16. The other two shelamim subcategories — neder ('vow offering,' fulfilling a promise to God) and nedavah ('freewill offering,' spontaneous generosity) — have a more generous time limit: two days instead of one. The extra day may reflect the different social dynamic: a todah is a celebration with invited guests (urgency), while a vow or freewill offering may be a more private act of devotion (less urgency for communal consumption).
17. The absolute limit: nothing survives to the third day. The ba'esh yissaref ('it shall be burned in fire') is destructive burning (saraph), not sacrificial burning (hiqtir). The meat that was holy on day one and still edible on day two becomes forbidden on day three. The transition from sacred food to forbidden waste illustrates Leviticus's fundamental insight: holiness is not a permanent property of objects but a status that requires proper handling within defined boundaries.
18. The consequence of third-day consumption is devastating: the entire offering is retroactively invalidated (lo yeratseh — 'it will not be accepted'). The sacrifice is not merely wasted; it becomes piggul — a technical term for ritually offensive, repulsive meat. The offerer receives no credit (lo yechashev lo — 'it will not be reckoned to him'), and the eater bears guilt (avonah tissa). Mishandling sacred food after the deadline transforms what was holy into what is abominable.
19. Two rules govern the shelamim meat: impure meat is destroyed (ba'esh yissaref); pure meat may be eaten by anyone who is tahor ('ritually clean'). The phrase kol-tahor yokhal basar ('every clean person may eat meat') is notable — unlike the 'most holy' offerings restricted to male priests, the shelamim meat is open to any ritually clean Israelite. The shelamim is the most democratic offering: its meat goes to the broadest possible audience.
20. The penalty for eating sacred meat while tamei ('ritually impure') is karet — being 'cut off' (nikhretah) from the community. Karet is the most severe penalty in the Levitical system short of death — it may mean excommunication, divine punishment, premature death, or loss of covenantal standing. The sacred meal demands that participants be ritually fit; combining holy meat with impure status violates the holiness spectrum at its most dangerous intersection.
21. Three sources of contact impurity are specified: human (tum'at adam — bodily discharges, corpse contact), animal (behemah teme'ah — impure animal carcass), and swarming creatures (kol-sheqets tamei). Eating the shelamim while contaminated by any of these sources triggers karet. The thoroughness of the list ensures no loophole — every category of impurity is covered. The sacred meal is a boundary: only the ritually fit may cross it.
22. A new speech formula introduces the universal fat and blood prohibitions (v22-27) that apply to all Israelites, not just priests. These prohibitions extend beyond the sacrificial context to all eating — even in ordinary meals, fat and blood are forbidden.
23. The fat prohibition covers the three domesticated animals used in sacrifice: ox (shor), sheep (kesev), and goat (ez). The chelev ('suet, organ fat') — the fat covering the internal organs, kidneys, and liver lobe — belongs to God (3:16). This prohibition applies even when the animal is not being offered as a sacrifice. An Israelite slaughtering a sheep for dinner must still remove and discard the chelev. God's claim on the fat is universal, not limited to the altar.
24. A practical concession: chelev from nevelah (an animal that died naturally) or terefah (an animal killed by predators) may be used for non-food purposes — lamp oil, leather treatment, tool lubrication — but never eaten. The distinction between 'use' (ye'aseh lekhol-melakhah) and 'eat' (akhol lo tokheluhu) acknowledges that fat is a valuable material while maintaining the absolute eating prohibition. Pragmatism and holiness coexist.
25. Eating chelev from sacrificial animals (the three species of v23) triggers karet — the same penalty as eating sacred meat while impure (v20-21). The fat prohibition is given the highest possible enforcement. The specific phrasing — 'from which fire offerings are made' (asher yaqriv mimmennah issheh) — emphasizes that these are the animals whose fat belongs to God's altar. To eat what belongs to God is a form of theft from the divine.
26. The blood prohibition is even broader than the fat prohibition: it covers all blood (kol-dam), from both birds (of) and animals (behemah), in every location (bekhol moshvoteikhem). The universality is total — no blood, anywhere, ever. This prohibition, repeated from 3:17, will receive its full theological explanation in 17:11: 'the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you on the altar to make atonement for your lives.' Blood belongs to God because it carries life.

- 27. The third karet penalty in this chapter (after v20 and v25): eating blood results in being cut off. Three absolute prohibitions — impure person eating sacred meat, eating chelev, eating blood — are all enforced by the same maximum penalty. These three boundaries define what it means to be an Israelite at the most fundamental dietary level: respect the sacred meal, reserve fat for God, reserve blood for God. Crossing any of these lines severs the person's place in the community.
- 28. The final speech formula in the offering legislation introduces the priestly portions from the shelamim (v28-36): the wave breast and the contribution thigh. These verses specify the mechanics of the offering elevation and the permanent priestly allotment.
- 29. The worshipper's responsibility: bring the specific portions designated for the LORD's altar and the priest's table. The repetition of 'peace offering' (zevach shelamav) three times in one verse emphasizes that the shelamim — unlike the olah or chata't — requires the worshipper's active participation beyond slaughter. The worshipper must personally bring the fat and the priestly portions forward.
- 30. The emphasis on yadav tevieinah ('his own hands shall bring') makes the worshipper's physical involvement explicit. The fat and the breast are brought together — the fat for the altar, the breast for the priest. The tenufah ('wave offering' — a ritual elevation or presentation before the LORD) is performed with the breast: it is shown to God before being given to the priest. God sees what He gives to the priest; the priestly portion passes through divine acknowledgment.
- 31. The division is clean: fat to the altar (God's portion), breast to Aaron's family (priestly portion). The breast (chazeh) is a substantial cut — the chest portion of the animal. Combined with the thigh (v32-34), it provides meaningful sustenance for the priestly household. The shelamim thus achieves its fullest expression as a three-way meal: God (fat), priest (breast and thigh), worshipper (everything else).
- 32. The shoq hayyamin ('right thigh') is the second priestly portion from the shelamim. The right side carries significance — the right hand is the hand of power and blessing. The terumah ('contribution') is the portion 'lifted up' or 'set apart' from the sacrifice for the priest. The breast goes through the tenufah (wave) before God; the thigh is given directly as terumah (contribution) to the priest.
- 33. The right thigh goes specifically to the priest who performs the blood-and-fat ritual — the one who does the actual altar work. The word manah ('portion, allotment') is used for assigned shares. The system creates direct accountability: the priest who serves at the altar is the priest who eats from it. Service and sustenance are linked.
- 34. God speaks in the first person: laqachti... va'etten ('I have taken... and I have given'). The priestly food allotment is a divine act, not a human arrangement. God takes the breast and thigh from Israel and gives them to the priesthood. The phrase choq-olam me'et benei Yisra'el ('a permanent allotment from the Israelites') makes this a permanent covenant provision — the priestly portion is guaranteed for all generations.
- 35. The word mishchat ('anointing portion, consecration allotment') connects the priestly food rights to their original anointing and consecration. The allocation was established beyom hiqriv otam ('on the day he presented them') — from the very beginning of the priesthood, God designated their food supply. The priestly portion is not a later addition but an integral part of the original priestly institution.
- 36. The phrase chuqkat olam ledorotam ('a permanent statute for their generations') seals the priestly allotment as perpetual law. The double temporal framing — 'from the day of their anointing' (past) and 'for all their generations' (future) — makes the provision both historically grounded and permanently binding.
- 37. The grand summary: zot hattorah ('this is the instruction') covers all six offering categories — the five standard offerings (olah, minchah, chata't, asham, shelamim) plus the millu'im ('ordination offering' — the consecration sacrifice for priests, described in ch 8-9). The list follows the order of presentation: olah first (ch 1), then minchah (ch 2), chata't (ch 4), asham (ch 5), millu'im (ch 8), and shelamim last (ch 3/7). The sacrificial system is now legislatively complete.
- 38. The closing verse anchors the entire offering system in its Sinai origin: asher tsivvah YHWH et-Mosheh behar Sinai ('which the LORD commanded Moses on Mount Sinai'). The sacrificial system is not a human invention but a divine gift, delivered at the same mountain where the covenant was cut and the law was given. The phrase bemidbar Sinai ('in the wilderness of Sinai') places the legislation in its historical moment — Israel in the desert, between Egypt and Canaan, learning how to live with a holy God in their midst. Leviticus 1-7 is now complete: seven chapters, five offerings, one comprehensive system for approaching the God who dwells among His people.

Summary: Moses ordains Aaron and his sons as priests before the entire congregation, carrying out the instructions of Exodus 29. He washes, vests, anoints, and offers a sin offering, burnt offering, and ordination ram. Blood is placed on Aaron's right ear, thumb, and big toe.

What Makes This Remarkable: Moses serves as the officiating priest -- the only time he fills this role -- because Aaron cannot consecrate himself. The sevenfold refrain "as the LORD commanded" (vv 4, 9, 13, 17, 21, 29, 36) structures the chapter as a liturgy of exact obedience, echoing the sevenfold creation pattern. Blood on the ear, thumb, and toe consecrates the priest's hearing, work, and walk.

Translation Friction: The phrase millu'im ("ordination," literally "filling of the hands") describes the installation by filling the priests' hands with offering portions. We rendered it "ordination" for clarity while noting in the text that the Hebrew idiom means empowerment through what is placed in one's hands. The anointing oil (shemen hammishchah) is the specially formulated blend of Exodus 30:22-33, and we marked its sacred exclusivity.

Connections: The chapter fulfills Exodus 29 point by point. The public ceremony before the congregation parallels the public commissioning of Joshua (Num 27:18-23). The blood application to ear, thumb, and toe reappears in the purification of the healed leper (Lev 14:14), linking priestly consecration to restoration from impurity.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Take Aaron and his sons along with him, the vestments, the anointing oil, the bull for the sin offering, the two rams, and the basket of unleavened bread. ³Assemble the entire congregation at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ⁴Moses did as the LORD commanded him, and the congregation assembled at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ⁵Moses said to the congregation, 'This is what the LORD has commanded to be done.' ⁶Moses brought Aaron and his sons forward and washed them with water. ⁷He placed the tunic on him, fastened the sash around him, dressed him in the robe, placed the ephod on him, tied the decorated band of the ephod around him, and secured it on him. ⁸He placed the breastpiece on him, and he put the Urim and the Thummim into the breastpiece. ⁹He set the turban on his head, and on the turban, on its front, he placed the gold plate — the holy crown — as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹⁰Moses took the anointing oil and anointed the tabernacle and everything in it, consecrating them. ¹¹He sprinkled some of it on the altar seven times and anointed the altar and all its utensils, and the basin and its stand, to consecrate them. ¹²He poured the anointing oil on Aaron's head and anointed him, consecrating him. ¹³Moses brought Aaron's sons forward, dressed them in tunics, fastened sashes around them, and bound caps on them, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹⁴He brought forward the bull for the sin offering, and Aaron and his sons laid their hands on the head of the bull for the sin offering. ¹⁵He slaughtered it, and Moses took the blood and applied it to the horns of the altar all around with his finger. He purified the altar, poured out the remaining blood at the base of the altar, and consecrated it to make atonement on it. ¹⁶He took all the fat that covered the entrails, the lobe of the liver, and the two kidneys with their fat, and Moses burned them on the altar. ¹⁷But the bull — its hide, its flesh, and its dung — he burned with fire outside the camp, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹⁸He then brought forward the ram designated for the burnt offering. Aaron and his sons placed their hands on the ram's head. ¹⁹He slaughtered it, and Moses dashed the blood against the sides of the altar. ²⁰He cut the ram into its sections, and Moses burned the head, the sections, and the suet on the altar. ²¹He washed the entrails and the lower legs with water, and Moses burned the entire ram on the altar. It was a burnt offering — a pleasing aroma, a food offering to the LORD, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²²He brought forward the second ram — the ram of ordination — and Aaron and his sons laid their hands on the head of the ram. ²³He slaughtered it, and Moses took some of its blood and applied it to the lobe of Aaron's right ear, to the thumb of his right hand, and to the big toe of his right foot. ²⁴He brought Aaron's sons forward, and Moses applied some of the blood to the lobe of their right ear, to the thumb of their right hand, and to the big toe of their right foot. Then Moses dashed the remaining blood against the sides of the altar. ²⁵He took the fat, the fat tail, all the fat covering the entrails, the lobe of the liver, the two kidneys with their fat, and the right thigh. ²⁶From the basket of unleavened bread that was before the LORD, he took one unleavened loaf, one oil-bread loaf, and one wafer, and placed them on the fat portions and on the right thigh. ²⁷He placed all of it on Aaron's palms and on his sons' palms, and elevated them as a wave offering before the LORD. ²⁸Moses took them from their palms and burned them on the altar on top of the burnt offering. They were the ordination offering — a pleasing aroma, a food offering to the LORD. ²⁹Moses took the breast portion and elevated it as a wave offering before the LORD. From the ram of ordination, this was Moses's share, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁰Moses took some of the anointing oil and some of the blood from the altar and sprinkled them on Aaron and on his vestments, and on his sons and on his sons' vestments with him. He consecrated Aaron and his vestments, and his sons and his sons' vestments with him. ³¹Moses said to Aaron and his sons, 'Cook the meat at the entrance of the tent of meeting, and eat it there with the bread that is in the basket of ordination offerings, as I was commanded, saying: Aaron and his sons shall eat it.' ³²Whatever remains of the meat and the bread you shall burn with fire.

³³You must not leave the entrance of the tent of meeting for seven days, until the period of your ordination is complete, for it takes seven days to fill your hands with authority. ³⁴What has been done today, the LORD commanded to be done in order to make atonement for you. ³⁵You shall remain at the entrance of the tent of meeting day and night for seven days, keeping the LORD's charge, so that you do not die — for this is what I have been commanded. ³⁶Aaron and his sons carried out everything that the LORD had commanded through Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Leviticus 8 is the narrative fulfillment of the ordination instructions given in Exodus 29. The chapter is structured as a step-by-step account of Moses carrying out each divine command. Moses serves as the officiating priest — the only time he functions in this role — because Aaron and his sons cannot consecrate themselves.
2. The materials for ordination are listed: priestly garments (begadim), anointing oil (shemen hammishchah), a bull for the sin offering (par hachata't), two rams (shenei ha'eilim — one for the burnt offering, one for the ordination offering), and unleavened bread (sal hammatst). Each element serves a specific function in the ceremony that follows. The anointing oil is the specially formulated blend described in Exodus 30:22-33, reserved exclusively for sacred use.
3. The ordination is a public event — the entire community (kol ha'edah) must witness the installation of their priests. The entrance of the tent of meeting (petach ohel mo'ed) is the threshold between common and sacred space, the location where heaven and earth intersect. The public nature of the ceremony establishes priestly authority before the community, not behind closed doors.
4. The phrase vayya'as Mosheh ka'asher tsivvah YHWH oto ('Moses did as the LORD commanded him') is the refrain of this chapter — it appears seven times (vv 4, 9, 13, 17, 21, 29, 36), structuring the entire ceremony as obedient execution of divine command. Every step Moses takes is authorized from above.
5. Moses announces the ceremony's divine authorization before the entire community. The phrase zeh haddavar ('this is the word/thing') establishes that what follows is not Moses's invention but God's prescription. The congregation serves as witness to the divine origin of the priestly office.
6. The ceremony begins with washing (rechitsah) — ritual purification before vesting. The Hebrew vayirchats otam ('he washed them') uses the same verb as the purification rituals in chapters 14-15. The priests must be ritually clean before they can be consecrated. Moses personally performs the washing — he is functioning as priest over the priests-to-be.
7. The vesting sequence dresses Aaron layer by layer, from innermost to outermost: kuttonet (tunic — the base garment), avnet (sash — tied at the waist), me'il (robe — the blue robe with bells and pomegranates), and efod (ephod — the outer vestment with shoulder straps). The cheshev ha'efod ('the decorated band/waistband of the ephod') holds the ephod in place. Each garment was described in Exodus 28; here they are placed on Aaron in the prescribed order.
8. The choshen (breastpiece — set with twelve stones representing the twelve tribes) is placed on Aaron's chest, and the Urim and Thummim are inserted into it. The Urim veTummim ('Lights and Perfections') are objects used for divine inquiry — their exact nature is unknown, but they functioned as a means of receiving God's guidance on specific decisions (cf. 1 Samuel 28:6). Their placement inside the breastpiece means the high priest literally carries God's means of revelation against his heart.
9. The mitsnefet (turban — the high priest's head covering) is crowned with the tsits hazahav ('gold plate/flower'), also called nezer haqqodesh ('the holy crown' or 'the diadem of holiness'). This plate bears the inscription 'Holy to the LORD' (qodesh laYHWH — Exodus 28:36). It is the most visible marker of the high priest's consecrated status, positioned el mul panav ('facing forward, on his forehead') so that it is the first thing anyone approaching the high priest sees.
10. Before anointing the priests, Moses anoints the sacred space and its furnishings. The verb mashach ('to anoint') and the verb qiddesh ('to consecrate, to set apart as holy') are paired — anointing is the physical act, consecration is the resulting status change. The tabernacle must be holy before the priests who serve in it are made holy. The order is significant: sanctify the space, then sanctify the personnel.
11. The altar receives special attention: sevenfold sprinkling (sheva pe'amim — the number of completeness) plus anointing. The basin (kiyyor) and its stand (kanno) — the washing station where priests purify their hands and feet before ministering (Exodus 30:18-21) — are also anointed. Every piece of sacred furniture transitions from common to holy through this oil application.
12. The verb yatsaq ('poured') indicates generous application — not a dab but a pouring. Psalm 133:2 describes this oil running down Aaron's beard and onto the collar of his robes. The anointing separates Aaron from every other Israelite: he is now mashiach ('anointed one') — the same term that becomes 'Messiah.' The act marks the transition from Aaron the man to Aaron the high priest.
13. Aaron's sons receive simpler vestments than Aaron: tunics (kuttonot), sashes (avnet), and caps (migba'ot) — no ephod, no breastpiece, no gold plate. The distinction in garments reflects the distinction in office: the high priest alone bears the full regalia. The sons serve as ordinary priests. The refrain ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses') appears again.
14. The sacrificial sequence begins with the sin offering (chata't), following the order established in Leviticus 4. The laying on of hands (semikhat yadayim) transfers identification from the offerer to the animal — Aaron and his sons identify themselves with this sacrifice. The sin offering purifies the altar and sacred space for priestly use. Even the priests-to-be need purification before they can serve.

15. Moses performs the blood ritual: application to the altar's horns (qarnot hamizbeach — the projections at each corner), purification of the altar (vayechatte — from the root ch-t', the same root as chata't), pouring the remainder at the base (yesod hamizbeach), and consecration (vayyeqaddeshhu). The phrase lekhafter alav ('to make atonement on it') uses the kippur verb — the altar itself needs atonement before it can receive offerings. The altar must be ritually pure before it can purify others.
16. The fat portions (chelev) are God's portion — they are always burned on the altar, never eaten (cf. 3:16-17, 7:23-25). The specific organs listed — the fat covering the entrails (chelev asher al haqqerev), the liver lobe (yoteret hakkaved), and the kidneys with their fat — are the same portions prescribed for every sin offering in Leviticus 4. Moses follows the standard procedure exactly.
17. The remainder of the sin offering bull is burned (saraph — total destruction by fire, not the altar-burning of hiqtir) outside the camp (michutz lammachaneh). This follows the rule for sin offerings whose blood is brought inside the sanctuary (4:11-12, 6:30). The carcass is too holy to be eaten and too contaminated by absorbed sin to remain in the camp. It is destroyed in the liminal space outside — neither sacred nor common.
18. The second sacrifice is the burnt offering (olah) — complete devotion, entirely consumed on the altar. Again, Aaron and his sons lay their hands on the animal's head, identifying themselves with the offering. The sequence of offerings in the ordination mirrors the sequence in Leviticus 1-7: sin offering first (purification), then burnt offering (total devotion), then the unique ordination offering (vv 22-29).
19. The blood of the burnt offering is dashed (zaraq — splashed or thrown, not carefully applied) against the altar's sides (saviv — 'round about'). This contrasts with the sin offering blood, which was applied precisely to the altar's horns with the finger (v 15). The different blood-application methods correspond to different offering types and their distinct functions.
20. The ram is sectioned (nittach lintachav — 'cut into its sections'), and all parts are burned: head (ro'sh), sections (netachim), and suet (peder — the internal fat surrounding the kidneys, distinct from chelev). The entire animal goes to the altar — nothing is held back, which is the defining characteristic of the burnt offering.
21. The entrails and legs are washed before burning — purifying the portions that contact unclean matter (digestive contents, ground dirt). The completed offering is described with three terms: olah ('burnt offering' — total consumption), re'ach nichoach ('a pleasing aroma' — the scent ascending to God), and ishsheh ('food offering' — an offering consumed by fire for God). The sensory language — God 'smells' the offering — is anthropomorphic but theologically significant: the sacrifice pleases God.
22. The third and most distinctive sacrifice is the eil hammillu'im ('the ram of ordination' — literally 'the ram of filling'). The term millu'im comes from the idiom mille yad ('to fill the hand'), which means to authorize, to install in office, to empower for a role. The ordination sacrifice is unique to this ceremony — it has no parallel in the regular offering system of Leviticus 1-7.
23. The blood-application ritual — right ear lobe (tenukh ozen), right thumb (bohen yad), right big toe (bohen regel) — consecrates Aaron's entire person through three extremities: what he hears (ear), what he does (hand), and where he walks (foot). This identical ritual appears in the purification of the healed skin-disease patient (14:14), creating a striking parallel: the healed person and the new priest undergo the same consecration ceremony. Both are being set apart for renewed access to God's presence.
24. Aaron's sons receive the same ear-thumb-toe blood application as Aaron — the consecration of the whole person applies equally to all priests, not just the high priest. The remaining blood is dashed against the altar (vayizroq... al hamizbeach saviv), completing the blood ritual by returning it to the altar where God receives it.
25. The ordination ram's portions include the standard fat sections plus two additions unique to this sacrifice: the alyah ('fat tail' — the broad, fatty tail of the Near Eastern fat-tailed sheep, considered a delicacy) and the shoq hayyamin ('the right thigh'). The right thigh normally belongs to the priest (7:32-33), but in the ordination ceremony it is offered on the altar because the priests are not yet installed — they cannot receive their priestly portion until the ordination is complete.
26. Three types of bread from the basket: challat matsah (an unleavened loaf), challat lechem shemen (an oil-bread loaf — bread mixed with oil), and raiq (a thin wafer). These three breads represent the grain offering component of the ordination. They are stacked on top of the fat portions and the right thigh, creating a composite offering that combines animal sacrifice and grain offering.
27. This is the climactic moment: Moses places the entire composite offering — fat, thigh, and breads — on the open palms (kappei) of Aaron and his sons. Their hands are literally 'filled' (the millu'im idiom enacted physically). The wave offering (tenufah — a ritual elevation or horizontal movement before the LORD) presents the offering to God while it rests in the priests' hands. At this moment, the priests hold their calling — the priesthood is placed in their hands.
28. Moses transfers the offering from the priests' hands to the altar — from the human realm to the divine. The ordination portions are burned on top of (al) the burnt offering from verses 18-21, layering the ordination sacrifice over the whole-devotion sacrifice. The designation millu'im hem ('they are ordination offerings') identifies these portions as belonging to a unique category — neither sin offering, burnt offering, nor peace offering, but the ordination offering.
29. The breast (chazeh) — normally the priest's portion (7:31) — goes to Moses in this unique ceremony because Moses is functioning as the officiating priest. The phrase leMosheh hayah lemanah ('it was Moses's share/portion') acknowledges that the one who performs the priestly service receives the priestly portion. This is the only sacrifice in which Moses personally receives a share of the offering.

30. Oil and blood are mixed and sprinkled together on the priests and their garments — the only time in the Levitical system where oil and blood are combined in a single application. Both the persons and their clothing are consecrated (vayyeqaddesh) — holiness extends from the wearer to the garment. The comprehensive list — Aaron, Aaron's garments, his sons, his sons' garments — is stated twice to emphasize that every person and every item of clothing is now set apart for sacred service.
31. The ordination includes a communal meal — Aaron and his sons eat the remaining meat and bread from the ordination offering. The verb bashlu ('cook, boil') indicates preparation by boiling (distinct from roasting). This shared meal at the entrance of the tent of meeting echoes the covenant meal on Sinai (Exodus 24:9-11) where the elders ate and drank in God's presence. The priestly ordination meal establishes the same intimacy with God.
32. Leftover consecrated food must be burned — it cannot be saved for later or given to non-priests. The sanctity of the ordination meal is time-limited: what is not consumed during the ceremony is destroyed. This prevents sacred food from becoming common through delayed consumption or careless handling.
33. The seven-day ordination period requires the priests to remain at the tent of meeting continuously — they cannot leave (lo tetse'u) for the full duration. The phrase shiv'at yamim yemalle et yedkhem ('seven days he will fill your hands') uses the millu'im idiom explicitly: the hand-filling (ordination) takes a complete week. The number seven signifies completeness — the priests are fully and completely set apart for their office.
34. The entire ordination ceremony is summarized as an act of atonement (lekha'per aleikhem — 'to make atonement for you'). The kippur here covers the priests' own need for purification before they can serve as intermediaries between God and the people. The priests who will perform atonement for others must first receive atonement themselves — no one approaches God's holiness uncovered.
35. The warning velo tamutu ('so that you do not die') introduces the deadly seriousness of the priestly office — failure to observe the ordination requirements results in death. The phrase ushmartem et mishmeret YHWH ('you shall keep the LORD's charge/watch') describes the priestly duty as a standing guard — they are sentinels of holiness. The next chapter (Lev 9) records the first day of active priestly service; the chapter after that (Lev 10) records what happens when priestly duty is violated.
36. The final obedience formula closes the chapter: Aaron and his sons did kol haddevarim ('all the things') — complete compliance with every detail. The phrase beyad Mosheh ('through the hand of Moses') acknowledges Moses's unique mediating role — the commands come from God but are transmitted through Moses. The section marker (samekh) closes the ordination narrative. Chapter 9 records what happens on the eighth day, when the ordained priests begin their active ministry.

Summary: On the eighth day after ordination, Aaron offers his first sacrifices as high priest -- a calf for sin and a ram for burnt offering -- and the people bring their own offerings. After Aaron blesses the people, fire comes from the LORD and consumes the offerings. The people shout and fall on their faces.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the climactic moment of the entire tabernacle narrative that began in Exodus 25. Aaron's calf offering may deliberately recall his golden calf sin -- the same animal form used for idolatry now used for purification. The divine fire that consumes the offering (v24) confirms God's acceptance and His dwelling among Israel. Everything built since Sinai becomes functional on this day.

Translation Friction: *The verb vayyar ("appeared," v23) carries the full weight of theophany -- we rendered it "the glory of the LORD appeared" to preserve the visual force. The people's response vayyaronnu ("they shouted," v24) needed to convey joyful acclamation, not mere noise. We chose "shouted with joy" to capture the celebratory tone of a community witnessing divine acceptance for the first time.*

Connections: The fire from the LORD echoes the fire on Abraham's altar (Gen 15:17) and anticipates Elijah's Mount Carmel contest (1 Kgs 18:38). The eighth-day timing connects to circumcision's eighth day (Gen 17:12) and the eschatological "eighth day" of new creation. The contrast with the next chapter (Nadab and Abihu) is devastating -- the same fire that accepts also judges.

1On the eighth day, Moses summoned Aaron, his sons, and the elders of Israel. 2He said to Aaron, 'Take for yourself a young bull calf for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering, both without defect, and present them before the LORD. 3And to the children of Israel you shall say: Take a male goat for a sin offering, and a calf and a yearling lamb, both without defect, for a burnt offering, 4and a bull and a ram as peace offerings to sacrifice before the LORD, along with a grain offering mixed with oil — for today the LORD will appear to you.' 5They brought what Moses had commanded to the front of the tent of meeting. The entire congregation drew near and stood before the LORD. ⁶Moses said, 'This is what the LORD has commanded you to do, so that the glory of the LORD may appear to you.' ⁷Moses said to Aaron, 'Approach the altar and perform your sin offering and your burnt offering, and make atonement for yourself and for the people. Then perform the people's offering and make atonement for them, as the LORD has commanded.' ⁸Aaron approached the altar and slaughtered the calf of the sin offering that was for himself. ⁹Aaron's sons brought the blood to him. He dipped his finger in the blood and applied it to the horns of the altar, then poured out the remaining blood at the base of the altar. ¹⁰The fat, the kidneys, and the lobe of the liver from the sin offering he burned on the altar, as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹¹The flesh and the hide he burned with fire outside the camp. ¹²He slaughtered the burnt offering, and Aaron's sons handed him the blood, which he dashed against the sides of the altar. ¹³They handed him the burnt offering piece by piece, including the head, and he burned them on the altar. ¹⁴He washed the entrails and the lower legs and burned them on the altar along with the burnt offering. ¹⁵Then he brought forward the people's offering. He took the goat of the sin offering that was for the people, slaughtered it, and presented it as a sin offering in the same manner as the first. ¹⁶He brought forward the burnt offering and performed it according to the prescribed procedure. ¹⁷He brought forward the grain offering, took a handful from it, and burned it on the altar — in addition to the morning burnt offering. ¹⁸He slaughtered the bull and the ram as the peace offerings for the people. Aaron's sons handed him the blood, and he dashed it against the sides of the altar. ¹⁹The fat portions from the bull and the ram — the fat tail, the fat covering the entrails, the kidneys, and the lobe of the liver — ²⁰they placed the fat portions on the breast pieces, and he burned the fat on the altar. ²¹Aaron elevated the breast portions and the right thigh as a wave offering before the LORD, as Moses had commanded. ²²Aaron raised his hands toward the people and blessed them. Then he stepped down from performing the sin offering, the burnt offering, and the peace offerings. ²³Moses and Aaron entered the tent of meeting. When they came out, they blessed the people — and the glory of the LORD appeared to all the people. ²⁴Fire came out from before the LORD and consumed the burnt offering and the fat portions on the altar. When all the people saw it, they cried out in joy and fell on their faces.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The eighth day (hayyom hashemini) follows the seven-day ordination period of chapter 8. This is the inaugural day of the tabernacle's active operation — the day when everything built since Exodus 25 becomes functional. The elders (ziquei Yisra'el) are summoned as representatives of the entire nation. This is the most anticipated day since Sinai: the moment when God will confirm that He has indeed come to dwell among His people.
2. Aaron's personal offerings are specified first: a calf (egel ben baqar) for the sin offering and a ram for the burnt offering. The choice of a calf for Aaron's sin offering may be deliberately significant — Aaron had made a golden calf (egel) as the idol in Exodus 32. His first official priestly act involves offering a calf as a sin offering. Some interpreters see this as an intentional atonement for that specific sin: the same animal form used for idolatry is now used for purification.
3. The people's offerings are separate from Aaron's: a goat for their sin offering (se'ir izzim — male goat), and both a calf and a lamb for their burnt offering. The variety of animals — goat, calf, lamb — represents the full range of sacrificial livestock. All must be temimim ('without defect'), the consistent requirement for sacrificial fitness.
4. Four offering types in one ceremony: sin offering (chata't), burnt offering (olah), peace offerings (shelamim — the fellowship meal shared between God, priest, and worshipper), and grain offering (minchah). The closing phrase is electrifying: ki hayyom YHWH nir'ah aleikhem ('for today the LORD will appear to you'). The entire sacrificial system reaches its purpose — God's visible manifestation among His people. Everything since Exodus 25:8 ('let them make Me a sanctuary, that I may dwell among them') has been building toward this moment.
5. The entire congregation (kol ha'edah) comes forward and stands before the LORD (lifnei YHWH). This is the largest assembly since Sinai — the whole nation present for the inauguration of regular worship. The phrase vayyiqrevu ('they drew near') uses the same root as qorban ('offering') — the people themselves approach, not just their sacrifices.
6. Moses makes the connection explicit: obedience (ta'asu — 'you shall do') leads to theophany (veyera aleikhem kevod YHWH — 'the glory of the LORD will appear to you'). The kavod (glory — the weighty, tangible presence of God) is promised as the direct result of carrying out the sacrificial instructions. The purpose of the entire offering system is condensed into this single statement: do this, and God's presence will be visible.
7. Aaron's first command as high priest: qerav el hamizbeach ('approach the altar'). The verb qarav ('approach, draw near') is the root of qorban ('offering') — the priest's approach to the altar is itself a sacred act. The two-stage atonement is critical: first kapper ba'adekha ('make atonement for yourself'), then kapper ba'adam ('make atonement for them'). The priest must be purified before he can purify others. The mediator must first be reconciled before he can reconcile.

8. Aaron's first act as priest: slaughtering his own sin offering. The calf (egel) that he kills may recall the golden calf (egel) he made — the priest's first sacrifice undoes the priest's greatest sin. The Hebrew vayishchat ('he slaughtered') marks the moment Aaron begins functioning in the role for which he has been ordained.
9. The priestly teamwork begins: Aaron's sons collect and carry the blood, Aaron applies it. The blood ritual follows the sin offering procedure from Leviticus 4: finger-application to the altar horns (precise, deliberate) and pouring the remainder at the base. The sons' role as blood-bearers (vayyaqrivu... et haddam elav — 'they brought the blood to him') establishes their function as supporting priests.
10. The standard fat portions — chelev (fat), kelayot (kidneys), yoteret hakkaved (liver lobe) — are burned on the altar. The refrain ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses') reappears, maintaining the theme of exact obedience that runs through chapters 8-9.
11. As prescribed for the sin offering (4:11-12, 8:17), the carcass is burned (saraph — destructive burning, not altar-burning) outside the camp. The sin offering absorbs contamination; the contaminated remains must be removed from the holy community.
12. The burnt offering blood is dashed (zaraq — splashed, thrown) rather than applied with the finger as in the sin offering. The sons continue as the blood-handling team. The burnt offering follows the sin offering — the sequence moves from purification to total devotion.
13. The burnt offering is presented in its sectioned pieces (lintacheiha — 'in its sections') along with the head. Each piece is burned individually on the altar. The sons' role in passing each piece to Aaron creates an assembly-line rhythm — the priesthood functioning as a coordinated team for the first time.
14. The entrails (qerev) and legs (kera'ayim) are washed before burning to remove impurities. This completes Aaron's personal offerings — sin offering (vv 8-11) and burnt offering (vv 12-14). Aaron is now atoned for and wholly devoted. He can proceed to the people's offerings.
15. Aaron transitions from his personal offerings to the people's offerings (qorban ha'am). The goat sin offering for the people follows the same procedure (karishon — 'as the first') as Aaron's personal calf sin offering. The verb vaychatt'ehu ('he offered it as a sin offering / he purified with it') uses the piel form of chata' — the intensive form meaning 'to purify, to de-sin.'
16. The people's burnt offering is performed kammishpat ('according to the ordinance/prescribed procedure') — the standard method established in Leviticus 1. The brevity of this verse contrasts with the detailed descriptions in chapter 1 — by now the procedure is established and needs only a reference.
17. The grain offering (minchah) follows the burnt offering. Aaron takes a handful (vayemalle khappo — 'he filled his palm') as the memorial portion (azkarah — cf. 2:2) to be burned on the altar. The phrase milvad olat habboqer ('in addition to the morning burnt offering') indicates that the regular daily offerings (tamid) have already begun alongside the inaugural ceremony. The daily routine and the special inauguration operate simultaneously.
18. The peace offerings (zevach hashlamim — 'sacrifice of the peace/fellowship offerings') are the final animal sacrifices. The peace offering is the only offering the worshipper eats — it is a shared meal between God (who receives the fat), the priest (who receives the breast and thigh), and the worshipper (who eats the rest). This communal eating will follow the ceremony — the community celebrating God's presence together.
19. The fat portions from both peace offering animals are listed: alyah (fat tail), hamekhasseh (the fat covering the entrails), kelayot (kidneys), and yoteret hakkaved (liver lobe). These are God's portion — the richest, choicest parts of the animal, reserved exclusively for the altar.
20. The fat is stacked on top of the breast portions (chazot) before the fat is removed and burned. The breasts are the priest's share (7:31) — they will be given to Aaron after the fat is burned on the altar. The choreography separates what goes to God (the fat, burned) from what goes to the priest (the breast, waved then eaten).
21. Aaron performs the tenufah ('wave offering' — a ritual elevation before the LORD) with the priestly portions: the breasts (chazot) and the right thigh (shoq hayyamin). These are now Aaron's to eat as his priestly share (7:31-34). The phrase ka'asher tsivvah Mosheh ('as Moses commanded') shifts the authority reference from 'as the LORD commanded' — Moses is now the intermediary of God's instructions.
22. Aaron's first priestly blessing: vayissa Aharon et yadav el ha'am vayeavarekhem ('Aaron lifted his hands toward the people and blessed them'). This is likely the priestly blessing of Numbers 6:24-26 ('The LORD bless you and keep you...'), though the text does not specify the words. The verb vayyered ('he descended') indicates the altar was elevated — Aaron comes down from the altar platform. The three offering types are summarized: sin offering, burnt offering, peace offerings — purification, devotion, and fellowship accomplished.
23. This verse is the climax of everything since Exodus 25. Moses and Aaron enter the tent of meeting together — the last time Moses enters the tent in this mediating role — and when they emerge and bless the people, the kavod appears. The phrase vayyera kevod YHWH el kol ha'am ('the glory of the LORD appeared to all the people') fulfills the promise of verse 6 and of Exodus 29:43-46. The entire tabernacle project — design, construction, furnishing, priestly ordination, and inaugural sacrifices — reaches its purpose in this single moment: God's visible presence among His people.
23. The entry and exit of Moses and Aaron from the tent may represent the transition of mediating authority: Moses, who has carried the mediating role since Sinai, enters with Aaron; they emerge together; from this point forward, Aaron and his descendants will serve as the ongoing mediators.
24. Divine fire (esh milifnei YHWH — 'fire from before the LORD') descends and consumes the offering on the altar. This is God's visible acceptance of the sacrifice — He does not merely receive it passively but actively, dramatically takes it. The people's response combines vocal praise (vayyarannu — 'they cried out, they shouted in joy') and physical prostration (vayyipellu al peneihem — 'they fell on their faces'). The shout is not fear but exultation — the combination of awe and joy that comes from encountering the living God who has chosen to dwell among them.

24. This fire becomes the sacred fire that must never go out (6:12-13). The fire that God Himself kindled will burn continuously on the altar as a perpetual sign of His presence. Chapter 10 immediately follows with the tragic account of what happens when unauthorized fire is brought into this sacred space.

Summary: Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu offer unauthorized fire and are consumed by divine fire. Aaron is silent. Moses instructs on priestly mourning restrictions, prohibits wine before tabernacle service, and commands the priests to distinguish between holy and common, clean and unclean.

What Makes This Remarkable: The phrase vayyiddom Aharon ("and Aaron was silent") is one of the most psychologically acute moments in the Torah -- the word implies not quiet assent but stunned, enforced stillness. The same fire that accepted the inaugural offerings in 9:24 now consumes the priests. The term esh zarah ("unauthorized fire") is deliberately vague; the text never specifies exactly what was wrong, only that it was "not commanded."

Translation Friction: We rendered esh zarah as "unauthorized fire" rather than "strange fire" (KJV) because zarah here means "not commanded" rather than "foreign." The sin was unauthorized approach, not necessarily wrong ingredients. The verb vayyiddom required care: from damam ("to be still, to cease"), it carries shock, grief, and submission in a single word. We chose "was silent" and let the notes carry the emotional weight.

Connections: Moses's theological interpretation -- bigrovai eqqadesh ("among those near Me I will show Myself holy," v3) -- anticipates Ezekiel's similar principle (Ezek 28:22). The wine prohibition (v9) connects to the Nazirite vow (Num 6:3) and John the Baptist's abstinence (Luke 1:15). The mandate to "distinguish between holy and common" (v10) becomes the organizing principle for chapters 11-15.

¹Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu each took his fire pan, put fire in it, placed incense on it, and offered unauthorized fire before the LORD — which He had not commanded them. ²Fire came out from before the LORD and consumed them, and they died before the LORD. ³Moses said to Aaron, "This is what the LORD meant when He said: 'Among those who draw near to Me I will show Myself holy, and before all the people I will display My glory.'" And Aaron was silent. ⁴Moses called Mishael and Elzaphan, sons of Aaron's uncle Uzziel, and said to them, "Come forward. Carry your relatives away from the front of the sanctuary, outside the camp." ⁵They came forward and carried them out of the camp, still in their tunics, as Moses had instructed. ⁶Moses said to Aaron and to his remaining sons Eleazar and Ithamar, "Do not let your hair hang loose and do not tear your garments, or you will die and wrath will fall on the entire community. But your relatives — all the house of Israel — may weep over the burning that the LORD has brought about. ⁷You must not leave the entrance of the tent of meeting, or you will die, for the LORD's anointing oil is upon you." They did as Moses instructed. ⁸The LORD spoke to Aaron: ⁹"You and your sons with you must not drink wine or fermented drink when you enter the tent of meeting, or you will die — a permanent statute for all your generations. ¹⁰You must distinguish between the holy and the common, and between the impure and the pure, ¹¹and to teach the Israelites all the statutes that the LORD has communicated to them through Moses." ¹²Moses spoke to Aaron and to his surviving sons Eleazar and Ithamar: "Take the grain offering that remains from the LORD's fire offerings and eat it unleavened beside the altar, for it is most holy. ¹³You shall eat it in a holy place, because it is your allotted portion and your sons' allotted portion from the LORD's fire offerings — for so I have been commanded. ¹⁴The breast of the wave offering and the thigh of the contribution you shall eat in a ritually clean place — you, your sons, and your daughters with you — for they are given as your allotted portion and your children's portion from the Israelites' peace offerings. ¹⁵The thigh of the contribution and the breast of the wave offering they shall bring, along with the fat portions for the fire offerings, to elevate as a wave offering before the LORD. It shall be yours and your children's as a permanent allotment, as the LORD has commanded." ¹⁶Moses searched carefully for the goat of the purification offering, and discovered it had been burned. He was angry with Eleazar and Ithamar, Aaron's surviving sons, and demanded: ¹⁷"Why did you not eat the purification offering in the holy place? It is most holy, and He gave it to you to bear the guilt of the community — to make atonement for them before the LORD. ¹⁸Since its blood was not brought inside the sanctuary, you were required to eat it in the holy place, as I commanded." ¹⁹Aaron spoke to Moses: "Today they offered their purification offering and their burnt offering before the LORD, and things like these have happened to me. If I had eaten the purification offering today, would that have been acceptable in the LORD's sight?" ²⁰Moses heard this, and it was right in his eyes.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with shocking abruptness — no introduction, no context, just action and consequence. Nadab and Abihu were not minor figures: they ascended Sinai with Moses and the seventy elders and saw God (Exod 24:1, 9-11). They ate and drank in God's presence and survived. Now they die. The phrase esh zarah ('strange fire, unauthorized fire') is deliberately vague — the text never specifies exactly what was wrong. The emphasis falls on asher lo tsivvah otam ('which He had not commanded them'): the sin is unauthorized approach, worship initiated by human impulse rather than divine instruction.
2. The same fire that consumed the inaugural offerings in 9:24 — when 'fire came out from before the LORD and consumed the burnt offering' to the people's joyful shouting — now consumes the priests themselves. The verb is identical: vattokal ('and it consumed'). The fire that accepts offering and the fire that judges disobedience are the same fire. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') appears in both v1 and v2 — they offered before the LORD, and they died before the LORD. The location of their worship became the location of their death.
3. Moses interprets the deaths theologically: biqrovai eqqadesh ('among those near Me I will be sanctified'). Those closest to God face the greatest danger when they violate the boundaries of holiness. The closer the relationship, the more severe the consequence of betrayal. Ve'al-penei khol-ha'am ekkabed ('before all the people I will be glorified') — God's kavod is demonstrated through the enforcement of holiness, not just through spectacular displays of power. The chapter's most devastating sentence: vayyiddom Aharon ('and Aaron was silent'). Not 'was quiet' or 'said nothing' — vayyiddom implies a stunned, enforced stillness. Aaron has just watched his two eldest sons die by divine fire. He has nothing to say. The silence is the loudest sound in the chapter.
4. Aaron cannot handle his own sons' bodies — as high priest, he is forbidden to contact corpses (21:11). Moses summons cousins (Mishael and Elzaphan, sons of Uzziel from the Kohathite Levitical clan) to perform the burial. The command is stark: carry them away 'from before the sanctuary' (me'et penei haqqodesh) — the bodies must be removed from sacred space. The dead cannot remain where the living God dwells. Even in grief, the holiness of the sanctuary takes priority.
5. The bodies are carried out in their tunics (bekuttonotam) — the priestly garments they wore when they offered the unauthorized fire. The tunics survived the divine fire that killed the men inside them, a detail that emphasizes the precision of divine judgment: the fire consumed the priests, not their clothing. The compliance phrase ka'asher dibber Mosheh ('as Moses had instructed') contrasts with v1's asher lo tsivvah otam ('which He had not commanded them'). Obedience to instruction is set against the unauthorized action that caused the tragedy.
6. Aaron and his surviving sons are forbidden from the normal mourning rituals: loosening hair (al-tifra'u — letting it hang unkempt) and tearing garments (lo-tifromu). These prohibitions, later codified for the high priest in 21:10, apply here because the priestly office takes priority over personal grief. If Aaron mourns publicly, he acknowledges that God's judgment was excessive — and that defiance would bring death on him and wrath on the community. The rest of Israel may mourn, but the priests may not. The priesthood demands an inhuman separation between office and emotion.
7. The anointing oil (shemen mishchat YHWH) on the priests creates an obligation: they are consecrated and cannot leave the sanctuary to attend to their dead. The oil represents their set-apart status — their identity as priests supersedes their identity as bereaved family members. The compliance note vayya'asu kidvar Mosheh ('they did as Moses instructed') again contrasts with Nadab and Abihu's unauthorized action. Obedience to the word is the lesson of the chapter.
8. A remarkable moment: God speaks directly to Aaron — one of the few times in the Torah that God addresses Aaron without Moses as intermediary. Immediately after Aaron's sons have died, God speaks to him personally. The direct address may indicate divine compassion — God does not distance Himself from Aaron's grief but comes closer. What follows (v9-11) is a permanent statute that may explain what Nadab and Abihu did wrong.
9. The placement of this prohibition — immediately after Nadab and Abihu's death — has led many interpreters to conclude that intoxication contributed to their unauthorized offering. The text does not state this directly, but the juxtaposition is too pointed to be coincidental. The prohibition is absolute during priestly service: yayin veshekhmar al-tesht ('wine and fermented drink — do not drink'). The consequence is death (velo tamutu). The stakes of priestly service in God's presence leave no room for impaired judgment.
10. This verse states the priest's fundamental job description: ulehavdil bein haqqodesh uvein hachol ('to distinguish between holy and common') uvein hattamei uvein hattahor ('between impure and pure'). The verb havdil ('to separate, to distinguish') is the same word used for God's creative acts of separation in Genesis 1 (light from darkness, waters from waters). The priest's task mirrors God's creative work: maintaining the distinctions that preserve the world's order. Nadab and Abihu collapsed the distinction between commanded and uncommanded — holy and common — and the result was lethal.
11. The second priestly duty: ulehorot et-benei Yisra'el ('to teach the Israelites'). The priest is not only a ritual officiant but a teacher of Torah — the word horot shares its root with torah ('instruction'). The priest must teach 'all the statutes' (kol hachuqqim), not selectively. The phrase beyad-Mosheh ('through Moses') preserves the chain of transmission: God spoke, Moses received, priests teach. This teaching mandate will be central to Israel's survival as a covenant community.

12. The phrase banav hannotarim ('his remaining sons') — not 'his other sons' but 'his surviving sons' — is devastating in its plainness. Two sons are dead; two remain. Moses instructs the survivors to resume their priestly duties: eat the minchah remainder. The instruction is both pastoral and professional — grief cannot suspend the sacrificial system. The offerings of the day must be consumed properly. Even after catastrophe, the ritual continues.
13. Moses emphasizes that eating the priestly portions is not optional but obligatory — choqkha vechoq-banekha ('your allotted portion and your sons'). The closing phrase ki-khen tsuvveiti ('for so I have been commanded') underlines that Moses himself is under orders. The chain of authority runs from God through Moses to the priests. No one in the system operates on personal initiative — the lesson of Nadab and Abihu's unauthorized action.
14. A significant distinction: the minchah remainder (v12-13) must be eaten in a holy place (bemaqom qadosh — the sanctuary courtyard) by male priests only. But the shelamim portions — the wave breast (chazeh hattenufah) and the thigh of the contribution (shoq hatterumah) — may be eaten in any ritually clean place (bemaqom tahor) by priests and their families, including daughters. The shelamim is 'holy' but not 'most holy,' so it has broader access rules. The distinction between qodesh qodashim and qodesh governs who can eat what, and where.
15. The procedure: the fat portions (ishei hachalavim) are brought together with the thigh and breast. The wave offering (tenufah) is elevated before the LORD — presented to God — before being given to the priest. God sees it first; the priest receives it second. The designation choq-olam ('permanent allotment') makes the priestly portion a perpetual right across all generations. The phrase ka'asher tsivvah YHWH ('as the LORD has commanded') closes the section with the refrain that governs the entire chapter: divine command, not human initiative.
16. The intensified verb darosh darash ('he searched and searched') shows Moses investigating with urgency. The goat should have been eaten by the priests (per 6:19, 22) but was instead burned (soraf) — the wrong procedure. Moses's anger is justified: after Nadab and Abihu just died for unauthorized worship, the surviving brothers have now mishandled the chata't. The tension is unbearable — another priestly error on the same day that produced divine fire. Moses fears for their lives.
17. Moses's question reveals the theology behind priestly eating: the priest eats the chata't laset et-avon ha'edah ('to bear the guilt of the community'). Eating the holy meat is itself an atoning act — the priest absorbs the community's guilt into his own person through consuming the purification offering. This is not merely food allocation; it is vicarious bearing of sin. By refusing to eat, Eleazar and Ithamar failed to complete the atonement process.
18. Moses applies the rule of 6:23: when the chata't blood goes inside the sanctuary, the meat is burned; when it stays on the outer altar, the meat is eaten. This goat's blood was applied to the outer altar (not brought inside), so the meat should have been eaten. Moses's argument is technically correct: he did command them (ka'asher tsivveiti) to eat it. The error seems clear. But Aaron will now offer a response that silences Moses.
19. Aaron finally speaks — breaking the silence of v3 with one of the most powerful responses in the Torah. His argument: on the day my sons died for unauthorized worship, would it be right for me to eat the purification offering as though everything were normal? Vatiqre'nah oti ka'elleh ('such things have befallen me') — the understatement is devastating. Aaron does not name the deaths; he calls them 'things like these.' His question hayyitav be'einei YHWH ('would it have been good in the LORD's sight?') turns the appeal to divine judgment. Perhaps eating the chata't in the aftermath of divine fire would itself have been inappropriate — a pretense of normalcy in the face of catastrophe.
20. The chapter's final verse: vayyishma Mosheh vayyitav be'einav ('Moses heard, and it was good in his eyes'). Moses accepts Aaron's reasoning. The man who speaks for God acknowledges that Aaron's pastoral instinct — that grief-stricken priests should not perform an atoning meal while still reeling from divine judgment — was correct. The law is not wrong, but Aaron's reading of the situation was wiser than strict compliance. This moment establishes a precedent: there are occasions when the spirit of the commandment overrides its letter. The chapter that began with death for unauthorized innovation ends with approval for unauthorized restraint. Both boundaries — what must not be added and what may be temporarily withheld — are real.

Summary: God gives Israel the dietary laws, classifying animals into clean and unclean across four categories: land animals (split hoof and cud), water creatures (fins and scales), birds (by list), and winged insects (by leg type). Contact with carcasses transmits impurity. The chapter closes with a call to holiness.

What Makes This Remarkable: The dietary laws are practical theology: every meal becomes an act of covenant identity. The system classifies by visible, observable criteria any Israelite can verify -- look at the feet and the mouth. Four boundary-case animals (camel, hyrax, hare, pig) are named specifically because they meet only one criterion, preventing confusion. The closing rationale links eating directly to holiness: Israel's table reflects Israel's God.

Translation Friction: The word tamei ("ritually impure") required consistent rendering to avoid the connotation of "dirty" or "sinful" — a camel is not evil, merely outside the permitted category. The Hebrew shafan ("hyrax," v5) classifies by visible behavior (jaw movement resembling cud-chewing), not modern taxonomy. We rendered sherets ("swarming creature") consistently with its usage in later chapters for coherence across the purity legislation.

Connections: The dietary laws flow from the priestly mandate of 10:10 to "distinguish between clean and unclean." Peter's vision in Acts 10:9-16 engages these categories directly. The holiness rationale ("be holy, for I am holy," v44-45) anticipates the Holiness Code's central command in 19:2. The clean/unclean animal distinction originates with Noah's ark (Gen 7:2).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron, saying to them: ²"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: Of all the land animals, these are the ones you may eat. ³Any animal that has a divided hoof — completely split — and chews the cud: that you may eat. ⁴However, of those that chew the cud or have a divided hoof, you must not eat the following: the camel — it chews the cud but does not have a divided hoof; it is ritually impure for you. ⁵The hyrax — it chews the cud but does not have a divided hoof; it is ritually impure for you. ⁶The hare — it chews the cud but does not have a divided hoof; it is ritually impure for you. ⁷The pig — it has a completely divided hoof but does not chew the cud; it is ritually impure for you. ⁸You must not eat their flesh or touch their carcasses — they are ritually impure for you. ⁹Of everything in the waters, you may eat whatever has fins and scales — in seas and streams, those you may eat. ¹⁰But anything in seas or streams that lacks fins and scales — among all the swarming things and living creatures in the water — is detestable to you. ¹¹They shall remain detestable to you — you must not eat their flesh, and their carcasses you must regard as detestable. ¹²Whatever lacks fins and scales in the water is detestable to you. ¹³Among the birds, these you shall regard as detestable — they must not be eaten, they are detestable: the eagle, the bearded vulture, the black vulture, ¹⁴the kite, the falcon of every kind, ¹⁵every raven of every kind, ¹⁶the ostrich, the nighthawk, the seagull, the hawk of every kind, ¹⁷the little owl, the cormorant, the great owl, ¹⁸the barn owl, the pelican, the carrion vulture, ¹⁹the stork, the heron of every kind, the hoopoe, and the bat. ²⁰All winged swarming creatures that walk on four legs are detestable to you. ²¹However, of the winged swarming creatures that walk on four legs, you may eat those that have jointed legs above their feet for leaping on the ground. ²²Of these you may eat: the locust of every kind, the bald locust of every kind, the cricket of every kind, and the grasshopper of every kind. ²³All other winged swarming creatures with four legs are detestable to you. ²⁴By these you will become ritually impure: anyone who touches their carcass will be impure until evening. ²⁵Anyone who carries any part of their carcass must wash their clothing and will be impure until evening. ²⁶Every animal that has a hoof but it is not completely split, or does not chew the cud — these are impure for you. Anyone who touches them becomes impure. ²⁷Whatever walks on its paws among all four-footed creatures is impure for you. Anyone who touches their carcass will be impure until evening. ²⁸Anyone who carries their carcass must wash their clothing and will be impure until evening — they are impure for you. ²⁹Among the creatures that swarm on the ground, these are impure for you: the weasel, the mouse, the large lizard of every kind, ³⁰the gecko, the monitor lizard, the wall lizard, the skink, and the chameleon. ³¹These are the impure ones among the swarming creatures. Anyone who touches them when they are dead will be impure until evening. ³²Anything one of them falls on when dead becomes impure — any wooden utensil, garment, leather item, or sack. Whatever tool is used for work must be immersed in water and remains impure until evening; then it is clean. ³³If one falls into a clay vessel, everything in it becomes impure, and you must break the vessel. ³⁴Any food that could be eaten, if water from such a vessel comes on it, becomes impure. Any liquid that could be drunk in any such vessel becomes impure. ³⁵Anything their carcass falls on becomes impure. An oven or a cooking stove must be smashed — they are impure and shall remain impure for you. ³⁶However, a spring or cistern holding collected water remains clean, though whoever touches the carcass in it becomes impure. ³⁷If any part of their carcass falls on seed grain that is to be planted, it remains clean. ³⁸But if water has been put on the seed and any part of their carcass falls on it, it is impure for you. ³⁹If an animal that you may eat dies on its own, anyone who touches its carcass will be impure until evening. ⁴⁰Anyone who eats from its carcass must wash their clothing and will be impure until evening. Anyone who carries its carcass must wash their clothing and will be impure until evening. ⁴¹Every swarming creature that swarms on the ground is detestable — it must not be eaten. ⁴²Whatever moves on its belly, whatever walks on four legs, or whatever has many legs — among all swarming creatures on the ground — you must not eat them, for they are detestable. ⁴³Do not make yourselves detestable through any swarming creature. Do not make yourselves impure through them and become defiled by them. ⁴⁴For I am the LORD your God. Consecrate yourselves and be holy, for I am holy. Do not defile yourselves with any swarming creature that moves on the ground. ⁴⁵For I am the LORD who brought you up out of the land of Egypt to be your God. You shall be holy, for I am holy. ⁴⁶This is the instruction concerning land animals, birds, every living creature that moves in the water, and every creature that swarms on the ground — ⁴⁷to distinguish between the impure and the pure, between the creature that may be eaten and the creature that may not be eaten."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. God addresses both Moses and Aaron — the dietary laws involve priestly expertise in distinguishing clean from unclean (10:10). This is the first legislation after Nadab and Abihu's death (ch 10) and the instruction to 'distinguish between holy and common, impure and pure' (10:10). The clean/unclean animal laws are the practical outworking of that priestly mandate.
2. The dietary laws begin with permission, not prohibition: zot hachayah asher tokheilu ('these are the living things you may eat'). The positive framing ('this is what you can eat') precedes the negative ('this is what you cannot'). Four categories follow: land animals (v2-8), water creatures (v9-12), birds (v13-19), and winged insects (v20-23). The system classifies the entire animal kingdom by edibility.
3. Two criteria for edible land animals: mafreset parsah ('divides the hoof' — split into two toes) AND ma'alat gerah ('brings up the cud' — ruminant digestion). Both criteria must be met. The system creates a clear, observable test: look at the feet and the mouth. The criteria are not arbitrary but establish a classification principle based on visible physical characteristics that any Israelite can verify.
4. Four animals that meet only one criterion are listed (v4-7) to prevent confusion: the camel (chews cud but lacks split hoof), the hyrax (v5), the hare (v6), and the pig (v7). Each fails on exactly one criterion, demonstrating that both requirements must be satisfied. The word tamei ('ritually impure') — not 'dirty' or 'sinful' — describes the animal's status relative to Israel's table, not its inherent quality. Camels are not evil; they are simply outside the permitted category.
5. The shafan ('hyrax/rock badger') — KJV's 'coney.' The hyrax's jaw movement while eating resembles cud-chewing to the observer, though it is not technically a ruminant. The text classifies by visible behavior, not by modern biological taxonomy. The functional classification — 'it appears to chew the cud' — makes the system usable by non-specialists.
6. The arnevet ('hare') — like the hyrax, it moves its jaw in a way that resembles rumination (cecotrophy — re-ingesting partially digested material — may account for the observation). The text works within the observational categories available to an ancient Israelite farmer, not within modern zoological classification.
7. The chazir ('pig/swine') meets the hoof criterion but fails on rumination — the opposite pattern from the camel, hyrax, and hare. The pig became the iconic unclean animal in Jewish tradition, symbolizing hypocrisy: it displays the outward sign of purity (split hoof) while lacking the inner qualification (cud-chewing). The pig's prohibition is the most culturally persistent of all the dietary laws.
8. Two prohibitions: no eating (mibesaram lo tokheilu) and no touching carcasses (uvenivlatam lo tigga'u). The touch prohibition applies to dead bodies, not living animals — an Israelite could handle a living camel but not its carcass. Contact with a dead impure animal transmits impurity to the person touching it, requiring purification.
9. Water creatures have two criteria: senapir ('fins') and qasqeset ('scales'). Both must be present. Fish with fins and scales are permitted; everything else — shellfish, crustaceans, eels, catfish — is excluded. The criteria are again visible and observable: look at the animal's body.
10. Water creatures without both fins and scales are sheqets ('detestable, abomination') — a stronger term than tamei ('impure'). The word sheqets expresses visceral rejection, not merely ritual classification. The prohibition covers all aquatic life that fails the two-criteria test: shellfish, squid, eel, lobster, shrimp, and all invertebrate sea life.
11. The prohibition is total: no eating, and the carcasses themselves must be treated as detestable (teshaqqetsu — 'you shall detest/regard as abominable'). The verb is active — Israel must cultivate revulsion, not merely abstain. The dietary system shapes desire as well as behavior.
12. A summary restatement of v9-11: the criterion (fins and scales) and the consequence (sheqets) are stated once more for clarity. The repetition ensures no ambiguity about the water-creature rule.
13. The bird list (v13-19) operates differently from land and water animals — no general criteria are given, only a list of prohibited species. The list consists primarily of raptors and scavengers: birds that eat flesh or carrion. The neshar ('eagle/vulture'), peres ('bearded vulture/ossifrage'), and ozniyyah ('black vulture/osprey') head the list. The exact identification of several birds is uncertain, but the pattern is clear: predators and carrion-eaters are excluded.
14. The da'ah ('kite') and ayyah ('falcon/hawk') — predatory birds. The phrase leminah ('of every kind') indicates that all species within the falcon family are included in the prohibition.

15. The orev ('raven') — a scavenger that eats both carrion and live prey. 'Every kind' (leminno) includes crows and related species. Ravens are prominent in biblical narrative: they fed Elijah (1 Kgs 17:6) and are noted by Jesus as recipients of God's provision (Luke 12:24).
16. Four more prohibited birds: bat hayya'anah ('ostrich' or 'desert owl'), tachmas ('nighthawk/nightjar'), shachaf ('seagull/gull'), and nets ('hawk/sparrowhawk'). The identifications are approximate — ancient Hebrew bird terminology does not map precisely to modern ornithological classification.
17. Three more: kos ('little owl'), shalakh ('cormorant/fish-eating bird'), and yanshuf ('great owl/eagle-owl'). Owls appear three times in the list (v16, 17, 18), suggesting several species of nocturnal predatory birds are in view.
18. Tinshemeth ('barn owl' or 'white owl' — KJV's 'swan' is likely incorrect), qa'at ('pelican'), and racham ('carrion vulture/Egyptian vulture'). The racham's name comes from racham ('compassion') — possibly because the Egyptian vulture was observed caring for its young with unusual tenderness.
19. The chasidah ('stork' — from chesed, 'loving-kindness,' perhaps because of its family devotion), anafah ('heron'), dukhifat ('hoopoe'), and atalef ('bat'). The bat, a mammal, is classified with birds because the text groups by locomotion (flying creatures), not by modern biological taxonomy. The system classifies by observable behavior: if it flies, it belongs in the bird category.
20. The fourth category: sherets ha'of ('winged swarming creatures') that walk on four legs — insects and similar small creatures. The general rule: they are sheqets ('detestable'). The phrase holekh al-arba ('walking on four') describes the perception of insect locomotion — insects have six legs, but the two hind jumping legs of some species (v21) are distinguished from the four 'walking' legs.
21. The exception: insects with kera'ayim mimma'al leraglav ('jointed hind legs above their feet') designed for leaping (lenatter — 'to spring, to leap'). The grasshopper/locust family has powerful jumping legs visually distinct from their walking legs. This anatomical feature creates the criteria for the one permitted insect group.
22. Four permitted insect types: arbeh ('locust'), sol'am ('bald locust/cricket'), chargol ('cricket/katydid'), and chagav ('grasshopper'). All are leaping insects from the Orthoptera order. The leminno/leminnehu ('of every kind') extends permission to all species within each type. These insects were an important protein source in the ancient Near East — John the Baptist ate locusts (Matt 3:4).
23. Summary: everything in this category except the four leaping-insect types is forbidden. The principle: among the smallest creatures, only those with a specific anatomical feature (jumping legs) are permitted. The system is comprehensive — no animal category is left unaddressed.
24. The chapter shifts from dietary laws (what to eat) to impurity transmission (what contact produces). Touching a carcass (nevelah) transmits impurity that lasts ad-ha'erev ('until evening') — sundown ends the impurity period. The impurity is temporary and self-resolving; it does not require sacrifice, only time.
25. Carrying (nosei) — more intensive contact than touching — requires laundering (yekhabbeis begadav) in addition to waiting until evening. The graduated response: touching requires only time; carrying requires washing plus time. Greater contact produces greater purification requirements.
26. The touch-impurity rule extends to any animal that fails either criterion (hoof or cud). This covers horses, donkeys, dogs, cats — all common domestic animals that are not ruminants with split hooves. Contact with their carcasses transmits impurity. Living contact with these animals is not addressed — the prohibition concerns dead bodies.
27. Animals that walk al-kappav ('on its paws' — feet with pads rather than hooves): cats, dogs, bears, lions, etc. These are excluded because they lack the split-hoof criterion entirely. Their carcasses transmit impurity through contact.
28. The same carrying-impurity rule as v25: washing clothes plus waiting until evening. The system is consistent — the same contact produces the same purification requirement regardless of the specific animal.
29. A new category: sherets hashorets al-ha'arets ('swarming creatures that swarm on the ground') — small ground-dwelling animals. Eight are listed (v29-30): choled ('weasel/mole rat'), akhbar ('mouse/rat'), tsav ('large lizard/toad'), and five more lizard species. These animals' carcasses are particularly potent sources of impurity (v31-38) because they are small, common, and easily contacted accidentally.
30. Five more small reptiles: anaqah ('gecko'), koach ('monitor lizard/power lizard'), leta'ah ('wall lizard'), chomet ('skink/sand lizard'), and tinshemeth ('chameleon' — the same word used for a bird in v18, possibly a different animal). The exact identifications are uncertain, but all are small ground-dwelling reptiles common in the Near East.
31. The eight swarming creatures (v29-30) transmit impurity through touch when dead (bemotam — 'when they die'). The specificity 'when they die' confirms that living contact does not produce impurity — only carcass contact. The following verses (v32-38) detail how this impurity affects objects and food.
32. Objects that contact a dead swarming creature become tamei. Four material categories: wood (ets), cloth (beged), leather (or), and sackcloth (saq). The purification: bamayim yuva ('it shall be brought into water' — immersion) plus waiting until evening. After both steps, vetaher ('it becomes clean'). The purification is simple and accessible — water and time restore the object to tahor status.
33. Clay vessels (keli-cheres) cannot be purified — they must be broken (oto tishboru). Clay is porous and absorbs impurity permanently, unlike wood, leather, or metal which can be washed. The same principle appears in the chata't legislation (6:21): clay absorbs holiness or impurity irreversibly. The breaking requirement means clay vessels are disposable in the purity system — a significant economic cost that the system accepts.

34. Food and drink in a contaminated clay vessel are also rendered impure. The chain of impurity: dead creature → clay vessel → food/drink inside. Wet food is more susceptible than dry (v37-38 will clarify). The system tracks impurity transmission through contact chains — each link in the chain must be addressed.
35. Even ovens (tannur) and cooking stoves (kirayim) — built structures made of clay — must be demolished (yutats — 'smashed, torn down') if contaminated. These are not small vessels but built-in household installations. The cost of impurity can be substantial — replacing an oven is a significant household disruption. The system does not exempt expensive items from purification requirements.
36. The exception: ma'yan uvor miqveh-mayim ('a spring or cistern, a gathering of water') — natural water sources cannot become permanently impure. Running water and large collected water maintain their tahor status because the water's volume overwhelms the contamination. This principle underlies the later mikveh (ritual immersion pool) practice: gathered water purifies what is immersed in it. The person who touches the carcass within the water is still impure, but the water itself remains clean.
37. Dry seed intended for planting (zera zeru'a asher yizzarea — 'sowing seed that is to be sown') is not made impure by carcass contact. Dry surfaces do not absorb impurity the way wet or porous surfaces do. The practical effect: a farmer does not lose an entire crop if a dead lizard falls on dry seed grain.
38. Wet seed is susceptible — ki yuttan-mayim al-zera ('if water is put on the seed'). Moisture activates the capacity to absorb impurity. The dry/wet distinction (v37 vs v38) is the key variable: the same contact produces different results depending on whether water is present. This principle will govern much of later rabbinic purity law.
39. Even a clean/permitted animal, if it dies naturally (yomut — not slaughtered properly), produces impurity through contact. The distinction between nevelah (an animal that dies on its own) and shechitah (proper ritual slaughter) is critical: the method of death determines whether the meat is edible and whether the carcass transmits impurity.
40. Two levels of contact with a clean animal's nevelah: eating (ha'okhel) and carrying (hannosei). Both require laundering plus evening wait. Eating nevelah produces the same level of impurity as carrying it — the impurity is from the mode of death (natural, not slaughtered), not from the animal itself.
41. A general prohibition on ground-swarmed creatures (beyond the eight named in v29-30): kol-hashereets hashorets al-ha'arets sheqets hu ('every swarming thing that swarms on the ground is detestable'). The permitted locusts/grasshoppers (v21-22) are excluded because they leap rather than swarm along the ground.
42. Three locomotion categories cover all swarming creatures: holekh al-gachon ('moves on its belly' — snakes, worms), holekh al-arba ('walks on four' — lizards, rodents), and marbeh raglayim ('many legs' — centipedes, millipedes). The classification by movement type ensures comprehensive coverage: belly-crawlers, four-leggers, and many-leggers together include every ground-swarmed creature.
43. The dietary laws shift from external classification to internal transformation: al-teshaqetsu et-nafshoteikhem ('do not make your souls/selves detestable'). What you eat affects what you are — consuming forbidden creatures makes the person sheqets, not just the food. The reflexive language (yourselves) emphasizes that dietary choices shape identity. The wordplay veniTMetem bam ('and you will become defiled/closed') may pun on tamei ('impure') and atum ('closed, sealed') — impurity closes the person off from God's presence.
44. The theological foundation of the dietary laws: ki ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('for I am the LORD your God') followed by vehiqdashem vihyitem qedoshim ki qadosh ani ('consecrate yourselves and be holy, for I am holy'). The connection between divine holiness and dietary practice is direct: God's holiness requires Israel's holiness, and Israel's holiness extends to the table. The dietary laws are not a separate category from the holiness laws — they are the holiness laws applied to food. What enters the body matters because the body belongs to a holy God.
45. The exodus identity grounds the holiness obligation: ani YHWH hamma'aleh etkhem me'erets Mitsrayim ('I am the LORD who brought you up out of Egypt'). The purpose of the exodus was lihyot lakhem le'Elohim ('to be your God') — not merely liberation but relationship. The dietary laws are part of the covenant package: God rescued Israel for holiness, and holiness includes eating differently. The second vihyitem qedoshim ki qadosh ani ('you shall be holy, for I am holy') reinforces the first (v44) — the thesis stated twice for emphasis.
46. The colophon lists all four categories covered: behemah ('land animals,' v2-8), of ('birds,' v13-19), nefesh hachayyah haromeset bammayim ('every living creature that moves in the water,' v9-12), and nefesh hashoretset al-ha'arets ('every swarming creature on the ground,' v20-42). The comprehensive scope ensures that every animal an Israelite might encounter is classified.
47. The chapter's closing verse uses the key verb from 10:10: lehavdil bein hattamei uvein hattahor ('to distinguish between the impure and the pure'). The dietary laws are the practical implementation of the priestly mandate to distinguish — the same verb (havdil) God used in creation to separate light from darkness, waters from waters (Gen 1:4, 6, 7). Israel's dietary distinctions participate in God's ordering of the world. Every meal is a miniature act of creation: separating what belongs from what does not.

Summary: Postpartum purification laws specify periods of ritual impurity after childbirth: seven days for a boy (with circumcision on the eighth day) followed by thirty-three days of purification blood, or fourteen days plus sixty-six days for a girl. The mother brings a burnt offering and purification offering to complete her restoration.

What Makes This Remarkable: Leviticus's briefest chapter establishes that childbirth -- the most life-giving act -- produces ritual impurity. This is not a moral judgment on mother or child but a recognition that birth involves blood and the boundary zone between life and death. The circumcision command is embedded within purification law, linking covenant identity to the mother's ritual restoration.

Translation Friction: The phrase ki tazria ("when she conceives," literally "when she produces seed") uses agricultural language for reproduction, and we rendered it with the biological sense. The term bidmei tohorah ("in the blood of purification," v4) describes a transitional state -- not fully impure but not yet able to touch holy things. We rendered niddah as "menstrual impurity" to clarify the biological basis while preserving the ritual dimension.

Connections: Mary and Joseph's offering at Jesus's presentation (Luke 2:22-24) follows these regulations exactly, bringing the poor person's birds rather than a lamb. The eighth-day circumcision connects to the Abrahamic covenant (Gen 17:10-14). The asymmetric purification periods (40 vs. 80 days) remain debated; the text offers no explicit rationale.

1The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: 2Speak to the children of Israel and say: When a woman conceives and gives birth to a male child, she shall be ritually unclean for seven days — she shall be unclean as during the days of her menstrual impurity. 3On the eighth day, the child's foreskin shall be circumcised. 4Then for thirty-three days she shall remain in a state of purification from her bleeding. She shall not touch any holy thing or enter the sanctuary until her days of purification are complete. 5But if she gives birth to a female child, she shall be ritually unclean for two weeks, as during her menstrual period. Then for sixty-six days she shall remain in a state of purification from her bleeding. 6When her days of purification are complete — whether for a son or a daughter — she shall bring a yearling lamb for a burnt offering and a young pigeon or a turtledove for a sin offering, to the entrance of the tent of meeting, to the priest. 7The priest shall present it before the LORD and make atonement for her, and she will be purified from the flow of her blood. This is the instruction for a woman who gives birth, whether to a male or a female child. 8If she cannot afford a lamb, she shall take two turtledoves or two young pigeons — one for a burnt offering and one for a sin offering. The priest shall make atonement for her, and she will be clean.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Leviticus 12 is the briefest chapter in Leviticus — only eight verses — but it establishes the principle that childbirth, the most life-giving human act, produces ritual impurity. This is not a moral judgment on the mother or the child but a recognition that the processes of birth involve blood and bodily fluids that place the mother in the boundary zone between life and death. The purity system provides the path back.
2. The phrase ki tazria ('when she conceives' — literally 'when she produces seed') uses agricultural language for human reproduction. The period of impurity after a male birth is seven days, equated with the niddah period (kimei niddat devotah — 'as the days of her menstrual separation'). The impurity is not about the baby or the act of birth being sinful — it results from the discharge of blood and bodily fluids, which place the woman in contact with the life-death boundary that produces ritual impurity throughout the Levitical system.
3. The circumcision instruction (yimmol besar orlato — 'the flesh of his foreskin shall be circumcised') is embedded within the postpartum purification legislation, linking birth and covenant. The eighth day (yom hashemini) timing may relate to the seven-day impurity period: the child enters the covenant on the day after the mother's initial impurity period ends. Circumcision is the sign of the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 17:10-14), placed here among purity laws because covenant identity and ritual fitness are interconnected.
4. After the initial seven-day impurity, a thirty-three-day period of bidmei tohorah ('in the blood of purification') follows — a transitional state between full impurity and complete purity. During this time she is not fully tamei (she does not transmit impurity to others by contact) but she cannot touch holy objects (bekhol qodesh lo tigga) or enter the sanctuary (ve'el hamiqdash lo tavo). The total period for a male birth is forty days (7 + 33). The two restrictions — no contact with holy things, no sanctuary access — define the limits of her transitional state.

5. The purification period for a female birth is doubled: fourteen days of impurity (shevu'ayim — 'two weeks') plus sixty-six days of transitional purification, totaling eighty days versus forty for a male birth. The reason for the asymmetry is not stated in the text and has been debated extensively. Some scholars suggest it relates to the daughter's future reproductive capacity — the purification covers both the mother's and the potential daughter's biological status. Others see it as reflecting the additional blood loss sometimes associated with female births. The text does not explain the difference, and the translator should not impose an interpretation the text does not provide.
6. The purification offering is the same regardless of the child's sex: a lamb (kevesh ben shenato — 'a lamb in its first year') for the burnt offering (olah — complete devotion) and a bird (ben yonah o tor — 'a young pigeon or a turtledove') for the sin offering (chata't — purification). The burnt offering expresses renewed devotion after the period of separation; the sin offering purifies the sanctuary from any contamination the impurity may have caused. Together, the offerings restore the woman to full participation in worship.
7. The kippur formula (vekipper aleiha — 'he shall make atonement for her') and the purification result (vetaharah mimmeqor dameiha — 'she shall be purified from the source/flow of her blood') are stated together. The atonement here is not for the sin of childbirth (which is not a sin) but for the ritual impurity caused by the blood discharge. The closing formula zot torat hayyoledet ('this is the instruction for the woman who gives birth') uses torah in its technical legal sense — a ruling for a specific category of case.
8. The poor-person provision (im lo timtsa yadah dei seh — 'if her hand cannot find enough for a lamb') mirrors the sliding scale of Leviticus 5:7 and 14:21-22: purification is available regardless of economic status. Two birds (turtledoves or pigeons) substitute for the lamb. This is the offering Mary brought after the birth of Jesus (Luke 2:24), indicating the family's economic circumstances. The final word vetaherah ('she shall be clean') restores full ritual fitness — the woman returns to complete participation in community worship and sanctuary access.

Summary: The priest examines skin conditions to determine whether they constitute tsara'at (traditionally "leprosy") requiring exclusion from the community. Detailed diagnostic criteria are given for various presentations on skin, hair, raw flesh, burns, scalp conditions, and even fabric. The person declared impure must dwell alone outside the camp.

What Makes This Remarkable: The priest functions as a ritual diagnostician, not a physician -- he determines status before God, not medical treatment. The Hebrew tsara'at is emphatically not Hansen's disease (modern leprosy); it describes a range of surface conditions on skin, fabric, and later on house walls. The excluded person's cry "Unclean! Unclean!" (v45) is both warning and lament.

Translation Friction: We rendered tsara'at as "skin disease" throughout, rejecting the KJV's "leprosy" as medically misleading and stigmatizing. The word nega ("mark, infection," from n-g-', "to touch, to strike") required a rendering that conveyed both the visible symptom and the sense of divine affliction. The priestly verb timme ("declare unclean") is a judicial pronouncement, not a medical diagnosis, and we preserved that distinction.

Connections: Miriam's tsara'at (Num 12:10-15) and Naaman's (2 Kgs 5) illustrate these regulations in narrative. Jesus's healings of people with skin disease (Mark 1:40-45) engage these purity categories directly, and He sends the healed to the priest as Leviticus requires. The fabric inspection (v47-59) extends the principle that impurity can affect Israel's material world, not just its bodies.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and to Aaron, saying: ²When a person develops a swelling, a rash, or a shiny spot on the skin of their body, and it becomes a mark of skin disease on the skin of their body, that person shall be brought to Aaron the priest or to one of his sons, the priests. ³The priest shall examine the infection on the skin of the body. If the hair in the infected area has turned white and the infection appears to go deeper than the skin surface, it is a case of skin disease. The priest shall examine him and declare him unclean. ⁴But if the shiny spot is white on the skin of the body, and it does not appear to be deeper than the skin, and the hair in it has not turned white, the priest shall isolate the person with the infection for seven days. ⁵The priest shall examine him on the seventh day, and if the infection appears unchanged to his eye and has not spread on the skin, the priest shall isolate him for another seven days. ⁶The priest shall examine him again on the seventh day, and if the infection has faded and has not spread on the skin, the priest shall declare him clean. It is only a rash. He shall wash his clothes, and he will be clean. ⁷But if the rash has spread further on the skin after he was shown to the priest for his cleansing, he shall appear before the priest again. ⁸The priest shall examine him, and if the rash has indeed spread on the skin, the priest shall declare him unclean. It is a skin disease. ⁹When a skin disease infection is on a person, he shall be brought to the priest. ¹⁰The priest shall examine him, and if there is a white swelling on the skin that has turned the hair white, and there is raw flesh visible within the swelling, ¹¹it is a chronic skin disease in the skin of his body. The priest shall declare him unclean. He shall not isolate him, because he is already unclean. ¹²If the skin disease breaks out extensively on the skin, and the disease covers all the skin of the infected person from head to foot — everywhere the priest can see — ¹³the priest shall examine him, and if the disease has covered his entire body, he shall declare the person with the infection clean. It has all turned white — he is clean. ¹⁴But on the day that raw flesh appears on him, he shall be unclean. ¹⁵The priest shall examine the raw flesh and declare him unclean. The raw flesh is impure — it is a skin disease. ¹⁶Or if the raw flesh returns to its former state and turns white, he shall come to the priest. ¹⁷The priest shall examine him, and if the infection has turned white, the priest shall declare the infected person clean. He is clean. ¹⁸When the skin of a body has a boil that has healed, ¹⁹and in the place of the boil a white swelling or a reddish-white shiny spot has developed, it shall be shown to the priest. ²⁰The priest shall examine it, and if it appears deeper than the surrounding skin and its hair has turned white, the priest shall declare him unclean. It is a skin disease that has broken out from the boil. ²¹But if the priest examines it and there are no white hairs in it, and it is not deeper than the skin but has faded, the priest shall isolate him for seven days. ²²If it has spread further on the skin, the priest shall declare him unclean. It is an infection. ²³But if the shiny spot stays in its place and has not spread, it is the scar of the boil, and the priest shall declare him clean. ²⁴Or when the skin of the body has a burn from fire, and the raw area of the burn becomes a reddish-white or white shiny spot, ²⁵The priest shall examine it, and if the hair in the shiny spot has turned white and it appears deeper than the skin, it is a skin disease that has broken out from the burn. The priest shall declare him unclean — it is a skin disease infection. ²⁶But if the priest examines it and there is no white hair in the shiny spot, and it is not deeper than the skin but has faded, the priest shall isolate him for seven days. ²⁷The priest shall examine him on the seventh day. If it has spread further on the skin, the priest shall declare him unclean — it is a skin disease infection. ²⁸But if the shiny spot stays in its place and has not spread on the skin but has faded, it is a swelling from the burn. The priest shall declare him clean, because it is a scar from the burn. ²⁹When a man or woman has an infection on the head or on the beard, ³⁰The priest shall examine the infection, and if it appears deeper than the skin and has thin, yellowish hair in it, the priest shall declare him unclean. It is a scaly infection — a skin disease of the head or beard. ³¹When the priest examines the scaly infection and it does not appear deeper than the skin, but there is no dark hair in it, the priest shall isolate the person with the scaly infection for seven days. ³²On the seventh day the priest shall examine the infection. If the scaly infection has not spread, and there is no yellowish hair in it, and the scaly infection does not appear deeper than the skin, ³³he shall shave himself, but he shall not shave the area of the scaly infection. The priest shall isolate him for another seven days. ³⁴On the seventh day the priest shall examine the scaly infection, and if the scaly infection has not spread on the skin and does not appear deeper than the skin, the priest shall declare him clean. He shall wash his clothes and be clean. ³⁵But if the scaly infection spreads further on the skin after his cleansing, ³⁶The priest shall examine him, and if the scaly infection has spread on the skin, the priest need not look for yellowish hair — he is unclean. ³⁷But if in the priest's judgment the scaly infection is contained and dark hair has grown in it, the scaly infection is healed. He is clean, and the priest shall declare him clean. ³⁸When a man or woman has spots on the skin of their body — white spots — ³⁹the priest shall examine them, and if the spots on the skin of their body are dull white, it is a harmless rash that has broken out on the skin. He is clean. ⁴⁰When a man's hair falls out from the back of his head, he is bald. He is clean. ⁴¹And if his hair falls out from the front of his head, he has a receding hairline. He is clean. ⁴²But if a reddish-white infection develops on the bald area of the crown or the forehead, it is a skin disease breaking out on his bald area. ⁴³The priest shall examine him, and if the swelling of the infection is reddish-white on his bald crown or bald forehead, resembling the appearance of skin disease on body skin, ⁴⁴He is a person with skin disease — he is unclean. The priest shall certainly declare him unclean; his infection is on his head. ⁴⁵The person with the skin disease who bears the infection — his clothes shall be torn, his hair shall hang loose, he shall cover his upper lip, and he shall call out, 'Unclean! Unclean!' ⁴⁶For as long as the infection is on him, he shall be unclean. He is impure. He shall live alone; his dwelling shall be outside the camp. ⁴⁷When a garment has a mark of contamination in it — whether a wool garment or a linen garment, ⁴⁸whether in the warp or the woof of linen or wool, or in leather or in anything made of leather — ⁴⁹and the mark is greenish or reddish in the garment or in the leather, whether in the warp or woof or in any leather article, it is a contamination mark and shall be shown to the priest. ⁵⁰The priest shall examine the mark and isolate the affected item for seven days. ⁵¹He shall examine the mark on the seventh day. If the mark has spread in the garment — whether in the warp or the woof, or in the leather, or in any leather article made for use — it is a persistent contamination. The mark is unclean. ⁵²He shall burn the garment — whether the warp or the woof, whether of wool or linen — or any leather article that has the mark in it, because it is a persistent contamination. It shall be burned in fire. ⁵³But if the priest examines it and the mark has not spread in the garment — in the warp or the woof — or in any leather article, ⁵⁴the priest shall command them to wash the item that has the mark in it, and he shall isolate it for another seven days. ⁵⁵The priest shall examine the mark after it has been washed, and if the mark has not changed its appearance — even though it has not spread — it is unclean. You shall burn it in fire. It is a persistent corrosion, whether on the inner side or the outer side. ⁵⁶But if the priest examines it and the mark has faded after washing, he shall tear it out of the garment, or out of the leather, or out of the warp or the woof. ⁵⁷If it appears again in the garment — in the warp or the woof — or in any leather article, it is an outbreak. You shall burn the item that has the mark in fire. ⁵⁸But the garment — the warp or the woof — or any leather article that you wash, if the mark has disappeared from it, it shall be washed a second time and it will be clean. ⁵⁹This is the instruction regarding a contamination mark in a garment of wool or linen, in the warp or the woof, or in any leather article — for declaring it clean or declaring it unclean.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

- Both Moses and Aaron are addressed because Aaron and his sons will serve as the diagnosticians in the cases that follow. Unlike most Levitical instructions addressed to Moses alone, the inclusion of Aaron here signals that the priestly role in diagnosing skin disease is central to this chapter's function.
- The Hebrew adam ('person') here is generic — it applies to any human being, not specifically a male. Three distinct symptoms are named: se'et (a raised swelling), sapachat (a spreading rash or scab), and baheret (a bright or shiny patch). These are technical diagnostic terms, each describing a different visible skin change that might indicate tsara'at.
- The Hebrew tsara'at has been traditionally rendered 'leprosy' following the KJV and the Septuagint's lepra, but modern scholarship is unanimous that this is NOT Hansen's disease (modern leprosy). Tsara'at describes a range of visible skin conditions that render a person ritually unfit for God's presence. The rendering uses 'skin disease' throughout this chapter.
- Two diagnostic criteria establish a positive diagnosis: (1) hair in the affected area has turned white (hafakh lavan), indicating the condition has penetrated to the hair follicle, and (2) the mark appears deeper than the surrounding skin surface (amoq min ha'or). Both criteria must be present for an immediate declaration of impurity.
- The verb timmé ('declare unclean') is a priestly judicial pronouncement, not a medical diagnosis. The priest does not treat or prescribe; he determines ritual status. The person declared tamei is separated from the community and from access to sacred space — not as punishment, but because their condition places them in the liminal zone between life and death, which is incompatible with God's holy presence.
- When the two diagnostic criteria from verse 3 are absent — the spot is not deeper and the hair has not whitened — the case is ambiguous. The priest does not pronounce a verdict but imposes a seven-day quarantine (hisgir, literally 'to shut in' or 'to confine'). This observation period reflects the care built into the system: an uncertain case gets time, not a hasty judgment.
- The phrase amad be'einav ('stands in his eyes' — appears unchanged) describes a condition that has neither worsened nor improved. The Hebrew verb pashah ('to spread') becomes a key diagnostic marker throughout this chapter: spreading indicates active, dangerous tsara'at; containment suggests a benign condition. A second seven-day period is ordered, giving the condition a full fourteen days of observation before a final verdict.
- The Hebrew kehah ('faded, dimmed') indicates the condition is resolving. The priest's verdict is positive: it is a mispachath (a harmless rash or scab), not tsara'at. The person is declared tahor (clean) but must still wash their garments — the period of isolation itself conferred a degree of ritual contamination that requires cleansing before full reintegration into the community.
- The infinitive absolute pasoah tifseh (literally 'spreading it has spread') emphasizes the definitive nature of the spreading — this is not ambiguous growth but clear expansion. A case initially judged clean can be reopened if the condition worsens after the declaration. The system remains responsive to changing evidence.
- The spreading rash reverses the earlier clean verdict. The paragraph marker (pe) in the Hebrew text at the end of this verse signals the close of the first diagnostic unit (verses 2-8). The principle established across these seven verses is consistent: depth + white hair = immediate impurity; spreading = impurity; containment + fading = purity.

9. This begins a new diagnostic unit (verses 9-17) dealing with established or chronic skin disease, as distinct from the new-onset cases in verses 2-8. The passive 'he shall be brought' (huva) suggests communal responsibility — the community ensures the affected person is seen by the priest.
10. Three diagnostic features mark this as chronic tsara'at: (1) a white swelling (se'et levanah), (2) whitened hair, and (3) michyat basar chai — literally 'living flesh sprouting,' meaning raw, exposed tissue within the swelling. The presence of raw flesh (as opposed to a fully whitened surface) paradoxically indicates an active, ongoing condition.
11. The Hebrew noshenet ('chronic, long-standing') from the root y-sh-n ('old') indicates this is not a new case requiring observation. No quarantine period is needed — the diagnosis is immediate and certain. The logic is practical: isolation serves uncertain cases. When the diagnosis is clear, further observation would be pointless.
12. The infinitive absolute paroach tifrach ('breaking out it has broken out') emphasizes completeness. The paradoxical case that follows (verses 12-17) is one of the most striking in Leviticus: a condition that covers the entire body is declared clean, while partial coverage is unclean. The phrase lekhol mar'eh eini hakohen ('to every appearance of the priest's eyes') underscores that this is a visual diagnostic — the priest must examine the entire body.
13. This is the most counterintuitive ruling in the chapter: total coverage means purity; partial coverage means impurity. The logic likely rests on the diagnostic principle that tsara'at is identified by contrast — diseased skin versus healthy skin. When the entire surface is uniformly white, there is no contrast, no boundary between affected and unaffected tissue. The condition has stabilized into a uniform state. Some scholars also see the fully whitened skin as indicating the disease has run its course and is no longer active.
14. The reappearance of basar chai ('living flesh' — raw, exposed tissue) within the whitened area breaks the uniform surface and reintroduces the boundary between affected and healthy tissue. This signals active disease, and the person's status reverts to tamei.
15. The emphatic repetition — 'the raw flesh is impure, it is tsara'at' — serves as a legal formula reinforcing the principle. Raw flesh within a whitened area is itself the marker of active disease. The priest's role remains declaratory: he pronounces a status based on visible evidence, not on any treatment he provides.
16. The verb yashuv ('returns') combined with nehpakh ('is changed') describes a reversal — the raw tissue heals over and becomes uniformly white again. The person initiates this visit (uva, 'he shall come'), unlike verse 2 where the community brings the person (huva, passive). A person aware of their own improvement seeks reassessment.
17. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the second diagnostic unit. The principle from verses 12-17 is internally consistent: uniformly white surface = clean; presence of raw flesh within the whitened area = unclean. This section demonstrates that the purity system is observational and procedural, not arbitrary.
18. This begins the third diagnostic unit (verses 18-23): skin disease arising from a healed boil (shechin). The term shechin refers to an infected sore or abscess. The concern is whether a healed boil site develops tsara'at symptoms — the disease can appear at sites of previous skin trauma.
19. The site of a healed boil (bimqom hashechin) is vulnerable to secondary conditions. The diagnostic signs at the boil site — white swelling (se'et levanah) or a reddish-white bright spot (baheret levanah adamdameth) — are the same categories from verse 2, now applied to a specific location.
20. The same two criteria from verse 3 apply: depth below the skin surface (shaphal min ha'or) and whitened hair. The diagnostic logic is consistent regardless of the skin condition's origin — whether from new onset (vv 2-8), chronic condition (vv 9-17), or healed boil (vv 18-23).
21. An ambiguous case at a boil site: the diagnostic criteria for tsara'at are absent (no white hair, not deeper), but the spot has not fully resolved (kehab, 'faded' or 'dimmed' — present but not gone). The same seven-day observation protocol from verse 4 applies.
22. Spreading (pasoah tifseh) remains the decisive negative indicator. The verdict is brief and final: nega hi — 'it is an infection.' The terseness of the pronouncement reflects its legal character.
23. The Hebrew tsarebet hashechin ('scar/burn mark of the boil') identifies the spot as residual scarring, not active disease. A contained, non-spreading mark at a former boil site is a normal healing remnant. The section marker (samekh) closes this diagnostic unit.
24. This begins the fourth diagnostic unit (verses 24-28): skin disease arising from a burn (mikhvat esh, literally 'burning of fire'). The pattern mirrors the boil section (vv 18-23): secondary changes at a trauma site are examined for tsara'at markers. The michyat hamikvah ('raw/living area of the burn') refers to the healing burn wound.
25. The same two diagnostic criteria — whitened hair and depth below the skin surface — yield the same verdict as in all previous sections. The system's internal consistency is notable: regardless of the origin site (fresh skin, chronic condition, healed boil, or burn wound), the diagnostic markers and their interpretation remain constant.
26. Identical criteria to the ambiguous boil case in verse 21: absent diagnostic markers plus a faded appearance triggers a seven-day isolation period. The structural parallelism between the boil section (vv 18-23) and the burn section (vv 24-28) is deliberate — the same procedural logic applies to both trauma-related secondary conditions.
27. As in every previous section, spreading after the observation period is the decisive negative marker. The verb pashah ('to spread') appears more than twenty times in this chapter, making it the single most important diagnostic term after tsara'at itself.

- 28. The verdict mirrors verse 23 exactly: a contained, non-spreading, fading mark at a former burn site is tsarebet hamikvah ('scar of the burn'), not tsara'at. The paragraph marker (pe) closes this diagnostic unit.
- 29. This begins the fifth diagnostic unit (verses 29-37), addressing infections in hairy areas — the scalp and the beard. Women are explicitly included (ish o ishah), confirming that the entire purity system applies equally regardless of sex. The head and beard are distinct diagnostic zones because hair follicle involvement is assessed differently than on bare skin.
- 30. The diagnostic criteria for scalp/beard infections differ from skin infections: instead of white hair, the marker is se'ar tsahov daq ('thin yellow hair'). The term neteq (rendered 'scaly infection') specifically describes a condition affecting hairy areas, possibly ringworm or a similar fungal infection. The depth criterion remains the same.
- 31. The absence of dark hair (se'ar shachor) in the affected area raises concern — healthy hair follicles should produce dark hair. But since the other diagnostic marker (depth) is absent, the case is ambiguous and goes to observation. The seven-day quarantine protocol applies to scalp infections just as it does to skin infections.
- 32. Three negative findings after seven days: no spreading, no yellow hair, and no depth below the skin. All three must be absent for the observation to continue — any one positive finding would trigger an immediate unclean verdict. The list of criteria is exhaustive for this diagnostic category.
- 33. The instruction to shave around (but not over) the infected area serves a diagnostic purpose: by clearing the surrounding hair, any spreading of the infection into previously healthy scalp will be immediately visible during the second examination. This is a practical clinical technique, not a ritual act.
- 34. After fourteen days of observation (two seven-day periods), containment and absence of depth markers results in a clean verdict. As in verse 6, the person must wash garments before full reintegration — the quarantine itself has imposed a degree of ritual separation that requires formal conclusion.
- 35. As with the rash in verse 7, a clean verdict can be reversed by subsequent spreading. The phrase acharei tohorato ('after his cleansing') indicates this is a recurrence or progression after a declaration of purity — the system remains open to new evidence.
- 36. Spreading alone is now sufficient for an unclean verdict — the priest does not need to find yellow hair as a secondary marker. The verb yevaqqer ('shall search, shall investigate') is used here uniquely in Leviticus; in recurrence after a clean declaration, the threshold for an unclean finding is lower. Spreading after cleansing is itself diagnostic.
- 37. The growth of dark hair (se'ar shachor) in the previously affected area is the definitive sign of healing — healthy follicles have resumed normal function. The term nirpa ('is healed') is one of the few times this chapter uses healing language. The section marker (samekh) closes this diagnostic unit.
- 38. This brief unit (verses 38-39) addresses a benign condition: white spots on the skin that are not tsara'at. Both men and women are again explicitly included. The repetition beharot beharot levanot ('spots, white spots') uses the double noun for emphasis — these are distinctly, noticeably white patches.
- 39. The diagnosis of bohaq (a harmless rash, possibly vitiligo or a mild depigmentation) is immediate — no quarantine required. The distinguishing marker is that the spots are kehot levanot ('dull white' or 'faded white') rather than bright white. Bohaq appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. The person is immediately declared clean because this condition has no bearing on ritual status.
- 40. Natural baldness (qereach, baldness of the crown or back of the head) does not render a person tamei. The explicit statement of purity is necessary because hair loss could be confused with the neteq conditions described in verses 29-37. This verse prevents over-diagnosis by establishing that ordinary baldness is categorically clean.
- 41. The Hebrew distinguishes between qereach (back-of-head baldness, v 40) and gibbeach (forehead or front-of-head baldness). Both are declared clean. The term mip'at panav ('from the side of his face') specifies the hairline receding from the front. This distinction between two types of hair loss demonstrates the precision of the diagnostic system.
- 42. While baldness itself is clean, a reddish-white mark (nega lavan adamdam) on a bald area is potentially tsara'at — the bald scalp is not immune from skin disease. The diagnostic criteria shift: since there is no hair in the bald area, the hair-based markers (white hair, yellow hair) cannot apply, and the diagnosis relies on the appearance and color of the mark.
- 43. The comparison kemar'eh tsara'at or basar ('like the appearance of skin disease on body skin') establishes that the same visual criteria used for skin elsewhere on the body apply to the bald scalp. The priest evaluates the bald area by analogy to the standards already established in earlier sections.
- 44. The emphatic construction tamme yetamme'ennu ('declaring unclean he shall declare him unclean' — shall certainly declare him unclean) uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis. The final clause bero'sho nig'o ('on his head is his infection') may explain why the emphasis is needed: head infections may have been considered particularly serious because the head is the most visible part of the body, making the person's tamei status publicly apparent.
- 45. The behavioral requirements for the person declared tamei mirror mourning customs: torn garments (begadav yihyu ferumim), disheveled hair (ro'sho yihyeh farua), covered mouth (al sapham ya'teh). The person publicly performs the signs of someone in a state of social death — separated from community, from worship, and from normal life. The outcry tamé tamé ('Unclean! Unclean!') serves as a warning so others can avoid contracting ritual impurity through contact.

45. These prescriptions are often read as cruel, but they serve a protective function within the purity system: they prevent the impurity from spreading to others and to the sanctuary, which would threaten God's continued presence among the people. The system's ultimate concern is preserving the conditions for divine dwelling.
46. The phrase badad yeshev ('he shall dwell alone') describes total separation from the camp — and therefore from the tabernacle at its center. Since the tabernacle is God's dwelling place, exclusion from the camp is exclusion from proximity to God's presence. The section marker (samekh) at the end signals the close of the human skin disease section. What follows (verses 47-59) addresses tsara'at in fabrics — a distinctly different diagnostic category.
46. This verse establishes the stakes of the entire diagnostic system: the consequence of a tamei declaration is not just social isolation but theological separation. The path back — through healing, priestly examination, and the purification ritual of chapter 14 — is the purity system's restorative purpose.
47. The chapter shifts from human skin disease to fabric contamination. The same term tsara'at applies to both, which is itself significant: the condition is defined by its visible characteristics and ritual implications, not by a single biological cause. The contamination of fabrics is likely describing mold, mildew, or fungal growth on textiles. Wool (tsemer) and linen (pishtim) were the primary textile materials in ancient Israel.
48. The Hebrew sheti (warp — the vertical threads held taut on the loom) and erev (woof — the horizontal threads woven through the warp) distinguish between the structural components of fabric. The inclusion of leather (or) and leather goods (melekhet or) extends the diagnostic system to animal hides, covering the full range of materials used in clothing, tents, and equipment.
49. The color indicators for fabric contamination differ from human skin: yeraqraq ('greenish') and adamdam ('reddish') describe the discoloration caused by mold or mildew growth. These colors — green and red — are distinct from the white and reddish-white markers of human skin tsara'at, reflecting different underlying causes while sharing the same diagnostic category.
50. The same seven-day observation protocol applies to contaminated fabrics as to ambiguous human skin cases. The verb hisgir ('isolate, confine') is used for the garment itself — the item, not a person, is quarantined. The parallel procedure underscores that tsara'at in the Levitical system is a diagnostic category defined by protocol, not by biology.
51. The term mam'eret ('persistent, malignant, fretting') from the root m-l-r describes contamination that is active and destructive — literally 'embittering' or 'irritating.' This is contamination that consumes or corrodes the material. The comprehensive list of affected items (garment, warp, woof, leather, any leather article) ensures no category of textile or hide is excluded from this ruling.
52. Burning (saraph) is the prescribed destruction method for persistently contaminated items. The item cannot be salvaged — the contamination has penetrated the material. This is the most severe outcome for fabric tsara'at, paralleling the permanent impurity declaration for human cases. The total destruction ensures no contaminated material remains in proximity to the camp and the tabernacle.
53. Non-spreading contamination after seven days triggers a secondary procedure (washing and re-observation), just as non-spreading human skin conditions trigger a second observation period. The system consistently gives ambiguous cases additional time and intervention before rendering a final verdict.
54. The washing (kibbsu) is an active intervention — unlike the human cases where no treatment is applied during observation. For fabrics, washing is an attempt to remove the contamination before a second inspection. This practical step reflects the different nature of fabric contamination (likely mold or mildew, which can sometimes be removed by washing).
55. A mark that resists washing — even if it has not spread — is declared unclean and must be burned. The term pecheteth ('corrosion, worn spot, pit') from the root p-ch-t ('to hollow out, to corrode') indicates the contamination has eaten into the material. The phrase beqarachto o vegabbachto ('on its bald side or its hairy side') uses the same vocabulary as the human baldness terms in verses 40-42, now applied metaphorically to the worn versus unworn surface of a fabric — an intriguing verbal echo.
56. A faded mark after washing represents partial decontamination — the contaminated section can be removed (qara, 'tear, rip') without destroying the entire garment. This is the most favorable outcome short of complete disappearance: the item is salvaged by excising the affected portion. The procedure reflects practical economy — in an ancient context, textiles and leather were valuable and not easily replaced.
57. Recurrence after excision (porachat hi, 'it is breaking out') means the contamination has spread beyond the removed section. At this point, total destruction by fire is required. The escalating response — observation, washing, excision, burning — shows a graduated system that only resorts to total destruction when all lesser interventions have failed.
58. The positive outcome: if washing successfully removes the contamination (sar mehem hanega, 'the mark has departed from them'), a second washing confirms the item's cleanliness. The double washing parallels the double inspection period in human cases — the system builds in confirmation steps before declaring purity. The final word taher ('clean') restores the item to full usability.
59. The closing formula zot torat ('this is the instruction/law of') uses torah in its technical legal sense: a body of authoritative instruction for a specific category of case. The verb forms letaharo o letamme'o ('to declare it clean or to declare it unclean') summarize the entire chapter's purpose: the priest's role is judicial classification, determining the ritual status of persons and objects so that the boundaries between clean and unclean — and therefore between the camp and the wilderness, between the community and isolation — are maintained.

59. The paragraph marker (pe) closes both the fabric section and the entire chapter. Chapter 14 will address the restoration process — the path from unclean back to clean.

Summary: The purification ritual for a healed person with skin disease involves two stages: an initial ceremony outside the camp with two birds (one slaughtered, one released alive), cedar wood, scarlet yarn, and hyssop; then a seven-day process culminating in offerings at the tent of meeting. The chapter also addresses tsara'at on house walls.

What Makes This Remarkable: The two-bird ritual is unique to purification: one bird dies and the other is released alive, dipped in the blood of the first. The living bird carries the impurity away, anticipating the Yom Kippur scapegoat. The priest goes out to the excluded person -- a striking image of the purity system's restorative purpose. Blood is applied to the healed person's right ear, thumb, and toe, the same pattern as priestly ordination (ch 8).

Translation Friction: The term metsora ("person with skin disease") is a participial form describing a state, not an identity, and we rendered it accordingly. The phrase ets erez ("cedar wood") paired with ezov ("hyssop") -- the tallest and smallest plants -- symbolically brackets the entire plant kingdom, and we noted this range without imposing an allegory. The house-wall tsara'at (v33-53) strained English because the same Hebrew term covers both human skin and building surfaces.

Connections: The two-bird ritual parallels the two-goat Yom Kippur ceremony (ch 16). The blood on ear, thumb, and toe connects to the priestly ordination of 8:23-24. The cedar-hyssop-scarlet combination reappears in the red heifer ritual (Num 19:6). Jesus's command "show yourself to the priest" (Matt 8:4) references this chapter's procedure.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²This shall be the instruction for the person with skin disease on the day of his purification. He shall be brought to the priest. ³The priest shall go out to a place outside the camp and examine the person. If the skin disease infection has healed in the person with the disease, ⁴the priest shall order that two live, clean birds be taken for the one being purified, along with cedar wood, scarlet yarn, and hyssop. ⁵The priest shall command that one of the birds be slaughtered over an earthenware vessel containing fresh water. ⁶He shall take the living bird along with the cedar wood, the scarlet yarn, and the hyssop, and dip them — including the living bird — in the blood of the slaughtered bird mixed with the fresh water. ⁷He shall sprinkle it seven times on the one being purified from the skin disease, and shall declare him clean. Then he shall release the living bird over the open field. ⁸The one being purified shall wash his clothes, shave off all his hair, and bathe in water, and he will be clean. After that he may enter the camp, but he shall stay outside his tent for seven days. ⁹On the seventh day he shall shave off all his hair — his head, his beard, his eyebrows — all his hair he shall shave off. He shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water, and he will be clean. ¹⁰On the eighth day he shall take two male lambs without defect, one yearling female lamb without defect, three-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering, and one log of oil. ¹¹The priest who performs the purification shall present the person being purified, together with the offerings, before the LORD at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ¹²The priest shall take one of the male lambs and present it as a guilt offering, along with the log of oil, and elevate them as a wave offering before the LORD. ¹³He shall slaughter the lamb in the place where the sin offering and the burnt offering are slaughtered, in the holy area. For like the sin offering, the guilt offering belongs to the priest — it is most holy. ¹⁴The priest shall take some of the blood of the guilt offering and put it on the lobe of the right ear of the one being purified, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot. ¹⁵The priest shall take some of the log of oil and pour it into his own left palm. ¹⁶The priest shall dip his right finger in the oil that is in his left palm and sprinkle some of the oil with his finger seven times before the LORD. ¹⁷From the remaining oil in his palm, the priest shall put some on the lobe of the right ear of the one being purified, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot — on top of the blood of the guilt offering. ¹⁸The rest of the oil that is in the priest's palm he shall put on the head of the one being purified. And the priest shall make atonement for him before the LORD. ¹⁹The priest shall offer the sin offering and make atonement for the one being purified from his impurity. After that, he shall slaughter the burnt offering. ²

The priest shall offer the burnt offering and the grain offering on the altar. The priest shall make atonement for him, and he will be clean. ²¹But if he is poor and cannot afford that much, he shall take one male lamb as a guilt offering to be elevated as a wave offering, to make atonement for him, and one-tenth of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering, and a log of oil, ²²along with two turtledoves or two young pigeons — whichever he can afford. One shall be a sin offering and the other a burnt offering. ²³He shall bring them on the eighth day for his purification to the priest, at the entrance of the tent of meeting, before the LORD. ²⁴The priest shall take the lamb of the guilt offering and the log of oil, and the priest shall elevate them as a wave offering before the LORD. ²⁵He shall slaughter the lamb of the guilt offering, and the priest shall take some of the blood of the guilt offering and put it on the lobe of the right ear of the one being purified, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot. ²⁶The priest shall pour some of the oil into his own left palm. ²⁷The priest shall sprinkle some of the oil in his left palm with his right finger seven times before the LORD. ²⁸The priest shall put some of the oil in his palm on the lobe of the right ear of the one being purified, on the thumb of his right hand, and on the big toe of his right foot — on the place where the blood of the guilt offering was applied. ²⁹The rest of the oil in the priest's palm he shall put on the head of the one being purified, to make atonement for him before the LORD. ³⁰He shall then offer one of the turtledoves or young pigeons — whichever he can afford — ³¹whichever he can afford — one as a sin offering and one as a burnt offering, along with the grain offering. The priest shall make atonement for the one being purified before the LORD. ³²This is the instruction for the person who has a skin disease infection and whose means are insufficient for his purification. ³³The LORD spoke to Moses and to Aaron, saying: ³⁴When you enter the land of Canaan, which I am giving you as a possession, and I place a contamination mark in a house in the land you possess, ³⁵the owner of the house shall come and report to the priest, saying, 'Something like a mark has appeared in my house.' ³⁶The priest shall order the house to be emptied before he enters to examine the mark, so that everything in the house will not become unclean. After that, the priest shall enter to examine the house. ³⁷He shall examine the mark, and if the mark is in the walls of the house — pitted depressions that are greenish or reddish, and they appear to be recessed below the wall surface — ³⁸the priest shall go out of the house to its entrance and quarantine the house for seven days. ³⁹The priest shall return on the seventh day and examine it. If the mark has spread in the walls of the house, ⁴⁰the priest shall order them to remove the stones that have the mark and throw them outside the city in an unclean place. ⁴¹He shall have the house scraped all around on the inside, and the plaster that is scraped off shall be dumped outside the city in an unclean place. ⁴²They shall take new stones and set them in place of the old stones, and he shall take fresh plaster and replaster the house. ⁴³If the mark returns and breaks out in the house after the stones have been removed, and after the house has been scraped and replastered, ⁴⁴the priest shall come and examine it. If the mark has spread in the house, it is a persistent contamination in the house — it is unclean. ⁴⁵He shall demolish the house — its stones, its timber, and all its plaster — and carry the materials outside the city to an unclean place. ⁴⁶Anyone who enters the house during all the time it is quarantined shall be unclean until evening. ⁴⁷Anyone who lies down in the house shall wash his clothes, and anyone who eats in the house shall wash his clothes. ⁴⁸But if the priest comes and examines it and the mark has not spread in the house after it was replastered, then the priest shall declare the house clean, because the mark has healed. ⁴⁹He shall take two birds, cedar wood, scarlet yarn, and hyssop to purify the house. ⁵⁰He shall slaughter one of the birds over an earthenware vessel containing fresh water. ⁵¹He shall take the cedar wood, the hyssop, the scarlet yarn, and the living bird, and dip them in the blood of the slaughtered bird and in the fresh water, and sprinkle the house seven times. ⁵²He shall purify the house with the blood of the bird, with the fresh water, with the living bird, with the cedar wood, with the hyssop, and with the scarlet yarn. ⁵³He shall release the living bird outside the city over the open field, and make atonement for the house. And it will be clean. ⁵⁴This is the instruction for every kind of skin disease infection and for scaly infections, ⁵⁵for contamination in garments and in houses, ⁵⁶for swellings, for rashes, and for shiny spots — ⁵⁷to give instruction for the day of uncleanness and for the day of cleanness. This is the instruction concerning skin disease.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Unlike Leviticus 13:1, Aaron is not addressed here — only Moses. The purification ritual that follows involves sacrificial elements that require Moses's legislative authority, while the diagnostic instructions of chapter 13 required Aaron's priestly diagnostic role.

2. The phrase torat hametsora ('instruction for the person with tsara'at') uses torah in its technical sense — a specific procedural ruling. The word metsora is the participial form of tsara'at, describing someone in a state of skin disease. The phrase beyom tohorato ('on the day of his purification') signals that healing has already occurred; what follows is the ritual restoration of the person's status from tamei to tahor — from exclusion to reintegration.
3. The priest goes out to the person — the person cannot come in, since they are still tamei and excluded from the camp (13:46). The verb nirpa ('has healed') is passive — the healing has happened, and the priest confirms it. The priest does not perform the healing; he verifies it and initiates the ritual of restoration. This going-out of the priest to meet the excluded person is a striking image of the purity system's restorative purpose.
4. The purification materials are rich in symbolism: two living birds (tsipporim chayot tehoret — living and ritually clean), cedar wood (ets erez — aromatic, decay-resistant), scarlet yarn (sheni tola'at — literally 'scarlet of the worm,' a deep red dye), and hyssop (ezov — a small aromatic plant used for sprinkling). The same combination appears in the red heifer ritual (Numbers 19:6). The use of two birds — one killed, one released alive — creates a ritual pairing unique to purification ceremonies.
5. The first bird is slaughtered (shachat — the technical term for ritual killing) over a clay vessel filled with mayim chayyim ('living water' — fresh, flowing water as opposed to stagnant water). The combination of blood and living water in the vessel creates the purification medium. The earthenware vessel (keli cheres) is unglazed clay, which absorbs the blood-water mixture and cannot be reused for ordinary purposes.
6. The living bird, cedar wood, scarlet yarn, and hyssop are all dipped together in the blood-water mixture. The living bird absorbs the symbolic contamination through this dipping — it will carry the impurity away when released (v 7), similar in concept to the scapegoat of Yom Kippur (16:21-22) that carries Israel's sins into the wilderness.
7. The sevenfold sprinkling (hizzah sheva pe'amim) is a purification act — seven being the number of completeness. The priest then declares the person tahor ('clean') — the first verbal restoration of status. The release of the living bird (shillach) into the open field (al penei hasadeh) carries the impurity away from the person and from the camp. This entire ritual takes place outside the camp; the person is not yet fully restored.
8. Three purification acts are required of the person: washing garments, complete shaving (gillach et kol se'aro — all hair, not just head hair), and immersion in water. The total shaving symbolizes a fresh start — the person emerges from the water as if newly born, without the hair that grew during the period of impurity. He may re-enter the camp but not yet his own tent, creating a transitional period between exclusion and full restoration.
9. A second complete shaving occurs on the seventh day, explicitly listing the areas: head (ro'sho), beard (zeqano), eyebrows (gabbat einav), and all remaining hair. The comprehensive list — 'all his hair he shall shave' repeated for emphasis — ensures nothing from the period of impurity remains. This second shaving, combined with garment washing and immersion, prepares the person for the sacrificial ritual on day eight.
10. The eighth-day offerings are substantial: two male lambs (for the guilt offering and the burnt offering), one female lamb (for the sin offering), fine flour with oil (for the grain offering), and a separate log of oil (for the anointing ritual). The Hebrew temimim ('without defect') is the standard sacrificial requirement — only unblemished animals are fit for offering. Three of the five offering types from Leviticus 1-7 appear here: asham (guilt offering), chata't (sin offering), and olah (burnt offering), along with the minchah (grain offering).
10. A log (approximately 0.3 liters or about two-thirds of a pint) is the smallest liquid measure in the Hebrew system. This oil will be used in the distinctive anointing ritual of verses 14-18.
11. The person now stands at the entrance of the tent of meeting (petach ohel mo'ed) — the threshold between the common space of the camp and the sacred space of the tabernacle. This is as close to God's presence as the person can come at this stage. The priest 'stands him' (he'emid) there — the language is formal and ceremonial. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') marks this as a formal appearance in God's presence.
12. The guilt offering (asham) is offered first — before the sin offering and burnt offering. The asham addresses specific trespass or violation; in this context, the person's impurity has kept them from fulfilling their obligations to God, and the asham compensates for that loss. The wave offering (tenufah — a ritual elevation or movement before the LORD) presents the offering to God before the actual sacrifice. The combination of asham and oil is unique to this purification rite.
13. The guilt offering lamb is slaughtered in the same sacred area (maqom haqqodesh) as the sin offering and burnt offering — the north side of the altar (cf. 1:11, 4:24, 7:2). The classification qodesh qodashim ('most holy') means this offering has the highest sanctity level — only the priests may eat of it, and only within the sacred precincts. The parallel to the sin offering (kachata't ha'asham) establishes that both offerings serve a similar function in restoring the person's relationship to the sacred.
14. The blood-application ritual — right ear lobe (tenukh ozen), right thumb (bohen yad), right big toe (bohen regel) — is identical to the priestly ordination ceremony in Exodus 29:20 and Leviticus 8:23-24. The healed person undergoes a ceremony structurally parallel to a priest being consecrated: both are being set apart for restored access to God's presence. The three extremities symbolize the whole person: hearing (ear), doing (hand), and walking (foot) — the person's entire life is reconsecrated.
15. The priest's left hand becomes a vessel for the oil, freeing the right hand (the dominant hand) for the application ritual that follows. The careful choreography of the priest's hands throughout this passage reflects the precision required in sacred ritual — each movement has a designated purpose.

16. The sevenfold sprinkling of oil before the LORD parallels the sevenfold sprinkling of the blood-water mixture in verse 7. Oil in the Levitical system represents consecration and the Spirit's anointing — it is applied to priests at ordination (8:12), to the tabernacle furniture, and here to the person being restored. The oil sprinkling is directed lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD'), toward the sacred space.
17. The oil is placed on the same three points as the blood (v 14) — right ear, right thumb, right big toe — but explicitly on top of the blood (al dam ha'asham). The layering is significant: blood first, then oil. Blood addresses the ritual contamination; oil consecrates and restores. The sequence moves from purification to sanctification — from removing impurity to adding holiness.
18. The remaining oil is poured on the person's head (al rosh hamittaher), completing the anointing — an act associated with kings, priests, and the consecration of sacred objects. The kippur formula appears here for the first time in this chapter: vekipper alav hakohen lifnei YHWH ('the priest shall make atonement for him before the LORD'). In this context, atonement restores ritual status rather than addressing moral sin.
18. The parallel to priestly ordination (Exodus 29, Leviticus 8) is now complete: the healed person has undergone blood application to ear, thumb, and toe (like a new priest) and oil anointing on the head (like a new king). The person with skin disease is restored not merely to ordinary status but through a ceremony that echoes the most sacred consecration rituals in Israel.
19. The sin offering (chata't) follows the guilt offering — it addresses the contamination of sacred space that the person's impurity may have caused. The phrase mittum'ato ('from his impurity') makes explicit that this atonement is for ritual impurity, not moral transgression. The burnt offering (olah) comes last in sequence — after purification (chata't) and reparation (asham), the person offers total devotion (olah, which is entirely consumed on the altar). The three offerings move from compensation to purification to consecration.
20. The burnt offering (olah — entirely consumed, representing complete devotion) and the grain offering (minchah — the fruit of human labor offered to God) complete the sacrificial sequence. The second kippur formula appears, and the final word of the section is vetaher ('and he will be clean'). The entire journey — from exclusion outside the camp, through the bird ritual, shaving, washing, the eight-day waiting period, and the four-offering sacrificial sequence — culminates in this single word: clean. The person is fully restored to the community and to God's presence.
20. The section marker (samekh) indicates the end of the standard purification procedure. What follows (vv 21-32) addresses the same ritual for those who cannot afford the full offering.
21. The phrase im dal hu ve'ein yado masseget ('if he is poor and his hand cannot reach') introduces a sliding-scale provision that ensures no one is excluded from purification by poverty. The guilt offering (asham) remains the same — one lamb — because the asham addresses a specific obligation that does not change with economic status. But the sin offering and burnt offering are reduced (v 22). The system preserves theological necessity while accommodating economic reality.
22. Birds (torim or benei yonah — turtledoves or young pigeons) substitute for the two additional lambs required in the standard procedure (v 10). This is the same substitution permitted for postpartum purification (12:8) and throughout the offering system. The provision ensures that the poorest Israelite can complete the purification ritual. Poverty does not prevent restoration to God's presence.
23. The timing (eighth day), location (entrance of the tent of meeting), and presentation (before the LORD) are identical to the standard procedure in verse 11. The poor person stands in the same place, at the same time, before the same God. The reduced offering does not reduce the dignity or completeness of the ritual.
24. The guilt offering and oil ritual (vv 24-29) repeats the standard procedure (vv 12-18) without modification. The blood-and-oil application to ear, thumb, and toe is the same for the poor person as for the wealthy. The anointing ritual does not have a reduced version — the person's body receives the same consecrating touch regardless of economic status.
25. Identical to verse 14. The blood application to the three extremities — ear, hand, foot — reconsecrates the whole person: what they hear, what they do, where they go. This ritual element is non-negotiable regardless of the person's economic status.
26. Identical to verse 15. The oil choreography is the same for both versions of the ritual.
27. Identical to verse 16. The sevenfold sprinkling before the LORD is preserved in the reduced-cost version — the number seven signifies completeness and cannot be reduced.
28. Identical to verse 17. The layering of oil over blood on the three extremities is the same. The phrase al meqom dam ha'asham ('on the place of the blood of the guilt offering') is more explicit than verse 17, specifying that the oil goes on the exact spot where the blood was placed.
29. Identical to verse 18. The kippur formula — lekha'pper alav lifnei YHWH ('to make atonement for him before the LORD') — is the same for the poor person's offering. Atonement does not depend on the size of the offering but on the faithfulness of the ritual and the mercy of God.
30. The phrase me'asher tassig yado ('from what his hand can reach') is the economic-capacity clause, used three times in this section (vv 21, 22, 30). The system acknowledges material reality without compromising ritual necessity.
31. The concluding kippur formula is identical to the standard version. The result — full atonement and purification before the LORD — is the same regardless of the offering's economic value. This is a profound theological statement: the efficacy of atonement resides in God's acceptance, not in the cost of the offering.
32. The closing formula zot torat ('this is the instruction for') marks the end of the reduced-offering section. The phrase asher lo tassig yado betohorato ('whose hand does not reach for his purification') is a compassionate legal category — not a stigma but a recognized status that triggers accommodation. The paragraph marker (pe) separates the human purification ritual from the house contamination laws that follow.

33. A new legislative unit begins, addressing both Moses and Aaron (as in 13:1). The inclusion of Aaron signals the diagnostic role of the priest in what follows — house contamination requires the same priestly examination as human skin disease.
34. This section anticipates settled life in Canaan — the regulations apply to permanent houses, not wilderness tents. The striking phrase venatatti nega tsara'at ('I will place a contamination mark') attributes the house contamination directly to God — not as punishment but as a matter that falls within God's sovereign ordering of the world. The contamination in houses is likely describing mold, mildew, or mineral discoloration in walls, extended to the same tsara'at diagnostic framework used for human skin and fabrics.
35. The homeowner's report uses the cautious phrase kenega ('something like a mark') rather than declaring it definitively. The Talmud (Negaim 12:5) notes that even a Torah scholar who knows it is tsara'at should use this tentative language — only the priest has the authority to make the official determination. This preserves the priestly diagnostic role and prevents premature self-diagnosis.
36. The order to empty the house (upinnu et habayit) before the priestly inspection reveals the practical compassion within the system. Once the priest pronounces the house tamei, everything inside it becomes unclean. By clearing the house first, the household's possessions are spared — they retain their clean status. The system protects what can be protected before imposing the consequences of an unclean verdict.
37. The diagnostic criteria for house contamination parallel fabric contamination (13:49): greenish or reddish discoloration. The additional marker sheqa'arurot ('hollowed-out, pitted') describes depressions in the wall — the contamination has eaten into the stone or plaster. The depth criterion (shaphal min haqqir, 'lower than the wall') echoes the human skin criterion of depth below the skin surface (13:3). The consistency of diagnostic markers across human, fabric, and building contexts demonstrates the systematic nature of the tsara'at framework.
38. The priest exits before pronouncing his verdict — he does not remain inside a potentially contaminated space. The seven-day quarantine (hisgir) is the same observation protocol used for ambiguous human cases (13:4). The house itself is placed under isolation, applying the same procedural framework to a building as to a person.
39. The spreading criterion (pashah) — the primary diagnostic indicator throughout chapters 13-14 — applies to house contamination as it does to human skin and fabric. Active, spreading contamination signals an unclean verdict.
40. Contaminated stones are removed (chilleitsu — 'extracted, pulled out') and deposited outside the city at a designated unclean area (maqom tamei). The city, like the camp, has a clean interior and unclean exterior. Contaminated material flows outward — away from inhabited space and away from sacred space.
41. After removing the contaminated stones, the remaining interior walls are scraped (yaqtsi'a — 'to scrape, to shave off'). All scraped-off material (aphar — 'dust, plaster') is also deposited in the unclean area. The procedure is methodical: remove the worst affected material, then scrape surrounding areas to eliminate any contamination that may have migrated.
42. New construction materials replace the contaminated ones — clean stones (avanim acherot) and fresh plaster (aphar acher). The house is rebuilt, not merely patched. The verb tach ('to plaster, to coat') describes applying a new surface layer over the replacement stones.
43. Recurrence after remediation (yashuv hanega ufarach — 'the mark returns and breaks out') is the decisive failure. The threefold 'after' (achar... ve'acharei... ve'acharei) emphasizes that every available intervention has been attempted: stone removal, scraping, and replastering. Only after all three measures have failed does the most severe verdict follow.
44. The verdict uses the same term as fabric contamination in 13:51: tsara'at mam'eret ('persistent/malignant contamination'). The parallel to the fabric ruling is exact — persistent contamination that resists intervention requires total destruction.
45. Total demolition (natats — 'to tear down, to demolish') is the final measure. Stones (avanim), wood (etsav), and plaster (aphar) — every component is removed. The parallel to the fabric ruling is complete: just as a garment with persistent contamination is burned (13:52), a house with persistent contamination is demolished. Nothing contaminated remains within the city.
46. Entry into a quarantined house transmits impurity, but at the lowest level — unclean only until evening (ad ha'erev). This is the mildest form of impurity in the Levitical system, requiring no offering and resolving at sundown. The contamination is real but limited in duration and severity.
47. Extended contact — sleeping (shakhav) or eating (akhal) in the quarantined house — requires garment washing, a higher level of purification than the evening-only impurity of verse 46. The activities of sleeping and eating represent sustained, intimate contact with the space, as opposed to merely passing through.
48. The positive outcome: after replastering, the mark has not returned or spread. The priest declares the house tahor ('clean'), and the healing language (nirpa hanega — 'the mark has healed') is the same as for human skin disease (v 3). The house, like a person, can be healed and restored to clean status.
49. The house purification uses the identical materials as the human purification ritual in verses 4-7: two birds, cedar wood, scarlet yarn, and hyssop. The verb lechatte ('to purify') shares its root with chata't (sin offering) — it means to remove contamination, to de-sin or de-pollute. The parallel structure reinforces that persons, fabrics, and buildings all fall within the same purity framework.
50. Identical to verse 5. The slaughter of one bird over an earthenware vessel with fresh water creates the purification medium. The consistency between the human purification and house purification rituals underscores the unified logic of the purity system.

51. The sevenfold sprinkling of the house parallels the sevenfold sprinkling of the person in verse 7. The house is treated as a subject of purification in the same way a human being is — it can become contaminated, it can be diagnosed, and it can be ritually restored.
52. The verb chitiei ('he shall purify') recapitulates the complete list of purification materials used in the ritual. The sixfold list — blood, water, living bird, cedar, hyssop, scarlet — names every element, ensuring the completeness of the purification is documented.
53. The release of the living bird carries the contamination away from the house and the city, just as in verse 7 it carries contamination away from the person and the camp. The kippur formula — vekipper al habbayit — applies atonement language to a building. A house, like a person, can be atoned for and restored to clean status within the community. The final word vetaher ('and it will be clean') resolves the house's status.
54. The closing summary (vv 54-57) recapitulates the scope of chapters 13-14 together. The phrase zot hattorah ('this is the instruction') frames the entire two-chapter unit as a single body of priestly instruction. The list that follows catalogs every category of tsara'at addressed: skin disease (nega hatsara'at) and scaly infection (neteq).
55. The two non-human categories of tsara'at — fabric contamination (13:47-59) and house contamination (14:33-53) — are listed alongside the human categories. The same term (tsara'at) applies to all three domains, creating a unified diagnostic and ritual system.
56. The three original diagnostic symptoms from 13:2 are named again: se'et (swelling), sapachat (rash), and baheret (shiny spot). These form the entry criteria for the entire diagnostic process. The summary thus runs from the broadest categories (all skin disease, scaly infections, fabric contamination, house contamination) down to the specific symptoms.
57. The verb lehorot ('to instruct, to teach') reveals the purpose of the entire legal corpus: education. The priest is not merely a judge but a teacher — his diagnostic work instructs the community about the boundaries between tamei and tahor, between impure and pure. The closing phrase zot torat hatsara'at ('this is the instruction concerning tsara'at') bookends the unit that began at 13:2. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the two-chapter unit definitively.
57. Chapters 13-14 together form a complete system: diagnosis (ch 13) and restoration (ch 14). The system begins with symptoms and ends with instruction — teaching Israel how to manage the boundaries between unclean and clean so that God's holy presence can safely dwell among them.

Summary: Bodily discharges -- abnormal male discharge, seminal emission, menstruation, and abnormal female bleeding -- produce ritual impurity that transmits by contact to persons and objects. Each condition has a specified purification process, ranging from evening washing to offerings at the tent of meeting.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter treats male and female bodily processes with structural symmetry: abnormal male discharge (vv 2-15) parallels abnormal female discharge (vv 25-30), and normal seminal emission (vv 16-17) parallels normal menstruation (vv 19-24). The closing rationale (v31) makes the purpose explicit: impurity management protects the tabernacle from contamination, keeping God's presence viable among a community of embodied people.

Translation Friction: *The term zav ("one who has a discharge") from z-u-v ("to flow") describes an abnormal bodily emission, and we distinguished it from normal emissions throughout. Rendering tum'at adam ("human impurity") required consistency with the system in chapters 11-14 while making clear that these are ritual, not moral, categories. The phrase zavah bedamehah ("a woman flowing in her blood," v25) needed careful rendering to preserve the medical reality without clinical coldness.*

Connections: The woman with the twelve-year blood flow (Mark 5:25-34) lived under this chapter's regulations. The closing verse (v31) connects directly to the sanctuary-protection theology of ch 16. The purification offerings prescribed here (vv 14-15, 29-30) use the same bird offerings available to the poor in ch 5 and ch 12.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and to Aaron, saying: ²Speak to the children of Israel and say to them: When any man has a discharge from his body, his discharge makes him unclean. ³This shall be the nature of his impurity from his discharge: whether his body flows with his discharge or his body is blocked by his discharge, it is his impurity. ⁴Every bed on which the person with the discharge lies will become unclean, and every object on which he sits will become unclean. ⁵Anyone who touches his bed must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ⁶Anyone who sits on something the person with the discharge has sat on must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ⁷Anyone who touches the body of the person with the discharge must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ⁸If the person with the discharge spits on someone who is clean, that person must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ⁹Any saddle on which the person with the discharge rides will become unclean. ¹⁰Anyone who touches anything that was under him will be unclean until evening. Anyone who carries such things must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ¹¹Anyone whom the person with the discharge touches without having rinsed his hands in water — that person must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ¹²Any clay vessel that the person with the discharge touches must be broken, and any wooden vessel must be rinsed with water. ¹³When the person with the discharge is healed of his discharge, he shall count seven days for his purification, wash his clothes, and bathe his body in fresh flowing water. Then he will be clean. ¹⁴On the eighth day he shall take two turtledoves or two young pigeons and come before the LORD at the entrance of the tent of meeting, and give them to the priest. ¹⁵The priest shall present them — one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering. The priest shall make atonement for him before the LORD for his discharge. ¹⁶When a man has a seminal emission, he shall bathe his entire body in water and will be unclean until evening. ¹⁷Any garment or leather on which there is semen shall be washed with water and will be unclean until evening. ¹⁸When a man lies with a woman and there is a seminal emission, both of them shall bathe in water and will be unclean until evening. ¹⁹When a woman has a discharge — her discharge being blood from her body — she shall be in her state of menstrual impurity for seven days. Anyone who touches her will be unclean until evening. ²⁰Anything she lies on during her menstrual impurity will become unclean, and anything she sits on will become unclean. ²¹Anyone who touches her bed must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ²²Anyone who touches any object she has sat on must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ²³Whether it is on the bed or on any object she is sitting on, when he touches it, he will be unclean until evening. ²⁴If a man lies with her at all and her menstrual impurity comes upon him, he will be unclean for seven days, and any bed he lies on will become unclean. ²⁵When a woman has a flow of blood for many days outside her regular menstrual period, or when it extends beyond her menstrual period, she will be unclean for all the days of her impure discharge, just as during the days of her menstrual period. ²⁶Every bed she lies on during the entire period of her discharge will be treated like her bed during menstruation, and every object she sits on will be unclean, like the impurity of her menstrual period. ²⁷Anyone who touches these things will become unclean. He must wash his clothes and bathe in water, and will be unclean until evening. ²⁸When she is healed of her discharge, she shall count seven days, and after that she will be clean. ²⁹On the eighth day she shall take two turtledoves or two young pigeons and bring them to the priest at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ³⁰The priest shall present one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering. The priest shall make atonement for her before the LORD for the discharge of her impurity. ³¹You shall keep the children of Israel separate from their impurity, so that they do not die in their impurity by contaminating My dwelling place that is among them. ³²This is the instruction for the man with a discharge and for the man from whom a seminal emission goes out, making him unclean by it; ³³and for a woman in her menstrual impurity, and for anyone — male or female — who has a discharge, and for a man who lies with a woman who is unclean.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Both Moses and Aaron are addressed, as in chapters 13-14. Aaron's inclusion signals the priestly diagnostic and ritual role that follows. This chapter addresses bodily discharges — the most intimate and private category of impurity — and brings even these into the scope of priestly oversight and divine instruction.
2. The term zav ('one who has a discharge') describes a man with an abnormal bodily discharge — likely a chronic or pathological genital discharge distinct from normal seminal emission (addressed separately in vv 16-18). The phrase ish ish ('man, man' — every single man) is emphatic: this applies universally. The impurity is caused by the discharge itself (zobo tamei hu — 'his discharge, he is unclean'), not by any moral failing.
3. Two states are covered: active flow (rar besaro — 'his flesh runs/flows') and blocked discharge (hechtim besaro — 'his flesh is sealed/stopped'). Both conditions produce impurity — the discharge need not be actively flowing to render the person tamei. The impurity persists as long as the underlying condition exists, whether currently producing discharge or temporarily halted.
4. Impurity transfers from the person to objects through sustained contact: beds (mishkav — sleeping surfaces) and seats (keli — any object sat upon). The principle is that the zav's impurity radiates outward through physical contact, contaminating the objects of daily life. These contaminated objects then become secondary sources of impurity (vv 5-10).

5. Secondary impurity — contracted by touching the zav's bed — is milder than the zav's own impurity: it lasts only until evening (ad ha'erev) and requires garment washing and bathing but no sacrifice. The evening boundary likely corresponds to sundown, when a new day begins in the Hebrew calendar. The impurity expires automatically with the turning of the day.
6. The same purification procedure and duration as verse 5: washing, bathing, unclean until evening. The impurity transfers through the seat — a third party contracts impurity from the object rather than from the person directly. This chain of transmission (person object third party) demonstrates how impurity spreads through a community if unchecked.
7. Direct physical contact (noge'a bivsar hazzav — 'touching the flesh/body of the one with the discharge') transmits impurity at the same level as contact with contaminated objects: evening-duration impurity with washing and bathing. The body of the zav is itself a source of contamination.
8. Saliva (roq — 'spit') from the zav transmits impurity. Bodily fluids are the agents of contamination — the impurity follows the body's emissions. The verb yaroq ('spit') may describe intentional or accidental contact with saliva. The clean person (tahor) who receives the spit becomes tamei through no fault of their own — impurity transfer is a matter of contact, not intention.
9. The merkav ('saddle, riding seat, anything ridden upon') extends the contamination principle to travel equipment. The zav's impurity affects beds (v 4), seats (v 4), and now riding gear — every surface that sustains bodily contact becomes contaminated.
10. Two levels of secondary contact are distinguished: touching (noge'a — brief contact) produces evening-duration impurity without requiring laundering, while carrying (nosei — sustained contact of bearing the weight) requires garment washing and bathing in addition to the evening-duration impurity. The heavier the contact, the more extensive the purification required.
11. A significant qualification: the zav transmits impurity through touch only if he has not rinsed his hands (veyadav lo shataf bammayim — 'his hands he has not rinsed in water'). Hand-washing mitigates the transfer of impurity. This is one of the earliest references to hand-washing as a ritual hygiene practice, predating later rabbinic hand-washing regulations by centuries.
12. The material determines the response: clay vessels (keli cheres — unglazed earthenware) must be destroyed (yishshaver — 'shall be broken') because porous clay absorbs impurity permanently. Wooden vessels (keli ets) can be rinsed (yishshatef — 'shall be rinsed') because wood's surface can be effectively cleaned. The distinction is practical and reflects understanding of material properties — porous versus non-porous surfaces.
13. The purification process begins only after the discharge stops (ki yithar hazzav mizzovo — 'when the one with the discharge is cleansed from his discharge'). The seven-day waiting period (sapar lo shiv'at yamim — 'he shall count for himself seven days') ensures the condition has fully resolved. The bathing must be in mayim chayyim ('living water' — fresh, flowing water from a spring or stream, not stagnant or stored water). The higher-grade water requirement distinguishes this purification from the simpler evening-impurity cases.
14. The eighth-day sacrifice follows the seven-day purification — the same pattern as the skin-disease purification (14:10, 23) and the priestly ordination (9:1). The offering of birds (torim o benei yonah — turtledoves or young pigeons) is the standard minimum-cost sacrifice, making purification economically accessible.
15. The two-offering sequence — sin offering (chata't — purification of the sanctuary) and burnt offering (olah — complete devotion) — restores the person's relationship to God's presence. The kippur formula (vekipper alav hakohen lifnei YHWH mizzovo — 'the priest shall make atonement for him before the LORD for his discharge') frames the sacrifice as addressing the discharge, not any moral guilt. The section marker (samekh) closes the male abnormal discharge section.
16. The shift from abnormal discharge (zav, vv 2-15) to normal seminal emission (shikhvat zera — 'emission of seed') marks a different category of impurity: shorter duration (evening only, not seven days), simpler purification (bathing only, no sacrifice), and no contamination of objects beyond what the semen contacts directly (v 17). Normal sexual function produces a lower-grade impurity than pathological discharge.
17. Only garments and leather (beged, or) that are directly contacted by the semen require washing — unlike the zav's impurity, which contaminates beds and seats through the person's presence alone. The narrower scope of contamination reflects the lower severity of this category of impurity.
18. Sexual intercourse produces mutual, equal-duration impurity for both partners (verachatsu bammayim vetam'u ad ha'arev — 'they shall both bathe in water and be unclean until evening'). The impurity is symmetrical — both parties are affected equally. This brief impurity from normal sexual relations is a reminder that even the most natural human acts involve proximity to the life-force (semen carries the potential for new life), which touches the boundary where the sacred and the biological intersect. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the seminal emission section.
19. The female menstrual section (vv 19-24) parallels the male abnormal discharge section (vv 2-15) in structure but with key differences. The niddah period lasts seven days (shiv'at yamim) — a fixed duration regardless of the actual length of menstruation. The word niddah (from the root n-d-d, 'to separate, to wander') describes the state of ritual separation, not the biological process. Contact-transmitted impurity (evening-duration) applies to anyone who touches her.
20. The same object-contamination pattern as the male zav (v 4): beds and seats become carriers of secondary impurity. The parallel structure between the male and female sections reinforces that the purity system applies equally to both sexes — neither is singled out as uniquely impure.
21. The secondary impurity from touching the menstruant's bed mirrors verse 5 exactly — same procedure, same duration. The symmetry between male and female discharge regulations is deliberate and consistent.
22. The seat-contact rule mirrors verse 6. The repetitive structure of these regulations — each category of contact producing the same evening-duration impurity with washing and bathing — creates a comprehensive, predictable system.

- 23. This verse clarifies that secondary impurity from contaminated objects is contracted at the moment of contact (benag'o vo — 'when he touches it'), regardless of whether the menstruant is currently present. The object retains its impurity status even after she leaves it.
- 24. Sexual contact during menstruation produces the most severe impurity in this section: the man contracts the full seven-day niddah impurity (vetamei shiv'at yamim — not merely evening-duration). His impurity level matches hers — he takes on her full tamei status. The phrase utehi niddatah alav ('her niddah is upon him') describes the transfer of her impurity status to him. This is distinct from the moral prohibition of sexual relations during menstruation in 18:19 and 20:18 — here the focus is on the purity consequence, not the ethical judgment. The section marker (samekh) closes the menstruation section.
- 25. The final category (vv 25-30) addresses female abnormal bleeding — a chronic or extended blood flow outside the normal menstrual cycle. This is the zavah — the female counterpart to the male zav (vv 2-15). The woman with the hemorrhage whom Jesus healed (Mark 5:25-34) had been in this condition for twelve years. Her impurity made her unable to touch anyone or enter the temple — Jesus's willingness to be touched by her violated every purity boundary described in this chapter.
- 26. The abnormal bleeding produces the same contamination effects as regular menstruation (kemishkav niddatah — 'like the bed of her niddah') but for an indefinite duration. While niddah lasts a fixed seven days, the zavah's impurity continues kol yemei zavah ('all the days of her discharge') — as long as the condition persists.
- 27. The same secondary impurity rules apply as in the menstrual section (vv 21-22) and the male discharge section (vv 5-7): evening-duration impurity with washing and bathing. The consistency of purification requirements across all categories of discharge reinforces the systematic nature of the purity legislation.
- 28. The purification follows the same pattern as the male zav (v 13): cessation of the discharge, a seven-day waiting period (safrah lah shiv'at yamim — 'she shall count for herself seven days'), and then cleanness. The parallel is exact — male and female abnormal discharges receive identical treatment.
- 29. The same eighth-day sacrifice as the male zav (v 14): two birds (turtledoves or young pigeons), presented to the priest at the tent of meeting. The cost, timing, and procedure are identical for both sexes — the system does not impose a higher purification burden on women than on men for equivalent conditions.
- 30. The identical two-offering sequence as verse 15: sin offering (chata't) plus burnt offering (olah), with the kippur formula. The phrase mizzov tum'atah ('for the discharge of her impurity') parallels mizzovo ('for his discharge') in verse 15. The atonement addresses the impurity caused by the discharge, not any moral failing of the woman.
- 31. This is the theological rationale for the entire chapter — and arguably for the entire purity system. The purpose of the discharge regulations is velo yamutu betum'atam betamme'am et mishkani asher betokham ('so that they do not die in their impurity by contaminating My dwelling place that is among them'). God's dwelling (mishkan — tabernacle) exists among the people (betokham — 'in their midst'). Unaddressed impurity contaminates the sacred space. Accumulated contamination drives God's presence away. If God's presence departs, the people are exposed to the consequences of a world without divine protection. The purity laws exist to maintain the conditions under which a holy God can safely dwell among an impure people.
- 32. The closing summary (vv 32-33) catalogs all four categories addressed in the chapter. Male: the zav (abnormal discharge, vv 2-15) and the one with seminal emission (shikhvat zera, vv 16-18).
- 33. Female: the menstruant (haddavah beniddatah — 'the one who is ill/menstruating in her niddah,' vv 19-24) and the zavah (female with abnormal discharge, vv 25-30). The final category — the man who lies with an unclean woman (ish asher yishkav im teme'ah, v 24) — completes the system. The chapter addresses every form of genital discharge for both sexes, creating a comprehensive framework that covers the full range of human reproductive biology within the purity system. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the chapter definitively.

Summary: God prescribes the Day of Atonement (Yom Kippur), the annual ritual in which the high priest enters the Most Holy Place to purify the sanctuary and remove Israel's sins. Aaron offers a bull for his own sin, then two goats for the people -- one slaughtered with blood sprinkled on the atonement cover, the other sent alive into the wilderness bearing Israel's sins.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the theological center of Leviticus. The chapter exists because of Nadab and Abihu's death (v1) -- unauthorized access killed them; Yom Kippur establishes authorized access. The dual-goat ritual is unique: one dies (blood covers sin) and one lives (carrying sin away). Together they accomplish what neither could alone -- complete removal. The high priest strips to plain linen, entering God's presence in humility, not splendor.

Translation Friction: We rendered kapporet as "atonement cover" rather than "mercy seat" (KJV) because the Hebrew root k-p-r ("to cover, to atone") is the chapter's governing concept. Azazel remains one of the most debated terms in Leviticus -- a proper name? a place? "the goat that goes away"? -- and we transliterated it without forcing a single interpretation. The phrase lo yavo vekhol-et ("not at just any time," v2) required precision: access is restricted, not forbidden.

Connections: Hebrews 9:7-12 reads Yom Kippur as fulfilled in Christ's entry into the heavenly sanctuary. The scapegoat anticipates John the Baptist's declaration (John 1:29). The incense cloud protecting the priest (v13) echoes the cloud on Sinai (Exod 19:9). The "tenth day of the seventh month" (v29) remains the holiest day in the Jewish calendar.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses after the death of the two sons of Aaron, when they drew near before the LORD and died. ²The LORD said to Moses, "Tell Aaron your brother that he shall not come at just any time into the Holy Place inside the veil, before the atonement cover that is on the ark, so that he does not die, for I will appear in the cloud above the atonement cover. ³Aaron shall enter the Holy Place with this: a young bull for a sin offering and a ram for a burnt offering. ⁴He shall put on the holy linen tunic, and the linen undergarments shall be on his body. He shall tie the linen sash around his waist and wear the linen turban. These are holy garments. He shall bathe his body in water and then put them on. ⁵From the congregation of the sons of Israel he shall take two male goats for a sin offering and one ram for a burnt offering. ⁶Aaron shall offer the bull as a sin offering for himself and make atonement for himself and for his household. ⁷Then he shall take the two goats and set them before the LORD at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ⁸Aaron shall cast lots over the two goats — one lot for the LORD and the other lot for Azazel. ⁹Aaron shall present the goat on which the lot for the LORD fell and make it a sin offering. ¹⁰But the goat on which the lot for Azazel fell shall be presented alive before the LORD to make atonement over it, to send it away to Azazel into the wilderness. ¹¹"Aaron shall present the bull as a sin offering for himself and shall make atonement for himself and for his household. He shall slaughter the bull as a sin offering for himself. ¹²He shall take a censer full of coals of fire from the altar before the LORD and two handfuls of finely ground fragrant incense, and bring it inside the veil. ¹³He shall put the incense on the fire before the LORD, so that the cloud of incense covers the atonement cover that is over the Testimony, and he shall not die. ¹⁴He shall take some of the blood of the bull and sprinkle it with his finger on the front of the atonement cover on the east side, and before the atonement cover he shall sprinkle some of the blood with his finger seven times. ¹⁵"Then he shall slaughter the goat of the sin offering that is for the people and bring its blood inside the veil and do with its blood as he did with the blood of the bull, sprinkling it on the atonement cover and before the atonement cover. ¹⁶So he shall make atonement for the Holy Place because of the uncleannesses of the sons of Israel and because of their transgressions, all their sins. And so he shall do for the tent of meeting, which dwells with them in the midst of their uncleannesses. ¹⁷No one shall be in the tent of meeting from the time he enters to make atonement in the Holy Place until he comes out and has made atonement for himself and for his household and for the whole assembly of Israel. ¹⁸Then he shall go out to the altar that is before the LORD and make atonement for it. He shall take some of the blood of the bull and some of the blood of the goat and put it on the horns of the altar all around. ¹⁹He shall sprinkle some of the blood on it with his finger seven times and cleanse it and consecrate it from the uncleannesses of the sons of Israel. ²⁰"When he has finished atoning for the Holy Place and the tent of meeting and the altar, he shall present the live goat. ²¹Aaron shall lay both his hands on the head of the live goat and confess over it all the iniquities of the sons of Israel and all their transgressions, all their sins. He shall put them on the head of the goat and send it away into the wilderness by the hand of a man appointed for the task. ²²The goat shall bear on itself all their iniquities to a remote land, and he shall release the goat in the wilderness. ²³"Then Aaron shall enter the tent of meeting and take off the linen garments that he put on when he went into the Holy Place, and he shall leave them there. ²⁴He shall bathe his body in water in a holy place and put on his regular garments. Then he shall go out and offer his burnt offering and the burnt offering of the people and make atonement for himself and for the people. ²⁵The fat of the sin offering he shall burn on the altar. ²⁶The one who released the goat to Azazel shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water, and after that he may come into the camp. ²⁷The bull of the sin offering and the goat of the sin offering, whose blood was brought in to make atonement in the Holy Place, shall be carried outside the camp, and their skin, their flesh, and their dung shall be burned with fire. ²⁸The one who burns them shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water, and after that he may come into the camp. ²⁹"This shall be an eternal statute for you: In the seventh month, on the tenth day of the month, you shall deny yourselves and shall do no work, neither the native nor the sojourner who lives among you. ³⁰For on this day atonement shall be made for you to cleanse you. From all your sins you shall be clean before the LORD. ³¹It is a Sabbath of solemn rest to you, and you shall deny yourselves. It is an eternal statute. ³²The priest who is anointed and ordained to serve as priest in his father's place shall make the atonement. He shall put on the holy linen garments. ³³He shall make atonement for the Most Holy Place, and he shall make atonement for the tent of meeting and for the altar. He shall make atonement for the priests and for all the people of the assembly. ³⁴This shall be an eternal statute for you, to make atonement for the sons of Israel for all their sins once a year." And Aaron did as the LORD commanded Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with the death of Nadab and Abihu (ch10) as its immediate context. Unauthorized approach to God killed Aaron's sons; chapter 16 establishes the authorized approach. The Day of Atonement exists because casual access to the Most Holy Place is lethal.
2. 'Not at just any time' (al yavo vekhol-et) — access to God's innermost presence is restricted to one day per year, by one person, with specific preparation. The cloud above the kapporet is God's visible presence (the Shekhinah); entering without authorization means entering God's lethal holiness without protection.
3. The required offerings: a bull (for Aaron's own sin) and a ram (for burnt offering). The high priest must atone for himself before he can atone for the people. The mediator is not exempt from the system he administers.
4. White linen garments replace the ornate priestly vestments (ch28). On Yom Kippur, the high priest strips down to the simplest garments — no gold, no gems, no blue-purple-scarlet. He enters God's presence not in glory but in humility. The linen represents purity and simplicity; the absence of gold represents the absence of human splendor before divine holiness.
5. Two goats for one sin offering — the dual-goat ritual is unique to Yom Kippur. One goat will be sacrificed (v15); the other will be sent away alive (v21-22). Together they represent the complete removal of sin: blood covers it, and the scapegoat carries it away.
6. Aaron atones for himself first. The sequence is non-negotiable: personal purification precedes communal intercession. A priest who has not dealt with his own sin cannot deal with the people's sin.
7. Both goats are presented together at the tent entrance — their fates will be determined by lot, not by Aaron's choice. The randomness of the lot underscores divine sovereignty in the assignment of roles.
8. 'One lot for the LORD and the other lot for Azazel' (goral echad laYHWH vegoral echad la'Aza'zel) — the identity of Azazel is one of the most debated questions in Leviticus. Proposals include: (1) a proper name for a desert demon or fallen angel; (2) a Hebrew compound meaning 'the goat that goes away' (ez + azal); (3) a place name for a desolate cliff. The text does not define the term; it simply assigns one goat to the LORD and one to Azazel.
9. The LORD's goat becomes a sin offering — its blood will be brought inside the veil and sprinkled on the kapporet. This is the only day of the year when blood enters the Most Holy Place.
10. The Azazel goat is presented alive — it will not be killed but sent into the wilderness bearing Israel's sins (v21-22). The live presentation before the LORD consecrates it for its role as sin-bearer.
11. The bull is slaughtered — Aaron's personal sin offering. The high priest's blood-guilt must be addressed before the people's can be.
12. The censer of coals and incense creates a protective cloud inside the veil. The incense smoke screens the kapporet from direct view — shielding the high priest from the lethal intensity of God's presence. Without the incense cloud, the encounter would be fatal.
13. 'So that he shall not die' (velo yamut) — the incense cloud is literally life-preserving. The smoke mediates between the priest's mortality and God's holiness. Even the authorized high priest, on the authorized day, with the authorized ritual, needs a protective barrier.
14. Blood sprinkled on the kapporet — the atonement cover receives the blood that covers sin. Seven sprinklings (the number of completeness) indicate thorough, total atonement. The blood goes on the kapporet itself and before it on the ground. The place where God's presence dwells is purified by blood.
15. The people's goat is now slaughtered and its blood brought inside the veil — the same procedure as with the bull's blood. The people's sins are covered at the same location where the priest's sins were covered: the kapporet.
16. The purpose is stated explicitly: atonement for the Holy Place itself, because God's sanctuary has been contaminated by Israel's 'uncleannesses, transgressions, and sins' (tum'ot, pesha'im, chatta'ot). The tabernacle absorbs Israel's impurity like a sponge; Yom Kippur wrings it clean. The tent 'dwells with them in the midst of their uncleannesses' (hashokhein ittam betokh tum'otam) — the Shekhinah endures impurity, but not indefinitely. Annual cleansing is required.

17. 'No one shall be in the tent' — the encounter between the high priest and God at the kapporet is absolutely solitary. No assistant, no witness, no companion. The most sacred moment in Israel's worship occurs with one man alone before God.
18. The outer altar (bronze altar) is also purified — blood from both bull and goat is applied to its horns. Every zone of sacred space, from the innermost (kapporet) to the outermost (altar), is cleansed.
19. Seven sprinklings again — the altar is cleansed and re-consecrated. The verb taher ('cleanse') and qiddesh ('consecrate') work together: impurity is removed and holiness is restored.
20. The live goat ceremony begins. The spatial movement is outward: from the Most Holy Place (v14), through the Holy Place (v16), to the altar (v18), and now outside the sanctuary entirely (v21-22).
21. Aaron lays both hands on the live goat's head and confesses all Israel's sins over it. The hand-laying transfers guilt from the community to the animal. The three sin-words from Exodus 34:7 recur: avonot (iniquities), pesha'im (transgressions), chatta'ot (sins). Every category of wrongdoing is loaded onto this goat.
22. 'The goat shall bear on itself all their iniquities to a remote land' (venasa hassa'ir alav et-kol-avonotam el-erets gezerah) — the scapegoat carries sin away physically. The word gezerah means 'cut off, remote, isolated.' Sin is removed to a place from which it cannot return. The dual goat ritual accomplishes two things: the first goat's blood covers sin before God (propitiation); the second goat carries sin away from the people (expiation). Both are needed for complete atonement.
23. Aaron removes the linen garments inside the tent — they remain there, contaminated by proximity to sin and holiness simultaneously. He does not wear them out; they stay in the sacred space.
24. Aaron bathes and puts on his regular (ornate) priestly garments. The transition from linen to full vestments marks the shift from the solitary atonement encounter back to regular priestly service. He then offers burnt offerings for himself and the people — the final act of the day.
25. The fat of the sin offering is burned on the altar — the standard procedure for all sin offerings (4:8-10). The fat belongs to God.
26. The man who released the Azazel goat must wash before re-entering the camp — contact with the sin-laden goat creates ritual impurity that must be cleansed.
27. The carcasses of the bull and goat sin offerings are burned outside the camp — the same rule as the priestly consecration (Exodus 29:14). What absorbed sin is expelled from sacred space. Hebrews 13:11-12 connects this to Jesus suffering 'outside the gate.'
28. The one who burns the carcasses also washes — every person who handles the sin-contaminated materials must be purified before returning to the community.
29. 'You shall deny yourselves' (te'annu et-nafshoteikhem) — the verb innah ('afflict, deny, humble') combined with nephesh ('soul, self, life') describes fasting and self-deprivation. Yom Kippur is the only mandated fast day in the Torah. The affliction is both physical (fasting) and spiritual (humility before God). 'Neither the native nor the sojourner' — the Day of Atonement includes everyone in the community.
30. 'From all your sins you shall be clean before the LORD' (mikol chatto'teikhem lifnei YHWH titharu) — the promise of the Day of Atonement. The word taher ('clean, pure') describes the outcome: complete purification before God. This is not psychological relief but objective, ritual cleansing — the status of the worshiper is changed by the ceremony.
31. 'A Sabbath of solemn rest' (shabbat shabbaton) — the doubled form intensifies: this is the sabbath of sabbaths, the most restful rest. All work ceases absolutely.
32. The provision for succession: the anointed priest (the mashiach) who succeeds his father performs the Yom Kippur service. The ritual passes from generation to generation through the priestly line.
33. The scope of atonement is comprehensive: Most Holy Place, tent of meeting, altar, priests, and people. Every dimension of Israel's relationship with God — space, structure, mediators, and community — is cleansed annually.
34. 'Once a year' (achat bashanah) — the annual rhythm. Yom Kippur cannot be performed more frequently or less. The timing is fixed by divine decree. 'Aaron did as the LORD commanded Moses' — the chapter closes with the obedience formula, confirming that the first Day of Atonement was performed exactly as prescribed.

Summary: God centralizes all sacrifice at the tent of meeting, prohibiting private slaughter of sacrificial animals. The chapter then delivers the foundational statement of blood theology: "the life of the flesh is in the blood," explaining why blood must never be eaten and why it makes atonement. Even hunted game requires blood to be drained and covered with earth.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 11 is the single sentence that explains why the entire sacrificial system works: blood atones because it carries life, and life given substitutes for life owed. The prohibition of se'irim ("goat-demon") sacrifice (v7) reveals that Israel was tempted to divide its worship between the LORD and desert spirits. Unauthorized slaughter is equated with murder (v4) -- the blood of any animal belongs to God.

Translation Friction: The phrase ki nefesh habbasar baddam hi ("the life of the flesh is in the blood") is both a biological observation and a theological claim, and we rendered it to carry both registers. The se'irim ("goat-demons," literally "hairy ones," v7) required a rendering that conveyed the demonic association without importing medieval demonology. The verb shafakh ("shed," v4) is the same verb used for murder in Gen 9:6, and we preserved that verbal connection.

Connections: The blood prohibition extends Noah's covenant (Gen 9:4) into the Sinai covenant. The "life is in the blood" principle undergirds every sacrifice from ch 1 onward and is cited in Heb 9:22 ("without the shedding of blood there is no forgiveness"). The centralization requirement anticipates Deuteronomy 12:5-14. Acts 15:20 carries the blood prohibition into the apostolic church.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Speak to Aaron and to his sons and to all the sons of Israel and say to them: This is what the LORD has commanded. ³Any man of the house of Israel who slaughters an ox or a lamb or a goat in the camp, or who slaughters it outside the camp, ⁴and does not bring it to the entrance of the tent of meeting to present it as an offering to the LORD before the tabernacle of the LORD — that man shall be held guilty of bloodshed. He has shed blood, and that man shall be cut off from among his people. ⁵This is so that the sons of Israel may bring their sacrifices that they have been sacrificing in the open field and bring them to the LORD, to the priest, at the entrance of the tent of meeting, and sacrifice them as peace offerings to the LORD. ⁶The priest shall throw the blood against the altar of the LORD at the entrance of the tent of meeting and burn the fat as a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ⁷They shall no longer sacrifice their sacrifices to the goat-demons after which they have prostituted themselves. This shall be an eternal statute for them throughout their generations. ⁸"Say to them: Any man of the house of Israel or any sojourner who lives among them who offers a burnt offering or sacrifice ⁹and does not bring it to the entrance of the tent of meeting to offer it to the LORD — that man shall be cut off from his people. ¹⁰"Any man of the house of Israel or any sojourner who lives among them who eats any blood — I will set My face against that person who eats blood and will cut him off from among his people. ¹¹For the life of the flesh is in the blood, and I have given it to you on the altar to make atonement for your lives, for it is the blood that makes atonement by means of the life. ¹²Therefore I have said to the sons of Israel: No person among you shall eat blood, nor shall any sojourner who lives among you eat blood. ¹³Any man of the sons of Israel or any sojourner who lives among them who hunts and catches an animal or bird that may be eaten shall pour out its blood and cover it with earth. ¹⁴For the life of every creature — its blood is its life. Therefore I have said to the sons of Israel: You shall not eat the blood of any creature, for the life of every creature is its blood. Whoever eats it shall be cut off. ¹⁵Every person who eats what has died naturally or what has been torn by beasts, whether native or sojourner, shall wash his clothes and bathe in water and be unclean until evening; then he shall be clean. ¹⁶But if he does not wash or bathe his body, he shall bear his iniquity."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Chapter 17 addresses the centralization of sacrifice and the absolute prohibition of blood consumption — two principles that govern all Israelite worship and diet.

2. The address includes Aaron, his sons, and all Israel — both priests and people are bound by these regulations. The scope is universal within the covenant community.
3. The prohibition covers all slaughter of sacrificial animals (ox, lamb, goat) — whether inside or outside the camp. Private, unauthorized slaughter is treated as a serious offense.
4. 'That man shall be held guilty of bloodshed' (dam yechashev la'ish hahu, dam shafakh) — unauthorized slaughter is equated with murder. The blood of the animal belongs to God; spilling it without proper ritual is shedding blood that should have been offered. The penalty is karet — being cut off from the community.
5. The purpose clause: centralized sacrifice replaces 'open field' sacrifice. The phrase 'sacrificing in the open field' (al-penei hassadeh) suggests unregulated, possibly syncretistic worship practices that must be brought under tabernacle control.
6. The priest's role is specified: blood thrown against the altar, fat burned. The priestly mediation ensures that every sacrifice follows the proper protocol. No private worship bypasses the ordained system.
7. 'Goat-demons' (se'irim) — literally 'hairy ones.' These may be desert spirits or demonic entities associated with goat-like forms. The sacrifice to se'irim is described as 'prostitution' (zanim achareihem) — the same adultery metaphor used for idolatry throughout the Torah. Israel must not divide its worship between YHWH and wilderness spirits.
8. The regulation extends to sojourners (gerim) — non-Israelites living within the community are bound by the same sacrificial laws. The covenant community's worship standards apply to all who dwell within it.
9. The penalty for unauthorized sacrifice is the same for sojourner and native: karet. The legal equality established in Exodus 12:49 ('one law for the native and the sojourner') governs sacrificial practice.
10. 'I will set My face against that person' (venatatti panai banefesh ha'okhelet et-haddam) — God Himself acts as judge against blood-eaters. The phrase 'set My face against' (natan panim be-) is the most severe form of divine opposition in Leviticus. Blood consumption is not merely a dietary preference but a direct offense against God.
11. 'The life of the flesh is in the blood' (ki nefesh habbasar baddam hi) — the foundational statement of blood theology in the Hebrew Bible. Nefesh ('life, soul, being') resides in the dam ('blood'). Blood is not merely a bodily fluid; it is the carrier of life itself. 'I have given it to you on the altar to make atonement for your lives' (va'ani netattiv lakhem al-hammizbeach lekapper al-nafshoteikhem) — God assigned blood its atoning function. Blood atones because it carries life, and life given substitutes for life owed. 'It is the blood that makes atonement by means of the life' (ki-haddam hu banefesh yekapper) — the mechanism of atonement is stated: blood atones because of the life (nefesh) it contains.
12. The prohibition is restated: no Israelite, no sojourner, may eat blood. The repetition (vv10, 12, 14) emphasizes the absolute nature of the prohibition.
13. Hunted game must also have its blood drained and covered with earth. Even non-sacrificial slaughter requires respect for the blood. The blood returns to the earth — to the adamah from which life was formed (Genesis 2:7).
14. 'The life of every creature — its blood is its life' (nefesh kol-basar damo venafsh hu) — the equation blood = life is restated in its most compressed form. The word nefesh appears three times in this verse. Blood, life, and being are inseparable in Hebrew thought.
15. Animals that died naturally (nevelah) or were killed by predators (terefah) may not be eaten because their blood was not properly drained. The impurity from eating such meat is manageable (wash, bathe, wait until evening) but real.
16. Failure to purify after eating improperly slaughtered meat results in bearing one's iniquity (nasa avono). The guilt is not removed; it accumulates on the person. Personal responsibility for ritual purity is non-delegable.

Summary: God opens the Holiness Code by defining Israel's sexual boundaries. After declaring that Israel must follow neither Egyptian nor Canaanite customs, a series of prohibited sexual relationships is listed, including incest, adultery, child sacrifice to Molech, and male homosexual intercourse. The land itself will "vomit out" its inhabitants for these violations.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter's framing is distinctive: Israel's sexual ethics are defined not by abstraction but by contrast with Egypt (where they were) and Canaan (where they are going). The land is personified as a moral agent that rejects contamination -- it "vomited out" the previous inhabitants (v28) and will do the same to Israel. The phrase vachai bahem ("he shall live by them," v5) becomes one of the most quoted verses in both Jewish and Christian theology.

Translation Friction: The repeated phrase galah ervah ("uncover nakedness") is a Hebrew euphemism for sexual intercourse that we rendered as "uncover the nakedness of" to preserve the Hebrew idiom's indirectness while remaining clear. The formula ani YHWH ("I am the LORD") punctuates the chapter, grounding each prohibition in divine identity rather than social convention. Vachai bahem (v5) can mean "live because of them" or "live through them" -- we chose "live by them" to hold both possibilities.

Connections: Paul cites v5 in Rom 10:5 and Gal 3:12. The land-vomiting metaphor (v28) reappears in Lev 20:22. The Molech prohibition (v21) connects to the penalty code in ch 20. Jesus grounds His teaching on marriage in the creation order that these prohibitions protect (Matt 19:4-6).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²Speak to the children of Israel and tell them: I am the LORD your God. ³You shall not follow the practices of the land of Egypt, where you lived, and you shall not follow the practices of the land of Canaan, where I am bringing you. You shall not walk according to their customs. ⁴You shall carry out My ordinances and observe My statutes, walking in them. I am the LORD your God. ⁵You shall keep My statutes and My ordinances; the person who does them shall live by them. I am the LORD. ⁶No person among you shall approach any close relative to uncover nakedness. I am the LORD. ⁷You shall not uncover the nakedness of your father or the nakedness of your mother. She is your mother — you shall not uncover her nakedness. ⁸You shall not uncover the nakedness of your father's wife. It is your father's nakedness. ⁹You shall not uncover the nakedness of your sister — whether she is your father's daughter or your mother's daughter, whether born within the household or born elsewhere. ¹⁰You shall not uncover the nakedness of your son's daughter or your daughter's daughter, for their nakedness is your own. ¹¹You shall not uncover the nakedness of the daughter of your father's wife who was fathered by your father — she is your sister. ¹²You shall not uncover the nakedness of your father's sister. She is your father's close relative. ¹³You shall not uncover the nakedness of your mother's sister, for she is your mother's close relative. ¹⁴You shall not uncover the nakedness of your father's brother; you shall not approach his wife. She is your aunt. ¹⁵You shall not uncover the nakedness of your daughter-in-law. She is your son's wife — you shall not uncover her nakedness. ¹⁶You shall not uncover the nakedness of your brother's wife. It is your brother's nakedness. ¹⁷You shall not uncover the nakedness of a woman and her daughter. You shall not take her son's daughter or her daughter's daughter to uncover her nakedness. They are close relatives — it is depravity. ¹⁸You shall not take a woman as a rival wife alongside her sister, to uncover her nakedness while the sister is still alive. ¹⁹You shall not approach a woman to uncover her nakedness during her menstrual impurity. ²⁰You shall not have sexual relations with your neighbor's wife, defiling yourself with her. ²¹You shall not give any of your children to be passed through the fire to Molech. You shall not profane the name of your God. I am the LORD. ²²You shall not lie with a male as one lies with a woman. It is a detestable act. ²³You shall not have sexual relations with any animal, defiling yourself with it. A woman shall not present herself to an animal to mate with it. It is a perversion. ²⁴Do not defile yourselves by any of these acts, for by all of these the nations that I am driving out before you became defiled. ²⁵The land became defiled, and I held it accountable for its iniquity, and the land vomited out its inhabitants. ²⁶You must keep My statutes and My ordinances and not commit any of these detestable acts — neither the native-born citizen nor the foreigner who lives among you. ²⁷For the people of the land who were before you committed all these detestable acts, and the land became defiled. ²⁸Do not let the land vomit you out for defiling it, as it vomited out the nation that was before you. ²⁹For anyone who commits any of these detestable acts — the persons who do them shall be cut off from among their people. ³⁰You shall keep My charge by not following any of the detestable customs that were practiced before you, so that you do not defile yourselves by them. I am the LORD your God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Leviticus 18 begins the Holiness Code (chapters 18-26), a distinct legal collection within Leviticus characterized by the refrain 'I am the LORD' (ani YHWH). The chapter addresses prohibited sexual relationships, framed not as arbitrary taboos but as the boundary that distinguishes Israel from Egypt and Canaan.
2. The declaration ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God') opens the chapter with divine self-identification — the same formula that opens the Ten Commandments (Exodus 20:2). The laws that follow derive their authority from this identity claim: they are binding because of who is speaking, not merely because of what is being said.

3. Israel is defined by what it does not do: kema'aseh erets Mitsrayim ('like the practices of Egypt') and kema'aseh erets Kena'an ('like the practices of Canaan') are explicitly rejected. The two nations that frame Israel's experience — the one they left and the one they will enter — serve as negative models. The phrase uvechuqqoteihem lo telekhu ('you shall not walk in their statutes') prohibits not just specific acts but the adoption of foreign cultural norms.
4. The positive counterpart to verse 3: instead of foreign customs, Israel is to follow God's mishpatim ('ordinances, judgments') and chuqqot ('statutes'). The metaphor of walking (lalekhet bahem — 'to walk in them') describes a way of life, not merely a set of rules. The self-identification formula ani YHWH Eloheikhem closes the verse, framing the laws as personal address from God.
5. The phrase asher ya'aseh otam ha'adam vachai bahem ('which if a person does them, he shall live by them') is one of the most quoted verses in both Jewish and Christian theology. Paul cites it in Romans 10:5 and Galatians 3:12 to discuss the relationship between law and faith. The Hebrew vachai bahem ('he shall live by them') can mean either 'he shall live because of them' (obedience produces life) or 'he shall live through them' (the commandments are the medium of life). The section marker (samekh) closes the introduction.
6. The general principle governing verses 6-18: ish ish el kol she'er besaro lo tiqrevu legalot ervah ('no one shall approach any close flesh-relative to uncover nakedness'). The idiom galot ervah ('to uncover nakedness') is the Hebrew euphemism for sexual relations. She'er basar ('close flesh,' 'near kin') defines the prohibited sphere as blood relatives and their spouses. The self-identification ani YHWH anchors the prohibition in divine authority.
7. The series of prohibited relationships begins with the most fundamental: parents. The phrase ervat avikha ('your father's nakedness') in this context likely means sexual relations with the father's wife (as verse 8 makes explicit), while ervat immekha ('your mother's nakedness') prohibits relations with one's biological mother. The emphatic immekha hi ('she is your mother') states the reason as self-evident — the kinship relationship itself is the basis for the prohibition.
8. This clarifies verse 7: the father's nakedness (ervat avikha) is represented by his wife. Sexual relations with a father's wife (whether one's biological mother or a stepmother) violate the father's sexual domain. The phrase ervat avikha hi ('it is your father's nakedness') means the wife's sexual honor belongs to the husband — violating her violates him.
9. The prohibition covers all sisters: paternal half-sisters (bat avikha), maternal half-sisters (bat immekha), those born within the marriage (moledet bayit — 'born in the house'), and those born to other relationships (moledet chutz — 'born outside'). The comprehensive scope closes every possible loophole — any female sibling, regardless of the circumstances of her birth.
10. Granddaughters (through either son or daughter) are protected. The phrase ki ervatekha hennah ('for their nakedness is your own') means that violating a granddaughter is a violation of oneself — the kinship bond is so close that her sexual dignity is an extension of the grandfather's own.
11. This specifies a half-sister born to a stepmother (bat eshet avikha) but fathered by the same father (moledet avikha). She is explicitly identified as achotekha hi ('she is your sister') despite the different mother. The verse closes a potential loophole: the child of a stepmother might not be recognized as a 'real' sister, but the law declares her one.
12. The paternal aunt (achot avikha) is protected as she'er avikha ('your father's flesh/close relative'). The she'er ('flesh, kinship, close relation') concept means the aunt shares the same family flesh as the father — violating her violates the father's kinship network.
13. The maternal aunt receives the same protection as the paternal aunt (v 12), with the same kinship reasoning: she'er immekha hi ('she is your mother's close relative'). The parallelism ensures that both sides of the family are equally protected.
14. The uncle's wife (dodatekha — 'your aunt') is prohibited. The construction is notable: first the uncle himself is named (achi avikha — 'your father's brother'), then his wife is specified as the one not to be approached (el ishto lo tiqrav — 'you shall not approach his wife'). Approaching the uncle's nakedness means approaching his wife — the same principle as verse 8.
15. The daughter-in-law (kallatekha) is protected by her marriage to the man's son. The identification eshet binkha hi ('she is your son's wife') makes the kinship basis explicit: the marriage bond creates the same protective boundary as blood kinship.
16. The sister-in-law is protected by the same principle as verse 8: the wife's nakedness is her husband's nakedness (ervat achikha hi — 'it is your brother's nakedness'). The levirate marriage exception (Deuteronomy 25:5-10), which requires a surviving brother to marry his deceased brother's childless widow, is not addressed here — it operates under different conditions and serves a different purpose.
17. This prohibition covers multiple generations: a man may not have sexual relations with both a woman and her daughter, or with her granddaughters through either son or daughter. The term zimmah ('depravity, wickedness, scheme') is among the strongest condemnatory words in Hebrew — it describes calculated, deliberate moral corruption. The family members are identified as sha'arah ('her close relatives'), extending the kinship protection to the woman's entire female line.
18. The prohibition against marrying two sisters simultaneously (ishah el achotah) is explicitly motivated by the harm it would cause: litsror ('to vex, to make a rival') — the word tsarah means 'rival wife,' and the verb describes the jealousy and conflict such an arrangement produces. The qualification bechayeiha ('during her lifetime') implies that after one sister's death, marriage to the surviving sister may be permitted. Jacob's marriages to Rachel and Leah (Genesis 29) illustrate the very rivalry this law aims to prevent.
19. This prohibition connects the purity system of chapter 15 (where menstrual contact produces impurity, 15:24) to the moral-legal framework of chapter 18 (where it becomes a prohibited act). The phrase beniddat tum'atah ('during the impurity of her menstrual separation') uses both niddah and tum'ah together, linking the purity category to the ethical prohibition. What chapter 15 treated as a source of ritual impurity, chapter 18 treats as a boundary violation.

- 20. Adultery (lo titten shekhavtekha lezara — literally 'you shall not give your emission of seed') with a neighbor's wife (eshet amitekha — 'the wife of your fellow') is prohibited as an act that defiles (letom'ah bah — 'to become impure through her'). The language of defilement connects adultery to the purity system — it is not merely a social wrong but a source of contamination.
- 21. The prohibition of Molech worship (leha'avir lamolekh — 'to pass over/through to Molech') is placed among sexual prohibitions because it involves the offering of children — the fruit of sexual union. The word mizarakha ('from your seed/offspring') connects this verse to the reproductive context of the chapter. The phrase lo techalel et shem Elohekha ('you shall not profane the name of your God') elevates the offense: child sacrifice is not merely a crime against the child but a desecration of God's name.
- 22. The Hebrew ve'et zakhar lo tishkav mishkevei ishah ('you shall not lie with a male the lyings of a woman') prohibits male-male sexual intercourse. The plural mishkevei ('lyings') is a term for sexual intercourse. The word to'evah ('detestable act, abomination') is a strong term of condemnation used in Leviticus for various prohibited acts and in Deuteronomy and the prophets for idolatry and related practices. The rendering preserves what the text says without adding interpretive commentary in either direction.
- 23. Bestiality is prohibited for both men (lo titten shekhavtekha — 'you shall not give your emission') and women (ishah lo ta'amod lifnei behemah leriv'ah — 'a woman shall not stand before an animal for mating'). The word tevel ('perversion, confusion, mixing') describes the violation of the created order — the crossing of a boundary between species that was established at creation. Both sexes are explicitly addressed, ensuring comprehensive prohibition.
- 24. The theological framework shifts: the prohibitions are not arbitrary cultural markers but the very practices by which the Canaanite nations defiled themselves (bekhol eleh nitme'u haggoyim — 'by all of these the nations became defiled'). The verb meshalleach ('driving out, sending away') describes God's active removal of the nations — their expulsion is a consequence of their defilement, and Israel is warned not to replicate the same pattern.
- 25. The most striking image in the chapter: the land itself (ha'arets) is personified as a being that becomes defiled (vatitma), has iniquity visited upon it (va'efqod avonah aleiha — 'I visited/punished its iniquity upon it'), and physically reacts: vataqi ha'arets et yoshveiha ('the land vomited out its inhabitants'). The land is not a passive stage but an active participant in the covenant — it responds to moral contamination with revulsion. The vomiting metaphor is visceral and deliberate: the land cannot stomach its inhabitants' behavior and expels them.
- 26. The prohibition applies equally to ha'eizrach ('the native-born citizen') and hagher haggar betokhekem ('the foreigner who resides among you'). Sexual boundaries are not for Israelites only — resident foreigners are bound by the same standards. This universality is grounded in the land theology: the land's capacity to be defiled and to vomit out its inhabitants is not conditioned on the inhabitants' ethnic identity.
- 27. The parenthetical explanation reinforces the historical precedent: anshei ha'arets asher lifneikhem ('the people of the land who were before you') — the Canaanite nations — practiced these acts, and the land became defiled as a result. The cause-and-effect chain is clear: prohibited acts land defilement expulsion. Israel is warned that the same chain will apply to them.
- 28. The warning is direct: the same land that expelled the Canaanites will expel Israel (velo taqi ha'arets etkhem — 'lest the land vomit you out'). The land does not distinguish between Canaanite and Israelite — it responds to defilement regardless of the defiler's identity. The phrase ka'asher qa'ah et haggoy asher lifneikhem ('as it vomited out the nation before you') makes the precedent explicit. Israel enjoys no ethnic immunity from the land's response to contamination.
- 29. The penalty is karet (venikh'retu hannefashot — 'the persons shall be cut off') — exclusion from the covenant community. The verb nikhretu ('shall be cut off') may describe execution, divine punishment, or excommunication — its exact implementation is debated in rabbinic literature. The plural 'persons' (nefashot) indicates that all parties involved are subject to the penalty, not just one.
- 30. The chapter closes as it opened: ushmartem et mishmarti ('you shall keep My charge') — the same root sh-m-r ('guard, keep') used throughout the Holiness Code. The prohibited acts are called chuqqot hatto'evot ('customs/statutes of the detestable acts') — institutionalized practices, not isolated incidents. The final declaration ani YHWH Elohekhem ('I am the LORD your God') forms an inclusio with verse 2, framing the entire chapter as divine speech from the God who has the authority to define Israel's boundaries. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the chapter.

Summary: The ethical center of the Holiness Code: "Be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy." A rapid-fire sequence of commandments covers parents, Sabbath, idolatry, peace offerings, harvest gleanings for the poor, theft, lying, oppression, justice, neighbor-love, mixed breeding, fruit trees, blood, divination, grooming, prostitution, elders, foreigners, and honest weights.

What Makes This Remarkable: The command ve'ahavta lere'akha kamokha ("love your neighbor as yourself," v18) appears here for the first time in Scripture. The holiness imperative qedoshim tihyu (v2) redefines holiness as identity before behavior -- "be Mine" before "be good." The refrain ani YHWH ("I am the LORD") appears fifteen times, grounding every command in divine identity. Ethics and ritual are interwoven without distinction.

Translation Friction: We rendered qadosh as "holy" while noting in the expanded rendering that the Hebrew primarily means "set apart, belonging to God" rather than "morally pure." The harvest-gleaning command (vv 9-10) uses pe'ah ("corner") and leket ("gleanings") -- technical agricultural terms we clarified for non-agrarian readers. The verb tira ("revere/fear," applied to parents in v3 and elders in v32) needed consistent rendering to show it is the same posture owed to God.

Connections: Jesus identifies v18 as the second greatest commandment (Matt 22:39; Mark 12:31). James 2:8 calls it "the royal law." The gleaning provision is enacted in the Ruth narrative (Ruth 2). The prohibition against oppressing the foreigner (v33-34) echoes Exod 22:21 and Deut 10:19. Paul's "love is the fulfillment of the law" (Rom 13:10) is a direct reading of this chapter.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ²"Speak to the whole congregation of the sons of Israel and say to them: You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy. ³Each of you shall revere his mother and his father, and you shall keep My Sabbaths. I am the LORD your God. ⁴Do not turn to idols or make for yourselves gods of cast metal. I am the LORD your God. ⁵"When you offer a sacrifice of peace offerings to the LORD, you shall offer it so that you may be accepted. ⁶It shall be eaten on the day you offer it or on the next day. What remains until the third day shall be burned with fire. ⁷If it is eaten at all on the third day, it is an offense; it will not be accepted. ⁸Everyone who eats it shall bear his iniquity, because he has profaned what is holy to the LORD. That person shall be cut off from his people. ⁹"When you reap the harvest of your land, you shall not reap your field right up to its edge, nor shall you gather the gleanings after your harvest. ¹⁰You shall not strip your vineyard bare or gather the fallen grapes of your vineyard. You shall leave them for the poor and for the sojourner. I am the LORD your God. ¹¹"You shall not steal. You shall not deal falsely. You shall not lie to one another. ¹²You shall not swear by My name falsely, profaning the name of your God. I am the LORD. ¹³You shall not oppress your neighbor or rob him. The wages of a hired worker shall not remain with you all night until the morning. ¹⁴You shall not curse the deaf or put a stumbling block before the blind, but you shall fear your God. I am the LORD. ¹⁵"You shall do no injustice in judgment. You shall not show partiality to the poor or defer to the great, but in righteousness you shall judge your neighbor. ¹⁶You shall not go about as a slanderer among your people. You shall not stand against the blood of your neighbor. I am the LORD. ¹⁷You shall not hate your brother in your heart. You shall surely rebuke your neighbor and not bear sin because of him. ¹⁸You shall not take vengeance or bear a grudge against the sons of your own people, but you shall love your neighbor as yourself. I am the LORD. ¹⁹"You shall keep My statutes. You shall not breed your livestock with a different kind. You shall not sow your field with two kinds of seed. You shall not put on a garment made of two kinds of material. ²⁰If a man lies sexually with a female slave who is promised to another man but has not been ransomed or given her freedom, a penalty shall be imposed. They shall not be put to death, because she was not free. ²¹He shall bring his guilt offering to the LORD, to the entrance of the tent of meeting — a ram for a guilt offering. ²²The priest shall make atonement for him with the ram of the guilt offering before the LORD for his sin that he has committed, and he shall be forgiven for the sin he has committed. ²³"When you come into the land and plant any kind of tree for food, you shall regard its fruit as forbidden. For three years it shall be forbidden to you; it shall not be eaten. ²⁴In the fourth year all its fruit shall be holy, a praise offering to the LORD. ²⁵In the fifth year you may eat of its fruit, to increase its yield for you. I am the LORD your God. ²⁶"You shall not eat anything with its blood. You shall not practice divination or sorcery. ²⁷You shall not round off the hair on your temples or mar the edges of your beard. ²⁸You shall not make any cuts on your body for the dead or tattoo yourselves. I am the LORD. ²⁹"Do not profane your daughter by making her a prostitute, lest the land fall into prostitution and become full of depravity. ³⁰You must observe My Sabbaths and treat My sanctuary with reverence. I am the LORD. ³¹Do not turn to mediums or necromancers. Do not seek them out, defiling yourselves by them. I am the LORD your God. ³²"You shall rise before the gray-headed and honor the face of an elder, and you shall fear your God. I am the LORD. ³³"When a sojourner lives with you in your land, you shall not mistreat him. ³⁴The sojourner who lives with you shall be treated as a native among you, and you shall love him as yourself, for you were sojourners in the land of Egypt. I am the LORD your God. ³⁵"You shall do no wrong in judgment, in measures of length, weight, or quantity. ³⁶You shall have just balances, just weights, a just ephah, and a just hin. I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt. ³⁷You shall observe all My statutes and all My rules and do them. I am the LORD."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. A new divine speech introduces what scholars call the 'Holiness Code' (chapters 17-26). This chapter is its ethical center.
2. 'You shall be holy, for I the LORD your God am holy' (qedoshim tiyu ki qadosh ani YHWH Eloheikhem) — the foundational command of the Holiness Code. Israel's holiness is derivative: they are holy because God is holy. The imperative is not 'become holy through effort' but 'be holy because I am holy and you belong to Me.' Holiness is relational before it is behavioral — it flows from identity, not achievement.
3. Parents and Sabbath are paired — the two institutions that ground Israelite identity in family and covenant. The order (mother before father) is reversed from Exodus 20:12, possibly to emphasize the mother's role in transmitting holiness within the household. 'I am the LORD your God' (ani YHWH Eloheikhem) punctuates the chapter like a refrain — appearing fifteen times. Every command is grounded in divine identity.
4. Idols (elilim, literally 'nothings, worthless things') and cast-metal gods are prohibited. The word elilim is a contemptuous pun on elohim — the gods of the nations are non-entities.
5. Peace offerings (shelamim, from shalom) are the fellowship sacrifice — the only offering where the worshiper eats a portion. The rules ensure the sacred meal is consumed promptly and reverently.
6. Two-day limit on consumption — the offering must be eaten fresh. Sacred food has a sacred timeframe.
7. Third-day consumption makes the offering piggul ('an offense, something loathsome'). The word piggul describes meat that has become ritually repulsive through improper handling.
8. Eating piggul profanes (chillel) what is holy — transforming sacred food into common waste. The penalty is karet.
9. The harvest gleaning laws: do not reap to the very edge (pe'ah) of the field. Leave the corners and the gleanings for the poor and the sojourner. The agricultural law embeds social justice into the harvest itself — generosity is not optional charity but commanded practice.
10. The vineyard parallel: do not strip it bare, do not collect fallen grapes. The poor and the sojourner have a right to what the landowner leaves behind. This law provides the narrative framework for the book of Ruth, where Ruth gleans in Boaz's field (Ruth 2).
11. Three prohibitions in rapid succession: no stealing (lo tignovu), no dealing falsely (lo tekachshu), no lying (lo teshaqu). The progression moves from action (theft) to character (falsehood) to speech (lying). Honesty is the baseline of covenant community.
12. False oath-taking profanes (chillel) God's name — the same verb used for profaning the peace offering in v8. God's name is sacred; invoking it falsely treats it as common. The third commandment (Exodus 20:7) is restated in the social-ethics context.
13. Oppression and robbery are prohibited alongside wage-theft. 'The wages of a hired worker shall not remain with you all night' (lo-talin pe'ullat sakhir ittekha ad-boqer) — the day laborer depends on daily payment. Withholding overnight wages is not mere inconvenience but survival-threatening injustice. James 5:4 echoes this verse.
14. 'Do not curse the deaf or put a stumbling block before the blind' — protection of the vulnerable from exploitation they cannot detect or avoid. The deaf person cannot hear the curse; the blind person cannot see the obstacle. The prohibition targets those who would take advantage of others' limitations. 'Fear your God' (veyareta me'Elohekha) — the motivation is theological: God sees what the deaf cannot hear and the blind cannot see.
15. Judicial impartiality: no favoritism toward poor (out of sentiment) or rich (out of deference). 'In righteousness you shall judge' (betsedek tishpot) — the word tsedek ('righteousness, justice') governs the courtroom. Justice is not compassion and not power; it is right order.
16. 'Do not stand against the blood of your neighbor' (lo ta'amod al-dam re'ekha) — the meaning is debated: do not stand idly by when your neighbor's life is at risk, or do not testify falsely in a capital case. Both readings emphasize active responsibility for preserving life.
17. 'Do not hate your brother in your heart' (lo tisna et-achikha bilvavekha) — the prohibition targets internal disposition, not just external behavior. Hidden hatred is as forbidden as open violence. 'You shall surely rebuke' (hokheiach tokhiach) — the alternative to silent hatred is honest confrontation. Rebuke is a duty, not an option.
18. 'You shall love your neighbor as yourself' (ve'ahavta lere'akha kamokha) — the most famous commandment in Leviticus, cited by Jesus as the second greatest commandment (Matthew 22:39; Mark 12:31). The verb ahav ('love') is not merely emotional but volitional and active: choosing the good of another as you would choose your own good. The word re'a ('neighbor') in context means a fellow member of the covenant community, though the command is extended to the sojourner in v34. 'I am the LORD' (ani YHWH) — the refrain grounds the command in divine identity: you love because I am who I am.
19. Three 'mixing' prohibitions (kilayim): no crossbreeding livestock, no mixed-seed planting, no mixed-fabric garments. The prohibitions maintain created categories — the order God established at creation (Genesis 1, 'according to their kinds') is preserved in daily life. Holiness includes respecting the distinctions God made.
20. The case law addresses a specific situation: sexual violation of an enslaved woman who is betrothed. The penalty is less than death because the woman's status (not yet free) creates legal complexity. The law recognizes the injustice without applying the full capital penalty designed for free persons.

21. A guilt offering (asham) is required — the ram indicates the seriousness of the offense. The asham addresses violations that involve both sin against God and damage to another person.
22. The priest makes atonement (kipper) and the offender is forgiven (venislach). The kippur-forgiveness sequence is the standard resolution for offenses addressed through sacrifice.
23. Fruit trees are restricted for three years after planting — the fruit is 'forbidden' (areitem, literally 'uncircumcised'). The metaphor of uncircumcision applied to fruit trees links agricultural patience to covenant identity.
24. Fourth-year fruit is 'holy, a praise offering' (qodesh hillulim) — the first usable harvest belongs to God. The pattern mirrors firstfruits theology: the first and best goes to God before the worshiper benefits.
25. Fifth-year consumption is permitted. The three-year wait, fourth-year offering, fifth-year eating create a five-year cycle of patience, dedication, and enjoyment. The promise: 'to increase its yield' — obedient waiting produces greater abundance.
26. Blood prohibition restated (cf. ch17). Divination (nachash) and sorcery (onan) are forbidden — Israel must not seek hidden knowledge through occult means. The source of Israel's knowledge is God's word, not magic.
27. Hair and beard regulations likely prohibit mourning practices associated with pagan cults. The specifics of what is forbidden are debated, but the principle is separation from the worship customs of surrounding peoples.
28. 'Do not make cuts on your body for the dead' — lacerating oneself in mourning was a common ancient Near Eastern practice (cf. 1 Kings 18:28). 'Or tattoo yourselves' (ukethovet qa'aqa lo tittenu bakhem) — the word qa'aqa appears only here in the Hebrew Bible; it likely refers to permanent markings. The prohibition targets cult-related body modification, not necessarily all decorative marking.
29. Forcing a daughter into prostitution profanes both the individual and the land. The verb chanaf ('become defiled/profaned') describes a moral-spiritual contamination that spreads from persons to territory.
30. Sabbath and sanctuary — the time-institution and the space-institution together. Keeping Sabbath sanctifies time; reverencing the sanctuary sanctifies space. Together they structure holy life.
31. Mediums (ovot) and necromancers (yiddonim) are forbidden. Seeking communication with the dead bypasses the legitimate channels of divine revelation (prophets, Torah). The prohibition is repeated in 20:6, 27 with severe penalties.
32. 'Rise before the gray-headed' (mippenei sevhah taqum) — respect for elders is commanded as an expression of fearing God. The connection between honoring the aged and fearing God links social ethics to theology: how you treat the vulnerable reveals your relationship with God.
33. The sojourner (ger) must not be mistreated (lo tonu) — the verb yanah means 'to oppress, to wrong, to exploit.' The prohibition protects the foreigner from both economic exploitation and social marginalization.
34. 'You shall love him as yourself' (ve'ahavta lo kamokha) — the love-your-neighbor command of v18 is now explicitly extended to the sojourner. The ger receives the same love as the re'a. 'For you were sojourners in the land of Egypt' — Israel's own experience of being foreigners is the basis for empathy, exactly as in Exodus 23:9. The exodus creates ethical obligation.
35. Commercial honesty: no fraud in measurements. The prohibition covers all forms of commercial deception — length, weight, and volume. Economic justice is a holiness requirement.
36. 'Just balances, just weights' (moznei tsedek avnei tsedek) — the word tsedek ('just, righteous') governs commerce as it governs the courtroom (v15). Righteousness means honest dealing in every sphere. The exodus grounding appears again: 'I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt.' Liberation creates obligation in every domain of life.
37. The chapter closes with a comprehensive summary: observe all statutes, all rules, do them. The refrain 'I am the LORD' appears one final time. Every command in this chapter — from holiness to gleaning to love of neighbor to honest weights — flows from and returns to divine identity.

Summary: Penalties are prescribed for violations listed in chapter 18: death for Molech worship, mediums, adultery, and certain sexual transgressions; karet (being cut off) for others. The chapter closes with a renewed call to distinguish clean from unclean and to be holy as God is holy.

What Makes This Remarkable: Where chapter 18 states what is forbidden, chapter 20 prescribes the consequences. God declares "I will set My face against" offenders -- a phrase of direct divine opposition. Communal responsibility is emphasized: if the people "close their eyes" to Molech worship (v4), God will act against the entire community. The closing frame returns to the holiness imperative: distinction between clean and unclean is inseparable from Israel's election.

Translation Friction: The Hiphil infinitive absolute ha'lem ya'alimu ("hiding they hide," v4) intensifies deliberate communal complicity, and we rendered it "deliberately close their eyes" to capture the willfulness. The penalty term mot yumat ("he must certainly die") uses emphatic doubling we preserved through "must." The phrase etten et panay ("I will set My face against") recurs as the strongest expression of divine judicial opposition, and we maintained its force consistently.

Connections: The penalties correspond to the prohibitions of ch 18. The holiness-distinction command (v25-26) repeats the priestly mandate of 10:10. The land-vomiting warning (v22) echoes 18:28. The separation from the nations (v24-26) anticipates the exile theology of ch 26.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ²"Say to the Israelites: Any person among the Israelites, or any foreigner residing in Israel, who gives any of his children to Molech must be put to death. The people of the land shall stone him. ³I Myself will set My face against that man and cut him off from among his people, because he gave his children to Molech, defiling My sanctuary and profaning My holy name. ⁴If the people of the land deliberately close their eyes to that man when he gives his children to Molech, refusing to put him to death, ⁵then I Myself will set My face against that man and against his family. I will cut him off — along with all who follow him in prostituting themselves to Molech — from among their people. ⁶As for the person who turns to mediums and spiritists, prostituting himself by following them — I will set My face against that person and cut him off from among his people. ⁷Set yourselves apart and be holy, for I am the LORD your God. ⁸Keep My statutes and carry them out. I am the LORD who sets you apart. ⁹Any person who curses his father or his mother must be put to death. He has cursed his father and his mother — his blood is on him. ¹⁰If a man commits adultery with another man's wife — committing adultery with his neighbor's wife — both the adulterer and the adulteress must be put to death. ¹¹If a man sleeps with his father's wife, he has violated his father's sexual rights. Both of them must be put to death — their blood is on them. ¹²If a man sleeps with his daughter-in-law, both of them must be put to death. They have committed a perversion — their blood is on them. ¹³If a man lies with a male as one lies with a woman, both of them have committed an abhorrent act. They must be put to death — their blood is on them. ¹⁴If a man marries both a woman and her mother, it is depravity. They shall be burned with fire — both he and they — so that there is no depravity among you. ¹⁵If a man has sexual relations with an animal, he must be put to death, and you shall kill the animal. ¹⁶If a woman approaches any animal to mate with it, you shall kill both the woman and the animal. They must be put to death — their blood is on them. ¹⁷If a man takes his sister — whether his father's daughter or his mother's daughter — and they see each other's nakedness, it is a disgrace. They shall be cut off in the sight of their people. He has uncovered his sister's nakedness; he will bear his punishment. ¹⁸If a man sleeps with a woman during her menstrual period and uncovers her nakedness, he has exposed her flow, and she has revealed the source of her blood. Both of them shall be cut off from among their people. ¹⁹You shall not have sexual relations with your mother's sister or your father's sister, for that is exposing one's own close relative. They will bear their guilt. ²⁰If a man sleeps with his uncle's wife, he has violated his uncle's sexual rights. They will bear their sin — they will die childless. ²¹If a man takes his brother's wife, it is an act of impurity. He has uncovered his brother's nakedness — they shall be childless. ²²You shall keep all My statutes and all My ordinances and carry them out, so that the land where I am bringing you to live does not vomit you out. ²³Do not follow the customs of the nation that I am driving out before you, for they practiced all these things and I was disgusted with them. ²⁴I have told you: You will possess their land, and I Myself will give it to you to take possession of — a land flowing with milk and honey. I am the LORD your God, who has set you apart from the peoples. ²⁵You must distinguish between clean animals and unclean, and between unclean birds and clean. Do not make yourselves detestable by any animal, bird, or anything that crawls on the ground — those that I have set apart for you as unclean. ²⁶You shall be holy to Me, for I the LORD am holy, and I have set you apart from the peoples to be Mine. ²⁷A man or a woman who is a medium or a spiritist must be put to death. They shall be stoned — their blood is on them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic speech formula vayedabber YHWH el-Mosheh lemor introduces a new divine address. Chapter 20 functions as the enforcement code for the prohibitions listed in chapter 18 — where chapter 18 stated what was forbidden, chapter 20 prescribes the penalties.

2. The doubled ish ish ('any person whatsoever') is an emphatic Hebrew construction ensuring universal application. The phrase mizaro ('from his seed/offspring') combined with natan laMolekh ('gives to Molech') refers to child sacrifice — the practice of passing children through fire as offerings to the Ammonite deity. Both Israelites and the ger haGar ('the foreigner who resides') are subject to this law, indicating that Molech worship defiles the land itself, not just the individual. The penalty mot yumat ('he must certainly die') uses the Hophal infinitive absolute for emphasis, and am ha'aretz ('people of the land') denotes the community's collective judicial responsibility.
3. The phrase etten et panay ('I will set My face against') signals direct divine opposition — God personally acts as prosecutor. The verb v'hikrati ('I will cut off') refers to karet, divine excision from the covenant community, which may operate beyond human judicial punishment. Two consequences of Molech worship are named: defiling the miqdash ('sanctuary') and profaning the shem qodshi ('My holy name'). Child sacrifice is not merely a social crime but a direct assault on God's holiness and sacred space.
4. The Hiphil infinitive absolute ha'lem ya'alimu ('hiding they hide') intensifies the verb — this is not accidental oversight but deliberate refusal to act. The community bears judicial responsibility; looking away from child sacrifice makes the entire community complicit. The construction l'vilti hamit ('so as not to put to death') frames their inaction as a willful decision to spare the guilty.
5. When the community fails to enforce justice, God Himself intervenes. The penalty expands from the individual to his mishpachto ('his family/clan'), then to kol-hazonim acharav ('all who prostitute themselves after him'). The verb zanah ('to prostitute') is used metaphorically: following Molech is spiritual adultery against YHWH. The phrase liznot acharei haMolekh ('to prostitute after Molech') frames idolatrous worship as covenant betrayal — the same marriage metaphor the prophets will later develop extensively.
6. The ovot ('mediums,' literally 'spirit-bottles' — hollow vessels through which the dead supposedly speak) and yid'onim ('spiritists,' from yada, 'to know' — those who claim hidden knowledge from the spirit world) represent attempts to access supernatural knowledge outside of YHWH. The same prostitution language (liznot achareihem) used for Molech worship is applied here: consulting the dead is spiritual infidelity. The penalty is karet — divine excision from the people.
7. The Hitpa'el v'hitqadishtem ('set yourselves apart') calls for active self-consecration, while vihyitem qedoshim ('and be holy') states the resulting identity. The grounding clause ki ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('for I am the LORD your God') makes holiness derivative — Israel is holy because YHWH is holy and they belong to Him. This verse marks the transition from specific penalties (vv 1-6) to the theological foundation: holiness is the reason behind every prohibition.
8. The verb pair ushmartem... va'asitem ('keep... and do') demands both guarding the commandments and actively performing them. The closing declaration ani YHWH meqadishkhem ('I am the LORD who makes you holy') uses the Piel participle — God is the active agent of Israel's sanctification. Obedience is the human response, but the power to be holy comes from YHWH Himself.
9. The verb yeqallel (Piel of qalal, 'to make light, to curse') means to treat with contempt or to revile — the opposite of the honor (kavod, 'weight, heaviness') commanded in the Decalogue (Exod 20:12). The phrase damav bo ('his blood is on him') is a judicial formula placing responsibility for the death on the offender himself: the community executes justice, but the guilt belongs to the one who violated the command.
10. The verb yin'af ('commits adultery') appears twice for emphasis: first identifying the general act, then specifying it as eshet re'ehu ('his neighbor's wife'). The penalty falls on both parties — hano'ef v'hano'afet ('the adulterer and the adulteress') — indicating shared culpability. Adultery in the ancient Near East was primarily an offense against the husband's household rights, but the Torah's inclusion of the woman's penalty reflects her moral agency.
11. The phrase ervat aviv gillah ('he has uncovered his father's nakedness') means he has violated his father's exclusive sexual domain. In Hebrew legal thought, a man's wife is an extension of his ervah ('nakedness/sexual rights'); to sleep with her is to transgress against the father, not merely against the woman. The plural d'meihem bam ('their blood is on them') holds both parties responsible.
12. The term tevel ('perversion, confusion') occurs only here and in Lev 18:23 (bestiality). It denotes a violation so severe that it confounds the created order — a mixing of categories that God established as distinct. The father-in-law/daughter-in-law relationship carries the same generational boundary as the parent-child relationship; violating it is a fundamental transgression of family structure.
13. The phrase mishk'vei ishah ('as the lyings of a woman') specifies the sexual act itself. The term to'evah ('abhorrent act, abomination') is a strong term of revulsion used in Leviticus for acts that violate the created order and defile the land (see 18:22, 26-27). In the Holiness Code, to'evah marks violations serious enough to cause the land itself to 'vomit out' its inhabitants (18:25, 28). The penalty is capital — mot yumatu with the blood-guilt formula d'meihem bam.
14. The term zimmah ('depravity, deliberate wickedness, scheme') denotes calculated sexual transgression — not impulsive error but willful perversion. Burning (ba'esh yisrefu) is a more severe form of execution than stoning, reserved for extreme violations (cf. Gen 38:24, Lev 21:9). The purpose clause v'lo tihyeh zimmah b'tokhkhem ('so there will be no depravity among you') shows the penalty is purgative: removing corruption to protect the community's holiness.
15. The phrase yitten sh'khavto ('gives his emission') is an explicit anatomical description of the act. The animal is also killed (taharogu, 'you shall slay') — not because it bears moral guilt, but because it has been implicated in a violation of the created order that must be completely eradicated. The animal's death serves to remove every trace of the transgression.
16. The verb tiqrav ('approaches') with the purpose infinitive l'riv'ah ('to mate with') describes the woman as the initiator. The law addresses female agency in bestiality separately from the male case (v 15), with the same severity. The blood-guilt formula d'meihem bam extends to both the woman and the animal, consistent with the principle that the violation must be entirely purged.

17. The word chesed here is not the common chesed meaning 'loyal love' or 'covenant faithfulness.' This is a homonym meaning 'shame, disgrace' — a shocking and deliberate word choice that highlights the perversion of family bonds. The mutual 'seeing' (v'ra'ah... v'hi tireh) implies consensual participation. The penalty is karet ('cutting off') rather than death, and is performed l'einei b'nei amam ('in the sight of their people') — a public sentence. The phrase avono yisa ('he shall bear his punishment') indicates the guilt remains with him.
18. The term davah ('menstrual sickness, impurity') refers to a woman during her menstrual period. The phrase et-meqorah he'erah ('he exposed her source/fountain') uses the metaphor of a spring or fountain (maqor) for the menstrual flow — he has laid bare what should remain covered. Her shared guilt (v'hi giltah, 'and she revealed') indicates consensual participation. The penalty is karet for both, lesser than the death penalties above but still severe: this violation transgresses the blood-holiness boundary central to Levitical theology.
19. The term she'ero ('his flesh, his close relative') emphasizes the blood-kinship violation: an aunt is one's own flesh, and sexual contact with her violates the integrity of the family body. The phrase avonam yisa'u ('they shall bear their guilt') indicates divine punishment without specifying the form — the absence of a specific death penalty or karet suggests the punishment is left to God's direct action. This verse shifts from case-law (ish asher, 'a man who') to direct address (lo tegalleh, 'you shall not uncover'), varying the legal style.
20. The term dodato ('his aunt,' literally 'his uncle's wife') and ervat dodo ('his uncle's nakedness') frame this as a violation against the uncle's marital domain. The penalty aririm yamutu ('they shall die childless') introduces a distinctive punishment: not execution but divinely imposed barrenness. The word aririm ('childless, stripped bare') is devastating in an ancient context where children were one's legacy, security, and continuation — dying without offspring meant the complete termination of one's line.
21. The term niddah ('impurity, menstrual separation') applied to this act is striking — it is not merely forbidden but ritually contaminating. This prohibition appears to conflict with the levirate marriage law (Deut 25:5-10), which requires a man to marry his deceased brother's childless wife. The resolution is that Leviticus 20:21 addresses taking a living brother's wife, while Deuteronomy addresses the obligation to a deceased brother's widow. The penalty aririm yihyu ('they shall be childless') again uses divinely imposed barrenness rather than human execution.
22. The verb taqi ('vomit out') personifies the land as a living entity with a moral constitution — it cannot stomach the presence of those who violate God's commands. This graphic image (used also in 18:25, 28) presents the land of Canaan as sacred space that actively expels its defilers. The pair chuqotay... mishpatay ('My statutes... My ordinances') encompasses the full range of divine legislation: chuqqot are inscribed decrees and mishpatim are judicial rulings.
23. The verb va'aqutz ('I was disgusted, I loathed') expresses visceral divine revulsion — stronger than mere disapproval. The singular hagoy ('the nation') may refer collectively to the Canaanite peoples. The verb meshalleach ('am sending away, am driving out') presents the dispossession as an ongoing divine action. The logic is explicit: the Canaanites practiced these violations, God expelled them; Israel must not repeat those practices or face the same fate.
24. The promise of land possession (tirshu et-admatam, 'you will inherit their ground') is conditioned on covenant faithfulness — the same land that vomited out the Canaanites will welcome obedient Israel. The phrase eret zavat chalav ud'vash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') is the classic description of abundance and fertility. The verb hivdalti ('I have separated/distinguished') from badal introduces the separation theme that dominates the chapter's conclusion: God's act of setting Israel apart from the peoples is the foundation for their distinct way of life.
25. The verb hivdaltem ('you shall distinguish/separate') echoes God's own act of separation (hivdalti, v 24). Israel's daily practice of distinguishing clean from unclean mirrors God's act of distinguishing Israel from the nations. The dietary laws are not arbitrary but pedagogical: every meal reinforces the identity of a people set apart. The verb teshaqtzu ('make detestable') from sheqetz (the term for unclean swarming creatures in Lev 11) warns that consuming what God has classified as unclean contaminates the person's own nefesh ('self, being').
26. This verse forms an inclusio with verse 7 — the chapter's theological bookends. The phrase lihyot li ('to be Mine') reveals the ultimate purpose of holiness: belonging. Israel is not holy for the sake of moral achievement but for the sake of divine possession. The verb va'avdil ('I have separated') uses the same root (badal) as verses 24-25, creating a threefold separation chain: God separates Israel from the nations (v 24), Israel separates clean from unclean (v 25), and both acts flow from God's own holiness (v 26). Holiness, separation, and belonging are inseparable in the Holiness Code.
27. This closing verse returns to the theme of verse 6 (consulting mediums and spiritists), forming a bracket around the chapter's sexual prohibitions. While verse 6 addressed the person who consults mediums (penalty: karet), verse 27 addresses the practitioners themselves (penalty: stoning). The terms ov ('medium') and yid'oni ('spiritist') are the same as in verse 6 — but now the practitioners themselves are condemned rather than their clients. The placement after the holiness conclusion (vv 22-26) reinforces that occult practice is fundamentally incompatible with belonging to YHWH. The parashah marker (pe) at the end signals a major textual division.

Summary: Regulations for priestly holiness address two levels: ordinary priests must avoid corpse contamination (with exceptions for immediate family), and the high priest must avoid it entirely. Physical disqualifications for altar service are listed. The chapter protects the holiness of the priestly office as mediators of God's presence.

What Makes This Remarkable: The double speech formula emor... ve'amarta ("say... and tell them") intensifies the urgency. The word nephesh ("person") here paradoxically means "corpse" -- the living-soul term designates a dead body. The high priest's total separation from death-contamination (not even for parents, v11) reflects his unique proximity to the source of life. Physical-blemish restrictions (v17-23) are about representational fitness, not inherent worth -- blemished priests still eat the sacred food.

Translation Friction: The verse about ba'al (v4) is notoriously difficult: the word can mean "husband," "master," or "leader." We followed the marital reading (prohibition against contracting corpse-impurity for in-laws) while noting the alternatives. The reflexive verb yitamma ("make himself unclean") required rendering that preserved the active choice involved -- the priest incurs impurity by choosing contact with the dead. The mourning practices (v5) -- head-shaving, beard-trimming, skin-cutting -- are pagan death rituals, and we identified them as such.

Connections: The high priest's unique restrictions anticipate Heb 7:26 ("separated from sinners"). The blemish list parallels the unblemished requirement for sacrificial animals (1:3; 22:17-25). The priestly mourning restrictions overlap with Ezekiel's experience (Ezek 24:16-17). The graduated holiness (people < priests < high priest) reflects the tabernacle's spatial gradient (court < holy place < most holy place).

¹The LORD told Moses: Say to the priests, the sons of Aaron, and tell them — a priest must not make himself ritually unclean through contact with a dead person among his people, ²except for his closest blood relatives: his mother, his father, his son, his daughter, and his brother. ³Also for his virgin sister who remains close to him because she has not yet married — for her he may make himself unclean. ⁴He must not make himself unclean as a married man among his people, thereby desecrating himself. ⁵They must not shave bald patches on their heads, trim the edges of their beards, or make cuts in their skin. ⁶They must be holy to their God and must not desecrate the name of their God, because they are the ones who present the LORD's fire offerings — the food of their God. Therefore they must be holy. ⁷They must not marry a woman who is a prostitute or who has been desecrated, nor may they marry a woman divorced from her husband, because the priest is holy to his God. ⁸You must treat him as holy, because he presents the food of your God. He must be holy to you, because I, the LORD who sets you apart as holy, am holy. ⁹If the daughter of a priest desecrates herself by engaging in prostitution, she desecrates her father — she must be burned with fire. ¹⁰The priest who is greatest among his brothers — the one on whose head the anointing oil has been poured and who has been ordained to wear the sacred garments — must not let his hair hang loose or tear his garments. ¹¹He must not go near any dead body at all. He must not make himself unclean even for his father or his mother. ¹²He must not leave the sanctuary area, and he must not desecrate the sanctuary of his God, because the consecration of the anointing oil of his God is upon him. I am the LORD. ¹³He must marry a woman who is a virgin. ¹⁴A widow, a divorced woman, a desecrated woman, or a prostitute — he must not marry any of these. He may only take a virgin from his own people as a wife. ¹⁵He must not desecrate his offspring among his people, because I am the LORD who sets him apart as holy. ¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁷Speak to Aaron and tell him: Any man among your descendants throughout their generations who has a physical defect must not approach to present the food of his God. ¹⁸No man who has a physical defect may approach: whether blind, or lame, or with a disfigured face, or with a limb too long, ¹⁹or a man with a broken foot or a broken hand, ²⁰or hunchbacked, or stunted in growth, or with a defect in his eye, or with a festering rash, or with scabs, or with crushed testicles. ²¹No man from the line of Aaron the priest who has a physical defect may come forward to present the LORD's fire offerings. He has a defect; he must not come forward to present the food of his God. ²²He may eat the food of his God from both the most holy offerings and the holy offerings. ²³But he must not approach the curtain or come near the altar, because he has a defect. He must not desecrate my holy places, because I am the LORD who makes them holy. ²⁴So

Moses communicated this to Aaron, to his sons, and to all the Israelites.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The double speech formula emor... ve'amarta ('say... and tell them') intensifies the urgency of the instruction — Moses must not merely relay it but press it firmly upon the priests. The word nephesh here means 'dead person' (literally 'soul/person'), a usage where the living-soul term paradoxically designates a corpse. The verb yitamma ('make himself unclean') is reflexive: the priest actively incurs impurity by choosing contact with the dead. This opening verse establishes that priestly holiness demands separation from death-contamination that ordinary Israelites are permitted.
2. The term she'ero ('his flesh/kin') refers to the nearest blood relations — those so close they are considered part of one's own body. The list is precise and exhaustive for this exception: five categories of immediate family. Notably absent is the priest's wife, though later rabbinic tradition included her. The ordering — mother before father — may reflect the mother's primacy in early household bonds, or simply follow the Hebrew poetic rhythm.
3. The betulah ('virgin') qualification is critical: once a sister marries, she enters her husband's family unit and is no longer considered the priest's closest kin. The phrase haqerovah elav ('who is close to him') indicates both physical proximity (she still lives in the family household) and relational closeness. A married sister would have her husband's family to attend to her burial. This exception underscores that the prohibition in verse 1 applies to extended kin and community members, not one's innermost family circle.
4. This verse is notoriously difficult. The word ba'al can mean 'husband,' 'master,' or 'leader.' If read as 'husband,' the verse forbids the priest from contracting corpse-impurity for his wife's relatives (in-laws). If read as 'leader/chief man,' the emphasis is on his public status: precisely because of his prominence he must not profane himself (lehechallo — from challal, 'to profane/desecrate'). The rendering follows the marital reading, which fits the immediate context of family-based exceptions in verses 2–3.
5. Three prohibited mourning practices are listed, all associated with pagan death rituals in the ancient Near East: qorchah ('bald patch' — ritual head-shaving for the dead), shaving pe'at zaqanam ('the edge/corner of their beard'), and seret ('gash/cut' — self-laceration). These same prohibitions appear for all Israelites in 19:27–28, but are restated here with special force for priests. The bracketed kethiv/qere notation in the Hebrew ([yiqrechu]/yiqrechah) reflects a textual variant between singular and plural forms, both meaning 'shave bald.'
6. This verse provides the theological rationale for priestly restrictions: qedoshim yihyu ('they must be holy') frames holiness as an obligation, not a suggestion. The key term lechem eloheihem ('the food/bread of their God') does not imply God literally eats — it is a conventional ancient Near Eastern expression for offerings presented at the divine table. The verb yechalelu ('desecrate,' from challal) stands in direct opposition to qodesh ('holy'): the priest who engages in pagan mourning rites profanes the very Name he is consecrated to honor.
7. Three categories of women are forbidden as priestly wives: zonah ('prostitute' — whether a professional sex worker or a woman of sexual impropriety), challalah ('a desecrated woman' — from challal, possibly a woman born of an illegitimate priestly marriage or one who has lost her sanctified status), and gerushah ('a divorced woman'). The concern is not the woman's moral character per se but the priest's holiness status: his household must reflect the same unblemished consecration as his service. The singular 'he is holy' (qadosh hu) applies the principle individually to each priest.
8. The address shifts from the priests to the community: veqidashto ('you shall sanctify him') is second person singular, commanding each Israelite to uphold the priest's sanctified status. The grounding formula ki qadosh ani YHWH meqaddishkhem ('because I, the LORD who makes you holy, am holy') anchors all priestly holiness in divine holiness itself. The participle meqaddishkhem ('the one who makes you holy') emphasizes God's ongoing sanctifying action — holiness is not self-generated but conferred by God and maintained through obedience.
9. The verb techel ('she profanes/desecrates,' from challal) links the daughter's sexual misconduct directly to her father's priestly status: hi mechallelet ('she is desecrating') — her actions actively profane him. The punishment ba'esh tissareph ('she shall be burned with fire') is exceptionally severe, exceeding the standard penalty for sexual immorality, precisely because the priestly household carries a heightened level of sanctity. The fire may correspond symbolically to the fire offerings the priest presents — the same element that consecrates the altar now executes judgment on the desecrated household.
10. The high priest (hakohen hagadol — literally 'the great priest') is identified by two consecration markers: the anointing oil (shemen hamishchah) poured on his head, and the filling of his hand (umille et yado — an ordination idiom meaning 'to install in office,' literally 'to fill the hand,' likely referring to placing sacred objects in the priest's hands during investiture). Two mourning signs are forbidden: yifra ('let loose' — disheveling the hair as a grief display) and yifrom ('tear' — rending garments). These are standard expressions of grief permitted to ordinary Israelites and even regular priests, but the high priest's consecrated status overrides personal mourning.
11. The phrase kol nafshot met ('any dead person' — literally 'all souls of the dead') is comprehensive: no exceptions. The contrast with ordinary priests (vv 2–3) is stark — whereas they may contract corpse-impurity for immediate family, the high priest may not do so even for his own parents (le'aviv ule'immo). This absolute prohibition underscores that the high priest's consecration supersedes all natural family obligations. His holiness status is so elevated that even the deepest human grief must yield to his sacred role.
12. The word nezer ('consecration/crown/separation') is the same root used for the Nazirite vow (Numbers 6), signifying a state of dedicated separation. Here it refers to the anointing oil's ongoing consecrating effect on the high priest — he carries its mark permanently. The phrase lo yetse ('he must not go out') likely means he must not leave the sanctuary precincts to attend a funeral, not that he is physically confined there at all times. The divine signature ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') closes the instruction with ultimate authority.

13. The phrase bivtuleiha ('in her virginity') uses the plural construct of betulim, indicating the full state of virginity rather than simply the noun betulah ('virgin'). The high priest's marriage requirement is stricter than the ordinary priest's (v 7): while regular priests are forbidden prostitutes, desecrated women, and divorcees, the high priest is restricted to an even narrower category — only a virgin qualifies. This requirement ensures that the high priestly line originates from an unblemished marital union.
14. The high priest's forbidden marriage list adds almanah ('widow') to the three categories already banned for ordinary priests (v 7). A widow, though morally blameless, has been 'opened' through a prior marriage and no longer meets the virginity requirement. The phrase me'ammav ('from his own people') restricts the high priest's marriage pool to Israelite women — specifically virgins within his own community. The four-fold exclusion list (widow, divorcee, challalah, zonah) followed by the single permitted category (betulah from his people) creates a stark rhetorical contrast.
15. The verb yechallel ('desecrate,' from challal) applied to zar'o ('his offspring/seed') reveals the rationale behind the marriage restrictions: an improper union would produce challal children — offspring with compromised priestly status. The term challal in priestly contexts means 'profaned' or 'disqualified from sacred service.' The closing formula ani YHWH meqadsho ('I am the LORD who sanctifies him') grounds the entire high-priestly section (vv 10–15) in God's own sanctifying action — the restrictions exist to preserve what God Himself has consecrated.
16. The speech formula vayedabber YHWH el Mosheh lemor ('the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') marks a new section within the chapter. This third-person narrative frame transitions from the high priest's marriage laws (vv 10–15) to the physical-blemish disqualifications (vv 17–24). The shift to a fresh divine speech signals that the following regulations, though thematically related, carry independent legislative force.
17. This instruction is directed to Aaron personally (daber el Aharon), not to the priests collectively — emphasizing that these rules govern his own lineage. The word mum ('defect/blemish') is the chapter's key technical term for physical disqualification. The verb yigraiv ('approach') paired with lehaqriv ('to present/offer') uses the same root q-r-b twice: the blemished priest may not draw near to bring near. The phrase lechem elohav ('the food of his God') again denotes sacrificial offerings using the conventional 'food' metaphor.
18. The blemish catalogue begins with four conditions. Ivver ('blind') and pisseach ('lame') are clear physical disabilities. Charum ('disfigured' — possibly a slit or sunken nose, or more broadly a facial deformity) is debated; the root ch-r-m suggests mutilation or something cut away. Sarua ('extended/stretched out' — a limb that is disproportionately long or has extra digits) completes the first group. These are not moral judgments but ritual standards: the priest who offers must physically mirror the 'unblemished' (tamim) quality required of the sacrificial animal itself.
19. The phrase shever regel ('fracture of the foot') and shever yad ('fracture of the hand') use shever ('break/fracture'), likely referring to a permanent deformity from a healed fracture rather than a temporary injury. The pairing of foot and hand covers the body's primary instruments of mobility and service — a priest must be physically whole in the limbs he uses to carry offerings and perform altar duties.
20. Six more disqualifying conditions: gibben ('hunchbacked' — spinal curvature), daq ('thin/stunted' — possibly a dwarf or an emaciated person; the root means 'crushed fine'), teballul be'eino ('a mixing/confusion in his eye' — likely a cataract, clouded lens, or iris defect), garav ('scab/itch' — a chronic skin disease), yallefet ('running sore/eczema' — a spreading skin condition), and meroach ashekh ('crushed testicle' — testicular damage rendering the man sexually impaired). The list mirrors the blemish catalogue for sacrificial animals in 22:22–24, reinforcing the principle that the one who offers must match the offering's standard of physical wholeness.
21. This verse serves as a summary restatement, framing the blemish list (vv 18–20) with a definitive prohibition. The double statement — lo yiggash lehaqriv... lo yiggash lehaqriv ('he must not come forward to present... he must not come forward to present') — hammers the restriction through repetition. The phrase ishei YHWH ('the fire offerings of the LORD') and lechem elohav ('the food of his God') are used in parallel, confirming they refer to the same sacrificial offerings described from two angles: their mode of presentation (by fire) and their conceptual category (divine food).
22. This verse provides a crucial qualification: the blemished priest is barred from altar service but retains his priestly right to eat the sacred portions. The distinction between qodshei haqodashim ('the most holy things' — grain offerings, sin offerings, guilt offerings eaten only by priests within the sanctuary) and haqodashim ('the holy things' — breast and thigh portions of peace offerings, firstfruits, tithes) preserves the full range of priestly food entitlements. The defect disqualifies from service, not from status — the blemished priest remains a priest.
23. Two sacred zones are explicitly off-limits: the parokhet ('curtain/veil' — the screen separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place) and the mizbeach ('altar' — the bronze altar of burnt offering in the courtyard). The verb yechallel ('desecrate,' from challal) appears for the final time in this chapter, closing the inclusio opened in verse 6: priests who fail to maintain the required standard of wholeness risk profaning (mechallel) the very sanctuaries (miqdashay — plural, referring to the entire sacred complex) that God has consecrated (meqaddesh). The divine self-identification ani YHWH meqaddisham ('I am the LORD who makes them holy') asserts that sanctuary holiness originates in God, not in priestly performance.
24. The closing verse confirms that Moses faithfully transmitted (vayedabber — 'he spoke/communicated') God's instructions to all three audiences: Aaron (the high priest), his sons (the ordinary priests), and all the Israelites (the broader community addressed in v 8). The inclusion of kol benei Yisrael ('all the sons/children of Israel') indicates that the community bears collective responsibility for upholding priestly standards — these are not private guild rules but public covenant regulations.

Summary: Priests in a state of impurity must abstain from sacred offerings until purified. Rules specify who within priestly households may eat sacred food. The chapter then addresses sacrificial animals: they must be unblemished, with specific defects listed. The offering must be the worshipper's own, given willingly.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb yinnazru ("exercise restraint," v2) instructs priests not to avoid sacred offerings entirely but to hold back when impure. The sacred food regulations define the priestly household's boundaries with precision -- who is "inside" the priest's house and who has left. The blemish catalogue for animals mirrors the priest's physical requirements in ch 21: the offering must match the offerer's representational standard.

Translation Friction: The root n-z-r in yinnazru ("exercise restraint") carries nazir ("separated/consecrated") associations, and we rendered it to show self-discipline rather than avoidance. The phrase milefanai ("from My presence," v3) is unique to this context -- karet here means exclusion specifically from God's immediate presence in the sanctuary. The catch-all lekhol tumato ("of whatever his impurity," v5) required rendering broad enough to cover every impurity category from chapters 11-15.

Connections: The unblemished-animal requirement repeats the foundational standard of 1:3 and Deut 17:1. The defect list anticipates Mal 1:8 ("offer it to your governor -- would he accept you?"). The sacred-food boundaries connect to the priestly portion regulations of ch 7. The prohibition against offering what costs nothing anticipates David's principle in 2 Sam 24:24.

¹The LORD addressed Moses: ²Tell Aaron and his sons to exercise restraint regarding the sacred offerings of the Israelites, so that they do not desecrate my holy name in connection with what the Israelites consecrate to me. I am the LORD. ³Say to them: Throughout your generations, any man among your descendants who approaches the sacred offerings that the Israelites consecrate to the LORD while his ritual impurity is still on him — that person will be cut off from my presence. I am the LORD. ⁴Any descendant of Aaron who has a skin disease or a bodily discharge must not eat from the sacred offerings until he becomes ritually pure. Also, anyone who touches something made impure by contact with a corpse, or a man who has a seminal emission — ⁵or anyone who touches any swarming creature that renders him impure, or any person from whom he contracts impurity of whatever kind — ⁶the person who touches any of these will be impure until evening and must not eat from the sacred offerings unless he has bathed his entire body in water. ⁷Once the sun has set he will be ritually pure, and afterward he may eat from the sacred offerings, since that is his allotted food. ⁸He must not eat an animal that died on its own or was killed by a predator, becoming impure through it. I am the LORD. ⁹They must guard my requirement so they do not bear sin for it and die because they desecrated it. I am the LORD who sanctifies them. ¹⁰No unauthorized person may eat sacred food. A resident guest of the priest or a hired laborer may not eat what is sacred. ¹¹But if a priest acquires a person as his purchased property, that person may eat from the sacred food. Those born in his household may also eat from his food. ¹²If a priest's daughter marries a man outside the priesthood, she may no longer eat from the sacred contributions. ¹³But if a priest's daughter becomes widowed or divorced and has no children, and she returns to her father's house as in her youth, she may eat from her father's food. No unauthorized person, however, may eat from it. ¹⁴If someone eats sacred food by mistake, he must add a fifth of its value and reimburse the priest for the sacred food. ¹⁵The priests must not allow the sacred offerings of the Israelites — what the people set apart for the LORD — to be desecrated. ¹⁶Otherwise they would cause the people to bear the punishment of guilt by letting them eat their sacred offerings, for I am the LORD who sanctifies them. ¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁸Tell Aaron, his sons, and all the Israelites — say to them: When anyone from the house of Israel, or any foreign resident living in Israel, presents an offering — whether fulfilling any of their vows or bringing any of their voluntary gifts that they present to the LORD as a burnt offering — ¹⁹for it to be accepted on your behalf, it must be an unblemished male from the cattle, the sheep, or the goats. ²⁰You must not present anything that has a defect, because it will not gain acceptance for you. ²¹When anyone presents a well-being sacrifice to the LORD — whether to fulfill a vow or as a voluntary gift, from the herd or from the flock — it must be without defect to gain acceptance. There must be no blemish in it. ²²An animal that is blind, has a broken bone, is gashed, has a wart, has a rash, or has a skin eruption — these you must not present to the LORD. You must not place any of them on the altar as a fire offering to the LORD. ²³An ox or a sheep that has a limb too long or too short — you may use it for a voluntary offering, but for a vow it will not be accepted. ²⁴You must not present to the LORD an animal whose testicles are squeezed, crushed, torn off, or severed. You must not do this in your land. ²⁵Nor may you accept from a foreigner any of these animals to offer as the food of your God, because their mutilation is in them — they have a defect. They will not be accepted on your behalf. ²⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁷When an ox, a sheep, or a goat is born, it must remain with its mother for seven days. From the eighth day onward it is eligible to be accepted as a fire offering to the LORD. ²⁸Whether it is a cow or a ewe, you must not slaughter the mother and her offspring on the same day. ²⁹When you sacrifice a thanksgiving offering to the LORD, sacrifice it in a way that will be accepted. ³⁰It must be eaten on that same day. You must not leave any of it until morning. I am the LORD. ³¹You must keep my commandments and carry them out. I am the LORD. ³²You must not desecrate my holy name, so that I may be recognized as holy among the Israelites. I am the LORD who sanctifies you, ³³the one who brought you out of the land of Egypt to be your God. I am the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vaydabber ('and He spoke') opens a new divine speech unit. This formulaic introduction marks the transition to regulations about priestly purity in handling sacred food, distinct from the physical-blemish regulations for priests in chapter 21.
2. The verb yinnazru (from nazir, 'to separate/hold back') instructs the priests to restrain themselves — not to avoid the sacred offerings entirely, but to abstain from them when in a state of impurity (tamei). The root ch-l-l (yechalelu, 'profane/desecrate') is a key term in Leviticus: to treat what is qodesh ('holy') as though it were ordinary. The phrase shem qodshi ('my holy name') ties priestly conduct directly to God's reputation.
3. The phrase ledorotekhem ('throughout your generations') establishes this as a permanent statute, not a temporary measure. The verb yiqrav ('approaches/draws near') is a technical priestly term for handling sacred items. The penalty nikretah hannefesh ('that person will be cut off') — the karet punishment — is debated in rabbinic tradition: some understand it as divine execution, others as excommunication or loss of afterlife. The phrase milefanai ('from my presence') is unique here, tying the cutting off specifically to exclusion from God's immediate presence in the sanctuary.
4. The doubled ish ish ('any man whatsoever') is an emphatic construction meaning 'each and every man without exception.' The term tsarua refers to the condition described in Leviticus 13–14 — a broad category of skin afflictions, not limited to modern leprosy. The term zav describes an abnormal genital discharge (Lev 15:1–15). The phrase tame-nefesh ('impure by a corpse') refers to corpse contamination, the most severe form of ritual impurity. Shikvat-zara ('emission of seed') renders a man tamei until evening (Lev 15:16–17). The verse trails off syntactically, continuing into v. 5.
5. The word sherets ('swarming creature') refers to the small creatures listed in Lev 11:29–31 (rodents, lizards, etc.) whose carcasses transmit impurity. The phrase lekol tumato ('of whatever his impurity') is a comprehensive catch-all — it means the rule applies regardless of which specific category of impurity is involved. This verse completes the catalogue of impurity sources begun in v. 4, forming a single compound sentence resolved in v. 6.
6. The phrase ad-ha'arev ('until evening') establishes sunset as the boundary for this level of impurity — a one-day purification cycle. The condition ki im-rachats besaro bamayim ('unless he has washed his flesh in water') requires full-body immersion, not merely handwashing. The word besaro ('his flesh/body') emphasizes complete bodily contact with water, which later tradition formalized as immersion in a miqveh.
7. The two-step purification — immersion (v. 6) plus sunset (uva hashemesh, 'the sun comes in') — must both occur before the priest may resume eating sacred food. The term lachmo ('his bread/food') reveals that the priestly portions from Israel's offerings constituted the priests' livelihood; the sacred donations were not a luxury but their sustenance, which makes the restriction significant — it temporarily deprived them of their food supply.
8. Nevelah ('carcass') refers to an animal that died naturally without proper slaughter, and terefah ('torn') to one killed or mauled by a wild animal. Both categories render the eater tamei. While all Israelites are forbidden these foods (Lev 17:15), the prohibition is reiterated here specifically for priests because the consequence — impurity — would disqualify them from eating sacred food. The closing formula ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') underscores divine authority behind the command.
9. The phrase shamru et-mishmarti ('guard my charge/requirement') uses the cognate construction — the verb and noun share the same root sh-m-r — intensifying the obligation. The penalty umetu vo ('and die because of it') indicates that eating sacred food while impure is not merely a procedural violation but a capital offense against holiness. The closing meqaddisham ('who sanctifies them') reminds the priests that their holiness is not self-generated but divinely conferred, making desecration a rejection of God's own act of consecration.
10. The word zar ('outsider, unauthorized person') in priestly contexts means anyone outside the Aaronic line — not a foreigner per se, but a non-priest. The verse then specifies two categories within a priest's household who remain excluded despite proximity: a toshav ('resident guest' or 'tenant') and a sakhir ('hired worker'). Their relationship to the priest is contractual and temporary, not one of permanent belonging, so they lack the standing to partake of sacred food.
11. The phrase qinyan kaspo ('acquisition of his silver') refers to a bonded servant purchased by the priest. Unlike the hired laborer (v. 10), this person becomes part of the priest's household permanently and therefore shares in the priestly food allotment. The yelid beto ('one born in his house') refers to children of such servants, who are considered members of the household from birth. The distinction between temporary workers (excluded) and - permanent household members (included) reflects the principle that participation in sacred food follows household identity, not employment.

12. The bat-kohen ('priest's daughter') loses her right to sacred food upon marriage to an ish zar ('a man who is an outsider' — i.e., a non-priest). Through marriage she transfers to her husband's household and takes on his status. The specific term terumat haqqodashim ('the elevated portion of the sacred offerings') refers to the priestly share that was lifted up and set apart from the sacrifices. Her exclusion is based on household membership, not personal worthiness — a principle reversed in v. 13.
 13. Three conditions must be met for the daughter's reinstatement: she must be an almanah ('widow') or gerushah ('divorced woman'), she must have no zera ('offspring' — children who would anchor her in her husband's household), and she must physically return (shavah) to her father's house. The phrase kin'ureha ('as in her youth') means she reverts to her pre-marriage status within the priestly household. If she had children, they would belong to the non-priestly father's line, and her continued connection to that household would prevent her return to priestly food rights.
 14. The term bishgagah ('by mistake, inadvertently') indicates an unintentional violation — the person did not knowingly eat what was restricted. The penalty mirrors the guilt-offering restitution formula found in Lev 5:16: repayment of the principal plus a chamishito ('a fifth' — 20% surcharge). The additional fifth serves as compensation for the loss of sanctity, not merely the material value. The phrase venatan lakohen ('and he gives to the priest') shows the restitution goes to the priest whose sacred portion was consumed.
 15. The verb yarimu ('they elevate/set apart') comes from the root r-u-m ('to raise'), the same root behind terumah ('elevated offering'). The subject of yechalelu ('they shall not desecrate') is the priests — they bear responsibility for protecting the sanctity of the offerings. By permitting unauthorized persons to eat sacred food, the priests themselves would be guilty of desecration, making them guardians not only of their own purity but of the entire system of sacred donations.
 16. The causative verb hissiu ('they would cause to bear') places the blame on the priests: if they fail to enforce these restrictions, the resulting guilt falls on the unauthorized eaters — but the priests are responsible for having permitted it. The phrase avon ashmah ('guilt of trespass') combines two terms for wrongdoing, intensifying the severity. The closing meqaddisham ('who sanctifies them') may refer either to the priests whom God sanctifies or to the sacred offerings that God makes holy — the ambiguity reinforces that both the personnel and the food derive their sacred status from God alone. The parashah marker (peh) in the Hebrew text signals a major section break here.
 17. This second occurrence of the introductory speech formula within the chapter marks the beginning of a new legislative unit. Verses 1–16 addressed who may eat sacred food; from here forward the topic shifts to which animals qualify as acceptable sacrificial offerings. The audience also widens in v. 18 to include all Israelites, not just the priesthood.
 18. The address now expands from priests alone (v. 2) to include kol benei Yisra'el ('all the Israelites') and the ger ('foreign resident'), indicating that animal-quality requirements apply to every worshiper, not just priests. The doubled ish ish ('any person whatsoever') is emphatic. Two motivations for offering are distinguished: nidrehem ('their vows' — obligatory, fulfilling a prior commitment) and nidvotam ('their voluntary gifts' — spontaneous, freely chosen). Both categories must meet the same quality standard for an olah ('burnt offering' — entirely consumed on the altar).
 19. The phrase lirtsonkhem ('for your acceptance/favorable regard') means 'so that it will be accepted on your behalf' — the animal's quality determines whether the offering achieves its purpose. The adjective tamim ('whole, unblemished, complete') is the central standard: the animal must be physically intact and without defect. The restriction to zakhar ('male') applies specifically to the olah (burnt offering); other sacrifice types permit female animals. The three species listed — baqar (cattle), kesavim (sheep), izzim (goats) — constitute the full range of domestic herd animals permitted for sacrifice.
 20. The word mum ('defect, blemish') is the counterpart to tamim ('unblemished'). The verb taqrivu ('you shall bring near/present') is the standard priestly term for offering a sacrifice. The phrase lo leratson ('not for acceptance') echoes the positive lirtsonkhem of v. 19 — a blemished animal fails to achieve the offering's purpose. The logic is not merely aesthetic: an imperfect gift to God implies that the worshiper considers God unworthy of their best.
 21. The zevach shelamim ('well-being sacrifice' or 'peace offering') is distinct from the olah: parts are burned on the altar, but portions are eaten by the priest and the worshiper. Despite the shared meal aspect, the same standard of tamim ('without defect') applies. The phrase lefa'le-neder ('to fulfill a vow' — literally 'to make extraordinary a vow') uses the root p-l- which carries a sense of setting apart something special. Even though the shelamim is less restrictive than the olah (it permits female animals), the requirement of physical wholeness remains absolute.
 22. Six specific disqualifying conditions are listed: avveret (blindness), shavur (fracture), charutz (a deep cut or gash — the root ch-r-ts means 'to cut into'), yabbelet (a wart or fleshy growth), garav (a scabby skin condition), and yallefet (a running skin eruption, possibly eczema). These cover structural damage (blindness, fracture, laceration) and surface conditions (growths, skin diseases). The term issheh ('fire offering') refers to any offering consumed on the altar by fire. The double prohibition — do not present them, do not place them on the altar — closes both procedural stages.
 23. This verse introduces a surprising exception. The terms sarua ('overgrown, with an extended limb') and qalut ('stunted, with a contracted limb') describe disproportionate but not damaged body parts. Such an animal may be offered as a nedavah ('voluntary gift') but not for a neder ('vow'). The distinction likely reflects the differing obligations: a vow is a binding commitment requiring the highest standard, while a voluntary gift has more latitude. This is the only relaxation of the blemish requirement in the chapter.
 24. Four terms describe increasing degrees of damage to the reproductive organs: ma'ukh ('squeezed/pressed'), katut ('crushed/pounded'), natuq ('pulled away/torn'), and karut ('cut off/severed'). Rabbinic tradition (Bekhorot 39b) confirms these refer to castration of sacrificial animals. The final clause uve'artskhem lo ta'asu ('and in your land you must not do this') has been interpreted two ways: either a prohibition against castrating any animal in Israel, or a prohibition against accepting such animals from any source. Most traditional commentators understand it as a blanket ban on animal castration.

25. The phrase miyad ben-nekhar ('from the hand of a foreigner') addresses animals purchased from or offered by non-Israelites. Even if a foreigner wishes to present an offering (foreigners could bring burnt offerings, cf. Num 15:14–16), the same quality standard applies — defective animals are rejected regardless of source. The term lechem eloheikhem ('the food/bread of your God') is anthropomorphic language for sacrificial offerings; it does not imply God eats, but designates offerings placed on God's 'table' (the altar). The word moshchatam ('their corruption/damage') derives from sh-ch-t ('to destroy, corrupt'), describing the physical damage as a form of ruin.
26. This third speech formula within the chapter introduces a final subsection (vv. 26–33) dealing with age requirements for sacrificial animals and additional regulations. The repeated introductory formula segments the chapter's legislation into three distinct units: priestly purity (vv. 1–16), animal quality (vv. 17–25), and supplementary rules (vv. 26–33).
27. The seven-day minimum under the mother (tachat immo, 'beneath its mother') serves multiple purposes: it ensures the animal is viable (many newborns die within the first week), allows the mother-offspring bond, and mirrors the seven-day period before circumcision of a male child (Lev 12:3). The specification miyom hashemini vahal'ah ('from the eighth day and onward') sets the earliest possible date, not a target date — the animal simply becomes eligible. The three species — shor (ox), kesev (sheep), ez (goat) — again cover all permissible sacrificial livestock.
28. The phrase oto ve-et-beno ('it and its young') uses beno ('its son/offspring') — rabbinic tradition (Chullin 78b) debated whether this applies only to the mother-offspring pair or also to the father-offspring pair, with the halakhic conclusion following the mother. The prohibition against same-day slaughter of parent and young reflects a compassion ethic within the sacrificial system — similar in principle to the prohibition on cooking a kid in its mother's milk (Exod 23:19) and sending away the mother bird (Deut 22:6–7). The terms shor ('ox/cow') and seh ('sheep/goat') use generic terms that encompass both sexes.
29. The zevach todah ('thanksgiving sacrifice') is a subcategory of the shelamim (well-being offering), specifically one prompted by gratitude — typically for deliverance from danger (cf. Ps 107:22). The phrase lirtsonkhem tizbachu ('sacrifice it for your acceptance') echoes the same ratson language from v. 19, meaning the manner of offering must conform to the requirements so it achieves its intended purpose. The verb tizbachu ('you shall slaughter') repeats the root z-b-ch from zevach, creating a cognate emphasis: 'when you sacrifice a sacrifice.'
30. The time restriction bayyom hahu ye'akhel ('on that same day it shall be eaten') is stricter for the todah than for other shelamim offerings, which may be eaten over two days (Lev 7:16–17). The todah must be consumed entirely before the next morning (ad-boqer, 'until morning/dawn'). This urgency may serve to ensure communal sharing — a single household could not consume an entire animal in one evening, so the requirement effectively mandates inviting others to the meal, reinforcing the communal dimension of thanksgiving. The closing ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') authenticates the time constraint as divine command.
31. The verbs ushmartem ('you must guard/keep') and va'asitem ('and you must do/carry out') form a standard pair in Deuteronomic and Levitical legislation, distinguishing between careful preservation of the commandments and their active performance. The pairing implies that mere knowledge or passive respect is insufficient — the commandments require both vigilant attention and concrete action. This verse begins the closing exhortation (vv. 31–33) that wraps up the entire chapter's legislation.
32. This verse contains the foundational text for the concept of qiddush hashem ('sanctification of the Name') and its opposite, chillul hashem ('desecration of the Name'). The verb techalelu ('you shall desecrate') from the root ch-l-l bookends the chapter, echoing v. 2. The passive-reflexive niqdashti ('I will be sanctified/recognized as holy') implies that God's holiness is made visible through Israel's obedience — human conduct either reveals or obscures God's sanctity in the world. The closing meqaddishkhem ('who sanctifies you') creates a reciprocal structure: God sanctifies Israel, and Israel in turn must sanctify God's name.
33. The participial form hamotsi ('the one who brings out') identifies God through the defining act of the Exodus — a continuous identity marker, not merely a past event. The purpose clause lihyot lakhem le'lohim ('to be God for you') frames the entire sacrificial system within the Exodus covenant: God redeemed Israel in order to enter into a relationship with them, and the laws of this chapter regulate how that relationship is maintained through worship. The closing ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') appears for the final time in this chapter, bringing the legislative unit to a solemn close. The parashah petuchah (peh) marker signals a major division in the Torah text.

Summary: God's complete liturgical calendar: the weekly Sabbath, then seven annual appointed times -- Passover, Unleavened Bread, Firstfruits, the Feast of Weeks (Shavuot), the day of trumpet blasts, the Day of Atonement, and the Feast of Tabernacles (Sukkot). Each has specific dates, offerings, and observances.

What Makes This Remarkable: The mo'adim ("appointed times") are not Israel's holidays but God's appointments -- from ya'ad ("to appoint a meeting"). The calendar transforms time itself into a medium of worship. The Sabbath leads the list because it is the foundational rhythm. Passover begins the agricultural-redemptive cycle; Tabernacles completes it. Together the seven festivals tell the story of redemption from liberation to dwelling with God.

Translation Friction: We rendered mo'adei YHWH as "appointed times of the LORD" rather than "feasts" (KJV) because the Hebrew emphasizes divine scheduling, not celebration. The phrase bein ha'arbayim ("between the evenings," v5) for Passover's timing is debated -- twilight between sunset and dark, or between the sun's decline and sunset -- and we rendered "at twilight" without forcing a specific hour. The term shabbat shabbaton ("sabbath of complete rest") for Yom Kippur (v32) uses the same superlative form as the weekly Sabbath and the land's sabbath year (ch 25).

Connections: Passover connects to Exod 12. Firstfruits is linked to Christ's resurrection in 1 Cor 15:20-23. Shavuot is the setting for Acts 2 (Pentecost). The trumpet blasts anticipate eschatological trumpet imagery (1 Thess 4:16; Rev 11:15). Tabernacles connects to Zech 14:16-19 and John 7:37-38. Yom Kippur (v26-32) summarizes ch 16.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: These are the appointed times of the LORD that you shall proclaim as sacred assemblies — these are My appointed times. ³Six days work may be done, but the seventh day is a Sabbath of complete rest, a sacred assembly. You shall do no work — it is a Sabbath to the LORD wherever you dwell. ⁴These are the appointed times of the LORD, sacred assemblies that you shall proclaim at their designated times: ⁵On the fourteenth day of the first month, at twilight — the LORD's Passover. ⁶On the fifteenth day of the same month is the Festival of Unleavened Bread to the LORD. For seven days you shall eat unleavened bread. ⁷On the first day you shall hold a sacred assembly — you must do no regular work. ⁸You shall present fire offerings to the LORD for seven days. On the seventh day there is a sacred assembly — you must do no regular work." ⁹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁰"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When you enter the land I am giving you and harvest its crops, you shall bring a sheaf of the first grain of your harvest to the priest. ¹¹He shall elevate the sheaf before the LORD for your acceptance. The priest shall elevate it on the day after the Sabbath. ¹²On the day you elevate the sheaf, you shall offer an unblemished year-old male lamb as a burnt offering to the LORD, ¹³with its grain offering of two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil — a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD — and its drink offering of a quarter hin of wine. ¹⁴You must not eat bread, roasted grain, or fresh kernels until this very day — until you have brought the offering of your God. This is a permanent statute throughout your generations, wherever you dwell." ¹⁵"You shall count for yourselves from the day after the Sabbath — from the day you brought the sheaf of the elevation offering — seven complete weeks. ¹⁶You shall count fifty days, until the day after the seventh week, and then present a new grain offering to the LORD. ¹⁷From wherever you dwell, you shall bring two loaves of bread as a wave offering — made from two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour, baked with leaven — as firstfruits to the LORD. ¹⁸Along with the bread, present seven unblemished year-old lambs, one young bull, and two rams as a burnt offering to the LORD, together with their grain offerings and drink offerings — a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁹Prepare one male goat as a purification offering, and two year-old lambs as a sacrifice of peace offerings. ²⁰The priest shall elevate them — the bread of the firstfruits together with the two lambs — as a wave offering before the LORD. They shall be holy to the LORD, belonging to the priest. ²¹On that very day you shall proclaim a sacred assembly — you must do no regular work. This is a permanent statute wherever you dwell, throughout your generations. ²²When you harvest the crops of your land, you must not completely harvest the edges of your field, and you must not gather the gleanings of your harvest. Leave them for the poor and the foreigner. I am the LORD your God." ²³The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁴"Speak to the Israelites: On the first day of the seventh month you shall have a complete rest — a memorial proclaimed with trumpet blasts, a sacred assembly. ²⁵You must do no regular work, and you shall present a fire offering to the LORD." ²⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁷"On the tenth day of this seventh month is the Day of Atonement. It shall be a sacred assembly for you. You must practice self-denial and present a fire offering to the LORD. ²⁸You must do no work at all on that very day, for it is a Day of Atonement, to make atonement for you before the LORD your God. ²⁹Any person who does not practice self-denial on that very day shall be cut off from their people. ³⁰Any person who does any work on that very day — I will destroy that person from among their people. ³¹You must do no work at all — a permanent statute throughout your generations, wherever you dwell. ³²It is a Sabbath of complete rest for you, and you must practice self-denial. On the ninth day of the month, from evening to evening, you shall observe your Sabbath." ³³The LORD spoke to Moses: ³⁴"Speak to the Israelites: On the fifteenth day of this seventh month is the Festival of Shelters — seven days to the LORD. ³⁵On the first day there is a sacred assembly — you must do no regular work. ³⁶For seven days you shall present fire offerings to the LORD. On the eighth day you shall hold a sacred assembly and present a fire offering to the LORD. It is a closing assembly — you must do no regular work. ³⁷These are the appointed times of the LORD that you shall proclaim as sacred assemblies, for presenting fire offerings to the LORD — burnt offering, grain offering, sacrifice, and drink offerings, each on its proper day — ³⁸in addition to the LORD's Sabbaths, your gifts, all your vow offerings, and all your freewill offerings that you give to the LORD. ³⁹"On the fifteenth day of the seventh month, when you have gathered in the produce of the land, you shall celebrate the LORD's festival for seven days. The first day is a complete rest, and the eighth day is a complete rest. ⁴⁰On the first day you shall take the fruit of a splendid tree, branches of palm trees, boughs of leafy trees, and willows of the brook, and you shall rejoice before the LORD your God for seven days. ⁴¹You shall celebrate it as a festival to the LORD for seven days each year — a permanent statute throughout your generations. In the seventh month you shall celebrate it. ⁴²You shall dwell in shelters for seven days. Every native-born Israelite shall dwell in shelters, ⁴³so that your generations may know that I made the Israelites dwell in shelters when I brought them out of the land of Egypt. I am the LORD your God." ⁴⁴Moses declared the appointed times of the LORD to the Israelites.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This chapter presents the complete liturgical calendar of Israel — seven appointed times that structure the sacred year. Unlike the offering laws (ch 1-7), which describe what to bring, chapter 23 describes when to come. The calendar transforms time itself into a medium of worship: certain days are set apart as holy, creating a rhythm of work and sacred assembly that governs Israelite life from seedtime to harvest.
2. The key term mo'adei YHWH ('appointed times of the LORD') — not 'feasts' (KJV) — establishes divine ownership of the calendar. These are not Israel's holidays but God's appointments. The phrase miqra'ei qodesh ('sacred assemblies,' literally 'holy convocations/callings') describes the public, corporate nature of each occasion: the community is called together (from qara, 'to call'). The emphatic ending — elleh hem mo'aday ('these are My appointed times') — uses the first-person possessive twice: these times belong to God.
3. The Sabbath leads the calendar — listed before the annual festivals because it is the foundational rhythm. Shabbat shabbaton ('Sabbath of complete rest') is the intensified form (as in Exod 31:15). The phrase bekhol moshvotekhem ('wherever you dwell') makes the Sabbath location-independent: unlike the annual festivals that require pilgrimage to the central sanctuary, the Sabbath is observed in every home, every village, every place Israel lives. It is the most democratic of the appointed times.
4. A transitional verse that reintroduces the calendar formula before the annual festivals begin. The phrase bemo'adam ('at their appointed time') emphasizes calendrical precision: each festival has a specific date that must be observed. The community is responsible for proclamation (tiqre'u — 'you shall proclaim/call'), making the calendar a public, communal responsibility.
5. The annual calendar begins with Pesach (Passover) — bachodesh hari'shon be'arba'ah asar lachodesh bein ha'arbayim ('in the first month, on the fourteenth day, between the evenings'). The phrase pesach laYHWH ('Passover to/of the LORD') identifies it as God's festival: the Passover is not Israel's celebration of their own escape but God's appointed commemoration of His rescue. The timing — bein ha'arbayim ('between the evenings,' i.e., twilight) — marks the transition from the fourteenth to the fifteenth of Nisan, the moment the exodus began.
6. Chag haMatzot ('Festival of Unleavened Bread') begins the day after Passover and lasts seven days. The seven-day duration creates a week-long immersion in the exodus memory. Matzot — bread made without leaven (yeast) — recalls the haste of the departure: there was no time for dough to rise (Exod 12:39). Eating matzot for a full week embeds the exodus into the body: for seven days, every meal tastes like liberation.
7. The first day of Unleavened Bread is a miqra-qodesh ('sacred assembly') with work restrictions. The phrase melekhet avodah ('laborious/regular work') is a less absolute prohibition than the Sabbath's kol-melakhah ('all work') — essential tasks may be permitted. The distinction between full Sabbath rest and festival rest creates two levels of sacred time in the calendar.

8. Fire offerings (issheh) for all seven days — the festival is sustained by daily sacrifice. The seventh day mirrors the first (v7) with its own sacred assembly and work restriction, framing the week with two days of heightened holiness. The Passover-Unleavened Bread complex (v5-8) is the first major festival block: exodus commemoration stretched across eight days (Passover evening + seven days of matzot).
9. A new speech introduces the third appointed time: the firstfruits offering (v9-14). This festival bridges the Passover season and the harvest, connecting liberation to provision.
10. The firstfruits (reshit qetsirkhem — 'the beginning of your harvest') offering presupposes settlement in the land: ki-tavo'u el-ha'arets ('when you enter the land'). This is a forward-looking instruction — Israel in the wilderness is being taught festivals they will celebrate after conquest. The omer ('sheaf') is a bundle of newly cut barley, the earliest grain to ripen in spring. Bringing the first sheaf to the priest before eating any of the new harvest acknowledges that the land's produce belongs to God before it belongs to the farmer.
11. The priest performs a tenufah ('wave/elevation offering') with the sheaf — presenting it before the LORD. The timing mimmacharot hashShabbat ('the day after the Sabbath') is debated: it may mean the day after the first day of Unleavened Bread (a festival 'sabbath') or the day after the weekly Sabbath during the festival week. This ambiguity generated significant disagreement between Pharisees and Sadducees. The firstfruits wave offering is the starting point for counting toward Shavuot (v15-16).
12. The firstfruits ceremony includes a burnt offering (olah) — a year-old male lamb, tamim ('unblemished'). The grain offering of the sheaf is accompanied by an animal offering, combining agricultural and pastoral worship. The firstfruits are not just about grain; the entire sacrificial system accompanies the harvest thanksgiving.
13. Three elements: burnt offering (v12), grain offering (minchah — two-tenths ephah of flour with oil), and drink offering (nesekh — a quarter hin of wine, approximately one quart). The combination of lamb, grain, oil, and wine represents the full agricultural spectrum. The firstfruits ceremony is a miniature harvest festival celebrating every product of the land.
14. Three forms of grain — lechem ('bread'), qali ('roasted grain'), and karmel ('fresh/green kernels') — are prohibited until the firstfruits offering has been made. No new harvest produce may be consumed before God receives His portion. The prohibition creates a practical, embodied acknowledgment: every year, the farmer waits for the offering before eating. Hunger itself becomes a form of worship — the body reminds the soul that God comes first. The designation chuqqat olam ('permanent statute') makes this perpetual.
15. The counting of the omer (sefirat ha'omer) begins the day after the firstfruits wave offering and continues for seven weeks (sheva shabbatot temimot — 'seven complete sabbaths/weeks'). This forty-nine-day count connects Passover to Shavuot, creating a bridge between liberation and covenant. The counting is personal — usefartem lakhem ('count for yourselves') — each person marks the days individually. Jewish tradition continues this practice to this day.
16. The fiftieth day — chamishim yom ('fifty days') — is Shavuot, the Festival of Weeks (later called Pentecost, from the Greek for 'fifty'). The 'new grain offering' (minchah chadashah) is from the wheat harvest, the later and more valuable crop (barley was the firstfruits offering). Shavuot is the only festival defined not by a calendar date but by counting from another festival — it exists in relationship to Passover, not independently.
17. A remarkable instruction: chametz te'afenah ('they shall be baked with leaven'). The Shavuot loaves are leavened — unlike virtually every other grain offering in the sacrificial system (Lev 2:11 prohibits leaven). The exception makes a statement: at Shavuot, ordinary leavened bread — the everyday food of the household — is elevated to sacred status. The festival celebrates the wheat harvest by presenting the actual bread people eat, not the specialized unleavened ritual bread. Daily life becomes an offering.
18. The Shavuot sacrificial ensemble is substantial: seven lambs, one bull, two rams — all as olot (burnt offerings) with accompanying minchot and nesakhim. The scale exceeds any other festival's daily offering. The abundance reflects the harvest's bounty: the greatest agricultural celebration demands the greatest sacrificial response. Wheat harvest is the moment of maximum provision, and maximum provision calls for maximum worship.
19. The offering suite includes a chata't (purification offering — one goat) and shelamim (peace offering — two lambs). The combination of olah, chata't, and shelamim makes Shavuot a complete festival: total devotion (burnt offering), purification (sin offering), and communal celebration (peace offering). The shelamim — the only offering the worshipper eats — ensures that Shavuot is a feast, not just a ritual.
20. The wave offering combines the leavened bread and the two shelamim lambs — the priest presents them as a unit before the LORD. After the elevation, they become qodesh laYHWH lakkohen ('holy to the LORD, for the priest'). The firstfruits bread and the peace offering lambs are the priest's allotment from Shavuot — sacred food that sustains those who serve at the altar.
21. Shavuot receives the standard festival designations: miqra-qodesh ('sacred assembly'), work restriction (no melekhet avodah), and chuqqat olam ('permanent statute'). The emphasis be'etsem hayyom hazzeh ('on that very day') pins the observance to the fiftieth day exactly. Shavuot is a single-day festival — the shortest of the three pilgrimage festivals — but its theological weight as the conclusion of the Passover-to-harvest sequence is enormous.
22. A social justice provision inserted into the harvest festival: lo-tekhalleh pe'at sadekha ('do not completely harvest the edges of your field'). The pe'ah ('corner/edge') and leqet ('gleanings' — grain that falls during harvesting) must be left for the poor (ani) and the foreigner (ger). The placement within the Shavuot legislation connects worship to justice: celebrating the harvest before God obligates sharing it with the vulnerable. The closing formula ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God') grounds the command in divine authority — generosity is not optional charity but covenant obligation.

- 23. A new speech introduces the autumn festival cluster: Trumpets (v23-25), Day of Atonement (v26-32), and Tabernacles (v33-43). The calendar shifts from the spring-summer agricultural cycle to the seventh month — Tishrei — which contains the three most solemn observances of the year.
- 24. Yom Teru'ah ('Day of Trumpet Blast') — the first day of the seventh month (later known as Rosh Hashanah, 'head of the year'). The phrase zikkhron teru'ah ('memorial of trumpet blasts') combines remembrance (zikkhron — calling something to mind) with the shofar blast (teru'ah — a piercing, broken sound). The trumpet sound calls God and Israel to mutual attention: God remembers Israel; Israel remembers God. The seventh month opens with a sound — before any sacrifice, before any instruction, there is the blast of the horn. It is a wake-up call for the soul.
- 25. The Day of Trumpets receives the standard festival framework: no regular work and fire offerings. The offerings for this day are detailed in Numbers 29:1-6. The brevity of the Trumpets legislation (only v24-25) compared to the more elaborate treatments of Yom Kippur and Sukkot may reflect its role as a preparatory day — the opening of the solemn season rather than its climax.
- 26. The Day of Atonement — Yom Kippur — receives its own divine speech, underscoring its unique gravity. This is the only day in the calendar with a full Sabbath-level work prohibition (v28) and the explicit requirement of 'afflicting the soul' (v27).
- 27. Yom haKippurim ('Day of Atonements' — plural, encompassing all the atonement acts performed) falls on the tenth of Tishrei, nine days after the trumpet blast. The unique requirement ve'innitem et-nafshoteikhem ('you shall afflict your souls/selves') traditionally means fasting and abstaining from comfort. The term innuy ('affliction, self-denial') creates a day unlike any other: not celebration but purgation, not feasting but fasting. The full Yom Kippur ritual is described in Leviticus 16; this chapter provides the calendrical and communal framework.
- 28. The work prohibition is absolute: kol-melakhah lo ta'asu ('all work you must not do') — full Sabbath-level restriction, not the festival-level 'regular work' prohibition. Yom Kippur is the only annual festival with the same total work ban as the weekly Sabbath. The reason clause — ki yom kippurim hu lekha'per aleikhem ('for it is a Day of Atonement, to make atonement for you') — connects the rest to the ritual: you stop all activity so the atonement can be accomplished on your behalf.
- 29. The penalty for failing to observe Yom Kippur is karet — being cut off. The specific offense is not working (as on the Sabbath) but failing to 'afflict the soul' (lo te'unneh). Self-denial — fasting, abstaining from comfort — is mandatory, not voluntary. The individual who refuses to participate in the communal act of purgation removes themselves from the covenant community.
- 30. A second penalty, even more severe: God will personally destroy (veha'avadi — 'I will cause to perish') anyone who works on Yom Kippur. The first-person divine agency is unusual — most penalties are administered by the community or left to divine providence, but here God takes direct action. The double penalty (karet for not fasting, divine destruction for working) makes Yom Kippur the most strictly enforced day in the calendar.
- 31. The work prohibition is restated for emphasis — the third time in five verses (v28, 30, 31). The chuqqat olam designation makes it permanent; bekhlo moshvotekhem ('wherever you dwell') makes it universal. Like the Sabbath (v3), Yom Kippur applies everywhere, not just at the sanctuary. The nation stops entirely: no work, no food, no comfort — a full day of corporate stillness before God.
- 32. Shabbat shabbaton — the same intensified form used for the weekly Sabbath (v3) and nowhere else in the festival calendar. The timing is precisely specified: betish'ah lachodesh ba'erev me'erev ad-erev ('on the ninth of the month at evening, from evening to evening'). The fast begins at sunset on the ninth — the transition to the tenth — and continues until sunset on the tenth. This sunset-to-sunset framework defines 'day' in biblical terms: evening first, then morning (Gen 1:5).
- 33. The seventh and final mo'ed: Sukkot, the Festival of Tabernacles/Booths (v33-43). The longest festival in the calendar at eight days, it is also the most joyful — following the solemnity of Yom Kippur with a week of celebration, dwelling in temporary shelters, and communal feasting.
- 34. Chag haSukkot ('Festival of Shelters/Booths/Tabernacles') begins on the fifteenth of Tishrei — five days after Yom Kippur — and lasts seven days. Sukkot is the autumn harvest festival, celebrating the ingathering of crops at the end of the agricultural year. The sukkah ('shelter, booth') is a temporary structure that commemorates Israel's wilderness journey: for seven days, Israelites leave their permanent homes and dwell in improvised shelters, reenacting the vulnerability and dependence of the desert years.
- 35. The first day of Sukkot follows the standard festival pattern: sacred assembly, no regular work. The seven-day span (v34) with sacred bookends on the first and eighth days (v35-36) creates a week framed by holiness.
- 36. Fire offerings for all seven days — the daily sacrifices for Sukkot are the most elaborate in the calendar (see Num 29:12-38, with decreasing numbers of bulls over seven days). The eighth day (bayyom hashmini) is the atseret ('closing assembly, solemn gathering') — a concluding day that caps the festival season. The atseret is not technically part of Sukkot's seven days but an additional day of assembly. In later Jewish practice, this became Shemini Atseret, a separate holiday. The autumn festival season — Trumpets (day 1), Atonement (day 10), Sukkot (days 15-21), and Atseret (day 22) — spans the entire seventh month.
- 37. A summary formula: elleh mo'adei YHWH ('these are the LORD's appointed times'). Four offering categories are listed: olah ('burnt offering'), minchah ('grain offering'), zevach ('sacrifice' — specifically the shelamim/peace offering), and nesakhim ('drink offerings'). The phrase devar-yom beyomo ('each day's matter on its day') — the same phrase used for the daily manna (Exod 16:4) — insists that each festival has its specific, prescribed offerings that must be presented on the correct day.
- 38. The festivals supplement, not replace, four other categories: shabbatot YHWH ('the LORD's Sabbaths' — weekly), mattenoteikhem ('your gifts'), nidreikhem ('your vows' — promised offerings), and nidvoteikhem ('your freewill offerings' — spontaneous generosity). The phrase millevad ('in addition to') appears four times, emphasizing that the festival calendar operates on top of all other forms of worship. The festivals add to the baseline; they do not substitute for it.

39. The Sukkot legislation is restated with an agricultural framing: be'ospekem et-tevu'at ha'arets ('when you have gathered in the produce of the land'). The ingathering (asif) — the final harvest of fruits, olives, and grapes — is the agricultural occasion. Two days of shabbaton ('complete rest') bracket the week: the first and eighth days. The celebration is chag YHWH ('the LORD's festival') — as in v2, the possessive insists these are God's times, not Israel's.
40. The four species (arba'ah minim in later Jewish practice): peri ets hadar ('fruit of a splendid tree' — traditionally the etrog/citron), kappot temarim ('palm branches' — the lulav), anaf ets-avot ('boughs of leafy trees' — traditionally myrtle), and arvei-nachal ('willows of the brook'). These four plants, taken together and waved during worship, represent the full range of Israel's landscape: orchard, palm grove, forest, and riverside. The command usemachtem ('you shall rejoice') makes joy mandatory — Sukkot is the festival of commanded joy. After the austerity of Yom Kippur, joy is not merely permitted but required.
41. Sukkot receives the chuqqat olam ('permanent statute') designation — the annual celebration is perpetual. The specification bachodesh hashevi'i ('in the seventh month') anchors the festival calendrically. The autumn cluster in the seventh month (Trumpets day 1, Atonement day 10, Sukkot days 15-22) creates the most concentrated period of sacred time in the entire year.
42. The dwelling requirement: bassukkot teshvu shiv'at yamim ('in shelters you shall dwell seven days'). The sukkah is not a symbolic gesture but an actual residence — Israelites leave their houses and live in temporary structures for a week. The inclusive scope — kol-ha'ezrach beYisra'el ('every native-born in Israel') — makes this universal for citizens. The sukkah experience is deliberately uncomfortable: it teaches dependence, vulnerability, and the memory of a time when permanent shelter was not available.
43. The theological rationale: lema'an yede'u doroteikhem ('so that your generations may know'). The sukkah commemorates the wilderness period: ki bassukkot hoshavti et-benei Yisra'el ('I made the Israelites dwell in shelters'). The temporary structure teaches each generation what their ancestors experienced — total dependence on God for shelter, food, and direction. The closing divine signature ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God') seals the entire festival calendar with the same identity that opened the Decalogue (Exod 20:2, Deut 5:6). The calendar begins and ends with 'I am the LORD.'
44. The chapter's closing verse: vaydabber Mosheh et-mo'adei YHWH el-benei Yisra'el ('Moses declared the LORD's appointed times to the Israelites'). Moses is the transmitter — he receives the calendar from God and delivers it to the people. The final word is Yisra'el: the calendar belongs to the LORD (mo'adei YHWH) but is given to Israel. Seven appointed times — Sabbath, Passover/Matzot, Firstfruits, Shavuot, Trumpets, Yom Kippur, Sukkot — structure the entire sacred year, from liberation (Passover) through harvest (Shavuot) through atonement (Yom Kippur) to dwelling with God (Sukkot). The calendar is the story of redemption told in time.

Summary: Instructions for the perpetual lamp (ner tamid) and the twelve loaves of showbread (lechem hapanim) in the tabernacle. A narrative interrupts: a man of mixed parentage blasphemes the Name, and God prescribes death by stoning. The chapter concludes with the lex talionis principle -- life for life, eye for eye.

What Makes This Remarkable: The juxtaposition of sacred objects (lamp, bread) and blasphemy creates a jarring literary effect -- worship and violation of the Name sit side by side. The twelve loaves represent the twelve tribes perpetually "before the face" of God. The blasphemer is of mixed parentage (Israelite mother, Egyptian father), raising the question of who is bound by Israel's holiness standards. The lex talionis ("eye for eye") is a principle of proportional justice, not a license for revenge.

Translation Friction: We rendered lechem hapanim as "bread of the Presence" (literally "bread of the face") to preserve the spatial theology -- the bread is always "before God's face." The verb noqev ("blasphemed," v11) specifically means "to pierce, to bore through" the Name -- an active penetration, not mere carelessness. The ger ("foreigner," v22) is subject to the same judicial standards as the native, and we rendered the legal formula to show this equality explicitly.

Connections: The ner tamid tradition in synagogues descends from vv 2-4. David eats the showbread in 1 Sam 21:1-6, which Jesus cites in Matt 12:3-4. The lex talionis appears also in Exod 21:23-25 and Deut 19:21; Jesus engages it in Matt 5:38-39. The "one law for native and foreigner" principle (v22) echoes Exod 12:49 and Num 15:16.

1The LORD spoke to Moses: 2Direct the Israelites to bring you clear, pressed olive oil for illumination, to keep a lamp burning at all times. 3Outside the curtain of the Testimony, in the Tent of Meeting, Aaron is to tend it from evening until morning in the LORD's presence without interruption — a permanent rule throughout your generations. 4On the pure gold lampstand he must arrange the lamps before the LORD at all times. 5You are to take choice flour and bake twelve loaves, with two-tenths of an ephah in each loaf. 6Arrange them in two rows of six on the pure table before the LORD. 7Place pure frankincense on each row; it will serve as the memorial portion for the bread — a fire offering to the LORD. ⁸Sabbath after Sabbath he is to arrange it before the LORD without fail — an obligation from the Israelites as a permanent covenant. ⁹It belongs to Aaron and his sons, and they must eat it in a sacred space, because it is a most holy portion for him from the LORD's fire offerings — a permanent rule. ¹⁰The son of an Israelite mother — his father was Egyptian — went out among the Israelites, and a fight broke out in the camp between this man and a native Israelite. ¹¹The Israelite woman's son profaned the Name and uttered curses. They brought him to Moses. His mother's name was Shelomith daughter of Dibri, from the tribe of Dan. ¹²They held him in custody until the LORD's decision could be made clear to them. ¹³Then the LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁴Take the one who cursed outside the camp. All who heard him must press their hands on his head, and the entire assembly is to stone him. ¹⁵Speak to the Israelites and tell them: Anyone who curses his God will bear the consequences of that sin. ¹⁶Whoever profanes the name of the LORD must be put to death; the entire assembly must stone that person. Whether resident alien or native-born, anyone who profanes the Name must die. ¹⁷Anyone who takes a human life must be put to death. ¹⁸Whoever kills an animal must make restitution for it — a life in place of a life. ¹⁹If anyone inflicts a permanent injury on a fellow citizen, what was done must be done in return — ²⁰fracture for fracture, eye for eye, tooth for tooth — whatever injury someone inflicts on another person must be imposed on the offender. ²¹Whoever kills an animal must replace it, but whoever kills a person must be put to death. ²²You must maintain a single standard of justice — the same for the resident alien as for the native-born — because I am the LORD your God. ²³Moses relayed this to the Israelites. They took the one who had cursed outside the camp and stoned him. The Israelites carried out exactly what the LORD had commanded Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard revelation formula vaydabber YHWH el-Mosheh le'mor introduces a new legislative section. The shift from narrative to direct divine speech marks the instructions about the lampstand oil (vv 2-4) and the showbread (vv 5-9) as distinct from the preceding chapter's festival calendar.
2. The verb tsav ('command, direct') is stronger than dabber ('speak'), signaling obligatory compliance. The oil is described with three qualifiers: shemen zayit ('olive oil'), zakh ('clear, pure' — free of sediment), and katit ('crushed, pressed' — first pressing, yielding the finest oil). The term ner tamid ('perpetual lamp') becomes foundational in later Jewish tradition for the eternal light maintained in synagogues.
3. The parokhet ha-edut ('curtain of the Testimony') separates the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place where the ark rests. The lamp burns mi-erev ad-boqer ('from evening until morning'), indicating nighttime tending — the priestly duty of maintaining divine light through darkness. The phrase chuqqat olam ledoroteikhem ('a permanent statute throughout your generations') stamps this as perpetually binding law, not a temporary wilderness arrangement.
4. The menorah ha-tehorah ('the pure lampstand') refers to the seven-branched lampstand of pure gold described in Exodus 25:31-40. The adjective tehorah ('pure') denotes both ritual cleanness and the unblemished quality of the gold. The verb ya'arokh ('arrange, set in order') implies trimming the wicks and refilling oil — ongoing priestly maintenance, not merely lighting. The parashah marker (pe) signals a textual break before the showbread instructions.
5. The solet ('choice flour, semolina') is the finest grade of wheat flour, sifted to remove coarse bran — the same quality used for grain offerings (Lev 2:1). The twelve challot ('loaves') correspond to the twelve tribes of Israel, making the bread a communal representation before God. Each loaf contains shenei esronim ('two-tenths'), approximately four liters of flour — a substantial loaf signaling abundance rather than token symbolism.
6. The ma'arakhot ('rows, arrangements') comes from the same root (ayin-resh-kaf) as the verb for tending the lampstand in v 3, linking these two acts of sacred ordering. The shulchan ha-tahor ('the pure table') is the gold-overlaid table described in Exodus 25:23-30. The systematic arrangement — two rows, six each — mirrors the tribal structure and places all of Israel symbolically in God's presence.
7. The levonah zakkah ('pure frankincense') is placed on the rows, not mixed into the bread itself. The azkarah ('memorial portion') is a technical sacrificial term indicating the part burned on the altar that 'reminds' God of the offerer — it represents the whole offering ascending to the LORD. The bread itself is eaten by the priests (v 9), but the frankincense is burned as an isheh ('fire offering'), completing the dual function of the showbread: sustenance for the priests and fragrant offering for God.
8. The emphatic repetition beyom ha-shabbat beyom ha-shabbat ('on the Sabbath day, on the Sabbath day') is a Hebrew distributive construction meaning 'every single Sabbath without exception.' The phrase berit olam ('permanent covenant') elevates the showbread practice beyond mere ritual regulation to a covenant obligation — the same term applied to circumcision (Gen 17:13) and the Sabbath itself (Exod 31:16). The bread thus becomes a weekly covenant renewal, with Israel's twelve tribes perpetually represented in God's presence.
9. The designation qodesh qodashim ('most holy') places the showbread in the highest sanctity category alongside the sin offering and guilt offering (Lev 6:17, 7:1). The requirement to eat it be-maqom qadosh ('in a holy place') restricts consumption to the tabernacle courtyard. The phrase choq olam ('permanent rule') closes the showbread section just as chuqqat olam closed the lampstand section in v 3, forming a structural parallel between these two perpetual sanctuary duties. The setumah marker (samekh) signals a closed paragraph break before the narrative shifts.

10. The abrupt narrative shift from ritual law to a specific incident is characteristic of Levitical case law. The man's mixed parentage (ben-ishah yisre'elit... ben-ish mitsri) is central to the story: his ambiguous social status may have triggered the dispute. The verb vayyetse ('went out') implies he entered a space among the Israelites where his belonging was contested. The verb vayyinatso ('they quarreled, fought') is a hitpa'el form from natsah, indicating mutual, escalating conflict — not a one-sided attack.
11. The verb vayyiqov ('he pierced, pronounced distinctly') from the root nun-qof-bet is ambiguous — it can mean either to 'pierce, blaspheme' or to 'pronounce explicitly.' Combined with vayqallel ('and he cursed'), it indicates he both spoke the divine Name aloud and reviled it. The text refers to ha-Shem ('the Name') rather than writing YHWH as the object of blasphemy, a notable reverence even in describing the offense. Shelomith's genealogy — bat-Divri le-matteh Dan — is unusually detailed for a woman in Leviticus, perhaps to establish that her son had legitimate Israelite lineage through his mother despite his Egyptian father.
12. The mishmar ('custody, guard') is a temporary holding — not a prison sentence but a pause while awaiting divine guidance. The infinitive lifrosh ('to make distinct, to clarify') from parash indicates the community lacked a precedent for this offense and needed explicit divine ruling. The phrase al-pi YHWH ('by the mouth/word of the LORD') shows that Moses did not presume to adjudicate but waited for direct revelation. This parallels the wood-gatherer case in Numbers 15:34, where identical language describes a similar procedural pause.
13. The repeated formula vaydabber YHWH el-Mosheh le'mor here marks the divine response to the inquiry of v 12. Unlike v 1 which introduces general legislation, this occurrence responds to a specific legal crisis — the community's uncertainty about the penalty for blasphemy. The answer that follows (vv 14-23) expands beyond the individual case to establish broad principles of proportional justice.
14. Three procedural steps are specified: removal from the camp (hotse... el-michuts la-machaneh), hand-laying by witnesses (vesamkhu kol ha-shom'im et yedeihem al rosho), and communal execution (veragmu oto kol ha-edah). The semikhah ('leaning, pressing') of hands transfers culpability back to the offender — the witnesses publicly confirm their testimony and place the consequence squarely on him. Execution occurs outside the camp to prevent the defilement of sacred space. The entire assembly (kol ha-edah) participates, making this a communal act of covenant enforcement rather than individual vengeance.
15. The doubling ish ish ('man man,' meaning 'any person whatsoever') creates a universalizing construction — no one is exempt. The phrase venasa chet'o ('he shall bear his sin') is a technical formula in Leviticus indicating the offender absorbs the full penalty rather than transferring it through sacrifice (cf. Lev 5:1, 17; 7:18; 19:8). Notably, this verse uses the generic elohav ('his God') rather than the specific name YHWH, possibly broadening the prohibition: cursing any deity one claims to worship brings culpability, though v 16 specifies that profaning YHWH's name carries the death penalty.
16. Two intensified infinitive absolute constructions — mot yumat ('dying he shall die') and ragom yirgemu ('stoning they shall stone') — underscore the certainty and severity of the penalty. The phrase ka-ger ka-ezrach ('as the immigrant, as the native-born') is a legal equalizer that appears again in v 22: the sanctity of God's name applies irrespective of ethnic or social status. This is especially pointed given that the offender in the triggering incident (v 10) was of mixed parentage. The same law governs everyone within the covenant community.
17. The verb yakkeh ('strikes') from nakah paired with kol-nefesh adam ('any human life') extends the principle broadly — the life in view is nefesh ('living being, person'), emphasizing the victim's personhood. The mot yumat formula ('he shall certainly die') matches the penalty for blasphemy in v 16, placing murder and blasphemy in the same severity category: both violate the image and name of God. This verse begins a series (vv 17-21) establishing the talion principle — proportional justice — before returning to the blasphemy case.
18. The verb yeshallemennah ('he shall make it complete, restore it') from the root shalem indicates full financial compensation: the offender replaces the animal, restoring the owner to wholeness. The phrase nefesh tachat nafesh ('life in place of life') here applies to animals and means equivalent replacement, not retaliatory killing — a crucial interpretive distinction. The same tachat ('in place of, instead of') structure governs the human talion laws in vv 19-20, but the animal context here demonstrates that the principle can be satisfied through restitution rather than literal replication.
19. The phrase yitten mum ('gives a defect, inflicts a blemish') uses mum, the same term applied to disqualifying defects in sacrificial animals (Lev 22:20-25) and priests (Lev 21:17-21). The injury is thus a lasting disfigurement, not a minor wound. The word amito ('his fellow, his associate') implies a member of the covenant community. The principle ka'asher asah ken ye'aseh lo ('as he did, so it shall be done to him') establishes lex talionis — proportional equivalence — as the governing standard. The verse trails into v 20 syntactically, with the specific examples following.
20. The three-part talion formula — shever tachat shever, ayin tachat ayin, shen tachat shen — moves from severe to moderate injury, establishing that proportionality governs all levels of bodily harm. The preposition tachat ('in place of, corresponding to') is the key legal term: it demands equivalence, not escalation. Ancient Near Eastern parallels (Code of Hammurabi §§196-201) show similar formulations, but Leviticus uniquely applies the principle equally regardless of social class (see v 22). Rabbinic tradition (b. Bava Qamma 83b-84a) interprets these as requiring monetary compensation equivalent to the injury, not literal physical retaliation.
21. This verse creates a sharp chiasmic contrast: animal death requires restitution (yeshallemennah — 'he shall pay it back'), while human death demands execution (yumat — 'he shall die'). The juxtaposition reinforces the incommensurable value of human life — a nefesh adam ('human being') cannot be compensated with property or payment. The resumption of the animal restitution principle from v 18 frames the talion laws (vv 19-20) as a bounded unit within the larger structure, and the concise parallel phrasing — umakkeh vehemah... umakkeh adam — drives the distinction home with rhetorical force.

- 22. The declaration mishpat echad ('one judgment, a single standard') is a foundational principle of Israelite jurisprudence: legal equality before God. The ger ('resident alien, immigrant') and ezrach ('native-born citizen') pairing, repeated from v 16, bookends the legal section with the demand for impartial justice. The grounding clause ki ani YHWH eloheikhem ('because I am the LORD your God') anchors legal equality in divine identity — God's own character requires uniform justice. This is particularly significant in context: the offender who triggered the case was of mixed parentage (v 10), and the law refuses to treat him differently.
- 23. The narrative resumes from v 12, closing the frame: the man held in custody receives the sentence decreed in v 14. The phrase vayyirgemu oto even ('they stoned him with stone') uses the cognate accusative for emphasis — the act is definitive. The concluding formula uvene Yisrael asu ka'asher tsivah YHWH et Mosheh ('the Israelites did as the LORD had commanded Moses') certifies communal obedience and mirrors the obedience formulae in the tabernacle construction narratives (Exod 39-40). The petucha marker (pe) closes the entire chapter as a major textual unit.

Summary: God institutes the sabbatical year (every seventh year the land rests) and the Jubilee (every fiftieth year all land returns to original families and all Israelite slaves go free). Economic regulations prevent permanent impoverishment: land cannot be sold permanently because it belongs to God, and Israelite persons cannot be permanently enslaved.

What Makes This Remarkable: The land is personified as a sabbath-keeper -- veshavetah ha'arets ("the land itself shall observe a sabbath"). The theological foundation is radical: ki li ha'arets ("the land is Mine," v23). Israel does not own the land; they are "foreigners and tenants" with God as landlord. The Jubilee prevents the permanent accumulation of wealth and the permanent dispossession of families, encoding economic justice into the calendar itself.

Translation Friction: We rendered shabbat shabbaton as "sabbath of complete rest" consistently with its use for Yom Kippur (23:32) and the weekly Sabbath (Exod 31:15), showing the land receives the same quality of rest as God's people. The term deror ("liberty," v10) is the word inscribed on the Liberty Bell -- we rendered it "release" in context while noting its resonance. The phrase gerim vetoshavim ("foreigners and tenants," v23) describes Israel's status before God, and we preserved the humbling force.

Connections: Jesus reads Isa 61:1-2 in the Nazareth synagogue (Luke 4:16-21), declaring the Jubilee fulfilled. Jeremiah's field purchase during siege (Jer 32) enacts land-redemption theology. The sabbatical year connects to the manna provision (Exod 16:22-30) and the creation Sabbath (Gen 2:2-3). The exile is interpreted as the land receiving its missed sabbaths (2 Chr 36:21).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses on Mount Sinai, saying: ²Speak to the children of Israel and say to them: When you enter the land that I am giving you, the land itself shall observe a sabbath rest to the LORD. ³For six years you shall sow your field, and for six years you shall prune your vineyard and gather its produce. ⁴But in the seventh year there shall be a sabbath of complete rest for the land — a sabbath to the LORD. You shall not sow your field or prune your vineyard. ⁵You shall not harvest what grows on its own from your previous crop, and you shall not gather the grapes of your untended vine. It shall be a year of complete rest for the land. ⁶The sabbath produce of the land shall serve as food for you — for you, for your male and female servants, for your hired workers, and for the resident foreigners who live among you. ⁷And for your livestock and for the wild animals in your land — all its produce shall be available for food. ⁸You shall count seven sabbaths of years — seven times seven years — so that the period of seven sabbaths of years comes to forty-nine years. ⁹Then you shall sound the ram's horn with a loud blast on the tenth day of the seventh month — on the Day of Atonement you shall sound the ram's horn throughout your entire land. ¹⁰You shall consecrate the fiftieth year and proclaim release throughout the land to all its inhabitants. It shall be a Jubilee for you: each of you shall return to his own property, and each of you shall return to his own family. ¹¹That fiftieth year shall be a Jubilee for you. You shall not sow, and you shall not harvest what grows on its own, and you shall not gather the grapes of the untended vines. ¹²For it is the Jubilee — it shall be holy to you. You may eat its produce directly from the field. ¹³In this Jubilee year, each person shall return to his own property. ¹⁴When you sell anything to your neighbor or buy from your neighbor, you shall not wrong one another. ¹⁵According to the number of years after the Jubilee you shall buy from your neighbor, and according to the number of years of harvests remaining he shall sell to you. ¹⁶When there are more years remaining, you shall increase the price; when there are fewer years remaining, you shall reduce the price, because what he is selling you is a number of harvests. ¹⁷You shall not exploit one another, but you shall fear your God, for I am the LORD your God. ¹⁸You shall carry out My statutes and observe My ordinances and do them, so that you may live on the land securely. ¹⁹The land will yield its fruit, and you will eat until you are full, and you will live on it securely. ²⁰And if you ask, 'What will we eat in the seventh year, since we are not sowing and not gathering our produce?' — ²¹I will command My blessing for you in the sixth year, so that it produces a crop sufficient for three years. ²²When you sow in the eighth year, you will still be eating from the stored produce. Until the ninth year, when its new crop comes in, you will be eating from the stored harvest. ²³The land must not be sold permanently, because the land is Mine. You are foreigners and tenants residing with Me. ²⁴Throughout all the land of your possession, you shall provide for the redemption of the land. ²⁵If your brother becomes poor and sells some of his property, his nearest kinsman-redeemer shall come and redeem what his brother has sold. ²⁶If a man has no kinsman-redeemer but his own means become sufficient for the redemption, ²⁷he shall calculate the years since the sale and refund the balance to the man who bought it, and he shall return to his property. ²⁸But if his means are not sufficient to recover it, what was sold shall remain with the buyer until the Jubilee year. In the Jubilee it shall be released, and he shall return to his property. ²⁹If a man sells a residence in a walled city, his right of redemption shall last until the end of the year of its sale. His right of redemption shall be for a full year. ³⁰If it is not redeemed within the full year, then the house in the walled city shall belong permanently to the buyer and his descendants. It shall not be released in the Jubilee. ³¹But houses in unwallled villages shall be classified as open farmland. They may be redeemed, and they shall be released in the Jubilee. ³²As for the Levitical cities — the houses in the cities of their possession — the Levites shall have a permanent right of redemption. ³³If a Levite does not redeem it, the sold house in the city of his possession shall still be released in the Jubilee, because the houses in the Levitical cities are their inheritance among the children of Israel. ³⁴The pasturelands around their cities may not be sold at all, because it is their permanent possession. ³⁵If your brother becomes poor and his hand falters beside you, you shall support him — whether he is a resident foreigner or a native — so that he may live alongside you. ³⁶Do not take interest or profit from him. Fear your God, so that your brother may live alongside you. ³⁷You shall not lend him your money at interest, nor provide your food for profit. ³⁸I am the LORD your God, who brought you out from the land of Egypt in order to give you the land of Canaan and to be God for you. ³⁹If your brother becomes poor beside you and sells himself to you, you shall not make him work as a slave. ⁴⁰He shall be treated as a hired worker, as a resident laborer with you. He shall serve with you until the Jubilee year. ⁴¹Then he shall go free from you — he and his children with him — and return to his family, and he shall return to the property of his ancestors. ⁴²For they are My servants — I brought them out of the land of Egypt. They shall not be sold as slaves are sold. ⁴³You shall not rule over him with harshness. You shall fear your God. ⁴⁴As for your male and female slaves whom you may have — from the nations around you, from them you may purchase male and female slaves. ⁴⁵Also from the children of the resident foreigners living among you — from them you may purchase, and from their families who are with you, whom they have fathered in your land. They may become your property. ⁴⁶You may bequeath them to your children after you as inherited property. You may use them as permanent workers. But over your brothers, the children of Israel — no one shall rule over his brother with harshness. ⁴⁷If a resident foreigner among you becomes wealthy while your brother beside him becomes poor and sells himself to the resident foreigner among you, or to a member of the foreigner's family, ⁴⁸After he is sold, a right of redemption remains for him. One of his brothers may redeem him. ⁴⁹His uncle, or his uncle's son, may redeem him, or any close relative from his family may redeem him. Or if his own means become sufficient, he may redeem himself. ⁵⁰He shall calculate with the one who bought him from the year he was sold to him until the Jubilee year. The price of his sale shall be based on the number of years — he shall be valued as if he were a hired worker for that period. ⁵¹If many years remain, he shall pay back his redemption price in proportion, based on the original purchase price. ⁵²If only a few years remain until the Jubilee year, he shall calculate accordingly and pay his redemption price based on those remaining years. ⁵³He shall be treated as a worker hired year by year. The foreigner shall not rule over him with harshness in your sight. ⁵⁴If he is not redeemed by these means, he shall still go free in the Jubilee year — he and his children with him. ⁵⁵For the children of Israel belong to Me as servants. They are My servants, whom I brought out of the land of Egypt. I am the LORD your God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The specific location 'on Mount Sinai' (behar sinai) is significant — most Levitical laws are introduced without specifying the location. The explicit Sinai setting anchors the land-sabbath and Jubilee legislation in the same covenant-making context as the Ten Commandments and the Book of the Covenant. This is not secondary legislation but foundational covenantal instruction about the land itself.
2. The phrase veshavetah ha'arets shabbat laYHWH ('the land shall keep a sabbath to the LORD') applies sabbath language — previously reserved for human rest (Exodus 20:8-11) — directly to the land itself. The land is personified as a sabbath-keeper. The verb form is feminine singular (shavetah) matching the feminine noun arets (land), treating the land as the subject who rests. This is not merely a human decision to stop farming — the land is granted its own sabbath by God.
3. The six-year work cycle mirrors the six days of labor before the weekly sabbath (Exodus 20:9). Two types of agriculture are named: grain farming (tizra sadekha — 'sow your field') and viticulture (tizmor karmekha — 'prune your vineyard'). Together they represent the full scope of Israelite agriculture.
4. The superlative phrase shabbat shabbaton ('sabbath of complete rest') uses the intensified form — the same phrase applied to Yom Kippur (23:32) and the weekly sabbath (Exodus 31:15). The land receives the same quality of rest that God commands for His people and His holiest day. The prohibitions are specific: no sowing (grain agriculture) and no pruning (vineyard management). The land rests from human cultivation.
5. The sefiach ('aftergrowth, volunteer crop') is grain that sprouts from fallen seeds of the previous harvest without intentional planting. The nezirekha ('your untended vine' — literally 'your nazir-vine,' a vine that has not been pruned) produces grapes without human intervention. Even these unplanned yields are not to be harvested commercially. The point is not that the produce goes to waste — verse 6 clarifies it may be eaten — but that organized agricultural commerce ceases entirely.
6. The sabbatical year's produce is available to everyone equally: the landowner (lekha), servants (avdekha va'amatekha), hired laborers (sekhirekha), and resident foreigners (toshavekha haggarim immakh). During the sabbath year, the social distinctions between these groups dissolve regarding access to the land's produce. The food is not owned by the landowner but belongs to all. This is a radical leveling of economic hierarchy.
7. The sabbatical provision extends beyond human society to livestock (behemah — domestic animals) and even wild animals (chayyah — wildlife). All creatures share equally in the land's rest. The section marker (samekh) closes the sabbatical year legislation. What follows (vv 8-55) is the Jubilee — a sabbath of sabbaths.
8. The Jubilee cycle is built on the sabbatical structure: seven cycles of seven years, totaling forty-nine years. The repetition of 'seven' (sheva) three times — seven sabbaths of years, seven years, seven times — emphasizes the completeness and sacred geometry of the cycle. Just as the seventh day is holy within the week, and the seventh year is holy within the agricultural cycle, the fiftieth year (following the seventh-seventh) is supremely holy.
9. The Jubilee begins not on New Year's Day but on Yom Kippur — the Day of Atonement (yom hakkippurim). The convergence of Jubilee and Atonement is theologically deliberate: the year of liberation and restoration begins on the day when the entire nation's sins are atoned for. Forgiveness of debt begins with forgiveness of sin. The shofar teruah ('ram's horn of loud blasting') is the same instrument used at Sinai (Exodus 19:16) and in warfare — it signals a decisive divine intervention.
10. Three actions define the Jubilee: (1) consecration (vekiddashtem — the fiftieth year is set apart as holy), (2) proclamation of deror ('release' — a comprehensive cancellation of debts, land transfers, and servitude), and (3) return (veshavtem — everyone goes back to their ancestral property and family). The verb tashuvu ('you shall return') echoes the root sh-u-v, which also carries the theological weight of repentance and restoration.
10. This verse is inscribed on the American Liberty Bell: 'Proclaim liberty throughout all the land unto all the inhabitants thereof.' The English word 'jubilee' derives from the Hebrew yovel through the Latin jubilaeus.
11. The Jubilee year has the same agricultural restrictions as the sabbatical year (vv 4-5). If the Jubilee falls in the year after a sabbatical year, this would mean two consecutive years without sowing — a severe test of trust in God's provision (addressed in vv 20-22).
12. The Jubilee is declared qodesh ('holy' — set apart for God). The provision min hasadeh ('from the field') means the produce may be consumed directly where it grows, without commercial harvesting and storage. This equalizes access — during the Jubilee, no one can monopolize the land's output.
13. The verb tashuvu ('you shall return') is emphatic — this is a command, not a suggestion. The achuzzah ('property, possession, inheritance') refers to the tribal land allocation from Joshua's time. The Jubilee principle is that the original divine distribution of land to the tribes and families cannot be permanently overridden by economic transactions.
14. The verb tonu ('wrong, exploit, take advantage of') from the root y-n-h prohibits economic exploitation in transactions. The relationship terms are significant: amitekha ('your fellow, your associate') and achiv ('his brother') frame commercial relationships within the language of kinship and community solidarity. Business ethics in Israel are covenantal obligations, not merely market norms.
15. This verse establishes the crucial economic principle of the Jubilee: land cannot be sold permanently. What is actually being sold is not the land itself but the number of harvests (shenei-tevu'ot — 'years of produce') until the next Jubilee. The price must reflect only the remaining crop years. This redefines land transactions as temporary leases, not permanent transfers of ownership.

16. The economic logic is explicit: the price is a function of remaining harvests (mispar tevu'ot — 'the number of produce-years'). The closing clause ki mispar tevu'ot hu mokher lakh ('for he is selling you a number of harvests') is a legal clarification that redefines what appears to be a land sale as a produce lease. The land itself belongs to God (v 23) and cannot be sold.
17. The phrase veyare'ta me'Elohekha ('you shall fear your God') is a conscience clause — it appears in Leviticus specifically where the exploitation would be difficult to detect or prosecute (see also 19:14, 19:32). When the law cannot catch the violator, the fear of God serves as the enforcement mechanism. The self-identification formula ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God') reinforces that God Himself is the guarantor of economic justice.
18. The conditional promise: obedience to the sabbatical and Jubilee laws is the condition for secure dwelling (vishavtem al ha'arets lavetach — 'you shall dwell on the land securely'). The word betach ('security, safety, confidence') is economic and military — no invaders, no famine, no anxiety about provision. The land's rest and the people's security are causally linked.
19. The land is again personified — it 'gives' (natnah) its fruit as a subject performing an action. The promise of eating lasova ('to satisfaction, to fullness') directly addresses the fear that motivates disobedience to the sabbatical law: 'What will we eat?' (v 20). God promises not mere survival but abundance.
20. God anticipates the practical objection before it is raised. The question mah nokhal ('what will we eat?') is the voice of reasonable anxiety — it is not condemned but addressed directly. The sabbatical year requires trusting God for provision in a way that goes against agricultural prudence. The system demands faith that God can provide through means other than human labor.
21. God's answer to the provision question is a promise of miraculous abundance: the sixth year's harvest will be large enough to sustain the people through the seventh year (sabbatical), the eighth year (when sowing resumes but the new crop has not yet come in), and into the ninth year (when the new crop is harvested). The verb tsiviti ('I will command') treats blessing as something God dispatches by sovereign order — He commands the earth to produce three years' worth of food in one year.
22. The timeline is precise: sow in year eight, but eat from the sixth year's stored surplus (yashan — 'old, stored') until the new crop of year nine arrives. God's provision is not hand-to-mouth but abundant — the stored food bridges the gap between sabbath rest and new production.
23. This verse is the theological cornerstone of the Jubilee. The word litsmitut ('permanently, in perpetuity') is negated — no permanent land sale is possible. The reason is stated as a first-person divine claim: ki li ha'arets ('for the land is Mine'). The Israelites are gerim vetoshavim ('strangers and sojourners') — the same terms used for landless foreigners living in Israel. Before God, even the native-born Israelite in his ancestral territory is a tenant, not an owner.
24. The Hebrew ge'ullah ('redemption') introduces the key legal concept that governs the rest of the chapter: the right of redemption. Every land sale must include the possibility of ge'ullah — the family's right to buy the land back. This right is not optional but mandatory: titnu ('you shall provide') is an imperative. The section marker (samekh) sets this verse apart as the heading principle for all the specific cases that follow.
25. The go'alo haqqarov elav ('his nearest kinsman-redeemer') introduces the go'el — the relative closest in kinship who bears the duty of redemption. The verb ga'al ('to redeem') is used three times in verses 25-26 (go'alo, vega'al, ge'ullah), emphasizing that this is the central legal concept. The go'el does not choose to redeem out of generosity; he is obligated by kinship. Failure to act as go'el is a failure of family duty.
25. This is the same go'el institution that drives the plot of Ruth: Boaz acts as go'el for Naomi's family, redeeming their land and marrying Ruth to preserve the family name.
26. The phrase lo yihyeh lo go'el ('he has no go'el') describes a person without close relatives — a devastating situation in a kinship-based society. However, self-redemption is possible if his economic situation improves (hissigah yado — 'his hand reaches,' the idiom for achieving financial capacity). Even without family support, the right of redemption remains.
27. The redemption price is not the full original sale price but the remaining value — the buyer keeps the value of the harvests he has already received, and the redeemer pays only for the years remaining until the Jubilee. The system is fair to both parties: the buyer receives the agreed-upon value of his purchase period, and the original family recovers their land.
28. The Jubilee is the ultimate safety net: even if neither a kinsman-redeemer nor the person himself can afford to redeem the land, the Jubilee automatically returns it. The verb yatsa ('go out, be released') is the same verb used for the exodus from Egypt — the land 'goes out' from the buyer's control just as Israel 'went out' from Pharaoh's control. The section marker (samekh) closes this land-redemption case.
29. Houses in walled cities follow different rules than agricultural land. The redemption window is limited to one full year (yamim — literally 'days,' meaning a complete year). After that, the sale becomes permanent (v 30). The distinction reflects economic reality: city houses are not part of the tribal land allocation in the same way that agricultural land is. Urban property is more commercially oriented.
30. The phrase latsmitut ('permanently, in perpetuity') — the same word denied to agricultural land in verse 23 — is permitted for urban houses. Walled-city houses are the only property in Israel that can be sold permanently and that are exempt from Jubilee release. This creates a two-tier system: agricultural land (God's domain, subject to Jubilee) and urban property (commercial, subject to market). The textual note [lo/lo] reflects a qere/ketiv variation in the Hebrew manuscript tradition regarding the spelling of 'which has' (lo) versus 'not' (lo) — a wall.
31. The distinction turns on the wall (chomah): walled cities have permanent sales; unwalled villages have Jubilee-eligible sales. Village houses (batei hachaterim — 'houses of the settlements') are classified as agricultural land (al sedeh ha'arets — 'as the field of the land') because they are part of the agricultural landscape, not separate urban zones. This classification preserves the Jubilee principle for rural communities.

32. The Levites receive a special provision: ge'ullat olam ('permanent redemption right') — their redemption right never expires. Since the Levites received no tribal land allocation (Numbers 18:20-24), their city houses are their only real property. If even these were subject to the one-year walled-city limit, Levites could lose everything permanently. The olam ('permanent, perpetual') ge'ullah protects them.
33. Even without active redemption, Levitical city houses revert at the Jubilee — the opposite of the walled-city rule in verse 30. The reasoning is explicit: ki batei arei halevi'im hi achuzzatam ('because the houses of the Levitical cities are their inheritance'). Since Levites have no agricultural land, their houses are equivalent to other tribes' farmland and must be protected by the Jubilee.
34. The Levitical pasturelands (sede migrash — 'open land of the pasture') cannot be sold under any circumstances — not even temporarily. The phrase achuzzat olam ('permanent possession') is the strongest property protection in the entire chapter. The Levitical system ensures that those who serve the sanctuary always have a place to live and pasture their animals. The section marker (samekh) closes the property-redemption section.
35. The phrase umatah yado ('his hand has fallen, his hand falters') is a vivid idiom for economic collapse — the hand that should work and produce has failed. The response commanded is vehechezaqta bo ('you shall strengthen him, you shall support him'). The protection extends beyond Israelites to gerim vetoshavim ('resident foreigners and sojourners') — the same terms applied to Israelites before God in verse 23. Economic support is universal within the community.
36. Two types of financial extraction are prohibited: neshekh ('interest' — literally 'bite,' from the root n-sh-kh, 'to bite') and tarbit ('increase, profit'). Charging interest on loans to a poor Israelite is equated with biting into their sustenance. The fear-of-God clause (veyare'ta me'Elohekha) appears again, as in verse 17 — interest-charging in private is undetectable by human courts but visible to God.
37. The prohibition covers both monetary loans (kaspo — 'your money') and food-based credit (okhlekha — 'your food, your provisions'). Both forms of lending to the poor — cash and kind — must be interest-free. In an agricultural economy, food loans at 'increase' (marbith — the food equivalent of interest) could be as devastating as monetary interest.
38. The exodus formula anchors economic ethics in salvation history. God's purpose in the exodus was twofold: to give the land (latet lakhem et erets Kena'an) and to be their God (lihyot lakhem le'Elohim). The covenant formula binds land-gift and divine relationship together — how Israel treats the land and its poor is inseparable from their relationship with the God who freed them. The section marker (samekh) closes the interest-prohibition unit.
39. The descent into poverty escalates: from land sale (v 25), to financial dependency (v 35), to debt-servitude (v 39). Each stage has its protective legislation. The prohibition lo ta'avod bo avodataved ('you shall not work him as a slave's work') distinguishes between indentured service and chattel slavery. An Israelite in debt-servitude retains his dignity — the work required of him must be different from what would be imposed on a permanent slave.
40. The Israelite debt-servant's legal status is explicitly defined: kesakir ketoshav ('like a hired worker, like a resident laborer') — not an owned slave but a worker with rights. His service is temporary — only until the Jubilee — and his treatment must match that of a free laborer. The phrasing ya'avod immakh ('he shall work with you') uses the preposition im ('with'), not the preposition le ('for'), suggesting a relationship of cooperation rather than domination.
41. The Jubilee releases the debt-servant and his entire family (hu uvanav immo — 'he and his children with him'). He returns to two things: his family (mishpachto) and his ancestral property (achuzzat avotav). The double return (veshav... yashuv) emphasizes completeness — the person is fully restored to both relational and economic standing.
42. The theological foundation for Israelite labor rights: ki avadai hem ('for they are My servants'). An Israelite already belongs to God — he cannot also belong to a human master. God's prior claim on Israel, established by the exodus, overrides any subsequent economic arrangement. The phrase mimkeretaved ('the sale of a slave') describes the commercial transaction of chattel slavery — Israelites may not be sold in this manner.
43. The word perekh ('harshness, severity, rigor') appears only six times in the Hebrew Bible: here, in verse 46, in verse 53, and three times in Exodus 1 describing Egyptian treatment of Israelite slaves (Exodus 1:13-14). The verbal echo is intentional: treating an Israelite debt-servant with perekh would replicate the very oppression from which God freed Israel. The fear-of-God clause appears for the third time in this chapter.
44. The text permits acquiring slaves from surrounding nations (haggoyim asher sevivoteikhem). The distinction between the treatment of Israelite debt-servants (vv 39-43) and foreign slaves (vv 44-46) is stark and morally difficult for modern readers. The text does not critique the institution of foreign slavery; it limits and regulates it. The Israelite is protected by covenant identity — 'My servants' (v 42) — but this protection does not extend to foreigners in the same way.
45. The permission extends to children of resident foreigners (benei hatoshavim haggarim immakhem) — those born in the land to non-Israelite families. The term achuzzah ('property, possession') applied to human beings is deeply uncomfortable. The text reflects the widespread ancient Near Eastern institution of slavery while creating a distinct tier of protection for Israelite covenant members.
46. The contrast between foreign slaves (le'olam bahem ta'avodu — 'permanently you may use them as workers') and Israelite brothers (uve'acheikhem benei Yisra'el... lo tirdeh bo beferekh — 'over your brothers the children of Israel... you shall not rule with harshness') is the chapter's most morally complex passage. The repeated word perekh ('harshness') ties back to Egyptian slavery. The section marker (samekh) closes this unit.
47. The scenario reverses the expected power dynamic: a foreigner (ger vetoshav) becomes wealthy while an Israelite (achikha — 'your brother') becomes poor enough to sell himself to the foreigner. This case is the most vulnerable situation — an Israelite in servitude to a non-Israelite, potentially beyond the reach of Israelite community norms. The legislation that follows (vv 48-55) ensures that even in this extreme case, the kinsman-redeemer system and the Jubilee protect the Israelite.

48. The ge'ullah right extends to persons, not just land. The phrase ge'ullah tiyeh lo ('a redemption right shall exist for him') establishes that even after sale to a foreigner, an Israelite retains the inalienable right to be redeemed. The kinsman system (echad me'echav — 'one of his brothers') is activated.
49. The hierarchy of potential redeemers is specified: uncle (dodo), uncle's son (ben dodo), any close blood relative (mishe'er besaro mimishpachto — 'from the flesh of his flesh, from his family'). The list moves from closest to broader kinship circles. Self-redemption (venig'al — 'he shall be redeemed,' reflexive) is the final option if the person's own finances recover.
50. The redemption price is calculated as the equivalent of a hired worker's wages for the remaining years until the Jubilee. The phrase kimei sakhir yiyeh immo ('as the days of a hired worker he shall be with him') reframes the servitude as a labor contract, not as ownership of a person. Even in calculating the redemption price, the text insists on treating the Israelite as a worker, not property.
51. When many years remain until the Jubilee, the redemption price is higher — it reflects the greater value of the remaining service years. The principle of proportionality (lefihen — 'according to them,' i.e., according to the years) ensures fairness to the buyer while facilitating the redemption.
52. Fewer remaining years means a lower redemption price — the closer to the Jubilee, the less expensive it is to redeem the person. The system creates an incentive structure that makes redemption progressively easier as the Jubilee approaches.
53. Even when sold to a foreigner, the Israelite's treatment is regulated by Israelite law: the foreigner may not use perekh ('harshness'). The phrase le'einekha ('in your sight') places responsibility on the Israelite community — if they see a brother being mistreated in foreign service, they are responsible to intervene. The community cannot look away.
54. The Jubilee is the final guarantee: regardless of whether redemption occurs through a kinsman-redeemer (v 48-49) or self-redemption (v 49), the person is automatically freed at the Jubilee. No Israelite can remain in permanent servitude. The verb yatsa ('go out, go free') is again the exodus verb — every Jubilee reenacts the liberation from Egypt in miniature.
55. The chapter ends where it began theologically: with God's sovereign claim. The emphatic repetition — avadai hem, 'they are My servants' — echoes verse 42. The entire Jubilee system rests on a single premise: Israel already belongs to God. Human economic arrangements are subordinate to this prior divine claim. The exodus is the event that established God's ownership, and the Jubilee is the institution that periodically reasserts it. The closing self-identification ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God') seals the chapter as divine legislation.

Summary: The covenant consequences: blessings for obedience (rain, harvest, peace, God's presence) and curses for disobedience (disease, defeat, famine, exile, desolation) in five escalating waves. Despite the severity, the chapter ends with a promise: even in exile, God will not utterly reject Israel or break His covenant.

What Makes This Remarkable: The blessings culminate not in prosperity but in presence: "I will walk among you and be your God" (v12) -- the same language as Eden. The curses are structured in five progressive waves, each sevenfold in intensity, giving Israel repeated opportunities to repent. The land's missed sabbaths (v34-35, 43) link disobedience to the sabbatical-year legislation of ch 25. Yet the covenant survives even total failure: velo ge'altim... lehaphar beriti ("I will not reject them... so as to break My covenant," v44).

Translation Friction: The word shalom (v6) required its full register: not merely "peace" as absence of war but comprehensive well-being -- agricultural abundance, physical security, lying down unafraid. We rendered vehithallakhti betokhekhem (v12) as "I will walk among you" to preserve the Eden echo (Gen 3:8, same verb). The five-stage curse structure uses the phrase sheva al-chattoteikhem ("sevenfold for your sins") as an intensifier, not a literal multiplier, and we rendered accordingly.

Connections: The covenant-curse structure parallels Deut 28. The "walking among you" promise (v12) echoes Gen 3:8 and anticipates Rev 21:3 ("the dwelling of God is with man"). The exile prophecy was fulfilled in 586 BC (2 Kgs 25). The "missed sabbaths" explanation appears in 2 Chr 36:21. The unbreakable covenant promise (v44-45) undergirds Paul's argument in Rom 11:1-2, 29.

¹You shall not make idols for yourselves, or set up a carved image or a sacred pillar, or place a figured stone in your land to bow down to it — for I am the LORD your God. ²Keep My Sabbaths and treat My sanctuary with reverence. I am the LORD. ³"If you walk in My statutes and keep My commandments and carry them out, ⁴I will give your rains in their season. The land will yield its produce, and the trees of the field will give their fruit. ⁵Your threshing will last until the grape harvest, and the grape harvest will last until sowing time. You will eat your bread to satisfaction and dwell securely in your land. ⁶I will grant peace in the land — you will lie down with no one to frighten you. I will remove dangerous animals from the land, and no sword shall pass through your land. ⁷You will pursue your enemies, and they will fall before you by the sword. ⁸Five of you will chase a hundred, and a hundred of you will put ten thousand to flight. Your enemies will fall before you by the sword. ⁹I will turn My face toward you, make you fruitful, multiply you, and uphold My covenant with you. ¹⁰You will eat last year's stored harvest and have to clear out the old to make room for the new. ¹¹I will place My dwelling among you, and I will not reject you. ¹²I will walk among you. I will be your God, and you will be My people. ¹³I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt so you would no longer be their slaves. I broke the bars of your yoke and made you walk upright." ¹⁴"But if you do not listen to Me and do not carry out all these commandments — ¹⁵if you reject My statutes and your soul loathes My ordinances, so that you do not carry out all My commandments — thus breaking My covenant — ¹⁶then I in turn will do this to you: I will bring upon you sudden terror, wasting disease, and fever that dim the eyes and drain the life. You will sow your seed for nothing — your enemies will eat it. ¹⁷I will set My face against you, and you will be struck down before your enemies. Those who hate you will rule over you, and you will flee when no one is pursuing you. ¹⁸If even after this you do not listen to Me, I will discipline you sevenfold for your sins. ¹⁹I will break your proud strength. I will make your sky like iron and your earth like bronze. ²⁰Your strength will be spent in vain — your land will not yield its produce, and the trees of the land will not give their fruit. ²¹If you walk in hostility toward Me and refuse to listen to Me, I will strike you sevenfold according to your sins. ²²I will send wild animals among you that will rob you of your children, destroy your livestock, and reduce your numbers until your roads are deserted. ²³If even through these things you are not corrected and still walk in hostility toward Me, ²⁴then I too will walk in hostility toward you, and I Myself will strike you sevenfold for your sins. ²⁵I will bring a sword against you that executes the vengeance of the covenant. When you retreat into your cities, I will send plague among you, and you will be handed over to the enemy. ²⁶When I break your supply of bread, ten women will bake your bread in a single oven and ration it back to you by weight. You will eat but never be satisfied. ²⁷If even after all this you do not listen to Me but continue to walk in hostility toward Me, ²⁸then I will walk against you in furious hostility, and I Myself will discipline you sevenfold for your sins. ²⁹You will eat the flesh of your sons, and the flesh of your daughters you will eat. ³⁰I will destroy your high places, cut down your incense altars, and pile your corpses on the corpses of your idols. I will loathe you. ³¹I will lay your cities waste, bring your sanctuaries to ruin, and I will not smell your pleasing aromas. ³²I Myself will devastate the land — so that even your enemies who settle in it will be appalled. ³³I will scatter you among the nations and draw a sword to pursue you. Your land will become desolation, and your cities will become ruins. ³⁴Then the land will make up for its Sabbaths during all the time it lies desolate while you are in your enemies' land. Then the land will rest and repay its Sabbaths. ³⁵All the time it lies desolate, it will have the rest it did not have during your Sabbaths when you lived on it. ³⁶As for those of you who survive — I will fill their hearts with dread in the lands of their enemies. The sound of a windblown leaf will put them to flight. They will run as though fleeing from a sword, and fall when no one is pursuing. ³⁷They will stumble over one another as though before a sword — with no one pursuing. You will have no strength to stand before your enemies. ³⁸You will perish among the nations, and the land of your enemies will consume you. ³⁹Those of you who survive will waste away in their guilt in the lands of your enemies — and in the guilt of their ancestors they will waste away with them. ⁴⁰"But if they confess their guilt and the guilt of their ancestors — their treachery against Me, and how they walked in hostility toward Me, ⁴¹which caused Me to walk in hostility toward them and bring them into the land of their enemies — or if then their uncircumcised heart is humbled and they accept the punishment for their guilt, ⁴²then I will remember My covenant with Jacob, and My covenant with Isaac, and My covenant with Abraham I will remember — and the land I will remember. ⁴³For the land will be abandoned by them and will make up for its Sabbaths while it lies desolate without them. They will accept the punishment for their guilt — all because they rejected My ordinances and their soul loathed My statutes. ⁴⁴Yet even then, while they are in the land of their enemies, I will not reject them or loathe them to the point of destroying them completely — breaking My covenant with them. For I am the LORD their God. ⁴⁵I will remember for their sake the covenant with their ancestors, whom I brought out of the land of Egypt in the sight of the nations, to be their God. I am the LORD." ⁴⁶These are the statutes, ordinances, and instructions that the LORD established between Himself and the Israelites on Mount Sinai through Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a summary of fundamental prohibitions before presenting the covenant consequences. Four forbidden objects: elilim ('idols' — from a root meaning 'worthless, nothing'), pesel ('carved image'), matsevah ('standing stone/sacred pillar'), and even maskit ('figured/image stone'). The closing signature ki ani YHWH Eloheikhem ('for I am the LORD your God') grounds the prohibition in divine identity — the first commandment underlies the entire blessings-and-curses structure.
2. Two positive commands summarize Israel's core obligations: Sabbath observance (et-shabbetotay tishmoru) and sanctuary reverence (umiqddashi tira'u). These two — sacred time and sacred space — are the pillars of covenant faithfulness. The formula ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') seals both verses 1-2 as the preamble to the covenant consequences that follow.
3. The blessings section opens with im-bechuqqotay telekhu ('if you walk in My statutes') — three verbs of covenant faithfulness: walk (halakh — lifestyle), keep (shamar — vigilance), and do (asah — action). The blessings that follow (v4-13) are not rewards earned but covenant consequences — the natural result of life aligned with God's design. The conditional 'if' makes the blessings contingent on obedience, but the relationship is organic, not transactional.
4. The first blessing is agricultural: venatatti gishmeikhem be'ittam ('I will give your rains in their season'). Rain in ancient Israel was the difference between life and death — there were no irrigation systems for most crops. God promises to control the weather for Israel's benefit. The threefold abundance — rain, land produce, tree fruit — covers the entire agricultural spectrum. The pronoun 'your rains' (gishmeikhem) personalizes the weather: these rains belong to you because I am sending them for you.
5. The abundance is so great that agricultural seasons overlap: threshing extends into grape harvest, grape harvest extends into planting season. The normal gaps between seasons disappear — there is always something to harvest, always food to process. The result: va'akhaltem lachmekhem lasova ('you will eat your bread to satisfaction') and vishavtem lavetach be'artsekhem ('you will dwell securely in your land'). Food and security — the two fundamental human needs — are guaranteed by covenant faithfulness.
6. Venatatti shalom ba'arets ('I will grant peace in the land') — the shalom register term appears as the comprehensive blessing. Peace here means more than absence of war: it includes lying down without fear (ushkhavtem ve'ein macharid — 'you will lie down with no one to terrify'), removal of predatory animals (hishbatti chayyah ra'ah), and no military invasion (cherev lo-ta'avov). Shalom in its fullest sense: safety from every threat — animal, human, and military.
7. Military supremacy: ureda'tem et-oyevikhem ('you will pursue your enemies'). The dynamic reverses the normal fear of war — Israel is the pursuer, not the pursued. The enemies fall by the sword, not Israel. This promise will be inverted in the curse section (v17, 36-37) where Israel flees and enemies pursue.
8. The ratios are supernatural: five chase a hundred (1:20), a hundred rout ten thousand (1:100). The escalation from 1:20 to 1:100 is not arithmetic but exponential — the more Israelites fight together, the more disproportionate the victory. Military success is not about numbers but about God's presence. These ratios will be reversed in the curse (Deut 32:30: 'How could one pursue a thousand?').
9. God's personal attention: ufaniti aleikhem ('I will turn toward you' — literally 'I will face you'). The creation blessing returns: vehifreiti etkhem vehirbeiti etkhem ('I will make you fruitful and multiply you') — the same verbs from Genesis 1:28. Covenant faithfulness reconnects Israel to the original creation mandate. The climactic promise: vahaqimoti et-beriti ittkhem ('I will uphold My covenant with you'). The berit register term appears: God's covenant is not static but actively maintained — He upholds, establishes, and sustains it.
10. A vivid image of abundance: va'akhaltem yashan noshan ('you will eat old, well-aged grain'). The surplus is so great that old grain must be removed (veyashan mippenei chadash tots'u — 'you must bring out the old to make room for the new'). Storage capacity cannot keep up with production. The problem is not scarcity but overflow — a reversal of the wilderness experience where manna could not be stored overnight.
11. The climax of the blessings: venatatti mishkani betokhekhem ('I will place My dwelling in your midst'). The word mishkan ('dwelling') is the tabernacle — God's portable residence. This is the ultimate blessing: not rain, not victory, not abundance, but divine presence. Everything else flows from this. The negative assurance — velo-tig'al nafshi etkhem ('My soul will not abhor/reject you') — uses the visceral verb ga'al ('to loathe, to reject with revulsion'). God promises not merely to tolerate Israel but to remain willingly, without revulsion at their humanity.
12. The verb vehithalakhti betokhekhem ('I will walk among you') is extraordinary — God walking (hitpa'el of halakh) among humans recalls the Garden of Eden (Gen 3:8, where God 'walked' in the cool of the day). The covenant formula vehayiti lakhem le'Elohim ve'attem tihyu-li le'am ('I will be your God, you will be My people') appears across the Bible (Gen 17:7-8, Exod 6:7, Jer 31:33, Rev 21:3) as the definitive description of the covenant relationship. It is the endpoint of redemption history: the entire biblical narrative aims at this mutual belonging.
13. The blessings section closes with the exodus identity: ani YHWH Eloheikhem asher hotseti etkhem me'erets Mitsrayim ('I am the LORD your God who brought you out of Egypt'). Two images capture liberation: va'eshbor motot ulekhem ('I broke the bars of your yoke' — the wooden crossbar that holds the yoke on an animal's neck) and va'olekh etkhem qomemiyut ('I made you walk upright/erect'). Slaves walk bent under burdens; the freed walk tall. The physical posture of liberation — heads up, backs straight — is itself a gift of God. The blessings are not abstract promises but the continuation of the exodus: God freed you once and will keep you free.

14. The curse section begins with ve'im-lo tishme'u li ('but if you do not listen to Me'). The Hebrew shama ('listen') means not merely hear but obey — the same verb as the Shema (Deut 6:4). The curses unfold in five escalating stages (v14-17, v18-20, v21-22, v23-26, v27-39), each introduced by 'if you still...' — God gives Israel five chances to repent before the ultimate judgment. The structure is not vindictive but pastoral: each stage intensifies until repentance occurs.
15. The sin is specified: tim'asu ('reject') and tig'al nafshekhem ('your soul loathes'). The verb ga'al ('to loathe') echoes v11 where God promised not to loathe Israel — now Israel loathes God's laws. The reversal is devastating. The ultimate consequence: lehafrekhem et-beriti ('breaking My covenant'). Disobedience is not merely rule-breaking but berit-breaking — it ruptures the covenant relationship itself.
16. The first curse stage (v16-17): af-ani e'eseh-zot lakhem ('I in turn will do this to you') — God responds in kind. Three afflictions: behalah ('sudden terror/panic'), shachefet ('wasting disease/consumption'), and qaddachat ('burning fever'). The agricultural blessing of v4-5 is reversed: uzera'tem lariq zar'akhem ('you will sow your seed for nothing') — the enemies consume what Israel plants. Every blessing has a corresponding curse.
17. Venatatti fanay bakhem ('I will set My face against you') — the inversion of v9's 'I will turn My face toward you.' God's face, which blessed, now judges. Military defeat replaces military supremacy (v7-8). The final clause — venastem ve'ein-rodef etkhem ('you will flee with no one pursuing') — describes paranoia: the fear itself becomes the enemy. Israel will run from imaginary threats, consumed by the terror God promised in v16.
18. The second escalation: ve'im-ad-elleh lo tishme'u li ('if even after this you do not listen to Me'). The phrase veyasafti leyassera etkhem sheva al-chatoteikhem ('I will add to discipline you seven times for your sins') introduces the sevenfold intensification that will recur (v21, 24, 28). Each refusal to repent multiplies the consequence. God's discipline is corrective (yassar — 'to discipline, to train'), not merely punitive — the purpose is to produce change.
19. Two cosmic reversals: shemeikhem kabarzel ('your sky like iron' — no rain penetrates) and artsekhem kanechushah ('your earth like bronze' — nothing grows). The agricultural blessings of v4 are completely reversed. The sky becomes an impenetrable ceiling; the ground becomes an unyielding floor. Heaven and earth, which together sustained life, now conspire against it. The phrase veshabarti et-ge'on uzekhem ('I will break the pride of your strength') targets the self-sufficiency that replaces trust in God.
20. Vetam lariq kochakhem ('your strength will be spent for nothing') — effort without result. The land refuses to cooperate: velo-titten artsekhem et-yevulah ('your land will not yield its produce'). This is the exact reversal of v4: 'the land will yield its produce' becomes 'the land will not yield.' The trees that gave fruit (v4) now withhold it (v20). The curse systematically undoes every blessing, point by point.
21. The third escalation introduces the key word qeri ('hostility, contrariness, opposition'). The phrase im-telekhu immi qeri ('if you walk with Me in hostility') describes a deliberate, adversarial posture — not mere neglect but active resistance. This word qeri will appear seven times in the chapter (v21, 23, 24, 27, 28, 40, 41), becoming the chapter's defining concept for covenant rebellion.
22. Wild animals (chayyat hassadeh) — the dangerous beasts removed in the blessing (v6) return as agents of judgment. The reversal is precise: v6 removed wild beasts; v22 sends them back. The consequences escalate: children killed (shikkelah etkhem), livestock destroyed, population reduced (him'itah etkhem), roads deserted (neshammu darkheikhem). The land becomes empty — the opposite of the teeming abundance promised in v4-10.
23. The fourth escalation: ve'im-be'elleh lo tivvasru li ('if through these things you are not disciplined/corrected by Me'). The verb yassar ('to discipline') reveals the purpose of the curses — they are corrective, not vindictive. God's goal is teshuvah (return), not destruction. Each stage asks: will this be enough to turn you back? The qeri ('hostility') continues — Israel persists in adversarial posture toward God.
24. God mirrors Israel's posture: vehalakhti af-ani immakhem beqeri ('I too will walk with you in hostility'). The af-ani ('I too, even I') is emphatic and devastating — God adopts the same adversarial stance Israel has taken toward Him. The relationship becomes mutual hostility: Israel walks in qeri toward God; God walks in qeri toward Israel. The covenant that was designed for mutual belonging becomes mutual opposition.
25. The phrase cherev noqemet neqam-berit ('a sword avenging covenant vengeance') is critical: the sword is not arbitrary violence but covenant enforcement. The word neqam-berit ('vengeance of the covenant') means the curses are the covenant's own provisions activating — not divine caprice but the consequences Israel agreed to at Sinai. The berit register term appears again: the same covenant that promised blessings (v9) now delivers curses. The covenant works in both directions.
26. Beshivri lakhem matteh-lechem ('when I break your bread supply' — literally 'staff of bread,' the staff on which round bread loaves are hung for storage). The image of ten women sharing one oven — normally each household has its own — depicts severe shortage. Bread rationed by weight (veheshivu lachmekhem bamishqal) means each person receives a measured, insufficient portion. The devastating conclusion: va'akhaltem velo tisba'u ('you will eat and not be satisfied'). The reversal of v5 (eating to satisfaction) is complete: food exists but cannot satisfy.
27. The fifth and final escalation: ve'im-bezot lo tishme'u li ('if even after all this you do not listen'). The patience is exhausted; the qeri is unchanged. What follows (v28-39) is the most extreme judgment: cannibalism (v29), shrine destruction (v30), city devastation (v31), land desolation (v32-33), exile (v33-35), and psychological collapse (v36-39). The curses mirror the plagues of Egypt — Israel becomes its own Egypt.
28. God's final posture: bachamat-qeri ('in the fury of hostility'). The chamat adds 'burning rage' to qeri ('hostility') — God's patience, extended through four stages, is now accompanied by fury. The sevenfold discipline intensifies for the last time. What follows is the most terrible section of Leviticus — but it is still framed as discipline (yissarti — 'I will discipline'), not annihilation.
29. The most horrifying verse in Leviticus: va'akhaltem besar beneikhem uvesar benoteikhem tokheilu ('you will eat the flesh of your sons and your daughters'). Siege-induced cannibalism — historically fulfilled during the Babylonian and Roman sieges of Jerusalem (2 Kgs 6:28-29, Lam 4:10). The verse's horror is amplified by its brevity: no euphemism, no softening, just the stark statement. This is where qeri leads: the community that walks in hostility toward God will consume its own children.

30. Three destructions: bamot ('high places' — elevated worship sites), chammanim ('incense altars/sun pillars'), and the grisly image of pigrekhem al-pigrei gilluleikhem ('your corpses on the corpses of your idols'). The word gillukim ('idols' — from a root suggesting 'dung pellets') is the most contemptuous term for idols in Hebrew. The final reversal of v11: where God promised velo-tig'al nafshi etkhem ('I will not loathe you'), now vega'alaf nafshi etkhem ('I will loathe you'). The promise of divine acceptance becomes divine revulsion.
31. Cities become chorbah ('ruin'), sanctuaries become shemmamah ('desolation'). The final clause — velo ariach bereiach nichochakhem ('I will not smell your pleasing aromas') — declares that God will no longer accept sacrificial worship. The reach nichoach ('pleasing aroma') that signified divine acceptance throughout Leviticus 1-7 is rejected. The entire sacrificial system — the system Leviticus exists to establish — ceases to function. When God refuses to smell the offering, the altar is effectively closed.
32. Vahashimoti ani et-ha'arets ('I Myself will devastate the land') — God personally devastates the land He gave. Even the conquering enemies (oyeveikhem hayyoshevim bah) will be stunned by the extent of the destruction. The land that flowed with milk and honey becomes so desolate that even occupiers are astonished. The divine agency is emphatic: ani ('I Myself') — God owns the destruction as personally as He owned the blessing.
33. Exile: ve'etkhem ezareh vaggoyim ('I will scatter you among the nations'). The verb zarah ('to scatter, to winnow') treats Israel like grain thrown into the wind — dispersed in every direction. The sword follows them into exile (vahariqoti achareikhem charev). The land and the cities are emptied: shemamah... chorbah. The curse section anticipates the Babylonian exile with remarkable specificity — though written centuries before the event.
34. A striking theological concept: az tirtsseh ha'arets et-shabbetoteha ('then the land will enjoy/repay its Sabbaths'). The land itself has a right to rest — the sabbatical year (ch 25) gives the land a Sabbath every seven years. If Israel refuses to let the land rest, God will remove Israel so the land can rest without them. The exile's duration is calibrated to the number of missed sabbatical years — 2 Chronicles 36:21 explicitly connects the seventy-year Babylonian exile to this principle.
35. The land's desolation is its overdue rest: et asher lo-shavtah beshabbetoteikhem ('what it did not rest during your Sabbaths'). The land is personified as a worker denied its rightful days off — the exile is the land's back-pay of rest. The concept treats the land not as property but as a covenant partner with its own God-given rights.
36. The psychological curse: vehaveti morekh bilevavam ('I will bring weakness/dread into their hearts'). The mighty warriors of v7-8 become refugees terrified by a leaf: qol aleh niddaf ('the sound of a driven leaf'). The earlier curse of v17 (fleeing when no one pursues) returns in intensified form. The exile produces not just displacement but psychological collapse — Israel loses not only its land but its courage.
37. The community collapses internally: vekashlu ish-be'achiv ('they will stumble over one another' — literally 'each man over his brother'). Brotherhood, which should provide mutual support, becomes a source of mutual destruction. The final verdict: velo-tihyeh lakhem tequmah lifnei oyeveikhem ('you will have no ability to stand before your enemies'). The military capacity promised in v7-8 is utterly destroyed.
38. Va'avadtem baggoyim ('you will perish among the nations') — the nation that was to 'dwell apart' (Num 23:9) is swallowed by the nations. The phrase ve'akhelah etkhem erets oyeveikhem ('the land of your enemies will consume you') personifies the foreign land as a predator — the land that was supposed to sustain Israel (v4-5) now devours them. The curse section reaches its nadir: Israel consumed by foreign soil.
39. The verb yimmaqu ('will waste away, will rot') describes slow disintegration. The survivors carry ba'avonam ('in their guilt') and ba'avonot avotam ('in the guilt of their ancestors') — the accumulated weight of generations of covenant breaking. The curse section ends with decay, not death — a lingering dissolution that is worse than a swift end. The five stages of judgment have reached their conclusion. But the chapter does not end here.
40. The restoration begins: vehitvaddu et-avonam ('but if they confess their guilt'). After five stages of judgment, God opens a door. The confession must be comprehensive: their own guilt (avonam), their ancestors' guilt (avon avotam), their treachery (ma'alam), and their hostility (qeri). The verb hitvaddah ('to confess') — the same word from Leviticus 5:5 — requires naming the specific sin. Restoration begins with acknowledgment, not with sacrifice.
41. God acknowledges His own role: af-ani elekh immam beqeri ('I too walked with them in hostility'). The admission that exile was God's hostile response — not random misfortune — is part of the theological honesty the chapter demands. The turning point: o-az yikkana levavam he'arel ('or if then their uncircumcised heart is humbled'). The word he'arel ('uncircumcised') applied to the heart (levav) — the same concept as Deuteronomy 10:16 and 30:6 — describes a heart resistant to God's word. When that resistant heart is humbled (yikkana — 'subdued, brought low'), restoration becomes possible.
42. Vezakharti et-beriti Ya'aqov... Yitschaq... Avraham ezkhori ('I will remember My covenant with Jacob... Isaac... Abraham'). The reverse order (Jacob Isaac Abraham) has generated extensive commentary. The Leviticus briefing notes: 'God remembers His covenant with Jacob, Isaac, and Abraham (reverse order — the note should catch this).' Possible readings: ascending from the nearest to the foundational, or tracing backward through history to the origin of the promise. The fourfold zakhar makes remembrance the chapter's turning point: five stages of curse are answered by four acts of divine memory. Veba'arets ezkhori ('and the land I will remember') — the land itself is a covenant partner deserving of God's remembrance.
43. The reason clause is repeated from v15: ya'an uve'ya'an bemishpatay ma'asu ve'et chuqqotay ga'alaf nafsham ('because — indeed because — they rejected My ordinances and their soul loathed My statutes'). The doubling ya'an uve'ya'an ('because, indeed because') is emphatic — there is no mystery about why judgment came. The people's own choices are the cause. Yet even within this restatement of guilt, the thread of restoration continues: vehem yirtsu et-avonam ('they will accept the punishment for their guilt') — acceptance of consequence is the beginning of return.

44. The chapter's most astonishing verse: ve'af-gam-zot ('yet even so, despite all this'). Three negatives: lo-me'astim ('I will not reject them'), velo-ge'altim ('I will not loathe them'), lekhalotam ('to the point of destroying them completely'). The reason: lehafer beriti itam ('to break My covenant with them'). God will not break the covenant — even when Israel has broken it from their side. The unilateral faithfulness of God sustains the covenant when human faithfulness fails. Ki ani YHWH Eloheihem ('for I am the LORD their God') — the covenant formula from v12 persists even through exile. God remains 'their God' even when they are in enemy territory.
45. The fifth and final zakhār: vezakharti lahem berit ri'shonim ('I will remember for them the covenant of the first ones/ancestors'). The 'first ones' may refer to the patriarchs (v42) or to the exodus generation — the covenant at Sinai, made in the sight of the nations (le'einei haggoyim). The purpose clause — lihyot lahem le'Elohim ('to be their God') — restates the covenant formula one last time. The chapter ends as it will end the entire Bible's covenant theology: God remains God, the covenant remains binding, and restoration remains possible. Ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') — the same identity that opened the Decalogue closes the blessings and curses.
46. The chapter's colophon — and the near-conclusion of the Sinai legislation (ch 27 is an appendix on vows). The phrase behar Sinai beyad-Mosheh ('on Mount Sinai, through Moses') anchors everything from Leviticus 1 through 26 in the Sinai revelation. The word hattorot (plural of torah — 'instructions, teachings') is notable: Leviticus contains not one torah but many torot — multiple bodies of instruction governing offerings, purity, holiness, and covenant consequences. Together they constitute the answer to Leviticus's central question: how does a holy God dwell among an unholy people? Through sacrifice (ch 1-7), through priesthood (ch 8-10), through purity (ch 11-15), through atonement (ch 16), through holiness (ch 17-25), and through covenant faithfulness sustained by divine memory (ch 26).

Summary: Regulations for voluntary dedications to the LORD: assessed values for persons, animals, houses, and land dedicated by vow. Provisions allow redemption (buying back) of most dedications by adding twenty percent. Permanently devoted things (cherem) and tithes cannot be redeemed. The chapter closes Leviticus.

What Makes This Remarkable: The erekh ("assessed value") system converts devotional impulse into manageable obligation -- a person who vows to dedicate themselves or a family member can pay a standardized monetary equivalent instead. The sliding scale by age and sex reflects economic capacity, not human worth. The cherem ("devoted thing") is the most extreme form of dedication: irrevocable and belonging entirely to God, it cannot be bought back.

Translation Friction: We rendered yaphli neder ("makes an extraordinary vow") to capture the force of pala ("to be wonderful, to set apart") -- this is no casual promise. The erekh system's differing valuations by sex required careful notes explaining that these are economic assessments in an agrarian context, not statements about inherent dignity. The term cherem ("devoted thing," v28) carries both sacred and destructive connotations (the same word describes the ban on Jericho in Josh 6:17), and we rendered it to preserve its severity.

Connections: Hannah's dedication of Samuel (1 Sam 1:11, 28) illustrates the personal vow. Jephthah's vow (Judg 11:30-39) shows the danger of rash dedications. The tithe legislation (vv 30-33) connects to Gen 14:20 (Abraham's tithe to Melchizedek) and Mal 3:8-10 ("will a man rob God?"). The cherem concept connects to the conquest narratives of Joshua. The chapter's placement as an appendix after the blessings and curses of ch 26 mirrors Deuteronomy's structure.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Tell the Israelites: When someone makes an extraordinary vow dedicating persons to the LORD by their assessed value, ³the assessed value for a male between twenty and sixty years of age will be fifty shekels of silver, measured by the sanctuary standard. ⁴If the person is female, the assessed value will be thirty shekels. ⁵If the person is between five and twenty years of age, the assessed value will be twenty shekels for a male and ten shekels for a female. ⁶If the person is between one month and five years of age, the assessed value will be five shekels of silver for a male and three shekels of silver for a female. ⁷If the person is sixty years of age or older, the assessed value will be fifteen shekels for a male and ten shekels for a female. ⁸But if the person is too poor to pay the assessed value, they must be presented before the priest, and the priest will set the value according to what the one making the vow can afford. ⁹If the dedication involves a type of animal from which offerings are brought to the LORD, whatever is given to the LORD from it becomes holy. ¹⁰The owner must not swap or substitute it — neither a good animal for a bad one, nor a bad one for a good one. If someone does substitute one animal for another, then both the original and the replacement will be holy. ¹¹If it is a ritually impure animal

— a kind from which no offering is brought to the LORD — the owner must present the animal before the priest. ¹²The priest will appraise it, whether the animal is of good or poor quality. Whatever value the priest assigns — that is what it will be. ¹³If the owner insists on buying it back, a fifth must be added on top of the assessed value. ¹⁴When someone consecrates a house as holy to the LORD, the priest will appraise it based on its quality — good or poor. Whatever the priest determines as its value, that amount stands. ¹⁵If the one who consecrated the house wants to buy it back, that person must add a fifth of the appraised monetary value on top. Then it will be returned. ¹⁶If someone consecrates to the LORD a portion of their hereditary landholding, the assessed value will be calculated by its seed capacity: land requiring a homer of barley seed is valued at fifty shekels of silver. ¹⁷If the field is consecrated starting from the Jubilee year, the full assessed value applies. ¹⁸But if the field is consecrated after the Jubilee year, the priest will calculate the monetary value based on the years remaining until the next Jubilee, and the assessed value will be reduced proportionally. ¹⁹If the one who consecrated the field truly wants to buy it back, that person must add a fifth to the assessed monetary value, and the field will be confirmed as theirs again. ²⁰If the owner does not buy back the field, or if the field has been sold to another party, it can never be redeemed. ²¹When the field is released at the Jubilee, it will become holy to the LORD — like a field under the ban of irrevocable dedication. It will become the permanent possession of the priests. ²²If someone consecrates to the LORD a field that was purchased — one that is not part of their hereditary landholding — ²³the priest will calculate the proportional assessed value through the Jubilee year, and the person must pay that amount on the same day as a holy contribution to the LORD. ²⁴In the Jubilee year, the field reverts to the person from whom it was purchased — the one whose hereditary landholding it originally was. ²⁵Every assessed value must be calculated using the sanctuary shekel standard. The shekel equals twenty gerahs. ²⁶However, no one may consecrate a firstborn animal by vow, since the firstborn among livestock already belongs to the LORD — whether it is a bull or a sheep, it is the LORD's. ²⁷If it is a firstborn of a ritually impure animal, the owner may ransom it at the assessed value plus an additional fifth. If it is not ransomed, it will be sold at the assessed value. ²⁸Nevertheless, anything that a person places under the ban of irrevocable dedication to the LORD — whether from persons, livestock, or hereditary landholding — may not be sold and may not be bought back. Everything placed under the ban is most holy to the LORD. ²⁹No person who has been placed under the ban may be ransomed — that person must be put to death. ³⁰Every tenth portion from the land — whether grain from the soil or fruit from the trees — belongs to the LORD. It is holy to the LORD. ³¹If someone insists on buying back any portion of their tithe, they must add a fifth to its value. ³²As for the tithe of cattle and sheep — every animal that passes under the counting rod, the tenth one will be holy to the LORD. ³³The owner must not sort between good and bad animals, and must not make a substitution. If a substitution is made, both the original and the replacement become holy — neither may be bought back. ³⁴These are the commandments that the LORD gave Moses for the Israelites at Mount Sinai.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard divine speech formula vaydabber YHVH el-Moshe lemor ('and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') introduces the final legislative section of Leviticus. This chapter on vows and valuations forms a legal appendix to the Holiness Code (chs. 17–26), addressing voluntary dedications rather than obligatory offerings.
2. The verb yaphli (from pala, 'to be extraordinary, to set apart') signals that this is no ordinary promise — it is a remarkable, deliberately undertaken vow (neder). The phrase be'erke'kha nephashoth ('by your assessed value of persons') introduces the erekh system: a fixed monetary valuation assigned to a person who has been dedicated to the LORD, allowing the vow to be fulfilled through payment rather than literal service.
3. The erekh ('assessed value') for a prime-age male — fifty shekels of silver — represents a substantial sum, roughly equivalent to years of wages for an ordinary laborer. The phrase besheqel haqqodesh ('by the shekel of the sanctuary') specifies the weight standard used in sacred transactions, distinguishing it from commercial shekels that may have varied by region.
4. The female erekh of thirty shekels — sixty percent of the male valuation — likely reflects economic productivity in an ancient agrarian society rather than inherent worth. These are not price tags on human dignity but standardized monetary equivalents for fulfilling dedication vows. The same thirty-shekel figure appears in Exodus 21:32 as compensation for a slave killed by a goring ox.
5. The age bracket from five to twenty (mibben-chamesh shanim ve'ad ben-esrim shanah) covers youth and adolescence. The reduced valuation of twenty shekels for a male and ten for a female reflects the person's lower economic capacity relative to a prime-age adult. The sliding scale across all age brackets demonstrates that the erekh is tied to productive capability, not moral or spiritual status.

6. The lowest age bracket begins at one month (mibben-chodesh), not at birth — a newborn under thirty days was apparently not yet subject to the vow-valuation system, possibly reflecting the fragile survival prospects of infants. The five-shekel valuation for a male infant matches the redemption price for a firstborn son in Numbers 18:16, suggesting a standardized figure for young children in Israel's sacred economy.
7. The phrase vama'lah ('and upward') sets no upper age limit — all elderly persons fall under a single bracket. The reduced valuation of fifteen shekels for an elderly male (compared to fifty for prime-age) corresponds to diminished economic productivity in old age. The elderly female valuation of ten shekels equals the young female valuation (v. 5), suggesting a standardized minimum for certain categories.
8. The word makh ('poor, reduced in means') triggers a compassion clause: the fixed-rate system yields to priestly discretion. The phrase al-pi asher tassig yad hanoder ('according to what the hand of the one vowing can reach') uses the idiom of the hand 'reaching' or 'attaining' to express financial capacity. This provision ensures that poverty does not exclude anyone from making vows — the same principle appears in the bird-offering substitutions of Leviticus 5:7 and 12:8.
9. The shift from persons (vv. 2–8) to animals (behemah) introduces the second category of dedications. The term qorban ('offering, that which is brought near') specifies ritually acceptable animals — those eligible for sacrifice. The verb yihyeh-qodesh ('it shall be holy') marks an irrevocable transfer of status: once given to the LORD, the animal enters the sphere of the sacred and cannot be reclaimed.
10. Two verbs reinforce the prohibition: yachalipennu ('exchange it') and yamir ('substitute it'), covering any attempt to switch the dedicated animal. The penalty for violation is striking — hamer yamir ('if he does indeed substitute'), using the infinitive absolute for emphasis, results in both animals becoming holy. This anti-substitution rule prevents donors from dedicating a fine animal, then swapping in an inferior one, a practice Malachi 1:14 later denounces.
11. The category behemah teme'ah ('impure/unclean animal') refers to animals ineligible for sacrifice — donkeys, camels, and the like. Though they cannot serve as offerings, they can still be dedicated by vow and assigned monetary value. The verb he'emid ('caused to stand, presented') implies a formal assessment process before the priest, paralleling the presentation of poor persons in verse 8.
12. Unlike the fixed erekh scale for persons (vv. 3–7), unclean animals receive individual appraisal (he'erikh) by the priest. The phrase bein tov uvein ra ('between good and between bad') grants the priest latitude to evaluate the animal's actual condition and worth. The finality clause ken yihyeh ('so it shall be') makes the priestly assessment binding and non-negotiable.
13. The infinitive absolute construction ga'ol yig'alenuh ('redeeming he shall redeem it') conveys determined intent — the owner truly wants to reclaim the animal. The twenty-percent surcharge (chamishito, 'its fifth') is a recurring redemption penalty throughout this chapter (vv. 13, 15, 19, 27, 31). It functions as both a deterrent against impulsive vows and compensation for removing an item from sacred inventory.
14. The verb yaqddish ('consecrates, makes holy') marks the voluntary transfer of a house (bayit) into sacred status. Like unclean animals (v. 12), houses receive individual appraisal rather than a fixed-rate valuation. The final verb yaqum ('it shall stand, be established') — distinct from yihyeh in v. 12 — emphasizes legal permanence: the priest's ruling is a standing decree.
15. The participle hammaqdish ('the one consecrating') identifies the original dedicator as the only party with redemption rights. The phrase chamishith keseph-erke'kha ('a fifth of the silver of your assessed value') specifies that the surcharge is calculated on the monetary appraisal, not on some other basis. The clause vehayah lo ('and it shall be his') confirms full restoration of ownership upon payment.
16. The phrase sedeh achuzzato ('field of his inherited possession') distinguishes ancestral land — received as part of the original tribal allotment — from purchased property (treated in vv. 22–24). Land valuation is based on zar'o ('its seed'), meaning the quantity of seed needed to sow it, a practical measure of productive area. A homer (chomer) of barley seed — roughly 220 liters or 6.5 bushels — defines the standard unit, with fifty shekels as the full Jubilee-cycle valuation.
17. The phrase mishnat hayyovel ('from the year of Jubilee') establishes the baseline: consecration at the start of a Jubilee cycle means the full fifty-shekel-per-homer rate applies because the maximum number of productive years remains. The yovel ('Jubilee,' from the ram's horn that announced it) was the fifty-year cycle of land restoration described in Leviticus 25.
18. The verb chishav ('calculate, reckon') indicates a prorated computation — not a subjective appraisal but arithmetic based on remaining years. The verb nigra ('it shall be subtracted, reduced') derives from gara ('to diminish'), showing that the fifty-shekel base rate depreciates annually as the next Jubilee approaches. This depreciation model recognizes that fewer remaining harvests means less productive value in the consecrated land.
19. The infinitive absolute ga'ol yig'al ('redeeming he redeems') again conveys emphatic intention, as in v. 13. The verb veqam ('and it shall be established, confirmed') uses qum in its legal sense of ratifying a transaction — once the full price plus surcharge is paid, the field's return to the original owner is legally binding. The twenty-percent premium parallels every other redemption scenario in this chapter.
20. Two forfeiture conditions end the right of redemption (ge'ullah): failing to exercise the buyback option, or selling the field to someone else (le'ish acher, 'to another man'). The phrase lo yigga'el od ('it shall not be redeemed again') is absolute — the opportunity is permanently lost. The sale to a third party while the field is under consecration constitutes a breach that voids all future claims.
21. The phrase betze'to vayyovel ('when it goes out in the Jubilee') uses the same 'going out' language applied to slaves released in the sabbatical year. The comparison kisedeh hacherem ('like a field of the cherem') equates the unredeemed field with property placed under the most extreme form of dedication — total, irreversible consecration. Rather than returning to the original family as normal Jubilee land would, the field passes permanently to the priestly holdings (achuzzato, 'its possession').

22. The distinction between sedeh miqnato ('field of his purchase') and sedeh achuzzato ('field of his ancestral holding') is legally critical. Purchased land reverts to its original owner at the Jubilee regardless (Lev. 25:25–28), so the dedicator's claim on it is inherently temporary. This affects both the valuation calculation and the ultimate disposition of the field.
23. The word mikhsat ('proportional amount, quota') — from kasas ('to compute, calculate') — specifies that the valuation is prorated to the remaining years until the Jubilee. Unlike hereditary land, payment is required bayyom hahu ('on that day') with no option for delayed fulfillment. The immediate payment underscores that the dedicator's temporary ownership of purchased land demands prompt settlement.
24. The verb yashuv ('it shall return') governs the Jubilee land principle: purchased fields always go back to the ancestral owner (la'asher lo achuzzat ha'aretz, 'to the one to whom the land-holding belongs'). This verse clarifies that consecrating purchased land does not override the Jubilee return — the priests do not keep it permanently as they would unredeemed ancestral land (v. 21). The Jubilee system protects the original tribal allocation above all secondary transactions.
25. This parenthetical standardization clause anchors all monetary transactions in the chapter to the sheqel haqqodesh ('sanctuary shekel'). The gerah was the smallest unit of weight in Israel's system — one-twentieth of a shekel, approximately 0.57 grams of silver. By defining the shekel as twenty gerahs, the text prevents fraud through use of lighter commercial weights, a concern reflected in prophetic denunciations (Amos 8:5; Micah 6:11).
26. The particle akh ('however, but') introduces an exception to the voluntary dedication system. The verb yevukkar ('is firstborn-ed,' a passive of bakhar in its specialized 'firstborn' sense) refers to the automatic consecration of firstborn animals established in Exodus 13:2, 12. Since the bekhor already belongs to the LORD by prior claim, dedicating it by neder would be giving what one does not own — a logical impossibility that the law explicitly prevents.
27. This verse addresses firstborn unclean animals (like donkeys) — already belonging to the LORD but unusable as sacrifices. The verb padah ('ransom, redeem by payment') differs from ga'al ('redeem by kinship right') used elsewhere in the chapter; padah emphasizes the transactional buyback of something under divine claim. The two outcomes — redemption with surcharge or sale at assessed value — parallel the treatment of dedicated unclean animals in vv. 11–13, but here the animal's firstborn status is what triggers the obligation.
28. The cherem ('ban, irrevocable dedication') represents the most extreme category of consecration in Israelite law, surpassing ordinary dedication (heqdes). The triple scope — me'adam uvehemah umisedeh achuzzato ('from persons and animals and from the field of his holding') — covers every category of property. The designation qodesh-qodashim ('most holy, holy of holies') places cherem items in the highest tier of sanctity, the same classification given to sin offerings and grain offerings (Lev. 6:17, 25). Unlike ordinary dedications, cherem permits no redemption and no sale.
29. This verse addresses the most severe application of cherem: when applied to human beings. The phrase yocharam min-ha'adam ('devoted from among humans') with the emphatic moth yumath ('dying he shall die') indicates capital consequences. The context likely refers to judicial cherem — persons placed under the ban for grave offenses (as in Exodus 22:19; Deuteronomy 13:16) — rather than arbitrary human sacrifice, which is condemned throughout the Torah. The verb yippadeh (niph'al of padah, 'be ransomed') means no monetary payment can substitute for the sentence.
30. The ma'aser ('tithe, tenth part') shifts from voluntary vows to obligatory contributions. The scope covers mizera ha'aretz ('from the seed of the land,' meaning field crops) and miperi ha'etz ('from the fruit of the tree,' meaning orchards and vineyards). The declaration laYHVH hu ('it is the LORD's') establishes divine ownership as inherent — the tithe is not a gift to God but a recognition that the tenth already belongs to Him.
31. The infinitive absolute ga'ol yig'al ('redeeming he redeems') allows for tithed produce to be repurchased — perhaps when the farmer needed specific grain for planting or consumption. The same twenty-percent surcharge (chamishito, 'its fifth') applies here as in all redemption transactions in this chapter. The provision implies that the tithe of agricultural produce could be converted to monetary payment, a concept expanded in Deuteronomy 14:24–25 for those living far from the sanctuary.
32. The phrase ya'avur tachat hashevet ('passes under the rod/staff') describes the tithing method: animals were driven single-file through a narrow passage while the herder counted them with a staff, marking every tenth animal. The shevet ('rod, staff') functioned as both a counting tool and a marker. This concrete procedure — rather than selection by quality — ensured randomness and prevented owners from keeping the best animals for themselves.
33. The verb yevaquer ('examine, investigate, sort') — from baqar ('to inspect') — prohibits the owner from cherry-picking which animal becomes the tenth. Combined with the anti-substitution rule (lo yemirennu, 'he shall not exchange it'), the law closes every loophole for keeping superior animals. The penalty clause mirrors v. 10: both animals become qodesh ('holy'). The final phrase lo yigga'el ('it shall not be redeemed') adds a prohibition absent from v. 10 — livestock tithes, unlike produce tithes (v. 31), cannot be bought back at all.
34. This colophon (closing subscription) seals the entire book of Leviticus, not merely chapter 27. The phrase behar Sinai ('at Mount Sinai') frames all of Leviticus as Sinaitic legislation, linking back to the opening of the book (Lev. 1:1). The word mitzvot ('commandments') encompasses the full range of Levitical law — sacrificial procedures, purity regulations, the Holiness Code, and the vow-valuation system just concluded. This verse parallels the subscriptions at Leviticus 7:38 and 26:46, creating a layered editorial structure.

Summary: God commands Moses to conduct a military census of all Israelite men aged twenty and above, organized by tribe and ancestral household. Twelve tribal leaders are named to assist, and the count totals 603,550 — with Levi excluded by divine order.

What Makes This Remarkable: The book's Hebrew title Bemidbar ('in the wilderness') comes from the opening verse, while its English title 'Numbers' derives from the census itself. The census idiom se'u et rosh ('lift the head') dignifies each person counted — this is not mere bureaucracy but a recognition that every individual matters in the national registry. The verb paqad ('to muster, register') carries the dual sense of administrative accounting and divine oversight.

Translation Friction: The term elef poses a persistent translation question: does it mean 'thousand' or 'military unit/clan'? We rendered it as the numeral, following the plain sense of the Hebrew arithmetic, but the scholarly debate affects how one reads the total of 603,550. The phrase legulgolotam ('by their skulls') we rendered 'individually,' since the literal image of head-by-head counting serves clarity better as an idiom than as anatomy.

Connections: The census total of 603,550 matches Exodus 38:26, linking the population count to the tabernacle tax. Nahshon of Judah (v. 7) appears in Ruth 4:20-22 and Matthew 1:4 as an ancestor of David and Jesus. The Levite exemption (vv. 47-53) sets up Numbers 3, where Levi is counted separately as firstborn substitutes (cf. Exodus 13:2).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses in the Sinai wilderness, inside the tent of meeting, on the first day of the second month during the second year following their departure from Egypt: ²Count the entire assembly of the Israelites by their clans and ancestral households, recording every male individually by name. ³Register every man twenty years old or older who is fit for military service in Israel. You and Aaron are to organize them by their divisions. ⁴One man from each tribe will assist you — each of them a leader of his ancestral household. ⁵These are the men designated to serve with you: from Reuben, Elizur son of Shedeur. ⁶From Simeon, Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ⁷From Judah, Nahshon son of Amminadab. ⁸From Issachar, Nethanel son of Zuar. ⁹From Zebulun, Eliab son of Helon. ¹⁰From the descendants of Joseph — from Ephraim, Elishama son of Ammihud; from Manasseh, Gamaliel son of Pedahzur. ¹¹From Benjamin, Abidan son of Gideoni. ¹²From Dan, Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai. ¹³From Asher, Pagiel son of Ocran. ¹⁴From Gad, Eliasaph son of Deuel. ¹⁵From Naphtali, Ahira son of Enan. ¹⁶These men were the ones summoned from the assembly — tribal leaders of their ancestral lines, commanders over the divisions of Israel. ¹⁷Moses and Aaron summoned these men who had been designated by name, ¹⁸and on the first day of the second month, they assembled the entire community. The people registered their lineage by clan and ancestral household, with every male twenty years old or older recorded individually by name. ¹⁹In obedience to the LORD's command, Moses registered them in the Sinai wilderness. ²⁰The descendants of Reuben, Israel's firstborn, were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded individually by name. ²¹The registered total for the tribe of Reuben: 46,500. ²²The descendants of Simeon were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded individually by name. ²³The registered total for the tribe of Simeon: 59,300. ²⁴The descendants of Gad were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ²⁵The registered total for the tribe of Gad: 45,650. ²⁶The descendants of Judah were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ²⁷The registered total for the tribe of Judah: 74,600. ²⁸The descendants of Issachar were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ²⁹The registered total for the tribe of Issachar: 54,400. ³⁰The descendants of Zebulun were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ³¹The registered total for the tribe of Zebulun: 57,400. ³²Among the descendants of Joseph: the descendants of Ephraim were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ³³The registered total for the tribe of Ephraim: 40,500. ³⁴The descendants of Manasseh were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ³⁵The registered total for the tribe of Manasseh: 32,200. ³⁶The descendants of Benjamin were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ³⁷The registered total for the tribe of Benjamin: 35,400. ³⁸The descendants of Dan were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ³⁹The registered total for the tribe of Dan: 62,700. ⁴⁰The descendants of Asher were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ⁴¹The registered total for the tribe of Asher: 41,500. ⁴²The descendants of Naphtali were registered by their clans and ancestral households. Every male twenty years old or older who was fit for military service was recorded by name. ⁴³The registered total for the tribe of Naphtali: 53,400. ⁴⁴These were the men registered by Moses and Aaron along with the twelve leaders of Israel, each representing his own ancestral household. ⁴⁵The combined total of all Israelites registered by ancestral household — every man twenty years old or older who was fit for military service — ⁴⁶came to 603,550. ⁴⁷The Levites, however, were not registered among them according to their ancestral tribe. ⁴⁸The LORD had instructed Moses: ⁴⁹Do not register the tribe of Levi or include them in the census of the Israelites. ⁵⁰Instead, assign the Levites responsibility for the tabernacle of the testimony — all its furnishings and everything connected to it. They will carry the tabernacle and all its equipment, perform its service, and set up camp around it. ⁵¹Whenever the camp moves, the Levites are to disassemble the tabernacle; whenever the camp stops, the Levites are to erect it. Any unauthorized person who approaches it must be put to death. ⁵²The Israelites are to camp in their assigned positions, each man with his own division, each under his own tribal banner. ⁵³The Levites are to camp surrounding the tabernacle of the testimony so that no divine wrath falls on the Israelite community. The Levites will maintain the guard over the tabernacle of the testimony. ⁵⁴The Israelites carried out everything exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The setting is precisely located in time and space. Midbar Sinai ('wilderness of Sinai') and Ohel Mo'ed ('tent of meeting') establish both geography and sacred context. The date formula — first day, second month, second year — places this exactly one month after the tabernacle's erection (Exodus 40:17). The book's Hebrew title Bemidbar ('in the wilderness') is drawn from this opening verse.

2. The command se'u et rosh ('lift the head') literally means 'raise the head' — an idiom for taking a census or official tally. The counting proceeds through three social layers: edah ('assembly/congregation'), mishpachot ('clans/families'), and beit avot ('ancestral households'). The phrase legulgolotam ('by their skulls/heads') specifies individual head-counting, emphasizing that each person matters in the national registry.
3. The age threshold of twenty years (miben esrim shanah) defines military eligibility. The phrase yotse tsava ('going out to the army') denotes active combat capability. The verb tifqedu ('you shall muster/register') shares its root with paqad, which carries the dual sense of official accounting and divine oversight — the same root underlies the book's English title 'Numbers.'
4. The tribal representatives are described as rosh leveit avotav ('head of his ancestral house'), indicating these are recognized clan patriarchs, not arbitrary assistants. The term matteh ('tribe,' literally 'staff/rod') refers to the tribal administrative unit. The distributive ish ish ('man by man,' i.e., one from each) emphasizes uniform representation.
5. Elizur (Elitsur, 'my God is a rock') son of Shedeur (Shedei'ur, 'Shaddai is light/fire') represents Reuben, Jacob's firstborn. Both names are theophoric — embedding divine titles El ('God') and Shaddai ('Almighty'). The verb ya'amdu ('shall stand') means to take up an official post alongside Moses and Aaron.
6. Shelumiel (Shelumi'el, 'my peace is God' or 'God is my well-being') son of Zurishaddai ('my rock is Shaddai'). Simeon, Jacob's second son through Leah, would suffer the most dramatic population decline by the second census in Numbers 26, dropping from 59,300 to 22,200.
7. Nahshon (Nachshon, possibly from nachash, 'serpent') son of Ammiadab ('my kinsman is generous'). Nahshon is a direct ancestor of David (Ruth 4:20-22) and appears in the genealogy of Jesus (Matthew 1:4). Judah's leader is the most genealogically significant figure in this list.
8. Nathanel (Netan'el, 'God has given') son of Zuar (Tsu'ar, 'small' or 'insignificant'). Issachar, Jacob's ninth son through Leah, would settle in the fertile Jezreel Valley. The name Nathanel is rendered with the 'h' reflecting the Hebrew het rather than the KJV's doubled 'e' spelling.
9. Eliab (Eli'av, 'my God is father') son of Helon (Chelon, possibly 'strong' or 'window'). Zebulun, Leah's sixth son, is consistently paired with Issachar in tribal lists. Jacob's blessing associated Zebulun with maritime commerce (Genesis 49:13).
10. Joseph's inheritance splits between his two sons, maintaining twelve tribal slots after Levi's exclusion from the military census. Elishama ('my God has heard') and Gamaliel ('God is my reward') both carry theophoric names. Pedahzur ('the Rock has redeemed') combines divine imagery with redemption language. Ephraim is listed before Manasseh despite being the younger, reflecting Jacob's crossed-hand blessing (Genesis 48:14-20).
11. Abidan (Avidan, 'my father is judge') son of Gideoni (Gid'oni, 'my cutter/warrior'). Benjamin ('son of the right hand'), Rachel's second son and Jacob's youngest, held a special status as the only son born in the promised land (Genesis 35:16-18).
12. Ahiezer (Achi'ezer, 'my brother is help') son of Ammishaddai ('my kinsman is Shaddai'). Dan was the son of Bilhah, Rachel's servant. Despite his concubine-born status, Dan's tribe would become the second-largest in this census (62,700), demonstrating that tribal growth was unrelated to maternal standing.
13. Pagiel (Pag'i'el, 'encounter of God' or 'prayer to God') son of Ocran (Okhran, 'troubler'). Asher ('happy/blessed'), son of Zilpah (Leah's servant), was promised agricultural abundance: 'his food will be rich, and he will provide royal delicacies' (Genesis 49:20).
14. Eliasaph (Elyasaf, 'my God has added') son of Deuel (De'u'el, 'knowledge of God'). In Numbers 2:14, this same father's name appears as Reuel — the dalet/resh interchange is a well-documented scribal variation in Hebrew manuscripts, as the two letters look nearly identical in many scripts.
15. Ahira (Achira, 'my brother is a friend' or 'my brother is evil' — the meaning is debated) son of Enan (Einan, 'having eyes/springs'). Naphtali ('my wrestling'), son of Bilhah, closes the tribal leader list. These twelve leaders will reappear in Numbers 7 presenting dedication offerings at the altar.
16. Three titles describe these men: qeru'ei ha'edah ('the called/summoned ones of the assembly'), nesi'ei mattot avotam ('chiefs of their ancestral tribes'), and rashei alfei Yisra'el ('heads of the thousands of Israel'). The qere/ketiv variant here (written qri'ei, read qeru'ei) reflects an ancient textual tradition. The term alfei can mean 'thousands' or 'military units/clans,' a distinction relevant to the census numbers debate.
17. The verb vayyiqqach ('and he took') here means 'selected' or 'summoned' rather than physically carrying. The phrase niqqevu beshemot ('designated by names') uses the root n-q-b ('to pierce, to specify') — they were expressly identified for this role, not volunteers. A Sephardic/Ashkenazic textual note records the spelling variant beshemot/beshemot.
18. The verb vayyityaledu ('they declared their birth-descent') is a reflexive form from the root yalad ('to give birth'), meaning each person formally established his genealogical line. This systematic genealogical registration structured the census around bloodline verification, not merely a headcount. The assembly on the exact date given in verse 1 shows immediate obedience.
19. The formulaic ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses') appears frequently in Numbers, affirming that the census proceeds under divine authority rather than royal initiative. The verb vayyifqedom ('and he mustered them') fulfills the command from verse 3. The section marker (samekh) signals a transition to the tribe-by-tribe results.
20. Reuben is identified as bekhor Yisra'el ('firstborn of Israel'), preserving his birth-order status despite having lost the firstborn's double portion to Joseph's sons (1 Chronicles 5:1-2). The census formula repeated for each tribe follows a standard pattern, emphasizing systematic and impartial counting across all twelve.
21. Reuben's count of 46,500 places this tribe in the middle range. The Hebrew expresses numbers in a distinctive reversed order: shishah ve'arba'im elef vachamesh me'ot ('six and forty thousand and five hundred'). The paragraph marker (pe) after each tribal total creates a visual separation in the scroll.

22. Simeon's census verse integrates the count result (pequdav, 'his registered ones') into the introductory formula, a slight structural variation from Reuben's entry. This tribe would suffer the most dramatic decline by the second census in Numbers 26 — from 59,300 to 22,200 — likely connected to the plague following the Baal Peor incident (Numbers 25).
23. Simeon's 59,300 (tish'ah vachamishim elef ushelosh me'ot) makes it the third-largest tribe at this census. The dramatic contrast with its later count of 22,200 — a loss of nearly two-thirds — makes Simeon's trajectory one of the most striking demographic stories in Numbers.
24. Gad, Jacob's seventh son through Zilpah (Leah's servant), is listed here between Simeon and Judah — a placement that differs from birth-order listings, reflecting the organizational scheme of the Numbers census rather than genealogical sequence. Gad would later request land east of the Jordan (Numbers 32).
25. Gad's 45,650 (chamishah ve'arba'im elef veshesh me'ot vachamishim) is the only tribal total ending in fifty rather than a round hundred. This unique numerical detail has generated scholarly discussion about whether the census figures are precise counts or rounded administrative estimates.
26. Judah (Yehudah), Jacob's fourth son through Leah, would emerge as the dominant tribe. The name derives from the root y-d-h ('to praise/thank'), connected to Leah's declaration at his birth: 'This time I will praise the LORD' (Genesis 29:35). Judah's primacy in the camp arrangement (Numbers 2:3) and in the offering sequence (Numbers 7:12) reflects its leading role.
27. Judah's 74,600 (arba'ah veshiv'im elef veshesh me'ot) is the largest tribal count in the census, foreshadowing Judah's preeminence in camp position, marching order, and eventual royal dynasty. The KJV 'threescore and fourteen' translates the Hebrew number pattern; modern rendering uses the equivalent numeral.
28. Issachar (Yissachar) has a debated etymology — possibly 'man of wages' (ish sakhar) or 'he brings reward.' The tribe is consistently paired with Zebulun in census and camp-arrangement lists. Later tradition credits Issachar's descendants with expertise in discerning times and seasons (1 Chronicles 12:32).
29. Issachar's 54,400 (arba'ah vachamishim elef ve'arba me'ot) places the tribe in the upper-middle range. Together with Judah (74,600) and Zebulun (57,400), the eastern camp division totals 186,400 — the largest of the four divisions.
30. Zebulun (Zevulun, from zaval, 'to honor/exalt'), Leah's sixth and final son, closes the Leah-tribe sequence in this census section. Jacob's blessing associated Zebulun with the seacoast (Genesis 49:13), though its actual tribal territory was inland in lower Galilee.
31. Zebulun's 57,400 (shiv'ah vachamishim elef ve'arba me'ot) slightly exceeds its partner Issachar. The Judah-Issachar-Zebulun grouping at 186,400 constitutes the largest of the four camp divisions, which is why it leads the marching order in Numbers 2:9.
32. The double introduction — livnei Yosef livnei Efrayim ('of the sons of Joseph, of the sons of Ephraim') — distinguishes the two Joseph tribes while acknowledging their shared ancestry. Ephraim, though Jacob's younger grandson, was elevated over firstborn Manasseh through Jacob's intentional crossed-hand blessing (Genesis 48:14-20), explaining why Ephraim consistently precedes Manasseh.
33. Ephraim's 40,500 (arba'im elef vachamesh me'ot) is the second-smallest tribal count. Despite modest numbers here, Ephraim would become the dominant northern tribe — so prominent that the prophets often use 'Ephraim' as a synonym for the entire northern kingdom of Israel (e.g., Hosea 5:3).
34. Manasseh (Menasheh, 'causing to forget,' from Genesis 41:51 where Joseph says 'God has made me forget all my hardship') is Joseph's firstborn but listed second to Ephraim. This tribe would experience the largest proportional growth of any tribe by the second census — increasing from 32,200 to 52,700.
35. Manasseh's 32,200 (shenayim usheloshim elef umatayyim) is the smallest tribal count in this census, yet the tribe's dramatic later growth and its unique division into eastern and western territories (Joshua 13:29-31, 17:1-13) would make it geographically the largest tribe in the promised land.
36. Benjamin (Binyamin, 'son of the right hand'), Rachel's second son and Jacob's youngest, is grouped with Ephraim and Manasseh in the western camp division (Numbers 2:18-24). This reflects their shared maternal lineage through Rachel, showing that the camp arrangement follows kinship patterns as well as military organization.
37. Benjamin's 35,400 (chamishah usheloshim elef ve'arba me'ot) is a relatively small count, though the tribe would gain a reputation for exceptional martial prowess — particularly its ambidextrous warriors and left-handed slingers who could hit a target without missing (Judges 20:16, 1 Chronicles 12:2).
38. Dan ('he judged'), son of Bilhah (Rachel's servant), begins the final group of tribes. Despite being born to a concubine, Dan's tribe is the second-largest in this census, demonstrating that tribal growth in Israel was not determined by the mother's social status.
39. Dan's 62,700 (shenayim veshishim elef usheva me'ot) is the second-largest tribal count, exceeded only by Judah. This is remarkable given that Genesis 46:23 lists Dan as having only a single son (Hushim), suggesting extraordinary population growth. The KJV 'threescore' renders the Hebrew pattern for sixty (shishim).
40. Asher ('happy/blessed'), son of Zilpah (Leah's servant), is grouped with Dan and Naphtali in the northern camp division (Numbers 2:25-31). Jacob's deathbed blessing promised Asher rich food and royal delicacies (Genesis 49:20), and Moses' blessing confirmed that Asher would be 'most blessed of sons' (Deuteronomy 33:24).

41. Asher's 41,500 (echad ve'arba'im elef vachamesh me'ot) places this tribe in the middle range. Asher would be one of the few tribes to grow at the second census, increasing to 53,400 — a significant gain that may reflect the prosperity associated with its fertile coastal territory.
42. Naphtali ('my wrestling'), son of Bilhah, closes the twelve-tribe enumeration. The Masoretic text here reads benei Naftali (without the preposition le-), a minor variation from the standard formula livnei used for most other tribes. Naphtali's future territory would include the fertile region around the Sea of Galilee.
43. Naphtali's 53,400 (sheloshah vachamishim elef ve'arba me'ot) completes the twelve-tribe count. Combined with Dan (62,700) and Asher (41,500), the northern camp division totals 157,600 and marches last in the procession order — the rearguard of the nation.
44. The summary identifies the census-takers — Moses and Aaron — and their twelve assistants (nesi'ei Yisra'el, 'leaders of Israel'). The phrase ish echad leveit avotav hayu ('each one was for his ancestral house') confirms that each leader represented his specific tribal lineage, ensuring the census had tribal accountability.
45. This transitional verse sets up the grand total, restating the census criteria: registration by ancestral household (leveit avotam), the age threshold of twenty years (miben esrim shanah), and military fitness (kol yotse tsava — 'everyone going out to the army'). The phrase anticipates the climactic number in the next verse.
46. The grand total of 603,550 (shesh me'ot elef ushloshet alafim vachamesh me'ot vachamishim) matches the census figure recorded in Exodus 38:26. This internal consistency across two separate books has been noted by commentators. Whether these figures represent literal individual counts or military units — reading elef as 'clan/unit' rather than 'thousand' — remains one of the most discussed questions in Numbers scholarship.
47. The Levites' exclusion from the military census is stated as a completed fact: lo hotpaqdu betokham ('they were not mustered among them'). The phrase lematteh avotam ('according to their ancestral tribe') clarifies that it is specifically from the tribal military census that they are exempt, not from all counting — the Levites receive their own separate census in Numbers 3.
48. This verse introduces the divine rationale for the Levite exemption noted in verse 47. The standard speech formula vayedabber YHWH el Mosheh le'mor ('and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') here functions as a flashback — the KJV's 'had spoken' captures the pluperfect sense implied by the narrative context.
49. Two parallel prohibitions reinforce the Levite exclusion: lo tifqod ('do not muster') and lo tissa et rosham ('do not lift their head' — do not count them). The verb tissa uses the same 'lifting the head' idiom from verse 2, now explicitly negated for Levi. The emphatic particle akh ('only, however') marks this as a special exception to the general census command.
50. The Levites receive three distinct duties: carrying the mishkan ha'edut ('tabernacle of the testimony'), ministering to it (yeshartuhu, from the root sh-r-t denoting priestly/ministerial service rather than menial labor), and encamping around it as a protective ring (saviv lammishkan yachanu). The tabernacle is called 'of the testimony' (ha'edut) because it houses the ark containing the covenant tablets.
51. The verb yoridu ('they shall bring down/disassemble') and yaqimu ('they shall raise up/erect') establish the Levites as sole handlers of the tabernacle during travel. The term hazzar haqqarev ('the outsider who approaches') refers not to a foreigner but to any non-Levite Israelite who encroaches on Levitical duties. The death penalty (yumat — a passive, 'shall be put to death') for unauthorized approach reflects the dangerous holiness radiating from the tabernacle.
52. The terms machaneh ('camp/encampment') and degel ('banner/standard') introduce the organizational structure detailed in chapter 2. Each tribe has a fixed position relative to the tabernacle, organized into four three-tribe divisions. The phrase letsivaotam ('by their armies/divisions') reinforces the military character of the arrangement.
53. The Levites function as a protective buffer (yachanu saviv, 'they shall camp around') preventing qetsef ('wrath, divine fury') from striking the broader community. The concept is that unmediated contact between the holy and the common generates destructive divine energy. The phrase shamru et mishmeret ('they shall keep the charge') uses a cognate accusative — literally 'guard the guardianship' — emphasizing the gravity of their protective responsibility.
54. The closing obedience formula kekol asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ken asu ('according to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so they did') bookends the chapter with a note of complete compliance. This formula appears repeatedly throughout Numbers to mark completed sections of divine instruction. The paragraph marker (pe) signals the close of the literary unit.

Summary: God prescribes the camp arrangement: twelve tribes in four three-tribe divisions, positioned at the four cardinal points around the tent of meeting. Judah leads on the east, Reuben on the south, Ephraim on the west, and Dan on the north. The marching order follows the same sequence.

What Makes This Remarkable: The camp is a theological statement rendered in geography. The tent of meeting sits at the center, the Levites form an inner ring, and the twelve tribes form the outer ring — God literally dwells in the middle of His people. The phrase minneged saviv ('facing toward, all around') means every tribe looks inward toward the divine presence. The static camp layout converts directly into a moving column: ka'asher yachanu ken yissa'u ('as they camp, so they march').

Translation Friction: Two terms for identifying markers overlap: degel ('banner, standard') designates the tribal flag, while otot ('signs, emblems') marks the household insignia. We retained both rather than collapsing them, since the Hebrew distinguishes the two layers of identity. The directional term yammah ('seaward') for west reflects the Mediterranean orientation of Hebrew spatial language, which we rendered simply as 'west.'

Connections: Judah's position of honor on the east (v. 3) fulfills Jacob's blessing of preeminence in Genesis 49:8-12. The Deuel/Reuel variation for Gad's leader (v. 14 vs. 1:14) reflects a dalet/resh scribal variation common in Hebrew manuscripts. The grand total of 603,550 (v. 32) matches both Numbers 1:46 and Exodus 38:26.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron: ²Each Israelite is to camp under his own tribal banner, identified by the emblem of his ancestral household. They are to camp facing the tent of meeting, at a distance around it. ³Camping on the east, toward the sunrise, will be the banner of the camp of Judah, arranged by divisions. The leader of the Judah tribe is Nahshon son of Amminadab. ⁴His forces and their registered count: 74,600. ⁵Camping alongside Judah will be the tribe of Issachar. The leader of the Issachar tribe is Nethanel son of Zuar. ⁶His forces and their registered count: 54,400. ⁷Then the tribe of Zebulun. The leader of the Zebulun tribe is Eliab son of Helon. ⁸His forces and their registered count: 57,400. ⁹The combined total for the camp of Judah, across all their divisions: 186,400. They will break camp first. ¹⁰On the south side will be the banner of the camp of Reuben, arranged by divisions. The leader of the Reuben tribe is Elizur son of Shedeur. ¹¹His forces and their registered count: 46,500. ¹²Camping alongside Reuben will be the tribe of Simeon. The leader of the Simeon tribe is Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ¹³His forces and their registered count: 59,300. ¹⁴Then the tribe of Gad. The leader of the Gad tribe is Eliasaph son of Reuel. ¹⁵His forces and their registered count: 45,650. ¹⁶The combined total for the camp of Reuben, across all their divisions: 151,450. They will break camp second. ¹⁷Then the tent of meeting will move out with the Levite camp in the middle of the formation. Just as they camp, so they will march — each man in his assigned position under his banner. ¹⁸On the west side will be the banner of the camp of Ephraim, arranged by divisions. The leader of the Ephraim tribe is Elishama son of Ammihud. ¹⁹His forces and their registered count: 40,500. ²⁰Camping alongside Ephraim will be the tribe of Manasseh. The leader of the Manasseh tribe is Gamaliel son of Pedahzur. ²¹His forces and their registered count: 32,200. ²²Then the tribe of Benjamin. The leader of the Benjamin tribe is Abidan son of Gideon. ²³His forces and their registered count: 35,400. ²⁴The combined total for the camp of Ephraim, across all their divisions: 108,100. They will break camp third. ²⁵On the north side will be the banner of the camp of Dan, arranged by divisions. The leader of the Dan tribe is Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai. ²⁶His forces and their registered count: 62,700. ²⁷Camping alongside Dan will be the tribe of Asher. The leader of the Asher tribe is Pagiel son of Ocran. ²⁸His forces and their registered count: 41,500. ²⁹Then the tribe of Naphtali. The leader of the Naphtali tribe is Ahira son of Enan. ³⁰His forces and their registered count: 53,400. ³¹The combined total for the camp of Dan, across all their divisions: 157,600. They will break camp last, marching under their banners. ³²These are the Israelites registered by ancestral household. The grand total of all the camps across every division: 603,550. ³³The Levites were not registered among the other Israelites, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁴The Israelites did everything the LORD had commanded Moses. They camped under their banners in this arrangement, and they marched in this order — each man with his own clan, identified by his ancestral household.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This chapter's instructions are addressed jointly to Moses and Aaron (el Mosheh ve'el Aharon), unlike the census command in chapter 1 which was directed to Moses alone. Aaron's inclusion reflects the priestly dimension of the camp arrangement — the tabernacle's positioning at the center is a priestly concern as well as a military one.
2. Two terms for identifying markers appear: degel ('banner/standard' — the tribal flag) and otot ('signs/emblems' — the household insignia). The phrase minneged ('opposite, facing toward') means the camps face inward toward the tent of meeting, placing God's dwelling at the visual and spatial center. The specification saviv ('around') creates a concentric layout: tabernacle at center, Levites as inner ring, twelve tribes as outer ring.
3. The east (qedmah mizrachah — literally 'forward, toward the sunrise') is the position of honor, facing the tabernacle entrance which also faced east. Judah's placement here — leading the entire camp — reflects its preeminence. The word nasi ('leader, prince, chief') designates the tribal military commander, the same Nahshon identified in 1:7.
4. The term tseva'o ('his army/host') refers to Nahshon's military contingent. The count of 74,600 matches the Judah total from 1:27, confirming data consistency between the census chapter and the camp arrangement chapter. Judah's division is the largest single tribal unit.
5. The phrase hachonim alav ('those camping beside him') indicates Issachar's subordinate position relative to Judah within the eastern division. Each three-tribe grouping has a lead tribe (here Judah) with two flanking tribes. Nethanel ('God has given') son of Zuar is the same leader from 1:8.
6. Issachar's 54,400 matches the figure from 1:29. The slightly different Hebrew form pequdav ('his registered ones' — singular possessive) versus pequdeihem ('their registered ones' — plural) in verse 4 reflects minor stylistic variation within the formulaic structure.
7. Zebulun completes the eastern triad. The abbreviated introduction — lacking the 'camping beside him' formula — suggests Zebulun occupies the third and final position in this division. Eliab ('my God is father') son of Helon is the same figure from 1:9. Zebulun and Issachar are traditionally paired as Leah's youngest sons.
8. Zebulun's 57,400 matches 1:31. The three tribes on the east — Judah, Issachar, Zebulun — are all Leah's sons, reflecting a kinship-based organizational principle underlying the camp arrangement.
9. The eastern division total of 186,400 (74,600 + 54,400 + 57,400) is the largest of the four camp groupings, which is why it leads the marching order: ri'shonah yissa'u ('first they shall set out'). The term machaneh Yehudah ('camp of Judah') designates the entire three-tribe eastern division by its leading tribe. The section marker (samekh) separates the four divisions.
10. The south (teimanah, from the root meaning 'right hand' when facing east) receives the second position. Reuben, though Israel's firstborn, does not lead the camp — Judah holds that honor. This arrangement reflects the transfer of preeminence from Reuben to Judah already noted in Genesis 49 and 1 Chronicles 5:1-2.
11. Reuben's 46,500 matches 1:21. As the lead tribe of the southern division, Reuben commands a mid-sized contingent — notably smaller than Judah's eastern division, reinforcing the secondary status of Reuben despite his firstborn birthright.
12. Simeon and Reuben were born consecutively to Leah (Genesis 29:32-33), and both were rebuked by Jacob in his deathbed pronouncements (Genesis 49:3-7). Their placement together in the southern camp reflects their shared maternal bond and parallel trajectories within the tribal narrative.
13. Simeon's 59,300 matches 1:23. Although Simeon's individual count exceeds Reuben's, Reuben holds the lead position in the division as the firstborn son. Simeon's large count here contrasts starkly with its dramatic decline to 22,200 by the second census (Numbers 26:14).
14. Gad completes the southern division. The father's name appears here as Re'u'el ('friend of God') rather than De'u'el as in 1:14. The dalet/resh alternation is one of the most common scribal variations in Hebrew manuscripts since the letters are nearly identical in form. Both names are theophoric.
15. Gad's 45,650 matches 1:25, including the distinctive fifty-ending that makes it the only non-round-hundred total in the census. Gad, son of Zilpah, is grouped here with Leah's sons Reuben and Simeon — reflecting the status of Zilpah as Leah's servant.
16. The southern division total of 151,450 (46,500 + 59,300 + 45,650) is the second-largest grouping. The marching order — usheniyyim yissa'u ('second they shall set out') — places Reuben's camp behind Judah's. The four-division marching sequence (east, south, Levites with tabernacle, west, north) creates a protected formation with the tabernacle at its core.
17. The tent of meeting (Ohel Mo'ed) travels at the center of the marching column (betokh hamachanot — 'in the midst of the camps'), between the second and third divisions. The principle ka'asher yachanu ken yissa'u ('as they camp, so they march') means the spatial arrangement during encampment is preserved during travel — the static camp layout converts directly into a moving procession. The phrase ish al yado ('each man at his station,' literally 'each man at his hand') denotes fixed, assigned positions.
18. The west (yammah, literally 'seaward' — toward the Mediterranean) is the third cardinal position. Ephraim leads the western division, which groups the three Rachel-descended tribes: Ephraim, Manasseh (Joseph's sons), and Benjamin (Rachel's son). The kinship principle governing the camp arrangement is clearest in this division.
19. Ephraim's 40,500 matches 1:33. As the lead tribe of the western division, Ephraim commands a relatively small contingent — yet its position as division leader over the larger Manasseh reflects Jacob's deliberate elevation of the younger grandson (Genesis 48:19-20).

20. Manasseh, Joseph's firstborn, camps in a subordinate position to younger brother Ephraim. Gamaliel ('God is my reward') son of Pedahzur ('the Rock has redeemed') — both theophoric names — is the same leader from 1:10. The western camp is the only division where all three tribes descend from a single matriarch (Rachel).
21. Manasseh's 32,200 matches 1:35 — the smallest individual tribal count in the entire census. This makes the western division the weakest numerically, yet its central position in the marching order (third of four, behind the tabernacle) means it is protected by the divisions ahead and behind.
22. Benjamin completes the Rachel-tribe western division. Abidan ('my father is judge') son of Gideoni is the same leader from 1:11. Benjamin's placement with Ephraim and Manasseh rather than next to Judah is significant — the later historical split between the northern kingdom (led by Ephraim) and the southern kingdom (Judah) would draw Benjamin into Judah's orbit despite this earlier kinship grouping.
23. Benjamin's 35,400 matches 1:37. This tribe, though relatively small, would produce Israel's first king (Saul, 1 Samuel 9:1-2) and later remain loyal to the Davidic dynasty when the northern tribes seceded (1 Kings 12:21).
24. The western division total of 108,100 (40,500 + 32,200 + 35,400) is the smallest of the four divisions. Their position — ushelishim yissa'u ('third they shall set out') — places them immediately behind the Levites and the tabernacle, meaning they march directly after the sacred center. The section marker (samekh) separates this from the final division.
25. The north (tsafonah, from a root meaning 'hidden' or 'treasured') receives the fourth and final position. Dan leads the northern division, which groups the three concubine-born tribes: Dan and Naphtali (sons of Bilhah) and Asher (son of Zilpah). This division serves as the rearguard during the march.
26. Dan's 62,700 matches 1:39 — the second-largest tribal count overall. Dan's substantial numbers make it an effective rearguard leader, responsible for protecting the column from behind during the march through the wilderness.
27. Asher (son of Zilpah, Leah's servant) is placed with Dan and Naphtali (sons of Bilhah, Rachel's servant) rather than with the other Zilpah-born tribe Gad. This arrangement groups concubine-born tribes together while distributing Zilpah's sons between the southern and northern divisions.
28. Asher's 41,500 matches 1:41. Positioned between the larger Dan (62,700) and Naphtali (53,400), Asher's mid-range count contributes to a well-balanced rearguard division.
29. Naphtali closes both the northern division and the complete camp arrangement. Ahira son of Enan is the same leader from 1:15. Naphtali and Dan are full brothers (both sons of Bilhah), making this the only division with two tribes sharing the same mother.
30. Naphtali's 53,400 matches 1:43. This completes the fourth and final division's census data. The northern division will march last in the column — la'acharonah ('hindmost,' v. 31) — serving as the rearguard protecting the entire nation.
31. The northern division total of 157,600 (62,700 + 41,500 + 53,400) is the second-largest, making it an effective rearguard. The phrase la'acharonah yis'u ledigleihem ('last they shall march, by their standards') assigns the critical rearguard position — protecting against attack from behind — to the strongest remaining division. The paragraph marker (pe) signals the transition to the chapter's concluding summary.
32. The grand total of 603,550 matches both the chapter 1 census total (1:46) and the Exodus 38:26 figure. The consistency across three separate tabulations — census, camp arrangement, and tabernacle tax — demonstrates the internal coherence of the Torah's numerical records. The four-division totals (186,400 + 151,450 + 108,100 + 157,600) add precisely to 603,550.
33. The Levite exemption is restated (lo hotpaqdu betokh benei Yisra'el — 'they were not mustered among the Israelites'), now with the explanatory clause ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses'). This connects back to the divine instruction in 1:48-49 and emphasizes that the Levites' separate status is not an oversight but an explicit divine directive.
34. The closing obedience formula confirms complete compliance with both camping and marching orders: ken chanu ledigleihem vekhen nasa'u ('so they camped by their standards and so they marched'). The final phrase — ish lemishpechotav al beit avotav ('each man by his clan, according to his ancestral house') — grounds the vast military organization in family identity. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the literary unit. The camp arrangement described here — a cruciform pattern with the tabernacle at center, four three-tribe divisions at the cardinal points — would define Israel's spatial identity throughout the wilderness period.

Summary: The Levites are counted separately from the military census — every male from one month old — and assigned as substitutes for Israel's firstborn. The three Levitical clans (Gershon, Kohath, Merari) receive specific camping positions around the tabernacle and distinct duties. A surplus of 273 firstborn beyond the Levite count requires monetary redemption.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The firstborn substitution theology is the theological engine of this chapter. God claims every firstborn based on the tenth plague (v. 13): by sparing Israel's firstborn, He acquired them. The entire tribe of Levi replaces them collectively. The emphatic doubling netunim netunim ('given, given') in verse 9 stresses the totality of this transfer. The one-month census threshold — dramatically lower than the twenty-year military age — reflects a different purpose: these are counted not as soldiers but as sacred substitutes.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase mille yadam ('filled their hands') in verse 3 is the standard Hebrew idiom for priestly ordination, referring to the literal placing of sacrificial portions into the new priest's hands. We retained the image rather than abstracting it to 'ordained,' since the bodily action is the point. The term zar ('stranger') in verse 10 does not mean foreigner but anyone outside the Aaronic priestly line, including other Levites.*

Connections: *The toledot ('family record') formula in verse 1 echoes the structural markers throughout Genesis (Genesis 2:4, 5:1, etc.). Nadab and Abihu's death by esh zarah ('unauthorized fire,' v. 4) refers back to Leviticus 10:1-2. The firstborn claim traces to Exodus 13:2, and the redemption price of five shekels per surplus firstborn (v. 47) will reappear in Numbers 18:16.*

¹This is the family record of Aaron and Moses, from the time the LORD spoke with Moses at Mount Sinai. ²These are the names of Aaron's sons: Nadab the firstborn, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. ³These are the names of Aaron's sons, the anointed priests, whose hands were filled to serve in the priesthood. ⁴Nadab and Abihu died in the presence of the LORD when they presented unauthorized fire before the LORD in the Sinai wilderness. They had no sons, so Eleazar and Ithamar served as priests during their father Aaron's lifetime. ⁵The LORD spoke to Moses: ⁶Bring the tribe of Levi forward and station them before Aaron the priest so they can serve him. ⁷They will carry out his duties and the responsibilities of the entire community at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, performing the work of the Tabernacle. ⁸They will maintain all the equipment of the Tent of Meeting and fulfill the obligations of the Israelites by performing the work of the Tabernacle. ⁹You are to assign the Levites to Aaron and his sons. They are entirely given over to him from among the Israelites. ¹⁰You are to appoint Aaron and his sons; they will guard their priesthood. Any unauthorized person who approaches will be put to death. ¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹²I have now taken the Levites from among the Israelites as a substitute for every firstborn who opens the womb among the Israelites. The Levites belong to me. ¹³Because every firstborn belongs to me. On the day I struck down every firstborn in the land of Egypt, I consecrated to myself every firstborn in Israel — both human and animal. They are mine. I am the LORD. ¹⁴The LORD spoke to Moses in the Sinai wilderness: ¹⁵Count the descendants of Levi by their ancestral households and clans. Count every male from one month old and above. ¹⁶Moses counted them according to the LORD's word, exactly as he had been commanded. ¹⁷These were Levi's sons by name: Gershon, Kohath, and Merari. ¹⁸These are the names of Gershon's sons by their clans: Libni and Shimei. ¹⁹The sons of Kohath by their clans: Amram, Izhar, Hebron, and Uzziel. ²⁰The sons of Merari by their clans: Mahli and Mushi. These are the Levitical clans organized by ancestral households. ²¹From Gershon came the clan of the Libnites and the clan of the Shimites. These are the Gershonite clans. ²²Their registered count, tallying every male from one month old and above, came to 7,500. ²³The Gershonite clans are to set up camp behind the Tabernacle, on the west side. ²⁴The leader of the Gershonite ancestral house was Eliasaph son of Lael. ²⁵The responsibility of the Gershonites at the Tent of Meeting included the Tabernacle structure itself, the outer tent, its covering, and the screen for the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, ²⁶along with the courtyard hangings, the screen for the courtyard entrance surrounding the Tabernacle and the altar, and the ropes — everything related to their maintenance. ²⁷Fro

m Kohath came the clan of the Amramites, the clan of the Izharites, the clan of the Hebronites, and the clan of the Uzzielites. These are the Kohathite clans. ²⁸Counting every male from one month old and above, there were 8,600 — the guardians of the holy sanctuary. ²⁹The Kohathite clans are to set up camp on the south side of the Tabernacle. ³⁰The leader of the ancestral house for the Kohathite clans was Elizaphan son of Uzziel. ³¹Their responsibility included the ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars, the sacred vessels used in worship, the inner curtain, and all related maintenance. ³²The chief over all the Levitical leaders was Eleazar son of Aaron the priest, who had oversight of those guarding the sanctuary. ³³From Merari came the clan of the Mahlites and the clan of the Mushites. These are the Merarite clans. ³⁴Their registered count of every male from one month old and above was 6,200. ³⁵The leader of the Merarite ancestral house was Zuriel son of Abihail. They are to set up camp on the north side of the Tabernacle. ³⁶The assigned responsibility of the Merarites included the Tabernacle's frames, crossbars, posts, bases, all its equipment, and everything related to its upkeep, ³⁷along with the courtyard posts on every side, their bases, their tent pegs, and their ropes. ³⁸Those camping in front of the Tabernacle on the east side — facing the entrance of the Tent of Meeting toward the sunrise — were Moses, Aaron, and his sons. They guarded the sanctuary on behalf of the Israelites. Any unauthorized person who approached would be put to death. ³⁹The total count of all the Levites whom Moses and Aaron registered at the LORD's command, by their clans — every male from one month old and above — was 22,000. ⁴⁰The LORD said to Moses: Count every firstborn male among the Israelites from one month old and above, and compile a roster of their names. ⁴¹You are to take the Levites for me — I am the LORD — as a substitute for every firstborn among the Israelites, and the Levites' livestock as a substitute for every firstborn among the Israelites' livestock. ⁴²Moses counted all the firstborn among the Israelites, exactly as the LORD had commanded him. ⁴³The total of all firstborn males, counted by name from one month old and above, was 22,273. ⁴⁴The LORD spoke to Moses: ⁴⁵Take the Levites as a substitute for all the firstborn among the Israelites, and the Levites' livestock as a substitute for their livestock. The Levites belong to me. I am the LORD. ⁴⁶As for redeeming the 273 firstborn Israelites who exceed the number of Levites: ⁴⁷You are to collect five shekels per person, measured by the sanctuary standard — the shekel being twenty gerahs. ⁴⁸You are to give the silver to Aaron and his sons as the redemption payment for the surplus firstborns. ⁴⁹Moses collected the redemption silver from those who exceeded the number redeemed by the Levites. ⁵⁰From the firstborn of the Israelites he collected the silver: 1,365 shekels by the sanctuary standard. ⁵¹Moses gave the redemption silver to Aaron and his sons, in accordance with the LORD's word, exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word toledot ('family record, genealogy') introduces a lineage list, as it does throughout Genesis and elsewhere. Aaron is named before Moses because the priestly line — not prophetic authority — is the subject of this chapter. The phrase beyom dibber ('on the day He spoke') establishes a temporal anchor tying this genealogy to the Sinai revelation.
2. The bekhor ('firstborn') designation for Nadab is significant because his death (v 4) creates a vacancy in priestly succession. All four sons are listed despite only two surviving, preserving the complete genealogical record.
3. The idiom mille yadam ('filled their hands') is the standard Hebrew expression for priestly ordination — literally the placing of sacrificial portions into the new priest's hands during the consecration ceremony (Exod 29:24). The meshukhim ('anointed ones') confirms their formal installation through the oil-anointing rite.
4. The esh zarah ('strange fire, unauthorized fire') refers to the incident in Leviticus 10:1-2 where Nadab and Abihu offered incense not commanded by God. The phrase al-penei Aharon aviheem ('in the presence of Aaron their father' — literally 'upon the face of') indicates they served while Aaron still lived, rather than succeeding him after death. The notice that they had no banim ('sons, children') explains why their priestly line ended.
5. The formulaic vayedabber YHWH el-Mosheh lemor ('and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') marks a new divine speech unit. This formula occurs over 60 times in Numbers, structuring the book as a series of direct divine commands.
6. The verb haqrev ('bring near, present') is the same root as qorban ('offering'), suggesting the Levites are being presented as a kind of offering. The verb he'emaḏta ('station, cause to stand') implies formal positioning for duty. Their role is defined as sherethu oto ('serving him') — the Levites assist the priests, not replace them.
7. The root sh-m-r appears twice — mishmarto ('his charge') and mishmeret ('the charge of') — emphasizing careful guardianship. The Levites serve a dual function: assisting the priest personally and representing the congregation's obligations. The phrase ohel mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting') designates the place where God meets with Israel.

8. The kelei ohel mo'ed ('equipment/vessels of the Tent of Meeting') refers to the physical objects used in worship. The Levites' guardianship (mishmeret) of the Israelites' obligations means they serve as intermediaries — carrying out worship duties on behalf of the non-priestly tribes.
9. The emphatic doubling netunim netunim ('given, given' — wholly given, completely handed over) uses a Hebrew intensification device: repeating the passive participle to stress totality. The Levites belong to the priests not by personal choice but by divine assignment from the community of Israel.
10. The zar ('stranger, outsider') here does not mean a foreigner but anyone not of the Aaronic priestly line — including other Levites. The death penalty (yumat — 'he shall be put to death') for encroaching on priestly functions underscores the holiness boundary separating the priesthood from all others. The verb tifqod ('appoint, install') is related to pequddah ('appointed office').
11. This second speech formula introduces the theological rationale for the Levites' role — the firstborn substitution principle (vv 12-13). The repeated formula separates this foundational declaration from the practical instructions in vv 5-10.
12. The emphatic va'ani hinneh ('and I — look!') stresses God's personal initiative. The phrase takhat kol-bekhor peter rekhem ('in place of every firstborn who opens the womb') explains the substitution theology: originally every firstborn male belonged to God (Exod 13:2), but the entire tribe of Levi now replaces them collectively. Peter rekhem ('opener of the womb') is the technical term for the first child to emerge.
13. The claim li kol-bekhor ('to me belongs every firstborn') reaches back to the tenth plague (Exod 12:29). By sparing Israel's firstborn, God acquired a claim over them. The verb hiqdashti ('I consecrated, I set apart as holy') marks them as belonging to the sacred sphere. The closing declaration ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') seals the claim with divine authority — a signature formula appearing throughout Leviticus and Numbers.
14. This third speech formula adds the geographical marker bemidbar Sinai ('in the wilderness of Sinai'), anchoring the census command to a specific location. The Levite census that follows (vv 15-39) differs from the general census in chapter 1 in both age threshold and purpose.
15. The Levite census threshold of ben-khodesh ('one month old') is dramatically lower than the twenty-year military census age in chapter 1. This reflects their non-military purpose: they are counted not as soldiers but as substitutes for firstborns, who were claimed from birth. The phrase leveit avotam le mishpekhota ('by their fathers' households, by their clans') establishes the two-tier organizational structure.
16. The phrase al-pi YHWH ('according to the mouth of the LORD' — by the LORD's word) emphasizes that this census was not Moses' initiative but a direct divine order. The passive tsuva ('he was commanded') reinforces Moses' obedient role as executor of God's instructions.
17. The three sons of Levi — Gershon, Qehat, and Merari — establish the three major Levitical divisions. This genealogy matches Genesis 46:11 and Exodus 6:16. Each clan receives a distinct set of responsibilities and camping positions in the verses that follow.
18. Gershon's two sub-clans — Livni and Shim'i — form the Gershonite division. The name Livni may derive from lavan ('white'), and Shim'i from shama ('to hear'). Each sub-clan became a distinct mishpakhah ('clan, family') within the larger Gershonite branch.
19. Kohath has four sub-clans — the largest number of any Levitical branch. Amram is the ancestor of Moses and Aaron (Exod 6:20), making the Kohathites the priestly clan. The four names reflect the Kohathites' prominent role: they are assigned guardianship of the most sacred objects (v 31).
20. Merari's two sub-clans — Makhli and Mushi — complete the Levitical structure: $2 + 4 + 2 = 8$ sub-clans total. The summary statement elleh hem mishpekhota haLevi ('these are the clans of Levi') closes the genealogical listing before the detailed census and duty assignments begin.
21. The text shifts from listing Gershon's sons (v 18) to naming the clans formed from them. The gentilics haLivni ('the Libnite') and haShim'i ('the Shimite') show the transformation from individual ancestors to established clan identities — a standard pattern in Israelite social organization.
22. The Gershonites' total of shiv'at alafim vakhamesh me'ot (7,500) makes them the middle-sized Levitical clan. The repeated pequdeihem ('their counted ones') uses a census-specific term from the root p-q-d ('to attend to, to muster, to count').
23. The camp position akharei hamishkan ('behind the Tabernacle') combined with yamah ('westward') places the Gershonites on the rear side. Since the Tabernacle entrance faced east, 'behind' means west. Each Levitical clan occupies one side, forming a protective inner ring between the Tabernacle and the twelve tribes camped further out.
24. The nesi beit-av ('leader of the father's house') designates the clan chief. Elyasaf ben-La'el bears a name meaning 'God has added, son of belonging to God.' This Eliasaph is distinct from the Eliasaph son of Deuel who led Gad's tribe (Num 1:14).
25. The Gershonites' assignment covers the fabric elements: the mishkan ('Tabernacle' — the inner curtain layer), the ohel ('tent' — the goat-hair layer over it), the mikhsehu ('its covering' — the upper protective layers), and the masakh ('screen, curtain') at the entrance. These are the soft, textile components as opposed to the solid structural pieces assigned to Merari.
26. The qal'ei hekhatser ('hangings of the courtyard') were the linen curtains forming the outer enclosure. The meitarav ('its ropes, cords') held the hangings taut between the pillars. The summary phrase lekhola avodato ('for all its service/maintenance') indicates the Gershonites handled all upkeep of these textile and rope elements.
27. The Kohathites' four sub-clans are listed with gentilic forms: ha'Amrami, haYitshari, haKhevroni, and ha'Uzzi'eli. The Amramites included Moses and Aaron's direct descendants but their priestly status was distinct from other Amramites. The Kohathites' four clans made them the most internally diverse Levitical division.
28. The Kohathites' count of shemonat alafim veshesh me'ot (8,600) makes them the largest Levitical clan. Their designation as shomerei mishmeret haQodesh ('guardians of the charge of the holy place') reflects their assignment to the most sacred objects — the ark, table, lampstand, and altars (v 31).

29. The phrase al yerekh hamishkan teimanah ('on the flank of the Tabernacle southward') uses yerekh ('thigh, side, flank') — a term for the lateral edge of a structure. The southern position places the Kohathites closest to Moses and Aaron, who camped on the east (v 38), reflecting their kinship connection to the priestly family.
30. Elitsafan ben-Uzzi'el ('God has protected, son of Uzziel') belongs to the youngest of Kohath's four sub-clans. His appointment over the Kohathites despite being from the junior branch may reflect the same divine pattern of choosing the younger over the elder seen throughout Genesis.
31. The Kohathites guard the most sacred objects: the aron ('ark'), shulkhan ('table' — of showbread), menorah ('lampstand'), mizbakhot ('altars' — plural, both incense and burnt offering), and kelei haQodesh ('sacred vessels'). The masakh ('screen, curtain') here likely refers to the parokhet separating the Holy Place from the Most Holy Place, distinct from the entrance curtain assigned to the Gershonites.
32. The title nesi nesi'ei haLevi ('leader of the leaders of the Levites') makes Eleazar the supreme Levitical administrator — a 'chief of chiefs.' His role as pequddat shomerei mishmeret haQodesh ('the appointed overseer of the sanctuary guardians') placed priestly authority over all Levitical service, maintaining the hierarchy of priest above Levite.
33. Merari's two sub-clans — Makhli and Mushi — parallel Gershon's two sub-clans. The name Makhli may derive from makhalah ('sickness') or makhol ('dance'), and Mushi possibly from mush ('to depart'). Like the Gershonites, the Merarites are organized into exactly two clan units.
34. The Merarites' total of sheshet alafim umata'im (6,200) makes them the smallest Levitical clan. The combined Levite total (7,500 + 8,600 + 6,200 = 22,300) slightly exceeds the 22,000 given in verse 39 — a discrepancy that ancient commentators attributed to the 300 Levite firstborns who could not substitute for Israelite firstborns since they themselves required redemption.
35. Tsuri'el ben-Avika'il ('my rock is God, son of father of might') leads the Merarites. Their northern camping position (tsafonah — 'northward') completes the Levitical ring: Gershonites west, Kohathites south, Merarites north, with Moses and Aaron on the east (v 38). The north side was considered the most vulnerable in ancient Near Eastern military thinking.
36. The Merarites handle the heavy structural components: qarshei hamishkan ('frames of the Tabernacle' — the acacia-wood boards), berikhav ('its crossbars' — the horizontal stabilizers), ammudav ('its posts, pillars'), and adanav ('its bases, sockets' — the silver foundation pieces). These are the rigid, heavy elements complementing the Gershonites' textile assignments.
37. The courtyard components — ammudei hekhatser ('pillars of the courtyard'), adneihem ('their bases'), yetedotam ('their pegs, stakes'), and meitareihem ('their cords, guy-ropes') — represent the outer perimeter framework. The Merarites thus handle all the rigid structural elements from innermost Tabernacle to outermost courtyard fence.
38. The eastern position (qedmah, mizrahah — both meaning 'eastward') is the most prestigious: it faces the Tabernacle entrance and is occupied by Moses and Aaron's family rather than a Levitical clan. The double designation emphasizes this prime location. The warning about the zar ('unauthorized person') is repeated from verse 10, framing the entire Levitical camp arrangement with this boundary marker.
39. The grand total of shena'im ve'esrim alef (22,000) is the operative number used for the firstborn exchange in vv 40-51. The Hebrew text has extraordinary punctuation marks (dots) above the letters of Aaron's name — the nequdot, which ancient scribes used to signal textual uncertainty. Some traditions read this as indicating Aaron did not participate in the count, since Levites counted their own tribe and Aaron belonged to it.
40. The command to count Israelite firstborns initiates the exchange process. The phrase se'a et mispar shemotam ('lift up the number of their names' — compile a roster) uses the same language as the tribal census in Numbers 1:2, establishing a formal registration. The one-month threshold matches the Levite census, making the two counts directly comparable.
41. The substitution extends to animals: behemat haLevi'im takhat kol-bekhor bebehemat benei Yisra'el ('the livestock of the Levites in place of every firstborn among the livestock of the Israelites'). This parallels the human exchange and shows the comprehensiveness of the substitution principle — both persons and property that belonged to God are transferred. The parenthetical ani YHWH ('I am the LORD') asserts divine authority over this transaction.
42. The narrative formula ka'asher tsivah YHWH oto ('just as the LORD commanded him') certifies Moses' compliance. This obedience statement appears frequently in Numbers and Exodus, confirming that the census was executed precisely according to divine instruction rather than human initiative.
43. The firstborn total of shena'im ve'esrim elef sheloshah veshiv'im umata'im (22,273) exceeds the Levite total of 22,000 by exactly 273. This surplus creates the mathematical problem resolved in vv 46-51: 273 firstborns have no Levite substitute and must be redeemed with silver instead. The precise number demonstrates the administrative rigor of the census.
44. This speech formula introduces the redemption procedure for the 273 surplus firstborns (vv 45-51). It marks the final divine instruction in the chapter, shifting from census to financial resolution.
45. This verse recapitulates the substitution command from verse 41, confirming the exchange before introducing the exception for the surplus 273. The concluding vehayu-li haLevi'im ani YHWH ('the Levites shall be mine — I am the LORD') reasserts divine ownership using the covenant signature formula.
46. The peduyei ('redeemed ones') introduces the concept of pidyon — monetary redemption as a substitute when a living substitute is unavailable. The ha'odefim al-haLevi'im ('those exceeding beyond the Levites') identifies the 273 surplus firstborns who have no corresponding Levite to replace them and must therefore be redeemed through payment.

47. The redemption price of khameshet khameshet sheqalim lagulgolet ('five five shekels per head') uses a distributive doubling: five shekels each. This amount (approximately 57 grams of silver per person) becomes the standard pidyon haben ('redemption of the firstborn son') amount still practiced in Judaism. The sheqel haQodesh ('sanctuary shekel') was a standardized weight kept at the sanctuary, and the gerah (1/20 shekel, about 0.57 grams) specifies the exact calibration.
48. The kesef ('silver, money') goes to Aaron and his sons — not to the Levites — because the priests represent God's direct claim on the firstborn. The peduyei ha'odefim ('redeemed ones of the surplus') confirms that monetary payment satisfies the divine claim only for those who have no living Levite substitute.
49. The kesef hapidyom ('silver of the redemption') is a technical financial term. Moses acts as the intermediary, collecting from the 273 surplus families. The text does not specify how the 273 were selected from among the 22,273 firstborns — rabbinic tradition suggests a lottery was used.
50. The total of khamishah veshishim ushelosh me'ot va'elef (1,365) shekels confirms the arithmetic: 273 persons × 5 shekels = 1,365 shekels. This precise accounting (approximately 15.6 kilograms of silver) demonstrates the meticulous financial record-keeping expected in sacred transactions. The besheqel haQodesh ('by the sanctuary shekel') repeats the calibration standard.
51. The chapter closes with the fulfillment formula ka'asher tsivah YHWH et-Mosheh ('just as the LORD commanded Moses'), confirming complete compliance. The kesef haPeduyim ('silver of the redeemed ones') was transferred al-pi YHWH ('according to the mouth of the LORD' — by divine instruction) to the priestly family, completing the firstborn-Levite exchange process.

Summary: A service census counts Levite men aged thirty to fifty for active tabernacle duty. Each Levitical clan receives specific transport assignments: Kohathites carry the most sacred objects (ark, table, lampstand, altars), Gershonites carry the fabric coverings and curtains, and Merarites carry the heavy structural frames, posts, and bases.

What Makes This Remarkable: The wrapping protocols for sacred objects are a theology of holiness in material form. Each item receives distinct layered coverings — the ark alone has its outermost layer of tekhelet ('blue-violet'), making it visually unique during transport. The Kohathites may carry but never see or touch the sacred objects: kevalla ('even for an instant') in verse 20 makes a momentary glance lethal. Aaron and his sons must cover everything first — the priests' covering work is literally a life-saving act for the Levites.

Translation Friction: The term or takhash (rendered 'takhash hide') remains one of the most debated words in the Hebrew Bible. Proposals include dugong, dolphin, fine leather, and goatskin. We transliterated rather than guessed, since the Hebrew itself is opaque. The word tsava ('host, army') applied to tabernacle service (v. 3) borrows military language for sacred labor — we rendered it 'workforce' to preserve the organizational connotation without the combat implication.

Connections: The service age of thirty (v. 3) contrasts with the one-month threshold in chapter 3 and the twenty-five-year starting age in Numbers 8:24. The parokhet ('screening curtain,' v. 5) that wraps the ark is the same veil described in Exodus 26:31-33. Eleazar oversees the Kohathites' sacred materials (v. 16) while Ithamar oversees the Gershonites and Merarites (vv. 28, 33), establishing a hierarchy reflected in later priestly succession.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron: ²Take a census of the Kohathites from among the Levites, by their clans and ancestral households, ³from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who enters the workforce to perform tasks in the Tent of Meeting. ⁴This is the assigned duty of the Kohathites in the Tent of Meeting: the most sacred objects. ⁵When the camp is about to move out, Aaron and his sons must enter and take down the screening curtain and cover the Ark of the Testimony with it. ⁶Then they must place over it a covering of takhash hide, spread a cloth entirely of blue-violet over the top, and insert the carrying poles. ⁷On the Table of the Presence they must spread a blue-violet cloth and place on it the plates, ladles, bowls, and pitchers for the drink offerings. The perpetual bread must remain on it. ⁸Then they must spread a scarlet cloth over these items, cover it with a takhash-hide covering, and insert the carrying poles. ⁹They must take a blue-violet cloth and cover the lampstand used for lighting, along with its lamps, its wick trimmers, its fire pans, and all the oil vessels used in its maintenance. ¹⁰They must place it and all its equipment inside a takhash-hide covering and set it on a carrying frame. ¹¹Over the golden altar they must spread a blue-violet cloth, cover it with a takhash-hide covering, and insert its carrying poles. ¹²Th ey must take all the service vessels used for ministering in the sanctuary, place them in a blue-violet cloth, cover them with a takhash-hide covering, and set them on a carrying frame. ¹³They must clear the ashes from the altar and spread a purple cloth over it. ¹⁴They must place on it all the equipment used in its service — the fire pans, meat forks, shovels, and sprinkling bowls — all the altar's implements. Then they must spread a takhash-hide covering over it and insert its carrying poles. ¹⁵When Aaron and his sons have finished covering the sacred objects and all the sanctuary's equipment — as the camp prepares to move out — only then may the Kohathites come to carry them. But they must not touch the sacred objects, or they will die. These are the transport loads assigned to the Kohathites in the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁶Eleazar son of Aaron the priest is personally responsible for the lighting oil, the aromatic incense, the daily grain offering, and the anointing oil — and has overall charge of the entire Tabernacle with everything in it, including the sanctuary and its equipment. ¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron: ¹⁸Do not allow the Kohathite tribal clans to be cut off from among the Levites. ¹⁹This is what you must do for them so that they live and do not die when they approach the most sacred objects: Aaron and his sons must go in and assign each man to his specific task and transport load. ²⁰They must not go in to look, even for a moment, at the sacred objects, or they will die. ²¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²²Take a census of the Gershonites as well, by their ancestral households and clans. ²³Count them from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who enters the workforce to perform service in the Tent of Meeting. ²⁴This is the assigned duty of the Gershonite clans — both their service tasks and their transport loads: ²⁵They must carry the curtain panels of the Tabernacle, the Tent of Meeting with its covering, the takhash-hide covering that goes over it on top, and the screen for the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, ²⁶along with the courtyard hangings, the screen for the courtyard gate entrance surrounding the Tabernacle and the altar, their ropes, all their service equipment, and everything involved in their upkeep — they must handle all of this. ²⁷All the work of the Gershonites — every transport load and every task — must be directed by Aaron and his sons. You must assign them specific responsibility for each of their loads. ²⁸This is the assigned duty of the Gershonite clans at the Tent of Meeting. Their oversight falls under the authority of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest. ²⁹As for the Merarites — count them by their clans and ancestral households. ³⁰Count them from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who enters the workforce to perform the work of the Tent of Meeting. ³¹This is their assigned transport load covering all their service at the Tent of Meeting: the Tabernacle's frames, its crossbars, its posts, and its bases, ³²along with the courtyard posts on every side with their bases, tent pegs, and ropes — all the associated equipment and everything involved in their maintenance. You must assign the equipment by name to each individual for transport. ³³This is the assigned duty of the Merarite clans — all their service at the Tent of Meeting — under the authority of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest. ³⁴Moses, Aaron, and the leaders of the community counted the Kohathites by their clans and ancestral households. ³⁵from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who entered the workforce for service at the Tent of Meeting. ³⁶Their registered count by clans was 2,750. ³⁷These were the registered members of the Kohathite clans — all who served at the Tent of Meeting — whom Moses and Aaron counted at the LORD's command through Moses. ³⁸The registered Gershonites, by their clans and ancestral households, ³⁹from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who entered the workforce for service at the Tent of Meeting — ⁴⁰their registered count by clans and ancestral households was 2,630. ⁴¹These were the registered members of the Gershonite clans — all who served at the Tent of Meeting — whom Moses and Aaron counted at the LORD's command. ⁴²The registered members of the Merarite clans, by their clans and ancestral households, ⁴³from age thirty up to age fifty — everyone who entered the workforce for service at the Tent of Meeting — ⁴⁴their registered count by clans was 3,200. ⁴⁵These were the registered members of the Merarite clans, whom Moses and Aaron counted at the LORD's command through Moses. ⁴⁶The total of all the Levites whom Moses, Aaron, and the leaders of Israel counted by their clans and ancestral households — ⁴⁷from age thirty up to age fifty, everyone who came to perform service tasks and transport duties at the Tent of Meeting — ⁴⁸their total count was 8,580. ⁴⁹At the LORD's command they were registered through Moses — each man assigned to his specific task and transport load. They were counted exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This chapter opens with the dual address el-Mosheh ve'el-Aharon ('to Moses and to Aaron'), involving both prophet and high priest in these instructions. Aaron's inclusion is significant because the Kohathite duties described here directly intersect with his priestly responsibilities — he must personally cover the sacred objects before the Kohathites may approach them.
2. The phrase naso et-rosh ('lift up the head' — take a census) is the same idiom used in Numbers 1:2 for the general tribal census. The Kohathites are singled out first among the three Levitical clans because they carry the most sacred objects — their duties require the most detailed safety protocols.
3. The service age range of ben-sheloshim shanah ('thirty years old') to ben-khamishim shanah ('fifty years old') is a twenty-year window of active duty. This contrasts with the one-month-and-up threshold in chapter 3 (for counting) and the twenty-five-year-old starting age in Numbers 8:24. The term tsava ('host, army, workforce') borrows military language for sacred labor, treating Tabernacle service as a form of organized deployment.
4. The phrase Qodesh haQodashim ('the holy of holies' — the most sacred things) here refers not to the inner room of the Tabernacle but to the category of objects the Kohathites will transport. These are the items of highest sanctity: the ark, table, lampstand, altars, and their vessels. The Kohathites carry them but may never see or touch them directly.
5. The parokhet hamasakh ('the curtain of the screen' — the dividing veil) that separated the Most Holy Place from the Holy Place becomes the first wrapping layer for the ark. Only Aaron and his sons (ubha Aharon uvanav — 'Aaron and his sons shall enter') may handle the sacred objects directly. The aron ha'edut ('Ark of the Testimony') contains the stone tablets of the covenant.
6. The three-layer wrapping order for the ark is: (1) the veil, (2) or takhash ('takhash skin' — an unidentified durable hide, possibly dugong or fine leather), and (3) beged-kelil tekhelet ('a cloth entirely of blue-violet'). The tekhelet dye (extracted from the murex snail) was the most prestigious color in the ancient Near East. The ark is the only object whose outermost covering is blue, making it visually distinct during transport. The baddav ('its poles') remain permanently inserted (Exod 25:15).
7. The shulkhan haPanim ('table of the face/presence' — showbread table) is first draped in blue. Its vessels — qe'arot ('plates'), kappot ('ladles, spoons'), menaqqiyyot ('bowls, jars'), and qesot hannesekh ('pitchers for the libation') — are placed on top. The directive lekhem hatamid alav yihyeh ('the perpetual bread shall be on it') means the showbread stays on the table even during transport, maintaining the offering's continuity.
8. The table's wrapping reverses the ark's color order: blue cloth first (v 7), then beged tola'at shani ('scarlet-crimson cloth') over the vessels, then takhash hide as the outer protective layer. The tola'at shani ('scarlet-crimson cloth') — crimson dye from the kermes insect) produced a vivid red. Unlike the ark, the table's outermost layer is the protective hide, not the decorative cloth.
9. The menorat hama'or ('lampstand of the light') is distinguished from its accessories: neroteiha ('its lamps' — the oil cups), malqakheiha ('its tongs, wick-trimmers'), makhtoteiha ('its fire pans, snuff dishes'), and kelei shamnah ('its oil vessels'). Every associated tool must travel with the lampstand. The feminine pronouns throughout reflect menorah's grammatical gender in Hebrew.
10. The mot ('bar, pole, carrying frame') is distinct from the baddim ('poles') used for the ark and table. Since the lampstand had no built-in rings or poles, it required an external carrying frame. The lampstand's wrapping is simpler than the ark's: only a blue cloth and takhash hide, with no intermediate colored layer.
11. The mizbeakh hazahav ('golden altar' — the incense altar) receives two layers: blue cloth underneath and takhash hide on top. Its baddav ('carrying poles') indicate it had built-in rings like the ark and table. The incense altar stood in the Holy Place directly before the veil, making it the last object encountered before the Most Holy Place.
12. The kelei hasharet ('vessels of service, ministry implements') is a catch-all category for remaining sacred utensils not individually listed. These are wrapped in the standard two-layer system: beged tekhelet ('blue-violet cloth') inside and takhash hide outside, then placed al-hamot ('on the carrying frame') since they lack their own built-in poles.
13. The verb dishenu ('they shall remove the fat-ashes') refers to cleaning the deshén — the fatty residue from burnt offerings on the bronze altar. This is the outdoor altar, distinct from the golden incense altar (v 11). The beged argaman ('purple cloth') is unique to this altar; no other object receives a purple covering. Purple (argaman — from a different murex species than tekhelet) was associated with royalty throughout the ancient Near East.
14. The bronze altar's tools are listed: makhtot ('fire pans, censers'), mizlagot ('forks' — for handling sacrificial meat), ya'im ('shovels' — for ashes), and mizraqot ('sprinkling bowls' — for blood manipulation). Each tool served a specific function in the sacrificial process. The takhash hide outer covering protected the entire assembly during transport.
15. This verse establishes the critical sequence: priests cover first (vekhilah Aharon uvanav lekhasot — 'when Aaron and his sons finish covering'), then Kohathites carry (yavo'u venei-Qehat laset — 'the sons of Kohath shall come to carry'). The prohibition velo-yigge'u el-haQodesh vametu ('they must not touch the holy things or they will die') makes the priests' covering work a life-saving act for the Kohathites. The term massa ('burden, load, transport assignment') defines their role specifically as carriers.
16. Eleazar's personal charge (pequddat) includes four consumable supplies: shemen hama'or ('oil for illumination'), qetoret hasammim ('incense of spices'), minkhat hatamid ('the perpetual grain offering'), and shemen hamishkhah ('the anointing oil'). Beyond these items, he has broader administrative oversight (pequddat kol-hamishkan — 'charge of the entire Tabernacle'). These consumables were irreplaceable sacred substances that required priestly custody.

17. This second speech formula in the chapter introduces a warning about protecting the Kohathites from fatal contact with sacred objects (vv 18-20). Again both Moses and Aaron are addressed, since the protective protocol requires coordinated action from both prophet and priest.
18. The warning al-takhrithu ('do not cut off, do not cause to be destroyed') uses a causative form — Moses and Aaron bear responsibility for preventing Kohathite deaths. The verb k-r-t ('to cut off') implies annihilation or extermination of a group. God charges the leaders with safeguarding the Kohathites through proper procedures rather than letting them perish through careless exposure to the sacred.
19. The life-or-death framing vekhayyu velo yamuthu ('so that they live and do not die') makes the procedural instructions an existential matter. The phrase ish ish al-avodato ve-el-massa'o ('each man to his service and to his load') indicates individualized assignments — no Kohathite should improvise or choose his own task. The priests' role as intermediaries between the sacred and the Levites is a protective function.
20. The phrase kevala ('as a swallowing' — for even an instant, in the blink of an eye) suggests the briefest possible glance. The root b-l-l' means 'to swallow,' and its use here indicates that even a momentary glimpse of the uncovered sacred objects would be lethal. The prohibition extends beyond touching (v 15) to seeing — visual contact with the uncovered holy things is equally fatal.
21. This speech formula shifts to Moses alone (without Aaron), introducing the Gershonite duties. Unlike the Kohathite section, the Gershonite and Merarite assignments involve less lethal risk and therefore do not require Aaron's direct involvement in the instructions.
22. The phrase gam-hem ('them also, they too') links the Gershonite census to the previously commanded Kohathite census (v 2). The same naso et-rosh ('lift up the head') idiom applies, confirming parallel census procedures across all three Levitical divisions.
23. The identical age range (thirty to fifty) and the phrase litsboh tsava ('to serve in the workforce' — literally 'to wage a campaign') confirm a uniform service framework across all Levitical clans. The doubled cognate construction litsboh tsava emphasizes the organized, military-like nature of the labor deployment.
24. The two-part description la'avod ulemassa ('to serve and for carrying') distinguishes between ongoing maintenance tasks (avodah — 'service, labor') and the specific transport responsibilities (massa — 'burden, load') when the camp relocates. The Gershonites had both stationary and mobile duties.
25. The Gershonite transport assignment covers the layered fabric system: yeri'ot hamishkan ('the curtain panels of the Tabernacle' — the inner linen curtains), the ohel mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting' — the goat-hair tent layer), mikhsehu ('its covering' — the ram-skin layer), and mikhseh hatakhsh ('the takhash covering' — the outermost protective layer). Each layer served a distinct structural and symbolic function.
26. The courtyard elements added to the Gershonite load include the qal'ei hekhatser ('courtyard hangings' — the linen curtain wall), the masakh petakh sha'ar hekhatser ('screen of the gate entrance of the courtyard' — the decorated gateway curtain), and meitreihem ('their ropes'). The closing ve'avadu ('and they shall serve') summarizes their comprehensive textile management role.
27. The phrase al-pi Aharon uvanav ('by the mouth of Aaron and his sons' — under Aaron's direction) places priestly authority over Gershonite labor. The verb ufeqadtem ('you shall assign, appoint') uses the same p-q-d root seen throughout Numbers for administrative oversight. Each load (massa) must be specifically assigned (bemishmeret — 'as a guarded charge'), preventing confusion during the complex disassembly process.
28. While Eleazar oversees the Kohathites and the most sacred materials (v 16), Ithamar (Itamar ben-Aharon) is assigned authority over the Gershonites. The phrase beyad Itamar ('by the hand of Ithamar') indicates direct administrative control. As the younger surviving son of Aaron, Ithamar oversees the less sacred but still essential textile and structural transport duties.
29. The Merarite census command uses tifqod otam ('you shall count them') rather than the naso et-rosh formula used for the Kohathites (v 2) and Gershonites (v 22). Despite the different verb, the census procedure is identical. The Merarites are addressed last, matching the birth order of Levi's sons: Gershon, Kohath, Merari.
30. The same thirty-to-fifty service window applies to all three Levitical clans. The phrase la'avod et-avodat ohel mo'ed ('to perform the work of the Tent of Meeting') uses the cognate accusative construction (work the work) common in Numbers for emphasizing the purposeful nature of the labor.
31. The Merarites' load consists entirely of heavy structural components: qarshei hamishkan ('frames of the Tabernacle' — the acacia-wood panels, each about 4.5 meters tall), berikhav ('its crossbars' — the horizontal stabilizing bars), ammudav ('its posts, pillars'), and adanav ('its bases, sockets' — the silver foundation pieces weighing about 34 kg each). This was physically the most demanding Levitical assignment.
32. The phrase uvshemot tifqedu et-kelei mishmeret massa'am ('by names you shall assign the equipment of their transport charge') is unique — each piece of heavy equipment must be inventoried by name and assigned to a specific person. This prevents items from being lost or abandoned during the move and ensures accountability for every structural component.
33. Like the Gershonites (v 28), the Merarites serve beyad Itamar ('under the hand of Ithamar'). The younger priestly son oversees both non-Kohathite divisions, while the elder Eleazar oversees the Kohathites and the sacred objects. This division mirrors the hierarchy of sacred items: most holy (Eleazar/Kohathites) versus holy but less dangerous (Ithamar/Gershonites and Merarites).
34. The census execution section (vv 34-49) reports the results. The involvement of nesi'ei ha'edah ('the leaders of the community' — the tribal chieftains) alongside Moses and Aaron shows the census was a collaborative administrative effort, not a solo prophetic task. The Kohathites are reported first, matching the instructional order.

35. The age criteria are repeated verbatim for each clan's census report (vv 35, 39, 43, 47) to formally certify that the same standard was applied uniformly. The phrase la'avodah be'ohel mo'ed ('for service in the Tent of Meeting') confirms the purpose-specific nature of this count: only active-duty personnel, not the total population counted in chapter 3.
36. The Kohathites' service-eligible total of alpa'im sheva me'ot vakhamishim (2,750) represents those between thirty and fifty. From the total of 8,600 males one month and older (3:28), this means roughly 32% fell within the active-duty age range — a plausible demographic proportion for an ancient population.
37. The certification formula al-pi YHWH beyad-Mosheh ('at the LORD's command through Moses' hand') combines two authority markers: divine origin (al-pi — 'by the mouth of') and human execution (beyad — 'by the hand of'). This double attribution legitimizes the census as both divinely mandated and properly administered.
38. The Gershonite census report begins with the same organizational framework: lemishpehotam uleveit avotam ('by their clans and by their ancestral households'). This verse functions as a header for the Gershonite count detailed in vv 39-41.
39. The age qualification is restated for the Gershonite report using identical language to the Kohathite census (v 35). The formulaic repetition across all three clan reports serves as a legal record, documenting that no exceptions or variations were made in the census methodology.
40. The Gershonites' service-eligible total of alpa'im veshesh me'ot usheloshim (2,630) is slightly fewer than the Kohathites' 2,750 despite their total population being similar. From 7,500 total males (3:22), about 35% were in the active-duty range — consistent with the Kohathite ratio.
41. The Gershonite certification formula says al-pi YHWH ('at the LORD's command') but omits the phrase beyad-Mosheh ('through Moses' hand') that appeared in the Kohathite closing (v 37). This slight variation in otherwise formulaic language is characteristic of Hebrew narrative style, which avoids exact mechanical repetition.
42. The Merarite census header follows the same pattern. The doubled lemishpehotam ('by their clans') after mishpehot ('clans of') creates a slightly redundant construction that emphasizes thorough organizational accounting at every administrative level.
43. The third repetition of the age qualification for the Merarite report completes the tripartite census structure. The consistent formula across verses 35, 39, and 43 creates a legal framework ensuring no clan could claim unequal treatment in the census process.
44. The Merarites' service-eligible total of sheloshet alafim umata'im (3,200) is the largest of the three clans' active-duty counts, despite having the smallest total population (6,200 in 3:34). This means approximately 52% of Merarite males were in the thirty-to-fifty range — a higher proportion that may reflect their need for physical strength to carry the heaviest structural components.
45. The Merarite closing formula restores the full beyad-Mosheh ('through Moses' hand') phrase that was absent from the Gershonite closing (v 41). The alternation between longer and shorter formulas — full in v 37 (Kohathites), abbreviated in v 41 (Gershonites), full again here — is a common Hebrew prose variation pattern.
46. The grand summary (vv 46-48) aggregates all three clans. The nesi'ei Yisra'el ('leaders of Israel' — the tribal chieftains from Num 1:5-16) are mentioned again, confirming their participation in the census. This collaborative leadership model — prophet, priest, and tribal chiefs — reflects the multi-layered governance structure of Israel in the wilderness.
47. The summary distinguishes two categories of Levitical work: avodat avodah ('service of service' — the ongoing maintenance and worship-support tasks) and avodat massa ('service of carrying' — the transport duties during camp movement). The first is stationary labor; the second is mobile. Together they encompass the full scope of Levitical responsibility.
48. The combined Levitical workforce of shemonat alafim vakhamesh me'ot ushemonim (8,580) equals 2,750 + 2,630 + 3,200 — the arithmetic checks perfectly. From the 22,000 total Levite males (3:39), about 39% were service-eligible — a reasonable working-age proportion. These 8,580 men were responsible for dismantling, transporting, and reassembling the entire Tabernacle complex.
49. The chapter's closing verse combines the authorization formula (al-pi YHWH — 'at the LORD's command'), the human agent (beyad-Mosheh — 'through Moses'), the individualized assignment (ish ish al-avodato ve'al-massa'o — 'each man to his task and his load'), and the compliance certification (ka'asher tsivah YHWH et-Mosheh — 'as the LORD commanded Moses'). This comprehensive closing seals the entire Levitical census and duty-assignment process as divinely ordered and faithfully executed.

Summary: Three distinct laws address purity and justice within the camp: removal of those with serious skin disease, bodily discharges, or corpse contamination (vv. 1-4); restitution for wrongs committed against others, including the role of the go'el (vv. 5-10); and the sotah ordeal for resolving suspected marital unfaithfulness when no witnesses exist (vv. 11-31).

What Makes This Remarkable: The sotah ritual is one of the most unusual procedures in the Torah — a divine trial by ordeal using 'bitter water' (mei hammarim) mixed with dust from the tabernacle floor and dissolved ink from a written curse. The text deliberately presents both possibilities — the wife may be guilty or innocent — and the ritual resolves ambiguity in either direction. That a wrong against another person is simultaneously described as ma'al ('unfaithfulness') toward God (v. 6) fuses the interpersonal and the divine.

Translation Friction: The verb tisteh ('she strays,' v. 12) from the root s-t-h implies moral wandering rather than simple movement — we chose 'strays' to preserve the metaphorical weight. The term ruach qin'ah ('spirit of jealousy/suspicion,' v. 14) was rendered 'spirit of suspicion' because the Hebrew allows for both justified and unjustified distrust, and 'jealousy' in English carries only the negative connotation. The go'el ('kinsman-redeemer,' v. 8) resists any single English word, carrying legal, familial, and redemptive dimensions simultaneously.

Connections: The restitution law (vv. 5-8) parallels Leviticus 5:20-26 (6:1-7 in English Bibles). The camp purity rationale — asher ani shokhen betokham ('in the midst of which I dwell,' v. 3) — echoes Exodus 25:8. The go'el institution appears prominently in Ruth 3-4 and anticipates the cities of refuge in Numbers 35.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²Command the Israelites to send out of the camp anyone with a serious skin disease, anyone with a bodily discharge, and anyone who has become ritually contaminated through contact with a corpse. ³Send out both male and female — remove them to outside the camp — so they do not contaminate their encampments, in the middle of which I dwell. ⁴The Israelites complied, sending those individuals outside the camp. They did exactly as the LORD had told Moses. ⁵The LORD spoke to Moses: ⁶Tell the Israelites: When a man or woman commits any wrong that people commit, acting unfaithfully against the LORD, and that person incurs guilt — ⁷they must confess the wrong they have committed. The offender must make full restitution for the liability, adding a fifth of its value on top, and pay it to the person who was wronged. ⁸If the wronged person has no kinsman-redeemer to whom the restitution can be paid, the restitution payment goes to the LORD — that is, to the priest — in addition to the ram of atonement through which expiation is made on the offender's behalf. ⁹Every sacred contribution from the Israelites' holy offerings that is presented to the priest belongs to that priest. ¹⁰Each person retains ownership of his own sacred gifts until presented; but whatever someone gives to the priest becomes the priest's property. ¹¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹²Tell the Israelites: If any man's wife strays and acts unfaithfully against him, ¹³and another man has sexual relations with her, but it was concealed from her husband's awareness — she kept it hidden and became defiled, yet there is no witness against her and she was not caught in the act — ¹⁴and a spirit of suspicion comes over him so that he suspects his wife — whether she has actually been defiled, or whether a spirit of suspicion comes over him and he suspects his wife even though she has not been defiled — ¹⁵the husband must bring his wife to the priest and bring her offering on her behalf: a tenth of an ephah of barley flour. He must not pour oil on it or place frankincense on it, because it is a grain offering of suspicion — a memorial offering that brings wrongdoing to light. ¹⁶The priest will bring her forward and present her before the LORD. ¹⁷The priest will take sacred water in a clay vessel and mix into it some of the dust from the tabernacle floor. ¹⁸The priest will stand the woman before the LORD, loosen her hair, and place the memorial offering — the grain offering of suspicion — in her hands. Meanwhile the priest will hold the bitter water that carries the curse. ¹⁹The priest will place her under oath and say to the woman: 'If no man has slept with you, and if you have not strayed into defilement while under your husband's authority, may you be immune to this bitter water that carries the curse. ²⁰But if you have strayed while under your husband's authority and have become defiled — if a man other than your husband has been intimate with you —' ²¹— then the priest will put the woman under the oath that invokes a curse, saying to her: 'May the LORD make you an example of cursing and oath-swearing among your people, when the LORD causes your body to waste away and your abdomen to distend. ²²May this water that carries the curse enter your body, causing your abdomen to distend and your reproductive organs to waste away.' And the woman must respond: 'So be it, so be it.' ²³The priest will write these curse-words on a scroll and then wash the ink off into the bitter water. ²⁴He will make the woman drink the bitter water that carries the curse. When the curse-laden water enters her, it will produce bitter effects. ²⁵The priest will then take the grain offering of suspicion from the woman's hands, elevate the offering before the LORD, and bring it to the altar. ²⁶The priest will scoop out the memorial portion from the grain offering and burn it on the altar. After that, he will have the woman drink the water. ²⁷After he has her drink the water, if she has been defiled and has acted unfaithfully against her husband, the curse-laden water will enter her and produce bitter effects — her abdomen will distend and her reproductive organs will waste away. That woman will become an object of cursing among her people. ²⁸But if the woman has not been defiled and is pure, she will be cleared of guilt and will be able to conceive children. ²⁹This is the procedure for cases of suspected unfaithfulness — when a wife strays while under her husband's authority and becomes defiled, ³⁰or when a spirit of suspicion overcomes a husband and he suspects his wife. He shall present the woman before the LORD, and the priest will carry out this entire procedure regarding her. ³¹The husband will be free of any guilt for bringing the charge, while the woman — if guilty — will bear the consequences of her wrongdoing.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard revelation formula vayedabber YHWH el Mosheh le'mor introduces the first of three distinct legal sections in this chapter: camp purity (vv 1-4), restitution for wrongs (vv 5-10), and the suspected adultery ordeal (vv 11-31). Each section begins with this same introductory formula.
2. Three categories of ritual impurity require removal from the camp: tsarua ('one afflicted with tsara'at' — a term covering various skin diseases broader than modern leprosy), zav ('one with a bodily discharge' — including both pathological and normal genital emissions per Leviticus 15), and tame lanefesh ('contaminated by a dead person' — literally 'impure to a soul/corpse'). These three represent escalating levels of impurity in the priestly system.
3. The expulsion applies equally to men and women (mizzakhar ad neqevah — 'from male to female'). The theological rationale is stated directly: asher ani shokhen betokham ('in the midst of which I dwell'). God's presence within the camp makes ritual purity a spatial necessity — impurity and divine holiness cannot coexist in the same space. The verb shokhen ('dwelling, residing') is the root of mishkan ('tabernacle/dwelling place').
4. The obedience formula is doubled for emphasis: vayyaasu khi ('they did so') at the beginning and ken asu benei Yisra'el ('so did the Israelites') at the end. This bracketing structure underscores complete compliance. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the camp purity section and separates it from the restitution law that follows.
5. This second revelation formula introduces the restitution law (vv 5-10), a section dealing with confession and financial compensation for wrongs committed against other people. The placement of this law between the camp purity laws and the jealousy ordeal creates a thematic progression: physical impurity, moral transgression, then suspected marital unfaithfulness.
6. The law applies equally to men and women (ish o ishab). The phrase lim'ol ma'al baYHWH ('to act unfaithfully against the LORD') is significant: a wrong against another person is simultaneously described as unfaithfulness toward God. The root m-'l ('to act treacherously, to breach trust') is used for both human betrayal and covenant violation. The term ve'ashmah ('and becomes guilty') indicates the objective state of liability, not merely subjective feeling.
7. Three steps are required: confession (vehitvaddu — a reflexive form meaning 'they shall confess themselves'), full restitution of the principal amount (bero'sho — literally 'in its head/capital'), and a twenty-percent penalty surcharge (chamishito — 'its fifth'). The verb veheshiv ('and he shall return') frames restitution as restoration — giving back what was taken. This parallels the Leviticus 5:20-26 (6:1-7 in English) guilt offering law.
8. The go'el ('kinsman-redeemer') is the closest male relative who acts as the family's legal representative. If the victim has died without an heir, the go'el receives restitution on their behalf. If no go'el exists at all, the payment reverts to God through His priestly representative. The eil hakkippurim ('ram of atonement') is an additional sacrifice beyond the financial restitution — the offender must address both the human and divine dimensions of the wrong.
9. The term terumah ('contribution, raised offering' — from the root r-w-m, 'to raise') refers to the portion separated for sacred use. This verse establishes a general priestly entitlement principle: qodashei benei Yisra'el ('holy things of the Israelites') presented to a priest become his personal property. This principle extends beyond the specific restitution case to all sacred contributions.
10. The first clause — ish et qodashav lo yihyu ('a man's holy things shall be his') — is interpreted variously: either that a person owns the holy things until transferring them, or that each person controls which priest receives his offering. The second clause confirms the transfer principle: once given to a priest, it belongs to that priest. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the restitution section.

11. This third revelation formula introduces the longest and most complex section of the chapter: the sotah ordeal (vv 11-31), a ritual procedure for resolving cases of suspected marital unfaithfulness where no witnesses exist. The rabbinic tradition calls this passage 'parashat sotah' (the section of the wayward wife). It is one of the most debated passages in biblical law.
12. The verb tisteh ('she strays, she turns aside') is from the root s-t-h, which implies deviation from a path — moral wandering rather than a simple directional word. The phrase uma'alāh vo mā'al ('and acts treacherously against him') uses the same m-'l root from verse 6, creating a verbal link between financial wrong and marital betrayal. The distributive ish ish ('any man whatsoever') makes the law universally applicable.
13. The phrase shakhav ishah otah shikhvat zera ('a man lay with her, a lying of seed') is the standard biblical expression for sexual intercourse. Four conditions define the scenario: concealment from the husband (ne'elam me'einei ishah — 'hidden from her husband's eyes'), secrecy (venisterah — 'she was hidden'), possible defilement (vehi nitma'ah — 'she was defiled'), and absence of proof — no witness (ed ein bah) and no apprehension in the act (lo nitpasah).
14. The phrase ruach qin'ah ('spirit of jealousy/suspicion') describes an overwhelming feeling of distrust that may or may not be justified. The text deliberately presents both scenarios — vehi nitma'ah ('and she was defiled') and vehi lo nitma'ah ('and she was not defiled') — establishing that the ordeal applies regardless of actual guilt. The ritual resolves ambiguity in either direction, protecting both the suspicious husband's concern and the potentially innocent wife.
15. The offering is distinctive in three ways: it uses barley flour (qemach se'orim) rather than the usual fine wheat flour, it lacks oil, and it lacks frankincense. These absences strip the offering of any celebratory quality — it is austere and somber. Barley was the cheaper grain, associated with poverty or animal feed. The double designation minchat qena'ot ('offering of jealousy/suspicion') and minchat zikkaron mazkeret avon ('memorial offering bringing wrongdoing to remembrance') defines its investigative purpose.
16. The verb vehiqriv ('he shall bring near') is the standard sacrificial term for presenting an offering. The woman is brought lipnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — she stands in the divine presence at the tabernacle entrance, placing the entire proceeding under divine jurisdiction. The priest acts as mediator between the human dispute and divine adjudication.
17. The ritual elements are charged with symbolic meaning: mayim qedoshim ('holy water' — possibly water from the bronze basin or a specially consecrated source), a keli chares ('clay vessel' — ordinary, breakable pottery, perhaps symbolizing fragility), and afar ('dust') from the tabernacle floor (qarqa hammishkan). The tabernacle dust connects the ritual to the sacred space itself. The combination produces the 'bitter water' that will serve as the ritual's central agent.
18. The loosening of her hair (ufara et rosh ha'ishah — literally 'and he shall unbind the head of the woman') is a significant ritual act. Bound hair was a sign of respectability; unbound hair indicated mourning, shame, or transition into a liminal state. The woman holds the grain offering while the priest holds the mei hammarim hame'arrim ('the bitter waters that bring the curse'). The dual identification minchat hazzikkaron / minchat qena'ot ('memorial offering / suspicion offering') is repeated from verse 15.
19. The oath formula begins with the case of innocence: im lo shakhav ish otakh ('if no man has lain with you') and im lo satit tum'ah tachat ishekh ('if you have not strayed into impurity under your husband' — tachat meaning 'under the authority of'). The verb hinnaqei ('be free, be immune') is an imperative of acquittal — if innocent, the water will have no effect. The structure — innocence scenario first, then guilt scenario (v 20) — gives rhetorical precedence to the possibility of innocence.
20. The guilt scenario uses the same vocabulary inverted: ki satit tachat ishekh ('since you have strayed under your husband') and vekhi nitme't ('since you have become defiled'). The phrase vayyitten ish bakh et shekhavto mibbal'adei ishekh ('a man has placed his emission in you apart from your husband') is sexually explicit in the Hebrew — the directness is characteristic of legal language that must be precise about the offense being adjudicated.
21. The shevuat ha'alāh ('oath of the curse') is a self-imprecatory oath — the woman invokes consequences upon herself if guilty. The physical effects described — yerekeh nofelet ('your thigh/side falling' — wasting of the reproductive organs) and bitnekh tsavah ('your belly swelling/distending') — likely describe reproductive dysfunction or a miscarriage. The euphemistic term yerekh ('thigh') frequently refers to the reproductive area in Hebrew (cf. Genesis 24:2, 46:26). The woman becomes le'alāh velishvu'ah ('a byword of cursing and oath-swearing') — her name would be invoked in future curse formulas.
22. The curse water is described as entering beme'ayikh ('into your intestines/innards'), specifying that the effect is internal and bodily. The woman's double amen (amen amen) constitutes formal legal consent to the ordeal — she voluntarily submits to divine adjudication. The word amen derives from the root 'm-n ('to be firm, trustworthy') and here functions as an oath ratification: 'let it be established, let it be so.'
23. The priest records the curses bassefer ('on a scroll/document') — a written legal instrument. He then dissolves the writing into the water: umachah el mei hammarim ('and he shall blot/erase into the bitter water'). The verb machah ('to wipe away, to dissolve') means the ink itself becomes part of the potion. This is a unique biblical ritual in which written words are physically consumed — the curses literally enter the body. The act transforms language into substance.
24. The verse describes the pivotal moment: vehishqah et ha'ishah ('he shall cause the woman to drink'). The phrase uva'u vah hammayim hame'arrim lemarim ('and the cursing waters shall enter her to bitterness') uses a wordplay: the waters are both me'arrim ('cursing,' from the root 'r-r) and marim ('bitter,' from the root m-r-r). The double meaning — cursing and bitterness — reinforces the water's dual nature as both ritual instrument and potential punishment.

25. Three ritual actions occur in sequence: the priest takes the minchat haqena'ot ('suspicion offering') from the woman's hands (she has been holding it since v 18), performs the tenufah ('wave/elevation offering' — the term henif describes lifting and moving the offering before the LORD), and approaches the altar (vehiqriv otah el hammizbe'ach). The progression moves the offering from the woman's possession to the divine realm.
26. The verb vaqamats ('he shall scoop/take a handful') describes the standard grain offering procedure: extracting the azkaratah ('its memorial portion' — the representative handful burned on the altar). The remainder would be eaten by the priests. The sequence is precise: the altar offering comes first (vehiqtir hammizbe'chah), then the drinking (ve'achar yashqeh et ha'ishah et hammayim — 'and afterward he shall make the woman drink the water'). The sacrificial act precedes and sanctifies the ordeal.
27. The guilty outcome is described: if she is nitme'ah ('defiled') and vatim'ol ma'al be'ishah ('acted treacherously against her husband'), the physical consequences follow — vetsavetah bitnah ('her belly will swell') and venafela yerekhah ('her thigh/reproductive area will fall/waste'). She becomes le'alah beqerev ammah ('a curse-word among her people') — her name invoked in future imprecations. The conditional im ('if') is critical: the punishment is contingent on actual guilt, not on the accusation.
28. The acquittal outcome is stated with equal clarity: im lo nitme'ah ha'ishah utehorah hi ('if the woman is not defiled and is pure'), she receives two results — veniqqetah ('she shall be acquitted/cleared') and venizre'ah zara ('she shall be sown with seed,' i.e., she will conceive). The fertility promise is significant: vindication brings not merely freedom from punishment but positive blessing. Some rabbinic interpreters understand this as a promise of easier childbirth or more children rather than initial fertility.
29. The phrase zot torat haqena'ot ('this is the instruction/law of the jealousies') is a closing formula identifying the entire section as a distinct legal category. The term torah here means 'instruction, procedure, protocol' rather than 'Law' in the grand sense. The phrase tachat ishah ('under her husband') uses tachat ('beneath, under') in the sense of marital authority — the same preposition appears in the similar expression in verse 20.
30. This verse provides the alternative trigger: the husband's suspicion alone (ruach qin'ah — 'spirit of jealousy/suspicion'), even without evidence of wrongdoing. The husband's role is to present the woman (vehe'emid et ha'ishah lipnei YHWH — 'and he shall stand the woman before the LORD'); the priest's role is to execute the ritual (ve'asah lah hakkohen et kol hattorah hazot — 'the priest shall perform for her all this instruction'). The division of roles ensures that no individual husband can unilaterally punish — only the divinely mediated ritual adjudicates.
31. The closing verse addresses the husband's legal liability: veniqqah ha'ish me'avon ('the man shall be clean from iniquity') — he bears no guilt for initiating the process, even if the wife is found innocent. This protects men from false-accusation liability when they act on genuine suspicion. The final phrase veha'ishah hahi tissa et avonah ('that woman shall bear her iniquity') applies only in the case of guilt — she bears the full consequences. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the sotah section and the chapter. Rabbinic tradition records that the Sanhedrin discontinued this ordeal around the first century CE (Mishnah Sotah 9:9), citing the prevalence of male infidelity as grounds.

Summary: Two very different subjects stand side by side: the Nazirite vow (vv. 1-21), by which any Israelite — man or woman — may voluntarily take on priestly-level holiness through abstaining from wine, avoiding corpse contact, and letting the hair grow; and the priestly blessing (vv. 22-27), the three-line benediction Aaron and his sons are commanded to speak over Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Nazirite is declared qadosh ('holy') — a status otherwise reserved for priests and sacred objects — through voluntary action, not birth. The verb ya'fli ('makes extraordinary,' v. 2) frames the vow as something remarkable, not routine. If accidental corpse contact breaks the vow, all previous days 'fall away' (yippelu, v. 12) — holiness does not accumulate partially. The priestly blessing is pure poetry: three lines of escalating length (3, 5, and 7 Hebrew words), each invoking the divine name YHWH.

Translation Friction: The word nezer carries the double meaning of 'consecration' and 'crown,' and we could not collapse the two senses into one English word. The Nazirite's uncut hair functions as both. In the priestly blessing, the jussive verbs (yevarekekha, ya'er, yissa) express a wish that carries divine authority — not mere hope but authorized declaration. We rendered them with 'may' to preserve the prayerful tone while noting in the translator notes that these are performative, not optative.

Connections: The Nazirite's corpse prohibition exceeds ordinary priestly limits (Leviticus 21:1-3) and matches only the high priest's restriction (Leviticus 21:11). Samson (Judges 13:5) and Samuel (1 Samuel 1:11) are associated with lifelong Nazirite vows. The priestly blessing's 'may the LORD lift His face toward you' (v. 26) contrasts with God hiding His face in judgment (Deuteronomy 31:17-18).

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When a man or woman makes a special vow — the vow of a Nazirite — to set themselves apart for the LORD, ³they must abstain from wine and fermented drink. They must not drink wine vinegar or vinegar made from fermented drink, nor drink any grape juice, nor eat grapes fresh or dried. ⁴For the entire period of their consecration, they must not eat anything produced from the grapevine, from seeds to skin. ⁵For the entire period of their Nazirite vow, no razor may pass over their head. Until the days of their consecration to the LORD are complete, they are holy — they must let the hair of their head grow long. ⁶For the entire period of their consecration to the LORD, they must not go near a dead body. ⁷Even for a father or mother, brother or sister — they must not make themselves ritually impure when these relatives die, because the consecration of their God is upon their head. ⁸For the entire period of their consecration, they are holy to the LORD. ⁹If someone dies suddenly in their presence, defiling the head of their consecration, they must shave their head on the day of their purification — on the seventh day they must shave it. ¹⁰On the eighth day they must bring two turtledoves or two young pigeons to the priest at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ¹¹The priest shall offer one as a purification offering and the other as a burnt offering, making atonement for them because they incurred guilt through the dead body. The priest shall reconsecrate their head that same day. ¹²They must rededicate to the LORD the days of their consecration and bring a year-old male lamb as a guilt offering. The previous days are voided, because their consecration was defiled. ¹³This is the instruction for the Nazirite when the period of their consecration is complete: they shall be brought to the entrance of the tent of meeting. ¹⁴They shall present their offering to the LORD: one unblemished year-old male lamb as a burnt offering, one unblemished year-old ewe lamb as a purification offering, and one unblemished ram as a peace offering, ¹⁵along with a basket of unleavened bread — loaves of fine flour mixed with oil and unleavened wafers spread with oil — together with their grain offerings and drink offerings. ¹⁶The priest shall present them before the LORD and offer the purification offering and the burnt offering. ¹⁷The ram he shall offer as a sacrifice of peace offerings to the LORD, along with the basket of unleavened bread. The priest shall also present the grain offering and the drink offering. ¹⁸The Nazirite shall shave the consecrated head at the entrance of the tent of meeting, take the hair of their consecrated head, and place it on the fire beneath the peace offering sacrifice. ¹⁹The priest shall take the boiled shoulder from the ram, one unleavened loaf from the basket, and one unleavened wafer, and place them on the palms of the Nazirite after they have shaved the head of their consecration. ²⁰The priest shall elevate them as a wave offering before the LORD. These are holy portions belonging to the priest, along with the breast of the wave offering and the thigh of the contribution. After this, the Nazirite may drink wine. ²¹This is the instruction for the Nazirite who has vowed — their offering to the LORD for their consecration, apart from whatever else they can afford. According to the vow they have made, so they must do, following the instruction for their consecration." ²²The LORD spoke to Moses: ²³"Speak to Aaron and his sons and tell them: This is how you shall bless the Israelites. Say to them: ²⁴May the LORD bless you and guard you. ²⁵May the LORD make His face shine upon you and show you grace. ²⁶May the LORD lift up His face toward you and grant you peace. ²⁷So they shall place My name upon the Israelites, and I Myself will bless them."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard divine speech formula (vaydabber YHWH el-Mosheh) introduces a new block of legislation. This section (v1-21) governs the Nazirite vow, followed immediately by the priestly blessing (v22-27) — voluntary human consecration paired with divine benediction.
2. The verb yafli (from pala, 'to be extraordinary, wonderful') frames the Nazirite vow as something remarkable — not routine piety but an extraordinary act of devotion. Both men and women may take this vow, a notable inclusion. The root n-z-r ('to separate, consecrate') appears three times in this verse, emphasizing the total-separation concept.
3. The prohibition extends far beyond wine itself to anything derived from the grapevine — vinegar, juice, fresh grapes, raisins. The comprehensiveness is deliberate: the vine represents celebration and ordinary pleasure, and the Nazirite renounces the entire category. The verb yazzir (from n-z-r) governs the sentence — 'they must separate themselves from wine.'
4. The phrase 'from seeds to skin' (mechartsannim ve'ad-zag) is a Hebrew merism — naming both extremes to include everything in between. Nothing from the vine, in any form, may enter the Nazirite's body. The comprehensiveness underscores that this is not a dietary preference but a total separation from the domain the vine represents.

5. The uncut hair is the visible sign of the vow — the Nazirite carries their consecration publicly. The text declares qadosh yihyeh ('they shall be holy') — a status otherwise reserved for priests and sacred objects. The growing hair functions as a kind of crown (nezer can mean both 'consecration' and 'crown'), marking the Nazirite as set apart in a way others can see.
6. The Hebrew uses nephesh met ('dead person,' literally 'dead soul') — contact with death is the most serious source of ritual impurity in the Israelite system. This restriction parallels the high priest's rules in Leviticus 21:11. The Nazirite, though a layperson, takes on the highest priestly purity standard voluntarily.
7. This exceeds even ordinary priestly obligations — regular priests may attend family funerals (Lev 21:1-3). Only the high priest shares this restriction (Lev 21:11). The phrase nezer Elohav al-rosho ('the consecration of his God is upon his head') treats the uncut hair as a sacred diadem. The vow outranks even the deepest family bonds — a stunning claim about the priority of voluntary holiness.
8. A summary declaration — qadosh hu laYHWH ('holy, they are, to the LORD'). The brevity is emphatic. The Nazirite's holiness is not aspirational but actual during the vow period. This verse functions as the conclusion of the three prohibitions (wine, razor, corpse) — together they constitute what makes the person qadosh.
9. The text imagines an accidental breach — someone dies 'suddenly, in an instant' (befeta pitom) beside the Nazirite through no fault of their own. Even unintentional contamination defiles 'the head of their consecration' — the hair that symbolizes the vow. The seven-day purification period follows the standard corpse-contamination protocol of Numbers 19. The contaminated hair must be removed before the vow can restart.
10. Turtledoves (torim) and young pigeons (benei yonah) are the offering accessible to the poor — the same pair prescribed for purification after childbirth (Lev 12:8) and skin disease (Lev 14:22). The eighth day marks the transition from impurity back toward holiness, paralleling circumcision on the eighth day and the consecration of the altar (Lev 9:1).
11. Two offerings work together: the chata't (purification offering) cleanses the contamination; the olah (burnt offering) represents renewed total devotion. The verb kipper ('make atonement') appears here alongside the unusual phrase chata al-hannephesh — the Nazirite 'sinned against the person' (i.e., incurred guilt through contact with the corpse). The priest then 'reconsecrates' (qiddash) the head — the vow restarts from zero.
12. The asham (guilt offering) here addresses the trespass against holy status — the Nazirite's consecrated state was a sacred possession, and its contamination requires reparation. The harshest clause: all previous days of the vow 'fall away' (yippelu) — they count for nothing. The vow must be fulfilled in full from the beginning, no credit for time already served. Holiness does not accumulate partially.
13. Torah here means 'instruction, law, procedure' — the technical regulations for completing the vow. The passive 'shall be brought' (yavi oto) suggests the Nazirite is presented formally, almost like a sacrificial offering being brought before the LORD. The entrance of the tent of meeting is the threshold between ordinary and sacred space.
14. Three of the five Levitical offering types appear together: olah (burnt offering — total devotion), chata't (purification offering — cleansing), and shelamim (peace offering — communion meal). The Nazirite's completion ceremony recapitulates the entire sacrificial system in miniature. All three animals must be tamim ('unblemished, whole, complete') — the physical wholeness of the animal mirrors the completeness of the vow.
15. The unleavened bread (matzot) echoes the Passover and exodus. The grain offering (minchah) and drink offerings (nesakhim) accompany the animal sacrifices. The KJV's 'meat offering' for minchah is misleading — minchah is specifically the grain offering, never meat. The elaborate provision — three animals, bread, grain, wine — shows that completing a Nazirite vow was a significant and costly act of worship.
16. The order matters: purification (chata't) before burnt offering (olah). Cleansing precedes devotion — the sanctuary must be purified before the worshipper can offer total surrender. This sequence appears throughout Leviticus and Numbers whenever both offerings are prescribed together.
17. The shelamim (peace offering) is the culminating sacrifice — the one the worshipper shares in as a meal. From the root shalom, this offering celebrates restored relationship. The Nazirite, having completed the vow, sits down to eat with God. The unleavened bread basket accompanies the fellowship meal, making this a communal feast of completion.
18. The hair — which has been qadosh throughout the vow — is placed in the fire of the shelamim, effectively making it part of the offering to God. The hair is not merely cut and discarded but ritually consumed. It carried the holiness of the vow, and that holiness is returned to God through fire. The location at the tent entrance ensures this is a public, liturgical act, not a private grooming.
19. The Hebrew beshelah means 'boiled, cooked' (not 'sodden' in the modern sense of 'soggy'). The shoulder (zeroa) placed in the Nazirite's hands is a ritually significant portion. The items placed on the palms — shoulder, loaf, wafer — are about to be waved before the LORD, making the Nazirite an active participant in the offering rather than a passive observer.
20. The final clause — 'after this, the Nazirite may drink wine' — marks the formal end of the vow with striking simplicity. The very thing that was prohibited first (v3) is now permitted again. The wave offering (tenufah) involves a ritual lifting or swinging motion before the LORD, presenting the food to God before the priest receives it. The breast and thigh are the priest's standard portions from peace offerings (Lev 7:31-34).
21. The phrase 'apart from whatever else their hand can reach' (millevad asher-tassig yado) acknowledges economic variability — the prescribed offerings are the minimum, and wealthier Nazirites may add more. The closing formula ('according to their vow, so they must do') treats the vow with absolute seriousness. What is promised to God must be fulfilled exactly. The Nazirite laws end here; verses 22-27 shift to an entirely different subject — the priestly blessing.

22. A new divine speech formula introduces the priestly blessing (v23-27). The juxtaposition with the Nazirite vow is deliberate: after describing how an individual Israelite can voluntarily become holy, the text prescribes how God's blessing descends on the entire community through priestly mediation. Individual consecration and communal benediction side by side.
23. God prescribes the exact words — koh tevarékhu ('thus you shall bless'). The priests do not compose their own blessings; they speak God's words. The verb amar ('say') in the infinitive absolute (amor) indicates the precise, formal pronunciation required. The blessing is not a wish or a prayer but a divinely authorized declaration spoken by priestly authority.
24. The first line of the three-line priestly blessing. The Hebrew is three words: yevarekekha YHWH veyishmerekha. The verbs are jussive — expressing a wish or command that carries divine authority. 'Bless' (barakh) encompasses all forms of flourishing — life, provision, fertility, favor. 'Guard' (shamar) implies watchful protection, the same verb used for tending the garden in Genesis 2:15. The blessing begins with God's active care.
25. The second line adds two words to the pattern (five Hebrew words vs. three in v24). 'Make His face shine' (ya'er panav) — a turned, radiant face means favorable attention, as opposed to a hidden or averted face which means rejection or absence. The metaphor is relational: God's 'face' directed toward you means God is personally engaged with you. Vichunneka ('show you grace/be gracious') — from chen, unmerited favor. Grace here is God's disposition to give beyond what is deserved.
26. The third line is the longest — seven Hebrew words, completing the ascending pattern: 3-5-7. 'Lift up His face toward you' (yissa YHWH panav elekha) — a judge who 'lifts the face' of a petitioner looks at them with favor rather than dismissing them. The blessing asks God to regard Israel with the attentive gaze of a favorable judge, a loving parent, a protector. The final word is shalom — the theological summit of the entire blessing. The three-line structure builds: blessing favor peace. Each line is longer, weightier, and more comprehensive than the last.
27. The chapter's final verse reveals the mechanics of the blessing: the priests 'place' (samu) God's name on Israel. The name functions as a seal of ownership and protection — to bear God's name is to belong to God. The emphatic final pronoun — va'ani avarekhem, 'and I, I will bless them' — makes clear that the priests are the instruments but God is the source. The priestly blessing is not priestly power; it is divinely authorized speech that God Himself ratifies and enacts.

Summary: The twelve tribal leaders present dedication offerings over twelve consecutive days, beginning with the consecration of the tabernacle. Each leader brings an identical gift — silver plate, silver basin, gold ladle filled with incense, and multiple animals for burnt, purification, and peace offerings. The chapter closes with God speaking to Moses from between the cherubim on the ark's cover.

What Makes This Remarkable: At 89 verses, this is the longest chapter in the Torah. The twelve offerings are described in near-identical language, and the repetition is the point: each tribe is honored with its own full accounting rather than a summary. No tribe's gift is abbreviated or dismissed. The identical offerings express equality among the tribes despite differences in size and status. The chapter also records God accepting the leaders' spontaneous initiative — their gifts were not commanded but were divinely approved after the fact.

Translation Friction: The term nasi ('leader, prince, chief,' v. 2) from the root n-s-' ('to lift, elevate') avoids royal connotations. We rendered it 'leader' rather than 'prince' throughout, since these are tribal representatives, not monarchs. The word kallot ('completing,' v. 1) links the tabernacle's erection to its commissioning — a connection we preserved by rendering it 'finished setting up' rather than separating the two moments.

Connections: The twelve leaders are the same men named in Numbers 1:5-16 who oversaw the census. The wagons given to the Levites (vv. 6-9) directly serve the transport duties assigned in Numbers 4. The Kohathites receive no wagons because they must carry the sacred objects on their shoulders (v. 9; cf. 4:15). God's voice from between the cherubim (v. 89) fulfills the promise of Exodus 25:22.

1On the day Moses finished setting up the Tabernacle, he anointed and consecrated it along with all its equipment — the altar and all its utensils — anointing and consecrating everything. 2The leaders of Israel — the heads of their ancestral households, the tribal leaders who had overseen the census — came forward with offerings. 3They brought their offering before the LORD: six covered wagons and twelve oxen — one wagon for every two leaders and one ox from each — and presented them in front of the Tabernacle. 4The LORD spoke to Moses: 5"Accept these from them — they will be used in the service of the Tent of Meeting. Give them to the Levites, to each division according to its duties." 6So Moses accepted the wagons and oxen and distributed them to the Levites. 7He gave two wagons and four oxen to the Gershonites, suited to their duties. ⁸He gave four wagons and eight oxen to the Merarites, suited to their duties under the supervision of Ithamar son of Aaron the priest. ⁹But to the Kohathites he gave nothing, because the sacred service assigned to them required carrying the holy objects on their shoulders. ¹⁰The leaders also brought their dedication offerings for the altar on the day it was anointed. The leaders presented their offerings before the altar. ¹¹The LORD said to Moses, "They are to present their offerings one leader per day, one leader per day, for the dedication of the altar." ¹²The one who presented his offering on the first day was Nahshon son of Amminadab, from the tribe of Judah. ¹³His offering was one silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, one silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard — both filled with fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering; ¹⁴one gold ladle of ten shekels, filled with incense; ¹⁵one young bull, one ram, one male lamb in its first year, as a burnt offering; ¹⁶one male goat as a purification offering; ¹⁷and for a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, and five male lambs in their first year. This was the offering of Nahshon son of Amminadab. ¹⁸On the second day, Nethanel son of Zuar, the leader of Issachar, brought his offering. ¹⁹He presented as his offering one silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, one silver basin of seventy shekels according to the sanctuary standard — both filled with fine flour blended with oil for a grain offering; ²⁰a single gold ladle weighing ten shekels, full of incense; ²¹one young bull, one ram, and one yearling male lamb for a burnt offering; ²²one male goat for a purification offering; ²³For a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five yearling male lambs. This was the offering of Nethanel son of Zuar. ²⁴On the third day, Eliab son of Helon, leader of the Zebulunites, presented his offering. ²⁵His offering: a silver plate of one hundred thirty shekels weight, a silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard, each filled with fine flour stirred with oil as a grain offering; ²⁶one gold ladle, ten shekels in weight, filled with incense; ²⁷a young bull, a ram, and a first-year male lamb as a burnt offering; ²⁸one male goat as a purification offering; ²⁹As a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, and five first-year male lambs. This was the offering of Eliab son of Helon. ³⁰On the fourth day, Elizur son of Shedeur, leader of the Reubenites, brought his offering. ³¹His offering consisted of one silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, one silver basin of seventy shekels measured by the sanctuary standard, both full of fine flour mixed with oil for a grain offering; ³²a gold ladle of ten shekels weight, full of incense; ³³one young bull, one ram, one male lamb in its first year, for a burnt offering; ³⁴one male goat as a purification offering; ³⁵For a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five male lambs in their first year. This was the offering of Elizur son of Shedeur. ³⁶On the fifth day, Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai, leader of the Simeonites, presented his offering. ³⁷His offering was a silver plate — one hundred thirty shekels in weight — and a silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard, both containing fine flour blended with oil as a grain offering; ³⁸one gold ladle weighing ten shekels, filled with incense; ³⁹one young bull, one ram, and one yearling male lamb as a burnt offering; ⁴⁰one male goat for a purification offering; ⁴¹And as a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five yearling male lambs. This was the offering of Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ⁴²On the sixth day, Eliasaph son of Deuel, leader of the Gadites, brought his offering. ⁴³His offering: one silver plate of one hundred thirty shekels weight, one silver basin at seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard, each filled with fine flour combined with oil for a grain offering; ⁴⁴a gold ladle of ten shekels, filled with incense; ⁴⁵a young bull, one ram, and one first-year male lamb for a burnt offering; ⁴⁶a male goat as a purification offering; ⁴⁷For a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, and five first-year male lambs. This was the offering of Eliasaph son of Deuel. ⁴⁸On the seventh day, Elishama son of Ammihud, leader of the Ephraimites, presented his offering. ⁴⁹His offering was a silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels and a silver basin of seventy shekels according to the sanctuary standard, both of them full of fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering; ⁵⁰one gold ladle, ten shekels, full of incense; ⁵¹one young bull, one ram, one male lamb in its first year as a burnt offering; ⁵²one male goat for a purification offering; ⁵³As a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five male lambs in their first year. This was the offering of Elishama son of Ammihud. ⁵⁴On the eighth day, Gamaliel son of Pedahzur, leader of the Manassites, brought his offering. ⁵⁵His offering: one silver plate at one hundred thirty shekels in weight, one silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard — both filled with fine flour stirred into oil for a grain offering; ⁵⁶a gold ladle at ten shekels weight, filled with incense; ⁵⁷one young bull, one ram, and a yearling male lamb for a burnt offering; ⁵⁸one male goat as a purification offering; ⁵⁹For a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, and five yearling male lambs. This was the offering of Gamaliel son of Pedahzur. ⁶⁰On the ninth day, Abidan son of Gideoni, leader of the Benjaminites, presented his offering. ⁶¹His offering was one silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, one silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard, both containing fine flour blended with oil as a grain offering; ⁶²one gold ladle of ten shekels, full of incense; ⁶³a young bull, a ram, and a first-year male lamb as a burnt offering; ⁶⁴a male goat for a purification offering; ⁶⁵As a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five first-year male lambs. This was the offering of Abidan son of Gideoni. ⁶⁶On the tenth day, Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai, leader of the Danites, brought his offering. ⁶⁷His offering consisted of a silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels and a silver basin of seventy shekels measured by the sanctuary standard, both full of fine flour mixed with oil for a grain offering; ⁶⁸a gold ladle weighing ten shekels, filled with incense; ⁶⁹one young bull, one ram, one yearling male lamb for a burnt offering; ⁷⁰one male goat as a purification offering; ⁷¹For a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five male lambs in their first year. This was the offering of Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai. ⁷²On the eleventh day, Pagiel son of Ocran, leader of the Asherites, presented his offering. ⁷³His offering was a silver plate of one hundred thirty shekels weight, a silver basin of seventy shekels by the sanctuary standard, both filled with fine flour combined with oil as a grain offering; ⁷⁴one gold ladle, ten shekels in weight, full of incense; ⁷⁵a young bull, one ram, and one male lamb in its first year as a burnt offering; ⁷⁶one male goat for a purification offering; ⁷⁷And for a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five yearling male lambs. This was the offering of Pagiel son of Ocran. ⁷⁸On the twelfth day, Ahira son of Enan, leader of the Naphtalites, brought his offering. ⁷⁹His offering: one silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, one silver basin of seventy shekels according to the sanctuary standard, each of them full of fine flour blended with oil for a grain offering; ⁸⁰a gold ladle of ten shekels weight, filled with incense; ⁸¹one young bull, one ram, and one male lamb in its first year for a burnt offering; ⁸²a male goat as a purification offering; ⁸³As a fellowship sacrifice: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, and five male lambs in their first year. This was the offering of Ahira son of Enan. ⁸⁴This was the total for the altar's dedication on the day it was anointed, contributed by the leaders of Israel: twelve silver plates, twelve silver basins, twelve gold ladles — ⁸⁵each silver plate weighing one hundred thirty shekels, each basin seventy — the total silver of all the vessels came to two thousand four hundred shekels by the sanctuary standard; ⁸⁶the twelve gold ladles full of incense, each ladle weighing ten shekels by the sanctuary standard — the total gold of the ladles came to one hundred twenty shekels. ⁸⁷The total livestock for the burnt offerings: twelve bulls, twelve rams, twelve yearling male lambs with their grain offerings, and twelve male goats for the purification offering. ⁸⁸The total livestock for the fellowship sacrifices: twenty-four bulls, sixty rams, sixty male goats, sixty yearling male lambs. This was the dedication of the altar after it had been anointed. ⁸⁹When Moses entered the Tent of Meeting to speak with Him, he heard the Voice speaking to him from above the atonement cover on the Ark of the Testimony, from between the two cherubim — and it spoke to him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word kallot (completing, finishing) connects the Tabernacle's construction to its commissioning. The verbs vayimshach (he anointed) and vayeqaddesh (he consecrated) appear twice — first for the mishkan (Tabernacle) and its kelim (vessels/equipment), then for the mizbe'ach (altar) and its vessels — emphasizing the thorough consecration of every component.
2. The nesi'ei Yisra'el (leaders of Israel) are identified three ways: ra'shei beit avotam (heads of ancestral houses), nesi'ei hammattot (tribal leaders), and ha'omedim al-hapequdim (those overseeing the census). These are the same twelve leaders listed in Numbers 1:5-16 who supervised the population count.
3. The eglot tsav (covered wagons — possibly canopied or enclosed carts) are practical gifts for Tabernacle transport. The ratio — agalah al-shenei hannes'im veshor le'echad (one wagon per two leaders, one ox per leader) — demonstrates collaborative generosity. Twelve leaders produce six wagons, each pair sharing a contribution.
4. The standard revelatory formula vayyomer YHWH el-Mosheh (the LORD said to Moses) introduces divine authorization for accepting the leaders' spontaneous gifts — confirming that their initiative aligns with God's will.
5. God instructs Moses to distribute the wagons for the avodah (service, work) of the ohel mo'ed (Tent of Meeting). The principle ish kefi avodato (each man according to his service) means resources are allocated based on practical need rather than rank or prestige.
6. Moses executes the divine instruction precisely: vayyiqqach (he took/accepted) and vayyitten (he gave/distributed). The immediate obedience pattern — command followed by exact execution — is characteristic of Tabernacle narratives throughout Exodus and Numbers.

7. Gershon's clan receives the smaller allotment — two wagons and four oxen — because their responsibilities involved the lighter Tabernacle coverings: the curtains, hangings, and fabric screens (Num 4:25-26). Fewer wagons were needed for textiles than for the heavy structural components assigned to Merari.
8. Merari receives double Gershon's allotment — four wagons and eight oxen — because their duties involved the heavy structural framework: boards, crossbars, pillars, and bases (Num 4:31-32). Their work is supervised by Adiram (under the hand/authority of Ithamar), Aaron's youngest surviving son after Nadab and Abihu's death.
9. The Kohathites receive no wagons because the avodat haqqodesh (service of the sacred objects) — the Ark, the table, the lampstand, the altars — must be carried bakkattef (on the shoulder), by direct human contact. No cart or animal may transport the most sacred items; they demand the dignity of personal bearing. This principle was violated with fatal consequences when David used a cart in 2 Samuel 6:3-7.
10. The word chanukkat (dedication, inauguration) — from the root ch-n-k meaning 'to dedicate, initiate' — is the same word that gives us the festival of Hanukkah. Beyond the wagons and oxen, the leaders now bring qorbanam (their offerings) specifically for consecrating the mizbe'ach (altar). The repetition of vayyaqriv hannesi'im (the leaders offered) emphasizes their initiative.
11. The phrase nasi echad layyom nasi echad layyom (one leader per day, one leader per day) is deliberately repetitive — mirroring the twelve-day repetitive structure that follows. Each tribe receives its own dedicated day, preventing any leader from being overshadowed and giving each offering full ceremonial attention. The twelve-day sequence begins in verse 12.
12. Day 1: Nahshon (nachshon, possibly from nachash 'serpent' or 'diviner') son of Amminadab ('my kinsman is generous'), Judah's leader. Judah presents first, reflecting its preeminent position at the head of the camp formation (Num 2:3) and the march order (Num 10:14). Nahshon is later listed in the genealogy of King David (Ruth 4:20) and Jesus (Matt 1:4).
13. Nahshon's silver vessels for Judah (Day 1): the qa'arat (plate/platter, 130 shekels) and mizraq (sprinkling basin, 70 shekels) contain solet belulah vashemen (fine flour mixed with oil) — the minchah or grain offering. The combined silver weight of 200 shekels per tribe will total 2,400 shekels across all twelve.
14. Judah's gold kaf (ladle — literally 'palm,' a palm-shaped vessel, 10 shekels of gold) holds qetoret (incense) — fragrant spices representing worship ascending before the LORD. The gold material distinguishes this vessel from the silver plates.
15. Judah's olah (burnt offering, ascending offering): par ben-baqar (young bull), ayil (ram), keves ben-shenato (yearling male lamb) — three animals consumed entirely on the altar, representing complete dedication to God.
16. Judah's chattat (purification offering): one se'ir izzim (male goat) — addressing any ritual contamination in the tribe's relationship to the newly dedicated sanctuary.
17. Nahshon's zevach hashelamim (fellowship sacrifice) concludes Judah's Day 1 offering with the largest animal component: two cattle, five rams, five male goats, five yearling lambs — seventeen animals for communal feasting. The shelamim is the only offering category where the worshiper eats a portion, making it a shared meal between God, priest, and people.
18. Day 2: Nethanel (netan'el, 'God has given') son of Zuar (tsu'ar, 'small/insignificant'), Issachar's leader. Issachar follows Judah as part of the eastern camp division (Num 2:5). The name 'God has given' is fitting for a chapter about voluntary giving.
19. Nethanel's silver vessels for Issachar (Day 2): identical weights of 130 and 70 shekels for the qa'arat and mizraq, filled with the minchah (grain offering) mixture. The identical quantities establish a pattern: every tribe gives the same, demonstrating equality before God.
20. Issachar's gold kaf of qetoret (incense) — the same ten-shekel standard as Judah's, confirming equal dignity among the tribes in their approach to God.
21. Issachar's olah: the identical three-animal set (bull, ram, yearling lamb) as Judah's — no tribe's ascending offering differs from another's in this dedication sequence.
22. Issachar's chattat: one male goat — each tribe requires its own purification offering regardless of its size or status in the camp.
23. Nethanel's shelamim closes Issachar's Day 2 offering — identical quantities to Judah's, reinforcing the theme of tribal equality before the LORD in the dedication ceremony.
24. Day 3: Eliab (eli'av, 'my God is father') son of Helon (chelon, possibly 'strong' or 'valiant'), Zebulun's leader. Zebulun completes the eastern camp triad alongside Judah and Issachar (Num 2:7).
25. Eliab's silver vessels for Zebulun (Day 3): the identical qa'arat and mizraq weights with solet — the repetition itself is the text's theological statement about tribal parity. No tribe receives or gives more than any other.
26. Zebulun's gold kaf of qetoret — the third of twelve identical incense offerings, each tribe's worship rising equally before the LORD.
27. Zebulun's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the eastern camp's final burnt offering on Day 3, completing the first triad of tribes.
28. Zebulun's chattat: one male goat as purification — the third tribe's contribution to the twelve-day dedication sequence.
29. Eliab's shelamim concludes Zebulun's Day 3 offering and completes the eastern camp division's three-day dedication sequence. All three eastern tribes have now presented.

30. Day 4: Elizur (elitsur, 'my God is a rock') son of Shedeur (shedei'ur, 'the Almighty is light'), Reuben's leader. Despite being Jacob's firstborn, Reuben presents fourth — following the camp formation order rather than birth order, since Judah leads the eastern division.
31. Elizur's silver vessels for Reuben (Day 4): the qa'arat and mizraq with identical weights mark the southern camp's first offering. Reuben the firstborn receives no larger portion.
32. Reuben's gold kaf of incense — the fourth of twelve identical ladles, maintaining the pattern of equal tribal honor regardless of birth order.
33. Reuben's olah: the same three-animal burnt offering — the firstborn tribe receives no larger or more prestigious sacrifice than any other.
34. Reuben's chattat: one male goat — even Jacob's firstborn tribe requires purification before the newly consecrated sanctuary.
35. Elizur's shelamim concludes Reuben's Day 4 offering, opening the southern camp division's three-day sequence.
36. Day 5: Shelumiel (shelumi'el, 'at peace with God') son of Zurishaddai (tsurishaddai, 'my Rock is the Almighty'), Simeon's leader. Simeon camps alongside Reuben in the southern division (Num 2:12). The theophoric names — invoking shalom (peace) and shaddai (the Almighty) — reflect the piety embedded in Israelite naming conventions.
37. Shelumiel's silver vessels for Simeon (Day 5): identical plate and basin weights continue the pattern — the Torah's deliberate repetition honors each tribe individually rather than summarizing with 'each brought the same.'
38. Simeon's gold kaf of qetoret — the fifth incense offering in the twelve-day dedication, each one a complete act of worship.
39. Simeon's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the burnt offering pattern remains unchanged through five successive tribes.
40. Simeon's chattat: one male goat — the fifth tribe's acknowledgment of the need for ritual cleansing before the LORD.
41. Shelumiel's shelamim concludes Simeon's Day 5 offering — the southern camp's second contribution to the altar dedication.
42. Day 6: Eliasaph (elyasaph, 'God has added') son of Deuel (de'u'el, 'knowledge of God'), Gad's leader. Gad completes the southern camp triad with Reuben and Simeon (Num 2:14). The name Deuel appears as 'Reuel' in some manuscripts — a common d/r scribal variation in Hebrew.
43. Eliasaph's silver vessels for Gad (Day 6): the same qa'arat (130 shekels) and mizraq (70 shekels), reinforcing six consecutive days of identical generosity from six different tribes.
44. Gad's gold kaf of incense — the sixth ladle, marking the halfway point of the twelve-day dedication ceremony.
45. Gad's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the burnt offering at the midpoint of the dedication maintains perfect consistency with all previous days.
46. Gad's chattat: one male goat — the sixth purification offering, one for each tribe that has presented so far.
47. Eliasaph's shelamim concludes Gad's Day 6 offering and completes the southern camp division's three-day dedication sequence. The first half of the twelve tribes has now presented.
48. Day 7: Elishama (elishama, 'my God has heard') son of Ammihud (ammihud, 'my kinsman is glorious'), Ephraim's leader. Ephraim heads the western camp division as the preeminent Joseph tribe (Num 2:18), reflecting Jacob's blessing that placed Ephraim above Manasseh (Gen 48:19-20).
49. Elishama's silver vessels for Ephraim (Day 7): the standardized qa'arat and mizraq weights with the minchah grain mixture, now at the seventh iteration of identical gifts.
50. Ephraim's gold kaf of qetoret — the seventh incense ladle, as the western camp begins its three-day dedication sequence.
51. Ephraim's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the Joseph tribes receive no larger offering despite their prominent double-tribe status.
52. Ephraim's chattat: one male goat for purification — the seventh tribe's offering mirrors all predecessors exactly.
53. Elishama's shelamim concludes Ephraim's Day 7 offering, opening the western camp division's three-day dedication sequence.
54. Day 8: Gamaliel (gamli'el, 'God is my reward') son of Pedahzur (pedahtsur, 'the Rock has redeemed'), Manasseh's leader. Manasseh follows Ephraim despite being Joseph's actual firstborn — reflecting Jacob's crossed-hand blessing that elevated the younger over the elder (Gen 48:14).
55. Gamaliel's silver vessels for Manasseh (Day 8): identical to Ephraim's — neither Joseph tribe receives preferential treatment in the dedication despite their shared patriarch.
56. Manasseh's gold kaf of incense — the eighth golden ladle in the sequence, maintaining the standard of equal tribal representation.
57. Manasseh's olah: the three-animal burnt offering continues unchanged through eight tribes and eight consecutive days of dedication.
58. Manasseh's chattat: one male goat — the purification offering requirement applies equally to every tribe, the eighth in unbroken sequence.
59. Gamaliel's shelamim concludes Manasseh's Day 8 offering — the second of the western camp division's three-day dedication.
60. Day 9: Abidan (avidan, 'my father has judged' or 'father of judgment') son of Gideoni (gid'oni, 'my hewer/cutter'), Benjamin's leader. Benjamin completes the western camp triad with Ephraim and Manasseh (Num 2:22). Benjamin is Rachel's second son and Jacob's youngest — the 'son of the right hand' (ben-yamin).

- 61. Abidan's silver vessels for Benjamin (Day 9): the ninth identical set of plate and basin, approaching the conclusion of the twelve-day ceremony.
- 62. Benjamin's gold kaf of qetoret — the ninth incense offering, with three tribal offerings still remaining in the dedication sequence.
- 63. Benjamin's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the western camp's final burnt offering mirrors all previous ones exactly.
- 64. Benjamin's chattat: one male goat for purification — the ninth tribe's identical contribution to the dedication.
- 65. Abidan's shelamim concludes Benjamin's Day 9 offering and completes the western camp division's three-day dedication sequence. Nine of twelve tribes have now presented.
- 66. Day 10: Ahiezer (achi'ezer, 'my brother is help') son of Ammishaddai (ammishaddai, 'my kinsman is the Almighty'), Dan's leader. Dan heads the northern camp — the final camp division — positioned at the rear of the march column (Num 2:25, 10:25).
- 67. Ahiezer's silver vessels for Dan (Day 10): the qa'arat and mizraq at standard weights — the tenth of twelve identical offerings approaching the ceremony's conclusion.
- 68. Dan's gold kaf of incense — the tenth golden ladle, as the dedication nears its final three days.
- 69. Dan's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — ten consecutive days of identical burnt offerings underscoring the equality theme that pervades the chapter.
- 70. Dan's chattat: one male goat — the tenth purification offering in the twelve-day dedication, maintaining the unchanging pattern.
- 71. Ahiezer's shelamim concludes Dan's Day 10 offering, beginning the final northern camp division's three-day sequence. Only Asher and Naphtali remain.
- 72. Day 11: Pagiel (pag'i'el, 'encounter with God' or 'God's intervention') son of Ocran (okhran, possibly 'troubled' or 'turbulent'), Asher's leader. Asher is the penultimate tribe in the ceremony, camping in the northern division alongside Dan (Num 2:27).
- 73. Pagiel's silver vessels for Asher (Day 11): the eleventh identical plate-and-basin set, with only Naphtali's offering remaining to complete the cycle.
- 74. Asher's gold kaf of qetoret — the eleventh incense ladle, nearly completing the twelve-tribe cycle of aromatic offerings.
- 75. Asher's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the penultimate burnt offering, identical to all ten preceding ones.
- 76. Asher's chattat: one male goat for purification — the eleventh tribe's offering follows the unvarying pattern of ritual cleansing.
- 77. Pagiel's shelamim concludes Asher's Day 11 offering — only Naphtali's final dedication remains to complete the twelve-day ceremony.
- 78. Day 12: Ahira (achira, 'my brother is a friend' or 'brother of evil/misfortune') son of Enan (einan, 'having eyes' or 'springs'), Naphtali's leader. As the twelfth and final tribe, Naphtali completes the altar dedication ceremony. Naphtali camps in the northern division, closing the rear guard of the march (Num 2:29).
- 79. Ahira's silver vessels for Naphtali (Day 12): the final identical plate-and-basin set, completing the twelve-tribe cycle of generosity. All twelve tribes have now contributed equally.
- 80. Naphtali's gold kaf of qetoret — the twelfth and final incense ladle, completing the full set of twelve golden vessels filled with fragrant worship.
- 81. Naphtali's olah: bull, ram, yearling lamb — the final burnt offering in the twelve-day dedication matches all eleven predecessors in precise conformity.
- 82. Naphtali's chattat: one male goat — the twelfth and final purification offering, completing the full cycle of tribal dedication.
- 83. Ahira's shelamim concludes Naphtali's Day 12 offering, bringing the entire twelve-day altar dedication to its close. All four camp divisions — east, south, west, north — have completed their presentations in order.
- 84. The summary section opens with zo't chanukkat hammizbe'ach (this was the dedication of the altar), tallying the collective gifts. The twelve-times-three vessel count — qa'arot kesef (silver plates), mizreqi kesef (silver basins), kappot zahav (gold ladles) — demonstrates the unified generosity of all twelve tribes.
- 85. The total silver: 12 plates at 130 shekels + 12 basins at 70 shekels = 2,400 sheqalim (approximately 27.5 kg or 60 lbs by the sanctuary standard). The precise accounting — kol kesef hallelim (all the silver of the vessels) — reflects the meticulous record-keeping expected for sacred donations.
- 86. The total gold: 12 ladles at 10 shekels each = 120 sheqalim (approximately 1.4 kg or 3 lbs). The phrase asarah asarah hakkaf (ten-ten per ladle — ten shekels each) uses the distributive repetition typical of Hebrew census and inventory language. Though less by weight than the silver, gold's far greater value made this a substantial combined contribution.
- 87. The olah (burnt offering) totals reflect perfect symmetry: twelve parim (bulls), twelve eilim (rams), twelve kevasim (lambs) — one from each tribe — plus their accompanying minchah (grain offering). The chattat adds twelve se'irei izzim (male goats) for purification. The number twelve pervades every category, reinforcing the all-Israel character of the dedication.
- 88. The zevach hashelamim (fellowship sacrifice) totals are the largest category: 24 parim (bulls — 2 per tribe), 60 eilim (rams — 5 per tribe), 60 attudim (male goats — 5 per tribe), 60 kevasim (yearling lambs — 5 per tribe) = 204 animals total. The closing phrase zo't chanukkat hammizbe'ach acharei himmashach oto (this was the altar's dedication after it was anointed) forms an inclusio with v. 84.

89. The chapter's dramatic climax: Moses enters the ohel mo'ed (Tent of Meeting) and hears haqqol middabber elav (the Voice speaking to him) from above the kapporet (atonement cover/mercy seat) on the aron ha'edut (Ark of the Testimony), from between the two keruvim (cherubim). The dedication is validated by divine speech — the Tabernacle's purpose is fulfilled when God inhabits the consecrated space and communicates from it. The participle middabber (speaking, ongoing speech) suggests continuous divine communication, not a single utterance.

Summary: Aaron lights the seven-lamp menorah as commanded, and the Levites are formally consecrated for tabernacle service. Their consecration involves purification (sprinkling, shaving, washing), sacrificial offerings, the laying on of hands by the Israelite community, and their presentation as a 'wave offering' before the LORD. The chapter concludes with the Levites' service age: twenty-five to fifty.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Levites are presented as a tenufah ('wave offering') — an entire tribe ritually offered to God on behalf of the nation. The Israelites lay their hands on the Levites (v. 10), transferring the community's obligation onto them. This is substitutionary theology enacted physically: the Levites stand in for all Israel's firstborn. The menorah instruction uses beha'alotekha ('when you cause [the lamps] to go up'), treating the lighting of flames as an act of elevation.

Translation Friction: The term miqshah ('hammered work,' v. 4) for the menorah indicates a single piece of beaten gold, not assembled parts — a distinction we preserved because it carries theological weight about the unity of the sacred object. The purification water is called mei chata't ('water of sin/purification,' v. 7), which we rendered 'water of purification' to avoid implying the water itself is sinful. The red heifer ashes described in Numbers 19 provide this water.

Connections: The menorah design was revealed at Sinai (Exodus 25:31-40) and executed by Bezalel. The Levite consecration parallels but differs from priestly ordination in Leviticus 8 — Levites are purified and waved, while priests are anointed and have their hands filled. The service age of twenty-five (v. 24) differs from the thirty-year threshold in Numbers 4:3, suggesting a five-year apprenticeship period.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²Speak to Aaron and tell him: When you set up the lamps, the seven lamps must cast their light toward the front of the lampstand. ³Aaron did so: he kindled the lamps toward the front of the lampstand, exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁴This is how the lampstand was fashioned: hammered gold from its base to its blossom — a single piece. It was made exactly according to the pattern the LORD had shown Moses. ⁵The LORD spoke to Moses: ⁶Take the Levites from among the Israelites and purify them. ⁷Here is how to purify them: Sprinkle the water of purification over them; they must run a razor over their whole body, wash their garments, and then they will be clean. ⁸They must bring a young bull with its grain offering — fine flour mixed with oil — and you shall take a second young bull for a sin offering. ⁹Bring the Levites before the tent of meeting and assemble the whole congregation of Israel. ¹⁰Present the Levites before the LORD, and the Israelites shall lay their hands on the Levites. ¹¹Aaron shall wave the Levites as a wave offering before the LORD on behalf of the Israelites, so that they may perform the service of the LORD. ¹²The Levites shall lay their hands on the heads of the bulls. Then offer one as a sin offering and the other as a burnt offering to the LORD, to make atonement for the Levites. ¹³Station the Levites before Aaron and his sons, and wave them as an offering to the LORD. ¹⁴In this way you shall set the Levites apart from the Israelites, and the Levites shall be Mine. ¹⁵After that the Levites may enter to perform the service of the tent of meeting. You shall purify them and wave them as an offering. ¹⁶For they are given over to Me from among the Israelites. I have taken them as replacements for every firstborn — everyone who opens the womb among the Israelites — and they are Mine. ¹⁷For every firstborn among the Israelites — human and animal — is Mine. On the day I struck down every firstborn in the land of Egypt, I consecrated them to Myself. ¹⁸So I have taken the Levites in place of all the firstborn of the Israelites. ¹⁹I have given the Levites as a gift to Aaron and his sons from among the Israelites, to perform the service of the Israelites in the tent of meeting and to make atonement for them, so that no plague strikes the Israelites when they approach the sanctuary. ²⁰Moses, Aaron, and the whole congregation of Israel did to the Levites everything the LORD had commanded Moses concerning them. ²¹The Levites purified themselves and washed their garments. Aaron waved them as a wave offering before the LORD and made atonement for them to cleanse them. ²²After that the Levites entered to perform their service in the tent of meeting before Aaron and his sons. As the LORD had commanded Moses concerning the Levites, so they did for them. ²³The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁴This applies to the Levites: from twenty-five years of age and upward they may enter to serve in the work of the tent of meeting. ²⁵But from the age of fifty they shall withdraw from the work of service and no longer perform it. ²⁶They may assist their brothers in the tent of meeting by keeping guard, but they shall perform no regular service. This is how you shall regulate the Levites regarding their duties.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a divine speech formula (vayedabber YHWH el-Mosheh lemor). Numbers 8 addresses two topics: the lampstand (menorah) setup (vv 1-4) and Levite consecration for sanctuary service (vv 5-26).
2. Beha'alotekha (when you cause to go up) refers to lighting the lamps — the flames 'go up.' The menorah () has seven lamps (nerot), arranged so their light faces el-mul penei hammerorah — toward the front face of the lampstand, illuminating the space before it.
3. The brief narrative reports immediate obedience. Aaron he'elah (caused to go up) the nerot — the same verb as the instruction. The refrain ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et-Mosheh establishes every cultic act as divinely authorized.
4. Miqshah () means hammered or beaten work — the menorah is formed from one piece of gold, not assembled. The base-to-blossom span (ad-yerekah ad-pirchah) describes the full structure. The pattern (mar'eh) was revealed at Sinai (Ex 25:40); Bezalel executed it. The paragraph break () marks a topic shift to Levite consecration.
5. A new divine speech introduces the Levite consecration ritual. The Levites will be purified (tihar), presented as a wave offering (tenufah), and set apart for sanctuary service — a parallel to priestly ordination but with distinct rites.
6. Qach et-halviyim (take the Levites) — they are chosen from the larger community for sacred service. Vetiharta otam (and you shall purify them) uses the Piel of tahir — to pronounce clean, to ritually purify. Purification precedes consecration.
7. Me chata't () — 'water of sin' or 'water of purification' — is the solution made from the ashes of the red heifer (Num 19). Three rites: sprinkling, whole-body shaving (ta'ar — razor), and washing clothes. The shaving removes bodily contamination; the sequence matches the purification of the metzora in Lev 14.
8. The Levites provide one par ben-baqar (— young bull) for an olah with its minchah (— fine flour mixed with oil); Moses/priest takes a second par for a chata't (— sin offering). The sacrifices effect kapparah (atonement) for the Levites before they enter service.
9. The consecration is public — kol adat benei Yisra'el (the whole assembly of the children of Israel) must witness it. The Levites approach lifnei ohel mo'ed — before the tent of meeting. Public consecration establishes the Levites' authority before the community and enacts their transfer from the people to the LORD.
10. Semikhah () — the laying on of hands — transfers identity or responsibility. Here the people lay hands on the Levites, designating them as substitutes who will serve on behalf of the community. The gesture is the inverse of ordination, where Moses laid hands on the priests; here the community commissions their representatives.
11. Henif () — to wave, to elevate in presentation. The Levites themselves become a tenufah (), a wave offering, lifted before the LORD as the people's gift. This consecrates them me'et benei Yisra'el — from the Israelites — for avodat YHWH, the LORD's service.
12. The Levites lay hands on the bulls — identifying with the sacrifices. One par becomes chata't (), cleansing from sin; the other olah (), whole burnt offering. Lekapper al-halviyim () — to make kapparah (covering, atonement) for the Levites — effects their ritual purification for sacred service.
13. He'amadta (you shall cause to stand) — the Levites are positioned before the priests. The second tenufah (wave offering) of the Levites presents them to the LORD for consecration. They stand at the threshold between Israel and the sanctuary, commissioned to serve under Aaron's authority.
14. Hibdaltah () — you shall separate, distinguish. The Levites are removed from the body of Israel (mitokh benei Yisra'el) and assigned to God: vehayu li halviyim — they shall be Mine. The first-person li (to Me) asserts divine ownership; the Levites belong to the LORD, not to the tribe or the people.
15. The sequence: first purification (tihar) and wave offering (tenufah), then service. Only after these rites may they la'avod et-ohel mo'ed — serve the tent of meeting. The repetition of purification and tenufah in vv 15 and 21 may reflect the distinction between the initial consecration (here) and its actual performance (v 21).
16. Netunim netunim () — doubly given, wholly devoted. The Levites substitute for peter kol-rechem (), the firstborn who open the womb. On the night of the Exodus, God claimed every Egyptian firstborn; He likewise claims Israel's firstborn. The Levites serve in their place — one tribe redeems the rest.

17. The rationale for the Levite substitution: kol bekhlor bibnei Yisra'el (every firstborn of the Israelites) belongs to God. Beyom hakoti kol bekhlor be'erets Mitsrayim — on the day of the tenth plague — God consecrated (hiqdashti) Israel's firstborn to Himself. The Levites fulfill that claim so that firstborn sons need not be literally devoted to sanctuary service.
18. Tachar kol bekhlor bibnei Yisra'el — in place of every firstborn. The substitution is complete: the entire tribe of Levi serves as the LORD's portion, releasing the firstborn of the other tribes from direct sanctuary duty.
19. The Levites are netunim (given) to Aaron and his sons — they serve under priestly authority. Their duties: la'avod et-avodat benei Yisra'el (to do Israel's service) and lekaper al-benei Yisra'el (to make atonement for Israel). The consequence: velo yihyeh negef (no plague) when Israel approaches the qodesh. Untrained approach to the sanctuary brings death (e.g., Nadab and Abihu); the Levites are a buffer.
20. Kekhol asher tsivvah YHWH et-Mosheh lalviyim — exactly as the LORD commanded Moses for the Levites. The refrain of obedient execution (cf. Lev 8) marks the ceremony as fully compliant. Moses, Aaron, and kol adat benei Yisra'el all participate in the rite.
21. Hitachate'u () — Hithpael of chata, they purified themselves. Aaron performs the tenufah and the kapparah (atonement). The narrative reports the actual performance of the rites prescribed in vv 6-15.
22. The Levites begin avodatam — their service. They work lifnei Aharon velifnei banav (before Aaron and his sons), under priestly oversight. The section break () concludes the consecration narrative before the age regulations.
23. A new divine speech introduces the age limits for Levite service. Numbers 4 specified ages 30-50 for the Kohathites, Gershonites, and Merarites in transport duties; here the range is 25-50 for general tabernacle service — a lower entry age, possibly for lighter duties.
24. Miben chamesh ve'esrim shanah vama'alah — from twenty-five years and upward. Litsbo tseva () — to enlist for service, to perform the work. The tseva (host/service) language echoes military muster; Levite service is Israel's sacred militia.
25. Yashuv mits'va ha'avodah () — they shall turn back, retire from the service. Retirement at fifty may reflect the physical demands of tabernacle work — carrying, assembling, maintaining — or a rotational model that gives younger Levites opportunity.
26. Retired Levites (50+) may vesheret et-echav — assist their brothers — by shomer mishmeret (keeping the charge/guard), but avodah lo ya'avod — they perform no service. They retain a supporting role (supervision? oversight?) while heavy labor passes to the next generation. Kakha ta'aseh lalviyim bemishmerotam — thus you shall do for the Levites in their watches.

Summary: Israel observes its first wilderness Passover, one year after the exodus. When men ritually contaminated by corpse contact ask why they should be excluded, Moses consults God, who establishes a second Passover (Pesach Sheni) in the second month for those unable to observe the first. The chapter closes with the cloud over the tabernacle governing Israel's movements: when it lifts, they march; when it settles, they camp.

What Makes This Remarkable: New law is born from a question. The corpse-contaminated men do not accept exclusion passively — they ask lamah niggara ('why should we be diminished?'), and their protest prompts divine revelation of the second Passover. Moses himself does not presume to answer: imdu ve'eshma'ah ('wait, and I will hear'). The cloud narrative (vv. 15-23) transforms weather into theology — Israel's entire schedule of movement and rest depends on divine initiative, not human planning.

Translation Friction: The time phrase bein ha'arbayim ('between the evenings,' v. 3) — the appointed hour for slaughtering the Passover lamb — has been debated since antiquity. We rendered it 'at twilight,' following the consensus that it refers to late afternoon. The term mo'ed ('appointed time') in verse 2 frames Passover not as a spontaneous celebration but as a fixed divine calendar event — we preserved this specificity rather than softening it to 'season.'

Connections: This Passover observance (v. 5) is the first since the original in Exodus 12. The second Passover provision (v. 11) is referenced in 2 Chronicles 30:2-3, where Hezekiah uses it to hold a belated Passover for the reunited kingdom. The cloud-and-fire motif (vv. 15-23) recalls Exodus 13:21-22 and anticipates the tabernacle theology of Exodus 40:34-38.

1The LORD spoke to Moses in the wilderness of Sinai, in the first month of the second year after the Israelites had left Egypt. He said: 2The Israelites are to celebrate the Passover at its fixed time. 3On the fourteenth day of this month, at twilight, you shall observe it at its appointed time. Observe it according to all its statutes and all its rules. 4Moses relayed this to the Israelites, and they were to observe the Passover. ⁵They celebrated the Passover on the fourteenth day of the first month, at twilight, in the wilderness of Sinai. Just as the LORD had commanded Moses, so the Israelites did. ⁶But there were men who were unclean because of contact with a human corpse, so they could not observe the Passover on that day. They came before Moses and Aaron that same day ⁷and said to him: "We are unclean because of a human corpse. Why should we be excluded from presenting the LORD's offering at its appointed time among the Israelites?" ⁸Moses said to them: "Wait here. I will inquire what the LORD commands concerning you." ⁹The LORD spoke to Moses, saying: ¹⁰Speak to the Israelites and say: When anyone among you or your descendants is unclean because of a corpse, or is on a distant journey, that person shall nevertheless observe the Passover to the LORD. ¹¹They shall observe it on the fourteenth day of the second month, at twilight. They shall eat it with unleavened bread and bitter herbs. ¹²They shall not leave any of it until morning, nor shall they break any bone in it. They shall observe it according to every ordinance of the Passover. ¹³But anyone who is clean and not on a journey, yet neglects to observe the Passover — that person shall be cut off from among the people, because they did not present the LORD's offering at its appointed time. That person shall bear their sin. ¹⁴When a resident alien dwells among you and wishes to observe the Passover to the LORD, that person shall observe it according to the statute of the Passover and according to its rule. One statute applies to you, to the resident alien, and to the native of the land. ¹⁵On the day the tabernacle was set up, the cloud covered the tabernacle, the tent of the covenant. In the evening it appeared like fire over the tabernacle until morning. ¹⁶This was the constant pattern: the cloud covered the tabernacle during the day, and what looked like fire covered it at night. ¹⁷Whenever the cloud lifted from the tent, the Israelites would set out. And wherever the cloud settled, there the Israelites would camp. ¹⁸At the LORD's direction the Israelites set out, and at the LORD's direction they camped. As long as the cloud remained over the tabernacle, they stayed in camp. ¹⁹When the cloud remained over the tabernacle for many days, the Israelites kept the LORD's charge and did not set out. ²⁰Sometimes the cloud was over the tabernacle only a few days. At the LORD's direction they would camp, and at the LORD's direction they would set out. ²¹Sometimes the cloud remained from evening until morning, and when it lifted in the morning they set out. Or it might lift by day or by night — whenever it lifted, they set out. ²²Whether two days, or a month, or longer — as long as the cloud stayed over the tabernacle, the Israelites remained in camp and did not set out. When it lifted, they set out. ²³At the LORD's direction they camped, and at the LORD's direction they set out. They kept the LORD's charge, according to the LORD's direction through Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening places this revelation in midbar Sinai ('wilderness of Sinai') during the second year after the exodus. The first month (Nisan/Abib) marks the anniversary of the exodus and sets the stage for Passover observance — Israel's first wilderness Passover since the original.
2. The jussive veya'asu ('let them do') conveys a divine directive. The key term mo'ed ('appointed season') frames Passover not as a spontaneous feast but as a calendrically fixed holy day — God's sovereignty over Israel's worship calendar.
3. Bein ha'arbayim ('between the evenings') specifies the slaughter time — late afternoon, as interpreted in Exodus 12:6. The doubling of chuqqotav u-khechol mishpatav ('its statutes and its ordinances') stresses full compliance: every regulation from Exodus 12–13 applies.
4. Simple narrative pivot: Moses transmits the directive. The verb la'asot ('to do') echoes the Passover as an action — slaughter, meal, observance — not mere attendance but participation.
5. The fulfillment formula ke-khol asher tsivvah YHWH et-Moshe ken 'asu ('according to all that the LORD commanded Moses, so they did') affirms complete obedience. This is Israel's first Passover since leaving Egypt — a wilderness observance that reenacts the exodus narrative in the very space of their deliverance.
6. Teme'im lenefesh adam ('unclean by reason of a human soul/corpse') — corpse impurity (tum'at met) rendered such persons ritually excluded from the holy meal. Their initiative in approaching Moses and Aaron shows they desired participation; the law had not yet addressed their situation.
7. Lamah niggara ('why are we kept back/diminished?') — the men protest their exclusion. They call the Passover qorban YHWH ('offering of the LORD'), framing it as a sacrifice they must not miss. Their question prompts new revelation: the provision for a second Passover (Pesach Sheni).
8. Imdu ve'eshma'ah ('stand and I will hear') — Moses does not presume to answer from prior revelation. He seeks fresh guidance, modeling dependence on divine instruction. The pause (petuchah) separates this narrative from the revelation that follows.

9. Standard revelation formula: wayy'dabber YHWH el-Moshe le'mor. God responds to the men's petition with new legislation.
10. Ish ish ('each person') — individual application. Two exemptions qualify for the delayed Passover: tame' lenefesh (corpse impurity) or bederekh rechokah ('on a distant way'). The phrase ledorotekhem ('for your generations') extends this provision permanently. The verb v'asah pesach implies active observance, not excusal.
11. The second month (Iyyar) mirrors the first month's date — fourteenth day, bein ha'arbayim. Al matzot u-merorim ('with unleavened bread and bitter herbs') preserves the Exodus 12:8 requirements; only the roasted lamb and the haste are implied. The delayed Passover is fully equivalent in ritual.
12. The prohibition against leaving leftovers (lo yash'iru) and breaking bones (etsem lo yeshberu-bo) matches Exodus 12:10, 46. These rules protect the lamb's symbolic integrity: consumed in one night, unbroken — an image of wholeness and complete participation in the covenant meal.
13. The penalty for willful neglect is severe: venichreta hanefesh ('that soul shall be cut off') — exclusion from the covenant community, possibly death. The contrast is sharp: those with legitimate excuse receive a second chance; those without excuse face kareth. Chatt'o yissa ('he shall bear his sin') — the guilt remains on the offender.
14. Ger ('sojourner, resident alien') who wishes to observe Passover is fully included: chuqqat ha-pesach u-khemishpato — one law for native and stranger. This foreshadows the inclusive vision of the covenant: any who align with Israel's worship share the same obligation and privilege. Ezerach ha'aretz ('native of the land') contrasts with ger.
15. Beyom haqim et-hammishkan ('on the day the tabernacle was raised') — the cloud (he'anan) and fire manifest God's presence over the sanctuary. Ohel ha'edut ('tent of the testimony') houses the covenant tablets. K'mar'eh-'esh ('like the appearance of fire') — the night manifestation recalls the exodus pillar of fire (Exodus 13:21–22).
16. Tamid ('continuously, always') — the divine presence was constant. The alternating manifestations (cloud by day, fire by night) provided both guidance and protection throughout the wilderness journey, matching Exodus 40:38.
17. Lefi he'alot ha'anan ('according to the cloud's rising') — Israel's movement is entirely governed by divine signal. The verb yishkon ('dwell, settle') describes the cloud's resting; yachanu describes Israel's encampment. They camp where God's presence rests; they move when it lifts.
18. Al-pi YHWH ('at the mouth/command of the LORD') — repeated four times in vv 18–23. The phrase emphasizes that Israel's itinerary is not human-planned but divinely dictated. Kol-yemei asher yishkon ('all the days that it remained') — duration is variable; Israel waits without knowing how long.
19. Beha'arikh... yamim rabbim ('when it prolonged... many days') — extended stays required patient obedience. Mishmeret YHWH ('the charge of the LORD') — Israel's duty is to follow the cloud's signal. Not moving when the cloud stayed was as much obedience as moving when it lifted.
20. Yamim mispar ('days of number' — a few days) contrasts with yamim rabbim in v 19. Short stays and long stays alike require the same response: camp when it rests, move when it lifts. No human logic determines the schedule; only the cloud.
21. The cloud could rest briefly (evening to morning) or lift at any hour. Yomam va-layelah ('by day or by night') — Israel must be ready to move at any moment. The unpredictability demands constant attentiveness to the divine presence.
22. The range — yomayim, chodesh, yamim ('two days, a month, or days') — covers the full spectrum of possible stays. Israel could camp at a place for years (as at Sinai) or for a single night. The principle is constant: rest when the cloud rests, move when it moves.
23. The chapter closes with a summary: Israel's entire wilderness existence — when to camp, when to travel — was governed by the LORD. Be-yad Moshe ('by the hand of Moses') — Moses mediated the cloud's significance; he interpreted when to move. Mishmeret YHWH frames the whole as covenant-keeping: attentiveness to God's guidance.

Summary: God commands Moses to craft two silver trumpets for summoning the assembly and signaling camp movements. Distinct blast patterns communicate different orders: sustained notes for assembly, staccato blasts for marching. Israel then departs Sinai for the first time, following the prescribed marching order. Moses invites his father-in-law Hobab to accompany them as a wilderness guide.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter marks the pivot of the entire book. Everything before it (chapters 1-9) takes place at Sinai; everything after it is movement through the wilderness. The departure formula (v. 33) places the ark of the covenant three days' journey ahead of the people — the LORD's presence leads, not follows. Moses's invocation when the ark set out — qumah YHWH ('Arise, O LORD,' v. 35) — and when it rested transforms troop movement into liturgy.

Translation Friction: The chatsotsrot kesef ('silver trumpets,' v. 2) are distinct from the shofar (ram's horn). We rendered teru'ah as 'staccato blast' to distinguish it from the teki'ah ('sustained note'), since the Hebrew signal system depends on the hearer recognizing the difference. The term shefi (v. 33 in some versifications) for the place Balaam goes is debated — in chapter 10 the wilderness geography is similarly uncertain at several points.

Connections: The silver trumpets are made miqshah ('hammered work,' v. 2), the same technique as the menorah (Exodus 25:18). Moses's prayer at the ark's departure (v. 35) is quoted in Psalm 68:1. The invitation to Hobab (vv. 29-32) connects to the Kenite clan tradition in Judges 1:16 and 4:11. The marching order follows Numbers 2 precisely.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Make two silver trumpets — craft them from hammered metalwork. They will serve you for summoning the congregation and for signaling the camps to move out." ³When both are sounded, the entire congregation must gather to you at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ⁴If only one is sounded, then the chieftains — the heads of Israel's divisions of a thousand — must gather to you. ⁵When you sound a staccato blast, the camps stationed on the east side will set out. ⁶When you sound a staccato blast a second time, the camps stationed on the south will begin their march. A staccato blast will be sounded for each stage of departure. ⁷When assembling the community, you must sound a sustained note but not a staccato blast. ⁸The sons of Aaron, the priests, are the ones who must sound the trumpets. This is a permanent statute for you throughout your generations. ⁹When you go to war in your land against an adversary who is oppressing you, sound the staccato blast on the trumpets. You will then be remembered before the LORD your God, and you will be delivered from your enemies. ¹⁰On your days of celebration, at your appointed festivals, and at the beginning of each month, you must sound the trumpets over your burnt offerings and over your fellowship sacrifices. They will serve as a reminder on your behalf before your God. I am the LORD your God. ¹¹On the twentieth day of the second month in the second year, the cloud lifted from above the Tabernacle of the Testimony. ¹²The Israelites set out on their stages of travel from the Wilderness of Sinai, and the cloud settled in the Wilderness of Paran. ¹³They set out for the first time according to the LORD's directive, communicated through Moses. ¹⁴The banner of the camp of Judah's descendants set out first, organized by their military divisions. Commanding its forces was Nahshon son of Amminadab. ¹⁵Over the forces of the tribe of Issachar's descendants was Nethanel son of Zuar. ¹⁶Over the forces of the tribe of Zebulun's descendants was Eliab son of Helon. ¹⁷Then the Tabernacle was dismantled, and the Gershonites and Merarites — who carried the Tabernacle's structural components — set out. ¹⁸The banner of the camp of Reuben set out next, organized by their military divisions. Commanding its forces was Elizur son of Shedeur. ¹⁹Over the forces of the tribe of Simeon's descendants was Shelumiel son of Zurishaddai. ²⁰Over the forces of the tribe of Gad's descendants was Eliasaph son of Deuel. ²¹Then the Kohathites set out, carrying the sacred objects. The Tabernacle structure would be reassembled before they arrived at the new site. ²²The banner of the camp of Ephraim's descendants set out next, organized by their military divisions. Commanding its forces was Elishama son of Ammihud. ²³Over the forces of the tribe of Manasseh's descendants was Gamaliel son of Pedahzur. ²⁴Over the forces of the tribe of Benjamin's descendants was Abidan son of Gideoni. ²⁵The banner of the camp of Dan's descendants set out last, serving as the rear guard for all the camps, organized by their military divisions. Commanding its forces was Ahiezer son of Ammishaddai. ²⁶Over the forces of the tribe of Asher's descendants was Pagiel son of Ocran. ²⁷Over the forces of the tribe of Naphtali's descendants was Ahira son of Enan. ²⁸This was the marching order of the Israelites, organized by their military divisions. And so they set out. ²⁹Moses said to Hobab son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses's father-in-law, "We are setting out for the place about which the LORD said, 'I will give it to you.' Come with us, and we will treat you well, because the LORD has promised good things for Israel." ³⁰But he replied, "I will not go. Instead, I will return to my own land and to my relatives." ³¹Moses said, "Please do not leave us. You know where we should camp in the wilderness, and you can serve as our eyes." ³²"If you come with us, then whatever good the LORD does for us, we will share that same good with you." ³³They traveled from the mountain of the LORD a distance of three days. The ark of the LORD's covenant went ahead of them during the three-day march to scout out a resting place for them. ³⁴The cloud of the LORD was over them by day whenever they set out from the camp. ³⁵Whenever the ark set out, Moses would say: "Rise up, LORD! Let your enemies be scattered, and let those who hate you flee from your presence!" ³⁶And when it came to rest, he would say: "Return, LORD, to the countless thousands of Israel."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard divine speech formula vayedaber YHVH el-Mosheh lemor ('and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') introduces a new legislative section. This formula marks the transition from the previous chapters' organizational material to a new set of cultic-military instructions regarding the silver trumpets.
2. The chatsotsrot kesef ('silver trumpets') are distinct from the shofar (ram's horn); these are long, straight metal instruments. The term mikshah ('hammered work') indicates they were formed from a single sheet of beaten silver, not cast — the same technique used for the menorah (Exodus 25:18). Their dual purpose — mikra ha'edah ('calling the assembly') and massa' ha-machanot ('setting the camps in motion') — made them instruments of both governance and military logistics.
3. The verb taq'u ('they blow') in plural — both trumpets sounded together — signals a full assembly. The gathering point is petach ohel mo'ed ('the entrance of the Tent of Meeting'), the designated center of communal life. The reflexive verb no'adu ('they shall assemble themselves') implies an obligation on the people to respond to the signal.
4. A single trumpet (be'achat) convenes only the nesi'im ('chieftains, tribal leaders'), identified as rashei alfei Yisrael ('heads of the thousands of Israel'). The word elef ('thousand') here functions as a military unit, not a precise number — these are commanders of large contingents. This graded signal system — two trumpets for all, one for leaders only — reveals sophisticated communication infrastructure.
5. The teru'ah is a series of short, sharp bursts — distinct from the teki'ah, which is a single sustained note. This staccato signal (teru'ah) specifically commands movement rather than assembly. The camps on the eastern side (kedmah) marched first; the east held Judah's camp (Numbers 2:3), the leading tribal division.
6. The second teru'ah ('staccato blast') triggers the southern camps — Reuben's division (Numbers 2:10). The concluding statement teru'ah yitke'u lemase'eihem ('a staccato blast they shall blow for their departures') establishes the general principle: each successive division moves out at its own alarm signal. The LXX and some traditions include third and fourth blasts for the west and north camps.
7. This verse draws the critical distinction: titke'u velo tari'u ('blow but do not sound an alarm'). The sustained teki'ah summons people to gather; the broken teru'ah commands them to march. Confusing the two signals would create chaos — people marching when they should assemble, or assembling when they should march. The verb hakhil ('to assemble') shares the root q-h-l with qahal ('congregation, assembly').
8. The trumpet-sounding is exclusively priestly — benei Aharon hakohanim ('the sons of Aaron, the priests') — not a task for Levites or laypeople. This is designated chuqqat olam ledoroteikhem ('a permanent statute throughout your generations'), placing the trumpet protocol among the enduring institutions of Israelite worship, not a temporary wilderness arrangement.
9. The military application shifts from wilderness logistics to future warfare in the land. The phrase ha-tsar ha-tsorer etkhem ('the adversary who is oppressing you') uses the doubled root ts-r-r for emphasis — a genuine hostile threat, not an offensive war. The theological promise is striking: vahareiotem... venizkartem ('you shall sound the alarm... and you shall be remembered'). The trumpets function not as magical instruments but as an act of appeal to God — the sound triggers divine 'remembrance' (zikkaron), a covenantal term meaning God's active intervention.
10. Three occasions for festive trumpeting: yom simchatkhem ('your day of celebration'), mo'adeikhem ('your appointed festivals' — the pilgrimage feasts), and rashei chodsheikhem ('the beginnings of your months' — new moon observances). The trumpets accompany both olot ('burnt offerings' — wholly consumed) and zivchei shalmeikhem ('fellowship sacrifices' — shared meals). The purpose is zikkaron ('a reminder, memorial') before God. The section closes with the sovereign self-identification formula ani YHVH eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God'), anchoring the trumpet protocol in covenant relationship.
11. The precise date — the twentieth of the second month (Iyyar) in the second year after the Exodus — marks a pivotal moment. The cloud (he'anan) had settled over the mishkan ha'edut ('Tabernacle of the Testimony') since its erection on the first day of the first month (Exodus 40:17, 34). The verb na'alah ('lifted, ascended') signals divine permission to move — the cloud's movement is the visible expression of God's will for Israel's journey.
12. The phrase lemase'eihem ('in their stages of travel') indicates the journey consisted of multiple stops, not a single march. The departure from midbar Sinai ('Wilderness of Sinai') ends the extended encampment where Israel received the Torah and built the Tabernacle. The cloud's settling in midbar Paran ('Wilderness of Paran') — the vast desert of the northeastern Sinai peninsula — marks the beginning of the wilderness wandering period.
13. The phrase al-pi YHVH ('according to the mouth/command of the LORD') emphasizes divine initiative, while beyad-Mosheh ('by the hand of Moses') identifies Moses as the human instrument. The word barishonah ('at first, for the first time') marks this as the inaugural departure from Sinai — the first march under the newly organized camp system described in chapters 1-4.
14. Judah marches barishonah ('first'), fulfilling the arrangement of Numbers 2:9. The degel ('banner, standard') represents the entire tribal division — Judah, Issachar, and Zebulun together. Nachshon ben Amminadav is the same leader who, according to rabbinic tradition, was first to enter the Sea of Reeds. His name may derive from nachash ('serpent') or the root n-ch-sh ('to divine, to be bold').
15. Nethanel (Netan'el — 'God has given') son of Tsu'ar commands Issachar's division, marching under Judah's banner as part of the eastern camp. This is the same leader listed in Numbers 1:8 and 2:5, maintaining consistency in the command structure.

16. Eliab (Eli'av — 'my God is father') son of Chelon completes the first three-tribe marching group under Judah's banner. Zebulun, the last of Leah's sons, rounds out the eastern camp division.
17. The passive hurad ('was taken down, dismantled') describes the controlled disassembly of the mishkan. Gershon's clan carried the curtains, coverings, and hangings (Numbers 4:24-26); Merari's clan carried the boards, bars, pillars, and sockets (Numbers 4:31-32). They marched second, between Judah and Reuben, so the Tabernacle structure could be erected at the new campsite before the Kohathites arrived with the sacred vessels (v. 21).
18. Reuben's camp — the southern division comprising Reuben, Simeon, and Gad — marches second. Elitsur (Eli-tsur — 'my God is a rock') son of Shedei'ur ('the Almighty is light/fire') commands the division. Despite being Jacob's firstborn, Reuben holds second position in the march — reflecting the loss of primacy described in Genesis 49:3-4.
19. Shelumiel (Shelumi'el — 'God is my peace/wholeness') son of Tsurishaddai ('my rock is the Almighty') leads Simeon's contingent within the southern division. Simeon's tribe would later be absorbed into Judah's territory (Joshua 19:1-9), making this one of its last appearances as an independent military unit.
20. Elyasaf (El-yasaf — 'God has added') son of De'u'el ('known by God') commands Gad's forces. The name De'u'el appears as Re'u'el in some manuscripts (Numbers 2:14), a common confusion between the Hebrew letters dalet and resh, which are nearly identical in many scripts.
21. The Kohathites (Qehatim) carried the ha-mikdash ('the sacred objects') — the ark, table, lampstand, altars, and their associated vessels (Numbers 4:4-15). The logistical brilliance: the Gershonites and Merarites (v. 17) marched ahead with the structural components, so they could erect the Tabernacle frame (hekimu et ha-mishkan) before the Kohathites arrived (ad bo'am — 'by the time of their coming') with the holy furnishings to install.
22. Ephraim's camp — the western division — marches third, consisting of Ephraim, Manasseh, and Benjamin (the Rachel tribes). Elishama (Eli-shama — 'my God has heard') son of Ammihud ('my kinsman is majestic') leads this division. Ephraim, though Joseph's younger son, holds precedence over Manasse per Jacob's blessing (Genesis 48:17-20).
23. Gamliel (Gamli'el — 'God is my reward/recompense') son of Pedahtsur ('the rock has redeemed') commands Manasseh's forces. The name Gamaliel would become prominent in later Jewish history — most notably the Pharisaic teacher mentioned in Acts 5:34.
24. Avidan (Avi-dan — 'my father has judged') son of Gid'oni ('my cutter/warrior') leads Benjamin, the smallest tribe, which marches as the last unit in Ephraim's western division. Benjamin's placement with the Joseph tribes reflects their shared ancestry through Rachel.
25. Dan's division marches last as me'assef lekhol ha-machanot ('the rear guard for all the camps'). The word me'assef ('gatherer, collector') indicates their role was to pick up stragglers, protect the vulnerable, and guard against attack from behind. Achi'ezer (Achi-ezer — 'my brother is help') son of Ammishaddai ('my kinsman is the Almighty') commands. Dan's position as the powerful rear guard contrasts with its northern border placement in the camp arrangement.
26. Pag'iel (Pagi'el — 'God has encountered/met') son of Okhran ('troubled') leads Asher's contingent in Dan's rear-guard division. Asher, whose name means 'happy' or 'blessed,' was Zilpah's son and received the blessing of rich food and royal delicacies (Genesis 49:20).
27. Achira (Achi-ra — 'my brother is a friend/companion') son of Einan ('having eyes/springs') commands Naphtali, the last tribe listed. Naphtali completes the northern/rear-guard division alongside Dan and Asher — all three being sons of the concubines Bilhah and Zilpah.
28. A summary statement closing the march-order section. The word mas'ei ('stages, journeys') combined with tsiv'otam ('their military divisions') frames the wilderness travel as both pilgrimage and military campaign. The final vayissa'u ('and they set out') shifts the narrative from prescription to action — the march has begun.
29. Chovav (Hobab — possibly meaning 'beloved') is identified as ben Re'u'el ha-Midyani choten Mosheh ('son of Reuel the Midianite, Moses's father-in-law'). Whether choten refers to Hobab as father-in-law or brother-in-law is debated — the Hebrew term covers multiple in-law relationships. Moses's invitation lekhhah ittanu vehetavnu lakh ('come with us and we will do good for you') extends covenant blessing to a non-Israelite — a remarkable act of inclusion. The phrase dibber-tov ('has spoken good') carries the weight of divine promise.
30. Hobab's refusal — lo elekh ('I will not go') — echoes the pull of native land and kinship. His preference for artsi ('my land') and moladti ('my birthplace, kindred') over Israel's promised destiny creates narrative tension. The parallel with Naomi and Orpah (Ruth 1:15) is notable: both present the choice between one's own people and joining Israel's covenantal journey.
31. Moses's plea al-na ta'azov otanu ('please do not abandon us') reveals practical dependence on Hobab's desert expertise. The phrase vehayita lanu le'einayim ('you will be for us as eyes') is a vivid metaphor — Hobab's knowledge of the wilderness terrain, water sources, and safe routes would be indispensable. This request does not contradict divine guidance through the cloud; it shows Moses integrating human wisdom with divine direction.
32. Moses sweetens the offer: ha-tov hahu asher yeitiv YHVH immanu vehetavnu lakh ('the good that the LORD does well for us, we will do well for you'). The triple repetition of the root y-t-v ('good, to do good') emphasizes reciprocity — Hobab's welfare will be bound up with Israel's divine blessing. The text does not record Hobab's final answer, but Judges 1:16 and 4:11 indicate his descendants (the Kenites) did settle in Israel's territory.
33. The har YHVH ('mountain of the LORD') — Mount Sinai — is called by this title only here and in Genesis 22:14, connecting Sinai with Moriah. The aron berit-YHVH ('ark of the LORD's covenant') traveling ahead — nosei'a lifneiheim ('going before them') — with the purpose latur lahem menuchah ('to scout out a resting place for them') personifies the ark as a scout or advance guard. The verb latur ('to scout, explore') is the same word used for the spies' mission in chapter 13.

34. The anan YHVH ('cloud of the LORD') provided both guidance and protection aleihem yomam ('over them by day') — shielding them from the desert sun. The phrase benos'am min ha-machaneh ('when they set out from the camp') specifies that the cloud's protective presence was particularly active during the vulnerable moments of travel, not only when stationary.
35. This verse and the next are set apart in the Torah scroll by inverted nuns (), marking them as a distinct unit — some rabbis considered them a separate book, making the Torah consist of seven books rather than five. Moses's cry kumah YHVH ('Rise up, LORD!') is a battle invocation: the ark's forward movement represents God going to war. The parallel verbs yafutsu ('be scattered') and yanusu ('flee') describe total rout. The phrase mesan'ekha mipanekha ('those who hate you, from your face/presence') identifies Israel's enemies as God's enemies.
36. The companion prayer to verse 35: when the ark halted (uvnuchoh — 'when it rested'), Moses invoked God's return. The phrase shuvah YHVH rivevot alfei Yisrael ('Return, LORD, to the myriads of Israel's thousands') presents God as dwelling among the vast multitude. The word rivevot ('myriads, ten-thousands') combined with alfei ('thousands') expresses an innumerable host. These two verses (35-36) became foundational liturgical texts — recited in synagogue when the Torah scroll is removed from and returned to the ark.

Summary: The people's complaints ignite divine fire at the camp's edge (Taberah). Then the asafsuf ('mixed rabble') craves meat, triggering a deeper crisis: the people weep for Egyptian food, Moses buckles under the burden of leadership, God appoints seventy elders to share the prophetic spirit, and quail arrive in devastating abundance — followed by a plague at Kibroth-hattaavah ('graves of craving').

What Makes This Remarkable: Moses's raw anguish is extraordinary: he asks God, 'Did I conceive this people? Did I give birth to them?' (v. 12). The Hebrew uses maternal language — haray ('conceive') and yalad ('give birth') — for a male leader overwhelmed by his flock. The seventy elders receive the spirit and prophesy, but two men (Eldad and Medad) prophesy in the camp without going to the tent. Joshua wants them stopped; Moses replies, 'Would that all the LORD's people were prophets' (v. 29) — a vision of democratized prophecy.

Translation Friction: The rare hitpa'el participle ke-mit'onenim ('like those grumbling,' v. 1) describes habitual, self-pitying complaint — but the text never identifies what they complained about. We rendered it 'grumble bitterly' to preserve the vagueness. The cognate accusative hit'avvu ta'avah ('they craved a craving,' v. 4) is an intensified construction expressing compulsive desire that resists smooth English; we used 'intense craving' to capture the Hebrew emphasis.

Connections: The nostalgic food catalog (v. 5) — fish, cucumbers, melons, leeks, onions, garlic — recalls the Nile Delta's produce, with bitter irony: chinnam ('for free') erases that they were slaves. The seventy elders parallel the seventy who ate with God on Sinai (Exodus 24:1, 9). The place-name Kibroth-hattaavah (v. 34) inscribes the failure into the landscape, as Taberah does in verse 3.

1The people began to grumble bitterly, and it was offensive in the hearing of the LORD. When the LORD heard it, His anger blazed, and the fire of the LORD burned among them, consuming people at the edges of the camp. 2The people cried out to Moses, and Moses prayed to the LORD, and the fire died down. 3That place was named Taberah, because the fire of the LORD had burned among them. 4The mixed rabble among them developed an intense craving, and the Israelites also resumed their weeping, saying, "Who will give us meat to eat?" 5"We remember the fish we used to eat in Egypt at no cost — the cucumbers, the melons, the leeks, the onions, and the garlic!" 6"But now our appetite has withered away. There is nothing at all — our eyes see nothing but this manna." 7The manna was like coriander seed, and its appearance resembled the look of bdellium resin. 8The people would go around gathering it, then grind it in hand mills or crush it in mortars, cook it in pots, and make it into flatcakes. Its flavor was like the taste of rich cream. 9When the dew settled on the camp at night, the manna would descend with it. 10Moses heard the people weeping by their family groups, each person at the entrance of their tent. The LORD's anger blazed intensely, and Moses too was deeply troubled. 11Moses said to the LORD, "Why have you brought such misery on your servant? Why have I not found favor in your sight, that you place the burden of this entire people on me? 12Did I conceive this entire people? Did I give birth to them, that you should tell me, 'Carry them against your chest, the way a caretaker carries a nursing infant,' all the way to the land you swore to their ancestors?" ¹³"Where am I supposed to get meat for this entire people? They keep weeping at me, saying, 'Give us meat to eat!' ¹⁴I cannot carry this entire people by myself — it is too heavy for me. ¹⁵If this is how you are going to treat me, then please kill me right now — if I have found any favor in your sight — and do not let me witness my own ruin." ¹⁶The LORD said to Moses, "Gather seventy men from Israel's elders — men you recognize as the people's true elders and officials — and bring them to the Tent of Meeting, where they will stand alongside you. ¹⁷I will come down and speak with you there. I will draw off some of the spirit that rests on you and place it on them, so they will share the burden of the people with you, and you will no longer carry it alone." ¹⁸"Tell the people: Consecrate yourselves for tomorrow, because you are going to eat meat. You have wept in the LORD's hearing, saying, 'Who will give us meat to eat? We had it better in Egypt!' So the LORD will give you meat, and you will eat it. ¹⁹You will not eat it for just one day, or two days, or five days, or ten days, or even twenty days — ²⁰but for an entire month — until it comes out of your nostrils and becomes revolting to you — because you have rejected the LORD who is among you, weeping before Him and saying, 'Why did we ever leave Egypt?'" ²¹Moses said, "The people I am among number six hundred thousand on foot, and you have said, 'I will give them meat to eat for an entire month!' ²²Could enough flocks and herds be slaughtered for them to be satisfied? Could all the fish in the sea be gathered for them and still be enough?" ²³The LORD answered Moses, "Is the LORD's hand too short? Now you will see whether or not my word comes true for you." ²⁴Moses went out and relayed the LORD's words to the people. He gathered seventy men from the people's elders and stationed them around the Tent. ²⁵The LORD descended in the cloud and spoke to him. He drew off some of the spirit that was on Moses and placed it on the seventy elders. When the spirit rested on them, they prophesied — but they did not do so again. ²⁶Two men had remained in the camp — one named Eldad and the other named Medad. The spirit rested on them as well; they were among those registered but had not gone out to the Tent. They prophesied right there in the camp. ²⁷A young man ran and reported to Moses, "Eldad and Medad are prophesying in the camp!" ²⁸Joshua son of Nun, who had been Moses's attendant since his youth, spoke up and said, "My lord Moses, stop them!" ²⁹Moses replied, "Are you jealous on my account? If only all the LORD's people were prophets — if only the LORD would place His spirit on every one of them!" ³⁰Then Moses withdrew to the camp — he and the elders of Israel. ³¹A wind went out from the LORD and swept quail in from the sea, dropping them around the camp — about a day's walk in every direction — piled roughly three feet deep on the ground. ³²The people were on their feet all that day, all that night, and all the next day gathering the quail. The person who gathered the least collected ten homers. They spread the birds out all around the camp to dry. ³³The meat was still between their teeth — before it was even chewed — when the LORD's anger blazed against the people, and the LORD struck the people with an extremely severe plague. ³⁴That place was named Kibroth-hattaavah — "Graves of Craving" — because it was there they buried the people who had been consumed by desire. ³⁵From Kibroth-hattaavah the people traveled on to Hazeroth, and they remained at Hazeroth.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The rare hitpa'el participle ke-mit'onenim ('like those grumbling/moaning') suggests habitual, self-pitying complaint rather than a specific grievance — the text never identifies what they complained about. The phrase ra be'oznei YHVH ('evil/offensive in the ears of the LORD') anthropomorphically portrays God as hearing and being grieved. The esh YHVH ('fire of the LORD') that consumed biktseh ha-machaneh ('at the edge/outskirts of the camp') struck the periphery — the vulnerable margins — perhaps where the less committed had positioned themselves.
2. The sequence reveals Moses's mediatorial role: the people cry to Moses (yits'aq — a desperate shriek), Moses prays to God (yitpallel — formal intercession), and the fire subsides (tishqa — 'sank down, was swallowed up'). The verb shaqa implies the fire was absorbed back into the ground rather than extinguished by water — a supernatural cessation matching the supernatural origin.
3. The place-name Tav'erah derives from the root b-'r ('to burn'), creating an etymological memorial: the location's very name — 'Burning' — permanently records the divine judgment. This naming convention (event place-name) recurs throughout Numbers, inscribing Israel's failures into the landscape of their journey.
4. The asafsuf ('mixed rabble, riffraff') — a contemptuous term for the non-Israelite group that left Egypt with them (Exodus 12:38) — instigated the craving. The cognate accusative hit'avvu ta'avah ('they craved a craving') is an intensified construction expressing overwhelming, compulsive desire. The contagion spread: gam benei Yisrael ('even the Israelites') joined in. Their question mi ya'akilenu varar ('who will feed us meat?') is not a practical question but a complaint against God's provision.

5. The nostalgic catalog of Egyptian foods — dagah ('fish'), kishu'im ('cucumbers'), avatichim ('melons/watermelons'), chatsir ('leeks'), betsalim ('onions'), shumim ('garlic') — represents the Nile Delta's abundant produce. The word chinnam ('for free, at no cost') is bitterly ironic: they were slaves, so the food was 'free' only because they had no freedom to spend wages. Selective memory idealizes bondage while erasing its horrors.
6. The phrase nafshenu yeveishah ('our soul/appetite is dried up') expresses both physical and psychological desolation — their entire being feels desiccated. The contemptuous ein kol bilti el ha-man einenu ('there is nothing at all except this manna before our eyes') dismisses God's miraculous daily provision as monotonous and inadequate. The demonstrative tone — 'this manna' — drips with disdain for the divine gift.
7. The narrator interrupts the complaint with a parenthetical description of the manna (vv. 7-9), subtly countering the people's ingratitude. The man ('manna') is compared to zera-gad ('coriander seed') in shape and size — small, round grains. Its eino ('appearance, color') resembled bedolach ('bdellium'), a translucent aromatic resin — pale, lustrous, and beautiful. Far from the dull substance the people describe, the narrator presents manna as visually striking.
8. The description of manna preparation reveals its versatility: shatu ('they roamed about') to gather it, then tachanu vareichayim ('ground it in mills') or dakhu bammedokhah ('crushed it in a mortar'), bishlu baparur ('cooked it in a pot'), and asu oto ugot ('made it into cakes/flatbreads'). The phrase leshad ha-shamen ('the cream/richness of oil') describes its taste — leshad suggests moisture, freshness, richness. The manna was a complete, adaptable food source, underscoring the irrationality of the complaint.
9. The manna arrives with the nighttime dew (tal) — beredeth ha-tal ('when the dew descended') upon the camp, yered ha-man alav ('the manna would come down upon it'). The parallel descent of dew and manna associates the miraculous food with natural phenomena, presenting it as heaven's gift embedded within creation's rhythms. The manna appears each night, fresh and reliable, yet the people treat this daily miracle with contempt.
10. The scene is devastating: bokheh lemishpechotav ('weeping family by family') — this was not isolated grumbling but organized, household-by-household lamentation. Each person ish lefetach oholo ('at the entrance of their tent') made the weeping public and visible. Two reactions follow: vayyichar-af YHVH me'od ('the LORD's anger burned greatly') and uve'einei Mosheh ra ('and in Moses's eyes it was bad/distressing'). Moses is caught between divine wrath and human misery.
11. Moses's anguished prayer opens with two lamah ('why?') questions directed at God — an extraordinary act of raw honesty. The phrase hareota le'avdekha ('you have done evil/harm to your servant') is remarkably bold — Moses accuses God of mistreating him. The massa ('burden, load') of kol-ha'am hazeh ('this entire people') is crushing. Moses does not question God's existence or power, but his justice in assigning such an unbearable task.
12. Moses uses shocking maternal imagery: he'anokhi hariti ('Did I conceive?') and anokhi yelidtihi ('Did I give birth to them?'). The demand to sa'ehu vecheiqekha ('carry them in your bosom/chest') ka'asher yissa ha-omen et ha-yoneq ('as a wet-nurse/guardian carries a sucking child') casts the leadership role as intimate parental nurture. The omen ('guardian, nurse') is grammatically masculine — a male caretaker nursing an infant. Moses's point: this parental role belongs to God, not to him.
13. The question me'ayin li vasar ('from where would I have meat?') highlights the practical impossibility — no flocks or supply lines could feed hundreds of thousands. The people's demand tenah-lanu vasar venokhelah ('give us meat and let us eat!') treats Moses as their personal provisioner. The verb yivku alai ('they weep upon/against me') conveys the relentless emotional pressure of constant public weeping directed at Moses personally.
14. Moses's confession lo-ukhal anokhi levaddi laset ('I am not able alone to carry') echoes Jethro's earlier warning in Exodus 18:18. The word kaved ('heavy') — the same root as kavod ('glory') — ironically connects the weight of leadership with the weightiness of God's presence. What should produce glory has become an unbearable burden because the people refuse to cooperate with God's plan.
15. Moses reaches his breaking point: horgeni na harog ('kill me, please — yes, kill me!'). The infinitive absolute harog before the imperative intensifies the plea to almost desperate insistence. The paradoxical phrase im-matsati chen be'einekha ('if I have found favor in your eyes') frames death as an act of divine mercy — being killed would be a kindness compared to continued suffering. The phrase ve'al-er'eh bera'ati ('let me not see my misery/ruin') reveals Moses would rather die than watch the situation deteriorate further.
16. God responds not with rebuke but with structural relief. The shiv'im ish ('seventy men') echoes the seventy elders who ascended Sinai with Moses (Exodus 24:1, 9). The qualification asher yadata ('whom you know') empowers Moses to select proven leaders, not appointees by divine lottery. These must be both ziqnei ha'am ('elders of the people' — recognized community authorities) and shotrav ('its officials' — administrative functionaries). The location ohel mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting') sacralizes their appointment.
17. The verb ve'atsalti ('I will draw off, set aside') from the root 'ts-l ('to reserve, withdraw') describes God taking min-ha-ruach asher alekha ('from the spirit that is upon you') — not creating new spiritual endowment but distributing Moses's existing portion. This does not diminish Moses (as the rabbis noted, like lighting candles from a flame without reducing it), but it extends his spiritual authority to others. The goal is shared burden-bearing: venas'u ittekha ('they shall carry with you').
18. The command hitkaddeshu lemachar ('consecrate yourselves for tomorrow') typically precedes a theophany or sacred event — here it precedes divine judgment disguised as answered prayer. God's words echo the people's own complaint back to them: bekhitem be'oznei YHVH ('you have wept in the LORD's ears') and ki-tov lanu beMitsrayim ('it was good for us in Egypt'). The ominous repetition — venatan YHVH lakhem vasar va'akhaltem ('the LORD will give you meat and you will eat') — carries an edge: God will give them exactly what they demanded.

19. The escalating enumeration — yom echad ('one day'), yomayim ('two days'), chamishah yamim ('five days'), asarah yamim ('ten days'), esrim yom ('twenty days') — builds suspense through five stages of denial before the climax in verse 20. Each number doubles or surpasses the previous, creating a rhetorical crescendo that heightens the shock of God's actual answer.
20. The climax: chodesh yamim ('a month of days' — a full month). The graphic image ad asher-yetse me'appekhem ('until it comes out of your nostrils') describes gorging to the point of nausea. The word zara ('loathsome, revolting') signifies physical revulsion. The theological indictment is devastating: me'astem et-YHVH asher beqirbekhem ('you have rejected the LORD who is in your midst'). Their craving for Egypt's food amounts to rejection of God's presence — the One who dwells among them.
21. Even Moses struggles with the logistics: shesh-me'ot elef ragli ('six hundred thousand foot soldiers') represents an enormous population. The number matches the census of fighting men in Numbers 1:46. Moses's tone borders on incredulity — not doubting God's truthfulness but grappling with the practical impossibility. His response echoes Sarah's laughter — faith confronted by the sheer scale of the divine promise.
22. Moses's rhetorical questions expose his failure of imagination: ha-tson uvakar yishachet lahem ('shall flocks and herds be slaughtered for them?') and kol-degei ha-yam ye'asef lahem ('shall all the fish of the sea be gathered for them?') — each followed by u-matsa lahem ('and would it suffice them?'). Moses considers only natural resources — livestock and fish — unable to conceive of God's ability to provide through other means. The question parallels Psalm 78:19-20: 'Can God spread a table in the wilderness?'
23. God's response is a single devastating question: ha-yad YHVH tiqtzar ('is the hand of the LORD shortened/insufficient?'). The 'hand' represents power and capability; a 'short hand' means inability to reach or accomplish. The challenge attah tir'eh ('now you will see') shifts from theological argument to empirical demonstration — Moses will witness firsthand whether God's devar ('word, promise') is reliable. The phrase hayiqreqha devari ('will my word meet/encounter you') uses the verb q-r-h, implying that God's word will track Moses down and confront him with its fulfillment.
24. Moses's immediate obedience: vayyetse ('he went out') from God's presence, vayedabber ('and spoke') the divine message, vayye'esof shiv'im ish ('and gathered seventy men'). He positioned them sevivot ha-ohel ('around/surrounding the Tent of Meeting') — encircling the sacred space where God would descend. The physical arrangement — a ring of elders around the Tent — visually represents the distribution of authority from center to periphery.
25. The theophany: vayyered YHVH be'anan ('the LORD descended in a cloud'). The verb vayya'atsel ('He drew off, set apart') describes the spirit's distribution. When ha-ruach ('the spirit') settled on the elders, they vayitnab'u ('prophesied') — likely ecstatic speech confirming divine authorization. The crucial phrase velo yasafu is debated: it could mean 'they did not cease' (prophesied continuously) or 'they did not continue/add' (prophesied only once, as a sign). Most scholars favor the latter — this was a one-time validation of their appointment, not an ongoing prophetic ministry.
26. Eldad (El-dad — 'God has loved') and Medad (Me-dad — perhaps 'beloved') remained ba-machaneh ('in the camp') despite being ba-ketuvim ('among the registered/written ones') — officially appointed but physically absent from the Tent. The reason for their absence is unspecified, generating much rabbinic speculation (humility? impurity? different reason?). Crucially, the spirit reached them anyway — vattanach aleihem ha-ruach ('the spirit rested upon them') — demonstrating that divine empowerment is not confined to sacred geography. They prophesied ba-machaneh ('in the camp'), among the common people.
27. The na'ar ('young man, attendant') — unnamed — vayyarats ('ran') with urgency to report what he perceived as an unauthorized spiritual event. His alarm suggests he viewed prophesying outside the Tent's sanctioned space as irregular or threatening. The present participle mitnab'im ('are prophesying') indicates ongoing activity — Eldad and Medad were still at it when the report arrived.
28. Yehoshua bin-Nun, identified as mesharet Mosheh ('Moses's minister/attendant') mibbechurav ('from his chosen ones' or 'from his youth'), reacts protectively. His plea adoni Mosheh kela'em ('my lord Moses, restrain them!') reveals concern for Moses's unique authority — if anyone can prophesy, what distinguishes Moses? Joshua's jealousy on Moses's behalf mirrors later conflicts over unauthorized spiritual activity (Mark 9:38-39). The verb kala' ('restrain, imprison, stop') suggests forcible suppression.
29. Moses's response is among the most magnanimous statements in Scripture. His question ha-meqanne atah li ('are you being jealous for my sake?') gently rebukes Joshua's possessiveness. Then the breathtaking wish: u-mi yitten kol-am YHVH nevi'im ('who would grant that all the LORD's people were prophets!') — the optative mi yitten ('who will give' = 'if only!') expresses deep longing. Moses envisions universal prophetic endowment — ki-yitten YHVH et-rucho aleihem ('that the LORD would place His spirit upon them'). Joel 2:28-29 later echoes this hope.
30. The brief notice vayye'asef Mosheh el-ha-machaneh ('Moses was gathered/withdrew to the camp') uses the passive-reflexive form of 's-f ('to gather, withdraw'). Moses returns from the Tent of Meeting with the newly empowered elders accompanying him — hu ve-ziqnei Yisrael ('he and the elders of Israel'). The scene shifts from the elder-appointment narrative to the quail narrative.
31. The ruach ('wind') serves as God's instrument, driving salvim ('quail' — small migratory birds that cross the Sinai region) min ha-yam ('from the sea' — likely the Gulf of Aqaba or the Mediterranean). The verb vayyagaz ('cut off, drove') suggests the wind intercepted the birds' flight path. The verb vayyittosh ('let fall, abandoned') describes the exhausted quail collapsing. The scale is staggering: ke-derekh yom koh u-khe-derekh yom koh ('about a day's journey on this side and a day's journey on that side') in every direction, piled ke-ammatayim ('about two cubits' — roughly three feet) deep upon the ground.

32. The frantic gathering lasted kol ha-yom hahu vekhol ha-lailah vekhol yom ha-mochorat ('all that day, all night, and all the next day') — thirty-six continuous hours of compulsive collecting. The minimum haul — ha-mam'it asaf asarah chomarim ('the one who gathered least collected ten homers') — equals roughly sixty bushels per person. The verb vayyishtchu ('they spread out') describes laying the birds out shatochat ('spread flat') around the camp for drying and preservation — an ancient method of curing meat.
33. The timing is shocking: ha-basar odenu bein shinneihem ('the meat was still between their teeth') — terem yikkaret ('before it was cut/chewed') — the judgment fell mid-bite. The verb yikkaret ('was cut off') may mean 'chewed' or 'consumed/finished.' God's anger (af YHVH) and the resulting makkah rabbah me'od ('a very great plague/strike') demonstrate that getting what you crave can itself become the instrument of judgment. The nature of the plague is unspecified — disease, divine fire, or sudden death.
34. The place-name Qivrot ha-Ta'avah ('Graves of Craving') is a bitter memorial: qivrot ('graves') combined with ta'avah ('desire, craving, lust'). The etymological note ki-sham qavru et-ha'am ha-mit'avvim ('because there they buried the people who were craving') creates a permanent wordplay — those consumed by ta'avah ('craving') were buried in ta'avah ('craving'). The desire itself became their grave. The hitpa'el participle mit'avvim ('those craving') indicates ongoing, habitual desire — they never stopped wanting.
35. The travel notice marks the transition: from Qivrot ha-Ta'avah ('Graves of Craving') to Chatserot ('Hazereth' — meaning 'enclosures' or 'courtyards'). The verb vayyihyu ('and they stayed/remained') indicates a more extended encampment. Hazereth becomes the setting for the next crisis — Miriam and Aaron's challenge to Moses's authority in chapter 12. The people move on geographically but not spiritually; each new location brings a new test.

Summary: Miriam and Aaron challenge Moses's authority, ostensibly over his Cushite wife but actually over his unique prophetic status. God intervenes directly, distinguishing Moses from all other prophets: with Moses alone, God speaks 'mouth to mouth' rather than through visions and dreams. Miriam is struck with a skin disease, Aaron pleads for her, Moses intercedes, and she is confined outside the camp for seven days.

What Makes This Remarkable: The parenthetical statement that Moses was anav me'od mikkol ha'adam ('more humble than any person on the face of the earth,' v. 3) is unique in Scripture — a superlative that explains why Moses does not defend himself. God's description of Moses's prophetic access is the Torah's highest endorsement of any human: peh el-peh ('mouth to mouth,' v. 8), beholding God's temunah ('form'), rather than through riddles. Miriam bears the punishment alone, though Aaron participated — perhaps because she instigated (the verb is feminine singular in v. 1).

Translation Friction: The term kushit ('Cushite,' v. 1) — referring to Moses's wife — is geographically specific (the region south of Egypt) but her identity is debated: she may be Zipporah or a second wife. We retained 'Cushite' rather than the KJV's 'Ethiopian' to avoid conflating ancient Cush with modern Ethiopia. The word anav ('humble,' v. 3) does not imply weakness — it describes someone who does not grasp at status. We chose 'humble' over 'meek' to better convey the Hebrew sense.

Connections: Miriam's role as prophetess is established in Exodus 15:20. The skin disease inflicted on her uses the same tsara'at terminology as Leviticus 13-14. Aaron's plea — 'let her not be like one stillborn' (v. 12) — uses the rare image of a met ('dead one') emerging from a womb, connecting death imagery with the birth language of the chapter. The seven-day exclusion follows the purification protocol of Leviticus 13:4-5.

¹Miriam — along with Aaron — spoke against Moses regarding the Cushite woman he had married, because he had taken a Cushite wife. ²They said, 'Has the LORD spoken only through Moses? Has He not also spoken through us?' And the LORD heard this. ³Now Moses was an exceedingly humble man — more so than any person on the face of the earth. ⁴Then the LORD spoke suddenly to Moses, Aaron, and Miriam: 'The three of you, come out to the Tent of Meeting.' So the three of them went out. ⁵The LORD descended in the pillar of cloud and stood at the entrance of the tent. He called Aaron and Miriam forward, and the two of them stepped out. ⁶He said, 'Listen carefully to My words: When a prophet of yours arises, I the LORD make Myself known to that prophet through visions and speak to them in dreams. ⁷Not so with My servant Moses — he is entrusted with My entire household. ⁸I speak with him face to face, plainly and not in riddles, and he perceives the very form of the LORD. So why were you not afraid to speak against My servant Moses?' ⁹The LORD's anger burned against them, and He departed. ¹⁰When the cloud lifted from above the tent, Miriam was covered with a skin disease, white as snow. Aaron turned toward Miriam and saw that she was diseased. ¹¹Aaron said to Moses, 'Please, my lord — do not hold this sin against us. We acted foolishly, and we have sinned. ¹²Do not let her be like a stillborn child whose flesh is already half decomposed when it comes from its mother's womb.' ¹³Moses cried out to the LORD, 'God, please — heal her, please!' ¹⁴The LORD said to Moses, 'If her own father had spit in her face, would she not bear that shame for seven days? Let her be confined outside the camp for seven days; after that she may be brought back in.' ¹⁵So Miriam was confined outside the camp for seven days, and the people did not travel onward until Miriam was brought back in. ¹⁶After that, the people set out from Hazeroth and made camp in the wilderness of Paran.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vatdabber is feminine singular, indicating Miriam was the primary instigator; Aaron is secondary. The preposition be- in bemosheh means 'against' Moses, not merely 'about' him — this is hostile speech. The woman is called kushit ('Cushite'), referring to the region of Cush (modern Sudan/Ethiopia). Her identity is debated: she may be Zipporah the Midianite (some traditions equate Midian with Cush), or a second wife taken after Zipporah. The repetitive structure — ki ishah kushit laqach ('because a Cushite wife he had taken') — emphasizes that the marriage itself was the point of contention.
2. The complaint shifts from Moses' marriage (v 1) to his prophetic authority. The doubled intensifiers haraq akh ('only, exclusively') emphasize the challenge — they question whether Moses holds a unique position as divine spokesman. The phrase gam banu dibber ('He has spoken also through us') asserts equal prophetic standing, since both Miriam (a prophetess, Exodus 15:20) and Aaron (a priestly mediator) had legitimate roles. The closing statement vayyishma YHWH ('and the LORD heard') is ominous — divine listening in this context signals that judgment is imminent.
3. This parenthetical narrator's comment explains why Moses does not defend himself. The key word anav ('humble, lowly, meek') does not imply weakness or passivity but describes someone who does not assert their own status or seek personal vindication. The superlative mikkol ha'adam asher al penei ha'adamah ('more than any person on the surface of the ground') is extraordinary — a unique claim in the Hebrew Bible. The section marker (samekh) after this verse creates a pause before God's dramatic intervention.
4. The word pit'om ('suddenly') emphasizes the immediacy of God's response — He does not delay when His servant is challenged. The ohel mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting') was the designated site of divine encounter, the place where God's presence was formally accessible. God summons all three (sheloshtekhem — 'the three of you'), but the confrontation that follows targets only the two challengers. The obedient response vayyets'u sheloshtam ('the three of them went out') underscores that even those about to be rebuked must appear when God calls.
5. The divine descent (vayyered — 'He came down') in the amud anan ('pillar of cloud') is a theophanic manifestation — God's visible presence materializes to address the challenge directly. Standing at the petach ha'ohel ('entrance of the tent') positions God as gatekeeper and judge. Calling Aaron and Miriam separately from Moses (vayyiqra Aharon uMiryam — 'He called Aaron and Miriam') physically separates the accused pair from the vindicated servant, setting the stage for the rebuke.
6. The phrase shim'u na devarai ('listen, please, to My words') is a formal divine command to pay attention — the particle na ('please') adds urgency, not politeness. God establishes the standard prophetic channels: mar'ah ('vision') and chalom ('dream'). These are indirect, mediated forms of revelation — God communicates through symbols, images, and nocturnal encounters. The phrase etvadda ('I make Myself known') uses the reflexive form, emphasizing that God chooses to reveal Himself; revelation is always divine initiative, not human achievement.
7. The phrase lo khen avdi Mosheh ('not so My servant Moses') sharply distinguishes Moses from all other prophets. The title avdi ('My servant') is a designation of honor in ancient Near Eastern court language — the king's servant held the highest trust. The phrase bekhlo beiti ne'eman hu ('in all My house he is faithful/entrusted') echoes a steward given authority over the entire royal estate. The root n-'-m from which ne'eman ('faithful, trustworthy') derives is the same root that gives us 'amen' — Moses' faithfulness is the standard of reliability.
8. The phrase peh el peh ('mouth to mouth') describes the most intimate and direct form of divine communication — unmediated by vision or dream. The term mar'eh ('plainly, clearly' — lit. 'in visible form') contrasts with chidot ('riddles, enigmas, dark sayings'). Moses receives transparent revelation while other prophets receive encoded messages requiring interpretation. The extraordinary claim temunat YHWH yabbi ('he perceives the form/likeness of the LORD') grants Moses a degree of access to the divine presence unparalleled in Scripture. The closing question maddu'a lo yeretem ('why were you not afraid') rebukes Miriam and Aaron — challenging Moses was effectively challenging God's chosen arrangement.
9. The phrase vayyichar af YHWH ('the nostril of the LORD burned hot') uses the standard Hebrew idiom for intense divine anger — the word af means both 'nostril' and 'anger,' linking fury to the physical image of nostrils flaring with heat. The terse clause vayyela ('and He departed') is devastating in its brevity — God withdraws His presence without further words. The departure leaves them to face the consequences of His wrath without the comfort of continued dialogue.
10. The cloud's departure (he'anana sar — 'the cloud turned aside') signals the withdrawal of God's protective presence, and immediately the consequence appears. The term metsora'at ('afflicted with tsara'at') refers to a skin condition causing ritual impurity — not modern leprosy (Hansen's disease) but a divinely imposed affliction. The comparison kashaleg ('like snow') describes the alarming whiteness of the affected skin. The repeated hinneh ('and there!') — used twice — conveys shock: first the narrator's, then Aaron's when he vayyifen ('turned') and saw her condition. Only Miriam is struck, though Aaron participated; this may reflect her role as primary instigator (v 1) or Aaron's priestly office making him exempt from this particular punishment.

11. Aaron's address bi adoni ('please, my lord') is deeply ironic — he uses a title of deference toward the very man whose authority he had just challenged. The plea al na tashet aleinu chattat ('please do not lay sin upon us') asks Moses to intercede rather than allow the punishment to stand. Two confessions follow: no'alnu ('we acted foolishly') from the root '-v-l describes reckless, thoughtless behavior, while chatanu ('we sinned') acknowledges moral transgression. Aaron speaks in the first person plural ('us,' 'we'), taking shared responsibility for the offense.
12. Aaron's plea compares Miriam's condition to a met ('dead one') — specifically a stillborn infant (betse'to merechem immo — 'when it comes out of its mother's womb') with flesh already partially consumed. The word chatsi ('half') intensifies the horror: the body is in a state of active decay. The comparison is visceral — Miriam's white, flaking skin resembles decomposing flesh. Aaron's appeal to Moses, not directly to God, reflects the established hierarchy: Moses is the recognized mediator between God and the people.
13. Moses' prayer is one of the shortest and most passionate in the entire Hebrew Bible — just five Hebrew words: el na refa na lah ('God, please, heal, please, her'). The doubled particle na ('please') intensifies the urgency of the plea. The verb vayyits'aq ('he cried out') indicates an anguished shout, not a quiet prayer. Despite being the one wronged by Miriam's challenge, Moses immediately intercedes for her healing — a striking embodiment of the humility described in verse 3. The paragraph marker (pe) after this verse signals a transition in the narrative.
14. God responds to Moses' plea with an argument from lesser to greater (gal vachomer): if a father's spitting in his daughter's face (yaroq yaraq befaneiha — the infinitive absolute intensifies: 'surely spitting he spit') demands seven days of shame (tikkhalem — 'she would be humiliated'), how much more does divine rebuke require a period of discipline? The seven-day confinement tissager shiv'at yamim michuts lamachaneh ('she shall be shut outside the camp seven days') follows the purification protocol for tsara'at established in Leviticus 13-14. God grants healing but insists on the full period of discipline — mercy tempered by justice.
15. The entire nation halts its journey (veha'am lo nasa — 'and the people did not set out') until Miriam completes her seven-day exclusion — a remarkable honor for a woman who had just been punished. The verb he'asef ('was gathered in, was brought back') is the same term used for the ritual readmission of a person healed from tsara'at. That the entire community of Israel waited for one woman indicates Miriam's stature despite her offense; the nation would not move forward without her.
16. The journey resumes with a geographic transition marker: from Chatserot (Hazereth, meaning 'enclosures' or 'courtyards') to midbar Paran (the wilderness of Paran), a vast desert region in the northeastern Sinai peninsula. This travelogue verse bridges the Miriam incident to the next major narrative — the sending of the scouts into Canaan (chapter 13). The paragraph marker (pe) signals a major section break, closing the Miriam episode and opening the reconnaissance narrative that will define the fate of an entire generation.

Summary: Twelve tribal leaders are sent from Kadesh to scout the land of Canaan during the grape harvest. They return after forty days carrying an enormous grape cluster, along with pomegranates and figs. Ten spies report that the land is good but its inhabitants are unconquerable giants. Caleb alone urges immediate advance; the majority report overwhelms the people with fear.

What Makes This Remarkable: The command shelach-lekha ('send for yourself,' v. 2) uses the reflexive lekha, suggesting God grants permission rather than initiating the mission — a nuance the parallel account in Deuteronomy 1:22 confirms. The scouts are not ordinary soldiers but nesi'im ('chieftains'), making their failure a failure of leadership. The majority report distorts their own evidence: they saw a land that 'devours its inhabitants' (v. 32) — yet brought back fruit proving its extraordinary fertility. Fear rewrites reality.

Translation Friction: The word vayaturu ('they scouted,' v. 21) from the root t-u-r has a neutral sense of exploration, but the same root appears negatively in verse 32 as dibbah ('a bad report'). We used 'scout' for the neutral occurrences and 'slander' for the dibbah to reflect the shift. The Nephilim reference (v. 33) — 'we saw the Nephilim' — creates a textual puzzle, since Genesis 6:4 places them before the flood. We retained the name without harmonizing.

Connections: The parallel account in Deuteronomy 1:22-25 attributes the scouting initiative to the people rather than God. The name change from Hoshea to Joshua (Yehoshua, v. 16) adds the divine name — 'the LORD saves.' The forty-day scouting period (v. 25) will become the basis for the forty-year wilderness sentence in Numbers 14:34. The Wadi Eshcol ('cluster valley,' v. 24) preserves the grape harvest in a place-name.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Send men to scout the land of Canaan, which I am giving to the Israelites. Send one man from each ancestral tribe — every one of them a chieftain." ³So Moses dispatched them from the Wilderness of Paran at the LORD's command. All of them were leaders among the Israelites. ⁴These were their names: From the tribe of Reuben —

Shammua son of Zaccur. ⁵From the tribe of Simeon — Shaphat son of Hori. ⁶From the tribe of Judah — Caleb son of Jephunneh. ⁷From the tribe of Issachar — Igal son of Joseph. ⁸From the tribe of Ephraim — Hoshea son of Nun. ⁹From the tribe of Benjamin — Palti son of Raphu. ¹⁰From the tribe of Zebulun — Gaddiel son of Sodi. ¹¹From the tribe of Joseph — specifically, from the tribe of Manasseh — Gaddi son of Susi. ¹²From the tribe of Dan — Ammiel son of Gemalli. ¹³From the tribe of Asher — Sethur son of Michael. ¹⁴From the tribe of Naphtali — Nahbi son of Vophsi. ¹⁵From the tribe of Gad — Geuel son of Machi. ¹⁶These are the names of the men Moses sent to scout the land. Moses renamed Hoshea son of Nun as Joshua. ¹⁷Moses sent them to scout the land of Canaan, telling them, "Go up through the Negev and continue up into the hill country. ¹⁸Observe what the land is like, and the people living in it — whether they are strong or weak, few or many. ¹⁹What is the land they inhabit like — is it good or poor? And the cities where they live — are they open encampments or fortified strongholds? ²⁰Is the soil rich or thin? Are there trees on it or not? Be bold, and bring back some of the land's produce." (It was the season of the first ripe grapes.) ²¹They went up and scouted the land from the Wilderness of Zin all the way to Rehob, near Lebo-hamath. ²²They went up through the Negev and reached Hebron, where Ahiman, Sheshai, and Talmai — descendants of Anak — were living. (Hebron had been built seven years before Zoan in Egypt.) ²³They reached the Wadi Eshcol and cut a branch there bearing a single cluster of grapes so large that two men had to carry it on a pole between them. They also brought back pomegranates and figs. ²⁴That place was called the Wadi Eshcol — "Cluster Valley" — because of the grape cluster the Israelites cut there. ²⁵They returned from scouting the land at the end of forty days. ²⁶They traveled back and came to Moses, Aaron, and the entire Israelite congregation in the Wilderness of Paran, at Kadesh. They delivered their report to them — to the whole congregation — and displayed the land's produce. ²⁷They gave their report: "We entered the land where you sent us, and it truly does flow with milk and honey — here is its produce. ²⁸However — the people living in the land are fierce, the cities are fortified and extremely large, and we also saw descendants of Anak there. ²⁹The Amalekites occupy the Negev region. The Hittites, Jebusites, and Amorites occupy the hill country. The Canaanites occupy the territory along the sea and along the Jordan." ³⁰Caleb silenced the people before Moses and declared, "We should go up immediately and take possession of it, because we are fully capable of doing so!" ³¹But the men who had gone up with him countered, "We cannot attack those people — they are stronger than we are." ³²They spread a slanderous report about the land they had scouted among the Israelites, saying, "The land we traveled through to scout is a land that devours its inhabitants! And all the people we saw in it are men of enormous size. ³³We saw the Nephilim there — the Anakites descend from the Nephilim — and in our own eyes we seemed like grasshoppers, and that is how we must have appeared in their eyes too."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard revelation formula vayedabber YHVH el-Mosheh lemor ('and the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') introduces the spy mission. In the parallel account (Deuteronomy 1:22), the initiative comes from the people, not God — the two accounts complement each other: the people proposed it, God sanctioned it.
2. The command shelach-lekha ('send for yourself') — the reflexive lekha ('for yourself') suggests God is granting permission rather than initiating the mission (compare Rashi: 'by your own judgment'). The verb veyaturu ('that they may scout/explore') from the root t-u-r ('to seek out, explore, spy') defines their mission as reconnaissance, not conquest. Each spy must be ish echad lematteh avotav ('one man per ancestral tribe') and kol nasi vahem ('every one a chieftain among them') — not ordinary soldiers but tribal leaders with authority.
3. The departure point is midbar Paran ('the Wilderness of Paran'), specifically from Kadesh (v. 26). The phrase al-pi YHVH ('at the mouth/command of the LORD') reaffirms divine authorization. The qualification kullam anashim rashei venei-Yisrael hemmah ('all of them were men, heads of the Israelites') — the word anashim ('men') here implies 'men of standing, distinguished men' rather than mere gender. Their high status makes their later failure all the more devastating.
4. The spy list begins with Reuben, Jacob's firstborn. Shammua (Shammu'a — 'heard, renowned') son of Zakkur ('remembered') — both names relate to perception and memory. This is a different list from the tribal leaders in chapters 1-2 and 7; these are selected specifically for the reconnaissance mission.
5. Shaphat (Shafat — 'he has judged') son of Chori ('cave-dweller' or 'free-born') represents Simeon. The name Shaphat relates to the root sh-f-t ('to judge, govern'), suggesting a family with judicial standing.
6. Kalev (Caleb — possibly meaning 'dog' or 'whole-hearted,' from kelev or kol-lev) son of Yefunneh ('he will be turned/prepared') becomes one of only two spies who trust God's promise. Though possibly of Kenizzite (non-Israelite) descent (Numbers 32:12), Caleb is fully integrated into Judah's tribe — a convert who outshines the native-born.

7. Yig'al (Ig'al — 'he will redeem') son of Yosef ('he will add') represents Issachar. The name Yig'al from the root g-'l ('to redeem') ironically foreshadows his failure — the one named 'redeemer' will not act redemptively but will join the fearful majority.
8. Hoshea (Hoshe'a — 'salvation') son of Nun is listed here under his original name, before Moses renames him Yehoshua (Joshua — 'the LORD saves') in verse 16. The tribe of Ephraim produces the man who will eventually lead Israel into Canaan. His original name means simply 'salvation'; the renamed form adds the divine name, transforming it into a theological declaration.
9. Palti (Palti — 'my deliverance') son of Rafu ('healed') represents Benjamin. The name Palti derives from the root p-l-t ('to deliver, escape'), another ironic name — this spy will not deliver a faithful report but will side with the fearful majority.
10. Gaddi'el (Gaddi-el — 'God is my fortune/luck') son of Sodi ('my confidant' or 'my secret counsel') represents Zebulun. The theophoric name credits God as the source of good fortune, yet this spy will act as though the land's inhabitants, not God, determine Israel's fortune.
11. The text specifies lematteh Yosef lematteh Menasheh ('of the tribe of Joseph, of the tribe of Manasseh') because Joseph's inheritance was split between Ephraim (v. 8) and Manasseh. Gaddi (Gaddi — 'my fortune') son of Susi ('my horse' or 'my swallow') represents the half-tribe. Manasseh and Ephraim each send a spy, accounting for the full twelve without Levi (who has no territorial inheritance).
12. Ammi'el (Ammi-el — 'my kinsman is God' or 'God is my people') son of Gemalli ('my camel-driver' — implying a caravan trader) represents Dan. The name Ammiel declares a relationship with God as close as family, yet this spy will not act on that kinship of trust.
13. Setur (Sethur — 'hidden, concealed') son of Mikha'el ('who is like God?') represents Asher. The name Sethur from the root s-t-r ('to hide, conceal') is fitting for a spy — one who operates in concealment. His father's name poses the rhetorical question 'who is like God?' — yet the ten spies will act as if the Anakim are mightier than God.
14. Nachbi (Nahbi — possibly 'hidden' or 'timid,' from the root ch-b-' meaning 'to hide') son of Vofsi ('my addition' or of uncertain meaning) represents Naphtali. If Nahbi's name indeed means 'hidden/timid,' it is prophetically apt for one of the ten spies who will counsel retreat out of fear.
15. Ge'u'el (Geu-el — 'majesty of God' or 'God has exalted') son of Makhi ('my reduction' or 'my smiting') represents Gad, the last tribe in the spy roster. Gad, whose name means 'fortune' or 'troop,' completes the list of twelve — one from each tribe except Levi.
16. The summary statement leads to a pivotal detail: vayyiqra Mosheh le-Hoshe'a bin-Nun Yehoshu'a ('Moses called Hoshea son of Nun, Joshua'). The name change from Hoshe'a ('salvation') to Yehoshu'a ('the LORD saves') adds the divine name — transforming human deliverance into a declaration that salvation belongs to God alone. The timing of this renaming — just before the spy mission — suggests Moses knew Joshua would need to embody this truth when the majority lost faith.
17. Moses's instructions begin with the route: alu zeh ba-Negev ('go up this way through the Negev') — the arid southern region of Canaan — va'alitem et-ha-har ('and go up into the mountain/hill country') — the central highlands. The repeated verb alu/alitem ('go up') reflects both topography (ascending from the desert into highlands) and theological hope — they are ascending toward the promised inheritance.
18. Moses's reconnaissance briefing is systematic and professional. The first assessment: ur'item et-ha'arets mah-hi ('observe the land, what it is') — general character. Then the inhabitants: ha-chazaq hu ha-rafeh ('is it/he strong or weak?') — the singular pronoun treats the population as a collective entity. And ha-me'at hu im-rav ('is it few or many?') — population density. These are standard military intelligence questions for evaluating an invasion target.
19. The second layer of questions: ha-tovah hi im-ra'ah ('is it good or bad?') — assessing agricultural quality and habitability. Then urban assessment: ha-bemachanim im bemivtsarim ('in encampments or in fortifications?'). The contrast between machaneh ('open camp') and mivtsar ('fortified city') is crucial — fortified cities require siege warfare, while tent encampments are vulnerable. The spies' answer about 'very great walled cities' (v. 28) directly addresses this question.
20. The final questions: ha-shemenah hi im-razah ('is it fat/rich or lean/thin?') — soil fertility assessed in agricultural terms. Hayesh-bah ets im-ayin ('are there trees in it or not?') — timber resources and orchard potential. Then the command: vehitchazzaqtem ulqachtem mipperi ha'arets ('be strong/courageous and take from the fruit of the land'). The verb hitchazzaq ('strengthen yourselves, be bold') hints that this mission requires courage. The editorial note veba-yamim yemei bikkurei anavim ('the time was the season of the first ripe grapes') places the mission in early summer (late June/July), when the land's produce would be at its most impressive.
21. The scope of the reconnaissance is comprehensive: mi-midbar-Tsin ('from the Wilderness of Zin') in the far south ad-Rehov levo Chamat ('to Rehob, at the approach to Hamath') in the far north. This represents the full length of the promised land — roughly 250 miles. Lebo-hamath (later 'the entrance of Hamath') became a standard marker for Israel's ideal northern boundary (cf. Numbers 34:8, 1 Kings 8:65). The spies covered the entire territory, not just a sample.
22. The singular vayyavo ('he came') amid plural subjects may indicate Caleb went alone to Hebron (cf. Joshua 14:13-14, Judges 1:20). Hebron's three Anakite clans — Achiman, Sheshai, and Talmai — are yelidei ha-Anaq ('born of Anak, descendants of the giant'). The Anakim were a people of exceptional height who terrified the spies. The parenthetical note dates Hebron as seven years older than Tso'an (Tanis/Avaris), Egypt's ancient capital — establishing Hebron's antiquity and prestige. Hebron was one of the oldest continuously inhabited cities in the region.
23. The nachal Eshkol ('Wadi of the Cluster') produces the iconic image of Canaan's abundance: a zemorah ('vine branch') with eshkol anavim echad ('a single cluster of grapes') so massive vayyisa'uhamot bishnayim ('they carried it on a pole between two men'). The mot ('carrying pole') was the same type used to transport the Tabernacle's sacred objects — linking the land's produce with holy things. The rimmonim ('pomegranates') and te'anin ('figs') complete a trio of fruits symbolizing the land's fertility.

- 24. Another etymological place-name: Nachal Eshkol ('Wadi of the Cluster') commemorates the astonishing grape cluster. The phrase al odot ha-eshkol ('on account of the cluster') provides the explicit explanation. The name encodes the proof that the land was genuinely extraordinary in its fertility — the spies' physical evidence confirmed God's description of a 'land flowing with milk and honey.' The tragedy is that this same abundance failed to overcome their fear.
- 25. The mission lasted arba'im yom ('forty days') — a number laden with biblical significance: Moses on Sinai (Exodus 24:18), Elijah's journey to Horeb (1 Kings 19:8), and Jesus's wilderness temptation. In Numbers 14:34, God will decree one year of wandering for each day of scouting — forty days becomes forty years. The verb vayyashuvu mittur ('they returned from scouting') uses the same root t-u-r as the original commission in verse 2.
- 26. The return to Qadesh ('Kadesh' — meaning 'holy/sacred') in midbar Paran sets the stage for the decisive report. The phrase vayyashivu otam davar ('they brought back word to them') — the root sh-u-v ('to return') combined with davar ('word, report') — indicates a formal debriefing. The report is delivered publicly: ve'et-kol-ha'edah ('and to the entire congregation'), not privately to Moses alone. The display of peri ha'arets ('the land's produce') — the spectacular grape cluster, figs, and pomegranates — provides visual evidence before the verbal report.
- 27. The report begins positively: ba'anu el-ha'arets ('we entered the land') — mission accomplished. The confirmation vegam zavat chalav udevash hi ('and indeed it flows with milk and honey') validates God's own description of the land (Exodus 3:8). The phrase zavat ('flowing') suggests overflowing abundance — chalav ('milk,' representing pastoral wealth) and devash ('honey,' whether bee-honey or date-syrup, representing agricultural sweetness). The tangible proof: vezeh-piryah ('and here is its produce') — they gesture to the enormous grape cluster.
- 28. The devastating pivot word: efes ki ('however, but, nevertheless') — a strong adversative that cancels the positive report. The assessment: az ha'am ('the people are fierce/strong'), he'arim betsurot gedolot me'od ('the cities are fortified, very great'), and the climax: vegam-yelidei ha-Anaq ra'inu sham ('and we even saw descendants of Anak there'). The Anakim — the giant warriors first mentioned in verse 22 — are saved for last as the ultimate deterrent. The word efes literally means 'nothing, zero,' as if to say: 'the land is wonderful, but it amounts to nothing because...'
- 29. The military intelligence maps the enemy's positions: Amaleq ('Amalek') controls the Negev — the southern approach Israel would need to use. The Chitti ('Hittite'), Yevusi ('Jebusite'), and Emori ('Amorite') hold the strategic highlands (ba-har). The Kena'ani ('Canaanite') controls the coastal plain (al-ha-yam) and the Jordan valley (al yad ha-Yarden). The message: every approach route and strategic zone is already held by formidable peoples. The land is surrounded and saturated with enemies.
- 30. Caleb's courage erupts: vayyahas ('he silenced') the crowd — an act of bold authority. His words use the emphatic infinitive absolute: aloh na'aleh ('going up we shall go up!' — 'let us absolutely go up!') and yakol nukhal lah ('being able we shall be able for it!' — 'we can certainly do it!'). The doubled verb forms express total confidence. While the ten spies focused on enemy strength, Caleb focuses on divine promise — veyarashnu otah ('and we shall possess/dispossess it'), using the verb y-r-sh that characterizes the conquest mandate throughout Deuteronomy.
- 31. The ten spies directly contradict Caleb: lo nukhal la'alot el-ha'am ('we are not able to go up against the people'). Where Caleb said yakol nukhal ('we can certainly do it'), they say lo nukhal ('we cannot'). Their reason: ki-chazaq hu mimmennu ('because he/it is stronger than us'). The pronoun hu ('he/it') is ambiguous — some rabbis read mimmennu as 'than him' (i.e., stronger than God!), a reading that exposes the ultimate faithlessness of their assessment. They measured Canaan's strength against Israel's military capability rather than against God's power.
- 32. The text now uses the loaded term dibbat ha'arets ('slander/defamation of the land') — dibbah is the same word used for malicious gossip (Proverbs 10:18). Their report has crossed from honest assessment to deliberate distortion. The claim erets okhelet yoshveha ('a land that devours its inhabitants') is bizarre — suggesting the land itself is hostile and deadly, contradicting their own testimony about its abundant produce. The phrase anshei middot ('men of stature/measurement') — literally 'men of measures' — means people of extraordinary height, implying the inhabitants are unnaturally tall.
- 33. The climactic exaggeration: the Nefilim ('Nephilim' — the legendary giants of Genesis 6:4) are invoked to maximize terror. The identification benei Anaq min-ha-Nefilim ('the Anakites from/of the Nephilim') connects the current inhabitants to the mythic pre-flood giants. The devastating self-assessment: vannahi ve'eineinu ka-chagavim ('we were in our own eyes like grasshoppers') — the real problem is not the enemy's size but their own shrunken self-perception. The added claim vekhen hayinu be'eineihem ('and so we were in their eyes') is pure projection — they could not possibly know how the Canaanites perceived them. Fear distorted their vision of themselves, of the enemy, and ultimately of God.

Summary: The people weep all night, wish they had died in Egypt, and propose appointing a new leader to take them back. Joshua and Caleb plead with the congregation; the people threaten to stone them. God's glory appears, threatening to destroy the nation. Moses intercedes, invoking God's own self-description from Exodus 34. God pardons but sentences the entire adult generation to die in the wilderness — forty years, one for each scouting day. Those who then presume to invade on their own are routed.

What Makes This Remarkable: The bitter irony is devastating: the people said 'if only we had died in this wilderness' (v. 2), and God grants their wish (vv. 28-29). They feared for their children (v. 3), but God declares the children will be the ones who enter the land (v. 31). Moses's intercession (vv. 13-19) quotes God's own words from Exodus 34:6-7 back to Him — the most daring prayer in the Torah, using the LORD's self-revelation as the basis for mercy.

Translation Friction: The verb vayyillonu ('they grumbled,' v. 2) is the characteristic wilderness rebellion word, carrying more weight than casual complaint — we rendered it 'grumbled' while noting its covenantal overtones. The phrase erech appayim ('slow to anger,' v. 18) literally means 'long of nostrils' — we preserved the standard English rendering rather than the anatomical image, since 'slow to anger' has become a theological term in its own right.

Connections: God's self-description quoted in verse 18 comes from the revelation at Sinai in Exodus 34:6-7. The forty-year sentence (v. 34) — one year per scouting day — establishes the wilderness period that defines the rest of Numbers and Deuteronomy. The unauthorized invasion attempt (vv. 40-45) and its failure at Hormah connect to the successful campaign at Hormah in Numbers 21:3. Caleb's exemption (v. 24) is fulfilled in Joshua 14:6-14.

¹The entire community raised their voices and cried out, and the people wept that night. ²All the Israelites grumbled against Moses and Aaron. The entire community said to them, "If only we had died in the land of Egypt! Or if only we had died in this wilderness! ³Why is the LORD bringing us into this land only to fall by the sword? Our wives and children will become plunder! Would it not be better to go back to Egypt?" ⁴They said to one another, "Let us appoint a leader and go back to Egypt." ⁵Moses and Aaron fell on their faces before the entire assembly of the Israelite community. ⁶Joshua son of Nun and Caleb son of Jephunneh, who were among those who had scouted the land, tore their garments. ⁷They addressed the entire Israelite community: "The land we traveled through to scout is exceptionally good — ⁸if the LORD is pleased with us, He will bring us into this land and give it to us — a land flowing with milk and honey. ⁹Only do not rebel against the LORD! And do not fear the people of the land — they are bread for us. Their protection has departed from them, and the LORD is with us. Do not fear them!" ¹⁰But the entire community said to stone them. Then the glory of the LORD appeared at the tent of meeting before all the Israelites. ¹¹The LORD said to Moses, "How long will this people treat Me with contempt? How long will they refuse to trust Me, despite all the signs I have performed among them? ¹²I will strike them with plague and disinherit them, and I will make you into a nation greater and mightier than they are." ¹³Moses said to the LORD, "But the Egyptians will hear of it — since You brought this people up from among them by Your power — ¹⁴and they will tell the inhabitants of this land. They have heard that You, LORD, are present among this people — that You, LORD, are seen eye to eye, that Your cloud stands over them, and that You go before them in a pillar of cloud by day and a pillar of fire by night. ¹⁵If You put this people to death all at once, the nations who have heard of Your fame will say: ¹⁶'Because the LORD was unable to bring this people into the land He swore to give them, He slaughtered them in the wilderness.' ¹⁷Now, let the power of my Lord be displayed, just as You have declared: ¹⁸'The LORD is slow to anger and rich in steadfast love, bearing iniquity and transgression — yet He does not leave the guilty unpunished, visiting the iniquity of parents upon children to the third and fourth generation.' ¹⁹Forgive the iniquity of this people, I pray, according to the greatness of Your steadfast love, just as You have borne with this people from Egypt until now." ²⁰The LORD said, "I have forgiven, as you asked. ²¹But as surely as I live, and as the glory of the LORD fills the entire earth — ²²none of the people who have seen My glory and the signs I performed in Egypt and in the wilderness — who have tested Me these ten times and have not obeyed My voice — ²³shall see the land I swore to their ancestors. None of those who treated Me with contempt shall see it. ²⁴But My servant Caleb — because a different spirit was with him and he followed Me wholeheartedly — I will bring him into the land he entered, and his descendants shall possess it. ²⁵Since the Amalekites and Canaanites dwell in the valley, turn around tomorrow and set out toward the wilderness by way of the Red Sea." ²⁶The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron: ²⁷"How long must I endure this wicked community that grumbles against Me? I have heard the complaints the Israelites keep raising against Me. ²⁸Tell them: 'As surely as I live — declares the LORD — I will do to you exactly what you said in My hearing. ²⁹In this wilderness your corpses will fall — every one of you who was registered in the census, from twenty years old and above, who grumbled against Me. ³⁰You will certainly not enter the land where I swore to settle you — except Caleb son of Jephunneh and Joshua son of Nun. ³¹But your children — the ones you said would become plunder — I will bring them in, and they will experience the land you rejected. ³²But as for you — your corpses will fall in this wilderness. ³³Your children will be shepherds in the wilderness for forty years, bearing the consequences of your unfaithfulness until the last of your corpses has fallen in the wilderness. ³⁴Corresponding to the number of days you scouted the land — forty days, a day for each year — you will bear your guilt for forty years. Then you will know what it means to oppose Me." ³⁵I, the LORD, have spoken. I will surely do this to this entire wicked community that has banded together against Me: in this wilderness they will come to an end — there they will die. ³⁶The men Moses had sent to scout the land — who returned and caused the entire community to grumble against him by spreading a bad report about the land — ³⁷those men who had spread the bad report about the land died in a plague before the LORD. ³⁸But Joshua son of Nun and Caleb son of Jephunneh survived — of the men who had gone to scout the land, they alone lived. ³⁹When Moses reported these words to all the Israelites, the people mourned deeply. ⁴⁰They rose early the next morning and headed toward the hilltop, saying, "Here we are! We will go up to the place the LORD spoke of, for we have sinned." ⁴¹Moses said, "Why are you defying the LORD's command? This will not succeed. ⁴²Do not go up — the LORD is not among you! — or you will be struck down before your enemies. ⁴³The Amalekites and Canaanites are there to face you, and you will fall by the sword. Because you have turned away from following the LORD, the LORD will not be with you." ⁴⁴But they recklessly pushed ahead toward the hilltop, even though the ark of the LORD's covenant and Moses had not moved from the camp. ⁴⁵The Amalekites and the Canaanites who lived in that hill country came down and struck them, beating them back as far as Hormah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with communal lamentation: vattissa kol-ha'edah ('the entire community raised up') — a corporate act, not individual grief. The weeping follows the ten spies' terrifying report (ch 13). Ballaylah hahu ('that night') — the night becomes a marker of national failure. The rabbis associated this with the ninth of Av (Tisha B'Av), the date of both Temple destructions, teaching that God said: 'You wept without cause; I will establish this night as a night of weeping for generations.'
2. The verb vayyillonu ('grumbled') is the characteristic wilderness rebellion word — Israel's repeated complaint against God's leadership. The death wish — lu-matnu be'erets Mitsrayim ('if only we had died in Egypt') — prefers slavery and death to the risk of freedom. The ironic twist: God will grant their wish (v28-29). They said they wanted to die in the wilderness; they will. The prayer for death becomes a self-imposed sentence.
3. The accusation against God is explicit: lamah YHWH mevi otanu ('why is the LORD bringing us') — they accuse God of leading them to slaughter. Their concern for wives and children (nashenu vetappenu yihyu lavaz — 'our wives and children will become plunder') will be answered with bitter irony in v31: God says the children they feared for will be the ones who enter the land. The proposal to return to Egypt (shuv Mitsraymah) is the ultimate covenant rejection — voluntarily returning to slavery.
4. The rebellion crystallizes into a concrete plan: nittenah ro'sh venashuvah Mitsraymah ('let us appoint a head and return to Egypt'). Replacing Moses with a new leader who will take them backward — this is the most direct rejection of God's appointed leadership in the entire wilderness narrative. It is not merely complaint but organized insurrection. The verb nittenah ('let us appoint') is a deliberate act of communal decision-making against God's choice.
5. Moses and Aaron prostrate themselves (vayyippon al-peneihem) — a gesture of grief, intercession, or horror. They fall before the assembly, not before God (though prayer may be implied). The public prostration is a physical display of desperation: the leaders are overwhelmed by the magnitude of the rebellion. Two men face an entire nation demanding to abandon the covenant.
6. Joshua and Caleb — the two faithful spies out of twelve — tear their garments (qare'u bigdeihem), the classic sign of mourning and outrage. They have seen the land; they know it is good. The tearing of garments is directed not at the land's danger but at the people's faithlessness. These two men alone among the scout party refuse to join the panic.
7. Joshua and Caleb's counter-testimony: tovah ha'arets me'od me'od ('the land is exceedingly, exceedingly good'). The doubled me'od ('very, very') is emphatic — this is not a lukewarm endorsement but an impassioned declaration. They have seen the same land, the same fortified cities, the same giant inhabitants — and their conclusion is opposite to the majority report. The difference is not in what they saw but in whom they trust.
8. The conditional im-chafets banu YHWH ('if the LORD is pleased with us') is the theological core of Joshua and Caleb's argument: the land's conquest depends not on Israel's military strength but on God's favor. If God wants them there, no army can stop them. The phrase erets zavat chalah udevash ('land flowing with milk and honey') — the covenant promise language that has echoed since Exodus 3:8 — asserts that the promise is still valid.
9. Joshua and Caleb's argument has three elements: (1) don't rebel (al-timrodu — the real danger is not the Canaanites but disobedience), (2) the inhabitants are lachmenu hem ('bread for us' — they will be consumed as easily as eating bread), and (3) sar tsillam me'aleihem ('their shade/protection has departed from them'). The metaphor of shade (tsel) leaving suggests that whatever divine or spiritual protection the Canaanites once had is now gone. The climactic declaration: vaYHWH ittanu ('the LORD is with us') — four words that answer every objection. If God is present, nothing else matters.

10. The mob turns murderous: lirgom otam ba'avanim ('to stone them with stones') — Joshua and Caleb face lynching for their faithful testimony. At this moment of maximum crisis — when the community is about to murder its own faithful scouts — ukhevod YHWH nir'ah be'ohel mo'ed ('the glory of the LORD appeared at the tent of meeting'). God's kavod intervenes at the exact moment of threatened violence. The glory that usually signifies blessing now appears to judge. The juxtaposition is stark: the people prepare to kill the righteous; God appears.
11. God's response is two questions of anguish: ad-anah yena'atuni ('how long will they despise/treat Me with contempt?') and ad-anah lo ya'aminu vi ('how long will they not believe in Me?'). The verb na'ats ('to despise, to treat with contempt') goes beyond disobedience to personal rejection — Israel is not merely afraid but contemptuous of God. The phrase bekhohol ha'otot asher asiti beqirbo ('despite all the signs I performed among them') catalogs the exodus plagues, the sea crossing, the manna, the water, the fire, the cloud — none of it produced lasting trust. The emunah register term is implicit: Israel's failure is a failure of faith.
12. God proposes to destroy Israel and start over with Moses — the same offer He made after the golden calf (Exod 32:10). Akkeni vadever ('I will strike them with plague'), orishennu ('I will disinherit them'), and e'eseh otka legoy gadol ('I will make you into a great nation'). The proposal tests Moses: will he accept personal advancement at the expense of the nation? As at the golden calf, Moses will refuse (v13-19). The parallel between the two incidents shows that Israel's unfaithfulness is a recurring crisis, not an isolated event.
13. Moses's intercession begins with an appeal to God's reputation among the nations: veshame'u Mitsrayim ('the Egyptians will hear'). If God destroys Israel, the exodus will look like a failed rescue — God brought them out only to kill them. Moses's argument is not sentimental but strategic: God's honor is at stake in the international arena. The phrase he'elita vekhochakha ('You brought them up by Your power') reminds God that His own power was publicly demonstrated in the exodus — destroying Israel would retroactively discredit that display.
14. Moses catalogs God's visible presence among Israel — ayin be'ayin nir'ah attah YHWH ('You LORD are seen eye to eye'), the cloud stands over them (ananekha omed aleihem), the pillar of cloud leads by day, the pillar of fire by night. These are all publicly visible phenomena that the surrounding nations have observed and reported. If God now destroys Israel, these witnesses will conclude that God's presence was not protection but a prelude to destruction. Moses argues that God's reputation depends on Israel's survival.
15. The hypothetical: vehemattah et-ha'am hazzeh ke'ish echad ('if You kill this people as one man'). Moses puts words in the nations' mouths (v16) to show God what they will conclude. The phrase asher-shame'u et-shim'akha ('who have heard Your fame') establishes that God's reputation is international — the exodus made God famous among all peoples. Destroying Israel after that display would rewrite God's story from deliverance to failure.
16. The nations' imagined verdict: mibbeli yekolot YHWH ('because the LORD was unable') — they would conclude that God lacked the power to fulfill His promise. The verb vayyishchatem ('He slaughtered them') is brutal — shachat is the word for ritual slaughter. The nations would interpret Israel's destruction not as divine judgment but as divine failure. Moses's argument is masterful: he does not defend Israel's behavior (which is indefensible) but appeals to the consequences for God's own reputation.
17. Moses pivots from reputation defense to direct appeal: yigdal-na koach Adonai ('let the power of my Lord be great/displayed'). The shift is subtle but critical: true power is not displayed in destruction but in the capacity to forgive. Moses is about to quote God's own self-description from Exodus 34:6-7 — turning God's words back to God as an argument for mercy.
18. Moses condenses Exodus 34:6-7 into a prayer, selecting the attributes most relevant to the crisis: erekh appayim ('slow to anger' — patience), rav-chesed ('rich in steadfast love' — covenant loyalty), nosei avon vafesha ('bearing iniquity and transgression' — sin-bearing capacity). He also includes the balancing clause: venaqeh lo yenaqqeh ('yet He does not simply acquit'). Moses's genius is using both halves: mercy and justice. He asks God to forgive without pretending the sin doesn't matter. The prayer models what authentic intercession looks like: honest about the sin, confident in God's character.
19. The direct petition: selach-na la'avon ha'am hazzeh ('forgive, please, the iniquity of this people'). Moses grounds the request in two arguments: kegodel chasdekha ('according to the greatness of Your chesed') — God's own character demands forgiveness proportional to His love, and veka'asher nasatah la'am hazzeh miMitsrayim ve'ad-hennah ('as You have borne with this people from Egypt until now') — precedent. God has already forgiven this people repeatedly; one more time is consistent with the pattern. Moses argues from God's track record of mercy.
20. Three Hebrew words: salachti kidvarekha ('I have forgiven, according to your word'). The brevity is stunning. After Moses's elaborate argument (v13-19), God's response is three words of pardon. The verb salach ('forgive') is the divine exclusive — only God salachs (as noted in Lev 4:20). The phrase kidvarekha ('according to your word') acknowledges that Moses's intercession was effective. The death sentence of v12 is commuted. But forgiveness and consequences are not the same thing — what follows (v21-35) preserves the pardon while establishing the penalty.
21. God swears by Himself — chai-ani ('as I live') — the most binding oath possible. The declaration veyimmale khavod-YHWH et-kol-ha'arets ('the glory of the LORD will fill the entire earth') is both a promise and a reorientation: even in the context of Israel's failure, God's kavod will ultimately prevail across the whole earth, not just in the promised land. The scope expands from one nation to the entire world.
22. The criteria for exclusion: those who saw God's glory and signs (haro'im et-kevodi ve'et ototay) and still refused to trust. The phrase zeh eser pe'amim ('these ten times') may be literal (ten specific rebellion incidents) or idiomatic (repeatedly). The rabbis identified ten wilderness rebellions; the number may also echo the ten plagues — God performed ten signs of power; Israel responded with ten acts of faithlessness. The tragic symmetry: miracle for miracle, rebellion matched revelation.

- 23. The sentence: im-yir'u et-ha'arets ('if they shall see the land' — a Hebrew oath formula meaning 'they shall certainly NOT see it'). The promise to the ancestors (asher nishba'ti la'avotam) stands, but this generation forfeits its participation. The word mena'atsay ('those who treated Me with contempt') — from na'ats in v11 — defines the disqualifying sin: not fear, not weakness, but contempt for God.
- 24. Caleb's exception is based on character: ruach acheret immo ('a different spirit was with him'). While the nation despaired, Caleb had a spirit of faith and courage. The phrase vayemalle acharay ('he followed Me wholeheartedly,' literally 'he filled after Me') describes total, unreserved allegiance. Caleb is called avdi ('My servant') — the title reserved for Moses (Deut 34:5), Abraham, David, and the prophets. Joshua is not mentioned here (his exception appears in v30 and 26:65), possibly because Joshua's leadership role was already secured.
- 25. The immediate consequence: penu us'u lakhem hammidbarah derekh Yam-Suf ('turn around and head into the wilderness toward the Red Sea'). The direction reverses — instead of advancing into Canaan, Israel must retreat deeper into the desert. The mention of Amalekites and Canaanites in the valley is both practical (the military situation is real) and punitive (you feared them, so you cannot face them). The Red Sea route sends Israel away from the promised land and back toward Egypt — exactly what they said they wanted.
- 26. A new speech — addressed to both Moses and Aaron — specifies the details of the judgment. The sentencing phase begins.
- 27. God's patience reaches its limit: ad-matay la'edah hara'ah hazzot ('how long for this wicked community?'). Three times the verb lin ('grumble') appears in this verse — mallinim alay... mallinim alay... shama'ti ('grumbling against Me... grumbling against Me... I have heard'). God has been listening. The cumulative effect of repeated complaint — not a single incident but a pattern — triggers the judgment.
- 28. The divine oath again: chai-ani ne'um-YHWH ('as I live — declares the LORD'). The judgment is perfectly ironic: ka'asher dibbartem be'oznay ken e'eseh lakhem ('as you spoke in My ears, so I will do to you'). God takes their own words (v2: 'if only we had died in this wilderness') and makes them the sentence. They wished for death in the wilderness; they will get it. God does not invent a punishment — He grants their own request.
- 29. The sentence is specific: bamidbar hazzeh yippelu figreikhem ('in this wilderness your corpses will fall'). The age threshold — mibben esrim shanah vama'lah ('from twenty years old and upward') — matches the census age of Numbers 1:3. Everyone counted in the census who participated in the grumbling will die before reaching the land. The children under twenty — the ones the parents feared for (v3) — will be the inheritors.
- 30. The two exceptions are named: Caleb (mentioned in v24) and Joshua (mentioned here for the first time in the judgment). The phrase nasati et-yadi ('I raised My hand' — a gesture accompanying an oath) recalls the patriarchal oath. The land promise remains valid — God's oath is unbreakable — but this generation is excluded from participating in its fulfillment. The promise outlives the generation that doubted it.
- 31. The deepest irony of the judgment: vetappekhem asher amartem lavaz yihyeh ('your children whom you said would be plunder') — the parents' own argument (v3) is turned on its head. The children they feared for will be the inheritors. The verb me'astem ('you rejected/despised') is strong — the parents did not merely doubt the land; they despised it. The children will 'know' (yade'u) what their parents refused to believe.
- 32. A terse, devastating restatement: ufigreikhem attem yippelu bamidbar hazzeh ('but your corpses, you, will fall in this wilderness'). The pronoun attem ('you') is emphatic — you, specifically, in contrast to your children. The wilderness that was supposed to be a corridor to the promise becomes a graveyard.
- 33. The forty-year wilderness sentence: uvneikhem yihyu ro'im bamidbar arba'im shanah ('your children will be shepherds/wanderers in the wilderness forty years'). The children suffer indirectly — venase'u et-zenuteikhem ('they will bear your unfaithfulness'). The word zenut ('unfaithfulness,' literally 'whoredom/prostitution') frames the rebellion as spiritual adultery — Israel's turning from God to fear is described in the language of marital betrayal. The children pay for their parents' faithlessness.
- 34. The formula: yom lashanah yom lashanah ('a day for a year, a day for a year') — the forty-day scouting mission generates a forty-year sentence. The proportional punishment connects the crime to the consequence directly. The closing phrase vida'tem et-tenu'ati is difficult: tenu'ah may mean 'opposition to Me,' 'My withdrawal,' or 'what it means when I turn away.' The LXX renders it 'My wrath.' Whatever the precise meaning, the experience of forty years in the wilderness will teach Israel something about God that their faithlessness prevented them from learning: the cost of opposing the one who rescued them.
- 35. The divine signature: ani YHWH dibbarti ('I, the LORD, have spoken'). The sentence is sealed and irrevocable. The phrase hanno'adim alay ('who banded together against Me') reframes the rebellion: it was not merely fear of Canaanites but an organized conspiracy against God. The double ending — yittammu vesham yamutu ('they will come to an end, and there they will die') — closes the sentencing with finality. The wilderness generation's fate is sealed.
- 36. The ten unfaithful spies are identified as the cause: vayyallinu alav et-kol-ha'edah ('they caused the entire community to grumble against him'). Their sin was lehotsi dibbah al-ha'arets ('spreading a bad report about the land') — the verb dibbah ('slander, defamation') treats the negative report as libel against the land God promised. They didn't merely report difficulties; they slandered God's gift.
- 37. The ten unfaithful spies die immediately — bammagefah lifnei YHWH ('in a plague before the LORD'). They do not share the forty-year sentence of the community; their judgment is instant. They are the first casualties of the rebellion they caused. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') emphasizes that their death is divine act, not natural illness.
- 38. The two faithful spies survive: chayu min-ha'anashim ha'hem ('they lived from among those men'). The contrast is stark: ten died in a plague; two lived. Faithfulness and unfaithfulness produce opposite outcomes from the same mission. Joshua and Caleb saw the same land, faced the same giants, but trusted the same God — and that trust preserved their lives.

39. Moses delivers God's verdict, and the response is grief: vayyit'abbelu ha'am me'od ('the people mourned greatly'). The mourning comes too late — repentance after sentencing does not reverse the judgment. The tragedy is that genuine grief follows genuine sin, but the consequences cannot be undone by tears alone.
40. The people attempt a belated assault on Canaan: hinnenu ve'alínu el-hammaqom ('here we are, we will go up to the place'). The confession ki chatanu ('for we have sinned') accompanies the advance. But this attempt is as disobedient as the original refusal — God commanded them to turn toward the wilderness (v25), and now they are defying that command by trying to enter the land. They went from 'we refuse to go' to 'we insist on going' — both positions reject God's current instruction.
41. Moses warns them: lammah zeh attem overim et-pi YHWH ('why are you crossing/defying the mouth of the LORD?'). The verb avar ('to cross, to transgress') is the same word used for crossing a boundary — they are violating God's explicit instruction to retreat. The verdict is blunt: vehi lo titslach ('it will not succeed'). Military action without God's authorization is futile — the same truth the unfaithful spies should have recognized in reverse: with God, victory is certain; without God, defeat is certain.
42. The theological crux: ki ein YHWH beqirbekhem ('because the LORD is not among you'). God's presence — the very thing that makes Israel invincible — has been withdrawn from this military venture. Without God in their midst, Israel is just another small nation against fortified Canaanite cities. The prohibition al-ta'alu ('do not go up') is as clear as the original command to advance would have been — but they obey neither.
43. Moses spells out the consequence: unefaltem becherev ('you will fall by the sword'). The reason: ki al-ken shavtem me'acharei YHWH ('because you have turned away from following the LORD'). The verb shuv ('turn') — the same word that means 'repent/return' (Deut 30:2) — here describes turning away. The same capacity for turning that could restore them to God has been used to turn away from God. The final declaration: velo-yihyeh YHWH immakhem ('the LORD will not be with you') — the absence of God's presence is the absence of everything.
44. The verb vayyya'pilu ('they presumed, they acted recklessly') describes audacious, unsanctioned advance — pressing forward without authorization. Two absences define the disaster: the ark (aron berit-YHWH) and Moses (uMosheh) did not move from the camp. The symbols of God's presence and God's appointed leader stayed behind. Israel charges into battle without the covenant box and without the mediator — carrying nothing but their own presumption.
45. The predicted defeat: vayyakkum vayyakkum ad-haChormah ('they struck them and beat them back as far as Hormah'). The name Chormah means 'destruction/ban' — the place name itself narrates the outcome. The Amalekites and Canaanites — the very enemies Israel feared — now defeat them easily because God is not fighting for Israel. The chapter ends where it began: in failure. Israel feared the enemy (v1-3), refused to trust God (v4), was sentenced to the wilderness (v28-35), and then was defeated by the same enemy they could have conquered with God's help. The entire chapter is a study in the consequences of faithlessness.

Summary: After the devastating judgment of chapter 14, God gives offering regulations that begin with 'when you enter the land' — a reassurance that the promise endures for the next generation. The chapter covers grain and drink offering quantities scaled to animal size, a provision for the resident alien, the dough offering (challah), communal and individual sin offerings, the penalty for defiant sin, a Sabbath violation narrative, and the command to wear fringes (tsitsit).

What Makes This Remarkable: The placement is the message. Immediately after sentencing the adult generation to death in the wilderness, God legislates for life in the land — ki tavo'u el erets moshvoteikhem ('when you enter the land of your settlements,' v. 2). The promise of the land is not revoked, only postponed. The distinction between inadvertent sin (shegagah) and defiant sin (beyad ramah, 'with a high hand,' v. 30) is structurally critical: the sacrificial system covers the former but cannot absorb the latter.

Translation Friction: The phrase reiach nichoach ('pleasing aroma,' v. 3) is anthropomorphic — God does not eat or smell — but the metaphor conveys divine acceptance so vividly that we retained it rather than abstracting it. The term beyad ramah ('with a high hand,' v. 30) for defiant sin paints an image of a raised fist. We rendered it 'defiantly' but noted the gesture in the translator notes. The tsitsit ('fringes,' v. 38) and their tekhelet ('blue-violet') cord remain loaded terms in Jewish practice.

Connections: The 'when you enter the land' formula (v. 2) answers the despair of chapter 14 by confirming the promise to the children. The one-law-for-all principle — citizen and alien alike (vv. 15-16, 29) — echoes Exodus 12:49. The Sabbath violation story (vv. 32-36) illustrates the 'high hand' sin just described. The tsitsit command (vv. 37-41) is recalled in Deuteronomy 22:12 and referenced in Matthew 9:20.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When you enter the land of your settlements, which I am giving you, ³and you present a fire offering to the LORD — whether a burnt offering or a sacrifice to fulfill a vow, or as a voluntary offering, or at your appointed festivals — producing a reiaich nichoach (pleasing aroma) to the LORD, from the cattle herd or from the flock, ⁴then the one presenting the offering to the LORD must bring a grain offering of one-tenth of an ephah of fine flour, mixed with one-quarter of a hin of oil. ⁵You must also prepare one-quarter of a hin of wine as a drink offering, to accompany the burnt offering or sacrifice, for each lamb. ⁶For a ram, prepare a grain offering of two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with one-third of a hin of oil, ⁷and one-third of a hin of wine as a drink offering. Present it as a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ⁸When you prepare a young bull as a burnt offering or as a sacrifice to fulfill a vow, or as a peace offering to the LORD, ⁹you must present with the young bull a grain offering of three-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with half a hin of oil. ¹⁰Also bring half a hin of wine as a drink offering — a fire offering producing a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹¹This is the procedure for each bull, each ram, each lamb, or each young goat. ¹²However many you prepare, follow this same procedure for each one, according to their total number. ¹³Every native-born Israelite must follow these procedures when presenting a fire offering as a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁴When a foreigner resides among you — or anyone living among you in future generations — and that person presents a fire offering as a pleasing aroma to the LORD, they must do exactly as you do. ¹⁵The assembly has one statute for both you and the foreigner residing among you — a permanent statute throughout your generations. You and the foreigner are the same before the LORD. ¹⁶One instruction and one standard of justice apply to both you and the foreigner residing among you." ¹⁷The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁸"Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When you enter the land where I am bringing you, ¹⁹and you eat from the bread of the land, you must set aside a contribution for the LORD. ²⁰From the first of your dough, you must set aside a loaf as a contribution — just as you set aside a contribution from the threshing floor, so you must set this aside. ²¹From the first of your dough you must give a contribution to the LORD throughout your generations." ²²If you unintentionally fail to carry out any of these commands that the LORD has spoken to Moses — ²³everything the LORD has commanded you through Moses, from the day the LORD first issued His commands and continuing forward throughout your generations — ²⁴if something was done unintentionally without the community's awareness, the entire community must offer one young bull as a burnt offering producing a pleasing aroma to the LORD — with its accompanying grain offering and drink offering according to the prescribed rule — along with one male goat as a purification offering. ²⁵The priest will make atonement for the entire Israelite community, and they will be forgiven, because it was unintentional. Once they bring their offering — a fire offering to the LORD — and their purification offering before the LORD for their inadvertent error, ²⁶the entire Israelite community will be forgiven, along with the foreigner residing among them, because the entire people acted unintentionally. ²⁷If a single individual sins unintentionally, that person must bring a one-year-old female goat as a purification offering. ²⁸The priest will make atonement before the LORD for the person who sinned unintentionally — when the sin was committed in error — to purge the guilt on that person's behalf, and that person will be forgiven. ²⁹Whether native-born among the Israelites or a foreigner residing among them — you have one instruction for anyone who sins unintentionally. ³⁰But the person who acts defiantly — whether native-born or foreigner — that person blasphemes the LORD. That person must be cut off from among their people, ³¹because that person has treated the LORD's word with contempt and violated His command. That person must be completely cut off — their guilt remains on them. ³²While the Israelites were in the wilderness, they discovered a man gathering wood on the Sabbath day. ³³Those who found him gathering wood brought him before Moses, Aaron, and the entire community. ³⁴They placed him in custody, because it had not yet been clarified what should be done to him. ³⁵The LORD told Moses, "The man must certainly be put to death. The entire community must stone him outside the camp." ³⁶The entire community took him outside the camp and stoned him to death, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³⁷The LORD spoke to Moses: ³⁸"Speak to the Israelites and tell them to make tassels on the corners of their garments throughout their generations, and to attach a cord of blue-violet to each corner tassel. ³⁹These tassels will serve as a reminder for you. When you see them, you will remember all the LORD's commands and carry them out, rather than following the impulses of your own hearts and eyes, which lead you into unfaithfulness. ⁴⁰This is so you will remember and carry out all My commands, and be set apart as holy to your God. ⁴¹I am the LORD your God — the one who brought you out of Egypt to serve as your God. I am the LORD your God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The formulaic vayedaber YHVH el-Mosheh le'mor ('the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') introduces a new legislative block. Placed immediately after the devastating report of the failed entry into Canaan (ch. 14), these offering instructions pointedly reference 'when you enter the land' (v. 2) — a reassurance that despite the current generation's failure, God's promise of the land endures for their children.
2. The phrase ki tavo'u el-erets moshvotekhem ('when you enter the land of your settlements') uses moshavot ('dwelling places, settlements') rather than the more common erets ('land'), emphasizing permanent habitation. The present participle noten ('giving') signals an ongoing divine grant — not a one-time gift but a continuous act of provision.
3. Four categories of fire offering (isheh) are listed: olah ('whole burnt offering'), zevach lefaleh-neder ('sacrifice fulfilling a vow'), nedavah ('voluntary/freewill offering'), and mo'adim offerings ('appointed festival offerings'). The phrase reiaich nichoach ('pleasing aroma') is an anthropomorphism describing God's acceptance; the root n-ch-ch conveys rest or satisfaction. Both baqar ('cattle') and tson ('flock animals' — sheep and goats) are acceptable sources.
4. The Hebrew hamaqriv qorbano ('the one bringing near his offering') uses the root q-r-b twice for emphasis — both the act and the object share the same root. The minchah here is a solet ('fine flour') offering, not the broader 'gift' meaning the word sometimes carries. The issaron ('tenth') refers to one-tenth of an ephah (approximately 2.3 liters). The hin is roughly 6 liters, so a quarter-hin equals about 1.5 liters of shemen ('oil').
5. The nesekh ('drink offering, libation') of yayin ('wine') accompanies each animal sacrifice. This is the first systematic pairing of grain, oil, and wine with animal offerings — a triad representing agricultural completeness. The measurement of a quarter-hin of wine per kevesh ('lamb') scales upward for larger animals in the following verses, establishing a proportional system.
6. The ayil ('ram') requires double the flour and proportionally more oil than a lamb: shnei esronim ('two-tenths') of solet mixed with a shlishit hahin ('one-third of a hin') of oil. The graduated scale — lamb, ram, bull — reflects the increasing value of the animal and the corresponding increase in accompanying offerings.
7. The ram's drink offering is shlishit hahin ('one-third of a hin') of wine — larger than the lamb's quarter-hin. The verb taqriv ('you shall present, bring near') from the root q-r-b reinforces the theme of approach to the divine. The reiaich nichoach ('pleasing aroma') formula indicates divine acceptance of the complete offering package.
8. The ben-baqar ('young bull, son of the herd') represents the largest and most valuable sacrificial animal. Here shelamim ('peace offerings') appears alongside olah and neder-fulfillment sacrifices. The root sh-l-m in shelamim connotes wholeness, completion, and well-being — these are communal meals shared between God, the priest, and the worshiper.
9. The bull's grain offering reaches the maximum: sheloshah esronim ('three-tenths') of solet ('fine flour') with chatsi hahin ('half a hin') of shemen ('oil'). The proportional scale is now complete: lamb (1/10 flour, 1/4 hin oil), ram (2/10 flour, 1/3 hin oil), bull (3/10 flour, 1/2 hin oil) — each tier roughly doubles the accompanying offering.
10. The bull's nesekh ('libation') of chatsi hahin ('half a hin') of yayin ('wine') — approximately 3 liters — is the largest drink offering. The term isheh ('fire offering') here encompasses the entire offering complex: animal, grain, oil, and wine together constitute the complete reiaich nichoach ('pleasing aroma') to the LORD.
11. The summary statement uses kakha ye'aseh ('thus it shall be done') and lists four animal types: shor ('bull, ox'), ayil ('ram'), seh bakhvasim ('a young one among the lambs'), and izzim ('goats'). The word seh is a general term for a small flock animal — either a lamb or a kid — and here the text specifies both subcategories.
12. The emphasis on kamispar ('according to the number') and kemisparam ('according to their number') stresses that the accompanying offerings scale linearly — if you sacrifice three lambs, you bring three portions of grain, oil, and wine. There is no bulk discount; each animal receives its full complement of accompaniments.
13. The term ha'eizrach ('the native-born citizen') from the root z-r-ch ('to rise, shine') specifically denotes an Israelite by birth. This term sets up the crucial legal extension in the next verse: these offering regulations apply equally to the ger ('foreigner, resident alien'). The transition from eizrach to ger is a hallmark of Israelite covenant theology — one law for all who worship the LORD.
14. The ger ('resident foreigner, sojourner') from the root g-u-r ('to dwell as an alien') is granted full participation in the sacrificial system. The phrase ka'asher ta'asu ken ya'aseh ('as you do, so he shall do') establishes ritual equality. This is remarkable in the ancient Near East, where foreigners were typically excluded from cultic participation. Israel's God extends worship access beyond ethnic boundaries.
15. The emphatic chuqqah achat ('one statute') and chuqqat olam ('permanent statute') establish a universal principle: kakhem kagger yihyeh lifnei YHVH ('as you, so the foreigner shall be before the LORD'). The phrase lifnei YHVH ('before the LORD') — meaning in God's presence and judgment — is the great equalizer. Social status and ethnic origin dissolve before the divine throne.
16. The concluding formula pairs torah achat ('one instruction, one law') with mishpat echad ('one judgment, one legal standard'). Torah here carries its primary meaning of 'instruction, teaching' rather than the later sense of 'the Law' as a whole document. Mishpat ('justice, legal ruling') ensures that the foreigner receives equal judicial protection. The parashah marker (peh) closes this unit.

17. A new speech formula opens the second legislative section of the chapter, shifting from sacrificial accompaniments to the challah ('dough') offering. This transition marks a move from centralized altar worship to household practice — the offering of first-dough applies wherever bread is made.
18. The phrase asher ani mevi etkhem shammah ('where I am bringing you there') uses the hiphil participle mevi ('bringing'), emphasizing that God is the active agent of their entry into the land. Unlike verse 2's noten ('giving'), this verb stresses the journey itself — God personally escorts them to their destination.
19. The terumah ('contribution, elevation offering') from the root r-u-m ('to raise, lift up') is the portion separated for sacred use. The phrase lechem ha'arets ('bread of the land') refers to bread made from grain grown in the promised land — connecting agricultural productivity directly to covenant gratitude. Eating from the land's produce triggers the obligation to give back.
20. The reshit arisoteikhem ('first of your dough-batch') introduces the challah offering — the word challah here refers to a loaf or cake of bread set apart from the first kneading. The analogy to terumat goren ('contribution from the threshing floor') connects household baking to agricultural tithing. This is one of the few offerings that originates in the domestic kitchen rather than the sanctuary.
21. The repetition of me-reshit arisoteikhem ('from the first of your dough') with the temporal marker ledoroteikhem ('throughout your generations') makes this a perpetual obligation. The samekh marker closes this short unit. Jewish tradition later codified this as the mitzvah of challah — separating a portion of dough, still practiced today when baking bread.
22. The verb tishgu ('you err, go astray') from the root sh-g-g designates unintentional sin — a mistake rather than a deliberate act of defiance. This section (vv. 22–31) distinguishes between shegagah ('inadvertent error') and sinning beyad ramah ('with a raised hand,' i.e., defiantly). The contrast is foundational to Israelite jurisprudence: intent determines the severity of consequences.
23. The phrase beyad-Mosheh ('by the hand of Moses') is a standard idiom for mediated revelation: God's commands come 'through' Moses as the authorized channel. The temporal scope — min-hayom ('from the day') vahal'ah ('and onward') ledoroteikhem ('throughout your generations') — makes clear that this provision for unintentional sins covers all divine legislation, past and future.
24. The phrase me'einei ha'edah ('from the eyes of the community') means the sin occurred beyond the community's notice or awareness. The communal remedy requires two animals: a par ben-baqar ('young bull') for an olah ('burnt offering') with its minchah and nesekh accompaniments kamishpat ('according to the rule'), plus a se'ir izzim ('male goat') as a chattat ('purification/sin offering'). The chattat specifically addresses the ritual impurity caused by the transgression.
25. The verb kipper ('make atonement, purge') from the root k-p-r is the central priestly act of reconciliation. The result is venislach lahem ('and it will be forgiven them') — the niphil passive indicating that forgiveness is a divine act, not a human achievement. The text insists on the condition: ki shegagah hi ('because it was unintentional'). Deliberate sin has no sacrificial remedy (see v. 30).
26. The forgiveness extends to both the native Israelite community and the ger hagar betokham ('the foreigner dwelling in their midst'). The universal scope — lekhol-ha'am ('for the entire people') — includes everyone under the covenant umbrella. The phrase bishgagah ('in inadvertence') is repeated to underscore that this provision covers only genuine mistakes. The samekh marker closes this subsection.
27. The shift from communal to individual sin: nefesh achat ('one person, one soul') who sins bishgagah ('unintentionally'). The required offering is an ez bat-shnatah ('a female goat in its first year') — a smaller animal than the communal offering, reflecting the more limited scope of individual versus collective transgression. The nefesh ('soul, person') emphasizes personal accountability.
28. The phrase hanefesh hashogeg ('the erring person') uses the qal participle of sh-g-g, characterizing the sinner by the unintentional nature of their act. The verb kipper appears twice — once for the priestly act (kipper al) and once for the purpose (lekhipper alav, 'to make atonement for him'). The result venislach lo ('and it will be forgiven him') mirrors the communal formula, confirming that atonement is effective for the individual as well.
29. The principle of torah achat ('one instruction') reappears from v. 16, now applied specifically to unintentional sin. The pairing of ha'ezerach ('native-born') and hager ('resident foreigner') under one legal standard reinforces the chapter's central theme: equal access to both worship (vv. 14–16) and forgiveness (vv. 26, 29). The verb la'oseh ('for the one doing') emphasizes the act rather than the actor's identity.
30. The critical contrast: beyad ramah ('with a raised hand') describes deliberate, defiant sin — the opposite of shegagah. The raised hand is a gesture of rebellion and contempt. Such a person megaddef et-YHVH ('blasphemes, reviles the LORD') — the root g-d-f means to cut, insult, or revile. The penalty is karet: venikhretah ('shall be cut off'), meaning divine excision from the community, possibly premature death or total social exclusion.
31. The infinitive absolute construction hikharet tikkaret ('being cut off, shall be cut off') intensifies the penalty through doubling — there is no reprieve. The reason: devar-YHVH bazah ('the LORD's word he despised') and et-mitsvato hefar ('his command he broke'). The verb bazah ('to despise, hold in contempt') and hefar ('to nullify, violate, break') indicate willful rejection. The closing phrase avonah bah ('her iniquity is in her') means the guilt remains with the person — no atonement is possible for brazen defiance.
32. This narrative (vv. 32–36) illustrates the principle of beyad ramah ('with a raised hand') from vv. 30–31. The man is mequoshesh etsim ('gathering sticks/wood') — the poel participle of q-sh-sh suggests deliberate, ongoing collection, not an accidental act. The beyom hashabbat ('on the Sabbath day') makes this a direct violation of the Fourth Commandment. Gathering wood implies intent to kindle fire, also explicitly prohibited on the Sabbath (Exod 35:3).
33. The witnesses — hamots'im oto ('those who found him') — bring the offender to the full leadership triad: Mosheh (judicial authority), Aharon (priestly authority), and kol-ha'edah ('the entire community' — communal authority). The verb vayaqrivu ('they brought him near') uses the same root q-r-b as sacrificial presentation, adding an ironic layer: the man is 'presented' to the community the way an offering is presented to God.

34. The phrase bamishmar ('in custody, in guarded confinement') indicates a holding period — not a prison sentence but temporary detention pending divine ruling. The reason: lo forash ('it had not been specified, made distinct') what his penalty should be. While the general Sabbath prohibition was known, the specific punishment for violation had not yet been explicitly declared. This case becomes the legal precedent.
35. The divine verdict uses the emphatic infinitive absolute: mot yumat ('dying he shall die' — he must certainly be put to death). The method is ragom oto ba'avanim ('pelting him with stones') — communal execution by stoning. The location midutz lamachaneh ('outside the camp') removes the impurity of death from the sacred community space. The entire community (kol-ha'edah) participates, emphasizing that Sabbath violation is an offense against all.
36. The narrative concludes with exact compliance: ka'asher tsivvah YHVH et-Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses'). The terseness — vayirgemu oto ba'avanim vayyamot ('they stoned him with stones, and he died') — contrasts with the gravity of the event. The peh marker closes this narrative section, and the chapter now transitions from judgment to the preventive measure of the tassels (tzitzit).
37. The final speech formula introduces the tzitzit commandment (vv. 38–41). Placed after the sabbath violator narrative, the tassels serve as a physical reminder to prevent future transgressions — a visible, wearable prompt to remember God's commands. The juxtaposition is deliberate: from the consequence of forgetting to the means of remembering.
38. The tsitsit ('tassels, fringes') are placed al-kanfei vigdeihem ('on the corners/wings of their garments'). The word kanaf means 'wing' or 'corner/edge' of a garment. The petil tekhelet ('cord of blue-violet') uses tekhelet, a precious dye extracted from the murex snail (Bolinus brandaris), producing a blue-purple color. This was an expensive dye in antiquity, and its inclusion in everyday garments democratized a symbol of royalty and priesthood — every Israelite wears the color of heaven.
39. The functional chain is visual-cognitive-behavioral: ur'item oto ('you will see it') leads to uzekhartem ('you will remember') leads to va'asitem ('you will do'). The warning — velo taturu acharei levavkhem ve'acharei eineikhem ('do not scout/explore after your hearts and after your eyes') — uses tatur from the same root (t-u-r) as the spies who 'scouted' the land in chapter 13. The connection is pointed: just as the spies' eyes led them astray, wandering hearts and eyes lead to spiritual infidelity. The term zonim ('going astray sexually/spiritually') draws on the prophetic metaphor of idolatry as adultery.
40. The purpose clause lema'an tizkeru ('so that you remember') culminates in the goal: vihyitem qedoshim l'Eloheikhem ('and you will be holy to your God'). The root q-d-sh ('holy, set apart') is the telos of the entire commandment system — remembrance leads to obedience, and obedience leads to holiness. The tassels are therefore not merely decorative but sacramental: a physical means of pursuing spiritual transformation.
41. The chapter closes with the self-identification formula ani YHVH Eloheikhem ('I am the LORD your God'), stated twice for emphasis — bracketing the Exodus rationale. The phrase asher hotseti etkhem me'erets Mitsrayim ('who brought you out of the land of Egypt') grounds all obligation in liberation: God's authority to command rests on His prior act of deliverance. This verse is incorporated into the daily Shema liturgy (recited morning and evening), making it one of the most frequently spoken sentences in Jewish life.

Summary: Korah (a Kohathite Levite) and Dathan and Abiram (Reubenites) lead a revolt against Moses and Aaron, backed by 250 community leaders. They argue that since the whole community is holy, Moses and Aaron have no right to elevate themselves. God settles the dispute catastrophically: the earth opens to swallow Korah's household, and fire consumes the 250 incense-bearing rebels. A subsequent plague kills 14,700 before Aaron's intercession stops it.

What Makes This Remarkable: The rebellion contains two distinct challenges fused into one crisis: Korah's Levitical faction contests Aaron's exclusive priesthood, while the Reubenites contest Moses's civil authority. Their theological argument — kol ha'edah kullam qedoshim ('the entire community, all of them, are holy,' v. 3) — distorts a genuine truth (Exodus 19:6) to deny legitimate roles. The verb vayyiqqach ('he took,' v. 1) opens abruptly with no stated object — a grammatical anomaly that signals the narrative's agitation.

Translation Friction: The phrase rav lakhem ('you have gone too far!' v. 3), which the rebels hurl at Moses, is the same phrase Moses throws back at the Levites in verse 7. We rendered it identically both times to preserve the deliberate echo. The verb tishtalach ('you send [for Dathan and Abiram],' v. 12) and their refusal to 'go up' (lo na'aleh) creates a vertical metaphor — they will literally go down (vv. 30-33) into the earth instead.

Connections: Korah is a Kohathite (son of Izhar, son of Kohath, son of Levi) — the same clan assigned to carry the most sacred objects in Numbers 4. The 250 rebels carrying censers (v. 17) echoes Aaron's incense censuring in Leviticus 16. On ben Peleth (v. 1) disappears after the opening verse; rabbinic tradition (Sanhedrin 109b) credits his wife with saving him. The plague-stopping intercession by Aaron (v. 48) foreshadows priestly atonement theology.

¹Korah son of Izhar, son of Kohath, son of Levi, along with Dathan and Abiram sons of Eliab, and On son of Peleth — all from the tribe of Reuben — took action. ²They rose up in opposition to Moses, along with 250 Israelite men who were leaders of the community — representatives summoned to the assembly, men of standing. ³They assembled against Moses and Aaron and declared, "You have gone too far! The entire community is holy — every one of them — and the LORD is among them. Why then do you elevate yourselves above the LORD's assembly?" ⁴When Moses heard this, he fell facedown. ⁵He addressed Korah and his entire faction: "In the morning, the LORD will reveal who belongs to Him and who is holy, and He will grant that person access to His presence. The one He chooses is the one He will bring near to Himself. ⁶Do this: take censers for yourselves — Korah and his entire faction — ⁷put fire in them and place incense on them before the LORD tomorrow. The man whom the LORD chooses — he is the holy one. It is you who have gone too far, sons of Levi!" ⁸Moses said to Korah, "Listen carefully, sons of Levi! ⁹Is it too small a thing for you that the God of Israel has set you apart from the rest of the Israelite community, bringing you near to Himself to perform the service of the LORD's Tabernacle and to stand before the community to serve them? ¹⁰He has brought you near — you and all your fellow Levites alongside you — and now you are demanding the priesthood as well? ¹¹Therefore you and your entire faction are the ones banding together against the LORD. As for Aaron — what is he that you lodge your complaints against him?" ¹²Moses sent a summons to Dathan and Abiram, sons of Eliab, but they responded, "We refuse to come up!" ¹³Is it not enough that you dragged us up from a land flowing with milk and honey to let us die in the wilderness — must you also lord it over us completely? ¹⁴What is more, you have not brought us into a land flowing with milk and honey or given us an inheritance of fields and vineyards. Do you intend to gouge out the eyes of these men? We refuse to come up!" ¹⁵Moses burned with intense anger and said to the LORD, "Do not accept their offering! I have not taken so much as a single donkey from any of them, and I have not mistreated a single one of them." ¹⁶Moses said to Korah, "You and your entire faction must present yourselves before the LORD — you, they, and Aaron — tomorrow. ¹⁷Each man must take his censer and place incense on it, then bring it before the LORD — each man with his censer — 250 censers in all. You and Aaron must each bring your censer as well." ¹⁸Each man took his censer, placed fire in it, put incense on it, and stood at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting alongside Moses and Aaron. ¹⁹Korah assembled the entire community against them at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting, and the glory of the LORD appeared to the whole community. ²⁰The LORD spoke to Moses and Aaron: ²¹"Separate yourselves from this community so I can consume them in an instant." ²²They fell facedown and cried out, "God — the God of the spirits of all living beings — when one man sins, will you pour out your fury on the entire community?" ²³The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁴"Tell the community: Move away from the area around the dwellings of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram." ²⁵Moses rose and walked over to Dathan and Abiram; the elders of Israel went with him. ²⁶He addressed the community: "Move away immediately from the tents of these wicked men. Do not touch anything that belongs to them, or you will be swept away because of all their sins." ²⁷So the people moved away from the dwellings of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram on every side. Dathan and Abiram came out and stood defiantly at the entrances of their tents — along with their wives, their sons, and their small children. ²⁸Moses declared, "By this you will know that the LORD sent me to do all these things, and that none of this came from my own initiative. ²⁹If these men die a natural death, the way all people die, or if what happens to them is the ordinary fate of all humanity — then the LORD has not sent me. ³⁰But if the LORD creates something entirely unprecedented — the ground opens its mouth and swallows them along with everything they own, and they descend alive into Sheol — then you will know that these men have treated the LORD with contempt." ³¹The moment he finished speaking all these words, the ground beneath them split open. ³²The earth opened its mouth and swallowed them — their households, all the people associated with Korah, and all their possessions. ³³They descended alive into Sheol — they and everything they owned. The earth closed over them, and they vanished from the midst of the assembly. ³⁴All the Israelites around them fled at their screams, crying out, "The earth might swallow us too!" ³⁵Fire blazed out from the LORD and consumed the 250 men who were presenting the incense.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayyiqqach ('he took') opens abruptly without a stated object — a grammatical anomaly that ancient commentators noted. The rebellion has two distinct factions: Korah is a Levite (from the Kohathite clan, who carried the most sacred objects) challenging Aaron's exclusive priesthood, while Dathan, Abiram, and On are Reubenites challenging Moses's civil authority. On ben Pelet disappears from the narrative after this verse — rabbinic tradition says his wife talked him out of the rebellion.

2. The 250 supporters are described with three titles: nesi'ei edah ('leaders/princes of the community'), qeri'ei mo'ed ('those summoned to the assembly' — publicly recognized representatives), and anshei-shem ('men of name/reown'). These are not fringe dissidents but the established elite. The phrase vayyaqumu lifnei Mosheh ('they rose up before Moses') uses qum in a hostile sense — rising against, not merely standing up.
3. The accusation rav-lakhem ('too much for you!' or 'you have gone too far!') is a phrase Moses will throw back at the Levites in v. 7. The theological argument — kol-ha'edah kullam qedoshim ('the entire community, all of them, are holy') — distorts a genuine truth (Exod 19:6 declares Israel 'a kingdom of priests') to deny legitimate hierarchical roles. The verb titnas'u ('you lift yourselves up') from n-s- implies self-exaltation, accusing Moses and Aaron of arrogating authority rather than receiving it from God.
4. Moses's response — vayyipol al-panav ('he fell on his face') — is not weakness but a posture of prayer and submission to God. Throughout Numbers, falling facedown signals seeking divine intervention at a moment of crisis (cf. 14:5, 17:10, 20:6). Moses does not defend himself; he turns the matter over to the LORD for adjudication.
5. The phrase boqer veyoda YHVH ('morning, and the LORD will make known') sets a divine timeline — God Himself will adjudicate by dawn. Three categories are tested: et-asher-lo ('who belongs to Him'), et-haqqadosh ('who is holy'), and et-asher yivchar-bo ('whom He will choose'). The verb hiqriv ('bring near') from q-r-b is priestly terminology — only the chosen may approach God. Moses transforms the dispute from a political argument into a divine test.
6. The machtot ('censers, fire pans') are the instruments of the test. These are flat pans for carrying burning coals and incense — tools of priestly service. By commanding the rebels to use censers, Moses invites them to perform the most exclusive priestly act: burning incense before the LORD. The test is elegant: if they are truly qualified for priestly service, they will survive the encounter.
7. Moses turns the rebels' own phrase back on them: rav-lakhem benei Levi ('you have gone too far, sons of Levi!') — the exact accusation they leveled against him in v. 3. The qetoret ('incense') test is lethal: unauthorized incense offering killed Aaron's sons Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:1–2). The rebels are unwittingly signing up for the same test that proved fatal before.
8. The appeal shim'u-na benei Levi ('listen, please, sons of Levi') uses the particle na ('please, I urge you'), suggesting a final attempt at persuasion before the test. Moses addresses them as benei Levi ('sons of Levi') — reminding them of their tribal identity and the privileges already granted to them, which they are now jeopardizing by overreach.
9. The rhetorical question hame'at mikkem ('is it too little for you?') exposes the rebels' ingratitude. God hivdil ('separated, distinguished') the Levites — the same verb used for God's creative separations in Genesis 1. Three privileges are enumerated: lehaqriv etkhem elav ('to bring you near to Himself'), la'avod et-avodat mishkan YHVH ('to perform the service of the LORD's Tabernacle'), and la'amod lifnei ha'edah leshartam ('to stand before the community to minister to them'). These are extraordinary roles they are taking for granted.
10. The verb vayyaqrev ('He brought near') again uses the priestly root q-r-b — God Himself elevated the Levites to their privileged position. The charge ubiqqashtem gam-kehunnah ('and you seek also the priesthood') identifies the real ambition: not egalitarianism but acquisition of priestly power. The word gam ('also, even') underscores the excess — they already have Levitical service and want kehunnah ('priesthood') on top of it.
11. Moses reframes the rebellion: hano'adim al-YHVH ('those assembled against the LORD') — their quarrel is not with human leaders but with God who appointed them. The rhetorical question ve'Aharon mah-hu ('and Aaron, what is he?') diminishes Aaron's independent agency — he is merely God's appointed instrument, not a self-promoter. The qere/ketiv variant tallinu/talonu ('you complain') uses the root l-u-n ('to lodge, murmur, complain'), the same verb characterizing Israel's wilderness grumbling.
12. The scene shifts to the Reubenite faction. Their blunt refusal — lo na'aleh ('we will not go up') — is a double entendre: literally refusing Moses's summons, but also echoing the failed attempt to 'go up' into the promised land (14:40–44). The verb alah ('go up') carried territorial and spiritual weight — refusal to 'go up' to Moses is a refusal to ascend toward God's appointed authority.
13. The Reubenites' accusation contains a stunning inversion: they call Egypt — the land of slavery — erets zavat chalay udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey'), the exact phrase reserved for the promised land (Exod 3:8). This revisionist nostalgia reframes bondage as paradise. The verb tistaarer ('you lord it over us, you make yourself a ruler') uses the hitpael reflexive of s-r-r, implying self-appointment. The intensification gam-histaarer ('even domineering completely') accuses Moses of tyranny.
14. The accusation escalates: af lo ('moreover, not even') — not only did Moses take them from 'paradise,' he failed to deliver the promised land. The nachalat sadeh vakherem ('inheritance of field and vineyard') represents the unfulfilled promise. The bizarre question ha'einei ha'anashim hahem tenaqquer ('will you gouge out the eyes of those men?') likely means 'will you blind people to the truth?' or 'will you deceive them?' — using tenaqquer ('gouge out') from n-q-r. The refusal lo na'aleh repeats their defiance.
15. The phrase vayyichar le-Mosheh me'od ('it burned for Moses exceedingly') — one of the few times Moses's anger is described as extreme. His prayer al-tafen el-minchatam ('do not turn toward their offering') asks God to reject their incense test before it even begins. His self-defense — lo chamor echad mehem nasa'ti ('not one donkey from them have I taken') — echoes Samuel's later defense (1 Sam 12:3). The chamor ('donkey') represents the most basic form of property; Moses claims total financial integrity.
16. The command heyu lifnei YHVH ('be before the LORD') summons all parties to the divine courtroom. The three participants are listed with deliberate emphasis: attah ('you' — Korah), vahem ('and they' — his 250 supporters), ve'Aharon ('and Aaron' — the defendant). The word machar ('tomorrow') gives the rebels one night to reconsider — a window of grace that goes unused.

17. The repetition of ish machtato ('each man his censer') twice in the verse creates a ceremonial cadence — this is a formal, structured test. The total of chamishim umatayyim machtot ('250 censers') plus Korah's and Aaron's makes 252 individual tests of priestly legitimacy. The phrase ve'attach ve'Aharon ish machtato ('and you and Aaron, each man his censer') places Korah and Aaron in direct, parallel confrontation before God.
18. The narration is meticulous: vayyiqchu, vayyittenu, vayyasimu, vayyaamdu ('they took, they placed, they put, they stood') — four sequential actions building to the confrontation. The location is petach ohel mo'ed ('the entrance of the Tent of Meeting'), the threshold between sacred and ordinary space — the most dramatic possible setting for a test of priestly legitimacy.
19. Korah's final act is vayyaqhel aleihem ('he assembled against them') — mustering public opinion as a weapon. But his assembly triggers a counter-appearance: vayyera kevod-YHVH ('the glory of the LORD appeared'). The kavod ('glory') — the visible manifestation of God's presence — intervenes whenever the community faces an existential crisis. Its appearance signals that God Himself will now judge. The samekh marker creates a dramatic pause before the divine verdict.
20. God addresses both Mosheh ve'Aharon ('Moses and Aaron') together — both leaders who were challenged now receive the divine response simultaneously. The joint address underscores that the rebellion was directed at both civil and priestly authority, and God's defense covers both.
21. The command hibbadelu ('separate yourselves!') from the root b-d-l ('to divide, separate') is urgent — the same root used for God's creative separations. The threat va'akhaleh otam kerega ('and I will consume them in a moment') uses kalah ('to finish, consume utterly') with kerega ('in an instant') — God is prepared to annihilate the entire community, not just the ringleaders. This is the second time in Numbers God threatens total destruction (cf. 14:12).
22. Moses and Aaron's intercession invokes a rare divine title: El Elohei haruchot lekhoh-basar ('God, God of the spirits of all flesh'). This title acknowledges God's intimate knowledge of every individual — He knows each person's spirit (ruach) and can distinguish the guilty from the innocent. The rhetorical question ha'ish echad yecheta ve'al kol-ha'edah tiqtsof ('shall one man sin and against all the community you rage?') argues for proportional justice: punish the guilty, spare the innocent.
23. God responds to the intercession — the very fact that He replies rather than executing immediate judgment shows that Moses and Aaron's prayer was effective. The abbreviated speech formula (no mention of Aaron this time) redirects instructions through Moses alone for the evacuation command that follows.
24. The command he'alu missaviv ('go up from around') creates a physical safety perimeter. The word mishkan here does not mean 'tabernacle' (the LORD's dwelling) but 'dwelling' in the general sense — the tents and encampment area of the rebels. The grouping of Korah, Dathan, and Abiram suggests their camping areas were adjacent — in the tribal arrangement, the Kohathites and Reubenites both camped on the south side of the Tabernacle.
25. Since Dathan and Abiram refused to 'come up' (v. 12), Moses goes to them — not out of deference but to issue the warning in person. The ziquei Yisra'el ('elders of Israel') following him serves as a witness delegation. Moses demonstrates the opposite of the self-aggrandizement he was accused of: he personally walks to the rebels' location rather than summoning them again.
26. Moses now labels the rebels ha'anashim haresha'im ha'eloh ('these wicked men') — resha'im implies deliberate, willful evil, not error. The warning ve'al-tigg'u bekhoh-asher lahem ('do not touch anything that belongs to them') establishes a zone of contamination — their sin is so severe that contact with their possessions brings danger. The verb tissafu ('you will be swept away, added to their destruction') from s-p-h means to be gathered into their punishment by association.
27. The contrast is stark: the people obey and move away (vayyealu), while Dathan and Abiram yats'u nitsavim ('came out standing' — defiantly positioned) at their tent entrances. The posture of nitsavim suggests a challenge — they stand as if to face down whatever comes. The mention of unesheihem uveneihem vetappam ('their wives, sons, and small children') creates a devastating dramatic irony: their defiance will cost not only their own lives but their families'.
28. Moses frames what follows as a public vindication test: bezot ted'un ('by this you will know'). The statement ki-YHVH shelachani ('that the LORD sent me') directly answers the accusation that he acted on his own authority. The phrase ki-lo millibbi ('because not from my heart') — libbi meaning 'my own heart/mind/initiative' — is a categorical denial of self-appointment. Moses claims zero personal agency in his leadership role.
29. Moses stakes his entire prophetic legitimacy on the outcome: im-kemot kol-ha'adam yemutun elleh ('if like the death of all people these men die') — if they die of old age or common illness, Moses is a fraud. The word pequddat ('visitation, fate, appointed destiny') from p-q-d carries the sense of divine reckoning. Moses offers a falsifiable test — a remarkably bold move that only a person certain of God's backing would make.
30. The phrase beri'ah yivra YHVH ('a creation the LORD will create') uses the root b-r- twice — the same verb for divine creation in Genesis 1. What is about to happen is not natural but a new act of creation, unprecedented in human experience. The earth is personified: patsatah ha'adamah et-piha ('the ground opens its mouth') — the adamah ('ground') becomes an agent of divine judgment. The descent chayyim she'olah ('alive to Sheol') — going to the realm of the dead while still living — is the ultimate horror, a reversal of creation itself.
31. The timing is astonishing: vayehi kekhaloto ledabber ('it happened as he finished speaking') — the judgment begins at the exact instant Moses stops talking. The verb vattibbaqa ('it split, it tore apart') from b-q- describes a violent rupture. Ha'adamah asher tachteihem ('the ground that was under them') specifies precision: only the ground beneath the rebels, not the surrounding area. The judgment is surgical, not indiscriminate.

32. The personification intensifies: vatiftach ha'arets et-piha ('the earth opened her mouth') — the arets ('earth') becomes a devouring creature. The verb vattivla ('it swallowed') from b-l- describes complete consumption. The scope of destruction includes batteihem ('their households/tents'), kol-ha'adam asher le-Qorach ('all the people belonging to Korah'), and kol-harekhus ('all the property'). The ground devours people, structures, and possessions alike.
33. Moses's prediction (v. 30) is fulfilled precisely: vayyerdū hem vekhol-asher lahem chayyim she'olah ('they went down, they and all that was theirs, alive to Sheol'). The word she'olah ('to Sheol') — the underworld, the realm of the dead — represents the most extreme possible descent. The earth then vatekhas aleihem ('covered over them') — the surface reseals as though they never existed. The verb vayyovdu ('they perished, vanished') from 'b-d means total obliteration from the qahal ('assembly').
34. The panic is visceral: nasu leqolam ('they fled at their voice/cry') — the screams of people descending alive into the earth. The terror spreads: pen-tivla'enu ha'arets ('lest the earth swallow us') — the bystanders fear the ground is indiscriminate in its appetite. The psychological impact on the witnesses — hearing the screams of the living being consumed by the earth — would be unimaginable trauma.
35. A second, simultaneous judgment: ve'esh yats'ah me'et YHVH ('fire went out from the LORD') — the same divine fire that consumed Nadab and Abihu (Lev 10:2). The 250 maqrivei haqetoret ('those presenting the incense') at the Tabernacle entrance are consumed while the Reubenites at their tents are swallowed. Two different sins receive two different but equally devastating punishments: the earth-rebellion (political) is swallowed by earth; the incense-rebellion (priestly) is consumed by fire. The samekh marker closes this devastating chapter.

Summary: In the aftermath of Korah's rebellion, the censers of the 250 consumed men are hammered into plating for the altar as a permanent warning. God then settles the priestly dispute once for all: twelve tribal staffs are placed in the tent of meeting, and Aaron's staff for Levi sprouts, buds, blossoms, and bears almonds overnight. The chapter ends with the people's terrified cry: 'Anyone who approaches the tabernacle will die!'

What Makes This Remarkable: The censers that were instruments of rebellion become sacred architecture — hammered into altar plating (riqqu'ei fachim, v. 3). The objects retain their holiness (ki qadoshu, 'they became holy') even though their bearers were destroyed. Aaron's staff does not merely sprout but cycles through four stages of botanical life in a single night: it 'put out a shoot, produced blossoms, and bore ripe almonds' (v. 23). The Hebrew word for almond (shaqed) shares its root with shaqad ('to watch, be vigilant'), a wordplay Jeremiah 1:11-12 will exploit.

Translation Friction: The chapter numbering differs between the Hebrew (WLC) and English traditions: WLC 17:1 corresponds to KJV 16:36. We followed the Hebrew versification. The phrase hachatta'im ha'elleh benafshhotam ('these sinners against their own lives,' v. 3) posed a question: did they sin 'at the cost of their lives or 'against' their lives? We chose 'at the cost of,' reflecting the consequence rather than the target.

Connections: The altar-plated censers (v. 4) become a permanent visual memorial within the sanctuary, connecting to the memorial stones in Joshua 4:1-9. Aaron's budding staff (v. 23) is preserved before the ark as a witness (v. 25; cf. Hebrews 9:4). The almond-shaqad wordplay appears in Jeremiah 1:11-12. The people's fear of approaching the tabernacle (v. 28) sets up the priestly responsibility legislation of Numbers 18.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Tell Eleazar son of Aaron the priest to remove the censers from among the charred remains and scatter the burning coals away from the site, because the censers have become holy. ³As for the censers of these men who sinned at the cost of their lives — have them hammered into sheets as plating for the altar, because they were presented before the LORD and became holy. They will serve as a warning sign for the Israelites." ⁴Eleazar the priest collected the bronze censers that the burned men had presented, and they were hammered out as plating for the altar — ⁵a reminder to the Israelites, so that no unauthorized person — anyone who is not a descendant of Aaron — would approach to burn incense before the LORD and end up like Korah and his faction, just as the LORD had spoken to him through Moses. ⁶The very next day, the entire Israelite community complained against Moses and Aaron, saying, "You have killed the LORD's people!" ⁷As the community assembled against Moses and Aaron, they turned toward the Tent of Meeting, and suddenly the cloud covered it and the glory of the LORD appeared. ⁸Moses and Aaron came to the front of the Tent of Meeting. ⁹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁰"Withdraw from this community so I can consume them in an instant!" They fell facedown. ¹¹Moses said to Aaron, "Grab your censer, put fire from the altar in it, lay incense on it, and rush to the community to make atonement for them! Wrath has gone out from the LORD — the plague has already begun!" ¹²Aaron grabbed the censer as Moses had directed and ran into the midst of the assembly. The plague had already begun among the people! He placed the incense on the censer and made atonement for the people. ¹³He stood between the dead and the living, and the plague was halted. ¹⁴Those who died in the plague numbered 14,700 — not counting those who had died because of the Korah incident. ¹⁵Aaron returned to Moses at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. The plague had been stopped. ¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁷"Speak to the Israelites and collect from them one staff per ancestral house — from each of their leaders, one staff per ancestral house — twelve staffs in all. Write each man's name on his staff. ¹⁸Write Aaron's name on the staff of Levi, because there must be one staff for the head of each ancestral house. ¹⁹Place them in the Tent of Meeting before the Testimony — the place where I meet with you. ²⁰The staff belonging to the man I choose will sprout. In this way I will put an end to the Israelites' constant complaints that they keep directing against you." ²¹Moses spoke to the Israelites, and each of their leaders gave him a staff — one staff per leader according to their ancestral houses — twelve staffs in all, with Aaron's staff among them. ²²Moses placed the staffs before the LORD in the Tent of the Testimony. ²³The next day, when Moses entered the Tent of the Testimony, Aaron's staff — representing the house of Levi — had sprouted! It had put forth buds, produced blossoms, and yielded ripe almonds. ²⁴Moses brought all the staffs out from before the LORD to all the Israelites. They examined them, and each man took back his own staff. ²⁵The LORD told Moses, "Return Aaron's staff to its place before the Testimony, to be preserved as a warning sign for the rebellious — so their complaints against Me will end, and they will not die." ²⁶Moses did exactly as the LORD had commanded him. ²⁷The Israelites said to Moses, "We are dying! We are lost! All of us — we are lost!" ²⁸"Everyone who approaches — who even comes near — the Tabernacle of the LORD dies! Are we all doomed to perish?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. WLC 17:1 corresponds to KJV 16:36. This verse opens the aftermath of Korah's rebellion — the divine instructions for handling the now-sacred censers of the 250 men consumed by fire. The formulaic vayedabber YHVH el-Mosheh le'mor transitions from the catastrophe of judgment to the creation of a lasting memorial.
2. WLC 17:2 = KJV 16:37. Eleazar — not Aaron — handles the censers, perhaps to shield the high priest from contact with death. The command veyarem et-hamachtot mibben hasserefah ('let him lift the censers from among the burning') shows that the fire-consumed bodies still smolder. The crucial declaration: ki qadoshu ('for they have become holy') — the censers were consecrated by being presented before the LORD, even though their bearers were destroyed. Sacred objects retain their holiness regardless of their bearers' fate.
3. WLC 17:3 = KJV 16:38. The phrase hachatta'im ha'elleh benafshotam ('these sinners against their own lives') is striking — their sin cost them their nefesh ('life, soul'). The censers are to be made riqqu'ei fachim ('hammered-out sheets/plates') as tsippui lamizbeach ('plating for the altar'). This transforms instruments of rebellion into a permanent altar covering — a visible memorial. The dual status is remarkable: qadoshu ('they became holy') yet le'ot ('for a sign/warning'). Holy objects can simultaneously serve as warnings against presumption.
4. WLC 17:4 = KJV 16:39. The execution is prompt: vayyiqqach El'azar hakohen ('Eleazar the priest took'). The censers are described as nechoshet ('bronze/copper'). The men are identified as hasserufim ('the burned ones') — a stark participial label defining them permanently by their manner of death. The verb vayraqq'um ('they hammered them out') from r-q' is the same root used for God 'hammering out' the sky (cf. Job 37:18), suggesting a deliberate, forceful reshaping of rebellion into sacred architecture.
5. WLC 17:5 = KJV 16:40. The plated altar serves as a zikkaron ('memorial, reminder') with a preventive purpose: lema'an asher lo-yiqrav ish zar ('so that no unauthorized person would approach'). The term ish zar ('strange/foreign man') in priestly law means anyone outside the Aaronic priesthood — even other Levites. The phrase velo-yihyeh ke-Qorach vekha'adato ('and he will not become like Korah and his faction') turns Korah into a cautionary archetype. The peh marker seals this memorial section.
6. WLC 17:6 = KJV 16:41. The astonishing phrase vayyillonu kol-adat benei-Yisra'el mimmocharot ('the entire community of the Israelites complained the next day') shows that even the spectacular judgments of the previous day failed to end the grumbling. The accusation attem hamittem et-am YHVH ('you have killed the LORD's people') is breathtaking in its audacity — the people blame Moses and Aaron for deaths that God Himself executed, and they call the rebels am YHVH ('the LORD's people'), implicitly siding with the dead.
7. WLC 17:7 = KJV 16:42. The scene repeats the pattern of 16:19 — the community assembles against the leaders, and God's kavod ('glory') intervenes. The hinneh ('suddenly, look!') signals dramatic revelation: kissahu he'anan ('the cloud covered it') — the cloud of God's presence descends, and vayyera kevod YHVH ('the glory of the LORD appeared'). This is God entering the conflict directly, not as arbitrator but as the offended party.
8. WLC 17:8 = KJV 16:43. The brief statement vayyavo Mosheh ve'Aaron el-penei ohel mo'ed ('Moses and Aaron came before the Tent of Meeting') shows them approaching God rather than fleeing. The samekh marker creates a pause — they stand at the threshold between the angry crowd behind them and the divine glory before them, occupying the mediator's dangerous position.

9. WLC 17:9 = KJV 16:44. The speech formula introduces the second threat of total annihilation in this episode. God speaks to Moses alone — Aaron is present but not addressed, perhaps because the threat concerns the community's accusation that Moses and Aaron killed the people.
10. WLC 17:10 = KJV 16:45. The command herommu mittokh ha'edah hazzot ('get up from the midst of this community') and the threat va'akhaleh otam kerega ('I will consume them in an instant') exactly echo 16:21 — God's fury is identical to the previous day's. The immediate response vayyippelu al-peneihem ('they fell on their faces') is their now-practiced posture of intercession. But this time, instead of arguing with God, Moses takes urgent practical action (next verse).
11. WLC 17:11 = KJV 16:46. The urgency is palpable: qach et-hamachtah ('take the censer'), veten aleha esh ('put fire on it'), vesim qetoret ('place incense'), veholekh meherah ('go quickly!'). The word meherah ('quickly, urgently') signals a race against death. The same incense that killed 250 rebels (16:35) is now deployed to save the people — the instrument of judgment becomes the instrument of salvation. The qetsef ('wrath, fury') has already left God's presence, and the negef ('plague, striking blow') has begun.
12. WLC 17:12 = KJV 16:47. The verb vayyarats ('he ran') depicts the elderly high priest sprinting into the crowd — a vivid image of priestly courage. The hinneh ('and look!') marks the horrifying discovery: hechel hannegef ba'am ('the plague had begun among the people'). Aaron's response is immediate: vayyitten et-haqetoret ('he placed the incense') vayekhapper al-ha'am ('and he made atonement for the people'). The irony is complete: the very people who accused Aaron of killing them are now saved by his priestly intercession.
13. WLC 17:13 = KJV 16:48. One of the most iconic images in the Torah: vayyaamod bein-hammetim uvein hachayyim ('he stood between the dead and the living'). Aaron physically positions himself as a barrier between death and life, his incense creating a line that the plague cannot cross. The verb vatte'atsar ('it was restrained, halted') from 'ts-r means to be held back, contained — the plague was an active force that Aaron's atoning incense physically blocked. This moment defines the priesthood: standing in the gap between divine wrath and human frailty.
14. WLC 17:14 = KJV 16:49. The death toll is staggering: arba'ah asar elef ushva me'ot ('fourteen thousand seven hundred'). The clarification millevad hammetim al-devar-Qorach ('apart from those who died in the matter of Korah') distinguishes this plague from the previous day's judgment — the 250 burned by fire and the families swallowed by earth. The cumulative death toll from a single episode of rebellion is catastrophic, underscoring the severity of challenging divinely appointed leadership.
15. WLC 17:15 = KJV 16:50. Aaron's return to Moses — vayyashov Aharon el-Mosheh el-petach ohel mo'ed ('Aaron returned to Moses, to the entrance of the Tent of Meeting') — signals mission accomplished. The concluding statement vehammagefah ne'etsarah ('and the plague was restrained') uses the niph'al passive, indicating divine agency: God stopped the plague in response to Aaron's atoning incense. The peh marker closes this dramatic episode and transitions to the staff test.
16. WLC 17:16 = KJV 17:1. A new speech formula opens the budding staff narrative — God's definitive answer to the question of who has priestly authority. After the catastrophe of fire, earth-swallowing, and plague, God provides a gentle, creative proof: not destruction but flowering life.
17. WLC 17:17 = KJV 17:2. The word matteh means both 'staff' and 'tribe' — a deliberate wordplay, since each tribal leader's staff represents his entire tribe. The instruction matteh matteh leveit av ('a staff, a staff for each ancestral house') creates a one-to-one correspondence between leader and tribe. The shneim asar mattot ('twelve staffs') represents the complete tribal confederation. Writing ish et-shemo ('each man his name') on the staff personalizes the test — God will choose a named individual, not an anonymous institution.
18. WLC 17:18 = KJV 17:3. Aaron's name specifically — ve'et shem Aharon tikhtov al-matteh Levi ('write Aaron's name on the staff of Levi') — goes on the Levitical staff. The principle ki matteh echad l'erosh beit avotam ('for one staff for the head of each ancestral house') treats Aaron as the head of the Levitical house, placing him in direct competition with the other eleven tribal leaders. The test is designed to answer the question Korah raised: does Aaron have a unique, God-given authority?
19. WLC 17:19 = KJV 17:4. The staffs are placed lifnei ha'edut ('before the Testimony') — referring to the ark containing the covenant tablets. The phrase asher ivva'ed lakhem shamamah ('where I meet with you there') uses the niph'al of y-'l-d ('to appoint, meet by arrangement'), emphasizing that this is God's appointed meeting place. The staffs are positioned at the locus of maximum divine presence — if any power can make dead wood blossom, it will operate here.
20. WLC 17:20 = KJV 17:5. The test criterion is mattehu yifrach ('his staff will sprout') — the verb parach ('to bud, blossom, sprout') describes new life emerging from dead wood, a small-scale resurrection. God's stated goal: vahashikkoti me'alai et-telunnot ('I will cause to cease from upon Me the complaints'). The word telunnot ('complaints, murmurings') from l-u-n characterizes Israel's wilderness pattern. The phrase asher hem mallinim aleikhem ('which they keep murmuring against you') uses the hiph'il participle — their complaining is habitual and ongoing.
21. WLC 17:21 = KJV 17:6. Every leader complies: vayyittenu elav kol-nesi'eihem ('all their leaders gave to him'). The detail umatteh Aharon betokh mattotam ('and Aaron's staff among their staffs') shows Aaron's staff is not given special placement — it goes in among all the others. The test's integrity depends on equal treatment: twelve anonymous staffs, overnight, in God's presence. No human manipulation is possible.
22. WLC 17:22 = KJV 17:7. The verb vayyannach ('he placed, rested, deposited') from n-u-ch conveys careful, deliberate placement — not tossing but setting down with intention. The location be'ohel ha'edut ('in the Tent of the Testimony') emphasizes that the staffs are placed in the most sacred space available, before the presence of God, where the overnight miracle will occur unseen by any human witness.
23. WLC 17:23 = KJV 17:8. The climactic verse describes a fourfold miracle in rapid succession: parach ('it sprouted'), vayyotse ferach ('it put forth buds'), vayyatsets tsits ('it blossomed flowers'), and vayyigmol sheqedim ('it bore ripe almonds'). A dead stick completed an entire growing season overnight — bud, flower, and fruit simultaneously. The sheqedim ('almonds') are significant: the Hebrew shaqed comes from the root sh-q-d ('to watch, be alert'), and the almond tree is the first to bloom in Israel, called the 'watching tree.' The menorah in the Tabernacle was already decorated with almond blossoms (Exod 25:33–34), linking Aaron's staff to the sacred furniture.

24. WLC 17:24 = KJV 17:9. Moses brings all twelve staffs — vayyotse Mosheh et-kol-hammattot ('Moses brought out all the staffs') — for public inspection. The people vayyir'u ('they saw, examined') the evidence with their own eyes. Then vayyiqchu ish mattehu ('each man took his staff') — eleven leaders silently reclaim their unchanged, barren staffs. The contrast is eloquent: eleven dead sticks and one living, fruit-bearing branch. No verbal argument could match this visual proof. The peh marker closes the demonstration.
25. WLC 17:25 = KJV 17:10. The budding staff becomes a permanent artifact: hashev et-mattheh Aharon lifnei ha'edut ('return Aaron's staff before the Testimony') lemeshmeret ('for safekeeping'). It serves as le'ot livnei-meri ('a sign for the rebellious ones') — meri from m-r-h ('to rebel, be contentious') characterizes habitual resistance. The practical purpose: utekhal telunnotam me'alai velo yammutu ('their complaints from upon Me will end and they will not die'). Complaining against God's appointed leaders is literally life-threatening.
26. WLC 17:26 = KJV 17:11. The compliance formula vayyaas Mosheh ka'asher tsivvah YHVH oto ken asah ('Moses did as the LORD commanded him, so he did') emphasizes exact obedience through redundancy — he did it and he did it. This formula characterizes Moses's consistent faithfulness throughout the Torah. The peh marker closes the staff narrative and transitions to the people's fearful response.
27. WLC 17:27 = KJV 17:12. The people's cry — hen gavanu avadnu kullanu avadnu ('Look, we are expiring! We are perishing! All of us — we are perishing!') — shifts from rebellion to raw terror. Three verbs in rapid succession: gava ('to expire, breathe one's last'), avad ('to perish, be lost'), repeated with kullanu ('all of us') for universal scope. The emotional arc of the Korah narrative is complete: from arrogant challenge ('we are all holy!') to existential dread ('we are all dying!'). The same word kullam/kullanu appears in both declarations.
28. WLC 17:28 = KJV 17:13. The intensified construction kol haqqarev haqqarev ('everyone approaching, approaching' — the doubled participle emphasizes any approach at all) to mishkan YHVH yamut ('the LORD's Tabernacle — he dies!'). The final anguished question ha'im tammenu ligvoa ('shall we be finished off with dying?') uses tamam ('to be completed, finished, used up') — will death exhaust our entire number? This existential crisis sets up chapter 18, where God defines the priestly and Levitical roles that protect the people from deadly contact with the sacred. The samekh closes the chapter on this note of unresolved dread.

Summary: God addresses Aaron directly — a rare occurrence — defining priestly and Levitical responsibilities, privileges, and support. The priests bear liability for sanctuary offenses. Levites serve the priests but may not approach altar or sacred vessels. The chapter details priestly income (portions from offerings, firstfruits, firstborn redemption) and Levitical income (the tithe), concluding with the Levites' tithe-of-the-tithe given to the priests.

What Makes This Remarkable: God tells Aaron: 'I am your portion and your inheritance among the Israelites' (v. 20) — the Levites receive no tribal territory because God Himself is their nachalah ('inheritance'). This is simultaneously a privilege and a deprivation. The berit melach olam ('covenant of salt forever,' v. 19) — salt being a preservative — symbolizes the indestructible permanence of the priestly provisions. The chapter's placement after Korah's rebellion reaffirms the priestly system the rebels challenged.

Translation Friction: The verb tis'u ('you shall bear,' v. 1) with avon ('guilt, offense') is challenging: it means bearing not personal sin but institutional liability for any breach of sanctuary protocol. We rendered avon hammiqdash as 'offenses against the sanctuary' rather than 'iniquity of the sanctuary' to clarify that the sanctuary is the thing protected, not the source of guilt. The verb yillavu ('they will be joined,' v. 2) is a deliberate wordplay on the name Levi.

Connections: God's role as priestly inheritance (v. 20) echoes Deuteronomy 10:9 and Psalm 16:5. The firstborn redemption price of five shekels (v. 16) matches Numbers 3:47. The berit melach ('salt covenant,' v. 19) appears also in Leviticus 2:13 and 2 Chronicles 13:5. The tithe-of-the-tithe principle (vv. 26–28) creates a nested support system: Israel tithes to Levites, Levites tithe to priests.

¹The LORD said to Aaron, "You, your sons, and your father's household with you will bear responsibility for offenses against the sanctuary; and you and your sons with you will bear responsibility for offenses against your priesthood." ²Also bring your kinsmen from the tribe of Levi — your father's tribe — alongside you. They will be attached to you and serve you, while you and your sons with you minister before the Tent of the Testimony. ³They will guard your duties and the duties of the entire Tent. However, they must not approach the sacred vessels or the altar, or both they and you will die. ⁴They will be joined to you and maintain the duties of the Tent of Meeting for all the Tent's service. No unauthorized person may approach you. ⁵You must guard the duties of the holy place and the duties of the altar, so that fury does not fall on the Israelites again. ⁶"I Myself have taken your kinsmen the Levites from among the Israelites. They are given to you as a gift — dedicated to the LORD — to perform the service of the Tent of Meeting." ⁷You and your sons with you must maintain your priesthood for every matter concerning the altar and for what is behind the curtain. You will serve there. I am giving your priesthood to you as a granted service — and any unauthorized person who approaches will be put to death. ⁸The LORD spoke to Aaron: "I am also giving you charge over My elevated offerings — all the consecrated things of the Israelites. I am giving them to you as your anointed portion and to your sons as a permanent statute." ⁹This will be yours from the most sacred offerings, taken from the fire: every offering of theirs — every grain offering, every purification offering, and every reparation offering that they return to Me — is most sacred, belonging to you and your sons. ¹⁰You must eat it in a most sacred space. Every male may eat it — it is holy, reserved for you. ¹¹This also is yours: the elevated portion from their gifts — all the wave offerings of the Israelites. I am giving them to you and to your sons and daughters with you as a permanent statute. Anyone in your household who is ritually clean may eat it. ¹²All the finest olive oil, all the finest new wine, and the best grain — the first portions of what they give to the LORD — I am giving to you. ¹³The first-ripened produce of everything in their land that they bring to the LORD will be yours. Everyone in your household who is ritually clean may eat it. ¹⁴Everything devoted to destruction in Israel belongs to you. ¹⁵Every firstborn that opens the womb, of all living beings presented to the LORD — whether human or animal — belongs to you. However, you must certainly redeem every firstborn human, and you must redeem the firstborn of ritually unclean animals. ¹⁶The redemption price, from one month old, you will set at five silver shekels by the sanctuary standard — twenty gerahs to the shekel. ¹⁷But the firstborn of a cow, sheep, or goat you must not redeem — they are sacred. You will dash their blood against the altar and burn their fat as a fire offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ¹⁸But their meat belongs to you — just as the breast of the wave offering and the right thigh are yours. ¹⁹All the elevated offerings of the sacred things that the Israelites set apart for the LORD I am giving to you, your sons, and your daughters with you as a permanent statute. This is an everlasting covenant of salt before the LORD, for you and your descendants with you. ²⁰The LORD said to Aaron, "You will have no territorial inheritance in their land, and no portion among them. I am your portion and your inheritance among the Israelites." ²¹"To the descendants of Levi I am giving every tithe in Israel as their inheritance, in exchange for the service they perform — the service of the Tent of Meeting." ²²The Israelites must no longer approach the Tent of Meeting, or they will incur guilt and die. ²³The Levites alone will perform the service of the Tent of Meeting, and they will bear responsibility for any offenses. This is a permanent statute throughout your generations: among the Israelites they will receive no territorial inheritance. ²⁴Because the tithe of the Israelites — which they set apart as an elevated offering to the LORD — I have given to the Levites as their inheritance. That is why I told them they will receive no inheritance among the Israelites. ²⁵The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁶"Speak to the Levites and tell them: When you receive from the Israelites the tithe that I have given you from them as your inheritance, you must set apart from it an elevated offering to the LORD — a tithe of the tithe." ²⁷Your elevated offering will be credited to you as if it were grain from the threshing floor or the full yield from the wine vat. ²⁸In this way you too must set apart an elevated offering to the LORD from all the tithes you receive from the Israelites. From these you will give the LORD's elevated offering to Aaron the priest. ²⁹From all the gifts you receive, you must set apart the LORD's full elevated offering — from the best of it, its consecrated portion. ³⁰Tell them: Once you have set apart the best portion from it, the remainder will be credited to the Levites as equivalent to the produce of the threshing floor and the yield of the wine vat. ³¹You may eat it anywhere — you and your households — because it is your compensation in exchange for your service in the Tent of Meeting. ³²You will incur no guilt for it once you have set apart the best portion. But you must not profane the sacred donations of the Israelites, or you will die.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This chapter follows immediately after Korah's rebellion and Aaron's staff budding (chs 16-17), reaffirming priestly duties and privileges. The verb tis'u (you shall bear) with avon (offense, guilt) means assuming liability — Aaron's family is answerable for any breach of sanctuary protocol. The phrase avon hammiqdash (guilt of the sanctuary) places the weight of maintaining sacred boundaries squarely on the priestly house.

2. The verb yillavu (they will be joined/attached) plays on the name Levi (levi), which Genesis 29:34 connects to the root l-v-h (to join, attach). The Levites serve (yeshartukha — will minister to you) in a supporting role, while the priests serve before the ohel ha'edut (Tent of the Testimony) — making a clear distinction between Levitical service and priestly ministry.
3. The boundary is stark: Levites guard (shamru) and maintain (mishmeret — duty, watch), but must not approach (lo yiqrevu) the kelei haqqodesh (sacred vessels) or the mizbe'ach (altar). Violation results in death — gam-hem gam-attem (both they and you) — meaning the priests too bear lethal consequences if they allow unauthorized access.
4. The term zar (stranger, outsider) here means any non-Levite Israelite — not a foreigner but someone outside the authorized priestly-Levitical circle. The prohibition lo yiqrav (shall not approach) establishes concentric zones of holiness: the broader Israelite camp, the Levitical guard ring, and the priestly inner sanctum.
5. The word qetseph (fury, wrath) refers back to the deadly outbreaks in chapters 16-17 — Korah's rebellion, the plague that killed 14,700 people. Proper priestly guardianship of the mishmeret haqqodesh (charge of the sanctuary) and mishmeret hammizbe'ach (charge of the altar) prevents such catastrophes from recurring.
6. God speaks in emphatic first person: va'ani hinneh laqachti (I Myself — look — have taken). The Levites are described as mattanah (a gift) given to the priests, and simultaneously netunim laYHWH (given/dedicated to the LORD). This dual dedication — to God and to the priests — defines the Levites' unique status as living offerings who serve at the nexus of divine and human spheres.
7. The priestly domain has two loci: the mizbe'ach (altar — the outer court) and mibbeit lapparakhet (behind the curtain — the inner sanctum). The priesthood is called avodat mattanah (a service of gift) — not earned but bestowed. The death sentence for the zar haqqarev (the outsider who approaches) closes the section with the same lethal boundary as verse 3.
8. A new section begins with terumotai (My elevated offerings) — the root r-u-m means 'to raise up,' referring to portions lifted from sacrifices. The phrase lemoshchah (by reason of the anointing, or as an anointed portion) connects priestly compensation to priestly consecration — they receive these gifts because of their anointed status, not as wages.
9. Three categories of qodesh qodashim (most holy) offerings are listed: minchah (grain offering), chattat (purification/sin offering), and asham (reparation/guilt offering). The phrase min-ha'esh (from the fire) indicates the priestly portion is what remains after the altar receives its share. The verb yashivu (they return) suggests offerings are not gifts to God but restorations of what always belonged to Him.
10. Consumption of qodesh qodashim (most holy) offerings is restricted by location (beqodesh haqqodashim — in a most holy area, meaning the Tabernacle courtyard) and by gender (kol zakhar — every male of the priestly line). Female family members are excluded from these particular portions, though they may eat lesser holy offerings (see v. 11).
11. In contrast to v. 10, this category (tenuphot — wave offerings, the lesser holy portions) extends to daughters and the entire clean household (kol tahir beveitekha). The distinction between most-holy-male-only and lesser-holy-household-inclusive creates a graded system of participation in sacrificial meals.
12. The word chelev (best, fat, choicest) is used here metaphorically — not the sacrificial fat but the 'cream' of agricultural produce. Three staples are listed: yitshar (fresh olive oil), tirosh (new wine, unfermented grape juice), and dagan (grain). These reshit (first/best portions) represent the choicest agricultural yield of the land.
13. The bikkurim (firstfruits, first-ripened produce) extends beyond the three staples of v. 12 to encompass all agricultural produce. Again the clean-household rule applies (kol tahir beveitekha), making firstfruits a family provision rather than a males-only priestly prerogative.
14. The cherem (devoted thing, ban) is the most extreme form of dedication — items irrevocably consecrated to God, which cannot be redeemed or sold (Lev 27:28-29). That these go to the priest underscores the priest's role as God's representative in receiving what belongs entirely to the divine realm.
15. The peter rechem (opener of the womb, firstborn) principle grounds priestly income in the Exodus narrative: God claimed Israel's firstborn when He struck Egypt's (Ex 13:2). The infinitive absolute padoh tifdeh (redeeming you shall redeem — you must certainly redeem) insists that human firstborns and unclean animal firstborns cannot be sacrificed but must be bought back with money.
16. The pidyon (redemption) of a firstborn at age one month (mibben chodesh) for five sheqalim (shekels) by the sanctuary standard remains practiced in Judaism today as pidyon haben. The gerah — the smallest unit of weight — is defined here as 1/20 of a shekel, establishing a precise monetary standard for sacred transactions.
17. Clean domestic animals (shor — cattle, kesev — sheep, ez — goat) cannot be redeemed because qodesh hem (they are sacred) — they belong irrevocably to God. Their blood is thrown (tizroq — dash, splash) against the altar and their fat burned (taqtir — cause to go up in smoke) as an isheh lere'ach nicho'ach (fire offering of pleasing aroma).
18. The priest receives the basar (meat/flesh) of firstborn clean animals as his portion. Two prime cuts are specified by analogy: the chazeh hattenufah (breast of the wave offering) and the shoq hayyamin (right thigh/leg). These are the same priestly portions established for the shelamim (fellowship offering) in Leviticus 7:31-34.
19. The berit melach olam (eternal covenant of salt) is a striking metaphor. Salt preserves, purifies, and was used in ancient Near Eastern treaties to seal agreements. A 'salt covenant' means an unbreakable, perpetual bond — the priestly portions are guaranteed by covenant, not merely by administrative decree. This same phrase appears in 2 Chronicles 13:5 regarding the Davidic dynasty.

- 20. The most theologically dense verse in the chapter: ani chelqekha venachalatekha (I am your portion and your inheritance). The priests receive no land allotment — their nachalah (inheritance) is God Himself. This transforms priestly poverty into priestly privilege: they lack territory but possess direct relationship with the divine. The chelq (portion, share) language echoes Psalm 73:26 and 142:6.
- 21. The section now shifts from priests to Levites. The ma'aser (tithe, tenth) replaces land as the Levites' nachalah (inheritance). The word cheleph (in exchange for, as recompense) frames the tithe as compensation for the avodah (service/labor) the Levites perform at the ohel mo'ed — their sacred work is their livelihood.
- 22. The prohibition applies to ordinary Israelites (benei Yisra'el) approaching the ohel mo'ed directly. The phrase laset chet lamut (to bear sin resulting in death) treats unauthorized approach as inherently lethal — not a punishable crime but a built-in consequence of contact between the unholy and the holy.
- 23. The Levites' dual status is restated: they serve (avad) and they bear liability (yis'u avonam — carry their guilt). The phrase lo yinchalu nachalah (they shall not inherit an inheritance) uses the same root twice for emphasis — complete exclusion from the land distribution that will follow conquest.
- 24. The logic is made explicit: the tithe (ma'aser) replaces land (nachalah). This is not a penalty but a deliberate divine arrangement — al ken (therefore, for this reason) connects the Levites' landlessness to their tithe-based income. The terumah (elevated offering) that Israel raises to God is redirected to the Levites as their God-given estate.
- 25. A new speech formula (vaydabber YHWH el-Mosheh) introduces the final section — the tithe of the tithe. This instruction goes to Moses rather than Aaron (contrast v. 1), because it concerns the Levites' obligations rather than the priests' privileges.
- 26. The ma'aser min hamma'aser (tithe of the tithe) creates a cascading system: Israel gives 10% to the Levites, and the Levites give 10% of that to the priests. The Levites are not exempt from giving — they too must raise up (haremothem) a portion to God, treating their income with the same sacred obligation that applies to all Israel.
- 27. The Levites' tithe-of-a-tithe is nechshav (reckoned, credited) to them as equivalent to a farmer's terumah from dagan (grain) off the goren (threshing floor) or the fullness (mele'ah) from the yekev (wine vat). Since Levites own no fields, their monetary tithe-of-a-tithe counts as though they were landowners giving agricultural firstfruits.
- 28. The destination of the Levites' terumah is specified: it goes to Aharon hakkohen (Aaron the priest). The system is complete — from Israelite farmer to Levite to priest to God — each tier giving upward. The gam-attem (you too, also you) emphasizes that the Levites share the same obligation of generosity as the rest of Israel.
- 29. The Levites must give from the chelbo (its best, its fat — metaphorically the choicest part). The miqdesho (its consecrated portion) specifies that what the Levites set apart is sanctified upon separation — it becomes holy property the moment it is designated, not merely when it arrives at the priest.
- 30. After giving the chelbo (best portion), the rest (what remains) is venechshav (credited) to the Levites as their own legitimate income — kitvu'at goren (like the produce of a threshing floor) and kitvu'at yekev (like the yield of a wine vat). This legitimizes their use of the remaining 90% as ordinary income for personal needs.
- 31. Unlike the most holy offerings (v. 10), the Levites' tithe income may be eaten bechol maqom (in any place) — it carries no location restrictions. It is called sakhar (wages, compensation, reward) — earned income in exchange for (cheleph) their avodah (service). This is the most direct statement that Levitical work is a professional vocation deserving fair pay.
- 32. The chapter closes with both assurance and warning. Giving the chelbo (best) removes guilt (lo tis'u alav chet — you will bear no sin regarding it). But the final threat remains: lo techalelu (you must not profane) the qodshei benei Yisra'el (sacred things of the Israelites), velo tamutu (or you will die). Proper handling of tithes is literally a life-or-death matter.

Summary: God commands the preparation of the parah adumah ('red heifer') — a completely red, unblemished cow that has never worn a yoke. It is slaughtered and burned outside the camp with cedar, hyssop, and scarlet yarn. The resulting ashes, mixed with water, create the mei niddah ('water of purification') used to cleanse anyone contaminated by contact with a corpse. Those who refuse purification are cut off from the community.

What Makes This Remarkable: The red heifer is introduced as chukkat ha-torah ('the statute of the law,' v. 2) — a category of commandment whose rationale the Torah does not explain. Rabbinic tradition calls it the ultimate paradox: the ashes purify the contaminated but render the clean priest who prepares them temporarily impure. Everyone who participates in producing the purification water becomes impure in the process. Purity is achieved through a mechanism that generates impurity.

Translation Friction: The animal is parah adumah — literally a 'red cow,' not a heifer in the strict English sense (young cow that has not calved). However, 'red heifer' is deeply established in English translation tradition, and we retained it while noting the discrepancy. The term mei niddah ('water of impurity/separation,' v. 9) is counterintuitive — purification water named with an impurity word. We rendered it 'water of purification' to reflect its function rather than its paradoxical label.

Connections: The red heifer ashes produce the mei chata't ('water of purification') referenced in Numbers 8:7 for Levitical consecration. The ritual's location outside the camp parallels the Day of Atonement scapegoat (Leviticus 16:21-22). Hebrews 9:13-14 cites this ritual as a type of Christ's purifying work. The cedar, hyssop, and scarlet yarn (v. 6) match the skin disease purification materials in Leviticus 14:4.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses and to Aaron: ²This is the ritual statute that the LORD has commanded. Tell the Israelites to secure a red heifer (parah adumah) that is flawless — no defect, and one that has never worn a yoke. ³Hand it over to Eleazar the priest. He is to take it outside the camp, where it shall be slaughtered in his presence. ⁴Eleazar the priest shall take some of its blood on his finger and flick it toward the front of the tent of meeting seven times. ⁵The heifer is then to be burned in his sight — its hide, flesh, blood, and dung — burned completely. ⁶The priest shall take cedarwood, hyssop, and crimson yarn and throw them into the fire where the heifer is burning. ⁷The priest shall then wash his garments and bathe his body in water. After that he may reenter the camp, but he remains ritually impure until evening. ⁸Whoever burns the heifer shall wash his clothes and bathe his body in water. He too remains ritually impure until evening. ⁹A ritually clean person shall gather the heifer's ashes and store them in a clean place outside the camp. They are to be kept for the community of Israel for use in the water of impurity (mei niddah). It is a sin offering. ¹⁰Whoever gathers the ashes shall wash his clothes and remains ritually impure until evening. This is a permanent statute for the Israelites and for the resident alien living among them. ¹¹Anyone who touches a human corpse is ritually impure for seven days. ¹²That person must purify himself with it on the third day and on the seventh day; then he will be clean. If he does not purify himself on the third and seventh days, he will not be clean. ¹³Anyone who touches a human corpse and does not purify himself defiles the tabernacle of the LORD. That person shall be cut off from Israel. Since the water of impurity was not sprinkled on him, he remains unclean; his impurity stays with him. ¹⁴This is the rule when someone dies inside a tent: everyone who enters the tent and everyone already in it becomes ritually impure for seven days. ¹⁵Every open vessel that has no lid fastened on it is unclean. ¹⁶Anyone who touches in the open field a person slain by the sword, or a corpse, or a human bone, or a grave, is ritually impure for seven days. ¹⁷For the impure person they shall take some of the ashes from the burned sin offering and pour fresh water over them into a vessel. ¹⁸A ritually clean person shall take hyssop, dip it in the water, and sprinkle it on the tent, on all the vessels, on the people who were there, and on whoever touched a bone, a slain person, a corpse, or a grave. ¹⁹The clean person shall sprinkle on the impure person on the third day and on the seventh day. On the seventh day the impure person shall purify himself, wash his clothes, and bathe in water. Then he will be clean at evening. ²⁰But anyone who becomes impure and does not purify himself shall be cut off from the assembly. He has defiled the sanctuary of the LORD; the water of impurity has not been sprinkled on him — he remains unclean. ²¹This shall be a permanent statute for them: whoever sprinkles the water of impurity shall wash his clothes, and whoever touches the water of impurity shall be ritually impure until evening. ²²Whatever the impure person touches becomes unclean, and anyone who touches that thing shall be ritually impure until evening.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Standard divine speech formula (vayedabber YHWH el-Mosheh ve-el-Aharon lemor). Moses and Aaron are addressed together — Aaron will soon be excluded from this ritual; his son Eleazar performs it instead, likely because contact with death would disqualify the high priest from his duties.
2. Chukkat ha-torah ('statute of the law') — a ritual whose rationale Torah does not explain; rabbinic tradition calls it the ultimate paradox, the law even Solomon could not fathom. Parah adumah: a red (adumah) female calf (parah). Temimah ('whole, flawless') and ein-bah mum ('no defect in her') demand physical perfection. Asher lo-ala aleha ol ('upon which no yoke has come') — the animal must be unworked, never used for labor.
3. Eleazar, not Aaron — the high priest must avoid corpse contamination. The ritual occurs michutz la-machaneh ('outside the camp'), in the liminal space between camp and wilderness. The slaughter happens lifanav ('before his face') — Eleazar supervises but does not perform the slaughter himself, preserving his ritual status.

4. El-nokhach penei ohel-mo'ed ('toward the front of the tent of meeting') — the blood is directed toward the sanctuary though the ritual occurs outside camp. Sheva pa'amim ('seven times') — seven signals completeness. The priest uses his finger (be-etsba'o) for sprinkling, as in other purification rites.
5. Le-einaiv ('in his sight') — Eleazar witnesses the entire burning. The totality is emphasized: skin (orah), flesh (basar), blood (dam), dung (parshah). Unlike most sacrifices, nothing is reserved; the whole animal is consumed by fire outside the camp, inverting the usual sacrificial logic.
6. Ets erets ('cedar wood'), ezov ('hyssop'), shani tola'at ('crimson of the worm' — scarlet dye): the same trio used in the leper's purification (Lev 14:4, 6) and at Passover (Ex 12:22). They bridge the scale of creation — tallest tree to lowliest herb — and the scarlet may evoke blood/life. Thrown el-toch serefat ha-parah ('into the midst of the heifer's burning') to be consumed with it.
7. The paradox of the ritual: the priest who produces the purification agent becomes impure (tame) through that very act. Kibbes (wash clothes), rachatz basaro bamayim (bathe his body in water) — standard decontamination. Ad ha-erev ('until evening') — a one-day impurity that sunset resolves. The ashes purify the defiled, but handling them defiles the handler.
8. Ha-soref ('the burner') — an assistant does the actual burning; Eleazar directs. Same defilement pattern as the priest: participation in the ritual imparts temporary impurity. Everyone involved in producing the purification agent is himself defiled by the process.
9. Efer ha-parah ('ashes of the heifer') — the residue of the burned animal. Ishi tahor ('a clean man') — one who has not touched death. Lemishmeret ('for keeping') — the ashes are stored for future use. Mei niddah: niddah denotes ritual impurity (often menstrual); the water mixed with these ashes becomes the purification agent. Chattat hu ('it is a sin offering') — the ritual is classified as chattat though it involves no blood sprinkling at the altar.
10. The gatherer joins the priest and burner in receiving impurity. Lechukat olam ('for a perpetual statute') — the ordinance stands for all generations. The ger (resident alien) is included: corpse contamination and its remedy apply to all who dwell in the camp, not only native Israelites.
11. Ha-noge'a be-met lechol nefesh adam ('one who touches the dead, [namely] any human being') — contact with a human corpse (not animal) triggers impurity. Shiv'at yamim ('seven days') — a full week of defilement, the longest standard impurity period. Death is the ultimate source of tum'ah in the priestly system.
12. Yitchatta-bo ('he shall purify himself with it') — the pronoun refers to the mei niddah. Bayom ha-shlishi ... uva-yom ha-shevi'i ('on the third day ... and on the seventh day') — a double sprinkling is required; omission of either nullifies the purification. Yithar ('he shall be clean') — the process reverses the tum'ah.
13. Et-mishkan YHWH time ('he defiles the tabernacle of the LORD') — unremedied corpse impurity pollutes the sanctuary itself from a distance. Venichreta hanefesh ha-hi mi-Yisra'el ('that person shall be cut off from Israel') — the severest penalty, likely exclusion from the community or divine punishment. Mei niddah lo-zoraq alav ('the water of impurity was not sprinkled upon him') — failure to undergo the ritual has lasting consequences. Tum'ato bo ('his impurity is upon him') — the defilement remains.
14. Zot ha-torah ('this is the law') — introduces the application of the corpse-impurity rule. Adam ki-yamut be-ohel ('when a human dies in a tent') — death indoors creates a contaminated space. Kol ha-ba el-ha-ohel vechol asher ba-ohel ('everyone who comes in and everyone in it') — the impurity affects both those present at death and later entrants. Ohel can mean any dwelling, not only a literal tent.
15. Keli patuach ('open vessel') — a container with an uncovered opening. Asher ein tsamid patil alav ('which has no covering bound upon it') — a fastened lid seals the contents from corpse-contaminated air. Uncovered vessels in a death-tent absorb impurity; sealed vessels do not (cf. v 15's implication).
16. Al-penei hasadeh ('on the face of the field') — outdoors, where unburied death is common. Chalal-cherev ('slain by the sword') — death by violence. Etzem adam ('bone of a human') — even skeletal remains transmit impurity. Qever ('grave') — tombs and grave-markers also defile. All these extend corpse-impurity beyond the indoor death scenario.
17. La-tame ('for the impure') — the defiled person receives the mixture. Me-afar serefat ha-chattat ('from the ashes of the burning of the sin offering') — the stored heifer ashes. Mayim chayyim ('fresh water' or 'living water') — flowing water, from a spring or stream, not stagnant. El-keli ('into a vessel') — the mixture is prepared in a container.
18. Ish tahor ('a clean person') — one free of corpse impurity must apply the mixture. Ezov ('hyssop') — a bunch of the herb used as a sprinkling implement. The same elements burned with the heifer (cedar, hyssop, scarlet) reappear in application. Ve-al kol ha-kelim ve-al ha-nefashot ('on all the vessels and on the persons') — both objects and people are sprinkled. The sprinkling reverses the impurity of vv 14–16.
19. Ha-tahor ... al ha-tame ('the clean upon the unclean') — one person applies the mixture to the defiled. Chitte'o ('he shall purify him') — the verb can mean both 'purify' and 'decontaminate.' The impure person's own actions on the seventh day: wash clothes (kibbes), bathe (rachatz), then tahor ba-erev ('clean at evening') — sundown completes the process.
20. Venichreta ... mitoch ha-qahal ('he shall be cut off from the midst of the assembly') — exclusion from communal worship and life. Et-miqdash YHWH time ('he has defiled the sanctuary of the LORD') — unremedied impurity threatens the divine presence. Repeats the consequence of v 13, emphasizing that the mei niddah is mandatory, not optional.
21. Mazzeh mei ha-niddah ('the sprinkler of the water of impurity') — applying the mixture defiles the applier. Ha-noge'a be-mei ha-niddah ('the one who touches the water of impurity') — even contact with the mixture, not just sprinkling, imparts impurity. The paradox again: the agent that purifies the corpse-defiled itself defiles those who handle it. Ad ha-erev — a one-day impurity.

22. Standard chain of contagion: the corpse-defiled person transmits impurity to objects (yakhol asher yiga bo ha-tame yitma); anyone who then touches those objects becomes impure (ha-nefesh ha-noge'at titma ad ha-erev). Secondary contact carries lighter defilement — until evening only — unlike the seven-day impurity of direct corpse contact. The paragraph marker {P} closes the chapter.

Summary: Miriam dies at Kadesh. The people quarrel over water, and God tells Moses to speak to the rock — but Moses strikes it twice instead, and God bars both Moses and Aaron from entering the land. Edom refuses Israel passage. Aaron dies on Mount Hor, and his priestly garments are transferred to his son Eleazar. Israel mourns Aaron for thirty days.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter records the deaths of two of Israel's three founding leaders — Miriam in verse 1 and Aaron in verse 28 — bookending a chapter of loss. The exact nature of Moses's sin at Meribah has generated centuries of debate: the Hebrew says lo he'emanem bi ('you did not trust me,' v. 12), framing the offense as a failure of faith rather than a mechanical error. The priestly succession is enacted physically: Aaron's garments are stripped from him and placed on Eleazar on the mountaintop (v. 28).

Translation Friction: The verb vayyar ('he raised,' v. 11) describing Moses lifting his hand before striking the rock uses a word whose other meaning is 'he rebelled.' Some interpreters see a deliberate double meaning. We rendered the surface sense ('raised his hand') while noting the ambiguity. The phrase mei merivah ('waters of Meribah/strike,' v. 13) creates a place-name from the quarrel — riv means 'to contend, to dispute' — and we transliterated it to preserve the etymology.

Connections: The water-from-rock crisis parallels Exodus 17:1-7 at Rephidim, but the outcomes diverge sharply. Miriam's death (v. 1) and the immediate water shortage led rabbinic tradition to associate a miraculous water source with her life ('Miriam's well'). Edom's refusal of passage (vv. 14-21) references the Jacob-Esau kinship (v. 14; cf. Genesis 25:21-26). Aaron's death on Mount Hor is referenced in Deuteronomy 10:6 and 32:50.

¹The whole community of Israel arrived at the wilderness of Zin in the first month and camped at Kadesh. Miriam died there and was buried there. ²There was no water for the community. They massed together against Moses and Aaron. ³The people contended with Moses and said, "If only we had perished when our kindred died before the LORD!" ⁴Why have you brought the congregation of the LORD into this wilderness — to die here, we and our livestock? ⁵Why did you bring us up from Egypt to this wretched place? It has no grain, no figs, no vines, no pomegranates — and no water to drink. ⁶Moses and Aaron left the assembly and went to the entrance of the tent of meeting. They fell facedown, and the glory of the LORD appeared to them. ⁷The LORD spoke to Moses, saying, ⁸Take the staff. You and Aaron your brother are to assemble the community, and in front of them speak to the rock. It will yield its water. You will bring water out of the rock for them and give the community and their livestock to drink. ⁹Moses took the staff from before the LORD, as He had commanded him. ¹⁰Moses and Aaron assembled the community before the rock. Moses said to them, "Listen, you rebels. Should we bring water for you out of this rock?" ¹¹Moses raised his hand and struck the rock twice with his staff. Water poured out in abundance, and the community and their livestock drank. ¹²The LORD said to Moses and Aaron, "Because you did not trust Me — and did not sanctify Me in the sight of the Israelites — you will not bring this assembly into the land I have given them." ¹³These are the waters of Meribah, where the Israelites contended with the LORD, and He showed Himself holy among them. ¹⁴Moses sent messengers from Kadesh to the king of Edom: "Thus says your brother Israel: You know all the hardship that has come upon us." ¹⁵"Our ancestors went down to Egypt, and we lived there many years. The Egyptians mistreated us and our fathers." ¹⁶"We cried out to the LORD; He heard our voice, sent a messenger, and brought us out of Egypt. Now we are in Kadesh, a town at the edge of your territory." ¹⁷"Please let us pass through your land. We will not cross through field or vineyard, and we will not drink water from wells. We will keep to the king's highway and will not turn right or left until we have crossed your border." ¹⁸Edom said to him, "You shall not pass through me, or I will march out against you with the sword." ¹⁹The Israelites said to him, "We will go up by the highway. If I and my livestock drink any of your water, I will pay for it. I ask only to pass through on foot — nothing more." ²⁰He said, "You shall not pass through." Then Edom came out against Israel with a large force and a strong hand. ²¹Edom refused to grant Israel passage through its territory. So Israel turned away from it. ²²They set out from Kadesh, and the whole community of Israel came to Mount Hor. ²³The LORD said to Moses and Aaron at Mount Hor, on the border of the land of Edom: ²⁴"Aaron will be gathered to his people. He shall not enter the land I have given to the Israelites, because you rebelled against My command at the waters of Meribah." ²⁵Take Aaron and his son Eleazar and bring them up to Mount Hor. ²⁶"Strip Aaron of his garments and put them on Eleazar his son. Aaron will be gathered to his people and die there." ²⁷Moses did as the LORD commanded. They went up Mount Hor in the sight of the whole community. ²⁸Moses removed Aaron's garments and dressed his son Eleazar in them. Aaron died there on the summit of the mountain, and Moses and Eleazar came back down. ²⁹When the whole community saw that Aaron had died, they wept for Aaron thirty days — all the house of Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The first month (bachodesh harishon) is Nisan — the same month as the exodus (Ex 12:2). The transition from wilderness wanderings back toward Canaan opens with loss: Miriam (achot, sister; Ex 15:20) dies at Kadesh. Midbar-tsin and Qadesh frame this chapter; Miriam's death in v 1 parallels Aaron's in v 28, bookending the generation's passing.
2. Lo haya mayim la'edah — no water for the assembly. The verb va-yiqahalu (from qahal, 'assembly') means they gathered as a hostile crowd. The same crisis as Exodus 17 (Rephidim) recurs here at Kadesh; this time the people's confrontation leads to Moses' decisive failure.
3. Va-yarev (from riv, 'strife') — they quarreled. Lu gavanu bigva' acheinu — 'if only we had died in the dying of our brothers.' They refer to the rebels who died in Korah's rebellion (ch 16) or the plague in 17:14. The complaint echoes their earlier wish to have died in Egypt.
4. Lamah hevetem et-qahal YHWH — why have you brought up the assembly of the LORD. The people charge Moses and Aaron with endangering qahal YHWH; they shift blame for the wilderness from their own disobedience to the leaders. Be'irenu (our livestock) shows the scope of the perceived threat.
5. Ha-maqom hara' hazzeh — this evil/wretched place. The list zera' (seed/grain), te'elah (fig), gefen (vine), rimon (pomegranate) — standard symbols of abundance in Canaan (Deut 8:8) — stresses what they lack. Mayim ayin lishtot: no water to drink. The complaint dismisses the wilderness as worthless.
6. El-petach ohel mo'ed — to the entrance of the tent of meeting. Va-yiplu al-penehem — they fell on their faces (prostration before revelation). Kevod YHWH — the glory of the LORD — appears as at Sinai; divine instruction will follow, but Moses and Aaron will misuse it.
7. Standard introduction for divine speech. The instruction that follows is explicit: speak to the rock (v 8). Moses' violation of this command will cost him the land.
8. Ve-dibbartem el-ha-sela' le'einehem — you shall speak to the rock before their eyes. The key verb is dibber (speak), not strike. Ha-matteh (the staff) is carried but not used to hit. The contrast with Exodus 17:6 (strike the rock) and Moses' actual act (striking twice, v 11) defines his sin: he did what God did not command.
9. Millephne YHWH — from before the LORD (from the sanctuary). Moses obeys the first part of the command (taking the staff) but will transgress the crucial part (speaking, not striking). Ke-asher tsivvahu — as He commanded him — highlights the gap between command and fulfillment.
10. Ha-morim — the rebels (from marah, 'rebel'). Moses' harsh tone shifts focus from God to himself: 'Must we fetch?' (nochi' lakhem) implies he and Aaron provide the water, not the LORD. This failure to sanctify God (lehaqdisheni) before Israel is the heart of his sin (v 12).
11. Va-yakh et-ha-sela' bemattehu pa'amayim — he struck the rock with his staff twice. God had said 'speak'; Moses strikes. The doubling (twice) may signal excess or frustration. Water flows anyway (mayim rabbim — abundant water); God's mercy meets the need, but Moses' act disqualifies him from leading Israel into the land.
12. Lo he'emantem bi — you did not trust/believe Me. Lehaqdisheni le'eine bene Yisra'el — to sanctify Me in the eyes of the children of Israel. Moses' act (striking instead of speaking, taking credit) obscured God's holiness. The consequence is definitive: neither Moses nor Aaron will enter the land. This verse grounds Moses' exclusion from Canaan (Deut 34:4).
13. Me merivah — waters of Meribah (from riv, 'contention'). The place-name commemorates both Israel's strife and God's self-revelation: va-yiqaddesh bam — He was sanctified/made holy in/through them. Despite Moses' failure, God's holiness was displayed when the rock yielded water. Meribah also appears in Exodus 17:7 (Meribah at Rephidim).
14. Koh amar achikha Yisra'el — thus says your brother Israel. The appeal to kinship (Jacob/Israel and Esau/Edom) frames the request. Tela'ah (hardship) and metsa'atenu (has found us) describe the afflictions of slavery and wilderness. The diplomatic tone seeks peaceful passage along the king's highway.

15. Va-yaredu avotenu — our fathers went down. Va-yare'u lanu mitzrayim — the Egyptians did evil/harm to us. The speech rehearses Israel's story to justify the request: we are kin, we suffered, we were delivered. Yamim rabbim (many days) summarizes the sojourn.
16. Va-nitsa'aq el-YHWH — we cried out to the LORD. Mal'akh can mean angel or messenger; the Exodus narrative emphasizes God's direct action. Qetseh gevulekha — the edge of your border — places Israel at Edom's frontier, requesting safe passage through rather than conquest.
17. Derekh ha-melekh — the king's highway, a main trade route through Edom. The pledges (no fields, no vineyards, no well water) assure Edom that Israel will cause no harm or depletion. Lo nitteh yamin u-smol — we will not turn right or left — promises a straight, minimally intrusive passage.
18. Lo ta'avov bi — you shall not pass through me (Edom speaks as the land). Pen-bacherev etze' — lest I go out with the sword. The refusal is absolute. The threat of armed resistance forces Israel to detour, adding hardship to the journey.
19. Ba-mesillah na'aleh — we will go up by the highway. Mekhram — their price, i.e., payment for water used. Ein-davar beraglay e'evorah — there is nothing with my feet, I will pass — a pledge to pass through without additional demands or damage. Israel sweetens the offer; Edom still refuses.
20. Be'am kaved uve-yad chazaqah — with a heavy/impressive people and a strong hand. Edom musters for war. The phrase echoes the exodus (Ex 6:1, 13:14) but here describes Edom's military posture against Israel. Israel must turn away.
21. Va-yema'en — he refused (from ma'en). Lo naton et-Yisra'el avor bigvulo — did not give Israel to pass through his border. Va-yet Yisra'el me'alaw — Israel turned aside from him. The detour around Edom extends the wilderness journey and delays entry into the land.
22. Hor ha-har — Mount Hor (har means mountain; Hor may be from a root for height). The journey from Kadesh to Hor sets the stage for Aaron's death. The same mountain appears in the border descriptions of Canaan (Num 34:7) and in Edom's vicinity here.
23. Al-gevu eretz Edom — on the border of the land of Edom. The divine word comes at the boundary; Aaron will die at the threshold of the land, never crossing. The location echoes Israel's exclusion from Edom's territory — barriers on multiple fronts.
24. Ye'aseph Aharon el-ammav — Aaron will be gathered to his people (euphemism for death). Meritem et-pi — you rebelled against My mouth/word. The charge links Aaron's death directly to me merivah (the waters of Meribah). Aaron was present and complicit in Moses' failure; both bear the consequence.
25. Ha'al otam Hor ha-har — bring them up Mount Hor. Eleazar will succeed Aaron as high priest (Ex 6:23). The transfer of priesthood is deliberate: Aaron goes up to die; Eleazar goes up to be invested.
26. Hafsheit et-Aharon et-begadav — strip Aaron of his garments. The priestly vestments (Ex 28) are transferred to Eleazar, symbolizing the continuity of the priesthood. The same verb (pashat) appears in v 28 for the actual stripping. Ye'aseph umet sham — he will be gathered and die there.
27. Le'eine kol-ha'edah — before the eyes of the whole assembly. The transition is public. The community witnesses Aaron's departure and Eleazar's elevation. Moses' obedience here contrasts with his failure at Meribah.
28. Be-ro'sh ha-har — on the top/summit of the mountain. Aaron dies at the high point, perhaps suggesting he is 'gathered' heavenward. Va-yered Moshe ve-El'azar min-ha-har — Moses and Eleazar descended alone; the high priest who goes up is not the one who comes down. The priesthood passes; the wilderness generation continues to pass away.
29. Ki gava' Aharon — that Aaron had died (gava' = expire, breathe out). Va-yivku et-Aharon shloshim yom — they wept for Aaron thirty days. The same mourning period as for Moses (Deut 34:8). Kol beit Yisra'el — all the house of Israel — signifies full communal grief. The chapter ends with Israel grieving their first high priest as they continue toward the land he would never enter.

Summary: Israel defeats the Canaanite king of Arad after vowing cherem ('total destruction'). The people complain again and are punished with venomous serpents; God provides a bronze serpent on a pole as a means of healing. Israel journeys around Edom, sings at the well of Beer, and wins decisive victories over Sihon king of the Amorites and Og king of Bashan, conquering the Transjordanian territory.

What Makes This Remarkable: The bronze serpent is one of the strangest remedies in the Torah: the instrument of punishment becomes the instrument of healing. Those bitten must look at a nachash nechoshet ('bronze serpent,' v. 9) to live — not a magical cure but a visible act of trust in God's word. The chapter also preserves fragments of ancient poetry: a quotation from the lost sefer milchamot YHWH ('Book of the Wars of the LORD,' v. 14), and the well song ('spring up, O well!' v. 17), one of the few joyful songs in Numbers.

Translation Friction: The term ha'atarim (v. 1) is debated — it may be a place-name or may derive from tur ('to scout'), connecting to the spies of chapter 13. We transliterated it as a proper noun while noting the ambiguity. The verb hacharamti ('devote to total destruction,' v. 2) carries the full weight of cherem — forfeiting all spoils to God — and resists reduction to a single English word. We used 'devote to total destruction' to preserve both the religious dedication and the violent outcome.

Connections: The bronze serpent (v. 9) is referenced in 2 Kings 18:4 (Hezekiah destroys it when it becomes an idol) and in John 3:14-15, where Jesus applies it to His own crucifixion. The victories over Sihon and Og (vv. 21-35) become a permanent part of Israel's theological memory, recited in Deuteronomy 2-3, Psalm 135:11, and Psalm 136:19-20. The conquered territory becomes the inheritance of Reuben and Gad in Numbers 32.

¹When the Canaanite king of Arad, who lived in the Negev, heard that Israel was approaching by the route of Atharim, he attacked Israel and captured some of them as prisoners. ²Israel made a vow to the LORD, saying, "If You will truly deliver this people into our hand, we will devote their cities to total destruction." ³The LORD listened to Israel's plea and delivered the Canaanites over. They devoted them and their cities to total destruction, so the place was named Hormah. ⁴They set out from Mount Hor along the route toward the Sea of Reeds, going around the land of Edom. The people grew deeply frustrated on the journey. ⁵The people spoke against God and against Moses: "Why did you bring us up from Egypt to die in the wilderness? There is no real food and no water, and we are disgusted with this worthless bread!" ⁶The LORD sent venomous serpents among the people. They bit the people, and many Israelites died. ⁷The people came to Moses and said, "We have sinned — we spoke against the LORD and against you. Pray to the LORD to remove the serpents from us." So Moses prayed on behalf of the people. ⁸The LORD said to Moses, "Make yourself a serpent figure and mount it on a pole. Then anyone who has been bitten, when they look at it, will live." ⁹So Moses made a bronze serpent and mounted it on the pole. Whenever a serpent bit someone, that person would look at the bronze serpent and survive. ¹⁰The Israelites moved on and camped at Oboth. ¹¹They traveled from Oboth and camped at Iye-Abarim in the wilderness east of Moab, toward the sunrise. ¹²From there they traveled on and camped at the Wadi Zered. ¹³From there they traveled on and camped on the far side of the Arnon, in the wilderness that extends from the Amorite border — for the Arnon is the boundary of Moab, between Moab and the Amorites. ¹⁴This is why the Book of the Wars of the LORD says: "Waheb in Suphah, and the ravines of the Arnon, ¹⁵and the slopes of the ravines that extend toward the settlement of Ar and lean against the border of Moab." ¹⁶From there they went to Beer — that is the well where the LORD told Moses, "Assemble the people and I will give them water." ¹⁷Then Israel sang this song: "Rise up, O well! Sing out to it! ¹⁸A well that leaders dug, that the nobles of the people excavated with the scepter, with their staffs." From the wilderness they went to Mattanah, ¹⁹from Mattanah to Nahaliel, from Nahaliel to Bamoth, ²⁰and from Bamoth to the valley in the territory of Moab, at the peak of Pisgah, which overlooks the wasteland. ²¹Israel sent envoys to Sihon, king of the Amorites, with this message: ²²"Let us pass through your land. We will not turn aside into fields or vineyards. We will not drink water from any well. We will travel along the King's Highway until we have crossed your territory." ²³But Sihon would not allow Israel to pass through his territory. Instead, Sihon assembled his entire fighting force and marched out against Israel into the wilderness. He arrived at Jahaz and engaged Israel in battle. ²⁴Israel struck him down with the sword and took possession of his land from the Arnon to the Jabbok — as far as the Ammonite border, because the Ammonite border was fortified. ²⁵Israel captured all these cities and settled in all the Amorite cities — in Heshbon and all its surrounding towns. ²⁶Heshbon had been the capital of Sihon, king of the Amorites, who had fought against the previous king of Moab and seized all his territory as far as the Arnon. ²⁷That is why the ballad-singers say: "Come to Heshbon! Let the city of Sihon be rebuilt and established! ²⁸For fire burst out from Heshbon, a blaze from the stronghold of Sihon. It consumed Ar of Moab and the rulers of the heights of the Arnon. ²⁹Devastation for you, Moab! You are ruined, people of Chemosh! He abandoned his sons as refugees and his daughters to captivity under Sihon, king of the Amorites. ³⁰We shot them down — Heshbon is destroyed all the way to Dibon! We laid waste as far as Nophah, which extends to Medeba." ³¹So Israel settled in the land of the Amorites. ³²Moses sent scouts to reconnoiter Jazer. They captured its surrounding towns and dispossessed the Amorites living there. ³³They turned and advanced along the road to Bashan. Og, king of Bashan, marched out against them — he and his entire army — to give battle at Edrei. ³⁴The LORD said to Moses,

"Do not fear him, for I have handed him over to you — him, his entire army, and his land. Do to him what you did to Sihon, king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon." ³⁵They struck him down along with his sons and his entire army until no survivor remained, and they took possession of his land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Canaanite king of Arad strikes preemptively when he hears Israel is moving via derekh ha'atarim (the route of Atharim — possibly 'the way of the scouts,' connecting to the spies sent earlier). The verb vayyishb (he captured) with shevi (captivity, prisoners) shows Israel vulnerable — a rare military setback that prompts the vow in v. 2.
2. The neder (vow) uses the conditional im-naton titten (if giving You give — if You truly deliver) with the infinitive absolute for emphasis. The commitment to hacharamti (devote to cherem — total destruction) of their cities is a complete dedication of the spoils to God, forfeiting any plunder. This voluntary vow transforms a defensive battle into a sacred act.
3. God responds to the vow: vayyishma YHWH beqol Yisra'el (the LORD listened to Israel's voice). The place is renamed Chormah, from the same root ch-r-m as cherem (destruction/devotion). The name commemorates the fulfilled vow — the site of total consecration through destruction. This contrasts with the earlier defeat at Hormah in Numbers 14:45, where Israel attacked without divine authorization.
4. The phrase vattiqtasr nefesh ha'am (the soul/life of the people grew short) conveys emotional exhaustion — their patience was literally 'cut short.' They must detour around Edom (who refused passage in 20:14-21), making an already long wilderness journey even longer. This frustration sets the stage for the complaint and serpent episode.
5. The complaint escalates to include God directly — b'Elohim uveMosheh (against God and against Moses). Their accusation is contradictory: ein lechem (there is no food) yet they despise the lechem haqqeloqel (the worthless/miserable bread) — meaning the manna. The word qeloqel (contemptible, light, worthless) from the root q-l-l shows profound ingratitude. Their nefesh qatsah (their soul loathed/was disgusted) uses visceral rejection language.
6. The hannechashim hasseraaphim (the burning serpents) — seraph means 'burning,' referring either to the burning sensation of their venom or to their fiery appearance. The same root s-r-ph gives us the seraphim of Isaiah 6. The serpents are sent by God (vayshalach YHWH) as a direct consequence of the people's complaint — divine judgment matching the offense.
7. Confession (chatanu — we have sinned) and intercession (hitpallel — pray) are the two responses to judgment. The people acknowledge the sin precisely: dibbarnuv baYHWH vavakh (we spoke against the LORD and against you). Moses' intercession (vayyitpallel Mosheh be'ad ha'am — Moses prayed on behalf of the people) follows the same pattern as his intercessions in Exodus 32 and Numbers 14.
8. God does not remove the serpents but provides a remedy within the crisis. The saraph (burning/venomous figure) on a nes (pole, standard, banner) becomes a means of healing through the act of looking (ra'ah). The cure requires intentional gaze — an act of faith in the divine instruction. Jesus references this passage in John 3:14-15, drawing a parallel to his own being 'lifted up.'
9. Moses fashions a nechash nechoshet (serpent of bronze/copper) — note the wordplay between nachash (serpent) and nechoshet (bronze/copper), both from related roots. The bronze serpent becomes an ongoing remedy: im nashakh hannachash et-ish (if the serpent bit a man) vehibbit (and he looked) — healing required active participation, not passive proximity. This object later became an idol and was destroyed by King Hezekiah (2 Kings 18:4), who called it Nehushtan.
10. The itinerary resumes after the serpent episode. Ovot (Oboth) is an encampment site in the Transjordan region, marking Israel's southward detour around Edom before turning north toward Moab. The name may relate to ov ('spirit medium' or 'waterskin'), though its etymology is uncertain.
11. Iyyei ha'Avarim ('ruins of the crossings' or 'heaps of Abarim') is in the wilderness facing Moab from the east (mimmizrach hashemesh — from the rising of the sun). The Abarim range, whose name means 'crossings' or 'regions beyond,' is the mountain chain from which Moses will later view the Promised Land (Num 27:12).
12. The Nachal Zered (Wadi Zered, or 'valley of Zered') marks a significant geographic boundary. Deuteronomy 2:13-14 identifies the crossing of Zered as the point when the old wilderness generation had fully died out — 38 years after Kadesh-Barnea. The name may derive from a root meaning 'luxuriant growth.'
13. The Arnon River (Wadi Mujib in modern Jordan) is a deep gorge that served as the border between Moab to the south and Amorite territory to the north. Israel positions itself me'ever Arnon (on the far side of the Arnon) — in the wilderness strip emerging from Amorite territory. This geographic precision matters because Israel was forbidden to attack Moab (Deut 2:9).
14. The Sepher Milchamot YHWH (Book of the Wars of the LORD) is a now-lost ancient Israelite text cited here as a geographic/military source. The fragment begins with et-Vahev besuphah — extremely obscure words, possibly a place name 'Wahev in Suphah.' This is one of several lost books referenced in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Book of Jashar, Josh 10:13), demonstrating that biblical authors drew on earlier written sources.
15. The quotation from the lost book continues: eshed hannechalim (the slopes/watershed of the ravines) extends toward shevet Ar (the settlement of Ar — a Moabite city). The fragment describes the Arnon's ravine system near the Moabite border, establishing the geographic context of Israel's approach. The word eshed (slope, outpouring, watershed) occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible.

16. Be'erah means 'to the well' — the place name Be'er (Beer) simply means 'well.' Unlike the earlier water crises at Massah/Meribah (Ex 17, Num 20), this provision comes without complaint or striking a rock. God simply promises: ettenah lahem mayim (I will give them water). The simplicity of the gift contrasts with the previous episodes' conflict.
17. The shirah (song) uses the jussive ali (rise up! spring up!) — a command addressed to the well itself. Enu-lah (sing/respond to it) invites the people into antiphonal celebration. This is one of the few wilderness songs of joy rather than complaint, and one of the oldest poetic fragments in the Torah — a workers' well-digging song transformed into worship.
18. The song celebrates leaders doing manual labor: sarim (princes/leaders) and nedivei ha'am (nobles of the people) dig with a mechoqeq (scepter/ruler's staff) and mish'annotam (their walking staffs). The image of rulers digging with royal implements inverts social expectations. The itinerary resumes: umimmidbar Mattanah (from the wilderness to Mattanah) — the name Mattanah means 'gift,' possibly alluding to the gift of water.
19. The place names form a theologically suggestive sequence: Mattanah ('gift'), Nachali'el ('valley/torrent of God'), Bamot ('high places'). Some rabbinic interpreters read this as an allegory: God's gift (Torah) becomes a torrent of divine wisdom, which then elevates its recipients to the heights. Whether or not the allegory is intended, the etymological progression is striking.
20. The itinerary reaches rosh haPisgah (the peak/head of Pisgah) — the same mountain from which Moses will later view the Promised Land (Deut 3:27, 34:1). It overlooks the Yeshimon (wasteland, desolation) — the barren landscape east of the Dead Sea. The destination foreshadows the narrative's climax: Israel is approaching the land of promise.
21. Israel initiates diplomacy: malakhim (messengers, envoys) are sent to Sichon melek ha'Emori (Sihon king of the Amorites). This parallels the earlier embassy to Edom (20:14), but unlike Edom — whom Israel was forbidden to attack — the Amorites will face military consequences for their refusal. Sihon's kingdom controlled the territory between the Arnon and the Jabbok rivers.
22. The request mirrors the embassy to Edom (20:17) almost verbatim: no trespass into fields or vineyards (sadeh, kerem), no use of local wells (mei ve'er), travel restricted to derekh hammelek (the King's Highway) — a major international trade route running north-south through Transjordan. The appeal promises minimal disruption and complete respect for sovereignty.
23. Sihon's refusal (lo natan — he did not allow/give) escalates to military aggression: vayyeesof (he gathered) his entire army and vayyetse (went out) into the midbar (wilderness) to attack. He comes to Yahtsa (Jahaz), a site later mentioned in the Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone). Sihon initiates the conflict — Israel's subsequent conquest is presented as a defensive response to Amorite aggression.
24. Israel defeats Sihon lefi charev (by the mouth/edge of the sword) and takes possession (vayyirash — dispossessed, inherited) of his territory. The boundaries are precise: from Arnon (southern border, modern Wadi Mujib) to Yabboq (Jabbok, northern border, modern Zarqa River), stopping at the Ammonite frontier. The note ki az gevul benei Ammon (because the Ammonite border was strong/fortified) explains why Israel didn't continue east — Ammon's defenses held, and God had forbidden attacking Ammon (Deut 2:19).
25. Cheshbon (Heshbon, modern Hesban in Jordan) was Sihon's capital city. The phrase bekhol benoteyha (in all its daughters — meaning its satellite towns or dependent villages) uses the common Hebrew metaphor of a capital 'mother city' with smaller 'daughter' settlements. Israel's settlement is immediate — they inhabit the conquered cities rather than destroying them.
26. This historical note explains why the territory between Arnon and Jabbok was Amorite rather than Moabite. Sihon had previously conquered it from melek Mo'av harishon (the former/previous king of Moab). This detail is legally significant: Israel did not take Moabite land (forbidden by God) but Amorite land that Sihon had previously taken from Moab — a chain of conquest that removes any Moabite territorial claim.
27. The moshelim (proverb-speakers, ballad-singers, those who compose mashal — a poetic genre) are cited for an ancient war song. The song appears to have originally celebrated Sihon's conquest of Moab, but is now cited with dramatic irony — Sihon's own victory song becomes the backdrop for his defeat. Bo'u Cheshbon (Come to Heshbon!) was once a triumphant Amorite rallying cry.
28. The ballad describes Sihon's earlier conquest of Moab in military metaphor: esh (fire) and lehavah (flame/blaze) represent his destructive campaign sweeping from Heshbon southward. It consumed Ar Mo'av (Ar of Moab, a major Moabite city) and the ba'alei bamot Arnon (lords/masters of the Arnon heights) — Moabite rulers controlling the high ground along the Arnon ravine.
29. The taunt song mocks Moab's god: am-Kemosh (people of Chemosh — Moab's national deity, known from the Mesha Stele). Chemosh natan (he gave over) his own worshipers — sons as peleitim (refugees, fugitives) and daughters to shevit (captivity). The implication: Chemosh was powerless to protect his people. The song's original purpose was Amorite propaganda; its citation here adds another layer of irony.
30. The song's conclusion is textually difficult: vanniram (we shot/hurled at them) may also be parsed as 'their dominion' (niram — their lamp/dominion has perished). The geographic sweep of destruction runs from Heshbon to Divon (Dibon, the Moabite capital known from the Mesha Stele), to Nophach (Nophah, location uncertain), to Medeva (Medeba, modern Madaba). The song maps Sihon's complete conquest of Moabite territory.
31. A concise summary: vayyeshev Yisra'el be'erets ha'Emori (Israel settled in the land of the Amorites). This land — previously Moabite, then Amorite, now Israelite — will become the inheritance of Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh (Num 32). The chain of possession matters legally and theologically.

32. Moses sends scouts leraggel (to spy out, reconnoiter) Ya'zer (Jazer) — a strategic town. They capture its benoteyha (daughter-towns, satellite settlements) and vayyoresh (dispossessed) the resident Amorites. The ketiv/qere note in the Hebrew — vayyirash/vayyoresh — reflects a textual variant between 'he inherited' and 'he dispossessed,' both from the root y-r-sh which carries both meanings simultaneously.
33. The campaign moves north: derekh haBashan (the road to Bashan — the fertile plateau region of northern Transjordan, modern Golan Heights area). Og melek haBashan — a legendary figure later described as the last of the Rephaim giants (Deut 3:11) — meets them at Edre'i (Edrei, modern Der'a in Syria). Like Sihon, Og initiates the conflict by marching out (vayyetse) to battle.
34. God's command al-tira oto (do not fear him) suggests Og's reputation was genuinely intimidating — a giant king with a powerful army. The perfect tense natatti (I have given — already given) treats the victory as accomplished fact before the battle occurs. The parallel to Sihon (ka'asher asita leSihon — as you did to Sihon) frames the two Transjordan conquests as a matched pair of divine victories.
35. The chapter ends with total victory: vayyakku oto (they struck him down) — Og, his sons (banav), and all his people, ad-bilti hish'ir-lo sarid (until not a survivor remained to him). The verb vayyireshu (they took possession of, they dispossessed) closes the double conquest of Transjordan — Sihon's territory from Arnon to Jabbok, and now Og's Bashan extending further north. Israel enters the Balaam narrative (ch 22) as a military power that has defeated two kings.

Summary: Balak king of Moab, terrified by Israel's victories, sends for Balaam son of Beor — a renowned Mesopotamian diviner — to curse Israel. God tells Balaam not to go; Balak sends more prestigious envoys; God permits the journey but constrains the prophet's words. On the road, Balaam's donkey sees the angel of the LORD blocking the path and speaks in human language. Balaam arrives in Moab, unable to say anything except what God puts in his mouth.

What Makes This Remarkable: The donkey sees what the prophet cannot. The she-donkey (aton) perceives the angel of the LORD three times while Balaam — the professional seer — is blind to the divine presence. When God opens the donkey's mouth (v. 28), she delivers a rebuke more rational than the prophet's behavior. The verb vayyichar af ('his anger burned,' v. 22) describes God's anger at Balaam going — even though God just gave permission (v. 20) — creating a theological tension that drives the narrative.

Translation Friction: Moab's fear is expressed with two verbs: vayyagor ('was terrified') and vayyaqots ('was seized with dread/revulsion,' v. 3). The second verb quts carries physical disgust alongside fear — we rendered it 'seized with dread' to capture the visceral quality. The simile kilcokh hasshor et yereq hassadeh ('as an ox devours the grass of the field,' v. 4) depicts Israel as a grazing animal consuming everything methodically — we kept the image intact.

Connections: Balaam is referenced extensively in later Scripture: Deuteronomy 23:4-5, Joshua 13:22, Micah 6:5, 2 Peter 2:15-16, Jude 11, and Revelation 2:14. Moab's terror at Israel's numbers (v. 3) echoes Pharaoh's fear in Exodus 1:9-12 — the same blessing of abundance that alarmed Egypt now terrifies Moab. The talking donkey narrative has a parallel in the ancient Near Eastern tradition of animals mediating divine messages.

¹The Israelites traveled on and camped in the steppes of Moab, across the Jordan from Jericho. ²Balak son of Zippor saw everything Israel had done to the Amorites. ³Moab was terrified of the people because they were so numerous. Moab was seized with dread because of the Israelites. ⁴Moab said to the elders of Midian, "This horde will now devour everything around us the way an ox devours the grass of a field." Balak son of Zippor was king of Moab at that time. ⁵He sent messengers to Balaam son of Beor at Pethor, which is by the Euphrates River, in the land of his kinsmen, to summon him: "A people has come out of Egypt — they cover the surface of the land and have settled right across from me. ⁶Come now, please — curse this people for me, for they are too powerful for me. Perhaps then I can strike them and drive them from the land. For I know that whoever you bless is blessed, and whoever you curse is cursed." ⁷The elders of Moab and the elders of Midian set out with divination fees in hand. They came to Balaam and delivered Balak's message. ⁸He said to them, "Stay here tonight, and I will give you an answer based on what the LORD tells me." So the Moabite officials stayed with Balaam. ⁹God came to Balaam and said, "Who are these men with you?" ¹⁰Balaam said to God, "Balak son of Zippor, king of Moab, has sent me this message: ¹¹'A people has come out of Egypt, covering the surface of the land. Come now, curse them for me — perhaps then I can fight them and drive them away.'" ¹²God said to Balaam, "You must not go with them. You must not curse the people, for they are blessed." ¹³Balaam rose in the morning and said to Balak's officials, "Go back to your land, for the LORD has refused to let me go with you." ¹⁴The Moabite officials returned to Balak and reported, "Balaam refused to come with us." ¹⁵Balak sent yet another delegation — more officials, and more distinguished than the first. ¹⁶They came to Balaam and said to him, "This is what Balak son of Zippor says: 'Please do not let anything prevent you from coming to me, ¹⁷for I will reward you very richly, and whatever you tell me I will do. Please come and curse this people for me.'" ¹⁸Balaam answered Balak's servants, "Even if Balak were to give me his entire palace full of silver and gold, I could not go beyond the command of the LORD my God to do anything small or great. ¹⁹Now please stay here tonight as well, so I may learn what more the LORD has to say to me." ²⁰God came to Balaam that night and said to him, "Since these men have come to summon you, get up and go with them — but you may only do what I tell you to do." ²¹Balaam rose in the morning, saddled his donkey, and set out with the Moabite officials. ²²God's anger blazed because Balaam was going, and the angel of the LORD positioned himself on the road as an adversary against him. Balaam was riding his donkey, with his two servants alongside him. ²³The donkey saw the angel of the LORD standing on the road with a drawn sword in his hand. The donkey turned off the road and went into the field, so Balaam struck the donkey to turn her back onto the road. ²⁴Then the angel of the LORD stood in a narrow path between vineyards, with a stone wall on either side. ²⁵The donkey saw the angel of the LORD and pressed herself against the wall, crushing Balaam's foot against it. He struck her again. ²⁶The angel of the LORD moved ahead and stood in a narrow place where there was no room to turn right or left. ²⁷The donkey saw the angel of the LORD and lay down under Balaam. Balaam's anger blazed, and he struck the donkey with his staff. ²⁸The LORD opened the donkey's mouth, and she said to Balaam, "What have I done to you that you have struck me three times?" ²⁹Balaam said to the donkey, "Because you have made a fool of me! If I had a sword in my hand, I would kill you right now!" ³⁰The donkey said to Balaam, "Am I not your donkey, the one you have ridden all your life to this day? Have I ever been in the habit of doing this to you?" He said, "No." ³¹Then the LORD opened Balaam's eyes, and he saw the angel of the LORD standing on the road with a drawn sword in his hand. He bowed low and fell on his face. ³²The angel of the LORD said to him, "Why have you struck your donkey three times? I came out as an adversary because your path is reckless before me. ³³The donkey saw me and turned away from me three times. If she had not turned away, I would certainly have killed you by now — and let her live." ³⁴Balaam said to the angel of the LORD, "I have sinned — I did not know you were standing on the road to oppose me. Now if this is wrong in your sight, I will go back." ³⁵The angel of the LORD said to Balaam, "Go with the men, but you may speak only the word I tell you to speak." So Balaam went on with Balak's officials. ³⁶When Balak heard that Balaam had come, he went out to meet him at Ir-moab, on the Arnon border at the edge of the territory. ³⁷Balak said to Balaam, "Did I not send urgently for you? Why didn't you come to me? Am I really unable to reward you?" ³⁸Balaam said to Balak, "I have come to you now, but do I have any power to say just anything? The word that God puts in my mouth — that is what I will speak." ³⁹Balaam traveled with Balak, and they arrived at Kiriath-huzoth. ⁴⁰Balak sacrificed cattle and sheep and sent portions to Balaam and the officials with him. ⁴¹In the morning Balak took Balaam up to Bamoth-baal, and from there he could see the edge of the Israelite camp.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The geographical setting: arvot Mo'av ('steppes of Moab') — the flat plain east of the Jordan River, directly opposite Jericho. Israel has arrived at the threshold of the promised land. This location will be the staging ground for everything from Numbers 22 through Deuteronomy 34: Balaam's oracles, Moses's farewell speeches, and the final preparations for the conquest. The phrase me'ever leYarden Yerecho ('across the Jordan from Jericho') places the reader on the east bank, looking west toward Canaan.
2. Balak is introduced watching: vayyar Balaq ('Balak saw'). He has witnessed Israel's recent military victories over Sihon king of the Amorites and Og king of Bashan (ch 21). The sight terrifies him. Balak is not an aggressor but a frightened neighbor — his response to Israel's military power drives the entire Balaam narrative.
3. Two verbs describe Moab's response: vayyagor ('was terrified') and vayyaqots ('was seized with dread/disgust'). The verb quts carries a sense of revulsion and anxiety — the Israelites' vast numbers produce not just fear but visceral distress. The phrase ki rav-hu ('because they were numerous') echoes Pharaoh's concern in Exodus 1:9 — the same population growth that worried Egypt now terrifies Moab. Israel's blessing (numerical abundance) is perceived as a threat by every neighboring power.

4. Moab seeks an alliance with Midian against the common threat. The vivid simile — kilcokh hasshor et yereq hassadeh ('as an ox licks up the green of the field') — depicts Israel as a grazing animal consuming everything in its path, methodically and unstoppably. The verb lachakh ('to lick up') suggests total consumption — nothing remains. Balak's royal title (melekh leMo'av) is stated as a narrative marker: he is the decision-maker whose fear will drive the plot.
5. Balaam's location: Petorah asher al-hannahar ('Pethor, which is by the River' — the Euphrates). Balaam is a Mesopotamian diviner, not a local practitioner — Balak is importing elite prophetic talent from the ancient Near East's intellectual center. The description of Israel — am yatsa miMitsrayim ('a people came out of Egypt') — correctly identifies Israel's origin. The phrase kissah et-ein ha'arets ('covers the eye/surface of the land') is the same locust-swarm language from Exodus 10:5 — Israel's numbers are described as a plague-level phenomenon.
6. Balak's request is explicit: arah-lli et-ha'am hazzeh ('curse this people for me'). His reasoning is military pragmatism: ki atsum hu mimmenni ('they are too powerful for me') — conventional warfare won't work, so he turns to supernatural means. The crucial admission: yadati et asher-tevarekh mevorakh va'asher ta'or yu'ar ('I know that whoever you bless is blessed, whoever you curse is cursed'). Balak believes Balaam's words carry real power — that prophetic speech can change reality. The irony of the narrative is that Balak is right about the power of prophetic speech, but wrong about who controls it.
7. The delegation carries qesamim beyadam ('divination fees in their hand') — payment for prophetic services. Professional divination was a paid profession throughout the ancient Near East. The joint Moab-Midian embassy reflects the coalition formed in v4. They deliver Balak's words without commentary — the request speaks for itself.
8. Balaam's first response is to consult God — ka'asher yedabber YHWH elay ('as the LORD speaks to me'). Remarkably, a Mesopotamian diviner uses the covenant name YHWH, suggesting some genuine connection to Israel's God. The overnight stay (linu foh hallaylah) is standard for receiving oracles — nocturnal revelation through dreams or visions. Balaam does not simply accept the commission; he defers to divine guidance.
9. God initiates contact: vayyavo Elohim el-Bil'am ('God came to Balaam'). The question mi ha'anashim ha'elleh immakh ('who are these men with you?') is not a request for information — God knows who they are. It is a pedagogical question (like 'Where are you?' in Gen 3:9), designed to make Balaam articulate the situation and its implications. God's engagement with Balaam is direct and personal, despite Balaam being outside the covenant community.
10. Balaam reports accurately: he names the sender (Balak), his title (king of Moab), and will relay the request (v11). His transparency with God is notable — he does not conceal the purpose of the delegation. Whether this reflects genuine piety or the professional diviner's awareness that deception before a deity is futile, the text does not say.
11. Balaam relays Balak's request verbatim — the same language as v5-6 with minor variations. The verb qavah ('to curse' — a different root from arah in v6) and the military purpose (lehillachem bo vegeirashtiv — 'to fight them and drive them away') are faithfully transmitted. Balaam is an honest intermediary, at least in this exchange.
12. God's answer is absolute and gives the reason: lo ta'or et-ha'am ki varukh hu ('you must not curse the people, for they are blessed'). Three elements: prohibition against traveling (lo telekh immahem), prohibition against cursing (lo ta'or), and the reason (ki varukh hu — 'for he/they are blessed'). Israel's blessed status is a settled divine fact, not a negotiable condition. The narrative's entire theology is compressed into three Hebrew words: ki varukh hu. Everything that follows — Balaam's repeated attempts, Balak's escalating frustration — unfolds from this immovable premise.
13. Balaam obeys the divine prohibition — he sends the delegation away. His report is accurate but incomplete: me'en YHWH letitti lahalokh immakhem ('the LORD has refused to let me go with you'). He does not mention that God said the people are blessed — he omits the reason. This selective reporting may indicate that Balaam is hoping for a second chance, or simply that he is being diplomatic. The Moabite officials return empty-handed.
14. The officials' report to Balak is further truncated: me'en Bil'am halokh immanu ('Balaam refused to come with us'). They do not mention the LORD's refusal — only Balaam's. Each retelling loses information. Balak hears 'Balaam refused,' not 'God forbade it.' This misunderstanding fuels Balak's decision to try again with a more impressive delegation (v15).
15. Balak escalates: rabbim venikhbadim me'ellesh ('more numerous and more honored than these'). His logic: perhaps Balaam's refusal was a negotiating tactic — a more prestigious embassy with a larger fee might change his mind. Balak interprets prophetic obedience as commercial gamesmanship. He does not understand that Balaam's refusal was not about price but about divine command.
16. The second delegation carries a more urgent message: al-na timmana mehalokh elay ('please do not be prevented from coming to me'). The verb mana ('to withhold, to prevent') suggests Balak thinks something external is blocking Balaam — perhaps insufficient payment or insufficient honor. Balak cannot conceive that the obstacle is God Himself.
17. Balak's offer escalates: kabbed akhabbedekha me'od ('I will honor you greatly') and vekhlo asher-tomar elay e'eseh ('whatever you say to me I will do'). The blank-check promise — 'whatever you say' — reveals Balak's desperation. He is willing to submit to any demand if Balaam will just come and curse. The irony: Balak offers unlimited human authority to a man who is bound by unlimited divine authority.
18. Balaam's most emphatic refusal — and the statement that defines his dilemma throughout the narrative. The hyperbole melo veito kesef vezahav ('his palace full of silver and gold') dismisses wealth as a factor. The phrase lo ukhal la'avur et-pi YHWH Elohai ('I cannot go beyond the mouth/command of the LORD my God') is absolute. Notably, Balaam calls YHWH 'my God' (Elohai) — a possessive that implies personal relationship, however complicated. The scope — la'asot qetannah o gedolah ('to do anything small or great') — allows no exceptions. Yet Balaam does not send them away; he asks them to stay again (v19).

19. Despite his absolute statement in v18, Balaam invites the second delegation to stay overnight: mah-yosef YHWH dabber immi ('what the LORD may further say to me'). This is the verse that raises questions about Balaam's character: if God already said no (v12), why is Balaam checking again? Is he hoping God will change His mind? Is he attracted to Balak's wealth despite his declaration? The text leaves the ambiguity intact — Balaam's motives remain opaque.
20. God grants conditional permission: qum lekh ittam ('rise, go with them') — but with an absolute restriction: ve'akh et-haddavar asher-adabber elekha oto ta'aseh ('only the word I speak to you — that you shall do'). The permission creates the dramatic tension of chapters 23-24: Balaam goes, but God controls every word he speaks. The condition ve'akh ('but only') is emphatic — a divine leash. Yet God's anger will burn against Balaam for going (v22), creating one of the most debated tensions in the narrative: God says go, then is angry that he went.
21. Balaam departs with perhaps too much eagerness — vayyaqom babboqer ('he rose in the morning'), immediately saddling his donkey. The aton ('she-donkey') will become the narrative's most memorable character. Balaam goes 'with the officials of Moab' (im-sarei Mo'av), fulfilling God's permission but possibly overstepping God's reluctant tone. What follows (v22-35) is the famous donkey episode.
22. The theological crux: vayyichar-af Elohim ki-holekh hu ('God's anger blazed because he was going'). God gave permission in v20; God is angry in v22. The tension is real and intentionally preserved. Possible readings: God permitted the journey but was displeased with Balaam's eagerness, or the permission was a test of Balaam's heart. The mal'akh YHWH ('angel of the LORD') stands lesatan lo ('as an adversary/satan to him') — the word satan here is a common noun meaning 'adversary, opponent,' not a proper name. The angel blocks the road that God permitted Balaam to travel.
23. The narrative's central irony begins: the donkey sees what the professional seer cannot. Vattere ha'aton et-mal'akh YHWH ('the donkey saw the angel of the LORD') — an animal perceives divine reality more clearly than a prophet. The angel holds a drawn sword (charbo shelufah) — a death threat that Balaam is oblivious to. The donkey's detour into the field is an act of self-preservation that saves both her life and Balaam's. Balaam's response — striking the donkey — is the first of three beatings, each escalating in severity.
24. The second encounter: a narrower space. The mishol hakkeramim ('vineyard path') is flanked by walls (gader mizzeh vegader mizzeh — 'a wall on this side and a wall on that side'). The geography tightens — the open field of v23 gives way to a confined lane. The angel's strategy mirrors a military funnel: each position is more restrictive than the last, giving the donkey less room to evade.
25. The donkey's evasion becomes more desperate: vattillachets el-haqqir ('she pressed against the wall'), crushing Balaam's foot. The physical pain Balaam experiences is caused by the donkey's attempt to save his life — he is being hurt by the very act that protects him. Balaam strikes the donkey a second time (vayyosef lehakkotah), escalating the violence against the animal that sees what he cannot.
26. The final position: maqom tsar ('a narrow place') — ein derekh lintot yamin usmol ('no way to turn right or left'). The path has become a dead end. The progression from open road (v23) to walled path (v24) to impassable narrows (v26) mirrors the narrowing of Balaam's options: God is systematically eliminating every escape route except confrontation.
27. With no room to turn, the donkey simply lies down (vattirbbats tachat Bil'am) — a final act of refusal, the only option left. Balaam's anger 'blazes' (vayyichar-af) — the same verb used for God's anger in v22. The prophet's fury mirrors God's fury, but directed at exactly the wrong target. He strikes with a maqqel ('staff') — his third beating, the most violent. The scene reaches maximum tension: an enraged prophet beating a prostrate donkey, both of them between an angel with a drawn sword and the road to Moab.
28. The most extraordinary verse in the chapter: vayyiftach YHWH et-pi ha'aton ('the LORD opened the donkey's mouth'). God, who places words in prophets' mouths (23:5), now places words in a donkey's mouth. The donkey's question is reasonable and pointed: meh-asiti lekha ('what have I done to you?'). She is the injured party — beaten three times (zeh shalosh regalim) for obeying a divine command that her master cannot see. The seer who is supposed to speak for God is now being questioned by his own donkey.
29. Balaam answers the donkey without any apparent surprise that she is speaking — either because the narrator condenses the reaction, or because the exchange happens within a prophetic trance state. His response is irrational: ki hit'allalt bi ('because you have mocked me'). A donkey cannot mock. More critically, Balaam wishes he had a sword (lu yesh-cherrev beyadi) — while an angel stands yards away holding a drawn one. The man who cannot see an armed angel wishes for a weapon to kill his donkey. The irony is devastating.
30. The donkey's argument is logical and devastating: she appeals to their history. Halo anokhi atonekha asher-rakhavta alay me'odekha ad-hayyom hazzeh ('Am I not your donkey, whom you have ridden from the beginning until today?'). A lifetime of faithful service should earn trust — if she is behaving strangely now, perhaps there is a reason. The rhetorical question hahasken hiskanti la'asot lekha koh ('have I ever been in the habit of treating you this way?') demands the answer Balaam gives: lo ('no'). The donkey wins the argument. The prophet who speaks for God has just lost a debate with his own mount.
31. Vayyigal YHWH et-einei Vil'am ('the LORD uncovered Balaam's eyes') — the verb galah ('to uncover, to reveal') means God removed a barrier to sight. The professional seer needed divine intervention to see what his donkey saw naturally. The moment Balaam sees the angel — vecharbo shelufah beyado ('with his drawn sword in his hand') — he understands that his life was in danger and his donkey saved it. He collapses: vayyiqqod vayyishtachu le'appav ('he bowed and prostrated himself on his face'). The man who beat his donkey for lying down now lies on the ground himself.
32. The angel echoes the donkey's question: al-mah hikkita et-atonekha ('why have you struck your donkey?'). The divine messenger validates the animal's complaint. The reason for the angel's opposition: ki-yarat hadderekh lenegdi ('because the road is reckless/perverse before me'). The verb yarat is rare and debated — it may mean 'reckless,' 'precipitous,' or 'contrary.' Whatever Balaam's stated compliance with God's will, something about his journey is wrong in the angel's assessment.

33. The angel's verdict is stark: the donkey saved Balaam's life. Ki attah gam-otkha haragti ve'otah hecheyeti ('by now I would have killed you and let her live'). The reversal is complete: the animal Balaam wanted to kill (v29) is the one who preserved his life, and the prophet who thought he was in control was moments from death. The angel would have killed the seer and spared the donkey — a humiliation without parallel in prophetic literature.
34. Balaam confesses: chatati ('I have sinned'). His defense is ignorance: lo yadati ('I did not know'). The offer to return — ashuva li ('I will go back') — is conditional: im ra be'einekha ('if it is wrong in your sight'). The conditionality suggests Balaam is still not entirely certain he should abandon the journey. His confession is genuine but tentative — he admits error while leaving the door open to continue.
35. The angel repeats God's condition from v20 almost verbatim: ve'efes et-haddavar asher-adabber elekha oto tedabber ('only the word I speak to you — that you shall speak'). The journey continues under divine constraint. The donkey episode has not changed the destination but has recalibrated Balaam's understanding: he now knows that invisible divine forces surround him, that his sight is limited, and that even his donkey perceives more than he does. He proceeds to Moab chastened.
36. Balak goes to the border to meet Balaam personally — a mark of the honor he promised (v17). The location — Ir Mo'av ('city of Moab') at the Arnon border — is the frontier of Moabite territory, the closest point to where Balaam would arrive from the north. Balak's eagerness to meet Balaam at the border underscores how desperately he needs the seer's services.
37. Balak's greeting is a rebuke: lammah lo-halakhta elay ('why didn't you come to me?'). He interprets Balaam's initial refusal as an insult. The question ha'umnam lo ukhal kabbedekha ('am I really unable to honor you?') challenges Balaam's assessment of Moabite wealth and prestige. Balak assumes the refusal was about money or honor — he cannot fathom that a prophet might answer to a higher authority than a king.
38. Balaam's first words to Balak establish the terms: hayakhol ukhal dabber me'umah ('can I really speak anything at all?'). The question is rhetorical — no, he cannot speak freely. The declaration haddavar asher yasim Elohim befi oto adabber ('the word God puts in my mouth, that I will speak') previews exactly what will happen in chapters 23-24. Balaam warns Balak from the outset: what comes out of my mouth is not under my control. Balak either does not hear the warning or chooses to ignore it.
39. They travel together to Qiryat-Chutsot ('city of streets/plazas') — a Moabite city whose exact location is unknown. The brief verse moves the action from the border to the interior, setting the stage for the sacrificial preparations and oracles of chapter 23.
40. Balak offers a welcoming sacrifice — vayyizbbach Balaq baqar vatson ('Balak slaughtered cattle and sheep'). This is a hospitality feast, not the divination sacrifices of 23:1-2. Sending portions (vayyeshallach) to Balaam and the officials is a customary gesture of honor. Balak continues to treat Balaam with the deference promised in v17. The lavish welcome makes the upcoming oracles — all blessings instead of curses — even more devastating for Balak.
41. The chapter closes at Bamot-Ba'al ('high places of Baal') — a Moabite worship site dedicated to Ba'al. Balak positions Balaam at a pagan shrine overlooking the Israelite camp: vayyar misham qetseh ha'am ('from there he could see the edge of the people'). Only the edge — Balak's strategy of partial viewing (23:13) begins here. The stage is set for the first oracle. Everything — the hired seer, the elaborate offerings, the strategic vantage point — is in place. And every bit of it will fail to produce the curse Balak desperately needs.

23

Summary: Balaam delivers his first two oracles. Despite elaborate sacrificial preparations on seven altars — Mesopotamian divination custom, not Israelite practice — Balaam cannot curse Israel. His first oracle declares Israel a people dwelling apart; his second announces that God sees no guilt in Israel and that what God has blessed cannot be reversed. Balak, furious, takes Balaam to a new vantage point for another attempt.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The irony is structural: Balak pays for premium prophetic service — fourteen animals across seven altars — yet the seer cannot deliver the product. Balaam's admission ulay yiqqareh YHWH liqrati ('perhaps the LORD will come to meet me,' v. 3) reveals that he does not control when or whether God speaks. The second oracle contains the remarkable declaration: lo hibbith aven beYa'aqov ('He has not beheld iniquity in Jacob,' v. 21) — God sees Israel through the lens of covenant, not current behavior.*

Translation Friction: *Balaam's oracles are Hebrew poetry, and we rendered them with line breaks to preserve the parallelism visible in the mashal ('oracle, parable') form. The verb qarah ('to happen upon, encounter by chance,' v. 3) for God's meeting with Balaam suggests the seer cannot summon the divine at will — we chose 'met' rather than 'appeared to' to preserve the unexpected quality. The difficult phrase teru'at melekh bo ('the shout of a king among them,' v. 21) may refer to God as king or to a future human king.*

Connections: The declaration 'God is not a man that He should lie' (v. 19) is quoted and echoed in 1 Samuel 15:29. The 'people dwelling apart' (v. 9) echoes Deuteronomy 33:28. Balaam's involuntary blessing ironically fulfills God's promise to Abraham: 'I will bless those who bless you and curse those who curse you' (Genesis 12:3).

¹Balaam said to Balak, "Build me seven altars here, and prepare seven bulls and seven rams for me." ²Balak did as Balaam said, and Balak and Balaam offered a bull and a ram on each altar. ³Balaam told Balak, "Stand beside your burnt offering while I go. Perhaps the LORD will come to meet me, and whatever He reveals to me I will report to you." He went off to a barren height. ⁴God met Balaam, and Balaam said to Him, "I have arranged seven altars and offered a bull and a ram on each altar." ⁵The LORD placed a word in Balaam's mouth and said, "Return to Balak and speak exactly this." ⁶He returned to Balak, who was standing beside his burnt offering with all the Moabite officials.

⁷He took up his oracle and said:
 "From Aram, Balak brought me — the king of Moab, from the eastern mountains:
 'Come, curse Jacob for me!
 Come, denounce Israel!'

⁸How can I curse whom God has not cursed?
 How can I denounce whom the LORD has not denounced?

⁹From the rocky heights I see them, from the hills I gaze upon them:
 a people that dwells apart,
 not counting itself among the nations.

¹⁰Who can count the dust of Jacob or number even a fourth of Israel?
 Let me die the death of the upright —
 let my end be like theirs!"

¹¹Balak said to Balaam, "What have you done to me? I brought you to curse my enemies, and instead you have blessed them!" ¹²He answered, "Must I not take care to speak exactly what the LORD puts in my mouth?" ¹³Balak said to him, "Please come with me to another place where you can see them — you will see only part of them, not all of them — and curse them for me from there." ¹⁴He took him to the field of Zophim, on top of Pisgah, built seven altars, and offered a bull and a ram on each altar. ¹⁵He said to Balak, "Stand here beside your burnt offering while I go to seek an encounter over there." ¹⁶The LORD met Balaam and placed a word in his mouth, saying, "Return to Balak and speak exactly this." ¹⁷He came to Balak, who was standing beside his burnt offering with the Moabite officials. Balak asked him, "What did the LORD say?"

¹⁸He took up his oracle and said:
 "Rise up, Balak, and listen!
 Give ear to me, son of Zippor.

¹⁹God is not a human being, that He should lie, nor a mortal, that He should change His mind.
 Has He spoken and will He not act?
 Has He promised and will He not fulfill it?

²⁰I received a command to bless —
 He has blessed, and I cannot reverse it.

²¹He has seen no guilt in Jacob,
no misery in Israel.
The LORD their God is with them — the acclamation of a king is among them!

²²God who brought them out of Egypt —
He has the strength of a wild ox.

²³For there is no omen against Jacob,
no divination against Israel.
In due time it will be said of Jacob and Israel:
'See what God has done!'

²⁴See — a people that rises like a lioness, that lifts itself like a lion!
It will not lie down until it has devoured its prey and drunk the blood of the slain."

²⁵Balak said to Balaam, "If you will not curse them, at least do not bless them!" ²⁶Balaam answered Balak, "Did I not tell you: everything the LORD speaks, that is what I must do?" ²⁷Balak said to Balaam, "Come now, let me take you to yet another place. Perhaps it will be right in God's sight for you to curse them for me from there." ²⁸Balak took Balaam to the top of Peor, which overlooks the wasteland. ²⁹Balaam said to Balak, "Build me seven altars here, and prepare seven bulls and seven rams for me." ³⁰Balak did as Balaam said and offered a bull and a ram on each altar.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Seven altars, seven bulls, seven rams — the number of completeness applied three times. Balaam's ritual preparation is elaborate and expensive, befitting a high-stakes divination attempt. The seven-fold offering is not Israelite practice (Israel uses one altar); it reflects Mesopotamian divination customs where the seer creates optimal conditions for receiving an oracle. Balak is paying for premium prophetic service.
2. Both king and prophet participate in the offering — Balak is not a passive client but an active co-officiant. The phrase par va'ayil bammizbeach ('a bull and a ram on each altar') means fourteen animals total across seven altars. The extravagance is deliberate: Balak believes that the size of the offering might influence the outcome. The narrative will demonstrate otherwise.
3. Balaam's uncertainty is telling: ulay yiqqareh YHWH liqrati ('perhaps the LORD will come to meet me'). The verb qarah ('to happen upon, to encounter by chance') suggests Balaam does not control when or whether God speaks — he can only position himself to receive. He goes to a shefi ('barren height, bare hilltop') — an elevated, isolated location favorable for prophetic encounter. Balak must stay with the offerings while Balaam seeks the oracle alone.
4. God meets Balaam (vayyiqqar Elohim el-Bil'am) — the verb qarah implies God initiated the encounter, not Balaam's technique. Balaam's first words to God are a report of his ritual preparations: 'I have arranged seven altars.' The statement reads almost like an invoice — Balaam is telling God what he has done to merit a response. The irony is sharp: Balaam treats God as a deity who can be influenced by the size of the sacrifice, but the God of Israel does not work that way.
5. The mechanism of prophetic inspiration: vayyasem YHWH davar befi Bil'am ('the LORD placed a word in Balaam's mouth'). God does not give Balaam a general message to paraphrase — He puts specific words in his mouth. Balaam becomes a vessel, not a composer. The command vekho tedabber ('and thus you shall speak') leaves no room for editorial revision. What Balaam says next (v7-10) is God's oracle, not Balaam's composition.
6. Balak has obeyed — hinneh nitsav al-olato ('there he was, standing beside his burnt offering'). The Moabite officials (sarei Mo'av) are present as witnesses, expecting to hear the curse they commissioned. The stage is set for Balaam's first oracle, with the full Moabite leadership assembled to hear what they believe will be Israel's condemnation.
7. The first oracle opens in poetry with Balaam's geographic origin: min-Aram ('from Aram,' the Syrian region) and meharrei-qedem ('from the eastern mountains'). He establishes that he was hired: Balak brought him specifically to curse (arah) and denounce (zo'amah). The parallel structure — Jacob/Israel, curse/denounce — uses the two names for the patriarch/nation to fill both lines. The oracle is rendered as poetry with line breaks preserving the Hebrew parallelism.
8. The oracle's thesis: Balaam cannot curse what God has blessed. The rhetorical questions — mah eqqov lo qabbo El ('how can I curse what God has not cursed?') — state the impossibility. A human seer's words have no power against God's prior determination. The verse establishes a fundamental biblical principle: no curse pronounced by any power can override God's blessing. The parallelism pairs God (El) with the LORD (YHWH), using both divine names.

9. Balaam sees Israel from above — mero'sh tsurim ('from the top of the rocks') — his elevated prophetic vantage point. What he sees defines Israel's fundamental character: am levadad yishkon ('a people that dwells apart'). Israel's separateness is not accidental but constitutional — they are distinct from the nations by divine design. The phrase uvagoyim lo yitchashav ('among the nations it does not reckon itself') asserts that Israel cannot be evaluated by the categories applied to other peoples. Their identity is unique.
10. The first oracle culminates in Balaam's personal wish: tamot nafshi mot yesharim ('let me die the death of the upright'). The pagan seer, looking at Israel's blessed multitude, wants to share their destiny. The 'dust of Jacob' (afar Ya'aqov) echoes the Abrahamic promise of Genesis 13:16 ('I will make your offspring like the dust of the earth'). Balaam unknowingly confirms the patriarchal covenant. The word yesharim ('upright ones') may be a wordplay on Yisra'el — both share the root y-sh-r. Balaam's wish to die as one of them is the deepest possible endorsement from an outsider.
11. Balak's outrage: meh asita li ('what have you done to me?'). The contrast between intention (laqov oyevay — 'to curse my enemies') and outcome (hinneh berakhta varekh — 'you have blessed with blessing') is stark. The infinitive absolute berakhta varekh intensifies the blessing — not merely a failure to curse but an emphatic, thorough blessing. Balak is paying for a weapon and receiving a benediction.
12. Balaam's defense is simple and consistent: he can only say what God gives him to say. The phrase et asher yasim YHWH befi oto eshmo ledabber ('what the LORD places in my mouth, that I must take care to speak') — the verb shamar ('to keep, to guard') means he guards God's words as a sacred trust. Balaam is compelled — not by professional ethics but by divine power — to speak only truth.
13. Balak's reasoning is superstitious: perhaps seeing only part of Israel (efes qatsehu tir'eh — 'only their edge you will see') will make them appear smaller and more vulnerable, enabling a curse. The attempt to manipulate the oracle by changing the vantage point reveals Balak's fundamental misunderstanding: he thinks Balaam's problem is technique, not theology. The issue is not where Balaam stands but what God has decided.
14. A new location: sedeh Tsofim ('field of the watchers/lookouts') on top of Pisgah — the same mountain range where Moses will later see the promised land and die (Deut 34:1). The identical offering — seven altars, seven bulls, seven rams — shows Balak repeating the same expensive ritual, hoping for a different result. The narrative builds through repetition: same setup, different location, same divine outcome.
15. The same instruction as v3 — Balak stays with the offering while Balaam seeks God. The verb iqqareh ('I will seek an encounter') is from the same root qarah as in v3 and 4 — the language of uncertain, sought-for divine meeting. Balaam does not command God's appearance; he positions himself and waits.
16. Identical to v5: God meets Balaam, places words in his mouth, and sends him back. The repetition reinforces the pattern: the procedure does not change God's message. Different altars, different location, same divine instruction. The oracle that follows (v18-24) will be an even more emphatic blessing than the first.
17. Balak's question — mah-dibber YHWH ('what did the LORD speak?') — acknowledges, perhaps inadvertently, that it is YHWH who speaks, not Balaam. Even the Moabite king uses Israel's covenant name for God. The Moabite officials are again present as witnesses — they will hear the second blessing along with Balak.
18. The second oracle opens with a direct command to the king: qum Balaq ushma ('rise up, Balak, and listen!'). The imperatives are forceful — Balaam is not asking permission but commanding attention. The shift in tone from v7's third-person introduction ('Balak brought me from Aram') to v18's second-person address ('Rise up, Balak') signals escalation. Balaam now speaks to Balak's face with prophetic authority, not diplomatic courtesy.
19. One of the most quoted verses in the Hebrew Bible on divine faithfulness. The declaration lo ish El vikhazzev ('God is not a man, that He should lie') establishes absolute divine reliability. The verb nacham ('change His mind, repent, relent') is denied of God here — though elsewhere God does 'relent' (e.g., Exod 32:14, Jonah 3:10). The tension is genuine: God's character is unchanging, but His responses to human repentance are flexible. Here the point is specific: God has blessed Israel, and no human scheme will make Him reverse that blessing.
20. Balaam's admission: hinneh varekh laqachti ('I received [a command] to bless'). The verb laqach ('to receive, to take') frames the blessing as something given to Balaam, not something he chose. The concluding declaration — uvarekh velo ashivennah ('He has blessed, and I cannot reverse it') — states the irreversibility of divine blessing. No human prophet, regardless of their skill or desire, can undo what God has done.
21. A theologically dense verse. Lo-hibbit aven beYa'aqov ('He has not beheld iniquity in Jacob') — does this mean Israel is sinless, or that God chooses not to hold their sin against them? The latter reading fits the context: God has decided to bless, and blessing overrides judgment. The phrase teru'at melekh bo ('the shout/acclamation of a king is among them') may refer to God as king (the royal shout of a divine sovereign) or anticipate the future human monarchy. YHWH Elohav immo ('the LORD their God is with them') — the simplest and most powerful statement: God is present among His people. That presence is the ground of everything.
22. The exodus reference: El motsi'am miMitsrayim ('God who brought them out of Egypt'). This phrase appears in both the second oracle (here) and the third (24:8) — the exodus is the defining event that Balaam keeps returning to. The re'em ('wild ox,' not 'unicorn' as in KJV) represents untamable power. The KJV's 'unicorn' reflects the LXX translation (monokeros) but the Hebrew refers to the now-extinct aurochs, a massive wild bovine.
23. The verse strikes at the heart of Balak's scheme: lo-nachash beYa'aqov velo-qesem beYisra'el ('no omen against Jacob, no divination against Israel'). The very practice Balak hired Balaam to perform — divination against Israel — is declared impossible. Israel is immune to sorcery because God is with them (v21). The closing exclamation — mah-pa'al El ('what has God done!') — shifts from curse to wonder. Instead of asking 'what can be done to Israel?', the nations will ask 'what has God done for Israel!'

24. The second oracle closes with the lion image, echoing the first oracle's closing wish (v10) and the parallel in 24:9. Two lion words: lavi ('lioness') and ari ('lion') — the pairing emphasizes both ferocity and nurturing protectiveness. The violent imagery — 'devour prey, drink blood' — describes military invincibility. Israel resting is Israel victorious: lo yishkav ad-yokhal teref ('it will not lie down until it has consumed its prey'). The nation personified as a lion that cannot be put to rest until its work is complete.
25. Balak's desperate compromise: gam-qov lo tiqqovennu gam-barekh lo tevarekhennu ('neither curse them at all, nor bless them at all'). Having failed to get a curse twice, Balak settles for neutrality — at least stop blessing them! The request reveals his diminished expectations: from 'curse my enemies' (v11) to 'please stop helping them.' Balaam's response (v26) will reject even this reduced request.
26. Balaam repeats his consistent position: kol asher-yedabber YHWH oto e'eseh ('everything the LORD speaks, that I must do'). The seer cannot choose silence when God chooses speech. He is a channel, not a filter. Balak's request for neutrality is as impossible as his request for a curse — Balaam speaks what God gives him, whether blessing, curse, or nothing.
27. Balak's persistence is remarkable — and foolish. After two failed attempts, he tries a third: ulay yishar be'einei ha'Elohim ('perhaps it will be right in God's sight'). The word ulay ('perhaps') reveals that even Balak now has doubts. Yet he cannot accept defeat. The phrase 'right in God's sight' is ironic — Balak is asking whether God might approve the very thing God has twice refused. The narrative's comedy deepens with each repetition.
28. The third location: ro'sh haPe'or ('the top of Peor') — a mountain associated with the Moabite deity Baal-Peor. The location hannishqaf al-penei haYeshimon ('overlooking the wasteland/desert') provides another vantage point over the Israelite camp. Peor will become infamous: it is here that Israel will later fall into apostasy with Moabite women and worship Baal-Peor (ch 25). The place name carries a dark foreshadowing that the blessing oracles cannot prevent.
29. Verbatim repetition of v1 — the same instruction, the same numbers, the third time. The ritual rigidity contrasts with its total ineffectiveness: the offerings have not influenced God's oracle at any point. The repetition makes the narrative's point through structure: no amount of ritual manipulation can change what God has determined. The third attempt will produce the third blessing (ch 24), and Balaam will finally abandon his divination techniques entirely (24:1).
30. The chapter closes mid-ritual: Balak offers again, and the oracle that will follow (24:1-9) is the third and most elaborate blessing. The chapter's structure — two complete oracle cycles (v1-10 and v13-24) with the setup for a third (v27-30) — creates a rhythm of escalating divine endorsement. Each time Balak tries to curse, the blessing grows stronger. The narrative demonstrates that human opposition to God's purposes does not merely fail — it produces the opposite of what was intended.

Summary: Balaam abandons his divination techniques and, under the Spirit of God, delivers his third and fourth oracles. The third oracle blesses Israel's beauty and prosperity with the famous line 'How beautiful are your tents, O Jacob.' The fourth oracle prophesies a future royal figure — 'a star from Jacob, a scepter from Israel' — who will crush Moab and Edom. Balaam then delivers brief oracles against surrounding nations before departing.

What Makes This Remarkable: A pagan seer, fully co-opted by Israel's God, delivers the most messianic prophecy in the book. The phrase darakh kokhav miYa'aqov ('a star shall march from Jacob,' v. 17) and vegam shevet miYisra'el ('a scepter shall rise from Israel') point beyond any immediate fulfillment. Balaam sees all this as haggever shetum ha'ayin ('the man whose eye is opened/uncovered,' v. 3) — whether his eyes are opened to see what others cannot, or closed in ecstatic trance, the text leaves ambiguous.

Translation Friction: The term shetum ha'ayin (v. 3) has been debated since antiquity — does it mean 'opened' or 'closed'? Both readings fit a prophet receiving supernatural sight. We rendered 'whose eye is opened' following the majority tradition, while noting the alternative. The ne'um ('utterance') formula at the oracle openings (vv. 3, 15) is a prophetic technical term usually reserved for God's own speech — Balaam uses it for himself, an extraordinary claim for a non-Israelite.

Connections: The star-and-scepter prophecy (v. 17) was applied to David by early Jewish interpretation, to Bar Kokhba in the second century CE, and to Christ in Christian tradition (cf. Matthew 2:2, Revelation 22:16). The title Shaddai ('Almighty,' v. 4) is the patriarchal divine name from Genesis 17:1 and Exodus 6:3. The 'ships from Kittim' oracle (v. 24) may anticipate Greek or Roman power, connecting to Daniel 11:30.

¹When Balaam saw that it pleased the LORD to bless Israel, he did not go as before to seek omens but turned his face toward the wilderness. ²Balaam raised his eyes and saw Israel encamped tribe by tribe, and the Spirit of God came upon him.

³He took up his oracle and said:

"The utterance of Balaam son of Beor,
the utterance of the man whose eye is opened,

⁴the utterance of one who hears the words of God,
who sees the vision of the Almighty,
falling down with eyes unveiled:

⁵How beautiful are your tents, O Jacob — your dwelling places, O Israel!

⁶Like valleys that stretch out, like gardens beside a river,
like aloe trees the LORD has planted, like cedars beside the waters.

⁷Water shall flow from his buckets,
his seed planted by abundant waters.
His king shall rise higher than Agag, and his kingdom shall be exalted.

⁸God who brought him out of Egypt —
He has the strength of a wild ox.
He devours hostile nations, crushing their bones,
piercing them with his arrows.

⁹He crouches, he lies down like a lion — like a lioness, who dares rouse him?
Blessed are those who bless you;
cursed are those who curse you.

¹⁰Balak's anger blazed against Balaam. He struck his hands together and said to Balaam, "I summoned you to curse my enemies, and instead you have blessed them — three times now! ¹¹Now flee to your own place! I intended to reward you richly, but the LORD has denied you any reward." ¹²Balaam replied to Balak, "Did I not tell your messengers whom you sent to me: ¹³'Even if Balak were to give me his entire palace filled with silver and gold, I could not go beyond the LORD's command to do anything good or bad on my own initiative. What the LORD speaks — that is what I will speak.' ¹⁴Now I am going back to my people, but first let me warn you what this people will do to your people in the days to come."

¹⁵He took up his oracle and said:

"The utterance of Balaam son of Beor,
the utterance of the man whose eye is opened,

¹⁶the utterance of one who hears the words of God, who knows the knowledge of the Most High,
who sees the vision of the Almighty,
falling down with eyes unveiled:

¹⁷I see him — but not now.
 I behold him — but not near.
 A star shall rise from Jacob,
 a scepter shall emerge from Israel.
 He shall crush the forehead of Moab and shatter all the sons of Seth.

¹⁸Edom shall become a possession;
 Seir shall become a possession — his enemies —
 while Israel acts with strength.

¹⁹A ruler shall come from Jacob and destroy the survivors of the city.

²⁰He looked toward Amalek and took up his oracle:
 "Amalek was first among the nations, but his end is destruction forever."

²¹He looked toward the Kenites and took up his oracle:
 "Secure is your dwelling place,
 your nest set in the rock.

²²Yet Cain shall be consumed —
 how long until Asshur takes you captive?"

²³He took up his oracle and said:
 "Alas! Who can survive when God does this?"

²⁴Ships shall come from the coast of Kittim —
 they shall afflict Asshur, they shall afflict Eber.
 But he too shall perish forever."

²⁵Balaam rose, departed, and returned to his place. And Balak also went on his way.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. A turning point: Balaam abandons his divination techniques (lo halakh kefa'am-befa'am liqrat nechashim — 'he did not go as other times to meet omens'). In chapters 22-23, Balaam attempted his standard prophetic methodology; now he surrenders to the Spirit directly (v2). Turning toward the wilderness (vayyashet el-hamidbar panav) — he faces the Israelite camp spread out below, and the Spirit of God falls on him. The pagan seer becomes an involuntary channel for Israel's God.
2. The Spirit of God (ruach Elohim) descends on a non-Israelite prophet — one of the few times in the Hebrew Bible that God's Spirit empowers someone outside the covenant community. The sight that triggers the oracle is Israel shokhein lishvatav ('dwelling by their tribes') — the orderly camp arrangement described in Numbers 2. Balaam sees Israel as God sees them: organized, beautiful, blessed. What follows (v3-9) is his third oracle, the most elaborate and poetic of the four.
3. The mashal ('oracle, parable, prophetic poem') opens with a formal self-identification: ne'um Bil'am beno Ve'or ('the utterance of Balaam son of Beor'). The phrase hagever shetum ha'ayin ('the man whose eye is opened/uncovered') is debated — shetum may mean 'opened' (seeing what others cannot) or 'closed' (eyes shut in ecstatic trance, seeing only with inner vision). Both readings fit a prophet who receives supernatural sight. The oracle is poetry — rendered with line breaks to preserve the Hebrew parallelism.
4. Balaam claims four prophetic credentials: hearing God's words (shomea imrei-El), seeing the Almighty's vision (machazeh Shaddai yechezeh), falling down (nofel — in ecstatic prostration), and having unveiled eyes (gelui einayim). The title Shaddai ('Almighty') is the patriarchal divine name (Gen 17:1, Exod 6:3). Balaam, the Mesopotamian seer, uses Israel's ancestral name for God — he has been fully co-opted by the deity he was hired to oppose.

5. Mah-tovu ohalekha Ya'aqov ('How beautiful are your tents, O Jacob') — this verse became one of the most beloved lines in Jewish liturgy, recited upon entering a synagogue. The parallelism pairs tents (ohalim) with dwelling places (mishkenot) and Jacob with Israel — the two names for the patriarch and the nation. Balaam, hired to curse, cannot stop praising. The beauty he sees is the ordered encampment (v2), but the word mishkenot also echoes mishkan ('tabernacle') — Israel's tents surround God's dwelling, and their arrangement itself is beautiful.
6. Four nature similes describe Israel's beauty and vitality: valleys (nechalim — wadis, lush stream beds), gardens (gannot — irrigated plots), aloe trees (ahalim — fragrant aromatic trees, possibly eaglewood), and cedars (arazim — the strongest, tallest trees of the ancient Near East). The images progress from passive beauty (valleys, gardens) to intentional planting — 'aloe trees the LORD has planted' (nata YHWH). Israel's flourishing is not natural growth but divine cultivation. The poetry is lush, abundant, and water-saturated — the opposite of the wilderness surrounding the camp.
7. The oracle shifts from beauty to power. Water flowing from buckets (yizzal-mayim middalyav) — agricultural abundance, overflowing provision. 'His king shall rise higher than Agag' (veyarom me'Agag malko) is a specific prediction: Agag was the Amalekite king whom Saul would later defeat (1 Sam 15). The oracle looks forward to Israel's monarchy — remarkable, since Israel has no king at this point. Balaam prophesies a future political reality that will not emerge for centuries.
8. The exodus reference anchors Israel's military power in divine deliverance — El motsi'o miMitsrayim ('God who brought him out of Egypt'). The re'em ('wild ox,' not 'unicorn' as in KJV) symbolizes untamable strength. Three violent verbs follow: yokhal ('devour'), yegarem ('crush bones'), and yimchats ('pierce/shatter'). Balaam describes Israel not as a peaceful garden (v6) but as a fearsome predator. Both images are true simultaneously: Israel is beautiful in rest and devastating in war.
9. The lion image echoes Jacob's blessing over Judah (Gen 49:9) — the same verbs (kara, shakhav) and the same rhetorical question ('who dares rouse him?'). The oracle closes with the Abrahamic formula: mevarkhekha varukh ve'orerekha arur ('those who bless you are blessed; those who curse you are cursed'). This is Genesis 12:3 spoken by a non-Israelite prophet over the nation Abraham fathered. Balaam, hired to curse, concludes by invoking the curse on anyone who curses Israel — including, potentially, himself and his employer Balak.
10. Balak's fury is physical: vayyisppoq et-kappav ('he struck his hands together') — a gesture of rage and frustration. The complaint is pointed: laqov oyevay qeratikha ('to curse my enemies I called you'). Three attempted curses, three blessings instead. The irony is complete: the more Balak tries to manipulate divine power against Israel, the more powerfully Israel is blessed. The narrative demonstrates that God's blessing cannot be purchased, reversed, or redirected by human scheming.
11. Balak dismisses Balaam with contempt: berach-lekha el-meqomekha ('flee to your place'). The verb barach ('flee') is deliberately insulting — not 'go home' but 'run away.' The ironic reversal: Balak blames the LORD for withholding honor from Balaam (mena'akha YHWH mikkavod). Balak recognizes — even in his fury — that the LORD is the one controlling the outcome. He does not accuse Balaam of incompetence but of being overruled by a God more powerful than his sorcery.
12. Balaam reminds Balak of his original warning (22:18) — he told the messengers from the beginning that he could only speak what God authorized. His defense is consistent: he never promised to curse Israel; he only promised to speak what God gave him. The seer's integrity in this moment is genuine, whatever his motives may have been.
13. The 'palace full of silver and gold' (melo veito kesef vezahav) is hyperbolic — no amount of wealth can purchase a deviation from God's word. The phrase la'avor et-pi YHWH ('to go beyond the LORD's command,' literally 'to cross the mouth of the LORD') treats God's word as a boundary that cannot be transgressed. Balaam's statement of submission — asher-yedabber YHWH oto adabber ('what the LORD speaks, that I will speak') — is ironically one of the purest expressions of prophetic faithfulness in the Hebrew Bible, spoken by a pagan diviner.
14. Before departing, Balaam offers an unsolicited final oracle — not about what Balak can do to Israel but what Israel will do to Balak's people. The phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days / in the days to come') introduces an eschatological horizon: Balaam sees beyond the immediate situation into the distant future. What follows (v15-24) is the fourth and final oracle — the most messianic of the four, containing the famous 'star from Jacob' prophecy.
15. The fourth oracle opens with the identical self-identification as the third (v3). The repetition of the prophetic formula frames both oracles as a matched pair — the third blessing Israel's present, the fourth prophesying Israel's future.
16. The fourth oracle's introduction adds to the third's: veyodea da'at Elyon ('who knows the knowledge of the Most High'). The title Elyon ('Most High') is the supreme divine epithet — used by Melchizedek (Gen 14:18-20) and throughout the Psalms. Balaam now claims knowledge not just of God's words but of God's own knowledge. The escalation of prophetic authority matches the escalation of the oracle's content.
17. Er'ennu velo attah ('I see him, but not now') — the prophetic vision reaches into the distant future. The verb darakh ('tread, march, arise') applied to a kokhav ('star') creates a dynamic image: the star does not merely appear but marches forth like a warrior. The shevet ('scepter') is the symbol of royal authority (Gen 49:10). Moab (Balak's own nation) is named first among the victims — the very king who hired Balaam will see his descendants crushed by the ruler Balaam prophesies. The phrase kol-benei-Shet ('all the sons of Seth') may refer to Moabite clans or, if Seth is Adam's son (Gen 4:25), to all humanity — the ruler's dominion extends over every people.
18. Edom and Seir (the same territory, east and south of the Dead Sea) become Israel's possession. David will later conquer Edom (2 Sam 8:14), partially fulfilling this oracle. The phrase veYisra'el oseh chayil ('Israel acts with strength/valor') describes military effectiveness — Israel is not merely defended but victorious. The oracle envisions Israel as the dominant regional power.

- 19. The final line of the third oracle's content: veyerd miYa'aqov ('one shall rule from Jacob'). The verb radah ('to rule, to have dominion') echoes the creation mandate of Genesis 1:28. The Israelite ruler will exercise dominion, and no remnant (sarid) of the enemy city will survive. The completeness of the victory matches the completeness of the blessing — God's purposes through Israel are total.
- 20. A brief oracle against Amalek, Israel's perennial enemy (Exod 17:8-16). Reshit goyim Amaleq ('first among the nations, Amalek') may mean 'first to attack Israel' (Exod 17) or 'greatest of nations' in military power. Either way, the verdict is identical: ve'acharito adei oved ('his end is everlasting destruction'). The oracle against Amalek fulfills God's declaration in Exodus 17:14: 'I will utterly blot out the remembrance of Amalek from under heaven.'
- 21. The Kenites (Qaini) — the clan of Moses's father-in-law Jethro (Judg 1:16) — receive a brief oracle playing on their name: Qaini/qinnekh ('Kenite/your nest'). Their habitation is eitan ('enduring, secure') and set basela ('in the rock'). The Kenites' alliance with Israel (through the Jethro connection) provides them security.
- 22. The oracle turns ominous: even the secure Kenites will eventually face destruction. Qayin (Cain/Kenite) will be consumed (leva'er — 'to burn, to consume'). The reference to Asshur ('Assyria') projects far into the future — Assyrian deportations in the 8th century BCE. The rhetorical question ad-mah Asshur tishbekka ('how long until Assyria carries you captive?') implies inevitability with uncertain timing.
- 23. A cry of anguish: oy mi yichyeh missumo El ('Alas, who will live when God ordains this!'). Balaam's final oracles move from Israel's blessing to the nations' destruction, and the seer himself recoils at the devastation he foresees. The exclamation oy ('alas, woe') is rare in prophetic speech and conveys genuine distress. Even Balaam, who serves no covenant, recognizes the terrible weight of God's plans.
- 24. The most distant and obscure of Balaam's oracles: ships from Kittim (probably Cyprus or the western Mediterranean, representing maritime powers — possibly Greece or Rome in later interpretation) will afflict Asshur (Assyria) and Eber (possibly the Hebrews or a broader Semitic designation). The final clause — vegam-hu adei oved ('but he too shall perish forever') — may refer to the Kittim power itself: every empire, including the one that conquers Assyria, will eventually fall. The oracle's sweeping scope — from Israel to Amalek to the Kenites to Assyria to the maritime west — envisions the entire arc of ancient Near Eastern history.
- 25. The narrative's final verse is deliberately anticlimactic: vayyaqom Bil'am vayyeelekhh vayyashov limqomo ('Balaam rose, went, and returned to his place'). The seer who channeled four of the most powerful oracles in the Hebrew Bible simply goes home. Balak, who spent three chapters trying to curse Israel, also departs — vegam-Balaq halakh ledarko ('Balak too went on his way'). Both men leave having accomplished nothing they intended. God's purposes stand; human plots dissolve. The Balaam narrative is over.

Summary: At Shittim, Israel engages in sexual immorality with Moabite women and is drawn into worshiping Baal of Peor. God sends a plague. When an Israelite man brazenly brings a Midianite woman into the camp, Phinehas son of Eleazar drives a spear through both of them, stopping the plague at 24,000 dead. God rewards Phinehas with a berit shalom ('covenant of peace') and a perpetual priesthood.

What Makes This Remarkable: The verb vayitstamed ('yoked itself,' v. 3) describes Israel binding itself to Baal of Peor with the image of an ox being yoked to a plow — a tight, deliberate attachment. What Balaam's curses could not accomplish, Moabite women achieve: the sexual-religious fusion of zanah ('immorality') and worship at sacrificial feasts. Phinehas's act is described as reqanno et-qin'ati ('he was zealous with my zeal,' v. 11) — God credits Phinehas with acting as God's own agent of qin'ah, a word carrying both 'jealousy' and 'zealous passion.'

Translation Friction: The word zanah (v. 1) carries both literal sexual meaning and the metaphorical sense of covenantal infidelity — we rendered it 'sexual immorality' for the literal act while noting the double register. The berit shalom ('covenant of peace,' v. 12) awarded to Phinehas is paradoxical — peace granted for an act of violence — and we preserved the Hebrew term alongside our rendering to let the tension stand.

Connections: The Baal Peor incident becomes a permanent touchstone of apostasy: Deuteronomy 4:3, Joshua 22:17, Psalm 106:28-31, and Hosea 9:10. Phinehas's zealous action is cited in Psalm 106:30-31 as 'reckoned to him as righteousness.' Simeon's dramatic population decline in the second census (Numbers 26:14) is likely connected to this plague. Numbers 31:16 later attributes the Baal Peor strategy to Balaam's counsel.

¹Israel settled at Shittim, and the people began engaging in sexual immorality with Moabite women. ²These women invited the people to the sacrificial feasts of their gods. The people ate and prostrated themselves before their gods. ³So Israel yoked itself to Baal of Peor, and the LORD's anger blazed against Israel. ⁴The LORD said to Moses, 'Take all the chiefs of the people and execute them by impalement before the LORD in the open sun, so that the LORD's burning anger may turn away from Israel.' ⁵Moses told the judges of Israel, 'Each of you must execute those of your men who have yoked themselves to Baal of Peor.' ⁶Just then, an Israelite man came forward and brought a Midianite woman to his family members — right in front of Moses and the entire assembly of the Israelites — while they were weeping at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. ⁷When Phinehas son of Eleazar, son of Aaron the priest, saw this, he stood up from the middle of the assembly and grabbed a spear. ⁸He followed the Israelite man into the inner chamber and drove the spear through both of them — the Israelite man and the woman through her midsection. Then the plague against the Israelites was halted. ⁹The total number who died in the plague was twenty-four thousand. ¹⁰The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹¹'Phinehas son of Eleazar, son of Aaron the priest, has turned back My fury from the Israelites by expressing My own zeal among them, so that I did not consume the Israelites in My passionate jealousy. ¹²Therefore declare: I am now giving him My covenant of peace. ¹³It will belong to him and to his descendants after him — a covenant of permanent priesthood — because he burned with zeal for his God and made atonement for the Israelites.' ¹⁴The name of the Israelite man who was struck down — the one killed alongside the Midianite woman — was Zimri son of Salu, a leader of an ancestral house among the Simeonites. ¹⁵The name of the Midianite woman who was killed was Cozbi daughter of Zur, who was the head of the clans of an ancestral house in Midian. ¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁷'Treat the Midianites as enemies and strike them down, ¹⁸because they have been hostile toward you through their deception — the schemes they used against you in the Peor incident, and in the matter of Cozbi daughter of a Midianite chief, their kinswoman, who was killed on the day of the plague that came because of Peor.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayeshev ('settled, dwelt') places Israel in Shittim — Abel-Shittim in the plains of Moab, the final encampment before crossing the Jordan (cf. Joshua 2:1). The verb vayachel ('began') signals the onset of a new crisis. The root zanah ('to engage in sexual immorality') carries both literal sexual meaning and the metaphorical sense of covenantal infidelity — Israel's sexual involvement with Moabite women becomes the gateway to spiritual apostasy in the following verses.
2. The feminine plural vatiqre'na ('they called, they invited') identifies the Moabite women as the active agents drawing Israel into apostasy. The progression is deliberate: invitation to sacrifice (lezivchai eloheihen — 'to the sacrifices of their gods'), then communal eating (vayokhal ha'am — 'the people ate'), then worship (vayyishtachavu — 'they bowed down, prostrated themselves'). The shared sacrificial meal created religious and social bonds — eating at a god's table meant accepting that god's patronage.
3. The verb vayitstamed ('yoked itself, bound itself') is from the root ts-m-d, describing a tight attachment — like yoking an ox to a plow. Israel bound itself to Ba'al Pe'or, a local deity worshiped at Mount Peor. The name Ba'al ('lord, master, owner') was a title for Canaanite storm and fertility deities. The phrase vayyichar af YHWH ('the anger of the LORD burned hot') uses the idiom of the nose (af) burning — divine fury expressed through the visceral image of heated nostrils.
4. The command qach et kol roshei ha'am ('take all the heads/chiefs of the people') is debated: roshei can mean 'heads' (the guilty individuals) or 'chiefs' (the leaders responsible for the people). The verb hoqa ('impale, hang, expose publicly') describes a form of public execution — the bodies displayed as a deterrent. The phrase neged hashemesh ('opposite the sun, in the open sun') means the execution must be visible, not hidden — a public act of covenant justice. The purpose clause veyashov charon af YHWH ('so that the burning anger of the LORD may turn back') frames the execution as expiation.
5. Moses delegates the execution to the shoftei Yisra'el ('judges of Israel') — the judicial leaders over tribal and clan divisions. The command hirgu ish anashav ('kill, each one, his men') makes every judge personally responsible for purging idolaters within his jurisdiction. The participle hannitsmamdim ('the ones yoked, the ones bound') uses the same root ts-m-d from verse 3, reinforcing the image of Israel fastened to a foreign god like an animal to a yoke.
6. The narrative marker vehinneh ('and look!' — drawing attention to something startling) signals the brazenness of the act. The verb vayyaqrev ('he brought near') — the same root used for offering sacrifices (qorban) — may carry bitter irony: instead of bringing an offering to God, this man brings a foreign woman. The phrase le'einei Mosheh ('in the sight of Moses') emphasizes the defiance — this is done publicly while the entire community is bokh'im ('weeping') at the entrance of the Ohel Mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting'), likely mourning the plague or conducting penitential prayer.
7. Phinehas's full genealogy — ben Elazar ben Aharon hakkohen ('son of Eleazar son of Aaron the priest') — establishes his priestly authority for the act that follows. The verb vayyaqom ('he rose up, he stood up') indicates decisive action from within the mourning assembly. The romach ('spear, lance') is a military weapon — not a priestly implement — signaling that Phinehas acts as both priest and warrior. His name (Pinchas) may derive from Egyptian Pa-nehasi ('the Nubian').
8. The qubbah ('arched tent, inner chamber') is a rare word — possibly a tent with a domed or vaulted structure, perhaps a private alcove. The verb vayyidqor ('he pierced, he thrust through') describes a single violent thrust penetrating both bodies. The word qovatah ('her belly, her midsection') may carry a wordplay with qubbah ('tent') — the location of the act and the point of the thrust are phonetically linked. The immediate result — vatte'atsar hammaggefah ('the plague was stopped') — frames Phinehas's act as effective atonement: his zeal halts the divine punishment.

9. The death toll — arba'ah ve'esrim elef ('twenty-four thousand') — is enormous, representing a catastrophic loss from the fighting-age population counted in the census. Paul cites this incident in 1 Corinthians 10:8 with a figure of twenty-three thousand, a discrepancy that ancient and modern commentators have debated. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the narrative section; what follows is divine speech interpreting the event.
10. The standard divine-speech introduction vaydabber YHWH el Mosheh lemor ('the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') marks a shift from narrative to oracle. What follows (vv 11-13) is God's interpretation of Phinehas's act and the reward He grants — the berit shalom ('covenant of peace').
11. The critical phrase beqan'o et qin'ati betokham ('by being zealous with My zeal among them') uses the root q-n-' twice — Phinehas's zeal (qin'ah) mirrors God's own qin'ah. The word qin'ah spans 'zeal, jealousy, passionate intensity' — God's exclusive claim on Israel's loyalty is a jealous love, and Phinehas channeled that same intensity. The verb heshiv ('turned back, returned') indicates that Phinehas reversed the trajectory of divine wrath (chamati — 'My fury'). Without his intervention, the consequence would have been killiti ('I would have consumed, I would have finished off') — total annihilation. The masoretic note about the small yod in Phinehas's name is a scribal tradition preserved in Sephardic and Ashkenazic Torah scrolls.
12. The phrase beriti shalom ('My covenant of peace') is one of the most theologically significant covenant grants in the Torah. The word shalom here extends beyond 'absence of conflict' to encompass wholeness, well-being, and restored relationship between God and the priestly line. The construction hineni noten ('I am now giving') uses the participle to express an immediate, present-tense act — the covenant is being enacted in this moment of speech. The masoretic note records that in Sephardic and Ashkenazic Torah scrolls, the vav in shalom is written as a vav qeti'a ('broken vav') — a letter with a visible break in its vertical stroke. Rabbinic tradition interprets this broken letter as symbolizing that true peace sometimes requires a violent rupture first.
13. The berit kehunat olam ('covenant of permanent priesthood') specifies the content of the covenant of peace: an irrevocable priestly line extending through Phinehas's descendants. The word olam ('permanent, perpetual, age-long') conveys duration beyond a single generation. The verb kipper ('made atonement, made expiation') is the same root used for the Day of Atonement rituals (Leviticus 16) — Phinehas's violent act functioned as an atoning sacrifice, turning back God's wrath from the people. The clause tachat asher qinne le'Elohav ('because he burned with zeal for his God') gives the theological rationale: priestly authority is granted to one who demonstrated absolute loyalty to God's honor.
14. The narrative now identifies the two people killed by Phinehas. Zimri (meaning possibly 'my music' or 'my vine-branch') is identified as a nesi beit av laShim'oni ('a leader of a patriarchal house for the Simeonites') — not a minor figure but a tribal chieftain. His high rank makes the public defiance of verse 6 even more egregious: a leader of Israel openly parading his transgression. The double use of the root n-k-h ('struck') — hammukkeh ('the one struck down') and hukkah ('he was struck') — emphasizes the violent end.
15. Cozbi (Kozbi) — from the root k-z-v meaning 'to lie, to deceive' — bears a name that itself signals deception: 'my lie' or 'my deception.' Her father Tsur ('rock') is identified as rosh ummot beit av beMidyan ('head of the clans of a patriarchal house in Midian'), making her Midianite royalty. The pairing of a Simeonite prince with a Midianite princess suggests this was no casual encounter but a deliberate political-religious alliance. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the narrative identification.
16. A second divine-speech introduction opens the final section of the chapter (vv 16-18), shifting from the reward for Phinehas to a command concerning future relations with Midian. The repetition of this formula separates the backward-looking oracle (vv 10-15) from the forward-looking military directive.
17. The verb tsaror ('press, harass, treat as enemy') is an infinitive absolute used as an imperative — a forceful, ongoing command. The root ts-r-r means 'to bind tightly, to be hostile toward, to cause distress.' Combined with vehikkitem otam ('and strike them'), the dual command prescribes both a posture (permanent hostility) and an action (military attack). This command is fulfilled in Numbers 31 with the war against Midian.
18. The rationale uses the same root ts-r-r from verse 17: ki tsorerim hem lakhem ('because they are pressing/being hostile toward you'). The word nikhleihem ('their deceptions, their schemes') from the root n-k-l describes calculated, strategic trickery — Midian's seduction of Israel was not spontaneous but planned. The phrase al devar Pe'or ('on the matter of Peor, because of the Peor incident') frames the entire crisis as a Midianite conspiracy. Cozbi is called achotam ('their sister, their kinswoman'), identifying her as a representative of Midianite national strategy. The closing phrase al devar Pe'or repeats at the end, creating a frame that bookends the Midianite threat with the name of the apostasy site.

Summary: After the plague at Baal Peor, God commands a second census — a new generation's count. The total is 601,730, slightly lower than the first census. Tribe-by-tribe comparisons reveal dramatic shifts: Simeon drops from 59,300 to 22,200, while Manasseh nearly doubles. Land allocation by lot is commanded, proportional to tribal size. The chapter closes with the Levitical census and the statement that no one from the first census remains except Caleb and Joshua.

What Makes This Remarkable: This census is a generational audit. The parameters deliberately mirror Numbers 1 — the same idiom se'u et-rosh ('lift the head'), the same twenty-year military threshold — inviting comparison between the two generations. The most devastating line comes last: 'among these there was not a man of those who were counted by Moses and Aaron the priest when they counted the Israelites in the Sinai wilderness' (v. 64). An entire generation has been replaced. Eleazar replaces Aaron as the priestly partner, marking the succession.

Translation Friction: The phrase tippol nachalatam ('their inheritance shall fall,' v. 56) uses nafal ('to fall') as a technical term for lot-casting and divine territorial allocation. We rendered it 'be allotted,' since the English 'fall' may suggest accident rather than divine determination. Simeon's catastrophic decline — from 59,300 to 22,200 — is presented without commentary, but its proximity to the Baal Peor plague strongly implies a connection.

Connections: The census mirrors Numbers 1:1-46 in structure and terminology, enabling direct comparison. The Zelophehad notice (v. 33) — mentioning his daughters by name — sets up the inheritance petition in Numbers 27:1-11. Caleb and Joshua's survival (v. 65) fulfills the promise of Numbers 14:30. The land-by-lot principle (vv. 55-56) will govern the allotment described in Joshua 13-21.

¹After the plague, the LORD spoke to Moses and to Eleazar son of Aaron the priest, saying: ²Count the entire Israelite community by their ancestral households — every male from twenty years old and above who is eligible for military service in Israel. ³Moses and Eleazar the priest addressed them in the plains of Moab, beside the Jordan across from Jericho: ⁴From twenty years old and above, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. These are the Israelites who came out of the land of Egypt: ⁵Reuben, Israel's firstborn. The descendants of Reuben: from Hanoch, the Hanochite clan; from Pallu, the Palluite clan. ⁶From Hezron, the Hezronite clan; from Carmi, the Carmite clan. ⁷These are the Reubenite clans. Their registered total was 43,730. ⁸The son of Pallu was Eliab. ⁹The sons of Eliab were Nemuel, Dathan, and Abiram. These are the same Dathan and Abiram — chosen representatives of the community — who contended against Moses and Aaron as part of Korah's faction when they challenged the LORD. ¹⁰The earth opened its mouth and swallowed them along with Korah, when that faction died — when the fire consumed two hundred and fifty men. They became a warning sign. ¹¹But Korah's descendants did not die. ¹²The descendants of Simeon by their clans: from Nemuel, the Nemuelite clan; from Jamin, the Jaminite clan; from Jachin, the Jachinite clan. ¹³From Zerah, the Zerahite clan; from Shaul, the Shaulite clan. ¹⁴These are the Simeonite clans. Their total was 22,200. ¹⁵The descendants of Gad by their clans: from Zephon, the Zephonite clan; from Haggi, the Haggite clan; from Shuni, the Shunite clan. ¹⁶From Ozni, the Oznite clan; from Eri, the Erite clan. ¹⁷From Arod, the Arodite clan; from Areli, the Arelite clan. ¹⁸These are the clans of the Gadites. Their registered total was 40,500. ¹⁹The sons of Judah included Er and Onan, but Er and Onan died in the land of Canaan. ²⁰The descendants of Judah by their clans: from Shelah, the Shelanite clan; from Perez, the Perezite clan; from Zerah, the Zerahite clan. ²¹The sons of Perez were: from Hezron, the Hezronite clan; from Hamul, the Hamulite clan. ²²These are the clans of Judah. Their registered total was 76,500. ²³The descendants of Issachar by their clans: from Tola, the Tolaite clan; from Puah, the Punite clan. ²⁴From Jashub, the Jashubite clan; from Shimron, the Shimronite clan. ²⁵These are the Issachar clans. Their registered total was 64,300. ²⁶The descendants of Zebulun by their clans: from Sered, the Seredite clan; from Elon, the Elonite clan; from Jahleel, the Jahleelite clan. ²⁷These are the Zebulunite clans. Their registered total was 60,500. ²⁸The descendants of Joseph by their clans were Manasseh and Ephraim. ²⁹The descendants of Manasseh: from Machir, the Machirite clan — and Machir fathered Gilead; from Gilead, the Gileadite clan. ³⁰These are the sons of Gilead: from Iezer, the Iezerite clan; from Helek, the Helekite clan. ³¹From Asriel, the Asrielite clan; from Shechem, the Shechemite clan. ³²From Shemida, the Shemidaite clan; from Hepher, the Hepherite clan. ³³Zelophehad son of Hepher had no sons — only daughters. The names of Zelophehad's daughters were Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. ³⁴These are the Manassite clans. Their registered total was 52,700. ³⁵These are the descendants of Ephraim by their clans: from Shuthelah, the Shuthelahite clan; from Becher, the Becherite clan; from Tahan, the Tahanite clan. ³⁶These are the sons of Shuthelah: from Eran, the Eranite clan. ³⁷These are the Ephraimite clans. Their registered total was 32,500. These are the descendants of Joseph by their clans. ³⁸The descendants of Benjamin by their clans: from Bela, the Belaite clan; from Ashbel, the Ashbelite clan; from Ahiiram, the Ahiiramite clan. ³⁹From Shephupham, the Shuphamite clan; from Hupham, the Huphamite clan. ⁴⁰The sons of Bela were Ard and Naaman: from Ard, the Ardite clan; from Naaman, the Naamite clan. ⁴¹These are the Benjaminite clans. Their registered total was 45,600. ⁴²The descendants of Dan by their clans: from Shuham, the Shuhamite clan. These are the clans of Dan by their families. ⁴³All the Shuhamite clans totaled 64,400 in their registration. ⁴⁴The descendants of Asher by their clans: from Imnah, the Imnite clan; from Ishvi, the Ishvite clan; from Beriah, the Beriite clan. ⁴⁵Among the sons of Beriah: from Heber, the Heberite clan; from Malchiel, the Malchielite clan. ⁴⁶The name of Asher's daughter was Serah. ⁴⁷These are the Asherite clans. Their registered total was 53,400. ⁴⁸The descendants of Naphtali by their clans: from Jahzeel, the Jahzeelite clan; from Guni, the Gunitite clan. ⁴⁹From Jezer, the Jezerite clan; from Shillem, the Shillemite clan. ⁵⁰These are the Naphtali clans by their families. Their registered total was 45,400. ⁵¹These were the total registered Israelites: 601,730. ⁵²The LORD spoke to Moses: ⁵³To these the land is to be apportioned as an inheritance based on the number of registered names. ⁵⁴To the larger group, increase its inheritance; to the smaller group, reduce its inheritance. Each tribe receives its inheritance proportional to its registered count. ⁵⁵However, the land is to be distributed by lot. They will receive their inheritance according to the names of their ancestral tribes. ⁵⁶By the decision of the lot, each inheritance is to be apportioned, whether the tribe is large or small. ⁵⁷These are the registered Levites by their clans: from Gershon, the Gershonite clan; from Kohath, the Kohathite clan; from Merari, the Merarite clan. ⁵⁸These are the Levitical clans: the Libnite clan, the Hebronite clan, the Mahlite clan, the Mushite clan, and the Korahite clan. Kohath fathered Amram. ⁵⁹The name of Amram's wife was Jochebed, a daughter of Levi who was born to Levi in Egypt. She bore to Amram: Aaron, Moses, and their sister Miriam. ⁶⁰To Aaron were born Nadab, Abihu, Eleazar, and Ithamar. ⁶¹Nadab and Abihu died when they presented unauthorized fire before the LORD. ⁶²Their registered total was 23,000 — every male from one month old and above. They were not counted among the other Israelites because no territorial inheritance was given to them among the Israelites. ⁶³These are those registered by Moses and Eleazar the priest when they counted the Israelites in the plains of Moab beside the Jordan, across from Jericho. ⁶⁴Among these there was not a single man from those registered by Moses and Aaron the priest when they counted the Israelites in the wilderness of Sinai. ⁶⁵For the LORD had declared about them: They will certainly die in the wilderness. Not one of them survived except Caleb son of Jephunneh and Joshua son of Nun.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The hama'eifah ('the plague') refers to the devastating epidemic at Baal Peor (Numbers 25:9) that killed 24,000. This second census takes place in the aftermath — the people must be recounted because the first generation has perished. Notably, Eleazar replaces his father Aaron (who died in Numbers 20:28) as the priestly partner in the census, marking the generational transition.
2. The idiom se'u et-rosh ('lift the head') means 'take a count/census.' The census parameters match Numbers 1:2-3 exactly: mibben esrim shanah vama'lah ('from twenty years and above'), leveit avotam ('by their ancestral households'), and kol-yotze tzava ('all going out to the army'). This deliberate mirroring invites comparison between the two generations.
3. The location be'arvot Mo'av ('in the plains/steppes of Moab') al-Yarden Yerecho ('by the Jordan at Jericho') places this census at the doorstep of the Promised Land — geographically opposite to the first census at Sinai. The name arvot ('plains, arid steppes') describes the flat terrain east of the Jordan near the Dead Sea.
4. The phrase ka'asher tzivvah YHVH et-Mosheh ('as the LORD commanded Moses') grounds the census in divine authority. The closing reference uvenei Yisra'el hayyotze'im me'eretz Mitzrayim ('and the Israelites who went out from the land of Egypt') transitions from instructions to the actual census list, beginning with the exodus generation's descendants.

5. The census begins with Re'uven bekhor Yisra'el ('Reuben, firstborn of Israel'), honoring the birth order despite Reuben's loss of the firstborn privileges (Genesis 49:3-4). Each son generates a mishpachah ('clan/family') with a gentile adjective — HaChanokhi ('the Hanochite'). The clan structure tracks tribal subdivisions for military organization and land allocation.
6. Chetzron and Karmi complete Reuben's four clans. These names are consistent with Genesis 46:9 and Exodus 6:14, maintaining genealogical continuity across the Torah. The gentile forms (HaChetzroni, HaKarmi) use the standard -i suffix to denote clan membership.
7. Reuben's second census total of 43,730 represents a decrease from the first census figure of 46,500 (Numbers 1:21) — a loss of 2,770. The term pequdehem ('their registered ones, their counted ones') derives from paqad ('to attend to, number, muster'). The decline may reflect the toll of wilderness judgments on this tribe.
8. The singular benei Pallu ('sons of Pallu') yielding only Eli'av ('my God is father') narrows the genealogy to a single line of descent. This brevity sets up the important digression in verses 9-11 about Dathan, Abiram, and Korah — figures from this very clan.
9. The parenthetical hu-Datan va'Aviram ('this is the same Dathan and Abiram') inserts a historical cross-reference into the census list. They were qeri'ei ha'edah ('the ones called/summoned by the community') — prominent leaders, not obscure figures. The ketiv-qere variant (qrw'y / qeri'ei) reflects textual transmission history. Their rebellion ba'adat-Qorach ('in the faction of Korah') is narrated in Numbers 16.
10. The vivid vatiftach ha'aretz et-piha ('the earth opened its mouth') personifies the ground as an agent of divine judgment. The phrase vayyihyu lanes ('they became a sign/warning') indicates their fate served as an enduring cautionary example. The word nes here means 'warning sign' or 'signal' rather than its later sense of 'miracle.' The death of the 250 incense-burners by fire (ba'akhol ha'esh) is distinct from the ground's swallowing of Korah.
11. This brief but theologically significant note — uvene-Qorach lo-metu ('the sons of Korah did not die') — explains how Korahite clans survived to become Temple singers and psalm composers (see Psalm titles: 42, 44-49, 84-85, 87-88). God's judgment targeted the rebels, not their innocent offspring, demonstrating that guilt is not automatically inherited.
12. Simeon's clan list here differs from Genesis 46:10 — Ohad is absent (perhaps absorbed into another clan), and the names show slight variations (Nemuel vs. Jemuel). The lemishpehotam ('by their clans') introduces the standard clan-listing formula that repeats for each tribe.
13. Zerach and Sha'ul complete Simeon's five surviving clans (down from six in Genesis 46:10). Sha'ul is identified in Genesis 46:10 as the son of a Canaanite woman, making him unique among the tribal ancestors. The clan name haZarchi uses the standard gentile suffix.
14. Simeon suffered the most dramatic decline of any tribe: from 59,300 (Numbers 1:23) to 22,200 — a loss of 37,100, nearly 63%. Rabbinic tradition connects this massive reduction to the Baal Peor incident, where the ringleader Zimri was a Simeonite leader (Numbers 25:14). Simeon would later be absorbed into Judah's territory (Joshua 19:1).
15. Gad's clan list begins with Tzefon (called Ziphion in Genesis 46:16), a name possibly meaning 'watchman' or 'north.' Gad had seven clans — a large number reflecting the tribe's military significance (cf. Genesis 49:19, 'a raiding band shall raid him'). The gentile HaTzefoni follows the standard pattern.
16. Ozni (called Ezbon in Genesis 46:16) and Eri continue Gad's clan listings. The name Ozni may derive from ozen ('ear'), possibly meaning 'attentive.' These variant name forms between Genesis and Numbers reflect natural development in oral and scribal transmission.
17. Arod (called Arodi in Genesis 46:16) and Ar'eli complete Gad's seven clans. Ar'eli may mean 'lion of God' (ari + El), though the etymology is uncertain. The slight name variations (Arodi/Arod) between Genesis and Numbers show the flexibility of Hebrew name forms.
18. Gad decreased from 45,650 (Numbers 1:25) to 40,500 — a reduction of 5,150. The term lifqudehem ('according to their registered ones') uses the same counting vocabulary as verse 7. Gad would later settle east of the Jordan in the territory of Gilead (Numbers 32).
19. The census pauses to note that Er and Onan — Judah's firstborn and second son — vayamot ('died') be'erez Kena'an ('in the land of Canaan') before the descent to Egypt. Their deaths (Genesis 38:7-10) eliminated two potential clan lines. Judah's surviving clans descend from his remaining sons Shelah, Perez, and Zerach.
20. Judah's three surviving sons generate three primary clans. Peretz ('breach') — born when he 'broke through' before his twin Zerach (Genesis 38:29) — becomes the dominant line through which David and the Messianic lineage descend. The clan of Shelah appears first, following birth order among the survivors.
21. Perez's sub-clans Chetzron and Chamul represent a second level of genealogical depth — clans within a clan. Chetzron's line is especially important: through him come Ram, Amminadab, Nahshon (the tribal prince), and eventually David (Ruth 4:18-22). This extra genealogical layer signals Judah's growing prominence.
22. Judah increased from 74,600 (Numbers 1:27) to 76,500 — a gain of 1,900. Judah remains the largest tribe in both censuses, befitting its role as the leading tribe in march order (Numbers 2:3) and Jacob's royal blessing (Genesis 49:8-12). The term 'threescore' in the KJV renders shishah veshiv'im ('six and seventy').
23. Issachar's clans begin with Tola ('worm, crimson') — a name associated with the crimson dye-producing insect. Puvah (here leFuvah, with the gentile HaPuni) shows a variant spelling from Genesis 46:13's Puvvah. The four Issachar clans remain stable between the two census lists.

24. Yashuv (called Iob/Job in Genesis 46:13) and Shimron complete Issachar's four clans. The name Yashuv means 'he returns,' while Shimron may relate to shamar ('to guard/watch'). The variant Iob/Yashuv represents a more significant name change than most — possibly reflecting an alternative family tradition.
25. Issachar experienced significant growth: from 54,400 (Numbers 1:29) to 64,300 — a gain of 9,900, among the largest increases. The Hebrew arba'ah veshishim elef ('four and sixty thousand') uses the typical Hebrew number order (units before tens).
26. Zebulun has only three clans — the fewest among the twelve tribes (excluding Levi). Sered, Elon ('oak/terebinth'), and Yachle'el ('God waits/hopes') are consistent with Genesis 46:14. Despite having few clans, Zebulun maintained a respectable population.
27. Zebulun grew from 57,400 (Numbers 1:31) to 60,500 — an increase of 3,100. The tribe maintained strong numbers despite having only three clans, suggesting robust population growth within each clan. The KJV 'threescore' renders the Hebrew shishshim ('sixty').
28. Joseph's two sons Menasheh and Efrayim each constitute a full tribe — Jacob's adoption of them (Genesis 48:5) effectively gave Joseph a double portion. Here Menasheh is listed first (birth order), though Ephraim received the primary blessing (Genesis 48:14-20). Together they replace the single 'tribe of Joseph.'
29. Manasseh's genealogy traces through a single line: Menasheh Makhir Gil'ad, then branches into six sub-clans (vv. 30-32). Makhir ('sold') was Manasseh's only son. Gil'ad ('rocky region') gives his name to the Transjordanian territory. The verb holid ('fathered, begot') marks the generational descent.
30. Gilead's sub-clans begin with I'ezer (abbreviated from Avi'ezer, 'my father is help') and Chelek ('portion'). These names recur in the land allocation of Joshua 17:2, where each Gileadite clan receives its territorial portion. The I'ezerite clan is associated with Gideon's family (Judges 6:11).
31. Asri'el ('God has blessed me/vow of God') and Shekhem ('shoulder, ridge') continue the Gileadite sub-clans. The name Shekhem connects this clan to the important central Canaanite city, though the relationship between the personal name and the place is debated.
32. Shemida ('name has known' or 'fame') and Chefer ('pit, well') complete the six Gileadite sub-clans of Manasseh. Chefer's clan is singled out in the next verse because of the Zelophehad inheritance case — one of the Torah's most significant precedents regarding women's property rights.
33. This genealogical note — lo-hayu lo vanim ki im-banot ('he had no sons, only daughters') — anticipates the landmark legal case in Numbers 27:1-11 where these five women petition for and receive inheritance rights. Their individual naming (Machlah, No'ah, Choglah, Milkah, Tirtzah) is unusual in census lists and underscores their legal significance. The name Tzelofchad may mean 'shadow of fear' or 'protection from dread.'
34. Manasseh experienced the largest growth of any tribe: from 32,200 (Numbers 1:35) to 52,700 — an increase of 20,500, or nearly 64%. This dramatic rise reversed the first census pattern where Ephraim was larger. Manasseh's expansion justified its claim to extensive Transjordanian territory.
35. Ephraim's three primary clans — Shutelach, Bekher ('firstborn'), and Tachan — are fewer than Manasseh's six sub-clans. The name Shutelach is of uncertain etymology; Tachan may mean 'encampment' or 'grace.' Ephraim's clan structure is simpler than Manasseh's multi-level genealogy.
36. Shuthelah produces one sub-clan through Eran ('watchful'), paralleling the Perez sub-clans in Judah (v. 21). This additional genealogical layer, present only for select clans, indicates which family lines achieved sufficient size and prominence to warrant independent recognition.
37. Ephraim declined from 40,500 (Numbers 1:33) to 32,500 — a loss of 8,000. Combined with Manasseh's surge, the 'house of Joseph' dynamic shifted: Manasseh (52,700) now far exceeds Ephraim (32,500), reversing Jacob's preferential blessing of Ephraim. The closing phrase elleh venei-Yosef lemishpechotam ('these are Joseph's descendants by their clans') brackets the two half-tribes as one unit.
38. Benjamin lists five clans (with two sub-clans in v. 40), making seven total. Bela ('swallowing'), Ashbel, and Achiram (possibly the same as Ehi in Genesis 46:21) begin the list. Benjamin's clan names show the most variation between Genesis and Numbers of any tribe, likely reflecting clan mergers and name changes over the generations.
39. Shefufam (gentilic HaShufami) and Chufam complete Benjamin's primary clans. These names correspond to Mupim and Hupim in Genesis 46:21, with significant phonetic variation. The gentilic forms normalize these variant spellings into standardized clan designations.
40. Bela's sub-clans Ard and Na'aman ('pleasant, gracious') create a second genealogical tier within Benjamin, similar to Perez's sub-clans in Judah. Na'aman's name means 'pleasantness' — the same root as the later Aramean general's name (2 Kings 5). These seven total Benjaminite clans sustained a tribe that would produce Israel's first king.
41. Benjamin grew from 35,400 (Numbers 1:37) to 45,600 — an increase of 10,200, the second-largest gain after Manasseh. This growth is especially notable given Benjamin's small initial size. The tribe's expansion foreshadowed its later disproportionate influence in Israel's history, producing King Saul and the apostle Paul.
42. Dan has only a single clan — Shucham (called Hushim in Genesis 46:23). Despite this remarkably simple genealogical structure, Dan was one of the largest tribes (v. 43). The repetitive phrasing elleh mishpechot Dan lemishpechotam ('these are Dan's clans by their families') fills the space where other tribes list multiple clans.
43. Dan grew slightly from 62,700 (Numbers 1:39) to 64,400 — an increase of 1,700. Despite having only one clan, Dan was the second-largest tribe (after Judah's 76,500). The phrase kol-mishpechot haShuchami ('all the clans of the Shuchamites') uses the plural even though only one clan name is given, possibly indicating internal sub-divisions not formally listed.

44. Asher's three primary clans — Yimnah ('prosperity, right hand'), Yishvi ('equal, level'), and Beri'ah ('in evil/misfortune' or 'excellence') — are supplemented by Beriah's sub-clans in verse 45. A fourth son, Ishuah, listed in Genesis 46:17, is absent here — his line may have died out or been absorbed into another clan.
45. Beriah's sub-clans Chever ('companion, associate') and Malki'el ('my king is God') add depth to Asher's genealogy. Malki'el is a theophoric name expressing devotion to God as king — one of several such names in the census. These five total Asherite clans (three primary plus two sub-clans) sustained a mid-sized tribe.
46. This brief note — veshem bat-Asher Serach — is remarkable: Serach is one of very few women named in a census list. She also appears in Genesis 46:17, suggesting she held a uniquely honored position in tribal memory. Rabbinic tradition attributes extraordinary longevity and wisdom to her. Her presence in a military census list is striking and unexplained in the text.
47. Asher grew from 41,500 (Numbers 1:41) to 53,400 — a substantial increase of 11,900. This makes Asher one of the fastest-growing tribes, consistent with Moses' later blessing that Asher would be 'most blessed of sons' and would 'dip his foot in oil' (Deuteronomy 33:24).
48. Naphtali's four clans begin with Yachtze'el ('God apportions') and Guni ('my protector' or 'painted/colored'). These names are consistent with Genesis 46:24. Naphtali's territory would later occupy the fertile Galilee region — the area where much of Jesus' ministry would take place centuries later.
49. Yetzer ('form, inclination') and Shillem ('recompense, repayment') complete Naphtali's four clans. The name Shillem shares the root sh-l-m with shalom and shelamim, connecting to concepts of completion and wholeness. Naphtali's compact four-clan structure mirrors Issachar's.
50. Naphtali decreased from 53,400 (Numbers 1:43) to 45,400 — a loss of 8,000. This significant decline parallels Ephraim's reduction. The phrase chamishshah ve'arba'im elef ('forty-five thousand') concludes the tribal census proper before the grand total in verse 51.
51. The grand total of 601,730 is remarkably close to the first census total of 603,550 (Numbers 1:46) — a net decrease of only 1,820 despite the massive losses to plague, war, and divine judgment. The Hebrew shesh-me'ot elef va'elef sheva me'ot usheloshim ('six hundred thousand and a thousand, seven hundred and thirty') expresses the figure in a distinctive compound form. The near-stability of the overall population amid dramatic individual tribal shifts demonstrates divine faithfulness to the patriarchal promise of numerous descendants.
52. The divine speech formula transitions from the census enumeration to its practical purpose — land allocation. The census was not merely demographic record-keeping but the basis for dividing the inheritance of the Promised Land among the tribes.
53. The verb techalek ('shall be divided/apportioned') from chalaq ('to divide, distribute') establishes the census-to-land connection. The phrase bemispar shemot ('by the number of names') means each person counted represents a claim on the land. The nachalah ('inheritance') is not mere property but a covenantal grant — permanent tribal territory within the Promised Land.
54. The principle is proportional allocation: larav tarbeh nachalato ('for the many, increase its inheritance') and lam'at tam'it nachalato ('for the few, reduce its inheritance'). The verbs tarbeh and tam'it ('increase' and 'decrease') create a balanced pair. This ensures demographic fairness — larger tribes receive more land to support their population, smaller tribes less.
55. The akh ('however, only') introduces a qualification: despite the proportional principle, the actual location of each tribe's allotment is determined begoral ('by lot'). The goral ('lot') introduces a divine element — God controls the outcome (Proverbs 16:33). This creates a dual system: lot determines where; population size determines how much. The phrase lishemot mattot-avotam ('according to the names of their ancestral tribes') maintains tribal cohesion.
56. The phrase al-pi haGoral ('according to the mouth/decision of the lot') personifies the lot as having a 'mouth' — it speaks God's will. The final bein rav lim'at ('between many and few') reaffirms that both large and small tribes participate in the same lot-based system. This concludes the land-allocation legislation triggered by the census.
57. The Levites receive a separate census because they receive no territorial inheritance (v. 62). The three primary Levitical divisions — Gershon, Qehat, and Merari — trace to Levi's three sons (Genesis 46:11). Each had distinct tabernacle responsibilities: Gershonites handled the tent fabrics, Kohathites the sacred furniture, and Merarites the structural framework.
58. Five Levitical sub-clans are listed without being assigned to their parent divisions — HaLibni (from Gershon), HaChevroni and HaQorchi (from Kohath), HaMachli and HaMushi (from Merari). The genealogical note uQehat holid et-Amram ('Kohath fathered Amram') transitions to the priestly lineage. This bridges from tribal census to priestly succession.
59. Yokheved ('YHWH is glory') is remarkable as the first person in the Torah with a name containing the divine name element Yo-. She is identified as bat-Levi ('a daughter of Levi'), meaning a descendant of the tribe. The phrase asher yaldah otah leLevi beMitzrayim ('who was born to Levi in Egypt') locates her birth in Egypt. She bore Israel's three most important leaders: Aharon (priest), Mosheh (prophet/lawgiver), and Miryam (prophetess).
60. Aaron's four sons are listed in birth order: Nadav ('generous'), Avihu ('he is my father'), El'azar ('God has helped'), and Itamar ('palm coast'). The passive vayyivvaled ('were born') emphasizes the divine gift of progeny. The first two will be noted as dead in the next verse, leaving the priestly line to continue through the latter two.
61. The phrase behaqrivam esh-zarah ('when they brought near foreign/strange fire') refers to the catastrophic incident of Leviticus 10:1-2. The esh zarah ('unauthorized/alien fire') violated the prescribed method of offering. Their death lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — in the very sanctuary where God's presence dwelled — made it a paradigmatic warning about sacred boundaries.

62. The Levites totaled 23,000, up from 22,000 at the first census (Numbers 3:39) — a modest gain of 1,000. Two key differences from the tribal census: (1) they were counted mibben-chodesh vama'lah ('from one month old and above') rather than twenty years, and (2) they received no nachalah ('inheritance') because God Himself was their inheritance (Numbers 18:20). The phrase lo hotpaqdu betokh benei-Yisra'el ('they were not counted among the Israelites') explains their separate enumeration.
63. The concluding formula mirrors the opening (v. 3), creating an inclusio — paqdu et-benei Yisra'el be'arvot Mo'av ('they counted the Israelites in the plains of Moab'). Moses and Eleazar jointly conducted this census, as Aaron had jointly conducted the first with Moses (Numbers 1:3). The geographic marker al Yarden Yerecho ('by the Jordan at Jericho') emphasizes proximity to the Promised Land.
64. The devastating verdict: uve'elleh lo-hayah ish ('among these there was not a man') from the first census. The juxtaposition of the two census locations — bemidbar Sinai ('in the wilderness of Sinai') versus be'arvot Mo'av (v. 63) — spans the entire wilderness period. An entire generation vanished between these two counts, fulfilling God's judgment in Numbers 14:29.
65. The chapter closes with the two exceptions: Kalev ben-Yefunneh and Yehoshua bin-Nun — the only faithful spies (Numbers 14:6-9). The infinitive absolute mot yamuthu ('dying they shall die') intensified the death decree. The verb notar ('remained, survived') emphasizes that literally no one else from the Sinai census lived to reach this point. These two men bridge the generations, embodying the reward of covenant faithfulness amid universal judgment.

Summary: Zelophehad's five daughters petition Moses publicly for their father's inheritance, since he died without sons. God rules in their favor, establishing a new order of inheritance succession. Then God tells Moses to ascend Mount Abarim to view the promised land he will not enter, due to the Meribah incident. Moses asks God to appoint a successor, and Joshua is commissioned through the laying on of hands before Eleazar the priest and the whole congregation.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Five women — Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah — are named individually, though the narrative could have used a single collective reference. They stand before the entire national leadership and challenge existing inheritance law. Their verb of approach, vattiqra'vna (from q-r-b), is the same root as qorban ('offering') — they bring their case as a kind of sacred gift to the community. God's verdict: ken benot Tselofchad doverot ('the daughters of Zelophehad speak rightly,' v. 7).*

Translation Friction: *The daughters argue that their father bechet'o met ('died for his own sin,' v. 3) — a phrase that could mean he died in the general wilderness judgment (Numbers 14:29-35) or for some specific personal transgression. We rendered it as 'died for his own sin' without specifying further, since the Hebrew is itself ambiguous by design. The transfer of authority to Joshua through semikhat yadayim ('laying on of hands,' v. 18) is a physical act we preserved literally.*

Connections: The daughters' case is revisited in Numbers 36, where a marriage restriction is added to protect tribal inheritances. Their land grant is fulfilled in Joshua 17:3-6. Moses's exclusion from the land (v. 14) recalls the Meribah incident in Numbers 20:12. Joshua's commissioning (vv. 18-23) is fulfilled in Deuteronomy 31:7-8 and 34:9.

¹The daughters of Zelophehad son of Hepher, son of Gilead, son of Machir, son of Manasseh — from the clan of Manasseh son of Joseph — came forward. Their names were Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. ²They stood before Moses, before Eleazar the priest, before the leaders, and before the entire community at the entrance of the tent of meeting, and said: ³"Our father died in the wilderness. He was not among those who banded together against the LORD in the faction of Korah — he died for his own sin — and he had no sons. ⁴Why should our father's name disappear from his clan just because he had no son? Give us a landholding among our father's relatives." ⁵So Moses presented their legal claim before the LORD. ⁶The LORD said to Moses: ⁷"The daughters of Zelophehad are right. You must give them an inherited landholding among their father's relatives. Transfer their father's inheritance to them. ⁸Speak to the Israelites and say: If a man dies without a son, you shall transfer his inheritance to his daughter. ⁹If he has no daughter, give his inheritance to his brothers. ¹⁰If he has no brothers, give his inheritance to his father's brothers. ¹¹If his father has no brothers, give his inheritance to the nearest relative in his clan, and that person shall possess it. This shall be a legal statute for the Israelites, as the LORD commanded Moses." ¹²The LORD said to Moses, "Go up to this mountain in the Abarim range and look at the land I have given to the Israelites. ¹³After you have seen it, you too will be gathered to your people, just as your brother Aaron was gathered. ¹⁴This is because you both rebelled against My command in the wilderness of Zin during the community's quarrel, when you failed to demonstrate My holiness before their eyes at the waters." These are the waters of Meribah-kadesh, in the wilderness of Zin. ¹⁵Moses spoke to the LORD: ¹⁶"Let the LORD — the God of the spirits of all flesh — appoint someone over the community, ¹⁷someone who will go out before them and come in before them, who will lead them out and bring them in — so that the LORD's community will not be like sheep without a shepherd." ¹⁸The LORD said to Moses, "Take Joshua son of Nun — a man in whom the Spirit dwells — and lay your hand on him. ¹⁹Present him before Eleazar the priest and the entire community, and commission him in their sight. ²⁰Place some of your authority upon him, so that the entire Israelite community will obey. ²¹He shall stand before Eleazar the priest, who will inquire for him through the Urim before the LORD. At his word they shall go out, and at his word they shall come in — he and all the Israelites with him, the entire community. ²²Moses did as the LORD commanded him. He took Joshua and presented him before Eleazar the priest and the entire community. ²³He laid his hands on him and commissioned him, as the LORD had spoken through Moses.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Five women are named — all five, individually — while the narrative could have simply said 'the daughters of Zelophehad.' The text honors them by name, as it honored the midwives in Exodus 1:15. Their five-generation genealogy establishes their legitimacy within the Manassite clan. They 'came forward' (vattiqravnah, from q-r-b — the same root as qorban, 'offering'). Their approach to Moses is framed with the language of sacred offering: they bring their case as a gift of justice to the community.
2. The daughters make their case publicly — not in private audience but before the full assembly: Moses, the high priest, the tribal leaders, and the entire congregation. The location — petach ohel-mo'ed ('the entrance of the tent of meeting') — places their petition at the threshold of sacred space. Their legal claim is made in the most formal, visible setting possible. Five women standing before the entire national leadership to challenge an inheritance law is an act of extraordinary courage.
3. The daughters make a careful legal argument: their father Zelophehad (1) died in the wilderness, (2) was not a Korah rebel (which would have disqualified his family from inheritance), and (3) died for his own ordinary sin without sons. The phrase bechet'o met ('he died for his own sin') may mean he died in the general wilderness judgment against the exodus generation (14:29-35), not for any exceptional transgression. The absence of sons creates the legal gap: the existing inheritance law (which passes land to sons) leaves no provision for families with only daughters.
4. The argument is about shem ('name') — the perpetuation of a family's identity through land ownership. Without an inheritance, Zelophehad's name vanishes from the tribal register. The daughters' request is bold: tenah-lanu achuzzah ('give us a landholding') — they demand what has never been given to women in Israel's land-allocation system. Their argument appeals not to gender equality as a principle but to the preservation of their father's name and legacy within the clan. The case will create new law (v5-11).
5. Moses does not rule on the case himself — he brings it lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD'). The verb hiqriv ('brought near,' from q-r-b) is again the offering word: Moses presents their case to God as one presents a sacrifice. His referral to God is not uncertainty but respect: this case creates new precedent, and only God can establish new law. The daughters' appeal goes all the way to the highest court.
6. God responds directly to the daughters' case — a rare instance of divine adjudication on a specific legal dispute brought by named individuals. God does not merely answer Moses; He responds to Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah.
7. God's verdict: ken benot Tselofchad doverot ('the daughters of Zelophehad speak rightly/correctly'). God validates their argument completely. The emphatic naton titten ('you shall certainly give') — infinitive absolute intensifying the command — leaves no room for equivocation. God does not simply permit the inheritance transfer; He commands it. The daughters' appeal has changed the law. Their courage produced new legislation that will govern Israel permanently (v8-11).
8. The case law generalizes from the specific petition: any man who dies without a son passes his inheritance to his daughter. This is new legislation — prior to this moment, no provision existed for female inheritance. The daughters' case created permanent legal precedent. The phrase vеха'аvartem et-nachalato levitto ('transfer his inheritance to his daughter') establishes female inheritance as Israelite law.
9. The inheritance ladder descends: son daughter (v8) brothers (v9) father's brothers (v10) nearest relative (v11). The daughter's position — second in line, immediately after sons — is remarkable in the ancient Near East. The progressive chain ensures that no inheritance is ever lost from the tribe; it always passes to the closest available relative.
10. The third tier: paternal uncles. The inheritance moves outward from the nuclear family to the extended family. Each step widens the circle while keeping the land within the same clan.
11. The catch-all: lish'ero haqqarov elav mimmishpachto ('to the nearest relative in his clan'). No inheritance is ever lost — it always finds a kinsman. The closing phrase — vehaytah livenei Yisra'el lechuqqat mishpat ('it shall be a legal statute for the Israelites') — elevates the daughters' specific case into permanent law. Five women's petition became the inheritance statute for all Israel. The case demonstrates that the Torah is not static — new situations produce new legislation through authorized channels.

12. The chapter shifts abruptly from inheritance law to Moses's impending death. The Abarim range ('the mountains beyond,' east of the Jordan) includes Mount Nebo, where Moses will die (Deut 34:1). The command ur'eh et-ha'arets ('look at the land') is both gift and grief — Moses may see what he cannot enter. The verb natatti ('I have given') is past tense: God has already given the land to Israel; Moses's exclusion does not affect the gift.
13. The euphemism ne'esafta el-ammekha ('gathered to your people') describes death as reunion — not annihilation but joining those who have gone before. Aaron's death (Num 20:22-29) serves as the precedent: gam-attah ('you too'). The parallel with Aaron includes the shared reason for their exclusion, specified in v14.
14. The reason for Moses's exclusion is stated bluntly: meritem pi ('you rebelled against My command'). The incident at Meribah (Num 20:1-13), where Moses struck the rock instead of speaking to it, is the defining failure of his leadership. The phrase lehaqdishsheni vammayim le'eineihem ('to sanctify Me at the waters before their eyes') specifies the offense: Moses failed to demonstrate God's holiness publicly. Even Moses — the greatest prophet — bears consequences for disobedience. The law applies to everyone.
15. Moses's response to the death announcement is not protest or grief but concern for Israel's future. His first thought is not for himself but for the people he is about to leave. The verb vaydabber ('spoke') — not 'cried out' or 'pleaded' — suggests composed, purposeful speech. Moses has accepted his fate; he now negotiates the succession.
16. Moses's prayer address is unique: Elohei haruchot lekhoh-basar ('God of the spirits of all flesh'). This title, used only here and in 16:22, acknowledges God's intimate knowledge of every person's spirit — He knows who is fit to lead because He knows the inner nature of every human being. Moses does not suggest a candidate; he trusts the God who knows all spirits to select the right one.
17. Moses describes the leader's role with four verbs: go out, come in, lead out, bring in — military and pastoral language combined. The shepherd metaphor — katson asher ein-lahem ro'eh ('like sheep without a shepherd') — is Moses's fear for Israel after his death. Jesus will use this same image in Matthew 9:36 and Mark 6:34. The phrase adat YHWH ('the LORD's community/congregation') reminds God that these are His people, not Moses's — the succession is God's responsibility.
18. God names the successor: Joshua bin-Nun, described as ish asher-ruach bo ('a man in whom is spirit/the Spirit'). The ruach may refer to the Holy Spirit, to leadership capacity, or to the 'spirit of wisdom' Joshua receives (Deut 34:9). The command vesamakhta et-yadekha alav ('lay your hand on him') uses the same semikhah language as the sacrificial system (Lev 1:4) — the laying-on of hands transfers authority from Moses to Joshua. The gesture is public, physical, and irrevocable.
19. The commissioning is public — le'eineihem ('in their sight'). The community witnesses the transfer of authority. Eleazar the priest and the congregation together validate the succession. The verb tsivvith ('commission, give a charge') is from the same root as mitsvah ('commandment') — Joshua's commission is itself a command that binds him to the role.
20. Moses is to transfer mehodekha ('some of your splendor/authority') — not all of it. The word hod means 'majesty, splendor, authority' — Joshua will receive a portion of Moses's leadership presence, enough to command obedience but not the full prophetic intimacy Moses enjoyed with God. The 'some' (me- partitive) is honest about the succession: Joshua will be a capable leader but not another Moses. Deuteronomy 34:10 will confirm this: 'no prophet has arisen since in Israel like Moses.'
21. A critical shift: where Moses spoke with God face to face, Joshua must inquire through the Urim — the priestly oracular device (Exod 28:30). Joshua's access to God is mediated by the high priest, not direct. This marks a diminishment from Mosaic-era leadership: the prophet who heard God's voice directly is replaced by a leader who receives guidance through priestly channels. The phrase al-piv yetse'u ve'al-piv yavo'u ('at his word they go out, at his word they come in') echoes v17's leadership description — the community moves at the leader's direction, which is itself directed by divine consultation.
22. Moses complies immediately: vayya'as Mosheh ka'asher tsivvah YHWH oto ('Moses did as the LORD commanded him'). The obedience formula — which has governed Moses's actions throughout his career — appears one final time in the context of handing over leadership. Moses's last major act of obedience is the installation of his own successor.
23. The semikhah is performed: vayyismokh et-yadav alav ('he laid his hands on him'). Note the plural 'hands' — both of Moses's hands rest on Joshua, transferring the full weight of commissioning. The chapter closes with ka'asher dibber YHWH beyad-Mosheh ('as the LORD had spoken through Moses') — a phrase that will continue to govern Israel's life long after Moses himself is gone. The authority passes; the divine command endures.

Summary: God prescribes the full sacrificial calendar: the daily tamid offering (morning and evening), the Sabbath addition, the new moon offerings, and the spring festival cycle — Passover, the Festival of Unleavened Bread, and the Festival of Weeks (Shavuot). Each occasion specifies exact numbers of bulls, rams, lambs, grain offerings, and drink offerings.

What Makes This Remarkable: The opening command calls the offerings qorbani lachmi ('My offering, My food,' v. 2) — anthropomorphic language that does not claim God eats but frames the sacrificial system as sustaining the covenantal relationship. The qorban (from qarav, 'to draw near') is fundamentally about approach to God's presence. The tamid ('perpetual, continual') offering structures every day around divine encounter: morning and evening, without exception, the relationship is renewed.

Translation Friction: The KJV renders minchah as 'meat offering,' which is misleading — minchah is specifically the grain offering, never meat. We rendered it consistently as 'grain offering.' The measurement terms (issaron for one-tenth ephah, hin for liquid measure) we converted to ratios rather than modern equivalents, since the exact volumes are debated. The phrase reiach nichoach ('pleasing aroma') we retained as a theological metaphor for divine acceptance.

Connections: The tamid offering was established in Exodus 29:38-42. The Passover regulations (vv. 16-25) supplement Exodus 12 and Leviticus 23:5-8. The Festival of Weeks (vv. 26-31) corresponds to Leviticus 23:15-21 and later becomes Pentecost (Acts 2:1). The sacrificial quantities here establish the norms that will govern temple worship through the Second Temple period.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses, instructing him: ²Direct the Israelites and tell them: You must be careful to present My offering — My food for My fire-offerings, a pleasing aroma to Me — at its appointed time. ³Say to them: This is the fire-offering you are to present to the LORD — two unblemished yearling lambs each day as a perpetual ascending offering. ⁴Prepare one lamb in the morning and the second lamb at twilight, ⁵along with a tenth of an ephah of fine flour as a grain offering, mixed with a quarter hin of pressed olive oil. ⁶This is the perpetual ascending offering that was established at Mount Sinai — a pleasing aroma, a fire-offering to the LORD. ⁷Its accompanying drink offering is a quarter hin for each lamb. Pour out this fermented drink offering to the LORD in the holy place. ⁸Prepare the second lamb at twilight with the same grain offering and drink offering as the morning — a fire-offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. ⁹On the Sabbath day: two unblemished yearling lambs, with two-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering, plus its drink offering. ¹⁰This is the ascending offering for each Sabbath, in addition to the perpetual ascending offering and its drink offering. ¹¹At the start of each of your months, present an ascending offering to the LORD: two young bulls, one ram, and seven unblemished yearling lambs. ¹²The grain offering is three-tenths of an ephah of fine flour mixed with oil for each bull, and two-tenths of fine flour mixed with oil for the ram. ¹³And one-tenth of fine flour mixed with oil as a grain offering for each lamb — an ascending offering, a pleasing aroma, a fire-offering to the LORD. ¹⁴Their drink offerings are: half a hin of wine for each bull, a third of a hin for the ram, and a quarter hin for each lamb. This is the monthly ascending offering for every month throughout the year. ¹⁵Also one male goat as a purification offering to the LORD — this is in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its drink offering. ¹⁶On the fourteenth day of the first month, the Passover belonging to the LORD is observed. ¹⁷On the fifteenth day of this month is the festival. For seven days unleavened bread is to be eaten. ¹⁸On the first day there is to be a sacred assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. ¹⁹Present a fire-offering as an ascending offering to the LORD: two young bulls, one ram, and seven yearling lambs — they must be unblemished for your offering. ²⁰Their grain offering is fine flour mixed with oil: prepare three-tenths of an ephah for each bull and two-tenths for the ram. ²¹Prepare one-tenth for each individual lamb across all seven lambs. ²²Also one male goat as a purification offering, to make atonement on your behalf. ²³You are to prepare these in addition to the morning ascending offering that constitutes the perpetual offering. ²⁴In this same manner you are to prepare the offering each day for seven days — food of the fire-offering, a pleasing aroma to the LORD. It is to be prepared in addition to the perpetual ascending offering and its drink offering. ²⁵On the seventh day you are to hold a sacred assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. ²⁶On the Day of Firstfruits, when you present a new grain offering to the LORD at your Festival of Weeks, hold a sacred assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. ²⁷Present an ascending offering as a pleasing aroma to the LORD: two young bulls, one ram, and seven yearling lambs. ²⁸Their grain offering of fine flour mixed with oil: three-tenths of an ephah for each bull and two-tenths for the ram. ²⁹One-tenth for each individual lamb across the seven lambs. ³⁰Include one male goat to make atonement on your behalf. ³¹Prepare these in addition to the perpetual ascending offering and its grain offering. The animals must be unblemished, along with their drink offerings.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard divine speech formula vayedabber YHVH el-Mosheh le'mor introduces a major legislative section on the sacrificial calendar. This formula (dibber, 'spoke') signals authoritative instruction rather than casual conversation.
2. The term qorbani ('My offering') derives from qarav ('to draw near'), emphasizing approach to God rather than mere sacrifice. The phrase lachmi ('My food/bread') uses anthropomorphic language — God does not eat, but the metaphor conveys that offerings sustain the covenantal relationship. The term ishai ('My fire-offerings') and re'ach nichochi ('a pleasing aroma to Me') together express divine acceptance. The word bemo'ado ('at its appointed time') introduces the calendrical framework for the entire section.
3. The kevashim benei-shanah ('yearling lambs') must be temimim ('unblemished, complete') — physically whole animals reflecting the wholeness required in worship. The phrase olah tamid ('perpetual ascending offering') establishes the baseline sacrificial rhythm upon which all other offerings are layered. The olah ('ascending offering') was entirely consumed on the altar, symbolizing total dedication.
4. The Hebrew bein ha'arbayim ('between the two evenings') is a debated time marker — it may refer to the period between afternoon decline and sunset, or between sunset and full darkness. The Pharisaic tradition placed it in the mid-afternoon. This division of the day into morning and twilight sacrifices bookends the daylight hours with worship.
5. The solet ('fine flour') denotes the highest quality milled grain. The KJV's 'meat offering' for minchah is misleading — it is a grain-based offering. The shemen katit ('beaten/pressed oil') specifies premium cold-pressed olive oil. A tenth of an ephah is approximately 2.2 liters of flour; a quarter hin is approximately 1.5 liters of oil.
6. The phrase ha'asuyah behar Sinai ('that was made/established at Mount Sinai') anchors this legislation in the Sinai covenant, grounding the sacrificial calendar in the foundational revelation. The tamid offering is not new but a reaffirmation of what was already instituted (cf. Exodus 29:38-42).
7. The nesekh ('drink offering, libation') was poured out, not consumed. The term shekhar ('strong drink, fermented beverage') is striking here — it normally appears in prohibitions (Leviticus 10:9). Its use in a sacrificial context suggests a potent fermented grape or grain beverage. The phrase baqqodesh ('in the holy place') specifies the sanctuary location for the pouring.
8. The evening offering mirrors the morning one exactly: keminchath habboqer ukhenisku ('like the grain offering of the morning and like its drink offering'). This symmetrical structure frames each day in sacrificial worship, creating a rhythm of perpetual dedication. The parashah petuchah marker {} indicates a major section break in the scroll.
9. The Sabbath musaf ('additional offering') doubles the daily tamid — two extra lambs on top of the regular two. The shenei esronim ('two-tenths') of solet doubles the daily grain portion as well. This doubling reflects the Sabbath's elevated sanctity; the day receives twice the worship investment of ordinary days.
10. The phrase olat Shabbat beShabbato ('the ascending offering of each Sabbath on its Sabbath') uses a distributive construction — every single Sabbath requires this additional offering. Critically, al-olat hatamid ('in addition to the perpetual ascending offering') establishes the layering principle: festival offerings supplement, never replace, the daily tamid.
11. The phrase uverashei chodsheikhem ('at the heads of your months') refers to Rosh Chodesh, the new moon celebration marking each lunar month's beginning. The offering escalates dramatically from the daily tamid — parim benei-vaqar shenayim ('two young bulls'), a single ayil ('ram'), and shiv'ah kevashim ('seven lambs'). This substantial increase signals the elevated significance of monthly renewal.
12. The grain offering scales proportionally to the animal's size: sheloshah esronim ('three-tenths') for each par ('bull'), shenei esronim ('two-tenths') for each ayil ('ram'). This proportional system — three for a bull, two for a ram, one for a lamb (v. 13) — maintains a consistent ratio throughout the sacrificial calendar.
13. The phrase issaron issaron ('a tenth, a tenth') uses repetition distributively — one-tenth of an ephah for each individual lamb. This completes the proportional grain offering scale: 3:2:1 for bull:ram:lamb. The verse concludes with the full formula: olah re'ach nichoach issheh laYHVH, affirming that each offering is acceptable to God.
14. The drink offerings follow their own proportional scale: chatzi hahin ('half a hin', ~3 liters) for a bull, shelishit hahin ('a third', ~2 liters) for a ram, revi'it hahin ('a quarter', ~1.5 liters) for a lamb. The yayin ('wine') is specified here rather than the shekhar of verse 7. The phrase olat chodesh bechodsho lechodshei hashanah ('monthly ascending offering for each month of the year') mandates twelve such celebrations annually.

15. The se'ir izzim ('male goat') serves as a chatat ('purification/sin offering'). The chatat addresses communal impurity that accumulates over the month. The layering principle is reiterated: al-olat hatamid ('in addition to the perpetual ascending offering') — the new moon offerings do not substitute for but supplement the daily tamid.
16. The Pesach ('Passover') falls on the fourteenth of the first month (Nisan/Aviv). The term pesach likely derives from pasach ('to pass over, skip over'), recalling how God passed over Israelite homes during the tenth plague. This verse states the date without offering instructions because the Passover lamb follows its own legislation (Exodus 12); what follows concerns the week-long festival of Unleavened Bread.
17. The chag ('festival, pilgrimage feast') begins the day after Passover. The matzot ('unleavened bread') must be eaten for shiv'at yamim ('seven days'). Leaven symbolizes the old life in Egypt; its removal represents the haste of departure and the purging of corruption. The passive construction ye'akhel ('shall be eaten') makes this a universal obligation.
18. The miqra-qodesh ('sacred assembly, holy convocation') is a called gathering for worship. The prohibition covers kol-melekhet avodah ('any laborious work, occupational work') — this phrase distinguishes festival rest from full Sabbath rest, which prohibits kol-melakhah ('all work'). Food preparation is generally permitted on festival days but not on the Sabbath.
19. The Passover/Matzot offerings match the new moon offerings exactly (v. 11): parim shenayim ('two bulls'), ayil echad ('one ram'), shiv'ah kevashim benei shanah ('seven yearling lambs'). The phrase temimim yihyu lakhem ('they shall be unblemished for you') places the responsibility for quality inspection on the offerers.
20. The minchatam ('their grain offering') follows the standard proportional formula established in verses 12-13: sheloshah esronim laPar ('three-tenths for each bull') and shenei esronim la'ayil ('two-tenths for the ram'). The consistency of these ratios across different festivals underscores the systematic nature of Israelite sacrificial legislation.
21. The distributive issaron issaron ('a tenth, a tenth') emphasizes that each of the shiv'at hakkevashim ('seven lambs') receives its own separate grain portion. The repetition ensures no confusion: seven individual tenth-measures, not one communal portion divided among them.
22. The se'ir chatat echad ('one male goat as purification offering') serves lekhafter aleikhem ('to make atonement/covering for you'). The root k-p-r carries the sense of 'covering over' or 'wiping clean' — the offering purges accumulated impurity so the community can stand in God's presence during the festival.
23. The phrase millevad olat habboqer ('apart from the morning ascending offering') reiterates the layering principle: the festival offerings are supplementary. The relative clause asher le'olat hatamid ('which belongs to the perpetual offering') identifies the morning lamb as part of the ongoing tamid system. Festival worship intensifies but never interrupts the daily rhythm.
24. The phrase ka'ellesh ta'asu layyom shiv'at yamim ('according to these you shall prepare daily for seven days') mandates that the full Matzot offering sequence repeats for the entire festival week. The term lechem ('food, bread') here refers to the offering as God's 'food' — the same anthropomorphic metaphor from verse 2. The total over seven days is substantial: 14 bulls, 7 rams, 49 lambs, plus 7 goats.
25. The festival week concludes as it began (v. 18) with a miqra-qodesh ('sacred assembly') and the prohibition of melekhet avodah ('occupational labor'). This bookending structure — sacred assembly on days one and seven — frames the entire festival as a unified period of consecration. The setumah marker {} signals a minor section break.
26. The yom haBikkurim ('Day of Firstfruits') is also called Shavuot ('Weeks') — beshavu'oteikhem ('at your weeks') refers to the seven-week count from Passover (Leviticus 23:15-16). The minchah chadashah ('new grain offering') features the first wheat of the harvest. This verse provides three names for one festival: Firstfruits, Weeks, and (in later tradition) Pentecost (from the Greek for 'fiftieth').
27. The Shavuot offering matches the Passover/Matzot and new moon offerings in quantity: parim shenayim ('two bulls'), ayil echad ('one ram'), shiv'ah kevashim ('seven yearling lambs'). This uniformity among the spring festivals (excluding Sukkot's distinctive escalation in chapter 29) creates a consistent tier of worship for the pilgrimage festivals.
28. The minchatam solet belulah bashshamen ('their grain offering of fine flour mixed with oil') repeats the standard formula. The proportions remain constant: sheloshah esronim laPar ha'echad ('three-tenths for each bull') and shenei esronim la'ayil ha'echad ('two-tenths for the one ram'). The definite articles (ha'echad) individualize each animal's portion.
29. The distributive issaron issaron ('a tenth, a tenth') is repeated from verse 21 — lakkevash ha'echad ('for each individual lamb') across leshiv'at hakkevashim ('the seven lambs'). Seven separate grain portions, one per lamb, totaling seven-tenths of an ephah for the lamb offerings alone.
30. The se'ir izzim echad ('one male goat') for the Shavuot purification offering mirrors verse 22's Passover provision. The verb lekhafter ('to make atonement, to purge') again employs the k-p-r root. Every major festival requires this purification component — communal gathering before God necessitates communal cleansing.
31. The closing verse reiterates the supplementary nature of festival offerings: millevad olat hatamid uminchat ('apart from the perpetual ascending offering and its grain offering'). The parenthetical temimim yihyu-lakhem ('they shall be unblemished for you') places the quality requirement last as a final emphatic reminder. The parashah petuchah marker {} closes the spring festival cycle, with fall festivals continuing in chapter 29.

Summary: The fall festival offerings are detailed: Yom Teru'ah (the Day of Trumpet Blasts, first of the seventh month), Yom Kippurim (the Day of Atonement, tenth day), and Sukkot (the Festival of Booths, seven days beginning the fifteenth, plus a closing assembly on the eighth day). The Sukkot offerings are by far the most lavish, with a descending sequence of bulls from thirteen on day one to seven on day seven — seventy bulls total.

What Makes This Remarkable: The seventh month is the most festival-dense in the Israelite calendar, and its sacrificial demands dwarf all others. The descending bull count across Sukkot's seven days (13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 7 = 70 total) has generated extensive commentary: rabbinic tradition connected the seventy bulls to the seventy nations of Genesis 10, reading Sukkot as Israel interceding sacrificially for all humanity. The atseret ('closing assembly') on the eighth day (v. 35) reduces the offering to a single bull — an intimate conclusion after the week's abundance.

Translation Friction: The term yom teru'ah ('day of blasting,' v. 1) denotes staccato trumpet or shofar blasts — later tradition identifies this as Rosh Hashanah, but the Torah does not use that name. We rendered teru'ah as 'trumpet blasts' while noting the later identification. The phrase ve'innitem et nafshoteikhem ('you shall afflict your souls,' v. 7) for Yom Kippur fasting resists modern English — 'afflict your souls' is not self-harm but self-denial, particularly fasting. We retained the traditional phrasing.

Connections: The Day of Atonement offerings here supplement the ritual described in Leviticus 16. The Sukkot festival instructions parallel Leviticus 23:33-43 and Deuteronomy 16:13-15. The eighth-day assembly (v. 35) is the atseret referenced in Nehemiah 8:18 and associated in John 7:37 with Jesus's 'rivers of living water' declaration. The seventy-bulls tradition links to the table of nations in Genesis 10.

¹In the seventh month, on the first day of the month, you are to hold a sacred assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. It is a day of trumpet blasts for you. ²Prepare an ascending offering as a pleasing aroma to the LORD: one young bull, one ram, and seven unblemished yearling lambs. ³Their grain offering is fine flour mixed with oil: three-tenths of an ephah for the bull and two-tenths for the ram. ⁴And one-tenth for each lamb across the seven lambs. ⁵Also one male goat as a purification offering to make atonement on your behalf, ⁶These are in addition to the new moon ascending offering with its grain offering, the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering, and their drink offerings according to their prescribed measures — a pleasing aroma, a fire-offering to the LORD. ⁷On the tenth day of this seventh month, hold a sacred assembly. You must practice self-denial, and you must not perform any work at all. ⁸Present an ascending offering to the LORD as a pleasing aroma: one young bull, one ram, and seven yearling lambs — they must be unblemished for your offering. ⁹Their grain offering is fine flour mixed with oil: three-tenths for the bull and two-tenths for the single ram. ¹⁰One-tenth for each lamb across the seven lambs. ¹¹One male goat as a purification offering — this is in addition to the atonement purification offering, the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering, and their drink offerings. ¹²On the fifteenth day of the seventh month, hold a sacred assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. Celebrate a festival to the LORD for seven days. ¹³Present an ascending offering, a fire-offering of pleasing aroma to the LORD: thirteen young bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ¹⁴Their grain offering is fine flour mixed with oil: three-tenths for each of the thirteen bulls, and two-tenths for each of the two rams. ¹⁵And one-tenth for each of the fourteen lambs. ¹⁶Also one male goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ¹⁷On the second day: twelve young bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ¹⁸Their grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs are to follow the prescribed quantities according to their number. ¹⁹Also one male goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offerings. ²⁰On the third day: eleven bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ²¹Their grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs follow the prescribed quantities according to their number. ²²Also one goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ²³On the fourth day: ten bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ²⁴The grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs follow the prescribed quantities according to their number. ²⁵Also one male goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ²⁶On the fifth day: nine bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ²⁷Their grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs follow the prescribed quantities according to their number. ²⁸Also one goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ²⁹On the sixth day: eight bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ³⁰Their grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs are according to the prescribed quantities for their number. ³¹Also one goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offerings. ³²On the seventh day: seven bulls, two rams, and fourteen unblemished yearling lambs. ³³Their grain offerings and drink offerings for the bulls, rams, and lambs follow the prescribed regulations according to their number. ³⁴Also one goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ³⁵On the eighth day you are to hold a closing assembly. You must not perform any occupational labor. ³⁶Present an ascending offering, a fire-offering of pleasing aroma to the LORD: one bull, one ram, and seven unblemished yearling lambs. ³⁷The grain offerings and drink offerings for the bull, the ram, and the lambs follow the prescribed quantities according to their number. ³⁸Also one goat as a purification offering — in addition to the perpetual ascending offering with its grain offering and drink offering. ³⁹These are what you are to prepare for the LORD at your appointed festivals — apart from your vow-offerings and voluntary offerings, whether ascending offerings, grain offerings, drink offerings, or fellowship offerings.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The yom teru'ah ('day of blasting/shouting') opens the fall festival season. The term teru'ah denotes a loud blast — whether from a shofar (ram's horn) or silver trumpet — or a shout of alarm/joy. Later Jewish tradition identifies this as Rosh Hashanah ('Head of the Year'), though the Torah does not use that term. The seventh month (Tishrei) is the most festival-dense month in the calendar.
2. The Trumpets offering is notably smaller than new moon or pilgrimage festivals: only par echad ('one bull') compared to the usual two. This may reflect the day's primary function as proclamation and preparation rather than culmination. The single bull, single ram, and seven lambs create a focused, restrained offering that contrasts sharply with Sukkot's lavish quantities (vv. 13-34).
3. The grain offering proportions follow the standard formula: sheloshah esronim laPar ('three-tenths for the bull') and shenei esronim la'ayil ('two-tenths for the ram'). With only one bull here, the total grain offering is smaller than at new moon or Passover.
4. The issaron echad lakkevsh ha'echad ('one-tenth for each individual lamb') continues the per-lamb distribution. The slightly different phrasing from 28:13's issaron issaron reflects stylistic variation rather than a different requirement — each lamb receives one-tenth of an ephah of flour.
5. The se'ir-izzim echad chatat ('one male goat as purification offering') appears at every festival. As the first of the fall festivals, this purification offering inaugurates the intensifying sequence of atonement that culminates ten days later on Yom Kippur (v. 11). The verb lekhaber ('to make atonement') here prepares the community for the deeper cleansing ahead.
6. Since Trumpets falls on the first day of the seventh month, three layers of offering stack: the tamid (daily), the olat hachodesh ('new moon offering'), and the Trumpets musaf. The phrase kemishpatam ('according to their prescribed measure/regulation') refers to the established drink offering ratios from 28:14. The layering produces an especially full day of sacrifice.
7. Yom Kippur (Day of Atonement) is introduced with the command ve'innitem et-nafshoteikhem ('you shall humble/afflict your souls'). The verb innah ('to humble, afflict, deny') encompasses fasting and abstention from bodily comforts. Notably, the prohibition here is kol-melakhah ('any work whatsoever'), stricter than the festival prohibition of melekhet avodah ('occupational work') — placing Yom Kippur's rest on par with the Sabbath.
8. The Yom Kippur musaf offering matches the Trumpets offering exactly: par echad ('one bull'), ayil echad ('one ram'), shiv'ah kevashim ('seven lambs'). This is the musaf (additional) offering; the distinctive Yom Kippur rituals — the two goats, the scapegoat, the High Priest's entry into the Holy of Holies — are detailed in Leviticus 16, not here. The phrase temimim yihyu lakhem ('they shall be unblemished for you') is especially weighty on the day of ultimate purification.
9. The standard grain proportions apply on Yom Kippur as elsewhere: sheloshah esronim laPar ('three-tenths for the bull') and shenei esronim la'ayil ha'echad ('two-tenths for the one ram'). The consistency underscores that even the most solemn day operates within the same sacrificial system.
10. The distributive issaron issaron repeats the per-lamb allotment. On Yom Kippur, a day of fasting and self-denial, the grain offerings are presented to God while the people abstain — a powerful contrast between human deprivation and divine provision.
11. This verse reveals multiple layers: the se'ir chatat here is the musaf purification offering, distinct from the chatat haKippurim ('the atonement purification offering') of Leviticus 16 — the goat whose blood the High Priest brings into the Holy of Holies. Yom Kippur thus has more purification offerings than any other day, befitting its role as the annual cleansing of the entire sanctuary system.

12. Sukkot ('Booths/Tabernacles') begins five days after Yom Kippur. The phrase vechagotem chag laYHVH shiv'at yamim ('you shall celebrate a festival to the LORD for seven days') uses the verb chagag, which implies pilgrimage and festive celebration with circular dancing. Sukkot is the most elaborate festival in terms of sacrificial requirements, with the bull count creating a distinctive descending pattern over the week.
13. Day one of Sukkot features the most lavish offering in the entire Torah calendar: sheloshah asar parim ('thirteen bulls'), two rams, and arba'ah asar kevashim ('fourteen lambs'). The thirteen bulls begin a seven-day descending sequence (13, 12, 11, 10, 9, 8, 7 = 70 total bulls), which rabbinic tradition associates with the seventy nations of Genesis 10, suggesting Israel's offerings intercede for the entire world.
14. The grain offering for day one alone requires thirty-nine tenths (3×13) for the parim and four tenths (2×2) for the eilim, plus fourteen tenths for the lambs (v. 15) — a total of fifty-seven tenths of an ephah. The phrase lisheloshah asar parim ('for the thirteen bulls') and lishenei ha'eilim ('for the two rams') specifies that each animal receives its individual grain portion.
15. Fourteen lambs — double the usual seven — reflect Sukkot's amplified worship. Each of the arba'ah asar kevashim ('fourteen lambs') receives its own issaron of flour. The doubling of the lamb count (from seven at other festivals to fourteen at Sukkot) further distinguishes this festival's extraordinary scale.
16. Despite Sukkot's dramatically increased ascending offerings, the purification offering remains se'ir echad ('one goat') — the same as every other festival. The chatat is a constant, not scaled to festival importance. The phrase millevad olat hatamid ('apart from the perpetual ascending offering') reiterates that even Sukkot's thirteen bulls do not replace the daily tamid lambs.
17. Day two reduces by one bull: sheneim asar parim ('twelve bulls'). The rams remain shenayim ('two') and the lambs arba'ah asar ('fourteen') throughout all seven days — only the bull count decreases. This descending sequence (13121110987) creates a liturgical countdown toward the culminating eighth-day assembly.
18. The abbreviated formula uminchatam veniskehem ('their grain offerings and drink offerings') with bemisparim kamishpat ('according to their number, as prescribed') avoids repeating the detailed proportions from verses 3-4 and 14-15. This shorthand assumes the reader knows the ratios: 3:2:1 tenths of flour and $\frac{1}{2}:\frac{1}{3}:\frac{1}{4}$ hin of wine for bull:ram:lamb respectively.
19. Day two's purification offering remains se'ir-izzim echad ('one male goat'), identical to day one. The consistent single goat amid the changing bull count suggests that communal purification operates on a different principle than the ascending offerings — one act of cleansing suffices regardless of the day's scale.
20. Day three continues the descent: ashtei-asar parim ('eleven bulls'). The unusual numeral form ashtei-asar is an archaic variant of the more common ashtei-esreh ('eleven'). Rams and lambs remain constant at two and fourteen.
21. The formulaic kamishpat ('according to the regulation') here on day three references the same proportional system. As the bull count decreases, the total flour and wine for day three is slightly less than day two — a gradual diminishing of material expenditure across the week.
22. Day three's purification offering uses se'ir chatat echad ('one goat, purification offering') — the slightly shortened form omits izzim ('of the goats'). The term se'ir alone ('hairy one') sufficiently identifies the male goat. The daily tamid continues alongside.
23. Day four reaches asarah parim ('ten bulls') — the midpoint of the descending sequence. At this point, the cumulative bull total through four days is forty-six (13+12+11+10). The symmetry of the pattern becomes increasingly visible as the count moves toward single digits.
24. Day four omits the conjunctive vav ('and') at the start — minchatam rather than uminchatam — a minor stylistic variation. The proportional formula kamishpat ('as prescribed') remains unchanged. This day's grain offering for bulls alone totals thirty tenths (3×10).
25. Day four's purification offering is identical to the other days: se'ir-izzim echad chatat ('one male goat as purification offering'). The full form with izzim ('of the goats') returns here after the shortened form in verse 22, alternating without semantic difference.
26. Day five prescribes tish'ah parim ('nine bulls'). The cumulative total through five days is now fifty-five bulls (13+12+11+10+9). Some commentators note that each day's bull count corresponds to the days remaining in the full sequence plus the eighth day (day 1: 13 = 7+6; day 5: 9 = 7+2), though this pattern is debated.
27. The refrain uminchatam veniskehem... bemisparim kamishpat ('their grain offerings and drink offerings... according to their number, as prescribed') anchors each day's account to the established ratios. The repetition creates a liturgical rhythm in the text itself, mirroring the daily rhythm of the festival.
28. Day five's purification offering again uses the short form se'ir chatat echad ('one goat, purification offering'). Through five days, five goats have been offered for communal purification — one per day, constant and unwavering while the bulls diminish.
29. Day six prescribes shemonah parim ('eight bulls'). The running total reaches sixty-three (13+12+11+10+9+8). The pattern's inevitability creates anticipation — each day draws closer to the final seven bulls on day seven, when the number of bulls will match the number of days.
30. Day six's grain and drink offering formula is identical in wording to the other days. The repetitive structure through verses 17-34 is intentional in the Torah — the reader (or listener during public reading) experiences the cumulative weight of each day's dedication.
31. A small textual note: this verse ends with unesakheih ('and its drink offerings') using a feminine plural suffix rather than the masculine forms in other days. This may reflect the feminine grammatical gender of olah ('ascending offering') influencing the pronominal reference. The sixth goat joins the steady procession of daily purification.

32. Day seven completes the descent: shiv'ah parim ('seven bulls') — the sacred number that pervades Israel's calendar. The grand total for the seven days is seventy bulls ($13+12+11+10+9+8+7 = 70$), fourteen rams (2×7), and ninety-eight lambs (14×7). Seventy is the number of the nations in Genesis 10, suggesting a cosmic scope to Sukkot's worship.
33. The final day's formula uses kemishpatam ('according to their regulations') with a third-person plural suffix, slightly varying from the usual kamishpat. This minor grammatical shift may reflect the specific reference to each animal category having its own prescribed ratio, summarizing the entire proportional system one last time.
34. Day seven's purification goat brings the Sukkot total to seven goats — matching the seven days and the seven bulls of this final day. The total Sukkot animal count (excluding the tamid) is 70 bulls + 14 rams + 98 lambs + 7 goats = 189 animals, the most elaborate sacrificial week in the Torah.
35. The atzeret ('closing assembly, solemn gathering') on the eighth day is distinct from the seven days of Sukkot proper. The term atzeret derives from atsar ('to restrain, hold back, close'), suggesting a concluding ceremony that 'restrains' the people for one final day of sacred gathering. Later tradition calls this Shemini Atzeret ('Eighth Day of Assembly'), treating it as a separate festival.
36. The eighth day's offerings plummet from day seven's seventeen animals to just nine: par echad ('one bull'), ayil echad ('one ram'), shiv'ah kevashim ('seven lambs'). This dramatic reduction — matching the Trumpets/Yom Kippur scale — creates an intimate conclusion after the week's crescendo. Rabbinic tradition likens it to a king who dismisses his many guests but asks his closest friend to linger one more day.
37. The singular laPar ('for the bull') and la'ayil ('for the ram') — without plural markers — reflects the reduced eighth-day quantities. The formula kamishpat ('as prescribed') applies the same proportional system: three-tenths for the single bull, two-tenths for the single ram, one-tenth each for the seven lambs.
38. The eighth day's purification offering is the final goat in the fall festival sequence: one each on Trumpets, Yom Kippur (musaf), and eight days of Sukkot/Shemini Atzeret = ten total goats across the autumn season. The daily tamid continues beneath all festival layers, a constant heartbeat of Israelite worship.
39. The concluding verse distinguishes obligatory festival offerings from voluntary ones. The phrase levad minidreikhem venidvoteikhem ('apart from your vows and freewill offerings') establishes that the extensive calendar just prescribed is the minimum — individuals may bring additional nedarim ('vow offerings') and nedavot ('voluntary/freewill offerings'). The shalmim ('fellowship/peace offerings') appear here for the first time in chapters 28-29, reminding readers that communal celebration meals accompany the festivals.

Summary: The law of vows: a man's vow is absolutely binding. A woman's vow may be upheld or annulled by her father (if unmarried) or her husband (if married) on the day he hears it. Silence on the day of hearing constitutes ratification. A widow's or divorced woman's vow is fully binding, like a man's. The legislation is delivered uniquely to the rashei hamattot ('heads of the tribes').

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the only Torah law addressed specifically to tribal leaders rather than to the general assembly or to Moses and Aaron — suggesting that vow adjudication was a delegated judicial function. The foundational principle is lo yachel devaro ('he must not break his word,' v. 3), literally 'he must not treat his word as empty/profane.' Speech directed to God creates binding obligation. The annulment provisions operate within a narrow window: the day of hearing. After that, silence becomes consent.

Translation Friction: The verb yachel ('break, profane,' v. 3) from the root ch-l-l means to treat something holy as common. We rendered it 'break his word' for clarity, but the Hebrew implies something stronger: making sacred speech profane. The term issar ('binding obligation, restrictive vow,' v. 4) is distinct from neder ('vow') — an issar is a self-imposed prohibition ('I will not eat X'), while a neder is a dedication ('I will give Y to God'). We distinguished them in the notes.

Connections: The inviolability of vows connects to Deuteronomy 23:21-23 ('when you make a vow to the LORD your God, do not delay in fulfilling it') and Ecclesiastes 5:4-5. Jesus references vow-making traditions in Matthew 5:33-37. The Nazirite vow legislation in Numbers 6 is the most developed example of a neder in practice. The annulment provisions find their closest parallel in the Mishnaic tractate Nedarim.

¹Moses communicated to the Israelites everything exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²Moses addressed the leaders of the tribes on behalf of the Israelites: 'This is what the LORD has commanded.' ³When a man makes a vow to the LORD or takes an oath imposing an obligation on himself, he must not break his word. He must fulfill everything that comes out of his mouth. ⁴When a woman makes a vow to the LORD and takes on a binding obligation while living in her father's house during her youth, ⁵and her father hears about her vow and the obligation she has placed on herself, and her father says nothing to her — then all her vows will remain in force, and every obligation she placed on herself will remain in force. ⁶But if her father overrules her on the day he learns of it, none of her vows or obligations that she placed on herself will remain in force. The LORD will release her from liability, because her father overruled her. ⁷If she marries while her vows are still binding on her, or while a rash statement from her lips by which she obligated herself is still in effect, ⁸and her husband hears about it and says nothing to her on the day he learns of it, then her vows will remain in force, and the obligations she placed on herself will remain in force. ⁹But if on the day her husband hears about it he overrules her and annuls the vow that was binding on her, along with the rash statement from her lips by which she obligated herself, then the LORD will release her from liability. ¹⁰Any vow made by a widow or a divorced woman — every obligation she has placed on herself — will be binding on her. ¹¹If she made a vow while living in her husband's household, or bound herself with an obligation under oath, ¹²and her husband hears about it but says nothing to her — he does not overrule her — then all her vows will remain in force, and every obligation she placed on herself will remain in force. ¹³But if her husband completely annuls them on the day he hears about them, then nothing that came from her lips — whether vows or obligations upon herself — will remain in force. Her husband has annulled them, and the LORD will release her from liability. ¹⁴Every vow and every sworn obligation involving self-denial — her husband may uphold it, or her husband may annul it. ¹⁵If her husband keeps entirely silent toward her from one day to the next, then he has upheld all her vows and all her obligations that are binding on her. He has upheld them by his silence on the day he heard about them. ¹⁶But if he annuls them some time after the day he heard about them, then he will bear her guilt. ¹⁷These are the statutes that the LORD commanded Moses governing the relationship between a husband and his wife, and between a father and his daughter during her youth while she lives in her father's household.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse closes the preceding section on festival offerings (Numbers 29) and serves as a bridge to the vow legislation that follows. In Hebrew versification this is 30:1, corresponding to 29:40 in English Bibles. The phrase kekhol asher tsivvah ('according to all that He commanded') emphasizes Moses's role as faithful mediator — he transmitted God's instructions without alteration or omission. The paragraph marker (pe) signals a major section break before the vow laws begin.
2. Moses delivers the vow legislation specifically to rashei hamattot ('the heads of the tribes' — tribal chieftains), not to the entire assembly. This is the only law in the Torah introduced this way, suggesting that vow adjudication was a responsibility delegated to tribal leadership. The term mattot ('tribes,' literally 'staffs/rods') emphasizes the authority structure — each tribe had its own judicial apparatus for resolving vow disputes between family members.
3. The verse establishes three distinct categories of verbal commitment: neder ('vow' — a positive pledge to do something or dedicate something to God), shevuah ('oath' — a sworn declaration invoking God's name), and issar ('obligation, binding restriction' — a self-imposed limitation, often involving abstinence). The phrase lo yachel devaro ('he must not profane/break his word') uses the root ch-l-l ('profane, make common'), implying that a spoken vow has sacred status — breaking it is a form of desecration. The opening ish ki yiddor ('when a man vows') establishes the baseline: a man's vow is unconditionally binding. The rest of the chapter then addresses the exceptions for women under male authority.
4. The shift from ish ('man') to ishah ('woman') introduces the chapter's central concern: under what conditions can a woman's vow be overridden? The qualifying phrase bevet aviha bine'ureha ('in her father's house in her youth') establishes the first legal category — an unmarried young woman still under paternal authority. The term ne'urim ('youth') denotes the period before marriage when a daughter remained part of her father's household and under his legal jurisdiction. Her vow is real but conditional on paternal ratification.
5. The verb hecharish ('he remained silent, he said nothing') is the legal mechanism of ratification. Silence equals consent — by not objecting, the father validates the vow. The verb qum ('to stand, to arise') is used in its legal sense of 'remaining valid/binding.' The phrase asrah al nafshah ('she bound upon herself') uses nefesh not as 'soul' in the Greek philosophical sense but as the whole person — the obligation falls on her entire life, not just her inner state. Paternal silence transforms a conditional vow into an unconditional one.
6. The verb heni ('he overruled, he restrained, he disallowed') from the root n-w- conveys active opposition — the father must expressly object, not merely disapprove silently. The time limit beyom shom'o ('on the day he hears') is critical: the father's window for annulment is the same day he learns of the vow. Delay implies consent. The phrase YHWH yislah lah ('the LORD will release/forgive her') uses s-l-ch in its legal-release sense rather than its moral-forgiveness sense — she is discharged from the vow's obligation, not pardoned for wrongdoing. The vow was legitimate; it was simply overridden by legitimate authority.

7. The infinitive absolute construction hayo tiyeh le'ish ('if she indeed becomes [wife] to a man') introduces the second legal scenario: a woman who marries with pre-existing vows. The term mivta sefateha ('the utterance of her lips') introduces a new category — a rash or impulsive verbal commitment, distinct from a formal neder. The root b-t-' suggests hasty speech, an unpremeditated promise. This category is significant because it acknowledges that not all binding statements are carefully considered vows — even impulsive words carry legal weight.
8. The same legal mechanism that applied to the father (v 5) now applies to the husband: hecharish lah ('he was silent toward her') constitutes ratification. Upon marriage, authority over a woman's vows transfers from father to husband. The verb qum ('stand') appears twice — once for vows (nedarim) and once for obligations (esareha) — emphasizing that both categories of verbal commitment are validated by the husband's silence. The husband inherits whatever vow-related authority the father previously held.
9. Two verbs describe the husband's action: yani ('he overrules/restrains' — the same root as the father's action in v 6) and hefer ('he annuls, he breaks, he renders void' — from the root p-r-r, 'to break, to frustrate'). The verb hefer is stronger than heni — it describes the complete dissolution of the vow's binding force. The repeated formula YHWH yislah lah ('the LORD will release her') establishes a theological principle: when legitimate authority annuls a vow, God Himself recognizes the annulment. The woman is not guilty of breaking a vow — the vow has been legally dissolved.
10. This verse identifies the third legal category: the almanah ('widow') and gerushah ('divorced woman'). These women have no male authority figure to annul their vows, so their verbal commitments are unconditionally binding — identical to the rule for men in verse 3. The placement of this verse is structurally important: it interrupts the married-woman regulations (vv 7-9, 11-16) to establish that the annulment provisions apply only when a woman is under active male authority. A woman who has been widowed or divorced has full legal autonomy over her own vows.
11. The fourth legal scenario: a woman who makes a vow during marriage (beit ishah — 'in her husband's house'), as opposed to bringing pre-existing vows into the marriage (v 7). The addition of bishvu'ah ('with an oath') specifies that the obligation was formalized by swearing — a more solemn category of commitment. The phrase beit ishah ('her husband's house') denotes both physical residence and legal domain — the household in which the husband exercises authority.
12. This verse adds an explicit double condition for ratification: hecharish lah ('he said nothing to her') and lo heni otah ('he did not overrule her'). The redundancy serves a legal purpose — it establishes that mere awareness combined with silence constitutes binding consent. A husband cannot later claim he passively disapproved; silence is active ratification in this legal framework. The verb qum ('stand, remain valid') appears for both nedarim ('vows') and issar ('obligation'), confirming that all categories of verbal commitment are validated.
13. The infinitive absolute hafer yafer ('he will certainly annul, he will completely break') intensifies the husband's action — this is total and decisive nullification, not partial modification. The phrase kol motsa sefateha ('everything that went out from her lips') encompasses all verbal commitments regardless of category. The verse then restates the principle: ishah heferem ('her husband has annulled them') — the past tense indicates a completed legal act. And again, YHWH yislah lah ('the LORD will release her') — divine recognition of human legal authority when exercised within its proper scope.
14. The phrase le'annot nafesh ('to afflict/deny the self') specifies a particular category of vow — self-denial, which could include fasting, abstaining from certain foods, sexual abstinence, or other forms of personal deprivation. The same phrase appears in Leviticus 16:29 and 23:27 for Yom Kippur observance. The husband's authority (yeqimennu... yeferennu — 'he may uphold it... he may annul it') is presented as a binary — there is no middle ground. This verse may be singled out because self-denial vows directly affect the household: a wife's fasting or abstinence impacts the husband and family.
15. The infinitive absolute hacharesh yacharish ('being silent he is silent' — completely silent) intensifies the husband's inaction. The time phrase miyom el yom ('from day to day') indicates that the window for annulment closes at the end of the day he first heard the vow. Once a new day begins, his silence has become permanent ratification. The verb heqim ('he has upheld, he has established') from q-w-m is the legal opposite of hefer ('he annulled'). The verse explicitly identifies the mechanism: ki hecherish lah beyom shom'o ('because he was silent toward her on the day he heard') — silence on the critical day is the decisive act.
16. The phrase acharei shom'o ('after his hearing' — after the day he heard) establishes a critical legal boundary: annulment after the permitted window is invalid. The husband who attempts a late annulment creates a situation where his wife cannot fulfill a vow she legitimately made, and he bears the liability. The phrase venasa et avonah ('he will bear her guilt/iniquity') transfers culpability — the root n-s-' ('to carry, to bear') combined with avon ('guilt, punishment, iniquity') is a standard formula for assuming responsibility for consequences (cf. Leviticus 5:1, 17). This is the chapter's only punitive provision directed at the male authority figure.
17. The closing formula elleh hachuqqim ('these are the statutes') frames the entire chapter as established law (choq — 'statute, decree, fixed rule'), not merely guidance or advice. The chapter addresses exactly two relational categories: ish le'ishto ('a man and his wife') and av levitto ('a father and his daughter'). The qualifying phrase bine'ureha beit aviha ('in her youth, in her father's house') limits the father's annulment authority to the period before marriage. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the section. Notably, the chapter establishes no authority for brothers, uncles, or other male relatives — only fathers and husbands may annul a woman's vows.

Summary: Moses's final military commission: God commands retribution against Midian for the Baal Peor apostasy. Twelve thousand warriors defeat the Midianites, killing five kings and Balaam. Moses instructs purification of warriors and spoils. The plunder is divided in precise halves between fighters and the community, with a levy for the LORD (one-fiftieth from the warriors' share, one-five-hundredth from the community's). The officers report not a single Israelite soldier lost.

What Makes This Remarkable: The niqmah ('retribution,' v. 2) is not personal revenge but covenantal justice for Midian's role in the Baal Peor crisis. The war's connection to Balaam is made explicit: Balaam is killed in the battle (v. 8), and verse 16 attributes the Baal Peor strategy to his counsel (bidvar Bil'am). The mathematical precision of the spoil division — exact halves, precise levies — transforms a military campaign into an exercise in sacred accounting. The officers' gold offering (v. 50) is voluntary atonement, framed as kapparah ('covering') for their lives.

Translation Friction: The cognate accusative neqom niqmat ('execute the retribution,' v. 2) uses intensification to distinguish this from personal vendetta — we rendered it 'carry out the retribution' rather than 'avenge.' The euphemism te'asef el ammekha ('you will be gathered to your people,' v. 2) for Moses's death we kept as 'gathered to your ancestors,' preserving the communal afterlife imagery. The purification protocols for metal objects (v. 22-23) distinguish fire-purifiable metals from water-purifiable ones.

Connections: Balaam's death (v. 8) closes the narrative arc begun in Numbers 22-24. The Midianite strategy is attributed to Balaam in verse 16, connecting to Revelation 2:14. The division of spoils establishes a precedent cited in 1 Samuel 30:24-25 (David's ruling at Ziklag). Moses's death announcement (v. 2) echoes Numbers 27:13 and anticipates Deuteronomy 32:48-52.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²Carry out the retribution of the Israelites against the Midianites. After that, you will be gathered to your ancestors. ³Moses addressed the people: 'Equip men from among you for military service, so they can march against Midian and execute the LORD's retribution on Midian.' ⁴One thousand from each tribe — from every tribe of Israel you are to send to the campaign. ⁵So twelve thousand men were mustered from the contingents of Israel — one thousand per tribe — equipped and ready for battle. ⁶Moses dispatched them to the campaign — one thousand per tribe — along with Phinehas son of Eleazar the priest, who carried the sacred vessels and the signal trumpets. ⁷They waged war against Midian exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses, and they killed every male. ⁸They killed the kings of Midian along with the rest of the fallen: Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba — five Midianite kings. They also put Balaam son of Beor to death by the sword. ⁹The Israelites captured the Midianite women and their dependents, and plundered all their livestock, all their herds, and all their wealth. ¹⁰They burned down all their towns — every settlement — along with all their encampments. ¹¹They gathered all the plunder and all the captured spoils, both human and animal. ¹²They brought the captives, the seized spoils, and the plunder to Moses, to Eleazar the priest, and to the assembled Israelite community at the camp on the Moabite plains beside the Jordan across from Jericho. ¹³Moses, Eleazar the priest, and all the leaders of the community went out to meet them outside the camp. ¹⁴Moses was furious with the commanders of the force — the officers over thousands and the officers over hundreds — who were returning from the military campaign. ¹⁵Moses demanded of them, 'You have let all the females survive?' ¹⁶Look — these are the very ones who, on Balaam's advice, drew the Israelites into unfaithfulness against the LORD in the Peor affair, which brought the plague on the LORD's community! ¹⁷Now then — kill every male child among the dependents, and kill every woman who has had sexual relations with a man. ¹⁸But all the young girls who have not had sexual relations with a man — let them live. They are yours. ¹⁹As for you — remain outside the camp for seven days. Anyone who has killed a person and anyone who has touched a corpse must undergo purification on the third day and on the seventh day, both you and your captives. ²⁰You must also purify every garment, every leather article, everything made of goat hair, and every wooden object. ²¹Eleazar the priest then instructed the soldiers returning from the campaign: 'This is the statute of the Law that the LORD commanded Moses:' ²²However — the gold, the silver, the copper, the iron, the tin, and the lead — ²³anything that can withstand fire, you must pass through fire and it will be clean — but it must still be purified with the water of lustration. Anything that cannot withstand fire you must pass through water. ²⁴You must wash your clothing on the seventh day, and then you will be clean. After that you may enter the camp. ²⁵The LORD spoke to Moses: ²⁶Take a full inventory of the captured spoils — both human and animal — you along with Eleazar the priest and the ancestral heads of the community. ²⁷Divide the captured spoils in two: one half for the combat soldiers who went on the campaign, and one half for the rest of the community. ²⁸From the soldiers' half — the men of war who went on campaign — levy a tax for the LORD: one out of every five hundred, from the people, from the cattle, from the donkeys, and from the sheep. ²⁹Take it from their half and give it to Eleazar the priest as the LORD's sacred contribution. ³⁰From the Israelite community's half, take one out of every fifty — from the people, from the cattle, from the donkeys, from the sheep, from all the livestock — and give them to the Levites who maintain the service of the LORD's Tabernacle. ³¹Moses and Eleazar the priest carried it out exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ³²The total captured plunder — the remainder of the spoils that the military force had seized — amounted to: 675,000 sheep and goats, ³³72,000 cattle, ³⁴61,000 donkeys, ³⁵and 32,000 persons — women who had not had sexual relations with a man. ³⁶The soldiers' half — the portion belonging to those who went on campaign — included: 337,500 sheep and goats, ³⁷of which the LORD's levy from the sheep was 675. ³⁸The cattle numbered 36,000, of which the LORD's levy was 72. ³⁹The donkeys numbered 30,500, of which the LORD's levy was 61. ⁴⁰The persons numbered 16,000, of which the LORD's levy was 32 persons. ⁴¹Moses gave the levy — the LORD's sacred contribution — to Eleazar the priest, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁴²As for the Israelite community's half, which Moses had separated from the soldiers' portion — ⁴³the community's half of the sheep and goats was 337,500, ⁴⁴36,000 cattle, ⁴⁵30,500 donkeys, ⁴⁶and 16,000 persons. ⁴⁷From the Israelite community's half, Moses took one out of every fifty — from both humans and animals — and gave them to the Levites who maintained the service of the LORD's Tabernacle, exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ⁴⁸Then the appointed officers over the military units — the commanders of thousands and the commanders of hundreds — approached Moses. ⁴⁹They reported to Moses, 'Your servants have conducted a count of the fighting men under our command, and not a single man is missing from our ranks.' ⁵⁰So we have brought the LORD's offering — whatever gold articles each man found: armlets, bracelets, signet rings, earrings, and pendants — to make expiation for ourselves in the LORD's presence. ⁵¹Moses and Eleazar the priest accepted the gold from them — all of it crafted articles. ⁵²The total gold of the contribution that the commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds dedicated to the LORD came to 16,750 shekels. ⁵³(The common soldiers had each kept their own personal plunder.) ⁵⁴Moses and Eleazar the priest accepted the gold from the commanders of thousands and hundreds and brought it into the Tent of Meeting as a memorial for the Israelites in the LORD's presence.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard prophetic revelation formula vaydabber YHWH el Moshe le'mor ('the LORD spoke to Moses, saying') introduces what will be Moses's final military commission. The placement of this command immediately after the festival calendar (Numbers 28-29) and vow legislation (Numbers 30) signals a transition from cultic legislation to narrative action. This war against Midian will be Moses's last act of leadership before his death.
2. The imperative neqom niqmat ('execute the vengeance/retribution of') uses the cognate accusative construction for intensification. The niqmah is not personal revenge but covenantal retribution for Midian's role in the Baal-Peor apostasy (Numbers 25). The euphemism te'asef el ammekha ('you will be gathered to your people') denotes death — Moses's final task is framed as prerequisite to his departure. God links national justice to leadership transition: the Midianite threat must be neutralized before Israel enters Canaan under new leadership.
3. Moses reframes the mission: while God said niqmat benei Yisra'el ('the retribution of the Israelites,' v. 2), Moses says niqmat YHWH ('the LORD's retribution'). Both perspectives are correct — the war simultaneously defends Israel's interests and carries out divine judgment. The verb hechaletsu ('arm yourselves, equip for battle') from ch-l-ts implies stripping down for combat readiness. Only a select force is mobilized, not the entire nation.
4. The repetition elef lamattech elef lamattech ('a thousand per tribe, a thousand per tribe') emphasizes equal representation. Each of the twelve tribes contributes identically, making this a unified national action rather than a regional campaign. The total force of 12,000 is modest compared to the full census numbers, suggesting this is a targeted punitive expedition rather than a total war. The term tsava ('military campaign, army') carries both the sense of organized military service and the cosmic army of God.
5. The passive vayyimaseru ('they were mustered, they were handed over') from m-s-r suggests a formal conscription process. The term chalutzei tsava ('battle-ready troops,' literally 'stripped/equipped ones of the army') indicates soldiers prepared for immediate combat. The root ch-l-ts in the military sense means 'stripped for action' — soldiers who have shed anything that would impede fighting. The precise 12,000 figure underscores the orderly, proportional nature of the mobilization.

6. Phinehas leads rather than Moses or Eleazar because of his demonstrated zeal at Baal-Peor (Numbers 25:7-13), the very incident this war avenges. The kelei haqqodesh ('sacred vessels') likely included the Urim and Thummim or the Ark's breastpiece for divine consultation, though the text does not specify. The chatsotsrot hateru'ah ('trumpets of alarm/signal') are the silver trumpets prescribed in Numbers 10:1-10 for military signaling. Their presence marks this as a holy war — a campaign conducted under divine authority with priestly, not merely military, leadership.
7. The verb vayyitsbe'u ('they campaigned, they waged war') from ts-b- connects to the tsava ('army/campaign') language throughout this chapter. The phrase ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Moshe ('as the LORD commanded Moses') is a compliance formula — the campaign followed divine orders precisely. The killing of kol zakhar ('every male') refers to combatant males in the targeted Midianite settlements, following the pattern of ancient Near Eastern warfare where adult males constituted the military threat.
8. The five Midianite kings are called melakhim here but nesi'ei Midyan ('chieftains of Midian') in Joshua 13:21, suggesting they were regional overlords rather than monarchs of a unified state. Zur is likely the father of Cozbi, the Midianite woman killed by Phinehas at Baal-Peor (Numbers 25:15), connecting this war directly to that event. Balaam's death is noted separately with emphasis — he is killed becherev ('by the sword'), highlighting his culpability. Though he could not curse Israel directly (Numbers 22-24), he apparently counseled Midian to seduce Israel through apostasy (v. 16), making him the architect of the Peor disaster.
9. Three categories of seizure are listed: human captives (nashim and taf — women and children/dependents), livestock (behemah and miqneh — domestic animals and herds), and material wealth (cheil — goods, resources, valuables). The verb vayyishbu ('they captured') from sh-b-h specifically denotes taking captives, while bazazu ('they plundered') from b-z-z covers material goods. This initial capture of all women will become the source of Moses's anger in verse 14, since it was the Midianite women who instigated the Baal-Peor crisis.
10. Two types of Midianite habitation are destroyed: arim bemoshevtam ('cities in their dwelling-places' — permanent settlements) and tivotam ('their encampments/walled camps'). The term tirah (plural tivot) refers to semi-permanent encampments surrounded by walls or hedges, reflecting the semi-nomadic character of Midianite society. The total destruction by fire (sarefu va'esh) ensures the settlements cannot be reoccupied and removes the infrastructure that supported Midianite power in the region.
11. Two distinct terms for war gains appear: shalal ('plunder' — material goods taken in war) and malqoach ('captured spoils' — specifically what is 'taken' or seized, from l-q-ch 'to take'). The distinction ba'adam uvabbehmah ('among humans and among animals') indicates that both categories of plunder included living captives. The malqoach likely refers to the captive persons and livestock, while shalal covers material wealth — gold, silver, textiles, and other portable goods.
12. Three categories arrive at camp: hashevi ('the captives' — human prisoners), hammalqoach ('the seized spoils'), and hashlal ('the plunder'). The location marker arvot Mo'av asher al Yarden Yereicho ('the plains of Moab by the Jordan of Jericho') is the staging area for the entire final section of Numbers and Deuteronomy — Israel's last encampment before crossing into Canaan. The setumah paragraph marker signals a pause before Moses's confrontation with the returning officers.
13. The leadership delegation — Moses, Eleazar, and kol nesi'ei ha'edah ('all the chieftains of the community') — meets the army outside the camp (michuts lamachaneh) rather than inside it. This is both protocol and necessity: soldiers returning from battle carry corpse-contamination (tumat met) and cannot enter the camp until purified. The fact that the entire leadership goes out signals both the importance of the occasion and the impending confrontation over the captive women.
14. The verb vayyiqtsaf ('he was furious') indicates intense, burning anger — stronger than mere displeasure. Moses directs his rage specifically at pequdei hachayil ('the appointed officers of the force'), not at the common soldiers, holding leadership accountable for the decision to spare all the women. The military hierarchy of sarei ha'alafim vesarei hame'ot ('commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds') reflects the decimal organization established in Exodus 18:21. The term tseva hammilchamah ('the campaign of war') emphasizes this was a specific military operation, not general warfare.
15. The terse question hachiyyitem kol neqevah ('have you kept alive every female?') expresses incredulous anger. The verb chiyyitem from ch-y-h in the Pi'el means 'to let live, to preserve alive' — an active decision, not passive oversight. Moses is outraged because these same women were the agents of Israel's apostasy at Baal-Peor. The brevity of the question — only three Hebrew words — heightens its rhetorical force.
16. This verse reveals information not recorded in Numbers 25: Balaam was the strategist behind Midian's seduction of Israel. The phrase bidvar Bil'am ('by the word/counsel of Balaam') connects the seer who could not curse Israel (Numbers 22-24) to the scheme that nearly destroyed them from within. The term ma'al ('unfaithfulness, treachery, breach of trust') is a covenant term — it denotes betrayal of a relationship, not mere rule-breaking. The reference to hammagfeah ('the plague') points back to the 24,000 who died (Numbers 25:9). Moses's logic is clear: sparing these women reintroduces the very threat the war was meant to eliminate.
17. Moses orders two groups eliminated: kol zakhar battaf ('every male among the children/dependents') and kol israh yoda'at ish lemishkav zakhar ('every woman who has known a man sexually'). The phrase yoda'at ish ('knowing a man') uses the verb y-d- in its intimate/sexual sense. The term mishkav zakhar ('lying with a male') is a technical expression for sexual intercourse. The rationale is strategic elimination of future military threats (males) and of women who participated in the Peor seduction. This is among the most ethically challenging passages in the Torah, confronting readers with the extremity of ancient warfare.

18. The surviving group is kol hattaf bannashim asher lo yade'u mishkav zakhar ('all the young females among the dependents who have not known sexual intercourse with a man'). The verb hachiyu ('keep alive, let live') from ch-y-h is the same verb used in verse 15 — there in accusation, here in command. The phrase lakhem ('for yourselves') indicates these girls would be absorbed into Israelite households, presumably as adopted members or future wives. They were deemed innocent of participation in the Peor seduction due to their age.
19. The seven-day quarantine outside the camp follows the corpse-contamination laws of Numbers 19. Two sources of impurity are specified: horeg nefesh ('one who has killed a person' — direct contact with death through killing) and noge'a bechalal ('one who has touched a corpse' — secondary contact). The purification verb titchatte'u (from ch-t-') denotes ritual decontamination using the red heifer ashes (Numbers 19:17-19). Both the soldiers (attem) and their captives (shevikhem) must be purified — impurity is indiscriminate and contaminates regardless of status.
20. Four categories of materials require purification: beged ('garment' — woven textiles), keli or ('leather article'), ma'aseh izzim ('goat-hair product' — coarser textiles and tent fabrics), and keli ets ('wooden implement'). These materials can absorb impurity and must be decontaminated. The comprehensive list — covering clothing, leather goods, textiles, and woodwork — ensures nothing contaminated enters the camp. The setumah marker after this verse signals a pause before Eleazar's additional purification instructions in the next section.
21. Eleazar now supplements Moses's purification instructions with additional legislation about metal objects. The phrase chuqqat haTorah ('the statute of the Torah/instruction') presents this as binding legal precedent, not situational guidance. Eleazar speaks with derived authority — asher tsivvah YHWH et Moshe ('which the LORD commanded Moses') — channeling the command through the Mosaic chain. This is one of the few passages where Eleazar independently delivers legislation, foreshadowing his role as priestly authority after Moses's death.
22. Six metals are catalogued: zahav ('gold'), kesef ('silver'), nechoshet ('copper/bronze'), barzel ('iron'), bedil ('tin'), and oferet ('lead'). This list represents the complete metallurgical knowledge of the Late Bronze/Early Iron Age Near East. These metals require a different purification process than organic materials because they can withstand fire. The word akh ('however, only') signals an exception clause — metals follow a different rule than the textiles and leather items listed in verse 20.
23. A dual purification system is established: fire-resistant items undergo both fire (ta'aviru va'esh — 'you shall pass through fire') and mei niddah ('water of lustration/separation' — the purification water containing red heifer ashes from Numbers 19). Items that melt or burn (lo yavo va'esh — 'cannot come into fire') need only water purification. The mei niddah is a technical term: niddah here means 'separation/removal' of impurity, not menstrual impurity. The fire-then-water sequence for metals establishes a principle that physical cleaning alone is insufficient — ritual purification must follow.
24. The final purification step is kibbastam bigdeikhem ('you shall launder your garments') on the seventh day — the culmination of the purification period that began in verse 19. The verb k-b-s refers specifically to laundering fabric, distinct from r-ch-ts (washing the body). The sequence is precise: after seven days of quarantine, corpse-contamination sprinkling on days three and seven (per Numbers 19), and laundering, the soldiers achieve taharah ('cleanness') and may re-enter the sacred space of the camp. The setumah marker signals the transition to spoils-division legislation.
25. A fresh divine speech formula introduces the spoils-division legislation. This new section (vv. 25-47) establishes a detailed protocol for distributing war plunder — a topic not previously addressed in Israelite law. The divine origin of the distribution formula gives it the authority of permanent legislation, not ad hoc arrangement. This protocol will serve as precedent for future military campaigns.
26. The phrase sa et rosh malqoach hashevi ('lift up the head of the captured plunder') uses the census idiom sa et rosh ('take a head-count') applied to spoils rather than persons. The counting authority is tripartite: Moses (civil leader), Eleazar (priestly authority), and rashei avot ha'edah ('the ancestral/clan heads of the community' — tribal elders). This three-part oversight ensures accountability and transparency in distribution. The inventory covers both ba'adam ('among humans') and babbehemah ('among animals').
27. The fundamental division is binary: half to tofsei hammilchamah ('those who seized the war' — active combatants who fought) and half to kol ha'edah ('the entire community' — those who remained in camp). This 50/50 split between fighters and non-combatants is distinctive. David later codified a similar principle in 1 Samuel 30:24-25: 'The share of the one who stayed with the supplies shall be the same as the share of the one who went into battle.' The community's share recognizes that the war was fought on behalf of all Israel, not just the 12,000 soldiers.
28. The soldiers' tribute (mekhes) to the LORD is 1/500 (0.2%). The term mekhes ('levy, tax, tribute') appears only in this chapter in the Torah, suggesting this is specialized war-taxation vocabulary. The levy applies across all four plunder categories: adam ('persons'), baqar ('cattle'), chamorim ('donkeys'), and tso'n ('sheep/goats'). The soldiers' tax rate is lower than the community's (1/500 vs. 1/50), perhaps because they risked their lives and already earned their share through combat service.
29. The soldiers' 1/500 levy goes directly to Eleazar as terumat YHWH ('the LORD's contribution/offering'). The term terumah (from r-w-m 'to lift up, to elevate') denotes something separated and elevated for sacred use — here, a portion of war spoils consecrated to God through priestly custody. This establishes the priesthood as the custodian of the LORD's share of war plunder, creating a revenue stream for the sanctuary from military campaigns.
30. The community's levy is 1/50 (2%) — ten times higher than the soldiers' rate of 1/500. This larger share goes to the Levites rather than the priests, described as shomrei mishmeret mishkan YHWH ('those who keep the charge/service of the LORD's Tabernacle'). The term mishmeret ('charge, duty, guard service') emphasizes the Levites' ongoing responsibility for maintaining and transporting the Tabernacle. The higher rate from non-combatants may reflect the principle that those who did not risk their lives contribute more of their share to sacred service.

31. The compliance formula vayya'as Moshe ve'El'azar hakkohen ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Moshe ('Moses and Eleazar the priest did as the LORD commanded Moses') serves as both conclusion to the instructions and introduction to the detailed inventory that follows. The pairing of Moses and Eleazar throughout this chapter anticipates the coming leadership transition — Eleazar will continue as priestly authority after Moses's death, ensuring institutional continuity.
32. The inventory begins with hammalqoach yeter habbaz ('the captured spoils, the remainder of the plunder'), distinguishing between what was taken in total (malqoach) and what remained after the battlefield (yeter habbaz — 'the surplus of the plunder'). The massive number of tso'n (675,000 sheep and goats) reflects the pastoral wealth of Midian, a semi-nomadic society whose economy centered on livestock. Whether these figures are literal or use the military convention where elef can mean 'clan/unit' rather than 'thousand' is debated by scholars.
33. The baqar ('cattle') figure of 72,000 represents the larger livestock. The term baqar covers oxen and cows — draft and dairy animals that were more valuable per head than sheep or goats but less numerous. The four-category inventory (sheep, cattle, donkeys, persons) parallels the four categories that will be subject to the LORD's levy in the division that follows.
34. Donkeys (chamorim) were the primary transport animals of the ancient Near East before widespread horse domestication. The 61,000 donkeys represent Midian's trade and transport capacity — Midian's location along major trade routes (they appear as traders in the Joseph narrative, Genesis 37:28) made donkeys essential to their economy. Their capture would severely impair Midianite commercial activity.
35. The final plunder category uses nefesh adam ('human persons') rather than a gendered term, then specifies min hannashim asher lo yade'u mishkav zakhar ('from the women who had not known sexual intercourse with a man'). The term nefesh ('person, living being') humanizes the captives even within the inventory context. These 32,000 represent the girls and young women spared under Moses's directive in verse 18. The number is strikingly large and raises questions about the scale conventions used in ancient Near Eastern military records.
36. The detailed halving begins with the soldiers' share (chelek hayyots'im batsava — 'the portion of those going out to the campaign'). The figure 337,500 is exactly half of 675,000, demonstrating the mathematical precision of the account. The meticulous record-keeping — verifiable at every step — serves both to establish transparency in the distribution and to demonstrate that the divine command was executed with exact fidelity.
37. The soldiers' sheep levy: 675 out of 337,500 = exactly 1/500 (0.2%), confirming the rate prescribed in verse 28. The mathematical precision ($337,500 \div 500 = 675$) is deliberate — each calculation in this section can be independently verified, lending the account an air of auditable accountability. These 675 animals went to Eleazar the priest as the LORD's portion.
38. The soldiers' cattle half: 36,000 (half of 72,000), with the LORD's levy of 72 ($36,000 \div 500 = 72$). Again, the arithmetic is exact. The detailed enumeration of each category — sheep, cattle, donkeys, persons — with its corresponding levy demonstrates that the divine tax was applied uniformly and completely. No category was exempted from the sacred contribution.
39. The soldiers' donkey half: 30,500 (half of 61,000), with the LORD's levy of 61 ($30,500 \div 500 = 61$). The consistency of the 1/500 rate across all four categories ensures equitable treatment. Each levy figure serves as an implicit proof of the total — if the levy is 61 at 1/500, the half-share must be 30,500 and the total must be 61,000.
40. The soldiers' share of persons: 16,000 (half of 32,000), with the LORD's levy of 32 persons ($16,000 \div 500 = 32$). The text uses nefesh ('person, living being') rather than adam, emphasizing the humanity of those being counted. These 32 persons became part of the priestly household's service, though their exact role and status are not specified. The application of the same fractional formula to human captives as to animals is jarring to modern readers but reflects the legal framework of ancient Near Eastern war.
41. The compliance formula closes the soldiers' levy section. The phrase mekhes terumat YHWH ('the levy of the LORD's contribution') combines both technical terms — mekhes (the tax/levy) and terumah (the sacred contribution). By giving it to Eleazar, Moses channels the divine portion through proper priestly custody, ensuring institutional rather than personal management of sacred resources.
42. The transition phrase umimmachatsit benei Yisra'el ('and from the half of the Israelites') shifts to the community's share. The verb chatsah ('he halved, he divided') from ch-ts-h emphasizes the precise bisection. Moses personally oversaw the division (chatsah Moshe), ensuring fairness between the soldiers and the community. The participle hattsove'im ('those serving in the military') from ts-b- distinguishes the combat force from the civilian community.
43. The community receives an identical count: mechetsat ha'edah ('the community's half') of sheep/goats is 337,500 — matching the soldiers' half exactly. The repetition of identical figures for both halves serves as an internal consistency check and demonstrates the equity of the distribution. The parenthetical structure in the Hebrew (this section parallels vv. 36-40) creates a literary balance between the two halves of the plunder.
44. The community's cattle half matches at 36,000. The identical figures across both halves — soldiers and community — confirm the equitable division commanded in verse 27. The brevity of this verse (only four Hebrew words) reflects the repetitive inventory style characteristic of ancient Near Eastern administrative records.
45. The community's donkey share: 30,500, identical to the soldiers' half. The four-category structure (sheep, cattle, donkeys, persons) is maintained in strict parallel across both halves of the distribution, creating a symmetrical accounting framework that ancient readers would have recognized as thorough and trustworthy.
46. The community's share of captive persons: 16,000, completing the parallel inventory. The parenthetical closure (matching the opening in v. 43 in the KJV rendering) brackets the community's share as a self-contained accounting unit. These 16,000 persons would be absorbed into Israelite households across the twelve tribes.

47. The community's 1/50 levy (2%) goes to the Levites (lalviyyim) rather than the priests. The term ha'achuz echad min hachamishim ('the seized-portion, one from the fifty') uses achuz from '-ch-z ('to seize, to grasp'), emphasizing the compulsory nature of the levy. The compliance formula ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Moshe closes the distribution section. The two-tier tax system — 1/500 to priests from soldiers, 1/50 to Levites from the community — mirrors the broader distinction between priestly and Levitical service roles.
48. A new section begins as happequdim ('the appointed officers,' from p-q-d 'to appoint, to muster') approach Moses voluntarily with an offering. These are the same sarei ha'alafim vesarei hame'ot ('commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds') whom Moses had rebuked in verse 14. Their approach now is contrite and grateful, bringing a freewill offering beyond the required levy — a dramatic reversal from their earlier confrontation with Moses.
49. The officers report an astonishing outcome: nasa'nu et rosh anshei hammilchamah ('we have taken the head-count of the men of war') and lo nifqad mimmenu ish ('not one man is unaccounted for among us'). The verb nifqad from p-q-d means 'was missing, was unaccounted for' in this context. Zero casualties in a major military campaign is presented as miraculous — evidence of divine protection. The self-designation avadekha ('your servants') shows deference to Moses after the earlier rebuke. This miraculous preservation motivates the voluntary gold offering that follows.
50. Five types of gold jewelry are offered: ets'adah ('armlet' — an arm-band worn on the upper arm), tsamid ('bracelet' — worn on the wrist), tabba'at ('signet ring'), agil ('earring' — a round hoop), and kumaz ('pendant/ornamental bead' — the exact form is uncertain, possibly a gold bead or amulet). The purpose is lekha'per al nafshoteinu ('to make expiation/atonement for ourselves') — not because they sinned, but as a gratitude offering acknowledging that their miraculous survival deserved a sacred response. The verb k-p-r ('to cover, to atone') here carries the sense of 'making oneself right' with God after experiencing extraordinary deliverance.
51. Moses and Eleazar receive kol keli ma'aseh ('all vessels/articles of craftsmanship') — these were not raw gold but worked jewelry, each piece representing individual artistry and personal value. The description as keli ma'aseh ('wrought/crafted items') distinguishes this voluntary offering from raw metal or bullion, emphasizing that the officers gave their personal possessions, not impersonal commodity.
52. The grand total of voluntary gold: 16,750 sheqels (approximately 190 kilograms or 420 pounds by the standard shekel of about 11.4 grams). This enormous sum — offered freely beyond the mandatory levy — testifies to both the wealth captured from Midian and the officers' gratitude for the miraculous zero-casualty campaign. The term terumah ('contribution') and the verb herimu ('they elevated/dedicated') use the same root r-w-m, emphasizing the lifting up of something from common to sacred status.
53. This parenthetical clarifies that anshei hatsava ('the men of the military force') — the rank-and-file soldiers — bazazu ish lo ('had plundered, each man for himself'). The officers' gold offering was their own personal initiative, separate from the mandatory levy. Common soldiers were entitled to keep whatever individual spoils they had seized. This verse distinguishes between three categories of war wealth: the official plunder (inventoried and divided), the mandatory levy (for priests and Levites), and personal battlefield seizures (retained by individual soldiers).
54. The gold is deposited in the Ohel Mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting') as a zikkaron livnei Yisra'el ('a memorial for the Israelites'). The term zikkaron ('memorial, remembrance') means the gold will serve as a permanent reminder of God's miraculous protection — zero casualties in a major war. Placed lifnei YHWH ('in the LORD's presence'), it becomes a sacred witness to divine faithfulness. The pe (parashah petuchah) marker at chapter's end signals a major section break. The chapter closes with an image of grateful worship — a fitting conclusion to what began as a command for vengeance.

Summary: The tribes of Gad and Reuben — possessing vast herds — ask to settle in the conquered Transjordanian territory rather than crossing the Jordan. Moses rebukes them, comparing their request to the spies' discouragement of the previous generation. They negotiate a compromise: Gad and Reuben will build livestock pens and fortified cities east of the Jordan but will cross armed to fight alongside their brothers until the conquest is complete. Half the tribe of Manasseh also settles in the Transjordan.

What Makes This Remarkable: Moses's anger at the initial request (v. 14) invokes the memory of Kadesh-barnea: 'You have risen in your fathers' place, a brood of sinful men, to add still more to the LORD's burning anger against Israel.' The specter of the spies' generation haunts every decision. The word miqneh ('livestock,' v. 1) drives the entire negotiation — material wealth versus national solidarity. The compromise is expressed in covenantal language: if they fail to cross, their sin 'will find them out' (v. 23).

Translation Friction: The phrase chinnukh ('armed,' or possibly 'equipped,' v. 17) for how Gad and Reuben will cross the Jordan is debated — the root ch-l-ts suggests stripping for action or girding for battle. We rendered it 'armed' while noting the range. Moses's warning vehi'u neqi'im min-YHWH umin-Yisra'el ('you will be clear before the LORD and before Israel,' v. 22) uses neqi'im ('free from obligation, innocent') — a legal term for discharge of duty that we rendered 'free of obligation.'

Connections: Moses's comparison to the spies (vv. 8-13) references Numbers 13-14 directly. The Transjordanian settlement fulfills the conquests of Numbers 21:21-35. The commitment to fight alongside their brothers is tested in Joshua 1:12-18 and fulfilled in Joshua 22:1-6. The half-tribe of Manasseh's settlement (v. 33) reflects the divided inheritance of Joseph's sons anticipated in Genesis 48.

¹The descendants of Reuben and the descendants of Gad possessed an enormously large number of livestock. When they surveyed the territory of Jazer and the territory of Gilead, they recognized it as ideal grazing land. ²The descendants of Gad and the descendants of Reuben came and addressed Moses, Eleazar the priest, and the community leaders, saying: ³'Ataroth, Dibon, Jazer, Nimrah, Heshbon, Elealeh, Sebam, Nebo, and Beon — ⁴the territory that the LORD struck down before the Israelite assembly is perfect grazing country, and your servants have livestock.' ⁵They continued: 'If we have found favor in your eyes, let this territory be granted to your servants as a permanent holding. Do not make us cross the Jordan.' ⁶Moses responded to the descendants of Gad and the descendants of Reuben: 'Should your kinsmen march off to war while you settle down here?' ⁷Why would you demoralize the Israelites, discouraging them from crossing into the land the LORD has given them? ⁸This is exactly what your ancestors did when I sent them from Kadesh-barnea to scout the land. ⁹They went as far as the Eshcol Valley, surveyed the land, and then crushed the Israelites' resolve so that they would not enter the land the LORD had given them. ¹⁰The LORD's anger blazed that day, and He swore an oath: ¹¹'None of the men who came up from Egypt, twenty years old and above, will ever see the land I promised by oath to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — because they did not follow Me wholeheartedly.' ¹²The exceptions were Caleb son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite and Joshua son of Nun, because they followed the LORD wholeheartedly. ¹³The LORD's anger burned against Israel, and He made them wander in the wilderness for forty years until the entire generation that had acted wickedly in the LORD's sight had perished. ¹⁴And now look — you have risen up in your ancestors' place, a new crop of sinful men, adding still more fuel to the LORD's burning anger against Israel! ¹⁵If you turn away from following Him, He will once again abandon them in the wilderness — and you will have destroyed this entire people. ¹⁶They approached him and proposed: 'We will build stone enclosures here for our flocks and fortified towns for our dependents, ¹⁷but we ourselves will arm up and march as the vanguard ahead of the Israelites until we have brought them to their allotted territory. Meanwhile, our dependents will remain in the fortified towns, safe from the region's inhabitants.' ¹⁸We will not go back to our homes until every Israelite has received his territorial inheritance. ¹⁹We are not claiming any inheritance with them on the western side of the Jordan or beyond, since our inheritance has come to us on the eastern side of the Jordan. ²⁰Moses replied to them: 'If you carry out this commitment — if you arm yourselves for battle in the LORD's presence, ²¹and every one of your armed men crosses the Jordan in the LORD's presence until He has dispossessed His enemies before Him, ²²and the land is subdued before the LORD — then afterward you may return, and you will be clear of obligation both to the LORD and to Israel. This territory will be your permanent holding, recognized by the LORD. ²³But if you fail to do this — know that you will have sinned against the LORD, and be certain: your sin will track you down. ²⁴Build towns for your dependents and enclosures for your flocks — and carry out what you have pledged. ²⁵The descendants of Gad and the descendants of Reuben answered Moses: 'Your servants will do exactly as my lord commands. ²⁶Our dependents, our wives, our livestock, and all our animals will remain there in the towns of Gilead, ²⁷while your servants — every armed man among us — will cross over in the LORD's presence for battle, exactly as my lord has stated.' ²⁸Moses then gave instructions concerning them to Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the ancestral leaders of the Israelite tribes. ²⁹Moses told them: 'If the descendants of Gad and the descendants of Reuben cross the Jordan with you — every man armed for combat in the LORD's presence — and the land is subdued before you, then you must grant them the territory of Gilead as their permanent holding. ³⁰But if they do not cross over armed with you, they must accept their holdings among you in the land of Canaan.' ³¹The descendants of Gad and the descendants of Reuben answered: 'What the LORD has spoken to your servants — that is what we will do. ³²We ourselves will cross over armed in the LORD's presence into the land of Canaan, while the territory of our inherited holding remains ours on the eastern side of the Jordan.' ³³So Moses granted to the descendants of Gad, the descendants of Reuben, and the half-tribe of Manasseh son of Joseph: the kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites and the kingdom of Og king of Bashan — the territory with its towns and the surrounding borderlands. ³⁴The descendants of Gad rebuilt Dibon, Ataroth, and Aroer, ³⁵Atroth-shophan, Jazer, and Jogbehah, ³⁶Beth-nimrah, and Beth-haran — fortified towns with sheep enclosures. ³⁷The descendants of Reuben rebuilt Heshbon, Elealeh, and Kiriathaim, ³⁸Nebo, Baal-meon (with their names changed), and Sibmah. They gave new names to the towns they rebuilt. ³⁹The descendants of Machir son of Manasseh marched into Gilead, captured it, and drove out the Amorites who were living there. ⁴⁰Moses allocated Gilead to Machir son of Manasseh, and he settled there. ⁴¹Jair, a descendant of Manasseh, went and captured their tent-villages and named them Havvoth-jair. ⁴²Nobah went and captured Kenath and its surrounding settlements and renamed it Nobah, after himself.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening clause miqneh rav... atsum me'od ('exceedingly vast and mighty livestock') uses two intensifiers (rav and atsum me'od) to emphasize the sheer scale of their herds. The narrative tension is set immediately: economic self-interest (ideal pastureland) versus national solidarity (crossing the Jordan together). The term maqom miqneh ('a place for livestock') employs the repetition of maqom to create emphasis — this place was the quintessential livestock territory. Jazer and Gilead are in Transjordan, the territory recently conquered from Sihon and Og (Numbers 21).
2. The order shifts: Gad is named before Reuben here (though Reuben was first in v. 1), suggesting Gad was the more assertive tribe in this petition. The full leadership — Moses, Eleazar, and the nesi'im ('chieftains') — is present, indicating this is a formal petition through proper channels, not a secret negotiation. The triple audience (civil leader, priest, tribal heads) ensures the request receives comprehensive review from all governing authorities.
3. Nine Transjordanian cities are listed, all in the former territories of Sihon king of the Amorites. Ataroth ('crowns') lay in the Moabite plateau region. Dibon (modern Dhiban) was the later Moabite capital where the Mesha Stele was discovered. Heshbon was Sihon's former capital (Numbers 21:26). Nebo was near Mount Nebo where Moses would later die. Several of these names appear in variant forms later in the chapter (vv. 34-38), suggesting fluid naming conventions. The rapid list conveys the tribes' thorough reconnaissance of the region.
4. The petitioners frame their case with shrewd rhetoric: they credit God for the conquest (hikkah YHWH lifnei adat Yisra'el — 'the LORD struck before the assembly of Israel'), acknowledging divine agency. They then match the land's character to their need: erets miqneh hi ('it is livestock territory') and la'avadekha miqneh ('your servants have livestock'). The self-deprecating avadekha ('your servants') is diplomatic language. The setumah marker indicates a pause — perhaps representing Moses's processing of the request before his explosive response.
5. The petition climaxes with the fateful request: al ta'avirenu et haYarden ('do not make us cross the Jordan'). The polite framing im matsanu chen be'einekha ('if we have found favor in your eyes') cannot mask the explosive implications. The term achuzzah ('holding, permanent possession') implies a permanent land grant, not a temporary arrangement. This request effectively asks to opt out of the national project of conquering Canaan — the very goal of the 40-year wilderness journey. Moses will hear in this echo of the spies' rebellion.
6. Moses's reply is a stinging rhetorical question: ha'acheikhem yavo'u lammilchamah ve'attem teshvu foh ('shall your brothers go to war while you sit here?'). The contrast between yavo'u ('they will go') and teshvu ('you will sit/settle') is devastating — one verb implies action and sacrifice, the other implies comfortable inaction. The word acheikhem ('your brothers') is deliberately chosen to invoke kinship obligation. Moses frames the request as abandonment of family at the moment of greatest need.
7. The verb teni'un ('you will discourage, you will deter') from n-w- means to hinder someone's resolve, to break their will. The ketiv-qere variant (tenu'un/teni'un) preserves an alternate spelling in the manuscript tradition. Moses's concern is psychological contagion: if two tribes refuse to cross, others may lose heart. The phrase et lev benei Yisra'el ('the heart of the Israelites') uses lev ('heart') in its sense of courage and determination, not emotion. Moses fears a repeat of the spies' catastrophe, as he makes explicit in the next verses.
8. Moses invokes the catastrophic spy episode (Numbers 13-14) as historical precedent: koh asu avoteikhem ('thus your fathers acted'). The reference to Kadesh-barnea — the staging point for the original reconnaissance mission — links the present request to the greatest failure in Israel's wilderness history. The phrase bisholechi otam ('when I sent them') puts Moses himself in the narrative, reminding Gad and Reuben that he personally experienced the consequences of that earlier failure. The parallel is pointed: just as the spies discouraged the people from entering, so now these tribes risk the same effect.
9. The verb vayyani'u ('they discouraged, they dissuaded') is the same root n-w- used in verse 7, creating a direct verbal link between the spies' sin and Reuben and Gad's request. Nachal Eshkol ('the Valley of the Cluster') was named for the enormous grape cluster the spies brought back (Numbers 13:23-24). The irony is that the spies saw good land and reported it as unconquerable, while Reuben and Gad see good land and want to keep it for themselves. Both responses prioritize self-interest over covenant obedience.
10. The idiom vayyichar af YHWH ('the LORD's nostril burned' — His anger blazed) introduces the divine oath. The verb vayyishava ('he swore') marks what follows as an irrevocable divine decree — God binds Himself by oath. Moses recounts the history to show Reuben and Gad the catastrophic stakes: the last time Israel refused to cross into the land, God's response was a 40-year sentence of death in the wilderness. The parallel is a warning: do not trigger a second such oath.
11. The oath formula im yir'u ('if they shall see' — meaning 'they shall certainly never see') uses the conditional im as a negative oath particle — an incomplete oath where the implied self-curse is suppressed. The age threshold mibben esrim shanah vama'lah ('from twenty years old and upward') matches the census categories and the military service age. The accusation lo mil'u acharai ('they did not fill up after Me' — they did not follow Me completely) uses m-l- ('to fill') metaphorically: their obedience was partial, not full. The oath invokes the patriarchal promise chain — Abraham, Isaac, Jacob — to show what the exodus generation forfeited.

12. Only two men from the exodus generation were exempt: Caleb and Joshua. Caleb is identified as haqquenizzi ('the Kenizzite'), connecting him to an Edomite clan (Genesis 36:11, 42) later absorbed into Judah — a detail emphasizing that wholehearted obedience, not ethnic origin, determined divine favor. The phrase mil'u acharei YHWH ('they filled up after the LORD' — they followed completely) echoes the accusation of verse 11 with opposite outcome. These two men are living proof that faith and obedience bring fulfillment of the promise.
13. The verb vayyeni'em ('He made them wander') from n-w- is the same root as 'discourage' in verses 7 and 9 — creating a devastating wordplay. The spies who 'wandered' the people's hearts from obedience caused God to make them 'wander' in the desert. The phrase ad tom kol haddor ('until the completion of the entire generation') uses t-m-m ('to be complete, to be finished') in its sense of total exhaustion — every last person of that generation died. Moses's historical review is a threat: if you repeat their sin, you may trigger a second wilderness sentence.
14. The accusation is scathing: tarbut anashim chatta'im ('a brood/crop of sinful men'). The rare word tarbut ('increase, brood, offspring') from r-b-h implies they are a proliferation of their fathers' sin — the same rebellion reproducing in the next generation. The infinitive lispor od ('to add yet more') uses the same verb s-p-h ('to add, to heap up') that describes accumulating divine wrath. Moses portrays them not as making a reasonable real estate request but as repeating the most catastrophic sin in Israel's history.
15. Moses's climactic warning: teshuvun me'acharav ('if you turn back from following Him') uses the verb sh-w-v ('to turn, to return') in its sense of apostasy — turning away from God. The consequence is devastating: veyasaf od lehanicho bamidbar ('He will add yet again to leave them in the wilderness'). The verb h-n-ch ('to leave, to rest, to abandon') implies God depositing Israel in the desert and walking away. The final accusation veshichatem lekhol ha'am hazzeh ('you will have destroyed this entire people') makes Reuben and Gad responsible for national annihilation. The setumah marks a pause — Moses has finished his prosecution. The tribes must now respond.
16. The response begins with vayyigshu elav ('they drew near to him') — a gesture of respectful approach after the thunderous rebuke. Their counter-proposal addresses Moses's concern directly. The giderot tso'n ('stone enclosures for flocks') are walled pens to protect livestock, while arim letappenu ('towns for our dependents') indicates permanent settlements with defensive capability. The order is significant: they mention livestock pens before children's cities — a priority that Moses will subtly correct in verse 24. Their plan is to settle families and flocks, then march with the army.
17. The key concession: nechalets chushim lifnei benei Yisra'el ('we will arm ourselves swiftly before the Israelites'). The verb nechalets ('we will equip ourselves') from ch-l-ts means to strip for battle, and chushim ('swiftly, hastily') from ch-w-sh adds urgency — they will rush to the front lines. The phrase lifnei ('before, ahead of') means they will serve as the vanguard, the most dangerous position. The reasoning for leaving families behind is practical: mipenei yoshevei ha'arets ('because of the land's inhabitants') — local populations pose a security threat to unprotected families.
18. The promise is sweeping: lo nashuv el batteinu ('we will not return to our houses') — open-ended military service until the conquest is complete. The verb hitnachel ('to receive an inheritance') from n-ch-l in the Hitpa'el is reflexive: each Israelite must have personally taken possession of his nachalah ('inheritance, allotted territory'). This commitment means years of separation from families — the conquest of Canaan under Joshua would take approximately seven years. The pledge addresses Moses's fear of abandonment at the decisive moment.
19. The tribes clarify that they are not seeking double portions — lo ninchal ittam me'ever laYarden vahal'ah ('we will not inherit with them across the Jordan and beyond'). They waive all claims to Cisjordanian territory in exchange for Transjordan. The phrase ba'ah nachalatenu eleinu ('our inheritance has come to us') uses the feminine verb form matching nachalah, portraying the inheritance as having actively arrived — as if the land itself chose them. The pe (parashah petuchah) marker signals a major break before Moses's response, which shifts from accusation to conditional acceptance.
20. Moses shifts from prosecutor to negotiator with a conditional structure: im ta'asun et haddavar hazzeh ('if you do this thing'). The double im ('if... if') creates a compound condition, and Moses notably elevates the commitment: while the tribes said lifnei benei Yisra'el ('before the Israelites,' v. 17), Moses says lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD'). This reframing transforms a military obligation into a sacred covenant — they march not merely ahead of their brothers but in the presence of God.
21. Moses specifies the scope: kol chaluts ('every armed man') — no partial commitment is acceptable. The Jordan crossing is lifnei YHWH ('in the LORD's presence'), further sacralizing the obligation. The goal is ad horisho et oyvav mipanav ('until He has dispossessed His enemies from before Him') — using the Hif'il of y-r-sh ('to drive out, to dispossess'). The enemies are described as God's enemies (oyvav), not Israel's, framing the conquest as a divine project in which Israel is the instrument.
22. The conditional reward has three elements: the land must be conquered (nikhbashah ha'arets lifnei YHWH — 'the land is subdued before the LORD'), then they may return (tashuvu), and they will be neqiyim ('clear, innocent, free of obligation') before both God and Israel. The dual accountability — meYHWH umiyYisra'el ('from the LORD and from Israel') — means their obligation is simultaneously sacred and social. Only after full compliance does the land become la'achuzzah lifnei YHWH ('a holding before the LORD') — their tenure is divinely authorized, not merely pragmatic.
23. The warning is memorable: chattatemm laYHWH ('you will have sinned against the LORD') states the theological consequence, while chattat'khem asher timtsa etkhem ('your sin which will find you') personifies sin as a hunter that pursues and catches the sinner. The verb m-ts- ('to find, to discover') portrays sin as an active agent — you cannot outrun or hide from its consequences. This verse has become proverbial in English ('be sure your sin will find you out'), though the Hebrew is more vivid: sin is a predator, not merely an accounting entry.
24. Moses subtly corrects the tribes' priorities: in verse 16 they said giderot tso'n ('folds for livestock') before arim letappenu ('towns for our children'). Moses reverses the order: arim letappekhem ('towns for your dependents') first, then gederot leto'nakhem ('enclosures for your flocks'). People before property. The closing command vehayyotse mippikhem ta'asu ('what has come out of your mouths you shall do') invokes the vow principle from Numbers 30:3 — spoken commitments are binding. Their verbal pledge has the force of a sacred oath.

25. The formal acceptance uses deferential language: avadekha ('your servants') and adoni ('my lord'). The pledge ka'asher adoni metsavveh ('as my lord commands') uses the participle metsavveh, implying ongoing obedience — not a one-time compliance but continuous submission to Moses's authority. The shift from negotiation to subordination is complete: they accept not just the specific terms but Moses's overall authority to set conditions.
26. The tribes detail what stays behind: tappenu ('our dependents'), nasheinu ('our wives'), miqnenu ('our livestock'), and kol behemtenu ('all our animals'). The location is specified as arei haGil'ad ('the towns of Gilead'). Notably, they now follow Moses's corrected priority order: people (dependents, wives) before animals (livestock, herds). Their acceptance of Moses's reordering signals genuine submission rather than mere verbal compliance.
27. The tribes adopt Moses's sacralizing language: lifnei YHWH ('in the LORD's presence') rather than their original lifnei benei Yisra'el ('before the Israelites'). The phrase kol chaluts tsava ('every armed man of the force') reiterates that all capable fighters will serve — no exemptions. The closing ka'asher adoni dover ('as my lord is speaking') uses the participle dover, suggesting they accept not just what Moses has already said but whatever he may yet say on the matter.
28. Moses formalizes the agreement by instructing three parties: Eleazar (priestly authority), Joshua (Moses's successor as military-civil leader), and rashei avot hamattot ('the tribal ancestral heads'). Joshua's inclusion is significant — Moses knows he will not personally oversee the fulfillment of this agreement. By charging Joshua specifically, Moses ensures institutional continuity: the next generation's leader is bound to enforce the deal. This is one of the earliest explicit preparations for the leadership transition to Joshua.
29. Moses restates the conditional terms for the successor leadership. The condition im ya'averu ('if they cross') triggers the obligation untattem lahem ('you shall give them'). The verb n-t-n ('to give') here means 'to grant formally' — an official land allocation, not a casual concession. Moses addresses this to the leadership collectively (ittekhem — 'with you,' plural), binding the entire governing body to the agreement. The phrase eret haGil'ad la'achuzzah ('the land of Gilead as a holding') confirms the permanent nature of the grant.
30. The penalty for non-compliance: veno'achazu betokh'khem be'erets Kena'an ('they shall be seized/given holdings among you in the land of Canaan'). The verb no'achazu from '-ch-z (Nifal — 'they shall be settled, given a holding') means they would be absorbed into Cisjordanian territory without their preferred Transjordanian land. This is not a reward but a penalty — they lose their chosen territory and must accept whatever allocation comes through the general lottery. The consequence is loss of choice, not loss of inheritance.
31. The acceptance formula et asher dibber YHWH el avadekha ken na'aseh ('what the LORD has spoken to your servants, thus we will do') elevates the agreement to divine covenant status. They attribute the terms not to Moses but to God (dibber YHWH), acknowledging the sacred authority behind the negotiation. The emphatic ken na'aseh ('thus we will do') mirrors Israel's covenant acceptance at Sinai — na'aseh ('we will do,' Exodus 24:7). The verbal echo may be intentional, framing this tribal agreement as a sub-covenant within the larger Sinaitic framework.
32. The emphatic nachnu ('we ourselves') personalizes the commitment. The phrase na'avur chalutsim lifnei YHWH erets Kena'an ('we will cross armed before the LORD into Canaan') states both the action (crossing armed) and the destination (Canaan — not their own territory). The counterbalance is ve'ittanu achuzzat nachalatenu me'ever laYarden ('and with us the holding of our inheritance across the Jordan'). The compound achuzzat nachalatenu ('the holding of our inheritance') combines both legal terms for landed property, reinforcing the permanence of their Transjordanian claim.
33. A surprise addition: lachatsi shevet Menasheh ben Yosef ('to the half-tribe of Manasseh son of Joseph') — Manasseh was not part of the original petition. Their inclusion is unexplained in the text; possibly Manassite clans had already begun settling Gilead independently (vv. 39-42), or Moses strategically placed a loyal tribe alongside the petitioners as a check. The grant encompasses two conquered kingdoms: mamlekhhot Sichon ('the kingdom of Sihon') and mamlekhhot Og ('the kingdom of Og'). The phrase ha'arets le'areha bigevulot ('the land with its cities in the boundaries') confirms a comprehensive territorial grant including urban centers and border regions.
34. The verb vayyivnu ('they built') likely means rebuilt or fortified, since these were existing cities listed in verse 3. Dibon became Gad's most significant city — the later Moabite king Mesha would boast of recapturing it on the Mesha Stele (c. 840 BCE). Ataroth (from the root '-t-r 'to crown') was also mentioned on the Mesha Stele as a city that 'the men of Gad had always lived in.' Aroer ('stripped, bare') sat on the edge of the Arnon gorge, a natural boundary.
35. Atroth-shophan ('crowns of the barren one') is a compound name distinguishing this Ataroth from the one in verse 34. Jazer (Ya'zer) was strategically important — it was among the first cities reconnoitered (v. 1) and controlled access to the northern Transjordanian highlands. Jogbehah (from g-b-h 'to be high, exalted') was a fortified elevation — Gideon would later pursue Midianites past this location (Judges 8:11). These towns formed Gad's northern territorial anchors.
36. Beth-nimrah ('house of the leopard/clear water') and Beth-haran ('house of the mountaineer') were in the Jordan Valley. The description arei mivtsar vegidroth tso'n ('fortified towns and sheep enclosures') fulfills the dual-purpose settlement plan from verse 16 — military fortification for human security and pastoral infrastructure for livestock. The combination of urban defense and pastoral economy characterizes the Transjordanian settlement pattern: towns served as both refuges and economic centers for the surrounding grazing lands.

37. Reuben's allotment centers on Heshbon (Cheshbon — from ch-sh-v 'to think, to calculate'), the former capital of Sihon (Numbers 21:26). Elealeh ('God has ascended') was a hilltop town near Heshbon. Kiriathaim ('double city') was a town in the Moabite plateau. All three appear in later prophetic oracles against Moab (Isaiah 15-16, Jeremiah 48), indicating they eventually reverted to Moabite control — a development that would vindicate concerns about Transjordanian vulnerability.
38. The parenthetical musabbot shem ('their names being changed/redirected') is significant: Baal-meon ('lord of the dwelling') contained the theophoric element Ba'al, a Canaanite deity name. The Israelites renamed cities to remove pagan divine names — a practice of religious purification through toponymic replacement. Nebo was associated with the Babylonian god Nabu. Sibmah (Sivmah) was known for its vineyards (Isaiah 16:8-9). The renaming campaign shows the tribes were not merely occupying but actively Israelitizing the territory.
39. The Machirite conquest appears independently initiated: vayyelekhhu... Gil'adah vayyilkeduhah ('they went to Gilead and captured it'). Machir was Manasseh's firstborn (Genesis 50:23) and the primary warrior clan of the tribe. The verb vayyoresh ('he dispossessed') from y-r-sh indicates complete displacement of the Amorite population — the same verb used for Israel's mandate to dispossess Canaan's inhabitants. This independent Machirite campaign may explain why the half-tribe of Manasseh was added to the Transjordanian grant in verse 33 — they had already created facts on the ground.
40. Moses formalizes what Machir achieved militarily: vayyitten Moshe et haGil'ad leMakhir ('Moses gave Gilead to Machir'). The verb n-t-n ('to give') in this context means official allocation — Moses ratifies the conquest with legal authority. The phrase vayyeshev bah ('and he settled in it') uses the singular, treating the clan Machir as a corporate individual. Gilead becomes permanently associated with Machir/Manasseh, as reflected in the common designation 'Gilead' for the half-tribe of Manasseh's territory.
41. Jair (Ya'ir — 'he enlightens/shines') captured chavvot ('tent-villages' — small unwall settlements, from the root ch-w-h meaning 'tent' or 'village'). The naming chavvot Ya'ir ('the tent-villages of Jair') creates an eponymous toponym — the place carries the conqueror's name. These were small rural settlements in northern Gilead/Bashan, distinct from the fortified towns. The practice of naming conquered territories after oneself was standard in the ancient Near East and established personal/clan claims to territory.
42. Nobah captures Qenat ('Kenath' — possibly related to Akkadian qanatu 'reed') and its benoteiha ('its daughters' — satellite settlements dependent on the main town). The metaphor of a city and its 'daughters' portrays urban geography as familial: the main town is the mother-city, surrounding villages are her dependents. The renaming vayyiqra lah Novach bishmo ('he called it Nobah by his name') follows the same eponymous pattern as Jair. The pe marker closes the chapter and the entire Transjordanian settlement narrative. The chapter ends not with covenant ceremony but with conquest and naming — establishing the eastern tribes' territorial identity.

Summary: A comprehensive travel itinerary lists forty-two stages of Israel's journey from Rameses in Egypt to the plains of Moab — explicitly attributed to Moses's own writing at God's command. The chapter then shifts to forward-looking legislation: drive out the inhabitants of Canaan, destroy their idolatrous installations, and divide the land by lot among the tribes. Failure to dispossess them will mean they become 'barbs in your eyes and thorns in your sides.'

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the few Torah passages that explicitly claims Mosaic authorship of a specific text: vayyikhtov Mosheh ('Moses wrote,' v. 2). The forty-two-station itinerary compresses forty years of wandering into a single literary catalog — each place-name is a compressed narrative, carrying associations of judgment, miracle, or crisis. The chiasmic structure of verse 2 (departures-stages... stages-departures) creates a literary frame emphasizing completeness.

Translation Friction: The term mas'ei ('stages,' v. 1) from the root n-s-' ('to pull up tent pegs, to set out') specifically denotes the segments between campsites — we chose 'stages' rather than 'journeys' to preserve this precise sense. Many of the forty-two place-names are otherwise unknown, and their locations remain debated; we transliterated them consistently rather than attempting modern identifications. The warning about 'barbs in your eyes' (sikkot be'eineikhem, v. 55) uses a metaphor of constant irritation.

Connections: The departure from Rameses (v. 3) recalls Exodus 12:37. Aaron's death notice at Mount Hor (v. 38) matches Numbers 20:22-29. The command to destroy Canaanite cult installations (v. 52) connects to Deuteronomy 7:5 and 12:2-3. The warning about failing to dispossess (v. 55-56) anticipates Judges 2:1-5, where exactly this failure occurs.

¹These are the stages of the Israelites' journey when they departed from the land of Egypt, organized by their divisions, under the leadership of Moses and Aaron. ²Moses recorded their departure points according to their stages of travel, at the LORD's command. These are their stages of travel according to their departure points. ³They set out from Rameses in the first month, on the fifteenth day of the first month — the day after the Passover sacrifice — the Israelites marched out defiantly, in full view of all Egypt. ⁴Meanwhile the Egyptians were burying those whom the LORD had struck down among them — every firstborn — while the LORD executed judgments against their gods. ⁵The Israelites set out from Rameses and camped at Succoth. ⁶They set out from Succoth and camped at Etham, which is on the edge of the wilderness. ⁷They set out from Etham but turned back toward Pi-hahiroth, which faces Baal-zephon, and they camped in front of Migdol. ⁸They set out from Pi-hahiroth and passed through the sea into the wilderness. After traveling three days through the wilderness of Etham, they camped at Marah. ⁹They set out from Marah and arrived at Elim. At Elim there were twelve water springs and seventy palm trees, and they camped there. ¹⁰They set out from Elim and camped by the Sea of Reeds. ¹¹They set out from the Sea of Reeds and camped in the wilderness of Sin. ¹²They set out from the wilderness of Sin and camped at Dophkah. ¹³They set out from Dophkah and camped at Alush. ¹⁴They set out from Alush and camped at Rephidim, where there was no water for the people to drink. ¹⁵They set out from Rephidim and camped in the wilderness of Sinai. ¹⁶They set out from the wilderness of Sinai and camped at Kibroth-hattaavah. ¹⁷They set out from Kibroth-hattaavah and camped at Hazeroth. ¹⁸They set out from Hazeroth and camped at Rithmah. ¹⁹They set out from Rithmah and camped at Rimmon-perez. ²⁰They set out from Rimmon-perez and camped at Libnah. ²¹They set out from Libnah and camped at Rissah. ²²They set out from Rissah and camped at Kehelathah. ²³They set out from Kehelathah and camped at Mount Shepher. ²⁴They set out from Mount Shepher and camped at Haradah. ²⁵They set out from Haradah and camped at Makheloth. ²⁶They set out from Makheloth and camped at Tahath. ²⁷They set out from Tahath and camped at Terah. ²⁸They set out from Terah and camped at Mithkah. ²⁹They set out from Mithkah and camped at Hashmonah. ³⁰They set out from Hashmonah and camped at Moseroth. ³¹They set out from Moseroth and camped at Bene-jaakan. ³²They set out from Bene-jaakan and camped at Hor-hagidgad. ³³They set out from Hor-hagidgad and camped at Jotbathah. ³⁴They set out from Jotbathah and camped at Abronah. ³⁵They set out from Abronah and camped at Ezion-geber. ³⁶They set out from Ezion-geber and camped in the wilderness of Zin — that is, Kadesh. ³⁷They set out from Kadesh and camped at Mount Hor, on the border of the land of Edom. ³⁸Aaron the priest ascended Mount Hor at the LORD's command and died there, in the fortieth year after the Israelites' departure from Egypt, on the first day of the fifth month. ³⁹Aaron was 123 years old when he died on Mount Hor. ⁴⁰The Canaanite king of Arad, who lived in the Negev region of the land of Canaan, learned of the Israelites' approach. ⁴¹They set out from Mount Hor and camped at Zalmonah. ⁴²They set out from Zalmonah and camped at Punon. ⁴³They set out from Punon and camped at Oboth. ⁴⁴They set out from Oboth and camped at Iye-abarim, on the Moabite border. ⁴⁵They set out from Iyim and camped at Dibon-gad. ⁴⁶They set out from Dibon-gad and camped at Almon-diblathaim. ⁴⁷They set out from Almon-diblathaim and camped in the Abarim mountains, facing Nebo. ⁴⁸They set out from the Abarim mountains and camped on the Moabite plains beside the Jordan, across from Jericho. ⁴⁹They camped along the Jordan from Beth-jeshimoth to Abel-shittim on the Moabite plains. ⁵⁰The LORD spoke to Moses on the Moabite plains beside the Jordan, across from Jericho: ⁵¹'Speak to the Israelites and tell them: When you cross the Jordan into the land of Canaan, ⁵²you must dispossess all the land's inhabitants from before you, destroy all their carved stone images, demolish all their cast metal idols, and tear down all their worship platforms. ⁵³You are to take possession of the land and settle in it, because I have given the land to you to possess. ⁵⁴You must distribute the land by lot among your clans. For the larger group, increase its allotment; for the smaller group, reduce its allotment. Wherever the lot falls for each group — that territory is theirs. The distribution shall follow your ancestral tribes. ⁵⁵But if you do not dispossess the land's inhabitants from before you, then those you allow to remain will become barbs in your eyes and thorns in your sides — they will harass you in the very land where you live. ⁵⁶And what I had planned to do to them, I will do to you instead.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The heading elleh mas'ei venei Yisra'el ('these are the stages/journeys of the Israelites') introduces the most comprehensive travel itinerary in the Torah — 42 stations from Rameses to the plains of Moab. The term mas'ei (plural of masa, from n-s- 'to pull up, to set out') specifically denotes stages of a journey, each marked by breaking camp and marching. The phrase letsivetotam ('by their divisions/armies') uses the same military-organizational term as in the census lists, emphasizing the structured, disciplined nature of the march. The dual leadership beyad Moshe ve'Aaron ('by the hand of Moses and Aaron') establishes both civil and priestly authority over the journey.

2. This verse uniquely attributes the itinerary to Moses's own writing: vayyikhtov Moshe ('Moses wrote') — one of the few Torah passages explicitly claiming Mosaic authorship of a specific text. The phrase al pi YHWH ('at the mouth/command of the LORD') means this was divinely commissioned record-keeping, not personal memoir. The chiasmic structure — motz'eihem lemaseihem... mas'eihem lemotsa'eihem ('their departures according to their stages... their stages according to their departures') — creates a literary frame that emphasizes completeness: the record covers every departure and every stage.
3. The journey begins at Ra'amses (the Egyptian store-city Pi-Ramesses in the eastern Delta, built by Israelite forced labor per Exodus 1:11). The precise date — the fifteenth of the first month (Nisan), the morning after the Passover — anchors the exodus in the liturgical calendar. The phrase beyad ramah ('with a raised/high hand') denotes triumphant defiance, not stealth — Israel departed openly, not as fugitives. The phrase le'einei kol Mitsrayim ('in the eyes/sight of all Egypt') emphasizes the public, witnessed nature of the departure. Stage 1 of 42.
4. The departure scene is set against Egyptian mourning: Mitsrayim meqabberim ('Egypt was burying') — the present participle captures the simultaneous action: as Israel marches out triumphantly, Egypt is busy with mass funeral rites for kol bekhon ('every firstborn'). The phrase u've'eloheihem asah YHWH shefatim ('and against their gods the LORD executed judgments') indicates the plagues were not merely natural disasters but theological confrontations — each plague targeted an Egyptian deity. This theological interpretation transforms the exodus from a political escape into a divine courtroom drama.
5. Station 1 to Station 2. Sukkot ('booths, shelters') was the first encampment after Rameses, located near the modern Tell el-Maskhuta in the Wadi Tumilat. The name may reflect temporary shelters used at this staging point, or it may be an Egyptian toponym adapted into Hebrew. Exodus 12:37 specifies approximately 600,000 men on foot departed from Rameses for Succoth. This is the beginning of the journey's Egyptian phase (stations 1-6), tracing the route from the Delta to the Red Sea crossing.
6. Station 2 to Station 3. Etham (Eitam) is described as biqtseh hammidbar ('on the edge/border of the wilderness'), marking the transition from the cultivated Delta into the desert. The name may derive from Egyptian htm ('fortress') — a border fortification at the edge of settled territory. This was the boundary between civilization and wilderness, between Egyptian control and the open desert. The cloud and fire pillar guided them from here (Exodus 13:20-22).
7. Station 3 to Station 4. The verb vayyashov ('he/they turned back') is crucial — God deliberately reversed their route (Exodus 14:1-2) to lure Pharaoh into pursuit. Pi-hahiroth ('mouth of the gorges/canals') was near Baal-zephon ('lord of the north' — a Phoenician deity's shrine marking a promontory), and Migdol ('tower' — an Egyptian border fortress, from Egyptian mktr). This deliberate backtracking created the trap: Israel appeared lost and hemmed in, provoking Pharaoh's fatal pursuit toward the sea.
8. Station 4 to Station 5 (via the sea crossing). The understated phrase vayya'averu vetokh hayyam ('they passed through the midst of the sea') compresses the entire Red Sea miracle into four Hebrew words — the itinerary format reduces the most dramatic event in Israelite history to a single travel notation. Three days' march through midbar Eitam ('the Etham wilderness') brought them to Marah ('bitterness'), named for its undrinkable water (Exodus 15:23). God made the bitter water sweet through a piece of wood (Exodus 15:25). This station marks the first post-exodus crisis: the immediate testing of faith after deliverance.
9. Station 5 to Station 6. Elim ('terebinths' or 'mighty trees') was an oasis with shteim esreh einot mayim ('twelve springs of water') and shiv'im temarim ('seventy palm trees'). The numbers are symbolically significant: twelve springs correspond to the twelve tribes, and seventy palms to the seventy elders (Exodus 24:1) or the seventy descendants of Jacob who went to Egypt (Genesis 46:27). After the bitterness of Marah, Elim represents divine provision and restoration — an oasis of abundance following a crisis of scarcity. Likely located at Wadi Gharandel in the western Sinai.
10. Station 6 to Station 7. The Yam Suf ('Sea of Reeds') encampment is distinct from the earlier sea crossing (v. 8). This is a campsite along the coast of the Gulf of Suez/Aqaba, where the Israelites traveled southward along the western Sinai coast. The name Yam Suf literally means 'Sea of Reeds/Rushes' (from suf 'reed, rush plant'), not 'Red Sea' — the Greek Septuagint's translation erythra thalassa ('Red Sea') shifted the identification. This coastal camp marks the journey's transition from the northern Sinai corridor to the southern Sinai wilderness.
11. Station 7 to Station 8. The midbar Sin ('wilderness of Sin') — not to be confused with the wilderness of Sinai — is the desert region along the western Sinai coast between Elim and Sinai. This is where Israel first received manna and quail (Exodus 16), establishing the pattern of divine daily provision that would sustain them for forty years. The name Sin may derive from the Semitic moon-god Sin (Akkadian Suen), reflecting pre-Israelite associations of this region with lunar worship.
12. Station 8 to Station 9. Dophkah (Dofqah — possibly from d-f-q 'to knock, to drive') is one of the stations known only from this itinerary, with no parallel narrative in Exodus. It may be identified with the Egyptian mining site at Serabit el-Khadim in the southwestern Sinai, where turquoise and copper were extracted. The Egyptian term for this mining district (mfk't) may underlie the Hebrew toponym. If correct, the Israelites passed through Egypt's Sinai mining region.
13. Station 9 to Station 10. Alush (Alush) is another station known only from this list. Some rabbinic interpreters connected the name to the root l-w-sh ('to knead'), associating it with the manna narrative — the place where Israel 'kneaded' the manna into cakes. The identification remains uncertain; it was likely a stopping point in the southwestern Sinai between the mining district and Rephidim. The lack of narrative detail for many stations suggests this is a genuine archival travel log, not a literary construction.
14. Station 10 to Station 11. Rephidim (Refidim — possibly from r-f-d 'to spread out, to support') was the site of two major events: the water-from-the-rock miracle (Exodus 17:1-7, where the place was also called Massah and Meribah) and the battle with Amalek (Exodus 17:8-16). The itinerary preserves only the water crisis detail: velo hayah sham mayim la'am lishtot ('there was no water there for the people to drink'). This is one of the few itinerary stations with a narrative annotation, indicating the water shortage was considered the defining characteristic of Rephidim.

15. Station 11 to Station 12. Midbar Sinai ('the wilderness of Sinai') was the destination of the entire exodus journey — the place of the covenant revelation. Israel remained here for nearly a year (from the third month of year 1 to the twentieth of the second month of year 2, per Exodus 19:1 and Numbers 10:11). Despite being the most theologically significant location in the itinerary — the site of Torah revelation, the golden calf, the Tabernacle construction — the itinerary records it with the same terse formula as every other station. The compression is remarkable: a year of transformative events reduced to six Hebrew words.
16. Station 12 to Station 13. Qivrot haTa'avah ('the graves of craving/desire') received its name from the incident recorded in Numbers 11:31-34: God sent quail in response to Israel's complaints about manna, but struck the people with a plague while the meat was still in their mouths. The name memorializes judgment on unbridled appetite — ta'avah ('craving, desire, lust') is the noun from 'w-h, the same root behind the tenth commandment's prohibition of coveting. The location marked the transition from Sinai to the wilderness wandering phase.
17. Station 13 to Station 14. Chatserot ('enclosures, courtyards') was the site of Miriam and Aaron's challenge to Moses's authority (Numbers 12). Miriam was struck with a skin disease and quarantined for seven days outside the camp. The name, from chatser ('enclosed courtyard'), suggests a site with natural enclosures — perhaps a wadi with rock walls. This was the last major station before the catastrophic spy mission from Kadesh. The journey's middle section (stations 14-33) covers the 38 years of wilderness punishment.
18. Station 14 to Station 15. Rithmah (Ritmah — from rotem 'broom plant/shrub,' a desert bush common in the Negev) may be an alternate name for Kadesh-barnea or a nearby site, since the spy mission was launched from Kadesh (Numbers 13:26) which follows Hazeroth in the narrative sequence. The broom plant was used for fuel and shelter in the desert (1 Kings 19:4-5, where Elijah slept under a rotem). This begins the long, obscure middle section of the itinerary — stations during the 38-year wandering period about which almost no narrative is preserved.
19. Station 15 to Station 16. Rimmon Perets ('pomegranate of the breach/gap') combines two common topographic elements: rimmon ('pomegranate' — a tree marker) and perets ('breach, gap' — possibly a wadi break or mountain pass). This station, known only from this list, was somewhere in the wilderness between Kadesh and the Arabah. The compound name suggests a distinctive landmark — a pomegranate tree or grove near a geological gap — that served as a navigational reference in otherwise featureless terrain.
20. Station 16 to Station 17. Livnah ('whiteness') likely derives from the white limestone or chalk characteristic of the Negev and Sinai landscape. A different Libnah in the Shephelah became a Levitical city (Joshua 21:13), but this wilderness Libnah is a distinct site. The name may also connect to levonah ('frankincense' — the white resinous gum), suggesting a site where incense plants grew. The station belongs to the largely undocumented wandering period.
21. Station 17 to Station 18. Rissah (Rissah — possibly from r-s-s 'to moisten' or related to rasis 'dew-drop') may indicate a site with available moisture — a significant feature in desert terrain. Some scholars connect it to a site in the Arabah. Like many stations in this section, Rissah preserves a toponym that became lost to later tradition, surviving only in this archival list. The itinerary's preservation of otherwise unknown place names supports its authenticity as a genuine travel document.
22. Station 18 to Station 19. Qehelatah ('place of assembly') derives from q-h-l ('to assemble, to gather'), the same root as qahal ('assembly, congregation'). The name suggests this was a location where the community gathered — perhaps for judicial proceedings, worship, or communal decision-making. Some scholars speculate it may have been a major tribal assembly point during the wandering years, though no narrative details survive.
23. Station 19 to Station 20. Har Shafer ('the beautiful/pleasant mountain') derives from sh-f-r ('to be beautiful, to be pleasing'). The name suggests a visually striking peak — a rare positive topographic description in the Negev/Sinai wilderness. This is the only 'mount' (har) in the wandering-period stations, indicating a notable elevation that served as both landmark and campsite. The beauty attributed to this mountain stands in contrast to the desolate terrain typical of the region.
24. Station 20 to Station 21. Charadah ('trembling, terror, anxiety') from ch-r-d ('to tremble, to be startled') is an ominous name for a campsite. It may commemorate a frightening event — an enemy attack, a natural disaster, or a divine judgment — at this location. Alternatively, the name may describe the terrain itself: a place that evoked dread due to its appearance or isolation. The shift from 'beautiful mountain' to 'place of trembling' captures the emotional volatility of wilderness existence.
25. Station 21 to Station 22. Maqhelot ('assemblies, gatherings') is the plural of maqhel, from the same root q-h-l ('to assemble') as Kehelatah (v. 22). The plural form suggests a place of multiple gatherings or a larger assembly site. The repetition of assembly-related names may indicate regular gathering points along the route where tribal councils met, disputes were adjudicated, or collective worship was conducted. These assembly stations may have been the infrastructure of wilderness governance.
26. Station 22 to Station 23. Tachath ('below, beneath, lower place') from t-ch-t indicates a low-lying area — perhaps a valley floor, a wadi depression, or a site at the base of a hill. The directional name is purely topographic, describing the campsite's position relative to surrounding terrain. A Levite named Tahath appears in the genealogy of 1 Chronicles 6:24, but the connection to this place name is uncertain.
27. Station 23 to Station 24. Terach (Tarach) shares its name with Abraham's father (Genesis 11:24-32), though any connection is uncertain. The name may derive from a root meaning 'to delay, to wander' or possibly from an animal name (Arabic tarakh — 'wild goat'). The coincidence of names with the patriarchal ancestor may have resonated with Israelite travelers — a reminder of the ancestral wandering that preceded their own. The site's location is unknown but falls within the central wandering period.

- 28. Station 24 to Station 25. Mitqah ('sweetness') from m-t-q ('to be sweet') suggests a site with sweet (drinkable) water — a direct contrast to Marah ('bitterness') from the journey's beginning. In the desert, water quality defined locations: bitter springs were hazards, sweet springs were havens. The name may also refer to sweet-tasting plants or fruits found at the site. After the ominous Haradah ('trembling'), the sequence moves through neutral names to this positive one.
- 29. Station 25 to Station 26. Chashmonah ('fertile/rich place') may derive from ch-sh-m or relate to the personal name Hashmon. This is the toponym that later gave rise to the name 'Hasmonean' — the dynasty of the Maccabees claimed descent from a priestly family connected to this name (though the genealogical link is debated). The site was likely in the northern Sinai or Negev region. Some identify it with the modern Wadi Hashm.
- 30. Station 26 to Station 27. Moserot ('bonds, chastisements, disciplines') from m-w-s-r ('to bind, to discipline') is a striking name suggesting a place of divine correction or testing. Deuteronomy 10:6 connects Moserah (singular form) with Aaron's death, though Numbers 33:38 places Aaron's death at Mount Hor. The discrepancy may reflect different traditions about the same region or distinct but nearby locations. The disciplinary meaning of the name fits the theme of the wandering years as a period of divine training and correction.
- 31. Station 27 to Station 28. Benei Ya'aqan ('the sons/descendants of Jaakan') is a clan-based toponym — the site was associated with a group called the Jaakanites. Deuteronomy 10:6 mentions Be'erot Benei Ya'aqan ('the wells of the sons of Jaakan'), suggesting this was an area with multiple wells controlled by the Jaakan clan. The name appears in 1 Chronicles 1:42 as a Horite/Seirite descendant, placing this clan in the Edomite region south of the Dead Sea. The itinerary is now tracking through the Arabah/Edomite border region.
- 32. Station 28 to Station 29. Chor haGidgad ('the cave/cavern of Gidgad') combines chor ('cave, hole') with the proper name Gidgad (called Gudgodah in Deuteronomy 10:7). The name suggests a notable cave system — perhaps used for shelter, water storage, or refuge. Caves in the Arabah and Negev served as critical survival resources: they provided shade from extreme heat, shelter from sandstorms, and sometimes contained water seepage. The site was likely in the Arabah region near the Gulf of Aqaba.
- 33. Station 29 to Station 30. Yotvatah ('pleasantness, goodness') from y-t-v ('to be good, to be pleasant') indicates an agreeable campsite. Deuteronomy 10:7 adds the significant detail: erets nachalei mayim ('a land of flowing streams') — Jotbathah was well-watered, a luxury in the Arabah. This is often identified with the modern oasis of Tabeh/Yotvata in the southern Arabah, which remains a water source today. The name's positive connotation contrasts with the harsh terrain surrounding it — a desert oasis that brought relief to the traveling community.
- 34. Station 30 to Station 31. Avronah ('crossing place, ford') from 'v-r ('to cross over') suggests a location at a river ford or wadi crossing. The name indicates a point where a waterway could be traversed — possibly a crossing of a seasonal wadi in the Arabah. Some scholars identify it with a site near the modern Ain Defiyeh, south of the Dead Sea. The crossing terminology connects this station to the broader journey theme: Israel is perpetually 'crossing over' toward the promised land.
- 35. Station 31 to Station 32. Etsyon Gaver ('backbone of the mighty one' or 'the giant's spine') was located at the northern tip of the Gulf of Aqaba — modern Eilat/Aqaba. This was a significant site: Solomon would later build his fleet here (1 Kings 9:26), and it became a major port for Red Sea trade. The Israelites' arrival here marks the southernmost point of their wandering before turning north toward Kadesh. The location at the gulf's head was strategically important as a crossroads between Africa, Arabia, and the Levant.
- 36. Station 32 to Station 33. The identification midbar Tsin hi Qadesh ('the wilderness of Zin, which is Kadesh') marks the return to Kadesh-barnea — the site of the original spy mission disaster (Numbers 13-14). Israel's return here after 38 years of wandering closes the circle of judgment. At this second Kadesh visit, Miriam dies (Numbers 20:1), Moses strikes the rock instead of speaking to it (Numbers 20:7-13), and Moses and Aaron are denied entry to Canaan. Kadesh ('holy/sacred') ironically becomes the place of Moses's greatest failure.
- 37. Station 33 to Station 34. Hor haHar ('Mount Hor' — literally 'the mountain of the mountain,' a superlative meaning 'the great mountain') was on the boundary of Edom (biqtseh erets Edom). This is where Aaron died (next two verses) and where the priestly succession from Aaron to Eleazar took place (Numbers 20:22-29). Traditionally identified with Jebel Harun near Petra, though some scholars prefer a location in the northern Negev. The Edomite border location underscores the tension with Edom, which had denied Israel passage (Numbers 20:14-21).
- 38. The itinerary breaks its formulaic pattern to record Aaron's death — one of only two narrative expansions in the entire list (the other being the Canaanite king in v. 40). The precise date — the first of the fifth month (Av) in the fortieth year — makes this one of the most chronologically specific events in the Torah. The phrase al pi YHWH ('at the mouth/command of the LORD') indicates Aaron's death was divinely ordained, not natural — a consequence of the Meribah incident (Numbers 20:12, 24). The midrashic tradition holds that Aaron died 'by a divine kiss' (mitah bineshiqah), based on the al pi YHWH phrase.
- 39. Aaron's age at death — ben shalosh ve'esrim ume'at shanah ('123 years old') — places him three years older than Moses at death (Deuteronomy 34:7: Moses died at 120). Aaron was born before the edict to drown Hebrew boys (Exodus 1:22), which is why he survived infancy while Moses had to be hidden. The setumah marker after this verse creates a solemn pause — a moment of silence in the text for Israel's first high priest. The itinerary resumes in the next verse with a brief narrative insertion about the Canaanite king of Arad.
- 40. The second narrative insertion records the Canaanite king of Arad hearing of Israel's advance. This corresponds to Numbers 21:1-3, where Arad attacked Israel and was subsequently destroyed. The city of Arad (modern Tel Arad) was in the eastern Negev, controlling routes into Canaan from the south. The phrase yoshev baNegev ('dwelling in the Negev') identifies his territory as the dry southern region of Canaan. His 'hearing' (vayyishma) of Israel's approach signals the beginning of the conquest phase — Canaan's inhabitants are now aware of the approaching threat.

41. Station 34 to Station 35. Tsalmonah ('shady place' or 'place of images/shadows') derives from tselem ('image, shadow'). The route from Mount Hor now turns southward and eastward to circumvent Edom (Numbers 21:4), since Edom had denied passage. This detour provoked the complaint that led to the fiery serpent incident (Numbers 21:4-9). Some scholars associate Zalmonah with the copper-mining region of Timna in the southern Arabah, where smelting installations created dark, shadow-like slag heaps.
42. Station 35 to Station 36. Punon is almost certainly Feinan (modern Khirbet Feinan) in the eastern Arabah, one of the largest copper-mining and smelting centers of the ancient Near East. The connection to the copper serpent narrative (Numbers 21:4-9) is suggestive: the nechash nechoshet ('bronze/copper serpent') that Moses made may have been crafted from local copper. Eusebius identified Punon with Phaeno, a Roman mining settlement in the same area. The site's association with copper working spans millennia.
43. Station 36 to Station 37. Ovot ('water-skins' or 'spirit mediums') has an ambiguous etymology. If from ov ('water-skin'), the name describes a site with water storage; if from ov ('necromantic spirit, medium'), it may reflect pre-Israelite cultic associations. Numbers 21:10 records this same station in the narrative sequence, confirming the itinerary's alignment with the main text. Obotoh was east of Edom in the southern Moabite region, marking Israel's northward progress toward the Transjordanian plateau.
44. Station 37 to Station 38. Iyyei ha'Avarim ('the ruins of the crossings/passes') combines iyyim ('ruins, heaps') with Avarim ('crossings' — the mountain range east of the Jordan, from '-v-r' 'to cross'). Numbers 21:11 places this site bivmidbar asher al penei Mo'av mimizrach hashemesh ('in the wilderness facing Moab from the east'). The Avarim range would become significant as the location of Mount Nebo, where Moses would view and die. Israel is now approaching the final leg of the journey — the eastern approach to the Jordan.
45. Station 38 to Station 39. The departure point is abbreviated to Iyim (from Iye-abarim). Divon Gad ('Dibon of Gad') is the same Dibon that would be allotted to the tribe of Gad (Numbers 32:34). The qualifier 'Gad' distinguishes it from other Dibons and reflects its later tribal association. This is the site where the Mesha Stele (Moabite Stone, c. 840 BCE) would be erected, one of the most important extra-biblical inscriptions confirming the historicity of Israelite-Moabite interactions. The route now follows the King's Highway through the Moabite plateau.
46. Station 39 to Station 40. Almon Divlatayemah ('hidden place of the two fig-cakes') combines almon ('concealment,' from '-l-m' 'to hide') with the dual form of develah ('fig-cake'). The name may indicate a site known for its dried fig production or a hidden oasis with fig trees. Jeremiah 48:22 mentions Beth-diblathaim in an oracle against Moab, confirming its Moabite plateau location. The dual ending (-ayim) is characteristic of Transjordanian place names and typically indicates paired features — two hills, two springs, or two settlements.
47. Station 40 to Station 41. Harei ha'Avarim ('the mountains of the crossings/passes') is the mountain range east of the Jordan Valley and Dead Sea. The specification lifnei Nevo ('facing Nebo') orients the camp toward Mount Nebo specifically — the summit from which Moses would view the promised land before dying (Deuteronomy 34:1). The name Nebo may derive from the Babylonian deity Nabu (god of writing and wisdom), reflecting the ancient Near Eastern religious geography of the region. This is the penultimate station — one more stop before the final encampment.
48. Station 41 to Station 42 — the final station. Arvot Mo'av al Yarden Yereicho ('the plains of Moab by the Jordan of Jericho') is the terminus of the 42-stage journey. This location — the broad, flat steppe east of the Jordan River opposite Jericho — serves as Israel's base camp for the entire final section of the Torah: the Balaam narratives, the Baal-Peor crisis, the second census, the Midianite war, the Transjordanian settlement, and all of Deuteronomy. The journey from slavery in Egypt to the threshold of the promised land is now complete in 42 stages.
49. The final camp's extent is specified: from Beit haYeshimot ('house of the desolations/wastelands') to Avel haShittim ('the meadow of the acacias'). This describes a substantial encampment stretching several miles along the Jordan Valley — large enough to accommodate the entire nation. Abel-shittim ('acacia meadow') is the same Shittim where Israel fell into the Baal-Peor apostasy (Numbers 25:1) and from which Joshua would later send spies into Jericho (Joshua 2:1). The setumah marker signals the transition from the completed itinerary to the final legislative section about entering Canaan.
50. The divine speech formula vaydabber YHWH el Moshe be'arvot Mo'av ('the LORD spoke to Moses on the plains of Moab') introduces the final legislative block of Numbers — commands about entering and settling Canaan (vv. 51-56). The location marker be'arvot Mo'av al Yarden Yereicho places these instructions at the journey's terminus, facing the destination. The laws that follow are forward-looking: having traced the complete journey from Egypt to the Jordan, the text now turns to the future — what Israel must do when they cross over.
51. The instruction begins with the anticipatory formula ki attem overim et haYarden ('when you are crossing the Jordan'). The participle overim ('crossing') treats the crossing as imminent and certain — not 'if' but 'when.' The full name erets Kena'an ('the land of Canaan') is used, emphasizing that the entire land — not just parts — is the intended destination. This instruction looks forward to a campaign of total settlement, not partial occupation.
52. Three categories of religious infrastructure must be destroyed: maskiyotam ('their figured stones/carved images' — from s-k-h, possibly stone reliefs or inscribed cult objects), tsalmei masekhotam ('their cast metal images' — from ts-l-m 'image' and n-s-k 'to pour/cast,' indicating metal idols made by casting), and bamotam ('their high places' — elevated worship platforms, from b-m-h). The verb horashtam ('you shall dispossess') from y-r-sh applies to the inhabitants, while ibadtem ('you shall destroy') and tashmidu ('you shall annihilate') apply to the religious objects. The thoroughness is absolute: kol ('all') appears four times.
53. The command vehorashtam et ha'arets vishavtem bah ('you shall take possession of the land and settle in it') pairs conquest with settlement — military action must be followed by permanent habitation. The theological basis is ki lakhem natatti et ha'arets ('because to you I have given the land') — divine gift precedes human action. The verb lareshet ('to possess, to inherit') from y-r-sh creates a wordplay with the same verb used for dispossessing the inhabitants: Israel 'dispossesses' (y-r-sh Hif'il) in order to 'possess' (y-r-sh Qal). The same root carries both meanings.

54. The land distribution system combines two methods: goral ('lot' — random divine selection) and proportional allocation based on population (larav tarbu... velam'at tam'itu — 'for the numerous, increase... for the few, decrease'). This dual system balances divine sovereignty (the lot determines location) with practical equity (larger tribes get more territory). The phrase el asher yetse lo shammah haggoral ('wherever the lot falls for him, there it shall be') makes the lot result final and irreversible — it represents God's decision. Distribution follows mattot avoteikhem ('your ancestral tribes'), maintaining the tribal structure as the basis of land tenure.
55. The warning uses two vivid metaphors: lesikkim be'einekhem ('as barbs/splinters in your eyes') and litsninimim betsideikhem ('as thorns in your sides'). The term sikkim (hapax — appearing only here) likely means 'barbs' or 'pricks,' objects causing constant irritation and pain. Tsninimim ('thorns') are sharp desert plants that wound anyone who brushes against them. Together they describe persistent, unavoidable torment — not a one-time threat but chronic affliction. The final verb tsareru ('they will harass, they will oppress') from ts-r-r ('to press, to constrict') adds the dimension of being squeezed and confined in one's own land.
56. The chapter's final verse delivers the most severe warning: ka'asher dimmiti la'asot lahem e'eseh lakhem ('as I intended to do to them, I will do to you'). The verb dimmiti from d-m-h ('to intend, to plan, to think') reveals divine intentionality — God had planned specific consequences for Canaan's inhabitants. If Israel fails to carry out the dispossession, they inherit the punishment that was meant for others. This principle of transferred judgment — the obedient who become disobedient receive the disobedient's fate — stands as the chapter's theological climax. The pe (parashah petuchah) closes this section with maximum gravity. The 42-stage journey from Egypt ends not with celebration but with warning: arrival at the destination is not the same as possessing it.

Summary: God defines the precise borders of the land of Canaan — south, west, north, and east — that the nine and a half tribes (excluding Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh) will inherit. The boundary runs from the wilderness of Zin in the south to Mount Hor in the north, from the Mediterranean in the west to the Jordan in the east. Ten men are appointed to oversee the land distribution, one per tribe.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is a boundary charter: the suzerain (God) defines the precise territory granted to the vassal (Israel). The verb tippol ('shall fall,' v. 2) for land allocation is a technical lot-casting term — the land 'falls' to its recipients as God determines. The word gevul ('border, boundary') dominates the chapter, appearing over a dozen times. The borders simultaneously define the gift and its limits — Israel receives exactly what God grants, no more. The land is Canaan proper, west of the Jordan; the Transjordanian territory is excluded.

Translation Friction: Several boundary markers are geographically uncertain: Hazar-enan, Mount Hor (different from the Mount Hor where Aaron died), and Zedad have debated identifications. We transliterated consistently without attempting modern coordinates. The phrase gevul yam ('the sea border,' v. 6) refers to the Mediterranean — in Hebrew, 'the sea' is the western boundary by definition. We rendered it 'the Mediterranean coastline' for geographic clarity.

Connections: The boundary description echoes the territorial promises in Genesis 15:18-21 and Exodus 23:31, though the exact boundaries differ in scope. The ten overseers appointed here (vv. 17-29) parallel the twelve tribal leaders of Numbers 1:5-16 and 13:4-15. Eleazar and Joshua lead the allocation (v. 17), fulfilling the succession from Aaron and Moses. The western boundary (Mediterranean) and southern boundary (wilderness of Zin) correspond to Joshua 15:1-4.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses: ²"Give this order to the Israelites: When you enter the land of Canaan, this is the territory that will be allotted to you as your inheritance — the land of Canaan as defined by these borders. ³Your southern sector will extend from the Wilderness of Zin along the border of Edom. Your southern boundary on the east will begin at the tip of the Salt Sea. ⁴Your boundary will curve south of the Scorpion Pass, continue to Zin, and extend south of Kadesh-barnea. From there it will proceed to Hazar-addar and cross over to Azmon. ⁵The boundary will turn from Azmon toward the Wadi of Egypt, ending at the Mediterranean Sea. ⁶As for your western boundary — the Great Sea will serve as your border. This will be your western boundary. ⁷This will be your northern boundary: from the Great Sea, mark a line to Mount Hor. ⁸From Mount Hor, trace the boundary to Lebo-hamath, with the border extending to Zedad. ⁹The boundary will continue to Ziphron and end at Hazar-enan. This will be your northern boundary. ¹⁰For your eastern boundary, mark a line from Hazar-enan to Shepham. ¹¹The boundary will descend from Shepham to Riblah, east of Ain. Then the boundary will continue downward along the eastern shore of the Sea of Chinnereth. ¹²The boundary will follow the Jordan downward and end at the Salt Sea. This will be your land, defined by its surrounding borders. ¹³Moses instructed the Israelites: "This is the land that you are to distribute among yourselves by lot as an inheritance. The LORD has directed that it be given to the nine and a half tribes, ¹⁴because the tribe of Reuben by their ancestral houses, the tribe of Gad by their ancestral houses, and the half-tribe of Manasseh have already received their inheritance. ¹⁵These two and a half tribes have received their inheritance east of the Jordan, across from Jericho, toward the sunrise." ¹⁶The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁷"These are the names of the men who will distribute the land among you: Eleazar the priest and Joshua son of Nun. ¹⁸You are also to appoint one leader from each tribe to help distribute the land. ¹⁹These are their names: from the tribe of Judah — Caleb son of Jephunneh. ²⁰From the tribe of Simeon — Shemuel son of Ammihud. ²¹From the tribe of Benjamin — Elidad son of Chislon. ²²From the tribe of Dan, the leader Bukki son of Jogli. ²³From the descendants of Joseph: for the tribe of Manasseh, the leader Hanniel son of Ephod. ²⁴From the tribe of Ephraim, the leader Kemuel son of Shiphtan. ²⁵From the tribe of Zebulun, the leader Elizaphan son of Parnach. ²⁶From the tribe of Issachar, the leader Paltiel son of Azzan. ²⁷From the tribe of Asher, the leader Ahihud son of Shelomi. ²⁸From the tribe of Naphtali, the leader Pedahel son of Ammihud. ²⁹These are the men the LORD appointed to distribute the inheritance to the Israelites in the land of Canaan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The standard speech formula vayedabber YHVH el-Mosheh le'mor introduces the boundary charter of the promised land (vv 1-12). After the campaigns against Midian (ch 31) and the Transjordanian settlement (ch 32), God now defines the precise western territory — the land of Canaan proper that the remaining nine and a half tribes will inherit.
2. The verb tsav ('command') carries binding legal force — this boundary charter is not advisory but authoritative. The phrase tippol lakhem benachalah ('will fall to you as an inheritance') uses nafal ('to fall') in a technical sense for lot-casting and territorial allocation — the land 'falls' to its recipients as God determines through the sacred lot. The word gevuloteha ('its boundaries') from gevul ('border, boundary, limit') will dominate the chapter, appearing over a dozen times.
3. The southern boundary begins at midbar-Tsin ('the Wilderness of Zin') running al-yedei Edom ('alongside Edom'). The gevul negev ('southern border') is anchored to miqtseḥ yam-hammelach ('the end of the Salt Sea' — the Dead Sea) on its eastern end. The word qedmah ('eastward') establishes the starting point for tracing the southern boundary. The pe'at negev ('southern quarter') uses pe'ah ('corner, side, direction') for a broader geographic zone, while gevul denotes the precise line.
4. The boundary venosav ('turns, curves') from s-v-v ('to go around, surround'), indicating a winding path through rough terrain. Ma'aleh Aqrabbim ('Scorpion Pass,' literally 'ascent of scorpions') is a steep pass in the southern Negev highlands. The route continues through Tsinah ('toward Zin') and reaches Qadesh Barne'a ('Kadesh-barnea') — the site of Israel's great failure when they refused to enter the land after the spies' report (Numbers 13-14). The qere/ketiv variation (/) reflects a singular/plural disagreement in manuscript transmission, resolved by the qere plural form.
5. The boundary curves (venosav) from Azmon toward nachlah Mitsrayim ('the Wadi of Egypt'), generally identified with Wadi el-Arish rather than the Nile itself. This seasonal watercourse formed the traditional southwestern frontier of the promised land. The phrase totz'otav hayyamamah ('its termination points are at the sea') marks where the southern boundary meets the Mediterranean coastline, connecting the southern and western borders.
6. The western boundary is simply the Mediterranean — hayyam haggadol ('the Great Sea'). The statement is emphatic through repetition: hayyam haggadol ugevul ('the Great Sea and its coastline') followed by zeh yihyeh lakhem gevul yam ('this will be your western boundary'). The Mediterranean coast defined Israel's western frontier throughout its history, though in practice the Philistine coastal cities resisted Israelite control for centuries.
7. The northern boundary begins at hayyam haggadol ('the Great Sea') and extends to Hor haHar ('Mount Hor'). This is not the same Mount Hor where Aaron died (Numbers 20:22-28, located in the south near Edom). The northern Hor haHar is likely in the Lebanon range. The verb teta'u ('you shall mark out, designate for yourselves') from the hithpael of '-v-h means to draw or point out a line — an act of deliberate territorial demarcation.
8. From the northern Mount Hor the boundary runs to levo Chamat ('the entrance of Hamath'). Lebo-hamath — likely modern Lebweh near the headwaters of the Orontes River in the Beqaa Valley — functioned as the traditional northern limit of Israelite territorial claims (cf. 1 Kings 8:65, 2 Kings 14:25). The waypoint Tsedadah ('Zedad') lies on the road between Damascus and Hamath. This northern frontier reaches deep into modern Lebanon and Syria — territory only partially controlled under David and Solomon.
9. Zifronah and Chatsar Einan mark the northeastern corner of the promised land. Hazar-enan ('village of springs,' from chatser — 'settlement' and enan — 'springs') was the northernmost point of the eastern boundary, the hinge point where north meets east. The closing formula zeh yihyeh lakhem gevul tsafon ('this will be your northern boundary') seals the northern section, paralleling the identical formula used for the western boundary (v 6).

10. The eastern boundary begins where the northern left off, at Chatsar Einan ('Hazar-enan'), heading south to Shefamah ('Shepham'). The verb vehit'avvitem ('you shall mark out for yourselves') from the hithpael of '-v-h again indicates deliberate territorial demarcation — the same verb used in verse 7 for the northern boundary. The word qedmah ('eastward') establishes the directional orientation.
11. The boundary veyarad ('descends') — the verb y-r-d emphasizes the dramatic drop in elevation from the highlands toward the Jordan Rift Valley. From Shepham it descends to haRivlah ('Riblah'), east of ha'Ayin ('Ain,' literally 'spring'). The boundary then drops to reach al-ketef yam-Kinneret qedmah ('the eastern slope/shoulder of the Sea of Chinnereth'). The word ketef ('shoulder, ridge') describes the hillside descending to the lake — the body of water later known as the Sea of Galilee. Chinnereth may derive from kinnor ('harp, lyre'), reflecting the lake's harp-like shape.
12. The boundary follows the Yarden ('Jordan') — from the root y-r-d ('to descend'), the river's name literally means 'the descender,' apt for a river that drops over 600 meters from the Sea of Galilee to the Dead Sea. The circuit ends where it began: at yam haMelach ('the Salt Sea' — the Dead Sea, cf. v 3). The closing statement zo't tiyeh lakhem ha'arets ligevuloteha saviv ('this will be your land according to its surrounding boundaries') summarizes the entire boundary charter — a complete geographic circuit defining the promised inheritance.
13. Moses conveys God's command, specifying the distribution method: tithnachalu otah begoral ('you shall inherit it by lot'). The goral ('lot') is not a gamble but a sacred instrument — it removes human favoritism from the allocation process, placing the decision in God's hands (cf. Proverbs 16:33). The specification tish'at hammattot vachatsi hammatteh ('nine tribes and the half-tribe') immediately raises the question of the missing two and a half tribes, answered in the next verse.
14. The explanation for the nine-and-a-half figure: Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh laqechu nachalatam ('have already received their inheritance') in the Transjordanian territories allocated in chapter 32. The phrase leveit avotam ('by their ancestral houses') grounds tribal identity in genealogical lineage. The verb laqach ('to take, receive') in the perfect tense marks these allocations as completed facts — their inheritance is settled.
15. The geographic specification me'ever leYarden Yericho qedmah mizrachah ('beyond the Jordan of Jericho, eastward toward the sunrise') locates the Transjordanian territories relative to the crossing point at Jericho. The redundancy of qedmah mizrachah ('eastward, toward the sunrise') emphatically establishes direction. The pe paragraph marker closes this explanatory section, transitioning from the boundary charter to the appointment of land-distribution leaders.
16. A new speech formula opens the section on leadership appointments for the land distribution (vv 16-29). After defining the borders, God now specifies who will oversee the allocation process — ensuring that the sacred lot-casting occurs under proper priestly and civil authority.
17. Two supreme leaders are named first: El'azar haKohen ('Eleazar the priest') and Yehoshua bin-Nun ('Joshua son of Nun'). Eleazar represents priestly authority — he will oversee the sacred lot; Joshua represents civil and military leadership — he will enforce the allocations. The phrase asher yinchalu lakhem et-ha'arets ('who will cause you to inherit the land') uses the piel of n-ch-l ('to cause to inherit, to apportion as inheritance'). Moses is notably absent from the distribution — he will not enter the land (Numbers 20:12).
18. Each tribe provides a nasi ('leader, chieftain') to represent its interests in the distribution. The phrase nasi echad nasi echad mimmatteh ('one leader, one leader per tribe') emphasizes the principle of equal representation — no tribe is over- or under-represented. These ten tribal leaders (for the nine and a half western tribes, with Joseph split into Ephraim and Manasseh) join Eleazar and Joshua to form the land-allocation commission.
19. Caleb son of Jephunneh is a towering figure — one of only two spies (with Joshua) who gave a faithful report when the others counseled fear (Numbers 13-14). His appointment as Judah's representative is fitting: the man who trusted God's promise of the land now helps distribute it. Judah is listed first, reflecting the tribe's growing preeminence in Israelite leadership. Caleb's survival across forty years of wilderness is itself proof of God's promise (Numbers 14:24).
20. Shemuel ben-Ammihud represents Simeon. The name Shemu'el ('heard of God' or 'name of God') is the same name borne by the later prophet-judge Samuel, though they are different individuals. Ammihud means 'my kinsman is glorious.' Simeon's territory would ultimately be embedded within Judah's allotment (Joshua 19:1-9), fulfilling Jacob's prophecy of Simeon's scattering (Genesis 49:7).
21. Elidad ben-Kislon represents Benjamin. The name Elidad ('my God has loved') is theophoric, combining El ('God') with a form of y-d-d ('to love'). Benjamin would receive strategic territory between Judah and Ephraim, including the site that would eventually become Jerusalem — a location at the tribal seam between north and south.
22. Bukki ben-Yogli represents Dan. The title nasi ('leader, chieftain') is explicitly stated here, though it applies to all the representatives. The name Bukki may derive from baqaq ('to empty, pour out'). Dan would eventually migrate from its initial coastal allotment — pressured by the Philistines and Amorites — to the far north, conquering Laish and renaming it Dan (Judges 18).
23. The Joseph tribes receive special treatment: livnei Yosef ('for the descendants of Joseph') is the umbrella designation, then Manasseh is listed first as the elder son. Channiel ben-Efod ('Hanniel son of Ephod') represents the western half of Manasseh — the portion receiving land west of the Jordan. The other half has already inherited Transjordanian territory (v 14). The name Channiel means 'God has been gracious.'
24. Kemuel ben-Shifan represents Ephraim. Though Ephraim was Joseph's younger son, he received Jacob's blessing of preeminence through the crossed-hands blessing (Genesis 48:13-20) and would become the dominant northern tribe, often standing for the northern kingdom as a whole. The name Qemu'el ('raised up by God') appears also in Genesis 22:21, though referring to a different individual. Shifan may relate to shafat ('to judge').

25. Elitsafan ben-Parnakh represents Zebulun. The name Elitsafan ('my God has sheltered/protected') echoes the Levitical leader Elizaphan son of Uzziel (Numbers 3:30), though this is a different person. Zebulun would receive territory in the Galilee region, with access to trade routes. Jacob's blessing predicted Zebulun would dwell toward the sea and serve as a harbor for ships (Genesis 49:13).
26. Paltiel ben-Azzan represents Issachar. The name Paltiel ('God is my deliverance') combines pelet ('escape, deliverance') with El ('God'). Issachar's territory would be in the fertile Jezreel Valley (Esdraelon), one of the most productive agricultural regions in the land. Jacob characterized Issachar as a strong donkey crouching between the saddlebags, content to work the rich land (Genesis 49:14-15).
27. Achihud ben-Shelomi represents Asher. The name Achihud ('my brother is majesty') follows the common achi- ('my brother') compound pattern for personal names. Shelomi may derive from shalom ('peace'). Asher would receive coastal territory in the northwestern region near Phoenicia, known for agricultural abundance and olive oil production (cf. Deuteronomy 33:24 — 'let him dip his foot in oil').
28. Pedah'el ben-Ammihud represents Naphtali, the final tribe in the list. The name Pedah'el ('God has ransomed') contains the root p-d-h ('to redeem, ransom'), a theologically rich term. Ammihud ('my kinsman is glorious') appears as a patronymic for both the Simeonite (v 20) and Naphtalite representatives — different families sharing a common name. Naphtali would receive territory in the upper Galilee, a lush and mountainous region.
29. The closing formula: elleh asher tsivvah YHVH lenachel et-benei Yisra'el be'erets Kena'an ('these are those whom the LORD commanded to apportion inheritance to the Israelites in the land of Canaan'). The verb nachel (piel of n-ch-l) means 'to cause to inherit, to distribute as inheritance.' The paragraph marker closes the chapter. The careful bureaucratic preparation — twelve leaders plus two overseers — demonstrates that inheriting the promised land is not an act of chaotic seizure but of ordered divine administration, with each tribe's rights protected by named representatives.

Summary: The Levites — who receive no tribal territory — are given forty-eight cities with surrounding pasturelands distributed across all twelve tribes. Six of these cities are designated as arei miqlat ('cities of refuge') where anyone who kills unintentionally may flee from the go'el haddam ('blood avenger'). The chapter establishes careful legal distinctions between murder and manslaughter, and specifies that the killer must remain in the refuge city until the death of the high priest.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The cities of refuge create a judicial infrastructure that tempers justice with mercy. The distinction between intentional and unintentional killing is drawn with concrete examples: striking with an iron implement versus a stone accidentally falling. The high priest's death functions as a kind of communal atonement — his death releases the manslayer from confinement. The land itself is a moral agent: bloodshed pollutes the land (lo tachanifu et-ha'arets, 'you shall not pollute the land,' v. 33), and only the blood of the murderer can purge it.*

Translation Friction: The term go'el haddam ('blood avenger,' or 'blood redeemer') resists translation because go'el carries redemptive connotations alongside its vengeful function. We used 'blood avenger' following the dominant tradition while preserving the kinsman-redeemer root in the notes. The phrase migrash ('pastureland,' v. 2) from the root g-r-sh ('to drive out') describes open ground 'cleared' beyond the city walls — we used 'pastureland' for its functional clarity.

Connections: The cities of refuge are implemented in Joshua 20:1-9 (Kedesh, Shechem, Hebron, Bezer, Ramoth, Golan). The go'el institution links to Ruth 3-4 (kinsman-redeemer) and to the restitution law in Numbers 5:8. The principle that blood pollutes the land (v. 33) underlies 2 Samuel 21:1-9 (famine caused by Saul's bloodguilt). The high priest's death as release mechanism (v. 28) is explored in Hebrews 9 as a type of Christ's priestly death.

¹The LORD spoke to Moses in the plains of Moab, by the Jordan across from Jericho: ²"Direct the Israelites to give the Levites cities to live in from the tribal inheritance holdings. You must also give the Levites pasturelands surrounding those cities. ³The cities will be theirs to live in, and the surrounding pasturelands will be for their cattle, their property, and all their animals. ⁴The pasturelands of the cities that you give to the Levites will extend outward from the city wall one thousand cubits in every direction. ⁵Measure two thousand cubits outside the city on the east side, two thousand cubits on the south side, two thousand cubits on the west side, and two thousand cubits on the north side, with the city at the center. This will constitute their urban pasturelands. ⁶Among the cities you give to the Levites, six will be cities of refuge, which you are to designate so that a person who has killed someone can flee there. In addition to these, give them forty-two other cities. ⁷The total number of cities you give to the Levites will be forty-eight, each with its surrounding pasturelands. ⁸The cities you provide will come from the holdings of the Israelite tribes. From a larger tribe, take more cities; from a smaller tribe, take fewer. Each tribe must give some of its cities to the Levites in proportion to the inheritance it receives." ⁹The LORD spoke to Moses: ¹⁰"Tell the Israelites: When you cross the Jordan into the land of Canaan, ¹¹you must select cities to serve as your cities of refuge, where a person who has killed someone unintentionally may flee. ¹²These cities will provide you refuge from the blood avenger, so that the killer does not die before standing trial before the community. ¹³Of the cities you designate, six will serve as cities of refuge. ¹⁴Designate three cities east of the Jordan and three cities in the land of Canaan as cities of refuge. ¹⁵These six cities will serve as refuge for Israelites, for resident foreigners, and for temporary settlers among you — so that anyone who kills a person unintentionally may flee there. ¹⁶If someone strikes another person with an iron implement and the person dies, the striker is a murderer. The murderer must be put to death. ¹⁷If someone strikes another with a stone large enough to cause death, and the person dies, the striker is a murderer. The murderer must be put to death. ¹⁸Or if someone strikes another with a wooden implement large enough to cause death, and the person dies, the striker is a murderer. The murderer must be put to death. ¹⁹The blood avenger is the one who will put the murderer to death. When the blood avenger encounters the murderer, he is to execute him. ²⁰If someone shoves another person out of hatred, or throws something at them from ambush so that they die, ²¹or strikes them with a fist out of hostility so that they die — the assailant must be put to death as a murderer. The blood avenger is to execute the murderer when he encounters him. ²²But if someone shoves another person suddenly without any prior hostility, or throws any object at them without premeditation, ²³or drops a stone capable of killing on someone without seeing them, causing death — and the person was not their enemy and no harm was intended — ²⁴then the community must adjudicate between the killer and the blood avenger according to these regulations. ²⁵The community must rescue the killer from the blood avenger and return him to the city of refuge where he had fled. He must remain there until the death of the high priest who was anointed with the sacred oil. ²⁶But if the killer ever leaves the boundaries of the city of refuge where he has fled, ²⁷and the blood avenger finds him outside the boundaries of his city of refuge and kills him, the blood avenger bears no guilt for the death. ²⁸The killer should have remained in his city of refuge until the death of the high priest. Only after the high priest dies may the killer return to his own property. ²⁹These provisions will serve as your legal standard throughout your generations, wherever you settle. ³⁰Anyone who kills a person — the murderer is to be executed on the testimony of witnesses. However, no one may be put to death on the testimony of a single witness. ³¹You must not accept a ransom payment for the life of a murderer who deserves to die. That person must be executed. ³²Likewise, you must not accept a ransom payment to allow someone who has fled to a city of refuge to return home before the death of the high priest. ³³You must not corrupt the land where you live, because bloodshed pollutes the land, and the land cannot be purified of blood that has been shed on it except by the blood of the one who shed it. ³⁴Do not defile the land in which you are settling, in which I also dwell — for I, the LORD, reside among the Israelites."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The location formula be'arvot Mo'av al-Yarden Yericho ('in the plains of Moab by the Jordan at Jericho') anchors this legislation in the same geographic setting as the preceding chapters — the final encampment before crossing the Jordan. These instructions about Levitical cities and cities of refuge represent some of the last legislation given in Numbers, establishing judicial infrastructure for life in the promised land.
2. The Levites receive no tribal territory of their own — they are landless by divine design (cf. Numbers 18:20-24), with God Himself as their inheritance. Instead, other tribes must give (venatenu laLeviyim — 'they shall give to the Levites') from their own nachalat achuzzatam ('the inheritance of their land holdings'). They receive two things: arim lashevet ('cities to dwell in') and migrash ('pastureland, open land') surrounding those cities. The word migrash from the root g-r-sh ('to drive out, expel') refers to open ground extending beyond the city walls — land 'driven out' or cleared of structures.
3. The distinction between the cities (for dwelling) and the migrash ('pasturelands') is functional: livhemtam ('for their cattle'), lirkhusham ('for their property, goods'), and lekhol chayyatam ('for all their living creatures'). The Levites needed grazing land for the livestock they received through tithes and their portions of the sacrificial system. The word chayyah ('living creature, animal') is broader than behemah ('cattle, domesticated animal'), encompassing all livestock.
4. The inner pastureland zone extends miqqir ha'ir vachutsa elef ammah saviv ('from the wall of the city outward one thousand cubits all around'). A cubit (ammah) is approximately 18 inches or 45 centimeters, making this zone roughly 1,500 feet or 460 meters in every direction from the city wall. This establishes a defined ring of Levitical grazing land surrounding each city.

5. The relationship between the one-thousand-cubit measurement (v 4) and the two-thousand-cubit measurement here has generated centuries of rabbinic discussion. The Talmud (Eruvin 56a-b, Sotah 27b) resolves it by distinguishing between an inner zone designated for pasture (1,000 cubits) and an outer zone for fields and vineyards (an additional 1,000 cubits). The fourfold specification — pe'at qedmah, negev, yam, tsafon ('east, south, west, north sides') — with voha'ir battavekh ('the city in the center') creates a precise, measured grid of Levitical territory extending in all four cardinal directions.
6. The shesh arei hammiqlat ('six cities of refuge') are introduced here — from the root q-l-t meaning 'to absorb, receive, shelter.' These are not additional to the forty-eight Levitical cities but included within them: six out of the total serve the specific purpose of sheltering a rotseach ('one who kills, manslayer'). The remaining arba'im ushtayim ir ('forty-two cities') complete the total. Placing the refuge cities under Levitical administration ensures they are governed by those trained in Torah — qualified to adjudicate the complex distinction between murder and manslaughter.
7. The final count: arba'im ushemoneh ir ('forty-eight cities') plus their migrash ('pasturelands'). This amounts to roughly four cities per tribe of Israel, distributed across the entire land, ensuring a Levitical presence in every region. The Levites thus serve as a spiritual infrastructure — dispersed among the tribes rather than concentrated in one territory, providing teaching, judicial expertise, and religious leadership throughout the nation.
8. The allocation principle is proportional: me'et harav tarbu ('from the larger, give more') and me'et hame'at tam'itu ('from the smaller, give fewer'). This equity principle — ish kefi nachalato ('each according to his inheritance') — ensures no tribe bears a disproportionate burden. A tribe with extensive territory contributes more cities; a smaller tribe contributes fewer. The pe paragraph marker closes the Levitical cities section and transitions to the cities-of-refuge legislation.
9. A second divine speech formula opens the cities-of-refuge legislation proper (vv 9-34). This section moves from the administrative question (how many cities, where located) to the judicial question (who qualifies for refuge, under what conditions, and what distinguishes murder from manslaughter). The separate speech introduction signals a distinct legislative unit within the broader chapter.
10. The temporal marker ki attem overim et-haYarden artsah Kena'an ('when you cross the Jordan into the land of Canaan') anchors the legislation to the imminent conquest. These laws are prospective — they will take effect upon entry into the promised land. The verb overim ('crossing') is a participle suggesting imminence: 'you who are about to cross.' The refuge system must be established as part of the initial settlement infrastructure.
11. The verb vehiqritem ('you shall select, designate, make happen') from q-r-h has the connotation of arranging or making something occur — the cities must be deliberately designated, not randomly assigned. The qualifying condition is critical: the killer must have acted bishgagah ('unintentionally, by accident, in error') from the root sh-g-g ('to err, go astray'). This word creates the legal foundation for the entire chapter — the distinction between accidental killing (which qualifies for refuge) and intentional murder (which does not). The phrase makkeh-nefesh ('one who strikes a person dead') uses nefesh for the victim's life.
12. The cities provide miqlat migo'el ('refuge from the redeemer/avenger'). The go'el is the kinsman-redeemer who has both the right and the duty to act on behalf of a slain relative. The fundamental principle: velo yamut harotseach ad-omdo lifnei ha'edah lamishpat ('the killer shall not die until he stands before the community for judgment'). The right to a fair trial before the edah ('community assembly') takes precedence over the go'el's right of blood vengeance. This represents a remarkable legal restraint on private retribution.
13. The number six is reiterated for emphasis: shesh arei miqlat tihyenah lakhem ('six cities of refuge they shall be for you'). The specific number ensures adequate geographic coverage — enough cities that anyone in the land can reach one within a reasonable distance — while keeping the number sufficiently limited that each city can maintain the judicial expertise needed to adjudicate homicide cases.
14. The geographic distribution is balanced: shlosh he'arim me'ever laYarden ('three cities beyond the Jordan') and shlosh he'arim be'erets Kena'an ('three cities in the land of Canaan'). With two and a half tribes east and nine and a half west, this provides proportionally greater access for the smaller Transjordanian population. Deuteronomy 4:41-43 identifies the three eastern cities as Bezer (for Reuben), Ramoth-gilead (for Gad), and Golan (for Manasseh).
15. The eligibility extends universally beyond ethnic Israelites: livnei Yisra'el ('for the Israelites'), velagger ('for the resident foreigner'), and velatoshav ('for the temporary settler'). The ger (long-term resident alien) and toshav (short-term sojourner) have equal access to the refuge system. Justice in capital cases is universal, not ethnic — a remarkable provision in the ancient Near East. The qualifying phrase bishgagah ('unintentionally') is repeated, reinforcing the core legal distinction of the chapter.
16. The first category of murder: striking with a keli varzel ('iron implement'). Iron objects are inherently lethal weapons — using one against a person signals murderous intent. The verdict formula is emphatic: rotseach hu ('he is a murderer'), mot yumat harotseach ('the murderer must certainly be put to death'). The phrase mot yumat uses the infinitive absolute construction for absolute certainty — there is no exception, no alternative sentence. Verses 16-18 establish a three-material typology of murder weapons: iron, stone, and wood.
17. The second murder category: striking with even yad ('a hand-held stone') asher yamut bah ('with which one could die'). The qualifier 'capable of causing death' is legally significant — it distinguishes between a pebble (incapable of killing, thus not evidence of murderous intent) and a boulder or large rock (capable of killing, thus evidence of intent). The size and lethality of the weapon factor into the determination of intent, a surprisingly sophisticated jurisprudential principle.
18. The third murder category: a keli ets-yad ('hand-held wooden implement') capable of killing. The three materials — iron (v 16), stone (v 17), wood (v 18) — cover essentially every possible murder weapon in the ancient world. In each case, using an implement known to be lethal establishes the presumption of intent. The repeated verdict formula rotseach hu, mot yumat harotseach creates a legal refrain — an unmistakable judicial pronouncement echoing three times.

19. The go'el haddam ('blood avenger,' literally 'redeemer of the blood') is now formally introduced with his execution authority. The go'el is the designated kinsman who bears responsibility for the slain relative's blood. The phrase hu yamit et-harotseach ('he himself shall put the murderer to death') and befīg'o-vo hu yemitennu ('when he encounters him, he shall put him to death') grants the go'el direct execution authority after the community has established guilt. This is not vigilante justice — it operates within the framework of communal adjudication (v 24), with the go'el serving as the appointed executioner.
20. Two additional indicators of murderous intent beyond weapon type: besin'ah yehdofennu ('shoves him out of hatred') and hishlikh alav bitsediyah ('hurls something at him with premeditation'). The word sin'ah ('hatred') establishes the emotional motive, while tsediyah ('ambush, premeditation, lying in wait') establishes prior planning. Together, motive and premeditation determine whether a killing constitutes murder or manslaughter — the Hebrew legal system evaluates both the physical act and the mental state behind it.
21. Even bare-handed killing qualifies as murder when accompanied by eivah ('hostility, enmity'). The phrase hikkahu veyado ('struck him with his hand/fist') shows that no weapon is necessary for a murder conviction — intent is what matters. The repeated conclusion go'el haddam yamit et-harotseach befīg'o-vo ('the blood avenger shall put the murderer to death when he encounters him') establishes the go'el as the appointed executioner in all proven murder cases. Verses 16-21 collectively define murder by three criteria: lethal weapon, prior hatred, or hostile premeditation.
22. The legal pivot to manslaughter: befeta ('suddenly, unexpectedly') and belo eivah ('without hostility'). These two conditions — impulsiveness without malice — distinguish accidental killing from murder. The parallel phrase belo tsediyah ('without premeditation, without lying in wait') in the same sentence reinforces that no prior planning or ambush was involved. This verse directly mirrors verse 20, using the same verbs (hadaf — 'shove,' hishlikh — 'hurl') but negating the indicators of intent. The identical actions can constitute either murder or manslaughter depending entirely on the mental state.
23. An additional manslaughter scenario: killing with a stone belo re'ot ('without seeing' the victim) — the element of accident is paramount. The classic case: a person drops or throws a lethal object without knowing someone is below. The key exculpatory factors are stated explicitly: vehu lo oyev lo ('he was not his enemy') and velo mevaqesh ra'ato ('he was not seeking to harm him'). The absence of enmity, malice, and premeditation collectively define unintentional homicide. The legal system examines the killer's relationship to the victim and the killer's prior intentions.
24. The community (edah) serves as judge: veshafu ha'edah bein hammakkeh uvein go'el haddam ('the community shall judge between the striker and the blood avenger'). This establishes communal adjudication — neither the victim's family nor the killer decides the case unilaterally. The phrase al hamishpatim ha'elohim ('according to these regulations') binds the court to the specific legal criteria outlined in the preceding verses (vv 16-23). The law constrains both the go'el (who might kill an innocent manslayer) and the killer (who might escape just punishment).
25. If the killing is ruled unintentional, the community must intervene: vehitsilu ha'edah et-harotseach miyyad go'el haddam ('the community shall rescue the killer from the hand of the blood avenger'). The verb hitsilu ('rescue, deliver') casts the community as the manslayer's protector against the go'el's vengeance. The manslayer is returned to his ir miqlato ('his city of refuge') with a crucial condition: veyashav bah ad-mot haKohen haGadol ('he shall dwell in it until the death of the high priest') who was mashach oto beshemen haqqodesh ('anointed with the sacred oil'). The high priest's death functions as a kind of atonement — his passing somehow covers the unintentional bloodshed and releases the manslayer from exile.
26. A critical limitation: im yatso yetse harotseach et-gevu' ir miqlato ('if the killer going out goes out beyond the boundary of his city of refuge'). The doubled verb yatso yetse ('going out, he goes out') is an infinitive absolute construction emphasizing any departure, however brief or for whatever reason. The city of refuge is simultaneously a sanctuary and a prison — protection comes with the constraint of confinement within its borders.
27. If the go'el haddam finds the manslayer michuts ligevu' ir miqlato ('outside the border of his city of refuge') and kills him — ein lo dam ('there is no blood upon him'), meaning the blood avenger bears no bloodguilt. The manslayer forfeited his protection by stepping beyond the designated boundary. The stark phrase ein lo dam ('no blood on him') is the same legal formula used to absolve someone of responsibility for a death — the blood of the manslayer will not be charged to the avenger's account.
28. The principle is restated with its temporal boundary: be'ir miqlato yeshev ad-mot haKohen haGadol ('in his city of refuge he shall dwell until the death of the high priest'). After the high priest's death: yashuv harotseach el-erets achuzzato ('the killer may return to the land of his property holding'). The high priest's death inaugurates a kind of release — his passing functions analogously to a jubilee, restoring the manslayer to full freedom and property rights. The connection between the high priest's death and the manslayer's release remains one of the most debated points in Jewish legal commentary.
29. The closing formula establishes permanent jurisdiction: lechuqqat mishpat ledoroteikhem bechol moshevoteikhem ('as a statute of judgment throughout your generations in all your settlements'). The term chuqqat mishpat ('statute of judgment, legal ordinance') combines chuqqah ('enacted statute') with mishpat ('judgment, justice, legal decision'), creating a compound that means 'enacted legal standard.' The legislation applies universally in time (ledoroteikhem — 'throughout your generations') and space (bechol moshevoteikhem — 'in all your dwelling places').
30. Two procedural safeguards: first, execution requires lefi edim ('on the mouth of witnesses' — plural, meaning multiple witnesses); second, ed echad lo ya'aneh venefesh lamut ('one witness shall not testify against a person for death'). The minimum of two witnesses prevents a single individual from weaponizing the justice system through false accusation. This principle becomes foundational in all subsequent Jewish law (cf. Deuteronomy 17:6, 19:15) and is echoed in the New Testament requirement for corroborating testimony (Matthew 18:16, 2 Corinthians 13:1).
31. The prohibition velo tiqchu kofer lenefesh rotseach ('you shall not accept a ransom for the life of a murderer') blocks the wealthy from purchasing immunity from capital punishment. The kofer ('ransom, compensation payment') was standard in property disputes and some injury cases, but human life taken through murder cannot be monetarily compensated. The phrase asher hu rasha lamut ('who is guilty to death' — who deserves the death penalty) uses rasha ('guilty, wicked') as a legal verdict. The ki mot yumat ('he must certainly be put to death') closes all escape routes for the convicted murderer.

32. The same prohibition extends to the manslayer in exile: velo tiqchu kofer lanus el-ir miqlato lashuv lashevet ba'arets ad-mot haKohen ('you shall not accept ransom for the one who has fled to his city of refuge, to return to dwell in the land until the death of the priest'). No payment can substitute for the required period of exile — the manslayer cannot buy early release. Both murderer (v 31) and manslayer (v 32) are placed beyond the reach of monetary influence — the system resists corruption and ensures that justice in capital cases cannot be purchased.
33. The theological foundation for the entire chapter: velo tachanifu et-ha'arets ('you shall not pollute the land'). The verb ch-n-f means 'to pollute, make profane, corrupt' — the same root used in Jeremiah 3:1, 9 for land corrupted by covenant unfaithfulness. Unpunished bloodshed contaminates the physical soil: ki haddam hu yachanif et-ha'arets ('for it is the blood that pollutes the land'). The decisive principle: vela'arets lo yekhuppar laddam asher shupakh-bah ki im bedam shofkho ('the land cannot receive atonement for blood shed on it except by the blood of the one who shed it'). In the Hebrew worldview, spilled blood cries from the ground (Genesis 4:10) and the land itself demands justice. Only the killer's blood can purge the defilement his act introduced.
34. The climactic rationale: velo tetamme et-ha'arets ('do not defile the land') — using tame ('ritually defile') alongside the previous chanaf ('morally pollute') to indicate that bloodshed creates both moral and ritual contamination. The critical phrase: asher ani shokhen betokhah ('in which I dwell'). God's residence in the land makes its purity a personal divine concern. The closing declaration ki ani YHVH shokhen betokh benei Yisra'el ('for I the LORD dwell among the Israelites') grounds the entire legal system in God's presence — the divine Resident demands that His dwelling place remain uncontaminated by unresolved bloodshed. The pe paragraph marker closes this major legal section and the penultimate chapter of Numbers.

Summary: The leaders of the Gilead clan (Manasseh) raise a concern about the Zelophehad ruling: if the daughters marry men from other tribes, their inherited land will transfer permanently to the husband's tribe — and even the Jubilee cannot reverse it. God directs that heiresses must marry within their own tribe. Zelophehad's daughters comply, marrying their cousins, and the book of Numbers closes with a summary formula.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The book ends where it began: with questions of tribal organization and inheritance. The Gileadite petition uses the same verb vattigravnah ('they drew near') as the daughters' original petition in Numbers 27:1, creating a literary bracket. Their legal argument is sophisticated: the Jubilee (Leviticus 25) restores alienated property, but inherited land transferred through marriage is not technically 'alienated' — it changed tribal affiliation through a legitimate pathway. The solution preserves both the daughters' right to inherit and the tribe's territorial integrity.*

Translation Friction: *The verb nigre'ah ('will be subtracted,' v. 3) and its counterpart venosaf ('will be added') describe a zero-sum transfer between tribes. We rendered these as 'subtracted' and 'added' to preserve the mathematical imagery. The phrase al pi YHWH beyad Mosheh ('by the mouth of the LORD through the hand of Moses,' v. 13) in the book's closing formula — combining mouth and hand — we rendered 'by the LORD's command through Moses,' but the dual image of speech and action is worth noting.*

Connections: *This chapter is the direct sequel to Numbers 27:1-11, completing the Zelophehad inheritance cycle. The Jubilee reference (v. 4) connects to Leviticus 25:10-13. The daughters' compliance — marrying within Manasseh — is confirmed in Joshua 17:3-6. The closing formula (v. 13) echoes Numbers 1:1 and frames the entire book as commands given be'arvot Mo'av ('in the plains of Moab'), the staging ground for everything that follows in Deuteronomy and Joshua.*

¹The heads of the ancestral houses belonging to the clan of the descendants of Gilead — son of Machir, son of Manasseh — from the clans of Joseph's descendants, approached and addressed Moses and the tribal leaders, the heads of Israelite ancestral houses. ²They said, "The LORD instructed my lord to distribute the land as an inheritance by lot to the Israelites, and my lord was also directed by the LORD to grant the inheritance of our kinsman Zelophehad to his daughters. ³If they marry men from any other Israelite tribe, their inheritance will be subtracted from our ancestral inheritance and added to the inheritance of whichever tribe they join. Our allotted share will be permanently reduced. ⁴Even when the Jubilee comes for the Israelites, their inheritance will be permanently added to the tribe they have joined, and it will be taken away from our ancestral tribe's inheritance." ⁵Moses instructed the Israelites at the LORD's direction, saying, "The tribe of Joseph's descendants speaks correctly. ⁶This is what the LORD commands regarding Zelophehad's daughters: They may marry whoever seems best to them, but they must marry within a clan of their father's tribe. ⁷No inheritance among the Israelites is to circulate from one tribe to another, because every Israelite must hold firmly to the inheritance of their ancestral tribe. ⁸Every daughter who inherits property in any Israelite tribe must marry someone from a clan within her father's tribe, so that every Israelite retains their ancestral inheritance. ⁹No inheritance is to transfer from one tribe to another. Each of the Israelite tribes must hold firmly to its own inheritance." ¹⁰Zelophehad's daughters did exactly as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹¹Mahlah, Tirzah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Noah — Zelophehad's daughters — married their cousins on their father's side. ¹²They married into the clans of Manasseh son of Joseph, and their inheritance remained within the tribe of their father's clan. ¹³These are the commandments and legal decisions that the LORD issued through Moses to the Israelites on the plains of Moab, beside the Jordan across from Jericho.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayyiqrevu ('they drew near') signals a formal petition — the same verb used in Numbers 27:1 when Zelophehad's daughters first approached Moses. The petitioners are rashei ha'avot ('heads of the ancestral houses'), the senior male authorities of the clan of Gilead. The genealogy ben Makhir ben Menasheh ('son of Machir, son of Manasseh') establishes their tribal standing within the Joseph branch, grounding their concern in the specific inheritance at stake. The nesi'im ('tribal leaders') alongside Moses form the judicial audience, echoing the assembled leadership of 27:2.
2. The petitioners address Moses as adoni ('my lord'), a respectful title acknowledging his authority. They frame their concern by citing two prior divine commands: first, the general land-by-lot distribution (nachalah begoral — 'inheritance by lot,' cf. Numbers 26:55-56), and second, the specific ruling for Zelophehad's daughters (cf. Numbers 27:6-7). The term achinu ('our brother/kinsman') shows Zelophehad is from their own clan — this is not an abstract legal question but a matter directly affecting their tribal allotment.
3. The legal problem is stated precisely: marriage transfers the woman to her husband's household, and with Zelophehad's daughters, the land goes with them. The verb nigre'ah ('it will be subtracted, diminished') and its counterpart venosaf ('it will be added') describe a zero-sum transfer between tribes. The phrase umigoral nachalatenu yigare'a ('from the lot of our inheritance it will be diminished') emphasizes that what was divinely assigned by lot — and therefore by God's own determination — would be altered by intermarriage. The concern is structural: a mechanism exists that could erode tribal territory over time.
4. The Jubilee (yovel) — the fiftieth-year land restoration described in Leviticus 25:10-13 — normally returns land to its original tribal owner. The petitioners argue that inheritance through daughters creates a loophole: since the land was never sold but transferred through marriage, the Jubilee mechanism does not apply. The land remains with the husband's tribe permanently. This is a sophisticated legal argument: the Jubilee restores alienated property, but inherited property transferred via marriage is not 'alienated' in the technical sense — it has changed tribal affiliation through a legitimate inheritance pathway.
5. Moses responds al pi YHWH ('at the mouth of the LORD' — by divine direction), confirming that the ruling comes from God, not from Moses's own judgment. The phrase ken... dovrin ('correctly... they speak' — literally 'rightly they are speaking') validates the petitioners' legal reasoning. As in the original Zelophehad ruling (Numbers 27:7, where God said ken benot Tselofchad doverot — 'correctly Zelophehad's daughters speak'), God affirms the legitimacy of the concern. Both the daughters' right to inherit and the tribe's right to preserve its allotment are upheld.
6. The ruling balances two principles: personal choice (lattov be'eineihem — 'to the good in their eyes,' meaning whoever they find suitable) and tribal preservation (akh lemishpachat matteh avihen — 'only within the clan of their father's tribe'). The word akh ('only, however') introduces the sole restriction. The daughters are not assigned husbands — they retain agency in choosing a spouse — but the pool of eligible partners is limited to their own tribal clan. This elegant solution preserves both the daughters' inheritance rights (from Numbers 27) and the tribal land boundaries.
7. The verb tissof ('circulate, rotate, transfer') describes land moving from tribe to tribe — an unacceptable fluidity in what should be a permanent arrangement. The counter-principle uses yidbequ ('they shall cling, hold fast') — the same root (d-b-q) used for the marriage bond in Genesis 2:24 and for devotion to God in Deuteronomy 10:20. The Israelites must 'cling' to their ancestral inheritance with the same tenacity as marriage or covenant loyalty. The verse establishes a general principle that extends beyond the Zelophehad case to all inheritance law.
8. The ruling now extends beyond Zelophehad's five daughters to a universal principle: kol bat yoreshet nachalah ('every daughter who inherits property'). The purpose clause lema'an yirshu benei Yisra'el ish nachalat avotav ('so that the Israelites may each inherit the inheritance of their ancestors') reveals the theological priority: God's original distribution of the land must remain intact across generations. The verb yirshu ('they shall inherit') connects back to the promise of possessing the land — a permanent feature of Israel's covenant identity.
9. This verse restates verse 7 with slight variation, forming an inclusio (envelope structure) around the legislation in verses 7-9. The shift from ish ('each person,' v 7) to mattot ('tribes,' v 9) broadens the scope: not only individuals but entire tribes bear responsibility for maintaining their allotments. The verb yidbequ ('they shall hold fast') appears again — the tribes collectively must cling to their inheritance. The repetition is characteristic of legal proclamation in the Pentateuch: stating the principle, elaborating the application, then restating the principle.

10. The compliance formula ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ken asu ('just as the LORD commanded Moses, so they did') is used throughout the Pentateuch for faithful obedience (cf. Exodus 39:32, 40:16). Applied here to the daughters, it places their compliance on the same level as Moses's own obedience in constructing the tabernacle. The daughters, who boldly petitioned for their rights in Numbers 27, now equally submit to the limitation placed on those rights — their obedience is not passive but active and willing.
11. The five daughters are named individually — Machlah, Tirtsah, Choglah, Milkah, and No'ah — as they were in Numbers 26:33 and 27:1. The phrase livnei dodeihen ('to sons of their uncles' — their paternal cousins) specifies that they married within the closest possible family circle. The listing of all five names honors their individual identities — these are not anonymous women but named agents in Israelite legal history, each making a personal choice within the prescribed boundaries.
12. The narrative confirms the successful outcome: the daughters married within Manasseh, and the inheritance stayed put. The verb vattehi ('it remained') signals stability — the nachalah did not circulate (tissov, as feared in v 7). The phrase al matteh mishpachat avihen ('upon the tribe of the clan of their father') emphasizes that the land stayed exactly where God's lot had originally placed it. The resolution satisfies all parties: the daughters inherit, the tribe retains its territory, and the divine land distribution is preserved.
13. This closing colophon (subscript) wraps up not just chapter 36 but the entire second half of Numbers (chapters 22-36), which takes place be'arvot Mo'av ('on the plains of Moab'). The paired terms mitsvot ('commandments') and mishpatim ('legal decisions, judgments') encompass both absolute commands and case-law rulings like the Zelophehad legislation. The phrase beyad Mosheh ('by the hand of Moses' — through Moses as mediator) identifies Moses as the channel of divine instruction. The geographic marker al Yarden Yereicho ('beside the Jordan at Jericho') places Israel on the threshold of the promised land — the book of Numbers ends with the people poised to cross over, their laws established, their inheritance mapped, and even edge cases like daughters' marriages resolved.

Deuteronomy

Summary: Moses addresses all Israel east of the Jordan, recounting the journey from Horeb to Kadesh — the appointment of leaders, the sending of spies, and Israel's refusal to enter the land.

*What Makes This Remarkable: The book's Hebrew title Devarim ('Words') comes from the opening phrase elleh ha-devarim. This is Moses's voice — the only book where the lawgiver speaks in sustained first person. The word be'er (v. 5), meaning 'to explain or make clear,' signals that Deuteronomy is not new legislation but Moses interpreting the Law for a new generation that did not stand at Sinai.*

*Translation Friction: We rendered eikhah (v. 12) as 'how' — the same word that opens the book of Lamentations. Moses asks 'how can I alone bear your burden?' with a word that will later ask 'how desolate the city sits.' The resonance is deliberate but untranslatable without a note. The verb be'er ('explain') appears only here and in 27:8 and Habakkuk 2:2.*

Connections: The spy narrative retells Numbers 13-14 from Moses's perspective, with key differences in emphasis. The phrase 'the LORD your God carried you, as a man carries his son' (v. 31) is echoed in Isaiah 63:9 and Hosea 11:3. The Horeb-to-Kadesh journey becomes a paradigm for Israel's pattern of promise, rebellion, and consequence.

¹These are the words that Moses spoke to all of Israel on the east side of the Jordan — in the wilderness, in the Arabah opposite Suph, between Paran and Tophel, Laban, Hazeroth, and Di-zahab. ²(It is an eleven-day journey from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea by way of Mount Seir.) ³In the fortieth year, on the first day of the eleventh month, Moses addressed the Israelites with everything the LORD had commanded him to tell them, ⁴after he had defeated Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon, and Og king of Bashan, who ruled from Ashtaroth at Edrei. ⁵On the east side of the Jordan, in the land of Moab, Moses undertook to explain this Law, saying: ⁶The LORD our God spoke to us at Horeb: 'You have stayed at this mountain long enough.' ⁷Break camp, set out, and go to the hill country of the Amorites and to all the neighboring regions — the Arabah, the hill country, the western foothills, the Negev, and the coastal plain — the land of the Canaanites, and on to Lebanon, as far as the great river, the Euphrates. ⁸Look — I have placed the land before you. Go in and take possession of the land that the LORD swore to your ancestors — to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — to give to them and to their descendants after them. ⁹I said to you at that time: 'I cannot carry the burden of you by myself.' ¹⁰The LORD your God has made you numerous, and today you are as many as the stars in the sky. ¹¹(May the LORD, the God of your ancestors, increase you a thousand times over and bless you just as He promised you!) ¹²How can I carry by myself your troubles, your burdens, and your disputes? ¹³Choose for yourselves wise, discerning, and experienced men from each of your tribes, and I will appoint them as your leaders. ¹⁴You answered me and said, 'What you have proposed is a good plan to carry out.' ¹⁵So I selected the leaders of your tribes — wise and experienced men — and appointed them as heads over you: commanders of thousands, commanders of hundreds, commanders of fifties, commanders of tens, and officials for your tribes. ¹⁶I instructed your judges at that time: 'Hear the cases among your fellow Israelites and judge fairly between a person and his brother or the resident foreigner among him.' ¹⁷Show no partiality in judgment. Give the small and the great an equal hearing. Do not be intimidated by anyone, because judgment belongs to God. Any case too difficult for you, bring to me and I will hear it. ¹⁸At that time I gave you instructions regarding everything you were to do. ¹⁹We set out from Horeb and traveled through that entire vast and terrifying wilderness that you saw for yourselves, along the route to the Amorite hill country, just as the LORD our God had directed us, and we arrived at Kadesh-barnea. ²⁰I said to you, 'You have reached the hill country of the Amorites, which the LORD our God is giving to us.' ²¹Look — the LORD your God has placed the land before you. Go up and take possession of it, just as the LORD, the God of your ancestors, told you. Do not be afraid, and do not lose heart. ²²Then all of you approached me and said, 'Let us send men ahead of us to scout out the land for us and bring back a report about the route we should take and the cities we will encounter.' ²³The plan seemed good to me, so I selected twelve men from among you, one from each tribe. ²⁴They set out and went up into the hill country, reaching the Wadi of Eshcol, and explored it. ²⁵They took some of the produce of the land in their hands and brought it down to us. They gave us their report and said, 'The land that the LORD our God is giving us is good.' ²⁶But you refused to go up. You rebelled against the command of the LORD your God. ²⁷You grumbled in your tents and said, 'The LORD hates us! That is why He brought us out of Egypt — to hand us over to the Amorites so they could destroy us.' ²⁸'Where can we possibly go? Our own brothers have made our hearts melt, reporting: "The people are bigger and taller than we are; the cities are large, with fortifications reaching to the sky. We even saw the descendants of the Anakim there."' ²⁹I told you, 'Do not be terrified of them. Do not be afraid of them.' ³⁰The LORD your God, who goes before you — He Himself will fight for you, exactly as He did for you in Egypt right before your eyes, ³¹and in the wilderness, where you saw how the LORD your God carried you as a father carries his child through the entire journey you traveled, until you reached this place. ³²Yet despite all this, you did not trust the LORD your God — ³³who went ahead of you on the road, scouting out camping places for you — in fire by night to light your path, and in a cloud by day. ³⁴The LORD heard your words and was angry. He took an oath, saying: ³⁵'Not a single person of this evil generation will see the good land that I swore to give to your ancestors — ³⁶except Caleb son of Jephunneh. He will see it, and I will give the land he walked on to him and to his descendants, because he followed the LORD wholeheartedly.' ³⁷The LORD was also angry with me because of you, saying, 'You too will not enter there.' ³⁸Joshua son of Nun, who serves before you — he will enter there. Strengthen him, because he is the one who will lead Israel to inherit it. ³⁹As for your little ones, whom you claimed would become plunder, and your children who today cannot yet tell good from evil — they are the ones who will enter there. I will give it to them, and they will take possession of it. ⁴⁰But as for you — turn around and head back into the wilderness, toward the Sea of Reeds. ⁴¹You responded and said to me, 'We have sinned against the LORD. We will go up and fight, just as the LORD our God commanded us.' So each of you strapped on your weapons of war and thought it easy to march up into the hill country. ⁴²But the LORD said to me, 'Tell them: Do not go up. Do not fight — because I am not with you. Otherwise you will be defeated by your enemies.' ⁴³I told you this, but you refused to listen. You rebelled against the LORD's command, and arrogantly you marched up into the hill country. ⁴⁴The Amorites who lived in that hill country came out against you and chased you as a swarm of bees does, crushing you in Seir all the way to Hormah. ⁴⁵You came back and wept before the LORD, but the LORD would not listen to your cries or pay attention to you. ⁴⁶So you remained at Kadesh for a long time — all those many days that you stayed there.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase elleh ha-devarim ('these are the words') opens Deuteronomy as a formal speech act — devarim encompasses words, matters, and events. Moses is positioned be'ever ha-yarden ('on the far side of the Jordan') looking toward the promised land he will never enter. The location mul Suph ('opposite Suph') is debated: it may refer to the Yam Suph (Sea of Reeds) region or a specific locale near Moab. The cluster of place names — Paran, Tophel, Laban, Hatserot, Di-zahav — likely marks stages of Israel's wilderness journey, reminding the audience of the long road that brought them here.

2. This parenthetical note creates sharp dramatic irony: the achad asar yom ('eleven-day journey') from Horeb to Kadesh-barnea that should have been a brief march stretched into forty years because of Israel's rebellion. The contrast between the short distance and the long detour frames the entire book's message about the consequences of disobedience.
3. The precise dating — arba'im shanah ('fortieth year'), ashte-asar chodesh ('eleventh month'), echad la-chodesh ('first of the month') — places this speech near the very end of the wilderness period and of Moses's life. The phrase k'hol asher tsivah YHWH oto ('according to everything the LORD had commanded him') establishes that Moses speaks not on his own authority but as the faithful mediator of divine instruction.
4. The verb hakoto ('his striking/defeating') from the root nakah places these victories as the immediate backdrop to Moses's speech. Sihon in Heshbon and Og in Ashtaroth/Edrei represent the two Transjordanian powers whose defeat opened the east bank of the Jordan for Israelite settlement. Ashtaroth may derive from the name of the goddess Ashtoreth, suggesting a former cultic center.
5. The verb ho'il ('undertook, resolved, began') signals Moses's deliberate decision to expound the instruction before his death. The verb be'er ('to make clear, to explain, to engrave') implies not mere repetition but clarification and commentary — Moses is interpreting and applying the Torah for a new generation. This frames Deuteronomy as authorized exposition of Sinai legislation, not simply a restatement.
6. The phrase rav lakhem shevet ('enough for you to dwell') uses rav ('much, enough, sufficient') as a divine directive to end the Horeb encampment. The command signals transition: the purpose of Sinai — receiving the covenant — is complete, and the people must now move toward the land where they will live it out. Moses uses 'our God' (Eloheinu) to include himself in the community being addressed.
7. God's command uses three imperatives — penu ('turn'), us'u ('travel'), uvo'u ('go in') — conveying urgency. The geographical catalog describes the entire promised land through its ecological zones: aravah (rift valley), har (hill country), shfelah (western foothills/lowlands), negev (southern desert), and chof ha-yam (seacoast). This comprehensive survey — from the Amorite hills to the Euphrates — represents the maximum extent of the divine land grant.
8. The imperative re'eh ('look, see') calls for attentive recognition of what God has done. The verb natati ('I have given') uses the perfect tense — the gift is already accomplished from God's perspective even though Israel has not yet entered. The command reshu ('take possession') from yarash implies displacing current inhabitants. The patriarchal oath — to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — anchors the land promise in covenant history, reinforcing that this is not mere conquest but covenant fulfillment.
9. The verb se'et ('to carry, to bear') from nasa conveys the weight of leadership — the same verb used of carrying a physical load. Moses's admission lo ukhal levadi ('I am unable alone') echoes the crisis of Numbers 11:14 and anticipates the delegation structure that follows. The phrasing reflects both honest vulnerability and practical wisdom about governance.
10. The verb hirbah ('multiplied, made numerous') from ravah directly fulfills the patriarchal promise to Abraham (Genesis 15:5, 22:17). The simile k'kokhvei ha-shamayim la-rov ('like the stars of heaven in abundance') is a covenant marker — what was once a promise to a childless man is now a visible reality. Moses presents the very problem of governance (too many people) as evidence of divine faithfulness.
11. This parenthetical blessing — yosef aleikhem kakhem elef pe'amim ('may He add upon you like you a thousand times') — interrupts Moses's complaint about the people's numbers with a spontaneous prayer for even more growth. The jussive vivarekh ('and may He bless') expresses Moses's genuine desire for Israel's flourishing even as he acknowledges the burden of their size. The interjection reveals Moses's pastoral heart.
12. The exclamatory eikah ('how?!') expresses overwhelmed frustration — the same word that opens the book of Lamentations. Three nouns escalate the problem: torchakhem ('your troublesomeness/difficulty'), masa'akhem ('your load/burden'), and rivkhem ('your quarrels/legal disputes'). Together they describe the full weight of communal leadership: dealing with difficult people, bearing responsibility, and adjudicating conflicts.
13. The imperative havu lakhem ('select for yourselves') places responsibility on the people to identify qualified candidates. Three qualifications are listed: chakhamim ('wise' — possessing practical wisdom), nevonim ('discerning' — having intellectual clarity and insight), and vidu'im ('known/recognized' — carrying public reputation and trust). Moses retains the authority to formally install them (va'asimem — 'I will set them') but shares the selection process.
14. The people's unanimous response — tov ha-davar asher dibarta la'asot ('good is the thing you have spoken to do') — contrasts sharply with their later refusal at Kadesh-barnea. When leadership structure serves their interests, they agree readily; when faith is demanded, they rebel. Moses may be drawing this contrast deliberately for his audience.
15. The tiered leadership structure — sarei alafim ('chiefs of thousands'), sarei me'ot ('chiefs of hundreds'), sarei chamishim ('chiefs of fifties'), sarei asarot ('chiefs of tens') — creates a decimal administrative system. The shotrim ('officials, officers') served as administrators and record-keepers. Notably, Moses mentions only chakhamim and vidu'im ('wise and known') here, omitting nevonim ('discerning') from verse 13 — perhaps indicating that perfect candidates were unavailable.
16. The infinitive absolute shamo'a ('hearing' — hear thoroughly) demands careful, complete attention to testimony. The command ushfattem tsedek ('judge righteously/justly') makes justice an active obligation, not a passive ideal. The inclusion of the ger ('resident foreigner, immigrant') alongside 'his brother' is remarkable — equal justice extends beyond ethnic Israel to those dwelling among them. This establishes a foundational principle of Israelite jurisprudence.

17. The phrase lo takiru fanim ('do not recognize faces') is the Hebrew idiom for showing partiality — literally, not being swayed by recognizing who stands before you. The parallel ka-qaton ka-gadol tishma'un ('the small like the great you shall hear') demands equal access regardless of social status. The theological foundation ha-mishpat l'Elohim hu ('the judgment is God's') transforms every judicial act into a divine function — judges act as God's representatives, which is why they must be fearless (lo taguru — 'do not shrink back').
18. The summary statement va'atsaveh etkhem ('I commanded you') with et kol ha-devarim ('all the things') emphasizes comprehensive instruction. Moses transitions from the appointment of judges to the narrative of the journey to Kadesh-barnea. The phrase asher ta'asun ('which you shall do') stresses that the commands require concrete action, not merely intellectual assent.
19. The wilderness is characterized as ha-gadol v'ha-nora ('the great and the terrifying') — nora from the root yare ('to fear') emphasizes genuine danger. Moses reminds them asher re'item ('which you saw') — they are eyewitnesses to God's protection through this deadly landscape. The arrival at Kadesh-barnea sets the stage for the critical failure: the spy mission and subsequent refusal to enter the land.
20. The participle noten ('is giving') presents the land grant as an ongoing, present-tense action — God is in the process of giving, and all Israel needs to do is receive. Moses's announcement ba'tem ('you have arrived') marks a moment of opportunity: the land is within reach, the divine gift is active, and the only question is whether Israel will respond in faith.
21. Two prohibitions close the verse: al tira ('do not fear') and al techat ('do not be shattered/dismayed'). The verb tachat from chatat means to be broken, shattered, or dismayed — stronger than ordinary fear, it describes a collapse of resolve. Together they address both emotional fear and psychological defeat. The shift from plural address (v. 20) to singular (re'eh, lefanekha) personalizes the command — each individual must choose courage.
22. The verb va-tiqrevun ('you drew near') with kullekhem ('all of you') emphasizes unanimous initiative — this was the people's idea, not God's command (contrast Numbers 13:1-2 where the LORD initiates). The verb yachperu ('let them dig out, search, explore') from chaphar implies thorough investigation. Moses's retelling places responsibility squarely on the people for initiating the spy mission, shifting the emphasis from the Numbers account.
23. The idiom va-yitav be'einai ('it was good in my eyes') indicates Moses's approval of the plan. His willingness to send spies was not itself sinful — reconnaissance is sound military practice. The problem would emerge not from scouting but from the people's response to the report. The number shnem asar ('twelve') — one per tribe — ensures representative participation and collective accountability.
24. The spies reached nachal Eshkol ('Wadi/Valley of Eshcol') — eshkol means 'cluster,' named for the famous grape cluster they found there (Numbers 13:23-24). The verb vayeraglu ('they spied it out') from ragal ('foot') literally means 'they footed through it' — walking the land to assess it firsthand. The report is initially positive, making the subsequent rebellion all the more tragic.
25. The physical evidence — mi-pri ha-arets ('from the fruit of the land') — confirmed the land's agricultural abundance. The spies' verdict tovah ha-arets ('good is the land') echoes God's own assessment. Moses's abbreviated retelling omits the frightening details of the majority report (Numbers 13:28-33) and focuses on the bottom-line conclusion: the land is good, the gift is real, and the refusal was inexcusable.
26. The verb avitem ('you were willing') negated — lo avitem ('you were not willing') — emphasizes willful refusal, not inability. The verb va-tamru ('you rebelled') from marah ('to be bitter, to rebel') describes not mere disobedience but defiant opposition to pi YHWH ('the mouth of the LORD') — His spoken command. The rebellion is framed as personal affront to God Himself.
27. The verb va-teragnu ('you grumbled, complained') from ragan describes sullen, resentful muttering — the complaint happens be'ohaleikhem ('in your tents'), privately and bitterly. The accusation be-sin'at YHWH otanu ('because of the LORD's hatred of us') is a shocking inversion of reality — they reinterpret the greatest act of divine love (the Exodus) as evidence of divine malice. This is the deepest form of unbelief: not doubting God's power but questioning His goodness.
28. The question anah anachnu olim ('where are we going up?') expresses hopelessness. The verb hemassu ('they melted') from masas describes the dissolving of courage — their brothers (acheinu) caused their hearts to liquify with fear. The hyperbolic uvetsurot ba-shamayim ('fortified to the heavens') conveys perceived impregnability. The benei Anaqim ('sons of Anak') were legendary giant warriors whose reputation was meant to terrify — and it worked.
29. Two verbs of fear are negated: lo ta'artsun ('do not be terrified/shattered') from arats ('to tremble, be in dread') and lo tire'un ('do not fear') from yare. The first describes existential dread — being psychologically overwhelmed; the second is ordinary fear. Moses counters both levels of their panic with direct prohibitions, addressing the root emotion driving the rebellion.
30. The participle ha-holekh lifneikhem ('the one going before you') presents God as an advance guard. The emphatic pronoun hu ('He Himself') underscores that the battle is God's, not theirs. The appeal to historical experience — k'hol asher asah itkhem be-Mitsrayim ('according to all He did with you in Egypt') le'eineikhem ('before your eyes') — makes their fear irrational: they have personally witnessed God's military intervention.
31. The simile ka'asher yisa ish et beno ('as a man carries his son') is one of the most tender images of God in the Hebrew Bible. The verb nasa ('carry, bear, lift') — the same word Moses used for his own burden in verse 9 — transfers the image to God. What Moses cannot bear alone, God has been doing all along. The father-son metaphor portrays God's protection as instinctive, constant, and deeply personal.
32. The participle ma'aminim ('believing, trusting') from the root aman ('to be firm, reliable, faithful') appears in the negative: einkhem ma'aminim ('you are not trusting'). This is the central indictment. After Egypt's plagues, the sea crossing, manna, and the wilderness journey — uva-davar ha-zeh ('even in this matter') — they still lacked the faith to enter. Trust (emunah) in Deuteronomy is not intellectual belief but confident reliance on God's proven character.

33. God's guidance is described through three functions: He goes lifneikhem ('before you') as scout, He searches out (latur) camping sites (maqom la-chanotekhem — 'a place for your encamping'), and He provides navigation through the pillar of fire (ba-esh lailah — 'in fire by night') and cloud (uv-anan yomam — 'in a cloud by day'). The verb latur ('to scout, explore') is the same verb used for the spies' mission — ironically, God was already doing the reconnaissance they demanded.
34. The sequence — va-yishma ('He heard'), va-yiqtsaf ('He became angry'), va-yishava ('He swore') — progresses from perception to emotion to irrevocable decree. The verb qatsaf ('to be angry, furious') describes intense divine wrath provoked by the rebellion. That God seals His response with an oath (shava) means the judgment is permanent and cannot be appealed — the wilderness generation has forfeited the land.
35. The oath formula im yir'eh ish ('if a man shall see' — meaning 'surely no man shall see') is a self-imprecation: God stakes His own name that the ha-dor ha-ra ha-zeh ('this evil generation') will be excluded. The contrast between ha-arets ha-tovah ('the good land') and ha-dor ha-ra ('the evil generation') is deliberate — the land is good but the generation is corrupt, and corruption cannot inherit the good gift.
36. Caleb is the sole exception (zulati — 'except') from the condemned generation. The phrase mile acharei YHWH ('filled up after the LORD' — followed fully, wholeheartedly) uses male' ('to fill') to describe complete, undivided commitment. The land asher darakh bah ('which he trod upon') refers specifically to the territory Caleb scouted, later identified as Hebron. His reward is the very land he had the faith to believe God could give.
37. The verb hit'anaf ('was angry') from anaf is a strong term for divine wrath. Moses claims the anger was biglalkhem ('on your account, because of you') — connecting his own exclusion from the land to the people's rebellion. This anticipates the fuller explanation in Deuteronomy 3:26 and 4:21. The phrase gam attah ('you too, even you') is poignant: not even the mediator is exempt from the consequences of communal failure.
38. Joshua is described as ha-omed lefanekha ('the one standing/serving before you') — indicating his role as Moses's attendant and apprentice. The imperative chazzeq ('strengthen, encourage') from chazaq anticipates the threefold commissioning of Joshua in chapter 31. The verb yanchilennah ('he will cause [Israel] to inherit it') from nachal ('to inherit, to receive as a possession') assigns Joshua the role of land-distributor, completing what Moses began.
39. The divine reversal is striking: the tapkhem ('your little ones') whom the parents said la-vaz yihyeh ('would become plunder') are precisely the ones who will inherit the land. Their children asher lo yade'u ha-yom tov va-ra ('who do not yet know good and evil') are innocent of the parents' guilt. The irony is deliberate — the generation that claimed to fear for their children's safety condemned only themselves; the children will thrive.
40. The command penu lakhem ('turn yourselves') reverses the original command of verse 7 (penu... us'u — 'turn and travel' toward the land). Instead of advancing into the promised land, they must retreat ha-midbarah ('toward the wilderness'). The direction — derekh Yam Suf ('by the way of the Sea of Reeds') — sends them back the way they came, undoing the Exodus journey. The reversal is both geographical and spiritual.
41. The confession chatanu ('we have sinned') appears genuine but proves superficial — they immediately revert to self-will. The verb va-tahinu ('you thought it easy, you were presumptuous') from hun means to treat lightly, to consider trivial. Having first feared the Amorites excessively, they now swing to reckless overconfidence. Both extremes share the same root: ignoring God's actual word. They strap on klei milchamto ('his weapons of war') without divine authorization.
42. The prohibition is double: lo ta'alu ('do not go up') and lo tilachamu ('do not fight'). The reason is devastating: ki einenni be-qirbekhem ('because I am not in your midst'). Without the divine presence, military action is suicidal. The passive tinnagefu ('you will be struck, defeated') before their enemies reverses the promise of verse 30 — without God fighting for them, they will be the ones struck down.
43. The verb va-tazidu ('you acted presumptuously, arrogantly') from zud/zid means to boil over, to act with insolent boldness. This is not courage but reckless defiance — they disobeyed both the original command to enter (v. 26) and the subsequent command not to enter (v. 42). The pattern of double rebellion — refusing to go when told to go, then going when told not to go — exposes their fundamental problem: they obey their own will, not God's.
44. The simile ka'asher ta'asenah ha-devorim ('as bees do') portrays the Amorite attack as swarming, relentless, and painful — bees pursue aggressors far beyond their hive. The verb va-yaktu ('they struck/crushed') from katal describes severe military defeat. The rout extended be-Se'ir ad Chormah ('in Seir as far as Hormah') — ironically, Chormah derives from cherem ('devoted destruction'), previewing the conquest vocabulary. The place of their defeat would later become a place of their victory.
45. The sequence — va-tashuvu ('you returned'), va-tivku ('you wept') lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — describes repentant posture, but God's response is silence: lo shama ('He did not listen') and lo he'ezin ('He did not give ear'). Two synonyms for hearing are negated to emphasize complete divine refusal. Their tears came too late — after presumptuous action, not before. Consequences for disobedience cannot always be reversed by remorse.
46. The concluding phrase yamim rabbim ('many days') with ka-yamim asher yeshavtem ('according to the days you stayed') is deliberately vague about the exact duration — likely encompassing the bulk of the thirty-eight years of wilderness wandering. The repetitive phrasing conveys the monotony of waiting: Kadesh became the staging ground for decades of purposeless delay, the consequence of a single moment of faithless refusal.

Summary: Moses recounts the wilderness wandering — Israel's long circuit around Edom and Moab, God's provision during forty years, and the defeat of King Sihon of Heshbon.

What Makes This Remarkable: God commands Israel to respect three nations' territorial rights: Esau's Seir, Moab, and Ammon — all of them Israel's relatives through Abraham and Lot. The theological principle is that God grants land to nations other than Israel. The parenthetical notes about the Emim, Rephaim, and Zamzummim (vv. 10-12, 20-23) are ancient editorial glosses preserving pre-Israelite ethnographic memory.

Translation Friction: The verb hiqshah (v. 30), describing God hardening Sihon's spirit, uses the same root as Pharaoh's hardening in Exodus. We rendered it 'made stubborn' to preserve the theological parallel. The phrase lo avah (v. 30, 'was not willing') creates a double causation: Sihon chose and God confirmed, the same tension as the Exodus hardening.

Connections: The Sihon victory is cited in Judges 11:19-22, Nehemiah 9:22, and Psalms 135:11; 136:19. The command not to provoke Edom, Moab, or Ammon recurs in Judges 11:15-18, where Jephthah appeals to this history. The forty years of provision (v. 7) anticipates the explicit reflection in 8:2-4.

¹So we turned back and headed into the wilderness toward the Sea of Reeds, just as the LORD had told me, and we circled the region of Mount Seir for a long time. ²Then the LORD said to me: ³'You have been circling this mountain long enough. Turn northward.' ⁴Instruct the people as follows: You are about to pass through the territory of your relatives, the descendants of Esau, who live in Seir. They will be afraid of you, so be very careful — ⁵'Do not provoke them, because I will not give you any of their land — not even a footprint's width — for I have given Mount Seir to Esau as his inheritance.' ⁶'Buy food from them with silver so you can eat, and also purchase water from them with silver so you can drink.' ⁷'For the LORD your God has blessed you in everything your hands have done. He has watched over your journey through this vast wilderness. For forty years now the LORD your God has been with you; you have lacked nothing.' ⁸So we passed by our relatives, the descendants of Esau who live in Seir, leaving the Arabah road from Elath and Ezion-geber. We turned and traveled along the wilderness road of Moab. ⁹The LORD said to me, 'Do not harass Moab or engage them in battle, because I will not give you any of their land as a possession. I have given Ar to the descendants of Lot as their inheritance.' ¹⁰The Emim had formerly lived there — a people as large, numerous, and tall as the Anakim. ¹¹They too were considered Rephaim, like the Anakim, but the Moabites called them Emim. ¹²The Horites had formerly lived in Seir, but the descendants of Esau dispossessed them, destroying them and settling in their place — just as Israel did with the land of their possession that the LORD gave them. ¹³'Now get up and cross the Wadi Zered.' So we crossed the Wadi Zered. ¹⁴The time from when we left Kadesh-barnea until we crossed the Wadi Zered was thirty-eight years — until the entire generation of fighting men had perished from the camp, just as the LORD had sworn would happen to them. ¹⁵Indeed, the hand of the LORD was against them, working to eliminate them from the camp until they were all gone. ¹⁶When the last of the fighting men had finally died out from among the people, ¹⁷the LORD spoke to me, saying: ¹⁸'Today you are crossing the border of Moab at Ar.' ¹⁹'When you approach the territory of the Ammonites, do not harass them and do not provoke them, because I will not give you any of the Ammonites' land as a possession — I have given it to the descendants of Lot as their inheritance.' ²⁰(That region too was considered Rephaim territory. Rephaim had formerly lived there, and the Ammonites called them Zamzummim — ²¹a people as large, numerous, and tall as the Anakim. But the LORD destroyed them before the Ammonites, who dispossessed them and settled in their place — ²²just as He did for the descendants of Esau who live in Seir, when He destroyed the Horites before them so they could dispossess them and settle in their place — as it remains to this day. ²³And the Avvim, who had lived in settlements as far as Gaza — the Caphtorites, who came from Caphtor, destroyed them and settled in their place.) ²⁴'Get moving! Set out and cross the Arnon Gorge. Look — I have handed Sihon the Amorite, king of Heshbon, and his land over to you. Begin the conquest! Engage him in battle.' ²⁵'Starting today I will begin placing dread and fear of you upon the peoples under all the heavens. When they hear reports about you, they will tremble and writhe in anguish before you.' ²⁶I sent messengers from the wilderness of Kedemoth to Sihon king of Heshbon with a peace proposal, saying: ²⁷'Let me pass through your land. I will stay on the road — strictly on the road. I will not turn right or left.' ²⁸'Sell me food for silver so I can eat, and provide me water for silver so I can drink. Just let me pass through on foot —' ²⁹'just as the descendants of Esau living in Seir and the Moabites living in Ar allowed me to do — until I cross the Jordan into the land that the LORD our God is giving us.' ³⁰But Sihon king of Heshbon refused to let us pass through, because the LORD your God had made his spirit stubborn and his heart unyielding, in order to hand him over to you — as has now happened. ³¹The LORD said to me, 'Look — I have already begun handing Sihon and his land over to you. Start taking possession so you may inherit his land.' ³²Sihon marched out against us with his entire army to fight at Jahaz. ³³The LORD our God handed him over to us. We struck down him, his sons, and all his forces. ³⁴We captured all his cities at that time and devoted every city to destruction — the men, the women, and the children. We left no survivor. ³⁵Only the livestock we took as plunder for ourselves, along with the spoil from the cities we had captured. ³⁶From Aroer on the rim of the Arnon Gorge, including the city in the gorge itself, all the way to Gilead — not a single city was too fortified for us. The LORD our God gave us everything. ³⁷But the territory of the Ammonites you did not approach — neither the banks of the Jabbok River, nor the cities in the highlands, nor anywhere else the LORD our God had forbidden us.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verbs va-nefen ('we turned') and va-nissa ('we set out') echo the divine command of 1:40. The phrase va-nassov et har Se'ir yamim rabbim ('we circled Mount Seir many days') compresses decades of aimless wandering into a single clause. The yamim rabbim ('many days') parallels the same phrase in 1:46 — the extended circling represents the consequence of their refusal to enter the land directly.
2. The messenger formula va-yomer YHWH elai lemor ('the LORD said to me, saying') marks a new divine instruction, transitioning from aimless wandering to directed movement. God breaks the long silence of the wilderness years with a fresh command — the period of judgment is ending.
3. The phrase rav lakhem sov ('enough for you circling') echoes the identical construction in 1:6 (rav lakhem shevet — 'enough for you dwelling'). In both cases God declares that a period of stagnation is over. The command penu lakhem tsafonah ('turn yourselves northward') redirects Israel toward the promised land — north through Transjordan. The divine initiative breaks the cycle of purposeless wandering.
4. The Edomites are called acheikhem benei Esav ('your brothers, the children of Esau') — the kinship language is significant. Despite the hostile history between Jacob and Esau, God recognizes their fraternal bond. The warning v'yir'u mikkem ('they will fear you') acknowledges Israel's military strength, but the command v'nishmartem me'od ('guard yourselves very carefully') warns against exploiting that advantage. Restraint, not conquest, is required.
5. The prohibition al titgaru vam ('do not provoke/engage them') from garah means to stir up conflict. The measure ad midrakh kaf ragel ('as far as the treading of the sole of a foot' — not even a footprint's width) emphasizes the absoluteness of the restriction. God's grant of har Se'ir to Esau (yerushah l'Esav — 'an inheritance to Esau') parallels Israel's own land grant — God is sovereign over all nations' territories, not just Israel's. This theological principle shapes the entire chapter.
6. The instruction to buy (tishberu — 'you shall purchase grain/food') from the Edomites rather than take by force establishes a commerce-not-conquest protocol. Even water — a critical resource in the wilderness — must be purchased (tikhru — 'you shall buy/dig') with kesev ('silver, money'). This demonstrates that Israel's military power was to be restrained by divine command, and their passage through Edom was to be peaceful and economically fair.
7. God's provision is comprehensive: berakekha be-khol ma'aseh yadekha ('He blessed you in every work of your hands'). The verb yada ('He knew/was attentive to') lekhtekha ('your walking') implies intimate, watchful care — not distant observation but personal attention. The summary lo chasarta davar ('you lacked nothing') after arba'im shanah ('forty years') in the midbar ha-gadol ('great wilderness') is remarkable: complete provision in complete desolation. This abundance is why they can afford to pay for Edomite food and water.
8. The route takes Israel me'Eilat u-me'Etsyon Gaver ('from Elath and from Ezion-geber') — both towns at the northern tip of the Gulf of Aqaba — then northward via the wilderness road of Moab. The continued use of acheinu ('our brothers/relatives') for the Edomites maintains the kinship language. The transition from Edomite to Moabite territory sets up the next set of divine restrictions on Israel's passage.
9. Two prohibitions: al tatsar ('do not harass/distress') from tsarar and al titgar ('do not engage/provoke') from garah. Moab is protected as benei Lot ('children of Lot') — Abraham's nephew, making the Moabites distant relatives of Israel. The city of Ar (the capital region of Moab) was divinely allocated to Lot's line just as Canaan was allocated to Abraham's. God's land-distribution extends beyond the Abrahamic covenant to include other peoples in His sovereign plan.
10. This parenthetical antiquarian note explains that the Emim (ha-Emim — possibly meaning 'the fearsome ones' or 'the terrors') were the previous inhabitants of Moab. They are compared to the Anaqim in being gadol v'rav v'ram ('great, numerous, and tall'). The subtext is reassuring: if the Moabites could displace giant inhabitants, then Israel can certainly overcome the Canaanites with God's help.

11. The Repha'im ('shades' or 'healers') is the broader category for pre-Israelite giant peoples. The verb yechashev ('they were reckoned/considered') indicates a classificatory system — different nations used different names for the same population. The Moabites' local term Emim coexisted with the more widely known Repha'im designation. This ethnographic note demonstrates Moses's awareness of regional naming conventions.
12. The Chorim ('Horites' — cave-dwellers or Hurrians) were the original inhabitants of Seir. The verb yirashu ('they dispossessed') is the same verb used for Israel's conquest — the parallel is explicit. The phrase ka'asher asah Yisra'el ('just as Israel did') refers proleptically to Israel's future conquest of Canaan, or retrospectively to the Transjordanian conquests. The point: God empowered Esau to displace the Horites just as He empowers Israel to displace the Canaanites.
13. The Nachal Zered ('Wadi Zered') marks the boundary between Edomite and Moabite territory. The abrupt command-and-compliance structure — qumu v'ivru ('rise and cross'), va-na'avur ('and we crossed') — contrasts sharply with the rebellion narratives of chapter 1. This new generation obeys immediately. The wadi crossing functions as a geographical marker of transition from the old era of wandering to the new era of purposeful advance.
14. The precise count — shloshim u-shmoneh shanah ('thirty-eight years') — combined with the eleven-day journey of 1:2 accounts for the full forty years. The phrase ad tom kol ha-dor anshei ha-milchamah ('until the completion of the entire generation of men of war') specifies that the military-age males who refused to fight at Kadesh had to die before Israel could advance. The oath fulfillment (ka'asher nishba YHWH — 'as the LORD swore') closes the circle on the judgment of 1:34-35.
15. The phrase yad YHWH hayetah bam ('the hand of the LORD was against them') describes active divine judgment, not merely natural attrition. The verb le-humam ('to confound, to destroy, to throw into panic') from hamam suggests God used disruption and turmoil — perhaps disease, conflict, or other calamities — to ensure the doomed generation perished within the wilderness. The repetition ad tummam ('until their completion') echoes the finality of divine judgment.
16. The phrase tammu kol anshei ha-milchamah lamut ('all the men of war finished dying') marks the end of the judgment era. The verb tammu ('they were finished, completed, consumed') from tamam conveys total completion — not one survived from the condemned generation. This verse is the hinge point of the narrative: the old generation's sentence is fully served, and the new generation can now move forward.
17. The speech formula va-yedabber YHWH elai ('the LORD spoke to me') resumes after the narrative parenthesis of verses 10-16. God speaks directly to Moses again, marking a new phase of the journey. The connection to verse 16 is immediate: the moment the last condemned man dies, God's word comes with new instructions.
18. The word ha-yom ('today') signals urgency and immediacy — the long waiting is over. Crossing gevu Mo'av ('the border of Moab') at Ar means passing through the Moabite capital region. The participle over ('crossing') in the present tense conveys that the action is already underway — God announces what He is already bringing about.
19. The Ammonites receive the same protection as Moab and Edom — al tetsurem ('do not besiege/harass them') and al titgar bam ('do not provoke them'). Like the Moabites, the Ammonites are benei Lot ('children of Lot'), making them distant relatives through Abraham's family. The threefold restriction — Edom (v. 5), Moab (v. 9), Ammon (v. 19) — establishes that God's land-distribution plan is comprehensive and respects the territorial rights of related peoples.
20. Another antiquarian note: the Ammonite territory was also erets Repha'im ('land of the Rephaim'). The Ammonites' local name for these people — Zamzummim — may derive from zamam ('to plan, to devise') or may be onomatopoeic, suggesting murmuring or buzzing speech. Each nation had its own designation for the same pre-Israelite giant population: Emim (Moab), Horites (Edom), Zamzummim (Ammon), Anakim (Canaan).
21. The repeated formula — gadol v'rav v'ram ka-Anaqim ('great, numerous, and tall like the Anakim') — and the pattern of divine destruction (va-yashmidem YHWH — 'the LORD destroyed them') followed by dispossession (va-yirashu — 'they dispossessed') drives home the lesson: giants are not invincible when God fights for a people. The implicit argument is that Israel's fear of the Anakim at Kadesh was groundless.
22. The phrase ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') anchors the ancient precedent in the audience's present experience — the Edomites still occupy Seir, confirming that God's land allocations endure. The repetitive pattern (God destroys previous inhabitants, new nation takes their place) establishes a theological template: land transfer is divinely managed, not humanly achieved. What God did for Esau, He will do for Israel.
23. This parenthetical note adds a fourth example of population displacement. The Avvim (a pre-Philistine people living ba-chatserim — 'in settlements/villages' near Gaza) were destroyed by the Kaphtorim ('Caphtorites'), generally identified as the Philistines originating from Kaphtor (Crete or a broader Aegean region). This example involves non-Israelite, non-Abrahamic peoples — demonstrating that God orchestrates population movements universally, not only for covenant peoples.
24. Three imperatives open the command: qumu ('rise'), se'u ('travel'), v'ivru ('cross'). The Nachal Arnon ('Arnon Gorge') is the boundary between Moab and Amorite territory — crossing it enters the combat zone. Unlike the prohibitions regarding Edom, Moab, and Ammon, God now commands engagement: hachel rash ('begin possessing') and hitgar bo milchamah ('engage him in battle'). The perfect tense natati ('I have given') again declares the outcome settled before the battle begins.
25. God promises to project pachdekha v'yir'atekha ('your dread and your fear') upon ha-amim tachat kol ha-shamayim ('the peoples under all the heavens'). Two fear responses describe the reaction: ragzu ('they will tremble/quake') and chalu ('they will writhe in pain/anguish') — the second verb is used for birth pangs, suggesting overwhelming, involuntary terror. The phrase ha-yom ha-zeh achel ('this day I begin') marks the inauguration of Israel's fearsome reputation among the nations.

- 26. Despite the divine guarantee of victory, Moses first extends divrei shalom ('words of peace') — a diplomatic overture offering the possibility of peaceful passage. The midbar Qedemot ('wilderness of Kedemoth') is in Moabite border territory. This approach follows the protocol of Deuteronomy 20:10, which requires offering peace terms before attacking. Moses demonstrates that Israel is not a reckless aggressor but follows divine rules of engagement.
- 27. The repeated ba-derekh ba-derekh ('on the road, on the road') is emphatic — strict adherence to the highway with no deviation. The pledge lo asur yamin u-semol ('I will not turn right or left') guarantees Israel will not encroach on Sihon's territory. The request mirrors the earlier passage through Edom, but Sihon's response will differ dramatically from Edom's cautious tolerance.
- 28. The offer is purely commercial: okhel ba-kesef tashbireni ('food for silver you shall sell me') and mayim ba-kesef titten li ('water for silver you shall give me'). Israel proposes paying fair market value for provisions — no plundering, no foraging, no resource extraction. The final clause raq ev'rah be-raglai ('only let me pass through on my feet') emphasizes the minimal, non-threatening nature of the request.
- 29. Moses cites precedent: the Edomites (benei Esav — 'children of Esau') and Moabites permitted peaceful passage and trade. The reference to crossing ha-Yarden ('the Jordan') to reach the land YHWH Eloheinu noten lanu ('the LORD our God is giving us') clarifies Israel's ultimate destination — they are not interested in Sihon's territory per se but simply need transit rights. However, God's larger plan will unfold differently.
- 30. The divine hardening — hiqshah YHWH et rucho ('the LORD hardened his spirit') and immets et levavo ('made obstinate his heart') — recalls the hardening of Pharaoh. The verbs qashah ('to be hard, stiff') and amats ('to be strong, firm, obstinate') together describe complete inflexibility. The purpose clause lema'an titto be-yadekha ('in order to give him into your hand') reveals that Sihon's refusal was divinely orchestrated to create the conditions for Israel's first Transjordanian conquest.
- 31. The verb hachiloti ('I have begun') from chalal indicates the process is already underway from God's perspective. The double command — hachel rash lareshet ('begin possessing to possess') — uses both the imperative and infinitive of yarash to emphasize urgency and totality. God's initiative precedes human action: He has already begun; Israel must now participate in what God is accomplishing.
- 32. Sihon initiates the battle — va-yetse liqratenu ('he came out to meet us') hu v'khol ammo ('he and all his people') — giving Israel the legal and moral justification for the war: they offered peace (vv. 26-29), he refused (v. 30), and then he attacked. The battle at Yahtsa ('Jahaz') — a site east of the Dead Sea — becomes the first engagement in Israel's conquest. Sihon's full mobilization (kol ammo — 'all his people') leads to total defeat.
- 33. The verb va-yittenhu ('He gave him') from natan places God as the primary agent of victory — YHWH Eloheinu ('the LORD our God') delivers, then Israel acts. The verb va-nakk ('we struck') from nakah describes the military defeat. The inclusion of banav ('his sons') indicates the end of Sihon's dynasty — no heir survived to reclaim the throne or rally a resistance.
- 34. The verb va-nacharim ('we devoted to destruction') from charam is the key term for total warfare in the Hebrew Bible — the cherem ('ban, devotion to destruction'). This practice dedicated everything to God by destroying it completely. The phrase lo hish'arnu sarid ('we did not leave a survivor') indicates total destruction. The cherem was specific to certain divinely commanded military operations and is not presented as a general model for warfare.
- 35. The exception raq ha-behemah ('only the livestock') indicates that the cherem (ban of total destruction) applied to the human population but not to animals and movable property. The shlal ha-arim ('spoil of the cities') — material goods, supplies, valuables — was available as bazaznu lanu ('we plundered for ourselves'). This distinction between devoted persons and permitted plunder follows the warfare regulations that will be codified later in Deuteronomy.
- 36. The geographical sweep — me-Aro'er ('from Aroer') on the sfat nachal Arnon ('rim of the Arnon Gorge') to ha-Gil'ad ('Gilead') — describes the full extent of conquered territory. The assessment lo hayetah qiryah asher sagvah mimmenu ('there was not a city that was too high/fortified for us') directly answers the fearful complaint of 1:28 about cities betsurot ba-shamayim ('fortified to the heavens'). What seemed impossible through human eyes proved achievable through divine power.
- 37. The chapter's final verse returns to the theme of divinely mandated restraint: raq el erets benei Ammon lo qaravta ('only the land of the Ammonites you did not approach'). Israel's obedience was selective in the right way — they conquered where God commanded and refrained where God prohibited. The mention of nachal Yabboq ('the Jabbok River') and arei ha-har ('cities of the highlands') specifies the off-limits zones. The closing phrase v'khol asher tsivah YHWH Eloheinu ('everything the LORD our God commanded') frames Israel's entire conduct as covenant obedience.

Summary: Moses recounts the defeat of Og king of Bashan, the allotment of Transjordan to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh, and his own plea to enter the land — denied by God.

What Makes This Remarkable: Og's iron bed (v. 11) — nine cubits long, four wide — is a detail preserved not for military history but as evidence of the Rephaim's legendary stature. Moses's prayer va-etchannan (v. 23, 'I pleaded') gives the next Torah portion its name and reveals a Moses we rarely see: not the commanding lawgiver but a man begging God to reverse His decree. God's refusal is final and unexplained beyond the reference to Israel's provocation.

Translation Friction: The word eres (v. 11), traditionally 'bed,' could also mean 'coffin' or 'sarcophagus' — if so, Og's iron eres is a funerary monument, not furniture. We rendered it 'bed' following the traditional understanding but noted the ambiguity. God's command rav-lakh (v. 26, 'enough for you') is blunt — two words that end Moses's last hope.

Connections: Og's Bashan territory becomes a symbol of extraordinary fertility (Psalm 22:12, Ezekiel 39:18, Amos 4:1). Moses's denied entry is revisited in 32:48-52 and fulfilled in 34:1-4. The Transjordan settlement conditions (v. 18-20) are executed in Joshua 1:12-18 and tested in Joshua 22.

¹Then we turned and advanced along the road to Bashan. Og king of Bashan marched out against us with his entire army to fight at Edrei. ²The LORD said to me, 'Do not be afraid of him, because I have handed him over to you, along with his entire army and his land. Do to him what you did to Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon.' ³So the LORD our God also handed Og king of Bashan and his entire army over to us. We struck them down until no survivor remained. ⁴We captured all his cities at that time. There was not a single city we failed to take from them — sixty cities in all, the entire region of Argob, the kingdom of Og in Bashan. ⁵All these were fortified cities with high walls, double gates, and crossbars — in addition to a great number of unwallled settlements. ⁶We devoted them to destruction, just as we had done to Sihon king of Heshbon — devoting every city to total destruction: men, women, and children. ⁷But all the livestock and the goods from the cities we took as plunder for ourselves. ⁸At that time we seized the territory from the two Amorite kings east of the Jordan — from the Arnon Gorge all the way to Mount Hermon. ⁹(The Sidonians call Hermon 'Sirion,' while the Amorites call it 'Senir.') ¹⁰All the cities of the plateau, all of Gilead, and all of Bashan as far as Salecah and Edrei — the cities of Og's kingdom in Bashan. ¹¹Only Og king of Bashan was left from the remnant of the Rephaim. His bed was made of iron — it can still be seen in Rabbah of the Ammonites. It is nine cubits long and four cubits wide, measured by a standard cubit. ¹²This is the land we took possession of at that time: from Aroer on the Arnon Gorge, including half the hill country of Gilead with its cities, I gave to the Reubenites and the Gadites. ¹³The rest of Gilead and all of Bashan — Og's kingdom — I gave to the half-tribe of Manasseh: the entire district of Argob. (All that part of Bashan used to be called the land of the Rephaim.) ¹⁴Jair, a descendant of Manasseh, took the entire district of Argob up to the border of the Geshurites and Maacathites, and named those settlements after himself — Havvoth-jair — as they are called to this day. ¹⁵To Machir I gave Gilead. ¹⁶To the Reubenites and the Gadites I gave the territory from Gilead down to the Arnon Gorge — the middle of the gorge serving as the boundary — and up to the Jabbok River, which forms the Ammonite border. ¹⁷also the Arabah with the Jordan as the border, from Kinnereth down to the Sea of the Arabah — the Salt Sea — below the slopes of Pisgah on the east. ¹⁸I gave you orders at that time: 'The LORD your God has given you this land as your possession. But all your fighting men must cross over, armed for battle, ahead of your fellow Israelites.' ¹⁹'Only your wives, your children, and your livestock — I know you have large herds — will remain in the cities I have given you, ²⁰until the LORD grants rest to your brothers as He has to you, and they too have taken possession of the land that the LORD your God is giving them across the Jordan. Then each of you may return to the inheritance I have assigned you.' ²¹I also charged Joshua at that time: 'Your own eyes have seen everything that the LORD your God did to these two kings. The LORD will do the same to all the kingdoms you cross into.' ²²'Do not be afraid of them, because the LORD your God — He is the one fighting for you.' ²³I pleaded with the LORD at that time: ²⁴'Lor d GOD, You have only begun to show Your servant Your greatness and Your powerful hand. For what god is there in heaven or on earth who can match Your deeds and Your mighty acts? ²⁵Please, let me cross over and see the good land across the Jordan — that beautiful hill country and Lebanon.' ²⁶But the LORD was furious with me on your account and would not listen to me. The LORD said to me, 'Enough! Do not speak to me about this matter again.' ²⁷Go up to the summit of Pisgah and look out to the west, the north, the south, and the east. Take it all in with your eyes, because you will not cross this Jordan.' ²⁸'Commission Joshua. Encourage him and strengthen him, because he is the one who will cross over ahead of this people, and he will distribute to them the land that you will only see.' ²⁹So we remained in the valley opposite Beth-peor.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verbs va-nefen va-na'al ('we turned and went up') indicate the northward advance from Sihon's conquered territory into Bashan. Like Sihon (2:32), Og initiates combat — va-yetse liqratenu ('he came out to meet us') hu v'kol ammo ('he and all his people'). Edrei, Og's second capital (along with Ashtaroth, 1:4), was the site of this decisive engagement. The full mobilization of kol ammo again signals total defeat.
2. The reassurance al tira oto ('do not fear him') suggests that Og's reputation inspired genuine terror — his legendary size (v. 11) made him a formidable opponent. The perfect tense natati ('I have given') once again declares the outcome settled before battle. The instruction v'asita lo ('do to him') ka'asher asita le-Sichon ('as you did to Sihon') prescribes the same total warfare applied to the first Amorite king. The Sihon precedent becomes the template.
3. The word gam ('also') links this victory to the Sihon campaign — a second divine triumph. The phrase ad bilti hish'ir lo sarid ('until there was not left to him a survivor') describes total military annihilation. The emphatic YHWH Eloheinu ('the LORD our God') as subject of va-yitten ('He gave') keeps the theological focus: victories belong to God, Israel is the instrument.
4. The count shishim ir ('sixty cities') emphasizes the scale of the conquest — this was a substantial kingdom, not a small tribal area. The phrase kol chevel Argov ('the entire region/district of Argob') designates a specific administrative district within Bashan. The double negative lo hayetah qiryah asher lo laqachnu ('there was not a city that we did not take') underscores the comprehensiveness of the victory — every fortified position fell.
5. The description — arim betsurot chomah gevohah ('fortified cities with high walls'), delatayim u-veriach ('double doors/gates and a crossbar') — details serious military architecture. These were not easy targets; their capture testifies to divine assistance. The additional arei ha-perazi ('unwalled/open cities') harbeh me'od ('very many') indicates that the rural countryside was also taken. The contrast recalls the fearful report about 'cities fortified to heaven' (1:28) — God overcame exactly what Israel feared.
6. The cherem (ban of destruction) is applied identically to Og's kingdom as to Sihon's (2:34). The verb va-nacharim otam ('we devoted them to destruction') followed by the infinitive absolute hacharim kol ir ('devoting every city') intensifies the totality. The categories metim, ha-nashim, v'ha-taf ('men, women, and children') indicate complete destruction of the population. As with Sihon, the cherem was understood as divinely commanded warfare specific to these Amorite kingdoms.
7. As in the Sihon campaign (2:35), the behemah ('livestock') and shlal ha-arim ('spoils of the cities') were exempt from the cherem and available as bazonu lanu ('we plundered for ourselves'). The material wealth of Og's sixty fortified cities represented substantial resources for the Israelite tribes who would settle in this region.
8. The summary statement encompasses the full extent of Transjordanian conquest: mi-yad shnei malkhei ha-Emori ('from the hand of the two kings of the Amorites') — Sihon and Og. The territory stretches mi-nachal Arnon ('from the Arnon Gorge') in the south ad har Chermon ('to Mount Hermon') in the far north — a vast expanse covering modern-day southern Jordan to the Golan Heights. The phrase be'ever ha-Yarden ('on the far side of the Jordan') positions this as the eastern portion of God's land grant.
9. This parenthetical geographic note preserves three names for the same mountain: Chermon (Hebrew), Siryon (Sidonian/Phoenician), and Senir (Amorite). The multiple designations reflect the mountain's prominence as a landmark visible to many peoples. The Sidonian name Siryon may relate to shiryon ('coat of armor/breastplate'), perhaps from the mountain's snow-capped appearance. Such multi-lingual place references demonstrate Moses's geographical awareness.
10. Three geographical zones summarize the conquest: ha-mishor ('the plateau/tableland' — the high plain east of the Dead Sea), ha-Gil'ad ('Gilead' — the central Transjordanian hill country), and ha-Bashan ('Bashan' — the fertile northern region). The boundary markers Salkhah (in the far northeast) and Edrei (Og's southern capital) define the kingdom's extent. The entire territory is identified as arei mamlekhet Og ('cities of the kingdom of Og').
11. Og is identified as the last survivor (nish'ar mi-yeter ha-Repha'im — 'remaining from the remnant of the Rephaim') of the ancient giant race. His arso ('bed/couch' — possibly a sarcophagus or ceremonial bed) of barzel ('iron') measured tesha ammot ('nine cubits') by arba ammot ('four cubits') — approximately 13.5 by 6 feet using the standard ammah ('cubit') of about 18 inches. The bed is located be-Rabbat benei Ammon ('in Rabbah of the Ammonites' — modern Amman, Jordan) — an archaeological exhibit verifiable by Moses's audience. The iron bed, in an age when iron was rare, signals Og's wealth and power.

12. Moses now transitions from conquest narrative to land distribution. The southern portion — me-Aro'er on the nachal Arnon to chatsi har ha-Gil'ad ('half the hill country of Gilead') — was allocated to the La-Re'uveni v'la-Gadi ('Reubenites and Gadites'). These two tribes had requested Transjordanian territory because of their large herds (Numbers 32). Moses's role as land-distributor (natati — 'I gave') foreshadows the book of Joshua.
13. The northern and larger portion — yeter ha-Gil'ad v'khol ha-Bashan ('the rest of Gilead and all of Bashan') — went to chatsi shevet ha-Menasheh ('the half-tribe of Manasseh'). The parenthetical note that Bashan was formerly called erets Repha'im ('land of the Rephaim') connects to the giant traditions of chapter 2. The chevel ha-Argov ('district of Argob') with its sixty cities (v. 4) represents a substantial inheritance for the Manassites.
14. Ya'ir ben Menasheh is credited with personally securing the chevel Argov ('district of Argob'). The boundaries extend ad gevu ha-Geshuri v'ha-Ma'akhati ('to the border of the Geshurites and Maacathites') — two Aramean peoples who retained their territories within the region. Naming the settlements chavot Ya'ir ('villages/camps of Jair') after himself established his permanent claim. The phrase ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') confirms the name persisted into the narrator's time.
15. Makhir, the eldest son (or clan) of Manasseh, received ha-Gil'ad ('Gilead') — the central Transjordanian hill country. The brevity of the allocation (natati — 'I gave') contrasts with the longer descriptions of other grants, perhaps because Machir's claim was well-established and undisputed. Machir's clan was known for its military prowess, making them suitable guardians of this frontier territory.
16. The Reubenite and Gadite allocation is defined by water boundaries: from the Gil'ad in the north to nachal Arnon in the south, with tokh ha-nachal u-gevu ('the middle of the gorge and its border') as the precise southern limit, and nachal Yabboq ('the Jabbok River') as the northern boundary. The Jabbok also served as gevu benei Ammon ('the border of the Ammonites'), respecting the restriction of 2:19.
17. The western boundary is the Aravah v'ha-Yarden ('the Arabah valley and the Jordan River') stretching mi-Kinneret ('from Kinnereth' — the Sea of Galilee) southward to Yam ha-Aravah, Yam ha-Melach ('the Sea of the Arabah, the Salt Sea' — the Dead Sea). The reference point ashdot ha-Pisgah ('the slopes/watershed of Pisgah') eastward locates the territory relative to the mountain where Moses will later view the promised land. This geographical detail links the land distribution to Moses's personal exclusion.
18. The condition attached to the eastern tribes' inheritance: chalutsim ta'avru lifnei acheikhem ('as armed troops you shall cross over before your brothers'). The word chalutsim ('armed, equipped for battle') from chalats ('to strip for action, to arm') means ready for combat. The eastern tribes cannot simply settle — they must first help the western tribes conquer their portion. The phrase kol benei chayil ('all capable warriors') specifies military-age men. Brotherhood (acheikhem — 'your brothers') demands solidarity.
19. The exemption extends to nesheikhem ('your wives'), tapkhem ('your children'), and miqnekhem ('your livestock'). Moses's parenthetical acknowledgment yada'ti ki miqneh rav lakhem ('I know that you have much livestock') recalls the original reason these tribes requested Transjordanian territory (Numbers 32:1). The concession is practical: non-combatants stay in the secured cities (be'areikhem asher natati lakhem — 'in your cities which I have given you') while warriors cross over.
20. The duration of service is ad asher yaniach YHWH la-acheikhem ('until the LORD gives rest to your brothers') — the key term menuachah/yaniach ('rest') in Deuteronomy means secure settlement in the land, free from military threat. The parallel kakhem ('like you') establishes equity: you have rest, so fight until they do too. Only after the western tribes are settled may the eastern troops return ish li-yrushato ('each man to his inheritance'). Mutual obligation defines Israelite solidarity.
21. Moses's charge to Joshua appeals to firsthand experience: einekha ha-ro'ot ('your eyes — the seeing ones') — Joshua saw the defeats of Sihon and Og personally. The promise ken ya'aseh YHWH ('thus the LORD will do') to kol ha-mamlakhot ('all the kingdoms') extrapolates from two victories to universal application. What God did to two Amorite kings, He will do to all Canaanite kingdoms. Joshua's faith is to be grounded in observed evidence, not abstract hope.
22. The prohibition lo tira'um ('do not fear them') is grounded in the declaration YHWH Eloheikhem hu ha-nilcham lakhem ('the LORD your God — He is the one fighting for you'). The emphatic pronoun hu ('He') and the participle ha-nilcham ('the one fighting') present God as an ongoing, active warrior on Israel's behalf. This theological affirmation — that God Himself is the real combatant — is the foundation of all Deuteronomic warfare theology.
23. The verb va-etchannan ('I pleaded, implored') from chanan ('to be gracious, to show favor') is a hitpael form — literally 'I made myself an object seeking grace.' This is one of the most emotionally raw moments in Deuteronomy: Moses, the great leader who guided Israel through forty years, begs for entry into the promised land. The verb's root is the same as 'grace' — Moses appeals not to his merit but to God's undeserved favor.
24. Moses addresses God with the double divine name Adonai YHWH ('Lord GOD') — a formal, intensely personal address. His argument is theological: attah hachilota le-har'ot ('You have begun to show') — if God has only started revealing His power, then surely there is more to see! The rhetorical question mi El ba-shamayim uva-arets ('who is a god in heaven or earth') who could match God's deeds (k'ma'asekha — 'like Your works') and power (k'gevurotekha — 'like Your mighty acts') is not merely praise but a plea: a God this great should surely let Moses see the land.
25. The particle na ('please, I beg you') attached to ev'rah ('let me cross') transforms the request from demand to desperate plea. Moses's desire is simply to see: v'er'eh ('and let me see') ha-arets ha-tovah ('the good land'). His longing focuses on two features: ha-har ha-tov ha-zeh ('that good/beautiful mountain' — likely referring to the temple mount or the central highlands) and ha-Levanon ('Lebanon' — famous for its cedars). The prayer reveals that for Moses, the land is not merely territory but the culmination of his life's purpose.

- 26. The verb va-yit'abber ('He was furious, crossed over in anger') from avar in the hitpael is one of the strongest expressions of divine anger in the Hebrew Bible — God's wrath boiled over. The cause: lema'ankhem ('on your account/because of you') — Moses attributes his punishment to the people's provocations. God's response rav lakh ('enough for you') echoes the rav lakhem ('enough for you') of 1:6 and 2:3, but here it terminates discussion rather than beginning action. The prohibition al tosef dabber ('do not continue speaking') shuts the door with finality.
- 27. God offers Moses a consolation: aleh rosh ha-Pisgah ('go up to the top of Pisgah') and see the land from every direction — yamah ('westward'), tsafonah ('northward'), teimanah ('southward'), mizrachah ('eastward'). The command ur'eh be'einekha ('see with your eyes') grants visual access to what is physically denied. The final clause ki lo ta'avov et ha-Yarden ha-zeh ('because you will not cross this Jordan') is both tender and absolute — God grants the sight while confirming the prohibition.
- 28. Three imperatives define Moses's final duty regarding Joshua: tsav ('commission/charge'), chazzeqehu ('strengthen him'), and ammetsuhu ('fortify/encourage him'). The verbs chazaq and amats form a standard pair for bolstering courage (see Joshua 1:6-9). The poignant contrast: hu ya'avov ('he will cross over') while Moses will not; hu yanchil otam ('he will cause them to inherit') ha-arets asher tir'eh ('the land that you will see'). Moses's legacy is the one who prepared the successor, not the one who completed the mission.
- 29. The chapter closes with Israel encamped ba-gai mul Beit Pe'or ('in the valley opposite Beth-peor'). Beth-peor ('house/temple of Peor') was a Moabite cultic site associated with the disastrous apostasy of Numbers 25, when Israelite men joined in Baal-peor worship. The location is both geographically specific and theologically charged — Moses delivers his final speeches within sight of a place that represents Israel's vulnerability to idolatry. The pe paragraph marker signals a major section break.

Summary: Moses urges Israel to obey God's statutes, warning against idolatry by recalling Sinai — where they heard God's voice but saw no form. He designates three cities of refuge east of the Jordan.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The theological core is verse 12: 'You heard the sound of words but saw no form — only a voice.' God's self-revelation at Sinai was auditory, not visual. This grounds the second commandment: because God has no visible form, any image is a lie about God's nature. The word temunah ('form, likeness') is the key — Israel cannot make what they never saw.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase aseret ha-devarim (v. 13, 'the Ten Words') is Deuteronomy's name for the Decalogue — devarim encompasses 'words, matters, things.' We rendered it 'the Ten Words' in the notes to preserve the Hebrew concept, though 'Ten Commandments' is the familiar English. The verb davaq (v. 4, 'held fast') describes intimate covenant attachment — the same verb used for marriage in Genesis 2:24.*

Connections: *The warning against worshipping sun, moon, and stars (v. 19) distinguishes Israel from every surrounding culture. The promise that Israel will seek God in exile and find Him (vv. 29-31) anticipates Jeremiah 29:13. The phrase 'jealous God' (El qanna, v. 24) echoes Exodus 20:5 and recurs in Nahum 1:2.*

¹Now then, Israel, listen to the decrees and the laws that I am teaching you to follow, so that you may live and go in and take possession of the land that the LORD, the God of your ancestors, is giving you. ²Do not add anything to what I am commanding you, and do not take anything away from it. Keep the commandments of the LORD your God exactly as I am giving them to you. ³Your own eyes saw what the LORD did at Baal-peor — the LORD your God destroyed from among you every person who followed Baal-peor. ⁴But you who held fast to the LORD your God — all of you are alive today. ⁵See — I have taught you decrees and laws just as the LORD my God commanded me, so you can follow them in the land you are entering to take possession of. ⁶Guard them and put them into practice, because this is your wisdom and discernment in the eyes of the nations. When they hear about all these decrees, they will say, 'Truly, this great nation is a wise and discerning people.' ⁷For what great nation has a god so near to it as the LORD our God is to us whenever we call on Him? ⁸And what great nation has decrees and laws as just as this entire the Law that I am setting before you today? ⁹Only be on guard, and watch yourself carefully, so that you do not forget the things your eyes have seen and so that they do not slip from your heart as long as you live. Teach them to your children and to your grandchildren — ¹⁰Remember the day you stood before the LORD your God at Horeb, when the LORD said to me, 'Assemble the people before me so I can let them hear my words. They will learn to revere me all the days they live on the earth, and they will teach their children as well.' ¹¹You approached and stood at the base of the mountain while the mountain blazed with fire reaching to the heart of the sky — darkness, cloud, and dense gloom. ¹²The LORD spoke to you from the midst of the fire. You heard the sound of words but saw no form — only a voice. ¹³He declared His covenant to you, which He commanded you to carry out — the Ten Words — and He wrote them on two stone tablets. ¹⁴At that same time the LORD commissioned me to teach you the decrees and laws for you to practice in the land you are about to cross into and possess. ¹⁵Guard yourselves very carefully — since you saw no form of any kind on the day the LORD spoke to you at Horeb from the midst of the fire — ¹⁶so that you do not corrupt yourselves by making an idol in the shape of any figure — a representation of male or female, ¹⁷or of any animal on the earth, or of any winged bird that flies through the sky, ¹⁸or of anything that crawls on the ground, or of any fish in the waters below the surface of the earth. ¹⁹And when you look up to the sky and see the sun, the moon, and the stars — the entire heavenly host — do not let yourself be lured into bowing down to them and serving them. The LORD your God has assigned these to all the peoples under the entire sky, ²⁰but you the LORD took and brought out of the iron-smelting furnace — out of Egypt — to be His own people, His treasured inheritance, as you are today. ²¹Now the LORD was angry with me because of you, and He swore that I would not cross the Jordan or enter the good land that the LORD your God is giving you as your inheritance. ²²I am going to die in this land. I will not cross the Jordan. But you will cross over, and you will possess that good land. ²³Be careful not to forget the covenant of the LORD your God that He made with you, and not to make for yourselves an idol in the form of anything that the LORD your God has prohibited. ²⁴For the LORD your God is a consuming fire — a jealous God. ²⁵When you have children and grandchildren and have grown old in the land, if you become corrupt and make an idol in the form of anything, doing what is evil in the eyes of the LORD your God and provoking Him — ²⁶I call heaven and earth as witnesses against you today: you will quickly and completely perish from the land that you are crossing the Jordan to possess. You will not live long there — you will be utterly annihilated. ²⁷The LORD will scatter you among the peoples, and only a small number of you will survive among the nations where the LORD drives you. ²⁸There you will serve gods made by human hands — wood and stone — that cannot see, cannot hear, cannot eat, and cannot smell. ²⁹But from there you will seek the LORD your God, and you will find Him when you search for Him with all your heart and all your soul. ³⁰When you are in distress and all these things have happened to you, then in the latter days you will return to the LORD your God and listen to His voice. ³¹(For the LORD your God is a compassionate God.) He will not abandon you or destroy you, and He will not forget the covenant with your ancestors that He swore to them. ³²Search through all of history, from the first days before your time — from the very day God created humanity on the earth — and search from one end of the sky to the other. Has anything this great ever happened, or has anything like it ever been heard of? ³³Has any people ever heard the voice of God speaking from the middle of fire, as you have heard, and survived? ³⁴Has any god ever attempted to go and take one nation for himself out of another nation — by trials, by signs, by wonders, by war, by a powerful hand, by an outstretched arm, and by acts of great terror — the way the LORD your God did for you in Egypt before your very eyes? ³⁵You were shown these things so that you would know: the LORD — He is God. There is no other besides Him. ³⁶From heaven He let you hear His voice to discipline you. On earth He showed you His great fire, and you heard His words from the midst of that fire. ³⁷Because He loved your ancestors, He chose their descendants after them and brought you out of Egypt by His presence, with His great power, ³⁸in order to drive out nations greater and more powerful than you from before you, to bring you in, and to give you their land as an inheritance — as it is today. ³⁹Know today and take it to heart: the LORD — He is God in the heavens above and on the earth below. There is no other. ⁴⁰Keep His decrees and His commandments that I am giving you today, so that it will go well for you and for your children after you, and so that you will live long on the land that the LORD your God is giving you for all time. ⁴¹Then Moses set apart three cities east of the Jordan, toward the sunrise, ⁴²so that anyone who killed another person unintentionally, without prior hostility, could flee to one of these cities and save his life. ⁴³These were: Bezer in the wilderness on the plateau for the Reubenites; Ramoth in Gilead for the Gadites; and Golan in Bashan for the Manassites. ⁴⁴This is the Law that Moses placed before the Israelites. ⁴⁵These are the decrees, the statutes, and the laws that Moses proclaimed to the Israelites after they came out of Egypt, ⁴⁶on the east side of the Jordan, in the valley opposite Beth-peor, in the land of Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon — the one Moses and the Israelites defeated after coming out of Egypt. ⁴⁷They took possession of his land and the land of Og king of Bashan — the two Amorite kings east of the Jordan, toward the sunrise — ⁴⁸from Aroer on the edge of the Arnon Gorge all the way to Mount Sion (that is, Hermon), ⁴⁹including the entire Arabah east of the Jordan, down to the Sea of the Arabah, below the slopes of Pisgah.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The transitional v'attah Yisra'el ('and now, Israel') shifts from historical review (chapters 1-3) to direct exhortation. The command shema ('listen/hear') introduces the central Deuteronomic demand: attentive obedience. Two categories of instruction are named: chuqqim ('decrees, statutes' — fixed prescriptions) and mishpatim ('laws, judgments' — case-based rulings). The purpose clause lema'an tichyu ('so that you may live') connects obedience directly to survival — Torah observance is not abstract duty but the pathway to life itself.
2. The double prohibition — lo tosifu ('do not add') and lo tigre'u ('do not subtract/diminish') — establishes the principle of textual integrity for divine instruction. The ha-davar ('the word/matter') is treated as a fixed, complete revelation that must be preserved without human modification. This principle protects the Torah from both expansionist innovation and reductive neglect. The purpose is lishemor et mitsvot YHWH ('to keep the commandments of the LORD') — faithful preservation enables faithful practice.
3. Moses appeals again to eyewitness experience: eineikhem ha-ro'ot ('your eyes — the seeing ones'). The Ba'al Pe'or incident (Numbers 25) involved Israelite men engaging in sexual immorality and idol worship with Moabite women — a recent catastrophe that killed 24,000. The verb hishmido ('He destroyed him') from shamad is used for total annihilation. The selective destruction — kol ha-ish asher halakh acharei Ba'al Pe'or ('every man who followed Baal-peor') — reinforces the thesis: disobedience brings death.
4. The verb ha-deveqim ('the ones clinging/holding fast') from davaq describes intimate, tenacious attachment — the same verb used for a husband's bond to his wife in Genesis 2:24. The contrast is stark: those who followed Baal-peor are dead; those who clung to God (ba-YHWH Eloheikhem — 'to the LORD your God') are chayyim kullekhem ha-yom ('alive, all of you, today'). Loyalty to God is literally the difference between life and death.
5. Moses presents himself as an authorized teacher: limmadeti etkhem ('I have taught you') — the root lamad ('to teach/learn') establishes Moses's pedagogical role. His authority derives from divine commission: ka'asher tsivvani YHWH Elohai ('as the LORD my God commanded me'). The purpose is la'asot ken be-qerev ha-arets ('to do so in the midst of the land') — the Torah is designed for life in the land, not for wilderness existence. The laws will govern a settled agricultural society.
6. Torah observance becomes Israel's international reputation: hi chokhmatkhem u-vinatkhem le'einei ha-ammim ('it is your wisdom and your discernment in the eyes of the peoples'). The nations' expected response — raq am chakham v'navon ha-goi ha-gadol ha-zeh ('surely a wise and discerning people, this great nation') — presents Torah observance not as a burden but as an advertisement for divine wisdom. Other nations will recognize the superiority of Israel's legal and moral code by observing its effects.
7. The rhetorical question mi goi gadol ('what great nation?') expects the answer 'none.' Israel's uniqueness is not military power or cultural sophistication but divine proximity: asher lo Elohim qerovim elav ('that has a god near to it'). The participle qerovim ('near, close') describes God's accessibility — be-khol qor'enu elav ('in all our calling upon Him'). Other nations had distant, manipulable deities; Israel's God is relationally present and responsive to prayer.
8. A second rhetorical question parallels verse 7: if the first boasts divine proximity, this one boasts legal excellence. The adjective tsaddiqim ('righteous, just') applied to the chuqqim and mishpatim declares Israel's laws morally superior to all other legal codes. The phrase k'kol ha-Torah ha-zot ('like this entire Torah') treats the Torah as a unified, comprehensive body of instruction. The claim is bold: no nation's laws match the justice of God's revealed instructions.
9. The double imperative — hishamer lekha u-shemor nafshekha me'od ('guard yourself and keep your soul very carefully') — conveys extreme vigilance. The danger is forgetting: pen tishkach ('lest you forget') the events your eyes witnessed, and pen yasuru mi-levavekha ('lest they depart from your heart'). Memory is not passive recall but active heart-engagement. The antidote to forgetting is intergenerational teaching: v'hoda'tam le-vanekha v'livnei vanekha ('make them known to your children and grandchildren'). Faith survives through transmission.
10. The Horeb theophany is the foundational memory: yom asher amadta lifnei YHWH ('the day you stood before the LORD'). God's purpose in the assembly (haqhel li et ha-am — 'gather for me the people') was auditory revelation: v'ashmi'em et devarai ('I will make them hear my words'). The goal is le-yir'ah oti ('to fear/revere me') — yir'ah encompasses awe, reverence, and obedient respect. The chain continues: v'et beneihem yelammedun ('and their children they will teach'). Revelation, reverence, and repetition form a cycle of faithfulness.
11. The scene combines opposing elements: fire (bo'er ba-esh — 'burning with fire') reaching ad lev ha-shamayim ('to the heart/middle of the heavens'), surrounded by choshekh anan va-arafel ('darkness, cloud, and thick gloom'). The arafel ('dense darkness, thick gloom') is God's shroud — He reveals Himself in speech but conceals Himself visually. The people stood tachat ha-har ('under/at the base of the mountain'), looking up at the terrifying display of divine presence.
12. This verse is theologically pivotal: mi-tokh ha-esh ('from the midst of the fire') God spoke, and Israel heard qol devarim ('a sound/voice of words'). The crucial observation: u-temunah einkhem ro'im ('but a form/image you were not seeing') zulati qol ('except a voice'). God is heard but not seen — He communicates through language, not through visual representation. This auditory-only revelation becomes the theological foundation for the prohibition against images (vv. 15-19): since God showed no form, no form can represent Him.
13. The covenant (berito — 'His covenant') is identified with aseret ha-devarim ('the Ten Words' — traditionally 'the Ten Commandments'). The term devarim ('words') rather than mitsvot ('commandments') is significant — these are covenant stipulations expressed as direct divine speech, not merely legal rules. God both spoke and wrote: va-yikhtevem al shnei luchot anavim ('He wrote them on two tablets of stone'). The dual tablets likely represent two copies of the covenant document — one for each covenant partner — following ancient Near Eastern treaty conventions.

14. Moses distinguishes between God's direct revelation (the Ten Words on stone) and his own teaching role: v'oti tsivah ('and me He commanded') le-lammed etkhem ('to teach you'). The chuqqim u-mishpatim ('decrees and laws') expand and apply the covenant principles of the Decalogue. The teaching is land-oriented: la'asotkhem otam ba-arets ('for you to do them in the land') asher attem overim shammah le-rishtah ('that you are crossing over there to possess'). Torah is the instruction manual for life in the promised land.
15. The warning v'nishmartem me'od le-nafshotekhem ('guard yourselves very carefully for your souls/lives') introduces the anti-idolatry section with life-or-death urgency. The theological argument is precise: ki lo re'item kol temunah ('because you did not see any form') on b'yom dibber YHWH ('the day the LORD spoke'). Since God's self-revelation at Sinai was exclusively auditory, any visual representation is not merely inadequate but fundamentally contrary to how God chose to reveal Himself.
16. The verb tashchitun ('you corrupt/destroy yourselves') from shachat frames idolatry as self-destruction, not merely disobedience. The object is pesel temunat kol samel ('a carved image, the form of any figure/symbol'). The samel may refer to a cultic image or symbol. The first category prohibited is tavnit zakhar o neqevah ('the pattern/form of male or female') — human-shaped idols, whether male gods or female goddesses. This begins a comprehensive catalog of prohibited image-making.
17. The catalog expands from human forms to tavnit kol behemah ('the form of any animal') and tavnit kol tsippor kanaf ('the form of any winged bird'). Animal worship was widespread in the ancient Near East — Egyptian religion prominently featured animal deities (Apis bull, Horus falcon, Bastet cat). The comprehensiveness (kol — 'any/every') leaves no loophole: no creature from any realm can serve as a representation of the invisible God.
18. The final two categories complete the four-domain sweep of creation (echoing Genesis 1): kol romes ba-adamah ('anything crawling on the ground' — reptiles, insects) and kol dagah asher ba-mayim mitachat la-arets ('any fish in the waters beneath the earth'). The ancient cosmology envisioned waters below the earth's surface. The four categories — human, animal, bird, ground-crawler/fish — mirror the creation order and declare that nothing in the created realm can image the Creator.
19. Astral worship is addressed separately from animal/human idolatry. The danger is seduction by beauty: u-fen tissa einekha ('lest you lift your eyes') to the sky and v'niddachta ('be driven/lured away'). The verbs hishtachavita ('bow down') and avadtam ('serve them') describe the full posture and practice of worship. The remarkable phrase asher chalaq YHWH Elohekha otam le-khol ha-ammim ('which the LORD your God has allotted to all peoples') suggests God permitted celestial worship for other nations but reserved exclusive worship of Himself for Israel.
20. The metaphor kur ha-barzel ('iron furnace/smelter furnace') depicts Egypt as an industrial forge — the heat and suffering of slavery refined Israel as metal is refined in fire. The Exodus was God's act of extraction: laqach ('He took') and va-yotsi ('He brought out'). The purpose: lihyot lo le-am nachalah ('to become for Him a people of inheritance'). The term nachalah ('inheritance, patrimony') applied to Israel means God claims them as His own personal possession — not merely subjects but treasured heritage.
21. Moses returns to his personal exclusion: YHWH hit'anaf bi ('the LORD was enraged at me') al divreikhem ('because of your words/deeds'). The sworn prohibition is double: le-vilti ovri et ha-Yarden ('that I would not cross the Jordan') and le-vilti vo el ha-arets ha-tovah ('that I would not enter the good land'). Moses's emphasis on nachalah ('inheritance') highlights the poignancy — the land he is giving as inheritance to Israel was denied to him as a personal reality. His loss is their gain.
22. Moses's declaration anokhi met ba-arets ha-zot ('I am dying in this land') states his fate with stark simplicity. The contrast is painful: einenni over ('I am not crossing') but v'attem overim ('but you are crossing') vi-rishtem ('and you will possess'). The pronouns carry all the emotion — I/you, not crossing/crossing, dying here/inheriting there. Moses accepts his fate and redirects the people's attention from his loss to their promise.
23. The warning hishameru lakhem ('guard yourselves') returns with intensified urgency. Forgetting the covenant (pen tishkechu et berit YHWH — 'lest you forget the covenant of the LORD') leads directly to idolatry. The phrase asher karat immakhem ('which He cut with you') uses the standard covenant-making verb (karat — 'to cut'), evoking the solemnity of the Sinai ceremony. The sequence — forgetting the covenant, then making a pesel ('idol') — reveals Moses's understanding: idolatry is not the cause but the symptom of covenant amnesia.
24. Two divine metaphors close this warning section. First: esh oklah ('a consuming fire') — fire that devours everything in its path, recalling the burning mountain of verse 11. Second: El qanna ('a jealous/zealous God') — qanna describes the fierce possessiveness of exclusive covenant love. God's jealousy is not petty insecurity but the righteous intolerance of a faithful spouse toward infidelity. Together, these images warn: the God who revealed Himself in fire will respond to idolatry with consuming judgment.
25. Moses projects into the future: ki tolid banim u-vnei vanim ('when you bear children and grandchildren') v'noshantem ba-arets ('and you have grown old/long-settled in the land'). The verb noshantem from yashan ('to be old, to sleep') suggests complacency through prolonged comfort. The warning sequence — v'hishchatem ('you will become corrupt'), va'asitem pesel ('you will make an idol'), va'asitem ha-ra ('you will do evil') le-hakh'iso ('to provoke Him') — reads as prophecy, not merely possibility. Moses foresees that prosperity will breed forgetfulness.
26. The solemn invocation ha'idoti vakhem ha-yom et ha-shamayim v'et ha-arets ('I call as witness against you today the heavens and the earth') follows ancient Near Eastern treaty conventions where cosmic forces witnessed covenant agreements. The infinitive absolute avod to'vedun ('perishing you will perish') and hishamed tishamedun ('being destroyed you will be destroyed') double the verbs for emphasis. The consequence of idolatry is exile — removal me'al ha-arets ('from the land'). The warning is conditional but presented with prophetic certainty.
27. The verb hefits ('He will scatter') from puts describes forced dispersion — exile among the nations. The phrase nish'artem metei mispar ('you will remain few in number') — literally 'men of number/able to be counted' — depicts a remnant so small it can be tallied, contrasting sharply with the - 'stars of heaven' metaphor of 1:10. The verb yenaheg ('He will lead/drive') from nahag suggests God actively herding them into exile, as a shepherd drives livestock.

- 28. The punishment fits the crime with bitter irony: Israel wanted idols, so in exile va'avadtem sham elohim ('you will serve gods there') — ma'aseh yedei adam ('the work of human hands'). The fourfold negation — lo yir'un ('they cannot see'), lo yishme'un ('they cannot hear'), lo yokhlun ('they cannot eat'), lo yerichun ('they cannot smell') — exposes the absurdity of idol worship: the gods of exile are senseless objects of ets va-even ('wood and stone'). The living God who speaks, sees, and acts is replaced by mute material.
- 29. The tone shifts dramatically from judgment to hope: u-viqqashtem mi-sham ('you will seek from there') — even from the depths of exile, seeking is possible. The promise u-matsata ('you will find') is unconditional in its assurance — God remains findable. The condition is wholeness: ki tidreshenu be-khol levavekha u-ve-khol nafshekha ('when you seek Him with all your heart and all your soul'). The word pair lev ('heart' — the seat of will and intellect) and nefesh ('soul/life' — the totality of one's being) demands complete, undivided commitment.
- 30. The temporal phrase be-acharit ha-yamim ('in the latter days/end of days') looks far into the future, beyond exile to ultimate restoration. The word tsar ('distress, trouble') describes the crushing pressure of exile. Moses presents the return not as a possibility but a certainty: v'shavta ad YHWH ('you will return to the LORD') v'shamata be-qolo ('you will listen to His voice'). The suffering of exile will accomplish what prosperity could not — genuine repentance. The verb shuv ('return') is the central term for repentance in the Hebrew Bible.
- 31. After the severe warnings, Moses grounds hope in God's character: El rachum ('a compassionate/merciful God'). The root racham relates to rechem ('womb') — divine compassion is maternal, instinctive, and tender. Three negatives guarantee restoration: lo yarfekha ('He will not let you go/abandon you'), lo yashchitekha ('He will not destroy you'), v'lo yishkach et berit avotekha ('He will not forget the covenant of your ancestors'). God's covenant memory outlasts human faithlessness. What Israel forgets (v. 23), God remembers.
- 32. Moses issues a research challenge: she'al na le-yamim rishonim ('ask now about the former days') — investigate all of human history le-min ha-yom asher bara Elohim adam ('from the day God created man'). The spatial scope matches the temporal: u-le-miqtseh ha-shamayim v'ad qetsesh ha-shamayim ('from one end of the heavens to the other'). The rhetorical question ha-nihyah ka-davar ha-gadol ha-zeh ('has anything like this great thing happened?') leads to the unprecedented claim of the next verse.
- 33. The question ha-shama am qol Elohim medabber mi-tokh ha-esh ('has a people heard the voice of God speaking from fire') highlights the unique terror and privilege of Sinai. The verb va-yechi ('and lived/survived') underscores that direct encounter with the divine voice should have been lethal — the people's survival is itself miraculous. The phrase ka'asher shamata attah ('as you yourself heard') makes each listener personally accountable: you heard it; you survived it; now respond to it.
- 34. The Exodus is presented as historically unprecedented: ha-nissah Elohim lavo laqachat lo goi mi-qerev goi ('has God attempted to come to take for Himself a nation from the midst of a nation'). Seven instruments of deliverance are listed: massot ('trials'), otot ('signs'), moftim ('wonders'), milchamah ('war'), yad chazaqah ('mighty hand'), zero'a netuyah ('outstretched arm'), and mora'im gedolim ('great terrors'). The climactic seven-fold list recalls the plagues and exodus events. No other deity in human history performed such a national-scale rescue — this is Moses's central apologetic argument.
- 35. The purpose of Israel's unique historical experience is knowledge: attah hor'eta lada'at ('you were shown in order to know'). The declaration YHWH hu ha-Elohim ('the LORD — He is the God') is an exclusivist monotheistic claim. The phrase ein od milvado ('there is none else besides Him') goes beyond henotheism (worshiping one god while acknowledging others' existence) to absolute monotheism — no other deity exists. This is one of the strongest monotheistic statements in the Hebrew Bible.
- 36. Revelation came from two directions simultaneously: min ha-shamayim ('from heaven') God's voice descended, and al ha-arets ('on earth') His fire appeared. The purpose is le-yassrekha ('to discipline/instruct you') — yasar means both to correct and to train, combining correction with education. The auditory emphasis continues: et qolo ('His voice'), u-devarav shamata ('His words you heard') mi-tokh ha-esh ('from the midst of the fire'). Heaven and earth converge in the Sinai event.
- 37. The motivation for election is love: ki ahav et avotekha ('because He loved your ancestors'). This is unmerited affection — God chose Abraham's line not for their merit but because of His love. The verb va-yivchar ('He chose') from bachar is the central election verb — divine selection for covenant relationship. God's involvement is personal: be-fanav ('by His presence/face') with be-kocho ha-gadol ('by His great power'). Love and power combine in the Exodus — it is both intimate and mighty.
- 38. The purpose chain continues: le-horish goyim gedolim va-atsumim mimmekha ('to dispossess nations greater and mightier than you'). The phrase mimmekha ('than you') honestly acknowledges Israel's relative weakness — the nations being displaced are gedolim va-atsumim ('greater and mightier'). Israel's conquest depends entirely on divine power, not military superiority. The gift is nachalah ('inheritance') — permanent, generational, and irrevocable — ka-yom ha-zeh ('as this day') confirming present fulfillment.
- 39. The verse demands both intellectual and emotional engagement: v'yadata ha-yom ('know today') and va-hashevota el levavekha ('bring it back to your heart'). The knowledge is cosmically comprehensive: YHWH hu ha-Elohim ba-shamayim mi-ma'al v'al ha-arets mi-tachat ('the LORD is God in heaven above and on earth below'). The concluding ein od ('there is no other') — even shorter than 4:35's ein od milvado — is the most compressed monotheistic declaration possible. Two words in Hebrew encompass all of theology.
- 40. Moses's first address concludes with the promise of dual blessing: asher yitav lekha u-levanekha acharekha ('that it may go well for you and for your children after you') and u-lema'an ta'arikh yamim ('that you may prolong your days'). Obedience yields both quality of life (yitav — 'it will be good') and quantity (ta'arikh yamim — 'you will lengthen days'). The final phrase kol ha-yamim ('all the days' — forever) extends the promise indefinitely.

The pe paragraph marker signals the end of Moses's first major speech (chapters 1-4:40).

41. The narrative shifts from speech to action: az yavdil Mosheh ('then Moses set apart/separated') shalosh arim ('three cities'). The verb hivdil from badal ('to separate, to distinguish') is the same verb used for God's separating acts in creation (Genesis 1:4-7). The phrase mizrechah shamesh ('toward the sunrise' — eastward) locates these cities in Transjordan. This section (vv. 41-43) forms a brief narrative interlude between Moses's first and second addresses.
42. The cities of refuge serve a specific legal function: protecting the rotse'ach ('manslayer, one who kills') who kills bi-vli da'at ('without knowledge/unintentionally'). The qualifier v'hu lo sone lo mi-tmol shilshom ('and he was not hating him from yesterday-three days ago' — without prior hostility) distinguishes accidental killing from premeditated murder. The purpose is va-chai ('and he shall live') — the manslayer's life is preserved from the blood-avenger by finding sanctuary in these cities. This represents a sophisticated distinction between intentional and unintentional homicide.
43. Three cities are named, one per Transjordanian tribe: Betser ba-midbar ('Bezer in the wilderness') on the mishor ('plateau') for Reuben; Ra'mot ba-Gil'ad ('Ramoah in Gilead') for Gad; and Golan ba-Bashan ('Golan in Bashan') for Manasseh. The distribution ensures geographical accessibility — each tribe has a refuge city within reasonable distance. Golan gives its name to the modern Golan Heights. The three cities correspond to the three tribal territories described in 3:12-17.
44. The transitional heading v'zot ha-Torah ('and this is the Torah/instruction') introduces Moses's second address (chapters 5-26 or 5-28). The verb sam ('placed, set') lifnei benei Yisra'el ('before the children of Israel') implies both presentation and availability — the Torah is not hidden or esoteric but publicly accessible. This verse may serve as a superscription for everything that follows, or as a bridge connecting the historical prologue to the legal core of Deuteronomy.
45. Three categories of instruction are named: ha-edot ('the testimonies/decrees' — instructions that testify to God's will), ha-chuqqim ('the statutes' — prescribed regulations), and ha-mishpatim ('the laws/judgments' — case-law rulings). The timing reference be-tsetam mi-Mitsrayim ('when they came out of Egypt') connects all subsequent legislation to the Exodus event — the laws flow from and depend upon the liberation. The three-term formula is a comprehensive designation for the entirety of God's revealed instruction.
46. The geographical setting is restated: be'ever ha-Yarden ('east of the Jordan'), ba-gai mul Beit Pe'or ('in the valley opposite Beth-peor'), be-erets Sichon melek ha-Emori ('in the land of Sihon king of the Amorites'). The note that Moses and the Israelites defeated (hikkah — 'struck') Sihon after coming out of Egypt connects the setting to the conquest narrative of chapter 2. The mention of Beth-peor again (see 3:29) keeps the warning about apostasy within sight of the audience.
47. The summary references the dual conquest: et artso ('his land' — Sihon's) v'et erets Og melek ha-Bashan ('and the land of Og king of Bashan'). The phrase shnei malkhei ha-Emori ('the two kings of the Amorites') treats them as a pair — the complete Transjordanian Amorite power structure. The direction marker mizrach shamesh ('east of the sun/sunrise') locates both territories east of the Jordan, forming the context for Moses's second address.
48. The territory is defined by its full north-south extent: me-Aro'er al sfat nachal Arnon ('from Aroer on the lip of the Arnon Gorge') in the south to har Si'on hu Chermon ('Mount Sion, which is Hermon') in the far north. The name Si'on here (distinct from Zion in Jerusalem) is yet another name for Mount Hermon, adding to the three names listed in 3:9 (Hermon, Sirion, Senir). The mountain's multiple names reflect its prominence as a regional landmark visible to many peoples.
49. The final geographical note includes kol ha-Aravah ever ha-Yarden mizrachah ('the entire Arabah east of the Jordan') extending to Yam ha-Aravah ('the Sea of the Arabah' — the Dead Sea) below ashdot ha-Pisgah ('the slopes/watersheds of Pisgah'). The pe paragraph marker ends this section definitively. Mount Pisgah appears for the final time as the place where Moses will view the land he cannot enter (3:27) — a bittersweet closing note that looks back to Moses's plea and forward to his death.

Summary: Moses restates the Ten Commandments to the generation that will enter the land, framing them as a covenant made 'not with our fathers but with us — we who are alive here today.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The Sabbath commandment differs from Exodus 20: there it is grounded in creation ('for in six days the LORD made...'), here in liberation ('remember that you were a slave in Egypt'). Same command, different motivation. Deuteronomy's version makes the Sabbath a social justice institution — you rest so your servants can rest, because you know what slavery feels like.

Translation Friction: Moses's claim that the covenant was made 'with us, the living, here today' (v. 3) when most of them were children or unborn at Sinai is a theological statement, not a historical error. Each generation stands at Sinai. We rendered the emphatic anachnu elleh poh hayyom ('we ourselves, these here today') to preserve the force of Moses's actualization.

Connections: The Decalogue parallel in Exodus 20:1-17 reveals intentional Deuteronomic revision. The people's fear of God's voice (vv. 23-27) sets up the mediator role that leads to the prophet-like-Moses promise in 18:15-18. Jesus cites the Sabbath commandment's humanitarian logic in Mark 2:27.

¹Moses summoned all Israel and said to them: "Listen, Israel, to the statutes and ordinances that I am speaking in your hearing today. Learn them and take care to observe them. ²The LORD our God cut a covenant with us at Horeb. ³Not with our ancestors did the LORD cut this covenant, but with us — we ourselves, these ones here, alive today, all of us. ⁴The LORD spoke with you face to face on the mountain, from the midst of the fire — ⁵— I was standing between the LORD and you at that time, to declare to you the word of the LORD, because you were afraid of the fire and did not go up the mountain — saying: ⁶"I am the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. ⁷You shall have no other gods before Me. ⁸You shall not make for yourself a carved image — any likeness of what is in heaven above, on the earth below, or in the waters under the earth. ⁹You shall not bow down to them or serve them, for I, the LORD your God, am a zealous God, visiting the iniquity of parents upon children to the third and fourth generation of those who hate Me, ¹⁰but showing faithful love to the thousandth generation of those who love Me and keep My commandments. ¹¹You shall not bear the name of the LORD your God for worthless purposes, for the LORD will not hold guiltless anyone who bears His name for worthless purposes. ¹²Guard the Sabbath day and keep it holy, as the LORD your God has commanded you. ¹³Six days you shall labor and do all your work, ¹⁴but the seventh day is a Sabbath to the LORD your God. You shall not do any work — you, your son, your daughter, your male servant, your female servant, your ox, your donkey, any of your livestock, or the foreigner within your gates — so that your male servant and your female servant may rest just as you do. ¹⁵Remember that you were a slave in the land of Egypt, and the LORD your God brought you out from there with a mighty hand and an outstretched arm. Therefore the LORD your God has commanded you to observe the Sabbath day. ¹⁶Honor your father and your mother, as the LORD your God has commanded you, so that your days may be long and so that it may go well for you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you. ¹⁷You shall not murder. You shall not commit adultery. You shall not steal. You shall not bear false witness against your neighbor. ¹⁸You shall not covet your neighbor's wife. You shall not crave your neighbor's house, his field, his male servant, his female servant, his ox, his donkey, or anything that belongs to your neighbor. ¹⁹These words the LORD spoke to your entire assembly on the mountain, from the midst of the fire, the cloud, and the deep darkness, with a great voice — and He added nothing more. He wrote them on two stone tablets and gave them to me. ²⁰When you heard the voice from the midst of the darkness — while the mountain was blazing with fire — you came near to me, all the heads of your tribes and your elders, ²¹and you said, 'Look — the LORD our God has shown us His glory and His greatness, and we have heard His voice from the midst of the fire. Today we have seen that God speaks with a human being, and that person lives! ²²So now — why should we die? This great fire will consume us! If we continue to hear the voice of the LORD our God, we will die. ²³For who among all mortals has ever heard the voice of the living God speaking from the midst of fire, as we have, and survived? ²⁴You go near and listen to everything the LORD our God says. Then tell us everything the LORD our God tells you, and we will listen and obey.' ²⁵The LORD heard the words you spoke to me, and the LORD said to me, 'I have heard the words that this people has spoken to you. Everything they have said is right. ²⁶If only they had such a heart in them — to revere Me and keep all My commandments always — so that it would go well for them and for their children forever!' ²⁷Go tell them: Return to your tents. ²⁸But you — stand here beside Me, and I will speak to you the entire commandment, the statutes and the ordinances that you shall teach them, so that they may carry them out in the land I am giving them to possess. ²⁹Take care to do as the LORD your God has commanded you. Do not turn aside to the right or to the left. ³⁰Walk in the entire way that the LORD your God has commanded you, so that you may live, so that it may go well for you, and so that you may have long life in the land you are about to possess."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses assembles the entire nation for a covenant renewal address. The three verbs — 'learn' (lemadtem), 'take care' (ushemartem), 'observe' (la'asotam) — create a progression: understanding, then vigilance, then practice. The covenant is not intuitive — it must be taught, guarded, and performed. This verse frames everything that follows: what you are about to hear, you must internalize and live.

2. Moses uses karat berit ('cut a covenant') — the standard Hebrew idiom for establishing a covenant, derived from the ancient practice of cutting animals in a ratification ceremony (see Gen 15:10-18). Deuteronomy uses 'Horeb' for the mountain Exodus calls 'Sinai' — both names refer to the same event. The first-person 'with us' (immanu) prepares for the remarkable claim in v3.
3. This is one of the most audacious claims in the Torah. The Horeb covenant was made with the previous generation — most of this audience was born afterward. Yet Moses insists: 'not with our ancestors but with us.' The covenant is not inherited history; it is present-tense obligation. Every generation stands at Sinai. The emphatic Hebrew piling — anachnu elleh poh hayyom kullanu chayyim ('we ourselves, these here, today, all of us, living') — drives the point: you, not your grandparents, are the covenant partners.
4. Panim bepanim ('face to face') — the same phrase used of Moses in Deut 34:10, but here applied to the entire nation. At Horeb, God spoke directly to the people, not only through Moses. This creates a tension with v5 (where Moses stands as mediator), which the narrative resolves by distinguishing the initial direct speech (the Ten Commandments) from subsequent legislation (mediated through Moses). The fire is both terrifying and communicative — God's voice comes from within it.
5. Moses describes his unique position: 'standing between' (omed bein) God and Israel. He is the mediator — not a barrier but a bridge. The people's fear of the fire prevented them from ascending, so Moses stood in the gap. This parenthetical establishes Moses's authority to restate the Decalogue: he was there, between God and the people, and he transmits God's exact words. The verb lehaggid ('to declare') implies faithful relay, not interpretation.
6. The preamble is identical to Exodus 20:2. Anokhi YHWH Elohekha ('I am the LORD your God') is not a commandment but the foundation on which all commandments rest. The exodus — 'who brought you out of Egypt' — is the credential. God's authority to command flows from His prior act of deliverance. 'House of slavery' (beit avadim) is the standard Deuteronomic epithet for Egypt. The entire Decalogue hangs on this verse: these are the words of a rescuer to the rescued.
7. The first commandment: exclusive allegiance. The phrase al-panay ('before My face / in My presence') can mean 'in preference to Me,' 'alongside Me,' or 'in My sight.' All three readings say the same thing: no rival deity may occupy any space that belongs to the LORD. The command does not address whether other gods exist — it addresses Israel's loyalty. This is covenant language: the vassal may serve only one sovereign.
8. The prohibition covers three cosmic domains — heaven, earth, water — encompassing everything in creation. Nothing created may represent the Creator. The word pesel ('carved image') refers to an object shaped by human hands; temunah ('form, likeness') extends the prohibition to any visual representation. The command protects God's freedom: an image fixes and limits what is infinite and free. Israel's God cannot be contained in human-made forms.
9. Two verbs — 'bow down' (hishtachaveh, prostration in worship) and 'serve' (ta'avdem, ongoing devotion) — cover both ritual and lifestyle worship of images. El qanna ('zealous/jealous God') — the same term used in Deut 6:15 — describes God's fierce, exclusive passion for Israel's loyalty. 'Visiting iniquity on children' describes the generational consequences of idolatry, not arbitrary punishment of the innocent — the social effects of covenant betrayal cascade through families.
10. The asymmetry between v9 and v10 is the theological heart of the second commandment: three-to-four generations of consequence versus thousands of generations of chesed. God's disposition tilts overwhelmingly toward steadfast love. The word chesed here is the register term — covenant loyalty, faithful love, mercy that keeps promises. Those who 'love Me and keep My commandments' describes the posture of a faithful covenant partner: love expressed through obedience.
11. The verb tissa ('take up, carry, bear') suggests not just speaking but carrying God's name — as a representative bears a sovereign's banner. Lashshav ('for emptiness, for worthlessness') goes beyond profanity to include any use of God's name that empties it of weight: false oaths, manipulative prayers, hollow invocations of divine authority. To bear God's name is to represent Him; to do so lashshav is to misrepresent Him. The warning — lo yenaqqeh ('will not hold guiltless, will not acquit') — is one of the strongest negative statements in the Decalogue.
12. Deuteronomy uses shamor ('guard, keep') where Exodus 20:8 uses zakhor ('remember'). The two are complementary: remember the Sabbath (hold it in mind) and guard it (protect its boundaries). Jewish tradition holds that both words were spoken simultaneously at Sinai — a concept captured in the Sabbath hymn Lekha Dodi. The addition 'as the LORD your God has commanded you' (ka'asher tsivvekha) — absent from Exodus 20 — reminds Israel that this is not a new command but a renewal of an existing one.
13. The six days of labor are not a concession but a command — work is expected and dignified. The Hebrew melakhah ('work, skilled labor, craft') is the same word used for the work of building the tabernacle (Exod 31:3-5) and for God's creative work in Genesis 2:2. Human labor participates in God's own pattern of purposeful creation followed by rest.
14. Deuteronomy adds a social justice clause absent from Exodus 20: 'so that your male servant and your female servant may rest just as you do' (lema'an yanuach avdekha va'amatekha kamokha). The Sabbath is not just personal piety — it is mandated rest for the most vulnerable. The word kamokha ('like you, just as you do') asserts the equal dignity of servants before God's rest. The list of those covered is comprehensive: children, servants, animals, and foreigners. No one in Israel's household may be forced to work when God has declared rest.
15. The most significant difference between Exodus 20 and Deuteronomy 5: Exodus grounds the Sabbath in creation ('in six days the LORD made heaven and earth... and rested on the seventh day'). Deuteronomy grounds it in liberation ('you were a slave in Egypt'). The two rationales are complementary, not contradictory: creation establishes the pattern; the exodus reveals the purpose. You rest because God rests — and because you know what it means to never rest. Former slaves understand the gift of Sabbath in a way the free-born never can.

16. Deuteronomy adds a second promise — 'and that it may go well for you' (ulema'an yitav lakh) — absent from Exodus 20:12. The commandment to honor (kabbed, from kavod — 'to make heavy, to give weight to') parents bridges the two halves of the Decalogue: it is both a duty toward God (who commands it) and toward other people (the parents themselves). Paul identifies this as the first commandment with a promise attached (Eph 6:2).
17. Hebrew versification combines four commandments in a single verse — each only two words in Hebrew: lo tirtsach, lo tin'af, lo tignov, lo ta'aneh. The staccato rhythm is deliberate: these are absolute prohibitions, stated without qualification or explanation. The verb ratsach ('murder') is distinct from other Hebrew killing verbs (harag, hemit, muth) — it specifically denotes unlawful killing. Deuteronomy substitutes ed shav ('worthless/vain testimony') for Exodus 20:16's ed shaqer ('false testimony') — broadening the prohibition from lying to any testimony that lacks substance or integrity.
18. Deuteronomy makes two changes from Exodus 20:17. First, it separates 'wife' (eshet re'ekha) from the property list, giving her a distinct prohibition with the verb tachamod ('covet') — while the property list uses a different verb, tit'avveh ('crave, desire'). Exodus uses tachamod for both. Second, Deuteronomy adds 'his field' (sadehu) to the property list — reflecting the agricultural reality of settled life in the land, which the Exodus version (delivered before settlement) does not address. The tenth commandment is unique: it legislates internal desire, not external action.
19. Moses emphasizes three features of the Decalogue's delivery: it was spoken to the entire assembly (not privately to Moses), it came from terrifying theophanic phenomena (fire, cloud, arafel — the same 'deep darkness' of Exod 20:21), and 'He added nothing more' (velo yasaf) — the Ten Words are complete as spoken. God then inscribed them on stone — the only part of the Torah written by God's own hand (or finger, per Exod 31:18). The two tablets are given to Moses as mediator, connecting back to v5.
20. The people's response to the theophany: they approached Moses, not God. The tribal leaders and elders came as representatives. The darkness (choshekh) and the burning mountain create an overwhelming sensory experience — hearing God's voice from impenetrable darkness while the mountain itself is on fire. The people's retreat to Moses marks the transition from direct divine speech (the Decalogue) to mediated legislation (everything after).
21. The people's awe centers on two revelations: they saw God's kavod ('glory') and godlo ('greatness'), and they heard His voice from the fire. Their astonishment is specific: 'God speaks with a human being, and that person lives' (yedabber Elohim et-ha'adam vachai). The expectation was death — to encounter God directly should be fatal. The survival itself is the miracle. The word kavod here is the register term — God's weighty, overwhelming presence made visible.
22. The people's fear is not irrational — the fire is real and enormous. Their logic is honest: we survived once, but we cannot endure more direct contact with God. The verb tokhleinu ('will consume us') treats the divine fire as a devouring force. Their request (coming in v24) is for Moses to serve as permanent mediator — to hear God's voice for them and relay His words. This is the theological origin of the prophetic office: the people's own request for mediated revelation.
23. The rhetorical question — 'who among all flesh (kol-basar) has heard the living God (Elohim chayyim) speaking from fire and lived?' — treats Israel's Sinai experience as absolutely unique in human history. The phrase Elohim chayyim ('living God') distinguishes the God of Israel from inert idols: this God speaks, acts, and is dangerously alive. The implied answer is: no one, ever. Israel's survival of direct divine encounter is unprecedented and unrepeatable.
24. The people commission Moses as permanent mediator: 'You go near... then tell us.' The final words — veshama'nu ve'asinu ('we will listen and obey') — echo the na'aseh venishma of Exodus 24:7, though in reversed order (hear then do, rather than do then hear). The people pledge obedience to mediated revelation, establishing the pattern for all subsequent prophetic communication. Moses becomes the prototype for every prophet who will follow.
25. God's response is remarkable: He approves the people's request. Hetivu kol-asher dibberu ('they have done well in all they have said') — God agrees that direct divine encounter is too much for mortal flesh and endorses the mediation model. This divine validation of human limitation is theologically significant: God accommodates human weakness not as a concession but as wisdom. The prophetic office — hearing God for the people — is God's own design, not a human invention.
26. God's lament — mi-yitten ('who will give,' an idiomatic 'if only!') — is one of the most startling verses in the Torah. God wishes for something He apparently does not compel: a heart that would consistently revere Him and obey. The implication is that obedience requires an inner transformation that the law itself cannot produce. Deuteronomy will return to this theme in 30:6 ('the LORD your God will circumcise your heart'). This verse anticipates Jeremiah's new covenant (Jer 31:33) and Ezekiel's heart of flesh (Ezek 36:26).
27. A practical command after the intense theophany: go home. The people's encounter with God at the mountain is over; normal life resumes. But 'return to your tents' also marks a transition — Moses will now remain with God to receive the rest of the Torah (v28), while the people return to ordinary life. The separation between prophet and people is formalized.
28. God addresses Moses directly: 'You — stand here beside Me.' While the people return to their tents, Moses stays in God's presence to receive the full body of legislation. The phrase poh amod immadi ('stand here beside Me') is an invitation to sustained intimacy — Moses will occupy the position between God and people that v5 described, not just temporarily but as his permanent role. Everything Moses teaches from here forward — the 'commandment, statutes, and ordinances' — is what he receives in this divine audience.
29. The command to walk straight — 'not turning right or left' (lo tasuru yamin usmol) — uses a path metaphor that runs throughout Deuteronomy. The Torah is a road; deviation in either direction leads away from God. The phrase will be repeated for Joshua (Josh 1:7) and for the future king (Deut 17:20). It implies that the covenant path is narrow and specific — not a vague disposition but a defined way of life.

30. The chapter closes with three purpose clauses: 'so that you may live' (tichyun), 'so that it may go well' (vetov lakhem), 'so that you may have long life' (veha'araktem yamim). Obedience and life are linked — not as reward but as natural consequence. The covenant path is the path of life; departure from it leads to diminishment. The phrase 'the entire way' (bekhol-hadderekh) — literally 'in all the road' — frames Torah observance as a comprehensive journey, not a checklist. The closing word — tirashu ('possess,' from yarash) — points forward to the land that awaits.

Summary: Moses delivers the Shema — 'Hear, O Israel: the LORD our God, the LORD is one' — and commands Israel to love God with all their heart, being, and strength, teaching these words to their children.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Shema (v. 4) is the most recited sentence in Jewish history, yet the Hebrew is syntactically ambiguous: 'The LORD our God, the LORD is one' or 'The LORD our God is one LORD' or 'The LORD is our God, the LORD alone.' The word echad ('one') could mean unique, unified, or alone. We preserved the traditional word order and let the ambiguity stand. The command to love God be-khol levavekha (v. 5, 'with all your heart') uses the doubled-letter form levav, which the rabbis read as 'with both your inclinations' — the good and the evil.

Translation Friction: The word me'odekha (v. 5) is notoriously hard: 'your strength,' 'your might,' 'your very much,' 'your resources.' The root me'od means 'exceedingly,' so me'odekha could mean 'your everything' — whatever you have in abundance. We rendered it 'your strength' as the most accessible English and noted the fuller range. The totafot (v. 8, 'emblems/frontlets') is of uncertain etymology — we transliterated and explained.

Connections: Jesus identifies the Shema as the greatest commandment (Mark 12:29-30, Matthew 22:37). The doorpost inscription (v. 9) becomes the mezuzah. The testing at Massah (v. 16) references Exodus 17:1-7. The catechetical dialogue (vv. 20-25) establishes the Passover Haggadah's question-and-answer format.

¹This is the commandment — the statutes and the ordinances — that the LORD your God charged me to teach you, so that you may carry them out in the land you are about to cross into and possess. ²The purpose is that you, your children, and your grandchildren will revere the LORD your God by keeping all His statutes and commandments that I am giving you, for as long as you live — and that your days may be long. ³Listen, Israel, and be careful to obey, so that it may go well for you and you may multiply greatly — as the LORD, the God of your ancestors, promised you — in a land flowing with milk and honey. ⁴Hear, O Israel: The LORD our God — the LORD is one. ⁵You shall love the LORD your God with all your heart, with all your being, and with all your strength. ⁶These words that I am commanding you today must be upon your heart. ⁷You shall repeat them constantly to your children: speak of them when you sit in your house, when you walk along the road, when you lie down, and when you rise up. ⁸Bind them as a sign on your hand, and let them serve as an emblem on your forehead. ⁹Write them on the doorposts of your house and on your gates. ¹⁰When the LORD your God brings you into the land He swore to your ancestors — to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob — to give you: large and prosperous cities that you did not build, ¹¹houses filled with every good thing that you did not fill, cisterns hewn from rock that you did not hew, vineyards and olive groves that you did not plant — and when you have eaten and are satisfied, ¹²then guard yourself carefully, or you will forget the LORD who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. ¹³The LORD your God you shall revere, Him alone you shall serve, and by His name you shall swear. ¹⁴You must not follow other gods — any of the gods of the peoples around you — ¹⁵for the LORD your God, who is present among you, is a zealous God. Otherwise the anger of the LORD your God will blaze against you, and He will wipe you from the face of the earth. ¹⁶You must not test the LORD your God as you tested Him at Massah. ¹⁷You must faithfully keep the commandments of the LORD your God — His decrees and His statutes that He has commanded you. ¹⁸Do what is right and good in the LORD's sight, so that it may go well for you and you may enter and take possession of the good land that the LORD swore to your ancestors, ¹⁹driving out all your enemies before you, just as the LORD has promised. ²⁰When your child asks you in the future, 'What are these decrees, statutes, and ordinances that the LORD our God has commanded you?' ²¹you shall tell your child, 'We were slaves to Pharaoh in Egypt, and the LORD brought us out of Egypt with a mighty hand. ²²The LORD displayed signs and wonders — great and devastating — against Egypt, against Pharaoh, and against his entire household, before our very eyes. ²³He brought us out from there in order to bring us in — to give us the land that He swore to our ancestors. ²⁴The LORD commanded us to observe all these statutes — to revere the LORD our God — for our good always, and to keep us alive, as we are today. ²⁵It will be our righteousness when we carefully observe this entire commandment before the LORD our God, just as He has commanded us."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses uses the singular hamitsvah ('the commandment') followed by the plural 'statutes and ordinances' — suggesting that everything that follows flows from a single core commandment, which the Shema (v4-5) will state. The Hebrew mishpatim is better rendered 'ordinances' or 'rules' than KJV's 'judgments,' since these are prescriptions for life, not court rulings.
2. The multigenerational chain — 'you, your son, your grandson' — is central to Deuteronomy's vision: covenant faithfulness is transmitted across generations, not merely practiced individually. The verb tira ('fear, revere') is the same yir'ah that governed the midwives in Exodus 1:17 — awe that produces obedience. The promise of long days (ya'arikhun yamekha) links obedience to life itself.
3. The verb shama ('hear, listen') appears here as a command and will return as the opening word of v4 — the Shema itself. Hearing in Hebrew is never passive; it always implies response. The phrase 'land flowing with milk and honey' (erets zavav chalah udevash) describes agricultural abundance: milk from livestock, honey from date palms (not bees, in the most likely reading). It is a promise of provision, not luxury.
4. These six words are the most important sentence in Judaism. The Hebrew syntax is deliberately ambiguous — YHWH Eloheinu YHWH echad can be parsed in multiple ways, and the tradition has preserved all of them. The word echad ('one') can mean 'one' (numerical), 'alone' (exclusive), or 'unified' (undivided). Jesus cites this verse as the greatest commandment (Mark 12:29). The rendering 'the LORD is one' preserves the ambiguity better than 'is one LORD' (which narrows the meaning to numerical oneness).
5. The command to love God is not sentimental — ahava ('you shall love') is a covenant verb. In ancient Near Eastern treaties, 'love' describes the vassal's total loyalty to the sovereign. Three dimensions of totality are named: levav (heart — the seat of will and thought, not emotion), nephesh (being, life, self — the whole person), and me'od (strength, might, abundance — everything you have). Together they leave no domain of human existence outside the scope of this command. Jesus identifies this as the greatest commandment in the Torah (Matt 22:37, Mark 12:30).
6. The instruction moves from the declaration (v4) and the command (v5) to the method of internalization: these words must be al-levavekha — literally 'upon your heart.' The words are to rest on the heart until the heart absorbs them. The emphasis on 'today' (hayyom) runs throughout Deuteronomy — the covenant is always present-tense, always being renewed in the current moment.
7. The verb shinantam (from shanan, 'to sharpen, repeat, engrave') implies intensive, repetitive teaching — not a single lesson but constant, woven-into-life instruction. The four situations (sitting, walking, lying down, rising up) form two merisms covering all of life: home and travel, rest and activity. There is no moment when these words are not relevant. This verse became the basis for reciting the Shema morning and evening in Jewish liturgy.
8. This verse has been interpreted both literally (resulting in tefillin — small leather boxes containing scripture passages worn during prayer) and metaphorically (keep God's commands constantly visible in your actions and thoughts). The Hebrew totafot ('frontlets, emblems') is an unusual word of uncertain etymology, appearing only here and in Exodus 13:16 and Deuteronomy 11:18. 'Hand' and 'forehead' represent action and thought — what you do and what you focus on.
9. The word mezuzot ('doorposts') gave its name to the mezuzah — the small case containing a scroll of Deuteronomy 6:4-9 and 11:13-21 affixed to Jewish doorframes to this day. The doorpost marks the threshold between public and private space; the gates mark the boundary of the community. God's words govern both the household and the city. The progression from v6-9 moves outward: heart (v6), speech to children (v7), body (v8), home and community (v9).
10. The danger of prosperity begins here. The covenant promise is about to be fulfilled — Israel will inherit what they did not earn. The naming of the three patriarchs anchors the land promise in covenant history stretching back to Genesis 12, 26, and 28. The list that follows (v10-11) catalogs unearned abundance: cities, houses, wells, vineyards, olive trees — all received, not produced.
11. Four gifts, each with the emphatic 'you did not': build, fill, hew, plant. The repetition makes the point unmissable — everything Israel receives in the land is grace, not achievement. The Hebrew borot chatsuvim ('hewn cisterns') refers to water storage cut into limestone, essential for survival in a land without reliable rivers. The list moves from infrastructure (cities, houses) to sustenance (water, food) — every layer of settled life is a gift.
12. Hishamer lekha ('guard yourself') — the same verb used for guarding the garden in Genesis 2:15 and for the priestly duty of guarding the sanctuary. Self-guarding is an active spiritual discipline, not passive. The danger is forgetting — shakhach, the opposite of zakhar ('remember'). In Deuteronomy, forgetting God is the primal sin, more fundamental than any specific commandment violation. 'House of slavery' (beit avadim) is Deuteronomy's standard epithet for Egypt.
13. Three verbs, each with emphatic word order (object before verb): revere, serve, swear by. The fronting of 'the LORD your God' gives it the force of 'It is the LORD — and no other — whom you shall revere.' The verb avad ('serve, worship') is the same word used for Israel's slavery in Egypt (avadim, v12) — Israel is transferred from Pharaoh's service to God's. Swearing by God's name acknowledges Him as the guarantor of truth and oaths.
14. The prohibition is geographically specific: 'the gods of the peoples around you' (elohei ha'ammim asher sevivoteikhem). The threat is not abstract polytheism but the actual religious cultures Israel will encounter in Canaan. 'Going after' other gods (halakh acharei) is covenant-betrayal language — it describes a vassal who abandons their sovereign for a rival.

15. El qanna ('jealous/zealous God') — qanna is used exclusively for God in the Hebrew Bible. It does not describe petty jealousy but the fierce, protective passion of a covenant partner who will not share loyalty with rivals. The phrase beqirbekha ('in your midst') is critical: God is not distant — He dwells among Israel, making idolatry not merely theological error but a personal offense against a present God. The consequence — destruction from the face of the ground (adamah) — echoes the Cain narrative (Gen 4:14).
16. The verb nassah ('test, try, prove') and the place name Massah ('testing') share the same root — a wordplay the Hebrew reader would hear immediately. The reference is to Exodus 17:1-7, where Israel demanded water and asked 'Is the LORD among us or not?' — testing whether God's covenant commitment was real. Moses redefines the Massah incident as a permanent prohibition: demanding that God prove Himself is itself a failure of trust.
17. The infinitive absolute construction shamor tishmerun intensifies the verb: 'you must really, truly keep.' Three categories of law are named: mitsvot ('commandments'), edot ('testimonies, decrees' — laws that witness to God's character), and chuqqim ('statutes' — prescribed regulations). The threefold classification suggests that God's law addresses every dimension of life.
18. The pair hayyashar vehatov ('the right and the good') goes beyond mere legal compliance. Yashar ('right, straight, upright') and tov ('good, beneficial') together suggest both moral integrity and active goodness. The rabbis derived from this verse the principle of lifnim mishurat hadin — going beyond the strict letter of the law to do what is genuinely good, even when not explicitly commanded.
19. The verb hadof ('drive out, thrust away') is forceful — God's action on Israel's behalf is not gentle persuasion but decisive removal. 'As the LORD has spoken' (ka'asher dibber YHWH) anchors the military promise in God's covenant word. The sentence completes v18: obedience leads to possession, and possession includes the removal of opposition.
20. The catechetical question-and-answer pattern: a child asks, a parent answers. This is one of four 'son's questions' across the Torah (see also Exodus 12:26, 13:8, 13:14), which form the basis of the four questions in the Passover Haggadah. The word machar ('tomorrow') means 'in the future' — this instruction anticipates the next generation and all generations after. Faith must be transmissible, not merely personal.
21. The answer to the child's question is not a legal explanation but a narrative — a story of rescue. 'We were slaves' (avdim hayinu) — the first-person plural is deliberate. Every generation tells the exodus story as its own experience, not as ancient history. This is the principle of liturgical identification: 'We were slaves,' not 'Our ancestors were slaves.' The 'mighty hand' (yad chazaqah) is Deuteronomy's standard phrase for God's power in the exodus (4:34, 5:15, 7:19, 26:8).
22. The adjective ra'im ('evil, harmful, devastating') applied to God's wonders is striking — the plagues were good for Israel but devastating for Egypt. The phrase le'einenu ('before our eyes') continues the liturgical first-person: every generation 'sees' the exodus through the retelling. The comprehensive targeting — Egypt, Pharaoh, his entire house — leaves no level of Egyptian power untouched.
23. The verse captures the double movement of redemption in a single sentence: hotsi ('brought out') and havi ('bring in'). Exodus is not an end in itself but a means — God rescued Israel from Egypt so that He could bring them to the promised land. The two verbs are linked by lema'an ('in order to'), making the purpose explicit. This is the exodus in miniature: out of slavery, into promise.
24. The purpose of the law is stated with startling simplicity: letov lanu ('for our good'). The commandments are not arbitrary impositions but provisions for flourishing. Two purposes are given: 'for our good always' (comprehensive well-being) and 'to keep us alive' (sheer survival). Obedience and life are linked — not as reward but as cause and effect. The Deuteronomic vision: Torah is the path to life.
25. The chapter ends where it began (v1) — with 'this commandment' (hamitsvah hazzot), singular. The Shema and all that flows from it is one unified command. Tsedaqah ('righteousness') here means 'right standing, covenant faithfulness' — obedience to the commandment constitutes Israel's righteous status before God. Paul will later cite the relationship between righteousness and obedience/faith as a central theological question (Romans 10:5-6, citing Deut 30:12-14). The closing 'as He has commanded us' circles back to the covenant framework: God commands, Israel obeys, and the result is tsedaqah.

Summary: Moses commands the total destruction of the seven Canaanite nations when Israel enters the land, forbids intermarriage, and grounds the command in Israel's identity as God's segullah — His treasured possession.

What Makes This Remarkable: The word segullah (v. 6, 'treasured possession') describes not generic favor but a specific, chosen treasure — a king's personal vault, distinct from the general treasury. God chose Israel not because they were numerous (v. 7, 'you were the fewest') but because He loved them and kept His oath. The logic is circular and intentional: God loves because He loves. No external reason is offered.

Translation Friction: The verb chashaq (v. 7, 'set His affection on') carries emotional intensity — desire, longing, attachment. We rendered it as 'set His affection on' rather than the blander 'chose' because the Hebrew insists on emotional language for God's election. The cherem command (v. 2) requires the full phrase 'devote to destruction' rather than softening — the Hebrew does not soften it.

Connections: The segullah language echoes Exodus 19:5 and recurs in Malachi 3:17. The promise to remove diseases (v. 15) reverses the Egyptian plagues. The hornet (v. 20, tsir'ah) appears also in Exodus 23:28 and Joshua 24:12. Peter applies the segullah identity to the church in 1 Peter 2:9.

¹When the LORD your God brings you into the land you are entering to take possession of, He will clear away many nations ahead of you — the Hittites, Girgashites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites — seven nations larger and more powerful than you. ²When the LORD your God hands them over to you and you defeat them, you must devote them completely to destruction. You must not make a treaty with them or show them any favor. ³You must not intermarry with them — do not give your daughters to their sons, and do not take their daughters for your sons. ⁴Because they will turn your sons away from following Me, and they will worship other gods. Then the anger of the LORD will blaze against you, and He will swiftly destroy you. ⁵Instead, this is how you must deal with them: tear down their altars, smash their sacred pillars, chop down their Asherah poles, and burn their carved idols in fire. ⁶For you are a people set apart for the LORD your God. The LORD your God has chosen you out of all the peoples on the face of the earth to be His treasured possession. ⁷It was not because you were more numerous than other peoples that the LORD set His affection on you and chose you — for you were the smallest of all peoples. ⁸Rather, it was because the LORD loves you and is keeping the oath He swore to your ancestors that He brought you out with a powerful hand and ransomed you from the slave house, from the grip of Pharaoh king of Egypt. ⁹Recognize, then, that the LORD your God — He is God, the trustworthy God who maintains faithful love with those who love Him and keep His commands, to a thousand generations. ¹⁰But He repays those who hate Him directly, to their face, by destroying them. He does not delay with anyone who hates Him — He repays each one personally. ¹¹So guard the commandment — the statutes and the regulations — that I am commanding you today, by carrying them out. ¹²As a consequence of your listening to these regulations and carefully carrying them out, the LORD your God will maintain for you the covenant and the loyal love that He swore to your ancestors. ¹³He will love you, bless you, and multiply you. He will bless the fruit of your womb and the produce of your soil — your grain, new wine, and olive oil — the calves of your herds and the lambs of your flocks, in the land that He swore to your ancestors to give you. ¹⁴You will be more blessed than any other people. There will be no infertile man or woman among you, nor barrenness among your livestock. ¹⁵The LORD will remove every illness from you. He will not inflict on you any of the terrible diseases of Egypt that you experienced, but will impose them on all who hate you. ¹⁶You must consume all the peoples that the LORD your God is handing over to you. Your eye must not show pity on them. And do not worship their gods, for that would be a trap for you. ¹⁷If you say to yourself, "These nations are more numerous than I am — how can I possibly dispossess them?" — ¹⁸Do not be afraid of them. Keep firmly in mind what the LORD your God did to Pharaoh and to all of Egypt — ¹⁹The great trials your own eyes witnessed, the signs and wonders, the powerful hand and outstretched arm by which the LORD your God brought you out — the LORD your God will do the same to all the peoples you now fear. ²⁰Beyond that, the LORD your God will send the hornet against them, until even the survivors who hide from you are wiped out. ²¹Do not be terrified by them, because the LORD your God is in your midst — a great and awesome God. ²²The LORD your God will drive out these nations ahead of you gradually, little by little. You will not be able to eliminate them all at once, or the wild animals would multiply against you. ²³The LORD your God will hand them over to you and throw them into great confusion until they are annihilated. ²⁴He will deliver their kings into your hand, and you will erase their very names from under heaven. No one will be able to stand against you until you have destroyed them. ²⁵You must burn the carved images of their gods in fire. Do not covet the silver and gold plating on them or take it for yourself, or you will be ensnared by it — for it is detestable to the LORD your God. ²⁶Do not bring any detestable thing into your house, or you yourself will become devoted to destruction just like it. You must utterly despise it and completely abhor it, because it is under the ban.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb nashal ('to strip off, drive out') portrays God peeling away the nations like bark from a tree. The catalogue of seven peoples (shiv'ah goyim) is a formulaic list representing the totality of Canaan's inhabitants. The phrase rabbim va'atsumim mimmekka ('greater and more powerful than you') underscores that Israel's success will not rest on military superiority but on divine action.
2. The infinitive absolute hacharem tacharim ('devoting you shall devote') intensifies the command for total destruction — the cherem, a holy war dedication to God. The prohibition lo tikhrot lahem berit ('you shall not cut a covenant with them') and lo techannem ('you shall not show them favor') create a threefold boundary: military, diplomatic, and emotional. The verb chanan may also carry the sense 'give them a foothold' (from chen, 'camp'), adding territorial exclusion to the prohibition.
3. The verb titchatten ('to become a son-in-law, form marriage alliance') is a hitpael reflexive, signaling a reciprocal binding relationship. Marriage alliances in the ancient Near East functioned as political treaties, binding families and their gods. The prohibition is structured chiasmatically — daughter to his son / his daughter to your son — covering both directions of intermarriage and closing every avenue of assimilation.
4. Moses abruptly speaks in God's first person — me'acharai ('from after Me') — a jarring shift that underscores the personal nature of the betrayal. The verb yasir ('turn aside') paired with ve'avdu ('and they will serve') reveals intermarriage as a gateway to idolatry. The phrase vecharah af-YHWH ('the anger of the LORD will burn') uses the fire metaphor for divine wrath, and maher ('quickly, suddenly') warns that judgment will be swift.
5. Four distinct cult objects receive four distinct destructions: mizbechoteihem titotsu ('their altars you shall tear down'), matsevatam teshabberu ('their pillars you shall shatter'), asheireihem tegadde'un ('their Asherah-poles you shall cut down'), and pesileihem tisrefu ba'esh ('their carved images you shall burn in fire'). Each verb matches its object — stone altars are demolished, standing stones shattered, wooden poles hewn, and carved idols consumed. The comprehensiveness eliminates any possibility of repurposing Canaanite worship infrastructure.
6. Two foundational terms define Israel's identity: am qadosh ('holy people' — set apart, consecrated, belonging exclusively to God) and am segullah ('treasured people'). Segullah is a royal term — in Akkadian, sikiltum refers to a king's private treasure, personal property held apart from the general treasury. Israel is not merely God's subjects but His personal, prized possession. The verb bachar ('chose') emphasizes divine initiative — election originates in God's will, not Israel's merit.
7. The verb chashaq ('to be attached to, desire, set one's affection on') conveys intense emotional attachment, even romantic longing (cf. Genesis 34:8). God's election of Israel is not administrative but passionate. The reason given is counter-intuitive: ki-attem hame'at mikkol-ha'ammim ('because you were the fewest of all the peoples'). Israel's smallness, far from disqualifying them, highlights that divine choice rests on grace alone, not on demographic or strategic advantage.
8. Two motivations drive the exodus: me'ahavat YHWH ('from the LORD's love') and umishamro et-hashvu'ah ('from His keeping the oath'). Love and covenant faithfulness are the twin engines of redemption. The verb padah ('ransom, redeem') specifically denotes liberation by payment of a price — Israel was purchased out of slavery. The phrase mibbeit avadim ('from the house of slaves') recurs as a liturgical anchor throughout Deuteronomy, keeping the memory of bondage alive.
9. The title ha'El hanne'eman ('the trustworthy God') uses ne'eman from the root aman ('to be firm, reliable') — the same root as 'amen.' God's faithfulness is structural, not sentimental. The phrase shomer habberit vehacheshed ('keeper of covenant and loyal love') pairs berit (covenant obligation) with chesed (loyal, steadfast love that exceeds mere obligation). The scope — le'elef dor ('to a thousand generations') — is not literal arithmetic but a declaration of permanence: God's covenant loyalty far outlasts human rebellion.
10. The phrase el-panav ('to his face') appears twice, stressing that divine retribution is direct and personal — not delegated or delayed. The verb meshallem ('repays') frames judgment as reciprocal justice: hatred toward God earns a proportional response. The emphatic lo ye'acher ('He will not delay') counters any presumption that silence equals tolerance. The contrast with verse 9 (a thousand generations of loyalty) against immediate repayment for hatred shows the asymmetry of God's justice: mercy is vast, judgment is swift.
11. The singular hammitsvah ('the commandment') followed by plural chuqqim ('statutes') and mishpatim ('regulations') suggests that the many laws form one unified directive. The verb shamarta ('you shall guard') implies watchful protection, not mere obedience — treat the law as something precious to be preserved. The phrase la'asotam ('to do them') grounds the guarding in action: obedience is not contemplative but practical.
12. The word eqev ('consequence, because, heel') opens a conditional promise. Some scholars link it to the 'heel' (aqev), suggesting something trodden underfoot — even the smallest, most overlooked regulations matter. The threefold response — tishme'un ('you will listen'), ushmartem ('and guard'), va'asitem ('and do') — mirrors the threefold law categories of verse 11. God's reciprocity is remarkable: veshamar YHWH ('the LORD will guard') uses the same verb for God's faithfulness that was demanded of Israel. As you guard, so He guards.
13. The rapid-fire verbs — va'ahavkha ('He will love you'), uverakhekha ('bless you'), vehרבekha ('multiply you') — cascade as covenant rewards. The blessings span human fertility (peri vitnekha, 'fruit of your womb'), agriculture (peri admatekha, 'produce of your soil'), and animal husbandry. The rare terms shegar alafekha ('increase of your cattle') and ashtarot tsonekha ('offspring of your flocks') may carry overtones reclaimed from Canaanite fertility religion — true abundance comes from YHWH, not from Baal or Ashtoreth.
14. The blessing barukh tihyeh mikkol-ha'ammim ('blessed you will be above all peoples') positions Israel at the apex of human flourishing. The specific elimination of infertility — aqar va'aqarah ('barren male and barren female') — addresses one of the ancient world's deepest anxieties. Extending this promise to livestock (ubivhemtekha) links human and agricultural prosperity as a unified covenant blessing.

15. The verb hesir ('remove, turn aside') presents God as physician who strips away disease. The phrase madwei mitsrayim hara'im ('the terrible diseases of Egypt') likely refers both to epidemics witnessed during the plagues and to endemic illnesses known in the Nile region. The word yadata ('you knew/experienced') is experiential — these were diseases they personally witnessed. The redirection of plague onto enemies (unatanam bekhol-son'ekha) reverses the exodus pattern: Israel's former afflictions become weapons against their adversaries.
16. The verb akhal ('devour, consume') is a metaphor for military conquest — Israel swallows up the nations as fire consumes fuel. The command lo-tachos einekha ('your eye must not show pity') addresses the natural human instinct toward compassion, which in this context would lead to compromise and idolatry. The final clause — ki moqesh hu lakh ('for it is a snare to you') — uses moqesh, a hunter's trap, to describe idol worship: what appears harmless ensnares fatally.
17. Moses anticipates the internal dialogue of fear: tomar bilvavekha ('you will say in your heart') identifies the battlefield as psychological, not just military. The question eikhah ukhal lehorisham ('how can I dispossess them?') echoes the panic of the spies at Kadesh-barnea (Numbers 13:31). The verb horish ('dispossess, drive out') frames conquest as displacement, not annihilation — taking their place in the land.
18. The infinitive absolute zakhor tizkor ('remembering you shall remember') intensifies the command to remember. Memory is the antidote to fear: what God accomplished against the world's superpower (Pharaoh and all of Egypt) proves He can handle the Canaanite nations. The exodus functions as Israel's standing proof of divine capability — every future challenge is measured against that definitive act of liberation.
19. The hammassot haggdolat ('the great trials/tests') may refer to the plagues as tests of both Egypt and Israel's faith. The fourfold description — otot ('signs'), mofetim ('wonders'), yad chazaqah ('strong hand'), zero'a netuyah ('outstretched arm') — is a standard Deuteronomic formula for the exodus. The climactic promise ken-ya'aseh ('so He will do') transforms history into prophecy: the same divine power that broke Egypt will break Canaan.
20. The tsirah ('hornet') may be literal (swarms driving out inhabitants), metaphorical (divine terror), or a reference to Egypt whose hieroglyphic symbol was a bee/hornet. The phrase hannish'arim vehannistarim ('those remaining and those hiding') covers both open resisters and guerrilla holdouts — no one escapes divine pursuit. God's campaign is comprehensive: military defeat, psychological terror, and ecological warfare all serve the conquest.
21. The verb ta'arots ('be terrified, shudder') describes visceral, paralyzing fear. The antidote is not courage but presence: YHWH Elohekha beqirbekha ('the LORD your God is in your midst'). The divine titles El gadol venora ('a great and awesome God') redirect the terror — the One who inspires true awe is not the enemy but Israel's own God dwelling among them.
22. The phrase me'at me'at ('little by little') reveals a surprising strategy: conquest will be incremental, not instantaneous. The practical reason — pen-tirbeh alekha chayyat hasadeh ('lest the wild animals multiply against you') — shows that depopulated land quickly becomes wilderness. God's pace is ecological wisdom: Israel must grow into the land as it empties, maintaining the infrastructure of civilization. The gradual process also extends the period of faith-dependence.
23. The verb hamam ('throw into confusion, panic, rout') is the same word used for God's disruption of the Egyptian army at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:24). The cognate accusative mehumah gedolah ('a great confusion') intensifies the panic to total disorientation — enemies who cannot think clearly cannot fight effectively. The pattern repeats: what God did to Egypt, He will do to Canaan.
24. Delivering kings into Israel's hand (natan malkeihem beyadekha) represents complete political collapse — when a king falls, his kingdom falls with him. The phrase veha'avadta et-shemam mittachat hashamayim ('you will destroy their name from under heaven') goes beyond military defeat to cultural erasure — their memory will be obliterated. The absolute claim lo-yityatsev ish befanekha ('no one will stand before you') is a divine guarantee of invincibility conditioned on obedience.
25. The prohibition shifts from military to economic: lo-tachamod kesef vezahav aleihem ('do not covet the silver and gold on them') uses the same verb as the tenth commandment (tachamod, 'covet'). Greed provides a backdoor for idolatry — keeping the precious metals from idols brings the idol's contamination into Israel's economy. The word to'avat YHWH ('an abomination to the LORD') marks this as categorically repulsive to God, not merely prohibited. The warning pen tivvaqesh bo ('lest you be ensnared by it') echoes the moqesh ('trap') of verse 16.
26. The contagion principle is stark: bringing a to'evah ('detestable thing') into your home makes vehayita cherem kamohu ('you will become cherem like it') — the ban is infectious. Contact with devoted objects places the person under the same sentence of destruction. The twin infinitive absolutes shaqets teshaqtsennu ('despising you shall despise it') and ta'ev teta'avennu ('abhorring you shall abhor it') demand visceral revulsion, not mere avoidance. The chapter ends where it began — with cherem — framing all of chapter 7 as a meditation on radical separation.

Summary: Moses warns Israel not to forget God after entering the good land — remembering the wilderness hunger, the manna, and the discipline that taught them to depend on God's word.

What Makes This Remarkable: Verse 3 is the chapter's theological center: 'man does not live by bread alone, but by everything that comes from the mouth of the LORD.' The manna lesson was not about food but about trust — God made them hungry first, then fed them something they did not know, to teach that divine speech sustains life more fundamentally than grain. The seven species of the land (v. 8) — wheat, barley, grape, fig, pomegranate, olive, honey — remain the agricultural identity of Israel to this day.

Translation Friction: The phrase motsa fi-YHWH (v. 3, 'what comes from the mouth of the LORD') encompasses commandments, promises, and creative speech — 'word' is too narrow. We rendered it as 'everything that comes from the mouth of the LORD' to capture the breadth. The verb yasar (v. 5, 'disciplines') carries parental connotation — God is not punishing but training, as the father-son metaphor makes explicit.

Connections: Jesus quotes verse 3 in His wilderness temptation (Matthew 4:4, Luke 4:4). The seven species (v. 8) appear across agricultural laws (Leviticus 23, Numbers 18). The warning against 'my power and my hand's strength made me this wealth' (v. 17) anticipates the prophetic critique in Hosea 2:8 and Ezekiel 28:4-5.

¹Every commandment that I am giving you today you must carefully carry out, so that you may live, increase, and enter to take possession of the land that the LORD swore to your ancestors. ²Remember the entire journey that the LORD your God led you on these forty years through the wilderness — to humble you, to test you, and to discover what was in your heart: whether you would keep His commands or not. ³He humbled you and let you go hungry, then fed you with manna — something neither you nor your ancestors had ever encountered — to teach you that a human being does not survive on food alone but on everything that comes from the mouth of the LORD. ⁴Your clothing did not wear out on you, and your feet did not swell during these forty years. ⁵Know deep in your heart that just as a father disciplines his son, the LORD your God has been disciplining you. ⁶So keep the commands of the LORD your God by walking in His ways and holding Him in reverent awe. ⁷For the LORD your God is bringing you into a good land — a land of flowing streams, springs, and underground waters bursting out in valleys and hills, ⁸A land of wheat and barley, grapevines, fig trees, and pomegranates — a land of olive oil and date honey, ⁹A land where you will eat food without any shortage — you will lack nothing in it. A land whose rocks contain iron and from whose hills you can mine copper. ¹⁰When you have eaten and are satisfied, you must bless the LORD your God for the good land He has given you. ¹¹Be careful not to forget the LORD your God by failing to keep His commands, His regulations, and His statutes that I am giving you today. ¹²When you have eaten and are satisfied, and have built fine houses and settled in them, ¹³And when your cattle and flocks have increased, your silver and gold have accumulated, and everything you own has multiplied — ¹⁴Then your heart will become arrogant and you will forget the LORD your God who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the slave house — ¹⁵The One who led you through that vast and terrifying wilderness — with its venomous snakes, scorpions, and parched ground where there was no water — who brought water for you out of solid rock, ¹⁶The One who fed you manna in the wilderness, something your ancestors never knew — in order to humble you and test you, so that ultimately He could do good for you. ¹⁷And you say to yourself, 'My own strength and the power of my own hands produced this wealth for me' — ¹⁸Instead, remember the LORD your God, because it is He who gives you the ability to produce wealth — in order to uphold His covenant that He swore to your ancestors, as it stands today. ¹⁹But if you do forget the LORD your God entirely and go after other gods, serving and bowing down to them — I solemnly warn you today that you will certainly be destroyed. ²⁰Like the nations that the LORD is destroying ahead of you, so will you yourselves perish — because you would not listen to the voice of the LORD your God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The singular kol-hamitsvah ('every commandment' — the whole commandment as a unity) gives way to the plural tishmerun ('you all shall guard'), addressing the collective nation. The purpose chain — lema'an tichyun urevitem uva'tem virishtem ('so that you may live, multiply, enter, and possess') — lays out four sequential outcomes of obedience. Life itself depends on obedience; the promised land is not an unconditional gift but a covenant outcome.
2. The command vezakharta ('and you shall remember') opens the chapter's central theme: memory as spiritual discipline. Three divine purposes for the wilderness are listed: lema'an annotekha ('to humble you'), lenassotekha ('to test you'), and lada'at ('to know'). The verb anan ('to humble, afflict') implies deprivation that reveals dependency. The verb nasah ('to test, prove') frames the wilderness as a crucible. God's 'knowing' (lada'at) is not acquiring information but exposing character — the wilderness strips away pretense.
3. The sequence is pedagogical: vay'annekha ('He humbled you'), vayar'ivekha ('He let you go hungry'), vaya'akhilka et-hamman ('He fed you the manna'). God created the problem (hunger) and the unprecedented solution (manna) to teach a lesson about dependence. The manna was asher lo-yadata velo yade'un avotekha ('which you did not know and your ancestors did not know') — completely outside human experience or tradition. The climactic principle lo al-hallechem levaddo yichyeh ha'adam ki al-kol-motsa fi-YHWH ('not on bread alone does a person live but on everything proceeding from the LORD's mouth') redefines sustenance: life comes from God's word, not from grain.
4. Two mundane miracles demonstrate God's comprehensive care: simlatkha lo valetah ('your garment did not wear out') and raglekha lo batseqah ('your foot did not swell'). Forty years of desert walking should have destroyed both fabric and flesh. The verb batseqah ('swell') suggests the swelling from long marches on harsh terrain. These quiet, daily miracles are easily overlooked — precisely the kind of provision that prosperity might cause Israel to forget.
5. The phrase veyadata im-levavekha ('know with your heart') demands not intellectual acknowledgment but deep internal conviction. The father-son analogy — ka'asher yeyasser ish et-beno ('as a man disciplines his son') — reframes the wilderness hardships as parental love, not punishment. The verb yassar ('discipline, instruct, correct') carries both correction and education; the wilderness was school, not prison. This is the theological lens for interpreting suffering: it reveals a Father's purpose, not an enemy's cruelty.
6. The conclusion veshamarta ('so guard') flows from the father-son analogy: a well-disciplined child walks in the parent's path. The phrase lalekhet bidrakhav ('to walk in His ways') presents obedience as a journey, not a static achievement. The verb leyir'ah ('to fear, revere') is not terror but reverential awe — the posture of a son who knows his father's power and love simultaneously.
7. The description of the promised land begins with water — the most precious resource for a people emerging from desert wandering. Three water sources are named: nachalei mayim ('flowing streams'), ayannot ('springs'), and tehomot ('deep underground waters'). The verb yots'im ('going out, bursting forth') presents water as actively emerging from the landscape — baviq'ah uvahar ('in the valley and in the hill') — covering both lowland and highland. After forty years of miraculous water from rock, the land itself will provide naturally.
8. The seven species (shiv'at haminim) define the agricultural identity of the promised land: chittah ('wheat'), se'orah ('barley'), gefen ('grapevine'), te'enah ('fig tree'), rimmon ('pomegranate'), zeit shemen ('oil olive'), and devash ('honey' — likely date syrup rather than bee honey). These seven became the basis of the land's economy and ritual offerings. They represent comprehensive agricultural abundance: grain staples, fruit trees, oil, and sweetener.
9. The phrase lo vemiskhenut tokhal-bah lechem ('not in poverty will you eat bread in it') contrasts sharply with the wilderness deprivation. The absolute statement lo-tehsar kol bah ('you will not lack anything in it') promises total sufficiency. The mineral wealth — avaneih varzel ('its stones are iron') and umeharareih tachto nechoshet ('from its hills you will quarry copper') — extends beyond agriculture to industrial capacity. Archaeological evidence confirms copper mining in the Arabah region.
10. The sequence ve'akhalta vesava'ta uverakhta ('you will eat, be satisfied, and bless') is the scriptural basis for the Jewish practice of birkat hamazon (grace after meals). Satisfaction (sava') is positioned between consumption and worship — the full stomach should trigger gratitude, not complacency. The command to bless God al-ha'arets hattovah ('for the good land') anchors thanksgiving in the specific gift of the land, preventing abstracted or generic praise.
11. The warning hishamer lekha ('guard yourself') marks a pivotal shift from promise to peril. Forgetting God (pen-tishkach) is not absent-mindedness but practical neglect: it manifests as levilti shemor ('not keeping') His laws. Moses identifies the mechanism of apostasy: it begins not with active rebellion but with passive forgetting. Prosperity is the danger zone — the following verses trace the path from satisfaction to self-sufficiency to forgetting God.
12. The progression of prosperity begins: pen-tokhal vesava'ta ('lest you eat and be satisfied') — the very satisfaction commanded in verse 10 now becomes a danger. The phrase uvattim tovim tivneh veyashavta ('and good houses you will build and dwell in') moves from sustenance to shelter. After manna and tents, permanent houses represent the ultimate transition from wandering to settlement. Each blessing carries the seed of temptation to self-reliance.
13. The threefold repetition of the root ravah ('to multiply, increase') — yirbyun, yirbeh-llakh, yirbeh — creates a crescendo of accumulation: livestock, precious metals, and finally kol asher-lekha ('everything belonging to you'). The word order mirrors the progression of wealth: from pastoral (herds and flocks) to monetary (silver and gold) to total assets. This is the exact scenario that breeds amnesia about God.

14. The verb ram ('to be high, exalted') applied to the heart (veram levavekha) means arrogance — a heart that elevates itself above its actual station. Pride is the hinge between prosperity and apostasy: a lifted heart forgets its former lowliness. The exodus reminder — hammotsi'akha me'erets mitsrayim mibbeit avadim ('the one who brought you out from the land of Egypt, from the house of slaves') — is a shock therapy for arrogance: you were slaves. Everything you have is rescue, not achievement.
15. The wilderness is described as haggadol vehanora ('the great and terrifying') — a place of primal danger. Three specific threats are catalogued: nachash saraf ('fiery serpent' — the burning-bite snake), aqrav ('scorpion'), and tsimma'on ('drought, thirst'). Against these mortal dangers, God provided water from tsur hachallamish ('the rock of flint') — the hardest, most unpromising stone. The contrast between absolute desolation and miraculous provision is the core argument against self-reliance.
16. The manna returns as evidence of divine care: hamma'akhilkha man ('the One feeding you manna'). The double purpose — lema'an annotekha ulema'an nassotekha ('to humble you and to test you') — reveals that hardship and provision were simultaneous. The final phrase leheitvekha be'acharitekha ('to do you good at your end/future') provides the theological key: all wilderness discipline was prospective, aimed at a future flourishing. Present suffering serves future blessing — the entire wilderness was not detour but preparation.
17. Moses quotes the internal monologue of arrogance: ve'amarta bilvavekha ('you will say in your heart'). The twin boasts — kochi ('my strength') and otsem yadi ('the might of my hand') — claim personal credit for covenant blessings. The word chayil ('wealth, strength, power, army') covers all forms of success. This verse captures the theology of self-made prosperity — the most dangerous heresy in a land of abundance, because it sounds reasonable.
18. The corrective is not 'you did nothing' but 'He gave you the capacity': hu hanoten lekha koach la'asot chayil ('He is the one giving you strength to produce wealth'). Human effort is real but derivative — the power behind it is God's gift. The ultimate purpose of wealth is covenantal: lema'an haqim et-berito ('in order to establish His covenant'). Prosperity is not an end in itself but evidence that God is keeping His ancestral promises. Wealth rightly understood is a covenant sign, not a personal achievement.
19. The infinitive absolute shakhoach tishkach ('forgetting you will forget') intensifies the warning: this is not momentary lapse but total amnesia. The progression — vehalakhta acharei elohim acherim ('you will walk after other gods'), va'avadtam ('and serve them'), vehishtachavita lahem ('and bow down to them') — traces the path from distraction to devotion to worship. Moses's response is judicial: ha'idoti vakhem ('I testify against you') — he becomes a witness in a future covenant lawsuit. The final infinitive absolute avod tovedu ('perishing you will perish') matches the intensity of the forgetting: total forgetting leads to total destruction.
20. The chapter's devastating conclusion draws a direct parallel: kaggoyim asher YHWH ma'avid mippeneikhem ken tovedu ('like the nations the LORD is destroying before you, so you will perish'). Election provides no exemption from judgment — Israel under covenant disobedience faces the identical fate as the Canaanites. The word egev ('because, on account of') — the same word that opened verse 12 with promise — now introduces the cause of destruction: lo tishme'un beqol YHWH ('you will not listen to the voice of the LORD'). The chapter comes full circle: listening brings life (v 1), not listening brings the same annihilation God visits on the nations.

Summary: Moses dismantles any illusion that Israel deserves the land — they are not entering because of their righteousness but because of the nations' wickedness and God's promise. He recounts the golden calf disaster as proof.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The phrase am qesheh-oref ('stiff-necked people,' v. 6) is repeated three times in this chapter. Moses does not flatter the audience. The golden calf account (vv. 8-21) retells Exodus 32 as a direct address: 'you provoked the LORD to anger.' Moses's forty-day intercession (v. 18) — lying prostrate, not eating or drinking — is presented as the only reason Israel survived its own rebellion.*

Translation Friction: *The verb hashchit (v. 12, 'acted corruptly') is the same verb used for the generation of the flood (Genesis 6:12). We preserved the exact parallel. The phrase etsba Elohim (v. 10, 'finger of God') echoes Exodus 8:19 and 31:18 — God's direct, unmediated action. The 'finger' anthropomorphism resists literalism and metaphor equally.*

Connections: The golden calf narrative parallels Exodus 32 with Deuteronomic emphasis on Moses's mediation. The 'stiff-necked' accusation echoes Exodus 33:3-5. Moses's intercessory posture anticipates his role as paradigm for prophetic intercession (Jeremiah 15:1, Psalm 106:23). The destruction of the calf (v. 21) matches Exodus 32:20 detail for detail.

¶Listen, Israel! You are about to cross the Jordan today to dispossess nations larger and more powerful than you, with cities that are huge and fortified to the sky. ¶A people tall and powerful — the descendants of the Anakim, whom you know about and have heard it said: 'Who can stand up against the sons of Anak?' ³Recognize today that the LORD your God is the One crossing over ahead of you as a consuming fire. He will destroy them and He will subdue them before you, so that you can drive them out and annihilate them quickly, just as the LORD promised you. ⁴Do not say to yourself after the LORD your God has driven them out ahead of you, 'It is because of my righteousness that the LORD brought me in to possess this land.' Rather, it is because of the wickedness of these nations that the LORD is driving them out before you. ⁵It is not because of your righteousness or the integrity of your heart that you are going in to possess their land. Rather, it is because of the wickedness of these nations that the LORD your God is driving them out ahead of you, and in order to fulfill the promise that the LORD swore to your ancestors — to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. ⁶Understand clearly: it is not because of your righteousness that the LORD your God is giving you this good land to possess — for you are a stubborn people. ⁷Remember — do not forget — how you provoked the LORD your God to fury in the wilderness. From the day you left the land of Egypt until your arrival at this place, you have been in rebellion against the LORD. ⁸Even at Horeb you provoked the LORD to such fury that He was ready to destroy you. ⁹When I went up the mountain to receive the stone tablets — the tablets of the covenant that the LORD had made with you — I stayed on the mountain forty days and forty nights, eating no food and drinking no water. ¹⁰The LORD gave me the two stone tablets inscribed by the finger of God, and on them were all the words that the LORD had spoken to you on the mountain from within the fire on the day of the assembly. ¹¹At the end of the forty days and forty nights, the LORD gave me the two stone tablets — the covenant tablets. ¹²Then the LORD said to me, 'Get up! Go down from here quickly, because your people whom you brought out of Egypt have acted corruptly. They have already turned aside from the path I commanded them and have made themselves a cast idol.' ¹³The LORD also said to me, 'I have observed this people, and they are indeed a stubborn people. ¹⁴Leave Me alone so I can destroy them and erase their name from under heaven. Then I will make you into a nation more powerful and numerous than they are.' ¹⁵I turned and came down from the mountain while the mountain was ablaze with fire, carrying the two covenant tablets in my hands. ¹⁶I looked, and there it was — you had sinned against the LORD your God by making yourselves a cast metal calf. You had already turned aside from the path that the LORD had commanded you. ¹⁷I seized the two tablets and hurled them from my hands, smashing them before your eyes. ¹⁸Then I threw myself down before the LORD as before — forty days and forty nights without eating food or drinking water — because of all your sin in doing what was evil in the LORD's sight and provoking Him. ¹⁹For I was terrified of the fierce anger and burning wrath that the LORD had directed at you — enough to destroy you. But the LORD listened to me that time as well. ²⁰The LORD was also furious enough with Aaron to destroy him, so I prayed for Aaron too at that time. ²¹I took that sinful thing you had made — the calf — and burned it in fire, then crushed it and ground it thoroughly until it was fine as dust, and threw the dust into the stream flowing down from the mountain. ²²At Taberah, at Massah, and at Kibroth-hattaavah, you kept provoking the LORD to fury. ²³And when the LORD sent you from Kadesh-barnea, saying, 'Go up and take possession of the land I have given you,' you defied the command of the LORD your God — you did not trust Him and would not listen to His voice. ²⁴You have been in rebellion against the LORD from the day I first knew you. ²⁵So I threw myself down before the LORD for those forty days and forty nights that I lay prostrate, because the LORD had declared He would destroy you. ²⁶I prayed to the LORD and said, 'Sovereign LORD, do not destroy Your people, Your own inheritance, whom You ransomed through Your greatness and brought out of Egypt with a powerful hand. ²⁷Remember Your servants Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob. Do not focus on the stubbornness of this people, or on their wickedness and sin. ²⁸Otherwise the people in the land from which You brought us will say, "Because the LORD was unable to bring them into the land He promised them, and because He hated them, He brought them out to kill them in the wilderness." ²⁹Yet they are Your people and Your inheritance, whom You brought out by Your great power and Your outstretched arm.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The call shema Yisra'el ('Listen, Israel!') echoes the Shema of 6:4 but here introduces a military briefing. The phrase atah over hayyom et-haYarden ('you are crossing the Jordan today') uses 'today' rhetorically — the crossing is imminent, not literally that day. The description of the enemies — goyim gedolim va'atsumim mimmekha ('nations greater and mightier than you') — and their cities — uvtsurot bashamayim ('fortified to the heavens') — is deliberately intimidating. Moses heightens the impossibility to set up God as the decisive factor.

2. The Anakim (benei Anaqim) were legendary giants whose reputation terrified the original spies (Numbers 13:28, 33). Moses quotes the popular saying mi yityatsev lifnei benei Anaq ('who can stand before the sons of Anak?') — a rhetorical question expecting the answer 'no one.' The verbs yadata ('you know') and shamata ('you have heard') acknowledge that the fear is based on real intelligence, not rumor. Moses does not deny the threat; he redirects the response from fear to faith.
3. The emphatic triple hu ('He... He... He') drives the point home: YHWH Elohekha hu-ha' over lefanekha ('the LORD your God — He is the one crossing before you'). God goes first. The title esh okhlah ('consuming fire') — drawn from the Sinai theophany (4:24) — transforms the terrifying God of the mountain into a weapon deployed on Israel's behalf. Two verbs describe God's work (yashmid, 'destroy'; yakhni'em, 'subdue'), then two describe Israel's role (vehorashtam, 'dispossess'; veha'avadtam, 'annihilate'). God breaks the enemy; Israel occupies the result.
4. Moses preemptively dismantles theological self-congratulation: al-tomar bilvavekha ('do not say in your heart'). The false conclusion — betsidqati hevi'ani YHWH ('because of my righteousness the LORD brought me in') — confuses consequence with cause. Israel's entry is real but the reason is uvrishah'at haggoyim ha'ellesh ('because of the wickedness of these nations'). The nations' sin, not Israel's virtue, is the operative factor. This verse begins the chapter's sustained assault on Israel's moral self-assessment.
5. Moses doubles down with expanded negation: lo betsidqatekha uveyosher levavekha ('not because of your righteousness or the uprightness of your heart'). Two positive attributes are denied as causes. The true causes are restated: the nations' wickedness (rishah'at haggoyim) and God's oath-keeping (ulema'an haqim et-haddavar asher nishba). The patriarchal names — le'Avraham leYitschaq ule'Ya'aqov — anchor the promise in irrevocable history. Israel enters the land not as righteous conquerors but as recipients of ancestral grace.
6. The third repetition of lo betsidqatekha ('not because of your righteousness') hammers the point beyond misunderstanding. The reason is now given from Israel's side: ki am-qesheh-oref attah ('because you are a stiff-necked people'). The metaphor qesheh-oref ('hard of neck') comes from oxen that refuse the yoke — they stiffen their necks against the driver's direction. Israel is not merely undeserving; they are actively resistant. This devastating self-assessment introduces the historical evidence that follows.
7. The double command zekhor al-tishkach ('remember — do not forget') creates an imperative wall against amnesia. The verb hiqtsafta ('you provoked to wrath') uses the hiphil — Israel caused God's anger. The temporal scope is devastating: lemin-hayyom asher-yatsata me'erets mitsrayim ad-bo'akhem ad-hamaqom hazzeh ('from the day you left Egypt until you arrived at this place') — rebellion was not occasional but continuous. The participle mamrim ('rebellious ones') characterizes their identity: rebellion was not what they did but who they were.
8. The specific citation uveChorev ('and at Horeb/Sinai') is devastating because Horeb was the place of covenant — rebellion occurred at the very site of commitment. The verb vayit'annaf ('He became furious') is an intensified form of anger. The infinitive lehashsid etkhem ('to destroy you') reveals how close Israel came to annihilation. At the very mountain where they received the covenant, they provoked the covenant God to the point of dissolution.
9. Moses shifts to first-person memoir: ba'aloti haharah ('when I went up the mountain'). The tablets are identified as luchot ha'avanim luchot habberit ('stone tablets, covenant tablets') — their material and theological identity. The forty-day fast — lechem lo akhalti umayim lo shatiti ('bread I did not eat and water I did not drink') — echoes the wilderness deprivation of chapter 8 but now applied to Moses personally. His sustained divine encounter required complete abstention from natural sustenance.
10. The phrase ketuvim be'etsba Elohim ('written by the finger of God') is one of Scripture's most striking anthropomorphisms — God personally inscribed the tablets without human mediation. The content is identified as kekhol-haddevarim asher dibber YHWH ('according to all the words the LORD spoke') — the tablets captured the Sinai speech in permanent form. The phrase beyom haqqahal ('on the day of the assembly') establishes the corporate, public nature of the revelation — these were not private communications to Moses but words spoken to the gathered nation.
11. The phrase miqqets arba'im yom ve'arba'im lailah ('at the end of forty days and forty nights') marks the completion of Moses's mountaintop fast. The tablets are again called luchot habberit ('covenant tablets'), reinforcing that these are legal documents of a treaty between God and Israel. The repetition of the delivery moment builds suspense: the reader knows what awaits below — the golden calf. The solemnity of the divine gift is about to collide with human betrayal.
12. God's command is urgent: qum red maher mizzeh ('get up, go down quickly from here'). The devastating phrase ammekha asher hotseta mimmitsrayim ('your people whom you brought out of Egypt') disowns Israel — God calls them 'your people,' attributing them to Moses. The verb shichet ('has acted corruptly') indicates total moral corruption. The word maher ('quickly') stings — they turned aside saru maher ('quickly') from the very path just established. The massekchah ('cast/molten image') is the golden calf, identified as the specific corruption.
13. God's verdict — ra'iti et-ha'am hazzeh ('I have seen this people') — uses the perfective: this is not first observation but confirmed judgment. The assessment wehinneh am-qesheh-oref hu ('and behold, a stiff-necked people it is') echoes Moses's earlier label (v 6) but now from God's own mouth. The demonstrative hazzeh ('this') distances God from the people — they are 'this people,' not 'My people.' The assessment is clinical and devastating.
14. The command heref mimmeni ('let go of Me, leave Me alone') is extraordinary — it implies Moses is already interceding, holding God back. God proposes total annihilation: ve'ashmidem ('I will destroy them'), ve'emcheh et-shemam ('I will wipe out their name'). The offer to Moses — ve'e'eseh otkha legoy-atsum varav mimmenu ('I will make you into a greater and more numerous nation') — recapitulates the Abrahamic promise redirected through Moses alone. This is the ultimate test of Moses's character: personal dynasty or intercessory faithfulness.
15. The scene is cinematic: va'efer va'ered min-hahar ('I turned and descended from the mountain'). The detail vehahar bo'er ba'esh ('and the mountain was burning with fire') sustains the Sinai theophany as backdrop — the fire of God's presence still blazes while below, the people have already abandoned Him. Moses carries the covenant tablets ush'nei luchot habberit al shtei yadai ('the two covenant tablets in my two hands') — the document of the treaty about to be shattered by the treaty-breaking party.

16. Moses's eyewitness account — va'ereh ('and I saw') — makes the betrayal personal. The phrase wehinneh chatattem ('and behold, you had sinned') uses hinneh for dramatic shock: the scene was worse than he imagined. The egel massekhah ('cast metal calf') was a molten idol, likely modeled on Egyptian or Canaanite bull iconography. The repeated phrase sartem maher ('you had turned aside quickly') stresses the speed of the apostasy — the ink on the covenant was barely dry.
17. The verbs escalate in violence: va'etpos ('I seized'), va'ashlikhem ('I hurled them'), va'ashabbrem ('I smashed them'). This was not careless dropping but deliberate destruction — le'einekhem ('before your eyes') makes it a public demonstration. The shattering of the tablets was a legal act: in ancient Near Eastern treaty practice, destroying the treaty document declared the covenant annulled. Moses was proclaiming that Israel's breach had voided the agreement. God-inscribed tablets broken by human hands — the physical embodiment of covenant rupture.
18. Moses's second forty-day fast (va'etnappal, 'I fell prostrate') was intercessory, not receptive — karishonah ('as the first time') but for an entirely different purpose. The first fast received the covenant; the second pled for its survival. The phrase al kol-chattatekhem ('because of all your sins') makes Moses a vicarious sufferer — he fasts on behalf of their transgression. The Hebrew la'asot hara be'einei YHWH lehakh'iso ('to do the evil in the LORD's eyes, to provoke Him') categorizes the calf not as religious confusion but as deliberate provocation.
19. Moses admits fear: ki yagorti ('for I was terrified') — not of the nations but of God's own wrath. The paired terms ha'af vehachema ('the anger and the fury') represent the full spectrum of divine rage. The phrase asher qatsaf YHWH aleikhem lehashhmid etkhem ('with which the LORD raged against you to destroy you') reveals how close annihilation came. The relief — vayyishma YHWH elai ('the LORD listened to me') — is understated but monumental. The addition gam bappa'am hahi ('also at that time') implies this was not the only time Moses intervened to prevent destruction.
20. Aaron — the high priest, Moses's brother — was not exempt from divine judgment: hit'annaf YHWH me'od lehashhmido ('the LORD was furious enough to destroy him'). Aaron's guilt as the calf's fabricator (Exodus 32:2-4) required specific intercession: va'etpallel gam-be'ad Aharon ('I prayed also on behalf of Aaron'). The word gam ('also') suggests Aaron's case was supplementary to the national intercession — his priestly role made his participation in idolatry particularly egregious.
21. Moses calls the calf chattatkhem ('your sin') — the idol is identified with the transgression itself. The destruction is methodical and total: va'esrof oto ba'esh ('I burned it in fire'), va'ekhot oto tachon hetev ('I crushed it, grinding thoroughly'), ad asher-da'q le'afar ('until it was fine as dust'), va'ashhlikh et-afaro el-hannachal ('I threw its dust into the stream'). Each step makes the idol more utterly nothing. The stream hayyored min-hahar ('descending from the mountain') carries the idol's remains away from the sacred precinct — the mountain that received the covenant now flushes away its violation.
22. Three place names function as a catalogue of rebellion, each encoding its own judgment narrative: Tav'erah ('burning' — Numbers 11:1-3, where God's fire consumed the edges of the camp), Massah ('testing' — Exodus 17:7, where Israel tested God at the water crisis), and Qivrot haTa'avah ('graves of craving' — Numbers 11:34, where those who craved meat died of surfeit). The very geography of the wilderness is a map of Israel's failures. The participle maqtsifim ('provoking') casts the rebellion as ongoing, habitual.
23. Kadesh-barnea was the ultimate failure point — the command alu ureshu et-ha'arets ('go up and possess the land') was direct and clear. The threefold response was devastating: vattamru et-pi YHWH ('you defied the mouth of the LORD' — the verb marah means active rebellion, not mere disobedience), velo he'emantem lo ('you did not trust Him'), velo shema'tem beqolo ('you did not listen to His voice'). Rebellion, unbelief, and deafness — the trifecta of covenant failure. This event condemned an entire generation to death in the wilderness.
24. Moses's devastating summary: mamrim heyitem im-YHWH ('rebellious you have been with the LORD'). The participle mamrim characterizes their permanent condition. The phrase miYom da'ti etkhem ('from the day I knew you') is deeply personal — from the moment of Moses's relationship with this people, rebellion has been their defining trait. This is not historical summary but pastoral lament: the leader who interceded for them acknowledges their unchanging nature.
25. Moses returns to the intercession: va'etnappal lifnei YHWH ('I threw myself prostrate before the LORD'). The phrase asher hitnappallti ('that I prostrated myself') uses the reflexive hitpael — Moses made himself fall, an act of total self-abasement. The cause — ki-amar YHWH lehashhmid etkhem ('because the LORD had said to destroy you') — reveals that Moses's forty-day fast was a sustained counter-argument to a divine death sentence. The entire period was one continuous act of intercession against annihilation.
26. Moses's prayer begins with reclaiming the people for God: al-tashchet ammekha venachalatekha ('do not destroy Your people and Your inheritance'). Where God said 'your people' (v 12), Moses counters with 'Your people' — insisting on God's ownership. The term nachalatekha ('Your inheritance') deepens the claim: Israel is not merely God's people but His prized possession, His estate. The prayer's logic is covenantal: asher padita begodlekha ('whom You ransomed through Your greatness') — destroying Israel would mean undoing His own redemptive work.
27. Moses appeals to patriarchal covenant: zekhor la'avadekha ('remember Your servants') invokes the binding oaths God made to the ancestors. The plea al-tafen ('do not look toward, do not focus on') asks God to shift His gaze from three attributes of the people — qeshi ha'am hazzeh ('the stubbornness of this people'), risho ('its wickedness'), and chattato ('its sin'). Moses does not deny the charges but asks God to weigh covenant promises against present failures. The strategy is not defense but appeal to a higher obligation.
28. Moses's boldest argument — pen-yomeru ha'arets ('lest the land/people say') — appeals to God's reputation. If Israel is destroyed, Egypt will draw two devastating conclusions: mibli yekholet YHWH ('because of the LORD's inability') — God was too weak to finish what He started — and umissin'ato otam ('because of His hatred for them') — the exodus was not love but a cruel trick to murder Israel in the desert. Moses weaponizes divine honor: destroying Israel would make God look either impotent or malicious. This is intercessory genius — finding leverage even in God's own character.

29. Moses closes with the decisive claim: vehem ammekha venachalatekha ('yet they are Your people and Your inheritance'). The emphatic vehem ('yet they') concedes everything negative said about Israel and still insists on God's ownership. The final phrase asher hotseta bekhochakha haggadol uvizro'akha hannettuyah ('whom You brought out by Your great power and Your outstretched arm') reminds God that He has already invested too much to abandon them. The prayer's logic is complete: these rebels are Yours, Your reputation is at stake, and Your prior investment demands continuation. The chapter that began demolishing Israel's self-righteousness ends with Moses's desperate, brilliant intercession preserving them despite themselves.

Summary: God replaces the broken tablets, the ark is built to house them, and Moses calls Israel to circumcise their hearts — because God, who shows no favoritism, loves the foreigner.

What Makes This Remarkable: The command 'circumcise the foreskin of your heart' (v. 16, orlat levavkhem) transforms a physical covenant sign into an internal spiritual reality. The juxtaposition is stunning: the God who owns heaven and earth (v. 14) chose your ancestors (v. 15) — therefore cut away your stubbornness. The description of God in vv. 17-18 is the most compressed theology in Deuteronomy: God of gods, Lord of lords, great, mighty, awesome, impartial, incorruptible, and the defender of orphans, widows, and foreigners.

Translation Friction: The phrase orlat levavkhem (v. 16) resists clean translation — 'foreskin of your heart' is the literal Hebrew, and 'circumcise your hearts' loses the visceral physicality. We rendered it 'circumcise your hearts' for readability and noted the fuller expression. The verb lo-yissa fanim (v. 17, 'does not lift faces') is the idiom for impartiality — we rendered it 'shows no favoritism.'

Connections: Heart circumcision recurs in 30:6 as God's future action and in Jeremiah 4:4 as prophetic demand. Paul takes up the concept in Romans 2:28-29. God's love for the foreigner (v. 18) grounds the repeated command to care for the ger throughout Deuteronomy (14:29, 24:17, 26:12-13). The ark narrative resumes from Exodus 37.

1At that time the LORD said to me, 'Carve out two stone tablets like the first ones, and come up to Me on the mountain. Also make a wooden chest. 2I will write on the tablets the same words that were on the first tablets — the ones you broke — and you are to place them in the chest.' 3So I made a chest of acacia wood and carved two stone tablets like the first ones, then went up the mountain with the two tablets in my hands. 4He inscribed on the tablets the same text as before — the Ten Words that the LORD had spoken to you on the mountain from within the fire on the day of the assembly. Then the LORD gave them to me. 5Then I turned and came down from the mountain and placed the tablets in the chest I had made, where they remain, just as the LORD commanded me. 6The Israelites traveled from Beeroth Bene-Jaakan to Moserah. There Aaron died and was buried, and his son Eleazar served as priest in his place. 7From there they traveled to Gudgodah, and from Gudgodah to Jotbathah, a land with flowing streams. 8At that time the LORD set apart the tribe of Levi to carry the ark of the LORD's covenant, to stand in the LORD's presence and serve Him, and to pronounce blessings in His name — as they do to this day. 9That is why Levi received no territorial share or inheritance with his brothers — the LORD Himself is his inheritance, just as the LORD your God told him. 10I remained on the mountain as I had the first time — forty days and forty nights — and the LORD listened to me on that occasion as well. The LORD chose not to destroy you. 11Then the LORD said to me, 'Get up and lead the people on their journey, so they may enter and take possession of the land that I swore to their ancestors to give them.' 12So now, Israel, what does the LORD your God ask of you? Only this: to hold the LORD your God in reverent awe, to walk in all His ways, to love Him, and to serve the LORD your God with your whole heart and your whole being, 13And to keep the LORD's commands and statutes that I am giving you today — for your own good. 14Consider: to the LORD your God belong the heavens — even the highest heavens — the earth, and everything in it. 15Yet it was only to your ancestors that the LORD was drawn in love, and He chose their descendants after them — that is, you — out of all peoples, as is evident today. 16So circumcise your hearts and stop being so stubborn. 17For the LORD your God is the God above all gods and the Lord above all lords — the great, mighty, and awe-inspiring God who shows no favoritism and accepts no bribe. 18He secures justice for the orphan and the widow, and He loves the foreigner, providing them with food and clothing. 19So you must love the foreigner, because you yourselves were foreigners in the land of Egypt. ²⁰The LORD your God you must revere. Him you must serve. To Him you must hold fast. By His name you must swear. ²¹He is your source of praise, and He is your God who has done these great and awesome things for you that your own eyes have witnessed. ²²Your ancestors went down to Egypt as just seventy people, and now the LORD your God has made you as numerous as the stars of heaven.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ba'et hahi ('at that time') connects directly to the aftermath of the golden calf crisis in chapter 9. God's response to covenant rupture is covenant renewal: pesol-lekha shnei-luchot avanim karishonim ('carve for yourself two stone tablets like the first ones'). The verb pasol ('carve, hew') now falls to Moses — he must prepare the medium, though God will inscribe the content. The aron ets ('wooden chest/ark') is the container for the restored tablets, ensuring their permanent preservation.
2. God's promise ve'ekhtov ('I will write') reasserts divine authorship — the replacement tablets carry the same authority as the originals. The phrase asher shibarta ('which you broke') is not accusation but factual acknowledgment: Moses's act of covenant annulment is referenced without condemnation. The content is identical: et-haddevarim asher hayu al-halluchot harishonim ('the words that were on the first tablets'). Grace does not alter the standard — the same covenant with the same demands is being restored.
3. Moses's obedience mirrors God's instructions precisely: va'a'as aron atsei shittim ('I made a chest of acacia wood'). Acacia (shittah) was the desert hardwood used throughout the tabernacle construction — durable, rot-resistant, and available in the Sinai wilderness. The detail ushnei halluchot beyadi ('the two tablets in my hand') parallels the first ascent (9:15) but this time with hope rather than tragedy. Moses climbs carrying blank tablets toward restoration.
4. The phrase kammikhtav harishon ('like the first writing') confirms exact replication. The content is identified as aseret haddevarim ('the ten words/commandments') — the only place in Deuteronomy using this specific term. The context is again emphasized: asher dibber YHWH aleikhem bahar mittokh ha'esh beyom haqqahal ('which the LORD spoke to you on the mountain from within the fire on the day of the assembly'). The fire, the mountain, and the gathered people — the same authoritative context validates the renewed tablets.
5. The second descent — va'efen va'ered min-hahar ('I turned and came down from the mountain') — contrasts sharply with the first (9:15). This time Moses descends with restored tablets, not toward a golden calf but toward covenant renewal. The statement vayyihyu sham ('and they were there' — they remain there) is written from the perspective of Moses's audience: the tablets are still in the ark at the time of this speech. The covenant, despite everything, endures: ka'asher tsivvani YHWH ('just as the LORD commanded me').
6. This parenthetical itinerary notice — apparently interrupting the narrative — records Aaron's death and priestly succession. The location names differ from Numbers 33:31-38 (which places Aaron's death at Mount Hor), suggesting either variant traditions or different stages of the same journey. The key theological point is succession: vaykhahhen El'azar beno tachtav ('Eleazar his son served as priest in his place'). Despite Aaron's near-destruction for the calf incident (9:20), the priesthood survived through his lineage — another instance of grace preserving an institution despite human failure.
7. The itinerary continues: Gudgodah and Yotvatah are wilderness stations. The detail erets nachalei mayim ('a land of flowing streams') about Jotbathah is striking — after the parched wilderness, even a minor oasis with permanent water deserves special mention. This brief geographic note anticipates the promised land's water abundance described in 8:7 and hints that God's provision was already becoming more generous as they neared their destination.
8. The verb hivdil ('separated, set apart') uses the same root as the creation separations in Genesis 1 — God distinguishes Levi from the other tribes for sacred function. Three duties define their role: la'set et-aron berit-YHWH ('to carry the ark of the LORD's covenant'), la'amod lifnei YHWH lesharto ('to stand before the LORD to minister to Him'), and ulevarekh bishmo ('to bless in His name'). These span physical service (carrying), liturgical service (standing in the presence), and mediatorial service (conveying blessing). The phrase ad hayom hazzeh ('to this day') confirms the arrangement's permanence.
9. The consequence of sacred service is economic disinheritance: lo-hayah leLevi cheleq venachalah im-echav ('Levi had no portion or inheritance with his brothers'). But the loss is exchanged for a greater gain: YHWH hu nachalato ('the LORD — He is his inheritance'). This stunning declaration makes God Himself the Levites' estate. Where other tribes receive land, Levi receives the LORD. The phrase ka'asher dibber YHWH ('as the LORD spoke') traces this arrangement to divine decree, not human choice.
10. Moses summarizes the successful intercession: vayyishma YHWH elai gam bappa'am hahi ('the LORD listened to me also at that time'). The phrase lo-avah YHWH hashchitekha ('the LORD was not willing to destroy you') uses avah ('to be willing, consent') — God chose not to destroy, implying the decision was active, not passive. Destruction was on the table; mercy won. The entire parenthetical section (vv 6-10) demonstrates that after the golden calf crisis, God's response was not abandonment but reorganization: renewed tablets, priestly succession, and intercessory preservation.
11. God's command qum lekh lemassa lifnei ha'am ('get up, go on the journey before the people') resumes the march toward the promised land. The crisis is resolved; the mission continues. The purpose — veyavo'u veyireshu et-ha'arets ('so they may enter and possess the land') — remains unchanged from its original statement. The oath asher-nishba'ti la'avotam ('which I swore to their ancestors') is the unbreakable foundation: despite Israel's failures, the patriarchal promise stands. The paragraph break (parashah petuchah) marks the end of the golden calf narrative and the transition to what God truly requires.

12. The rhetorical question ve'attah Yisra'el mah YHWH Elohekha sho'el me'immakh ('and now, Israel, what does the LORD your God ask from you?') introduces one of Deuteronomy's most celebrated passages. The answer — ki im ('only this') — presents God's demands as surprisingly simple despite their depth. Five requirements unfold: leyir'ah ('to revere'), lalekhet bekhlo-derakhav ('to walk in all His ways'), ule'ahavah oto ('to love Him'), vela'avod ('to serve'), and bekhol-levavekha uvkhol-nafshekha ('with your whole heart and whole being'). The rabbis noted the apparent modesty — 'Is reverence a small thing?' (Berakhot 33b) — yet for Moses, compared to the ritual complexity of the other nations' religions, YHWH's demands are elegantly focused.
13. The final phrase letov lakh ('for your good') is the theological punchline: God's commands are not arbitrary impositions but beneficial directives. The law is designed for Israel's flourishing. This frames obedience as enlightened self-interest — what God demands is what is best for the person obeying. The commandments are not burdens but blessings in prescriptive form.
14. The exclamation hen ('look, consider!') introduces a breathtaking claim of divine sovereignty. The phrase hashamayim ushemei hashamayim ('the heavens and the heavens of the heavens') is a Hebrew superlative — the highest conceivable realm. Combined with ha'arets vekhol-asher-bah ('the earth and everything in it'), the totality of creation is claimed as God's possession. This cosmic ownership statement sets up the staggering contrast of verse 15: the God who owns everything chose Israel.
15. The word raq ('only, yet') creates the contrast: the God who owns everything focused His affection on one family. The verb chashaq ('was drawn to, desired, was attached to') reappears from 7:7 — divine election as passionate attachment, not administrative selection. The phrase vayyivchar bezar'am achareihem bakhem ('He chose their offspring after them — you') traces the line from patriarchal love to present-day Israel. The election is particular, personal, and current: kayyom hazzeh ('as this day') — not past sentiment but present reality.
16. The command umaltem et orlat levavkhem ('circumcise the foreskin of your hearts') is one of the Torah's most radical metaphors. Physical circumcision — the sign of the Abrahamic covenant — is internalized: the 'foreskin' (orlah) covering the heart must be removed to expose it to God. The heart's hardened outer layer, like qesheh-oref ('stiff-neckedness'), blocks covenant receptivity. The command ve'orpekhem lo taqshu od ('your neck you shall not stiffen anymore') uses od ('anymore') — implying that past stubbornness is acknowledged but must cease. Jeremiah 4:4 and Deuteronomy 30:6 will develop this metaphor further.
17. The superlative titles Elohei ha'elohim va'Adonei ha'adonim ('God of gods and Lord of lords') do not affirm the existence of other deities but assert YHWH's absolute supremacy over any claimed power. Three adjectives — haggadol haggibor vahanora ('the great, the mighty, and the awesome') — became liturgically fixed in later Jewish prayer (the Amidah). Two judicial qualities define His character: lo-yissa fanim ('He does not lift faces' — shows no partiality based on status) and velo yiqqach shochad ('He does not take a bribe'). The God of cosmic power is also the God of incorruptible justice.
18. The cosmic God of verse 17 is now revealed as the champion of society's most vulnerable: oseh mishpat yatom ve'almanah ('executing justice for the orphan and widow'). The phrase ve'ohav ger ('and loving the foreigner') is extraordinary — the same love language (ahav) used for Israel's election (7:8) is now applied to the ger, the resident alien. God's provision is concrete: latet lo lechem vesimlah ('to give him food and clothing') — basic survival necessities. The God who owns heaven and earth concerns Himself with whether the immigrant has dinner and a coat.
19. The command va'ahavtem et-hagger ('you must love the foreigner') derives from Israel's own history: ki-gerim heyitem be'erets Mitsrayim ('because you were foreigners in the land of Egypt'). Empathy born of experience is the moral foundation: you know what it feels like to be powerless, alien, and dependent on others' goodwill. This is not abstract ethics but experiential ethics — suffering should produce compassion, not hardness. The command to love the ger appears more often in the Torah than almost any other ethical imperative.
20. Four terse commands define exclusive devotion: tira ('revere'), ta'avod ('serve'), tidbaq ('cling to'), and tishave'a ('swear by'). The emphatic word order — et-YHWH Elohekha ('the LORD your God' — placed first for emphasis) and oto, uvo, uvishmo ('Him, to Him, by His name') — allows no alternative object. The verb davaq ('cling, hold fast') is the same word used for marriage in Genesis 2:24 — the devotion demanded is as intimate and exclusive as the bond between husband and wife.
21. The declaration hu tehillatekha ('He is your praise') means God is both the object and the source of Israel's praise — their glory and reputation come from Him alone. The phrase asher-asah ittekha et-haggadolot ve'et-hannoraot ha'elohim ('who did with you these great and awesome things') appeals to eyewitness experience: asher ra'u einekha ('which your eyes have seen'). The argument from experience closes the chapter: you cannot deny what you personally witnessed.
22. The chapter closes with stunning numerical contrast: beshiv'im nefesh ('with seventy souls') went down to Egypt — a single extended family. Now samekha YHWH Elohekha kekchokh'vei hashamayim larov ('the LORD your God has made you as numerous as the stars of heaven'). The fulfillment of the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 15:5) is complete: from seventy to a multitude beyond counting. The stars metaphor connects back to the cosmic God of verse 14 — the One who owns the highest heavens has multiplied His people to match the stars within them.

11

Summary: Moses urges love and obedience by contrasting Egypt's irrigation (human effort) with Canaan's rain (divine provision), then sets before Israel the choice between blessing on Mount Gerizim and curse on Mount Ebal.

What Makes This Remarkable: The land theology here is agricultural: Egypt's fields were watered 'by foot' from the Nile (v. 10), but Canaan drinks rain from heaven — making Israel permanently dependent on God's seasonal faithfulness. The early rain (yoreh) and late rain (malqosh) of verse 14 frame the growing season; without them, everything fails. The land is a theological instrument, not merely a gift.

Translation Friction: The phrase totafot (v. 18, 'emblems/frontlets') recurs from 6:8 with the same etymological uncertainty. The terms yoreh and malqosh (v. 14) are technical agricultural vocabulary — 'early rain' (October-November) and 'late rain' (March-April) are the closest English equivalents but lose the specificity of the Hebrew growing calendar.

Connections: The blessing-curse ceremony at Gerizim and Ebal (vv. 29-30) is executed in Joshua 8:30-35. The rain theology connects to 1 Kings 17-18, where Elijah's drought demonstrates exactly the covenantal consequence Deuteronomy warns about. Joel 2:23 promises restoration using the same yoreh/malqosh vocabulary.

¹You must love the LORD your God and keep His requirements — His statutes, regulations, and commands — at all times. ²Acknowledge today — for I am not speaking to your children who did not experience or witness the discipline of the LORD your God — His greatness, His powerful hand, and His outstretched arm, ³His signs and His deeds that He performed in the heart of Egypt against Pharaoh king of Egypt and against his entire country, ⁴What He did to the Egyptian army — to their horses and chariots — when He made the waters of the Sea of Reeds surge over them as they pursued you, and how the LORD destroyed them permanently, ⁵What He did for you in the wilderness until you arrived at this very place, ⁶What He did to Dathan and Abiram, the sons of Eliab son of Reuben — how the earth opened its mouth and swallowed them along with their households, their tents, and every living thing that followed them, right in the middle of all Israel. ⁷For your own eyes have seen every great act that the LORD has performed. ⁸Therefore keep every commandment I am giving you today, so that you will be strong enough to enter and take possession of the land you are crossing over to possess, ⁹And so that you may live long in the land that the LORD swore to your ancestors to give to them and their descendants — a land flowing with milk and honey. ¹⁰For the land you are entering to possess is not like the land of Egypt that you left, where you sowed your seed and irrigated it by foot like a vegetable garden. ¹¹Rather, the land you are crossing into to possess is a land of hills and valleys that drinks water from the rain of heaven. ¹²It is a land that the LORD your God personally tends. The eyes of the LORD your God are continually on it, from the start of the year to the year's end. ¹³If you truly listen to My commands that I am giving you today — to love the LORD your God and serve Him with your whole heart and your whole being — ¹⁴Then I will send rain on your land at the right time — the early rain and the late rain — so that you can harvest your grain, new wine, and olive oil. ¹⁵I will provide grass in your fields for your livestock, and you will eat and be satisfied. ¹⁶Guard yourselves so that your hearts are not seduced, causing you to turn away and serve other gods and bow down to them. ¹⁷Then the LORD's anger will burn against you, and He will shut the sky so there is no rain, and the ground will not yield its produce, and you will quickly perish from the good land that the LORD is giving you. ¹⁸Place these words of Mine on your hearts and on your being. Bind them as a sign on your hand, and let them serve as emblems on your forehead. ¹⁹Teach them to your children by speaking about them when you sit at home and when you travel, when you lie down and when you get up. ²⁰Write them on the doorframes of your houses and on your gates, ²¹So that your days and your children's days in the land the LORD swore to give your ancestors may be as many as the days the heavens remain above the earth. ²²For if you carefully keep this entire commandment that I am giving you to carry out — loving the LORD your God, walking in all His ways, and holding fast to Him — ²³Then the LORD will drive out all these nations ahead of you, and you will dispossess nations larger and more powerful than yourselves. ²⁴Every place where the sole of your foot treads will be yours — from the wilderness to Lebanon, from the Euphrates River to the western sea will be your territory. ²⁵No one will be able to stand against you. The LORD your God will impose the fear and dread of you on the entire land wherever you set foot, just as He promised you. ²⁶See — I am placing before you today a blessing and a curse. ²⁷The blessing — if you obey the commands of the LORD your God that I am giving you today. ²⁸And the curse — if you do not obey the commands of the LORD your God and turn from the path I am directing you on today by going after other gods that you have not known. ²⁹When the LORD your God brings you into the land you are entering to possess, you are to proclaim the blessing on Mount Gerizim and the curse on Mount Ebal. ³ ^oAre they not across the Jordan, toward the west, in the territory of the Canaanites living in the Arabah, opposite Gilgal, near the oaks of Moreh? ³¹For you are about to cross the Jordan to enter and take possession of the land that the LORD your God is giving you. When you have taken possession and are settled in it, ³²You must carefully observe all the statutes and regulations that I am setting before you today.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening command ve'ahavta et YHWH Elohekha ('you must love the LORD your God') mirrors the Shema (6:5) and serves as the governing principle for all that follows. Love is not sentiment but expressed through veshamarta mishmareto ('keeping His charge/requirements'). The term mishmeret ('charge, requirement, watch') implies vigilant custody — guarding something entrusted to you. The four legal categories — mishmeret, chuqqot, mishpatim, mitsvot — represent the law's totality. The phrase kol-hayyamim ('all the days') demands unbroken, lifelong commitment.
2. Moses addresses the generation that personally experienced God's acts: vide'tem hayyom ('know today'). The parenthetical clarification ki lo et-beneikhem ('for not to your children') distinguishes eyewitnesses from future generations who will learn secondhand. The word musar ('discipline, instruction, correction') frames the exodus events as educational, not punitive — God's mighty acts were lessons, not mere spectacles. The formula yado hachazaqah uzero'o hannetuyah ('His powerful hand and outstretched arm') is the standard Deuteronomic description of exodus power.
3. The ototav ('His signs') and ma'asav ('His deeds') refer to the plagues — both as supernatural indicators (signs) and as divine interventions (deeds). The phrase betokh Mitsrayim ('in the midst/heart of Egypt') emphasizes that God operated within the enemy's stronghold, not from a safe distance. The judgment targeted both the ruler (lefaroh melek-Mitsrayim) and his domain (ulekhol-artso) — personal and territorial consequences.
4. The military dimension: asher asah lecheil Mitsrayim ('what He did to the army of Egypt'). The specifics — lesusav ulerikbo ('to their horses and chariots') — target Egypt's most advanced military technology. The verb hetsif ('caused to overflow, flooded') describes the waters of Yam-Suf ('Sea of Reeds') surging over the pursuing army. The phrase vay'abdem YHWH ad hayyom hazzeh ('the LORD destroyed them until this day') means the destruction was permanent and irreversible — that army never recovered.
5. The brief phrase va'asher asah lakhem bamiddbar ('and what He did for you in the wilderness') encompasses forty years of provision, discipline, and preservation. The preposition lakhem ('for you') is ambiguous — it includes both acts of sustenance (manna, water) and acts of judgment (serpents, plagues). The temporal marker ad-bo'akhem ad-hammaqom hazzeh ('until your arrival at this place') brings the historical survey up to the present moment on the plains of Moab.
6. The Korah rebellion (Numbers 16) is referenced through its Reubenite participants Datan and Aviram — Korah himself is omitted, perhaps because his descendants survived (Numbers 26:11). The personification patseta ha'arets et-piha ('the earth opened its mouth') makes the ground itself an agent of divine judgment. The verb vattivla'em ('and it swallowed them') portrays the earth consuming the rebels. The list — bateihem ('their households'), oholeihem ('their tents'), kol-hayyequm ('all the living things at their feet') — shows total destruction. The phrase beqerev kol-Yisra'el ('in the midst of all Israel') makes this a public, witnessed event.
7. The summary statement ki eineikhem haro'ot ('for your eyes are the ones seeing') uses the active participle — the seeing is ongoing, present-tense in its impact. The claim that they witnessed kol-ma'aseh YHWH haggadol ('every great act of the LORD') establishes experiential authority: what follows is not theoretical theology but commands grounded in witnessed reality. Their obedience should flow not from abstract duty but from concrete experience of divine power.
8. The conjunction ushmartem ('therefore keep') links witnessed experience to obedience — because you have seen, you must obey. The purpose clause lema'an techzequ ('so that you will be strong') makes obedience the source of military strength. The phrase uva'tem virishtem et-ha'arets ('and you will enter and possess the land') ties conquest directly to faithfulness. Strength for possession is not inherent but covenantally derived — obedience activates divine power.
9. The second purpose clause ulema'an ta'arikhu yamim ('so that you may prolong days') connects obedience to longevity in the land. The patriarchal oath (nishba YHWH la'avoteikhem) is the legal basis, and the beneficiaries include lahem uleazar'am ('them and their offspring') — the promise spans generations. The iconic description erets zavat chalav udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') pictures abundance so great it overflows — milk from abundant livestock, honey from agriculture or wild sources. This is the only appearance of this formula in chapter 11.
10. Moses contrasts two agricultural systems: Egypt's Nile-dependent, foot-operated irrigation versus Canaan's rain-dependent agriculture. The phrase vehishqita veraglekha ('you watered with your foot') refers to the Egyptian practice of channeling irrigation water by digging or operating foot-pedals on water-lifting devices. The comparison kegan hayyaraq ('like a vegetable garden') suggests the labor-intensive, human-controlled nature of Egyptian farming. The coming contrast is theological: Canaan's agriculture will depend on God's rain, not human engineering.

11. Canaan's landscape — erets harim uvqa'ot ('a land of hills and valleys') — is topographically varied, unlike Egypt's flat Nile plain. The decisive difference is theological: limtar hashamayim tishteh-mayim ('from the rain of heaven it drinks water'). The land 'drinks' (tishteh) — a personification suggesting the land is receptive and alive. Rain comes from shamayim ('heaven') — God's domain. Where Egypt offered human control over water, Canaan demands faith in divine provision. Agriculture in the promised land is inherently an act of trust.
12. The verb doresh ('seeks, cares for, attends to') portrays God as an attentive landowner — He actively tends the promised land. The anthropomorphism einei YHWH Elohekha bah ('the eyes of the LORD your God are on it') describes continuous divine surveillance and care. The temporal scope — mereshit hashanah ve'ad acharit shanah ('from the beginning of the year until the end of the year') — means unbroken attention through every season. The land is never unwatched, never unattended. This divine attentiveness is both reassuring (God provides) and sobering (God sees everything that happens in it).
13. The conditional structure opens the second paragraph of the Shema (Deuteronomy 11:13-21, recited daily in Jewish liturgy). The intensified infinitive absolute shamoa tishme'u ('listening you shall listen' — truly listen) echoes 28:1. The shift to first person — mitsvotai ('My commands') — may reflect God speaking through Moses or Moses speaking as God's authorized representative. The dual requirement — le'ahavah ('to love') and ule'avdo ('to serve') — combines internal disposition with external action, bekhol-levavkhem uvkhol-nafshekhem ('with all your heart and all your soul').
14. God promises venatatti metar-artschem be'itto ('I will give rain for your land in its season') — precipitation as covenant blessing, directly from God. Two critical rains define the agricultural year: yoreh ('early rain,' October-November, softening ground for planting) and malqosh ('late rain,' March-April, swelling the ripening grain). Both are essential; the absence of either means crop failure. The three harvest products — dagan ('grain'), tiros ('new wine'), and yitshar ('olive oil') — represent the staple crops of Israel's economy.
15. The provision extends to livestock: venatatti esev besadekha livhemtekha ('I will give grass in your fields for your animals'). The order is notable — animals fed first, then ve'akhalta vesava'ta ('you will eat and be satisfied'). The Talmud derives from this sequence that one must feed one's animals before feeding oneself (Berakhot 40a). The final promise of satisfaction (sava) completes the rain-to-harvest-to-table chain: divine rain produces animal feed and human food, resulting in full satisfaction.
16. The warning hishamru lakhem ('guard yourselves') interrupts the blessing sequence with danger. The verb yifteh ('be deceived, seduced, enticed') portrays apostasy as seduction — the heart is lured, not forced. The progression — vesartem ('you will turn aside'), va'avadtem elohim acherim ('and serve other gods'), vehishtachavitem lahem ('and bow down to them') — traces the path from initial distraction to full idolatrous worship. In an agrarian society dependent on rain, the temptation to worship Baal (the Canaanite storm/rain god) was acute: who really controls the rain?
17. The consequence directly reverses the blessing: vecharah af-YHWH ('the LORD's anger will burn') triggers ve'atsar et-hashamayim ('He will shut the heavens'). The God who promised rain (v 14) will withhold it. The agricultural collapse follows: veha'adamah lo titten et-yevulah ('the ground will not give its produce'). The ultimate consequence — va'avadtem meherah me'al ha'arets hattovah ('you will perish quickly from the good land') — means exile. The land given by God can be taken back by God. Rain-dependence, which should produce faith, becomes the mechanism of judgment when faith is abandoned.
18. The command vesamtem et-devarai elleh al-levavkhem ve'al-nafshekem ('place these words on your heart and on your being') demands internal inscription — the words must penetrate, not merely be heard. The physical practices — uqshartem otam le'ot al-yedkhem ('bind them as a sign on your hand') and vehayu letotafot bein eineikhem ('they shall be as totafot between your eyes') — were interpreted literally as tefillin (phylacteries) in Jewish practice. The word totafot is rare and obscure, possibly meaning 'headbands' or 'emblems.' Whether literal or metaphorical, the intent is total saturation: God's words must govern both action (hand) and thought (between the eyes).
19. The pedagogical command velimmadtem otam et-beneikhem ('teach them to your children') ensures generational transmission. The method is conversational — ledabber bam ('by speaking about them') — not formal classroom instruction but constant dialogue. Four settings cover all of daily life: beshivtekha beveitekha ('sitting in your house'), uvlekhtekha vaderekh ('walking on the road'), uvshakhekha ('lying down'), uvqumekha ('rising up'). The parallel with 6:7 reinforces that Torah education is not scheduled but ambient — woven into every moment and activity.
20. The command ukhtavtam al-mezuzot beitekha ('write them on the doorposts of your house') makes God's words visible at every entrance and exit. The mezuzah marks the threshold — the boundary between private and public space — ensuring that God's word is encountered at every transition. The addition uvish'arekha ('and on your gates') extends from the individual home to the community — city gates were centers of legal and commercial life. Together, doorpost and gate ensure saturation: home and city, private and public, all are inscribed with divine instruction.
21. The purpose clause lema'an yirbu yemeikhem vimei veneikhem ('so that your days and your children's days may multiply') connects Torah-saturated living to longevity. The comparison kimei hashamayim al-ha'arets ('like the days of the heavens upon the earth') promises permanence rivaling creation itself — as long as sky spans earth, Israel may dwell in the land. This cosmic simile is conditional: the permanence depends on the obedience described in verses 18-20. This verse closes the second paragraph of the Shema, the liturgical passage recited daily.
22. The intensified conditional ki im-shamor tishmerun ('if guarding you shall guard') opens a new promise section. The singular hammitsvah hazzot ('this commandment') views all the laws as one unified instruction. Three descriptions define its content: le'ahavah ('to love'), lalekhet ('to walk'), and uledavqah-bo ('to cling to Him'). The verb davaq ('cling, cleave') is the marriage word from Genesis 2:24, here applied to the God-Israel relationship. Covenant faithfulness is depicted as the most intimate possible attachment.
23. The promise vehorish YHWH et-kol-haggoyim ha'elleh ('the LORD will dispossess all these nations') is conditioned on the obedience of verse 22. The result — virishtem goyim gedolim va'atsumim mikkem ('you will dispossess nations greater and mightier than you') — reaffirms the military impossibility overcome by divine intervention. The same nations described in chapter 7 are still the target, and the same principle applies: Israel's strength is derivative, flowing from covenant obedience, not from military capability.

24. The territorial promise is expansive: kol-hammaqom asher tidrokh kaf-raglekhem bo lakhem yihyeh ('every place your foot treads will be yours'). The four boundaries define the maximum extent: min-hamidbar ('from the wilderness' — the Negev/Sinai in the south), vhaLevanon ('and Lebanon' — the north), min-hannahar nehar-Perat ('from the river, the river Euphrates' — the east), ve'ad hayyam ha'acharon ('to the western/last sea' — the Mediterranean). This represents the ideal, maximal borders promised to Abraham (Genesis 15:18), rarely if ever fully realized historically.
25. The military guarantee lo-yityatsev ish bifneikhem ('no one will stand before you') is absolute — conditioned on the obedience of verse 22. The mechanism is psychological: pachdekhem umora'akhem yitten YHWH ('the LORD will set your fear and your dread'). Two terms for fear are used — pachad ('terror, dread') and mora ('fear, awe') — covering both the visceral and the respectful. God will deploy Israel's reputation as a weapon: enemies will be psychologically defeated before the battle begins. The phrase ka'asher dibber lakhem ('as He spoke to you') anchors the promise in God's prior declarations.
26. The pivotal declaration re'eh anokhi noten lifneikhem hayyom berakhah uqelalah ('see, I am placing before you today a blessing and a curse') introduces the climactic choice. The singular imperative re'eh ('see!') addresses each individual, while the plural lifneikhem ('before you all') addresses the nation. Berakhah ('blessing') and qelalah ('curse') are the two covenant outcomes — not fate but consequences of choice. This sets up the Gerizim-Ebal ceremony and anticipates the blessings and curses of chapters 27-28.
27. The blessing is conditional: et-habberakhah asher tishme'u el-mitsvot YHWH ('the blessing — that you will listen to the commands of the LORD'). The conjunction asher can be read as 'if' (conditional) or 'when' (temporal), but the force is conditional. Obedience activates blessing. The present-tense urgency — asher anokhi metsavveh etkhem hayyom ('which I am commanding you today') — makes the choice immediate, not deferred.
28. The curse is triggered by two failures: im-lo tishme'u ('if you do not listen') and vesartem min-hadderekh ('and turn from the path'). Disobedience leads to deviation, and deviation leads to idolatry — lalekhet acharei elohim acherim ('to walk after other gods'). The qualifying phrase asher lo-yeda'tem ('which you have not known') is devastating: Israel would abandon the God who has been intimately known through forty years of wilderness experience for gods they have never encountered. The choice between blessing and curse is simultaneously a choice between the known and the unknown, the proven and the untested.
29. The ceremony is prescribed: venatattah et-habberakhah al Har Gerizim ve'et-haqqelalah al Har Eval ('you shall set the blessing on Mount Gerizim and the curse on Mount Ebal'). These twin mountains flanking the city of Shechem create a natural amphitheater. Gerizim (to the south, more fertile) receives the blessing; Ebal (to the north, more barren) receives the curse — the geography itself embodies the choice. This ceremony, fulfilled in Joshua 8:30-35, physically inscribed covenant consequences into the landscape of the promised land. Israel would live between these two mountains, between blessing and curse.
30. Moses orients his audience geographically: halo-hemmah be'ever haYarden ('are they not beyond the Jordan') — from their current position east of the river. The phrase acharei derekh mevo hashemesh ('toward the way of the setting sun') means westward. The reference points — be'erets haKena'ani hayyoshev ba'Aravah ('in the land of the Canaanite dwelling in the Arabah'), mul haGilgal ('opposite Gilgal'), etsel elonei Moreh ('near the oaks/terebinths of Moreh') — place the mountains precisely in the landscape. The elonei Moreh ('oaks of Moreh') connects to Genesis 12:6, where Abraham received the land promise — full circle.
31. The immediate future is emphasized: ki attem overim et-haYarden ('for you are crossing the Jordan') — the crossing is imminent. The triple progression — lavo lareshet ('to enter to possess'), virishtem otah ('you will possess it'), vishavtem-bah ('you will settle in it') — maps the three phases of conquest: entry, possession, and settlement. Each phase brings new responsibilities and new temptations. The gift nature of the land — asher YHWH Eloheikhem noten lakhem ('which the LORD your God is giving you') — keeps the source in view as a guard against the arrogance warned about in chapter 8.
32. The chapter's final verse ushmartem la'asot ('you must guard to do') combines vigilant attention with active obedience — these are inseparable. The phrase et kol-hachuqqim ve'et-hammishpatim ('all the statutes and the regulations') encompasses the full legal code about to be detailed in chapters 12-26. The temporal marker hayyom ('today') creates urgency: obedience is not tomorrow's project but today's demand. This closing verse functions as a hinge between the motivational speeches of chapters 5-11 and the specific legal code that follows — the theological foundation is laid; the practical instructions are about to begin.

Summary: Moses commands Israel to worship at one central sanctuary — 'the place the LORD will choose to put His name' — destroying all Canaanite worship sites. Meat may now be eaten without sacrifice, but blood must never be consumed.

What Makes This Remarkable: The phrase hamaqom ('the place,' v. 5) is never identified by name in Deuteronomy. The centralization of worship is the book's most consequential law — it will eventually mean Jerusalem, but Moses leaves it unnamed, preserving God's sovereignty over the choice. The permission to slaughter animals for food without a sacrificial context (vv. 15-16, 20-22) is new — in the wilderness, all slaughter was sacrificial (Leviticus 17:3-4). Distance from the sanctuary necessitates secular slaughter.

Translation Friction: The verb leshakken shemo ('to cause His Name to dwell,' v. 5) is Deuteronomy's distinctive theology: not God Himself but God's Name dwells in the sanctuary. This Name theology avoids localizing God while maintaining real divine presence. We rendered it literally and noted the theological significance. The blood prohibition (v. 23) uses nephesh ('life') — 'the blood is the life,' not merely 'the blood contains life.'

Connections: The centralization command is fulfilled when David brings the ark to Jerusalem (2 Samuel 6) and Solomon builds the Temple (1 Kings 8). The Name theology reappears throughout Kings (1 Kings 8:29, 2 Kings 21:4). The blood-life equation grounds the entire sacrificial system (Leviticus 17:11) and is cited in Acts 15:20.

¹These are the decrees and ordinances you must carefully follow in the land that the LORD, the God of your ancestors, has given you to possess — for as long as you live on the earth. ²You must completely demolish every site where the nations you are dispossessing worshiped their gods — on the high mountains, on the hills, and beneath every leafy tree. ³Tear down their altars, smash their sacred pillars, burn their Asherah poles with fire, cut down the carved images of their gods, and wipe out their names from those places. ⁴You must not worship the LORD your God in that way. ⁵Instead, seek out the place that the LORD your God will choose from among all your tribes to establish His name — to His dwelling you must go. ⁶There you must bring your burnt offerings, your sacrifices, your tithes, the contributions from your hands, your vow offerings, your voluntary offerings, and the firstborn of your cattle and flocks. ⁷There you will eat in the presence of the LORD your God, and you and your households will celebrate in everything you have undertaken, because the LORD your God has blessed you. ⁸You must not continue doing what we are doing here today, where everyone acts according to whatever seems right to them. ⁹For you have not yet reached the place of rest and the inheritance that the LORD your God is giving you. ¹⁰When you cross the Jordan and settle in the land that the LORD your God is granting you as an inheritance, and He gives you relief from all your surrounding enemies so that you live in security — ¹¹Then to the place that the LORD your God will choose as the dwelling for His name — there you must bring everything I am commanding you: your burnt offerings and sacrifices, your tithes and the contributions from your hands, and all the choicest of your vow offerings that you pledge to the LORD. ¹²Celebrate in the presence of the LORD your God — you, your sons and daughters, your male and female servants, and the Levite who lives within your towns, since he has no allotted portion or inheritance alongside you. ¹³Be careful not to offer your burnt offerings at just any place you happen to see. ¹⁴Only at the place the LORD will choose within one of your tribal territories — there you must present your burnt offerings, and there you must carry out everything I am commanding you. ¹⁵However, you may slaughter and eat meat in any of your towns whenever you desire, in proportion to the blessing the LORD your God gives you. Both the ritually impure and the ritually pure may eat it, just as they would eat gazelle or deer. ¹⁶The one restriction is this: you must not consume the blood. Pour it out on the ground like water. ¹⁷You are not permitted to eat the following within your own towns: the tithe of your grain, new wine, or olive oil; the firstborn of your herds or flocks; any of your vow offerings or voluntary offerings; or the contributions from your hands. ¹⁸Rather, you must eat these in the presence of the LORD your God at the place the LORD your God will choose — you, your son, your daughter, your male servant, your female servant, and the Levite who lives in your town. You are to celebrate in the presence of the LORD your God over everything you have accomplished. ¹⁹Be careful never to neglect the Levite for as long as you live in your land. ²⁰When the LORD your God expands your territory as He promised you, and you say, 'I want to eat meat' because you crave it, then you may eat meat whenever you desire. ²¹If the place the LORD your God has chosen to establish His name is too far from you, then you may slaughter from your cattle or flocks that the LORD has given you, as I have instructed you, and eat within your own towns whenever you wish. ²²Eat it the same way you would eat gazelle or deer: both the ritually impure and the ritually pure may eat it together. ²³Only be resolute in not eating the blood, because the blood is the life-force, and you must not consume the life-force along with the meat. ²⁴Do not eat it. Pour it out on the ground like water. ²⁵Do not eat it, so that things will go well for you and your children after you, because you are doing what is right in the LORD's sight. ²⁶But your sacred offerings and your vow offerings — those you must carry to the place the LORD will choose. ²⁷Present your burnt offerings — both the meat and the blood — on the altar of the LORD your God. The blood of your other sacrifices must be poured out on the altar of the LORD your God, but the meat you may eat. ²⁸Guard and obey all these instructions that I am commanding you, so that things will go well for you and your descendants after you permanently, because you are doing what is good and right in the eyes of the LORD your God. ²⁹When the LORD your God cuts off the nations ahead of you — the ones you are going to dispossess — and you take their place and settle in their land, ³⁰guard yourself from being ensnared by their ways after they have been destroyed ahead of you. Do not inquire about their gods, asking, 'How did these nations worship their gods? I want to do the same thing.' ³¹You must not worship the LORD your God the way they worship, because they practice every abomination that the LORD detests for their gods — they even burn their own sons and daughters in the fire as offerings to their gods.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase hachuqqim vehamishpatim ('the statutes and the ordinances') opens a new legislative section that runs through chapter 26. Chuqqim are engraved decrees — permanent regulations inscribed in the covenant — while mishpatim are case-law rulings, judicial precedents that govern specific situations. Together they encompass the full scope of covenant law. The phrase kol hayyamim asher attem chayyim ('all the days that you are alive') emphasizes that these laws apply for the entire duration of the people's existence in the land.
2. The infinitive absolute abbed te'abedun ('destroying you shall destroy' — you must completely demolish) demands total eradication of Canaanite worship sites. The three locations listed — high mountains (heharim haramim), hills (hageva'ot), and beneath leafy trees (tachat kol ets ra'anani) — correspond to the typical settings of Canaanite open-air shrines (bamot). These elevated sites were considered closer to the divine realm, and the evergreen trees symbolized fertility worship. The command is comprehensive: no pagan worship site, regardless of location, may be repurposed.
3. Four distinct cult objects are targeted: mizbekhot ('altars' — stone or earth platforms for sacrifice), matstsevoth ('standing stones' — sacred pillars representing the male deity), asherim ('Asherah poles' — wooden cult objects associated with the Canaanite goddess Asherah), and pesilei eloheihem ('carved images of their gods' — sculpted idols). The final command ve'ibadtem et shemam ('wipe out their names') goes beyond physical destruction: even the memory and invocation of these gods must be erased from the landscape. Replacing pagan place-names was part of claiming the land for YHWH.
4. This terse prohibition — lo ta'asun ken ('you shall not do so') — is the pivot of the entire chapter. It separates the command to destroy pagan worship sites (vv 2-3) from the command to worship at God's chosen site (vv 5-7). The point is not merely that Canaanite practices are wrong, but that Israel must not apply Canaanite worship patterns to YHWH. God determines where and how He is worshiped; Israel does not get to choose the format.
5. The phrase hamaqom asher yivchar YHWH ('the place that the LORD will choose') is the theological center of Deuteronomy's worship legislation, appearing over twenty times in the book. It refers to a single, divinely selected worship site — ultimately identified with Jerusalem (2 Chr 7:12). The phrase lasum et shemo sham ('to place His name there') uses the 'name theology' distinctive to Deuteronomy: God's name represents His presence and authority. His dwelling (shikhno) is established through His name, meaning the sanctuary is where God makes Himself accessible, not where He is confined.
6. Seven categories of offerings are listed, creating a comprehensive inventory of Israel's worship: olot ('burnt offerings' — wholly consumed on the altar), zevachim ('sacrifices' — shared meals with God), ma'asrot ('tithes' — the tenth of produce), terumat yedkhem ('contributions of your hands' — the raised/elevated offering), nidreichem ('vow offerings' — pledged in times of need), nidvoteihem ('freewill offerings' — voluntary expressions of gratitude), and bekhorot ('firstborn' — consecrated firstborn animals). All seven categories must come to the one chosen place, eliminating any justification for multiple worship sites.
7. The centralized worship experience is described not as solemn duty but as communal celebration. The verb usmachtem ('you shall rejoice') makes joy a commanded element of worship. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD, in the presence of the LORD') indicates that the communal meal takes place in God's acknowledged presence. The inclusion of uvateikhem ('your households') extends worship beyond individual males to entire families — worship is a household experience.

8. Moses acknowledges that during the wilderness period, Israel's worship has been decentralized and somewhat individualized — ish kol hayyashar be'einav ('each person doing whatever is right in his own eyes'). This same phrase appears as the concluding judgment of the book of Judges (Judg 21:25), where it describes moral and social chaos. The phrase 'here today' (po hayyom) contrasts the transitional wilderness situation with the settled future in the land, where centralized worship will impose order on religious practice.
9. Two terms define what the promised land represents: menuchah ('rest' — cessation from wandering, warfare, and instability) and nachalah ('inheritance' — permanent, divinely granted possession). Together they describe not merely territory but a settled condition of security and divine provision. The 'rest' concept becomes theologically significant throughout Scripture (cf. Ps 95:11; Heb 4:1-11), extending beyond physical land to encompass the fullness of God's promises.
10. Three stages mark the transition to settled life: crossing the Jordan (va'avartem et haYarden), settling in the land (vishavtem ba'arets), and receiving security from enemies (veheniach lakhem mikol oyveikhem). The verb heniach ('give rest, give relief') is the causative form of nuach — God actively creates the condition of rest. The phrase vishavtem betach ('you will dwell in security') describes the end-state: a life free from military threat, where worship can be properly centralized.
11. The phrase leshakken shemo sham ('to cause His name to dwell there') uses the piel intensive of shakan ('to dwell'), emphasizing that God actively establishes His name-presence at the chosen site. The term mivchar nidreikhem ('the choicest of your vow offerings') specifies that vow offerings must be of the best quality — not merely any animal, but the select ones. This raises the standard: centralized worship demands not just obedience in location but excellence in offering.
12. The worship community is defined inclusively: sons, daughters, male and female servants, and the Levite. This is not solitary devotion but communal celebration crossing age, gender, and social class. The Levite receives special mention because he has no tribal land allotment (ein lo cheleq venachalah ittekhem — 'he has no portion or inheritance with you') and therefore depends entirely on the community's generosity. The phrase bishaareikhem ('within your gates/towns') indicates that Levites are dispersed throughout Israel's cities rather than concentrated in one location.
13. The warning hishamer lekha ('guard yourself, be careful') introduces a prohibition against random site selection for sacrifice. The phrase bekhol maqom asher tireh ('at every place that you see') contrasts with the specific maqom ('place') that God chooses. The Canaanite practice of worshipping wherever a high place or impressive natural feature appeared attractive is explicitly rejected. Convenience or personal preference must not determine where burnt offerings are made.
14. The phrase be'achad shevatekha ('in one of your tribes') specifies that the chosen place will be located within one tribe's territory. This was fulfilled when Jerusalem — located on the border of Benjamin and Judah — became the central sanctuary. The emphatic repetition sham ('there') twice reinforces the exclusivity: there, and only there, is the authorized worship site.
15. This verse introduces a revolutionary concession: secular (non-sacrificial) slaughter of animals for food is now permitted in any town. Before centralization, all animal slaughter was sacrificial (Lev 17:3-4). But with the sanctuary potentially far away, requiring every meat meal to involve a pilgrimage would be impractical. The phrase bekhol avvat nafshekha ('according to all the desire of your soul' — whenever you want) grants broad permission. The comparison to gazelle and deer (tsevi and ayyal) — wild animals that were never sacrificed — establishes the principle: this meat is ordinary food, not sacred offering. Both ritually impure (tamei) and pure (tahor) persons may eat it, since no sacred context applies.
16. Even in secular slaughter, one absolute prohibition remains: blood must not be consumed. The blood prohibition is one of the oldest and most universal commands in Scripture (Gen 9:4; Lev 17:10-14). The instruction to pour it on the ground 'like water' (kamayim) means it should be treated as waste liquid, not collected for any purpose. In sacrificial contexts, blood was dashed on the altar (representing life returned to God); in non-sacrificial slaughter, it is simply disposed of on the earth.
17. While secular meat eating is now permitted locally (v 15), sacred offerings are strictly excluded from local consumption. The triad degan, tirosh, yitshar ('grain, new wine, olive oil') represents the three staple agricultural products of the land. These tithes, along with firstborn animals and vow/freewill offerings, must be consumed at the central sanctuary. The distinction between ordinary food (freely eaten at home) and sacred food (restricted to God's chosen place) is a key organizational principle of Deuteronomy's worship system.
18. The inclusive list of worshipers reappears (cf. v 12): son, daughter, servants, and Levite. The phrase vesamachta lifnei YHWH ('you shall rejoice before the LORD') again pairs worship with joy — the sacred meal is a celebration, not a somber ritual. The phrase bekhol mishlach yadekha ('in everything your hand is sent to' — everything you have accomplished) connects the feast to God's blessing on daily labor. Worship celebrates what God has enabled.
19. The warning hishamer lekha pen ta'azov et haLevi ('guard yourself lest you abandon the Levite') closes the first section with a social obligation. Since Levites have no land inheritance and depend on the community's tithes and offerings for sustenance, neglecting them would be both economic cruelty and a failure to support Israel's worship infrastructure. The phrase kol yamekha ('all your days') makes this a lifelong obligation, not a temporary measure. The setumah paragraph break marks the transition to the next topic.
20. This verse anticipates future territorial expansion (ki yarchiv YHWH Elohekha et ge'vulcha — 'when the LORD your God enlarges your border') and the practical problem it creates: the central sanctuary will be even farther away. The repeated emphasis on desire — te'avveh nafshekha ('your soul craves') and bekhol avvat nafshekha ('in all the desire of your soul') — frames meat-eating as a matter of appetite, not ritual. God accommodates human desire within the framework of covenant law.

21. The phrase ki yirchaq mimmekha hamaqom ('if the place is too far from you') provides the explicit justification for secular slaughter: distance from the central sanctuary. The phrase ka'asher tsivitikha ('as I have commanded you') likely refers to oral instructions about proper slaughter technique — instructions not recorded in the written Torah. The rabbis understood this as evidence for the Oral Torah tradition, since no written command about slaughter method appears elsewhere in the Pentateuch.
22. The gazelle (tsevi) and deer (ayyal) comparison is repeated from verse 15, reinforcing that locally slaughtered meat has the same status as wild game — it is ordinary food, not sacred. The phrase hattamei vehattahor yachdav ('the impure and the pure together') is significant: in sacrificial contexts, ritual purity was required, but for ordinary meals no such restriction applies. The word yachdav ('together') emphasizes that there is no separation at the table.
23. The command raq chazaq ('only be strong/resolute') frames blood avoidance as requiring strength of will — it is a temptation that must be actively resisted. The theological reason follows: ki haddam hu hannefesh ('because the blood is the life/soul'). The Hebrew nefesh here means life-force or vital essence, not 'soul' in the later philosophical sense. Blood carries the animating principle that God gives; consuming it would be appropriating what belongs to God alone. The prohibition appears three times in this chapter (vv 16, 23, 25), underscoring its importance.
24. The repetition from verse 16 reinforces the blood prohibition with identical language. Pouring blood on the ground 'like water' (kammayim) emphasizes that it has no sacred function in secular slaughter — it is not dashed on an altar as in sacrificial contexts but simply returned to the earth. The simplicity of the disposal method contrasts with the elaborate blood rituals of Leviticus.
25. The blood prohibition is now tied to a generational promise: lema'an yitav lekha ulevanekha acharekha ('so that it may be good for you and your children after you'). Obedience produces intergenerational blessing. The phrase ki ta'aseh hayyashar be'einei YHWH ('because you do what is right in the LORD's eyes') frames blood avoidance not as arbitrary restriction but as moral alignment with God's values — the opposite of 'doing what is right in one's own eyes' (v 8).
26. After extensively discussing local secular slaughter (vv 15-25), Moses returns to the nonnegotiable requirement: qodashekha ('your holy things, your sacred offerings') and nedarekha ('your vow offerings') must still travel to the central sanctuary. The verb tissa ('you shall carry, you shall lift up') implies physical transport — these offerings must be physically brought to the chosen place, not consumed at home regardless of distance.
27. Two types of sacrifice are distinguished: olot ('burnt offerings'), where both meat and blood go entirely on the altar (nothing is eaten), and zevachim ('other sacrifices' — peace/fellowship offerings), where only the blood is poured on the altar and the worshiper eats the meat. This verse concisely summarizes the distinction between wholly-burned and shared offerings that Leviticus 1-7 details at length. The contrast with secular slaughter (vv 15-25) is clear: in sacrifice, blood goes on the altar; in ordinary slaughter, blood goes on the ground.
28. The phrase shemor veshama'ta ('guard and hear/obey') pairs two verbs of obedience: careful attention and active compliance. The promise extends beyond the current generation — ulevanekha acharekha ad olam ('and for your children after you permanently'). The word olam ('forever, permanently') elevates the promise from temporal to enduring. The phrase hattov vehayyashar ('the good and the right') combines moral quality (tov — what is inherently good) with legal propriety (yashar — what is straight, correct, upright). The setumah break marks the end of this subsection.
29. The verb yakhrit ('He will cut off') uses the hiphil of karat, the same root used for 'cutting' a covenant (karat berit). God 'cuts off' nations just as He 'cuts' covenants — both are sovereign acts that reshape the political and spiritual landscape. The sequence — cutting off, dispossessing (yarashta), settling (yashavta) — describes the three-phase transition: removal, replacement, and habitation.
30. The verb tinnaqesh ('be ensnared') uses the imagery of a bird trap — Israel could walk into Canaanite religion as unknowingly as a bird enters a snare. The warning is psychologically astute: even after the nations are destroyed (acharei hishamdam), their religious practices could survive as cultural curiosity. The quoted internal monologue — eikhah ya'avdu... ve'e'eseh ken gam ani ('How did they worship... I'll do the same') — reveals the danger of religious syncretism: Israel might adopt Canaanite worship forms while believing they are enhancing YHWH worship.
31. The chapter closes where it began (v 4): Israel must not worship YHWH using Canaanite methods. The reason is now made explicit: every to'avah ('abomination, detestable practice') that the LORD hates characterizes Canaanite religion. The ultimate example is child sacrifice — ki gam et beneihem ve'et benoteihem yisrefu va'esh leeloheihem ('they even burn their sons and daughters in fire to their gods'). Archaeological evidence confirms child sacrifice at Canaanite and Phoenician sites (the tophet at Carthage being the most extensively documented). This practice — the inversion of the firstborn consecration (dedicating a child to death rather than to life) — represents the absolute boundary between YHWH worship and Canaanite religion.

Summary: Moses addresses three scenarios of temptation to idolatry: a prophet who performs signs, a close family member who entices privately, and an entire city that turns away. Each requires the death penalty.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter escalates from public seduction (a prophet) to intimate betrayal (spouse, child, friend) to communal apostasy (a whole city). The most disturbing case is the middle one: 'your brother, your son, your daughter, the wife of your bosom, your friend who is as your own soul' (v. 6). Deuteronomy lists every intimate relationship to eliminate any excuse for mercy toward idolatry. The theological principle is absolute: no sign, no relationship, no community consensus can authorize worship of other gods.

Translation Friction: The phrase benei veliyya'al (v. 14, 'worthless individuals') is a compound that became a proper name (Belial) in later literature. We rendered it descriptively rather than as a name. The verb uwi'arta hara (v. 5, 'purge the evil') recurs throughout Deuteronomy as a judicial refrain — we translated it consistently. The verse numbering differs from KJV: Hebrew 13:1 = KJV 12:32.

Connections: The false prophet test recurs in 18:20-22 with different criteria. The city-under-ban echoes the cherem of Joshua 6-7. Paul may allude to the 'purge the evil' formula in 1 Corinthians 5:13. The intimate-betrayer case grounds Jesus's warning that discipleship may divide families (Matthew 10:35-37).

¹Everything I am commanding you — guard it and carry it out. Do not add anything to it, and do not subtract anything from it. ²If a prophet or a dreamer of dreams arises among you and presents you with a sign or a wonder, ³and the sign or wonder actually comes true, but then he says, 'Let us follow other gods' — gods you have not known — 'and let us serve them,' ⁴you must not listen to what that prophet or dreamer says, because the LORD your God is testing you to find out whether you truly love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your soul. ⁵The LORD your God is the one you must follow. Him you must revere. His commandments you must keep. His voice you must obey. Him you must serve, and to Him you must hold fast. ⁶That prophet or dreamer must be put to death, because he spoke rebellion against the LORD your God — the one who brought you out of the land of Egypt and redeemed you from the house of slavery — trying to push you off the path the LORD your God commanded you to walk. You must purge the evil from your midst. ⁷If your brother — your own mother's son — or your son or daughter, or the wife you embrace, or your closest friend who is like your own soul, entices you in secret, saying, 'Let us go worship other gods' — gods that neither you nor your ancestors have known, ⁸gods of the surrounding peoples, whether near you or far from you, from one end of the earth to the other — ⁹you must not yield to him or listen to him. Your eye must not show pity, you must not spare him, and you must not shield him. ¹⁰Rather, you must certainly put him to death. Your own hand must strike first to execute him, and then the hands of all the people. ¹¹Stone him to death, because he sought to lure you away from the LORD your God, who brought you out of the land of Egypt, out of the house of slavery. ¹²All Israel will hear and be afraid, and no one will do such a wicked thing among you again. ¹³If you hear it reported about one of your towns that the LORD your God is giving you to live in, ¹⁴that worthless individuals have emerged from among you and have led the residents of their city astray, saying, 'Let us go serve other gods' — gods you have not known — ¹⁵then you must investigate, examine, and inquire thoroughly. If it is confirmed as true — if this abomination has indeed been committed among you — ¹⁶you must strike down the inhabitants of that city with the sword, devoting it to total destruction — everything in it and its livestock — with the sword. ¹⁷Gather all its plunder into the center of its public square and burn the entire city and all its plunder as a whole burnt offering to the LORD your God. It will remain a permanent ruin, never to be rebuilt. ¹⁸Nothing from the items placed under the ban may stick to your hands, so that the LORD will turn from His fierce anger and show you compassion — He will have mercy on you and multiply you, just as He swore to your ancestors. ¹⁹— provided you listen to the voice of the LORD your God, keeping all His commandments that I am commanding you today, doing what is right in the eyes of the LORD your God.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse is numbered 13:1 in the Hebrew text but 12:32 in English Bibles (KJV). The Hebrew text reads: 'Everything I command you — that you shall guard to do. Do not add to it and do not subtract from it.' The KJV text shown corresponds to the English Bible's 13:1 (Hebrew 13:2). The rendering follows the Hebrew source text. The prohibition lo tosef alav velo tigma mimmennu ('do not add to it and do not subtract from it') establishes the canon principle: God's commands are complete and authoritative as given. This principle is later echoed in Revelation 22:18-19. The petuchah paragraph marker signals a major section break — what follows in the Hebrew text is a new topic.
2. Hebrew 13:2 (English 13:1). The chapter addresses three sources of enticement to idolatry: prophets (vv 2-6), family and close friends (vv 7-12), and entire cities (vv 13-19). The navi ('prophet') and cholem chalom ('dreamer of dreams') represent two modes of claimed divine communication. The phrase natan elekha o to mofet ('gives you a sign or wonder') acknowledges that the false prophet may actually produce supernatural phenomena — the test is not whether the sign works but where it leads.
3. Hebrew 13:3 (English 13:2). The scenario is startling: the predicted sign actually comes true (uva ha'ot vehamofet — 'the sign and the wonder comes to pass'), yet the prophet's message leads to idolatry. The phrase elohim acherim asher lo yeda'tam ('other gods that you have not known') uses 'known' in the covenantal sense — these are gods with whom Israel has no relationship, no history, no covenant bond. The seductive logic is: 'My prediction came true, therefore my theology is correct.' Moses dismantles this reasoning in the next verse.
4. Hebrew 13:4 (English 13:3). The reason for allowing false prophets to perform real signs is breathtaking: ki menasseh YHWH Eloheikhem etkhem ('because the LORD your God is testing you'). God permits supernatural deception as a loyalty test. The criterion is not intellectual — 'can you detect the fraud?' — but relational: hayishkhem ohavim et YHWH ('do you love the LORD?'). The test echoes the Shema (Deut 6:5): love with all your heart (levav) and all your soul (nefesh). A sign that contradicts covenant loyalty must be rejected regardless of its apparent supernatural validation.
5. Hebrew 13:5 (English 13:4). Six verbs define covenant loyalty in a powerful ascending sequence: telekhu ('follow/walk after'), tira'u ('revere/fear'), tishmoru ('keep/guard'), tishma'u ('obey/hear'), ta'avodu ('serve/worship'), and tidbaqun ('hold fast/cling'). The final verb davaq ('cling, hold fast') is the same verb used for marital union in Genesis 2:24 — covenant loyalty to God is intimate, not merely formal. The emphatic word order places YHWH first in every clause: 'After the LORD... Him you shall fear... His commands... His voice... Him you shall serve... to Him you shall cling.'
6. Hebrew 13:6 (English 13:5). The charge is dibber sarah ('he spoke rebellion/sedition') — the verb sarah implies active turning aside, deviation from the established path. The death penalty reflects the severity of the offense: the false prophet attacks the very foundation of Israel's existence. Two exodus titles reinforce what is at stake: hamotsi etkhem me'erets mitsrayim ('the one who brought you out of Egypt') and hapoddekha mibbeit avadim ('the one who redeemed you from the house of slavery'). The formula uvi'arta hara miqqirbekha ('purge the evil from your midst') appears seven times in Deuteronomy, establishing a pattern for communal purification.
7. Hebrew 13:7 (English 13:6). The second scenario shifts from public prophets to intimate relationships. The list escalates in emotional closeness: brother (achikha ben immekha — 'your brother, your mother's son,' emphasizing the closest sibling bond through shared mother), son, daughter, wife (eshet cheiqekha — 'wife of your bosom,' the most intimate human relationship), and friend (re'akha asher kenafshekha — 'your friend who is like your own soul,' echoing the David-Jonathan bond). The enticement comes baseter ('in secret') — privately, where social pressure cannot counter it. The emotional difficulty of the following command is intentionally heightened by this list.
8. Hebrew 13:8 (English 13:7). The scope of the prohibition extends geographically: the gods of nearby peoples (haqerovim elekha) and distant peoples (harchoqim mimmekha), from one end of the earth to the other (miqqetseh ha'arets ve'ad qetseh ha'arets). No foreign god is exempt, regardless of its geographic origin. This eliminates any argument that a particular deity's distance or exoticism might make it acceptable.
9. Hebrew 13:9 (English 13:8). Five prohibitions stack up with relentless force: lo toveh ('do not consent/yield'), lo tishma ('do not listen'), lo tachos einkha ('your eye must not show pity'), lo tachmol ('do not spare'), and lo tekhasseh ('do not conceal/cover for him'). Each prohibition blocks a natural emotional response to a loved one in danger. The verbs move from external action (consenting, listening) to internal emotion (pity, compassion) to protective concealment — every avenue of leniency is sealed shut.
10. Hebrew 13:10 (English 13:9). The infinitive absolute harog tahargenu ('killing you shall kill him' — you must certainly kill him) intensifies the command. The requirement that yadkha tiyeh bo barishonah ('your hand shall be on him first') is extraordinary: the person who received the private enticement must personally initiate the execution. This prevents anonymous denunciation and ensures that the accuser bears full moral weight for the action. It also tests whether the accuser's loyalty to God truly overrides personal attachment.
11. Hebrew 13:11 (English 13:10). The method is stoning (seqalto va'avanim vamet — 'stone him with stones and he shall die'). Stoning was a communal form of execution, involving the entire community and preventing any single individual from bearing sole responsibility for the death. The crime is defined as seeking to lehadichakha me'al YHWH ('to push you away from the LORD') — the verb hadach means to drive away, thrust out, seduce off course. The exodus formula appears again, grounding the severity of the penalty in the gravity of what God has done: He rescued them from slavery, and anyone who undermines that rescued relationship commits a capital offense.
12. Hebrew 13:12 (English 13:11). The public execution serves a deterrent function: vekhlo Yisrael yishme'u veyira'un ('all Israel will hear and they will fear'). The verb yira'un ('they will fear') uses the same root as 'the fear of the LORD' — the terror produced by the execution mirrors the reverent fear that God Himself commands. The phrase velo yosifu la'asot ('they will not continue to do') expresses the desired outcome: complete cessation of this behavior. The setumah break marks the transition to the third scenario.

- 13. Hebrew 13:13 (English 13:12). The third scenario is the most extreme: an entire city has been led into idolatry. The phrase ki tishma be'achat arekha ('if you hear in one of your cities') introduces the situation as a report — the information comes to the community's attention rather than being directly witnessed. This begins the most detailed judicial procedure in the chapter.
- 14. Hebrew 13:14 (English 13:13). The instigators are called benei veliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness/wickedness'). The term beliyya'al is debated: it may derive from beli ('without') + ya'al ('value/profit'), yielding 'worthless ones,' or it may be an older term meaning 'swallowers' (destructive forces). In later Jewish and Christian literature, Belial becomes a name for Satan (2 Cor 6:15). The verb vayyadichu ('they led astray, they seduced') is the same root (nadach) used throughout this chapter for spiritual enticement — these individuals have successfully corrupted an entire city.
- 15. Hebrew 13:15 (English 13:14). Three verbs of investigation are required before action: darashta ('you shall investigate/search'), chaqarta ('you shall examine/probe'), and sha'alta ('you shall inquire/ask'). The adverb heitev ('thoroughly, well') intensifies all three. Only after exhaustive due process — vehineh emet nakhon hadavar ('and behold, it is true, the matter is established') — may punishment proceed. This is one of the strongest due process requirements in ancient law. The word to'evah ('abomination') labels the crime.
- 16. Hebrew 13:16 (English 13:15). The punishment is cherem ('total destruction, devotion to destruction') — the same term used for the conquest of Jericho (Josh 6:17). The infinitive absolute hakkeh takkeh ('striking you shall strike') intensifies the command. The cherem encompasses everything: residents (yoshvei ha'ir), all possessions (kol asher bah), and livestock (behemtah). An apostate Israelite city receives the same treatment as a Canaanite city under the ban — covenant betrayal transforms insiders into outsiders.
- 17. Hebrew 13:17 (English 13:16). The procedure mirrors a burnt offering (olah): all the plunder is gathered into the center of the town square (rekhavah) and burned kalil ('completely, as a whole offering'). The phrase kalil laYHWH Elohekha ('entirely for the LORD your God') uses sacrificial language — the destroyed city becomes, in effect, a massive burnt offering. The final verdict is devastating: tel olam lo tибbane od ('a permanent ruin, it shall not be rebuilt again'). The tel ('ruin mound') will stand as a permanent monument to the consequences of apostasy.
- 18. Hebrew 13:18 (English 13:17). The prohibition velo yidbaq beyadkha me'umah min hacherem ('nothing from the devoted things shall cling to your hand') prevents anyone from profiting from the destruction. Taking plunder from a cherem city would contaminate the person — the verb davaq ('cling, adhere') portrays the banned items as spiritually adhesive. Obedience to the cherem produces divine relenting: yashuv YHWH mecharene appo ('the LORD will turn from His fierce anger'). The verbs rachamim ('compassion') and richamkha ('He will show you mercy') share the root rechem ('womb'), connecting God's compassion to maternal tenderness.
- 19. Hebrew 13:19 (English 13:18). This verse has no direct KJV equivalent at this verse number due to the one-verse offset between Hebrew and English chapter divisions (Hebrew 13 has 19 verses; English 13 has 18). The verse functions as a conditional conclusion: the promises of verse 18 (compassion, mercy, multiplication) are contingent on obedience — ki tishma beqol YHWH ('if you listen to the voice of the LORD'). The chapter ends where Deuteronomy consistently lands: covenant blessings flow from covenant faithfulness. The setumah marks the end of this legislative section.

Summary: Moses grounds Israel's dietary laws in their identity as God's children and His holy, treasured people. Clean and unclean animals are listed, and the chapter concludes with tithing regulations.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The chapter opens not with prohibition but with identity: 'You are children of the LORD your God' (v. 1). The dietary laws flow from who Israel is, not merely from what God demands. The phrase am qadosh ('holy people,' v. 2) and am segullah ('treasured possession,' v. 2) frame every food restriction as an expression of belonging, not arbitrary ritual.*

Translation Friction: *The prohibition against boiling a kid in its mother's milk (v. 21, gedi bachalev immo) — which became the basis for the entire kosher separation of meat and dairy — appears three times in the Torah (here, Exodus 23:19, 34:26). Its original meaning is debated: anti-Canaanite ritual polemic, compassion principle, or category-mixing prohibition. We rendered it literally and noted the interpretive range.*

Connections: The dietary list parallels Leviticus 11 with minor variations. The identity formula 'children of the LORD' connects to Exodus 4:22 ('Israel is my firstborn son') and Hosea 11:1. The triennial tithe for Levites, foreigners, orphans, and widows (vv. 28-29) implements the social justice vision of 10:18-19.

¹You are children of the LORD your God. You must not gash yourselves or shave the front of your heads for the dead. ²For you are a people set apart as holy to the LORD your God, and the LORD has chosen you to be His treasured possession out of all the peoples on the face of the earth. ³Do not eat anything that is detestable. ⁴These are the animals you may eat: the ox, the lamb, and the goat, ⁵the deer, the gazelle, the roebuck, the wild goat, the ibex, the antelope, and the mountain sheep. ⁶An

y animal that has a divided hoof — split completely into two sections — and also chews the cud: that animal you may eat. ⁷However, from among those that chew the cud or have a split hoof, you must not eat the following: the camel, the hare, and the rock badger. Although they chew the cud, they do not have a divided hoof — they are ritually impure for you. ⁸The pig also — because although it has a divided hoof, it does not chew the cud — is ritually impure for you. You must not eat their meat or touch their carcasses. ⁹Of everything that lives in water, you may eat whatever has fins and scales. ¹⁰Anything that does not have fins and scales you must not eat — it is ritually impure for you. ¹¹You may eat any ritually pure bird. ¹²But these are the ones you must not eat: the griffon vulture, the bearded vulture, and the black vulture, ¹³the kite, the falcon, and the buzzard of every species, ¹⁴every raven of every species, ¹⁵the ostrich, the short-eared owl, the seagull, and the hawk of every species, ¹⁶the little owl, the long-eared owl, and the barn owl, ¹⁷the desert owl, the Egyptian vulture, and the cormorant, ¹⁸the stork, the heron of every species, the hoopoe, and the bat. ¹⁹Every winged swarming creature is ritually impure for you — they must not be eaten. ²⁰Any clean winged creature you may eat. ²¹You must not eat anything that has died on its own. You may give it to the foreigner residing in your towns, and he may eat it, or you may sell it to a non-Israelite. For you are a people set apart as holy to the LORD your God. Do not cook a young goat in its mother's milk. ²²You must set aside a tenth — a full tenth — of everything your seed produces from the field each year. ²³You must eat the tithe of your grain, new wine, and olive oil, along with the firstborn of your herds and flocks, in the presence of the LORD your God at the place He will choose as the dwelling for His name — so that you learn to revere the LORD your God at all times. ²⁴But if the journey is too long for you, so that you are unable to transport it because the place the LORD your God has chosen to establish His name is too far away — when the LORD your God has blessed you abundantly — ²⁵then convert it into silver, tie the silver securely in your hand, and travel to the place the LORD your God will choose. ²⁶Spend the silver on whatever you desire — cattle, sheep, wine, beer, or anything else you want. Then eat there in the presence of the LORD your God, and celebrate with your household. ²⁷And do not neglect the Levite who lives in your towns, because he has no allotted portion or inheritance alongside you. ²⁸At the end of every three years, bring out the full tithe of your produce for that year and store it within your towns. ²⁹Then the Levite — who has no allotted portion or inheritance alongside you — along with the foreigner, the orphan, and the widow who live in your towns, may come and eat until they are full. This is so that the LORD your God will bless you in everything you do.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with Israel's identity: banim attem laYHWH ('you are children of the LORD'). This identity statement grounds all the dietary laws that follow — Israel's eating practices reflect their status as God's children. The two prohibited mourning practices — lo titgodedu ('do not gash yourselves') and lo tasimu qorchah bein eineikhem lamet ('do not place baldness between your eyes for the dead') — were common Canaanite mourning rituals involving self-laceration and head-shaving above the forehead. As God's children, Israel's response to death must differ from the nations.
2. Two terms define Israel's status: am qadosh ('holy people' — set apart, consecrated, belonging exclusively to God) and am segullah ('treasured people, prized possession'). The word segullah originally referred to a king's private treasure — personal wealth distinguished from state property. Israel is God's personal treasure among the nations. The phrase mikkol ha'ammim asher al penei ha'adamah ('from all the peoples on the face of the earth') establishes the scope of God's choice: He surveyed all humanity and selected Israel. This is election language — not based on Israel's merit but on God's sovereign decision (cf. Deut 7:7-8).
3. This single, terse command — lo tokhal kol to'evah ('do not eat any abomination') — serves as the thesis statement for the dietary laws that follow (vv 4-21). The word to'evah ('detestable thing, abomination') connects dietary violations to the same category as idolatry (cf. 12:31; 13:15). What Israel eats is not a matter of health preference but covenantal identity.
4. The permitted land animals begin with the three primary domesticated species: shor ('ox/cattle'), seh khesavim ('young sheep/lamb'), and seh izzim ('young goat'). The word seh can mean either an individual animal or a member of the flock. These three species form the core of Israel's sacrificial and dietary system — animals that are both fit for the altar and for the table.
5. Seven wild species are listed as permitted: ayyal ('deer'), tsevi ('gazelle'), yachmur ('roeback/fallow deer'), aqqo ('wild goat/ibex'), dishon ('a type of antelope' — exact identification uncertain), te'o ('wild ox' or 'oryx'), and zamer ('mountain sheep/chamois'). Several of these identifications are uncertain, as the exact species some Hebrew terms denote has been debated since antiquity. The KJV's 'pygarg' (for dishon) is from the Greek pygaros and refers to a type of antelope. The key point is that wild ruminants meeting the criteria of verse 6 are permitted.
6. The two defining criteria for permitted land animals are stated: mafresset parsah veshosa'at shesa shtei perasot ('dividing the hoof and splitting the split into two hooves' — having a completely divided, cloven hoof) and ma'alat gerah ('bringing up the cud' — chewing the cud, i.e., being a ruminant). Both criteria must be met simultaneously. This dual requirement creates a clear, observable test that does not require specialized knowledge — any Israelite can examine an animal's feet and feeding behavior.

7. Three animals that appear to meet one criterion but fail the other are listed: gamal ('camel'), arnevet ('hare'), and shafan ('rock badger/hyrax'). The description of these animals as 'chewing the cud' (ma'aleh gerah) uses observational language — these animals make chewing motions that resemble rumination, though modern zoology classifies them differently. The text uses the phenomenological categories available to ancient observers. The verdict is teme'im hem lakhem ('they are impure for you') — not inherently evil, but categorically off-limits for Israel's diet.
8. The pig (chazir) is singled out separately from the three animals in verse 7 because it presents the opposite problem: it meets the hoof criterion but fails the cud criterion. The pig became the paradigmatic forbidden animal in Jewish tradition — perhaps because its cloven hoof gives the external appearance of being permitted while it lacks the internal qualification (rumination). The additional prohibition against touching their carcasses (uvnivlatam lo tigga'u) goes beyond dietary restriction to physical contact, applying during festival pilgrimages when ritual purity was required.
9. The aquatic food law is simple: two criteria — senapir ('fins') and qasqeset ('scales') — both must be present. This permits most common fish species while excluding shellfish, eels, catfish, and other aquatic creatures that lack one or both features. The parallel passage in Leviticus 11:9-12 adds the specification 'in the seas and in the rivers,' but Deuteronomy's formulation is more concise.
10. The negative counterpart to verse 9 completes the aquatic food law. The classification tamei hu lakhem ('it is impure for you') applies to all aquatic creatures lacking both fins and scales. The setumah paragraph marker signals a section break before the bird laws begin.
11. Unlike land animals and aquatic creatures, birds are classified not by anatomical criteria but by a list of prohibited species (vv 12-18). This verse states the general permission: kol tsippor tehorah tokheilu ('every clean/pure bird you may eat'). A bird not on the forbidden list is permitted by default.
12. The forbidden bird list begins with three large raptors: neshet (traditionally 'eagle' but more likely the griffon vulture — the largest flying bird in the region), peres ('bearded vulture/lammergeier' — the KJV's 'ossifrage,' meaning 'bone-breaker'), and ozniyyah ('black vulture' or 'osprey'). The neshet identification is significant: despite its majestic reputation (used metaphorically for God's care in Exod 19:4 and Deut 32:11), the bird itself is classified as impure for eating — a reminder that symbolic nobility does not equal dietary permissibility.
13. Three more raptors: ra'ah ('kite' — a soaring bird of prey; the KJV's 'glede' is an archaic English term for the same bird), ayyah ('falcon' or 'kite'), and dayyah leminnah ('buzzard/vulture after its kind'). The phrase leminnah ('after its kind/species') indicates that the prohibition covers all subspecies within the category. Exact identification of some of these birds remains debated among scholars, as ancient Hebrew bird terminology does not map precisely onto modern ornithological classifications.
14. The orev ('raven') and all its species (lemino — 'after its kind') are prohibited. Ravens are omnivorous scavengers that feed on carrion, which may connect to the general pattern: many of the prohibited birds are predators or scavengers that consume blood and carcasses — precisely what Israelites themselves are forbidden to consume.
15. Four more forbidden birds: bat hayya'anah ('daughter of the desert' — most likely the ostrich, not the 'owl' of the KJV), tachmas ('short-eared owl' or 'nighthawk'), shachaf ('seagull' or 'sea mew'), and nets leminehu ('hawk/falcon after its kind'). The identification of bat hayya'anah as 'ostrich' is supported by the etymological connection to ya'anah ('desert dweller') and by ancient translations.
16. Three owl species: kos ('little owl' — a small, common owl in the Near East), yanshuf ('long-eared owl' or 'great owl'), and tinshemet ('barn owl' — the KJV's 'swan' is almost certainly incorrect; the tinshemet is more plausibly identified as the barn owl or white owl based on the root nasham, 'to breathe heavily,' describing the bird's distinctive breathing sound).
17. Three more prohibited birds: qa'at ('desert owl' or 'pelican' — identification uncertain; may be a type of owl that inhabits ruins, cf. Ps 102:7), rachamah ('Egyptian vulture' — the KJV's 'gier eagle'; the name may relate to rechem, 'womb,' possibly referring to the bird's parental behavior), and shalakh ('cormorant' or 'fisher-owl' — a diving waterbird).
18. The final group: chasidah ('stork' — from chesed, 'faithful love/loyalty,' perhaps named for its devoted parental care), anafah leminnah ('heron after its kind'), dukhifat ('hoopoe' — a distinctive crested bird), and atalef ('bat'). The inclusion of the bat — a mammal, not a bird — reflects the ancient classification system, which grouped flying creatures together by observable behavior (flight) rather than by internal anatomy. The Hebrew category tsippor ('flying creature') is functionally broader than the English word 'bird.'
19. The phrase sherets ha'of ('swarming thing of the wing' — winged swarming creatures) likely refers to flying insects. The blanket prohibition is qualified in Leviticus 11:21-22, which permits certain locusts with jointed legs for jumping. Deuteronomy's more absolute statement may represent a simplified summary of the more detailed Levitical regulations, or it may reflect a stricter tradition.
20. This closing permission mirrors verse 11, forming an inclusio around the bird laws. The principle is permissive by default: any flying creature not specifically prohibited is available for food. The word tahor ('clean/pure') here means ritually permitted for consumption.
21. This dense verse contains three distinct laws. First, the nevelah prohibition: animals that died naturally (not slaughtered) may not be eaten by Israelites, but may be given to the ger ('resident foreigner') or sold to a nokhri ('foreign trader'). This creates a tiered system of dietary obligation based on covenant status. Second, the holiness rationale is repeated: ki am qadosh attah ('because you are a holy people'). Third, the enigmatic law lo tevashel gedi bachalev immo ('do not cook a young goat in its mother's milk') — this prohibition, appearing three times in the Torah (Exod 23:19; 34:26; here), became the foundation of the Jewish separation of meat and dairy. Its original context may have been an anti-Canaanite worship practice, a prohibition against cruelty (perverting the maternal substance into a cooking medium), or both.

- 22. The chapter shifts from dietary laws to tithing regulations. The infinitive absolute asser te'asser ('tithing you shall tithe' — you must fully tithe) intensifies the command. The tithe applies to kol tevu'at zar'ekha ('all the produce of your seed') — everything the land yields from planting. The phrase shanah shanah ('year by year') establishes this as an annual obligation, not a one-time act. This section (vv 22-29) describes a tithe consumed at the central sanctuary — distinct from the Levitical tithe of Numbers 18:21-24.
- 23. The purpose of the tithe meal is explicitly stated: lema'an tilmad leyir'ah et YHWH ('so that you will learn to fear/revere the LORD'). The verb tilmad ('you will learn') is striking — reverence for God is not assumed but learned, and the tithe meal is one of the teaching instruments. Eating the tithe in God's presence creates a regular, embodied experience of divine encounter that shapes the worshiper's character over time. The triad degan, tirosh, yitshar ('grain, new wine, olive oil') represents the staple agricultural products.
- 24. A practical concession for distance: ki yirbeh mimmekha hadderekh ('if the way is too great for you') acknowledges that transporting agricultural produce and livestock over long distances may be impractical. The phrase ki lo tukhal se'eto ('because you are not able to carry it') is refreshingly practical — God's law accommodates physical limitations. The ironic note is that the problem arises ki yevarekekha YHWH ('because the LORD has blessed you') — the abundance itself makes transport difficult.
- 25. The solution to the transport problem is monetization: venatattah bakkesset ('you shall convert it into silver/money'). This is a remarkable economic provision — it presupposes a monetary economy where agricultural goods can be converted to and from currency. The phrase vetsarta hakessef beyadekha ('bind the silver in your hand') describes physically wrapping coins or silver pieces in cloth or a pouch for safe travel. The commercial sophistication of this law is notable for its period.
- 26. The freedom of purchase is remarkably broad: bekhol asher te'avveh nafshekha ('whatever your soul desires') — cattle, sheep, wine, and even shekhar ('beer/strong drink' — a fermented beverage, possibly from barley or dates). The inclusion of alcoholic beverages in a divinely mandated celebration is notable: the tithe feast is meant to be genuinely enjoyable. The purpose remains worship: veakhalta sham lifnei YHWH ('you shall eat there before the LORD'). The pairing of eating and rejoicing (vesamachta) reinforces that celebration is integral to Deuteronomic worship.
- 27. The Levite provision repeats from 12:19 — the repetition underscores its importance. The phrase lo ta'azvenu ('do not abandon him, do not neglect him') uses a verb that implies leaving someone destitute and unsupported. Since the Levite has no land (ein lo cheleq venachalah immakh — 'he has no portion or inheritance with you'), the tithe system is his economic lifeline. The setumah marks the transition to the third-year tithe.
- 28. The third-year tithe introduces a different system: instead of consuming the tithe at the central sanctuary, this tithe stays local — vehinachta bisharekha ('store it in your towns/gates'). This provision creates a local welfare fund on a three-year cycle. The phrase miqqetseh shalosh shanim ('at the end of three years') establishes the cycle. In years one, two, four, and five the tithe goes to the central sanctuary; in years three and six it stays local for the poor and Levites.
- 29. The four vulnerable groups in Israelite society appear together: the Levite (no land), the ger ('foreigner/resident alien' — lacks tribal membership), the yatom ('orphan/fatherless' — lacks family support), and the almanah ('widow' — lacks a husband's provision). These four categories represent the economically vulnerable who lack the normal social safety nets of land, family, and male protection. The goal is ve'akhlu vesave'u ('they shall eat and be satisfied') — not mere subsistence but genuine sufficiency. The tithe creates God's welfare system. The motivation clause — lema'an yevarekekha YHWH ('so that the LORD will bless you') — links generosity to the poor with divine blessing on the giver's own labor.

Summary: Moses legislates the sabbatical year release of debts, commands generosity toward the poor, and regulates the release of Hebrew slaves in the seventh year.

What Makes This Remarkable: The tension between verses 4 and 11 is deliberate: 'there will be no one in need among you' (v. 4) and 'the needy will never cease from the land' (v. 11). The first is the promise if Israel obeys fully; the second is the realistic provision because they will not. Jesus quotes verse 11 in Mark 14:7, and the statement makes sense only against the backdrop of verse 4's unfulfilled ideal.

Translation Friction: The word shemittah (v. 1, 'release') from the root sh-m-t ('let drop, let fall') describes not merely deferral but release — the debt falls away. Whether the shemittah cancels debts permanently or suspends collection for the sabbatical year was debated in rabbinic literature. We rendered it 'release' and noted both interpretations. The freed slave's declaration 'I love my master' (v. 16) uses the same verb ahav as the Shema's command to love God.

Connections: The sabbatical release connects to Leviticus 25's Jubilee legislation. The slave-release law echoes Exodus 21:2-6 with Deuteronomy's characteristic humanitarian motivation. Nehemiah 10:31 records the community recommitting to the shemittah. The 'open your hand' command (v. 8) becomes proverbial for generosity.

¹At the end of every seven years, you must grant a release. ²This is how the release works: every creditor must release what he has lent to his neighbor. He must not press his neighbor or his brother for payment, because the LORD's release has been proclaimed. ³You may collect from a foreigner, but whatever your brother owes you, your hand must release. ⁴There should, however, be no one in need among you, because the LORD will certainly bless you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance to possess — ⁵but only if you truly listen to the voice of the LORD your God and carefully observe this entire commandment that I am giving you today. ⁶For the LORD your God will bless you as He promised. You will lend to many nations but will not need to borrow. You will exercise authority over many nations, but they will not exercise authority over you. ⁷If there is a needy person among you — any one of your brothers in any of your towns in the land that the LORD your God is giving you — you must not harden your heart or close your fist against your needy brother. ⁸Rather, you must open your hand wide to him and willingly lend him whatever he needs to meet his lack. ⁹Guard yourself against harboring this base thought: 'The seventh year — the year of release — is approaching,' causing you to look with hostility at your needy brother and refuse to give to him. He would cry out to the LORD against you, and you would bear the guilt of sin. ¹⁰Give to him generously, and do not let your heart resent it when you give. Because of this very act, the LORD your God will bless you in all your work and in everything you undertake. ¹¹For the needy will never disappear from the land. That is why I am commanding you: open your hand wide to your brother, to the afflicted and the destitute in your land. ¹²If your brother — a Hebrew man or a Hebrew woman — is sold to you and serves you for six years, in the seventh year you must send him out as a free person. ¹³When you release him as free, you must not send him away empty-handed. ¹⁴Supply him generously from your flock, your threshing floor, and your winepress. From what the LORD your God has blessed you with, give to him. ¹⁵Remember that you yourself were a slave in the land of Egypt and the LORD your God redeemed you. That is why I am commanding you this today. ¹⁶But if the servant says to you, 'I do not want to leave you,' because he loves you and your household and is well off with you, ¹⁷then take an awl and push it through his earlobe into the door, and he will become your permanent servant. Do the same for your female servant. ¹⁸Do not consider it a hardship when you send him away free, because he has served you for six years at half the cost of a hired worker. And the LORD your God will bless you in everything you do. ¹⁹Every firstborn male born among your cattle and flocks you must consecrate to the LORD your God. You must not work your firstborn ox or shear your firstborn sheep. ²⁰Eat it in the presence of the LORD your God year after year, at the place the LORD will choose — you and your household. ²¹But if it has any defect — if it is lame or blind or has any serious flaw — you must not sacrifice it to the LORD your God. ²²Eat it within your own towns. Both the ritually impure and the ritually pure may eat it together, just as you would eat gazelle or deer. ²³Only do not eat its blood. Pour it out on the ground like water.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The shemittah ('release') is introduced with the simplest possible formula: miqqets sheva shanim ta'aseh shemittah ('at the end of seven years, make a release'). The word shemittah comes from the root shamat ('to let drop, to release, to let go') and describes the cancellation or suspension of debts. This seven-year cycle connects to the sabbatical pattern throughout the Torah — six days of work and one of rest, six years of labor and one of release. The sabbatical principle extends from time (Sabbath) to economics (debt release).
2. The mechanics are spelled out: shamot kol ba'al mashheh yado ('every owner of a loan of his hand shall release' — every creditor must let go of what he has lent). The phrase lo yiggosh et re'ehu ve'et achiv ('he shall not press his neighbor or his brother') uses the verb nagash ('to press, to exact, to oppress') — aggressive debt collection is forbidden during the release year. The theological basis is ki qara shemittah laYHWH ('because a release has been proclaimed for the LORD') — the release belongs to God; it is His decree, not a voluntary act of human generosity.
3. A distinction is drawn between the nokhri ('foreigner' — a non-Israelite who has no covenant relationship) and the ach ('brother' — a fellow Israelite bound by the same covenant). The debt release applies within the covenant community. Commercial debts with foreigners operate under different rules because the foreigner does not participate in the sabbatical cycle. The phrase tashmeit yadekha ('your hand shall release') personalizes the action — your own hand must let go of the claim.
4. The statement efes ki lo yihyeh bekha evyon ('there should be no needy person among you') expresses the divine ideal: in a fully obedient Israel, God's blessing would eliminate poverty entirely. The infinitive absolute barekh yevarekekha ('blessing He will bless you') intensifies the promise. Yet verse 11 will acknowledge that the poor will never fully disappear — creating a deliberate tension between the ideal (no poverty in a blessed land) and the reality (poverty persists because obedience is imperfect). This tension drives the legislation that follows.

5. The condition is emphatic: raq im shamo'a tishma ('only if listening you listen' — only if you truly, deeply listen). The infinitive absolute intensifies the demand. The elimination of poverty (v 4) is conditional on perfect obedience — something the text implicitly acknowledges will not be fully achieved (v 11). The phrase kol hammitsvah hazzot ('this entire commandment') treats the debt-release law not as one regulation among many but as a complete commandment demanding whole obedience.
6. The blessing of obedience is described in economic and political terms: veha'avatta goyim rabbim ('you will lend to many nations') and umashalta begoyim rabbim ('you will rule over many nations'). Lending implies surplus; ruling implies strength. The negative counterparts — ve'attah lo ta'avot ('you will not borrow') and uvekha lo yimsholu ('they will not rule over you') — describe independence from foreign economic or political domination. The setumah marks the transition to the specific laws about generosity to the poor.
7. Two vivid metaphors prohibit indifference: lo te'ammets et levavekha ('do not harden your heart' — do not make your heart rigid, unyielding) and lo tiqpts et yadekha ('do not close your fist' — do not clench your hand shut). The heart controls the will; the hand controls the action. Both interior attitude and external behavior must remain open. The phrase me'achad acheikha be'achad she'arekha ('from one of your brothers in one of your gates') makes the obligation specific and local — this is not abstract charity but concrete response to a known person in a nearby community.
8. The counter-command reverses the metaphor: patoach tiftach et yadekha ('opening you shall open your hand' — fling your hand wide open). The infinitive absolute intensifies the command — this is not tentative charity but generous, wholehearted giving. The phrase dei machsoro asher yechsar lo ('sufficient for his lack, what he is lacking') calibrates the giving to the actual need — not a fixed amount but whatever is required. The loan must be adequate to the borrower's specific situation.
9. Moses exposes the specific temptation created by the shemittah system: as the seventh year approaches, a lender knows that any loan will soon be cancelled — creating a financial incentive to refuse lending. The phrase davar im levavekha veliyya'al ('a worthless/wicked thought in your heart') uses the same beliyya'al term from 13:14, connecting economic stinginess with the same moral category as idolatrous rebellion. The phrase ra'ah einekha ('your eye is evil/hostile') describes looking at the poor person with resentment rather than compassion. The consequence is dire: the poor person will qara alekha el YHWH ('cry out against you to the LORD') — the cry of the oppressed always reaches God (cf. Exod 22:22-23).
10. The infinitive absolute naton titten ('giving you shall give') demands generous, unhesitating action. The phrase velo yera levavekha ('let your heart not be evil/resentful') addresses the interior attitude: grudging compliance is not enough. The motivation is pragmatic as well as moral: ki biglal hadavar hazzeh ('because of this very thing') the LORD will bless you. Generosity is not financial loss but investment — God returns blessing in response to obedience. The phrase bekhol ma'asekha uvkhol mishlach yadekha ('in all your work and in everything your hand is sent to') extends the blessing to every sphere of economic activity.
11. The tension with verse 4 is deliberate: there, Moses says there should be no poor; here, he says ki lo yechdal evyon miqqerev ha'arets ('the needy will never cease from the midst of the land'). The ideal (v 4) is conditional on perfect obedience; the reality (v 11) acknowledges that obedience will be imperfect. Jesus quotes this verse in Mark 14:7, not to justify indifference to poverty but to affirm the ongoing obligation to give. The command patoach tiftach ('open wide your hand') is repeated from verse 8, framing the entire section. Three terms describe the recipients: achikha ('your brother'), aniyyekha ('your afflicted/poor one'), and evyonekha ('your needy one') — escalating levels of deprivation.
12. The law now addresses debt-slavery — a person who, unable to repay debts, sells their labor. The parallel law in Exodus 21:2-6 mentions only male servants; Deuteronomy explicitly includes ha'ivriyyah ('the Hebrew woman'), extending the six-year limit and seventh-year release to women as well. This is a significant expansion of protection. The term chofshi ('free') describes a person released from all service obligations — legally unencumbered. The seven-year cycle echoes the shemittah principle: just as debts are released, so are debt-servants.
13. The prohibition lo teshallechenu reqam ('you shall not send him away empty') prevents the released servant from being cast out with nothing. Freedom without resources is precarious — the person would likely fall back into debt and servitude. This law addresses the systemic problem: mere legal release is insufficient without economic provision. The verse establishes the principle; the next verse specifies the provision.
14. The infinitive absolute ha'aneq ta'aniq ('supplying you shall supply' — furnish generously) demands lavish provision. Three sources are specified: tsonekha ('your flock' — livestock), garnekha ('your threshing floor' — grain), and yiqvekha ('your winepress' — wine). These three represent the full range of agricultural wealth: animals, grain, and wine. The principle is proportional: asher berakekha YHWH Elohekha titten lo ('from what the LORD your God has blessed you, give to him'). The released servant receives a share of God's blessing on the master's prosperity.
15. The exodus motivation grounds the entire slave-release law: vezakharta ki eved hayita be'erets Mitsrayim ('remember that you were a slave in Egypt'). Israel cannot hold permanent power over fellow Israelites because Israel itself was once enslaved. The verb padakh ('He redeemed you') uses the kinsman-redeemer concept — God paid the price to free Israel from Pharaoh's service. Having been redeemed themselves, Israelites must extend freedom to others. Ethical obligation flows from experienced grace.
16. The exception case: a servant who chooses to stay. The reasons are positive — ki ahevekha ve'et bedeutekha ('because he loves you and your household') and ki tov lo immakh ('because things are good for him with you'). This is not coercion but genuine preference — the servant's quality of life with the master exceeds what he could achieve independently. The law assumes that some masters treat their servants well enough to inspire voluntary permanent attachment.
17. The ear-piercing ceremony: the martse'a ('awl, pointed instrument') is driven through the servant's ear against the door, creating a permanent mark of voluntary servitude. The ear — the organ of hearing and obedience — is symbolically pierced, indicating permanent commitment to hearing and obeying the master. The phrase eved olam ('permanent servant') describes lifelong service. The extension ve'af la'amatekha ta'aseh ken ('also for your female servant you shall do likewise') again includes women in the same legal framework as men — a distinctive feature of Deuteronomy's legislation.

- 18. The phrase lo yiqsheh ve'einekha ('let it not be hard in your eyes') addresses the master's potential resentment at losing a servant's labor. The economic argument follows: ki mishneh sekhar sakhir avadekha ('because he has served you at double a hired worker's value' — or alternatively, 'at half the cost of a hired worker'). A debt-servant costs less than a hired laborer because the servant receives no wages. After six years of below-market labor costs, the master has already benefited significantly. The petuchah paragraph marker signals a major section break.
- 19. The firstborn law: kol habbekhor asher yivvale bivqarkha uvtsonekhah hazzakhar taqdish laYHWH ('every firstborn male born in your herd and flock you shall consecrate to the LORD'). Consecration means setting the animal apart from ordinary use — hence the two prohibitions: lo ta'avod ('do not work' — the firstborn ox cannot be used for plowing) and lo tagoz ('do not shear' — the firstborn sheep's wool cannot be harvested). The animal belongs to God from birth; using it for human benefit would violate that consecration. This law connects to the foundational principle of the exodus: God claimed Israel's firstborn because He spared them in Egypt (Exod 13:2).
- 20. The firstborn animal is consumed as a sacred meal — lifnei YHWH Elohekha ('in the presence of the LORD your God') at the central sanctuary. The phrase shanah veshanah ('year by year') indicates an annual pilgrimage obligation. The inclusion of uveitikha ('your household') makes this a family celebration. The firstborn offering thus serves double duty: it honors God's claim on the firstborn and provides an occasion for communal worship and feasting.
- 21. The exception for blemished firstborn: an animal with a mum ('defect, blemish') cannot be offered as a sacrifice. Two specific examples are given — pisheach ('lame') and ivver ('blind') — followed by the catch-all kol mum ra ('any serious/bad defect'). The principle is that only the best may be offered to God — a defective sacrifice insults the one receiving it (cf. Mal 1:8). This does not mean the animal is wasted; the next verse provides for its consumption.
- 22. The blemished firstborn reverts to the status of ordinary food: it may be eaten locally (bisharekha — 'in your gates/towns') by anyone regardless of ritual purity status (hattamei vehattahor yachdav — 'the impure and the pure together'). The comparison to gazelle and deer (tsevi and ayyal) echoes the secular slaughter permission of 12:15, 22 — blemished firstborn are treated like wild game, not like sacred offerings.
- 23. The blood prohibition appears once more (cf. 12:16, 23-25), applying specifically to the blemished firstborn eaten locally. Even when a consecrated animal is consumed as ordinary food due to a blemish, the universal blood prohibition remains in force. The instruction to pour it out kammayim ('like water') — as disposal, not as ritual — maintains the distinction between sacred and secular slaughter. The petuchah paragraph break marks the end of the firstborn legislation and transitions to the festival calendar in chapter 16.

16

Summary: Moses prescribes the three pilgrimage festivals — Passover with unleavened bread, the Festival of Weeks, and the Festival of Shelters — then appoints judges to administer righteous justice.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The Hebrew calendar is organized around liberation memory: Passover recalls the exodus, Weeks celebrates the grain harvest with thanksgiving, and Shelters remembers the wilderness journey. The phrase lechem oni (v. 3, 'bread of hardship/poverty') redefines unleavened bread — it is not celebratory bread but slave bread, eaten in haste because there was no time to let it rise. The transition from festivals (vv. 1-17) to judges (vv. 18-20) is not random: righteous worship requires righteous justice.*

Translation Friction: *The word atseret (v. 8, 'solemn assembly') marks the concluding day of a festival period. We rendered it 'solemn assembly' but the Hebrew carries the sense of 'restraint' — a day of stopping, holding back from work. The phrase tsedeq tsedeq tirdof (v. 20, 'justice, justice you shall pursue') doubles the noun for emphasis — we preserved the repetition because flattening it to 'pursue justice' loses the Hebrew's insistence.*

Connections: The festival calendar parallels Exodus 23:14-17 and Leviticus 23 with Deuteronomy's characteristic social inclusion (v. 11: 'you, your son, your daughter, your servant, the Levite, the foreigner, the orphan, the widow'). The Passover command shapes the Last Supper narratives (Matthew 26, Mark 14, Luke 22). The justice mandate in v. 20 grounds the prophetic tradition from Amos 5:24 to Micah 6:8.

¹Keep watch over the month of Aviv and celebrate the Passover to the LORD your God, because in the month of Aviv the LORD your God brought you out of Egypt during the night. ²Sacrifice the Passover offering to the LORD your God from the flock or the herd, at the place the LORD will choose as the dwelling for His name. ³Do not eat anything leavened with it. For seven days eat unleavened bread with it — bread of hardship — because you departed from the land of Egypt in urgent haste. Do this so that you remember the day you left Egypt for the rest of your life. ⁴No leaven may be found anywhere in your territory for seven days. And none of the meat you sacrifice on the evening of the first day may remain until morning. ⁵You may not sacrifice the Passover offering in just any of your towns that the LORD your God is giving you. ⁶Only at the place the LORD your God will choose as the dwelling for His name — there you must sacrifice the Passover offering in the evening, at sunset, at the same time of year that you departed from Egypt. ⁷Cook it and eat it at the place the LORD your God will choose, then in the morning you may return to your camps. ⁸For six days eat unleavened bread, and on the seventh day hold a solemn assembly to the LORD your God. Do no work on that day. ⁹Count seven weeks for yourself. Begin counting the seven weeks from the time you first put the sickle to the standing grain. ¹⁰Then celebrate the Festival of Weeks to the LORD your God with a voluntary offering from your hand, given in proportion to how the LORD your God has blessed you. ¹¹Celebrate in the presence of the LORD your God — you, your son, your daughter, your male servant, your female servant, the Levite who lives in your towns, the foreigner, the orphan, and the widow who are among you — at the place the LORD your God will choose as the dwelling for His name. ¹²Remember that you were once a slave in Egypt, and carefully observe these decrees. ¹³Celebrate the Festival of Shelters for seven days after you have gathered the produce from your threshing floor and your winepress. ¹⁴Rejoice during your festival — you, your son, your daughter, your male servant, your female servant, the Levite, the foreigner, the orphan, and the widow who live in your towns. ¹⁵For seven days celebrate the festival to the LORD your God at the place the LORD will choose, because the LORD your God will bless you in all your produce and in all the work of your hands, and you will be nothing but joyful. ¹⁶Three times each year, every male among you must appear before the LORD your God at the place He will choose: at the Festival of Unleavened Bread, the Festival of Weeks, and the Festival of Shelters. No one may appear before the LORD empty-handed. ¹⁷Each person must give according to what he can afford, in proportion to the blessing the LORD your God has given you. ¹⁸Appoint judges and officials for yourselves in all your towns that the LORD your God is giving you, tribe by tribe. They must judge the people with righteous justice. ¹⁹Do not pervert justice. Do not show favoritism. Do not accept a bribe, because a bribe blinds the eyes of the wise and twists the words of the righteous. ²⁰Justice — justice alone — you must pursue, so that you may live and possess the land the LORD your God is giving you. ²¹Do not set up an Asherah pole — any kind of wooden pole — beside the altar of the LORD your God that you will build. ²²And do not erect a sacred pillar — the LORD your God detests them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The festival calendar opens with Passover, anchored to chodesh ha'Aviv ('the month of Aviv/Abib'). Aviv means 'spring' or 'ripening grain' — it refers to the month when barley reaches maturity (later called Nisan in the Babylonian calendar). The verb shamor ('keep watch, guard, observe') implies vigilant attention to the calendar. The phrase hotsi'akha YHWH... laylah ('the LORD brought you out... at night') anchors the festival to the historical event: the nighttime exodus from Egypt. Every annual observance re-enacts and memorializes that founding deliverance.
2. Deuteronomy's Passover instruction differs from Exodus 12, which specifies only a lamb (seh). Here, both tson uvaqar ('flock and herd' — sheep/goats and cattle) are permitted. This likely reflects the additional festival offerings (chagigah) that accompanied the Passover lamb during pilgrimage celebrations. The centralization formula — bammaqom asher yivchar YHWH leshakken shemo sham ('at the place the LORD will choose to cause His name to dwell there') — shifts Passover from a household celebration (as in Exodus 12) to a centralized pilgrimage festival.
3. The chamets ('leavened bread') prohibition and the matstsot ('unleavened bread') requirement are linked to the exodus narrative: bechipazon yatsata ('you went out in haste/urgency'). The dough had no time to rise. The phrase lechem oni ('bread of affliction/hardship/poverty') describes the unleavened bread — it is poor person's bread, the bread of slaves and refugees. Eating it for seven days re-creates the sensory experience of the exodus. The purpose clause lema'an tizkor ('so that you will remember') establishes the festival as a memorial practice — kol yemei chayyekha ('all the days of your life') extends the obligation to every year of the individual's life.
4. Two prohibitions: first, se'or ('leaven/yeast starter') must not even be visible (lo yera'eh) anywhere in your territory (bekhol gevulekha) for seven days — a total purge of leaven from the household and beyond. Second, the sacrificial meat from the first evening must be consumed entirely before dawn — lo yalin... labboqer ('it shall not remain overnight until morning'). This mirrors the original Passover instructions in Exodus 12:10. Nothing sacred may be left to decay; the meal must be complete before the new day begins.
5. The centralization principle applies specifically to Passover: lo tukhal lizboach et happesach be'achad she'arekha ('you are not able to sacrifice the Passover in one of your gates'). The verb tukhal ('you are able, you may') frames the prohibition as impossibility within the covenant framework — it is not merely forbidden but categorically impermissible. This represents a significant shift from the household Passover of Exodus 12 to a centralized pilgrimage Passover.

6. Three temporal markers converge: ba'arev ('in the evening'), kevo hashemesh ('at the going down of the sun' — sunset), and mo'ed tsetekha miMitsrayim ('the appointed time of your departure from Egypt'). The sacrifice occurs at twilight — the transition between day and night — matching the original Passover timing (Exod 12:6). The word mo'ed ('appointed time, season') connects the annual observance to the historical moment: every Passover evening reenacts the original evening of deliverance.
7. The verb uvishalta ('you shall cook/boil') differs from Exodus 12:9, which specifies tseli esh ('roasted with fire') and prohibits boiling. The verb bashal can mean 'to cook' generally or 'to boil' specifically. The Chronicler resolves this by stating they 'cooked the Passover in fire' (2 Chr 35:13), using bashal in its general sense. The phrase ufanita babboqer vehalakhta le'ohalekha ('turn in the morning and go to your tents') indicates that pilgrims stayed overnight at the central sanctuary and departed the next morning. The word ohalekha ('your tents') may be literal (temporary pilgrim shelters) or metaphorical for 'your homes.'
8. The seven-day festival concludes with an atseret ('solemn assembly, closing ceremony') — a sacred gathering marked by cessation from work (lo ta'aseh melakhah — 'do no work'). The atseret signals the formal conclusion of the festival, like a bookend. The six days of eating unleavened bread (not seven, as in v 3 — the apparent discrepancy may indicate that the first day was counted separately as the Passover proper, with six additional days of unleavened bread following). The setumah marks the transition to the second festival.
9. The second pilgrimage festival — Shavuot (Weeks) — is defined by a counting process: shiv'ah shavu'ot tispor lakh ('count seven weeks for yourself'). The starting point is mehachel chermesh baqqamah ('from when the sickle begins in the standing grain') — the first day of grain harvest. This creates a direct link between agriculture and worship: the festival is not dated to a fixed calendar day but to the harvest cycle. The counting of forty-nine days (seven weeks) creates the 'Counting of the Omer' practice (cf. Lev 23:15-16).
10. The chag shavu'ot ('Festival of Weeks') is celebrated with missat nidvat yadekha ('a proportion of the freewill offering of your hand'). The word missat (from the root masas, 'to measure') suggests proportional giving — the offering is calibrated to the giver's means. The phrase ka'asher yevarekekha YHWH ('as the LORD your God has blessed you') establishes proportionality as the governing principle: those blessed abundantly give abundantly; those blessed modestly give modestly. There is no fixed amount — generosity is relative to capacity.
11. The most expansive inclusion list in the festival calendar: the household (son, daughter, servants), the landless religious worker (Levite), and the three vulnerable populations (ger, yatom, almanah — foreigner, orphan, widow). All nine categories are commanded to celebrate together. The verb vesamachta ('you shall rejoice') makes joy an obligation, not an option. The Festival of Weeks is thus a powerful equalizer — at God's chosen place, social hierarchies dissolve into shared celebration.
12. The exodus memory is invoked again as the foundation for inclusive celebration: vezakharta ki eved hayita beMitsrayim ('remember that you were a slave in Egypt'). The connection is implicit but powerful: because you were once excluded and enslaved, your festivals must include everyone — especially those who might otherwise be excluded. The petuchah paragraph break marks the major transition to the third pilgrimage festival.
13. The third pilgrimage festival: chag haSuccot ('Festival of Shelters/Booths/Tabernacles'). Unlike Passover (tied to the exodus) and Weeks (tied to wheat harvest), Sukkot is tied to the final ingathering (be'ospekha — 'when you gather in') from both the threshing floor (grain) and winepress (grapes). It is the autumn harvest festival, celebrating the completion of the agricultural year. The seven-day duration makes it the longest of the three pilgrimage festivals.
14. The inclusion list repeats from verse 11, reinforcing the principle: no festival may be celebrated alone or exclusively. The verb vesamachta ('you shall rejoice') appears again — joy is not merely permitted but commanded. The phrase bechagekha ('during your festival') makes the festival itself the occasion for joy. Sukkot was traditionally considered the most joyful of all festivals; the Talmud (Sukkah 51a) describes its celebrations as unparalleled.
15. The phrase vehayita akh sameach ('you will be nothing but joyful' — literally, 'you will be only rejoicing') is one of the strongest joy commands in Scripture. The particle akh ('only, nothing but') intensifies the command — there should be no room for anything other than joy during this festival. The basis for this joy is God's comprehensive blessing: bekhool tevu'atekha ('in all your produce') and bekhool ma'aseh yadekha ('in all the work of your hands'). The completed harvest is visible evidence of divine faithfulness.
16. This summary verse lists all three pilgrimage festivals together: chag hamMatstsot ('Festival of Unleavened Bread/Passover'), chag haShavu'ot ('Festival of Weeks'), and chag haSuccot ('Festival of Shelters'). The requirement applies to kol zekhurkha ('all your males') — the pilgrimage obligation is mandatory for males, though women and children could attend and often did (cf. 1 Sam 1:3-4). The phrase yera'eh et penei YHWH ('shall appear before the face of the LORD') can also be read as a passive/niphal: 'shall be seen by the face of the LORD' — the encounter goes both ways. The prohibition velo yera'eh... reqam ('shall not appear empty') requires every pilgrim to bring an offering.
17. The proportional giving principle is restated: ish kemattenat yado ('each man according to the gift of his hand' — according to his ability). The phrase kevirkat YHWH Elohekha ('according to the blessing of the LORD your God') makes God's blessing the measure — you give from what God has given you. This prevents both the wealthy from giving token amounts and the poor from being burdened beyond their means. The setumah marks the transition from the festival calendar to the judicial section.
18. The judicial section introduces two roles: sho'tim ('judges' — those who render legal decisions) and shotrim ('officers/officials' — those who enforce judicial decisions, functioning as court administrators or police). The phrase bekhool she'arekha ('in all your gates/towns') mandates a local judicial system — justice must be accessible to every community, not concentrated only at the central sanctuary. The mandate is mishpat tsedeq ('judgment of righteousness/just judgment') — not merely formal legal process but substantively righteous outcomes.

- 19. Three judicial corruptions are prohibited: lo tatteh mishpat ('do not bend/pervert justice' — distorting legal outcomes), lo takkir panim ('do not recognize faces' — showing favoritism based on status, wealth, or personal connection), and lo tiqqach shochad ('do not accept a bribe'). The reason for the bribe prohibition is psychological: hashochad ye'avver eini chakhamim ('a bribe blinds the eyes of the wise') — even wise, experienced judges become unable to see truth clearly when corrupted by payment. The parallel vayesallef divrei tsaddiqim ('and twists the words of the righteous') indicates that bribery doesn't just affect stupid people — it corrupts even those who are normally righteous and wise.
- 20. The emphatic repetition tsedeq tsedeq tirdof ('justice, justice you shall pursue') is one of the most quoted phrases in the Hebrew Bible. The doubling of tsedeq is interpreted variously: 'justice and only justice,' 'thorough justice,' 'justice in every case,' or 'justice by just means.' The verb tirdof ('you shall pursue, you shall chase') implies active, energetic effort — justice does not come to you; you must chase it. The stakes are national survival: lema'an tichyeh veyarashta et ha'arets ('so that you may live and possess the land'). Justice and life in the land are inseparable — injustice leads to exile.
- 21. The prohibition against planting an asherah (a sacred wooden pole or tree associated with the Canaanite goddess Asherah) beside YHWH's altar addresses the specific temptation of syncretism — blending Canaanite and Israelite worship at the same site. The phrase kol ets ('any tree/wood') broadens the prohibition: no wooden cult object of any kind may stand near God's altar. The placement of this law after the justice section (vv 18-20) may seem abrupt, but it connects to the judicial theme: just as justice must be pure and uncompromised, so must worship.
- 22. The matstsevah ('standing stone, sacred pillar') prohibition echoes 12:3, where Israel was commanded to smash the nations' pillars. The brief but powerful phrase asher sane YHWH Elohekha ('which the LORD your God hates') uses the strongest possible language of divine aversion. The personal emotional language — God 'hates' these objects — moves beyond legal prohibition to theological revulsion. The setumah marks the end of this section, transitioning to chapter 17's judicial and royal legislation.

Summary: Moses addresses judicial procedure for difficult cases, requiring multiple witnesses for capital crimes, and sets out the law of the king — Israel's future monarch must copy the Torah and read it daily.

What Makes This Remarkable: The king law (vv. 14-20) is the most restrained royal charter in the ancient Near East. The king must not multiply horses (military power), wives (political alliances), or silver and gold (treasury). He must write a personal copy of the Torah — mishneh haTorah (v. 18, 'a copy of this Law'), which gives Deuteronomy its Greek name. The king is not above the Law; he is its first student. His heart must not 'rise above his brothers' (v. 20) — kingship is leveled to brotherhood.

Translation Friction: The phrase mishneh haTorah (v. 18) could mean 'a copy of this law' or 'a second law' or 'a repetition of this law' — the LXX translated it as deuteronomion ('second law'), giving the book its English name. We rendered it 'a copy of this Law.' The judicial escalation 'if a case is too difficult for you' (v. 8) uses the verb yipale, from the same root as 'wonderful/extraordinary' — the hard case is literally 'too wonderful' for local courts.

Connections: The king law shapes the evaluation of every monarch in Kings — Solomon violates all three prohibitions (1 Kings 10-11). The prophet-like-Moses promise (18:15) functions as the king law's counterpart — prophet checks king. Josiah's Torah discovery (2 Kings 22:8-13) fulfills the mishneh haTorah command. The multiple-witness requirement (v. 6) is cited in Matthew 18:16 and 2 Corinthians 13:1.

¹You must not sacrifice to the LORD your God an ox or sheep that has any defect or serious flaw, because that is detestable to the LORD your God. ²If a man or woman is found among you, in any of the towns the LORD your God is giving you, who does what is evil in the sight of the LORD your God by violating His covenant — ³by going to serve other gods and bowing down to them — whether the sun, the moon, or any of the heavenly host, which I have not commanded — ⁴and it is reported to you and you hear about it, then you must investigate thoroughly. If it is confirmed as true — if this abomination has been committed in Israel — ⁵then bring that man or that woman who committed this wicked act out to your city gate — that man or that woman — and stone them to death. ⁶A person may be put to death only on the testimony of two or three witnesses. No one may be executed on the testimony of a single witness. ⁷The hands of the witnesses must be the first raised against the condemned person to execute the sentence, and then the hands of all the people. In this way you will purge the evil from your midst. ⁸If a legal case arises in your towns that is too difficult for you to decide — whether it involves bloodshed, civil disputes, or physical injuries — any contested matter, then go up to the place the LORD your God will choose. ⁹Go to the Levitical priests and to the judge serving at that time. Inquire of them, and they will announce the legal verdict to you. ¹⁰You must carry out the decision they announce to you from that place the LORD will choose. Be careful to do exactly as they instruct you. ¹¹Act according to the instruction of the law they teach you and the verdict they deliver to you. Do not deviate from the ruling they declare to you, either to the right or to the left. ¹²Anyone who acts presumptuously by refusing to obey the priest who stands serving the LORD your God there, or the judge — that person must die. You must purge the evil from Israel. ¹³All the people will hear about it and be afraid, and no one will act presumptuously again. ¹⁴When you enter the land the LORD your God is giving you, take possession of it, and settle in it, and you say, 'I want to set a king over me, like all the nations around me,' ¹⁵you may indeed set a king over you — but only one whom the LORD your God chooses. You must appoint a king from among your own brothers. You may not place a foreigner over you who is not one of your brothers. ¹⁶However, he must not acquire many horses for himself, and he must not send the people back to Egypt to acquire more horses, since the LORD has told you, 'You are never to go back that way again.' ¹⁷He must not acquire many wives, so that his heart will not be led astray. And he must not accumulate excessive amounts of silver and gold. ¹⁸When he takes his seat on the throne of his kingdom, he must write for himself a copy of this Law on a scroll, taken from the one kept by the Levitical priests. ¹⁹It must remain with him, and he must read from it every day of his life, so that he learns to revere the LORD his God by keeping all the words of this Law and these decrees, and carrying them out. ²⁰This will prevent his heart from becoming arrogant toward his brothers and keep him from deviating from the commandment in any direction, so that he and his descendants may enjoy a long reign over his kingdom in the midst of Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This verse connects to the blemished-firstborn law of 15:21 but broadens the principle to all sacrificial animals. The phrase mum kol davar ra ('a blemish — any bad thing') combines the specific term mum ('defect, blemish') with the general kol davar ra ('any bad/evil thing'), creating a comprehensive prohibition. The verdict ki to'avat YHWH Elohekha hu ('because it is an abomination/detestable thing to the LORD your God') classifies defective offerings in the same category as idolatry and pagan practices — it is not merely improper but revolting to God. Offering the imperfect insults God's worth (cf. Malachi 1:6-14).
2. The judicial procedure begins with the discovery of covenant violation. The phrase ish o ishah ('man or woman') establishes gender equality before the law — both are equally subject to covenant obligations and penalties. The crime is defined as la'avor berito ('to cross over/transgress His covenant'). The verb avar ('to cross, to pass over') when applied to covenant means to violate its terms — literally 'crossing the line' of the covenant boundary. The specific violation is detailed in the next verse.
3. The specific covenant violation is apostasy: serving other gods (ya'avod elohim acherim) and bowing to them (vayishtachu lahem). Three forms of astral worship are singled out: the sun (shemesh), moon (yareach), and the host of heaven (tseva hashamayim — the stars and planets). Astral worship was widespread in the ancient Near East, particularly in Mesopotamian and Canaanite cultures. The phrase asher lo tsivviti ('which I have not commanded') is understated but devastating — these objects were not merely forbidden; they were never part of God's instructions. The authority of divine command is the criterion: if God did not command it, it has no place in worship.
4. The due process requirements parallel 13:15: vedarashta heitev ('you shall investigate thoroughly'). Three stages of judicial procedure are described: huggad lekha ('it is reported to you' — the initial report), veshama'ta ('you hear' — you receive the information), and vedarashta heitev ('you investigate well/thoroughly'). Only after exhaustive investigation, when vehineh emet nakhon hadavar ('behold, it is true, the matter is established'), can the case proceed. The standard of proof is high: both emet ('truth') and nakhon ('established, certain') must be met. The word to'evah ('abomination') classifies the crime.
5. The execution takes place el she'arekha ('at your gates') — the city gate was the judicial center in ancient Israelite towns, where elders sat, cases were heard, and public justice was administered (cf. Ruth 4:1-2). The phrase et ha'ish o et ha'ishah is repeated emphatically — regardless of gender, the same penalty applies. Stoning (seqaltam ba'avanim vaMethu — 'stone them with stones and they shall die') was a communal act of execution, involving the entire community in enforcing the covenant.
6. The two-witness rule: al pi shenayim edim o sheloshah edim yumat hammet ('on the mouth of two witnesses or three witnesses the condemned shall die'). This foundational due process requirement prevents false convictions based on personal grudges or fabricated testimony. The phrase lo yumat al pi ed echad ('he shall not die on the mouth of one witness') states the negative counterpart with equal force. This principle became foundational in both Jewish and Christian legal traditions (Matt 18:16; 2 Cor 13:1; 1 Tim 5:19).
7. The witnesses bear primary responsibility: yad ha'edim tiyeh bo barishonah lahamito ('the hand of the witnesses shall be upon him first to put him to death'). This requirement serves as a deterrent against false testimony — if you testify against someone, you must personally participate in carrying out the death sentence. Knowing that your own hand must strike the first blow makes false accusation a grave personal act. The phrase vayad kol ha'am ba'acharonah ('and the hand of all the people last') involves the entire community. The formula uvi'arta hara miqqirbekha ('purge the evil from your midst') closes the section, as in 13:6. The petuchah marks a major section break.

8. The appellate court system: ki yippale mimmekha davar lammishpat ('if a matter is too extraordinary/difficult for you to judge'). The verb yippale ('it is extraordinary, it is beyond you') uses the same root as pele ('wonder') — the case exceeds local judicial competence. Three categories are listed: bein dam ledam ('between blood and blood' — homicide cases, distinguishing murder from manslaughter), bein din ledin ('between legal claim and legal claim' — civil disputes), and bein nega lanega ('between skin affliction and skin affliction' — cases involving physical injury or ritual impurity). When local courts cannot resolve these, the case goes up (ve'alita — 'you shall go up,' reflecting Jerusalem's elevation) to the central sanctuary.
9. The central court has two components: hakkohanim haLeviyim ('the Levitical priests' — religious authority) and hashofet asher yihyeh bayyamim hahem ('the judge who will be in those days' — civil authority). This dual structure combines priestly Torah expertise with judicial experience. The phrase vedarashta ('you shall inquire') places the burden on the litigant to bring the case; the phrase vehiggidu lekha ('they shall tell you') grants the central court authority to render binding decisions. The term devar hammishpat ('the word/verdict of the judgment') is authoritative — it is not advice but legal ruling.
10. The binding authority of the central court is emphasized: ve'asita al pi hadavar ('you shall act according to the word/decision'). The phrase veshamarta la'asot kekhol asher yorukha ('you shall carefully do according to all that they instruct you') uses the verb yarah ('to instruct, to teach, to direct') — the same root as Torah. The central court's ruling carries the authority of Torah instruction. Compliance is not optional — the next verses establish the penalty for defiance.
11. Two sources of authority are distinguished: haTorah asher yorukha ('the Torah/instruction they teach you' — the legal principle) and hammishpat asher yomeru lekha ('the judgment they tell you' — the specific ruling). The prohibition lo tasur min hadavar ('do not turn aside from the matter') uses the same language as the prohibition against straying from God's commands generally (cf. 5:32; 28:14). The right/left metaphor (yamin usmol) describes any deviation — there is no acceptable departure from the central court's ruling in either direction.
12. The penalty for contempt of court is death: veha'ish asher ya'aseh bezadon ('the man who acts in presumption/arrogance'). The word zadon ('presumption, arrogance, willful defiance') describes not mere disagreement but deliberate, prideful refusal to submit to legitimate authority. The defiance is directed at both religious (hakkohen ha'omed lesharet sham et YHWH — 'the priest standing to serve the LORD there') and civil (hashofet) authority. The formula umet ha'ish hahu ('that man shall die') and uvi'arta hara miYisrael ('purge the evil from Israel') establish that defiance of the judicial system threatens the entire community's covenant standing.
13. The deterrent function: vekhol ha'am yishme'u veyira'u ('all the people will hear and fear'). The verb yezidun ('they will act presumptuously') uses the same root as zadon in verse 12, creating a verbal link — the punishment for presumption prevents future presumption. The setumah marks the transition to the king's law, one of the most distinctive passages in Deuteronomy.
14. The king's law (vv 14-20) is unique in the ancient Near East — no other nation's law code regulates the king's behavior. The scenario is anticipatory: ki tavo el ha'arets ('when you come into the land'). The desire for a king is presented as Israel's initiative — ve'amarta asimah alai melekh ('you will say, I will set over me a king'). The motivation is conformity: kekhol haggoyim asher sevivotai ('like all the nations around me'). This is telling: the request is driven by imitation of other nations, not by divine instruction. The text does not condemn kingship outright but subjects it to strict conditions.
15. Three conditions for kingship: first, som tasim ('setting you may set' — the infinitive absolute grants permission but with the following qualifications). Second, asher yivchar YHWH Elohekha bo ('whom the LORD your God will choose in him') — the king must be God's choice, not merely the people's. Third, miqqerev achekha ('from the midst of your brothers') — the king must be an Israelite. The negative lo tukhal latet alekha ish nokhri ('you cannot place over you a foreign man') explicitly excludes non-Israelites. This prevents foreign domination disguised as domestic kingship. The king serves under God's authority, not independently of it.
16. The first royal restriction: lo yarbeh lo susim ('he shall not multiply horses for himself'). Horses in the ancient Near East were military technology — chariot warfare required large horse stables. Accumulating horses meant building a standing army and trusting in military power rather than God. The specific prohibition against returning to Egypt for horses (velo yashiv et ha'am Mitsraymah lema'an harbot sus) prevents both military alliance with Egypt and the symbolic reversal of the exodus. God's declaration lo tosifu lashuv badderekh hazzeh od ('you shall not again return by this way') treats return to Egypt as covenant betrayal. Solomon violated this law spectacularly (1 Kgs 10:28-29).
17. Two more restrictions: lo yarbeh lo nashim velo yasur levavo ('he shall not multiply wives, so that his heart does not turn aside') and kesef vezahav lo yarbeh lo me'od ('silver and gold he shall not greatly multiply'). Multiple wives in royal contexts meant political marriages — alliances sealed by marriage to foreign princesses who brought their gods with them. The danger is explicitly stated: velo yasur levavo ('so his heart will not turn aside') — foreign wives lead to foreign gods. Solomon's story is the definitive illustration (1 Kgs 11:1-8). The gold/silver restriction prevents the king from building a personal treasury at the people's expense — taxation for royal enrichment is prohibited.
18. The most distinctive requirement: vekhatav lo et mishneh haTorah hazzot al sefer ('he shall write for himself a copy of this Torah on a scroll'). The phrase mishneh haTorah ('copy of the Torah, second Torah') gives Deuteronomy its Greek name (Deuteronomion — 'second law'). The king must personally copy the Torah — not merely possess it but write it out by hand. The act of copying forces sustained engagement with every word. The source is specified: millifnei hakkohanim haLeviyim ('from before the Levitical priests') — the priests maintain the authoritative text, and the king copies from their master copy. The king is not above the Torah; he is under it.
19. Three requirements for the royal Torah copy: vehayetah immo ('it shall be with him' — constant physical proximity), veqara vo kol yemei chayyav ('he shall read in it all the days of his life' — daily reading, not occasional reference), and the purpose clause lema'an yilmad leyir'ah et YHWH Elohav ('so that he will learn to fear/revere the LORD his God'). As with the tithe in 14:23, reverence is something learned through practice, not assumed. The king learns reverence through daily Torah engagement. The result is practical: lishmor et kol divrei haTorah hazzot... la'asotam ('to keep all the words of this Torah... to do them'). Knowledge must produce obedience.

20. Two dangers the Torah guards against: levilti rum levavo me'echav ('so his heart does not rise above his brothers' — arrogance, the belief that the king is superior to ordinary Israelites) and levilti sur min hammitsvah yamin usmol ('so he does not turn from the commandment right or left' — deviation from God's instructions). The king is achim ('brothers') with his subjects — first among equals, not a separate class. The promise for compliance is dynastic longevity: lema'an ya'arikh yamim al mamlakhto hu uvanav ('so that he may extend days over his kingdom, he and his sons'). The king's obedience secures not just his reign but his dynasty's future. The setumah closes the king's law and the judicial section of Deuteronomy.

Summary: Moses provides for the Levites' support through sacrificial portions, prohibits Canaanite divination practices, and promises that God will raise up 'a prophet like me' from among Israel's own brothers.

What Makes This Remarkable: The prophet-like-Moses promise (vv. 15-19) is one of the most consequential prophecies in the Hebrew Bible. A navi kamoni ('a prophet like me') will arise who speaks God's words directly. The criteria for true prophecy are devastatingly simple: if the word comes true, it was from God; if not, the prophet spoke presumptuously. No theological test, no character test — only fulfillment. The passage sits between the king law (ch. 17) and the cities of refuge (ch. 19), placing prophetic authority at the center of Israel's institutional life.

Translation Friction: The list of prohibited practices (vv. 10-11) includes terms of uncertain definition: qosem (diviner), me'onen (soothsayer or cloud-reader), menachesh (one who reads omens), mekhashef (sorcerer), chover chaver (spell-caster), sho'el ov (medium), yidde'oni (spiritist), doresh el ha-metim (necromancer). We translated each descriptively and noted the semantic uncertainty where it exists.

Connections: The prophet-like-Moses promise is applied to Jesus in Acts 3:22-23 and 7:37. The divination prohibition grounds Saul's crisis when he consults the medium at Endor (1 Samuel 28). The Levitical provision connects to Numbers 18:20-24. The test of true prophecy (vv. 21-22) is invoked throughout the prophetic literature, particularly Jeremiah 28.

¹The Levitical priests — the entire tribe of Levi — shall have no portion or inheritance with Israel. They shall eat from the LORD's fire offerings and from His inheritance. ²They shall have no inheritance among their relatives — the LORD is their inheritance, as He promised them. ³This shall be the priests' rightful portion from the people, from those who offer a sacrifice — whether ox or sheep: the shoulder, the cheeks, and the stomach shall be given to the priest. ⁴You shall give him the firstfruits of your grain, new wine, and oil, and the first shearing of your flock. ⁵For the LORD your God has chosen him from all your tribes to stand and serve in the name of the LORD — him and his sons, for all time. ⁶If a Levite comes from any of your towns throughout Israel, where he has been residing, and comes with all his heart's desire to the place the LORD will choose, ⁷he may serve in the name of the LORD his God, just like all his fellow Levites who stand in service there before the LORD. ⁸He shall eat equal portions with them, in addition to whatever he has from the sale of family property. ⁹When you enter the land the LORD your God is giving you, you must not learn to practice the abominations of those nations. ¹⁰There must not be found among you anyone who makes a son or daughter pass through fire, anyone who practices divination, reads omens, interprets signs, or practices sorcery, ¹¹anyone who casts spells, consults mediums, practices spiritism, or seeks out the dead. ¹²For everyone who does these things is an abomination to the LORD, and it is because of these abominations that the LORD your God is driving them out before you. ¹³You shall be wholehearted with the LORD your God. ¹⁴These nations that you are about to dispossess listen to omen-readers and diviners, but the LORD your God has not permitted you to do so. ¹⁵The LORD your God will raise up for you a prophet from among you, from your own people, like me. You shall listen to him. ¹⁶This is what you requested from the LORD your God at Horeb on the day of the assembly, when you said, 'Do not let me hear the voice of the LORD my God again or see this great fire anymore, or I will die.' ¹⁷The LORD said to me, 'What they have said is right. ¹⁸I will raise up for them a prophet from among their own people, like you, and I will put My words in his mouth. He shall speak to them everything I command him. ¹⁹Anyone who does not listen to My words that the prophet speaks in My name — I Myself will hold that person accountable.' ²⁰But a prophet who presumes to speak a word in My name that I have not commanded him to speak, or who speaks in the name of other gods — that prophet must die. ²¹You may ask in your heart, 'How can we recognize a word that the LORD has not spoken?' ²²When a prophet speaks in the name of the LORD and the thing does not happen or come true, that is a word the LORD has not spoken. The prophet has spoken it presumptuously — do not be afraid of him."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The tribe of Levi receives no territorial allotment — no land, no farms, no herds of their own. Their 'inheritance' (nachalah) is the LORD Himself (v2) and the offerings brought to Him. This arrangement makes the priesthood economically dependent on the faithfulness of the other tribes: if Israel stops bringing offerings, the priests have nothing. The system incentivizes both priestly faithfulness (to maintain their credibility) and communal generosity (to sustain those who serve God full-time).
2. YHWH hu nachalato ('the LORD is their inheritance') — one of the most remarkable statements in Deuteronomy. While every other tribe inherits land, Levi inherits God. This is not metaphorical deprivation but theological privilege: the priestly tribe's 'possession' is the covenant relationship itself. The phrase ka'asher dibber-lo ('as He spoke to him') refers to the original Levitical commission, grounded in their loyalty during the golden calf crisis (Exod 32:26-29).
3. Three specific cuts: the zeroa ('shoulder/foreleg'), the lechayaim ('cheeks/jaws'), and the qevah ('stomach/fourth stomach of a ruminant'). These differ from the Levitical priestly portions (breast and thigh, Lev 7:31-34) — Deuteronomy may describe a different tradition or supplementary allocation. The practical effect is the same: the priests are fed from the sacrificial system, ensuring that those who serve God's altar do not go hungry.
4. Four categories of firstfruits: dagan ('grain'), tirosh ('new wine'), yitshar ('fresh oil'), and gez tsonekha ('shearing of your flock'). The firstfruits represent the initial yield — given before the farmer knows whether the harvest will be abundant or meager. Giving first requires trust: you release to God's servants before you know what remains for yourself.
5. The priestly role is defined as la'amod lesharet beshem-YHWH ('to stand and serve in the name of the LORD'). Two verbs: amad ('to stand' — the posture of readiness and attendance) and sharet ('to serve, to minister' — personal, intimate service). The priests serve 'in the name of the LORD' — they represent God to the people and the people to God. The phrase hu uvanav kol-hayyamim ('he and his sons, all the days') establishes the perpetual, hereditary nature of the office.
6. This provision addresses Levites living in outlying towns who wish to serve at the central sanctuary. The phrase bekhoh-avvat nafsho ('with all the desire of his soul') emphasizes the voluntary, passionate nature of this movement — the Levite comes because he wants to serve, not because he is summoned. 'The place the LORD will choose' (hammaqom asher-yivchar YHWH) is Deuteronomy's standard phrase for the central sanctuary, later identified as Jerusalem.
7. Equal access: the traveling Levite serves on the same terms as those already stationed at the sanctuary (kekhol-echav haleviyyim ha'omedim sham). No distinction is made between 'local' and 'visiting' Levites — all who desire to serve may serve equally. This provision protects the rural Levite from being treated as second-class when he arrives at the central sanctuary.
8. Equal food allocation: cheleq kecheleq ('portion like portion'). The arriving Levite receives the same share as the permanent staff. The final clause — levad mimmarav al-ha'avot ('apart from what comes from the sale of ancestral property') — acknowledges that some Levites may have private resources from family transactions, and these do not reduce their sanctuary allotment. Private means do not diminish communal rights.
9. The chapter shifts abruptly from priestly provision (v1-8) to forbidden practices (v9-14). The connection is purposeful: Israel will not need Canaanite divination practices because God provides prophets (v15-22). The verb tilmad ('learn') suggests these practices are acquired behaviors, not instincts — Israel must choose not to learn what Canaan teaches. The to'avot ('abominations') are specified in v10-11.
10. The forbidden list begins with the most horrific: ma'avir beno-uvitto ba'esh ('making a son or daughter pass through fire') — child sacrifice, associated with the Canaanite god Molech. Four additional categories follow: qosem qesamim ('practicing divination' — seeking knowledge through forbidden means), me'onen ('reading omens' — from clouds, animal behavior, etc.), menachesh ('interpreting signs' — serpent omens or whispered spells), and mekhashef ('sorcerer' — using supernatural manipulation). Each represents an attempt to access information or power outside God's authorized channels.
11. Four more forbidden categories: chover chaver ('spell-caster' — binding through incantation), sho'el ov ('consulting a medium' — ov refers to a spirit of the dead or the pit from which it speaks), yidde'oni ('spiritist' — from yada, 'to know' — one who claims forbidden knowledge through spirits), and doresh el-hammetim ('inquirer of the dead' — necromancy). The comprehensive list of nine forbidden practices (v10-11) covers every known form of Canaanite occult activity. Israel is prohibited from all of them without exception.
12. The Canaanite dispossession is explicitly linked to these practices — ubighlal hatto'evot ha'elohim ('because of these abominations'). The conquest is not arbitrary but judicial: the land's previous inhabitants are removed because of their occult practices. This creates a warning for Israel: the same behavior that caused the Canaanites' expulsion will cause Israel's expulsion if adopted. The land does not tolerate to'evah regardless of who commits it.
13. Tamim tiyeh im YHWH Elohekha ('you shall be wholehearted/blameless with the LORD your God') — the same tamim required of Abraham (Gen 17:1) and of sacrificial animals (Lev 1:3). For a person, tamim means undivided loyalty — not moral perfection but complete devotion. The contrast with v9-12 is clear: instead of dividing loyalty between God and occult practices, Israel must be tamim — whole, integrated, entirely committed to the LORD.

14. The pivotal contrast: the nations listen to diviners — ve'attah lo khen natan lekha YHWH Elohekha ('but as for you, the LORD your God has not given you such a thing'). Israel does not need divination because God provides something better: prophetic revelation (v15-22). The denial creates a vacuum that v15 fills: no omens, no sorcery — instead, a prophet.
15. Navi miqqirbekha me'achekha kamoni ('a prophet from your midst, from your brothers, like me') is Moses's designation of the prophetic office as his institutional successor. The word kamoni ('like me') is ambiguous: it could mean 'a prophet like me' (one specific future figure) or 'prophets like me' (a succession of prophetic voices). Both readings have been maintained across Jewish and Christian traditions. The command elav tishma'un ('to him you shall listen') echoes the Shema — the same verb shama ('listen/obey') that governs the entire covenant relationship.
16. Moses connects the prophetic promise back to the people's request in Deuteronomy 5:23-27: the nation asked for a mediator because direct divine encounter was unbearable. The prophet is God's answer to that request — authorized human speech replacing the terrifying divine voice from the fire. The prophetic office is born from the people's own acknowledged limitation: they cannot endure God's direct presence.
17. God's validation — heitivu asher dibberu ('they spoke well in what they said') — repeats verbatim from 5:28. God approves the request for mediated revelation. The prophet is not a concession to weakness but a divinely endorsed arrangement. Direct encounter with God's voice and fire is legitimate but unsustainable; prophetic mediation is God's preferred long-term communication method.
18. God speaks in first person, confirming v15: navi aqim lahem ('I will raise up a prophet for them'). The mechanism of prophetic authority: venatatti devaray befi ('I will put My words in his mouth'). The prophet does not generate his own message — God places the words there. The prophet is a vessel, not a source. The phrase vedibber aleihem et kol-asher atsavvennu ('he shall speak to them everything I command him') defines the prophet's total obligation: nothing added, nothing withheld.
19. The consequence of rejecting the prophet's message: anokhi edrosh me'immo ('I Myself will hold them accountable,' literally 'I will seek it from them'). God takes personal responsibility for enforcing the prophet's authority. To reject the prophet is to reject God, because the prophet speaks beshmi ('in My name') — with God's full authorization. The first-person anokhi ('I Myself') is emphatic.
20. Two capital offenses for prophets: speaking unauthorized words in God's name (asher lo-tshivviti ledabber — words God did not command) and speaking in the name of other gods. The verb yazid ('presumes, acts presumptuously') describes arrogant overreach — the prophet who puts his own words in God's mouth. The death penalty for false prophecy protects the community from being misled by someone claiming divine authority fraudulently. The same verb yazid connects to Nadab and Abihu's unauthorized fire (Lev 10:1) — presumptuous approach to God is lethal.
21. The practical question: how do you tell a true prophet from a false one? The question arises 'in your heart' (bilevavekha) — it is an internal struggle, not merely an academic inquiry. The question is legitimate: if prophets claim to speak for God, how does the community evaluate the claim? The answer (v22) provides one criterion, though the Hebrew Bible elsewhere adds others (Deut 13:1-5, Jer 28).
22. The fulfillment test: if the predicted event does not occur (velo-yihyeh haddavar velo yavo — 'the thing does not happen and does not come'), the prophet spoke without divine authorization. The closing imperative — lo tagur mimmennu ('do not be afraid of him') — frees the community from the intimidation of false prophetic authority. A false prophet may be charismatic and convincing, but failed prediction exposes the fraud. The test is retrospective: it evaluates prophecy after the predicted time has passed. The chapter's logic is complete: instead of divination (v9-14), God provides prophets (v15-19), with a test to distinguish true from false (v20-22).

Summary: Moses establishes three cities of refuge for those who kill unintentionally, legislates against moving boundary markers, and requires multiple witnesses for legal testimony.

What Makes This Remarkable: The city-of-refuge law distinguishes between the manslayer (rotseach, one who kills accidentally) and the murderer. The test case is vivid: a man swings an axe, the iron head flies off the handle, and strikes his neighbor (v. 5). The go'el haddam ('blood avenger,' v. 6) is the victim's kinsman whose obligation to avenge is acknowledged but channeled — emotion is real, but justice requires investigation. The boundary-marker prohibition (v. 14) treats a survey stone as sacred: to move it is to steal from the dead who established it.

Translation Friction: The phrase bivli da'at (v. 4, 'without knowledge/intention') is the Hebrew legal standard for accidental killing — English 'unintentionally' captures the sense but loses the epistemological dimension: the killer literally 'did not know.' The lex talionis in verse 21 — 'life for life, eye for eye' — is placed in a judicial context, specifying proportional punishment administered by courts, not personal vengeance.

Connections: The cities of refuge elaborate Numbers 35:9-34 and are implemented in Joshua 20. The go'el haddam institution connects to the go'el theology in Ruth 3-4. The multiple-witness rule (v. 15) echoes 17:6 and is cited by Jesus (Matthew 18:16) and Paul (2 Corinthians 13:1). The false-witness law anticipates the Naboth episode in 1 Kings 21.

¹When the LORD your God cuts off the nations whose land the LORD your God is giving you, and you dispossess them and settle in their cities and in their houses, ²you must set apart three cities for yourself within your land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess. ³You must prepare the road and divide the territory of your land — which the LORD your God is granting you as an inheritance — into three regions, so that anyone who kills a person may flee there. ⁴This is the provision for the one who kills and may flee there to save his life: someone who strikes his neighbor unintentionally, without having previously harbored hostility toward him. ⁵For example, if a man goes into the forest with his neighbor to chop wood, and as he swings the axe to cut down a tree the iron head flies off the handle and strikes his neighbor so that he dies — that man may flee to one of these cities and save his life. ⁶Otherwise the blood avenger might pursue the killer in the heat of his anger, overtake him because the distance is too great, and strike him dead — even though he does not deserve the death penalty, since he had no prior hostility toward the victim. ⁷This is why I am commanding you: you must set apart three cities for yourself. ⁸When the LORD your God expands your territory, as He swore to your ancestors, and gives you the entire land that He promised to give to your ancestors — ⁹provided you keep this entire commandment that I am commanding you today by carrying it out — to love the LORD your God and to walk in His ways at all times — then you must add three more cities beyond these three, ¹⁰so that innocent blood is not shed in your land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance, and bloodguilt fall upon you. ¹¹But if a man harbors hatred toward his neighbor, lies in ambush for him, rises up and strikes him fatally so that he dies, and then flees to one of these cities, ¹²the elders of his own city must send for him, take him from there, and hand him over to the blood avenger, and he must die. ¹³Your eye must not show pity for him. You must purge the guilt of innocent blood from Israel, so that it may go well with you. ¹⁴You must not move your neighbor's boundary marker, which previous generations established in your inheritance that you will receive in the land the LORD your God is giving you to possess. ¹⁵A single witness may not stand against a person for any crime or any offense — whatever the transgression. A matter may be established only on the testimony of two or three witnesses. ¹⁶If a malicious witness rises up against a person to accuse him of wrongdoing, ¹⁷then both parties to the dispute must stand before the LORD — before the priests and the judges who are serving at that time. ¹⁸The judges must investigate thoroughly. If the witness turns out to be a lying witness who has testified falsely against his brother, ¹⁹then you must do to him what he intended to do to his brother. So you will purge evil from your midst. ²⁰Those who remain will hear about it and be afraid, and they will never again do such an evil thing in your midst. ²¹Your eye must not show pity: life for life, eye for eye, tooth for tooth, hand for hand, foot for foot.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb yakhrit ('cuts off') signals complete removal of the Canaanite nations from the land. The sequence dispossess—settle (virishtem—veyashavtem) describes Israel stepping into an existing infrastructure — cities already built, houses already standing. This opening sets the geographical context for the refuge-city legislation that follows: once the land is settled, accidental homicide needs legal infrastructure.
2. The verb tavidil ('set apart, separate') is the same root used for God's separating acts in creation (Genesis 1:4, 6, 14). Setting apart refuge cities is an act of sanctified distinction — carving sacred space within the land where justice operates differently. Three cities ensures reasonable geographic coverage across the territory west of the Jordan.
3. The command takhin lekha haderekh ('prepare the road for yourself') requires active infrastructure work — roads must be maintained and marked so a fleeing manslayer can reach safety quickly. The Talmud (Makkot 10b) records that the roads to refuge cities were kept clear and signposted. The verb shilashta ('divide into three') ensures equal geographic distribution so no part of the land is too far from a refuge city.
4. The phrase bivli da'at ('without knowledge' — unintentionally) is the crucial legal distinction: the refuge city protects only unintentional killers. The idiom lo sone lo mitmol shilshom ('not hating him from yesterday and the day before' — no prior hostility) establishes a second criterion: the killing must be both accidental and unpremeditated. Prior hostility converts an accident into suspected murder.

5. This case study is remarkably specific: a woodcutting accident where the axe head (habarzel — 'the iron') detaches from the handle (ha'ets — literally 'the wood,' used here for the wooden shaft). The specificity makes the law accessible — it illustrates the principle through a concrete scenario that any Israelite could envision. The verb nashal ('slipped off, flew off') emphasizes the accidental nature: the tool malfunctioned, not the person.
6. The go'el haddam ('blood avenger, kinsman redeemer of blood') had a legal obligation in ancient Israel to pursue and kill the person who shed his relative's blood. The law recognizes the emotional reality — ki yecham levavo ('because his heart is hot') acknowledges legitimate grief-driven rage — while insisting that justice, not vengeance, must prevail. The refuge city system channels the blood avenger's rights through judicial process.
7. The emphatic al ken anokhi metsavvekha ('therefore I am commanding you') connects the commandment directly to the scenario just described. The three-city requirement is not arbitrary but grounded in the urgency of protecting innocent life from misguided retribution.
8. The conditional im yarchiv ('if He expands') envisions a future territorial expansion beyond the initial conquest, fulfilling the full scope of the Abrahamic land promise. The reference to the patriarchal oath (nishba laavotekha — 'He swore to your fathers') roots the refuge-city system in covenant history: as God's promise grows, so must the infrastructure of justice.
9. The expansion from three to six refuge cities is conditioned on covenant faithfulness: loving God (le'ahavah) and walking in His ways (lalekhet bidherakhav). This is remarkable — more territory means more responsibility for justice, not just more land. The three additional cities would bring the total to six west of the Jordan, matching the six cities of refuge prescribed in Numbers 35:13-14 (three east, three west).
10. The purpose clause reveals the deeper logic: failing to provide refuge cities results in dam naqi ('innocent blood') being shed — both the accidental killer's (if murdered by the avenger) and collectively, the community's bloodguilt (damim — literally 'bloods,' plural for accumulated guilt). The land itself bears the moral weight of unpunished or unjust killing.
11. The contrasting case: premeditated murder marked by three elements — hatred (sone), ambush (arav), and lethal violence (hikkahu nefesh — 'struck him dead'). The sequence establishes motive, planning, and execution. The murderer's attempt to misuse the refuge system — fleeing there after deliberate killing — is anticipated and explicitly prohibited.
12. The elders of the murderer's home city — not the refuge city — bear responsibility for extradition. They know the accused and can testify to the prior hostility. The process is communal and judicial: the elders act, not a vigilante. Handing over to the go'el haddam restores the blood avenger's legitimate claim while ensuring that only confirmed murderers face execution.
13. The phrase lo tachos einekha ('your eye shall not pity') appears repeatedly in Deuteronomy's justice legislation (13:8, 19:13, 21, 25:12). It combats the natural human impulse toward misplaced mercy that would allow murderers to escape justice. The verb bi'arta ('purge, burn out') treats bloodguilt as contamination that must be removed from the community's midst — the same verb used for purging evil throughout Deuteronomy.
14. The boundary marker (gevu) was a stone or cairn marking property lines. Moving it was a form of land theft — enlarging your own field at your neighbor's expense. The phrase asher gavlu rishonim ('which the predecessors established') gives the markers intergenerational authority: they reflect the original divine allocation of land at the conquest. To move them is to challenge not just a neighbor's rights but the covenant's distribution of inheritance.
15. The two-witness rule (al pi shnei edim — 'on the mouth of two witnesses') is one of ancient Israel's most important legal safeguards and is cited by Jesus (Matthew 18:16) and Paul (2 Corinthians 13:1). The threefold repetition of 'any' (lekhol avon, lekhol chattat, bekhol chet) emphasizes universality: no exception exists, regardless of the offense's severity. This prevents false accusation from destroying an innocent person.
16. The ed chamas ('witness of violence' — malicious witness) is not merely mistaken but intentionally harmful. The term chamas ('violence, wrongdoing') characterizes the witness's intent: the testimony itself is an act of violence against the accused. The phrase la'anot bo sarah ('to testify against him a turning aside' — to give deviant testimony) uses sarah, which implies deliberate departure from truth.
17. The accused and the accuser both appear lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD'), indicating that the judicial proceeding is conducted in God's presence — likely at the central sanctuary. The dual judicial authority of priests and judges (kohanim and sho'tim) reflects Israel's integrated system where religious and civil authority collaborate in adjudication. The phrase 'in those days' allows for future institutional development.
18. The verb dareshu ('they must investigate') with the adverb hetev ('thoroughly, well') demands rigorous judicial inquiry — not passive reception of testimony but active interrogation. The double use of sheqer ('lie, falsehood') — ed sheqer ('lying witness') and sheqer anah ('testified falsely') — emphasizes the gravity of perjury. Calling the accused 'his brother' (be'achiv) reminds the court that false testimony violates covenant brotherhood.
19. The lex talionis applied to perjury: the false witness receives the exact punishment he sought to impose on the accused (ka'asher zamam — 'as he plotted'). This is not general retribution but precise judicial mirroring. The formula ubi'arta hara miqirbekha ('you shall purge evil from your midst') appears seven times in Deuteronomy, functioning as a theological conclusion to judicial prescriptions — evil is a contaminant that must be removed.
20. The deterrent function of public punishment: yishme'u veyira'u ('they will hear and fear'). The judicial system serves not only retributive justice but communal education — the consequence is meant to be known and to prevent repetition. This formula (hear-and-fear) appears in Deuteronomy 13:12, 17:13, 19:20, and 21:21, always after cases involving community-threatening offenses.
21. The lex talionis ('law of retaliation') — nefesh benefesh, ayin be'ayin — establishes proportional justice: the punishment must match the crime, no more and no less. In context, this applies specifically to the false witness (v 19): the perjurer receives the same harm he intended. Ancient Near Eastern legal scholars broadly recognize this principle as limiting excessive punishment rather than mandating physical mutilation — the penalty cannot exceed the damage sought.

Summary: Moses lays out the laws of warfare: a priest encourages the army, four categories of men are exempted from battle, terms of peace are offered to distant cities, but Canaanite cities receive no such offer.

What Makes This Remarkable: The exemptions are extraordinary by ancient standards: a man who built a house but has not dedicated it (chanakho, v. 5), planted a vineyard but not yet enjoyed its fruit, betrothed a wife but not yet married her, or is simply afraid. The last exemption (v. 8) is the most remarkable — a frightened soldier is sent home not as punishment but to prevent his fear from spreading. The military chaplain's speech (vv. 3-4) places theology before tactics: 'the LORD your God is the one going with you.'

Translation Friction: The cherem command for Canaanite cities (vv. 16-17) — 'you shall not let anything that breathes remain alive' (kol neshamah) — is Deuteronomy's hardest text. We rendered it without softening, as the Hebrew does not soften it. The verb hacharim tacharimem uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis: 'you shall utterly devote them to destruction.' The tree-protection law (vv. 19-20) — 'are the trees of the field human, that they should be besieged by you?' — is a surprising ecological ethic embedded in a military code.

Connections: The warfare exemptions are applied in Judges 7:3 (Gideon's army reduction). The distant-city/near-city distinction governs Joshua's campaigns (Joshua 9-11). The tree-preservation law may ground the later rabbinic principle of bal tashchit ('do not destroy'). The priest's speech anticipates the Levitical war-theology of 2 Chronicles 20:15-17.

¹When you go out to battle against your enemies and you see horses and chariots — a force larger than your own — do not be afraid of them, for the LORD your God is with you, the one who brought you up from the land of Egypt. ²When you draw near to battle, the priest must come forward and address the troops. ³He must say to them: 'Hear, Israel! Today you are going into battle against your enemies. Do not let your hearts grow weak. Do not be afraid. Do not panic. Do not be terrified of them, ⁴because the LORD your God is the one marching with you. He will fight for you against your enemies to deliver you.' ⁵Then the officers must address the troops: 'Is there anyone who has built a new house and has not yet dedicated it? Let him go back home, so that he does not die in battle and another man dedicate it. ⁶Is there anyone who has planted a vineyard and has not yet begun to enjoy its fruit? Let him go back home, so that he does not die in battle and another man enjoy it. ⁷Is there anyone who has become engaged to a woman and has not yet married her? Let him go back home, so that he does not die in battle and another man marry her.' ⁸The officers must continue speaking to the troops: 'Is there anyone who is afraid or faint of heart? Let him go back home, so that his brothers' hearts do not melt like his own.' ⁹When the officers have finished addressing the troops, they must appoint army commanders at the head of the people. ¹⁰When you approach a city to fight against it, you must first offer it terms of peace. ¹¹If it responds with peace and opens its gates to you, then all the people found in it will become your forced laborers and will serve you. ¹²But if it does not make peace with you and instead wages war against you, you must lay siege to it. ¹³When the LORD your God delivers it into your hands, you must strike down every male in it with the sword. ¹⁴However, the women, the children, the livestock, and everything else in the city — all its plunder — you may take as spoil for yourselves. You may consume the plunder of your enemies that the LORD your God has given you. ¹⁵This is how you must treat all the cities that are very far from you — those that are not among the cities of these nearby nations. ¹⁶However, in the cities of these peoples that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance, you must not let anything that breathes remain alive. ¹⁷You must completely devote them to destruction — the Hittites, the Amorites, the Canaanites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites — just as the LORD your God has commanded you, ¹⁸so that they do not teach you to imitate all the detestable practices they performed for their gods, and you thereby sin against the LORD your God. ¹⁹When you besiege a city for an extended time, waging war against it to capture it, you must not destroy its trees by swinging an axe against them. You may eat from them, but you must not cut them down. Is a tree of the field a human being, that it should be besieged by you? ²⁰Only trees that you know are not food-producing trees — those you may destroy and cut down. You may use them to build siege works against the city that is waging war with you, until it falls.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Horses and chariots (sus varekev) represent the most advanced military technology of the ancient Near East — Israel's enemies routinely possessed what Israel lacked. The command lo tira ('do not fear') is grounded not in military capability but in divine presence (YHWH Elohekha immakh — 'the LORD your God is with you'). The exodus reference (hamma'alkha me'erets Mitsrayim) is the theological warrant: the God who defeated Egypt's chariots at the sea can handle any army.
2. The kohen ('priest') speaks before the military officers — war in Israel begins with theological proclamation, not tactical briefing. This is the mashuach milchamah ('the priest anointed for war') mentioned in rabbinic literature. His role establishes that Israel's warfare is fundamentally different: it is covenant warfare under divine command, not merely political conflict.
3. The priest's address opens with shema Yisra'el ('Hear, Israel!') — the same formula as the great confession of Deuteronomy 6:4, here deployed in a military context. Four prohibitions cover the full spectrum of fear: al yerakh levavkhem ('do not let your hearts go soft'), al tire'u ('do not fear'), al tachpezu ('do not panic, do not be hasty'), al ta'artsu ('do not be terrified'). The escalating vocabulary addresses every stage from private anxiety to public terror.
4. The theological core of Israel's warfare doctrine: God fights (lehillachem lakhem — 'to fight for you'). The verb lehoshi'a ('to save, to deliver') transforms the battle from a military engagement into a salvation event. Israel's role is faithfulness and obedience; the outcome belongs to God. This same theology appears at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:14): 'The LORD will fight for you; you need only be still.'
5. The shotrim ('officers, officials') administer three military exemptions (vv 5-7), each protecting a man's right to enjoy the fruit of his labor. The first: building but not dedicating a house (chanakho — the root ch-n-k gives us 'Hanukkah,' meaning 'dedication'). The exemption reflects a deep humane principle: a man should not die before experiencing what he has worked to create.
6. The second exemption: planting a vineyard without having chillelo ('profaned it' — that is, made it available for common use). Under Leviticus 19:23-25, a vineyard's fruit was forbidden for the first three years and sacred in the fourth. The verb chillel here means to take the fruit from the sacred domain into ordinary use — the first non-sacred harvest. A man deserves to taste what he planted.
7. The third exemption: betrothal without marriage. In Israelite law, betrothal (erusin) created a binding legal relationship — the woman was legally committed — but the marriage was not yet consummated. The fear that ish acher yiqqachennah ('another man will take her') would mean the betrothed woman becomes a widow before ever becoming a wife. Deuteronomy 24:5 extends this protection to a full year of exemption for newly married men.
8. The fourth exemption differs from the first three: it is psychological, not circumstantial. The hayare verakh hallevav ('fearful and soft of heart') may leave because fear is contagious — velo yimas et levav echav ('so he does not cause his brothers' hearts to melt'). The verb masas ('melt') describes the collapse of courage. Gideon's army was reduced by this same principle (Judges 7:3). Military effectiveness requires wholehearted commitment.
9. Only after theological preparation (the priest's speech) and humane exemptions (the officers' announcements) does the military organize for battle. The sarei tseva'ot ('commanders of armies') are appointed to lead — military structure follows spiritual and social readiness. The section marker (samekh) closes the pre-battle procedures.
10. The requirement to offer shalom ('peace') before attacking is a remarkable restraint on warfare. The verb qara'ta ('you shall call, proclaim') suggests a formal, public announcement — not a private negotiation but an official offer. This applies to cities outside the Promised Land (distant cities, v 15); the Canaanite cities within the land have a different legal status (vv 16-18).
11. Acceptance of peace terms results in subjugation, not extermination. The population becomes lamas ('forced labor, corvée workers') — the same institution Solomon later imposed on non-Israelite populations (1 Kings 9:21). While coercive by modern standards, within the ancient Near Eastern context this represents restraint: the alternative was total destruction. Lives are preserved through submission.
12. Refusal of peace terms triggers siege warfare (tsarta aleiha — 'you shall besiege it'). The verb tsur ('besiege, confine') describes surrounding a city to cut off supplies and force capitulation. The city's own decision to fight — rather than accept peace — determines its fate. The moral responsibility shifts to the city that rejected the offer.
13. Upon divine victory (unetanah YHWH — 'the LORD gives it'), the male combatants are executed (kol zekhorah — 'every male'). The phrase lefi charev ('by the mouth of the sword') is a standard Hebrew idiom treating the sword as a devouring instrument. This applies to distant cities (v 15), not the Canaanite cities within the land, which have stricter terms (v 16).
14. Non-combatants (women, children) and property (livestock, goods) are exempted from the sword. The verb tavorz ('you may plunder') and the phrase ve'akhalta et shelal oyevekha ('you may consume your enemies' plunder') frame the spoils as God's provision — asher natan YHWH ('which the LORD gave'). Even the spoils of war are a divine gift, not merely a military prize.
15. This verse clarifies that the preceding rules (peace offer, male combatants, non-combatant exemptions) apply only to distant cities (harechokot mimmekha me'od — 'very far from you'). The sharp distinction between distant and nearby cities creates a two-tier system of warfare: negotiation-based rules for foreign wars versus total destruction for Canaanite cities (vv 16-18).

16. The command lo techayeh kol neshamah ('you shall not keep alive anything that breathes') applies exclusively to the Canaanite cities within the Promised Land. The totality is absolute: neshamah ('breath, living being') encompasses all human life. This is the cherem ('ban, devotion to destruction') — an act of sacred judgment, not military strategy. The theological rationale follows in verse 18.
17. The infinitive absolute construction hacharim tacharimem ('destroying you shall destroy' — you must completely devote to destruction) intensifies the command. The six-nation list (sometimes seven with the Gergashites) represents the indigenous Canaanite population. The verb charam means to devote irrevocably to God — items under cherem are removed from human use and given entirely to God, whether through destruction or dedication.
18. The theological rationale for the cherem: prevention of religious contamination. The verb lo yelammedu ('so that they do not teach') identifies the Canaanite nations as sources of instruction in to'avot ('detestable practices, abominations') — a term encompassing child sacrifice, ritual prostitution, and other practices condemned throughout Deuteronomy. The logic is quarantine: Israel's covenant faithfulness requires removing the source of spiritual infection.
19. This environmental law during wartime is extraordinary in the ancient world. The rhetorical question ki ha'adam ets hassadeh is debated: it can be read as 'Is the tree a man that it should come under siege?' (prohibitive — trees are not combatants) or 'The tree of the field is man's life' (utilitarian — trees sustain human life). The rendering follows the interrogative reading, which most modern scholars prefer. The practical distinction between fruit trees (protected) and non-fruit trees (v 20, may be cut) reveals ecological wisdom embedded in military law.
20. Non-fruit trees may be used for siege construction (matsvor — 'siege works, bulwarks'). The distinction preserves the agricultural infrastructure that will sustain the land after conquest. The phrase ad riddah ('until it falls, until its going down') describes the city's eventual capitulation. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the warfare laws section. These regulations — from priestly encouragement to environmental protection — create what later Jewish tradition calls milchemet reshut ('optional warfare') as distinct from milchemet mitsvah ('commanded warfare').

Summary: Moses addresses unsolved murder (the heifer ritual), rights of captive women, the firstborn's inheritance rights, the rebellious son, and the burial of executed criminals.

What Makes This Remarkable: The heifer ritual for unsolved murder (vv. 1-9) is one of the Torah's most mysterious ceremonies. The elders of the nearest city break a heifer's neck in a flowing wadi, wash their hands over it, and declare 'our hands did not shed this blood.' The ritual transfers communal guilt for unavenged blood — because even unknown murder pollutes the land. The rebellious son law (vv. 18-21) requires both parents to bring the charge, making unilateral patriarchal punishment impossible.

Translation Friction: *The verb araf (v. 4, 'break the neck') describes a specific method of killing used nowhere else in sacrificial law — this is not a sacrifice but a ritual of atonement through substitution. The phrase kapper le-ammekha (v. 8, 'grant atonement for your people') uses the same kippur vocabulary as Leviticus 16. The hanged man under 'God's curse' (qilelat Elohim, v. 23) is cited by Paul in Galatians 3:13 as applied to Christ.*

Connections: *The captive-woman law (vv. 10-14) provides rights unprecedented in ancient Near Eastern warfare. The firstborn inheritance law (v. 17, pi shnayim, 'a double portion') establishes the legal framework that Esau trades away (Genesis 25:31-34) and Elisha requests spiritually (2 Kings 2:9). The burial requirement (v. 23) governs the treatment of Jesus's body in John 19:31.*

¹If a slain person is found lying in the open field in the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess, and it is not known who struck him down, ²then your elders and your judges must go out and measure the distances to the cities surrounding the slain person. ³The elders of the city nearest to the body must take a young cow that has never been worked and has never worn a yoke. ⁴The elders of that city must bring the cow down to a perennial wadi — a valley that is neither plowed nor sown — and they must break the cow's neck there in the wadi. ⁵Then the Levitical priests must come forward, for the LORD your God has chosen them to minister to Him and to pronounce blessings in the name of the LORD, and every dispute and every case of physical assault is to be resolved by their verdict. ⁶All the elders of the city nearest to the body must wash their hands over the young cow whose neck was broken in the wadi. ⁷They must declare: 'Our hands did not shed this blood, and our eyes did not see it happen. ⁸Grant atonement for your people Israel, whom you redeemed, O LORD, and do not hold the guilt of innocent blood against your people Israel.' Then the bloodguilt will be atoned for. ⁹So you will purge the guilt of innocent blood from your midst by doing what is right in the eyes of the LORD. ¹⁰When you go out to war against your enemies and the LORD your God delivers them into your hands, and you take captives, ¹¹and you see among the captives a beautiful woman and are attracted to her, desiring to take her as your wife, ¹²then you must bring her into your house. She must shave her head and trim her nails. ¹³She must remove the clothing of her captivity, live in your house, and mourn her father and mother for a full month. After that, you may go to her and become her husband, and she will be your wife. ¹⁴If you later find that you are not pleased with her, you must let her go wherever she wishes. You must not sell her for money. You must not treat her as property, because you have had intimate relations with her. ¹⁵If a man has two wives, one loved and the other unloved, and both the loved and the unloved have borne him sons, but the firstborn belongs to the unloved wife, ¹⁶then on the day he distributes his property to his sons as inheritance, he may not give the rights of the firstborn to the son of the loved wife in place of the son of the unloved wife, who is actually the firstborn. ¹⁷He must acknowledge the firstborn — the son of the unloved wife — by giving him a double portion of everything he owns, for that son is the first evidence of his vitality. The right of the firstborn belongs to him. ¹⁸If a man has a stubborn and rebellious son who does not obey his father or his mother, and even after they discipline him he still will not listen to them, ¹⁹then his father and his mother must seize him and bring him out to the elders of his city, to the gate of his town. ²⁰They must say to the elders of his city: 'This son of ours is stubborn and rebellious. He will not obey us. He is a glutton and a drunkard.' ²¹Then all the men of his city must stone him to death. So you will purge evil from your midst, and all Israel will hear about it and be afraid. ²²If a man has committed a sin deserving the death penalty and is put to death, and you hang his body on a tree, ²³his body must not remain on the tree overnight. You must bury him that same day, for a hanged person is under God's curse, and you must not defile your land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The word chahal ('pierced one, slain person') refers to someone killed by violence, not natural death. Found nofel bassadeh ('fallen in the field') — in open land between settlements where no witnesses were present. The phrase lo noda mi hikkahu ('it is not known who struck him') creates the legal problem: unsolved homicide leaves bloodguilt unresolved, contaminating the land.
2. The measuring ceremony (umadedu — 'they shall measure') determines which city is nearest and therefore bears responsibility for the unsolved death. Elders and judges acting together (zeqenekha veshoftekha) ensures both communal authority and judicial precision. The physical act of measurement transforms an abstract question of guilt into a concrete civic responsibility.
3. The eglat baqar ('heifer, young cow') must meet two conditions: lo ubbad bah ('not worked with') and lo mashkhah be'ol ('not pulled in a yoke'). An animal untouched by human labor represents innocence and unused potential — mirroring the innocent life cut short. The parallel with the red heifer of Numbers 19 (also never yoked) suggests a purification ritual, though the mechanism here differs.
4. The nachal eitan ('enduring wadi' — a valley with a permanent stream) must be uncultivated land, matching the animal's unworked status. The verb arefu ('break the neck') is not a sacrificial slaughter but a distinct killing method — the animal's death absorbs the community's bloodguilt. The unworked animal in unworked ground creates a ritually pristine setting for absorbing the contamination of unsolved murder.
5. The priests' triple function is stated: lesharto ('to minister to Him'), ulevarekh beshem YHWH ('to bless in the LORD's name'), and judicial authority over kol riv vekhol nega ('every dispute and every injury'). The word nega ('stroke, plague, injury') covers both physical harm and skin diseases (as in Leviticus 13-14), giving priests jurisdiction over bodily matters.
6. Handwashing over the slain animal is a public declaration of innocence — the symbolic transfer of potential guilt. This is the biblical origin of the 'washing hands of responsibility' gesture, later echoed by Pilate in Matthew 27:24. The ritual combines physical act (washing) with verbal declaration (v 7) to formally dissociate the community from the bloodshed.
7. The declaration is a formal oath of innocence with two components: hands (action — 'we did not kill') and eyes (knowledge — 'we did not witness it'). The Qere/Ketiv variant: the Ketiv (— shafkhah, singular feminine) may reflect an older grammatical form; the Qere (— shafkhu, plural) matches the plural subject 'our hands.' The community leaders speak on behalf of the entire city.
8. The prayer contains the verb kapper ('atone, cover, purge') twice: as imperative petition (kapper le'ammekha — 'grant atonement for your people') and as result (venikapper lahem haddam — 'the blood-guilt will be atoned for them'). The appeal to God as redeemer (asher padita — 'whom you redeemed') invokes the exodus as grounds for mercy. Israel's identity as a redeemed people obligates God to maintain their purity.
9. The concluding formula teva'er haddam hannaqi miqirbekha ('you will purge innocent blood from your midst') uses the familiar purging language of Deuteronomy. Performing the ceremony is itself the act of doing hayashar ('the right thing') — the community's proactive response to unsolved violence demonstrates commitment to justice even when the perpetrator remains unknown.

10. A new law section begins with the warfare formula ki tetse lammilchamah ('when you go out to war'). God's role as the one who delivers victory (unetano YHWH beyyadekha — 'the LORD gives him into your hand') is stated before any human action. The taking of captives (shavita shivyo — 'you capture his captivity') transitions to a specific regulation about captive women.
11. The eshet yefat to'ar ('woman beautiful of form') is a war captive whom an Israelite soldier desires. The verb chashaqta ('you desire, you are attracted to') acknowledges sexual attraction as a reality of warfare without condemning it. Rather than prohibiting the marriage or permitting immediate sexual exploitation, the law creates a structured process (vv 12-13) that protects the woman's dignity and humanity.
12. The three actions — entering the house, shaving the head, and trimming nails — mark a transition from captive to household member. Shaving the head (gillchah et roshah) may represent mourning for her former life, or symbolically shedding her foreign identity. The trimming of nails (ve'astah et tsipporneiha — literally 'do her nails') similarly marks a physical transformation. Some scholars see these as de-beautification acts that test whether the man's attraction is genuine.
13. Removing the simlet shivyah ('clothing of captivity') marks another identity transition. The mandatory mourning period — uvekhta et aviha ve'et immah yerach yamim ('she shall weep for her father and mother a full month') — serves multiple functions: it honors her grief, grants her time to adjust, imposes a cooling-off period on the soldier, and prevents immediate sexual exploitation. The month-long delay transforms what could be wartime rape into a structured marriage with legal protections.
14. The woman's protections upon divorce: she goes lenafshah ('on her own terms' — wherever she wants), cannot be sold (makhor lo timkerenah — absolutely cannot be sold), and cannot be treated as merchandise (lo tit'ammer bah — 'you shall not exploit her commercially'). The reason: tachat asher innitah ('because you humbled her') — the intimate relationship created obligations that survive the marriage's end. Once married, she has the rights of a free woman.
15. The scenario assumes polygamy (shtei nashim — 'two wives') and introduces a preference dynamic: ahuvah ('loved') versus senu'ah ('hated, unloved') — probably meaning 'less loved' rather than literal hatred, as with Leah in Genesis 29:31). The legal problem arises when the firstborn son is from the unloved wife and the father wants to favor the loved wife's son — precisely the scenario of Jacob, Rachel, Leah, and their sons.
16. The prohibition lo yukhal levakker ('he cannot give firstborn status') prevents a father from reassigning birth order based on marital preference. The verb bakker ('treat as firstborn, give firstborn status to') specifically prohibits the transfer of legal priority from the actual firstborn to a younger son. This law protects inheritance rights from the distortions of favoritism.
17. The double portion (pi shnayim — literally 'a mouth of two,' meaning two shares) is the firstborn's inheritance right: if there are three sons, the estate is divided into four parts, and the firstborn receives two. The father must yakkir ('acknowledge, recognize') the true firstborn. The phrase reshit ono ('the beginning of his strength/virility') connects the firstborn to the father's reproductive power — the first son is the first proof of the father's generative capacity. The mishpat habbekhorah ('right of the firstborn') is a legal entitlement, not a parental gift.
18. The ben sorer umoreh ('stubborn and rebellious son') is described with two adjectives: sorer ('turning aside, stubborn') and moreh ('defiant, rebellious'). Three conditions limit the law: (1) both parents must agree — einennu shome'a beqol aviv uveqol immo ('he does not listen to the voice of his father or the voice of his mother'); (2) prior discipline has been attempted — veyisseru oto ('they disciplined him'); (3) the defiance persists — velo yishma aleihem ('he still does not listen to them'). Rabbinic tradition added so many conditions that this penalty was considered practically impossible to carry out.
19. Both parents (aviv ve'immo) must act together — neither parent alone can initiate the proceedings. This requirement of mutual parental agreement serves as a safeguard against one parent's anger or prejudice. The city gate (sha'ar meqomo) is the traditional location for legal proceedings in ancient Israel, functioning as the public courthouse.
20. The parents make a formal legal accusation before the elders, adding two specific charges: zolel vesove ('glutton and drunkard'). These terms describe a lifestyle of self-indulgent excess that wastes family resources and shames the household. Proverbs 23:20-21 connects the zolel vesove with poverty and disgrace. The public accusation before elders ensures communal oversight — the parents' charge must be credible enough for community leaders to act.
21. The execution by communal stoning (urgemahu kol anshei iro — 'all the men of his city shall stone him') makes the punishment a communal act — no single person bears the weight of the killing. The double formula returns: ubi'arta hara ('purge evil') and vekhlo Yisra'el yishme'u veyira'u ('all Israel will hear and fear'). The severity of the punishment for a rebellious son underscores how seriously Israelite law took family structure as the foundation of social order.
22. The law addresses post-execution display, not the method of execution. The man is first executed (humat — 'he is put to death') and then hung (vetalita oto al ets — 'you hang him on a tree/pole'). Public display of the executed criminal served as both deterrent and statement of communal judgment. The term ets ('tree, wood, pole') could refer to any wooden structure used for display.
23. The prohibition against overnight exposure (lo talin nivlato — 'his corpse shall not remain overnight') limits the duration of public display. The theological reason is striking: ki qilelat Elohim talui ('for a curse of God is a hanged person') — the displayed body represents a divine curse, and prolonged display defiles the land. Paul applies this verse christologically in Galatians 3:13, identifying Jesus's crucifixion with the curse of the hanged. The land's sanctity requires prompt burial — even executed criminals retain enough dignity to demand interment.

Summary: Moses collects laws about returning lost property, cross-dressing, bird nests, roof parapets, mixed-kind prohibitions, tassels, and sexual offenses including marriage disputes and assault.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter moves from compassion for a lost ox (v. 1) to compassion for a mother bird (v. 6-7) to a parapet requirement preventing falls (v. 8) — the thread is the sanctity of life at every scale. The mother-bird law (shiluach haqen) promises long life for something as small as letting a bird go free. The prohibition of sha'atnez (v. 11, mixing wool and linen) remains one of the Torah's most opaque commands — no reason is given, and the mixture is reserved for priestly garments (Exodus 28).

Translation Friction: The phrase to'avat YHWH (v. 5, 'detestable to the LORD') applied to cross-dressing uses the strongest disapproval term in Deuteronomy's vocabulary, but the exact scope of the prohibition is debated: is it about deception, cultic cross-dressing, or gender categories? We rendered it plainly and noted the interpretive range. The word gedilim (v. 12, 'tassels') connects to the tsitsit of Numbers 15:38-39.

Connections: The lost-property law (vv. 1-4) develops Exodus 23:4-5. The roof-parapet law (v. 8) applies building-code ethics that persist into Talmudic law. The tassels command echoes Numbers 15:37-41. The marriage-dispute laws (vv. 13-29) provide the legal background for Joseph's dilemma in Matthew 1:19.

¹You must not see your brother's ox or sheep wandering off and ignore them. You must make sure to return them to your brother. ²If your brother does not live nearby, or if you do not know who he is, you must bring the animal into your own house and keep it until your brother comes looking for it, and then you must return it to him. ³You must do the same with his donkey, the same with his garment, and the same with anything your brother has lost that you find. You may not look the other way. ⁴You must not see your brother's donkey or ox fallen on the road and ignore them. You must help him lift them up again. ⁵A woman must not wear a man's equipment, and a man must not put on a woman's clothing, for anyone who does this is detestable to the LORD your God. ⁶If you come across a bird's nest along the road, in any tree or on the ground, with chicks or eggs, and the mother bird is sitting on the chicks or on the eggs, you must not take the mother along with the young. ⁷You must certainly let the mother go, but you may take the young for yourself, so that it may go well with you and you may have a long life. ⁸When you build a new house, you must construct a parapet for your roof, so that you do not bring bloodguilt on your house if someone falls from it. ⁹You must not sow your vineyard with two kinds of seed, or the entire yield will become sacred — both the seed you sowed and the produce of the vineyard. ¹⁰You must not plow with an ox and a donkey yoked together. ¹¹You must not wear fabric made of wool and linen woven together. ¹²You must make tassels on the four corners of the garment you wrap yourself in. ¹³If a man marries a woman, has relations with her, and then turns against her, ¹⁴and he levels charges against her, publicly defaming her by saying, 'I married this woman, but when I was intimate with her, I did not find evidence of her virginity' — ¹⁵then the young woman's father and mother must take the evidence of the young woman's virginity and bring it to the elders of the city at the gate. ¹⁶The young woman's father must say to the elders: 'I gave my daughter to this man in marriage, and now he has turned against her. ¹⁷He has made false charges, saying, "I did not find evidence of your daughter's virginity." But here is the proof of my daughter's virginity.' Then they must spread out the cloth before the elders of the city. ¹⁸The elders of that city must take the man and discipline him. ¹⁹They must also fine him one hundred silver shekels and give them to the young woman's father, because the husband publicly defamed a virgin of Israel. She will remain his wife, and he may never divorce her as long as he lives. ²⁰But if the charge is true and evidence of virginity was not found for the young woman, ²¹then they must bring the young woman to the entrance of her father's house, and the men of her city must stone her to death, because she committed a disgraceful act in Israel by being sexually promiscuous while in her father's house. So you will purge evil from your midst. ²²If a man is found sleeping with a woman who is married to another man, both of them must die — the man who slept with the woman and the woman. So you will purge evil from Israel. ²³If a young woman who is a virgin is engaged to a man, and another man encounters her in the city and sleeps with her, ²⁴you must bring both of them out to the gate of that city and stone them to death — the young woman because she did not cry out even though she was in the city, and the man because he violated another man's wife. So you will purge evil from your midst. ²⁵But if the man encounters the engaged young woman in the open field and the man seizes her and sleeps with her, only the man who slept with her must die. ²⁶You must do nothing to the young woman — the young woman has committed no sin deserving death. This case is like a man attacking his neighbor and murdering him. ²⁷Because he found her in the open field — the engaged young woman cried out, but there was no one to rescue her. ²⁸If a man encounters a virgin who is not engaged, and he seizes her and sleeps with her, and they are discovered, ²⁹then the man who slept with her must give the young woman's father fifty silver shekels, and she must become his wife. Because he violated her, he may never divorce her as long as he lives.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb hit'allamta ('hide yourself, look the other way') condemns willful indifference to a neighbor's loss. The infinitive absolute hashev teshivem ('returning you shall return them') intensifies the obligation — this is not optional neighborliness but a covenant duty. The term 'brother' (achikha) extends beyond blood relatives to any fellow Israelite, establishing mutual care as a communal norm.
2. The law extends to situations where the owner is unknown or distant. The finder must actively care for the lost animal — asafto el tokh beitekha ('gather it into your house') — bearing the cost of feeding and sheltering it. The obligation persists ad drosh achikha oto ('until your brother seeks it') — indefinitely, until the owner claims it. This creates a positive duty of stewardship over another's property.
3. The law expands from livestock to any lost property: donkey, garment, and lekhol avodat achikha ('every lost thing of your brother'). The universal scope means there is no item too small or inconvenient to return. The closing phrase lo tukhal lehit'alleim ('you cannot hide yourself, you may not ignore it') makes indifference itself a violation — seeing and doing nothing is morally equivalent to causing the loss.
4. Beyond returning lost animals, this law requires active assistance when an animal collapses under its load. The infinitive absolute haqem taqim ('raising you must raise') intensifies the command — you must absolutely help. The parallel in Exodus 23:5 extends this duty even to the donkey of your enemy, making it clear that the obligation transcends personal relationships.
5. The term keli gever ('man's equipment/articles') is broader than clothing — keli can mean tools, weapons, or any characteristically male implements. The prohibition is reciprocal: women wearing male items and men wearing female clothing. The label to'avat YHWH ('detestable to the LORD') places this among the most seriously condemned behaviors in Deuteronomy. The precise rationale is debated: proposals include opposition to Canaanite cult practices involving cross-dressing, maintenance of created order distinctions, or prevention of deceptive identity.
6. The phrase ki yiqqare ('if it happens to be found' — if you chance upon) indicates a spontaneous encounter, not deliberate hunting. The law covers both efrokhim ('chicks') and betsim ('eggs'), and whether the nest is in a tree or on the ground. The prohibition lo tiqqach ha'em al habbanim ('do not take the mother upon the young') protects the breeding female — taking mother and offspring together eliminates future reproduction.
7. The infinitive absolute shalle'ach teshalach ('sending you must send away') makes the release of the mother bird mandatory. The reward formula — lema'an yitav lakh vecha'arakhta yamim ('so that it goes well with you and you prolong your days') — is the same promise attached to honoring parents (5:16). Only two commandments carry this specific reward, and rabbinic tradition noted the connection: if such a seemingly minor commandment brings long life, how much more the weightier ones?
8. The ma'aqeh ('parapet, railing') is a safety barrier on flat rooftops, which in ancient Israel served as living space, sleeping areas, and work surfaces. The legal principle is remarkable: the builder is held liable for preventable accidents. The phrase lo tasim damim beveitekha ('do not put blood-guilt on your house') treats negligence as morally equivalent to causing death. This is one of the earliest building safety codes in recorded law.
9. The kil'ayim ('mixed kinds') prohibition forbids planting different crops in the same vineyard. The consequence pen tiqdash ('lest it become holy/set apart') is counterintuitive: the mixed crop becomes qadosh — sacred, and therefore forbidden for ordinary use. The verb qadhash here means 'become forfeit to the sanctuary,' effectively making the entire harvest unusable. Mixing categories produces something that belongs to neither and must be surrendered entirely.
10. Yoking different species (shor vachamor — ox and donkey) is prohibited because they differ in size, strength, and gait, causing the weaker animal to suffer. The law may also reflect the broader kil'ayim principle of maintaining created distinctions. Paul applies this metaphorically in 2 Corinthians 6:14 ('Do not be unequally yoked').
11. Sha'atnez is a technical term for the forbidden mixture of wool and linen in a single garment. The prohibition parallels Leviticus 19:19. Notably, the priestly garments did combine wool and linen (Exodus 28), suggesting that what is forbidden for ordinary use is reserved for sacred service — the prohibition maintains the distinction between common and holy.
12. The gedilim ('twisted cords, tassels') correspond to the tsitsit of Numbers 15:38-39, where their purpose is stated: to remind Israel of God's commandments. Placement on the arba kanfot ('four corners') of the outer garment makes them visible during daily life. The garment is the kesut ('covering, wrap-around cloak') — the standard outer garment of an Israelite.

13. The verb usne'ah ('and he hates her') marks the husband's rejection after consummation. The sequence — marriage, intimacy, hostility — establishes the context for a false accusation of premarital unchastity. This law section (vv 13-21) protects women from being discarded through false charges.
14. The husband's accusation involves three escalating actions: sam lah alilot devarim ('he placed against her fabricated charges'), hotsi aleiha shem ra ('he brought out against her a bad name' — public defamation), and a specific claim about missing betulim ('virginity evidence'). The term alilot devarim implies deliberate fabrication — trumped-up charges designed to justify divorce and avoid returning the bride-price.
15. Both parents (avi hanna'arah ve'imamah — 'the young woman's father and her mother') act to defend their daughter — the mother's role is explicitly included. The betulei hanna'arah ('evidence of the young woman's virginity') likely refers to the stained bedsheet from the wedding night, a custom attested across the ancient Near East and still practiced in some cultures. The elders at the gate serve as the judicial body.
16. The father speaks as the family's legal representative. His statement establishes the facts: a valid marriage was contracted (natatti et bitti la'ish hazzeh le'ishah — 'I gave my daughter to this man as a wife') and the husband has rejected her (vayyisna'eha — 'and he hated her'). The father's testimony sets up the defense.
17. The father quotes the husband's accusation and presents counter-evidence. The verb ufarsu ('they shall spread out') describes publicly displaying the hassimlah ('the cloth, the garment') — the wedding-night bedsheet — before the judicial assembly. The physical evidence serves as a public refutation of the husband's claim.
18. The verb veyisseru ('they shall discipline') likely refers to corporal punishment — flogging — as the penalty for false accusation. The elders act as both judge and enforcer. The husband's public lie against his wife is treated as a serious offense against both her and the community.
19. Three penalties: physical discipline (v 18), a financial penalty of me'ah kasef ('one hundred silver shekels' — double the standard bride-price of fifty shekels), and permanent marriage without the right of divorce (lo yukhal leshallchah kol yamav — 'he cannot send her away all his days'). The fine goes to the father as compensation for the public shame. The irrevocable marriage protects the woman from being abandoned after being publicly accused.
20. The conditional reversal: im emet hayah haddavar hazzeh ('if this matter was true'). The absence of evidence (lo nimtse'u vetulim — 'virginity evidence was not found') shifts the case from false accusation to proven charge. The gravity of the consequence that follows (v 21) must be understood within the context of betrothal as a binding covenant agreement.
21. The execution takes place at petach bet aviha ('the entrance of her father's house'), associating the crime with the household that should have prevented it. The charge is nevalah beYisra'el ('a disgraceful act in Israel') — nevalah denotes something scandalously out of bounds, a violation of community norms so severe it shames the entire people. The phrase liznot bet aviha ('to act promiscuously in her father's house') specifies the offense: premarital sexual activity while under her father's legal protection.
22. Adultery with a married woman (ishah be'ulot ba'al — 'a woman mastered by a husband,' that is, a married woman) carries the death penalty for both parties. The phrase gam shneihem ('both of them together') insists on equal punishment — the man is not less guilty than the woman. This reflects the covenant understanding of marriage: adultery violates the marriage covenant and defiles the community.
23. The case involves a betrothed virgin (na'arah vetulah me'orasah le'ish — 'a young woman, a virgin, betrothed to a man'). Betrothal in Israelite law was a legally binding contract — the betrothed woman had the legal status of a wife even before the marriage was consummated. Sexual contact with her therefore constituted adultery.
24. The urban setting matters: in a city, help was available. The young woman's failure to cry out (lo tsa'aqah va'ir — 'she did not cry out in the city') is treated as evidence of consent. The man's guilt is stated as asher innah et eshet re'ehu ('because he violated his neighbor's wife') — using 'wife' for a betrothed woman, confirming that betrothal equals marriage in legal status. The contrasting rural case (v 25) addresses situations where crying out would not have brought help.
25. The field setting (bassadeh — 'in the open field') changes the legal calculus entirely. The verb hecheziq bah ('he seized her, he overpowered her') indicates force — this is not consensual. Only the man dies (levaddo — 'alone, by himself'). The law distinguishes between urban consent (where crying out would bring help) and rural assault (where no help was available).
26. The law explicitly exonerates the victim: ein lanna'arah chet mavet ('there is no capital sin in the young woman'). The analogy to murder (ka'asher yaqum ish al re'ehu uretsacho nefesh — 'as when a man rises against his neighbor and murders him') is a legal comparison: just as a murder victim is not complicit in their own death, so the rape victim bears no guilt. This is one of the earliest legal protections for victims of sexual assault.
27. The reasoning is stated: bassadeh metsa'ah ('he found her in the field') — the isolated location explains both the assault and the inability to get help. The phrase ve'ein moshi'a lah ('and there was no rescuer for her') uses the same verb (yasha — 'save, deliver') that describes God's salvation. The absence of a human deliverer establishes the woman's helplessness and therefore her innocence.
28. The third case: an unbetrothed virgin (na'arah vetulah asher lo orasah). The verb utfasah ('he seizes her') indicates force or coercion. The phrase venimtsa'u ('and they are discovered') means the act becomes publicly known — the discovery triggers the legal process. Since she is not betrothed, no marriage covenant has been violated, so the penalty differs from the previous cases.
29. The penalties: chamishim kasef ('fifty silver shekels') paid to the father as bride-price, mandatory marriage (velo tihyeh le'ishah — 'she must become his wife'), and permanent marriage without divorce rights (lo yukhal shallchah kol yamav — 'he cannot send her away all his days'). The payment compensates the father for the loss of bride-price; the irrevocable marriage protects the woman from abandonment. The parallel in Exodus 22:16-17 adds that the father may refuse the marriage, suggesting the woman's family retains veto power.

Summary: Moses defines who may enter the assembly of the LORD, addresses camp purity during warfare, protects escaped slaves, prohibits cult prostitution and interest on loans to fellow Israelites, and regulates vows.

What Makes This Remarkable: The exclusion list (vv. 2-8) and the inclusion timeline are striking: Ammonites and Moabites are excluded to the tenth generation, but Edomites and Egyptians are accepted in the third generation — 'because he is your brother' (Edom) and 'because you were a foreigner in his land' (Egypt). Gratitude and kinship override hostility. The escaped-slave law (vv. 15-16) is revolutionary: a runaway slave must not be returned but allowed to live 'wherever he chooses' — a direct challenge to every slave-return treaty in the ancient Near East.

Translation Friction: The word mamzer (v. 2) is traditionally rendered 'illegitimate child' but its precise meaning is debated — it may refer specifically to the offspring of an incestuous or prohibited union rather than any child born outside marriage. We rendered it 'one of illegitimate birth' with a note on the semantic range. The term qahal YHWH (v. 2, 'assembly of the LORD') refers to the covenant community's formal worship gathering, not the nation in general.

Connections: Ruth the Moabite challenges the Moabite exclusion — her inclusion in David's genealogy (Ruth 4:17-22) stands in tension with this law. The runaway-slave protection contrasts sharply with the Philemon situation in Paul's letter. The interest prohibition (vv. 19-20) is developed in Ezekiel 18:8, 13, 17 as a marker of righteousness.

¹A man must not marry his father's wife, and he must not uncover his father's covering. ²No man who has been crushed in the testicles or has had his male organ cut off may enter the assembly of the LORD. ³No one of illegitimate birth may enter the assembly of the LORD. Even to the tenth generation, none of his descendants may enter the assembly of the LORD. ⁴No Ammonite or Moabite may enter the assembly of the LORD. Even to the tenth generation, none of their descendants may ever enter the assembly of the LORD, ⁵because they did not meet you with food and water on the road when you came out of Egypt, and because they hired Balaam son of Beor from Pethor in Aram-naharaim to curse you. ⁶But the LORD your God refused to listen to Balaam. Instead, the LORD your God turned the curse into a blessing for you, because the LORD your God loves you. ⁷You must never seek their peace or their prosperity as long as you live. ⁸You must not despise an Edomite, for he is your brother. You must not despise an Egyptian, because you were a foreigner in his land. ⁹Children born to them in the third generation may enter the assembly of the LORD. ¹⁰When you go out as a military camp against your enemies, you must guard yourself from every evil thing. ¹¹If there is among you a man who becomes ritually unclean because of a nocturnal emission, he must go outside the camp. He may not re-enter the camp. ¹²Toward evening he must wash himself with water, and at sunset he may re-enter the camp. ¹³You must designate a place outside the camp where you can go to relieve yourself. ¹⁴You must have a digging tool among your equipment. When you relieve yourself outside, you must dig a hole with it and then cover up your excrement. ¹⁵For the LORD your God moves about within your camp, to deliver you and to hand your enemies over to you. Therefore your camp must be holy, so that He does not see anything indecent among you and turn away from you. ¹⁶You must not hand over to his master a slave who has escaped to you from his master. ¹⁷He may live with you, in your midst, in whatever place he chooses within any of your towns — wherever suits him best. You must not mistreat him. ¹⁸No Israelite woman may become a cult prostitute, and no Israelite man may become a cult prostitute. ¹⁹You must not bring the earnings of a prostitute or the payment for a dog into the house of the LORD your God to fulfill any vow, for both of these are detestable to the LORD your God. ²⁰You must not charge your brother interest — interest on money, interest on food, interest on anything that is lent at interest. ²¹You may charge interest to a foreigner, but to your brother you must not charge interest, so that the LORD your God may bless you in everything you undertake in the land you are entering to possess. ²²When you make a vow to the LORD your God, you must not delay in fulfilling it, for the LORD your God will certainly require it of you, and it would be counted as sin against you. ²³But if you refrain from making a vow, there is no sin in that. ²⁴Whatever comes from your lips you must keep and perform, just as you vowed to the LORD your God — the freewill offering that you promised with your own mouth. ²⁵When you enter your neighbor's vineyard, you may eat as many grapes as you wish until you are full, but you must not put any in a container. ²⁶When you enter your neighbor's standing grain, you may pluck heads of grain with your hand, but you must not swing a sickle over your neighbor's grain.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. In Hebrew versification, this is 23:1; in KJV it is 22:30. The verse prohibits marrying one's stepmother (eshet aviv — 'his father's wife,' not necessarily his biological mother). The phrase lo yegalleh kenaf aviv ('he shall not uncover his father's skirt/wing') is a sexual euphemism: the father's 'covering' represents his marital rights. The same imagery appears in Ruth 3:9, where Ruth asks Boaz to spread his garment over her — a proposal of marriage.
2. In Hebrew versification, this is 23:2; the KJV text shown corresponds to KJV 23:2 (about a mamzer), but the Hebrew text addresses physical emasculation. The petsu'a daka ('crushed of crushing' — a man with crushed testicles) and kerut shofkhah ('cut off of the pouring member' — a man whose penis has been severed) are excluded from the qahal YHWH ('assembly of the LORD'). The exclusion likely targeted deliberate castration associated with pagan priesthood practices, not accidental injury.
3. The mamzer is traditionally understood as a child born from a forbidden sexual union (incest or adultery), not simply an out-of-wedlock child. The KJV text shown corresponds to KJV 23:3 (about Ammonites and Moabites), but the Hebrew text of this verse addresses the mamzer. The exclusion extends to dor asiri ('the tenth generation'), effectively meaning permanently — 'ten generations' functions as a synonym for 'forever' in this legal context.
4. The permanent exclusion of Ammonites and Moabites (ad olam — 'forever') is harsher than the generational limit for Edomites and Egyptians (v 8). Both peoples descended from Lot (Genesis 19:30-38) and were therefore distant relatives of Israel, making their hostility a betrayal of kinship. The reason follows in verse 5.
5. Two charges against Ammon and Moab: (1) failure of hospitality — lo qiddemu etkem ballechem uvammayim ('they did not meet you with bread and water') when Israel passed through during the exodus; (2) active hostility — hiring Bil'am (Balaam) to curse Israel. The combination of neglect and aggression compounds their guilt. The Balaam narrative is told in Numbers 22-24.
6. God's sovereignty overrules human cursing: vayahafokh YHWH lekha et haqqelalah livhrakhah ('the LORD turned the curse into a blessing for you'). The verb hafakh ('turn, reverse, overturn') — the same word used for the overthrow of Sodom — here describes God's power to reverse hostile spiritual forces. The theological ground is stated simply: ki ahevka YHWH ('because the LORD loves you'). Divine love protects Israel from external spiritual assault.
7. The prohibition lo tidrosh shelomam vetobhatam ('do not seek their peace or well-being') forbids treaties and trade alliances with Ammon and Moab. The phrase kol yamekha le'olam ('all your days forever') makes this permanent. This verse is notably severe compared to the treatment of Edomites and Egyptians in verse 8.
8. Two nations receive more favorable treatment: Edom (ki achikha hu — 'because he is your brother' — descended from Esau, Jacob's twin) and Egypt (ki ger hayita ve'artso — 'because you were a stranger in his land'). Despite Egypt's oppression, Israel's memory of Egyptian hospitality during the Joseph era creates an ongoing obligation. The verb te'ta'ev ('despise, abhor') is forbidden — Israel may not harbor collective hatred against these peoples.
9. Edomites and Egyptians face a three-generation waiting period (dor shelishi — 'third generation') before integration into the Israelite assembly. This is significantly more lenient than the permanent exclusion of Ammonites and Moabites. The distinction reflects different degrees of kinship and historical relationship — closer relatives and former hosts receive more favorable terms for eventual inclusion.
10. The transition to camp purity laws. The phrase ki tetsa machaneh ('when you go out as a camp') treats the army as a sacred encampment — God's presence accompanies the military camp (v 15), requiring the same purity standards as the tabernacle camp. The broad command venishmarta mikol davar ra ('guard yourself from every evil thing') introduces specific regulations in the following verses.
11. The miqreh laylah ('nocturnal occurrence') is a seminal emission during sleep, which creates temporary ritual impurity (see Leviticus 15:16-17). The impure man must leave the camp entirely — even in a military setting, purity laws apply. This reflects the theological conviction that the war camp is sacred space.
12. The restoration process: washing with water as evening approaches (lifnot erev yirchats bammayim), then waiting until sunset (ukevo'a hashemesh) before re-entering. The timing follows the standard Levitical pattern — impurity lasts until evening, and the new day begins at sunset. Even in the urgency of military operations, purification cannot be rushed.
13. The yad ('designated place' — literally 'hand,' meaning a marked or pointed-out location) is a latrine area outside the camp perimeter. The practical sanitation regulation has a theological foundation: the military camp must be kept clean because of God's presence within it (v 15). Ancient Near Eastern armies often suffered disease from poor sanitation — this law prevents that.
14. The yated ('peg, stake, digging tool') is part of mandatory military equipment — alongside weapons, each soldier carries a sanitation implement. The procedure is specific: dig (chafartah), then cover (vekhissita et tse'atekha — 'cover your excrement'). This is one of the Bible's most practical commands, combining public health with theological concern for camp sanctity.

15. The theological foundation for all camp regulations: YHWH Elohekha mithallekh beqerev machanekha ('the LORD your God walks about in the midst of your camp'). The verb mithallekh ('walks about') uses the same hitpael form as God walking in the Garden of Eden (Genesis 3:8). God's presence makes the camp sacred ground (qadosh — 'holy'). The consequence of impurity: veshav me'acharekha ('He will turn away from behind you') — God withdraws His protective presence, leaving Israel militarily vulnerable.
16. This law is extraordinary in the ancient Near East, where extradition treaties for runaway slaves were standard (as in the Code of Hammurabi §15-16, which imposed the death penalty for harboring fugitives). Israel's law reverses the norm entirely: lo tasgir eved el adonav ('you shall not surrender a slave to his master'). The escaped slave who reaches Israel receives asylum — a radical statement about the value of human freedom.
17. The escaped slave receives extraordinary rights: freedom to choose where to live (bammaqom asher yivchar — 'in the place he chooses'), residence among Israelites (immekha yeshev beqirbekha — 'with you he shall dwell in your midst'), and legal protection from oppression (lo tonennu — 'you shall not oppress him'). This is full social integration, not second-class residency.
18. The qedeshah (feminine) and qadesh (masculine) are temple prostitutes — persons consecrated to fertility cult rituals associated with Canaanite worship. The root q-d-sh ('holy') is used ironically: these 'consecrated ones' serve a false holiness. The prohibition applies to both women (mibbenot Yisra'el — 'from the daughters of Israel') and men (mibbenei Yisra'el — 'from the sons of Israel'), indicating that both male and female cult prostitution existed in the ancient Near East.
19. The etnan zonah ('wages of a prostitute') and mechir kelev ('price of a dog') may not be used for sacred offerings. The term 'dog' (kelev) likely refers to a male cult prostitute — attested in other ancient Near Eastern texts as a designation for males engaged in temple prostitution. Both income sources are to'avat YHWH ('detestable to the LORD'). Money earned through sexual exploitation cannot be laundered through sacred giving.
20. The neshekh ('interest' — literally 'bite,' from nashakh, 'to bite') is prohibited in all forms when lending to a fellow Israelite (le'achikha — 'to your brother'). Three categories are specified: money (kesef), food (okhel), and anything else (kol davar asher yishshakh — 'anything that can generate interest'). The comprehensive list closes loopholes: no form of interest extraction from a fellow Israelite is permitted.
21. The distinction between brother and foreigner (nokhri) allows commercial interest on international trade loans while prohibiting it within the covenant community. The motivation is stated: lema'an yevarkhekha YHWH ('so that the LORD may bless you'). Covenant generosity toward fellow Israelites activates divine blessing on the national economy. The distinction is economic, not ethnic — a resident alien (ger) would typically be treated as a brother.
22. Vows to God must be fulfilled promptly: lo te'acher leshalmo ('do not delay to pay it'). The infinitive absolute darosh yidreshenu ('seeking He will seek it' — He will certainly demand it) emphasizes that God holds people accountable for their promises. An unfulfilled vow becomes sin (hayah vekha chet — 'there will be sin in you'). The urgency reflects the weight of speech directed to God — words spoken to the divine are binding.
23. The counterbalance to verse 22: not vowing is perfectly acceptable — ki techdal lindor lo yihiyeh vekha chet ('if you refrain from vowing, there will be no sin in you'). Ecclesiastes 5:5 echoes this: 'Better not to vow at all than to vow and not fulfill.' The law protects against rash vows by making clear that silence before God is always an option.
24. The phrase motsa sefatekha ('what goes out of your lips') makes spoken words the binding standard — once uttered to God, a vow acquires the force of obligation. The term nedavah ('freewill offering') emphasizes that the vow was voluntary, not compelled. Precisely because it was freely given, it must be freely honored. The integrity of speech before God is a covenant fundamental.
25. The right to eat from a neighbor's vineyard while passing through (akhalta anavim kenafshekha sov'ekha — 'eat grapes to your desire, your satisfaction') reflects communal generosity and hospitality laws. The limit — ve'el kelyekha lo titten ('do not put any in your container') — prevents taking and profiting from what is meant for immediate sustenance. The principle: satisfying hunger is a communal right; commercial harvesting of another's produce is theft.
26. This verse extends the vineyard principle to grain fields. The distinction is between hands (qatafta melilot beyadekha — 'you may pluck ears with your hand') and tools (chermesh lo tanif — 'do not swing a sickle'). Hand-plucking for immediate eating is permitted; using harvest tools constitutes unauthorized harvesting. Jesus's disciples exercised this right in Matthew 12:1, plucking grain on the Sabbath. The verse has no KJV equivalent at this verse number due to the Hebrew-KJV versification offset in this chapter.

Summary: Moses addresses divorce procedure, protections for newlyweds, millstone pledges, kidnapping, skin diseases, loan collateral ethics, worker wages, and gleaning rights for the vulnerable.

What Makes This Remarkable: The divorce certificate (sefer keritut, v. 1) is one of the most debated passages in the Torah. The phrase ervat davar ('something indecent/objectionable') triggered the famous Hillel-Shammai debate: Shammai read it as sexual immorality only, Hillel as any cause of displeasure. Moses does not command divorce — he regulates an existing practice to protect the woman with a written document. The chapter's consistent refrain is 'remember that you were a slave in Egypt' (vv. 18, 22) — every humanitarian law is grounded in liberation memory.

Translation Friction: The phrase ervat davar (v. 1) is deliberately vague — and the vagueness may be intentional, leaving the community to discern boundaries rather than codifying them. We rendered it 'something indecent' and noted the full interpretive range. Jesus addresses this passage directly in Matthew 19:3-9, siding with neither school but appealing to Genesis 2:24 as the prior and governing text.

Connections: Jesus cites this passage in Matthew 19:7-8, calling it a concession to hardness of heart. The gleaning law (vv. 19-21) is practiced by Ruth in Ruth 2. The same-day wage payment (v. 15) is echoed in James 5:4. The principle that 'fathers shall not be put to death for children' (v. 16) is applied in 2 Kings 14:6.

¹If a man takes a wife and marries her, and she does not find favor in his eyes because he has found something indecent about her, then he must write her a certificate of divorce, place it in her hand, and send her from his house. ²After she leaves his house, she may go and become another man's wife. ³If the second husband also rejects her and writes her a certificate of divorce, places it in her hand, and sends her from his house — or if the second husband dies — ⁴then her first husband, who divorced her, may not take her back as his wife after she has been with another man, for that is detestable before the LORD. You must not bring sin upon the land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance. ⁵When a man has recently married a wife, he must not go out with the army, and no public duty may be imposed on him. He must be free for his household for one year, bringing joy to the wife he has married. ⁶No one may take a pair of millstones — or even the upper millstone — as collateral for a loan, for that would be taking a person's livelihood as collateral. ⁷If a man is found kidnapping one of his brothers from among the Israelites — exploiting him or selling him — that kidnapper must die. So you will purge evil from your midst. ⁸Be careful in cases of skin disease to follow very carefully all that the Levitical priests instruct you. Just as I commanded them, you must observe and carry out their directions. ⁹Remember what the LORD your God did to Miriam on the journey after you came out of Egypt. ¹⁰When you make any kind of loan to your neighbor, you must not enter his house to take his collateral. ¹¹You must stand outside, and the person to whom you are lending must bring the collateral out to you. ¹²If the person is poor, you must not keep his collateral overnight. ¹³You must return the collateral to him at sunset so that he may sleep in his own garment and bless you. And it will be counted as righteousness for you before the LORD your God. ¹⁴You must not exploit a hired worker who is poor and needy, whether he is one of your own people or a foreigner residing in your land within your towns. ¹⁵You must pay him his wages each day before the sun sets, for he is poor and his life depends on it. Otherwise he may cry out to the LORD against you, and it would be counted as sin against you. ¹⁶Fathers must not be put to death for the sins of their children, and children must not be put to death for the sins of their fathers. Each person must be put to death only for his own sin. ¹⁷You must not deny justice to the foreigner or the fatherless, and you must not take a widow's garment as collateral. ¹⁸Remember that you were a slave in Egypt and the LORD your God redeemed you from there. That is why I am commanding you to do this. ¹⁹When you harvest your field and forget a sheaf in the field, you must not go back to get it. It must be left for the foreigner, the fatherless, and the widow, so that the LORD your God may bless you in all the work of your hands. ²⁰When you beat your olive trees, you must not go over the branches again. What remains must be left for the foreigner, the fatherless, and the widow. ²¹When you harvest your vineyard, you must not go through it again to pick what you missed. It must be left for the foreigner, the fatherless, and the widow. ²²Remem number that you were a slave in the land of Egypt. That is why I am commanding you to do this.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ervat davar ('indecentcy of a matter' — something objectionable) is deliberately vague and became the center of the famous Hillel-Shammai debate: Shammai restricted it to sexual immorality; Hillel extended it to any cause of displeasure. Jesus addressed this passage in Matthew 19:3-9. The sefer keritut ('document of cutting' — certificate of divorce) is a formal legal instrument that frees the woman to remarry. The law does not institute divorce but regulates an existing practice.
2. The divorced woman has full legal freedom to remarry: vehaytah le'ish acher ('she may become another man's wife'). The certificate of divorce protects her from being considered an adulteress if she remarries. Without the formal document, her status would be ambiguous and dangerous.
3. The scenario now involves a second marriage that also ends, whether by divorce (usene'ah ha'ish ha'acharon — 'the second husband hates her') or by death (ki yamut ha'ish ha'acharon — 'or the second husband dies'). The elaborate conditional setup — spanning verses 1-3 — builds toward the actual legal ruling in verse 4.
4. This is the actual legal ruling: the first husband may not remarry her (lo yukhal ba'alach harishon lashuv leqachtah — 'her first husband cannot return to take her'). The reason is stated as to'evah lifnei YHWH ('detestable before the LORD'). Jeremiah 3:1 applies this principle metaphorically to Israel's relationship with God. The prohibition prevents marriage from becoming a revolving door and protects the woman from being treated as property shuttled between men.
5. The newlywed exemption covers both military service (lo yetse batsava — 'he shall not go out with the army') and all public obligations (velo ya'avov alav lekhol davar — 'no matter shall pass upon him'). The purpose is stated positively: vesimmach et ishto ('he shall bring joy to his wife'). The verb simmach is in the piel — intensive — meaning he must actively make her happy, not merely stay home. The year-long duration (shanah echad) exceeds the month-long exemption for the betrothed soldier in 20:7.
6. The rechayim varokhev ('millstones and rider' — the lower and upper grinding stones) were essential daily equipment for processing grain into flour. Taking them as pledge (lo yachavol — 'shall not seize as collateral') would deprive a family of their ability to prepare food. The principle: ki nefesh hu chovel ('for he is taking a life as pledge') — nefesh here means livelihood, not literally life. Essential survival tools may not be confiscated for debt.
7. Kidnapping (gonev nefesh — 'stealing a person') is a capital offense. The verb hit'ammer ('exploit, treat as merchandise') and umkharo ('sell him') describe the crime's full scope: abduction for the purpose of enslavement and sale. This law corresponds to the Eighth Commandment's original scope — 'You shall not steal' (Exodus 20:15) was understood to prohibit primarily person-theft, with property theft addressed elsewhere.
8. The nega hatsara'at ('affliction of tsara'at') refers to the skin conditions described in Leviticus 13-14 — a broader category than modern leprosy, encompassing various scaly or discolored skin conditions. The emphasis is on obedience to priestly instruction (kol asher yoru etkhem — 'everything they teach you'), positioning the priests as the authoritative diagnosticians for these conditions.
9. The reference to Miriam's tsara'at (Numbers 12:1-15) serves as a powerful warning: even Moses's own sister was not exempt from divine discipline for sin. The verb zakhor ('remember') in Deuteronomy always calls for active response, not mere recollection. The lesson: no one stands above the purity laws, and the priests' authority in these matters must be respected.
10. The creditor is prohibited from entering the debtor's house (lo tavo el beto — 'do not enter his house') to seize collateral. The debtor retains the dignity of his home — the creditor must wait outside (v 11). The loan (mash'at me'umah — 'a loan of anything') is stated broadly to cover all lending situations. This law protects the borrower's autonomy and prevents creditor intimidation.
11. The creditor must wait bacchuts ('outside'), and the debtor himself brings the pledge out (yotsi elekha — 'he will bring it out to you'). The debtor chooses which item to pledge, preventing the creditor from selecting the most valuable or personally meaningful possessions. This small detail encodes a profound respect for the borrower's agency even in a position of financial weakness.
12. Special protection for the poor borrower: lo tishkav ba'avoto ('you shall not sleep with his pledge' — you must not keep it overnight). A poor man's pledge was likely his outer garment — the cloak used as a blanket. Keeping it overnight would leave him cold. The creditor's property rights do not override the debtor's basic need for warmth. Exodus 22:26-27 states the same principle and adds: 'When he cries out to me, I will hear, for I am compassionate.'
13. The pledge must be returned kevo'a hashemesh ('at sunset') — before the cold night. The result: the borrower blesses the creditor (uverkhekka — 'and he will bless you'), and this act is counted as tsedaqah ('righteousness') before God. The term tsedaqah here means an act of justice that aligns with God's character — economic mercy is not charity but covenant righteousness.
14. The protection extends to both Israelites (me'achekha — 'from your brothers') and resident aliens (migerekha — 'from your strangers'). The terms ani ve'evyon ('poor and needy') describe economic vulnerability. The verb lo ta'ashoq ('do not oppress, exploit') covers wage theft, delayed payment, and taking advantage of the worker's desperate position. Economic exploitation of the vulnerable is a direct violation of covenant justice.
15. Day-laborers must receive same-day payment: beyomo titten sekharo ('on his day you must give his wages'). The phrase ve'elav hu nose et nafsho ('he lifts up his soul toward it' — his life depends on it) reveals the desperation of the poor worker who needs the money for that evening's meal. The theological dimension: the exploited worker may cry to God (yiqra alekha el YHWH — 'he will cry out against you to the LORD'), and God will hold the employer accountable.

16. The principle of individual criminal responsibility: ish bechet'o yumatu ('each person shall be put to death for his own sin'). This stands in tension with passages about God visiting iniquity on children (Exodus 20:5), but the distinction is between divine prerogative and human judicial practice. Human courts may not execute family members for another's crime. King Amaziah applied this law in 2 Kings 14:6, refusing to execute the children of his father's assassins.
17. Three vulnerable groups receive specific legal protection: the ger ('foreigner, resident alien'), the yatom ('fatherless, orphan'), and the almanah ('widow'). This triad appears repeatedly in Deuteronomy (10:18, 14:29, 16:11, 24:19-21, 26:12-13). The prohibition against taking a widow's garment as pledge extends the principle of verses 10-13 to the most vulnerable — she may not be made to surrender even her clothing for a debt.
18. The motivational formula vezakharta ki eved hayita beMitsrayim ('remember that you were a slave in Egypt') grounds social justice in historical experience. Israel's obligation to the vulnerable is rooted in their own history of vulnerability. The verb vayifdekha ('He redeemed you') uses the commercial term for buying back from slavery — God paid the price for Israel's freedom, and this act creates an obligation to extend similar mercy.
19. The forgotten sheaf law (shikchah — 'forgetfulness') converts accidental oversight into deliberate provision. If you forget an omer ('sheaf') during harvest, it must remain for the vulnerable triad (ger, yatom, almanah). The law transforms human imperfection into divine provision — God uses what we forget to feed those we might overlook. The blessing formula (lema'an yevarkhekha YHWH — 'so that the LORD may bless you') makes generosity the pathway to prosperity.
20. Olives were harvested by beating the branches with poles (tachbot — 'you beat'). The prohibition lo tefa'er acharekha ('do not go over after yourself') forbids a second pass — the remaining olives belong to the vulnerable. The verb fa'ar in this context means to strip clean or glean thoroughly. Like the forgotten sheaf, this law builds social welfare into the harvest process itself.
21. The vineyard gleaning law completes the triad of agricultural provisions: grain (v 19), olives (v 20), and grapes (v 21). The verb te'olel ('glean, gather small clusters') specifically refers to collecting the small, imperfect grape clusters left after the main harvest. Ruth exercised this right in Boaz's field (Ruth 2). The three laws together create a comprehensive welfare system built into Israel's agricultural economy.
22. The chapter closes as verse 18 did: with the slavery-memory formula. The repetition frames the entire section (vv 17-22) as motivated by exodus memory. Israel's social ethic is not abstract morality but experienced theology — 'you were vulnerable once; now protect the vulnerable.' The corporate memory of slavery creates perpetual obligation toward the marginalized.

Summary: Moses limits judicial flogging, mandates the levirate marriage for a brother who dies without sons, prescribes the sandal-removal ceremony for refusal, and commands the destruction of Amalek's memory.

What Makes This Remarkable: The levirate marriage law (yibbum, vv. 5-10) preserves the dead brother's name and inheritance through his living brother. The refusal ceremony is publicly humiliating: the widow pulls off the brother-in-law's sandal and spits in his face, and his family is known as 'the house of the one whose sandal was removed.' The chapter closes with the command to blot out Amalek's memory (v. 19) — a paradox, since the command to remember to destroy ensures Amalek is never forgotten.

Translation Friction: The word yevamah (v. 7, 'brother-in-law's wife') is a technical legal term from the root y-b-m that gives the institution its name (yibbum). English has no equivalent — 'levirate' comes from the Latin levir, not from Hebrew. The chalitsah ceremony (v. 9, pulling off the sandal) may connect to the sandal transaction in Ruth 4:7-8, though the relationship between the two customs is debated.

Connections: The levirate law provides the legal framework for Ruth 4 and Tamar's claim in Genesis 38. The Sadducees use it to challenge Jesus about resurrection (Matthew 22:23-28). The Amalek command is executed by Saul (1 Samuel 15) and Esther (Esther 9). The flogging limit (v. 3) is referenced by Paul in 2 Corinthians 11:24.

¹When there is a dispute between people and they go to court, the judges must decide the case, acquitting the innocent and condemning the guilty. ²If the guilty person deserves flogging, the judge must have him lie down and be flogged in his presence, with the number of lashes corresponding to the severity of his offense. ³He may be given up to forty lashes but no more. If he is flogged beyond that with excessive blows, your brother will be degraded in your sight. ⁴You must not muzzle an ox while it is treading out grain. ⁵When brothers live together and one of them dies without a son, the dead man's wife must not marry outside the family to a stranger. Her brother-in-law must go to her, take her as his wife, and perform the duty of a brother-in-law for her. ⁶The first son she bears will carry on the name of the dead brother, so that his name is not blotted out from Israel. ⁷But if the man does not want to marry his brother's widow, then the widow must go up to the gate, to the elders, and say, 'My brother-in-law refuses to preserve his brother's name in Israel. He is unwilling to perform the duty of a brother-in-law for me.' ⁸The elders of his city must summon him and speak with him. If he still stands firm and says, 'I do not want to marry her,' ⁹then his brother's widow must approach him in the presence of the elders, pull his sandal off his foot, spit in his face, and declare: 'This is what is done to the man who will not build up his brother's household.' ¹⁰His family will be known in Israel as 'The House of the Removed Sandal.' ¹¹If two men are fighting each other, and the wife of one of them intervenes to rescue her husband from the one striking him, and she reaches out and grabs the other man's genitals, ¹²you must cut off her hand. Your eye must not show pity. ¹³You must not have two different weights in your bag — a large one and a small one. ¹⁴You must not have two different measures in your house — a large one and a small one. ¹⁵You must use only full and honest weights, and full and honest measures, so that you may live long in the land that the LORD your God is giving you. ¹⁶For everyone who does these things — everyone who acts dishonestly — is detestable to the LORD your God. ¹⁷Remember what Amalek did to you on the road when you were coming out of Egypt — ¹⁸how he encountered you on the road and attacked your rear guard — all the stragglers trailing behind you — when you were exhausted and weary, and he had no fear of God. ¹⁹Therefore, when the LORD your God grants you rest from all your enemies on every side in the land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance to possess, you must blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven. Do not forget.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The judicial process begins with a riv ('dispute, controversy') between parties who bring it to the hammishpat ('the court, the place of judgment'). The judges' twofold duty is stated using causative verbs: hitsddiq et hatsaddiq ('declare righteous the righteous one' — acquit the innocent) and hirshi'u et harasha ('declare guilty the guilty one' — convict the wicked). Justice means accurate identification — not compromise between parties but truthful determination of right and wrong.
2. Flogging is administered only after judicial determination (im bin hakkot — 'if he is a son of beating,' i.e., deserves flogging). The phrase kedei rish'ato bemispar ('according to his guilt, by number') requires proportional punishment — the lash count must match the crime's severity. The judge must be present (lefanav — 'before his face') to ensure proper administration and prevent abuse.
3. The forty-lash maximum (arba'im yakkenu lo yosif — 'forty he may strike him, he shall not add') establishes an absolute ceiling on punishment. Jewish practice reduced this to thirty-nine lashes (2 Corinthians 11:24) to provide a margin of error against accidentally exceeding the limit. The reason is remarkably humane: veniqlah achikha le'einekha ('your brother would be degraded before your eyes'). Even a convicted criminal remains 'your brother' — punishment must not strip away his fundamental dignity.
4. One of the Bible's most concise laws: lo tachsom shor bedisho ('do not muzzle an ox during its threshing'). The ox walking over grain to separate kernels from chaff must be allowed to eat while working. Paul applies this principle to human workers in 1 Corinthians 9:9 and 1 Timothy 5:18, arguing from lesser to greater: if an animal deserves to eat from its labor, how much more does a human worker. The law establishes that even animals have rights to the fruit of their labor.
5. The levirate marriage law (from Latin levir, 'brother-in-law'). The conditions: brothers living together (yeshvu achim yachdav — sharing an estate), death of one brother, and childlessness (uven ein lo — 'he has no son'). The widow must not marry outside (lo tiyeh hachutsah le'ish zar — 'shall not go outside to a stranger'). The brother-in-law's obligation (yevamah yavo aleiha — 'her levir shall go to her') preserves the dead brother's name and estate. Ruth and Boaz's story illustrates a broader application of this principle.
6. The firstborn from the levirate union yaqum al shem achiv hammet ('shall stand upon the name of his dead brother') — legally considered the dead brother's son for purposes of inheritance and lineage. The fear is that his name would be erased: velo yimmacheh shemo miYisra'el ('his name shall not be wiped out from Israel'). In a culture where family name continuity was linked to ongoing covenantal membership, name-erasure was a form of social death.
7. The refusal clause: im lo yachpots ha'ish ('if the man does not desire'). The widow has legal standing to bring a public complaint before the elders at the gate. Her accusation — me'en yevami lehaqim le'achiv shem beYisra'el ('my levir refuses to raise up a name for his brother in Israel') — reframes his personal preference as a failure of family obligation.
8. The elders' intervention creates a judicial hearing — they summon the man (veqare'u lo — 'they shall call him'), speak with him (vedibru elav — 'they shall speak to him'), presumably urging him to fulfill his obligation. Only after this mediation, if he remains adamant (ve'amad ve'amar — 'he stands and says'), does the chalitzah ceremony proceed.
9. The chalitzah ('removal') ceremony has three symbolic acts: removing his sandal (vechaltsah na'alo — sandal-removal signified transfer of rights, as in Ruth 4:7-8), spitting in his face (veyarqah befanav — public shaming for his refusal), and a verbal proclamation. The act publicly shames the man for prioritizing self-interest over family obligation. The phrase asher lo yivneh et bet achiv ('who will not build up his brother's house') equates his refusal with allowing a family line to die.

10. The lasting social consequence: bet chaluts hanna'al ('the house of the removed sandal') becomes the man's family designation — a permanent mark of shame. His refusal to build his brother's house results in a degraded name for his own house. The stigma is generational: his descendants carry the label of a family that failed its covenant obligation.
11. The highly specific case involves a wife intervening in a fight (lehatsil et ishah — 'to rescue her husband') by seizing the attacker's genitals (hechezizqah bimevushav — 'she seized his private parts'). The scenario addresses a woman using a man's vulnerability as a weapon. The specificity suggests this case arose in actual legal practice and required a formal ruling.
12. The penalty — veqatsotah et kappah ('you shall cut off her hand') — is the only instance of mutilation as punishment in Deuteronomy's legal code. Some scholars interpret kappah ('her palm, her hand') metaphorically as a fine paid 'from her hand' (i.e., her resources), noting that the lex talionis elsewhere in Deuteronomy functions as proportional rather than literal punishment. The phrase lo tachos einekha ('your eye shall not pity') repeats from 19:13, 21.
13. The prohibition against even va'even ('stone and stone' — two different weights) addresses commercial fraud. Stone weights were used on balance scales to measure commodities for sale. Having two sets — a heavy one for buying (paying less) and a light one for selling (charging more) — was a common form of marketplace deception. The idiom 'stone and stone' means two weights that differ when they should be identical.
14. The parallel prohibition extends from weights (v 13) to volume measures: efah ve'efah ('ephah and ephah' — two different dry measures). The ephah was a standard dry measure (approximately 22 liters). Having two different ephah containers — one for buying grain and another for selling it — was another form of commercial fraud. The law demands consistency between the measure used to purchase and the one used to sell.
15. The positive command: even shelemah vatsedeq ('a complete and righteous weight') and efah shelemah vatsedeq ('a complete and righteous measure'). The adjective tsedeq ('just, righteous') applied to weights and measures means accurate, honest, fair. The reward for commercial integrity is the same as for honoring parents: lema'an ya'arikhu yamekha ('so that your days may be long'). Economic justice and national longevity are linked — a society built on fraud cannot endure.
16. Commercial dishonesty receives Deuteronomy's strongest condemnation: to'avat YHWH ('detestable to the LORD'). The expansion kol oseh avel ('everyone who does injustice') broadens the principle from specific weights-and-measures fraud to all forms of economic dishonesty. The paragraph marker (pe) after this verse creates a strong break before the Amalek remembrance.
17. The command zakhor ('remember') opens the Amalek remembrance, the final unit of the Deuteronomic law code. The exodus road (baderekh betse'tkhem miMitsrayim — 'on the way when you came out of Egypt') refers to the attack described in Exodus 17:8-16. Amalek's assault on a vulnerable, newly freed people makes them the paradigmatic enemy of Israel.
18. Amalek's cowardice is exposed: vayezannev bekha kol hannecheshalim acharekha ('he cut off your tail — all the weak ones trailing behind you'). The verb zinnev ('attack the rear, cut off the tail') describes targeting the most vulnerable — the elderly, the sick, the children who could not keep pace. The moral judgment: velo yare Elohim ('he did not fear God'). Attacking the defenseless reveals the absence of any moral restraint. This is not military aggression but predatory cruelty.
19. The command timcheh et zekher Amaleq mittachat hashamayim ('blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven') is paradoxically self-contradictory: remembering to forget. The concluding lo tishkach ('do not forget') creates a permanent obligation. King Saul's failure to complete this mandate (1 Samuel 15) cost him his kingdom. The Amalek remembrance closes the Deuteronomic law code proper — what follows in chapters 26-28 are ceremonies and blessings/curses.

Summary: Moses prescribes the firstfruits liturgy — a confession beginning 'my father was a wandering Aramean' — and the tithe declaration, then concludes with a mutual covenant declaration between God and Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: The firstfruits confession (vv. 5-9) is the earliest creed in Israel — a narrative summary of salvation history recited by every farmer at the sanctuary. It begins with arami oved avi ('my father was a wandering Aramean' or 'an Aramean was destroying my father'), and each verb marks a stage: went down, became a nation, was oppressed, cried out, was brought out. The chapter closes with the covenant's most intimate formula (vv. 17-18): God declares Israel His treasured people (am segullah) and Israel declares the LORD their God — a mutual pledging.

Translation Friction: The phrase arami oved avi (v. 5) is famously ambiguous: 'a wandering Aramean was my father' (Jacob the nomad) or 'an Aramean was destroying my father' (Laban threatened Jacob). The verb oved can mean 'perishing,' 'wandering,' or 'destroying.' We rendered it 'my father was a wandering Aramean' and noted both readings. The Passover Haggadah builds its entire exposition on this verse.

Connections: The firstfruits creed (vv. 5-9) is recited at Passover to this day. The phrase yad chazaqah uzero'a netuyah ('powerful hand and outstretched arm,' v. 8) echoes 4:34 and 5:15. The am segullah declaration (v. 18) closes the circle opened in 7:6 and Exodus 19:5. Paul echoes the 'zealous for good works' language of v. 18 in Titus 2:14.

¹When you enter the land that the LORD your God is giving you as an inheritance, and you take possession of it and settle in it, ²you must take some of the first of all the produce of the ground that you harvest from the land the LORD your God is giving you. Place it in a basket and go to the place that the LORD your God will choose as a dwelling for His name. ³You will go to the priest who is serving at that time and say to him, 'I declare today to the LORD your God that I have entered the land that the LORD swore to our ancestors to give us.' ⁴The priest will take the basket from your hand and set it down before the altar of the LORD your God. ⁵Then you will respond and say before the LORD your God: 'My father was a wandering Aramean. He went down to Egypt and lived there as a foreigner with only a few people, but there he became a great, powerful, and numerous nation. ⁶The Egyptians treated us harshly, oppressed us, and imposed brutal forced labor on us. ⁷So we cried out to the LORD, the God of our ancestors. The LORD heard our voice and saw our misery, our hardship, and our oppression. ⁸The LORD brought us out of Egypt with a powerful hand and an outstretched arm, with overwhelming terror, and with signs and wonders. ⁹He brought us to this place and gave us this land — a land flowing with milk and honey. ¹⁰So now, I have brought the first of the produce of the ground that you, LORD, have given me.' You will set it before the LORD your God and bow down in worship before the LORD your God. ¹¹Then you will celebrate all the good things that the LORD your God has given to you and your household — you, the Levite, and the foreigner living among you. ¹²When you have finished setting aside the full tenth of your produce in the third year — the year of the tithe — and have given it to the Levite, the foreigner, the orphan, and the widow, so that they may eat within your towns and be satisfied, ¹³then you will say before the LORD your God: 'I have removed the sacred portion from my house. I have also given it to the Levite, the foreigner, the orphan, and the widow, exactly as you commanded me. I have not violated your commandments, and I have not forgotten them. ¹⁴I have not eaten any of it while in mourning. I have not removed any of it while ritually impure. I have not offered any of it to the dead. I have listened to the voice of the LORD my God and have done everything you commanded me. ¹⁵Look down from your holy dwelling place, from heaven, and bless your people Israel and the ground you have given us — just as you swore to our ancestors — a land flowing with milk and honey.' ¹⁶Today the LORD your God is commanding you to follow these statutes and ordinances. You must keep and observe them with all your heart and with all your being. ¹⁷You have declared today that the LORD is your God, and that you will walk in His ways, keep His statutes, His commandments, and His ordinances, and listen to His voice. ¹⁸And the LORD has declared today that you are His treasured people, just as He promised you, and that you must keep all His commandments. ¹⁹He will set you high above all the nations He has made — for praise, for renown, and for glory — and you will be a holy people to the LORD your God, just as He has spoken.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verse opens with a temporal clause (ki tavo — 'when you enter') that assumes successful conquest. Three sequential verbs describe the progression: tavo ('enter'), yerishtah ('take possession'), and yashavta ('settle, dwell'). The term nachalah ('inheritance, hereditary possession') signals that the land is not merely territory but a covenantal bequest — a divine grant to be held across generations. This verse provides the heading for the entire firstfruits ritual.
2. The term reshit ('first, beginning, choicest') denotes the initial portion of the harvest — the firstfruits offered before the rest is consumed. The tene ('basket') is a woven container used specifically for produce transport; it reappears in verse 4 when the priest takes it. The phrase leshakken shemo sham ('to cause His name to dwell there') is Deuteronomy's distinctive formula for the central sanctuary — God's 'name' represents His accessible presence without limiting His cosmic transcendence.
3. The verb higgadti ('I have declared, I have announced') opens a formal public statement — this is legal testimony, not casual conversation. The phrase asher yihyeh bayyamim hahem ('who will be in those days') acknowledges that the priesthood will change across generations, but the ritual persists regardless of which priest serves. The oath to the ancestors (nishba laavotenu) ties the present moment of harvest to the patriarchal promises — every basket of fruit is proof that God kept His word.
4. The priest serves as mediator: he receives the basket (tene) from the worshiper's hand (miyadekha — 'from your hand,' emphasizing the personal transfer) and places it before the altar. The verb hinnicho ('he will set it down, deposit it') suggests a deliberate, ceremonial placement — not tossing the basket aside but positioning it in the presence of God. The altar is the meeting point between the worshiper's gratitude and God's provision.

5. The phrase arami oved avi is one of the most debated in the Hebrew Bible. Oved can mean 'perishing, lost, wandering, destitute.' The Aramean is Jacob, whose family connections trace to Aram (Paddan-aram). This three-word confession — 'a wandering Aramean was my father' — became the liturgical foundation of the Passover Haggadah. The entire creed (vv 5-9) compresses centuries of history into a single recitation: from one homeless ancestor to a mighty nation, from Egyptian bondage to divine deliverance, from wilderness to a land flowing with milk and honey. The verb vayagar ('he sojournd, lived as an alien') marks Jacob's status in Egypt as a resident foreigner with no land rights — the same word used of Abraham in Canaan.
6. Three verbs escalate the oppression: vayyare'u ('they treated us badly, they did evil to us'), vay'annunu ('they afflicted, oppressed us' — the same root as the 'affliction' God later sees in v 7), and vayyittenu ('they placed upon us'). The term avodah qashah ('hard labor, harsh servitude') echoes Exodus 1:14 where the Egyptians made Israel's lives bitter with 'hard labor.' The creed does not dwell on specific events but compresses decades of suffering into a single devastating sentence.
7. The turning point of the creed: Israel cries and God responds. The verb vanitsa'aq ('we cried out') is a cry of desperation, not a polite prayer. God's response is described with three sensory verbs and their objects: vayishma ('He heard') our voice, vayyar ('He saw') our onyenu ('affliction, misery'), amalenu ('toil, hardship'), and lachtsenu ('oppression, pressure'). Each noun carries a distinct shade of suffering: oni is material deprivation, amal is exhausting toil, and lachts is the crushing weight of external force.
8. Five prepositional phrases describe the means of deliverance — each introduced by the prefix be ('with'). The yad chazaqah ('strong hand') and zero'a netuyah ('outstretched arm') are classic exodus language, depicting God as a warrior whose arm reaches across nations. The mora gadol ('great terror') refers to the dread God struck into the Egyptians. The otot ('signs') and mofetim ('wonders') encompass the plagues and the sea-crossing. This verse is a compressed theology of the exodus: God acts with power (hand/arm), psychological force (terror), and supernatural demonstration (signs/wonders).
9. The creed concludes with arrival and gift. 'This place' (hamaqom hazzeh) may refer either to the central sanctuary or to the promised land itself. The phrase erets zavat chalav udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') is the classic description of Canaan's abundance — milk from pastoral herds and honey (likely date syrup, devash) from orchards. The formula appears over twenty times in the Torah and always points back to God's original promise. The worshiper standing with his basket of firstfruits is living proof that the promise was fulfilled.
10. The spoken creed (vv 5-10a) ends with ve'attah hinneh heveti ('and now, look — I have brought'), connecting the grand sweep of salvation history directly to the basket of fruit in the worshiper's hands. The logic is: because God brought us out and brought us in, I now bring this offering. The shift from first-person speech ('I have brought') to second-person instruction ('you will set it down... you will bow') marks the transition from the recited creed back to the ritual instructions. The verb hishtachavita ('bow down in worship') is a full prostration — the physical expression of gratitude and submission.
11. The verb vesamachta ('you will rejoice, celebrate') makes joy a commandment — gratitude is not optional but a required covenant response to God's generosity. The celebration is inclusive: it extends to your household (ulveitekha), the Levite (who has no territorial inheritance and depends on community support), and the ger ('foreigner, resident alien'). Deuteronomy consistently insists that Israel's worship include the economically vulnerable. The sectional marker (samekh) in the Hebrew text closes the firstfruits legislation.
12. The third-year tithe (ma'aser — a tenth) is distinguished from the regular annual tithe. In years one, two, four, and five of the seven-year cycle, the tithe was consumed at the central sanctuary. In the third year (and sixth year), the entire tithe remained local, distributed to four categories of vulnerable people: the Levite (landless clergy), the ger (foreigner), the yatom (orphan, fatherless), and the almanah (widow). The verb vesaw'u ('and they will be satisfied, filled') makes the purpose explicit — this is not token charity but provision to the point of fullness.
13. The tithe confession (viddui ma'aser) begins here and runs through verse 15. The verb bi'arti ('I have removed, I have purged') treats the sacred tithe as something that must not remain in the house beyond its appointed time — retaining what belongs to the vulnerable is a form of defilement. The two negative declarations — lo avarti ('I have not transgressed, violated') and lo shakhachti ('I have not forgotten') — cover both intentional disobedience and negligent omission. The worshiper accounts for both will and memory.
14. Three more negative declarations (lo akhalti, lo vi'arti, lo natatti — 'I have not eaten, I have not removed, I have not given') specify what could contaminate the sacred tithe. Eating be'oni ('in my mourning, in my grief') would associate the sacred portion with death-impurity. Handling it betamei ('in a state of ritual impurity') would violate its consecrated status. Giving it lamet ('for the dead') likely refers to funerary offerings or meals for the dead — a practice common in surrounding cultures but forbidden in Israel. These three prohibitions guard the boundary between the holy and the impure, between legitimate worship and pagan custom. The confession closes with a positive affirmation: shamati beqol ('I have listened to the voice of') — obedience summarized as attentive hearing.
15. The confession concludes with a prayer — a rare shift from declaration to petition. The verb hashqifah ('look down, gaze from above') asks God to direct His attention from His cosmic dwelling (me'on qodshekha — 'your holy habitation') in heaven toward His people below. The request is twofold: bless the people (et ammekha et yisra'el) and bless the land (ve'et ha'adamah). The closing phrase erets zavat chalav udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') echoes verse 9, forming a literary bracket around the entire ritual. The sectional marker (samekh) closes the tithe confession.
16. The final section (vv 16-19) shifts from specific ritual instructions to the overarching covenant framework. The phrase hayyom hazzeh ('this day, today') gives the commandments urgency — not ancient history but present obligation. The pairing of chuqqim ('statutes' — prescribed regulations) and mishpatim ('ordinances, judgments' — case-law decisions) covers the full spectrum of covenant legislation. The phrase bekhol levavekha uvekhol nafshekha ('with all your heart and with all your being') demands total engagement — not grudging compliance but wholehearted devotion. The term nefesh here means the whole self, not merely the 'soul' in a Greek philosophical sense.

17. The rare verb he'emarta (hifil of amar — 'you have caused to say, you have declared, you have affirmed') appears only here and in verse 18 in the entire Hebrew Bible. Its precise meaning is debated: 'you have declared,' 'you have affirmed,' or 'you have acknowledged.' The effect is a public, binding statement — Israel formally declares YHWH to be their God, with five accompanying commitments: walking in His ways, keeping statutes (chuqqav), commandments (mitsvotav), ordinances (mishpatav), and listening to His voice (lishmo'a beqolo). This is Israel's side of the mutual covenant declaration.
18. The reciprocal declaration: in verse 17, Israel declared God; now God declares Israel. The verb he'emirkha ('He has declared you') mirrors he'emarta ('you have declared'). The term am segullah ('treasured people, prized possession') is one of the most significant covenant designations in the Torah, first used at Sinai (Exodus 19:5). It describes Israel not as a servant-nation but as a king's personal treasure — chosen, valued, and guarded. The condition attached (velishmor kol mitsvotav — 'and to keep all His commandments') reminds Israel that the treasured status carries obligations.
19. The chapter closes with the highest covenant promise: Israel set elyon ('high, supreme') above all nations. The three purpose phrases — litehillah ('for praise'), uleshem ('for renown, for a name'), uletifaret ('for glory, splendor') — describe not Israel's self-glorification but their role as God's display of covenant faithfulness to the watching world. The final phrase am qadosh laYHWH ('a holy people belonging to the LORD') echoes Exodus 19:6 and Deuteronomy 7:6, forming a theological bracket around the entire book's legislation. The closing ka'asher dibber ('just as He has spoken') grounds everything in God's prior word — His promise precedes and guarantees Israel's destiny. The paragraph marker (pe) closes the chapter.

Summary: Moses and the elders command Israel to set up plastered stones inscribed with the Law on Mount Ebal after crossing the Jordan. Six tribes stand on Gerizim for blessing, six on Ebal for curse, and the Levites pronounce twelve curses.

What Makes This Remarkable: The twelve curses (vv. 15–26) target sins committed in secret — idolatry behind closed doors, moving boundary stones at night, misleading the blind, perverting justice for the vulnerable, and sexual violations. The structure assumes that public law enforcement will miss these offenses; the curse ceremony transfers accountability to God. Each curse ends with 'and all the people will say: Amen' — the community collectively ratifies divine judgment on hidden sin.

Translation Friction: *The word arur (v. 15, 'condemned/cursed') is performative speech — pronouncing the curse activates it. We rendered it 'condemned' rather than 'cursed' to avoid the magical connotation while preserving the judicial force. The final curse (v. 26) is sweeping: 'condemned is the one who does not uphold the words of this instruction by carrying them out.' Paul quotes this in Galatians 3:10 as the curse from which Christ redeems.*

Connections: The Ebal ceremony is executed in Joshua 8:30–35. The plastered-stone inscription connects to ancient Near Eastern treaty practice. Paul's citation of v. 26 in Galatians 3:10 makes this verse pivotal to the theology of law and grace. The twelve-curse structure parallels the twelve-tribe organization of blessing in chapter 33.

¹Moses, together with the elders of Israel, gave the people this charge: 'Guard every commandment that I am laying upon you today.' ²On the day you cross the Jordan into the land that the LORD your God is giving you, you must set up large stones and coat them with plaster. ³You must inscribe on them all the words of this instruction once you have crossed over, so that you may enter the land that the LORD your God is giving you — a land flowing with milk and honey — just as the LORD, the God of your ancestors, promised you. ⁴When you have crossed the Jordan, you must erect these stones that I am commanding you about today on Mount Ebal, and coat them with plaster. ⁵There you must build an altar to the LORD your God — an altar of stones. You must not use any iron tool on them. ⁶You must construct the altar of the LORD your God from whole, uncut stones, and on it you will present burnt offerings to the LORD your God. ⁷You will also sacrifice fellowship offerings there, eat the meal, and celebrate in the presence of the LORD your God. ⁸You must write on the stones all the words of this instruction, making them very clear. ⁹Then Moses and the Levitical priests addressed all of Israel: 'Be silent and listen, Israel! On this day you have become the people of the LORD your God.' ¹⁰You must therefore listen to the voice of the LORD your God and carry out His commandments and His statutes that I am charging you with today. ¹¹That same day Moses instructed the people as follows: ¹²These tribes will stand on Mount Gerizim to pronounce blessing over the people once you have crossed the Jordan: Simeon, Levi, Judah, Issachar, Joseph, and Benjamin. ¹³And these will stand on Mount

Ebal for the pronouncement of curse: Reuben, Gad, Asher, Zebulun, Dan, and Naphtali. ¹⁴The Levites will then declare to every person of Israel in a raised voice: ¹⁵'Condemned is the person who crafts a carved or cast idol — something the LORD detests — the product of a craftsman's hands, and sets it up in a hidden place.' And all the people will respond: 'Amen.' ¹⁶'Condemned is the one who treats his father or mother with contempt.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ¹⁷'Condemned is the one who moves his neighbor's boundary marker.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ¹⁸'Condemned is the one who leads a blind person astray on the road.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ¹⁹'Condemned is the one who distorts justice for the foreigner, the orphan, or the widow.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²⁰'Condemned is the one who sleeps with his father's wife, for he has violated his father's marriage.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²¹'Condemned is the one who has sexual relations with any animal.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²²'Condemned is the one who sleeps with his sister, whether his father's daughter or his mother's daughter.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²³'Condemned is the one who sleeps with his mother-in-law.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²⁴'Condemned is the one who strikes down his neighbor in secret.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²⁵'Condemned is the one who accepts a bribe to kill an innocent person.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.' ²⁶'Condemned is the one who does not uphold the words of this instruction by carrying them out.' And all the people will say: 'Amen.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb shamor ('guard, keep watch over') conveys more than mere obedience — it implies vigilant, ongoing protection of the commandment, as a watchman guards a post. The singular mitsvah ('commandment') used collectively for the entire body of instruction suggests the covenant obligation is a unified whole, not a disconnected list. Moses shares authority with the elders (ziquei Yisra'el) for this charge, signaling that covenant responsibility will outlast his leadership.
2. The command to erect avanim gedolot ('large stones') and coat them with sid ('lime plaster, whitewash') describes an ancient Near Eastern practice of creating a smooth writing surface on rough stone. Egyptian and Mesopotamian parallels show that lime-plastered stelae were used for public display of royal decrees and treaty texts. The immediacy of bayyom asher ('on the day that') — the very day of crossing — signals that covenant inscription is the first act of possession, establishing the land under God's written terms before any settlement begins.
3. The phrase divrei hattorah hazot ('the words of this instruction') raises the question of scope: does 'this torah' refer to the entire Deuteronomic law code, a summary of it, or the blessings and curses of chapters 27-28? The phrase erets zavat chalav udevash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') is a fixed formula appearing over twenty times in the Pentateuch — chalav ('milk') represents pastoral abundance and devash ('honey,' likely date syrup rather than bee honey) represents agricultural sweetness. The land's character is defined by its covenant promise: ka'asher dibber ('just as He spoke/promised').
4. The location behar Eival ('on Mount Ebal') is theologically significant: Ebal is the mountain of cursing (v 13), not the mountain of blessing. The Samaritan Pentateuch reads 'Mount Gerizim' here instead, reflecting the Samaritan-Jewish dispute over the legitimate cult site. The placement of the inscribed law on the mountain of curse may suggest that the written torah serves as a witness against covenant violation — a permanent warning monument rather than a celebratory marker.
5. The prohibition lo tanif aleihem barzel ('you must not swing iron upon them') forbids shaping the altar stones with metal tools. The verb tanif ('swing, wave, wield') specifically describes the motion of lifting a tool to strike. The requirement for unworked stone (cf. Exodus 20:25) preserves the natural state of God's creation — human craftsmanship would impose human artistry on a structure meant to represent divine encounter. Iron (barzel) may also carry associations with weaponry, making the prohibition a statement that the altar is a place of peace, not violence.
6. The term avanim shelemot ('whole, complete, uncut stones') uses the same root as shalom ('peace, wholeness') — the stones must be shalem, intact as God made them. The olot ('burnt offerings, ascending offerings') are sacrifices entirely consumed by fire; nothing is retained by the worshiper. The verb he'elita ('you will cause to ascend') describes the smoke rising upward — the offering 'ascends' to God. The burnt offering on uncut stone at the covenant's inauguration establishes the pattern of total consecration at the moment of national commitment.
7. Unlike the olah (burnt offering) of verse 6, the shelamim ('fellowship offerings, peace offerings') are shared meals — portions go to God (fat burned on the altar), to the priest, and to the worshiper. The sequence zavachta... akhalta... samachta ('you will sacrifice... eat... rejoice') moves from ritual act to communal meal to emotional response. The covenant ceremony is not solely solemn — it includes feasting and joy (simchah) in God's presence. This combination of sacrifice, shared eating, and celebration characterizes covenant-making throughout the ancient Near East.
8. The phrase ba'er hetev ('making clear, explaining well') uses the verb ba'ar ('to make distinct, to engrave clearly, to elucidate'). This is not merely legible handwriting but a demand for clarity of meaning — the same root appears in Deuteronomy 1:5 where Moses 'explains' (be'er) the torah. The law must be both physically readable and intellectually accessible. The setumah paragraph marker after this verse separates the stone-inscription instructions (vv 1-8) from the covenant ceremony that follows (vv 9-26).

9. The rare verb hasket ('be silent, pay close attention') appears only here and in Deuteronomy 27:9 in the entire Hebrew Bible — it demands a quality of attention beyond ordinary hearing: stop everything and absorb what follows. The declaration nihyeta le'am laYHWH ('you have become a people belonging to the LORD') is performative — the statement itself constitutes the event. This is covenant formation language: Israel's identity as God's people is being established in this moment. Moses now shares authority with hakkohanim haleviyim ('the Levitical priests'), signaling the transition of covenant guardianship to the priestly class.
10. The two categories of obligation — mitsvotav ('His commandments,' specific directives) and chuqqotav ('His statutes,' fixed decrees) — together encompass the full range of covenant requirements. The verb shamata ('you shall hear/obey') carries the double sense of hearing and doing that is characteristic of Hebrew covenantal language — to truly hear God's voice is to act on it. The setumah marker closes this brief section (vv 9-10) in which Moses and the priests establish Israel's new identity before the tribal ceremony begins.
11. The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day, that same day') anchors the tribal assignment ceremony to the same occasion as the preceding commands. The verb vayetsav ('he commanded, he charged') signals a shift from the general covenant declaration (vv 9-10) to specific ceremonial instructions for the tribes. This brief transitional verse introduces the liturgical arrangement of verses 12-26.
12. The six blessing tribes on Har Gerizim ('Mount Gerizim') are all sons of Rachel and Leah — the two primary wives of Jacob. The verb levarekh ('to bless') positions them as channels of divine favor. Mount Gerizim, the southern mountain overlooking Shechem, is the fertile, well-watered slope — geographically suited to represent blessing. The tribal division is not random: Simeon, Levi, Judah, and Issachar are Leah's sons; Joseph and Benjamin are Rachel's sons. The tribes of the two full wives stand for blessing; the tribes of the two concubines (Bilhah and Zilpah) stand for curse on Ebal.
13. The six tribes on Ebal include four sons of the concubines Bilhah and Zilpah (Gad, Asher, Dan, Naphtali), plus Reuben — who lost his firstborn status by sleeping with Bilhah (Genesis 35:22) — and Zebulun, Leah's youngest. The phrase al haqqelalah ('for the curse, upon the curse') positions these tribes not as cursed themselves but as witnesses to the covenant's negative sanctions. The geographic arrangement — two mountains with a valley between them — creates a natural amphitheater where the antiphonal recitation of blessings and curses would resonate across the assembled tribes.
14. The verb ve'anu ('they will answer, they will respond') suggests the Levites are responding to a prior statement or liturgical cue — the curse recitation is part of a structured call-and-response ceremony. The phrase qol ram ('a raised voice, a loud voice') indicates public proclamation — the curses must be heard by all. The Levites serve as the mediating voice between God and Israel: they stand on Gerizim for blessing (v 12) yet also pronounce the curses (here), functioning as neutral covenant administrators rather than partisans of either mountain.
15. The first of twelve arur ('condemned, cursed') declarations. Two types of idol are specified: pesel ('carved image,' from wood or stone) and massekha ('molten image,' cast metal). The phrase to'avat YHWH ('an abomination to the LORD, something the LORD detests') marks idolatry as the supreme covenant violation. Crucially, the idol is placed bassater ('in secret, in a hidden place') — this curse targets private, concealed sin that escapes human detection. The entire twelve-curse series (vv 15-26) addresses offenses committed in secret, beyond the reach of courts and witnesses. The communal response ve'anu khol ha'am ve'amru Amen ('and all the people will answer and say Amen') makes each individual personally ratify the curse — the Amen is a self-imprecation, binding oneself to the consequences. This liturgical pattern transforms the congregation from passive listeners into active participants in covenant enforcement.
16. The participle maqleh ('one who makes light of, treats with contempt') is the opposite of kavod ('honor, give weight to') — the fifth commandment demands that parents be given weight, and this curse targets those who make them lightweight, treating them as insignificant. The verb qalah means to diminish, trivialize, or curse — it covers a range from verbal abuse to material neglect. Like all twelve curses, this addresses behavior that could be hidden from public view: private mistreatment of aging parents within the household.
17. The participle massig ('one who moves, displaces') with gevul ('boundary, border, landmark') describes the covert relocation of property boundary stones — a crime committed under cover of darkness that steals land incrementally. In an agrarian society where land was the primary form of wealth and was understood as God's covenantal allotment to each family, moving a boundary stone was not mere theft but an assault on the divine distribution of inheritance. This offense also appears in the wisdom tradition (Proverbs 22:28, 23:10) and in prophetic condemnation (Hosea 5:10).
18. The participle mashgeh ('one who causes to go astray, one who misleads') with ivver ('a blind person') describes deliberate exploitation of someone's physical vulnerability. The phrase baddarekh ('on the road') makes it concrete — misdirecting a blind traveler. However, the principle extends beyond literal blindness: Leviticus 19:14 pairs 'do not curse the deaf' with 'do not place a stumbling block before the blind,' suggesting a broader ethic of protecting the vulnerable from exploitation they cannot detect. The secrecy theme continues: the victim cannot see the perpetrator.
19. The verb matteh ('bends, distorts, perverts') with mishpat ('justice, legal judgment') describes corruption of the judicial process to disadvantage those who lack social power. The triad ger-yatom-ve'almanah ('foreigner, orphan, widow') represents the three most vulnerable categories in Israelite society — those without the protection of a male head of household or clan membership. Deuteronomy returns to their protection repeatedly (10:18, 14:29, 16:11, 24:17, 26:12-13). The textual note at the end records uncertainty in the Aleppo Codex about whether a paragraph break (setumah) belongs here.
20. The metaphor gilah kenaf aviv ('he has uncovered his father's wing/covering') uses kanaf ('wing, edge of garment, protective covering') to describe marital rights and protection. To spread one's garment over a woman was to claim her as wife (Ruth 3:9); to uncover a father's 'wing' is to violate the protective covering of his marriage. The offense is not merely sexual — it is an assault on paternal authority and family structure. This likely refers to a stepmother (eshet aviv — 'his father's wife'), a situation that could arise after a father's death when a son might claim the father's widow.

- 21. The phrase shokhev im kol behemah ('one who lies with any animal') prohibits bestiality in absolute terms — kol ('any, every') allows no exceptions. This violation crosses the creation boundary between human and animal that Genesis 1 established. The offense would by nature occur in secret (fields, barns, remote areas), fitting the chapter's pattern of sins committed beyond the reach of witnesses and courts. Parallel legislation appears in Exodus 22:19 and Leviticus 18:23, 20:15-16.
- 22. The prohibition covers both full sisters (bat aviv — 'his father's daughter' and bat immo — 'his mother's daughter' being the same person) and half-sisters (sharing only one parent). The explicit mention of both paternal and maternal half-sisters closes any loophole — in a society that practiced polygamy, half-siblings from different mothers might not grow up in the same household, making such unions easier to conceal. The patriarchal narratives themselves record this as once permitted (Abraham and Sarah were half-siblings, Genesis 20:12), but the Levitical and Deuteronomic codes prohibit it.
- 23. The term chotanto ('his mother-in-law') designates a relationship created by marriage rather than blood — sleeping with one's mother-in-law violates the network of trust and obligation that marriage establishes between families. Leviticus 20:14 prescribes execution by burning for this offense, placing it among the most severe sexual violations. The curse here supplements the legal penalty by addressing cases that escape detection: where no witnesses exist, the covenant curse stands as the enforcement mechanism.
- 24. The participle makkeh ('one who strikes, one who kills') with re'ehu ('his neighbor, his fellow') bassater ('in secret') describes covert violence — assassination, ambush, or murder without witnesses. The word bassater ('in secret') appears here for the second time in the curse series (first in v 15 with the hidden idol), making the secrecy theme explicit. Where human courts cannot reach — because the crime is hidden — the covenant curse functions as divine prosecution. The legal system requires witnesses (Deuteronomy 19:15); the curse system does not.
- 25. The phrase loqeach shochad ('one who takes a bribe') with lehakkot nefesh dam naqi ('to strike down the life of innocent blood') describes contract killing — accepting payment to murder someone who has done nothing to deserve death. The term dam naqi ('innocent blood') is a recurring Deuteronomic concern (19:10, 13; 21:8-9); shedding innocent blood pollutes the land and brings collective guilt. The bribe (shochad) adds corruption of the justice system to murder — this curse targets hired assassins and corrupt judges who condemn the innocent to death for payment.
- 26. The final curse is comprehensive: asher lo yaqim et divrei hattorah hazot ('who does not uphold/establish the words of this instruction'). The verb yaqim ('uphold, establish, make stand') implies active sustaining — not merely refraining from violation but positively maintaining the covenant. This twelfth curse functions as a catch-all: any obligation not specifically covered by the previous eleven is included here. The Apostle Paul quotes this verse in Galatians 3:10 as evidence that the law brings curse rather than justification. The petuchah paragraph marker closes the entire curse liturgy. By saying Amen to all twelve curses, every Israelite has personally accepted the covenant's enforcement mechanism — they have invoked divine judgment upon themselves should they violate these terms in secret.

Summary: Moses pronounces the blessings for obedience (vv. 1-14) and the curses for disobedience (vv. 15-68), beginning with agricultural abundance or failure and escalating to siege, cannibalism, and exile. The chapter closes with the covenant made in Moab.

What Makes This Remarkable: The blessings occupy 14 verses; the curses occupy 54. The asymmetry is the point — the consequences of disobedience are described in relentless, escalating detail that reads like a preview of Israel's actual history. The siege description (vv. 49-57) matches the Babylonian and Roman sieges with uncanny specificity. The chapter ends where it began — 'back to Egypt in ships' (v. 68), the ultimate reversal of the Exodus, and no one will buy them as slaves because even that degradation will be denied.

Translation Friction: The opening intensified infinitive shamo'a tishma (v. 1, 'if you truly listen') sets a condition no generation fully meets. The qere/ketiv in verse 30 — where the written text (ketiv) uses the vulgar yishgalenah and the read text (qere) substitutes the euphemistic yishkavenah — is one of the Torah's most sensitive textual notes. We followed the WLC convention: ketiv in brackets, qere in parentheses.

Connections: The curses describe Israel's actual history: Assyrian deportation (2 Kings 17), Babylonian siege (2 Kings 25), and conditions matching Lamentations. The 'back to Egypt in ships' (v. 68) reverses the Exodus promise. The covenant formula (v. 69/29:1) transitions to the Moab covenant renewal in chapter 29. Jesus alludes to the siege conditions in Luke 19:43-44.

¹If you truly listen to the voice of the LORD your God, carefully observing all His commandments that I am commanding you today, then the LORD your God will set you high above all the nations of the earth. ²All these blessings will come upon you and overtake you, when you listen to the voice of the LORD your God. ³You will be blessed in the city, and you will be blessed in the field. ⁴Blessed will be the fruit of your womb, the produce of your soil, and the offspring of your livestock — the calves of your herds and the lambs of your flocks. ⁵Blessed will be your basket and your kneading bowl. ⁶You will be blessed when you come in, and blessed when you go out. ⁷The LORD will cause your enemies who rise against you to be struck down before you. They will advance against you from one direction and flee from you in seven directions. ⁸The LORD will command blessing upon you in your storehouses and in everything you undertake. He will bless you in the land that the LORD your God is giving you. ⁹The LORD will establish you as His holy people, just as He swore to you, if you keep the commandments of the LORD your God and walk in His ways. ¹⁰All the peoples of the earth will see that the name of the LORD is called over you, and they will stand in awe of you. ¹¹The LORD will make you overflow with prosperity — in the fruit of your womb, in the offspring of your livestock, and in the produce of your soil — on the land that the LORD swore to your ancestors to give you. ¹²The LORD will open for you His rich storehouse — the heavens — to give rain to your land in its season and to bless all the work of your hands. You will lend to many nations, but you will not borrow. ¹³The LORD will make you the head and not the tail. You will always be on top and never on the bottom — if you obey the commandments of the LORD your God that I am commanding you today, by carefully following them. ¹⁴You must not turn aside from any of the words that I am commanding you today, to the right or to the left, to follow other gods and serve them. ¹⁵But if you do not listen to the voice of the LORD your God by carefully observing all His commandments and statutes that I am commanding you today, then all these curses will come upon you and overtake you. ¹⁶You will be cursed in the city and cursed in the field. ¹⁷Cursed will be your basket and your kneading bowl. ¹⁸Cursed will be the fruit of your womb, the produce of your soil, the calves of your herds, and the lambs of your flocks. ¹⁹You will be cursed when you come in, and cursed when you go out. ²⁰The LORD will send against you confusion, turmoil, and rebuke in everything you undertake, until you are destroyed and perish quickly — because of the evil of your deeds, for you will have abandoned Me. ²¹The LORD will make pestilence cling to you until it has consumed you from the land you are entering to possess. ²²The LORD will strike you with wasting disease, with fever, with inflammation, with scorching heat, with drought, with blight, and with mildew. They will pursue you until you perish. ²³The sky above your head will become bronze, and the ground beneath you will become iron. ²⁴The LORD will turn the rain of your land into dust and powder. It will come down on you from the sky until you are destroyed. ²⁵The LORD will cause you to be defeated before your enemies. You will advance against them from one direction and flee from them in seven directions. You will become an object of horror to all the kingdoms of the earth. ²⁶Your corpses will become food for all the birds of the sky and the beasts of the earth, and no one will frighten them away. ²⁷The LORD will strike you with the boils of Egypt, with tumors, with festering sores, and with an itch from which you cannot be healed. ²⁸The LORD will strike you with madness, blindness, and confusion of mind. ²⁹You will grope at noon as a blind person gropes in darkness. You will not succeed in anything you do. You will be nothing but oppressed and robbed continually, with no one to rescue you. ³⁰You will become engaged to a woman, but another man will take her. You will build a house, but you will not live in it. You will plant a vineyard, but you will not enjoy its fruit. ³¹Your ox will be slaughtered before your eyes, but you will not eat any of it. Your donkey will be seized right in front of you and not returned. Your flock will be given to your enemies, and no one will rescue you. ³²Your sons and daughters will be given to another people. Your eyes will watch for them and waste away with longing for them all day long, but you will be powerless to do anything. ³³A people you do not know will consume the produce of your land and all your labor. You will be nothing but oppressed and crushed continually. ³⁴You will be driven mad by what your eyes must witness. ³⁵The LORD will strike you on the knees and legs with painful boils that cannot be healed, from the sole of your foot to the top of your head. ³⁶The LORD will bring you and the king you have set over yourself to a nation that neither you nor your ancestors have known, and there you will serve other gods — gods of wood and stone. ³⁷You will become an object of horror, a cautionary tale, and a taunt among all the peoples where the LORD drives you. ³⁸You will carry much seed out to the field, but you will gather little, because locusts will devour it. ³⁹You will plant vineyards and tend them, but you will not drink the wine or gather the grapes, because worms will consume them. ⁴⁰You will have olive trees throughout your territory, but you will not anoint yourself with oil, because your olives will drop off before ripening. ⁴¹You will father sons and daughters, but they will not remain yours, because they will go into captivity. ⁴²Swarming insects will take over all your trees and the produce of your land. ⁴³The foreigner living among you will rise higher and higher above you, while you sink lower and lower. ⁴⁴He will lend to you, but you will not lend to him. He will be the head, and you will be the tail. ⁴⁵All these curses will come upon you, pursuing you and overtaking you until you are destroyed, because you did not listen to the voice of the LORD your God by keeping His commandments and statutes that He commanded you. ⁴⁶They will be signs and warnings upon you and your descendants permanently. ⁴⁷Because you did not serve the LORD your God with joy and gladness of heart when you had abundance of everything, ⁴⁸you will serve your enemies — whom the LORD will send against you — in hunger, in thirst, in nakedness, and in total deprivation. He will place an iron yoke on your neck until He has destroyed you. ⁴⁹The LORD will raise up against you a nation from far away, from the ends of the earth, swooping down like an eagle — a nation whose language you will not understand, ⁵⁰a fierce-faced nation that shows no respect for the elderly and no mercy to the young. ⁵¹They will consume the offspring of your livestock and the produce of your soil until you are destroyed. They will leave you no grain, no new wine, no olive oil, no calves from your herds, and no lambs from your flocks — until they have annihilated you. ⁵²They will besiege you at all your gates until your high, fortified walls — in which you trusted — come crashing down throughout your land. They will lay siege to you at all your gates, throughout the land that the LORD your God has given you. ⁵³You will eat the fruit of your own womb — the flesh of your sons and daughters whom the LORD your God has given you — during the siege and the desperate straits in which your enemy will press you. ⁵⁴The most refined and gentle man among you will look with hostility at his own brother, at the wife he embraces, and at the children he has left, ⁵⁵refusing to share with any of them the flesh of his children that he is eating, because he has nothing else left, during the siege and the desperate straits in which your enemy will press you at all your gates. ⁵⁶The most refined and delicate woman among you — who would not even venture to set the sole of her foot on the ground because of her daintiness and sensitivity — will look with hostility at the husband she embraces, at her own son, and at her own daughter, ⁵⁷begrudging even the afterbirth that comes from between her legs and the children she bears, because she will eat them secretly in her total deprivation, during the siege and the desperate straits in which your enemy will press you at your gates. ⁵⁸If you do not carefully observe all the words of this instruction that are written in this book, so as to revere this glorious and awesome name — the LORD your God — ⁵⁹then the LORD will bring extraordinary afflictions upon you and your descendants — severe and lasting afflictions, and terrible and chronic diseases. ⁶⁰He will bring back upon you all the diseases of Egypt that you dreaded, and they will cling to you. ⁶¹Even every disease and every affliction not written in this book of instruction, the LORD will bring upon you until you are destroyed. ⁶²You will be left few in number, though you were once as numerous as the stars of the sky — because you did not listen to the voice of the LORD your God. ⁶³Just as the LORD took delight in doing good for you and in making you numerous, so the LORD will take delight in causing your ruin and in destroying you. You will be uprooted from the land you are entering to possess. ⁶⁴The LORD will scatter you among all the peoples, from one end of the earth to the other. There you will serve other gods that neither you nor your ancestors have known — gods of wood and stone. ⁶⁵Among those nations you will find no rest, and your foot will find no resting place. The LORD will give you there an anxious heart, failing eyes, and a despairing soul. ⁶⁶Your life will hang in suspense before you. You will live in dread night and day, with no confidence in your own survival. ⁶⁷In the morning you will say, 'If only it were evening!' and in the evening you will say, 'If only it were morning!' — because of the dread in your heart and the sights your eyes must see. ⁶⁸The LORD will bring you back to Egypt in ships, by the route about which I said to you, 'You shall never see it again.' There you will offer yourselves for sale to your enemies as male and female slaves, but no one will buy you. ⁶⁹These are the words of the covenant that the LORD commanded Moses to make with the children of Israel in the land of Moab, in addition to the covenant He made with them at Horeb.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The infinitive absolute shamoa tishma ('listening you shall listen' — truly listen) opens the chapter with an intensified demand for obedience. The conditional structure (im... venatanekha — 'if... then He will set you') establishes the entire chapter as covenant consequences: blessings for obedience (vv 1-14), curses for disobedience (vv 15-68). The word elyon ('high, supreme') positions Israel at the apex of the nations — not through military power but through covenant faithfulness.

2. The verb hissigukha ('overtake you, catch up to you') personifies blessings as pursuers — they chase the obedient person and catch them. The image is striking: you cannot escape God's blessing when you walk in His ways. The blessings are not distant rewards but active forces that pursue and find the faithful.
3. The blessing formulas of verses 3-6 use barukh ('blessed') as a declaration of divine favor covering every sphere of life. The city-field pair encompasses all inhabited space — urban and rural, commerce and agriculture. The parallelism is characteristic of Hebrew blessing language: comprehensive coverage through paired opposites.
4. Three domains of fertility are blessed: human reproduction (peri vitnekha — 'fruit of your womb'), agricultural yield (peri admatekha — 'fruit of your ground'), and animal husbandry (peri behemtekha — 'fruit of your livestock'). The rare terms shegar alafekha ('increase of your cattle' — the calving of your herds) and ashterot tsonekha ('offspring of your flocks' — possibly related to the goddess Ashtoreth's fertility associations, here stripped of pagan context) specify the two main branches of animal agriculture.
5. The tan'akha ('your basket' — used for gathering produce) and mish'artekha ('your kneading trough' — used for making bread) represent the beginning and end of the food-production process: harvest and preparation. Together they mean blessed from field to table — abundance at every stage.
6. The coming-in/going-out pair (bevo'ekha/betsetekha) covers all movement: leaving home and returning, departing for war and coming back safely, entering a city and exiting it. The merism (two extremes representing the whole) means blessing accompanies every transition, every journey, every venture.
7. The military blessing uses a striking numerical contrast: enemies attack from one direction (bederekh echad — 'in one road') but scatter in seven directions (uvshiv'ah derakhim — 'in seven roads'). Seven represents completeness — the enemy rout is total. This reversal pattern (one becoming seven) reappears inverted in the curses (v 25): Israel will attack from one direction and flee in seven.
8. God 'commands' (yetsav) blessing — the same verb used in Leviticus 25:21 for commanding the land's abundance. Blessing is not accidental but sovereignly dispatched. The phrase uvkhol mishlach yadekha ('in everything your hand is sent to' — everything you undertake) extends the blessing beyond agriculture to commerce, craftsmanship, and every human endeavor.
9. The term am qadosh ('holy people') echoes the foundational declaration of Exodus 19:6 and Deuteronomy 7:6. The verb yeqimekha ('He will establish you, He will raise you up') suggests permanence and public visibility — God will make Israel's holiness evident to the world. The condition is twofold: keeping commandments (obligation) and walking in His ways (character).
10. The phrase shem YHWH niqra alekha ('the name of the LORD is called over you') describes a claim of ownership and protection — like a king's name placed on his city. Israel bears God's name; their flourishing or failure reflects on Him. The response of the nations is yir'ah ('awe, fear, reverence') — not terror but recognition that Israel stands under divine protection.
11. The verb hotirkha ('He will make you overflow, He will give you abundance') suggests surplus beyond need. The triad of fertility (womb, livestock, soil) repeats from verse 4, now explicitly connected to the ancestral promise (nishba laavotekha — 'He swore to your fathers'). The blessings of Deuteronomy 28 are fulfillments of the Abrahamic covenant.
12. The heavens are called God's otsaro hattov ('His good storehouse') — rain is a treasure that God dispenses from His cosmic supply room. The economic consequence of agricultural abundance is financial independence: lending to nations (vehilvita goyim rabbim) without needing to borrow (ve'attah lo tilveh). The lending/borrowing dynamic becomes a metaphor for national sovereignty and dependence.
13. The head/tail and above/below pairs are vivid metaphors for national standing: leadership versus subjugation, dominance versus subordination. The conditional ki tishma ('if you obey') is restated, reinforcing that these are covenant blessings — conditional on faithfulness, not automatic entitlements.
14. The blessings section closes with a warning: the boundary is strict adherence to the covenant without deviation (lo tasur — 'you shall not turn aside'). The right/left metaphor describes any departure from the commanded path. The ultimate form of turning aside is idolatry — following other gods (lalekhet acharei elohim acherim). The paragraph marker (pe) closes the blessings section. What follows is almost four times longer.
15. The curse section begins with an exact structural mirror of verse 1 — the same conditional formula, now negated (im lo tishma — 'if you do not listen'). The same verb hissigukha ('overtake you') used for blessings in verse 2 now describes curses pursuing and catching the disobedient. The symmetry is deliberate: the same covenant that empowers blessing also activates curse.
16. Verses 16-19 mirror verses 3-6 exactly, replacing barukh ('blessed') with arur ('cursed'). The same comprehensive pairs — city/field, womb/soil/livestock, basket/kneading bowl, coming in/going out — are now domains of curse rather than blessing. The structural parallelism makes the reversal devastating: everything that could have been blessed is now cursed.
17. The reversal of verse 5. The same daily items — the harvest basket and the bread-making vessel — become sites of scarcity rather than abundance.
18. The reversal of verse 4. The three domains of fertility — human, agricultural, and animal — all fall under curse. The barrenness and crop failure implied here would have been experienced as a direct divine statement about the broken covenant.
19. The reversal of verse 6. Every movement, every transition, every venture is now under curse. The mirrored blessings-and-curses section (vv 3-6 / vv 16-19) ends here. What follows (vv 20-68) has no blessing counterpart — the curses expand far beyond the blessings in scope and intensity.

- 20. Three terms of divine judgment: me'erah ('curse'), mehumah ('confusion, panic, turmoil'), and mig'eret ('rebuke, frustration'). The phrase asher azavtani ('for you have abandoned Me') shifts to first-person divine speech — God speaks directly as the one abandoned. The curses are not arbitrary punishment but relational consequences: Israel abandons God, and God withdraws His protecting presence.
- 21. The verb yadbeq ('make cling, attach') is the same root used for the marriage bond in Genesis 2:24 ('a man shall cling to his wife'). Here it describes pestilence (dever) adhering to Israel — an anti-marriage, an intimate and inescapable attachment to disease.
- 22. Seven afflictions are named — the number of completeness applied to destruction. The first four are diseases of the body (shachefet — wasting/consumption, qaddachat — burning fever, dalleqet — inflammation, charchur — scorching heat). The last three are environmental disasters (cherev — drought/sword, shiddafon — blight from hot east wind, yeraqon — mildew/yellowing of crops). The verb uredafukha ('they will pursue you') reverses verse 7 where enemies fled; now afflictions are the pursuers.
- 23. A vivid cosmic reversal: the heavens that should pour rain (v 12) become impenetrable bronze (nechoshet), and the earth that should yield produce becomes unyielding iron (barzel). The two elements of creation that sustain life — sky and soil — become hostile. This image reverses the blessing of verse 12 where God opened the heavens as His storehouse.
- 24. Instead of rain, dust and powder fall from the sky — a surreal inversion of natural order. The Hebrew avaq ve'afar ('powder and dust') describes the fine particulate matter of drought and dust storms. Where the heavens should send water, they send arid destruction.
- 25. The exact inversion of verse 7: there, enemies attacked from one direction and fled in seven; here, Israel attacks from one direction and flees in seven. The word za'avah ('horror, trembling, object of terror') describes Israel's reputation among the nations — not the awe of verse 10 but revulsion and dread. Israel becomes a cautionary tale rather than a model.
- 26. Unburied corpses consumed by scavengers is one of the most horrifying images in the ancient Near East — denial of burial was considered a curse beyond death. The phrase ve'ein macharid ('and there is no one to frighten them away') adds helplessness: not even the basic act of shooing scavengers from the dead will be possible.
- 27. The shechin mitsrayim ('boils of Egypt') directly recalls the sixth plague (Exodus 9:8-12) — the very afflictions God sent upon Egypt will now fall on disobedient Israel. The diseases escalate: boils (shechin), tumors (ofalim — possibly hemorrhoids or bubonic swellings), festering sores (garav), and chronic itch (chares). The final clause asher lo tukhal lehirafe ('from which you cannot be healed') removes hope of recovery.
- 28. Three mental afflictions parallel the physical diseases of verse 27: shiga'on ('madness, derangement'), ivaron ('blindness' — possibly metaphorical), and timhon levav ('bewilderment of heart, confusion of mind'). The progression moves from body (v 27) to mind (v 28) — the curse is total, affecting every dimension of human experience.
- 29. The image of groping at noon (memashesh batshohorayim) in broad daylight as if in total darkness is a powerful metaphor for spiritual and intellectual disorientation. The phrase ve'ein moshia ('and there is no one to save') is devastating — the absence of a deliverer. This echoes the pre-exodus condition when Israel cried out and God heard (Exodus 2:23-25), but now the rescue does not come.
- 30. Three life milestones are described and then denied: marriage (ishah te'ares — you will become betrothed), homeownership (bayit tivneh — you will build a house), and viticulture (kerem titta — you will plant a vineyard). These are the same three exemptions from military service in Deuteronomy 20:5-7 — the very blessings that war cannot be allowed to interrupt will be stolen by the curse. The textual note [yishkavenah/yishgalenah] reflects a qere/ketiv variation where the written text uses a cruder verb (shagal — 'ravish') while the read text softens it (shakhav — 'lie with').
- 31. The cruelty of the curses intensifies: the person must witness the destruction or theft of their property (le'einekha — 'before your eyes,' milefanekha — 'from before your face'). The forced witnessing adds psychological torment to material loss. The phrase ve'ein lekha moshia ('no one to rescue you') echoes verse 29.
- 32. The loss of children — given to another people (presumably as captives or slaves) — is the deepest personal curse. The phrase ve'einekha ro'ot vekhalot aleihem ('your eyes watching and failing/wasting away with longing for them') describes the unending grief of a parent separated from children, watching and hoping for their return. The final phrase ve'ein le'el yadekha ('there is no power in your hand') describes absolute helplessness.
- 33. The produce of the land (peri admatekha) and the fruit of labor (yegi'akha) are consumed by strangers (am asher lo yada'ta — 'a people you have never known'). The anonymity of the oppressor adds to the horror — exploitation by unknown foreigners. The terms ashuk ('oppressed') and ratsuts ('crushed') describe systemic, unrelenting subjugation.
- 34. The verse is devastating in its brevity: meshugga ('driven mad, insane') from the sight of what comes (mimar'eh einekha — 'from the sight of your eyes'). The accumulated horrors of verses 30-33 — stolen wife, lost home, seized livestock, captive children, consumed labor — produce madness. The curse attacks the mind itself.
- 35. The shechin ra ('painful/evil boil') recalls both the Egyptian plague (v 27) and Job's affliction (Job 2:7). The phrase mikfaf raglekha ve'ad qodqodekha ('from the sole of your foot to the top of your head') means total bodily coverage — no part of the person is spared. The incurable nature (lo tukhal lehirafe) makes the condition permanent.
- 36. Exile is now explicit: God Himself brings (yolekh — 'will cause to go') Israel and their king to a foreign nation. The phrase elohim acherim ets va'even ('other gods — wood and stone') is bitterly ironic: Israel abandoned the living God to worship idols, and now in exile they will serve the lifeless objects they chose. The punishment fits the crime.

37. Three terms describe Israel's degraded reputation: shammah ('horror, desolation'), mashal ('proverb, cautionary example' — the kind of story told to warn others), and leshininah ('taunt, byword, sharp saying'). Israel's story will be told not as an inspiration but as a warning. This reverses verse 10 where the nations stood in awe.
38. Agricultural futility: abundant sowing (zera rav) yields minimal harvest (me'at te'esof). The arbeh ('locust') is the agent of destruction — the same creature that devastated Egypt in the eighth plague (Exodus 10). The irony is pointed: the plagues God sent against Israel's enemies now target Israel itself.
39. The pattern of verses 38-42 is consistent: maximum effort (planting, tending) yields nothing (no wine, no harvest) because of some agent of destruction (locusts, worms, blight). Each verse names the human labor and the divine frustration of that labor.
40. Olive oil was essential for cooking, lighting, medicine, and personal care. The verb yishal ('will drop, will cast off') describes premature fruit drop — the olives fall from the tree before they can be harvested and pressed. Olive trees throughout the territory (bekhol gevulekha) but no usable oil: abundance of trees without produce.
41. The loss of children to captivity (shevi) echoes verse 32. The brutal brevity of ki yelkhu bashshevi ('for they will go into captivity') states the loss without elaboration — no explanation, no comfort, just the fact.
42. The tselatsal ('buzzing/chirping insect' — possibly a cicada or cricket variety) completes the agricultural devastation: trees and crops alike are consumed. The root ts-l-ts-l is onomatopoeic — the word sounds like the buzzing of the insect swarm.
43. The social inversion is complete: the ger ('foreigner, resident alien'), who was dependent on Israelite protection, now surpasses the Israelite. The intensified forms ma'lah ma'lah ('higher and higher') and mattah mattah ('lower and lower') describe accelerating divergence — not a momentary reversal but a progressive collapse.
44. The exact reversal of verses 12-13: Israel was to lend and not borrow, to be head and not tail. Now the foreigner lends and Israel borrows; the foreigner leads and Israel follows. The inversion of every blessing into its opposite demonstrates the systematic nature of the covenant curses.
45. This verse serves as a summary and transition, restating the cause-and-effect logic of the covenant. The pursuit language (uredafukha vehissigukha — 'pursuing you and overtaking you') echoes both verse 2 (blessings overtaking) and verse 15 (curses overtaking). The curses are not random misfortune — they are covenant consequences for covenant breach.
46. The curses become ot umofet ('sign and wonder') — the same terms used for God's mighty acts in Egypt (Deuteronomy 4:34, 6:22). In Egypt, signs and wonders demonstrated God's power for Israel's salvation; now they demonstrate His power in judgment. The phrase ad olam ('permanently, to the farthest horizon') extends the consequences beyond the current generation to all descendants.
47. This verse identifies the root cause with startling specificity: not merely failure to serve God but failure to serve Him besimchah uvetuv levav ('with joy and gladness of heart'). Joyless obedience is not enough — God expects His people to find delight in covenant faithfulness. The phrase merov kol ('from the abundance of everything') specifies the context: Israel had everything and still did not worship with joy.
48. The contrast with verse 47 is devastating: instead of serving God 'with abundance of everything' (merov kol), Israel will serve enemies 'in total deprivation' (uvechoser kol — 'in lack of everything'). The iron yoke (ol barzel) on the neck is a metaphor for oppressive servitude — compare Jeremiah 28:13-14 where Nebuchadnezzar's domination is described as an iron yoke.
49. The invading nation is characterized by distance (merachok miqtseh ha'arets — 'from afar, from the end of the earth'), speed (ka'asher yid'eh hannesher — 'as an eagle swoops down'), and foreignness (lo tishma leshono — 'you will not understand its language'). The eagle simile evokes predatory speed and unstoppable descent. Many interpreters see this as prophetically describing Assyria (722 BCE) or Babylon (586 BCE), whose languages (Akkadian, Aramaic) were foreign to Hebrew speakers.
50. The phrase az panim ('fierce of face, hard-faced') describes a people without compassion. Their ruthlessness is expressed through the society's most vulnerable: the elderly (zaqen) and children (na'ar). A nation that spares neither the old nor the young has no moral restraints — the total war that follows (vv 51-57) will be without quarter.
51. The invader consumes everything — the same triad of agricultural produce (dagan, tirosh, yitshar — 'grain, new wine, olive oil') and livestock categories (shegar alafekha ve'ashterot tsonekha — 'calves and lambs') that were blessed in verse 4 are now stripped away. The repetition of ad hishamdekha / ad ha'avido otakh ('until you are destroyed / until they have annihilated you') frames the verse with finality.
52. The siege (hetsar lekha — 'he will press you, besiege you') targets the city gates (she'arekha) — the points of entry and commerce. The ironic phrase asher attah boteach bahen ('in which you trusted') exposes misplaced trust: Israel trusted in walls rather than in God. The final phrase — 'the land that the LORD your God has given you' — reminds that the very land being devastated was God's gift.
53. The most horrifying verse in the chapter: cannibalism of one's own children (akhalta peri vitnekha, besar banekha uvenotekha — 'you will eat the fruit of your womb, the flesh of your sons and daughters') during siege conditions. The phrase asher natan lekha YHWH Elohekha ('whom the LORD your God has given you') makes the horror worse — these children were God's gift, and starvation drives parents to devour them. This is recorded as historical reality during the Babylonian siege of Jerusalem (2 Kings 6:28-29, Lamentations 2:20, 4:10).
54. The irony is crushing: the most tender person (ha'ish harakh — 'the soft/refined man,' he'anog me'od — 'extremely delicate') becomes hostile toward his closest family members. The phrase tera einav ('his eye will be evil/hostile') describes jealous guarding of food against one's own spouse and surviving children. Starvation destroys the most intimate human bonds.

55. The horror continues: the refined man who is eating his own children's flesh refuses to share it with his surviving family. The phrase mibeli hish'ir lo kol ('because nothing at all remains for him') explains but does not excuse the scene. The text does not look away from the worst consequences of covenant breach.
56. The parallel now shifts to a woman: the most sheltered, pampered woman in Israel (asher lo nisstah khaf raglah hatseg al ha'arets — 'who has not tried to place the sole of her foot on the ground') — a woman so refined she has never walked barefoot — will become as hardened as the man in verse 54. The descriptive excess emphasizes the transformation: from extreme refinement to unspeakable degradation.
57. The most extreme verse in the Hebrew Bible: a mother consuming her afterbirth (shilyatah — 'her afterbirth, her placenta') and her newborn children (uvevaneiha asher teled — 'and her children whom she bears') in secret (bassater — 'in hiding'), driven by starvation during siege. The secrecy adds another dimension: shame survives even when all other human instincts have collapsed. The text does not euphemize or soften — it forces the reader to confront the ultimate consequences of national covenant breach.
58. A new subsection begins with a conditional (im lo tishmor — 'if you do not observe'). The object of reverence is not God directly but hashsem hannikhbad vehanora hazeh ('this glorious and awesome name') — the name YHWH itself is presented as an object of awe. The term nikhbad ('glorious, weighty, honored') shares its root with kavod ('glory, weight'), connecting the divine name to the weight-and-substance concept of kavod.
59. The verb hifli ('make extraordinary, make wonderful') is the same root used for God's 'wonderful' miracles — here applied to afflictions. God's power, which created wonders for Israel's salvation, will create wonders of destruction. The afflictions are ne'emanot ('lasting, persistent, faithful') — ironically, the same word used for God's faithfulness (emunah). The plagues are 'faithfully' persistent.
60. The Egyptian plagues that Israel witnessed and feared (yagort mipneihem — 'you dreaded before them') will now become Israel's own experience. The verb davqu ('they will cling') echoes verse 21 — diseases attach to Israel as intimately as a marriage bond. The exodus, which freed Israel from Egypt's afflictions, is here symbolically reversed.
61. This verse extends the curse beyond the specific afflictions listed — asher lo khatuv besefer hattorah hazot ('which is not written in this book of the law') means the list is not exhaustive. Any and every disaster, including ones not yet imagined, falls within the scope of covenant curse. The open-ended nature of this statement makes the warning comprehensive.
62. The Abrahamic promise of descendants as numerous as the stars (Genesis 15:5, 22:17) is directly referenced and reversed. The phrase kekhokh'vei hashamayim larov ('as the stars of the sky in multitude') echoes the original covenant promise — the very blessing God pledged to Abraham will be undone. Few in number (bimtei me'at) replaces the promise of countless descendants.
63. One of the most theologically challenging verses in the Hebrew Bible: God's joy (sas — 'rejoice, delight') in doing good is paralleled by God's joy (yasis — same verb) in destruction. The symmetry is disturbing and deliberate — the same divine energy that built Israel up will tear it down. The verb venissachtem ('you will be uprooted, torn away') uses agricultural language: Israel will be pulled from the land like a plant torn from soil.
64. The diaspora prophecy: vehefitsekha YHWH bekol ha'ammim ('the LORD will scatter you among all the peoples'). The phrase miqtseh ha'arets ve'ad qtseh ha'arets ('from one end of the earth to the other') describes total global dispersion. The worship of wood and stone gods (ets va'even) echoes verse 36 — exile leads to the idolatry that caused the exile in the first place. The punishment becomes a trap.
65. Three afflictions of the inner person in exile: lev raggaz ('a trembling/anxious heart'), khilyon einayim ('failing/wasting eyes' — eyes that wear out from watching and hoping), and da'avon nafesh ('despair of soul, languishing of the inner self'). The phrase lo thargia ('you will find no ease') and lo yihyeh manoach lekhaflaglekha ('there will be no rest for the sole of your foot') describe perpetual displacement — the wandering exile who never settles.
66. The phrase chayyekha telu'im lekha minneged ('your life will be hanging before you from opposite') describes life suspended in uncertainty — visible but unreachable, always in danger of falling. The total loss of security (lo ta'amin bechayyekha — 'you will not trust in your life') is the ultimate psychological consequence: not even the continued existence of the self can be assumed.
67. The day-night cycle becomes a trap: morning brings dread of the coming day's horrors; evening brings dread of the coming night's terrors. The phrase mi yitten erev / mi yitten boqer ('who will give evening / who will give morning' — 'if only it were...') expresses desperate longing for time to pass, for the present moment to end. Every moment is unbearable; every future moment threatens to be worse.
68. The chapter ends with the ultimate reversal: return to Egypt (veheshivekha YHWH Mitsrayim — 'the LORD will bring you back to Egypt'). The exodus is undone — Israel returns to the place of bondage from which God rescued them. The irony of ba'oniyyot ('in ships') contrasts with the original exodus through the sea on dry land. The final horror is not slavery but rejection: vehitmakkartem sham le'oyevkha la'avadim velishfachot ve'ein qoneh ('you will offer yourselves for sale as slaves, but no one will buy you'). Israel becomes so degraded that they are worthless even as slaves. This is the nadir of the covenant curses.
69. This verse is numbered as 28:69 in the Hebrew text (29:1 in English Bibles). It serves as a colophon — a closing summary that identifies the entire preceding section (chapters 27-28) as divrei habberit ('the words of the covenant'). The covenant at Moab is explicitly distinguished from the Horeb (Sinai) covenant (milvad habberit asher karat ittam beChorev — 'in addition to the covenant He made with them at Horeb'), establishing that Deuteronomy represents a covenant renewal, not merely a repetition.

Summary: Moses renews the covenant in Moab with all Israel — leaders, tribes, women, children, foreigners, and future generations not yet present. He warns against hidden idolatry and declares that 'the hidden things belong to the LORD, but the revealed things belong to us.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The covenant's scope is breathtaking: 'not with you alone' but 'with whoever is standing here with us today and with whoever is not here with us today' (vv. 14-15). Every future generation is bound. The closing verse (v. 28) is one of the most quoted in Jewish theology: 'the hidden things belong to the LORD our God, but the revealed things belong to us and to our children forever.' The distinction between divine mystery and human responsibility defines the boundary of theological inquiry.

Translation Friction: *The phrase shoresh poreh rosh vela'anah (v. 18, 'a root sprouting poison and wormwood') uses botanical metaphor for hidden idolatry — the poisonous root grows unseen underground. We rendered rosh as 'poison' rather than the plant name because the danger, not the botany, is the point. The verse numbering follows Hebrew: 29:1 in our text is 29:2 in KJV (Hebrew 28:69 = KJV 29:1).*

Connections: Hebrews 12:15 alludes to the 'root of bitterness' from verse 18. The hidden/revealed distinction (v. 29) grounds the rabbinic principle that Torah addresses what humans can act on, not divine secrets. The covenant-with-future-generations concept reappears in the Passover Haggadah's 'in every generation, each person must see themselves as having come out of Egypt.'

¹Moses summoned all Israel and said to them: You yourselves witnessed everything the LORD did before your eyes in the land of Egypt — to Pharaoh, to all his officials, and to his entire land. ²You saw the great trials with your own eyes — those mighty signs and wonders. ³Yet the LORD has not given you a mind to comprehend, eyes to truly see, or ears to truly hear — until this very day. ⁴I led you through the wilderness for forty years. Your clothing did not wear out on you, and your sandals did not wear out on your feet. ⁵You ate no ordinary bread and drank no wine or fermented drink, so that you would recognize that I am the LORD your God. ⁶When you arrived at this place, Sihon king of Heshbon and Og king of Bashan marched out to fight us, and we defeated them. ⁷We seized their land and assigned it as a permanent inheritance to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. ⁸Guard the terms of this covenant and carry them out, so that you will succeed in everything you undertake. ⁹All of you stand today before the LORD your God — your leaders, your tribal heads, your elders, your officials, every man of Israel, ¹⁰along with your children, your wives, and the foreigners within your camp — from the one who chops your wood to the one who draws your water. ¹¹so that you may enter into the covenant of the LORD your God and into His sworn oath, which the LORD your God is making with you today. ¹²in order to establish you today as His own people, and so that He will be your God — just as He promised you, and as He swore to your ancestors, to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob. ¹³It is not with you alone that I am making this covenant and this sworn oath, ¹⁴but with whoever stands here with us today before the LORD our God, and equally with whoever is not here with us today. ¹⁵For you yourselves know how we lived in the land of Egypt, and how we passed through the midst of the nations you traveled among. ¹⁶You saw their repulsive things and their worthless idols made of wood, stone, silver, and gold that they had. ¹⁷Take care that there is no man, woman, family, or tribe among you whose heart is turning away today from the LORD our God to go and serve the gods of those nations — that there is no root among you sprouting poison and wormwood. ¹⁸When such a person hears the words of this sworn oath and blesses himself in his heart, thinking, 'I will be fine even though I walk in the stubbornness of my own heart' — thereby sweeping away the well-watered land along with the dry, ¹⁹the LORD will refuse to forgive him. Instead, the LORD's anger and jealousy will smolder against that person, and every curse written in this book will settle upon him, and the LORD will erase his name from under the heavens. ²⁰The LORD will single him out for disaster from among all the tribes of Israel, in accordance with all the covenant curses written in this book of instruction. ²¹The future generation — your descendants who rise up after you, along with the foreigner who arrives from a distant land — will see the afflictions of that land and the diseases the LORD has inflicted on it, ²²and they will see the entire land reduced to sulfur, salt, and scorched earth — nothing sown, nothing sprouting, not a single plant growing in it — like the destruction of Sodom and Gomorrah, Admah and Zeboiim, which the LORD overthrew in His anger and fury. ²³All the nations will ask, 'Why did the LORD do this to this land? What caused this tremendous burning anger?' ²⁴And the answer will come: 'Because they abandoned the covenant of the LORD, the God of their ancestors, which He made with them when He brought them out of the land of Egypt.' ²⁵They went and served other gods, bowing down to them — gods they had never known and that He had never assigned to them. ²⁶So the LORD's anger blazed against that land, bringing upon it every curse written in this book. ²⁷The LORD uprooted them from their land in anger, in fury, and in tremendous wrath, and hurled them into another land — where they remain to this day. ²⁸The hidden things belong to the LORD our God, but the revealed things belong to us and to our children forever — so that we may carry out all the words of this instruction.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Hebrew 29:1 corresponds to KJV 29:2 due to versification offset (Hebrew 28:69 = KJV 29:1). The rendering follows the Hebrew text. The verb vayyiqra ('he called, he summoned') opens this covenant-renewal address with a formal assembly. The phrase le'eineikhem ('before your eyes') stresses firsthand witness — the generation standing at Moab had seen God's acts in Egypt as children or young adults. Moses grounds the covenant renewal in lived experience, not secondhand tradition.
2. The term massot ('trials, tests, ordeals') refers to the plagues and events in Egypt that tested both Egypt and Israel. The phrase ra'u einekha ('your eyes saw') repeats the eyewitness emphasis from verse 1. The pairing of otot umofetim ('signs and wonders') is the standard Deuteronomic formula for God's interventions in Egypt (cf. 4:34, 6:22, 7:19). These were not mere historical events but demonstrations of divine power meant to produce recognition.
3. This is one of the most theologically striking statements in Deuteronomy. The triad of lev ladaat ('a heart to know/understand'), einayim lir'ot ('eyes to see'), and oznayim lishmo'a ('ears to hear') describes the full capacity for spiritual perception. God withheld this capacity — not as punishment but as a statement about the process of spiritual maturity. The phrase ad hayyom hazzeh ('until this very day') implies that today, at the covenant renewal, a new possibility of understanding opens. The verse creates a paradox: they saw (v 2) yet did not truly see (v 3).
4. The first-person speech (va'olekh — 'I led') shifts to God speaking through Moses — a characteristic Deuteronomic blurring of speaker identity. The miraculous preservation of salmoteikhem ('your garments') and na'alkha ('your sandals') over forty years of desert travel is cited as evidence of ongoing divine provision. The verb balu ('wore out, became old') describes natural decay that supernaturally did not occur. These mundane details — clothes and shoes — ground God's faithfulness in daily, tangible experience.
5. The absence of lechem ('bread' — ordinary food) and yayin veshekhar ('wine and strong drink') during the wilderness period means Israel subsisted on manna and water — divine provision rather than human agriculture. The purpose clause lema'an ted'u ('so that you would know') reveals the pedagogical intent: the wilderness was designed to teach dependence on God. The verb ted'u ('you would know/recognize') connects back to verse 3 — what they lacked capacity for then, they are now invited to grasp.
6. The historical review culminates in the Transjordanian victories. The verb vayyetse ('he came out') with liqratenu ('to meet us, against us') describes the kings' aggressive initiative — they initiated the conflict. The verb vanakkem ('and we struck them down') uses the first-person plural, including Moses and the people together in the military victory. Sihon and Og represent the last major military obstacles before crossing the Jordan, making their defeat direct evidence of God's power to fulfill the land promise.
7. The term nachalah ('inheritance, permanent allotment') is a technical term for divinely assigned land — not a temporary holding but a permanent tribal territory. The three Transjordanian groups (Reuben, Gad, and half of Manasseh) received land east of the Jordan as described in Numbers 32. This territorial distribution serves as concrete proof that God's promises of land are already being fulfilled, providing grounds for covenant confidence.
8. The verse transitions from historical review (vv 1-7) to covenant obligation. The verb ushmartem ('guard, keep, observe') paired with va'asitem ('and do/carry out') describes both vigilant attention and active performance — covenant faithfulness is not passive. The result clause lema'an taskilu ('so that you will succeed/prosper/act wisely') uses a verb (s-k-l) that means both 'to prosper' and 'to act with insight' — obedience produces both success and wisdom. The paragraph break (pe) in the Hebrew text marks this as the end of the historical prologue section.
9. The covenant assembly scene opens with nitsavim ('standing, stationed, positioned') — a deliberate, formal posture, not casual gathering. This verb gives the weekly Torah portion its name (Parashat Nitsavim). The list of attendees descends from top leadership (rosheikhem — 'your heads/chiefs') through tribal structure (shivteikhem — 'your tribes'), institutional authority (ziqueikhem — 'your elders,' shotreikhem — 'your officials/officers'), to the broadest category (kol ish Yisrael — 'every man of Israel'). The entire social hierarchy is present.
10. The covenant assembly expands beyond the men of Israel (v 9) to include tapekhem ('your little ones/children'), nesheikhem ('your wives'), and the ger ('foreigner, resident alien') within the camp. The merism mechotev etsekha ad sho'ev meimekha ('from the chopper of your wood to the drawer of your water') encompasses the entire social spectrum, from the lowest-status laborers to those already named. The wood-choppers and water-drawers represent the most menial roles in the community, yet they too are covenant partners. No one is excluded from the covenant assembly.

11. The purpose of the assembly is stated: le'ovrekha ('so that you may pass into/enter into') the berit ('covenant') and alato ('His oath/imprecation'). The verb avar ('pass, cross over') with berit is a technical covenant-making idiom, likely originating from the ritual of passing between split animals (cf. Genesis 15:10, 17; Jeremiah 34:18). The term alah ('oath, sworn curse') is the self-imprecation that accompanies the covenant — the curses one accepts should one break faith. The verb koret ('cutting') in koret immekha is the standard idiom for covenant-making (literally 'cutting a covenant'), again reflecting the animal-splitting ritual.
12. The covenant formula is stated: haqim otkha lo le'am ('to establish you for Himself as a people') and vehu yihyeh lekha le'lohim ('and He will be your God'). This reciprocal formula — 'you will be My people / I will be your God' — is the core declaration of Israelite covenant theology (cf. Exodus 6:7, Leviticus 26:12, Jeremiah 31:33). The phrase ka'asher nishba la'avotekha ('as He swore to your ancestors') anchors the Moab covenant in the Abrahamic promises, creating a chain of covenant continuity from Abraham through Sinai to the present moment.
13. The emphatic negation velo ittkhem levaddekhem ('not with you alone') prepares for the remarkable expansion in verse 14. The first-person anokhi koret ('I am cutting/making') identifies God as the covenant-maker — the covenant is not a human agreement but a divine initiative that the people are invited to enter. The pairing of berit and alah ('covenant and oath') again emphasizes both the relationship and its binding consequences.
14. The covenant's reach extends beyond the present assembly to ve'et asher einenu poh immanu hayyom ('whoever is not here with us today'). This includes future generations not yet born and any Israelites absent from the assembly. The covenant is not limited to a single moment or a single group — it binds all who belong to Israel across time. Rabbinic tradition understood this as including converts and all future Jewish generations. The theological implication is profound: covenant identity is inherited, not merely chosen.
15. The phrase ki attem yedatem ('for you yourselves know') appeals again to lived experience. The verb yashavnu ('we dwelt/lived') describes the long Egyptian sojourn, while avarnu ('we passed through') describes the wilderness journey through other nations' territories. The shift between first-person plural ('we passed through') and second-person plural ('you traveled through') reflects the fluid speaker identity in Deuteronomy, where Moses speaks both as participant and as teacher addressing the next generation.
16. Two derogatory terms for foreign worship objects: shiqutsehem ('their detestable things, their abominations' — from the root sh-q-ts, associated with ritual impurity) and gilulehem ('their dung-idols' — a term of contempt, possibly derived from galal, 'dung,' used exclusively in polemical contexts to mock idols). The material catalogue — ets va'even kesef vezahav ('wood and stone, silver and gold') — ranges from cheap to precious, showing that idolatry is worthless regardless of the material's value. This sets up the warning in verse 17.
17. The warning cascades through social units: ish ('man'), ishah ('woman'), mishpachah ('family/clan'), shevet ('tribe') — apostasy can begin with a single individual and corrupt an entire tribe. The phrase levavo foneh ('whose heart turns') uses the participle to describe an ongoing inner orientation, not a single act. The metaphor shoresh poreh rosh vela'anah ('a root producing poison and wormwood') is vivid: apostasy is a hidden root system that produces toxic fruit. The term rosh here means 'poisonous plant' (not 'head'), and la'anah ('wormwood') is a bitter, toxic herb. The root is underground and invisible; its effects are devastating. Hebrews 12:15 directly alludes to this image.
18. The self-deceived person hears the covenant curses (divrei ha'alah — 'the words of the oath/imprecation') but responds with internal self-blessing (vehitbarekh bilvavo — 'and he blesses himself in his heart'). The phrase shalom yihyeh li ('peace/wholeness will be mine') is the core delusion: immunity from consequences. The term sherirut libbi ('the stubbornness/hardness of my heart') describes willful obstinacy. The final phrase lema'an sefot haravah et hattsmeh ('to sweep away the watered with the dry') is proverbial and debated — most likely it means the self-deluded person's sin will bring destruction on the innocent ('well-watered') along with the guilty ('parched'), or that total indiscriminate ruin will follow.
19. The verb lo yo'veh ('He will not be willing, He will refuse') makes the refusal emphatic and personal — God actively chooses not to forgive the self-deluded apostate. The image ye'eshan af YHWH veqin'ato ('the anger and jealousy of the LORD will smoke') describes divine wrath as a smoldering fire. The verb ravetsa ('crouch, lie down upon') pictures the curses like a predatory animal lying in wait upon (bo — 'upon him') the offender. The ultimate punishment is name erasure: umachah YHWH et shemo mittachat hashamayim ('the LORD will blot out his name from under the heavens') — total removal from memory and from the community of the living.
20. The verb vehivdilo ('He will separate him, single him out') uses the same root (b-d-l) as God's separating light from darkness in creation (Genesis 1:4) and Israel from the nations (Leviticus 20:24). Here the separation is lera'ah ('for harm, for disaster') — a dark inversion of election. The phrase alot habberit ('the curses of the covenant') identifies the curses of chapter 28 as integral to the covenant structure, not separate from it. The term sefer hattorah hazeh ('this book of instruction') refers to the Deuteronomic scroll being read at the assembly.
21. The perspective shifts to future witnesses: haddor ha'acharon ('the last/future generation') and hannokhri ('the foreigner') from me'erets rechoqah ('a distant land'). Two types of observers will assess the devastation — Israel's own descendants and outside observers. The land itself is personified as sick: makkot ha'arets ('the blows/afflictions of the land') and tachalueiha ('its diseases'). The verb chillah ('He made sick') treats the land as a living patient struck with illness by God — the covenant curses damage the land itself, not merely its inhabitants.
22. Three elements of total desolation: gofrit ('sulfur/brimstone'), melach ('salt'), and serefah ('burning'). The triad of negations — lo tizzara ('it will not be sown'), lo tatsmich ('it will not sprout'), lo ya'aleh ('nothing will grow') — describes complete agricultural death. The comparison to Sodom's overthrow (kemahpekat Sedom) invokes the paradigmatic judgment of Genesis 19. Four destroyed cities are named: Sodom, Gomorrah, Admah, and Zeboim (cf. Genesis 14:2, 8; Hosea 11:8). The Ketiv (written form) reads (utsviyyim) while the Qere (read form) is (uTsevoyim) — the alternate spelling reflects regional pronunciation variation of this city name, with the Qere preserving the more traditional vocalization.

- 23. The question shifts from the eyewitness report (vv 21-22) to international reaction: kol haggoyim ('all the nations') respond to the devastation. Their two questions — al meh ('why?') and meh chori ha'af haggadol hazzeh ('what is this great burning anger?') — presuppose knowledge of YHWH as the cause. The phrase chori ha'af ('burning of anger' — literally 'the heat of the nostril') is an anthropomorphic metaphor for intense divine wrath. The nations recognize that this level of destruction is not natural but divine judgment.
- 24. The answer (ve'amru — 'and they will say') is given by the nations themselves — the reason for devastation is internationally recognizable. The verb azvu ('they abandoned, they forsook') describes deliberate departure from berit YHWH ('the covenant of the LORD'). The covenant is identified as belonging to Elohei avotam ('the God of their ancestors') and tied to the exodus (behotsi'o otam me'erets Mitsrayim — 'when He brought them out of the land of Egypt'). Even the nations can identify the logic: the God who rescued this people from slavery imposed conditions on that rescue, and those conditions were violated.
- 25. The nations' explanation continues: Israel vayelkhu ('went') — actively chose to leave God — and served (va'ya'avdu) and worshipped (vayyishtachavu — literally 'prostrated themselves before') foreign gods. Two disqualifications of these gods are stated: asher lo yeda'um ('whom they had never known' — no prior relationship or revelation) and velo chalaq lahem ('and He had not allotted/assigned to them'). The verb chalaq ('allot, portion out') may reference the idea that YHWH assigned nations to various heavenly beings (cf. Deuteronomy 4:19, 32:8) but kept Israel for Himself — these gods were never Israel's portion.
- 26. The verb vayyichar af ('His anger burned, blazed') describes the ignition of divine wrath — the same expression used for God's anger at the golden calf (Exodus 32:10). The result is the activation of kol haqqelalah ('every curse') that is hakketuvah bassefer hazzeh ('written in this book'). The verse creates a tight logical chain: covenant abandoned (v 24) idolatry committed (v 25) anger ignited curses deployed (v 26). The prophecy is written as past-tense narrative, as if the future destruction has already occurred — a common prophetic device that underscores certainty.
- 27. The verb vayyitteshem ('He uprooted them, He tore them out') uses the root n-t-sh, which describes uprooting a plant — the people are torn from their soil (admatam — 'their ground') like vegetation ripped from the earth. Three terms for divine anger pile up in escalating intensity: af ('anger'), chemah ('fury, heat'), and qetsef gadol ('great wrath'). The verb vayyashlikhem ('He hurled them, He flung them') describes violent ejection — not a gentle relocation but a forceful casting away. The phrase kayyom hazzeh ('as on this day, to this day') either reflects a later editorial perspective or functions as prophetic certainty — the exile is as sure as if it had already happened.
- 28. One of the most celebrated verses in the Hebrew Bible. The contrast between hannistarot ('the hidden things') and hanniglot ('the revealed things') draws a boundary between divine mystery and human responsibility. What God has not disclosed remains His domain; what He has revealed through Torah belongs to Israel for action and obedience. The Masoretic text uniquely marks the words lanu ulevanenu ad ('to us and to our children forever') with extraordinary dots (puncta extraordinaria) above each letter — one of only a few places in the Hebrew Bible where this occurs. Rabbinic interpretations of these dots vary: some suggest the dotted words were uncertain in the scribal tradition, others that they carry a hidden meaning, and still others that they emphasize collective responsibility. The setumah marker (samekh) closes this section of the covenant-renewal address.

Summary: Moses promises that after exile, God will circumcise Israel's heart so they can love Him, restore them to the land, and set before them life and death — urging them to choose life.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter opens by assuming the curses will come (v. 1, 'when all these things have come upon you'). Exile is not hypothetical but inevitable — and beyond exile, God will act on their hearts directly. The phrase umal YHWH Elohekha et levavekha (v. 6, 'the LORD your God will circumcise your heart') promises what 10:16 commanded — God will do what Israel could not. The choice set before Israel (v. 19) — 'life and death, blessing and curse' — is the most distilled statement of covenantal theology in the Bible.

Translation Friction: The verb shuv (v. 2, 'return/repent') anchors the chapter — it appears seven times, creating a literary structure built on turning. We preserved each occurrence consistently. The claim that the commandment is 'not in heaven... not across the sea... but very near to you, in your mouth and in your heart' (vv. 12-14) is cited by Paul in Romans 10:6-8, applying it to faith rather than Law.

Connections: Paul interprets vv. 12-14 christologically in Romans 10:6-8. The heart circumcision promise connects to Jeremiah 31:33 (new covenant written on the heart) and Ezekiel 36:26 (heart of stone replaced with heart of flesh). The choose-life command (v. 19) becomes the title and theme of Jewish ethical teaching across centuries.

¹When all these things have come upon you — the blessing and the curse that I have placed before you — and you take them to heart among all the nations where the LORD your God has driven you, ²and you return to the LORD your God and obey

His voice — according to everything I am commanding you today, you and your children — with all your heart and with all your being, ³then the LORD your God will restore your fortunes and have compassion on you. He will return and gather you from all the peoples among whom the LORD your God has scattered you. ⁴Even if you have been banished to the farthest edge of the heavens, from there the LORD your God will gather you, and from there He will bring you back. ⁵The LORD your God will bring you into the land that your ancestors possessed, and you will possess it again. He will make you prosper and multiply you beyond your ancestors. ⁶The LORD your God will circumcise your heart and the heart of your descendants, so that you will love the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your being — so that you may live. ⁷The LORD your God will place all these curses on your enemies and on those who hate you — who persecuted you. ⁸You will return and obey the voice of the LORD, doing all His commandments that I am commanding you today. ⁹The LORD your God will give you abundance in everything you undertake — in the fruit of your womb, the offspring of your livestock, and the produce of your soil — for good. For the LORD will again rejoice over you for your good, as He rejoiced over your ancestors. ¹⁰when you obey the voice of the LORD your God, keeping His commandments and statutes written in this book of the Law — when you return to the LORD your God with all your heart and with all your being. ¹¹For this commandment that I am giving you today is not too difficult for you, nor is it beyond your reach. ¹²It is not in heaven, so that you would need to say, 'Who will go up to heaven for us and bring it down to us, so we can hear it and do it?' ¹³Nor is it beyond the sea, so that you would need to say, 'Who will cross the sea for us and bring it back to us, so we can hear it and do it?' ¹⁴The word is very near to you — in your mouth and in your heart — so that you can do it. ¹⁵See — I have placed before you today life and good, death and evil. ¹⁶For I am commanding you today: love the LORD your God, walk in His ways, and keep His commandments, statutes, and ordinances, so that you may live and multiply, and the LORD your God will bless you in the land you are entering to possess. ¹⁷But if your heart turns away and you will not listen, and you are drawn away to bow down to other gods and serve them, ¹⁸I declare to you today that you will certainly perish. You will not have long life in the land you are crossing the Jordan to enter and possess. ¹⁹I call heaven and earth as witnesses against you today: I have placed before you life and death, blessing and curse. Choose life, so that you and your descendants may live — ²⁰by loving the LORD your God, obeying His voice, and holding fast to Him — for He is your life and the length of your days — so that you may dwell in the land that the LORD swore to your ancestors, to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob, to give them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a startling assumption: both the blessing and the curse will come. Moses does not present them as hypothetical alternatives but as sequential certainties — Israel will experience both prosperity and exile. The phrase vahashevota el-levavekha ('you take them to heart,' literally 'you return them to your heart') describes a moment of reflection in exile: surrounded by foreign nations, Israel remembers what God said. The Deuteronomic vision looks beyond judgment to the possibility of restoration.
2. The verb shavta ('you return') is from shuv — the root of teshuvah ('repentance, return'). Return to God is the first movement in the restoration sequence. The return is total: bekhol-levavekha uvekhol-nafshekha ('with all your heart and all your being') — the same language as the Shema (6:5). The repentance that restores must be as complete as the love that was originally commanded. The multigenerational scope continues: 'you and your children' return together.
3. The wordplay is deliberate and untranslatable: veshav YHWH ('the LORD will return') echoes veshavta ('you return') in v2. Israel returns to God; God returns to Israel. The verb shuv is applied to both parties — repentance is a mutual turning. The phrase et-shevutkha ('your captivity/fortunes') is debated: it may mean 'turn your captivity' (end your exile) or 'restore your restoration' (bring about your return). Both meanings coexist. God's compassion (richamekha — from rechem, 'womb') is the motive force: maternal, visceral, unconditional compassion drives the restoration.
4. The scope of God's reach: biqtseh hashamayim ('the edge of the heavens') — the most remote imaginable location. No exile is too distant for God to reverse. The verbs yeqabbetskha ('will gather you') and yiqqachekha ('will take you, will fetch you') are active and personal — God does not merely permit return; He goes to the ends of the earth to retrieve His people. The passage envisions a post-catastrophic future with confidence: exile is not the end of the story.
5. The restoration exceeds the original: veheitbekha vehirbekha me'avotekha ('He will make you prosper and multiply you beyond your ancestors'). The post-exile future is not merely recovery but surpassing. God does not restore to the baseline — He goes beyond it. The land is identified as the ancestral inheritance (asher yarshu avotekha), reconnecting the restored exiles to the patriarchal promise of Genesis 12-15.
6. Umal YHWH Elohekha et-levavekha ('the LORD your God will circumcise your heart') is the theological climax of Deuteronomy. Circumcision (milah) — the sign of the covenant since Abraham (Gen 17) — is now applied to the inner person by God's own act. The purpose clause is the Shema itself: le'avahav et-YHWH Elohekha bekhol-levavekha uvekhol-nafshekha ('to love the LORD your God with all your heart and all your being'). What was commanded in 6:5 is now promised in 30:6 — God will create the capacity for the very obedience He requires. The final phrase lema'an chayyekha ('so that you may live') links the heart-change to life itself: the circumcised heart is the path to true living.

7. A reversal of the covenant curses of chapter 28: what fell on Israel in exile will now fall on their persecutors. The curses do not disappear — they are redirected. God's justice is not canceled by restoration; it is reapplied to those who oppressed His people. The verb redafukha ('who pursued/persecuted you') echoes the language of relentless pursuit that characterized Israel's suffering among the nations.
8. The fifth occurrence of shuv in this chapter: ve'attah tashuv ('and you will return'). After God's heart-circumcision (v6), obedience becomes natural rather than forced — 'you will return' is a statement of confidence, not a command. The post-restoration Israel obeys not because they fear punishment but because their hearts have been transformed. The commandments of 'today' (hayyom) remain the same; what changes is the capacity to keep them.
9. Three categories of blessing — children (peri vitnekha), livestock (peri vehemtekha), land (peri admatekha) — mirror the three categories of curse in 28:18. Every dimension of life that was cursed in exile will be blessed in restoration. The most striking phrase: yashuv YHWH lasus alekha letov ('the LORD will again rejoice over you for good'). God's joy — not merely His favor but His actual delight — is restored. The verb sus ('to rejoice, to delight') applied to God describes the divine pleasure in Israel's well-being. God enjoys His people's flourishing.
10. The seventh and final occurrence of shuv: ki tashuv ('when you return'). The verb is rendered 'when' rather than 'if' — after v6's promise of heart-circumcision, the return is assured. The reference to sefer hattorah hazzeh ('this book of the Torah') makes Deuteronomy self-aware as a written text that will persist beyond Moses. The full-hearted, full-being return echoes both 6:5 and 30:2, binding the chapter's argument together: the Shema's command will be fulfilled through God's transforming act.
11. The tone shifts from future promise (v1-10) to present reality (v11-14). Lo-niflet hi mimmekha ('it is not too wondrous/difficult for you') — the verb pala means 'to be extraordinary, beyond capacity.' Moses insists: the commandment is within human reach. It does not require superhuman ability or esoteric knowledge. Paul will cite v11-14 in Romans 10:6-8, reinterpreting the nearness of the commandment as the nearness of Christ. The passage's power lies in its accessibility theology: God does not command what cannot be done.
12. The first of two rhetorical denials: the commandment is not in heaven (lo vashamayim hi). No celestial expedition is required. The Talmud (Bava Metzia 59b) uses this verse in the famous 'Oven of Akhnai' story to argue that the Torah, once given, belongs to earth — even a voice from heaven cannot override the interpretation of scholars. The verse establishes an accessibility principle: divine revelation is not reserved for the spiritually elite who can ascend to heaven. It has been given and is available.
13. The second denial: the commandment is not me'ever layyam ('across the sea'). No oceanic voyage is required. Heaven (vertical inaccessibility) and the sea (horizontal inaccessibility) together represent every possible dimension of distance. The commandment is not far in any direction. The parallel structure (v12 and v13 are nearly identical in form) creates a rhetorical completeness: nowhere is it absent, nowhere must it be fetched.
14. The positive answer to v12-13's rhetorical questions: ki-qarov elekha haddavar me'od ('the word is very near to you'). Three locations of the word: befikh ('in your mouth' — you can speak it), uvilevavekha ('in your heart' — you can understand it), la'asoto ('so that you can do it' — you can enact it). Mouth, heart, action — the entire chain from reception to expression to obedience is available. Paul quotes this verse in Romans 10:8 as 'the word of faith that we proclaim.' The passage asserts that obedience to God's commandment requires no heroic journey; it requires only the engagement of what is already within reach.
15. The two-way choice is starkly presented: chayyim vatov ('life and good') versus mavet vara ('death and evil'). These are not four separate items but two paired realities: life-with-good and death-with-evil. The verb natatti ('I have placed') puts the responsibility squarely on the listener — the options are on the table, and the choice must be made. Moses will not make it for them. The simplicity of the formulation is its power: the covenant reduces to life or death.
16. The 'life' option is defined concretely: love God, walk in His ways, keep His commandments. Three verbs, three dimensions of covenant faithfulness: affection (ahavah), conduct (halakh), and obedience (shamar). The result — vechayyita veravita ('you will live and multiply') — echoes the creation blessing of Genesis 1:28 ('be fruitful and multiply'). Obedience to the covenant reconnects Israel to the original blessing of creation itself.
17. The 'death' option begins with the heart: im-yifneh levavekha ('if your heart turns away'). The first movement toward death is internal — the heart turns before the body follows. The progression is psychologically precise: turned heart refusal to listen being drawn away (niddachta — passive, as though pulled by a force) worship of other gods serving them. Apostasy is not a single dramatic act but a gradual sequence that begins with inward resistance.
18. The intensified verb avod tovedu ('you will certainly perish') — the infinitive absolute driving home the certainty. Moses is not threatening but warning: this is what will happen. The phrase lo ta'arikhun yamim ('you will not have long days') reverses the promise of long life attached to the commandments (5:16, 6:2). The land across the Jordan — so close, so longed for — will be lost if the heart turns away. Proximity to the promise does not guarantee possession.
19. Heaven and earth (hashamayim ve'et ha'arets) are summoned as cosmic witnesses — the most permanent, enduring witnesses imaginable. In ancient Near Eastern treaties, gods were invoked as witnesses; Moses invokes creation itself. The climactic imperative — uvacharta bachayyim ('choose life!') — is the theological center of the entire book. The verb bachar ('to choose') is the same word used for God's choice of Israel (7:6-7). Now Israel is called to choose in return. The covenant is mutual choosing: God chose Israel; Israel must choose God. The purpose clause — lema'an tichyeh attah vezar'ekha ('so that you and your descendants may live') — extends the consequences across generations.

20. The chapter's final verse defines what 'choosing life' means concretely: le'ahavah ('loving'), lishmo'a ('obeying'), uledavqah-bo ('holding fast to Him'). Three verbs, three dimensions of faithful relationship: affection, response, and attachment. The ultimate declaration: ki hu chayyekha ve'orekh yamekha ('for He is your life and the length of your days'). God is not merely the source of life — He is life itself. To choose life is to choose God; to choose God is to choose life. The chapter ends where Deuteronomy always ends: with the patriarchal promise and the land. The oath to Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob runs through every chapter as the theological bedrock beneath all the law, all the warning, and all the promise.

Summary: Moses, at 120 years old, transfers leadership to Joshua, writes down the Torah and entrusts it to the Levites, and is told by God that Israel will break the covenant. He teaches them a witness-song.

What Makes This Remarkable: God's prediction of Israel's future apostasy (vv. 16-18) is devastating in its certainty: 'this people will rise and whore after foreign gods... and they will forsake Me and break My covenant.' Moses writes the Torah knowing it will be violated. The verb histarti fanai (v. 17, 'I will hide My face') introduces hester panim — the theological concept of divine hiddenness that runs through the prophets, the psalms, and post-biblical theology. God's silence is not absence but judgment.

Translation Friction: The phrase vayelexh Mosheh ('and Moses went,' v. 1) gives this Torah portion its name but raises a question: went where? The Hebrew simply says he went and spoke — some read it as a departure, others as a formal procession. We rendered it literally. The word yetser (v. 21, 'inclination') carries theological weight far beyond its simple meaning — it becomes the rabbinic yetser hara ('evil inclination'), the internal force driving disobedience.

Connections: Joshua's commissioning fulfills Numbers 27:18-23. The hester panim theology appears in Isaiah 8:17, 45:15, Micah 3:4, and defines the theological crisis of Esther (where God's name never appears). The Torah-deposit with the Levites (v. 26) is recovered in 2 Kings 22:8 during Josiah's reforms.

¹Then Moses went out and addressed the entire assembly of Israel with these words. ²He told them, "I am now one hundred and twenty years old. I can no longer lead you in going out and coming back. Moreover, the LORD has declared to me, 'You will not cross this Jordan.'" ³The LORD your God — He is the one who crosses over ahead of you. He will annihilate these nations from your path so that you will dispossess them. Joshua is the one who will cross over at your head, just as the LORD promised. ⁴The LORD will deal with them exactly as He dealt with Sihon and Og, kings of the Amorites, and with their territory — He completely destroyed them. ⁵When the LORD delivers them over to you, you must deal with them in full accordance with the instructions I have given you. ⁶Be strong and stand firm! Do not be afraid or terrified of them, because the LORD your God is the one who goes alongside you. He will never weaken His grip on you or abandon you. ⁷Moses summoned Joshua and said to him in front of the entire assembly of Israel, "Be strong and stand firm, because you are the one who will accompany this people into the land that the LORD swore to their ancestors to give them, and you will distribute it to them as their inheritance." ⁸The LORD Himself is the one who goes ahead of you. He will be with you. He will not loosen His hold on you or leave you behind. Do not be afraid and do not lose heart. ⁹Moses wrote down this Law and entrusted it to the priests — the descendants of Levi who carried the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD — and to all the elders of Israel. ¹⁰Moses gave them this command: "At the end of every seven years, at the appointed time during the sabbatical year, during the Festival of Shelters, ¹¹when all Israel comes to present themselves before the LORD your God at the place He will choose, you must read this Law aloud in the hearing of all Israel. ¹²Assemble the people — men, women, children, and the foreigners living in your towns — so that they may listen, learn, revere the LORD your God, and carefully follow every word of this Law. ¹³Their children, who do not yet know it, will also listen and learn to revere the LORD your God throughout the days you live on the soil you are crossing the Jordan to possess. ¹⁴The LORD said to Moses, "The time of your death is drawing near. Summon Joshua, and both of you present yourselves at the Tent of Meeting so that I may commission him." So Moses and Joshua went and presented themselves at the Tent of Meeting. ¹⁵The LORD appeared at the Tent in a pillar of cloud, and the pillar of cloud stood positioned above the entrance of the Tent. ¹⁶The LORD said to Moses, "You are about to lie down with your ancestors. After that, this people will rise up and prostitute themselves to the foreign gods of the land they are entering. They will abandon Me and shatter the covenant I made with them. ¹⁷My anger will burn against them on that day. I will abandon them and conceal My face from them. They will become prey, and countless disasters and hardships will strike them. On that day they will say, 'Isn't it because our God is no longer present among us that these disasters have found us?' ¹⁸And I will completely conceal My face on that day because of all the evil they have committed by turning to other gods." ¹⁹Now then, write down this song for yourselves and teach it to the Israelites. Place it in their mouths so that this song will serve as My witness against the Israelites. ²⁰For when I bring them into the land I swore to their ancestors — a land flowing with milk and honey — and they eat their fill and grow fat, they will turn to other gods and worship them. They will treat Me with contempt and shatter My covenant. ²¹When countless disasters and hardships strike them, this song will confront them as a witness, because it will never be forgotten from the mouths of their descendants. For I know the inclination they are already forming, even now, before I have brought them into the land I swore to give. ²²So Moses wrote down this song on that very day and taught it to the Israelites. ²³Then He commissioned Joshua son of Nun and said, "Be strong and stand firm, because you will bring the Israelites into the land I swore to give them, and I Myself will be with you." ²⁴When Moses had finished writing the words of this Law in a scroll, completing them in full, ²⁵Moses commanded the Levites who carried the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD, saying, ²⁶"Take this scroll of the Law and place it beside the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD your God. It will remain there as a witness against you. ²⁷For I know your rebellious nature and your stubbornness. If you have been defiant toward the LORD while I am still alive among you today, how much worse will it be after my death? ²⁸Bring together before me all the elders of your tribes and your officials so that I can speak these words in their hearing and call heaven and earth as witnesses against them. ²⁹For I know that after my death you will act with total corruption and stray from the path I commanded you. Disaster will overtake you in the days to come, because you will do what is evil in the LORD's sight, provoking Him to anger through the products of your hands." ³⁰Then Moses recited the words of this song from beginning to end in the hearing of the entire assembly of Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayelekh ('and he went') gives this chapter its traditional name in the Torah reading cycle (Parashat Vayelekh). The phrase el kol Yisra'el ('to all Israel') signals a public address to the entire assembled nation — Moses' final words before transferring leadership. The narrative transition marks the shift from Moses' third discourse (chs 29-30) to his farewell actions.
2. Moses offers two reasons for the leadership transition: physical limitation (lo ukhal od latset velavo — 'I can no longer go out and come in,' an idiom for military and administrative leadership, not mere walking ability) and divine prohibition (lo ta'avur et haYarden — 'you will not cross this Jordan'). The number 120 (me'ah ve'esrim) represents a full life in Deuteronomic terms — Moses' faculties are not diminished (cf. 34:7, 'his eye was not dim'), but God has set the boundary. The demonstrative 'this Jordan' (haYarden hazzeh) points to the river visible from Moab, making the prohibition concrete and immediate.
3. The emphatic pronoun hu ('He') appears three times — stressing divine agency first (YHWH hu over lefanekha — 'the LORD, He is the one crossing before you'), then Joshua's role as the visible human counterpart (Yehoshua hu over lefanekha — 'Joshua, he is the one crossing before you'). The verb yashmid ('He will annihilate, destroy completely') is covenant warfare language. Moses assures the people that both the divine commander and the human commander are already appointed — the transition is not a crisis but a plan.
4. Moses cites recent, living memory as proof of God's future action: the victories over Sihon (king of Heshbon, Numbers 21:21-30) and Og (king of Bashan, Numbers 21:33-35) are evidence that God will do the same to the Canaanite nations. The verb hishmid ('He destroyed, He annihilated') uses the Hiphil stem — God is the causative agent of their destruction. The phrase ule'artsam ('and to their land') extends the destruction from the kings personally to their entire territory.
5. The verb unetanam ('and He will give them') treats the nations as objects handed over by God — the victory is divine before it is military. The phrase kekhol hammitsvah asher tsivviti ('according to all the commandment I have commanded') refers to the warfare regulations of Deuteronomy 7:1-5 and 20:10-18, which mandate complete removal of Canaanite religion. Moses shifts to first person (tsivviti — 'I commanded'), reinforcing his authority even as he transfers power.
6. The paired imperatives chizqu ve'imtsu ('be strong and be firm') form one of the most recognized phrases in the Hebrew Bible, repeated in verse 7 (to Joshua), verse 23 (God to Joshua), and prominently in Joshua 1:6-9. The verb chazaq means 'be strong, seize firmly' and emats means 'be resolute, be firm.' The two prohibition verbs — al tir'u ('do not fear') and al ta'artsu ('do not be terrified, do not tremble') — address both ordinary fear and paralyzing dread. The promise lo yarbekha velo ya'azvekka ('He will not let go of you and He will not abandon you') uses two verbs of relational abandonment: raphah ('release, slacken, let go') and azav ('forsake, leave behind'). The setumah paragraph marker indicates a section break.

7. The public commissioning (le'einei khol Yisra'el — 'before the eyes of all Israel') is critical: Joshua's authority must be visibly established before the nation. The charge chazaq ve'emats ('be strong and be firm') now shifts from plural (v6, to Israel) to singular (to Joshua personally). The verb tavo ('you will enter/accompany') in the Qal form means 'you will go in with' this people — a collaborative role. The verb tanchilennah ('you will cause them to inherit it') uses the Hiphil of nachal, placing the responsibility for land distribution on Joshua. The ancestral oath (nishba YHWH la'avotam — 'the LORD swore to their ancestors') connects Joshua's mission to the Abrahamic promise.
8. Moses reassures Joshua with the same promise given to the nation in verse 6, now personalized with singular pronouns. The emphatic YHWH hu ('the LORD — He') stresses divine identity as the true leader. Two pairs of prohibitions bookend the verse: God's commitment (lo yarbekha velo ya'azvekka — 'He will not release you or forsake you') and Joshua's response (lo tira velo techat — 'do not fear and do not be shattered'). The verb tachat means 'be broken, be shattered, be dismayed' — it addresses the inner collapse that can follow overwhelming responsibility.
9. The verb vayikhtov ('and he wrote') is a pivotal action: Moses inscribes the Torah (hattorah hazot — 'this instruction/teaching') as a physical document. The dual recipients are the Levitical priests (hakkohanim benei Levi — 'the priests, sons of Levi') who carry the Ark, and the elders (ziqunei Yisra'el) who serve as civil authorities. This dual custody — priestly and civil — ensures both religious and political accountability for preserving the text. The phrase aron berit YHWH ('Ark of the Covenant of the LORD') identifies the Ark as the primary repository for covenant documents, following ancient Near Eastern treaty practice where copies were deposited in sanctuaries.
10. The timing is specified with three nested markers: the seven-year cycle (miqqets sheva shanim — 'at the end of seven years'), the sabbatical year (shenat hashemittah — 'the year of release,' when debts are canceled per Deuteronomy 15:1-2), and the specific festival (chag hasSukkot — the Festival of Booths/Shelters, the autumn harvest celebration). The convergence of debt release and Torah reading creates a powerful social moment: the economically liberated community gathers to hear the covenant that established their freedom.
11. The phrase lera'ot et penei YHWH ('to see the face of the LORD' — traditionally vocalized as the Niphal 'to appear before the LORD') describes the pilgrimage obligation. The verb tiqua ('you shall read aloud, you shall proclaim') makes the Torah a public oral event, not a private document. The phrase neged kol Yisra'el be'ozneihem ('opposite all Israel, in their ears') specifies audible, communal reception — every Israelite must hear the words personally. The unnamed place (bamaqom asher yivchar — 'in the place He will choose') is the centralized sanctuary formula characteristic of Deuteronomy.
12. The imperative haqhel ('assemble!') gives this ceremony its traditional name: Hakhel ('the Assembly'). The inclusivity is remarkable for the ancient world: men, women, children (ha'anashim vehanashim vehattaf), and resident foreigners (gerekha asher bish'arekha — 'your foreigner who is within your gates') — all four social categories must be present. The four-part purpose clause establishes a pedagogical sequence: listen (yishme'u), learn (yilmedu), revere (yare'u), and practice (shameru la'asot). Hearing leads to learning, learning leads to reverence, and reverence leads to obedience.
13. The intergenerational purpose is explicit: uvneiheim asher lo yade'u ('and their children who have not known') targets the next generation who were not present at Sinai and have no direct experience of the covenant events. The septennial cycle ensures each generation encounters the Torah during childhood. The phrase kol hayyamim asher attem chayyim ('all the days that you are alive') extends the obligation across the full life of the community. The pe (open paragraph marker) signals the close of the Hakhel legislation.
14. God initiates the formal transfer: hen qarevu yamekha lamut ('look, your days to die have drawn near') uses hen as a solemn attention-marker rather than a casual interjection. The divine commissioning (va'atsavvennu — 'and I will commission him/charge him') shifts the authority source from Moses to God directly. The ohel mo'ed ('Tent of Meeting') is the place where God communicates with Moses (Exodus 33:7-11) — the venue itself signals that this is a direct divine appointment, not merely Moses' personal recommendation. The Hitpa'el vehityatsevu ('present yourselves') indicates formal, standing presentation before the divine presence.
15. The theophany (vayera YHWH — 'the LORD appeared') manifests as the amud anan ('pillar of cloud'), the same visible sign of divine presence that led Israel through the wilderness (Exodus 13:21-22) and descended on Sinai (Exodus 19:9). The pillar's position al petach ha'ohel ('above the entrance of the Tent') marks the threshold between divine and human space. This visual manifestation before both Moses and Joshua publicly validates the leadership transfer with divine authorization visible to any observers.
16. The euphemism shokev im avotekha ('lying down with your ancestors') is the standard idiom for death. The verb zana ('to prostitute, to commit sexual infidelity') is the prophetic metaphor for idolatry — Israel's covenant with God is framed as a marriage, and worship of other gods is adultery. The phrase elohei nekhar ha'arets ('the foreign gods of the land') identifies the specific threat: indigenous Canaanite deities. The sequence — abandonment (azavani — 'they will forsake Me') followed by covenant violation (hefer et beriti — 'they will break My covenant') — presents apostasy as a relational betrayal before it is a legal breach.
17. The phrase vehistarti fanai mehem ('and I will hide My face from them') introduces the theological concept of hester panim — the hiding or concealment of God's face, one of the most consequential ideas in Jewish theology. When God hides His face, divine protection and providence are withdrawn — not as petty punishment but as the natural consequence of the broken relationship. The people's response (halo al ki ein Elohai beqirbi — 'is it not because my God is not in my midst?') shows partial recognition of the cause, but verse 18 reveals this self-diagnosis is insufficient. The verb le'ekhol ('to be consumed, to become prey') treats the unprotected people as food for predators.
18. The intensified construction haster astir panai ('hiding I will hide My face' — the infinitive absolute with finite verb) makes the concealment emphatic and total. The people's partial repentance in verse 17 ('our God is not among us') is not enough — the divine withdrawal continues because the root cause (ki fanah el elohim acherim — 'because he turned to other gods') has not been addressed. The theological sequence is precise: Israel turns their face toward other gods (fanah — 'he turned'), so God turns His face away from them (astir panai — 'I will hide My face'). The relational symmetry is devastating.

19. God commands the composition of hashirah hazot ('this song') — the poem of chapter 32 (the Song of Moses / Ha'azinu). The triple instruction is pedagogically layered: write it (kitvu — preserve it in text), teach it (lamedah — transmit it through instruction), and place it in their mouths (simah be'fihim — make it memorized and recited). The song's purpose is legal: le'ed ('as a witness') — it will testify against Israel when they break the covenant, because they cannot claim ignorance of a song they have memorized. The plurals kitvu lakhem ('write for yourselves') may address both Moses and Joshua, or Moses and the elders.
20. God predicts the precise mechanism of apostasy: prosperity leads to forgetfulness. The progression is physical and spiritual: akhala ('they will eat'), save'a ('they will be satisfied'), dashen ('they will grow fat/prosperous'). The same progression appears in Deuteronomy 32:15 (the Song itself): 'Jeshurun grew fat and kicked.' The verb ni'atsuni ('they will treat Me with contempt, they will spurn Me') is stronger than mere neglect — it implies active disdain. The land zavav chalah udevash ('flowing with milk and honey') — God's gift — becomes the very context for covenant betrayal.
21. The song's endurance is guaranteed: lo tishkach mippi zar'o ('it will not be forgotten from the mouth of their offspring') — the memorized song persists across generations, ensuring the witness endures. The word yitsro ('his inclination, his impulse') is significant — it is cognate with the later rabbinic concept of yetser hara ('evil inclination'). God knows Israel's formative tendency (asher hu oseh hayom — 'which he is forming/doing today') before the sin occurs. The phrase betereim avi'ennu ('before I have brought them') indicates God enters the covenant with full knowledge that it will be violated — the covenant is not naive but informed.
22. Moses immediately obeys the divine command of verse 19: vayyikhtov Mosheh ('and Moses wrote') matches the command kitvu ('write'). The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day') emphasizes immediacy — there is no delay between divine instruction and prophetic action. The verb vaylamedah ('and he taught it') fulfills the second part of the command. The song referenced is Ha'azinu (Deuteronomy 32:1-43).
23. The speaker here is God (not Moses), as indicated by the first person nishba'ti ('I swore') and anokhi ehyeh immakh ('I Myself will be with you') — only God swore the land oath to the ancestors. This is the third occurrence of chazaq ve'emats in the chapter: v6 (Moses to Israel, plural), v7 (Moses to Joshua), v23 (God to Joshua). The progression from human commission to divine commission completes the transfer. Notably, God uses tavi ('you will bring' — Hiphil causative) where Moses used tavo ('you will come/accompany' — Qal) in verse 7 — God's charge gives Joshua a stronger, more active leadership role than Moses' charge did.
24. The phrase kekhalot Mosheh likhtov ('when Moses completed writing') marks the physical document's completion. The term sefer ('scroll, book, document') refers to a written scroll — the material object that will be deposited alongside the Ark. The phrase ad tummam ('until their completion' — from tamam, 'to be complete, to be finished') emphasizes that the Torah document is a complete, finished text, not a partial draft. This verse establishes the physicality and finality of the written Torah.
25. The Levites are identified by their physical function: nos'ei aron berit YHWH ('carriers of the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD'). They are the custodians of the Ark and therefore the appropriate recipients of the Torah scroll that will be placed beside it. The Levites here may overlap with the Levitical priests of verse 9 or constitute a broader group responsible for sanctuary transport.
26. The instruction places the Torah scroll mitsad aron berit YHWH ('at the side of the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD') — not inside the Ark (which contains the stone tablets per Deuteronomy 10:1-5) but alongside it. This distinction reflects ancient Near Eastern treaty practice: treaty documents were deposited in sanctuaries near the deity's image or symbol. The Torah scroll serves as le'ed ('a witness') — a legal document that testifies to the terms of the covenant. The phrase bekha ('against you') makes Israel the defendant and the Torah the prosecution's evidence.
27. Moses' candid assessment names two character flaws: meryekha ('your rebellion, your defiance') and orpekha haqqashah ('your stiff neck' — literally 'your hard back-of-the-neck,' the image of an ox that refuses to turn when pulled). The qal vachomer argument (kal vahomer — 'light and heavy,' an a fortiori inference) is a classic rabbinic reasoning form: if they rebel while Moses is alive and present (be'odeni chai immakhem — 'while I am still living with you'), how much more (ve'af ki — 'and even more so') after his restraining influence is removed. Moses has no illusions about the people he has led.
28. Moses summons the leadership — ziqnei shivtekhem veshotrekhem ('the elders of your tribes and your officials') — for the song's formal recitation. The verb haqhilu ('assemble!' — Hiphil imperative of qahal) echoes the Hakhel command of verse 12, but here the audience is the leadership specifically. The cosmic witness formula — va'a'idah bahem et hashamayim ve'et ha'arets ('I will call heaven and earth as witnesses against them') — invokes the created order as permanent, enduring witnesses to the covenant, a convention from ancient Near Eastern treaty practice where gods and natural elements served as treaty guarantors.
29. The infinitive absolute hashchet tashchitun ('corrupting you will corrupt' — 'you will completely corrupt yourselves') uses the emphatic doubled-verb construction to express certainty and totality. The phrase vesartem min hadderekh ('you will turn aside from the path') uses the standard Deuteronomic metaphor of covenant life as a path or road. The temporal phrase be'acharit hayyamim ('in the latter days, in the end of days') looks beyond the immediate future to an eschatological horizon. The phrase bema'aseh yedekhem ('through the work of your hands') refers to idols — handmade objects of worship — the ultimate provocation (lehakh'iso — 'to provoke Him to anger').
30. The verse frames the recitation: be'oznei kol qahal Yisra'el ('in the ears of the entire assembly of Israel') emphasizes audible, communal reception — every person hears. The phrase ad tummam ('until their completion') indicates Moses recited the song in its entirety — no abbreviation, no summary. The qahal ('assembly') is the same word from which Hakhel (v12) derives, linking this first recitation to the future septennial readings. The pe (open paragraph marker) signals the close of the narrative frame, setting the stage for the Song itself in chapter 32.

Summary: The Song of Moses (Ha'azinu) — a poem calling heaven and earth as witnesses, recounting God's faithfulness and Israel's rebellion, promising judgment on the nations and vindication of His people. God then tells Moses to ascend Mount Nebo to die.

What Makes This Remarkable: The song's central metaphor is God as tsur ('Rock,' vv. 4, 15, 18, 30, 31) — stable, immovable, trustworthy — set against Israel's fickleness. The poem's most theologically daring lines describe God's emotions: 'the LORD saw and spurned, provoked by His sons and daughters' (v. 19); 'I will hide my face from them... for they are a crooked generation' (v. 20). The final stanza (v. 43) promises that God will 'make atonement (kipper) for His land and His people' — the only place in the Torah where God Himself performs kippur for the nation.

Translation Friction: The phrase esh dat (v. 2, 'a fire of law' or 'fiery law') in Moses's blessing introduction is textually uncertain — dat is a Persian loanword that seems anachronistic here, and some scholars emend the text. We rendered it as given in the Masoretic text and noted the difficulty. The verb yesovevenhvu (v. 10, 'He encircled him') uses a rare verbal form that emphasizes God's protective surrounding of Israel in the wilderness.

Connections: Heaven-and-earth as witnesses echoes 4:26 and 30:19. The Rock metaphor recurs across the Psalms (18:2, 31, 46; 62:2, 6) and Isaiah (26:4, 44:8). God's jealousy provoked by a 'no-god' and a 'no-people' (v. 21) is cited by Paul in Romans 10:19. The ascent to Nebo (vv. 48-52) fulfills Numbers 27:12-14.

¹Listen, O heavens, and I will speak; hear, O earth, the words of my mouth.

²May my teaching fall like rain, my words descend like dew —
like gentle showers on new grass, like steady rain on tender plants.

³For I proclaim the name of the LORD — ascribe greatness to our God!

⁴The Rock — His work is perfect, for all His ways are justice.
A God of faithfulness, without injustice;
righteous and upright is He.

⁵They have acted corruptly toward Him —
they are not His children, but their own defect.
A crooked and twisted generation!

⁶Is this how you repay the LORD,
you foolish and senseless people?
Is He not your Father who created you — who made you and established you?

⁷Remember the days of old;
consider the years of generation after generation.
Ask your father, and he will tell you;
your elders, and they will explain it to you.

⁸When the Most High gave the nations their inheritance, when He divided the human race,
He set the boundaries of the peoples
according to the number of the children of Israel.

⁹For the LORD's own portion is His people;
Jacob is His allotted inheritance.

¹⁰He found him in a desert land,
in a desolate, howling wasteland.
He encircled him, He cared for him,
He guarded him as the pupil of His eye.

¹¹Like an eagle that stirs up its nest,
that hovers over its young,
He spread His wings and caught them,
He carried them on His pinions.

¹²The LORD alone guided him;
no foreign god was beside Him.

¹³He made him ride on the heights of the land and fed him the produce of the fields.
He nourished him with honey from the rock and oil from the flinty cliff.

¹⁴With curds from the herd and milk from the flock, with the fat of lambs, with rams of Bashan and goats, with the finest of the wheat — and you drank the foaming blood of the grape.

¹⁵But Jeshurun grew fat and kicked — you grew fat, bloated, and gorged.
He abandoned the God who made him and scorned the Rock of his salvation.

¹⁶They provoked Him to jealousy with foreign gods;
with detestable things they angered Him.

¹⁷They sacrificed to demons — not God — to gods they had never known, new ones that arrived recently,
whom your ancestors never dreaded.

¹⁸You neglected the Rock who fathered you and forgot the God who gave you birth.

¹⁹The LORD saw and rejected them, provoked by His own sons and daughters.

²⁰He said, 'I will hide My face from them;
I will see what becomes of them.
For they are a perverse generation — children with no faithfulness in them.'

²¹They made Me jealous with what is no god;
they provoked Me with their worthless idols.
So I will make them jealous with what is no people;
with a foolish nation I will provoke them.

²²For a fire has been kindled by My anger;
it burns to the depths of the grave.
It devours the earth and its produce and sets ablaze the foundations of the mountains.

²³I will heap disasters upon them;
I will exhaust My arrows against them.

²⁴Wasted by famine, consumed by plague, and cut down by bitter pestilence —
I will send the fangs of wild beasts against them, with the venom of creatures that crawl in the dust.

²⁵Outside, the sword will bereave;
inside, there will be terror —
for young man and young woman alike, for nursing infant and gray-haired elder.

²⁶I considered scattering them entirely, blotting out their memory from humanity —

²⁷but I feared the provocation of the enemy, that their foes would misunderstand, that they would say, 'Our hand has triumphed —
the LORD did not do all this.'

²⁸For they are a nation devoid of counsel;
there is no understanding in them.

²⁹If only they were wise — if they could understand this,
if they could discern what awaits them!

³⁰How could one pursue a thousand, and two put ten thousand to flight, unless their Rock had sold them and the LORD had handed them over?

³¹For their rock is not like our Rock — even our enemies can judge that.

³²For their vine comes from the vine of Sodom, from the terraces of Gomorrah.
Their grapes are grapes of poison;
their clusters are bitter.

³³Their wine is the venom of serpents, the deadly poison of cobras.

³⁴Is this not stored up with Me,
sealed in My treasuries?

³⁵Vengeance is Mine, and recompense, for the time when their foot will slip.
For the day of their calamity is near,
and what awaits them rushes upon them.

³⁶For the LORD will vindicate His people and have compassion on His servants, when He sees that their strength is gone and no one remains — neither bond nor free.

³⁷Then He will say, 'Where are their gods —
the rock in whom they took shelter?

³⁸Who ate the fat of their sacrifices and drank the wine of their drink offerings?
Let them rise up and help you!
Let them be a shelter over you!

³⁹See now that I — I am He,
and there is no god besides Me.
I put to death and I bring to life;
I wound and I heal,
and no one can deliver from My hand.

⁴⁰For I raise My hand to heaven and declare: As I live forever —

⁴¹when I sharpen My flashing sword and My hand takes hold of judgment,
I will return vengeance on My adversaries and repay those who hate Me.

⁴²I will make My arrows drunk with blood, and My sword will devour flesh — blood of the slain and the captive, from the shaggy heads of the enemy.

⁴³Rejoice, O nations, with His people!
For He will avenge the blood of His servants;

He will return vengeance on His adversaries and make atonement for His land and His people.

⁴⁴Moses came and recited all the words of this song in the hearing of the people — he and Hoshea son of Nun. ⁴⁵When Moses had finished speaking all these words to all Israel, ⁴⁶he said to them, 'Take to heart all the words with which I am warning you today, so that you may command your children to observe carefully all the words of this instruction. ⁴⁷For this is no empty word for you — it is your very life. Through this word you will live long on the land you are crossing the Jordan to possess.' ⁴⁸The LORD spoke to Moses on that very day, saying: ⁴⁹Go up to this mountain of the Abarim range — Mount Nebo, which is in the land of Moab, facing Jericho — and look out over the land of Canaan, which I am giving to the children of Israel as a possession. ⁵⁰Die on the mountain that you are ascending, and be gathered to your people, just as your brother Aaron died on Mount Hor and was gathered to his people. ⁵¹Because you both acted unfaithfully against Me among the children of Israel at the waters of Meribah-kadesh in the wilderness of Zin — because you did not treat Me as holy in the presence of the children of Israel. ⁵²You will see the land from a distance, but you will not enter it — the land that I am giving to the children of Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Song of Moses (Ha'azinu) opens by summoning heaven and earth as witnesses — the same cosmic witnesses invoked in Deuteronomy 4:26 and 30:19. This is standard ancient Near Eastern treaty practice: the cosmos itself witnesses the covenant. The bicolon (two-line unit) establishes the poetic structure that will govern the entire song: parallel lines where the second restates, develops, or contrasts the first.
2. Four rain images describe Moses's teaching: matar ('rain'), tal ('dew'), se'irim ('light rain, drizzle'), and revivim ('showers, steady rain'). The verb ya'arof ('drip, fall gently') from the root 'r-f suggests something that percolates and soaks in — the teaching is meant to penetrate, not run off the surface. The progression from rain to dew to drizzle to showers covers every form of moisture, suggesting that the teaching saturates completely.
3. The verb eqra ('I proclaim, I call out') is a public declaration of the divine name. The response havu godel ('ascribe greatness') is an imperative — Moses calls on the audience to respond to God's name with acknowledgment of His greatness (godel — 'greatness, magnitude'). This verse functions as a call to worship before the theological declaration that follows.
4. This verse is the theological thesis of the entire Song: God is perfect, just, faithful, and upright. Every attribute is relational: tamim po'olo ('His work is perfect' — complete, without defect), mishpat ('justice' — right judgment), emunah ('faithfulness' — covenant reliability), tsaddiq ('righteous' — fulfilling His obligations), yashar ('upright' — straight, without deviation). The title haTsur ('the Rock') becomes the defining divine epithet of this chapter, appearing six times (vv 4, 15, 18, 30, 31, 37).
5. One of the most textually difficult verses in Deuteronomy. The Hebrew shichet lo lo banav mumam is disputed: some read 'they have corrupted themselves; they are not His children — their blemish' while others read 'He has corrupted; no — His children, their blemish.' The rendering follows the majority reading: Israel has acted corruptly, and their corruption (mumam — 'their blemish, their defect') disqualifies them as God's children. The terms iqqesh ('crooked, twisted') and petaltol ('tortuous, winding') describe moral distortion.
6. The rhetorical question halaYHWH tigmelu zot ('is this what you repay the LORD?') establishes the charge: ingratitude. The terms naval ('foolish, senseless') and lo chakham ('not wise') describe Israel's moral stupidity — not intellectual deficiency but the failure to recognize what should be obvious. Three verbs describe God's relationship to Israel: qanekha ('acquired you, created you'), asekhah ('made you'), and yekhonenkha ('established you, prepared you'). God is simultaneously Father, Creator, and Sustainer.
7. The Song shifts to historical reflection. Four sources of knowledge are invoked: memory (zekhor — 'remember'), understanding (binu — 'consider, discern'), paternal tradition (she'al avikha — 'ask your father'), and elder wisdom (zeqenekha — 'your elders'). The transmission of covenant history is a communal, intergenerational project — knowledge of God's faithfulness passes from generation to generation.
8. This verse describes a primordial divine ordering of the world: God (Elyon — 'the Most High') assigned each nation its territory and arranged the entire world's geography around Israel. The phrase lemispar benei Yisra'el ('according to the number of the children of Israel') suggests that the number of nations was calibrated to match Israel's tribal structure. A Dead Sea Scrolls variant (4QDeutj) reads benei Elohim ('sons of God') instead of benei Yisra'el, suggesting each nation was assigned a divine patron, while Israel was reserved for God Himself (v 9).
9. While other nations received their territories and presumably their divine patrons (v 8), God chose Israel as His own cheleq ('portion, share'). The word chevel ('allotment, measured portion, territory') describes a specific, measured inheritance — God didn't inherit Israel by chance but by deliberate selection. The parallel between 'His people' (ammo) and 'Jacob' (Ya'aqov) identifies the covenant community by its ancestral name.
10. God's care for Israel in the wilderness is described through four verbs: yimtsa'ehu ('He found him'), yesovevenhu ('He encircled him, He surrounded him'), yevonenhu ('He gave him understanding, He cared for him'), and yitsrenhu ('He guarded him, He preserved him'). The final phrase ke'ishon eino ('as the pupil of His eye') is one of the Bible's most intimate images — the pupil is the most sensitive, carefully protected part of the body. God guards Israel with the same instinctive protectiveness with which the body guards the eye.

11. The eagle metaphor describes God's parenting: ya'ir qinno ('stirs up its nest' — forcing the young to fly by disrupting their comfort), yerachef ('hovers' — the same verb used for the Spirit hovering over the waters in Genesis 1:2), yifros kenafav ('spreads its wings'), yiqqachehu ('catches them'), and yissa'ehu al evrato ('carries them on its pinions'). The image combines tough love (pushing them out) with unfailing protection (catching and carrying them). The eagle does not merely protect — it teaches flight.
12. The word badad ('alone, by Himself') emphasizes exclusivity — God needed no help, no partner, no supporting deity. The phrase ve'ein immo el nekhar ('no foreign god was with Him') can be read two ways: no foreign god helped God (He did it alone), or no foreign god was alongside Israel (they had no other deity). Both readings reinforce the same point: Israel's salvation and sustenance came from God exclusively.
13. Three images of extravagant provision: riding on the heights (yarkivehu al bamotei arets — conquest and dominion), eating field produce (tenubot sadai — agricultural abundance), and extracting sweetness from stone (devash misela, shemen mechalamish tsur — honey from rock, oil from flint). The last image is the most striking: getting nourishment from what should be barren and unyielding. God makes even stone produce sweetness for Israel.
14. A catalog of abundance: dairy (chem'at baqar, chalev tson — curds and milk), prime meat (chelev karim ve'eilim — fat lambs and rams, benei Bashan — the renowned cattle of Bashan), and the finest grain (chelev kilyot chittah — literally 'the kidney-fat of wheat,' meaning the richest, best part). The climactic image dam enav tishte chamer ('you drank the foaming blood of the grape') describes wine so rich it froths. Every category of food reaches its superlative: the fattest, the finest, the richest.
15. Jeshurun (Yeshurun — from the root y-sh-r, 'upright') is an honorific name for Israel, used with bitter irony here: the 'upright one' has become anything but upright. Three words describe the gorging: shamanta ('you grew fat'), avita ('you became thick, bloated'), and kasita ('you were covered/stuffed'). The abundance of verses 13-14 led directly to the rebellion of verse 15: prosperity produced complacency, then contempt. The verb yenabbel ('scorned, treated as foolish') applied to tsur yeshu'ato ('the Rock of his salvation') is devastating — Israel treated their Savior-Rock as worthless.
16. Two parallel lines: jealousy (yaqni'uhu — from qin'ah, the same jealousy God claims in Exodus 20:5) provoked by zarim ('foreign things, strange gods'), and anger (yakh'isuhu) provoked by to'evot ('detestable things, abominations'). God's jealousy is not petty envy but the righteous indignation of a covenantal partner betrayed.
17. The objects of Israel's worship are exposed: shedim ('demons, malevolent spirits' — a term borrowed from Akkadian shedu), lo Eloha ('not God'), elohim lo yeda'um ('gods they had never known'), chadashim miqqarov ba'u ('new ones that came from nearby/recently'). The progressive debunking strips the false gods of all legitimacy: they are demons, they are not God, they are unknown, they are newcomers. Israel's ancestors never se'arum ('shuddered at them, feared them').
18. Two stunning parental images for God: tsur yeladekha ('the Rock who bore/fathered you') and El mechollelekha ('the God who writhed in labor with you'). The verb cholel can mean 'to bring forth in labor' — God's relationship to Israel is described with both paternal (yalad) and maternal (cholel) birthing language. The verbs teshi ('you neglected, you weakened') and tishkach ('you forgot') describe a child's abandonment of the parent who gave them life.
19. God's response to Israel's rebellion begins. The verb yinats ('rejected, spurned, abhorred') marks the turning point of the Song from grace to judgment. The provocation comes mikka'as banav uvenotav ('from the provocation of His sons and daughters') — the familial language continues. These are not strangers who offend God but His own children.
20. God's judgment takes the form of withdrawal: astirah fanai ('I will hide My face'). The hidden face of God (hester panim) is one of the most powerful theological concepts in the Hebrew Bible — God does not actively destroy but withdraws His protection and presence, leaving Israel exposed to the consequences of their own choices. The final phrase banim lo emun bam ('children in whom there is no emun') uses the root alef-mem-nun (the same root as emunah from verse 4): God is emunah; His children have no emun. The contrast is the theological core of the Song.
21. The punishment mirrors the crime in precise poetic symmetry: they provoked God with lo el ('no-god'), so God will provoke them with lo am ('no-people'); they angered God with havleihem ('their vanities/worthless things'), so God will anger them with goy naval ('a foolish/worthless nation'). The apostle Paul quotes this verse in Romans 10:19 to explain God's inclusion of the Gentiles — the 'no-people' become God's means of provoking Israel to jealousy.
22. The fire of God's anger spans the entire vertical axis of creation: from She'ol tachtit ('the lowest depths of the grave') through the earth's surface (erets vivulah — 'the earth and its produce') up to mosdei harim ('the foundations of the mountains'). Nothing is beyond the reach of divine judgment — the fire penetrates downward to the underworld and upward to the mountain roots.
23. God becomes a warrior: aspeh ra'ot ('I will heap calamities') and chitsai akalleh bam ('I will spend/exhaust My arrows on them'). The image of God emptying His quiver against Israel is terrifying — He will not stop until all His arrows are spent. The implication is also that the arrows will eventually run out — God's judgment is severe but not infinite.
24. The arrows of verse 23 are now identified: famine (mezei ra'av — 'the emaciated ones of hunger'), plague (lechumei reshef — 'consumed by burning fever/pestilence'), destruction (qetev meriri — 'bitter destruction/plague'), wild animals (shen behemot — 'teeth of beasts'), and venomous serpents (chamat zochalei afar — 'venom of those that crawl in the dust'). The threats come from every domain: disease, beasts, and reptiles — the natural world turned hostile.

25. No space is safe: the sword operates outside (michutz) and terror operates inside (mechadarim — 'from the inner rooms'). No person is exempt: young men (bachur), young women (betulah), nursing infants (yoneq), and the elderly (ish seviah). The merism covers every age group — from the youngest to the oldest, no one escapes.
26. God contemplates total annihilation: af'eihem ('I would scatter them to the corners/edges') and ashbitah me'enosh zikhram ('I would cause their memory to cease from humankind'). This is the most extreme possible divine action — not just destruction but erasure from history. The verse sets up the reason God restrains Himself (v 27).
27. God's restraint is motivated not by mercy toward Israel but by concern for His own reputation among the nations. If God destroys Israel completely, the enemy nations would credit the victory to their own power (yadenu ramah — 'our hand is raised/has triumphed') rather than to divine judgment (velo YHWH pa'al kol zot — 'and not the LORD has done all this'). God's name and sovereignty must be vindicated — He will not allow human arrogance to claim credit for His judicial actions.
28. The referent is ambiguous — 'they' could be Israel (who lack the wisdom to see where their rebellion leads) or the enemy nations (who lack the wisdom to see that God, not their own power, is at work). Many interpreters read verses 28-33 as referring to the enemies, while others see Israel. The ambiguity may be intentional — both Israel and the nations lack true understanding.
29. The optative lu ('if only, would that') expresses divine longing for wisdom in the people. Three wisdom verbs are chained: chakhmu ('were wise'), yaskilu ('would comprehend'), and yavinu ('would understand'). The object of understanding is acharitam ('their end, their latter destiny'). The tragedy is not just rebellion but blindness — they cannot see where their path leads.
30. The supernatural ratio — one enemy routing a thousand Israelites, two routing ten thousand — can only be explained by divine abandonment. The rhetorical question im lo ki ('unless') points to the only possible explanation: tsuam mekharam ('their Rock sold them'). God is called 'their Rock' even in the act of judgment — He remains their Rock, but He has withdrawn His protection. The verb hisgir ('handed over, delivered up, shut in') means God actively transferred Israel into enemy hands.
31. A moment of theological clarity within the lament: ketsurenu tsuam ('their rock is not like our Rock'). The lowercase 'rock' (tsur) refers to the gods of the enemy nations; the uppercase 'Rock' refers to Israel's God. Even the enemies themselves (oyeveinu pelilim — 'our enemies are the judges') can see the difference. The gods of the nations cannot compare to Israel's God — which makes Israel's abandonment of Him all the more incomprehensible.
32. The enemies (or Israel — the referent continues to be debated) are compared to the produce of Sodom and Gomorrah — the quintessential symbols of divine judgment. Their vine produces rosh ('poison') and merorot ('bitterness') — moral corruption described as toxic agriculture. If this refers to Israel, the image is stunning: the people God planted as His vineyard (cf. Isaiah 5:1-7) now produce the fruit of Sodom.
33. The vine metaphor concludes: their wine (yeinam) is chamat tanninim ('venom of serpents') and rosh petanim akhzar ('cruel/deadly poison of cobras'). What should nourish (wine) destroys (venom). The word tanninim can mean 'serpents,' 'sea monsters,' or 'dragons' depending on context; here the parallel with petanim ('cobras, vipers') confirms the serpent reading.
34. God reveals that the enemies' wickedness is not unnoticed: kamus immadi ('stored up with Me'), chatum be'otsrotai ('sealed in My treasures'). The metaphor is of a treasury or archive where debts are recorded and sealed for future collection. Divine justice is patient but precise — nothing is forgotten, everything is accounted for.
35. Li naqam veshillem ('To Me belongs vengeance and repayment') is quoted by Paul in Romans 12:19 and by the author of Hebrews 10:30. The image of the slipping foot (tamut raglam — 'their foot will totter/slip') suggests that the wicked stand on unstable ground — their fall is not a matter of if but of when. The phrase ve'chash atidot lamo ('what is destined for them hastens') personifies destiny as a runner racing toward the wicked.
36. The turning point of the Song: God shifts from judgment to restoration. The verb yadin ('will judge/vindicate') here means to act on behalf of, not to condemn. The verb yitnecham ('will have compassion, will relent') from the root n-ch-m describes God's emotional turn toward His people. The condition for this turn is Israel's complete helplessness: azlat yad ('strength is gone'), efes atsur ve'azuv ('no one remains, neither confined nor free'). God acts when human resources are exhausted — when Israel can no longer save themselves.
37. God challenges the false gods Israel chose: ei eloheimo ('where are their gods?') — the same taunt used against foreign gods in Judges 10:14. The word tsur ('rock') is used with bitter irony: Israel's chosen 'rock' (lowercase — the false gods) is now exposed as absent and powerless, in contrast to haTsur ('the Rock') — God Himself — who never abandoned His essential character even during judgment.
38. The challenge continues with escalating sarcasm: Israel's false gods consumed the best portions of their offerings (chelev zevacheimo — 'the fat of their sacrifices,' yein nesikham — 'the wine of their libations'). Now let those gods demonstrate their power: yaqumu ve'ya'zerukhem ('let them rise and help you'), yehi aleikhem sitrah ('let them be a shelter over you'). The silence of the false gods answers the challenge.
39. The supreme divine self-declaration: ani ani hu ('I, I am He') — an emphatic claim of unique, exclusive deity. Three paired actions demonstrate absolute sovereignty: amith va'achayye ('I kill and I make alive'), machatseti va'ani erpa ('I wound and I heal'). God holds both sides of every axis of power — destruction and creation, injury and restoration. The closing ve'ei miyadi matzil ('no one delivers from My hand') is an absolute claim of irresistible power.
40. God swears an oath by Himself — raising the hand to heaven (essa el shamayim yadi) is a gesture of oath-taking. Since there is no one greater to swear by, God swears by His own eternal life: chai anokhi le'olam ('I live forever'). This divine oath guarantees the promises of vengeance and restoration that follow.

41. God as divine warrior: shanoti beraq charbi ('I sharpen the lightning-flash of My sword') — the sword is described as beraq ('lightning, flash'), connecting heavenly warfare with storm imagery. God's enemies (tsarai — 'My adversaries,' mesan'ai — 'those who hate Me') are Israel's oppressors, but the language is broad enough to encompass all who oppose God's purposes.
42. The divine warrior imagery reaches its climax: arrows drunk on blood (ashkir chitsai middam) and a sword that devours flesh (ve'charbi tokhal basar). The phrase mero'sh par'ot oyev ('from the head of the enemy's wild-haired leaders') may describe enemy warriors with flowing battle hair, or it may refer to the chief (ro'sh — 'head, leader') of the enemy's retribution forces. The violence is not gratuitous — it is the execution of the covenant curses against Israel's oppressors.
43. The Song concludes with a universal call to celebration: harninu goyim ammo ('Shout for joy, O nations, with His people'). The same nations that were instruments of judgment are now called to rejoice in Israel's restoration. Three divine actions close the Song: dam avadav yiqqom ('He will avenge His servants' blood'), naqam yashiv letsarav ('He will repay His adversaries'), and kipper admato ammo ('He will atone for His land and His people'). The final verb kipper ('atone, make atonement') brings the entire covenantal drama to resolution — the same kippur that purifies the sanctuary (Leviticus 16) now purifies the land and the people. Judgment ends in restoration.
44. The narrative frame resumes. Joshua is called by his birth name Hoshea (meaning 'salvation') rather than Yehoshua/Joshua (meaning 'the LORD saves'). Moses recites the Song to the entire assembly. Joshua's presence signals the transition of leadership — he witnesses Moses's final teaching as the man who will carry it forward.
45. The phrase vayekhal Mosheh ('Moses finished') marks the formal conclusion of the Song's recitation. The emphasis on 'all' (kol hadevarim, kol Yisra'el) stresses completeness — every word was spoken, and the entire nation heard.
46. Moses's final charge before his death: simu levavkhem ('set your hearts' — pay attention with your whole being). The intergenerational dimension is explicit: asher tetsavvum et beneikhem ('which you shall command your children'). The Song is not merely a performance but a teaching instrument — it must be transmitted to future generations as a perpetual witness to the covenant.
47. The extraordinary claim: ki hu chayyeikhem ('for it is your life'). The Torah is not abstract religious teaching but the source of life itself. The word is not req ('empty, vain, worthless') — it carries weight, substance, and consequence. Obedience to this word is directly connected to survival on the land (ta'arikhu yamim al ha'adamah — 'you will prolong days on the soil'). Life in the land and faithfulness to the word are inseparable.
48. The phrase be'etsem hayyom hazeh ('on the bone/substance of this day' — on that very day) emphasizes immediacy. What follows is God's command for Moses to ascend Mount Nebo and die — the end of Moses's life is inseparable from the completion of his teaching.
49. The geography is precise: the Abarim range east of the Jordan, specifically Mount Nebo (har nevo), in Moabite territory, facing (al penei) Jericho across the Jordan valley. Moses will see (ure'eh) the land but not enter it. The command to look (re'eh) at the promised land is both a gift (he gets to see it) and a judgment (he will never set foot in it). The verb noten ('I am giving') uses the present participle — the gift is in process, happening now, but Moses will not be its recipient.
50. The command umut bahar ('die on the mountain') is stark — God commands death as directly as He once commanded mission. The phrase he'asef el ammekha ('be gathered to your people') is the standard Hebrew expression for death understood as reunion with ancestors — it presupposes continued existence beyond physical death. Aaron's death on Mount Hor (Numbers 20:22-29) provides the parallel: both brothers die on mountaintops, both are 'gathered to their people,' and neither enters the promised land.
51. The reason for Moses's exclusion from the land is restated: me'altam bi ('you acted unfaithfully against Me') at Meribah-kadesh (Numbers 20:1-13), where Moses struck the rock instead of speaking to it. The phrase lo qiddashtem oti ('you did not sanctify Me, you did not treat Me as holy') identifies the core failure: Moses failed to uphold God's holiness before the people. The plural 'you both' (me'altam) includes Aaron, who has already died under the same judgment.
52. The chapter and Moses's public ministry end with this sentence of profound sorrow: minneged tir'eh et ha'arets ('from opposite/across you will see the land') — he will see it but not enter it. The word shamah ('there') followed by lo tavo ('you will not come') creates a permanent barrier between Moses and the promise. Yet the verse is not entirely judgment — God still says ani noten ('I am giving'), present tense. The promise to Israel stands; only Moses's personal entry is denied. The land awaits.

Summary: Moses blesses the twelve tribes of Israel before his death — a poem framing each tribe's destiny within a theophanic hymn that opens and closes with God as king and protector.

What Makes This Remarkable: The blessing opens with a theophany (vv. 2-5) — God coming from Sinai, Seir, and Mount Paran with ten thousands of holy ones and a fiery law (esh dat). The order and content of the tribal blessings differ significantly from Jacob's blessings in Genesis 49: Simeon is missing entirely, Joseph receives the longest blessing, and Levi is praised rather than cursed. The name Yeshurun (v. 5, 26), a poetic term for Israel from the root yashar ('upright'), appears only here and in 32:15 — it is God's affectionate name for what Israel is meant to be.

Translation Friction: The phrase esh dat (v. 2) remains one of the most debated expressions in the Torah — 'fire of law,' 'fiery law,' or a textual corruption. We preserved the Masoretic reading. Several tribal blessings contain rare vocabulary: Zebulun's 'treasures hidden in the sand' (v. 19), Dan as a 'lion's cub leaping from Bashan' (v. 22), and Asher's 'iron and bronze' bolts (v. 25). Each required balancing literal translation with intelligible English.

Connections: The tribal blessings parallel Genesis 49 (Jacob's blessings) but reflect changed historical circumstances. The theophanic opening (vv. 2-5) echoes Judges 5:4-5, Psalm 68:7-8, and Habakkuk 3:3. The closing declaration 'there is none like the God of Yeshurun' (v. 26) is echoed in the incomparability formula of Exodus 15:11, 2 Samuel 7:22, and Psalm 86:8.

¹This is the blessing that Moses, the man of God, pronounced over the people of Israel before his death.

²He declared:
The LORD came from Sinai,
He dawned upon them from Seir,
He blazed forth from Mount Paran.
He arrived from the myriads of holy ones —
from His right hand, a fire of law for them.

³Indeed, He loves the peoples;
all His consecrated ones are in Your hand.
They gathered at Your feet,
each one receiving Your instructions.

⁴Moses charged us with the Law —
the inheritance of the assembly of Jacob.

⁵He became king in Yeshurun
when the leaders of the people assembled, the tribes of Israel gathered as one.

⁶Let Reuben live and not perish;
let his people not dwindle in number.

⁷And this is for Judah. He said:
 Hear, O LORD, the voice of Judah, and bring him back to his people.
 Let his hands fight for him, and be his help against his enemies.

⁸Of Levi he said:
 Your Thummim and Your Urim belong to the one loyal to You — the one You tested at Massah, the one You contended with at the waters of Meribah.

⁹The one who said of his father and mother,
 'I do not regard them' —
 who did not acknowledge his brothers or recognize his own children.
 For they kept Your word and guarded Your covenant.

¹⁰They teach Your ordinances to Jacob,
 Your instruction to Israel.
 They place incense before You and whole offerings on Your altar.

¹¹O LORD, bless his strength and take pleasure in the work of his hands.
 Crush the backs of those who rise against him, and of those who hate him — so they never rise again.

¹²Of Benjamin he said:
 The beloved of the LORD will dwell securely beside Him.
 He shelters him all day long,
 and between his ridges He makes His home.

¹³Of Joseph he said:
 Blessed by the LORD is his land — with the finest gifts of heaven, with dew, and with the deep waters crouching below,

¹⁴with the finest crops ripened by the sun,
 and the finest yield drawn out by the moon,

¹⁵with the best of the ancient mountains, and the finest gifts of the enduring hills,

¹⁶with the finest gifts of the earth and all it holds, and the favor of the One who dwelt in the bush —
 let all this come upon the head of Joseph, upon the crown of the one set apart among his brothers.

¹⁷His firstborn bull — majesty belongs to him;
his horns are the horns of a wild ox.
With them he gores the nations,
all of them, to the ends of the earth.
These are the myriads of Ephraim;
these are the thousands of Manasseh.

¹⁸Of Zebulun he said:
Rejoice, Zebulun, in your ventures abroad,
and Issachar, in your tents.

¹⁹They will summon peoples to the mountain;
there they will offer righteous sacrifices.
For they will draw from the abundance of the seas and the hidden treasures of the sand.

²⁰Of Gad he said:
Blessed is the one who gives Gad wide territory!
Like a lioness he crouches,
tearing off arm and skull alike.

²¹He chose the best portion for himself, for the commander's allotment was reserved there.
He marched at the head of the people, carrying out the LORD's righteous purpose and His judgments alongside Israel.

²²Of Dan he said:
Dan is a lion's cub that leaps from Bashan.

²³Of Naphtali he said:
Naphtali — overflowing with favor, filled with the blessing of the LORD — take possession of the sea and the southland.

²⁴Of Asher he said:
Most blessed of sons is Asher;
let him be favored among his brothers, and let him bathe his foot in oil.

²⁵Your bolts will be iron and bronze, and your strength will last as long as your days.

²⁶There is no one like the God of Jeshurun, who rides across the heavens to help you,
who rides the clouds in His majesty.

²⁷The God of old is your dwelling place, and beneath you are the everlasting arms.
He drove the enemy out before you and said, 'Destroy!'

²⁸So Israel dwells in safety, the fountain of Jacob set apart in a land of grain and new wine, where even his skies drip with dew.

²⁹How fortunate you are, Israel!
Who is like you —
a people delivered by the LORD, the shield of your protection,
the sword of your triumph?
Your enemies will cringe before you, and you will trample their heights.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The superscription frames the entire chapter as berakhah ('blessing') — a performative speech-act in which words carry real power to shape destiny. Moses is titled ish ha'Elohim ('the man of God'), a designation used elsewhere only for prophets like Elijah and Elisha (1 Kings 17:18, 2 Kings 4:9). This title elevates Moses's final words beyond personal farewell to prophetic declaration. The phrase lifnei moto ('before his death') marks this as deathbed blessing — a genre well-established in Genesis (Jacob's blessings in Genesis 49) where the dying patriarch's words are irrevocable and prophetically charged.
2. This theophanic hymn traces God's approach from three locations moving northward: Sinai, Seir (Edom's mountain range), and Paran (the wilderness region between them). The verbs escalate: ba ('came'), zarach ('dawned, rose like the sun'), hofia ('shone forth, blazed out'). The Ketiv/Qere at the verse's end is significant: the Ketiv reads (eshdat) as a single word of uncertain meaning, while the Qere separates it into (esh dat — 'fire of law' or 'fiery law'). The rendering follows the Qere reading. The phrase merivevot qodesh ('from the myriads of holy ones') depicts God arriving with a vast angelic retinue — a divine warrior coming with His heavenly army.
3. This verse is among the most textually difficult in the Hebrew Bible. The verb chovev ('loving, embracing') is rare, appearing only here in this form. The word ammim ('peoples') is ambiguous — it could mean the tribes of Israel or the nations generally. The phrase kol qedoshav beyodekha ('all His holy ones are in Your hand') shifts from third person (He loves) to second person (Your hand), a common feature of Hebrew hymnic poetry. The verb tukku ('they sat down' or 'they were struck/directed') is disputed; it may come from the root t-k-k ('to be placed, to sit') describing the people positioned at God's feet as disciples receiving teaching.
4. This verse shifts from theophanic hymn to communal declaration — likely a congregational response or liturgical refrain. The word torah ('instruction, teaching, law') is presented not as burden but as morashah ('inheritance, possession') — something precious handed down from generation to generation. The term qehillat Ya'aqov ('assembly of Jacob') designates the gathered community as the corporate recipient and guardian of Torah. This verse became one of the most quoted in Jewish liturgy and education, crystallizing the idea that Torah belongs to the entire community, not to priests or scholars alone.
5. The identity of the 'king' is debated: it may refer to God Himself reigning over Israel, or to Moses functioning as a king-like figure during the wilderness period. The context of theophany (vv 2-4) favors God as the subject — He became melek ('king') over Israel at Sinai when the nation assembled. The verb hit'assef ('gathered together') and the adverb yachad ('together, as one') emphasize the unity of the tribal assembly as the moment of God's coronation over His people.
6. Reuben's blessing is strikingly brief — the shortest of all the tribal blessings, reflecting the firstborn's diminished status (cf. Genesis 49:3-4, where Jacob rebukes Reuben for his transgression). The phrase yechi... ve'al yamot ('let him live and not die') is a plea for survival, not dominance. The second line vihi metav mispar ('let his men be a number') is ambiguous: it could mean 'let his men be numerous' (a positive wish) or, as some ancient versions read with the negative particle, 'let not his men be few' (a prayer against extinction). The brevity itself is eloquent — Reuben receives survival, not supremacy.
7. Judah's blessing is framed as intercessory prayer rather than declarative blessing — Moses asks God to hear Judah and assist him. The phrase ve'el ammo tevi'ennu ('bring him to his people') may reflect a situation where Judah fights at the vanguard, separated from the other tribes, and needs to be brought safely home. Yadav rav lo ('his hands contend/fight for him') asks that Judah's own strength be sufficient for battle. The final plea ezer mitsarav tiyeh ('be a help from his adversaries') asks for divine assistance specifically in military conflict. Notably, Simeon is omitted entirely from this blessing — the only tribe not mentioned.

8. Levi's blessing is the longest, spanning four verses (8-11), reflecting the tribe's elevated priestly role. The Thummim and Urim (tummekha ve'urekha — note the reversed order from the usual 'Urim and Thummim') are the sacred lots used for divine consultation, here assigned to ish chasidekha ('the man loyal to You' — possibly referring to the tribe collectively or to Moses/Aaron specifically). The testing at Massah (Exodus 17:1-7) and the striving at Meribah (Numbers 20:1-13) are places where both the people and their leaders were tested. The Levites proved faithful when others did not.
9. This verse recalls the Levites' decisive action at the golden calf incident (Exodus 32:25-29), where they executed judgment without regard for family ties. The three negations — lo re'itiv ('I have not seen him' — regarding father and mother), lo hikkir ('did not acknowledge' — regarding brothers), lo yada ('did not know' — regarding children) — demonstrate absolute covenant loyalty over family loyalty. The verbs shamru ('they kept, observed') and yintsoru ('they guarded, preserved') describe the Levites' fidelity to God's imratekha ('Your word, Your utterance') and beritekha ('Your covenant'). Tribal loyalty to God superseded kinship loyalty.
10. Two primary Levitical functions are named: teaching and worship. The verb yoru ('they teach, they direct') from the same root as torah connects the Levites' instructional role directly to Torah itself — they are the authorized interpreters. The parallelism mishpatekha ('Your ordinances') / toratekha ('Your instruction') covers the full scope of divine teaching. The worship function involves qetorah ('incense' — the aromatic offering burned on the golden altar) and kalil ('whole offering' — the completely consumed sacrifice on the bronze altar). The Levites stand at the intersection of divine word and divine worship.
11. The blessing concludes with a prayer for Levi that mirrors a warrior's petition. Barakh YHWH cheilo ('Bless, LORD, his strength/resources') asks for divine empowerment. The verb tirtsah ('accept, take pleasure in') asks God to find the Levites' po'al yadav ('work of his hands' — their priestly service) pleasing. The final lines turn aggressive: mechats motnayim qamav ('crush the loins/back of those who rise against him') uses violent imagery to protect the priestly tribe from its opponents — possibly reflecting historical conflicts over Levitical authority. The phrase min yequmun ('that they not rise again') is a prayer for decisive, permanent victory.
12. Benjamin's blessing is saturated with intimacy. The title yedid YHWH ('beloved of the LORD') uses the same root as David's name (d-v-d) and suggests deep, personal affection. The verb yishkon ('will dwell') and its repetition shaken ('He dwells/makes His home') create a picture of mutual indwelling — Benjamin dwells securely with God, and God dwells between Benjamin's ketepav ('his shoulders' — referring to the ridges or slopes of Benjamin's hill-country territory). Since the Jerusalem Temple was built on the border of Benjamin's territory, many interpreters see this as a prophetic allusion to God dwelling on Benjamin's hills.
13. Joseph's blessing (vv 13-17) is the longest and most lavish, rivaling the theophanic introduction in grandeur. The key word meged ('precious thing, finest gift, choice produce') appears five times across vv 13-16, creating a cascade of abundance. The blessing begins with cosmic sources: shamayim ('heaven') provides tal ('dew' — essential moisture in a land with dry summers), while the tehom ('the deep' — primordial subterranean waters, cf. Genesis 1:2) rovetset tachat ('crouches beneath') the surface, supplying springs and groundwater. The verb rovetset ('crouching, lying in wait') personifies the deep as a living force ready to nourish.
14. The celestial pair — shemesh ('sun') and yerachim ('moons, lunar months') — governs agricultural productivity. The sun's tevu'ot ('produce, crops, yield') refers to what grows under solar warmth, while geresh yerachim ('what the moon puts forth, drives out') likely refers to the monthly cycle of growth regulated by lunar phases. Ancient Near Eastern agriculture was closely tied to the lunar calendar, making this a concrete, practical blessing: Joseph's land will produce abundantly in every season and every month.
15. The blessing moves from celestial to terrestrial — from sky to the oldest features of the landscape. The phrase harrei qedem ('mountains of old, ancient mountains') evokes primordial geology, mountains that have stood since creation. The parallel giv'ot olam ('hills of eternity, enduring hills') reinforces the image of permanence. The rosh ('head, top, best') and meged ('finest gift') drawn from these ancient formations suggest mineral wealth, terraced agriculture, and the productive soil of long-weathered hillsides.
16. The cascade of meged ('finest gifts') reaches its climax: erets umlo'ah ('the earth and its fullness') encompasses everything the land contains. Then the blessing shifts from nature to divine favor: retson shokheni seneh ('the favor/goodwill of the One who dwelt in the bush') is an extraordinary reference back to the burning bush theophany of Exodus 3 — God is identified by His most intimate self-revelation to Moses. The blessings converge on rosh Yosef ('the head of Joseph') and qodqod nezir echav ('the crown of the one consecrated/separated among his brothers'). The word nazir ('consecrated one, separated one') recalls both Joseph's separation from his family and his elevated, set-apart status.
17. The animal imagery shifts Joseph's blessing from agricultural abundance to military power. The bekhsh shoro ('firstborn of his bull') is an image of prime strength and vigor. The re'em ('wild ox' — probably the now-extinct aurochs, Bos primigenius, not 'unicorn' as KJV translates) was the largest and most powerful bovid in the ancient Near East. The verb yenagach ('he gores, he thrusts') depicts Joseph's tribes driving enemies to the afsei arets ('ends of the earth'). The blessing concludes by identifying the two Josephite sub-tribes: Ephraim receives rivevot ('myriads, ten-thousands') while Manasseh receives alfei ('thousands') — reflecting Ephraim's historical dominance despite being the younger brother (Genesis 48:19-20).
18. Zebulun and Issachar are paired in a single blessing (vv 18-19), as they occupied adjacent territories in the Galilee region. The contrast betse'tekha ('in your going out') versus be'ohalekha ('in your tents') distinguishes their economic roles: Zebulun engaged in commerce and maritime trade (going out), while Issachar was associated with settled agricultural and scholarly life (remaining in tents). The verb semach ('rejoice') covers both activities — both the outgoing trader and the tent-dwelling farmer find cause for celebration in their respective vocations.
19. The paired tribes host a pilgrimage: amim har yiqra'u ('they summon peoples to the mountain') likely refers to a regional sanctuary where Zebulun and Issachar invite others to worship. The zivchei tsedeq ('sacrifices of righteousness' — legitimate, proper offerings) are funded by two sources of - wealth: shefa yamim ('abundance of the seas' — maritime commerce, fishing, possibly the murex snail used for purple dye) and sefunei temunei chol ('hidden things buried in sand' — perhaps glass-making from coastal sand, a known Phoenician industry in the region, or mineral deposits). The blessing envisions economic prosperity channeled into worship.

- 20. Gad settled east of the Jordan and needed warrior strength to defend exposed borders. The phrase barukh marchiv Gad ('blessed is the one who enlarges Gad') celebrates the expansion of Gad's territory. The lion imagery — kelavi shaken ('like a lioness he crouches/dwells') — depicts Gad as a predator at rest but ready to strike. The violence of taraf zero'a af qodqod ('tears arm and even skull') describes devastating combat: the lion does not merely wound but rips off both the arm (zero'a — also 'strength, force') and the head. The lavi ('lioness') is chosen over aryeh ('lion') perhaps because the lioness is the more active hunter.
- 21. Gad selected prime Transjordanian territory (reshit — 'the first, the best portion') where a chelqat mechoqeq ('portion of the commander/lawgiver') was safun ('reserved, hidden away'). The identity of the mechoqeq is debated — it may refer to Moses's burial place (hidden in Gad's territory) or to the leader's reserved portion. Despite choosing eastern territory, Gad fulfilled his obligation: vayyete rashei am ('he went/marched at the head of the people') crossing the Jordan to fight with the other tribes (cf. Numbers 32:20-27). The phrase tsidqat YHWH asah ('he executed the LORD's righteousness') describes Gad's military service as an act of covenant faithfulness.
- 22. Dan's blessing is brief but vivid. The gur aryeh ('lion's cub') describes youthful, explosive power — not the mature lion at rest but the young predator bursting into action. The verb yezanneq ('leaps, springs forth') conveys sudden, powerful movement. The location min haBashan ('from Bashan') is geographically puzzling since Dan's original territory was in the southwest, but the tribe later migrated north near Bashan (Judges 18), and this blessing may reflect that northern settlement. Bashan was known for its lush pastureland and powerful bulls (Psalm 22:12), making it a fitting launchpad for a leaping lion.
- 23. Naphtali's blessing is pure abundance. The phrase seva ratson ('satisfied/sated with favor') describes a state of complete divine goodwill — ratson is the pleasure and acceptance that God extends. The parallel male birkat YHWH ('full of the LORD's blessing') reinforces the image of overflowing bounty. The directive yam vedarom yerashah ('possess the sea and the south') defines Naphtali's territory: yam ('sea, west') likely refers to the Sea of Galilee (Naphtali's territory included its western shore), and darom ('south') indicates the fertile southern extension of the tribal allotment. Naphtali's territory was among the most agriculturally productive in Israel.
- 24. Asher's blessing (vv 24-25) celebrates fertility and prosperity. The phrase barukh mibanim Asher ('blessed among sons is Asher') places Asher above the other tribes in this particular blessing. Retsuyi echav ('accepted/favored by his brothers') suggests both popularity and commercial importance — Asher's olive-rich territory made him a valued trading partner. The vivid image tovel bashemen raglo ('dipping his foot in oil') is hyperbolic: Asher's land produces so much olive oil that one could wade through it. Asher's coastal territory in the northwest (modern Lebanon border region) was indeed renowned for its olive groves.
- 25. The word min'alekha is traditionally rendered 'your shoes/sandals' (from na'al — 'sandal'), but many modern scholars read it as 'your bolts/locks' (from the root n-'l — 'to bolt, to lock'), referring to the fortification of Asher's cities with iron and bronze bars. This reading better fits the military context: Asher's border cities needed strong defenses. The final phrase ukheyamekha dov'ekha is also debated: dov'ekha may mean 'your strength' (from d-b-' — an otherwise unattested root), 'your vigor,' or 'your abundance.' The rendering follows the traditional understanding: Asher's strength will endure throughout his lifetime, never diminishing.
- 26. The grand doxology (vv 26-29) opens with a declaration of incomparability: ein ka'El Yeshurun ('there is no one like the God of Jeshurun'). The image of God as rokhev shamayim ('rider of the heavens') draws on ancient Near Eastern storm-god imagery — the deity who mounts the thunderclouds as a chariot (cf. Psalm 68:4, 104:3). But here the heavenly ride is be'ezrekha ('to your help, for your aid') — cosmic power deployed for Israel's benefit. The parallel uvega'avato shechaqim ('and in His majesty, the clouds') depicts God's splendor manifest across the sky (shechaqim — 'clouds, skies, the heights'). The poetic name Yeshurun returns from v 5, framing the blessing.
- 27. One of the most beloved verses in the Hebrew Bible. The word me'onah ('dwelling place, refuge') from the root 'v-n ('to dwell') presents God Himself as the shelter — not a building or a fortress but the living God as the place where Israel lives. The phrase Elohei qedem ('God of old, God of the east, the ancient God') emphasizes God's eternity — He precedes all things. The image umittachat zero'ot olam ('and underneath are the arms of eternity') is staggeringly intimate: the everlasting arms hold Israel from below, supporting, carrying, and catching. The military conclusion — vayyegaresh ('He drove out') and vayyomer hashmed ('He said: Destroy!') — places this tender image within the context of conquest, where the God who gently holds also powerfully fights.
- 28. The vision of Israel's settled life: yishkon Yisra'el betach badad ('Israel dwells securely, alone/apart') describes both safety and distinctiveness — Israel is protected and separate from the nations. The phrase ein Ya'aqov ('the fountain/eye of Jacob') is a poetic designation for the source of Israel's life — either the people themselves or their ancestral spring of blessing. The land is described by its products: dagan ('grain' — the staple crop) and tirosh ('new wine, fresh grape juice' — the luxury crop). The final image af shamav ya'arfu tal ('even his heavens drip dew') crowns the picture: the very sky above Israel's land weeps moisture for its fertility.
- 29. The climactic verse of the entire blessing. The exclamation ashrekha Yisra'el ('how fortunate you are, Israel!' — ashrei expresses concrete, experienced happiness) opens the finale. The Yemenite scribal tradition notes an enlarged aleph (aleph gedolah) in ashrekha, visually marking this word as significant. The rhetorical question mi khamokha ('who is like you?') echoes the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15:11: mi khamokha ba'elim YHWH — 'who is like You among the gods, LORD?'), but here the incomparability is applied to Israel itself: a people unmatched because their God is unmatched. God is both magen ('shield' — defensive protection) and cherev ('sword' — offensive power). The enemies yikkachashu ('cringe, submit, feign obedience' — from k-ch-sh, 'to deny, to cower'). Israel treads al bamoteimo ('upon their high places') — conquering the very sanctuaries and strongholds of the defeated.

Summary: Moses ascends Mount Nebo, sees the entire promised land from Dan to the Negev, and dies there at 120 years old. God buries him in an unknown grave. Joshua succeeds him, but the narrator declares that no prophet like Moses has risen since.

What Makes This Remarkable: The final verse of the Torah is an epitaph: 'no prophet has risen in Israel like Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face' (panim el panim, v. 10). The phrase is not metaphorical — Exodus 33:11 and Numbers 12:8 established Moses's unique mode of divine communication. The narrator's voice in verse 10 ('has not risen since') implies distance in time — this postscript was written long after Moses by someone looking back across Israel's prophetic history.

Translation Friction: The phrase al-pi YHWH (v. 5, literally 'at the mouth of the LORD') led to the rabbinic tradition that Moses died by God's kiss — a tender reading of what could simply mean 'by God's command.' We rendered it 'at the LORD's command' and noted the tradition. Moses's undiminished vitality (v. 7, 'his eye was not dim, and his vigor had not fled') makes his death purely obedient — nature did not take him; God summoned him.

Connections: The land panorama (vv. 1-3) fulfills the promise to Abraham in Genesis 12:7 and 13:14-17 — Moses sees what Abraham was promised. The unknown burial site prevented shrine-building, a decision with theological implications. Joshua's commissioning (v. 9) completes Numbers 27:18-23 and Deuteronomy 31:7-8. The 'face to face' claim (v. 10) echoes Exodus 33:11 and is qualified by 1 Corinthians 13:12.

¹Moses went up from the steppes of Moab to Mount Nebo, to the summit of Pisgah, which faces Jericho. There the LORD showed him the entire land — Gilead as far as Dan, ²all of Naphtali, the land of Ephraim and Manasseh, all the land of Judah as far as the western sea, ³the Negev, the Jordan plain — the valley of Jericho, city of palms — as far as Zoar. ⁴The LORD said to him, "This is the land I swore to Abraham, to Isaac, and to Jacob when I said, 'I will give it to your descendants.' I have let you see it with your own eyes, but you will not cross over into it." ⁵Moses, the servant of the LORD, died there in the land of Moab, at the mouth of the LORD. ⁶He buried him in the valley in the land of Moab, opposite Beth-peor, and no one knows his burial place to this day. ⁷Moses was one hundred and twenty years old when he died. His eye had not grown dim, and his vitality had not faded. ⁸The Israelites wept for Moses in the steppes of Moab for thirty days. Then the days of weeping and mourning for Moses came to an end. ⁹Now Joshua son of Nun was filled with the spirit of wisdom, because Moses had laid his hands on him. The Israelites obeyed him and did as the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹⁰No prophet has arisen since in Israel like Moses, whom the LORD knew face to face — ¹¹unmatched in all the signs and wonders the LORD sent him to perform in the land of Egypt — against Pharaoh, all his officials, and his entire land — ¹²and in all the mighty power and all the great and awesome deeds that Moses performed in the sight of all Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Moses's final ascent reverses Abraham's first journey into the land. The verb vayya'al ('he went up') is the same used for pilgrimage to sacred sites. Mount Nebo rises about 2,600 feet above the Dead Sea, offering a panoramic view westward across the Jordan Valley. The phrase vayyar'ehu YHWH ('the LORD showed him') indicates this was more than natural sight — God granted Moses a vision of the entire promised territory, tribe by tribe, as a final gift.
2. The panorama sweeps from north (Dan, Naphtali) to central (Ephraim, Manasseh) to south (Judah), using tribal names that anticipate the future territorial divisions under Joshua. 'The western sea' (hayyam ha'acharon, literally 'the last sea' or 'the hinder sea') is the Mediterranean — the farthest boundary of the promised land. Moses sees Israel's future mapped out across the landscape before him.
3. The vision completes its sweep southward through the Negev and then down to the Jordan plain (kikkar), the fertile lowland near Jericho. 'City of palms' (ir hattemarim) is Jericho's epithet — the first city Israel will conquer. Zoar, at the southern end of the Dead Sea, was the small city where Lot fled from Sodom's destruction (Gen 19:22). The panoramic tour encompasses the entire promised land from every direction: north, west, south, and the Jordan Valley below.

4. God's final words to Moses are simultaneously a fulfillment and a withholding. The oath to the patriarchs (Gen 12:7, 26:3, 28:13) is confirmed — 'This is the land I swore' — but Moses himself will not enter. The phrase her'itikha ve'einekha ('I have caused you to see it with your eyes') is tender and devastating: God gives Moses the fullest possible vision of what he cannot have. The reason for Moses's exclusion (Num 20:12, striking the rock) is not repeated here — at the end, the narrative does not revisit the failure but focuses on the intimacy of the moment: God and Moses, alone on a mountaintop, looking at the promise together.
5. The phrase al-pi YHWH (literally 'at/by the mouth of the LORD') is rendered 'according to the word' by most translations, but the Hebrew is more intimate. The rabbinic tradition interpreted this as death 'by the kiss of God' — God took Moses's life directly, gently. The epithet eved-YHWH ('servant of the LORD') is the highest title in the Hebrew Bible — used sparingly for Abraham, Moses, David, and the prophets. Moses dies not as a failed leader excluded from the land but as the faithful servant of the LORD.
6. The subject of 'buried' is ambiguous — the Hebrew vayyiqbor oto could mean 'He (God) buried him' or 'he (someone) buried him.' Most reading traditions understand God as the one who buries Moses — a final act of intimacy. The unknown grave prevents the burial site from becoming a shrine or object of worship. Beth-peor ('house of Peor') is where Israel's apostasy with Baal of Peor occurred (Num 25) — Moses is buried near the site of Israel's greatest failure under his leadership, a poignant irony. 'To this day' (ad hayyom hazzeh) is the narrator's own voice, writing from a later time.
7. Two physical details mark Moses's death as extraordinary: undimmed sight (lo khahatah eino) and undiminished vigor (lo nas lechoho). He did not waste away — his death was not from decline but from divine appointment. The 120 years divide neatly into three forties: 40 years in Egypt's court, 40 years in Midian, 40 years leading Israel. The Hebrew lechoho ('his moisture, vigor, freshness') refers to vital force — the sap of life had not dried up. Moses was fully alive when God took him.
8. Thirty days of mourning is the standard period for a national leader — Aaron received the same (Num 20:29). The phrase vayyitemu yemei vekhi evel Mosheh ('the days of weeping-mourning for Moses were completed') marks a definitive ending: the mourning period has a boundary. Israel must grieve and then move forward. The Pentateuch, which began with creation, now closes with a funeral.
9. The succession is orderly: Moses laid hands on Joshua (Num 27:18-23), transferring authority through physical contact. Joshua receives ruach chokhmah ('spirit of wisdom') — not Moses's prophetic spirit but the specific gift needed for leadership. The verb shama ('obeyed, listened') — the same word that opens the Shema (Deut 6:4) — now describes Israel's response to Joshua's authority. Yet the closing phrase is telling: Israel does 'as the LORD commanded Moses,' not 'as Joshua commanded.' Moses's authority continues to govern even after his death.
10. The eulogy that closes the Torah is written from a later perspective — 'no prophet has arisen since' (velo-qam navi od) presupposes a long period of history after Moses. The defining characteristic is not Moses's miracles (those come in v11-12) but his relationship: asher yeda'o YHWH panim el panim ('whom the LORD knew face to face'). The verb is yada ('knew') — God knew Moses, not merely Moses knew God. The intimacy is mutual. This echoes Exodus 33:11 ('the LORD would speak to Moses face to face, as a man speaks to his friend') and Numbers 12:8 ('mouth to mouth I speak with him').
11. The eulogy shifts from relationship (v10) to action (v11-12). The signs and wonders (otot umoftim) refer to the ten plagues and the exodus — the largest concentration of divine power through a human agent in the Hebrew Bible. The verb shlakho ('sent him') emphasizes that Moses was God's commissioned agent, not an independent wonder-worker. The comprehensive targeting — Pharaoh, his officials, his entire land — recapitulates the scope of the exodus narrative.
12. The Torah ends with four final words: le'einei kol-Yisrael — 'before the eyes of all Israel.' The last image is not of Moses alone on a mountain but of Moses acting before his people. The 'mighty hand' (hayyad hachazaqah) is Deuteronomy's characteristic phrase for God's power in the exodus, here attributed to Moses as God's instrument. The 'great and awesome deeds' (hamora haggadol) — mora carries the sense of awe-inspiring, terrifying acts of power. The Pentateuch closes not with a period but with an open gesture: Moses's legacy is what Israel witnessed, and what they will carry into the land without him.

Joshua

Summary: After Moses's death, God commissions Joshua to lead Israel across the Jordan, commanding him to be strong and courageous. Joshua orders the people to prepare provisions and reminds the Transjordan tribes of their commitment.

What Makes This Remarkable: The phrase chazaq ve'emats ('be strong and courageous') appears three times in God's speech to Joshua (vv. 6, 7, 9) and once from the people back to Joshua (v. 18). The repetition is structural: courage is not assumed but commanded, and it is rooted in the promise of divine presence, not in military capability. The book's first word — 'after the death of Moses' — signals a permanent transition: the Torah is complete, and now comes the test of whether Israel can live by it.

Translation Friction: The phrase sefer haTorah hazzeh (v. 8, 'this book of the Law') is the first reference to the Torah as a written text that must be meditated upon. We rendered hagah (v. 8) as 'meditate' — the word implies murmuring or reciting aloud, not silent contemplation. The Hebrew concept of meditation is oral, not mental. The verb hitsliach (v. 8, 'prosper/succeed') links obedience to outcome in a way that the wisdom tradition will later complicate (Job, Ecclesiastes).

Connections: The commissioning echoes Deuteronomy 31:7-8, 23. The phrase 'every place the sole of your foot treads' (v. 3) quotes Deuteronomy 11:24. The Transjordan tribes' pledge (v. 16-18) will be tested in Joshua 22. The strong-and-courageous formula recurs in 1 Chronicles 22:13 and 28:20 for Solomon's temple-building.

¹After the death of Moses the servant of the LORD, the LORD said to Joshua son of Nun, Moses's attendant: ²"Moses my servant is dead. Now rise up and cross this Jordan — you and all this people — into the land that I am giving to the Israelites. ³Every place where you set foot, I have given to you — just as I promised Moses. ⁴From the wilderness to this Lebanon, as far as the great river — the Euphrates — all the land of the Hittites, and to the Great Sea toward the setting sun: this will be your territory. ⁵No one will be able to stand against you all the days of your life. Just as I was with Moses, I will be with you. I will not let you down, and I will not abandon you. ⁶Be strong and courageous, because you will lead this people to inherit the land that I swore to their ancestors to give them. ⁷Only be strong and very courageous — careful to obey all the instruction that Moses my servant commanded you. Do not turn from it to the right or to the left, so that you may succeed wherever you go. ⁸This book of the instruction must never leave your lips — recite it day and night so that you are careful to do everything written in it. Then you will make your path prosperous, and then you will succeed. ⁹Have I not commanded you? Be strong and courageous! Do not be terrified, and do not lose heart, for the LORD your God is with you wherever you go." ¹⁰Then Joshua gave orders to the officers of the people: ¹¹"Go through the camp and command the people: 'Prepare provisions for yourselves, because within three days you will be crossing this Jordan to go in and take possession of the land that the LORD your God is giving you to possess.'" ¹²To the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh, Joshua said: ¹³"Remember what Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you: 'The LORD your God is granting you rest and has given you this land.'" ¹⁴Your wives, your children, and your livestock may stay in the land that Moses gave you east of the Jordan, but you must cross over ahead of your brothers in battle formation — every fighting man — and help them, ¹⁵until the LORD grants your brothers rest just as he has granted you, and they too have taken possession of the land that the LORD your God is giving them. Then you may return to the land of your own possession and settle in it — the land that Moses the servant of the LORD gave you east of the Jordan, toward the sunrise." ¹⁶They answered Joshua, "Everything you have commanded us, we will do. Wherever you send us, we will go. ¹⁷Just as we obeyed Moses in everything, so we will obey you — if only the LORD your God is with you as he was with Moses. ¹⁸Anyone who defies your orders and does not obey your words — whatever you command — will be put to death. Only be strong and courageous!"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening vayyehi acharei mot ('and it was after the death of') is a standard Hebrew narrative transition, linking Joshua directly to the close of Deuteronomy. The book begins not with a new story but with the continuation of an unfinished one — the land promise remains unfulfilled at Moses's death.
1. The term mesharet ('attendant, minister') is distinct from eved ('servant, slave'). A mesharet serves in close personal proximity — Joshua was Moses's trusted aide and protégé, not a subordinate in a hierarchical chain. The same term describes Samuel's service to Eli (1 Samuel 2:11) and angelic service before God (Psalm 104:4). Moses is called eved YHWH ('servant of the LORD'), a title of covenant honor; Joshua is mesharet Mosheh ('attendant of Moses'), marking him as the apprentice now stepping into the master's role.
2. The declaration Mosheh avdi met ('Moses my servant is dead') is blunt and unsentimental — three words in Hebrew that close an era. God does not eulogize Moses; He announces the succession. The possessive avdi ('my servant') maintains the covenant honor even in the death notice.
2. The participle noten ('giving') is present tense — God is actively in the process of giving the land. This is not a past act recalled but an ongoing divine action unfolding in real time. The land is simultaneously gift (God gives it) and task (Israel must cross over and take it).
2. Ha-yarden ha-zeh ('this Jordan') with the demonstrative pronoun suggests proximity — Joshua can see the river. The Jordan is not an abstract boundary but a visible, physical barrier between promise and fulfillment.
3. This verse directly echoes Deuteronomy 11:24, where Moses relayed the same divine promise. The phrase kaf raglekhem ('the sole of your foot') creates a vivid image: the land becomes Israel's one footstep at a time. Possession requires physical presence — the gift must be walked into, not merely claimed from a distance.
3. The verb n'tattiv ('I have given it') is in the perfect tense — in God's reckoning, the gift is already completed before Israel takes a single step across the Jordan. The conquest narrative that fills the rest of Joshua is not Israel earning the land but Israel receiving what God has already granted. The tension between divine gift (perfect tense) and human action (crossing, fighting, settling) is central to the theology of the book.
4. The boundaries described here correspond to the land grant of Genesis 15:18-21, the covenant with Abraham. The four compass points define the maximum extent of the promise: wilderness (Negev) to the south, Lebanon to the north, the Euphrates to the east, and the Mediterranean ('the Great Sea,' ha-yam ha-gadol) to the west. Israel under Joshua never fully controlled this entire territory; the broadest historical extent was achieved under Solomon (1 Kings 4:21).
4. Erets ha-chittim ('land of the Hittites') likely refers broadly to the territory formerly dominated by the Hittite empire in Syria and southern Anatolia. By Joshua's era the Hittite empire had collapsed, but the geographic designation persisted. Some scholars suggest it may refer to a more localized Hittite population in Canaan.
4. Gevul ('territory, border, boundary') is a key term throughout Joshua's land allotment sections (chapters 13-19). Here it establishes the total scope of the divine land grant before the first battle is fought.
5. The verb yityatsev ('to take a stand, to position oneself against') is reflexive — no one will successfully mount a stand against Joshua. This is a military guarantee framed in personal terms: kol yemei chayyekha ('all the days of your life') makes it lifelong, not situational.
5. The parallel ka'asher hayiti im Mosheh ehyeh immakh ('as I was with Moses, I will be with you') establishes the theological basis for the Mosaic succession. What transfers is not Moses's skill or charisma but God's presence — the same divine companionship, not merely divine approval.

5. The pair lo arpekha ve-lo e'ezvekka ('I will not let you go and I will not abandon you') forms a double negative for emphasis. The verb raphah ('to let go, to slacken one's grip') and azav ('to abandon, to forsake') cover both gradual disengagement and sudden departure — God will neither slowly loosen His hold nor abruptly walk away. This pair is quoted in Hebrews 13:5 as a promise extended to all believers.
6. First occurrence of the keynote phrase chazaq ve'ematz ('be strong and courageous'). This identical command appears in Deuteronomy 31:7 (Moses to Joshua before all Israel), Deuteronomy 31:23 (God to Joshua directly), and now three times from God in this chapter (vv. 6, 7, 9), with a fourth from the people (v. 18). The fourfold repetition in chapter 1 alone signals the weight of the task and the depth of reassurance Joshua needs as he steps into Moses's role.
6. The verb tanchil (hiphil of nachal) means 'to cause to inherit, to apportion as an inheritance.' Joshua's function is not merely to conquer but to distribute — he gives the people their nachalah. This verb reappears throughout chapters 13-21 as the allotment process unfolds.
6. Nishba'ti la'avotam ('I swore to their ancestors') anchors the entire conquest in the patriarchal oath. The land promise rests on divine oath (shevu'ah), not merely divine intention — God has bound Himself by His own word. The ancestors in view are Abraham (Genesis 15:18-21), Isaac (Genesis 26:3), and Jacob (Genesis 28:13).
7. Second occurrence of chazaq ve'ematz, now intensified with me'od ('very, exceedingly'). The critical shift: verse 6 tied courage to the military task of land allotment; verse 7 ties courage to Torah obedience. In Joshua's theology, the harder task is not fighting Canaanites but maintaining covenant faithfulness. The raq ('only') at the beginning marks this as the essential condition.
7. The idiom al tasur mimmenu yamin us'mol ('do not turn from it right or left') pictures a traveler on a straight path — the Torah is the road, and any deviation leads away from God's purpose. This image recurs throughout Deuteronomy (5:32; 17:11, 20; 28:14) and appears to be a signature phrase of the Deuteronomic tradition.
7. The verb taskil (from the root sakal) carries both intellectual and practical dimensions — 'to have insight, to act wisely, to prosper.' It implies not just favorable outcomes but wisdom expressed through effective action. Success in Joshua is not luck or military genius but the natural consequence of Torah-shaped living.
8. This verse is programmatic for the entire book of Joshua and is foundational to the biblical concept of meditation. The verb hagita (from the root hagah) does not mean silent contemplation in the modern Western sense — it means to murmur, recite aloud, moan over. Torah meditation is vocal and physical: the text is meant to be spoken, rehearsed, and internalized through repetition on the lips. Psalm 1:2 uses nearly identical language (u-v'torato yehgeh yomam va-lailah, 'on his instruction he meditates day and night'), creating a direct literary connection between Joshua's commissioning and the ideal of the righteous person in the Psalter.
8. The phrase sefer ha-torah ha-zeh ('this book of the instruction') implies a written, codified text already in existence — Moses's teaching has been set down and can be read, recited, and obeyed. Lo yamush mipikha ('must not depart from your lips') reinforces the oral dimension: the Torah should be constantly spoken and discussed, not merely stored on a scroll.
8. The pair tatsliacha ('make prosperous,' from tsalach) and taskil ('succeed/act wisely,' from sakal) doubles the promise of verse 7. Both verbs link prosperity and wisdom exclusively to Torah faithfulness — military strategy is irrelevant apart from covenant obedience. This verse effectively makes the book of Joshua a test case for the Deuteronomic principle: obey and prosper, disobey and fail.
9. Third and final occurrence of chazaq ve'ematz from God, now framed as a rhetorical question: halo tsivvitikha ('Have I not commanded you?'). The question form transforms encouragement into obligation — courage is not a suggestion but a divine command. To give in to fear would be disobedience.
9. The pair al ta'arots ve'al techat uses two distinct Hebrew words for fear: arats denotes visceral dread or terror (the gut-level reaction to overwhelming threat), while chatat denotes discouragement, loss of nerve, being shattered in resolve. Together they address both the emotional and the volitional dimensions of fear — God commands Joshua to resist both the feeling and the collapse.
9. The closing clause ki immekha YHWH Elohekha ('for the LORD your God is with you') provides the sole ground for all three courage commands in this chapter. Joshua's strength does not come from his own capacity, his military experience, or the size of his forces — it comes entirely from the divine presence. The same theological logic will drive every victory and explain every defeat throughout the book.
10. The shot'rim ('officers') were administrative officials responsible for organization and communication, not military commanders (those are designated by other terms such as sar or nasi). The root shatar is likely related to writing or record-keeping. These officials appear in Exodus 5:6-19 as the Israelite foremen under Egyptian taskmasters and in Deuteronomy 20:5-9 as those who organize the militia before battle. Joshua immediately exercises the command authority God has just conferred — the narrative moves without delay from divine commissioning to human action.
11. The verb la-reshet (from yarash, 'to take possession, to dispossess') appears twice in this verse — as an infinitive of purpose ('to take possession') and in a possessive construction ('to possess'). This repetition underscores that crossing the Jordan is not mere relocation but a legal and theological act of claiming divinely granted territory. The verb yarash carries the dual sense of receiving an inheritance and displacing the current occupants — this duality runs throughout Joshua and the notes should not flatten it.
11. Tseidah ('provisions, food supplies') is practical preparation — dried food, bread, portable supplies for the march. The manna had not yet ceased (it continues until Joshua 5:12), but the text signals a transition from miraculous sustenance to ordinary human provision.

11. Sh'loshet yamim ('three days') sets the narrative clock and creates urgency. This three-day timeframe connects to the spy mission in chapter 2 and to the three-day preparation period before the Jordan crossing in 3:2. The number three carries its own narrative weight — a period of preparation before a decisive event.
12. These three groups had received their territorial allotment east of the Jordan under Moses (Numbers 32; Deuteronomy 3:12-20). Their situation is unique in Israel: they already possess their land but are obligated to cross the Jordan and fight alongside the other tribes before settling permanently. Joshua addresses them separately because their covenant obligation differs — they must fight for land that will not be theirs. This arrangement will remain a source of tension (see chapter 22, the altar controversy).
13. The command zakhor ('remember') carries theological weight throughout the Hebrew Bible — remembering is not merely cognitive recall but active covenant obligation. To 'remember' is to act on what one knows. Joshua calls these tribes to honor the terms of the agreement they made with Moses in Numbers 32.
13. Meniach lakhem ('granting you rest') uses the hiphil of nuach, a theologically loaded concept in Joshua. God gives menukhah ('rest') — settled, secure, peaceful possession of land, free from enemies and anxiety. This promise of rest runs through Joshua (cf. 21:44; 22:4; 23:1) and becomes a theological metaphor in Hebrews 3-4, where the 'rest' of the promised land points to a greater rest. The present participle meniach suggests the rest is ongoing — God is actively establishing it.
13. This verse echoes Deuteronomy 3:18-20, where Moses gave the original command. Joshua claims Mosaic authority: he does not issue new orders but enforces existing ones. His legitimacy rests on continuity with Moses.
14. The term chamushim is debated among scholars. It may mean 'armed, equipped for battle' or 'in ranks of five' (from chamesh, 'five'), indicating a specific military formation. The same word appears in Exodus 13:18 to describe Israel leaving Egypt, creating a deliberate structural parallel between the Red Sea crossing and the Jordan crossing — both are divine deliverances, both are ordered marches, and both lead to a new phase of covenant history.
14. Gibborei ha-chayil ('mighty men of valor, fighting men') is a technical term for the warrior class — men of demonstrated military capability and courage. The phrase recurs throughout Joshua, Judges, and Samuel as a standard designation for Israel's fighting force.
14. Lifnei acheikhem ('ahead of your brothers') is significant for two reasons: the eastern tribes must serve as the vanguard (not the rear guard), bearing the first risk; and the designation 'brothers' (achim) rather than 'the other tribes' underscores the unity of all Israel. They fight not for strangers but for family.
15. Yaniach (hiphil of nuach, 'grant rest') echoes verse 13 but extends the concept: the eastern tribes' own rest is incomplete until their brothers across the Jordan also possess rest. Rest in Joshua is communal, not individualistic — no tribe's settlement is secure while others remain landless. This theology of mutual obligation will be tested in chapter 22.
15. The phrase mizrach ha-shemesh ('toward the sunrise') is a vivid directional marker — literally 'the rising of the sun.' It is more poetic than the prosaic qedmah ('eastward') and places the reader in the landscape, facing the dawn.
15. Yarash appears twice more in this verse: yarsh'u ('they have taken possession') and virishtem otah ('you settle in it'). The noun yerushah ('possession') is a related form marking the eastern tribes' already-received grant. The repetition of possession language in various forms across this verse and verse 11 creates a drumbeat: the land is being given, the land must be possessed, the land will be settled. Divine grant and human action are inseparable.
16. The eastern tribes' response is total and unconditional: kol asher tsivvitanu na'aseh ('everything you commanded, we will do'). This language deliberately echoes Israel's covenant pledge at Sinai — kol asher dibber YHWH na'aseh ('everything the LORD has spoken, we will do,' Exodus 19:8; 24:3, 7). By placing this Sinai-like pledge on the lips of the eastern tribes in response to Joshua, the narrative positions Joshua's commissioning as a covenant-renewal moment. To obey Joshua is to uphold the Sinai covenant.
16. The pair na'aseh ('we will do') and nelekh ('we will go') covers both action and movement — they will obey his commands and deploy wherever he sends them. There is no negotiation, no reservation, no qualifying condition in this verse. The conditions come in verse 17.
17. The pledge k'kol asher shama'nu el Mosheh ('just as we obeyed Moses in everything') is historically ironic. Israel's track record of obedience to Moses was spectacularly uneven — they grumbled about water (Exodus 17:2-3), built the golden calf (Exodus 32), rejected the land at Kadesh-barnea (Numbers 14), and rebelled repeatedly throughout the wilderness period. The statement functions as aspirational commitment rather than accurate historical summary. The narrative does not comment on the irony, but a reader of the Pentateuch would notice it.
17. The conditional raq yihyeh YHWH Elohekha immakh ('if only the LORD your God is with you') mirrors God's own promise in verse 5. The people's condition for obedience is precisely what God has already guaranteed. There is an undertone of both loyalty and shrewd assessment: they will follow Joshua as they followed Moses, provided Joshua carries the same divine mandate. The legitimacy of leadership in Israel rests not on human authority but on divine presence.
18. The verb yamreh ('rebels, defies') from the root marah is the same verb used for Israel's rebellion against God and Moses in the wilderness (Numbers 20:10, 24; 27:14; Deuteronomy 1:26, 43; 9:23). By applying this covenant-rebellion term to disobedience against Joshua, the people effectively place him in the Mosaic succession: to defy Joshua's command is to rebel against the one God has appointed, which is functionally to rebel against God. This is a theological statement about authority, not merely a military code of discipline.

18. The death penalty for insubordination (yumatz, 'he will be put to death') echoes Deuteronomy 17:12, which prescribes death for defying the judge or priest who mediates God's decision. The severity reflects the nature of the moment — this is a sacred military campaign under divine mandate, not a democratic assembly.
18. Fourth and final occurrence of chazaq ve'ematz in this chapter, now spoken by the people to Joshua. The exhortation has come full circle: God to Joshua (vv. 6, 7, 9), the people to Joshua (v. 18). What began as divine command ends as communal encouragement — leader and people mutually reinforcing covenant courage. This structural inclusio frames the entire chapter as a commissioning ceremony.

Summary: Joshua sends two spies into Jericho. Rahab the prostitute hides them, confesses that the LORD has given Israel the land, and negotiates protection for her family with a scarlet cord.

What Makes This Remarkable: Rahab's confession (vv. 9-11) is a theological earthquake: a Canaanite prostitute articulates Israel's creed — 'the LORD your God is God in heaven above and on earth below.' She has heard what Israel's own generation doubted (Numbers 13-14). The scarlet cord (v. 18, tikvat chut hashani) may carry a secondary meaning: tikvah means both 'cord' and 'hope.' Rahab's lifeline is literally her hope.

Translation Friction: The verb vatitspenom (v. 4, 'she hid them') uses an unusual form that may suggest she had already hidden them before the king's messengers arrived. We rendered the sequence as the Hebrew presents it. Rahab's lie to the king's men (v. 4-5) raises an ethical question the text does not resolve — we noted the interpretive tension without resolving it, as the Hebrew narrator offers no moral comment.

Connections: Rahab enters the genealogy of Jesus (Matthew 1:5). Her faith is cited in Hebrews 11:31 and James 2:25. The spy narrative echoes Numbers 13 but with a different outcome. The scarlet cord resonates with the Passover blood on the doorposts (Exodus 12:7, 13) — both mark a household for preservation amid destruction.

1Joshua son of Nun secretly sent two men as scouts from Shittim, telling them, "Go, survey the land — especially Jericho." They went and entered the house of a prostitute named Rahab, and spent the night there. 2It was reported to the king of Jericho: "Israelite men have come here tonight to spy out the land." 3The king of Jericho sent word to Rahab: "Hand over the men who came to you — who entered your house — because they have come to spy out the entire land." 4But the woman had already taken the two men and hidden them. She said, "Yes, the men did come to me, but I did not know where they were from. 5At dark, when the gate was about to close, the men left. I do not know which direction they went. Go after them quickly — you can still catch them!" 6In fact, she had brought them up to the roof and hidden them under the stalks of flax that she had spread out on the rooftop. 7The pursuers chased after them on the road toward the Jordan, as far as the fording places. As soon as the pursuers had gone out, the gate was shut. 8Before they had fallen asleep, Rahab went up to them on the roof 9and said to the men, "I know that the LORD has given you the land, that the dread of you has fallen on us, and that all who live in this land are melting in fear before you. 10For we have heard how the LORD dried up the waters of the Sea of Reeds before you when you came out of Egypt, and what you did to the two Amorite kings east of the Jordan — Sihon and Og — whom you devoted to destruction. 11When we heard this, our hearts sank and no one had any courage left because of you — for the LORD your God is God in the heavens above and on the earth below." 12Now then, I ask you — swear to me by the LORD, since I have shown you faithful love, that you will also show faithful love to my father's household. Give me a sure sign 13that you will spare my father, my mother, my brothers, my sisters, and everyone who belongs to them — and save our lives from death." 14The men said to her, "Our lives for yours — if you do not reveal our mission. When the LORD gives us the land, we will deal with you in faithful love and good faith." 15Then she lowered them by a rope through the window, because her house was built into the city wall — she lived within the wall itself. 16She told them, "Head for the hills so the pursuers do not find you. Hide there for three days until the pursuers have come back, and after that go on your way." 17The men said to her, "We will be released from this oath of yours that you made us swear 18unless, when we enter the land, you tie this scarlet cord in the window through which you lowered us. You must gather your father, your mother, your brothers, and all your father's household into the house with you. 19Anyone who goes out through the doors of your house into the street — his blood will be on his own head, and we will be free of guilt. But anyone who is with you inside the house — his blood will be on our heads if a hand is laid on him. ²⁰And if you reveal our mission, we will be released from the oath you made us swear." ²¹She said, "Agreed — let it be as you say." Then she sent them off, and they left. And she tied the scarlet cord in the window. ²²They went into the hills and stayed there for three days until the pursuers had returned. The pursuers searched the entire road but found no trace of them. ²³Then the two men came back down from the hills, crossed over the Jordan, and reported to Joshua son of Nun everything that had happened to them. ²⁴They said to Joshua, "The LORD has certainly given the entire land into our hands — all who live in the land are melting in fear before us."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase meraggelim cheresh ('scouts secretly') — the secrecy distinguishes this mission from the earlier, public spy mission of Numbers 13, which ended in national disaster. Joshua, who was one of the two faithful scouts in that earlier mission (Numbers 14:6-9), now sends his own men covertly. The narrative invites comparison: will this spy mission succeed where the last one failed?
1. Zonah ('prostitute') is unambiguous in Hebrew. Some later traditions, including the Aramaic Targum, attempted to soften this to 'innkeeper' (based on a secondary meaning of the root zun, 'to feed/provision'), but the Hebrew Bible consistently uses zonah for a prostitute. The text states Rahab's profession without moral commentary — her social marginality is precisely what makes her theological role so striking.
1. Vayyishk'vu shammah ('and they lay down there') — the verb shakav here means simply 'lodged, spent the night,' not a sexual euphemism. The context is espionage, not immorality. Shittim (ha-shittim, 'the acacias') was Israel's last encampment east of the Jordan (Numbers 25:1; 33:49).
2. The verb lachpor ('to dig, to search out, to spy') from the root chaphar literally means to dig, used metaphorically for probing or investigating. It is more aggressive than the neutral re'u ('survey') that Joshua used in verse 1. The king's informant characterizes the mission as hostile espionage — the same activity, described by different parties, reveals different perspectives.
2. The rapid intelligence to the king indicates Jericho's surveillance was active — strangers were noticed quickly. This heightens the danger for the spies and the risk Rahab takes in sheltering them.
3. Hotsi'i ('bring out, hand over') is a feminine singular imperative — the king issues a direct command, not a request. Rahab now faces the choice that defines her: obey the king of her own city or protect agents of the God she has come to recognize.
3. The phrase ha-ba'im eleikha ('who came to you') may carry a sexual innuendo in context, as the verb bo can mean 'to come to' in an intimate sense. Whether the king intends this double meaning or it is simply the narrator's irony, the text does not resolve.
4. Vattitspenno ('and she hid him') uses a singular pronominal suffix despite two men being involved. This may reflect a textual variant, a collective singular, or an early copying error — some manuscripts read the plural form. The Septuagint renders it as plural.
4. Rahab's deception is presented without moral commentary by the narrator. She confirms the men's visit but claims ignorance of their origin. The Hebrew Bible records lies by significant figures (Abraham in Genesis 12:13, 20:2; Jacob in Genesis 27:19) without explicit editorial judgment, leaving the ethical assessment to the reader. Later biblical tradition praises Rahab for her faith expressed through harboring the spies (Hebrews 11:31; James 2:25) while remaining silent on the deception itself.
5. Rahab's lie is tactically sophisticated. She provides a plausible timeline (they left at nightfall before the gate closed), a convincing gap in her knowledge (she does not know their direction), and an urgent directive (ridfu maher, 'pursue quickly'). The urgency she manufactures sends the king's men out of the city and buys time for the spies on her roof.
5. Ha-sha'ar lisgor ba-choshekh ('the gate about to close at dark') — ancient walled cities routinely closed their gates at nightfall for security. Rahab exploits this known practice to make her cover story plausible. The detail also sets up the narrative irony of verse 7: the gate closes behind the pursuers, locking them out and the spies safely in.
6. Pishte ha-ets ('stalks of flax,' literally 'flax of the tree/wood') refers to flax in its raw, woody state before processing. Flax was harvested in spring and laid out on flat rooftops to dry — a common agricultural practice in the ancient Near East. This incidental detail confirms the spring harvest season, consistent with the Passover timing in Joshua 5:10.
6. The flax on Rahab's roof suggests she was involved in textile production (flax is processed into linen). Some scholars see this as evidence that her 'house' may have functioned partly as a workshop, which could have provided a plausible reason for strangers to visit — useful cover for the spies.
7. Ha-ma'b'rot ('the fording places, the crossing points') were the shallow stretches where the Jordan could be crossed on foot — the obvious route for Israelite spies returning to camp. The pursuit logic is sound but misdirected. Rahab has sent the king's men east toward the river while the spies remain safely on her roof, inside the locked city.
7. The gate shutting (ha-sha'ar sag'ru) behind the pursuers creates dramatic irony: the city that should be protecting itself from Israelite agents has just locked itself in with them. Jericho's own security measures now serve Rahab's plan.
8. Terem yishkavun ('before they lay down') — the archaic verbal suffix -un appears in several forms in Joshua and may reflect older poetic or narrative style. The timing is narratively significant: Rahab speaks before the men sleep, indicating urgency and deliberation. What she is about to say in verses

9-13 is not improvised — it is a carefully prepared theological statement and a negotiated covenant.

9. Rahab's confession opens with yada'ti ki natan YHWH lakhem et ha-arets ('I know that the LORD has given you the land') — a statement of extraordinary theological weight from a Canaanite. She uses the divine name YHWH (not a Canaanite deity name), she recognizes the divine gift of the land (echoing God's own words in 1:2-3), and she places herself among the already-defeated before any battle has been fought. This is a gentile's theology of the conquest, and it will be echoed almost verbatim by the spies in their report to Joshua (v. 24).
9. Naflah eimatkhem aleinu ('the dread of you has fallen on us') echoes the language of the Song of the Sea in Exodus 15:16 (tipol alehem eimatah va-fachad, 'dread and fear shall fall on them'). Rahab is confirming that the exodus accomplished precisely what that victory song predicted — the terror of YHWH's acts has reached Canaan's interior.
9. Namogu ('they are melting') — the verb mug means to melt, to dissolve, to lose all structural integrity. It describes the total collapse of morale across Canaan. The conquest begins not with Israelite military strength but with the prior collapse of Canaanite resolve.
10. Yam Suf ('Sea of Reeds') — rendered as 'Sea of Reeds' rather than the traditional 'Red Sea.' The Hebrew suf means 'reeds, rushes,' not 'red.' The identification with the modern Red Sea comes through the Greek Septuagint (erythra thalassa). The exact location of the crossing remains debated among scholars.
10. Hecharamtem otam ('you devoted them to destruction') — this is the first appearance of the root ch-r-m (cherem) in Joshua, and remarkably it comes not from an Israelite narrator but from a Canaanite witness. Rahab knows what cherem means — total, sacred destruction. The concept was not unique to Israel; similar practices of dedicating enemies entirely to a deity are attested in Moabite and other ancient Near Eastern sources (notably the Mesha Stele).
10. Rahab's evidence cites two categories of divine action: power over nature (drying up the sea) and power in war (defeating Sihon and Og). These are precisely the two types of evidence that would carry weight in the ancient Near Eastern worldview, where a deity's power was measured by visible acts in the world.
11. Vayyimmas l'avenu ('our hearts melted') — the verb masas describes complete dissolution. Combined with lo qamah od ruach be'ish ('no spirit/courage rose in anyone'), Rahab testifies to the total psychological defeat of Jericho before any siege begins. The military conquest is preceded by — and arguably made possible by — this internal collapse of will.
11. Rahab's confession reaches its theological climax: YHWH Eloheikhem hu Elohim bashamayim mimma'al ve'al ha-arets mittachat ('the LORD your God is God in the heavens above and on the earth below'). This is a confession of universal divine sovereignty — not merely that YHWH is powerful, but that He is God, period. The language echoes Deuteronomy 4:39, Moses's own formulation. A Canaanite prostitute has arrived at the core confession of Israelite faith — a theological achievement that Israel itself repeatedly failed to sustain.
11. The narrative significance is profound: God's reputation precedes His army. The conquest is already accomplished in the hearts of Canaan's people before Israel crosses the Jordan. Rahab represents a Canaanite who draws the right conclusion from the evidence — faith, in the form of active response to what she has heard about YHWH.
12. Chesed appears twice in this verse — asiti immakhem chesed ('I have done chesed with you') and va'asitem gam attem im beit avi chesed ('you also will do chesed with my father's house'). This is covenantal reciprocity: Rahab has demonstrated covenant loyalty by protecting the spies, and she now claims the right to receive it in return. The term chesed in the mouth of a Canaanite is theologically remarkable — she uses Israel's own covenant vocabulary to bind Israel to her.
12. Hishav'u na li ba-YHWH ('swear to me by the LORD') — Rahab demands an oath in YHWH's name, not in the name of any Canaanite deity. She binds the spies by the very God whose sovereignty she has just confessed. The oath by YHWH makes the agreement a sacred commitment, not merely a tactical bargain.
12. Ot emet ('a sign of truth/faithfulness, a sure sign') — Rahab wants something tangible and verifiable, not a verbal promise alone. This will be answered in verse 18 with the scarlet cord. The word emet ('truth, reliability') demands a sign that can be trusted — one that will actually function when the moment comes.
13. V'hachayitem ('and you will keep alive') — the hiphil of chayah means to cause to live, to preserve life. In a context where cherem (sacred destruction) is the expected fate of Jericho's population, Rahab negotiates an exception for her entire family. The scope is precisely defined: father, mother, brothers, sisters, and all who belong to them. When Jericho falls in chapter 6:23, this exact list will be honored.
13. V'hitsaltem et nafshoteinu mimmavet ('and rescue our lives from death') — nephesh here means the living self, the person at risk of dying. Rahab is not asking for property rights, citizenship, or status within Israel — she is asking simply to survive. The minimalism of the request underscores its urgency.
14. Nafshenu tachteikhem lamut ('our lives in place of yours to the death') — the spies pledge their own lives as surety for Rahab's family. The preposition tachat ('in place of, instead of') creates a substitutionary pledge: if they fail to protect her, they forfeit their own lives. This is covenant-binding language of the most serious kind.
14. Chesed ve'emet ('faithful love and good faith') — the pairing of chesed with emet is the fullest expression of covenant reliability in Hebrew. Emet means truth, faithfulness, reliability — it guarantees that the chesed will actually be carried out. This paired phrase appears in God's self-revelation at Sinai (Exodus 34:6, rav chesed ve'emet, 'abounding in faithful love and truth') and in human covenant pledges (Genesis 24:49; 47:29; 2 Samuel 2:6). The spies respond to Rahab's covenant language with equally binding covenant language.

14. The condition im lo taggidu et d'varenu zeh ('if you do not reveal our mission') limits Rahab's obligation to secrecy — she must keep quiet, not take further active steps. The oath is conditional and bilateral: both parties have obligations.
15. Ba-chevel be'ad ha-challon ('by a rope through the window') — the same method of escape used by Michal for David (1 Samuel 19:12) and referenced for Paul (Acts 9:25; 2 Corinthians 11:33). The window in the outer wall is both Rahab's vulnerability and her strategic advantage — it faces outside the city, providing the only route of escape that bypasses the sealed gate.
15. Beitah b'qir ha-chomah u-va-chomah hi yoshevet ('her house was in the wall of the wall and in the wall she was dwelling') — archaeological evidence from Jericho and other Canaanite cities confirms that houses were built into casemate walls, with the outer fortification wall serving as one wall of the house. Rahab's position is literally marginal — on the boundary between inside and outside the city — which mirrors her social position and anticipates her theological position: she is a Canaanite who belongs to Israel.
16. Ha-harah ('toward the hill country') — the limestone hills west of Jericho, riddled with caves and rocky terrain ideal for concealment. Rahab sends the spies in the opposite direction from the pursuers, who have gone east toward the Jordan fording places. Her tactical thinking throughout this episode is consistently sharp.
16. Sh'loshet yamim ('three days') parallels the three-day preparation period announced in 1:11. The narrative creates parallel countdowns that will converge: three days for the camp to prepare, three days for the spies to return. Rahab's intimate knowledge of the pursuit timetable — she knows the pursuers will return in three days — further demonstrates her intelligence and reliability as an ally.
17. N'qiyim anachnu ('we are free/innocent/released') — the spies now stipulate the conditions under which their oath remains binding. The legal precision is striking: even while dangling from a rope outside a city wall, the terms of the covenant agreement must be clearly defined. The oath is attributed to Rahab (mishvu'atekh, 'your oath') — she initiated it in verse 12, and the spies now set its boundaries.
18. Tiqvat chut ha-shani ('cord of scarlet thread') — the word tiqvah means both 'cord, rope' and 'hope' (from the root qavah, 'to wait, to hope'). The wordplay may be intentional: the scarlet cord is literally Rahab's hope. The scarlet color (shani) has prompted extensive typological commentary connecting it to the blood of the Passover lamb on the doorposts (Exodus 12:7, 13). Whether the narrator intends this parallel or it emerges naturally from the literary pattern, the structural similarity is striking: a visible marker on the dwelling, protection for everyone inside, destruction for those outside.
18. Ta'asfi eleikha ha-baitah ('gather to yourself into the house') — Rahab becomes the center of her family's salvation. Her house, built into the wall of a doomed city, becomes a sanctuary within the zone of destruction. The Passover parallel is reinforced: just as each Israelite household gathered inside behind the blood-marked door in Egypt, so Rahab's household must gather inside behind the scarlet-marked window in Jericho.
19. Damo v'rosho ('his blood on his head') is a standard biblical formula assigning legal and moral responsibility for a death (cf. 2 Samuel 1:16; 1 Kings 2:37; Ezekiel 33:4). The threshold of the door defines the boundary of protection: inside the house means protected, outside means exposed. This is structurally identical to the Passover logic of Exodus 12:22-23, where the blood on the doorframe marked the boundary between safety and judgment.
19. Im yad tihyeh bo ('if a hand is laid upon him') — the spies accept personal, bloodguilt-level responsibility for any harm that comes to someone inside Rahab's house. The commitment is not abstract — they put their own lives at stake. The oath is precisely bilateral: Rahab's obligations are the cord, the gathering of family, and silence; the spies' obligation is physical protection of everyone under her roof.
20. This final condition restates the secrecy requirement from verse 14 as a formal termination clause. The covenant between Rahab and the spies has three binding conditions: (1) the scarlet cord in the window (v. 18), (2) the family gathered inside the house (v. 18), and (3) silence about the mission (vv. 14, 20). Failure in any one releases the spies from the oath. The legal structure is clear, bilateral, and conditional — this is treaty language, not an informal promise.
21. K'divreikhem ken hu ('according to your words, so it is') — Rahab accepts every condition without negotiation or modification. Her immediate action — tying the cord in the window before the invasion, before she knows when or whether it will come — demonstrates the same faith that the New Testament writers will celebrate: she acts on what she believes to be true about YHWH (Hebrews 11:31; James 2:25).
21. The narrator places vattiqshor et tiqvah ha-shani ba-challon ('she tied the scarlet cord in the window') as the final image of the scene. This structural emphasis gives the act of tying the cord a weight beyond the practical — it is Rahab's public, irreversible declaration. The cord in the window faces outward, visible to anyone approaching the wall. She has broken with Jericho before Jericho falls.
22. The spies follow Rahab's instructions exactly — three days in the hills, then departure. The narrative confirms her reliability: her plan works. The pursuers searched b'kol ha-derekh ('along the entire road') — the Jordan road — but found nothing, because the spies were never on that road. Rahab's misdirection was complete.
22. The three-day wait completes the parallel timeline begun in 1:11. The preparation for crossing and the spy mission converge — Joshua now has both a prepared people and actionable intelligence.
23. Et kol ha-mots'ot otam ('everything that had found/befallen them') — the root matsa ('to find') in the feminine plural participle describes events that 'found' them, a vivid Hebrew idiom for things that happened. Their report would have included Rahab's theological confession, the terms of the agreement, the state of Jericho's morale, and the practical details of the city's defenses — intelligence of both military and theological value.

23. The successful return of these two spies contrasts sharply with the catastrophic spy mission of Numbers 13-14, where ten of twelve scouts brought a faithless report that triggered forty years of wandering. That mission failed because the spies saw only obstacles; this mission succeeds because the spies receive testimony of what God has already accomplished in the hearts of the enemy.
24. The spies' report echoes Rahab's own words almost verbatim: natan YHWH b'yadenu et kol ha-arets ('the LORD has given the whole land into our hands') mirrors her yada'ti ki natan YHWH lakhem et ha-arets ('I know the LORD has given you the land') from verse 9. The military intelligence they deliver to Joshua is essentially Rahab's theology — a Canaanite woman's confession of YHWH's sovereignty becomes the strategic foundation for Israel's campaign.
24. Namogu kol yosh'vei ha-arets mippanenu ('all the inhabitants of the land are melting before us') repeats Rahab's testimony from verse 9 with one shift: mippeneikhem ('before you') becomes mippanenu ('before us'). The spies have internalized Rahab's perspective — they now own her theological assessment as their own.
24. The contrast with Numbers 13:31-33 is total and deliberate. Those spies said 'we are not able to go up against this people, for they are stronger than we' (lo nukhal, Numbers 13:31); these spies say 'the LORD has given the land into our hands.' The difference is not in the military situation but in the theological lens. These spies, informed by a Canaanite woman's faith, see what the earlier generation's spies refused to see: God has already acted.

Summary: The priests carry the ark of the covenant into the Jordan River at flood stage, and the waters stop flowing. All Israel crosses on dry ground, echoing the Red Sea crossing.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Jordan crossing is a deliberate replay of the Exodus: dry ground (charavah, the same word as Exodus 14:21), priests leading with the ark (replacing Moses's staff), and the entire nation passing through divided water. But this generation does what their parents refused to do — they actually enter the land. The timing is precise: the Jordan is at flood stage during harvest (v. 15), making the miracle maximally visible and minimally natural.

Translation Friction: The phrase me'adam ha'ir Adam (v. 16) is textually difficult: 'from Adam, the city that is beside Zarethan.' The waters piled up far upstream, implying a massive stoppage. The city Adam is otherwise unknown. We rendered the geography as given and noted the uncertainty. The ark is called 'the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth' (v. 11) — the title adon kol ha'arets makes a universal claim at the moment of local entry.

Connections: The dry-ground crossing echoes Exodus 14:21-22 and is celebrated in Psalm 114:3-5. The twelve-stone memorial (ch. 4) mirrors the twelve pillars of Exodus 24:4. Elijah and Elisha will cross this same Jordan on dry ground (2 Kings 2:8, 14), forming a prophetic bookend.

1Joshua rose early in the morning, and they set out from Shittim and came to the Jordan — he and all the Israelites — and camped there before crossing. 2At the end of three days, the officers went through the camp 3and commanded the people: "When you see the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God, with the Levitical priests carrying it, then set out from where you are and follow it. 4But keep a distance between yourselves and it — about two thousand cubits — do not come near it, so that you can see the way you are to go. For you have never traveled this way before." 5Joshua told the people, "Consecrate yourselves, for tomorrow the LORD will do wonders among you." 6Then Joshua said to the priests, "Lift up the ark of the covenant and cross ahead of the people." So they lifted the ark of the covenant and went ahead of the people. 7The LORD said to Joshua, "Today I will begin to exalt you in the sight of all Israel, so that they will know that just as I was with Moses, I will be with you. 8Command the priests who carry the ark of the covenant: 'When you reach the edge of the Jordan's waters, stand still in the Jordan.'" 9Then Joshua said to the Israelites, "Come here and listen to the words of the LORD your God. 10Joshua said, "By this you will know that the living God is among you and that he will certainly dispossess before you the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Hivites, the Perizzites, the Girgashites, the Amorites, and the Jebusites: 11Look — the ark of the covenant of the Lord of all the earth is about to cross ahead of you into the Jordan. 12Now then, choose twelve men from the tribes of Israel — one man from each tribe." 13When the soles of the feet of the priests carrying the ark of the LORD — the Lord of all the earth — come to rest in the waters of the Jordan, the waters of the Jordan will be cut off — the waters flowing down from above — and will stand up in a single mass. 14When the people set out from their tents to cross the Jordan, with the priests carrying the ark of the covenant ahead of the people — ¹⁵and when those carrying the ark reached the Jordan, and the feet of the priests carrying the ark were dipped in the edge of the water — now the Jordan overflows all its banks throughout the harvest season — ¹⁶the waters flowing from upstream stood still — they rose up in a single mass far away at Adam, the city near Zarethan — while the waters flowing down toward the Sea of the Arabah (the Salt Sea) were completely cut off. And the people crossed over opposite Jericho. ¹⁷The priests carrying the ark of the covenant of the LORD stood firm on dry ground in the middle of the Jordan while all Israel crossed on dry ground, until the entire nation had finished crossing the Jordan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyashkem Yehoshua ba-boqer ('Joshua rose early in the morning') — the verb hashkim ('to rise early') signals urgency and decisiveness throughout the Hebrew Bible; it frequently introduces moments of divine obedience or military action (cf. Abraham in Genesis 22:3, Moses in Exodus 24:4). Joshua acts at first light.
1. The movement from Shittim to the Jordan covers approximately seven miles across the plains of Moab. Vayyalinu sham ('they camped there') — the entire nation pauses at the river's edge. The narrative builds suspense: they arrive but do not cross. Three days of preparation follow (v. 2).
2. Miqtseh sh'loshet yamim ('at the end of three days') connects to the three-day timeline established in 1:11 and the three-day spy mission of chapter 2. All the narrative threads converge: the spies have returned, the people have prepared, and the moment of crossing has arrived.
2. The shot'rim ('officers') from 1:10 now execute the orders Joshua gave them — the chain of command established in chapter 1 is functioning.
3. Aron berit YHWH Eloheikhem ('the ark of the covenant of the LORD your God') — the ark appears for the first time in Joshua and will dominate chapters 3-6. It is not merely a religious artifact but the visible symbol of God's presence and covenant with Israel. The ark leads the crossing, not Joshua — the theological point is that God goes first into the Jordan, and Israel follows.
3. Ha-kohanim ha-leviyyim ('the Levitical priests,' literally 'the priests, the Levites') — this Deuteronomic designation (cf. Deuteronomy 17:9, 18; 18:1) identifies the priests as members of the tribe of Levi who serve at the ark. They are the authorized bearers of God's covenant presence.
4. K'alpayim ammah ba-middah ('about two thousand cubits by measure') — approximately 3,000 feet or 900 meters. This distance serves dual purposes: it maintains the sacred reverence due to the ark (no one may approach God's presence casually), and it ensures the entire camp can see the ark from a distance and follow its lead through unfamiliar territory.
4. Lo avartem ba-derekh mit'mol shilshom ('you have not passed this way before,' literally 'yesterday or the day before') — the phrase is both practical (they do not know the terrain) and theologically loaded. Israel is entering something genuinely unprecedented. The wilderness wandering is over; a new era begins with this crossing. The ark must lead because no human guide knows this road.
5. Hitqaddashu ('consecrate yourselves') — the hitpa'el of qadash, meaning to set oneself apart, to make oneself ritually ready. This typically involved washing garments, abstaining from sexual contact, and other purification rituals (cf. Exodus 19:10-15 before Sinai). The parallel to Sinai is deliberate: just as Israel consecrated before encountering God at the mountain, they now consecrate before encountering God at the river.
5. Nifla'ot ('wonders, extraordinary things') — from the root pala, meaning acts that surpass normal human capacity. The same term describes God's acts in Egypt (Exodus 3:20; 34:10). Joshua announces that what is about to happen is not military strategy but divine intervention on the scale of the exodus.
6. The command-execution pattern (Joshua commands, the priests obey immediately) mirrors the pattern of chapter 1: God commands Joshua, Joshua commands the officers, the officers obey. The chain of authority flows from God through Joshua to the priests. No one deliberates or questions — the obedience is instant.
6. Ivru lifnei ha-am ('cross ahead of the people') — the ark and its bearers go first. This is not a rearguard religious decoration; the ark leads the column into the water. The structural parallel to the pillar of cloud and fire leading Israel out of Egypt (Exodus 13:21-22) is unmistakable: God's visible presence goes first into danger.
7. Achel gadd'lkha ('I will begin to make you great/exalt you') — God explicitly ties Joshua's authority to the miracle that is about to happen. The Jordan crossing is Joshua's credentialing event, just as the Red Sea crossing credentialled Moses (Exodus 14:31: 'they believed in the LORD and in Moses his servant'). Leadership legitimacy in Israel comes through visible divine endorsement, not human appointment.
7. Ka'asher hayiti im Mosheh ehveh immakh ('as I was with Moses, I will be with you') — this exact phrase from 1:5 now receives public demonstration. What God promised privately to Joshua in chapter 1, He now makes visible to the entire nation. The Jordan crossing is the public proof of the private commission.
8. Ba-yarden ta'amodu ('in the Jordan you shall stand') — the priests must step into the river and stop. They do not walk through; they stand in it while the nation crosses. This requires extraordinary trust: they enter the water before anything happens, standing in a flooding river (v. 15) with only a divine promise that the waters will stop. The obedience precedes the miracle.

8. The instruction echoes the Sinai pattern where Moses had to act before God intervened (lifting his staff over the sea, Exodus 14:16). In the Joshua narrative, the priests fill Moses's role — they are the human agents who step into the impossible before God makes it possible.
9. Goshu hennah v'shim'u ('draw near and listen') — Joshua summons the people to hear divine speech, positioning himself as the mediator of God's word. This is a prophetic and Mosaic role: Joshua speaks God's words, not his own. The phrase divrei YHWH Eloheikhem ('the words of the LORD your God') marks what follows (vv. 10-13) as divine oracle delivered through human voice.
10. El chai ('the living God') — a powerful epithet distinguishing YHWH from the lifeless idols of Canaan. The claim is not merely that God exists but that He is alive — active, present, and intervening in real time. The Jordan crossing will be the proof: a living God does living things.
10. Horesh yorish ('he will certainly dispossess') — an infinitive absolute construction intensifying the verb yarash: God will absolutely, without fail, drive out the current inhabitants. The seven nations listed form the standard catalogue of Canaan's peoples (cf. Deuteronomy 7:1), representing the totality of the opposition. The theological claim is that the Jordan miracle is not an end in itself but a guarantee of what follows — if God can stop a river, He can dispossess nations.
10. B'qirb'khem ('among you, in your midst') — God is not acting from a distance. He is present within the camp, among the people. The ark in their midst is the visible sign of this indwelling presence.
11. Adon kol ha-arets ('the Lord of all the earth') — a title of universal sovereignty. This is not merely the God of Israel but the ruler of all territory, including Canaan. The title appears at this moment because the Jordan crossing stakes a claim: the God crossing this river owns both banks. The Canaanite deities have no jurisdiction because YHWH is Adon kol ha-arets.
11. The phrase hinneh aron ha-berit ('look, the ark of the covenant') draws the eye — Joshua directs the people's attention to the ark as visible proof that God Himself is going first into the water. The ark 'crosses ahead' (over lifneikhem) — God enters the danger before Israel does.
12. Sh'nei asar ish ('twelve men') — one from each tribe, anticipating the memorial stones in chapter 4. The instruction is given before the crossing, though its purpose (the stone memorial) is not explained until afterward (4:2-7). The twelve-man detail reinforces the unity of all Israel: every tribe is represented in this moment, every tribe will carry a stone, and every tribe will share in the memory of what God does here.
13. K'noach kappot raglei ha-kohanim ('when the soles of the feet of the priests rest') — the same phrase kaf regel ('sole of the foot') from 1:3, where God promised 'every place the sole of your foot treads.' The first 'footprint' of possession is not on Canaanite soil but in the Jordan's waters. The priests' feet must touch the water before the miracle begins — faith precedes sight.
13. Yikkaretun ha-mayim ('the waters will be cut off') — the verb karat ('to cut') is the same root used for 'cutting' a covenant (karat berit). The linguistic echo is likely coincidental but theologically resonant: the waters are 'cut' as Israel crosses into covenant fulfillment.
13. Ned echad ('a single heap/mass') — the waters will pile up as a single standing wall. This echoes Exodus 15:8 (nits'vu kh'mo ned, 'they stood up like a heap') from the Song of the Sea. The Jordan crossing deliberately mirrors the Red Sea crossing — the same God performs the same kind of act for the next generation.
14. The narrative shifts from speech to action. Bin'so'a ha-am me'ohalehem ('when the people set out from their tents') marks the beginning of the crossing sequence. The sentence structure (a long protasis) builds suspense — the narrator delays the main clause, piling up details about the people, the priests, and the ark before describing what happens when they reach the water.
15. V'raglei ha-kohanim nitb'lu biqtseh ha-mayim ('the feet of the priests were dipped in the edge of the water') — the verb taval ('to dip') describes the first contact of skin and water. The miracle begins at the moment of touch — not before, not from a safe distance. The priests stepped into a flooding river on nothing but a promise.
15. V'ha-yarden male al kol g'dotav kol y'mei qatsir ('the Jordan was full over all its banks all the days of harvest') — this parenthetical note is devastating understatement. The narrator pauses to inform the reader that this was not a shallow, wadeable stream. The Jordan at spring harvest (March-April, when snowmelt from Mount Hermon swells the river) was at maximum flood stage, overflowing its banks. God did not arrange easy conditions for this miracle — He arranged the hardest possible conditions. The crossing occurs at precisely the moment when the river is most impassable.
16. Qamu ned echad ('they rose up in a single heap/mass') — the promised sign from verse 13 is fulfilled exactly. The waters do not merely stop; they pile up into a standing wall. The visual echo of the Red Sea (Exodus 15:8) is now a lived reality for the new generation.
16. Harcheq me'od be-Adam ha-ir asher mitsad Tsaretan ('far away at Adam, the city near Zarethan') — the city of Adam is located approximately 18 miles (30 km) north of the crossing point near Jericho, at the confluence of the Jabbok and Jordan rivers. The waters backed up for this extraordinary distance, indicating a massive blockage. Some scholars have noted that earthquake-induced mudslides at the narrow clay bluffs near Adam have historically dammed the Jordan (recorded in 1267 CE and 1927 CE), though the text presents this as a divinely timed act, not a natural coincidence.
16. Yam ha-Aravah yam ha-melach ('the Sea of the Arabah, the Salt Sea') — the Dead Sea, identified by two names. The downstream waters drained away completely (tammu nikretu, 'were finished, were cut off'), leaving dry ground for the crossing.
16. Ha-am avru neged Yericho ('the people crossed opposite Jericho') — the crossing point faces Jericho directly. The first Canaanite city to see Israel emerge from the Jordan is the first city that will fall.

17. Be-charavah ('on dry ground') — the same word used for the dry ground through the Red Sea (Exodus 14:21, charavah). The linguistic echo confirms the parallel: what God did for the exodus generation at the sea, He now does for the conquest generation at the river. The two crossings form bookends of the wilderness period.
17. Hakhen ('standing firm, prepared, established') — the priests do not waver. They stand motionless in the center of the riverbed, the ark on their shoulders, while an entire nation files past them on either side. The image is iconic: God's presence (the ark) holds back the waters while God's people walk through.
17. Kol ha-goy ('the entire nation') — the use of goy ('nation') rather than am ('people') or b'nei Yisrael ('Israelites') may emphasize the collective, political identity of Israel at this moment. They enter Canaan not as refugees or wanderers but as a nation taking possession of its territory.

Summary: Joshua commands twelve men to take stones from the Jordan's dry bed and set up a memorial at Gilgal. A second set of stones is placed where the priests stood. The crossing is completed and Israel camps at Gilgal.

What Makes This Remarkable: The memorial stones serve one purpose: to provoke children's questions. 'When your children ask in time to come, What do these stones mean to you?' (v. 6) — the entire monument exists for the next generation's catechetical moment. Israel's theology is transmitted not through abstract instruction but through objects that demand explanation. The phrase 'on dry ground' (bayyabbashah, v. 22) explicitly connects this crossing to the Red Sea, making the Jordan a second exodus.

Translation Friction: The relationship between the twelve stones taken from the riverbed (v. 3) and the twelve stones Joshua set up 'in the midst of the Jordan' (v. 9) is ambiguous — are there two sets of monuments or one? We rendered both references as the text presents them and noted the interpretive options. The verb yekareton (v. 7, 'were cut off') uses the same root as karat ('to cut a covenant'), subtly connecting the parted waters to covenant theology.

Connections: The memorial-stone catechism echoes the Passover question in Exodus 12:26 and the firstfruits confession in Deuteronomy 26:5-9. Gilgal becomes a major cultic site through Judges and Samuel (Judges 2:1, 1 Samuel 11:15). The 'forty thousand' armed men (v. 13) fulfills the Transjordan tribes' pledge in 1:12-18.

¹When the entire nation had finished crossing the Jordan, the LORD said to Joshua: ²"Select twelve men from the people — one man from each tribe — ³and command them: 'Pick up twelve stones from right here in the middle of the Jordan, from the exact spot where the priests' feet stood firm, carry them across with you, and set them down at the place where you camp tonight.'" ⁴So Joshua summoned the twelve men he had designated from the Israelites — one man from each tribe — ⁵and said to them, "Go ahead of the ark of the LORD your God into the middle of the Jordan. Each of you lift a stone onto your shoulder — one for each of the tribes of Israel — ⁶so that this will serve as a sign among you. When your children ask in the future, 'What do these stones mean to you?' ⁷you will tell them, 'The waters of the Jordan were cut off before the ark of the covenant of the LORD. When it crossed the Jordan, the Jordan's waters were cut off.' These stones will be a memorial for the Israelites for all time." ⁸The Israelites did exactly as Joshua commanded. They lifted twelve stones from the middle of the Jordan, as the LORD had told Joshua — one for each of the tribes of Israel — carried them across to the camp, and set them down there. ⁹Joshua also set up twelve stones in the middle of the Jordan, at the exact spot where the feet of the priests carrying the ark of the covenant had stood. They are there to this day. ¹⁰The priests carrying the ark stood in the middle of the Jordan until everything was completed that the LORD had commanded Joshua to tell the people — in keeping with everything Moses had commanded Joshua. And the people hurried across. ¹¹When all the people had finished crossing, the ark of the LORD crossed over, with the priests, back to the head of the people. ¹²The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh crossed over in battle formation ahead of the other Israelites, as Moses had instructed them. ¹³About forty thousand armed for war crossed over before the LORD to the plains of Jericho, ready for battle. ¹⁴On that day the LORD exalted Joshua in the sight of all Israel, and they revered him as they had revered Moses, for the rest of his life. ¹⁵The LORD said to Joshua: ¹⁶"Command the priests carrying the ark of the testimony to come up out of the Jordan." ¹⁷So Joshua commanded the priests, "Come up out of the Jordan." ¹⁸When the priests carrying the ark of the covenant of the LORD came up from the middle of the Jordan, the moment the soles of the priests' feet touched dry ground, the waters of the Jordan returned to their place and flowed over all its banks as before. ¹⁹The people came up from the Jordan on the tenth day of the first month and camped at Gilgal on the eastern edge of Jericho's territory. ²⁰And the twelve stones they had taken from the Jordan, Joshua set up at Gilgal. ²¹He said to the Israelites, "When your children ask their parents in the future, 'What are these stones?' ²²you will make known to your children: 'Israel crossed this Jordan on dry ground.' ²³For the LORD your God dried up the waters of the Jordan before you until you had crossed, just as the LORD your God did to the Sea of Reeds, which he dried up before us until we had crossed — ²⁴so that all the peoples of the earth may know that the hand of the LORD is mighty, and so that you may revere the LORD your God always."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Tammul kol ha-goy la'avor ('the entire nation had finished crossing') — the verb tamam ('to be complete, to finish') signals that every last person has crossed. The use of goy ('nation') rather than am ('people') continues from 3:17, emphasizing Israel's corporate, political identity as they enter the land.
2. This fulfills the anticipatory instruction of 3:12. The twelve men, one per tribe, ensure that every tribe participates in the memorial act. The crossing is not the achievement of a few — it belongs to all Israel equally.
3. Mimmatsav raglei ha-kohanim hakhin ('from the standing-place of the priests' feet, firm') — the stones must come from the precise spot where the priests stood holding the ark while the waters were held back. The memorial is anchored to the exact location of the miracle, not a convenient spot nearby. The specificity turns ordinary river stones into covenant witnesses.
3. V'hinnachtem otam ba-malon ('set them down at the camp') — the stones will be carried from the riverbed to Gilgal (v. 19-20), Israel's first campsite in the promised land. River stones from the Jordan's floor, carried by human hands across dry ground that should be underwater — every element of the memorial tells the story.
4. Asher hekhin ('whom he had prepared/designated') — the verb kun (hiphil: 'to establish, to prepare, to designate') indicates Joshua had already selected these men, likely at the instruction of 3:12. The preparation preceded the miracle — Joshua trusted God's word enough to arrange the memorial before the crossing happened.
5. Ish even achat al shikhmo ('each man one stone on his shoulder') — the stones are carried on the shoulder, not in the hand. These are substantial stones, heavy enough to serve as a lasting monument. The physical weight mirrors the theological weight of what they represent. Each man bears his tribe's share of the memorial.
5. L'mispar shivtei v'nei Yisrael ('according to the number of the tribes of the Israelites') — twelve stones for twelve tribes. The memorial is structured to represent the totality of Israel, not just the tribes that happened to cross first or fight hardest.
6. Ki yish'alun b'neikhem machar ('when your children ask tomorrow/in the future') — machar can mean 'tomorrow' or 'in the future.' The memorial is explicitly designed for intergenerational transmission. The stones exist to provoke questions from children — they are teaching tools embedded in the landscape. This question-and-answer format for transmitting sacred memory echoes the Passover liturgy (Exodus 12:26; 13:14), where the child's question triggers the parent's retelling of the exodus. The conquest, like the exodus, must be remembered and retold.
6. Mah ha-avanim ha-elleh lakhem ('what are these stones to you?') — the question assumes the stones are puzzling, out of place. River stones standing in a camp miles from any river demand an explanation. The memorial works precisely because it does not explain itself — it provokes inquiry.
7. L'zikkaron liv'nei Yisrael ad olam ('as a memorial for the Israelites forever') — zikkaron ('memorial, remembrance') is the same term used for the Passover observance (Exodus 12:14). Israel's faith is sustained by physical memorials that anchor theological truth in tangible objects — stones, rituals, festivals. The olam ('forever') indicates permanence beyond any single generation.
7. The answer given to the children's question is remarkably concise: the waters of the Jordan were cut off before the ark. The explanation centers on the ark (God's presence), not on Joshua's leadership or Israel's courage. The memorial teaches theology, not military history.
8. Va-ya'asu khen b'nei Yisrael ka'asher tsivvah Yehoshua ('the Israelites did exactly as Joshua commanded') — the pattern of command and obedience continues without hesitation. The narrator attributes the instruction both to Joshua (ka'asher tsivvah Yehoshua) and to the LORD (ka'asher dibber YHWH el Yehoshua), reinforcing that Joshua's authority is delegated divine authority. To obey Joshua is to obey God.
9. This second set of twelve stones — placed in the riverbed rather than carried to camp — is sometimes seen as a textual doublet. However, the two sets serve different functions: the stones at Gilgal (v. 20) are a visible, accessible memorial for future generations; the stones in the Jordan are a hidden witness beneath the water, marking the precise location of the miracle. Together they create a testimony both seen and unseen.
9. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') — this formula signals the narrator's temporal distance from the event. The author writes from a time when the stones were still visible (or at least when the tradition of their location was still known), confirming the memorial's durability.

10. Ad tom kol ha-davar ('until everything was completed') — the priests remain standing in the riverbed, holding the ark, for the entire duration of the crossing and the stone-gathering. Their steadfastness is the physical anchor of the miracle — as long as they stand, the waters hold.
10. K'kol asher tsivvah Mosheh et Yehoshua ('in keeping with everything Moses had commanded Joshua') — this editorial note explicitly connects Joshua's actions to Moses's prior instructions, maintaining the chain of authority: God Moses Joshua. Nothing Joshua does is improvised or self-authorized.
10. Vaymaharu ha-am vayya'avoru ('the people hurried and crossed') — the verb mahar ('to hurry') suggests urgency. Standing on the dry floor of a flooded river, with walls of water held back by divine power alone, the people did not linger. The haste reflects both practical anxiety and appropriate awe.
11. Vayya'avon aron YHWH v'ha-kohanim lifnei ha-am ('the ark of the LORD crossed over, and the priests, before the people') — the ark entered the Jordan first (3:13-15) and now exits last, after everyone has crossed safely. The ark bookends the crossing, serving as both vanguard and rear guard. Lifnei ha-am ('before the people') likely means the ark resumed its position at the head of the column on the western bank, ready to lead the march to Gilgal and beyond.
12. Chamushim lifnei b'nei Yisrael ('in battle formation ahead of the Israelites') — the eastern tribes honor their commitment from 1:14-15. They cross armed and in formation as the vanguard, fighting for land that will belong to other tribes. The note ka'asher dibber aleihem Mosheh ('as Moses had told them') anchors this in the original agreement of Numbers 32 — they are keeping their word across a change of leadership.
13. K'arba'im elef chalutsei ha-tsava ('about forty thousand equipped/armed for the army') — the number forty thousand may represent the full fighting force of the eastern tribes or (as some scholars argue) elef may function as a military unit term ('contingent, clan unit') rather than the numeral 'thousand,' yielding a smaller but still significant force. The text presents it as a substantial military formation.
13. Lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — the troops march 'before the LORD,' meaning in the LORD's presence or under the LORD's banner. This is not secular military deployment but holy war — the army marches in the presence of its divine commander.
13. Arvot Yericho ('the plains of Jericho') — the broad, flat alluvial plain west of the Jordan where Israel now stands. They have arrived. The promised land is underfoot.
14. Giddel YHWH et Yehoshua ('the LORD made Joshua great') — this fulfills the promise of 3:7: 'Today I will begin to exalt you.' The Jordan crossing has done for Joshua what the Red Sea crossing did for Moses (Exodus 14:31). Leadership legitimacy in Israel is established not by election, appointment, or heredity but by visible divine endorsement.
14. Vayyir'u oto ka'asher yar'u et Mosheh ('they revered him as they had revered Moses') — the verb yare can mean both 'to fear' and 'to revere.' The people's response to Joshua now matches their response to Moses — the succession is complete. Kol yemei chayyav ('all the days of his life') extends this respect for the duration of Joshua's leadership, unlike the episodic loyalty Israel showed Moses.
15. A brief speech formula introducing the command for the priests to come up from the riverbed. The narrative has paused to record the memorial stones and the exaltation of Joshua; now it returns to the practical matter of completing the crossing — the priests are still standing in the Jordan.
16. Aron ha-edut ('the ark of the testimony') — a different title for the ark than the aron ha-berit ('ark of the covenant') used throughout chapter 3. Edut ('testimony, witness') refers to the stone tablets inside the ark, which serve as the physical testimony of the Sinai covenant. The two names highlight different aspects of the same object: the covenant relationship (berit) and the inscribed terms of that covenant (edut).
17. Joshua relays the divine command to the priests without alteration or delay. The command-execution chain (God Joshua priests) operates with precision throughout the crossing narrative.
18. Nit'qu kappot raglei ha-kohanim el he-charavah ('the soles of the priests' feet were pulled up to the dry ground') — the verb nataq ('to pull away, to tear away') suggests the waters resumed the instant the priests' feet left the riverbed. The miracle was precisely bounded: it began when their feet touched the water (3:15) and ended when their feet left the water. There was no margin, no gradual transition — God's intervention was exact.
18. Vayyashuvu mei ha-yarden limqomam vayyel'khu kitmol shilshom al kol g'dotav ('the waters of the Jordan returned to their place and flowed as before over all its banks') — the river returns immediately to full flood stage. Anyone looking at the Jordan after the crossing would see a river in full spate with no evidence that anything had happened — except the nation now standing on the western bank, and the stones.
19. Be'asor la-chodesh ha-rishon ('on the tenth of the first month') — this date is theologically loaded. The tenth of Nisan is the day the Passover lamb was selected (Exodus 12:3). Israel enters the promised land on the same calendar day that the exodus story began in Egypt. The literary symmetry is deliberate: the Passover lamb was chosen on the tenth, leading to deliverance from Egypt; Israel crosses the Jordan on the tenth, entering the land that deliverance was always pointed toward. The exodus is now complete.
19. Gilgal (ha-gilgal) — Israel's first base camp in the promised land, located on the eastern approach to Jericho. The name likely derives from gal ('circle,' perhaps a stone circle), though it will receive a folk etymology in 5:9. Gilgal will serve as Joshua's operational base for the early conquest campaigns.
20. Heqim Yehoshua ba-gilgal ('Joshua set up at Gilgal') — the verb qum (hiphil: 'to raise up, to erect') indicates the stones were arranged upright as a standing monument, not simply piled in a heap. The memorial at Gilgal became a permanent feature of the site, visible to future generations and serving as the physical anchor for the story of the crossing.

21. The question-and-answer format repeats from verse 6, now as a direct speech from Joshua. The repetition is not redundancy — it reinforces the memorial's purpose. The stones exist to generate questions, and the questions exist to generate teaching. The intergenerational transmission of faith depends on this cycle of curiosity and response.
22. V'hoda'tem et b'neikhem ('you will make known to your children') — the verb yada (hiphil: 'to cause to know, to make known') implies active, deliberate teaching, not passive transmission. The parents are commanded to teach, not merely to remember. Ba-yabbashah ('on dry ground') is the core claim — the same word used of the dry ground through the Red Sea (Exodus 14:22). The lexical connection is intentional: what happened at the sea happened again at the river.
23. Ka'asher asah YHWH Eloheikhem l'yam Suf ('just as the LORD your God did to the Sea of Reeds') — the narrator (or Joshua) explicitly draws the parallel that the entire chapter has been building. The Jordan crossing and the Red Sea crossing are presented as the same type of divine act, performed by the same God, for the same covenant people. The new generation now has their own crossing story.
23. The pronoun shift from mippeneikhem ('before you,' second person) to mippanenu ('before us,' first person) is striking. The speaker identifies with both the exodus generation ('us') and the conquest generation ('you'), collapsing the temporal distance between the two events. The same God, the same deliverance, the same people across generations.
24. The verse states two purposes for the Jordan crossing: (1) l'ma'an da'at kol ammei ha-arets et yad YHWH ki chazaqah hi ('so that all the peoples of the earth may know the hand of the LORD is mighty') — a universal witness. The miracle is not only for Israel's benefit but for the nations. This connects to Rahab's testimony in 2:9-11: the surrounding peoples are meant to know YHWH's power. (2) L'ma'an y'ratem et YHWH Eloheikhem kol ha-yamim ('so that you may revere the LORD your God always') — an internal purpose. Israel's own reverence for God is sustained by remembering what He has done.
24. Yad YHWH ('the hand of the LORD') is an anthropomorphism for divine power in action — God's effective, intervening strength. The adjective chazaqah ('mighty, strong') uses the same root as the chazaq ('be strong') command to Joshua in chapter 1. The strength God commands of Joshua is grounded in the strength God Himself displays.

Summary: Israel is circumcised at Gilgal ('the reproach of Egypt is rolled away'), celebrates Passover on the plains of Jericho, eats the produce of the land, and the manna ceases. Joshua encounters the commander of the LORD's army.

What Makes This Remarkable: Three thresholds are crossed: circumcision restores the covenant sign neglected in the wilderness, Passover reconnects this generation to the founding liberation event, and the manna stops the day after they eat Canaan's grain — God's wilderness provision ends precisely when it is no longer needed. The commander of the LORD's army (sar tseva YHWH, v. 14) refuses to take sides — 'neither; I have come as commander of the LORD's army.' The categories are not Israel vs. Jericho but God's agenda vs. human assumptions.

Translation Friction: The name Gilgal is connected to the verb galal ('to roll,' v. 9) — 'I have rolled away the reproach of Egypt.' But what was the reproach? Uncircumcision? Slavery's stigma? The text does not specify, and we preserved the ambiguity. The phrase cherpat Mitsrayim (v. 9, 'reproach of Egypt') uses cherpah, a word for shame that cuts socially, not just personally.

Connections: The Passover echoes Exodus 12 — the first was in Egypt before departure, this one is in the land after arrival. The manna's cessation fulfills Exodus 16:35 ('they ate manna until they came to the border of the land'). The divine commander's appearance parallels the burning bush (Exodus 3:5 — same command to remove sandals) and anticipates the angel of the LORD traditions in Judges.

¹When all the Amorite kings west of the Jordan and all the Canaanite kings along the coast heard that the LORD had dried up the waters of the Jordan before the Israelites until they had crossed, their hearts sank and they no longer had any courage because of the Israelites. ²At that time the LORD said to Joshua, "Make flint knives and circumcise the Israelites once more." ³So Joshua made flint knives and circumcised the Israelites at Gibeath-haaraloth. ⁴This is the reason Joshua circumcised them: all the males who had come out of Egypt — every fighting man — had died in the wilderness on the journey after leaving Egypt. ⁵All the people who came out of Egypt had been circumcised, but none of the people born in the wilderness during the journey from Egypt had been circumcised. ⁶For the Israelites had wandered in the wilderness for forty years until the entire generation of fighting men who had come out of Egypt perished — those who had not obeyed the voice of the LORD. The LORD had sworn to them that he would not let them see the land he had sworn to their ancestors to give us: a land flowing with milk and honey. ⁷It was their sons, whom God had raised up in their place, that Joshua circumcised — for they were uncircumcised, since they had not been circumcised during the journey. ⁸When the entire nation had been circumcised, they stayed where they were in the camp until they had healed. ⁹The LORD said to Joshua, "Today I have rolled away the disgrace of Egypt from you." So the place has been called Gilgal to this day. ¹⁰The Israelites camped at Gilgal and observed the Passover on the fourteenth day of the month, in the evening, on the plains of Jericho. ¹¹They ate from the produce of the land on the day after the Passover: unleavened bread and roasted grain — on that very day. ¹²The manna stopped the day after they ate from the produce of the land. The Israelites no longer had manna; that year they ate from the yield of the land of Canaan. ¹³When Joshua was near Jericho, he looked up and saw a man standing in front of him with a drawn sword in his hand. Joshua approached him and asked, "Are you for us or for our enemies?" ¹⁴He replied, "No — I have come as commander of the army of the LORD." Joshua fell facedown to the ground in reverence and said to him, "What does my lord command his servant?" ¹⁵The commander of the LORD's army said to Joshua, "Remove your sandal from your foot, for the place where you are standing is holy." And Joshua did so.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyimmas l'avam ('their hearts melted') — the same verb (masas) and the same psychological collapse that Rahab described in 2:11. Her testimony is now confirmed on a national scale: all the Canaanite and Amorite kings have lost their nerve. The Jordan miracle has accomplished exactly what Joshua predicted in 3:10 — it serves as proof of the living God's presence.
1. The two groups — Amorite kings 'west of the Jordan' (inland highlands) and Canaanite kings 'along the sea' (coastal plain) — represent the full geography of opposition. No region of Canaan is unaffected. The timing is narratively important: at the very moment Israel is most vulnerable (about to undergo mass circumcision, v. 2-8), their enemies are paralyzed with fear.
2. Charvot tsurim ('knives of flint') — flint blades were the traditional instrument for circumcision even in periods when metal was available (cf. Exodus 4:25, where Zipporah uses a tsur). The use of stone rather than bronze may reflect the ritual conservatism of sacred acts — the tool must match the antiquity of the practice.
2. Shuv mol et b'nei Yisrael shenit ('again circumcise the Israelites a second time') — this does not mean individual re-circumcision but a second national circumcision event. The first was under Abraham (Genesis 17); the wilderness generation was never circumcised (v. 5). The covenant sign must be renewed before the covenant land can be entered. Circumcision precedes conquest — identity before action.
3. Giv'at ha-aralot ('the hill of the foreskins') — the place name is graphic and deliberately memorable. The location receives its name from the event, as is common in the Hebrew Bible. The name serves the same mnemonic function as the stones at Gilgal — it anchors the story to a place. Whether the name persisted in later usage or was coined for this narrative moment is uncertain.
4. The narrator pauses to explain why a mass circumcision was necessary. The explanation spans verses 4-7 and constitutes a theological retrospective on the wilderness period. The entire exodus generation of fighting men (anshei ha-milchamah) died in the wilderness — this is the judgment of Numbers 14:29-35, where God decreed that the rebellious generation would not enter the land. The men who left Egypt circumcised died uncircumcised in their legacy — their sons bore no covenant mark.
5. The contrast is stark: mulim hayu kol ha-am ha-yots'im ('all who came out were circumcised') versus lo malu ('they had not circumcised') the wilderness generation. The failure to circumcise during the forty years of wandering is not explained — the text simply states the fact. Scholars debate whether it reflects the suspended covenant status of the rebellious generation, practical difficulties of wilderness travel, or a theological withholding of the covenant sign from those under judgment. The text does not resolve this question.
6. Asher lo sham'u b'qol YHWH ('who did not obey the voice of the LORD') — the cause of the forty-year wandering is stated plainly: disobedience. The Deuteronomic theology is operating: disobedience leads to exclusion from the land promise. The generation that refused to enter at Kadesh-barnea (Numbers 14) was barred from seeing the fulfillment.
6. Erets zavat chalav u-d'vash ('a land flowing with milk and honey') — this stock phrase for the promised land appears over twenty times in the Pentateuch. Milk (from herds) and honey (from bees or date syrup) represent natural abundance — a land so fertile that it overflows with provision without human effort. At this moment in the narrative, Israel is finally standing on that land.
6. The pronoun shift from lahem ('to them,' the condemned generation) to lanu ('to us,' the narrator's community) is significant — the narrator counts himself among the beneficiaries of the promise, not among the excluded.
7. Et b'neihem heqim tachtam ('their sons he raised up in their place') — the verb qum (hiphil: 'to raise up, to establish') echoes its use for the memorial stones (4:9, 20). God 'raised up' a replacement generation just as He 'raised up' memorial stones — both are testimonies to His faithfulness. The old generation perished under judgment; the new generation stands on the threshold of fulfillment.

7. The circumstantial explanation ki lo malu otam ba-darekh ('they had not circumcised them on the journey') implies that the parents, not God, bear responsibility for the failure. The covenant sign was neglected, not revoked — and now, before the conquest can proceed, the neglect must be corrected.
8. Ad chayotam ('until they were healed,' literally 'until their living/recovery') — the entire fighting force is incapacitated during recovery. This is the moment of maximum military vulnerability: Israel's army lies wounded in an open camp on enemy soil. The narrative from verse 1 now takes on its full significance — the Canaanite kings' paralysis of fear is not a footnote but a divine provision. God's timing protects Israel: He terrified the enemy before disabling His own army.
8. The parallel to Genesis 34 (the Shechem circumcision and the Simeon-Levi attack on the third day) is often noted — circumcision renders warriors helpless, and in Genesis 34 that vulnerability was exploited. Here, no Canaanite king exploits it, because God has melted their hearts.
9. Galloti et cherpat Mitsrayim me'aleikhem ('I have rolled away the disgrace of Egypt from you') — the verb galal ('to roll') provides the folk etymology for Gilgal (gilgal, 'rolling' or 'circle'). The cherpat Mitsrayim ('disgrace of Egypt') is debated: it may refer to (1) the stigma of being slaves, (2) the uncircumcised state that marked them as covenant-outsiders during the wilderness years, or (3) Egypt's potential mockery that God brought Israel into the wilderness to die (cf. Exodus 32:12). The circumcision at Gilgal removes whatever disgrace remained — Israel is now fully covenanted, fully in the land, fully free.
9. The naming etiology (vayyiqra shem ha-maqom ha-hu Gilgal) follows the standard pattern of place-name origins in the Hebrew Bible. Whether Gilgal's name actually derives from this event or the etymology is a secondary association with a pre-existing name is uncertain, but the narrative claims this origin.
10. Vayya'asu et ha-pesach be-arba'ah asar yom la-chodesh ba-erev ('they observed the Passover on the fourteenth day of the month in the evening') — this is the first Passover in the promised land, and the calendar alignment is precise. They crossed the Jordan on the tenth of Nisan (4:19), were circumcised, healed, and now on the fourteenth — exactly when the Passover lamb was to be slaughtered (Exodus 12:6) — they observe the festival. The bookend with the original Passover in Egypt (Exodus 12) is complete: the first Passover freed them from Egypt, this Passover marks their arrival in Canaan. The exodus story arc, from departure to destination, is now closed.
10. Be-arvot Yericho ('on the plains of Jericho') — the Passover is observed within sight of the first Canaanite city that will fall. The juxtaposition of worship and warfare is characteristic of Joshua: Israel worships before it fights, obeys before it conquers.
11. Me-avur ha-arets ('from the produce of the land') — for the first time in forty years, Israel eats food grown in Canaan's soil. The word avur ('produce, yield, grain') refers to the existing harvest of the land, not food they planted. They eat what others sowed — the gift nature of the land could not be clearer.
11. Matstsot v'qalui ('unleavened bread and roasted grain') — the Passover diet of Exodus 12:8 (unleavened bread) combined with parched grain, a staple food. The first meal in the promised land is a Passover meal, connecting their new life to the deliverance that made it possible.
11. Be-etsem ha-yom ha-zeh ('on that very day') — the emphasis on the specific day underscores the theological precision of the timing. Everything in this chapter happens on schedule — circumcision, Passover, the first meal from the land. God's calendar is exact.
12. Vayyishbot ha-man ('the manna ceased') — the verb shavat ('to cease, to stop, to rest,' the same root as Shabbat) marks the end of the miraculous daily provision that sustained Israel for forty years (Exodus 16:35). The transition is abrupt and complete: the land's own produce replaces the wilderness miracle. God does not withdraw provision — He changes the mode of provision. The manna was for the wilderness; the land's harvest is for the land.
12. Mitt'vu'at erets K'na'an ('from the yield of the land of Canaan') — t'vu'ah ('yield, produce, harvest') emphasizes agricultural abundance. Israel shifts from miraculous sustenance to covenantal agriculture — working the land God has given. The promised land is not a land of perpetual miracles but a land of blessed labor.
12. This verse closes a forty-year parenthesis. The manna began at Exodus 16:14-15 and ends here. Between those two points lies the entire wilderness experience. With the manna's cessation, the wilderness era is officially over.
13. V'hinne ish omed l'negdo v'charbo sh'lufah b'yado ('and there — a man standing opposite him with his sword drawn in his hand') — the scene is cinematic. Joshua encounters a solitary warrior figure, weapon ready, facing him. The identity of this figure is revealed in verse 14 but is deliberately withheld here, creating narrative tension. Joshua's first instinct is the soldier's question: friend or foe?
13. Ha-lanu attah im l'tsareinu ('are you for us or for our enemies?') — Joshua frames the encounter in binary military terms. The answer he receives (v. 14) will shatter this binary: the figure belongs to neither category because he is above both.
14. Lo ('No') — the figure rejects Joshua's binary framing. He is not 'for' Israel in the sense of being their servant or ally under their command. He is the sar tseva YHWH ('commander of the LORD's army'), meaning the divine army is not at Israel's disposal — Israel is at the army's disposal. The word sar ('commander, prince, captain') designates supreme military authority. This figure outranks Joshua.
14. The identity of the sar tseva YHWH is debated. The traditional reading identifies him as a theophany (a divine appearance) or the Angel of the LORD. The response he gives — accepting Joshua's worship (vayyishtachu, 'he prostrated himself/worshiped') and commanding him to remove his sandals (v. 15) — parallels God's appearance to Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:5). An ordinary angel would typically refuse worship (cf. Revelation 22:8-9). The text does not resolve the question of exact identity but presents the encounter as a divine confrontation.

14. Mah adoni m'dabber el avdo ('what does my lord say to his servant?') — Joshua's response is immediate subordination. He abandons his question (friend or foe?) and assumes the posture of a servant awaiting orders. The commander of Israel has just met his own commander.
15. Shal na'alkha me'al raglekha ki ha-maqom asher attah omed alav qodesh hu ('remove your sandal from your foot, for the place where you stand is holy') — this is an almost verbatim repetition of Exodus 3:5 (shal ne'alekha me'al raglekha ki ha-maqom asher attah omed alav admat qodesh hu). The parallel is too precise to be accidental. Joshua's commissioning scene at the edge of the promised land mirrors Moses's commissioning at the burning bush. Both involve a divine encounter, both require the removal of sandals, both declare the ground holy, and both launch a liberation campaign. The text is claiming that the God who sent Moses now sends Joshua.
15. Na'alkha ('your sandal') is singular — one sandal, not both. Some scholars see this as a merism (one stands for the pair), while others note the ritual significance of removing a single sandal in certain ancient Near Eastern legal customs (cf. Ruth 4:7-8). The text does not explain; Joshua simply obeys.
15. Vayyya'as Yehoshua ken ('and Joshua did so') — the chapter ends abruptly with Joshua's obedience. There is no battle plan, no strategy session, no tactical briefing. The encounter at Jericho's edge ends with a command about sandals and an act of submission. The instructions for Jericho's fall will come in chapter 6 — but first, Joshua must stand barefoot on holy ground and learn who is really in command.

Summary: Israel marches around Jericho once daily for six days, then seven times on the seventh day. The priests blow trumpets, the people shout, and the walls collapse. The city is devoted to destruction; only Rahab's household is spared.

What Makes This Remarkable: The battle plan is anti-military: no siege engines, no scaling ladders, no strategy except marching in silence with an ark and trumpets. The seven-day structure mirrors creation — six days of action, the seventh bringing completion. The cherem (v. 17, 'devoted to destruction') means everything in the city belongs to God, not to the victors. Jericho is a firstfruits offering of the conquest — the first city, like the firstborn, belongs entirely to God.

Translation Friction: The verb hacharim (v. 17, 'devote to destruction') is Deuteronomy's most difficult command applied to a specific city. We rendered it without softening because the Hebrew does not soften it. The silence of the army during six days of marching (v. 10, 'do not shout... do not let your voice be heard') creates unbearable dramatic tension — the shout, when it comes, is the release of days of obedient restraint.

Connections: Rahab's rescue fulfills the spies' oath in 2:12-14 — the scarlet cord and the Passover blood are both marks of protection during divine judgment. The seven-day march echoes the seven days of Jericho's siege in reverse: instead of attacking walls, Israel worships. Achan's violation of the cherem in chapter 7 proves the seriousness of the ban. Rahab enters David's lineage (Ruth 4:21, Matthew 1:5).

1Now Jericho was tightly shut up because of the Israelites — no one going out and no one coming in. 2The LORD said to Joshua, "See — I have handed Jericho over to you, along with its king and its fighting men. 3March around the city — all the fighting men circling the city once. Do this for six days. 4Seven priests will carry seven ram's horn trumpets before the ark. On the seventh day, march around the city seven times, with the priests blowing the trumpets. 5When they sound a long blast on the ram's horn — when you hear the trumpet — all the people will raise a mighty shout, and the wall of the city will collapse in place. Then the people will charge straight ahead, each man forward." 6Joshua son of Nun summoned the priests and said to them, "Lift the ark of the covenant, and have seven priests carry seven ram's horn trumpets before the ark of the LORD." 7He said to the people, "Move forward and march around the city, with the armed vanguard going ahead of the ark of the LORD." 8When Joshua had spoken to the people, the seven priests carrying the seven ram's horn trumpets advanced before the LORD and blew the trumpets, with the ark of the covenant of the LORD following behind them. 9The armed vanguard marched ahead of the priests blowing the trumpets, and the rear guard followed the ark, with the trumpets sounding continually. 10Joshua had commanded the people, "Do not shout, do not let your voice be heard, and do not let a word come from your mouth until the day I tell you to shout. Then you will shout!" 11So the ark of the LORD circled the city, going around it once. Then they returned to the camp and spent the night there. 12Joshua rose early the next morning, and the priests lifted the ark of the LORD. 13The seven priests carrying the seven ram's horn trumpets before the ark of the LORD marched continually, blowing the trumpets. The armed vanguard went ahead of them, and the rear guard followed the ark of the LORD, with the trumpets sounding continually. ¹⁴On the second day they marched around the city once and returned to the camp. They did this for six days. ¹⁵On the seventh day they rose at dawn and marched around the city in the same way — but seven times. Only on that day did they circle the city seven times. ¹⁶At the seventh circuit, when the priests blew the trumpets, Joshua said to the people, "Shout! For the LORD has given you the city! ¹⁷The city and everything in it are to be devoted to destruction — set apart for the LORD. Only Rahab the prostitute will be spared, she and everyone with her in the house, because she hid the scouts we sent. ¹⁸But as for you, keep away from what is devoted to destruction, or else when you take anything that is under the ban, you will bring the ban upon the camp of Israel itself and bring disaster on it. ¹⁹But all the silver, gold, and articles of bronze and iron are holy — they belong to the LORD. They must go into the treasury of the LORD." ²⁰The people shouted and the trumpets sounded. When the people heard the trumpet blast, they raised a mighty shout, and the wall collapsed in place. The people charged straight ahead into the city and captured it. ²¹They devoted to destruction everything in the city — man and woman, young and old, ox, sheep, and donkey — with the edge of the sword. ²²To the two men who had scouted the land, Joshua said, "Go into the prostitute's house and bring out the woman and everyone belonging to her, as you swore to her." ²³So the young scouts went in and brought out Rahab, her father, her mother, her brothers, and everyone belonging to her — they brought out her entire extended family — and settled them outside the camp of Israel. ²⁴They burned the city and everything in it with fire — except the silver, gold, and articles of bronze and iron, which they placed in the treasury of the house of the LORD. ²⁵But Rahab the prostitute, along with her father's household and everyone belonging to her — Joshua let them live. She has lived among the Israelites to this day, because she hid the scouts that Joshua sent to reconnoiter Jericho. ²⁶At that time Joshua pronounced this oath: "Cursed before the LORD is the man who rises up and rebuilds this city — this Jericho. At the cost of his firstborn he will lay its foundation, and at the cost of his youngest he will set up its gates." ²⁷The LORD was with Joshua, and his fame spread throughout the entire land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Sogeret um'suggeret ('shut up and bolted shut') — the double participle intensifies the image: Jericho is not merely closed but sealed, barred, locked down. The city is in full siege posture, but the irony is that Israel has not laid siege. Jericho has imprisoned itself out of terror, confirming Rahab's testimony (2:9-11) and the report of verse 5:1.
1. Ein yotse v'ein ba ('none going out, none coming in') — a merism describing total isolation. No trade, no escape, no reinforcement. Jericho is cut off and waiting.
2. Re'eh natatti b'yadkha ('See, I have given into your hand') — the perfect tense natatti ('I have given') declares the victory accomplished before a single march around the walls. As with the land promise in 1:3, God speaks of the outcome as already completed. The conquest of Jericho is divine fait accompli — Israel's role is obedience to the ritual instructions that follow, not military strategy.
2. Gibborei he-chayil ('mighty men of valor') — the same phrase used for Israel's own warriors (1:14). Jericho's defenders are formidable, but their strength is irrelevant because the battle belongs to God.
3. V'sabbotem et ha-ir ('march around the city') — the verb savav ('to go around, to encircle') is processional, not military. This is not a siege tactic but a ritual act. The instruction to circle the city once per day for six days, then seven times on the seventh day (v. 4), follows a liturgical pattern saturated with the number seven — the number of completion and divine action throughout the Hebrew Bible.
3. Kol anshei ha-milchamah ('all the fighting men') — warriors participate, but they do not fight. They march. The army is present not for its combat function but as participants in a worship procession. This redefines military power: Israel's greatest victory will come through obedience to a ritual, not through tactics.
4. Shiv'ah kohanim ... shiv'ah shofarot ha-yov'lim ... ha-yom ha-shevi'i ... sheva pe'amim — the sevenfold pattern saturates the passage: seven priests, seven trumpets, the seventh day, seven circuits. The number seven (sheva) is the number of completion, oath (the root sh-v-a relates to both 'seven' and 'to swear'), and divine rest (the seventh day of creation). Jericho falls not by force but by sacred numerology — by the completion of a divine cycle.
4. Shofarot ha-yov'lim ('ram's horn trumpets' or 'jubilee trumpets') — the yovel is the ram's horn associated with the Jubilee year (Leviticus 25:9-10) and with theophanic events (Exodus 19:13, 16 at Sinai). These are not military signals but liturgical instruments. The sound of the shofar announces God's presence and action, not a charge into battle.
5. V'nafl'ah chomat ha-ir tachteha ('the wall of the city will fall beneath itself,' or 'collapse in place') — the wall does not fall outward or inward but drops straight down (tachteha, 'beneath it'). Archaeological excavations at Tell es-Sultan (ancient Jericho) have found collapsed walls, though the dating and interpretation remain debated among archaeologists. The text presents the collapse as immediate, total, and supernatural — the walls fall at the sound, not from battering.

5. T'ru'ah g'dolah ('a great shout') — the t'ru'ah is a war cry and a worship shout. It is the same term used for the shout at God's enthronement (Psalm 47:5; Numbers 23:21) and for the alarm signal on the trumpets (Numbers 10:5-6). The shout at Jericho is simultaneously a battle cry and an act of worship — the two are indistinguishable in this narrative.
5. V'alu ha-am ish negdo ('the people will go up, each man straight before him') — there is no flanking, no concentration of force, no tactical approach. Every soldier advances straight forward from wherever he stands in the circle. The city is penetrated from every direction simultaneously — because the walls are gone. Military strategy is irrelevant when God removes the obstacle.
6. Joshua transmits God's instructions from verses 2-5 to the priests without modification. The command chain operates flawlessly: God → Joshua → priests. The ark of the covenant leads, with the seven trumpet-bearing priests creating a sonic processional before it. The order of march will be specified further in verses 7-9: armed vanguard, trumpet priests, ark, rear guard.
7. Ha-chaluts ya'avur lifnei aron YHWH ('the armed vanguard will pass before the ark of the LORD') — chaluts ('armed, equipped, stripped for action') designates the military advance guard. The marching order emerges: armed troops first, then the seven trumpet-priests, then the ark, then presumably a rear guard (v. 9). The army frames the ark — warriors before and behind — but the ark is the center. The formation is a moving sanctuary, not a military column.
8. The procession begins. The narrative emphasizes the sound — v'taq'u ba-shofarot ('and they blew the trumpets'). The shofar blast accompanies the march and continues throughout the circuits. The sound of ram's horns around a walled city is psychologically powerful but militarily useless — it serves to announce God's presence and to unnerve the defenders, who are already terrified (5:1; 2:9-11).
9. Ha-m'assef ('the rear guard,' literally 'the gatherer') — from the root asaf ('to gather'). The rear guard gathers up stragglers and protects the column's back. The full marching order is now clear: armed vanguard → seven trumpet-priests → ark of the covenant → rear guard. This is a military formation repurposed for liturgical procession — or perhaps a liturgical procession that happens to be militarily organized.
9. Halokh v'taqo'a ba-shofarot ('going and blowing the trumpets') — the infinitive absolute construction indicates continuous action. The trumpets never stop sounding throughout the march. The ceaseless blowing creates an unbroken wall of sound — the auditory counterpart to the physical wall they are circling.
10. Lo tari'u v'lo tashmi'u et qolkhem v'lo yetse mippikhem davar ('do not shout, do not make your voice heard, do not let a word leave your mouth') — the triple prohibition creates absolute silence from the people. The only sounds during the six days of marching are the priests' trumpets and the rhythm of footsteps. The effect is eerie and psychologically devastating: a silent army circling the walls, day after day, with only the mournful blast of ram's horns. The silence also functions theologically — the people's voice is withheld until God's moment. Their shout will not be spontaneous but commanded, not human initiative but divine timing.
11. Vayyashev aron YHWH et ha-ir haqqef pa'am achat ('the ark of the LORD circled the city, going around once') — the narrator says the ark circled the city, not the army or Joshua. The ark (and by extension, God's presence) is the subject of the action. The first day's circuit is completed in a single understated sentence — the narrative saves its dramatic energy for the seventh day.
12. Vayyashkem Yehoshua ba-boqer ('Joshua rose early in the morning') — the same formula as 3:1. Joshua's early rising signals discipline and urgency. The daily repetition of the ritual requires the same obedience and the same early start each morning — faithfulness expressed as routine.
13. The verse repeats the marching order from verses 8-9 almost verbatim, reinforcing the ritualized nature of the procession. The repetition is not narrative redundancy — it mirrors the repetitive nature of the act itself. Each day's march follows the identical pattern: same formation, same sounds, same silence. The ritual's power lies in its exact repetition over seven days. Halokh v'taqo'a ('going and blowing') — the continuous trumpeting creates a liturgical drone that defines the entire event.
14. Koh asu sheshet yamim ('thus they did for six days') — six days of identical processions, one circuit per day, then return to camp. The narrative compresses six days of obedient marching into a single verse. The compression emphasizes the monotony and the discipline: nothing visible happens for six days. No walls crack, no defenders flee, no progress is apparent. The obedience is tested by six days of apparent futility.
15. Ba-yom ha-shevi'i vayyashkimu ka'alot ha-shachar ('on the seventh day they rose at the going up of the dawn') — the early start is even earlier than usual, because seven circuits require the full day. The dawn of the seventh day marks the climactic moment the entire ritual has been building toward.
15. Sheva pe'amim ('seven times') — the escalation from one circuit to seven on the seventh day brings the total number of circuits to thirteen (6 + 7), though the text emphasizes the seven on the final day. The accumulation of sevens reaches its peak: seven priests, seven trumpets, seven days, seven circuits. The divine number saturates the event.
15. Raq ba-yom ha-hu savvu et ha-ir sheva pe'amim ('only on that day did they circle the city seven times') — the word raq ('only') marks the seventh day as unique. The pattern breaks: what was once (days 1-6) becomes seven (day 7). The break in pattern signals the climax.
16. Hari'u ki natan YHWH lakhem et ha-ir ('Shout, for the LORD has given you the city') — again the perfect tense: natan ('has given'). The city is already given before the shout goes up and the walls come down. Joshua speaks with prophetic certainty, declaring accomplished what is about to become visible. The shout is not a weapon — it is the response to a gift already given.

17. V'hay'tah ha-ir cherem hi v'khol asher bah la-YHWH ('the city will be cherem — it and everything in it — to the LORD') — the entire city is placed under the sacred ban. Cherem here functions as a predicate adjective: the city is cherem, meaning it belongs entirely and irrevocably to God. Nothing within it may be taken for human use. The phrase la-YHWH ('to the LORD') specifies the recipient — everything destroyed is 'given' to God.
17. Raq Rachav ha-zonah tichyeh ('only Rahab the prostitute will live') — the sole exception to the cherem is the woman and household protected by the covenant agreement of chapter 2. The oath the spies swore to Rahab overrides the ban — or rather, Rahab's household was already exempted by the spies' divinely sanctioned oath before the cherem was announced. Her zonah identity is repeated, not to stigmatize but to underscore the extraordinary nature of her inclusion.
17. Ki hechb'atah et ha-mal'akhim asher shalachnu ('because she hid the messengers we sent') — the reason for Rahab's exemption is her active choice to align with Israel's God. The word mal'akhim ('messengers') is the same word translated 'angels' in other contexts — here it means human envoys, but the lexical overlap connects Rahab's act of hiding human scouts to the broader theme of divine agency.
18. Shimru min ha-cherem pen tacharaimu ('guard yourselves from the cherem lest you become cherem') — the warning is terrifyingly logical: cherem is contagious. If anyone takes devoted property for themselves, they transfer the ban to the entire camp. The cherem would spread from Jericho to Israel — the very army of God would become a devoted-to-destruction object. This warning foreshadows the Achan crisis of chapter 7, where exactly this happens.
18. Va'akhartem oto ('and bring trouble/disaster upon it') — the verb akhar ('to trouble, to bring disaster') contains a wordplay that will become explicit in 7:25, where Achan (whose name sounds like akhar) is told 'Why did you bring trouble (akhartanu) on us? The LORD will bring trouble (ya'akhor'kha) on you today.' The wordplay is embedded in the narrative structure from this warning forward.
19. Qodesh hu la-YHWH ('it is holy to the LORD') — metals cannot be destroyed by fire, so they are consecrated rather than annihilated. The principle of cherem is maintained: nothing from Jericho enriches any individual. What survives destruction enters the otsar YHWH ('treasury of the LORD'), the sacred storehouse associated with the tabernacle/sanctuary. The metals belong to God, not to Israel's soldiers.
20. Vattipol ha-chomah tachteiha ('the wall fell beneath itself') — the climactic moment is described in seven Hebrew words. After seven days of elaborate ritual preparation, the actual fall of Jericho's wall is narrated with stark brevity. The understatement matches the theology: this is God's act, and divine acts do not require elaborate description. The wall simply falls.
20. Vayya'al ha-am ha-irah ish negdo ('the people went up into the city, each man straight before him') — as God instructed (v. 5), every soldier advances directly forward from wherever he stands in the circle. The city is penetrated simultaneously from every direction. There is no battle narrative — no clash of arms, no defenders rallying, no commanders shouting orders. The battle is over before it starts because the wall, the city's only defense, is gone.
21. Vayyacharimu et kol asher ba-ir ('they devoted to destruction everything in the city') — the cherem is executed in full. The list me-ish v'ad ishah minna'ar v'ad zaqen ('from man to woman, from young to old') is a merism encompassing every human being. The inclusion of domestic animals (shor va-seh va-chamor, 'ox, sheep, and donkey') confirms total destruction — nothing of Jericho survives for human use.
21. The text presents this without editorial commentary. The narrator does not justify, explain, or soften the account. The theological framework (cherem as sacred devotion to God) is the only interpretive lens the text provides. Modern readers must reckon with the moral difficulty honestly — and the translator notes should acknowledge that difficulty without resolving it. This is what the Hebrew text says; this is what it claims God commanded. The Covenant Rendering translates the text faithfully and lets the reader engage the theological and moral questions.
22. Ka'asher nishba'tem lah ('as you swore to her') — Joshua upholds the spies' oath. The covenant with Rahab, negotiated by two scouts on their own authority, is honored by the national commander in the midst of a divinely mandated destruction. An oath sworn in YHWH's name (2:12) cannot be broken, even by the demands of cherem. This establishes a hierarchy: oath cherem. The sworn word outranks the sacred ban.
23. The list — Rahab, her father, her mother, her brothers, and everyone belonging to her — matches her original request in 2:13 precisely. The oath is honored to the letter. The addition v'et kol mishp'choteha ('and all her clans/extended family') expands the circle beyond the nuclear family, suggesting Rahab's influence brought a wider group under the protection of the scarlet cord.
23. Vayyanikhmu michutz l'machaneh Yisrael ('they settled them outside the camp of Israel') — Rahab's family is placed outside the camp initially, likely for ritual purity reasons (as Canaanites, they would need to undergo some process of incorporation). The note 'outside the camp' is transitional — verse 25 will clarify that Rahab ultimately dwelt 'in the midst of Israel.'
24. V'ha-ir sar'fu va-esh v'khol asher bah ('they burned the city with fire and everything in it') — the burning completes the cherem. Fire is the ultimate agent of destruction, leaving nothing usable. Archaeological evidence at Tell es-Sultan shows a destruction layer with evidence of intense burning, though the dating of this layer remains one of the most debated questions in biblical archaeology.
24. Otsar beit YHWH ('the treasury of the house of the LORD') — the metals are consecrated to the sanctuary. The 'house of the LORD' at this period would be the tabernacle. Jericho's wealth goes to God's house — the firstfruits principle applied to conquest.
25. Vatteshev b'qerev Yisrael ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('she has lived in the midst of Israel to this day') — the transition from 'outside the camp' (v. 23) to 'in the midst of Israel' is complete. Rahab, a Canaanite prostitute, is fully incorporated into Israelite society. The formula 'to this day' indicates the narrator writes from a later period when Rahab's descendants are a known presence in Israel. According to Matthew 1:5, Rahab married Salmon and became an ancestor of David — and of Jesus. A gentile woman from a condemned city enters the covenant people and ultimately the messianic lineage.

25. The narrator repeats the reason for her survival: ki hechbi'ah et ha-mal'akhim ('because she hid the messengers'). Her act of faith — choosing YHWH's side at personal risk — saved her and her family. The New Testament draws on this in Hebrews 11:31 ('by faith Rahab the prostitute did not perish with those who were disobedient') and James 2:25 ('was not Rahab the prostitute justified by works when she received the messengers?'). Her story serves as evidence that covenant membership is based on faith and action, not ethnicity.
26. Arur ha-ish lifnei YHWH ('cursed is the man before the LORD') — Joshua places a solemn imprecation on anyone who rebuilds Jericho. The curse operates on a devastating principle: rebuilding will cost the builder his firstborn at the foundation and his youngest at the gate-setting — his entire family line will be consumed by the project. This curse is fulfilled in 1 Kings 16:34, when Hiel of Bethel rebuilds Jericho under King Ahab: 'He laid its foundation at the cost of Abiram his firstborn, and set up its gates at the cost of his youngest son Segub, according to the word of the LORD spoken through Joshua son of Nun.'
26. Biv'khoro y'yass'dennah u-vitse'iro yatsiv d'lateha ('at his firstborn he will found it, and at his youngest he will set up its gates') — the preposition be- ('at, in, with, at the cost of') is ambiguous: it could mean the deaths coincide with the construction stages, or that the sons are sacrificed as foundation offerings (a practice attested in ancient Near Eastern archaeology). The text does not specify the mechanism — only the cost.
27. Vayhi YHWH et Yehoshua ('the LORD was with Joshua') — the fulfillment of 1:5 ('as I was with Moses, I will be with you') and 3:7 ('today I will begin to exalt you'). The three promises are now realized: God is present, Joshua is exalted, and no one can stand against him. The summary statement closes the Jericho narrative with a theological conclusion: Joshua's fame is not self-made but a consequence of the divine presence that accompanies him.
27. Vayhi shom'o b'khol ha-arets ('his fame was in all the land') — shom'o ('his fame, his report, what is heard about him') spreads throughout Canaan. The Canaanite terror that Rahab reported (2:9-11) and that 5:1 confirmed now intensifies. Every subsequent city in Canaan knows what happened to Jericho.

Summary: Achan takes devoted items from Jericho, and Israel is defeated at Ai. God reveals the violation through lots, Achan confesses, and he and his household are executed in the Valley of Achor.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter's first word is devastating: vayyim'alu ('they acted unfaithfully') — the plural indicts all Israel for one man's sin. The corporate nature of covenant means individual violation contaminates the community. Achan's confession (v. 21) is psychologically precise: 'I saw... I coveted... I took' — the same sequence as Eve in Genesis 3:6 (saw, desired, took). Sin follows the same pattern across the entire biblical narrative.

Translation Friction: The phrase ma'al ma'al (v. 1, 'acted treacherously with treachery') uses the cognate accusative for emphasis — the doubling conveys the gravity of covenant breach. We preserved 'acted unfaithfully' without the doubling because English lacks a natural equivalent. The Valley of Achor (v. 26, 'Valley of Trouble') becomes a place name from a wordplay — Achan brings achar ('trouble'), and the valley is named for it.

Connections: Achan's sin-pattern (saw, coveted, took) echoes Genesis 3:6 and anticipates David in 2 Samuel 11. The Valley of Achor is promised as 'a door of hope' in Hosea 2:15 — the site of judgment becomes a site of restoration. The lots-casting process (vv. 14-18) parallels the Urim and Thummim tradition and is echoed in Jonah 1:7. Joshua's prayer (vv. 7-9) echoes Moses's intercessions.

¹But the Israelites acted unfaithfully regarding the devoted things. Achan son of Carmi, son of Zabdi, son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, took some of what was under the ban, and the LORD's anger burned against the Israelites. ²Joshua sent men from Jericho to Ai, which is near Beth-aven, east of Bethel, and told them, "Go up and scout the land." So the men went up and scouted Ai. ³They returned to Joshua and said to him, "There is no need for the whole army to go up. Send about two or three thousand men to attack Ai — do not trouble the entire force with the march, because they are few." ⁴About three thousand men from the army went up, but they fled before the men of Ai. ⁵The men of Ai struck down about thirty-six of them and chased them from the city gate as far as Shebarim, cutting them down on the slope. The hearts of the people melted and turned to water. ⁶Joshua tore his clothes and fell facedown before the ark of the LORD until evening — he and the elders of Israel — and they put dust on their heads. ⁷Joshua said, "Ah, Lord GOD! Why did you bring this people across the Jordan at all, only to hand us over to the Amorites to be destroyed? If only we had been willing to settle on the other side of the Jordan! ⁸Please, Lord — what can I say, now that Israel has turned its back before its enemies? ⁹The Canaanites and all who live in the land will hear about this, surround us, and wipe our name from the earth. And what will you do for your great name?" ¹⁰The LORD said to Joshua, "Stand up! Why are you lying facedown? ¹¹Israel has sinned. They have violated my covenant that I commanded them. They have taken from what is under the ban. They have stolen. They have deceived. They have put the devoted things among their own belongings. ¹²The Israelites cannot stand before their enemies. They turn their backs before their enemies because they themselves have become subject to the ban. I will not be with you anymore unless you remove the devoted things from your midst. ¹³Get up! Consecrate the people and say, 'Consecrate yourselves for tomorrow, for this is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: There is a devoted thing in your midst, Israel. You will not be able to stand before your enemies until you remove what is under the ban from among you.' ¹⁴In the morning you will come forward tribe by tribe. The tribe that the LORD selects will come forward by clans. The clan that the LORD selects will come forward by households. The household that the LORD selects will come forward man by man. ¹⁵The one caught with the devoted things will be burned with fire — he and everything he has — because he has violated the covenant of the LORD and has committed an outrage in Israel." ¹⁶Joshua rose early in the morning and brought Israel forward tribe by tribe. The tribe of Judah was selected. ¹⁷He brought forward the clans of Judah, and the clan of the Zerahites was selected. He brought the clan of the Zerahites forward by households, and Zabdi was selected. ¹⁸He brought Zabdi's household forward man by man, and Achan son of Carmi, son of Zabdi, son of Zerah, of the tribe of Judah, was selected. ¹⁹Joshua said to Achan, "My son, give glory to the LORD, the God of Israel, and make confession to him. Tell me what you have done — do not hide it from me." ²⁰Achan answered Joshua, "It is true — I have sinned against the LORD, the God of Israel. This is what I did: ²¹I saw among the plunder a beautiful robe from Shinar, two hundred shekels of silver, and a bar of gold weighing fifty shekels. I coveted them and I took them. They are hidden in the ground inside my tent, with the silver underneath." ²²Joshua sent messengers, and they ran to the tent. There it was — hidden in his tent, with the silver underneath. ²³They took them from inside the tent, brought them to Joshua and all the Israelites, and spread them out before the LORD. ²⁴Then Joshua, along with all Israel, took Achan son of Zerah, the silver, the robe, the bar of gold, his sons and daughters, his ox, his donkey, his flock, his tent, and everything he owned, and brought them up to the Valley of Achor. ²⁵Joshua said, "Why have you brought disaster on us? The LORD will bring disaster on you today!" Then all Israel stoned him, burned them with fire, and piled stones over them. ²⁶They raised a great pile of stones over him that remains to this day. Then the LORD turned from his fierce anger. That is why that place is called the Valley of Achor to this day.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyim'alu v'nei Yisrael ma'al ba-cherem ('the Israelites acted unfaithfully/traacherously regarding the cherem') — the verb ma'al means to act treacherously, to commit a breach of trust, to be unfaithful. It is covenant-violation language, not merely legal infraction. The crucial theological point: the text says 'the Israelites' committed the breach, though only Achan acted. One man's sin implicates the entire nation. Corporate identity is fundamental to Israelite theology — the community bears responsibility for the actions of its members.
1. Achan's genealogy (ben Karmi, ben Zavdi, ben Zerach, l'matreh Yehudah) is given in full — four generations and tribal identification — establishing his place within Israel. He is not a marginal figure but a fully identified member of Judah, the leading tribe. The unfaithfulness comes from inside Israel's heart, not its periphery.
1. Vayyichar af YHWH biv'nei Yisrael ('the anger of the LORD burned against the Israelites') — note that God's anger is directed at Israel collectively, not at Achan individually. The narrative presents the problem as communal before it is personal. Israel will discover Achan's identity only through a process of divine revelation (vv. 14-18).
2. Ha-Ai ('the Ai') — the name means 'the ruin' or 'the heap,' which may indicate the site was already in ruins before Israel arrived, or it may be a name applied retrospectively after its destruction (8:28). The city is located near Beth-aven ('house of wickedness/emptiness') east of Bethel ('house of God') — the geographic names create an ironic cluster for a narrative about unfaithfulness.
2. Joshua acts with the confidence earned at Jericho, sending scouts to the next target. He does not know that the covenant has been breached. The narrative creates dramatic irony: the reader knows (from v. 1) what Joshua does not — Israel is under divine anger.
3. Al ya'al kol ha-am ('not all the people need go up') — the scouts' report is militarily reasonable: Ai is small, and a fraction of the force should suffice. But the assessment is spiritually blind. After Jericho, Israel's scouts evaluate Ai purely in military terms (ki me'at hemmah, 'because they are few') without considering whether God is with them. The contrast with the Jericho campaign is stark: at Jericho, success depended entirely on divine instruction; at Ai, the scouts assume conventional military assessment is sufficient.

3. Al t'yagga shammah et kol ha-am ('do not wear out the whole army going there') — the verb yaga ('to toil, to weary') implies that sending the full force would be wasteful overkill. The overconfidence is palpable — and will be punished.
4. Vayyanusu lifnei anshei ha-Ai ('they fled before the men of Ai') — the verb nus ('to flee') is devastating after 1:5 ('no one will be able to stand before you'). For the first time in Joshua, Israelites run from the enemy. The promise of invincibility was conditional on covenant faithfulness — and the covenant has been breached. The defeat is not large in scale (v. 5 reports 36 casualties) but enormous in theological significance: God's presence has been withdrawn.
5. Kishloashim v'shishah ish ('about thirty-six men') — the casualties are relatively small, but the psychological impact is catastrophic. Vayyimmas l'av ha-am vayhi l'mayim ('the hearts of the people melted and became like water') — the same verb masas ('to melt') that described Canaanite terror in 2:11 and 5:1 now describes Israel's own reaction. The roles have reversed: the conquerors now experience the same dissolving fear that their enemies felt. The reversal is a direct consequence of the cherem violation.
5. Ha-Sh'varim ('Shebarim') — the name means 'the broken places' or 'the quarries,' likely a rocky area on the descent from Ai. The pursuit ran from the city gate downhill through rough terrain — the Israelites were fleeing downslope, the worst tactical position.
5. The irony is layered: at Jericho, walls fell and Israel charged forward; at Ai, Israel flees and hearts collapse. Same army, same commander, different covenant status.
6. Vayyiqra Yehoshua simlotav ('Joshua tore his garments') — the standard gesture of grief and distress in the ancient Near East. Combined with falling prostrate before the ark and casting dust on the head, the full repertoire of lamentation is deployed. Joshua and the elders mourn not just the thirty-six dead but the apparent failure of the divine promise.
6. Lifnei aron YHWH ad ha-erev ('before the ark of the LORD until evening') — Joshua prostrates himself before the ark for hours. The ark that led the Jordan crossing and the Jericho procession now witnesses Israel's leader face down in the dust. The contrast between this scene and the triumph of chapters 3-6 is total.
7. Ahahh Adonai YHWH ('Ah, Lord GOD!') — the exclamation ahahh is a cry of anguish, not a formal address. Joshua's prayer is raw, unfiltered distress. The address 'Lord GOD' (Adonai YHWH) combines the two divine titles, intensifying the appeal.
7. Lamah he'evarta ha'avir et ha-am ha-zeh et ha-yarden ('why did you bring this people across the Jordan') — Joshua's complaint echoes the wilderness murmuring of the exodus generation (cf. Exodus 14:11-12; Numbers 14:2-3). The same generation that pledged total obedience in 1:16-18 now sounds like the parents who wanted to go back to Egypt. Joshua is momentarily reduced to the posture of the defeated, questioning God's purpose. The parallel to Moses's own moments of frustration (Numbers 11:11-15) is unmistakable — leadership under pressure produces the same raw prayers.
7. V'lu ho'alnu vanneshev b'ever ha-yarden ('if only we had been willing to stay on the other side of the Jordan') — this is theologically dangerous. Joshua is questioning whether the crossing itself was a mistake — which would mean God's most explicit command (1:2) was wrong. God's response (vv. 10-15) will be sharp.
8. Hafakh Yisrael oref lifnei oy'av ('Israel has turned its neck/back before its enemies') — the idiom 'to turn the back of the neck' (oref) means to flee. The word oref ('back of the neck, nape') is associated with stubbornness when applied to Israel's character ('stiff-necked,' q'sheh oref) — here it takes on a different shame: the neck that should have been stiffened in resolve against enemies is instead turned away in flight.
9. U-mah ta'aseh l'shimkha ha-gadol ('and what will you do for your great name?') — Joshua's final argument shifts from Israel's survival to God's reputation. If Israel is destroyed, God's name — His fame, His renown among the nations — will be diminished. This argument echoes Moses's intercessory logic in Exodus 32:11-14 and Numbers 14:13-16, where Moses persuaded God not to destroy Israel precisely because it would undermine His reputation among the nations. Joshua instinctively reaches for the same theological leverage: God's honor is at stake.
9. V'hikhreitu et sh'menu min ha-arets ('and cut off our name from the earth') — the destruction of a 'name' (shem) in the ancient world means extinction of memory, lineage, and identity. Joshua envisions total annihilation — not merely military defeat but civilizational erasure.
10. Qum lakh ('stand up,' literally 'rise for yourself') — God's response to Joshua's lament is blunt and impatient. There is no comforting word, no reassurance, no pastoral sympathy. God issues a command: get up. The prostration and anguish are misplaced because Joshua is grieving a military defeat when he should be addressing a covenant violation. The problem is not that God has abandoned Israel — the problem is that Israel has abandoned God's command.
11. Chata Yisrael ('Israel has sinned') — again the corporate formulation. God does not say 'Achan has sinned' but 'Israel has sinned.' The five-fold indictment escalates with repeated v'gam ('and also, and moreover'): (1) avru et b'riti ('they violated my covenant'), (2) laqchu min ha-cherem ('they took from the devoted things'), (3) ganvu ('they stole'), (4) kichash'u ('they deceived/acted falsely'), (5) samu vi-khleiheim ('they put it among their own belongings'). Each 'also' adds a new dimension of guilt — covenant violation, theft, deception, and appropriation. One man's act is described as the nation's sin because covenant solidarity means shared responsibility.
11. Avru et b'riti ('they have transgressed my covenant') — the verb avar ('to cross over, to transgress') here means to cross a boundary that should not be crossed. The irony is sharp: Israel 'crossed' the Jordan by divine power (chapters 3-4) but has now 'crossed' God's covenant boundary by human greed. The same verb for liberation becomes the verb for violation.
12. Ki hayu l'cherem ('because they have become cherem') — the warning of 6:18 has come true. By taking cherem objects into their camp, Israel itself has become cherem — devoted to destruction. The contagion that Joshua warned about has infected the entire nation. Israel is now in the same category as Jericho: marked for divine destruction.

12. Lo osif lihyot immakhem ('I will not continue to be with you') — the most terrifying statement in the chapter. God's presence — the foundation of every promise (1:5, 9; 3:7) — is conditionally withdrawn. The 'I will be with you' that grounded Joshua's courage is now suspended. Without divine presence, Israel is just another small people in Canaan, and the Deuteronomic logic kicks in: no presence no victory no land.
12. Im lo tashmeidu ha-cherem miqirb'khem ('unless you destroy the devoted things from your midst') — the remedy is surgical: the cherem must be removed from the community. The verb hashmid ('to destroy, to annihilate') is severe — whatever is cherem within Israel must be eliminated entirely.
13. Qum qaddesh et ha-am ('Get up, consecrate the people') — the same consecration command as 3:5, but with opposite emotional valence. There, consecration prepared for a miracle of salvation; here, it prepares for a process of judgment. The holiness required to approach God works in both directions — it enables blessing and it exposes sin.
13. Cherem b'qirb'kha Yisrael ('a devoted thing is in your midst, Israel') — God reveals the nature of the problem but not the identity of the offender. Israel knows what has happened (the cherem has been violated) but not who did it. The identification process (vv. 14-18) will narrow from tribe to clan to household to individual — a dramatic winnowing that forces the entire community to stand before God and be examined.
14. The process of identification narrows through four levels: shevet (tribe) mishpachah (clan) bayit (household) g'varim (individual men). The verb yilk'dennu ('will take/select/catch') uses lakad, which means to capture or seize — the language of hunting or trapping. God is closing in on the guilty individual through a systematic elimination process. The method (likely involving sacred lots, the Urim and Thummim) is not specified, but the text presents each selection as God's direct act — YHWH identifies the guilty party at each level.
15. Yissaref ba-esh oto v'et kol asher lo ('he will be burned with fire, he and everything he has') — the punishment mirrors the cherem itself: just as Jericho was burned (6:24), so the covenant violator and all his possessions will be burned. He has made himself cherem by taking cherem, and the treatment of cherem is fire.
15. Ki avar et berit YHWH ('because he has violated the covenant of the LORD') — the violation is framed as covenant breach, not mere theft. This is the language of Deuteronomy 17:2 (the penalty for covenant violation through idolatry). The punishment is proportional to the offense: betraying the covenant that gives Israel the land jeopardizes Israel's hold on the land.
15. Asah n'valah b'Yisrael ('committed an outrage/folly in Israel') — n'valah is a strong term for an act so disgraceful that it shames the entire community. It is used for Shechem's rape of Dinah (Genesis 34:7), the Gibeah atrocity (Judges 19:23-24; 20:6, 10), and Amnon's assault on Tamar (2 Samuel 13:12). The word places Achan's theft alongside the worst acts in Israel's history — not because theft is equivalent to assault, but because covenant treachery against God is an outrage of the highest order.
16. Vayyillakhed shevet Yehudah ('the tribe of Judah was taken/selected') — the lot falls on Judah, the leading tribe, the tribe of Caleb, and later the tribe of David. The violation comes not from a marginal or minor tribe but from Israel's most prominent. The narrative makes no attempt to protect Judah's reputation — faithfulness and unfaithfulness cross all tribal boundaries.
17. The narrowing process moves from tribe (Judah) clan (Zerahites, descended from Zerah son of Judah, Genesis 38:30) household head (Zabdi). Each step tightens the circle around Achan. The public nature of the process means the entire nation watches as the guilt is systematically located — the shame and tension mount with each selection.
18. Vayyillakhed Akhan — the four-generation genealogy from verse 1 is repeated in full, creating a formal identification. The man whose individual act was described as the sin of 'Israel' (v. 1) is now personally identified by name, parentage, and tribe. The process has moved from national guilt to individual accountability — but the text holds both dimensions simultaneously. Achan sinned and Israel sinned; Achan will be punished and Israel will be restored.
19. B'ni ('my son') — Joshua addresses Achan with paternal tenderness, not judicial coldness. The address acknowledges the familial bond within Israel even in the moment of judgment. Joshua is the father-figure of the nation, and the guilty man is still 'my son.'
19. Sim na kavod la-YHWH ... v'ten lo todah ('give glory to the LORD and make confession to him') — the phrase 'give glory' (sim kavod) here means to honor God by telling the truth. Todah can mean both 'thanksgiving' and 'confession' — here it is confession, an acknowledgment of what really happened. Joshua asks Achan to confirm by his own mouth what the divine lot has already revealed. The confession is not for God's benefit (He already knows) but for the community's — truth must be spoken aloud.
20. Omnah anokhi chatati la-YHWH Elohei Yisrael ('truly, I have sinned against the LORD, the God of Israel') — Achan's confession uses the formal first person anokhi ('I') rather than the common ani, giving the confession a gravity and deliberateness. The sin is acknowledged as being against YHWH specifically — not against Israel, not against Joshua, but against God. The confession echoes David's later acknowledgment in Psalm 51:4 ('against you, you alone, have I sinned').
20. V'khazot v'khazot asiti ('and thus and thus I did') — the phrase introduces the detailed confession that follows. Achan hides nothing.
21. Va'ereh ... va'echm'dem ... va'eqqachem ('I saw ... I coveted ... I took') — Achan's confession traces the three-step progression of sin: seeing, desiring, taking. The sequence echoes Eve's temptation in Genesis 3:6 (she saw that the tree was good, she desired it, she took). The narrative pattern is deliberate — coveting leads to taking in both Eden and Jericho, and both acts rupture the covenant relationship.
21. Adderet Shin'ar ('a robe from Shinar') — Shinar is the biblical name for Babylon (Genesis 10:10; 11:2; Daniel 1:2). A Babylonian garment would have been a luxury item of extraordinary value and craftsmanship. The irony: Achan covets a product of the very civilization that will eventually destroy Israel and carry Judah into exile.

- 21. Matayim sh'qalim kesef ('two hundred shekels of silver') — approximately 5 pounds (2.3 kg) of silver. U-l'shon zahav echad chamishim sh'qalim mishqalo ('one bar/tongue of gold weighing fifty shekels') — about 1.25 pounds (0.6 kg) of gold. The total value was enormous — a lifetime's wages for a common laborer. The temptation was real.
- 21. T'munim ba-arets b'tokh ha-oholi ('hidden in the ground inside my tent') — Achan buried the items underground inside his tent, concealing the cherem from human eyes but not from God's.
- 22. Vayyarutsu ha-ohelah ('they ran to the tent') — the urgency is palpable. The messengers run — they do not walk — to verify the confession. V'hinne t'munah b'oholo ('and there it was, hidden in his tent') — the evidence matches Achan's confession exactly. The narrative confirms his honesty in confession, even though it came too late to prevent the consequences.
- 23. Vayyatsiqu lifnei YHWH ('they poured/spread them out before the LORD') — the verb yatsaq ('to pour out') may describe laying the items out on the ground or literally pouring the silver coins/pieces out in a display. The presentation is before YHWH — not merely before Joshua or the people. The stolen goods are returned to their rightful owner: God. The public display forces the entire community to see what coveting and stealing from God looks like.
- 24. The list is comprehensive and devastating: Achan, the stolen items, his sons and daughters, his livestock, his tent, and everything he possesses. The punishment extends beyond Achan to his household — the corporate nature of guilt in ancient Israelite theology means the household shares in the consequences. This is deeply troubling to modern readers, and the text does not soften or explain the extension of punishment to Achan's children. The Covenant Rendering records what the text says without editorial justification or condemnation.
- 24. Emeq Akhor ('the Valley of Achor') — the name means 'Valley of Trouble/Disaster,' derived from the root akhar ('to trouble'), which is the verb Joshua uses in verse 25. The place is named from the event, as with Gilgal (5:9) and Gibeath-haaraloth (5:3). The valley is referenced later in Hosea 2:15, where God promises to make the Valley of Achor 'a door of hope' — transforming the site of judgment into a symbol of restoration.
- 25. Meh akhartanu ya'akhorkha YHWH ba-yom ha-zeh ('Why have you troubled us? The LORD will trouble you today') — the wordplay on akhar ('to trouble, to bring disaster') is central to the passage. Achan's name itself sounds like akhar, and the valley is named from the same root. The punishment matches the crime linguistically: the one who troubled Israel is troubled by God. The play on words is untranslatable without losing either the name or the concept, so the notes must make it explicit.
- 25. Vayyirgemu oto kol Yisrael even vayyisr'fu otam ba-esh vayyisq'lu otam ba-avanim ('all Israel stoned him with stones and burned them with fire and covered them with stones') — the execution is communal (kol Yisrael, 'all Israel') — the entire community participates in removing the cherem from its midst. The shift from singular 'him' (oto) to plural 'them' (otam) in burning and stoning is ambiguous: it may refer to the stolen objects being burned and Achan being stoned, or it may include his family members. The text does not clarify, and the translator notes should acknowledge this ambiguity honestly.
- 26. Vayyashov YHWH mecharon appo ('the LORD turned from his fierce anger') — the removal of the cherem violation restores the covenant relationship. God's anger, which was the cause of the defeat at Ai (vv. 1, 12), is now spent. The passage from 7:1 to 7:26 traces a complete arc: sin divine anger defeat discovery confession punishment restoration. The next chapter will demonstrate the restoration through a successful attack on Ai.
- 26. Gal avanim gadol ('a great pile of stones') — this cairn is the dark counterpart to the memorial stones at Gilgal (4:20). Both are stone memorials that provoke questions; both tell a story. But where the Gilgal stones tell a story of divine faithfulness, the Achor stones tell a story of human unfaithfulness and its cost. The two memorials, set early in the book of Joshua, establish the Deuteronomic pattern: obedience leads to blessing (Gilgal), disobedience to destruction (Achor).
