphan was with Jeremiah, so that he was not handed over to the people to be put to death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The date formula places this event at the start of Jehoiakim's reign (approximately 609 BCE), shortly after Josiah's death at Megiddo. Jehoiakim was installed by Pharaoh Necho after deposing Josiah's son Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:34), making him a vassal king dependent on Egypt — a political context that shaped his hostility toward prophets predicting Babylonian dominance.
2. The command al tigma davar ('do not diminish a word') is critical — God forbids Jeremiah from softening, editing, or abbreviating the message. The same prohibition appears in Deuteronomy 4:2 and 12:32 regarding the Torah. The setting — the temple courtyard — is deliberately provocative: Jeremiah will denounce the temple inside the temple complex, before an audience of worshipers from across Judah.
3. The word ulai ('perhaps') is remarkable — God holds open the possibility of repentance without guaranteeing it. The verb nichamti ('I will relent') describes God changing his intended course of action in response to human repentance — the same theological concept as Jonah 3:10. This is not divine uncertainty but genuine openness to a changed outcome if the people change their behavior. The word ra'ah appears three times in this verse with different nuances: darkko hara'ah ('his evil way'), hara'ah ('the disaster'), and ro'a ma'aleleihem ('the wickedness of their deeds').

4. The word torah is rendered 'instruction' here rather than 'law' to capture the Hebrew sense of teaching and guidance rather than mere legal code. The phrase 'set before you' (natatti lifneikhem) echoes the Deuteronomic choice formula (Deuteronomy 30:15, 19) — God places the instruction in front of them; the choice to follow it is theirs.
5. The hashkem idiom ('rising early and sending') appears again as Jeremiah's characteristic expression for God's persistent effort to reach his people through the prophets. The parenthetical admission — 'though you have not listened' — is devastating: God acknowledges that the sending has been futile, yet the demand to listen remains.
6. Shiloh was the central sanctuary of Israel before Jerusalem, where the Ark of the Covenant resided during the period of the Judges (Joshua 18:1, 1 Samuel 1-4). It was destroyed, probably by the Philistines after the battle of Ebenezer (1 Samuel 4), and its ruins were a visible warning in Jeremiah's day (see Psalm 78:60, Jeremiah 7:12-14). The threat to make the temple 'like Shiloh' directly challenges the popular theology of temple inviolability — the belief that God would never allow his own house to be destroyed.
7. Three groups hear the sermon: priests (kohanim), prophets (nevi'im), and all the people (kol ha'am). By the end of the chapter, these groups will be on opposite sides — the priests and prophets demanding death, the officials and people acquitting Jeremiah. The seeds of that division are planted here.
8. The verb yitpesu ('they seized') indicates a physical arrest, not merely verbal opposition. The death sentence mot tamut ('dying you will die') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute — an irrevocable verdict pronounced on the spot, the same formula used in Genesis 2:17 ('you will certainly die'). The phrase 'everything the LORD had commanded him' emphasizes that Jeremiah held nothing back, obeying the instruction of verse 2.
9. The accusation centers on prophesying 'in the name of the LORD' (bashem YHWH) — they do not dispute that Jeremiah claims divine authority; they dispute the content of his message. The phrase 'like Shiloh' is the specific trigger: predicting the temple's destruction was tantamount to blasphemy in popular theology. The verb yiqqahel ('assembled, crowded together') has a hostile connotation here — this is a mob forming, not a congregation gathering.
10. The sarei Yehudah ('officials of Judah') are the civil magistrates, distinct from the religious establishment. They 'came up' (ya'alu) from the palace to the temple — the palace was lower in elevation than the temple mount. Their 'sitting' (yeshvu) at the gate is a judicial act — sitting in the gate was the formal posture for hearing legal cases (cf. Ruth 4:1, Amos 5:15). They constitute themselves as a court.
11. The phrase mishpat mavet ('judgment of death') is a formal legal charge demanding capital punishment. The prosecutors are the priests and prophets — the religious establishment. The accusation is not that Jeremiah lied but that he 'prophesied against this city' (nibba el ha'ir hazot) — the content, not the authority, is the offense. The appeal to the audience — 'as you have heard with your own ears' (ka'asher shema'tem be'ozneikhem) — treats the audience as witnesses for the prosecution.
12. Jeremiah's defense is strikingly simple — he does not retract, soften, or explain away his words. His sole defense is divine commission: YHWH shelachani ('the LORD sent me'). The claim to be divinely sent is either his complete vindication or his complete condemnation — if true, killing him is rebellion against God; if false, he deserves death as a false prophet (Deuteronomy 18:20).
13. Even on trial for his life, Jeremiah continues to preach repentance rather than plead for his own safety. The verb heitivu ('make good, improve, reform') calls for genuine change, not mere remorse. The promise that God will 'relent' (yinnachem) of the disaster repeats the theology of verse 3 — divine judgment is conditional, not fatalistic.
14. Jeremiah's surrender is total: hineni beyedkhem ('I am in your hands'). He does not resist, flee, or bargain. The phrase ka-tov ve-ka-yashar be'eineikhem ('as seems good and right in your eyes') leaves the decision entirely to the court — but the words 'right' (yashar) and 'good' (tov) carry moral weight, implicitly challenging them to act justly.
15. The emphatic yadoa ted'u ('knowing, you will know') uses the infinitive absolute to stress absolute certainty. The phrase dam naqi ('innocent blood') invokes the most severe category of guilt in Israelite law — the shedding of innocent blood pollutes the land and brings collective guilt (cf. Deuteronomy 19:10, 2 Kings 21:16, 24:4). Jeremiah's warning transforms the trial: if they execute him, the crime shifts from his prophesying to their murder.
16. The verdict is a complete reversal: the officials and people acquit Jeremiah using the same legal phrase (mishpat mavet) the prosecutors used in verse 11, but negated — ein la'ish hazeh mishpat mavet ('there is no death sentence for this man'). The decisive factor is the divine name: bashem YHWH Eloheinu dibber eleinu ('in the name of the LORD our God he spoke to us'). They accept Jeremiah's claim to divine commission. The alignment has shifted — officials and people against priests and prophets.
17. The ziqunei ha'arets ('elders of the land') are a distinct group from the officials (sarim) — they represent the traditional authority of the tribal and family leadership, the repository of communal memory and precedent. Their standing to speak (yaqumu) indicates they have legal standing in the proceedings.
18. This is a near-verbatim quotation of Micah 3:12, one of the most significant examples of inner-biblical citation. The elders quote a century-old prophecy from memory, proving that prophetic oracles were being preserved and treated as authoritative precedent. Micah of Moresheth (a town southwest of Jerusalem) prophesied during Hezekiah's reign (c. 715-686 BCE). The three parallel predictions — Zion plowed, Jerusalem ruined, temple mount overgrown — describe total destruction of the religious center. The word bamot ya'ar ('high places of a forest') suggests the temple mount reverting to wild woodland. The argument is legal precedent: Micah said worse things than Jeremiah, and Hezekiah did not execute him.

19. The elders' argument is two-fold: (1) Hezekiah heard a worse prophecy and responded with repentance rather than execution, and God relented; (2) if we kill Jeremiah, we will bring 'great disaster on ourselves' (ra'ah gedolah al nafshotenu). The verb chalah et-penei YHWH ('sought the face/favor of the LORD') describes earnest, humble petition — Hezekiah's response to the prophet was prayer, not persecution. The verb yinnachem ('relented') is the same used in verse 3 and verse 13, creating a theological frame: God relents when people repent; killing the prophet prevents repentance and guarantees disaster.
20. The Uriah episode (vv. 20-23) functions as a counter-example showing what typically happened to prophets who challenged the establishment. Kiriath-jearim was a city northwest of Jerusalem, where the Ark of the Covenant had been housed before David brought it to Jerusalem (1 Samuel 7:1-2, 2 Samuel 6:2). The phrase kekhol divrei Yirmeyahu ('according to all the words of Jeremiah') establishes that Uriah's message was identical to Jeremiah's — yet their fates diverged dramatically.
21. Jehoiakim's response to Uriah contrasts sharply with Hezekiah's response to Micah (v. 19). Where Hezekiah feared God and sought his favor, Jehoiakim fears nothing and seeks the prophet's death. The word gibborim ('warriors, mighty men') suggests Jehoiakim deployed military force against a prophet — a gross misuse of royal power. Uriah's flight to Egypt is ironic given Jeremiah's consistent warnings against relying on Egypt for protection.
22. Elnathan son of Achbor was a high-ranking official; his father Achbor had served under Josiah (2 Kings 22:12, 14). Elnathan may be the same official who later urged Jehoiakim not to burn Jeremiah's scroll (36:25), suggesting a complex figure who obeyed the king's orders here but later showed more conscience. The repetition of 'to Egypt' (el Mitsrayim) at the end emphasizes the extraordinary length Jehoiakim went to — sending an extradition party to a foreign country to retrieve a prophet.
23. The execution is described with cold brevity — vayakkehu ba-cheret ('he struck him with the sword'). The final indignity is the disposal of his body: va-yashlekh et-nivlato el-qivrei benei ha'am ('he threw his corpse into the burial ground of the common people'). In Israelite culture, a prophet deserved honorable burial; throwing his body (nivlah, 'corpse, carcass' — the same word used for animal carcasses) into the commoners' graves was a deliberate act of posthumous shaming.
24. Ahikam son of Shaphan was part of the reform-minded family that had supported Josiah's religious renewal — his father Shaphan was the scribe who read the discovered scroll of the Torah to Josiah (2 Kings 22:8-10), and Ahikam himself was part of the delegation sent to consult Huldah the prophetess (2 Kings 22:12-14). His son Gedaliah would later become the governor appointed by Babylon after Jerusalem's fall (2 Kings 25:22, Jeremiah 39:14, 40:5-6). The 'hand' (yad) of Ahikam represents his political influence and personal protection — he shielded Jeremiah with his authority.

Summary: Jeremiah 27 opens with God commanding the prophet to fashion a yoke of straps and bars and place it on his own neck — a sign-act dramatizing subjection to Babylon. Through envoys visiting Jerusalem, Jeremiah sends word to the kings of Edom, Moab, Ammon, Tyre, and Sidon: submit to Nebuchadnezzar, the servant God has appointed over the nations, or face sword, famine, and plague. Jeremiah then turns to Zedekiah and the priests of Judah with the same message, directly countering the false prophets who promise that the Temple vessels seized by Babylon will be returned shortly. The chapter closes with Jeremiah's challenge: if these prophets truly speak for God, let them intercede that the remaining vessels not be carried away.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter presents one of Jeremiah's most provocative sign-acts: the prophet wearing an ox yoke through the streets and diplomatic corridors of Jerusalem. The political audacity is staggering — Jeremiah is telling allied foreign kings, through their own ambassadors, to surrender to Babylon. He calls Nebuchadnezzar 'my servant' (avdi, v. 6), applying a term of covenant honor to a pagan emperor. The verb avad ('to serve') creates a theological wordplay throughout: the nations must 'serve' Nebuchadnezzar because God has designated him as 'my servant.' The false prophets' claim that the Temple vessels will return 'soon' (v. 16) directly contradicts Jeremiah's insistence that more vessels will be taken. The stakes are not merely theological but geopolitical — Jeremiah is accused of treason precisely because his prophecy aligns with Babylonian interests.*

Translation Friction: *The chapter superscription (v. 1) reads 'Jehoiakim' in the Masoretic Text but the context clearly describes Zedekiah's reign (v. 3, 12). Most scholars regard this as a scribal error or redactional artifact; we rendered the text as it stands and noted the discrepancy. The term moseroth ('straps, bonds') in verse 2 is debated — it could refer to leather thongs binding the yoke-bars together or to the yoke apparatus as a whole. We rendered it as 'straps and crossbars' to convey both components. The phrase 'until I have consumed them by his hand' (v. 8) uses the verb tamam in a way that could mean 'complete' or*

'consume/destroy,' and we chose 'destroyed' to match the threatening context. The false prophets' promise in verse 16 uses the word meherah ('quickly, soon'), which we rendered as 'soon' to preserve the temporal contrast with Jeremiah's longer timeline.

Connections: The yoke sign-act connects directly to chapter 28, where Hananiah breaks the yoke and Jeremiah responds with the iron-yoke oracle. Nebuchadnezzar as God's 'servant' (avdi) echoes 25:9 and 43:10 — a title otherwise reserved for patriarchs, Moses, David, and the prophets. The false prophets' message about the Temple vessels connects to 2 Kings 24:13 and 25:13-17, where the full removal is documented historically. The command to 'serve the king of Babylon and live' anticipates Jeremiah's counsel to Zedekiah in 38:17-18. The theological claim that God gives sovereignty to whomever he wills (v. 5) parallels Daniel 2:21 and 4:17.

¹At the beginning of the reign of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah, this word came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²This is what the LORD said to me: Make yourself straps and crossbars, and place them on your neck. ³Then send them to the king of Edom, the king of Moab, the king of the Ammonites, the king of Tyre, and the king of Sidon — through the envoys who have come to Jerusalem to Zedekiah king of Judah. ⁴Charge them with a message for their masters: This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says — this is what you are to say to your masters: ⁵I made the earth, the people and the animals on the face of the earth, by my great power and my outstretched arm, and I give it to whomever I see fit. ⁶Now I have given all these lands into the hand of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, my servant. Even the wild animals I have given him to serve him. ⁷All nations will serve him, and his son, and his grandson, until the appointed time for his own land arrives. Then many nations and great kings will make him serve them. ⁸Any nation or kingdom that will not serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon — that will not put its neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon — I will punish that nation with sword, famine, and plague, declares the LORD, until I have destroyed them by his hand. ⁹So do not listen to your prophets, your diviners, your dream interpreters, your soothsayers, or your sorcerers who say to you, 'You will not serve the king of Babylon.' ¹⁰For they are prophesying falsehood to you, with the result that you will be driven far from your land — I will banish you, and you will perish. ¹¹But the nation that puts its neck under the yoke of the king of Babylon and serves him — I will let it remain on its own soil, declares the LORD, and it will farm it and dwell on it. ¹²To Zedekiah king of Judah I spoke this same message: Put your necks under the yoke of the king of Babylon — serve him and his people, and you will live. ¹³Why should you and your people die by sword, famine, and plague, as the LORD has declared against any nation that will not serve the king of Babylon? ¹⁴Do not listen to the words of the prophets who say to you, 'You will not serve the king of Babylon,' for they are prophesying falsehood to you. ¹⁵For I did not send them, declares the LORD, yet they prophesy in my name with falsehood — so that I will banish you, and you will perish, both you and the prophets who prophesy to you. ¹⁶To the priests and to all this people I spoke, saying: This is what the LORD says — do not listen to the words of your prophets who prophesy to you, saying, 'Look, the vessels of the house of the LORD will be brought back from Babylon soon.' For they are prophesying falsehood to you. ¹⁷Do not listen to them. Serve the king of Babylon and live. Why should this city become a ruin? ¹⁸But if they are truly prophets and if the word of the LORD is with them, let them intercede with the LORD of Hosts so that the vessels still remaining in the house of the LORD, in the palace of the king of Judah, and in Jerusalem are not taken to Babylon. ¹⁹For this is what the LORD of Hosts says concerning the pillars, the sea, the stands, and the rest of the vessels remaining in this city — ²⁰which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon did not take when he deported Jeconiah son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, from Jerusalem to Babylon, along with all the nobles of Judah and Jerusalem — ²¹For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says concerning the vessels remaining in the house of the LORD, in the palace of the king of Judah, and in Jerusalem: ²²To Babylon they will be taken, and there they will remain until the day I attend to them, declares the LORD. Then I will bring them up and restore them to this place.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Masoretic Text reads 'Jehoiakim' (yehoyaqim), but the events described in this chapter clearly occur during Zedekiah's reign (v. 3, 12). Several Hebrew manuscripts and the Syriac Peshitta read 'Zedekiah' here. Most scholars consider this a scribal error, possibly caused by confusion with the superscription of chapter 26. We render the Masoretic Text as it stands and note the discrepancy.

1. Le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon introducing the direct divine speech that follows.
2. The nouns moseroth ('straps, bonds') and mototh ('bars, poles') describe the components of an ox yoke — leather straps binding wooden crossbars to the animal's neck. God commands Jeremiah to construct and wear this apparatus as a prophetic sign-act, a physical dramatization of the subjection he is about to proclaim. The plural forms may indicate multiple yokes, one for each nation addressed in the following verses.
3. The five nations listed were neighboring kingdoms considering an anti-Babylonian coalition. The envoys (mal'akhim, 'messengers') had come to Jerusalem for diplomatic consultations with Zedekiah — Jeremiah intercepted the political gathering with a prophetic counter-message. This verse confirms that the events take place under Zedekiah, not Jehoiakim as the superscription states.
4. The double formula — 'This is what the LORD says' followed by 'this is what you are to say' — creates a chain of prophetic authority: God speaks to Jeremiah, Jeremiah speaks to the envoys, the envoys speak to their kings. The title 'LORD of Hosts' (YHWH tseva'ot) emphasizes God's sovereignty over all armies, both heavenly and earthly — a pointed claim when addressing military allies.
5. God's claim to universal sovereignty grounds the entire chapter: the one who created everything has the authority to assign political dominion. The phrase 'outstretched arm' (zero'i ha-netuyah) is Exodus language — the same arm that struck Egypt now assigns Babylon as sovereign. The expression yashar be'ainai ('right in my eyes') asserts unilateral divine discretion over international affairs.
6. Calling Nebuchadnezzar avdi ('my servant') is theologically explosive. This is covenant-honor vocabulary — the same title given to Abraham, Moses, David, and the prophets. God is declaring that a pagan emperor serves as his chosen instrument. The extension to 'wild animals' (chayyat hasadeh) echoes the creation mandate of Genesis 1:28 and the sovereignty language of Daniel 2:38, signaling total dominion over the created order.
7. The three-generation dynasty (Nebuchadnezzar, his son, his grandson) roughly corresponds to the Neo-Babylonian succession, though the historical details are compressed. The phrase 'the appointed time for his own land' (et artso) indicates that Babylon's dominion is not permanent but divinely bounded — Babylon too will be subjected. The reversal ('make him serve them') points to Babylon's eventual fall to Persia in 539 BCE.
8. The triad 'sword, famine, and plague' (cherev, ra'av, dever) is Jeremiah's signature judgment formula, recurring over a dozen times in the book (14:12, 21:7, 21:9, 24:10, 29:17-18, 32:24, 32:36, 34:17, 38:2, 42:17, 42:22, 44:13). The yoke metaphor in verse 2 is now made explicit — refusing the literal yoke means refusing divine assignment. The verb tamam ('to complete, to finish off') here carries the sense of total destruction.
9. The five-fold list — prophets (nevi'im), diviners (qosemim), dream interpreters (chalomot), soothsayers (onenim), and sorcerers (kashshefim) — catalogs the entire spectrum of ancient Near Eastern religious consultation. By grouping nevi'im ('prophets') with practitioners of divination and sorcery, Jeremiah strips the false prophets of legitimacy, equating them with pagan practitioners forbidden by Deuteronomy 18:10-14.
10. The word sheqer ('falsehood, lie') is one of Jeremiah's most frequent terms for false prophecy (see 5:31, 14:14, 20:6, 23:25-26, 29:9). The irony is devastating: the false prophets promise that resistance will prevent exile, but their deceptive counsel is precisely what will cause the exile they claim to prevent.
11. The reward for submission is strikingly simple: remaining on ancestral land, farming, and dwelling in peace. The verb avadah ('work it, farm it') creates a wordplay with avad ('serve') — the nation that 'serves' Babylon will 'work' its own land. The promise of land retention echoes the Deuteronomic land theology where possession of the land is contingent on obedience.
12. The same message delivered to foreign kings is now directed at Zedekiah — Judah receives no special exemption. The blunt imperative vichyu ('and live') reduces the choice to its starkest terms: submission means survival, resistance means death. The plural 'your necks' (tsavvareikhem) addresses the king and his court collectively.
13. The rhetorical question lammah tamutu ('why should you die?') recurs in Jeremiah's appeals to Zedekiah (cf. 38:17-18). It presents the choice as self-evidently absurd — death by stubbornness when survival is available through submission. The recurring triad of sword, famine, and plague reappears from verse 8.
14. This is the second explicit warning against false prophets in the chapter (cf. v. 9). Here the warning is directed specifically to Zedekiah and the Judean court, not to the foreign envoys. The accusation sheqer hem nibbe'im ('falsehood they are prophesying') uses the emphatic word order, placing 'falsehood' first for rhetorical force.
15. The claim lo shelachtim ('I did not send them') is the definitive test of prophetic authenticity in the Deuteronomic tradition (Deuteronomy 18:20). The dark irony is that the false prophets will share the fate of those they deceived — both the deceivers and the deceived will perish together. Prophesying 'in my name' (bishmi) while unsent constitutes the gravest possible prophetic offense.
16. The false prophets' specific claim concerns the Temple vessels taken by Nebuchadnezzar in 597 BCE (2 Kings 24:13). Their promise of imminent return ('soon,' meherah) contradicts Jeremiah's message that the exile will be long (cf. 25:11-12, 29:10). The address shifts to the priests, who had a particular interest in the Temple vessels — their liturgical function depended on this sacred equipment.
17. The appeal shifts from national survival to urban survival — 'this city' (ha'ir hazzot) is Jerusalem itself. The word chorbah ('ruin, desolation') anticipates what will happen in 586 BCE when the city is indeed destroyed. The question format implies the choice is still open, though the rhetorical pressure is immense.
18. Jeremiah issues a devastating challenge: if these prophets genuinely carry God's word, they should use their prophetic authority to prevent further loss, not promise the return of what is already gone. The verb yifge'u ('let them intercede, press upon') implies urgent, persistent petition. The mention of 'vessels still remaining' reveals that a first deportation of Temple equipment has already occurred (597 BCE) and more remain at risk.

19. The specific Temple furnishings named — the bronze pillars (ha'ammudim, cf. 1 Kings 7:15-22), the bronze sea (ha-yam, the massive basin described in 1 Kings 7:23-26), and the bronze stands (ha-mekhonot, 1 Kings 7:27-39) — are the monumental pieces too large to have been taken in the first deportation. Their eventual removal is documented in 2 Kings 25:13-17 and Jeremiah 52:17-23.
20. Jeconiah (yekhanyah, also called Jehoiachin and Coniah) was deported in 597 BCE after a three-month reign (2 Kings 24:8-16). The word chorei ('nobles, freeborn') designates the aristocratic and administrative class taken in the first deportation. The verse establishes the historical timeline: a first deportation has already occurred, and the items left behind are now at stake.
21. The full divine title 'LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel' lends maximum authority to the pronouncement that follows. The triple location — Temple, royal palace, city — indicates that sacred vessels were distributed across multiple sites, not confined to the sanctuary alone.
22. The chapter closes with an unexpected note of hope. The verb paqad ('attend to, visit, take account of') here carries its positive sense — divine visitation for restoration rather than punishment. The promise that the vessels will eventually return presupposes a long exile (contra the false prophets' 'soon') but affirms that Babylon is not the final destination. The historical fulfillment came under Cyrus (Ezra 1:7-11), though Jeremiah does not name the agent. This verse simultaneously contradicts the false prophets (the vessels will go to Babylon, not return now) and offers hope (they will eventually return).

Summary: Jeremiah 28 presents the dramatic confrontation between Jeremiah and Hananiah son of Azzur, a prophet from Gibeon who publicly contradicts Jeremiah's yoke message. In the Temple, before priests and people, Hananiah announces that within two years God will break the yoke of Babylon, return the Temple vessels, and restore King Jeconiah. He then seizes the yoke from Jeremiah's neck and snaps it. Jeremiah's initial response is remarkable — he says 'Amen, may the LORD do so' — then walks away. Later, God sends Jeremiah back with a devastating counter-oracle: the broken wooden yoke will be replaced by an iron yoke, and Hananiah will die within the year for inciting rebellion against the LORD. Hananiah dies in the seventh month, two months after his prophecy.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the most vivid prophet-versus-prophet confrontation in the Hebrew Bible. The theological tension is extraordinary: both men speak 'in the name of the LORD,' both use prophetic formulas, both claim divine authority. How does anyone in the audience distinguish true from false? Jeremiah's initial reaction — walking away rather than immediately counter-propheying — is one of the most humanly honest moments in prophetic literature. He does not fabricate an instant rebuttal; he waits until God actually speaks to him. The replacement of the wooden yoke with iron bars (v. 13) transforms Hananiah's defiant act into an escalation of judgment: resistance does not remove the yoke but makes it heavier. Hananiah's death within two months of his prophecy (vv. 16-17) fulfills Deuteronomy 18:20-22's test of prophetic authenticity with brutal finality.

Translation Friction: The date formula in verse 1 presents textual issues: 'that same year, at the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah' in the fourth year is difficult, since the fourth year is not the 'beginning' of a reign. The phrase may be a redactional gloss or may use re'shit loosely. We rendered it as given and noted the tension. Jeremiah's response 'Amen — may the LORD do so' (v. 6) could be read as sincere hope, diplomatic irony, or prophetic testing; we preserved the ambiguity. The verb sarah ('to rebel, turn aside') in verse 16 is the same word used for political rebellion and theological apostasy — we chose 'rebellion' to capture both dimensions. The time reference 'that same year, in the seventh month' (v. 17) places Hananiah's death approximately two months after the confrontation (which occurred in the fifth month, v. 1).

Connections: This chapter is the direct sequel to chapter 27's yoke sign-act. Hananiah's promise to 'break the yoke of the king of Babylon' (v. 4) directly inverts Jeremiah's command to 'put your neck under the yoke' (27:12). The promise to return Jeconiah connects to Jeremiah's oracle against Jeconiah in 22:24-30. The iron yoke intensification connects to Deuteronomy 28:48, where iron yoke is a covenant curse for disobedience. The death-sentence formula 'this year you will die' echoes 2 Kings 7:2, 19 and anticipates the prophetic death-sentence pattern. The criterion of prophetic authenticity — fulfilled prediction — draws on Deuteronomy 18:21-22. Hananiah's prophecy of a two-year return contradicts Jeremiah's seventy-year timeline (25:11-12, 29:10).

¶In that same year — at the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the fourth year, in the fifth month — Hananiah son of Azzur, the prophet from Gibeon, spoke to me in the house of the LORD, in the sight of the priests and all the people, saying: ²This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I have broken the yoke of the king of Babylon. ³Within two more years I will bring back to this place all the vessels of the house of the LORD that Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon took from this place and carried to Babylon. ⁴I will also bring back to this place Jeconiah son of Jehoiakim, king of Judah, along with all the exiles of Judah who went to Babylon, declares the LORD, for I will break the yoke of the king of Babylon. ⁵Then the prophet Jeremiah said to the prophet Hananiah in the sight of the priests and all the people standing in the house of the LORD: ⁶The prophet Jeremiah said: Amen! May the LORD do so. May the LORD fulfill your words that you have prophesied — to bring back the vessels of the house of the LORD and all the exiles from Babylon to this place. ⁷But listen carefully to this word that I am speaking in your hearing and in the hearing of all the people: ⁸The prophets who came before me and before you from ancient times prophesied against many lands and great kingdoms of war, disaster, and plague. ⁹As for the prophet who prophesies peace — only when the word of that prophet comes to pass will it be known that the LORD truly sent him. ¹⁰Then Hananiah the prophet took the yoke-bar from the neck of the prophet Jeremiah and broke it. ¹¹Hananiah spoke before all the people: This is what the LORD says — just so will I break the yoke of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon within two years from the neck of all the nations. And the prophet Jeremiah went on his way. ¹²Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah after Hananiah the prophet had broken the yoke-bar from the neck of the prophet Jeremiah: ¹³Go and say to Hananiah: This is what the LORD says — you have broken bars of wood, but you have made bars of iron in their place. ¹⁴For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I have placed an iron yoke on the neck of all these nations to make them serve Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and they will serve him. I have even given him the wild animals. ¹⁵Then the prophet Jeremiah said to the prophet Hananiah: Listen, Hananiah — the LORD did not send you, and you have made this people trust in a lie. ¹⁶Therefore this is what the LORD says: I am about to remove you from the face of the earth. This year you will die, because you have spoken rebellion against the LORD. ¹⁷Hananiah the prophet died that same year, in the seventh month.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The date formula is internally awkward: 'beginning of the reign' (re'shit mamlekhet) does not naturally pair with 'the fourth year,' since a fourth year is not the beginning of a reign. The phrase may be a scribal addition linking this to 27:1, or re'shit may be used loosely to mean 'in the early period.' We render the Masoretic Text as it stands. Hananiah is introduced with full credentials — named, patronymic, titled 'the prophet' (hannavi), city of origin (Gibeon) — establishing him as a legitimate prophetic figure, not an obvious fraud. The public setting — Temple, priests, and people — makes this a formal prophetic confrontation.
2. Hananiah uses the full prophetic messenger formula with the complete divine title — identical in form to Jeremiah's own oracles. The verb shabarti ('I have broken') is in the prophetic perfect, treating a future event as already accomplished. This is standard prophetic grammar used by both true and false prophets, making it impossible to distinguish authenticity by form alone.
3. The phrase be'od shenatayim yamim ('within two more years of days') is precise — Hananiah commits to a verifiable timeline, unlike vague prophetic promises. This specificity directly contradicts Jeremiah's seventy-year prophecy (25:11-12). The phrase 'this place' (hamaqom hazzeh) repeated twice emphasizes the Temple itself as the site of loss and promised restoration.
4. Hananiah extends his prophecy beyond the Temple vessels to include the return of Jeconiah (Jehoiachin) himself and all the exiles. This directly contradicts Jeremiah's oracle against Jeconiah in 22:24-30, which declares that none of his descendants will sit on David's throne. The word galut ('exile, exiled community') has become a technical term by this period for the Judean deportees in Babylon.
5. The narrator deliberately titles both men hannavi ('the prophet') — 'the prophet Jeremiah' and 'the prophet Hananiah.' The text refuses to prejudice the reader by labeling one as false before the outcome is known. The public audience — priests and people standing in the Temple — underscores that this is not a private exchange but a formal prophetic contest.
6. Jeremiah's response is one of the most striking moments in the book. His 'Amen' (amen) and 'May the LORD do so' (ken ya'aseh YHWH) could be read as genuine hope — Jeremiah would prefer Hananiah's optimistic prophecy to be true — or as devastating irony, since Jeremiah knows it is false. The word yaqem ('may he establish, fulfill') is the same verb used for covenant fulfillment. We preserve the ambiguity because the Hebrew sustains both readings.
7. The particle akh ('but, however, only') introduces a sharp contrast — Jeremiah's apparent concession in verse 6 is immediately followed by a qualification. The phrase be'ozneikha ('in your ears') is emphatic, demanding personal attention. Jeremiah shifts from personal wish to prophetic criterion.

8. Jeremiah appeals to prophetic precedent: the mainstream tradition of Israelite prophecy has been overwhelmingly one of judgment, not comfort. Prophets like Amos, Hosea, Micah, and Isaiah predominantly warned of war (milchamah), disaster (ra'ah), and plague (dever). The phrase min-ha'olam ('from ancient times') stretches back to the earliest prophetic tradition. Jeremiah is arguing that warnings of doom need no special validation — they align with the prophetic norm.
9. This is Jeremiah's application of the Deuteronomic test of prophecy (Deuteronomy 18:21-22): the prophet of judgment needs no special proof because judgment is the default prophetic message, but the prophet of shalom ('peace, well-being') bears the burden of proof — only fulfillment can validate his word. The word be'emet ('in truth, truly') from the root aleph-mem-nun emphasizes genuine divine commissioning versus self-appointed prophesying.
10. Hananiah responds not with words but with a counter sign-act — he seizes Jeremiah's prophetic prop and destroys it. The word hammotah ('the bar, the yoke-beam') is the singular of mototh from 27:2. The verb vayyishberehu ('and he broke it') is violent and decisive. By breaking the yoke, Hananiah physically enacts his prophecy that God will break Babylon's yoke. Both prophets are now using the same dramatic prophetic genre — embodied proclamation.
11. The word kakhah ('just so, in this manner') ties the physical act to the prophetic word — 'just as I broke this yoke, God will break Babylon's.' The final sentence is stunning in its understatement: vayelexh yirmeyahu hannavi ledarko ('and Jeremiah the prophet went on his way'). Jeremiah walks away. He does not argue, does not counter-prophecy, does not invoke divine authority. He has no word from God at this moment and he will not fabricate one. This silence is among the most honest moments in prophetic literature.
12. The phrase acharei shevor ('after the breaking') explicitly marks a gap in time between the confrontation and God's response. Jeremiah walked away without a word because he had none — now, after an unspecified interval, the word of the LORD comes. The narrative structure validates Jeremiah's silence: a true prophet waits for God to speak rather than manufacturing a response under pressure.
13. The divine response transforms Hananiah's defiant act into an escalation of judgment. The contrast between motot ets ('bars of wood') and motot barzel ('bars of iron') is devastatingly ironic — Hananiah's attempt to break the yoke has only made it unbreakable. Wood can be splintered; iron cannot. The wordplay on the root sh-b-r ('break') from verse 10 is deliberately inverted: what was broken has been replaced by what cannot be broken.
14. The iron yoke echoes Deuteronomy 28:48, where serving enemies 'with an iron yoke on your neck' is listed among the covenant curses for disobedience. By invoking this image, God confirms that Babylon's dominion is not random geopolitics but covenant-curse fulfillment. The repetition of 'wild animals' (chayyat hasadeh) from 27:6 reaffirms the totality of Nebuchadnezzar's divinely granted dominion.
15. The verdict lo shelachakha YHWH ('the LORD did not send you') is the definitive declaration of false prophecy (cf. 27:15, Deuteronomy 18:20). The verb hivathta ('you have caused to trust') from the root b-t-ch is causative — Hananiah has not merely spoken falsehood but has actively manufactured false confidence in an entire people. The word sheqer ('lie, falsehood') is Jeremiah's standard term for the entire apparatus of false prophecy.
16. The verb meshallechakha ('I am sending you away') uses the same root sh-l-ch as the accusation 'the LORD did not send you' (lo shelachakha) — a bitter wordplay. God did not 'send' Hananiah as a prophet, but God will 'send' him from the earth. The word sarah ('rebellion, turning aside') carries both political and theological weight — Hananiah has incited rebellion against God's declared purpose. The death sentence hashanah attah met ('this year you will die') sets a verifiable prophetic timeline, just as Hananiah set his own two-year timeline in verse 3.
17. The narrative fulfillment is reported with terse finality — no elaboration, no dramatic scene, no further comment. The seventh month (Tishri) is approximately two months after the fifth month (Av) confrontation in verse 1. The speed of fulfillment validates Jeremiah and condemns Hananiah by the very criterion Jeremiah proposed in verse 9: the prophet whose word comes to pass is the one truly sent by the LORD. The narrator still calls Hananiah hannavi ('the prophet') even in death — the title was his public identity, now rendered tragically ironic.

Summary: Jeremiah 29 preserves the prophet's letter to the exiles deported to Babylon in 597 BCE with King Jehoiachin.

Against the false prophets who promise a swift return, Jeremiah delivers an astonishing command: settle down, build houses, plant gardens, marry, have children, and seek the welfare (shalom) of the foreign city where God has placed you. The chapter contains one of the most quoted verses in all of scripture — 'For I know the plans I have for you, declares the LORD, plans for welfare and not for disaster, to give you a future and a hope' (v. 11). The second half of the chapter pronounces judgment on the false prophets in Babylon — Ahab son of Kolaiah and Zedekiah son of Maaseiah — and especially on Shemaiah the Nehelamite, who wrote letters from Babylon demanding Jeremiah's arrest.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter reverses a fundamental prophetic instinct. Prophets typically call Israel to separate from pagan nations, yet Jeremiah commands the exiles to integrate into Babylonian civic life and pray for its prosperity, because 'in its welfare you will find your welfare.' This theology of exile — that God's people can flourish in a foreign land, that faithfulness does not require a temple or a homeland — becomes foundational for diaspora Judaism and eventually for Christian theology of living in the world. Verse 11 is routinely quoted in isolation as a personal promise, but in its original context it is addressed to an entire exiled community and is conditioned on a seventy-year timeline (v. 10). The word machshevot ('plans, thoughts') in verse 11 deserves careful attention — it is the same word used of human scheming in other contexts, here applied to God's purposeful designs. The condemnation of Shemaiah in the chapter's closing verses shows that the battle between true and false prophecy extended beyond Jerusalem into the exile community itself.

Translation Friction: The word shalom appears with full covenantal weight in verses 7 and 11, requiring expanded rendering. The term machshevot (v. 11) carries a semantic range from 'thoughts' to 'plans' to 'purposes' — we rendered it as 'plans' for clarity while documenting the fuller range. The verb darash ('seek') in verse 7 is the same verb used for seeking God in worship, now applied to seeking the welfare of a pagan city — a deliberately provocative usage that must be preserved. Shemaiah's letter (vv. 24-32) introduces complex reported speech within reported speech, requiring careful handling of quotation layers. The phrase acharit vetikvah ('a future and a hope,' v. 11) could also be rendered 'an outcome and an expectation' — the more familiar rendering is retained but the Hebrew range is documented.

Connections: The seventy-year exile timeline connects to 25:11-12 and is referenced in Daniel 9:2 and 2 Chronicles 36:21. The command to seek the city's welfare anticipates Jesus's teaching to love enemies and pray for persecutors (Matthew 5:44). The false prophets condemned here connect to the broader anti-false-prophecy polemic of chapters 23, 27-28. Verse 11's 'plans for welfare and not for disaster' echoes the covenant blessings and curses of Deuteronomy 28-30. The letter format is unique in prophetic literature and anticipates the apostolic epistles of the New Testament. The promise 'you will seek me and find me when you search for me with all your heart' (v. 13) echoes Deuteronomy 4:29.

¹These are the words of the letter that Jeremiah the prophet sent from Jerusalem to the surviving elders of the exile, to the priests, the prophets, and all the people whom Nebuchadnezzar had deported from Jerusalem to Babylon — ²after Jeconiah the king, the queen mother, the court officials, the leaders of Judah and Jerusalem, the craftsmen, and the metalworkers had gone out from Jerusalem — ³The letter was sent by the hand of Elasah son of Shaphan and Gemariah son of Hilkiah, whom Zedekiah king of Judah dispatched to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon in Babylon. It said: ⁴This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says to all the exiles whom I sent into exile from Jerusalem to Babylon: ⁵Build houses and settle in them. Plant gardens and eat their produce. ⁶Marry and have sons and daughters. Find wives for your sons and give your daughters in marriage, so that they too may bear sons and daughters. Multiply there — do not diminish. ⁷Seek the welfare of the city where I have sent you into exile, and pray to the LORD on its behalf, for in its welfare you will find your welfare. ⁸For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Do not let your prophets who are among you and your diviners deceive you, and do not listen to the dreams that you are prompting them to dream. ⁹For they are prophesying falsely to you in my name. I did not send them, declares the LORD. ¹⁰For this is what the LORD says: When seventy years are completed for Babylon, I will attend to you and fulfill my good promise to you — to bring you back to this place. ¹¹For I know the plans I have for you, declares the LORD — plans for welfare and not for disaster, to give you a future and a hope. ¹²Then you will call on me and come and pray to me, and I will listen to you. ¹³You will seek me and find me when you search for me with all your heart. ¹⁴I will let myself be found by you, declares the LORD. I will restore your fortunes and gather you from all the nations and from all the places where I have driven you, declares the LORD, and I will bring you back to the place from which I sent you into exile. ¹⁵Because you have said, 'The LORD has raised up prophets for us in Babylon' — ¹⁶For this is what the LORD says concerning the king who sits on the throne of David and all the people who remain in this city — your relatives who did not go out with you into exile: ¹⁷This is what the LORD of Hosts says: I am sending against them the sword, famine, and plague. I will make them like rotten figs, so bad they cannot be eaten. ¹⁸I will pursue them with sword, famine, and plague, and make them a horror to all the kingdoms of the earth — an object of cursing, devastation, scorn, and disgrace among all the nations where I have driven them, ¹⁹because they did not listen to my words, declares the LORD, when I sent my servants the prophets to them persistently — but you would not listen, declares the LORD. ²⁰But as for you — hear the word of the LORD, all you exiles whom I sent from Jerusalem to Babylon. ²¹This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says concerning Ahab son of Kolaiah and Zedekiah son of Maaseiah, who are prophesying lies to you in my name: I am handing them over to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he will strike them down before your eyes. ²²From them a curse-formula will be drawn by all the exiles of Judah who are in Babylon: 'May the LORD make you like Zedekiah and like Ahab, whom the king of Babylon roasted in the fire' — ²³because they committed outrageous acts in Israel: they committed adultery with their neighbors' wives and spoke lying words in my name, which I never commanded them. I am the one who knows, and I am the witness, declares the LORD. ²⁴To Shemaiah the Nehelamite, say this: ²⁵This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Because you sent letters in your own name to all the people in Jerusalem, to Zephaniah son of Maaseiah the priest, and to all the priests, saying — ²⁶'The LORD has appointed you as priest in place of Jehoiada the priest, to be an overseer in the house of the LORD over every madman who acts as a prophet — you should put him in the stocks and the neck-iron.' ²⁷'So why have you not rebuked Jeremiah of Anathoth, who is acting as a prophet among you? ²⁸For he has sent word to us in Babylon saying: The exile will be long. Build houses and settle in them. Plant gardens and eat their produce.' ²⁹Zephaniah the priest read this letter aloud in the hearing of Jeremiah the prophet. ³⁰Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ³¹Send word to all the exiles: This is what the LORD says concerning Shemaiah the Nehelamite — Because Shemaiah prophesied to you when I did not send him, and he made you trust in a lie, ³²therefore this is what the LORD says: I am about to punish Shemaiah the Nehelamite and his descendants. He will have no one living among this people, and he will not see the good that I am going to do for my people, declares the LORD, because he spoke rebellion against the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew sefer ('scroll, letter, document') indicates a formal written communication, not a casual note. This is the only prophetic letter preserved in the Hebrew Bible. The word yeter ('remainder, survivors') indicates that some of the elder leadership had already died or been eliminated since the deportation.
2. Jeconiah (Yekhanyah) is also known as Jehoiachin and Coniah (cf. 22:24). The gevirah ('queen mother') held significant political status in Judah. The deportation of charash ('craftsmen') and masger ('metalworkers, locksmiths') was strategic — Babylon removed the skilled labor needed for military resistance (cf. 2 Kings 24:14-16). The word sarisim can mean 'eunuchs' or 'court officials' — we render as 'court officials' since the term had broadened by this period to include non-castrated palace administrators.
3. Jeremiah used a diplomatic delegation as his mail service — Zedekiah's own ambassadors carried the prophet's letter to the exiles. Elasah was the son of Shaphan, the scribe who had found the Book of the Law under Josiah (2 Kings 22:3-10), indicating that this family was sympathetic to Jeremiah's prophetic ministry. Gemariah son of Hilkiah may be connected to Hilkiah the high priest from Josiah's reform (2 Kings 22:8).
4. The critical theological claim is in the verb higleti — 'whom I sent into exile.' God takes ownership of the deportation. Nebuchadnezzar was the instrument, but God was the agent. This reframes exile not as divine defeat but as divine discipline. The full divine title 'LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel' asserts sovereignty over both the heavenly armies and the covenant people simultaneously.
5. The imperatives are strikingly domestic: build, settle, plant, eat. These are the verbs of permanence, not temporary encampment. God is commanding long-term investment in Babylonian life, directly contradicting the false prophets who promised a swift return (cf. 28:3). The word shevu ('settle, dwell') implies putting down roots, not merely surviving.
6. The command extends to a second generation — the exiles must plan for grandchildren, not a quick return. The verbs revu ('multiply') and al-tim'atu ('do not diminish') echo the creation mandate of Genesis 1:28 and God's promises to the patriarchs. Even in exile, the covenant community must grow and flourish. This is not mere survival but covenant fruitfulness in an alien land.
7. This verse is theologically revolutionary. The verb dirshu ('seek') is used elsewhere for seeking God (Deuteronomy 4:29, Amos 5:4) — now applied to seeking the shalom of Babylon, the empire that destroyed Jerusalem. The repetition of shalom ('in its shalom you will have shalom') creates an inseparable bond between the exiles' welfare and the welfare of their captors. We render shalom as 'welfare' rather than 'peace' here because the context demands the broader meaning — complete well-being, not just absence of conflict.
8. The phrase asher attem machlimim ('which you are causing to be dreamed') is remarkable — the exiles are not merely being deceived; they are actively commissioning the dreams they want to hear. The Hiphil form implies the audience is driving the false prophecy by seeking out prophets who will tell them what they desire. This is prophetic supply meeting popular demand.
9. The phrase bishmi ('in my name') makes the offense graver — these prophets do not merely predict wrongly; they invoke the divine name to authorize their lies. The verb shlachtim ('I sent them') is the key criterion for true prophecy in Jeremiah — a genuine prophet is one whom God sends (cf. 1:7, 23:21, 23:32, 28:15).

10. The seventy-year timeline (first stated in 25:11-12) sets the expectation for an extended exile, directly contradicting Hananiah's two-year prediction (28:3). The verb efqod ('I will attend to, visit') carries the double sense of divine attention — God visits to judge (as with Babylon) and to deliver (as with Israel). The phrase devari hatov ('my good word/promise') indicates that restoration is not a new plan but the fulfillment of an existing divine commitment.
11. This is one of the most frequently quoted verses in the entire Bible, often removed from its context. In the Hebrew, machshavot (from the root ch-sh-v, 'to think, plan, devise') carries more weight than the English 'plans' — it implies intentional, purposeful thought, the same word used for a craftsman's designs or a military strategist's calculations. The pair acharit vetikvah is rendered 'a future and a hope' following the most natural English reading; the KJV's 'expected end' reflects a different parsing. Acharit means 'latter end, outcome, posterity' and tikvah means 'hope, expectation, cord' (from the root q-v-h, 'to wait, to hope'). The verse's power lies in its context: it is spoken to people in exile who will not live to see the promise fulfilled — the seventy-year timeline means this is a promise for their children and grandchildren.
12. Three verbs describe the exiles' return to God: qara ('call'), halakh ('come, go'), and hitpallel ('pray'). The sequence moves from initial cry to deliberate approach to sustained prayer. God's response — 'I will listen' — reverses the exile dynamic where God refused to listen to a disobedient people (cf. 11:11, 14:12).
13. This verse echoes Deuteronomy 4:29, where Moses promised that Israel would find God when they sought him with all their heart — even from exile. The verb biqqashtem ('you will seek') and dirshu ('search') are near-synonyms intensifying the idea of wholehearted pursuit. The condition bekhol levavkhem ('with all your heart') mirrors the Shema's total devotion (Deuteronomy 6:5). God is findable — but only to those who search without reservation.
14. The Niphal venimtseti ('I will let myself be found') is reflexive — God makes himself available to be discovered by those who seek. The phrase shavti et shevutkhem ('I will restore your fortunes') is a wordplay on the root shuv — the same root that means 'return, repent.' Restoration (shevut) and repentance (teshuvah) share the same linguistic root, binding them together. God again claims agency over the exile — 'where I have driven you' — maintaining the theology that exile was divine discipline, not divine failure.
15. The exiles' claim that God raised up prophets in Babylon directly challenges Jeremiah's authority as God's spokesman from Jerusalem. The irony is sharp: the 'prophets' the exiles trust are the very ones God is about to condemn as frauds.
16. The shift turns back to Jerusalem. The 'king on David's throne' is Zedekiah, the puppet king installed by Nebuchadnezzar. The word acheikhem ('your relatives, your brothers') reminds the exiles that those left behind in Jerusalem are still family — but they are about to face worse judgment.
17. The triad of sword, famine, and plague (cherev, ra'av, dever) is Jeremiah's signature judgment formula, appearing over fifteen times in the book. The rotten-fig image recalls the vision of chapter 24, where two baskets of figs represented the exiles (good figs) and those remaining in Jerusalem (bad figs). The Hebrew sho'arim ('horrible, shuddering') describes figs so repulsive they cause revulsion.
18. The four-fold curse formula — alah ('cursing'), shammah ('devastation, desolation'), shereqah ('hissing, whistling in scorn'), and cherpah ('reproach, disgrace') — is a Jeremican expansion of the Deuteronomic curse vocabulary. The hissing (shereqah) describes the involuntary gasp of horror from passersby who see the ruins, a sound combining shock and contempt.
19. The Jeremican idiom hashkem veshaloch ('rising early and sending') again conveys God's tireless effort to reach his people through the prophets (cf. 7:25, 25:4, 26:5). The abrupt shift from third person ('they did not listen') to second person ('you would not listen') directly addresses the exiles, collapsing the distance between past and present generations of disobedience.
20. The emphatic ve'attem ('but as for you') redirects the oracle to the exilic audience. Again God asserts agency over the exile: shillachti ('I sent'). The command to hear (shim'u) contrasts with the refusal to hear in the previous verse.
21. These are not the biblical king Ahab or King Zedekiah — these are otherwise unknown false prophets bearing the same names. Their execution by Nebuchadnezzar would serve as public proof that their prophecies were false. The phrase le'eineikhem ('before your eyes') emphasizes that the exiles will witness the judgment themselves.
22. The verb qalam ('roasted') is graphic and specific — execution by fire, likely referring to the Babylonian practice of burning convicted criminals alive (cf. Daniel 3). Their names become proverbial curse material — the ultimate reversal for men who claimed to speak for God. The curse-formula (qelalah) invokes their fate as the worst thing one could wish upon an enemy.
23. The word nevalah ('outrage, disgraceful folly') is the term used for the most egregious social violations in Israel — rape (Genesis 34:7, 2 Samuel 13:12), violation of hospitality (Judges 19:23-24), and covenant-breaking. Their double crime is moral and prophetic: adultery violates the social covenant, and false prophecy violates the divine commission. God's self-identification as both knower (yodea) and witness (ed) uses legal language — God is simultaneously the omniscient judge and the eyewitness who can testify.
24. Shemaiah is identified as hannechelami ('the Nehelamite'), which may refer to a place of origin or may be a wordplay on chalom ('dream'), implying 'the dreamer' — a sarcastic epithet for a false prophet who claims divine dreams. The ambiguity may be intentional.
25. Shemaiah sent his own counter-letter from Babylon to Jerusalem, creating a prophetic letter-war across the empire. He wrote beshimkha ('in your own name') — not in God's name but in his own authority, yet attempting to exercise priestly power from exile. Zephaniah son of Maaseiah served as a temple official who would have authority to act on such instructions.

26. Shemaiah's letter invokes Jehoiada the priest as a precedent for temple police authority. The word meshugga ('madman') was used dismissively of prophets by their opponents (cf. 2 Kings 9:11, Hosea 9:7) — Shemaiah characterizes Jeremiah as insane. The mahpekhet ('stocks' — a device that twists the body into a painful position) and tsinnoq ('neck-iron, collar') are instruments of public punishment and humiliation previously used against Jeremiah (cf. 20:2).
27. Shemaiah demands to know why Zephaniah has not used his authority to silence Jeremiah. The dismissive hammitnabei ('who makes himself a prophet, who acts as a prophet') denies the legitimacy of Jeremiah's call. The identification 'of Anathoth' — Jeremiah's hometown — may carry a sneer: he is a small-town prophet presuming to speak for God.
28. Shemaiah quotes Jeremiah's own letter (v. 5) back to Jerusalem with outrage. The phrase arukhah hi ('it will be long') summarizes the seventy-year message that the false prophets found intolerable. The very words of divine instruction — build, settle, plant, eat — become Shemaiah's evidence for prosecution.
29. Rather than acting on Shemaiah's demand to arrest Jeremiah, Zephaniah reads the letter to Jeremiah himself — a quiet act of either sympathy or fair warning. The phrase be'oznei ('in the ears of') indicates public or formal reading aloud, not private communication.
30. The standard prophetic reception formula signals a direct divine response to Shemaiah's challenge. God answers the attempted suppression with a counter-oracle.
31. The phrase va'ani lo shelachtivu ('and I did not send him') is the definitive criterion of false prophecy in Jeremiah — legitimacy comes only from divine commission (cf. 23:21, 28:15). The verb hivtiach ('he made you trust, gave you confidence') indicates that Shemaiah's false prophecy was not merely wrong information but a false ground for confidence that prevented the people from accepting the reality of their situation.
32. The punishment is total exclusion — Shemaiah's entire line is cut off from the restored community. The phrase lo yir'eh batov ('he will not see the good') is particularly cruel in context: God has just promised restoration (vv. 10-14), and Shemaiah will be excluded from it. The word sarah ('rebellion, turning aside, revolt') characterizes false prophecy not as mere error but as incitement to rebellion against divine authority. The punishment mirrors the crime: Shemaiah tried to prevent the exiles from hearing God's true word, and now he is prevented from participating in God's promised future.

Summary: Jeremiah 30 opens the Book of Consolation (chapters 30-33), the heart of Jeremiah's hope oracles. God commands the prophet to write all his words in a scroll, then declares that the days are coming when he will restore the fortunes of Israel and Judah. The chapter moves through terror to triumph: a vivid depiction of anguish so severe it is compared to a man in labor (v. 6), followed by the promise of deliverance from foreign bondage, the raising up of 'David their king' (v. 9), and the healing of wounds that others have called incurable. The chapter closes with the whirlwind of the LORD's wrath against the wicked, framing restoration not as cheap comfort but as the fruit of divine justice.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter marks a dramatic tonal shift in Jeremiah. The prophet whose oracles have been dominated by judgment, destruction, and exile now pivots to sustained hope — but hope that passes through suffering, not around it. The wound/healing imagery is central: God acknowledges that he himself inflicted the wound ('I struck you as an enemy strikes,' v. 14), yet he is also the healer. The mention of 'David their king' (v. 9) introduces a messianic expectation — not David personally resurrected, but a future ruler from David's line whom God will raise up. This connects to the 'righteous Branch' of 23:5-6 and becomes foundational for messianic theology in both Jewish and Christian traditions. The command to write everything in a scroll (v. 2) is itself significant — it suggests that these hope oracles were composed as a distinct literary collection before being incorporated into the larger book of Jeremiah.

*Translation Friction: The verb shuv ('restore, return') dominates this chapter in multiple forms, requiring careful attention to which sense is operative in each instance. The phrase 'David their king' (v. 9) is rendered literally without resolving whether this refers to a literal Davidic restoration or a messianic figure — the ambiguity is preserved with notes documenting both readings. The wound/healing vocabulary (makkah, shever, teruphah, arukah) carries precise medical connotations that resist simple English equivalents. The phrase 'a time of distress for Jacob' (v. 7) — et tsarah le-Ya'aqov — is traditionally rendered 'Jacob's trouble' and carries significant weight in eschatological interpretation; we render it plainly while noting the traditional reading. The closing verses (vv. 23-24) reuse judgment language from 23:19-20 nearly verbatim, and we preserve the parallel rather than disguising it.*

Connections: The command to write in a scroll connects to 36:2 where Baruch writes Jeremiah's oracles. The 'time of distress for Jacob' (v. 7) echoes Daniel 12:1 and is developed in eschatological literature. 'David their king' connects to 23:5-6 (the righteous Branch), Ezekiel 34:23-24, 37:24-25, and Hosea 3:5. The wound/healing imagery connects to Isaiah 1:5-6 and anticipates 33:6. The breaking of the yoke (v. 8) reverses the yoke imagery from chapters 27-28 where Jeremiah wore a yoke symbolizing Babylonian subjugation. The closing whirlwind oracle (vv. 23-24) is nearly identical to 23:19-20, creating a literary frame connecting judgment of false prophets with the promise of restoration.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: Write down in a scroll all the words that I have spoken to you. ³For the days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will restore the fortunes of my people Israel and Judah, says the LORD. I will bring them back to the land that I gave to their ancestors, and they will take possession of it. ⁴These are the words that the LORD spoke concerning Israel and Judah:

⁵For this is what the LORD says:

A cry of terror we have heard — fear, and no peace.

⁶Ask now and consider —

can a man bear a child?

Then why do I see every warrior with his hands on his hips like a woman in labor, and every face drained of color?

⁷How terrible! For that day is great —

there is none like it.

It is a time of distress for Jacob, but he will be saved out of it.

⁸On that day, declares the LORD of Hosts,

I will break the yoke from your neck
and tear apart your chains,
and foreigners will enslave you no longer.

⁹Instead they will serve the LORD their God and David their king, whom I will raise up for them.

¹⁰So do not be afraid, my servant Jacob, declares the LORD,
and do not be dismayed, Israel.

For I am going to save you from far away,
and your descendants from the land of their captivity.
Jacob will return and be at rest,
at ease, with no one to cause him fear.

¹¹For I am with you to save you, declares the LORD.

I will make a complete end of all the nations
where I scattered you,
but I will not make a complete end of you.
I will discipline you with justice —
but I will by no means leave you unpunished.

¹²For this is what the LORD says:
Your fracture is beyond healing;
your wound is severe.

¹³No one pleads your case for healing;
there is no remedy for you, no recovery.

¹⁴All your lovers have forgotten you;
they care nothing for you.
For I struck you as an enemy strikes, with the discipline of a cruel one,
because your iniquity is great
and your sins are many.

¹⁵Why do you cry out over your fracture?
Your pain is beyond cure.
Because your iniquity is great
and your sins are many,
I have done these things to you.

¹⁶Therefore all who devour you will be devoured, and all your enemies — every one of them — will go into captivity.
Those who plunder you will become plunder,
and all who loot you I will give over to be looted.

¹⁷For I will bring healing to you and cure you of your wounds, declares the LORD, because they have called you 'Outcast' —
'That is Zion; no one cares about her.'

¹⁸This is what the LORD says:
I am about to restore the fortunes of Jacob's tents and have compassion on his dwellings.
The city will be rebuilt on its own mound,
and the citadel will stand in its rightful place.

¹⁹From them will come thanksgiving and the sound of celebration.
I will multiply them, and they will not decrease;
I will honor them, and they will not be insignificant.

²⁰His children will be as they were in former times,
and his assembly will be established before me.
I will punish all who oppress them.

²¹His leader will be one of his own,
and his ruler will come from his midst.
I will bring him near, and he will approach me —
for who would otherwise risk his life to approach me? declares the LORD.

²²You will be my people,
and I will be your God.

²³Look — the storm of the LORD!
Wrath has gone out,
a whirlwind sweeping onward.
It will burst upon the heads of the wicked.

²⁴The burning anger of the LORD will not turn back until he has accomplished it, until he has carried out the purposes of his heart.
In days to come you will understand this.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic reception formula. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') functions as a colon introducing direct speech and is rendered accordingly rather than retained as a redundant English word.
2. The command ketav-lekha ('write for yourself') initiates what scholars call the Book of Consolation (chapters 30-33). The word sefer can mean 'book, scroll, document' — we render 'scroll' as the physical medium of the ancient world. This command to write parallels 36:2 where God later instructs Jeremiah to dictate all his oracles to Baruch, suggesting these hope oracles were preserved as a distinct written collection.
3. The phrase shavti et shevut ('I will restore the fortunes') opens the Book of Consolation with the same formula used in 29:14. Both Israel (the northern kingdom, destroyed in 722 BCE) and Judah (the southern kingdom, now in exile) are included in the restoration promise — this is a pan-Israelite hope, not limited to one kingdom. The verb vireshuha ('they will possess it') echoes the Deuteronomic conquest language, framing the return as a second entry into the promised land.
4. This verse functions as a secondary heading, introducing the oracles that follow. The dual address to both Israel and Judah reinforces the pan-Israelite scope of the restoration promise.
5. The oracle shifts to poetry. The word charadah ('trembling, terror, dread') describes physical shaking from fear. The phrase ve'ein shalom ('and there is no peace') echoes the false prophets' empty promise of 'Peace, peace!' (6:14, 8:11) — the reality is the opposite of what they proclaimed. The first-person plural 'we have heard' may represent the exilic community or a prophetic identification with the people's experience.
6. The image is deliberately shocking — mighty warriors (gever, 'strong man, warrior') reduced to the posture of a woman in labor, hands gripping their hips in agony. The word yerakon ('greenness, pallor') describes the sickly color of extreme fear or pain — faces literally turning green. The rhetorical question 'can a man bear a child?' sets up the absurdity: the answer should be no, yet here they are, doubled over like women giving birth. The Hebrew chalatsav ('his loins, his hips') specifically refers to the area of the body associated with both childbirth and masculine strength.
7. The interjection hoi ('alas, woe, how terrible') is a funeral-lament particle, used when death or catastrophe looms. The phrase et tsarah le-Ya'aqov is traditionally rendered 'the time of Jacob's trouble' — a phrase that has taken on eschatological significance in various interpretive traditions (cf. Daniel 12:1). We render 'a time of distress for Jacob' to stay close to the Hebrew without importing later theological frameworks. The critical turn is the final clause: umimmenah yivvashe'a ('but from it he will be saved') — the distress is not the end of the story.
8. The yoke imagery directly reverses chapters 27-28, where Jeremiah wore a wooden and iron yoke symbolizing Babylonian domination. The verb eshbor ('I will break') and the noun ul ('yoke') recall Hananiah's symbolic breaking of Jeremiah's yoke (28:10) — what the false prophet did prematurely in symbolic theater, God will do in reality at the appointed time. The word mosrotekha ('your bonds, chains') adds a second image of bondage beyond the yoke. The shift between second person ('your neck') and third person ('him') is characteristic of Hebrew prophetic poetry.
9. The pairing of 'the LORD their God' and 'David their king' creates a dual loyalty structure: covenant allegiance to God and political allegiance to a Davidic ruler. The verb aqim ('I will raise up') connects to the 'righteous Branch' oracle of 23:5 (using the same root q-w-m) and to Ezekiel's parallel promise in 34:23-24 and 37:24-25. Hosea 3:5 uses the identical phrase 'David their king.' Whether this refers to a restored Davidic monarchy or a messianic figure transcending historical kingship is left open in the text itself — the rendering preserves the ambiguity.
10. The address 'my servant Jacob' echoes Isaiah 41:8-10 and 44:1-2, placing Jeremiah's oracle in the broader prophetic tradition of comfort. The triple description of peace — shaqat ('rest, be quiet'), sha'anani ('at ease, tranquil'), and ein macharid ('none causing fear') — paints a comprehensive picture of security. The phrase ein macharid ('none making afraid') is a covenant-blessing formula from Leviticus 26:6 — the restored future will fulfill the original covenant promises.

11. The distinction is critical: the nations face kalah ('complete destruction, annihilation'), but Israel faces yissar ('discipline, correction') — painful but purposive. The phrase lamishpat ('with justice, according to judgment') indicates that God's discipline is measured and proportional, not arbitrary. The final clause venaqqeh lo anaqqeka ('I will certainly not leave you unpunished') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute to stress that mercy does not mean impunity. This verse appears nearly identically in 46:28, framing the oracles against the nations.
12. The medical vocabulary is precise: shever ('fracture, break, shattering') describes a catastrophic structural break, and makkah ('wound, blow, plague') refers to an injury inflicted by a blow. The adjective anush ('incurable, desperate, beyond remedy') and nachlah ('grievous, sickly') paint a clinical picture of a patient given no hope of recovery. The feminine singular address personifies Israel/Judah as a wounded woman — a striking shift from the masculine 'Jacob' of the previous verses.
13. The word mazor ('healing, binding up of a wound') refers to the medical treatment of bandaging. The phrase teruphot refu'ot ('healing remedies, medicines of cure') uses two near-synonyms intensifying the hopelessness — not just one medicine is missing, but the entire category of healing is unavailable. The legal metaphor dan dinekh ('one judging your case, pleading your cause') introduces a courtroom image: no advocate will step forward on behalf of this patient.
14. The 'lovers' (me'ahavayikh) are the foreign allies Judah courted for political protection — Egypt, Assyria, and others — who have now abandoned her (cf. Ezekiel 16, 23). The most theologically jarring statement is hikkitikh ('I struck you') — God identifies himself as the one who inflicted the wound, and he did so makkat oyeve ('as an enemy strikes'). God temporarily took the posture of an enemy toward his own people. The reason is stated plainly: rov avonekh ('the greatness of your iniquity') and atsmu chatto'tayikh ('your sins were numerous'). The distinction between avon ('iniquity, guilt') and chata'ot ('sins, failures') preserves the Hebrew differentiation between the condition of guilt and the individual acts of transgression.
15. God's question is not sympathetic but confrontational: why cry out when you brought this upon yourself? The repetition of rov avonekh and atsmu chatto'tayikh from verse 14 hammers the point — the suffering has a cause, and the cause is Israel's own faithlessness. The final asiti elleh lakh ('I have done these things to you') is stark divine ownership of the judgment. Yet in context, this brutal honesty is preparation for healing — God must diagnose before he can cure.
16. The word lakhen ('therefore') marks the pivot from diagnosis to promise — precisely because God inflicted the wound justly, he now turns justice against the oppressors. The fourfold reversal (devourers devoured, enemies exiled, plunderers plundered, looters looted) uses measure-for-measure justice language. The verb forms create precise mirror images: okhlayikh ye'akhelu ('your devourers will be devoured'), shosayikh limshissah ('your plunderers to plunder'), bozezeyikh etten lavaz ('your looters I will give to looting').
17. The word arukhah ('healing, new flesh over a wound') specifically describes the growth of new tissue — this is not merely pain relief but genuine regeneration. The motive clause is striking: God heals not because Israel has repented but because the nations have dismissed Zion as worthless. The taunt niddachah ('outcast, driven away') and doresh ein lah ('no one seeks her') provoke God's protective instinct — he will not let his people be written off by their contemptors. The verb darash ('seek, care for') is the same verb used in 29:7 for seeking the city's welfare — no one is seeking Zion's welfare, so God himself will.
18. The 'tents of Jacob' (ohalei Ya'aqov) evokes the nomadic patriarchal past — even in restoration, Israel's identity is rooted in the tent-dwelling ancestors. The word arachem ('I will have compassion') from the root r-ch-m connotes deep, visceral mercy — the same root as rechem ('womb'). The tel ('mound, ruin-heap') refers to the archaeological mound formed by successive cities built on the same site — Jerusalem will be rebuilt precisely where it fell, on top of its own ruins.
19. The pairing of todah ('thanksgiving, praise') and qol mesachaqim ('sound of those celebrating, laughing') replaces the sounds of lamentation that have characterized the preceding chapters. The verbs hirbiti ('I will multiply') and hikhbadti ('I will make weighty, honor') reverse the exile's diminishment. The root k-v-d in hikhbadtim is the same root as kavod ('glory, weight') — God will restore their significance, their substance, their weight in the world.
20. The word adato ('his assembly, his congregation') uses edah, the term for Israel's formal assembly before God — the covenant community reconstituted. The phrase lefanai tikkon ('before me it will be established') means the community will stand secure in God's presence, a reversal of the exile's separation from the temple and divine presence. The verb paqadti ('I will attend to, punish') carries the same double sense noted in 29:10 — God's attention means judgment for oppressors.
21. The word addiro ('his majestic one, his noble leader') and moshlo ('his ruler') describe the future Davidic king from verse 9. The phrase arav et libbo ('pledged his heart, risked his life') uses the vocabulary of surety and collateral — approaching God is so dangerous that no one would dare without divine invitation. The verb hiqravtiv ('I will bring him near') uses the same root as qorban ('offering') — the king's access to God's presence has a priestly, sacrificial quality. This verse grants the future ruler both political authority (he comes from the people) and priestly access (he approaches God directly).
22. The bilateral covenant formula vihyitem li le'am va'anokhi ehyeh lakhem le'elohim ('you will be my people and I will be your God') is the theological center of the Book of Consolation. It appeared in 11:4 as a covenant that was broken; here it reappears as a covenant being restored. The formula's simplicity — two clauses, perfect symmetry — carries the full weight of the Sinai relationship. This is the third time this formula appears in Jeremiah (7:23, 11:4), and each occurrence marks a different stage: original promise, broken covenant, and now renewed hope.
23. This verse is nearly identical to 23:19, where it concludes the oracle against false prophets. Its reuse here creates a literary bracket: the judgment announced against false prophets in chapter 23 frames the restoration promises of chapter 30. The word sa'ar ('storm, tempest') and the participle mitgorer ('sweeping, whirling, churning') depict divine wrath as a natural catastrophe — uncontrollable, indiscriminate against those in its path. The verb yachul ('it will whirl, burst, writhe') on the heads of the wicked echoes the labor imagery of verse 6.

24. Also nearly identical to 23:20. The phrase mezimmot libbo ('the purposes/plans of his heart') echoes the machshavot of 29:11 — God has purposes, and his anger serves those purposes rather than existing for its own sake. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days, in days to come') points to a future moment of clarity when the full meaning of both judgment and restoration will be understood. The verb titbonenu ('you will understand, contemplate, discern') implies that comprehension of God's ways requires hindsight — only from the vantage point of fulfillment can the coherence of God's plan be seen.

Summary: *Jeremiah 31 is the theological summit of the Book of Consolation (chapters 30-33) and arguably the single most consequential chapter in all of Jeremiah. It opens with oracles of restoration for northern Israel — Ephraim, the lost tribes — promising that the exiles will return with weeping and joy. Rachel weeps for her vanished children at Ramah, but God commands her to stop: they will come back. The chapter builds to its climax in verses 31-34, where God announces the berit chadashah — the new covenant — the only occurrence of this exact phrase in the entire Hebrew Bible. This covenant will not be like Sinai, which Israel broke; instead, God will write his torah directly on human hearts, making external enforcement unnecessary. The chapter closes with cosmic imagery: as long as the fixed order of sun, moon, and stars endures, Israel will endure as a nation before God.*

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains the phrase berit chadashah ('new covenant'), which appears nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible and which gave the Christian scriptures their name ('New Testament' derives from the Latin novum testamentum, a translation of the Greek he kaine diatheke, itself a translation of the Hebrew berit chadashah from this passage). The theological weight is extraordinary: Hebrews 8:8-12 quotes Jeremiah 31:31-34 at length as the foundational text for the new covenant in Christ, while Jewish tradition reads the same passage as a promise of renewed Torah observance written on Israelite hearts. Both readings find genuine support in the Hebrew. We rendered this passage with maximum transparency, documenting both traditions without privileging either. The chapter also contains Rachel weeping for her children (v. 15), quoted in Matthew 2:18 in connection with Herod's massacre of the innocents — a typological application that layers new meaning onto Jeremiah's original reference to the Exile. The divine declaration 'I have loved you with an everlasting love' (ahavat olam, v. 3) and the depiction of God's rachamim ('womb-love') for Ephraim (v. 20) together present the most concentrated expression of divine tenderness in the prophetic literature.*

Translation Friction: *The relationship between the 'new covenant' and the Sinai covenant required careful handling: the Hebrew chadashah means 'new' not 'renewed,' yet the content of the new covenant (Torah on hearts, knowledge of God) is continuous with the old. We rendered the Hebrew transparently and documented both the discontinuity (genuinely new, not a patch on the old) and the continuity (Torah remains central) in the notes. The verb heperu (v. 32, 'they broke') required attention — God is the wronged party, the faithful husband whose covenant partner proved faithless. The phrase ahavat olam (v. 3) was rendered 'everlasting love' rather than 'eternal love' because olam denotes duration beyond sight, not philosophical infinity. In verse 15, Rachel's weeping at Ramah required historical context: Rachel's tomb was near Bethlehem, but Ramah was a deportation staging point — the note documents both the geographical and typological significance. The verb mashakhtikh (v. 3, 'I have drawn you') carries overtones of attraction and courtship, which the expanded rendering addresses.*

Connections: *Verse 3 (ahavat olam / chesed) connects to Hosea's marriage metaphor and to Psalm 136's refrain 'for his faithful love endures forever.' Verse 15 (Rachel weeping) is quoted in Matthew 2:18. Verses 31-34 (the new covenant) are quoted at length in Hebrews 8:8-12 and 10:16-17, and the phrase berit chadashah stands behind the institution narrative of the Lord's Supper (Luke 22:20, 1 Corinthians 11:25). Verse 20 (rachamim for Ephraim) connects to Hosea 11:8-9 (God's compassion overriding judgment). The cosmic permanence language (vv. 35-37) echoes Genesis 1 and Psalm 89:36-37. The rebuilding of Jerusalem (vv. 38-40) connects forward to Nehemiah's reconstruction and to eschatological visions in Zechariah 14 and Revelation 21.*

¹At that time, declares the LORD, I will be God to all the clans of Israel, and they will be my people. ²This is what the LORD says: The people who survived the sword found favor in the wilderness — Israel, when I went to give him rest. ³From far away the LORD appeared to me: "I have loved you with an everlasting love; therefore I have drawn you with faithful love." ⁴I will build you again, and you will be rebuilt, young woman Israel! You will again take up your tambourines and go out dancing with those who celebrate. ⁵You will again plant vineyards on the hills of Samaria; planters will plant and enjoy the fruit. ⁶For a day is coming when watchmen on the hills of Ephraim will call out: "Come, let us go up to Zion, to the LORD our God!" ⁷For this is what the LORD says: Sing out with joy for Jacob! Shout at the head of the nations! Make it heard, give praise, and say: "LORD, save your people, the remnant of Israel!" ⁸Look — I am bringing them from the land of the north and gathering them from the farthest parts of the earth. Among them will be the blind and the lame, the pregnant woman and the one in labor, together — a great assembly will return here. ⁹They will come with weeping, and with pleas for mercy I will lead them. I will bring them to streams of water, on a level path where they will not stumble — for I am a father to Israel, and Ephraim is my firstborn. ¹⁰Hear the word of the LORD, O nations, and proclaim it on the distant coastlands. Say: "The one who scattered Israel will gather him and guard him as a shepherd guards his flock." ¹¹For the LORD has ransomed Jacob and redeemed him from the hand of one stronger than he. ¹²They will come and sing on the heights of Zion, streaming toward the goodness of the LORD — toward grain, new wine, and fresh oil, toward young flocks and herds. Their life will be like a well-watered garden, and they will never languish again. ¹³Then young women will rejoice in the dance, and young men and elders together. I will turn their mourning into joy; I will comfort them and give them gladness instead of grief. ¹⁴I will drench the priests with abundance, and my people will be satisfied with my goodness, declares the LORD. ¹⁵This is what the LORD says: A voice is heard in Ramah — wailing, bitter weeping. Rachel is weeping for her children; she refuses to be comforted for her children, because they are gone. ¹⁶This is what the LORD says: Hold back your voice from weeping and your eyes from tears, for there is a reward for your labor, declares the LORD — they will return from the land of the enemy. ¹⁷There is hope for your future, declares the LORD — your children will return to their own territory. ¹⁸I have surely heard Ephraim grieving: "You disciplined me and I was disciplined, like an untrained calf. Bring me back and I will return, for you are the LORD my God." ¹⁹For after I turned away, I was filled with regret; after I came to understand, I struck my thigh in shame. I was ashamed — deeply humiliated — because I bore the disgrace of my youth. ²⁰Is Ephraim my precious son? Is he the child I delight in? For as often as I speak against him, I still remember him deeply. Therefore my inner being churns for him — I will surely have compassion on him, declares the LORD. ²¹Set up road markers for yourself; place signposts for yourself. Fix your attention on the highway, the road by which you went. Return, young woman Israel — return to these cities of yours. ²²How long will you waver, O faithless daughter? For the LORD has created something new on the earth — a woman will embrace a man. ²³This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: They will again use this saying in the land of Judah and its cities when I restore their fortunes — "May the LORD bless you, O pasture of righteousness, O holy mountain!" ²⁴Judah and all its cities together will dwell in it — farmers and those who move about with their flocks. ²⁵For I will satisfy the weary, and every one who languishes I will fill. ²⁶At this I awoke and looked around, and my sleep had been pleasant to me. ²⁷The days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will sow the house of Israel and the house of Judah with the seed of humans and the seed of animals. ²⁸And just as I watched over them to uproot, to tear down, to overthrow, to destroy, and to bring harm — so I will watch over them to build and to plant, declares the LORD. ²⁹In those days they will no longer say, "The parents ate sour grapes, and the children's teeth are set on edge." ³⁰Instead, each person will die for his own iniquity. Whoever eats sour grapes — his own teeth will be set on edge. ³¹The days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will cut a new covenant with the house of Israel and the house of Judah. ³²It will not be like the covenant I cut with their ancestors on the day I took them by the hand to lead them out of the land of Egypt — my covenant that they broke, though I was a faithful husband to them, declares the LORD. ³³Rather, this is the covenant I will cut with the house of Israel after those days, declares the LORD: I will put my instruction within them, and I will write it on their hearts. I will be their God, and they will be my people. ³⁴No longer will each one teach his neighbor or each one his brother, saying, "Know the LORD," for they will all know me, from the least of them to the greatest of them, declares the LORD. For I will forgive their iniquity, and their sin I will remember no more. ³⁵This is what the LORD says — he who gives the sun for light by day, who sets the fixed order of moon and stars for light by night, who stirs up the sea so that its waves roar — the LORD of Hosts is his name: ³⁶"If these fixed orders could be removed from before me," declares the LORD, "then the offspring of Israel would also cease to be a nation before me — for all time." ³⁷This is what the LORD says: "If the heavens above could be measured and the foundations of the earth below explored, then I would also reject all the offspring of Israel for everything they have done," declares the LORD. ³⁸The days are coming, declares the LORD, when the city will be rebuilt for the LORD, from the Tower of Hananel to the Corner Gate. ³⁹The measuring line will extend further, straight to the hill of Gareb, and will turn toward Goah. ⁴⁰The entire valley of corpses and ashes, and all the terraced fields as far as the Kidron Valley, to the corner of the Horse Gate toward the east — all of it will be holy to the LORD. It will never again be uprooted or torn down, for all time.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The covenant formula 'I will be their God and they will be my people' reappears here at the opening of the chapter, signaling the restoration of the relationship broken in chapters 2-29. The word mishpechot ('clans, families') emphasizes that every subdivision of Israel — not just Judah — is included in the restoration.
2. The Hebrew chen ('favor, grace') echoes the language of the Exodus — just as Israel found favor with God in the wilderness of Sinai, so the survivors of judgment will find divine favor again. The phrase sridei charev ('survivors of the sword') refers to those who survived military destruction, either the Assyrian conquest of the north or the coming Babylonian exile.
3. The phrase ahavat olam ('everlasting love') appears only here and in the parallel construction of Psalm 103:17. The word olam does not denote philosophical eternity but duration whose limits are hidden from view — love that stretches beyond what can be seen. The verb mashakh in this context means 'to draw, to attract, to pull gently' — it is the language of courtship, not coercion. Chesed is rendered 'faithful love' per project standard, capturing the covenantal dimension that the KJV's 'lovingkindness' partially obscures. The verse structure places two declarations of divine love in parallel: the love itself (ahavat olam) and its active expression (chesed).
4. The title betulat Yisrael ('virgin of Israel') is rendered 'young woman Israel' because betulah in prophetic address functions as a personification of the nation as a maiden — the emphasis is on vulnerability and youth rather than sexual status. The tambourines (tuppim) recall the celebration after the Red Sea crossing (Exodus 15:20), where Miriam led the women with timbrels — the restoration will mirror the Exodus celebration.
5. The reference to Samaria — capital of the northern kingdom destroyed by Assyria in 722 BCE — signals that this oracle addresses the lost northern tribes, not just Judah. The verb chilelu ('enjoy as common, treat as profane') is a technical agricultural term: fruit trees were considered sacred (and their fruit forbidden) for the first three years (Leviticus 19:23-25). To 'profane' the fruit means to reach the year when it becomes ordinary food — the planters will live long enough to enjoy what they planted.
6. The notsrim ('watchmen, sentinels') are the lookouts who scan for pilgrimage festivals and new moons. The stunning element is location: Ephraim's watchmen — from the rebellious northern kingdom that rejected the Jerusalem temple — will call their people to worship at Zion. This envisions the reunification of the divided kingdoms around a single sanctuary. The verb na'aleh ('let us go up') is the technical term for pilgrimage to Jerusalem, which sits at elevation.
7. The phrase berosh hagoyim ('at the head of the nations') indicates that Israel's restoration will be so dramatic that it becomes the leading story among all peoples. The prayer hosha YHWH ('save, LORD') uses the root y-sh-a, from which the name Yeshua/Joshua/Jesus derives. The word she'erit ('remnant') is a key prophetic concept — not all were destroyed; a preserved core survives for restoration.
8. The catalogue of vulnerable people — blind, lame, pregnant, laboring — emphasizes that this is not a military march but a compassionate ingathering. God brings home those who could never make the journey on their own strength. The 'land of the north' (erets tsafon) is the standard designation for Babylon and Assyria, which lay north-northeast of Israel along the Fertile Crescent trade routes.
9. The declaration 'Ephraim is my firstborn' (Ephrayim bekhori hu) is remarkable because historically Ephraim was Joseph's younger son (Genesis 48:14-20) and the northern kingdom that rebelled against the Davidic dynasty. God reasserts his paternal claim over the estranged tribes. The 'level path' (derekh yesharah) and 'streams of water' echo the new exodus imagery of Isaiah 40-55 — God will make the return journey as miraculous as the original Exodus.
10. The nations themselves are summoned as witnesses to Israel's restoration — the same nations that watched the destruction will watch the regathering. The verb mezareh ('the one who scattered') uses the same root as 'winnowing' — scattering grain on the threshing floor. God scattered Israel like chaff, but now gathers them as a shepherd gathers sheep. The mixed metaphors (winnowing and shepherding) span the full arc from judgment to restoration.
11. Two redemption verbs appear together: padah ('ransom,' commercial redemption — paying a price to free someone) and ga'al ('redeem,' familial redemption — a kinsman reclaiming what belongs to the family). Together they present God as both the one who pays the price and the kinsman who is obligated by blood to rescue. The 'one stronger' refers to Babylon, the imperial power that held Israel captive.
12. The verb naharu ('stream, flow, radiate') depicts the people flowing toward Zion like rivers converging — an image of irresistible, joyful movement. The word nephesh ('soul, life, being') is rendered 'life' rather than 'soul' because the comparison to a watered garden emphasizes the whole person's flourishing, not an immaterial soul. The catalogue of blessings (grain, wine, oil, livestock) represents the full scope of agricultural abundance promised under the covenant.

13. The reversal theme is emphatic: mourning becomes joy, grief becomes gladness. The word betulah ('young woman') here functions collectively — all the young women of restored Israel will dance. The pairing of bachurim ('young men') and zeqenim ('elders') encompasses the full demographic range. The verb nichamtim ('I will comfort them') shares the root n-ch-m with the name Nehemiah ('the LORD comforts') — comfort is not passive consolation but active divine intervention to reverse sorrow.
14. The verb rivveithi ('I will drench, saturate') is more intense than simple satisfaction — it means to soak thoroughly, to overflow. The word dashen ('fatness, abundance') refers to the choicest portions of sacrificial offerings. When the people bring abundant offerings, the priests' portion overflows — prosperity in worship and daily life are inseparable in this vision.
15. The verb mevakkah ('weeping') is a participle — Rachel's weeping is ongoing, not a single event. The phrase me'anah lehinnachem ('she refuses to be comforted') uses the same root n-ch-m as verse 13, creating a deliberate contrast: God promises to comfort Israel, but Rachel refuses comfort. The tension is resolved in the next verse when God commands her to stop weeping. Ramah is identified with modern er-Ram, about five miles north of Jerusalem. In Jeremiah 40:1, Ramah is where the Babylonian captain Nebuzaradan processed the exiles — it was literally where the deportees were gathered. Matthew 2:18 quotes this verse in connection with Herod's slaughter of the infants of Bethlehem, applying it typologically to a new grief near Rachel's tomb (Genesis 35:19).
16. God directly addresses Rachel and commands her to stop weeping — not because her grief is wrong but because it will be answered. The word sakhar ('reward, wages') is concrete and commercial: Rachel's labor (pe'ullatekh) of bearing and raising children will be compensated. The children are not gone permanently — they will return. The verb shavu ('they will return') uses the key Jeremiah verb shuv, here in its hopeful sense of homecoming.
17. The word acharit ('end, latter days, future') here means the outcome, the final chapter — Rachel's story does not end in grief. The word gevulam ('their territory, border') is specific: the children will not merely survive in exile but will return to their own ancestral land. The promise addresses the deepest fear of exile — permanent displacement from the promised land.
18. The emphatic construction shamoa shamati ('I have surely heard') — an infinitive absolute — stresses that God has been listening to Ephraim's lament. The simile of the untrained calf (egel lo lummad) acknowledges that Ephraim was stubborn and needed breaking, like a young ox that has never worn a yoke. The prayer hashiveni ve'ashuvah ('bring me back and I will return') plays on the verb shuv — Ephraim cannot return on his own; God must initiate the turning. This is a theology of grace embedded in a single Hebrew verb: repentance requires divine initiative.
19. Ephraim's confession continues. Striking the thigh (safaqti al yarekh) is a gesture of grief, shame, and self-reproach — comparable to beating the breast in other cultures. The 'disgrace of my youth' (cherpat ne'urai) refers to the sins of the nation's early history — idolatry, rebellion, the golden calves of Jeroboam. The word niklamti ('humiliated, disgraced') is stronger than simple embarrassment — it is the shame of public exposure.
20. The rhetorical questions expect an emphatic 'yes' — Ephraim is God's precious son, the child of delight. The phrase hamu me'ai ('my inner being churns') describes an involuntary physical response — the intestines/bowels twisting with emotion. This is not a calm decision to show mercy but an uncontrollable parental instinct. The verb rachem arachamenu ('I will surely have compassion') is the emphatic infinitive absolute of r-ch-m, which shares its root with rechem ('womb'). God's mercy for Ephraim is womb-love — the primal, visceral compassion of a parent for the child of their body. This verse is among the most intimate depictions of divine emotion in the Hebrew Bible, paralleled by Hosea 11:8-9.
21. The command shifts to practical preparation for the return journey. The tsiyunim ('road markers, cairns') and tamrurim ('signposts, guideposts') — note the same word tamrurim used for 'bitter weeping' in v. 15, here meaning something entirely different (guideposts) — mark the way home. The command shuvi ('return!') is addressed to personified Israel as a young woman being called to come home. The way she went into exile becomes the road home.
22. This is one of the most debated verses in Jeremiah. The phrase neqevah tesovev gaver ('a woman will surround/embrace a man') has generated centuries of interpretive dispute. The verb sovev can mean 'to surround, encircle, court, protect, embrace.' The meaning may be: (1) Israel (the faithless woman) will return to court/embrace God (the man) — a reversal of the normal pattern where the man pursues; (2) a woman will protect a warrior — a reversal of gender roles signaling a new era; (3) a reference to restored fertility and normalcy. The Hebrew is genuinely ambiguous, and we render the most natural reading while documenting the alternatives. The word chadashah ('new, unprecedented') emphasizes that whatever this means, it is without precedent.
23. The oracle now shifts from northern Israel to Judah. The phrase neveh tsedek ('pasture/dwelling of righteousness') depicts Jerusalem as a place where righteousness resides naturally, like sheep in a green pasture. The parallel title har haqqodesh ('holy mountain') refers to Mount Zion, the temple mount. The phrase shviti et shevutam ('I restore their fortunes') uses a wordplay on shuv — the same root that means 'return/repent' here means 'restore' in the causative sense.
24. The vision of restoration includes both settled agriculture (ikkarim, 'farmers, plowmen') and pastoral nomadism (those who travel with flocks). Both ways of life will coexist peacefully in the restored land — a picture of social harmony and economic completeness.
25. The word nephesh ('soul, life, being') appears twice and is rendered according to context — the 'weary soul' becomes 'the weary' (the whole exhausted person) and the 'sorrowful soul' becomes 'every one who languishes.' The verb milleti ('I will fill') depicts God pouring fullness into emptiness — the opposite of the famine and deprivation of exile.
26. This enigmatic verse suggests the preceding oracles came as a dream or night vision. Jeremiah awakens refreshed — his sleep was arevah ('pleasant, sweet') — a sharp contrast to the nightmarish visions elsewhere in the book. The implication is that visions of restoration are so welcome, so different from his usual burden, that even the prophet's sleep is transformed.

27. The verb zarati ('I will sow') reverses the metaphor of judgment: where exile scattered and depleted the population, God will now plant new life — both human and animal — in the land. Both kingdoms (Israel and Judah) are named together, continuing the reunification theme of the chapter. The agricultural metaphor is deliberate: God is the farmer who plants his people in the soil of the promised land.
28. This verse directly echoes Jeremiah's commissioning in 1:10, where God set him 'over nations and kingdoms to uproot and tear down, to destroy and overthrow, to build and to plant.' The five verbs of destruction are now matched by two verbs of restoration (build, plant). The verb shaqadti ('I watched over') puns on the almond branch (shaqed) vision of 1:11-12: God is 'watching' (shoqed) over his word to fulfill it — first for judgment, now for restoration. The same vigilance that executed judgment will now execute rebuilding.
29. This proverb (also quoted in Ezekiel 18:2) expressed the complaint that the present generation was suffering for the sins of previous generations — an objection to collective, intergenerational punishment. God declares that this proverb will become obsolete in the new era. The word boser ('sour/unripe grapes') describes fruit that is not yet ready — the metaphor suggests premature, inappropriate consequences falling on the wrong generation.
30. Individual responsibility replaces collective punishment. This principle — that each person bears the consequences of their own sin — prepares for the new covenant theology of verses 31-34, where the relationship with God becomes individual ('they will all know me') rather than mediated through collective institutions. The shift from communal to individual accountability is one of the most significant theological developments in the prophetic literature (cf. Ezekiel 18).
31. The phrase berit chadashah appears only here in the entire Hebrew Bible (31:31). The verb karati ('I will cut') retains the ancient idiom of covenant-making — 'cutting' a covenant by sacrificing and dividing animals. Both houses are named: this is not a covenant with Judah alone (the surviving southern kingdom) but with all Israel reunited. The word chadashah is unambiguously 'new' — the same adjective used for a 'new song' (shir chadash, Psalm 33:3) or a 'new thing' (chadashah, Isaiah 43:19). It is not the word for 'renew' (chadesh). The theological weight of this verse is immense: it is quoted at length in Hebrews 8:8-12 and 10:16-17, and the phrase 'new covenant' (novum testamentum in Latin, he kaine diatheke in Greek) gave the Christian scriptures their name.
32. The phrase hecheziki veyadam ('I took them by the hand') is tender and parental — the image of God gripping the hand of a small child to lead them through danger. The verb heferu ('they broke') is emphatic: they didn't merely neglect the covenant but actively annulled it. The clause va'anokhi ba'alti vam is debated: ba'alti can mean 'I was husband to them' (from ba'al, 'to be husband/lord') or 'I rejected them' (from ba'al in a different conjugation, or an Aramaic cognate). We follow the majority reading 'I was a faithful husband to them,' which fits Jeremiah's sustained marriage metaphor (chapters 2-3) and creates the sharpest contrast: God remained faithful; they did not. The added word 'faithful' in the rendering makes explicit what the Hebrew implies through context.
33. The word torah is rendered 'instruction' rather than 'law' to capture the broader semantic range of the Hebrew — torah derives from the root y-r-h ('to teach, to instruct') and encompasses teaching, guidance, and revelation, not merely legal statutes. The phrase beqirbam ('within them,' literally 'in their inner parts') contrasts with the external stone tablets of Sinai. The verb ekhtevannah ('I will write it') uses the same root as the writing on the stone tablets (Exodus 31:18) — God is the author in both cases, but the medium changes from stone to the human heart. The covenant formula 'I will be their God and they will be my people' appears for the third time in this chapter (cf. v. 1), forming an inclusio that frames the entire restoration oracle. Hebrews 8:10 quotes this verse, applying the internalized torah to the work of Christ and the Holy Spirit.
34. The vision of universal, unmediated knowledge of God is the most radical element of the new covenant: no teaching hierarchy, no priestly mediation, no prophetic intermediary — every person in direct relationship with God. The verb yada ('to know') in Hebrew encompasses intimate, experiential, relational knowledge — not merely knowing facts about God but knowing God as a person knows a person. The phrase lo ezkhod ('I will not remember any more') does not mean God will forget (divine omniscience is not in question) but that God will choose not to act on the memory — sin will no longer function as a barrier in the relationship. Hebrews 8:11-12 quotes this verse as the climax of the new covenant prophecy, and Hebrews 10:17 returns to the 'remember no more' clause as the basis for the finality of Christ's sacrifice. Jewish reading: the universal knowledge of God is fulfilled when all Israel returns to Torah and knows God through observance, study, and communal life.
35. The cosmic language grounds the permanence of God's promise in the permanence of the created order. The word chuqqot ('fixed orders, statutes, decrees') is the same word used for the statutes of the Torah — the laws governing the cosmos and the laws governing Israel share the same vocabulary of divine decree. The verb roga ('to stir up, to agitate') depicts God as sovereign over the sea's power — a common ancient Near Eastern motif where the sea represents chaos, and God demonstrates mastery by stirring and calming it at will.
36. The conditional is deliberately impossible: the sun, moon, and stars cannot be removed from their fixed order; therefore, Israel cannot cease to be a nation before God. This is the strongest possible guarantee of national survival — it is tied to the very structure of the cosmos. The word zera ('offspring, seed, descendants') emphasizes biological and national continuity. The phrase kol-hayyamim ('all the days,' rendered 'for all time') reinforces the permanence.
37. A second impossible conditional reinforces the first: the heavens cannot be measured and the foundations of the earth cannot be explored — therefore God will not reject Israel. The verb em'as ('I would reject, spurn') is the word used for God rejecting Saul from kingship (1 Samuel 15:23, 26) — God declares he will never apply that verb to Israel as a whole, no matter what they have done. The phrase al-kol-asher asu ('for all that they have done') acknowledges that Israel's sins are real and severe but declares them insufficient to sever the relationship.

38. The final oracle moves from cosmic guarantees to concrete geography. The Tower of Hananel (migdal Chanan'el) stood at the northeast corner of Jerusalem's walls; the Corner Gate (sha'ar hapinnah) was at the northwest. Together they describe the northern wall of the city — the side most vulnerable to attack and the side from which the Babylonians would breach the walls. God will rebuild precisely where the enemy destroyed.
39. Gareb and Goah are otherwise unknown locations, probably on the western or southwestern outskirts of Jerusalem. The measuring line (qav hammiddah) is the surveyor's tool for planning new construction — the city will be expanded beyond its previous boundaries. The rebuilding is not merely restoration to the former state but enlargement.
40. The 'valley of corpses and ashes' (emeq happegarim vehaddeshen) likely refers to the Hinnom Valley (Ge-Hinnom/Gehenna), the site of child sacrifice and later a refuse dump south of Jerusalem. The deshene ('ashes, fatty ashes') may refer to sacrificial ash dumps or cremation residue. That this defiled space will become 'holy to the LORD' represents the ultimate reversal — the most polluted place in Israel's geography becomes sacred ground. The Kidron Valley runs along Jerusalem's eastern side between the city and the Mount of Olives. The Horse Gate was in the southeastern wall. Together these landmarks trace a circuit around the entire expanded city. The final phrase le'olam ('for all time') closes the chapter with the same duration-word (olam) that opened the love declaration in verse 3 — everlasting love, everlasting city.

Summary: Jeremiah 32 records the most dramatic enacted prophecy in the book: while Jerusalem is under Babylonian siege and Jeremiah himself is imprisoned in the guard court, God commands him to purchase a field at Anathoth from his cousin Hanamel. This is the go'el obligation — the kinsman-redeemer must buy family land to keep it in the clan — but exercised at the worst possible moment, when the land is literally in enemy hands. Jeremiah pays seventeen shekels of silver, signs and seals the deed, has it witnessed by Baruch son of Neriah, and orders the documents stored in a clay jar for long-term preservation. Then Jeremiah prays — a sweeping recitation of God's mighty acts from creation through Egypt through the present catastrophe — and confesses his bewilderment: 'You told me to buy a field, but the city is being handed to the Chaldeans!' God responds with one of the most quoted lines in prophetic literature: 'Is anything too hard for me?' The chapter closes with God's promise of restoration, culminating in the berit olam — the everlasting covenant.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the ultimate test of prophetic integrity. Jeremiah has spent decades announcing that Babylon will conquer Judah — and now, at the very moment when his words are coming true, God tells him to invest in real estate. The purchase is absurd by every human calculation: the land is in enemy-occupied territory, the buyer is in prison, and the nation is collapsing. But the purchase is an acted parable — the most expensive prophetic sign-act in the Hebrew Bible. By buying land he cannot use, Jeremiah stakes his own money on God's promise of restoration. Baruch son of Neriah, Jeremiah's faithful scribe, appears here as the legal witness; he will later write and preserve Jeremiah's oracles (chapter 36) and accompany Jeremiah into Egyptian exile (chapter 43). The clay jar storage instruction (v. 14) anticipates the Dead Sea Scrolls by six centuries — the same preservation technique that would protect biblical manuscripts for two millennia. Jeremiah's prayer (vv. 17-25) is one of the great prayers of the Hebrew Bible, moving from creation theology to Exodus memory to present crisis with unflinching honesty. God's response introduces the berit olam ('everlasting covenant,' v. 40), linking this chapter to the berit chadashah of chapter 31.

Translation Friction: The legal details of the land purchase (vv. 9-14) required careful handling — the Hebrew describes two documents (sealed and open copies), witnesses, and clay jar storage, reflecting authentic ancient Near Eastern property transaction procedures. The word sefer ('document, scroll') is rendered 'deed' in the property context rather than the more general 'book.' Jeremiah's prayer (vv. 17-25) shifts between praise and bewilderment, and we preserved the emotional arc without smoothing the transition. The phrase hayipale mimmenni kol davar (v. 27, 'Is anything too hard/wonderful for me?') uses the verb pala, which means both 'to be wonderful' and 'to be difficult/impossible' — we rendered it 'too difficult' in context but documented the dual meaning. The go'el obligation (kinsman-redemption right) required an expanded rendering because its full significance is lost without cultural context.

Connections: The kinsman-redeemer (go'el) obligation connects to Leviticus 25:25-28 (redemption of family land), Ruth 4 (Boaz as go'el), and Isaiah 41:14, 43:14, 44:6 (God as Israel's Go'el). The question 'Is anything too hard for me?' echoes Genesis 18:14 (God's question to Abraham about Sarah's pregnancy) — the same verb pala is used in both. The everlasting covenant (berit olam, v. 40) connects to the new covenant of 31:31-34 and to the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 17:7), the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 23:5), and the priestly covenant (Numbers 25:13). Baruch son of Neriah appears again in chapters 36, 43, and 45. The clay jar storage instruction connects forward to the Dead Sea Scrolls discovery at Qumran. Jeremiah's prayer echoes Nehemiah 9 and Daniel 9 as one of the great recitals of salvation history.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD in the tenth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, which was the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar. ²At that time the army of the king of Babylon was besieging Jerusalem, and Jeremiah the prophet was confined in the court of the guard, which was in the palace of the king of Judah. ³Zedekiah king of Judah had confined him, saying, "Why do you prophesy, saying, 'This is what the LORD says: I am about to hand this city over to the king of Babylon, and he will capture it; ⁴and Zedekiah king of Judah will not escape from the Chaldeans, but will certainly be handed over to the king of Babylon, and will speak with him face to face and see him eye to eye; ⁵He will take Zedekiah to Babylon, and there he will remain until I attend to him, declares the LORD. If you fight against the Chaldeans, you will not succeed.'" ⁶Jeremiah said: The word of the LORD came to me: ⁷"Hanamel son of Shallum, your uncle's son, is coming to you. He will say: 'Buy my field at Anathoth, for the right of redemption belongs to you as next of kin to purchase it.'" ⁸Then Hanamel, my uncle's son, came to me in the court of the guard, just as the LORD had said, and told me: "Please buy my field at Anathoth in the territory of Benjamin, for you have the right of inheritance and the right of redemption — buy it for yourself." Then I knew that this was the word of the LORD. ⁹So I bought the field at Anathoth from Hanamel, my uncle's son, and I weighed out the silver for him — seventeen shekels of silver. ¹⁰I signed the deed, sealed it, called witnesses, and weighed the silver on scales. ¹¹Then I took the deed of purchase — the sealed copy containing the terms and conditions, and the open copy — ¹²and I gave the deed of purchase to Baruch son of Neriah, son of Mahseiah, in the presence of my cousin Hanamel, in the presence of the witnesses who signed the deed of purchase, and in the presence of all the Judeans sitting in the court of the guard. ¹³Then I instructed Baruch in their presence: ¹⁴"This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Take these deeds — this sealed deed of purchase and this open deed — and place them in a clay jar so that they will last for a long time." ¹⁵For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Houses, fields, and vineyards will again be bought in this land. ¹⁶After I had given the deed of purchase to Baruch son of Neriah, I prayed to the LORD: ¹⁷"Ah, Lord GOD! You yourself made the heavens and the earth by your great power and by your outstretched arm. Nothing is too difficult for you. ¹⁸You show faithful love to thousands, yet you repay the iniquity of ancestors into the laps of their children after them — O great and mighty God, the LORD of Hosts is his name! ¹⁹Great in counsel and mighty in deed — your eyes are open to all the ways of humankind, to repay each person according to his ways and according to the fruit of his actions. ²⁰You performed signs and wonders in the land of Egypt — and to this day, both in Israel and among all people — and you made a name for yourself, as it remains today. ²¹You brought your people Israel out of the land of Egypt with signs and wonders, with a strong hand and an outstretched arm, and with great terror. ²²You gave them this land that you swore to their ancestors to give them — a land flowing with milk and honey. ²³They came in and took possession of it, but they did not obey your voice or walk in your instruction. They did nothing of all you commanded them to do — so you brought all this disaster upon them. ²⁴Look — the siege ramps have reached the city to capture it, and the city is being handed over to the Chaldeans who fight against it, because of sword, famine, and plague. What you spoke has come to pass — and you can see it yourself! ²⁵Yet you yourself said to me, Lord GOD: 'Buy the field with silver and call witnesses' — even though the city is being handed over to the Chaldeans!" ²⁶Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁷"I am the LORD, the God of all living things. Is anything too difficult for me?" ²⁸Therefore, this is what the LORD says: I am about to hand this city over to the Chaldeans and to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, and he will capture it. ²⁹The Chaldeans who are fighting against this city will come and set this city on fire, burning it along with the houses on whose rooftops they burned incense to Baal and poured out drink offerings to other gods, provoking me to anger. ³⁰For the people of Israel and the people of Judah have done nothing but evil in my sight from their youth, for the people of Israel have done nothing but provoke me to anger with the work of their hands, declares the LORD. ³¹For this city has been a source of my anger and my fury from the day they built it until this very day, so that I must remove it from my presence — ³²because of all the evil that the people of Israel and the people of Judah have done to provoke me to anger — they, their kings, their officials, their priests, their prophets, the people of Judah, and the inhabitants of Jerusalem. ³³They turned their backs to me, not their faces. Though I taught them persistently, teaching again and again, they would not listen or accept correction. ³⁴They placed their detestable idols in the house that bears my name, defiling it. ³⁵They built the high places of Baal in the Valley of Ben-Hinnom to make their sons and daughters pass through fire to Molech — something I never commanded and that never entered my mind — committing this abomination and causing Judah to sin. ³⁶"Now therefore, this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says about this city that you say is being handed over to the king of Babylon by sword, famine, and plague: ³⁷I am going to gather them from all the lands where I have driven them in my anger, in my fury, and in great wrath. I will bring them back to this place and make them dwell in safety. ³⁸They will be my people, and I will be their God. ³⁹I will give them one heart and one path, to revere me at all times, for their own good and for the good of their children after them. ⁴⁰I will cut an everlasting covenant with them: I will never turn away from them or cease doing them good. I will place the reverence of me in their hearts so that they will not turn away from me. ⁴¹I will take delight in doing them good, and I will plant them firmly in this land with all my heart and with all my being. ⁴²For this is what the LORD says: Just as I brought all this great disaster upon this people, so I am going to bring upon them all the good that I am promising them. ⁴³Fields will again be purchased in this land about which you say, 'It is desolate, without human or animal — it has been handed over to the Chaldeans.' ⁴⁴Fields will be bought with silver, deeds will be written, sealed, and witnessed — in the territory of Benjamin, in the area around Jerusalem, in the cities of Judah, in the cities of the hill country, in the cities of the lowlands, and in the cities of the Negev. For I will restore their fortunes, declares the LORD."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double dating system (regnal years of both the Judean king and the Babylonian emperor) reflects the political reality of vassal status — Judah's calendar is now synchronized with Babylon's. The tenth year of Zedekiah is approximately 588/587 BCE, during the final siege of Jerusalem. The Hebrew spelling Nevukhadre'tsars alternates with Nevukhadnettsar in the book; we standardize the English to 'Nebuchadnezzar,' the most recognized form.
2. The chatsar hammattarah ('court of the guard') was not a dungeon but a military detention facility within the royal compound — Jeremiah had restricted movement but was not in a pit or cell (contrast 38:6, where he is lowered into a cistern). The juxtaposition is deliberate: Jerusalem is besieged from without, and God's prophet is imprisoned from within. The very king who imprisoned Jeremiah for his prophecies is now watching those prophecies come true.
3. Zedekiah's question 'Why do you prophesy?' reveals the king's frustration — he does not dispute the content of Jeremiah's message but objects to the prophet's insistence on speaking it publicly during a siege. The phrase notein et ha'ir ('handing over the city') uses the participial form, indicating an action already in progress — God is in the process of giving Jerusalem to Babylon.
4. The phrase 'mouth to mouth' (pihu im pihu) and 'eyes to eyes' (einav et einav) describe a personal encounter — Zedekiah will stand before Nebuchadnezzar as a defeated vassal. The emphatic infinitive absolute hinnton yinnaton ('will certainly be handed over') leaves no room for escape. The bitter irony: in 2 Kings 25:7, Zedekiah does see Nebuchadnezzar's eyes — and then his own eyes are gouged out, so it is the last thing he ever sees.
5. The phrase ad-paqdi oto ('until I attend to him') uses the verb paqad, which can mean 'to visit, to attend to, to punish, to care for.' The ambiguity is deliberate — God's 'attending to' Zedekiah could mean judgment or eventual mercy. The final clause is addressed to the collective 'you' (plural) — all of Judah's resistance will fail. This completes Zedekiah's quotation of Jeremiah's prophecy that led to the prophet's imprisonment.
6. The narrative shifts from the editor's framing (vv. 1-5) to Jeremiah's first-person account. The formula devar-YHWH ('the word of the LORD') marks the transition to divine instruction — what follows is not Jeremiah's idea but God's command.
7. The Hebrew dod ('uncle') makes Hanamel Jeremiah's cousin (son of his father's brother). Anathoth was Jeremiah's hometown (1:1), a Levitical city in the territory of Benjamin. The phrase mishpat hage'ullah ('right of redemption') is the legal term from Leviticus 25:25 for the kinsman-redeemer's prerogative. God tells Jeremiah in advance what will happen, confirming it as a divinely orchestrated sign-act, not a coincidental family transaction.
8. The confirmation formula va'eda ki devar-YHWH hu ('then I knew that this was the word of the LORD') reveals that Jeremiah had waited to see whether God's prediction would come true. When Hanamel appeared exactly as foretold, Jeremiah recognized the divine origin of the command. The location is specified precisely — Anathoth in Benjamin — establishing the legal record. The phrase mishpat hayyerushah ('right of inheritance') is distinct from ge'ullah ('redemption') — Jeremiah has both the inheritance claim and the kinsman-redemption right, making his legal obligation unambiguous.
9. The price — seventeen shekels of silver (approximately seven ounces / 196 grams) — is remarkably low, reflecting the depressed value of land during a siege. For comparison, Abraham paid four hundred shekels of silver for the cave of Machpelah (Genesis 23:15-16). The verb shaqal ('to weigh') indicates that silver was weighed out on scales rather than counted as coins — coined money was not yet standard in Judah at this period. The transaction is executed with full legal formality despite the absurdity of the circumstances.

10. The verb katav ('to write') here means to draw up or sign a legal document. The sepher ('document, deed') is the bill of sale. The sealing (chatam) involved pressing a cylinder or stamp seal into clay to authenticate the document — equivalent to a notarized signature. The witnesses (edim) provided legal testimony to the transaction's validity. Every element follows standard ancient Near Eastern property law, giving the purchase full legal standing even under siege conditions.
11. Two copies of the deed were produced: a sealed copy (hechatom) that could not be tampered with, and an open copy (haggalui) that could be consulted for reference. This dual-document practice is attested in ancient Near Eastern legal archives — the sealed copy was the authoritative legal record, while the open copy allowed public access to the terms. The words mitsvah and chuqqim ('commands and statutes' or 'terms and conditions') describe the stipulations of the sale.
12. Baruch son of Neriah son of Mahseiah is Jeremiah's personal scribe and most trusted companion. His name means 'blessed' (barukh). An actual clay seal impression (bullā) bearing the inscription 'Belonging to Berekyahu son of Neriyaḥu the scribe' was discovered in a Jerusalem antiquities market in 1975, providing possible archaeological confirmation of this biblical figure. The public nature of the transaction — 'in the presence of all the Judeans' — ensures maximum witness coverage, turning a private land deal into a public prophetic declaration.
13. The verb tsivveh ('commanded, charged, instructed') indicates a formal directive, not a casual request. Jeremiah gives Baruch specific archival instructions in the hearing of all the witnesses — the storage method matters as much as the purchase itself.
14. The preservation instruction is remarkable: a clay jar (keli chares) would protect papyrus or leather documents from moisture, insects, and decay. This is precisely the storage method used for the Dead Sea Scrolls, discovered at Qumran in 1947 — documents preserved in sealed clay jars for approximately two thousand years. The phrase yamin rabbim ('many days') acknowledges that the exile will be prolonged, but the deeds must survive because the land will eventually be reclaimed. The documents are evidence of ownership that will outlast the exile.
15. This single sentence is the theological key to the entire chapter. While Babylon besieges the walls, while the army camps in the fields, while vineyards are being trampled and houses burned — God declares that normal economic life will resume. The verb yiqqanu ('will be bought') is passive: buying will happen again, as naturally and routinely as it always did before the catastrophe. The three categories — houses, fields, vineyards — represent the full spectrum of property ownership in an agrarian society.
16. The transition from legal transaction to prayer is abrupt — Jeremiah moves directly from signing papers to addressing God. The verb hitpallel ('to pray') is reflexive, suggesting deep introspection. What follows (vv. 17-25) is one of the great prayers of the Hebrew Bible, moving from theology of creation through salvation history to bewildered honesty about the present.
17. The exclamation ahahh ('ah!') expresses awe, distress, or overwhelm — it is not praise but the sound of a person staggering under the weight of what they are experiencing. The phrase zeroakha hannotuyah ('your outstretched arm') is Exodus language (Deuteronomy 4:34, 5:15) — the same arm that defeated Egypt created the cosmos. The declaration lo yippale mimmekha kol davar ('nothing is too difficult/wonderful for you') uses the verb pala, which means both 'to be wonderful' and 'to be beyond ability.' Jeremiah affirms God's unlimited power at the outset — which makes his closing confusion (v. 25) all the more honest.
18. The phrase chesed la'alaphim ('faithful love to thousands') echoes the divine self-revelation at Sinai (Exodus 34:6-7), where God declares himself 'maintaining faithful love to thousands' but also 'visiting the iniquity of ancestors on children.' Jeremiah quotes this creedal statement almost verbatim. The word cheiq ('bosom, lap, fold of garment') is where gifts or payments were placed — ancestral guilt is 'deposited' into the children's laps. The divine titles — ha'El haggadol haggibor ('the great, the mighty God') — are formal worship language, elevating the prayer to liturgical register. The full title YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Hosts/Armies') identifies God as commander of heavenly forces.
19. The parallelism of 'counsel' (etsah) and 'deed' (aliliyyah) presents God as both planner and executor — divine wisdom and divine action are inseparable. The phrase einakha pequchot ('your eyes are open') depicts God's comprehensive awareness of all human conduct — nothing escapes his sight. The principle of proportional recompense (each person according to his ways) connects to the individual accountability theme of 31:29-30.
20. The phrase otot umophetim ('signs and wonders') is the standard Exodus terminology (Deuteronomy 4:34, 6:22). Jeremiah extends God's sign-working beyond Egypt — 'to this day, both in Israel and among all people' — asserting that God's mighty acts continue into the present. The phrase 'made a name for yourself' (ta'aseh lekha shem) echoes Nehemiah 9:10 and Isaiah 63:12-14, placing Jeremiah's prayer in the tradition of great salvation-history recitals.
21. The five-fold description of the Exodus — signs, wonders, strong hand, outstretched arm, great terror — echoes the Deuteronomic creed (Deuteronomy 26:8) almost verbatim. The word mora gadol ('great terror') refers to the fear God struck into the Egyptians. Jeremiah is not innovating theology here but reciting the traditional confession, grounding his prayer in the oldest layer of Israel's faith.
22. The covenant promise formula erets zavat chalav udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') encapsulates the agricultural abundance of the promised land. Milk represents pastoral wealth (herds); honey represents either wild bee honey or, more likely, the thick syrup of dates — together they signify a land of overflowing provision. The bitter irony is that this land is now being devastated by the very siege Jeremiah is describing.
23. The prayer reaches its pivot: Israel received the land but failed to keep the covenant. The three-fold negation — they did not obey, did not walk, did nothing of what was commanded — is emphatic and comprehensive. The word torah here is rendered 'instruction' per project standard to preserve the broader meaning beyond legal statutes. The result clause (vattaqre otam) means literally 'you caused to meet them' — disaster did not happen randomly but was the direct consequence of covenant violation.

24. The solelot ('siege ramps, earthworks') were massive earthen mounds built against the city walls to allow attackers to breach the fortifications. The three instruments of siege destruction — cherev ('sword,' military violence), ra'av ('famine,' starvation from blockade), and dever ('plague,' disease from overcrowding and contamination) — form a recurring triad in Jeremiah (14:12, 21:7, 24:10, 27:8). The final clause 'and you can see it yourself' (vehinneka ro'eh) is startlingly direct — Jeremiah points out to God what God already knows, building to his bewildered question in the next verse.
25. This is the climax of Jeremiah's prayer — and it is a question disguised as a statement. Jeremiah does not directly ask 'Why?' but the bewilderment is unmistakable: God told him to invest in land that is falling to the enemy. The juxtaposition of 'buy the field' and 'the city is given to the Chaldeans' in the same sentence captures the apparent absurdity. The prayer ends without resolution — Jeremiah has stated his faith (v. 17, 'nothing is too difficult for you'), recited the history (vv. 18-23), and pointed to the crisis (vv. 24-25). Now he waits for God's answer, which comes in verses 26-44.
26. The standard prophetic reception formula marks the transition from Jeremiah's prayer to God's response. The narrative device creates a pause — the reader has heard Jeremiah's bewildered prayer and now awaits the divine answer.
27. The question hayipale mimmenni kol davar ('Is anything too difficult for me?') uses the same verb pala that Jeremiah used in his prayer (v. 17, 'nothing is too difficult for you'). God throws Jeremiah's own confession back as a question: you said nothing is too hard for me — do you believe it? The phrase Elohei kol basar ('God of all flesh/living things') expands God's sovereignty beyond Israel to encompass all creation, including Babylon and its armies. The rhetorical question expects the answer 'No — nothing is too difficult,' but the force lies in making Jeremiah (and the reader) articulate that conviction in the face of impossible circumstances.
28. God confirms rather than contradicts Jeremiah's prophecy of doom — the city will fall. The divine response does not begin with comfort but with truth: judgment is real and imminent. God names Nebuchadnezzar specifically as the instrument of judgment. The word lakhen ('therefore') connects the fall to everything Jeremiah recited in his prayer — Israel's disobedience has consequences.
29. The rooftop altars (gaggotehem) were high places for unauthorized worship — roofs provided open-air access to the sky where astral deities and Baal were worshiped. The houses that served as platforms for idolatry will be the very houses consumed by fire. The verb qiteru ('burned incense') is the technical term for offering fragrant smoke to a deity; its use for Baal worship underscores the betrayal — incense rituals proper to YHWH were redirected to a foreign god. The phrase lema'an hakh'iseni ('to provoke me to anger') implies deliberate provocation, not accidental offense.
30. The word akh ('only, nothing but') is emphatic and sweeping — Israel's entire history, from its 'youth' (ne'urothem, the early period of nationhood) to the present, is characterized as unbroken evil. The 'work of their hands' (ma'aseh yedehem) is a frequent Jeremiah phrase for idols — handmade objects treated as gods. The indictment encompasses both kingdoms (Israel and Judah), emphasizing that the northern kingdom's fall to Assyria should have served as a warning that Judah ignored.
31. The startling claim that Jerusalem has provoked God's anger from the day it was built encompasses the entire Davidic-Solomonic era — not even the golden age was free from provocation. The words ap ('anger,' literally 'nostril,' the flaring of nostrils in rage) and chamah ('fury, heat') represent two intensities of divine wrath. The phrase lehasirah me'al panai ('to remove it from my presence/face') — continuing into the next verse — uses the same language as the expulsion from the garden in Genesis.
32. The catalogue of offenders is comprehensive: kings (malkehem), officials (sarehem), priests (kohanehem), prophets (nevi'ehem), and the common people. Every level of society is implicated. The word sarim ('officials, princes, commanders') refers to the ruling class — those with political and military authority. No one is exempt from guilt: the leadership that should have guided the people toward covenant faithfulness instead led them toward Baal.
33. The idiom 'turned their back, not their face' (oref velo fanim) is a physical image of rejection — turning away from someone who is speaking to you. The phrase hashkem velammod ('rising early and teaching' = 'teaching persistently') is the same Jeremianic idiom seen in 7:13, 7:25, 11:7, 25:3 — God's tireless, dawn-to-dusk effort to instruct his people. The word musar ('correction, instruction, discipline') encompasses both teaching and the consequences of ignoring it.
34. The shiqqutsehem ('their detestable things, abominations') refers to idols and pagan cult objects placed inside the Jerusalem temple itself — not merely alongside it but within the very building where God's name dwelt. The phrase niqra shemi alav ('upon which my name is called / which bears my name') indicates ownership and presence — the temple belongs to God, and his reputation is attached to it. Placing idols there is not merely disobedience but desecration of God's own house. Historical reference: Manasseh placed an Asherah pole in the temple (2 Kings 21:7).
35. The Valley of Ben-Hinnom (Gei Ben-Hinnom, later Gehenna) south of Jerusalem was the site of child sacrifice. The verb he'evir ('to make pass through') describes the ritual of passing children through fire — whether this meant actual immolation or a fire-passing ritual is debated, but the context implies lethal sacrifice. God's triple denial is emphatic: 'I never commanded it' (lo tsivvitim), 'it never entered my mind' (lo aletah al-libbi), and it is a to'evah ('abomination'). This passage is repeated almost verbatim from 7:31 and 19:5, showing how deeply this sin troubles the prophetic message.
36. The phrase 'now therefore' (ve'attach lakhen) marks the transition from God's recitation of sins to the declaration of hope. The people's own words ('it is being handed over') are quoted back — they state the obvious reality of the siege. God does not deny it but is about to reframe it: the fall of the city is not the end of the story. The triad of destruction — sword, famine, plague — appears again as in verse 24.
37. Three words for divine wrath — ap ('anger'), chamah ('fury'), and qetsef gadol ('great wrath') — describe the intensity that drove the scattering. But the same God who scattered will gather. The verb hashvotim ('I will bring them back') uses the root shuv ('return') in its causative form — God will cause the return. The word lavetach ('in safety, securely') promises not just physical return but psychological security — no more fear of exile or invasion.

38. The covenant formula in its most compact form — six Hebrew words that summarize the entire covenantal relationship. This same formula appeared in 31:1, 31:33, and now here, forming a refrain throughout the Book of Consolation (chapters 30–33). Its repetition after the catalogue of sins (vv. 29–35) is stunning: despite everything, the relationship will be restored.
39. The phrase lev echad ('one heart') means unity of purpose and desire — the divided heart that chased multiple gods will be made singular in its devotion. The word derekh ('way, path, road') echoes the 'two ways' tradition of Deuteronomy 30:15–20 — God will give them one clear road instead of the constant wavering between YHWH and Baal. The verb yirah ('to revere, to fear') denotes not terror but covenantal awe — the proper human response to the holy God. The motive clause 'for their own good' (letov lahem) reveals that covenant obedience is not arbitrary demand but is genuinely beneficial to the people.
40. The phrase berit olam ('everlasting covenant') links this promise to the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 17:7), the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 23:5), and the priestly covenant (Numbers 25:13). The two uses of shuv create a beautiful reciprocity: God will not shuv ('turn away') from them, and he will ensure they do not sur ('turn aside') from him — the double turning that plagued the old covenant is healed from both directions. The phrase yir'ati ('my reverence, the fear of me') placed 'in their hearts' (bilvavam) parallels 31:33 where torah is placed 'within them' and written 'on their hearts' — the new and everlasting covenants share the same mechanism of internal transformation.
41. The verb sasti ('I will take delight, I will rejoice') depicts God experiencing joy over his people — not merely tolerating or rescuing them but genuinely delighting in their restoration. The verb natati ('I will plant') echoes the commission language of 1:10 — the planting that follows uprooting. The adverb be'emet ('in truth, faithfully, firmly') means this is not a temporary resettlement but a permanent planting. The phrase bekhol-libbi uvekhol-nafshi ('with all my heart and with all my being') is extraordinary as applied to God — it attributes to God the wholehearted covenantal devotion that Deuteronomy demands of Israel, creating a perfect reciprocity.
42. The parallel structure is exact: the same God who executed ra'ah ('disaster, evil, harm') will execute tovah ('good, benefit, blessing'). The word ka'asher...ken ('just as...so') creates a proportion — the magnitude of the coming good will match the magnitude of the past disaster. The phrase dober alehem ('speaking/promising concerning them') uses the participial form, indicating that the promise is active and ongoing — God is currently in the process of declaring good over them.
43. God's response circles back to the field purchase that prompted Jeremiah's bewildered prayer. The people's assessment — shemamah ('desolation, wasteland') — is accurate for the present but not for the future. The phrase me'ein adam uvehemah ('without human or animal') describes total depopulation — the opposite of the divine promise in 31:27 to sow the land 'with the seed of humans and the seed of animals.' What the people see as permanent ruin, God sees as temporary devastation.
44. The chapter closes with a comprehensive geographical catalogue: Benjamin (Jeremiah's own tribal territory), Jerusalem's environs, the Judean hill country, the Shephelah (western foothills), and the Negev (southern desert region). Every region of Judah is named — the restoration will be total, not partial. The legal vocabulary from Jeremiah's own transaction — buy with silver, write, seal, witness — becomes the vocabulary of the restored future. What Jeremiah did as a lone prophetic act in a prison courtyard will become the normal activity of a recovered nation. The final phrase ashiv et shevutam ('I will restore their fortunes') closes the chapter with the verb shuv in its most hopeful form — the great return, the great reversal.

Summary: Jeremiah 33 completes the Book of Consolation (chapters 30–33) with a second revelation received while Jeremiah remains confined in the court of the guard. God invites the prophet to call upon him and promises to reveal 'great and inaccessible things' (v. 3). The chapter moves from the devastation of siege to the restoration of joy, health, and prosperity in Jerusalem and Judah. Its theological climax is the reaffirmation of the Davidic covenant through the metaphor of cosmic permanence: just as God's covenant with day and night cannot be annulled, neither can his promises to David's line and the Levitical priesthood (vv. 20–26). The Righteous Branch reappears (v. 15, cf. 23:5–6), and Jerusalem itself receives the name 'The LORD Is Our Righteousness.'

Verse 3 — 'Call to me and I will answer you, and I will tell you great and inaccessible things that you do not know' — is one of the most quoted verses in Jeremiah, yet its context is often overlooked: Jeremiah is a prisoner when God speaks these words. The promise comes not in freedom but in confinement. The Righteous Branch title tsemach tsaddiq reappears from 23:5–6, but with a striking variation: in 23:6 it is the king who bears the name 'The LORD Is Our Righteousness' (YHWH tsidqenu), while here in 33:16 it is Jerusalem — the city itself — that receives this name. The covenant-with-day-and-night passage (vv. 20–26) is unparalleled in prophetic literature: God stakes his promises to David on the reliability of the created order itself, making the alternation of day and night into a perpetual witness. We note that 33:14–26 is absent from the Septuagint, suggesting these verses may be a later addition to the Hebrew tradition — a significant text-critical issue that we document transparently.

Translation Friction: The adjective betsurot (v. 3, from batsar, 'to cut off, fortify, make inaccessible') is variously rendered 'mighty,' 'hidden,' 'unsearchable,' or 'fortified.' We chose 'inaccessible' because the root conveys walled-off knowledge — things beyond human reach without divine revelation. The phrase tsemach tsaddiq (v. 15) could be 'righteous branch' or 'righteous shoot/sprout' — we retained 'branch' for consistency with 23:5. The shift of the name YHWH Tsidqenu from the king (23:6) to the city (33:16) required careful notation, as it represents a theological development within the book itself. Verses 14–26 are absent from the LXX, raising the question of whether they belong to the earliest text; we include them as part of the Masoretic tradition while noting the discrepancy.

Connections: The Righteous Branch (tsemach tsaddiq) connects to 23:5–6 and forward to Zechariah 3:8 and 6:12. The covenant formula 'David will never lack a man on the throne' echoes 2 Samuel 7:12–16 (the Davidic covenant) and 1 Kings 2:4. The covenant with day and night recalls Genesis 8:22 (God's post-flood promise of perpetual seasons) and Jeremiah 31:35–37 (the fixed order of sun, moon, and stars as guarantee of Israel's permanence). The Levitical covenant connects to Numbers 25:12–13 (the covenant of perpetual priesthood with Phinehas) and Malachi 2:4–7. The restoration imagery of joy and thanksgiving echoes 30:19 and 31:4, 12–13. The phrase 'the voice of joy and the voice of gladness, the voice of the bridegroom and the voice of the bride' reprises 7:34 and 16:9 in reverse — what was taken away in judgment is restored in consolation.

¹The word of the LORD came to Jeremiah a second time while he was still confined in the court of the guard: ²This is what the LORD says — he who made it, the LORD who shaped it to establish it, whose name is the LORD: ³Call to me and I will answer you; I will tell you great and inaccessible things that you have not known. ⁴For this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says concerning the houses of this city and the houses of the kings of Judah that are torn down for siege ramps and for the sword: ⁵They come to fight against the Chaldeans only to fill them with the corpses of the people whom I have struck down in my anger and my wrath — those on account of whose wickedness I have hidden my face from this city. ⁶I am going to bring healing and remedy to her, and I will heal them; I will reveal to them an abundance of peace and faithfulness. ⁷I will restore the fortunes of Judah and the fortunes of Israel, and I will rebuild them as they were at the beginning. ⁸I will cleanse them from all their iniquity by which they sinned against me, and I will forgive all their iniquities by which they sinned against me and rebelled against me. ⁹This city will become for me a name of joy, a praise and a splendor before all the nations of the earth, who will hear of all the good I am doing for them. They will tremble and be shaken on account of all the good and all the peace that I am bringing about for her. ¹⁰This is what the LORD says: In this place — of which you say, 'It is a ruin, without person or animal' — in the cities of Judah and the streets of Jerusalem that are desolate, without person, without inhabitant, without animal, ¹¹there will again be heard the sound of joy and the sound of gladness, the sound of the bridegroom and the sound of the bride, the sound of those saying, 'Give thanks to the LORD of Hosts, for the LORD is good, for his faithful love endures forever' — those bringing thanksgiving offerings to the house of the LORD. For I will restore the fortunes of the land as they were at the beginning, says the LORD. ¹²This is what the LORD of Hosts says: In this place that is desolate — without person or animal — and in all its cities, there will again be pastures for shepherds resting their flocks. ¹³In the cities of the hill country, in the cities of the lowland, in the cities of the Negev, in the land of Benjamin, in the surroundings of Jerusalem, and in the cities of Judah, flocks will again pass under the hands of the one who counts them, says the LORD. ¹⁴The days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will fulfill the good word that I spoke concerning the house of Israel and the house of Judah. ¹⁵In those days and at that time, I will cause a righteous branch to sprout for David, and he will execute justice and righteousness in the land. ¹⁶In those days Judah will be saved and Jerusalem will dwell securely. And this is what she will be called: 'The LORD Is Our Righteousness.' ¹⁷For this is what the LORD says: David will never lack a man to sit on the throne of the house of Israel. ¹⁸And the Levitical priests will never lack a man in my presence to offer burnt offerings, to burn grain offerings, and to prepare sacrifices — for all time. ¹⁹The word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁰This is what the LORD says: If you could break my covenant with the day and my covenant with the night, so that day and night no longer come at their appointed time, ²¹then also my covenant with David my servant could be broken, so that he would have no son reigning on his throne — and my covenant with the Levites, the priests who minister to me. ²²Just as the host of heaven cannot be counted and the sand of the sea cannot be measured, so I will multiply the offspring of David my servant and the Levites who minister to me. ²³The word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁴Have you not observed what this people are saying — 'The two families that the LORD chose, he has rejected them'? They treat my people with contempt, as if they were no longer a nation in their sight. ²⁵This is what the LORD says: If I have not established my covenant with day and night, if I have not set in place the fixed orders of heaven and earth — ²⁶then I would also reject the offspring of Jacob and of David my servant, so as not to take from his offspring rulers over the descendants of Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. But I will restore their fortunes and have compassion on them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word 'second time' (shenit) links this oracle to chapter 32, where the first word came during the same imprisonment. The term matara ('guard') is distinct from the dungeon (bor) where Jeremiah was later thrown (38:6); this is a military courtyard used for detention, not a pit. We render le'mor as a colon introducing direct speech.
2. The threefold repetition of YHWH in a single verse is emphatic and liturgical. The verbs 'asah ('made') and yatsar ('shaped, formed') are creation vocabulary — the same yatsar used for God forming humanity from clay in Genesis 2:7. The ambiguous pronoun 'it' likely refers to the earth or Jerusalem; the Hebrew leaves the referent deliberately open, suggesting that the God who shaped creation can reshape his city.
3. The KJV renders betsurat as 'mighty,' but the root batsar means 'to cut off, fortify, enclose' — the same root used for 'fortified cities' (arei mivtsar). We render 'inaccessible' to capture the sense of walled-off, unreachable knowledge. The invitation 'Call to me' is addressed to a prisoner — Jeremiah has no freedom of movement, but he has unlimited access to God. The verb 'aggidah ('I will tell/declare') implies formal revelation, not casual conversation.
4. The participle nethutsim ('torn down, demolished') describes houses already being demolished during the siege — residents were dismantling their own buildings to construct defensive siege ramps (solelot) against the Babylonian assault. The grim irony is that the city is destroying itself trying to survive.
5. The syntax is difficult: 'fill them' (male'am) likely refers to filling the demolished houses (v. 4) with corpses, not filling the Chaldeans. The image is horrific — the torn-down buildings become mass graves. The idiom histir panim ('to hide the face') is the ultimate expression of divine withdrawal in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Deuteronomy 31:17–18; Isaiah 54:8).
6. The nouns arukah ('healing, restoration') and marpe ('remedy, cure') are near-synonyms piled for emphasis — the city's wound is so severe that one word for healing is not enough. The verb gala ('reveal, uncover') is striking: peace and faithfulness are not merely given but revealed, as if they had been hidden behind the judgment. We render emet as 'faithfulness' here rather than 'truth' because the context is covenantal restoration, and emet in covenant contexts carries the sense of God's reliable fidelity.
7. The phrase shavti et-shevut is debated: it could mean 'restore the captivity' (return the exiles) or 'restore the fortunes' (a broader restoration). The latter reading, supported by cognate evidence and the Septuagint, better fits the context of comprehensive renewal. Both kingdoms — Judah and Israel — are included in the restoration, even though the northern kingdom had been dispersed for over a century.
8. Three sin-terms appear: avon ('iniquity' — the guilt and its consequence), chat'u ('sinned' — from chata, to miss the mark), and pash'u ('rebelled' — from pasha, willful transgression). The Hebrew preserves the full taxonomy of sin: missing the mark, bearing twisted guilt, and deliberate rebellion. Cleansing (tihar) is ritual-purification language, while forgiveness (salach) is relational-restoration language — both are needed.
9. The triad shem sason, tehillah, tiferet ('name of joy, praise, splendor') describes Jerusalem's transformed reputation among the nations. The verbs pachadu veragzu ('they will tremble and be shaken') describe the nations' response — not terror in the negative sense but awe at the overwhelming reversal of Jerusalem's fortunes. The nations who watched Jerusalem's destruction will now be stunned by its restoration.
10. The threefold repetition of me'ein ('without') — without person, without inhabitant, without animal — hammers the totality of the desolation. This exact formula appeared as a threat in 32:43; here it is quoted only to be reversed. The word charev ('ruin, waste') is the same root used for the destruction of the temple.
11. This verse reverses the judgment formula from 7:34 and 16:9, where the sounds of joy and wedding celebration were silenced. Five occurrences of qol ('sound, voice') create an overwhelming cascade of restored celebration. The liturgical quotation 'for the LORD is good, for his faithful love endures forever' appears in 2 Chronicles 5:13, 7:3, Ezra 3:11, and Psalm 136 — it is Israel's core worship refrain. The word todah ('thanksgiving offering') means both the sacrifice and the attitude of gratitude.
12. The image of shepherds resting flocks (marbitsei tso'n) is pastoral peace restored. The verb rabats ('to lie down, rest') describes animals at ease, without threat — the opposite of a land terrorized by invasion. The destroyed landscape will return to productive pastoral life.
13. The geographical survey — hill country, lowland (shephelah), Negev, Benjamin, Jerusalem, Judah — covers the entire territory of the southern kingdom. The image of sheep passing under the counter's hands (al yedei moneh) evokes Leviticus 27:32, where every tenth animal passing under the rod belongs to the LORD. Counting implies ownership, order, and care — the restored land will be managed, not chaotic.
14. This verse begins a section (vv. 14–26) absent from the Septuagint (LXX), suggesting it may be a later addition to the Hebrew text. We include it as part of the Masoretic tradition while noting this significant text-critical issue. The phrase hadavar hatov ('the good word/thing') refers back to the promises of chapters 30–32 — God is about to specify exactly which promises he means.

15. This verse closely parallels 23:5 but uses tsemach tsedaqah ('branch of righteousness') rather than tsemach tsaddiq ('righteous branch'). The variation may reflect a subtle theological shift: in 23:5 the branch himself is righteous; here the branch produces righteousness. The verb atsmiyach ('I will cause to sprout') emphasizes divine agency — this is not natural political succession but God's direct intervention in history.
16. The striking difference from 23:6 is the pronoun: there the masculine yiqra'o ('he will be called') applies the name to the king; here the feminine yiqra-lah ('she will be called') applies it to Jerusalem. Whether this is a deliberate theological expansion or a scribal variation is debated, but the Masoretic text clearly assigns the name to the city. The verb tishkon ('will dwell') shares the root sh-k-n with Shekhinah — Jerusalem's secure dwelling echoes God's own dwelling presence.
17. The phrase lo yikkaret ('will not be cut off') uses the same verb (karat) as 'cutting' a covenant — the line will not be severed. This restates the Davidic covenant of 2 Samuel 7:12–16, where God promised David an eternal dynasty. Despite the apparent end of the monarchy with Zedekiah's capture, the promise stands.
18. The phrase hakkohanim haleviyim ('the priests, the Levites' or 'the Levitical priests') uses the Deuteronomic designation that identifies priests specifically as members of the tribe of Levi (cf. Deuteronomy 18:1). Three types of sacrifice are named: olah (burnt offering, entirely consumed), minchah (grain offering), and zevach (fellowship/peace sacrifice). The promise of perpetual priestly service parallels the perpetual Davidic throne — both institutions are declared permanent.
19. A fresh reception formula marks a new oracle unit. The following section (vv. 20–26) will anchor the Davidic and Levitical promises in the permanence of the created order.
20. The concept of a 'covenant with day and night' has its roots in Genesis 8:22, where God promises the perpetual cycle of seasons after the flood, and in 31:35–37, where the fixed order of celestial bodies guarantees Israel's permanence. The verb taferu ('you could break, annul') is the same verb used for breaking covenant in 11:10 — God is saying the cosmic order and the Davidic promise share the same covenantal status, and both are equally unbreakable.
21. The conditional structure (if ... then) makes the Davidic covenant as certain as the sunrise. The phrase avdi ('my servant') is an honorific title — David is God's designated agent, not merely a subject. The Levitical priesthood is paired with the Davidic monarchy as co-recipients of irrevocable covenant — both throne and altar are guaranteed.
22. The twin images of uncountable stars and immeasurable sand echo the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 15:5, 22:17). God transfers the Abrahamic abundance promise to the Davidic and Levitical lines, weaving all three covenants — Abrahamic, Davidic, Levitical — into a single fabric. The word zera ('offspring, seed') is the same word used in the promises to Abraham.
23. Another reception formula introduces the final oracle of the chapter (vv. 23–26), which responds to the despair of the people who believe God has rejected both his chosen families — the Davidic dynasty and the nation of Israel.
24. The 'two families' (shtei hamishpachot) likely refers to the royal house of David and the priestly house of Levi — or possibly the two kingdoms, Israel and Judah. The verb ma'as ('rejected') is the same verb used for God's rejection of Saul (1 Samuel 15:23, 26). The people are saying God has done to David what he did to Saul — permanently discarded his chosen line. God's response in the following verses is a vehement denial.
25. The chuqqot ('fixed orders, statutes, decrees') of heaven and earth are the same word used for the statutes of the Torah. The laws governing nature and the laws governing the covenant community share the same vocabulary — both are divine decrees. The conditional 'if not' (im lo) introduces an oath formula: 'If I have not done X, then I will not do Y' — meaning 'As certainly as X is true, Y is guaranteed.'
26. The verse completes the oath formula begun in v. 25: since God's covenant with day and night is unbreakable, his covenant with David and Jacob is equally unbreakable. The three patriarchs — Abraham, Isaac, Jacob — are invoked together, linking the Davidic promise back to the Abrahamic covenant. The final verb richamtim ('I will have compassion on them') is from the root r-ch-m, related to rechem ('womb') — God's compassion is maternal, visceral, from the depths of his being. The chapter ends not with a threat but with tenderness.

Summary: Jeremiah 34 narrates two distinct but thematically connected episodes during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem. In the first (vv. 1–7), God sends Jeremiah to tell King Zedekiah that Jerusalem will fall and he will be captured — but he will die in peace, not by the sword. In the second (vv. 8–22), the narrative turns to the covenant of liberty: Zedekiah and the nobles proclaimed the release of all Hebrew slaves as required by Torah law (Exodus 21, Deuteronomy 15), but when the Babylonian siege was temporarily lifted (likely by the approach of an Egyptian army), the slave owners seized their freed slaves and re-enslaved them. God's response is devastating: since they violated the covenant of liberty, he will proclaim 'liberty' to them — liberty to the sword, plague, and famine. The covenant-cutting ceremony with the calf (vv. 18–19) explicitly echoes the ritual of Genesis 15, where God himself passed between the halves.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most vivid and terrifying covenant texts in the Hebrew Bible. The wordplay on deror ('liberty, release') in verse 17 is brilliant and savage: because the people refused to proclaim liberty to their slaves, God will proclaim liberty to them — liberty to be consumed by sword, plague, and famine. The covenant-cutting ritual in verses 18–19, where the parties passed between the halves of a slaughtered calf, is the only explicit description of this ceremony outside Genesis 15. The implied threat is unmistakable: those who break the covenant have symbolically invoked the fate of the cut animal upon themselves. We preserved the raw violence of the covenant curse — the bodies given to the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth — because this is covenant theology at its most visceral. The chapter also reveals the moral calculus of Jerusalem's elite: they freed their slaves when they were desperate for divine favor during the siege, then re-enslaved them the moment the military pressure eased. God sees through the performance.

Translation Friction: The verb shuv in verse 11 ('they turned back and took back') uses the same root that elsewhere means 'repent' — here it means the opposite, turning back from a righteous act to re-enslave. The phrase karat berit (v. 18, 'cut a covenant') is both the standard covenant idiom and a literal description of cutting the calf. We rendered avdu-vam ('they enslaved them,' v. 11) plainly without softening — the Hebrew verb kavash ('to subdue, force into servitude') in verse 16 is even harsher than avad, carrying connotations of forceful subjugation. The phrase 'before me' (lefanai, v. 15) in the temple context means the covenant was made in God's own presence, making the violation a personal affront.

Connections: The slave-release law connects to Exodus 21:2–6 and Deuteronomy 15:12–18, the seventh-year manumission requirement. The covenant-cutting ceremony echoes Genesis 15:9–17, where God passed between the halves as a self-imprecation. The 'liberty' proclamation connects to Leviticus 25:10 (the Jubilee 'liberty throughout the land'). Zedekiah's fate prophecy (vv. 2–5) connects forward to 39:4–7 and 52:7–11. The bodies exposed to birds and beasts echoes the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28:26. The temporary lifting of the siege connects to 37:5–11, where the Egyptian army's approach caused the Babylonians to withdraw briefly.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon — with all his army, all the kingdoms of the lands under his rule, and all the peoples — was fighting against Jerusalem and all its surrounding cities: ²This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: Go and speak to Zedekiah king of Judah. Say to him — This is what the LORD says: I am going to hand this city over to the king of Babylon, and he will burn it with fire. ³And you will not escape from his hand. You will certainly be seized and handed over to him. Your eyes will see the eyes of the king of Babylon, and he will speak to you face to face, and you will go to Babylon. ⁴Yet hear the word of the LORD, Zedekiah king of Judah. This is what the LORD says concerning you: You will not die by the sword. ⁵You will die in peace. And just as they burned spices for your ancestors, the former kings who preceded you, so they will burn spices for you, and they will mourn for you, saying, 'Alas, lord!' For I myself have spoken this word, declares the LORD. ⁶Jeremiah the prophet spoke all these words to Zedekiah king of Judah in Jerusalem, ⁷while the army of the king of Babylon was fighting against Jerusalem and against all the remaining cities of Judah — against Lachish and Azekah, for these were the only fortified cities left among the cities of Judah. ⁸The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD after King Zedekiah had cut a covenant with all the people in Jerusalem to proclaim liberty to them — ⁹that each person should release his male servant and his female servant — any Hebrew man or Hebrew woman — setting them free, so that no one would enslave a fellow Judean, his own brother. ¹⁰All the officials and all the people who had entered the covenant obeyed — each releasing his male servant and his female servant, setting them free and no longer enslaving them. They obeyed and released them. ¹¹But afterward they reversed course and took back the male servants and female servants whom they had set free, and they forced them back into servitude as slaves. ¹²Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ¹³This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: I myself cut a covenant with your ancestors on the day I brought them out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery, saying: ¹⁴At the end of seven years, each of you must release his Hebrew brother who has been sold to you; after he has served you for six years, you must send him away free from you. But your ancestors did not listen to me or incline their ear. ¹⁵You yourselves recently turned and did what was right in my eyes by proclaiming liberty to one another, and you cut a covenant before me in the house that bears my name. ¹⁶But then you reversed course and profaned my name. Each of you took back his male servant and his female servant whom you had set free according to their desire, and you forced them into subjection to be your slaves again. ¹⁷Therefore this is what the LORD says: You have not obeyed me by proclaiming liberty to one another — each to his brother and each to his neighbor. So now I am proclaiming liberty for you, declares the LORD — liberty to the sword, to the plague, and to the famine. I will make you a horror to all the kingdoms of the earth. ¹⁸I will hand over the people who violated my covenant, who did not uphold the terms of the covenant that they cut before me — the calf that they cut in two and passed between its halves — ¹⁹the officials of Judah, the officials of Jerusalem, the court officers, the priests, and all the people of the land who passed between the halves of the calf — ²⁰I will hand them over to their enemies, to those who seek their lives. Their corpses will become food for the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth. ²¹And Zedekiah king of Judah and his officials I will hand over to their enemies, to those who seek their lives, and to the army of the king of Babylon — the ones who have withdrawn from you. ²²I am about to give the command, declares the LORD, and I will bring them back to this city. They will fight against it, capture it, and burn it with fire. The cities of Judah I will make a desolation without inhabitant.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The scope of the Babylonian force is emphasized by the triple kol ('all'): all his army, all the kingdoms, all the peoples. Nebuchadnezzar's empire drew soldiers from vassal kingdoms across the Near East — the siege of Jerusalem was a multinational military operation. The phrase erets memshelat yado ('lands under the rule of his hand') describes Nebuchadnezzar's domain as an extension of his personal grip.
2. The double messenger formula — 'This is what the LORD says ... Say to him, This is what the LORD says' — emphasizes the divine origin of the message Jeremiah must deliver personally to the king. The verb noten ('giving, handing over') presents Jerusalem's fall as God's own act — Babylon is merely the instrument. The verb seraphah ('he will burn it') foreshadows 2 Kings 25:9 and Jeremiah 52:13, the historical burning of the city and temple.
3. The emphatic infinitive absolute tafos tittafes ('you will certainly be seized') removes all ambiguity — there is no escape. The phrase 'your eyes will see his eyes' is intimate and terrifying: Zedekiah will stand personally before Nebuchadnezzar. Tragically, according to 39:7 and 52:11, Nebuchadnezzar blinded Zedekiah after forcing him to watch his sons' execution — the last thing his eyes saw was Nebuchadnezzar's face. The phrase piv et-pikha ('his mouth with your mouth,' i.e., face to face) indicates a personal audience, not communication through intermediaries.
4. The particle akh ('yet, however, but') introduces an unexpected qualification — despite the dire prophecy, Zedekiah's death will not be violent. The promise is limited but real: he will be a captive, not a casualty. According to 52:11, Zedekiah was imprisoned in Babylon until his death.
5. The 'burnings' (misrefot) refer to the burning of spices or incense at royal funerals, a customary honor for deceased kings (cf. 2 Chronicles 16:14, 21:19). The mourning cry hoi adon ('Alas, lord!') parallels the funeral lament in 22:18 for Jehoiaikim, though there the lament was denied. The emphatic ani dibbarthi ('I myself have spoken') seals the oracle as irrevocable divine decree.
6. The narrative frame confirms that Jeremiah delivered the oracle as commanded. The title hannavi ('the prophet') emphasizes Jeremiah's official role — he is not offering personal opinion but delivering authorized divine speech to the king.
7. Lachish and Azekah were the last fortified outposts of Judah still holding out. The Lachish Letters — ostraca discovered in the ruins of Lachish — include a message from a military outpost stating 'we are watching for the signals of Lachish, because we cannot see Azekah,' suggesting Azekah had already fallen. This archaeological evidence dramatically confirms the historical situation described here. The phrase arei mivtsar ('fortified cities') indicates cities with defensive walls — the rest of Judah's towns had already been overrun.
8. We render karat berit as 'cut a covenant' rather than 'made a covenant' because the literal cutting is central to the chapter — the covenant-cutting ceremony with the calf (v. 18) makes the etymology visible. The word deror ('liberty, release') is a technical term for the freeing of Hebrew slaves; it appears on the Liberty Bell inscription (Leviticus 25:10). The covenant was public and binding, involving the king and 'all the people' — making the subsequent violation collective, not merely individual.
9. The law distinguishes Hebrew slaves from foreign slaves — the manumission requirement applied specifically to Israelites enslaved by fellow Israelites. The word achiv ('his brother') is loaded: enslaving a fellow covenant member violates the kinship created by the covenant itself. The term chofshim ('free') is the standard legal term for manumission — a freed slave's legal status changes permanently.
10. The verb shama ('heard/obeyed') appears twice, framing the verse with compliance: they heard and they obeyed. The initial obedience was genuine — the covenant was honored, at least temporarily. The phrase ba'u vabberit ('entered the covenant') uses the standard idiom for covenant participation. The repetition of vayyishme'u vayyeshallechu ('they obeyed and released') emphasizes the completeness of the initial compliance, which makes the reversal in v. 11 all the more damning.
11. The verb shuv ('turn, return') is used twice with devastating irony: vayyashuvu ('they turned back') and vayyashivu ('they brought back'). The same root that means 'repent' in prophetic usage here means the opposite — turning back from righteousness to wickedness. The verb kavash ('forced into subjection') is violent language — it implies physical coercion, not merely legal re-classification. These are people being physically dragged back into slavery after tasting freedom.

12. The reception formula introduces God's furious response to the covenant violation. The double mention of YHWH ('the word of the LORD ... from the LORD') emphasizes the divine origin of what follows — this is not Jeremiah's outrage but God's.
13. God speaks in the first person emphatic: anokhi ('I myself'). The phrase beit avadim ('house of slavery/bondage') for Egypt is standard Exodus language (Exodus 13:3, 14; 20:2; Deuteronomy 5:6). The irony is devastating: God freed Israel from slavery in Egypt, and the covenant he made on that day included the requirement that Israelites never permanently enslave one another — yet that is precisely what they have done.
14. The law summarized here combines elements from Exodus 21:2 and Deuteronomy 15:12. The phrase 'your brother the Hebrew' (achikha ha'ivri) insists on the kinship dimension — a fellow covenant member cannot be treated as permanent property. God notes that even the ancestors failed to keep this law, establishing a pattern of persistent violation that the current generation has continued.
15. The phrase hayashar be'einai ('what was right in my eyes') is the Deuteronomic evaluation formula used for righteous kings. For a brief moment, Zedekiah and the people acted like faithful covenant partners. The covenant was cut lefanai ('before me') — in the temple, in God's direct presence. The phrase asher niqra shemi alav ('upon which my name is called') indicates God's personal ownership of the temple — violating a covenant made there is a direct affront to the divine name.
16. The verb chillelu ('profaned, desecrated') is sacrilege language — by breaking a covenant made in the temple under God's name, they have desecrated the divine name itself. The phrase lefanai in v. 15 and et-shemi here create a direct link: the covenant was made 'before me' and the violation 'profaned my name.' The phrase lenafshan ('according to their desire/at their will') may modify the freed slaves (who desired their freedom) or the slave owners (who freed them at their own discretion). We follow the reading that the slaves were freed 'according to their desire,' emphasizing that the re-enslavement overrode the freed people's own will.
17. The rhetorical structure is devastating: 'You did not proclaim liberty ... so I am proclaiming liberty for you.' The irony of deror applied to sword, plague, and famine is intentionally horrifying — these forces are 'released' against the people who refused to release their slaves. The triad cherev, dever, ra'av ('sword, plague, famine') is Jeremiah's signature formula for total devastation (cf. 14:12, 21:7, 24:10, 27:8, 29:17-18). The word za'avah ('horror, object of trembling') describes what the exiled people will become — a cautionary spectacle for other nations.
18. The verb karat ('cut') appears three times in this verse, creating a cascade of cutting: they cut a covenant, they cut the calf, they cut it in two. The word betarav ('its halves, its pieces') is from the same root as Genesis 15:10 (betarim). The phrase va'ya'avru bein betarav ('they passed between its halves') describes the self-imprecatory ritual: walking between the severed animal invokes its fate upon the oath-taker if the covenant is broken. The people have now triggered that curse.
19. The list of participants is comprehensive: sarei Yehudah (officials of Judah), sarei Yerushalayim (officials of Jerusalem), hassarisim (court officers — the Hebrew sarisim can mean 'eunuchs' or 'court officials'; in this context, royal courtiers is the likely sense), hakkohanim (the priests), and kol am ha'arets (all the people of the land). Every social class participated in the covenant and is therefore implicated in its violation. No one is exempt.
20. The punishment fulfills the self-imprecation of the covenant ritual: those who passed between the halves of the calf will themselves be torn apart like the calf. The phrase nivlatam lema'akhal ('their corpses as food') echoes Deuteronomy 28:26, the covenant curse: 'Your carcasses will be food for all the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth, and no one will frighten them away.' Denial of burial was considered the ultimate dishonor in ancient Israelite culture — the body left exposed to scavengers.
21. The participle ha'olim me'aleikhem ('the ones going up from upon you,' i.e., withdrawing from you) reveals the historical moment: the Babylonian army has temporarily lifted the siege (cf. 37:5, when Egypt's army caused a Babylonian withdrawal). This withdrawal is exactly what emboldened the slave owners to re-enslave their freed servants — they thought the crisis was over. God's message is clear: the Babylonians are coming back.
22. The verb tsivveh ('command') presents the Babylonian return as God's own military order — Nebuchadnezzar's army moves at God's command, not its own initiative. The verb hashivotim ('I will bring them back') uses the same root shuv that described the people's reversal in v. 11 — as they 'turned back' to enslave, God 'turns back' the army to destroy. The chapter ends with the very desolation that chapter 33 promised to reverse, creating a stark contrast: the Book of Consolation's promises stand, but the present generation's covenant violation ensures present judgment.

Summary: Jeremiah 35 records a divine object lesson using the Rechabites, a clan descended from Jonadab son of Rechab, who had commanded his descendants to never drink wine, never build houses, never plant vineyards, and to live as nomads in tents. God instructs Jeremiah to bring the Rechabites into the temple chambers and offer them wine. They refuse categorically, citing their ancestor's command. God then uses their unwavering obedience to a human father as a devastating contrast with Judah's refusal to obey the divine word — despite God's persistent, repeated appeals through the prophets. The chapter closes with a blessing on the Rechabites for their faithfulness and a judgment on Judah for its disobedience.

What Makes This Remarkable: The literary structure is brilliantly simple: a test that the Rechabites are meant to pass, followed by a rhetorical question that Judah cannot answer. The Rechabites have obeyed a human ancestor's command for over two centuries without deviation; Judah will not obey God for a single generation. The temporal setting is during Jehoiakim's reign, when the Babylonian and Aramean raids have forced the Rechabites temporarily into Jerusalem — they are in the city against their own principles, pushed there by military necessity, yet still will not break their ancestor's command even under these extreme circumstances. The phrase hashkem veshalach ('rising early and sending,' v. 15) reprises the characteristic Jeremiah idiom for God's tireless persistence, making the contrast between divine effort and human indifference all the more stark. We rendered the Rechabites' speech in verses 6-10 with the repetitive cadence of the Hebrew, preserving the rhythmic quality of a family creed recited from memory across generations.

Translation Friction: The verb tsivvah ('commanded') is used for both Jonadab's human command (vv. 6-7) and God's divine command (vv. 14-16), creating a deliberate parallel that had to be preserved in English — the same verb for a lesser authority whose commands are obeyed and a greater authority whose commands are ignored. The word mishkenot in verse 7 could mean 'dwellings' or 'tents,' and we chose 'tents' because the context specifically contrasts permanent houses with nomadic dwelling. The chapter's setting 'in the days of Jehoiakim' (v. 1) places it chronologically earlier than the surrounding narrative chapters, illustrating Jeremiah's non-chronological arrangement.

Connections: The Rechabites trace to Jonadab son of Rechab, who appears in 2 Kings 10:15-23 as the zealous supporter of Jehu's purge of Baal worship — their ancestral command to live apart from Canaanite agricultural culture was rooted in anti-idolatry conviction. The 'rising early and sending' formula connects to 7:13, 7:25, 11:7, 25:3-4, 26:5, 29:19, 32:33, and 44:4. The covenant-obedience contrast anticipates the new covenant passage in 31:31-34, where God will solve the problem of disobedience by writing the law on hearts. The blessing formula for the Rechabites in verse 19 ('Jonadab son of Rechab will never lack a man to stand before me') echoes the Davidic and Levitical permanence formulas in 33:17-18.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD in the days of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah: ²Go to the house of the Rechabites and speak with them. Bring them into the house of the LORD, into one of the side chambers, and offer them wine to drink. ³So I took Jaazaniah son of Jeremiah son of Habazziniah, along with his brothers, all his sons, and the entire house of the Rechabites. ⁴I brought them into the house of the LORD, to the chamber of the sons of Hanan son of Igdaliah, the man of God, which was beside the chamber of the officials and above the chamber of Maaseiah son of Shallum, the keeper of the threshold. ⁵I set before the members of the house of the Rechabites bowls full of wine and cups, and said to them, "Drink wine." ⁶They said, "We will not drink wine, because Jonadab son of Rechab, our ancestor, commanded us: 'You and your descendants must never drink wine — ⁷You must not build a house, you must not sow seed, and you must not plant a vineyard or own one. Instead, you must live in tents all your days, so that you may live a long time on the land where you are sojourners.' ⁸We have obeyed the voice of Jonadab son of Rechab, our ancestor, in everything he commanded us — to drink no wine all our days, we ourselves, our wives, our sons, and our daughters; ⁹and not to build houses to live in. We have no vineyard, no field, and no seed. ¹⁰We have lived in tents and have obeyed and done everything that Jonadab our ancestor commanded us. ¹¹But when Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came up against the land, we said, 'Come, let us go into Jerusalem to escape the Chaldean army and the Aramean army.' So we have been living in Jerusalem. ¹²Then the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ¹³This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Go and say to the people of Judah and the inhabitants of Jerusalem — Will you not accept correction and obey my words? declares the LORD. ¹⁴The words of Jonadab son of Rechab have been upheld — he commanded his sons not to drink wine, and to this day they have not drunk any, because they obeyed their ancestor's command. But I have spoken to you persistently, and you have not obeyed me. ¹⁵I sent to you all my servants the prophets, sending them persistently, saying: 'Turn back, each of you, from your evil way! Make your deeds right and do not go after other gods to serve them, and you will live on the land that I gave to you and your ancestors.' But you did not incline your ear or obey me. ¹⁶The sons of Jonadab son of Rechab have upheld the command their ancestor gave them, but this people has not obeyed me. ¹⁷Therefore, this is what the LORD, the God of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am about to bring on Judah and on all the inhabitants of Jerusalem every disaster that I have spoken against them, because I spoke to them and they did not listen, and I called to them and they did not answer. ¹⁸To the house of the Rechabites, Jeremiah said: This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says — Because you have obeyed the command of Jonadab your ancestor, kept all his instructions, and done everything he commanded you, ¹⁹Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Jonadab son of Rechab will never lack a man to stand before me for all time.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The temporal marker 'in the days of Jehoiakim' places this episode during Jehoiakim's reign (609-598 BCE), likely during the Babylonian-Aramean incursions of 601-598 BCE that forced the Rechabites into Jerusalem (see v. 11). The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') introduces direct speech and is rendered as a colon.
2. The leshakh ('side chambers') were rooms attached to the temple complex used for various purposes — storage, meetings, priestly functions. The setting is significant: God stages this object lesson in the temple itself, the center of Judah's covenant relationship, making the contrast between Rechabite obedience and Judahite disobedience all the more pointed.
3. The Jeremiah named here as Jaazaniah's father is a different person from the prophet Jeremiah — a common name in this period. The three-generation lineage (Jaazaniah-Jeremiah-Habazziniah) establishes Jaazaniah as the clan's current leader. The Hebrew 'all his sons and the entire house of the Rechabites' emphasizes that the full clan is assembled as witnesses to the test.
4. The detailed spatial description locates this room precisely within the temple complex — beside the officials' chamber and above Maaseiah's room. Hanan is called ish ha-Elohim ('man of God'), a title for prophets and holy men (cf. 1 Samuel 9:6, 1 Kings 13:1). Maaseiah's title shomer ha-miftan ('keeper of the threshold') designates one of the senior temple gatekeepers, a position of considerable authority (cf. 2 Kings 12:10, 25:18). The level of topographic detail suggests this is drawn from Baruch's eyewitness narrative.
5. The gevi'im are large bowls or pitchers — the same word used for Joseph's silver divination cup (Genesis 44:2). The abundance of wine (full bowls plus individual cups) makes the offer emphatic and generous, heightening the drama of the refusal. The command shetu yayin ('drink wine') is deliberately blunt — a two-word test.
6. The emphatic lo nishteh-yayin ('we will not drink wine') is an absolute refusal. The verb tsivvah ('commanded') is the same word used for God's commands — the parallel is deliberately set up by the narrative. The phrase ad-olam ('for ever') indicates a perpetual, cross-generational obligation. The Rechabites do not hesitate, negotiate, or ask for an exception despite being in the temple with a prophet.
7. The fourfold prohibition (no houses, no sowing, no vineyards, no ownership) represents a total rejection of settled Canaanite agricultural civilization. The Rechabites were to remain gerim ('sojourners, resident aliens') — living in the land but not assimilated into its culture. The promise 'that you may live a long time on the land' echoes the Deuteronomic longevity promise (Deuteronomy 5:16, 25:15), suggesting Jonadab modeled his family code on covenant language.
8. The phrase vanishma beqol ('we obeyed the voice of') uses the same construction shim'u beqoli ('obey my voice') that God uses for his own covenant demands (v. 13, 11:4, 7:23). The comprehensive list — 'we ourselves, our wives, our sons, and our daughters' — shows total household compliance across every generation and gender. The contrast being set up is devastating: a human ancestor commands once, and his entire extended family obeys for centuries.
9. The terse listing — 'no vineyard, no field, no seed' — reads like an inventory of what they have deliberately refused to possess. Each item represents a pillar of settled Canaanite life that the Rechabites have voluntarily renounced.
10. The phrase vanishma vanna'as ('we obeyed and we did') pairs hearing with doing — the covenantal ideal expressed in Israel's own pledge at Sinai: na'aseh venishma, 'we will do and we will hear' (Exodus 24:7). The Rechabites embody precisely the obedience that Israel promised but failed to sustain.
11. The Rechabites explain their presence in Jerusalem as a concession forced by military necessity — the Chaldean and Aramean raids made tent-dwelling in the open countryside impossible. Even this breach of their normal practice is minimal: they moved into the city but still refused to drink wine, build houses, or plant fields. The Hebrew mippenei ('from the face of, because of') expresses the immediate military threat. Nebuchadnezzar is spelled differently here (nevukhadre'tsarsar) than in some other passages (nevukhadnetsar) — both are attested Hebrew transliterations of the Babylonian Nabu-kudurri-usur.
12. The standard prophetic reception formula marks the transition from the narrative test (vv. 1-11) to the divine application (vv. 13-19). God will now interpret what has just happened.
13. The rhetorical question halo tiqchu musar ('will you not accept correction/discipline?') uses musar, a wisdom-tradition term meaning 'discipline, correction, instruction' (prominent in Proverbs). God is not merely commanding but asking why they refuse to learn. The question is devastating in context: the Rechabites have just demonstrated flawless obedience to a human command, and God must ask his own people whether they will even consider obeying him.

14. The verb huqam ('have been upheld, established') emphasizes the durability of the Rechabites' obedience — Jonadab's words still stand because his descendants still honor them. The idiom hashkem vedabber ('rising early and speaking') is the characteristic Jeremiah formula for God's tireless prophetic outreach (see 7:13, 7:25, 11:7, 25:3). The contrast is explicit: a human father commands once and is obeyed for centuries; God speaks persistently through generations of prophets and is ignored.
15. The verb shuvu ('turn back, return') is the key Jeremiah word for repentance — here it appears as God's plea through the prophets. The appeal is comprehensive: turn from evil, improve conduct, abandon idolatry, and the covenant promise of land remains. The phrase lo hittitem et-ozenekhem ('you did not incline your ear') is a recurring Jeremianic accusation (7:24, 7:26, 11:8, 17:23, 25:4, 34:14, 44:5) depicting willful deafness to divine speech.
16. The verdict is delivered with devastating simplicity. The verb heqimu ('they upheld') and the contrasting lo sham'u ('they did not obey') create a stark binary. Ha'am hazzeh ('this people') carries a note of estrangement — God refers to his own covenant people with the distancing demonstrative 'this,' as if they have become strangers to him through their disobedience.
17. The hinneni mevi ('I am about to bring') construction expresses imminent divine action. The double failure — 'I spoke and they did not listen, I called and they did not answer' — echoes Isaiah 65:12 and 66:4, depicting a God who has exhausted every avenue of communication. The word ra'ah ('disaster, calamity, evil') refers to the covenant curses that were always the stated consequence of disobedience.
18. The triad shema'tem...tishmer'u...ta'asu ('you obeyed...you kept...you did') is emphatic — three verbs to describe the completeness of their compliance. The word mitsvotav ('his instructions, commands') is the same term used for God's commandments (mitsvot), reinforcing the parallel between human and divine authority that structures this chapter.
19. The blessing formula lo yikkaret ish...omed lefanai ('he will never lack a man standing before me') is a permanence promise identical in structure to the Davidic promise (33:17) and the Levitical promise (33:18). To 'stand before' God means to serve in his presence — a priestly and prophetic vocation. God rewards the Rechabites' faithfulness to a human ancestor with permanent standing before the divine presence, the highest honor available. The phrase kol-hayyamim ('all the days') extends this promise without a visible endpoint.

Summary: Jeremiah 36 is one of the most dramatic narratives in all prophetic literature — the story of a scroll written, read, and destroyed. In Jehoiakim's fourth year, God commands Jeremiah to dictate all his oracles onto a scroll, and Baruch son of Neriah writes them down. Since Jeremiah is banned from the temple, Baruch reads the scroll publicly on a fast day. Officials hear of it and summon Baruch for a private reading; they are alarmed and report to King Jehoiakim. The king has the scroll read before him in his winter quarters, and as each three or four columns are read, he cuts them off with a scribe's knife and throws them into the fire in the brazier until the entire scroll is consumed. He shows no fear, no repentance, and no grief. God responds through Jeremiah with a judgment oracle against Jehoiakim, and Jeremiah dictates the scroll again to Baruch — this time with additional material.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is the closest the Hebrew Bible comes to describing the physical process of prophetic literary composition. We see the tools: a megillat sefer (scroll), deyo (ink), a ta'ar hasofer (scribe's knife), an ach (brazier). We see the layers of transmission: God speaks to Jeremiah, Jeremiah dictates to Baruch, Baruch reads to the people, officials relay to the king. The repeated readings create mounting dramatic tension — three audiences, three reactions. The people listen. The officials tremble. The king burns. Jehoiakim's act of cutting and burning the scroll is a deliberate act of royal contempt for prophetic authority, a symbolic annulment of the divine word. But the final verse delivers the theological punchline: the scroll is rewritten with additions. The word of God cannot be destroyed by fire. We preserved the pacing of the Hebrew narrative, which builds slowly through procedural detail before erupting in the king's defiant act of destruction.

Translation Friction: The word megillah ('scroll') appears throughout and must be distinguished from sefer ('book, document, writing'). The compound megillat-sefer in verse 2 is literally 'scroll of a book/document' — we rendered it as 'a scroll' since in this period a scroll was the standard book format. The term delathot ('columns, doors') in verse 23 describes the sections of the scroll — literally 'doors' but technically the columns of text visible when the scroll was unrolled to a given point. We rendered this as 'columns' with a note on the Hebrew image. The verb qara ('he tore, cut') in verse 23 could mean either 'tore' or 'cut,' but the presence of the scribe's knife indicates deliberate cutting, not ripping. Jehoiakim's lack of reaction required careful handling — the Hebrew emphasizes what did NOT happen (no tearing of garments, no fear) as powerfully as what did.

Connections: The contrast between Jehoiakim and his father Josiah is unmistakable. When a scroll was read to Josiah (2 Kings 22:11), he tore his garments in grief and repentance; when a scroll is read to Jehoiakim, he cuts and burns it. The phrase 'they were not afraid and did not tear their garments' (v. 24) deliberately invokes Josiah's opposite response. Baruch son of Neriah reappears in chapters 32, 43, and 45, and is increasingly recognized as the editor or compiler of significant portions of the book of Jeremiah. The promise that Jehoiakim's dead body will be 'thrown out to the heat of day and the frost of night' (v. 30) connects to 22:18-19 where Jeremiah prophesied that Jehoiakim would receive 'the burial of a donkey.' The theological principle that the word of God survives destruction anticipates the broader biblical theme of scripture's indestructibility.

¹In the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah, this word came to Jeremiah from the LORD: ²"Take a scroll and write on it all the words I have spoken to you against Israel, against Judah, and against all the nations, from the day I first spoke to you — from the days of Josiah — until today. ³Perhaps the house of Judah will hear of all the disaster I intend to bring on them, and each person will turn back from his evil way, and I will forgive their iniquity and their sin." ⁴Jeremiah summoned Baruch son of Neriah, and Baruch wrote on a scroll, at Jeremiah's dictation, all the words of the LORD that he had spoken to him. ⁵Then Jeremiah instructed Baruch: "I am restricted — I cannot enter the house of the LORD. ⁶So you must go and read from the scroll — the words of the LORD that you wrote at my dictation — in the hearing of the people in the house of the LORD on a day of fasting. Read them also in the hearing of all the people of Judah who come in from their cities. ⁷Perhaps their plea for mercy will come before the LORD and each of them will turn back from his evil way, because the anger and the fury that the LORD has declared against this people are great." ⁸Baruch son of Neriah did everything that Jeremiah the prophet commanded him, reading the words of the LORD from the scroll in the house of the LORD. ⁹In the fifth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah, in the ninth month, a fast was proclaimed before the LORD for all the people in Jerusalem and all the people coming in from the cities of Judah to Jerusalem. ¹⁰Baruch read the words of Jeremiah from the scroll in the house of the LORD, in the chamber of Gemariah son of Shaphan the scribe, in the upper court at the entrance of the New Gate of the house of the LORD, in the hearing of all the people. ¹¹When Micaiah son of Gemariah son of Shaphan heard all the words of the LORD from the scroll, ¹²he went down to the royal palace, to the chamber of the scribe, and there all the officials were sitting: Elishama the scribe, Delaiah son of Shemaiah, Elnathan son of Achbor, Gemariah son of Shaphan, Zedekiah son of Hananiah, and all the other officials. ¹³Micaiah reported to them all the words he had heard when Baruch read from the scroll in the hearing of the people. ¹⁴All the officials sent Jehudi son of Nethaniah son of Shelemiah son of Cushi to Baruch, saying, "Take the scroll from which you read in the hearing of the people and come." So Baruch son of Neriah took the scroll in his hand and came to them. ¹⁵They said to him, "Sit down and read it to us." So Baruch read it in their hearing. ¹⁶When they heard all the words, they turned to one another in alarm and said to Baruch, "We must certainly report all these words to the king." ¹⁷They questioned Baruch: "Tell us — how did you write all these words? Was it at his dictation?" ¹⁸Baruch answered them, "He dictated all these words to me from his mouth, and I wrote them on the scroll with ink." ¹⁹The officials said to Baruch, "Go and hide — you and Jeremiah. No one must know where you are." ²⁰They went to the king in the court, but first they deposited the scroll in the chamber of Elishama the scribe. Then they reported all the words to the king. ²¹The king sent Jehudi to fetch the scroll. He took it from the chamber of Elishama the scribe, and Jehudi read it in the hearing of the king and all the officials standing beside the king. ²²The king was sitting in the winter quarters — it was the ninth month — with a fire burning in the brazier before him. ²³Whenever Jehudi had read three or four columns, the king would cut them off with a scribe's knife and throw them into the fire in the brazier, until the entire scroll was consumed in the fire in the brazier. ²⁴They showed no fear and did not tear their garments — neither the king nor any of his servants who heard all these words. ²⁵Even though Elnathan, Delaiah, and Gemariah urged the king not to burn the scroll, he would not listen to them. ²⁶The king commanded Jerahmeel the king's son, Seraiah son of Azriel, and Shelemiah son of Abdeel to seize Baruch the scribe and Jeremiah the prophet. But the LORD hid them. ²⁷After the king had burned the scroll and the words that Baruch had written at Jeremiah's dictation, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah: ²⁸"Take another scroll and write on it all the previous words that were on the first scroll — the one that Jehoiakim king of Judah burned. ²⁹And concerning Jehoiakim king of Judah, you are to say: This is what the LORD says — You burned this scroll, saying, 'Why did you write on it that the king of Babylon will certainly come and destroy this land and eliminate from it both human and animal?' ³⁰Therefore, this is what the LORD says concerning Jehoiakim king of Judah: He will have no one to sit on the throne of David, and his dead body will be thrown out, exposed to the heat by day and the frost by night. ³¹I will punish him, his offspring, and his servants for their iniquity. I will bring on them, on the inhabitants of Jerusalem, and on the people of Judah every disaster I have spoken against them — but they would not listen." ³²Then Jeremiah took another scroll and gave it to Baruch son of Neriah, the scribe. Baruch wrote on it, at Jeremiah's dictation, all the words of the scroll that Jehoiakim king of Judah had burned in the fire — and many similar words were added to them besides.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The fourth year of Jehoiakim is 605/604 BCE — the same year Nebuchadnezzar defeated Egypt at Carchemish (cf. 46:2) and established Babylonian dominance over the region. The timing is significant: God commands the scroll's composition at the precise moment when the geopolitical crisis Jeremiah had been warning about becomes irreversible. The Hebrew vayyehi ('and it was') is the standard narrative opening, rendered naturally without the archaic 'and it came to pass.'
2. Megillat-sefer is literally 'a scroll of a book/document' — the standard writing format of the period, made from animal skins or papyrus sewn together. The scope of the writing is comprehensive: every oracle from the beginning of Jeremiah's ministry (c. 627 BCE under Josiah) to the present (605 BCE) — over twenty years of prophetic speech. The threefold 'against Israel, against Judah, and against all the nations' covers the full range of Jeremiah's oracles, including the oracles against the nations collected in chapters 46–51.
3. The word ulai ('perhaps') is extraordinary — God expresses hope rather than certainty, leaving space for human response. The purpose of the scroll is not merely to record but to provoke repentance (yashuvu, from shuv). The distinction between avon ('iniquity' — the guilt/distortion of wrongdoing) and chattat ('sin' — missing the mark, failing to meet the standard) is preserved. God's willingness to forgive is contingent on their turning back — the scroll is an instrument of mercy, not merely judgment.
4. The phrase mippi Yirmeyahu ('from the mouth of Jeremiah') describes oral dictation — Jeremiah speaks, Baruch writes. This is one of the few biblical passages that explicitly describes the mechanism of prophetic literary composition. Baruch was a trained scribe from a prominent family — his brother Seraiah held a court position (51:59). The word order in Hebrew emphasizes Baruch as the agent of transcription while Jeremiah remains the source of the divine words.
5. The word atsur ('restricted, confined, shut up') indicates that Jeremiah was barred from the temple, though the text does not specify why. Possible reasons include: official ban by the temple authorities after his temple sermon (chapter 7/26), ritual impurity, or some form of house arrest. The restriction necessitates Baruch as his proxy — the scroll becomes Jeremiah's voice when the prophet himself cannot be present.
6. The be'oznei ('in the ears of') construction emphasizes public, audible proclamation — not private reading but public performance of the prophetic word. The 'day of fasting' (yom tsom) would draw large crowds from across Judah to the temple, maximizing the audience. Jeremiah strategically chooses a moment of national assembly to deliver twenty years of accumulated oracles.
7. Again ulai ('perhaps') — Jeremiah echoes God's own hopeful uncertainty from verse 3. The word techinnah ('plea for mercy, supplication') is from the root chanan ('to be gracious') — it is a plea that throws itself entirely on the hearer's grace. The pairing of af ('anger') and chemah ('fury, heat') describes the full intensity of divine wrath, making the urgency of repentance clear.
8. The phrase kekhol asher tsivvahu ('according to everything he commanded him') echoes the obedience language of the Rechabites in the preceding chapter (35:10, 18), creating a literary link: Baruch, like the Rechabites, obeys fully. Jeremiah is here called hannavi ('the prophet'), a title that reinforces his authority as the source of authentic divine speech.
9. The ninth month (Kislev, approximately November–December) places this during the cold season, which becomes significant when the winter brazier appears in verse 22. The fast may have been called in response to the Babylonian threat following the battle of Carchemish the previous year. Nearly a year has passed since the command to write the scroll (v. 1, fourth year), suggesting the scroll's composition was not rushed. The passive 'a fast was proclaimed' (qar'u tsom) leaves the initiative ambiguous — it may have been the king's or the religious authorities' decision.
10. Gemariah son of Shaphan belongs to a family that repeatedly supported Jeremiah — his father Shaphan was the scribe who read the discovered scroll to King Josiah (2 Kings 22:8–10), and his brother Ahikam protected Jeremiah from execution (26:24). The location is strategic: the upper court at the New Gate would have been a high-traffic area during a public fast, giving Baruch maximum exposure. The chamber's use suggests Gemariah was sympathetic to Jeremiah's message.
11. Micaiah is Gemariah's son — three generations of the Shaphan family now intersect with prophetic scrolls. His grandfather Shaphan read the discovered book of the law to Josiah; now the grandson hears Jeremiah's scroll read. The verb shama ('heard') begins the chain of transmission: Micaiah hears, then reports to the officials, who summon Baruch, who reads to them, and they report to the king.
12. The list of officials names specific individuals who can be cross-referenced with other biblical and extra-biblical sources. Elnathan son of Achbor was sent by Jehoiakim to extradite the prophet Uriah from Egypt for execution (26:22) — his presence here creates tension about where his loyalties lie. Gemariah son of Shaphan is the same official in whose chamber Baruch read; his presence among the officials confirms his involvement. The Hebrew hinneh ('there') conveys the narrative immediacy of finding the officials already assembled — the information reaches the right people at the right moment.

13. The verb higgid ('reported, declared') indicates a formal report, not casual gossip. Micaiah functions as a relay in the chain of transmission: God to Jeremiah to Baruch to the people to Micaiah to the officials — five links before the words reach the political leadership.
14. Jehudi's name means 'the Judean' or 'the Jew' — he functions as an intermediary throughout this chapter, later reading the scroll to the king (v. 21). His grandfather's name Cushi ('the Cushite/Ethiopian') may indicate African ancestry, a detail that reflects the ethnic diversity of Judean court life. The officials' request is respectful — they ask Baruch to come with the scroll, not seize it. Their posture toward the prophetic word is initially open, in contrast to the king's response.
15. The invitation shev na ('sit down, please') is courteous — the officials treat Baruch with respect and give him a proper hearing. The particle na adds politeness. This is the second reading of the scroll (after the public reading in v. 10), and the narrative builds through repetition — each successive reading brings the words closer to the king.
16. The officials' reaction is fear — pachadu ish el re'ehu ('they were alarmed, each toward his neighbor') — a communal, shared dread at the content of the scroll. Their response is the proper one: alarm at divine judgment, followed by action. The emphatic infinitive absolute haggeid naggid ('we must certainly report') shows resolve — they feel obligated to inform the king. Their fear contrasts sharply with Jehoiakim's total lack of fear in verse 24.
17. The officials want to verify the chain of transmission — are these Jeremiah's own compositions or direct prophetic dictation? The question eikh katavta ('how did you write?') probes the mechanism of composition, anticipating the modern scholarly question about the relationship between prophetic speech and written text. The phrase mippiv ('from his mouth') is both literal (oral dictation) and metaphorical (prophetic authority).
18. Baruch's answer is precise and revealing: mippiv yiqra elai ('from his mouth he would call out to me') describes an ongoing process of oral dictation. The mention of deyo ('ink') is one of the few references to writing materials in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Ezekiel 9:2-3) — a concrete physical detail that grounds the narrative in material reality. The ink was likely a carbon-based mixture of soot and gum. This verse provides the clearest biblical description of how prophetic texts were physically produced.
19. The officials' warning reveals their awareness that the scroll's content will provoke the king's wrath. Their counsel to hide (histater, from the root s-t-r, 'to conceal') shows they expect violence. This group of officials occupies a precarious middle position — they take the prophetic word seriously enough to be alarmed, but they serve a king who will not tolerate it. Their protective instinct toward Jeremiah and Baruch echoes Ahikam son of Shaphan's protection of Jeremiah in 26:24.
20. The officials take a precaution — they leave the physical scroll in safekeeping before going to the king, perhaps hoping to control the king's access to it or protect it from immediate destruction. The verb hifqidu ('they deposited, entrusted') implies careful placement for safekeeping. They report the contents orally (vayyaggidu be'oznei hammelekh, 'they reported in the king's ears') rather than bringing the scroll itself — a buffer that proves insufficient, as the king will demand the scroll.
21. The king demands the physical scroll — the officials' attempt to maintain a buffer fails. Jehudi now performs the third reading, this time directly to the king and his entire court. The verb yiqra'eha ('he read it') is singular — Jehudi reads aloud while the king and officials listen. The phrase ha'omedim me'al hammelekh ('standing beside/above the king') describes the court formation, with officials standing while the king is seated.
22. The beit hachoref ('winter house/quarters') was a section of the palace used in the cold months (cf. Amos 3:15). The ninth month (Kislev) corresponds to November-December, when Jerusalem can be cold enough to require heating. The ach is a portable brazier or fire-pot, not a built-in hearth — a metal or ceramic container holding burning charcoal, placed in the room for warmth. This detail sets the physical scene for the burning: the fire is already lit, available, within arm's reach. The narrative's attention to the brazier is ominous — it tells the reader exactly how the scroll will be destroyed before the destruction happens.
23. The delathot ('doors, columns') refers to the columns of text visible on the scroll when partially unrolled — each 'door' is a panel of writing. The ta'ar hasofer ('scribe's knife') was a blade used for cutting and trimming parchment or scraping off errors — Jehoiakim turns a tool of literary production into a tool of literary destruction. The iterative construction (reading three or four columns, then cutting, then throwing) indicates a prolonged, deliberate act — not a single impulsive throw but systematic, column-by-column destruction. The king slices apart the word of God with the same tool a scribe would use to prepare it. The repetition of 'the fire in the brazier' at the end hammers the image home.
24. This verse is constructed entirely as negation — what did NOT happen. The phrase lo pachadu ('they were not afraid') directly contrasts with the officials' alarm in verse 16 (pachadu). The phrase lo qar'u et-bigdeihem ('they did not tear their garments') is a devastating allusion to Josiah's response when a scroll was read to him: 'the king tore his garments' (2 Kings 22:11). Josiah ripped his clothes in grief and repentance; his son Jehoiakim rips the scroll in contempt. Father and son hear the word of God and respond with tearing — but what they tear reveals everything about their character.
25. The verb hifgi'u ('they urged, interceded, pleaded') indicates intense personal advocacy — these three officials tried to stop the king. Gemariah is the same official in whose chamber Baruch first read the scroll; his opposition to burning it is consistent with his earlier support. Elnathan's intercession is complex — this is the same man who brought the prophet Uriah back from Egypt for execution (26:22), yet here he tries to save the scroll. The phrase velo shama aleihem ('he would not listen to them') echoes the recurring accusation against Judah: God spoke and they did not listen. Now the king refuses to listen even to his own advisors.
26. Ben-hammelekh ('son of the king') may mean a literal prince or could be a court title. Jehoiakim's order to arrest Baruch and Jeremiah confirms the officials' fear in verse 19 — their warning to hide was well-founded. The final clause vayyastirem YHWH ('but the LORD hid them') is abrupt and theologically decisive. No explanation is given for how God concealed them; the narrative simply states divine protection as a fact. The verb s-t-r ('to hide, conceal') echoes the officials' command histater ('hide yourselves') in verse 19 — what the officials advised in human wisdom, God accomplished in divine power.

27. The prophetic reception formula marks a new divine communication in response to the king's act. The phrase 'the scroll and the words' treats the physical scroll and its verbal content as two distinct things — the king burned the object, but the words persist. The narrative's structure enacts its own theology: the king destroys the scroll, and immediately God speaks again.
28. The command shuv qach ('again take') uses the verb shuv ('return, again') — the key verb of Jeremiah's theology now applied to the act of writing itself. The word returns. God's response to the burning is not grief or defeat but repetition — take another scroll, write again. The phrase megillah acheret ('another scroll') emphasizes material replacement, but the content is restored: 'all the previous words.' The king destroyed the medium; God restores the message.
29. God quotes Jehoiakim's own objection back to him — the king burned the scroll because it prophesied Babylonian invasion. The emphatic infinitive absolute bo yavo ('will certainly come') is the very prediction the king tried to annul by burning. The verb hishbit ('eliminate, cause to cease') is comprehensive — total depopulation, both human and animal. Jehoiakim's act was not merely censorship but an attempt at sympathetic magic: by destroying the written prediction, he hoped to prevent the predicted event. The theology of this chapter refutes that: destroying the word does not prevent the reality.
30. The judgment has two parts. First, dynastic termination: lo yihyeh-lo yoshev al-kisse David ('he will have no one sitting on David's throne'). Jehoiakim's son Jehoiachin did briefly reign (three months, 2 Kings 24:8) before deportation to Babylon, raising questions about fulfillment — the brevity of his reign may be the point, or the prophecy may refer to lasting dynastic rule. Second, the denial of proper burial: his corpse will be 'thrown out' (mushleket) to the elements. This connects to 22:18-19 where Jeremiah prophesied Jehoiakim would receive 'the burial of a donkey — dragged and thrown beyond the gates of Jerusalem.' The pairing of chorev ('heat') and qerach ('frost') creates a merism — his body will be exposed to every extreme, with no one to gather it.
31. The verb paqadti ('I will punish, visit upon') carries the full weight of divine reckoning — it means to pay attention to, to take account of, to hold accountable. The judgment extends concentrically: from Jehoiakim, to his offspring and servants, to all Jerusalem, to all Judah. The final clause velo shame'u ('but they did not listen') is the chapter's epitaph — the same indictment repeated throughout Jeremiah, now applied specifically to the king who burned the scroll. The irony is total: the king who refused to hear the words will now experience the reality those words described.
32. The final verse is the theological climax of the chapter. The scroll is reconstituted — every word the king burned is restored. But the last phrase delivers the punchline: ve'od nosaf aleihem devarim rabbim kaheimah ('and many similar words were added to them besides'). The king's attempt to silence the prophetic word resulted in MORE words. The scroll grew. Fire could not diminish it; destruction only multiplied it. This principle — that the word of God survives and exceeds every attempt to destroy it — becomes a foundational theme in biblical theology. The verb nosaf ('were added') is in the passive, suggesting divine rather than merely human initiative in the expansion.

Summary: Jeremiah 37 opens with Zedekiah's installation as king by Nebuchadnezzar, noting immediately that neither the king nor his officials heeded the LORD's words through Jeremiah. When a temporary Egyptian military advance causes the Chaldeans to lift the siege of Jerusalem, Zedekiah sends a delegation asking Jeremiah to pray for the nation. The LORD's response is blunt: Egypt will retreat and the Chaldeans will return and burn the city. Jeremiah attempts to leave Jerusalem to claim a property inheritance in Benjamin, is arrested at the Benjamin Gate, accused of deserting to the Chaldeans, beaten, and imprisoned in the house of Jonathan the scribe. After many days in the dungeon, Zedekiah secretly summons Jeremiah to ask: 'Is there any word from the LORD?' Jeremiah's answer is unchanged: 'You will be handed over to the king of Babylon.' Jeremiah then pleads not to be sent back to Jonathan's dungeon, and Zedekiah transfers him to the court of the guard with a daily ration of bread.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter captures the paradox at the heart of Zedekiah's reign — a king who cannot stop consulting the prophet he cannot bring himself to obey. Zedekiah's secret question, 'Is there any word from the LORD?' (hayesh davar me'et YHWH, v. 17), is one of the most poignant moments in the book: a man who desperately wants a different answer but keeps asking a prophet who will not give him one. The temporary Egyptian relief (v. 5) creates a false hope that Jeremiah's prophecy has failed — but God immediately corrects this, declaring that even if the Chaldean army were reduced to wounded men lying in their tents, they would still rise and burn Jerusalem (v. 10). This hyperbolic statement underscores that Jerusalem's destruction is a divine decree, not a military calculation. Jeremiah's arrest on charges of desertion (v. 13) is bitterly ironic: the prophet who told others to surrender is accused of surrendering himself. The dungeon of Jonathan the scribe (beit ha-bor) is described in language suggesting a cistern-pit within a house, anticipating the literal cistern of chapter 38.

Translation Friction: The verb nachal in verse 12 is debated — it may mean 'to receive a portion' (inheritance division), 'to slip away,' or 'to conduct business.' We rendered it as 'to claim his portion' following the context of property division among kinspeople, which connects to Jeremiah's land purchase in chapter 32. The phrase 'falling away to the Chaldeans' (nofel el ha-kasdim, v. 13) uses the participle of nafal ('to fall'), a technical term in this period for military desertion — we rendered it 'deserting to the Chaldeans' to capture the military accusation. Zedekiah's request in verse 21 for daily bread from 'the bakers' street' (chuts ha-ofim) is a specific topographic detail — we preserved this as a place name rather than a generic description.

Connections: Zedekiah's secret consultation with Jeremiah connects to 21:1-7 (his first inquiry) and anticipates 38:14-28 (his final meeting). The Egyptian army's approach and withdrawal echoes Ezekiel 17:15-17, where Ezekiel independently condemns Zedekiah's alliance with Egypt. The charge of desertion against Jeremiah parallels the charge against the soldiers in 38:19 and 39:9. Jeremiah's plea for his life (v. 20) echoes the petition form found in the Psalms of individual lament. The transfer to the court of the guard (chatsar ha-mattarah) positions Jeremiah for the events of chapters 38 and 39.

¹King Zedekiah son of Josiah reigned in place of Coniah son of Jehoiakim, whom Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon had installed as king in the land of Judah. ²But neither he, nor his officials, nor the people of the land listened to the words of the LORD that he spoke through the prophet Jeremiah. ³King Zedekiah sent Jehucal son of Shelemiah and Zephaniah son of Maaseiah the priest to the prophet Jeremiah, saying, "Please pray to the LORD our God on our behalf." ⁴At that time Jeremiah was still moving freely among the people, for they had not yet placed him in the prison. ⁵Meanwhile, Pharaoh's army had marched out of Egypt, and when the Chaldeans who were besieging Jerusalem heard the report, they withdrew from Jerusalem. ⁶Then the word of the LORD came to the prophet Jeremiah: ⁷This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: This is what you are to say to the king of Judah, who sent you to consult me — Pharaoh's army, which has marched out to help you, will return to its own land, to Egypt. ⁸The Chaldeans will return and attack this city. They will capture it and burn it with fire. ⁹This is what the LORD says: Do not deceive yourselves by thinking, 'The Chaldeans will surely leave us.' They will not leave. ¹⁰For even if you were to strike down the entire Chaldean army fighting against you and only wounded men remained among them, each lying in his tent — they would still rise up and burn this city with fire. ¹¹Now when the Chaldean army had withdrawn from Jerusalem because of Pharaoh's army, ¹²Jeremiah set out from Jerusalem to go to the territory of Benjamin, to claim his portion there among the people. ¹³When he reached the Benjamin Gate, the officer of the guard stationed there — a man named Irijah son of Shelemiah, son of Hananiah — seized the prophet Jeremiah, saying, "You are deserting to the Chaldeans!" ¹⁴Jeremiah said, "That is a lie! I am not deserting to the Chaldeans." But Irijah would not listen to him. He seized Jeremiah and brought him before the officials. ¹⁵The officials were furious with Jeremiah. They beat him and imprisoned him in the house of Jonathan the scribe, which they had converted into a prison. ¹⁶When Jeremiah had been placed in the pit-dungeon, in the vaulted cells, he remained there many days. ¹⁷Then King Zedekiah sent for him and had him brought out. The king questioned him secretly in his palace and asked, "Is there any word from the LORD?" Jeremiah answered, "There is." Then he said, "You will be handed over to the king of Babylon." ¹⁸Then Jeremiah said to King Zedekiah, "What crime have I committed against you, or against your officials, or against this people, that you have put me in prison? ¹⁹And where are your prophets who prophesied to you, saying, 'The king of Babylon will not come against you or against this land'? ²⁰Now please hear me, my lord the king. Let my plea come before you: do not send me back to the house of Jonathan the scribe, or I will die there." ²¹So King Zedekiah gave orders, and they placed Jeremiah in the court of the guard. A loaf of bread was given to him daily from the Bakers' Street, until all the bread in the city was gone. And Jeremiah remained in the court of the guard.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew himlikh ('caused to reign, installed') emphasizes that Zedekiah's kingship was Nebuchadnezzar's doing — he is a vassal, not a sovereign. 'Coniah' (Konyahu) is the shortened form of Jeconiah/Jehoiachin, who reigned only three months before being deported (2 Kings 24:8-17). We rendered himlikh as 'installed' rather than the KJV's 'made king' to highlight the political reality of puppet kingship.

2. The phrase be-yad ('by the hand of') is the standard idiom for prophetic mediation — God's words come 'through' or 'by the hand of' the prophet. The indictment covers three levels of society: king, court officials (avadav, literally 'his servants'), and the common people (am ha-arets). All three are culpable.
3. The delegation includes both a court official (Jehucal) and a priest (Zephaniah son of Maaseiah), representing both civil and religious authority. Jehucal reappears in 38:1 as one of the officials who demand Jeremiah's death — his role shifts from supplicant to accuser. The request hitpallel-na ('please pray') uses the polite particle na, revealing desperation beneath the royal dignity.
4. The narrative provides a temporal marker: Jeremiah still had freedom of movement — 'coming and going' (ba vayotse) is a Hebrew idiom for unrestricted daily activity. The word keliy ('prison, place of confinement') anticipates the imprisonments that follow in this chapter and the next.
5. The Pharaoh is Hophra (Apries, r. 589–570 BCE), mentioned by name in 44:30. His military expedition created temporary relief for Jerusalem and false hope that the siege was over. The verb va-ye'alu ('they went up,' i.e., 'withdrew') indicates a tactical retreat, not a defeat — the Chaldeans pulled back to deal with the Egyptian threat. The word shim'am ('their report, the news of them') is a cognate accusative construction emphasizing the hearing of intelligence.
6. The standard prophetic reception formula. The word le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon introducing the divine speech that follows.
7. The verb lidrosheni ('to consult me, to seek me out') is the standard verb for seeking a prophetic oracle. God addresses the delegation rather than Zedekiah directly — the answer must pass through the same mediators who brought the question. The emphatic announcement that Egypt will retreat demolishes the political calculation behind Zedekiah's revolt.
8. Three verbs in rapid succession — return, capture, burn — create a compressed military narrative of Jerusalem's inevitable fate. The finality of the sequence leaves no room for negotiation or alternative outcomes. The verb saraf ('burn') foreshadows the literal burning of the temple and city described in 52:13.
9. The idiom al tashshi'u nafshoteikhem (literally 'do not lift up your souls') means 'do not delude yourselves' or 'do not raise false hopes.' We rendered it as 'do not deceive yourselves' to capture the self-deception God warns against. The infinitive absolute halokh yelekhu ('going they will go,' i.e., 'surely leave') expresses the people's confident expectation, which God flatly denies.
10. This is one of the most striking hyperbolic statements in the prophets: even a Chaldean army reduced entirely to wounded men would still carry out God's decree against Jerusalem. The word meduqqarim ('pierced, wounded') describes men run through with weapons, barely alive. The point is theological, not military — Jerusalem's fall is divinely ordained and no human calculation can prevent it.
11. The temporal clause sets the scene for Jeremiah's arrest. The verb he'alot ('going up, withdrawing') is the same used in verse 5 for the Chaldean withdrawal, creating narrative cohesion. The withdrawal was tactical — because of (mippenei, literally 'from before the face of') Pharaoh's approaching forces.
12. The verb lachaloq ('to divide, to receive a portion') is debated. The KJV's 'to separate himself' misses the likely meaning: Jeremiah was going to handle a property matter — the division or claiming of an inheritance among his kinspeople in Anathoth (in Benjamin). This connects to his purchase of the field in chapter 32. The phrase betokh ha-am ('among the people') indicates he was participating in a communal property distribution, not fleeing.
13. The phrase nofel el ha-kasdim ('falling to the Chaldeans') is the technical term for military desertion in wartime, literally 'falling over' to the enemy side. The accusation was plausible on the surface because Jeremiah had publicly urged surrender (21:9, 38:2). The ba'al pequddut ('master of oversight') was a military officer responsible for controlling movement through the city gates during the siege. Irijah is identified by his grandfather Hananiah — possibly the same false prophet Hananiah of chapter 28, which would make the arrest personally vindictive.
14. Jeremiah's protest sheqer ('falsehood, lie') uses the same word he applies to the false prophets throughout the book (cf. navi sheqer, 'prophet of falsehood'). The irony is sharp: the prophet of truth is accused on the basis of a sheqer. The officials (sarim) are the royal court administrators who function as a judicial body during wartime.
15. The verb vayiqtsifu ('they were furious') indicates a rage beyond judicial displeasure — this is personal hostility. The officials beat Jeremiah (hikku, from nakah, 'to strike') before any formal proceeding, indicating extrajudicial violence. Jonathan the scribe's house had been repurposed as a place of confinement (beit ha-kele), likely because the regular prison was overwhelmed during the siege. The conversion of a scribe's house into a dungeon symbolizes the perversion of literate, administrative order into instruments of oppression.
16. The beit ha-bor ('house of the pit') indicates an underground chamber — likely a cistern or cellar beneath the house, damp and dark. The chanuyyot ('vaulted cells, arched chambers') describes the specific architectural feature of the underground confinement: arched stone cells, cramped and suffocating. The phrase yamim rabbim ('many days') is deliberately vague, conveying an indefinite period of suffering.
17. The word basseter ('in secret') reveals Zedekiah's political cowardice — he cannot afford to be seen consulting Jeremiah, whom his officials have imprisoned. The question hayesh davar me'et YHWH ('Is there any word from the LORD?') is almost plaintive, as though the king hopes that confinement might have changed the prophet's message. Jeremiah's one-word answer yesh ('there is') precedes the devastating repetition of the same judgment he has delivered consistently: you will be handed over (tinnatein, niphal of natan) to Babylon.
18. The verb chatati ('I have sinned, offended') is from the root ch-t-a, the standard word for sin in Hebrew. Jeremiah turns the tables: if imprisonment is punishment, what is the offense? The threefold address — you, your officials, this people — mirrors the threefold indictment of verse 2, creating a structural parallel between the nation's guilt before God and the prophet's innocence before his accusers.

- 19. Jeremiah's rhetorical question is devastating: the false prophets who promised peace have been proven wrong by events. The word ayyeh ('where?') demands an accounting. The prophets who predicted no Babylonian invasion (cf. Hananiah in chapter 28) are conspicuously absent now that Nebuchadnezzar has arrived. Jeremiah does not need to argue his case — the siege itself vindicates him.
- 20. Jeremiah addresses Zedekiah as adoni ha-melekh ('my lord the king'), the formal court address, showing proper deference even while protesting his treatment. The word techinnati ('my supplication, my plea') is from the root ch-n-n ('to be gracious, to show favor') — Jeremiah is asking for mercy from the king even as he delivers God's message of judgment. The warning velo amut sham ('or I will die there') is a plain statement that the conditions in Jonathan's dungeon are lethal.
- 21. The chatsar ha-mattarah ('court of the guard') was an open courtyard attached to the royal palace where soldiers were garrisoned — a significant improvement over the underground dungeon. The chuts ha-ofim ('Bakers' Street') was a specific commercial lane in Jerusalem where bakers had their shops, mentioned only here in the Hebrew Bible. The detail 'until all the bread in the city was gone' foreshadows the famine conditions of the final siege (52:6). Zedekiah shows enough compassion to improve Jeremiah's conditions but not enough courage to release him or follow his counsel.

Summary: Jeremiah 38 narrates the prophet's lowest physical point and his final exchange with Zedekiah. Four officials hear Jeremiah's continued message that only surrender to Babylon will save lives, and they petition the king to have him executed for undermining military morale. Zedekiah capitulates, handing Jeremiah over to the officials, who lower him into the cistern of Malkijah son of the king, where he sinks into the mud. Ebed-Melech, a Cushite official in the royal palace, intervenes — he appeals directly to Zedekiah, who authorizes a rescue. Ebed-Melech lowers rags and worn cloth for Jeremiah to pad the ropes, then pulls him out. In the chapter's second half, Zedekiah summons Jeremiah one final time, swearing a secret oath not to kill him. Jeremiah delivers his last counsel: surrender to the officers of Babylon and you will live; refuse, and the city will burn and you will not escape. Zedekiah confesses his real fear — not the Babylonians, but the Judeans who have already deserted, who might abuse him. Jeremiah assures him this will not happen if he surrenders. The king swears Jeremiah to secrecy about their conversation, and Jeremiah remains in the court of the guard until Jerusalem falls.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains one of the most vivid rescue scenes in the Hebrew Bible. The detail of Ebed-Melech lowering worn rags and old cloth (selavot beloyei secharavot, v. 11-12) for Jeremiah to pad under his arms before being pulled up is extraordinarily specific — it reflects both physical compassion and practical wisdom. Ebed-Melech is a Cushite (Ethiopian), a foreign official who shows more moral courage than any Judean in the narrative. His name means 'servant of the king,' but he serves the true King by rescuing the true prophet. God rewards his faith explicitly in 39:15-18. The chapter also reveals the full tragedy of Zedekiah: a man who privately agrees with the prophet, who even tries to protect him, but who is controlled by his own officials and paralyzed by fear. His confession in verse 19, 'I am afraid of the Judeans who have deserted to the Chaldeans,' is devastating — the king of Judah fears his own defectors more than he fears God.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase 'the king cannot do anything against you' (v. 5) uses the Hebrew eyn ha-melekh yukhal etkhem davar, which is difficult — it could mean 'the king is unable to oppose you' (political weakness) or 'the king will not refuse you anything' (passive consent). We rendered it to capture Zedekiah's abdication of authority. The word selavot (v. 11) is rare and its exact meaning debated — possibly 'rags,' 'worn-out cloths,' or 'tattered garments.' Paired with beloyei ('worn out'), the phrase emphasizes the threadbare, discarded nature of the material. The verb tava (v. 6, 'he sank') describes sinking into the tit ('mud, mire') at the bottom of the cistern — we preserved the visceral quality of the image. Zedekiah's final instruction to Jeremiah to mislead the officials (vv. 25-26) raises an ethical question about deception that we document without resolving.*

Connections: *Ebed-Melech's rescue of Jeremiah from the cistern contrasts with the brothers who threw Joseph into a bor (Genesis 37:24) — both are pits, but Ebed-Melech reverses the crime of Joseph's brothers. God's explicit promise of safety to Ebed-Melech (39:15-18) echoes the reward given to Rahab the Canaanite (Joshua 6:25) — both are foreigners who protect God's people and are saved from the destruction that follows. Zedekiah's fear of the Judean deserters (v. 19) connects to the broader theme of nafal ('to fall/desert') that runs through chapters 37-39. The final counsel to surrender connects directly to 21:8-10, where Jeremiah first publicly offered the choice between the way of life and the way of death. Jeremiah's continued confinement in the court of the guard until the city's fall (v. 28) sets up the narrative of chapter 39.*

¹Shephatiah son of Mattan, Gedaliah son of Pashhur, Jehucal son of Shelemiah, and Pashhur son of Malkijah heard the words that Jeremiah was speaking to all the people: ²This is what the LORD says: Whoever stays in this city will die by the sword, by famine, or by plague. But whoever goes out to the Chaldeans will live — his life will be his plunder, and he will survive. ³This is what the LORD says: This city will certainly be handed over to the army of the king of Babylon, and he will capture it. ⁴The officials said to the king, "Let this man be put to death, because he is weakening the resolve of the soldiers who remain in this city and the resolve of all the people by speaking these words to them. This man does not seek the welfare of this people but their ruin." ⁵King Zedekiah answered, "He is in your hands. The king can do nothing to oppose you." ⁶They took Jeremiah and threw him into the cistern of Malkijah, a son of the king, which was in the court of the guard. They lowered Jeremiah down with ropes. There was no water in the cistern — only mud. And Jeremiah sank into the mud. ⁷When Ebed-Melech the Cushite, a court official in the royal palace, heard that they had put Jeremiah into the cistern — the king was sitting at the Benjamin Gate at the time — ⁸Ebed-Melech left the royal palace and spoke to the king: ⁹"My lord the king, these men have done a terrible thing in all they have done to the prophet Jeremiah. They have thrown him into the cistern, and he will die there from starvation, for there is no more bread in the city." ¹⁰Then the king commanded Ebed-Melech the Cushite, "Take thirty men from here under your authority and pull the prophet Jeremiah up out of the cistern before he dies." ¹¹Ebed-Melech took the men under his command and went into the royal palace, to a storeroom beneath the treasury. From there he took worn-out rags and tattered scraps of cloth, and lowered them down to Jeremiah in the cistern by ropes. ¹²Ebed-Melech the Cushite called down to Jeremiah, "Put the worn rags and scraps of cloth under your arms, beneath the ropes." And Jeremiah did so. ¹³They pulled Jeremiah up with the ropes and lifted him out of the cistern. And Jeremiah remained in the court of the guard. ¹⁴King Zedekiah sent for the prophet Jeremiah and had him brought to the third entrance of the house of the LORD. The king said to Jeremiah, "I am going to ask you something. Do not hide anything from me." ¹⁵Jeremiah said to Zedekiah, "If I tell you, will you not certainly put me to death? And if I give you counsel, you will not listen to me." ¹⁶King Zedekiah swore secretly to Jeremiah, "As the LORD lives — the one who gave us this life — I will not put you to death, and I will not hand you over to those men who are seeking your life." ¹⁷Then Jeremiah said to Zedekiah, "This is what the LORD, the God of Armies, the God of Israel, says: If you will go out and surrender to the officers of the king of Babylon, you will live. This city will not be burned with fire, and you and your household will survive. ¹⁸But if you do not go out to the officers of the king of Babylon, this city will be handed over to the Chaldeans. They will burn it with fire, and you yourself will not escape from their hands." ¹⁹King Zedekiah said to Jeremiah, "I am afraid of the Judeans who have deserted to the Chaldeans — they might hand me over to them, and they will abuse me." ²⁰Jeremiah answered, "They will not hand you over. Please listen to the voice of the LORD in what I am telling you, and it will go well for you, and you will live. ²¹But if you refuse to go out, this is what the LORD has shown me:

²²All the women remaining in the palace of the king of Judah will be led out to the officers of the king of Babylon, and those women will say:

'Your trusted friends misled you and overpowered you.
Your feet are sunk in the mud —
they have turned their backs on you.'

²³All your wives and children will be led out to the Chaldeans. You yourself will not escape from their grasp but will be seized by the king of Babylon. And this city will be burned with fire." ²⁴Zedekiah said to Jeremiah, "Let no one know about this conversation, and you will not die. ²⁵If the officials hear that I have spoken with you and they come to you and say, 'Tell us what you said to the king and what the king said to you — do not hide it from us, and we will not kill you' — ²⁶then say to them, 'I was presenting my plea to the king, asking him not to send me back to Jonathan's house to die there.'" ²⁷All the officials came to Jeremiah and questioned him. He told them exactly what the king had commanded him to say. They stopped pressing him, because the conversation had not been overheard. ²⁸Jeremiah remained in the court of the guard until the day Jerusalem was captured. He was still there when Jerusalem fell.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Four officials are named — a formal accusation requires multiple witnesses. Jehucal (Jucal) is the same man Zedekiah sent to Jeremiah in 37:3 as a supplicant; he now turns accuser. Pashhur son of Malkijah appeared in 21:1 in a similar diplomatic role. The verb medabber (participle, 'was speaking') indicates continuous, ongoing public preaching — Jeremiah had not stopped despite his recent imprisonment.
2. The triad cherev, ra'av, dever ('sword, famine, plague') is one of Jeremiah's most characteristic formulas, appearing over a dozen times in the book as covenant-curse language. The striking phrase nafsho le-shalal ('his life will be his plunder') means that the deserter's only spoil of war will be his own survival — he will escape with nothing but his life, as though he had plundered it from the wreckage. This is the same message as 21:9.
3. The infinitive absolute hinnaton tinnaten ('being given it will be given') creates emphatic certainty — the construction doubles the verb to remove all doubt. The outcome is not conditional or negotiable. The verb lakad ('capture, seize') is a military term for the fall of a fortified position.
4. The idiom merappeh et yedei ('weakening the hands of') is a military expression for undermining morale — literally making the warriors' hands go slack so they cannot grip their weapons. Remarkably, this exact phrase appears in the Lachish Letters (Letter VI, c. 588 BCE), a contemporary military correspondence complaining that officials in Jerusalem were 'weakening the hands' of the people — possibly a direct reference to Jeremiah's preaching. The officials frame their accusation in patriotic terms: Jeremiah seeks ra'ah ('ruin, disaster') rather than shalom ('welfare') for the people.
5. Zedekiah's capitulation is staggering. The statement eyn ha-melekh yukhal etkhem davar ('the king cannot do anything against you') is an open admission of royal impotence. The king refers to himself in the third person, as if distancing himself from his own powerlessness. He does not condemn Jeremiah or endorse the death sentence — he simply abandons the prophet to the officials' will. This is the portrait of a king who has lost all authority over his own court.
6. The bor ('cistern, pit') was a bell-shaped water-storage chamber cut into rock, common in Judean architecture. When empty of water, thick mud collected at the bottom. The phrase vayyitba Yirmeyahu battiyt ('and Jeremiah sank into the mud') is viscerally descriptive — the verb tava ('to sink, to be swallowed') conveys slow submersion. Without rescue, Jeremiah would have suffocated or died of exposure in the mud. The phrase ben ha-melekh ('son of the king') may mean a literal prince or a royal official bearing that title.
7. Ebed-Melech ('servant of the king') is identified as a Kushi ('Cushite'), meaning he was from the region of Cush (modern Sudan/Ethiopia). The word saris can mean 'eunuch' or simply 'court official' — the term had evolved by this period to designate high-ranking officials regardless of physical status. We rendered it 'court official' as the narrative emphasizes his role and access rather than physical condition. The detail of the king sitting at the Benjamin Gate places Zedekiah in a public judicial setting where Ebed-Melech can approach him.
8. The verb vayyetse ('he went out') indicates urgency — Ebed-Melech left the palace compound to find the king at the city gate. He acts immediately, without waiting for a convenient moment or seeking permission through intermediaries.
9. Ebed-Melech uses the formal court address adoni ha-melekh ('my lord the king') and frames his appeal in moral terms: here'u ('they have done evil, acted wickedly'). He does not merely report the situation but passes judgment on the officials' actions. The phrase vayyamot tachtav ('he will die in his place,' literally 'beneath him') may refer to Jeremiah dying where he is, stuck in the mud. The famine detail — 'there is no more bread in the city' — explains why the daily ration from the Bakers' Street (37:21) has ceased.
10. The number thirty is surprisingly large for a rescue operation — it may indicate the depth of the cistern or the difficulty of extracting a man from thick mud, or it may serve as a royal guard escort to prevent the officials from interfering. The phrase beterem yamut ('before he dies') reveals that Zedekiah acts under the threat of Jeremiah's imminent death — he does not initiate the rescue but responds to Ebed-Melech's moral pressure. The phrase be-yadekha ('under your hand/authority') gives Ebed-Melech command over the operation.
11. The detailed description of Ebed-Melech gathering beloyei sechabot u-beloyei melachim ('worn-out rags and tattered scraps') from a palace storeroom is one of the most humanizing moments in the prophetic literature. He thinks ahead to the practical problem: ropes alone under the armpits of a weakened man stuck in mud would cut into the flesh. The storeroom 'beneath the treasury' (tachat ha-otsar) suggests a basement or cellar area where discarded materials were kept.
12. The phrase tachat atsilot yadekha ('under the hollows of your arms,' i.e., your armpits) is anatomically precise. Ebed-Melech's instruction reveals practical compassion — he understands that Jeremiah, weakened and possibly injured, would be further hurt by rough ropes cutting into bare skin. The rags serve as padding. The simple conclusion vayyaas Yirmeyahu ken ('and Jeremiah did so') conveys the prophet's trust and compliance without embellishment.
13. The rescue is described with understated brevity — vayyimshekhhu ('they pulled') and vayyaalu ('they brought up'). After the detailed preparation, the actual extraction is narrated without drama. Jeremiah is returned to the court of the guard (chatsar ha-mattarah), the same relatively favorable confinement he occupied before (37:21). He is not freed but his conditions are significantly improved.
14. The mavo ha-shelishi ('third entrance') of the temple is an architectural detail mentioned only here — it was apparently a private or restricted entry point suitable for a secret meeting. Zedekiah chooses the temple rather than the palace, perhaps seeking sacred ground for this consultation. His demand al tekhached mimmenni davar ('do not conceal anything from me') echoes his earlier secret consultation in 37:17 but is more insistent, using the verb kachad ('to hide, conceal').

15. Jeremiah's response reveals the impossible position of the prophet: speaking truth risks execution, but the king will not follow advice anyway. The infinitive absolute hamot temiteni ('killing you will kill me') expresses certainty — Jeremiah expects death if he speaks plainly. The second clause is not a question but a bitter statement of fact: 'you will not listen to me.' Jeremiah has learned from experience that Zedekiah wants reassurance, not truth.
16. Zedekiah swears by the LORD — invoking the very God whose word he refuses to obey. The oath formula chay YHWH ('as the LORD lives') is the strongest available, and the qualifying phrase asher asah lanu et ha-nefesh ha-zot ('who made us this life/soul') adds theological weight by acknowledging God as creator. The irony is acute: the king invokes God's authority to protect the prophet while simultaneously defying God's counsel through that same prophet. The basseter ('in secret') again marks this as a private meeting hidden from the officials.
17. The full divine title YHWH Elohei Tsevaot Elohei Yisrael ('the LORD, God of Armies, God of Israel') is deployed at this critical moment — the most extended form of the divine name, conveying maximum authority. The verb yatso tetsu ('going out you will go out') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis. 'Going out' to the enemy officers is the euphemism for formal surrender. The promise is conditional and comprehensive: personal survival, the city spared from burning, and the household preserved.
18. The conditional structure creates a stark binary: surrender and live, or resist and lose everything. The verb lo timmalet ('you will not escape') uses the niphal of malat, emphasizing the futility of any attempt at flight. The direct address ve-attach ('and you yourself') makes the consequence personal — Zedekiah individually will be captured.
19. Zedekiah's confession reveals his deepest fear: not the Babylonians themselves, but his own people who have already defected. The word do'eg ('afraid, anxious') expresses genuine dread. The verb hit'alelu ('mock, abuse, mistreat') is the same root used for the Philistines' abuse of Samson (Judges 16:25) — it implies public humiliation, mockery, and physical mistreatment. The Judean deserters would regard Zedekiah as a traitor who prolonged the war unnecessarily, costing lives. The king fears retribution from those who followed Jeremiah's counsel before he did.
20. Jeremiah's lo yittenu ('they will not hand you over') is a direct prophetic assurance — not speculation but divine guarantee. The plea shema na ('please listen') uses the same verb shama that dominates the book's vocabulary — the fundamental call to obey. The phrase veyitav lekha ('and it will go well for you') echoes the Deuteronomic promise formulas (Deuteronomy 4:40, 5:16, 6:3).
21. The verb hir'ani ('he has shown me') indicates a visionary experience — Jeremiah has been given a vision of what will happen if Zedekiah refuses to surrender. The shift from verbal oracle to visual revelation heightens the urgency. The verb ma'en ('to refuse') carries connotations of obstinate resistance, not mere hesitation.
22. The women's taunt is presented as poetry — a mocking song composed by the royal women as they are led away as captives. The phrase anshei shelomekha ('your men of peace,' i.e., 'your trusted friends, your allies') refers to the officials who gave Zedekiah bad counsel. The image hotebu babits raglekha ('your feet are sunk in the mud') creates a devastating parallel to Jeremiah's literal sinking in the cistern mud (v. 6) — the king who let the prophet sink in mud will himself be stuck in the mire of his own political situation. The verb hissitukha ('they misled you, incited you') is from the root s-w-t, the same verb used for divine testing or incitement (cf. 1 Chronicles 21:1).
23. The consequences escalate: family captured, king seized personally, city burned. The verb tittafes ('you will be seized') is from the root t-p-s ('to seize, capture'), a military term for taking a prisoner. The phrase ve-et ha-ir ha-zot tisrof ba-esh ('and this city you will cause to be burned with fire') uses the hiphil form, potentially implying Zedekiah's refusal to surrender will be the cause of the city's burning — his inaction bears responsibility.
24. Zedekiah's immediate response is not to obey the divine counsel but to demand secrecy. The conditional velo tamut ('and you will not die') is ambiguous — it could be a promise of protection or a veiled threat: keep silent or face consequences. The king's priorities are laid bare: controlling information matters more to him than responding to God's word.
25. Zedekiah anticipates the officials' interrogation of Jeremiah, revealing how thoroughly the officials control information at court. The demand al tekhach ('do not conceal') from the officials would mirror the king's own words in verse 14, creating a situation where Jeremiah is pressured by both sides.
26. Zedekiah instructs Jeremiah to give a partial truth: Jeremiah did indeed make this plea (37:20). The king does not ask the prophet to lie outright but to reveal only a portion of the conversation. The verb mappil ('presenting, casting') combined with techinnah ('plea, supplication') means literally 'casting my plea before' — the same petition language of 37:20. The ethical complexity of this guided deception is left in the text without editorial comment.
27. The verb vayyacharishu ('they fell silent, they stopped') indicates the officials accepted Jeremiah's account and ceased their interrogation. The phrase ki lo nishma ha-davar ('because the matter was not heard') confirms that the private conversation between king and prophet remained secret. Jeremiah complies with the king's instruction — the text reports this without moral commentary, leaving the reader to assess Zedekiah's manipulation of the prophet.
28. The chapter ends with a grim inclusio: Jeremiah remains confined in the court of the guard as Jerusalem falls around him. The verb nilkedah ('was captured') from lakad ('to seize, capture') is repeated twice for emphasis — the city was taken, and when it was taken, the prophet was still imprisoned. The redundancy is deliberate, bridging to the fall narrative in chapter 39. Jeremiah, who told the truth about the city's fate, experiences that fate from inside a prison. The prophet was vindicated, but the vindication came as catastrophe.

Summary: Jeremiah 39 records the event Jeremiah has prophesied for decades: the fall of Jerusalem. In the ninth year of Zedekiah, Nebuchadnezzar besieges the city; by the eleventh year, the wall is breached. Babylonian officials take their seat in the Middle Gate — a symbol of judicial authority over a conquered city. Zedekiah flees by night toward the Jordan valley but is overtaken at Jericho. His sons are executed before his eyes, and then his eyes are put out — the last thing he ever sees is the death of his dynasty. The city is burned and its people deported. Yet within the catastrophe, two acts of deliverance occur: Jeremiah is released from the court of the guard and entrusted to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, and Ebed-Melech the Cushite receives a personal oracle of survival because he trusted in God.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter compresses the most catastrophic event in ancient Judah's history into eighteen verses. The narrative is spare and brutal — no laments, no prophetic commentary, just the bare facts of siege, breach, flight, capture, blinding, burning, and deportation. The Babylonian officials named in verse 3 — Nergal-Sharezer, Samgar-Nebo, Sarsechim the Rab-saris, Nergal-Sharezer the Rab-mag — are attested in cuneiform records, anchoring the text in verifiable history. The detail that Zedekiah's sons were killed 'before his eyes' (le'enav) and then his eyes were blinded is devastatingly precise: the last image burned into his vision was the extinction of his line. We preserved the starkness of the Hebrew without narrative padding. The oracle to Ebed-Melech (verses 15-18) rewards the one Gentile who acted with compassion toward Jeremiah in chapter 38, creating an ironic contrast — a foreign slave survives while a Davidic king is destroyed.

Translation Friction: The list of Babylonian officials in verse 3 presents textual difficulties. The names and titles are partially corrupted in the Masoretic tradition, and scholars disagree on how many individuals are listed and which words are names versus titles. We followed the most defensible parsing while noting uncertainties. The phrase 'in the Middle Gate' (besha'ar hattavekh) is geographically uncertain — its exact location in Jerusalem's wall system is debated. The transition between the fall narrative (vv. 1-10) and the Jeremiah deliverance (vv. 11-14) and the Ebed-Melech oracle (vv. 15-18) involves apparent chronological displacement, since the oracle to Ebed-Melech is introduced as occurring 'while Jeremiah was confined in the court of the guard' — that is, before the fall. We preserved the text's own sequence without rearranging.

Connections: The fall of Jerusalem fulfills Jeremiah's repeated warnings throughout chapters 1-38, particularly the explicit predictions in 21:3-10, 32:3-5, 34:2-3, and 38:17-23. Zedekiah's capture at Jericho (v. 5) fulfills 32:4 and 34:3. The blinding of Zedekiah reconciles two seemingly contradictory prophecies: Jeremiah said he would see the king of Babylon's face (32:4, 34:3) while Ezekiel said he would not see Babylon (Ezekiel 12:13) — he saw Nebuchadnezzar at Riblah but was blinded before reaching Babylon. The parallel account appears in 2 Kings 25:1-12 and Jeremiah 52:4-16. Ebed-Melech's deliverance connects to his rescue of Jeremiah from the cistern in 38:7-13, and the phrase 'because you trusted in me' (ki batachta bi) links to the fundamental prophetic demand for trust in God rather than political alliances.

¹In the ninth year of Zedekiah king of Judah, in the tenth month, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came with his entire army against Jerusalem and laid siege to it. ²In the eleventh year of Zedekiah, in the fourth month, on the ninth day of the month, the city wall was breached. ³All the officials of the king of Babylon entered and took their seats in the Middle Gate: Nergal-Sharezer, Samgar-Nebo, Sarsechim the chief officer, Nergal-Sharezer the chief magus, and all the rest of the officials of the king of Babylon. ⁴When Zedekiah king of Judah and all the soldiers saw them, they fled, going out from the city at night by way of the king's garden, through the gate between the two walls, and he went out toward the Arabah. ⁵But the Chaldean army pursued them and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho. They seized him and brought him up to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon at Riblah in the land of Hamath, and he pronounced judgment on him. ⁶The king of Babylon slaughtered the sons of Zedekiah at Riblah before his eyes, and the king of Babylon also slaughtered all the nobles of Judah. ⁷Then he blinded the eyes of Zedekiah and bound him in bronze shackles to bring him to Babylon. ⁸The Chaldeans burned the king's palace and the houses of the people with fire, and they tore down the walls of Jerusalem. ⁹Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard deported to Babylon the rest of the people who remained in the city, the deserters who had gone over to him, and the rest of the population that remained. ¹⁰But Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard left behind some of the poorest people who had nothing, in the land of Judah, and he gave them vineyards and fields on that day. ¹¹Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon gave orders concerning Jeremiah through Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard: ¹²Take him and watch over him. Do nothing harmful to him — rather, do for him whatever he asks you. ¹³So Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard sent word, along with Nebushazban the chief officer, and Nergal-Sharezer the chief magus, and all the senior officials of the king of Babylon. ¹⁴They sent for Jeremiah and took him from the court of the guard, and they entrusted him to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan, to bring him out to his home. And he lived among the people. ¹⁵The word of the LORD had come to Jeremiah while he was still confined in the court of the guard: ¹⁶Go and say to Ebed-Melech the Cushite: This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says — I am bringing my words against this city for disaster, not for good, and they will be fulfilled before your eyes on that day. ¹⁷But I will rescue you on that day, declares the LORD, and you will not be handed over to the men you fear. ¹⁸For I will certainly save you, and you will not fall by the sword. Your life will be your plunder, because you trusted in me, declares the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The date formula places the beginning of the siege in January 588 BCE. The verb vayyatsuru ('they besieged') is from tsur, meaning to press in, to confine, to besiege — the military image of surrounding a city and cutting off all supply lines. The Hebrew uses the fuller form Nevukhadre'ttsar for the Babylonian king's name, reflecting the original Akkadian Nabu-kudurri-usur ('Nabu, protect the boundary stone').
2. The siege lasted approximately eighteen months — from January 588 to July 586 BCE. The passive verb hovqe'ah ('was breached') is from baqa', meaning to split open, to break through. The text records the breach with devastating brevity — no battle description, no heroic resistance, just the bare fact that the wall was split open. The ninth of Tammuz became a day of mourning in Jewish tradition.
3. The Babylonian officials 'sit (vayyeshvu) in the gate — this is an act of judicial and administrative authority, not casual rest. City gates in the ancient Near East served as courtrooms and government seats. The names and titles in this verse present significant textual difficulties. Rab-saris ('chief officer' or 'chief eunuch') and Rab-mag ('chief magus') are titles, not personal names. The name Nergal-Sharezer appears twice, likely referring to two different officials; one may be identifiable with Neriglissar, who later became king of Babylon (560-556 BCE). The 'Middle Gate' (sha'ar hattavekh) likely refers to a gate between the upper and lower sections of Jerusalem, though its exact location is debated.
4. The Hebrew vayyehi ('and it was') is a narrative transition marker, rendered naturally without the archaic 'and it came to pass.' The escape route — through the king's garden and the gate between the double walls — was at the southeastern corner of the city, near the junction of the Kidron and Hinnom valleys. The Arabah refers to the Jordan Rift Valley, indicating Zedekiah was heading east toward the Jordan and possibly seeking refuge across the river. The flight at night underscores the desperation — the king of Judah fleeing his own capital like a fugitive.
5. The verb vayyassigu ('they overtook') is from nasag, meaning to reach, to catch up with — Zedekiah's flight was intercepted before he could cross the Jordan. Riblah in the land of Hamath was Nebuchadnezzar's field headquarters in central Syria, strategically located on the Orontes River — far from Jerusalem, requiring a long forced march for the captive king. The phrase vaydabber itto mishpatim ('he spoke judgments with him') is a legal idiom meaning he pronounced a judicial sentence, not merely that they had a conversation.
6. The verb shachat ('slaughtered') is from the same root used for sacrificial slaughter — its use here is brutally visceral, not the more neutral verb harag ('killed'). The phrase le'enav ('before his eyes') is devastatingly precise: Zedekiah was forced to watch the execution of his own sons. The chorei Yehudah ('nobles of Judah') — the political and military leadership — were eliminated alongside the royal house, ensuring no organized resistance could continue.
7. The verb ivver ('blinded') describes the physical act of putting out the eyes. The juxtaposition with the previous verse is devastating — the last thing Zedekiah saw was his sons being killed, and then he was blinded. The nechúshṭayim ('bronze shackles,' literally 'double bronze') indicates heavy fetters. This detail fulfills both Jeremiah's prophecy that Zedekiah would see the king of Babylon face to face (34:3) and Ezekiel's prophecy that he would be brought to Babylon but would not see it (Ezekiel 12:13) — the two prophecies are reconciled by the sequence: he saw Nebuchadnezzar, then was blinded before the journey.
8. The verb sarefu ('they burned') is followed by ba'esh ('with fire'), which is technically redundant but emphatic — the destruction was total, consuming. The verb natátsu ('they tore down, demolished') for the walls indicates systematic dismantling, not merely damage from the siege. The demolition of the walls removed Jerusalem's military viability and its symbolic identity as a fortified city of God. The Hebrew bet hammelek is literally 'house of the king' — rendered as 'palace' for clarity, since 'house' in English does not convey the scale of a royal compound.
9. Nebuzaradan's title rav-tabbachim literally means 'chief of the butchers' or 'chief of the slaughterers' — an ancient title that had evolved to mean 'captain of the guard' or 'chief executioner.' The nophelim ('those who fell away, deserters') refers to those who had surrendered to the Babylonians during the siege — even they were deported, not rewarded for their defection. The repetition of hannish'arim ('those remaining') emphasizes the thoroughness of the deportation.

10. The dallim ('poor, destitute') were left behind precisely because they posed no political or economic threat. The irony is sharp: those with nothing suddenly received the confiscated vineyards and fields of the deported elite. The word yigevim ('fields' or 'cisterns') is rare — it may refer to agricultural plots or water catchment areas, both essential for subsistence farming. Babylonian imperial policy typically left an agricultural underclass to keep the land productive and prevent it from becoming a wilderness.
11. The verb tsivvah ('he commanded, gave orders') indicates a formal royal directive. That Nebuchadnezzar personally issued orders about Jeremiah suggests the Babylonians knew of his prophecies urging surrender — information likely reported by the Judean deserters (v. 9). The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon introducing direct speech.
12. The phrase ve'inekha sim alav ('set your eyes on him') is an idiom meaning to watch over, to care for — not surveillance but protection. The royal command grants Jeremiah a remarkable status: a conquered people's prophet receiving personal protection from the conquering emperor. The instruction 'do for him whatever he asks' (ka'asher yedabber elekha ken aseh immo) gives Jeremiah an astonishing degree of freedom and personal agency under Babylonian authority.
13. Three high-ranking Babylonian officials are dispatched to handle Jeremiah's release, underscoring the importance Nebuchadnezzar placed on the prophet's treatment. Rab-saris and Rab-mag are titles rather than personal names: rab-saris is 'chief of the eunuchs/officials' and rab-mag is 'chief magus/diviner.' The Hebrew rabbei melekh Bavel ('senior officials of the king of Babylon') indicates the broader command structure was involved.
14. The chatsar hammattarah ('court of the guard') was the military detention area within the royal compound where Jeremiah had been held since 37:21 — not a dungeon, but a form of house arrest. Gedaliah son of Ahikam son of Shaphan came from a family with a history of protecting Jeremiah: his father Ahikam had saved the prophet from execution after the temple sermon (26:24), and his grandfather Shaphan was the scribe who read the discovered Torah scroll to King Josiah (2 Kings 22:10). The phrase vayyeshev betokh ha'am ('he lived among the people') indicates Jeremiah was not deported but remained in Judah — a free man among the surviving remnant.
15. This verse marks a chronological flashback — the oracle to Ebed-Melech occurred during Jeremiah's confinement, before the fall of the city. The verb atsur ('confined, restrained') is from atsar, meaning to shut up, to imprison. The pluperfect 'had come' reflects the temporal sequence: this word was given prior to the events of verses 1-14. The Hebrew le'mor ('saying') is rendered as a colon.
16. Ebed-Melech ('servant of the king') is identified as ha-Kushi ('the Cushite'), indicating he was from the region of modern Sudan/Ethiopia. The name may be a title or epithet rather than a birth name. The phrase mevi et-devarai ('bringing my words') is significant: God's spoken prophecies are not merely predictions but active agents — they arrive, they are fulfilled, they accomplish their purpose. The contrast lera'ah velo letovah ('for disaster and not for good') echoes 21:10 and makes clear that the prophetic word Jeremiah has spoken against Jerusalem will be realized in full.
17. The verb hitsaltikha ('I will rescue you') is from natsal, meaning to deliver, to snatch away, to rescue from danger. The promise is specific and personal — amid national catastrophe, one individual receives a divine guarantee of survival. The phrase yagor mippenhem ('you fear from their faces') uses yagor, which implies dread or terror — Ebed-Melech had reason to fear retribution from the pro-war faction who had opposed Jeremiah and resented those who aided him.
18. The infinitive absolute construction mallet amallettekha ('I will certainly save you') is emphatic — an absolute divine guarantee. The idiom nafshekha leshalal ('your life as plunder') is unique to Jeremiah and deeply ironic: in a scene of total looting, the greatest plunder is simply to walk away alive. The reason for Ebed-Melech's deliverance is stated plainly: ki batachta bi ('because you trusted in me'). This is the only place in the chapter where trust (bitachon) in God is explicitly named, and it belongs not to a king or priest or prophet but to a foreign court official who pulled Jeremiah out of a cistern (38:7-13).

Summary: Jeremiah 40 narrates the immediate aftermath of Jerusalem's fall. Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard releases Jeremiah at Ramah, where deportees were being assembled for the march to Babylon. The Babylonian commander delivers a striking theological speech, attributing Judah's destruction to their sin against their own God. Jeremiah is given the choice to go to Babylon with full provision or to remain in the land — he chooses to stay. Gedaliah son of Ahikam is appointed governor over the remnant at Mizpah. Judean military commanders and scattered refugees gather to him, and he urges them to settle down, serve the king of Babylon, and harvest the land. Finally, Johanan son of Kareah brings intelligence that Baalis king of Ammon has sent Ishmael son of Nethaniah to assassinate Gedaliah. Gedaliah refuses to believe it and forbids Johanan from striking preemptively — a fateful decision that will cost him his life in chapter 41.

What Makes This Remarkable: The most remarkable element is the Babylonian commander's theological speech (vv. 2-3). A pagan military officer correctly interprets Judah's fall as the fulfillment of their own God's judgment — the very message Jeremiah had preached for forty years and been persecuted for. The irony is layered: the enemy understands what Israel's own kings, priests, and prophets refused to accept. Gedaliah's appointment represents a thread of hope — a governor from a family loyal to the covenant (grandson of Shaphan, son of Ahikam who protected Jeremiah), governing a remnant in the land. But the chapter's final verses cast a shadow over this fragile restoration: the assassination plot is revealed, warned against, and dismissed. We rendered Gedaliah's refusal to believe the intelligence report with careful attention to his exact words — he does not merely doubt but actively forbids action, sealing his own fate.

Translation Friction: The relationship between 39:14 (Jeremiah entrusted to Gedaliah) and 40:1-6 (Jeremiah released at Ramah) presents a chronological tension — it appears Jeremiah was released twice, or the two accounts describe different stages of the same process. We rendered each passage as the Hebrew presents it without harmonizing. The verb 'found' (matsa) in verse 1 is unusual — Nebuzaradan 'found' Jeremiah among the deportees at Ramah, suggesting the prophet had been swept up in the mass deportation despite the earlier order to protect him. The list of locations where scattered Judeans gathered (v. 11-12) required careful handling of geography.

Connections: Nebuzaradan's theological speech (vv. 2-3) echoes Jeremiah's own words throughout the book, particularly 25:3-11 and 35:17. Gedaliah's appointment connects to his family's protection of Jeremiah in 26:24 and the broader Shaphan family's role in Josiah's reform (2 Kings 22:3-14). The assassination plot foreshadowed here is carried out in chapter 41 and triggers the flight to Egypt in chapters 42-43. Ishmael son of Nethaniah is 'of the royal seed' (41:1), suggesting dynastic motivation for the assassination. Johanan's warning and Gedaliah's refusal to hear it creates a tragic parallel with all the unheeded warnings throughout the book — now it is not a king rejecting a prophet but a good governor rejecting sound intelligence.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah from the LORD after Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard released him from Ramah, having found him bound in chains among all the captives of Jerusalem and Judah who were being deported to Babylon. ²The captain of the guard took Jeremiah aside and said to him, "The LORD your God declared this disaster against this place. ³The LORD has brought it about and has done just as he said. Because you sinned against the LORD and did not obey his voice, this thing has come upon you. ⁴Now, I am freeing you today from the chains on your hands. If it seems good to you to come with me to Babylon, come, and I will watch over you. But if it seems wrong to you to come with me to Babylon, then do not. Look — the whole land is before you. Go wherever seems good and right to you." ⁵While Jeremiah had not yet turned away, he said, "Return to Gedaliah son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan, whom the king of Babylon has appointed over the cities of Judah, and live with him among the people — or go wherever seems right to you." Then the captain of the guard gave him provisions and a gift and sent him on his way. ⁶So Jeremiah went to Gedaliah son of Ahikam at Mizpah and lived with him among the people who remained in the land. ⁷When all the commanders of the forces in the open country — they and their men — heard that the king of Babylon had appointed Gedaliah son of Ahikam over the land, and that he had entrusted to him the men, women, and children from the poorest of the land who had not been deported to Babylon, ⁸they came to Gedaliah at Mizpah — Ishmael son of Nethaniah, Johanan and Jonathan sons of Kareah, Seraiah son of Tanhumeth, the sons of Ephai the Netophathite, and Jezaniah the son of the Maacathite — they and their men. ⁹Gedaliah son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan, swore an oath to them and their men, saying, "Do not be afraid of serving the Chaldeans. Settle in the land and serve the king of Babylon, and it will go well for you. ¹⁰As for me, I will stay at Mizpah to represent you before the Chaldeans who come to us. But you — gather wine, summer fruit, and oil, store them in your vessels, and settle in the towns you have occupied." ¹¹Likewise, all the Judeans who were in Moab, among the Ammonites, in Edom, and in all the other lands heard that the king of Babylon had left a remnant in Judah and had appointed Gedaliah son of Ahikam, son of Shaphan, over them. ¹²All the Judeans returned from all the places where they had been scattered and came to the land of Judah, to Gedaliah at Mizpah, and they gathered wine and summer fruit in great abundance. ¹³Then Johanan son of Kareah and all the commanders of the forces in the open country came to Gedaliah at Mizpah. ¹⁴They said to him, "Are you aware that Baalis king of the Ammonites has sent Ishmael son of Nethaniah to take your life?" But Gedaliah son of Ahikam did not believe them. ¹⁵Johanan son of Kareah spoke to Gedaliah privately at Mizpah, saying, "Let me go and strike down Ishmael son of Nethaniah — no one will know. Why should he take your life, so that all the Judeans gathered around you are scattered and the remnant of Judah perishes?" ¹⁶But Gedaliah son of Ahikam said to Johanan son of Kareah, "You must not do this. You are speaking falsely about Ishmael."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Ramah, located about five miles north of Jerusalem, served as the Babylonian assembly point for deportees — the same Ramah associated with Rachel's weeping in 31:15. The detail that Jeremiah was asur ba'aziqim ('bound in chains') among the captives suggests a breakdown in the chain of command: despite Nebuchadnezzar's personal order to protect him (39:11-12), Jeremiah had been swept up in the mass deportation. The verb shalach ('released, sent away') indicates an official discharge from custody.
2. The verb vayyiqqach ('he took') implies Nebuzaradan singled Jeremiah out from the line of deportees for a personal conversation. A Babylonian military commander attributes the fall of Jerusalem to YHWH Elohekha ('the LORD your God') — using Israel's own covenant name for God. The word ra'ah ('disaster, calamity') is the same word Jeremiah used throughout his prophecies to describe what God would bring upon Jerusalem. The pagan commander speaks as if he has read Jeremiah's own oracles.
3. Nebuzaradan completes his theological analysis with remarkable precision: sin (chata'tem), failure to obey God's voice (lo shema'tem beqolo), and consequent judgment (hayah lakhem haddavar hazzeh). This mirrors the exact prophetic formula Jeremiah used throughout his ministry — the Babylonian commander is essentially preaching Jeremiah's own sermon. The phrase 'did not obey his voice' uses the same shama beqol construction that appears throughout the covenant-obedience passages in Deuteronomy and in Jeremiah 11:4, 7.
4. The verb pittachtikha ('I have opened/released you') is from patach, meaning to open, to release — the chains are literally opened from his wrists. Nebuzaradan offers Jeremiah an extraordinary choice: the comfort and security of Babylon under official protection, or freedom in the devastated land. The phrase kol ha'arets lefanekha ('the whole land is before you') echoes God's words to Abraham in Genesis 13:9 and 20:15 — the land is spread before him to choose. The idiom asim et-eini alekha ('I will set my eye on you') repeats the protective promise from 39:12.
5. The opening clause ve'odennu lo yashuv ('while he had not yet turned back') is syntactically difficult — it may mean Jeremiah was hesitating to leave, or that Nebuzaradan spoke again before Jeremiah had turned to go. The verb hifqid ('he appointed') is from paqad, meaning to appoint, to entrust with authority — Gedaliah is the Babylonian-appointed governor, not a king. The aruchah ('provisions, food rations') and mas'et ('gift, portion') represent both practical sustenance and a mark of official favor. Nebuzaradan's generosity toward Jeremiah reflects the prophet's vindication — the enemy commander treats him with more honor than his own people ever did.
6. Mizpah (hammitspah, 'the watchtower'), located about eight miles north of Jerusalem, became the administrative center for the remnant community because Jerusalem itself was destroyed. The site had deep associations in Israel's history — Samuel judged Israel there (1 Samuel 7:5-6) and Saul was chosen king there (1 Samuel 10:17). Jeremiah's choice to stay with Gedaliah and the remnant rather than accept Babylonian patronage reflects his lifelong commitment to the people of the land, even after their rejection of his message.
7. The sarei hachayalim ('commanders of the forces') refers to Judean military officers who had escaped the fall by fleeing into the countryside (bassadeh, 'in the field/open country') with their units. These were guerrilla bands who had avoided capture. The phrase middallat ha'arets ('from the poorest of the land') echoes 39:10 — the Babylonians left the destitute as an agricultural labor force while deporting the skilled and wealthy.
8. This list of military commanders names the key players in the events of chapters 40-43. Ishmael son of Nethaniah, listed first, is the man who will assassinate Gedaliah in chapter 41 — his presence at this gathering is ominous in retrospect. Johanan son of Kareah will emerge as the leader who warns Gedaliah and later leads the remnant to Egypt. The Netophathite designation indicates origin from Netophah, a town near Bethlehem. The Maacathite designation refers to the region of Maacah in northern Transjordan — this commander had come from far away to join the remnant.
9. The verb vayyishava ('he swore') indicates a formal oath — Gedaliah binds himself by covenant oath to the reliability of his promise. His counsel to 'serve the king of Babylon' (ivdu et melek Bavel) follows exactly the policy Jeremiah had preached throughout his ministry (27:11-12). The promise veyitav lakhem ('it will go well for you') echoes the covenant blessing formula from Deuteronomy. Gedaliah is essentially implementing Jeremiah's prophetic program — submit to Babylon and survive.
10. The phrase la'amod lifnei ('to stand before') means to serve as an intermediary or representative — Gedaliah will be the point of contact between the remnant and the Babylonian administration. The list of agricultural products — yayin (wine), qayits (summer fruit, probably figs), and shemen (oil) — indicates the harvest season was approaching and the land could still sustain its inhabitants. The verb tefastem ('you have occupied, taken hold of') suggests the scattered commanders had already claimed abandoned towns as bases. Gedaliah legitimizes their presence and redirects them from military resistance to agricultural settlement.
11. The scattered Judeans mentioned here had fled to neighboring territories during or before the siege — Moab to the east, Ammon to the northeast, and Edom to the south. The word she'erit ('remnant') is theologically loaded in prophetic literature — it carries the hope that God preserves a surviving core through judgment. The news that Babylon had allowed a remnant to remain rather than deporting everyone signaled a possibility of return and restoration.
12. The verb vayyashuvu ('they returned') uses the root shuv, Jeremiah's signature word for both repentance and physical return. Here it is literal — the refugees come home — but the resonance with the prophetic call to 'return' to God is present. The phrase niddechu sham ('they had been driven/scattered there') uses the passive of nadach, meaning to be pushed away, banished, scattered — they did not leave voluntarily but were driven out by the catastrophe. The abundant harvest (harbeh me'od, 'very much') suggests the land itself was yielding generously despite the destruction, a quiet sign of God's provision for the remnant.

13. This verse marks a shift in the narrative from the gathering of the remnant to the intelligence report about the assassination plot. Johanan son of Kareah emerges as the military leader among the scattered commanders — his name means 'the LORD is gracious.' The phrase bassadeh ('in the field/open country') distinguishes these armed bands from the settled civilian population.
14. The infinitive absolute construction hayado' teda' ('do you really know') is emphatic — 'are you fully aware?' The commanders are pressing Gedaliah with urgent intelligence. The verb lehakkotekha nafesh ('to strike your life,' i.e., to kill you) uses the verb nakah ('to strike') with nefesh ('life, soul') — a direct way to say 'assassinate.' Baalis king of the Ammonites had political motivation: a stable Judean remnant under Babylonian authority would threaten Ammonite expansion into Judean territory. The final clause is devastating in its simplicity: velo he'emin lahem ('and he did not believe them'). The verb he'emin is from the root aleph-mem-nun, the same root as 'amen' and emunah — Gedaliah lacked the trust to credit the warning.
15. The word basseter ('in secret, privately') indicates Johanan understood the sensitivity of what he was proposing — a preemptive assassination. His argument is strategic, not personal: if Gedaliah is killed, the fragile remnant community will scatter (nafotsu, from puts, 'to disperse') and the she'erit Yehudah ('remnant of Judah') will perish. Johanan's reasoning is sound — this is exactly what happens in chapters 41-43. The phrase ve'ish lo yeda' ('and no one will know') shows Johanan planned a covert operation to eliminate the threat without destabilizing the community. His logic anticipates the catastrophe with precision, making Gedaliah's refusal all the more tragic.
16. Gedaliah's response is absolute: al ta'aseh et haddavar hazzeh ('do not do this thing') — a direct prohibition. His accusation ki sheqer attah dover ('for you are speaking falsehood') uses sheqer, the same word used throughout Jeremiah for the 'false' prophecies of the nevi'ei sheqer ('false prophets'). The irony is cutting: throughout the book, truth-tellers have been accused of lying while liars have been believed. Now Gedaliah — a good man from a family that supported Jeremiah — falls into the same pattern of refusing to hear an unwelcome truth. The chapter ends on this note of tragic refusal, and the reader already knows from the trajectory of the book that refusing to hear warnings leads to destruction.

Summary: Jeremiah 41 records the assassination of Gedaliah son of Ahikam, the Babylonian-appointed governor over the remnant in Judah. Ishmael son of Nethaniah, of royal blood, comes to Gedaliah at Mizpah with ten men and murders him along with the Judeans and Chaldean soldiers present. The next day, before anyone knows of the assassination, eighty men arrive from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria in mourning, bearing grain offerings and incense for the house of the LORD. Ishmael lures them inside and slaughters most of them, sparing ten who reveal hidden stores of wheat, barley, oil, and honey. Ishmael throws the bodies into a large cistern that King Asa had built during his fortification against Baasha of Israel. Ishmael then takes captive all the remaining people at Mizpah, including the king's daughters whom Nebuzaradan had entrusted to Gedaliah, and sets out toward the Ammonites. Johanan son of Kareah and the other military commanders hear of the atrocity, pursue Ishmael, and overtake him at the great pool in Gibeon. The captive people rally to Johanan, but Ishmael escapes with eight men to the Ammonites. Johanan and the remnant, now terrified of Babylonian reprisal for Gedaliah's death, settle near Bethlehem, preparing to flee to Egypt.

What Makes This Remarkable: The assassination of Gedaliah is one of the most consequential political murders in biblical history. It extinguished the last ember of self-governance in Judah and set in motion the flight to Egypt that Jeremiah had explicitly warned against. The scene of the eighty mourners from the former northern kingdom — beards shaved, clothes torn, bodies gashed — traveling to offer worship at the destroyed Temple site reveals that even after 586 BCE, pilgrims still came to Jerusalem's ruins. Ishmael's massacre of these worshipers is gratuitous evil: he kills men coming to mourn. The cistern of Asa (v.9) connects this atrocity to the northern-southern conflict centuries earlier — a defensive fortification now becomes a mass grave. The Fast of Gedaliah (Tsom Gedaliah), observed on the third of Tishrei, commemorates this event as one of the four fasts of Jewish tradition (Zechariah 8:19).

Translation Friction: Ishmael's motive is not fully explained. He is of royal blood (min-zera ha-melukhah), which may suggest dynastic resentment against a non-Davidic governor, but the text also notes that Baalis king of Ammon sent him (40:14). The combination of royal pretension and foreign manipulation makes him simultaneously a political assassin and a foreign agent. We have preserved the narrator's restraint — the text does not psychologize Ishmael but simply records his actions. The ten men who buy their lives with hidden food stores (v.8) raise a moral question the text does not resolve: is their survival pragmatic wisdom or complicity?

Connections: Gedaliah's assassination parallels the account in 2 Kings 25:25-26 but with far greater detail. The flight toward Egypt (v.17) sets up chapters 42-44 and fulfills the ironic reversal Jeremiah has been warning about: the remnant that survived Babylon's judgment will now voluntarily return to Egypt. The cistern of Asa connects to 1 Kings 15:22, where Asa fortified Mizpah against Baasha. The mourners from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria represent the former northern kingdom — their pilgrimage to the destroyed Temple shows the persistence of worship even after catastrophe. Ishmael's escape to the Ammonites connects to 40:14, where Baalis king of Ammon had commissioned the assassination.

¹In the seventh month, Ishmael son of Nethaniah son of Elishama, of royal blood, along with officers of the king and ten men with him, came to Gedaliah son of Ahikam at Mizpah. They ate bread together there at Mizpah. ²Then Ishmael son of Nethaniah rose up with the ten men who were with him and struck down Gedaliah son of Ahikam son of Shaphan with the sword, killing him — the one whom the king of Babylon had appointed over the land. ³Ishmael also killed all the Judeans who were with Gedaliah at Mizpah, along with the Chaldean soldiers who were stationed there. ⁴On the second day after the killing of Gedaliah — before anyone knew of it — ⁵eighty men arrived from Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria with their beards shaved, their clothes torn, and their bodies gashed, carrying grain offerings and incense to bring to the house of the LORD. ⁶Ishmael son of Nethaniah went out from Mizpah to meet them, weeping as he walked. When he met them he said, 'Come to Gedaliah son of Ahikam.' ⁷When they entered the city, Ishmael son of Nethaniah and the men with him slaughtered them and threw them into a cistern. ⁸But ten men among them said to Ishmael, 'Do not kill us, for we have hidden stores in the field — wheat, barley, oil, and honey.' So he relented and did not kill them along with their companions. ⁹The cistern into which Ishmael threw all the bodies of the men he had killed was the one King Asa had constructed as a defense against Baasha king of Israel. Ishmael son of Nethaniah filled it with the slain. ¹⁰Then Ishmael took captive all the rest of the people at Mizpah — the king's daughters and all the people who remained at Mizpah, whom Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard had entrusted to Gedaliah son of Ahikam. Ishmael son of Nethaniah took them captive and set out to cross over to the Ammonites. ¹¹When Johanan son of Kareah and all the commanders of the forces with him heard of all the evil that Ishmael son of Nethaniah had done, ¹²They gathered all their men and went to fight Ishmael son of Nethaniah. They found him by the great pool at Gibeon. ¹³When all the people whom Ishmael held captive saw Johanan son of Kareah and all the commanders of the forces with him, they rejoiced. ¹⁴All the people whom Ishmael had taken captive from Mizpah turned around and went over to Johanan son of Kareah. ¹⁵But Ishmael son of Nethaniah escaped from Johanan with eight men and fled to the Ammonites. ¹⁶Then Johanan son of Kareah and all the commanders of the forces with him took the entire remnant of the people whom he had recovered from Ishmael son of Nethaniah at Mizpah after the murder of Gedaliah son of Ahikam — soldiers, women, children, and court officials whom he had brought back from Gibeon. ¹⁷They set out and stayed at Geruth Chimham near Bethlehem, intending to go on to Egypt, ¹⁸because they were afraid of the Chaldeans, since Ishmael son of Nethaniah had struck down Gedaliah son of Ahikam, whom the king of Babylon had appointed over the land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The seventh month is Tishrei (September-October 586 BCE), only two months after the destruction of Jerusalem. The phrase min-zera ha-melukhah ('of the seed of royalty') establishes Ishmael as a Davidic descendant, giving him a dynastic claim against the non-royal Gedaliah. The shared meal — va-yokhelu sham lechem yachdav ('they ate bread together there') — is a covenant act of hospitality and trust. To murder a man with whom you have eaten bread is a violation of the most fundamental social bond in the ancient Near East.
2. The narrator emphasizes the enormity of the act by reciting Gedaliah's full lineage (son of Ahikam son of Shaphan — from a family that had protected Jeremiah, 26:24) and his appointment by the king of Babylon. To kill Gedaliah is to strike against the only remaining political order in Judah and to invite Babylonian retaliation upon the entire remnant.
3. The massacre extends beyond Gedaliah to include all the Judeans at Mizpah and the Chaldean garrison. The killing of Babylonian soldiers makes this not merely a political assassination but an act of rebellion against Babylon itself — guaranteeing reprisal against whoever remains in the land.
4. The phrase ve-ish lo yada ('and no man knew') creates dramatic irony: the reader knows what the arriving pilgrims do not. The narrative slows to set up the next atrocity with terrible suspense.
5. These pilgrims come from the former northern kingdom — Shechem, Shiloh, and Samaria — cities associated with Israel rather than Judah. Their mourning rituals technically violate Leviticus 19:28 and Deuteronomy 14:1, which prohibit gashing the body for the dead, but the narrator records them without condemnation. Their destination — beit YHWH ('the house of the LORD') — is the destroyed Temple, yet they bring minchah (grain offering) and levonah (incense) as if it still stands. Worship persists even at ruins.

6. Ishmael's weeping (halokh halokh u-vokheh, 'walking, walking, and weeping') is feigned grief designed to lure the pilgrims into the trap. The use of Gedaliah's name as bait — 'Come to Gedaliah' — is doubly cruel since Gedaliah is already dead. Ishmael weaponizes the pilgrims' trust and mourning.
7. The verb va-yishchatem ('he slaughtered them') uses the same root (shachat) used for sacrificial slaughter. These men came carrying grain offerings and incense for the house of the LORD; they themselves become victims of slaughter. The irony is devastating. The bodies are cast into a bor (cistern/pit), identified in verse 9 as the cistern of Asa.
8. The ten survivors buy their lives with matmonim (hidden stores/treasures) — supplies cached in the fields. The four staples listed (wheat, barley, oil, and honey) represent significant agricultural wealth. Ishmael's calculation is purely mercenary: these ten are worth more alive than dead. The phrase be-tokh acheihem ('among their brothers/companions') reminds the reader that the seventy dead were these men's brothers.
9. The narrator pauses to identify this cistern historically: it was built by King Asa (r. c. 911-870 BCE) during his fortification of Mizpah against Baasha king of Israel (1 Kings 15:22). A defensive structure from the northern-southern conflict centuries earlier now becomes a mass grave. The verb mille ('filled') — Ishmael filled the cistern with corpses — is grotesque in its completeness.
10. The king's daughters (benot ha-melekh) — royal women of the Davidic house — had been left in Gedaliah's care by Nebuzaradan. Ishmael now takes them as political hostages. His destination is the Ammonites, confirming the connection to Baalis king of Ammon who had commissioned the assassination (40:14). He is taking the remnant of Judah to a foreign king.
11. Johanan had warned Gedaliah about Ishmael's plot and even offered to assassinate Ishmael secretly (40:13-16), but Gedaliah refused to believe him. Now the catastrophe Johanan predicted has occurred. The phrase kol ha-ra'ah ('all the evil') encompasses the assassination, the massacre, and the kidnapping.
12. The mayim rabbim ('great waters') at Gibeon is the large pool mentioned in 2 Samuel 2:13, where Joab's and Abner's men once fought. Gibeon was approximately five miles southwest of Mizpah. The site has been archaeologically identified with a massive rock-cut pool discovered in the 1950s excavations.
13. The single word va-yismachu ('they rejoiced') captures the relief of the captives upon seeing their rescuers. The contrast between captivity under Ishmael and deliverance by Johanan is immediate.
14. The captives actively rally to Johanan — they are not merely liberated but choose to follow him. This group will become the remnant that Jeremiah accompanies, first to the region of Bethlehem (v.17) and eventually to Egypt (43:7).
15. Of the original eleven conspirators (Ishmael plus ten men, v.1), only nine survive — eight men plus Ishmael. Two were apparently killed or deserted. Ishmael escapes to the Ammonites, his patron Baalis's territory. He disappears from the narrative and is never mentioned again. The text offers no punishment, no justice — only escape. The narrator leaves this unresolved.
16. The list — gevarim anshei ha-milchamah ve-nashim ve-taf ve-sarisim ('soldiers and women and children and eunuchs/court officials') — catalogs the entire surviving community. The word sarisim can mean either 'eunuchs' or 'court officials'; in this context it likely refers to officials from the Judean court who had been left behind by the Babylonians.
17. Geruth Kimham (the 'lodging place of Chimham') is near Bethlehem, about six miles south of Jerusalem and on the road toward Egypt. Chimham may be connected to Chimham son of Barzillai, whom David brought to Jerusalem (2 Samuel 19:37-40), suggesting a Davidic-era estate that became a waystation. The remnant pauses here — they have already decided to go to Egypt, though they will consult Jeremiah in chapter 42.
18. The chapter ends with the reason for flight: fear of Babylonian retaliation. The assassination of a Babylonian-appointed governor would inevitably provoke a punitive response. The remnant's logic is understandable — but the following chapters will show that running to Egypt is the one thing God has explicitly forbidden. Their fear of Babylon drives them toward the very disaster Jeremiah has been warning about.

Summary: The remnant under Johanan son of Kareah approaches Jeremiah and asks him to pray to the LORD for direction: should they stay in Judah or flee to Egypt? They swear to obey whatever God says. After ten days, the word of the LORD comes to Jeremiah. God's answer is unambiguous: remain in the land, and He will build them up and plant them; He relents of the disaster He brought upon them. They are not to fear the king of Babylon. But if they go to Egypt, the very sword, famine, and pestilence they fear will follow them there, and none will survive. Jeremiah warns them that they have made a fatal error in their hearts — they asked for God's word but never intended to obey it. He tells them plainly: you will die by sword, famine, and pestilence in Egypt.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter presents one of the most psychologically penetrating moments in the Hebrew Bible: people who ask God for guidance while having already decided what they will do. The ten-day delay (v.7) between the request and the answer is unusual — most prophetic responses in Jeremiah are immediate. The delay may test the remnant's patience and sincerity, or it may simply reflect that the word comes in God's time, not the prophet's. Jeremiah's final accusation (vv.20-22) is devastating: 'You have deceived yourselves' — they sought divine sanction for a decision already made, and when the answer contradicted their plan, they would reject it.

Translation Friction: The remnant's pledge of obedience (vv.5-6) appears sincere. We have not retroactively dismissed it as insincere from the start, though Jeremiah's accusation in verse 20 implies they were self-deceived. The tension between genuine petition and predetermined conclusion is preserved without resolution. God's promise to 'relent of the disaster' (v.10, nichamti) raises questions about divine immutability — we note the Hebrew without softening it.

Connections: The agricultural metaphors of verse 10 ('I will build you up and not tear you down, I will plant you and not uproot you') reprise the language of Jeremiah's commissioning in 1:10. The warning about sword, famine, and pestilence in Egypt echoes the threefold judgment formula that runs throughout Jeremiah (14:12, 21:7, 24:10, 27:8). The remnant's flight to Egypt will invert the exodus — a theme developed fully in chapters 43-44. God's call to 'not fear the king of Babylon' (v.11) inverts the people's stated fear (41:18).

¹Then all the commanders of the forces, Johanan son of Kareah, Jezaniah son of Hoshaiah, and all the people from the least to the greatest approached ²and said to Jeremiah the prophet, 'Let our plea for mercy come before you. Pray for us to the LORD your God — for all this remnant. For we are left as only a few out of many, as your own eyes can see. ³Let the LORD your God tell us the way we should go and what we should do.' ⁴Jeremiah the prophet said to them, 'I have heard you. I am going to pray to the LORD your God as you have asked, and whatever the LORD answers, I will tell you. I will withhold nothing from you.' ⁵They said to Jeremiah, 'May the LORD be a true and faithful witness against us if we do not act according to every word that the LORD your God sends through you to us. ⁶Whether it is good or bad, we will obey the voice of the LORD our God, to whom we are sending you, so that it may go well with us when we obey the voice of the LORD our God.' ⁷After ten days, the word of the LORD came to Jeremiah. ⁸He summoned Johanan son of Kareah, all the commanders of the forces with him, and all the people from the least to the greatest, ⁹and said to them, 'This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, to whom you sent me to present your plea, says: ¹⁰If you will remain in this land, I will build you up and not tear you down; I will plant you and not uproot you. For I relent of the disaster that I have brought upon you. ¹¹Do not be afraid of the king of Babylon, whom you now fear. Do not be afraid of him, declares the LORD, for I am with you to save you and to deliver you from his hand. ¹²I will grant you mercy, and he will have compassion on you and let you return to your own land. ¹³But if you say, "We will not remain in this land," and so refuse to obey the voice of the LORD your God, ¹⁴saying, 'No! We will go to the land of Egypt, where we will not see war or hear the sound of the trumpet or be hungry for bread, and there we will live' — ¹⁵now therefore hear the word of the LORD, O remnant of Judah. This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: If you are determined to go to Egypt and you go to settle there, ¹⁶then the sword you fear will overtake you there in the land of Egypt, and the famine you dread will pursue you to Egypt, and there you will die. ¹⁷All the men who are determined to go to Egypt to settle there will die by the sword, by famine, and by pestilence. None of them will survive or escape the disaster I will bring upon them. ¹⁸For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Just as My anger and My wrath were poured out on the inhabitants of Jerusalem, so My wrath will be poured out on you when you enter Egypt. You will become an object of cursing, horror, execration, and reproach, and you will never see this place again. ¹⁹The LORD has spoken concerning you, O remnant of Judah: Do not go to Egypt. Know for certain that I have warned you this day. ²⁰For you have deceived yourselves. You sent me to the LORD your God, saying, 'Pray for us to the LORD our God, and whatever the LORD our God says, tell us and we will do it.' ²¹I have told you today, but you have not obeyed the voice of the LORD your God in anything He sent me to tell you. ²²Now therefore know for certain: you will die by the sword, by famine, and by pestilence in the place where you desire to go and settle.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The entire community comes — mi-qaton ve-ad gadol ('from small to great') — indicating a unified delegation. Jezeiah (also called Azariah in 43:2) son of Hoshai is identified as one of the ringleaders who will reject Jeremiah's word.
2. The phrase nish'arnu me'at me-harbeh ('we remain a few out of many') is a poignant admission: the once-great nation of Judah has been reduced to a tiny remnant. They address Jeremiah's God as 'the LORD your God' — not 'our God' — a subtle distancing that Jeremiah will correct in verse 4.
3. The request is straightforward: direction (ha-derekh, 'the way') and instruction (ha-davar, 'the word/thing'). At face value, this is a humble petition for divine guidance. The sincerity of the request will be tested by whether they obey the answer.
4. Jeremiah corrects their distancing: he says 'the LORD your God' (elohekhem, not elohai), reassigning ownership. He also commits to full transparency — lo emna mikhem davar ('I will not hold back a word from you'). The prophet is the faithful channel, not the filter, of divine speech.
5. They invoke God as a witness — ed emet ve-ne'eman ('a true and faithful witness') — binding themselves with an oath. The conditional curse ('if we do not act') makes this a self-maledictory oath: they call God's judgment upon themselves if they disobey. The tragic irony is that they will indeed disobey, making this oath their own condemnation.
6. Now they say 'the LORD our God' (YHWH elohenu) — accepting ownership. The phrase im tov ve-im ra ('whether good or bad') pledges unconditional obedience. The clause le-ma'an asher yitav lanu ('so that it may go well with us') echoes Deuteronomic language (Deuteronomy 5:29, 6:3). But the question is whether words match will.
7. The ten-day delay is significant. Prophetic words in Jeremiah usually come immediately. This delay tests the remnant's patience and commitment to their oath. Ten days of silence, ten days of uncertainty, ten days in which the pull of fear and the road to Egypt grow stronger.
8. Jeremiah assembles the full community — the same group that came to him in verse 1. Everyone must hear the word directly from the prophet; there is no room for secondhand transmission or distortion.
9. The full divine title — YHWH elohei Yisra'el ('the LORD, the God of Israel') — gives the response maximum authority. Jeremiah reminds them that they initiated this inquiry: 'to whom you sent me.' The word is the answer they asked for.
10. This verse reprises the four key verbs of Jeremiah's call (1:10): build, tear down, plant, uproot. God promises to reverse the destruction — but only if they remain. The verb nichamti ('I have relented') is theologically weighty: God declares a change in His disposition toward the remnant. The disaster phase is over; restoration is offered.
11. The double al-tire'u ('do not fear') directly addresses the fear that drove them to Bethlehem (41:17-18). God names their fear and countermands it. The covenantal promise ki ittkhem ani ('for I am with you') echoes the assurance given to Jeremiah at his call (1:8) and to Israel throughout the prophets.
12. God promises to move Nebuchadnezzar to show mercy (rachamim). The verb ve-heshiv ('and he will cause you to return') implies restoration to the land — not exile, not displacement, but a return to their own soil (admatkem). This is the positive outcome if they obey.
13. The conditional shifts from promise to warning. God identifies refusal to stay as refusal to obey — the two are equated. Le-vilti shemo'a be-qol YHWH ('so as not to obey the voice of the LORD') reveals that the decision to flee is fundamentally a decision of disobedience.
14. God quotes the remnant's own reasoning back to them: Egypt means no war (milchamah), no trumpet alarm (qol shofar), no famine (la-lechem lo nir'av). These are precisely the three forms of suffering they experienced during the siege. Their logic is that Egypt offers what Judah cannot — security, peace, food. God is about to demolish this logic.
15. The full title — YHWH tseva'ot elohei Yisra'el ('the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel') — adds military authority. The phrase som tesimu peneikhem ('you set, yes set your faces') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis: if you are absolutely determined.
16. The divine irony is precise: the sword and famine they flee from in Judah will follow them to Egypt. The verb yidbaq ('will cling to, will pursue') is the same verb used in Deuteronomy for clinging to God (Deuteronomy 10:20) — but here it is famine that clings to them.
17. The threefold judgment formula — cherev, ra'av, dever ('sword, famine, pestilence') — is Jeremiah's signature warning, appearing more than a dozen times throughout the book. The absoluteness — ve-lo yihyeh lahem sarid u-falit ('not a survivor or escapee among them') — leaves no room for partial safety in Egypt.
18. The four terms — alah (oath-curse), shammah (horror/desolation), qelalah (curse), cherpah (reproach) — form a catalog of humiliation. The final phrase ve-lo tir'u od et ha-maqom ha-zeh ('you will not see this place again') is exile made permanent.
19. The phrase yado'a ted'u ('know, yes know' — infinitive absolute for emphasis) makes the warning undeniable. The verb he'idoti ('I have testified/warned') is legal language — God is placing them on formal notice.
20. Jeremiah's accusation is devastating: ki hit'etem be-nafshoteikhem ('you have deceived yourselves / led yourselves astray'). The reflexive form indicates self-deception. They asked for God's word, but their decision was already made. The quoted prayer repeats their own words from verses 5-6, throwing their oath back at them.

21. Jeremiah speaks in the prophetic perfect — the disobedience is so certain that he states it as already accomplished: ve-lo shema'tem ('you have not obeyed'), even though they have not yet physically departed for Egypt. The prophet sees through the pretense to the settled will beneath it.
22. The chapter ends with the same emphatic construction — yado'a ted'u ('know, yes know') — and the same threefold judgment: sword, famine, pestilence. The final word is ba-maqom asher chafatstem lavo lagur sham ('in the place where you desired to go to sojourn') — the place of their desire becomes the place of their death.

Summary: The remnant rejects Jeremiah's word. Azariah son of Hoshaiiah, Johanan son of Kareah, and all the arrogant men accuse Jeremiah of lying and blame Baruch son of Neriah for turning the prophet against them. They refuse to remain in Judah and take the entire remnant — men, women, children, the king's daughters, and Jeremiah and Baruch themselves — to Egypt. They arrive at Tahpanhes, a frontier city in the eastern Nile Delta. There the word of the LORD comes to Jeremiah: take large stones and bury them in the mortar at the entrance to Pharaoh's palace in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the Judean men. Then declare that Nebuchadnezzar will come and set his throne over these very stones, spreading his royal canopy over them. He will strike the land of Egypt — death for those destined for death, captivity for those destined for captivity, sword for those destined for the sword. He will burn the temples of Egypt's gods and carry off their idols. He will wrap Egypt around himself like a shepherd wraps his garment, and depart in peace.

What Makes This Remarkable: The accusation against Baruch (v.3) is a remarkable deflection: rather than confront Jeremiah's authority directly, they invent a conspiracy theory — the scribe Baruch has manipulated the prophet. This is the first and only time in the book where Baruch is blamed for Jeremiah's message. The forced march to Egypt completes the ironic inversion of the exodus: the people whom God brought out of Egypt now return there voluntarily, dragging the prophet with them. The sign-act at Tahpanhes — burying stones in the pavement — is Jeremiah's last recorded prophetic action. It declares that even Egypt cannot protect them from Babylon. The prophecy was historically fulfilled: Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt in 568/567 BCE.

Translation Friction: The text says the people 'did not obey the voice of the LORD' (v.7), yet Jeremiah and Baruch are taken along against their will — the prophet who told them to stay is himself dragged to the place God forbade. We have not resolved this tension. The phrase 'Nebuchadnezzar My servant' (v.10, avdi) — God calling the pagan king His servant — is theologically jarring and preserved without softening.

Connections: The flight to Egypt inverts the exodus of Exodus 12-15. Tahpanhes (Egyptian: Daphnae) was a garrison city where Greek mercenaries served Pharaoh — the remnant seeks refuge among foreign soldiers. Nebuchadnezzar is again called 'My servant' (avdi), as in 25:9 and 27:6 — God uses pagan rulers as instruments of His purpose. The prophecy of Nebuchadnezzar's invasion of Egypt connects to Ezekiel 29:19-20 and was fulfilled historically. The burning of Egyptian temples (v.12) parallels the burning of the Jerusalem Temple.

¹When Jeremiah had finished speaking to all the people all the words of the LORD their God — everything the LORD their God had sent him to tell them — ²Azariah son of Hoshaiiah, Johanan son of Kareah, and all the arrogant men said to Jeremiah, 'You are lying! The LORD our God did not send you to say, "Do not go to Egypt to settle there." ³Baruch son of Neriah is inciting you against us to hand us over to the Chaldeans, so they can kill us or deport us to Babylon!' ⁴So Johanan son of Kareah, all the commanders of the forces, and all the people did not obey the voice of the LORD by remaining in the land of Judah. ⁵Johanan son of Kareah and all the commanders of the forces took the entire remnant of Judah — those who had returned from all the nations where they had been scattered to live in the land of Judah: ⁶men, women, children, the king's daughters, and every person whom Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard had left with Gedaliah son of Ahikam — along with Jeremiah the prophet and Baruch son of Neriah. ⁷They entered the land of Egypt — for they did not obey the voice of the LORD — and they came to Tahpanhes. ⁸The word of the LORD came to Jeremiah at Tahpanhes: ⁹'Take large stones in your hand and bury them in the mortar in the brick pavement at the entrance to Pharaoh's palace in Tahpanhes, in the sight of the Judean men. ¹⁰Then say to them, "This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am going to send for Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, My servant, and I will set his throne over these very stones that I have buried. He will spread his royal canopy over them. ¹¹He will come and strike the land of Egypt — those destined for death, to death; those destined for captivity, to captivity; those destined for the sword, to the sword. ¹²I will kindle a fire in the temples of the gods of Egypt. He will burn them and carry the gods away. He will wrap himself in the land of Egypt as a shepherd wraps himself in his garment, and he will depart from there in peace. ¹³He will shatter the pillars of the temple of the sun in the land of Egypt, and he will burn the temples of the gods of Egypt with fire."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator twice emphasizes 'the LORD their God' (YHWH eloheihem) — the God they claimed to want to obey is still their God, even as they reject His word. The phrase kol ha-devarim ha-elleh ('all these words') underscores that nothing was withheld.
2. The narrator calls them ha-anashim ha-zedim ('the arrogant/presumptuous men') — the only time this label appears in Jeremiah. Their accusation is direct: sheqer attah medabber ('you are speaking falsehood'). They accuse the prophet of fabricating the oracle. Having sworn to obey (42:5-6), they now deny the word came from God at all.
3. The accusation against Baruch is unprecedented. Throughout the book, Baruch has been Jeremiah's faithful scribe (chapter 36). Now the remnant invents a political motive for him: he wants to hand them to the Chaldeans. The word massit ('inciting') is the same root used in Deuteronomy 13:6 for one who entices Israel to worship other gods — a serious charge.
4. The verdict is stated plainly: ve-lo shama ('they did not obey'). The oath of 42:5-6 is broken. The voice of the LORD — the very voice they pledged to follow whether good or bad — is rejected.
5. The phrase asher shavu mi-kol ha-goyim ('who had returned from all the nations') reveals that this remnant included people who had fled to neighboring countries during the Babylonian invasion and then returned to Judah after the destruction. They are now being uprooted a second time.
6. Jeremiah and Baruch are listed at the end, almost as an afterthought — but it is the most significant detail. The prophet who told them not to go to Egypt is himself taken to Egypt. The man who delivered God's prohibition is compelled to accompany those who violate it. Whether by force or by the momentum of events, Jeremiah goes where God said not to go.
7. The narrator repeats the verdict — ki lo shame'u be-qol YHWH ('for they did not obey the voice of the LORD') — embedding the judgment within the narrative. Tahpanhes is the first stop inside Egypt, a border fortress. The people who left Egypt in the exodus now re-enter it in disobedience.
8. Even in Egypt, the word of the LORD comes. God's speech is not confined to the land of Israel. Jeremiah continues to function as a prophet outside the promised land — the word follows the people wherever they go.
9. This is a prophetic sign-act (otot, symbolic actions). The stones are buried ba-melet ba-malben ('in the mortar in the brick pavement/kiln') at the entrance to Pharaoh's palace. The act is performed publicly — le-einei anashim yehudim ('in the sight of Judean men') — so witnesses can testify when the prophecy is fulfilled. Petrie's excavation at Tell Defenneh found a large brick platform before the entrance to the fortress.
10. Nebuchadnezzar is again called avdi ('My servant'), as in 25:9 and 27:6. The stones Jeremiah buried become the foundation for Babylon's throne in Egypt. The shapripo ('royal pavilion/canopy') represents Babylonian sovereignty established on Egyptian soil. This prophecy was fulfilled when Nebuchadnezzar invaded Egypt in 568/567 BCE.
11. The threefold sorting — death, captivity, sword — echoes 15:2 where God similarly assigns fates. The repetitive structure (asher la-mavet la-mavet, 'those for death to death') has the rhythm of an inescapable decree. There is no category for escape.
12. The burning of Egyptian temples mirrors the burning of the LORD's temple in Jerusalem (52:13). Egypt's gods prove as powerless as Judah's Temple was to prevent destruction. The shepherd-garment simile — ka'asher ya'teh ha-ro'eh et bigdo ('as a shepherd wraps his garment') — portrays the conquest as effortless. Nebuchadnezzar wraps Egypt around himself and walks away.
13. Beit Shemesh ('House of the Sun') is Heliopolis (Egyptian: Iunu/On), the great center of solar worship northeast of Cairo. Its obelisks (matsevot, 'sacred pillars/standing stones') were among the most famous monuments in the ancient world. Nebuchadnezzar will shatter them. The chapter ends with the burning of Egypt's temples — the same fate that befell the house of the LORD in Jerusalem.

Summary: Jeremiah 44 records the prophet's final confrontation with the Judean refugees who have fled to Egypt. God speaks through Jeremiah condemning their persistent idolatry — specifically their burning of incense to the Queen of Heaven. The women respond with brazen defiance, insisting they will continue their vows to the Queen of Heaven and arguing that their suffering began when they stopped worshiping her, not when they started. Jeremiah delivers a closing judgment oracle: Egypt will not be a refuge. Nearly all who fled there will perish by sword and famine. This is Jeremiah's last recorded prophetic oracle.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter preserves the most sustained female speech in the prophetic literature. The women's response in verses 15-19 is not merely quoted — it is given as a theological argument with its own internal logic. They claim a direct causal connection between abandoning the Queen of Heaven cult and the disasters that befell Judah. Their reasoning inverts Jeremiah's entire prophetic message: he says disaster came because of idolatry; they say disaster came because they stopped the idolatry. The Hebrew term melekhet hashamayim ('Queen of Heaven,' or possibly 'work/host of heaven' — the vocalization is disputed) likely refers to the Mesopotamian goddess Ishtar or her Canaanite equivalent Astarte. The chapter's location in Egypt creates a bitter irony: Israel was delivered from Egypt at the Exodus, and now the remnant has voluntarily returned to the place of bondage, bringing their idolatry with them.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase melekhet hashamayim (7:18, 44:17-19, 44:25) presents a significant textual problem. The Masoretic vocalization points it as melekhet ('work of'), but many scholars repoint it as malkat ('queen of'), which better fits the context of a goddess cult. We rendered 'Queen of Heaven' following the scholarly consensus and the ancient versions, but documented the textual issue. The verb qittar ('burn incense') and the noun nesek ('drink offering') indicate full-scale cultic worship, not casual superstition. The phrase 'we and our ancestors, our kings and our officials' in verse 17 distributes responsibility across all levels of society — the women are claiming this was mainstream state religion, not a fringe practice.*

Connections: The Queen of Heaven cult was first condemned in 7:18, forming an inclusio with this final chapter of Jeremiah's ministry — the same sin that opened his public preaching closes it. The flight to Egypt against prophetic warning was narrated in chapters 42-43. The covenant curses invoked here (sword, famine, pestilence) echo Deuteronomy 28. The remnant's insistence on returning to Egypt reverses the Exodus and fulfills the warning of Deuteronomy 28:68. The pattern of female-led idolatry connects to Ezekiel 8:14 (women weeping for Tammuz). Jeremiah's inability to persuade the people even after Jerusalem's destruction demonstrates the thoroughness of the apostasy he has been denouncing since chapter 1.

¹The word that came to Jeremiah concerning all the Judeans living in the land of Egypt — those settled at Migdol, at Tahpanhes, at Memphis, and in the land of Pathros: ²This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: You yourselves have seen all the disaster I brought upon Jerusalem and upon all the cities of Judah. ³This happened because of the evil they committed to provoke me — going to burn incense and serve other gods that neither they nor you nor your ancestors had known. ⁴Yet I sent to you all my servants the prophets, sending them persistently, saying: Do not do this detestable thing that I hate! ⁵But they did not listen or incline their ear to turn from their evil, to stop burning incense to other gods. ⁶So my wrath and my anger poured out and blazed in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem, and they became a ruin and a wasteland, as they are today. ⁷So now, this is what the LORD, the God of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Why are you doing such great harm to yourselves — cutting off from Judah man and woman, child and infant, leaving yourselves no remnant? ⁸You provoke me with the works of your hands, burning incense to other gods in the land of Egypt where you have gone to settle — so that you bring destruction on yourselves and become a curse and a disgrace among all the nations of the earth. ⁹Have you forgotten the evil deeds of your ancestors, the evil deeds of the kings of Judah, the evil deeds of their wives, your own evil deeds, and the evil deeds of your wives — all that was done in the land of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem? ¹⁰They have not been crushed with remorse to this day. They have not feared, and they have not walked in my instruction or in my statutes that I set before you and before your ancestors. ¹¹Therefore, this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am setting my face against you for destruction, to cut off all of Judah. ¹²I will take hold of the remnant of Judah who set their faces to enter the land of Egypt to settle there, and they will all meet their end in the land of Egypt. They will fall by the sword and be consumed by famine — from the least to the greatest, they will die by sword and by famine. They will become an object of horror, a desolation, a curse, and a disgrace. ¹³I will punish those living in the land of Egypt just as I punished Jerusalem — by sword, by famine, and by plague. ¹⁴There will be no fugitive or survivor among the remnant of Judah who came to settle in the land of Egypt, to return to the land of Judah where they long to go back and live. None will return — except a few refugees. ¹⁵Then all the men who knew that their wives were burning incense to other gods, and all the women standing there — a large assembly — and all the people living in the land of Egypt, in Pathros, answered Jeremiah: ¹⁶As for the word you have spoken to us in the name of the LORD — we will not listen to you. ¹⁷Instead, we will certainly carry out every word that has come from our mouths — to burn incense to the Queen of Heaven and pour out drink offerings to her, just as we and our ancestors, our kings and our officials did in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem. We had plenty of food then, we prospered, and we saw no disaster. ¹⁸But from the time we stopped burning incense to the Queen of Heaven and pouring out drink offerings to her, we have lacked everything and have been consumed by sword and famine. ¹⁹And when we burned incense to the Queen of Heaven and poured out drink offerings to her — did we make cakes stamped with her image and pour out drink offerings to her without our husbands' knowledge? ²⁰Then Jeremiah spoke to all the people — to the men, to the women, and to all the people who had answered him — saying: ²¹The incense you burned in the cities of Judah and in the streets of Jerusalem — you, your ancestors, your kings, your officials, and the people of the land — did the LORD not remember it? Did it not rise into his mind? ²²The LORD could no longer endure it because of the evil of your actions and the detestable things you committed. That is why your land has become a ruin, a wasteland, and a curse — without an inhabitant — as it is today. ²³It was because you burned incense and sinned against the LORD and did not obey the voice of the LORD or walk in his instruction, his statutes, and his decrees — that is why this disaster has come upon you, as it has today. ²⁴Then Jeremiah said to all the people and to all the women: Hear the word of the LORD, all of Judah who are in the land of Egypt. ²⁵This is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: You women and your husbands have spoken with your mouths and fulfilled with your hands, saying, 'We will certainly carry out the vows we made — to burn incense to the Queen of Heaven and pour out drink offerings to her.' Go ahead then — fulfill your vows! Carry out your vows! ²⁶Therefore, hear the word of the LORD, all of Judah living in the land of Egypt: I have sworn by my great name, says the LORD, that my name will never again be invoked by any person of Judah in all the land of Egypt, saying, 'As the Lord GOD lives.' ²⁷I am watching over them for harm and not for good. All the people of Judah in the land of Egypt will be consumed by sword and by famine until they are finished. ²⁸Those who escape the sword will return from the land of Egypt to the land of Judah, few in number. Then all the remnant of Judah who came to the land of Egypt to settle will know whose word stands — mine or theirs. ²⁹This will be the sign to you, declares the LORD, that I am punishing you in this place, so that you may know that my words will certainly stand against you for harm: ³⁰This is what the LORD says: I am going to hand over Pharaoh Hophra, king of Egypt, to his enemies and to those who seek his life — just as I handed Zedekiah king of Judah over to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, his enemy who sought his life.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew noph is the shortened form of the Egyptian city name rendered in Greek as Memphis — the ancient capital of Lower Egypt. We use 'Memphis' as the more recognizable English form. Pathros refers to Upper Egypt (southern Egypt), indicating the Judean refugees had dispersed widely across Egypt. The list of four locations shows the diaspora was already extensive, not concentrated in one settlement.
2. The emphatic pronoun attem ('you yourselves') stresses that the refugees are eyewitnesses to the destruction — they cannot claim ignorance. The word ra'ah ('disaster, evil, calamity') here refers to the Babylonian destruction of 586 BCE, which these refugees survived and fled.
3. The verb leha'kiseni ('to provoke me to anger') is a Deuteronomic formula (cf. Deuteronomy 32:16, 21) describing idolatry as a deliberate provocation of God's jealousy. The phrase 'gods they had not known' echoes Deuteronomy 13:2, 6, 13 — these are foreign deities with no history in Israel's covenant tradition. The inclusive 'they, you, your ancestors' spans all generations of guilt.
4. The idiom hashkem veshaloch ('rising early and sending') is Jeremiah's characteristic expression for God's persistent prophetic outreach (cf. 7:25, 25:4, 26:5, 29:19, 35:15). The word to'evah ('abomination, detestable thing') is covenantal legal terminology — it designates acts that violate the covenant at its core and are incompatible with the LORD's character.

5. The verb shuv ('turn, return') appears here in its negative sense — they refused to turn back from their evil course. The same root carries both 'repentance' (turning to God) and 'apostasy' (turning from God) throughout Jeremiah. Their refusal to shuv from idolatry is itself a failure of teshuvah.
6. Two verbs describe God's anger: nittakh ('was poured out') and tiv'ar ('blazed, burned'). The first depicts anger as liquid flooding outward; the second as fire consuming. The result — charvah ('ruin') and shemamah ('desolation, wasteland') — describes the post-586 BCE landscape the refugees left behind. The phrase 'as at this day' emphasizes present reality: the ruins are still smoking.
7. The phrase ra'ah gedolah el nafshoteikhem ('great evil against your own souls/selves') frames their idolatry as self-destruction. The word nephesh here means 'selves' in the reflexive sense — they are the agents of their own destruction. The catalog 'man and woman, child and infant' is a merism covering the entire population. The term she'erit ('remnant') is theologically loaded — even in judgment, the prophets usually preserve hope for a remnant, but these refugees are destroying even that.
8. The phrase ma'asei yedeikhem ('works of your hands') is deliberately ambiguous — it can refer to the acts of worship or to the idols themselves, which are literally handmade objects. The consequence — becoming a qelalah ('curse') and cherpah ('disgrace') among the nations — reverses the Abrahamic promise that Israel would be a blessing to the nations (Genesis 12:2-3).
9. The fivefold repetition of ra'ot ('evil deeds') creates a rhetorical cascade of guilt: ancestors, kings, queens, the people themselves, and their wives. The inclusion of women (nashav, 'his wives'; nesheikhem, 'your wives') is notable and anticipates the women's defiant response later in the chapter (vv. 15-19). Some manuscripts read 'his officials' (sarav) instead of 'his wives' (nashav), but the Masoretic text is retained.
10. The verb dukke'u ('crushed, contrite') from the root d-k- indicates a thorough breaking of the will — not merely feeling sorry but being genuinely broken by grief. The word torah here is rendered 'instruction' rather than 'law' to capture its broader Deuteronomic sense of divine teaching. The shift between third person ('they') and second person ('you') is characteristic of prophetic speech addressing both the absent guilty and the present audience.
11. The idiom sam panay ('set my face') indicates fixed, unwavering divine intention — once God's face is set against a people, the judgment is determined. The phrase 'for evil' (lera'ah) is rendered 'for destruction' because the context makes clear this is not moral evil but punitive disaster. The totality of the threat — 'all of Judah' — means the remnant in Egypt has no exemption from judgment.
12. The verb tammu ('they will be consumed, finished, completed') indicates total annihilation. The merism 'from the least to the greatest' (miqqaton ve'ad gadol) encompasses the entire community without exception. The fourfold consequence — alah ('oath/horror'), shammah ('desolation'), qelalah ('curse'), cherpah ('disgrace') — is a standard prophetic judgment formula that appears throughout Jeremiah (cf. 24:9, 25:18, 29:22, 42:18).
13. The verb paqad ('visit, punish, reckon with') indicates divine judicial action. The parallel between Egypt and Jerusalem is devastating — the refugees fled to Egypt to escape the very judgment that will now pursue them there. The triad cherev/ra'av/dever ('sword/famine/plague') is Jeremiah's characteristic judgment formula, appearing over twenty times in the book.
14. The word palit ('fugitive, escapee') and sarid ('survivor') together emphasize the thoroughness of the judgment. The phrase menass'im et nafsham ('lifting up their souls') is an idiom for deep longing or desire — they yearn to return to Judah but will not be able to. The final clause 'except a few refugees' (ki im-peletim) provides a razor-thin exception to the absolute judgment, preserving the tension between total destruction and the slender thread of remnant theology.
15. The description emphasizes complicity at every level: the men know and do not stop it, the women actively participate, and the whole community is present. The phrase qahal gadol ('large assembly') ironically echoes the covenant assembly language of Deuteronomy — this is a counter-assembly, gathered not for covenant renewal but for defiance of the covenant.
16. The bluntness of this response is striking. The phrase beshem YHWH ('in the name of the LORD') shows they fully recognize Jeremiah is claiming divine authority — and they reject it anyway. The verb shom'im ('listening, obeying') carries both senses, and their refusal encompasses both: they will neither hear nor obey.
17. The emphatic infinitive absolute asoh na'aseh ('we will certainly do') expresses absolute determination — this is a vow they intend to keep. The phrase meleket hashamayim ('Queen of Heaven') likely refers to the goddess Ishtar/Astarte. The Masoretic vocalization meleket could mean 'work of' or 'host of' heaven, but the context of incense and drink offerings clearly points to a goddess cult, and most scholars repoint as malkat ('queen'). The people's argument is empirical — when we worshiped her, things went well. Their 'evidence' covers the prosperous periods under Manasseh's long reign (697-642 BCE).
18. The people's argument reaches its theological core: they interpret Josiah's reforms (2 Kings 23) — the destruction of the high places and suppression of foreign cults — as the cause of Judah's subsequent disasters. In their reading of history, Josiah's reform was the catastrophe, not the idolatry it removed. The verb chasarnu ('we have lacked') and tamnu ('we have been consumed') create a cause-and-effect argument that directly contradicts Jeremiah's prophetic interpretation.
19. The women now speak distinctly, defending their role. The kavvanim ('cakes') were ritual cakes shaped or stamped with the image of the goddess — the word appears only in Jeremiah 7:18 and here. The question hamibbal'adei anashenu ('without our husbands?') is a legal defense — they argue the worship had male authorization and was therefore a legitimate household and community practice, not unsanctioned female rebellion. The verb leha'atsivah is difficult; it may mean 'to portray her' or 'to represent her image' on the cakes.

- 20. The threefold address ('men, women, all the people') mirrors the threefold audience of verse 15 and ensures no one can claim they were not addressed. Jeremiah's response will directly counter their historical argument.
- 21. Jeremiah turns their own argument against them. They claimed incense-burning brought prosperity; he insists God remembered every act of it. The verb zakhar ('remember') in covenant contexts means not passive recollection but active response — God remembered and acted. The phrase 'rose into his mind' (ta'aleh al-libbo) uses the same verb for 'rising' that describes smoke rising — the incense smoke that rose to the Queen of Heaven also rose into God's awareness as provocation.
- 22. The verb laset ('to bear, endure, carry') depicts God's patience as having a limit — he carried the weight of their offenses until he could carry no more. The result — charvah ('ruin'), shammah ('wasteland'), qelalah ('curse'), me'ein yoshev ('without inhabitant') — directly refutes the people's claim that the Queen of Heaven cult brought prosperity. The land they remember as prosperous is now uninhabited rubble.
- 23. Jeremiah delivers the counter-narrative: disaster came not from stopping the Queen of Heaven cult but from practicing it. The fourfold description of what they violated — qol YHWH ('voice of the LORD'), torah ('instruction'), chuqqot ('statutes'), edot ('decrees') — is Deuteronomic covenant language covering every dimension of the covenant obligation. The word chata'tem ('you sinned') is from the root ch-t- meaning 'to miss the mark' — they aimed their worship at the wrong target.
- 24. Jeremiah now addresses the women specifically alongside the whole people — they spoke as a distinct group in verse 19, and now they receive a distinct divine response. The command shim'u ('hear') carries the force of 'listen and obey,' the same verb they refused in verse 16.
- 25. God's response is devastatingly ironic. The emphatic forms haqem taqimnah ('you will certainly fulfill') and asoh ta'asenah ('you will certainly carry out') are not permission but bitter sarcasm — since they are determined to keep their idolatrous vows, God releases them to the consequences. The feminine plural verb forms (taqimnah, ta'asenah) address the women directly. The phrase 'spoken with your mouths and fulfilled with your hands' condemns them for both word and deed — their vows were not idle words but enacted rituals.
- 26. God swears by his own name — the most solemn possible oath, since there is no higher authority to swear by (cf. Genesis 22:16, Hebrews 6:13). The oath formula chai Adonai YHWH ('as the Lord GOD lives') was the standard way Israelites confirmed solemn statements. God is saying that this formula will vanish from Egypt because the Judeans who used it will be dead. The withdrawal of the divine name from their mouths is a reversal of the covenant relationship — the people who bear his name will no longer exist to speak it.
- 27. The verb shoqed ('watching') is a devastating echo of 1:12 where God told the young Jeremiah, 'I am watching over my word to carry it out.' The same divine vigilance that guaranteed the prophetic word now guarantees judgment. The reversal from tov ('good') to ra'ah ('harm') inverts every covenant blessing. The phrase ad kelotam ('until their completion/end') indicates extinction, not merely suffering.
- 28. The phrase metei mispar ('few in number,' literally 'men of counting') indicates such a small group they can be individually counted. God frames the issue as a contest of words — devar mi yaqum ('whose word will stand/be established'). The people in verses 17-18 argued from their interpretation of history; God says history itself will settle whose word is true. The verb qum ('stand, arise, be established') is covenant language for a promise that holds firm.
- 29. The ot ('sign') functions as a prophetic proof — when the predicted judgment arrives, it will validate Jeremiah's entire prophetic ministry. The emphatic infinitive absolute qom yaqumu ('will certainly stand') echoes the verb used in verse 25 about the women's vows (haqem taqimnah) — their vows will 'stand' only in the sense that they bring destruction, while God's words will 'stand' as fulfilled prophecy.
- 30. Pharaoh Hophra (Egyptian: Wahibre; Greek: Apries) reigned 589-570 BCE. He was eventually overthrown by his own general Amasis (Ahmose II) in a military coup, fulfilling this oracle. The parallel with Zedekiah is pointed: the refugees trusted Hophra for protection just as Zedekiah had trusted him for military support against Babylon (cf. 37:5-7). Both trust-in-Egypt policies ended in the same way — the Egyptian protector fell to his enemies. The phrase mevaqshei nafsho ('those who seek his life') is a standard expression for mortal enemies.

Summary: Jeremiah 45 is the shortest chapter in the book — five verses containing a personal oracle from God to Baruch son of Neriah, Jeremiah's scribe and companion. The oracle is dated to the fourth year of Jehoiakim (605/604 BCE), the same year Baruch wrote down Jeremiah's prophecies on the first scroll (chapter 36). Baruch has cried out in despair — 'Woe to me!' — overwhelmed by sorrow. God responds with a stark message: He is about to tear down what he has built and uproot what he has planted across the whole earth. In that context, Baruch should not seek great things for himself. But God promises him one thing — his life, given to him 'as plunder' wherever he goes.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This tiny chapter is one of the most intimate moments in prophetic literature. God speaks not to a king, not to a nation, but to a single scribe — a man whose personal anguish matters enough for a divine oracle. The phrase 'I will give you your life as plunder' (ve-natatti lekha et-nafshekha leshallal) is extraordinary: in a world about to be torn apart, survival itself is the prize. Baruch will carry his life out of the catastrophe the way a soldier carries loot from a conquered city — it* is something seized from destruction, not guaranteed. The chapter's placement after the Egypt oracles (chapters 43-44) but with a chronological setting twenty years earlier creates a literary frame: Baruch's personal story is given its own space, separate from the national narrative, honoring the individual amid the collapse of nations.

Translation Friction: The verb yagata ('you are weary/exhausted') in verse 3 could indicate physical exhaustion from the scribal labor of writing the scroll, or spiritual and emotional exhaustion from the content of what he was writing — prophecies of national destruction. We rendered it in a way that allows both readings. The phrase 'great things' (gedolot) in verse 5 is deliberately vague in the Hebrew — it could mean personal ambition, political advancement, or simply a normal life. We preserved the ambiguity rather than specifying. The dating formula places this oracle in 605 BCE, but its position in the book (after chapter 44) suggests the editor placed it here as a conclusion to the Baruch narrative cycle, not in chronological sequence.

Connections: The 'building and tearing down, planting and uprooting' language directly echoes Jeremiah's call narrative (1:10), forming an inclusio between the prophet's commission and this near-final oracle. The scroll-writing event referenced in verse 1 is narrated in detail in chapter 36. Baruch's role as Jeremiah's scribe and companion runs through chapters 32, 36, 43, and 45. The promise of life 'as plunder' uses the same phrase applied to Ebed-Melech in 39:18, linking two faithful individuals who stood with Jeremiah and received personal survival promises. The theme of not seeking 'great things' connects to the broader prophetic critique of human ambition in the face of divine judgment.

¹The word that Jeremiah the prophet spoke to Baruch son of Neriah, when he wrote these words on a scroll from Jeremiah's dictation, in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah: ²This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says to you, Baruch: ³You said, 'Woe to me! The LORD has added grief to my pain. I am exhausted from my groaning, and I find no rest.' ⁴Say this to him: This is what the LORD says — What I have built, I am tearing down. What I have planted, I am uprooting — and this means the whole earth. ⁵And you — are you seeking great things for yourself? Do not seek them. For I am bringing disaster upon all flesh, declares the LORD. But I will give you your life as plunder wherever you go.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase mippi yirmeyahu ('from the mouth of Jeremiah') indicates dictation — Baruch wrote what Jeremiah spoke. The sefer ('scroll') is the same scroll described in chapter 36, which King Jehoiakim later cut apart and burned column by column. The fourth year of Jehoiakim (605/604 BCE) was the year of the Battle of Carchemish, when Babylon defeated Egypt and became the dominant world power — a pivotal moment that confirmed Jeremiah's prophecies of judgment from the north.
2. The directness is striking — God names Baruch personally. In the prophetic literature, God typically addresses kings, priests, nations, or cities. To receive a named, personal oracle is rare and marks Baruch as someone God considers significant. The brevity of the introduction — no titles, no genealogy beyond what verse 1 provides — creates intimacy.
3. Baruch's lament has three elements: accumulated sorrow (yagon al makh'ovi, 'grief upon my pain'), physical and emotional collapse (yaga'ti be'anchati, 'I am exhausted in my groaning'), and the absence of relief (menuchah lo matsati, 'I have found no rest'). The verb yasaph ('added') suggests Baruch's suffering is cumulative — each prophetic word he transcribes adds another layer of grief. The word menuchah ('rest') carries echoes of the promised land as Israel's 'rest' (Deuteronomy 12:9) — Baruch cannot find the very thing Israel was promised.
4. The verbs banah/haras ('build/tear down') and nata'/natash ('plant/uproot') are the four verbs of Jeremiah's original commission in 1:10. God is now executing the destructive half of that commission on a cosmic scale. The emphatic pronoun ani ('I myself') appears twice — God himself built, and God himself tears down. The final phrase ve'et-kol-ha'arets hi ('and the whole earth/land — it') is grammatically unusual and emphatic. Whether erets means 'land' (Judah specifically) or 'earth' (the whole world) is debated; the context of universal judgment in Jeremiah's oracles against the nations (chapters 46-51) suggests the broader reading.
5. The phrase gedolot ('great things') is deliberately unspecified — it could mean political ambition, professional recognition, personal comfort, or simply a normal life. God does not mock the desire but contextualizes it: when God is bringing ra'ah ('disaster') on all flesh (kol-basar), personal aspirations must yield. The promise nafshekha leshallal ('your life as plunder') appears also in 21:9, 38:2, and 39:18 — it is given to those who submit to God's judgment rather than resisting it. The word shalal ('plunder, spoil, booty') is military vocabulary — Baruch will escape with his life the way a soldier escapes a battlefield carrying whatever he could grab. The oracle ends with the open phrase 'wherever you go' (al kol-hammeqomot asher telekh-sham), which proved prophetically apt — Baruch went to Egypt with Jeremiah (43:6) and tradition suggests he traveled further.

Summary: Jeremiah 46 opens the 'Oracles against the Nations' section (chapters 46-51), beginning with Egypt. The chapter divides into two oracles: the first (vv. 3-12) is a taunting war song addressed to the Egyptian army at the Battle of Carchemish in 605 BCE, where Nebuchadnezzar crushed Pharaoh Necho's forces along the Euphrates. The second oracle (vv. 13-26) prophesies Nebuchadnezzar's future invasion of Egypt itself. The chapter closes with a promise of restoration for Israel (vv. 27-28) — the only hopeful voice in this war poetry — assuring Jacob that exile is not annihilation.

What Makes This Remarkable: The military poetry of verses 3-12 is among the most vivid in the Hebrew Bible. The prophet mimics Egyptian battle commands — 'Harness the horses! Mount the steeds! Take your positions!' — then shatters them with the reality of defeat. Egypt is personified as the Nile in flood (vv. 7-8), rising with ambitions to cover the earth, only to be driven back. The nickname for Pharaoh in verse 17 — sha'on he'evir hamo'ed — is a devastating wordplay, rendered as 'Big Noise Who Missed His Moment,' mocking a king who talked loudly but failed to act when it mattered. The historical specificity is rare for prophetic literature: verse 2 names the battle, the opponent, and the date. The closing promise to Jacob (vv. 27-28) reuses language from 30:10-11 almost verbatim, anchoring the oracles against nations within the broader Book of Consolation framework.

Translation Friction: The phrase sha'on he'evir hamo'ed (v. 17) is notoriously difficult. Sha'on means 'tumult, loud noise, roar.' He'evir can mean 'he let pass' or 'he caused to pass by.' Mo'ed means 'appointed time, meeting, season.' The result is a mocking epithet: Pharaoh is all noise and missed his chance. We chose 'Big Noise Who Missed His Moment' to capture the contempt while remaining intelligible. The geographic references in verse 9 — Cush, Put, Lud — require identification without disrupting the poetic rhythm. Verse 20 calls Egypt a 'beautiful heifer' (eglah yephephiyah) — a metaphor mixing beauty and sacrifice that resists clean English rendering. The shift from war taunt to salvation oracle in verses 27-28 is abrupt, and some scholars consider these verses a later addition; we translate without prejudice.

Connections: The Battle of Carchemish (605 BCE) is one of the most consequential events in ancient Near Eastern history, shifting world power from Egypt to Babylon. Pharaoh Necho is the same ruler who killed Josiah at Megiddo (2 Kings 23:29, 2 Chronicles 35:20-24). The Nile-flood imagery in verses 7-8 echoes Amos 8:8 and 9:5. The sword-as-devourer motif (v. 10) recurs in 2 Samuel 11:25 and Isaiah 1:20. The closing promise (vv. 27-28) parallels 30:10-11 almost word for word. Nebuchadnezzar is again God's instrument — not named as 'My servant' here, but the theology is consistent with 25:9, 27:6, and 43:10. Egypt's judgment connects to Ezekiel 29-32, which devotes four chapters to oracles against Egypt.

¹The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning the nations. ²Concerning Egypt — concerning the army of Pharaoh Necho king of Egypt, which was at the Euphrates River at Carchemish, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon defeated in the fourth year of Jehoiakim son of Josiah, king of Judah:

³Prepare the small shield and the large shield, and advance to battle!

⁴Harness the horses! Mount up, horsemen!
Take your positions in helmets!
Polish the spears! Put on the armor!

⁵Why do I see them terrified, falling back?
Their warriors are crushed,
fleeing headlong without looking back.
Terror on every side! — declares the LORD.

⁶The swift cannot flee,
the warrior cannot escape.
In the north, by the Euphrates River,
they stumble and fall.

⁷Who is this rising like the Nile, whose waters surge like rivers?

⁸Egypt rises like the Nile,
its waters surging like rivers.
It says, 'I will rise and cover the earth!
I will destroy the city and everyone in it!'

⁹Charge, horses! Drive wildly, chariots!
Let the warriors march out —
Cush and Put, who carry the shield, and the Ludim, who handle and draw the bow.

¹⁰That day belongs to the Lord GOD of Hosts —
a day of vengeance, to avenge himself on his foes.
The sword will devour and be satisfied,
drunk with their blood.
For the Lord GOD of Hosts holds a sacrifice
in the land of the north, by the Euphrates River.

¹¹Go up to Gilead and get balm,
virgin daughter of Egypt!
In vain you multiply remedies —
there is no healing for you.

¹²The nations have heard of your disgrace;
your cry fills the earth.
Warrior stumbles over warrior —
both have fallen together.

¹³The word that the LORD spoke to Jeremiah the prophet about the coming of Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon to strike the land of Egypt:

¹⁴Announce in Egypt! Proclaim in Migdol!
Proclaim in Memphis and in Tahpanhes!
Say: Take your stand and prepare yourself,
for the sword devours all around you.

¹⁵Why are your mighty ones swept away?
They do not stand, because the LORD has thrust them down.

¹⁶He multiplies the stumbling; they fall over one another.
They say, 'Get up! Let us return to our own people, to the land where we were born,
away from the oppressing sword!'

¹⁷They cried out there:
'Pharaoh king of Egypt — Big Noise Who Missed His Moment!'

¹⁸As I live — declares the King, whose name is the LORD of Hosts —
as surely as Tabor stands among the mountains and Carmel rises above the sea, so he will come.

¹⁹Pack your bags for exile, daughter dwelling in Egypt!
For Memphis will become a wasteland, burned and emptied of inhabitants.

²⁰Egypt is a beautiful heifer,
but a biting fly from the north is coming — it is coming!

²¹Even her hired soldiers in her midst are like fattened calves — they too have turned and fled together; they did not stand.
For the day of their calamity has come upon them,
the time of their reckoning.

²²Her voice hisses away like a snake,
for they advance with force.
They come against her with axes,
like woodcutters.

²³They will cut down her forest — declares the LORD —
though it is impenetrable,
for they are more numerous than locusts;
they are beyond counting.

²⁴Daughter Egypt is put to shame;
she is handed over to the people of the north.

²⁵The LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am about to punish Amon of Thebes, and Pharaoh, and Egypt — her gods, her kings, Pharaoh, and all who trust in him. ²⁶I will hand them over to those who seek their lives, to Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon and his servants. But afterward, Egypt will be inhabited as in former days — declares the LORD.

²⁷But you — do not be afraid, my servant Jacob,
and do not be dismayed, Israel.
For I am about to save you from far away,
your descendants from the land of their captivity.
Jacob will return and be at rest, at ease,
with no one to cause terror.

²⁸Do not be afraid, my servant Jacob — declares the LORD — for I am with you.
I will make a complete end of all the nations
where I have driven you,
but I will not make a complete end of you.

I will discipline you justly,
but I will certainly not leave you unpunished.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew al ha-goyim ('concerning the nations') is rendered 'concerning the nations' rather than the KJV's 'against the Gentiles.' The term goyim in prophetic context refers to the surrounding peoples, not a religious category. This superscription introduces the entire oracles-against-nations collection (chapters 46-51).
2. This is one of the most precisely dated oracles in the prophetic literature. The Battle of Carchemish in 605 BCE was the decisive engagement that ended Egyptian dominance in the Levant. Pharaoh Necho II had killed Josiah at Megiddo in 609 BCE (2 Kings 23:29); now his army is destroyed at the Euphrates. The Hebrew hikkah ('struck, defeated') is the standard military term for a decisive defeat. The name Nebuchadnezzar appears in two Hebrew spellings throughout Jeremiah — Nevukhadre'ttsar here, Nevukhadnettsar elsewhere.
3. The Hebrew distinguishes between magen (the small round shield carried by infantry) and tsinnah (the large body-shield). This is a mocking command addressed to the Egyptian forces — the prophet ventriloquizes Egyptian officers issuing orders that will prove futile. The imperative forms create urgency: the battle is about to begin.
4. A rapid-fire series of six imperatives mimicking battle preparation commands. The word siryanot ('coats of mail, body armor') is rendered 'armor' rather than the KJV's archaic 'brigandines.' The verb mirqu ('polish, burnish, scour') applied to spears conveys making the bronze tips gleam — battle-ready. The staccato rhythm captures the pre-battle urgency of the Hebrew.
5. The scene pivots violently from preparation to rout. The verb chittim ('shattered, dismayed') describes psychological collapse. The phrase magor missaviv ('terror on every side') is one of Jeremiah's signature expressions (cf. 6:25, 20:3, 20:10, 49:29) — here applied to Egypt's army rather than to Judah. The shift from commanding battle preparation (vv. 3-4) to witnessing total defeat (v. 5) creates devastating irony.
6. The Hebrew al-yanus ('let not flee') is rendered as an impossibility — 'cannot flee' — rather than a prohibition, because the context is prophetic declaration of inescapable defeat, not a command. The geographic marker 'in the north, by the Euphrates River' locates the defeat at Carchemish. The verbs kashelu venafalu ('they stumble and fall') are prophetic perfects — the defeat is so certain it is described as already completed.
7. The ye'or is specifically the Nile (from Egyptian itrw, 'river') — not a generic flood. The image of the Nile's annual inundation is Egypt's defining natural phenomenon. The question 'Who is this?' sets up the answer in verse 8: Egypt itself, swelling with imperial ambition like its own river. The verb yitga'ashu ('surge, churn, be turbulent') conveys violent, uncontrollable movement.
8. Egypt answers its own question from verse 7. The verb akasseh ('I will cover') uses flood imagery — Egypt intends to inundate the world as the Nile inundates its valley. The singular 'city' (ir) is likely collective, meaning cities in general rather than one specific city. The hubris of the declaration is deliberate — Egypt speaks as though it were an unstoppable natural force.
9. Egypt's army was multinational — mercenaries from across Africa. Cush refers to the region south of Egypt (modern Sudan/Ethiopia), Put is likely Libya, and the Ludim are debated (possibly Libyans or a people of Anatolia/Lydia). The verb hithollelu ('rage, drive madly') applied to chariots creates an image of reckless, frenzied assault. These are ironically presented as commands the prophet issues to Egypt's army — go ahead, bring your full force, it will not matter.
10. The phrase zebach la-Adonai YHWH tseva'ot ('a sacrifice to the Lord GOD of Hosts') recasts the battlefield as a sacrificial altar — Egypt's army is the offering. This motif of warfare-as-sacrifice appears also in Isaiah 34:6 and Ezekiel 39:17-20. The sword is personified with three verbs: it 'devours' (akhelah), 'is satisfied' (save'ah), and 'is drunk' (ravetah) — a progression from hunger through satiation to intoxication. The double divine title Adonai YHWH Tseva'ot ('Lord GOD of Hosts') signals maximum divine authority.
11. The address 'virgin daughter of Egypt' (betulat bat-Mitsrayim) is ironic — Egypt, the great power, is mocked as a wounded girl searching for medicine. Gilead was famous for its healing balm (cf. 8:22, 'Is there no balm in Gilead?'). The word te'alah ('healing, recovery') indicates that Egypt's wound is terminal — no amount of medicine will restore her. The irony deepens: Jeremiah earlier asked about Gilead's balm for Judah; now Egypt is the patient who cannot be healed.
12. The word qelonekh ('your shame, disgrace, humiliation') is the public exposure of Egypt's defeat — international humiliation. The image of warriors stumbling over each other in retreat (gibbor begibbor kashalu) depicts the chaos of a panicked rout where soldiers trample their own comrades. This verse closes the Carchemish oracle with Egypt reduced from Nile-like ambition (v. 8) to a heap of fallen men.
13. This superscription introduces the second oracle (vv. 13-26), which looks beyond Carchemish to a future Babylonian invasion of Egypt itself — historically fulfilled around 568/567 BCE. The verb lehakkot ('to strike') is the same root used in verse 2 for the Carchemish defeat (hikkah), linking the two oracles: what happened to Egypt's army abroad will happen to Egypt at home.
14. Three Egyptian cities are named: Migdol (a frontier fortress in the northeastern Delta), Noph/Memphis (the ancient capital in Lower Egypt), and Tahpanhes (Daphnae, where Jeremiah's own group fled in chapter 43). The geographic spread — border, capital, Delta garrison — indicates the warning reaches all Egypt. Memphis (Hebrew Noph) was the political and religious center; its mention signals that the invasion will reach Egypt's heart.

15. The word abbirekha ('your mighty ones, your bulls') can also be read as a reference to the Apis bull — Egypt's sacred bull deity. If so, the verse simultaneously asks why Egypt's warriors and Egypt's god have been swept away. The verb nischaf ('swept away') suggests being washed away by a flood — ironic, since Egypt was the one boasting of rising like the Nile (v. 8). The cause is stated plainly: YHWH hadafo ('the LORD has thrust him down').
16. The mercenaries in Egypt's army — Cushites, Libyans, Ludim (see v. 9) — now abandon Egypt and flee to their homelands. The phrase erets moladtenu ('the land of our birth') reveals they are foreigners who have no stake in Egypt's survival. The 'oppressing sword' (cherev hayyonah) uses yonah, which may derive from yanah ('oppress') — the sword that victimizes. Egypt hired foreign soldiers, and now they desert.
17. This is one of the most debated phrases in Jeremiah. Sha'on ('noise, tumult, roar') mocks Pharaoh's bombast. He'evir hamo'ed ('he let the appointed time pass') accuses him of missing his strategic window — possibly a reference to Necho's failure to reinforce his army at Carchemish in time. Some scholars read hamo'ed as a pun on a pharaonic name. We rendered it as a nickname — 'Big Noise Who Missed His Moment' — to capture the contemptuous tone of the Hebrew epithet.
18. God swears by his own life — the most solemn oath possible, since nothing higher exists to swear by. The title 'the King' (ha-Melekh) contrasts with Pharaoh's impotent kingship in the previous verse: the real King speaks. Tabor and Carmel are chosen for their unmistakable prominence — Tabor rises dramatically from the Jezreel Valley, Carmel juts into the Mediterranean. Nebuchadnezzar's coming will be equally unmistakable and unavoidable.
19. The phrase kelei golah ('vessels of exile, baggage for captivity') is a concrete image — pack your belongings for deportation. The same instruction appears in Ezekiel 12:3-4, where the prophet acts it out as a sign. Memphis (Noph) was Egypt's cultural and political capital; its destruction signals total national collapse. The verb nitstetah ('burned, set ablaze') adds fire to desolation.
20. Egypt is compared to a sleek, beautiful cow — an image resonant in a culture that venerated the cow-goddess Hathor and the Apis bull. The word qeret ('gadfly, biting insect, destruction') is debated — it may mean a stinging horsefly (an insect that torments cattle) or simply 'destruction.' We render 'biting fly' to preserve the cattle metaphor: a gorgeous heifer tormented by a fly from the north (Babylon). The doubled ba ba ('is coming, is coming') expresses certainty and imminence.
21. The mercenaries (sekhireha) are compared to stall-fed calves (eglei marbeq) — pampered, fat, and useless in crisis. The animal imagery continues from verse 20: Egypt is a beautiful cow, her soldiers are fattened calves, and none can withstand the predator from the north. The term pequddatam ('their visitation, reckoning, punishment') carries the double sense of divine inspection and divine punishment — God comes to examine and to judge.
22. Egypt's voice — once roaring like the Nile (v. 8) — is now reduced to the hiss of a retreating snake. The image captures Egypt slithering away in humiliation. The Babylonian soldiers are compared to woodcutters (chotevei etsim) — they will hack through Egypt's defenses as methodically as lumberjacks fell trees. The shift from Egypt's grandiose self-image to this diminished reality is the rhetorical climax of the oracle.
23. The 'forest' (ya'rah) may be literal (the Nile Delta's dense vegetation) or metaphorical (Egypt's dense population and resources). The invaders — compared to locusts (arbeh) — overwhelm by sheer numbers. The irony is layered: in the Exodus, God sent locusts against Egypt; now he sends a locust-army of Babylonians. The verb kartu ('they cut down') continues the woodcutter metaphor from verse 22.
24. The verb hovisha ('she is shamed, disgraced') marks the completion of Egypt's humiliation arc — from rising Nile (v. 7) to beautiful heifer (v. 20) to shamed captive. The phrase am tsafon ('people of the north') avoids naming Babylon directly, emphasizing the geographic direction from which all threats come to the Levant and Egypt.
25. Amon of No — Amon (the chief god of the Egyptian pantheon) worshipped at No (Thebes, the great religious capital of Upper Egypt). The LORD targets not just the political ruler but the rival deity: YHWH versus Amon. Pharaoh is named twice, framing the list — the repetition emphasizes that everything between the two mentions of Pharaoh is included in the judgment. The phrase 'all who trust in him' (ha-botechim bo) may include Judeans who relied on Egyptian protection.
26. The verse ends with a surprising note of restoration: acharei-khen tishkon kimei-qedem ('afterward it will be inhabited as in days of old'). Unlike the oracles against Babylon (chapters 50-51), which prophesy permanent destruction, Egypt's judgment is temporary. This aligns with Ezekiel 29:13-14, which also prophesies Egypt's partial restoration after forty years. The Hebrew tishkon ('it will be settled, inhabited') uses the root sh-k-n, the same root as Shekhinah — Egypt will be 'dwelt in' again, though not by God's presence.
27. This verse parallels 30:10 almost verbatim — the same promise appears in the Book of Consolation and here, framing the oracles against nations as part of Israel's restoration. The verb moshi'akha ('I am saving you') is a participle indicating imminent action. The three-word sequence shaqat vesh'a'anan ve'ein macharid ('quiet and at ease and none terrifying') paints a picture of total shalom — rest, security, and the absence of threat.
28. The distinction between Israel and the nations is sharp: the nations face kalah ('complete destruction'), while Israel faces discipline (yissartikha, from yasar, 'to discipline, correct, instruct'). The phrase lammishpat ('with justice, in due measure') qualifies the discipline — it will be proportionate, not annihilating. The final clause venaqeh lo anaqekka ('and acquitting, I will not acquit you') is a double-edged promise: Israel will survive, but guilt will not be ignored. This parallels the divine self-description in Exodus 34:7. The verse — and the chapter — ends with the tension unresolved: grace and judgment coexist.

Summary: Jeremiah 47 contains the oracle against the Philistines — a concentrated burst of war poetry in only seven verses. Waters rise from the north to flood the Philistine coast. The cities of Gaza and Ashkelon are devastated. The Philistines are cut off along with their allies from Tyre and Sidon. The oracle closes with a haunting address to the sword of the LORD itself, asking how long it will rage before returning to its sheath — and answering that it cannot rest, because the LORD has given it its orders.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the shortest oracles against a foreign nation in Jeremiah, but its intensity is extraordinary. The flood metaphor (v. 2) casts the Babylonian invasion as a cosmic deluge rising from the north — water imagery that inverts the exodus, where God parted waters to save Israel. Here God sends waters to destroy. The concluding dialogue with the sword (vv. 6-7) is unique in prophetic literature: the prophet addresses God's weapon directly, pleading for it to cease, then acknowledges that the sword acts on divine commission. The Philistines — Israel's ancient enemies from the time of the Judges through David — are now fellow victims of the same Babylonian storm. The superscription ties the oracle to an Egyptian campaign 'before Pharaoh struck Gaza' (v. 1), grounding the cosmic poetry in specific historical events.

Translation Friction: The superscription 'before Pharaoh struck Gaza' (v. 1) is historically uncertain — it may refer to Pharaoh Necho's campaign northward in 609 BCE or to an earlier Egyptian action. We translate without resolving the historical question. The phrase she'erit i Kaphtor (v. 4) — 'the remnant of the coastland of Caphtor' — identifies the Philistines' origin as Caphtor (likely Crete or the broader Aegean), which aligns with the 'Sea Peoples' migration known from Egyptian records. The phrase 'how long will you gash yourself?' (v. 5) uses the verb titgodedi, which can mean either mourning gashes (self-laceration in grief) or military gathering — we chose the mourning sense, as the context is lamentation.

Connections: The Philistines as 'remnant of Caphtor' connects to Amos 9:7 ('Did I not bring the Philistines from Caphtor?') and Deuteronomy 2:23. The flood-from-the-north motif links to Jeremiah 1:14 ('From the north disaster will break loose') and Isaiah 8:7-8 (Assyria as flood waters). The sword-of-the-LORD motif appears in Deuteronomy 32:41-42, Isaiah 34:5-6, and Ezekiel 21:1-17. Ashkelon and Gaza are named together in judgment oracles in Amos 1:6-8, Zephaniah 2:4-7, and Zechariah 9:5. The mourning imagery connects to the Philistine lament traditions referenced in Isaiah 14:29-31.

¹The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning the Philistines, before Pharaoh struck Gaza.

²This is what the LORD says:

Waters are rising from the north —

they will become a raging torrent!

They will flood the land and everything in it,
the city and all who live there.

People will cry out;

every inhabitant of the land will wail.

³At the sound of the pounding hooves of his stallions, the rattling of his chariots, the rumble of his wheels — fathers will not turn back for their children, their hands too limp with terror.

⁴Because of the day that is coming to devastate all the Philistines, to cut off from Tyre and Sidon
every surviving ally.

For the LORD is about to devastate the Philistines,

the remnant of the coastland of Caphtor.

⁵Baldness has come upon Gaza;
Ashkelon is silenced — remnant of their valley.
How long will you gash yourself in grief?

⁶O sword of the LORD,
how long before you are still?
Return to your sheath!
Cease — be silent!

⁷How can it be still when the LORD has given it its orders?
Against Ashkelon and against the seacoast —
there he has appointed it.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription places this oracle before a specific Egyptian military campaign against Gaza. The historical referent is debated — most likely Pharaoh Necho II's march through Philistia en route to Carchemish in 609 BCE. The preposition el is rendered 'concerning' rather than the KJV's 'against' for consistency with the project's treatment of prophetic superscriptions. The oracle itself, however, describes a northern invasion (Babylon), not an Egyptian one — the superscription may be editorial, dating the oracle's reception rather than its subject.
2. The flood imagery depicts the Babylonian army as an unstoppable wall of water pouring down from the north. The word nachal shotef ('overflowing torrent, raging wadi') describes the flash floods that fill dry riverbeds — sudden, violent, and indiscriminate. The verb yishtepu ('they will flood') repeats the root of shotef, intensifying the drowning image. This inverts the Egypt oracle, where Egypt boasted of rising like the Nile (46:7-8) — here God himself sends the flood. The dual objects 'the land and everything in it, the city and all who live there' uses merism to indicate total destruction.
3. The verse builds an overwhelming soundscape: sha'atat parsot abbirav ('the stamping/pounding of his stallions' hooves'), ra'ash rikhbō ('the crashing of his chariot'), hamon galgillav ('the roar of his wheels'). The sounds arrive before the army does — the Philistines hear their death approaching. The word abbirav ('his mighty ones, his stallions') was used for Egypt's warriors in 46:15; here it refers to war horses. The most devastating image: fathers abandon their children because their hands have gone slack (riphyon yadayim, 'limpness of hands') — terror has dissolved the most primal human bond.
4. Tyre and Sidon — Phoenician cities north of Philistia — are mentioned because they were allied with the Philistines against Babylon. The verb lishddod ('to devastate, plunder') is repeated (shoed) for emphasis. The identification of the Philistines as she'erit i Kaphtor ('remnant of the coastland/island of Caphtor') recalls their origin as part of the Sea Peoples migration from the Aegean world (cf. Amos 9:7, Deuteronomy 2:23). By calling them a 'remnant' (she'erit), the text implies they are already diminished — and now even that remnant will be destroyed. Kaphtor is generally identified with Crete or the broader Aegean region.
5. Qorchah ('baldness') refers to the mourning practice of shaving the head in grief (cf. Isaiah 22:12, Micah 1:16) — Gaza has entered a state of lamentation. The verb nidmetah ('she is silenced, destroyed, cut off') applied to Ashkelon carries the dual sense of being silenced and being annihilated — the city's voice is extinguished. The question 'how long will you gash yourself?' (titgodadi) refers to the practice of self-laceration in mourning (cf. Deuteronomy 14:1, 1 Kings 18:28). The prophet addresses the surviving Philistines directly, but the question is rhetorical — the mourning will not end because there is no recovery coming.
6. The prophet now addresses the sword itself — a remarkable personification. The exclamation hoy ('O, alas') begins what reads as a lament directed at God's own weapon. The three imperatives — he'asephi ('gather yourself in, return'), heragi ('rest, be still'), and dommi ('be silent') — plead with the sword to stop its work. This is the prophet's own voice breaking through the oracle, unable to bear the destruction any longer, even destruction he has announced as God's will. The tension between prophetic commission and human compassion is raw.
7. The prophet answers his own plea: the sword cannot rest because YHWH tsivvah lah ('the LORD has commanded it'). The sword is not autonomous — it executes divine orders. The word ye'adah ('he has appointed it, assigned it') uses the root y-'-d, related to mo'ed ('appointed time, meeting') — the same root used to mock Pharaoh in 46:17. There, Pharaoh missed his appointed time; here, the LORD's sword keeps its appointment precisely. The oracle ends not with resolution but with the terrible logic of divine judgment: once God commissions destruction, even the prophet's compassion cannot recall the weapon.

Summary: Jeremiah 48 is the longest and most elaborate of the oracles against the nations — a sweeping judgment against Moab, Israel's neighbor east of the Dead Sea. The oracle announces the devastation of Moab's cities, the humiliation of its god Chemosh, and the end of its famed wine production. The central image of the chapter is Moab as undisturbed wine left to settle on its dregs (v. 11), never poured from vessel to vessel — a nation whose complacency has become its defining quality. Despite the totality of the destruction announced, the chapter closes with a startling promise: 'I will restore the fortunes of Moab in the latter days' (v. 47), placing even this condemned nation within the scope of God's ultimate redemptive purpose.

What Makes This Remarkable: This oracle borrows extensively from Isaiah 15-16, sometimes quoting nearly verbatim, creating one of the most significant cases of prophetic intertextuality in the Hebrew Bible. The wine-on-its-dregs metaphor (v. 11) is unique to Jeremiah and captures Moab's essential problem — not active rebellion against God but undisturbed self-satisfaction. The personification of Moab as a woman mourning on rooftops (v. 38) and the image of the broken vessel (v. 38) echo Jeremiah's own earlier imagery. The repeated lament formula 'How it is broken!' transforms judgment speech into something closer to elegy — the prophet grieves even over nations under condemnation. We preserved the poetic parallelism throughout, particularly in the lament sections, because the Hebrew shifts between prose announcement and poetic mourning in ways that shape the reader's emotional response.

Translation Friction: The relationship between this oracle and Isaiah 15-16 required careful handling — where the Hebrew of Jeremiah quotes or adapts Isaiah, we rendered Jeremiah's own text rather than harmonizing with our Isaiah renderings, since the prophets may have deliberately modified their source. The place names in this chapter are numerous and many are uncertain in location; we transliterated them consistently but noted the geographic uncertainty where relevant. The word shaqat ('to be at rest, undisturbed') in verse 11 carries both positive and negative connotations — rest can be blessing or complacency, and context here demands the negative sense. The divine first-person voice shifts to prophetic third-person and back without clear markers, requiring interpretive decisions about speaker identification.

Connections: The Isaiah 15-16 parallel is the dominant intertextual connection — Jeremiah inherits, adapts, and expands the earlier Moab oracle. The wine imagery connects to Isaiah's vineyard songs (Isaiah 5, 27) and to Jeremiah's own cup-of-wrath metaphor (25:15-29). The promise of restoration in verse 47 parallels similar restoration promises for Egypt (46:26), Ammon (49:6), and Elam (49:39) — a pattern suggesting that God's judgment of the nations is penultimate, not final. Chemosh, Moab's national deity, is mentioned in the Mesha Stele (c. 840 BCE), the most important extrabiblical witness to Moabite religion and the same god condemned in 1 Kings 11:7 when Solomon built high places for foreign deities. The 'broken vessel' language echoes Jeremiah 19:11 and 22:28.

¹Concerning Moab — this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says:

Woe to Nebo, for it is destroyed!

Kiriathaim is put to shame, it is captured.

The fortress is put to shame and shattered.

²Moab's glory is no more.

In Heshbon they have plotted evil against her:

'Come, let us cut her off as a nation!'

You too, Madmen, will be silenced —
the sword will pursue you.

³A cry rings out from Horonaim — devastation and great destruction!

⁴Moab is shattered!
Her little ones cry out in anguish.

⁵On the ascent of Luhith
weeping rises upon weeping, and on the descent to Horonaim cries of anguish over destruction are heard.

⁶Flee! Save your lives!
Be like a juniper bush in the wilderness.

⁷Because you trusted in your achievements and your treasures,
you too will be captured.
Chemosh will go into exile,
his priests and officials together.

⁸The destroyer will come against every city —
no city will escape.
The valley will perish and the plateau will be ruined,
as the LORD has declared.

⁹Give wings to Moab,
for she must fly away!
Her cities will become desolate,
with no one living in them.

¹⁰Cursed is the one who carries out the LORD's work halfheartedly, and cursed is the one who holds back his sword from blood.

¹¹Moab has been undisturbed since his youth, settling on his dregs.
He has never been poured from vessel to vessel or gone into exile.
So his flavor has stayed in him and his aroma has not changed.

¹²Therefore the days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will send tilters to him who will tilt him over.
They will empty his vessels and smash his jars.

¹³Moab will be ashamed of Chemosh, just as the house of Israel was ashamed of Bethel, their confidence.

¹⁴How can you say, 'We are warriors, men of valor for battle'?

¹⁵Moab is destroyed and her cities overrun.
The best of her young men go down to the slaughter,
declares the King, whose name is the LORD of Hosts.

¹⁶Moab's disaster is near at hand,
and his calamity rushes swiftly.

¹⁷Grieve for him, all who surround him,
all who know his name.
Say: 'How the mighty scepter is broken,
the staff of splendor!'

¹⁸Come down from your glory and sit in parched ground, you who dwell in Daughter Dibon!
For the destroyer of Moab has come up against you;
he has ruined your fortifications.

¹⁹Stand by the road and watch,
you who dwell in Aroer!
Ask the man fleeing and the woman escaping, say: 'What has happened?'

²⁰Moab is put to shame, for he is shattered!
Wail and cry out!
Declare it at the Arnon:
Moab is destroyed!

²¹Judgment has come upon the plateau —
upon Holon, upon Jahazah, upon Mephaath,

²²upon Dibon, upon Nebo, upon Beth-diblathaim, ²³upon Kiriathaim, upon Beth-gamul, upon Beth-meon, ²⁴upon Kerioth, upon Bozrah, and upon all the cities of the land of Moab, far and near.

²⁵Moab's horn is cut off and his arm is broken,
declares the LORD.

²⁶Make him drunk, for he exalted himself against the LORD!
Moab will wallow in his own vomit and become an object of ridicule himself.

²⁷Was not Israel a laughingstock to you?
Was he caught among thieves, that whenever you spoke of him
you shook your head in scorn?

²⁸Abandon the cities and settle among the rocks,
you inhabitants of Moab!
Be like a dove that nests
on the sides of a gorge's mouth.

²⁹We have heard of Moab's pride — exceedingly proud! — his loftiness, his arrogance,

his conceit, and the haughtiness of his heart.

³⁰I know his bluster, declares the LORD —
it amounts to nothing.
His boasts accomplish nothing.

³¹Therefore I will wail over Moab;
for all of Moab I will cry out.
For the men of Kir-heres he will moan.

³²More than the weeping for Jazer
I weep for you, O vine of Sibmah!
Your branches stretched across the sea,
reaching as far as the sea of Jazer.
The destroyer has fallen upon your summer fruit and your grape harvest.

³³Joy and gladness are taken away from the orchards and from the land of Moab.
I have stopped the wine from the vats.
No one treads the grapes with shouts —
the shouts are not shouts of joy.

³⁴From the outcry of Heshbon to Elealeh, to Jahaz they raise their voice — from Zoar to Horonaim, to Eglath-shelishiyah — for even the waters of Nimrim have become desolate.

³⁵I will put an end in Moab, declares the LORD, to anyone who offers sacrifice at the high places and burns incense to his gods.

³⁶Therefore my heart moans for Moab like a flute, and my heart moans for the men of Kir-heres like a flute — for the wealth they gained has perished.

³⁷For every head is shaved bald and every beard is cut short.
On every hand are gashes,
and on every waist, sackcloth.

³⁸On every rooftop in Moab and in her public squares — everywhere, mourning!
For I have shattered Moab like a jar that no one wants, declares the LORD.

³⁹How shattered he is! Wail!
How Moab has turned his back in shame!
Moab has become an object of ridicule and a horror to all his neighbors.

⁴⁰For this is what the LORD says:
Look — like an eagle he swoops down and spreads his wings over Moab.

⁴¹The cities are captured and the strongholds are seized.
On that day the heart of Moab's warriors will be like the heart of a woman in labor.

⁴²Moab will be destroyed as a people, because he exalted himself against the LORD.

⁴³Terror, pit, and trap await you, inhabitant of Moab,
declares the LORD.

⁴⁴The one fleeing from terror
will fall into the pit,
and the one climbing out of the pit
will be caught in the trap.
For I will bring upon Moab
the year of their punishment,
declares the LORD.

⁴⁵In the shadow of Heshbon the fugitives stand exhausted, but fire has gone out from Heshbon,
a flame from the house of Sihon.
It has consumed the forehead of Moab,
the skull of the sons of tumult.

⁴⁶Woe to you, Moab!
The people of Chemosh are lost,
for your sons are taken captive and your daughters into exile.

⁴⁷Yet I will restore the fortunes of Moab
in the latter days, declares the LORD.
Thus far is the judgment of Moab.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The oracle opens with the standard prophetic messenger formula redirected toward a foreign nation. Nebo here is a Moabite city (not the mountain of Moses's death, though they share the name). Kiriathaim is a Moabite town mentioned in the Mesha Stele. Misgab may be a proper name or the common noun meaning 'fortress, stronghold' — we rendered it as 'the fortress' following the Hebrew sense, noting the ambiguity.
1. The verbs hubishah ('put to shame') and chattah ('shattered, dismayed') describe not merely military defeat but the collapse of national confidence.
2. There is a wordplay in the Hebrew that cannot be reproduced in English: Heshbon () and chashvu ('they plotted,' from the root ch-sh-b) share consonants, creating a pun — 'In Plot-town they have plotted.' Similarly, Madmen and tiddommi ('you will be silenced,' from the root d-m-m) form another wordplay. These puns suggest the city names themselves prophesy their fate. The shift from third-person description to second-person address ('you too') is characteristic of prophetic rhetoric.

3. Horonaim is a Moabite city also mentioned in the Mesha Stele and in Isaiah 15:5. The paired nouns shod vashever ('devastation and destruction') form a hendiadys emphasizing total ruin. The brevity of the Hebrew line — only five words — creates a staccato urgency.
4. The word tse'oreha is debated — it may mean 'her little ones' (children) or may be a reference to the town Zoar (tso'ar), mentioned in Isaiah 15:5. We followed the reading 'her little ones' because the image of children crying intensifies the pathos of the oracle. The LXX reads 'Zoar,' and some modern translations follow that reading.
5. This verse closely parallels Isaiah 15:5. The geographic imagery is vivid — Luhith is uphill and Horonaim downhill, so the weeping ascends and the cries descend, filling the entire landscape with lamentation. The phrase bikhi ya'aleh bekhi ('weeping rises upon weeping') uses repetition to convey relentless, compounding grief.
6. The word aro'er is difficult — it may refer to a bare, scrubby plant (juniper or tamarisk), to the city Aroer, or may be related to the root meaning 'stripped bare.' The comparison to a desert shrub suggests desolate survival — alive but barely, stripped of everything, clinging to existence in barren land. The LXX reads 'wild donkey,' but the MT plant imagery fits the desolation context better.
7. Chemosh (Kemosh) was the national deity of Moab, well attested in the Mesha Stele (c. 840 BCE) where King Mesha credits Chemosh with military victories — the mirror image of how Israel credits the LORD. The verb yatsa ('go out') combined with golah ('exile') describes the deportation of the god's idol along with his personnel — a devastating theological statement: Moab's god cannot protect even himself. The word ma'asayikh ('your achievements/works') may also refer to idol-making, creating a double meaning.
8. The Hebrew makes a geographic sweep: the emeq ('valley,' the Jordan rift) and the mishor ('plateau,' the Moabite tableland east of the Dead Sea). Together they encompass all of Moab's territory — lowland and highland alike fall. The word shoded ('destroyer') is a participle suggesting an ongoing agent of destruction, not a single event.
9. The word tsits may mean 'wings' or 'blossom/flower,' and some scholars read this as 'give Moab a gravestone' (from tsiyyun, 'marker'). The image of giving wings to Moab so she can fly away is bitterly ironic — escape would require flight, but there is no escape. The desolation formula 'without any to dwell therein' (me'ein yoshev bahen) is a standard Jeremican judgment formula recurring throughout chapters 46–51.
10. This verse is startling — it pronounces a curse on anyone who executes God's judgment against Moab with insufficient zeal. The word remiyyah means 'slackness, negligence, deceitfulness' — we rendered it 'halfheartedly' to capture the sense of inadequate commitment to the task. The theological implication is severe: the destroyer of Moab is doing 'the LORD's work' (melekheth YHWH), and failure to complete it fully is itself a cursable offense. This verse has been used in later tradition to discuss the ethics of divinely commanded violence.
11. This is the theological center of the oracle. The word sha'an'an ('undisturbed, at ease, complacent') carries negative connotations in prophetic literature — cf. Amos 6:1, 'Woe to those who are at ease in Zion.' The winemaking metaphor is technically precise: shemarim are the sediment or lees that settle at the bottom of a wine jar, and the verb huraq ('emptied, poured out') describes the decanting process. Moab has never experienced national catastrophe — unlike Israel and Judah who were repeatedly invaded and exiled — and this undisturbed existence has produced not maturity but stagnation. The word ta'am ('taste, flavor') and reach ('aroma, scent') sustain the wine metaphor through to the end of the verse.
12. The wine metaphor continues: God will send tso'im ('tilters, those who tip over') — workers who pour the wine from one vessel to another. The wordplay between tso'im and tse'uhu ('they will tilt him') reinforces the image. The verb yariqu ('they will empty') and the smashing of nivlehem ('their jars/wineskins') complete the metaphor: Moab's long-undisturbed complacency will be violently ended. The metaphor of decanting becomes the metaphor of destruction.
13. The comparison is devastating: Moab's trust in Chemosh will fail just as Israel's trust in the golden calf at Bethel failed. Bethel ('house of God') was the site of Jeroboam's calf shrine (1 Kings 12:28–29), and Israel's confidence in that cult did not prevent the Assyrian destruction of 722 BCE. The parallel implies that false religious confidence — whether Moabite or Israelite — leads to the same outcome.
14. The rhetorical question exposes the emptiness of Moab's military boasting. The words gibborim ('warriors, mighty men') and anshei-chayil ('men of valor') are the highest terms for military prowess in Hebrew — Moab claims elite warrior status, but the claim is about to be shown hollow.
15. The divine title here is striking: hammelekh YHWH tseva'ot shemo ('the King, whose name is the LORD of Hosts'). God is identified not merely as prophet's patron but as the sovereign King who outranks all earthly rulers and all national deities. The word meitav ('the best, choicest') describes the cream of Moab's youth — the finest soldiers are the ones who fall. The verb yardu ('they go down') to slaughter suggests descent, both literal (into a valley of battle) and figurative (into death).
16. The verse is concise and urgent — only eight Hebrew words. The noun eid ('disaster, calamity') and ra'ato ('his misfortune, his evil') form a pair emphasizing the totality of what approaches. The verb miharah ('hastens, rushes') with the intensifier me'od ('very, exceedingly') conveys unstoppable momentum.
17. The summons to mourn shifts the tone from judgment announcement to lament. The images matteh-oz ('staff of strength, mighty scepter') and maqqel tif'arah ('staff of splendor, beautiful rod') are symbols of royal authority and national pride. Their breaking represents the end of Moab's sovereignty. The lament formula ekhah ('How!') echoes the opening word of the book of Lamentations and is the characteristic cry of funeral lamentation in Hebrew.
18. Dibon was the capital of Moab, where the Mesha Stele was discovered in 1868. The personification bat-Dibon ('Daughter Dibon') treats the city as a woman — a common prophetic convention. The command to descend from glory (kavod) to sit in thirst reverses the city's status: from enthroned honor to ground-level desperation. The word tsama ('thirst, parched ground') may refer to literal thirst or to sitting in dry, desolate ground.

19. Aroer sits on the Arnon gorge at the northern border of Moab — a natural observation point for refugees streaming south. The inhabitants of this border city will see the flood of escapees and learn of the catastrophe from their terrified reports. The pair nas venimlatah ('the fleeing one and the escaping one') uses masculine and feminine forms, indicating that both men and women are in flight.
20. The Arnon River formed Moab's traditional northern boundary. The command to declare the news at the Arnon means announcing the catastrophe at the nation's border — the destruction is to be published at the very boundary of the land. The verb heililu ('wail') is the characteristic sound of mourning, an onomatopoeic word imitating the wailing cry.
21. This begins a catalogue of doomed Moabite cities (vv. 21-25). The mishor ('plateau, tableland') is the elevated plain east of the Dead Sea that was Moab's agricultural heartland. Holon, Jahazah, and Mephaath were Levitical cities assigned to Reuben (Joshua 21:36-37) but later absorbed into Moab — their mention here recalls the contested territorial history between Israel and Moab.
22. The city catalogue continues. Dibon was the capital (see v. 18). Nebo here is the city, not the mountain. Beth-diblathaim ('house of fig cakes') is mentioned in the Mesha Stele as a Moabite town. The rapid listing without connecting verbs creates a drumbeat effect — city after city falling under judgment.
23. Kiriathaim was already mentioned in verse 1 as captured. Beth-gamul and Beth-meon are Moabite towns; Beth-meon is likely the same as Baal-meon mentioned in the Mesha Stele. The prefix 'Beth' means 'house' — these are named as households or settlements, emphasizing the domestic scale of the devastation.
24. Keriath may be the same as Ar, the ancient capital of Moab. Bozrah here is a Moabite city, not the Edomite Bozrah of 49:13. The summary phrase 'far and near' closes the city catalogue with a comprehensive sweep — no Moabite settlement, however remote, is exempt from judgment.
25. Two body-part metaphors for national power: qeren ('horn') represents strength and aggressive power (as a bull's horn), while zero'a ('arm') represents military might and active force. Both are destroyed. The combination 'horn cut off, arm broken' is comprehensive — Moab has lost both offensive capability (horn) and the capacity to act (arm).
26. The metaphor shifts from wine as complacency (v. 11) to wine as humiliation — forced drunkenness that leads to public degradation. The verb higdil ('made himself great, exalted himself') names Moab's fundamental sin: arrogance against the LORD. The image of wallowing in vomit (safaq beqi'o) is deliberately revolting — national pride collapses into physical grotesqueness. The word sechok ('laughter, ridicule, derision') indicates that Moab will become what he once was to others: a joke.
27. God turns the tables: Moab mocked Israel's suffering (the fall of Samaria in 722 BCE and Judah's later troubles), but now Moab will receive the same treatment. The verb titnoded ('you shook yourself, wagged your head') describes the physical gesture of contemptuous derision — shaking the head at someone's misfortune. The rhetorical question 'Was he caught among thieves?' implies that Israel's punishment was not for crime but was nevertheless mocked by Moab as if it were.
28. The dove nesting at the edge of a chasm is an image of desperate, precarious refuge — the only shelter left is the wild cliff face. The word pachat ('pit, gorge, chasm') suggests a dangerous precipice rather than a safe cave. The inhabitants who once lived in proud cities must become like birds clinging to rock walls. The dove (yonah) is elsewhere a symbol of vulnerability and mourning (cf. Isaiah 38:14, 59:11).
29. This verse piles up five synonyms for pride: ge'on ('pride, majesty'), govho ('his loftiness'), ge'ono ('his arrogance'), ga'avato ('his conceit'), and rum libbo ('the height of his heart'). The accumulation is deliberate — Moab's pride is so excessive that one word cannot contain it. This verse closely parallels Isaiah 16:6, confirming Jeremiah's dependence on the earlier oracle. The 'we have heard' (shama'nu) is plural, suggesting a collective prophetic tradition witnessing Moab's notorious pride.
30. God's response to the five-fold pride of v. 29 is dismissive. The word evrato can mean 'his wrath, his fury, his bluster' — the sense here is that Moab's angry posturing is empty. The phrase lo-khen baddav ('his lies/boasts are not so, not right') indicates that Moab's self-assessment is fundamentally false. The contrast between Moab's elaborate pride (five terms in v. 29) and God's terse dismissal (a single short verse) is rhetorically devastating.
31. A remarkable shift: the speaker (whether God or the prophet — the text is ambiguous) breaks into lament for Moab rather than continuing the judgment speech. The verb ayalil ('I will wail') is the same mourning cry commanded in v. 20. Kir-heres (also called Kir-hareseth, modern Kerak in Jordan) was a major Moabite fortress city. The shift from first person ('I will wail') to third person ('he will moan') in the Hebrew is abrupt — this may reflect alternating voices between prophet and God, or a textual difficulty.
32. This verse closely parallels Isaiah 16:8-9. Sibmah was famous for its vineyards, and the vine of Sibmah symbolizes Moab's agricultural prosperity. The 'branches stretching across the sea' is hyperbolic — Moab's vine tendrils (netishoteha) reached so far they seemed to cross the Dead Sea. The pairing of qayits ('summer fruit') and batsir ('grape harvest') represents the full agricultural cycle now interrupted by the destroyer. The vine imagery connects to the wine-on-dregs metaphor of verse 11.
33. The word heidad appears three times in rapid succession — it normally means the joyful shout of grape-treaders stomping the harvest, but the final occurrence negates it: heidad heidad lo heidad ('shouting, shouting — not shouting!'). The joyful harvest cry has become a cry of something else — perhaps war, perhaps grief. The wordplay captures the inversion of celebration into catastrophe. The karmel ('orchard, fruitful field') may be a common noun or refer to a specific place; we rendered it as the common noun.
34. This verse parallels Isaiah 15:4-6. The geographic sweep traces the sound of lamentation across the entire Moabite landscape from north (Heshbon) to south (Zoar). Eglath-shelishiyah is debated — it may be a place name ('Eglath of the third') or a description ('a three-year-old heifer'), an epithet for Horonaim or Zoar. We treated it as a place name following the LXX tradition. The waters of Nimrim (a wadi south of the Dead Sea) going dry represents the destruction of Moab's water sources — ecological devastation accompanying military destruction.

35. The destruction extends to Moab's religious system. The bamah ('high place') was the standard worship site throughout the ancient Near East — an elevated platform or hilltop shrine. The verb maqtir ('one who burns incense, one who makes offerings smoke') describes the characteristic ritual act at these shrines. God eliminates not just Moab's political and economic life but its entire religious apparatus.
36. The comparison of the heart's mourning to a chalilim ('flutes, pipes') evokes the sound of funeral music — the hollow, mournful tone of reed pipes played at funerals and laments. The verb yehemeh ('moans, murmurs, growls') is onomatopoeic. The phrase yitrat asah ('the surplus/wealth he made') refers to accumulated prosperity now lost. The speaker's personal grief for Moab — 'my heart moans' — is remarkable in a judgment oracle and parallels Isaiah 15:5, 16:9, 11.
37. Four mourning customs are catalogued: shaving the head (qorchah), cutting the beard, slashing the hands (gedudot, 'gashes, cuts'), and wearing sackcloth. These rituals were practiced throughout the ancient Near East as expressions of grief. Some of these practices were prohibited for Israelites in Leviticus 19:28 and Deuteronomy 14:1, but Moabites are not under that prohibition — the prophet describes their mourning customs without comment. The universality ('every head, every beard, all hands') emphasizes the totality of grief.
38. The rooftop (gag) was the place of public mourning in ancient culture — flat roofs served as open-air platforms visible to the whole community. The simile of the broken vessel (keli ein-chefets bo, 'a vessel in which there is no delight') echoes Jeremiah 22:28 where the same phrase is used of King Jehoiachin. A pot that no one wants is discarded — Moab has lost all value in God's assessment. The divine first-person 'I have shattered' makes clear that this is not random catastrophe but deliberate divine action.
39. The lament formula eikh ('How!') returns from v. 17. The phrase hifnah oref ('turned the back') is an idiom for fleeing in defeat — the opposite of the warrior facing his enemy. Moab becomes both sechok ('ridicule, laughingstock') and mechittah ('horror, terror, dismay') — simultaneously laughable and terrifying, the contradictory reactions that total destruction provokes in observers.
40. The eagle (neshet, which may also refer to a vulture — both large raptors) is a recurring image for invading armies in prophetic literature (cf. Deuteronomy 28:49, Habakkuk 1:8, Ezekiel 17:3). The verb yid'e'h ('he swoops, he flies') and the spreading of wings (paras kenafav) describe both the speed of the attack and the totality of coverage — the eagle's wings overshadow the entire land. The identity of the eagle is unstated but contextually refers to Nebuchadnezzar of Babylon.
41. The simile of warriors reduced to the helplessness of a woman in labor (ishah metserah) appears also in 49:22 and 50:43. It describes not cowardice but overwhelming, involuntary pain and loss of control — the mightiest soldiers will be seized by terror as uncontrollable as labor contractions. The word qeriyot may be the city Keriath (as in v. 24) or the common noun 'cities' — we rendered it as the common noun here since the plural form with the article suggests a generic reference.
42. This verse states the verdict in its starkest form: Moab ceases to exist as a people (me'am). The cause is repeated from v. 26: higdil ('he made himself great, he exalted himself') against the LORD. Moab's sin is not idolatry per se (though that is implied) but the fundamental posture of self-exaltation — placing himself above the God of Israel. The verb nishmat ('will be destroyed, annihilated') from the root sh-m-d is the strongest term for national destruction in Hebrew.
43. Three words with alliterative force in Hebrew: pachad, pachat, pach — 'terror, pit, trap.' The near-identical sounds create a sense of inescapable danger closing in from every direction. This triad is borrowed from Isaiah 24:17, where it describes universal judgment. The sound-play cannot be fully reproduced in English, though 'terror, pit, and trap' partially preserves the percussive consonants.
44. The three-fold trap from v. 43 is now deployed in sequence: fleeing from one danger leads directly into the next. This image of inescapable judgment also appears in Amos 5:19 (the man who flees a lion and meets a bear). The phrase shenat pequddatam ('the year of their punishment/visitation') uses pequddah, which can mean 'visitation' (positive or negative) — here clearly negative, the appointed time when God calls Moab to account. This verse closely follows Isaiah 24:18.
45. This verse quotes Numbers 21:28-29, the ancient Song of Heshbon celebrating Sihon the Amorite's original conquest of Moab. Jeremiah reaches back to Israel's oldest poetry to describe Moab's present destruction — history repeats itself. Heshbon, once Sihon's capital, becomes both refuge and source of destruction. The phrase pe'at Mo'av ('the forehead/side of Moab') and qodqod ('skull, crown of the head') personify the nation as a human body being consumed by fire. The benei sha'on ('sons of tumult') characterizes the Moabites as a people of uproar and commotion.
46. This verse also echoes Numbers 21:29 — the ancient taunt against Chemosh's inability to protect his people. The phrase am-Kemosh ('people of Chemosh') identifies Moab by its national deity, as Israel is called 'people of the LORD.' The parallel between Chemosh's failure and the LORD's faithfulness is implicit but devastating. Sons and daughters in captivity represent the total demographic destruction of the nation.
47. The closing verse reverses the entire oracle. After 46 verses of relentless destruction, God promises to restore Moab's fortunes 'in the latter days.' This restoration formula (shavti shevut) appears also for Egypt (46:26), Ammon (49:6), and Elam (49:39) — a pattern suggesting that judgment of the nations is penultimate, not final. The editorial note 'Thus far is the judgment of Moab' (ad hennah mishpat Mo'av) is a redactional marker closing the oracle unit. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim is eschatological, pointing beyond historical restoration to an ultimate future act of God.

Summary: Jeremiah 49 collects five short oracles against nations surrounding Israel: Ammon (vv. 1-6), Edom (vv. 7-22), Damascus (vv. 23-27), Kedar and Hazor (vv. 28-33), and Elam (vv. 34-39). Each oracle announces divine judgment for a specific reason — Ammon for land theft, Edom for proud self-reliance, Damascus for panic in the face of bad news, the Arabian tribes for false security, and Elam for military aggression. Three of the five oracles (Ammon, Edom, Elam) close with promises of future restoration, extending the pattern established in chapter 48's Moab oracle.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Edom oracle (vv. 7-22) is the most theologically dense section, borrowing extensively from Obadiah — the only case in the Hebrew Bible where two prophetic books share this much material, raising complex questions about literary priority and prophetic tradition. The question 'Is there no longer wisdom in Teman?' (v. 7) challenges Edom's famed intellectual tradition (Teman being associated with wisdom, as in Job's friend Eliphaz the Temanite). The Kedar-Hazor oracle is notable for its target — nomadic Arabian tribes rather than settled kingdoms — and contains some of the most vivid desert warfare imagery in prophetic literature. The Elam oracle is geographically surprising, reaching far to the east (modern southwestern Iran), suggesting that God's sovereignty extends well beyond Israel's immediate neighbors. We preserved the distinct rhetorical character of each sub-oracle rather than harmonizing them into a uniform style.

Translation Friction: The Edom oracle's relationship to Obadiah required careful handling — where the Hebrew of Jeremiah 49 parallels Obadiah, we rendered Jeremiah's own text rather than importing our Obadiah renderings, since the textual traditions may have diverged deliberately. The phrase malkom in verse 1 is ambiguous: it could mean 'their king' (malkam) or 'Milcom' (the Ammonite deity), and context supports both readings — we rendered 'Milcom' with a note on the ambiguity. Several place names in the oracle against Kedar and Hazor are uncertain, and the Hazor here is not the Canaanite city of Joshua 11 but an otherwise unknown Arabian settlement. The shift between divine first-person and prophetic third-person speech is particularly abrupt in this chapter, sometimes changing mid-verse.

Connections: The Edom oracle connects to Obadiah 1-9 (shared material), Genesis 25 and 36 (Esau/Edom traditions), and the broader prophetic tradition of Edom as Israel's perpetual antagonist (Isaiah 34, 63:1-6, Ezekiel 25:12-14, 35:1-15, Malachi 1:2-5). The Ammon oracle connects to Judges 11 (Jephthah's dispute over Ammonite land claims) and Amos 1:13-15. The Damascus oracle parallels Amos 1:3-5 and Isaiah 17. The promise of restoration for Ammon (v. 6) and Elam (v. 39) parallels the Moab restoration promise (48:47), forming a theological pattern: God's judgment of the nations is real but not final. Bozrah in the Edom oracle (v. 13) should not be confused with the Moabite Bozrah of 48:24 — this is the Edomite capital, modern Buseirah in southern Jordan.

¹Concerning the Ammonites — this is what the LORD says:

Does Israel have no sons?

Has he no heir?

Then why has Milcom dispossessed Gad, and why do his people settle in its cities?

²Therefore the days are coming, declares the LORD,

when I will sound the battle alarm against Rabbah of the Ammonites.

She will become a desolate mound,

and her surrounding towns will be burned with fire.

Then Israel will dispossess those who dispossessed him,

says the LORD.

³Wail, Heshbon, for Ai is destroyed!
 Cry out, daughters of Rabbah!
 Put on sackcloth, lament,
 and run back and forth among the walls,
 for Milcom will go into exile,
 his priests and officials together.

⁴Why do you boast of your valleys — your valley is flowing away, faithless daughter!
 You who trust in your treasures, saying,
 'Who would come against me?'

⁵I am bringing terror upon you,
 declares the Lord GOD of Hosts,
 from every side.
 Each of you will be driven out headlong,
 and no one will gather the fugitives.

⁶But afterward I will restore the fortunes of the Ammonites,
 declares the LORD.

⁷Concerning Edom — this is what the LORD of Hosts says:
 Is there no longer wisdom in Teman?
 Has counsel vanished from the discerning?
 Has their wisdom rotted away?

⁸Flee! Turn back! Go deep into hiding, you inhabitants of Dedan!
 For I will bring Esau's disaster upon him —
 the time when I punish him.

⁹If grape-pickers came to you,
 would they not leave some gleanings?
 If thieves came in the night,
 would they not steal only what they needed?

¹⁰But I — I have stripped Esau bare,
 I have uncovered his hiding places,
 and he cannot conceal himself.
 His offspring are destroyed, his brothers and his neighbors, and he is no more.

¹¹Leave your orphans — I will keep them alive.
 Let your widows trust in me.

¹²For this is what the LORD says: If those who did not deserve to drink the cup must drink it, will you really go unpunished?
 You will not go unpunished — you will certainly drink it.

¹³For I have sworn by myself, declares the LORD, that Bozrah will become a desolation,

a reproach, a ruin, and a curse.
All her cities will be ruins forever.

¹⁴I have heard a report from the LORD,
and a messenger has been sent among the nations:
'Assemble and march against her!
Rise up for battle!'

¹⁵For I will make you small among the nations, despised among humanity.

¹⁶The dread you inspire has deceived you,
the arrogance of your heart —
you who dwell in the clefts of the rock, who cling to the height of the hill.
Even if you build your nest as high as the eagle,
from there I will bring you down,
declares the LORD.

¹⁷Edom will become a desolation.
Everyone passing by will be appalled and will hiss at all her wounds.

¹⁸Like the overthrow of Sodom and Gomorrah and their neighboring cities, says the LORD,
no one will live there,
no human being will settle in her.

¹⁹Look — like a lion coming up from the thickets of the Jordan to rich pastureland,
I will suddenly chase him away from it.
And who is the chosen one I will appoint over it?
For who is like me?
Who can summon me to court?
And what shepherd can stand against me?

²⁰Therefore hear the plan of the LORD that he has devised against Edom, and his purposes that he has formed against the inhabitants of Teman:
Surely the youngest of the flock will drag them away;
surely their pasture will be made desolate because of them.

²¹At the sound of their fall the earth trembles;
their outcry is heard at the Sea of Reeds.

²²Look — like an eagle he rises and swoops, spreading his wings over Bozrah.

On that day the heart of Edom's warriors
will be like the heart of a woman in labor.

²³Concerning Damascus — Hamath and Arpad are put to shame, for they have heard bad news.
They melt in anxiety;
there is agitation on the sea that cannot be calmed.

²⁴Damascus has lost her strength.
She has turned to flee,
and panic has gripped her.
Distress and pain have seized her like a woman giving birth.

²⁵How is the renowned city not abandoned,
the town of my delight!

²⁶Therefore her young men will fall in her public squares, and all her soldiers will be silenced on that day,
declares the LORD of Hosts.

²⁷I will set fire to the walls of Damascus, and it will consume the fortresses of Ben-hadad.

²⁸Concerning Kedar and the kingdoms of Hazor, which Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon defeated —
this is what the LORD says:
Rise up, advance against Kedar,
and plunder the people of the east!

²⁹Their tents and their flocks will be seized, their tent curtains and all their goods and their camels carried off.
Men will shout at them:
'Terror on every side!'

³⁰Flee! Wander far away! Go deep into hiding, you inhabitants of Hazor, declares the LORD!
For Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon has devised a plan against you and formed a strategy against you.

³¹Rise up, advance against a nation at ease, living in security, declares the LORD —
a nation with no gates and no bars, dwelling in isolation.

³²Their camels will become plunder and their vast herds, spoil.
I will scatter to every wind
those who clip the corners of their hair, and from every direction I will bring their disaster,
declares the LORD.

³³Hazor will become a haunt of jackals,
a desolation forever.
No one will live there;
no human being will settle in her.

³⁴The word of the LORD that came to Jeremiah the prophet concerning Elam, at the beginning of the reign of Zedekiah king of Judah:

³⁵This is what the LORD of Hosts says:
I am about to break the bow of Elam,
the chief weapon of their strength.

³⁶I will bring against Elam the four winds from the four corners of the heavens.
I will scatter them to all these winds, and there will be no nation
where Elam's exiles will not reach.

³⁷I will shatter Elam before their enemies,
before those who seek their lives.
I will bring disaster upon them —
the burning heat of my anger,
declares the LORD.
I will send the sword after them until I have consumed them.

³⁸I will set my throne in Elam and destroy her king and officials from there,
declares the LORD.

³⁹But in the latter days
I will restore the fortunes of Elam,
declares the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word malkam is deliberately ambiguous — it can be vocalized as 'their king' (malkam) or as 'Milcom' (the national deity of Ammon, also known as Molech). We rendered it as 'Milcom' because the parallel with Chemosh in 48:7 (Moab's god going into exile) suggests a deity rather than a human king. The tribe of Gad occupied Transjordanian territory that Ammon claimed; after Gad's deportation by Assyria (c. 733 BCE), Ammon expanded into the vacated land. God's rhetorical questions imply that Israel's exile was not an invitation for Ammon to annex the territory — Israel still has heirs.
2. Rabbah (modern Amman, Jordan) was the Ammonite capital. The term teru'at milchamah ('alarm of war, war cry') refers to the blast of the shofar or the shout of attacking troops. The word tel ('mound, ruin heap') is a technical term for the artificial hill created when a city is destroyed and rebuilt repeatedly — Rabbah will become an archaeological ruin. The phrase yarash yisra'el et yorshav ('Israel will dispossess his dispossessioners') uses the same verb from v. 1 (yarash, 'to inherit, to dispossess') — the tables are turned, and Israel reclaims what was taken.

3. Heshbon here is in Ammonite territory (distinct from the Moabite context of chapter 48). The Ai mentioned here is not the Ai of Joshua 7-8 near Bethel but an otherwise unknown Ammonite town. The phrase malkam bagolah yelekh ('Milcom/their king will go into exile') exactly parallels 48:7 where Chemosh goes into exile — the pattern demonstrates that foreign gods are powerless against the LORD. The women running 'among the walls/hedges' (bagederot) suggests frantic, directionless movement within confined spaces.
4. The phrase zav imqekh ('your valley flows') is a wordplay — the amaqim ('valleys') that Ammon boasts about are 'flowing away,' possibly referring to the blood flowing in the valleys or the fertility of the land draining away. The title bat hashovovevah ('faithless/backsliding daughter') applies the same term used for Israel (3:14, 22) to Ammon — even foreign nations are held accountable for faithlessness. The arrogant question 'Who would come against me?' echoes Edom's boast in Obadiah 3 and is a characteristic prophetic marker of prideful self-delusion.
5. The full divine title Adonai YHWH Tseva'ot ('the Lord GOD of Hosts') is used here — the most expansive form of the divine name, combining the title of sovereignty (Adonai), the covenant name (YHWH), and the military title (Tseva'ot). The phrase ish lefanav ('each man straight ahead') describes panicked, directionless flight — each person running wherever he faces, with no coordination or leadership. The final clause 'no one will gather the fugitives' (ein meqabbets lanoded) means there will be no rallying point, no regrouping — the dispersal is permanent.
6. As with Moab (48:47) and later Elam (49:39), the judgment oracle closes with a promise of restoration. The phrase ashiv et shevut ('I will restore the fortunes/captivity') uses the root shuv ('return'), Jeremiah's central verb for both judgment and restoration. The word 'afterward' (acharei-khen) is less specific than the 'latter days' of 48:47 — it promises restoration without placing it in eschatological time.
7. Teman, an Edomite clan and region, was renowned in the ancient world for wisdom — Eliphaz the Temanite is the most prominent of Job's friends (Job 2:11). The three rhetorical questions are devastating: Edom's famed intellectual tradition has failed completely. The verb nisrechah ('has rotted, has become foul, has decayed') is unusually strong — wisdom has not merely departed but decomposed. The word banim ('sons, children') here means 'the discerning ones' or 'the intelligent' — a usage of ben as a member of a class rather than a literal offspring.
8. Dedan was an Arabian trading settlement at the southern edge of Edom's territory. The inhabitants are warned to flee because Edom's catastrophe will spill over into neighboring regions. The name 'Esau' is used instead of 'Edom' — a reminder that Edom is Jacob/Israel's twin brother (Genesis 25:25-26, 36:1), making this a judgment within the family. The verb he'miqu ('go deep') suggests hiding in deep caves or remote wadis — the terrain of Edom (Petra region) is famous for its deep, narrow gorges and hidden caves.
9. This verse closely parallels Obadiah 5. The rhetorical logic is a fortiori: even grape-harvesters leave some fruit behind, and even thieves take only enough — but the judgment coming on Edom will be far more thorough than either. The implied conclusion (stated explicitly in v. 10) is that Edom will be stripped completely bare. The word ollelot (' gleanings') refers to the small clusters left on the vine after harvest — gleaning laws in Israel required leaving these for the poor (Leviticus 19:10).
10. The emphatic pronoun ani ('I myself') stresses divine agency — this is not a natural disaster but God's deliberate act. The verb chasafti ('I have stripped bare, I have exposed') is the opposite of Edom's attempt to hide in deep places (v. 8). God strips away every layer of protection. The phrase ve'einenu ('and he is not, and he is no more') is stark and final — Edom ceases to exist. Historically, the Edomites were gradually absorbed by the Nabataeans and later the Idumeans of the Hellenistic period, effectively disappearing as a distinct people.
11. This verse is startling in context — after announcing total destruction, God offers to protect Edom's most vulnerable: the orphans (yetomim) and widows (almanot). The verse may be ironic (Edom's orphans will need divine protection because there will be no men left) or genuinely compassionate (even in judgment, God cares for the helpless). The tension between these readings is deliberate and should not be resolved. The imperative 'leave' (azvah) addresses Edom directly — entrust your most vulnerable to the God who is destroying you.
12. The cup metaphor connects to Jeremiah's cup-of-wrath vision in 25:15-29, where all nations must drink from the cup of divine judgment. The argument is a fortiori: if even those whose 'judgment' (mishpat) did not require drinking the cup must nevertheless drink, how much more must Edom drink? The emphatic infinitive absolute construction shato tishteh ('you will certainly drink') leaves no room for escape. The identity of those who 'did not deserve to drink' is debated — it likely refers to Judah, who suffered despite being God's covenant people.
13. God swears by himself because there is no greater authority to swear by (cf. Genesis 22:16, Hebrews 6:13). Bozrah (modern Buseirah in southern Jordan) was the capital of Edom — not to be confused with the Moabite Bozrah of 48:24. The four-fold sentence — shamah ('desolation'), cherpah ('reproach'), chorbah ('ruin'), qelalah ('curse') — is a comprehensive judgment formula. The phrase chorvot olam ('ruins forever') uses olam in its sense of indefinite, stretching-beyond-sight duration.
14. This verse closely parallels Obadiah 1. The prophet receives a shemu'ah ('report, rumor, message') directly from the LORD, then sees a tsir ('envoy, messenger') dispatched among the nations to muster an army against Edom. The scene reveals the heavenly council directing international affairs — the nations think they are acting independently, but God has summoned them. The imperatives hitqabetsu ('gather yourselves'), bo'u ('come'), and qumu ('rise up') create urgency.
15. Parallels Obadiah 2. The verbs describe both diminishment (qaton, 'small, insignificant') and social contempt (bazui, 'despised'). Edom, which considered itself great and secure, will be reduced to insignificance. The word ba'adam ('among humanity, among people') broadens the scope beyond the nations to a universal contempt.
16. Parallels Obadiah 3-4. The word tiflatstetkha is rare — it may mean 'the terror/dread you inspire in others' or 'your horrible nature.' Edom's fearsome reputation has become a source of self-deception: because others fear them, they believe they are invulnerable. The geographic references to 'clefts of the rock' (chagvei hassela) precisely describe the terrain around Petra (whose name means 'rock' in Greek) and the Edomite highlands — narrow canyon passages and cliff dwellings that seemed impregnable. The eagle-nest image combines height with the illusion of inaccessibility, but God's reach exceeds even the eagle's altitude.

17. The reaction of passersby combines yishom ('will be appalled, horrified, stunned') with yishroq ('will hiss, whistle') — the hissing is a gesture of shock and contempt, the sharp intake of breath at something terrible. The word makkoteha ('her wounds, her plagues, her blows') describes Edom's devastation as physical injuries inflicted on a body.
18. The comparison to Sodom and Gomorrah (Genesis 19) invokes the paradigmatic divine destruction — total, irreversible, and exemplary. The phrase mahpekhat Sedom ('the overthrow of Sodom') uses a specific noun for catastrophic overturning, not merely 'destruction.' The double negation — 'no one will live there, no human being will settle' — uses two different words for humanity (ish, 'a man,' and ben-adam, 'a son of man/human being') to emphasize the completeness of depopulation.
19. This extended simile compares God to a lion emerging from the dense vegetation along the Jordan River to attack prey in open pasture. The ge'on haYarden ('pride/thickets of the Jordan') refers to the lush, jungle-like growth along the river banks where lions once lived. The three rhetorical questions assert God's absolute sovereignty: no one equals him (mi khamoni), no one can call him to account (mi yo'ideni), and no leader (ro'eh, 'shepherd,' a common metaphor for kings) can resist him. This passage is reused almost verbatim in 50:44 against Babylon.
20. The 'plan' (atsat) and 'purposes' (machshevotav) of the LORD are presented as accomplished facts — what God has planned is as good as done. The image of tse'irei hatso'n ('the youngest/smallest of the flock') dragging away the mighty Edomites is deliberately humiliating — even the weakest will overcome them. The word neveh ('pasture, dwelling') continues the pastoral metaphor: Edom's home territory will be made desolate. This verse reappears nearly identically in 50:45 against Babylon.
21. The fall of Edom is so catastrophic that the earth itself shakes (ra'ashah ha'arets) and the sound carries to the yam-suf ('Sea of Reeds,' traditionally 'Red Sea') — an enormous distance, emphasizing the magnitude of the event. The mention of the Sea of Reeds also evokes the Exodus, linking Edom's fall to the paradigmatic act of divine judgment and deliverance.
22. This verse closely parallels 48:40-41 (the eagle over Moab), using nearly identical language for Edom. The reuse suggests that the same divine agent of destruction (the eagle, representing Nebuchadnezzar) will strike both nations. The simile of warriors reduced to the helplessness of a woman in labor (ishah metserah) describes involuntary, overwhelming physical distress — the mightiest soldiers seized by terror as uncontrollable as contractions.
23. The Damascus oracle begins abruptly without a messenger formula. Hamath and Arpad were Syrian cities north of Damascus that fell to Assyria before Damascus itself (cf. Isaiah 10:9, 36:19). The verb namogu ('they melt, they dissolve') describes the loss of all solidity and resolve. The phrase bayyam de'agah ('anxiety/worry on the sea') is difficult — it may mean the anxious sea as a metaphor for turmoil, or 'anxiety like the sea' (comparing their inner turmoil to the restless ocean). The verb hashqet ('to be quiet, to be still') with lo yukal ('is not able') describes uncontrollable agitation.
24. The verb rafetah ('has become weak, has gone limp') describes the loss of physical strength — Damascus's legendary military power collapses. The personification as a woman in labor (kayyoleodah) echoes 48:41 and 49:22 — the same image applied to Moab, Edom, and now Damascus, suggesting that divine judgment produces the same helpless agony regardless of the nation. The word retet ('trembling, panic') is rare in the Hebrew Bible, intensifying the unusualness of Damascus's experience.
25. The speaker of this lament is debated — it may be the prophet, a citizen of Damascus, or God himself expressing loss. The phrase ir tehillah ('city of praise/renown') and qiryat mesosi ('city of my joy/delight') indicate that Damascus was celebrated for its beauty and vitality. The exclamation eikh ('How!') again echoes the lament formula. The verse's meaning is also debated: 'How is it that the city has not yet been abandoned' (wondering why people stay in a doomed place) or 'How has the city of renown been abandoned' (mourning its fall).
26. The verb yiddammu ('will be silenced, will perish') from the root d-m-m ('to be silent, to cease') suggests death as silencing — the noisy, vibrant city falls into the silence of death. The rehov ('public square, broad place') was the center of civic life in an ancient city — for young men to fall there means the heart of the city is a killing ground. The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day') is eschatological language marking a decisive divine intervention.
27. Ben-hadad ('son of Hadad') was a dynastic name used by several Aramean kings of Damascus (1 Kings 15:18, 20:1, 2 Kings 13:3). The name invokes the storm god Hadad, the chief deity of the Arameans — calling the fortresses by this name suggests that Damascus's royal power, rooted in its national deity, will be consumed. This verse closely parallels Amos 1:4. The verb hitsatti ('I will kindle, I will set fire') makes God the direct agent of destruction.
28. Kedar was a confederation of Arabian tribes descended from Ishmael (Genesis 25:13), inhabiting the Syrian-Arabian desert east of Israel. Hazor here is not the Canaanite city of Joshua 11:1 but refers to unwallled Arabian settlements (from chatser, 'enclosure, settlement') — semi-permanent encampments in the desert. The phrase benei-qedem ('people of the east, easterners') is a general term for Arabian and Transjordanian peoples. Nebuchadnezzar is named directly as the historical agent of this judgment — a rare explicit identification in the oracles against nations.
29. The catalogue of plunder — tents, flocks, curtains, goods, camels — is the complete inventory of nomadic wealth. These are not city-dwellers with walls and storehouses but pastoralists whose entire livelihood is portable and vulnerable. The cry magor missaviv ('terror on every side') is a characteristic Jeremiah phrase (6:25, 20:3, 20:10, 46:5) — it becomes the war cry shouted at the fleeing nomads, turning Jeremiah's own experience of terror into a weapon against others.
30. The triple imperative — nusu ('flee'), nudu ('wander'), he'miqu ('go deep') — creates escalating urgency. The same command to 'go deep' (he'miqu lashavet) appeared in v. 8 addressed to Dedan near Edom — the same survival strategy for different nations. The word etsah ('counsel, plan') and machashavah ('thought, strategy') describe Nebuchadnezzar's deliberate military planning, but the broader context makes clear that the Babylonian king's plans are themselves instruments of God's judgment.

31. The description of the target — shelev ('at ease, tranquil'), yoshev lavetach ('living in security'), without doors or bars, dwelling alone — describes the nomadic lifestyle as both its blessing and its vulnerability. These desert-dwelling tribes have no fortifications because they have no fixed cities. Their isolation (badad yishkonu, 'they dwell alone') is geographic and cultural — they live apart from the settled world. What was freedom becomes fatal exposure when an army comes.
32. The phrase qetsutssei fe'ah ('those who clip the corners [of their hair]') describes an Arabian grooming custom — trimming the hair at the temples. This same phrase appears in 9:25 and 25:23, identifying specific Arabian peoples by their distinctive hairstyle. The scattering 'to every wind' (lekhol-ruach) means dispersal in all four directions — total diaspora. The phrase mikkol-avarav ('from all his sides/directions') means disaster converges from every quarter, leaving no direction of escape.
33. The word tannim ('jackals') represents the wild animals that reclaim abandoned human settlements — a standard image of desolation in prophetic literature (cf. Isaiah 13:22, 34:13). The double negation with ish and ben-adam (paralleling v. 18 and 48:9) is the comprehensive depopulation formula. The phrase shemamah ad-olam ('desolation forever/to the distant horizon of time') uses olam in its sense of indefinite, stretching-beyond-sight duration — the desolation has no visible end.
34. The Elam oracle is unique among the oracles against nations for having a precise date — the beginning of Zedekiah's reign (c. 597 BCE). Elam was located in what is now southwestern Iran (capital: Susa), far to the east of Israel's usual sphere of concern. Its inclusion extends the scope of God's sovereignty far beyond the Levant. The dating formula connects this oracle to the turbulent period immediately after Nebuchadnezzar's first deportation of Judah.
35. Elam was renowned in the ancient world for its archers — the bow (qeshet) was their signature military weapon. Breaking the bow means destroying their primary military capability. The phrase reshit gevuratam ('the beginning/chief of their strength') identifies archery as the foundation of Elamite power. The destruction begins with the weapon system that defines them — without the bow, Elam is defenseless.
36. The 'four winds from the four corners of the heavens' (arba ruchot me'arba qetsot hashamayim) represents cosmic-scale judgment — destruction comes from every cardinal direction simultaneously. The scattering of Elam's people to every nation is the most extreme dispersal formula in Jeremiah's oracles against nations. The word nidchei ('exiles, outcasts, driven-out ones') from the root n-d-ch describes forced, involuntary displacement to the farthest reaches of the known world.
37. The phrase charon appi ('the burning of my anger, my fierce wrath') is one of the strongest anger expressions in Hebrew — charon means 'burning heat' and af ('nose, anger') refers to the flaring nostrils of fury. The verb hichatti ('I will shatter, I will terrify') from the root ch-t-t describes the complete breakdown of morale. The sword 'sent after them' (shilachti achareihem et-hacherev) personifies the weapon as a pursuing agent — the sword chases Elam's scattered survivors until consumption (kaloti, 'until I have finished/consumed') is complete.
38. The image of God setting his throne (kis'i) in Elam is extraordinary — it declares that God will personally exercise sovereignty in this distant land, displacing its human rulers. The destruction of 'king and officials' (melekh vesarim) eliminates the entire governing structure. This verse makes explicit what the other oracles against nations imply: God is not merely punishing foreign lands but establishing his own kingship over them. The placement of God's throne in Elam anticipates the universal sovereignty theme of later apocalyptic literature.
39. The restoration formula echoes 48:47 (Moab) and 49:6 (Ammon), completing a three-fold pattern: judgment is followed by eschatological hope. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days') uses the same eschatological time-marker as 48:47. Notably, Edom and Damascus receive no such restoration promise — their oracles end with unrelieved judgment. The theological significance is debated: does this pattern suggest degrees of divine mercy, or is it a redactional difference reflecting the history of the text's composition? Acts 2:9 mentions Elamites among those present at Pentecost, which some interpreters read as fulfillment of this promise.

Summary: Jeremiah 50 opens the massive two-chapter oracle against Babylon (chapters 50-51), the longest sustained prophetic judgment in the book. The chapter announces Babylon's fall, the shattering of her gods Bel and Marduk, and the arrival of 'a nation from the north' — the same directional formula previously used for Babylon's own attack on Jerusalem, now turned back on her. Interwoven with Babylon's doom is Israel's restoration: the scattered people of both Israel and Judah will seek the LORD together, weeping as they return to Zion and binding themselves in an everlasting covenant. The chapter's theological center is verse 34, where God is named Israel's Go'el — the kinsman-redeemer who is bound by obligation to plead their cause against the empire that devoured them.

What Makes This Remarkable: The literary architecture of this chapter is a study in reversal. Every judgment formula that Jeremiah used against Jerusalem in earlier chapters reappears here aimed at Babylon: the foe from the north (v. 3, cf. 1:14, 4:6, 6:1, 6:22), the call to flee (v. 8, cf. 4:6), the land becoming a desolation (v. 13, cf. 4:27, 6:8), the sword against inhabitants (v. 35-38, cf. 14:12). Babylon was God's instrument; now the instrument itself faces the forge. The go'el declaration in verse 34 is theologically explosive — God does not rescue Israel as a distant sovereign but as closest kin, using the same legal category as Ruth's Boaz. The everlasting covenant of verse 5 (berit olam) reaches beyond Sinai, anticipating the new covenant of chapter 31. The fourfold 'sword' refrain in verses 35-38 is poetry of devastating precision, systematically dismantling every pillar of Babylonian society.

Translation Friction: The phrase hinneh (rendered 'look' or integrated naturally) appears multiple times and required contextual judgment each time. The verb paqad ('to visit, attend to, punish') in verses 18, 27, and 31 shifts between punitive and restorative uses — we rendered each according to context and documented the decisions. The word naqam ('vengeance') in verses 15 and 28 required careful handling: this is not petty revenge but covenantal vindication, and we rendered it as 'vengeance' with notes on the covenantal dimension. The metaphor of Israel as 'scattered sheep' (v. 17) connects to earlier shepherd-failure oracles (23:1-4) and we preserved the pastoral language. The rare word zed/zadon ('arrogance, presumption') in verses 31-32 is a key characterization of Babylon's sin — pride elevated to cosmic defiance.

Connections: The 'foe from the north' formula reverses the invasion oracle of 6:22-24 almost word for word. The go'el imagery connects to Isaiah 41:14, 43:14, 44:6, 44:24, 47:4, 48:17, 49:7, 49:26, 54:5, 54:8, and to Ruth 3-4 where the legal institution is narrated. The everlasting covenant (berit olam, v. 5) links to 31:31-34 (new covenant), 32:40 (everlasting covenant), and Genesis 17:7. The shepherd-and-flock metaphor connects to 23:1-4 (faithless shepherds), Ezekiel 34, and Psalm 23. The 'vengeance of his temple' (v. 28) links to the temple destruction narrated in chapter 52 and 2 Kings 25. Babylon's fall here is echoed in Isaiah 13-14, 21:1-10, and ultimately in Revelation 17-18.

¹The word that the LORD spoke against Babylon, against the land of the Chaldeans, through Jeremiah the prophet. ²Announce it among the nations, proclaim it, raise a signal; proclaim it and do not conceal it. Say: Babylon is captured! Bel is put to shame, Marduk is shattered. Her images are put to shame, her idols are broken to pieces. ³For a nation advances against her from the north — it will turn her land into a wasteland, and no one will live in it. Both human and animal will flee; they will be gone. ⁴In those days and at that time, declares the LORD, the people of Israel will come — they and the people of Judah together. They will walk along weeping, and they will seek the LORD their God. ⁵They will ask the way to Zion, their faces turned toward it: 'Come, let us bind ourselves to the LORD in an everlasting covenant that will never be forgotten.' ⁶My people have been lost sheep. Their shepherds led them astray, turning them loose on the mountains. They wandered from mountain to hill and forgot their resting place. ⁷All who found them devoured them, and their oppressors said, 'We bear no guilt, because they sinned against the LORD — the pasture of righteousness, the hope of their ancestors, the LORD.' ⁸Flee from the midst of Babylon, go out from the land of the Chaldeans, and be like the lead goats at the head of the flock. ⁹For I am about to stir up and bring against Babylon an assembly of great nations from the land of the north. They will array themselves against her; from there she will be captured. Their arrows will be like those of a skilled warrior — none returns empty-handed. ¹⁰Chaldea will become plunder; all who plunder her will have their fill, declares the LORD. ¹¹Because you rejoiced, because you exulted, you who plundered my inheritance — because you frolicked like a heifer treading grain and neighed like stallions — ¹²Your mother will be utterly put to shame; she who bore you will be disgraced. Look — the last of the nations! A desert, a dry land, a wasteland. ¹³Because of the wrath of the LORD she will not be inhabited; she will become an utter desolation. Everyone who passes by Babylon will be horrified and will hiss at all her wounds. ¹⁴Take up your positions around Babylon, all you who draw the bow. Shoot at her! Do not spare any arrows, for she has sinned against the LORD. ¹⁵Raise the war cry against her on every side! She has surrendered; her pillars have fallen, her walls are torn down. For this is the vengeance of the LORD — take vengeance on her! As she has done, do to her. ¹⁶Cut off the sower from Babylon, and the one who wields the sickle at harvest time. Before the oppressing sword, each one will turn to his own people and each will flee to his own land. ¹⁷Israel is a scattered sheep that lions have driven away. The first to devour him was the king of Assyria, and this last one, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon, has gnawed his bones. ¹⁸Therefore this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: I am about to punish the king of Babylon and his land, just as I punished the king of Assyria. ¹⁹And I will bring Israel back to his pasture, and he will graze on Carmel and Bashan, and on the hills of Ephraim and Gilead his appetite will be satisfied. ²⁰In those days and at that time, declares the LORD, the iniquity of Israel will be searched for — and there will be none. The sins of Judah — and they will not be found. For I will pardon the remnant I preserve. ²¹Go up against the land of Merathaim — attack it — and against the inhabitants of Pekod. Put them to the sword and devote them to destruction, declares the LORD. Do everything I have commanded you. ²²The sound of war in the land — and great shattering! ²³How the hammer of the whole earth has been cut down and shattered! How Babylon has become a horror among the nations! ²⁴I set a trap for you, and you were caught, Babylon — and you did not even know it. You were found and seized, because you provoked the LORD. ²⁵The LORD has opened his armory and brought out the weapons of his wrath, for the Lord GOD of Hosts has work to do in the land of the Chaldeans. ²⁶Come against her from every direction. Open her granaries, pile her up like heaps of grain, and devote her to utter destruction. Let nothing of her remain. ²⁷Put all her young bulls to the sword; let them go down to slaughter. Woe to them, for their day has come — the time of their reckoning. ²⁸The sound of fugitives and survivors from the land of Babylon, coming to declare in Zion the vengeance of the LORD our God — the vengeance for his temple. ²⁹Summon the archers against Babylon, all who draw the bow. Encamp against her on every side; let no one escape. Repay her according to her deeds — as she has done, do to her — for she has acted arrogantly against the LORD, against the Holy One of Israel. ³⁰Therefore her young men will fall in her public squares, and all her warriors will be silenced on that day, declares the LORD. ³¹I am against you, Arrogance — declares the Lord GOD of Hosts — for your day has come, the time when I will call you to account. ³²Arrogance will stumble and fall with no one to lift him up. I will set fire to his cities, and it will consume everything around him. ³³This is what the LORD of Hosts says: The people of Israel and the people of Judah are oppressed together. All who took them captive hold them fast and refuse to let them go. ³⁴Their Redeemer is strong — the LORD of Hosts is his name. He will surely champion their cause, so that he may give rest to the land but turmoil to the inhabitants of Babylon. ³⁵A sword against the Chaldeans, declares the LORD, against the inhabitants of Babylon, against her officials, and against her wise men! ³⁶A sword against her diviners — they will become fools! A sword against her warriors — they will be shattered! ³⁷A sword against his horses and chariots, and against all the mixed peoples in her midst — they will become weak! A sword against her treasuries — they will be plundered! ³⁸A drought on her waters — they will dry up! For she is a land of carved images, and they go mad over terrifying idols. ³⁹Therefore desert creatures will dwell there with jackals, and ostriches will inhabit it. It will never again be settled; no one will live in it from generation to generation. ⁴⁰As when God overthrew Sodom and Gomorrah and their neighboring towns, declares the LORD, no one will live there; no human being will settle in it. ⁴¹Look — a people is coming from the north! A great nation and many kings are stirring from the ends of the earth. ⁴²They grasp bow and javelin. They are cruel and show no mercy. Their roar is like the sea. They ride on horses, drawn up for battle like one man — against you, daughter of Babylon! ⁴³The king of Babylon has heard the report of them, and his hands have gone limp. Anguish has seized him, pain like a woman in labor. ⁴⁴Look — like a lion coming up from the thickets of the Jordan to a secure pasture, I will suddenly drive them from it. And who is the chosen one I will appoint over it? For who is like me? Who will summon me to court? And what shepherd can stand before me? ⁴⁵Therefore hear the plan of the LORD that he has formed against Babylon, and the purposes he has devised against the land of the Chaldeans: Even the smallest of the flock will drag them off. Their own pasture will be devastated because of them. ⁴⁶At the sound of Babylon's capture, the earth trembles; a cry is heard among the nations.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription marks this as the beginning of a new oracle collection. The preposition be-yad ('by the hand of') is rendered 'through' to capture the instrumental sense — Jeremiah is the conduit, not the author, of the divine word. The dual target ('Babylon... land of the Chaldeans') is emphatic: both the city and the entire territory are addressed.
2. The rapid-fire imperatives (haggidu, hashmi'u, se'u-nes, hashmi'u) create urgency — this news must be broadcast everywhere at once. Bel is the title of Marduk, Babylon's chief deity, from the Akkadian belu ('lord'). The verb hovish ('put to shame') does not mean merely embarrassed but publicly exposed as powerless. The word gilluleiha ('her idols') is deliberately derogatory — from a root meaning 'dung-pellets,' it is the prophets' contemptuous term for pagan images.

3. The phrase goy mitsafon ('a nation from the north') is the same formula used for Babylon's own attack on Judah (1:14-15, 4:6, 6:1, 6:22). The reversal is deliberate and devastating — the destroyer from the north now faces a destroyer from the north. Historically this refers to the Medes and Persians. The totality of desolation ('from human to animal') echoes the un-creation language Jeremiah used for Judah in 4:25.
4. The phrase halokh uvakho yelekhu ('walking and weeping they will go') uses the infinitive absolute construction to depict continuous weeping during the journey home. The reunion of Israel (the former northern kingdom, exiled since 722 BCE) and Judah (exiled in 586 BCE) is a restoration beyond political possibility — only divine intervention reunites the two separated peoples. The verb biqesh ('seek') implies deliberate, urgent searching, not casual inquiry.
5. The verb nilvu ('let us join, bind ourselves') is from the root l-v-h, the same root from which the name 'Levi' may derive — it means to attach oneself, to cling to. The covenant the returning exiles seek is not the old Sinai covenant they broke but a berit olam — an everlasting covenant that anticipates the berit chadashah of 31:31-34. The phrase lo tishshakheach ('will not be forgotten') contrasts with the old covenant that was forgotten through disobedience.
6. The shepherd metaphor indicts Judah's leaders (kings, priests, prophets) for the people's exile — the flock did not wander on its own; the shepherds drove them off course. The verb shovevu ('turned them aside, led them astray') is from shuv in a causative sense — the same root that means 'return/repent' here means 'lead astray,' another of Jeremiah's characteristic wordplays with shuv. The 'resting place' (rivtsam) is both literal pasture and metaphor for the covenant relationship — the place of security they abandoned.
7. The enemies' self-justification ('we bear no guilt') exposes a theological irony: Babylon claims immunity because Israel sinned against the LORD. But exploiting God's discipline of his people does not exempt the exploiter — this is precisely the logic that condemns Babylon throughout this chapter. The phrase neveh-tsedeq ('pasture of righteousness') continues the shepherd-flock imagery: God is the righteous pasture the sheep left. The word miqveh ('hope, gathering place') also carries the sense of a reservoir — God as the source to which all hope flows.
8. The imperative nodu ('flee, wander away') is addressed to the Judean exiles — they must leave before judgment falls. The comparison to attudim ('he-goats, lead goats') means the returning exiles should lead the way boldly, like the dominant male goats that walk at the front of the flock. This is not a call to timid departure but to confident exodus.
9. The phrase qahal goyim gedolim ('assembly of great nations') mirrors the coalition language used for Babylon's own allies. The archer simile specifies maskhil ('skilled, effective') — not merely a strong warrior but one who knows where to aim. The phrase lo yashuv reqam ('will not return empty') means every arrow finds its mark — total military efficiency.
10. The verb yisba'u ('will be satisfied, sated') implies abundance — the plunderers will gorge themselves on Babylon's wealth. The same verb is used for feasting to fullness. The concluding ne'um YHWH ('declares the LORD') stamps divine authority on the prediction.
11. God addresses Babylon directly. The word nachalati ('my inheritance') is significant: Israel is not merely a nation Babylon conquered but God's own nachalah — his personal inheritance, his treasured portion. The heifer and stallion imagery is deliberately crude: Babylon's celebration over destroying God's people was animalistic exuberance. The verb tafushu ('you grew fat, frolicked') and titshahalu ('you neighed') reduce the empire to barnyard behavior.
12. 'Your mother' is Babylon herself, the mother-city of the Chaldean empire. The progression from 'last of the nations' to 'desert... dry land... wasteland' is a three-stage descent from political humiliation to physical desolation. The word acharit ('end, last, hindmost') reverses Babylon's self-understanding as the first of the nations.
13. The verb yishom ('will be horrified, appalled') and yishroq ('will hiss, whistle') describe the reaction of passersby to ruins — the hissing is not contempt but the sharp intake of breath at shocking devastation. The same double reaction appears in 19:8 directed at Jerusalem, reinforcing the symmetry between Judah's and Babylon's fates.
14. The military command language shifts to direct address of the attacking armies. The verb yedu ('shoot') is an imperative plural. The phrase al-tachmelu el-chets ('do not spare arrows') means hold nothing back — total assault. The justification ki laYHWH chat'ah ('for she has sinned against the LORD') applies to Babylon the same standard she cited against Israel in verse 7.
15. The phrase natnah yadah ('she has given her hand') means surrender — the gesture of submission. The word niqmat YHWH ('vengeance of the LORD') is not petty retaliation but covenantal justice: God enforces the same measure-for-measure principle (ka'asher astah asu lah, 'as she has done, do to her') that Babylon herself used against others. The lex talionis applied to empires.
16. The destruction of agriculture (sower and harvester) means the end of Babylon as a functioning civilization. The phrase cherev hayyonah ('the oppressing sword') uses yonah in an unusual sense — not 'dove' but from the root y-n-h meaning 'to oppress, to wrong.' The flight of foreign workers and conscripts back to their homelands describes the disintegration of Babylon's multinational empire.
17. The singular seh ('sheep,' not 'flock') emphasizes Israel's vulnerability — one lone animal against predators. The two lions represent Assyria (which destroyed the northern kingdom in 722 BCE) and Babylon (which destroyed the southern kingdom in 586 BCE). The verb itsmoh ('gnawed his bones, crushed his bones') is more violent than mere 'breaking' — it describes a predator stripping a carcass of the skeleton. The chronological framing (harishon... hazeh ha'acharon, 'the first... this last one') structures Israel's entire exile history as a sequence of predation.

18. The verb paqad ('to visit, attend to, punish') here carries its punitive sense — God 'visits' Babylon with judgment. The parallel structure ('as I punished the king of Assyria') reminds the reader that Assyria, once invincible, was destroyed in 612 BCE — Babylon will follow the same path. The full divine title YHWH tseva'ot Elohei Yisrael ('the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel') emphasizes God's sovereignty over all armies and his particular bond with Israel.
19. The restoration continues the shepherd imagery — God returns the scattered sheep to its naveh ('pasture, dwelling'). The four regions named (Carmel, Bashan, Ephraim, Gilead) represent the full territorial extent of the united kingdom, including areas lost to Assyria — this is a promise of total restoration, not partial return. The verb tisba ('will be satisfied') echoes verse 10's yisba'u, creating a contrast: Babylon's plunderers will be sated with loot, but Israel will be sated with good pasture.
20. The forensic imagery is striking: iniquity and sin will be searched for like evidence in a legal investigation — and the search will come up empty. This is not because Israel never sinned but because God will have pardoned (eslach, from s-l-ch, the verb used exclusively for divine forgiveness in the Hebrew Bible) the surviving remnant. The parallel between 'iniquity of Israel' and 'sins of Judah' uses the two standard terms for wrongdoing: avon (iniquity, guilt, twisted action) and chatto't (sins, missing the mark). Both kingdoms' guilt is erased.
21. Merathaim ('double rebellion') is a wordplay on southern Babylonia's marshland region (mat marrati). Pekod ('punishment, visitation') is both a real Aramean tribe east of the Tigris and a wordplay on paqad ('to punish'). Jeremiah loads the oracle with double meanings — the place names themselves pronounce judgment. The verb hacharem ('devote to destruction') is the herem — total destruction as an act of consecration to God, the most severe form of warfare in the Hebrew Bible.
22. The brevity of this verse is itself expressive — two short phrases that crack like a whip. The word shever ('shattering, breaking, destruction') is one of Jeremiah's most frequent terms, used for both physical and social collapse. Its placement at the end of this staccato couplet gives it percussive force.
23. The title pattish kol-ha'arets ('hammer of the whole earth') is a striking epithet for Babylon — the empire that smashed every nation. The verb nigda ('has been cut down') applies the language of felling a tree to the hammer, mixing metaphors deliberately: the weapon that shattered others is itself shattered. The exclamatory eikh ('how!') introduces the qinah (lament) form, ironically mourning the fall of the destroyer.
24. God himself is the trapper — yaqoshti ('I set a snare') uses the language of bird-catching. Babylon, the great predator, is reduced to prey. The phrase ve'at lo yada'at ('and you did not know') is devastating: the world's most sophisticated intelligence apparatus was oblivious to the trap. The verb hitgarit ('you provoked, contended against') from g-r-h means to stir up strife against — Babylon did not merely ignore God but actively antagonized him.
25. The word otsaro ('his storehouse, treasury, armory') pictures God as having a divine arsenal from which he draws instruments of judgment. The phrase kelei za'mo ('weapons of his indignation') personalizes the invading armies as God's own weaponry. The phrase melakhah hi ('it is work, a task') is almost bureaucratic — God's destruction of Babylon is framed as a job to complete, not an outburst of rage.
26. The word ma'abuseiha ('her granaries, her storage bins') is from the root meaning 'to feed, fatten' — the invaders are to crack open the stores that fattened Babylon. The simile kemo aremim ('like heaps') compares the piled rubble to threshed grain heaps. The verb hacharimuhah ('devote her to destruction') is the herem again — total, consecrated destruction.
27. The 'young bulls' (pareiha) is both literal (livestock destruction) and metaphorical (Babylon's warriors as fattened cattle). The phrase et pequddatam ('the time of their visitation/reckoning') uses paqad in its punitive sense — God's appointed day of accounting. The word yomam ('their day') echoes the 'Day of the LORD' concept from the prophetic tradition.
28. The fugitives are Judean exiles escaping Babylon's fall. They carry news to Zion of niqmat hekhalo ('vengeance for his temple') — God has avenged the destruction of the Jerusalem temple by Nebuchadnezzar in 586 BCE. The word heikhal ('temple, palace') specifically refers to the inner sanctuary, the most sacred space. The destruction of God's dwelling place demands God's retribution against the destroyer.
29. The principle of measure-for-measure justice (ke-fo'olah, 'according to her deeds') is repeated from verse 15. The verb zadah ('acted arrogantly, presumed') is from the root z-d-h denoting willful, presumptuous defiance — not mere pride but cosmic insolence. The title Qedosh Yisrael ('the Holy One of Israel') is primarily Isaianic (used over 25 times in Isaiah) but appears here to stress that Babylon's offense is against God's holiness itself — his utter distinctness and authority.
30. The verb yiddammu ('will be silenced, cut off') is from d-m-m ('to be silent, cease') — the warriors will not merely die but be silenced, their voices and military commands extinguished. The 'public squares' (rechovoteiha) were the centers of civic life; their young men will litter the very places where Babylon's culture thrived.
31. God addresses Babylon by the name zadon ('Arrogance, Presumption') — the city is personified as its defining sin. This is not a description but a title: Babylon is Arrogance itself. The divine self-introduction formula hineni elekha ('I am against you') is the most threatening sentence in prophetic literature — when God declares himself against an entity, its doom is sealed. The phrase et peqadtikha ('the time I visit you') uses paqad in its punitive sense.
32. The personification continues: zadon ('Arrogance') stumbles like a man and falls with no one to help. The verb kashol ('stumble') implies an unexpected fall — Babylon will not see it coming. The fire motif (hitsatti esh, 'I will kindle fire') is God's signature instrument of total judgment, used for Sodom (Genesis 19:24), and promised against Jerusalem itself (21:14). Now it turns on the instrument of Jerusalem's punishment.

33. The language deliberately echoes the Exodus: 'refuse to let them go' (me'anu shallecham) mirrors Pharaoh's refusal to release Israel (Exodus 4:23, 7:14, 8:28, 9:2, 10:4). Babylon is the new Egypt, and the coming liberation will be a new exodus. The verb hecheziku ('held fast, gripped') intensifies the captivity — this is not passive detention but an iron grip.
34. The emphatic infinitive absolute riv yariv ('he will surely plead, champion') intensifies the legal metaphor — God enters the courtroom as Israel's kinsman-advocate and will not rest until the case is won. The contrast between hirgia ('give rest') for the land and hirgiz ('give turmoil') for Babylon uses two verbs from similar roots to create a wordplay: rest for one, restlessness for the other. This verse is the theological center of the chapter.
35. The fourfold 'sword' oracle begins here and runs through verse 38 — four targets systematically dismantled. The first target couples the general population ('inhabitants') with the ruling elite ('officials' and 'wise men'). Babylon's renowned wisdom tradition (magi, astrologers, diviners) is specifically targeted — the very intellectual culture that made Babylon famous will be destroyed.
36. The baddim ('diviners, empty talkers, boasters') are Babylon's professional soothsayers. The verb no'alu ('they will become foolish, be shown to be fools') strips them of their claimed wisdom. The parallel structure (cherev el X... cherev el X) creates a drumbeat of destruction. The verb chattu ('they will be shattered, dismayed') indicates psychological collapse — the warriors will break internally before the sword even reaches them.
37. The 'mixed peoples' (ha'erev) are the foreign mercenaries and multinational population of the Babylonian empire. The phrase vehayu lenashim ('they will become like women') is rendered 'they will become weak' because the Hebrew idiom equates femininity with military helplessness — a culturally bound metaphor that we translate by its intended meaning (loss of fighting capacity) rather than its literal image, to avoid implying that women are inherently weak. The fourth sword target is Babylon's wealth — her treasures (otsroteiha) will be looted.
38. The wordplay shifts from cherev ('sword') to chorev ('drought') — a single consonant change turns military destruction into ecological catastrophe. Babylon's power depended on the Euphrates and its canal system; drought means death. The word emim ('terrors, terrifying things') for idols may allude to the Mesopotamian lamassu and shedū — the terrifying winged figures that guarded Babylonian temples and palaces. The verb yitholalu ('they go mad, rave') describes the frenzy of idol worship.
39. The tsiyyim ('desert creatures') and iiyim ('jackals' or 'howling creatures') are wild animals that reclaim abandoned human settlements — their presence signals that civilization has completely retreated. The benot ya'anah ('ostriches' or 'daughters of the desert cry') are birds associated with desolate ruins. The phrase ad-dor vador ('from generation to generation') extends the desolation into perpetuity. This language closely parallels Isaiah 13:20-22, the Isaianic oracle against Babylon.
40. The Sodom comparison is the ultimate judgment formula — Babylon's destruction will be as total and permanent as the archetypal act of divine annihilation. The phrase mahpekhat Elohim ('God's overthrow') uses the specific vocabulary of Genesis 19. The distinction between yeshev ('dwell permanently') and yagur ('sojourn temporarily') emphasizes that Babylon will have neither permanent residents nor temporary visitors — complete emptiness.
41. This verse nearly replicates 6:22, where the same formula described the Babylonian invasion of Judah. There the 'foe from the north' was Babylon; here the 'foe from the north' targets Babylon — the most devastating literary reversal in the book. The addition of 'many kings' (melakhim rabbim) expands beyond chapter 6's original, indicating a coalition (the Medo-Persian alliance). The verb ye'oru ('are stirring, being roused') implies divine initiative behind the coalition's formation.
42. This verse closely parallels 6:23, which described the Babylonian army approaching Jerusalem. The phrase bat-Babel ('daughter of Babylon') personifies the city as a vulnerable woman facing a merciless army — the same terror Jerusalem felt now falls on Babylon. The phrase arukh ke'ish lammilchamah ('arrayed like one man for battle') conveys disciplined military unity. The sea-roar simile (qolam kayyam yehemeh) captures the terrifying sound of a massive army in motion.
43. This verse parallels 6:24, where it was Judah who heard the report and went limp — now the king of Babylon experiences the identical terror. The phrase rafu yadav ('his hands went limp') is an idiom for total paralysis in the face of overwhelming threat. The labor-pain simile (chil kayyoleadah) is not merely about pain but about helplessness — the king cannot stop what is coming any more than a woman can halt labor. The reversal from chapter 6 is complete.
44. This passage recycles 49:19-21 (the oracle against Edom), applying the same lion imagery to Babylon. The ge'on haYarden ('pride/thickets of the Jordan') refers to the dense vegetation along the Jordan River where lions once lived. God is the lion who drives the flock (Babylon) from its pasture. The rhetorical questions ('who is like me?') assert absolute divine sovereignty — no human authority can challenge, summon, or withstand God. The verb yo'ideni ('will appoint me a time, summon me') is legal language — no one can subpoena God.
45. The phrase tse'irei hatson ('the smallest of the flock') is deeply ironic — even the weakest, most insignificant members of the attacking force will be able to drag away Babylon's defenders. The word naveh ('pasture, habitation') continues the shepherd-flock metaphor that runs through the entire chapter. God's 'plan' (atsat YHWH) is a deliberate, considered strategy, not an impulsive reaction — the verb ya'ats implies counsel, planning, purposeful design.
46. The final verse is a cosmic conclusion — Babylon's fall shakes the entire earth. The verb nir'ashah ('trembles, quakes') describes seismic impact, and the ze'aqah ('cry, outcry') that reaches the nations is both Babylon's death-scream and the shockwave felt by every nation that depended on or feared her. The chapter ends not with resolution but with reverberating impact — the full consequences unfold in chapter 51.

Summary: Jeremiah 51 continues the oracle against Babylon begun in chapter 50, forming the longest chapter in the book. The chapter moves through waves of imagery: Babylon as God's 'war-hammer' now broken, the cup of God's wrath poured out on the nations now turned back on Babylon, the heavens and earth singing over Babylon's fall, and the cosmic scope of the LORD's sovereignty over all creation. The chapter climaxes with a dramatic sign-act: the prophet instructs Seraiah son of Neriah to carry a scroll bearing all these oracles to Babylon, read them aloud, tie a stone to the scroll, and hurl it into the Euphrates with the words 'So shall Babylon sink, never to rise again.' The final line — 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah' — marks the formal end of the prophetic collection before the historical appendix of chapter 52.

What Makes This Remarkable: Three images dominate this chapter. First, Babylon as God's mappets ('war-hammer' or 'shatterer,' v. 20) — a nation used as a divine instrument of judgment now itself shattered by the same God who wielded it. Second, the cup of wrath — Babylon made the nations drink, and now the LORD forces the cup back on her (v. 7). Third, the scroll-sinking sign-act (vv. 59-64) is one of the most vivid prophetic actions in the Hebrew Bible, a physical enactment of the oracle's message: as the stone drags the scroll to the riverbed, so Babylon will be dragged down irreversibly. The instruction to Seraiah is significant because he is the brother of Baruch, Jeremiah's scribe — both sons of Neriah serve as the prophet's literary agents. The closing colophon 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah' (v. 64b) is a scribal note that marks the boundary between Jeremiah's prophetic corpus and the historical appendix of chapter 52.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew mappets (v. 20) is variously translated as 'battle-axe,' 'war-club,' or 'hammer' — we chose 'war-hammer' because the root n-p-ts means 'to shatter,' and the instrument is defined by its effect. The verb shiqqu (v. 39) in 'when they are heated I will set their feast' is difficult; some read it as intoxication, others as a burning heat — we followed the intoxication reading since the cup-of-wrath metaphor governs the context. The phrase lev qamai (v. 1), traditionally read as an atbash cipher for kasdim ('Chaldeans'), poses a translation question — we rendered the surface meaning with a note on the cipher. The relationship between this chapter's poetry and the prose sign-act narrative (vv. 59-64) required attention to tonal shift.

Connections: The cup-of-wrath motif connects to Jeremiah 25:15-29, where Jeremiah is first commanded to make the nations drink. The war-hammer imagery echoes Jeremiah 50:23 ('How the hammer of the whole earth is cut down and broken!'). The sign-act of sinking the scroll parallels other Jeremiah sign-acts: the linen belt (ch. 13), the potter's vessel (ch. 19), the yoke (ch. 27-28). Seraiah son of Neriah connects to Baruch son of Neriah (ch. 36, 45). The closing formula connects forward to chapter 52's historical appendix, which draws from 2 Kings 24-25. The cosmic hymn sections (vv. 15-19) are nearly identical to Jeremiah 10:12-16, forming an inclusio within the book.

¹This is what the LORD says: I am stirring up against Babylon and against those who dwell in Leb-qamai a destroying wind. ²I will send winnowers to Babylon, and they will winnow her and empty her land, for they will come against her from every side on the day of disaster. ³Let no archer string his bow, let no one stand tall in his armor. Do not spare her young men — devote her entire army to destruction. ⁴The slain will fall in the land of the Chaldeans, the pierced through in her streets. ⁵For Israel and Judah have not been widowed by their God, by the LORD of Hosts — though their land was filled with guilt before the Holy One of Israel. ⁶Flee from the midst of Babylon! Each of you, save your own life! Do not be destroyed for her iniquity, for this is the time of the LORD's vengeance — he is repaying her what she deserves. ⁷Babylon was a golden cup in the LORD's hand, making the whole earth drunk. The nations drank her wine — that is why the nations have gone mad. ⁸Suddenly Babylon has fallen and is shattered! Wail over her! Bring balm for her wound — perhaps she can be healed. ⁹We tried to heal Babylon, but she could not be healed. Leave her, and let each of us go to his own land, for her judgment reaches to the heavens and rises to the clouds. ¹⁰The LORD has brought forth our vindication! Come, let us declare in Zion the work of the LORD our God. ¹¹Sharpen the arrows! Fill the quivers! The LORD has stirred up the spirit of the kings of the Medes, for his purpose against Babylon is to destroy her — for this is the vengeance of the LORD, the vengeance for his temple. ¹²Raise the signal against the walls of Babylon! Strengthen the guard, post the watchmen, prepare the ambushes — for the LORD has both planned and carried out what he spoke against the inhabitants of Babylon. ¹³You who dwell by many waters, rich in treasures — your end has come, the measure of your profit-taking is cut off. ¹⁴The LORD of Hosts has sworn by himself: I will surely fill you with attackers like a swarm of locusts, and they will raise a war cry against you. ¹⁵He made the earth by his power, established the world by his wisdom, and stretched out the heavens by his understanding. ¹⁶When he thunders, there is a roar of waters in the heavens. He makes clouds rise from the ends of the earth, creates lightning for the rain, and brings wind out from his storehouses. ¹⁷Every person is too stupid to understand; every metalworker is put to shame by his idol, for his cast image is a lie and there is no breath in them. ¹⁸They are worthless, a work of mockery. In the time of their reckoning, they will perish. ¹⁹The portion of Jacob is not like these, for the one who formed all things is he, and Israel is the tribe of his inheritance — the LORD of Hosts is his name. ²⁰You are my war-hammer, my weapon of battle. With you I shattered nations, with you I destroyed kingdoms. ²¹With you I shattered horse and rider; with you I shattered chariot and driver. ²²With you I shattered man and woman; with you I shattered old and young. ²³With you I shattered shepherd and flock; with you I shattered farmer and team of oxen; with you I shattered governors and officials. ²⁴I will repay Babylon and all the inhabitants of Chaldea for all the evil they did in Zion before your eyes, declares the LORD. ²⁵I am against you, destroying mountain, declares the LORD — you who destroy the whole earth. I will stretch out my hand against you and roll you down from the crags and make you a scorched mountain. ²⁶No one will take from you a stone for a cornerstone or a stone for foundations, for you will be an everlasting ruin, declares the LORD. ²⁷Raise a signal in the land! Blow the ram's horn among the nations! Consecrate nations against her, summon against her the kingdoms of Ararat, Minni, and Ashkenaz. Appoint a commander against her; bring up horses like bristling locusts. ²⁸Consecrate nations against her — the kings of the Medes, all their governors, all their officials, and every land under their rule. ²⁹The earth trembles and writhes, for the purposes of the LORD against Babylon stand firm — to make the land of Babylon a desolation with no one living in it. ³⁰The warriors of Babylon have stopped fighting; they sit in their fortresses. Their strength has dried up; they have become like women. Her dwellings are set on fire; her gate-bars are broken. ³¹Runner meets runner, messenger meets messenger, to report to the king of Babylon that his city is captured from end to end, ³²the river crossings are seized, the marshes are burned with fire, and the soldiers are in a panic. ³³For this is what the LORD of Hosts, the God of Israel, says: Daughter Babylon is like a threshing floor at the time it is trampled — just a little longer, and the time of harvest will come for her. ³⁴Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon has devoured us, he has crushed us, he has set us down like an empty vessel. He has swallowed us like a sea-serpent, filled his belly with our delicacies, and vomited us out. ³⁵The violence done to me and my flesh — let it fall on Babylon, says the inhabitant of Zion. My blood — let it fall on the inhabitants of Chaldea, says Jerusalem. ³⁶Therefore this is what the LORD says: I am taking up your case and exacting your vengeance. I will dry up her sea and make her springs run dry. ³⁷Babylon will become a heap of ruins, a haunt of jackals, an object of horror and hissing, with no one living in it. ³⁸Together they roar like young lions; they growl like lion cubs. ³⁹When they are heated, I will prepare their feast and make them drunk so that they revel — then they will sleep an everlasting sleep and never wake, declares the LORD. ⁴⁰I will bring them down like lambs to the slaughter, like rams together with he-goats. ⁴¹How Sheshach is captured — the praise of all the earth seized! How Babylon has become an object of horror among the nations! ⁴²The sea has risen over Babylon; she is covered by the roar of its waves. ⁴³Her cities have become a desolation, a dry and barren land, a land where no one dwells and no human being passes through. ⁴⁴I will punish Bel in Babylon and force out of his mouth what he has swallowed. The nations will no longer stream to him — even the wall of Babylon has fallen. ⁴⁵Come out from her, my people! Each of you, save your own life from the fierce anger of the LORD! ⁴⁶Do not lose heart or be afraid when rumors are heard in the land — one year a rumor comes, and the next year another rumor, with violence in the land and ruler against ruler. ⁴⁷Therefore the days are coming when I will punish the idols of Babylon. Her whole land will be put to shame, and all her slain will fall in her midst. ⁴⁸Then the heavens and the earth and everything in them will shout for joy over Babylon, for the destroyers will come against her from the north, declares the LORD. ⁴⁹Just as Babylon caused the slain of Israel to fall, so at Babylon the slain of all the earth have fallen. ⁵⁰You who have escaped the sword — go! Do not stand still! Remember the LORD from far away, and let Jerusalem rise in your hearts. ⁵¹We are ashamed, for we have heard insults; disgrace has covered our faces because foreigners have entered the holy places of the house of the LORD. ⁵²Therefore the days are coming, declares the LORD, when I will punish her idols, and throughout her entire land the wounded will groan. ⁵³Even if Babylon were to ascend to the heavens, even if she were to fortify her lofty stronghold, destroyers will come against her from me, declares the LORD. ⁵⁴A sound of outcry from Babylon — great shattering from the land of the Chaldeans! ⁵⁵For the LORD is destroying Babylon and silencing her great voice. Their waves roar like mighty waters; the thunder of their voice is unleashed. ⁵⁶For a destroyer has come against her — against Babylon. Her warriors are captured; their bows are shattered, for the LORD is a God of recompense; he will surely repay in full. ⁵⁷I will make her officials and sages drunk, her governors, commanders, and warriors, and they will sleep an everlasting sleep and never wake, declares the King — the LORD of Hosts is his name. ⁵⁸This is what the LORD of Hosts says: The broad walls of Babylon will be completely torn down, and her high gates will be set on fire. The peoples labor for nothing, and the nations exhaust themselves for what the flames consume. ⁵⁹The instruction that Jeremiah the prophet gave to Seraiah son of Neriah, son of Mahseiah, when Seraiah went with Zedekiah king of Judah to Babylon in the fourth year of his reign. Seraiah was the quartermaster. ⁶⁰Jeremiah wrote on a single scroll all the disaster that would come upon Babylon — all these words that are written against Babylon. ⁶¹Jeremiah said to Seraiah, "When you arrive in Babylon, make sure you read aloud all these words. ⁶²Then say: LORD, you yourself have spoken against this place, declaring that it will be cut off so that no one will dwell in it — neither human nor animal — for it will be an everlasting desolation. ⁶³When you finish reading this scroll, tie a stone to it and throw it into the middle of the Euphrates.

⁶⁴Then say: So shall Babylon sink, never to rise again, because of the disaster I am bringing upon her. And they will collapse in exhaustion."

Thus far are the words of Jeremiah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase lev qamai ('the heart of those who rise against me') is widely recognized as an atbash cipher — a Hebrew code where letters are substituted in reverse alphabetical order — for kasdim ('Chaldeans'). The same technique appears in 25:26 where sheshakh encodes bavel ('Babylon'). We retain the surface meaning in the rendering with this note. The verb me'ir ('stirring up') indicates that God initiates this destruction actively, not merely permits it.
2. The verb zarah ('to winnow') pictures grain thrown into the wind so the chaff blows away — applied to Babylon, it means the nation will be scattered and sifted until nothing of value remains. The wordplay between bavel and zarim/zeruha (Babylon and the winnowers) reinforces the irony: Babylon the great will be blown away like chaff.
3. The verse is directed at Babylon's defenders, telling them resistance is futile. The verb hacharim ('devote to destruction') is the language of cherem — total consecration to God through annihilation. This same vocabulary was used for Israel's conquest of Canaan, now turned against Babylon. The irony is devastating: the instrument of God's judgment is now itself under the ban.
4. The parallelism between chahal ('slain') and meduqarim ('pierced through') intensifies the carnage. The phrase 'in her streets' echoes the language used earlier for Jerusalem's own destruction (Lamentations 2:21), creating a grim reciprocity — what Babylon did to Zion's streets now happens in Babylon's own.
5. The verb alman ('widowed') is striking — it casts the covenant relationship as a marriage, with exile as the apparent death of the spouse. But God declares the marriage is not over; Israel is not a widow. The word asham ('guilt') here denotes both the offense and the liability it creates. The title 'the Holy One of Israel' (qedosh yisra'el) is more characteristic of Isaiah but appears here to emphasize God's covenantal distinctness.
6. The command to flee Babylon is addressed to the Judean exiles living there — they must separate themselves before judgment falls. The verb damam in the nifal ('be silenced, be destroyed') carries the sense of being wiped out. The noun gemul ('recompense, what is deserved') implies strict proportional justice — Babylon will receive exactly what she gave.
7. The image of Babylon as a golden cup in God's hand is theologically explosive: Babylon's imperial conquest was God's instrument of judgment, but now the cup turns. The verb mesakkeret ('making drunk') connects to the cup-of-wrath motif in Jeremiah 25:15-29. The verb yitholelu ('go mad, rave') depicts the political chaos that follows Babylon's influence — the nations stagger like drunks.
8. The verb nishbarah ('is shattered') uses the same root as the shattering Babylon inflicted on others. The word tsori ('balm, resin') recalls Jeremiah 8:22 — 'Is there no balm in Gilead?' — creating a bitter echo. There was no healing for Judah's wound, and now there is none for Babylon's. The 'perhaps' (ulai) is ironic: the speaker knows there is no remedy.
9. The speakers here are likely the foreign nations who served Babylon — they tried to sustain the empire, but it is beyond saving. The phrase 'reaches to the heavens' echoes the Tower of Babel narrative (Genesis 11:4), where Babylon's builders said 'let us build a tower that reaches to the heavens.' Now it is Babylon's judgment, not her tower, that reaches heaven.

10. The word tsidqoteinu ('our righteousness/vindication') here carries the sense of legal vindication — God has demonstrated that Israel's cause was just by judging their oppressor. The shift from Babylon's judgment to Zion's declaration creates a liturgical moment: the exiles envision returning to tell the story.
11. The Medes are named as God's instrument, historically accurate since the Medo-Persian alliance under Cyrus conquered Babylon in 539 BCE. The phrase niqmat hekhalo ('vengeance for his temple') refers to the destruction of Solomon's temple in 586 BCE — God will avenge the desecration of his own dwelling place. The word mezimmah ('plan, purpose, device') emphasizes that Babylon's fall is not random but divinely orchestrated.
12. The military commands pile up in rapid succession — five imperatives in a single verse. The final clause affirms the prophetic-fulfillment principle: God both devises (zamam) and executes (asah) his word. The distinction between planning and doing emphasizes that prophetic speech is not wishful thinking but a declaration of what God has already determined.
13. Babylon was literally built on waterways — the Euphrates ran through the city, and an elaborate canal system sustained its agriculture and commerce. The phrase 'many waters' is both geographical and symbolic, evoking the cosmic waters of chaos that Babylon claimed to control. The word bitsa ('profit, unjust gain, plunder') denotes wealth gained through exploitation. The noun ammah ('cubit, measure') here functions as the limit God sets: Babylon's greed has been measured and found finished.
14. God swearing 'by himself' (benafsho, literally 'by his own life/soul') is the most solemn oath possible — there is no higher authority to swear by. The comparison to yeleq ('locusts') evokes the plague imagery of Joel and Exodus — an overwhelming, consuming force. The hedad ('war cry, shout') is the triumphal shout of harvesters or warriors, ironically applied here to Babylon's destruction.
15. This verse begins a hymnic section (vv. 15-19) that is nearly identical to Jeremiah 10:12-16, creating an inclusio within the book. Placed here in the Babylon oracle, it serves a polemical function: the God who judges Babylon is not a local deity but the creator of all things. The three parallel clauses ascribe three attributes to creation: power (koach), wisdom (chokhmah), and understanding (tevunah).
16. The phrase leqol titto ('at the sound of his giving') is rendered 'when he thunders' because the context describes God's voice as the thunderstorm. The 'storehouses' (otsrot) of wind is a cosmological image — God keeps the winds stored until he releases them, asserting sovereign control over weather, which Babylonian religion attributed to Marduk.
17. The verb niv'ar ('made brutish, rendered stupid') is a harsh assessment — idol-makers are not merely mistaken but rendered sub-rational by their craft. The phrase lo ruach bam ('no breath/spirit in them') is the definitive judgment on idols: they lack the animating breath (ruach) that God breathes into living things (Genesis 2:7). This directly contrasts with the living God described in vv. 15-16.
18. The word hevel ('vapor, breath, worthlessness') — the same word that dominates Ecclesiastes — dismisses idols as insubstantial. The phrase ma'aseh ta'tu'im ('work of mockery/delusion') suggests the idols are both deceptive and ridiculous. The 'time of reckoning' (et pequddatam) is the moment God calls all things to account.
19. This verse concludes the hymnic section by contrasting the living God with dead idols. The 'portion of Jacob' (cheleq ya'aqov) means that Israel's God is not an idol but the maker of everything. The word shevet ('tribe, staff, scepter') here designates Israel as God's particular possession among the nations. This verse is nearly identical to 10:16.
20. The noun mappets appears only here in the Hebrew Bible — it is coined for this context, derived from the verb nippets ('to shatter, smash to pieces'). We render it 'war-hammer' rather than 'battle-axe' (KJV) because the root describes blunt-force shattering, not cutting. The past tense 'shattered' and 'destroyed' (perfective verbs) is deliberate — God speaks of Babylon's role as already completed. What follows in vv. 21-23 is a litany of what God smashed with this hammer, building to the revelation that the hammer itself is now broken.
21. The repetitive 'with you I shattered' (venippatsti bekha) creates a litany that extends through verse 23. Each line names a category of human power — military, political, social — all crushed by God's war-hammer. The rhythm is deliberately incantatory, building to a devastating crescendo.
22. The litany moves from military targets (v. 21) to civilian ones — men, women, elderly, youth. The totality of destruction is the point: no category of person was exempt from the devastation God inflicted through Babylon. The merism 'old and young' encompasses the entire population.
23. The litany concludes by spanning all social roles — pastoral (shepherd), agricultural (farmer), and political (governors, officials). The words pachot ('governors') and seганим ('officials') are loan words from Akkadian, appropriate for an oracle about Babylon. The effect of the seven-fold repetition of 'with you I shattered' is cumulative: Babylon was the instrument of total devastation — and now that instrument is finished.
24. The verb shillamti ('I will repay, recompense') carries the sense of completing a payment — God will settle the account in full. The phrase le'eineikhem ('before your eyes') means the exiles will witness the reversal — the same people who watched Zion's destruction will see Babylon's.
25. Babylon was built on a flat plain, so 'mountain' (har) here is metaphorical — Babylon is a mountain of destructive power, towering over the nations. The image of being rolled down from the crags and becoming a 'scorched mountain' (har serefah) evokes volcanic destruction: the once-mighty peak reduced to burned-out rock from which no building stone can ever be quarried (v. 26). The verb gilgalti ('I will roll you') is vivid and physical — God pushes Babylon off the heights like a boulder.
26. The image is of total demolition — not even the rubble will be reusable. A city whose stones cannot serve as foundation material is a city permanently erased from civilization. The phrase shimmemot olam ('everlasting desolation') uses olam to indicate duration beyond the horizon of perception — Babylon will not recover within any foreseeable future.

27. The three kingdoms — Ararat (Urartu, in modern eastern Turkey/Armenia), Minni (the Manneans, south of Lake Urmia), and Ashkenaz (the Scythians) — are all peoples who came under Median control and participated in the assault on Babylon. The verb qaddesh ('consecrate, set apart') for military campaign uses holy-war language — the attack on Babylon is a sacred mission. The word tipsar ('commander, marshal') is an Akkadian loan word. The simile 'like bristling locusts' (keyelek samar) describes cavalry horses with their manes standing on end.
28. The Medes are again identified as the human agents of divine judgment. The repetition of 'consecrate' (qaddesh) reinforces the holy-war framework: this is not mere geopolitics but sacred action. The phrase 'every land under their rule' (kol erets memshaltô) indicates a coalition of vassal states under Median hegemony.
29. The verbs ra'ash ('tremble') and chul ('writhe, convulse') describe the earth itself reacting to God's judgment as if in labor pains. The phrase me'ein yoshev ('without an inhabitant') is the ultimate judgment formula in Jeremiah, recurring throughout the book (2:15, 4:7, 9:10, 33:10, 34:22, 44:22, 46:19) — a land without people is a land under the full weight of covenant curse.
30. The verb nasheta ('has dried up') pictures strength evaporating like water — the mighty warriors are drained of all power. The simile 'become like women' (hayu lenashim) reflects ancient Near Eastern war rhetoric where defeated warriors are compared to women as an expression of total military collapse. The breaking of bars (berichim) signifies the breaching of the city's defenses — Babylon's famous gates are forced open.
31. The breathless sequence of runners and messengers conveys the speed and panic of the city's fall. The phrase miqqatseh ('from the end') means the invaders have entered from the outskirts and are advancing inward — the king learns his city is falling section by section. According to Herodotus (1.191) and the Nabonidus Chronicle, the Persians entered Babylon by diverting the Euphrates and walking under the walls along the dried riverbed.
32. The ma'barot ('crossings, fords') are the strategic river passages through Babylon — whoever controls the Euphrates crossings controls the city. The agammim ('marshes, reed pools') surrounding Babylon are set ablaze, eliminating both cover and escape routes. The verb nivhalu ('are terrified, panic') describes the complete psychological collapse of the defending forces.
33. The threshing floor image (goren) layers two agricultural metaphors: the floor is trampled and prepared now, and soon the harvest (qatsir) — the full destruction — will arrive. The phrase 'Daughter Babylon' (bat bavel) personifies the city as a woman, consistent with ancient Near Eastern convention. The word hidrikhah ('treading, trampling') describes the oxen treading grain on the threshing floor, an image of being crushed underfoot.
34. Jerusalem speaks in the first person plural, voicing the experience of exile. The verb bela'anu ('swallowed us') compares Nebuchadnezzar to a tannin ('sea-serpent, dragon, great sea creature') — the primordial chaos monster of ancient Near Eastern mythology. The progression is vivid: devoured, crushed, emptied, swallowed, filled, expelled. The verb hedichanu ('cast us out, rinsed us away') carries the sense of being flushed out — Jerusalem was consumed and then discarded.
35. Zion and Jerusalem speak as plaintiff and witness, demanding that the violence (chamas) and bloodshed (dam) they suffered be returned upon Babylon. The word she'eri ('my flesh, my body') makes the suffering physical and personal — not abstract political loss but bodily violation. This is a legal cry for justice, not mere vengeance.
36. God responds to Zion's legal cry (v. 35) by taking up her case (riv) — the language is forensic, depicting God as both advocate and judge. The drying up of Babylon's 'sea' (yam) and 'springs' (maqor) refers to the elaborate water systems that sustained the city. Without the Euphrates and its canal network, Babylon cannot survive. Historically, Cyrus diverted the Euphrates to enter the city.
37. The word gallim ('heaps, stone piles') reduces Babylon from the world's greatest city to rubble. The tannim here is 'jackals' (not the tannin 'sea-serpent' of v. 34 — different Hebrew words). The phrase shammah ushreqah ('horror and hissing') describes the reaction of passersby — they gasp in shock and hiss in contempt at the ruins.
38. The Babylonians are compared to lions in their ferocity — kefirim ('young lions') and gorei arayot ('lion cubs') are still dangerous but not fully mature, suggesting Babylon's power is past its prime. The verbs yish'agu ('they roar') and na'aru ('they growl') create an animal soundscape of predatory aggression.
39. The word bechumam ('in their heat, when they are inflamed') may refer to intoxication at a feast or to the heat of battle fever. We follow the feast interpretation since the next clause describes drinking. The phrase shenat olam ('everlasting sleep') is a euphemism for death — the drunken revelry becomes a permanent stupor. Historically, ancient sources report that Babylon fell during a feast (Daniel 5; Herodotus 1.191; Xenophon, Cyropaedia 7.5.15).
40. The sacrificial imagery is deliberate — karim ('lambs'), elim ('rams'), and attudim ('he-goats') are all sacrificial animals. Babylon's destruction is portrayed as a sacrifice to God, reversing the language of worship: the empire that destroyed God's temple now becomes an offering on God's altar.
41. Sheshakh is the atbash cipher for Bavel ('Babylon') — the same code used in 25:26. The letters b-b-l become sh-sh-k when each letter is replaced by its reverse-alphabet counterpart. The phrase tehillat kol ha'arets ('the praise of all the earth') is used ironically — the city that was admired by every nation has become shameful. The exclamatory eikh ('How!') is the same word that opens Lamentations, creating a deliberate echo between Jerusalem's fall and Babylon's.
42. The 'sea' (yam) here is metaphorical — the invading armies are compared to a flood of chaotic waters overwhelming the city. This inverts Babylon's own self-image: in Babylonian mythology, Marduk conquered the chaos-sea Tiamat. Now the chaos-waters conquer Babylon. The verb nikhsatah ('she is covered, overwhelmed') pictures total submersion.

43. Three terms pile up for the wasteland: shamamah ('desolation'), tsiyyah ('dry land'), and aravah ('steppe, wilderness'). The phrase ben adam ('son of man, human being') is used in its generic sense — not a single human will traverse this land. The total absence of human life reverses the divine blessing of filling and subduing the earth (Genesis 1:28).
44. Bel (from the Akkadian belu, 'lord') is the title of Marduk, Babylon's chief deity. The image of forcing out what Bel has swallowed refers to the captive peoples and temple treasures that Babylon consumed — God will make Marduk disgorge his plunder. The verb yinharu ('stream, flow') describes the tributary nations who once flowed toward Babylon like rivers toward the sea — that tide has reversed. The fall of Babylon's wall (chomat bavel) signals the end of what was considered the greatest fortification in the ancient world.
45. The command ammi ('my people') is addressed to the Judean exiles in Babylon — they must physically separate from the doomed city. The phrase charon af YHWH ('fierce anger of the LORD') is literally 'the burning of the LORD's nostrils,' a physiological metaphor for wrath. This call to 'come out' anticipates Isaiah 48:20 and Revelation 18:4.
46. The word shemu'ah ('rumor, report, news') repeats three times, capturing the anxiety of exile life — each year brings a new alarming report. The phrase moshel al moshel ('ruler against ruler') describes the power struggles within the Babylonian empire during its final years. The exiles must not mistake these upheavals for the end — the final judgment will come in God's time.
47. The verb paqad ('punish, attend to, visit') is used for divine reckoning against Babylon's idols (pesilei bavel). The word pesil ('carved image, idol') targets the physical representations of Babylonian religion. When God punishes the idols, the entire theological claim of Babylon — that its gods sustain the empire — is exposed as false.
48. The cosmic response — heavens, earth, and everything in them singing — elevates Babylon's fall to a creation-wide event. The irony is sharp: 'from the north' (mitsafon) echoes Jeremiah's early oracles where judgment came on Judah 'from the north' (1:13-15, 4:6, 6:1). Now the northern threat turns against Babylon itself.
49. The parallelism creates strict reciprocity: Babylon caused Israel's dead to fall, and now Babylon's own dead fall — along with the dead of every nation she consumed. The gam...gam ('also...also') construction emphasizes exact proportionality in divine justice.
50. This verse is addressed to the Judean exiles who will survive Babylon's fall. The command 'do not stand still' (al ta'amodu) urges immediate departure — do not linger in the collapsing empire. The phrase 'let Jerusalem rise in your hearts' (virushalaim ta'aleh al levavkhem) is deeply poignant: the exiles must carry Jerusalem within them as they journey home. The verb 'rise' (ta'aleh) is the same root as 'go up' (alah), the technical term for pilgrimage to Jerusalem.
51. The exiles speak, confessing their shame at the desecration of the temple. The word miqdeshei ('holy places, sanctuaries') of the LORD's house refers to the inner sacred spaces that only authorized priests could enter — foreigners in the holy of holies is the ultimate violation. The emotion is both national humiliation and religious horror.
52. God responds to the exiles' shame (v. 51) with a promise of action against Babylon's idols. The verb ye'enoq ('groan, moan') is onomatopoeic — the sound of the word mimics the groan of the dying. This auditory detail makes the judgment visceral: Babylon will be filled with the sound of suffering.
53. The language echoes the Tower of Babel (Genesis 11:4) — even if Babylon builds to heaven itself, God will bring her down. The verb tevatser ('fortify, make inaccessible') suggests a fortress so high it seems unreachable. But no height is beyond God's reach. The phrase me'itti ('from me') emphasizes that the destroyers come as God's agents — this is not random conquest but divine commission.
54. The noun shever ('shattering, breaking, destruction') is the same root as the verb used for shattering throughout the war-hammer litany (vv. 20-23). The shatterer is now shattered — the wordplay completes the reversal. The verse is pure sound: ze'aqah ('outcry') and shever gadol ('great shattering') create an auditory image of collapse.
55. The 'great voice' (qol gadol) that God silences is Babylon's imperial proclamation — the voice of command that ruled the nations. The 'waves' (gallim) continue the sea metaphor from v. 42 — the invading forces are an unstoppable flood. The word she'on ('thunder, roar, tumult') describes the overwhelming noise of the assault, drowning out Babylon's silenced voice.
56. The title el gemulot ('God of recompense/repayment') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible — it defines God's character in terms of exact justice. The emphatic infinitive absolute shallem yeshallem ('he will surely, fully repay') guarantees that the debt will be collected in its entirety. The broken bows (qashshot) symbolize the end of Babylon's military capability.
57. The divine title 'the King' (ha-melekh) is placed in direct contrast with Babylon's human rulers — God outranks every official, sage, governor, and warrior just listed. The five categories of leadership (officials, sages, governors, commanders, warriors) represent the full apparatus of imperial power, all rendered unconscious by divine judgment. The phrase 'everlasting sleep' (shenat olam) repeats from v. 39, reinforcing the finality of death.
58. Babylon's walls were legendary — Herodotus reports them as 56 miles long, 80 feet thick, and 320 feet high (likely exaggerated, but reflecting their fame). The verb 'ar'er tit'ar'ar is an emphatic infinitive absolute meaning 'will surely, completely be torn down.' The closing proverb about laboring for nothing and for fire echoes Habakkuk 2:13 almost verbatim — the nations build empires that God reduces to ash.
59. This verse begins the sign-act narrative that closes the Babylon oracle (vv. 59-64). Seraiah son of Neriah is the brother of Baruch son of Neriah, Jeremiah's scribe (32:12) — both brothers serve the prophet. The title sar menuchah is debated: KJV renders it 'quiet prince,' but it more likely means 'quartermaster' or 'officer of rest stops' — the official responsible for the delegation's lodging during the journey to Babylon. Zedekiah's trip to Babylon in his fourth year (594/593 BCE) was likely to demonstrate continued loyalty after unrest in the region.

60. The word sefer ('scroll, book, document') refers to a parchment or papyrus scroll. The phrase sefer echad ('a single scroll') emphasizes that all the Babylon oracles (chapters 50-51) were gathered into one document for this specific mission. This is a rare glimpse into the physical production of prophetic literature — the oracle is not just spoken but written, transported, and performed.
61. The verb qara ('read, call out, proclaim') means to read aloud, not silently. Seraiah is to publicly proclaim the oracle against Babylon while standing in Babylon — an extraordinarily dangerous act of prophetic theater. The verb ra'ita ('and you shall see') may mean 'survey' or 'observe' — Seraiah should witness Babylon's grandeur and then read God's sentence against it.
62. Seraiah is to address God directly while standing in the heart of Babylon — a prayer that God fulfill his own word. The merism 'from human to animal' (me'adam ve'ad behemah) indicates the reversal of creation itself in that place: where God made both humanity and animals to inhabit the earth, Babylon will have neither. The phrase shimmemot olam ('everlasting desolation') repeats from v. 26, forming a frame around the oracle.
63. The sign-act reaches its climax: the written word of God is physically enacted. The stone (even) ensures the scroll sinks — it will not float or be recovered. The Euphrates (Perat) was Babylon's lifeline, the river that ran through the city center. Throwing the oracle into the Euphrates is throwing God's judgment into the heart of Babylon. The act is both symbolic and irrevocable — once sunk, the scroll cannot be retrieved, and neither can the judgment be reversed.
64. The verb tishqa ('sink, submerge') is the interpretive key to the entire sign-act: as the stone-weighted scroll sinks to the riverbed, so Babylon will sink beneath the weight of divine judgment. The phrase velo taqum ('and will not rise') makes the sinking permanent — there is no resurfacing. The colophon 'Thus far are the words of Jeremiah' (ad hennah divrei yirmeyahu) is a scribal notation marking the end of the prophetic collection. Everything that follows in chapter 52 is historical appendix, drawn from the same tradition as 2 Kings 24-25. This colophon is one of the clearest editorial markers in the prophetic books, indicating that the book of Jeremiah was compiled and edited by hands other than the prophet's — likely Baruch or a later scribal circle.

Summary: Jeremiah 52 is the historical appendix to the book, closely paralleling 2 Kings 24:18-25:30. It narrates the final events of Judah's kingdom: Zedekiah's rebellion, the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem, the city's breach, Zedekiah's capture and blinding, the destruction of the temple and city walls, the deportation of the population, and the appointment of officials over the remnant. The chapter includes a unique three-part deportation census (vv. 28-30) not found in 2 Kings, providing specific numbers for three separate deportations. The book closes with the release of King Jehoiachin from Babylonian prison by Evil-Merodach (Amel-Marduk) — a quiet note of hope at the end of catastrophe.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter functions as the historical verification of everything Jeremiah prophesied. The prophet warned of siege, destruction, exile, and the fall of the Davidic monarchy — chapter 52 shows it all fulfilled. The deportation numbers in verses 28-30 (3,023 + 832 + 745 = 4,600 total) are significantly lower than the round numbers in 2 Kings 24:14-16 (10,000 + 8,000), likely because Jeremiah's count records only adult males while Kings includes families, or because they count different deportation events. The discrepancy is historically significant and we note it without resolving it. The final scene — Jehoiachin eating at the king's table in Babylon — echoes the covenant meals of the patriarchs and provides the book's only forward-looking moment: the Davidic line survives. We preserve the matter-of-fact prose register of this chapter, which reads like royal annals rather than prophetic poetry.

Translation Friction: *The parallel with 2 Kings 25 required constant cross-referencing to identify where Jeremiah 52 diverges — the deportation numbers (vv. 28-30) are the most significant unique material. The dating formulas use both regnal years and calendar months, requiring careful rendering. The word pinnah ('corner') in verse 23 is traditionally rendered 'on a side' but may indicate a specific architectural feature of the temple pillars. The name Evil-Merodach (v. 31) is the Hebrew rendering of the Babylonian name Amel-Marduk ('man of Marduk') — we retain the biblical form with a note on the original. Throughout the chapter, the prose is deliberately spare and archival, and we resisted the temptation to add rhetorical color that the Hebrew does not contain.*

Connections: This chapter parallels 2 Kings 24:18-25:30 almost word for word, with key differences. It also reprises Jeremiah's own prophecies: the siege fulfills 21:3-10 and 34:1-5; the burning of the temple fulfills 7:14; Zedekiah's capture fulfills 32:3-5 and 34:3; the exile fulfills 25:11. Jehoiachin's release connects to 22:24-30 (the signet-ring oracle) and forward to Zerubbabel, Jehoiachin's grandson, who leads the return (Haggai 2:23, where God reverses the signet-ring image). The deportation numbers provide data found nowhere else in the ¹Zedekiah was twenty-one years old when he became king, and he reigned eleven years in Jerusalem. His mother's name was Hamutal daughter of Jeremiah of Libnah. ²He did what was evil in the eyes of the LORD, just as Jehoiakim had done. ³For because of the anger of the LORD, things reached the point in Jerusalem and Judah that he cast them out from his presence. And Zedekiah rebelled against the king of Babylon. ⁴In the ninth year of his reign, in the tenth month, on the tenth day of the month, Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon came with his entire army against Jerusalem. They encamped against it and built siege works all around it. ⁵The city remained under siege until the eleventh year of King Zedekiah. ⁶In the fourth month, on the ninth day of the month, the famine in the city was so severe that there was no bread for the people of the land. ⁷Then the city wall was breached. All the soldiers fled, leaving the city at night by way of the gate between the two walls near the king's garden, even though the Chaldeans surrounded the city. They made their way toward the Arabah. ⁸The Chaldean army pursued the king and overtook Zedekiah in the plains of Jericho. His entire army scattered away from him. ⁹They captured the king and brought him up to the king of Babylon at Riblah in the land of Hamath, where he passed sentence on him. ¹⁰The king of Babylon slaughtered the sons of Zedekiah before his eyes. He also slaughtered all the officials of Judah at Riblah. ¹¹Then he blinded Zedekiah, bound him in bronze shackles, and the king of Babylon brought him to Babylon and put him in the house of custody until the day of his death. ¹²In the fifth month, on the tenth day of the month — the nineteenth year of King Nebuchadnezzar king of Babylon — Nebuzaradan, the captain of the guard, who served the king of Babylon, entered Jerusalem. ¹³He burned the house of the LORD, the king's palace, and every house in Jerusalem — every large building he burned with fire. ¹⁴The entire Chaldean army that was with the captain of the guard tore down all the walls of Jerusalem on every side. ¹⁵Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard deported some of the poorest people, the rest of the population remaining in the city, the deserters who had gone over to the king of Babylon, and the rest of the craftsmen. ¹⁶But Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard left some of the poorest people of the land as vine-workers and field-laborers. ¹⁷The Chaldeans broke apart the bronze pillars of the house of the LORD, the stands, and the bronze sea that was in the house of the LORD, and carried all their bronze to Babylon. ¹⁸They also took the pots, the shovels, the wick-trimmers, the basins, the ladles, and all the bronze implements used in the service. ¹⁹The captain of the guard also took the thresholds, the fire pans, the basins, the pots, the lampstands, the ladles, and the drink-offering bowls — whatever was gold, as gold, and whatever was silver, as silver. ²⁰The two pillars, the one sea, and the twelve bronze bulls that were beneath it, which King Solomon had made for the house of the LORD — the bronze of all these items was beyond weighing. ²¹As for the pillars, the height of one pillar was eighteen cubits, its circumference twelve cubits, its thickness four fingers — it was hollow. ²²A bronze capital was on top of it, and the height of one capital was five cubits, with latticework and pomegranates all around the capital — all of bronze. The second pillar was the same, with pomegranates. ²³There were ninety-six pomegranates facing outward; in all, there were one hundred pomegranates on the latticework all around. ²⁴The captain of the guard took Seraiah the chief priest, Zephaniah the second priest, and the three keepers of the threshold. ²⁵From the city he took a court official who had been commander over the soldiers, seven men from the king's inner circle who were found in the city, the secretary of the army commander who mustered the people of the land, and sixty men of the people of the land who were found inside the city. ²⁶Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard took them and brought them to the king of Babylon at Riblah. ²⁷The king of Babylon struck them down and put them to death at Riblah in the land of Hamath. So Judah went into exile from its own soil. ²⁸This is the number of people Nebuchadnezzar deported: in the seventh year, 3,023 Judeans; ²⁹in the eighteenth year of Nebuchadnezzar, 832 people from Jerusalem; ³⁰in the twenty-third year of Nebuchadnezzar, Nebuzaradan the captain of the guard deported 745 Judeans. The total number of people deported was 4,600. ³¹In the thirty-seventh year of the exile of Jehoiachin king of Judah, in the twelfth month, on the twenty-fifth day of the month, Evil-Merodach king of Babylon, in the year he became king, lifted the head of Jehoiachin king of Judah and released him from prison. ³²He spoke kindly to him and set his throne above the thrones of the other kings who were with him in Babylon. ³³He changed out of his prison garments and ate regularly at the king's table for the rest of his life. ³⁴His allowance was a regular allowance given to him by the king of Babylon, a daily portion, until the day of his death — all the days of his life.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This is the standard regnal formula used for Judean kings. Hamutal was also the mother of Jehoahaz (2 Kings 23:31), making Zedekiah and Jehoahaz full brothers. The 'Jeremiah of Libnah' here is not the prophet — it is a common name. Libnah was a Judean city in the Shephelah near Lachish.
2. The evaluation formula 'he did what was evil in the eyes of the LORD' (vayyaas hara be'einei YHWH) is the standard negative verdict used for Judean and Israelite kings throughout Kings and Chronicles. Comparing Zedekiah to Jehoiaquim rather than to his father Josiah makes the judgment sharper — he followed the worst recent model rather than the best.
3. The phrase hishlikho otam me'al panav ('he cast them out from his presence') is the theological thesis of the entire chapter: exile is expulsion from God's presence. The verb hishlikh ('cast, hurl') is violent — not a gentle dismissal but a forcible ejection. Zedekiah's rebellion against Nebuchadnezzar was the proximate political cause of the siege, but the text frames it as occurring within God's anger — the political act is embedded in a theological framework.
4. The date — the tenth of Tevet, 588 BCE — became a permanent Jewish fast day (Zechariah 8:19) commemorating the beginning of the siege. The word dayeq ('siege works, siege wall') refers to the earthen ramps and wooden fortifications used to encircle and starve a besieged city. The precision of the dating reflects annalistic record-keeping — the scribes knew the exact day the siege began.
5. The siege lasted approximately eighteen months — from January 588 to July 586 BCE. The brevity of this verse belies the catastrophic suffering: famine, disease, and social collapse are documented in Lamentations 2:11-12, 4:4-10 and Ezekiel 4:9-17. The terse style is characteristic of annalistic prose.
6. The ninth of Tammuz (July 586 BCE) is the date of the famine's extremity — later tradition associates this with the seventeenth of Tammuz, another fast day. The phrase am ha'arets ('people of the land') here refers to the common population of Jerusalem, the civilian non-elite who suffered most from the siege. The verb chazaq ('was strong, severe') describes the famine as an overwhelming force.
7. The verb tivvaqa ('was breached, broken through') is the technical military term for a wall being pierced by siege operations. The gate 'between the two walls' (bein hachmotayim) was in the southeastern corner of the city, near the Kidron Valley — it offered a narrow escape route toward the Jordan Rift Valley. The Arabah is the Jordan Valley depression extending south to the Dead Sea. The nighttime escape reveals the desperation of the defenders.
8. The plains of Jericho (arvot yericho) are about fifteen miles east of Jerusalem — Zedekiah did not get far. The verb nafotsu ('scattered') uses the same root as mappets ('war-hammer') in 51:20 — a bitter irony: the nation that shattered others is itself shattered. The king is abandoned by his own army, left alone to face capture.
9. Riblah was Nebuchadnezzar's military headquarters in central Syria (modern Lebanon/Syria border region), strategically located on the Orontes River. The phrase vayedabber itto mishpatim ('he spoke judgments with him') means Nebuchadnezzar held a formal judicial proceeding — this was not summary execution but a vassal trial for treaty violation. Zedekiah had sworn loyalty by oath (2 Chronicles 36:13, Ezekiel 17:13-19), and his rebellion was legally prosecutable under ancient Near Eastern treaty law.
10. The verb shachat ('slaughtered') is the same verb used for sacrificial slaughter — the execution of Zedekiah's sons is described with deliberate brutality. The phrase le'evinav ('before his eyes') emphasizes that this was designed as psychological torture — the last sight Zedekiah would ever see (v. 11). Killing the royal sons eliminated potential future claimants to the throne — a standard practice in ancient Near Eastern political punishment.
11. The verb ivver ('blinded') describes the physical mutilation of gouging out the eyes — a punishment attested in Assyrian and Babylonian records for rebellious vassals. The detail fulfills both Jeremiah's prophecy that Zedekiah would 'see the king of Babylon's eyes' (32:4, 34:3) and Ezekiel's seemingly contradictory prophecy that Zedekiah would go to Babylon but not 'see' it (Ezekiel 12:13). The bronze shackles (nechushtayim) may echo Samson's fate (Judges 16:21), another blinded prisoner. The 'house of custody' (beit ha-pequddot) is a Babylonian prison.
12. The date is the tenth of Av (August 586 BCE). Second Kings 25:8 gives the seventh of Av — the discrepancy of three days is unexplained and likely reflects different records or different stages of the destruction. The ninth of Av (Tisha B'Av) became the traditional fast day, splitting the difference. Nebuzaradan's title rav tabbachim (literally 'chief of the butchers/slaughterers') was the standard title for the commander of the royal bodyguard — an Akkadian administrative title, not a description of his actions, though the literal meaning is grimly appropriate.
13. The house of the LORD (beit YHWH) is Solomon's temple, which had stood for approximately 370 years. The systematic nature of the burning — temple, palace, private houses, and all major structures — indicates deliberate demolition, not collateral damage. The phrase kol beit hagadol ('every large building') may mean 'every house of a great person' (i.e., the aristocratic houses) or 'every great house' in terms of size. This verse fulfills Jeremiah 7:14 — 'I will do to this house what I did to Shiloh.'
14. The verb natsetsu ('tore down, demolished') indicates systematic dismantling, not mere breaching. City walls were symbols of identity and security — their destruction left Jerusalem defenseless and politically nullified. Archaeological evidence confirms massive destruction layers in Jerusalem dating to this period.
15. The deportees fall into categories: the poor (dallot ha'am), the remaining residents, the defectors (nofelim, literally 'those who fell' to the Babylonian side), and the craftsmen (amon, 'artisans, skilled workers'). Babylon's deportation policy targeted skilled laborers and potential leaders while leaving subsistence farmers to work the land (v. 16). The word nofelim for defectors is loaded — those who 'fell to' Babylon during the siege may have followed Jeremiah's counsel (21:9, 38:2).

16. The words koremim ('vine-workers') and yogevim ('field-laborers, plowmen') indicate that the Babylonians maintained agricultural production in Judah — the land was not abandoned but worked by a remnant of impoverished farmers. This economic calculation — deport the skilled, keep the unskilled to work the soil — was standard Babylonian imperial policy.
17. The bronze pillars (Jachin and Boaz, cf. 1 Kings 7:15-22), the movable stands (mekhonot, cf. 1 Kings 7:27-37), and the bronze sea (yam hanechoset, cf. 1 Kings 7:23-26) were the major bronze furnishings of Solomon's temple. The verb shibberu ('they broke apart') indicates they were too large to transport whole — the Babylonians dismantled them for the metal. The temple was not merely burned but systematically stripped of its valuable metals.
18. The inventory of temple vessels catalogues the items used in daily sacrificial service: sirot ('pots' for boiling offerings), ya'im ('shovels' for ash removal), mezammerot ('wick-trimmers' for the lampstand), mizraqot ('basins' for catching and throwing sacrificial blood), and kappot ('ladles' or 'pans' for incense). The detailed listing emphasizes the completeness of the plunder — every implement of worship was confiscated.
19. The phrase asher zahav zahav va'asher kesef kasef ('what was gold as gold, what was silver as silver') indicates that the metals were catalogued and collected by type — the Babylonians were meticulous in their plunder. The sippim may be 'thresholds' or 'bowls' (the Hebrew is ambiguous). The menaqiyot ('drink-offering bowls') were used for libation offerings.
20. The twelve bronze bulls (baqar, literally 'oxen, cattle') supported the bronze sea on their backs (1 Kings 7:25). The phrase lo hayah mishqal ('there was no weight,' i.e., 'beyond weighing') indicates the quantity of bronze was so vast it could not be practically measured. According to 1 Kings 7:47, Solomon's bronze work was 'exceedingly great' in quantity. The mention of Solomon by name connects the destruction to its builder, completing the arc from construction to demolition.
21. The dimensions are given precisely: eighteen cubits high (approximately 27 feet / 8.2 meters), twelve cubits in circumference (approximately 18 feet / 5.5 meters), and four fingers thick (approximately 3 inches / 7.6 cm). The note that the pillar was hollow (navuv) indicates it was cast as a cylinder, not solid — a significant feat of bronze-casting technology. These measurements describe the pillars Jachin and Boaz (1 Kings 7:15-22).
22. The koteret ('capital') was the decorative crown atop each pillar, five cubits high (approximately 7.5 feet / 2.3 meters). The sevakah ('latticework, network') and rimmonim ('pomegranates') were ornamental features — pomegranates symbolized fertility and abundance in ancient Israelite art. The description matches 1 Kings 7:17-20 with minor variations.
23. The number discrepancy — ninety-six visible ('facing outward,' ruchah, literally 'toward the wind/air') versus one hundred total — means four pomegranates were concealed at the attachment points of the latticework. This architectural detail is unique to Jeremiah 52; it does not appear in the Kings parallel. The precision of the count (even noting hidden pomegranates) reflects the archival nature of this record.
24. This Seraiah the chief priest is not the same Seraiah as in 51:59. The three ranks of priestly leadership are named: the chief priest (kohen ha-rosh), the second priest (kohen ha-mishneh), and the threshold keepers (shomrei ha-saf). These were the senior religious officials of the temple. Their arrest and execution (v. 27) eliminated the priestly leadership of Judah.
25. The saris ('court official,' sometimes 'eunuch') was a military overseer. The 'seven men who saw the king's face' (shiv'ah anashim mero'ei fenei ha-melek) were members of the royal privy council — only the most trusted advisors had direct access to the king. The number is seven in Jeremiah versus five in 2 Kings 25:19 — another discrepancy between the parallel accounts. The sixty men from the general population may have been civic leaders or elders.
26. The prisoners are transported from Jerusalem to Riblah in Syria — a journey of approximately 200 miles — to face Nebuchadnezzar's judgment in person. The deliberate transport to the king's headquarters rather than summary execution in Jerusalem indicates these were political prisoners whose fate Nebuchadnezzar determined personally.
27. The final clause — vayyigel yehudah me'al admato ('Judah went into exile from its own soil') — is the theological summary of the entire catastrophe. The word adamah ('soil, ground') connects to adam ('human being') and to the Edenic creation narrative — exile from the land is a second expulsion from the garden. The covenant promised land; exile is the covenant's ultimate curse (Deuteronomy 28:63-64).
28. This deportation census (vv. 28-30) is unique to Jeremiah 52 — it does not appear in 2 Kings 25 and is one of the most important historical records in the chapter. The 'seventh year' of Nebuchadnezzar (598/597 BCE) corresponds to the first deportation, when Jehoiachin surrendered. The number 3,023 is far lower than the 10,000 given in 2 Kings 24:14 — the discrepancy likely reflects different counting methods: Jeremiah may count only adult males, or only those from Jerusalem, while Kings includes families and surrounding territory.
29. The 'eighteenth year' (587/586 BCE) corresponds to the siege and fall of Jerusalem. The word nefesh ('soul, person, life') is used as the counting unit — literally '832 souls.' This number seems remarkably low for the main deportation following the city's destruction, reinforcing the probability that these counts represent only a specific category (perhaps adult male citizens of Jerusalem proper, not the broader population of Judah).
30. The third deportation in Nebuchadnezzar's twenty-third year (582/581 BCE) is otherwise unknown from biblical sources — it may relate to the aftermath of Gedaliah's assassination (Jeremiah 41) and the resulting disorder. The grand total of 4,600 (3,023 + 832 + 745) is strikingly modest compared to the tens of thousands mentioned in Kings. If these numbers are accurate and represent adult males, the total exiled community including women, children, and dependents may have been 15,000-20,000. These figures are among the most debated numbers in biblical historiography.

31. Evil-Merodach (Hebrew form of the Babylonian name Amel-Marduk, meaning 'man of Marduk') succeeded Nebuchadnezzar in 562 BCE. The phrase nasa rosh ('lifted the head') is an idiom meaning 'showed favor to' or 'pardoned' — it carries the sense of raising someone from a lowered, defeated posture. Jehoiachin had been imprisoned for thirty-seven years since his surrender in 597 BCE. Babylonian administrative tablets (the 'Jehoiachin rations tablets') confirm that Jehoiachin was housed and fed in Babylon, corroborating this account.
32. The phrase dibber itto tovot ('spoke good things to him') indicates a formal change of status, not merely polite conversation. Setting Jehoiachin's throne above the other captive kings means he was given precedence — the Davidic king, though a prisoner, held the highest rank among Babylon's royal captives. The 'other kings' were rulers of various conquered nations also held in Babylon.
33. The changing of garments (shinnah et bigdei kil'o) symbolizes a change of status — from prisoner to honored guest. The phrase akhal lechem lefanav tamid ('ate bread before him continually') means Jehoiachin dined at the king's own table — a mark of the highest favor, echoing Mephibosheth eating at David's table (2 Samuel 9:7). This image of a Davidic king eating at a foreign king's table is the book's final word: not triumph, but survival. The Davidic line endures.
34. The final verse of Jeremiah ends not with a bang but with quiet sustenance: a daily food ration (aruchat tamid, 'continual allowance') given day by day (devar yom beyomo, 'the matter of a day in its day'). The repetition of 'all the days of his life' (kol yemei chayyav) from verse 33 emphasizes permanence — this provision never stopped. The book that began with the call of a prophet and moved through national catastrophe ends with a meal. The Davidic king lives; the line is not extinguished. From Jehoiachin's line will come Zerubbabel, who leads the return from exile (1 Chronicles 3:17-19, Ezra 3:2). This quiet ending is the book's final theological statement: judgment is real, but God's covenant with David's house endures beyond the ruins.

Lamentations

Summary: Lamentations 1 opens with the anguished cry 'Eikhah!' — 'How!' — as the poet gazes upon the desolation of Jerusalem after the Babylonian destruction of 586 BCE. The city is personified as a widow, once great among the nations, now reduced to forced labor. The first half (vv. 1-11) is the poet's third-person lament over Zion's ruin; the second half (vv. 12-22) shifts to Jerusalem herself speaking in the first person, crying out to passersby to witness her suffering. The chapter is structured as an acrostic poem: each of its 22 verses begins with a successive letter of the Hebrew alphabet, from aleph to tav, imposing artistic order on the chaos of destruction.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Hebrew title of the book is 'Eikhah' — the first word, meaning 'How!' — a cry of stunned disbelief. This same word opens chapters 2 and 4 as well. The acrostic structure is not mere literary decoration; it serves a theological function, expressing totality — grief from aleph to tav, from A to Z. The personification of Jerusalem as a weeping widow draws on ancient Near Eastern city-lament traditions (Sumerian laments for Ur and Nippur predate this by a millennium). Though traditionally attributed to Jeremiah, the text itself is anonymous, and the Talmud records debate about authorship. The shift from third-person description to first-person speech at verse 12 is one of the most powerful voice changes in biblical poetry — the city herself interrupts the poet to speak her own pain. The phrase 'Is there any sorrow like my sorrow?' (v. 12) became foundational in Jewish liturgical tradition and in Christian devotion (applied to Christ's passion).

Translation Friction: The Hebrew niddah in verse 8 ('she has become unclean / a filthy thing') carries connotations of menstrual impurity — Jerusalem's sin is likened to ritual uncleanness. We rendered this faithfully without euphemism but noted the cultural context. The word sarnei in verse 15 (KJV 'mighty men') actually means 'bulls' or 'warriors' — we rendered it as 'warriors' with a note on the metaphor. The ayin-pe letter order in this chapter follows the standard alphabetic sequence, unlike chapters 2-4 which reverse pe and ayin — a textual variant scholars debate. The verb tzivvah ('he commanded') in verse 17 uses military language for God's summoning of enemies against Jerusalem, which we preserved.

Connections: The city-as-widow image connects to Isaiah 54:1-6 (the barren woman restored) and Revelation 18 (the fall of Babylon). The phrase 'no comforter' (ein menahem) repeats five times in this chapter, establishing a theme that the book of Isaiah answers: 'Comfort, comfort my people' (Isaiah 40:1, using the same root n-h-m). The cry 'Look, LORD, and see' (v. 11) anticipates the same cry in 2:20 and 5:1. The acrostic form connects to Psalms 9-10, 25, 34, 37, 111, 112, 119, and 145, as well as Proverbs 31:10-31. Jerusalem speaking in first person anticipates the personal lament of chapter 3.

¹How she sits alone,
the city once teeming with people!
She has become like a widow —
she who was great among the nations.
A princess among the provinces,
she has been put to forced labor.

²She weeps bitterly in the night,
tears streaming down her cheeks.
Among all who loved her,
none brings her comfort.
All her allies have betrayed her;
they have become her enemies.

³Judah has gone into exile
under affliction and harsh servitude.
She dwells among the nations
but finds no resting place.
All who pursued her overtook her in the narrow passes.

⁴The roads to Zion mourn
because no one comes to the appointed feasts.
All her gates are desolate;
her priests groan,
her young women grieve,
and she herself is in bitter anguish.

⁵Her enemies have gained the upper hand;
her foes are at ease.
For the LORD has caused her grief
because of the abundance of her transgressions.
Her children have gone away,
captives driven before the enemy.

⁶All her splendor has departed from Daughter Zion.
Her leaders have become like deer that find no pasture —
they stumble on without strength before the pursuer.

⁷In the days of her affliction and wandering, Jerusalem remembers all the precious things that were hers in days of old.
When her people fell into the hand of the enemy
with no one to help her,

the adversaries looked at her and laughed at her downfall.

⁸Jerusalem has sinned grievously;
for this she has become an object of scorn.
All who once honored her now despise her,
for they have seen her nakedness.
She herself groans and turns her face away.

⁹Her uncleanness clings to her skirts;
she gave no thought to her future.
Her fall has been staggering,
and there is no one to comfort her.
"Look, LORD, upon my affliction, for the enemy has triumphed!"

¹⁰The enemy has stretched out his hand over all her treasures.
She has watched as nations entered her sanctuary — those you commanded should never enter your assembly.

¹¹All her people groan,
searching for bread.
They have traded their treasures for food just to stay alive.
"Look, LORD, and take notice,
for I have become worthless."

¹²Does this mean nothing to you,
all who pass along the road?
Look and see —
is there any pain like my pain,
which was inflicted on me,
which the LORD brought upon me
on the day of his burning anger?

¹³From on high he sent fire into my bones and it overcame them.
He spread a net for my feet;
he turned me back.
He has left me desolate,
sick with grief all day long.

¹⁴My transgressions have been bound into a yoke
by his hand.
They are woven together,
fastened upon my neck.

He has broken my strength.
The Lord has handed me over to those I cannot withstand.

¹⁵The Lord has rejected all my warriors from my midst.
He has summoned an assembly against me
to crush my young men.
The Lord has trodden the virgin Daughter Judah
as in a winepress.

¹⁶For all these things I weep;
my eyes — my eyes overflow with tears.
For any comforter is far from me,
anyone to restore my life.
My children are desolate,
for the enemy has prevailed.

¹⁷Zion stretches out her hands,
but there is no one to comfort her.
The LORD has commanded against Jacob that his neighbors become his enemies.
Jerusalem has become an unclean thing among them.

¹⁸The LORD is righteous,
for I have rebelled against his word.
Hear now, all you peoples, and see my pain —
my young women and my young men have gone into captivity.

¹⁹I called out to my allies,
but they betrayed me.
My priests and my elders perished in the city while they searched for food
to keep themselves alive.

²⁰Look, LORD, for I am in anguish!
My stomach churns;
my heart turns over within me
because I have been utterly rebellious.
Outside, the sword takes my children;
inside, it is like death itself.

²¹They have heard how I groan —
there is no one to comfort me.
All my enemies have heard of my disaster;

they rejoice that you have done this.
 Bring about the day you have proclaimed,
 and let them become like me!

²²Let all their wickedness come before you;
 deal with them
 as you have dealt with me
 for all my transgressions.
 For my groans are many,
 and my heart is sick.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aleph () verse. The opening word 'Eikhah' ('How!') gives the book its Hebrew name. It is not a question seeking information but a cry of stunned grief — the same word opens David's lament for Saul and Jonathan (2 Samuel 1:19). The word rabbati ('great, teeming') appears twice in the verse, creating a bitter contrast: she was rabbati in people and rabbati among the nations, but now she is alone. The word lamas ('to forced labor, tribute') refers to corvée labor — the same system Solomon imposed on subject peoples (1 Kings 9:21). The oppressed has become the oppressed.
2. Bet () verse. The emphatic infinitive absolute bakho tivkeh ('weeping, she weeps') intensifies the grief — we rendered this as 'weeps bitterly' to capture the force. The word menahem ('comforter') appears here for the first time; its absence (ein menahem, 'no comforter') will echo through verses 9, 16, 17, and 21, becoming a structural refrain. The 'lovers' (ohaveiha) are political allies — Egypt, Edom, and other nations Judah courted for protection instead of trusting God (cf. Jeremiah 30:14, Ezekiel 23).
3. Gimel () verse. The word manoach ('resting place') echoes the failed search for rest in the wilderness and in Ruth 1:9 — rest is a covenant blessing, and its absence signals covenant rupture. The phrase bein hametsarim ('in the narrow passes / between the straits') literally means 'between the tight places' — a military image of being trapped in a canyon with no escape. In Jewish tradition this phrase gives its name to the Three Weeks mourning period between 17 Tammuz and 9 Av (bein hametsarim).
4. Dalet () verse. The Hebrew mo'ed ('appointed feast') refers to the pilgrimage festivals — Passover, Weeks, and Booths — when Israelites traveled to Jerusalem. The roads themselves personified as mourning because the pilgrims have ceased. The word betuloteiha ('her young women / virgins') refers to the young women who participated in festival celebrations (cf. Judges 21:21, Jeremiah 31:13). The adjective mar ('bitter') is the root of Naomi's self-renaming in Ruth 1:20.
5. He () verse. The crucial theological claim: the LORD (YHWH) himself has caused Jerusalem's suffering. The verb hogah ('caused grief, afflicted') makes God the active agent of the city's devastation — this is not random misfortune but covenant judgment. The word pesh'a'eiha ('her transgressions') is the Hebrew term for deliberate rebellion, the most serious category of sin. The children (olaleiha) going into captivity before the enemy reverses the Exodus — instead of God leading his people out, the enemy leads them away.
6. Vav () verse. The title bat-Tsiyon ('Daughter Zion') personifies the city as a vulnerable young woman — a tender address that intensifies the pathos. The word hadarah ('her splendor, majesty') refers to the visible glory of the city — the Temple, the palace, the walls. The simile of deer without pasture captures exhaustion and helplessness: deer that cannot find food become too weak to flee predators. The word sarehia ('her leaders, princes') denotes the ruling class who should protect the city.
7. Zayin () verse. The word merudeha ('her wandering, homelessness') is rare, conveying restless displacement. The word mahmudeiha ('her precious things, desirable things') likely refers to both the treasures of the Temple and the cherished life of the covenant community. The final word mishbatteha is debated: it may mean 'her cessation' (from shavat, 'to cease') or 'her sabbaths' (from shabbat). The KJV reads 'sabbaths,' but the context of enemies mocking suggests 'her downfall / cessation' — the end of everything she was. We rendered 'downfall' with this note.
8. Chet () verse. The emphatic het hateah ('sinning, she has sinned') mirrors the emphatic weeping of verse 2. The word lenidah ('to a niddah / unclean thing') carries connotations of menstrual impurity (Leviticus 15:19-33) — Jerusalem's sin has made her ritually repulsive. We rendered this as 'an object of scorn' because the emphasis in context is on the social consequence (being shunned), while noting the Hebrew connotation here. The exposure of ervatah ('her nakedness') is the language of covenant violation — Ezekiel 16 and 23 develop this metaphor extensively. She turns away in shame at her own exposure.
9. Tet () verse. The image of tumah ('uncleanness') on her skirts is visceral — her defilement is visible, trailing behind her for all to see. The phrase lo zakhrah aharitah ('she did not remember her end') means she failed to consider the consequences of her actions. The refrain ein menahem ('no comforter') returns from verse 2. At the end of this verse, Jerusalem's own voice breaks through for the first time — 're'eh YHWH' ('Look, LORD') — a sudden shift from third person to first person that many scholars see as the city herself interrupting the poet's lament.
10. Yod () verse. The word mahmadeiha ('her treasures, precious things') echoes verse 7 — what was precious has been seized. The violation of the miqdash ('sanctuary') is the ultimate sacrilege: foreign nations have entered the holy space. The prohibition referenced is Deuteronomy 23:3-4, which barred Ammonites and Moabites from the qahal ('assembly') of the LORD. The shift to second-person address ('you commanded') shows the city speaking directly to God, accusing him of allowing what his own Torah forbade.

11. Kaf () verse. The phrase lehashiv nefesh ('to restore life / to keep alive') is literally 'to cause the soul to return' — they are at the brink of death. The word zolelah ('worthless, despised, gluttonous') is debated; it can mean 'cheap, worthless' or connect to the 'glutton' (zolel) of Deuteronomy 21:20. In context, Jerusalem is saying she has become something cheap and contemptible in the eyes of the world. The cry re'eh YHWH ('Look, LORD') echoes verse 9, reinforcing Jerusalem's direct plea to God.
12. Lamed () verse. This is perhaps the most famous verse in Lamentations. Jerusalem addresses the passersby — those walking past the ruins. The phrase makh'ov kemakh'ovi ('pain like my pain') became central in Jewish liturgy for Tisha B'Av (the anniversary of the Temple's destruction) and in Christian tradition was applied to Christ's suffering on the cross. The verb hogah ('brought grief upon') again names God as the agent, and haron appo ('his burning anger') uses the image of God's flaring nostrils — anger so intense it is described as heat radiating from his face.
13. Mem () verse. Three images of divine attack in rapid succession: fire in the bones (internal torment), a net for the feet (entrapment like an animal), and being turned back (military defeat). The fire 'from on high' (mimarom) emphasizes that this destruction comes from heaven — from God himself. The word davah ('sick, faint') specifically connotes the weakness of illness, not mere sadness. Jerusalem is not just sad — she is physically broken.
14. Nun () verse. The rare verb nisqad ('bound, watched, tied together') may relate to shaqad ('to watch, be alert') — the image is of sins being carefully tied together like a yoke lashed to an ox's neck. Each transgression (pesha) is a strand in the rope. The title Adonai ('Lord') is used here rather than YHWH — a distinction maintained throughout Lamentations where the poet alternates between the covenant name and the sovereign title.
15. Samekh () verse. The verb sillah ('rejected, cast aside') means to treat as worthless — the warriors who should have defended the city are swept aside by God himself. The word mo'ed ('assembly, appointed time') creates bitter irony: instead of summoning a festival assembly (cf. v. 4), God has summoned a military assembly to destroy. The winepress image (gat darakh, 'treading the winepress') is visceral — grapes are crushed underfoot until they burst, and the juice runs like blood. This image reappears in Isaiah 63:1-6 and Revelation 14:19-20.
16. Ayin () verse. The repetition eini eini ('my eye, my eye') is not a scribal error but a deliberate intensification — the poet stutters with grief. The word menahem ('comforter') returns for the third time (cf. vv. 2, 9), and meshiv nafshi ('one who restores my soul/life') adds urgency — she needs not just emotional comfort but someone to pull her back from the edge of death. The desolation of her 'children' (banai) means both the literal inhabitants and the metaphorical children of Mother Zion.
17. Pe () verse. The image of outstretched hands is a gesture of supplication — Zion begs but receives nothing. The refrain ein menahem ('no comforter') appears for the fourth time. The verb tsivvah ('commanded') is military language — God has issued orders deploying Jacob's neighbors as attackers. The word leniddah ('to an unclean thing') returns from verse 8, again evoking menstrual impurity language. The pe-ayin order here follows the standard Hebrew alphabet; chapters 2, 3, and 4 reverse pe and ayin, an ancient textual variant.
18. Tsade () verse. The stunning confession: tsaddiq hu YHWH ('righteous is the LORD'). In the midst of devastation, Jerusalem does not accuse God of injustice but confesses that the destruction is deserved — she rebelled against pihu ('his mouth/word/command'). The verb mariti ('I rebelled') is the same root used for Israel's rebellion in the wilderness (Numbers 20:24, 27:14). The appeal to 'all peoples' (kol amim) universalizes the lament — Jerusalem calls the whole world to witness.
19. Qof () verse. The 'lovers' (me'ahavai) are the foreign allies of verse 2, now explicitly described as having 'deceived' (rimmuni) Jerusalem — the political alliances proved worthless. The priests and elders — the religious and civic leaders — died of starvation within the city walls during the siege. The phrase lehashiv et nafsham ('to restore their lives') echoes verse 11, creating a devastating parallel: the people traded treasures for food, but the leaders could not even find food to trade for.
20. Resh () verse. The visceral language — me'ai homarmarru ('my insides churn') and nehpakh libbi ('my heart turns over') — describes grief as a physical sensation, the body revolting against unbearable suffering. The repetition maro mariti ('rebellious I have rebelled') is another emphatic infinitive absolute, intensifying the confession. The final line sets up a merism: outside (mihutz) the sword kills, inside (babbayit) death stalks — there is no safe place, no escape.
21. Shin () verse. The fifth and final occurrence of ein menahem ('no comforter') in this chapter. The enemies sasu ('rejoice') at Jerusalem's suffering, which God himself caused — a bitter acknowledgment. The final line shifts from lament to imprecation: Jerusalem calls on God to bring the 'day' (yom) of judgment upon her enemies too. The 'day you have proclaimed' (yom qarata) anticipates the 'Day of the LORD' language that runs through the prophets. This is not revenge but an appeal to divine justice — if my sins were punished, let theirs be also.
22. Tav () verse — the final letter of the Hebrew alphabet, completing the acrostic. The imprecation continues from verse 21: Jerusalem asks God to treat her enemies with the same justice he applied to her. The word pesha'ai ('my transgressions') returns from verse 5, forming an inclusio — the chapter begins and ends with the acknowledgment that Jerusalem's transgressions caused her suffering. The closing words libbi davvai ('my heart is sick/faint') echo the davah of verse 13, ending the chapter in unresolved grief. There is no resolution, no comfort, no restoration — only the raw wound of judgment acknowledged as just.

Summary: Lamentations 2 is the most theologically searing chapter in the book. The poet describes God himself as the destroyer of Jerusalem — not merely permitting the Babylonian invasion but actively tearing down his own Temple, his own walls, his own people. The LORD has become 'like an enemy' (v. 5). The chapter moves from God's destructive fury (vv. 1-10) to the poet's personal anguish at the sight of starving children (vv. 11-12), to a direct address to Daughter Zion urging her to cry out to God (vv. 18-19), and finally to Zion's own agonized prayer (vv. 20-22). Like chapter 1, this is a 22-verse acrostic poem following the Hebrew alphabet, but with the pe-ayin letter order reversed at verses 16-17.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theological audacity of this chapter is almost without parallel in scripture. Verse after verse names God as the agent of destruction using verbs of violence: he has swallowed, demolished, cut down, burned, bent his bow, killed, poured out his fury, destroyed his own tabernacle. The poet does not flinch from the conclusion: the LORD has done what he planned (v. 17). The pe-ayin letter reversal (where pe precedes ayin, reversing the order found in chapter 1) is attested in several ancient acrostic texts and may reflect an alternative alphabetic tradition. The description of prophets who gave false visions (v. 14) connects directly to Jeremiah's conflict with the optimistic prophets (Jeremiah 23, 28). The closing question — 'Should women eat their own children?' (v. 20) — is the most horrifying line in the Hebrew Bible, fulfilled during the siege according to 2 Kings 6:28-29.

Translation Friction: The verb billa ('swallowed') in verses 2, 5, and 16 required consistent rendering — we used 'swallowed up' to convey the totality of destruction. The word sukkah in verse 6 can mean 'booth/shelter' or 'his tabernacle' — the ambiguity is theologically loaded because it connects the Temple to the temporary Sukkot booths, implying God has dismantled his own dwelling as easily as taking down a festival tent. The pe-ayin reversal at verses 16-17 was noted without attempting to reproduce it in English, since the acrostic structure does not transfer across languages. The graphic description of starving infants in verses 11-12 and cannibalism in verse 20 was rendered without euphemism.

Connections: The portrayal of God as warrior-destroyer connects to the Day of the LORD traditions in Amos 5:18-20, Joel 2:1-11, and Zephaniah 1:14-18. The demolished Temple connects to Jesus's prediction of the second Temple's destruction (Matthew 24:2). The false prophets of verse 14 connect to Jeremiah 23:9-40 and Ezekiel 13. The 'pouring out of the heart like water' (v. 19) anticipates Psalm 62:8. The cannibalism reference connects to the covenant curses of Deuteronomy 28:53-57 and Leviticus 26:29 — the very consequences Moses warned would follow covenant violation.

¹How the Lord has covered Daughter Zion with a cloud in his anger!
He has hurled the splendor of Israel from heaven to earth.
He has not remembered his footstool on the day of his wrath.

²The Lord has swallowed up all the dwellings of Jacob without mercy.
In his fury he has torn down
the fortresses of Daughter Judah.
He has brought them to the ground;
he has profaned the kingdom and its rulers.

³In burning anger he has cut off
every horn of Israel.

He has drawn back his right hand
from before the enemy.
He has blazed against Jacob like a consuming fire on every side.

⁴He has bent his bow like an enemy, stood with his right hand poised like a foe.
He has killed all who were precious to the eye.
In the tent of Daughter Zion
he has poured out his fury like fire.

⁵The Lord has become like an enemy.
He has swallowed up Israel;
he has swallowed up all her palaces and destroyed his fortresses.
He has multiplied in Daughter Judah mourning upon mourning.

⁶He has torn down his booth like a garden shelter;
he has destroyed his place of meeting.
The LORD has made festival and sabbath forgotten in Zion,
and in the fury of his anger
he has spurned both king and priest.

⁷The Lord has rejected his own altar;
he has abandoned his own sanctuary.
He has handed over to the enemy
the walls of her palaces.
They raised a shout in the house of the LORD
as on the day of a festival.

⁸The LORD determined to destroy the wall of Daughter Zion.
He stretched out the measuring line;
he did not restrain his hand from destruction.
He made rampart and wall mourn;
together they crumble.

⁹Her gates have sunk into the ground;
he has smashed and shattered her bars.
Her king and her officials are among the nations where there is no instruction.
Even her prophets receive no vision from the LORD.

¹⁰The elders of Daughter Zion sit on the ground in silence.
They have thrown dust on their heads and put on sackcloth.

The young women of Jerusalem have bowed their heads to the ground.

¹¹My eyes are spent with tears;
my stomach churns.
My bile pours out on the ground
over the destruction of the daughter of my people,
as children and infants faint
in the streets of the city.

¹²They cry to their mothers,
"Where is bread? Where is wine?"
as they collapse like the wounded
in the streets of the city,
as their lives pour out
in their mothers' arms.

¹³What can I say for you?
To what can I compare you,
Daughter Jerusalem?
What can I liken to you,
that I might comfort you,
virgin Daughter Zion?
For your wound is as vast as the sea —
who can heal you?

¹⁴Your prophets saw for you visions of emptiness and whitewash.
They did not expose your guilt
so as to restore your fortunes.
The oracles they saw for you were false and misleading.

¹⁵All who pass along the road
clap their hands at you.
They hiss and shake their heads
at Daughter Jerusalem:
"Is this the city that was called the perfection of beauty,
the joy of all the earth?"

¹⁶All your enemies open their mouths wide against you.
They hiss and grind their teeth.
They say, "We have swallowed her up!
This is the day we waited for —
we have found it; we have seen it!"

¹⁷The LORD has done what he planned;
 he has carried out his decree that he ordained from days of old.
 He has torn down without mercy;
 he has let the enemy rejoice over you and raised up the strength of your foes.

¹⁸Their heart cries out to the Lord.
 O wall of Daughter Zion,
 let tears flow down like a river
 day and night!
 Give yourself no rest;
 let your eyes find no relief.

¹⁹Rise up! Cry out in the night, at the start of every watch.
 Pour out your heart like water
 before the face of the Lord.
 Lift up your hands to him for the lives of your children who faint from hunger
 at the head of every street.

²⁰Look, LORD, and consider:
 To whom have you done this?
 Should women eat their own offspring,
 the children they have nursed?
 Should priest and prophet be slain
 in the sanctuary of the Lord?

²¹Young and old lie on the ground in the streets.
 My young women and my young men
 have fallen by the sword.
 You killed them on the day of your anger;
 you slaughtered without mercy.

²²You summoned terrors against me from every side
 as on the day of a festival.
 On the day of the LORD's anger, none escaped, none survived.
 Those I carried and raised — my enemy has destroyed them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aleph () verse. The chapter opens with the same cry 'Eikhah' ('How!') as chapter 1. The verb ya'iv ('covered with a cloud, darkened') suggests an ominous storm cloud — God's anger as a thunderhead descending over Zion. The 'footstool' (hadom raglav) is the Ark of the Covenant and by extension the Temple (cf. 1 Chronicles 28:2, Psalm 132:7) — God has forgotten even the place where his feet rested on earth. The verb hishlikh ('hurled, thrown down') conveys violence — Israel's splendor was not gently set aside but violently thrown from heaven to the ground.

2. Bet (ב) verse. The verb billa ('swallowed up') is a verb of total consumption — nothing remains after swallowing. The phrase lo hamal ('without mercy, without pity') appears repeatedly in this chapter (vv. 2, 17, 21), characterizing God's judgment as relentless. The verb hillel ('profaned') means to strip something of its sacred status — God has desacralized the Davidic monarchy and its leaders. This is the reversal of the anointing that made them holy.
3. Gimel (ג) verse. The 'horn' (qeren) symbolizes strength and power — cutting off every horn means stripping Israel of all capacity to resist. God drawing back his right hand is devastating: the right hand is the hand of deliverance (Exodus 15:6, 12), and its withdrawal means God refuses to fight for Israel. Worse, God himself burns against Jacob — the fire that once protected Israel from Egypt (Exodus 14:24) is now turned against her.
4. Dalet (ד) verse. The transformation is complete: God has become ke'oyev ('like an enemy') and ketsar ('like a foe'). The right hand that was withdrawn from protecting Israel (v. 3) is now deployed against her. The phrase mahmaddei ayin ('precious things of the eye') refers to beloved people — the beautiful, the cherished, the young. The 'tent' (ohel) of Daughter Zion may refer to the Temple using tabernacle language, connecting the destruction back to the wilderness dwelling of God.
5. He (ה) verse. The central theological statement of the chapter: Adonai hayah ke'oyev ('The Lord has become like an enemy'). This is not metaphor — it is the poet's stunned recognition that the God who fought for Israel at the Reed Sea has now turned his military might against her. The verb billa ('swallowed up') appears twice in succession, intensifying the totality of destruction. The final pair ta'anyah va'anyah ('mourning and lamentation') is nearly synonymous, piling grief upon grief through sound repetition.
6. Vav (ו) verse. The word sukko ('his booth/shelter') is the same word used for the temporary shelters of the Sukkot festival — God has dismantled his own Temple as casually as tearing down a harvest tent. The word mo'ado ('his appointed meeting place') connects to the 'tent of meeting' (ohel mo'ed) of the wilderness — the place where God met with Israel is now rubble. The abolition of mo'ed veshabbat ('festival and sabbath') means the entire liturgical calendar has ceased. God has rejected both civil (melekh, 'king') and religious (kohen, 'priest') leadership.
7. Zayin (ז) verse. The bitter irony reaches its peak: the enemies shout in God's own house keyom mo'ed ('as on the day of a festival'). The joyful noise of worship has been replaced by the war cries of invaders, and the poet describes both with the same language. God has zanah ('rejected, cast off') his own altar — the place where Israel met God through sacrifice is abandoned. The verb ni'er ('abhorred, spurned') his sanctuary makes God the one who desecrates his own holy place by withdrawing from it.
8. Chet (ח) verse. The verb hashav ('planned, determined') shows that this destruction is not impulsive but deliberate — God planned it. The measuring line (qav) is normally a tool for building (Zechariah 1:16); here it measures for demolition, a devastating inversion. The personification of rampart and wall mourning together extends the city-as-person metaphor — even the stones grieve. The verb umlelalu ('they languish, crumble') suggests slow collapse rather than sudden destruction.
9. Tet (ט) verse. The gates 'sinking into the ground' (tave'u va'arets) is an image of total ruin — the gates have collapsed and been swallowed by rubble. The word torah here means 'instruction, teaching' rather than specifically the Mosaic law — in exile among the nations, there is no prophetic or priestly guidance. The cessation of prophetic vision (hazon) means God has gone silent. The three pillars of Israelite society — kingship, Torah instruction, and prophecy — have all failed simultaneously.
10. Yod (י) verse. The rituals of mourning are described: sitting on the ground (the posture of shiva), silence (yidemmū — the deepest form of grief beyond words), dust on the head, and sackcloth garments. The elders who once sat in the gate to judge now sit in the dirt. The young women (betulot) who once danced at festivals (cf. 1:4) now bow their heads to the earth. Every element of communal life has been inverted.
11. Kaf (כ) verse. The poet now speaks in first person, overwhelmed by what he sees. The phrase kavedi ('my liver/bile') being poured out is visceral Hebrew body language — the liver was considered the seat of deep emotion, and its 'pouring out' describes grief so intense it feels like internal organs are collapsing. The word olel ('child, toddler') and yoneq ('nursing infant') — the most vulnerable members of society — are fainting from hunger in the public squares. The poet cannot maintain detached observation; the sight of dying children breaks him.
12. Lamed (ל) verse. The children's cry ayyeh dagan vayayin ('Where is grain and wine?') is devastating in its simplicity — they ask for the basic staples of life. The comparison to the wounded (kehalal, 'like one pierced by a sword') means the children are dying of starvation as if they had been struck in battle. The phrase behistappekh nafsham ('as their lives pour out') describes death by degrees — the nephesh (life-force) slowly draining away in their mothers' laps. This is one of the most emotionally devastating images in all of scripture.
13. Mem (מ) verse. The poet searches for an adequate comparison and fails — no analogy is large enough. The phrase gadol kayyam shivrekh ('your wound/breaking is great as the sea') uses the sea as the measure of immeasurable vastness. The word shever ('breaking, wound, fracture') is the same word Jeremiah uses repeatedly for the nation's catastrophe (Jeremiah 6:14, 8:21, 14:17). The question mi yirpa lakh ('who can heal you?') implies the answer: perhaps no one — or only God, the one who inflicted the wound.
14. Nun (נ) verse. The false prophets are indicted: they saw shav vetafel ('emptiness and whitewash') — tafel is literally plaster or whitewash used to cover over cracks (cf. Ezekiel 13:10-15, where false prophets are accused of 'whitewashing' a weak wall). They failed to gilu al avonekh ('expose/uncover your guilt'), which would have led to repentance and restoration. The word maddukhim ('misleading oracles, causes of banishment') may derive from nadah ('to drive away') — their false words drove the people into exile. This verse directly parallels Jeremiah's confrontation with Hananiah (Jeremiah 28).
15. Samekh (ס) verse. The clapping (safqu kappayim) here is not applause but mockery — a gesture of scorn. The hissing (sharqu) and head-shaking are universal gestures of derision. The title kelilat yofi ('perfection of beauty') echoes Psalm 50:2 ('Out of Zion, the perfection of beauty, God shines forth') and masos lekhol ha'arets ('joy of all the earth') echoes Psalm 48:3. The passersby quote Jerusalem's own praise songs back to her in mockery.

— what she sang about herself is now thrown in her face.

16. Pe () verse. NOTE: In this chapter, pe precedes ayin, reversing the order found in chapter 1. This pe-ayin reversal also occurs in chapters 3 and 4, and may reflect an older alphabetic tradition. The enemies use the same verb billa'nu ('we have swallowed') that was applied to God's action in verses 2 and 5 — the enemies claim for themselves what was actually God's doing. Their gloating 'this is the day' (zeh hayyom) is a perversion of the festival language 'this is the day the LORD has made' (Psalm 118:24).
17. Ayin () verse. Following pe in the reversed order. This is the theological climax: asah YHWH asher zamam ('The LORD has done what he planned'). The destruction is not a failure of divine power or a surprise — it is the fulfillment of the covenant curses God announced through Moses (Deuteronomy 28). The word bitsa ('carried out, completed') means he saw it through to the end. The phrase lo hamal ('without mercy') echoes verse 2. God's plan, Israel's enemies' triumph, and the ancient warnings all converge in this verse.
18. Tsade () verse. The poet now exhorts Daughter Zion to unceasing weeping — the tears should flow kannahal ('like a stream/torrent'), a never-ending current. The phrase bat einekh ('daughter of your eye') is the pupil — the most tender, vulnerable part of the body. The command is paradoxical: weep without stopping, because only through the exhaustion of grief can any healing begin. The address to the 'wall' (homat) may be apostrophe — the poet speaks to the ruins themselves.
19. Qof () verse. The poet commands Zion to pray — but the prayer is specifically for the children. The word ashmurot ('watches') divides the night into shifts; the command is to begin crying out at the start of each one, meaning the entire night. The phrase shifkhi khammayim libbekh ('pour out your heart like water') is one of the most powerful prayer images in scripture — the heart emptied entirely before God, holding nothing back. The olalayikh ('your little children') fainting from starvation at every street corner echoes the same devastating image from verses 11-12.
20. Resh () verse. Daughter Zion now speaks directly to God, and her words are the most searing in the Hebrew Bible. The phrase tokhalena nashim piryam ('should women eat their fruit/offspring?') refers to cannibalism during the siege — mothers eating their own children. The word tipu'him ('nursed, cherished, dandled') emphasizes that these are children who were tenderly cared for. This horror was predicted in the covenant curses (Deuteronomy 28:53-57) and is attested historically in the siege of Jerusalem (2 Kings 6:28-29). The murder of priest and prophet in the sanctuary violates every sacred boundary.
21. Shin () verse. The direct accusation against God intensifies: haragta ('you killed') and tavahta ('you slaughtered') — the second verb is butchery language, used for slaughtering animals. The phrase lo hamalta ('you did not show mercy') echoes vv. 2 and 17, completing a refrain of divine mercilessness that runs through the entire chapter. The bodies of young and old lying in the streets together eliminates every social distinction — death is the great equalizer.
22. Tav () verse — the final letter, completing the acrostic. The bitter festival language returns: keyom mo'ed ('as on the day of an appointed feast') — God has made destruction into a festival, summoning terrors the way worshippers were once summoned to Jerusalem. The totality is absolute: lo hayah palit vesarid ('no refugee and no survivor'). The chapter ends with Zion as a mother whose children have all been consumed by the enemy — the one she herself nursed and raised (tippahti veribbiti). The chapter closes without resolution, without hope, without any word of comfort.

Summary: Lamentations 3 is the theological heart of the book — the longest chapter, with 66 verses arranged as a triple acrostic (three verses per Hebrew letter). An individual sufferer speaks in the first person: 'I am the man who has seen affliction' (v. 1). The first section (vv. 1-20) is unrelenting darkness — the speaker has been walled in, hunted, broken by God. Then, at the exact center of the chapter and the book, comes the astonishing turn: 'The faithful loves of the LORD never cease; his mercies never end. They are new every morning — great is your faithfulness' (vv. 22-23). This is the hope passage, set like a jewel in the middle of devastation. The chapter moves from personal lament to theological reflection on divine justice (vv. 25-39), then to communal confession and prayer (vv. 40-66).

What Makes This Remarkable: *The triple acrostic structure is the most elaborate in the Hebrew Bible — each Hebrew letter governs three consecutive verses, creating a poem of mathematical precision within emotional chaos. The identity of the speaker is debated: he may be Jeremiah, an everyman figure, or a personification of the community. The hope passage (vv. 22-24) contains the Hebrew Bible's most concentrated expression of chesed and emunah — two covenant terms that carry the entire weight of Israel's theology of divine faithfulness. The phrase hadashim labbeqarim ('new every morning') became the basis of the hymn 'Great Is Thy Faithfulness.' The chapter's position at the center of the book's five chapters is architecturally deliberate — hope surrounded by despair on every side, yet surviving. The verb qavah ('to wait, to hope') in verse 25 is from the same root as tiquah ('hope'), used in Jeremiah 29:11.*

Translation Friction: The shift from individual to communal voice (around v. 40) required careful handling — the 'I' becomes 'we' without explicit transition. The word chesed in verse 22 follows the Qere (written marginal reading chasdei YHWH, 'the faithful loves of the LORD') rather than the Ketiv (written text), which reads tamnu ('they are finished') — a significant textual variant where the traditional reading reverses the meaning entirely. We followed the Qere with the majority of translations and noted the Ketiv. The Hebrew gever ('man, strong man') in verse 1 is not the generic adam or ish but the word for a warrior or vigorous man — his affliction is emphasized by his strength. The pe-ayin reversal continues from chapter 2 at verses 46-51.

Connections: The chesed-emunah pairing in verses 22-23 connects to Exodus 34:6-7 (the divine self-revelation to Moses), Psalm 36:5-6, Psalm 89:1-2, and Psalm 100:5. 'Great is your faithfulness' connects to Deuteronomy 7:9. The 'man who has seen affliction' connects to the Suffering Servant of Isaiah 52:13-53:12. The call to self-examination (v. 40) connects to Haggai 1:5-7. The image of God as a stalking bear and lion (v. 10) connects to Hosea 13:7-8. The 'pit' imagery (vv. 53-55) connects to Psalm 69 and Jeremiah 38 (Jeremiah's actual imprisonment in a cistern). The closing imprecation (vv. 64-66) connects to Psalm 137.

¹I am the man who has seen affliction under the rod of his fury.

²He has driven me and led me into darkness, not light.

³Against me alone he turns his hand, again and again, all day long.

⁴He has worn away my flesh and my skin;
he has shattered my bones.

⁵He has besieged me
and surrounded me with bitterness and hardship.

⁶He has made me dwell in darkness like those long dead.

⁷He has walled me in so I cannot escape;
he has weighed down my chains.

⁸Even when I cry out and plead for help,
he shuts out my prayer.

⁹He has blocked my paths with cut stone;
he has made my roads twist.

¹⁰He is a bear lying in ambush for me,
a lion in hiding.

¹¹He has dragged me from the path and torn me apart;
he has left me devastated.

¹²He has bent his bow and set me as a target for his arrow.

¹³He has driven the shafts of his quiver into my kidneys.

¹⁴I have become a laughingstock to all my people,
the subject of their mocking songs all day long.

¹⁵He has filled me with bitter herbs;
he has drenched me with wormwood.

¹⁶He has ground my teeth on gravel;
he has pressed me into the ashes.

¹⁷My life has been deprived of peace;
I have forgotten what goodness is.

¹⁸So I said, "My endurance is gone, and my hope from the LORD has perished."

¹⁹Remember my affliction and my wandering,
the wormwood and the gall!

²⁰My soul remembers them vividly and sinks low within me.

²¹But this I call to mind,
and therefore I have hope:

²²The faithful loves of the LORD never cease;
his mercies never come to an end.

²³They are new every morning;
great is your faithfulness!

²⁴"The LORD is my portion," says my soul;
"therefore I will hope in him."

²⁵The LORD is good to those who wait for him, to the soul that seeks him.

²⁶It is good to wait in silence for the salvation of the LORD.

²⁷It is good for a man to bear the yoke in his youth.

²⁸Let him sit alone and be silent
when it is laid upon him.

²⁹Let him put his mouth in the dust —
perhaps there is hope.

³⁰Let him offer his cheek to the one who strikes him;
let him be filled with disgrace.

³¹For the Lord does not reject forever.

³²Though he causes grief, he will show compassion
according to the abundance of his faithful love.

³³For he does not afflict from his heart,
nor grieve the children of humanity.

³⁴To crush underfoot
all the prisoners of the earth,

³⁵to deny a person justice before the face of the Most High,

³⁶to wrong a person in their lawsuit —
the Lord does not approve.

³⁷Who has spoken and it came to be when the Lord has not commanded it?

³⁸Is it not from the mouth of the Most High that both disaster and good come?

³⁹Why should any living person complain?
Let each one complain about their own sins.

⁴⁰Let us examine and test our ways,
and return to the LORD.

⁴¹Let us lift up our hearts and our hands to God in heaven.

⁴²We have transgressed and rebelled,
and you have not forgiven.

⁴³You have wrapped yourself in anger and pursued us;
you have killed without mercy.

⁴⁴You have wrapped yourself in a cloud
so that no prayer can pass through.

⁴⁵You have made us filth and refuse
among the peoples.

⁴⁶All our enemies have opened their mouths wide against us.

⁴⁷Terror and the pit have come upon us,
devastations and destruction.

⁴⁸Streams of tears flow from my eyes
over the destruction of the daughter of my people.

⁴⁹My eyes pour out tears without stopping,
without relief,

⁵⁰until the LORD looks down and sees from heaven.

⁵¹My eyes cause me anguish
because of all the young women of my city.

⁵²My enemies hunted me relentlessly like a bird, without cause.

⁵³They tried to end my life in the pit and threw stones at me.

⁵⁴Waters closed over my head;
I said, "I am finished."

⁵⁵I called on your name, LORD, from the depths of the pit.

⁵⁶You heard my voice — do not close your ear
to my cry for relief, to my plea!

⁵⁷You drew near on the day I called to you;
you said, "Do not be afraid."

⁵⁸You championed my cause, Lord;
you redeemed my life.

⁵⁹You have seen the wrong done to me, LORD.
Uphold my cause!

⁶⁰You have seen all their vengeance,
all their plots against me.

⁶¹You have heard their insults, LORD,
all their schemes against me —

⁶²the words of those who rise against me,
and their murmuring against me all day long.

⁶³Watch them — whether they sit or stand,
I am the subject of their mocking songs.

⁶⁴Pay them back, LORD,
according to what their hands have done.

65 Give them a stubborn heart;
let your curse be upon them.

66 Pursue them in anger and destroy them from under the heavens of the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aleph () — first of three aleph verses. The triple acrostic begins. The word gever ('man') is not the common ish or adam but denotes a strong, vigorous man — the irony is deliberate. The 'rod of his fury' (shevet evrato) makes God the one wielding the rod. The speaker does not name God yet, only 'his' — the pronoun creates an ominous distance.
2. Aleph () — second verse. The verb nahag ('driven') is used for driving livestock or captives — the strong man is treated like an animal being herded. The contrast hoshekh velo or ('darkness, not light') inverts Amos 5:18, where the Day of the LORD is 'darkness, not light' — this is that day experienced firsthand.
3. Aleph () — third verse. The phrase yashuv yahapokh yado ('he turns and overturns his hand') conveys relentless, repeated striking — not a single blow but unending affliction. The word akh ('surely, only') emphasizes the isolation: the sufferer feels singled out. 'All day long' (kol hayyom) is the first of many temporal markers indicating the suffering has no respite.
4. Bet () — first verse. The verb billah ('worn away, consumed') describes erosion — flesh and skin wasting under prolonged suffering. The verb shibbar ('shattered') is intensified (Piel stem), indicating the bones are not merely broken but crushed. The body is systematically dismantled from the outside in: first skin, then flesh, then bones.
5. Bet () — second verse. The verb banah ('built') is siege language — the enemy builds siege works around a city. Here God builds the siege against the sufferer. The word rosh ('gall, poison, bitterness') refers to a bitter, possibly poisonous plant — the sufferer is walled in by toxic misery. The word tela'ah ('hardship, weariness') conveys exhaustion.
6. Bet () — third verse. The 'dark places' (mahashakim) are the realm of the dead — Sheol. The phrase kemetei olam ('like the dead of long ago') means the most thoroughly dead, those who have been in the grave so long no one remembers them. The sufferer is being described as already entombed. Cf. Psalm 143:3, which uses nearly identical language.
7. Gimel () — first verse. The verb gadar ('walled in, fenced') creates a prison image — the sufferer is enclosed on every side. The bronze chains (nehoshti) are heavy (hikhibid, from the root k-v-d, 'to be heavy') — the same root as kavod ('glory'). There is bitter irony: God's 'weightiness' once meant glory; now it means the weight of chains.
8. Gimel () — second verse. Two words for crying out: ez'aq ('cry for help') and ashavve'a ('shout, plead') — neither gets through. The verb satam ('shut out, blocked') means the prayer hits a wall. This is the opposite of the open heavens promised in covenant blessing — God has closed the communication channel. Cf. Job 30:20 for the same experience of unanswered prayer.
9. Gimel () — third verse. The walls are built of gazit ('cut stone, dressed stone') — not a flimsy barrier but permanent masonry. The verb ivvah ('made crooked, twisted') means even the paths that remain open lead nowhere useful. The image combines imprisonment with disorientation — walled in and lost simultaneously.
10. Dalet () — first verse. God is compared to predatory animals: a bear (dov) and a lion (ari) — Israel's two most dangerous wild beasts. Both are described as waiting in concealment (orev, 'lying in ambush'; bemisttarim, 'in hidden places'). The sufferer is the prey. Hosea 13:7-8 uses the same imagery: 'I will be like a lion to them; like a leopard I will lurk beside the way. I will fall upon them like a bear.' The Ketiv reads ari (without the he), while the Qere reads aryeh — both mean 'lion.'
11. Dalet () — second verse. The verb sorer ('turned aside') and vayefasshekheni ('torn apart, dismembered') continue the predator imagery — the bear or lion has seized its prey, dragged it off the path, and mauled it. The word shomem ('desolate, devastated') is the same word used for the desolation of Jerusalem — the man's inner state mirrors the city's outer ruin.
12. Dalet () — third verse. The predator image shifts to the warrior-archer image from 2:4. The word mattara ('target') means the sufferer is not hit by accident but aimed at deliberately. God is the archer; the man is the mark. This connects to Job 16:12-13 where Job uses the same archery imagery for divine hostility.
13. He () — first verse. The 'sons of his quiver' (benei ashpatō) is a Hebrew idiom for arrows. The kidneys (khilyotai) were considered the seat of the deepest emotions and the most vulnerable internal organs — the arrows penetrate to the innermost part of the body. This is not a surface wound but a mortal strike to the core.
14. He () — second verse. The word sehoq ('laughter, derision') and neginatam ('their song, their taunt-song') show that the sufferer's own community mocks him. This parallels Jeremiah's experience (Jeremiah 20:7) and anticipates the Suffering Servant's rejection (Isaiah 53:3). The mocking is not from enemies but from 'my people' (ammi) — the deepest betrayal.

15. He () — third verse. The merorim ('bitter herbs') echo the Passover meal (Exodus 12:8) — but this is not memorial bitterness, it is present suffering. The la'anah ('wormwood') is Artemisia, proverbially the bitterest plant in the region. The verbs hisbi'ani ('sated me') and hirvani ('drenched me') mean the sufferer has been forced to consume bitterness until he is full to overflowing — a grotesque parody of being filled with good things.
16. Vav () — first verse. The verb vayyagres ('he ground, crushed') with hatsats ('gravel') describes being forced to eat gravel — a vivid image of humiliation and degradation. The word efer ('ashes') connotes mourning (sitting in ashes) but also worthlessness — the sufferer is ground down to the same level as dust and debris.
17. Vav () — second verse. The word shalom here carries its full weight: not merely the absence of conflict but the complete well-being that comes from right relationship with God. The sufferer has been cast so far from shalom that he cannot even remember what 'good' (tovah) feels like. The verb nashiti ('I have forgotten') indicates prolonged suffering — the memory of good times has been erased.
18. Vav () — third verse. The word nitschi ('my endurance, my lasting strength') and tokhalti ('my hope, my expectation') are both declared lost. This is the absolute nadir — the sufferer has given up on God. The phrase meYHWH ('from the LORD') means the hope that came from God is what has died. This sets up the dramatic reversal that begins at verse 21.
19. Zayin () — first verse. The imperative zekhor ('remember!') may be addressed to God or to the sufferer himself. The words la'anah ('wormwood') and rosh ('gall/poison') return from verse 15, forming an inclusio around the suffering. The word merudi ('my wandering, my homelessness') echoes 1:7, connecting the individual's displacement to the city's exile.
20. Zayin () — second verse. The emphatic infinitive absolute zakhor tizkor ('remembering, it remembers') indicates memory that cannot be suppressed — the suffering replays constantly. The Ketiv reads vetashokh ('and bows down'), while the Qere reads vetashoakh ('and sinks') — both convey the same collapse of spirit. This verse is the hinge: the soul sinks to its lowest point, and from this depth the turn begins.
21. Zayin () — third verse. The pivotal word is zot ('this') — what follows in verses 22-23 is the 'this' that the sufferer chooses to remember. The verb ohil ('I have hope, I wait') is from the root y-h-l, which carries the sense of patient waiting, not mere optimism. The sufferer does not deny the suffering of verses 1-20 but deliberately calls to mind something that coexists with it.
22. Chet () — first verse. TEXTUAL NOTE: The Ketiv (written text) reads tamnu as 'we are finished/consumed' — making the verse say 'Because of the LORD's faithful loves, we are not consumed.' The Qere (marginal reading) vocalizes it as tamnu from tamam ('to be complete/cease'), making it 'The faithful loves of the LORD do not cease.' We follow the Qere with the majority of translations, but the Ketiv reading is also theologically powerful: it is precisely God's chesed that prevents total annihilation. The word rahamav ('his mercies') is from the root r-h-m, related to rehem ('womb') — God's mercy has the quality of a mother's visceral compassion for the child of her womb.
23. Chet () — second verse. The word hadashim ('new') means these mercies are not recycled or diminished — they arrive fresh each morning like the manna in the wilderness (Exodus 16:21), which also appeared new each day and could not be stored. The exclamation rabbah emunatekha ('great is your faithfulness!') became the inspiration for Thomas Chisholm's 1923 hymn 'Great Is Thy Faithfulness.' The switch to second person ('your faithfulness') makes this a direct address to God — the sufferer is no longer talking about God but to him.
24. Chet () — third verse. The word helek ('portion, share, inheritance') is land-distribution language from the conquest. When the tribes received their inheritance, the Levites received none — God himself was their inheritance (Numbers 18:20, Deuteronomy 10:9). The sufferer, who has lost everything, claims the Levitical inheritance: God himself is what remains. The verb ohil ('I will hope, I will wait') returns from verse 21, forming the frame of the hope passage.
25. Tet () — first verse. The verb qavah ('to wait, to hope') involves active, expectant waiting — not passive resignation. The verb darash ('to seek') means diligent pursuit, not casual looking. Together they describe the posture of someone who trusts God enough to wait but engages enough to seek. The declaration tov YHWH ('the LORD is good') echoes Psalm 100:5 and 136:1.
26. Tet () — second verse. Three words define the proper posture before God: yahl ('wait with hope'), dumam ('in silence'), and the goal is teshu'at YHWH ('the salvation/deliverance of the LORD'). The silence is not emptiness but trust — the opposite of the anxious crying of the early verses. The word teshu'ah ('salvation, deliverance') is from the same root as yeshu'ah and the name Yeshua/Joshua/Jesus.
27. Tet () — third verse. The word ge'ever ('man, strong man') returns from verse 1, creating a frame — the strong man who has seen affliction now declares that bearing the yoke early in life has value. The 'yoke' (ol) can mean suffering, discipline, or the yoke of Torah. The wisdom is that suffering endured young builds the capacity to endure what comes later.
28. Yod () — first verse. The word badad ('alone') echoes 1:1 where Jerusalem 'sits alone' — the same posture of desolation is now reframed as a posture of patient endurance. The silence (yiddom) from verse 26 continues. The verb natal ('laid upon, imposed') suggests a burden placed by God, accepted rather than fought.
29. Yod () — second verse. The gesture of putting the mouth in the dust is total prostration and submission — the lowest possible posture before God. The word ulai ('perhaps') is startlingly honest — this is not a guarantee but a possibility. And the word tiqvah ('hope') is from the root q-v-h ('to wait'), connecting to the waiting of verse 25. Hope is not certainty; it is the willingness to wait in the dust.
30. Yod () — third verse. The image of offering the cheek to the striker connects to Isaiah 50:6 (the Servant who 'gave his back to those who struck him') and to Jesus's teaching in Matthew 5:39. The word herpah ('disgrace, reproach') is to be accepted, not resisted — the sufferer absorbs shame as part of patient waiting for God's deliverance.

- 31. Kaf () — first verse. The word le'olam ('forever') is the key — God's rejection is real but not permanent. The verb yiznah ('reject, cast off') acknowledges that God has indeed rejected (cf. 2:7), but now places a time limit on it. This is the beginning of the theological argument: suffering is real, God caused it, but it is not the final word.
- 32. Kaf () — second verse. The verb hogah ('causes grief') is the same word used for God's affliction in 1:5 and 1:12, now placed in a conditional framework: though he grieves, he will also have mercy (riham, from the womb-compassion root r-h-m). The Ketiv reads hasadav (plural) and the Qere reads hasdo (singular) — either way, chesed is the basis of hope. We follow the Qere.
- 33. Kaf () — third verse. The phrase millibbo ('from his heart') is crucial: God's affliction is real but it does not arise from his deepest desire. The heart (lev) is the center of will and intention in Hebrew — God's core intention is not to harm but to restore. The verb innah ('afflict') and vayyaggeh ('grieve, cause sorrow') acknowledge the reality of divine-caused suffering while insisting it is not God's ultimate purpose.
- 34. Lamed () — first verse. Verses 34-36 form a unit describing injustices that the Lord does not approve of, even though humans commit them. The infinitive ledakke ('to crush') begins a series: crushing prisoners, perverting justice, defrauding — these acts displease God. Some read these as actions God would never do; others as actions God does not approve when humans do them.
- 35. Lamed () — second verse. The phrase lehatot mishpat ('to turn aside justice, to pervert a legal case') is the language of judicial corruption. The title Elyon ('Most High') emphasizes that these perversions of justice happen 'before his face' — God sees every act of injustice and does not approve, even when he permits suffering for covenantal reasons.
- 36. Lamed () — third verse. The verb le'avvet ('to wrong, to twist, to subvert') describes deliberately corrupting a legal proceeding. The phrase Adonai lo ra'ah is literally 'the Lord has not seen' — but in context it means 'the Lord does not look upon with favor / does not approve,' not that he is ignorant of it. God sees injustice and condemns it, even when his own judgments bring suffering.
- 37. Mem () — first verse. A rhetorical question asserting divine sovereignty: nothing happens without God's command (tsivvah). This is both comforting (nothing is random) and terrifying (the suffering is God's doing). The verse echoes Amos 3:6 ('Does disaster come to a city unless the LORD has done it?') and Isaiah 45:7.
- 38. Mem () — second verse. The Hebrew ra'ot ('bad things, disasters') and tov ('good') both proceed from the mouth of Elyon ('Most High'). The word ra'ot does not mean 'moral evil' here but 'calamity, disaster, harmful events' — God is sovereign over both fortune and misfortune. This is covenantal logic: the same God who blesses also curses, as Deuteronomy 28 laid out.
- 39. Mem () — third verse. The word yit'onen ('complain, murmur') is the same root used for Israel's complaining in the wilderness (Numbers 11:1). The argument is sharp: a person who is alive has no right to complain about suffering when they have sinned. The word ge'ever ('strong man') returns from verses 1 and 27. The Ketiv reads hata'o ('his sin,' singular) and the Qere reads hata'av ('his sins,' plural).
- 40. Nun () — first verse. The voice shifts from singular 'I' to plural 'we' — the individual's reflection becomes a communal call to action. The verbs nahpeshah ('let us search') and nahqorah ('let us investigate') are thorough — this is not casual self-reflection but forensic self-examination. The verb venashuvah ('let us return') is the core vocabulary of repentance (teshuvah) — turning back to God after straying.
- 41. Nun () — second verse. The gesture of lifted hands (kappayim) was the standard posture of prayer in the ancient Near East. The command to lift hearts (levavenu) as well as hands insists on internal sincerity, not mere external ritual. The destination is El bashamayim ('God in heaven') — the same God who seemed absent is now addressed as accessible.
- 42. Nun () — third verse. The confession pasha'nu umarinu ('we have transgressed and rebelled') uses both pasha (willful covenant violation) and marah (bitter rebellion) — the fullest admission of guilt. The blunt accusation attah lo salahta ('you have not forgiven') is not impudence but honest prayer: the community confesses sin and simultaneously tells God that his forgiveness has not yet come. This is the raw honesty that characterizes biblical lament.
- 43. Samekh () — first verse. The verb sakkotah ('you have covered/wrapped') portrays God as cloaked in anger — his wrath is his garment. The verb tirdefeinu ('you pursued us') makes God the pursuer and Israel the prey, echoing the predator imagery of verses 10-11. The phrase lo hamalta ('you showed no mercy') continues the refrain from chapter 2.
- 44. Samekh () — second verse. The cloud (anan) that once signified God's presence (Exodus 13:21, 40:34) has become a barrier blocking prayer. The irony is devastating: the pillar of cloud that guided Israel through the wilderness is now a wall preventing their prayers from reaching God. The verb me'avur ('from passing through') makes the barrier absolute — not even prayer penetrates.
- 45. Samekh () — third verse. The words sehi ('scrapings, filth') and ma'os ('refuse, something rejected') describe the lowest possible social status — Israel, once chosen and set apart (qadosh), has become garbage in the eyes of the nations. This reverses the election language of Deuteronomy 7:6.
- 46. Pe () — first verse. NOTE: The pe-ayin reversal continues from chapter 2; pe precedes ayin here as well. The enemies opening their mouths (patsu pihem) is a gesture of mockery and devouring — like predators opening their jaws. This echoes 2:16 almost verbatim, linking the two chapters.
- 47. Pe () — second verse. The pair pahad vapahat ('terror and pit') is a wordplay — the similar sounds create a sense of inescapability, like falling from one danger into another. Isaiah 24:17 uses the identical pair. The word hashe't ('devastation, ruin') and hashever ('destruction, breaking') pile up synonyms of catastrophe.
- 48. Pe () — third verse. The phrase palgei mayim ('channels of water, streams') for tears echoes Psalm 119:136. The speaker returns to first-person singular — the 'I' reasserts itself from the communal 'we.' The phrase bat ammi ('daughter of my people') personalizes the national catastrophe — this is not abstract destruction but the ruin of the speaker's own community.

49. Ayin () — first verse. Following pe in the reversed order. The verb niggerah ('pours out, trickles') and lo tidmeh ('does not cease') describe unending weeping. The word hafugot ('cessation, relief, pauses') means there is not even a break in the tears — the grief is constant and uninterrupted.
50. Ayin () — second verse. The verb yashqif ('looks down, gazes from above') implies that God is watching from a distance — heaven — and has not yet intervened. The expectation is that God will eventually look and act, but the 'until' (ad) sets an indefinite time frame. The sufferer weeps until God responds.
51. Ayin () — third verse. The phrase eini olelah lenafshi ('my eye does harm to my soul') means that what the speaker sees — the suffering of the young women (benot iri, 'daughters of my city') — wounds him internally. Sight becomes the channel of suffering; he cannot look away, and each sight of suffering women intensifies his grief.
52. Tsade () — first verse. The emphatic infinitive absolute tsod tsaduni ('hunting they hunted me') intensifies the pursuit. The comparison to a bird (katsipor) suggests a small, defenseless creature — the strong man (gever) of verse 1 has been reduced to prey. The phrase hinnam ('without cause, for nothing') protests innocence, shifting from the communal confession of verse 42 back to individual protest.
53. Tsade () — second verse. The bor ('pit, cistern') connects directly to Jeremiah's experience of being thrown into a cistern (Jeremiah 38:6). The verb tsamethu ('they cut off, they silenced') means the enemies attempted to destroy him completely. Throwing stones (even, 'stone') may refer to sealing the pit with a stone or to stoning — either way, it is an attempt to ensure permanent silence.
54. Tsade () — third verse. Water over the head is the language of drowning and of overwhelming suffering (Psalm 69:1-2, Psalm 42:7). The word nigzarti ('I am cut off') means severed from the living — the same root as the 'cutting off' of the Suffering Servant in Isaiah 53:8. The speaker has reached the point of believing death is certain.
55. Qof () — first verse. From the lowest point — the bottom of the pit (bor tahtiyot, 'the lowest pit') — the sufferer calls on the name of YHWH. This is the turning point: at the moment of greatest desperation, he prays. The phrase qarati shimkha ('I called your name') is intimate — not a generic cry for help but an invocation of the personal, covenant name of God.
56. Qof () — second verse. The shift is dramatic: shamata ('you heard') — God actually listened. After verses of silence and blocked prayer (v. 8, v. 44), the speaker testifies that God heard from the pit. The word revahati ('my relief, my breathing room') means the speaker is gasping — he needs space to breathe. The prayer is both testimony of past hearing and plea for continued attention.
57. Qof () — third verse. The verb qaravta ('you drew near') reverses the distance of the entire poem — God moves toward the sufferer instead of away. The divine word al tira ('do not be afraid') is the most frequent divine command in the Hebrew Bible, appearing in theophanies from Abraham to Isaiah. It is God's characteristic response to human fear. The sufferer's testimony is that God did not remain distant.
58. Resh () — first verse. The verb ravta ('you championed, you contended for') is legal language — God served as the sufferer's advocate in court. The verb ga'alta ('you redeemed') is the go'el verb — God acted as kinsman-redeemer, the nearest relative who is obligated by blood to rescue. This is covenant language: God did not help as a stranger but rescued as family.
59. Resh () — second verse. The word avvatati ('the wrong done to me, my injustice') can mean either 'my wrongdoing' or 'the wrong done against me' — context favors the latter, as the speaker has been unjustly persecuted. The imperative shoftah mishpati ('judge my case') asks God to serve as judge in the legal dispute between the sufferer and his enemies.
60. Resh () — third verse. The word niqmatam ('their vengeance') and mahshevotam ('their plots, their schemes') indicate that the enemies' attacks are both reactive (vengeance) and premeditated (plots). The appeal is to God as witness — you have seen means the evidence is in, and now the sufferer awaits the verdict.
61. Shin () — first verse. The verb shamata ('you heard') parallels ra'itah ('you saw') from verses 59-60 — God has both seen and heard all the evidence. The word herpatam ('their reproach, their insults') is the public shaming language used throughout Lamentations. The sufferer builds a legal case with accumulated evidence: you saw, you heard, now act.
62. Shin () — second verse. The word sifte ('lips of') is metonymy for speech, and hegionam ('their murmuring, their meditation') suggests constant, low-level scheming — not just open attack but whispered conspiracy. The phrase kol hayyom ('all day long') echoes verse 3 and verse 14, forming a frame: the speaker is struck all day (v. 3), mocked all day (v. 14), and plotted against all day (v. 62).
63. Shin () — third verse. The merism shivtam veqimatam ('their sitting and their rising') means 'everything they do' — at all times and in every activity, the speaker is their target. The word manginatam ('their song, their taunt-song') echoes verse 14 — the mocking has not ceased. The imperative habbitah ('look! watch!') is addressed to God, urging him to observe the ongoing ridicule.
64. Tav () — first verse. The final triad turns to imprecation — a prayer for divine justice against the enemies. The verb tashiv ('give back, repay') and gemul ('recompense, what is deserved') invoke the principle of proportional justice: let the punishment match the crime. This parallels 1:22 and connects to the broader biblical theology of divine retribution.
65. Tav () — second verse. The phrase meginnat lev ('covering/hardening of heart') may mean 'a shield over the heart' — a heart that cannot feel, cannot repent, cannot receive God's word. The word ta'alatekha ('your curse') is the covenant-curse vocabulary — the sufferer asks God to redirect the curses from Israel onto the enemies. This is not personal vengeance but an appeal to covenantal justice.

66. Tav ם — third and final verse, completing the 66-verse triple acrostic. The verb tirdof ('pursue') reverses the hunter-prey dynamic of verse 52 — now God is asked to pursue the enemies as they pursued the speaker. The phrase mitahat shemei YHWH ('from under the heavens of the LORD') means total annihilation — removal from existence under God's sky. The chapter ends not with the hope of verses 22-24 but with a cry for justice, reminding the reader that hope and lament coexist without resolution in this book. The acrostic from aleph to tav is complete — total suffering, total confession, total hope, total imprecation, all contained within the ordered structure of the alphabet.
