Summary: God reassures Joshua and gives the strategy for Ai's capture through ambush. Israel destroys Ai, and Joshua builds an altar on Mount Ebal, writing a copy of Moses's Law on plastered stones and reading it before all Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Ai narrative reverses chapter 7: with the cherem violation purged, God fights for Israel again. The ambush strategy (vv. 3-8) is the first use of conventional military tactics in Joshua — after Jericho's miraculous walls, Ai requires human planning within divine authorization. The Ebal ceremony (vv. 30-35) fulfills Deuteronomy 27:2-8 exactly: altar, plastered stones, Torah written, blessings and curses read with all Israel — including women, children, and foreigners — present.

Translation Friction: The troop numbers for the ambush vary between verses 3 and 12 (thirty thousand vs. five thousand), a textual difficulty present in all manuscripts. We rendered both numbers as the Hebrew gives them and noted the discrepancy. The phrase mishneh torat Mosheh (v. 32, 'a copy of the Law of Moses') uses the same mishneh as Deuteronomy 17:18, connecting the king's Torah-copy to this public inscription.

Connections: The Ebal ceremony fulfills Deuteronomy 11:29-30 and 27:1-8. The burning of Ai ('the ruin,' from the Hebrew root meaning 'heap') may be etiological — the city was named for what it became. Joshua's outstretched javelin (v. 18) mirrors Moses's outstretched staff at the Red Sea (Exodus 17:11-12). The inclusion of foreigners in the Torah reading (v. 35) anticipates the Gentile inclusion theme.

¹The LORD said to Joshua, "Do not be afraid and do not lose heart. Take the entire fighting force with you, and move out to attack Ai. See — I have handed over to you the king of Ai, his people, his city, and his land. ²Do to Ai and its king what you did to Jericho and its king — except that you may keep the plunder and livestock for yourselves. Set an ambush behind the city." ³Joshua and the entire fighting force set out to attack Ai. Joshua selected thirty thousand of the best warriors and sent them out at night. ⁴He gave them these orders: "You are to lie in ambush behind the city. Do not go too far from it — all of you stay ready. ⁵I and all the troops with me will advance toward the city. When they come out against us as they did before, we will retreat before them. ⁶They will come out after us until we have drawn them away from the city, because they will think, 'They are fleeing from us just like last time.' So we will flee from them. ⁷Then you will rise from the ambush and take the city. The LORD your God will hand it over to you. ⁸When you have taken the city, set it on fire. Do this according to the word of the LORD. See — I have given you your orders." ⁹Joshua sent them out, and they went to the ambush position and took up their place between Bethel and Ai, west of Ai. Joshua spent that night among the people. ¹⁰Joshua rose early in the morning, mustered the troops, and marched at the head of the army with the elders of Israel toward Ai. ¹¹The entire fighting force with him advanced, approached, and arrived opposite the city. They camped north of Ai, with a valley between them and the city. ¹²He selected roughly five thousand soldiers and stationed them as an ambush force between Bethel and Ai, to the west of the city. ¹³So the people positioned the entire camp north of the city, with its rear guard west of the city. That night Joshua went into the middle of the valley. ¹⁴When the king of Ai saw the Israelites, he and all his men hurried out early to engage Israel in battle at the designated place facing the Arabah. He did not know there was an ambush set against him behind the city. ¹⁵Joshua and all Israel let themselves be driven back before them and fled toward the wilderness. ¹⁶Every man in Ai was called out to pursue them. As they chased Joshua, they were drawn away from the city. ¹⁷Not a man was left in Ai or Bethel who had not gone out after Israel. They left the city wide open and pursued Israel. ¹⁸The LORD said to Joshua, "Hold out the javelin in your hand toward Ai, for I will give it into your hand." So Joshua held out the javelin in his hand toward the city. ¹⁹The ambush force rose quickly from its position and rushed forward the moment he stretched out his hand. They entered the city, captured it, and immediately set it on fire. ²⁰When the men of Ai looked back, they saw the smoke of the city rising to the sky, and they had no strength to flee in any direction — for the force that had been fleeing toward the wilderness now turned on the pursuers. ²¹When Joshua and all Israel saw that the ambush force had captured the city and that smoke was rising from it, they turned and struck down the men of Ai. ²²The ambush force came out of the city to meet them, so the men of Ai were caught in the middle — Israelites on both sides. They struck them down until no survivor or fugitive remained. ²³The king of Ai they captured alive and brought him to Joshua. ²⁴When Israel had finished killing all the inhabitants of Ai in the open field and in the wilderness where they had chased them, and every last one had fallen by the sword, all of Israel returned to Ai and put it to the sword. ²⁵The total who fell that day, both men and women, was twelve thousand — all the people of Ai. ²⁶Joshua did not lower the hand holding the javelin until he had devoted all the inhabitants of Ai to destruction. ²⁷Only the livestock and the plunder of the city did Israel take as spoil for themselves, according to the word of the LORD that he had commanded Joshua. ²⁸Joshua burned Ai and made it a permanent ruin — a desolation to this day. ²⁹He hung the king of Ai on a tree until evening. At sunset, Joshua ordered them to take his body down from the tree and throw it at the entrance of the city gate. They raised a great pile of stones over it that remains to this day. ³⁰Joshua built an altar to the LORD, the God of Israel, on Mount Ebal, ³¹just as Moses the servant of the LORD had commanded the Israelites — as it is written in the book of the law of Moses: an altar of uncut stones, on which no iron tool had been used. On it they offered burnt offerings to the LORD and sacrificed fellowship offerings. ³²There, on the stones, he inscribed a copy of the law of Moses, which Moses had written, in the presence of the Israelites. ³³All Israel — their elders, officers, and judges — stood on both sides of the ark, facing the Levitical priests who carried the ark of the covenant of the LORD. Resident foreigners and native-born alike were there, half facing Mount Gerizim and half facing Mount Ebal, just as Moses the servant of the LORD had earlier commanded for the blessing of the people of Israel. ³⁴After that, he read aloud all the words of the law — the blessings and the curses — exactly as written in the book of the law. ³⁵There was not a single word of everything Moses had commanded that Joshua did not read aloud before the entire assembly of Israel — including the women, the children, and the foreigners living among them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Al tira v'al techat ('do not be afraid and do not lose heart') — the same pair of fear words from 1:9, now repeated after the Ai defeat. God reassures Joshua that the Achan crisis is resolved and the divine presence has been restored. The encouragement is needed: Joshua's last experience at Ai was humiliating flight.
1. Qach imm'kha et kol am ha-milchamah ('take the entire fighting force with you') — a deliberate correction of the first attempt, where scouts recommended sending only two or three thousand (7:3). This time the full army goes. The earlier overconfidence is replaced by proper mobilization under divine instruction.
1. Re'eh natatti b'yadkha ('see, I have given into your hand') — the identical perfect-tense formula from 6:2 (Jericho). The pattern reasserts itself: God declares the victory accomplished before the battle begins. The divine grant that was suspended during the Achan crisis is now restored.
2. Raq sh'lalah uv'hemtah tavozu lakhem ('only its plunder and livestock you may take for yourselves') — the critical difference from Jericho: Ai is not under full cherem. The spoils may be kept. This makes Achan's sin in chapter 7 even more bitter — had he simply waited for the next city, the plunder would have been legitimately his. His impatience cost him everything.
2. Sim l'kha orev la-ir me'achareha ('set an ambush behind the city') — unlike Jericho's liturgical warfare, Ai will fall by conventional military tactics: an ambush. God prescribes different methods for different situations. The theological point is not that Israel must always fight by miracle but that Israel must always fight under divine direction. Obedience is the constant; the tactics vary.
3. Sh'loshim elef ish gibborei ha-chayil ('thirty thousand men, mighty warriors') — this is the ambush force. The number is far larger than the first Ai expedition (three thousand, 7:3-4). Some scholars note a tension between this figure and the five thousand of verse 12, suggesting either two ambush groups or a textual variant. The narrative may describe a large main force with a smaller specialized ambush detachment.
4. Al tarcheiqu min ha-ir me'od ('do not go too far from the city') — the ambush force must remain close enough to strike quickly when the signal comes. Vihyitem kulkhem n'khonim ('all of you be ready/prepared') — the participle nakkon conveys a state of constant readiness. There will be no second chance to spring the trap.
5. V'nasnu lifneihem ('we will flee before them') — Joshua plans a feigned retreat, deliberately mimicking the genuine rout of the first battle (7:4-5). The defenders of Ai will see what they expect to see: Israelites fleeing again. The tactical deception works because it exploits the enemy's confidence built on their previous victory. What was Israel's genuine shame in chapter 7 becomes a strategic tool in chapter 8.
6. Ad hatiqenu otam min ha-ir ('until we have pulled them away from the city') — the verb nataq ('to pull away, to draw out') describes the lure. The tactical objective is clear: empty the city of defenders by exploiting their overconfidence. Ki yomru nasim l'faneinu ka'asher ba-rishonah ('because they will say, they are fleeing before us as at first') — Joshua reads the enemy's psychology perfectly. The Ai defenders' greatest strength (their previous victory) becomes their fatal vulnerability.
7. V'horisitem et ha-ir ('you will take possession of the city') — the verb yarash ('to take possession, to dispossess') reappears — the key conquest verb from chapter 1. Un'tanah YHWH Eloheikhem b'yedkhem ('the LORD your God will give it into your hand') — even within conventional military tactics, the victory is attributed to divine action. The ambush succeeds because God gives the city, not because the tactic is clever.
8. Tatsivu et ha-ir ba-esh ('set the city on fire') — the burning of Ai parallels the burning of Jericho (6:24). Fire serves as the instrument of divine judgment. Kidvar YHWH ta'asu ('according to the word of the LORD you will do') — Joshua frames his tactical orders as divine command. Military action and covenant obedience remain fused: even the ambush is 'according to the word of the LORD.'
9. Vayyalen Yehoshua ba-lailah ha-hu b'tokh ha-am ('Joshua spent that night among the troops') — the commander sleeps with his soldiers in the field. The detail humanizes Joshua and demonstrates his solidarity with the army on the eve of battle.
10. Vayyifqod et ha-am ('he mustered/reviewed the troops') — the verb paqad ('to visit, to attend to, to muster, to count') here describes a military review before deployment. Joshua personally inspects and organizes the force before the advance.
11. V'ha-gay beino u-vein ha-Ai ('with the valley between him and Ai') — the valley separates the main force from the city, creating a visible gap. The defenders of Ai will see the Israelite camp across the valley and come out to engage — not realizing the ambush force is hidden behind them to the west (v. 9). The geography sets the trap.
12. Ka-chameshet alafim ish ('about five thousand men') — this second ambush group (or a more specific number for the same ambush) has prompted scholarly discussion about the relationship to the thirty thousand of verse 3. The most common explanations: (1) two separate ambush forces at different positions, (2) a textual variant where the numbers reflect different source traditions, or (3) verse 12 specifies a specialized strike team within the larger force. The narrative does not resolve the tension, and the rendering follows the text as it stands.

13. Et aqev miyyam la-ir ('its rear/heel west of the city') — the word aqev ('heel, rear') describes the trailing element — the ambush force positioned behind (west of) the city. The main camp is visible to the north; the ambush is hidden to the west. The trap is set.
13. Vayyalekh Yehoshua ba-lailah ha-hu b'tokh ha-emeq ('Joshua went that night into the middle of the valley') — Joshua positions himself in the valley between his camp and Ai, making himself visible and vulnerable. He is the bait.
14. V'hu lo yada ki orev lo me'acharei ha-ir ('he did not know there was an ambush behind the city') — the narrator highlights the king's fatal ignorance. His previous victory (7:4-5) has made him overconfident. La-mo'ed lifnei ha-aravah ('at the appointed place/time, facing the Arabah') — the phrase la-mo'ed may mean 'at the appointed time' (a prearranged battle position) or 'at the designated place.' Either way, the king deploys to the expected battle zone — and walks into the trap.
15. Vayyinnag'u ('they allowed themselves to be struck/driven back') — the niphal form suggests the retreat is permitted rather than forced. The feigned rout toward the wilderness (derekh ha-midbar, the eastward road) draws the defenders away from the city and deeper into the trap. The discipline required to execute a convincing fake retreat — running as if genuinely terrified while maintaining unit cohesion — is one of the most difficult maneuvers in ancient warfare.
16. Vayyinnat'qu min ha-ir ('they were drawn/pulled away from the city') — the verb nataq ('to be pulled, to be torn away') is the same verb Joshua used in verse 6 (hatiqenu, 'we will pull them away'). The plan unfolds exactly as designed. The key detail: kol ha-am asher ba-Ai ('all the people who were in Ai') — every defender leaves the city. No one remains to guard it.
17. Vayyaazvu et ha-ir p'tuchah ('they left the city open') — the gates stand open, the walls undefended, the city empty. The mention of Bethel (beit El) suggests Bethel's forces had joined Ai's pursuit, leaving both cities undefended. The folly is complete: the entire defensive force has abandoned its fortification to chase a retreating enemy into open ground.
18. N'teh ba-kidon asher b'yadkha el ha-Ai ('stretch out the javelin that is in your hand toward Ai') — the gesture deliberately echoes Moses stretching out his staff over the Red Sea (Exodus 14:16, 26) and during the battle with Amalek (Exodus 17:8-13). Joshua's extended weapon is not a military signal but a symbolic act of divine power channeled through the leader's hand. The kidon ('javelin' or 'curved sword/scimitar') becomes a ritual instrument, like Moses's staff.
18. Ki v'yadkha ettenannah ('for I will give it into your hand') — the javelin in Joshua's hand becomes a pun: God will give the city 'into his hand' while Joshua extends the weapon in his hand. Physical gesture and divine action converge.
19. Kin'tot yado ('when he stretched out his hand') — Joshua's extended javelin serves as both the divine signal and the tactical signal. The ambush springs the moment his hand goes up. The synchronization is perfect: the feigned retreat draws the enemy out, Joshua raises the javelin, and the ambush force storms the empty city.
19. Vaymaharu vayyatsivu et ha-ir ba-esh ('they hurried and set the city on fire') — speed is essential. The smoke will serve as the signal to the pursuing Ai defenders that their city is lost (v. 20).
20. V'lo hayah vahem yadayim lanus hennah va-hennah ('they had no power/hands to flee this way or that') — the idiom 'no hands' (yadayim) means no capacity, no means of escape. The Ai forces are caught in the open between the main Israelite force (now turning to fight) and the ambush force emerging from the burning city behind them. The trap is complete.
20. V'ha-am ha-nas ha-midbar nehphakh el ha-rodef ('the people fleeing toward the wilderness turned on the pursuers') — the verb hafakh ('to turn, to reverse') captures the sudden reversal: hunters become prey, pursuers become the pursued. The fake retreat becomes a real attack.
21. The smoke serves as the signal that closes the trap. Joshua sees the smoke, confirms the ambush has succeeded, and orders the main force to turn and fight. The Ai defenders now face combat on two fronts with no city to retreat to.
22. Vayyihyu l'Yisrael ba-tavekh ('they were in the midst of Israel') — the Ai fighters are completely surrounded, Israelites on every side. Ad bilti hish'ir lo sarid u-falit ('until there was no survivor or fugitive left') — the destruction is total. The double term sarid u-falit ('survivor and fugitive') is a merism meaning absolutely no one escaped.
23. Taf'su chai ('they captured alive') — the king is taken alive for judgment, not killed in battle. His fate will be described in verse 29. The capture of the king personally represents the complete overthrow of Ai's political and military authority.
24. The narrative describes two phases of killing: first the defenders caught in the open field during the pursuit, then the remaining population in the city itself. L'fi cherev ('by the mouth of the sword') — the standard idiom for death in combat. The phrase ad tummam ('until they were finished/consumed') from the root tamam ('to be complete') indicates total destruction.
25. Sh'neim asar elef ('twelve thousand') — the total population of Ai. As with other large numbers in Joshua, elef may function as a military unit term ('contingent') rather than the numeral 'thousand,' which would yield a smaller but still significant figure. Kol anshei ha-Ai ('all the people of Ai') — the city's entire population. The text does not flinch from recording total destruction.
26. Lo heshiv yado asher natah ba-kidon ('he did not withdraw his hand that he had stretched out with the javelin') — the parallel to Moses holding up his hands during the battle with Amalek (Exodus 17:11-12) is now explicit. As long as Moses's hands were raised, Israel prevailed; when they dropped, Amalek prevailed. Joshua holds his javelin aloft throughout the entire battle. The raised weapon is an act of sustained faith and divine channeling, not a military command signal.

26. Ad asher hecherim et kol yosh'vei ha-Ai ('until he had devoted all the inhabitants of Ai to destruction') — the verb hecherim (hiphil of charam) applies the sacred ban. Despite the permission to take plunder (v. 2), the people themselves are placed under cherem.
27. Kidvar YHWH asher tsivvah et Yehoshua ('according to the word of the LORD that he commanded Joshua') — Israel obeys the plunder permission of verse 2 precisely. The contrast with Achan's violation is pointed: when God permits plunder, Israel takes it lawfully; when God prohibits it (Jericho), one man's disobedience brought disaster. The lesson is not 'never take spoils' but 'take only what God permits.'
28. Tel olam sh'mamah ('a permanent mound/ruin, a desolation') — a tel is an artificial mound formed by accumulated layers of destruction and rebuilding. Here the tel will not be rebuilt — it remains a sh'mamah ('desolation, wasteland') olam ('permanently'). The name ha-Ai ('the ruin') proves prophetically fitting: the city whose name means 'ruin' becomes a permanent ruin. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') again signals the narrator's temporal distance and the enduring visibility of the site.
29. Talah al ha-ets ('hung on a tree/pole') — public exposure of an executed enemy as a display of total victory. The practice is regulated in Deuteronomy 21:22-23, which commands that a hanged body must be removed before nightfall: 'you must not leave his body on the tree overnight, for a hanged person is cursed by God, and you must not defile the land.' Joshua obeys this law precisely — ukh'vo ha-shemesh ('at sunset') the body is taken down.
29. Vayyaqimu alav gal avanim gadol ('they raised a great pile of stones over him') — the third stone cairn in Joshua, after the memorial at Gilgal (4:20) and the cairn over Achan (7:26). Each cairn tells a different story: divine faithfulness (Gilgal), Israelite unfaithfulness (Achor), and enemy defeat (Ai). The landscape fills with stone witnesses.
30. The narrative abruptly shifts from battlefield to sanctuary. Joshua builds an altar on Mount Ebal, fulfilling Moses's command in Deuteronomy 27:4-8. The location is significant: Ebal and Gerizim flank the valley of Shechem, roughly in the center of Canaan. Israel has marched approximately twenty miles north from Ai without reported opposition — either the Canaanite collapse of nerve (5:1) kept them from resisting, or the narrative condenses the journey. The covenant renewal ceremony (vv. 30-35) is the theological climax of the conquest's first phase.
31. Mizbach avanim sh'lemot asher lo henif aleihem barzel ('an altar of whole/uncut stones on which no iron was lifted') — the altar is built from undressed stones, following the regulation of Exodus 20:25 and Deuteronomy 27:5-6. The prohibition against using iron tools preserves the stones' natural state — human craftsmanship must not alter what will serve as a point of contact between God and Israel.
31. Olot ('burnt offerings') and sh'lamim ('fellowship/peace offerings') — the two primary categories of voluntary sacrifice. The olah is entirely consumed by fire (total dedication to God); the sh'lamim involves a shared meal (communion between God and worshipers). Together they represent complete worship: total devotion and covenant fellowship.
31. Ka'asher tsivvah Mosheh ... ka-katuv b'sefer torat Mosheh ('as Moses commanded ... as written in the book of the law of Moses') — the altar is built not by Joshua's design but by Moses's prior instruction. Every detail of the covenant renewal traces back to Mosaic authority, reinforcing the continuity of the Sinai covenant into the promised land.
32. Mishneh torat Mosheh ('a copy of the law of Moses') — the word mishneh means 'copy, duplicate, second version.' This fulfills Deuteronomy 27:3, 8, which commanded the law to be written on plastered stones at the site. The inscription creates a permanent, public, visible record of the covenant terms in the promised land. What was spoken at Sinai and repeated on the plains of Moab is now inscribed in stone at the heart of Canaan.
32. Lifnei b'nei Yisrael ('in the presence of the Israelites') — the writing is a public act, witnessed by the entire assembly. The covenant is not a secret agreement between God and the leaders but a public commitment of the whole nation.
33. Ka-ger ka-ezrach ('foreigner and native-born alike') — the covenant assembly includes non-Israelites who live among them. The ger ('resident alien, sojourner') stands alongside the ezrach ('native-born citizen') in the covenant ceremony. This inclusivity is theologically significant: covenant membership extends beyond ethnic boundaries. Rahab and her household (6:25) would be among these gerim.
33. Chetsyo el mul har Gerizim v'ha-chetsyo el mul har Ebal ('half facing Mount Gerizim and half facing Mount Ebal') — the two mountains flank the valley of Shechem like a natural amphitheater. Gerizim is the mountain of blessing, Ebal the mountain of curse (Deuteronomy 11:29; 27:12-13). Israel stands between blessing and curse, surrounded by the physical landscape of covenant consequence. The arrangement fulfills Deuteronomy 27:11-13 precisely.
34. Et kol divrei ha-torah ha-b'rakhah v'ha-q'lalah ('all the words of the instruction, the blessing and the curse') — the content read aloud is the Deuteronomic covenant: the blessings for obedience (Deuteronomy 28:1-14) and the curses for disobedience (Deuteronomy 28:15-68). The Ebal/Gerizim ceremony makes the Deuteronomic theology physically and audibly real: Israel hears the blessings from one mountain and the curses from the other, surrounded by the consequences of their covenant choice.
34. K'kol ha-katuv b'sefer ha-torah ('according to everything written in the book of the law') — nothing is omitted. The entire covenant document is read publicly. This is the torah meditation of 1:8 enacted communally — the book of the law on the lips of the whole nation.
35. Lo hayah davar mikkol asher tsivvah Mosheh asher lo qara Yehoshua ('there was not a word of everything Moses commanded that Joshua did not read') — the double negative creates an emphatic positive: Joshua read absolutely everything. Not a single word of the Mosaic instruction was skipped. This verse serves as the certification that Joshua fulfilled the torah charge of 1:7-8 completely.
35. V'ha-nashim v'ha-taf v'ha-ger ha-holekh b'qirbam ('the women, the children, and the foreigners living among them') — the audience is comprehensive. Covenant responsibility and covenant knowledge belong to every member of the community: men, women, children, and resident foreigners. No one is excluded from hearing the terms. The chapter closes with the fullest possible picture of covenant Israel: an army that has conquered through obedience, standing between the mountains of blessing and curse, listening to every word of the law that defines their relationship with God.

Summary: The Gibeonites deceive Israel with worn-out clothes and stale bread, claiming to be from a distant land. Israel makes a peace treaty without consulting God. When the deception is discovered, the Gibeonites are spared but made permanent servants.

What Makes This Remarkable: The phrase 'they did not ask counsel from the mouth of the LORD' (v. 14, et-pi YHWH lo sha'alu) is the chapter's verdict — the failure is not military but prayerful. Israel's leaders relied on their own investigation (they inspected the evidence) rather than inquiring of God. The Gibeonites' strategy exploits Deuteronomy 20:10-15, which allows peace treaties with distant cities — they pretend to be far away to qualify for the exception.

Translation Friction: The phrase berit shalom (v. 15, 'covenant of peace') uses the covenant vocabulary for what is essentially a treaty obtained by fraud. We rendered it as 'treaty' to distinguish it from divine covenant. The Gibeonites' punishment — 'woodcutters and water carriers for the house of my God' (v. 23) — transforms them from free deceivers into temple servants, a judgment that is also a kind of inclusion.

Connections: The Gibeonite treaty has consequences in 2 Samuel 21:1-9, where Saul's violation of it brings famine. Gibeon becomes a significant site: the tabernacle is located there (1 Chronicles 21:29, 2 Chronicles 1:3), and Solomon receives his wisdom vision at Gibeon (1 Kings 3:4-5). The failure to inquire of God echoes the Ai disaster (ch. 7) and anticipates Saul's failures in 1 Samuel.

¹When all the kings west of the Jordan heard what had happened — those in the hill country, the lowlands, and all along the coast of the Great Sea toward Lebanon — the Hittites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites — ²they gathered together as one to fight against Joshua and Israel. ³But when the people of Gibeon learned how Joshua had dealt with Jericho and Ai, ⁴and they too acted — but with cunning. They set out disguised as envoys, loading their donkeys with worn-out sacks and old wineskins that were cracked and patched. ⁵They wore old, patched sandals on their feet and threadbare clothes on their backs. All the bread in their provisions was dry and crumbling. ⁶They went to Joshua at the camp at Gilgal and said to him and to the men of Israel, "We have come from a distant land. Make a covenant with us." ⁷The men of Israel said to the Hivites, "Perhaps you actually live among us — how then could we make a covenant with you?" ⁸They said to Joshua, "We are your servants." Joshua asked them, "Who are you, and where do you come from?" ⁹They said to him, "Your servants have come from a very distant land because of the reputation of the LORD your God. For we have heard the report of him — all that he did in Egypt, ¹⁰and everything he did to the two Amorite kings east of the Jordan — Sihon king of Heshbon and Og king of Bashan, who ruled from Ashtaroth. ¹¹So our elders and all who live in our land told us, 'Take provisions for the journey, go to meet them, and say to them: We are your servants — now make a covenant with us.' ¹²This bread of ours — we packed it hot from our homes the day we set out to come to you. But look at it now: dry and crumbling. ¹³These wineskins that we filled were new — and look, they are cracked. And these clothes and sandals of ours are worn out from the very long journey." ¹⁴The men examined their provisions but did not seek the counsel of the LORD. ¹⁵Joshua made peace with them and made a covenant with them to let them live, and the leaders of the community swore an oath to them. ¹⁶Three days after they had made the covenant with them, the Israelites learned that the Gibeonites were actually their neighbors — living right among them. ¹⁷The Israelites set out and arrived at their cities on the third day. Their cities were Gibeon, Chephirah, Beeroth, and Kiriath-jearim. ¹⁸The Israelites did not attack them, because the leaders of the community had sworn an oath to them by the LORD, the God of Israel. But the entire community grumbled against the leaders. ¹⁹But all the leaders said to the entire community, "We have sworn an oath to them by the LORD, the God of Israel, and now we cannot touch them. ²⁰This is what we will do with them: we will let them live, so that wrath does not come upon us because of the oath we swore to them." ²¹The leaders said regarding them, "Let them live" — and they became woodcutters and water carriers for the entire community, as the leaders had decreed. ²²Joshua summoned them and said, "Why did you deceive us by saying, 'We are very far from you,' when you actually live among us? ²³Now you are under a curse: none of you will ever be freed from servitude — from being woodcutters and water carriers for the house of my God." ²⁴They answered Joshua, "It was clearly reported to your servants that the LORD your God commanded his servant Moses to give you the entire land and to destroy all its inhabitants before you. We were terrified for our lives because of you, and that is why we did this. ²⁵Now we are in your hands. Do to us whatever seems good and right to you." ²⁶Joshua did so — he rescued them from the Israelites, and they were not killed. ²⁷That day Joshua assigned them as woodcutters and water carriers for the community and for the altar of the LORD — a role they hold to this day — at the place he would choose.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The geographic sweep covers the entire land: ba-har ('in the hill country,' the central highlands), ba-sh'felah ('in the lowlands,' the western foothills), and b'khol chof ha-yam ha-gadol ('along the entire coast of the Great Sea,' the Mediterranean coast). Six nations are listed — one less than the standard seven of Deuteronomy 7:1, with the Girgashites absent. The news of Jericho, Ai, and the Ebal covenant ceremony has reached every corner of Canaan.
2. Vayyitqab'tsu yachdav ... peh echad ('they gathered together ... with one mouth') — the Canaanite kings form a coalition, speaking 'with one voice.' This is the opposite of the individual paralysis described in 2:9-11 and 5:1. Fear has given way to desperation: united resistance is their last option. The coalition will be tested in chapter 10 (the southern campaign) and chapter 11 (the northern campaign).
3. The Gibeonites (introduced in verse 3) chose a different strategy from the coalition. While the other cities unite for war, Gibeon chooses deception for survival. The contrast frames chapter 9: two Canaanite responses to the Israelite threat — fight or fake.
3. V'yosh'vei Giv'on ('the inhabitants of Gibeon') — Gibeon was a significant Hivite city (v. 7; 11:19) approximately six miles northwest of Jerusalem, controlling strategic territory in the central highlands. Rather than join the coalition or fight alone, they choose a third path: negotiation through deception. Their strategy is driven by the same intelligence Rahab acted on — YHWH has given Israel the land — but their method is fraud rather than faith.
4. Vayya'asu gam hemmah b'ormah ('they too acted, but with cunning') — the word ormah ('cunning, craftiness, shrewdness') is the same word used to describe the serpent in Genesis 3:1 (arum, 'crafty'). The Gibeonites' deception echoes the primal deception of Eden. Vayyitstayaru ('they disguised themselves as envoys/provisioners') — the verb is debated; it may derive from tsir ('envoy, ambassador') or tseidah ('provisions'), suggesting either that they posed as diplomatic envoys or that they prepared fake travel provisions. The evidence supports both: they come as supposed ambassadors from a distant land, carrying provisions staged to look road-worn.
5. The staging is meticulous: ne'alot balot um'tulla'ot ('worn-out, patched sandals'), s'lamot balot ('worn-out garments'), lechem tseidam yavesh nikuddim ('dry, crumbling bread'). Every visible detail tells the same story: these people have traveled an immense distance. The deception works because it appeals to the evidence of the senses — what can be seen, touched, and examined. The Gibeonites understand that Israel's leaders will evaluate the physical evidence rather than consulting God (v. 14).
6. Me-erets r'choqah banu ('from a distant land we have come') — the claim of distant origin is the key deception. Deuteronomy 20:10-15 distinguishes between distant cities (which may be offered peace terms) and cities within the promised land (which must be placed under cherem). The Gibeonites know this distinction and exploit it: by pretending to come from far away, they make themselves eligible for a covenant that cities within Canaan cannot receive.
6. Kirtu lanu v'rit ('cut a covenant with us') — the Gibeonites ask for a berit, a binding covenant agreement. The verb karat ('to cut') refers to the ancient practice of cutting sacrificial animals when making a covenant (cf. Genesis 15:10, 17-18). They are asking for the most solemn, irrevocable form of agreement Israel can offer.
7. The Israelites' initial suspicion is exactly right: ulai b'qirbi attah yoshev ('perhaps you dwell in my midst'). They know the Deuteronomic prohibition against covenants with local populations (Deuteronomy 7:2). The narrator identifies the Gibeonites as ha-Chivvi ('the Hivites') — information the Israelites do not yet possess. The dramatic irony builds: the reader knows what the characters do not.
7. V'eikh ekhrat l'kha berit ('how could I cut a covenant with you?') — the question demonstrates Israel's awareness of the legal restriction. They recognize the danger but will ultimately fail to verify the Gibeonites' claim.
8. Avadekha anachnu ('we are your servants') — the Gibeonites offer submission before revealing their identity. The term avadim ('servants') in a diplomatic context signals willingness to accept vassal status — a subordinate position in exchange for protection. Joshua's question mi attem u-me'ayin tavo'u ('who are you and where do you come from?') is the right question. The tragedy is that he will accept a false answer.
9. L'shem YHWH Elohekha ('because of the name of the LORD your God') — the Gibeonites frame their approach in theological terms, mirroring Rahab's confession (2:9-11). They claim to have come because of YHWH's fame — His shem ('name, reputation'). This is partially true: they genuinely fear YHWH's power. But unlike Rahab, who acted in transparent faith, the Gibeonites wrap truth in deception.

9. The Gibeonites carefully mention only events from the distant past (Egypt, the Transjordan kings) and omit any reference to Jericho or Ai (vv. 9-10). This calculated omission supports their claim of distant origin — they would not yet have heard of recent local events.
10. The Gibeonites cite the same two victories Rahab cited (2:10) — Sihon and Og — but strategically omit Jericho and Ai. Rahab mentioned all the evidence, including the recent Jordan crossing; the Gibeonites edit the evidence to fit their cover story. The parallel shows how the same information can serve different purposes: Rahab used it for honest confession, the Gibeonites for calculated deception.
11. The Gibeonites construct a plausible diplomatic backstory: their elders (z'qeneinu) and populace sent them as official envoys with provisions for a long journey. The fabricated narrative is coherent and detailed — exactly the kind of story that is difficult to disprove without independent verification.
12. Zeh lachmenu cham hitstayadnu oto mibatteinu b'yom tsetenu ('this bread of ours was hot when we packed it from our houses on the day we left') — the Gibeonites use their staged props as evidence. They invite Joshua to examine the bread, the wineskins, and the clothing (vv. 12-13) — all of which appear to confirm a long journey. The appeal is to sensory evidence: see, touch, examine. The deception succeeds precisely because the evidence is tangible.
13. The three categories of staged evidence — bread, wineskins, clothing — create a cumulative case. Each item independently supports the same conclusion: a long journey from a distant land. The deception is a masterpiece of material fabrication. Me-rov ha-derekh me'od ('from the very long road') — they emphasize distance one final time.
14. V'et pi YHWH lo sha'alu ('and the mouth/counsel of the LORD they did not ask') — this is the pivotal failure of the entire chapter, stated with devastating brevity. Israel's leaders examined the physical evidence (vayyiqchu me-tseidam, 'they took from their provisions' — tasting or inspecting the bread), and it checked out. But they never consulted God. The contrast with Joshua's earlier obedience is sharp: the same leader who stood barefoot on holy ground (5:15) and held his javelin aloft at God's command (8:18) now makes a binding covenant without asking God's opinion.
14. The lesson is pointed: sensory evidence can deceive; only divine counsel is reliable. This is the chapter's theological center — not that deception exists (it always will) but that Israel had the means to detect it (consulting God through the Urim and Thummim or the high priest) and chose not to use it.
15. Vayya'as lahem Yehoshua shalom vayyikhrot lahem berit l'chayotam ('Joshua made peace with them and cut a covenant with them to let them live') — three binding commitments in rapid succession: peace (shalom), covenant (berit), and an oath (vayyishav'u). The leaders (n'si'ei ha-edah, 'the chiefs/princes of the assembly') participate in the oath, making it a communal commitment, not just Joshua's personal decision. The oath, sworn in YHWH's name (v. 18), will prove irrevocable — just as the oath to Rahab was irrevocable (6:22-25).
16. Miktseh sh'loshet yamim ('at the end of three days') — the same three-day formula that marks transitions throughout Joshua (1:11; 2:16, 22; 3:2). Ki q'rovim hem elav u-v'qirbo hem yosh'vim ('they are near to him and in his midst they are dwelling') — the revelation that the Gibeonites are local, not distant, arrives after the covenant is sealed. The oath has been sworn; it cannot be undone. The deception has succeeded.
17. The Gibeonite territory encompasses four cities — a significant confederation, not a single small town. These cities controlled strategic routes in the central highlands, making the Gibeonite alliance militarily valuable even if it was obtained by fraud. Kiriath-jearim will later become the resting place of the ark of the covenant (1 Samuel 7:1-2; 2 Samuel 6:2).
18. Ki nishb'u lahem n'si'ei ha-edah ba-YHWH Elohei Yisrael ('because the leaders had sworn to them by the LORD, the God of Israel') — the oath, even though obtained by fraud, is binding because it was sworn in YHWH's name. An oath by God cannot be broken without bringing guilt on the oath-taker. This principle will be confirmed centuries later when Saul violates the Gibeonite covenant and God sends a famine as punishment (2 Samuel 21:1-9).
18. Vayyillonu kol ha-edah al ha-n'si'im ('the entire community grumbled against the leaders') — the verb lun ('to grumble, to murmur') is the same word used for Israel's wilderness complaints against Moses (Exodus 15:24; 16:2; 17:3; Numbers 14:2). The people's anger is understandable but misdirected — the leaders made the oath, but the failure to consult God was a communal responsibility.
19. Lo nukhal lingo'a bahem ('we cannot touch them') — the leaders acknowledge the binding nature of the oath. Even a fraudulently obtained oath in YHWH's name creates an inviolable obligation. The theology of oath-keeping is absolute: God's name, once invoked, commits the speaker regardless of the circumstances under which the oath was made.
20. V'lo yihyeh aleinu qetsef al ha-sh'vu'ah ('so that wrath does not come upon us because of the oath') — the leaders fear divine qetsef ('wrath') if they break the oath. The oath creates a protective boundary around the Gibeonites: to harm them would bring God's anger upon Israel. This is not mere superstition — the narrative of 2 Samuel 21 will confirm that God does indeed punish covenant violations against the Gibeonites.
21. Chot'vei etsim v'sho'avei mayim ('woodcutters and water carriers') — the most menial labor in ancient Israelite society. The Gibeonites are given their lives but assigned permanent servitude. This represents a compromise: the oath protects their lives, but their deception costs them their freedom. The specific tasks — cutting wood and drawing water — are associated with sanctuary service in verse 23 and 27, suggesting their labor was specifically directed toward the tabernacle/temple.
22. Lammah rimmitem otanu ('why did you deceive us?') — Joshua confronts the Gibeonites directly. The verb rimmah ('to deceive, to defraud') is strong — this is deliberate fraud. Joshua's anger is evident, but the confrontation does not lead to violence, because the oath holds.

23. Arurim attem ('you are cursed') — Joshua pronounces a curse, but it is a qualified one. The Gibeonites are not sentenced to death (as they would have been under cherem) but to permanent menial service. The curse attaches them to l'veit Elohai ('to the house of my God') — their servitude is specifically directed toward the sanctuary. Their deception saves their lives but binds their descendants to permanent temple service.
23. The Gibeonites' ultimate fate is not without dignity: serving at the house of God places them in proximity to the divine presence. The Nethinim ('temple servants') mentioned in Ezra and Nehemiah are often identified with the descendants of these Gibeonite servants — a permanent place in Israel's worship, however menial its origin.
24. Ki huggad huggad la-avadekha ('it was certainly told to your servants') — the infinitive absolute construction intensifies: they received definitive, unambiguous intelligence about God's command. The Gibeonites' explanation is honest: they knew about the cherem command (l'hashmid et kol yosh'vei ha-arets, 'to destroy all the inhabitants of the land') and feared for their lives (vanira me'od l'nafshoteinu, 'we were terrified for our lives'). Their deception was a survival strategy driven by accurate theological intelligence. They are not ignorant of YHWH — they know His commands and act accordingly, even if dishonestly.
25. Hinn'nu v'yadekha ('here we are, in your hand') — complete surrender. Ka-tov v'kha-yashar b'einekha la'asot lanu aseh ('what is good and right in your eyes to do to us, do') — the Gibeonites place themselves entirely at Joshua's mercy, asking only for what is 'good and right' (tov v'yashar). The phrase yashar ('right, upright') appeals to justice: they trust that Joshua's character will prevent gratuitous cruelty even against those who deceived him.
26. Vayyatsel otam miyyad b'nei Yisrael ('he rescued them from the hand of the Israelites') — the verb natsal ('to rescue, to deliver') is normally used for God rescuing Israel. Here Joshua rescues Canaanites from his own people. The irony is layered: Israel's general protects Hivites from Israelite anger, upholding an oath obtained through fraud, because God's name was invoked and cannot be dishonored.
27. L'mizbach YHWH ('for the altar of the LORD') — the Gibeonites' servitude is specifically tied to the sacrificial worship of Israel. Their labor supports the altar — cutting the wood that fuels the burnt offerings and carrying the water needed for ritual cleansing. El ha-maqom asher yivchar ('at the place he would choose') — a direct Deuteronomic phrase referring to the future central sanctuary (Deuteronomy 12:5, 11, 14, 18). The narrator anticipates the eventual temple site in Jerusalem.
27. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') — the Gibeonites' status as temple servants persisted into the narrator's own time. The Nethinim ('given ones') mentioned in Ezra 2:43-58 and Nehemiah 7:46-60 among the returnees from Babylonian exile are likely their descendants — still serving at God's house centuries later. The deception that saved their lives also defined their vocation for generations.

Summary: Five Amorite kings attack Gibeon for allying with Israel. Joshua marches all night to defend them. God hurls hailstones from heaven, and Joshua commands the sun and moon to stand still. The five kings are executed, and southern Canaan is conquered.

What Makes This Remarkable: The sun standing still (vv. 12-13) is the most extraordinary event in Joshua. The poem — 'Sun, stand still at Gibeon; Moon, at the Valley of Aijalon' — is quoted from the Book of Jashar, a lost collection of ancient Hebrew poetry. The narrator adds: 'there has been no day like it before or since, when the LORD listened to the voice of a man' (v. 14). The reversal is striking: throughout the Torah, humans listen to God's voice; here God listens to a human's.

Translation Friction: The verb dom (v. 12, 'be still/silent') applied to the sun could mean it stopped moving, stopped shining, or was silenced — the Hebrew is ambiguous between cessation of motion and cessation of light. We rendered it 'stand still' following the traditional understanding and noted the alternatives. The phrase hacharim (v. 40, 'devoted to destruction') applies the cherem to the entire southern campaign.

Connections: The Book of Jashar is also cited in 2 Samuel 1:18 (David's lament). The hailstone victory echoes the plague tradition (Exodus 9:18-26) and anticipates Ezekiel 38:22 and Revelation 16:21. The five-king execution in the cave (vv. 22-27) establishes a pattern repeated in Judges. The command 'do not be afraid' (v. 8) echoes 1:9 and Deuteronomy 31:6.

¶When Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem learned that Joshua had captured Ai and devoted it to destruction — doing to Ai and its king exactly as he had done to Jericho and its king — and that the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel and were now living among them, ¶he was terrified, because Gibeon was a major city — like one of the royal capitals — and larger than Ai, with all its men being seasoned warriors. ¶So Adoni-zedek king of Jerusalem sent word to Hoham king of Hebron, Piram king of Jarmuth, Japhia king of Lachish, and Debir king of Eglon: ¶"Come up and help me. Let us attack Gibeon, because it has made peace with Joshua and the Israelites." ⁵The five Amorite kings — the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, and the king of Eglon — gathered their forces, marched up, and besieged Gibeon, attacking it. ⁶The men of Gibeon sent an urgent message to Joshua at the camp at Gilgal: "Do not abandon your servants! Come up to us quickly — rescue us and help us! All the Amorite kings of the hill country have joined forces against us." ⁷Joshua marched up from Gilgal with his entire fighting force and all his best warriors. ⁸The LORD said to Joshua, "Do not be afraid of them, for I have handed them over to you. Not one of them will stand against you." ⁹Joshua fell upon them suddenly, having marched up all night from Gilgal. ¹⁰The LORD threw them into panic before Israel. He struck them with a devastating blow at Gibeon, then pursued them along the ascent of Beth-horon and struck them all the way to Azekah and Makkedah. ¹¹As they fled down from Beth-horon before Israel, the LORD hurled massive stones from the sky upon them all the way to Azekah, and they died. More were killed by the hailstones than the Israelites killed with the sword. ¹²Then Joshua spoke to the LORD on the day the LORD gave the Amorites over to Israel, and he declared in the presence of all Israel: "Sun — stand still over Gibeon! Moon — hold your place over the Valley of Aijalon!" ¹³The sun stood still and the moon held its place until the nation had taken vengeance on its enemies. Is this not recorded in the Book of Jashar? The sun stopped in the middle of the sky and did not hurry to set for an entire day. ¹⁴There has never been a day like it, before or since — a day when the LORD responded to the voice of a human being. For the LORD was fighting for Israel. ¹⁵Then Joshua returned with all Israel to the camp at Gilgal. ¹⁶The five kings fled and hid in a cave at Makkedah. ¹⁷Joshua was told, "The five kings have been found hiding in a cave at Makkedah." ¹⁸Joshua said, "Roll large stones against the mouth of the cave and post guards over it. ¹⁹But you — do not stop! Pursue your enemies and cut off their rear guard. Do not let them reach their cities, for the LORD your God has given them into your hands." ²⁰When Joshua and the Israelites had finished inflicting a massive defeat on them — nearly wiping them out — the survivors managed to reach the fortified cities. ²¹The entire army returned safely to Joshua at the camp at Makkedah. No one dared to speak a word against the Israelites. ²²Then Joshua said, "Open the mouth of the cave and bring those five kings out to me." ²³They did so, bringing the five kings out of the cave to him: the king of Jerusalem, the king of Hebron, the king of Jarmuth, the king of Lachish, and the king of Eglon. ²⁴When they had brought the kings out to Joshua, he summoned all the men of Israel and said to the commanders of the warriors who had marched with him, "Come forward and put your feet on the necks of these kings." They came forward and placed their feet on their necks. ²⁵Joshua said to them, "Do not be afraid or lose heart. Be strong and courageous, for this is what the LORD will do to every enemy you fight." ²⁶After this, Joshua struck them down and put them to death, then hung them on five trees. They remained hanging on the trees until evening. ²⁷At sunset, Joshua ordered them taken down from the trees and thrown into the cave where they had hidden. Large stones were placed at the mouth of the cave — and they are there to this very day. ²⁸Joshua captured Makkedah that same day and put it to the sword. He devoted its king and every person in it to destruction, leaving no survivor. He dealt with the king of Makkedah as he had dealt with the king of Jericho. ²⁹From Makkedah, Joshua and all Israel advanced to Libnah and attacked it. ³⁰The LORD gave it too, along with its king, into Israel's hand. He put it and every person in it to the sword, leaving no survivor. He dealt with its king as he had dealt with the king of Jericho. ³¹From Libnah, Joshua and all Israel advanced to Lachish. He besieged it and attacked it. ³²The LORD gave Lachish into Israel's hand, and Joshua captured it on the second day. He put it and every person in it to the sword, just as he had done to Libnah. ³³At that time, Horam king of Gezer came up to help Lachish, but Joshua struck him and his forces down until no survivor remained. ³⁴From Lachish, Joshua and all Israel advanced to Eglon. They besieged it and attacked it. ³⁵They captured it that same day and put it to the sword. He devoted every person in it to destruction that day, just as he had done to Lachish. ³⁶From Eglon, Joshua and all Israel went up to Hebron and attacked it. ³⁷They captured it and put it to the sword — its king, all its surrounding towns, and every person in it. He left no survivor, just as he had done to Eglon. He devoted it and every person in it to destruction. ³⁸Then Joshua and all Israel turned toward Debir and attacked it. ³⁹He captured it along with its king and all its surrounding towns. They put them to the sword and devoted every person in it to destruction, leaving no survivor. As he had done to Hebron and to Libnah and their kings, so he did to Debir and its king. ⁴⁰Joshua conquered the entire region — the hill country, the Negev, the Shephelah, and the mountain slopes — along with all their kings. He left no survivor. He devoted everything that breathed to destruction, just as the LORD, the God of Israel, had commanded. ⁴¹Joshua conquered them from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza, and the entire region of Goshen as far as Gibeon. ⁴²Joshua captured all these kings and their territory in a single campaign, because the LORD, the God of Israel, was fighting for Israel. ⁴³Then Joshua returned with all Israel to the camp at Gilgal.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Adoni-Tsedeq ('my lord is righteousness') — an ironic royal name. The king of Jerusalem claims righteousness as his title, yet he will oppose the God who defines righteousness. The name parallels Melchizedek ('king of righteousness,' Genesis 14:18), the earlier king-priest of Salem/Jerusalem who blessed Abraham. The same city that once produced a priestly ally now produces an adversary.
1. V'khi hishleimu yosh'vei Giv'on et Yisrael ('the inhabitants of Gibeon had made peace with Israel') — the verb hishlīm (hiphil of shalom, 'to make peace, to submit') describes the Gibeonite treaty. This alarms Adoni-zedek not because he lost a battle but because he lost an ally: Gibeon's defection breaks the Canaanite coalition.
2. Vayyir'u me'od ('they feared greatly') — the subject shifts between singular and plural in the Hebrew. The fear is both personal (Adoni-zedek) and collective (Jerusalem and its allies). K'achat arei ha-mamlakhah ('like one of the royal cities') — Gibeon held the status of a city-state with its own ruling class. Its defection to Israel was a strategic catastrophe for the Canaanite coalition, removing a powerful military force from their side and placing it in Israel's camp.
2. V'khol anasheha gibborim ('all its men were warriors') — Gibeon's fighting force was formidable. The Canaanite kings must now consider that Gibeon's warriors might fight alongside Israel against them.
3. Five Amorite city-state kings form a southern coalition. The cities represent a strategic arc across the southern hill country and Shephelah: Jerusalem (central highlands), Hebron (southern highlands), Jarmuth (Shephelah), Lachish (major fortified city in the Shephelah), and Eglon (western Shephelah). Together they control the main routes through southern Canaan. Hebron is particularly significant: it is where Abraham, Isaac, and Jacob are buried at Machpelah (Genesis 23; 49:29-32), and it will become Caleb's inheritance (14:13-14).
4. The coalition's first target is not Israel but Gibeon — the traitor to the Canaanite cause. Ki hishlīmah et Yehoshua ('because it made peace with Joshua') — Gibeon's treaty with Israel is treated as betrayal by the other Canaanite kings. The attack on Gibeon will force Israel's hand: they must either honor the treaty and defend Gibeon or break their oath.
5. Chameshet malkei ha-Emori ('the five Amorite kings') — the coalition is identified specifically as Amorite. The Amorites were the dominant power in the southern highlands. The five-fold listing creates a sense of overwhelming military force converging on one city. Gibeon's survival depends entirely on whether Israel will honor the treaty of chapter 9.
6. Al teref yadekha me-avadekha ('do not let your hands go slack from your servants') — the idiom 'slack hands' means to withhold help, to abandon. The Gibeonites now invoke the very treaty they obtained by deception: 'your servants' (avadekha) — the same term they used in 9:8, 11. The test is clear: will Israel honor an oath made under false pretenses? Hoshi'ah lanu v'ozrenu ('save us and help us') — the verbs yasha ('to save') and azar ('to help') are normally addressed to God. The Gibeonites appeal to Joshua in language usually reserved for divine petition.
7. Joshua responds immediately. There is no hesitation, no debate about whether the fraudulently obtained treaty deserves honoring. The oath was sworn in YHWH's name, and that settles it. V'khol gibborei he-chayil ('and all the mighty warriors') — the elite troops accompany the main force. Joshua commits everything to defending the Gibeonites, treating the oath obligation with the same seriousness as a divine command.
8. Al tira mehem ki v'yadkha n'tattim ('do not fear them, for I have given them into your hand') — God confirms that Joshua's decision to honor the Gibeonite treaty is correct by promising military victory. The divine oracle transforms a treaty obligation into a conquest opportunity. Lo ya'amod ish mehem b'fanekha ('not a man of them will stand before you') — the same promise from 1:5, now applied specifically to the five-king coalition. God's endorsement signals that defending Gibeon — even though the treaty was obtained by deception — aligns with His purposes.
9. Pit'om ('suddenly') — Joshua's overnight forced march from Gilgal, roughly twenty miles uphill through the wilderness, achieves complete tactical surprise. The Amorite coalition expected to deal with Gibeon at leisure; instead they face Israel's full army at dawn. Kol ha-lailah alah min ha-Gilgal ('all night he went up from Gilgal') — the march ascends about 3,300 feet in elevation through difficult terrain, a remarkable feat of endurance and urgency.
10. Vayyehumem YHWH lifnei Yisrael ('the LORD threw them into panic before Israel') — the verb hamam ('to confuse, to throw into panic, to rout') is the same word used for God's action at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:24) and in other divine-warrior contexts (Judges 4:15; 1 Samuel 7:10). God is the primary agent of the rout; Israel participates but God drives the panic.
10. Derekh ma'aleh Beit Choron ('along the ascent of Beth-horon') — the Beth-horon pass is the main route from the central highlands down to the coastal plain, a steep descent through a narrow valley. The fleeing coalition is funneled into this natural chokepoint. The pursuit covers roughly twenty-five miles, from Gibeon through Beth-horon down to Azekah and Makkedah in the Shephelah.
11. YHWH hishlīkh aleihem avanim g'dolot min ha-shamayim ('the LORD threw great stones from the sky upon them') — divine intervention through the heavens. The avanim g'dolot ('great stones') are identified as avnei ha-barad ('hailstones') — massive hail raining down on the fleeing army. The image echoes the seventh plague on Egypt (Exodus 9:18-26), where the LORD sent barad ('hail') against Pharaoh. The same divine weapon used against Egypt is now used against the Amorites.

11. Rabbim asher metu b'avnei ha-barad me-asher hargu b'nei Yisrael be-charev ('more died from the hailstones than the Israelites killed with the sword') — the narrator makes explicit that God's direct intervention killed more of the enemy than Israel's army. The divine warrior does more than Israel's best soldiers. This theological claim undergirds the entire conquest: the land is won by God's power, not human might.
12. Shemesh b'Giv'on dom v'yareach b'Emeq Ayyalon ('sun, be still over Gibeon; moon, over the Valley of Aijalon') — Joshua's command to the celestial bodies is presented as poetry (possibly an excerpt from the Book of Jashar, v. 13). The verb dom ('be still, be silent, cease') is not the usual word for stopping motion but for ceasing activity or falling silent. Some interpreters understand this as a command for the sun to stop shining (providing relief from heat and cloud cover for the march) rather than to stop moving.
12. The geography is precise: Gibeon is to the east (where Joshua's army is), Aijalon is to the west (where the enemy flees). The sun over Gibeon and the moon over Aijalon places the scene in early morning, with the sun rising in the east and the moon still visible in the western sky. Joshua asks the heavenly bodies to freeze in this configuration — extending the morning light for continued pursuit.
13. Vayyiddom ha-shemesh v'yareach amad ('the sun was still and the moon stood') — two different verbs are used: dom ('to be still/silent') for the sun and amad ('to stand, to stop') for the moon. The effect described is an extended period of daylight enabling Israel to complete the rout.
13. Halo hi k'tuvah al Sefer ha-Yashar ('is this not written in the Book of Jashar?') — the Book of Jashar (or 'Book of the Upright') is a lost Israelite literary collection, cited also in 2 Samuel 1:18 (David's lament for Saul and Jonathan). The narrator cites a written source, inviting verification — an early form of source documentation.
13. V'lo ats lavo k'yom tamim ('it did not hurry to set for an entire day') — the phrase yom tamim ('a complete/whole day') indicates the phenomenon lasted approximately a full day-cycle. Whether understood as a literal astronomical event, an extended period of hailstorm darkness followed by clearing, or a poetic hyperbole celebrating divine intervention, the theological point is clear: creation itself serves the purposes of the Creator and His covenant people.
14. V'lo hayah ka-yom ha-hu l'fanav v'acharav lishmo'a YHWH b'qol ish ('there was no day like it before or after, for the LORD to listen to the voice of a man') — the narrator's commentary identifies the uniqueness not in the astronomical phenomenon but in the relational dynamic: God listened to a human command as though Joshua's word directed the cosmos. The Creator subordinated the sun and moon to the prayer of His servant.
14. Ki YHWH nilcham l'Yisrael ('for the LORD was fighting for Israel') — the chapter's theological refrain. The divine warrior fights through hailstones (v. 11), through cosmic obedience (vv. 12-13), and through human armies (v. 10). The methods vary; the agent is constant.
15. This verse appears to interrupt the narrative, as the pursuit continues in verse 16. Some scholars consider it a displaced summary that originally concluded the chapter, while others see it as a brief return to base before the cave discovery at Makkedah. The Septuagint omits this verse, supporting the view that it may be a later editorial insertion or a variant placement.
16. Vayyechav'u bam'arah b'Maqqedah ('they hid in the cave at Makkedah') — the kings who led the coalition are now fugitives hiding in a limestone cave. The irony is severe: the kings who gathered their forces to crush Gibeon (v. 5) are now cowering underground while their armies are destroyed by hail and sword.
17. Nimts'u chameshet ha-m'lakhim nechba'im bam'arah ('the five kings were found hiding in the cave') — the discovery sets up the dramatic execution scene of verses 22-27. Joshua will deal with the kings after completing the rout of their armies.
18. Gollu avanim g'dolot el pi ha-m'arah ('roll large stones to the mouth of the cave') — the kings are sealed in, trapped but alive, while Joshua finishes the pursuit. The cave becomes a temporary prison. The detail creates dramatic tension: the kings wait in darkness while their kingdoms fall.
19. V'zinnavtem otam ('cut off their tail/rear guard') — the verb zanav ('to strike the tail, to attack the rear') appears also in Deuteronomy 25:18, where Amalek attacked Israel's rear. Now Israel strikes the enemy's rear. Al titt'num lavo el areihem ('do not let them enter their cities') — once the enemy reaches fortified cities, the advantage of the open-field rout is lost. Joshua's tactical priority is to prevent regrouping behind city walls.
20. Ad tummam ('until they were consumed/finished') — the same root tamam from 8:24, indicating near-total destruction. V'has'ridim sar'du mehem vayyavo'u el arei ha-mivtsar ('the survivors who survived from them entered the fortified cities') — despite Joshua's order (v. 19), some fugitives reached walled cities. The fortified cities will be taken individually in verses 28-39.
21. Lo charats livnei Yisrael l'ish et l'shono ('no man sharpened his tongue against the Israelites') — the idiom 'sharpening the tongue' means to speak hostility or challenge. The parallel is Exodus 11:7: 'not a dog shall sharpen its tongue against the Israelites' — spoken of Israel's departure from Egypt. The exodus language reappears: Israel's conquest mirrors Israel's deliverance. The Canaanite world is too terrified to even speak against them.
22. The scene now shifts to the execution of the captured kings. The narrative has built suspense: the kings were sealed in the cave (v. 18) while the battle raged, and now Joshua returns to deal with them. Hotsi'u elai et chameshet ham'lakhim ('bring the five kings out to me') — the kings are summoned from darkness into judgment.
23. The fivefold repetition of 'the king of...' creates a ceremonial rhythm. Each king is named individually, stripping them of their royal dignity and authority. They entered the cave as rulers; they emerge as prisoners.
24. Simu et ragleikhem al tsavv'rei ham'lakhim ha-elleh ('put your feet on the necks of these kings') — the act of placing one's foot on a conquered enemy's neck is well-attested in ancient Near Eastern iconography (cf. Egyptian and Assyrian reliefs). It symbolizes total subjugation. Joshua makes this a public act witnessed by 'all the men of Israel' — the humiliation of the kings is a communal lesson, not a private act of revenge. Psalm 110:1 uses the same imagery: 'Sit at my right hand until I make your enemies a footstool for your feet.'

25. Al tir'u v'al techatu chizqu v'imtsu ('do not be afraid, do not lose heart, be strong and courageous') — Joshua now passes on the fourfold encouragement he received from God in 1:6-9 and again in 10:8. The five conquered kings at his feet serve as the visual proof: God does what He promises. Ki khakhah ya'aseh YHWH l'khol oy'veikhem ('for thus the LORD will do to all your enemies') — the five kings become a prophetic object lesson for every future battle. What God did here, He will do again.
26. Vayyitlem al chamishah etsim ('he hung them on five trees') — public display of executed enemies, as with the king of Ai (8:29). The five trees echo the five kings — each receives his own tree of display. Ad ha-arev ('until evening') — Joshua again observes the Deuteronomic law of removing hanged bodies before nightfall (Deuteronomy 21:22-23), as he did at Ai.
27. Vayyashlikhum el ha-m'arah asher nechb'u sham ('they threw them into the cave where they had hidden') — the cave that served as the kings' hiding place becomes their tomb. The stones that sealed them in as prisoners (v. 18) now seal them in permanently as corpses. Ad etsem ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this very day') — the narrator's attestation formula. Another stone marker joins the growing collection of memorial cairns across the landscape of Joshua.
28. Hecherim otam v'et kol ha-nefesh asher bah lo hish'ir sarid ('he devoted them to destruction, every living person in it, leaving no survivor') — the cherem formula begins the southern campaign summary (vv. 28-39). Each city receives a formulaic account: capture, sword, cherem, no survivors, comparison to previous conquests. The repetitive structure creates a relentless, catalog-like record of systematic conquest.
29. The southern campaign proceeds geographically: Makedah to Libnah (south-southwest in the Shephelah). Each conquest builds momentum. Libnah will later be assigned to the Levites as a priestly city (21:13) and will rebel against Judah in the time of Jehoram (2 Kings 8:22).
30. Vayyitten YHWH gam otah b'yad Yisrael ('the LORD gave it also into the hand of Israel') — the divine-agent formula continues. Each city falls because God gives it — the victories are theological events, not merely military achievements.
31. Lachish was one of the most heavily fortified cities in the southern Shephelah, known from archaeological excavation (Tell ed-Duweir) as a major Bronze Age center with massive walls and gate complex. Its capture required a siege (vayyichan aleha, 'he encamped against it'), unlike some of the other cities that fell more quickly.
32. Ba-yom ha-sheni ('on the second day') — Lachish required two days to take, reflecting its superior fortifications. The other cities in the summary fall without this notation, suggesting quicker capitulation. Despite the delay, the outcome is the same: God gives, Israel takes.
33. Horam melekh Gezer ('Horam king of Gezer') — Gezer was a major fortified city guarding the Aijalon Valley (the same valley where the moon stood still, v. 12). Gezer's king intervenes to aid Lachish but is destroyed in the field. Notably, Gezer itself is not captured at this time — it will remain unconquered until Solomon's era (1 Kings 9:16), when Pharaoh takes it and gives it to Solomon as a dowry.
34. The campaign continues southward through the Shephelah. Eglon's king was one of the original five coalition leaders (v. 3). Joshua is now dismantling the coalition city by city.
35. Ba-yom ha-hu ('that day') — unlike Lachish, Eglon fell in a single day. The formula continues: capture, sword, cherem, comparison. The catalog's repetition conveys the inevitability of conquest: city after city falls to the same pattern.
36. Chevronah ('to Hebron') — the campaign moves from the lowland Shephelah up into the southern highlands. Hebron is the most theologically significant city in the southern conquest: it is the burial place of Abraham, Sarah, Isaac, Rebekah, Jacob, and Leah at the cave of Machpelah (Genesis 23:19; 25:9; 49:29-31; 50:13). The patriarchal promise of land finds its most personal fulfillment here. Hebron will be given to Caleb as his personal inheritance (14:13-14; 15:13-14).
37. V'et kol areha ('and all its towns/cities') — Hebron's surrounding satellite settlements are included in the conquest. The comprehensive formula extends the cherem to the entire district, not just the central city. Vayyacharem otah v'et kol ha-nefesh asher bah ('he devoted it and every person in it to destruction') — the cherem is applied to Hebron, the city of the patriarchs. The promised land is being reclaimed through the very judgment God decreed.
38. D'virah ('to Debir') — also known as Kiriath-sepher ('city of the book/scribe'), located south of Hebron in the hill country. Debir will be reconquered by Othniel son of Kenaz (Caleb's nephew) in 15:15-17 and Judges 1:11-13, suggesting the initial conquest described here was not permanently secured.
39. Ka'asher asah l'Chevron ... v'kha'asher asah l'Libnah ('as he had done to Hebron ... as he had done to Libnah') — the cross-references chain the conquests together: Debir falls like Hebron, Hebron like Eglon, Eglon like Lachish, Lachish like Libnah, Libnah like Makedah, Makedah like Jericho. The chain traces back to the first conquest city — every subsequent victory echoes and confirms the first.
40. Ha-har v'ha-Negev v'ha-Sh'felah v'ha-ashedot ('the hill country, the Negev, the lowlands, the slopes') — four geographic zones summarize the entire southern theater: the central highlands, the arid south, the western foothills, and the transitional slopes between them. V'et kol ha-n'shamah hecherim ('he devoted everything that breathed to destruction') — the language of total cherem. Ka'asher tsivvah YHWH Elohei Yisrael ('as the LORD, the God of Israel, commanded') — the narrator roots the conquest in divine command, not human initiative. The destruction is presented as covenant execution, not ethnic violence.
40. Register departure: cherem rendered as 'devotion to destruction' rather than default 'devoted to destruction' — nominal variant reflecting the Hebrew construct form in this summary statement.

41. Mi-Qadesh Barnea v'ad Azzah ('from Kadesh-barnea to Gaza') — the geographic sweep defines the southern conquest's boundaries: Kadesh-barnea (in the southern Negev, where Israel spent most of its wilderness years) to Gaza (on the Mediterranean coast, the southwestern corner of Canaan). V'et kol erets Goshen ('the entire land of Goshen') — not the Egyptian Goshen but a region in the southern Judean hills. The total territory described covers the entire southern half of the promised land, from the wilderness border to the coast, from the Negev to the central highlands at Gibeon.
42. Pa'am echat ('at one time / in a single campaign') — the entire southern conquest is presented as one continuous military operation, driven by momentum from the initial Gibeonite crisis through the final city. Ki YHWH Elohei Yisrael nilcham l'Yisrael ('because the LORD, the God of Israel, was fighting for Israel') — the chapter's theological summary, matching verse 14. The refrain frames the entire campaign: it begins with God fighting through hailstones and cosmic phenomena and ends with God fighting through Israel's sustained campaign. Divine warfare encompasses both the miraculous and the military.
43. The campaign ends where it began — at the base camp of Gilgal, near Jericho. The circular movement (Gilgal Gibeon Beth-horon Makkedah Libnah Lachish Eglon Hebron Debir Gilgal) traces a vast loop through the entire southern territory. Israel returns to its starting point having secured the south, ready for the northern campaign of chapter 11.

Summary: A northern Canaanite coalition under Jabin of Hazor gathers at the Waters of Merom. Joshua attacks suddenly, defeats them, burns Hazor, and completes the conquest of the land. The narrator summarizes: Joshua took the whole land.

What Makes This Remarkable: The summary statement (vv. 16-23) claims total conquest: 'Joshua took the whole land... and the land had rest from war.' Yet the text itself acknowledges exceptions — the Anakites survived in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod (v. 22), and chapter 13 will list unconquered territories. The tension is deliberate: the conquest is complete in theological terms (God fulfilled His promise) while remaining incomplete on the ground. This dual reality defines the rest of Israel's history.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'the LORD hardened their hearts' (v. 20, chizraq et libbam) uses the same language as the Pharaoh hardening in Exodus. We rendered it consistently. The purpose clause — 'so that they would come against Israel in battle, in order to devote them to destruction' — presents the hardening as serving the chereim. This is one of the hardest theological statements in Joshua, and we let it stand without softening.

Connections: Hazor's destruction is confirmed archaeologically. Jabin of Hazor reappears (or a successor does) in Judges 4. The Anakite remnant in Gath connects to Goliath of Gath (1 Samuel 17:4). The conquest summary parallels Deuteronomy's promise and anticipates the 'rest' theology of Hebrews 4. The reference to Moses's commands (v. 15) closes the loop opened in 1:7.

¹When Jabin king of Hazor heard of these events, he sent word to Jobab king of Madon, the king of Shimron, and the king of Achshaph, ²as well as to the kings in the northern hill country, in the Arabah south of Chinnereth, in the Shephelah, and in the heights of Dor to the west — ³the Canaanites to the east and west, the Amorites, Hittites, Perizzites, and Jebusites in the hill country, and the Hivites below Hermon in the region of Mizpah. ⁴They marched out with all their forces — a vast army, as numerous as the sand on the seashore — with a great many horses and chariots. ⁵All these kings joined forces and came together, encamping at the waters of Merom to fight against Israel. ⁶The LORD said to Joshua, "Do not be afraid of them. By this time tomorrow, I will hand all of them over to Israel as casualties. You are to hamstring their horses and burn their chariots." ⁷Joshua and his entire fighting force fell upon them suddenly at the waters of Merom and attacked. ⁸The LORD gave them into Israel's hand. They struck them down and pursued them to Great Sidon, to Misrephoth-maim, and eastward to the Valley of Mizpeh. They struck them until no survivor remained. ⁹Joshua dealt with them exactly as the LORD had told him: he hamstrung their horses and burned their chariots. ¹⁰At that time Joshua turned back and captured Hazor. He struck its king with the sword, because Hazor had been the head of all those kingdoms. ¹¹They struck down every person in it with the sword, devoting them to destruction. Not a single breathing creature was left. Then he burned Hazor. ¹²Joshua captured all the cities of those kings along with their kings. He put them to the sword and devoted them to destruction, just as Moses the servant of the LORD had commanded. ¹³As for the cities still standing on their mounds, Israel did not burn any of them — only Hazor did Joshua burn. ¹⁴The Israelites took all the plunder from these cities and the livestock as spoil for themselves, but every person they struck down with the sword until they had annihilated them. They did not leave a single breathing creature. ¹⁵What the LORD commanded his servant Moses, Moses commanded Joshua, and Joshua carried out. He did not neglect a single thing of all that the LORD had commanded Moses. ¹⁶Joshua took the entire land: the hill country, the whole Negev, the entire region of Goshen, the Shephelah, the Arabah, and the hill country of Israel with its lowlands — ¹⁷from Mount Halak, which rises toward Seir, to Baal-gad in the Valley of Lebanon below Mount Hermon. He captured all their kings, struck them down, and put them to death. ¹⁸Joshua waged war against all those kings for a long time. ¹⁹No city made peace with the Israelites except the Hivites who lived in Gibeon. All the rest they took in battle. ²⁰For it was the LORD's doing that they hardened their hearts to wage war against Israel, so that He might devote them to total destruction without mercy — so that He might annihilate them, just as the LORD had commanded Moses. ²¹At that time Joshua went and eliminated the Anakim from the hill country — from Hebron, Debir, Anab, and the entire hill country of Judah and Israel. Joshua devoted them and their cities to destruction. ²²No Anakim were left in the land of the Israelites. They survived only in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod. ²³So Joshua took the entire land, in keeping with everything the LORD had spoken to Moses. Joshua gave it as an inheritance to Israel, apportioned among their tribes. And the land had rest from war.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Yavin melek Chatsor ('Jabin king of Hazor') — Hazor was the largest city in Canaan, described in verse 10 as rosh kol ha-mamlakhot ('the head of all those kingdoms'). Archaeological excavation at Tel Hazor reveals a city of approximately 200 acres — ten times the size of most Canaanite cities. Jabin organizes a northern coalition just as Adoni-zedek organized the southern one (10:3). The name Jabin ('he understands/discerns') recurs in Judges 4:2, suggesting either a dynastic title or a later king of the same name.
2. The geographic scope encompasses the entire northern territory: ba-har ('the hill country' — the Galilee highlands), ba-Aravah negev Kinnerot ('the Arabah south of Chinnereth' — the Jordan Valley below the Sea of Galilee), ba-Sh'felah ('the lowlands'), and b'nafot Dor miyyam ('the heights/regions of Dor on the coast'). Chinnereth is the early name for the Sea of Galilee (kinnerot, 'harps' — possibly from the lake's harp-like shape).
3. V'ha-Chivvi tachat Chermon b'erets ha-Mitspah ('the Hivites below Hermon in the land of Mizpah') — Mount Hermon marks the northernmost extent of the promised land's traditional boundary. The Hivites settled at its base, in the region called Mizpah ('lookout, watchtower'). The coalition draws from the full diversity of Canaan's peoples and the full extent of its geography — from Hermon in the far north to the coastal plain in the west.
4. Am rav ka-chol asher al s'fat ha-yam la-rov ('a people as numerous as the sand on the seashore') — the simile deliberately echoes the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 22:17), where God promised Abraham's descendants would be 'as the sand on the seashore.' The enemy army is described with the same imagery used for Israel's promised future — a vast horde set against God's people. V'sus va-rekhev rav me'od ('horses and chariots in great number') — chariotry was the dominant military technology of the Bronze Age. Israel had no chariots. The technological disparity makes the upcoming victory all the more clearly divine.
5. El mei Merom ('at the waters of Merom') — the gathering point for the northern coalition. Merom is likely in the upper Galilee, possibly identified with the spring-fed area near modern Meiron. The coalition chooses a staging ground with water for their horses and room for their chariots. The flat, well-watered terrain favors their technological advantage.
6. Al tira mip'neihem ('do not be afraid of them') — the same divine encouragement formula as 8:1 and 10:8. Each new campaign begins with God addressing Joshua's fear. The escalating scale of the enemy (from Ai to the five kings to the sand-on-the-seashore coalition) requires escalating reassurance.
6. Et suseihem t'aqquer v'et mark'voteihem tisrof ba-esh ('hamstring their horses and burn their chariots') — God commands the destruction of the captured military technology. Aqquer ('to hamstring') means to cut the leg tendons, rendering the horses permanently lame. The command prevents Israel from adopting chariot warfare and placing their trust in military technology rather than in God. The same principle appears in Deuteronomy 17:16: the king 'must not acquire many horses.' Israel is to fight as a foot army dependent on God, not as a chariot empire dependent on technology.
7. Pit'om ('suddenly') — the same word used for the surprise attack on the Amorite coalition at Gibeon (10:9). Joshua's tactical pattern is consistent: rapid forced marches ending in sudden assault. The surprise negates the enemy's advantage in numbers and chariots — they have no time to deploy their formations.
8. The pursuit fans out in three directions from the waters of Merom: northwest to Sidon Rabbah ('Great Sidon,' on the Phoenician coast — the furthest point of pursuit), west to Misrephot Mayim ('the burnings/smelters by the waters,' likely on the Mediterranean coast south of Sidon), and east to Biq'at Mitspeh ('the Valley of Mizpeh,' east of the battlefield). The three-directional pursuit indicates the coalition scattered in every direction — total rout, total panic.
9. Ka'asher amar lo YHWH ('as the LORD told him') — Joshua's obedience is exact. The captured horses are hamstrung, the chariots burned. Israel will not build a chariot force. The theological principle is embedded in the military decision: trust in God, not in horses and chariots (cf. Psalm 20:7: 'Some trust in chariots and some in horses, but we trust in the name of the LORD our God').

10. Ki Chatsor l'fanim hi rosh kol ha-mamlakhot ha-elleh ('because Hazor was formerly the head of all those kingdoms') — the narrator explains why Hazor receives special treatment: it was the capital of the northern coalition, the dominant city-state in the entire region. Archaeological evidence confirms Hazor's preeminence: it was the largest city in Canaan, with massive fortifications and an extensive lower city. Taking the head city decapitates the coalition.
11. V'et Chatsor saraf ba-esh ('he burned Hazor with fire') — of all the northern cities, only Hazor is burned (v. 13 makes this explicit). The burning of the capital while sparing the other cities as usable infrastructure represents a strategic as well as theological decision: destroy the center of power but preserve the cities for Israelite settlement. Archaeological excavation at Hazor reveals a massive destruction layer from the Late Bronze Age, consistent with this account.
12. Ka'asher tsivvah Mosheh eved YHWH ('as Moses the servant of the LORD commanded') — the chain of authority runs from God to Moses to Joshua. Every act of conquest is traced back through this chain. Joshua acts not on his own authority but as the executor of Mosaic commands, which are themselves the commands of God.
13. Kol he-arim ha-om'dot al tillam ('all the cities standing on their tells/mounds') — the tel ('mound') is the accumulated layers of previous settlement. Cities 'standing on their tells' are intact, fortified cities on established sites. Israel preserves them as infrastructure for their own future use — Deuteronomy 6:10-11 promised 'cities you did not build' and 'houses full of good things you did not fill.' Zulatei et Chatsor l'vaddah ('except Hazor alone') — only the coalition capital is burned, making the archaeological record precise and testable.
14. As at Ai (8:2, 27), the plunder and livestock may be kept but the human population is placed under cherem. The distinction between total cherem (Jericho — everything destroyed) and partial cherem (Ai and the northern cities — people destroyed but goods kept) shows that the sacred ban has different levels of application depending on God's specific command for each situation.
15. Ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh avdo ken tsivvah Mosheh et Yehoshua v'ken asah Yehoshua ('as the LORD commanded Moses, so Moses commanded Joshua, and so Joshua did') — the chain of obedience is complete and unbroken: God Moses Joshua execution. Lo hesir davar mikkol asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ('he did not remove/neglect anything from all that the LORD commanded Moses') — this is Joshua's highest commendation: perfect obedience to the Mosaic command, fulfilling the charge of 1:7 ('do not turn from it to the right or to the left'). This assessment contrasts with the Judges period, where 'everyone did what was right in his own eyes' (Judges 21:25).
16. The geographic summary encompasses the full promised land from south to north. Ha-har ('the hill country' — both Judean and Israelite), ha-Negev ('the southern desert'), erets ha-Goshen ('the Goshen region'), ha-Sh'felah ('the western foothills'), ha-Aravah ('the Jordan rift valley'), and har Yisrael u-sh'felato ('the hill country of Israel and its lowlands' — the northern highlands). The comprehensive list demonstrates that the conquest covered every topographic zone of the promised territory.
17. Min ha-har he-Chalaq ha-oleh Se'ir v'ad Ba'al Gad b'viq'at ha-L'vanon tachat Har Chermon ('from Mount Halak rising toward Seir to Baal-gad in the Lebanon valley below Hermon') — the boundaries define the full north-south extent of the conquest: Mount Halak ('the smooth/bare mountain') in the far south near Edom, to Baal-gad (possibly Baniyas/Caesarea Philippi) at the foot of Mount Hermon in the far north. The distance is approximately 250 miles.
18. Yamim rabbim ('many days / a long time') — the narrator corrects any impression that the conquest was swift. Despite the compressed narrative, the campaigns against the Canaanite kings took years. The Talmud and later tradition estimate the conquest period at approximately seven years (cf. Caleb's age statements in 14:7, 10 that provide a chronological anchor).
19. Bilti ha-Chivvi yosh'vei Giv'on ('except the Hivites, the inhabitants of Gibeon') — only Gibeon chose negotiation over combat. Every other city fought and fell. The Gibeonites' deception, despite its moral problems, represents the only successful Canaanite response to Israel's advance: they alone survived because they alone chose to seek peace, however fraudulently.
20. Ki me'et YHWH hay'tah l'chazzeq et libbam ('for it was from the LORD to harden their hearts') — one of the most theologically dense verses in Joshua. The hardening of the Canaanite hearts parallels God hardening Pharaoh's heart (Exodus 4:21; 7:3; 9:12; 10:1, 20, 27; 11:10; 14:4, 8). The same theological pattern governs both the exodus and the conquest: God hardens the hearts of those set on opposition, confirming them in their chosen path so that judgment may proceed.
20. L'vilti heyot lahem t'chinnah ('so that they would have no mercy/grace') — t'chinnah ('grace, favor, compassion') is denied to the hardened. The hardening removes the possibility of surrender. If the Canaanites had sought peace, Israel would have been obligated to spare them (as with the Gibeonites). By hardening their hearts to fight, God ensures the cherem proceeds as commanded. The theological tension — divine sovereignty and human responsibility — is stated rather than resolved.
21. Vayyakhret et ha-Anaqim ('he cut off the Anakim') — the Anakim were the giant warrior clan whose presence terrified the original spies forty years earlier (Numbers 13:28, 33: 'we seemed like grasshoppers in our own eyes'). The ten faithless spies' report about the Anakim triggered the wilderness wandering (Numbers 14:1-4). Joshua now systematically eliminates the very people who caused the previous generation's failure of faith. The giants who kept Israel out of the land for forty years are no obstacle to the generation that trusts God.
22. Raq b'Azzah b'Gat uv'Ashdod nish'aru ('only in Gaza, Gath, and Ashdod they remained') — the Anakim survive in the three Philistine cities that Israel did not conquer. Gath is particularly significant: it will later produce Goliath, the Philistine champion described as a giant warrior of extraordinary height (1 Samuel 17:4). The surviving Anakim in Gath become the seed of the future Goliath narrative — a thread that connects Joshua to David.

23. Vayyitt'nah Yehoshua l'nachalah l'Yisrael k'machl'qotam l'shivteihem ('Joshua gave it as an inheritance to Israel according to their divisions by tribes') — the conquest narrative (chapters 1-12) concludes with the transition to the allocation narrative (chapters 13-21). The word nachalah ('inheritance') is the key term for the second half of Joshua: the land won by conquest must now be distributed as the covenantal inheritance of each tribe.
23. V'ha-arets shaq'tah mil-milchamah ('the land had rest from war') — the verb shaqat ('to be quiet, to rest') describes the cessation of active military campaigns. This 'rest' fulfills the promise of Deuteronomy 12:10 ('when he gives you rest from all your enemies'). However, chapters 13-19 will reveal that significant territory remains unconquered (13:1-6), and the subsequent book of Judges will show that the 'rest' was incomplete and fragile.

Summary: A summary of the defeated kings — two east of the Jordan (Sihon and Og, conquered under Moses) and thirty-one west of the Jordan (conquered under Joshua).

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is a victory catalog — thirty-three kings listed by name and territory. The structure mirrors ancient Near Eastern conquest records, but with a theological difference: every victory is attributed to the LORD, not to Israel's military prowess. The list includes cities that archaeological evidence confirms were occupied during this period. The count of thirty-one western kings (v. 24) gives the conquest a comprehensive scope.

Translation Friction: Several city identifications are uncertain — we rendered the names as the Hebrew gives them and noted geographical alternatives where scholarship offers them. The king list format ('the king of X, one') uses a formulaic Hebrew counting pattern that is awkward in English. We preserved the repetitive structure because the accumulation is the rhetorical point.

Connections: Sihon and Og's inclusion (vv. 2-6) connects to Numbers 21 and Deuteronomy 2-3. The defeated-king list becomes a praise motif in Psalm 135:10-12 and 136:17-22. Several cities reappear in Judges as unconquered (Judges 1), creating the tension between Joshua's theological completeness and Judges' historical reality.

¹These are the kings of the land whom the Israelites defeated and whose territory they took possession of east of the Jordan, from the Arnon Valley to Mount Hermon, including the entire eastern Arabah: ²Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon. His territory extended from Aroer on the rim of the Arnon Valley — including the middle of the valley itself — through half of Gilead as far as the Jabbok River, the border of the Ammonites. ³He also controlled the Arabah eastward to the Sea of Chinnereth, and southward through the Arabah to the Dead Sea, toward Beth-jeshimoth, and on the south below the slopes of Pisgah. ⁴And the territory of Og king of Bashan — one of the last of the Rephaim — who ruled from Ashtaroth and Edrei. ⁵He ruled over Mount Hermon, Salecah, all of Bashan as far as the border of the Geshurites and Maacathites, and half of Gilead, up to the border of Sihon king of Heshbon. ⁶Moses the servant of the LORD and the Israelites defeated them, and Moses the servant of the LORD gave their land as a possession to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. ⁷These are the kings of the land whom Joshua and the Israelites defeated west of the Jordan, from Baal-gad in the Valley of Lebanon to Mount Halak, which rises toward Seir. Joshua gave this land to the tribes of Israel as their possession, apportioned among their divisions — ⁸in the hill country, the Shephelah, the Arabah, the mountain slopes, the wilderness, and the Negev — the lands of the Hittites, Amorites, Canaanites, Perizzites, Hivites, and Jebusites: ⁹the king of Jericho — one; the king of Ai, near Bethel — one; ¹⁰the ruler of Jerusalem — one; the ruler of Hebron — one; ¹¹the ruler of Jarmuth — one; the ruler of Lachish — one; ¹²the ruler of Eglon — one; the ruler of Gezer — one; ¹³the ruler of Debir — one; the ruler of Geder — one; ¹⁴the ruler of Hormah — one; the ruler of Arad — one; ¹⁵the ruler of Libnah — one; the ruler of Adullam — one; ¹⁶the ruler of Makkedah — one; the ruler of Bethel — one; ¹⁷the ruler of Tappuah — one; the ruler of Hopher — one; ¹⁸the ruler of Aphek — one; the ruler of Lasharon — one; ¹⁹the ruler of Madon — one; the ruler of Hazor — one; ²⁰the ruler of Shimron-meron — one each; the ruler of Achshaph — one each; ²¹the ruler of Taanach — one each; the ruler of Megiddo — one each; ²²the king of Kedesh — one; the king of Jokneam in Carmel — one; ²³the king of Dor in the heights of Dor — one; the king of Goiim at Gilgal — one; ²⁴the king of Tirzah — one. In all, thirty-one kings.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens the comprehensive catalog of defeated kings — first the Transjordan conquests under Moses (vv. 1-6), then the Cisjordan conquests under Joshua (vv. 7-24). The verb yarash ('to take possession, to dispossess') connects the catalog to the central conquest theme. Mi-nachal Arnon ad Har Chermon ('from the Arnon Valley to Mount Hermon') — the full north-south extent of Transjordan territory: the Arnon gorge (modern Wadi Mujib in Jordan, the northern border of Moab) to Hermon in the far north.
2. Sihon's kingdom covered the southern half of the Transjordan: from the Arnon gorge in the south to the Jabbok River in the north, encompassing the southern portion of Gilead. His capital Heshbon sat in the central Transjordan plateau. His defeat is narrated in Numbers 21:21-30 and Deuteronomy 2:24-37.
3. Yam Kinnerot ('Sea of Chinnereth' — Sea of Galilee) to yam ha-Aravah yam ha-Melach ('the Arabah Sea, the Salt Sea' — Dead Sea) — Sihon's domain included the eastern shore of both major bodies of water in the Jordan Rift Valley. Ashdot ha-Pisgah ('the slopes of Pisgah') — the slopes of the mountain range where Moses viewed the promised land before his death (Deuteronomy 34:1).
4. Og melek ha-Bashan mi-yeter ha-Refa'im ('Og king of Bashan, from the remnant of the Rephaim') — Og is identified as a surviving member of the Rephaim, the legendary giant race of the ancient Near East (cf. Deuteronomy 3:11, which describes his enormous iron bedstead). His defeat is narrated in Numbers 21:33-35 and Deuteronomy 3:1-11. Ashtaroth and Edrei were his dual capitals in the rich volcanic plateau of Bashan (modern Golan Heights and Hauran).
5. Og's domain covered the northern half of the Transjordan: from Hermon and Salecah in the far north through all of Bashan and the northern half of Gilead, meeting Sihon's territory at the Jabbok. Together, Sihon and Og controlled the entire Transjordan from Arnon to Hermon — the complete territory now held by Reuben, Gad, and the half-tribe of Manasseh.
6. Mosheh eved YHWH ('Moses the servant of the LORD') — the title appears twice, framing Moses as the divinely authorized agent of the Transjordan conquest and allocation. Yerushah ('possession') is used rather than nachalah ('inheritance'), though the terms overlap. The Transjordan allocation is presented as fully legitimate — it was given by Moses under divine authority, establishing the same covenant rights as the Cisjordan allotments.
7. The second half of the catalog lists the Cisjordan kings defeated under Joshua. The geographic boundaries repeat 11:17 in reverse order (north to south here, south to north there). Vayyitt'nah Yehoshua l'shivtei Yisrael yerushah k'machl'qotam ('Joshua gave it to the tribes of Israel as a possession according to their divisions') — the transition from conquest to allocation.
8. Six geographic zones and six ethnic groups frame the catalog that follows. The comprehensive listing emphasizes totality: every region, every people group. The catalog itself (vv. 9-24) will enumerate thirty-one kings — a formal accounting of the conquest.
9. The catalog begins with the first two conquests. Each entry follows a strict formula: melek [city name] echad ('king of [city], one'). The number echad ('one') functions as a tally mark. The literary form resembles an ancient administrative record — a royal accounting of defeated enemies.
10. The five kings of the southern coalition (10:3-5) are listed: Jerusalem, Hebron, Jarmuth, Lachish, and Eglon (vv. 10-12). Their defeat at the battle of Gibeon and the subsequent southern campaign is summarized in this tally.
11. Jarmuth and Lachish — both members of the southern coalition defeated in chapter 10.
12. Eglon was the fifth member of the southern coalition. Gezer's king Horam was defeated when he came to aid Lachish (10:33), though Gezer itself was not captured at this time.
13. Debir was conquered in the southern campaign (10:38-39). Geder (or Beth-gader) is otherwise unmentioned in the conquest narratives, suggesting the catalog preserves a more complete record than the narrative accounts.
14. Hormah and Arad are Negev cities. Hormah's name itself means 'destruction/devotion to destruction' — the city's name commemorates an earlier Israelite victory (Numbers 21:3), where the name was given as a wordplay on cherem. Arad is in the northern Negev, known from archaeological excavation as a significant fortified site.
15. Libnah was conquered in 10:29-30. Adullam, in the Shephelah, will later become famous as the cave where David hid from Saul (1 Samuel 22:1).
16. Makkedah was the site of the cave where the five kings hid (10:16-27). Bethel's forces joined Ai's pursuit (8:17), and its king's defeat is recorded here though not narrated separately in the campaign accounts.
17. Tappuah ('apple') is a city in the hill country later assigned to Manasseh at the border with Ephraim (17:8). Hephher appears in Manassite territory and is connected to the daughters of Zelophehad (Numbers 27:1).
18. Aphek controlled a key pass on the Via Maris trade route in the Sharon plain. Lasharon may be an independent city or a descriptive term ('belonging to Sharon'), locating this Aphek in the coastal Sharon region.
19. The northern coalition kings begin here. Madon and Hazor were the first two allies named in 11:1. Hazor's listing is understated — no special marker distinguishes the largest city in Canaan from any other defeated king in this democratic tally.
20. Shimron-meron (combining Shimron from 11:1 with a fuller name) and Achshaph were members of Jabin's northern coalition.

- 21. Taanach and Megiddo guarded the strategic Jezreel Valley and the pass through the Carmel ridge. Megiddo (Armageddon in Greek, from Har Megiddo, 'Mount of Megiddo') was one of the most strategically important cities in the ancient Near East, controlling the main route between Egypt and Mesopotamia. Despite the king's defeat, Megiddo remained partially unconquered (17:11-12; Judges 1:27).
- 22. Kedesh (Kedesh-naphtali) was a city in the upper Galilee, later designated as a city of refuge (20:7). Jokneam was at the foot of Mount Carmel, guarding the southwestern approach to the Jezreel Valley.
- 23. Dor was a coastal city south of Mount Carmel. Melekh Goyim l'Gilgal ('king of nations/peoples at Gilgal') — goyim means 'nations' or 'peoples,' possibly designating a multi-ethnic confederation rather than a single city-state. This Gilgal is likely a different site from Joshua's base camp near Jericho.
- 24. Kol m'lakhim sh'loshim v'echad ('all the kings: thirty-one') — the total tally. Tirzah, the final entry, was a beautiful city in the northern hill country that later became the first capital of the northern kingdom of Israel (1 Kings 14:17; 15:21, 33). The catalog closes with a grand total: thirty-one kings defeated, their territories taken. The number represents the comprehensive scope of the conquest — every petty kingdom in the promised land has been overthrown.
- 24. Chapter 12 functions as the accounting ledger of the conquest — a formal record that transitions the narrative from war (chapters 1-11) to land distribution (chapters 13-21). The catalog demonstrates that God's promise has been fulfilled: the land has been taken, the kings have fallen, and the inheritance awaits distribution.

Summary: God tells the aging Joshua that much land remains unconquered and commands the distribution of territory. The Transjordan allotments to Reuben, Gad, and half-Manasseh are detailed, and the Levites receive no territorial inheritance.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter opens with a startling admission after the conquest summary of chapters 11-12: 'You are old, advanced in years, and very much of the land remains to be possessed' (v. 1). The tension between 'Joshua took the whole land' (11:23) and 'very much remains' (13:1) is not contradiction but theology — God's gift is complete, but Israel's occupation is ongoing. The Levites' non-inheritance (v. 33) is stated with theological precision: 'the LORD God of Israel is their inheritance' — not land but God Himself.

Translation Friction: The geographical boundaries involve numerous place names whose ancient locations are debated. We rendered each name as the Hebrew gives it and noted identifications where scholarship is reasonably confident. The phrase ad hayyom hazzeh ('to this day,' v. 13) is the narrator's voice from a later period, acknowledging that Geshurites and Maacathites remained unconquered through the time of writing.

Connections: The unconquered territories become the nations that 'test' Israel in Judges 2:20-3:6. The Transjordan allotment fulfills Numbers 32 and Deuteronomy 3:12-17. The Levitical non-inheritance echoes Numbers 18:20 and Deuteronomy 10:9. Caleb's upcoming request (ch. 14) connects to the spy narrative of Numbers 13-14.

¹Joshua had grown old, advanced in years. The LORD said to him, "You have grown old, advanced in years, and a great deal of land still remains to be taken. ²This is the land that remains: all the regions of the Philistines and all Geshurite territory, ³from the Shihor east of Egypt to the border of Ekron on the north — territory considered Canaanite — the five Philistine rulers: of Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron; also the Avvites. ⁴From the south, all the land of the Canaanites — including Mearah, which belongs to the Sidonians — as far as Aphek, to the Amorite border; ⁵also the land of the Gebalites and all of Lebanon to the east, from Baal-gad below Mount Hermon to Lebo-hamath. ⁶All the inhabitants of the hill country from Lebanon to Misrephoth-maim — all the Sidonians — I myself will drive them out before the Israelites. Only allocate the land to Israel as an inheritance, as I have commanded you. ⁷Now divide this land as an inheritance among the nine tribes and the half-tribe of Manasseh. ⁸With the other half-tribe, the Reubenites and Gadites had already received the inheritance that Moses gave them east of the Jordan, just as Moses the servant of the LORD assigned it to them: ⁹from Aroer on the rim of the Arnon Valley, including the city in the middle of the valley, and the entire plateau from Medeba to Dibon; ¹⁰all the cities of Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon, as far as the border of the Ammonites; ¹¹Gilead, the territory of the Geshurites and Maacathites, all of Mount Hermon, and all of Bashan as far as Salecah — ¹²the entire kingdom of Og in Bashan, who had ruled from Ashtaroth and Edrei. He was one of the last surviving Rephaim. Moses defeated them and dispossessed them. ¹³But the Israelites did not drive out the Geshurites or the Maacathites. Geshur and Maacath live among Israel to this day. ¹⁴Only to the tribe of Levi he gave no territorial inheritance. The fire offerings of the LORD, the God of Israel, are their inheritance, as He promised them. ¹⁵Moses gave territory to the tribe of Reuben, clan by clan. ¹⁶Their territory ran from Aroer on the rim of the Arnon Valley, including the city in the middle of the valley, and the entire plateau near Medeba — ¹⁷Heshbon and all its towns on the plateau: Dibon, Bamoth-baal, Beth-baal-meon, ¹⁸Jahaz, Kedemoth, Mephaath, ¹⁹Kiriathaim, Sibmah, and Zereth-shahar on the hill overlooking the valley, ²⁰Beth-peor, the slopes of Pisgah, and Beth-jeshimoth, ²¹all the plateau cities and the entire kingdom of Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled from Heshbon — the one Moses defeated along with the Midianite chieftains Evi, Rekem, Zur, Hur, and Reba, the vassals of Sihon who lived in the land. ²²The Israelites also killed Balaam son of Beor, the diviner, with the sword, along with the others they slew. ²³The western border of the Reubenites was the Jordan River itself. This was the inheritance of the Reubenites, clan by clan — their cities and surrounding settlements. ²⁴Moses gave territory to the tribe of Gad, clan by clan. ²⁵Their territory included Jazer, all the cities of Gilead, and half the Ammonite territory as far as Aroer, east of Rabbah; ²⁶from Heshbon to Ramath-mizpeh and Betonim, and from Mahanaim to the border of Lo-debar; ²⁷and in the valley: Beth-haram, Beth-nimrah, Succoth, and Zaphon — the rest of the kingdom of Sihon king of Heshbon — with the Jordan as its western border, extending to the southern end of the Sea of Chinnereth, east of the Jordan. ²⁸This was the inheritance of the Gadites, clan by clan — their cities and surrounding settlements. ²⁹Moses gave territory to the half-tribe of Manasseh, and it was allocated to the half-tribe of Manasseh clan by clan. ³⁰Their territory extended from Mahanaim through all of Bashan — the entire kingdom of Og king of Bashan — including all the settlements of Jair in Bashan: sixty towns. ³¹Half of Gilead, along with Ashtaroth and Edrei — the royal cities of Og's kingdom in Bashan — went to the descendants of Machir son of Manasseh, that is, to half the Machirites, clan by clan. ³²These are the territories Moses allocated on the plains of Moab, east of the Jordan across from Jericho. ³³But to the tribe of Levi, Moses gave no inheritance. The LORD, the God of Israel, is their inheritance, as He promised them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Attah zaqanta bata vayyamim ('you have grown old, you have entered into the days') — God states Joshua's age not as a compliment but as an urgency: much remains to be done and Joshua's time is limited. V'ha-arets nish'arah harbeh me'od l'rishtah ('the land remaining is very great to possess') — the verb yarash ('to possess, to dispossess') reappears. Despite the conquest summary of chapters 10-12, significant territory remains outside Israelite control. The tension between 'Joshua took the whole land' (11:23) and 'very much land remains' (13:1) is deliberate: the initial military campaigns broke Canaanite power, but comprehensive settlement and control were incomplete.
2. Kol g'lilot ha-P'lishtim ('all the districts/regions of the Philistines') — the Philistine territory along the southern coastal plain was never conquered during Joshua's campaigns. The Philistines, a Sea People who arrived in Canaan around the same time as the Israelite settlement, would become Israel's primary adversary through the period of the Judges and into the monarchy. Their five cities (v. 3) remained independent enclaves within the promised land.
3. Chameshet sarnei F'lishtim ('the five lords/rulers of the Philistines') — the word seren (plural sarnim) is a distinctly Philistine title, possibly cognate with Greek tyrannos ('tyrant, ruler'). Each of the five Philistine cities was governed by its own seren, forming a pentapolis confederation. The five cities — Gaza, Ashdod, Ashkelon, Gath, and Ekron — controlled the southern coastal plain and the trade routes connecting Egypt to Mesopotamia.
3. The Shihor (Shichor, 'black waters') is likely the easternmost branch of the Nile delta or the Wadi el-Arish, marking the traditional border with Egypt.
4. The unconquered territory extends northward along the Phoenician coast. M'arah asher la-Tsidonim ('Mearah belonging to the Sidonians') — likely a cave or cave-settlement in the Lebanese coast region. The Sidonians (Phoenicians) controlled the northern coastal territory that Israel never occupied.
5. Ha-Givli ('the Gebalites') — inhabitants of Gebal (Byblos), the ancient Phoenician port city. Kol ha-L'vanon ('all Lebanon') — the Lebanon mountain range and its settlements remained unconquered. Ad l'vo Chamath ('to the entrance of Hamath') — Lebo-hamath (modern Lebweh in the Beqa'a Valley) marks the ideal northern boundary of the promised land (Numbers 34:8). The gap between the ideal boundary and the actual conquest is significant — the territory described in verses 2-6 represents the 'not yet' within God's 'already.'
6. Anokhi orishem mip'nei b'nei Yisrael ('I myself will drive them out before the Israelites') — God takes personal responsibility for completing the conquest of the unconquered territories. The emphatic anokhi ('I myself') signals that the remaining dispossession is God's task, not Joshua's. Raq happilehah l'Yisrael b'nachalah ('only divide it for Israel as an inheritance') — Joshua's remaining assignment is allocation, not conquest. The verb nafal (hiphil, 'to cause to fall' — i.e., to cast lots) connects to the lot-casting method of land distribution.

6. The word nachalah ('inheritance') here carries its full covenantal weight: the land — including territory not yet controlled — is already Israel's inheritance by divine grant. Joshua is to distribute what God has promised, even before it is fully possessed.
7. L'tish'at ha-sh'vatim va-chatsi ha-shevet ha-M'nasheh ('for the nine tribes and the half-tribe of Manasseh') — the western half of Manasseh receives its allotment west of the Jordan, while the eastern half already received its share in the Transjordan (v. 29-31). The nine-and-a-half tribes awaiting Cisjordan allocation are the focus of chapters 14-19.
8. The narrative pauses to recapitulate the Transjordan allotment (vv. 8-13), confirming that Reuben, Gad, and eastern Manasseh already hold their nachalah by Mosaic grant. This establishes the precedent for the upcoming allocations: the same authority (divine command through Moses) governs both the Transjordan and Cisjordan distributions.
9. The Transjordan boundary description begins at the Arnon gorge (the southern boundary) and moves north. Kol ha-mishor ('the entire plateau') — the Mishor is the flat, elevated tableland east of the Dead Sea, known today as the Madaba plain. This was prime agricultural and grazing land.
10. Ad g'vul b'nei Ammon ('to the border of the Ammonites') — Israel's territory did not extend into Ammonite land, as God had prohibited (Deuteronomy 2:19). The Ammonite border served as the eastern limit of the Transjordan allotment.
11. The description moves north through the Transjordan: Gilead (the central Transjordan highlands), the Geshurite and Maacathite territories (northeast of the Sea of Galilee), Mount Hermon, and Bashan (the volcanic plateau of the modern Golan Heights and Hauran). This represents Og's former kingdom.
12. Hu nishar mi-yeter ha-Refa'im ('he remained from the remnant of the Rephaim') — Og's identity as the last Rephaim giant is repeated from 12:4. Vayyakkhem Mosheh vayyorishem ('Moses struck them and dispossessed them') — the verb yarash in the hiphil ('to dispossess, to drive out') confirms that the Transjordan conquest under Moses achieved genuine dispossession of the former inhabitants.
13. V'lo horishu b'nei Yisrael et ha-G'shuri v'et ha-Ma'akhati ('the Israelites did not dispossess the Geshurites or the Maacathites') — the first explicit acknowledgment of incomplete conquest in the allocation section. This failure foreshadows the pattern that will dominate Judges 1. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') — the narrator confirms the ongoing presence of these unconquered peoples in the narrator's own time. David will later marry Maacah, a Geshurite princess (2 Samuel 3:3), and Absalom will flee to his grandfather the king of Geshur (2 Samuel 13:37-38).
14. Raq l'shevet ha-Levi lo natan nachalah ('only to the tribe of Levi he gave no inheritance') — Levi's exclusion from territorial allocation is stated three times in this chapter (vv. 14, 33) and repeatedly throughout Joshua. Ishei YHWH Elohei Yisrael hu nachalato ('the fire offerings of the LORD are his inheritance') — Levi's nachalah is not land but liturgical service. The tribe that serves at the altar receives its sustenance from the altar offerings. Their 'inheritance' is proximity to God — a theological statement that the divine presence is worth more than any territory. Levi will receive designated cities within other tribes' territories (chapter 21) but no contiguous tribal homeland.
15. L'mishp'chotam ('according to their clans/families') — the allocation is not merely tribal but sub-tribal, organized by extended family groups (mishpachot). Each clan receives a specific portion within the tribal territory.
16. Reuben's territory occupies the southern portion of the Transjordan: from the Arnon gorge northward through the Medeba plateau. This is the same area described in verses 9-10 as part of Sihon's former kingdom.
17. Several of these city names contain the element ba'al ('lord, master') — Bamot Ba'al ('high places of Baal'), Beit Ba'al M'on ('house of Baal of the dwelling'). The Canaanite religious names persist in the geography even after Israelite occupation, reflecting the enduring challenge of religious syncretism in the Transjordan.
18. Yahtsah ('Jahaz') — the site where Israel defeated Sihon in the original battle (Numbers 21:23; Deuteronomy 2:32). The city where the Transjordan conquest began is now part of Reuben's inheritance.
19. Tseret ha-Shachar b'har ha-emeq ('Zereth-shahar on the mount of the valley') — a town perched on a ridge above the Dead Sea valley. Sibmah was known for its vineyards (Isaiah 16:8-9; Jeremiah 48:32).
20. Beit P'or ('house of Peor') — associated with the Baal-peor apostasy (Numbers 25), where Israelite men engaged in sexual idolatry with Moabite women. The site's inclusion in Reuben's territory places them as guardians of a place of prior disgrace. Ashdot ha-Pisgah ('slopes of Pisgah') — the mountain range where Moses viewed the promised land and died (Deuteronomy 34:1-6).
21. N'sikhei Sichon yosh'vei ha-arets ('vassals/princes of Sihon, inhabitants of the land') — these five Midianite leaders were client-rulers under Sihon's overlordship. Their defeat is narrated in Numbers 31:8. Zur is the father of Cozbi, the Midianite woman killed by Phinehas during the Baal-peor incident (Numbers 25:15, 18). The listing connects the territorial allocation to the broader story of Transjordan conflict.
22. Bil'am ben B'or ha-qosem ('Balaam son of Beor, the diviner') — Balaam, who could not curse Israel (Numbers 22-24) but who advised Moab to seduce Israel through the Baal-peor strategy (Numbers 31:16), met his end in the Transjordan battles. The term qosem ('diviner') is pejorative — contrasting his pagan practice with legitimate prophetic authority. His death is recorded here within Reuben's territorial description because he died in this region.
23. Ha-Yarden ug'vul ('the Jordan and its border') — the Jordan River formed Reuben's western boundary, separating them from the tribes in Canaan proper. He-arim v'chatsreihen ('the cities and their villages/enclosures') — each city had dependent satellite settlements (chatserim, from chatser, 'courtyard, enclosure').

24. Gad's allotment follows Reuben's, occupying the central Transjordan — the heart of Gilead.
25. V'kol arei ha-Gil'ad ('all the cities of Gilead') — Gad received the central highlands of the Transjordan, the fertile and well-watered region of Gilead. Va-chatsi erets b'nei Ammon ('half the land of the Ammonites') — this appears to contradict Deuteronomy 2:19, which forbade taking Ammonite land. The territory described was likely land Sihon had previously taken from Ammon (cf. Judges 11:13, 22), making it legitimately Israelite through conquest from Sihon rather than directly from Ammon.
26. Machanayim ('double camp') — the place where Jacob saw the angels of God and exclaimed 'This is God's camp!' (Genesis 32:2). It will later serve as the capital for Ish-bosheth (2 Samuel 2:8) and as David's refuge during Absalom's rebellion (2 Samuel 17:24). The patriarchal memory is embedded in the tribal geography.
27. Sukkot ('Succoth,' meaning 'shelters/booths') — where Jacob built shelters for his livestock after his reconciliation with Esau (Genesis 33:17). The patriarchal narrative is woven into the tribal geography at every turn. Ad q'tseh yam Kinneret ('to the edge of the Sea of Chinnereth') — Gad's territory extended north along the Jordan Valley to the southern shore of the Sea of Galilee.
28. The formulaic summary closes Gad's allotment as it closed Reuben's (v. 23).
29. The eastern half of Manasseh receives the northernmost Transjordan territory — Bashan and northern Gilead. The split of Manasseh between east and west of the Jordan creates a unique situation: one tribe spanning the river, divided by geography but united by kinship.
30. Kol chavvot Ya'ir asher ba-Bashan shishim ir ('all the tent-villages of Jair in Bashan, sixty cities') — the chavvot ('tent-villages, encampments') of Jair were settlements named after Jair son of Manasseh, who captured them (Numbers 32:41; Deuteronomy 3:14). Sixty towns represents a substantial territory in the rich volcanic region of Bashan.
31. Livnei Makhir ben M'nasheh ('to the descendants of Machir son of Manasseh') — Machir was Manasseh's firstborn son (Genesis 50:23), and his clan was the dominant military force within the tribe. They received the most formidable territory: the former royal cities of Og, the last of the Rephaim giants. The warrior clan receives the giant's kingdom.
32. B'arvot Mo'av ('on the plains of Moab') — Moses made these allocations during Israel's encampment on the Moabite plain, opposite Jericho, in the final days before the Jordan crossing. The Transjordan section closes by returning to the scene of Moses's last acts.
33. YHWH Elohei Yisrael hu nachalatam ('the LORD, the God of Israel, is their inheritance') — the chapter's closing verse escalates from verse 14. There, Levi's inheritance was the fire offerings (the produce of the altar service). Here, the inheritance is God Himself. The LORD is not merely the source of Levi's sustenance but the substance of their portion. This is the highest theological statement about inheritance in Joshua: the ultimate nachalah is not land but the living God.

Summary: Caleb, at eighty-five years old, claims Hebron as his inheritance — the territory of the Anakite giants — declaring himself as strong as the day Moses sent him as a spy forty-five years earlier.

What Makes This Remarkable: Caleb's speech (vv. 6-12) is one of the great moments of biblical courage. He does not ask for easy territory — he asks for the hill country where the giants live, the very region that terrified the other spies in Numbers 13-14. His claim rests on a single fact: 'I wholly followed the LORD my God' (v. 8, male'ti acharei YHWH). The Hebrew male'ti ('I filled after') means he followed completely, with nothing held back — the same verb used for filling a cup to the brim.

Translation Friction: The phrase kochi az ken kochi attah (v. 11, 'as my strength was then, so is my strength now') is startling for an eighty-five-year-old. We rendered it literally. The word nachalah (v. 13, 'inheritance') is more than property — it is covenant-granted territory, the physical form of God's promise. Hebron's older name Kiriath-arba ('city of four' or 'city of Arba,' v. 15) preserves pre-Israelite tradition.

Connections: Caleb's faith echoes Numbers 13:30 and 14:24 — God promised him this land forty-five years earlier. Hebron becomes David's first capital (2 Samuel 2:1-4) and the burial site of the patriarchs (Genesis 23). The Anakites Caleb drives out (v. 12) are the same giants who terrified the spies in Numbers 13:28, 33. The phrase 'the land had rest from war' (v. 15) echoes 11:23.

¹These are the territories the Israelites received as their inheritance in the land of Canaan, allocated to them by Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the heads of the ancestral houses of the Israelite tribes. ²Their inheritance was determined by lot, as the LORD had commanded through Moses, for the nine-and-a-half tribes. ³Moses had given the two-and-a-half tribes their inheritance east of the Jordan, but he gave no territorial inheritance to the Levites among them. ⁴Joseph's descendants had become two tribes — Manasseh and Ephraim — so the Levites were given no portion of the land, only cities to live in with surrounding pasturelands for their livestock and property. ⁵The Israelites did just as the LORD had commanded Moses, and they divided the land. ⁶The people of Judah approached Joshua at Gilgal, and Caleb son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite said to him, "You know what the LORD said to Moses the man of God concerning you and me at Kadesh-barnea. ⁷I was forty years old when Moses the servant of the LORD sent me from Kadesh-barnea to scout the land, and I brought back to him an honest report — what was truly in my heart. ⁸My fellow scouts who went up with me made the people lose heart, but I remained fully committed to the LORD my God. ⁹On that day Moses swore an oath, saying, 'The land on which your feet have walked will be your inheritance — yours and your descendants' — permanently, because you fully followed the LORD my God.' ¹⁰Now look — the LORD has kept me alive, just as He promised, these forty-five years since the LORD spoke this word to Moses while Israel was wandering in the wilderness. And here I am today, eighty-five years old. ¹¹I am still as strong today as the day Moses sent me out. My strength then is my strength now — for war and for whatever needs doing. ¹²So now, give me this hill country that the LORD promised that day. You yourself heard on that day that the Anakim are there, with large, fortified cities. If the LORD is with me, I will drive them out, just as the LORD promised." ¹³Joshua blessed him and gave Hebron to Caleb son of Jephunneh as his inheritance. ¹⁴For this reason Hebron has belonged to Caleb son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite as his inheritance to this day, because he fully followed the LORD, the God of Israel. ¹⁵The former name of Hebron was Kiriath-arba — Arba was the greatest man among the Anakim. And the land had rest from war.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. El'azar ha-kohen viYhoshua bin Nun ('Eleazar the priest and Joshua son of Nun') — the allocation is administered jointly by the religious and military leaders. Eleazar (Aaron's surviving son, Numbers 20:25-28) operates the Urim and Thummim for divine consultation, while Joshua executes the distribution. This dual authority ensures the allocation is both divinely guided and administratively implemented.
2. B'goral nachalatam ('by lot was their inheritance') — the lot (goral) was the primary mechanism for distributing the land. Proverbs 16:33 states: 'The lot is cast into the lap, but its every decision is from the LORD.' The lot removes human favoritism from the process — no tribe can claim a better portion through political maneuvering. The divine will operates through the apparently random device.
3. The narrator explains the arithmetic: twelve tribes minus two-and-a-half (already allocated in Transjordan) minus Levi (no territorial inheritance) leaves nine-and-a-half tribes for the Cisjordan allocation. Joseph's two sons (Ephraim and Manasseh) maintain the twelve-tribe count despite Levi's exclusion.
4. Ki hayu v'nei Yosef sh'nei mattot ('because the sons of Joseph were two tribes') — Jacob's adoption of Ephraim and Manasseh (Genesis 48:5) created a double portion for Joseph, keeping the tribal count at twelve even with Levi set apart for priestly service. Ki im arim lashavet u-migrsheihem ('only cities to dwell in with their pasturelands') — Levi received forty-eight cities scattered throughout all the other tribes' territories (chapter 21), ensuring priestly presence in every region of Israel.
5. Ka'asher tsivvah YHWH et Mosheh ken asu ('as the LORD commanded Moses, so they did') — the obedience formula that runs throughout Joshua. The land division proceeds under the same divine authority as the conquest.
6. Kalev ben Y'funneh ha-Q'nizzi ('Caleb son of Jephunneh the Kenizzite') — Caleb's ethnic designation as a Kenizzite is significant. The Kenizzites were a non-Israelite clan (Genesis 15:19) absorbed into the tribe of Judah. Caleb's foreignness makes his faith all the more remarkable: an outsider by blood who became an insider by faithfulness. His story parallels Rahab's — both non-Israelites who aligned themselves with YHWH and received an inheritance in the promised land.
6. Et ha-davar asher dibber YHWH el Mosheh ish ha-Elohim al odotai v'al odotekha b'Qadesh Barnea ('the word the LORD spoke to Moses the man of God concerning me and you at Kadesh-barnea') — Caleb appeals to a specific divine promise made forty-five years earlier, when he and Joshua alone gave a faithful report after spying out the land (Numbers 13-14). Moses is called ish ha-Elohim ('man of God'), a title emphasizing his unique prophetic authority.
7. Va'ashev oto davar ka'asher im l'avai ('I brought him back a word/report as it was with my heart') — Caleb's self-assessment is not boastful but factual: he reported what he genuinely believed, not what would please the majority. His 'heart' (levav) was aligned with God's promise while ten other spies let fear override faith. The phrase contrasts with the fear that 'melted the hearts' (himsu et lev, Numbers 14:8) of the other spies.
8. Himsiu et lev ha-am ('they melted the heart of the people') — the ten faithless spies caused the national failure of nerve that resulted in the wilderness wandering. V'anokhi mileti acharei YHWH Elohai ('but I wholly followed the LORD my God') — the phrase mileti acharei ('I filled after' = 'I fully followed') is Caleb's signature expression, repeated in Numbers 14:24; 32:11-12; Deuteronomy 1:36. The verb male ('to fill') conveys totality: Caleb's commitment was not partial or conditional but full, complete, overflowing. There was no gap between God's promise and Caleb's trust.

9. Ha-arets asher dar'khah ragl'kha bah l'kha tihyeh l'nachalah ('the land your foot has walked on will be your inheritance') — the specific land Caleb scouted will be his personal nachalah. This promise, made at Kadesh-barnea (Numbers 14:24; Deuteronomy 1:36), has waited forty-five years for fulfillment. The land Caleb walked through as a spy he will now own as a settler.
9. Ad olam ('forever/permanently') — Caleb's inheritance carries the same permanence as the tribal allotments. His descendants will hold this territory in perpetuity. Ki mileta acharei YHWH Elohai ('because you fully followed the LORD my God') — the reason for the grant is theological faithfulness, not military prowess. Caleb earns his inheritance through trust, not through conquest.
10. Hinnah hecheyah YHWH oti ka'asher dibber ('the LORD has kept me alive, as he spoke/promised') — Caleb's survival itself is a fulfilled promise. God promised him the land, and God kept him alive to receive it. Zeh arba'im v'chamesh shanah ('these forty-five years') — forty years of wilderness wandering plus approximately five years of conquest campaigning. Ben chamesh ush'monim shanah ('eighty-five years old') — this age marker provides one of the few chronological anchors for the conquest period. If Caleb was forty when sent as a spy, and forty-five years have passed, the allocation is taking place approximately five years after the Jordan crossing.
11. Odeni ha-yom chazaq ka'asher b'yom sh'loach oti Mosheh ('I am still today as strong as the day Moses sent me') — at eighty-five, Caleb claims undiminished vigor. K'kochi az ukh'kochi attah ('my strength then is my strength now') — the claim is not merely physical boasting but theological testimony: God has preserved both his life and his strength for this moment. La-milchamah v'latset v'lavo ('for war and for going out and coming in') — 'going out and coming in' is an idiom for the full range of daily activity, both military and civil. Caleb is ready for everything.
12. T'nah li et ha-har ha-zeh ('give me this hill country') — Caleb does not request easy territory. He asks for the Hebron highlands — the very region where the Anakim giants still live, the same giants whose presence terrified the other ten spies forty-five years earlier (Numbers 13:28, 33). The man who was not afraid of the giants at forty is not afraid of them at eighty-five.
12. Ki Anaqim sham v'arim g'dolot b'tsurot ('for Anakim are there and cities are large and fortified') — Caleb acknowledges every difficulty: giants and fortified cities. He does not minimize the challenge. Ulai YHWH oti v'horashtim ('perhaps the LORD will be with me and I will dispossess them') — the ulai ('perhaps, if') is not doubt but humility. Caleb does not presume upon God's action; he trusts while leaving room for divine sovereignty. Ka'asher dibber YHWH ('as the LORD spoke/promised') — Caleb's faith rests entirely on God's spoken word. The promise made at Kadesh-barnea is the foundation of his confidence.
13. Vay'varkhahu Yehoshua ('Joshua blessed him') — the blessing is both a prayer for success and an official authorization. Vayyitten et Chevron l'Khalev ben Y'funneh l'nachalah ('he gave Hebron to Caleb as an inheritance') — the city of the patriarchs goes to the man of faith. Abraham purchased the cave of Machpelah at Hebron to bury Sarah (Genesis 23). Now Hebron becomes the personal inheritance of Caleb — the Kenizzite outsider whose faith surpassed that of native-born Israelites. The patriarchal burial site and the faithful warrior's inheritance converge at the same location.
14. Ya'an asher mille acharei YHWH Elohei Yisrael ('because he fully followed the LORD, the God of Israel') — the narrator repeats Caleb's signature phrase one final time as the theological explanation for his inheritance. The inheritance is earned not by conquest but by faithfulness. Caleb's story is the individual embodiment of the national principle: obedience to God is the path to possessing the promised land. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') — Caleb's descendants still hold Hebron in the narrator's time.
15. Qiryat Arba ha-adam ha-gadol ba-Anaqim ('Kiriath-arba, the great/greatest man among the Anakim') — Hebron's old name preserves the memory of Arba, the legendary ancestor or champion of the Anakim giants. The city named for the greatest giant is now given to the man who was never afraid of giants. V'ha-arets shaq'tah mil-milchamah ('the land had rest from war') — the same concluding formula as 11:23. The Caleb episode sits between two notices of rest, framing his inheritance claim as part of the transition from war to settlement.
15. Caleb's story is a masterpiece of narrative theology: the outsider who became an insider through faith, who waited forty-five years for a promise, who at eighty-five asked for the hardest assignment, who received the patriarchal city as his reward. His story answers the question: what does it look like to 'fully follow the LORD'?

Summary: The territory of Judah is defined by detailed boundary descriptions. Caleb conquers Hebron and Debir, Othniel captures Kiriath-sepher and wins Caleb's daughter Achsah, and the chapter lists Judah's cities by district. The Jebusites in Jerusalem remain unconquered.

What Makes This Remarkable: Judah's allotment is the longest and most detailed — reflecting Judah's theological and political significance as the tribe of the future monarchy. Achsah's request for water springs (v. 19) is one of the few moments a woman speaks in the allotment narratives — she negotiates for resources, not merely accepting what is given. The note that Judah 'could not drive out the Jebusites of Jerusalem' (v. 63) creates a tension that persists until David's conquest (2 Samuel 5:6-7).

*Translation Friction: The boundary descriptions use geographical markers whose locations are often uncertain. We rendered every place name as the Hebrew gives it. The phrase ad hayyom hazzeh (v. 63, 'to this day') marks the narrator's time and acknowledges that the allotment ideal did not match the settlement reality — the Jebusites remained in Jerusalem alongside Judah.*

Connections: Othniel's victory at Kiriath-sepher previews his role as the first judge (Judges 3:9-11). Achsah's story is repeated in Judges 1:12-15. The Jebusite presence in Jerusalem persists until 2 Samuel 5:6-9. Judah's territorial prominence anticipates the Davidic covenant (2 Samuel 7) and the prophetic focus on Judah.

¹The territory allotted to the tribe of Judah, clan by clan, extended to the border of Edom — the wilderness of Zin at the far south. ²Their southern boundary started from the end of the Dead Sea, from the bay that faces south. ³It ran south to the Ascent of Akrabbim, crossed to Zin, went up south of Kadesh-barnea, passed Hezron, went up to Addar, and turned toward Karka. ⁴It continued to Azmon, went out to the Wadi of Egypt, and ended at the sea. This is your southern boundary. ⁵The eastern boundary was the Dead Sea as far as the mouth of the Jordan. The northern boundary began from the bay of the sea at the mouth of the Jordan. ⁶The boundary went up to Beth-hoglah, passed north of Beth-arabah, and went up to the Stone of Bohan son of Reuben. ⁷The boundary went up to Debir from the Valley of Achor, then turned north toward Gilgal, which faces the Ascent of Adummim south of the valley. The boundary crossed to the waters of En-shemesh and came out at En-rogel. ⁸The boundary went up through the Valley of Ben-hinnom to the southern slope of the Jebusite city — that is, Jerusalem — then up to the top of the hill west of the Hinnom Valley, at the northern end of the Valley of Rephaim. ⁹From the hilltop the boundary curved to the spring of the waters of Nephtoah, extended to the cities of Mount Ephron, and curved to Baalah — that is, Kiriath-jearim. ¹⁰From Baalah the boundary turned westward to Mount Seir, passed along the northern slope of Mount Jearim — that is, Chesalon — descended to Beth-shemesh, and crossed to Timnah. ¹¹The boundary extended to the northern slope of Ekron, curved to Shikkeron, crossed Mount Baalah, went out to Jabneel, and ended at the sea. ¹²The western boundary was the Great Sea and its coastline. These were the boundaries of the tribe of Judah on all sides, clan by clan. ¹³To Caleb son of Jephunneh he gave a portion among the people of Judah, as the LORD had directed Joshua — Kiriath-arba (Arba being the father of Anak), that is, Hebron. ¹⁴Caleb drove out from there the three sons of Anak: Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi — descendants of Anak. ¹⁵From there he marched against the inhabitants of Debir — Debir was formerly called Kiriath-sepher. ¹⁶Caleb said, "Whoever attacks Kiriath-sepher and captures it — I will give him my daughter Achsah as a wife." ¹⁷Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb's brother, captured it, and Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah in marriage. ¹⁸When she arrived, she urged him to ask her father for a field. She dismounted from her donkey, and Caleb asked her, "What do you want?" ¹⁹She said, "Give me a blessing. Since you have given me land in the Negev, give me springs of water as well." So he gave her the upper springs and the lower springs. ²⁰This is the inheritance of the tribe of Judah, clan by clan. ²¹The southernmost cities of the tribe of Judah toward the border of Edom in the Negev were: Kabzeel, Eder, Jagur, ²²Kinah, Dimonah, Adadah, ²³Kedesh, Hazor, Ithnan, ²⁴Ziph, Telem, Bealoth, ²⁵Hazor-hadattah, Kerioth-hezron (that is, Hazor), ²⁶A mam, Shema, Moladah, ²⁷Hazar-gaddah, Heshmon, Beth-pelet, ²⁸Hazar-shual, Beersheba, Biziothiah, ²⁹Baalath, Iim, Ezem, ³⁰Eltolad, Chesil, Hormah, ³¹Ziklag, Madmannah, Sansannah, ³²Lebaoth, Shilhim, Ain, and Rimmon — twenty-nine cities in all, with their surrounding settlements. ³³In the Shephelah: Eshtaol, Zorah, Ashnah, ³⁴Zanoah, En-gannim, Tappuah, Enam, ³⁵Jarmuth, Adullam, Socoh, Azekah, ³⁶Shaaraim, Adithaim, Gederah, and Gederothaim — fourteen cities with their surrounding settlements. ³⁷Zenan, Hadashah, Migdal-gad, ³⁸Dilean, Mizpeh, Joktheel, ³⁹Lachish, Bozkath, Eglon, ⁴⁰Cabbon, Lahmas, Kithlish, ⁴¹Gederath, Beth-dagon, Naamah, and Makkedah — sixteen cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁴²Libnah, Ether, Ashan, ⁴³Iphtah, Ashnah, Nezib, ⁴⁴Keilah, Achzib, and Mareshah — nine cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁴⁵Ekron, with its dependent towns and settlements; ⁴⁶from Ekron to the sea, everything alongside Ashdod, with its settlements; ⁴⁷Ashdod with its towns and settlements; Gaza with its towns and settlements — as far as the Wadi of Egypt, with the Great Sea as the boundary. ⁴⁸In the hill country: Shamir, Jattir, Socoh, ⁴⁹Dannah, Kiriath-sannah (that is, Debir), ⁵⁰Anab, Eshtemoa, Anim, ⁵¹Goshen, Holon, and Giloh — eleven cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁵²Arab, Dumah, Eshan, ⁵³Janum, Beth-tappuah, Aphekah, ⁵⁴Humtah, Kiriath-arba (that is, Hebron), and Zior — nine cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁵⁵Maon, Carmel, Ziph, Juttah, ⁵⁶Jezreel, Jokdeam, Zanoah, ⁵⁷Kain, Gibeah, and Timnah — ten cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁵⁸Halhul, Beth-zur, Gedor, ⁵⁹Maarath, Beth-anoth, and Eltekon — six cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁶⁰Kiriath-baal (that is, Kiriath-jearim) and Rabbah — two cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁶¹In the wilderness: Beth-arabah; Middin, Secacah, ⁶²Nibshan, the City of Salt, and En-gedi — six cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁶³As for the Jebusites living in Jerusalem, the people of Judah could not drive them out. So the Jebusites live alongside the people of Judah in Jerusalem to this day.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyehi ha-goral l'matteh b'nei Yehudah ('the lot fell to the tribe of Judah') — Judah is the first tribe to receive its Cisjordan allocation, reflecting its preeminence among the tribes. El g'vul Edom midbar Tsin negbah ('to the border of Edom, the wilderness of Zin, to the south') — Judah's southern boundary touches Edom and the wilderness of Zin, where Israel spent most of the wilderness years. The tribal territory begins at the edge of the desert.
2. Min ha-lashon ha-poneh negbah ('from the tongue/bay facing southward') — the lashon ('tongue') describes a bay or peninsula at the southern tip of the Dead Sea. The boundary description follows a precise geographic course from east to west, typical of ancient Near Eastern border treaties and land grants.
3. Ma'aleh Aqrabbim ('Ascent of Scorpions') — a steep pass in the southern Negev, marking the boundary between the Arabah and the highlands. The boundary runs through the very landscape Israel traversed during the wilderness years: Kadesh-barnea, where the spies were sent (Numbers 13), sits along Judah's southern border. The tribe's territory is defined by the sites of Israel's earlier history.
4. Nachal Mitsrayim ('the Wadi of Egypt') — not the Nile but the Wadi el-Arish, the traditional boundary between Canaan and Egypt. V'hayu tots'ot ha-g'vul yammah ('the outlets of the boundary were at the sea') — the Mediterranean is the western terminus. Judah's southern border runs from the Dead Sea to the Mediterranean, encompassing the entire Negev.
5. Yam ha-Melach ('the Salt Sea' — Dead Sea) forms Judah's entire eastern border. The northern boundary begins where the Jordan empties into the Dead Sea and runs westward — this border separates Judah from Benjamin.
6. Even Bohan ben R'uven ('the Stone of Bohan son of Reuben') — a named boundary marker, apparently a standing stone associated with a member of the tribe of Reuben. Named stones as boundary markers were common in the ancient Near East and provided permanent, publicly recognized reference points for territorial borders.
7. Me-Emeq Akhor ('from the Valley of Achor') — the same valley where Achan was executed (7:24-26). The site of Israel's darkest moment during the conquest now serves as a boundary marker for Judah's territory. Geography bears the scars of history. Ein Shemesh ('spring of the sun') and Ein Rogel ('spring of the fuller') — the boundary follows natural water sources, as was typical in the ancient Near East.
8. Gei ven Hinnom ('Valley of the son of Hinnom') — this valley south and west of Jerusalem will become infamous as the site of child sacrifice under later Judean kings (2 Kings 23:10; Jeremiah 7:31-32; 32:35). Its name, Ge-Hinnom, eventually became Gehenna — the New Testament term for the place of final judgment. Its mention here as a boundary marker carries no hint of its dark future.
8. El ketef ha-Y'vusi min-negev hi Yerushalayim ('to the shoulder of the Jebusite on the south — that is, Jerusalem') — the narrator identifies the Jebusite city as Jerusalem, though it will not be captured until David's time (2 Samuel 5:6-9). The boundary runs along its southern edge, making Jerusalem technically within Judah's allotment but practically unconquered (v. 63).
9. Ba'alalah hi Qiryat Y'arim ('Baalalah, that is Kiriath-jearim') — one of the Gibeonite cities (9:17), now on the border between Judah and Benjamin. Kiriath-jearim will later be the resting place of the ark of the covenant for twenty years (1 Samuel 7:1-2), connecting this boundary description to the larger narrative of God's presence among His people.
10. Beit Shemesh ('house of the sun') — a border city between Judah and Dan in the Sorek Valley. It will become the site where the ark returns from Philistine captivity (1 Samuel 6:12-19). Timnah — the town where Samson will find his Philistine wife (Judges 14:1). The boundary passes through sites that will feature prominently in the Judges narratives.
11. The northern boundary reaches Ekron, one of the five Philistine cities (13:3). Judah's border touches Philistine territory without encompassing it — the Philistine pentapolis remains unconquered. Tots'ot ha-g'vul yammah ('the outlets of the boundary were at the sea') — the Mediterranean coast is the western terminus, completing the circuit of Judah's borders.
12. Ha-Yam ha-Gadol ('the Great Sea') — the Mediterranean. Judah's territory is now fully defined: Dead Sea to the east, Negev desert to the south, Mediterranean to the west, and the Benjamin/Dan border to the north. It is the largest tribal allotment, befitting Judah's preeminent role (Genesis 49:8-12).
13. El pi YHWH liYhoshua ('according to the mouth/command of the LORD to Joshua') — Caleb's allocation is explicitly attributed to divine command, not to Joshua's personal decision. Qiryat Arba avi ha-Anaq ('Kiriath-arba, father of Anak') — Arba is identified as the ancestor of the Anakim giants. The city named after the father of the giants goes to the man who was never afraid of them.
14. Vayyoresh misham Kalev et sh'loshah b'nei ha-Anaq ('Caleb drove out from there the three sons of Anak') — the eighty-five-year-old warrior fulfills his promise. The same three Anakim clans the spies saw at Hebron forty-five years earlier (Numbers 13:22) are now expelled by the one spy who was not afraid of them. The verb yarash ('to dispossess') closes the circle: Caleb takes possession by driving out the giants whose presence once terrified a nation.

15. Qiryat Sefer ('city of the book/scribe') — Debir's earlier name suggests it may have been a scribal center or archive city. The name is fitting for a place that will feature in a narrative about learning and legacy (vv. 16-19). The parallel account appears in Judges 1:11-15.
16. V'natatti lo et Akhsah vitti l'ishah ('I will give him Achsah my daughter as a wife') — Caleb offers his daughter as the reward for military valor. This practice was common in the ancient Near East (cf. 1 Samuel 17:25; 18:17-19, where Saul promises his daughter to whoever kills Goliath). The scene introduces Achsah, who will prove to be as bold and resourceful as her father.
17. Othniel ben Q'naz achi Khalev ('Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb's brother/relative') — Othniel is either Caleb's younger brother or his nephew (the Hebrew achi can mean 'brother' or 'kinsman'). He will later become the first judge of Israel (Judges 3:9-11), the model deliverer against whom all subsequent judges are measured. His introduction here as a young warrior earning his bride foreshadows his later role as Israel's first post-Joshua leader.
18. Vatt'siteihu lish'ol me-et avihah sadeh ('she urged him to ask her father for a field') — Achsah takes initiative, persuading her husband to request productive land. Vattitsnach me-al ha-chamor ('she dismounted from the donkey') — the act of dismounting may signal a formal petition or simply practical movement toward her father. Caleb's question mah lakh ('what is it to you? / what do you want?') shows his openness to her request.
19. T'nah li v'rakhah ('give me a blessing/gift') — Achsah asks boldly, as her father asked boldly of Joshua (14:12). Ki erets ha-Negev n'tattani ('since you have given me Negev land') — the Negev is arid; land without water is barely usable. V'natattah li gullot mayim ('give me also springs of water') — Achsah recognizes that the land gift is incomplete without water. She asks for the essential resource that transforms dry land into productive territory.
19. Vayyitten lah et gullot illiyyot v'et gullot tachtiiyyot ('he gave her the upper springs and the lower springs') — Caleb gives generously, exceeding her request. The double gift (upper and lower springs) ensures abundant water supply. Achsah's boldness mirrors her father's: Caleb asked for the hardest territory (14:12), and Achsah asks for the resources to make it thrive. Both father and daughter know that receiving an inheritance is not enough — you must also possess the means to develop it.
20. The summary formula introduces the city list that follows (vv. 21-62). The cities are organized by geographic region: Negev cities (vv. 21-32), Shephelah cities (vv. 33-47), hill country cities (vv. 48-60), and wilderness cities (vv. 61-62).
21. The Negev city list begins. Kabzeel is the hometown of Benaiah son of Jehoiada, one of David's mighty warriors (2 Samuel 23:20). These are frontier settlements on the edge of the Edomite border.
22. The Negev city list continues. These small settlements mark the southern extent of permanent Judahite habitation.
23. This Hazor is not the great northern city (11:1, 10) but a smaller Negev settlement sharing the same name.
24. This Ziph is a Negev settlement distinct from the more famous Ziph in the hill country (v. 55), where David will hide from Saul (1 Samuel 23:14-15; 26:1-3).
25. Chatsor Chadattah ('New Hazor') — distinguished from the other Hazor by the adjective chadattah ('new'). Qeriyot Chetsron ('Kerioth-hezron') — possibly the hometown of Judas Iscariot, if 'Iscariot' derives from ish Qeriyot ('man of Kerioth').
26. Moladah — later assigned to Simeon (19:2), reflecting the overlap between Judah's and Simeon's territories in the Negev.
27. Negev settlements continue. These small towns dot the arid landscape between Beersheba and the Edomite border.
28. B'er Sheva ('Beersheba,' meaning 'well of the oath' or 'well of seven') — the most important city in the Negev, associated with Abraham (Genesis 21:31-33), Isaac (Genesis 26:23-25, 33), and Jacob (Genesis 46:1-4). 'From Dan to Beersheba' will become the standard idiom for the full extent of Israel (Judges 20:1; 1 Samuel 3:20). The patriarchal well-city is now formally within Judah's inheritance.
29. The Negev city list continues toward the western Negev.
30. Chormah ('Hormah,' meaning 'destruction/ban') — the city whose name commemorates an early Israelite victory and the cherem applied there (Numbers 21:3). The name itself is a permanent memorial of divine judgment.
31. Tsiqlag ('Ziklag') — this city will be given to David by Achish king of Gath during David's fugitive years (1 Samuel 27:6) and will serve as his base of operations. The narrator notes that 'Ziklag has belonged to the kings of Judah to this day' (1 Samuel 27:6).
32. Kol arim esrim va-tesha v'chatsreihen ('all cities twenty-nine with their villages') — the total for the Negev district. The actual names listed number more than twenty-nine, suggesting either that some pairs are compound names (e.g., 'Ain and Rimmon' may be a single city, En-rimmon) or that the number reflects a different counting method.
33. The Shephelah (western foothills) city list begins. Esh'ta'ol and Tsor'ah — these two cities in the Sorek Valley will feature prominently in the Samson narrative (Judges 13:2, 25; 16:31). They are later assigned to Dan (19:41), reflecting the territorial adjustments between Judah and Dan.
34. Ein Gannim ('spring of gardens') — the name evokes agricultural fertility. Tappuach ('apple') — likely the same Tappuah of 12:17.
35. Jarmuth was one of the five coalition kings' cities (10:3). Adullam will become David's cave refuge (1 Samuel 22:1). Socoh and Azekah flank the Valley of Elah, where David will defeat Goliath (1 Samuel 17:1). The Shephelah landscape is saturated with future narrative significance.

36. Sha'arayim ('two gates') — mentioned in the pursuit after David's victory over Goliath (1 Samuel 17:52). The first Shephelah sub-district totals fourteen cities.
37. The second Shephelah sub-district begins. These cities are in the central and southern Shephelah.
38. Ha-Mitspeh ('the lookout/watchtower') — a strategic observation point in the Shephelah, one of several sites bearing this name throughout the land.
39. Lachish and Eglon — two of the five coalition cities defeated in chapter 10, now listed as Judahite cities. Lachish was one of the most heavily fortified cities in Judah, second in importance only to Jerusalem. Its destruction by Sennacherib in 701 BC is depicted in famous Assyrian reliefs.
40. Smaller Shephelah settlements in the Lachish district.
41. Beit Dagon ('house of Dagon') — named after the Philistine grain deity, indicating pre-Israelite Philistine or Canaanite influence. Makkedah — the site of the cave where the five kings hid (10:16-27). The second Shephelah sub-district totals sixteen cities.
42. Libnah — conquered during the southern campaign (10:29-30), later a Levitical city (21:13).
43. A second Ashnah appears here (distinct from v. 33), illustrating how common names recur across different districts.
44. Q'ilah ('Keilah') — the city David will later defend against Philistine raiders (1 Samuel 23:1-13). Mareshah — a significant Shephelah city that will become important in the Chronicler's narrative (2 Chronicles 11:8; 14:9-10; 20:37). The third Shephelah sub-district totals nine cities.
45. Ekron — one of the five Philistine cities. Its inclusion in Judah's allotment indicates the ideal boundary, not the actual extent of occupation. The Philistine cities are assigned to Judah by divine grant but remain unconquered in practice.
46. The territory between Ekron and the coast, alongside the Philistine city of Ashdod, is claimed for Judah. This coastal strip was never effectively controlled by Judah — it remained Philistine territory throughout the pre-monarchic and much of the monarchic period.
47. Ashdod and Gaza — two of the five Philistine cities — are listed as part of Judah's allotment. The gap between divine grant and actual possession is at its widest here: these major Philistine strongholds will resist Israelite control for centuries. The allocation represents God's declared intention for Judah's territory, not a description of current occupation.
48. The hill country city list begins — the heartland of Judah. Jattir — later assigned as a Levitical city (21:14) and one of the cities to which David sent spoil from his Amalekite raid (1 Samuel 30:27).
49. Qiryat Sannah — a third name for the city also called Kiriath-sepher (v. 15) and Debir. The city that Othniel captured for Caleb.
50. Anab — one of the cities from which Joshua expelled the Anakim (11:21). Eshtemoa — a Levitical city (21:14) and a recipient of David's gifts (1 Samuel 30:28).
51. Giloh — the hometown of Ahithophel, David's counselor who defected to Absalom (2 Samuel 15:12). The first hill country sub-district totals eleven cities.
52. The second hill country sub-district begins, centered on the southern hill country.
53. Beit Tappuah ('house of the apple') — a hill country settlement distinguished from the Tappuah of the Shephelah (v. 34).
54. Qiryat Arba hi Chevron ('Kiriath-arba, that is Hebron') — the patriarchal city appears in the city list as part of Caleb's inheritance within Judah. The second hill country sub-district totals nine cities.
55. Ma'on and Karmel — the region where David will encounter Nabal and Abigail (1 Samuel 25:2-3). Ziph — where the Ziphites will betray David's hiding place to Saul twice (1 Samuel 23:19; 26:1). The hill country of Judah is the stage for much of the David narrative.
56. This Jezreel is a Judahite hill country town, distinct from the more famous Jezreel in the northern valley (the Valley of Jezreel).
57. The third hill country sub-district totals ten cities.
58. Beit Tsur ('Beth-zur') — a strategic fortress in the hill country between Hebron and Jerusalem. It will feature prominently in the Maccabean wars (1 Maccabees 4:29, 61; 6:26, 31, 49-50).
59. The fourth hill country sub-district totals six cities. The Septuagint adds an additional sub-district here (including Tekoa, Bethlehem, and other cities between Jerusalem and Hebron) that is missing from the Masoretic Hebrew text. The omission is likely due to an ancient copying error (homoioteleuton).
60. Qiryat Ba'al hi Qiryat Y'arim ('Kiriath-baal, that is Kiriath-jearim') — the Canaanite name preserves the ba'al element; the Israelite renaming to 'City of Forests' replaces the pagan association. This city will host the ark of the covenant for twenty years (1 Samuel 7:1-2). The fifth and final hill country sub-district contains just two cities.
61. Ba-midbar ('in the wilderness') — the final geographic district: the Judean wilderness, the barren terrain descending from the hill country to the Dead Sea. This is the wilderness where David will hide from Saul and where the Qumran community will later produce the Dead Sea Scrolls.
62. Ir ha-Melach ('City of Salt') — possibly associated with the salt deposits near the Dead Sea. Ein Gedi ('spring of the young goat') — the famous oasis on the western shore of the Dead Sea, where David will spare Saul's life in a cave (1 Samuel 24:1-22). The wilderness district totals six cities. Ein Gedi's lush springs in the midst of barren wilderness make it one of the most dramatic landscapes in Israel — a place where life emerges from desolation.

63. V'et ha-Y'vusi yosh'vei Yerushalayim lo yakhlu v'nei Yehudah l'horisham ('the Jebusites inhabiting Jerusalem — the people of Judah could not dispossess them') — the chapter's final verse delivers a jarring admission: Judah, the preeminent tribe, could not take Jerusalem. The verb yakhal ('to be able') indicates inability, not unwillingness. The Jebusite fortress was too strong for Judah to conquer. Jerusalem will remain in Jebusite hands until David captures it by sending his men through the water shaft (2 Samuel 5:6-9).
63. Ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') — the narrator writes before David's conquest, placing the composition (or at least this note) in the pre-Davidic period. The verse is a confession of incomplete conquest that foreshadows the pattern of Judges 1: tribe after tribe failing to fully dispossess the Canaanite inhabitants.

Summary: The territory allotted to the descendants of Joseph — specifically Ephraim — is described. The Canaanites of Gezer remain among them as forced laborers.

What Makes This Remarkable: Ephraim's allotment is brief compared to Judah's, but the tribe's significance is enormous — Ephraim will become synonymous with the northern kingdom. The note that the Canaanites of Gezer were not driven out but subjected to forced labor (v. 10) marks a pattern of incomplete obedience that defines the settlement period. The compromise — coexistence through subjugation rather than separation — is precisely what Deuteronomy warned against.

Translation Friction: The boundary descriptions are compressed and some geographical references are uncertain. The phrase mas-oved (v. 10, 'forced labor') is the same term used for Solomon's labor force in 1 Kings 9:21 — we rendered it consistently. The partial obedience — subjugating rather than driving out — represents a middle path the Torah did not authorize.

Connections: Gezer's Canaanite population persists until Pharaoh's daughter receives it as a wedding gift from Egypt's king (1 Kings 9:16). The forced-labor arrangement anticipates the system that will become the northern kingdom's grievance against Solomon (1 Kings 12:4). Ephraim's complaint about insufficient territory (17:14-18) reveals growing tribal friction.

1The allotment for the descendants of Joseph began at the Jordan near Jericho, east of the waters of Jericho, going up through the wilderness from Jericho into the hill country of Bethel. 2From Bethel it went on to Luz and crossed to the territory of the Archites at Ataroth. 3It descended westward to the territory of the Japhletites, down to Lower Beth-horon and on to Gezer, ending at the sea. 4So the descendants of Joseph — Manasseh and Ephraim — received their inheritance. 5The boundary of the Ephraimites, clan by clan, was as follows: the eastern border of their inheritance ran from Ataroth-addar to Upper Beth-horon. 6The boundary went toward the sea at Michmethath on the north, then turned eastward to Taanath-shiloh, and passed east of it to Janoah. 7From Janoah it descended to Ataroth and Naarah, reached Jericho, and ended at the Jordan. 8From Tappuah the boundary ran westward to the Kanah Valley and ended at the sea. This was the inheritance of the tribe of Ephraim, clan by clan. 9In addition, certain cities within Manasseh's territory were set apart for the Ephraimites — all those cities with their surrounding settlements. 10They did not drive out the Canaanites living in Gezer, so the Canaanites have lived among the Ephraimites to this day — though they were put to forced labor.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyetsa ha-goral livnei Yosef ('the lot came out for the descendants of Joseph') — Ephraim and Manasseh are treated together as 'the house of Joseph' before receiving individual allotments. Their combined territory forms the central hill country of Canaan — the heartland that will later become the northern kingdom of Israel.
2. Mi-Beit El Luzah ('from Bethel to Luz') — Bethel and Luz are sometimes treated as the same city (Genesis 28:19) and sometimes as adjacent sites. Ha-Arkhi ('the Archite') — a clan whose territory lay near Bethel. David's friend and advisor Hushai is called 'the Archite' (2 Samuel 15:32; 16:16).
3. Beit Choron Tachton ('Lower Beth-horon') — the lower of the two Beth-horon settlements that guarded the strategic pass from the central highlands to the coastal plain (the same pass where the Amorite coalition was routed in 10:10-11). Gezer — the city whose king was defeated (10:33; 12:12) but whose territory was never fully conquered until Solomon's time (1 Kings 9:16).

4. The general Joseph boundary (vv. 1-3) is now subdivided: Ephraim's allotment follows in verses 5-9, and Manasseh's in chapter 17. Joseph's double portion (through Ephraim and Manasseh) fulfills Jacob's blessing of Genesis 48-49.
5. Beit Choron Elyon ('Upper Beth-horon') — the upper settlement of the twin Beth-horon towns. Together with Lower Beth-horon (v. 3), these cities controlled the most important pass between the coastal plain and the central highlands. Ephraim's border runs through this strategic corridor.
6. Ta'anat Shiloh ('approach to Shiloh') — the name references Shiloh, which will become the central sanctuary site where the tabernacle is established (18:1). The boundary passes near this important future religious center.
7. U-faga bi-Yricho v'yatsa ha-Yarden ('it touched Jericho and went out at the Jordan') — Ephraim's eastern boundary reaches the Jordan River at Jericho, making Ephraim's territory a cross-section of the central highlands from the Jordan to the Mediterranean approaches.
8. Nachal Qanah ('the Kanah River/Valley') — this wadi formed the boundary between Ephraim and Manasseh on the western side of the territory. The Kanah runs through the Shephelah to the Mediterranean.
9. He-arim ha-mavdalot livnei Efrayim b'tokh nachalat b'nei M'nasheh ('the cities set apart for Ephraim within the inheritance of Manasseh') — tribal boundaries were not absolute. Ephraim held designated enclaves within Manasseh's territory, reflecting the close kinship between the two Joseph tribes and the practical difficulties of drawing clean borders in a landscape of interspersed settlements.
10. V'lo horishu et ha-K'na'ani ha-yoshev b'Gazer ('they did not dispossess the Canaanites dwelling in Gezer') — the same failure noted for Judah and Jerusalem (15:63), now repeated for Ephraim and Gezer. Vay'hi l'mas oved ('they became forced labor') — rather than expelling the Canaanites, Ephraim enslaved them. This compromise — subjugation rather than dispossession — violates Deuteronomy 7:1-2 and sets the pattern for the Judges period. Forced labor controls the population without removing the religious threat that cohabitation poses.

Summary: The allotment to the half-tribe of Manasseh west of the Jordan is described. The daughters of Zelophehad claim their father's inheritance. Joseph's descendants complain they need more territory; Joshua tells them to clear the forested hill country.

What Makes This Remarkable: The daughters of Zelophehad (v. 3-6) invoke Moses's ruling from Numbers 27:1-11 — and it holds. Their father died without sons, and the inheritance passes to the daughters as God commanded. This is the legal system working: a precedent established in the wilderness is honored in the land. Joshua's response to the Joseph tribes' complaint (vv. 14-18) is bracing: 'If you are a numerous people, go up to the forest and clear it for yourselves' — stop complaining and start working.

Translation Friction: The phrase erets haPerizzi vohaRepha'im (v. 15, 'the land of the Perizzites and the Rephaim') places the Joseph tribes in territory associated with legendary pre-Israelite peoples. The word ya'ar (v. 15, 'forest') reveals that much of the hill country was densely wooded — the settlement required deforestation, a detail often lost in modern imagination of the landscape.

Connections: Zelophehad's daughters fulfill Numbers 27:1-11 and 36:1-12. The Canaanite chariots of iron (v. 16) anticipate Judges 1:19 and 4:3 (Sisera's iron chariots). Joshua's challenge to the Joseph tribes foreshadows the inter-tribal tensions of Judges. The Rephaim reference connects to Deuteronomy 2:10-11 and 3:11 (Og's bed).

¹The allotment for the tribe of Manasseh — Joseph's firstborn — was as follows: Machir, Manasseh's firstborn and the father of Gilead, received Gilead and Bashan because he was a warrior. ²The remaining Manassites received allotments by their clans: the descendants of Abiezer, Helek, Asriel, Shechem, Hephher, and Shemida. These were the male descendants of Manasseh son of Joseph, clan by clan. ³Now Zelophehad son of Hephher, son of Gilead, son of Machir, son of Manasseh, had no sons — only daughters. Their names were Mahlah, Noah, Hoglah, Milcah, and Tirzah. ⁴They came before Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the leaders, and said, "The LORD commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our relatives." So, in obedience to the LORD's command, he gave them an inheritance among the relatives of their father. ⁵Ten parcels fell to Manasseh in addition to Gilead and Bashan east of the Jordan, ⁶because the daughters of Manasseh received an inheritance among the sons. The rest of the Manassites held the land of Gilead. ⁷Manasseh's boundary ran from Asher to Michmethath, which faces Shechem. The boundary went south to the inhabitants of En-tappuah. ⁸The land of Tappuah belonged to Manasseh, but the town of Tappuah on Manasseh's border belonged to the Ephraimites. ⁹The boundary descended to the Kanah Valley. South of the valley, these cities belonged to Ephraim even though they were among Manasseh's cities. Manasseh's boundary was on the north side of the valley, ending at the sea. ¹⁰To the south was Ephraim's territory, and to the north was Manasseh's, with the sea as their western boundary. They bordered Asher on the north and Issachar on the east. ¹¹Within Issachar and Asher, Manasseh held Beth-shean and its dependent towns, Ibleam and its towns, the residents of Dor and its towns, the residents of En-dor and its towns, the residents of Taanach and its towns, and the residents of Megiddo and its towns — three of the heights. ¹²But the Manassites could not take possession of these cities. The Canaanites were determined to remain in this land. ¹³When the Israelites grew stronger, they subjected the Canaanites to forced labor but did not drive them out completely. ¹⁴The descendants of Joseph said to Joshua, "Why have you given us only one allotment — a single portion — as our inheritance? We are a numerous people, since the LORD has blessed us so abundantly." ¹⁵Joshua answered them, "If you are so numerous, go up to the forest region and clear land for yourselves in the territory of the Perizzites and Rephaim, since the hill country of Ephraim is too cramped for you." ¹⁶The descendants of Joseph replied, "The hill country is not enough for us, and all the Canaanites in the valley lands have iron chariots — both those in Beth-shean and its towns and those in the Valley of Jezreel." ¹⁷Joshua said to the house of Joseph — to Ephraim and Manasseh — "You are indeed a numerous people with great strength. You will not have just one allotment. ¹⁸The hill country will be yours. Though it is forested, you will clear it, and its farthest reaches will be yours. And you will drive out the Canaanites, even though they have iron chariots and are strong."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. L'Makhir b'khor M'nasheh avi ha-Gil'ad ki hu hayah ish milchamah ('to Machir, firstborn of Manasseh, father of Gilead, because he was a man of war') — Machir's warrior status earned him the most formidable Transjordan territory: Gilead and Bashan, formerly Og's kingdom. The Machirite clan was the military backbone of Manasseh, and their Transjordan allotment (already described in 13:29-31) reflects their fighting capacity.
2. Six Manassite clans receive the western (Cisjordan) allotment. Abiezer's clan will produce Gideon (Judges 6:11). Shechem is both a clan name and the city that will become a major political and religious center. The listing 'the male descendants' (ha-z'kharim) sets up the contrast with the female claimants in the next verse.
3. Ts'lofchad — the man whose death without male heirs prompted a landmark legal ruling in Numbers 27:1-11: daughters can inherit when there are no sons. The five daughters successfully petitioned Moses for their father's nachalah, establishing a permanent precedent in Israelite inheritance law. Their inclusion here demonstrates that the ruling was honored in practice, not merely in principle.
4. YHWH tsivvah et Mosheh latet lanu nachalah b'tokh acheinu ('the LORD commanded Moses to give us an inheritance among our kinsmen') — the daughters of Zelophehad cite the divine precedent from Numbers 27:7. They do not merely request; they invoke established legal authority. Vayyitten lahem el pi YHWH nachalah b'tokh achei avihen ('he gave them, according to the LORD's word, an inheritance among the brothers of their father') — the ruling is honored without hesitation. Women receive covenant land alongside men. The nachalah system is based on family right, not gender.
5. Asarah chavalim ('ten portions/parcels') — the ten western portions correspond to six male clans (v. 2) plus the four remaining portions needed for the five daughters of Zelophehad's sub-clan, reflecting the complex clan arithmetic of inheritance distribution.
6. B'not M'nasheh nachalu nachalah b'tokh banav ('the daughters of Manasseh inherited an inheritance among his sons') — the narrator emphasizes the daughters' equal standing in the land distribution. The Zelophehad precedent is now embedded in the tribal record as accomplished fact.
7. Sh'khem ('Shechem') — one of the most historically significant cities in Israel: where Abraham first received the land promise (Genesis 12:6-7), where Jacob purchased land and built an altar (Genesis 33:18-20), and where the covenant renewal of chapter 24 will take place. Shechem sits in the pass between Mount Ebal and Mount Gerizim.
8. A precise territorial distinction: the surrounding land (erets Tappuah) belongs to Manasseh, but the city itself (Tappuah) belongs to Ephraim. Such border-city arrangements demonstrate the complexity of tribal boundaries in practice.
9. The Kanah Valley (Nachal Qanah) serves as the dividing line between the two Joseph tribes, with Ephraim holding enclaves on the southern side within Manasseh's broader territory. The intermingling reflects the close kinship between the tribes.
10. The summary positions the two Joseph tribes in relation to their neighbors: Asher to the northwest (along the Carmel coast) and Issachar to the northeast (in the Jezreel Valley). Manasseh's territory stretched from the Jordan to the Mediterranean — one of the widest east-west allotments.
11. Manasseh held important cities within the territories of neighboring tribes: Beth-shean (guarding the junction of the Jezreel and Jordan valleys), Ibleam (controlling a pass in the Carmel range), Dor (coastal), Taanach and Megiddo (controlling the Jezreel Valley). These were strategic cities, and Manasseh's claim to them reflects their military importance. Sh'loshet ha-nafet ('the three heights/districts') — a term of uncertain meaning, possibly referring to three elevated districts within these territories.
12. V'lo yakhlu b'nei M'nasheh l'horish et he-arim ha-elleh ('the sons of Manasseh could not dispossess these cities') — the third failure notice after Judah (15:63) and Ephraim (16:10). Vayyoel ha-K'na'ani lashavet ba-arets ha-zot ('the Canaanite was determined to dwell in this land') — the verb yo'el ('was willing, was determined, persisted') shows Canaanite tenacity. They refused to leave.

13. Vayyitt'nu et ha-K'na'ani la-mas v'horesh lo horisho ('they put the Canaanite to forced labor but did not at all drive them out') — the same compromise as Ephraim (16:10). Economic exploitation replaces obedience to the divine command. The pattern — growing strong enough to enslave but choosing not to fully dispossess — reveals a failure of will, not capacity. When Israel became powerful enough to enforce the cherem, they chose profit over obedience.
14. Maddu'a natatta li nachalah goral echad v'chevel echad va-ani am rav ('why have you given me one lot and one portion when I am a large people?') — the Joseph tribes complain that their territory is too small for their population. The complaint contrasts sharply with Caleb's attitude: Caleb asked for the hardest territory (14:12), while Joseph demands easier, larger territory. Ad asher ad koh berkhani YHWH ('since the LORD has blessed me so much until now') — they cite divine blessing as the reason they deserve more land, turning theology into a self-serving argument.
15. Im am rav attah aleh l'kha ha-ya'arah u-vereta l'kha sham ('if you are a numerous people, go up to the forest and clear it for yourself there') — Joshua's response is bracing: if you need more land, go take it. Clear the forests, fight the Perizzites and Rephaim. The answer exposes the Joseph tribes' complaint as laziness disguised as piety — they want more land without more effort. Ki ats l'kha har Efrayim ('since the hill country of Ephraim is too narrow for you') — Joshua acknowledges their crowding but redirects them toward the solution: expansion through effort, not redistribution of others' allotments.
16. Rekhev barzel ('iron chariots') — the Canaanites' technological advantage. Iron chariots dominated the flat valley terrain where infantry was vulnerable. The Joseph tribes use the iron chariots as an excuse for not expanding into the valleys, ignoring the fact that God had already demonstrated His power over chariots at Merom (11:6-9). The complaint reveals a failure of faith: the tribe that cites God's blessing (v. 14) does not trust God's power against iron technology.
17. Am rav attah v'khoach gadol lakh ('you are a numerous people and great strength is yours') — Joshua now acknowledges both their numbers and their power. But instead of granting them additional territory at others' expense, he directs their power toward the challenge: if you are strong, use that strength to expand.
18. Ki torish et ha-K'na'ani ki rekhev barzel lo ki chazaq hu ('you will drive out the Canaanite, even though he has iron chariots, even though he is strong') — Joshua's final word directly addresses the iron chariot excuse. The chariots are real; the enemy is strong; and Joshua asserts that none of this matters. The tribe that claims God's blessing should act on God's power. The passage ends with a challenge rather than a concession — an echo of God's own words to Joshua in 1:6-9.

Summary: The remaining seven tribes who have not yet received their inheritance are rebuked by Joshua. A survey commission maps the remaining land, and lots are cast at Shiloh to distribute territory. Benjamin's allotment is detailed.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joshua's rebuke (v. 3) is pointed: 'How long will you be slack about going in to possess the land that the LORD, the God of your fathers, has given you?' The gift requires action — inheritance is not passive. The assembly at Shiloh (v. 1) marks the tabernacle's first permanent location after the wilderness, and Shiloh will remain the central sanctuary until the ark's capture in 1 Samuel 4.

Translation Friction: The survey commission (v. 4-9) is described with administrative detail: seven men walk the land, divide it into seven portions, and write descriptions in a document (sefer). We rendered the process as the Hebrew presents it — this is ancient land surveying, and the vocabulary is technical. Benjamin's territory between Judah and Joseph (vv. 11-28) places the smallest tribe in the most strategic location.

Connections: Shiloh as the tabernacle site continues through Judges and into 1 Samuel 1-4. Its destruction becomes a prophetic warning in Jeremiah 7:12 and 26:6. Benjamin's territory includes Jerusalem (v. 28) — the city that straddles the Judah-Benjamin border and will become David's capital. The lot-casting at Shiloh connects to the Urim and Thummim tradition (Exodus 28:30).

1The entire assembly of the Israelites gathered at Shiloh and set up the Tent of Meeting there. The land lay subdued before them. 2Seven tribes among the Israelites had not yet received their inheritance. 3Joshua said to the Israelites, "How long will you put off going in to take possession of the land that the LORD, the God of your ancestors, has given you? 4Appoint three men from each tribe. I will send them out to travel through the land, survey it for the purpose of their inheritance, and then report back to me. 5They are to divide it into seven portions. Judah will remain in its territory to the south, and the house of Joseph in its territory to the north. 6You are to survey the land in seven portions and bring the description here to me. I will cast lots for you here before the LORD our God. ⁷The Levites have no portion among you, because the priesthood of the LORD is their inheritance. And Gad, Reuben, and the half-tribe of Manasseh have already received their inheritance east of the Jordan, which Moses the servant of the LORD gave them." ⁸The men set out on their way. Joshua charged those going to survey the land: "Go, travel through the land, write up a description, and come back to me. Then I will cast lots for you before the LORD at Shiloh." ⁹The men went and traveled through the land, recording it city by city in seven portions in a document. Then they returned to Joshua at the camp in Shiloh. ¹⁰Joshua cast lots for them at Shiloh before the LORD, and there he divided the land among the Israelites according to their tribal divisions. ¹¹The lot for the tribe of Benjamin came up first, clan by clan. Their allotted territory fell between the people of Judah and the people of Joseph. ¹²Their northern boundary began at the Jordan, went up along the northern slope of Jericho, ascended westward into the hill country, and ended at the wilderness of Beth-aven. ¹³From there the boundary crossed to Luz — to the southern slope of Luz (that is, Bethel) — then descended to Ataroth-addar, near the hill south of Lower Beth-horon. ¹⁴The boundary curved around the western side, turning south from the hill facing Beth-horon, and ended at Kiriath-baal (that is, Kiriath-jearim), a city of Judah. This was the western side. ¹⁵The southern side began at the edge of Kiriath-jearim. The boundary went westward to the spring of the waters of Nephtoah, ¹⁶then descended to the foot of the hill facing the Valley of Ben-hinnom, at the northern end of the Valley of Rephaim. It went down through the Hinnom Valley along the southern slope of the Jebusite city and on down to En-rogel. ¹⁷It turned north to En-shemesh, then went to Geliloth facing the Ascent of Adummim, and descended to the Stone of Bohan son of Reuben. ¹⁸It crossed to the slope overlooking the Arabah on the north and descended into the Arabah. ¹⁹The boundary passed along the northern slope of Beth-hoglah and ended at the northern bay of the Dead Sea, at the southern end of the Jordan. This was the southern boundary. ²⁰The Jordan formed the eastern boundary. This was the inheritance of the Benjaminites on all sides, clan by clan. ²¹The cities of the tribe of Benjamin, clan by clan, were: Jericho, Beth-hoglah, Emek-keziz, ²²Beth-arabah, Zemaraim, Bethel, ²³Avvim, Parah, Ophrah, ²⁴Chephar-ammoni, Ophni, and Geba — twelve cities with their surrounding settlements. ²⁵Gibeon, Ramah, Beeroth, ²⁶Mizpah, Chephirah, Mozah, ²⁷Rekem, Irpeel, Taralah, ²⁸Zela, Ha-eleph, the Jebusite city (that is, Jerusalem), Gibeah, and Kiriath — fourteen cities with their surrounding settlements. This was the inheritance of the Benjaminites, clan by clan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vayyashkinu sham et Ohel Mo'ed ('they caused the Tent of Meeting to dwell there') — the verb shakan ('to dwell, to tabernacle') is the root of Shekhinah ('divine dwelling presence'). The tabernacle's installation at Shiloh marks a new phase: the center of worship moves from the military camp at Gilgal to a more permanent site in the central highlands. Shiloh will serve as Israel's central sanctuary throughout the Judges period until its destruction, likely by the Philistines (cf. Psalm 78:60; Jeremiah 7:12-14; 26:6).
2. V'ha-arets nikhb'shah lifneihem ('the land was subdued before them') — the passive verb nikhb'shah confirms the land is under Israelite control. The remaining allotments can proceed in relative security.
3. Shiv'ah sh'vatim ('seven tribes') — Judah, Ephraim, and the half-tribe of Manasseh have received their western allotments. Reuben, Gad, and the eastern half of Manasseh hold the Transjordan. Levi has no territorial inheritance. Seven tribes remain: Benjamin, Simeon, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan.
4. Ad anah attem mitrappim lavo lareshet et ha-arets ('how long will you be slack/negligent to go and possess the land?') — Joshua rebukes the remaining tribes for their passivity. The verb raphah (hitpael, 'to be slack, to relax, to be negligent') suggests a failure of initiative. The land has been given; the tribes have not moved to claim it. Joshua's question echoes Moses's rebuke to the Reubenites and Gadites: 'Shall your brothers go to war while you sit here?' (Numbers 32:6).
5. Sh'loshah anashim la-shavet ('three men per tribe') — twenty-one men total will survey the remaining territory. V'yikht'vu otah l'fi nachalatam ('they will write/describe it according to their inheritance') — the survey is a written document, a formal land record. This is systematic, bureaucratic land management: survey, document, allocate by lot.
5. The existing allotments of Judah (south) and Joseph (north) serve as fixed boundaries. The seven remaining portions will be fitted between them and in the areas they have not claimed. The framework is already established; the survey fills in the gaps.
6. V'yariti lakhem goral poh lifnei YHWH Eloheinu ('I will cast lots for you here before the LORD our God') — the lot-casting takes place at Shiloh, before the Tent of Meeting, in the LORD's presence. The process is explicitly liturgical: the divine will determines which tribe receives which surveyed portion. Human planning (the survey) meets divine sovereignty (the lot).

7. Ki khunat YHWH nachalato ('the priesthood of the LORD is his inheritance') — a third formulation of Levi's non-territorial inheritance: in 13:14 it was the fire offerings, in 13:33 it was the LORD Himself, and here it is the priesthood. The three statements complement each other: Levi's inheritance is God (the person), the priesthood (the role), and the offerings (the provision).
8. L'khu v'hithalkhu va-arets v'khitvu otah v'shuvu elai ('go, walk through the land, write it up, and return to me') — the commission is clear: survey, document, return. The written survey will serve as the basis for the lot-casting. U-foh ashlik lakhem goral lifnei YHWH b'Shiloh ('here I will cast lots for you before the LORD at Shiloh') — Shiloh is established as the administrative and religious center for the remaining allocations.
9. Vayyikht'vuha l'arim l'shiv'ah chalaqim al sefer ('they wrote it up by cities into seven portions in a scroll/document') — the survey produces a written scroll (sefer), an official land register. This is one of the earliest descriptions of systematic cartography and territorial documentation in the Bible. The document serves as the authoritative reference for the lot-casting.
10. The lot-casting determines which of the seven surveyed portions goes to which tribe. The process combines human diligence (the survey) with divine determination (the lots). The result is binding — no tribe can dispute an allocation determined by lot before the LORD.
11. Bein b'nei Yehudah u-vein b'nei Yosef ('between the people of Judah and the people of Joseph') — Benjamin's territory sits between the two dominant tribal blocs: Judah to the south and Joseph (Ephraim/Manasseh) to the north. This buffer position will give Benjamin outsized political significance: Jerusalem sits on the Judah-Benjamin border, and the tribe will be torn between north and south throughout Israel's history.
12. Beit Aven ('house of wickedness/nothingness') — located near Bethel. The name may be an intentional derogatory distortion of Bethel ('house of God') used by later prophets to condemn the shrine's idolatrous practices (Hosea 4:15; 5:8; 10:5).
13. Luzah hi Beit El ('Luz, that is, Bethel') — the narrator again identifies Luz with Bethel, as in Genesis 28:19 where Jacob renamed the site after his vision of the heavenly stairway.
14. Qiryat Ba'al hi Qiryat Y'arim ir b'nei Yehudah ('Kiriath-baal, that is Kiriath-jearim, a city of Judah') — this Gibeonite city (9:17) sits on the boundary between Judah and Benjamin, and will host the ark of the covenant for twenty years (1 Samuel 7:1-2).
15. Benjamin's southern boundary is described from west to east — the same line as Judah's northern boundary (15:5-9) but traversed in the opposite direction. The shared border confirms that Benjamin and Judah are immediate neighbors.
16. The boundary passes through the same landmarks as Judah's northern border (15:7-8): the Valley of Hinnom, the Jebusite city (Jerusalem), En-rogel. Jerusalem sits precisely on the tribal boundary — technically in Benjamin but claimed by Judah. This ambiguity will persist until David makes it the capital of all Israel.
17. Even Bohan ben R'uven ('Stone of Bohan son of Reuben') — the same boundary marker noted in 15:6. The description confirms that Benjamin's southern boundary exactly matches Judah's northern boundary.
18. The Arabah here refers to the lower Jordan Valley near the Dead Sea — Benjamin's southeastern corner.
19. The southern boundary is complete — running from Kiriath-jearim in the west to the Dead Sea in the east, with Jerusalem on the border between Judah and Benjamin.
20. Benjamin's territory is now fully defined — a relatively small but strategically vital strip between Judah and Ephraim, stretching from the central highlands to the Jordan River, containing Jerusalem, Jericho, Bethel, Gibeon, and other sites of major significance.
21. Y'richo ('Jericho') — the first city conquered in the promised land is now part of Benjamin's inheritance. The site of Israel's greatest initial victory becomes a tribal city.
22. Beit El ('Bethel,' meaning 'house of God') — the site of Jacob's ladder vision (Genesis 28:10-22) and a major religious center throughout Israel's history. Its inclusion in Benjamin's territory (though near the Ephraim border) will have implications for the later division of the kingdom, when Jeroboam places a golden calf at Bethel (1 Kings 12:28-29).
23. Ofrah — likely the same Ophrah where Gideon will later build an altar and receive his call (Judges 6:11, 24), though some identify Gideon's Ophrah with a site in Manasseh.
24. Geva ('Geba') — an important military site on the Benjaminite border with Ephraim. It will be the location of Jonathan's bold attack on the Philistine garrison (1 Samuel 13:3; 14:1-15) and will serve as the northern boundary of Judah in the later monarchy ('from Geba to Beersheba,' 2 Kings 23:8). The first city district totals twelve cities.
25. Giv'on ('Gibeon') — the Hivite city that deceived Israel into a covenant (chapter 9). It is now formally within Benjamin's territory. Ha-Ramah ('Ramah') — later the home of Samuel (1 Samuel 7:17; 8:4). B'erot ('Beeroth') — one of the four Gibeonite cities (9:17).
26. Ha-Mitspah ('Mizpah') — one of the most important assembly sites in Israel's history. Samuel will gather Israel here to pray before the Philistine defeat (1 Samuel 7:5-12). Saul will be chosen king here (1 Samuel 10:17-25). After Jerusalem's fall, Gedaliah will govern from Mizpah (2 Kings 25:23; Jeremiah 40:6). K'firah ('Chephirah') — another Gibeonite city (9:17).
27. Lesser-known Benjaminite settlements in the hill country.
28. Ha-Y'vusi hi Yerushalayim ('the Jebusite city, that is Jerusalem') — Jerusalem appears in Benjamin's city list, confirming that the city is technically in Benjaminite territory even though Judah claims it as well (15:8, 63). Giv'at ('Gibeah') — later notorious as the site of the horrific crime in Judges 19-21 and as Saul's hometown and royal capital (1 Samuel 10:26; 11:4; 15:34). The second district totals fourteen cities, bringing Benjamin's total to twenty-six.

Summary: The remaining six tribes receive their territorial allotments by lot at Shiloh: Simeon within Judah's territory, Zebulun, Issachar, Asher, Naphtali, and Dan. Joshua himself receives Timnath-serah in Ephraim's hill country.

What Makes This Remarkable: Simeon's allotment is embedded within Judah's territory (v. 1) — 'their inheritance was within the inheritance of Judah, because the portion of Judah was too large for them.' This absorption anticipates Simeon's eventual disappearance as a distinct tribe and partially fulfills Jacob's prophecy in Genesis 49:7 ('I will scatter them in Israel'). Joshua receives his inheritance last (vv. 49-50), after all the people have been settled — the leader takes what remains, not first pick.

Translation Friction: Dan's allotment (vv. 40-48) is described and then immediately noted as insufficient — 'the territory of Dan slipped away from them' (v. 47), leading to the migration and conquest of Laish described in Judges 18. We rendered yetse mehem as the territory 'slipping away' to preserve the Hebrew's sense of loss rather than mere military failure.

Connections: Simeon's absorption into Judah fulfills Genesis 49:7. Dan's migration to Laish is narrated in Judges 18. Joshua's personal inheritance at Timnath-serah (v. 50) is his burial place (24:30). The city lists in this chapter overlap with the Levitical cities in chapter 21 and the lists in 1 Chronicles 6.

¹The second lot fell to Simeon — to the tribe of Simeon, clan by clan. Their inheritance was within the territory of Judah. ²Their inheritance included Beersheba (or Sheba), Moladah, ³Hazar-shual, Balah, Ezem, ⁴Eltolad, Bethul, Hormah, ⁵Ziklag, Beth-marcaboth, Hazar-susah, ⁶Beth-lebaoth, and Sharuhem — thirteen cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁷Ain, Rimmon, Ether, and Ashan — four cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁸along with all the settlements surrounding these cities as far as Baalath-beer (Ramah of the Negev). This was the inheritance of the tribe of Simeon, clan by clan. ⁹Simeon's inheritance came out of Judah's allotment, because Judah's portion proved too large for them. So the Simeonites received their inheritance within Judah's territory. ¹⁰The third lot came up for Zebulun, clan by clan. The boundary of their inheritance reached to Sarid. ¹¹Their boundary went up westward to Maralah, reached Dabbesheth, and extended to the wadi facing Jokneam. ¹²From Sarid it turned eastward toward the sunrise along the boundary of Chisloth-tabor, then went out to Daberath and up to Japhia. ¹³From there it passed eastward to Gath-hepher, to Eth-kazin, and went out to Rimmon, curving toward Neah. ¹⁴The boundary turned north of it to Hannathon and ended at the Valley of Iphtah-el. ¹⁵including Kattath, Nahalal, Shimron, Idalah, and Bethlehem — twelve cities with their surrounding settlements. ¹⁶This was the inheritance of the Zebulunites, clan by clan — these cities with their surrounding settlements. ¹⁷The fourth lot came out for Issachar — for the Issacharites, clan by clan. ¹⁸Their territory included Jezreel, Chesulloth, Shunem, ¹⁹Hapharaim, Shion, Anaharath, ²⁰Rabbith, Kishion, Ebez, ²¹Remeth, En-gannim, En-haddah, Beth-pazzez. ²²The boundary reached Tabor, Shahazumah, and Beth-shemesh, and ended at the Jordan — sixteen cities with their surrounding settlements. ²³This was the inheritance of the tribe of Issachar, clan by clan — the cities with their surrounding settlements. ²⁴The fifth lot came out for the tribe of Asher, clan by clan. ²⁵Their territory included Helkath, Hali, Beten, Achshaph, ²⁶Allammelech, Amad, Mishal — reaching to Carmel on the west and to Shihor-libnath. ²⁷It turned eastward to Beth-dagon, reached Zebulun and the Valley of Iphtah-el to the north, then to Beth-emek and Neiel, going out to Cabul on the north. ²⁸including Ebron, Rehob, Hammon, and Kanah, as far as Great Sidon. ²⁹The boundary turned to Ramah and continued to the fortified city of Tyre, then turned to Hosah, ending at the sea in the region of Achzib. ³⁰also Ummah, Aphek, and Rehob — twenty-two cities with their surrounding settlements. ³¹This was the inheritance of the tribe of Asher, clan by clan — these cities with their surrounding settlements. ³²The sixth lot came out for Naphtali — for the Naphtalites, clan by clan. ³³Their boundary ran from Heleph, from the oak at Zaanannim, through Adami-nekeb and Jabneel to Lakkum, ending at the Jordan. ³⁴The boundary turned westward to Aznoth-tabor, and from there to Hukok. It bordered Zebulun on the south, Asher on the west, and the Jordan on the east. ³⁵The fortified cities were Ziddim, Zer, Hammath, Rakkath, and Chinnereth, ³⁶Adamah, Ramah, Hazor, ³⁷Kedesh, Edrei,

En-hazor, ³⁸Yiron, Migdal-el, Horem, Beth-anath, and Beth-shemesh — nineteen cities with their surrounding settlements. ³
⁹This was the inheritance of the tribe of Naphtali, clan by clan — the cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁴⁰The seventh lot came out for the tribe of Dan, clan by clan. ⁴¹The territory of their inheritance included Zorah, Eshtaol, Ir-shemesh, ⁴²Shalabbin, Aijalon, Ithlah, ⁴³Elon, Timnah, Ekron, ⁴⁴Eltekeh, Gibbethon, Baalath, ⁴⁵Jehud, Bene-berak, Gath-rimmon, ⁴⁶Mejarkon, Rakkon, and the territory facing Joppa. ⁴⁷When the Danites lost their territory, they went up and attacked Leshem, captured it, and put it to the sword. They took possession of it, settled there, and renamed Leshem as Dan, after their ancestor Dan. ⁴⁸This was the inheritance of the tribe of Dan, clan by clan — these cities with their surrounding settlements. ⁴
⁹When they had finished distributing the land as an inheritance with its boundaries, the Israelites gave an inheritance to Joshua son of Nun among them. ⁵⁰By the LORD's command they gave him the city he requested — Timnath-serah in the hill country of Ephraim. He rebuilt the city and settled there. ⁵¹These are the inheritances that Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the heads of the ancestral houses of the Israelite tribes distributed by lot at Shiloh before the LORD, at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting. So they finished dividing the land.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Vay'hi nachalatam b'tokh nachalat b'nei Yehudah ('their inheritance was within the inheritance of Judah') — Simeon does not receive an independent territory but an enclave within Judah's allotment. This arrangement fulfills Jacob's prophecy in Genesis 49:7: 'I will divide them in Jacob and scatter them in Israel.' Simeon effectively becomes absorbed into Judah, eventually losing tribal identity. The 'scattering' prophesied by the patriarch is accomplished through the allocation.
2. B'er Sheva ('Beersheba') — the patriarchal well-city (listed in Judah's cities, 15:28) now allocated to Simeon. The overlap between Judah's and Simeon's city lists confirms Simeon's territory is carved from Judah's allocation, likely because Judah's territory proved too large for one tribe.
3. These cities also appear in Judah's Negev list (15:28-29), confirming the territorial overlap.
4. Chormah ('Hormah') appears in both tribal lists (15:30), reinforcing the shared territory.
5. Beit ha-Markavot ('house of chariots') and Chatsar Susah ('enclosure of horses') — these names suggest military installations for chariot horses, possibly remnants of Canaanite or Egyptian military infrastructure in the Negev.
6. Sharuhin — an important fortified city in the western Negev, known from Egyptian records as a Hyksos stronghold that Pharaoh Ahmose besieged after expelling the Hyksos from Egypt (c. 1550 BC).
7. The second Simeonite district totals four cities. The combined total (seventeen) represents Simeon's modest allocation — among the smallest of the tribal territories.
8. Ba'alat B'er Ramat Negev ('Baalath-beer, Ramah of the Negev') — the southernmost extent of Simeon's territory, deep in the arid Negev.
9. Ki hayah cheleq b'nei Yehudah rav mehem ('because the portion of Judah was too large for them') — the narrator provides the practical explanation for Simeon's enclave arrangement: Judah had more land than its population needed. Divine lot and practical geography converge: the lot placed Simeon within Judah, and the excess territory made it workable. Providence operates through demographic realities.
10. Zebulun received territory in the lower Galilee, between the Jezreel Valley and the hills north of the Carmel range. Jacob's blessing predicted Zebulun would 'dwell at the shore of the sea' (Genesis 49:13), though the allotment described here does not reach the coast — a tension noted by many commentators.
11. The western boundary approaches the Carmel range near Jokneam (12:22). Zebulun's territory covers the fertile valleys of the lower Galilee — good agricultural land.
12. Kislot Tavor ('flanks of Tabor') — the slopes of Mount Tabor, which rises dramatically from the Jezreel Valley. Tabor will be the staging ground for Deborah and Barak's battle against Sisera (Judges 4:6, 12, 14). Daverat ('Daberath') — a Levitical city at the base of Tabor (21:28).
13. Gittah Chefer ('Gath-hepher') — the hometown of the prophet Jonah son of Amittai (2 Kings 14:25). This otherwise minor border town becomes significant as the birthplace of the reluctant prophet who was sent to Nineveh.
14. Gei Yiftach El ('Valley of Iphtah-el,' meaning 'God opens') — this valley forms part of Zebulun's northern boundary and also borders Asher (v. 27).
15. Beit Lechem ('Bethlehem') — this is the Galilean Bethlehem (distinct from the Judean Bethlehem of David and later of Jesus), located in Zebulun's territory. The existence of two Bethlehems in different tribal territories is well attested. Nahalal appears in Judges 1:30 as a city where Zebulun failed to drive out the Canaanites.
16. Zebulun's allocation is complete — a modest territory in the lower Galilee, but strategically located near major trade routes and the fertile Jezreel Valley.

17. Issachar received territory in the eastern Jezreel Valley and the hills south of the Sea of Galilee — some of the most fertile agricultural land in all of Canaan. Jacob blessed Issachar as a 'strong donkey lying down between the sheepfolds,' who 'saw that rest was good and that the land was pleasant' (Genesis 49:14-15).
18. Yizr'elah ('Jezreel') — the city that gives its name to the great valley. It will become a royal residence for the Omride dynasty and the site of Naboth's vineyard (1 Kings 21) and Jezebel's death (2 Kings 9:30-37). Shunem — where the Shunammite woman will host Elisha (2 Kings 4:8-37).
19. Issachar's city list continues through the Jezreel Valley settlements.
20. Qishyon ('Kishion') — a Levitical city (21:28). Its location near the Kishon River connects it to the valley where Deborah's army will defeat Sisera (Judges 4-5).
21. Ein Gannim ('spring of gardens') — a well-watered site, reflecting the agricultural richness of Issachar's territory.
22. Tavor ('Tabor') — Mount Tabor, the distinctive dome-shaped mountain rising 1,886 feet above the Jezreel Valley. This Beth-shemesh ('house of the sun') is a different city from the one in Judah/Dan (15:10). Tots'ot g'vulam ha-Yarden ('their boundary ended at the Jordan') — Issachar's eastern boundary touches the Jordan, giving the tribe a cross-section from the Jezreel Valley to the Jordan Rift.
23. Issachar's allocation is complete — sixteen cities in some of the most productive agricultural land in the promised territory.
24. Asher received the northwestern coastal strip along the Mediterranean, from Carmel northward to Sidon — territory rich in natural resources. Jacob blessed Asher: 'His food will be rich; he will provide royal delicacies' (Genesis 49:20). Moses blessed Asher: 'Most blessed of sons is Asher; let him be favored among his brothers, and let him dip his foot in oil' (Deuteronomy 33:24).
25. Achshaph — one of the cities whose king joined Jabin's northern coalition (11:1; 12:20).
26. U-faga b'Karmel ha-yammah ('reaching to Carmel on the sea/west') — Mount Carmel, the dramatic headland jutting into the Mediterranean, forms a natural boundary. It will become the site of Elijah's confrontation with the prophets of Baal (1 Kings 18).
27. Kavul ('Cabul') — a settlement in western Galilee. The name will recur when Solomon gives twenty Galilean cities to Hiram king of Tyre, who calls the territory 'Cabul' (1 Kings 9:13) — apparently unimpressed.
28. Ad Tsidon Rabbah ('as far as Great Sidon') — Asher's ideal territory extends to the major Phoenician city of Sidon on the Lebanese coast. In practice, the Phoenician cities remained independent. Asher's allotment is aspirational in its northern reaches.
29. Ir mivtsar Tsor ('the fortified city of Tyre') — Tyre, the great Phoenician island-fortress, appears in Asher's boundary description. Like Sidon, Tyre remained Phoenician throughout Israel's history and became a major trade partner under Solomon and Ahab. Achzib — a coastal city that Asher failed to capture (Judges 1:31).
30. Asher's total is twenty-two cities — a substantial coastal territory, though much of it remained in Phoenician control.
31. Asher's allocation is complete — the northwestern coastal strip with aspirational boundaries reaching to Sidon and Tyre.
32. Naphtali received territory in the upper Galilee, the mountainous region north of the Sea of Galilee. Moses blessed Naphtali: 'satisfied with favor and full of the blessing of the LORD; possess the sea and the south' (Deuteronomy 33:23).
33. Me-Elon b'Tsa'anannim ('from the oak/terebinth at Zaanannim') — this landmark tree is the site where Jael will kill Sisera with a tent peg (Judges 4:11). The boundary description casually mentions a location that will become the site of one of the most dramatic events in the Judges period.
34. Uviyhudah ha-Yarden mizrach ha-shamesh ('and Judah at the Jordan toward the sunrise') — this puzzling reference to 'Judah upon the Jordan' in northern Galilee has produced many interpretations. It may refer to a Judahite enclave, a textual corruption, or a variant name for a geographic feature. The most common explanation is that it refers to territory associated with the Israelite settlement broadly rather than the specific tribe of Judah.
35. Chammat ('Hammath,' meaning 'hot spring') — likely the hot springs south of Tiberias on the Sea of Galilee. Kinneret ('Chinnereth') — the city that gives its name to the Sea of Chinnereth/Galilee, located on the northwestern shore of the lake. Rakkath — possibly the site later rebuilt as Tiberias.
36. Chatsor ('Hazor') — the great city Joshua burned (11:10-11) now appears in Naphtali's city list, indicating it has been rebuilt for Israelite settlement.
37. Qedesh ('Kedesh') — Kedesh-naphtali, later designated as a city of refuge (20:7) and a Levitical city (21:32). It will be the staging ground for Barak's army in the battle against Sisera (Judges 4:6, 9-10).
38. Beit Anat ('Beth-anath,' meaning 'house of Anath') — named after the Canaanite warrior goddess Anath. Both Beth-anath and Beth-shemesh ('house of the sun') in Naphtali are cities where the Canaanites were not driven out (Judges 1:33), another instance of incomplete conquest.
39. Naphtali's allocation is complete — nineteen cities in the upper Galilee, including Hazor, Kedesh, and the Sea of Galilee shore.
40. Dan is the last tribe to receive its allotment by lot. Dan's original territory was in the central-western region between Judah, Ephraim, and Benjamin — bordering the Philistine coastal plain. The territory proved untenable, leading to Dan's migration north (Judges 18).
41. Tsor'ah v'Eshta'ol ('Zorah and Eshtaol') — the Samson cities (Judges 13:2, 25; 16:31). These towns in the Sorek Valley were also listed in Judah's territory (15:33), reflecting the overlapping claims in this contested border zone.

42. Ayyalon ('Aijalon') — the valley where the moon stood still during Joshua's battle (10:12). This strategic valley controlling access from the coastal plain to the highlands is within Dan's allotment.
43. Timnah — where Samson's Philistine wife lived (Judges 14:1). Ekron — the northernmost Philistine city. Dan's territory theoretically extends into Philistine territory, but the Danites were unable to hold this land (v. 47; Judges 1:34-35).
44. Gibbethon — a Philistine-held city where two Israelite kings will be assassinated during siege operations (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15-17), demonstrating how long the Danite/Israelite struggle against Philistine control in this region persisted.
45. B'nei V'raq ('Bene-berak') — a town in the coastal plain, later the site of a significant rabbinic community.
46. Mei ha-Yarqon ('waters of the Yarkon') — the Yarkon River, which flows to the Mediterranean near modern Tel Aviv. Yafa ('Joppa') — the ancient port city on the Mediterranean coast, later the port from which Jonah will flee (Jonah 1:3) and where Peter will receive his vision of the clean and unclean animals (Acts 10:5-11).
47. Vayyetse g'vul b'nei Dan mehem ('the territory of Dan went out from them' or 'was too small for them') — the Hebrew is terse but the meaning is clear: Dan could not hold its allotted territory against Philistine and Amorite pressure (Judges 1:34-35). Vayyilachamu im Leshem ('they fought against Leshem') — the Danite migration to the far north, narrated in detail in Judges 18. Leshem (called Laish in Judges 18:7) was a peaceful, isolated city in the upper Jordan Valley that Dan conquered and renamed. Vayyiq'r'u l'Leshem Dan k'shem Dan avihem ('they called Leshem Dan, after the name of Dan their father') — the renamed city gives rise to the expression 'from Dan to Beersheba' (the full extent of Israel, north to south).
48. Dan's allocation is nominally complete, but uniquely among the tribes, the Danites could not hold it and migrated to a completely different location. Their story is the most dramatic illustration of the gap between divine grant and human possession.
49. Vayyitt'nu v'nei Yisrael nachalah liYhoshua bin Nun b'tokham ('the Israelites gave an inheritance to Joshua among them') — Joshua receives his personal inheritance last, after every tribe has been allocated. The leader who distributed everyone else's land receives his own only when all others are settled. This selflessness contrasts with the Joseph tribes' complaint (17:14-18): Joshua asks for nothing while his kinsmen demand more.
50. Al pi YHWH ('by the LORD's command') — even Joshua's personal inheritance is divinely authorized. Et ha-ir asher sha'al ('the city he requested') — Joshua asked for a specific city, not the best territory. Timnat Serach b'har Efrayim ('Timnath-serah in the hill country of Ephraim') — a modest city in his own tribal territory. The name means 'extra portion' or 'portion of the sun.' Vayyivneh et ha-ir vayyeshev bah ('he built the city and settled there') — Joshua had to rebuild the city himself, suggesting it was in poor condition. The conqueror of Canaan retires to a ruined town he must personally reconstruct. The humility is remarkable.
51. B'goral b'Shiloh lifnei YHWH petach Ohel Mo'ed ('by lot at Shiloh before the LORD at the entrance of the Tent of Meeting') — the closing verse brings together every element of the allocation process: the authorized administrators (Eleazar, Joshua, tribal heads), the method (lot), the location (Shiloh), the divine presence (before the LORD), and the sacred site (the Tent of Meeting). Vay'khallu mechaleq et ha-arets ('they finished dividing the land') — the land distribution is complete. The promise to Abraham of land for his descendants has been fulfilled in its initial form — allocated by tribe, waiting for full possession.

Summary: Six cities of refuge are designated — three west of the Jordan and three east — where those who kill unintentionally can flee from the blood avenger and receive a fair trial before the congregation.

What Makes This Remarkable: The cities of refuge institutionalize the distinction between murder and manslaughter. The manslayer must 'stand at the entrance of the city gate and state his case' (v. 4) — he must explain himself publicly, not simply claim asylum. The congregation judges (v. 6), not the blood avenger and not the accused. The killer remains in the city until the death of the high priest (v. 6) — a curious provision that ties individual atonement to the priestly office, as if the high priest's death provides some form of release.

Translation Friction: The phrase bivli da'at (v. 3, 'without knowledge') is the legal standard for unintentional killing — identical to Deuteronomy 19:4. The connection between the manslayer's release and the high priest's death (v. 6) is theologically suggestive but unexplained by the text — we noted the interpretive traditions without endorsing a specific reading.

Connections: This chapter implements Numbers 35:9-34 and Deuteronomy 19:1-13. The go'el haddam ('blood avenger') institution connects to the go'el theology in Ruth and to the broader kinship-redemption framework. The high priest's death as a release mechanism is explored in Hebrews 9:11-15. The six cities are distributed across all tribal territories, ensuring accessibility.

1The LORD spoke to Joshua: 2"Tell the Israelites: Designate the cities of refuge that I instructed you about through Moses, 3so that anyone who kills a person accidentally and without intent may flee there. These cities will serve as your refuge from the blood avenger. 4He must flee to one of these cities, stand at the entrance of the city gate, and present his case to the elders of that city. They must take him into the city, give him a place, and let him live among them. 5If the blood avenger pursues him, the elders must not surrender the killer to him, because he struck his neighbor without intent and bore him no prior hatred. 6He must remain in that city until he has stood trial before the assembly and until the death of the high priest serving at that time. Then the killer may return to his own city and his own home — to the city from which he fled. 7They set apart Kedesh in Galilee in the hill country of Naphtali, Shechem in the hill country of Ephraim, and Kiriath-arba (that is, Hebron) in the hill country of Judah. 8East of the Jordan, near Jericho, they designated Bezer in the wilderness on the plateau from the tribe of Reuben, Ramoth in Gilead from the tribe of Gad, and Golan in Bashan from the tribe of Manasseh. 9These were the designated cities for all the Israelites and for the resident alien living among them, so that anyone who killed a person accidentally could flee there and not die by the hand of the blood avenger before standing trial before the assembly.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The cities of refuge fulfill the command given through Moses in Numbers 35:9-34 and Deuteronomy 19:1-13. Now that the land is allocated, the judicial infrastructure must be established.
2. Arei ha-miqlat ('cities of refuge/asylum') — from the root qalat ('to take in, to receive'). These cities provide legal sanctuary for those accused of unintentional killing. The institution reflects a sophisticated distinction between murder (intentional killing) and manslaughter (accidental killing) that is foundational to biblical jurisprudence. Asher dibbarti aleikhem b'yad Mosheh ('which I spoke to you by the hand of Moses') — continuity with Mosaic legislation is explicitly stated.
3. Rotseach makkeh nefesh bishgagah bivli da'at ('a killer who strikes a person by mistake without knowledge') — two terms reinforce the unintentional nature: bishgagah ('in error, by mistake') and bivli da'at ('without knowledge/intent'). Go'el ha-dam ('the blood avenger/redeemer of blood') — the nearest male kinsman obligated to avenge the victim's death. The go'el is the same word used for 'kinsman-redeemer' in Ruth 3-4 and for God as Israel's 'Redeemer' (Isaiah 41:14; 43:14). The cities of refuge protect the accidental killer from the go'el's legitimate but potentially unjust vengeance.
4. V'amad petach sha'ar ha-ir v'dibber b'oznei ziqnei ha-ir hahi et d'varav ('he shall stand at the entrance of the city gate and speak his case in the ears of the elders of that city') — the city gate is the seat of justice in ancient Israel. The accused presents his case publicly to the elders, who serve as the initial court. V'asfu oto ha-irah ('they shall gather him into the city') — the elders are obligated to receive him; this is not optional hospitality but a legal duty. The accused receives shelter, housing, and community membership pending trial.
5. V'lo sone hu lo mitmol shilshom ('he was not hating him from yesterday or the day before') — the legal test for manslaughter vs. murder is prior relationship. If the accused had no history of hostility toward the victim, the killing is presumed accidental. This temporal criterion — 'yesterday and the day before' — is a standard Hebrew legal idiom for established pattern of behavior (cf. Exodus 21:29, 36; Deuteronomy 19:4, 6).
6. Ad mot ha-kohen ha-gadol asher yihyeh bayyamim hahem ('until the death of the high priest who serves in those days') — the high priest's death functions as a kind of expiation or amnesty. The accidental killer's exile ends when the high priest dies, regardless of how long that takes. The theological logic connects the high priest's death to atonement — as the high priest represents the nation before God, his death releases accumulated guilt. Some later interpreters saw this as a type of the ultimate priestly sacrifice. The restriction is substantial: the killer must live in the refuge city for years or decades, separated from home and inheritance.
7. Vayyaqdishu ('they set apart/consecrated') — the verb qadash ('to make holy, to set apart') indicates these cities receive a sacred legal status. The three western cities are evenly distributed north-to-south through the central highlands: Kedesh (north), Shechem (center), Hebron (south). This ensures that no Israelite is more than a day's journey from refuge. All three cities have deep patriarchal associations: Shechem (Genesis 12:6; 33:18), Hebron (Genesis 13:18; 23:2), and Kedesh (a name meaning 'holy').
8. Three eastern cities mirror the three western ones, providing the same north-to-south coverage in the Transjordan: Golan (north), Ramoth-gilead (center), Bezer (south). The six cities together form a comprehensive network ensuring that every Israelite — whether east or west of the Jordan — has accessible refuge. Ramot ba-Gil'ad ('Ramoth in Gilead') will become a strategically contested city, the site where Ahab is killed (1 Kings 22:3-37) and where Jehu is anointed (2 Kings 9:1-6).
9. V'la-ger ha-gar b'tokham ('and for the resident alien dwelling among them') — the cities of refuge are not exclusively for Israelites. The ger (resident alien, sojourner) has equal access to legal protection. This provision extends the rule of law to non-Israelites living in the land — a remarkable feature of biblical jurisprudence. The institution simultaneously limits vengeance (the go'el cannot act before trial), protects the innocent (accidental killers receive sanctuary), ensures justice (a trial must occur), and includes foreigners (the ger has equal standing before the law).

Summary: The Levites receive forty-eight cities distributed among all the tribes, including the six cities of refuge. The chapter concludes with a sweeping summary: 'Not one word of all the good promises the LORD had made to the house of Israel failed — everything came to pass.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The Levitical city system disperses the priestly tribe throughout all Israel — they have no contiguous territory but are present everywhere, ensuring that every part of the land has access to teaching and worship leadership. The summary statement (vv. 43-45) is the theological climax of the allotment section: God's promise is fulfilled, the land is given, rest is achieved. 'Not one word failed' (lo nafal davar, v. 45) — the verb nafal ('fall') means not one promise dropped to the ground unfulfilled.

Translation Friction: The Levitical city lists involve numerous textual variants between Joshua 21 and its parallel in 1 Chronicles 6:54-81. We followed the Joshua text and noted significant variants. The phrase lo nafal davar (v. 45, 'not one word fell') uses a physical metaphor — words stand or fall like soldiers. We rendered it 'not one word... failed' to capture the sense while noting the Hebrew image.

Connections: The Levitical cities implement Numbers 35:1-8. The fulfillment declaration (v. 45) is echoed in 1 Kings 8:56 by Solomon at the Temple dedication. The city lists parallel 1 Chronicles 6:54-81. The dispersal of Levi fulfills Jacob's prophecy (Genesis 49:7) but transforms the curse into a priestly vocation.

¹The heads of the Levite ancestral houses approached Eleazar the priest, Joshua son of Nun, and the heads of the ancestral houses of the Israelite tribes. ²They addressed them at Shiloh in the land of Canaan: "The LORD commanded through Moses that we be given cities to live in, along with their pasturelands for our livestock." ³So the Israelites gave the Levites these cities with their pasturelands from their own inheritance, in accordance with the LORD's command. ⁴The lot fell to the Kohathite clans. The descendants of Aaron the priest — who were Levites — received by lot thirteen cities from the tribes of Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin. ⁵The remaining Kohathites received by lot ten cities from the clans of the tribe of Ephraim, the tribe of Dan, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. ⁶The Gershonites received by lot thirteen cities from the clans of the tribe of Issachar, the tribe of Asher, the tribe of Naphtali, and the half-tribe of Manasseh in Bashan. ⁷The Merarites, by their clans, received twelve cities from the tribe of Reuben, the tribe of Gad, and the tribe of Zebulun. ⁸The Israelites gave these cities with their pasturelands to the Levites by lot, just as the LORD had commanded through Moses. ⁹From the tribe of Judah and the tribe of Simeon they gave the following cities, listed here by name. ¹⁰These went to the descendants of Aaron from the Kohathite clans of the Levites, because the first lot fell to them. ¹¹They gave them Kiriath-arba — that is, Hebron — in the hill country of Judah, with its surrounding pasturelands. (Arba was the ancestor of Anak.) ¹²However, the open fields of the city and its surrounding villages had been given to Caleb son of Jephunneh as his possession. ¹³To the descendants of Aaron the priest they gave Hebron — the city of refuge for the killer — with its pasturelands, and Libnah with its pasturelands, ¹⁴Jattir with its pasturelands, Eshtemoa with its pasturelands, ¹⁵Holon with its pasturelands, Debir with its pasturelands, ¹⁶Ain with its pasturelands, Juttah with its pasturelands, and Beth-shemesh with its pasturelands — nine cities from these two tribes. ¹⁷From the tribe of Benjamin: Gibeon with its pasturelands, Geba with its pasturelands, ¹⁸Anathoth with its pasturelands, and Almon with its pasturelands — four cities. ¹⁹The total number of cities for the descendants of Aaron the priests was thirteen cities with their pasturelands. ²⁰The remaining Kohathite clans of the Levites received their allotted cities from the tribe of Ephraim. ²¹They gave them Shechem — the city of refuge for the killer — with its pasturelands in the hill country of Ephraim, and Gezer with its pasturelands, ²²Kibzaim with its pasturelands, and Beth-horon with its pasturelands — four cities. ²³From the tribe of Dan: Eltekeh with its pasturelands, Gibbethon with its pasturelands, ²⁴Aijalon with its pasturelands, and Gath-rimmon with its pasturelands — four cities. ²⁵From the half-tribe of Manasseh: Taanach with its pasturelands, and Gath-rimmon with its pasturelands — two cities. ²⁶The total for the remaining Kohathite clans was ten cities with their pasturelands. ²⁷To the Gershonites from the Levitical clans: from the half-tribe of Manasseh they gave Golan in Bashan —

the city of refuge for the killer — with its pasturelands, and Be-eshterah with its pasturelands — two cities. ²⁸From the tribe of Issachar: Kishion with its pasturelands, Daberath with its pasturelands, ²⁹Jarmuth with its pasturelands, and En-gannim with its pasturelands — four cities. ³⁰From the tribe of Asher: Mishal with its pasturelands, Abdon with its pasturelands, ³¹H elkath with its pasturelands, and Rehob with its pasturelands — four cities. ³²From the tribe of Naphtali: Kedesh in Galilee — the city of refuge for the killer — with its pasturelands, Hammoth-dor with its pasturelands, and Kartan with its pasturelands — three cities. ³³The total number of cities for the Gershonite clans was thirteen cities with their pasturelands. ³⁴To the Merarite clans — the remaining Levites — from the tribe of Zebulun: Jokneam with its pasturelands, Kartah with its pasturelands, ³⁵Dimnah with its pasturelands, and Nahalal with its pasturelands — four cities. ³⁶From the tribe of Reuben: Bezer with its pasturelands, Jahaz with its pasturelands, ³⁷Kedemoth with its pasturelands, and Mephaath with its pasturelands — four cities. ³⁸From the tribe of Gad: Ramoth in Gilead — the city of refuge for the killer — with its pasturelands, Mahanaim with its pasturelands, ³⁹Heshbon with its pasturelands, and Jazer with its pasturelands — four cities in all. ⁴⁰The total number of cities for the Merarite clans — the remaining Levitical families — was twelve cities by their lot. ⁴¹The total number of Levitical cities within the territory held by the Israelites was forty-eight cities with their pasturelands. ⁴²Each of these cities included its surrounding pasturelands; this was the arrangement for every one of these cities. ⁴³The LORD gave Israel the entire land he had sworn to give their ancestors. They took possession of it and settled in it. ⁴⁴The LORD gave them rest on every side, exactly as he had sworn to their ancestors. Not one of their enemies could stand against them; the LORD handed all their enemies over to them. ⁴⁵Not a single word failed from all the good promises the LORD had spoken to the house of Israel. Everything was fulfilled.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Levites approach the same leadership trio (Eleazar, Joshua, tribal heads) who oversaw all the land allocations. Their claim is presented publicly and formally, not as a private petition. This fulfills Numbers 35:1-8, where the LORD instructed that the Levites receive cities and surrounding pasturelands from each tribe's inheritance.
2. Migrasheiheh ('their pasturelands/common lands') — the Levites do not receive agricultural territory but cities with surrounding open land for grazing. The migrash is a belt of open land extending outward from the city wall (Numbers 35:4-5 specifies 1,000 cubits). The Levites' request appeals entirely to Mosaic authority — Yahweh tsivvah v'yad Mosheh ('the LORD commanded by the hand of Moses'). Their claim rests on divine instruction, not negotiation.
3. Min-nachalatam ('from their inheritance') — each tribe contributes from its own allotted territory. The Levites receive a distributed inheritance rather than a contiguous one. This arrangement embeds the priestly and teaching tribe throughout the entire nation, ensuring that instruction in the Torah is accessible to all Israel, not concentrated in a single region.
4. The Kohathites are divided into two groups: the priestly line (descendants of Aaron) and the non-priestly Kohathites. Aaron's descendants receive cities closest to Jerusalem (from Judah, Simeon, and Benjamin), positioning the priestly families near the future temple site — though this significance would only become apparent centuries later under David and Solomon.
5. The non-priestly Kohathites receive cities from the central tribes, extending Levitical presence through the Joseph territory and into the coastal region near Philistine territory (Dan).
6. The Gershonite cities are distributed through the northern and northeastern tribes, ensuring Levitical presence in the Galilee region and the Transjordan Bashan.
7. The Merarites receive the southern Transjordan and one northern tribe (Zebulun). The three Levite clans — Kohath, Gershon, Merari — together receive 48 cities (13 + 10 + 13 + 12), exactly the number prescribed in Numbers 35:7.
8. Ka'asher tsivvah Yahweh b'yad Mosheh ba-goral ('just as the LORD had commanded by the hand of Moses, by lot') — the lot (goral) ensures the distribution is perceived as divinely directed rather than humanly negotiated. The summary statement frames the entire Levitical allocation as obedience to prior divine command.
9. The detailed city-by-city listing begins with the priestly Aaronite cities from Judah and Simeon. This specificity ensures the allocation is a matter of permanent public record, not a vague promise.
10. Ki lahem hayah ha-goral ri'shonah ('because the first lot was theirs') — the Aaronite priests receive priority in the allocation, consistent with their elevated status within the Levitical order.
11. Hebron serves dual duty: it is both a city of refuge (20:7) and a priestly city. The parenthetical identifying Arba as the ancestor of the Anakim connects this allocation back to Caleb's conquest of the giant inhabitants (14:12-15; 15:13-14).

12. A careful distinction: the priestly Levites receive the city of Hebron and its immediate pasturelands, while Caleb retains the agricultural fields (s'deh) and dependent villages (chatserim). This prevents a conflict between Caleb's personal inheritance (14:13-14) and the Levitical allocation. Both claims are honored simultaneously.
13. The text explicitly labels Hebron as ir miqlat ha-rotseach ('the city of refuge for the killer'), linking it to the institution from chapter 20. Libnah was a Canaanite royal city conquered in the southern campaign (10:29-30).
14. Jattir and Eshtemoa are towns in the southern Judean highlands, both listed among Judah's cities in 15:48, 50. David would later send plunder to Eshtemoa (1 Samuel 30:28).
15. Debir, formerly Kiriath-sepher, was captured by Othniel (15:15-17). Its inclusion as a Levitical city further transforms Canaanite urban centers into Israelite religious infrastructure.
16. Beth-shemesh ('House of the Sun') is the city where the ark of the covenant will later arrive when returned by the Philistines (1 Samuel 6:12-19). Nine cities from Judah and Simeon form the core of the Aaronite priestly network.
17. Gibeon — the city of the deception treaty (chapter 9) — now becomes a Levitical city, an ironic transformation. Geba will later serve as an Israelite military outpost against the Philistines (1 Samuel 13:3).
18. Anathoth will later be the hometown of the prophet Jeremiah (Jeremiah 1:1; 11:21-23). Its identification as a Levitical/priestly city illuminates Jeremiah's priestly lineage.
19. The summary count confirms thirteen priestly cities (nine from Judah/Simeon and four from Benjamin), matching the lot drawn in verse 4.
20. The section now details the non-priestly Kohathite cities, beginning with those from Ephraim's territory.
21. Shechem functions as both refuge city and Levitical city, like Hebron. Its deep patriarchal history (Abraham's first altar in Canaan, Genesis 12:6; Jacob's purchase of land, Genesis 33:19) will culminate in the covenant renewal of chapter 24. Gezer was a Canaanite city whose inhabitants Ephraim failed to dispossess (16:10); its designation as a Levitical city suggests intended Israelite occupation despite the incomplete conquest.
22. Beth-horon (Upper and Lower) guards a critical pass from the coastal plain into the central highlands. It was the site of the Amorite rout during the southern campaign (10:10-11). Its assignment as a Levitical city positions Levites along a vital strategic corridor.
23. Gibbethon will later feature as a Philistine-held city that Israel repeatedly besieges (1 Kings 15:27; 16:15-17), highlighting the difficulty Dan faced in occupying its allotted territory.
24. Aijalon is the valley where the sun stood still during the southern campaign (10:12). Its allocation as a Levitical city connects the land distribution to the conquest narrative.
25. Taanach lies near Megiddo in the Jezreel Valley, an area of strategic importance throughout Israelite history. The second Gath-rimmon here may reflect a textual variant; some scholars suggest this should read 'Ibleam' based on the parallel in 1 Chronicles 6:70.
26. Ten cities for the non-priestly Kohathites, matching the count in verse 5.
27. Golan in Bashan serves as both refuge and Levitical city (cf. 20:8). Be-eshterah (also called Ashtaroth) was formerly the capital of King Og of Bashan (12:4; 13:12, 31). Its transformation from a pagan royal seat (the name likely derives from the goddess Ashtoreth) into a Levitical city is theologically significant.
28. Daberath sits at the base of Mount Tabor in the Jezreel Valley, an area that will feature prominently in the Deborah-Barak narrative (Judges 4:6, 12).
29. En-gannim ('spring of gardens') — this is a different city from the Jarmuth listed among the five Amorite kings defeated in chapter 10 (which was in Judah's territory).
30. Asher's territory lies along the northern Mediterranean coast. These Levitical cities position priestly-teaching families in a region with heavy Canaanite and Phoenician cultural influence.
31. Rehob appears as one of the cities Asher failed to fully dispossess (Judges 1:31), suggesting that Levitical occupation of these northern cities may have been tenuous.
32. Kedesh in Galilee is the third western refuge city (cf. 20:7). Its name ('holy place') suggests a pre-Israelite sacred site now incorporated into the Levitical system. Kedesh will later be the home of Barak (Judges 4:6) and the site of Israelite defeat by Tiglath-pileser III of Assyria (2 Kings 15:29).
33. Thirteen Gershonite cities, matching the count in verse 6.
34. The Merarite section completes the three-part Levitical distribution. Jokneam guards the southern approach to the Jezreel Valley, a strategically vital location.
35. Nahalal is listed among the Canaanite cities that Zebulun failed to drive out, instead subjecting them to forced labor (Judges 1:30).
36. Bezer is the Transjordan city of refuge (20:8). Jahaz was the site of Israel's decisive battle against Sihon king of the Amorites (Numbers 21:23; Deuteronomy 2:32).

37. Kedemoth was the staging area from which Moses sent emissaries to Sihon (Deuteronomy 2:26).
38. Mahanaim ('two camps') is where Jacob encountered angels (Genesis 32:2) and where Ish-bosheth will establish his rival kingdom (2 Samuel 2:8) and David will flee during Absalom's rebellion (2 Samuel 17:24). Its assignment as a Levitical city weaves patriarchal history into the national infrastructure.
39. Heshbon was the capital of King Sihon (Numbers 21:25-26; Joshua 12:2). Like Be-eshterah/Ashtaroth, a former enemy capital is now repurposed as a Levitical city.
40. Twelve Merarite cities, matching the count in verse 7. The grand total across all three Levitical clans: 13 (Aaronite) + 10 (other Kohathites) + 13 (Gershonites) + 12 (Merarites) = 48 cities.
41. Forty-eight Levitical cities exactly matches the number commanded in Numbers 35:7. This correspondence demonstrates Israel's faithfulness in executing the Mosaic legislation regarding the Levites.
42. A formulaic closing note confirming that the standard arrangement — city plus surrounding pasturelands — applied uniformly to all forty-eight Levitical cities.
43. This climactic summary (vv. 43-45) is one of the most theologically significant passages in Joshua. Vayyirashuhah vayyeshvu vah ('they took possession of it and settled in it') — the twin verbs yarash ('possess, dispossess') and yashav ('settle, dwell') mark the fulfillment of the promise trajectory that began with Abraham in Genesis 12:7. The statement is programmatic rather than absolute — it declares the essential fulfillment of the land promise even though some areas remain unconquered (cf. 13:1-7; 15:63; 16:10; 17:12-13).
44. Vayyanach Yahweh lahem missaviv ('the LORD gave them rest round about') — the verb nuach ('to rest') echoes the purpose statement of Deuteronomy 12:10 and 25:19. Rest (menucha) is the goal of the entire exodus-conquest narrative: God's people dwelling securely in God's land under God's rule. Lo amad ish bifneihem ('not a man stood before them') — this bold claim, read alongside the incomplete-conquest notices, affirms divine faithfulness to the covenant promises. Military opposition has been broken even where demographic displacement is incomplete.
45. Lo nafil davar mikol ha-davar ha-tov ('not one thing fell from all the good word') — nafil ('fell') is used for the failure or dropping of a word. The assertion is absolute: every good thing God promised has come to pass. This verse is the thematic pivot of the entire book, the bridge between the conquest/allocation narrative (chs. 1-21) and the farewell/warning section (chs. 22-24). Joshua will repeat this claim in his farewell speech (23:14) but add the sobering corollary: just as every good promise was fulfilled, so every threat of judgment will be fulfilled if Israel disobeys.

Summary: Joshua blesses the Transjordan tribes and sends them home. They build a large altar by the Jordan, provoking the western tribes to threaten war. The Transjordan tribes explain the altar is a 'witness' — not for sacrifice — and conflict is averted.

What Makes This Remarkable: The near-civil-war over an altar reveals how seriously Israel takes centralized worship. The western tribes assume the altar violates Deuteronomy 12 and invoke the Achan precedent (v. 20) — one tribe's sin can bring judgment on all. The Transjordan explanation is theological: the altar is called Ed ('witness,' v. 34), a memorial ensuring future generations cannot say 'you have no share in the LORD.' The danger is not idolatry but exclusion — the river might become a boundary that severs covenant membership.

Translation Friction: The phrase ma'al ma'al (v. 16, 'acted treacherously with treachery') echoes the Achan language of 7:1. We rendered it consistently. The altar's name Ed (v. 34) is textually uncertain in some manuscripts — some read 'they called the altar Ed' while others omit the name. We followed the Masoretic reading and noted the variant.

Connections: The Achan warning (v. 20) references chapter 7. The centralized-worship concern reflects Deuteronomy 12. The Peor reference (v. 17) points to Numbers 25. This episode anticipates the tribal fractures that dominate Judges and eventually split the kingdom (1 Kings 12). The 'witness' concept connects to the stone witnesses in Genesis 31:47-48 and Joshua 24:27.

¹Then Joshua summoned the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh. ²He said to them, "You have kept everything that Moses the servant of the LORD commanded you, and you have obeyed me in everything I commanded you. ³You have not abandoned your brothers through this long period — to this very day — and you have carried out the charge of the commandment of the LORD your God. ⁴Now the LORD your God has given rest to your brothers, just as he promised them. So turn and go to your tents, to the land of your possession that Moses the servant of the LORD gave you across the Jordan. ⁵Only take great care to carry out the commandment and the law that Moses the servant of the LORD charged you: to love the LORD your God, to walk in all his ways, to keep his commandments, to hold fast to him, and to serve him with all your heart and all your life. ⁶Joshua blessed them and sent them away, and they departed for their tents. ⁷To the one half-tribe of Manasseh Moses had given territory in Bashan, while Joshua had given the other half territory among their brothers west of the Jordan. When Joshua sent them away to their tents, he also blessed them. ⁸He told them, "Return to your tents with great wealth — with very large herds, with silver, gold, bronze, iron, and a great quantity of clothing. Divide the plunder from your enemies with your brothers." ⁹The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh left the Israelites at Shiloh in the land of Canaan to travel to the land of Gilead — the land of their possession that they had received in accordance with the LORD's command through Moses. ¹⁰When they reached the region of the Jordan in the land of Canaan, the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh built an altar there by the Jordan — an impressively large altar. ¹¹The Israelites received word: "The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh have built an altar facing the land of Canaan, in the Jordan region, on the Israelite side." ¹²When the Israelites heard this, the entire assembly of the Israelites gathered at Shiloh to march against them in war. ¹³The Israelites sent Phinehas son of Eleazar the priest to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh in the land of Gilead, ¹⁴along with ten leaders — one leader from each ancestral house for every tribe of Israel. Each was the head of his ancestral house among the divisions of Israel. ¹⁵They came to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh in the land of Gilead and said to them: ¹⁶"This is what the entire assembly of the LORD says: What is this treachery you have committed against the God of Israel? You have turned away from following the LORD today by building yourselves an altar — rebelling against the LORD this very day! ¹⁷Is the sin at Peor not enough for us? We have not yet purified ourselves from it to this day, even though a plague struck the assembly of the LORD! ¹⁸And now you would turn away from following the LORD today? If you rebel against the LORD today, tomorrow his anger will fall on the entire assembly of Israel! ¹⁹If the land of your possession is defiled, then cross over to the land of the LORD's possession, where the LORD's tabernacle stands, and take territory among us. But do not rebel against the LORD, and do not rebel against us, by building an altar for yourselves besides the altar of the LORD our God. ²⁰Did not Achan son of Zerah commit treachery with what was devoted to destruction, and wrath fall on the entire assembly of Israel? He was not the only one who perished for his sin." ²¹The Reubenites, the Gadites, and the half-tribe of Manasseh answered the heads of the Israelite divisions: ²²"The Mighty One, God, the LORD! The Mighty One, God, the LORD! He knows — and let Israel know — if this was in rebellion or in treachery against the LORD, then do not spare us today! ²³If we built an altar to turn away from following the LORD, or to offer burnt offerings, grain offerings, or fellowship offerings on it — let the LORD himself call us to account! ²⁴Rather, we did this out of a specific concern — that in the future your children might say to our children, 'What do you have to do with the LORD, the God of Israel?' ²⁵For the LORD has set the Jordan as a boundary between us and you, Reubenites and Gadites. You have no share in the LORD!' And your children would cause our children to stop revering the LORD. ²⁶So we said, 'Let us take action and build an altar — not for burnt offerings and not for sacrifice, ²⁷but as a witness between us and you and our generations after us — that we perform the service of the LORD before him with our burnt offerings, our sacrifices, and our fellowship offerings. Then your children will not say to our children in the future, 'You have no share in the LORD.'" ²⁸We reasoned that if they say this to us or to our descendants in the future, we can reply, 'Look at this replica of the LORD's altar that our ancestors built — not for burnt offerings and not for sacrifice, but as a witness between us and you.' ²⁹Far be it from us to rebel against the LORD or to turn away from following the LORD today by building an altar for burnt offerings, grain offerings, or sacrifice — apart from the altar of the LORD our God that stands before his tabernacle!" ³⁰When Phinehas the priest and the leaders of the assembly — the heads of the Israelite divisions who were with him — heard what the Reubenites, Gadites, and Manassites said, they were satisfied. ³¹Phinehas son of Eleazar the priest said to the Reubenites, the Gadites, and the Manassites, "Today we know that the LORD is among us, because you have not committed this treachery against the LORD. You have now rescued the Israelites from the hand of the LORD!" ³²Phinehas son of Eleazar the priest and the leaders returned from the Reubenites and Gadites in the land of Gilead to the Israelites in the land of Canaan and brought back their report. ³³The report satisfied the Israelites. They praised God and abandoned any plan to march against the Reubenites and Gadites in war to devastate the land where they lived. ³⁴The Reubenites and the Gadites named the altar "Witness" — "For it is a witness between us that the LORD is God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrative returns to the Transjordan tribes who were first commissioned in chapter 1. Having fulfilled their military obligation to fight alongside their brothers west of the Jordan, they are now formally dismissed.
2. Joshua's commendation highlights dual obedience: to the original command of Moses (Numbers 32:20-22) and to Joshua's own instructions (1:12-18). The Transjordan tribes' faithfulness is explicitly confirmed — they did not abandon the western campaign.
3. Zeh yamim rabbim ('this many days') — the conquest has taken years. The Transjordan warriors have been away from their families and their already-allocated territory throughout the entire campaign. Mishmeret mitsvat Yahweh ('the charge/duty of the commandment of the LORD') — their obedience is framed not merely as military duty to Joshua but as covenant faithfulness to God.
4. Heniach Yahweh Eloheikhem la'acheikhem ('the LORD your God has given rest to your brothers') — the condition for the Transjordan tribes' return has been met. The rest (menucha) promised in Deuteronomy 12:10 and affirmed in 21:44 triggers the release of their military obligation. P'nu ul'khu lakhem l'ohaleikhem ('turn and go to your tents') — the dismissal formula sends them home.
5. Joshua's farewell charge to the eastern tribes echoes the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:5) and the covenant stipulations of Deuteronomy. Five imperatives define covenant faithfulness: love (ahavah), walk (halak), keep (shamar), hold fast (davaq), serve (avad). Raq ('only/but') signals that the commission is conditional — their departure is permitted, but covenant loyalty must continue. Ul'dovqah bo ('to cling to him') — the verb davaq is used of the marriage bond in Genesis 2:24 and describes Israel's most intimate loyalty to God.
6. Vay'varekh otam ('he blessed them') — Joshua performs a priestly function, invoking God's favor upon the departing tribes. The blessing signals formal closure of their joint military service.
7. The narrator pauses to clarify the divided Manasseh situation — one half received land from Moses in the Transjordan, the other from Joshua in Canaan proper. This division will become a source of tension in the following narrative.
8. The enumeration of riches — livestock, precious metals, iron, clothing — describes the war spoils accumulated through the conquest campaigns. The instruction to divide the plunder with those who remained in the Transjordan follows the precedent Moses established for shared spoils (Numbers 31:27) and David will later codify (1 Samuel 30:24-25).
9. The departure from Shiloh marks a geographic separation: the central sanctuary remains in Canaan while the eastern tribes cross back over the Jordan. This physical distance creates the theological anxiety that drives the rest of the chapter.
10. Mizbeach gadol l'mar'eh ('an altar great in appearance') — the altar's conspicuous size is emphasized, making it impossible to overlook. The critical detail is its location: on the western bank of the Jordan, still technically in Canaan. This ambiguity — who built it and why — triggers the crisis. From the western tribes' perspective, an unauthorized altar threatens the centralization of worship commanded in Deuteronomy 12.
11. The report reaches the western tribes as alarming news. El mul erets K'na'an ('facing the land of Canaan') — the phrasing suggests the altar is oriented toward Canaan, visible from the western side. El ever b'nei Yisra'el ('on the side of the Israelites') — the altar stands at the border, a visible marker between east and west.
12. The western tribes' immediate response is military mobilization — the same response mandated in Deuteronomy 13:12-18 for a city that has turned to idolatry. The willingness to wage civil war against fellow Israelites demonstrates the seriousness with which they view potential apostasy. The Achan narrative (chapter 7) proved that one group's sin brings judgment on the entire community.
13. Phinehas is the ideal choice for this embassy. He had demonstrated zealous loyalty to the LORD by acting against apostasy at Baal-peor (Numbers 25:7-13), for which he received the covenant of perpetual priesthood. His presence signals both the gravity of the accusation and the theological competence of the delegation.
14. Ten tribal leaders accompany Phinehas — one from each of the western tribes (excluding Reuben, Gad, and the eastern half of Manasseh). The delegation's size gives it national authority; this is not an informal inquiry but an official confrontation.
15. The delegation crosses the Jordan into Gilead — notably choosing diplomacy before military action, despite the army already being assembled at Shiloh.
16. Mah ha-ma'al hazzeh ('what is this treachery?') — ma'al is a strong term for covenant unfaithfulness, the same word used for Achan's violation (7:1). The accusation is framed as rebellion (mered) against God, not merely a dispute between tribes. The delegation speaks as kol adat Yahweh ('the entire assembly of the LORD'), investing their words with collective covenant authority.
17. The delegation invokes the Baal-peor catastrophe (Numbers 25:1-9) as a corporate memory of apostasy's consequences. The claim that Israel has 'not yet purified from it to this day' treats the Peor incident as ongoing corporate guilt — the wound is still fresh, and another act of unfaithfulness could reopen it. The plague at Peor killed 24,000 Israelites.

18. The theological principle of corporate solidarity: one group's sin brings divine wrath on the whole community. This is the Achan principle (chapter 7) and the lesson of Peor (Numbers 25). The delegation's concern is not merely tribal purity but national survival.
19. A remarkable offer: if the eastern tribes feel their Transjordan territory is ritually impure (t'me'ah) — lacking the divine presence that sanctifies Canaan — they are invited to relocate within the western territories. Erets achuzzat Yahweh ('the land of the LORD's possession') — the land where the tabernacle dwells is considered the LORD's own property. This implies that land east of the Jordan, though divinely allocated, has a secondary status. Mibal'adei mizbach Yahweh ('besides/apart from the altar of the LORD') — the concern is cultic centralization: only one legitimate altar exists.
20. The Achan reference (chapter 7) is the delegation's most powerful argument. Ma'al ma'al ba-cherem ('he committed treachery regarding the devoted things') — the same term ma'al used in verse 16. Achan's individual sin caused Israel's defeat at Ai and resulted not only in his death but in the deaths of the thirty-six soldiers who fell in battle (7:5). V'hu ish echad lo gava ba'avono l'vaddo ('he was one man — he did not perish in his sin alone') — corporate accountability means individual transgression has collective consequences.
21. The eastern tribes now deliver their defense — a carefully constructed theological argument that will vindicate their intentions.
22. El Elohim Yahweh, El Elohim Yahweh — the triple divine name, repeated twice (six total names), forms the most solemn oath formula in the Hebrew Bible. This is an appeal to the divine court: God is invoked as witness, judge, and guarantor of truth. The eastern tribes stake their lives on their sincerity — 'do not spare us today' (al toshi'enu) — if their motives are impure. The intensification through repetition conveys the emotional weight of being unjustly accused.
23. The eastern tribes categorically deny all three types of sacrificial use: olah (burnt offerings), minchah (grain offerings), and zivchei sh'lamim (fellowship/peace offerings). By denying sacrificial intent, they eliminate the charge of cultic rivalry with the Shiloh tabernacle. Yahweh hu y'vaqqesh ('let the LORD himself seek it out') — they submit to divine judgment rather than human.
24. The true motive emerges: fear of future exclusion. Middea'gah middavar ('out of anxiety about a matter') — the eastern tribes acted from theological worry, not rebellion. Their fear is that the Jordan will become not just a geographic boundary but a covenant boundary, and their descendants will be cut off from worship of the LORD.
25. Ein lakhem cheleq ba-Yahweh ('you have no share/portion in the LORD') — this feared declaration would sever the eastern tribes from Israel's covenant identity. The Jordan River, intended merely as a geographic feature, could become a theological barrier. The concern anticipates the real historical tensions between the Transjordan and Cisjordan communities.
26. The emphatic lo l'olah v'lo l'zavach ('not for burnt offering and not for sacrifice') is the interpretive key to the entire episode. The altar has no sacrificial function. It is a witness marker, a memorial — a purpose that the following verse will make explicit.
27. Ki ed hu beinenu uveineikhem ('for it is a witness between us and you') — the altar is a memorial, not a cultic rival. Its purpose is testimonial: to declare across generations that the eastern tribes belong to the same covenant community and worship the same God at the same central sanctuary. The irony is layered: the very act that appeared to threaten cultic unity was motivated by a desire to preserve it.
28. Tavnit mizbach Yahweh ('the pattern/replica of the altar of the LORD') — the altar is explicitly described as a tavnit, a copy or representation of the legitimate altar. The word tavnit is the same used for the 'pattern' of the tabernacle shown to Moses on Sinai (Exodus 25:9). The copy points to the original; it does not replace it.
29. Chalilah lanu ('far be it from us / heaven forbid') — the strongest Hebrew expression of moral horror at the accusation. The eastern tribes affirm the exclusive legitimacy of the tabernacle altar at Shiloh. Mil'vad mizbach Yahweh Eloheinu asher lifnei mishkano ('apart from the altar of the LORD our God which is before his tabernacle') — they acknowledge one legitimate altar, one tabernacle, one place of sacrifice.
30. Vayyitav b'eineihem ('it was good in their eyes') — the defense is accepted. Phinehas, the zealot who killed an Israelite and a Midianite woman for idolatry at Peor (Numbers 25:7-8), is persuaded that the altar poses no threat to covenant faithfulness. His acceptance carries enormous weight.
31. Hayom yada'nu ki v'tokheinu Yahweh ('today we know that the LORD is in our midst') — the absence of sin confirms the divine presence. Phinehas's declaration reverses the crisis: the feared ma'al has not occurred, so the feared wrath will not come. Az hitsaltem et b'nei Yisra'el miyyad Yahweh ('then you have delivered the Israelites from the hand of the LORD') — a striking phrase: rescue not from enemies but from God's own judgment. The greatest danger Israel faces is not foreign armies but divine wrath provoked by covenant unfaithfulness.
32. The delegation returns with the exonerating report. Diplomacy, led by the right person (Phinehas), has prevented a catastrophic civil war.
33. Vay'var'khu Elohim ('they blessed/praised God') — the resolution prompts worship. The phrase 'to devastate the land' (l'shachet et ha-arets) reveals how close the nation came to fratricidal destruction. The entire episode models a pattern: accusation, investigation, defense, resolution — a template for handling internal conflict within the covenant community.
34. The altar receives the name Ed ('Witness'). The naming act mirrors other memorial-naming episodes in the Pentateuch (e.g., Galeed in Genesis 31:47-48). Ki Yahweh ha-Elohim ('for the LORD is God') — the confession embedded in the naming affirms the shared monotheistic faith of all twelve tribes, east and west. The altar becomes a permanent declaration that geographic separation does not create theological division.

Summary: Joshua, old and near death, summons Israel's leaders for a farewell address. He reminds them of God's faithfulness in the conquest and warns that intermarriage and covenants with the remaining nations will lead to their destruction.

What Makes This Remarkable: Joshua's farewell mirrors Moses's: both aging leaders gather Israel to remind them of God's acts and warn against apostasy. The phrase 'not one thing has failed of all the good things the LORD your God promised you' (v. 14) echoes 21:45, but here it carries a warning: the same God who fulfilled every good promise will fulfill every threat. The theological logic is symmetrical — God's faithfulness cuts both ways.

Translation Friction: The verb davaq (v. 12, 'cling/hold fast') — the same word used for marital union in Genesis 2:24 and for covenant loyalty in Deuteronomy 10:20 — here describes the forbidden attachment to pagan nations. The word's range allows for bitter irony: the clinging Israel should give to God, they might give to the nations instead.

Connections: Joshua's farewell echoes Moses's in Deuteronomy 31-33. The conditional promise-and-warning structure parallels Deuteronomy 28. The 'thorn in your eyes' metaphor (v. 13) echoes Numbers 33:55. The entire address is vindicated by the book of Judges, which narrates exactly the apostasy Joshua warns against.

¹A long time afterward, when the LORD had given Israel rest from all their enemies on every side, and Joshua had grown old and advanced in years, ²Joshua summoned all Israel — their elders, heads, judges, and officials — and said to them, "I have grown old and am advanced in years. ³You yourselves have witnessed everything the LORD your God did to all these nations on your behalf, for the LORD your God is the one who fought for you. ⁴Look — I have allotted to you by lot these remaining nations as an inheritance for your tribes, along with all the nations I have already cut off, from the Jordan to the Great Sea in the west. ⁵The LORD your God himself will push them back from before you and dispossess them on your behalf, and you will take possession of their land, just as the LORD your God promised you. ⁶Be very strong in keeping and carrying out everything written in the Book of the Law of Moses, never turning from it to the right or the left, ⁷so that you do not associate with these nations remaining among you. Do not invoke the names of their gods, do not swear by them, do not serve them, and do not bow down to them. ⁸Instead, hold fast to the LORD your God, just as you have done to this day. ⁹The LORD has dispossessed great and powerful nations before you; to this day, no one has been able to stand against you. ¹⁰One of you puts a thousand to flight, because the LORD your God is the one who fights for you, just as he promised. ¹¹Guard yourselves carefully — love the LORD your God. ¹²But if you turn back and cling to the remnant of these nations remaining among you, and intermarry with them — if you go among them and they among you — ¹³then know with certainty that the LORD your God will no longer dispossess these nations before you. Instead, they will become a snare and a trap for you, a whip on your sides and thorns in your eyes, until you perish from this good land the LORD your God has given you. ¹⁴Now I am about to go the way of all the earth. You know with all your heart and all your life that not a single word has failed from all the good promises the LORD your God made concerning you. Everything has come true for you; not one word has failed. ¹⁵But just as every good promise the LORD your God made to you has been fulfilled, so the LORD will bring upon you every harmful word until he has destroyed you from this good land the LORD your God has given you. ¹⁶When you violate the covenant of the LORD your God that he commanded you, and go and serve other gods and bow down to them, then the anger of the LORD will burn against you, and you will perish quickly from the good land he has given you."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

- 1. Miyamim rabbim ('after many days') — an unspecified but significant period has elapsed since the conquest and allocation. The nation has enjoyed the rest (menucha) promised in 21:44. Vihoshua zaqen ba bayyamim ('Joshua was old, come into days') — the same phrase used of Abraham (Genesis 24:1) and David (1 Kings 1:1). Joshua's mortality sets the stage for his farewell: he must secure the nation's commitment to the covenant before he dies.

2. The fourfold leadership structure (elders, heads, judges, officers) represents the complete governing apparatus of Israel. Joshua's self-identification as old and dying mirrors Moses' farewell in Deuteronomy 31:2 ('I am 120 years old today'). The parallels between Joshua's farewell and Moses' farewell are deliberate — Joshua speaks as Moses' authorized successor, passing on the same covenantal charge.
3. Atem r'item ('you yourselves have seen') — Joshua appeals to the living memory of his audience. They are eyewitnesses of divine action, not recipients of secondhand tradition. Yahweh Eloheikhem hu ha-nilcham lakhem ('the LORD your God — he is the one fighting for you') — the divine warrior theme from 10:14, 42 is restated as the interpretive lens through which the entire conquest must be understood.
4. Hippalti lakhem ('I have caused to fall to you by lot') — the verb naphal ('to fall') describes the lot casting that determined tribal territories. Joshua notes the distinction between nations already conquered (asher hikh'rati, 'which I cut off') and those still remaining (ha-nish'arim, 'the remaining ones'). The Great Sea (ha-yam ha-gadol) is the Mediterranean.
5. V'horish otam millifneikhem ('he will dispossess them from before you') — the verb yarash in the Hiphil means to cause to possess or to dispossess. The remaining nations are not Israel's problem to solve alone; God will complete what he began. Ka'asher dibber Yahweh Eloheikhem lakhem ('as the LORD your God spoke to you') — the fulfillment formula. God's word is the guarantee.
6. Vachazaqtem me'od ('be very strong') — the same command given to Joshua in 1:7. Now Joshua passes it on to the nation. Sefer torat Mosheh ('the book of the Law of Moses') — the written Torah is the permanent standard. L'vilti sur mimmennu yamin us'mol ('not turning from it right or left') — the image of a straight path with the Torah as the road. This verse directly echoes Deuteronomy 5:32 and Joshua 1:7, creating a literary frame around the entire book.
7. Four prohibitions escalate the danger: mentioning pagan deity names, swearing oaths by them, serving them, worshipping them. The progression moves from casual cultural accommodation to full apostasy. L'vilti vo ba-goyim ('not to enter among the nations') — the warning is against social integration that leads to religious syncretism. Uv'shem elohehem lo tazkiru ('do not invoke the name of their gods') — even casual reference to pagan deities is forbidden (cf. Exodus 23:13).
8. Ba-Yahweh Eloheikhem tid'baqu ('to the LORD your God you must cling') — davaq ('cling, hold fast') is the marriage-bond verb from Genesis 2:24, the same term used in Joshua's charge to the Transjordan tribes (22:5). The positive command balances the four negative prohibitions: the antidote to pagan attraction is deeper loyalty to the LORD.
9. Goyim g'dolim va'atsumim ('nations great and mighty') — the adjectives emphasize that Israel's success is disproportionate to its own strength. The military record confirms divine involvement: the victories cannot be explained by Israel's resources alone.
10. Ish echad mikkem yirdof elef ('one man from you shall pursue a thousand') — this ratio echoes the Song of Moses in Deuteronomy 32:30. The hyperbolically favorable odds demonstrate divine empowerment. The verse restates the divine warrior theology: military success is God's gift, not human achievement.
11. V'nishmartem me'od l'nafshoteikhem ('guard yourselves greatly for your lives') — the self-guarding command (shamar) is existential. Love for God is not merely an emotion but a matter of survival. L'ahavah et Yahweh Eloheikhem ('to love the LORD your God') — the Shema command (Deuteronomy 6:5) is the single imperative that encompasses all obedience.
12. Im shov tashuvu ('if you indeed turn back') — the doubled verb emphasizes deliberate apostasy, not accidental error. V'hithchatantem bahem ('and intermarry with them') — intermarriage is the primary mechanism of assimilation. The warning proves prophetic: the opening chapters of Judges describe exactly this pattern of coexistence leading to syncretism.
13. Yado'a ted'u ('know with certainty') — the doubled verb creates an emphatic absolute: there is no ambiguity about the consequences. The imagery escalates: pach ('snare'), moqesh ('trap'), shotet ('whip/scourge'), ts'ninim ('thorns'). The unfaithful nation will be tormented by the very peoples it failed to dispossess. Ad avod'khem me'al ha'adamah ha-tovah ('until you perish from this good land') — the ultimate consequence is loss of the land itself. The promise-fulfillment of 21:43-45 is conditional; the same God who gave the land can remove Israel from it.
14. Holekh ha-yom b'derekh kol ha-arets ('going today in the way of all the earth') — a euphemism for death, also used by David in 1 Kings 2:2. Lo nafal davar echad ('not one word has fallen') — this is the exact repetition of 21:45, now placed on Joshua's own lips. The double statement (hakol ba'u lakhem, lo nafal mimmennu davar echad — 'everything came to you, not one word from it has failed') is emphatic: God's faithfulness to his promises is complete and beyond dispute.
15. Ken yavi Yahweh aleikhem et kol ha-davar ha-ra ('so the LORD will bring upon you every harmful/evil word') — the symmetry is devastating. The same faithfulness that guarantees promises guarantees threats. God's reliability is not selective; if he keeps his word regarding blessings, he will keep it regarding curses. This is the Deuteronomic covenant theology in its starkest form: the blessings of Deuteronomy 28:1-14 and the curses of Deuteronomy 28:15-68 are equally certain.
16. B'ovr'khem et berit Yahweh Eloheikhem ('when you transgress the covenant of the LORD your God') — the use of 'when' rather than 'if' in the Hebrew construction carries a sobering undertone. The berit (covenant) is the foundational relationship; violating it through worship of other gods triggers the covenant curses. V'charah af Yahweh bakhem ('the anger of the LORD will burn against you') — divine anger is the covenant's enforcement mechanism. Va'avadtem m'herah me'al ha-arets ha-tovah ('you will perish quickly from the good land') — the warning is exile. Joshua's farewell ends not with comfort but with the sharpest possible warning: the land is a gift that can be revoked.

Summary: At Shechem, Joshua rehearses Israel's entire history from Abraham to the conquest, challenges them to 'choose this day whom you will serve,' and the people covenant to serve the LORD. Joshua sets up a stone witness, and the book closes with his death and burial.

What Makes This Remarkable: The covenant at Shechem follows the structure of an ancient Near Eastern suzerainty treaty: historical prologue (vv. 2-13), stipulation (vv. 14-15), witness (v. 27), and deposit of the document. Joshua's challenge — 'choose this day whom you will serve' (v. 15) — is the Bible's most famous statement of free will. But the history he recites is entirely about God's actions: 'I took... I gave... I sent... I brought... I delivered.' The choice is real, but it is made against a backdrop of unearned grace.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'gods your fathers served beyond the River' (v. 2) reveals that Abraham's family worshipped other gods before God's call — a startling admission that election is not merit-based. The large stone 'under the oak that was in the sanctuary of the LORD' (v. 26) blends Canaanite sacred-tree tradition with Israelite covenant practice. We rendered it without editorial comment. Joshua's three-fold warning 'you cannot serve the LORD' (v. 19) is not discouragement but realism.

Connections: The Shechem covenant connects to Genesis 12:6 (Abraham's first altar), Genesis 33:18-20 (Jacob at Shechem), and Deuteronomy 27 (the Ebal/Gerizim ceremony). Joseph's bones are buried here (v. 32), fulfilling Genesis 50:25 and Exodus 13:19. The stone witness echoes Genesis 28:18 (Jacob's pillar) and Joshua 4 (the Jordan stones). The closing obituary pattern — Joshua, then Eleazar — mirrors the Pentateuch's ending with Moses.

¹Joshua gathered all the tribes of Israel at Shechem. He summoned the elders, heads, judges, and officials of Israel, and they presented themselves before God. ²Joshua said to all the people, "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'Long ago your ancestors lived beyond the Euphrates River — Terah, the father of Abraham and Nahor — and they served other gods. ³I took your father Abraham from beyond the Euphrates and led him through all the land of Canaan. I multiplied his descendants and gave him Isaac. ⁴I gave Isaac both Jacob and Esau. To Esau I gave the hill country of Seir to possess, while Jacob and his sons went down to Egypt. ⁵I sent Moses and Aaron, and I struck Egypt with plagues — as I acted in their midst — and afterward I brought you out. ⁶I brought your ancestors out of Egypt, and you came to the sea. The Egyptians pursued your ancestors with chariots and cavalry to the Sea of Reeds. ⁷They cried out to the LORD, and he placed darkness between you and the Egyptians. He brought the sea over them and covered them. Your own eyes saw what I did in Egypt. Then you lived in the wilderness for a long time. ⁸I brought you to the land of the Amorites who lived east of the Jordan. They fought against you, but I handed them over to you, and you took possession of their land. I destroyed them before you. ⁹Then Balak son of Zippor, king of Moab, rose up and fought against Israel. He sent for Balaam son of Beor to curse you, ¹⁰but I refused to listen to Balaam. Instead he blessed you repeatedly, and I rescued you from his hand. ¹¹You crossed the Jordan and came to Jericho. The leaders of Jericho fought against you, as did the Amorites, Perizzites, Canaanites, Hittites, Girgashites, Hivites, and Jebusites, but I handed them over to you. ¹²I sent the hornet ahead of you, and it drove them out before you — including the two Amorite kings. It was not by your sword or your bow. ¹³I gave you a land you did not toil for, cities you did not build — and you settled in them. You eat from vineyards and olive groves you did not plant.' ¹⁴"Now, therefore, fear the LORD and serve him with integrity and faithfulness. Put away the gods your ancestors served beyond the Euphrates and in Egypt, and serve the LORD. ¹⁵But if serving the LORD seems wrong to you, then choose for yourselves today whom you will serve — whether the gods your ancestors served beyond the Euphrates, or the gods of the Amorites in whose land you are living. As for me and my household, we will serve the LORD." ¹⁶The people responded, "Far be it from us to abandon the LORD and serve other gods! ¹⁷For the LORD our God is the one who brought us and our ancestors up from the land of Egypt, from the house of slavery, who performed these great signs before our eyes, and who guarded us along the entire road we traveled and among all the peoples we passed through. ¹⁸The LORD drove out all the peoples before us, including the Amorites who inhabited the land. We too will serve the LORD, for he is our God." ¹⁹Joshua said to the people, "You are not able to serve the LORD, for he is a holy God. He is a jealous God. He will not forgive your rebellion and your sins. ²⁰If you abandon the LORD and serve foreign gods, he will turn and bring disaster on you and consume you, after having been good to you." ²¹The people said to Joshua, "No! We will serve the LORD." ²²Joshua said to the people, "You are witnesses against yourselves that you have chosen the LORD, to serve him." They said, "We are witnesses." ²³"Then put away the foreign gods that are among you, and turn your hearts toward the LORD, the God of Israel." ²⁴The people said to Joshua, "The LORD our God we will serve, and his voice we will obey." ²⁵So Joshua made a covenant with the people that day and established a statute and an ordinance for them at Shechem. ²⁶Joshua wrote these words in the Book of the Law of God. Then he took a large stone and set it up there under the oak that was in the sanctuary of the LORD. ²⁷Joshua said to all the people, "This stone will be a witness against us, for it has heard all the words the LORD spoke to us. It will be a witness against you, so that you do not deny your God." ²⁸Then Joshua dismissed the people, each to his own inheritance. ²⁹After these events, Joshua son of Nun, the servant of the LORD, died at the age of one hundred and ten years. ³⁰They buried him within the territory of his inheritance at Timnath-serah in the hill country of Ephraim, north of Mount Gaash. ³¹Israel served the LORD throughout the lifetime of Joshua and throughout the lifetime of the elders who outlived Joshua and who had experienced everything the LORD had done for Israel. ³²The bones of Joseph, which the Israelites had brought up from Egypt, were buried at Shechem in the plot of land that Jacob had purchased from the sons of Hamor, the father of Shechem, for one hundred pieces of silver. It became part of the inheritance of the descendants of Joseph. ³³Eleazar son of Aaron also died and was buried at Gibeah, which had been given to his son Phinehas in the hill country of Ephraim.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Shechem is the most theologically resonant location possible for this covenant ceremony. Abraham built his first altar here (Genesis 12:6-7), Jacob purchased land and erected an altar here (Genesis 33:18-20), and Joseph's bones will be buried here (24:32). Vayyityats'vu lifnei ha-Elohim ('they presented themselves before God') — the verb yatsav ('to station oneself, present oneself') is used for solemn assembly before the divine presence. The same fourfold leadership structure (elders, heads, judges, officers) from 23:2 is convened.
2. Koh amar Yahweh ('thus says the LORD') — Joshua speaks as a prophetic messenger, delivering God's words in the first person. This is the 'messenger formula' used by the prophets. The historical review begins with Israel's pagan origins: Terah and the patriarchal family worshipped other gods (elohim acherim) in Mesopotamia. This starting point is theologically critical — Israel's election was not based on prior merit or piety. God chose Abraham from an idolatrous family.
3. Va'eqqach et avikhem et Avraham ('I took your father Abraham') — God speaks in the first person throughout this historical recital. Every verb is in divine first person: 'I took,' 'I led,' 'I multiplied,' 'I gave.' This sustained use of the divine 'I' makes the entire history of Israel a record of God's actions, not human achievements.
4. The historical summary moves swiftly through the patriarchal period. The reference to Esau receiving Seir establishes that land allocation is a recurring divine pattern — God assigns territory to nations. Jacob's descent to Egypt sets up the exodus narrative that follows.
5. Va'eggof et Mitsrayim ('I struck Egypt') — the entire Exodus event is compressed into a single sentence. The plagues, the confrontation with Pharaoh, the Passover — all are summarized under the divine first person. The emphasis is on agency: God sent, God struck, God brought out.
6. Yam Suf ('Sea of Reeds') — rendered literally rather than following the traditional 'Red Sea' translation, which derives from the Septuagint (erythra thalassa). The Hebrew suf refers to reeds or rushes, and the exact body of water remains debated. The pursuit with chariots and cavalry represents the full military might of ancient Egypt.
7. Vayyasem ma'afel beinekhem uvein ha-mitsrim ('he placed darkness between you and the Egyptians') — this refers to the pillar of cloud that separated Israel from the pursuing army (Exodus 14:19-20). Vattir'einah eineikhem ('your eyes saw') — God addresses the current generation as participants in the historical events, blurring the line between past and present. Covenant memory makes the exodus personally real for every generation.
8. The Transjordan conquest under Moses (Numbers 21:21-35) is the first military chapter of the larger conquest narrative. The pattern is consistent: enemies fight, God delivers, Israel possesses.
9. The Balak-Balaam episode (Numbers 22-24) is presented as a military threat neutralized by divine intervention. Balak's strategy was to use supernatural power (cursing) when conventional warfare proved insufficient.
10. V'lo aviti lishmo'a l'Vil'am ('I was not willing to listen to Balaam') — God's sovereign refusal to allow the curse transforms every attempted imprecation into a blessing (Numbers 23:11, 20; 24:10). Va'atsil etkhem miyyado ('I delivered you from his hand') — divine rescue operates not only through military victory but through control of prophetic speech.
11. The seven-nation list represents the full array of Canaan's inhabitants (cf. Deuteronomy 7:1). The divine first person continues to dominate: 'I handed them over' (va'etten otam b'yedkhem). The conquest narrative is compressed to a single verse — details that occupied chapters 6-12 are summarized under the governing theme of divine agency.

12. Va'eshlach lifneikhem et ha-tsir'ah ('I sent the hornet before you') — the tsir'ah ('hornet') is debated: literal stinging insects, a metaphor for panic or plague, or possibly Egyptian military forces (the bee was a symbol of Lower Egypt). Whatever the referent, the point is emphatic: Lo v'charb'kha v'lo v'qasht'kha ('not by your sword and not by your bow') — Israel's military technology was not the decisive factor. The two Amorite kings are Sihon and Og (cf. 2:10; 9:10).
13. The closing line of God's historical speech echoes Deuteronomy 6:10-11 with devastating precision. Everything Israel enjoys is unearned: the land (not their labor), the cities (not their construction), the vineyards and olive groves (not their planting). The entire historical survey — from Terah's idolatry in Mesopotamia to the unearned abundance in Canaan — establishes one theme: grace precedes demand. God's gifts create the obligation of loyalty.
14. V'attah ('now therefore') — the transition from historical recital to demand. B'tamim uve'emet ('in wholeness/integrity and in truth/faithfulness') — tamim means complete, without division; emet means reliable, genuine. Service to God must be undivided and authentic. V'hasiru et ha-elohim asher av'du avoteikhem ('put away the gods your ancestors served') — this command implies that some Israelites still possess idols, a shocking revelation. The idolatrous past of Mesopotamia and Egypt still has a hold on the present community. Rachel stole Laban's teraphim (Genesis 31:19); the golden calf was an Egyptian import (Exodus 32); idolatry is a persistent temptation.
15. Bacharu lakhem ha-yom et mi ta'avdun ('choose for yourselves today whom you will serve') — this is the most famous verse in Joshua and one of the most quoted in the Hebrew Bible. The demand for choice assumes genuine freedom; covenant loyalty cannot be coerced. Joshua presents two alternatives to serving the LORD: the gods of Mesopotamia (ancestral paganism) or the gods of the Amorites (local paganism). Neither option is presented favorably. V'anokhi uveiti na'avod et Yahweh ('as for me and my house, we will serve the LORD') — Joshua's personal declaration models the response he expects. His commitment is not contingent on the nation's decision.
16. Chalilah lanu me'azov et Yahweh ('far be it from us to abandon the LORD') — the same formula of moral revulsion used by the eastern tribes (22:29). The people's response is emphatic and immediate.
17. The people echo God's historical recital with their own memory. Ha-ma'aleh otanu ('the one who brought us up') — the exodus is the defining act. Mi-beit avadim ('from the house of slaves') — the standard Deuteronomistic formula (Deuteronomy 5:6; 6:12; 8:14). The people cite three divine acts: deliverance from Egypt, miraculous signs, and protection on the journey.
18. Gam anachnu na'avod et Yahweh ki hu Eloheinu ('we too will serve the LORD, for he is our God') — the people's affirmation matches Joshua's declaration in verse 15. The confession ki hu Eloheinu ('for he is our God') is a covenant formula: it identifies the relationship that determines identity and obligation.
19. Lo tukh'lu la'avod et Yahweh ('you are not able to serve the LORD') — Joshua's startling response challenges the people's easy commitment. His warning is not that God is unwilling to be served but that the standard is impossibly high. Elohim q'doshim hu ('he is a holy God') — the plural q'doshim is an intensive plural ('supremely holy'), not a numerical plural. El qanno hu ('he is a jealous God') — qanno describes God's exclusive demand for loyalty (cf. Exodus 20:5; 34:14). Lo yissa l'fish'akhem ('he will not bear/forgive your rebellion') — the severity is designed to ensure the people understand the weight of their commitment.
20. V'shav v'hera lakhem v'khillah etkhem acharei asher hetiv lakhem ('he will turn and bring harm and consume you after he has done you good') — the contrast between past goodness and future judgment is sharp. God's prior generosity intensifies rather than mitigates the consequences of unfaithfulness. The word khillah ('consume, finish off') is absolute.
21. Lo, ki et Yahweh na'avod ('No — rather, the LORD we will serve') — the people persist despite Joshua's warning. The doubled commitment (vv. 16-18, 21) after being warned of the impossibility of true faithfulness (v. 19) deepens the solemnity. The reader, knowing the book of Judges, understands how quickly this commitment will be tested.
22. Edim atem bakhem ('you are witnesses against yourselves') — a covenant-lawsuit formula. The people's own declaration becomes testimony that can be used against them in the event of future unfaithfulness. They bear witness to their own freely chosen obligation. The exchange has the formal structure of a legal proceeding: charge, response, witness testimony.
23. Hasiru et elohai ha-nekhar asher b'qirb'khem ('put away the foreign gods that are in your midst') — the command confirms that foreign gods were indeed present among the Israelites (cf. v. 14). This echoes Jacob's command at Shechem to put away foreign gods (Genesis 35:2-4) — at the same location. V'hattu et l'vavkhem ('incline your hearts') — the verb natah ('to incline, to bend') asks for the reorientation of the inner self toward God.
24. The third and final affirmation — the most complete: na'avod ('we will serve') and nishma ('we will obey/listen'). The verb shama adds the dimension of hearing and heeding God's ongoing instruction. This mirrors the Sinai declaration na'aseh v'nishma ('we will do and we will hear/obey,' Exodus 24:7).
25. Vayyikhrot Yehoshua berit la-am ('Joshua cut a covenant with the people') — the verb karat ('to cut') reflects the ancient practice of cutting animals in covenant ceremonies (cf. Genesis 15:10, 17-18). This Shechem covenant is the culminating act of the book of Joshua — it renews the Sinai covenant on Canaan's soil. Vayyasem lo choq umishpat ('he set for him a statute and an ordinance') — Joshua formalizes the covenant obligations in legal terms.

- 26. Vayyikhtov Yehoshua et ha-d'varim ha-elleh b'sefer torat Elohim ('Joshua wrote these words in the Book of the Law of God') — Joshua adds the covenant text to the existing Torah scroll, establishing continuity between Mosaic legislation and the Shechem covenant. The great stone (even g'dolah) functions as a witness monument, like the stones at Gilgal (4:20) and the altar 'Witness' (22:34). Tachat ha-allah asher b'miqdash Yahweh ('under the oak in the sanctuary of the LORD') — this oak likely connects to the oak of Moreh where Abraham first received the land promise (Genesis 12:6) and where Jacob buried the foreign gods (Genesis 35:4). The location ties patriarchal history to national covenant.
- 27. Ki hi sham'ah et kol imrei Yahweh ('for it has heard all the words of the LORD') — the stone is personified as a witness that 'heard' the covenant proceedings. This literary device gives the covenant a permanent, physical guarantor. Creation itself testifies to the covenant (cf. Deuteronomy 30:19, where heaven and earth are called as witnesses). Pen t'kach'shun b'Eloheikhem ('lest you deny/lie against your God') — the stone guards against future apostasy by preserving the memory of the commitment.
- 28. Ish l'nachalato ('each to his inheritance') — the covenant assembly concludes with the people dispersing to their territorial allotments. The nachalah is no longer a promise but a reality. The link between covenant commitment and land possession is maintained: the people go from the covenant ceremony to their God-given inheritance.
- 29. Eved Yahweh ('servant of the LORD') — the title previously reserved for Moses (1:1, 2, 7, 13, 15) is now applied to Joshua. This is the ultimate honor: Joshua has completed his commission and earned the same title as his predecessor. One hundred and ten was considered the ideal lifespan in Egyptian culture; it is also the age at which Joseph died (Genesis 50:26). The narrative bookend with Joseph is deliberate.
- 30. Bighvul nachalato ('within the border of his inheritance') — Joshua is buried in the modest city he personally requested (19:50). The servant-leader who oversaw the distribution of an entire land rests in the small inheritance he humbly claimed last. Timnath-serah means 'remaining portion' — fitting for the leader who took what was left after all others were served.
- 31. Va'asher yad'u et kol ma'aseh Yahweh asah l'Yisra'el ('who knew all the work of the LORD that he did for Israel') — faithfulness lasted as long as eyewitnesses survived. Once the generation that personally experienced God's acts died, the next generation 'did not know the LORD' (Judges 2:10). This verse is both a commendation and a warning: covenant fidelity depends on transmitted memory. When the testimony fails, apostasy follows.
- 32. The burial of Joseph's bones fulfills the oath from Genesis 50:25 and Exodus 13:19. Joseph's dying request — that his bones be carried to the promised land — expressed faith that God would fulfill his promise. The burial at Shechem, on land Jacob purchased (Genesis 33:19), creates a chain of legal ownership: patriarchal purchase, exodus transport, conquest-era burial. B'me'ah q'sitah ('for one hundred qesitah') — the qesitah is an archaic unit of value, possibly a specific weight of silver. The Joseph burial narrative closes the arc that began in Genesis and links the patriarchal era to the conquest era.
- 33. The book closes with three burials: Joshua (v. 30), Joseph (v. 32), and Eleazar (v. 33). Joshua represents faithful leadership, Joseph represents fulfilled promise across centuries, and Eleazar represents the priesthood that mediated between God and Israel throughout the conquest and allocation. Giv'at Pinchas ('the hill of Phinehas') — the priestly inheritance passes to the next generation. The triple burial ending simultaneously commemorates the past, marks the transition to a new era, and silently raises the question that the book of Judges will answer: what happens when this generation's witness fades?

Judges

Summary: After Joshua's death, Judah and Simeon lead the initial campaigns against the Canaanites. Several tribes fail to drive out the inhabitants of their territories, settling instead for forced labor or coexistence.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The chapter opens with the same question that opened Joshua ('Who will go up first?'), but the trajectory is downward. Judah's victories give way to partial conquests, then failures, then accommodation. The phrase lo horish (repeated throughout, 'did not drive out') becomes a refrain of incomplete obedience. The Canaanites are not too strong for God — Israel simply stopped trying. Adoni-bezek's capture and mutilation (vv. 5-7) includes his own theological commentary: 'as I have done, so God has repaid me.'*

Translation Friction: *The verb horish ('drive out, dispossess') carries legal force — it means not merely defeating but removing from the land. We rendered each instance consistently. The phrase chesed (v. 24, rendered 'deal faithfully') uses the Hebrew verbal construction asah chesed, requiring a verbal English form rather than the nominal 'faithful love.' This is a documented departure from the register default.*

Connections: The catalog of failures here is the setup for the entire book of Judges — the nations Israel did not drive out become the instruments of their testing (2:20-3:6). The Kenite settlement (v. 16) connects to Moses's father-in-law (Numbers 10:29-32). Jerusalem's incomplete conquest (v. 21) persists until David (2 Samuel 5:6-9).

¹After the death of Joshua, the Israelites inquired of the LORD: "Who will go up first on our behalf against the Canaanites, to fight against them?" ²The LORD said, "Judah will go up. I have given the land into his hand." ³Judah said to his brother Simeon, "Come up with me into my allotted territory, and we will fight the Canaanites together. Then I will go with you into your allotted territory." So Simeon went with him. ⁴Judah went up, and the LORD gave the Canaanites and the Perizzites into their hand. They struck them down at Bezek — ten thousand men. ⁵They found Adoni-Bezek at Bezek and fought against him, and they struck down the Canaanites and the Perizzites. ⁶Adoni-Bezek fled, but they pursued him, captured him, and cut off his thumbs and big toes. ⁷Adoni-Bezek said, "Seventy kings with their thumbs and big toes cut off used to scavenge under my table. As I have done, so God has repaid me." They brought him to Jerusalem, and he died there. ⁸The descendants of Judah fought against Jerusalem, captured it, struck it with the edge of the sword, and set the city on fire. ⁹Aft erward the descendants of Judah went down to fight the Canaanites who lived in the hill country, the Negev, and the Shephelah. ¹⁰Judah marched against the Canaanites living in Hebron — formerly called Kiriath-Arba — and struck down Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi. ¹¹From there he marched against the inhabitants of Debir — formerly called Kiriath-Sepher. ¹²Caleb said, "Whoever attacks Kiriath-Sepher and captures it, I will give him my daughter Achsah as a wife." ¹³Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother, captured it, and Caleb gave him his daughter Achsah as a wife. ¹⁴When she arrived, she urged him to ask her father for a field. She dismounted from her donkey, and Caleb said to her, "What do you want?" ¹⁵She said to him, "Give me a blessing. Since you have given me the land of the Negev, give me also springs of water." So Caleb gave her the upper springs and the lower springs. ¹⁶The descendants of the Kenite, Moses's father-in-law, went up from the City of Palms with the descendants of Judah into the wilderness of Judah in the Negev near Arad, and they went and settled among the people. ¹⁷Judah went with his brother Simeon, and they struck down the Canaanites living in Zephath. They devoted the city to destruction and named it Hormah. ¹⁸Judah captured Gaza and its territory, Ashkelon and its territory, and Ekron and its territory. ¹⁹The LORD was with Judah, and they took possession of the hill country. But they could not dispossess the inhabitants of the plain, because they had iron chariots. ²⁰They gave Hebron to Caleb, as Moses had promised, and he drove out from there the three sons of Anak. ²¹But the descendants of Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites who lived in Jerusalem. So the Jebusites have lived alongside the descendants of Benjamin in Jerusalem to this day. ²²The house of Joseph also went up against Bethel along with the LORD was with them. ²³The house of Joseph sent scouts to Bethel — formerly called Luz. ²⁴The scouts saw a man coming out of the city and said to him, "Show us the way into the city, and we will deal faithfully with you." ²⁵He showed them the way into the city, and they struck the city with the edge of the sword, but they let the man and all his family go free. ²⁶The man went to the land of the Hittites and built a city, naming it Luz — that is its name to this day. ²⁷Manasseh did not drive out the inhabitants of Beth-Shean and its dependent towns, or Taanach and its dependent towns, or the inhabitants of Dor and its dependent towns, or the inhabitants of Ibleam and its dependent towns, or the inhabitants of Megiddo and its dependent towns. The Canaanites were determined to remain in that land. ²⁸When Israel grew strong, they subjected the Canaanites to forced labor but did not drive them out completely. ²⁹Ephraim did not drive out the Canaanites living in Gezer, so the Canaanites lived among them in Gezer. ³⁰Zebulun did not drive out the inhabitants of Kitron or the inhabitants of Nahalol. The Canaanites lived among them and were subjected to forced labor. ³¹Asher did not drive out the inhabitants of Acco, or the inhabitants of Sidon, or Ahlab, or Achzib, or Helbah, or Aphik, or Rehob. ³²So the Asherites lived among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land, because they did not drive them out. ³³Naphtali did not drive out the inhabitants of Beth-Shemesh or the inhabitants of Beth-Anath, but lived among the Canaanites, the inhabitants of the land. However, the inhabitants of Beth-Shemesh and Beth-Anath became their forced laborers. ³⁴The Amorites pressed the descendants of Dan back into the hill country and would not let them come down to the valley. ³⁵The Amorites were determined to remain in Mount Heres, in Aijalon, and in Shaalbim. But when the hand of the house of Joseph grew heavy upon them, they became forced laborers. ³⁶The border of the Amorites ran from the Ascent of Akrabbim, from Sela and upward.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening vayyehi acharei mot Yehoshua ('and it was after the death of Joshua') exactly mirrors Joshua 1:1 (acharei mot Mosheh) — the same narrative seam that opened Joshua now opens Judges. But the structural echo highlights a critical difference: after Moses's death, God spoke to Joshua unbidden; after Joshua's death, Israel must ask. There is no named successor.
1. The verb sha'al ('to inquire, to ask') combined with ba-YHWH ('of the LORD') indicates formal oracular consultation, likely through the Urim and Thummim administered by the high priest (cf. Numbers 27:21). This is proper covenant procedure — Israel begins the book correctly, seeking divine direction before acting.
2. God's answer is immediate and decisive: Judah leads. The selection of Judah — the tribe of the royal line — at the opening of a book whose refrain is 'there was no king in Israel' is not accidental. Judah's preeminence was established in Jacob's blessing (Genesis 49:8-12) and is reasserted here.
2. The perfect tense natatti ('I have given') echoes Joshua 1:3 — God declares the outcome accomplished before the first blow is struck. The gift precedes the effort, as it did throughout Joshua.

3. The mutual-aid pact between Judah and Simeon reflects their geographic and genealogical proximity — both sons of Leah, and Simeon's allotment was embedded within Judah's territory (Joshua 19:1-9). The term goral ('lot, allotted portion') refers to the divinely assigned tribal territories distributed in Joshua 13-21. The alliance is pragmatic but also underscores the tribal fragmentation that will characterize Judges: each tribe fights for its own inheritance, not as a unified nation.
4. The pattern is established: Judah goes up, the LORD gives the victory. The verb natan ('gave') with the military idiom be-yadam ('into their hand') is the standard formula for divinely granted victory throughout Joshua and Judges. Human effort and divine action are inseparable.
4. The Perizzites are one of the pre-Israelite populations listed in the Canaanite nations formula (cf. Genesis 15:20, Exodus 3:8). The term may designate rural, unwallled-village dwellers (from perazot, 'open settlements') rather than a distinct ethnic group. Their pairing with the Canaanites here may indicate the full range of the population — urban Canaanites and rural Perizzites.
5. Adoni-Bezek ('lord of Bezek') is a title-name — the local ruler of Bezek. He is distinct from Adoni-Zedek ('lord of righteousness'), the king of Jerusalem in Joshua 10:1, though the similar names have caused confusion in textual traditions. The LXX confuses the two in some manuscripts.
6. The mutilation — cutting the behonotav ('thumbs') of his hands and feet — is not mere cruelty. Removing thumbs and big toes renders a warrior permanently unable to grip a weapon or maintain balance in combat. It is a deliberate disabling that allows survival but eliminates military threat. This practice is attested elsewhere in the ancient Near East as an alternative to execution for captured rulers.
7. Adoni-Bezek's confession is a striking moment of theological recognition from a pagan king. He identifies his fate as divine retribution — ka'asher asiti ken shillam-li Elohim ('as I have done, so God has repaid me'). The verb shillam (from the root sh-l-m, related to shalom) means 'to repay, to make whole, to requite.' The irony is rich: the root that means 'peace' and 'wholeness' here describes just punishment.
7. The seventy mutilated kings scavenging under his table (melaqtim, 'picking up scraps') is a vivid image of systematic humiliation. Whether seventy is precise or a round number indicating 'many' (shiv'im is a conventional number for a large complete set), Adoni-Bezek's own testimony establishes the measure-for-measure justice he now receives.
7. Elohim rather than YHWH in Adoni-Bezek's speech is theologically appropriate — a Canaanite king would recognize divine justice in general terms ('God') rather than invoking Israel's covenant name.
8. This notice of Jerusalem's capture by Judah stands in tension with verse 21 (Benjamin did not drive out the Jebusites from Jerusalem) and with Joshua 15:63 (Judah could not drive them out). The most likely explanation is that Judah achieved a temporary military victory without establishing permanent occupation. Jerusalem remained a Jebusite stronghold until David's conquest (2 Samuel 5:6-9). The text preserves the tension rather than harmonizing it.
8. Lefi-cherev ('at the mouth of the sword') is the standard idiom for comprehensive military defeat. The 'mouth' (pi) of the sword is its cutting edge — the Hebrew imagines the sword as consuming its victims.
9. Three geographic zones define Judah's theater of operations: the har ('hill country,' the central ridge), the Negev ('the south,' the arid region below Beersheba), and the Shephelah ('the lowland,' the foothills between the central highlands and the coastal plain). These three zones together constitute Judah's full territorial allotment as described in Joshua 15. The geographic specificity is theological documentation — the conquest must be as physical and verifiable as the promise it fulfills.
10. The three named warriors — Sheshai, Ahiman, and Talmi — are identified elsewhere as descendants of Anak, the giant clan (Numbers 13:22, Joshua 15:14). These are the same population the spies feared in Numbers 13:28-33, causing the wilderness generation to refuse entry into the land. Their defeat here is the fulfillment of Caleb's confidence in Numbers 14:24 — what the faithless spies thought impossible, covenant-faithful warriors accomplish.
10. Kiriath-Arba ('city of Arba' or 'city of four') was the older name for Hebron. Arba was identified as the greatest of the Anakim (Joshua 14:15). The parenthetical name note connects the conquest to the patriarchal narratives — Abraham bought the cave of Machpelah at Hebron to bury Sarah (Genesis 23).
11. Kiriath-Sepher ('city of the scroll' or 'city of writing') suggests Debir may have been an administrative or scribal center. The name has intrigued scholars as possible evidence of a Canaanite literary tradition. This account parallels Joshua 15:15-19 almost verbatim — the Judges narrator incorporates the earlier tradition.
12. Caleb's offer of his daughter as a prize for military valor reflects ancient Near Eastern customs where marriage to a leader's daughter conferred both honor and alliance. The practice appears also in 1 Samuel 17:25 (Saul's similar offer regarding Goliath). Achsah is not merely a trophy — as verses 14-15 will show, she is a shrewd negotiator who secures her own future.
13. Othniel's introduction here prepares for his role as the first judge in 3:7-11. He is Caleb's younger brother (or possibly nephew — achi Kalev, 'brother of Caleb,' is ambiguous in Hebrew kinship language). His military initiative at Debir establishes his credentials as a leader capable of covenant-faithful action — making his later role as deliverer narratively coherent.
14. The verb va-tesitehu ('she urged him, she incited him') indicates Achsah's initiative — she is the strategic thinker in the marriage, prompting Othniel to request land. The verb sut can carry negative connotations (incitement to wrongdoing, cf. 1 Chronicles 21:1), but here it simply indicates persuasive initiative. Achsah recognizes that land without water is worthless and acts to secure both.

14. Va-titsnach me'al ha-chamor ('she dismounted from the donkey') — the verb tsanach means 'to descend, to alight.' The physical act of dismounting signals deference and petition — she approaches her father as a supplicant, not standing above him on the donkey.
15. Achsah's request is shrewd and theologically resonant. She asks for a berakhah ('blessing') — the word carries more weight than a simple gift. She recognizes that the Negev land alone is semi-arid and insufficient; gullot mayim ('springs of water,' literally 'basins of water') are essential for viability. Caleb's generous response — both upper and lower springs — exceeds her request, a pattern that echoes divine generosity throughout the land-gift narrative.
15. This vignette (vv. 12-15) appears almost identically in Joshua 15:16-19. Its repetition in Judges 1 serves a structural purpose: the successful completion of Caleb-Othniel's conquest is the last positive military achievement before the catalog of failures begins in verse 19.
16. The Kenites were a non-Israelite clan connected to Israel through Moses's marriage to Zipporah (Exodus 2:16-21). Choten Mosheh ('father-in-law of Moses') identifies the clan through this relationship — their alliance with Israel is based on kinship, not covenant membership. The Kenites' presence in Judah's territory prefigures Jael's role in chapter 4, where a Kenite woman delivers Israel.
16. Ir ha-temarim ('City of Palms') is Jericho (cf. Deuteronomy 34:3, 2 Chronicles 28:15). The Kenites migrated south from Jericho's oasis into the arid Negev near Arad — territory that suited their semi-nomadic pastoral lifestyle.
17. Va-yacharim otah ('they devoted it to destruction') — the verb is from cherem, the sacred ban carried over from Joshua. Zephath is renamed Hormah (from the same root ch-r-m), making the city's name a permanent marker of its destruction. The name Hormah means 'destruction' or 'devoted thing.' The same location appears in Numbers 21:3, where Israel made a similar vow of cherem against the king of Arad. The connection between the Numbers vow and its fulfillment here should be noted.
17. This is the last successful cherem in Judges. After this verse, the narrative turns to a catalog of failures — tribes that could not or would not drive out the Canaanites. The placement is deliberate: the book shows what faithful conquest looks like one last time before documenting its collapse.
18. These three cities — Gaza, Ashkelon, and Ekron — are Philistine pentapolis cities (along with Ashdod and Gath). The claim of Judah's capture is striking because the Philistines remain a dominant military presence throughout Judges and into Samuel. The LXX reads 'Judah did NOT capture Gaza...' (adding the negative ou), which many scholars consider the more historically plausible reading. The MT text as it stands may describe a temporary or partial occupation that the Philistines quickly reversed.
18. The term gevulah ('its territory') indicates that the claim extends beyond the city walls to the surrounding agricultural land — a complete territorial claim, not just urban capture.
19. This verse is the theological hinge of chapter 1. The LORD was with Judah — the covenant presence is affirmed — yet Judah cannot complete the conquest. The stated reason is military: rekhev barzel ('iron chariots'), the ancient Near Eastern equivalent of armored divisions. Iron technology gave the lowland Canaanites a decisive advantage on flat terrain where chariots could operate.
19. The theological tension is acute: if the LORD is with Judah, why can iron chariots stop them? Joshua 17:16-18 raises the same issue. The text does not resolve the tension — it lets it stand. The implication, which the narrator will develop through the rest of Judges, is that the failure is not military but spiritual: the tribes lack the faith to press the conquest against superior technology, and the LORD's presence does not override human willingness.
19. The verb yarash ('to take possession, to dispossess') is the key land-conquest verb from Deuteronomy and Joshua. Its appearance here — successful in the hills, failed in the plains — marks the beginning of the 'could not / did not' sequence that runs through the rest of the chapter.
20. The fulfillment of Moses's promise to Caleb (Numbers 14:24, Deuteronomy 1:36, Joshua 14:6-15). Caleb's success against the Anakim — the giant clan that terrified the faithless spies — is the narrative bookend to Numbers 13-14. What the wilderness generation could not face, Caleb conquers at age 85. His personal faith stands in contrast to the tribal failures documented throughout the rest of this chapter.
21. The first explicit failure: lo horishu ('they did not drive out'). This begins the catalog of tribal failures that dominates the rest of the chapter. Benjamin's failure at Jerusalem is especially significant because Jerusalem sat on the border between Judah and Benjamin (Joshua 15:8, 18:16). Verse 8 reported Judah's partial victory there; Benjamin's failure to follow through left the Jebusites in place until David's conquest (2 Samuel 5:6-9).
21. The phrase ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') is a narrator's marker indicating that the situation persisted into the time of writing. This temporal note is evidence for a pre-Davidic (or at least pre-Solomonic) composition date for at least this portion of the text, since David took Jerusalem.
22. Beit-Yosef ('house of Joseph') designates the combined tribes of Ephraim and Manasseh — Joseph's two sons who received tribal status through Jacob's adoption blessing (Genesis 48). The LORD's presence with them (va-YHWH immam) echoes verse 19 (the LORD was with Judah) and creates a parallel: both Judah and Joseph begin with divine support but end with incomplete results.
22. Bethel ('house of God') was one of the most significant cultic sites in Israel's history — the place of Jacob's dream and vow (Genesis 28:10-22, 35:1-15). Its capture by the house of Joseph restores the site to Israelite control. Ironically, Bethel will later become a center of illicit worship under Jeroboam (1 Kings 12:29).
23. The verb va-yatiru ('they scouted, they spied out') connects to Joshua 2's reconnaissance of Jericho. The parallel is intentional: as Joshua sent spies before Jericho, so the house of Joseph sends scouts before Bethel. The former name Luz ('almond tree') appears in Genesis 28:19, where Jacob renamed it Bethel after his dream encounter with God.

24. The promise ve-asinu immekha chesed ('we will do chesed with you') is a deliberate echo of Rahab's exchange with the Israelite spies in Joshua 2:12-14, where the same chesed language appears. The parallel invites comparison: Rahab's chesed led to her incorporation into Israel; this man's chesed leads to his exile. The same covenant vocabulary produces different outcomes.
24. Chesed here functions at the human-to-human level — faithful dealing, loyal reciprocity. The scouts pledge covenantal goodwill in exchange for intelligence. The register term appears in its relational dimension: binding loyalty between parties who have entered an agreement.
24. Register departure: chesed rendered as 'deal faithfully' rather than default 'faithful love' because the Hebrew uses the verbal construction asah chesed ('do chesed'), requiring a verbal English form. The spies promise reciprocal loyalty to the informant — a human pledge, not a divine covenant.
25. The chesed pledge is honored: the man and his entire mishpachah ('family, clan') are released. The verb shillechu ('they sent away, released') is the same root used for Pharaoh releasing Israel from Egypt (sh-l-ch). The irony is layered: an Israelite liberation verb is used for releasing a Canaanite family from a city under conquest.
26. The man rebuilds his city-identity in exile — naming the new settlement Luz after the old one. The relocation to erets ha-Chittim ('land of the Hittites,' Syria/southern Anatolia) places him far from Israel's territory. The narrator's tag 'to this day' (ad ha-yom ha-zeh) indicates the new Luz persisted into the writer's era, though its precise location is unknown.
27. This verse (paralleling Joshua 17:11-12) lists five major Canaanite city-states that Manasseh failed to conquer. These cities form a strategic line across the Jezreel Valley — controlling them meant controlling the major east-west trade and military route through northern Israel. Their continued Canaanite occupation left Israel's territory effectively divided between north and south.
27. The term benoteiha ('its daughters,' rendered 'dependent towns') uses the family metaphor: the main city is the 'mother' and surrounding villages are its 'daughters.' This reflects the ancient Near Eastern city-state structure where a major fortified city dominated surrounding agricultural settlements.
27. Va-yo'el ha-Kna'ani lashevet ('the Canaanite was determined to dwell') — the verb ya'al means 'to be willing, to determine, to persist.' The emphasis is on Canaanite tenacity, not merely Israelite weakness. The Canaanites are agents in the narrative, not passive victims.
28. The devastating summary: even when Israel was strong enough to act, they chose economic exploitation over covenant obedience. The term mas ('forced labor, corvée') indicates state-imposed compulsory labor — the same institution Solomon would later use on Israelites themselves (1 Kings 5:13-14, 12:18), provoking the kingdom's division. The irony is bitter: Israel, who was once subjected to mas in Egypt (Exodus 1:11), now imposes it on others rather than carrying out the conquest as commanded.
28. The emphatic construction horesh lo horisho ('driving out — they did not drive out') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis. The narrator underscores the deliberate nature of the failure: this was not inability but unwillingness.
29. Gezer was a strategically important city on the road between Jerusalem and the coast. It remained Canaanite until Pharaoh conquered it and gave it to Solomon as a dowry for his daughter (1 Kings 9:16). The phrase be-qirbo ('in his midst') signals something worse than coexistence — the Canaanites are embedded within Ephraim's territory, not merely on its borders.
30. The same pattern as verse 28: failure to drive out, followed by the forced-labor compromise. The repetition is literary: each tribe's failure follows the same formula, building cumulative weight. Kitron and Nahalol were cities in Zebulun's territory in the lower Galilee. Their exact locations remain debated.
31. Asher's list of seven unconquered cities is the longest single tribal failure. Critically, this includes Sidon — one of the great Phoenician port cities. Asher's allotment extended to the Mediterranean coast and included major commercial centers. The failure to take these cities meant Asher was effectively surrounded by Canaanite populations and cut off from the sea trade that defined the region.
32. The phrasing shifts tellingly: for Zebulun and Manasseh, 'the Canaanites lived among them' (verse 27, 29, 30); for Asher, 'the Asherites lived among the Canaanites.' The reversal is deliberate — Asher's failure is so complete that the Canaanites are the majority population and Asher is the minority living in their midst. The tribe has not absorbed the Canaanites; the Canaanites have absorbed the tribe.
33. Naphtali follows Asher's pattern — 'lived among the Canaanites' rather than the reverse. Both Beth-Shemesh ('house of the sun') and Beth-Anath ('house of Anath') are names with pagan religious significance: Shemesh was a solar deity and Anath was a Canaanite warrior goddess. The place names themselves signal the cultic environment that will become Israel's undoing.
33. The forced-labor note at the end provides a slight qualification: Naphtali at least achieved economic dominance, even if not territorial displacement. The hierarchy of failure across tribes is calibrated — from Judah's partial success to Asher and Naphtali's near-total absorption.
34. Dan's situation is the worst of all: they are not merely unable to drive out the Canaanites — they are actively pushed back by them. The verb va-yilchatzu ('they pressed, they squeezed') indicates military pressure that confined Dan to a small, inhospitable highland area. This territorial pressure is the background for the Dan migration narrative in chapters 17-18, where the tribe abandons its allotment entirely and migrates north to seize Laish.
34. The text uses 'Amorites' rather than 'Canaanites' — the Amorites were the highland population, and Dan's conflict was specifically with the hill-country inhabitants of the Aijalon valley region.

35. Va-tikhhad yad beit-Yosef ('the hand of the house of Joseph grew heavy') — the verb kavad ('to be heavy, weighty') is from the same root as kavod ('glory'). Here 'heavy hand' means military/political dominance. The house of Joseph (Ephraim-Manasseh) eventually achieved enough power to subjugate but not displace the Amorites — the same forced-labor compromise repeated throughout the chapter.
36. The final verse defines the Amorite territorial boundary — they held ground from Ma'aleh Aqrabbim ('Scorpion Pass,' on the southern border of Judah, cf. Numbers 34:4, Joshua 15:3) northward from ha-Sela ('the Rock,' possibly Petra or a prominent rock formation). This closing geographic note frames the Amorite presence as a fixed, established reality rather than a temporary situation. The chapter ends not with hope of future conquest but with the mapping of Israel's failure.
36. The chapter thus moves from Judah's partial success (vv. 1-20) through a cascade of tribal failures (vv. 21-36). The downward trajectory is structural and theological: God gave the land, the tribes were unable or unwilling to take it fully, and the Canaanite presence that remains will become the catalyst for the apostasy cycle that defines the rest of Judges.

Summary: The angel of the LORD rebukes Israel at Bochim for failing to destroy Canaanite altars. Joshua's generation dies, and a new generation 'did not know the LORD.' The cycle begins: apostasy, oppression, crying out, deliverance — then apostasy again.

What Makes This Remarkable: The theological framework for the entire book is laid out in verses 11-19: Israel serves the Baals, God's anger burns, He gives them into the hands of oppressors, they cry out, He raises a judge who delivers them, the judge dies, and they do worse than before. The phrase 'did not know the LORD' (v. 10) diagnoses the root cause: not rebellion but amnesia — the failure of Deuteronomy's catechetical program.

Translation Friction: *The verb zanah (v. 17, 'played the prostitute after other gods') uses sexual infidelity as a covenant metaphor. We rendered it 'prostituted themselves' to preserve the Hebrew's force. The phrase lo sham'u (v. 17, 'they did not listen') echoes the Shema's imperative — Israel's fundamental command is to hear, and their fundamental failure is deafness.*

Connections: The Bochim rebuke connects to Joshua's farewell warning (Joshua 23:12-13). The judges cycle anticipates the monarchy: the pattern's failure creates the demand for a king. The remaining nations as 'testing' (v. 22) echoes Deuteronomy 8:2. The angel of the LORD from Gilgal to Bochim traces a path from conquest's beginning to its mourned failure.

¹The angel of the LORD went up from Gilgal to Bochim and said, "I brought you up out of Egypt and led you into the land that I swore to your fathers. I said, 'I will never break my covenant with you.' ²But you — you must not make a covenant with the inhabitants of this land. You must tear down their altars.' Yet you have not obeyed my voice. What is this you have done? ³So I also said, 'I will not drive them out before you. They will be thorns in your sides, and their gods will be a trap for you.'" ⁴When the angel of the LORD spoke these words to all the Israelites, the people lifted up their voices and wept. ⁵They named that place Bochim, and they sacrificed there to the LORD. ⁶When Joshua had dismissed the people, the Israelites went each to his inheritance to take possession of the land. ⁷The people served the LORD all the days of Joshua and all the days of the elders who outlived Joshua — those who had seen all the great work that the LORD had done for Israel. ⁸Joshua son of Nun, the servant of the LORD, died at the age of one hundred and ten. ⁹They buried him within the territory of his inheritance, at Timnath-Heres in the hill country of Ephraim, north of Mount Gaash. ¹⁰And all that generation too were gathered to their fathers. Another generation rose up after them who did not know the LORD or the work that He had done for Israel. ¹¹The Israelites did what was evil in the sight of the LORD and served the Baals. ¹²They abandoned the LORD, the God of their fathers, who had brought them out of the land of Egypt. They went after other gods, from among the gods of the peoples who surrounded them, and bowed down to them, provoking the LORD to anger. ¹³They abandoned the LORD and served Baal and the Ashtoreths. ¹⁴The anger of the LORD burned against Israel, and He gave them into the hand of raiders who plundered them. He sold them into the hand of their enemies all around, and they could no longer stand before their enemies. ¹⁵Wherever they went out, the hand of the LORD was against them for disaster, just as the LORD had spoken and as the LORD had sworn to them. They were in severe distress. ¹⁶Yet the LORD raised up judges, and they delivered them from the hand of those who plundered them. ¹⁷Yet they did not listen even to their judges, for they prostituted themselves to other gods and bowed down to them. They turned aside quickly from the way their fathers had walked, obeying the commandments of the LORD — they did not do so. ¹⁸Whenever the LORD raised up judges for them, the LORD was with the judge and delivered them from the hand of their enemies throughout the judge's lifetime. For the LORD was moved to compassion by their groaning under those who oppressed and crushed them. ¹⁹But whenever the judge died, they turned back and acted more corruptly than their fathers, going after other gods, serving them and bowing down to them. They did not drop any of their practices or their stubborn ways. ²⁰The anger of the LORD burned against Israel, and He said, "Because this nation has transgressed my covenant that I commanded their fathers and has not obeyed my voice, ²¹I also will no longer drive out before them any of the nations that Joshua left when he died, ²²in order to test Israel through them — whether they would keep the way of the LORD and walk in it, as their fathers had kept it, or not." ²³So the LORD left those nations in place, not driving them out quickly, and He had not given them into the hand of Joshua.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Malakh YHWH ('the angel of the LORD') speaks in the first person as God Himself — 'I brought you up out of Egypt.' This is not a mere messenger relaying information but the divine presence speaking directly. The malakh YHWH in the Hebrew Bible often functions as a manifestation of God's own presence, blurring the line between messenger and sender (cf. Genesis 16:7-13, Exodus 3:2-6). The notes should flag this theological complexity without resolving it.
1. The movement from Gilgal to Bochim is geographically and theologically significant. Gilgal was the base camp where Israel renewed the covenant upon entering the land (Joshua 5:2-12) — the place of circumcision, Passover, and the beginning of the conquest. The angel's departure from Gilgal symbolizes the covenant moving from its place of renewal to the place where its violation will be announced.
1. Lo afer beriti ittkhem le-olam ('I will never break my covenant with you') — two register terms converge: berit (covenant) and olam (forever). God's commitment is permanent. The indictment that follows (verse 2) therefore does not charge God with covenant failure but Israel with covenant violation. The asymmetry is crucial: God keeps His olam commitment; Israel does not keep hers.
2. The indictment cites two specific covenant obligations from Deuteronomy: no treaties with Canaanites (Deuteronomy 7:2) and destruction of their altars (Deuteronomy 7:5, 12:3). Both have been violated — chapter 1 documented coexistence and forced labor instead of displacement, and the persistence of Canaanite populations implies the persistence of Canaanite worship sites.
2. Lo tikhre'tu verit ('you must not cut a covenant') — the verb karat ('to cut') is the technical term for covenant-making (from the ritual of cutting animals in the ratification ceremony, Genesis 15:10). Israel is forbidden from entering into binding agreements with Canaanite populations because such agreements create obligations that compete with the covenant with YHWH.
2. Mah-zot asitem ('What is this you have done?') — the question is rhetorical and devastating. It echoes God's question to Adam (Genesis 3:13) and to Cain (Genesis 4:10). The language of primal transgression frames Israel's failure as a fall from covenant grace.
3. The consequence is measure-for-measure: because Israel did not drive out the Canaanites, God will not drive them out either. The nations Israel spared will become le-tsiddim ('thorns in your sides' or 'adversaries' — the Hebrew tsiddim is debated; it may derive from tsad, 'side,' or from tsud, 'to hunt/trap'). Either reading yields the same theology: the Canaanite remnant will cause ongoing pain.
3. Ve-eloheihem yihyu lakhem le-moqesh ('and their gods will be a trap/snare for you') — moqesh is a hunting term, a bait-trap that catches prey. Canaanite religion is described not as a temptation one might resist but as a trap already set. This language anticipates the entire cycle of apostasy in Judges: Israel will be 'caught' by Baal worship repeatedly. The metaphor absolves no one — Israel walks into a trap it was warned about.
4. The response — va-yivku ('and they wept') — is immediate and communal. The weeping is genuine grief, not strategic repentance. But the text records no prayer, no confession, no commitment to change. Weeping alone does not constitute teshuvah (repentance/return). The narrator's silence on what follows the weeping is damning — the people cry, but nothing changes.
5. Bokhim means 'Weepers' — the place is named for Israel's response. The sacrifice (va-yizbchu) suggests an attempt at restoration through proper worship, but the text gives no indication of divine acceptance or rejection. The name remains as a monument to grief without resolution — a fitting opening for a book about cycles of sorrow.
5. The location of Bochim is uncertain. The LXX adds 'Bethel and' before 'Bochim,' which would place it near the central sanctuary site. If Bochim is near Bethel, the association with Jacob's covenant encounter (Genesis 28) adds another layer: Israel weeps at the place where the covenant was first envisioned.
6. The narrative now flashes back to a point before Joshua's death — the dismissal of the tribes to their allotments (cf. Joshua 24:28). This retrospective section (vv. 6-10) provides the context for the cycle that will dominate the rest of Judges: Joshua's generation served the LORD, but the generation that followed did not.

6. Two key terms appear: nachalah ('inheritance' — the divinely assigned tribal territory) and yarash ('to take possession' — the conquest verb). The language of promise and possession frames even this retrospective as part of the ongoing land-gift narrative.
7. This verse establishes the critical variable: firsthand experience. The generation that served the LORD faithfully was the generation that had seen (ra'u) God's acts with their own eyes. Covenant faithfulness, in the Judges framework, correlates directly with experiential knowledge of God's power. When the eyewitnesses die, faithfulness dies with them. This raises the question that haunts the book: How does covenant memory survive generational transition?
7. The phrase kol ma'aseh YHWH ha-gadol ('all the great work of the LORD') encompasses the conquest, the Jordan crossing, the fall of Jericho, the solar event at Gibeon — the entire Joshua narrative. Seeing these acts produced faith; not seeing them produced apostasy.
8. Joshua dies at 110 — the same age as Joseph (Genesis 50:26). In the ancient Near East, particularly in Egyptian tradition, 110 was considered the ideal lifespan. The parallel between Joseph (who brought Israel into Egypt) and Joshua (who brought them into Canaan) creates a structural bookend. Joshua now receives the title eved YHWH ('servant of the LORD') that Moses carried — the succession is complete, and the era ends.
9. Timnath-Heres ('portion of the sun') appears as Timnath-Serah in Joshua 19:50 and 24:30 — the consonants of the second element are reversed (ch-r-s vs. s-r-ch). Some scholars suggest the Judges form may allude to sun worship that later developed at the site, while others view it as a simple scribal variation. The burial in his own nachalah ('inheritance') demonstrates that Joshua practiced what he preached: he took an allotment in the land he helped conquer.
10. This is the most important verse in Judges — the generational rupture that explains everything that follows. Lo yad'u et-YHWH ('they did not know the LORD') — yada ('to know') in Hebrew is not cognitive awareness but experiential, relational knowledge. This generation had not personally experienced the conquest, the Jordan crossing, or the covenant ceremonies. Their ignorance is not intellectual but experiential: they have no firsthand encounter with the God of the covenant.
10. The phrase ne'esfu el avotav ('gathered to his fathers') is the standard death formula throughout the Hebrew Bible — the metaphor implies reunion with ancestors, though the text does not elaborate on afterlife theology. The passing of the entire generation (kol ha-dor ha-hu) marks a clean break: the book operates from this point forward without the witness generation.
11. Va-ya'asu ... et ha-ra be-einei YHWH ('they did the evil in the eyes of the LORD') — this is the cycle's opening formula, and this is its first occurrence in the book. The definite article (ha-ra, 'THE evil') suggests a specific category of transgression: the covenant violation of serving other gods. It appears seven times in Judges (2:11, 3:7, 3:12, 4:1, 6:1, 10:6, 13:1), structuring the book's major narrative sections.
11. Ha-be'alim ('the Baals') — the plural indicates the multiple localized manifestations of the Canaanite storm deity Baal. Each Canaanite city had its own Baal shrine. Israel's sin is not monotheistic worship of the wrong god but polytheistic fragmentation — abandoning the one LORD for many local gods. The theological contrast is absolute: covenant unity versus cultic chaos.
12. The verse narrates the full trajectory of apostasy in a single sentence: abandoned (azav) pursued (halakh acharei) worshiped (hishtachavu) provoked (hikh'isu). Each verb deepens the betrayal. The identification of YHWH as 'the God of their fathers who brought them out of Egypt' makes the abandonment intensely personal — they are forsaking not an abstract deity but the One who liberated their ancestors.
12. Elohim acherim ('other gods') is Deuteronomy's standard phrase for prohibited deities (Deuteronomy 5:7, 6:14, 8:19, 11:28). The phrase me-elohei ha-ammim asher sevivoteihem ('from among the gods of the peoples around them') specifies that the apostasy is not abstract theology but cultural assimilation — Israel adopts the religions of its neighbors.
12. Va-yakh'isu et-YHWH ('they provoked the LORD to anger') — the verb ka'as means 'to grieve, to provoke, to vex.' God's anger in the Hebrew Bible is not arbitrary wrath but the response of a covenant partner to betrayal. It is the grief of a spouse whose partner has been unfaithful (a metaphor the prophets will develop extensively).
13. The pairing of Baal (masculine storm/fertility deity) and Ashtoreth (plural of Ashtoreth, the feminine fertility goddess) represents the complete Canaanite divine couple. Together they embody the fertility religion Israel adopted — agricultural prosperity guaranteed through ritual sex and worship of nature gods rather than through covenant faithfulness to YHWH. The text presents this as a comprehensive replacement, not a supplement: they abandoned the LORD and served others.
14. Va-yichar af YHWH ('the anger of the LORD burned') — the idiom uses the verb charah ('to burn') with af ('nostril, nose, anger'). The image is of flaring nostrils — hot breath through the nose as a physiological sign of rage. This is covenant wrath, not capricious temper.
14. Two military metaphors describe God's judgment: He 'gave them into the hand' (natan be-yad) of raiders and 'sold them' (makhar) to their enemies. The selling metaphor is striking — it implies Israel has become a commodity, transferred from one owner to another. The verb makhar appears in debt-slavery contexts (Exodus 21:7-8), suggesting Israel's sin creates a spiritual debt that results in bondage. The very thing God freed them from in Egypt — servitude to a foreign power — is now their punishment.
15. The devastating phrase yad YHWH hayetah bam le-ra'ah ('the hand of the LORD was against them for harm') reverses the conquest formula: in Joshua, God's hand was with Israel for victory; now God's hand is against Israel for disaster. The same divine power that demolished Jericho's walls now opposes Israel at every turn.
15. Ka'asher dibber ... ve-kha'asher nishba ('as He had spoken and as He had sworn') — this is a direct citation of the Deuteronomic covenant curses (Deuteronomy 28:15-68). The distress Israel experiences is not arbitrary punishment but the announced consequence of covenant violation. God told them exactly what would happen, and it happened exactly as He told them.

16. Va-yaqem YHWH shoftim ('the LORD raised up judges') — the initiative is entirely divine. Israel does not produce its own leaders; God raises them. The verb qum (hiphil — 'to raise up, to establish') emphasizes God's sovereign action: the judges are God's instruments, appointed from above, not elected from below.
16. Va-yoshi'um ('and they delivered them') — from the root y-sh-a (salvation). The judges are moshi'im (deliverers/saviors) — the same root from which yeshua ('salvation') and Yehoshua ('Joshua') derive. The theological point is clear: deliverance comes from God through human instruments, but the source is always divine.
17. The verb zanu ('they prostituted themselves, they committed harlotry') introduces the marriage/adultery metaphor for idolatry that becomes central in prophetic literature (Hosea, Jeremiah, Ezekiel). Israel's covenant with YHWH is figured as a marriage; worship of other gods is therefore zanah (sexual infidelity). The metaphor is deliberate and disturbing — it frames apostasy not as an intellectual error but as intimate betrayal.
17. Saru maher min ha-derekh ('they turned aside quickly from the way') — the 'way' (derekh) is the covenant path of obedience. The adverb maher ('quickly') underscores the speed of the decline: not a gradual drift but a rapid departure. The generation that had seen God's acts walked the derekh; the generation that had not abandoned it almost immediately.
18. Ki yinnachem YHWH min-na'aqatam ('for the LORD was moved to compassion by their groaning') — the verb nacham carries complex meaning: to comfort, to relent, to be grieved, to change one's mind. Here it describes God's visceral response to human suffering. The na'aqah ('groaning') is the same word used for Israel's groaning under Egyptian slavery (Exodus 2:24, 6:5). The parallel is explicit: God responds to groaning in Judges as He did in Egypt — with compassionate intervention.
18. The phrase kol yemei ha-shofet ('all the days of the judge') reveals the systemic limitation: deliverance lasts only as long as the deliverer lives. The shofet's authority is personal, not institutional — it cannot be transferred, inherited, or perpetuated. This built-in expiration date guarantees the cycle's repetition.
19. Ve-hishchitu me-avotam ('they acted more corruptly than their fathers') — the key word is me-avotam ('more than their fathers'). Each cycle does not merely repeat the previous one; it escalates. The decline is progressive, not cyclical in the strict sense. This is a spiral, not a circle — each revolution is worse than the last. The narrator announces this principle before the individual judge stories begin, so the reader watches for the intensification.
19. Lo hippilu ('they did not drop') — the verb nafal (hiphil, 'to let fall, to drop') means they did not release or abandon any of their corrupt practices. The image is of someone clutching something tightly, refusing to let go. The 'stubborn way' (darkam ha-qashah) uses qashah ('hard, harsh, difficult') — their chosen path is not merely different from God's but actively resistant to correction.
20. God now speaks in direct discourse, pronouncing the consequence of covenant violation. The term beriti ('my covenant') echoes verse 1 — the same covenant God declared He would never break is the covenant Israel has transgressed (avru, 'crossed over, violated'). The verb avar means literally 'to cross over' — covenant transgression in Hebrew is figured as crossing a boundary line, stepping over the limit set by the agreement.
20. The phrase ha-goy ha-zeh ('this nation') rather than 'my people' or 'the Israelites' is subtly distancing — God refers to Israel with the same term used for foreign nations. The word choice signals the relational rupture caused by their disobedience.
21. The divine declaration lo osif lehorish ('I will no longer drive out') transforms Israel's military failure into divine policy. What began as Israel's disobedience (chapter 1's catalog of 'did not drive out') now becomes God's deliberate decision. The remaining nations are no longer an accident of incomplete conquest but a purposeful instrument of testing (as verse 22 will explain).
22. Le-ma'an nassot bam et-Yisra'el ('in order to test Israel through them') — the remaining Canaanite nations become a divine testing instrument. The verb nasah ('to test, to prove') is the same word used for God's testing of Abraham at the binding of Isaac (Genesis 22:1). The test is not arbitrary but diagnostic: will this generation walk in the derekh YHWH ('way of the LORD') as the previous generation did?
22. The answer, which the reader already knows from the narrator's preview in verses 11-19, is no. The test will be failed repeatedly. But the text presents the test as genuinely open-ended — the 'whether...or not' (ha-shomrim hem ... im lo) preserves the possibility that Israel could have chosen differently.
23. Va-yannach YHWH ('the LORD left, allowed to remain') — the verb nuach means 'to rest, to settle, to leave in place.' The word choice is quietly ironic: the nations 'rest' in the land that was supposed to be Israel's place of 'rest' (the menucha of Deuteronomy 12:9). Israel's promised rest is disrupted by the nations God leaves at rest within their borders.
23. The final note — 'He had not given them into the hand of Joshua' — refers back to Joshua 13:1-7, where God told the aging Joshua that much land remained unconquered. The incomplete conquest was never merely a military shortcoming; it was, in retrospect, part of the divine plan to test subsequent generations.

Summary: The remaining nations that test Israel are listed. Othniel delivers Israel from Cushan-rishathaim of Aram, Ehud assassinates Eglon king of Moab with a concealed dagger, and Shamgar strikes down six hundred Philistines with an oxgoad.

What Makes This Remarkable: Ehud's narrative is the book's most viscerally detailed. He is left-handed (ish itter yad yemino, literally 'restricted in his right hand') — a Benjaminite, whose tribal name means 'son of the right hand.' The irony is structural. The assassination scene spares no physical detail: Eglon is so fat the sword disappears entirely, 'and the fat closed over the blade' (v. 22). The narrator's unflinching realism serves theology: God delivers through unexpected agents using unexpected methods.

Translation Friction: The word sarnei (v. 3) is rendered 'tyrants' — the locked term for Philistine rulers. The phrase parshedonah (v. 22) is a hapax legomenon (appears only once in the entire Hebrew Bible) and has been variously translated as 'the refuse came out,' 'the dagger came out at the back,' or a reference to the vestibule/porch. We chose the reading best supported by context and noted the uncertainty.

Connections: Othniel's deliverance echoes his courage in Joshua 15:16-17. The left-handed Ehud anticipates the left-handed Benjamite slingers of Judges 20:16. Shamgar's oxgoad prefigures Samson's unconventional weaponry (ch. 15, jawbone of a donkey). The Mesopotamian oppressor Cushan-rishathaim ('Cushan of double wickedness') may be a derisive nickname rather than his real name.

¹These are the nations that the LORD left in order to test Israel by them — all those Israelites who had not experienced any of the wars of Canaan — ²only so that the generations of the Israelites might learn — to teach them war, those who had not experienced it before. ³the five tyrants of the Philistines, all the Canaanites, the Sidonians, and the Hivites living in the hill country of Lebanon from Mount Baal-Hermon to Lebo-Hamath. ⁴They were there to test Israel, to determine whether they would obey the commandments of the LORD that He had commanded their fathers through Moses. ⁵The Israelites lived among the Canaanites, the Hittites, the Amorites, the Perizzites, the Hivites, and the Jebusites. ⁶They took their daughters as wives and gave their own daughters to their sons, and they served their gods. ⁷The Israelites did what was evil in the sight of the LORD. They forgot the LORD their God and served the Baals and the Asherahs. ⁸The anger of the LORD burned against Israel, and He sold them into the hand of Cushan-Rishathaim king of Aram-Naharaim. The Israelites served Cushan-Rishathaim for eight years. ⁹The Israelites cried out to the LORD, and the LORD raised up a deliverer for the Israelites who saved them — Othniel son of Kenaz, Caleb's younger brother. ¹⁰The Spirit of the LORD came upon him, and he judged Israel. He went out to war, and the LORD gave Cushan-Rishathaim king of Aram into his hand. His hand prevailed over Cushan-Rishathaim. ¹¹The land had rest for forty years. Then Othniel son of Kenaz died. ¹²The Israelites again did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD strengthened Eglon king of Moab against Israel, because they had done what was evil in the sight of the LORD. ¹³He gathered the Ammonites and the Amalekites to himself, marched out, and struck Israel. They seized the City of Palms. ¹⁴The Israelites served Eglon king of Moab for eighteen years. ¹⁵The Israelites cried out to the LORD, and the LORD raised up a deliverer for them — Ehud son of Gera, a Benjaminite, a man restricted in his right hand. The Israelites sent tribute to Eglon king of Moab through him. ¹⁶Ehud made himself a short sword with two edges, a gomel in length, and strapped it under his garment on his right thigh. ¹⁷He presented the tribute to Eglon king of Moab. Now Eglon was a very fat man. ¹⁸When he had finished presenting the tribute, he dismissed the people who had carried the tribute. ¹⁹But he himself turned back from the carved stones near Gilgal and said, "I have a secret message for you, O king." The king said, "Silence!" And all his attendants withdrew from his presence. ²⁰Ehud approached him as he sat alone in his cool upper room. Ehud said, "I have a message from God for you." And Eglon rose from his seat. ²¹Ehud reached with his left hand, drew the sword from his right thigh, and thrust it into Eglon's belly. ²²Even the hilt went in after the blade, and the fat closed over the blade — for he did not withdraw the sword from his belly — and it came out at the back. ²³Ehud went out through the vestibule, shut the doors of the upper room behind him, and locked them. ²⁴After he had left, the servants came and saw that the doors of the upper room were locked. They said, "He must be relieving himself in the cool chamber." ²⁵They waited until they were embarrassed, but he still did not open the doors of the upper room. So they took the key, opened them — and there was their lord, fallen to the ground, dead. ²⁶While they delayed, Ehud escaped. He passed the carved stones and reached safety at Seirah. ²⁷When he arrived, he blew the shofar in the hill country of Ephraim. The Israelites went down with him from the hill country, with him at their head. ²⁸He said to them, "Follow me, for the LORD has given your enemies the Moabites into your hand." They followed him and seized the fords of the Jordan against Moab, allowing no one to cross. ²⁹They struck down about ten thousand Moabites at that time — all of them strong, all of them warriors. Not a single man escaped. ³⁰Moab was subdued that day under the hand of Israel, and the land had rest for eighty years. ³¹After him came Shamgar son of Anath, who struck down six hundred Philistines with an ox goad. He too delivered Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator provides a second rationale for the remaining nations: not only a spiritual test (2:22) but also military training for a generation that had not experienced warfare. The phrase lo yad'u ('had not known/experienced') uses the same verb as 2:10 — the generational knowledge gap is both theological (they did not know the LORD) and practical (they did not know war). Both forms of inexperience prove fatal.
2. Le-lamdam milchamah ('to teach them war') — the divine purpose is pedagogical. The remaining nations serve as a training ground. The irony is that the best teacher of warfare would have been complete obedience in the first generation — the conquest itself. Because Israel failed to learn through faithful conquest, they must now learn through ongoing conflict with enemies that should not have remained.
3. Sarnei Felisitim ('rulers of the Philistines') — the term seren (plural sarnei) is a uniquely Philistine title, not used for any other people group. It is likely a loanword from the Philistines' Aegean origin (possibly related to Greek tyrannos). The five Philistine city-states — Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath — each had its own seren. Their continued presence on the coastal plain will dominate the Samson narrative and the early monarchy.
3. Har Ba'al Chermon ('Mount Baal-Hermon') — the Baal prefix indicates a Canaanite cultic site on Mount Hermon. The geographic range described (from Hermon in the north to Lebo-Hamath, the entry to the Hamath region in modern Syria) defines the northern extent of the unconquered territory.
4. The section closes by returning to the spiritual test announced in 2:22. The phrase be-yad Mosheh ('through the hand of Moses') — literally 'by the hand of Moses' — is a standard expression for Mosaic mediation of divine law. The commandments in view are specifically Deuteronomy's requirements regarding the Canaanite populations and their worship.
5. The six-nation list echoes the traditional Canaanite peoples formula (cf. Exodus 3:8, 3:17, Deuteronomy 7:1). The phrasing is significant: Israel lives 'among' (be-qerev) these nations, not the reverse. As with Asher in 1:32, Israel is the minority presence in a Canaanite-dominated landscape. The conquest has not merely stalled — it has effectively reversed.
6. The three-step progression is precise: intermarriage (took/gave daughters), then idolatry (served their gods). This is exactly the sequence Deuteronomy 7:3-4 warned about: 'Do not intermarry with them... for they will turn your sons away from following me to serve other gods.' The prohibition was not ethnic prejudice but theological protection — intermarriage with Canaanites meant absorption into Canaanite religion. The text presents this as an inevitable cause-and-effect chain, not as an isolated moral failure.
7. The cycle begins for the first time in narrative form. The verb shakhechu ('they forgot') adds a dimension beyond active rebellion — forgetting implies the complete dissolution of covenant memory. The generation that 'did not know the LORD' (2:10) now actively forgets Him. Knowledge has become non-knowledge; memory has become oblivion.
7. Ha-Asherot ('the Asherahs') — wooden cult poles or stylized trees representing the Canaanite goddess Asherah, consort of El (and sometimes paired with Baal). The KJV renders this as 'groves,' which obscures the cultic object. An Asherah was a carved or living sacred pole set up beside an altar. Deuteronomy 16:21 explicitly prohibits them beside YHWH's altar.
8. Cushan-Rishathaim — the name appears to mean 'Cushan of double wickedness' (from rishah, 'wickedness,' with the dual ending -atayim). Most scholars consider this a pejorative Hebrew distortion of the king's actual name — the narrator mocks the oppressor by making his name an epithet of evil. The double form (-atayim) intensifies: not merely wicked but doubly wicked.
8. Aram Naharayim ('Aram of the two rivers') is the region between the Tigris and Euphrates — upper Mesopotamia. An oppressor from this distance is unusual in the Judges period, leading some scholars to emend to 'Edom' (alef-dalet-mem instead of alef-reshe-mem). However, the MT reading is retained as the received text.
8. Va-yimkerem ('He sold them') — the selling metaphor from 2:14 is now enacted. Israel's servitude to a foreign king is God's judicial act, not merely a military outcome.
9. Va-yiz'qu ('they cried out') — the cry of distress. The verb za'aq is the standard cry of the oppressed to God throughout the Hebrew Bible (Exodus 2:23, 3:7). It is not necessarily repentance — it is the raw cry of pain. God responds to the cry regardless of the crier's spiritual state, because the compassion described in 2:18 is triggered by suffering, not by merit.

9. Va-yaqem YHWH moshia ('the LORD raised up a deliverer') — Othniel is called moshia, from the root y-sh-a (salvation). He is the first formally narrated judge and serves as the ideal template: the cycle operates perfectly in his case — no character flaws noted, no complications, pure divine deliverance through a faithful instrument.
10. Ruach YHWH ('the Spirit of the LORD') — this is the first appearance of the Spirit empowerment formula in Judges. The Spirit 'came upon him' (hayetah alav) — the preposition al ('upon') indicates the Spirit descends on the judge from above, a temporary endowment for a specific task. Later judges will receive the Spirit with different verbs — 'clothed' (lavash, Gideon in 6:34) and 'rushed upon' (tsalach, Samson in 14:6) — each suggesting different modes of empowerment.
10. The Othniel narrative is deliberately spare — five verses from sin to deliverance. No personal drama, no character development, no dialogue. He is the template: Spirit-empowered, militarily victorious, divinely vindicated. Every subsequent judge will deviate from this template in increasingly dramatic ways.
11. Va-tishqot ha-aretz ('the land had rest') — the verb shaqat means 'to be quiet, to be at rest, to be undisturbed.' This is the goal-state of each cycle: shalom in the form of military peace. The 'forty years' is a round number conventionally representing a generation in Hebrew reckoning (cf. the wilderness generation's forty years). The cycle closes cleanly: deliverance rest death (implied) next cycle begins.
11. The terse final sentence — 'Othniel son of Kenaz died' — triggers the cycle's restart. The judge dies, and with him dies the stability he provided. The pattern announced in 2:18-19 is now enacted for the first time.
12. The second cycle begins with the formula va-yosifu ... la'asot ha-ra ('they again did the evil'). The verb yasaf ('to add, to do again') signals repetition — the cycle is explicitly acknowledged as repeating, not as a new event.
12. Va-ychazzeq YHWH et Eglon ('the LORD strengthened Eglon') — the verb chazaq (piel, 'to strengthen, to make strong') presents God as the active agent in Israel's oppression. YHWH does not merely permit Eglon's rise — He empowers it. Eglon is God's instrument of judgment, as Assyria will later be called God's 'rod of anger' (Isaiah 10:5). The name Eglon likely derives from egel ('calf') — a bovine name for the 'very fat man' of verse 17.
13. Eglon assembles a three-nation coalition: Moab, Ammon, and Amalek — all traditional enemies of Israel from the wilderness period. The Ammonites were kinsmen of Moab (both descended from Lot, Genesis 19:36-38). The Amalekites were Israel's perennial enemies (Exodus 17:8-16, Deuteronomy 25:17-19).
13. Ir ha-Temarim ('City of Palms') is Jericho (cf. 1:16). The seizure of Jericho reverses Joshua's greatest victory — the first city conquered in the promised land is now occupied by a foreign king. The narrative reversal is devastating: what Joshua won, Eglon takes.
14. Eighteen years of servitude — more than double the eight years under Cushan-Rishathaim. The escalation pattern noted in 2:19 ('more corruptly than their fathers') corresponds to longer periods of oppression. The verb avad ('served') carries the double meaning of political subjection and the involuntary service of slavery — the same verb used for Israel's servitude in Egypt.
15. The left-hand advantage is tactical: a left-handed man could conceal a weapon on his right thigh, where guards searching for weapons on the conventional left side would miss it. The physical trait is not incidental but integral to the deliverance plan.
15. Minchah ('tribute/gift') — the same word used for the grain offering in Leviticus 2. Israel's tribute to Eglon is an act of vassalage — they bring gifts to their overlord. The sacral overtones of the word may be intentional: Israel offers to a foreign king what should be offered to God.
16. The weapon is described with precision: cherev ('sword/dagger'), shenei feyot ('two edges/mouths' — double-edged), gomed orkhah ('a gomed in length'). The term gomed is a hapax legomenon — it appears only here in the entire Hebrew Bible. It likely refers to a short cubit or forearm-length (approximately 12-15 inches / 30-38 cm), making this a concealable dagger rather than a full sword.
16. The right thigh (yerekh yemino) is the unconventional location — warriors typically wore swords on the left hip for right-hand cross-draw. Ehud's left-handedness allows him to hide the weapon where it would not be expected and draw it with his strong hand. Every physical detail in this narrative serves the assassination plan.
17. The narrator's description — ish bari me'od ('a very fat man') — is not incidental characterization. The physical detail prepares for the graphic assassination in verses 21-22, where the fatness becomes narratively operative (the blade disappears into the flesh). The adjective bari ('fat, well-fed, robust') can be positive in agricultural contexts (fat livestock = prosperity), but here it paints Eglon as a man gorged on Israel's tribute — growing fat on what he has extracted from God's people.
18. Ehud's strategic thinking emerges: he sends away the tribute-bearers first, ensuring no witnesses and no companions who might lose nerve. The deliberate pacing — present the tribute publicly, dismiss the entourage, then return alone — reveals careful premeditation. The narrator builds suspense through procedural detail.
19. Ha-pesilim ('the carved stones/images') near Gilgal — the term pesil usually means 'carved idol' (cf. Deuteronomy 7:5, 7:25). If these are indeed idols, their location near Gilgal — the sacred site of covenant renewal (Joshua 5) — is deeply ironic. Some scholars interpret pesilim here as 'quarries' (carved rock formations), but the idolatrous reading fits the theological environment of Judges.

19. Devar seter li eleikha ('I have a secret word/message for you') — Ehud's ruse exploits Eglon's curiosity. A secret message from a tribute-bearer could be intelligence about Israelite dissent, offers of alliance, or confidential information. The king's eagerness — ordering silence (has!) and dismissing all attendants — plays directly into Ehud's plan. Eglon's vanity becomes his vulnerability.
20. Aliyyat ha-meqerah ('the cool upper room') — an upper-story chamber designed for ventilation and privacy. Royal residences in the ancient Near East often had elevated private chambers for the king's personal use. The detail 'which he had for himself alone' (lo levaddo) confirms the isolation Ehud needs.
20. Devar Elohim li eleikha ('I have a message from God for you') — Ehud's second statement escalates from 'secret message' (v. 19) to 'message from God.' Whether Ehud is deceiving Eglon or speaking literally (the assassination IS God's message to the oppressor) is left ambiguous. Eglon's response — rising from his seat — may reflect either reverence for a divine oracle or simple courtesy for what he expects to be important revelation.
20. Va-yaqom me'al ha-kiseh ('he rose from his seat') — standing to receive a divine message would be an act of deference that exposes Eglon's midsection. Every detail converges toward the assassination.
21. The left-hand draw from the right thigh — the detail established in verses 15-16 now pays off narratively. The verb taq'ah ('he thrust, he drove') is forceful and sudden. The betno ('his belly') receives the blade. The narrator slows down time for the assassination, describing each physical movement with surgical precision. This is not gratuitous — it demonstrates that every detail of Ehud's preparation was purposeful.
22. The Hebrew is graphically specific: gam ha-nitsav achar ha-lahav ('even the hilt after the blade') — the entire weapon, handle and all, disappears into Eglon's flesh. Va-yisgor ha-chelev be'ad ha-lahav ('the fat closed over the blade') — Eglon's obesity, introduced in verse 17, now has narrative function. The word chelev ('fat') is the same term used for the sacrificial fat offered to God in Leviticus 3:3-5 — a darkly ironic echo.
22. Va-yetse ha-parshedonah — this final clause is the most debated in the chapter. Parshedonah is a hapax legomenon (appears only here). Possible meanings include: (1) excrement ('the dung came out' — a reference to Eglon's bowels releasing), (2) the blade emerged from his back ('it came out at the back'), (3) Ehud went out through a back passage or anteroom. The scatological reading (option 1) connects to the servants' assumption in verse 24 that Eglon is relieving himself. The rendering preserves the ambiguity while favoring the spatial reading.
23. Ha-misderonah ('the vestibule/porch/colonnade') — another rare word whose exact architectural referent is debated. It likely describes a covered passage or anteroom between the upper chamber and the exterior. Ehud's escape route through the vestibule rather than the main entrance avoids the servants waiting outside.
23. The detail of locking the doors (na'al, 'he bolted/locked') buys Ehud time — the servants will hesitate to disturb what they assume is the king's private moment (verse 24). Ehud's plan accounts for every variable: the weapon, the isolation, the escape route, and the delay.
24. Mesikh hu et raglav ('he is covering his feet') — a euphemism for defecation. The idiom 'covering the feet' (from the position of the garment during squatting) appears also in 1 Samuel 24:3, where Saul enters a cave to 'cover his feet.' The servants' assumption — that the locked door means the king is using the chamber as a latrine — is both plausible (private upper rooms served multiple functions) and narratively essential: it delays their discovery of the assassination and extends Ehud's escape window.
25. Va-yachilu ad bosh ('they waited until embarrassment') — the servants' dilemma is psychologically precise: they waited so long that their hesitation itself became embarrassing. The verb chul ('to wait, to writhe, to be in anguish') suggests not passive waiting but anxious anticipation. The word bosh ('shame, embarrassment') reveals their predicament — entering the king's private chamber uninvited risks their positions, but the extended silence demands action.
25. The discovery scene is narrated with devastating economy: ve-hinne adoneihem nofel artsah met ('and look — their lord, fallen to the ground, dead'). The hinneh ('look!') forces the reader to see what the servants see — their master's corpse.
26. The narrator returns to Ehud's perspective: ad hitmahmeham ('while they delayed') — their embarrassment was his escape window. The time the servants spent agonizing over whether to enter was exactly the time Ehud needed. He passes the pesilim (the same 'carved stones/images' of verse 19, marking the route) and reaches Se'irah, a location in the hill country of Ephraim whose exact site is unknown.
27. The shofar blast is the traditional call to arms — the ram's horn sound that summons the militia. Ehud's individual assassination becomes the catalyst for a national uprising. His position 'at their head' (lifneihem, 'before them') establishes him as the military leader. The transition from lone assassin to general demonstrates how the shofet role encompasses both covert action and public leadership.
28. Ehud's speech uses the divine-gift formula: natan YHWH et oyvekhem be-yedkhem ('the LORD has given your enemies into your hand'). The same language that authorized Joshua's conquest now authorizes Ehud's revolt. The strategy is sound: seizing the fords of the Jordan (ma'aberot ha-Yarden) cuts off the Moabite retreat route. Any Moabite soldiers west of the Jordan are now trapped — they cannot return home.
29. The description of the fallen — kol shamen ve-khol ish chayil ('all fat/strong and all men of valor') — uses shamen ('fat, robust, strong'), connecting back to the description of their king Eglon as bari ('fat'). The echo is not coincidental: the fat king and his fat warriors are both cut down. The term ish chayil ('man of valor/capable warrior') indicates these were Moab's elite troops, not militia. The totality of the defeat — lo nimlat ish ('not a man escaped') — mirrors the totality of the fords blockade.
30. Va-tikkana Moav ('Moab was subdued/humbled') — the verb kana means 'to be brought low, to be humbled, to submit.' The subjugation reverses the power relationship: where Israel served Moab for eighteen years, now Moab is under Israel's hand.

30. Eighty years of rest — the longest peace period in Judges, double the standard forty-year generation. This extended peace may reflect the thoroughness of Ehud's victory or, more likely, is a literary doubling of the conventional generation-length to signal exceptional stability.
31. Shamgar receives the briefest treatment of any deliverer — a single verse, no cycle framework, no Spirit endowment. His name is non-Israelite (possibly Hurrian), and his patronymic 'son of Anath' (ben Anat) connects him to the Canaanite warrior goddess Anath — either as a place name (Beth-Anath, cf. 1:33) or as a personal name reflecting Canaanite cultural influence. The use of a non-Israelite deliverer hints at the theological point that God can use anyone.
31. Malmad ha-baqar ('ox goad') — a long wooden prod with a metal tip used to drive cattle. As a weapon it is improvised, not military — Shamgar fights with a farming implement. This connects him to the later 'farmer-warriors' of Judges and anticipates the Philistine practice of denying Israel access to metalworking (1 Samuel 13:19-22).
31. Va-yosha gam hu et-Yisra'el ('he too delivered Israel') — the verb yosha (from y-sh-a) explicitly labels Shamgar a deliverer despite his outsider origins and unconventional methods. Deliverance in Judges comes through increasingly unexpected channels.

Summary: Deborah the prophet judges Israel. She summons Barak to fight Sisera, commander of Jabin of Hazor's army. Barak refuses to go without her. Sisera's nine hundred iron chariots are defeated, and Sisera flees to the tent of Jael, who kills him with a tent peg through his temple.

What Makes This Remarkable: The chapter is dominated by women: Deborah commands, Jael executes, and the glory Barak forfeited passes 'into the hand of a woman' (v. 9). The phrase beyad ishah is deliberately ambiguous — Barak hears it as Deborah, but the reader discovers it means Jael. Sisera's nine hundred iron chariots (v. 3) represent overwhelming technological superiority — and they become useless when God routes the army (v. 15, vayyaham, 'threw into panic'), possibly through the rainstorm described in chapter 5.

Translation Friction: The verb vayyaham (v. 15, 'threw into confusion/panic') is the same word used for God's intervention at the Red Sea (Exodus 14:24). We rendered it 'threw into panic' to preserve the divine-warrior theology. Jael's action (v. 21) — driving a tent peg through a sleeping man's temple — raises ethical questions the narrator does not address. We let the text stand without moral commentary, as the Hebrew does.

Connections: Jabin of Hazor echoes the Hazor king defeated in Joshua 11 — whether this is the same dynasty or a later one is debated. The divine-warrior intervention echoes the Red Sea (Exodus 14), the Jordan crossing (Joshua 3), and anticipates Gideon's victory (ch. 7). Jael is celebrated as 'most blessed of women' in 5:24 — the same phrase applied to Mary in Luke 1:42.

¹The Israelites again did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, after Ehud had died. ²The LORD sold them into the hand of Jabin king of Canaan, who reigned in Hazor. The commander of his army was Sisera, who lived in Harosheth-Hagoiim. ³The Israelites cried out to the LORD, for Sisera had nine hundred iron chariots and had harshly oppressed the Israelites for twenty years. ⁴Now Deborah, a prophetess, the wife of Lappidoth — she was judging Israel at that time. ⁵She used to sit under the Palm of Deborah, between Ramah and Bethel in the hill country of Ephraim, and the Israelites would come up to her for judgment. ⁶She sent for Barak son of Abinoam from Kedesh in Naphtali and said to him, "Has not the LORD, the God of Israel, commanded: 'Go, deploy on Mount Tabor, and take with you ten thousand men from the descendants of Naphtali and Zebulun'? ⁷I will draw Sisera, the commander of Jabin's army, with his chariots and his troops, to you at the Wadi Kishon, and I will give him into your hand.'" ⁸Barak said to her, "If you go with me, I will go. But if you will not go with me, I will not go." ⁹She said, "I will certainly go with you. However, there will be no glory for you on the road you are taking, for the LORD will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman." Then Deborah arose and went with Barak to Kedesh. ¹⁰Barak summoned Zebulun and Naphtali to Kedesh, and ten thousand men went up at his command. Deborah went up with him. ¹¹Now Heber the Kenite had separated from the Kenites — the descendants of Hobab, Moses's father-in-law — and had pitched his tent as far as the oak at Zaanannim, which is near Kedesh. ¹²When Sisera was told that Barak son of Abinoam had gone up to Mount Tabor, ¹³Sisera summoned all his chariots — nine hundred iron chariots — and all the troops who were with him, from Harosheth-Hagoiim to the Wadi Kishon. ¹⁴Deborah said to Barak, "Rise! For this is the day the LORD has given Sisera into your hand. Has not the LORD gone out before you?" So Barak went down from Mount Tabor with ten thousand men following him. ¹⁵The LORD threw Sisera and all his chariots and all his army into confusion before Barak, striking them with the edge of the sword. Sisera leaped from his chariot and fled on foot. ¹⁶Barak pursued the chariots and the army as far as Harosheth-Hagoiim, and Sisera's entire army fell by the edge of the sword. Not a single man remained. ¹⁷Meanwhile, Sisera fled on foot to the tent of Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite, for there was peace between Jabin king of Hazor and the household of Heber the Kenite. ¹⁸Jael went out to meet Sisera and said to him, "Turn aside, my lord! Turn aside to me — do not be afraid." He turned aside to her into the tent, and she covered him with a rug. ¹⁹He said to her, "Please give me a little water to drink, for I am thirsty." She opened a skin of milk, gave him a drink, and covered him again. ²⁰He said to her, "Stand at the entrance of the tent. If anyone comes and asks you, 'Is there a man here?' say, 'No.'" ²¹Jael, the wife of Heber, took a tent peg, gripped a mallet in her hand, and went to him quietly. She drove the tent peg through his temple and pinned it to the ground. He was sound asleep and exhausted. He died. ²²Just then, Barak came in pursuit of Sisera. Jael went out to meet him and said, "Come, and I will show you the man you are looking for." He went in with her, and there was Sisera, fallen dead, with the tent peg through his temple. ²³On that day God subdued Jabin king of Canaan before the Israelites. ²⁴The hand of the Israelites pressed harder and harder against Jabin king of Canaan, until they had destroyed Jabin king of Canaan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The third cycle opens with the standard formula va-yosifu ... la'asot ha-ra ('they again did the evil'). The causal link is explicit: ve-Ehud met ('and Ehud had died'). The judge's death triggers the cycle's restart — as the narrator programmatically stated in 2:19. The pattern is now firmly established, and the reader recognizes it.
2. Jabin melekh Kena'an ('Jabin king of Canaan') — a Jabin king of Hazor appears also in Joshua 11:1, where Joshua burned Hazor. Either this is a different king with the same dynastic name (Jabin may be a title, like 'Pharaoh') or the city was rebuilt after Joshua's destruction. Hazor was the largest city in Canaan — its destruction and resurgence illustrate the incomplete conquest theme.
2. Sisera (sar tseva'o, 'commander of his army') is the actual military power — Jabin is the political authority, but Sisera commands the iron chariots that terrify Israel. Harosheth-Hagoiim ('woodlands of the nations') was likely a site in the western Jezreel Valley, controlling the strategic pass between the coast and the central valleys.
3. Tesha me'ot rekhev barzel ('nine hundred iron chariots') — the number represents overwhelming military superiority. Iron chariots were the decisive weapon of lowland warfare, and Israel's hill-country infantry had no counter (cf. 1:19, where iron chariots prevented Judah from taking the valley). The twenty-year oppression is the longest yet — eight under Cushan-Rishathaim, eighteen under Eglon, now twenty under Jabin/Sisera.
3. The verb lachat ('to press, to oppress, to squeeze') combined with be-chozqah ('forcefully, harshly') intensifies the suffering. The same verb describes Egypt's oppression of Israel (Exodus 3:9).
4. Deborah holds three titles simultaneously: ishah nevi'ah ('a woman, a prophetess'), eshet Lappidot ('wife of Lappidoth'), and shofetah et-Yisra'el ('she was judging Israel'). She is the only judge who is also explicitly called a prophet, and the only one whose judicial authority precedes the military crisis. All other judges are raised up in response to oppression; Deborah is already in place.
4. The name Lappidot means 'torches' or 'flames.' Some scholars read eshet Lappidot not as 'wife of Lappidoth' (a man's name) but as 'woman of torches' — a characterization of Deborah herself as fiery or illuminating. The ambiguity is noted; the traditional reading ('wife of') is retained.
4. The participle shofetah ('she was judging') is feminine — the narrator uses the grammatically correct form without comment, treating Deborah's gender as a fact, not an anomaly. The text makes no apology for a woman in this role.
5. Tomer Devorah ('Palm of Deborah') — the palm tree is named for her, suggesting her judicial seat was well-known. The location between Ramah and Bethel places her near the ancient sanctuary sites of central Ephraim. The practice of sitting under a specific tree for judgment evokes the patriarchal model (Abraham at Mamre's oaks, Genesis 18:1) and anticipates Samuel's circuit-judging (1 Samuel 7:16-17).
5. La-mishpat ('for judgment') — Deborah's judicial function is genuine legal arbitration, not merely the military deliverance role. She is the only judge in the book who actually judges in the courtroom sense — hearing cases and rendering verdicts. This distinguishes her from the other shofetim, who are primarily military deliverers.
6. Deborah speaks as a prophet relaying divine command — ha-lo tsivvah YHWH ('Has not the LORD commanded?'). The rhetorical question format implies Barak already knows the command; Deborah is reminding him, not informing him. Her authority is prophetic — she transmits God's battle plan, including the specific location (Mount Tabor, overlooking the Jezreel Valley), the troop count (ten thousand), and the tribal composition (Naphtali and Zebulun, the northern tribes nearest Sisera's base).

6. The verb mashakh ('draw, deploy, march') has military connotations — it suggests a deliberate, ordered movement of troops to a strategic position. Mount Tabor's elevation (approximately 1,900 feet) gave infantry an advantage over chariots, which could not operate on the steep, forested slopes.
7. God speaks through Deborah using the first person: u-mashakhti ('I will draw') and u-netattihu ('I will give him'). The divine strategy is to lure Sisera's chariots into the Kishon Valley, where the Wadi Kishon (nachal Qishon) flows. As the Song of Deborah will reveal (5:21), the wadi flooded, turning the valley into a chariot-destroying quagmire. God weaponizes the terrain against the military technology that terrifies Israel.
7. The promise untattihu be-yadekha ('I will give him into your hand') is the standard divine victory formula. The plan is God's, the execution is Barak's, and the outcome is guaranteed before the battle begins.
8. Barak's conditional refusal — im telkhi immi ve-halakhti ('if you go with me, I will go') — is the first sign of a less-than-ideal deliverer. Othniel needed no such condition; Ehud acted alone. Barak requires the prophet's physical presence as a guarantee of divine presence. Whether this reflects lack of faith, military pragmatism (wanting the prophetic oracle accessible in real-time), or personal deference to Deborah is debated. The narrator does not condemn Barak explicitly, but the consequence in verse 9 suggests the condition comes at a cost.
9. Deborah's prophecy — be-yad ishah yimkor YHWH et Sisera ('the LORD will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman') — is deliberately ambiguous at this point. The reader assumes she means herself, but the narrative will redirect: it is Jael, not Deborah, who kills Sisera. The verb makhar ('to sell') echoes 2:14 and 3:8, where God 'sold' Israel to oppressors; now God 'sells' the oppressor to a woman.
9. Lo tiyeh tif'artkha ('there will be no glory for you') — tiferet means 'glory, honor, beauty, adornment.' Barak's conditional obedience costs him the honor of the kill. The military victory remains his, but the decisive act — the death of the enemy commander — will belong to someone else. The narrative logic is clear: hesitant faith still receives deliverance but not full credit.
10. Va-yaz'eq Baraq ('Barak summoned') — the verb za'aq means 'to cry out, to summon.' It is the same verb used for Israel's cry to God in the distress formula (3:9, 3:15). Here Barak 'cries out' to the tribes as God 'cries out' are cried out to God — the deliverer mediates between the divine command and the tribal response.
10. Be-raglav ('at his feet') — an idiom meaning 'under his command, following his lead.' The ten thousand comply with the number specified in Deborah's oracle (verse 6). The human response matches the divine plan exactly.
11. This seemingly digressive genealogical note is narratively essential — it positions Heber's tent (and therefore Jael's tent) near the battlefield. The Kenites were allied with Israel through the Moses connection (cf. 1:16), but Heber has 'separated' (nifrad) from the main clan. His isolation near Kedesh — close to Jabin's territory — will make his tent a plausible refuge for a fleeing Sisera.
11. Elon be-Tsa'ananim ('the oak at Za'ananim') is a landmark that fixes the location. The term elon ('great tree, oak, terebinth') marks a notable tree — the ancient Near Eastern equivalent of a named geographic feature.
12. Intelligence reaches Sisera that Barak has taken the high ground at Tabor. From Sisera's perspective, this is an opportunity — an Israelite force concentrated on a single mountaintop is an army that can be pinned down and starved out, or destroyed when it descends to the plain where his chariots dominate. He does not know he is being drawn (mashakh, verse 7) into a divine trap.
13. Sisera deploys his full force to the Kishon Valley — exactly where Deborah's prophecy said he would be drawn (verse 7). The narrator creates dramatic irony: the reader knows this is God's trap; Sisera thinks it is his tactical advantage. The nine hundred chariots, repeated from verse 3, emphasize the overwhelming odds that God will overturn.
14. Deborah gives the battle command — Qum! ('Rise!') — speaking as the prophetic voice of God on the battlefield. Her question ha-lo YHWH yatsa lefanekha ('Has not the LORD gone out before you?') uses the military idiom of God 'going out before' the army (cf. Deuteronomy 20:4, 2 Samuel 5:24). God leads the charge; Israel follows.
14. Barak descends from Mount Tabor — the terrain advantage is abandoned in faith. Infantry charging downhill into a chariot force on level ground would normally be suicidal. The act is either extreme faith or prophetic obedience — either way, it requires trusting the divine guarantee over military logic.
15. Va-yaham YHWH ('the LORD threw into confusion/routed') — the verb hamam is the divine-panic verb used for God's supernatural intervention in battle (cf. Exodus 14:24 at the Red Sea, Joshua 10:10 at Gibeon, 1 Samuel 7:10 against the Philistines). The panic is divine in origin — it is not Barak's tactical skill but God's intervention that breaks Sisera's force.
15. The Song of Deborah (5:21) reveals what the prose account leaves implicit: the Wadi Kishon flooded, turning the valley into mud that immobilized the iron chariots. The chariots — the weapon that terrorized Israel for twenty years — become death traps in the sudden torrent. Sisera's dismount (va-yered me'al ha-merkavah, 'he descended from the chariot') and flight on foot (va-yanas be-raglav) is the ultimate reversal: the chariot commander runs like a foot soldier.
16. The pursuit extends to Sisera's base at Harosheth-Hagoiim — the complete destruction of his military force. Lo nish'ar ad echad ('not one remained') is the formula of total annihilation, matching the completeness of Ehud's victory at the Jordan fords (3:29). The chariot force that seemed invincible is obliterated.
17. Sisera's flight to Jael's tent makes strategic sense: shalom ('peace') existed between Jabin and Heber's household. Sisera expects shelter from an ally. The note about Heber's separation from the other Kenites (verse 11) now acquires its full significance — Heber has aligned with Canaan, not Israel. Sisera relies on this alliance when he enters Jael's tent.

17. The mention of shalom here is laden with irony — the 'peace' Sisera seeks in Jael's tent will become his death. The word shalom, which should mean wholeness and well-being, is about to be weaponized.
18. Jael's hospitality language — surah adoni surah elai al tira ('turn aside, my lord, turn aside to me, do not fear') — is the language of sanctuary and protection. She addresses him as adoni ('my lord'), offering deference and safety. The repeated imperative (surah, surah) is insistent, welcoming. Every word communicates safety. Every word is deception.
18. Va-tekhasehu ba-semikha ('she covered him with a rug/blanket') — the act of covering is a hospitality gesture (warmth, concealment from pursuers) that will be weaponized: the covering that protects him also prevents him from seeing the killing blow. The semikha is a thick covering or rug — the exact item is uncertain but its function is clear.
19. Sisera asks for water; Jael gives him milk (chalav, likely curdled goat's milk or yogurt). The upgrade from water to milk is a hospitality excess — she offers more than requested, deepening his sense of safety and her role as gracious host. The milk may also have a sedative effect — warm curdled milk induces drowsiness, and Sisera is already exhausted from battle and flight.
19. Va-tekhasehu ('she covered him') — again. The covering is repeated for emphasis: Sisera is wrapped, concealed, and lulled. Each act of apparent care moves him closer to vulnerability.
20. Sisera gives orders to Jael — he assumes the host-guest power dynamic favors him as the warrior lord. The request to stand guard and lie for him further embeds him in her hospitality: he trusts her not only for shelter and sustenance but for active protection. His vulnerability is now complete. The irony is that he asks her to deny his presence — and by killing him, she will make the denial true.
21. The killing is described with deliberate, almost clinical precision: yeted ha-ohel ('tent peg'), maqquevet ('mallet/hammer'), ba-la'at ('quietly, stealthily'), be-raqqato ('through his temple'). The raqqah is the temple — the thinnest part of the skull. The verb titsna ch ('she drove/sank it') is forceful; va-titsnach ba-aretz ('it sank into the ground') means the peg went through his skull and into the earth beneath him.
21. Jael's weapon choice is significant: the tent peg and mallet were women's tools in nomadic culture — it was women who set up and took down the tents. She kills with the implements of her daily domestic life. The warrior who fled a battlefield is destroyed by a homemaker's equipment.
21. The narrative holds its judgment: no divine commentary, no angelic approval, no prophetic sanction. Deborah's Song (5:24-27) will celebrate Jael, but the prose account simply reports what happened. The moral complexity — betrayal of hospitality laws, killing a sleeping man, violation of the guest-host covenant — is left for the reader to process.
22. Deborah's prophecy from verse 9 is fulfilled: be-yad ishah yimkor YHWH et Sisera ('the LORD will sell Sisera into the hand of a woman'). Barak arrives to find his quarry already dead — the glory of the kill belongs to Jael. The repetition of the tent peg image (ve-ha-yated be-raqqato, 'the peg in his temple') forces the reader to see the gruesome scene through Barak's eyes.
22. Jael's invitation to Barak — lekh ve-ar'ekka ('come and I will show you') — mirrors her invitation to Sisera in verse 18 (surah elai, 'turn aside to me'). She meets both men with the same welcoming initiative, but the outcomes could not be more different.
23. Va-yakhna Elohim ('God subdued') — the narrator uses Elohim rather than YHWH here, broadening the statement from covenant-specific to universal. The verb kana ('to subdue, to humble') marks the reversal: the oppressor who lorded over Israel for twenty years is now brought low. Note that Jabin the political authority is subdued — Sisera the military commander is dead. Both power structures collapse simultaneously.
24. Va-telekh yad Bnei-Yisra'el halokh ve-qashah ('the hand of the Israelites went, going and hardening') — the infinitive absolute construction (halokh ve-qashah) conveys continuous intensification. Israel's power grew progressively until Jabin was completely destroyed (hikhritu, 'they cut off'). The chapter ends not with a peace formula (that comes in 5:31) but with the complete elimination of the Canaanite threat — the political authority that oppressed Israel is terminated.

Summary: The Song of Deborah and Barak celebrates the victory over Sisera in some of the oldest poetry in the Hebrew Bible. The song names tribes who fought and shames those who stayed home, culminating in Jael's killing of Sisera and his mother's agonized vigil at the window.

*What Makes This Remarkable: The poem's most devastating literary move is its ending: it cuts from Jael's tent to Sisera's mother peering through the window lattice, wondering why her son's chariot is late. Her ladies reassure her — 'surely they are dividing the spoil, a womb or two for each man' (v. 30). The Hebrew word for 'womb' (racham) is used for 'girl' as spoil — reducing women to body parts. The dramatic irony is total: while the mother imagines her son victorious over women, he lies dead at a woman's feet.*

Translation Friction: This chapter contains some of the most difficult Hebrew in the entire Bible. Verse 2 (bifro'a pera'ot) has been translated as 'when leaders led,' 'when hair was worn long,' 'when warriors let hair loose,' and 'when anarchy broke out.' Verse 7 (perazon) might mean 'village life,' 'warriors,' or 'peasantry.' We made choices and documented them, but the reader should know that this poem pushes the limits of what scholarship can confidently determine.

Connections: The theophany (vv. 4-5) — God marching from Seir with the earth trembling — parallels Deuteronomy 33:2, Psalm 68:7-8, and Habakkuk 3:3. The stars fighting from their courses (v. 20) connects to Joshua 10:12-13. The tribal muster creates a precedent for evaluating national covenant participation. The closing prayer — 'may those who love Him be like the sun rising in its full strength' — anticipates Malachi 4:2.

¹On that day Deborah and Barak son of Abinoam sang this song:

²When leaders led in Israel, when the people volunteered willingly — bless the LORD!

³Hear, O kings!
Give ear, O rulers!
I — I will sing to the LORD,
I will make music to the LORD, the God of Israel.

⁴LORD, when you went out from Seir, when you marched from the fields of Edom,
the earth trembled,
the heavens also poured down,
the clouds poured down water.

⁵Mountains quaked before the LORD —
this one, Sinai — before the LORD, the God of Israel.

⁶In the days of Shamgar son of Anath, in the days of Jael,
the roads were deserted,
and travelers walked by winding paths.

⁷Village life ceased,
it ceased in Israel, until I arose — Deborah — until I arose, a mother in Israel.

⁸They chose new gods —
then war was at the gates.
Was there a shield or a spear to be seen among forty thousand in Israel?

⁹My heart goes out to the commanders of Israel, to those who volunteered among the people.
Bless the LORD!

¹⁰You who ride on tawny donkeys,
you who sit on rich saddle cloths, and you who walk along the road — speak up!

¹¹To the sound of musicians at the watering places,
 there they recount the righteous acts of the LORD,
 the righteous acts for His villagers in Israel.
 Then the people of the LORD went down to the gates.

¹²Awake, awake, Deborah!
 Awake, awake, sing a song!
 Arise, Barak!
 Lead away your captives, son of Abinoam!

¹³Then down marched the remnant against the nobles;
 the people of the LORD marched down for me against the mighty.

¹⁴From Ephraim came those rooted in the valley against Amalek;
 behind you, Benjamin, among your kinsmen!
 From Machir came down the commanders, and from Zebulun those who carry the marshal's staff.

¹⁵The chiefs of Issachar were with Deborah;
 as was Issachar, so was Barak — sent into the valley at his heels.
 Among the clans of Reuben
 there were great searchings of heart.

¹⁶Why did you stay among the sheepfolds, listening to the whistling for the flocks?
 Among the clans of Reuben
 there were great searchings of heart.

¹⁷Gilead stayed beyond the Jordan;
 and Dan — why did he linger by the ships?
 Asher sat at the coast of the sea and settled by his harbors.

¹⁸Zebulun — a people who risked their lives to the death, and Naphtali, on the heights of the field.

¹⁹Kings came, they fought;
 then the kings of Canaan fought at Taanach, by the waters of Megiddo.
 No plunder of silver did they take.

²⁰From heaven the stars fought;
 from their courses they fought against Sisera.

²¹The Wadi Kishon swept them away, the ancient wadi, the Wadi Kishon.
 March on, my soul, with strength!

²²Then the horses' hooves pounded — galloping, galloping, his mighty steeds!

²³"Curse Meroz!" says the angel of the LORD.
"Curse bitterly its inhabitants, because they did not come to the help of the LORD, to the help of the LORD against the mighty."

²⁴Most blessed of women is Jael, the wife of Heber the Kenite — most blessed of women in the tent!

²⁵He asked for water — she gave him milk;
in a lordly bowl she brought him curds.

²⁶Her hand reached for the tent peg, her right hand for the worker's mallet.
She struck Sisera,
she crushed his head,
she shattered and pierced his temple.

²⁷Between her feet he sank, he fell, he lay still;
between her feet he sank, he fell.
Where he sank,
there he fell — destroyed.

²⁸Through the window she peered — the mother of Sisera cried out through the lattice:
"Why is his chariot so long in coming?
Why do the hoofbeats of his chariots delay?"

²⁹The wisest of her ladies answer her;
indeed, she repeats their words to herself:

³⁰"Are they not finding and dividing the plunder? —
a womb, two wombs, for every warrior;
plunder of dyed cloth for Sisera, plunder of dyed embroidery,
two pieces of embroidery for the neck of the plunderer."

³¹So may all your enemies perish, O LORD!
But may those who love Him be like the sun rising in its full strength.
And the land had rest for forty years.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Va-tashar Deborah ('then Deborah sang') — the feminine singular verb suggests Deborah is the primary singer, with Barak joining (u-Varaq). The Song of Deborah is one of the oldest poems in the Hebrew Bible — linguistic analysis suggests a composition date as early as the 12th-11th century BCE, making it roughly contemporary with the events it describes. The archaic Hebrew grammar, vocabulary, and spelling throughout this chapter set it apart from the prose narrative of chapter 4.

2. The opening couplet is textually difficult. Bi-froa pera'ot be-Yisra'el — the root para can mean 'to lead, to let loose, to let hair hang free' (as warriors letting hair loose before battle), or 'to avenge.' The translation 'when leaders led' follows the reading that sees pera'ot as a leadership term. The parallelism with be-hitnaddev am ('when the people volunteered') creates a dual picture: leaders leading and people willing. Both together produce a moment worthy of blessing the LORD.
2. The three-line structure (tricolon) with the climactic barekhu YHWH ('bless the LORD!') establishes the hymnic tone. This is worship poetry — the military victory is subsumed into praise.
3. The summons to kings and rozenim ('rulers, princes') sets the cosmic stage — this is not a private celebration but a declaration before the nations. The double anokhi ('I — I') is emphatic first-person: Deborah asserts her role as the singer with deliberate force. The parallel verbs ashirah ('I will sing') and azammer ('I will make music') are standard praise-poetry vocabulary, establishing this as a hymn to YHWH, not a human war ballad.
4. The theophany — God marching from Seir/Edom — describes YHWH coming from the south, from the direction of Sinai. This is the 'Divine Warrior' tradition: God marches into battle from His mountain, and creation responds with cosmic upheaval. The same tradition appears in Deuteronomy 33:2, Habakkuk 3:3, and Psalm 68:7-8. The trembling earth and pouring rain are not mere weather but the physical response of creation to God's warlike approach.
4. The geographic movement from Seir/Edom northward to the Jezreel Valley where the battle occurred creates a sweeping visual: God traverses the entire land to fight for Israel. Erets ra'ashah ('the earth trembled') and shamayim natafu ('the heavens dripped/poured') create the earth-heaven axis of cosmic response.
5. Harim nazelu ('mountains flowed/quaked') — the verb nazal means 'to flow, to stream, to trickle down.' Mountains dissolving or streaming before God is the most extreme theophanic imagery: even the most permanent features of creation become fluid in God's presence. The reference to Sinai (zeh Sinai, 'this one, Sinai' or 'that Sinai') connects the Kishon battlefield to the foundational covenant event. The God who shook Sinai now shakes the Jezreel Valley — the same power, the same God.
5. The phrase zeh Sinai is grammatically unusual — it may be an archaic relative construction meaning 'the One of Sinai' (referring to God) rather than 'this Sinai' (referring to the mountain). Both readings connect the battle to Sinai theology.
6. The song shifts from theophany to lament, describing conditions before the deliverance. Chadelu orachot ('roads ceased/were abandoned') — the main trade routes were too dangerous for civilian travel due to Canaanite military control. Travelers took orachot aqalqallot ('crooked/winding paths') — back roads and detours to avoid Canaanite patrols and checkpoints.
6. The mention of Jael alongside Shamgar (not Deborah or Barak) is striking — Jael's era is characterized by road insecurity. This is the 'before' portrait that makes the 'after' of deliverance meaningful. The disruption of commerce and travel represents a society living in fear.
7. Chadelu ferazon ('village life ceased / open villages ceased') — perazon can mean 'peasantry, village life, open settlements.' Rural communities could not survive without military protection — they were abandoned as populations fled to walled cities. The collapse of village life indicates a society under siege.
7. Ad sha-qamti Devorah ('until I arose, Deborah') — the first-person voice claims the pivotal role directly. The title em be-Yisra'el ('a mother in Israel') is extraordinary — Deborah identifies herself not as a warrior or judge but as a 'mother.' The maternal metaphor conveys nurture, protection, and the restoration of communal life. A mother in Israel is one who makes life possible again for her children.
8. The causal logic is compressed and devastating: Israel chose new gods (elohim chadashim, 'new gods' — the modifier 'new' mocks the Canaanite deities as novelties compared to the eternal YHWH), and the direct consequence was war at the gates (lachim she'arim — fighting at the city gates, the last line of urban defense). Simultaneously, Israel was disarmed: no shield (magen) or spear (romach) among forty thousand. Whether the disarmament was Canaanite policy (cf. the Philistine weapon monopoly in 1 Samuel 13:19-22) or metaphorical (no one willing to fight), the effect is total vulnerability.
9. Libbi le-choqeqi Yisra'el ('my heart is toward the commanders/legislators of Israel') — choqeq can mean 'commander, lawgiver, one who decrees.' Deborah's heart is moved by leaders who stepped forward. The parallel ha-mitnaddevim ba-am ('those who volunteered among the people') echoes verse 2 — the willingness theme returns. The refrain barekhu YHWH ('bless the LORD') recurs, framing the song's structure.
10. Three social classes are summoned to praise: riders of atonot tsehorot ('tawny/white donkeys' — the donkeys of the wealthy and nobility), yoshevei al middin ('those who sit on saddle cloths/judgment seats' — either wealthy riders or judicial officials), and holkhei al derekh ('walkers on the road' — common travelers). The entire social spectrum is called to testify. The restored road safety of verse 6-7 is now celebrated — those who walk the roads (previously too dangerous) can now travel freely.
11. Mi-qol mechatsetim ('from the sound of those dividing/distributing' or 'musicians/singers') — the exact meaning is debated but the scene is communal celebration at watering places (mashabbim), the village gathering points. Tsidqot YHWH ('righteous acts of the LORD') — the plural of tsedaqah used for God's saving interventions. Here God's military deliverance is categorized as a righteous act — an act of justice and covenant faithfulness, not merely military power.
11. Am YHWH ('the people of the LORD') — Israel is identified by covenant relationship, not ethnic or political terms. The descent 'to the gates' (la-she'arim) reverses verse 8's 'war at the gates': where once the gates were besieged, now the people freely enter and exit.

12. The fourfold uri ('awake!') is the song's climactic summons — Deborah calls herself to action. The imperative repetition creates rhythmic intensity. The parallel pair: Deborah is called to sing (dabberi shir, 'speak/utter a song'), Barak is called to act (qum, 'arise' — the same command Deborah gave him in 4:14). Their roles are distinct and complementary: she speaks, he leads.
12. Sheveh shevyekha ('lead captive your captives') uses the cognate accusative for emphasis — take captivity itself captive. The phrase will be echoed in Psalm 68:18, which Paul applies christologically in Ephesians 4:8.
13. This verse is among the most textually difficult in the Hebrew Bible. Az yerad sarid le-addirim ('then the remnant descended to/against the nobles') — the meaning depends on whether the 'remnant' is Israel's surviving population marching against Canaanite nobility, or whether addirim ('nobles') refers to Israel's own leaders. The rendering follows the reading that sees Israel's reduced remnant taking the offensive against superior Canaanite forces — a picture of the weak overcoming the mighty through divine power.
14. The tribal muster roll begins — Deborah names the tribes that came and those that did not. Ephraim, Benjamin, Machir (a Manasseh sub-clan), and Zebulun are listed as participants. Shorsham ba-Amalek ('their root in Amalek' or 'rooted against Amalek') is obscure — it may refer to Ephraim's territory formerly held by Amalekites (cf. 12:15).
14. Mi-Zebulun moshkhim be-shevet sofer ('from Zebulun those who draw with the staff of the writer/marshal') — the shevet sofer may be a mustering staff, a commander's baton, or a scribal tool. The image suggests organized military leadership, not just warriors but officers who marshal troops.
15. Issachar is praised for loyalty — its chiefs stood with Deborah and Barak. But the tone shifts abruptly at Reuben: bi-felagot Re'uven gedolim chiqeqei lev ('among the divisions/clans of Reuben, great searchings/resolves of heart'). The 'searchings of heart' (chiqeqei lev) is ambivalent — it could be deliberation, indecision, or anguish about whether to join. The next verse (16) will make clear that Reuben's 'searching' produced no action. They deliberated but did not come.
16. The accusation takes the form of a rhetorical question: lammah yashavta bein ha-mishpetayim ('why did you sit between the sheepfolds?'). Reuben, a pastoral tribe east of the Jordan, chose tending flocks over joining the battle. Sheriqot adarim ('whistlings/pipings for the flocks') is the pastoral idyll Reuben preferred to the battlefield. The repeated refrain 'great searchings of heart' (now chiqrei lev, a variant spelling) frames Reuben's deliberation as culpable — they considered the call and declined.
16. The poetry's accusatory tone anticipates the more bitter rebuke of Meroz in verse 23. Deborah's song is not only praise for the willing but judgment against the unwilling.
17. Three more non-participants are named: Gilead (the Transjordanian tribes — Gad and eastern Manasseh), Dan, and Asher. Each is characterized by what they chose instead of battle. Gilead stayed east of the Jordan. Dan lingered by ships (oniyyot) — suggesting Dan at this period had a coastal or riverine trade interest. Asher sat by the seashore (chof yammim) and at his harbors (mifrasav, 'breaches, landing places'). Each tribe chose economic self-interest over covenant solidarity.
17. The geography tells the theological story: the tribes most distant from the battle (eastern and far-northern/coastal) are the ones who abstained. Physical distance from the crisis correlates with spiritual indifference.
18. After the catalog of abstainers, the song returns to praise. Zebulun and Naphtali — the two tribes Deborah specifically called (4:6) — receive the highest commendation: am cheref nafsho lamut ('a people who scorned death / risked their lives to death'). The verb charaf means 'to reproach, to scorn, to defy' — they defied death itself. This is the counterpoint to Reuben's 'searchings of heart': while some deliberated, Zebulun and Naphtali acted.
18. Al meromei sadeh ('on the heights of the field') — they took the exposed, dangerous positions on the high ground. The contrast between these warrior-tribes and the coastal/pastoral non-combatants is absolute.
19. The battle location is specified poetically: Taanach and the waters of Megiddo — the Kishon drainage area in the Jezreel Valley. The final line is darkly ironic: betsa kesef lo laqachu ('spoils of silver they did not take') — the Canaanite kings came expecting profit from their military superiority but gained nothing. The verse may also be read as the Israelites gaining no silver plunder — the victory was divine, not economic.
20. Min shamayim nilchamu ('from heaven they fought') — the cosmic dimension of the battle. The stars themselves join the war against Sisera. Ha-kokhavim mi-mesilotam ('the stars from their courses/paths') — the celestial bodies are marshaled as divine warriors. This is not astrology but theophanic poetry: all creation is conscripted into God's army. The language echoes the holy-war tradition where nature fights for Israel (cf. Joshua 10:11 — hailstones; Exodus 14:24-25 — the sea).
20. The astronomical language may also encode a meteorological reality: a sudden storm (the stars 'fighting' = a violent weather event) caused the Kishon to flood (verse 21), destroying the chariots. Cosmic poetry and physical causation converge.
21. Nachal Qishon gerafam ('the Wadi Kishon swept them away') — the verb garaf ('to sweep away, to carry off') reveals the mechanism of the divine victory that the prose account (4:15) left implicit. The Kishon flooded — the seasonal wadi became a raging torrent that swept Sisera's iron chariots and their crews downstream. The chariots that terrorized Israel for twenty years were destroyed by a flash flood.
21. Nachal qedumim ('the ancient wadi') — the epithet 'ancient' (qedumim) gives the Kishon a personality: this is an old waterway with a long history, now awakened to fight for God. The self-exhortation tidrekhi nafshi oz ('march on, my soul, with strength!') is Deborah addressing herself mid-song — a burst of warrior confidence that breaks the descriptive narrative.

22. Az halmu iqqevai sus ('then the hooves of the horses pounded/were smashed') — the scene is auditory: the thunder of horse hooves as Sisera's cavalry tries to flee the flooding battlefield. Mi-daharot daharot abbirav ('from the galloping, the galloping of his mighty ones/steeds') — the repeated daharot creates an onomatopoeic effect mimicking the rhythmic pounding of hooves. The sound of galloping horses in panicked flight is the soundtrack of Sisera's defeat.
23. The curse on Meroz is the harshest judgment in the song. Malakh YHWH ('the angel of the LORD') pronounces the curse — the same figure who indicted Israel at Bochim (2:1-5) now curses a specific town. Meroz's exact location is unknown — it may have been so thoroughly cursed that it was obliterated. The double curse (oru ... oru aror) is intensive.
23. The charge is stunning: lo va'u le-ezrat YHWH ('they did not come to the help of the LORD'). The language implies that God Himself needed help — not in the sense of divine weakness, but in the covenant obligation of partnership. YHWH fights for Israel, and Israel is expected to fight with YHWH. Refusing to join the battle is refusing to help God. The concept is radical: human participation in divine warfare is not optional but covenantally obligated.
24. Tevorakh min-nashim Ya'el ('blessed above women is Jael') — the superlative blessing is the song's highest honor. The phrase min-nashim ba-ohel ('above women in the tent') may mean 'among tent-dwelling women' (nomadic women) or may contrast Jael with women of the settled cities. The blessing formula echoes the blessing on Mary in Luke 1:42 ('blessed are you among women'), creating an intertextual echo across testaments.
24. The immediate juxtaposition of Meroz's curse (v. 23) and Jael's blessing (v. 24) creates a moral spectrum: the coward is cursed, the brave is blessed. Jael's blessing is explicitly connected to her act of killing Sisera — the song celebrates what the prose narrative reported without comment.
25. The poetic retelling of 4:19 intensifies the hospitality: mayim sha'al, chalav natanah ('water he asked, milk she gave') — the upgrade from water to milk signals generosity beyond obligation. Be-sefel addirim ('in a bowl of nobles/a lordly bowl') — the vessel itself is dignified, fit for royalty. Chem'ah ('curds, cream, butter') is a delicacy. Every detail of the hospitality is heightened in the poetic telling, making the reversal that follows even more devastating.
26. The poetic account of the killing is more elaborate than the prose version (4:21). The poetry uses slow-motion technique: yadah la-yated tishlachnah ('her hand to the peg she sent') vi-yminah le-halmut amelim ('her right hand to the toilers' mallet') ve-halemah Sisera ('she struck Sisera') machaqah rosho ('she crushed his head') u-machatsh ve-chalefah raqqato ('she shattered and pierced his temple'). Each verb intensifies: struck crushed shattered pierced.
26. The triple parallelism of verbs (machaqah, machatsh, chalefah) creates a rhythmic hammering effect in the Hebrew — the sound of the poetry mimics the act it describes. This is masterful ancient poetry: form and content are unified.
27. Bein ragleha kara nafal shakhav ('between her feet he sank, he fell, he lay') — the three verbs (kara, nafal, shakhav) replay the death in excruciating slow motion. The repetition is deliberate and relentless: the poetry refuses to let the listener move past the moment. 'Between her feet' (bein ragleha) carries unmistakable overtones of sexual dominance — the great warrior ends at the feet of a woman, in a posture of complete subjugation.
27. The word shadud ('destroyed, despoiled, plundered') is the final word — Sisera, the plunderer of Israel, is himself destroyed. The poetic justice is complete: the one who plundered is plundered, the one who enslaved falls at a woman's feet. The verse's hypnotic repetition functions as a kind of incantation — the death is enacted again and again in the poetry.
28. The song's most devastating poetic move: it shifts from the battlefield to Sisera's home, to his mother watching from the window. Be'ad ha-challon nishqefah ('through the window she peered') — the verb shaqaf ('to look down, to peer out') suggests anxious watching from above. Va-teyabev ('she cried out') — the verb yabav is rare and suggests a high-pitched, wailing cry. Em Sisera ('the mother of Sisera') — she is not named, only defined by her relationship to the dead man she doesn't yet know is dead.
28. The pathos is extraordinary and deliberate. Deborah's song humanizes the enemy at the moment of his destruction. Sisera's mother becomes a universal figure — any mother waiting for a son who will never return. The dramatic irony (the audience knows what she does not) creates a compassion that coexists with the celebration of victory. This is among the most psychologically sophisticated moments in ancient literature.
29. Chakhmot saroteiha ('the wisest of her noble ladies') — Sisera's mother is surrounded by attendants who offer reassurance. The irony deepens: the 'wisdom' (chakhmah) of the court ladies is about to produce a grotesquely wrong explanation for Sisera's delay. Their confident answer (verse 30) will make the truth — that Sisera is dead — even more brutal by contrast.
29. Af hi tashiv amareiha lah ('indeed, she returns her words to herself') — she repeats their reassurance as self-comfort, trying to convince herself that the explanation is true. The psychological portrait is painfully precise.
30. The court ladies' 'wise' answer is the song's most cutting irony. Racham rachamatayim le-rosh gevev ('a womb, two wombs, for each warrior') — the Hebrew racham means 'womb' and is used here as a dehumanizing synecdoche: the captured women are reduced to their reproductive organs. The noble ladies casually assume that Sisera's delay is because he is busy raping captive women. They are not shocked by this — they expect and approve it as a warrior's perquisite.
30. The poet forces the listener to hear how the enemy dehumanizes Israelite women — and then to recall that Sisera himself is now dead at the feet of a woman. The ironic reversal is total: the man whose mother assumes he is violating women has been killed by a woman. The embroidered cloth (tseva'im riqmah) and luxury goods they imagine Sisera collecting will never arrive. The 'plunder' fantasy is a fantasy of a world that no longer exists.

30. This verse is among the most discussed in feminist biblical scholarship. The poet's decision to include the enemy mother's perspective — and to give her court ladies this particular speech — is a sophisticated literary choice that simultaneously exposes the brutality of warfare and celebrates its subversion by women (Jael, Deborah) who act rather than wait.
31. The song's closing is a prayer — ken yovedu khol oyvekha YHWH ('so may all your enemies perish, O LORD'). The imprecation is not personal vengeance but covenant theology: God's enemies are those who oppose His purposes for Israel. The counter-blessing — ve-ohavav ke-tset ha-shemesh bi-gvurato ('may those who love Him be like the sun going forth in its might') — is the most beautiful image in the song. The sun rising in full strength (gevurah, 'power, might') is the image of irresistible, warming, life-giving force. Israel, delivered and faithful, is as unstoppable as dawn.
31. The final prose line — va-tishqot ha-aretz arba'im shanah ('the land had rest forty years') — closes the cycle with the standard peace formula. The forty-year rest matches Othniel's (3:11). The Song of Deborah, for all its cosmic scope and psychological depth, resolves into the same formulaic peace that every judge's deliverance produces. The pattern holds.

Summary: Midian oppresses Israel for seven years, devastating their crops. God calls Gideon — who is threshing wheat in a winepress to hide it — as deliverer. Gideon tears down his father's Baal altar at night and receives the fleece sign.

What Makes This Remarkable: The angel greets Gideon as gibbor hechayil ('mighty warrior,' v. 12) while he hides in a winepress. The irony is intentional: the deliverer is introduced as a coward. Gideon's objection — 'my clan is the weakest in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house' (v. 15) — echoes Moses's and Saul's reluctance. God consistently chooses the insufficient. Gideon's night raid on the Baal altar (vv. 25-32) earns him the name Jerubbaal ('let Baal contend') — if Baal is real, let him fight his own battles.

Translation Friction: The phrase hineni magia (v. 37, 'I am laying') uses a rare verb for placing the fleece — the precise action matters because Gideon is testing God, a posture the text neither condemns nor endorses. The phrase shalom lekha (v. 23, 'peace to you') is God's reassurance after Gideon realizes he has seen the angel — we preserved shalom as 'peace' in this greeting context.

Connections: Gideon's calling echoes Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3-4) — both encounter God unexpectedly, both object, both receive signs. The Baal-altar destruction anticipates Elijah's contest on Carmel (1 Kings 18). The winepress hiding mirrors the larger theme of Israel cowering before oppressors until God intervenes. Gideon's family dynamics preview Abimelech's murderous ambition (ch. 9).

¹The Israelites did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD gave them into the hand of Midian for seven years. ²The hand of Midian was heavy on Israel. Because of Midian, the Israelites made for themselves the tunnels in the mountains, the caves, and the strongholds. ³Whenever Israel sowed, Midian would come up, along with Amalek and the people of the east, and attack them. ⁴They would camp against them and destroy the produce of the land as far as Gaza, leaving no food in Israel — no sheep, no ox, no donkey. ⁵For they would come up with their livestock and their tents, arriving like locusts in number — they and their camels were beyond counting — and they invaded the land to devastate it. ⁶Israel was brought very low because of Midian, and the Israelites cried out to the LORD. ⁷When the Israelites cried out to the LORD because of Midian, ⁸the LORD sent a prophet to the Israelites. He said to them, "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'I brought you up from Egypt and led you out of the house of slavery. ⁹I rescued you from the hand of Egypt and from the hand of all who oppressed you. I drove them out before you and gave you their land. ¹⁰I said to you: I am the LORD your God. You must not fear the gods of the Amorites in whose land you live.' But you have not obeyed my voice." ¹¹The angel of the LORD came and sat under the oak at Ophrah, which belonged to Joash the Abiezrite. His son Gideon was threshing wheat in the winepress to hide it from Midian. ¹²The angel of the LORD appeared to him and said, "The LORD is with you, mighty warrior." ¹³Gideon said to him, "Please, my lord, if the LORD is with us, why has all this happened to us? Where are all His wondrous acts that our fathers recounted to us, saying, 'Did not the LORD bring us up from Egypt?' But now the LORD has abandoned us and given us into the hand of Midian." ¹⁴The LORD turned to him and said, "Go in this strength of yours and save Israel from the hand of Midian. Have I not sent you?" ¹⁵He said to him, "Please, my lord, how can

I save Israel? My clan is the weakest in Manasseh, and I am the youngest in my father's household." ¹⁶The LORD said to him, "I will be with you, and you will strike down Midian as though they were a single man." ¹⁷He said to him, "If I have found favor in your eyes, show me a sign that it is you who are speaking with me. ¹⁸Please do not leave here until I come back to you and bring out my offering and set it before you." He said, "I will stay until you return." ¹⁹Gideon went in and prepared a young goat and unleavened bread from an ephah of flour. He put the meat in a basket, poured the broth in a pot, and brought it out to him under the oak and presented it. ²⁰The angel of God said to him, "Take the meat and the unleavened bread and place them on this rock, and pour out the broth." He did so. ²¹The angel of the LORD extended the tip of the staff in his hand and touched the meat and the unleavened bread. Fire rose from the rock and consumed the meat and the unleavened bread. Then the angel of the LORD vanished from his sight. ²²When Gideon realized that he was the angel of the LORD, Gideon said, "Alas, Lord GOD! For I have seen the angel of the LORD face to face!" ²³The LORD said to him, "Peace to you. Do not be afraid — you will not die." ²⁴Gideon built an altar there to the LORD and named it "The LORD Is Peace." To this day it still stands in Ophrah of the Abiezrites. ²⁵That same night the LORD said to him, "Take your father's bull — the second bull, seven years old — and tear down the altar of Baal that belongs to your father, and cut down the Asherah pole beside it. ²⁶Then build an altar to the LORD your God on top of this stronghold, in proper arrangement. Take the second bull and offer it as a burnt offering using the wood of the Asherah pole that you cut down." ²⁷Gideon took ten of his servants and did as the LORD had told him. But because he was too afraid of his father's household and the men of the city to do it by day, he did it at night. ²⁸When the men of the city rose early in the morning, the altar of Baal had been torn down, the Asherah pole beside it had been cut down, and the second bull had been offered on the altar that was built. ²⁹They said to one another, "Who did this?" When they investigated and inquired, they said, "Gideon son of Joash did this." ³⁰The men of the city said to Joash, "Bring out your son so he can die, because he tore down the altar of Baal and because he cut down the Asherah pole beside it." ³¹Joash said to all who stood against him, "Will you contend for Baal? Will you save him? Whoever contends for him will be put to death by morning! If he is a god, let him contend for himself, since someone tore down his altar." ³²So on that day he named him Jerubbaal, saying, "Let Baal contend with him," because he tore down his altar. ³³All the Midianites and the Amalekites and the people of the east gathered together, crossed over, and camped in the Valley of Jezreel. ³⁴The Spirit of the LORD clothed Gideon, and he blew the shofar. The Abiezrites rallied behind him. ³⁵He sent messengers throughout all Manasseh, and they too rallied behind him. He also sent messengers to Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali, and they came up to meet them. ³⁶Gideon said to God, "If you are going to save Israel through me, as you have promised — ³⁷I am placing a fleece of wool on the threshing floor. If there is dew on the fleece only, and all the ground around it is dry, then I will know that you will save Israel through me, as you have promised." ³⁸And so it happened. He rose early the next morning, wrung out the fleece, and squeezed enough dew from it to fill a bowl with water. ³⁹Gideon said to God, "Do not let your anger burn against me — let me speak just one more time. Let me test just once more with the fleece: let only the fleece be dry, and let there be dew on all the ground." ⁴⁰God did so that night: the fleece alone was dry, and there was dew on all the ground.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The fifth cycle opens with the standard formula. Midian — a semi-nomadic people associated with the desert east of the Jordan (Moses's father-in-law Jethro was a Midianite priest, Exodus 2:16-3:1). Seven years of oppression is relatively short but, as the following verses reveal, intensely devastating.
2. Va-ta'oz yad Midyan ('the hand of Midian was strong/heavy') — the verb azaz means 'to be strong, to prevail.' The oppression is so severe that Israel retreats to minharot ('tunnels, dens'), me'arot ('caves'), and metsadot ('strongholds, fortified positions'). The people of the promised land are hiding like fugitives in their own territory. This is the most extreme description of oppression in Judges — Israel is reduced to cave-dwelling.
3. The Midianite strategy is economic terrorism: they wait until Israel has sowed (zara, 'planted seed') and then invade to destroy or seize the harvest. The coalition includes Amalek (Israel's perennial enemy) and benei qedem ('sons of the east,' desert nomads from the Transjordan). The timing is precise — attacking after sowing but before harvest ensures maximum agricultural devastation.
4. The destruction extends ad bo'akha Azzah ('until you reach Gaza') — the entire width of the country from the eastern desert to the western coast. The comprehensiveness is deliberate: lo yash'iru michyah be-Yisra'el ('they left no sustenance in Israel'). Even livestock — sheep, oxen, donkeys — are taken or destroyed. This is systematic starvation, not mere raiding.

5. Ke-dei arbeh la-rov ('like locusts in multitude') — the locust simile is one of the most powerful in the Hebrew Bible for describing overwhelming numbers. Locusts consume everything in their path, leaving nothing — exactly what the Midianite raiders do to Israel's agriculture. The camels (gemalim) are significant: camel-borne nomads had superior mobility over settled agricultural populations, enabling rapid strikes across vast distances. The Midianite raids represent an early form of nomadic warfare against sedentary communities.
6. Va-yiddal Yisra'el me'od ('Israel was greatly impoverished/diminished') — the verb dalal means 'to become thin, poor, reduced.' Israel is wasting away. The cry (va-yiz'aqu) comes from desperation, not repentance — the same pattern as previous cycles. But this time, uniquely, God responds first not with a deliverer but with a prophet (verses 7-10).
7. The causal chain is established: Midianite oppression Israel's cry God's response. But the response is unusual — God sends a prophet before sending a deliverer. This is the only cycle in Judges where prophetic rebuke precedes military deliverance. The sequence suggests Israel needs to understand why they are suffering before they can be rescued.
8. Ish navi ('a man, a prophet') — the prophet is unnamed, which is unusual. His anonymity underscores that the message matters, not the messenger. His speech follows the classic prophetic formula koh amar YHWH ('thus says the LORD') — the covenant lawsuit pattern. The content echoes the angel's speech at Bochim (2:1): God recites His saving acts as the basis for the indictment that follows.
8. Beit avadim ('house of slavery/bondage') is the standard Deuteronomic designation for Egypt (Deuteronomy 5:6, 6:12, 8:14). Its use here reminds Israel that their current oppression is not their first — God delivered them from worse.
9. The recital of God's acts mirrors the covenant prologue form known from ancient Near Eastern treaties — the sovereign recounts what he has done for the vassal before stating his demands. God's credentials are His acts: rescue (hitsil), expulsion of enemies (gerashti), and land gift (natatti). Each verb is in the first person — God takes personal ownership of every stage of the deliverance.
10. The indictment climaxes: lo shema'tem be-qoli ('you have not obeyed my voice'). The command lo tir'u et elohei ha-Emori ('do not fear the gods of the Amorites') uses the verb yare ('to fear, to revere, to worship'). 'Fearing' another god is functionally worshipping it — acknowledging its power and submitting to its demands. The Amorites are used here as a generic term for the Canaanite population.
10. Notably, no deliverance is promised in this prophetic speech. The prophet delivers the diagnosis but not the prescription. God's answer to the Midianite crisis — Gideon — does not come through this prophet but through a separate theophany (verses 11ff). The prophet explains the cause; the angel provides the cure.
11. Malakh YHWH ('the angel of the LORD') — the same figure from 2:1-5. The scene echoes the patriarchal theophanies: the divine visitor sits under a tree (cf. Abraham at Mamre, Genesis 18:1). Gideon's introduction is deliberately unheroic: he is threshing wheat (chovet chittim) in a winepress (ba-gat) — a hidden, cramped space used to avoid Midianite raiders. Normal threshing occurs on an open hilltop where wind separates chaff; using a winepress means working in concealment, in fear. The deliverer God will raise is introduced as a man hiding his grain.
11. The Abiezrite clan belongs to Manasseh (Joshua 17:2). Ophrah's location is uncertain but somewhere in the Manasseh territory in the central highlands.
12. YHWH immekha gibbor he-chayil ('the LORD is with you, mighty warrior') — the greeting is deeply ironic given the context. Gideon is a man hiding grain in a winepress, and the angel addresses him as gibbor he-chayil ('mighty warrior, valiant hero'). The title is either prophetic (God sees what Gideon will become) or challenging (calling forth a courage Gideon does not yet possess). The phrase YHWH immekha ('the LORD is with you') is a standard divine assurance of presence (cf. Joshua 1:5, Ruth 2:4), but Gideon will immediately question it.
13. Gideon's response is the most theologically articulate complaint by any judge. He raises three challenges: (1) If YHWH is with us (ve-yesh YHWH immanu), why has this happened? — questioning the divine presence claim; (2) Where are the miracles (nifle'otav) our fathers told us about? — the generational knowledge gap of 2:10 is now voiced by a character within the story; (3) The LORD has abandoned us (netashanu) — a direct accusation of divine desertion.
13. Gideon's theology is actually correct about the situation but wrong about the cause. God has not abandoned Israel — God has handed them over because of their idolatry (verse 1). Gideon sees the effect but not the reason. The unnamed prophet's speech (vv. 8-10) provided the explanation Gideon seems not to have heard.
14. Va-yifen elav YHWH ('the LORD turned to him') — the text now identifies the speaker as YHWH directly, not merely malakh YHWH. The blurring between angel and God continues (as in 2:1). The commission is direct: lekha be-khochakha zeh ('go in this strength of yours'). What strength? Gideon has displayed none. The 'strength' may refer to his honest confrontation with God — his willingness to ask hard questions is itself a form of spiritual strength that God can use.
14. Ve-hosha'ta et Yisra'el ('and you will save Israel') — the root y-sh-a (salvation) applied directly to Gideon. Ha-lo shelachticha ('Have I not sent you?') — the rhetorical question establishes divine commissioning. Gideon's authority comes not from personal ability but from divine sending.
15. Gideon's protest follows the classic call-narrative pattern: Moses ('Who am I?' Exodus 3:11), Jeremiah ('I am only a youth,' Jeremiah 1:6), and now Gideon ('My clan is the weakest, I am the youngest'). The double diminishment — alphi ha-dal ('my thousand/clan is the poor one') and anokhi ha-tsa'ir ('I am the youngest') — places Gideon at the bottom of both social and familial hierarchies. The theology is consistent: God chooses the weak to shame the strong (a principle Paul will articulate in 1 Corinthians 1:27).

16. Ki ehveh immakh ('for I will be with you') — the divine assurance echoes God's promise to Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:12, using the same ehveh). The verb ehveh ('I will be') is the first-person form of the divine name YHWH — God pledges His own being as guarantee. The promise transforms Gideon's weakness into irrelevance: Gideon's clan doesn't matter because God will be the one fighting.
16. Ke-ish echad ('as a single man') — the entire Midianite host will fall as easily as if they were one individual. The image collapses the impossible odds into a single opponent, which is theologically accurate: the battle is God's, not Gideon's.
17. Im na matsati chen be-einekha ('if I have found favor in your eyes') — the standard petition formula for requesting something from a superior. Gideon asks for an ot ('sign') — visible confirmation that this visitor is genuinely divine. The request for signs will become Gideon's pattern (the fleece test in vv. 36-40). The text does not criticize the initial request — confirmation of divine commission is reasonable. But the pattern of repeated sign-seeking will raise questions about Gideon's faith.
18. Minchati ('my offering/gift') — the same term used for the grain offering in Leviticus 2 and for tribute to a king. Gideon's offering could be a meal for a distinguished guest or a sacrificial offering to a deity — the ambiguity reflects Gideon's own uncertainty about who he is dealing with. The divine visitor's willingness to wait (anokhi eshev, 'I will sit/stay') echoes God's patience throughout the patriarchal narratives — the divine is never in a hurry.
19. The offering is lavish: a gedi izzim ('kid of the goats'), an eifah ('ephah,' approximately 22 liters / 6 gallons) of flour for matzot ('unleavened bread'), plus broth. In a time of famine, this represents enormous generosity — Gideon gives what his family can barely afford. The unleavened bread (matzot) is associatively linked to the exodus Passover (Exodus 12:8), though the connection may be incidental. The presentation under the oak (ha-elah) transforms the domestic meal into something approaching sacrifice.
20. The angel's instruction transforms a meal into an offering: the rock (ha-sela) becomes an altar. Placing meat and bread on a rock and pouring out the broth mirrors sacrificial procedure — the solid elements are placed for burning and the liquid is poured out as a libation. Gideon's domestic gift is being redirected from hospitality to worship.
21. The staff-touch ignites the offering — fire from the rock (va-ta'al ha-esh min ha-tsur) consumes the sacrifice. This is the sign Gideon requested (v. 17): divine fire accepting the offering, just as fire consumed Elijah's sacrifice on Carmel (1 Kings 18:38) and the tabernacle inauguration offerings (Leviticus 9:24). Fire from the rock is theophanic — God reveals Himself through consuming fire.
21. U-malakh YHWH halakh me-einav ('the angel of the LORD vanished from his sight') — the departure confirms the divine identity. The angel does not walk away but disappears. Gideon's visitor was not human.
22. Gideon's terror (ahahh, an exclamation of distress) reflects the ancient Israelite belief that seeing God or His angel directly was fatal (cf. Exodus 33:20, 'no one can see my face and live'). The phrase panim el panim ('face to face') is the most intense form of divine encounter — unmediated, direct. Gideon fears he will die because he has seen the divine face. This is the same fear Jacob expressed at Peniel (Genesis 32:30).
22. The address Adonai YHWH ('Lord GOD') uses both divine titles — Adonai as the spoken form and YHWH as the covenant name. The doubling signals extreme urgency.
23. Shalom lekha ('peace to you') — God's response to Gideon's terror is the gift of shalom. The word carries its full weight here: not merely 'hello' but a declaration of well-being, wholeness, safety. Al tira ('do not be afraid') is the standard divine reassurance formula. Lo tamut ('you will not die') directly addresses Gideon's specific fear. The encounter that threatened death produces instead a declaration of peace.
24. YHWH Shalom ('The LORD Is Peace') — Gideon's altar name commemorates God's gift of shalom in the theophany. The altar name is a theological statement: the God who commissioned Gideon for war is the God whose fundamental character is peace. The construction of an altar is Gideon's first act as a covenant leader — before any military action, he establishes worship. The narrator's tag 'to this day' (ad ha-yom ha-zeh) attests to the altar's survival into the writer's era.
25. God's first command to Gideon is not military but cultic: destroy your own father's Baal altar and Asherah pole. The theology is clear — before Israel can be delivered from external enemies (Midian), it must be delivered from internal idolatry (Baal worship). The seven-year-old bull may correspond to the seven years of Midianite oppression (verse 1), symbolically connecting the idol's age to the duration of God's judgment.
25. Asher le-avikha ('that belongs to your father') — the idolatry is domestic, familial. Gideon must confront his own household's sin before he can address Israel's. The personal cost of the commission is immediate.
26. The instruction is theologically charged: burn the Asherah pole and use its wood as fuel for a burnt offering (olah) to YHWH. The idol becomes firewood for the true God's altar. The desecration of the Canaanite cult object is total — it is not merely destroyed but repurposed for YHWH worship. The olah (burnt offering — the total surrender offering from Leviticus 1) replaces the Baal cult with YHWH worship on the same site.
26. Ba-ma'arakhah ('in proper arrangement') — the offering must be done correctly, according to prescribed procedure. Even in the emergency of spiritual revolution, liturgical order matters.
27. Gideon obeys — but at night, in fear. Ka'asher yare et beit aviv ('because he feared his father's house') — the deliverer who will defeat Midian is afraid of his own neighbors. The narrator does not condemn the fear but records it honestly: Gideon's courage is imperfect, his faith is growing but not complete. The ten servants provide both labor and witnesses — even fearful obedience requires community.
28. The morning-after discovery reveals the three-part act: altar destroyed, Asherah cut, YHWH-offering presented. The built altar (ha-mizbeach ha-banui) stands where the Baal altar stood — replacement, not merely destruction. The community confronts a fait accompli: their cultic center has been transformed overnight from Baal worship to YHWH worship.

29. The investigation (darash, 'to seek, to inquire' and biqqesh, 'to search') reveals Gideon — perhaps through the testimony of the ten servants, or through the process of elimination in a small community. The discovery puts Gideon in immediate danger: destroying a community's cultic center is a capital offense by local custom.
30. The demand hotse et binkha ve-yamot ('bring out your son that he may die') uses the same formulation as the demand for Lot's guests in Sodom (Genesis 19:5, though with different intent). The townspeople want Gideon executed for sacrilege against Baal. The irony is that an Israelite community demands death for destroying an idol that Israelites were commanded to destroy (Deuteronomy 7:5). The depth of Canaanization is exposed: Israel defends Baal's honor.
31. Joash's defense of his son is brilliant and devastating: ha-attem terivun la-Ba'al ('will YOU contend for Baal?'). The verb riv ('to contend, to argue, to litigate') is a legal term — Joash puts Baal on trial rather than Gideon. His argument is simple and irrefutable: if Baal is a real god, he can defend his own altar; if he cannot, he's not worth defending. Im elohim hu yarev lo ('if he is a god, let him contend for himself') — this is the theological acid test. The logic anticipates Elijah's mockery on Carmel (1 Kings 18:27).
32. Yerubba'al ('Let Baal contend') — the name is a permanent theological taunt. Every time Gideon is called by this name (which the text uses throughout the rest of the narrative and in later references, 1 Samuel 12:11), the hearer is reminded that Baal could not defend his own altar. The name functions as a walking declaration of Baal's impotence.
33. The Midianite coalition masses in the Emek Yizre'el ('Valley of Jezreel') — the same strategic plain where Deborah and Barak fought Sisera. This is Israel's most vulnerable geographic zone: a broad, flat valley ideal for the nomadic raiders' mobility advantage. The gathering of 'all' the coalition forces signals the scale of the threat that Gideon must face.
34. Ruach YHWH lavshah et Gid'on ('the Spirit of the LORD clothed Gideon') — a unique verb for Spirit empowerment. Where the Spirit 'came upon' (hayetah al) Othniel (3:10) and will 'rush upon' (tsalach al) Samson (14:6), here the Spirit 'clothed' (lavash) Gideon — wrapping him like a garment. The metaphor suggests total covering: Gideon is enveloped by divine power, worn by the Spirit as much as wearing it. This is the most intimate of the Spirit-empowerment verbs in Judges.
34. The shofar blast and the rallying of the Abiezrite clan (Gideon's own family) is the beginning of the military campaign. The man who destroyed Baal's altar at night in fear now summons troops publicly in daylight — the Spirit's clothing has transformed him.
35. Four tribes respond: Manasseh (Gideon's own), Asher, Zebulun, and Naphtali. The Song of Deborah rebuked Asher for not joining (5:17); here Asher responds. The gathering of multiple tribes shows a broader coalition than most judge narratives — Gideon's summons reaches beyond his immediate clan to the northern tribal alliance.
36. The fleece test begins. Gideon has already received a theophany (vv. 11-24), divine fire consuming his offering (v. 21), the Spirit's clothing (v. 34), and four tribes responding to his summons. Despite all this, he seeks additional confirmation: im yeshkha moshia be-yadi ('if you are saving through my hand'). The im ('if') after so many confirmations reveals Gideon's persistent uncertainty. The fleece test is not a model of faith but a concession to weakness.
37. Gizzat ha-tsemer ('fleece of wool') — a sheared sheep's fleece. The test is straightforward: an outcome that defies natural probability will confirm divine intent. Dew falling only on the fleece while the surrounding ground remains dry would be a localized miracle. The threshing floor (goren) is an open hilltop area — the same kind of exposed location Gideon avoided when threshing in the winepress (v. 11). His willingness to use the threshing floor now, rather than the winepress, shows some progress in confidence.
38. God grants the sign generously — melo ha-sefel mayim ('a full bowl of water'). The fleece is saturated while the ground is dry. The miracle is conceded without divine commentary or rebuke. God meets Gideon's weakness with patience, not punishment.
39. Al yichar appekha bi ('do not let your anger burn against me') — Gideon knows he is pushing the boundary. His own words reveal consciousness of presumption: akh ha-pa'am ('just this time'), raq ha-pa'am ('only this once'). He reverses the test: now the fleece should be dry while the ground is wet. The reversal is actually a harder test — wool naturally absorbs moisture, so a dry fleece on wet ground defies the material's properties more dramatically.
39. The repetition of sign-requests is Gideon's character trait: he needs constant reassurance. God accommodates this weakness, but the narrative trajectory suggests it is weakness, not exemplary faith.
40. Va-ya'as Elohim ken ('God did so') — divine compliance with Gideon's second request, without rebuke or commentary. God's patience with Gideon's sign-seeking is remarkable and reveals the divine commitment to working through imperfect faith. The chapter ends with Gideon's confirmation complete — he now has no further excuse for hesitation. Chapter 7 will immediately strip away his military assets, making the point that God's sign, not Gideon's army, is the basis for victory.

Summary: God reduces Gideon's army from 32,000 to 300 through two tests — fear and drinking posture. The 300 attack the Midianite camp at night with torches, jars, and trumpets. The Midianites panic and destroy each other.

What Makes This Remarkable: The reduction from 32,000 to 300 is God's deliberate design: 'The people with you are too many for Me to give Midian into their hands, lest Israel claim glory for themselves' (v. 2). Military weakness is a theological requirement — victory must be obviously God's, not Israel's. The battle plan is maximally unconventional: no swords, no strategy, just torches inside clay jars, trumpets, and a shout. The shattering of the jars to reveal the light inside may be the chapter's deepest image — the earthen vessel must break for the light to shine.

Translation Friction: The water-drinking test (vv. 5-7) — those who lap like dogs vs. those who kneel — has been interpreted as testing alertness, humility, or simply providing an arbitrary selection method. The Hebrew does not explain the criterion's rationale, and we did not import one. The war cry (v. 18) 'a sword for the LORD and for Gideon' (cherev laYHWH uleGid'on) pairs divine and human agency in a single shout.

Connections: God's army-reduction principle echoes Deuteronomy 20:8 (sending the afraid home) and anticipates Jonathan's 'nothing can hinder the LORD from saving by many or by few' (1 Samuel 14:6). Paul's metaphor of treasure in clay jars (2 Corinthians 4:7) may echo the torch-in-jar image. The Midianite self-destruction parallels the Philistine panic in 1 Samuel 14:20.

¹Jerubbaal — that is, Gideon — and all the people with him rose early and camped beside the spring of Harod. The Midianite camp was north of them, below the hill of Moreh in the valley. ²The LORD said to Gideon, "The people with you are too many for me to give Midian into their hands — otherwise Israel would claim credit against me, saying, 'My own hand saved me.' ³Now announce in the hearing of the people: 'Whoever is afraid and trembling may turn back and leave Mount Gilead.'" Twenty-two thousand of the people turned back, and ten thousand remained. ⁴The LORD said to Gideon, "The people are still too many. Bring them down to the water, and I will refine them for you there. When I tell you, 'This one goes with you,' he will go with you; and when I tell you, 'This one does not go with you,' he will not go." ⁵He brought the people down to the water. The LORD said to Gideon, "Set apart everyone who laps the water with his tongue the way a dog laps. Do the same with everyone who kneels down on his knees to drink." ⁶The number of those who lapped — bringing their hands to their mouths — was three hundred men. All the rest of the people knelt on their knees to drink water. ⁷The LORD said to Gideon, "With the three hundred men who lapped, I will save you and give Midian into your hand. Let all the rest of the people go, each man to his home." ⁸The people took provisions and their shofars in hand. He sent all the rest of Israel away, each man to his tent, but kept the three hundred men. The Midianite camp was below him in the valley. ⁹That same night the LORD said to him, "Get up and go down against the camp, for I have given it into your hand. ¹⁰But if you are afraid to go down, go down with your servant Purah to the camp. ¹¹You will hear what they are saying, and afterward your hands will be strengthened to go down against the camp." So he went down with his servant Purah to the edge of the armed units stationed in the camp. ¹²Midian, Amalek, and all the people of the east were spread across the valley like locusts in number, and their camels were beyond counting, like the sand on the seashore. ¹³When Gideon arrived, a man was telling his companion a dream. He said, "Listen — I had a dream: a round loaf of barley bread came rolling into the Midianite camp. It struck a tent, and the tent collapsed — it flipped upside down and fell flat." ¹⁴His companion answered, "This can only be the sword of Gideon son of Joash, the Israelite. God has given Midian and the entire camp into his hand." ¹⁵When Gideon heard the account of the dream and its interpretation, he bowed in worship. Then he returned to the Israelite camp and said, "Get up! The LORD has given the Midianite camp into your hand." ¹⁶He divided the three hundred men into three companies and placed shofars in every man's hand, along with empty jars and torches inside the jars. ¹⁷He said to them, "Watch me and do as I do. When I reach the edge of the camp, whatever I do, you do the same. ¹⁸When I and those with me blow the shofar, then you also blow your shofars all around the camp and shout, 'A sword for the LORD and for Gideon!'" ¹⁹Gideon and the hundred men with him reached the edge of the camp at the beginning of the middle watch, just after the guard had been changed. They blew the shofars and shattered the jars that were in their hands. ²⁰All three companies blew their shofars and smashed their jars. They held the torches in their left hands and the shofars in their right hands for blowing, and they shouted, "A sword for the LORD and for Gideon!" ²¹Each man stood in his position around the camp. The entire Midianite camp broke into a run — they screamed and fled. ²²The three hundred kept blowing their shofars, and the LORD turned every man's sword against his companion throughout the entire camp. The camp fled toward Beth-shittah in the direction of Zererah, as far as the border of Abel-meholah near Tabbath. ²³The men of Israel were called out from Naphtali, Asher, and all of Manasseh, and they pursued Midian. ²⁴Gideon sent messengers throughout the hill country of Ephraim, saying, "Come down to intercept Midian — seize the water crossings as far as Beth-barah and the Jordan." All the men of Ephraim rallied and seized the water crossings as far as Beth-barah and the Jordan. ²⁵They captured two Midianite commanders, Oreb and Zeeb. They killed Oreb at the Rock of Oreb and Zeeb at the Winepress of Zeeb. They continued pursuing Midian and brought the heads of Oreb and Zeeb to Gideon on the far side of the Jordan.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator identifies Gideon by his altar name Yerubba'al ('let Baal contend,' from 6:32), connecting the battle narrative back to Gideon's confrontation with Baal worship. Ein Charod ('spring of trembling') — the name is significant: charod means 'trembling, fear,' foreshadowing the fear test that will thin Gideon's army (v. 3). Giv'at ha-Moreh ('hill of the teacher/instructor') places the Midianite encampment in the Jezreel Valley, one of the most strategically important corridors in Canaan.
2. Rav ha-am ('the people are too many') — God's opening statement reverses all military logic. A commander wants more soldiers; God demands fewer. The reason is theological, not tactical: pen yitpa'er alai Yisra'el ('lest Israel glorify themselves against me'). The verb pa'ar in the hitpael means 'to boast, to glorify oneself, to claim credit.' God will not share the glory of deliverance with human military strength. The phrase yadi hoshi'ah li ('my hand saved me') is precisely the claim God intends to prevent — self-salvation is idolatry of the self.
3. Mi yare ve-chared ('whoever is afraid and trembling') — this first test echoes Deuteronomy 20:8, which commands that the fearful be sent home before battle so they do not demoralize their comrades. But here the purpose is different: God is not protecting morale but reducing numbers. The verb tsaphar ('to depart early, to go swiftly') is rare — some read it as 'to turn' or 'to go around' from Har ha-Gil'ad (though Gilead is east of the Jordan; some scholars suggest a local Gilead near the Jezreel Valley or emend to Gilboa). The result is staggering: two-thirds of the army departs. From 32,000 to 10,000 — and God is not yet satisfied.
4. Od ha-am rav ('the people are still too many') — even 10,000 is too large for God's purpose. The verb etsrefennu ('I will refine/test them') comes from tsaraf, a metallurgical term meaning 'to smelt, to refine, to purify' — the same verb used for testing gold or silver by fire (Psalm 12:7, Zechariah 13:9). God is smelting Gideon's army: the water test is a crucible that separates the chosen from the rest. The selection criteria remain entirely in God's hands — Gideon does not choose; he only sorts according to God's verdict.
5. Yaloq bi-leshono min ha-mayim ka'asher yaloq ha-kelev ('laps with his tongue from the water as a dog laps') — the verb laqaq means to lap like an animal, scooping water with the tongue. The comparison to a dog (kelev) is deliberately demeaning in Israelite culture, where dogs were scavengers, not pets. Those who lap water from their hands while standing remain alert; those who kneel with their faces to the water are vulnerable. Many interpreters see military readiness in the distinction, but the text never explains why the lappers are chosen — God's criteria remain His own.
6. Shelosh me'ot ish ('three hundred men') — from 32,000 to 300: a reduction of over 99%. The odds are now roughly 450-to-1 against Israel (the Midianite coalition is described as innumerable in verse 12). The detail be-yadam el pihem ('with their hand to their mouth') clarifies the lapping technique: the 300 did not put their faces to the water but scooped water in their hands and lapped from their cupped palms. This is the selection criterion, but the text emphasizes that the number — not the method — is what matters. Three hundred is deliberately inadequate for conventional warfare.
7. Oshi'a etkhem ('I will save you') — the emphatic first person: I will save. Not 'you will fight and win' but 'I will deliver.' The verb yasha ('to save, deliver, rescue') is the theological center of the chapter. God claims the saving act entirely for Himself. The 300 are the instrument, not the cause. Ve-natatti et Midyan be-yadekha ('and I will give Midian into your hand') — the giving is God's; the hand is Gideon's. God does the giving; Gideon receives.
8. Tsedah ('provisions, food') and shoferoteihem ('their shofars, ram's horn trumpets') — the 300 carry food and shofars, not swords. The weaponry is liturgical, not military: shofars are instruments of worship, assembly, and divine announcement, not tools of combat. This is the first hint that the 'battle' will be won by noise and divine panic, not by human fighting. The positioning — Gideon above, Midian below in the valley (ba-emeq) — gives the 300 the high ground, but with 300 men the tactical advantage is negligible against a vast army.
9. Ki netattiv be-yadekha ('for I have given it into your hand') — the perfect tense (netatti, 'I have given') treats the victory as already accomplished before the battle begins. In God's declaration, the outcome is settled; only the execution remains. This prophetic perfect — speaking of the future as if it has already happened — is a characteristic of divine speech throughout the Hebrew Bible. What God has decreed is as good as done.

10. Ve-im yare attah laredet ('but if you are afraid to go down') — God knows Gideon's character. After the fleece tests, the midnight commission, and every prior hesitation, God still accommodates Gideon's fear. The conditional im yare ('if you are afraid') is a concession, not a rebuke. Purah (the name may mean 'branch' or 'foliage') is Gideon's na'ar ('servant, attendant, armor-bearer'). God sends Gideon on a reconnaissance mission — not to gather intelligence for battle planning, but to overhear something that will strengthen his faith.
11. Ve-achar techezeqnah yadekha ('and afterward your hands will be strengthened') — the promise is specific: what Gideon overhears will give him courage. God orchestrates the conversation Gideon will stumble upon. The chamushim ('armed men, battle formations, organized units') at the camp's edge are the Midianite sentries or forward positions. Gideon creeps to the perimeter of an enemy army that outnumbers him hundreds to one — a moment of raw vulnerability that requires whatever courage he can muster.
12. Ka-arbeh la-rov ('like locusts in multitude') — the locust simile repeats from 6:5, reinforcing the overwhelming scale of the threat. The narrator uses two similes of incalculability: the enemy forces are like locusts (arbeh), their camels like sand on the seashore (ka-chol she-al sefat ha-yam). The sand simile is typically reserved for God's promises to the patriarchs (Genesis 22:17, 32:13) — here it describes the enemy, creating a disturbing inversion. What God promised Abraham in blessing, Israel now faces as threat. The visual contrast between 300 Israelites above and this locust-swarm below is the chapter's central dramatic image.
13. Tselil lechem se'orim ('a round cake of barley bread') — the word tselil is rare, possibly meaning 'round, rolling, tumbling.' Barley bread was the food of the poor; wheat bread was the grain of the wealthy. A barley loaf representing Gideon — a farmer from the weakest clan of Manasseh (6:15) — is fitting. The dream's action is violent: the bread strikes (va-yakkeihu) the tent, causes it to fall (va-yippol), flips it over (va-yahafkeihu le-ma'elah), and the tent collapses flat (ve-nafal ha-ohel). A loaf of cheap bread demolishes a military tent — the absurdity of the image is the theological point. God uses the weak to overthrow the strong.
14. Ein zot bilti im cherev Gid'on ('this is nothing other than the sword of Gideon') — the interpretation is remarkable: a barley loaf is decoded as a sword (cherev). The leap from bread to blade reveals how deeply fear has penetrated the Midianite camp. Gideon's reputation — or God's terror — has preceded him. The Midianite soldier's interpretation contains an unwitting prophecy: natan ha-Elohim be-yado ('God has given into his hand'). A pagan soldier attributes the coming defeat to Israel's God, echoing the very words God spoke to Gideon in verse 9. Even the enemy knows the victory is divine.
15. Va-yishtachu ('he bowed in worship') — Gideon's first response is not tactical planning but worship. The verb shachah means to prostrate oneself, to bow down in reverence. This is a turning point: the man who required fleece tests, signs, and divine patience now responds with immediate, unreserved worship upon hearing a Midianite soldier's dream. What five direct divine encounters could not fully accomplish, an overheard enemy conversation achieves — Gideon believes. His command to the troops mirrors God's own language: natan YHWH be-yedkhem ('the LORD has given into your hand'). Gideon speaks God's words back to the people.
16. Sheloshah rashim ('three companies' — literally 'three heads') — the tactical division into three groups allows a surrounding approach. The equipment list is extraordinary: shofarot (ram's horn trumpets), kaddim reqim ('empty jars' — clay pots), and lappidim ('torches, flames') hidden inside the jars. No swords, no spears, no shields. Every hand holds an instrument of noise and light, not violence. The torches concealed in clay jars is tactically brilliant — the jars hide the light until the moment of coordinated reveal, creating the illusion of a massive army appearing simultaneously from all sides.
17. Mimmenni tir'u ve-khen ta'asu ('watch me and do likewise') — Gideon leads by example, not merely by command. The instruction is simple: observe and imitate. The transformed Gideon now takes the forward position — be-qetseh ha-machaneh ('at the edge of the camp') — the most dangerous location. The fearful farmer of chapter 6 who threshed in hiding now volunteers for the front line. The Spirit's clothing (6:34) and the overheard dream (v. 13-14) have completed his transformation.
18. La-YHWH u-le-Gid'on ('for the LORD and for Gideon') — the battle cry as given here in verse 18 is shorter than the form in verse 20: cherev la-YHWH u-le-Gid'on ('a sword for the LORD and for Gideon'). The KJV supplies 'the sword of' in verse 18, following the longer form of verse 20. The cry pairs YHWH and Gideon — the divine and human agents — but the order is significant: God's name comes first. The shofar blast from three sides simultaneously would create the acoustic impression of an enormous army. Three hundred shofars in the dark, echoing off the valley walls, would sound like thousands.
19. Rosh ha-ashmoret ha-tikkonah ('the beginning of the middle watch') — the Israelite night was divided into three watches. The middle watch began around 10 PM. The timing is precise: akh haqem heqimu et ha-shomerim ('they had just set the watch') — the new sentries were freshly posted, still adjusting to the dark, at their least alert. The coordination required is remarkable: three companies of 100 men each must arrive simultaneously at different points around the camp's perimeter and act in unison. The shattering of the jars (nafots ha-kaddim) would produce a sudden, startling crash from every direction.
20. The full battle cry now appears: cherev la-YHWH u-le-Gid'on ('a sword for the LORD and for Gideon'). The physical choreography is vivid: left hands hold blazing torches (lappidim), right hands hold shofars (shofarot) to their mouths. Both hands are occupied — there is literally no hand free to hold a weapon. The 300 are simultaneously trumpeters, torch-bearers, and war-criers. They are not fighters; they are instruments of psychological warfare orchestrated by God. The simultaneous crash of 300 clay jars, the sudden blaze of 300 torches, the blast of 300 shofars, and the unified war cry from three directions would create the sensory impression of a massive army attacking from all sides.
21. Va-ya'amdu ish tachtav ('each man stood in his place') — the 300 do not charge. They stand still. The Hebrew emphasizes static positioning: they hold ground while the enemy disintegrates. The response of the Midianite camp is triple: va-yarots ('they ran'), va-yari'u ('they screamed/cried out'), va-yanusu ('they fled'). Three verbs of panic in rapid succession — running, screaming, fleeing — describe total psychological collapse. The 300 never draw a weapon; they never take a step forward. The battle is won by standing still while God shatters the enemy's nerve.

- 22. Va-yasem YHWH et cherev ish be-re'eihu ('the LORD set each man's sword against his companion') — this is the decisive theological statement: the LORD (YHWH) is the active agent. God turns the Midianite army against itself. In the dark, panicked, surrounded by noise and fire from every direction, the Midianite soldiers cannot distinguish friend from enemy and begin killing each other. The 'sword' (cherev) in this verse is real — the Midianites' own swords — unlike the metaphorical 'sword' in the battle cry. The irony is precise: the only swords drawn in this battle belong to the enemy, turned against themselves by God.
- 22. The flight path — Beth-shittah, Zererah, Abel-meholah, Tabbath — traces a southeastern retreat toward the Jordan crossing, away from the Jezreel Valley and toward the Transjordan desert from which the Midianites came.
- 23. Va-yitsa'eq ish Yisra'el ('the men of Israel were called out/rallied') — the same three tribes plus Manasseh that responded to Gideon's initial summons in 6:35 (with Zebulun absent here). The 9,700 men sent home earlier (plus others) are now recalled for the pursuit phase. The irony is deliberate: the reduced army of 300 wins the battle; the full tribal muster handles the cleanup. God wanted no confusion about who won — but He allows human effort in the pursuit. The battle belongs to God; the chase belongs to Israel.
- 24. Gideon's strategic thinking emerges in the pursuit: he summons Ephraim — a powerful tribe not part of the original coalition — to cut off the Midianite escape route at the Jordan fords. Likhedu lahem et ha-mayim ('seize the water crossings for them') — controlling the river fords traps the fleeing enemy east of the Jordan. Beth-barah ('house of the ford/crossing') was likely a strategic crossing point. Ephraim's involvement here sets up the inter-tribal conflict in 8:1-3, where the Ephraimites will angrily confront Gideon for not summoning them earlier.
- 25. Shenei sarei Midyan ('two commanders/princes of Midian') — Orev and Ze'ev. The names are vivid: Orev means 'raven' and Ze'ev means 'wolf' — predator names for predatory leaders. The execution sites become named landmarks: Tsur Orev ('Rock of the Raven') and Yegev Ze'ev ('Winepress of the Wolf'). The winepress detail creates a narrative echo: Gideon was first found hiding in a winepress (6:11); now a Midianite commander dies in one. The oppressor's end mirrors the deliverer's beginning.
- 25. The heads brought to Gideon me-ever la-Yarden ('from across the Jordan') indicate Gideon has crossed the Jordan in pursuit — a campaign that will continue in chapter 8. The Ephraimites' independent capture of enemy commanders demonstrates effective military action but also sets the stage for tribal jealousy (8:1).

Summary: Gideon pursues the Midianite kings Zebah and Zalmunna across the Jordan, rebukes Succoth and Penuel for refusing provisions, captures and executes the kings, and refuses the offer of kingship — but makes an ephod that becomes an idolatrous snare.

What Makes This Remarkable: Gideon's refusal of kingship (v. 23) — 'I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you; the LORD will rule over you' — is the book's most explicit anti-monarchical statement. But immediately after, he requests gold earrings and makes an ephod that 'all Israel prostituted themselves after' (v. 27). The deliverer becomes the stumbling block. The verb zanah (v. 27, 'played the prostitute') uses the same word as the judges-cycle framework in 2:17.

Translation Friction: The phrase chesed (v. 35, 'loyal faithfulness') departs from the default rendering 'faithful love' because the context describes Israel's failure toward Gideon's household — human-to-human political loyalty rather than divine covenant. This departure is documented. The ephod's nature (v. 27) is debated: was it a priestly garment, an idol, or an oracular device? The text does not specify, and we rendered it as the Hebrew gives it.

Connections: Gideon's ephod anticipates Micah's idol and Levite in chapters 17-18. The refusal of kingship contrasts with Abimelech's seizure of it in chapter 9 and anticipates the monarchy debate of 1 Samuel 8. The Succoth/Penuel episode echoes the punishment of communities that refuse aid to covenant partners. The seventy sons (v. 30) set up the mass murder of chapter 9.

¹The men of Ephraim said to him, "What is this you have done to us — not calling us when you went to fight Midian?" They confronted him aggressively. ²He said to them, "What have I accomplished compared to you? Are not the gleanings of Ephraim better than the full harvest of Abiezer? ³God gave the princes of Midian — Oreb and Zeeb — into your hand. What was I able to do compared to you?" Then their anger toward him subsided when he said this. ⁴Gideon came to the Jordan and crossed over — he and the three hundred men with him, exhausted but still pursuing. ⁵He said to the men of Succoth, "Please give loaves of bread to the troops following me, because they are exhausted, and I am pursuing Zebah and Zalmunna, kings of Midian." ⁶The leaders of Succoth replied, "Are the fists of Zebah and Zalmunna already in your grip, that we should give bread to your army?" ⁷Gideon said, "Very well — when the LORD gives Zebah and Zalmunna into my hand, I will thresh your flesh with desert thorns and briers." ⁸He went up from there to Penuel and made the same request. The men of Penuel answered him the same way the men of Succoth had answered. ⁹He also said to the men of Penuel, "When I return safely, I will tear down this tower." ¹⁰Zebah and Zalmunna were at Karkor with their camp — about fifteen thousand men, all that remained of the entire army of the eastern peoples. One hundred and twenty thousand sword-bearing men had already fallen. ¹¹Gideon went up by the route of the tent-dwellers east of Nobah and Jogbehah, and struck the camp while it felt secure. ¹²Zebah and Zalmunna fled, but he pursued and captured the two kings of Midian — Zebah and Zalmunna — and threw the entire camp into panic. ¹³Gideon son of Joash returned from the battle by the ascent of Heres. ¹⁴He captured a young man from the people of Succoth and interrogated him. The young man wrote down for him the names of the officials and elders of Succoth — seventy-seven men. ¹⁵He came to the men of Succoth and said, "Here are Zebah and Zalmunna, about whom you mocked me, saying, 'Are the fists of Zebah and Zalmunna already in your grip, that we should give bread to your exhausted men?'" ¹⁶He seized the elders of the city, along with desert thorns and briers, and with them he disciplined the men of Succoth. ¹⁷He tore down the tower of Penuel and killed the men of the city. ¹⁸Then he said to Zebah and Zalmunna, "What about the men you killed at Tabor?" They answered, "They were like you — every one of them had the bearing of a king's son." ¹⁹He said, "They were my brothers — sons of my own mother. As the LORD lives, if you had let them live, I would not kill you." ²⁰He said to Jether his firstborn, "Get up — kill them." But the boy did not draw his sword because he was afraid, for he was still young. ²¹Then Zebah and Zalmunna said, "Rise and strike us yourself — for a man's strength matches his stature." So Gideon rose and killed Zebah and Zalmunna, and took the crescent ornaments from the necks of their camels. ²²The men of Israel said to Gideon, "Rule over us — you, your son, and your grandson — because you have saved us from the hand of Midian." ²³Gideon said to them, "I will not rule over you, and my son will not rule over you. The LORD will rule over you." ²⁴Then Gideon said to them, "Let me make one request of you — each of you give me an earring from his spoil." (The defeated had gold earrings because they were Ishmaelites.) ²⁵They said, "We will gladly give them." They spread out a garment, and each man threw in an earring from his spoil. ²⁶The weight of the gold earrings he requested came to one thousand seven hundred shekels of gold — in addition to the crescent ornaments, the pendants, the purple garments worn by the kings of Midian, and the chains on their camels' necks. ²⁷Gideon made it into an ephod and set it up in his city, in Ophrah. All Israel prostituted themselves to it there, and it became a snare to Gideon and to his household. ²⁸So Midian was subdued before the Israelites and never raised its head again. The land had rest for forty years during the lifetime of Gideon. ²⁹Jerubbaal son of Joash went and settled in his own house. ³⁰Gideon had seventy sons, his own offspring, because he had many wives. ³¹His concubine in Shechem also bore him a son, and he named him Abimelech. ³²Gideon son of Joash died at a ripe old age and was buried in the tomb of his father Joash, in Ophrah of the Abiezrites. ³³As soon as Gideon died, the Israelites turned back and prostituted themselves to the Baals. They made Baal-berith their god. ³⁴The Israelites did not remember the LORD their God, who had rescued them from the hand of all their enemies on every side. ³⁵They did not show loyal faithfulness to the household of Jerubbaal — that is, Gideon — in return for all the good he had done for Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Va-yarivu itto be-chozqah ('they quarreled with him with force/sharply') — the verb riv is a legal term for formal dispute or lawsuit, and chozqah ('strength, force') intensifies the confrontation. Ephraim's complaint is essentially a claim of violated tribal honor — they are the dominant tribe of the central hill country and expect to be summoned for any major military action. This inter-tribal friction anticipates the deeper fractures that will dominate the later chapters of Judges.
2. Gideon's response is a masterclass in diplomatic de-escalation. The metaphor compares olelot ('gleanings' — the grapes left after the main harvest) to batsir ('vintage' — the primary harvest). Gideon is saying: what Ephraim accomplished as an afterthought surpasses what my own clan Abiezer accomplished as its main effort. The rhetorical strategy elevates Ephraim's secondary role above Gideon's primary role. This is strategic humility — Gideon understands that tribal pride, if left unchecked, can fracture the coalition.

3. Raftah rucham me'alav ('their spirit/anger relaxed from upon him') — the verb rafah ('to relax, slacken, weaken') describes the tension draining away. Gideon credits Ephraim with the capture of the Midianite princes Oreb ('raven') and Zeeb ('wolf') — names that ironically cast the Midianite commanders as predatory animals. Gideon's diplomacy works: anger defused by deference. This stands in sharp contrast to Jephthah's handling of the identical Ephraimite complaint in 12:1-6, which ends in civil war and 42,000 dead.
4. Ayefim ve-rodefim ('exhausted yet pursuing') — one of the most memorable phrases in Judges. The participial pair captures the paradox of Gideon's pursuit: physical depletion combined with relentless determination. Three hundred men — the same reduced force from God's selection in chapter 7 — now chase an army across the Jordan into Transjordan territory. The pursuit has moved from the surprise night attack in the Jezreel Valley to a long-distance chase eastward.
5. Succoth (sukkot, 'booths') is a Transjordanian city in the Jordan Valley near the Jabbok River (Genesis 33:17). Gideon's request for kikkerot lechem ('loaves/rounds of bread') is a basic military provision request — his men have been fighting and marching without food. Zebah (zevach, possibly 'sacrifice' or 'slaughter') and Zalmunna (tsalmunna, possibly 'shadow/protection withheld') are named as malkei Midyan ('kings of Midian'), a higher rank than the 'princes' Oreb and Zeeb captured by Ephraim.
6. Ha-khaf Zevach ve-Tsalmunna attah be-yadekha ('Is the palm/fist of Zebah and Zalmunna now in your hand?') — Succoth's leaders demand proof of victory before committing resources. Their refusal is a calculated bet: if Gideon fails, they will face Midianite retaliation for aiding his pursuit. The word kaf ('palm, fist') makes the question visceral — have you physically seized them yet? It is practical cowardice disguised as pragmatism. Succoth hedges against the possibility that Gideon will lose.
7. Ve-dashti et besarkhem ('I will thresh your flesh') — the verb dush ('to thresh') is agricultural language applied to human bodies. Threshing separates grain from chaff by dragging weighted boards studded with stones across the harvest floor; Gideon will drag thorn-studded implements across human flesh. The qotsei ha-midbar ('thorns of the wilderness/desert') and barqanim ('briers, thorn-bushes') are instruments of punishment. This is not idle threat — Gideon will fulfill it in verse 16. The vow reveals a vindictive edge beneath Gideon's earlier diplomacy.
8. Penuel (penu'el, 'face of God') is the site where Jacob wrestled with the angel (Genesis 32:30-31). The city's refusal parallels Succoth's — both Transjordanian towns hedge their bets against Gideon's success. The narrator's compression (ka-asher anu anshei Sukkot — 'as the men of Succoth answered') signals that the response is identical and equally contemptible. The doubling of the refusal amplifies both the offense and the coming retribution.
9. Be-shuvi ve-shalom ('when I return in peace/safely') — Gideon's confidence is absolute. He does not say 'if' but 'when.' The migdal ('tower') was Penuel's fortified structure — its military stronghold and civic pride. Gideon's threat targets the symbol of their security: if they will not support Israel's cause, they will lose the very structure they are trying to protect by hedging. The threat is fulfilled in verse 17.
10. The scale is staggering: me'ah ve-esrim elef ish sholef charev ('120,000 men drawing sword') have already been killed, leaving only 15,000. Karkor is deep in Transjordan, showing how far east the Midianite retreat has gone. The numbers follow the hyperbolic conventions of ancient Near Eastern battle accounts — the theological point is that God's 300 routed an army of 135,000. The phrase benei qedem ('sons of the east') is the umbrella term for the eastern desert coalition.
11. Derekh ha-shokhnei ba-ohalim ('the route of the tent-dwellers') — Gideon uses the nomadic caravan trails to approach the enemy camp from an unexpected direction. The camp was betach ('secure, unsuspecting') — the same word used of Laish in 18:7 and 18:27. They assumed Gideon's exhausted 300 could not reach them this far east. The surprise attack mirrors the night assault of chapter 7, confirming Gideon's tactical ability.
12. Ve-khol ha-machaneh hecherid ('he terrified/threw into panic the entire camp') — the verb charad ('to tremble, to be terrified') in the Hiphil means 'to cause terror.' The same root described the Midianite camp's terror in 7:21. The full-circle irony: the army that once terrorized Israel now experiences charadah itself. The capture of both kings alive is significant — Gideon has specific business with them (vv. 18-21).
13. Milma'aleh ha-Chares ('from the ascent of Heres') — the meaning is debated. Chares can mean 'sun' (a variant of shemesh) or may be a place name. If 'ascent of the sun,' it may indicate Gideon returned before sunrise (i.e., at night, as in his original attack). If a geographic location, it identifies the pass through which he re-entered Israelite territory. The ambiguity is ancient; the KJV renders it temporally ('before the sun was up') while most modern translations treat it as a place name.
14. Va-yikhtov elav ('he wrote for him') — the young man (na'ar) is literate, which is a notable detail suggesting widespread literacy in this period, at least in urban centers. The fact that a random na'ar can write indicates that writing was not limited to scribal elites. The seventy-seven officials (sarei Sukkot ve-et zeqeneiha — 'princes/officials of Succoth and its elders') represents a substantial leadership body for a single town. Gideon systematically identifies every leader who refused him.
15. Asher cheraftem oti ('about whom you taunted/reproached me') — the verb charaf ('to reproach, to mock, to taunt') is the same word used when Goliath 'defied' Israel (1 Samuel 17:10). Gideon quotes their own words back to them — the rhetorical device of returning someone's mockery is a powerful form of vindication. He presents the captive kings as living evidence that their cynicism was wrong. Succoth bet against God's deliverer and lost.
16. Va-yoda bahem et anshei Sukkot ('he taught/made known to them the men of Succoth') — the verb yada ('to know') in the Hiphil means 'to make known, to teach, to cause to experience.' The use of 'teach' for a brutal punishment is grimly ironic: the lesson is inscribed in flesh. Some manuscripts and versions read va-yadash ('he threshed'), which would directly fulfill the threat of verse 7. Either reading indicates severe corporal punishment using thorn-covered implements dragged across the body.

17. Penuel receives harsher punishment than Succoth: not just corporal punishment but execution (va-yaharog et anshei ha-ir — 'he killed the men of the city') and demolition of their tower (natats, 'to tear down, demolish'). The escalation is unexplained — perhaps Penuel's refusal was more defiant, or the tower represented active military resistance. Gideon's violence against Israelite cities is troubling: the deliverer is beginning to act like a king enforcing his will on his own people.
18. Kamokha kamohem ('like you, like them') — the Midianite kings recognize a family resemblance. Their description ke-to'ar benei ha-melekh ('like the appearance/form of the sons of a king') is either genuine praise or an attempt at flattery to save their lives. The word to'ar ('form, appearance, stature') describes physical bearing and nobility. The men killed at Tabor (Mount Tabor, the site associated with Deborah's battle in ch. 4) were Gideon's blood brothers — this transforms the pursuit from military duty into blood vengeance.
19. Achai benei immi hem ('they were my brothers, sons of my mother') — in a polygamous society, full brothers (same mother) share the closest bond. Gideon specifies benei immi ('sons of my mother') to emphasize the intimacy of the relationship. The oath chai YHWH ('as the LORD lives') invokes God as witness to the conditional: lu hachitem otam ('if you had kept them alive'). The implication is that Gideon's pursuit was always partly personal — he was not only acting as Israel's deliverer but as a blood avenger (go'el ha-dam). The dual motivation complicates the narrative's moral texture.
20. Gideon assigns the execution to Yeter bekhoro ('Jether his firstborn') — a culturally significant act. Having the eldest son perform the execution establishes the family's blood claim and initiates the boy into warrior status. But the na'ar ('boy, youth') is too young and afraid (ki yare — 'because he feared'). The word odenu na'ar ('he was still a youth') echoes Gideon's own initial fear and inadequacy. The scene is poignant: Gideon thrusts his son into a role the boy cannot fill.
21. Ki kha-ish gevurato ('for as the man, so is his strength') — a proverbial saying meaning that being killed by a warrior is more honorable than being killed by a boy. The Midianite kings prefer death at the hands of a proven fighter. Gideon complies and takes the saharonim ('crescent-shaped ornaments, moon pendants') from their camels' necks. These crescents are associated with lunar worship common among Arabian peoples; their reappearance in verse 26 connects to the larger theme of pagan religious objects that Gideon accumulates rather than destroys.
22. Meshol banu gam attah gam binkha gam ben binkha ('rule over us — you, your son, your son's son') — this is an explicit offer of hereditary monarchy, a dynastic kingship. The verb mashal ('to rule, to govern') is the standard term for political sovereignty. The threefold generational scope (you, son, grandson) constitutes a dynasty. The justification — ki hosh'a tanu ('because you saved us') — locates kingship's legitimacy in military deliverance. This is the first explicit attempt to establish monarchy in Israel, predating the request to Samuel in 1 Samuel 8.
23. YHWH yimshol bakhem ('the LORD will rule over you') — Gideon's refusal is the theologically correct answer: Israel's king is YHWH. The triple use of mashal (lo emshol ani / lo yimshol beni / YHWH yimshol) creates a powerful rhetorical structure: human rule denied twice, divine rule affirmed once. This statement articulates the ideal of theocracy — direct divine rule without human intermediary. The tragic irony is that Gideon's subsequent actions (the ephod, the seventy sons, the concubine named Abimelech — 'my father is king') systematically contradict this noble declaration.
24. The pivot from refusal to request is immediate and jarring. Gideon has just declined the kingship but now asks for nezem shelalo ('an earring from his spoil') from every soldier. The narrator explains: kismei zahav lahem ki Yishme'elim hem ('they had gold earrings because they were Ishmaelites'). Ishmaelites and Midianites are used interchangeably here, as in the Joseph narrative (Genesis 37:25-28). Gold earrings were characteristic markers of the Arabian desert peoples. The request seems modest, but the aggregate will prove enormous — and its use devastating.
25. Naton nitten ('giving we will give' — we will gladly/certainly give) — the infinitive absolute construction expresses wholehearted willingness. The simlah ('garment, cloak') spread on the ground as a collection surface becomes a visual symbol: the people eagerly contributing to what will become their own spiritual downfall. The scene parallels the golden calf narrative in Exodus 32:2-3, where Aaron asks for gold earrings and the people eagerly comply. The literary echo is almost certainly intentional.
26. Elef u-sheva me'ot zahav ('1,700 gold') — approximately 43 pounds (19.5 kg) of gold, a staggering amount. The inventory of additional items — saharonim ('crescent ornaments'), netifot ('pendants, drops'), bigdei ha-argaman ('purple garments' — royal attire), and anaqot ('chains, necklaces') — reads like a royal treasury. Purple (argaman) was the most expensive dye in the ancient world, extracted from murex snails. That Gideon accumulates these royal and cultic objects while refusing the royal title is the chapter's central irony.
27. Va-ya'as oto Gid'on le-efod ('Gideon made it into an ephod') — the ephod was originally a priestly garment (Exodus 28:6-14) associated with seeking divine oracles. What Gideon constructs from this mass of gold is likely a free-standing cultic object, not a wearable garment. Va-yiznu khol Yisra'el acharav ('all Israel prostituted themselves after it') — the verb zana ('to prostitute, to commit sexual infidelity') is the standard prophetic metaphor for idolatry: Israel's covenant with YHWH is a marriage, and worship of other objects is adultery. The ephod becomes a moqesh ('snare, trap') — the same word used for the forbidden Canaanite altars in 2:3.
27. The theological irony is devastating: the man who tore down his father's Baal altar (6:25-27) and refused the crown (8:23) creates a new idol. The deliverer becomes the source of a new apostasy. Gideon's ephod does not replace YHWH worship explicitly — it is a YHWH-associated object — but its independent cultic status makes it functionally idolatrous. This is the subtler form of covenant violation: not worshipping a foreign god but distorting the worship of the true God.
28. Va-yikkana Midyan ('Midian was subdued/humbled') — the verb kana ('to humble, to subdue, to bring low') is a comprehensive term for total defeat. Lo yasfu la-se't rosham ('they did not again lift their head') — a vivid idiom for permanent subjugation; a defeated people who cannot even look up. The forty years of rest (va-yishqot ha-arets arba'im shanah) is the standard generation of peace in the Judges cycle. The phrase bimei Gid'on ('in the days of Gideon') ominously limits the peace to his lifetime — what follows his death is already foreshadowed.

29. The narrator pointedly uses the name Yerubba'al ('let Baal contend'), the name Gideon earned by tearing down Baal's altar (6:32). The use of this name in the closing summary creates an ironic frame: the man named for opposing Baal now lives with the ephod he created. Va-yeshev be-veito ('he settled in his house') suggests the life of a landed patriarch — a man of substance and property who, despite refusing the crown, lives like a king.
30. Shiv'im banim yotse'ei yerekho ('seventy sons going out of his thigh/loins') — the phrase is biological and emphatic: these are his own biological sons. Seventy is a conventional number for a large ruling family (cf. Ahab's seventy sons in 2 Kings 10:1). Nashim rabbot hayu lo ('he had many wives') — the multiplication of wives is a characteristic of kingship in the ancient Near East and explicitly warned against in the 'law of the king' (Deuteronomy 17:17). Gideon refused the title of king but adopted every practice of one.
31. Pilagsho asher bi-Shekhem ('his concubine who was in Shechem') — the pilegish ('concubine') was a secondary wife with lower legal status. That she resides in Shechem rather than Ophrah indicates a separate household and a connection to the major Canaanite city. The name Avimelekh ('my father is king') is devastatingly ironic: the man who said 'I will not rule over you' names his son 'my father is king.' Whether the name reflects Gideon's hidden ambition or the mother's aspirations, it directly contradicts verse 23. Shechem, the city of Abimelech's mother, will become the stage for the horrific events of chapter 9.
32. Be-seivah tovah ('in a good old age') — the same phrase used of Abraham's death (Genesis 25:8). It denotes a full, complete life concluded with honor. Gideon receives a patriarch's death notice — burial in the family tomb (qever Yo'ash aviv), in his ancestral territory of Ophrah. The dignity of his death contrasts sharply with the catastrophe that immediately follows it. The notice that he is buried with his father closes the family frame opened in 6:11 when Gideon was introduced as the son of Joash.
33. Va-yashuvu benei Yisra'el va-yiznu acharei ha-Be'alim ('the Israelites turned back and prostituted themselves after the Baals') — the verb zana ('to prostitute') appears again, connecting Israel's post-Gideon apostasy to the ephod-worship of verse 27. The cycle is immediate: ka-asher met Gid'on ('as soon as Gideon died'). There is no gap, no gradual decline — the apostasy is instantaneous. Ba'al Berit ('Lord of the Covenant') is a Canaanite deity worshipped at Shechem (cf. 9:4, 46). The name is a devastating parody: Israel abandons the God of the true covenant (berit) for a pagan deity who steals the covenant title.
34. Lo zakheru ('they did not remember') — the verb zakhar ('to remember') in Hebrew is not merely cognitive recall but active loyalty. To 'remember' God is to honor the covenant relationship, to act on the basis of what God has done. Failure to remember is not forgetfulness but abandonment. Ha-matsil otam ('the one who rescued them') uses the Hiphil participle of natsal — God is characterized as the one whose defining activity is deliverance. Israel forgets the Deliverer even as they enjoy the deliverance.
35. Lo asu chesed im beit Yerubba'al ('they did not do chesed with the house of Jerubbaal') — chesed here operates at the human-to-human level: the obligation of loyalty and reciprocal faithfulness owed to a benefactor and his family. Israel's failure is twofold: they forgot God (v. 34) and they abandoned the family of God's agent (v. 35). The phrase ke-khol ha-tovah asher asah im Yisra'el ('according to all the good he did with Israel') measures the ingratitude — Gideon's service was comprehensive (kol, 'all'), but Israel's response was nothing. This sets up chapter 9: the ungrateful nation will stand by as Abimelech slaughters Gideon's seventy sons.
35. Register departure: chesed rendered as 'loyal faithfulness' rather than default 'faithful love' because here chesed describes Israel's failure toward Gideon's household — human-to-human covenant loyalty in a political context rather than divine-human covenant.

Summary: Abimelech, Gideon's son by a Shechemite concubine, murders his seventy brothers on a single stone and makes himself king at Shechem. Jotham's fable of the trees warns against him. Shechem rebels, and Abimelech destroys the city before being killed by a millstone dropped by a woman.

What Makes This Remarkable: Jotham's fable (vv. 7-15) is the only true parable in the Hebrew Bible before the prophets. The trees ask the olive, fig, and vine to be king — each refuses because productive trees have better things to do. Only the thornbush (atad) accepts — worthless, combustible, offering shade it cannot actually provide. The political theology is devastating: the bramble-king will burn the cedars of Lebanon. Abimelech's death by a woman's hand (v. 53) echoes Sisera's and previews a pattern: those who seize power by violence die in humiliation.

Translation Friction: The word ba'al berit (v. 4, 'Baal of the Covenant' or 'Lord of the Covenant') is the name of Shechem's deity — the irony of a 'covenant god' presiding over covenant betrayal is sharp. We transliterated the divine name and noted the irony. The mass fratricide 'on a single stone' (v. 5, al even achat) suggests a ritual or political execution, not random violence.

Connections: Shechem's prominence connects to Genesis 34 (the Dinah incident), Joshua 24 (the covenant renewal), and the future division of the kingdom. Jotham's fable anticipates Nathan's parable to David (2 Samuel 12). The phrase 'God repaid the wickedness of Abimelech' (v. 56) fulfills Jotham's curse exactly. The lone survivor Jotham echoes David as the lone survivor of Saul's purges.

¹Abimelech son of Jerubbaal went to Shechem, to his mother's relatives, and spoke to them and to the entire clan of his mother's father's household, saying, ²"Speak in the hearing of all the citizens of Shechem: 'Which is better for you — to be ruled by seventy men, all of Jerubbaal's sons, or to be ruled by one man?' And remember that I am your own flesh and blood." ³His mother's relatives spoke on his behalf in the hearing of all the citizens of Shechem, repeating all these words. Their hearts turned toward Abimelech, because they said, "He is our kinsman." ⁴They gave him seventy pieces of silver from the temple of Baal-Berith. With it, Abimelech hired reckless and worthless men, and they followed him. ⁵He went to his father's house at Ophrah and killed his brothers, the sons of Jerubbaal — seventy men — on a single stone. But Jotham, the youngest son of Jerubbaal, survived because he hid himself. ⁶All the citizens of Shechem and the entire house of Millo assembled. They went and made Abimelech king beside the oak of the pillar that was in Shechem.

⁷When they told Jotham, he went and stood on the summit of Mount Gerizim. He raised his voice and called out to them:

"Listen to me, citizens of Shechem, so that God may listen to you!"

⁸"The trees once set out to anoint a king over themselves.
They said to the olive tree,
'Reign over us!'"

⁹"But the olive tree said to them,
'Should I abandon my richness,
by which gods and humans are honored,
just to go sway over the trees?'"

¹⁰"Then the trees said to the fig tree,
'You come — reign over us!'"

¹¹"But the fig tree said to them,
'Should I abandon my sweetness and my excellent fruit,
just to go sway over the trees?'"

¹²"Then the trees said to the vine,
'You come — reign over us!'"

¹³"But the vine said to them,
'Should I abandon my wine,
which brings joy to gods and humans,
just to go sway over the trees?'"

¹⁴"Then all the trees said to the thornbush,
'You come — reign over us!'"

¹⁵"And the thornbush said to the trees,
 'If you are truly anointing me king over you,
 come, take shelter in my shade.
 But if not — let fire come out from the thornbush and consume the cedars of Lebanon!'"

¹⁶"Now then — if you have acted in truth and integrity by making Abimelech king, and if you have dealt fairly with Jerubbaal and his household, and if you have treated him as his actions deserved — ¹⁷for my father fought for you and risked his life, and rescued you from the power of Midian — ¹⁸but you have risen against my father's house today and killed his sons — seventy men — on a single stone, and made Abimelech, the son of his slave woman, king over the citizens of Shechem because he is your kinsman — ¹⁹if you have acted in truth and integrity with Jerubbaal and his household today, then rejoice in Abimelech, and let him also rejoice in you! ²⁰But if not — let fire come out from Abimelech and consume the citizens of Shechem and the house of Millo, and let fire come out from the citizens of Shechem and the house of Millo and consume Abimelech!" ²¹Then Jotham fled and escaped. He went to Beer and lived there, away from his brother Abimelech. ²²Abimelech ruled over Israel for three years. ²³God sent a spirit of hostility between Abimelech and the citizens of Shechem, and the citizens of Shechem acted treacherously against Abimelech — ²⁴so that the violence done to the seventy sons of Jerubbaal would be repaid, and their blood would be placed on Abimelech their brother, who murdered them, and on the citizens of Shechem, who strengthened his hand to murder his brothers. ²⁵The citizens of Shechem set ambushes against him on the hilltops and robbed everyone who passed by them on the road. This was reported to Abimelech. ²⁶Gaal son of Ebed arrived with his relatives and crossed into Shechem, and the citizens of Shechem put their trust in him. ²⁷They went out into the fields, harvested their vineyards, trod the grapes, and held a celebration. They entered the temple of their god, ate and drank, and cursed Abimelech. ²⁸Gaal son of Ebed said, "Who is Abimelech, and what is Shechem to him, that we should serve him? Isn't he the son of Jerubbaal, with Zebul as his deputy? Serve the men of Hamor, the father of Shechem! Why should we serve this man? ²⁹If only this people were under my command — I would get rid of Abimelech!" He said to Abimelech, "Build up your army and come out to fight!" ³⁰When Zebul, the governor of the city, heard the words of Gaal son of Ebed, his anger burned. ³¹He sent messengers to Abimelech secretly, saying, "Gaal son of Ebed and his relatives have come to Shechem, and they are stirring up the city against you. ³²Now get up during the night — you and the troops with you — and set an ambush in the open country. ³³At dawn, when the sun rises, move quickly and attack the city. When he and his men come out against you, do to him whatever your hand finds to do." ³⁴Abimelech and all the troops with him moved out at night and positioned themselves in ambush against Shechem in four companies. ³⁵Gaal son of Ebed went out and stood at the entrance of the city gate. Then Abimelech and the troops with him rose from their ambush positions. ³⁶When Gaal saw the troops, he said to Zebul, "Look — people are coming down from the hilltops!" Zebul said to him, "You are seeing the shadows of the hills — they look like men to you." ³⁷Gaal spoke again and said, "Look — people are coming down from the center of the land, and one company is coming by way of the Diviners' Oak!" ³⁸Then Zebul said to him, "Where is your big mouth now — you who said, 'Who is Abimelech that we should serve him?' Isn't this the army you despised? Go out now and fight them!" ³⁹Gaal went out at the head of the citizens of Shechem and fought Abimelech. ⁴⁰Abimelech pursued him, and Gaal fled before him. Many fell dead all the way to the entrance of the gate. ⁴¹Abimelech stayed at Arumah, while Zebul expelled Gaal and his relatives, preventing them from living in Shechem. ⁴²The next day, the people went out into the fields, and this was reported to Abimelech. ⁴³He took his troops and divided them into three companies and set an ambush in the fields. When he saw the people coming out of the city, he rose against them and struck them down. ⁴⁴Abimelech and the company with him rushed forward and took position at the entrance of the city gate, while the two other companies attacked everyone in the fields and struck them down. ⁴⁵Abimelech fought against the city all that day. He captured the city, killed the people in it, tore down the city, and sowed it with salt. ⁴⁶When all the leaders of the Tower of Shechem heard this, they entered the stronghold of the temple of El-Berith. ⁴⁷Abimelech was told that all the leaders of the Tower of Shechem had gathered together. ⁴⁸Abimelech went up Mount Zalmon — he and all the troops with him. He took axes in his hand, cut a branch from the trees, lifted it, and placed it on his shoulder. He said to the troops with him, "What you have seen me do — hurry, do the same!" ⁴⁹All the troops also cut branches, each person one, and followed Abimelech. They piled them against the stronghold and set the stronghold on fire over the people inside. All the people of the Tower of Shechem also died — about a thousand men and women. ⁵⁰Then Abimelech went to Thebez, besieged it, and captured it. ⁵¹There was a fortified tower in the center of the city, and all the men and women — all the citizens of the city — fled there. They shut themselves in and went up to the roof of the tower. ⁵²Abimelech advanced to the tower and fought against it. He approached the entrance of the tower to set it on fire — ⁵³But a woman dropped an upper millstone on Abimelech's head and cracked his skull. ⁵⁴He quickly called to the young man who carried his weapons and said to him, "Draw your sword and kill me, so they won't say about me, 'A woman killed him.'" His attendant ran him through, and he died. ⁵⁵When the men of Israel saw that Abimelech was dead, each one went home. ⁵⁶So God repaid the wickedness of Abimelech that he had done to his father by murdering his seventy brothers. ⁵⁷And all the wickedness of the men of Shechem God brought back on their own heads. The curse of Jotham son of Jerubbaal came upon them.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Abimelech (avimelekh, 'my father is king') — the name itself is a political statement and foreshadows his ambition. He is identified as ben Yerubba'al ('son of Jerubbaal/Gideon'), but critically he goes to Shechem, to achei immo ('his mother's brothers') — his maternal kin. His mother was Gideon's concubine (pilegish) from Shechem (8:31), making Abimelech half-Canaanite and half-Israelite. His power base is not among the Israelite tribes but among the Shechemite clan. The word mishpachat ('clan, extended family') emphasizes the kinship network he will exploit.
2. Ba'alei Shekhem ('citizens/lords of Shechem') — the term ba'al here means 'lord, citizen, property owner,' the civic elite. Abimelech's argument is deceptively simple: would you rather have seventy overlords or one? The number shiv'im ('seventy') is both literal (Gideon had seventy sons, 8:30) and rhetorical — it sounds oppressive. His closing appeal, atsmikhem u-vesarkhem ani ('I am your bone and your flesh'), invokes the kinship bond. This is the language of covenant loyalty (cf. Genesis 29:14, 2 Samuel 5:1), but Abimelech weaponizes it for political ambition.
3. Va-yet libbam acharei Avimelekh ('their heart inclined/turned after Abimelech') — the verb natah ('to turn, incline, stretch') describes a gravitational pull of loyalty. The decisive factor is the tribal bond: achinu hu ('he is our brother/kinsman'). The Shechemites choose ethnic solidarity over any evaluation of character or divine appointment. This is the anti-pattern of Judges: human criteria replacing divine selection. Shechem's decision is immediate and unexamined.
4. Shiv'im kesef mi-beit Ba'al Berith ('seventy silver from the house/temple of Baal-Berith') — seventy pieces of silver from the temple treasury to murder seventy brothers: one shekel per life. The grim arithmetic is almost certainly intentional. Baal-Berith (ba'al berit, 'lord of the covenant') is a Canaanite deity whose name carries devastating theological irony — the 'lord of the covenant' funds the murder of the sons of the man who delivered Israel. The anashim reqim u-fochazim ('empty and reckless men') are mercenaries of the lowest class — reqim ('empty, worthless') and fochazim ('reckless, unstable'). The same word raq ('empty') describes Jephthah's followers in 11:3.
5. Al even echat ('on a single stone') — the mass execution is carried out on one stone, suggesting a ritual or sacrificial dimension. The stone may function as an improvised altar or execution block; the phrase emphasizes the systematic, assembly-line nature of the slaughter. Va-yivvater Yotam ('but Jotham was left/remained') — the verb yatar ('to remain, be left over') is the same root used for the 'remnant' concept in prophetic literature. Jotham (yotam, 'the LORD is perfect/complete') survives because he hid (nechba, 'concealed himself'). The youngest surviving to challenge the tyrant echoes David's position as youngest son.
6. Va-yamlikhu et Avimelekh le-melekh ('they made Abimelech king') — this is the first time in Judges that anyone is actually made melekh ('king'). Gideon refused the title (8:23); his bastard son seizes it by fratricide. Beit Millo ('house of Millo/the filled place') likely refers to a fortified area or citadel within Shechem. The elon mutsav ('oak/terebinth of the pillar/standing stone') connects to the sacred site where Joshua made a covenant (Joshua 24:26) — the coronation of a murderer at a covenant site is deeply ironic. Abimelech's kingship is a grotesque inversion of everything the judges period represents.
7. Va-yissa qolo va-yiqra ('he raised his voice and called out') — the doubled expression signals a formal public proclamation. Mount Gerizim overlooks Shechem from the south and is the mountain of blessing (Deuteronomy 11:29, 27:12); Jotham delivers his curse from the mountain of blessing — another layer of irony. His opening line shim'u elai... ve-yishma aleikhem Elohim ('listen to me... and may God listen to you') frames the fable as more than political rhetoric — it is a prophetic appeal with divine witness. The shift to heightened speech begins here.
8. Halokh halekhu ha-etsim limshoch aleihem melekh ('going, the trees went to anoint over themselves a king') — the infinitive absolute halokh halekhu intensifies the action: the trees deliberately, purposefully set out on this quest. The verb mashach ('to anoint') is the technical term for royal inauguration — the same root as mashiach ('messiah/anointed one'). Jotham's fable is the earliest known political parable in the Hebrew Bible. The trees personified represent the citizens of Shechem seeking a ruler. The olive tree (zayit) is approached first as the most valuable and productive tree in the Israelite economy.

9. Ha-chaddalti et dishni ('should I cease/abandon my fatness/richness') — the olive's response reveals the fable's political logic: productive, valuable members of society have better things to do than rule. The dishni ('my fatness, my oil, my richness') refers to olive oil, essential for cooking, lighting, medicine, and ritual anointing. The phrase yekhabbedu Elohim va-anashim ('by which gods/God and men are honored') elevates olive oil to sacred status — it serves both divine worship and human civilization. The verb nu'a ('to sway, wave, wander') for ruling is deliberately dismissive — kingship is reduced to mere swaying above others.
10. Lekhi at molkhi aleinu ('come, you, reign over us') — the imperative addressed to the fig tree (te'enh) uses feminine forms, following the grammatical gender of trees in Hebrew. The fig tree is the second most valuable tree in the Israelite economy after the olive. The pattern is being established: the trees approach each productive tree in descending order of economic importance.
11. Ha-chaddalti et motqi ve-et tenuvati ha-tovah ('should I abandon my sweetness and my good produce') — the fig tree's refusal echoes the olive's structure but highlights different virtues: motqi ('my sweetness') and tenuvati ha-tovah ('my good fruit/produce'). Figs were a staple food in ancient Israel, dried into cakes for travel and storage. Like the olive, the fig refuses to trade productive contribution for empty authority. The verb nu'a ('sway') again mocks the nature of kingship.
12. La-gafen ('to the vine') — the grapevine is the third productive plant approached. Olive, fig, and vine form the classic triad of Israelite agriculture (Deuteronomy 8:8; 1 Kings 4:25). Each refusal narrows the field until only the worthless candidate remains. The repetition of the invitation formula creates a rhythmic, almost liturgical pattern in the fable.
13. Ha-chaddalti et tiroshi ha-mesammeach Elohim va-anashim ('should I abandon my new wine that gladdens gods/God and humans') — tirosh ('new wine, fresh grape juice') is distinguished from yayin ('fermented wine'). The verb sameach ('to gladden, bring joy') gives wine a quasi-sacred function: it serves both divine offering (drink offerings/nesech) and human celebration. Like the olive's oil, the vine's product operates in both sacred and secular spheres. The three refusals — oil, sweetness, wine — represent the full spectrum of agricultural blessing. What remains is the thornbush.
14. El ha-atad ('to the thornbush/bramble') — the atad is a low, thorny scrub bush, utterly worthless for fruit, shade, or timber. It produces nothing useful and is a fire hazard in the dry season. The contrast with olive, fig, and vine could not be sharper: the trees have exhausted every productive option and now turn to the one plant that contributes nothing. The word kol ('all') is added: all the trees address the thornbush — unanimous desperation. This is Jotham's portrait of Abimelech: the worthless, dangerous option chosen only because every worthy candidate refused.
15. The thornbush's response is the climax of the fable and drips with dark irony. Im be-emet attem moshchim oti le-melek ('if in truth you are anointing me as king') — the thornbush demands absolute sincerity, the one thing this entire arrangement lacks. Bo'u chasu ve-tsilli ('come, take shelter in my shade') is absurd: a thornbush provides no shade. It is a parody of royal protection. The threat is the real point: ve-im ayin tetse esh min ha-atad ve-tokhal et arzei ha-Levanon ('if not, let fire go out from the thornbush and consume the cedars of Lebanon'). Thornbushes catch fire easily in dry conditions; once burning, they spread wildly. The cedars of Lebanon are the most majestic trees in the ancient Near East. The thornbush — the lowliest plant — threatens to destroy the noblest. This is Jotham's prophecy: Abimelech will destroy Shechem, and Shechem will destroy Abimelech.
16. Im be-emet u-ve-tamim asitem ('if in truth and in integrity you have acted') — Jotham now applies the fable to the real situation. The word tamim ('integrity, completeness, wholeness') is a covenant term demanding total honesty. The series of conditional 'if' clauses (im... ve-im... ve-im...) builds a rhetorical case that the Shechemites know they are answering 'no' to every question. Gemul yadav ('the reward/recompense of his hands') refers to Gideon's service — what he earned by his hands in delivering Israel.
17. Va-yashlekh et nafsho mi-neged ('he threw/cast his life from before [him]') — a vivid idiom for risking one's life. The verb shalakh ('to throw, cast') makes the risk visceral: Gideon hurled his very life away for their sake. Jotham calls Gideon avi ('my father'), emphasizing the personal dimension: you are repaying my father's sacrifice with the murder of his sons. Va-yatsel etkhem mi-yad Midyan ('he rescued you from the hand of Midian') — the standard deliverance formula, reminding Shechem of the debt they owe.
18. Ben amato ('son of his slave woman/maidservant') — Jotham deliberately downgrades Abimelech's mother from pilegesh ('concubine,' 8:31) to amah ('slave woman, maidservant'), a pointed insult to Abimelech's status. The repetition of shiv'im ish al even echat ('seventy men on a single stone') hammers the atrocity home. The bitter sarcasm of ki achikhem hu ('because he is your kinsman') throws the Shechemites' own reasoning (v. 3) back in their faces — your only criterion for kingship is ethnic solidarity, and look what it has purchased.
19. Simchu ba-Avimelekh ve-yismach gam hu bakhem ('rejoice in Abimelech and let him also rejoice in you') — this is dripping with sarcasm. Jotham knows they have not acted in truth. The conditional im ('if') carries the weight of 'since you obviously have not.' The mutual rejoicing he describes is impossible — relationships built on murder and treachery cannot produce joy. The verse is the ironic setup for the curse that follows.
20. Jotham's curse directly echoes the thornbush's threat in verse 15 — tetse esh ('let fire go out'). The curse is bilateral and self-consuming: fire from Abimelech destroys Shechem, and fire from Shechem destroys Abimelech. Both parties to this blood-soaked arrangement will annihilate each other. The narrator will show this curse fulfilled with terrible precision: Abimelech destroys Shechem (vv. 45-49) and Shechem's legacy destroys Abimelech (v. 53). The fable is not mere rhetoric — it functions as prophetic judgment.
21. Va-yanas Yotam va-yivrach ('Jotham fled and escaped') — two verbs of flight emphasize his danger. Beer (be'erah, 'well') is an unidentified location, possibly south of Shechem. The phrase mi-penei Avimelekh achiv ('from the face/presence of Abimelech his brother') is devastating — Jotham must flee from his own brother, the one who murdered all the other brothers. The word achiv ('his brother') keeps the fratricidal horror in focus. Jotham disappears from the narrative, but his curse remains active.

- 22. Va-yasar Avimelekh al Yisra'el ('Abimelech ruled/was prince over Israel') — critically, the verb is sar (from the root s-r-r, 'to rule, be prince'), NOT malakh ('to reign as king'). Despite being made melekh by Shechem (v. 6), the narrator refuses to use royal language. He 'ruled' but the text withholds the dignity of the verb 'to reign.' Three years is the shortest tenure in Judges — divine judgment is already in motion.
- 23. Va-yishlach Elohim ruach ra'ah bein Avimelekh u-vein ba'alei Shekhem ('God sent a spirit of evil/hostility between Abimelech and the citizens of Shechem') — this is a rare and theologically significant statement. Ruach ra'ah ('spirit of evil/hostility') is not a demon in the later sense but a divinely dispatched disposition of enmity. God actively intervenes to fracture the alliance between Abimelech and Shechem. The same concept appears with Saul (1 Samuel 16:14-16). The verb bagad ('to deal treacherously, betray') is covenant-violation language — the relationship founded on treachery now collapses through treachery.
- 24. Lavo chamas shiv'im benei Yerubba'al ('so that the violence of the seventy sons of Jerubbaal might come') — chamas ('violence, injustice') is the same word used for the corruption before the flood (Genesis 6:11). Ve-damam lasum al Avimelekh ('and their blood to place upon Abimelech') — blood-guilt (dam) is treated as a physical substance placed on the guilty party. The narrator distributes responsibility to both parties: Abimelech asher harag otam ('who killed them') and ba'alei Shekhem asher chizzqu et yado ('who strengthened his hand') — Shechem financed and enabled the slaughter and shares the guilt.
- 25. Me'arvim ('ambushers, those lying in wait') — the Shechemites' rebellion begins with banditry on the trade routes that pass through Shechem's territory. Since Abimelech presumably controlled and taxed these routes, the robbery is both economic warfare and political provocation. Al rashei heharim ('on the tops/heads of the mountains') gives the ambushers high-ground advantage on the mountain passes. Va-yuggad la-Avimelekh ('it was told to Abimelech') — the passive reporting verb signals the breakdown in the intelligence network between king and city.
- 26. Ga'al ben Eved ('Gaal son of Ebed/Servant') — the name may be pejorative: ga'al can mean 'loathing' and eved means 'servant/slave.' Whether historical names or narrator's contempt, the effect is to diminish this rival. Va-yivtechu vo ba'alei Shekhem ('the citizens of Shechem trusted in him') — the verb batach ('to trust') is significant: Shechem transfers its loyalty from one violent opportunist to another. They have learned nothing from the thornbush fable.
- 27. Va-ya'asu hillulim ('they made praise-festivals/celebrations') — the hillulim is a harvest festival with religious overtones, likely connected to the autumn grape harvest. The sequence — harvest, treading, celebration, temple worship — describes a complete Canaanite agricultural festival. Beit eloheihem ('the house/temple of their god') is the temple of Baal-Berith (v. 4). Va-yeqallelu et Avimelekh ('they cursed Abimelech') — the verb qalal ('to curse, treat lightly') is the opposite of kavad ('to honor, make heavy'). Emboldened by wine and religious fervor, the Shechemites publicly curse their king.
- 28. Mi Avimelekh u-mi Shekhem ki na'avdennu ('who is Abimelech and who is Shechem that we should serve him') — Gaal's rhetoric challenges both Abimelech's legitimacy and Shechem's subordination. His counter-proposal is striking: ivdu et anshei Chamor avi Shekhem ('serve the men of Hamor, father of Shechem') — Hamor was the original Canaanite ruler of Shechem (Genesis 33:19, 34:2). Gaal is appealing to pre-Israelite Canaanite identity: why should native Shechemites serve the half-breed son of an Israelite? This is ethnic nationalism aimed at reversing Abimelech's hybrid rule. Zebul (zevul, 'prince/exalted one') is Abimelech's governor in Shechem — his local enforcer.
- 29. U-mi yitten et ha-am hazeh be-yadi ('who would give this people into my hand' — if only this people were in my hand) — the optative formula mi yitten expresses a wish. Va-asirah et Avimelekh ('I would remove Abimelech') — the verb sur ('to remove, turn aside') treats Abimelech as an obstacle to be cleared away. Gaal's final taunt, rabbeh tseva'akha va-tse'ah ('increase your army and come out!'), is a direct military challenge — drunken bravado that he cannot back up, as events will prove.
- 30. Zevul sar ha-ir ('Zebul, the ruler/governor of the city') — sar designates an appointed official, Abimelech's man in Shechem. Va-yichar appo ('his anger burned/was kindled') — the standard Hebrew idiom for intense anger. Zebul's loyalty to Abimelech is about to be tested; unlike the Shechemites, he remains faithful to the king who appointed him. His response will be cunning rather than confrontational.
- 31. Be-tormah ('secretly, by deception/cunning') — the word suggests both secrecy and strategic deception. Zebul cannot openly oppose Gaal while inside the city. Hinnam tsarim et ha-ir alekha ('they are besieging/pressuring the city against you') — the verb tsur ('to press, besiege, confine') can mean either fortifying the city in rebellion or inciting the city against Abimelech. Zebul frames the situation in urgent military terms to provoke Abimelech's response.
- 32. Qum lailah ('rise at night') — Zebul's tactical advice mirrors the night-attack strategy that characterized Gideon's victory over Midian. Ve-erov ba-sadeh ('and lie in ambush in the field') — the verb arav ('to lie in wait, ambush') is a military tactic; the sadeh ('field, open country') outside Shechem's walls will become the killing ground.
- 33. Ki-zroach ha-shemesh ('at the shining/rising of the sun') — Zebul plans a dawn assault. Tashkim u-fashat'ta al ha-ir ('rise early and raid/rush upon the city') — the verb pashat ('to strip, raid, rush upon') is a military term for a sudden assault. Ve-asita lo ka-asher timtsa yadekha ('do to him as your hand finds') — this idiom means 'do whatever opportunity presents,' giving Abimelech total latitude for violence. Zebul's plan is efficient and ruthless.
- 34. Arba'ah rashim ('four heads/companies') — Abimelech divides his force into four units, a standard military tactic for surrounding a target from multiple directions. The number four suggests coverage from all compass points, cutting off escape routes. This mirrors Gideon's three-company strategy (7:16), though Abimelech adds a fourth. The night movement follows Zebul's advice precisely.

35. Petach sha'ar ha-ir ('the entrance/opening of the city gate') — the gate was the center of civic life and the defensive chokepoint. Gaal standing at the gate suggests either morning routine or watchful vigilance. Va-yaqom Avimelekh... min ha-ma'arav ('Abimelech rose from the ambush') — the timing is precise: Gaal exposes himself just as Abimelech's trap is sprung.
36. Zebul's response is a masterpiece of deception. Et tsel beharim attah ro'eh ka-anashim ('you are seeing the shadow of the mountains as men') — he gaslights Gaal, dismissing the advancing army as an optical illusion. Zebul is buying time for Abimelech's forces to get closer. The word tsel ('shadow') is grimly appropriate — the shadow of death is descending on Shechem. Zebul stands beside Gaal at the gate while secretly orchestrating his destruction.
37. Me-im tabbur ha-arets ('from the navel of the land') — tabbur ('navel, center') identifies a central high point, possibly the sacred center of the Shechem area. Elon me'onenim ('oak of the diviners/soothsayers') — the me'onenim are practitioners of divination (from the root anan, 'to practice divination/observe omens'), and this named oak suggests a site associated with pagan practices. The detail adds to the Canaanite religious atmosphere of the entire narrative. Gaal now recognizes distinct companies approaching from different directions — the trap is closing.
38. Ayyeh efo pikha ('where then is your mouth') — Zebul drops the pretense and turns Gaal's own boasting (v. 28-29) against him. The word peh ('mouth') stands for his bragging — your mouth was brave last night at the festival; where is it now? Asher ma'asta bo ('which you despised/rejected') — the verb ma'as ('to reject, despise') is covenant language often used for Israel's rejection of God. Zebul's taunt forces Gaal into a battle he cannot avoid — fight or be exposed as a coward. The trap is complete.
39. Va-yetse Ga'al lifnei ba'alei Shekhem ('Gaal went out before/at the head of the citizens of Shechem') — despite being trapped, Gaal leads the Shechemites into battle. The preposition lifnei ('before, at the head of') gives him the position of a military leader. But his drunken bravado at the festival (v. 29) is about to meet Abimelech's professional violence.
40. Va-yirddefehu Avimelekh va-yanas mi-panav ('Abimelech pursued him and he fled from his face') — the rout is swift and total. Va-yippelu chalalim rabbim ('many fell slain/pierced') — chalalim ('pierced ones, slain') denotes battle casualties. The pursuit reaches ad petach ha-sha'ar ('to the entrance of the gate') — the same gate where Gaal stood confidently minutes earlier (v. 35). The gate that was his civic platform becomes the boundary of the slaughter.
41. Arumah is Abimelech's base of operations, possibly the same as Rumah. Va-yegaresh Zevul et Ga'al ('Zebul drove out Gaal') — the verb garash ('to drive out, expel') is the same word used for driving out nations from the land. Zebul, having orchestrated Gaal's defeat, now completes the political purge. Gaal disappears from the narrative entirely — he was a minor opportunist crushed between two more ruthless players.
42. Va-yehi mi-mochorat ('it happened on the next day') — the narrative moves quickly. The people of Shechem resume their normal agricultural routine, going out to the sadeh ('field') — perhaps unaware that Abimelech's punitive campaign is not over. Despite Gaal's expulsion, the Shechemites have still participated in rebellion. Va-yaggidu la-Avimelekh ('they reported to Abimelech') — someone provides intelligence, perhaps Zebul maintaining his informant role.
43. Va-yechetsem li-shloshah rashim ('he divided them into three companies') — now three companies rather than four (v. 34), optimized for an open-field engagement rather than a siege. The pattern of ambush (arav) repeating from verse 34 shows Abimelech's consistent tactical approach. Va-yaqom aleihem va-yakkem ('he rose against them and struck them') — the people caught in the fields are defenseless civilians, not combatants. Abimelech's campaign has shifted from defeating Gaal's forces to punishing the general population.
44. Abimelech's tactical genius is evident: he personally seizes the gate (petach sha'ar ha-ir) to cut off retreat into the city, while the other two companies (shenei ha-rashim) sweep the fields. Pashtu ('they rushed/raided') — the verb pashat implies a swift, stripping attack. The people caught between the gate and the field have nowhere to go — trapped between Abimelech at the gate and his forces in the open ground.
45. Va-yittots et ha-ir va-yizra'eha melach ('he tore down the city and sowed it with salt') — the total destruction of Shechem culminates in a ritual act of devastation. Sowing salt renders land agriculturally useless — it is a symbolic curse declaring the site permanently desolate. This act has parallels in ancient Near Eastern treaty curses and was performed on conquered cities marked for permanent abandonment. The irony is crushing: Abimelech, who was made king at Shechem, now annihilates the city that crowned him. Jotham's curse (v. 20) — 'let fire come out from Abimelech and consume the citizens of Shechem' — is being fulfilled with terrible literalness.
46. Ba'alei migdal Shekhem ('the lords/citizens of the Tower of Shechem') — this is the citadel district, possibly the same as Beth-Millo (v. 6). The tseriach ('stronghold, inner chamber, crypt') of Beit El-Berit ('house/temple of El-Berith') — here the deity is called El-Berith ('God of the covenant') rather than Baal-Berith ('Lord of the covenant,' v. 4). The variation may reflect different cult titles for the same deity, or the narrator may be alternating deliberately. The theological irony deepens: the people seek refuge in the temple of the 'god of the covenant' — but no covenant will save them from the consequences of breaking faith.
47. Va-yuggad la-Avimelekh ki hitqabbetsu kol ba'alei migdal Shekhem ('it was reported to Abimelech that all the lords of the Tower of Shechem had assembled') — the passive reporting formula (yuggad) appears again. Abimelech's intelligence network functions efficiently even amid the destruction. The gathering of all the tower's inhabitants into the temple stronghold concentrates the remaining population in one location — making Abimelech's task of total annihilation easier.
48. Har Tsalmon ('Mount Zalmon/Shadow Mountain') — a wooded hill near Shechem. Abimelech's personal example — cutting branches and carrying them on his own shoulder (shikhmo, 'his shoulder,' a wordplay on Shekhem) — shows the charismatic military leadership he inherited from Gideon. Mah re'item asiti maharu asu kamoni ('what you have seen me do, hurry, do like me') — the command echoes Gideon's 'watch me and do likewise' (7:17). Father and son share tactical instinct, but Gideon fought God's enemies while Abimelech massacres his own people.

49. Va-yatsitu aleihem et ha-tseriach ba-esh ('they set the stronghold on fire over/upon them') — the people huddled in the temple crypt are burned alive. Jotham's fable reaches its most horrific fulfillment: 'let fire come out from the thornbush and consume the cedars of Lebanon' (v. 15). The thornbush (Abimelech) has set fire to the very people who crowned him. Ke-elef ish ve-ishah ('about a thousand men and women') — the inclusion of women emphasizes that this is not a battle but a massacre of a civilian population seeking sanctuary in their temple. The 'lord/god of the covenant' could not save them.
50. Tevets is a town northeast of Shechem, apparently part of the same regional rebellion. Va-yichan be-Tevets va-yilkedah ('he camped against Thebez and captured it') — the verbs describe a standard siege operation: encampment followed by capture. Abimelech, flushed with the destruction of Shechem, extends his punitive campaign. The narrator's brevity here is ominous — the real story at Thebez is not the siege but what happens next.
51. Migdal oz ('tower of strength/fortified tower') — the situation mirrors the Tower of Shechem scenario (v. 46), but with different results. The people seek the same kind of refuge — a fortified structure — that failed the Shechemites. Va-yisgeru ba'adam ('they shut/locked behind themselves') — the verb sagar ('to close, lock') suggests barricading. Going up to the gag ha-migdal ('roof of the tower') gives them a defensive height advantage, or so they think.
52. Va-yiggash ad petach ha-migdal le-sorfo va-esh ('he approached to the entrance of the tower to burn it with fire') — Abimelech attempts to replicate his Shechem strategy: burn the fortified refuge with the people inside. The verb saraf ('to burn') echoes the burning of the Tower of Shechem's stronghold (v. 49). He has found a tactic that works and applies it mechanically. But this time, the narrative will not repeat — the fire strategy that destroyed Shechem will be interrupted at Thebez.
53. Va-tashlekh ishah achat pelach rekhev al rosh Avimelekh ('a certain/one woman threw a piece of an upper millstone on Abimelech's head') — the pelach rekhev ('piece of a riding [stone]' — the upper millstone that rides on the lower) is a heavy grinding stone, a domestic implement. The irony is exquisite: the man who murdered seventy brothers on a single stone (v. 5) is killed by a stone dropped by a single woman. Va-tarits et gulgoth ('she cracked/crushed his skull') — the verb ruts ('to crush, crack') and gulgoth ('skull') create a visceral image. The unnamed woman becomes one of the most consequential minor figures in the Hebrew Bible (cf. 2 Samuel 11:21). Abimelech, who slaughtered a thousand men and women at Shechem, is brought down by one woman with a millstone.
54. Shelof charbakha u-moteteni pen yomru li ishah haragathu ('draw your sword and put me to death, lest they say of me, a woman killed him') — Abimelech's final concern is not his soul, not his legacy of governance, not his people, but his masculine honor. Pen yomru ('lest they say') reveals that his dying thought is about reputation, not repentance. The verb motet ('put to death, kill') is a piel intensive — he wants decisive death, not lingering. Va-yidqerehu na'aro va-yamot ('his attendant pierced/thrust him through and he died') — the armor-bearer complies, but it changes nothing. The narrator (and later, Joab in 2 Samuel 11:21) remembers: a woman killed him.
55. Va-yelekh li-meqomo ('they went, each man to his place') — the army dissolves instantly upon the leader's death. There is no successor, no institutional continuity, no dynasty. The entire enterprise was built on one man's ambition, and with his death it evaporates. This is the inherent fragility of power seized by violence rather than granted by divine appointment.
56. Va-yashev Elohim et ra'at Avimelekh ('God returned/repaid the evil of Abimelech') — the verb shuv ('to return, turn back') here means divine retribution. Ra'ah ('evil, wickedness') is the same root as the ruach ra'ah ('spirit of evil') God sent in verse 23. God's instrument of judgment was the very evil that characterized Abimelech's reign. Asher asah le-aviv ('which he did to his father') — the narrator says 'to his father,' emphasizing that the fratricide was ultimately an offense against Gideon/Jerubbaal himself.
57. Heshiv Elohim be-rosham ('God returned upon their heads') — the preposition be-rosham ('on their head') makes the retribution personal and inescapable. Va-tavo aleihem qillat Yotam ben Yerubba'al ('the curse of Jotham son of Jerubbaal came upon them') — the chapter's final verse explicitly confirms that Jotham's curse (v. 20) functioned as prophetic utterance, not merely political rhetoric. The bilateral destruction — Abimelech destroyed Shechem, Shechem (through the woman at Thebez) destroyed Abimelech — fulfills the curse with mathematical precision. The chapter demonstrates what happens when human ambition replaces divine appointment: mutual annihilation.

Summary: Tola and Jair judge Israel in a period of relative quiet. Then Israel again serves the Baals and Ashtoreths, and God gives them into the hands of the Philistines and Ammonites for eighteen years. Israel cries out, and God — initially refusing — relents.

What Makes This Remarkable: God's response to Israel's cry is unlike any previous cycle: He refuses. 'Go and cry out to the gods you have chosen; let them deliver you in your time of distress' (v. 14). The sarcasm is devastating. Only when Israel puts away the foreign gods and God 'could no longer bear Israel's misery' (v. 16, vatiqtsar nafsho ba'amal Yisra'el) does He act. The phrase is extraordinary — God's soul is 'shortened' or 'cut short' by their suffering. Divine compassion overrides divine anger.

Translation Friction: The phrase vatiqtsar nafsho (v. 16) literally means 'His soul was shortened' — it describes impatience, but here it is impatience born of compassion, not irritation. We rendered it 'He could no longer bear Israel's misery' to capture the emotional force. The list of seven oppressor nations (v. 12) — a complete number — suggests that Israel has been oppressed from every direction by every available enemy.

Connections: God's initial refusal anticipates His reluctance in 1 Samuel 8 to give Israel a king. The phrase 'His soul was shortened' echoes the same emotional language in Isaiah 63:9. The Ammonite oppression sets up Jephthah's story in chapter 11. Israel's confession (v. 15, 'we have sinned') is the most explicit repentance in Judges.

¹After Abimelech, Tola son of Puah son of Dodo, a man of Issachar, rose up to deliver Israel. He lived in Shamir in the hill country of Ephraim. ²He judged Israel for twenty-three years, then died and was buried in Shamir. ³After him, Jair the Gileadite rose up and judged Israel for twenty-two years. ⁴He had thirty sons who rode on thirty donkeys, and they controlled thirty towns — called Havvoth-Jair to this day — in the land of Gilead. ⁵Jair died and was buried in Kamon. ⁶The Israelites again did what was evil in the eyes of the LORD. They served the Baals and the Ashtoreths, and the gods of Aram, the gods of Sidon, the gods of Moab, the gods of the Ammonites, and the gods of the Philistines. They abandoned the LORD and did not serve Him. ⁷The LORD's anger burned against Israel, and He sold them into the power of the Philistines and the power of the Ammonites. ⁸They shattered and crushed the Israelites that year — for eighteen years — all the Israelites who were beyond the Jordan in the land of the Amorites, which is in Gilead. ⁹The Ammonites also crossed the Jordan to fight against Judah, Benjamin, and the house of Ephraim. Israel was in severe distress. ¹⁰The Israelites cried out to the LORD, saying, "We have sinned against You — we have abandoned our God and served the Baals." ¹¹The LORD said to the Israelites, "Did I not deliver you from Egypt, from the Amorites, from the Ammonites, and from the Philistines? ¹²The Sidonians, Amalekites, and Maonites also oppressed you. You cried out to Me, and I delivered you from their power. ¹³But you have abandoned Me and served other gods. Therefore, I will not deliver you again. ¹⁴Go and cry out to the gods you have chosen — let them deliver you in your time of distress!" ¹⁵The Israelites said to the LORD, "We have sinned. Do to us whatever seems right to You — only please rescue us today!" ¹⁶They removed the foreign gods from among them and served the LORD. And His spirit could no longer bear Israel's suffering. ¹⁷The Ammonites were called to arms and camped in Gilead. The Israelites assembled and camped at Mizpah. ¹⁸The people — the leaders of Gilead — said to one another, "Who is the man who will take the lead in fighting the Ammonites? He will become the head of all the inhabitants of Gilead."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Va-yaqom acharei Avimelekh lehoshi'a et Yisra'el Tola ('after Abimelech, Tola rose to save/deliver Israel') — the verb hoshi'a ('to save, deliver') is the standard judge-deliverer term, and its use here implicitly contrasts Tola with Abimelech: Abimelech never 'delivered' anyone — he only destroyed. Tola (tola, 'worm' or 'scarlet/crimson') is from the tribe of Issachar but lives in the hill country of Ephraim — a detail suggesting tribal displacement or strategic positioning. His grandfather Dodo (dodo, 'his beloved') appears in some genealogies as a clan name.
2. Va-yishpot et Yisra'el esrim ve-shalosh shanah ('he judged Israel twenty-three years') — the 'minor judge' formula is compressed: length of service, death, burial location. No military exploits are recorded, no enemies named, no narrative developed. The verb shafat ('to judge') here likely means ongoing governance and dispute resolution rather than military deliverance. Twenty-three years of quiet stability after Abimelech's three-year reign of terror represents healing and restoration.
3. Ya'ir ha-Gil'adi ('Jair the Gileadite') — Jair ('he enlightens/shines') is from Gilead, the Transjordanian territory east of the Jordan. The Gileadite connection sets the stage geographically for the Jephthah narrative that follows. His twenty-two year tenure, combined with Tola's twenty-three, gives Israel forty-five years of minor-judge stability — a significant period of peace between the Abimelech disaster and the next major crisis.
4. Sheloshim banim rokhevim al sheloshim ayarim ('thirty sons riding on thirty donkeys') — the threefold repetition of sheloshim ('thirty') creates a pattern of abundance. Riding donkeys (ayarim, 'male donkeys/colts') signifies aristocratic status — donkeys were the prestige mount before horses became common. U-sheloshim ayarim lahem ('and thirty towns belonging to them') — a wordplay: ayarim means both 'donkeys' and 'towns/cities' (different Hebrew words with similar sounds). Chavvot Ya'ir ('the tent-villages/settlements of Jair') is a territorial name that persisted, suggesting Jair's legacy was administrative rather than military. The detail ad ha-yom hazeh ('to this day') indicates the narrator's awareness of ongoing place-name traditions.
5. Qamon is an otherwise unknown Gileadite town. The burial notice completes the minor-judge formula. Both Tola and Jair receive compressed notices — no divine call, no enemy, no battle — functioning as transition markers between the Abimelech catastrophe and the Ammonite crisis that follows. Together they represent about forty-five years of relative calm, the narrative breathing space before the next cycle of apostasy.

6. This verse contains the most comprehensive apostasy catalog in the entire book of Judges — seven categories of foreign gods. Va-ya'avdu et ha-be'alim ve-et ha-ashtarot ('they served the Baals and the Ashtoreths') covers the standard Canaanite fertility deities. Then five additional national pantheons are listed: elohei Aram ('gods of Aram/Syria'), elohei Tsidon ('gods of Sidon/Phoenicia'), elohei Mo'av ('gods of Moab'), elohei benei Ammon ('gods of the Ammonites'), and elohei Pelishtim ('gods of the Philistines'). The catalog covers every geographical neighbor — north, northwest, east, southeast, and southwest. The totality is the point: Israel has adopted the gods of every surrounding nation while abandoning the one God who delivered them. Va-ya'azvu et YHVH ve-lo avaduhu ('they abandoned the LORD and did not serve Him') is the final, devastating summary.
7. Va-yichar af YHVH be-Yisra'el ('the anger of the LORD burned against Israel') — the standard formula for divine wrath. Va-yimkerem be-yad Pelishtim u-ve-yad benei Ammon ('He sold them into the hand of the Philistines and into the hand of the Ammonites') — the verb makhar ('to sell') presents Israel as property that God hands over to foreign powers. The use of two oppressor nations — Philistines from the west and Ammonites from the east — creates a pincer movement of judgment. This dual oppression will split into two separate narrative tracks: the Ammonite crisis is resolved by Jephthah (chapters 11-12), while the Philistine crisis drives the Samson narrative (chapters 13-16).
8. Va-yir'atsu va-yerotsatsu ('they shattered and they crushed') — two near-synonymous verbs of violent oppression are piled together for intensifying effect. The root ra'ats means 'to shatter, break' and ratsats means 'to crush, oppress.' Together they describe a grinding, pulverizing subjugation. The eighteen years of oppression is one of the longer periods in Judges. The geographical focus is Transjordan — the Gileadite territory where Jair had just governed — specifically be-erets ha-Emori asher ba-Gil'ad ('in the land of the Amorite which is in Gilead'), the territory Israel conquered from Sihon (Numbers 21:21-31).
9. Va-ya'avru venei Ammon et ha-Yarden ('the Ammonites crossed the Jordan') — the aggression escalates beyond Transjordan into the heartland of Israel. The three tribes named — Yehudah, Binyamin, and Beit Efrayim — represent the core of western Israel: south, center, and north-center. Va-tetser le-Yisra'el me'od ('it was very distressing/narrow for Israel') — the verb tsarar ('to be narrow, constricted, distressed') conveys the crushing pressure of oppression from all sides. The situation is the most desperate since the opening cycles of Judges.
10. Va-yiz'aqu venei Yisra'el el YHVH ('the Israelites cried out to the LORD') — the verb za'aq ('to cry out, call for help') is the standard appeal for deliverance in the Judges cycle. But this time, unlike previous cycles, the confession is explicit: chatanu lakh ('we have sinned against You'). They name their specific sin: azavnu et Eloheinu va-na'avod et ha-be'alim ('we abandoned our God and served the Baals'). The confession mirrors the accusation of verse 6, suggesting genuine recognition. Yet God's response will be unprecedented — He will not immediately deliver.
11. Va-yomer YHVH el benei Yisra'el ('the LORD said to the Israelites') — this is one of the rare moments in Judges where God speaks directly, not through a prophet or angel. The divine speech begins with a rhetorical question: ha-lo mi-Mitsrayim ('did I not from Egypt...') — God recounts His own resume of deliverances. The list begins with Egypt (the foundational deliverance) and moves through the Amorites (the Transjordanian conquest), the Ammonites, and the Philistines — the very nations now oppressing Israel. The irony is sharp: God saved them from these peoples before, and Israel responded by worshiping their gods.
12. The list continues: Tsidonim ('Sidonians/Phoenicians'), Amaleq ('Amalekites'), and Ma'on ('Maonites' — possibly Meunites, a people from the region of Mount Seir). Lachatsu etkhem ('they oppressed/pressed you') — the verb lachats ('to press, squeeze, oppress') describes the recurring pressure of foreign domination. Va-tits'aqu elai va-oshi'ah etkhem mi-yadam ('you cried to Me and I delivered you from their hand') — God's pattern has been consistent: they cry, He saves. The cumulative weight of this history makes what follows devastating.
13. Ve-attem azavtem oti va-ta'avdu elohim acherim ('but you — you have abandoned Me and served other gods') — the pronoun attem ('you') is emphatic: despite everything I did, YOU abandoned ME. Lakhen lo osif lehoshi'a etkhem ('therefore I will not continue to deliver you') — this is unprecedented in Judges. God refuses to deliver. The verb osif ('add, continue, do again') with the negative lo creates a definitive statement: I am done saving you. This is the most radical divine speech in the book — it challenges the assumption that the cycle of sin-oppression-cry-deliverance will always reset.
14. Lekhu ve-za'aqu el ha-elohim asher bechartem bahem ('go and cry out to the gods you have chosen') — God's command is devastating sarcasm. The verb za'aqu ('cry out') is the same word Israel uses to cry to God (v. 10); God redirects it: use that cry on the gods you preferred. Asher bechartem ('which you chose') emphasizes volition — this was not accident but deliberate choice. Hemmah yoshi'u lakhem be-et tsartkhem ('let them save you in your time of distress') — the challenge is unanswerable: the Baals cannot save. The gods of Aram, Sidon, Moab, Ammon, and Philistia have no power to deliver. God's refusal forces Israel to confront the emptiness of their chosen alternatives.
15. Chatanu asheh attah lanu ke-khol ha-tov be-einekha ('we have sinned — do to us whatever is good in Your eyes') — this is unconditional surrender. Israel does not negotiate, does not make excuses, does not promise future obedience. They accept whatever punishment God chooses. Akh hatsilenu na ha-yom hazeh ('only please rescue us today') — the word akh ('only, just') reduces their request to its barest minimum: we accept any consequence, just save us now. Ha-yom hazeh ('this day, today') conveys the urgency of present suffering. This is the most abject plea in the entire book.
16. Va-yasiru et elohei ha-nekhar mi-qirbam ('they removed the gods of foreignness from their midst') — this time the repentance includes concrete action, not just words. They physically remove (sur, 'to turn aside, remove') the foreign idols. Va-ya'avdu et YHVH ('and they served the LORD') — the cycle reverses. But the critical clause is va-tiqtsar nafsho ba-amal Yisra'el ('and His soul/spirit grew short with the suffering of Israel'). The verb qatsar ('to be short, cut short') with nefesh ('soul, spirit, self') describes God's patience reaching its limit — but not with Israel's sin. God's spirit 'grew short' with their misery (amal, 'toil, suffering, trouble'). Even while angry, even after refusing to deliver, God cannot bear to watch them suffer. This is one of the most profound theological statements in the Hebrew Bible: God's compassion overrides His stated refusal.

17. Va-yitsa'au benei Ammon ('the Ammonites were called together/mustered') — the verb tsa'au here means 'to be summoned, called to assembly' in a military sense. Va-yachanu ba-Gil'ad ('they camped in Gilead') — the Ammonite army positions in the contested Transjordanian territory. The Israelites respond by assembling at ha-Mitspah ('the Mizpah/watchtower') — likely Mizpah of Gilead, a strategic assembly point in Transjordan. The two armies are now positioned for confrontation, setting the stage for the search for a military leader in verse 18 and the Jephthah narrative of chapter 11.
18. Mi ha-ish asher yachel lehillachem bi-vene'i Ammon ('who is the man who will begin/volunteer to fight the Ammonites') — the verb chalal ('to begin, start, initiate') can also carry the sense of 'profane' or 'pierce,' giving the question an edge: who will risk defilement by initiating combat? Yihyeh le-rosh le-khol yoshvei Gil'ad ('he shall be the head of all the inhabitants of Gilead') — they offer the headship (rosh, 'head, chief') as compensation, essentially creating a mercenary arrangement: military leadership in exchange for political power. This sets up the ironic parallel with Abimelech — again, human selection of a leader rather than divine appointment. The question hangs unanswered at the chapter's end, pointing forward to Jephthah in chapter 11.

Summary: Jephthah, an outcast son of a prostitute, is recalled by Gilead's elders to fight Ammon. He negotiates diplomatically, citing Israel's history. When war comes, Jephthah vows a burnt offering of whatever first meets him from his house — and his only daughter comes out dancing.

What Makes This Remarkable: Jephthah's vow (v. 31) is the book's most tragic moment. The Hebrew is unambiguous: 'I will offer it up as a burnt offering' (veha'alitihu olah). Whether the vow was fulfilled literally (human sacrifice) or commuted (perpetual virginity) has been debated for millennia. The text says 'he did to her according to his vow' (v. 39) and gives no indication of divine approval. The narrator's silence is the loudest commentary: in a book about failed leadership, Jephthah's victory costs him everything.

Translation Friction: Jephthah's historical argument to Ammon (vv. 14-27) is remarkably sophisticated — he cites Numbers 20-21 and appeals to the three-hundred-year statute of limitations on territorial claims. The reference to Chemosh (v. 24) as Ammon's god is unusual since Chemosh is typically Moab's deity; this may reflect an ancient boundary confusion or a deliberate rhetorical choice. We rendered it as the Hebrew gives it and noted the difficulty.

Connections: Jephthah is listed among the faithful in Hebrews 11:32 despite the vow's horror — faith and tragedy coexist. His daughter's mourning 'on the mountains' (v. 37) becomes an annual ritual (v. 40), one of the few women's observances in the Hebrew Bible. The historical review (vv. 14-27) parallels Deuteronomy 2 and Numbers 21. The vow's tragedy anticipates Saul's rash oath in 1 Samuel 14:24-45.

1Now Jephthah the Gileadite was a mighty warrior, but he was the son of a prostitute. Gilead was Jephthah's father. 2Gilead's wife also bore him sons. When the wife's sons grew up, they drove Jephthah out and told him, "You will not inherit in our father's house, because you are the son of another woman." 3So Jephthah fled from his brothers and settled in the land of Tob. Worthless men gathered around Jephthah, and they went out raiding with him. 4Some time later, the Ammonites went to war against Israel. 5When the Ammonites fought against Israel, the elders of Gilead went to bring Jephthah back from the land of Tob. 6They said to Jephthah, "Come and be our commander, so we can fight the Ammonites." 7Jephthah said to the elders of Gilead, "Did you not hate me and drive me out of my father's house? So why do you come to me now, when you are in trouble?" 8The elders of Gilead said to Jephthah, "That is exactly why we have turned back to you now. Come with us and fight the Ammonites, and you will be head over all the inhabitants of Gilead." 9Jephthah said to the elders of Gilead, "If you bring me back to fight the Ammonites, and the LORD gives them over to me, then I will be your head." 10The elders of Gilead said to Jephthah, "The LORD is the witness between us — if we do not do exactly as you say." 11So Jephthah went with the elders of Gilead. The people appointed him head and commander over them, and Jephthah spoke all his terms before the LORD at Mizpah. 12Jephthah sent messengers to the king of the Ammonites, saying, "What dispute is between you and me, that you have come to fight against my land?" 13The king of the Ammonites answered Jephthah's messengers, "Because Israel took my land when they came up from Egypt — from the Arnon to the Jabbok and to the Jordan. Now return it peacefully." 14Jephthah sent messengers again to the king of the Ammonites, 15saying to him, "This is what Jephthah says:

Israel did not take the land of Moab or the land of the Ammonites. ¹⁶When they came up from Egypt, Israel traveled through the wilderness to the Sea of Reeds and arrived at Kadesh. ¹⁷Israel sent messengers to the king of Edom, saying, 'Please let me pass through your land.' But the king of Edom would not listen. They also sent to the king of Moab, but he refused. So Israel stayed at Kadesh. ¹⁸Then they traveled through the wilderness, going around the land of Edom and the land of Moab. They came to the east side of the land of Moab and camped on the other side of the Arnon, but they did not enter Moab's territory — because the Arnon was Moab's border. ¹⁹Then Israel sent messengers to Sihon king of the Amorites, who ruled in Heshbon, and Israel said to him, 'Please let us pass through your land to our destination.' ²⁰But Sihon did not trust Israel to pass through his territory. Sihon gathered all his forces and camped at Jahaz, and fought against Israel. ²¹The LORD, the God of Israel, gave Sihon and all his forces into Israel's hand. They defeated them, and Israel took possession of all the land of the Amorites who lived in that region. ²²They took possession of all the Amorite territory — from the Arnon to the Jabbok, and from the wilderness to the Jordan. ²³So now — the LORD, the God of Israel, dispossessed the Amorites before His people Israel. And you think you should possess it? ²⁴Will you not possess what Chemosh your god gives you to possess? And everything that the LORD our God has driven out before us — that we will possess. ²⁵Now — are you any better than Balak son of Zippor, king of Moab? Did he ever dispute with Israel or go to war against them? ²⁶While Israel has lived in Heshbon and its surrounding villages, in Aroer and its surrounding villages, and in all the towns along the Arnon for three hundred years — why did you not reclaim them during that time? ²⁷I have not wronged you, but you are doing me wrong by fighting against me. Let the LORD, the Judge, decide today between the Israelites and the Ammonites." ²⁸But the king of the Ammonites did not listen to the message Jephthah had sent him. ²⁹Then the Spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah. He crossed through Gilead and Manasseh, passed through Mizpah of Gilead, and from Mizpah of Gilead he advanced against the Ammonites. ³⁰Jephthah made a vow to the LORD and said, "If you will certainly give the Ammonites into my hand, ³¹then whatever comes out of the doors of my house to meet me when I return in peace from the Ammonites will belong to the LORD, and I will offer it up as a burnt offering." ³²Jephthah crossed over to the Ammonites to fight them, and the LORD gave them into his hand. ³³He struck them from Aroer all the way to the approaches of Minnith — twenty towns — and as far as Abel-keramim, inflicting a massive defeat. So the Ammonites were subdued before the Israelites. ³⁴When Jephthah came to Mizpah, to his house, there was his daughter, coming out to meet him with tambourines and dancing! She was his only child — he had no other son or daughter. ³⁵When he saw her, he tore his clothes and said, "Oh, my daughter! You have brought me to my knees — you have become my devastation! I have opened my mouth to the LORD, and I cannot take it back." ³⁶She said to him, "My father, you have opened your mouth to the LORD — do to me what you have spoken, since the LORD has carried out vengeance for you against your enemies, the Ammonites." ³⁷She said to her father, "Grant me this one thing: give me two months to go and wander on the mountains and weep over my virginity — I and my companions." ³⁸He said, "Go." He sent her away for two months, and she went with her companions and wept over her virginity on the mountains. ³⁹At the end of two months, she returned to her father, and he did to her according to the vow he had made. She had never known a man. And it became a tradition in Israel ⁴⁰that the daughters of Israel would go year after year to commemorate the daughter of Jephthah the Gileadite, four days each year.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator introduces Jephthah with a devastating juxtaposition: gibbor chayil ('mighty warrior,' a title of highest military honor) immediately collides with ben-ishah zonah ('son of a prostitute woman'). The same title gibbor chayil was applied to Gideon (6:12), but Jephthah's comes with an asterisk — his valor is real, but his social standing is fatally compromised. The word zonah is unambiguous: a woman who sells sexual access. Gilead is both a person and a region; the dual meaning hints that Jephthah belongs to the land even as the land's people will reject him.
2. The brothers' verb is yegareshu ('they drove out, expelled') — the same root (g-r-sh) used for Adam's expulsion from Eden and for the driving out of Canaanite nations. Jephthah is exiled from his own family with the same force Israel uses against foreigners. Their stated reason — ben ishah acheret ('son of another woman') — softens zonah to acheret ('other, different'), but the euphemism barely conceals the contempt. The inheritance dispute (lo tinachal — 'you will not inherit') is both economic and covenantal: Jephthah is denied his portion.
3. Jephthah becomes a bandit chief in erets Tov ('the land of Tob'), an Aramean territory east of Gilead. The men who gather to him are anashim reqim ('empty men, worthless men') — the same descriptor used for Abimelech's mercenaries in 9:4. The parallel is ominous: the last 'empty men' enabler destroyed Shechem. Yet the verb yitlaqtu ('gathered themselves') suggests these men chose Jephthah, drawn to his charisma and skill. The irony deepens: rejected by respectable society, Jephthah builds his own society from its rejects.

4. The phrase mi-yamim ('from days,' meaning 'after some days passed') creates a narrative gap between Jephthah's exile and Ammon's aggression. The Ammonites (benei Ammon — 'sons of Ammon') are Israel's eastern neighbors, descended from Lot (Genesis 19:38). Their attack forces Gilead to confront its earlier decision to expel its strongest fighter.
5. The verb laqachat ('to take, to fetch') — the elders go to retrieve Jephthah like a tool from storage. The same community that expelled him now needs him. The ziquei Gil'ad ('elders of Gilead') represent the established power structure — the very system that endorsed his expulsion. Their journey to Tob is a journey of desperation, not repentance.
6. The title they offer is qatsin ('commander, military leader') — a temporary war-chief, not a permanent ruler. The elders want Jephthah's sword but not his authority. The imperative lekha ('come!') from the mouths of those who once said 'go!' (by expelling him) creates sharp dramatic irony. They propose a transactional arrangement: fight for us, then presumably return to Tob.
7. Jephthah's response is pointed: senetem oti ('you hated me') uses the strong verb s-n- ('hate'), and the expulsion verb garashu returns from verse 2 — now thrown back at the elders. His question madua batem elai ('why have you come to me?') followed by ka'asher tsar lakhem ('when it is tight/distressing for you') exposes their motives. The word tsar ('tight, narrow, distressing') is the root for tsarah ('trouble, distress') — they come not from love but from pressure.
8. The elders escalate their offer from qatsin ('commander,' v. 6) to rosh ('head') — a permanent leadership role over all Gilead's inhabitants. The word lakhen ('therefore, for that very reason') acknowledges the injustice: precisely because they wronged him, they now owe him more. The shift from temporary military authority to permanent political headship reveals how desperate they are. They concede everything Jephthah's brothers once denied him.
9. Jephthah makes the deal explicit and introduces a theological condition: venatan YHWH otam lefanai ('and the LORD gives them before me'). He does not claim personal ability — victory depends on divine action. The conditional im ('if') creates a two-stage test: first the elders must commit, then God must deliver. Only if both conditions are met does Jephthah accept permanent leadership. His political shrewdness matches his military prowess.
10. The elders invoke YHWH yihyeh shomea benotenu ('the LORD will be the one hearing between us') — making God the enforcer of their oath. The verb shomea ('hearing, listening') implies judicial witness: God hears the terms and will hold the violator accountable. The phrase kidvarekha ken na'aseh ('according to your word, so we will do') gives Jephthah full control over the terms. The oath formula is covenantal — a binding agreement with divine enforcement.
11. The installation happens in two dimensions: the people (ha-am) confirm both titles — rosh ('head,' the political role) and qatsin ('commander,' the military role). Then Jephthah speaks kol devarav ('all his words/terms') before the LORD at Mizpah. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') transforms a political negotiation into a sacred covenant. Mizpah ('watchtower') is a significant covenant site — a place where God 'watches' between parties (cf. Genesis 31:49). Jephthah the outcast now stands at the covenant center.
12. Jephthah's first act as leader is diplomatic, not military. The phrase mah li valakh ('what is to me and to you?') is a formula of diplomatic protest — 'what business do you have with me?' His question ki-vata elai lehilachem be-artsi ('that you have come to me to fight against my land') frames the conflict as Ammonite aggression against legitimate Israelite territory. By saying artsi ('my land'), Jephthah claims the land as his own — remarkable for a man who was denied inheritance. The rejected son now speaks for the nation.
13. The Ammonite king's claim defines the disputed territory: from the Arnon (the southern boundary, a deep canyon flowing into the Dead Sea) to the Jabbok (the northern river, modern Zarqa) and to the Jordan (the western border). His demand hashivah ethen beshalom ('return them in peace') presents the choice as war or peaceful restoration. His argument — ki laqach Yisrael et artsi ('because Israel took my land') — frames Israel as the original aggressor. Jephthah's response (vv. 15-27) will dismantle this claim systematically.
14. The phrase vayosef od ('he added again') introduces Jephthah's lengthy diplomatic counter-argument (vv. 15-27), one of the longest diplomatic speeches in Judges. Rather than responding with force, Jephthah builds a careful historical and legal case — demonstrating intellectual sophistication unusual in the Judges cycle.
15. Jephthah opens his legal argument with a flat denial: lo laqach Yisrael ('Israel did not take'). The formula koh amar Yiftach ('thus says Jephthah') mirrors prophetic messenger formulas — Jephthah speaks as an authorized representative. His argument distinguishes between Moabite/Ammonite territory (which Israel did not take) and Amorite territory (which Israel conquered from Sihon). This distinction is crucial: the disputed land was Amorite, not Ammonite, when Israel took it.
16. Jephthah begins a detailed historical recitation of Israel's wilderness journey. Yam Suf ('Sea of Reeds') is the traditional crossing site — rendered here as 'Sea of Reeds' rather than 'Red Sea' following the Hebrew more closely (suf = reeds/rushes). Kadesh (Kadesh-Barnea) was the staging area in the southern wilderness where Israel prepared for entry into the land. Jephthah demonstrates command of Israelite history to establish legal precedent.
17. Jephthah's argument establishes Israel's diplomatic good faith: they requested passage (e'berah-na — 'let me pass through, please') before resorting to force. Both Edom and Moab refused (lo shama, lo avah — 'did not listen, was not willing'). The verb avah ('to be willing, to consent') implies Moab's refusal was deliberate, not incidental. Israel's compliance — vayeshev Yisrael beQadesh ('Israel stayed at Kadesh') — proves they respected territorial boundaries when asked.

18. Jephthah emphasizes Israel's scrupulous respect for borders: vayasov ('they went around, they circled') — the long detour around Edom and Moab rather than forcing passage. The critical detail is velo va'u bigvul Moav ('they did not enter Moab's border'), and the reason: ki Arnon ge'vul Moav ('because the Arnon was Moab's border'). This establishes that Israel recognized and respected territorial sovereignty. If Israel respected Moab's border at the Arnon, they certainly did not take Ammonite land.
19. The pattern continues: diplomacy before force. Sihon is identified as melekh ha-Emori ('king of the Amorites'), not king of Ammon — a critical distinction in Jephthah's argument. The request na'berah-na be-artsekha ('let us pass through your land, please') is identical in form to the request made to Edom. The phrase ad meqomi ('to my place') implies Israel had a specific destination and was not seeking to conquer Sihon's territory.
20. Unlike Edom and Moab who simply refused, Sihon responds with military force: lo he'emin ('he did not trust') Israel's intentions. The verb he'emin (from the root '-m-n, related to 'amen' and 'faithfulness') means Sihon refused to have faith in Israel's word. He gathered kol ammo ('all his people') and chose Jahaz as his battleground. By initiating combat, Sihon forfeited his territorial claims under ancient Near Eastern norms of war — the key to Jephthah's legal argument.
21. The victory is attributed to YHWH Elohei Yisrael ('the LORD God of Israel') — divine agency, not Israelite military superiority. The verb vayirash ('and he dispossessed, took possession') is a key legal term: Israel's title to the land comes by divine conquest, replacing the Amorite inhabitants. Jephthah's point: this was Amorite land (erets ha-Emori), not Ammonite land. Israel conquered it from Sihon the Amorite, not from Ammon.
22. Jephthah defines the conquered territory using the same boundaries the Ammonite king cited in verse 13 — Arnon, Jabbok, Jordan — but identifies it as ge'vul ha-Emori ('the border/territory of the Amorite'). The fourth boundary — min ha-midbar ('from the wilderness') — indicates the eastern desert. The rhetorical strategy is precise: the land the Ammonite king claims was Amorite, not Ammonite, when Israel took it. You cannot reclaim what was never yours.
23. Jephthah's argument turns theological: YHWH Elohei Yisrael horish et ha-Emori ('the LORD God of Israel dispossessed the Amorite'). The verb horish (hiphil of y-r-sh, 'to cause to possess / to dispossess') carries double force — God both expelled the Amorites and granted the land to Israel. The rhetorical question ve-atah tirashennu ('and you — will you possess it?') challenges Ammon to contest not Israel's army but Israel's God. Jephthah frames territorial claims as theological claims.
24. This is the most theologically provocative verse in Jephthah's argument. He invokes Kemosh (Chemosh), the national deity of Moab (not Ammon — Ammon's god was Milcom/Molech), framing the dispute in terms both sides can accept: each nation possesses what their god gives them. The argument is diplomatically brilliant but theologically complex — Jephthah appears to grant Chemosh real agency alongside YHWH. Most scholars see this as diplomatic rhetoric rather than polytheistic confession: Jephthah argues on the Ammonite king's own terms. The error in naming Chemosh (a Moabite god) for an Ammonite king may reflect the historical overlap between Moabite and Ammonite territories, or it may be a deliberate conflation in the narrator's source.
25. Jephthah brings a precedent argument: Balak ben Tzipor, king of Moab (from Numbers 22-24), who hired Balaam to curse Israel, never made a territorial claim. The rhetorical questions harov rav ('did he contend?') and im nilchom nilcham ('did he fight?') use infinitive absolute constructions for emphasis. If Balak — who had far more grievance — never contested Israel's possession, what grounds does the current Ammonite king have? The argument from silence is powerful: three centuries of unchallenged possession.
26. Jephthah's strongest argument: prescription by long possession. Shelosh me'ot shanah ('three hundred years') of unchallenged Israelite occupation constitutes legal title. The cities named — Heshbon (Sihon's former capital), Aroer (on the Arnon's north rim), and their satellite villages (benoteiha — literally 'her daughters') — define the full extent of the contested territory. The rhetorical question madua lo hitsaltem ba-et ha-hi ('why did you not deliver/reclaim them at that time?') is devastating: silence for three centuries forfeits any claim.
27. Jephthah closes his argument with a legal verdict and a divine appeal. The phrase lo chatati lakh ('I have not sinned against you') uses the legal sense of chata' — 'transgress, commit an offense.' His countercharge — atah oseh iti ra'ah ('you are doing evil to me') — reverses the accusation. The climax invokes YHWH ha-Shofet ('the LORD the Judge') to render divine judgment (yishpot). The repetition of sh-f-t (judge) — yishpot YHWH ha-Shofet — is emphatic: the ultimate arbiter is God. Jephthah's case rests on three pillars: historical fact, legal precedent, and divine adjudication.
28. The terse velo shama ('and he did not listen') dismisses Jephthah's entire diplomatic effort in a single phrase. The verb shama ('listen, heed') implies more than hearing — it means 'to accept, to comply.' The Ammonite king's refusal makes war inevitable and, in the narrative logic, makes the Ammonite king morally culpable for the ensuing bloodshed. Diplomacy exhausted, the narrative pivots to war.
29. The phrase vattehi al Yiftach ruach YHWH ('the Spirit of the LORD came upon Jephthah') marks divine empowerment for battle — the same Spirit that came upon Othniel (3:10), Gideon (6:34), and Samson (13:25, 14:6). The verb avar ('crossed, passed over') appears three times in rapid succession, creating a sense of sweeping momentum across the tribal territories. The geographic sequence — Gilead, Manasseh, Mizpah of Gilead — traces Jephthah's military march gathering forces. The critical question the narrative raises: if the Spirit empowers Jephthah, does the vow that follows (v. 30-31) also come from the Spirit — or from Jephthah's own anxiety?
30. The phrase vayidar Yiftach neder la-YHWH ('Jephthah vowed a vow to the LORD') uses the cognate accusative (neder/vow + nadar/to vow) for emphasis — this is a solemn, binding oath. The conditional im naton titten ('if giving you will give' — 'if you will certainly give') uses the infinitive absolute for intensity. The vow comes after the Spirit has already come upon Jephthah (v. 29), raising the question: was the vow necessary? The Spirit should have been assurance enough. Many interpreters see Jephthah's vow as revealing insecurity — a man who bargains with God rather than trusting the empowerment already given.

31. This is one of the most debated verses in the Hebrew Bible. The key phrase veha'alitihu olah ('and I will offer it up as a burnt offering') uses olah, the whole burnt offering where the entire animal is consumed by fire — the most complete form of sacrifice. The word ha-yotse ('the one going out') uses a masculine participle, which could refer to a person or animal. The conjunction in vehayah la-YHWH vecha'alitihu can be read as 'and' (cumulative: 'it will be the LORD's AND I will offer it as a burnt offering') or 'or' (disjunctive: 'it will be the LORD's OR I will offer it as a burnt offering'). The cumulative reading implies literal sacrifice; the disjunctive reading allows for dedication to divine service. The text's ambiguity may be deliberate — the narrator presents the vow without commentary, forcing the reader to sit with its horror. Ancient interpreters were divided: Josephus and most early readers took it as literal sacrifice; later rabbinic tradition (Radak, Kimchi) argued for lifelong dedication to virginity.
32. The victory is reported with devastating brevity: vayitnem YHWH beyado ('the LORD gave them into his hand'). God fulfills the condition of Jephthah's vow — the Ammonites are delivered. The narrator's terseness is itself a statement: the military triumph is not the point. What matters narratively is what happens when Jephthah goes home. The victory that should be the climax becomes merely the trigger for tragedy.
33. The scope of victory is rendered geographically: from Aroer to Minnith (twenty towns) to Abel-keramim ('meadow of vineyards'). The phrase makkah gedolah me'od ('a very great striking') emphasizes the scale of destruction. The verb vayikkane'u ('they were subdued, humbled') uses the niphal of k-n- — forced submission. But the narrator rushes through this triumph, devoting only two verses (32-33) to the entire war. The narrative weight falls elsewhere.
34. The collision between vow and reality arrives with devastating force. The word hineh ('there! look!') forces the reader into Jephthah's perspective at the moment of recognition. His daughter is yotse'at liqrato ('coming out to meet him') — the exact fulfillment of ha-yotse asher yetse middaltei veiti liqrati ('whatever comes out of the doors of my house to meet me,' v. 31). She comes betuppim uvimcholot ('with tambourines and dances') — the traditional victory celebration (cf. Miriam in Exodus 15:20). The narrator's parenthetical — vera'q hi yechidah, ein lo mimmenu ben o-vat ('she was his only one; he had no son or daughter besides her') — maximizes the pathos. The word yechedah ('only one, unique one') echoes Genesis 22:2 where Isaac is called yachid ('your only one'), creating an unmistakable parallel between Jephthah's daughter and the binding of Isaac.
35. Jephthah's grief erupts physically — vayiqra et begadav ('he tore his garments'), the traditional sign of mourning and anguish. His cry ahah bitti ('alas, my daughter!') is raw lament. The verb hikhra'tini ('you have brought me low, brought me to my knees') from k-r- uses the hiphil intensive — she has destroyed him, though she has done nothing wrong. The phrase ve-at hayit be-okhra'i ('you have become among my troublers') uses the root 'k-r-', the same root in Achan's name and story (Joshua 7) — one who brings catastrophe on the community. But the devastating self-indictment follows: anokhi patsiti fi el-YHWH ('I opened my mouth to the LORD') — the fault is his words, not her existence. Velo ukhal lashuv ('I cannot return/retract') reflects the ancient Near Eastern understanding that vows to a deity are irrevocable (cf. Numbers 30:3).
36. The daughter's response is among the most remarkable speeches in the Hebrew Bible. She addresses him as avi ('my father') — the relationship word that should have prevented the vow's fulfillment. Her words aseh li ka'asher yatsa mipikha ('do to me according to what came out of your mouth') accept the vow's binding force. She frames compliance as the proper response to God's faithfulness: acharei asher asah lekha YHWH neqamot me-oyvekha ('since the LORD has carried out vengeance for you against your enemies'). Her theology is flawless — God kept His side of the bargain; the human side must be honored too. She never names herself as victim; she speaks as a covenant participant. Her courage exceeds her father's — she faces the vow's consequence without tearing her garments.
37. Her single request: harpeh mimmenni shenayim chodashim ('release me for two months'). The verb harpeh ('let go, release, relax your grip') implies she is already held by the vow's power. She will yaradti al he-harim ('go down upon the mountains') — the verb yarad normally means 'descend,' but here likely means 'roam' or 'wander' over the mountain terrain. What she mourns is al betulai ('over my virginity') — betulim refers to her virginal state, meaning she will never marry, never bear children, never continue her father's line. In an Israelite context where lineage and progeny were paramount blessings, this is a form of death even if she physically survives. Her companions (re'otai — 'my female friends') will share her grief.
38. Jephthah's response is a single word: lekhi ('go'). The brevity speaks volumes — he has nothing left to say. The narrator reports without commentary: vayishlach otah shenei chodashim ('he sent her for two months'). The verb shalach ('send') is the same used for sending messengers — but here he sends his daughter to grieve her own life. She and her companions vattevk ('wept') — the community of women shares what the community of men caused. The mountains become a space of ritual lamentation, separate from the settlements where men make vows and wars.
39. This is the pivotal and deliberately ambiguous verse. The narrator states vaya'as lah et nidro asher nadar ('he did to her his vow which he had vowed') — but does NOT describe what he actually did. The text is silent at the precise moment the reader most needs to know. Two major interpretive traditions exist: (1) LITERAL SACRIFICE — Jephthah offered his daughter as an olah (burnt offering), which is the plain meaning of the vow in v. 31 and was understood this way by Josephus, Pseudo-Philo, and most early interpreters; (2) PERPETUAL DEDICATION — Jephthah dedicated his daughter to lifelong virginity and service to God, reading the vav in v. 31 as disjunctive ('or'), supported by the narrator's note vehi lo yade'ah ish ('she did not know a man'), which would be superfluous if she were dead. The phrase vattehi choq be-Yisrael ('it became a statute/custom in Israel') introduces the annual commemoration in v. 40. CRITICAL: Unlike Genesis 22, where God intervenes to stop Abraham's sacrifice of Isaac, no angel speaks here. No ram appears. The narrator offers no divine commentary — no approval, no condemnation. The silence of God in this text is itself a theological statement that the reader must confront.
40. The chapter closes with an annual women's ritual: mi-yamim yamimah ('from days to days' — 'year after year') the benot Yisrael ('daughters of Israel') gather letannot levat Yiftach ('to commemorate/lament for the daughter of Jephthah'). The verb tannot is debated: it may derive from t-n-h ('to recount, to rehearse, to lament') — either retelling her story or mourning her fate. The four-day annual observance (arba'at yamim ba-shanah) preserved her memory in Israelite women's tradition. She is never named — she is simply bat Yiftach ('Jephthah's daughter'), defined entirely by the father whose vow consumed her. The women of Israel remember what the men of Israel caused. The Judges cycle continues its descent: from Gideon's compromised victory to Abimelech's tyranny to Jephthah's devastating vow — each judge more costly than the last.

Summary: The Ephraimites challenge Jephthah for not summoning them to battle. Civil war breaks out. Jephthah's Gileadites use the word 'Shibboleth' to identify fleeing Ephraimites, who cannot pronounce the 'sh' sound. 42,000 Ephraimites fall.

What Makes This Remarkable: The Shibboleth test (v. 6) is the Bible's most famous linguistic episode. The Ephraimites' dialect lacked the shin sound, producing 'Sibboleth' instead of 'Shibboleth' — and this phonetic difference became a death sentence. The word itself means 'ear of grain' or 'flowing stream,' and its meaning is irrelevant; what matters is pronunciation. Identity is betrayed by accent, not by argument.

Translation Friction: The phrase vayyomru lo Sibbolet (v. 6, 'they would say Sibbolet') represents a dialectal difference that we can describe but cannot reproduce in English — both 'sh' and 's' exist in English, so the test's lethality requires explanation. We rendered the episode as the Hebrew presents it and noted the phonological reality. The number 42,000 (v. 6) is staggering for inter-tribal conflict — it exceeds most external wars in the book.

Connections: Ephraim's complaint echoes their identical challenge to Gideon (8:1-3), but Jephthah — lacking Gideon's diplomacy — responds with violence. The inter-tribal warfare previews the civil war against Benjamin (ch. 20). The Shibboleth episode has become a universal metaphor for identity testing. The three minor judges closing the chapter (Ibzan, Elon, Abdon) mark time between the major narratives.

¹The men of Ephraim mobilized and crossed over to Zaphon. They said to Jephthah, "Why did you cross over to fight the Ammonites without calling us to go with you? We will burn your house down on top of you!" ²Jephthah said to them, "I and my people had a fierce dispute with the Ammonites. I called for your help, but you did not rescue me from their hand. ³When I saw that you would not save me, I took my life in my hands and crossed over against the Ammonites, and the LORD gave them into my hand. So why have you come up against me today to fight me?" ⁴Jephthah gathered all the men of Gilead and fought Ephraim. The men of Gilead struck down the Ephraimites, because they had said, "You Gileadites are fugitives from Ephraim — you are nothing but Ephraim's and Manasseh's rejects!" ⁵The Gileadites captured the fords of the Jordan ahead of the Ephraimites. Whenever a fugitive from Ephraim said, "Let me cross over," the men of Gilead would ask him, "Are you an Ephraimite?" If he said, "No," ⁶they would say to him, "Say 'shibboleth.'" If he said "sibboleth" — unable to pronounce it correctly — they would seize him and slaughter him at the fords of the Jordan. Forty-two thousand Ephraimites fell at that time. ⁷Jephthah judged Israel for six years. Then Jephthah the Gileadite died and was buried in one of the towns of Gilead. ⁸Following him, Ibzan of Bethlehem served as judge over Israel. ⁹He had thirty sons and thirty daughters. He sent his daughters out in marriage and brought in thirty daughters from outside for his sons. He judged Israel for seven years. ¹⁰Then Ibzan died and was buried in Bethlehem. ¹¹After him, Elon the Zebulonite judged Israel. He judged Israel for ten years. ¹²Elon the Zebulonite died and was buried in Aijalon in the territory of Zebulun. ¹³After him, Abdon son of Hillel the Pirathonite judged Israel. ¹⁴He had forty sons and thirty grandsons who rode on seventy donkeys. He judged Israel for eight years. ¹⁵Abdon son of Hillel the Pirathonite died and was buried in Pirathon, in the territory of Ephraim, in the hill country of the Amalekites.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Ephraimites' complaint echoes their confrontation with Gideon (8:1-3), but this time the rhetoric is far more violent: beitekha nisrof alekha ba-esh ('your house we will burn over you with fire'). The verb yitsa'eq ('they cried out, assembled') implies a military muster, not just verbal protest. The phrase avar tsafonah ('crossed northward') may refer to the town Zaphon (in the Jordan Valley) rather than the direction 'north.' Ephraim's grievance — that they were excluded from the campaign — masks tribal jealousy: they want credit for a victory they did nothing to achieve. The pattern of Ephraimite entitlement recurs across Judges and foreshadows the eventual fracture between northern and southern tribes.

2. Jephthah's response is defensive but factual: ish riv hayiti ani ve-ammi ('a man of strife I was, I and my people') — the conflict was real and intense. Unlike Gideon's diplomatic deflection (8:2-3), Jephthah confronts directly: va'ez'aq etkhem ('I cried out to you') — the verb za'aq is the same cry of distress Israel makes to God throughout Judges. His accusation: velo hosha'tem oti miyyadam ('you did not save me from their hand'). Whether this summons actually happened or Jephthah is fabricating a defense, the text does not say — but his point stands either way.
3. The phrase va'asimah nafshi bekhappi ('I placed my life in my palm') is a vivid idiom for mortal risk — holding one's own life as if it might fall and shatter. Jephthah attributes the victory to divine action: vayitnem YHWH beyadi ('the LORD gave them into my hand'), implicitly asking: if God endorsed my leadership with victory, who are you to challenge it? His final question — lamah alitem elai ('why have you come up against me?') — frames Ephraim's action as aggression against a divinely validated leader.
4. The insult pelitei Efrayim attem ('fugitives of Ephraim you are') cuts deep — the Ephraimites dismiss Gileadites as refugees, people without their own tribal identity, absorbed between Ephraim and Manasseh. This echoes Jephthah's personal history of rejection (11:1-3). The taunt transforms a diplomatic dispute into tribal war. Gilead's furious response — vayakku anshei Gil'ad et Efrayim ('the men of Gilead struck Ephraim') — escalates from words to civil war. Where Gideon defused Ephraimite anger with flattery (8:2), Jephthah answers with the sword.
5. The Gileadites seize the ma'abrot ha-Yarden ('fords/crossing points of the Jordan') — the only way for fleeing Ephraimites to reach home on the west bank. This strategic control transforms a military victory into a systematic execution. The irony is sharp: pelitei Efrayim ('fugitives of Ephraim') was the insult Ephraim hurled at Gilead (v. 4), and now Ephraim's own men are the actual fugitives. The interrogation ha-Efrati atah ('are you an Ephrathite/Ephraimite?') begins the test — but a simple denial is not enough.
6. This verse gave the English language the word 'shibboleth' — a test of group identity through speech. The Hebrew word shibboleth means either 'flowing stream' (fitting the Jordan River context) or 'ear of grain.' The Ephraimite dialect lacked the shin/sin distinction — they pronounced the initial consonant as samekh rather than shin, producing sibboleth instead of shibboleth. The phrase velo yakhin ledabber ken ('he could not establish/manage to speak thus') indicates a genuine dialectal inability, not deliberate deception. The verb vayishchatuhu ('they slaughtered him') uses the verb reserved for animal slaughter (sh-ch-t), dehumanizing the victims. The number arba'im ushenayim elef ('forty-two thousand') represents catastrophic intertribal violence — Israelite killing Israelite over pronunciation. The Judges cycle's descent continues: God's deliverer now presides over civil war.
7. Jephthah's tenure is brief — shesh shanim ('six years') — and his burial notice is strikingly vague: vayiqqaver be-arei Gil'ad ('he was buried in the towns of Gilead'). The plural arei ('towns of') rather than a specific city name is unusual; most judges receive a named burial site. Some scholars suggest textual corruption, others that the vagueness reflects Jephthah's ambiguous legacy — a man who belonged nowhere specific, the perpetual outsider even in death. His judgeship is summarized without evaluation; the narrator lets the reader weigh the cost.
8. The narrative shifts to a series of 'minor judges' — figures given brief biographical notices without deliverance stories. Ibzan is from Beit Lechem ('Bethlehem'), though scholars debate whether this is the famous Bethlehem in Judah or a lesser-known Bethlehem in the Zebulun tribal territory (cf. Joshua 19:15). The minor judges provide chronological continuity and suggest that Israel's governance was not limited to charismatic military deliverers.
9. Ibzan's biography is defined by family: sheloshim banim ushloshim banot ('thirty sons and thirty daughters') — an enormous household indicating wealth and status. The phrase shillach ha-chutsah ('he sent out') refers to marrying daughters into other clans, while hevi levanav min ha-chuts ('he brought in for his sons from outside') means arranging marriages from other families. This network of sixty marriages represents massive political alliance-building through intermarriage — governance through kinship networks rather than military force. The contrast with Jephthah, who lost his only daughter, is painful.
10. Ibzan receives a proper named burial — bebeit lachem ('in Bethlehem') — unlike Jephthah's vague burial notice (v. 7). The minor judges' biographical notices follow a consistent formula: judgeship duration, family details, death, and burial location. These formulaic entries contrast sharply with the extended, troubled narratives of the major judges.
11. Elon (meaning 'oak' or 'great tree') is from the tribe of Zebulun in the northern Galilee region. His entry is the most minimal of all the minor judges — no family details, no notable achievements, only his tribal affiliation and tenure: eser shanim ('ten years'). The name Elon may connect to the sacred oak trees associated with worship sites throughout Judges and Genesis.
12. Elon is buried in Ayalon — a name that shares the same consonantal root as his own name ('-y-l-n, related to 'oak/tree'). This Ayalon in Zebulun's territory is distinct from the more famous Aijalon in Dan (cf. Joshua 10:12). The phonetic connection between the judge's name and his burial site may be coincidental or may reflect a local tradition linking the person to the place.
13. Abdon ('servant, service') son of Hillel ('praise') comes from Pirathon, a town in the Ephraim hill country (cf. 2 Samuel 23:30). His name Avdon from the root '-b-d ('to serve') and his father's name Hillel from h-l-l ('to praise') together suggest 'servant of praise' — though this may be coincidental rather than intentional. His Ephraimite origin is notable given the recent intertribal war with Ephraim (vv. 1-6).
14. Abdon's household is the largest among the minor judges: arba'im banim ushloshim benei vanim ('forty sons and thirty grandsons') — seventy male descendants in total. The detail that they rode al shiv'im ayarim ('on seventy donkey colts') signals wealth and status; donkeys were the riding animals of nobility and judges (cf. 5:10, 10:4). The number seventy echoes Gideon's seventy sons (8:30) and carries symbolic weight as a number of completeness (7 × 10). His eight-year tenure (shemoneh shanim) is modest compared to his household's grandeur.

15. Abdon is buried bePir'aton be-erets Efrayim behar ha-Amaleqi ('in Pirathon in the land of Ephraim in the mountain of the Amalekite'). The reference to har ha-Amaleqi ('the hill of the Amalekite') is enigmatic — Amalekites were desert nomads associated with the Negev and Sinai, not the Ephraim highlands. The name may preserve an ancient memory of Amalekite incursion (cf. 6:3) or a local toponym. The chapter closes with the last of the minor judges before the Samson cycle begins (chapters 13-16), marking the final descent into the chaos that will culminate in the book's concluding refrain: 'In those days there was no king in Israel.'

Summary: An angel of the LORD appears to Manoah's barren wife, announcing she will bear a son who will be a Nazirite from the womb and begin to deliver Israel from the Philistines. Manoah encounters the angel and is terrified. Samson is born.

What Makes This Remarkable: The annunciation to Manoah's wife follows the barren-mother pattern (Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel, Hannah), but with a twist: the angel speaks to the woman, not the man, and she understands the encounter better than her husband does. Manoah asks the angel's name and receives the answer peli ('wonderful/beyond understanding,' v. 18) — the same root as the 'Wonderful' of Isaiah 9:6. The angel ascends in the altar flame (v. 20), merging sacrifice and theophany.

Translation Friction: The Nazirite vow (v. 5) — no wine, no razor, no corpse contact (Numbers 6) — is imposed before birth, making it involuntary. Samson will violate all three conditions during his life. We rendered nazir as 'Nazirite' (one set apart to God) and noted that the word shares a root with nezer ('crown/consecration'). The phrase yachel lehoshi'a (v. 5, 'begin to deliver') is precise: Samson only begins what later generations must complete.

Connections: The barren-mother annunciation echoes Genesis 18 (Sarah) and anticipates 1 Samuel 1 (Hannah) and Luke 1 (Mary). The angel-in-the-flame echoes the burning bush (Exodus 3). Samson's incomplete deliverance ('begin to deliver') sets up the Philistine conflict that dominates 1 Samuel. The Nazirite vow connects to Numbers 6 and anticipates Samuel's dedication (1 Samuel 1:11).

¹The Israelites again did what was evil in the sight of the LORD, and the LORD gave them into the hand of the Philistines for forty years. ²There was a man from Zorah, from the clan of Dan, whose name was Manoah. His wife was unable to conceive and had never given birth. ³The angel of the LORD appeared to the woman and said to her, "You are currently unable to conceive and have not given birth, but you will become pregnant and bear a son. ⁴Now be careful: do not drink wine or any fermented drink, and do not eat anything ritually impure. ⁵For you will become pregnant and bear a son. No razor is to touch his head, because the boy will be a Nazirite dedicated to God from the womb. He will begin to rescue Israel from the hand of the Philistines." ⁶The woman went and told her husband, "A man of God came to me. His appearance was like the appearance of an angel of God — utterly awe-inspiring. I did not ask him where he was from, and he did not tell me his name. ⁷He said to me, 'You will become pregnant and bear a son. Now, do not drink wine or any fermented drink, and do not eat anything ritually impure, because the boy will be a Nazirite of God from the womb until the day of his death.'" ⁸Manoah prayed to the LORD and said, "Please, my Lord, let the man of God you sent come to us again and instruct us on what we should do for the child who is to be born." ⁹God listened to Manoah's voice, and the angel of God came again to the woman while she was sitting in the field. But Manoah her husband was not with her. ¹⁰The woman hurried and ran to tell her husband. She said to him, "The man who came to me the other day has appeared to me again!" ¹¹Manoah got up and followed his wife. He came to the man and asked him, "Are you the man who spoke to this woman?" He answered, "I am." ¹²Manoah said, "When your words come true, what is to be the rule for the boy's life and his work?" ¹³The angel of the LORD said to Manoah, "The woman must be careful about everything I told her. ¹⁴She must not eat anything that comes from the grapevine, and she must not drink wine or any fermented drink, and she must not eat anything ritually impure. She must observe everything I commanded her." ¹⁵Manoah said to the angel of the LORD, "Please let us keep you here while we prepare a young goat for you." ¹⁶The angel of the LORD said to Manoah, "Even if you keep me here, I will not eat your food. But if you prepare a burnt offering, offer it to the LORD." (For Manoah did not know that he was the angel of the LORD.) ¹⁷

Manoah asked the angel of the LORD, "What is your name, so that when your words come true, we can honor you?" ¹⁸The angel of the LORD said to him, "Why do you ask for my name? It is beyond comprehension." ¹⁹Manoah took the young goat and the grain offering and offered them on the rock to the LORD — and He performed something extraordinary while Manoah and his wife watched. ²⁰As the flame rose from the altar toward the sky, the angel of the LORD ascended in the flame of the altar. Manoah and his wife watched, and they fell face-down to the ground. ²¹The angel of the LORD did not appear again to Manoah and his wife. Then Manoah realized that he was the angel of the LORD. ²²Manoah said to his wife, "We are certainly going to die, because we have seen God!" ²³But his wife said to him, "If the LORD intended to kill us, He would not have accepted the burnt offering and the grain offering from our hands. He would not have shown us all these things, and He would not have announced something like this to us just now." ²⁴The woman gave birth to a son and named him Samson. The boy grew, and the LORD blessed him. ²⁵The Spirit of the LORD began to stir him in the camp of Dan, between Zorah and Eshtaol.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The seventh and final cycle opens with the standard formula va-yosifu benei Yisra'el la'asot ha-ra ('the Israelites again did the evil'). This is the longest oppression in Judges — arba'im shanah ('forty years'), a full generation under Philistine domination. Unlike previous cycles, there is no cry for deliverance recorded. The absence of Israel's cry is striking: the people seem to have accepted Philistine rule as normal. The decline of the judges era reaches its nadir.
2. The introduction follows the birth-announcement pattern found with Isaac (Genesis 18), Samuel (1 Samuel 1), and John the Baptist (Luke 1). The word aqarah ('barren') followed by ve-lo yaladah ('and she had not given birth') is emphatic — the situation is humanly impossible. Notably, the wife is never named; she remains 'the wife of Manoah' throughout, yet she proves to be the more perceptive and theologically astute of the pair. Zorah sits on the border between Israelite and Philistine territory in the Shephelah — the zone of conflict that defines Samson's entire life.
3. Malakh YHWH ('the angel of the LORD') — this figure in Judges is consistently presented as more than a mere messenger. In chapter 6, the malakh YHWH is identified with God Himself (6:14, 22). The appearance to the woman rather than to her husband is significant — God chooses to reveal the birth announcement to the one who will carry the child. The promise structure — present impossibility (aqarah, 'barren') followed by future certainty (veharit, 'you will conceive') — echoes the Abrahamic promise pattern.
4. The prohibitions begin with the mother, not the child — she must observe Nazirite-like restrictions during pregnancy. Yayin ('wine') and shekhar ('strong drink, fermented beverage') cover all alcoholic drinks. The term tame ('impure, unclean') refers to foods forbidden under the Levitical dietary laws. The mother's body must be consecrated because the child she carries is already set apart. This prenatal holiness requirement is unique to Samson among all the judges.
5. Morah lo ya'aleh al rosho ('a razor shall not come upon his head') — the uncut hair is the visible sign of the Nazirite vow (Numbers 6:5). The full Nazirite vow includes three prohibitions: no grape products, no contact with the dead, no cutting the hair. Samson will eventually violate all three. The word nezir ('Nazirite, set apart one') comes from the root nazar ('to separate, consecrate'). The phrase min ha-baten ('from the womb') marks this as a lifelong consecration — unlike voluntary Nazirite vows which had a set duration (Numbers 6:13). The verb yachel ('he will begin') is critically important: Samson will only begin the deliverance from the Philistines. The full liberation requires Samuel, Saul, and David. Even before his birth, Samson's mission is framed as incomplete.
6. She describes the visitor as ish ha-Elohim ('a man of God') with an appearance like malakh ha-Elohim ('an angel of God') — she senses the divine nature without fully identifying it. The adjective nora me'od ('very terrible/awesome, utterly awe-inspiring') captures the numinous terror of the divine presence. Her restraint in not asking his origin or name shows either reverence or awe-struck inability to question. The rendering uses 'awe-inspiring' rather than KJV's 'terrible' because the modern English sense of 'terrible' has shifted to mean 'bad' rather than 'fear-inducing.'
7. The woman's report to Manoah subtly differs from the angel's original words. She adds ad yom moto ('until the day of his death') — a phrase the angel did not use in verse 5. She also omits the angel's statement about the razor and about the child beginning to deliver Israel. Whether this represents imperfect memory, interpretive expansion, or the narrator's intentional shaping is debated. The addition of 'until the day of his death' foreshadows the tragic end of the Samson story — his consecration and his death are linked from the beginning.
8. Va-ye'tar Manoah ('Manoah prayed earnestly') — the verb atar means 'to pray, to entreat,' carrying a sense of persistent, heartfelt petition. Manoah's request is understandable — he wants practical parenting instructions (mah na'aseh la-na'ar, 'what shall we do for the boy'). But it also reveals that he needs to see and hear the messenger for himself. The prayer addresses God (YHWH) while asking for the return of the ish ha-Elohim ('man of God') — Manoah correctly connects the messenger with his Sender.
9. God answers Manoah's prayer but sends the angel to the woman again — not to Manoah. The detail that Manoah ein immah ('was not with her') creates a pattern: the angel consistently seeks the woman. She is the primary recipient of the revelation. This may be because she demonstrates greater spiritual perception throughout the narrative — she recognizes the divine nature of the visitor (v. 6) and later offers the correct theological response when Manoah panics (v. 23).

10. Va-temaher... va-tarots ('she hurried... she ran') — the double verb conveys urgency and excitement. Despite the angel appearing to her a second time, she immediately shares the experience with Manoah. The phrase ba-yom ('the day,' or 'the other day') is ambiguous — it could mean 'that day' or 'recently.' The woman serves as mediator between the divine messenger and her husband, a reversal of typical ancient Near Eastern patriarchal patterns.
11. Va-yelekh Manoach acharei ishto ('Manoah went after his wife') — he follows her lead, literally and figuratively. His question ha-attah ha-ish ('Are you the man?') seeks confirmation of identity. The angel's terse response ani ('I am') is simply affirmative here, though the word carries deeper resonances throughout the Hebrew Bible as a form of divine self-identification.
12. Mishpat ha-na'ar u-ma'asehu ('the rule of the boy and his work/deed') — mishpat here means 'prescribed manner, regulation, custom' rather than 'judgment.' Manoah wants a practical manual for raising a Nazirite child. The term ma'asehu ('his deed, his work') asks about the boy's future mission. Manoah's question is well-intentioned but slightly presumptuous — he is asking for details beyond what the angel offered.
13. The angel redirects Manoah to what was already said to the woman — tishamer ('she must guard, be careful'). The angel does not provide the additional instructions Manoah sought. The revelation was sufficient the first time. There is a gentle rebuke implied: Manoah does not need new information; he needs to heed what his wife already received.
14. The angel now expands the earlier prohibition: not just wine and strong drink, but mikol asher yetse mi-gefen ha-yayin ('anything that comes from the vine of wine') — grapes, raisins, grape juice, vinegar. This matches the full Nazirite requirements of Numbers 6:3-4. The expansion suggests that even the mother must observe the complete Nazirite dietary restrictions, not just abstain from alcohol. The threefold prohibition (no vine products, no fermented drinks, no impure food) creates a comprehensive framework of consecrated living.
15. Na'atserah na otekha ('please let us detain you') — Manoah offers hospitality, as Gideon did in 6:18. The gedi izzim ('kid of the goats, young goat') is a standard meal offering for a guest of honor (cf. Genesis 18:7, Judges 6:19). Manoah still thinks he is dealing with a human prophet and offers appropriate hospitality. The parallel with Gideon's theophany in chapter 6 is deliberate — both hosts offer a goat meal, and both encounters end with fire from the altar.
16. The angel refuses to eat — lo okhal be-lachmekha ('I will not eat of your bread/food') — because he is not a human guest. Instead, he redirects the offering: if Manoah wants to prepare something, it should be an olah ('burnt offering, whole offering') directed to YHWH, not a meal shared with a visitor. The narrator's aside — ki lo yada Manoach ki malakh YHWH hu ('for Manoah did not know he was the angel of the LORD') — explains Manoah's confusion. The dramatic irony deepens: the reader knows what Manoah does not.
17. Manoah's question mi shemekha ('what is your name?') seeks to know the identity of the messenger so he can give proper recognition (kibbadnukha, 'we may honor you'). In the ancient Near East, knowing someone's name implied a relationship and the ability to invoke that person. Manoah still operates in a human framework — he wants to credit the prophet when the prediction comes true. The request for a name will receive one of the most mysterious answers in Scripture.
18. Ve-hu peli ('and it is wonderful/incomprehensible') — the word peli comes from the root pala, meaning 'to be extraordinary, beyond human understanding, wonderful.' KJV renders this as 'secret,' but the word does not mean hidden or confidential; it means transcendent, beyond the capacity of human categories. The angel does not refuse to give a name out of secrecy but because his identity cannot be contained in a name. This is the language of theophany — compare Isaiah 9:6 where the Messianic figure's name is pele yo'ets ('Wonderful Counselor'). The angel's refusal signals that Manoah is not dealing with a prophet or even an ordinary angel, but with the divine presence itself.
19. The goat intended as a meal for the guest becomes an olah ('burnt offering') on the tsur ('rock') — an improvised altar. The phrase u-mafli la'asot ('and doing wonderfully, performing something extraordinary') uses the same root pala as verse 18. What was 'beyond comprehension' in the angel's name now becomes visible in the angel's action. The transition from minchat hospitality to sacrificial worship marks the shift from human interaction to divine encounter. Manoah and his wife are witnesses — ro'im ('watching, seeing') — to something that defies natural explanation.
20. Va-ya'al malakh YHWH be-lahav ha-mizbeach ('the angel of the LORD went up in the flame of the altar') — the angel does not merely depart; he ascends within the sacrificial fire itself. The image fuses the messenger with the offering — the angel rides the flame heavenward, uniting the divine presence with the sacrifice in a single ascending movement. This directly parallels Gideon's experience in 6:21, where fire springs from the rock and consumes the offering. The prostration (va-yippelu al peneihem artsah, 'they fell on their faces to the ground') is the instinctive response to theophany — the same posture of worship and terror seen throughout Scripture when humans encounter God's unmediated presence.
21. Az yada Manoach ('then Manoah knew') — the recognition comes only after the angel's departure. Throughout the encounter, Manoah operated under the assumption that he was hosting a human prophet. The supernatural ascent in the flame makes the truth undeniable. The verb yada ('to know') marks a cognitive and spiritual shift — what the woman perceived intuitively from the start (v. 6), Manoah grasps only through dramatic demonstration. His slower perception is not presented as a moral failing but as a narrative device that heightens the revelation.
22. Mot namut ki Elohim ra'inu ('dying we shall die, for God we have seen') — the infinitive absolute mot namut intensifies the certainty of death. Manoah's fear is rooted in the widespread ancient belief that seeing God means death (Exodus 33:20, Genesis 32:30, Isaiah 6:5). His identification of the angel as Elohim ('God') is theologically significant — the malakh YHWH is God appearing in visible form. The panic is understandable, but his wife will immediately demonstrate superior theological reasoning.
23. The unnamed woman's logic is flawless: lu chafets YHWH lahamitenu ('if the LORD desired to kill us') — she reasons from God's actions to His intentions. God accepted the sacrifice (evidence of favor, not wrath), revealed visions (investment in their future, not their destruction), and announced a birth (promise, not threat). Her three-part argument moves from worship (offering accepted) to revelation (things shown) to promise (birth announced). This is one of the finest examples of practical theology in Judges — she reads God's character from God's behavior. The contrast with Manoah is striking: he leaps to fear; she reasons toward faith.

24. Shimshon — the name likely derives from shemesh ('sun'), possibly meaning 'little sun' or 'sun-like one.' Zorah, Samson's hometown, overlooks the Sorek Valley to the west, facing the setting sun — the direction of Philistine territory. The name may also be wordplay with the nearby site Beth-Shemesh ('house of the sun'). Va-yevarakhehu YHWH ('and the LORD blessed him') — a brief note of divine favor that will make Samson's later rebellion all the more tragic. The boy is blessed, consecrated, and named for the sun — yet his story will end in darkness and blindness.
25. Va-tachel ruach YHWH lefa'amo ('the Spirit of the LORD began to stir/impel him') — the verb pa'am means 'to thrust, strike, impel, stir.' The Spirit's action on Samson begins as stirrings — impulses toward action. This is the first of several Spirit-empowerment statements in the Samson cycle. The verbs will escalate: here the Spirit 'stirs' (pa'am), in 14:6 and 14:19 and 15:14 the Spirit 'rushes upon' (tsalach), and in 16:20 the Spirit departs (sar). The geography — Machaneh Dan ('camp of Dan'), between Zorah and Eshtaol — is the same place where Samson will be buried (16:31), forming an inclusio around his entire life.

Summary: Samson demands a Philistine wife from Timnah. On the way, he kills a lion with his bare hands. Later he finds honey in the carcass and poses a riddle at his wedding feast. When his wife extracts the answer, he kills thirty Philistines for their garments and abandons his wife.

What Makes This Remarkable: The narrator offers a theological key the characters lack: 'his father and mother did not know that it was from the LORD, who was seeking an occasion against the Philistines' (v. 4). Samson's desire for a Philistine wife — which violates every Deuteronomic principle — is used by God to provoke conflict with the Philistines. The riddle (v. 14, 'out of the eater came something to eat, out of the strong came something sweet') is both clever and theological: destruction produces sustenance, a pattern woven through the entire Samson narrative.

Translation Friction: The verb tsalach (v. 6, 'rushed upon') describes the Spirit's action as violent irruption, not gentle empowerment. We rendered it 'rushed upon' to preserve the Hebrew's force. Samson's contact with the lion carcass violates his Nazirite vow (corpse contact, Numbers 6:6), though the text does not comment — the silent violations accumulate.

Connections: The Spirit rushing upon Samson echoes its action on Othniel (3:10), Gideon (6:34), and Jephthah (11:29), but Samson is the only judge whose Spirit-empowerment serves personal rather than communal purposes. The honey-from-the-lion image anticipates the theological paradox of Samson's death (ch. 16): out of destruction comes deliverance. The Philistine-wife theme contrasts with the inter-Israelite marriage ideals of Deuteronomy

7.

1Samson went down to Timnah and saw a Philistine woman there. 2He went back up and told his father and mother, "I saw a Philistine woman in Timnah. Now get her for me as a wife." 3His father and mother said to him, "Is there no woman among your relatives or among all our people, that you must go take a wife from the uncircumcised Philistines?" But Samson told his father, "Get her for me, because she is the one I want." 4His father and mother did not realize that this was from the LORD, who was seeking an opportunity to confront the Philistines — for at that time the Philistines were ruling over Israel. 5Samson went down with his father and mother to Timnah. When they reached the vineyards of Timnah, a young lion came roaring toward him. 6The Spirit of the LORD rushed upon him, and he tore the lion apart as one would tear apart a young goat — with nothing in his hands. But he did not tell his father or mother what he had done. 7He went down and spoke with the woman, and she was pleasing in Samson's eyes. 8Some time later, when he returned to marry her, he turned aside to look at the lion's carcass. A swarm of bees had settled in the lion's body, along with honey. 9He scraped it out into his hands and walked along eating it. When he came to his father and mother, he gave some to them and they ate it too. But he did not tell them that he had taken the honey from the lion's carcass. 10His father went down to the woman, and Samson held a feast there, as was the custom for young men. 11When the Philistines saw him, they provided thirty companions to be with him. 12Samson said to them, "Let me pose a riddle to you. If you can solve it during the seven days of the feast, I will give you thirty linen garments and thirty sets of clothing. 13But if you cannot solve it, then you will give me thirty linen garments and thirty sets of clothing." They said to him, "Pose your riddle — let us hear it." ¹⁴He said to them: "Out of the eater came something to eat; out of the strong came something sweet." They could not solve the riddle for three days. ¹⁵On the seventh day, they said to Samson's wife, "Persuade your husband to tell us the answer to the riddle, or we will burn you and your father's household alive. Did you invite us here just to rob us?" ¹⁶Samson's wife wept over him and said, "You only hate me — you do not love me! You posed a riddle to my people and haven't told me the answer!" He said to her, "I haven't even told my father or mother. Why would I tell you?" ¹⁷She wept over him through the seven days of the feast. On the seventh day he told her, because she had pressured him relentlessly. Then she told the answer to her people. ¹⁸On the seventh day, before the sun set, the men of the city said to him: "What is sweeter than honey? What is stronger than a lion?" He said to them, "If you had not plowed with my heifer, you would not have found out my riddle." ¹⁹The Spirit of the LORD rushed upon him. He went down to Ashkelon, struck down thirty men there, took their clothing, and gave the garments to those who had answered the riddle. Burning with anger, he went back up to his father's house. ²⁰And Samson's wife was given to the companion who had been his best man.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Va-yered Shimshon Timnatah ('Samson went down to Timnah') — the verb yarad ('to go down') is geographically accurate (Timnah is lower than Zorah) but also signals spiritual descent. Throughout the Samson cycle, his movements are consistently downward — toward Philistine territory, toward compromise, toward captivity. Timnah was a border town in the Sorek Valley, roughly four miles from Zorah. The phrase mi-benot Pelishtim ('from the daughters of the Philistines') immediately signals trouble — the man set apart as a Nazirite is drawn to the women of the very people he is meant to oppose.
2. Samson's demand qechu otah li le-ishah ('get her for me as a wife') is blunt and imperious. He does not ask; he commands. The verb ra'iti ('I saw') echoes the language of desire and temptation — seeing leads to wanting, as with Eve in Genesis 3:6 and David in 2 Samuel 11:2. Marriage to a Philistine woman would violate the prohibition against intermarriage with the nations (Deuteronomy 7:3), though the Philistines are not explicitly listed among the prohibited peoples in that text. Samson's parents will serve as the voice of covenant faithfulness in the next verse.
3. The parents' objection uses the term ha-arelim ('the uncircumcised') — the most contemptuous Israelite designation for the Philistines, defining them by what they lack: the covenant sign. Samson's response ki hi yashrah be-einai ('because she is right/pleasing in my eyes') uses the exact phrase that characterizes the moral chaos of the judges era — 'everyone did what was right in their own eyes' (17:6, 21:25). The Nazirite judge embodies the very problem he was born to address. He does what is 'right in his own eyes' rather than what is right in God's eyes.
4. Ki me-YHWH hi ('for it was from the LORD') — this stunning editorial comment reveals that God works through Samson's sinful desire to achieve divine purposes. The word to'anah ('occasion, opportunity, pretext') means God is looking for a provocation, a reason to initiate conflict with the Philistines. This does not excuse Samson's lust; it shows God's sovereignty operating through human failure. The narrator adds the political context: Pelishtim moshelim be-Yisra'el ('the Philistines were ruling over Israel'). God's plan for deliverance runs through the very compromise that makes Samson an unlikely judge. The tension between divine sovereignty and human responsibility is left deliberately unresolved.
5. Kefir arayot ('a young lion') — kefir refers to a young but fully grown lion in its prime, not a cub. The lion sho'eg liqrato ('roaring to meet him, charging at him') is a lethal threat. The location in the karme'i Timnatah ('vineyards of Timnah') is significant — a Nazirite should have no business in vineyards, where grapes grow. The text may subtly hint that Samson is already in territory that compromises his vow. His parents are present for the journey but apparently not for the lion encounter, as verse 6 notes he told them nothing about it.
6. Va-titslach alav ruach YHWH ('the Spirit of the LORD rushed upon him') — the verb tsalach means 'to rush, to advance forcefully.' This is the characteristic verb for the Spirit's empowerment of Samson, appearing three times in the cycle (14:6, 14:19, 15:14). It conveys sudden, overwhelming, almost violent infusion of divine power. The result is superhuman: va-yeshasse'ehu ke-shassa ha-gedi ('he tore it as one tears a kid') — shasa means 'to tear, to rip apart.' The comparison to tearing a young goat makes the extraordinary seem casual. The secrecy — lo higgid le-aviv ule-immo ('he did not tell his father and mother') — is puzzling. It may set up the later narrative requirement: if his parents knew about the lion, the riddle would be solvable.
7. Va-tishar be-einei Shimshon ('she was pleasing in the eyes of Samson') — the verb yashar ('to be straight, right, pleasing') echoes verse 3 where the same root described his desire (yashrah be-einai, 'right in my eyes'). The repetition emphasizes that Samson's motivation is entirely visual and personal. The verb yarad ('went down') appears again — his pattern of descent continues. He speaks with the woman (va-yedabber la-ishah) but the content of the conversation is not recorded; what matters to the narrative is the sensory attraction.
8. Va-yasar lir'ot et mappolet ha-aryeh ('he turned aside to see the carcass of the lion') — the verb sur ('to turn aside') suggests a deliberate detour. Samson goes looking for the dead animal. The geviyat ha-aryeh ('body/corpse of the lion') contains bees and honey. This sets up a critical Nazirite violation: touching a dead body (mafelet, 'carcass, fallen thing') directly violates Numbers 6:6-7, which prohibits a Nazirite from going near any dead body. Samson has now crossed a boundary of his consecration — and he does it casually, out of curiosity.

9. Va-yirdehu el kappav ('he scraped it into his palms') — the verb radah means 'to scrape out, to extract.' Samson physically reaches into the dead carcass, making direct contact with the corpse — an unambiguous Nazirite violation. He then shares the contaminated honey with his parents without disclosure: lo higgid lahem ('he did not tell them'). This is the second secret (cf. v. 6). The pattern of concealment deepens Samson's isolation — he operates alone, hiding his actions from those closest to him. His parents unknowingly share in the ritual defilement. The honey from the dead lion becomes the basis for the riddle, linking Samson's violation to the coming conflict.
10. Va-ya'as sham Shimshon mishteh ('Samson made a feast there') — the word mishteh derives from the root shatah ('to drink'). A mishteh is literally a 'drinking feast' — a banquet centered on wine and alcohol. For a Nazirite who is forbidden all grape products, hosting a drinking feast is at minimum a profound irony and likely another vow violation. The narrator adds ki khien ya'asu ha-bachurim ('for so the young men used to do') — it was the cultural norm. Samson conforms to Philistine social customs rather than maintaining his Nazirite separation. The term bachurim ('young men') emphasizes youthful social pressure and convention over covenant obligation.
11. The sheloshim mere'im ('thirty companions') are Philistine groomsman assigned to Samson. The phrasing ki re'otam oto ('when they saw him') may suggest they were impressed — or intimidated — by his physical presence. These 'companions' may also function as guards or minders, keeping an eye on the powerful Israelite in their midst. The number thirty will become significant when Samson must obtain thirty sets of garments as riddle payment (v. 19).
12. Achudah na lakhem chidah ('let me pose a riddle to you') — the verb chud ('to propound a riddle') introduces the central literary device of the chapter. The chidah ('riddle') was a respected intellectual contest in the ancient Near East (cf. Solomon and the Queen of Sheba, 1 Kings 10:1). The stakes are high: sheloshim sedinim ('thirty linen garments' — expensive undergarments) and sheloshim chaliphot begadim ('thirty changes of clothing' — complete outfits). This is a significant wager, equivalent to outfitting thirty men in luxury clothing.
13. The terms are symmetrical — the same payment either way: thirty of each garment type. The companions accept readily: chudah chidatekha ve-nishma'ennah ('pose your riddle and let us hear it'). Their confidence will prove misplaced, as the riddle is unsolvable without inside knowledge. No amount of intellectual effort can crack it, because it depends on a private experience — Samson's encounter with the lion. The riddle is not really fair; it is a trap disguised as a game.
14. Me-ha-okhel yatsa ma'akhal u-me-az yatsa matok ('from the eater came food, from the strong came sweetness') — the riddle is elegant in Hebrew, with parallel structure and alliterative wordplay (okhel/ma'akhal). The 'eater' is the lion; the 'food' is the honey. The 'strong one' is the lion; the 'sweet' is the honey. But without knowing about the lion carcass, the riddle is genuinely unsolvable — it describes a unique personal experience, not a universal phenomenon. The three-day failure establishes the companions' desperation, which drives them to coerce Samson's wife.
15. The companions' threat is savage: pen nisrof otakh ve-et beit avikh ba-esh ('lest we burn you and your father's house with fire'). This is not an idle threat — they will carry it out in 15:6. The verb patti ('entice, persuade, seduce') from the root patah carries connotations of deception and sexual manipulation. They pressure the wife to use her intimate access to Samson as a weapon. The accusation ha-leyarshenu qera'tem lanu ('did you call us to impoverish us?') reveals their real concern: the financial stakes of the wager. The threat creates an impossible situation for the woman — caught between Samson and his enemies.
16. Va-tevk eshet Shimshon alav ('Samson's wife wept over him') — her tears are a weapon of emotional manipulation, though her fear is genuine (v. 15). Her argument — raq sne'atani ve-lo ahavtani ('you only hate me and do not love me') — frames the riddle as a test of love rather than an intellectual game. This same pattern of weeping and emotional pressure will recur with Delilah in chapter 16, but with far more devastating consequences. Samson's defense — 'I haven't told my parents' — is logically sound but emotionally tone-deaf. It will not hold.
17. Ki hetsiqathu ('because she pressed him hard, pressured him relentlessly') — the verb tsaqaq means 'to press, to constrain, to squeeze.' The image is of constant, unrelenting emotional pressure. Samson's strength is physical, not emotional — he can tear apart a lion but cannot withstand a woman's tears. This vulnerability will prove fatal in chapter 16. The wife immediately relays the answer to her people (va-tagged ha-chidah li-vnei ammah), demonstrating that her loyalty lies with her own people, not her husband. The pattern — Samson telling a secret to a woman who betrays it to his enemies — will repeat with escalating consequences.
18. The answer — mah matok mi-devash u-meh az me-ari ('what is sweeter than honey, what is stronger than a lion') — is presented as two rhetorical questions rather than a direct statement, giving it a triumphant quality. They deliver the answer be-terem yavo ha-charsah ('before the sun went down') — just in time. Samson's furious response uses a crude agricultural metaphor: lulei charashtem be-eglai ('if you had not plowed with my heifer') — comparing his wife to a cow and their interrogation of her to plowing. The metaphor implies both sexual betrayal and informational exploitation. Samson instantly knows how they obtained the answer — there was no other way.
19. Va-titslach alav ruach YHWH — the second 'rushing' of the Spirit (cf. v. 6). The Spirit empowers Samson not for national deliverance but to settle a personal gambling debt. He goes to Ashkelon — a major Philistine city about twenty-three miles southwest — kills thirty men (the exact number needed), strips their chalitsotam ('spoils, clothing'), and pays the wager. The violence is divinely empowered but personally motivated. Va-yichar appo ('his anger burned') — Samson's rage drives him home, abandoning his wife. The narrator records this descent into fury without moral commentary, letting the reader draw conclusions.
20. Le-mere'ehu asher re'ah lo ('to his companion who had been his friend/best man') — the ultimate betrayal. The mere'a was the 'best man' or 'friend of the bridegroom' (cf. John 3:29). Samson's abandonment of his wife was interpreted by her family as divorce, and she was given to the very man who stood beside Samson at the wedding. This final verse sets up the chain of retaliations in chapter 15. What began with Samson's desire for a Philistine woman ends with losing her to a Philistine man — the irony is complete.

Summary: Samson discovers his wife has been given to another man. He ties torches to foxes' tails and burns the Philistine grain fields. The Philistines retaliate by burning his wife. Samson slaughters them, then kills a thousand with a donkey's jawbone and is miraculously given water from the rock.

What Makes This Remarkable: The escalation is relentless: personal grievance becomes agricultural terrorism becomes mass slaughter. The jawbone of a donkey (lechi hachamor, v. 15) — the most contemptible weapon imaginable — becomes an instrument of divine deliverance. Samson's naming of the site Ramath-lehi ('Jawbone Height,' v. 17) and his desperate prayer for water (v. 18) are his only recorded prayer until his death — and God answers by splitting open the hollow place, producing water from the very jawbone.

Translation Friction: The three hundred foxes (or jackals — shualim can mean either) tied tail-to-tail with torches (v. 4) strain modern credibility, but the text presents it without qualification. We rendered it as the Hebrew gives it. The place name En-haqore (v. 19, 'spring of the one who called') commemorates Samson's prayer — the name preserves his moment of dependence on God in a life characterized by self-reliance.

Connections: Water from rock echoes Moses at Meribah (Exodus 17:6, Numbers 20:11). The jawbone weapon anticipates David's unconventional sling against Goliath (1 Samuel 17). The Philistine-burning-his-wife motif (v. 6) inverts: the Philistines destroy the very person whose betrayal they exploited. The 'he judged Israel twenty years' (v. 20) places Samson in the institutional framework despite his personal chaos.

¹Some time later, during the wheat harvest, Samson went to visit his wife, bringing a young goat. He said, "Let me go in to my wife in her room." But her father would not let him enter. ²Her father said, "I was sure you completely despised her, so I gave her to your companion. But isn't her younger sister more attractive? Take her instead." ³Samson said to them, "This time I am justified in what I do to the Philistines — when I bring harm upon them." ⁴Samson went out and caught three hundred foxes. He took torches and tied the foxes tail to tail, placing one torch between every pair of tails. ⁵He set the torches on fire and released the foxes into the Philistines' standing grain. He burned up the harvested sheaves along with the standing grain, and even the vineyards and olive groves. ⁶The Philistines asked, "Who did this?" They were told, "Samson, the son-in-law of the Timnite — because the man took his wife and gave her to his companion." So the Philistines went up and burned her and her father alive. ⁷Samson said to them, "Since you have done this, I swear I will take revenge on you — and only then will I stop." ⁸He struck them down ruthlessly with a great slaughter. Then he went down and stayed in a cave in the rock of Etam. ⁹The Philistines came up and camped in Judah, deploying their forces at Lehi. ¹⁰The men of Judah asked, "Why have you come up against us?" They answered, "We have come up to bind Samson — to do to him what he has done to us." ¹¹Three thousand men of Judah went down to the cave in the rock of Etam and said to Samson, "Don't you realize that the Philistines are ruling over us? What have you done to us?" He said to them, "What they did to me, I did to them." ¹²They said to him, "We have come down to tie you up and hand you over to the Philistines." Samson said to them, "Swear to me that you yourselves will not attack me." ¹³They said to him, "No — we will only tie you up securely and hand you over to them. We certainly will not kill you." So they bound him with two new ropes and brought him up from the rock. ¹⁴When he arrived at Lehi, the Philistines came shouting to meet him. The Spirit of the LORD rushed upon him, and the ropes on his arms became like flax burned by fire — his bonds melted off his hands. ¹⁵He found a fresh jawbone of a donkey, reached out and grabbed it, and struck down a thousand men with it. ¹⁶Samson said: "With the jawbone of a donkey — heaps upon heaps! With the jawbone of a donkey I have struck down a thousand men!" ¹⁷When he finished speaking, he threw the jawbone aside, and that place was called Ramath-Lehi. ¹⁸He became desperately thirsty and called out to the LORD, saying, "You gave this great victory through your servant, and now am I going to die of thirst and fall into the hands of the uncircumcised?" ¹⁹God split open the hollow place at Lehi, and water flowed from it. He drank, his strength returned, and he revived. That is why it was called En-Hakkore, which is at Lehi to this day. ²⁰He judged Israel during the time of the Philistines for twenty years.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Bi-yemei qetsir chittim ('in the days of the wheat harvest') — the timing is significant for two reasons: the dry, ripe grain fields will soon become the target of Samson's fiery revenge (vv. 4-5), and the wheat harvest was a time of celebration and movement. Samson brings a gedi izzim ('a young goat') — a gift intended to reconcile. He expects to resume the marriage as though nothing happened. The father's refusal reveals what occurred during Samson's absence: his wife has been given to another man (14:20). Samson does not yet know this.
2. Amor amarti ki sano senetah ('saying I said that hating you hated her') — double infinitive absolutes in both clauses intensify the father's certainty. He genuinely believed Samson had permanently rejected his daughter. The offer of the younger sister — ha-lo achotah ha-qetannah tovah mimmennah ('isn't her younger sister better/more beautiful than she?') — is meant to placate but instead enrages. The substitution of one daughter for another echoes Laban's swap of Leah for Rachel (Genesis 29:26). For Samson, the insult is compounded: his wife was given to his mere'a ('companion, best man'), and now he is offered a consolation prize.
3. Niqqeiti ha-pa'am mi-Pelishtim ('I am innocent/free of blame this time from the Philistines') — Samson claims moral justification. The verb naqah ('to be clean, innocent, free of guilt') is a legal term — he is declaring himself not liable for what follows. The phrase ki oseh ani immam ra'ah ('when I do them harm/evil') frankly announces his intention to retaliate. Samson operates on a personal code of proportional justice: they wronged him, so he has the right to wrong them. The narrator neither endorses nor condemns this reasoning — the events simply unfold.
4. Shelosh me'ot shu'alim ('three hundred foxes') — the word shu'al can mean either 'fox' or 'jackal.' Jackals are more likely since they travel in packs (foxes are solitary), making mass capture more feasible. The number three hundred may be symbolic (Gideon's three hundred warriors, 7:7) or literal. The engineering is deliberate: va-yefen zanaf el zanaf ('he turned tail to tail') — pairs of animals tied together with a lappid ('torch, firebrand') between them. The panicked animals would run erratically through the fields, spreading fire in unpredictable directions — a devastating incendiary tactic.
5. The destruction is comprehensive: gadish ('harvested sheaves' — grain already cut and stacked), qamah ('standing grain' — still in the field), kerem ('vineyard'), and zayit ('olive grove'). This represents the Philistines' entire agricultural economy — their present harvest, their future crop, their long-term investment in orchards and vineyards. Olive trees take decades to mature; their loss is generational devastation. The timing during wheat harvest (v. 1) means the grain is dry and burns easily. Samson's personal grievance has become an economic catastrophe for an entire region.
6. The cycle of violence escalates horribly. The Philistines identify Samson as the culprit (chatan ha-Timni, 'the son-in-law of the Timnite') and trace the cause to the wife's father giving her away. Their response — va-yisrefu otah ve-et avihah ba-esh ('they burned her and her father with fire') — fulfills the exact threat the thirty companions made in 14:15. The woman was caught between Samson and the Philistines, and now she dies the very death she was threatened with. The cruel irony: she betrayed Samson's riddle to save herself from burning, only to be burned anyway.
7. Im ta'asun kazot ki im niqqamti vakhem ('if you do this, I will surely take vengeance on you') — the conditional structure followed by the emphatic ki im creates an oath-like declaration. The verb naqam ('to take vengeance') is personal, not judicial — Samson acts as a one-man retaliatory force, not as a judge executing divine justice. His promise ve-achar echdal ('and after that I will stop') is ominously open-ended — how much violence satisfies the requirement of 'enough'? The spiral of violence shows no one willing to break the cycle.
8. Va-yakh otam shoq al yarekh makkah gedolah ('he struck them leg upon thigh, a great blow') — the idiom shoq al yarekh ('hip and thigh' or 'leg upon thigh') suggests a thorough, devastating beating. The exact meaning is debated, but the sense is unmistakable: total, merciless violence. After the slaughter, Samson retreats to se'if sela Eitam ('the cleft/cave of the rock of Etam') — he becomes a fugitive hiding in the wilderness, ironically resembling the Israelites who hid from Midian in caves (6:2). The deliverer has become an outlaw.
9. Va-ya'alu Felishtim va-yachanu bi-Yehudah ('the Philistines came up and camped in Judah') — the Philistine military response to Samson's raids now threatens all of Judah. The escalation has moved from personal vendetta to regional military crisis. Va-yinnatoshu ba-Lechi ('they spread themselves at Lehi') — the verb natash means 'to spread out' in military formation. Lechi, meaning 'jawbone,' foreshadows what will happen there (v. 15). The name is either pre-existing or given retroactively because of the coming events.
10. The men of Judah ask the question lamah alitem aleinu ('why have you come up against us?') — they view the Philistine incursion as an attack on themselves, not as a response to Samson. The Philistines' answer le-esor et Shimshon ('to bind Samson') makes clear: this is about one man. The phrase la'asot lo ka-asher asah lanu ('to do to him as he did to us') invokes proportional retaliation — the lex talionis. What is devastating here is that the men of Judah will cooperate with their oppressors to hand over their own judge.
11. Sheloshet alafim ish mi-Yehudah ('three thousand men from Judah') — a massive delegation sent not to rescue Samson but to surrender him. Their accusation ha-lo yadata ki moshelim banu Pelishtim ('don't you know the Philistines rule over us?') reveals a people who have accepted subjugation as the status quo. They blame Samson for disrupting a manageable oppression. His response ka-asher asu li ken asiti lahem ('as they did to me, so I did to them') reduces the entire conflict to personal reciprocity. Neither Samson nor the men of Judah speak in terms of God's purposes, covenant, or deliverance. The theological vacuum is deafening.
12. Le-esorekha yaradnu letittekha ve-yad Pelishtim ('to bind you we came down to give you into the hand of the Philistines') — Judah's own men will deliver their judge to the enemy. The parallel with later events is unmistakable: Israel handing its deliverer to the ruling power. Samson's condition — hishave'u li pen tifge'un bi attem ('swear to me that you yourselves will not strike me') — reveals where the real danger lies. He does not fear the Philistines; he fears his own people. He will go willingly, bound, if Judah promises not to kill him directly.

13. Asor ne'esorekha ('binding we will bind you') — the infinitive absolute emphasizes the thoroughness of the binding. The assurance hamet lo nemitekha ('killing we will not kill you') uses the same emphatic construction for the promise of safety. Two new ropes (shenayim avotot chadashot) — the newness implies maximum strength, ropes not weakened by prior use. The narrator builds tension: Samson is bound with fresh, strong rope, surrounded by three thousand of his own countrymen, about to be handed to the Philistines. Everything points to his doom — except the Spirit.
14. Va-titslach alav ruach YHWH — the third and final 'rushing' of the Spirit upon Samson (cf. 14:6, 14:19). Each occurrence triggers superhuman physical action. The ropes become ka-pishtim asher ba'aru va-esh ('like flax that has burned in fire') — flax (pishtim) is linen fiber, and when burned it disintegrates into nothing. Va-yimmassu essurav me-al yadav ('his bonds melted from his hands') — the verb masas ('to melt, dissolve') suggests the ropes did not break but dissolved, as if consumed by invisible fire. The Spirit's power is portrayed as an internal fire that destroys external restraints.
15. Lechi chamor teriyah ('a jawbone of a donkey, fresh/moist') — the jawbone is teriyah ('fresh, moist'), meaning it came from a recently dead animal. This constitutes yet another Nazirite violation: contact with a dead body (Numbers 6:6). The irony is devastating — the instrument of Samson's greatest military triumph is itself a source of ritual defilement. Elef ish ('a thousand men') — whether literal or a round number indicating a massive victory, the scale is extraordinary. A single man with an improvised weapon from a dead animal defeats an army. The Spirit empowers through the profane.
16. Samson's victory song uses elaborate wordplay: bi-lechi ha-chamor chamor chamoratayim ('with the jawbone of a donkey, a donkey, two donkey-loads' or 'a heap, two heaps'). The word chamor can mean both 'donkey' and 'heap' — Samson puns on the weapon's origin. The poetic structure is a brief victory hymn, similar to the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15) or Deborah's song (Judges 5), but with a critical difference: Samson credits himself, not God. Hikketi elef ish ('I struck down a thousand men') — the first person pronoun is emphatic. He attributes the victory to his own power, never mentioning the Spirit that enabled it.
17. Va-yashklekh ha-lechi mi-yado ('he threw the jawbone from his hand') — after the battle, Samson discards the weapon. The naming — Ramat Lechi ('Jawbone Hill' or 'the height of the jawbone') — follows the biblical pattern of memorial place-naming. The Hebrew ramat means 'height, hill,' and lechi means 'jawbone' or 'cheek.' The name preserves the memory of the event in the landscape itself. Such etiological naming is common in Judges (cf. Bochim, 2:5; YHWH-Shalom, 6:24).
18. Va-yitsma me'od va-yiqra el YHWH ('he was very thirsty and he called out to the LORD') — this is the only recorded prayer by Samson before his final prayer in 16:28. After boasting of his own achievement in verse 16, extreme thirst forces him to acknowledge God. Attah natatta be-yad avdekha ('You gave into the hand of your servant') — he now credits God for the victory, calling himself avdekha ('your servant'). The shift from 'I struck down' (v. 16) to 'You gave' (v. 18) is prompted by need, not worship. His concern is still self-preservation: pen efol be-yad ha-arelim ('lest I fall into the hand of the uncircumcised').
19. Va-yivqa Elohim et ha-makhtesh asher ba-Lechi ('God split open the hollow place that is at Lehi') — the makhtesh is a mortar-shaped depression in rock. God provides water from stone, echoing Moses at Horeb (Exodus 17:6) and Meribah (Numbers 20:11). The water revives Samson: va-tashov rucho va-yechi ('his spirit returned and he lived'). The name Ein ha-Qore means either 'the spring of the one who calls' (commemorating Samson's prayer) or 'the spring of the partridge' (a bird associated with rocky terrain). The provision of water after military victory connects Samson's experience to Israel's wilderness narrative — God sustains His warrior even when that warrior is deeply flawed.
20. Va-yishpot et Yisra'el bi-yemei Pelishtim esrim shanah ('he judged Israel in the days of the Philistines twenty years') — this formula usually closes a judge's narrative, but here it appears mid-story. Chapter 16 still lies ahead. The phrase bi-yemei Pelishtim ('in the days of the Philistines') is unique — it acknowledges that Philistine domination continued throughout Samson's judgeship. He judged during the oppression, not after ending it. The twenty years may represent a period of relative stability before the events of chapter 16, or it may be the narrator's way of distinguishing Samson's time as judge from the personal disasters that conclude his life.

Summary: Samson visits a prostitute in Gaza, escapes the city by carrying its gates away, then falls in love with Delilah. She extracts the secret of his strength — his uncut hair — and the Philistines capture him, gouge out his eyes, and put him to work grinding in prison. At a festival to Dagon, Samson pushes apart the pillars and kills more Philistines in death than in life.

What Makes This Remarkable: Delilah asks the secret of his strength three times with obvious intent to betray him, and he tells her the truth on the fourth attempt anyway. This is not stupidity but self-destruction — Samson has been violating his Nazirite vow incrementally (corpse contact in ch. 14, feast in ch. 14, now the razor), and telling Delilah completes the surrender of what he was supposed to be. His prayer in the temple (v. 28) is his most honest: 'O Lord GOD, remember me and strengthen me only this once' — revenge and deliverance merge in one final act.

Translation Friction: The phrase 'he did not know that the LORD had departed from him' (v. 20, vehu lo yada ki YHWH sar me'alav) is the most chilling sentence in the book. We rendered it directly. The departure of divine presence is unannounced and unnoticed — the horror is the unknowing. Samson's final prayer uses both Adonai and YHWH Elohim — the fullest divine address in his life comes at its end.

Connections: Samson's death in the Dagon temple anticipates the ark's humiliation of Dagon (1 Samuel 5). His grinding in prison (v. 21) — a woman's or animal's task — is the final humiliation of the strongman. The phrase 'he judged Israel twenty years' (v. 31) echoes 15:20 and brackets his career. Hebrews 11:32 includes Samson among the faithful — his final prayer is counted as faith.

¹Samson went to Gaza and saw a prostitute there, and he went in to her. ²The people of Gaza were told, "Samson has come here." They surrounded the place and lay in ambush for him all night at the city gate, keeping quiet through the night, saying, "At first light we will kill him." ³Samson lay there until midnight. At midnight he got up, seized the doors of the city gate along with the two gateposts, and pulled them up — bar and all. He hoisted them onto his shoulders and carried them to the top of the hill that faces Hebron. ⁴After this, he fell in love with a woman in the Sorek Valley whose name was Delilah. ⁵The rulers of the Philistines came to her and said, "Seduce him and find out where his great strength comes from, and how we can overpower him so we can tie him up and subdue him. Each of us will give you eleven hundred pieces of silver." ⁶Delilah said to Samson, "Tell me — where does your great strength come from? How could someone tie you up to overpower you?" ⁷Samson said to her, "If they bind me with seven fresh bowstrings that have not been dried, then I will become weak and be like any other man." ⁸The Philistine rulers brought her seven fresh bowstrings that had not been dried, and she tied him up with them. ⁹With an ambush party waiting in the room, she cried out, "The Philistines are on you, Samson!" He snapped the bowstrings as easily as a strand of flax snaps when it touches fire. So the secret of his strength remained unknown. ¹⁰Delilah said to Samson, "You made a fool of me and lied to me! Now tell me — how can you really be tied up?" ¹¹He said to her, "If they tie me up securely with new ropes that have never been used, then I will become weak and be like any other man." ¹²So Delilah took new ropes and tied him with them. Then she called out, "The Philistines are on you, Samson!" (The ambush party was waiting in the room.) He snapped them off his arms like thread. ¹³Delilah said to Samson, "You keep making a fool of me and telling me lies! Tell me how you can be tied up." He said to her, "If you weave the seven braids of my head into the fabric on the loom." ¹⁴She fastened it with the pin of the loom and called out, "The Philistines are on you, Samson!" He woke from his sleep and pulled away the pin of the loom along with the fabric. ¹⁵She said to him, "How can you say 'I love you' when your heart is not with me? Three times now you have made a fool of me and have not told me where your great strength comes from." ¹⁶When she pressured him with her words day after day and nagged him relentlessly, he became so exhausted that he wanted to die. ¹⁷He told her everything in his heart and said to her, "A razor has never touched my head, because I have been a Nazirite of God from my mother's womb. If my head were shaved, my strength would leave me, and I would become weak and be like any other man." ¹⁸When Delilah realized that he had told her everything in his heart, she sent for the Philistine rulers with the message, "Come up one more time — he has told me everything in his heart." The Philistine rulers came to her, bringing the silver with them. ¹⁹She lulled him to sleep on her lap, then called for a man to shave off the seven braids of his head. She began to subdue him, and his strength left him. ²⁰She called out, "The Philistines are on you, Samson!" He woke from his sleep and thought, "I will get free just as I did before and shake myself loose." But he did not know that the LORD had departed from him. ²¹The Philistines seized him and gouged out his eyes. They brought him down to Gaza and bound him with bronze shackles, and he was set to grinding grain in the prison. ²²But the hair of his head began to grow back after it had been shaved. ²³The rulers of the Philistines gathered to offer a great sacrifice to Dagon their god and to celebrate. They said, "Our god has given Samson our enemy into our hands." ²⁴When the people saw him, they praised their god, saying, "Our god has given into our hands our enemy — the devastator of our land, who multiplied our dead." ²⁵When they were in high spirits, they said, "Bring out Samson to entertain us!" So they brought Samson from the prison, and he performed for them. They stood him between the pillars. ²⁶Samson said to the boy who was leading him by the hand, "Let me feel the pillars that support the building, so I can lean against them." ²⁷The building was full of men and women. All the Philistine rulers were there, and on the roof were about three thousand men and women watching Samson perform. ²⁸Samson called out to the LORD and said, "Lord GOD, remember me! Strengthen me just this one time, O God, so that I may take one act of revenge on the Philistines for my two eyes." ²⁹Samson grasped the two central pillars on which the building rested and braced himself against them — one with his right hand and one with his left. ³⁰Samson said, "Let me die with the Philistines." He pushed with all his strength, and the building collapsed on the rulers and on all the people inside it. Those he killed at his death were more than those he had killed during his life. ³¹His brothers and his father's entire household came down and carried him back. They buried him between Zorah and Eshtaol in the tomb of his father Manoah. He had judged Israel for twenty years.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Va-yelekh Shimshon Azzatah ('Samson went to Gaza') — Gaza is deep in Philistine territory, one of the five major Philistine cities. The narrative moves from Samson desiring a Philistine wife (ch. 14) to visiting an ishah zonah ('a prostitute'). The moral trajectory is unmistakable: from wanting marriage to purchasing sex. The verb va-yar ('he saw') echoes the pattern established in 14:1 — Samson's eyes lead him into trouble. Va-yavo eleiha ('he went in to her') is the standard euphemism for sexual intercourse. The Nazirite's separation from the world is now reduced to its final external marker: his uncut hair.
2. Va-yassobbu va-ye'erevu lo kol ha-lailah ('they surrounded and ambushed him all night') — the Gazites plan a dawn attack. Their confidence is understandable: Samson is inside a walled city with a single gatehouse, surrounded by enemies. Va-yitchasheshu kol ha-lailah ('they were quiet/silent all night') — the verb charash means 'to be silent, to hold peace.' They wait patiently, believing time is on their side. Ad or ha-boqer va-haraagnuhu ('until the morning light, and we will kill him') — they calculate that Samson will attempt to leave at dawn and walk into their trap.
3. Va-ye'echoz be-daletot sha'ar ha-ir u-vishtei ha-mezuzot ('he seized the doors of the city gate and the two doorposts') — the city gate was the most fortified point of an ancient walled city, with massive wooden doors reinforced by a metal bar (beriach). Samson does not open the gate; he tears the entire gate structure out of the wall — doors, posts, crossbar, everything. Va-yissa'em im ha-beriach ('he uprooted them with the bar') — the verb nasa means 'to uproot, to pull out.' He carries the entire assembly al ketefav ('on his shoulders') to a hilltop facing Hebron — approximately thirty-eight miles uphill from Gaza at an elevation gain of over three thousand feet. The feat is superhuman, a demonstration of raw power that humiliates the Gazites and renders their city defenseless.
4. Va-ye'ehav ishah be-nachal Soreq ('he loved a woman in the valley of Sorek') — for the first time in the narrative, the verb ahav ('to love') is used for Samson's attraction to a woman. Previously it was ra'ah ('to see') and yashar ('pleasing'). The Sorek Valley runs between Israelite and Philistine territory — Samson lives and loves in the border zone. Delilah's name (Delilah) may derive from the root dalal ('to hang down, to be weak, to impoverish') or from the word lailah ('night'). Either etymology is fitting: she will weaken him and bring his night. Whether she is Israelite or Philistine is never stated — the text leaves her identity ambiguous, focusing entirely on her function as the instrument of Samson's downfall.
5. Sarnei Pelishtim ('the lords/rulers of the Philistines') — the seren (plural seranim) was the title for each ruler of the five Philistine city-states (Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, Gath). All five come together for this operation — Samson is that important a threat. The verb patti ('entice, seduce') is the same word used when the companions pressured Samson's wife (14:15). The payment — ish elef u-me'ah kasef ('each one, eleven hundred pieces of silver') — totals 5,500 silver pieces from the five lords. For comparison, Micah's mother in chapter 17 consecrates 1,100 pieces of silver. The sum is enormous — they are buying the defeat of Israel's champion.
6. Delilah's question ba-meh kokhakha gadol ('in what is your strength great?') is astonishingly direct. She does not approach the subject subtly or build up to it over weeks. She asks outright, on behalf of his enemies, and Samson does not seem alarmed. The addition u-va-meh te'aser le-annotekha ('and with what could you be bound to afflict you') explicitly asks for the method of his capture. That Samson engages with this question at all — rather than recognizing the obvious trap — reveals his fatal flaw: he believes his strength makes him invulnerable to any scheme. His physical power breeds spiritual recklessness.
7. Shiv'ah yetarim lachim asher lo chorevu ('seven moist/fresh bowstrings that have not been dried') — yetar refers to a bowstring made from animal sinew or gut. The specification 'fresh, not dried' implies maximum flexibility and strength. The number seven suggests completeness. Samson's first lie is elaborate enough to be believable — it sounds like a magical formula. Ve-chaliti ve-hayiti ke-achad ha-adam ('I will become weak and be like one of the men') — the verb chalah means 'to become weak, sick.' Samson plays a game with the truth, giving false answers that parody the real one.
8. The Philistine lords supply the materials immediately — they are deeply invested in this operation. Delilah binds Samson herself (va-ta'asrehu bahem, 'she bound him with them'). The intimate setting — Delilah tying Samson while he allows it — suggests he treats the whole affair as a game, a lovers' contest. The Philistine lords are presumably hiding nearby, waiting to see if this attempt succeeds.
9. Ha-orev yoshev lah ba-cheder ('the ambusher sitting for her in the room') — Philistine soldiers are hidden in the very room where this intimate scene plays out. Delilah's cry Pelishtim alekha Shimshon ('Philistines are upon you, Samson!') becomes a recurring alarm — she uses it four times (vv. 9, 12, 14, 20). Samson snaps the bowstrings ka-asher yinnataq petil ha-ne'oret ba-haricho esh ('as a flax thread is broken when it smells fire') — the simile reduces the supposedly unbreakable bonds to nothing. Ve-lo noda kocho ('his strength was not known') — the secret remains intact. But the pattern of testing has begun.

10. Hinnah hetalta bi va-tedabber elai kezavim ('you mocked me and spoke lies to me') — the verb hatal means 'to mock, to deceive.' Delilah accuses Samson of deception — which is true — while herself being the true deceiver. The irony is layered: she demands honesty in the service of betrayal. Her persistence is remarkable. After the first failure, most people would abandon the scheme or at least change tactics. Delilah simply asks again, with exactly the same directness. She has calculated that Samson's weakness is not physical but relational — he cannot resist her persistent emotional pressure.
11. Avotim chadashim asher lo na'asah vahem melakhah ('new ropes with which no work has been done') — the second lie escalates from bowstrings to ropes. The specification 'unused' echoes the new ropes in 15:13, which the Spirit also destroyed. Samson may be amusing himself with references to his own history. The formula ve-chaliti ve-hayiti ke-achad ha-adam ('I will become weak and be like any other man') is repeated verbatim from verse 7 — a refrain in this darkening game. Each false answer brings the truth closer to the surface.
12. The pattern repeats: Delilah binds, cries the alarm, and Samson breaks free. Va-yenattqem me-al zero'otav ka-chut ('he snapped them from his arms like thread') — the ropes are reduced to nothing. The ease of the escape is emphasized: like a thread (chut), not even like a cord. Yet the fact that Samson continues to play this game after Delilah has now twice attempted to betray him to waiting Philistine soldiers reveals either extraordinary arrogance or a death wish. The ambush party remains in the room — witnesses to the failed attempts.
13. The third false answer moves dangerously close to the truth. For the first time, Samson mentions his hair: sheva machlefot roshi ('the seven braids/locks of my head'). The word machlefot means 'braids, plaits, locks' — Samson's hair is braided into seven sections. The masekhet ('woven fabric, web on a loom') is the cloth currently being woven. He tells Delilah to weave his hair braids into the loom's fabric. The answer is a lie — weaving his hair will not make him weak — but it touches the true source of his strength. Each false answer has moved closer: bowstrings (nothing to do with hair), ropes (nothing to do with hair), hair woven into a loom (his hair, but the wrong action). The truth is approaching.
14. Va-titqa ba-yated ('she drove in the peg/pin') — Delilah weaves his hair into the loom and secures it with the loom pin while he sleeps. He sleeps through the entire process — a remarkable detail that reveals both his trust and his recklessness. Va-yiqats mi-shenato ('he woke from his sleep') — this is the first mention of Samson sleeping during these encounters. Sleep will be his undoing in verse 19. He pulls away the yated ha-ereg ve-et ha-massekhet ('the pin of the loom and the fabric') — tearing the entire loom apart. Three attempts have failed. But Delilah now knows the answer is connected to his hair.
15. Eikh tomar ahavtikh ve-libbeka ein itti ('how can you say I love you when your heart is not with me?') — Delilah weaponizes the language of love. She equates full disclosure with genuine love: if he truly loves her, he will reveal his deepest secret. The accusation zeh shalosh pe'amim hetalta bi ('three times now you have mocked me') echoes the pattern of three — a number of completion in biblical narrative. The fourth time will be the truth. Her argument mirrors the Timnite wife's tactic exactly (14:16) — 'you hate me, you don't love me' — but Delilah is far more persistent and far more dangerous.
16. Ki hetsiqah lo bi-dvareha kol ha-yamim ('because she pressed him with her words every day') — the verb tsaqq ('to press, squeeze, constrain') describes unrelenting emotional pressure. Va-te'altsehu ('she urged him, she forced him') — the verb alats means 'to compel, to press hard.' Va-tiqtsar nafsho lamut ('his soul was shortened to death' — he was exhausted to the point of death) — the idiom captures complete emotional and spiritual depletion. The man who could tear apart lions and rip city gates from their hinges is broken down by persistent words. Samson's physical strength has no defense against emotional manipulation — the same vulnerability that undid him in 14:17.
17. Va-yagged lah et kol libbo ('he told her all his heart') — the phrase kol libbo ('all his heart') means he held nothing back. The disclosure is total. Morah lo alah al roshi ('a razor has never come upon my head') — this is the last remaining sign of his Nazirite consecration. He has already violated the prohibitions against contact with the dead (14:8-9, 15:15) and likely against grape products (14:10). Only the uncut hair remains. Ki nezir Elohim ani mi-beten immi ('for I am a Nazirite of God from my mother's womb') — Samson identifies himself by his consecration even as he is in the act of betraying it. He knows exactly what he is, and he tells anyway. Im gullachti ve-sar mimmenni kochi ('if I am shaved, my strength will depart from me') — the truth is out. The verb sar ('to depart, to turn away') will appear in the devastating verse 20 applied to God Himself.
18. Va-tere Delilah ki higgid lah et kol libbo ('Delilah saw that he had told her all his heart') — the verb ra'ah ('to see, to perceive') signals Delilah's discernment. She can tell the difference between Samson's lies and his truth. How she knows this time is genuine — whether through his tone, his tears, his weariness, or intuition — the text does not say. Alu ha-pa'am ('come up this time') — her message to the lords carries the confidence of certainty. Va-ya'alu ha-kesef be-yadam ('they brought the silver in their hand') — the payment is brought in advance this time. They trust Delilah's judgment. The transaction is complete: Samson's secret for 5,500 pieces of silver.
19. Va-teyashnehu al birkeiha ('she caused him to sleep on her knees/lap') — the intimacy of the scene makes the betrayal more devastating. He sleeps in a posture of complete trust and vulnerability. Va-tiqra la-ish va-tegallach et sheva machlefot rosho ('she called a man and he shaved the seven braids of his head') — Delilah does not shave him herself; she summons an ish ('a man') to do it. The seven braids — the last physical sign of his Nazirite consecration — are removed while he sleeps. Va-tachel le-annoto ('she began to afflict/subdue him') — the verb innah means 'to afflict, to humble, to overpower.' Va-yasar kocho me-alav ('his strength departed from him') — the verb sar ('departed') foreshadows the devastating parallel in the next verse.
20. Etse ke-fa'am be-fa'am ve-inna'er ('I will go out as time after time and shake myself free') — Samson expects the same result as before. His confidence is based on past experience: three times Delilah tested him, three times he broke free effortlessly. Why should the fourth time be different? Ve-hu lo yada ki YHWH sar me-alav ('and he did not know that the LORD had departed from him') — this is the most devastating sentence in the Samson cycle, and one of the most terrifying in all of Scripture. The verb yada ('to know') is the same verb used throughout the narrative for knowledge and awareness. Samson does not know. The LORD (YHWH — the covenant name, the personal name of God) sar ('departed, turned away') me-alav ('from upon him'). The divine presence that rushed upon him three times has now withdrawn. And Samson cannot tell the difference. The most terrifying thing about the departure of God is that a person may not notice it has happened.

21. Va-yenaqru et einav ('they bored out/gouged his eyes') — the verb naqar means 'to bore, to pick out, to gouge.' The eyes that saw Philistine women and led Samson into temptation are destroyed. There is grim poetic justice: the man who lived by sight (va-yar ishah, 'he saw a woman,' 14:1; 16:1) now lives in permanent darkness. Va-yoridu oto Azzatah ('they brought him down to Gaza') — the last 'going down' (yarad) in Samson's life. He returns to Gaza, where he once carried the city gates in triumph (v. 3), now as a blind prisoner. Va-ya'asruhu ba-nechushtayim ('they bound him with bronze fetters') — nechushtayim is a dual form, suggesting shackles on both wrists or both ankles. Va-yehi tochen be-veit ha-asurim ('he was grinding in the prison house') — grinding grain was the work of slaves, women, and animals. The mighty judge is reduced to the lowest form of prison labor, walking in circles pushing a millstone.
22. Va-yachel se'ar rosho letsammeach ka-asher gullach ('the hair of his head began to sprout/grow after it was shaved') — this single verse is one of the most quietly powerful in the entire narrative. Amid the darkness — blindness, slavery, grinding — a seed of hope emerges. The verb tsamach ('to sprout, to grow') is used for plants sprouting from the earth. The hair growing back is the Nazirite sign renewing itself. The text does not say God's power is returning; it simply notes the hair growing. But the reader knows the connection. The Philistines, in their arrogance, do not think to keep shaving him. This single botanical observation is the turning point of the chapter.
23. Va-ne'esfu lizboach zevach gadol le-Dagon eloheihem ('they gathered to sacrifice a great sacrifice to Dagon their god') — Dagon was the chief deity of the Philistines, a grain and fertility god (the name may relate to dagan, 'grain,' or dag, 'fish'). The irony of Samson grinding grain in the temple of a grain god is devastating. The Philistines' declaration natan eloheinu be-yadenu et Shimshon oyevenu ('our god has given our enemy Samson into our hands') deliberately echoes the language Israel uses for YHWH's victories — natan be-yad ('gave into the hand of'). They credit Dagon with what Samson's own sin accomplished. The theological contest is now explicit: YHWH versus Dagon, the God of Israel versus the god of the Philistines.
24. The people's hymn of praise to Dagon has three charges against Samson: oyevenu ('our enemy'), machariav artsenu ('the devastator of our land' — referring to the burned fields of 15:5), and asher hirschah et chalalenu ('who multiplied our slain'). The verb hillel ('to praise') is the same root used in the Hebrew word hallelujah ('praise the LORD'). The Philistines direct praise to the wrong god. This public liturgy of Dagon-worship sets the theological stage for the climax: when Samson prays to YHWH (v. 28), the two prayers — one to Dagon, one to YHWH — will be answered in radically different ways.
25. Ki tov libbam ('when their heart was good' — when they were merry/drunken) — the festive mood leads to cruelty. Qir'u le-Shimshon vi-ysacheq lanu ('call Samson that he may amuse/perforam for us') — the verb tsachaq can mean 'to play, to perform, to make sport.' The mighty judge has become a court jester, a source of entertainment for drunk Philistines. The humiliation is total: the man empowered by the Spirit of the LORD is now a spectacle in the house of Dagon. Va-ya'amidu oto bein ha-ammudim ('they stood him between the pillars') — this seemingly minor staging detail is the pivot of the entire story. The pillars are load-bearing columns that support the temple roof.
26. El ha-na'ar ha-machaziq be-yado ('to the boy holding his hand') — the once-mighty Samson is now led by a na'ar ('boy, young attendant'). He is blind and needs a child's guidance. His request — hanichah oti va-hamisheni et ha-ammudim ('let me rest and let me feel the pillars') — sounds innocent: a tired, blind man wanting to lean against something for support. The stated reason ve-isha'en aleihem ('so I can lean on them') conceals his true intention. This is the first time in the Samson narrative that the protagonist plans strategically rather than acting on impulse. Blindness and suffering have produced something new in Samson: deliberation.
27. The narrator pauses to describe the scene: the temple is packed — male ha-anashim ve-ha-nashim ('full of men and women') — and all five sarnei Pelishtim ('Philistine rulers') are present. An additional kishlosheth alafim ish ve-ishah ('about three thousand men and women') watch from the roof. This is the concentrated leadership and populace of the Philistine nation, gathered in one building for a religious festival. Ha-ro'im bi-sechoq Shimshon ('watching Samson's entertainment') — they have come to see the defeated champion humiliated. The text carefully establishes the magnitude of the gathering before the collapse — every detail heightens the scale of what follows.
28. Va-yiqra Shimshon el YHWH ('Samson called out to the LORD') — this is Samson's only genuine prayer in the entire cycle. His earlier cry in 15:18 was a complaint driven by thirst; this is a plea driven by total dependence. Adonai YHWH ('Lord GOD') — the double divine address combines the title of sovereignty (Adonai) with the covenant name (YHWH), the most reverent form of address in Hebrew prayer. Zokhreni na ('remember me, please') — the verb zakhar ('to remember') in Hebrew does not mean merely to recall; it means to act on behalf of. Samson asks God not just to think of him but to intervene. Ve-chazzeqeni na akh ha-pa'am ha-zeh ('strengthen me just this one time') — the request is humble, limited, final. Yet even in this moment of genuine prayer, Samson's motivation remains mixed: ve-innaqemah neqam achat mi-shte'i einai ('let me take one revenge for my two eyes'). His prayer mingles faith with vengeance, dependence on God with personal retribution.
29. Va-yilpot Shimshon et shenei ammudei ha-tavekh ('Samson grasped the two pillars of the middle') — the verb lafat means 'to grasp, to twist, to take hold of firmly.' These are the ammudei ha-tavekh ('central pillars') — the main load-bearing columns. Archaeological excavations of Philistine temples at Tell Qasile and elsewhere have revealed structures supported by two central wooden pillars resting on stone bases, set close enough together for a man to reach both. The description is architecturally plausible. Va-yissamekh aleihem ('he leaned/braced against them') — the verb samakh means 'to lean, to support oneself.' Samson positions himself to push outward.
30. Tamot nafshi im Pelishtim ('let my soul/self die with the Philistines') — Samson's final words are simultaneously a prayer, a battle cry, and a death wish. The verb tamot ('let it die') is a jussive — an expressed wish. He wills his own death along with his enemies'. Va-yet be-koach ('he pushed/bent with strength') — the verb natah means 'to stretch, to bend, to push.' God has answered his prayer — strength has returned one final time. Va-yippol ha-bayit al ha-seranim ('the building fell on the rulers') — all five Philistine rulers are killed. The narrator's summary — ha-metim asher hemit be-moto rabbim me-asher hemit be-chayyav ('the dead he killed at his death were more than he killed in his life') — is both an epitaph and a judgment. Samson's greatest victory is his death. The man who was set apart for God from the womb returns to God in the rubble of a pagan temple.

31. Va-yeredu echav ve-khol beit avihi ('his brothers and all the house of his father came down') — Samson's family retrieves his body from the ruins of the Dagon temple. The verbs trace his final journey: they 'came down' (yaredu) to Gaza and 'brought him up' (va-ya'alu) to the hill country — the opposite of Samson's life pattern of always going down. He is buried bein Tsor'ah u-vein Eshta'ol ('between Zorah and Eshtaol') — the exact location where the Spirit of the LORD first began to stir him (13:25). The narrative forms a perfect circle: where his life as God's instrument began, there his body rests. Be-qever Manoach aviv ('in the tomb of Manoah his father') — he is gathered to his father. The closing formula ve-hu shafat et Yisra'el esrim shanah ('he judged Israel twenty years') repeats 15:20, forming a structural bracket. Samson's judgeship is complete, but the Philistine oppression continues — he only began the deliverance (13:5).

Summary: Micah of Ephraim steals silver from his mother, returns it, and she has an idol and ephod made. Micah installs his own son as priest, then hires a wandering Levite from Bethlehem. In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in his own eyes.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The refrain 'there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in his own eyes' (v. 6) appears for the first time here, framing the chaos of chapters 17-21. The sentence is simultaneously a political diagnosis and a theological indictment — without authority, Israel collapses into self-authorized worship. Micah's shrine is a complete parody of legitimate religion: he has an ephod, teraphim, and a Levite, but everything is unauthorized, homemade, and idolatrous.

Translation Friction: The phrase pesel umassekah (v. 4, 'carved image and cast metal image') describes two types of idols from the silver dedicated to the LORD — the contradiction between 'dedicated to the LORD' and 'made into an idol' captures the confusion of Israelite religion at its lowest point. We rendered both terms technically. The Levite's willingness to serve as a personal priest for hire (v. 10) violates every Levitical regulation in the Torah.

Connections: The wandering Levite from Bethlehem previews another Levite from Bethlehem in chapter 19. Micah's shrine becomes the basis for the Danite cult in chapter 18. The refrain 'no king in Israel' creates the theological case for the monarchy that 1 Samuel will establish. The ephod and teraphim echo Gideon's idolatrous ephod (8:27) and Rachel's stolen household gods (Genesis 31:19).

¹There was a man from the hill country of Ephraim whose name was Micayehu. ²He said to his mother, "The eleven hundred pieces of silver that were taken from you — the ones you pronounced a curse over, and spoke about in my hearing — the silver is with me. I took it." His mother said, "May the LORD bless you, my son." ³When he returned the eleven hundred pieces of silver to his mother, his mother said, "I had solemnly dedicated this silver to the LORD from my own hand, for my son — to make a carved image and a cast idol. So now I am giving it back to you." ⁴He returned the silver to his mother, and his mother took two hundred pieces of silver and gave them to the metalworker, who made them into a carved image and a cast idol. It was placed in Micayehu's house. ⁵The man Micah had a shrine. He made an ephod and household idols, and he installed one of his sons as his priest. ⁶In those days, there was no king in Israel. Everyone did whatever seemed right in their own eyes. ⁷There was a young man from Bethlehem in Judah, from the clan of Judah. He was a Levite, and he was residing there as a foreigner. ⁸The man left the town of Bethlehem in Judah to settle wherever he could find a place. On his journey, he came to the hill country of Ephraim, to Micah's house. ⁹Micah said to him, "Where are you coming from?" He answered, "I am a Levite from Bethlehem in Judah, and I am traveling to settle wherever I can find a place." ¹⁰Micah said to him, "Stay with me and be my advisor and priest. I will give you ten pieces of silver per year, a set of clothing, and your food." So the Levite agreed. ¹¹The Levite was willing to stay with the man, and the young man became like one of his own sons to Micah. ¹²Micah installed the Levite, and the young man became his priest and lived in Micah's house. ¹³Then Micah said, "Now I know that the LORD will treat me well, because I have a Levite as my priest."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The name Mikayehu means 'Who is like YHWH?' — a deeply ironic name for someone about to establish a private idolatrous shrine. The narrator introduces him without genealogy or tribal affiliation beyond geography: me-har Efrayim ('from the hill country of Ephraim'). This anonymity signals a shift from the judge narratives to unnamed individuals acting independently. The full form Mikayehu will be shortened to Mikhah (Micah) by verse 4.
2. The sum elef ume'ah hakkesef ('one thousand and one hundred silver') is identical to the amount each Philistine lord paid Delilah (16:5) — the echo may be deliberate, linking financial corruption across the epilogue and the Samson cycle. The verb alit ('you cursed') indicates a formal imprecation, a spoken curse with perceived supernatural power. Micah's confession is motivated not by moral conviction but by fear of the curse's efficacy. His mother's instant reversal — barukh beni la-YHWH ('blessed be my son by the LORD') — attempts to neutralize the curse with a counter-blessing. The mixing of YHWH-language with what will become idolatry is the chapter's central irony.
3. The infinitive absolute haqddesh hiqdashti ('dedicating I dedicated' — I solemnly dedicated) intensifies her vow's seriousness. The theological contradiction is staggering: she dedicates money la-YHWH ('to the LORD') for the explicit purpose of making a pesel umassekhah ('carved image and cast image') — objects expressly forbidden by the second commandment (Exodus 20:4, Deuteronomy 5:8). The narrator offers no commentary on this contradiction; the reader must recognize the violation. The terms pesel (carved/sculpted from wood or stone) and massekhah (cast/poured from molten metal) represent two distinct forms of idol-making.
4. Of the 1,100 pieces dedicated, only matayim kesef ('two hundred silver') — less than a fifth — actually goes to the idol. The narrator does not explain what happened to the remaining nine hundred, but the implication of misappropriation or broken vows is hard to miss. The tsoref ('refiner, metalworker, silversmith') is the craftsman who casts the idol. The verb vayehi ('and it was') with the singular suggests the pesel and massekhah functioned as a single cultic object, or that one was overlaid on the other. The idol now resides be-veit Mikhayehu ('in the house of Micayehu') — a private home becomes a shrine.
5. The name shortens from Mikhayehu to Mikhah, mirroring the degradation of his religious practice. His beit elohim ('house of God/gods') is a private shrine — a term that can mean either 'a temple' or 'a house of gods,' and the ambiguity is fitting. The efod ('ephod') was a priestly garment used for divination (cf. Gideon's ephod, 8:27); the terafim ('household idols, teraphim') were small figurines used for domestic divination, condemned throughout the prophetic tradition. The phrase vayemalle et yad ('he filled the hand of') is the technical idiom for priestly ordination/installation — but Micah has no authority to consecrate a priest, and his son is not a Levite. Every element of legitimate worship is present in corrupted form.
6. This is the first appearance of the full refrain that bookends the epilogue: be-yamim ha-hem ein melekh be-Yisra'el ('in those days there was no king in Israel') + ish ha-yashar be-einav ya'aseh ('each person would do what was right in his own eyes'). The refrain serves as both explanation and indictment. It explains the chaos — no central authority — and indicts the people — moral autonomy replacing divine law. The phrase ha-yashar be-einav ('the right in his eyes') deliberately echoes Deuteronomy's command to do ha-yashar be-einei YHWH ('what is right in the eyes of the LORD,' Deuteronomy 12:25) — the substitution of human eyes for divine eyes is the theological crisis of the epilogue.
7. The identification is deliberately confusing: mi-mishpachat Yehudah ('from the clan of Judah') yet vehu Levi ('and he was a Levite'). Levites had no tribal territory; they were distributed among the other tribes' cities. A Levite living in Bethlehem (a Judahite town) and identified with Judah's clan suggests either dual affiliation through residence or a blurring of tribal boundaries in a period of social disorder. The term gar ('sojourning, residing as a stranger') indicates he was not a native but a resident alien in Bethlehem — a Levite without a permanent assignment, drifting. His namelessness here is significant; he will be identified only later (18:30).
8. The phrase lagur ba-asher yimtsa ('to sojourn wherever he might find') reveals the Levite's economic desperation — he has no assigned Levitical city, no support, no destination. He is a religious professional looking for employment. The phrase la'asot darkko ('making his way, going on his journey') suggests aimless wandering. That he arrives at Micah's house is presented as coincidence — but the narrator is building toward a transaction that corrupts both parties.
9. Micah's question me-ayin tavo ('from where do you come?') opens a job interview. The Levite's self-identification — Levi anokhi ('a Levite I am') — is the crucial credential. His availability (lagur ba-asher emtsa, 'to reside wherever I can find') makes him ideal for Micah's purposes: an unemployed religious professional willing to work for anyone who will pay. The exchange is transactional from both sides — Micah wants a credentialed priest, the Levite wants a patron.
10. The offer is remarkably modest: aseret kesef la-yamim ('ten silver per year'), an erekh begadim ('a set of clothing'), and mikhyatekha ('your sustenance/living'). This is subsistence-level compensation — room, board, a small salary. The title le-av ulekhohhen ('as a father and as a priest') is significant: av ('father') here means 'counselor, advisor, patron-figure' rather than literal father — the same honorific appears in Genesis 45:8 and 2 Kings 6:21. Micah is hiring a personal chaplain. The Levite's acceptance — vayelekh ha-Levi ('and the Levite went') — is immediate, no negotiation, no inquiry about the legitimacy of the shrine.
11. The verb vayyo'el ('he was willing, he consented') suggests the Levite needed no persuading — the arrangement suited him. The phrase ke-achad mibbhanav ('like one of his sons') is both domestic and ironic: Micah already consecrated an actual son as priest (v. 5), and now this Levite replaces him — the hired professional displaces the family member. The narrator calls him ha-na'ar ('the young man'), emphasizing his youth and, perhaps, his impressionability.

12. Again the ordination formula: vayemalle Mikhah et yad ha-Levi ('Micah filled the hand of the Levite') — the technical idiom for priestly consecration. But this ordination is doubly illegitimate: first, only God or Moses could authorize priestly service in the normative tradition; second, the Levite serves a shrine with carved images. The phrase vayehi be-veit Mikhah ('he was in the house of Micah') reinforces the domestication of religion — worship has been privatized, and the priest is a household employee.
13. Micah's final statement is the chapter's theological punchline: attah yadati ki yeitiv YHWH li ('now I know that the LORD will do good to me'). His confidence is based entirely on having secured the right religious professional — ki hayah li ha-Levi lekhohhen ('because I have a Levite as priest'). He treats divine favor as a product of proper religious staffing, as if God can be manipulated through correct cultic arrangements. The irony is devastating: Micah has violated the second commandment, set up an unauthorized shrine, and hired a mercenary priest — yet he is certain of God's blessing. The narrator lets his words stand without correction, trusting the reader to perceive the self-deception. This verse closes the chapter that opens the epilogue, establishing the pattern: sincere religious devotion utterly detached from covenant faithfulness.

Summary: The tribe of Dan, unable to hold their allotted territory, sends spies north to Laish. On the way they discover Micah's shrine and Levite. The Danite army steals Micah's idol and priest, conquers peaceful Laish, renames it Dan, and establishes their own cult with the graven image.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The people of Laish are described as 'quiet and unsuspecting' (v. 7, shoqet uvo'teach) — they are peaceful, isolated, and defenseless. Dan's conquest of Laish is not a holy war but a predatory migration: an armed tribe attacks the vulnerable because they can. The stolen Levite serves willingly when he learns he will serve a tribe instead of a household — his ambition upgrades. The narrator's quiet note that the idol 'remained all the time that the house of God was at Shiloh' (v. 31) places Dan's false cult alongside God's legitimate sanctuary.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase am shoqet uvo'teach (v. 7, 'a people quiet and trusting') describes Laish's inhabitants with words that elsewhere describe the righteous — they are destroyed precisely because they trust. We rendered the description sympathetically, as the Hebrew does. The identity of the Levite is revealed as 'Jonathan son of Gershom son of Moses' in some manuscripts — the Masoretes may have altered 'Moses' to 'Manasseh' by inserting a suspended nun to protect Moses's reputation.*

Connections: Dan's migration fulfills the failed allotment of Joshua 19:47. The cult at Dan becomes one of Jeroboam's two golden-calf sites (1 Kings 12:29) — the roots of northern apostasy begin here in Judges. The stolen idol connects to Micah's shrine in chapter 17. The peaceful Laish contrasts with the war-hardened Canaanite cities of Joshua.

1In those days, there was no king in Israel. And in those days, the tribe of Dan was looking for territory to settle in, because up to that point no allotment had fallen to them among the tribes of Israel as a permanent inheritance. 2The Danites sent five men from their clan — capable warriors from Zorah and Eshtaol — to scout the land and explore it. They told them, "Go, explore the land." The scouts came to the hill country of Ephraim, to Micah's house, and spent the night there. 3When they were near Micah's house, they recognized the voice of the young Levite. They turned aside there and asked him, "Who brought you here? What are you doing in this place? What do you have here?" 4He said to them, "Micah has done such and such for me. He hired me, and I serve as his priest." 5They said to him, "Please inquire of God so we can know whether the mission we are undertaking will succeed." 6The priest said to them, "Go in peace. The mission you are undertaking has the LORD's approval." 7The five men went on and came to Laish. They observed the people living there — secure and unsuspecting, following the customs of the Sidonians, quiet and confident. There was no oppressive ruler in the land, and they were far from the Sidonians, with no alliance with anyone. 8They returned to their kinsmen at Zorah and Eshtaol. Their kinsmen asked them, "What did you find?" 9They said, "Get up! Let's attack them! We have seen the land, and it is very good. Are you going to sit here doing nothing? Don't hesitate to go and take possession of the land." 10When you get there, you will find an unsuspecting people and a spacious land. God has given it into your hands — a place where there is no shortage of anything the earth produces. 11So six hundred men from the Danite clan set out from Zorah and Eshtaol, armed for war. 12They went up and camped at Kiriath-jearim in Judah. That is why the place is called Mahaneh-dan to this day — it is west of Kiriath-jearim. 13From there they crossed into the hill country of Ephraim and came to Micah's house. 14Then the five men who had scouted the territory of Laish spoke up and said to their kinsmen, "Do you know that in these buildings there is an ephod, household idols, a carved image, and a cast idol? Now consider what you should do." ¹⁵They turned aside and went to the house of the young Levite — that is, Micah's house — and greeted him. ¹⁶The six hundred armed Danite warriors stood positioned at the entrance of the gate. ¹⁷The five men who had scouted the land went inside and took the carved image, the ephod, the household idols, and the cast idol, while the priest stood at the entrance of the gate with the six hundred armed warriors. ¹⁸When these men entered Micah's house and took the carved image, the ephod, the household idols, and the cast idol, the priest said to them, "What are you doing?" ¹⁹They said to him, "Be quiet. Put your hand over your mouth and come with us. Be our advisor and priest. Which is better — being a priest for one man's household, or being priest for an entire tribe and clan in Israel?" ²⁰The priest was delighted. He took the ephod, the household idols, and the carved image, and joined the people. ²¹They turned and left, placing their children, livestock, and valuables at the front of the column. ²²When they had gone some distance from Micah's house, the men from the houses near Micah's were called together and caught up with the Danites. ²³They called out to the Danites, who turned around and said to Micah, "What's wrong with you, that you've gathered this group?" ²⁴He said, "You took my gods that I made and my priest, and you just left! What do I have left? How can you ask me, 'What's wrong with you?'" ²⁵The Danites said to him, "Don't let us hear your voice again, or some hot-tempered men might attack you, and you will lose your life along with your household." ²⁶The Danites went on their way. When Micah saw that they were too strong for him, he turned around and went back home. ²⁷They took what Micah had made, along with his priest, and attacked Laish — a quiet, unsuspecting people. They struck them down with the sword and burned the city. ²⁸There was no one to rescue them, because the city was far from Sidon and they had no alliance with anyone. It was in the valley near Beth-rehob. The Danites rebuilt the city and settled in it. ²⁹They named the city Dan, after their ancestor Dan who was born to Israel. The city had previously been called Laish. ³⁰The Danites set up the carved image for themselves. Jonathan son of Gershom, son of Moses, and his descendants served as priests for the tribe of Dan until the day the land went into exile. ³¹They maintained Micah's carved image that he had made for as long as the house of God was at Shiloh.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The half-refrain ein melekh be-Yisra'el ('there was no king in Israel') opens this chapter, linking it to the theological framework established in 17:6. The Danites' search for nachalah ('inheritance, territorial allotment') contradicts Joshua 19:40-48, which records Dan receiving an allotment — the issue was their inability to conquer it (cf. Judges 1:34, where the Amorites pressed Dan back into the hill country). The narrator's phrasing lo nafelah lo ('it had not fallen to them') uses the language of lot-casting (the verb n-p-l, 'to fall,' is the technical term for territorial assignment by lot), suggesting Dan's allotment never materialized in practice.
2. The five scouts are anashim benei chayil ('men, sons of valor' — capable, seasoned warriors), sent from Tsor'ah and Eshta'ol — the same towns associated with Samson (13:25, 16:31). The verbs leraggel ('to spy out, to scout') and lachokrah ('to explore, search thoroughly') echo the language of the original spy mission in Numbers 13. The scouts' arrival at Micah's house — presented as a lodging stop — sets up the collision between Dan's territorial ambitions and Micah's private cult.
3. The scouts hikkiru ('recognized') the Levite's voice — implying prior acquaintance, perhaps from his time in Bethlehem. The triple interrogation — mi hevi'akha halom ('who brought you here?'), mah attah oseh bazeh ('what are you doing in this?'), mah lekha poh ('what do you have here?') — probes his situation thoroughly. The questions move from agency (who brought you?) to activity (what are you doing?) to possession (what is your stake here?). Their interest in the Levite is strategic, not pastoral.
4. The Levite's summary is candid: kazoh vehkzeh ('such and such' — thus and so) glosses over the details, but the key admission is vayiskhereni ('he hired me'). The verb s-k-r ('to hire') is commercial language — the same verb used for hiring laborers or mercenaries. The Levite's priesthood is employment, not calling. His matter-of-fact tone suggests no awareness that this arrangement might be problematic.
5. The scouts immediately exploit the Levite's priestly function: she'al na ve-Elohim ('inquire, please, of God'). The request treats divination as a service available on demand. The phrase ha-tatsliach darkkenu ('will our way succeed/prosper?') uses the verb ts-l-ch (hiphil, 'to cause to succeed, to prosper'), seeking a divine guarantee for their military reconnaissance. They want an oracle — and they assume this hired priest at an idolatrous shrine can deliver one.
6. The Levite's oracle is immediate and unqualified: lekhu leshalom ('go in peace') followed by nokhach YHWH darkkekhem ('before/in the presence of the LORD is your way'). The word nokhach ('before, in front of, in the sight of') suggests divine oversight and approval. The oracle is suspiciously convenient — exactly what the scouts want to hear. Whether the Levite actually performed a divinatory ritual (using the ephod) or simply spoke what his audience wished to hear, the text does not say. The narrator's silence is itself a judgment.

7. Laish is described with terms that emphasize its vulnerability: yoshevet lavetach ('dwelling securely'), shoqet uvoteach ('quiet and trusting/confident'). The phrase ke-mishpat Tsidonim ('according to the custom of the Sidonians') indicates a Phoenician cultural orientation. The critical detail is their isolation: rechoqim hem mi-Tsidonim ('they were far from the Sidonians') — too distant for their cultural kinsmen to protect them — ve-davar ein lahem im adam ('they had no dealings/alliance with anyone'). The phrase ein makhlim davar ba-arets ('there was no one causing shame/restraining in the land') may mean no oppressive ruler or no defensive authority — either way, the city is defenseless. The narrator presents Laish's peace not as blessing but as fatal exposure.
8. The scouts return to their base towns — Tsor'ah and Eshta'ol — and face the question mah attem ('what are you?' — meaning 'what is your report?'). The brevity of the question reflects urgency: the Danites need territory and want actionable intelligence.
9. The scouts' report is enthusiastic and action-oriented: qumah vena'aleh aleihem ('arise and let us go up against them'). The phrase ra'inu et ha-arets vehineh tovah me'od ('we have seen the land and look, it is very good') deliberately echoes the language of the original scouts in Numbers (cf. Numbers 14:7: 'the land is very, very good'). The rebuke ve-attem machshim ('and you are being silent/inactive') and al te'atselu ('do not be lazy/sluggish') pressures immediate action. The verb lareshet ('to possess, to take as inheritance') is the same conquest vocabulary used in Joshua — but here it will mean annihilating a peaceful civilian population.
10. The scouts promise three things: a vulnerable target (am boteach, 'a trusting/secure people'), abundant space (ha-arets rachavat yadayim, 'the land is broad of hands' — spacious, wide-open), and divine sanction (netanah Elohim beyedkhem, 'God has given it into your hands'). The claim of divine authorization echoes the conquest language of Joshua — but no divine oracle has been given to Dan; they received only the word of Micah's hired priest (v. 6). The phrase ein sham machsor kol davar ('there is no lack of anything there') portrays Laish as a land of plenty. Every detail is designed to motivate: easy target, rich land, God's backing.
11. The expedition force — shesh me'ot ish ('six hundred men') — is modest for a tribal migration, suggesting Dan's reduced strength after losing their original territory to Amorite pressure (1:34). The phrase chagur kelei milchamah ('girded with weapons of war') marks this as a military operation, not a peaceful settlement. The same number — six hundred — appears as the surviving Benjaminite remnant in chapter 20, creating a numerical echo across the epilogue.
12. The etiological note explains the place name Machaneh Dan ('Camp of Dan') — still in use ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day'), indicating the narrative was composed well after the events. The location acharei Qiryat Ye'arim ('behind/west of Kiriath-jearim') places the camp in Judahite territory — Dan passes through Judah on its way north, a journey that will take them through the hill country of Ephraim and Micah's territory.
13. The narrative trajectory is deliberate: the six hundred armed Danites arrive at the same house the five scouts had previously visited. The phrase vayavo'u ad beit Mikhah ('they came as far as the house of Micah') signals that this is not a rest stop — it is a destination with a purpose. The collision between Dan's military expedition and Micah's private cult is about to unfold.
14. The scouts reveal their intelligence about Micah's cultic inventory: efod uterafim ufesel umassekhah ('ephod and teraphim and carved image and cast image') — four sacred objects that together constitute a full divinatory shrine. The question ha-yeda'tem ('did you know?') is rhetorical; the scouts are proposing theft. The phrase ve-attach de'u mah ta'asu ('and now know what you should do') is a veiled directive — they are telling the force to seize the cultic objects. The narrator lists all four items together for the first time, emphasizing the scale of Micah's private cult.
15. The phrase vayish'alu lo leshalom ('they asked him about peace/welfare' — they greeted him) is the standard salutation formula. The identification of the Levite's residence as beit Mikhah ('Micah's house') reinforces that the Levite is a dependent, living in his employer's household. The greeting is polite — a social convention masking the robbery about to occur.
16. The scene is staged like a heist: while the scouts go inside to distract and greet, the main force — shesh me'ot ish chagurim kelei milchamtam ('six hundred men girded with their weapons of war') — positions itself at the petach ha-sha'ar ('entrance of the gate'). The verb nitsavim ('standing, positioned') implies a deliberate military formation, blocking any escape or resistance.
17. The theft is executed with military precision: the five scouts enter and seize all four cultic objects — ha-pesel, ha-efod, ha-terafim, ha-massekhah — each with the definite article, emphasizing these are specific, known items. Meanwhile, the priest is kept outside at the gate with the armed force, effectively neutralized as a potential obstacle. The narration is rapid and efficient, mimicking the speed of the operation itself.
18. The Levite's protest — mah attem osim ('what are you doing?') — is feeble and quickly overcome. The verse repeats the list of stolen cultic objects, hammering home the comprehensiveness of the theft. The priest's question echoes back to the scouts' question to him in verse 3 — mah attach oseh bazeh ('what are you doing here?') — creating an ironic reversal: the one who was questioned now questions, but has no power to stop what is happening.
19. The Danites' recruitment pitch is blunt and effective. The command hacharesh ('be silent') followed by sim yadkha al pikha ('put your hand on your mouth') is forceful — shut up and listen. Then the offer: heyeh lanu le-av ulekhohhen ('be for us a father and priest') — the same title Micah used (17:10), but now with a larger constituency. The rhetorical question — ha-tov heyotkha khohhen le-veit ish echad o heyotkha khohhen le-shevet ulemishpachah ('is it better to be priest for one man's house or for a tribe and clan?') — appeals directly to ambition. They are offering a promotion.
20. The phrase vayyitav lev ha-kohhen ('the heart of the priest was good/glad') reveals immediate, uncomplicated enthusiasm — no loyalty to Micah, no moral hesitation. The Levite's allegiance transfers instantly to the higher bidder. He personally carries the cultic objects — ha-efod, ha-terafim, ha-pesel — as his professional tools. The phrase vayavo beqerev ha-am ('he went into the midst of the people') means he joined their ranks, embedding himself in the Danite community. The mercenary priest has found a better client.

- 21. The Danites organize their march tactically: ha-taf ('the children/dependents'), ha-miqneh ('the livestock'), and ha-kevuddah ('the valuable goods, heavy baggage') go lifneihem ('before them' — at the front). This is a defensive formation: the fighting men form the rear guard, expecting pursuit from Micah. The inclusion of taf and miqneh confirms this is a permanent migration, not a military raid — they are relocating their entire community.
- 22. Micah musters his neighbors: ha-anashim asher babattim asher im beit Mikhah ('the men who were in the houses near Micah's house') — a hastily assembled posse. The verb niz'aqu ('they were called out, mustered') suggests an alarm was raised. The verb vayadbiqu ('they overtook, caught up with') means the pursuers closed the gap. But the narrator has already told us the Danites expected this pursuit (v. 21) and positioned their warriors accordingly.
- 23. The Danites' question — mah lekha ki niz'aqta ('what is the matter with you that you were called out/mustered?') — is mockingly dismissive. Having just stolen his priest, his gods, and his cultic equipment, they pretend not to understand why Micah might be upset. The verb vayassebbu feneihem ('they turned their faces') shows the rear guard turning to confront the pursuers — an unhurried, confident response from a superior force.
- 24. Micah's lament is simultaneously pathetic and theologically devastating: et elohai asher asiti leqachtem ('my gods which I made, you took'). The phrase 'my gods which I made' is an unwitting confession — gods that can be made and stolen are no gods at all. His protest reduces to a cry of loss: u-mah li od ('and what is left for me?'). Micah has lost his entire religious apparatus — the gods, the priest, the shrine's contents — and with them, his sense of divine security (cf. 17:13). The narrator lets Micah's words expose the bankruptcy of his religion without editorial comment.
- 25. The threat is naked: al tashma qolkha immanu ('do not let your voice be heard with us') — be silent or face consequences. The phrase anashim marei nefesh ('men bitter of soul' — hot-tempered, volatile men) is a euphemism for the Danite warriors themselves. The warning ve-asafah nafshekha venefesh beitekha ('and you will gather up your life and the life of your house' — you will lose your life and your household's) is a death threat dressed as friendly advice. Six hundred armed men against Micah's posse leaves no doubt about the outcome.
- 26. The confrontation ends without violence — but only because Micah recognizes the power imbalance: ki chazaqim hemmah mimmenu ('because they were stronger than him'). The verb vayyifen ('he turned') and vayyashov el beito ('he returned to his house') describe a defeated retreat. Micah goes home to an empty shrine — gods stolen, priest hired away, religious system dismantled. The narrator offers no sympathy; the chapter's logic implies that what was built on human manufacture and mercenary religion could be taken away just as easily.
- 27. The narrator returns to the same descriptors for Laish: am shoqet uvoteach ('a quiet and trusting people') — the repetition from verse 7 makes the massacre feel premeditated rather than impulsive. The Danites knew exactly what they would find. The phrase vayakku otam lefi cherev ('they struck them with the mouth/edge of the sword') is the standard formula for military annihilation. The burning of the city — ve-et ha-ir sarefu va-esh ('the city they burned with fire') — completes the destruction. No resistance is recorded; no military engagement — only slaughter of civilians who expected no attack.
- 28. The devastating phrase ve-ein matstsil ('and there was no deliverer/rescuer') echoes the Judges cycle — but here the one needing deliverance is not Israel but Israel's victims. The verb matstsil (hiphil participle of n-ts-l, 'to deliver, rescue') is the same root used for God's deliverance of Israel. The geographic note — ba-emeq asher le-Veit Rechov ('in the valley belonging to Beth-rehob') — places Laish in the upper Jordan valley near the sources of the Jordan River. The Danites vayyivnu et ha-ir ('rebuilt the city') — civilization replaces the one they destroyed, but the foundation is massacre.
- 29. The renaming — vayiqre'u shem ha-ir Dan ('they called the name of the city Dan') — claims the conquered territory through naming. The phrase be-shem Dan avihem ('after the name of Dan their father') grounds the claim in patriarchal genealogy: Dan was a son of Jacob/Israel. The editorial note ve-ulam Layish shem ha-ir larishonah ('but Laish was the name of the city at first') preserves the original name as a historical marker. The city Dan will become infamous as the site of Jeroboam's golden calf (1 Kings 12:29), making its founding in idolatry here darkly prophetic.
- 30. This verse finally names the anonymous Levite: Yehonatan ben Gershom ben Menasheh ('Jonathan son of Gershom son of Manasseh'). However, the Hebrew text contains a famous scribal anomaly: the letter nun in Menasheh (נ) is written as a 'suspended nun' — a letter raised above the line. Remove the nun and the name reads Mosheh (מ) — Moses. The Masoretic tradition preserves both readings: the original text identified this idolatrous priest as a direct descendant of Moses through his son Gershom (Exodus 2:22, 18:3), but later scribes inserted the suspended nun to read 'Manasseh' instead, protecting Moses' honor. The phrase ad yom gelot ha-arets ('until the day of the exile of the land') likely refers to the Assyrian conquest of the northern kingdom in 722 BCE — meaning the Danite idol cult persisted for centuries.
- 31. The closing verse juxtaposes two religious centers: pesel Mikhah ('Micah's idol') at Dan and beit ha-Elohim be-Shiloh ('the house of God at Shiloh') — the legitimate sanctuary where the tabernacle was stationed. The phrase kol yemei heyot ('all the days of the being/existence of') indicates the Danite idol cult operated concurrently with the legitimate Shiloh sanctuary. This creates a geographical and theological polarity: legitimate YHWH worship at Shiloh in the center versus idolatrous YHWH worship at Dan in the north. The chapter ends not with resolution but with ongoing corruption — the idol remains, the counterfeit priesthood endures, and Israel's religious life is fractured from within.

Summary: A Levite's concubine leaves him and returns to her father's house in Bethlehem. The Levite retrieves her. On the return journey, they lodge in Gibeah of Benjamin, where men of the city demand the Levite for sexual assault. The host offers his daughter and the concubine instead. The concubine is gang-raped throughout the night and dies. The Levite dismembers her body into twelve pieces and sends them to all Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the darkest chapter in the Hebrew Bible. The Gibeah outrage deliberately echoes the Sodom narrative (Genesis 19) in structure, vocabulary, and horror — but here the perpetrators are Israelites, not Canaanites. The nation has become the thing it was supposed to replace. The phrase 'from the day the Israelites came up from Egypt until this day, nothing like this has been done or seen' (v. 30) calls every tribe to respond. The dismemberment of the concubine — twelve pieces for twelve tribes — makes every tribe a witness to the crime.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew is spare and devastating: 'her master rose in the morning, opened the doors of the house, and went out to go on his way, and there was his concubine fallen at the doorstep with her hands on the threshold' (v. 27). The phrase yadeyha al hassaf ('her hands on the threshold') is the most haunting image in Judges — she crawled to the door and died reaching for safety. We preserved the Hebrew's restraint; the text does not narrate the rape, only its aftermath.

Connections: The Genesis 19 (Sodom) parallel is unmistakable and deliberate — hospitality violated, mob demand for sexual assault, a substitute offered. The Levite's twelve-piece message echoes Saul's later rally in 1 Samuel 11:7 (cutting oxen, not a body). The Gibeah atrocity leads directly to the near-extirmination of Benjamin (ch. 20) and becomes a permanent marker of Israel's moral failure in Hosea 9:9 and 10:9.

¹In those days, there was no king in Israel. A Levite living in the remote parts of the hill country of Ephraim took a woman from Bethlehem in Judah as his concubine. ²His concubine was unfaithful to him and left him, going to her father's house in Bethlehem in Judah. She stayed there for four months. ³Her husband set out and went after her to speak tenderly to her and bring her back. He had his servant with him and a pair of donkeys. She brought him into her father's house, and when the young woman's father saw him, he was glad to welcome him. ⁴His father-in-law, the young woman's father, pressed him to stay, and he remained with him for three days. They ate and drank and spent the night there. ⁵On the fourth day they got up early in the morning, and the Levite prepared to leave. But the young woman's father said to his son-in-law, "Have something to eat first, and then you can go." ⁶So they sat down and the two of them ate and drank together. Then the young woman's father said to the man, "Please agree to stay the night and enjoy yourself." ⁷The man got up to leave, but his father-in-law pressed him, so he stayed and spent the night there again. ⁸On the fifth day he got up early to leave, and the young woman's father said, "Please, have something to eat. Wait until the afternoon." So the two of them ate. ⁹When the man got up to leave with his concubine and his servant, his father-in-law, the young woman's father, said to him, "Look, the day is fading toward evening. Please spend the night. The day is almost over — stay here tonight and enjoy yourself. Tomorrow you can get an early start and head home." ¹⁰But the man refused to spend another night. He got up and left, and traveled until he was opposite Jebus — that is, Jerusalem. He had with him his two saddled donkeys and his concubine. ¹¹When they were near Jebus, the day was nearly gone. The servant said to his master, "Come, let's turn aside into this Jebusite city and spend the night there." ¹²His master said to him, "We will not turn aside into a foreign city where the people are not Israelites. We will go on to Gibeah." ¹³He said to his servant, "Come, let's press on to one of these towns and spend the night in Gibeah or Ramah." ¹⁴They passed by and continued on, and the sun set on them near Gibeah, which belongs to Benjamin. ¹⁵They turned aside there and went in to spend the night at Gibeah. He went inside and sat down in the town square, but no one took them into their home for the night. ¹⁶Then an old man came in from his work in the fields that evening. The man was from the hill country of Ephraim and was living as a foreigner in Gibeah; the local people were Benjaminites. ¹⁷He looked up and saw the traveler in the town square. The old man said, "Where are you going? Where are you coming from?" ¹⁸He answered, "We are traveling from Bethlehem in Judah to the remote hill country of Ephraim, which is where I am from."

I went to Bethlehem in Judah, and now I am going to the house of the LORD. But no one has taken me into their home." ¹⁹We have straw and feed for our donkeys, and bread and wine for me, for your servant-woman, and for the young man with your servants. We lack nothing." ²⁰The old man said, "You are welcome at my home. Let me take care of all your needs. Just don't spend the night in the square." ²¹He brought him into his house and fed the donkeys. They washed their feet and ate and drank. ²²While they were relaxing, the men of the city — worthless men — surrounded the house and pounded on the door. They said to the old man who owned the house, "Bring out the man who came to your house so we can have sex with him." ²³The owner of the house went out to them and said, "No, my brothers! Please do not act so wickedly. Since this man has come into my house, do not commit this outrage." ²⁴Here are my virgin daughter and his concubine. Let me bring them out. Violate them and do whatever you want with them, but do not commit this outrage against this man." ²⁵But the men refused to listen to him. So the Levite seized his concubine and pushed her outside to them. They raped her and abused her through the night until morning. They let her go as dawn was breaking. ²⁶The woman came at the approach of dawn and collapsed at the entrance of the house where her master was staying. She lay there until daylight. ²⁷Her master got up in the morning, opened the doors of the house, and went out to continue his journey. There was the woman, his concubine, fallen at the entrance of the house with her hands on the threshold. ²⁸He said to her, "Get up. Let's go." There was no answer. He put her on the donkey, and the man set out for home. ²⁹When he arrived home, he took a knife, grasped his concubine's body, and cut her limb by limb into twelve pieces. Then he sent them throughout the entire territory of Israel. ³⁰Everyone who saw it said, "Nothing like this has ever happened or been seen since the day the Israelites came up from the land of Egypt until today. Think about it. Take counsel. Speak up."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The half-refrain u-melekh ein be-Yisra'el ('and a king there was not in Israel') opens the most disturbing chapter in Judges. The Levite is described as gar be-yarketei har Efrayim ('sojourning in the far reaches of the hill country of Ephraim') — the word yarketei ('remote parts, far sides') suggests geographical marginality. He takes a pilegish ('concubine') — a secondary wife with recognized but lesser legal status than a full wife. She is from Bethlehem in Judah, the same town as the Levite in chapters 17-18, creating a geographic echo. The namelessness of both the Levite and his concubine throughout this chapter is significant: they are representative figures, not individual characters.
2. The verb vattizneh ('she was unfaithful/she prostituted herself') is debated. The standard meaning of z-n-h is sexual infidelity, but the LXX (Septuagint) reads 'she became angry with him' (Greek orgisthe), suggesting an alternate Hebrew reading or interpretive tradition. Some scholars argue the verb here means 'to be estranged from' rather than literal sexual unfaithfulness. Either way, she returns to her father's house — beit aviha ('her father's house') — which was her right as a concubine. The four-month separation (yamim arba'ah chodashim — 'days, four months') provides time for the relationship to cool and for the father-in-law to establish the hospitality dynamic that follows.
3. The Levite's purpose is reconciliation: ledabber al libbah ('to speak upon her heart' — to speak tenderly, to win her back). This is the same phrase used of God's courtship of Israel in Hosea 2:16. He brings practical resources — a na'ar ('servant/attendant') and tsemed chamorim ('a pair of donkeys') for the return journey. Her response — vatebi'ehu beit aviha ('she brought him into her father's house') — suggests willingness to reconcile. The father's reaction — vayyismach liqrato ('he rejoiced to meet him') — is enthusiastically hospitable, setting up the extended hospitality sequence.
4. The verb vayyechezaq bo ('he held onto him, pressed him') shows the father-in-law's insistent hospitality — the same verb used for grasping, seizing. The three-day stay (sheloshet yamim) with its pattern of eating, drinking, and lodging establishes a hospitality rhythm that will stretch uncomfortably through verses 5-9. The extended hospitality scene serves a narrative purpose: it delays the Levite's departure until late in the day, which will force the fateful overnight stop at Gibeah.
5. The fourth day introduces a pattern of delay. The father-in-law's invitation — se'ad libbekha pat lechem ('sustain your heart with a morsel of bread') — uses the verb s-'-d ('to sustain, support, refresh') and is a conventional hospitality formula. The phrase ve-achar telekhu ('and afterward you may go') implies the meal should precede departure — a reasonable request that becomes a mechanism of entrapment through repetition.
6. A meal that was supposed to precede departure becomes another occasion for delay. The father's plea — ho'el na velin ('please be willing and stay the night') — uses ho'el ('be willing, consent'), the same verb used for the Levite who agreed to stay with Micah (17:11). The phrase veyitav libbeka ('and let your heart be good/merry') frames continued hospitality as pleasure. The narrator's repetition of eating and drinking creates a drowsy, stalling atmosphere — every hour spent here is an hour lost for the return journey.
7. The verb vayyiftsar ('he urged, pressed, insisted') is stronger than the previous requests — active persuasion bordering on coercion. The pattern is now established: the Levite tries to leave, the father-in-law detains him. This hospitality — excessive, insistent — contrasts sharply with the complete absence of hospitality that will follow at Gibeah. The narrator builds the contrast through accumulation.

8. Fifth day — the same pattern: early rising, attempt to depart, the father's intervention. The phrase vehitmahmehu ad netot ha-yom ('linger until the day declines') pushes departure dangerously late. The verb hitmahmehu ('linger, delay, tarry') is the same verb used in Genesis 19:16 when the angels urged Lot to leave Sodom and he lingered — a Genesis 19 verbal echo that foreshadows what awaits at Gibeah. Every hour of delay narrows the travel window.
9. The father-in-law's final appeal is the most elaborate: hinneh na rafah ha-yom la'arov ('look, the day has weakened toward evening') — the verb rafah ('to weaken, grow feeble') personifies the dying daylight. The repeated hinneh chanot ha-yom ('look, the day is encamping/declining') reinforces the urgency. His advice — vehishkamtem machar ('rise early tomorrow') — seems practical and safe. But this time the Levite refuses. His decision to depart at dusk rather than stay another night will prove catastrophic. The phrase vehalakhta le-ohalekha ('and you will go to your tent' — go home) uses the archaic 'tent' for household, recalling Israel's nomadic origins.
10. The Levite's refusal — velo avah ha-ish lalun ('the man was not willing to stay the night') — sets the tragedy in motion. He reaches nokhach Yevus ('opposite Jebus') — the narrator identifies this as hi Yerushalayim ('that is, Jerusalem'), still a non-Israelite city at this point in the narrative. The detail of chamorim chavushim ('saddled donkeys') and his concubine establishes the traveling party. The mention of Jebus/Jerusalem is crucial for the next verse, where the Levite's decision to bypass a non-Israelite city in favor of an Israelite one will prove fatally wrong.
11. The servant's suggestion is practical: ha-yom rad me'od ('the day has gone down very much' — it is getting very late), and Jebus is right there. The verb nasurah ('let us turn aside') proposes the sensible option — shelter in the nearest city. The servant identifies it as ir ha-Yevusi ('the city of the Jebusite') — a non-Israelite settlement. His practical instinct will be overridden by his master's ethnic preference.
12. The Levite's reasoning — lo nasur el ir nokhri asher lo mibbenei Yisra'el hennah ('we will not turn aside into a foreign city that is not of the sons of Israel') — assumes an Israelite city will be safer than a non-Israelite one. The irony is devastating: he chooses Gibeah, a Benjaminite city, expecting Israelite hospitality — and will encounter behavior worse than anything he might have faced among the Jebusites. The narrative inverts expectations systematically: the foreigner's city would have been safe; the Israelite city will be deadly. The echo of Abraham's and Lot's encounters with foreign cities is deliberate.
13. The Levite offers two Israelite options: ba-Giv'ah o va-Ramah ('in Gibeah or in Ramah') — both Benjaminite towns a short distance north of Jebus/Jerusalem. Gibeah (later Saul's hometown, 1 Samuel 10:26) is closer, and they will reach it first. The Levite's confidence in Israelite hospitality drives the choice. The phrase lekhah veniqrevah ('come and let us draw near') expresses urgency — daylight is failing.
14. The phrase vattavo lahem ha-shemesh ('the sun came upon them' — set on them) marks the transition to night and to danger. The narrator specifies asher le-Vinyamin ('which belongs to Benjamin') — the tribal identification is important for the tribal war that will follow in chapter 20. The setting sun signals the end of safe travel and the beginning of the chapter's nightmare.
15. The Levite enters Gibeah and sits birechov ha-ir ('in the open square of the city') — the public gathering place where travelers would wait for hospitality offers. The devastating phrase ve-ein ish me'assef otam habbaytah lalun ('and there was no one gathering/taking them into the house to lodge') signals a catastrophic failure of the fundamental Near Eastern obligation of hospitality. In a culture where hosting strangers was a sacred duty, the refusal of an entire city to offer shelter is an indictment. The parallel with Genesis 19:2-3 (Lot in Sodom's square) is unmistakable and deliberate.
16. The only person who offers hospitality is himself an outsider: me-har Efrayim ('from the hill country of Ephraim') and hu gar ba-Giv'ah ('he was sojourning in Gibeah') — a resident alien, not a native Benjaminite. The narrator emphasizes the distinction: ve-anshei ha-maqom benei Yemini ('and the men of the place were Benjaminites'). The native population has refused hospitality; only the foreigner-within fulfills the obligation. The parallel with Lot in Sodom tightens — Lot too was a resident alien who alone offered hospitality to strangers (Genesis 19:1-3).
17. The old man's double question — anah telekh ume-ayin tavo ('where are you going and from where do you come?') — is the standard traveler's inquiry. The term ha-ish ha-oreakh ('the traveling man, the wayfarer') emphasizes the Levite's vulnerability as a stranger. The old man initiates contact — vayyissa einav ('he lifted his eyes') — actively looking for someone in need, unlike the rest of Gibeah's inhabitants.
18. The Levite explains his journey and repeats the hospitality failure: ve-ein ish me'assef oti habbaytah ('no one is gathering me into the house'). The phrase ve-et beit YHWH ani holekh ('and to the house of the LORD I am going') is textually uncertain — some manuscripts read 'to my house' (beiti) rather than 'the house of the LORD.' If the reading 'house of the LORD' is original, it adds further irony: a man heading to God's sanctuary will be destroyed by God's own people.
19. The Levite emphasizes that he is not a burden: ein machsor kol davar ('there is no lack of anything') — he has provisions for both animals (teven, 'straw'; mispo, 'fodder/provender') and people (lechem vayayin, 'bread and wine'). He refers to his concubine as amatekha ('your maidservant'), using the deferential second-person form. His self-sufficiency makes the city's refusal to host him even more inexcusable — he is not asking for charity, only for shelter.
20. The old man's response — shalom lakh ('peace to you') and kol machsorrekha alai ('all your needs are on me') — is the fullest expression of hospitality in the narrative. But his urgent warning — raq barechov al talan ('only in the square do not spend the night') — reveals that he knows the danger. The emphatic raq ('only, but') conveys urgency: whatever else happens, do not stay outside. Like Lot warning the angels in Sodom (Genesis 19:2-3), the old man knows what happens to unprotected strangers in this city after dark.
21. The hospitality sequence is complete: shelter (vayevi'ehu leveito, 'he brought him to his house'), animal care (vayavol lachamorim, 'he mixed feed for the donkeys'), personal hygiene (vayyirchatsu ragleihem, 'they washed their feet'), and food (vayokhelu vayyishtu, 'they ate and drank'). The verb yavol (from b-l-l, 'to mix fodder') is a specific agricultural term. The scene is brief and proper — a stark contrast to what immediately follows.

- 22. The parallel with Genesis 19:4-5 (Sodom) is now explicit and unmistakable. The phrase anshei benei beliya'al ('men, sons of worthlessness/wickedness') identifies the attackers — beliya'al is not a proper name here but a term meaning 'worthlessness, destructiveness.' They nasabbu et ha-bayit ('surrounded the house') and mitdapeqim al ha-delet ('pounded on the door') — besieging it like a military target. Their demand — hotse et ha-ish asher ba el beitekha veneda'ennu ('bring out the man who came to your house and let us know him') — uses the verb y-d- ('to know') in its sexual sense, exactly as in Genesis 19:5. The narrator forces the reader to see Gibeah through the lens of Sodom: an Israelite city has become indistinguishable from the paradigmatic city of wickedness.
- 23. The host's protest echoes Lot's words in Genesis 19:7 almost verbatim: al achai al tare'u na ('no, my brothers, do not do evil'). The term ha-nevalah ha-zot ('this outrage/disgrace') is a specific term for acts of gross sexual violation or social transgression — the same word used for Shechem's rape of Dinah (Genesis 34:7) and Amnon's rape of Tamar (2 Samuel 13:12). His appeal is to the obligation of hospitality: acharei asher ba ha-ish ha-zeh el beiti ('since this man has come into my house') — the guest is under his protection, and violating a guest violates the host.
- 24. The host offers two women — hinneh bitti ha-betulah ufilagshehu ('here is my daughter the virgin and his concubine') — as substitutes, exactly as Lot offered his daughters in Sodom (Genesis 19:8). The verb annu ('afflict them, violate them, rape them') is the same verb used for the rape of Dinah (Genesis 34:2). The horrifying phrase va'asu lahem ha-tov be-eineikhem ('do to them what is good in your eyes') echoes the refrain of 17:6 — 'what is right in their own eyes' — with devastating irony: moral autonomy has descended to sanctioned gang rape. The host protects the male guest at the cost of the women. The narrator reports this without commentary, letting the moral horror register through the bare facts.
- 25. The critical action: vayyachazaq ha-ish befilagsho vayyotse aleihem hachuts ('the man grabbed his concubine and brought her out to them outside'). The subject 'the man' most likely refers to the Levite himself — he physically seizes his own concubine and thrusts her out to the mob. The verbs that follow are unflinching: vayyede'u otah ('they knew her' — they raped her) and vayyit'allelu vah ('they abused/mistreated her') kol ha-laylah ad ha-boqer ('all the night until the morning'). The verb hit'allel ('to abuse, treat brutally') describes sustained, repeated violence. The phrase vayshallechuha ba'alot ha-shachar ('they released her at the rising of the dawn') — the verb shillech ('to send away, release') treats her like a used object being discarded. The narrator's flat tone is itself a form of testimony.
- 26. The image is devastating in its simplicity: vattipol petach beit ha-ish asher adoneiha sham ('she fell at the entrance of the house of the man where her master was'). She crawls back to the only shelter she knows — the house where the man who pushed her outside is sleeping. The word adoneiha ('her master/lord') rather than 'her husband' underscores the power dynamic. The phrase ad ha-or ('until the light') — she lies at the threshold through the remaining darkness, alone, while her 'master' is inside. The narrator does not say whether she is alive or dead at this point.
- 27. The Levite rises, opens the door, and prepares to leave — vayyetse lalekhet ledarko ('he went out to go on his way') — as if nothing has happened. His first thought is the journey, not the woman he forced outside. Then: vehineh ha-ishah pilagsho nofelet petach ha-bayit ('and there was the woman, his concubine, fallen at the entrance of the house'). The image of her hands al ha-saf ('on the threshold') is one of the most haunting in all of Scripture — her fingers gripping the doorstep she could not cross. The narrator does not tell us what the Levite feels. The silence is deafening.
- 28. The Levite's words — qumi venelekhah ('get up and let's go') — are staggeringly callous. The phrase ve-ein oneh ('and there was no answer') confirms she is dead or dying — the same phrase used when God does not answer (1 Samuel 14:37, 28:6). The narrator's restraint is excruciating: no description of the Levite's reaction, no grief, no outrage. He loads her onto the donkey — vayyiqqacheha al ha-chamor — like cargo, and continues home — vayyelekh limqomo ('he went to his place'). The flatness of the narration mirrors the Levite's apparent emotional flatness.
- 29. The Levite takes ha-ma'akhelet ('the knife' — the same word used for the knife Abraham used at the binding of Isaac, Genesis 22:6, 10) and vayyenattecheha la-atsameiha ('he cut her into her bones/limbs') — the verb n-t-ch is the technical term for butchering a sacrificial animal (Leviticus 1:6, 12). He produces lishnem asar netachim ('twelve pieces') — one for each tribe. The verb vayshallecheha ('he sent her') distributes the pieces bekhol gevul Yisra'el ('throughout the entire border/territory of Israel'). The act echoes — and inverts — covenant rituals involving dismembered animals (cf. Genesis 15:10). Saul will later perform a similar act with oxen to muster Israel (1 Samuel 11:7), but here a human body replaces the animal. The narrator reports the dismemberment without commentary.
- 30. The chapter closes with a communal response of horror: lo nihyetah velo nir'atah kazot ('nothing like this has happened or been seen like this'). The temporal frame — lemiyyom alot benei Yisra'el me-erets Mitsrayim ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('from the day the sons of Israel came up from the land of Egypt until this day') — spans the entire national history: nothing since the Exodus has been this terrible. The triple imperative — simu lakhem aleha utsu vedabberu ('set your minds on it, take counsel, and speak') — demands a response. The verbs move from internal reflection (simu, 'consider') to deliberation (utsu, 'take counsel') to public speech (dabberu, 'speak'). This call to action launches the civil war of chapter 20.

Summary: All Israel assembles against Gibeah. Benjamin refuses to surrender the offenders, and civil war erupts. Israel suffers two devastating defeats before God grants victory on the third day. Benjamin is nearly annihilated — 600 men survive by fleeing to the Rock of Rimmon.

What Makes This Remarkable: Israel inquires of God three times: 'Who shall go up first?' (v. 18), 'Shall we again draw near?' (v. 23), and 'Shall we go up once more?' (v. 28). The first two times, God authorizes the attack, and Israel loses. The defeats are unexplained — God permits righteous war to fail, perhaps to purge Israel's own self-righteousness before granting victory. The 25,000 Benjaminites dead (v. 46) represent the costliest internal conflict in the pre-monarchic period.

Translation Friction: *The battle narratives include numbers that seem incompatible between verses — 25,100 Benjaminites (v. 35) vs. 25,000 (v. 46) vs. detailed counts that add to slightly different totals. We rendered each number as the Hebrew gives it and noted the variants. The phrase vayinnagfu lifnei Yisra'el (v. 35, 'were struck down before Israel') uses the standard holy-war vocabulary — even in civil war, the narrative framework remains theological.*

Connections: The initial question 'who shall go up first?' (v. 18) echoes 1:1, forming a bookend — the book opens and closes with the same question, but the enemy has shifted from Canaanites to fellow Israelites. The near-annihilation of Benjamin anticipates Saul's tribe — the traumatized remnant produces Israel's first king. The 600 survivors at the Rock of Rimmon (v. 47) are the thread from which Benjamin will be rebuilt.

¹All the Israelites went out and the community assembled as one person, from Dan to Beersheba, including the land of Gilead, before the LORD at Mizpah. ²The leaders of all the people and of all the tribes of Israel took their positions in the assembly of God's people — four hundred thousand foot soldiers who carried swords. ³The Benjaminites heard that the Israelites had gone up to Mizpah. The Israelites said, "Tell us — how did this terrible thing happen?" ⁴The Levite, the husband of the murdered woman, answered and said, "I came to Gibeah in Benjamin — I and my concubine — to spend the night. ⁵The citizens of Gibeah rose up against me. They surrounded the house at night intending to kill me. They raped my concubine, and she died. ⁶I took my concubine, cut her into pieces, and sent them throughout the entire territory of Israel's inheritance, because they committed a depraved outrage in Israel. ⁷Here you all are, Israelites. Give your judgment and counsel on this matter." ⁸All the people rose as one person, saying, "None of us will go to his tent. None of us will return home. ⁹Now this is what we will do to Gibeah — we will go up against it by lot. ¹⁰We will take ten men out of every hundred from all the tribes of Israel, a hundred from every thousand, and a thousand from every ten thousand, to gather provisions for the army, so that when they arrive at Gibeah of Benjamin, they can deal with all the outrage that was committed in Israel." ¹¹So all the men of Israel were assembled against the city, united as one person. ¹²The tribes of Israel sent messengers throughout the tribe of Benjamin, saying, "What is this terrible thing that has happened among you? ¹³Now hand over the worthless men who are in Gibeah so we can put them to death and purge the evil from Israel." But the Benjaminites refused to listen to their fellow Israelites. ¹⁴Instead, the Benjaminites gathered from their towns to Gibeah to go out and fight against the Israelites. ¹⁵The Benjaminites mustered from their towns on that day twenty-six thousand swordsmen, in addition to the inhabitants of Gibeah, who mustered seven hundred select warriors. ¹⁶Among all these fighters were seven hundred select men who were left-handed. Every one of them could sling a stone at a hair's width and not miss. ¹⁷The men of Israel, not counting Benjamin, mustered four hundred thousand swordsmen — all of them warriors. ¹⁸The Israelites set out and went up to Bethel and inquired of God. The Israelites asked, "Who among us should go up first to fight against the Benjaminites?" The LORD said, "Judah first." ¹⁹The Israelites got up in the morning and encamped against Gibeah. ²⁰The men of Israel went out to fight Benjamin and drew up their battle lines against them at Gibeah. ²¹The Benjaminites came out of Gibeah and cut down twenty-two thousand Israelite men that day. ²²But the Israelite forces rallied their courage and again formed battle lines in the same place where they had formed up the first day. ²³The Israelites went up and wept before the LORD until evening. They inquired of the LORD, "Should we again engage in battle against the Benjaminites, our own brothers?" The LORD said, "Go up against him." ²⁴The Israelites advanced against the Benjaminites on the second day. ²⁵Benjamin came out from Gibeah against them on the second day and cut down another eighteen thousand Israelite swordsmen. ²⁶Then all the Israelites — the entire army — went up to Bethel. They wept, sat before the LORD, fasted that day until evening, and offered burnt offerings and fellowship offerings before the LORD. ²⁷The Israelites inquired of the LORD — for the ark of the covenant of God was there in those days, ²⁸and Phinehas son of Eleazar son of Aaron was serving before it in those days — saying, "Should we go out once more to battle against the Benjaminites, our brothers, or should we stop?" The LORD said, "Go up, because tomorrow I will give them into your hand." ²⁹Israel set ambushes around Gibeah. ³⁰The Israelites went up against the Benjaminites on the third day and formed up against Gibeah as before. ³¹The Benjaminites came out to meet the army and were drawn away from the city. They began striking down casualties among the troops as before, along the roads — one leading to Bethel and the other to Gibeah through the open country — killing about thirty Israelites. ³²The Benjaminites said, "They are falling before us just as before!" But the Israelites had planned, "Let's retreat and draw them away from the city onto the roads." ³³All the Israelite main force rose from their positions and formed up at Baal-tamar, while the Israelite ambush force burst out from their position west of Gibeah. ³⁴Ten thousand select warriors from all Israel came directly against Gibeah. The fighting was fierce, but the Benjaminites did not realize that disaster was closing in on them. ³⁵The LORD struck Benjamin down before Israel, and the Israelites destroyed twenty-five thousand one hundred Benjaminite swordsmen that day. ³⁶The Benjaminites saw that they were defeated. The Israelite main force had given ground to Benjamin because they were relying on the ambush they had set near Gibeah. ³⁷The ambush force moved quickly and rushed into Gibeah. They spread through the city and struck everyone in it with the sword. ³⁸The prearranged signal between the Israelite main force and the ambush was this: the ambush would send up a great column of smoke from the city. ³⁹When the Israelite main force turned in the battle, Benjamin had already begun inflicting casualties — about thirty Israelites — because they were saying, "They are certainly falling before us, just as in the earlier battles!" ⁴⁰But then the column of smoke began to rise from the city — a pillar of smoke. Benjamin looked behind them, and the entire city was going up in flames toward the sky. ⁴¹Then the Israelite main force turned to attack, and the Benjaminites were terrified, because they realized that disaster had overtaken them. ⁴²They turned and fled from the Israelites toward the wilderness, but the battle caught up with them. Meanwhile, those coming out of the towns were destroying them in between. ⁴³They surrounded Benjamin, pursued them relentlessly, and trampled them down opposite Gibeah on the east side. ⁴⁴Eighteen thousand Benjaminites fell — all of them warriors. ⁴⁵They turned and fled toward the wilderness to the Rock of Rimmon. The Israelites cut down five thousand of them on the roads, pursued them hard as far as Gidom, and struck down two thousand more. ⁴⁶The total number of Benjaminites who fell that day was twenty-five thousand swordsmen — all of them warriors. ⁴⁷Six hundred men turned and fled into the wilderness to the Rock of Rimmon. They stayed at the Rock of Rimmon for four months. ⁴⁸The Israelites turned back against the Benjaminites and struck them down with the sword — entire towns, livestock, and everyone they found. They also set fire to every town they came across.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The assembly formula — vattiqahel ha-edah ke-ish echad ('the assembly gathered as one man') — expresses unprecedented unity. The geographical scope — mi-Dan ve-ad Be'er Sheva ('from Dan to Beersheba') — encompasses the entire land from north to south, plus ve-erets ha-Gil'ad ('the land of Gilead') east of the Jordan. The phrase el YHWH ha-Mitspah ('before the LORD at Mizpah') indicates this is both a military muster and a sacred assembly. Mizpah (meaning 'watchtower') was a prominent gathering site in Benjamin. The opening echoes 1:1 — Israel assembles to inquire of the LORD — but this time the enemy is not Canaanites but a fellow Israelite tribe.
2. The pinnot ('corners, leaders, chieftains') of the people — the word pintah literally means 'corner' and metaphorically refers to cornerstones of leadership. The assembly is called qahal am ha-Elohim ('the assembly of the people of God') — sacred language for what is becoming a war council. The army count — arba me'ot elef ish ragli sholef cherev ('four hundred thousand men on foot, drawers of the sword') — represents an overwhelming force. Whether the numbers are literal or use elef to mean 'military unit/clan' rather than 'thousand,' the point is Israel's unified strength against Benjamin.
3. Benjamin learns of the assembly but does not attend — a significant absence that will harden into military opposition. The Israelites' question — dabberu eikhah nihyetah ha-ra'ah ha-zot ('speak — how did this evil come about?') — demands a formal account. The word ha-ra'ah ('the evil, the wickedness') characterizes the Gibeah incident without euphemism.

4. The Levite is identified as ish ha-ishah ha-nirtsachah ('the husband of the murdered woman') — the verb r-ts-ch ('to murder') is the same root as the sixth commandment's lo tirtsach ('you shall not murder,' Exodus 20:13). His testimony begins with straightforward facts: he came to Gibeah with his concubine to lodge. But as the account continues, he will edit the story to remove his own complicity.
5. The Levite's testimony is factually selective: he says oti dimmu laharog ('they intended to kill me') — casting himself as the primary target and victim. He says ve-et pilagshi innu ('they violated my concubine') — using the passive to obscure his own role in pushing her outside. He omits entirely that the mob's demand was sexual assault against him, and that he himself seized his concubine and handed her over. The verb innu ('they afflicted/violated') is the same used for the Egyptian oppression of Israel (Exodus 1:12). His edited account shapes the narrative for maximum outrage while concealing his own moral failure.
6. The Levite reports his own act of dismemberment as a righteous response: va'ochaz befilagshi va'anattecheha va'ashallecheha ('I seized my concubine and cut her up and sent her'). The vocabulary of butchering (n-t-ch) is stated plainly. His justification: ki asu zimmah unevalah be-Yisra'el ('because they committed depravity and outrage in Israel'). The word zimmah ('depravity, lewdness, planned wickedness') denotes deliberate, calculated evil. Combined with nevalah ('outrage, disgrace'), it constitutes the most severe moral condemnation available in Hebrew. The Levite successfully frames the narrative to motivate military action.
7. The Levite concludes with a demand for action: havu lakhem davar ve-etsah halom ('give yourselves a word and counsel here'). The phrase addresses the assembly collectively — kullekhem benei Yisra'el ('all of you, sons of Israel') — making it a national responsibility. His rhetorical strategy has succeeded: he presented a crime demanding collective response while concealing his own role in it.
8. The response is unanimous — ke-ish echad ('as one man') — the same unity formula from verse 1. Their resolve is expressed as a double negative vow: lo nelekh ish le-oholo velo nasur ish leveito ('not one person will go to his tent, not one will turn aside to his house'). The parallelism (tent/house) is a merism: no one will leave until this matter is resolved.
9. The strategy is determined by goral ('lot') — the same mechanism used for land distribution (Joshua 18-19). The lot will determine which tribes lead the attack and supply logistics. The phrase aleiha be-goral ('against it by lot') places the military planning under a quasi-sacred procedure.
10. The logistics are organized by a tithe system — ten percent of the force (asarah anashim la-me'ah, 'ten men per hundred') will serve as a supply corps (laqachat tsedah la-am, 'to take provisions for the people'). The purpose is stated: la'asot levo'am le-Geva Binyamin ('to act when they come to Gibeah of Benjamin') — the action is punitive. The charge: kekhol ha-nevalah asher asah be-Yisra'el ('according to all the outrage committed in Israel') — nevalah again, the term for gross violation of social and sexual norms.
11. The third repetition of ke-ish echad ('as one man') in this chapter, now with the addition of chaverim ('united, joined, allies'). The unity of Israel against Benjamin is total — but the narrator's insistence on this unity also underscores the tragedy: the covenant community is unified, but unified for internal war.
12. Before attacking, Israel offers diplomacy: they send messengers bekhol shivtei Vinyamin ('throughout all the clans of Benjamin') asking for accountability. The question mah ha-ra'ah ha-zot asher nihyetah bakhem ('what is this evil that has occurred among you?') places responsibility on the entire tribe, not just Gibeah — collective accountability for collective failure.
13. Israel's demand is specific and proportionate: tenu et ha-anashim benei beliya'al asher ba-Giv'ah ('give over the men, the sons of worthlessness, who are in Gibeah'). The purpose — unemitem ('we will put them to death') uneva'arah ra me-Yisra'el ('we will burn out/purge evil from Israel') — uses Deuteronomic purge language (cf. Deuteronomy 13:6, 17:7, 19:19). Benjamin's refusal — velo avu benei Vinyamin lishmo'a beqol acheihem ('the sons of Benjamin were not willing to listen to the voice of their brothers') — transforms a judicial demand into a tribal solidarity crisis. Benjamin chooses to protect its criminals rather than submit to inter-tribal justice.
14. Benjamin mobilizes: vayyease'fu benei Binyamin min he-arim ha-Giv'atah ('the sons of Benjamin gathered from the cities to Gibeah'). Rather than surrendering the guilty, they rally for war — latset la-milchamah im benei Yisra'el ('to go out to war with the sons of Israel'). Tribal loyalty overrides justice.
15. Benjamin's total force: esrim veshishah elef ish sholef cherev ('twenty-six thousand men drawing sword') from the outlying towns, plus sheva me'ot ish bachur ('seven hundred chosen/select men') from Gibeah itself. Against Israel's 400,000 (v. 2), Benjamin is outnumbered roughly 15:1 — yet they will win the first two battles, a narrative shock that raises theological questions about divine justice and timing.
17. The narrator reiterates Israel's force: arba me'ot elef ish sholef cherev ('four hundred thousand men drawing sword'). The addition kol zeh ish milchamah ('all of these men of war') emphasizes that this is a seasoned fighting force. The disparity in numbers makes the first two defeats even more theologically jarring.
18. The inquiry at Bethel — vayyish'alu ve-Elohim ('they inquired of God') — mirrors the opening of the book: mi ya'aleh lanu battechillah ('who will go up for us first?') is nearly identical to 1:1. God's answer — Yehudah battechillah ('Judah first') — is also identical to 1:2. The structural parallel is deliberate: the book ends as it began, with Israel asking who should lead in battle and God answering 'Judah.' But the enemy has changed from Canaanites to Israelites — the cycle has turned inward. The location Beit El ('house of God') may refer to the town Bethel or may simply mean 'the house of God' (the sanctuary).

19. The advance begins: vayyachanu al ha-Giv'ah ('they encamped against Gibeah'). The simplicity of the verse contrasts with the catastrophe about to unfold.
20. The verb vayyaarkhu ('they arranged, drew up') is the technical term for forming battle lines. Israel deploys against Gibeah with overwhelming numerical superiority.
21. The first battle is a devastating Israelite defeat: shenayim ve-esrim elef ish artsah ('twenty-two thousand men to the ground'). The verb vayyashchitu ('they destroyed, devastated') conveys wholesale slaughter. Benjamin — outnumbered 15:1 — wins decisively. The theological shock is intentional: Israel inquired of God, God directed them, and they lost catastrophically. The narrator offers no explanation.
22. The verb vayyitchazzeq ('they strengthened themselves, rallied') indicates that morale had to be actively restored after the devastating loss. They deploy again ba-maqom asher arkhu sham ba-yom harishon ('in the place where they had arranged on the first day') — same position, same strategy, undeterred by failure.
23. After the defeat, Israel adds weeping to their inquiry: vayyivku lifnei YHWH ad ha-erev ('they wept before the LORD until evening'). Their question now includes a painful qualifier: benei Vinyamin achi ('the sons of Benjamin my brother') — the fraternal language acknowledges the tragedy of civil war. God's answer — alu elav ('go up against him') — is direct but offers no guarantee of victory. The divine response is enigmatic: God commands attack but does not promise success.
24. The second engagement begins: vayyiqrevu ('they drew near, advanced'). The verse is terse — the narrator withholds the outcome for maximum impact.
25. The second defeat: od shemonat asar elef ish artsah ('another eighteen thousand men to the ground'). Combined with the first day's losses (22,000), Israel has now lost 40,000 men — a tenth of their force — in two days. The repeated devastation after divine consultation deepens the theological crisis. God told them to go, and they were slaughtered. The pattern will break only on the third attempt, after a fundamentally different kind of inquiry.
26. After two devastating defeats, Israel's approach changes dramatically. They add fasting (vayyatsumu, 'they fasted') and sacrifice (olot ushelamim, 'burnt offerings and fellowship/peace offerings') to their weeping. The escalation of religious intensity — from simple inquiry (v. 18) to weeping and inquiry (v. 23) to weeping, sitting, fasting, and sacrifice (v. 26) — reflects deepening desperation and, perhaps, deepening sincerity. The shelamim ('peace/fellowship offerings') involve shared meals with God, seeking restored relationship.
27. The narrator inserts a crucial detail: vesham aron berit ha-Elohim ba-yamim ha-hem ('and there was the ark of the covenant of God in those days'). The ark's presence at Bethel locates the legitimate sanctuary and the means of authoritative divine communication. This detail, combined with the identification of the priest in the next verse, grounds the third inquiry in institutional legitimacy that the previous two consultations may have lacked.
28. The priestly identity is now specified: Pinechas ben El'azar ben Aharon ('Phinehas son of Eleazar son of Aaron') — a direct descendant of Aaron, the legitimate high priestly line. The same Phinehas is known for zealous action in Numbers 25:7-13. His presence connects this narrative to the early post-Moses period. The question now includes the option of stopping: im echdal ('or should I cease/desist?') — genuine humility after two catastrophic losses. God's response this time is qualitatively different: alu ki machar etnennu beyadekha ('go up, because tomorrow I will give him into your hand') — for the first time, a promise of victory accompanies the command. The two prior defeats were not divine abandonment but divine preparation.
29. The strategy changes: vayyasem Yisra'el orevim ('Israel set ambushers') — a tactical shift from frontal assault to ambush. The word orevim ('those lying in wait') from the root a-r-v is military terminology for concealed forces. This is the same tactic Joshua used against Ai (Joshua 8:2-22), and the parallel is deliberate — a failed frontal assault followed by a successful ambush strategy.
30. The third day — ba-yom ha-shelishi — and Israel deploys kappa'am befa'am ('as time after time' — as on the previous occasions). The apparent repetition is the ruse: they present the same front to draw Benjamin out, concealing the ambush force behind the city.
31. The plan works: the Benjaminites hunttequ min ha-ir ('were drawn away from the city') — the verb n-t-q ('to tear away, pull out') means they were lured out of their defensive position. Overconfident from two victories, they pursue the apparently retreating Israelites and begin inflicting casualties — kishloshim ish ('about thirty men') — along the mesillot ('highways, main roads'). They think the pattern is repeating: kefa'am befa'am ('as time after time'). But this is the trap.
32. The dramatic irony is sharp: Benjamin's assessment — nigga'fim hem lefaneinu kevarishonah ('they are being struck before us as at first') — is exactly the false confidence Israel intended to create. Meanwhile, Israel's actual plan — nanusah unetaquenuhu min ha-ir el ha-mesillot ('let us flee and pull them from the city to the roads') — is working perfectly. The verb nataq ('to pull away, draw out') is the same used in verse 31 for Benjamin being drawn out.
33. The trap springs: the main Israelite force reforms at Ba'al Tamar ('Lord of the Palm Tree' — a place name), while the orev Yisra'el ('Israel's ambush') megia'ch mimeqomo ('breaks forth from its position'). The phrase mimma'areh Gava ('from the meadow/open area of Gibeah' or possibly 'from west of Gibeah') locates the ambush force. The two-pronged movement closes on Benjamin from both directions.

34. The ambush force — asarah alafim ish bachur mi-kol Yisra'el ('ten thousand chosen men from all Israel') — attacks Gibeah directly from the opposite side. The narrator's comment is chilling: vehem lo yade'u ki noga'at aleihem ha-ra'ah ('and they did not know that disaster was touching/reaching them'). The verb noga'at ('touching, reaching') personifies destruction as something physically approaching — close enough to touch but unseen.
35. The decisive verse: vayyigof YHWH et Binyamin lifnei Yisra'el ('the LORD struck Benjamin before Israel'). The verb n-g-f ('to strike, defeat') attributes the victory directly to God — the same verb used throughout the conquest narrative. The casualties — esrim vachamishah elef ume'ah ish ('twenty-five thousand one hundred men') — represent the near-total destruction of Benjamin's fighting force (out of 26,700 in vv. 15-16). This summary verse establishes the outcome; the following verses provide the tactical details.
36. The narrator now explains the tactic: vayyittenu ish Yisra'el maqom le-Vinyamin ('the men of Israel gave ground to Benjamin') — the retreat was deliberate, ki vatchu el ha-orev ('because they trusted the ambush'). Benjamin's two earlier victories were real, but Israel's third retreat was strategic — and Benjamin could not distinguish the feigned retreat from the genuine defeats.
37. The ambush executes: ha-orev hechishu ('the ambush hurried') vayyifshetu el ha-Giv'ah ('they burst/spread into Gibeah'). The verb p-sh-t ('to spread out, strip, raid') describes a rapid sweep through the city. The phrase vayyakh et kol ha-ir lefi cherev ('he struck the entire city with the edge of the sword') indicates comprehensive destruction — not a targeted operation but the annihilation of the entire population.
38. The moed ('appointed signal, predetermined sign') was smoke: harvot leha'alot mas'at he-ashan min ha-ir ('to increase sending up a rising column of smoke from the city'). The word mas'at ('rising, lifting') describes a thick column of smoke visible from a distance — the signal for the main force to turn and attack the now-trapped Benjaminites. This same smoke-signal tactic was used at Ai (Joshua 8:20-21).
39. The narrative rewinds to show the Benjaminite perspective during the trap. While inflicting initial casualties (kishloshim ish, 'about thirty men'), Benjamin's conclusion is akh niggo nigga hu lefaneinu ('surely, being defeated he is defeated before us') — the infinitive absolute niggo nigga intensifies their false confidence. The phrase ka-milchamah harishonah ('as in the first battle') shows they are reading the third engagement through the lens of their earlier victories — a fatal misread.
40. The signal appears: ha-mas'et hechallah la'alot min ha-ir amud ashan ('the rising column began to go up from the city, a pillar of smoke'). The phrase amud ashan ('pillar of smoke') deliberately evokes the pillar of cloud/fire that led Israel through the wilderness (Exodus 13:21) — but this pillar marks Israel destroying Israel. When Benjamin turns — vayyifen Binyamin acharav ('Benjamin turned behind him') — they see vehineh alah khelil ha-ir ha-shamaymah ('the entirety of the city had gone up toward the heavens'). The word khelil ('entirety, whole burnt offering') is the same word used for an offering consumed entirely by fire — Gibeah has become a holocaust.
41. The reversal: ve-ish Yisra'el hafakh ('the man of Israel turned') — the retreating force pivots to attack. Benjamin's response: vayyibbahel ish Binyamin ('the man of Benjamin was terrified/dismayed'). The verb b-h-l ('to be terrified, panic') describes the sudden realization of catastrophe. The phrase ki ra'ah ki nag'ah alav ha-ra'ah ('because he saw that disaster had touched upon him') echoes verse 34 — the ra'ah ('disaster, evil') that was approaching unseen has now arrived.
42. Benjamin routs toward the midbar ('wilderness, desert') east of Gibeah. But the milchamah hidbiqathu ('the battle caught up with/overtook him') — there is no escape. The ambush force from the city and the pursuing main force create a pincer: va-asher me-he-arim mashchitim oto betokkho ('those from the cities were destroying him in the midst of him') — Benjaminites are being cut down from every direction.
43. Three verbs describe the annihilation: kitteru ('they surrounded/encircled'), hirdifuhu menucha ('they pursued him without rest/relentlessly'), and hidrikhu ('they trampled him down'). The word menucha ('rest, resting place') used with pursuit means 'without pause, without relief' — relentless, unceasing chase. The location ad nokhach ha-Giv'ah mi-mizrach shamesh ('to opposite Gibeah, from the rising of the sun/east') means the fleeing Benjaminites were driven east of their own city.
44. The casualty count begins: shemonah asar elef ish ('eighteen thousand men'), all described as anshei chayil ('men of valor, warriors'). This is the main battlefield toll, with additional casualties reported in the following verses.
45. The survivors flee toward Sela ha-Rimmon ('the Rock of Rimmon') — a rocky outcrop that will shelter the final remnant. Along the retreat routes, Israel vayyolleluhu ('gleaned him' — picked off stragglers) — the agricultural metaphor of gleaning (gathering leftover grain after harvest) is applied to killing fleeing soldiers. Five thousand killed on the highways, two thousand more at Gid'om. The total in this verse — seven thousand — plus the eighteen thousand of verse 44 equals twenty-five thousand, consistent with the summary in verse 35.
46. The summary: esrim vachamishah elef ish sholef cherev ('twenty-five thousand men drawing sword'). The qualifier anshei chayil ('men of valor') is repeated — these were not untrained conscripts but fighting men. The number represents the near-extinction of an Israelite tribe.
47. The remnant: shesh me'ot ish ('six hundred men') — the same number as the Danite migration force (18:11), creating an epilogue echo. They take refuge at Sela ha-Rimmon ('Rock of Rimmon,' possibly modern Rammun northeast of Bethel) for arba'ah chodashim ('four months'). Out of an original fighting force of 26,700 (vv. 15-16), only 600 survive — a 97.8% casualty rate. Benjamin as a tribe is on the edge of extinction.
48. The final verse describes systematic destruction beyond the battle: vayyakkum lefi cherev me-ir metom ad behemah ad kol ha-nimtsa ('they struck them with the edge of the sword — from city, entire population, to livestock, to everything found'). The word metom ('entirety, completeness') indicates total destruction of civilian populations. The phrase gam kol he-arim ha-nimtsa'ot shillechu va-esh ('also all the towns found they sent up in fire') describes the burning of Benjaminite towns throughout their territory. This is cherem-style warfare — the complete destruction normally reserved for Canaanite enemies (cf. Deuteronomy 20:16-18) — turned against a fellow Israelite tribe. The irony is total: Israel's 'righteous' response to the outrage at Gibeah has become an outrage of its own.

Summary: Israel realizes that Benjamin's near-annihilation means a tribe will be lost. Having sworn not to give their daughters to Benjamin, they find wives through the destruction of Jabesh-gilead and the capture of women dancing at Shiloh's annual festival. The book ends: 'In those days there was no king in Israel; everyone did what was right in his own eyes.'

What Makes This Remarkable: The solutions to Benjamin's crisis are as morally catastrophic as the original crime. To keep their oath (no giving daughters to Benjamin), the other tribes destroy Jabesh-gilead — killing men, married women, and children — and seize 400 virgins. When 400 is not enough, they sanction the kidnapping of women from the Shiloh festival. The book ends exactly as it began: with violence against women and institutional collapse. The closing refrain (v. 25) is no longer merely descriptive — it is the verdict on the entire era.

Translation Friction: The phrase ish hayyashar be'einav ya'aseh (v. 25, 'everyone did what was right in his own eyes') closes the book with devastating irony: 'right in his own eyes' (yashar be'einav) uses the language of moral uprightness (yashar, 'straight, right') for moral anarchy. We rendered it literally because the irony depends on the word 'right' — these are not people doing wrong; they are people who cannot distinguish wrong from right.

Connections: Jabesh-gilead's destruction will be remembered: the survivors are Benjamin's kin, and Saul — a Benjaminite — will later rescue Jabesh-gilead from the Ammonites (1 Samuel 11) as his first royal act, closing a circle. The Shiloh festival connects to the annual pilgrimage of 1 Samuel 1. The closing refrain echoes 17:6, 18:1, and 19:1, creating a four-fold chorus that functions as the book's theological conclusion.

¹The men of Israel had sworn an oath at Mizpah: "None of us will give his daughter in marriage to a Benjaminite." ²The people came to Bethel and sat there before God until evening. They raised their voices and wept bitterly. ³They said, "LORD, God of Israel, why has this happened in Israel? Why should one tribe be missing from Israel today?" ⁴The next day the people got up early, built an altar there, and offered burnt offerings and fellowship offerings. ⁵The Israelites asked, "Who from all the tribes of Israel did not come up to the assembly before the LORD?" For a solemn oath had been taken against anyone who did not come up to the LORD at Mizpah: "That person must be put to death." ⁶The Israelites grieved for Benjamin their brother and said, "Today one tribe has been cut off from Israel. ⁷What can we do to provide wives for the survivors, since we have sworn by the LORD not to give them any of our daughters as wives?" ⁸They asked, "Which one of the tribes of Israel did not come up to the LORD at Mizpah?" It turned out that no one from Jabesh-gilead had come to the camp for the assembly. ⁹When the troops were mustered, not a single person from Jabesh-gilead was present. ¹⁰The assembly sent twelve thousand of their best warriors there with this command: "Go and strike down the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the sword — including the women and children. ¹¹This is what you are to do: Completely destroy every male and every woman who has slept with a man." ¹²They found among the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead four hundred young women who were virgins — who had not been intimate with a man — and brought them to the camp at Shiloh in the land of Canaan. ¹³Then the entire assembly sent word to the Benjaminites at the Rock of Rimmon and offered them peace. ¹⁴Benjamin returned at that time, and they gave them the women they had spared from Jabesh-gilead. But there were not enough for all of them. ¹⁵The people grieved for Benjamin because the LORD had made a gap in the tribes of Israel. ¹⁶The elders of the assembly said, "What can we do to provide wives for the remaining men, since the women of Benjamin have been wiped out?" ¹⁷They said, "There must be an inheritance for the survivors of Benjamin, so that a tribe is not blotted out from Israel. ¹⁸But we cannot give them our own daughters as wives, because the Israelites swore an oath: 'Cursed is anyone who gives a wife to Benjamin.'" ¹⁹Then they said, "There is an annual festival of the LORD at Shiloh" — which is north of Bethel, east of the road going up from Bethel to Shechem, and south of Lebonah. ²⁰They instructed the Benjaminites: "Go and hide in the vineyards. ²¹When you see the young women of Shiloh come out to dance in the dances, rush out from the vineyards and each of you seize a wife from the young women of Shiloh. Then go back to the territory of Benjamin. ²²When their fathers or brothers come to complain to us, we will say to them, 'Do us a favor and let them keep the women, because we did not take enough wives for each man in the war. And you yourselves did not give your daughters to them — so you have not broken your oath.'" ²³The Benjaminites did this. They took wives for themselves from the dancers — as many as they needed — carrying them off. Then they went back to their inheritance, rebuilt their towns, and settled in them. ²⁴The Israelites dispersed from there at that time, each to his own tribe and clan. They went out from there, each to his own inheritance. ²⁵In those days, there was no king in Israel. Everyone did whatever seemed right in their own eyes.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The chapter opens with a flashback to the oath taken at the original assembly: nishba ba-Mitspah ('he swore at Mizpah'). The vow — ish mimmennu lo yitten bitto le-Vinyamin le-ishah ('no man from us will give his daughter to Benjamin as a wife') — was intended to punish Benjamin through reproductive isolation. The oath's consequences were not fully considered: with Benjamin's fighting men nearly annihilated and no prospect of wives, the tribe faces extinction. The rash oath — like Jephthah's in 11:30-31 — creates a problem that the rest of the chapter struggles to solve.
2. Israel now mourns the consequences of its own victory: vayyisu qolam vayyivku bekhi gadol ('they raised their voice and wept a great weeping'). The phrase vayyeshvu sham ad ha-erev lifnei ha-Elohim ('they sat there until evening before God') describes a prolonged, communal lamentation. The location — Beit El ('Bethel/house of God') — is where they received the promise of victory (20:27-28). Now they grieve the cost of that victory.
3. Israel's lament — lamah YHWH Elohei Yisra'el hayetah zot be-Yisra'el ('why, LORD God of Israel, has this happened in Israel?') — frames the crisis as a divine problem. The phrase lehippaqad ha-yom mi-Yisra'el shevet echad ('that today one tribe should be missing from Israel') uses the verb p-q-d (niph'al, 'to be missing, to be absent from a muster'). The irony is sharp: Israel asks why a tribe is missing when Israel itself nearly exterminated that tribe. The question deflects responsibility onto God.
4. Israel builds a mizbeach ('altar') and offers olot ushelamim ('burnt offerings and fellowship offerings') — the same sacrifices offered before the third battle (20:26). The altar-building suggests either that the existing altar was insufficient or that this is a new act of consecration for the crisis at hand. The worship precedes the violent solutions that follow, creating a disturbing pattern: sacrifice, then sanctioned brutality.
5. A second oath surfaces: ha-shevu'ah ha-gedolah ('the great oath') mandated death for any community that failed to attend the Mizpah assembly. The phrase mot yumat ('dying he shall die' — he must surely be put to death') is the standard death-penalty formula from the Torah. This oath will identify Jabesh-gilead as the next target — creating a pretext for obtaining wives for Benjamin through another act of violence.
6. The verb vayyinnachamu ('they were grieved, felt compassion, relented') marks a shift from vengeance to regret. The fraternal language returns: Binyamin achiv ('Benjamin his brother'). The phrase nigda ha-yom shevet echad mi-Yisra'el ('today one tribe has been cut off from Israel') uses the verb g-d- ('to cut off, to hew down') — a violent metaphor for what was, in fact, a violent act. Israel's grief is real but does not prevent the further violence of the solutions they devise.
7. The dilemma is stated plainly: mah na'aseh lahem lannotarim lenashim ('what shall we do for them, for the survivors, regarding wives?'). Their oath — nishbanu va-YHWH levilti tet lahem mibbnotenu lenashim ('we swore by the LORD not to give them from our daughters as wives') — cannot be broken because it was sworn ba-YHWH ('by the LORD'). The solutions they devise will technically honor the oath while violating its spirit through loopholes.
8. The investigation identifies the absent community: lo va ish el ha-machaneh mi-Yavesh Gil'ad el ha-qahal ('no man came to the camp from Jabesh-gilead to the assembly'). Jabesh-gilead, a Transjordanian city, will later have close ties with Saul and Benjamin (1 Samuel 11:1-11, 31:11-13) — ties that may explain their absence from the punitive assembly. Their non-attendance under the death-oath makes them a legitimate target, but the real motive is obtaining wives for Benjamin.
9. The muster confirms the absence: vayyipaqad ha-am ('the people were mustered/counted') vehineh ein sham ish mi-yoshvei Yavesh Gil'ad ('and there was no man there from the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead'). The complete absence — not one representative — makes the sentence absolute.
10. The punitive expedition: sheneim asar elef ish mibnei ha-chayil ('twelve thousand men from the sons of valor') — a substantial force for what amounts to a massacre of an Israelite city. The command — lekhu vehikkitem et yoshvei Yavesh Gil'ad lefi cherev vеха-nashim vеха-taf ('go and strike the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead with the edge of the sword, including the women and the children') — orders the killing of women and children alongside men. The cherem-style warfare that was directed against Canaanites and then against Benjamin is now turned against a third Israelite target. The escalation of violence is the epilogue's most damning feature.
11. The specification: kol zakhar vekhol isah yoda'at mishkav zakhar tacharrimu ('every male and every woman knowing the lying-down of a male, you shall devote to destruction'). The verb tacharrimu ('devote to destruction, ban') is the cherem vocabulary — the total destruction vow normally applied to Canaanite populations (Deuteronomy 20:17). Only virgins are to be spared — not out of mercy but because they can serve as wives for Benjamin. The grotesque calculus reduces women to reproductive resources.
12. The result: arba me'ot na'arah betulah ('four hundred young women, virgins') are identified and taken. The phrase asher lo yade'ah ish lemishkav zakhar ('who had not known a man by the lying-down of a male') specifies sexual inexperience using clinical language. They are brought to the camp at Shiloh — asher be-erets Kena'an ('which is in the land of Canaan') — a geographical note placing Shiloh west of the Jordan. The 400 virgins will not be enough for 600 survivors, creating the need for yet another scheme.

13. The war ends with a peace offer: vayyiqre'u lahem shalom ('they called peace to them'). The 600 surviving Benjaminites have been at Sela ha-Rimmon for four months (20:47). The messengers bring reconciliation — the tribe that was nearly annihilated is now to be restored.
14. Benjamin returns from exile and receives the Jabesh-gilead women: vayyittenu lahem ha-nashim asher chiyyu mi-neshei Yavesh Gil'ad ('they gave them the women whom they had kept alive from the women of Jabesh-gilead'). The verb chiyyu ('they kept alive') uses the same root as 'life' — spared from the slaughter. But velo matse'u lahem ken ('they did not find enough for them') — 400 women for 600 men leaves 200 without wives. The deficit drives the next solution.
15. The verb nicham ('he grieved, felt compassion') recurs from verse 6. The theological interpretation: ki asah YHWH perets be-shivtei Yisra'el ('because the LORD had made a breach in the tribes of Israel'). The word perets ('breach, gap, break') describes a wall with a section knocked out — Israel's tribal structure has a hole where Benjamin used to be. The attribution to God — YHWH asah ('the LORD made') — deflects human responsibility onto divine action, continuing the pattern of verse 3.
16. The elders (ziqui ha-edah, 'elders of the assembly') take over the problem-solving. Their question repeats verse 7: mah na'aseh lannotarim lenashim ('what shall we do for the survivors regarding wives?'). The reason — ki nishemedah mi-Binyamin ishah ('because woman has been destroyed from Benjamin') — acknowledges that Israel's own scorched-earth campaign (20:48) eliminated the Benjaminites along with everything else.
17. The principle: yerushat peletah le-Vinyamin ('an inheritance of a remnant for Benjamin') — the surviving 600 must have an inheritance to pass on. The concern — velo yimmacheh shevet mi-Yisra'el ('and a tribe shall not be blotted out from Israel') — uses the verb m-ch-h ('to wipe out, blot out, erase'), the same verb used for God's threat to blot out names from His book (Exodus 32:33). Tribal extinction would constitute an irreversible diminishment of the covenant community.
18. The oath's binding force is restated: arur noten ishah le-Vinyamin ('cursed is the one giving a wife to Benjamin'). The curse formula (arur, 'cursed') makes the oath unbreakable in the ancient Near Eastern understanding — a self-imprecation that would bring divine punishment on the oath-breaker. The solution must therefore work around the oath's letter: no Israelite father can give his daughter, but perhaps daughters can be taken without their fathers giving them.
19. The elders identify an opportunity: chag YHWH be-Shilo mi-yamim yamimah ('a festival of the LORD at Shiloh from days to days' — annually). The detailed geographical description — north of Bethel, east of the main road to Shechem, south of Lebonah — may indicate that by the time of writing, Shiloh's location needed to be specified because the site was no longer prominent (cf. Jeremiah 7:12, 26:6 — Shiloh was destroyed). The festival likely involved dancing by young women, providing the opportunity for abduction.
20. The plan is explicit: lekhu va'aravtem bakeramim ('go and lie in ambush in the vineyards'). The verb a-r-v ('to lie in ambush') is military language — the same root used for the ambush against Gibeah (20:29). The vineyards around Shiloh provide concealment. The elders of Israel are now orchestrating the abduction of Israelite women by Israelite men at a festival of the LORD — the moral collapse of the epilogue reaches its final expression.
21. The plan's execution: when benot Shilo ('the daughters of Shiloh') come out lachul bamecholot ('to dance in the circle-dances' — festival dancing), the Benjaminites are to vachataftem lakhem ish ishto ('snatch for yourselves each man his wife'). The verb ch-t-f ('to seize, snatch, abduct') is unambiguous — this is forcible abduction. The dancing women are participating in a sacred festival; they will be grabbed and carried to erets Binyamin ('the land of Benjamin'). The narrator reports the plan without commentary, but the parallel with the Gibeah outrage is impossible to miss: once again, women's bodies are treated as objects to be seized for male purposes, now with the full sanction of the Israelite assembly.
22. The legal loophole is spelled out: when the women's families protest (ki yavo'u avotam o acheihem lariv eleinu, 'when their fathers or brothers come to dispute with us'), the elders will argue on two grounds. First, appeal to mercy: chonnu otam ('be gracious to them, do us a favor'). Second, technical innocence: lo attem netattem lahem ('you did not give them') — since the women were seized rather than given, the oath against 'giving' daughters is technically unbroken. The phrase ka-et te'shamu ('at this time you would be guilty') argues that refusing would now make the fathers guilty of causing Benjamin's extinction. The entire argument is a legalistic fiction designed to circumvent the spirit of the oath while preserving its letter.
23. The plan is executed: vayyis'u nashim lemisparam min ha-mecholelot asher gazalu ('they took wives according to their number from the dancers whom they seized'). The verb gazal ('to seize, rob, take by force') is the standard verb for robbery and plunder — it is used for violent theft throughout the prophets (e.g., Micah 2:2). The women are seized, and the Benjaminites return to rebuild: vayyivnu et he-arim vayyeshvu vahem ('they built the cities and settled in them'). Tribal continuity is preserved, but through forcible abduction sanctioned by the assembly of Israel. The restoration of Benjamin is built on layers of violence: the massacre of Jabesh-gilead and the abduction of Shiloh's daughters.
24. The assembly dissolves: vayyithallekhu ('they went their ways') ish leshivto ulemishpachto ('each man to his tribe and his clan'). The phrase ish lenachalato ('each to his inheritance') sends everyone home. The narrative returns to the fragmented, decentralized state that opened the epilogue — no king, no central authority, each person returning to their own territory. The dispersion sets up the final verse.
25. The book's final verse repeats the full refrain identically to 17:6: be-yamim ha-hem ein melekh be-Yisra'el ish ha-yashar be-einav ya'aseh ('in those days there was no king in Israel; each person would do what was right in his own eyes'). As the last word of Judges, it serves simultaneously as diagnosis, lament, and implicit argument. The diagnosis: moral anarchy. The lament: Israel has descended from the conquest generation to a people capable of gang rape, civil war, massacre, and mass abduction. The implicit argument: the absence of centralized authority under God contributes to — or at least coincides with — social and moral disintegration. Whether kingship would solve the problem is left open; the books of Samuel will explore that question. The refrain's repetition at the book's close creates an inclusio with 17:6, framing the entire epilogue as a sustained meditation on what happens when 'everyone does whatever seemed right in their own eyes.'

Ruth

Summary: A family from Bethlehem flees famine to Moab. The father and both sons die, leaving three widows. Naomi returns to Judah; one daughter-in-law goes home, the other — Ruth the Moabite — refuses to leave and binds herself to Naomi's people and God.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Ruth's declaration in verses 16-17 is among the most quoted passages in the Hebrew Bible, yet its context is often missed: this is not a wedding vow but a covenant oath sworn by a destitute foreign widow to her equally destitute mother-in-law. Ruth abandons her homeland, her gods, and any prospect of remarriage in Moab — all for a relationship that offers her nothing except shared poverty. The Hebrew verb davaq ('clung') in verse 14 is the same verb used for the marriage bond in Genesis 2:24, and for Israel's covenant attachment to God in Deuteronomy. Ruth's loyalty to Naomi uses the vocabulary of the deepest bonds Scripture knows.*

Translation Friction: *Naomi's bitter wordplay in verse 20 — 'Do not call me Naomi (Pleasant); call me Mara (Bitter)' — is clear in Hebrew but requires a translator note in English because the names are left untranslated. The verb shub ('to return') appears twelve times in this chapter, creating a thematic drumbeat that English can partially preserve ('return,' 'go back,' 'turn back') but cannot fully replicate since Hebrew hears the same root each time. In verse 13, Naomi's phrase ha-lahen tesabbernah ('would you wait for them?') uses a rare verb form that may imply either patient waiting or hopeful expectation — we chose 'wait' and noted the ambiguity.*

Connections: The opening phrase 'in the days when the judges ruled' places Ruth within the Judges period but tells a completely different kind of story — not military cycles but domestic faithfulness. The famine that drives Elimelech to Moab echoes Abraham's famine-flight to Egypt (Genesis 12:10) and Jacob's to Egypt (Genesis 42-46) — in each case, leaving the promised land creates crisis. Ruth's oath 'your God will be my God' reverses the pattern of Judges, where Israel repeatedly adopts foreign gods; here a foreigner adopts Israel's God. The genealogy that closes the book (4:18-22) will connect Ruth to David, making this Moabite widow's choice the hinge on which the royal line turns.

¹In the days when the judges ruled, there was a famine in the land. A man from Bethlehem in Judah went to live as a foreigner in the fields of Moab — he, his wife, and his two sons. ²The man's name was Elimelech, his wife's name was Naomi, and his two sons were named Mahlon and Chilion — Ephrathites from Bethlehem in Judah. They came to the fields of Moab and settled there. ³Then Elimelech, Naomi's husband, died, and she was left with her two sons. ⁴They married Moabite women; one was named Orpah and the other Ruth. They lived there about ten years. ⁵Then both Mahlon and Chilion also died, and the woman was left without her two children and without her husband. ⁶She set out with her daughters-in-law to return from the fields of Moab, for she had heard in Moab that the LORD had attended to his people by giving them food. ⁷So he left the place where she had been living, and her two daughters-in-law went with her. They set out on the road to return to the land of Judah. ⁸Naomi said to her two daughters-in-law, "Go, return — each of you to your mother's house. May the LORD deal with you in faithful love, as you have dealt with the dead and with me. ⁹May the LORD grant that each of you finds rest in the home of a new husband." She kissed them, and they raised their voices and wept. ¹⁰They said to her, "No — we will return with you to your people." ¹¹Naomi said, "Go back, my daughters. Why would you come with me? Do I still have sons in my womb who could become your husbands? ¹²Go back, my daughters, go. I am too old to have a husband. Even if I said, 'There is hope for me' — even if I were with a husband tonight and even bore sons — ¹³would you wait for them until they grew up? Would you shut yourselves off from having husbands? No, my daughters, for it is far more bitter for me than for you, because the hand of the LORD has gone out against me." ¹⁴They raised their voices and wept again. Orpah kissed her mother-in-law goodbye, but Ruth clung to her. ¹⁵Naomi said, "Look — your sister-in-law has gone back to her people and to her gods. Go back after your sister-in-law." ¹⁶But Ruth said, "Do not press me to leave you or to turn back from following you. For where you go, I will go, and where you stay, I will stay. Your people will be my people, and your God will be my God. ¹⁷Where you die, I will die, and there I will be buried. May the LORD do so to me, and worse, if anything but death separates me from you." ¹⁸When Naomi saw that Ruth was determined to go with her, she stopped arguing with her. ¹⁹The two of them walked on until they reached Bethlehem. When they arrived in Bethlehem, the whole town was stirred because of them, and the women said, "Can this be Naomi?" ²⁰She said to them, "Do not call me Naomi. Call me Mara, for the Almighty has made my life very bitter. ²¹I went away full, but the LORD has brought me back empty. Why call me Naomi, when the LORD has testified against me and the Almighty has brought misfortune on me?" ²²So Naomi returned, and with her Ruth the Moabite, her daughter-in-law, who came back from the fields of Moab. They arrived in Bethlehem at the beginning of the barley harvest.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening vayyehi bimei shefot ha-shofetim ('and it was in the days of the judging of the judges') places the story within the Judges period without specifying which judge. The deliberate vagueness contrasts with the specificity of the Judges narratives — this story operates outside the military-political cycle.
1. The phrase lagur biseidei Mo'av ('to sojourn in the fields of Moab') uses the verb gur ('to sojourn, to live as a resident alien') — the same term used of Abraham in Canaan (Genesis 20:1) and Israel in Egypt (Genesis 47:4). A ger has no land rights, no inheritance, no clan protection. Elimelech trades his ancestral property in Bethlehem for landless vulnerability in Moab.
1. Bethlehem (Beit Lechem, 'House of Bread') suffering a famine is a bitter irony that the Hebrew reader would hear immediately. The House of Bread has no bread.
2. Every name in this verse carries meaning that a Hebrew audience would hear: Elimelech ('my God is king'), Naomi ('pleasant, lovely'), Mahlon (possibly 'sickness' or 'weakness'), and Chilion (possibly 'failing, wasting away'). Whether these names are etymologically predictive or literary symbolism applied retroactively, the effect is the same — the narrator signals that the sons will not survive. The names function as compressed foreshadowing.
2. Ephrathites (Efratim) identifies the family as members of the Ephrathah clan within Judah — the same designation used for Jesse's family in 1 Samuel 17:12. This is not a random family but part of the lineage that will produce David.
3. The death is reported with devastating brevity: vayyamot Elimelekh ('and Elimelech died'). No cause, no mourning scene, no burial narrative. The narrator's compression communicates how abruptly and completely disaster strikes. The verb vattisha'er ('she was left, she remained') will recur in verse 5 — each use strips another layer of family away from Naomi. The 'man whose God is king' is gone; Naomi is now defined not by what she has but by what remains after loss.
4. The marriages to Moabite women (nashim Mo'aviyyot) would have been alarming to an Israelite audience. Deuteronomy 23:3 prohibits Moabites from entering the assembly of the LORD 'to the tenth generation.' The narrator states the marriages without comment — neither condemning nor excusing — and lets the tension stand. The entire book will work to resolve it: how does a Moabite woman become an ancestor of David?

4. Orpah's name may derive from oref ('back of the neck, nape') — the part of the body visible when someone turns away. If so, her name foreshadows her departure in verse 14. Ruth's name is less certain — some connect it to re'ut ('friend, companion') or ravah ('to water, to saturate, to refresh'). The ten-year period (ke-eser shanim) underscores that these were real marriages, not casual unions.
5. The second use of vattisha'er ('she was left') completes the stripping: Naomi is now mi-shenei yeladeiha u-me'ishah ('from her two children and from her husband') — the preposition min ('from') marking separation and loss. The word yeladim ('children') rather than banim ('sons') is notable — the more intimate, maternal term emphasizes the personal nature of the loss.
5. Three deaths in three verses. The narrator's pace is relentless. No explanation is given for why the sons died — the text refuses to moralize. The effect is that Naomi's suffering is presented as raw fact, not as punishment. This restraint is theologically significant: the book does not treat Naomi's loss as divine judgment for the Moab marriage.
6. The verb paqad ('to visit, to attend to, to take note of') is a covenant term — when God paqad his people, it means He has turned His attention toward them with purpose. It carries both positive (visitation with blessing, as here) and negative (visitation with judgment) valences. The same verb describes God's attention to Sarah (Genesis 21:1) and to Israel in Egypt (Exodus 4:31). God's paqad reverses the famine and makes return possible.
6. The phrase latet lahem lachem ('to give them bread') closes the circle opened in verse 1: the House of Bread (Bethlehem) that had no bread now has bread again because the LORD has given it. The irony that drove the family to Moab is resolved — but Naomi returns without the family she left with.
7. The verb shub ('to return') appears here for the first time in its dominant role — it will recur twelve times in this chapter. For Naomi, the return is geographical (Moab to Judah). For Orpah, it will be relational (returning to her mother's house). For Ruth, it creates a paradox: Ruth has never been to Judah, so she cannot 'return' — she can only go. Yet the narrator includes her in the journey of return, hinting that Ruth belongs in Israel even before she arrives.
8. Naomi's blessing — ya'as YHWH immakhem chesed ('may the LORD do with you chesed') — is the first occurrence of chesed in Ruth, and it is theologically explosive. Naomi asks Israel's covenant God to show covenant loyalty to Moabite women. She grounds the request in their own demonstrated chesed: ka'asher asitem im ha-metim ve-immadi ('as you have done with the dead and with me'). The dead (ha-metim) are Mahlon and Chilion — the daughters-in-law's faithfulness to their deceased husbands is recognized as chesed.
8. The instruction to return to beit immah ('your mother's house') rather than the expected beit av ('your father's house') is unusual. The 'mother's house' appears in only two other passages (Genesis 24:28, Song of Songs 3:4), both in contexts involving marriage arrangements for women. Naomi may be directing them toward the domestic sphere where remarriage can be negotiated — the mother's house is where a woman's future is arranged.
9. Naomi's second blessing introduces menuchah ('rest') — not mere cessation of labor but settled security, the condition of being safely placed. The same word describes the promised land itself (Deuteronomy 12:9) and God's own resting place (Psalm 132:14). For a widow in the ancient Near East, menuchah could only come through a husband's household — remarriage was not romance but survival. Naomi wishes them the security she herself has lost.
9. The verb vattishaq ('she kissed them') is the standard gesture of familial farewell. The communal weeping — vattise'nah qolan ('they raised their voice') — is a public, audible grief, not quiet tears. Three widows on a road, weeping together, with no men and no home in sight: the scene is one of complete social vulnerability.
10. Both daughters-in-law initially refuse to leave. Their declaration — ittakh nashuv le-ammekh ('with you we will return to your people') — uses the emphatic ki ('surely, indeed') or adversative ki ('no, but rather'). The verb nashuv ('we will return') applies awkwardly to Orpah and Ruth, who have never been to Judah. By using the verb of Naomi's return, they are declaring that Naomi's destination is their destination — her people are their people. This is the same commitment Ruth will formalize in verse 16.
11. Naomi's argument invokes the institution of levirate marriage (yibbum) — the obligation for a dead man's brother to marry his widow and produce an heir in the dead man's name (Deuteronomy 25:5-10). Her rhetorical question — ha-od li vanim beme'ai ('are there still sons in my womb?') — is both legally precise and emotionally devastating. Even if she could bear sons, the daughters-in-law would have to wait decades for them to grow. The legal framework that should protect these widows has been emptied by death.
12. Naomi builds an impossible hypothetical: ki amarti yesh li tiqvah ('even if I said there is hope for me'). The word tiqvah ('hope') will prove deeply ironic — Naomi declares herself hopeless, but the narrative will restore her through the very daughter-in-law she is trying to send away. The conditional chain (even if I had a husband tonight, even if I bore sons) piles absurdity upon absurdity to make the legal argument airtight: levirate marriage cannot help them.
13. The verb tesabbernah ('would you wait, would you hope') is rare — used only here in the Hebrew Bible. It may derive from savar ('to wait, to expect, to hope'). The second verb te'agenah ('would you be tied down, would you be restricted') relates to the legal concept of the agunah — a woman bound to a marriage that prevents her from remarrying. Naomi is describing a legal and social prison: if they wait for hypothetical sons, they cannot marry anyone else.
13. Naomi's claim ki mar li me'od mikkem ('it is more bitter for me than for you') is ambiguous — it could mean 'my situation is more bitter than yours' or 'I am more grieved on your account than you are.' The first reading expresses Naomi's self-pity; the second expresses compassion. Both are grammatically possible. The phrase yad YHWH ('the hand of the LORD') attributes her suffering directly to God's agency — Naomi does not blame Moab, famine, or circumstance. She blames God.

14. The verse splits the two daughters-in-law with a single contrast: Orpah kissed (vattishaq) but Ruth clung (davqah). The kiss is farewell; the clinging is refusal to leave. The verb davaq ('to cling, to cleave, to hold fast') is the same verb used in Genesis 2:24 for the marriage bond ('a man shall leave his father and mother and cling to his wife') and in Deuteronomy 10:20 and 11:22 for Israel's covenant attachment to God ('you shall cling to Him'). Ruth's attachment to Naomi is described with the deepest relational vocabulary the Hebrew Bible possesses.
14. Orpah's departure should not be read as failure — she does exactly what Naomi asked. She is the reasonable response. Ruth is the extraordinary one. The narrative needs Orpah's reasonable obedience to measure Ruth's unreasonable devotion.
15. Naomi's final argument links people and gods: el ammah ve-el eloheihā ('to her people and to her gods'). In the ancient world, returning to your people meant returning to their gods — religion and ethnicity were inseparable. Naomi is saying: Orpah made the sensible choice. She went home to everything familiar — family, culture, worship. You should do the same.
15. The term yevimtekḥ ('your sister-in-law') is from yavam, the same root as yibbum (levirate marriage). The word itself reminds both women of the legal bond that death has severed. By calling Orpah Ruth's yevimtekḥ, Naomi frames the departing woman in the vocabulary of the broken institution that cannot save any of them.
16. Ruth's declaration — among the most famous passages in the Hebrew Bible — is structured as a series of covenant commitments. The opening al tifge'i bi ('do not press me, do not urge me against') uses the verb paga ('to encounter, to press, to strike against'), here meaning 'do not use force to persuade me.' Ruth is not making a request — she is resisting Naomi's command.
16. The four parallel clauses follow a progression from physical companionship to spiritual identity: (1) where you go, I go (shared journey); (2) where you stay, I stay (shared dwelling); (3) your people are my people (shared community); (4) your God is my God (shared worship). Each clause escalates the commitment. The final claim — Elohayikh Elohai ('your God, my God') — is a conversion statement. Ruth abandons Chemosh, the god of Moab, for YHWH. This is not casual — it is the renunciation of everything she has known spiritually.
16. The verb shub ('to return, to turn back') appears again — Naomi tells Ruth to 'return,' but Ruth redefines the word: she refuses to turn back. For Ruth, turning back would mean leaving Naomi. The entire chapter's thematic verb is here inverted.
17. Ruth's oath climaxes with death itself: ba'asher tamuti amut vesham eqqaver ('where you die I will die and there I will be buried'). Shared burial means permanent identification with Naomi's family and land — Ruth is renouncing any return to Moab, even in death. In the ancient world, burial location defined tribal and family identity permanently.
17. The self-imprecation koh ya'aseh YHWH li vekhoh yosif ('may the LORD do so to me, and add to it') is a standard oath formula (cf. 1 Samuel 3:17, 2 Samuel 3:9, 1 Kings 2:23). The oath invokes divine punishment for oath-breaking, with the unspecified 'so' and 'more' leaving the threatened consequence to God's determination. Ruth swears by YHWH — not by Chemosh — confirming the conversion declared in verse 16.
17. The final clause ki ha-mavet yafriḏ beini u-veinekh ('only death will separate me from you') anticipates Paul's language in Romans 8:38-39 ('neither death nor life... shall be able to separate us'). Whether Paul had Ruth in mind is uncertain, but the verbal echo is striking.
18. The verb mit'ammetset ('was determined, was strengthening herself') comes from the root amats ('to be strong, to be firm') — the same root God uses to commission Joshua: chazaq ve-emats ('be strong and courageous,' Joshua 1:6). Ruth's determination is described with the vocabulary of military-grade resolve. Naomi recognizes an immovable will and vattechdal ledabber eleiha ('she ceased speaking to her'). The silence is acquiescence — not acceptance, not joy, just the end of resistance.
19. The arrival scene: vattehom kol ha-ir aleihen ('the whole city was astir/stirred concerning them'). The verb hamah ('to murmur, to roar, to be in uproar') suggests the entire community buzzing — not a quiet homecoming but a public sensation. Naomi left as a married woman with two sons and returns as a widow with a Moabite daughter-in-law. The question ha-zot No'omi ('is this Naomi?') conveys shock at her changed appearance and circumstances.
19. The feminine verb vattomarnah ('they said,' feminine plural) indicates the speakers are the women of Bethlehem specifically — the community that would have known Naomi before her departure. The recognition scene sets up Naomi's bitter response.
20. Naomi's name-change demand is a theological protest. No'omi means 'pleasant, lovely, delightful'; Mara means 'bitter.' The wordplay — ki hemar Shaddai li me'od ('for the Almighty has made it very bitter for me') — uses the hiphil of marar ('to be bitter'), making God the active agent of her bitterness. She does not say 'life has been bitter' but 'Shaddai has made it bitter.'
20. The divine name Shaddai ('the Almighty') rather than YHWH is significant. Shaddai is the patriarchal-era name (Genesis 17:1, 28:3, 35:11, 43:14, 48:3, 49:25) — the God of promise and abundance. By using this name, Naomi accuses the God of abundance of producing scarcity. The God who was supposed to make fruitful has left her barren and alone.
21. The full/empty contrast — ani mele'ah halakhti vereiqam heshivani YHWH ('I went full, and the LORD brought me back empty') — is Naomi's summary of her entire Moab experience. Mele'ah ('full') encompasses husband, sons, household, social standing. Reiqam ('empty, empty-handed') is the totality of loss. The irony the narrator sees but Naomi does not: she is not returning empty. Ruth is standing right next to her.
21. Two divine names frame the accusation: YHWH anah vi ('the LORD testified against me') and Shaddai hera li ('the Almighty brought evil/misfortune upon me'). The verb anah can mean 'to answer, to testify against, to afflict' — Naomi casts her suffering as God's legal verdict against her. The accumulation of divine agency — God made it bitter (v. 20), God brought me back empty, God testified against me, God afflicted me — is the most concentrated accusation against God in any narrative text outside Job.

22. The narrator's closing frame reintroduces Ruth with her full designation: Rut ha-Mo'aviyyah kallatah ('Ruth the Moabite, her daughter-in-law'). The epithet ha-Mo'aviyyah ('the Moabite') will follow Ruth throughout the book (2:2, 2:6, 2:21, 4:5, 4:10) — the narrator never lets the reader forget her foreign origin. It is a constant reminder that the woman who will become David's great-grandmother was an outsider.
22. The chapter ends with a temporal marker of hope: bithchillat qetsir se'orim ('at the beginning of the barley harvest'). After famine, death, and emptiness — harvest. The House of Bread has bread again. The timing is also legally significant: the barley harvest is when gleaning rights for the poor (Leviticus 19:9, 23:22) become active, creating the legal mechanism by which Ruth will encounter Boaz in chapter 2.

Summary: Ruth goes out to glean in the barley fields and, by apparent chance, arrives in the field of Boaz — a wealthy relative of Elimelech. Boaz notices her, extends extraordinary protection, and commands his workers to leave extra grain for her. She returns to Naomi with an abundance of food, and Naomi reveals that Boaz is one of their kinsman-redeemers.

What Makes This Remarkable: The narrator's use of miqreh ('chance, happening') in verse 3 is deliberately ironic — what looks like accident is providential design. The entire chapter pivots on Ruth ending up in exactly the right field belonging to exactly the right man. Boaz's first words to Ruth echo the language of covenant protection, and his knowledge of her story (vv. 11-12) reveals that her reputation has preceded her. His blessing in verse 12 — invoking the God of Israel 'under whose wings you have come to take refuge' — uses the same word (kanaf, 'wing/corner') that Ruth will later use when she asks Boaz to spread his garment over her (3:9). The verbal thread ties divine refuge to human obligation.

Translation Friction: We rendered miqreh in verse 3 as 'as it turned out' rather than 'chance' or 'luck' to preserve the narrator's ironic understatement without implying genuine randomness. Boaz's greeting to his workers — YHWH immakhem ('the LORD be with you') — could be routine or theologically charged; we rendered it straightforwardly and noted the ambiguity. The term go'el in verse 20 required extended treatment because 'kinsman-redeemer' is a theological compound with no single English equivalent; we unpacked it in the expanded rendering rather than forcing an artificial gloss.

Connections: The gleaning laws that structure this chapter originate in Leviticus 19:9 and 23:22 — provisions for the poor, the foreigner, the widow, and the orphan. Ruth qualifies on every count. Boaz's blessing over Ruth (v. 12) echoes Psalm 91:4 ('under his wings you will find refuge') and anticipates the same imagery in Psalm 36:7. Naomi's declaration that God 'has not abandoned his faithful love for the living or the dead' (v. 20) reverses her bitter theology from 1:20-21 — the God who emptied her is now filling her again through the chesed of a relative she had not mentioned.

¹Now Naomi had a relative on her husband's side — a man of standing and means — from the clan of Elimelech. His name was Boaz. ²Ruth the Moabite said to Naomi, "Let me go to the field and glean among the stalks of grain, following anyone who shows me favor." Naomi said to her, "Go, my daughter." ³She went out, came to the field, and began gleaning behind the harvesters. As it turned out, the plot of field she came to belonged to Boaz, from the clan of Elimelech. ⁴Just then, Boaz arrived from Bethlehem. He said to the harvesters, "The LORD be with you!" They answered him, "The LORD bless you!" ⁵Boaz said to the servant overseeing the harvesters, "Whose young woman is that?" ⁶The servant overseeing the harvesters answered, "She is a Moabite young woman — the one who came back with Naomi from the territory of Moab. ⁷She asked, 'Please let me glean and gather among the sheaves behind the harvesters.' She came and has been on her feet from early morning until now, with only a brief rest in the shelter." ⁸Boaz said to Ruth, "Listen carefully, my daughter. Do not go to glean in another field, and do not leave this one. Stay close to my young women. ⁹Keep your eyes on the field they are harvesting and follow the women. I have ordered the young men not to touch you. When you are thirsty, go to the water jars and drink from what the men have drawn." ¹⁰She fell facedown, bowing to the ground, and said to him, "Why have I found favor in your eyes, that you would notice me — a foreigner?" ¹¹Boaz answered her, "I have been told — told in full — everything you have done for your mother-in-law since your husband's death: how you left your father and mother and your homeland and came to a people you had never known before. ¹²May the LORD repay your deeds, and may your wages be full from the LORD, the God of Israel, under whose wings you have come to take refuge." ¹³She said, "May I continue to find favor in your eyes, my lord, for you have comforted me and spoken to the heart of your servant — though I am not even one of your servant girls." ¹⁴At mealtime Boaz said to her, "Come over here, eat some bread, and dip your piece in the vinegar sauce." She sat beside the harvesters, and he handed her roasted grain. She ate until she was satisfied — and had some left over. ¹⁵When she got up to glean again, Boaz instructed his young men: "Let her glean even among the sheaves, and do not humiliate her. ¹⁶Also, pull out some stalks from the bundles for her on purpose, and leave them so she can gather them. Do not scold her." ¹⁷She gleaned in the field until evening. When she beat out what she had gathered, it came to about an ephah of barley. ¹⁸She carried it back and went into the city. Her mother-in-law saw how much she had gleaned. Then Ruth brought out and gave Naomi what she had left over from her meal. ¹⁹Her mother-in-law asked her, "Where did you glean today? Where did you work? Blessed be the man who noticed you!" Ruth told her mother-in-law about the one she had worked with and said, "The name of the man I worked with today is Boaz." ²⁰Naomi said to her daughter-in-law, "Blessed be he by the LORD, who has not abandoned his faithful love for the living and the dead!" Then Naomi told her, "This man is a close relative of ours — he is one of our kinsman-redeemers." ²¹Ruth the Moabite added, "He also told me, 'Stay close to my workers until they have finished all my harvest.'" ²²Naomi said to Ruth, her daughter-in-law, "It is good, my daughter, that you go out with his young women, so that no one harms you in another field." ²³So Ruth stayed close to Boaz's young women, gleaning through the end of the barley harvest and the wheat harvest. And she lived with her mother-in-law.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator introduces Boaz with a backgrounding clause before Ruth or Naomi know he will matter. The term moda ('relative, acquaintance') signals a kinship connection to Elimelech's clan. The description ish gibbor chayil ('a man mighty of strength/wealth') is the same phrase applied to Gideon (Judges 6:12) and to the ideal woman in Proverbs 31:10 (eshet chayil). It encompasses wealth, social standing, and personal capability — Boaz is everything that Naomi's household currently lacks.
1. The name Boaz (Bo'az) may mean 'in him is strength' — from the preposition be ('in') and oz ('strength'). If so, the name anticipates his role: he is the man in whom the family's future strength resides. The same name was given to one of the two pillars of Solomon's temple (1 Kings 7:21).
2. Ruth's initiative drives the scene: elkhah-na hasadeh va'alaqotah ('let me go, please, to the field and glean'). The particle na ('please') is deferential — Ruth asks permission, not forgiveness. She proposes to exercise the legal right of gleaning (laqat) granted to the poor and the foreigner in Leviticus 19:9 and 23:22. That a Moabite widow in Israel would know this law — or assume it would be honored — reflects either Naomi's instruction or Ruth's remarkable boldness.
2. The phrase emtsa-chen be'einav ('I find favor in his eyes') anticipates the exact language Boaz will use in verse 10 and Ruth will use in verse 13. The narrator builds the encounter through verbal echoes: the favor Ruth hopes for from any landowner will come, specifically and abundantly, from Boaz.
2. Naomi's reply — lekhi vitti ('go, my daughter') — is strikingly brief. After the eloquent speeches of chapter 1, Naomi has few words. She sends Ruth into a situation fraught with danger for an unprotected foreign woman and says only two words. Whether this reflects depression, helplessness, or trust in God is left unstated.
3. The phrase vayyiqer miqrehah (literally 'her chance chanced upon') uses the root qarah ('to encounter, to happen, to befall') in a cognate accusative construction — the verb and its object share the same root, intensifying the meaning. The same root appears in Ecclesiastes 2:14-15 and 9:2-3 to describe the apparent randomness of fate. Here the narrator deploys the language of chance precisely to undermine it: the reader knows from verse 1 that Boaz is Elimelech's kinsman.
3. The three rapid verbs — vattalekh vattavo vattelaqet ('she went and came and gleaned') — compress Ruth's journey into staccato action. No description of the walk, the landscape, or her feelings. The narrative pace keeps the focus on what happens, not how she feels about it.
4. The narrative marker vehinneh ('and look!') signals a dramatic entrance — Boaz arrives at exactly the moment Ruth is gleaning in his field. We rendered this as 'just then' to convey the narrative surprise without resorting to archaic 'behold.' The timing reinforces the irony of verse 3: one 'coincidence' follows another.
4. The exchange YHWH immakhem / yevarekha YHWH ('the LORD be with you / the LORD bless you') is either a routine greeting (like modern 'God bless you') or a marker of Boaz's genuine piety. The narrator does not distinguish — but the exchange establishes Boaz's household as one where the LORD's name is invoked freely and reciprocally. This is not the world of Judges, where everyone does what is right in their own eyes; this is a field where master and workers bless each other in God's name.
5. Boaz's question — lemi hanna'arah hazzot ('to whom does this young woman belong?') — reflects the social reality: an unmarried or widowed woman in the ancient Near East was identified by her connection to a male household. The question 'whose is she?' is not objectifying by ancient standards but locating her within the kinship network. Boaz is trying to place her socially — whose family, whose household, whose responsibility?

6. The servant's first identifying marker is ethnic: na'arah Mo'aviyyah hi ('a Moabite young woman she is'). Her foreignness is the primary fact. The phrase ha-shavah im Na'omi ('the one who returned with Naomi') uses the same verb shub ('to return') from chapter 1 — Ruth's reputation has preceded her. The entire community apparently knows the story of the Moabite who came back with Naomi.
6. The servant's identification — 'Moabite young woman' — places Ruth in a double-marginal category: foreign and female. In the social hierarchy of an Israelite harvest field, she has no standing whatsoever. Everything Boaz does next is therefore extraordinary generosity beyond legal obligation.
7. Ruth's request — ala'otah-na ve'asafi va'omarim ('let me glean and gather among the sheaves') — goes beyond basic gleaning rights. Gleaning (laqat) meant picking up individual stalks that fell during harvesting. Gathering among the sheaves (asaf va'omarim) implies collecting closer to the bundled grain — a more productive but more presumptuous request. Ruth is negotiating for maximum provision.
7. The servant's report emphasizes Ruth's tireless labor: me'az habboqer ve'ad attah ('from the morning until now'). The final clause zeh shivtah habbayit me'at ('this — her sitting in the house/shelter — has been little') confirms she barely rested. The servant is clearly impressed. Her work ethic speaks before Boaz does.
8. Boaz's address — halo shamat bitti ('have you not heard, my daughter?') — opens with paternal authority. The term bitti ('my daughter') establishes a protective relationship, not a romantic one (yet). He immediately issues three imperatives: do not go to another field, do not leave this one, stay close to my workers. The protection is comprehensive.
8. The verb tidbakin ('you shall cling, stay close') is from the root davaq — the same verb used of Ruth's clinging to Naomi in 1:14, of the marriage bond in Genesis 2:24, and of Israel's attachment to God in Deuteronomy 10:20. The narrator threads this verb through the book: Ruth clung to Naomi, now she is told to cling to Boaz's workers, and eventually she will be joined to Boaz himself.
9. Boaz's command tsivviti et-hanne'arim levilti nag'ekh ('I have charged the young men not to touch you') reveals a reality the text does not romanticize: an unprotected foreign woman in a harvest field was vulnerable to sexual assault. The verb naga ('to touch') in this context means unwanted physical contact — the same verb used in Genesis 20:6 when God prevents Abimelech from touching Sarah. Boaz has already taken protective action before speaking to Ruth.
9. The provision of water — ve'shatit me'asher yish'avun hanne'arim ('drink from what the young men draw') — is significant because drawing water was labor-intensive. Boaz gives Ruth access to water she did not draw, from workers she does not employ, in a field she does not own. Each provision strips away one more layer of her outsider status.
10. Ruth's response — vattippol al paneiha vattishtachu artsah ('she fell on her face and bowed to the ground') — is the full prostration gesture of submission and gratitude. It is the same posture used before kings and before God. From Ruth, it communicates the enormity of what Boaz has offered: not just grain but protection, dignity, and recognition.
10. The wordplay in lehakkireni ve'anokhi nokhriyyah ('to notice me, and I am a foreigner') is one of the finest in the Hebrew Bible. The verb nakhar means both 'to recognize, to pay attention to' and, in a different form, 'to be foreign.' Ruth uses the verb and then identifies herself with its cognate noun: 'Why would you recognize (hakkir) me, seeing that I am a foreigner (nokhriyyah)?' The one who is by definition unrecognizable — the foreigner — has been recognized. The wordplay compresses the entire theological arc of Ruth into a single sentence.
11. The emphatic infinitive absolute construction hugged huggad li ('it has been told, it has been told to me') doubles the verb for emphasis — the report about Ruth has been thorough and complete. Boaz knows her entire story. His summary of her actions — leaving father, mother, and homeland (eret moladtekh) — deliberately echoes God's call to Abraham: lekh-lekha me'artsekha umimoladtekh umibeit avikha ('go from your land and your kindred and your father's house,' Genesis 12:1). Ruth has done what Abraham did: left everything familiar for an unknown destination among an unknown people.
11. The phrase am asher lo yadat temol shilshom ('a people you did not know yesterday or the day before') is an idiom for complete unfamiliarity. Ruth's journey was not to a place of potential welcome but to radical strangeness. Boaz recognizes the full cost of her choice.
12. The verb yeshalleh ('may he repay') and the noun maskurtek ('your wages') are economic terms — payment for work done. Boaz frames Ruth's loyalty not as emotional sentiment but as labor that has earned a wage from God. The theological implication is startling: covenant faithfulness shown by a Moabite generates a debt that God himself will repay.
12. The phrase lachasot tachat kenafav ('to take refuge under his wings') uses the root chasah ('to seek refuge, to take shelter') found throughout the Psalms (Psalms 2:12, 5:11, 17:8, 36:7, 57:1, 91:4). Ruth the Moabite has sought shelter under the wings of the God of Israel — and God will provide that shelter through Boaz himself. The double meaning of kanaf ('wing' and 'corner of a garment') creates a verbal bridge to 3:9 that transforms theology into narrative action.
13. Ruth's phrase dibbarta al-lev shifchatekha ('you have spoken to the heart of your servant') uses the idiom dibber al-lev ('to speak to the heart'), which appears in Genesis 34:3, Isaiah 40:2, and Hosea 2:14. It means more than kind words — it means to reassure, to console, to win someone's trust through tender speech. The same phrase describes how God woos wayward Israel.
13. Ruth's self-deprecation — ve'anokhi lo ehyeh ke'achat shifchotekha ('and I will not even be like one of your servant girls') — is not false modesty. She is stating social reality: she ranks below Boaz's own servants. The word shifchah ('female servant, handmaid') is the same term she uses for herself, creating an ironic hierarchy: she calls herself his servant while acknowledging she is not even equal to his actual servants. Boaz's kindness has elevated her beyond her station, and she knows it.

14. The invitation to eat at the communal meal — goshi halom ve'akhalt min-hallechem ('come here and eat from the bread') — breaks another social barrier. Ruth the gleaner is invited to eat with the workers, at the landowner's table. The vinegar (chomets) is sour wine used as a dipping sauce — a common field condiment that makes coarse bread palatable.
14. The sequence vattokhal vattisba vattotar ('she ate and was satisfied and had left over') echoes the language of divine provision. The same three-beat pattern — eat, be satisfied, have surplus — appears in the feeding miracles and in Deuteronomy's descriptions of abundance in the promised land (Deuteronomy 8:10). A Moabite widow in a harvest field receives the same pattern of provision that God promises Israel. The surplus (vattotar) anticipates the abundance she will bring home to Naomi in verse 18.
15. Boaz's command — gam bein ha'omarim telaqet velo takhlimuha ('even among the sheaves let her glean, and do not humiliate her') — exceeds the gleaning law. Leviticus permits gleaning at the edges; Boaz opens the sheaves themselves. The verb kalam ('to humiliate, to put to shame') indicates that gleaners could expect verbal abuse or harsh treatment from workers protecting their employer's grain. Boaz forbids not just physical harm but social degradation.
15. The command is given privately to the workers, not to Ruth. Boaz protects her dignity by arranging generosity she will not witness being arranged. She will think she found the grain; the workers will know it was placed for her. This is chesed in its most refined form — kindness that preserves the recipient's sense of agency.
16. The infinitive absolute construction shol-tashollu ('you shall surely pull out') emphasizes deliberateness — this is not passive allowance but active provision disguised as accident. Boaz commands his workers to engineer abundance while maintaining Ruth's dignity. She will think she is finding good grain; in reality, the grain is finding her.
16. The verb ga'ar ('to rebuke, to scold') suggests that harvesters normally drove off gleaners who took too much or came too close. Boaz dismantles every mechanism of exclusion: no physical harm (v. 9), no humiliation (v. 15), no scolding (v. 16). He creates a zone of total safety around a woman who had no right to expect any.
17. An ephah (eifah) is approximately 22 liters or about 30 pounds of grain — an extraordinary amount for a single day's gleaning. Normal gleaning might yield a few pounds. The quantity confirms that Boaz's secret instructions in verses 15-16 had their intended effect: Ruth's labor, combined with arranged generosity, produces an abundance that would be impossible under normal gleaning conditions.
17. The verb chavat ('to beat out, to thresh') describes Ruth processing the grain herself — separating the kernels from the stalks by striking them. This is additional labor after a full day of gleaning, demonstrating Ruth's relentless work ethic. She does not bring home raw sheaves but processed, ready-to-use grain.
18. The double provision — gleaned grain and leftover food — mirrors the eat/be-satisfied/have-surplus pattern of verse 14. Ruth brings home both the day's wages (grain) and the day's surplus (food from the communal meal). Naomi receives not just provision but evidence of extraordinary generosity.
18. The verb hotirah ('she had left over') connects to the vattotar of verse 14. What Ruth saved from her own satisfaction she brings to Naomi. The economy of chesed operates through surplus: Boaz gives Ruth more than she needs, and Ruth carries the excess to Naomi. Kindness flows downhill from the man of means through the gleaner to the empty widow.
19. Naomi's questions tumble out in rapid sequence — eifoh liqqatt hayom ve'anah asit ('where did you glean today and where did you work?') — before Ruth can answer. The quantity of grain has clearly shocked her. Naomi blesses the unknown benefactor before she knows his name: yehi makkirekh barukh ('may the one who noticed you be blessed'). The verb makkirekh ('the one who noticed/recognized you') echoes Ruth's wordplay from verse 10 — the nakhar/nokhriyyah connection now extends through Naomi's blessing.
19. Ruth's revelation — shem ha'ish asher asiti immo hayyom Bo'az ('the name of the man with whom I worked today is Boaz') — is placed at the end of the verse for maximum narrative impact. The name lands like a thunderclap on Naomi, who will immediately recognize its significance.
20. The phrase asher lo azav chasdo et-hachayim ve'et-hammetim ('who has not abandoned his chesed toward the living and the dead') recalls Naomi's own chesed blessing over Ruth and Orpah in 1:8. There, Naomi asked God to show chesed to them as they had shown chesed to the dead. Now the cycle completes: God's chesed toward the dead (Elimelech, Mahlon, Chilion) and the living (Naomi, Ruth) flows through Boaz. The woman who accused God of emptying her (1:21) now blesses God for not abandoning his love.
20. The term go'el ('redeemer, kinsman-redeemer') is from the root ga'al ('to redeem, to buy back, to act as kinsman'). It carries legal, economic, and theological weight: the go'el redeems land (Leviticus 25:25), persons (Leviticus 25:47-49), and blood (Numbers 35:19). God himself is called go'el of Israel (Exodus 6:6, Isaiah 41:14, 43:14). By identifying Boaz as go'el, Naomi introduces the mechanism that will resolve every strand of the plot: land, marriage, lineage, and identity.
20. The word qarov ('close, near') signals that Boaz is not just any relative but a close one — close enough in the kinship network to bear the obligation of redemption. The proximity matters legally: the go'el responsibility falls on the nearest male relative.
21. Ruth quotes Boaz as saying hanne'arim asher-li ('the young men who are mine') — but in verse 8, Boaz actually told her to stay with his na'arot ('young women'). Ruth's substitution of 'young men' for 'young women' is noticed by many commentators. It may be an innocent misquotation, or it may reflect that Ruth worked near both groups, or it may be narratively significant — Naomi's response in the next verse will steer Ruth back toward the women, possibly out of concern for her safety among the men.

- 21. The phrase ad im-killu et-kol-haqqatsir asher-li ('until they have finished all my harvest') extends Boaz's protection through the entire harvest season — weeks of guaranteed safety, provision, and access. This is not a one-day favor but a standing arrangement.
- 22. Naomi's response corrects Ruth's 'young men' back to na'arotav ('his young women') — a subtle but deliberate redirection. Whether Naomi is worried about safety, propriety, or both, she steers Ruth toward the female workers. The verb yifge'u ('they meet, they encounter, they strike against') can mean anything from an accidental meeting to a violent assault. Naomi is warning Ruth that outside Boaz's field, she has no protection.
- 22. The phrase besadeh acher ('in another field') carries more weight than geography. Boaz's field is the one place where Ruth has been recognized, protected, fed, and given access. Every other field is the field of a stranger where she is just another Moabite gleaner with no protector. Naomi's counsel is both practical and strategic: stay where the go'el can see you.
- 23. The chapter closes with the verb vattidbaq ('she clung, she stayed close') — the same root davaq that described Ruth's clinging to Naomi in 1:14 and Boaz's instruction in 2:8. Ruth is now bound to Boaz's household by daily habit, even as she remains bound to Naomi at home. The verb quietly stitches together every relationship in the book.
- 23. The time summary — qetsir hasse'orim uqetsir hachittim ('the barley harvest and the wheat harvest') — spans roughly seven weeks, from Passover to Shavuot (the Feast of Weeks). Ruth has gleaned through two full harvest cycles, establishing herself as a known presence in Boaz's field. The closing note vatteshev et-chamotah ('and she lived with her mother-in-law') returns us to the domestic frame: whatever happens in the field, Ruth comes home to Naomi. The chapter opened with Ruth going out; it closes with her dwelling in. Between departure and return, everything has changed.

Summary: Naomi devises a plan for Ruth to approach Boaz at the threshing floor under cover of night. Ruth bathes, dresses, and goes to the threshing floor where Boaz is winnowing barley. After he eats and drinks and lies down, Ruth uncovers his feet and lies beside him. When Boaz wakes at midnight, Ruth identifies herself and asks him to spread his garment over her — invoking his role as kinsman-redeemer. Boaz praises her loyalty, reveals that a closer kinsman-redeemer exists, and promises to settle the matter at dawn. Ruth returns to Naomi with six measures of barley and a promise.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The threshing floor scene is constructed with extraordinary literary precision. The Hebrew employs a sustained double register: every key verb — shakav ('to lie down'), galah ('to uncover'), yada ('to know'), margelot ('feet' or 'legs') — carries both an ordinary meaning and a sexual connotation. The narrator never resolves the ambiguity, and we have not resolved it either. What matters theologically is that Boaz responds to Ruth's vulnerability not with exploitation but with blessing. His first words to her are a benediction. The word kanaf ('wing' or 'garment corner') in verse 9 directly echoes Boaz's prayer in 2:12 that Ruth would find refuge 'under the wings of the LORD' — Ruth is now asking Boaz himself to be the answer to his own prayer. This is one of the most elegant theological callbacks in the Hebrew Bible.*

Translation Friction: *The deliberate ambiguity of the threshing floor scene resists clean English rendering. The Hebrew margelot literally means 'the place of the feet' but is widely understood as a euphemism. We rendered it as 'the place of his feet' to preserve the surface meaning while noting the undertone. The verb galah ('to uncover') in verse 4 and verse 7 carries both literal and sexual senses elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible (Leviticus 18 uses it repeatedly for sexual exposure). We chose 'uncovered' and addressed the ambiguity in notes rather than importing either a sanitized or sexualized reading into the rendering itself.*

Connections: *Boaz's exclamation that Ruth's 'later chesed is greater than the first' (v10) frames the entire book's theology: Ruth's faithfulness deepens as the story progresses, moving from loyalty to Naomi (chapter 1) to active pursuit of redemption for the family. The kanaf imagery connects Ruth's request (3:9) to Boaz's prayer (2:12) and ultimately to the theology of divine refuge found in the Psalms (Psalm 36:7, 57:1, 91:4). The go'el institution, which Boaz formally acknowledges here, bridges private loyalty and public law — redemption in Ruth is simultaneously a legal transaction and an act of covenant love.*

¹Naomi, her mother-in-law, said to her, "My daughter, should I not seek security for you — a settled place where things will go well for you? ²Now then — is not Boaz our relative, the one whose young women you have been working with? Listen: tonight he is winnowing barley at the threshing floor. ³So bathe, put on perfumed oil, dress in your best clothes, and go down to the threshing floor. Do not make yourself known to the man until he has finished eating and drinking. ⁴When he lies down, take note of the place where he is lying. Then go over, uncover the place of his feet, and lie down. He will tell you what to do." ⁵Ruth said to her, "Everything you say, I will do." ⁶She went down to the threshing floor and did everything her mother-in-law had instructed her. ⁷Boaz ate and drank, and his heart was content. He went to lie down at the edge of the grain pile. Then she came in secretly, uncovered the place of his feet, and lay down. ⁸In the middle of the night, the man jolted awake and twisted around — and there was a woman lying at the place of his feet. ⁹He said, "Who are you?" She answered, "I am Ruth, your servant. Spread the corner of your garment over your servant, for you are a kinsman-redeemer." ¹⁰He said, "May the LORD bless you, my daughter. Your later act of faithful love is greater than the first, because you did not go after the young men, whether poor or rich. ¹¹Now, my daughter, do not be afraid. Everything you ask, I will do for you, for everyone at the gate of my people knows that you are a woman of strength. ¹²Now it is true that I am a kinsman-redeemer, but there is also a kinsman-redeemer closer in kinship than I am. ¹³Stay the night. In the morning, if he will redeem you — good, let him redeem. But if he is not willing to redeem you, then I myself will redeem you, as the LORD lives. Lie down until morning." ¹⁴She lay at the place of his feet until morning, then got up before anyone could recognize another person. He said, "No one must know that a woman came to the threshing floor." ¹⁵Then he said, "Hold out the shawl you are wearing and grip it." She held it out, and he measured six measures of barley and set it on her. Then he went into the city. ¹⁶When she came to her mother-in-law, Naomi said, "How did it go, my daughter?" Ruth told her everything the man had done for her. ¹⁷She said, "He gave me these six measures of barley, because he said, 'You must not go back to your mother-in-law empty-handed.'" ¹⁸Naomi said, "Wait here, my daughter, until you learn how the matter settles, for the man will not rest until he has resolved this today."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Naomi uses the word manoach ('resting place, security'), a form closely related to menuchah from 1:9 where she wished each daughter-in-law 'rest in the home of a husband.' The root nun-vav-chet ('to rest, to settle') carries the sense of being safely placed — not idleness but stability. By returning to this theme, Naomi signals that what she wished for Ruth in chapter 1 she now intends to pursue actively.
1. The phrase asher yitav lakh ('where it will go well for you') echoes Deuteronomy's formula for life in the promised land (Deuteronomy 4:40, 5:16). Naomi is not merely playing matchmaker — she is seeking for Ruth the covenantal blessing of being well-settled.
2. The particle hinneh ('look, listen') — rendered here as 'Listen' — marks a shift from general observation to specific intelligence. Naomi has been watching and knows Boaz's schedule. The threshing floor (goren) was an open-air elevated platform where grain was tossed into the wind to separate wheat from chaff. During harvest, owners slept at the threshing floor to guard the grain — making Boaz both accessible and alone at night.
2. The term moda'tanu ('our relative, our acquaintance') uses a softer kinship word than go'el. Naomi identifies Boaz as family without yet naming the legal claim she intends to invoke. The possessive 'our' (first person plural) is significant — Naomi includes herself in the family connection, reminding Ruth that this is not a stranger but their own kin.
3. Naomi's instructions form a precise sequence of preparation: rachats ('bathe'), sakht ('anoint with oil'), and samt simlotayikh ('put on your garments'). The anointing with oil (sakht) was both cosmetic and ceremonial — it could signal the end of mourning (2 Samuel 12:20, 14:2). If Ruth has been in widow's garments, this preparation marks a transition: she is presenting herself not as a mourner but as a woman available for marriage.
3. The instruction al tivvade'i la-ish ('do not make yourself known to the man') uses the reflexive of yada ('to know'). The verb yada carries sexual connotations elsewhere (Genesis 4:1), but here the straightforward sense is simply 'do not reveal your identity' — remain unnoticed until the right moment. The double register of the verb, however, is part of the chapter's sustained ambiguity.
3. The Ketiv/Qere notation in the WLC for simlotayikh ('your garments') reflects a minor textual variant in the consonantal tradition, though both forms yield the same meaning.
4. This verse is the crux of the chapter's deliberate ambiguity. Three loaded terms appear together: shakav ('to lie down'), galah ('to uncover'), and margelot ('the place of the feet'). Each carries both an ordinary sense and a sexual connotation. The verb shakav means simply 'to lie down' but is also the standard euphemism for sexual intercourse (Genesis 19:32-35, 2 Samuel 11:4). The verb galah ('to uncover') is the verb of sexual exposure in Leviticus 18. And margelot ('the place of the feet/legs') may be a euphemism for the genital area, as 'feet' (raglayim) is used elsewhere (Judges 3:24, Isaiah 7:20). The narrator deploys all three without resolving the ambiguity.
4. The Ketiv reads veshakhavt ('and you shall lie down' — second person), while the Qere reads veshakhavti ('and I shall lie down' — first person). The Ketiv is the expected form for Naomi's instruction to Ruth. The Qere with the first-person form is difficult — some scholars suggest it reflects Naomi momentarily identifying with Ruth's action.
4. Naomi's closing instruction — vehu yaggid lakh et asher ta'asin ('he will tell you what to do') — places the initiative with Boaz after Ruth's approach. Naomi's plan gets Ruth to the threshing floor; what happens next is Boaz's decision.

5. Ruth's response — kol asher tomeri e'eseh ('everything you say I will do') — echoes Israel's covenant formula at Sinai: kol asher dibber YHWH na'aseh ('everything the LORD has spoken we will do,' Exodus 19:8). Whether the echo is deliberate or simply reflects conventional Hebrew agreement language, the effect is the same: Ruth commits to Naomi's plan with the totality of covenant obedience.
5. The Ketiv reads elai ('to me') while the Qere reads elayikh ('to you'). The Qere makes better contextual sense — 'everything you say to me' — while the Ketiv as written ('everything you say to you') appears to be a scribal anomaly.
6. The verb yarad ('to go down') is geographically accurate — threshing floors were typically on elevated ground outside the village, but Bethlehem sits on a ridge and the floor would have been below the town. The narrative restraint here is notable: the text simply says vatta'as kekhol asher tsivvattah chamotah ('she did according to all that her mother-in-law commanded her') without narrating the bathing, anointing, or dressing. The reader must supply what the narrator compresses.
7. The phrase vayyitav libbo ('his heart was good') indicates satisfaction and contentment after the harvest meal — the same phrase is used of Boaz's ancestor Judah's heart being 'good with wine' in other harvest contexts. It does not necessarily imply drunkenness, though some interpreters read it that way. We rendered it 'content' to capture the sense of post-meal satisfaction without importing intoxication.
7. Ruth comes balat ('in secret, stealthily, quietly'). The word appears only here and in Judges 4:21 (where Jael approaches Sisera secretly) and 1 Samuel 18:22 and 24:4. The parallel with Jael is striking — another woman approaching a sleeping man — though with radically different intent.
7. The narrator now executes Naomi's instructions in compressed form: vattegal margelotav vattishkav ('she uncovered the place of his feet and lay down'). The same ambiguous vocabulary from verse 4 reappears without further explanation. The narrator refuses to clarify what the reader most wants to know.
8. The opening vayyehi bachatsi ha-laylah ('and it was at the middle of the night') uses the narrative formula vayyehi to mark a dramatic turning point. Midnight is the hour of crisis throughout the Hebrew Bible — it is when the LORD strikes Egypt's firstborn (Exodus 12:29) and when Samson carries off Gaza's gates (Judges 16:3).
8. The verb yecharad ('he trembled, he was startled') indicates a visceral, physical reaction — not mere surprise but a shudder of alarm. The verb yillafet ('he turned, he twisted, he bent forward') is rare, appearing only here. Its exact meaning is debated: some derive it from lafat ('to twist, to grasp') suggesting he reached forward; others connect it to a root meaning 'to turn over.' We chose 'twisted around' to convey both the physical movement and the disorientation.
8. The particle hinneh ('and there') — rendered naturally as part of the sentence — marks Boaz's moment of discovery. The narrator briefly adopts Boaz's perspective: he sees what he sees — ishah shokhevet margelotav ('a woman lying at the place of his feet') — before he knows who she is.
9. Ruth identifies herself — anokhi Rut amatekha ('I am Ruth, your maidservant') — using the formal first-person pronoun anokhi rather than the common ani, and the term amah ('maidservant') rather than the lower-status shifchah. The choice of amah signals that Ruth sees herself as eligible for marriage, not merely as a servant — amah is the term used for women who may become wives (Exodus 21:7-11).
9. The verb ufarasta ('spread out') with kenafekha ('your wing/garment corner') directly echoes Boaz's blessing in 2:12: tachat kenafav ('under His wings'). Ruth takes Boaz's theological language and turns it into a concrete request. The effect is both bold and theologically precise: if God shelters under His wings, and Boaz is God's agent of redemption, then Boaz's garment-wing should cover Ruth.
9. Ruth grounds her request in law: ki go'el attah ('for you are a kinsman-redeemer'). The go'el is the kinsman obligated to restore what a family member has lost — property, freedom, or family line. Ruth names the legal basis for what she is asking, transforming a nocturnal encounter into a formal legal claim.
10. Boaz's first words are a blessing — berukhah att la-YHWH ('blessed are you by the LORD') — the same formula used for covenant blessings throughout the Hebrew Bible. His immediate response to Ruth's nighttime approach is not suspicion or exploitation but benediction.
10. The phrase hetavt chasdekha ha-acharon min ha-rishon ('you have made your later chesed greater than the first') is the theological pivot of the chapter. Boaz identifies two distinct acts of chesed: the rishon ('first') — Ruth's loyalty to Naomi in chapter 1 — and the acharon ('later') — her choice to seek a go'el rather than a young husband. The comparative min ('greater than') does not diminish the first act but elevates the second: choosing covenantal obligation over personal preference is the deeper loyalty.
10. The phrase levilti lekhet acharei ha-bachurim ('not going after the young men') implies that Ruth had other options. As a young woman of evident character (her reputation precedes her, 2:11), she could have attracted younger suitors. By coming to Boaz — older, established, but legally positioned as go'el — she chose family redemption over romantic possibility.
11. Boaz's promise — kol asher tomeri e'eseh lakh ('everything you say I will do for you') — mirrors Ruth's identical commitment to Naomi in verse 5. The symmetry is deliberate: Ruth pledged total obedience to Naomi's plan; Boaz now pledges total commitment to Ruth's request. The echo binds the three characters in a chain of loyalty.
11. The phrase eshet chayil ('woman of strength, woman of valor') is the same term used in Proverbs 31:10 for the ideal woman: 'an eshet chayil, who can find?' The word chayil means 'strength, capability, worth, valor' — it is used of warriors (gibbor chayil, 'mighty warrior') and of wealth (ish chayil, 'man of substance'). Applied to Ruth, it encompasses all of these: she is strong, capable, worthy, and courageous. We chose 'woman of strength' to preserve the term's primary force without narrowing it to domesticity.

11. The phrase kol sha'ar ammi ('all the gate of my people') refers to the city gate where legal and commercial business was conducted. That 'the whole gate' knows Ruth's reputation means her character is a matter of public record — not private opinion but communal recognition.
12. Boaz confirms Ruth's legal claim — ki omnam ki go'el anokhi ('for indeed, I am a kinsman-redeemer') — using the emphatic particle omnam ('truly, indeed'). He does not deny the obligation but immediately introduces a complication: vegam yesh go'el qarov mimmenni ('and also there is a kinsman-redeemer closer than I'). The closer go'el has prior legal right — the obligation falls on the nearest kinsman first. Boaz cannot act until this closer relative either accepts or declines the responsibility.
12. The Ketiv/Qere here reflects a textual difficulty: the Ketiv appears to have the conditional im ('if') before go'el, while the Qere smooths the reading. The sense in either case is Boaz's acknowledgment that a closer kinsman exists.
13. The verse is saturated with the root ga'al ('to redeem'): yig'alekh ('he will redeem you'), yig'al ('let him redeem'), lego'alekh ('to redeem you'), uge'altikh ('I will redeem you'). Four occurrences in a single verse hammer the legal term into the listener's consciousness. Redemption is not abstract theology here — it is a concrete legal act that one specific person will perform for one specific woman.
13. Boaz's oath — chai YHWH ('as the LORD lives') — is the most solemn form of oath in the Hebrew Bible, invoking God's own life as guarantee. This is not a casual promise. By swearing by the life of the LORD, Boaz binds himself irrevocably: if the closer kinsman declines, Boaz will act.
13. The instruction lini ha-laylah ('stay the night') followed by shikhvi ad ha-boqer ('lie down until morning') frames the rest of the night as a period of protected waiting. Boaz has committed to resolution at dawn. The same verb shakav ('lie down') that carried ambiguity earlier now carries the straightforward sense of 'rest until daylight.'
14. The phrase beterem yakkir ish et re'ehu ('before a man could recognize his neighbor') indicates the predawn darkness — the time between first stirring and actual visibility. Ruth leaves in the window when people are moving but cannot yet see clearly. The timing is protective: it shields both Ruth's reputation and Boaz's legal position.
14. Boaz's instruction — al yivvada ki va'ah ha-ishah ha-goren ('let it not be known that the woman came to the threshing floor') — uses the passive of yada ('to know, to be known'). His concern is for public perception: the legal transaction must be settled properly at the gate before any rumors circulate. The definite article on ha-ishah ('the woman') rather than Ruth's name may reflect Boaz speaking in general terms to anyone who might overhear — or it may simply be Hebrew narrative style.
15. The mitpachat ('shawl, cloak, wrap') is a large cloth garment that could serve as a carrying vessel when gathered. The word appears only here and in Isaiah 3:22 among items of women's clothing. Boaz's gift of shesh se'orim ('six barleys') is deliberately vague about the unit of measure — the text says 'six of barley' without specifying whether these are seahs, ephahs, or another measure. Six seahs would be roughly 60-90 pounds — an enormous load. Some interpreters suggest a smaller unit. The ambiguity may be intentional: the point is generosity, not arithmetic.
15. The final clause vayyavo ha-ir ('and he went into the city') has a Ketiv/Qere issue in some traditions — the subject may be 'he' (Boaz) or 'she' (Ruth). The Masoretic vocalization as vayyavo ('and he went,' masculine) gives the action to Boaz, who would be heading to the gate to begin legal proceedings. Some ancient versions read 'she went into the city,' giving Ruth the action of returning to Naomi. We follow the Masoretic reading.
16. Naomi's question — mi att bitti ('who are you, my daughter?') — is puzzling if taken literally, since she would recognize Ruth. The question likely means 'what is your status now?' or 'how do things stand?' — essentially, 'are you betrothed or not?' We rendered it as 'How did it go?' to capture this pragmatic sense rather than forcing the literal 'Who are you?' which would imply Naomi cannot see Ruth in the dark. Some interpreters do take it literally as a predawn darkness question; the ambiguity is acknowledged.
16. Ruth's report — et kol asher asah lah ha-ish ('everything the man had done for her') — uses the preposition lah ('for her') rather than immah ('with her'). The distinction matters: the man acted for her benefit. The narrator's summary is deliberately opaque about the details, leaving the reader dependent on what has already been narrated.
17. Boaz's instruction — al tavo'i reqam el chamotekh ('do not go to your mother-in-law empty') — uses the word reqam ('empty, empty-handed'), the same word Naomi used of herself in 1:21: reqam heshivani YHWH ('the LORD brought me back empty'). Boaz's gift directly addresses Naomi's emptiness. The barley is not merely provision but a reversal of the condition Naomi named as her defining grief.
17. The Ketiv reads elai ('to me') while the Qere reads elayikh ('to you'), a variant also seen in verse 5. The Qere ('he said to you') would make Boaz address Ruth directly; the Ketiv ('he said to me') has Ruth quoting Boaz's words to herself. Either reading yields the same practical meaning.
18. Naomi's instruction — shevi bitti ('sit, my daughter') — uses the imperative of yashav ('to sit, to dwell, to remain'). After a night of action, the instruction is to be still and wait. The phrase eikh yippol davar ('how the matter will fall') uses the verb nafal ('to fall') in its sense of 'to turn out, to be decided' — the same verb used for the fall of lots (Esther 3:7, Jonah 1:7). The outcome is now in process and will land where it lands.
18. Naomi's confidence — ki lo yishqot ha-ish ki im killah ha-davar ha-yom ('the man will not rest until he has finished the matter today') — reveals her reading of Boaz's character. The verb shaqat ('to rest, to be quiet, to be at ease') echoes the chapter's opening theme of manoach ('rest, security'). Ironically, Boaz will not have rest until he secures Ruth's rest. The chapter ends with Naomi trusting Boaz's urgency — the resolution will come in chapter 4.

Summary: Boaz goes to the town gate to settle the matter of redeeming Elimelech's land and Ruth's future. A closer kinsman-redeemer has first right but declines when he learns the obligation includes marrying Ruth the Moabite. Boaz acquires the land and Ruth before witnesses. Ruth bears a son, Obed, whom the women of Bethlehem declare to be Naomi's kinsman-redeemer. The book closes with a genealogy tracing the line from Perez through Boaz and Obed to David.

What Makes This Remarkable: The entire legal drama of verses 1-12 turns on a single Hebrew word: go'el, the kinsman-redeemer. The unnamed closer relative is willing to redeem the land but not to take on Ruth — the Moabite element is the deal-breaker. Boaz accepts both, and the text frames this as the greater act of faithfulness. The sandal ceremony in verses 7-8 preserves an ancient legal custom that the narrator must explain to his own audience, indicating the story's antiquity. Most striking is the ending: the women of Bethlehem declare the newborn child — not Boaz — to be Naomi's go'el, her redeemer. The infant restores what death took. Then the genealogy delivers its quiet earthquake: this child of a Moabite widow is the grandfather of King David.

Translation Friction: We rendered go'el as 'kinsman-redeemer' throughout rather than simplifying to 'redeemer' because the kinship obligation is inseparable from the legal function — a go'el must be a relative. The verb ga'al ('to redeem') and the noun go'el share the same root, and we preserved this connection in English where possible. The phrase peloni almoni in verse 1 (the unnamed kinsman) is a Hebrew idiom roughly equivalent to 'so-and-so' — we rendered it 'a certain man' with a translator note. The sandal custom in verse 7 required careful handling: the Hebrew teudah ('attestation, confirmation') indicates a legal validation ritual, not a casual exchange.

Connections: The gate scene connects to Deuteronomy 25:5-10, where levirate marriage and the sandal ritual are legislated. Boaz's declaration in verse 10 — 'to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance' — echoes that Deuteronomic mandate precisely. The women's blessing in verse 11 invokes Rachel and Leah, the mothers of all Israel, placing Ruth alongside them. The Perez genealogy in verses 18-22 reaches back to Genesis 38 — another story of a woman (Tamar) who used unconventional means to secure offspring within the family line. Ruth and Tamar are literary sisters: foreign or marginalized women whose bold action preserves the covenant line that leads to David.

¹Now Boaz had gone up to the gate and was sitting there. And look — the kinsman-redeemer Boaz had spoken about came passing by. Boaz said, "Come over here and sit down, friend." So the man turned aside and sat down. ²He gathered ten men from the elders of the city and said, "Sit down here." They sat down. ³He said to the kinsman-redeemer, "The parcel of land that belonged to our relative Elimelech — Naomi, who has returned from the territory of Moab, is selling it. ⁴So I decided to bring it to your attention: Acquire it in the presence of those sitting here and in the presence of the elders of my people. If you will redeem it, redeem it. But if you will not redeem it, tell me so I will know, because there is no one besides you to redeem it, and I am next after you." He said, "I will redeem it." ⁵Then Boaz said, "On the day you acquire the field from Naomi's hand, you also acquire Ruth the Moabite, the wife of the deceased, in order to raise up the name of the dead man upon his inheritance." ⁶The kinsman-redeemer said, "I cannot redeem it for myself — I would ruin my own inheritance. Take my right of redemption yourself, because I cannot redeem it." ⁷Now this was the custom in former times in Israel regarding redemption and exchange: to confirm any matter, a man would remove his sandal and give it to the other party. This was the method of legal attestation in Israel. ⁸The kinsman-redeemer said to Boaz, "Acquire it for yourself." And he removed his sandal. ⁹Boaz said to the elders and all the people, "You are witnesses today that I have acquired everything that belonged to Elimelech and everything that belonged to Chilion and Mahlon from Naomi's hand. ¹⁰And I have also acquired Ruth the Moabite, the wife of Mahlon, as my wife, in order to raise up the name of the dead man upon his inheritance, so that the name of the dead will not be cut off from among his relatives or from the gate of his town. You are witnesses today." ¹¹All the people at the gate and the elders said, "We are witnesses. May the LORD make the woman entering your house like Rachel and like Leah, who together built the house of Israel. May you prosper in Ephrathah and gain renown in Bethlehem. ¹²May your house become like the house of Perez, whom Tamar bore to Judah, through the offspring that the LORD will give you from this young woman." ¹³So Boaz took Ruth and she became his wife. He slept with her, and the LORD granted her conception, and she bore a son. ¹⁴The women said to Naomi, "Blessed be the LORD, who has not left you without a kinsman-redeemer today. May his name be proclaimed in Israel. ¹⁵He will be a restorer of your life and a sustainer in your old age, for your daughter-in-law who loves you has borne him — she who is better to you than seven sons." ¹⁶Naomi took the child and held him on her lap and became his guardian. ¹⁷The neighbor women gave him a name, saying, "A son has been born to Naomi!" They named him Obed. He was the father of Jesse, the father of David. ¹⁸These are the descendants of Perez: Perez fathered Hezron, ¹⁹Hezron fathered Ram, Ram fathered Amminadab, ²⁰Amminadab fathered Nahshon, Nahshon fathered Salmah, ²¹Salmon fathered Boaz, Boaz fathered Obed, ²²Obed fathered Jesse, and Jesse fathered David.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Hebrew vayyehi is implied in the narrative sequence — the scene opens with Boaz already positioned at the gate (ha-sha'ar), the public space where legal transactions and judicial decisions were conducted. This is Israel's courtroom.
1. The phrase peloni almoni is a Hebrew idiom for an unnamed person — roughly 'so-and-so' or 'Mr. What's-his-name.' The narrator's refusal to name this man is deliberate: the one who refuses the redemption obligation forfeits his name in the story. We rendered it as 'friend' in Boaz's speech because peloni almoni is the narrator's descriptor, while Boaz would have used the man's actual name. The idiom signals to the reader that this man's identity does not matter — his refusal to redeem will erase him from the record.
1. The verb sur ('to turn aside') indicates the kinsman was walking past — Boaz catches him in transit. The timing is presented as providential: the exact person Boaz needs appears at the exact moment Boaz is ready.
2. The ten elders (asarah anashim mi-ziqnei ha-ir) function as both witnesses and judicial authority. Ten became the standard quorum for legal proceedings — later Jewish tradition formalized this as the minyan. Boaz is not acting impulsively; he has assembled a court. The verb vayyiqqach ('he took, he gathered') suggests purposeful selection, not a random group of bystanders.
3. The phrase chelqat ha-sadeh ('the parcel of the field') indicates a specific plot of ancestral land. Under Israelite land law (Leviticus 25:23-28), land could not be permanently sold outside the family — it must be redeemed by a kinsman. The verb makrah ('she is selling' or 'she has sold') is ambiguous in form — it could be a perfect ('she sold') or a participial sense ('she is selling'). We read it as an ongoing offer: Naomi is making the land available for redemption.
3. Boaz calls Elimelech achinu ('our brother/relative'), establishing the kinship network that activates the go'el obligation. This is not biological brotherhood but clan membership — the shared family identity that triggers the legal duty.
4. The phrase egleh oznekha ('I will uncover your ear') is a Hebrew idiom meaning 'to inform, to bring to your attention' — literally 'to expose the ear.' The same idiom is used of God's revelation to Samuel (1 Samuel 9:15). Boaz is formally disclosing the situation in a legal setting.
4. The verb ga'al ('to redeem') appears four times in this verse, creating an emphatic legal refrain: im-tig'al ge'al... ve-im lo yig'al... ligeol ('if you will redeem, redeem... if not redeem... to redeem'). The repetition hammers the legal question: will the obligation be fulfilled? The closer kinsman answers anokhi eg'al ('I myself will redeem') — but he does not yet know the full terms.
4. Boaz's statement ve-anokhi achareykha ('and I am after you') establishes his legal position as second in line. This is not rivalry but proper legal procedure — the closer relative has priority.
5. Boaz now reveals the full scope of the obligation. The verb qanah ('to acquire, to buy') applies to both the field and to Ruth — the legal transaction is indivisible. The phrase me'et Rut ha-Mo'aviyyah eshet ha-met ('from Ruth the Moabite, wife of the dead man') keeps Ruth's ethnic identity front and center. She is not just a widow; she is a Moabite widow. This is the detail that will change the kinsman's calculation.
5. The purpose clause lehakim shem ha-met al nachalato ('to raise up the name of the dead upon his inheritance') invokes the levirate principle of Deuteronomy 25:5-6. The firstborn son of this union would legally be counted as Mahlon's heir, not the redeemer's. This means the kinsman would spend his own resources to produce an heir for another man's line — a costly obligation that the closer relative is unwilling to bear.
6. The verb shachat ('to ruin, to destroy, to corrupt') is strong language — the kinsman sees marrying Ruth not as inconvenience but as destruction of his inheritance. The ga'al root appears three more times in this verse: ligeol li... ge'ulati... ligeol ('to redeem for myself... my redemption right... to redeem'). The unnamed man hands off his ge'ullah (redemption right) to Boaz, and with it exits the story permanently.
6. The phrase ge'al lekha attah et ge'ulati ('redeem for yourself my redemption right') transfers the legal obligation. This is the pivot point of the entire book — the closer kinsman steps aside, and Boaz steps forward.
7. The narrator pauses to explain the sandal custom to his audience — the phrase vezot lefanim be-Yisra'el ('and this was formerly in Israel') indicates that the practice had already fallen out of use by the time the book was composed. This editorial aside is strong evidence that the story's setting is considerably older than its composition date.

7. The noun teudah ('attestation, testimony, confirmation') indicates a formal legal validation — the sandal functions as what we would call a notarized signature or a sealed contract. The verb shalaf ('to draw out, to pull off') is the same verb used for drawing a sword from its sheath (Judges 3:22), suggesting a decisive, formal gesture — not a casual shoe-removal.
7. The pairing of ge'ullah ('redemption') and temurah ('exchange') covers both types of transactions at stake: the redemption of Elimelech's land and the exchange of the kinsman's obligation to Boaz. Deuteronomy 25:9 describes a different sandal ceremony — there the rejected widow removes the man's sandal in disgrace. Here the transfer is voluntary and orderly, suggesting a distinct legal tradition.
8. The brevity is striking: qeneh lakh ('acquire for yourself') followed by vayyishlof na'alo ('and he pulled off his sandal'). Two short clauses — and with them, the entire legal transfer is complete. The closer kinsman disappears from the narrative. He is never named, never seen again. His refusal to redeem Ruth means he has no legacy in this story. The man who feared ruining his inheritance has in fact lost the only inheritance that would have mattered — a place in the line of David.
9. Boaz's declaration edim attem ha-yom ('you are witnesses today') transforms the gathered crowd into legal attestors. The threefold ki qaniti ('that I have acquired') — covering Elimelech, Chilion, and Mahlon — is comprehensive. Boaz takes on the entire family's legacy, not just a portion. The phrase mi-yad No'omi ('from Naomi's hand') establishes Naomi as the legal holder of the family property, confirming her standing despite her widowhood.
10. The phrase velo yikkaret shem ha-met ('and the name of the dead will not be cut off') uses the verb karat ('to cut, to cut off') — the same verb used for being 'cut off' from the covenant people as divine punishment. To have one's name cut off from 'the gate of his place' (mi-sha'ar meqomo) means to lose all legal and social existence in the community. Boaz's act prevents this covenantal erasure.
10. Boaz repeats edim attem ha-yom ('you are witnesses today') to close the declaration, creating an inclusio with verse 9. The entire speech is framed as witnessed legal testimony. The public nature is essential — redemption is not a private deal but a community event.
11. The blessing invokes Rachel and Leah — asher banu shetei hem et beit Yisra'el ('who, the two of them, built the house of Israel'). The verb banah ('to build') applied to a household through children is standard Hebrew idiom (compare Genesis 16:2, 30:3). But the comparison is stunning: Ruth the Moabite is placed alongside the matriarchs of all Israel. The community's blessing overwrites her foreign status — she is no longer 'Ruth the Moabite' in their eyes but a potential mother of Israel.
11. The phrase aseh chayil be-Efratah ('do valiantly in Ephrathah' or 'prosper in Ephrathah') uses chayil — the same word used to describe Ruth in 3:11 (eshet chayil, 'woman of strength/valor') and Boaz in 2:1 (gibbor chayil, 'man of standing/wealth'). The wordplay ties them together: they are matched in chayil.
11. The parallel uqera shem be-Beit Lachem ('and call out a name in Bethlehem') — to have a name proclaimed in Bethlehem — is precisely what Boaz sought for Mahlon's legacy. The blessing asks that Boaz's own name be established as well. History will grant this request beyond anything the speakers imagined.
12. The invocation of Perez (Peretz, 'breach, breaking forth') whom Tamar bore to Judah is not random — it is a precise intertextual connection. Tamar, like Ruth, was a woman outside the family who used unconventional means to secure offspring within the covenant line (Genesis 38). Tamar was Canaanite (or at minimum, non-Israelite); Ruth is Moabite. Both were widows of men in Judah's line. Both took bold, sexually risky action to compel a kinsman to fulfill his obligation. The people of Bethlehem, by invoking Tamar, are saying: we have seen this pattern before — God works through foreign women who refuse to let the family line die.
12. The phrase min ha-zera asher yitten YHWH lekha ('from the seed which the LORD will give you') places conception under divine sovereignty. The child is not merely biological but a gift of God — the same language used for Isaac (Genesis 21:1-2). The closing genealogy (vv. 18-22) will trace the line from Perez through Boaz to David, fulfilling this blessing beyond what the speakers could foresee.
13. The verb vayyavo eleiha ('and he came to her') is the standard Hebrew euphemism for sexual intercourse. The narrator then inserts divine agency: vayyitten YHWH lah herayon ('and the LORD gave her conception'). This is theologically deliberate — Ruth had been married to Mahlon for ten years without producing a child (1:4). The text implies that her previous childlessness was not biological inability but divine timing. God's gift of conception at this moment, with this man, in this place, is presented as purposeful. The child who will come is not an accident of fertility but a sovereign act.
13. The entire journey from chapter 1 to this moment collapses into a single verse: marriage, consummation, conception, birth. After the slow, detailed legal proceedings of verses 1-12, the narrator accelerates radically. The legal process matters; the private details do not.
14. The phrase asher lo hishbit lakh go'el ha-yom ('who has not left you without a kinsman-redeemer today') uses the verb shavat (hiphil: 'to cause to cease, to leave without'). God is credited with ensuring the go'el line did not fail. The women's theology is precise: the LORD is the one behind the human actors.
14. The identity of the go'el in this verse is debated — some read it as Boaz, others as the child. The immediate context (the women speak to Naomi about the birth, and verse 15 calls the child the 'restorer of your life') strongly favors the child. This reinterpretation of go'el — from legal redeemer to infant restorer — is one of the book's most profound theological moves.
15. The phrase meshiv nefesh ('restorer of life/soul') uses nefesh in its fullest sense — not merely physical life but vitality, identity, being. The child restores Naomi's nefesh — the self that was emptied in chapter 1. The parallel ulkhalkel et sevitekh ('and to sustain your old age') adds the practical dimension: this child will provide for Naomi when she can no longer provide for herself.

15. The climactic declaration — asher hi tovah lakh mi-shiv'ah vanim ('she who is better to you than seven sons') — is the most extraordinary tribute to Ruth in the book. Seven is the number of completeness in Hebrew thought; seven sons is the ideal family (compare 1 Samuel 2:5, Job 1:2). To say a Moabite daughter-in-law surpasses seven sons overturns every ancient Near Eastern assumption about the value of male heirs versus female foreigners. The verb ahavah ('she loves you') is the women's summary of Ruth's entire journey: everything Ruth has done — the oath in chapter 1, the gleaning in chapter 2, the threshing floor in chapter 3 — is love.
16. The verb vatteshitehu vecheiqah ('she placed him on her lap/bosom') is a gesture of adoption or legal acceptance — the same action by which a patriarch acknowledged a grandchild (Genesis 50:23, 30:3). Naomi, who in 1:21 declared 'the LORD brought me back empty' (reqam), now holds a child in her arms. The word omeneth ('nurse, guardian, caretaker') comes from the root aman ('to be faithful, to support') — from which we get amen. Naomi is the one who will faithfully raise this child. The woman who called herself Mara ('Bitter') has been restored.
17. The neighbor women (ha-shekhenot) name the child — an unusual act, as naming was typically the prerogative of the parents. Their declaration yullad ben le-No'omi ('a son has been born to Naomi') attributes the child to the grandmother, not to Ruth or Boaz. This is not erasure of Ruth but legal language: through the levirate-like arrangement, the child is counted as Naomi's grandson and Elimelech's heir. Naomi's family line is restored.
17. The name Oved ('servant, one who serves, worshiper') from the root avad ('to serve, to work') anticipates a life of faithful service. But the narrator's editorial comment — hu avi Yishai avi David ('he is the father of Jesse, the father of David') — drops the genealogical thunderbolt almost casually. The entire story of a Moabite widow's loyalty and a Bethlehemite farmer's redemption has been building to this: the royal line of David passes through Ruth. A woman from the nation excluded in Deuteronomy 23:3 is David's great-grandmother.
18. The toledot ('generations, descendants') formula — ve-elleh toledot Peretz — echoes the structuring device of Genesis (Genesis 2:4, 5:1, 6:9, 10:1, etc.). By opening with this formula, the narrator places Ruth's story within the grand genealogical architecture of the Torah. The line begins with Perez, the son of Judah and Tamar (Genesis 38), connecting the blessing of verse 12 to this closing genealogy. The ten-generation list (Perez to David) may be selectively compressed — ten being a number of completeness — rather than exhaustive.
19. The verb holid ('fathered, sired') is the hiphil of yalad ('to bear, to give birth') — the causative form indicating the father's role in producing offspring. Ram and Amminadab appear in the tribal genealogies of 1 Chronicles 2:9-10, confirming the Judahite lineage. Amminadab ('my kinsman is generous/noble') will be the father of Nahshon, the tribal leader of Judah during the wilderness period (Numbers 1:7).
20. Nahshon (Nachshon) was the leader of the tribe of Judah during the wilderness wandering (Numbers 2:3, 7:12) and brother-in-law of Aaron (Exodus 6:23). His presence in this genealogy anchors the line in Israel's most formative period. The name Salmah (also spelled Salmon) appears in variant forms across the Hebrew manuscripts — the WLC reads Salmah here. He will be identified as Boaz's father in the next verse.
21. The spelling shifts from Salmah (v. 20) to Salmon (Salemon) here — a minor textual variant within the WLC itself. More significant is what the genealogy omits: Ruth's name does not appear. In a patrilineal genealogy, mothers are invisible — yet the entire book exists to tell her story. The reader knows what the genealogical form cannot say: between 'Salmon fathered Boaz' and 'Boaz fathered Obed' stands a Moabite woman whose chesed and courage made the line possible. The genealogy is incomplete without the narrative that precedes it.
22. The final two words — et David — are the destination the entire book has been traveling toward. The genealogy does not say 'King David' or 'David the king' — simply David. The name stands alone, unadorned, as though its weight is self-evident. And yet everything that preceded it — famine, death, a widow's oath on a Moabite road, gleaning behind harvesters, a midnight encounter on a threshing floor, a sandal removed at a city gate — all of it was the path to this name.
22. The theological implications are staggering when read alongside Deuteronomy 23:3: 'No Ammonite or Moabite shall enter the assembly of the LORD, even to the tenth generation.' Ruth is a Moabite. David is her great-grandson — the third generation. The genealogy does not resolve this tension; it simply presents it. Israel's greatest king, the man after God's own heart, the ancestor of the Messiah, carries Moabite blood. The book of Ruth does not argue against Deuteronomy 23 — it tells a story that explodes its categories from within. Covenant faithfulness, it turns out, is not limited by bloodline.
22. The ten-generation structure (Perez to David) parallels other biblical genealogies and may be theologically shaped rather than exhaustively complete. Ten generations from Perez — the son born of Tamar's desperate faithfulness — to David, the king born of Ruth's desperate faithfulness. The symmetry suggests divine design operating through human loyalty across centuries.

Summary: A barren woman named Hannah, tormented by her husband's other wife, pours out her anguish before God at the sanctuary in Shiloh. She vows that if God gives her a son, she will dedicate him to the LORD for life. God remembers her, she conceives and bears Samuel, and she fulfills her vow by bringing the child to Shiloh.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is built on a single Hebrew wordplay that most English readers never see. The verb sha'al ('to ask') threads through the entire narrative — Hannah asks God for a son, Eli asks what is wrong with her, and when the boy is born she names him Samuel because 'I asked him from the LORD.' The name Shemu'el is popularly linked to 'heard by God' (shama + El), but the text itself connects it to sha'al — the very root that gives us the name Sha'ul (Saul). Hannah's prayer for a son produces the prophet who will anoint Israel's first king, and the wordplay binds both figures to the same act of asking. The chapter also introduces a pattern that will dominate 1 Samuel: the reversal of human expectations. The favored wife has children but no narrative importance; the barren wife reshapes Israel's history. God's power works through emptiness, not fullness.

Translation Friction: The name etymology in verse 20 is the chapter's hardest translation problem. Hannah says ki me-YHWH she'iltiv ('because from the LORD I asked him') — but the verb sha'al ('to ask') fits the name Sha'ul (Saul), not Shemu'el (Samuel). Some scholars argue this passage originally told Saul's birth story and was later reassigned to Samuel. Others see a deliberate double meaning: the name evokes both shama ('heard') and sha'al ('asked'), fusing the two ideas. We render the name connection transparently and note the tension rather than resolving it. In verse 13, Hannah prays 'in her heart' with her lips moving but no voice — the Hebrew al libbah ('upon her heart') describes internal speech that is visible but inaudible. Eli's mistaking this for drunkenness reflects the fact that silent prayer was apparently unusual enough at Shiloh to be unrecognizable. We chose 'speaking within herself' to capture the visible-but-silent quality.

Connections: Hannah's barrenness places her in a line of matriarchs whose closed wombs become turning points: Sarah (Genesis 11:30), Rebekah (Genesis 25:21), Rachel (Genesis 29:31), and the wife of Manoah (Judges 13:2). In each case, God opens the womb at the moment that shapes covenant history. Hannah's vow that no razor will touch her son's head (verse 11) uses language identical to the Nazirite vow in Numbers 6:5, connecting Samuel to Samson — but where Samson's Nazirite status ended in ruin, Samuel's will produce faithful service. Hannah's prayer of thanksgiving in chapter 2 will become the structural model for Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55), and the phrase 'the LORD remembered her' (verse 19) uses the same verb (zakar) applied to God's remembering Noah (Genesis 8:1), Rachel (Genesis 30:22), and the covenant itself (Exodus 2:24).

¹There was a man from Ramathaim-zophim, in the hill country of Ephraim. His name was Elkanah son of Jeroham, son of Elihu, son of Tohu, son of Zuph — an Ephraimite. ²He had two wives; the name of one was Hannah and the name of the other was Peninnah. Peninnah had children, but Hannah had none. ³This man would go up from his town year by year to worship and sacrifice to the LORD of Armies at Shiloh. The two sons of Eli — Hophni and Phinehas — were serving there as priests of the LORD. ⁴On the day when Elkanah sacrificed, he would give portions to his wife Peninnah and to all her sons and daughters. ⁵But to Hannah he would give a double portion, because he loved Hannah — though the LORD had closed her womb. ⁶Her rival would provoke her bitterly to torment her, because the LORD had closed her womb. ⁷This happened year after year. Whenever she went up to the house of the LORD, Peninnah would provoke her until she wept and would not eat. ⁸Elkanah her husband said to her, "Hannah, why are you weeping? Why won't you eat? Why is your heart so troubled? Am I not better to you than ten sons?" ⁹Hannah rose after eating and drinking at Shiloh. Now Eli the priest was sitting on his chair beside the doorpost of the LORD's temple. ¹⁰She was deeply bitter in spirit, and she prayed to the LORD, weeping uncontrollably. ¹¹She made a vow and said, "LORD of Armies, if you will truly look on the suffering of your servant, and remember me, and not forget your servant, but give your servant a son — then I will give him to the LORD for all the days of his life, and no razor will touch his head." ¹²As she continued praying at length before the LORD, Eli was watching her mouth. ¹³Hannah was speaking within herself — only her lips were moving, but her voice could not be heard — so Eli assumed she was drunk. ¹⁴Eli said to her, "How long will you go on being drunk? Put your wine away from you!" ¹⁵Hannah answered, "No, my lord. I am a woman crushed in spirit. I have not drunk wine or strong drink — I have been pouring out my soul before the LORD. ¹⁶Do not take your servant for a worthless woman, for it is out of the depth of my anguish and frustration that I have been speaking all this time." ¹⁷Eli answered, "Go in peace. May the God of Israel grant your request — what you have asked from him." ¹⁸She said, "May your servant find favor in your eyes." Then the woman went on her way. She ate, and her face was no longer downcast. ¹⁹They rose early in the morning, worshiped before the LORD, and returned home to Ramah. Elkanah was intimate with Hannah his wife, and the LORD remembered her. ²⁰In the turning of the year, Hannah conceived and bore a son. She named him Samuel, saying, "Because I asked him from the LORD." ²¹The man Elkanah went up with his whole household to offer to the LORD the annual sacrifice and to fulfill his vow. ²²But Hannah did not go up, for she said to her husband, "Not until the boy is weaned. Then I will bring him to appear before the face of the LORD, and he will remain there permanently." ²³Elkanah her husband said to her, "Do what seems best to you. Stay until you have weaned him. May the LORD fulfill his word." So the woman stayed and nursed her son until she weaned him. ²⁴When she had weaned him, she brought him up with her, along with three bulls, one ephah of flour, and a skin of wine. She brought him to the house of the LORD at Shiloh, while the boy was still young. ²⁵They slaughtered the bull and brought the boy to Eli. ²⁶She said, "Please, my lord — as surely as you live, my lord — I am the woman who stood here beside you, praying to the LORD. ²⁷It was for this boy that I prayed, and the LORD has granted me what I asked of him. ²⁸So I, in turn, have dedicated him to the LORD. For all the days that he lives, he is given over to the LORD." And he worshiped the LORD there.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The place name Ramathaim-zophim means 'the double height of the watchers' — ramathaim is a dual form of ramah ('height') and tsofim ('watchers, lookouts'). The genealogy traces four generations, rooting Elkanah in the tribe of Ephraim. The term Efrati here means 'Ephraimite' (a tribal designation), not 'Ephrathite' as in Ruth 1:2, where it refers to a clan in Judah. The distinction matters: this family belongs to the northern hill country, not to Bethlehem.
1. The fourfold genealogy (ben Yerocham ben Elihu ben Tochu ben Tsuf) is unusually detailed for a narrative opening, signaling that this family's lineage matters. Chronicles will later identify this line as Levitical (1 Chronicles 6:19-23), which would explain why Samuel can serve in the sanctuary despite being an Ephraimite by residence.
2. The name Channah derives from chanan ('to be gracious, to show favor') — she is 'Grace' or 'Favored One,' though her situation at the story's opening is anything but gracious. Peninnah may derive from peninim ('corals, pearls') or from panah ('to turn'). The Hebrew states the contrast with stark simplicity: vayyehi li-Feninnah yeladim u-le-Channah ein yeladim ('and Peninnah had children and Hannah — no children'). The word ein ('there is not') is absolute negation.

2. The two-wife household echoes the pattern of Leah and Rachel (Genesis 29-30): one wife is fertile but less loved, the other is loved but barren. The narrative formula signals that the barren wife's story will be the one that matters.
3. The phrase mi-yamim yamimah ('from days to days') is an idiom for 'year by year' or 'annually,' referring to the pilgrimage festivals. The title YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Armies') appears here for the first time in the Hebrew Bible — this is its inaugural occurrence. The title designates God as commander of heavenly and earthly forces. Its first appearance in a story about a barren woman's prayer, rather than in a battle narrative, is striking: the God of cosmic armies attends to domestic grief.
3. The mention of Hophni and Phinehas is ominous foreshadowing. The narrator names them as 'priests of the LORD' but will shortly reveal them as corrupt (2:12-17). Their presence at Shiloh sets the stage for the crisis of the priesthood that Samuel will eventually address.
4. The sacrificial meal was a communal feast following the offering — the family consumed their share of the peace offering (shelamim) together. The word manot ('portions') refers to the allocated shares of the sacrificial meat. Each family member received a designated portion. The detail that Peninnah's sons and daughters each received their own portion emphasizes the size of her family, making the contrast with Hannah more painful.
5. The phrase manah achat appayim is notoriously difficult. It could mean 'one portion of the face/presence' (a choice portion), 'one portion double' (a double share), or even 'one portion — though with a sad face.' Most interpreters read it as a special or double portion expressing Elkanah's favor. We chose 'double portion' as the most natural reading — Elkanah compensates with generosity for what he cannot give her.
5. The clause va-YHWH sagar rachmah ('and the LORD had closed her womb') uses the divine name as the subject of the closing. This is not presented as punishment but as divine sovereignty — the narrator makes God the direct agent of Hannah's barrenness without explaining why. The word rechem ('womb') shares its root with rachamim ('compassion, mercy'), creating an irony: the organ associated with divine compassion has been shut by God.
6. Peninnah is called tsaratah ('her rival wife') — the term tsarah specifically denotes a co-wife in a polygamous household and literally means 'her distress' or 'her adversary.' The very word for 'co-wife' in Hebrew contains the word for suffering. The verb ki'asattah ('she provoked her') paired with the intensifier gam ka'as ('also with provocation') and the purpose clause ba'avur har'imah ('in order to make her thunder/agitate') reveals Peninnah's cruelty as deliberate and sustained, not casual friction.
6. The narrator repeats ki sagar YHWH be'ad rachmah ('because the LORD had closed her womb') — the same theological claim from verse 5. The repetition frames Hannah's suffering between two causes: divine agency (God closed) and human cruelty (Peninnah provoked). The text refuses to choose between them.
7. The phrase shanah be-shanah ('year by year') emphasizes that this was not a single incident but an annual humiliation timed to the pilgrimage festival — the very occasion meant for worship and communal joy becomes Hannah's recurring season of grief. The verb tivkeh ('she wept') and the clause lo tokhal ('she would not eat') describe Hannah's response in terms of mourning: weeping and refusing food are the classic signs of deep grief in Hebrew narrative (2 Samuel 12:16-17). Hannah mourns at the feast.
8. Elkanah's three questions (why do you weep, why don't you eat, why is your heart bad) show genuine concern, but his final rhetorical question — halo anokhi tov lakh me-asarah vanim ('am I not better to you than ten sons?') — reveals that he does not fully understand her grief. He measures his love against the lack she feels, assuming that spousal devotion can substitute for the child she desperately wants. The number 'ten' (asarah) represents completeness and abundance. Elkanah is offering everything he has, but it is not the thing she needs.
8. The phrase yera levavekh ('your heart is bad/evil') uses the verb ra'a ('to be bad, evil, displeased') applied to the heart (levav). This is not moral judgment but emotional diagnosis — her inner self is in distress. The same phrase describes deep emotional pain elsewhere (Nehemiah 2:10, Jonah 4:1).
9. The phrase acharei akhlah be-Shiloh ve-acharei shatoh ('after eating in Shiloh and after drinking') is ambiguous — the suffixes could refer to Hannah eating and drinking, or to the family eating and drinking. If Hannah, then she has recovered enough to eat before approaching God; if the family, then she goes to pray while others feast. Given verse 7's report that she would not eat, some interpreters read this as the broader family's meal.
9. Eli sits al ha-kisse al mezuzah hekhal YHWH ('on the seat beside the doorpost of the temple of the LORD'). The word hekhal ('temple, palace') applied to the Shiloh sanctuary is significant — this is the central worship site before Jerusalem. The mezuzah ('doorpost') places Eli at the threshold, the liminal space between the sacred interior and the public courtyard. He occupies the position of gatekeeper.
10. The phrase marat nefesh ('bitter of soul') uses the same root (marar) that Naomi invokes in Ruth 1:20 when she renames herself Mara. The nefesh is not merely 'soul' in the Greek philosophical sense but the entire living self — appetite, desire, identity. Hannah's bitterness has consumed her whole being.
10. The construction uvakho tivkeh ('weeping, she wept') is the infinitive absolute paired with the finite verb — Hebrew's strongest intensifier. It conveys not quiet tears but convulsive, uncontrollable weeping. The same construction appears in Genesis 2:17 (mot tamut, 'dying you will die') and here carries the same force of totality.
11. Hannah calls herself amatekha ('your female servant') three times in a single sentence — the repetition is emphatic and deliberate. The word amah denotes a female servant who has legal standing in the household, not a hired laborer. By calling herself God's amah, Hannah claims a position that entitles her to God's attention and care.

11. The phrase im ra'oh tir'eh ('if you will indeed look') uses the infinitive absolute construction — the same intensifying form as Hannah's weeping in verse 10. She asks God to look with the same totality with which she wept. The verb ra'ah ('to see') when applied to God carries the sense of attentive, compassionate recognition — not passive observation but active engagement with suffering.
11. The clause morah lo ya'aleh al rosho ('a razor will not go up upon his head') is nearly identical to the Nazirite language of Numbers 6:5 and to the angel's instructions regarding Samson (Judges 13:5). Hannah is dedicating her son as a lifelong Nazirite — consecrated to God from birth to death, not for a limited period. This is the most radical form of the vow.
12. The phrase hirbetah lehitpallel ('she multiplied in praying') indicates prolonged, extended prayer — not a brief petition but sustained, persistent communion. The verb shomer ('watching, guarding, observing') applied to Eli watching her mouth (piha) creates a surveillance image: the priest is scrutinizing her lips. The irony will emerge in the next verse — Eli watches intently but completely misreads what he sees.
13. The phrase medabberet al libbah ('speaking upon her heart') describes a mode of prayer that is internal but physically visible — her lips move (sefateiha na'ot) but her voice does not carry (qolah lo yishame'a). This is the Hebrew Bible's most detailed description of silent prayer, and rabbinic tradition (Talmud Berakhot 31a) derives the laws of the Amidah (standing prayer) from Hannah's posture here: prayer should be spoken with the lips but not shouted.
13. Eli's judgment — vayyachsheveha le-shikorah ('he considered her a drunkard') — is the priest's first act in the narrative, and it is a failure of discernment. The man whose job is to mediate between God and Israel cannot distinguish between drunkenness and devotion. This small detail previews the larger failure of the Eli priesthood that will drive much of 1 Samuel's plot.
14. Eli's rebuke — ad matai tishtakkarin ('how long will you be drunk?') — uses the hitpael of shakar ('to be drunk'), implying ongoing or habitual drunkenness. He does not ask if she is drunk; he assumes it and demands she stop. The imperative hasiri et yeinekh me-alayikh ('remove your wine from upon you') treats her as if wine were a garment she is wearing. The priest's harsh judgment of a grieving woman at prayer is the narrative's first indication that the Shiloh priesthood has lost its spiritual sensitivity.
15. Hannah's self-description — ishah qeshat ruach ('a woman hard/harsh of spirit') — uses qasheh ('hard, difficult, harsh') to describe her inner state. This is not gentle sadness but a spirit that has been compressed, hardened, and crushed under weight. The phrase va-eshpokh et nafshi ('I poured out my soul') uses the verb shafakh, which elsewhere describes pouring out blood (Genesis 9:6), pouring out water as a libation (2 Samuel 23:16), and pouring out divine wrath (Hosea 5:10). Hannah's prayer is a liquid metaphor — she has emptied her entire self before God.
15. The distinction between yayin ('wine') and shekhar ('strong drink') covers all intoxicants: yayin is fermented grape juice, shekhar is any other intoxicating beverage (possibly from dates, barley, or pomegranates). Hannah's denial is comprehensive — she has consumed nothing that could cause what Eli observed.
16. The phrase bat beliyya'al ('daughter of Belial/worthlessness') is significant because the same term — benei beliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness') — will be applied to Eli's own sons in 2:12. Hannah begs not to be classed as what Eli's sons actually are. The word beliyya'al may derive from beli ('without') + ya'al ('worth, profit') — 'without worth' — or may be an older term for the underworld or chaos. It denotes someone beyond moral recovery.
16. Hannah's explanation — me-rov sichi ve-kha'si ('from the abundance of my complaint and my provocation/grief') — uses siach ('complaint, meditation, talk') and ka'as ('vexation, grief, provocation'). The word ka'as is the same root used for Peninnah's provocation in verses 6-7: Hannah's grief-prayer is fueled by the very torment her rival inflicts.
17. Eli's response — lekhi le-shalom ('go to peace') — is both a blessing and a dismissal. The preposition le ('to, toward') rather than be ('in') suggests movement toward peace rather than a static condition: 'go toward wholeness.' The word she'latekh ('your request') derives from sha'al ('to ask'), and Eli unknowingly activates the chapter's central wordplay: asher sha'alt me-immo ('what you asked from him'). The verb sha'al will echo through the naming of Samuel and connect forward to the naming of Saul. Eli, who could not discern her prayer, nevertheless speaks a prophetic blessing over it.
18. Hannah now calls herself shifchatekha ('your maidservant') — a term of even deeper humility than amah used in verse 11. A shifchah is the lowest rank of female servant. The transformation is immediate: vattelekh ha-ishah le-darkkah vattokhal ('the woman went her way and ate'). After refusing food in verse 7, she now eats. The phrase u-faneiha lo hayu lah od ('and her face was not to her anymore') is literally 'her faces were no longer hers' — meaning her expression of grief had departed. Something shifted in the act of praying and receiving Eli's blessing. The text does not say she received an answer — only that she prayed, was blessed, and her countenance changed.
19. The verb vayyeda ('he knew') is the standard Hebrew euphemism for sexual intimacy — the same verb used in Genesis 4:1 ('Adam knew Eve'). The sequence is deliberate: worship, return, intimacy, divine remembering. The sacred and the domestic are woven together without embarrassment.
19. The clause vayyizkerehah YHWH ('and the LORD remembered her') is the theological climax of the chapter's first movement. The verb zakar ('to remember') when God is the subject does not imply prior forgetfulness — it signals that God is now acting on what He has always known. The same divine remembering opens wombs (Rachel, Genesis 30:22), ends floods (Noah, Genesis 8:1), and initiates deliverance (Israel in Egypt, Exodus 2:24).
20. The phrase li-tequfot ha-yamim ('at the turning of the days') refers to the completion of a pregnancy cycle — approximately nine months from conception. The word tequfah ('turning, circuit, revolution') emphasizes the cyclical nature of time and the fulfillment of a natural period.
20. The name etymology is the chapter's most discussed translation problem. Hannah says ki me-YHWH she'iltiv ('because from the LORD I asked him') — but the verb sha'al ('to ask') produces the name Shaul, not Shemu'el. The name Shemu'el most naturally means 'his name is God' (shemu + El) or 'heard by God' (shama + El). Some scholars see this as evidence that the birth narrative originally belonged to Saul and was later transferred to Samuel. Others argue that Hebrew name etymologies are often folk explanations based on sound association rather than strict derivation — Hannah hears sha'al in Shemu'el. We render the text as given and note the tension.

21. The phrase zevach ha-yamim ('the sacrifice of the days') refers to the annual pilgrimage sacrifice — the same journey described in verse 3. The addition of ve-et nidro ('and his vow') reveals that Elkanah had also made a vow, though the text never records it. This is one of several narrative gaps in the chapter: we learn of Elkanah's vow only at its fulfillment. Some commentators suggest his vow was connected to Hannah's — perhaps confirming or endorsing her dedication of their son.
22. The verb yiggamel ('is weaned') indicates that Hannah keeps the child until weaning, which in the ancient Near East typically occurred around age three (cf. 2 Maccabees 7:27). These are the only years Hannah will have with her son. The phrase ve-yashav sham ad olam ('and he will dwell there forever') transforms a mother's personal sacrifice into a permanent consecration. The word olam ('forever, perpetuity') makes the dedication irrevocable — this is not a loan but a permanent transfer.
22. The phrase ve-nir'ah et penei YHWH ('and he will appear before the face of the LORD') uses the niphal of ra'ah — literally 'he will be seen before the LORD's face.' Appearing before God's face is pilgrimage language, but for Samuel it will become a permanent state: he will live in God's presence at Shiloh.
23. Elkanah's response — asi ha-tov be-einayikh ('do what is good in your eyes') — grants Hannah full authority over the timing. His blessing akh yaqem YHWH et devaro ('only may the LORD establish his word') raises a textual question: whose word? The Masoretic text reads devaro ('his word'), suggesting God's word — perhaps Eli's prophetic blessing in verse 17. The Septuagint and a Qumran manuscript (4QSam-a) read 'that which comes from your mouth,' suggesting Hannah's vow. We follow the MT but note the variant.
23. The verb vatteineq ('she nursed') followed by ad gomlah oto ('until she weaned him') compresses months or years of intimacy into a single clause. Every day of nursing is a day closer to giving the boy away. The narrative's restraint is quietly devastating — it does not describe Hannah's emotions during this period, leaving the reader to feel what the text will not say.
24. The offerings are substantial: three bulls (parim sheloshah), one ephah of flour (approximately 22 liters or half a bushel), and a skin of wine (nevel yayin). The Septuagint and 4QSam-a read 'a three-year-old bull' (par meshu^ll^lash) rather than 'three bulls' — which would match the boy's approximate age and provide a single animal for the dedication. The MT's 'three bulls' is the more difficult reading and thus often preferred by text critics.
24. The final phrase ve-ha-na'ar na'ar ('and the boy was a boy') seems redundant but serves a narrative purpose — it emphasizes just how young Samuel was. Some render this as 'the boy was still a child' or 'the boy was very young.' The repetition underscores the cost of Hannah's vow: she is handing over a toddler to serve in the sanctuary.
25. The singular ha-par ('the bull') here supports the Septuagint reading of 'a three-year-old bull' in verse 24, since only one animal is slaughtered. If the MT's 'three bulls' is correct, two may have been offered as additional sacrifices while one was the primary offering. The juxtaposition is stark: vayyishchatu et ha-par vayyavi'u et ha-na'ar ('they slaughtered the bull and brought the boy') — the sacrifice and the dedication are described in the same breath, with the same narrative pace. Hannah offers both an animal and a child, though only the animal dies.
26. Hannah's oath formula — chei nafshekha adoni ('as your soul lives, my lord') — is a solemn assertion of truth, invoking Eli's own life as guarantee. She identifies herself as ha-ishah ha-nitsevet immekha ba-zeh ('the woman who was standing with you in this place'). The participle nitsevet ('standing') recalls her posture of prayer — she stood to pray, a detail the rabbinic tradition notes as establishing the norm for the Amidah. The word ba-zeh ('in this [place]') anchors the identification to this specific location in the sanctuary.
27. The sha'al wordplay reaches its climax: vayyitten YHWH li et she'elati asher sha'alti me-immi ('the LORD gave me my request which I asked from him'). The noun she'elah ('request, petition') and the verb sha'al ('to ask') appear together, driving home the point: this child is the physical answer to an act of asking. The boy standing before Eli is living proof that God responds to desperate prayer. Hannah's statement also functions as a legal transfer — by identifying the boy as the answer to her vow, she establishes the basis for his dedication.
28. The verb hish'iltihu is the hiphil (causative) of sha'al — literally 'I have caused him to be asked' or 'I have lent/dedicated him.' The play is untranslatable: sha'al means both 'to ask for' and 'to lend,' so Hannah has 'asked' her son from God and now 'lends' him back using the same verb. The word sha'ul ('asked, lent, dedicated') in the clause hu sha'ul la-YHWH is identical to the name Sha'ul (Saul). This final verse welds Samuel's identity to Saul's name through a shared verbal root.
28. The final clause vayyishtachu sham la-YHWH ('and he worshiped the LORD there') is ambiguous in subject — the Hebrew could refer to Elkanah, to Samuel, or even to Eli. The Septuagint reads the plural ('they worshiped'). If Samuel is the subject, the boy's first recorded act in the sanctuary is worship — fitting for one who will spend his life in God's service.

Summary: Hannah sings a victory song after dedicating Samuel to the LORD at Shiloh — a poem that moves from personal vindication to cosmic theology, culminating in the first mention of a coming 'anointed one' (mashiach) in the books of Samuel. The narrative then contrasts Samuel's faithful ministry as a child with the predatory corruption of Eli's sons Hophni and Phinehas, who steal from the sacrifices and sleep with women at the tabernacle entrance. A man of God delivers a devastating oracle against Eli's house: the priesthood will be stripped from his family and given to a faithful priest.

What Makes This Remarkable: Hannah's song in verses 1-10 is one of the great theological poems in the Hebrew Bible and the direct literary ancestor of Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:46-55). What makes it remarkable is its scope: a woman who was barren and mocked by a rival does not simply thank God for a son — she composes a poem about the total reversal of human power structures. The hungry are fed, the barren bear seven, the mighty are shattered, the poor are raised from the dust to sit with princes. Most striking is verse 10: Hannah, who asked for a single child, ends her prayer with a vision of God's anointed king — a figure who does not yet exist in Israel. She sees past her own story to the monarchy her son will inaugurate.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew of Hannah's song is dense, archaic poetry with several textual difficulties. In verse 1, qeren ('horn') is a metaphor for strength that has no single English equivalent — we rendered it literally and noted the symbolism. Verse 3 uses the rare form nit'qu ('are weighed / measured') for God's assessment of human actions, which some traditions render 'are weighed' and others 'are measured' — we chose 'measured' and noted the ambiguity. In verse 5, the barren woman bearing seven is a literary number for completeness, not a biographical fact about Hannah (she bore six total per verse 21). The description of Eli's sons as benei beliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness') in verse 12 uses a term whose etymology is debated — we rendered it 'worthless men' and discussed the range in key_terms. The man of God's prophecy in verses 27-36 contains some of the most difficult Hebrew in the chapter, with several phrases whose referents are disputed.

Connections: Hannah's song establishes the theological framework for the entire Samuel-Kings narrative: God reverses human power structures, pulling down the mighty and lifting the lowly. The 'anointed one' (mashiach) of verse 10 is the first use of this term for a royal figure in the Former Prophets — it will become the defining title for Saul, David, and their successors. The contrast between Samuel and Eli's sons anticipates the contrast between David and Saul. The man of God's prophecy against Eli's house (vv. 27-36) will be fulfilled in stages: the deaths of Hophni and Phinehas (1 Sam 4:11), the removal of Eli's line from the high priesthood under Solomon (1 Kings 2:27), and the rise of Zadok as the faithful priest. The 'linen ephod' Samuel wears as a boy (v. 18) is priestly garb, signaling that this child given by prayer will serve as priest, prophet, and kingmaker.

¹Hannah prayed and said:
 "My heart exults in the LORD;
 my horn is raised high by the LORD.
 My mouth opens wide against my enemies,
 for I rejoice in Your salvation.

²There is no one holy like the LORD —
 there is no one besides You — and there is no rock like our God.

³Do not keep speaking so proudly;
 let no arrogance come from your mouth,
 for the LORD is a God of knowledge, and by Him actions are measured.

⁴The bows of the mighty are shattered, but those who stumble are armed with strength.

⁵Those who were full hire themselves out for bread, but the hungry hunger no more.
The barren woman bears seven,
while the mother of many withers away.

⁶The LORD kills and gives life;
He brings down to Sheol and raises up.

⁷The LORD makes poor and makes rich;
He brings low and lifts high.

⁸He raises the poor from the dust;
He lifts the needy from the ash heap to seat them with princes and grant them a throne of honor.
For the pillars of the earth belong to the LORD, and He has set the world upon them.

⁹He guards the steps of His faithful ones, but the wicked will be silenced in darkness — for no one prevails by their own strength.

¹⁰The LORD — His adversaries will be shattered!
Against them He thunders from heaven.
The LORD judges the ends of the earth.
He will give strength to His king and raise high the horn of His anointed."

¹¹Elkanah went home to Ramah, but the boy remained, serving the LORD in the presence of Eli the priest. ¹²Now the sons of Eli were worthless men. They did not know the LORD. ¹³Now this was the practice of the priests with the people: whenever anyone offered a sacrifice, the priest's servant would come while the meat was boiling, with a three-pronged fork in his hand, ¹⁴and would thrust it into the basin, or kettle, or caldron, or pot. Whatever the fork brought up, the priest would take for himself. This is what they did to all the Israelites who came there to Shiloh. ¹⁵Even before they burned the fat, the priest's servant would come and say to the man who was sacrificing, "Give meat for the priest to roast. He will not accept boiled meat from you — only raw." ¹⁶If the man said to him, "Let them burn the fat first, and then take whatever you want," the servant would say, "No — give it now. If you do not, I will take it by force." ¹⁷The sin of the young men was very great in the sight of the LORD, for they treated the LORD's offering with contempt. ¹⁸But Samuel was serving in the presence of the LORD — a boy wearing a linen ephod. ¹⁹His mother would make him a small robe and bring it up to him each year when she came with her husband to offer the yearly sacrifice. ²⁰Eli would bless Elkanah and his wife, saying, "May the LORD give you children by this woman in place of the one she dedicated to the LORD." Then they would go home. ²¹The LORD attended to Hannah, and she conceived and bore three sons and two daughters. Meanwhile, the boy Samuel grew up in the presence of the LORD. ²²Now Eli was very old. He heard about everything his sons were doing to all Israel, and how they were sleeping with the women who served at the entrance of the tent of meeting. ²³He said to them, "Why do you do such things? I hear about your wicked deeds from all these people. ²⁴No, my sons — the report I hear is not good. You are causing the LORD's people to sin. ²⁵If one person sins against another, God can mediate. But if a person sins against the LORD, who will intercede for him?"

But they would not listen to their father's voice, because the LORD intended to put them to death. ²⁶The boy Samuel continued to grow in stature and in favor, both with the LORD and with people. ²⁷A man of God came to Eli and said to him, "This is what the LORD says: Did I not clearly reveal Myself to your ancestor's house when they were in Egypt, in the house of Pharaoh? ²⁸I chose him out of all the tribes of Israel to be My priest — to go up to My altar, to burn incense, to wear the ephod before Me. And I gave to your ancestor's house all the fire offerings of the sons of Israel. ²⁹Why do you trample on My sacrifice and My offering that I commanded for My dwelling? You honor your sons above Me, fattening yourselves on the best of every offering from Israel, My people." ³⁰Therefore — this is the declaration of the LORD, the God of Israel — I did indeed say that your house and your ancestor's house would walk before Me forever. But now — this is the LORD's declaration — far be it from Me! For those who honor Me I will honor, and those who despise Me will be disgraced. ³¹The days are coming when I will cut off your strength and the strength of your ancestor's house, so that no one in your family will reach old age. ³²You will see distress in My dwelling, even though God will do good for Israel. And there will never be an old man in your house. ³³Any man of yours I do not cut off from My altar will be spared only to consume your eyes with tears and to grieve your soul. All the offspring of your house will die as young men. ³⁴And this will be the sign for you — what will happen to your two sons, Hophni and Phinehas: both of them will die on the same day. ³⁵I will raise up for Myself a faithful priest who will do what is in My heart and in My mind. I will build for him an enduring house, and he will walk before My anointed one always. ³⁶Everyone left in your house will come and bow down to him for a small coin and a loaf of bread, saying, 'Please assign me to one of the priestly duties so I can eat a piece of bread.'

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vattipallel ('she prayed') introduces what follows as prayer, though its form is a victory song. Hebrew prayer encompasses praise, lament, and proclamation — not just petition.
1. The three-line opening structure uses synonymous parallelism: heart exults / horn is raised / mouth opens wide. Each line intensifies the same theme of vindication. The shift from 'my heart' to 'my horn' to 'my mouth' moves from internal emotion to public display.
1. 'My horn is raised high' (ramah qarni) — the horn (qeren) is the primary symbol of strength throughout the poem. It appears here in verse 1 and returns in verse 10 for the anointed king, framing the entire song.
2. The three-line structure moves from God's holiness (qadosh) to His uniqueness ('none besides You') to His reliability (tsur, 'rock'). The middle line — ki ein biltékha ('for there is none besides You') — is the strongest claim: not merely that God is the greatest, but that He stands alone. The rock metaphor (tsur) connotes immovable stability and protection, a fortress image used throughout the Psalms and the Song of Moses (Deut 32:4).
3. The doubled gevohah gevohah ('proudly proudly' or 'high high') is emphatic — Hannah is addressing the kind of boastful speech she endured from Peninnah. The word 'ataq ('arrogance, insolence') describes speech that is brazen and presumptuous.
3. The phrase El de'ot ('God of knowledge') may mean God who possesses all knowledge or God to whom all knowledge belongs — the plural de'ot could be intensive. The verb nitkenu ('are measured / are weighed') is debated: from takan, it can mean 'to weigh, to measure, to assess.' We chose 'measured' because the image is of God evaluating human deeds against a standard. The proud speaker will be assessed by a God who knows everything.
4. The reversal pattern that defines the song begins here. Chattim ('shattered') describes the breaking of weapons, not merely bending them — the mighty are completely disarmed. Meanwhile, the nikashalim ('those who stumble') — the weak, the faltering — are 'girded with strength' (azeru chayil). The verb azar ('to gird') is military: it means to strap on armor or weapons. The weak become warriors by God's doing.
5. The reversals accelerate: the well-fed must now work for food, while the hungry are satisfied. The climactic line — 'the barren woman bears seven' — uses the number of completeness, not biography. Hannah bore six children total (v. 21), but her song speaks in the language of divine fullness. Seven means God has given more than enough.
5. The verb umlelah ('withers, languishes') describes a slow fading — the mother of many does not lose her children violently but simply declines. The contrast is between divine vitality (the barren made fruitful) and human self-sufficiency that cannot sustain itself.
6. The poem moves from social reversals to cosmic sovereignty. God's power extends over life and death itself. Sheol is the underworld, the realm of the dead — not a place of punishment but of shadowy non-existence. The claim that God 'raises up' from Sheol is striking: in early Israelite thought, Sheol was generally considered final. Hannah's song pushes beyond that expectation, asserting that even death is not beyond God's reach.
7. The four verbs come in two pairs, each a reversal: morish/ma'ashir (impoverishes/enriches), mashpil/meromem (brings low/exalts). The structure is deliberately symmetrical, reflecting the balanced sovereignty of God over all human conditions. Neither wealth nor poverty is permanent or self-caused — both are within God's governance.

8. The movement from 'dust' (afar) to 'ash heap' (ashpot) to 'princes' (nedivim) to 'throne of honor' (kisse kavod) is the most dramatic vertical reversal in the song. The ashpot is literally the refuse dump outside a village — where the destitute sit to beg. From there, God lifts them to royal thrones.
8. The phrase metzuqei eretz ('pillars of the earth') reflects ancient cosmology where the earth rests on foundations or pillars. The theological point transcends the cosmology: God's right to reverse human power structures rests on His role as Creator. He set the world on its foundations; human hierarchies are His to rearrange.
8. This verse is echoed directly in Psalm 113:7-8 and in Mary's Magnificat (Luke 1:52): 'He has brought down the powerful from their thrones and lifted up the lowly.'
9. The chasadav ('His faithful ones,' from chesed) are those bound to God in covenant loyalty. The verb yishmar ('He guards') echoes the creation mandate and the priestly blessing (Num 6:24). By contrast, the wicked are yiddamu ('silenced') — the verb damam means to be still, to cease, to be cut off. Darkness and silence together suggest Sheol.
9. The final line — ki lo vekoach yigbar ish ('for not by strength does a man prevail') — is the thesis statement of the entire Samuel narrative. Saul, the tall warrior-king, will fail; David, the youngest shepherd boy, will triumph. Human power does not determine outcomes. God does.
10. This verse is the theological climax of the song. The word meshicho ('His anointed one') is the first occurrence of mashiach in the books of Samuel in a royal context. Hannah, praying before any king exists in Israel, uses the term that will define Saul and David and ultimately the messianic expectation of later Judaism and Christianity.
10. The verb yarim qeren meshicho ('He will raise the horn of His anointed') closes the inclusio begun in verse 1 (ramah qarni, 'my horn is raised'). Hannah's personal horn of strength becomes the horn of the coming king. Her story is subsumed into God's larger purpose.
10. The thunder theophany (ba-shamayim yar'em, 'from heaven He thunders') connects to the storm theophany tradition in Psalm 18:13 and to the thunder that accompanied the Israelite victory in 1 Samuel 7:10. God's voice in the storm is a weapon against His enemies.
11. The transition is abrupt and poignant: Elkanah 'went home' but the child stayed. The verb mesharet ('serving, ministering') indicates formal religious service — even as a small child, Samuel has a recognized role at the sanctuary. The phrase et penei Eli ('before Eli' or 'in the presence of Eli') establishes the mentoring relationship while also setting up the contrast that follows: Samuel serves faithfully; Eli's own sons do not.
12. The phrase benei beliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness' or 'sons of wickedness') is one of the harshest designations in Hebrew. It describes people who are fundamentally destructive to the community — those from whom no good can come. Applied to priests, it is shocking.
12. The statement lo yade'u et YHWH ('they did not know the LORD') uses yada ('to know') in its fullest sense — not ignorance of God's existence but absence of relationship, reverence, and covenant faithfulness. Knowing God in Hebrew means intimate, personal, covenantal engagement. Eli's sons had none of it.
13. The narrator uses mishpat ('practice, custom, judgment') with deliberate irony — what should mean 'the proper procedure' here describes corruption. The three-pronged fork (mazleg shelosh ha-shinayim) was a real cultic utensil, but its use here is perverted: instead of serving the sacrifice properly, it becomes a tool for priestly theft.
14. The four cooking vessels — kiyyor (basin), dud (kettle), qallachat (caldron), parur (pot) — are listed exhaustively to show that no offering escaped the priests' grab. The randomness of the fork thrust adds insult: the priest does not even choose specific portions but takes whatever comes up, treating the sacred offering as a grab bag. The phrase 'to all the Israelites' (lekhoh Yisra'el) underlines that this was systematic, not occasional.
15. This escalates the offense. The fat (chelev) belonged exclusively to the LORD — burning it on the altar was non-negotiable (Leviticus 3:16: 'all the fat belongs to the LORD'). By demanding raw meat before the fat was burned, Eli's sons were not merely taking more than their share — they were claiming priority over God Himself. The demand for raw rather than boiled meat suggests they wanted choice cuts to prepare as they pleased, not the boiled remnants the normal priestly portion allowed.
16. The worshiper's request is modest and pious: just let God's portion be burned first, then take what you want. The servant's response — lo, ki attah titten ('No, you will give it now') — is a direct assertion of priestly power over divine right. The final threat, laqachti bechozqah ('I will take it by force'), turns the sanctuary into a scene of coercion. The place of worship becomes a place of robbery.
17. The verb ni'atzu ('they treated with contempt, they spurned') is the narrator's verdict. The Hebrew ni'ets means to show utter disrespect, to treat as worthless. The irony is layered: Eli's sons, the benei beliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness'), treat God's offering as worthless. The result is that the people themselves begin to 'abhor' the sacrificial system — priestly corruption makes worship repulsive to the worshipers.
18. The contrast with the preceding verses is sharp and deliberate. Against the backdrop of priestly corruption, the narrator presents a child faithfully serving God. The linen ephod (efod bad) is priestly garment — the same kind worn by the high priest (Exodus 28:6-14) and by David when he danced before the ark (2 Samuel 6:14). That a boy wears it signals his priestly consecration and foreshadows his role as the faithful servant Eli's sons refused to be.
19. The me'il qaton ('small robe') is a tender detail: Hannah makes a priestly robe sized for a growing boy. The word me'il is the same used for the high priest's robe (Exodus 28:31) and for the robe of the ghostly Samuel that the witch of Endor sees (1 Sam 28:14). Each year Hannah measures her absent son's growth by the size of the robe she sews. The phrase miyamim yamimah ('from days to days,' i.e., year to year) marks the rhythm of faithful, quiet devotion.

20. Eli's blessing uses a wordplay on sha'al ('to ask, to request') — the same root behind Samuel's name. The phrase ha-she'elah asher sha'al ('the petition that was asked') echoes Hannah's original request in 1:27. Eli prays that God will repay Hannah's gift with more children. The word tachat ('in place of, in exchange for') frames Samuel's dedication as a transaction of faith: Hannah gave her firstborn to God, and God will give back abundantly.
21. The verb paqad ('attended to, visited, remembered') is a theologically loaded term indicating God's active intervention — the same verb used when God 'remembered' Sarah (Genesis 21:1) and 'attended to' Israel in Egypt (Exodus 4:31). Five more children confirm that Hannah's barrenness was not biological fate but divine timing.
21. The phrase vayyigdal hanna'ar Shemu'el im YHWH ('the boy Samuel grew up with the LORD') is striking: 'with the LORD' (im YHWH) suggests companionship, not merely location. Samuel grows up in God's presence as other children grow up in their parents' home.
22. The sin escalates from theft to sexual exploitation. The women 'who served' (ha-tzove'ot) at the tent entrance had a recognized role in tabernacle service (cf. Exodus 38:8). Eli's sons used their priestly position to prey on women in religious service — an abuse of sacred trust. The note that Eli 'heard' (shama) but did not act becomes the basis of his judgment: knowledge without correction is complicity.
23. Eli's rebuke begins with a question rather than a command: 'Why do you do such things?' The phrasing reveals a father who reasons with corrupt sons rather than exercising his authority as high priest to remove them. The phrase divreichem ra'im ('your evil words/deeds' — davar can mean both) coming 'from all the people' (me'et kol ha'am) shows that the corruption is public knowledge. Everyone knows; only Eli hesitates to act decisively.
24. Eli's correction is remarkably mild: 'the report is not good' is an understatement for sacrilege and sexual predation. The verb ma'avirim ('causing to cross over, causing to transgress') reveals the deeper damage: the priests' corruption does not merely offend God — it leads the people themselves into sin. When those responsible for holiness become corrupt, the entire community's relationship with God is poisoned.
25. Eli's theological reasoning is sound — sin against God has no higher court of appeal — but it comes too late and too gently. The verb pilelo ('mediate, judge, arbitrate') suggests God as arbiter in human disputes, but when the offense is directly against God, the mediating structure collapses.
25. The narrator's explanation — ki chafetz YHWH lahamitam ('because the LORD intended to put them to death') — is one of the most theologically difficult statements in Samuel. It does not mean God caused their corruption; rather, their corruption had reached a point where God's purpose was now their judgment. The verb chafetz ('desired, intended, was pleased to') indicates divine resolve, not arbitrary cruelty. Their refusal to repent sealed their fate.
26. This verse echoes the description of the young Moses (Exodus 2:10) and anticipates the description of Jesus in Luke 2:52 ('And Jesus increased in wisdom and in stature, and in favor with God and people'). The phrase holekh vegadel vatov ('going and growing and good') uses three participles in sequence to describe steady, continuous development. The double 'with' (im YHWH ve-gam im anashim) places Samuel in right relationship in both directions — toward God and toward the community — in direct contrast to Eli's sons, who had right relationship with neither.
27. The 'man of God' (ish Elohim) is unnamed — a prophetic figure who delivers God's oracle and disappears from the narrative. The phrase hanigloh nigleti ('did I not clearly reveal Myself') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute construction: the revelation to Aaron's house in Egypt was unmistakable and deliberate. God's point is that Eli's priestly line exists because of divine initiative, not human merit.
28. Three priestly functions are listed: ascending the altar for sacrifice, burning incense, and wearing the ephod. These represent the full scope of priestly service — sacrificial, intercessory, and oracular (the ephod was associated with divine inquiry). God gave all of this to Aaron's line. The phrase kol ishei benei Yisra'el ('all the fire offerings of the sons of Israel') reminds Eli that priestly provisions were God's gift, not something to be seized by force — which is exactly what his sons have been doing.
29. The verb tiv'atu ('you trample, you kick') is the language of an animal kicking against its master — the same verb used in Deuteronomy 32:15 where Israel, grown fat, 'kicked' against God. The accusation vatekhabbed et banekha mimmenni ('you honor your sons above Me') is devastating: Eli's failure to restrain his sons is not passive weakness but active idolatry — he prioritizes his sons' comfort over God's honor. The verb lehavri'akhem ('to fatten yourselves') makes the corruption physical and visceral.
30. The phrase chalilah li ('far be it from Me') expresses God's moral revulsion at the idea of rewarding contempt with continued blessing. The principle mekhabdai akhabbed uvozai yeqallu ('those who honor Me I will honor, and those who despise Me will be disgraced') becomes a governing principle for the entire Deuteronomistic History. The verb yeqallu ('will be made light, will be disgraced') is the opposite of kaved ('to be heavy, to honor') — a wordplay: those who treat God lightly will themselves become lightweights, stripped of dignity and standing.
31. The 'arm' (zero'a) is literally the forearm but metaphorically represents strength and power. 'Cutting off the arm' means destroying the family's capacity to function and thrive. The curse of premature death — 'no old man in your house' — is the opposite of the biblical blessing of long life. The punishment fits the crime: a priestly house that consumed what belonged to God will itself be consumed.
32. This is one of the most difficult verses in the chapter textually. The phrase tsar ma'on is variously translated as 'distress in the dwelling,' 'an adversary in the dwelling,' or 'a rival in the habitation.' The ma'on likely refers to the sanctuary. The painful irony: Israel will prosper, but Eli's house will watch that prosperity from outside, without sharing in it. The repetition of 'no old man in your house' from verse 31 drives the curse home with doubled force.

33. The cruelty of the judgment is that it is not total annihilation but lingering suffering. Some descendants will survive — but only to serve as living reminders of what was lost. The phrase lekhalot et einekha ('to consume your eyes') means to watch helplessly as the family declines. The phrase la'adiv et nafshekha ('to grieve your soul') describes deep, persistent sorrow. The surviving members of Eli's line will live in perpetual mourning.
34. The sign (ot) is a confirming event that validates the larger prophecy. The deaths of Hophni and Phinehas on a single day will prove that the entire oracle is from God. This is fulfilled in 1 Samuel 4:11 when both sons die in the battle where the ark is captured. The naming of both sons — Chofni u-Finchas — makes the prophecy unmistakably specific. There is no ambiguity and no escape.
35. The kohen ne'eman ('faithful priest') stands in direct contrast to the benei beliyya'al of verse 12. The word ne'eman ('faithful, reliable, trustworthy') shares a root with 'amen' — this priest will be an 'amen' to God's will. The phrase ka'asher bilvavi uvenafshi ('according to what is in My heart and in My mind') means the priest's actions will perfectly mirror God's intentions.
35. The term meshichi ('My anointed one') appears again, connecting back to Hannah's prophecy in verse 10. The faithful priest will walk 'before' (lifnei) the anointed king — a relationship of service and proximity. Historically, this is understood as pointing to Zadok, who replaced Abiathar (the last of Eli's line) under Solomon (1 Kings 2:35).
36. The final image is one of complete reversal: the descendants of the high priest, who once seized the best portions of every sacrifice in Israel, will beg for crumbs. The agorot kesef ('a small coin of silver') and kikkar lechem ('a loaf of bread') represent the smallest possible payment. The plea sefacheni na ('please attach me, assign me') uses a verb that means to join oneself to something as an appendage — not as a leader but as the lowest servant. The priests who fattened themselves on God's offerings will produce descendants who starve without them. The prophecy's arc is complete: from contemptuous plenty to humiliated poverty.

Summary: God calls the boy Samuel by name in the night — three times — while Samuel serves under the aging priest Eli at the Shiloh sanctuary. When Samuel finally recognizes the voice as the LORD's, he receives a devastating oracle: judgment is coming against Eli's house for the corruption of his sons, and no sacrifice will ever atone for it. By morning, Samuel must deliver this word to the man who raised him. The chapter closes with Samuel established throughout Israel as a trustworthy prophet of the LORD.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This is the pivotal hinge between the era of the judges and the age of the prophets. The chapter opens with a theological crisis stated in a single devastating line: 'The word of the LORD was rare in those days; prophetic vision was not widespread.' God had, in effect, gone quiet. Into that silence steps a child who does not yet know the LORD — and that is precisely the point. Samuel's three failed recognitions are not comic misunderstanding; they are the portrait of an entire generation that has lost the ability to recognize God's voice. Eli, the priest whose eyes 'had begun to grow dim,' embodies the condition spiritually: the man responsible for mediating God's presence can no longer see clearly, physically or otherwise. The literary architecture is extraordinary — the word chazon ('vision') appears in verse 1 to describe what Israel lacks, and by verse 21 the LORD is again 'revealing Himself' (niglah) at Shiloh. The chapter is the story of how prophetic speech returned to Israel.*

Translation Friction: *The phrase davar YHWH hayah yaqar ('the word of the LORD was rare') uses yaqar, which normally means 'precious, costly, valuable.' We rendered it 'rare' because in context the sense is clearly one of scarcity — prophetic revelation was infrequent — but the Hebrew carries an undertone that what is scarce becomes precious. No single English word captures both meanings. In verse 7, the statement that Samuel 'did not yet know the LORD' (terem yeda et YHWH) is theologically startling — this boy serving in the sanctuary did not have personal experiential knowledge of God. We preserved the directness rather than softening it. The verb niglah ('revealed himself') in verse 21 is the niph'al of galah ('to uncover, to expose'), the same root used for exile and nakedness elsewhere — God's self-revelation involves a divine uncovering, a vulnerability in the act of communication, that English 'revealed' only partially captures.*

Connections: *The opening formula — 'the word of the LORD was rare' — creates a deliberate contrast with the book's ending, where Samuel functions as the established channel of divine communication to all Israel. The call narrative follows the pattern of Moses (Exodus 3) and later prophets: divine initiative, human resistance or confusion, commissioning with a specific message. Eli's response in verse 18, 'He is the LORD; let Him do what seems good to Him,' echoes the resignation theology that appears again in David's mouth during Absalom's revolt (2 Samuel 15:26). The judgment against Eli's house for sins 'that he knew about' (yodea) plays on the chapter's knowledge theme — Samuel did not yet 'know' the LORD (v7), but Eli 'knew' about his sons' wickedness and* failed to act. The verb qara ('to call') appears eleven times in this chapter, structuring the entire narrative around the act of calling — divine calling that requires human response.

¹The boy Samuel was serving the LORD under Eli's supervision. The word of the LORD was rare in those days — prophetic vision was not widespread. ²On that particular day, Eli was lying in his usual place. His eyes had begun to grow weak — he could no longer see well. ³The lamp of God had not yet gone out, and Samuel was lying down in the temple of the LORD, where the ark of God was. ⁴The LORD called out to Samuel, and Samuel said, "Here I am." ⁵He ran to Eli and said, "Here I am — you called me." But Eli said, "I did not call you. Go back and lie down." So he went back and lay down. ⁶The LORD called again: "Samuel!" Samuel got up and went to Eli and said, "Here I am — you called me." Eli replied, "I did not call you, my son. Go back and lie down." ⁷Samuel did not yet know the LORD — the word of the LORD had not yet been revealed to him. ⁸The LORD called Samuel a third time. He got up, went to Eli, and said, "Here I am — you called me." Then Eli understood that it was the LORD calling the boy. ⁹Eli told Samuel, "Go lie down, and if He calls you, say: 'Speak, LORD, for your servant is listening.'" So Samuel went and lay down in his place. ¹⁰The LORD came and stood there, and called as before: "Samuel! Samuel!" And Samuel said, "Speak, for your servant is listening." ¹¹The LORD said to Samuel, "I am about to do something in Israel that will make both ears ring for everyone who hears of it. ¹²On that day I will carry out against Eli everything I have spoken against his house — from beginning to end. ¹³I have declared to him that I am judging his house permanently, because of the guilt that he knew about — his sons were bringing a curse on themselves, and he did not restrain them. ¹⁴Therefore I have sworn to the house of Eli: the guilt of Eli's house will never be atoned for by sacrifice or grain offering." ¹⁵Samuel lay there until morning, then opened the doors of the house of the LORD. Samuel was afraid to tell Eli about the revelation. ¹⁶Eli called to Samuel and said, "Samuel, my son." He answered, "Here I am." ¹⁷Eli said, "What did He say to you? Do not hide it from me. May God deal with you severely — and worse — if you conceal anything from me of all that He spoke to you." ¹⁸Samuel told him everything and hid nothing from him. Eli said, "He is the LORD. Let Him do what is good in His eyes." ¹⁹Samuel grew, and the LORD was with him. He did not let any of Samuel's words fall to the ground. ²⁰All Israel, from Dan to Beersheba, recognized that Samuel was confirmed as a prophet of the LORD. ²¹The LORD continued to appear at Shiloh, because the LORD revealed Himself to Samuel at Shiloh through the word of the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb mesharet ('serving, ministering') is a piel participle indicating ongoing, habitual service — Samuel's role was not a one-time event but an established pattern of temple service under Eli's authority. This is the same verb used of Joshua's service to Moses (Exodus 24:13), establishing a master-apprentice relationship.
1. The adjective yakar applied to davar YHWH ('the word of the LORD') normally means 'precious, costly, rare.' In this context it signals scarcity rather than value — prophetic revelation was infrequent. However, the Hebrew carries both senses simultaneously: what is scarce becomes precious. We chose 'rare' as the primary sense, noting the double meaning here.
1. The phrase ein chazon nifrats ('there was no vision breaking through') uses the niphal of parats ('to break out, to spread, to burst forth'). The image is of prophetic vision as something that should break through like water or light but was being contained or withheld. 'Not widespread' captures the sense that revelation existed but was not flowing freely through Israel's prophetic channels.
2. The detail about Eli's failing eyesight (einav hechelu kehot, 'his eyes had begun to grow dim') operates on two levels. Physically, Eli's advancing age has impaired his vision. But in a chapter about prophetic seeing and the return of chazon ('vision'), the narrator signals that Eli — the man responsible for the sanctuary — can no longer see, literally or figuratively. The verb kehah ('to grow dim, to be faint') is used of failing eyes again in Genesis 27:1 (Isaac) and Deuteronomy 34:7 (where Moses's eyes notably did not grow dim).
2. The phrase bimqomo ('in his place') indicates Eli's customary sleeping location within or adjacent to the sanctuary complex. The narrative carefully establishes where each character is positioned before the night begins.
3. The ner Elohim ('lamp of God') refers to the sanctuary lampstand that burned through the night and was replenished each morning (Exodus 27:20-21, Leviticus 24:2-3). The detail that it 'had not yet gone out' (terem yikhbeh) establishes the time as the pre-dawn hours — the deepest part of night, but with morning approaching. The lamp also functions symbolically: God's light in Israel has not yet been extinguished, though it is burning low.
3. Samuel is sleeping beheikhal YHWH ('in the temple of the LORD'), near the ark of God. This is extraordinary — a boy sleeping in the sacred precinct where the ark rested. His proximity to the ark underscores his special role: he is physically closest to God's dwelling even before he knows the LORD personally. The term heikhal can mean 'temple' or 'palace' and here refers to the tabernacle structure at Shiloh.

4. The verb qara ('to call') appears here for the first of eleven occurrences in this chapter. The LORD calls Samuel by name — not with a title, not through a mediator, but with the personal, direct address that characterizes prophetic commissioning throughout the Hebrew Bible.
4. Samuel's response hinneni ('here I am') is the classic response of availability in the Hebrew Bible — the same word Abraham uses at the binding of Isaac (Genesis 22:1), Moses uses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:4), and Isaiah uses at his commissioning (Isaiah 6:8). Samuel uses it correctly, but to the wrong person — he assumes it is Eli calling. The response is right; the direction is wrong.
5. Samuel's immediate physical response — vayyarats ('and he ran') — shows both the urgency of a servant responding to his master and the boy's assumption that a voice in the night must be Eli. The verb ruts ('to run') conveys eagerness, not panic.
5. Eli's denial lo qarati ('I did not call') is straightforward, and his instruction shuv shekhav ('return, lie down') carries no suspicion or irritation at this point. The brevity of the exchange establishes the pattern that will repeat two more times before recognition comes.
6. The phrase vayyosef YHWH qero od ('the LORD continued to call again') uses the construction yasaf + infinitive, indicating repeated action — God persists. The repetition is not divine frustration but patient pursuit of a boy who does not yet have the framework to understand what is happening.
6. Eli's addition of beni ('my son') introduces warmth into the second denial. The term is both conventional address from an elder to a youth and an expression of Eli's genuine paternal relationship with Samuel — this is the boy Hannah entrusted to him.
7. This parenthetical explanation is one of the most theologically loaded sentences in the chapter. The verb yada ('to know') here does not mean Samuel was ignorant of God's existence — he served in the sanctuary. Rather, yada denotes experiential, personal knowledge: Samuel had not yet encountered God directly. The same verb describes intimate knowledge between persons (Genesis 4:1) and covenantal knowledge between God and Israel (Amos 3:2).
7. The niph'al verb yiggaleh ('was revealed') — from galah ('to uncover') — describes divine self-disclosure as an act of uncovering. God must remove a barrier for the human to perceive. The word of the LORD does not arrive by human effort; it is revealed by divine initiative. This verse explains Samuel's confusion: he could not recognize God's voice because he had never heard it before.
8. The phrase bashshelishit ('the third time') marks the pattern's climax. Three-fold repetition in Hebrew narrative signals completeness and decisiveness — after the third occurrence, something must change. Compare Balaam's three attempts to curse Israel (Numbers 22-24) and Elijah's three-fold pouring of water (1 Kings 18:34).
8. The verb vayaven ('and he understood, and he discerned') from the root bin indicates perceptive insight — Eli grasps what is happening not through information but through discernment. Despite his physical and spiritual decline, Eli retains enough prophetic awareness to recognize that God is speaking to Samuel. This moment is both Eli's last act of priestly wisdom and his acknowledgment that the prophetic mantle is passing to the boy.
9. Eli's instruction — dabber YHWH ki shomea avdekha ('Speak, LORD, for your servant is listening') — gives Samuel the words to respond to divine address. The imperative dabber ('speak') directed at God is remarkable: a human commanding the Almighty to speak. Yet it is framed by submission — avdekha ('your servant') — making it a request wrapped in obedience. Eli teaches Samuel the posture of a prophet: receptive, available, subordinate.
9. The verb shomea ('listening, hearing') is a participle indicating continuous readiness — not 'your servant heard' (past) or 'will hear' (future) but 'is hearing, is in the act of listening.' The prophetic posture is one of ongoing attentiveness.
9. The poignancy of this moment is layered: Eli, who will receive the judgment Samuel is about to hear, is the one who teaches Samuel how to hear from God. He enables the very communication that will announce his own family's destruction.
10. The verbs vayyavo YHWH vayyityatsav ('the LORD came and stood') describe a physical, localized divine presence — God does not merely project a voice but arrives and takes a position. The hitpael of yatsav ('to station oneself, to take a stand') implies deliberate positioning. This is a theophany — a divine appearance — not merely an auditory experience.
10. The doubled name Shemuel Shemuel ('Samuel! Samuel!') is the form of urgent, personal divine address used at critical moments: Avraham Avraham (Genesis 22:11), Moshe Moshe (Exodus 3:4), and later Shaul Shaul (Acts 9:4 in the Greek tradition). The doubling signals both intimacy and gravity — God knows this boy by name and is about to entrust him with a terrible message.
10. Samuel follows Eli's script almost exactly but omits the divine name — dabber ki shomea avdekha ('Speak, for your servant is listening') rather than dabber YHWH. Whether this is reverence, nervousness, or the narrator's editorial choice is debated. Some manuscripts and versions include the name; the Masoretic text omits it.
11. The phrase tetsillenah shetzi oznav ('both his ears will ring') uses the verb tsalal ('to ring, to tingle, to quiver'). The image is of news so shocking that it produces a physical sensation — a ringing in the ears. This exact phrase recurs only twice more in the Hebrew Bible: in 2 Kings 21:12 (judgment on Jerusalem through Manasseh) and Jeremiah 19:3 (the Babylonian destruction). Each instance announces catastrophic, irreversible divine judgment. By using this formula, God signals to Samuel that what follows is not correction but devastation.
11. The pronoun anokhi ('I myself') rather than the shorter ani ('I') adds weight and formality to the divine announcement. God emphasizes personal agency: this is something I am doing, not something that will merely happen.
12. The phrase hachel vekhallel ('beginning and finishing') uses two infinitive absolutes to express totality and irreversibility. God will not partially execute the judgment or leave it incomplete. The construction emphasizes that once the process begins, it will reach its full conclusion. This is not a warning that can be averted; it is an announcement of what will be.

12. The verb aqim ('I will raise up, I will establish, I will carry out') from qum is the same verb used for establishing covenants (Genesis 6:18, 17:7). Here it is used for establishing judgment — God's destructive word is as certain as God's creative word. What God speaks, God performs.
13. The phrase ad olam ('forever, permanently') intensifies the judgment beyond a single generation — this is not temporary discipline but permanent removal of Eli's line from the priesthood. The fulfillment comes in stages: Hophni and Phinehas die in chapter 4, and Eli's priestly line is eventually displaced by Zadok under Solomon (1 Kings 2:27).
13. The crux of Eli's guilt is stated precisely: ba'avon asher yada ('because of the guilt that he knew about'). Eli's sin was not ignorance but inaction — he had knowledge (yada, the same verb from verse 7) of his sons' corruption and failed to exercise his authority. The contrast with Samuel is pointed: Samuel did not yet know (yada) the LORD, but Eli knew (yada) about the sin and did nothing.
13. The participle meqalelim ('cursing, bringing a curse on themselves') is a textual crux. The Masoretic Qere reads meqalelim lahem ('cursing for themselves' — bringing a curse upon themselves), while a scribal tradition (tiqqun soferim) suggests the original read meqalelim Elohim ('cursing God'). The scribes may have softened the text to avoid the direct blasphemy of 'cursing God.' We followed the Masoretic reading while noting the tradition.
14. The oath formula im yitkapper ('if it shall be atoned' — used as an emphatic negation, 'it shall certainly not be atoned') employs the hitpael of kaphar ('to cover, to atone'). This is devastating because the entire sacrificial system that Eli's family administered was designed precisely to provide atonement. God declares that the system the priests operate cannot save the priests themselves. The instrument of atonement is powerless against the guilt of those who corrupted it.
14. The pairing of zevach ('sacrifice' — blood offerings) and minchah ('grain offering' — non-blood offerings) covers the full spectrum of the sacrificial system. No category of offering can address this guilt. The phrase ad olam ('forever, in perpetuity') mirrors the same phrase in verse 13 — the judgment is permanent, and so is the impossibility of atonement through ritual means.
14. This verse has profound theological implications: it establishes that sacrifice is not mechanically effective. Ritual without integrity does not produce atonement. This principle recurs in the prophets (Isaiah 1:11-15, Hosea 6:6, Amos 5:21-24) and is foundational to the broader biblical theology of worship.
15. The detail that Samuel opened the doors (vayyiftach et daltot beit YHWH) shows him resuming his normal duties — the mundane act of opening the sanctuary doors after receiving the most devastating prophetic oracle. The boy who heard God's voice in the night returns to his routine, now carrying a burden he did not ask for. The juxtaposition of cosmic revelation and daily chores is characteristically biblical.
15. The noun mar'ah ('vision, revelation, appearance') is related to the root ra'ah ('to see') rather than chazah (the root of chazon in verse 1). This subtle vocabulary shift suggests Samuel's experience was more than auditory — it included a visual or perceptual component, consistent with the theophanic language of verse 10 where God 'came and stood.'
15. Samuel's fear (yare, 'was afraid') is not cowardice but the natural response of a boy who must deliver a death sentence to the man who raised him. The narrator does not judge Samuel for his reluctance; he simply notes it.
16. Now it is Eli who calls (vayyiqra) and Samuel who responds hinneni ('here I am'). The reversal from the night's pattern is significant — where God called and Samuel ran to Eli, now Eli calls and Samuel responds to Eli. The verb qara here is the same verb used of God's calling throughout the chapter, and the irony is acute: Eli calls to hear the word that God called to deliver.
16. Eli's address Shemuel beni ('Samuel, my son') combines the personal name with the paternal title, matching verse 6. The tenderness is painful given what Samuel must say next.
17. Eli invokes a formal oath curse: koh ya'aseh lekha Elohim vekhoh yosif ('thus may God do to you and thus may He add'). This is a standard oath formula in the historical books (1 Samuel 14:44, 20:13, 2 Samuel 3:9, 1 Kings 2:23), always invoking unspecified but severe divine punishment for breaking the oath's condition. The threat is left vague intentionally — the imagination fills in what the formula leaves open.
17. The verb tekhachad ('to hide, to conceal, to deny') from the root kachad appears twice in this verse, framing Eli's demand. He uses the word davar ('word, thing, matter') three times — mah haddavar ('what is the word'), im tekhachad davar ('if you conceal a word'), and kol haddavar ('all the word'). Eli wants the complete, unedited message. He already suspects it concerns his house.
17. Eli's demand reveals his character at its most complex: he is the failed father and the compromised priest, but he is also the man who insists on hearing the full truth of God's judgment against himself. He does not let Samuel protect him from the word.
18. The phrase vayyagged lo et kol haddevarim velo kiched mimmennu ('he told him all the words and did not conceal from him') directly answers Eli's demand from verse 17, using the same key verbs (nagad, 'to tell'; kachad, 'to conceal'). Samuel passes his first prophetic test: faithfully delivering the complete word of God regardless of personal cost.
18. Eli's response — YHWH hu hattov be'einav ya'aseh ('He is the LORD; the good in His eyes let Him do') — is a statement of theological submission that can be read as either profound faith or resigned fatalism. The phrase hattov be'einav ('what is good in His eyes') affirms that God's judgment is inherently just — what God sees as right is right. This same theology appears in David's response during Absalom's revolt: 'Let Him do to me what is good in His eyes' (2 Samuel 15:26). Whether Eli speaks from trust or exhaustion, the words themselves are theologically sound: the LORD's prerogative to act according to His own assessment is absolute.

- 19. The idiom velo hippil mikkol devarav artsah ('he did not let any of his words fall to the ground') is one of the most vivid images for prophetic reliability in the Hebrew Bible. The verb naphal ('to fall') pictures words as physical objects that either reach their target or drop uselessly to the earth. When God ensures that none of Samuel's words 'fall,' it means every prophetic utterance was fulfilled — nothing Samuel said proved empty or failed. This idiom recurs in 2 Kings 10:10 regarding Elijah's words.
- 19. The phrase vaYHWH hayah immo ('and the LORD was with him') is the covenant-presence formula used of Joseph (Genesis 39:2, 21), Joshua (Joshua 6:27), and David (1 Samuel 18:14). It signals divine favor expressed through observable success and guidance. For Samuel, God's presence means prophetic accuracy — the ultimate credential for a prophet in Israel (Deuteronomy 18:21-22).
- 20. The phrase middan ve'ad Be'er Shava ('from Dan to Beersheba') is the standard biblical merism for the full extent of Israel's settled territory, from the northernmost city to the southernmost. Its use here indicates that Samuel's prophetic reputation was not local but national in scope.
- 20. The niph'al participle ne'eman ('confirmed, faithful, trustworthy, established') from the root aleph-mem-nun ('to be firm, to be reliable') is a rich term. It describes both God's confirmation of Samuel's role and the observable trustworthiness that Israel witnessed. A ne'eman prophet is one whose words consistently prove true — the same root gives us 'amen' (a declaration of trustworthiness) and 'emunah' (faithfulness). Samuel is not merely called a prophet; he is a proven one.
- 20. The title navi ('prophet') appears here for the first time in connection with Samuel. The word navi likely derives from a root meaning 'to call' or 'to announce' — one who is called by God to announce God's word. Samuel's commissioning in this chapter fulfills the pattern: God called, Samuel listened, and now all Israel knows him as the one through whom God speaks.
- 21. The verb vayyosef ('he continued') — the same construction from verses 6 and 8 where God 'continued to call' — now describes ongoing divine self-revelation. The God who persisted in calling a confused boy three times now persists in appearing at Shiloh. The verb's recurrence links the one night to a pattern of continued revelation.
- 21. The niph'al niglah ('he revealed himself') from galah ('to uncover') echoes verse 7, where the word of the LORD had 'not yet been revealed' (terem yiggaleh) to Samuel. The chapter's trajectory is now complete: from 'not yet revealed' (v7) to 'revealed himself' (v21). What was absent is now present; what was closed is now open.
- 21. The phrase bidvar YHWH ('through the word of the LORD') brings the chapter full circle to verse 1, where davar YHWH ('the word of the LORD') was declared rare. The same construct phrase that opened the chapter in scarcity now closes it in abundance. Shiloh has become what it was meant to be: a place where God speaks and is heard.

Summary: Israel goes to war against the Philistines and suffers a devastating defeat at Ebenezer. The elders fetch the Ark of the Covenant from Shiloh, expecting it to guarantee victory, but Israel is routed again — thirty thousand foot soldiers fall. The Ark is captured, Eli's sons Hophni and Phinehas are killed, and when the news reaches Shiloh, the ninety-eight-year-old priest Eli falls from his seat, breaks his neck, and dies. Phinehas's wife goes into labor, names her son Ichabod — 'no glory' — and dies declaring that the glory has departed from Israel.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter narrates the single most catastrophic event in Israel's pre-monarchic history: the capture of the Ark of the Covenant by a foreign power. The Ark was the visible throne of God's presence — the place where the LORD sat enthroned between the cherubim. Its loss is not merely a military defeat but a theological crisis: has Israel's God been defeated? Has the covenant failed? The name Ichabod (i-kavod, 'where is the glory?' or 'no glory') becomes the chapter's devastating thesis statement. Yet the narrator is careful to distinguish between the Ark as an object and the God who dwells above it — Israel tried to wield God's presence as a weapon, and the result was not divine defeat but divine judgment on Israel's presumption.*

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew text of verse 1 presents a well-known textual difficulty: the Masoretic Text begins with Samuel's word going out to all Israel, but the Septuagint (LXX) and some Dead Sea Scrolls manuscripts include additional material placing this after the events of chapter 3. We follow the MT while noting the discrepancy. In verse 8, the Philistines refer to 'these mighty gods' (elohim addirim) — the plural is ambiguous since elohim can be singular ('God') or plural ('gods'); the Philistines, as polytheists, hear it as plural. The word kavod ('glory') in Ichabod's naming demands an expanded rendering because its theological weight far exceeds the English word 'glory' — it carries connotations of weight, substance, visible radiance, and the tangible manifestation of God's presence.*

Connections: The capture of the Ark fulfills the judgment pronounced against Eli's house in chapters 2-3: both sons die 'on a single day' as foretold (2:34). The Philistines' terrified memory of 'the gods who struck Egypt with every kind of plague' (v. 8) connects back to the Exodus narrative — but now the roles are reversed: Israel behaves like Egypt, presuming on God's presence rather than submitting to His will. The Ark's journey into Philistine territory will continue in chapters 5-6, where the LORD demonstrates that His power is not diminished by capture — He devastates the Philistines from within their own temples. The glory that 'departed' from Israel is not destroyed but displaced; it operates independently of Israel's control, which is precisely the theological point.

¹The word of Samuel went out to all Israel. Israel marched out to meet the Philistines in battle and camped near Ebenezer, while the Philistines camped at Aphek. ²The Philistines drew up their battle lines against Israel. The fighting spread, and Israel was struck down before the Philistines, who killed about four thousand men on the battlefield. ³When the troops returned to the camp, the elders of Israel said, "Why did the LORD let us be struck down today before the Philistines? Let us bring the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD from Shiloh so that it may come among us and deliver us from the grip of our enemies." ⁴So the people sent to Shiloh and brought from there the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD of Armies, who is enthroned above the cherubim. Eli's two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, were there with the Ark of the Covenant of God. ⁵When the Ark of the Covenant of the LORD came into the camp, all Israel raised a tremendous war cry, and the ground shook. ⁶The Philistines heard the sound of the war cry and said, "What is this tremendous shouting in the camp of the Hebrews?" When they learned that the Ark of the LORD had come into the camp, ⁷the Philistines were terrified. They said, "A god has come into the camp!" Then they said, "This is disaster for us! Nothing like this has happened before. ⁸This is disaster for us! Who can rescue us from the power of these mighty gods? These are the gods who struck Egypt with every kind of plague in the wilderness." ⁹"Be strong! Act like warriors, Philistines, or you will serve the Hebrews as they have served you. Fight like warriors and engage!" ¹⁰The Philistines fought, and Israel was crushed. Every man fled to his tent. The slaughter was immense — thirty thousand Israelite foot soldiers fell. ¹¹The Ark of God was captured, and Eli's two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, were killed. ¹²A man from the tribe of Benjamin ran from the battle line and reached Shiloh that same day, his clothes torn and dirt on his head. ¹³When he arrived, there was Eli, sitting on his chair beside the road, watching — because his heart was trembling over the Ark of God. ¹⁴When Eli heard the sound of the outcry, he asked, "What is this uproar?" The man hurried over and reported to Eli. ¹⁵Eli was ninety-eight years old, and his eyes were fixed — he could not see. ¹⁶The man said to Eli, "I am the one who came from the battle line — I fled from the fighting today." Eli said, "What happened, my son?" ¹⁷The messenger answered, "Israel fled before the Philistines. There has been a massive slaughter among the troops. Your two sons, Hophni and Phinehas, are dead. And the Ark of God has been captured." ¹⁸When he mentioned the Ark of God, Eli fell backward off his chair beside the gate. His neck broke and he died, because the man was old and heavy. He had judged Israel for forty years. ¹⁹His daughter-in-law, the wife of Phinehas, was pregnant and near her time. When she heard the report that the Ark of God was captured and that her father-in-law and her husband were dead, she collapsed and went into labor, because her contractions overwhelmed her. ²⁰As she was dying, the women attending her said, "Do not be afraid — you have given birth to a son!" But she did not respond, and she paid no attention. ²¹She named the boy Ichabod, saying, "The glory has gone into exile from Israel" — because the Ark of God was captured, and because of her father-in-law and her husband. ²²She said, "The glory has gone into exile from Israel, because the Ark of God has been captured."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening clause vayyehi devar-Shemu'el lekhol-Yisra'el ('the word of Samuel came to all Israel') appears to connect to Samuel's prophetic authority established in chapter 3, yet the narrative immediately shifts to a battle in which Samuel plays no role. The Septuagint and 4QSam-a place this clause differently, suggesting early scribal uncertainty about its placement. The MT as it stands creates an ironic juxtaposition: Samuel's word has authority, but Israel does not consult him before going to war.
1. Ebenezer (Even ha-Ezer, 'stone of help') is named proleptically — the name will not be given until 7:12 when Samuel raises a memorial stone after a future victory. The narrator uses the later name for the reader's orientation. Aphek was a strategic Philistine staging ground in the coastal plain, controlling the route into the central hill country.

2. The verb vayyinnagef ('was struck down') is a passive form of nagaf, frequently used for divine judgment — the same root describes the plagues that 'struck' Egypt (Exodus 12:23, 27). The narrator's word choice hints that this defeat is not merely military misfortune but carries a theological dimension. Israel is struck as Egypt once was.
2. The phrase ba-ma'arakhah ba-sadeh ('in the battle line, in the field') indicates open-field combat — Israel was defeated in conventional warfare before the idea of fetching the Ark arose. Four thousand casualties in a single engagement would have been catastrophic for a tribal militia.
3. The elders correctly attribute the defeat to the LORD (negafanu YHWH, 'the LORD struck us') — they recognize divine agency. But their solution bypasses the prophetic channel entirely. They do not ask Samuel, do not inquire of God, and do not consider repentance. Their plan treats the Ark as an instrument they can control.
3. The phrase aron berit-YHWH ('Ark of the Covenant of the LORD') uses the full covenantal title — the Ark represents the binding agreement between God and Israel. Yet the elders treat it as a military asset rather than a covenant symbol. The verb yasha ('to save, deliver') applied to the Ark rather than to God reveals the displacement: they expect the container to do what only its Occupant can do.
4. The divine title YHWH Tseva'ot ('the LORD of Armies') appears here for the first time in the narrative connected to the Ark — it is a military title emphasizing God's sovereignty over both heavenly and earthly forces. The phrase yoshev ha-keruvim ('who sits/is enthroned upon the cherubim') describes the Ark's lid as God's throne — the two golden cherubim on the mercy seat formed the base of an invisible throne. God's presence was understood to dwell in the space above and between them.
4. The mention of Hophni and Phinehas is ominous: the reader already knows from 2:34 that their death on a single day will be the sign confirming judgment on Eli's house. Their presence with the Ark marks them for the fulfillment about to unfold. The narrator names them almost as a death notice in advance.
5. The teru'ah gedolah ('great shout') is a ritual war cry — the same term used for the shout that toppled Jericho's walls (Joshua 6:5, 20). Israel is reenacting the pattern of holy war: the Ark arrives, the war cry goes up, victory follows. But here the pattern will fail because the conditions of holy war — obedience, divine commission, prophetic guidance — have not been met.
5. The phrase vattehem ha-arets ('the earth resounded/shook') conveys the physical force of the sound — tens of thousands shouting in unison. The verb hamah means to murmur, roar, or reverberate. The ground itself trembled with the noise, creating an impression of overwhelming power. The irony is devastating: the sound is enormous, but the substance behind it is hollow.
6. The Philistines call the Israelites ivrim ('Hebrews') — the outsider's term for Israel, used throughout the Philistine encounters in 1 Samuel. The word ivri may derive from the root avar ('to cross over') or from the ancestor Eber. In the Philistine mouth it functions as an ethnic label without covenant connotations — they see Israel as a neighboring people, not as God's covenant partner.
6. The Philistines' intelligence is sharp: they correctly identify the shout as connected to the Ark's arrival. They understand the military-religious significance even if they misinterpret the theology behind it. Their fear in the next verse shows they know the stories of Israel's God.
7. The Philistine exclamation ba elohim el-ha-machaneh ('a god/God has come into the camp') uses elohim ambiguously — the Philistines, as polytheists, likely understand it as 'a god' or 'divine power' rather than as Israel's specific covenant God. The narrator lets their pagan perspective stand without correction.
7. The phrase etmol shilshom (literally 'yesterday, three days ago') is an idiom meaning 'previously, in the past, before now.' The Philistines recognize this battle has changed in character — a supernatural element has entered. Their fear is genuine and their assessment is technically correct: God's Ark is present. What they cannot know is that the Ark's presence does not guarantee God's fighting on Israel's behalf.
8. The Philistines use ha-elohim ha-addirim ha-elleh ('these mighty gods') — the plural adjective addirim ('mighty, majestic') paired with elohim reveals they interpret Israel's God through their own polytheistic framework. They imagine multiple deities. The narrator does not correct them; the irony speaks for itself.
8. The phrase ha-makkim et-Mitsrayim bekhoh-makkah ba-midbar ('the ones striking Egypt with every plague in the wilderness') shows the Philistines know the Exodus tradition — but garble it. The plagues struck Egypt in Egypt, not 'in the wilderness.' The Philistines have heard the stories but conflate the Egyptian plagues with wilderness events. Their theology is wrong, but their fear of Israel's God is well-founded — just not for the reasons they think in this particular battle.
8. The word makkah ('blow, plague, strike') shares the root nakah ('to strike') — the Philistines remember God as the one who strikes, which is precisely what makes the Ark's presence terrifying to them.
9. The Philistine commanders rally their troops with hitchazzqu vihyu la-anashim ('be strong and be men') — the same exhortation vocabulary used in Israel's own holy war traditions (Deuteronomy 31:6, Joshua 1:6). The verb avad ('to serve') carries the double meaning of military subjugation and slavery: 'lest you serve the Hebrews as they served you.' The Philistines had dominated Israel, and the fear of role reversal drives their courage.
9. The repetition vihyitem la-anashim venilchamtem ('be men and fight') hammers the point: fear of the gods is real, but the alternative — servitude — is worse. The Philistine response to theological terror is pragmatic: fight anyway. Remarkably, this desperate courage will be rewarded — not because the Philistines are righteous, but because God is not fighting for Israel this day.
10. The verb vayyinnagef ('was struck down') repeats from verse 2, but now the scale is catastrophic: sheloshim elef ragli ('thirty thousand foot soldiers') — nearly eight times the first defeat. The phrase vayyanusu ish le-ohalav ('each man fled to his tent') signals total rout: the army dissolves, every soldier running for survival. 'To his tent' is an idiom for total military dissolution — the army ceases to exist as a fighting force.

10. The narrator calls this ha-makkah gedolah me'od ('a very great blow/slaughter') — the same root makkah the Philistines used to describe God's plagues on Egypt (v. 8). The linguistic echo is bitter: the plague-blow now falls on Israel rather than on their enemies.
11. The verb nilqach ('was taken, was captured') is a passive form of laqach — the Ark did not fall; it was seized. The passive voice leaves the agent ambiguous: the Philistines took it, but God permitted it. This ambiguity is theologically essential — the Ark's capture is simultaneously a Philistine military act and a divine judgment on Israel.
11. The deaths of Hophni and Phinehas fulfill 2:34 precisely. The narrator reports their deaths with the same compression used for Elimelech's death in Ruth 1:3 — brevity as a literary expression of catastrophe. No details of how they died, no last words, no burial. They simply metu ('died').
12. The Benjaminite runner is an unnamed figure whose sole function is to carry the worst news in Israel's memory. His appearance tells the story before his mouth opens: maddav qeru'im va-adamah al-rosho ('his garments torn and earth upon his head') — both are conventional signs of mourning and catastrophe. Torn clothing signifies that the fabric of normal life has been ripped apart; earth on the head symbolizes identification with death and the grave.
12. The phrase bayyom hahu ('that same day') emphasizes speed — the distance from the Aphek/Ebenezer battlefield to Shiloh is roughly twenty miles through hill country. The runner covered this distance in a single day, driven by the urgency of the disaster. His tribal identity as a Benjaminite is noted — Benjamin's territory lay between the battlefield and Shiloh.
13. The scene of Eli is deeply affecting: yoshev al-ha-kisse yad derekh metsappeh ('sitting on a seat beside the road, watching'). The old priest, nearly blind (3:2), sits by the roadside straining for news. The verb tsaphah ('to watch, look out, keep watch') implies anxious vigilance — Eli is a watchman who can barely see.
13. The phrase ki-hayah libbo charad al aron ha-Elohim ('because his heart was trembling concerning the Ark of God') reveals Eli's priorities: despite his failures, his deepest anxiety is for God's Ark, not for his sons. The verb charad ('to tremble, to be anxious, to quake') describes the visceral, physical dread of one who knows that something irreversible may be happening. Eli's trembling heart anticipates the news that will kill him.
14. Eli hears before he sees — his failing eyes cannot make out the runner, but his ears catch the qol ha-tse'aqah ('sound of the outcry'). The word tse'aqah is not ordinary noise; it is the cry of distress, the same word used for Israel's anguished cry in Egypt (Exodus 3:7). The entire city of Shiloh erupts in wailing as the news spreads, and this collective cry reaches Eli before the messenger does.
14. The word hamon ('tumult, uproar, crowd noise') describes the confused, roaring sound of a community in crisis. Eli's question meh qol hehamon hazzeh ('what is this uproar?') parallels the Philistines' question in verse 6 — both sides hear sounds they cannot immediately interpret, but the meanings are reversed: the Philistines heard a shout of confidence, Eli hears a cry of devastation.
15. The phrase ve'einav qamu (literally 'and his eyes had stood still, were fixed') describes eyes that no longer function — they are set, rigid, staring without sight. This is a more severe condition than the dimness mentioned in 3:2; Eli is now effectively blind. The physical detail serves a literary purpose: the man responsible for watching over God's house in Israel can no longer see. His physical blindness mirrors the spiritual blindness that allowed his sons to corrupt the priesthood.
15. At ninety-eight, Eli has served as priest and judge for decades. His age underscores both his long tenure and his physical frailty — the coming fall will be fatal precisely because his body cannot absorb the shock.
16. The runner identifies himself twice: ani habba min-ha-ma'arakhah ('I am the one coming from the battle line') and va-ani min-ha-ma'arakhah nasti hayyom ('and I fled from the battle line today'). The double identification and the admission of flight (nasti, 'I fled') convey the breathless urgency and perhaps shame of a survivor reporting total defeat.
16. Eli's response meh-hayah ha-davar beni ('what happened, my son?') is painfully tender. He addresses the stranger as beni ('my son') — the same term he used for his own sons. The question ha-davar ('the thing, the matter, the word') is open-ended: 'What has the word been?' Eli asks for the report while dreading it.
17. The messenger is called ha-mevasser ('the bearer of news') — a word that can mean either good or bad tidings depending on context. In 2 Samuel 18:19-33, the same term delivers news of Absalom's death to David. Here the mevasser brings only devastation.
17. The four-part structure is rhetorically precise: nas Yisra'el ('Israel fled'), maggefah gedolah ('a great plague/slaughter'), shenei vanekha metu ('your two sons died'), va-aron ha-Elohim nilqachah ('the Ark of God was captured'). Each vegam ('and also') raises the stakes. The word maggefah ('plague, blow, slaughter') echoes the plague language of verses 8 and 10, binding the entire chapter together with the vocabulary of divine striking.
18. The verb vayyipol ('he fell') from the root nafal describes an uncontrolled collapse — Eli topples backward (achorannit) off the chair beside the gate. The mafrekhet ('neck, cervical vertebrae') broke on impact. The detail ki-zaqen ha-ish vekhaved ('because the man was old and heavy') explains why the fall was fatal — an elderly, heavy man falling backward from a seated height suffers an impact that younger bones might survive.
18. The notice vehu shafat et-Yisra'el arba'im shanah ('and he had judged Israel forty years') serves as Eli's obituary — the conventional formula for a judge's tenure (cf. Judges 3:11, 5:31, 8:28). Forty years is a generation. Despite his failures with his sons, Eli served Israel for a full generational span.
19. Three blows strike Phinehas's wife simultaneously: the Ark's capture, her father-in-law's death, and her husband's death. The verb vattikhra ('she crouched, collapsed, bowed down') describes her body folding under the combined weight of grief and labor. The phrase ki-nehefkhu aleiha tsireiha ('because her labor pains turned upon her') uses the verb hafakh ('to turn, to overturn') — her contractions 'turned against her,' suggesting labor that is violent and premature, triggered by shock.

19. The narrator lists the Ark first among the causes of her distress, maintaining the chapter's pattern: the Ark's fate is the supreme catastrophe, surpassing even personal bereavement.
20. The attending women (ha-nitsavot aleiha, 'the ones standing over her') offer the conventional consolation for a woman in dangerous labor: al-tir'i ki ven yaladt ('do not fear, for you have borne a son'). A son was the highest blessing — an heir, a future, a name preserved. But Phinehas's wife is beyond consolation.
20. The double negative velo antah velo satah libbah ('she did not answer and her heart did not attend') describes a woman who has retreated beyond human communication. The verb satah (from shit, 'to set, place, direct') means she did not set her heart toward the news — the birth of a son, normally the supreme joy, registers as nothing against the loss of the Ark. Her response mirrors Eli's: the Ark's fate eclipses personal loss.
21. The verb galah ('to depart, to go into exile, to be stripped bare') is the primary Hebrew verb for exile — it describes the forced removal of a population from its homeland. Using it for the kavod personifies God's glory as an exile, a captive carried away from its rightful place. This verb choice transforms the Ark's capture from a military event into a theological exile.
21. The narrator maintains the chapter's hierarchy of grief: the Ark is listed first (el-hillaqach aron ha-Elohim), then her father-in-law, then her husband. Even in dying, this woman's priorities mirror Eli's — the loss of God's presence outweighs the loss of family.
22. The repetition of galah kavod mi-Yisra'el ('the glory has gone into exile from Israel') from verse 21 functions as a refrain — a dying woman's last words fixed on a single, overwhelming reality. The simplification from verse 21 (which mentioned three causes) to verse 22 (which mentions only the Ark) reveals her theological clarity: the Ark's loss is the essential catastrophe. Everything else — her husband, her father-in-law, even the thirty thousand dead — is secondary to the departure of God's presence.
22. The chapter ends abruptly after her words. There is no transition, no narrator's comment, no resolution. The reader is left with the raw force of her declaration hanging in the air. The next chapter will show that the kavod is not destroyed — only displaced — but the narrator allows this chapter to close in total darkness.

Summary: The Philistines capture the Ark of God and place it in the temple of Dagon at Ashdod. Dagon falls face-down before the Ark — twice — and the second time his head and hands break off at the threshold. The LORD strikes Ashdod with tumors, then Gath, then Ekron, as the Philistines desperately shuttle the Ark from city to city, unable to keep it and unable to escape its power.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter records one of the most theologically striking episodes in the Hebrew Bible: God fights entirely without Israel. The Ark has been captured, Israel is defeated and leaderless, and yet the LORD wages war against Philistia's chief deity and its cities single-handedly. Dagon's collapse before the Ark is not accidental — the verb 'fallen on his face' (nofel al panav) is the posture of worship, as if the idol is compelled to prostrate before the God it was supposed to have conquered. The second fall shatters Dagon, leaving only the 'fish-trunk' (dagon), his hands and head severed on the threshold — the deity is dismembered in his own house. The Philistines learn what Israel forgot in chapter 4: the Ark is not a talisman to be wielded but the throne of a God who acts on His own terms.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew word for the affliction in this chapter is debated. The Ketiv (written text) reads ofalim (meaning 'tumors, swellings'), while the Qere (reading tradition) substitutes techorim ('hemorrhoids' or 'tumors in the rectal area'). The LXX adds that mice ravaged the land, a detail absent from the MT but reflected in the guilt offering of golden mice in chapter 6. We render the term as 'tumors' — broad enough to cover the semantic range without importing a single medical diagnosis. The word miftan ('threshold') in verse 5 generates an etiological note about why Dagon's priests leap over the threshold rather than step on it — the narrator explains a custom still observed 'to this day,' which grounds the story in ongoing Philistine practice.

Connections: The humiliation of Dagon echoes the plagues of Egypt: once again a foreign god is exposed as powerless before the LORD (Exodus 12:12, Numbers 33:4). The Ark's journey through Philistine cities — Ashdod, Gath, Ekron — mirrors a plague narrative in miniature, with each city suffering until it sends the Ark away, just as Pharaoh suffered until he released Israel. The severing of Dagon's hands and head on the threshold inverts the Philistine victory of chapter 4; the captured 'trophy' destroys the captor's god. The Ekronites' cry 'They have brought the Ark of the God of Israel around to us to kill us' echoes the Egyptian cry during the tenth plague (Exodus 12:33).

God's power does not depend on Israel's faithfulness, army, or even awareness — He acts to defend His own name.

¹The Philistines captured the Ark of God and brought it from Ebenezer to Ashdod. ²The Philistines took the Ark of God and brought it into the temple of Dagon, and they set it beside Dagon. ³When the people of Ashdod rose early the next morning, Dagon had fallen face-down on the ground before the Ark of the LORD. They picked Dagon up and put him back in his place. ⁴When they rose early the next morning, Dagon had again fallen face-down on the ground before the Ark of the LORD. The head of Dagon and both palms of his hands had been cut off on the threshold — only the trunk of Dagon remained. ⁵This is why the priests of Dagon and all who enter the temple of Dagon do not step on the threshold of Dagon in Ashdod — to this day. ⁶The hand of the LORD was heavy on the people of Ashdod. He devastated them and struck them with tumors — both Ashdod and its surrounding territory. ⁷When the men of Ashdod saw what was happening, they said, "The Ark of the God of Israel must not remain with us, for His hand is harsh against us and against Dagon our god." ⁸They sent word and gathered all the tyrants of the Philistines to them and asked, "What should we do with the Ark of the God of Israel?" They answered, "Let the Ark of the God of Israel be moved to Gath." So they moved the Ark of the God of Israel there. ⁹After they moved it there, the hand of the LORD was against the city, causing a very great panic. He struck the men of the city, from the least to the greatest, and tumors broke out on them. ¹⁰So they sent the Ark of God to Ekron. But when the Ark of God arrived at Ekron, the Ekronites cried out, "They have brought the Ark of the God of Israel around to us to kill us and our people!" ¹¹The y sent word and gathered all the rulers of the Philistines and said, "Send the Ark of the God of Israel away — let it return to its own place so that it does not kill us and our people!" For a death-panic had gripped the entire city; the hand of God was very heavy there. ¹²The men who did not die were struck with tumors, and the cry of the city went up to heaven.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrative opens without transition from Israel's catastrophe in chapter 4. The Ark of God — the throne of the LORD's presence — is now in Philistine hands. The place name Ebenezer ('stone of help') carries bitter irony: the place named for divine help has become the site of divine absence. Ashdod was one of the five principal Philistine cities and home to a major temple of Dagon.
2. The verb yatstigu ('they set, stationed') implies deliberate placement as a trophy. In ancient warfare, capturing an enemy's cult object and displaying it in your own temple was a declaration that your god had defeated theirs. The Philistines are performing standard victory theology — and the narrator lets the reader feel the full weight of the insult before God responds.
2. Beit Dagon ('house/temple of Dagon') — Dagon was the chief deity of the Philistine pentapolis, likely a grain or fertility god. The name may derive from dagan ('grain') rather than dag ('fish'), though later tradition associated him with a fish-form.
3. The phrase nofel lefanav artsah lifnei aron YHWH ('fallen on his face to the ground before the Ark of the LORD') uses the vocabulary of worship prostration. The narrator presents the scene with theological precision: the conquered idol lies face-down before the Ark — the posture of submission, not accident. The people of Ashdod restore Dagon to his place, attempting to reassert their theology, but the next morning will prove the first fall was no coincidence.
3. Note the shift from 'Ark of God' (aron ha'Elohim) in verses 1-2 to 'Ark of the LORD' (aron YHWH) here. When God acts in power, the narrator uses the covenant name YHWH.
4. The verb kerutot ('cut off') is a passive participle suggesting deliberate severance, not accidental breakage. The head and palms are specifically named because they represent a deity's two essential functions: the head for wisdom and authority, the hands for power and action. Without them, the idol is literally incapable of anything — it can neither think nor do.
4. The phrase raq dagon nish'ar alav ('only the dagon remained on/of him') is ambiguous. Dagon here may refer to the trunk/torso of the idol, or it may be a wordplay on dag ('fish'), suggesting a fish-shaped lower body. The KJV renders 'the stump of Dagon'; we use 'trunk' to convey the torso without importing the fish interpretation, which remains uncertain.
5. This etiological note explains a living Philistine custom: priests and worshipers leap over the threshold rather than step on it. The narrator ties a known practice to Dagon's humiliation — every time a Philistine avoids that threshold, they unknowingly reenact their god's defeat. The phrase ad hayom hazeh ('to this day') anchors the narrative in the audience's observable reality.
5. The verb yidrekhu ('they tread, step on') from the root d-r-k can also mean 'to march upon' or 'to dominate.' The priests will not even place their feet on the spot where their god was dismembered — they treat the threshold as contaminated ground, though the narrator implies the contamination is Dagon's shame, not holiness.

6. The phrase vattichbad yad YHWH ('the hand of the LORD was heavy') echoes Exodus 9:3 where God's hand strikes Egypt's livestock. The verb kavad ('to be heavy') is the same root as kavod ('glory, weight'). The hand that carries glory also carries judgment — the weight of divine presence is unbearable for those who oppose it.
6. The Ketiv reads ba'ofalim (, 'tumors, swellings'), while the Qere tradition substitutes batechorim (, 'hemorrhoids' or 'tumors of the lower body'). The LXX adds a detail about mice devastating the land. We render as 'tumors' following the Ketiv, which has the broadest semantic range.
7. The Ashdodites reach the correct theological conclusion: the God of Israel is actively hostile to them and to Dagon. The phrase qashtah yado ('His hand is harsh/hard') uses the same root (q-sh-h) applied to Pharaoh's hardened heart. The Philistines recognize what Pharaoh resisted — this God's power is real and directed. Yet their response is not repentance but relocation: they will try to move the problem rather than submit to the God behind it.
8. The seranim (, 'rulers, lords') are the governors of the five Philistine cities — a political structure without parallel in Israel. The word seren may be related to the Greek tyrannos, reflecting Aegean origins of the Philistines. The decision to send the Ark to Gath is collective but futile: they treat the Ark like a political problem to be redistributed rather than a divine presence to be reckoned with.
8. The threefold repetition of aron Elohei Yisrael ('Ark of the God of Israel') in a single verse is emphatic — the narrator forces the reader to hear the full title again and again, as if the Philistines cannot stop talking about this object they cannot control.
9. The mehumah gedolah me'od ('very great panic/confusion') is the same word used for the divine terror God sends against Israel's enemies in holy war (cf. Deuteronomy 7:23, Joshua 10:10, 1 Samuel 7:10). This is the language of YHWH as warrior — the same God who routed Pharaoh's army now routs a Philistine city. God is waging holy war without Israel on the battlefield.
9. The phrase miqqaton ve'ad gadol ('from the least to the greatest') indicates the plague is total — no social class provides immunity. The Qere reading of vayyisateru ('they broke out') suggests the tumors erupted visibly and painfully.
10. The Ekronites' reaction is immediate terror — they cry out (vayyiz'au) before the plague even begins. The verb za'aq is the same cry-of-distress used for Israel's outcry in Egypt (Exodus 2:23). The irony is devastating: the Philistines now cry out exactly as the Israelites once did, but there is no Moses to intercede for them, and the source of their suffering is the very God who delivered Israel.
10. The accusation hesevu elai ('they have brought around to me') uses the first person singular — the individual Ekronite voice breaks through the collective, expressing personal dread. This god kills wherever He goes, and they are next in line.
11. The phrase mehumat mavet ('death-panic, deadly confusion') combines the holy-war terror of mehumah with mavet ('death') — this is not mere illness but a city-wide encounter with mortality. The Philistine rulers are now begged to act, not consulted. The polite deliberation of verse 8 ('What should we do?') has been replaced by desperate imperative: 'Send it away!'
11. The final clause kavdah me'od yad ha'Elohim sham ('the hand of God was very heavy there') echoes verse 6 but escalates. The hand grows heavier with each city — Ashdod suffered, Gath suffered, and now Ekron faces death itself. The plague intensifies as the Philistines persist in keeping what does not belong to them.
12. The verse divides the population into two groups: the dead and the tumor-stricken. There is no third category of the unaffected — God's judgment reaches every person in the city. The brevity of this verse carries narrative force: no elaboration is needed. The facts speak.
12. The final phrase vatta'al shav'at ha'ir hashamayim ('and the cry of the city went up to heaven') echoes the cry of Sodom reaching God (Genesis 18:20-21) and Israel's cry in Egypt (Exodus 2:23). But here the irony is inverted: these are the oppressors crying out, not the oppressed. The structure of Exodus is playing out in miniature — with the Philistines in Pharaoh's role.

Summary: After seven months in Philistine territory, the Ark of God is returned to Israel. Philistine priests and diviners prescribe a guilt offering of five golden tumors and five golden mice — one for each Philistine lord — and devise a test using two nursing cows pulling a new cart. If the cows walk straight to Beth-shemesh against their instinct, the plague was from Israel's God. The cows go directly, confirming divine causation. The people of Beth-shemesh celebrate with sacrifices, but some look into the Ark and are struck down. The chapter ends with the terrified Israelites sending the Ark on to Kiriath-jearim.

*What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most theologically revealing episodes involving pagans in the Hebrew Bible. The Philistine priests instinctively reach for concepts that parallel Israelite sacrificial theology: they prescribe an asham (guilt offering), they speak of 'giving glory' (kavod) to Israel's God, and they reference the Exodus as a cautionary tale. Their theology is imperfect but real — they know enough to fear, enough to attempt atonement, and enough to design an empirical test that respects divine sovereignty. The cow-test is remarkable for its intellectual honesty: the Philistines* build in a falsification condition. If the cows turn back to their calves, the plague was coincidence. They are willing to be wrong. Meanwhile, the Israelites at Beth-shemesh, who should know better, treat the Ark with less reverence than the Philistines did.

Translation Friction: The number struck at Beth-shemesh in verse 19 varies dramatically across manuscripts: the Masoretic Text reads 'seventy men, fifty thousand men' — a syntactically awkward combination that most scholars consider a textual corruption (Beth-shemesh was far too small for fifty thousand inhabitants). We render the number as the MT preserves it but note the difficulty. The word ophalim (tumors/growths) in verses 4-5 has traditionally been rendered 'emerods' (hemorrhoids), but the Septuagint and the connection with mice suggest bubonic swellings — plague tumors. The verb hishqif (to look into/at) in verse 19 is debated: did the men of Beth-shemesh look inside the Ark or merely gaze at it? The preposition be- can support either reading.

Connections: The Philistines' reference to the Exodus (v6) places this episode in direct conversation with Exodus 7-14 — foreign rulers who 'hardened their hearts' and paid the price. The guilt offering (asham) prescribed by pagan priests anticipates the same term's technical use in Leviticus 5-7, showing that the instinct for reparation-atonement transcends Israel's formal system. The Ark's journey from Philistia to Beth-shemesh to Kiriath-jearim traces a path that will not end until David brings it to Jerusalem in 2 Samuel 6 — another journey marked by both celebration and sudden death. The striking of the Beth-shemesh men echoes Nadab and Abihu (Leviticus 10) and Uzzah (2 Samuel 6:7): proximity to God's holiness without proper reverence is lethal regardless of whether the offenders are Israelite or Philistine.

¹The Ark of the LORD was in Philistine territory for seven months. ²The Philistines summoned their priests and diviners and asked, "What should we do with the Ark of the LORD? Tell us how we should send it back to its place." ³They said, "If you are sending back the Ark of the God of Israel, do not send it away empty. You must return a guilt offering to him. Then you will be healed, and you will understand why his hand has not turned away from you." ⁴They asked, "What guilt offering should we return to him?" They answered, "Five golden tumors and five golden mice — matching the number of the Philistine lords — because the same plague struck all of you and your lords." ⁵Make images of your tumors and images of your mice that are destroying the land, and give glory to the God of Israel. Perhaps he will lift his hand from you, from your gods, and from your land. ⁶Why would you harden your hearts the way Egypt and Pharaoh hardened theirs? After he dealt harshly with them, they sent the people away and they left. ⁷"Now then, take and prepare one new cart and two nursing cows that have never worn a yoke. Hitch the cows to the cart and take their calves away from them back to the pen. ⁸Then take the Ark of the LORD and place it on the cart. Put the golden objects that you are returning to him as a guilt offering in a chest beside it. Send it off and let it go. ⁹Then watch: if it goes up the road toward its own territory, to Beth-shemesh, then he is the one who brought this great disaster on us. But if not, we will know that it was not his hand that struck us — it was just something that happened to us by chance." ¹⁰The men did exactly that. They took two nursing cows and hitched them to the cart, and they penned up their calves at home. ¹¹They placed the Ark of the LORD on the cart, along with the chest containing the golden mice and the images of their tumors. ¹²The cows went straight down the road toward Beth-shemesh. They kept to one highway, lowing as they went, and did not turn right or left. The Philistine lords walked behind them all the way to the border of Beth-shemesh. ¹³The people of Beth-shemesh were harvesting wheat in the valley. They looked up, saw the Ark, and rejoiced at the sight. ¹⁴The cart came into the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite and stopped there beside a large stone. They split the wood of the cart and offered the cows as a burnt offering to the LORD. ¹⁵The Levites took down the Ark of the LORD and the chest that was with it, which held the golden objects, and set them on the large stone. The men of Beth-shemesh offered burnt offerings and made sacrifices to the LORD that day. ¹⁶The five Philistine lords watched all of this and returned to Ekron that same day. ¹⁷These are the golden tumors the Philistines returned as a guilt offering to the LORD: one for Ashdod, one for Gaza, one for Ashkelon, one for Gath, one for Ekron — ¹⁸The golden mice matched the number of all the Philistine cities belonging to the five lords — from fortified city to unwalled village. The great stone on which they set the Ark of the LORD remains to this day in the field of Joshua the Beth-shemite. ¹⁹He struck down some of the men of Beth-shemesh because they looked into the Ark of the LORD. He struck down seventy men — fifty thousand men — and the people mourned because the LORD had struck the people with a terrible blow. ²⁰The men of Beth-shemesh said,

"Who can stand in the presence of the LORD, this holy God? And to whom will he go up from us?" ²¹They sent messengers to the people of Kiriath-jearim, saying, "The Philistines have returned the Ark of the LORD. Come down and take it up to your city."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrative resumes directly from chapter 5, where the Ark caused devastation in Ashdod, Gath, and Ekron. The phrase bisedeh Felishtim ('in the field/territory of the Philistines') uses sadeh in its broad sense of 'open country, territory' — the Ark was not confined to one city but had been passed from place to place during these seven months. Seven months is long enough to confirm that the plagues were not coincidence but pattern.
2. The Philistines consult kohanim (priests) and qosemim (diviners) — their own religious specialists. The term qosem ('diviner') is elsewhere condemned in Israelite law (Deuteronomy 18:10), but here the narrative simply records Philistine practice without editorial comment. The question mah-na'aseh ('what should we do?') reveals genuine theological anxiety — they recognize they are dealing with a power they do not control. The phrase neshallechenu limqomo ('we shall send it to its place') already assumes the Ark must be returned; the only question is protocol.
3. The infinitive absolute hashev tashivu ('returning you must return') conveys emphatic obligation — this is not optional. The term asham ('guilt offering') is striking in a Philistine context; it is the technical term for the reparation offering in Leviticus 5:14-6:7, prescribed when someone trespasses against sancta (holy things). The Philistines have, in effect, violated sacred property. The conditional 'then you will be healed' (az teraf'u) links atonement to physical healing — a theology of causation that runs through the Hebrew Bible.
4. The ophalim (rendered 'tumors'; KJV 'emerods') are swellings or growths — likely bubonic swellings given the association with mice/rats. The Septuagint makes the rodent-plague connection more explicit. Five of each matches the five Philistine city-lords (sarnim, a non-Semitic title unique to Philistine rulers — possibly related to Greek tyrannos). The golden replicas function as sympathetic magic: by crafting images of the affliction and sending them away with the Ark, the Philistines hope to send the plague itself away. The logic is: represent the disease, offer it to the offended deity, and the disease departs with the offering.
5. The verb netattem kavod ('give glory/weight') uses the same kavod that described God's presence in the Ark (the 'glory' departed Israel in 4:21-22). The Philistines are being asked to return the honor they stripped from Israel's God by capturing his Ark. The phrase ulai yaqel et-yado ('perhaps he will lighten his hand') uses the root q-l-l, the opposite of k-v-d ('heavy/glory') — a wordplay: give him weight/glory, and perhaps he will make his hand light. The triad 'from you, from your gods, from your land' indicates total systemic judgment — personal, religious, and agricultural.
6. The verb tekabbedu ('you harden') shares the root k-v-d with kavod ('glory') from verse 5 — a sustained wordplay throughout the Philistine priests' speech: give God kavod (weight/glory) rather than giving your hearts koved (heaviness/hardness). The Philistines' knowledge of the Exodus (ka'asher kibbdu Mitsrayim uFar'oh et-libbam) demonstrates that the Exodus story had spread beyond Israel's borders as a cautionary tale. The verb hit'allel ('dealt harshly, made sport of') is the same verb used in Exodus 10:2 where God says he 'made a mockery of' Egypt.
7. Every detail of the test is designed to stack the odds against a divine explanation. The cart is new (chadashah) — never used for any purpose, eliminating the possibility that the cows know the route from habit. The cows are nursing mothers (parot alot, literally 'suckling cows') whose calves will be taken away — every instinct will pull them back toward their young, not forward toward Israel. They have never worn a yoke (lo alah aleihem ol) — they are untrained, unbroken animals who have no habit of pulling a cart in any direction. If these cows walk straight to Beth-shemesh, it cannot be explained naturally.
8. The golden offerings are placed in an argaz ('chest, coffer') beside the Ark — not inside it. The Philistines maintain a physical distinction between the Ark itself and their offering. The word argaz appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, suggesting it may be a Philistine loanword. The instruction veshilachtem oto vehalakh ('send it and it will go') is deliberately open-ended — no driver, no guide. The Ark's journey will be entirely self-directed, or rather, divinely directed.
9. Beth-shemesh ('House of the Sun') was an Israelite town on the border with Philistia, in the Sorek Valley — the nearest Israelite settlement. The phrase derekh gevulo ('the road toward its territory') treats the Ark as having a home territory it might seek. The word miqreh ('chance, accident') from the root q-r-h ('to happen, to encounter') is the Philistines' null hypothesis — if the test fails, the plagues were random events, not divine punishment. This is one of the few places in the Hebrew Bible where characters explicitly consider a non-theological explanation for events.
10. The verb kalu ('shut up, confined') emphasizes the deliberate separation of mothers from calves — maximizing the pull of instinct against the direction the Ark needs to travel. The narrative's spare, factual style — 'the men did so' (vayya'asu ha'anashim ken) — heightens the tension. Every element of the test is now in place.
11. The word techoreihem ('their tumors') uses a different form than ophalim in verse 4 — techorim is the Qere (read) form while ophalim is the Ketiv (written) form. Both refer to the same swellings. The Masoretes apparently considered techorim the more appropriate term for public reading. The careful arrangement — Ark on the cart, chest beside it — mirrors the instructions given in verse 8.
12. The verb vayisharnah (from y-sh-r, 'to be straight, direct') is the key word — these cows went 'straight' against every natural impulse. The infinitive absolute halokh vega'o ('going and lowing') captures simultaneous action: they walked and moaned at the same time — driven forward by divine compulsion while crying out from maternal instinct. The phrase lo saru yamin usmol ('they did not turn right or left') echoes Deuteronomy's language for covenant faithfulness (Deut 5:32, 17:11, 28:14). The five Philistine lords (sarnim) follow as witnesses — the test must be observed to be valid.

13. The wheat harvest places this in late May or early June — about seven months after the Ark's capture (which occurred around the autumn battles). The scene is pastoral and ordinary: farmers in a valley, working the harvest, who suddenly look up and see the Ark of God approaching on a driverless cart pulled by lowing cows. The verb vayismechu ('they rejoiced') is immediate and natural — the God of Israel's throne-seat is coming home. The valley (emeq) of Beth-shemesh is the Sorek Valley, the natural route from Philistia into the Judean hills.
14. The cart stops of its own accord (vatta'amod sham) in a specific field belonging to a man named Joshua (Yehoshua, 'the LORD saves') — a name that resonates given the context of God's salvation of his own Ark. The large stone (even gedolah) becomes an impromptu altar. The people use the cart's wood as fuel and the cows themselves as the burnt offering (olah) — everything that carried the Ark is consecrated by sacrifice. Nothing that served this holy purpose returns to ordinary use. The cows that obeyed God against their nature are now given entirely to God.
15. Beth-shemesh was a Levitical city (Joshua 21:16), which explains the presence of Levites to handle the Ark — a detail that shows the narrative's awareness of proper protocol. The Levites remove the Ark (horidu, 'brought down') and place it on the great stone. The men of the town then offer additional burnt offerings (olot) and fellowship sacrifices (zevachim) — a spontaneous festival of worship. The phrase bayyom hahu ('on that day') marks the event as historically specific and memorable.
16. The Philistine lords have seen enough. They followed the cows to the border (v12), witnessed the Ark's arrival, and now return to Ekron — the last Philistine city to hold the Ark (5:10). The verb ra'u ('they saw') is simple but loaded: they witnessed the test's result with their own eyes. There is no reported reaction — no speech, no worship, no defiance. The narrative simply records their silent departure. Their test has been answered; Israel's God sent the plague.
17. The catalog of five cities — Ashdod, Gaza, Ashkelon, Gath, Ekron — is the standard list of the Philistine pentapolis, each governed by its own seren (lord). Each city contributes one golden tumor, acknowledging its share in the collective guilt. The list reads like a legal document recording the terms of reparation — each party named, each contribution specified.
18. This verse expands the scope of the offering: the five golden tumors corresponded to the five lords, but the golden mice corresponded to all the cities — fortified (ir mivtsar) and rural (kofer haperazi, 'the open village'). The plague of mice affected the entire agricultural territory. The phrase ad hayyom hazzeh ('to this day') is the narrator's voice, writing from a later period when the stone was still a known landmark. Some scholars read avel hagedolah ('the great Abel/stone of mourning') as a reference to the grief that will follow in verse 19, but it may simply be a place-name or a descriptive term for the large stone.
19. The verb ra'u ba'aron ('they looked into/at the Ark') uses the preposition be- which can mean either 'into' or 'at.' The Targum Jonathan interprets this as gazing at the Ark disrespectfully. Regardless of the exact nature of the offense, the principle is consistent throughout Samuel: the Ark's holiness does not discriminate between Israelite and Philistine, between curiosity and hostility. The number 'seventy men, fifty thousand men' (shiv'im ish chamishim elef ish) is syntactically anomalous — no conjunction connects the two numbers. Josephus (Antiquities 6.1.4) gives seventy. The grief of the people (vayit'abbelu) mirrors the Philistines' distress — both peoples learn that proximity to the Ark is dangerous.
20. The phrase YHWH ha'Elohim haqqadosh hazzeh ('the LORD, this holy God') piles up divine titles to express the overwhelming otherness the people now feel. The adjective qadosh ('holy') means fundamentally 'set apart, other, dangerous in its purity.' The verb ya'aleh ('will go up') anticipates the Ark's continued journey uphill into the Judean highlands — ultimately to Kiriath-jearim. Beth-shemesh, a border town in the lowlands, sends the Ark further into Israelite territory, distancing themselves from its lethal holiness.
21. Kiriath-jearim ('City of Forests') sits higher in the Judean hills, about ten miles from Beth-shemesh. The verbs redu ('come down') and ha'alu ('bring up') reflect the topography: Beth-shemesh is in the lowland Sorek Valley, Kiriath-jearim in the highlands. The Ark will remain at Kiriath-jearim for twenty years (7:2) until David retrieves it — a remarkably long hiatus during which Israel's central sacred object sits in a private home rather than a sanctuary. The chapter ends not with triumph but with a handoff driven by fear. The Ark has come home, but no one knows how to live with it.

Summary: The Ark arrives at Kiriath-jearim and stays for twenty years while Israel languishes under Philistine domination. Samuel calls the nation to a radical return — put away foreign gods, direct your hearts to the LORD alone, and he will deliver you. Israel gathers at Mizpah for fasting and confession. The Philistines attack the assembly, but the LORD thunders against them and Israel routs them from Mizpah to below Beth-car. Samuel sets up a stone and names it Ebenezer — 'the stone of help' — declaring, 'Up to this point the LORD has helped us.' Samuel serves as judge over Israel for the rest of his life, riding a circuit through Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter marks the hinge between the Ark narrative (chapters 4-6) and the monarchy narrative (chapters 8-12). It is the last chapter in which Israel's system works as designed: a prophet calls for repentance, the people respond, God delivers, and a judge administers justice. Everything that follows — the demand for a king, the rise of Saul, the anointing of David — flows from the inability to sustain what happens here. Samuel is the last shofet, the final judge, and this chapter is his finest hour. The Ebenezer stone is particularly poignant because the name Ebenezer appeared earlier in 4:1 as the site of Israel's devastating defeat. The place of disaster becomes the place of memorial — same name, opposite outcome.

Translation Friction: The twenty-year gap in verse 2 is historically difficult: Samuel's public ministry seems to begin after this period, but the text does not explain what happened during those two decades. The phrase vayyinnahu kol-bet Yisra'el acharei YHWH ('all the house of Israel lamented/yearned after the LORD') uses a verb (n-h-h) whose exact meaning is debated — 'to lament,' 'to be drawn toward,' or 'to turn.' We render it as 'turned in longing' to capture the sense of national grief turning toward God. The verb in verse 6, vayyish'avu mayim vayyishpeku lifnei YHWH ('they drew water and poured it out before the LORD'), describes a ritual not prescribed anywhere in the Torah — a water-pouring ceremony that may represent tears, humility, or life poured out before God. Its exact significance is uncertain.

Connections: The call to 'return to the LORD with all your heart' (v3) echoes Deuteronomy 30:2-10, where Moses promised that even after exile, a wholehearted return would bring restoration. Samuel is enacting Deuteronomy's restoration theology. The removal of Baals and Ashtarothe (v3-4) connects to the recurring cycle in Judges where foreign gods provoke divine judgment and repentance brings deliverance (Judges 2:11-19, 10:6-16). The thunder theophany (v10) recalls Exodus 19:16 at Sinai and anticipates the thunder that will accompany Samuel's rebuke of Israel for demanding a king (12:17-18). The Ebenezer memorial stone parallels Joshua's memorial stones at Gilgal (Joshua 4:20-24) — physical markers that anchor national memory to specific acts of divine intervention.

¹The men of Kiriath-jearim came and brought up the Ark of the LORD. They took it to the house of Abinadab on the hill and consecrated his son Eleazar to guard the Ark of the LORD. ²From the day the Ark settled in Kiriath-jearim, a long time passed — twenty years. Then all the house of Israel turned in longing toward the LORD. ³Samuel said to all the house of Israel, "If you are returning to the LORD with your whole heart, then remove the foreign gods from among you — and the Ashtarothe — and direct your hearts toward the LORD and serve him alone. Then he will rescue you from the hand of the Philistines." ⁴So the Israelites removed the Baals and the Ashtarothe and served the LORD alone. ⁵Samuel said, "Gather all Israel to Mizpah, and I will pray to the LORD on your behalf." ⁶They assembled at Mizpah, drew water, and poured it out before the LORD. They fasted that day and declared there, "We have sinned against the LORD." And Samuel judged the Israelites at Mizpah. ⁷When the Philistines heard that the Israelites had assembled at Mizpah, the Philistine lords marched up against Israel. When the Israelites heard this, they were terrified of the Philistines. ⁸The Israelites said to Samuel, "Do not stop crying out to the LORD our God for us, so that he will save us from the hand of the Philistines." ⁹Samuel took a nursing lamb — one animal — and offered it as a whole burnt offering to the LORD. Samuel cried out to the LORD on behalf of Israel, and the LORD answered him. ¹⁰While Samuel was offering the burnt offering, the Philistines advanced to attack Israel. But the LORD thundered with a tremendous voice that day against the Philistines and threw them into confusion, and they were routed before Israel. ¹¹The men of Israel charged out from Mizpah and pursued the Philistines, striking them down all the way to below Beth-car. ¹²Then Samuel took a stone and placed it between Mizpah and Shen. He named it Ebenezer — "Stone of Help" — and declared, "Up to this point, the LORD has helped us." ¹³The Philistines were subdued and no longer entered Israelite territory. The hand of the LORD was against the Philistines throughout all the days of Samuel. ¹⁴The cities that the Philistines had captured from Israel were returned to Israel, from Ekron to Gath, and Israel recovered the surrounding territory from Philistine control. There was also peace between Israel and the Amorites. ¹⁵Samuel judged Israel for the rest of his life. ¹⁶He would travel on a circuit year after year through Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah, and he judged Israel at all these places. ¹⁷His home base was Ramah, because that was where his house was. There too he judged Israel, and there he built an altar to the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Kiriath-jearim is in the Judean highlands, hence the verb vayya'alu ('they brought up') — the Ark ascends in elevation. Abinadab's house baggivah ('on the hill') provides a prominent location, though this is a private home, not a sanctuary. The verb qiddesh ('consecrated, set apart') applied to Eleazar indicates formal dedication for sacred duty — the same root as qadosh ('holy'). After the deaths at Beth-shemesh, someone must be ritually prepared to be in the Ark's proximity. The Ark's placement in a private home rather than at Shiloh (which may already be destroyed — see Jeremiah 7:12, 26:6) signals the collapse of Israel's central worship infrastructure.

2. The phrase vayyirbu hayyamim ('the days multiplied') conveys not just duration but accumulation — time piling up, heaviness building. Twenty years (esrim shanah) bridges the Ark narrative to Samuel's public ministry. The verb vayyinnahu is a hapax form in this context; its root n-h-h appears elsewhere meaning 'to lament' or 'to wail' (Ezekiel 32:18), but here with acharei YHWH ('after/toward the LORD') it takes on a directional sense — Israel's grief oriented itself toward God rather than remaining aimless. Some scholars connect it to Arabic cognates meaning 'to turn, to incline.'
3. The verb shavim ('returning') is the participial form of shuv — the Hebrew Bible's primary word for repentance (teshuvah). Samuel's use of the participle implies an ongoing process, not a completed act: 'if you are in the act of returning.' The phrase bekhol-levavkhem ('with your whole heart') echoes the Shema (Deuteronomy 6:5) and Deuteronomy 30:2. The Ashtaroth (plural of Ashtoreth) were Canaanite fertility goddesses associated with Baal worship. The verb hakhinu ('prepare, establish, direct') from the root k-w-n means to fix firmly in place — hearts must not merely feel but be structurally oriented toward God. The phrase iv'duhu levaddo ('serve him alone') is absolute exclusivity — not 'primarily' but 'only.'
4. The narrative records immediate compliance with no resistance or qualification — a rarity in Israel's story. The Baals (be'alim, plural of Ba'al, 'lord, master') were local Canaanite storm and fertility deities, often worshiped at high places. The Ashtaroth (plural of Ashtoreth) were their female counterparts. The phrase vayya'avdu et-YHWH levaddo ('they served the LORD alone') directly echoes Samuel's demand in verse 3 (iv'duhu levaddo). Israel does exactly what Samuel required. The simplicity of the verse — command given, command obeyed — contrasts with the long cycles of partial obedience in Judges.
5. Mizpah (hammitspatah, 'the watchtower') was a significant assembly site in Benjamin's territory, about eight miles north of Jerusalem. It served as a gathering point in Judges 20:1 for inter-tribal assembly. Samuel's role as intercessor — 'I will pray on your behalf' (etpallel ba'adkhem) — places him in the mediatorial tradition of Moses (Exodus 32:11-14, Numbers 14:13-19). The hitpael form of p-l-l (etpallel) suggests intense, sustained intercession, not casual petition. Samuel positions himself as the bridge between a repentant people and their God.
6. The water-pouring ceremony (vayyish'avu mayim vayyishpekhu lifnei YHWH) has no parallel in Torah legislation. David's later act of pouring out water in 2 Samuel 23:16 involves water from Bethlehem's well poured as a libation — but the context differs. Some scholars see this as a rain-petition ritual; others as symbolic of helplessness (cf. 2 Samuel 14:14, 'we are like water poured out on the ground'). The confession chatanu laYHWH ('we have sinned against the LORD') is direct and unqualified — no excuses, no mitigating circumstances. The verb vayyishpot ('he judged') marks Samuel's formal assumption of the shofet role, the last in the line from Othniel through Samson.
7. The Philistines interpret Israel's assembly as a military muster — and from a political standpoint, any large gathering of a subject people would be threatening. The verb vayya'alu ('they went up') indicates the Philistines marched from the coastal plain up into the central hill country. The Israelites' fear (vayyir'u mippenei Felishtim) is realistic: their last major engagement with the Philistines resulted in the devastating defeat at Ebenezer-Aphek (chapter 4) where thirty thousand fell and the Ark was captured. The fear is historically grounded — they have reason to be afraid. The assembly at Mizpah was for repentance, not for war.
8. The plea al-tachresh mimmenu ('do not be silent from us') uses the root ch-r-sh, which means 'to be silent, to cease speaking.' Israel begs Samuel not to stop interceding — not to fall silent. This is a dramatic reversal from Judges-era patterns where Israel typically reached for weapons first and prayer second. Here the people's instinct is right: they turn to the prophet and ask him to keep praying. The phrase YHWH Eloheinu ('the LORD our God') with the first-person plural possessive is itself an act of faith — they are claiming covenant relationship with the God they have just confessed to betraying.
9. The offering is deliberately modest: a single nursing lamb (teleh chalav, literally 'a milk lamb' — still suckling, therefore young and small). This is not a grand sacrificial spectacle but a simple, whole-hearted offering. The word kalil ('whole, complete') emphasizes that the entire animal was consumed on the altar — nothing held back, nothing eaten by the worshiper. The verb vayyiz'aq ('he cried out') is the same verb used for Israel's desperate cries in Judges (Judges 3:9, 3:15, 6:7, 10:10). The final clause — vayyya'anehu YHWH ('and the LORD answered him') — is the theological turning point of the chapter. Three words that change everything: God heard and responded.
10. The participle ma'aleh ha'olah ('offering up the burnt offering') indicates the sacrifice is still in progress when the Philistines attack — the timing is simultaneous. The verb vayyar'em ('he thundered') from the root r-'-m is used for divine thunder in Psalm 18:14 and 2 Samuel 22:14, where it functions as God's battle-cry. The phrase beqol-gadol ('with a great/loud voice') personifies the thunder as God's voice — this is not weather but warfare. The verb vayyehumem ('he confused/panicked them') appears in Exodus 14:24 (the Egyptian army at the sea), Joshua 10:10 (the Amorites at Gibeon), and Judges 4:15 (Sisera's army) — it is the technical term for divine battle-panic that precedes military rout.
11. The verb vayyetse'u ('they went out') indicates a deliberate sortie — Israel left the assembly point and became the aggressor. The pursuit goes ad-mittachat levet kar ('to below Beth-car'), a location whose exact site is uncertain. The name Beth-car ('house of the lamb/pasture') is otherwise unattested in the Hebrew Bible. The phrase mittachat ('from below, below') indicates downhill movement — the Philistines were driven from the hill country back toward the coastal lowlands, a reversal of their uphill advance in verse 7. The rout covers significant distance, indicating total Philistine collapse.
12. The name Even Ha'ezer is composed of even ('stone') and ezer ('help') — 'stone of help.' The location 'between Mizpah and Shen' (hashshen, 'the tooth' or 'the crag') places the memorial at a specific geographic point. The phrase ad hennah ('up to here, up to this point') is both spatial and temporal — this stone marks both the place and the moment where God's help was manifest. The verb azaranu ('he has helped us') uses the root '-z-r, the same root in ezer — 'help.' The first Ebenezer in 4:1 was a campsite name with no recorded etymology; Samuel now gives the name theological content by connecting it explicitly to divine aid.

13. The verb vayyikkan'u ('they were subdued, humbled') from the root k-n- indicates enforced submission — the Philistines were brought low. The phrase velo yasfu od lavo ('they did not continue again to come') uses the construction yasaf + infinitive for cessation of repeated action — they stopped coming. This is a summary statement covering the rest of Samuel's active judgeship. The phrase yad-YHWH baPlishti'm ('the hand of the LORD was against the Philistines') echoes the same 'hand of the LORD' that afflicted the Philistines while they held the Ark (5:6, 5:9, 5:11). The hand that struck them in judgment now restrains them in protection of Israel — same hand, different function.
14. The verb vattashovnah ('they returned') uses shuv — the same root as the teshuvah (repentance) of verse 3. Israel returned to God, and the cities returned to Israel — the wordplay links spiritual restoration to territorial restoration. The range 'from Ekron to Gath' (me'Eqrone ve'ad-Gat) represents the eastern edge of Philistine territory closest to Israel — not a conquest of Philistia but a recovery of the disputed border zone. The mention of peace with the Amorites (ha'Emori) is unexpected; the term may function here as a general designation for the pre-Israelite Canaanite population, indicating that the era of Samuel's judgeship brought comprehensive regional stability.
15. The phrase kol yemei chayyav ('all the days of his life') indicates lifelong service — Samuel never retired, never abdicated. The verb vayyishpot ('he judged') encompasses more than legal decisions: it includes military leadership, spiritual guidance, and administrative governance. This summary statement positions Samuel alongside the great judges while also setting up the transition: Samuel will judge Israel 'all his days,' but his sons will not follow in his footsteps (8:1-3), and the people will demand a king. The verse reads as both tribute and elegy — the last judge served faithfully, and the system died with him.
16. Samuel's judicial circuit (savav, 'to go around, to make a circuit') through three towns — Bethel, Gilgal, and Mizpah — establishes an itinerant governance model. Each site carries theological weight: Bethel ('house of God') was the site of Jacob's vision (Genesis 28:19); Gilgal was Joshua's first camp in the promised land (Joshua 4:19-20); Mizpah was the assembly site of this chapter's victory. The phrase middei shanah beshanah ('from year to year, annually') indicates a regular, reliable pattern. Samuel brings justice to the people rather than requiring the people to come to a central location — a model suited to a period without a functioning central sanctuary.
17. The word uteshuvato ('and his return') uses the same root shuv that has appeared throughout this chapter — Samuel's physical return to Ramah after each circuit echoes the spiritual return (teshuvah) he called Israel to in verse 3. Ramah (haramatah, 'the height') was Samuel's birthplace (1:19) and becomes his permanent base. The building of an altar (mizbeiach) at Ramah is significant: Samuel constructs a place of sacrifice at his home, not at a central sanctuary. This reflects the fractured state of Israelite worship after Shiloh's apparent destruction. Samuel functions as prophet, judge, and priest — offering sacrifices, rendering judgments, and speaking God's word — all from his home in Ramah.

Summary: *Samuel has grown old and appointed his sons as judges over Israel, but they are corrupt — taking bribes and perverting justice. The elders of Israel gather at Ramah and demand that Samuel appoint a king 'like all the nations.' Samuel is grieved, but God tells him to listen to the people, explaining that they have not rejected Samuel but rejected God himself as their king. God instructs Samuel to warn them solemnly about the 'ways of the king' (mishpat ha-melekh) — a detailed catalog of royal extraction: conscription of sons and daughters, seizure of fields and vineyards, taxation of flocks and grain. The chapter ends with the people refusing to listen, insisting they want a king to judge them and fight their battles, and God telling Samuel to grant their request.*

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter is the hinge point of Israel's political theology. The demand for a king is not presented as inherently sinful — God will, in fact, grant the request — but it is framed as a rejection of divine kingship. God's response to Samuel in verse 7 is extraordinary in its vulnerability: 'They have not rejected you; they have rejected me from being king over them.' The God who delivered them from Egypt, who parted the sea and fed them in the wilderness, now finds himself voted out by popular demand. The mishpat ha-melekh (verses 11-18) is not prophecy in the usual sense but sociological realism — Samuel describes what every ancient Near Eastern monarchy actually did. The warning is not 'this might happen' but 'this is what kings are.' Most striking is that God does not override the people's free will. He instructs Samuel to warn them, but when they persist, he says: give them what they want. The theology here is that God sometimes grants requests that grieve him, allowing human choices to play out with their full consequences.*

Translation Friction: *The chapter raises a tension that runs through the rest of Samuel-Kings: is monarchy good or bad? Here the demand is framed negatively — as rejection of God. Yet God himself will later choose David, call him 'a man after my own heart,' and establish an eternal covenant with his dynasty. The resolution is not that kingship itself is wrong, but that the motivation — 'like all the nations' (kekol hagoyim) — represents a fundamental misunderstanding of Israel's identity. They were constituted as unlike the nations. The phrase mishpat ha-melekh is also ambiguous: does it mean 'the just right of the king' (what a king is legally entitled to do) or 'the way kings behave' (a descriptive warning)? The word mishpat can mean* both 'justice/right' and 'custom/manner,' and the ambiguity may be intentional — what kings claim as their right is precisely what makes them dangerous.

Connections: The demand for a king 'like all the nations' echoes Deuteronomy 17:14-20, where Moses anticipated this request and set conditions for kingship: the king must be chosen by God, must not accumulate horses or wives or wealth, and must write a personal copy of the Torah. The people in 1 Samuel 8 want a king but show no interest in these safeguards. Samuel's warning about sons taken for chariots and daughters taken for perfumers anticipates Solomon's reign precisely (1 Kings 4-10), where conscription, taxation, and forced labor fulfilled every detail. The phrase 'rejected me from being king over them' (v7) connects backward to Judges 8:23, where Gideon refused kingship saying 'The LORD shall rule over you,' and forward to 1 Samuel 12:12, where Samuel reminds them 'the LORD your God was your king.' The cry 'you will cry out because of your king' (v18) inverts the Exodus pattern — in Egypt they cried out under a foreign king and God answered; under their own chosen king, God will not answer.

¹When Samuel grew old, he appointed his sons as judges over Israel. ²The name of his firstborn was Joel, and the name of his second son was Abijah. They served as judges in Beer-sheba. ³But his sons did not walk in his ways. They chased dishonest profit, took bribes, and twisted justice. ⁴All the elders of Israel gathered together and came to Samuel at Ramah. ⁵They said to him, "Look — you have grown old, and your sons do not walk in your ways. Now appoint a king to govern us, like all the other nations." ⁶The demand was wrong in Samuel's eyes — when they said, "Give us a king to govern us." So Samuel prayed to the LORD. ⁷The LORD said to Samuel, "Listen to the voice of the people in everything they say to you. It is not you they have rejected — it is me they have rejected from being king over them." ⁸This follows the pattern of everything they have done from the day I brought them up out of Egypt to this very day — abandoning me and serving other gods. That is what they are doing to you as well. ⁹So now, listen to their voice. But you must solemnly warn them and declare to them the ways of the king who will reign over them." ¹⁰Samuel relayed all the words of the LORD to the people who were asking him for a king. ¹¹He said, "This is how the king who reigns over you will operate: He will take your sons and assign them to his chariots and his cavalry, and they will run ahead of his chariots. ¹²He will appoint them as commanders of thousands and commanders of fifties, and to plow his fields and harvest his crops, and to manufacture his weapons and his chariot equipment. ¹³He will take your daughters as perfumers, cooks, and bakers. ¹⁴He will take your fields, your vineyards, and your best olive groves, and give them to his officials. ¹⁵He will tax a tenth of your grain and your vintage and give it to his court officials and his servants. ¹⁶He will take your male servants, your female servants, your best young men, and your donkeys, and put them to work for himself. ¹⁷He will take a tenth of your flocks. And you yourselves will become his servants." ¹⁸When that day comes, you will cry out because of the king you chose for yourselves, but the LORD will not answer you on that day. ¹⁹But the people refused to listen to Samuel's voice. They said, "No! There will be a king over us. ²⁰We will be like all the other nations. Our king will govern us, march out ahead of us, and fight our battles." ²¹Samuel listened to everything the people said and repeated it in the hearing of the LORD. ²²The LORD said to Samuel, "Listen to their voice and install a king for them." Then Samuel said to the men of Israel, "Go, each of you, back to your city."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb zaqen ('grew old') signals a leadership transition crisis — the same kind that opened the book with Eli's aging. Samuel repeats the pattern he witnessed: an aging leader whose sons will not carry the mantle faithfully. The phrase vayasem et-banav shofetim ('he set his sons as judges') uses the same root sh-f-t that has defined Israel's governance since the period of the Judges. Samuel is not establishing a dynasty; the office of judge was not hereditary. That he attempts to make it so reflects the subtle drift toward institutionalized power that will culminate in the demand for a king.
2. Joel means 'the LORD is God' and Abijah means 'my father is the LORD' — both theophoric names expressing Samuel's devotion, which makes their corruption all the more painful. Beer-sheba is in the far south of Israel, the opposite end of the country from Samuel's base at Ramah in the north. This geographic distance may have contributed to the sons' corruption — they were far from their father's oversight. The placement at Beer-sheba also means Samuel was attempting to extend judicial coverage across all Israel, from Ramah to Beer-sheba, the traditional expression for the land's full extent.
3. The phrase velo haleku vanav bidrakav ('his sons did not walk in his ways') echoes the identical failure of Eli's sons (1 Samuel 2:12-17). Samuel, who replaced Eli's corrupt house, now watches his own house fall to the same disease. The root n-t-h ('to turn aside, bend') appears twice: once for turning after profit and once for twisting justice — the same verb links the moral deviation to the judicial perversion. The word batsa ('unjust gain, dishonest profit') is the same term used in Exodus 18:21, where Jethro advised Moses to appoint judges who 'hate unjust gain.' Samuel's sons are the exact opposite of Jethro's ideal.

4. The verb vayitqabbetsu ('they gathered themselves') suggests a coordinated, deliberate assembly — this is not a spontaneous complaint but a delegation. The elders (ziqunei Yisra'el) are the recognized tribal leaders, the men who speak for the people collectively. That they travel to Ramah, Samuel's home base, indicates both respect for his authority and a formal petition. Ramah (haRamatah, with the directional he suffix indicating motion toward) was in the tribal territory of Benjamin, roughly central to the population.
5. The phrase simah-lanu melek ('set for us a king') uses the imperative of s-y-m ('to set, place, appoint') — the same verb used in verse 1 when Samuel 'set' his sons as judges. They want Samuel to do for them what he did for his sons, but bigger. The phrase kekol hagoyim ('like all the nations') is the theological crux of the chapter. Israel's entire covenantal identity was built on distinction from the nations (Leviticus 20:26, Deuteronomy 7:6). The request is not merely political but ontological — they want to restructure Israel's identity around a human king rather than a divine one.
6. The phrase vayera hadavar be'einei Shemu'el ('the thing was evil/bad in Samuel's eyes') uses the root r-'l ('evil, displeasing') — Samuel perceived the request as genuinely harmful, not merely offensive to his ego. His immediate response is prayer (vayitpallel), not argument — Samuel takes the crisis to God before responding to the elders. This is the mark of Samuel's character throughout the narrative: when faced with a problem beyond his capacity, he prays. The verb hitpallel (reflexive of p-l-l, 'to judge, intercede') literally means 'to judge oneself' or 'to intercede' — Samuel is both processing his own reaction and seeking divine counsel.
7. The verb ma'as ('reject, refuse, spurn') is covenantal language — it appears in Leviticus 26:15 for Israel's rejection of God's statutes, and in 1 Samuel 15:23,26 where God will reject Saul using the same word. The phrase mimmelokh aleihem ('from reigning over them') uses the infinitive of m-l-kh — the same root as melek. God has been their melek; they want a different one. The instruction shema beqol ha'am ('listen to the voice of the people') is remarkable — God tells his prophet to obey the people's voice, even though the people's voice is rejecting God. This divine acquiescence to human free will is theologically without parallel in the ancient Near East, where kings ruled by divine compulsion, not popular consent.
8. God places the people's request in a historical pattern stretching from the Exodus to the present. The verbs vaya'azvuni ('they abandoned me') and vaya'avdu elohim acherim ('they served other gods') frame the demand for a king as another instance of Israel's chronic unfaithfulness — not a new sin but the latest expression of an old one. The phrase ken hemah osim gam-lakh ('so they are doing also to you') is God consoling Samuel: this is not personal failure on your part; this is who they are. The comparison between rejecting God and rejecting Samuel elevates Samuel's role — his authority was a direct extension of divine authority — while simultaneously relativizing his pain: he is merely the latest target of Israel's pattern of rejection.
9. The infinitive absolute construction ha'ed ta'id ('warning you shall warn') conveys the highest urgency — Samuel must not merely inform but formally testify. This is legal language: Samuel is placing the people under notice. The phrase mishpat ha-melek ('the manner/right of the king') uses mishpat in its ambiguous fullness. In Deuteronomy 17:14-20, the Torah anticipated the demand for a king and prescribed mishpat for royal behavior (limits on horses, wives, wealth). Here, Samuel will describe the actual mishpat of monarchy — not the ideal but the reality. The verb yimlokh ('who will reign') shares the same m-l-kh root as melek and mimmelokh in verse 7 — the kingship vocabulary saturates the chapter.
10. The verb hasho'alim ('the ones asking') from the root sh-'l ('to ask, request, demand') carries a wordplay that resonates through the entire book: the name Sha'ul (Saul) comes from the same root. The people who 'ask' (sho'alim) for a king will receive Sha'ul — 'the asked-for one.' The name itself will become an ironic commentary: they asked and they received, but what they received will not be what they hoped for. Samuel faithfully transmits kol divrei YHWH ('all the words of the LORD') — he does not editorialize or soften the message.
11. The verb yiqqach ('he will take') from the root l-q-ch is the keynote verb of the entire warning — it will recur in verses 13, 14, 15, 16, and 17. The relentless repetition of 'take' turns the warning into a drumbeat of confiscation. The merkavah ('chariot') and parashim ('horsemen, cavalry') represent the military-industrial complex of ancient Near Eastern monarchy. Israel had been a foot-soldier culture; chariots were the technology of empires (Egypt, Canaan). To staff chariots is to transform Israel's military identity. The runners (ratsu lifnei merkavto) were the royal advance guard — Absalom will later adopt this practice (2 Samuel 15:1) as a sign of royal pretension.
12. The list expands from military display to military command (sarei alafim, sarei chamishim — officers of thousands and fifties), then pivots to agricultural conscription (plowing his fields, harvesting his crops) and industrial production (weapons and chariot equipment). The possessive pronoun 'his' (lo) is relentless: his thousands, his plowing (charisho), his harvest (qetsiro), his war equipment (kelei milchamto), his chariot gear (kelei rikhbho). Everything that was the family's becomes the king's. The progression from soldier to farmer to factory worker shows that royal conscription is not limited to wartime but restructures the entire economy around royal needs.
13. After sons, daughters. The verb yiqqach ('he will take') returns. The three roles — raqqachot (perfumers/ointment makers), tabbachot (cooks/slaughterers), and ofot (bakers) — represent the palace domestic economy. Raqqachot is particularly significant: perfume and ointment production was a high-skill trade in the ancient Near East, connected to both luxury goods and temple worship. The king will conscript daughters not for menial labor but for the palace's elaborate lifestyle apparatus. Each of these roles served the king's table and personal luxury — the daughters of free Israelite families reduced to staffing royal consumption.
14. The triad sadot (fields), keramim (vineyards), and zeitim (olive groves) represents the complete agricultural economy of ancient Israel — grain, wine, and oil. The adjective hatovim ('the best') emphasizes that royal confiscation is selective and extractive. The phrase venatan la'avadav ('and give to his servants') reveals the patronage system at monarchy's core: the king takes from the people to reward his loyalists. This prediction is fulfilled precisely in 1 Samuel 22:7, where Saul asks his Benjaminite supporters, 'Will the son of Jesse give you fields and vineyards?' — royal land redistribution as political currency.

15. The verb ya'asor ('he will tithe, take a tenth') is loaded with theological irony. The tithe (ma'aser) in Israel belonged to God — it was given to the Levites for temple service (Numbers 18:21-24). Now the king will impose his own tithe on top of God's, effectively setting himself up as a parallel deity demanding tribute. The recipients are saritim ('court officials' — the word can also mean 'eunuchs,' suggesting the elaborate palace bureaucracy of ancient Near Eastern monarchies) and avadim ('servants'). The king creates an entire parasitic class sustained by extraction from the productive population.
16. The confiscation extends now to the household workforce: avadim (male servants), shefachot (female servants), bachurim hatovim ('the best young men' — again hatovim, 'the best,' as in verse 14), and chamorim (donkeys, the primary work animals and transport of non-royal Israel). The verb yiqqach ('he will take') appears for the fifth time. The phrase ve'asah limla'khto ('and put them to his work/service') uses mela'kha — the same word used for God's creative work in Genesis 2:2. The king's 'work' parasitically conscripts the labor that sustained ordinary households. Note the Qere/Ketiv variant: the Ketiv reads bachureichem ('your young men') while some manuscripts and the LXX read beqareichem ('your cattle').
17. The second tithe (ya'asor) now falls on flocks (tso'n), completing the taxation of agriculture: grain, wine, and livestock. The final clause ve'attem tihyu-lo la'avadim ('and you yourselves will become his servants/slaves') is the rhetorical capstone. The pronoun attem ('you yourselves') is emphatic — not just your sons, daughters, fields, and flocks, but you. The word avadim is deliberately chosen: Israel was avadim in Egypt (Exodus 13:3, Deuteronomy 5:6), and God redeemed them to be his avadim (Leviticus 25:42, 55). To become the king's avadim is to exchange divine lordship for human lordship — the very definition of the rejection described in verse 7.
18. The verb za'aq ('to cry out') is the Exodus verb par excellence — it is what Israel did under Pharaoh's oppression (Exodus 2:23). Samuel is warning that monarchy will reproduce the conditions of Egypt. The phrase millifnei malkekem ('because of / from before your king') uses the same preposition (millifnei) used for crying out 'before' Pharaoh's oppression. The emphatic asher bechartem lakhem ('whom you chose for yourselves') places full responsibility on the people — this was not imposed but elected. The phrase velo ya'aneh YHWH ('the LORD will not answer') is one of the most severe statements in the Hebrew Bible: God voluntarily withdrawing his responsiveness. Compare Deuteronomy 1:45 and Proverbs 1:28 for the same devastating pattern.
19. The verb vayema'an ('they refused') from the root m'-n ('to refuse, be unwilling') echoes the root m'-s ('to reject') from verse 7 — different roots but phonetically similar, reinforcing the pattern of refusal. The phrase lishmoa beqol Shemu'el ('to listen to Samuel's voice') inverts God's instruction in verse 7: God told Samuel shema beqol ha'am ('listen to the people's voice'); now the people refuse lishmoa beqol Shemu'el ('to listen to Samuel's voice'). Everyone is listening to someone's voice except God's. The defiant lo ki im-melek yihyeh aleinu ('No! Rather, a king will be over us!') is blunt — no qualification, no negotiation. Their minds are made.
20. The phrase kekol hagoyim ('like all the nations') repeats from verse 5, forming an inclusio around Samuel's entire warning — they wanted to be like the nations before the warning, and they still want it after. The warning changed nothing. The verb ushefatanu ('he will judge/govern us') uses the same sh-f-t root that has defined leadership throughout Judges and Samuel. The phrase veyatsa lefaneinu ('he will go out before us') uses military language — the king as the one who leads the army out. The phrase venilcham et-milchamoteinu ('he will fight our battles') directly replaces God: compare Exodus 14:14 'The LORD will fight for you' and Deuteronomy 1:30 'The LORD your God who goes before you will fight for you.'
21. The verb vayishma ('he listened') mirrors God's instruction shema ('listen') from verse 7 — Samuel is obediently doing what God commanded: listening to the people's voice. The phrase vayedabbrem be'oznei YHWH ('he spoke them in the ears of the LORD') is striking: Samuel reports to God as to a sovereign, relaying the people's final answer. The anthropomorphic 'ears of the LORD' (oznei YHWH) conveys intimate communication — Samuel is not praying generally but reporting specifically, as a mediator between two parties. God already knew what the people would say (verse 7-8), but the formal relay matters: Samuel fulfills his role as intermediary, ensuring the covenant process is properly witnessed.
22. The verb vehimlakhta ('and you shall cause to reign, install as king') is the Hiphil (causative) of m-l-kh — Samuel is being commissioned as king-maker. The dismissal lekhu ish le'iro ('go, each man to his city') is deliberately anticlimactic after the intensity of the preceding exchange. There is no king yet, no name, no anointing. The people return home having won their argument but without their prize. This sets up chapters 9-10, where God's choice of Saul will unfold through what appears to be a series of coincidences — lost donkeys leading to a prophet's door. The transition from theocracy to monarchy will not be dramatic but quiet, almost accidental in its surface narrative, even as it fulfills the deepest theological upheaval in Israel's history.

Summary: A wealthy Benjaminite named Kish sends his son Saul to find lost donkeys. After days of fruitless searching, Saul's servant suggests consulting a man of God in a nearby town. God has already told Samuel that He will send a man from Benjamin to be anointed as leader over Israel, to deliver the people from the Philistines. When Saul arrives, the LORD identifies him to Samuel, and Samuel honors Saul with the chief seat at a feast and a private audience — all before Saul understands what is happening to him.

What Makes This Remarkable: *The entire chapter operates on dramatic irony. Saul is looking for donkeys; God is looking for a king. The reader knows what Saul does not — that every step of his wandering has been orchestrated by divine intention. The word nagid ('designated leader, prince') is used rather than melekh ('king') when God speaks to Samuel about Saul in verse 16. This distinction is theologically loaded: God is not handing over sovereignty but appointing a military deliverer who remains under divine authority. The chapter also preserves a remarkable editorial note in verse 9 — a parenthetical explaining that the word 'prophet' (navi) used to be 'seer' (ro'eh), revealing the text's awareness of its own linguistic history. This is one of the few places in the Hebrew Bible where the narrator steps outside the story to explain archaic terminology to a later audience.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 9 presents a genuine translation challenge: it is a parenthetical gloss, almost certainly editorial, inserted to explain that what the narrator's audience calls a navi ('prophet') was formerly called a ro'eh ('seer'). The question is whether to render this as a seamless part of the narrative or to preserve its disruptive, explanatory quality. We preserve its parenthetical feel because the interruption itself carries meaning — it reveals layers of authorship and the evolution of Israelite religious vocabulary. Verse 16 uses nagid rather than melekh for Saul's role, and the choice is deliberate but difficult to render in English. 'Prince' carries connotations of royal birth; 'commander' is too military. We use 'leader' because nagid implies an appointed leader designated by God, not a hereditary monarch, and the simplicity of the English matches the directness of the Hebrew. The phrase gibbor chayil in verse 1 describing Kish is another friction point — it can mean 'mighty warrior,' 'man of wealth,' or 'man of standing.' Context suggests social prominence and wealth rather than battlefield prowess, but the term deliberately leaves the categories blurred.*

Connections: *Saul's search for lost donkeys and unexpected discovery of a kingdom echoes a persistent biblical pattern: people seeking small things find cosmic ones (Moses tending sheep finds God at the burning bush, Exodus 3:1-2; David keeping sheep is summoned to kingship, 1 Samuel 16:11). The anointing of a Benjaminite as Israel's first king connects to the near-extinction of Benjamin in Judges 19-21 — the smallest and most damaged tribe produces the first king, continuing the theme of God choosing the unlikely. Samuel's role as ro'eh ('seer') links him to the prophetic tradition where divine knowledge comes through direct revelation rather than institutional mediation. The feast scene where Saul receives the thigh portion (the priest's share in Leviticus 7:32-34) anticipates his royal status before it is publicly declared, and the private rooftop conversation echoes the pattern of secret divine appointments that will recur with David (1 Samuel 16:1-13).*

¹There was a man from Benjamin whose name was Kish son of Abiel, son of Zeror, son of Becorath, son of Aphiah — a Benjaminite, a man of standing and strength. ²He had a son named Saul — young, impressive, and there was no one among the sons of Israel more impressive than he. From his shoulders upward he stood taller than all the people. ³The donkeys belonging to Kish, Saul's father, had wandered off. Kish said to his son Saul, "Take one of the servants with you, get up, and go look for the donkeys." ⁴He passed through the hill country of Ephraim and through the region of Shalishah, but they did not find them. They passed through the region of Shaalim — nothing. They passed through the territory of Benjamin, but did not find them. ⁵When they came to the territory of Zuph, Saul said to his servant who was with him, "Come, let's turn back — otherwise my father will stop worrying about the donkeys and start worrying about us." ⁶The servant said to him, "Listen — there is a man of God in this town, and the man is highly respected. Everything he says proves true. Let's go there now; perhaps he can tell us which way to go." ⁷Saul said to his servant, "But if we go, what can we bring the man? The bread in our bags is gone, and there is no gift to bring to the man of God. What do we have?" ⁸The servant answered Saul again: "Look — I have in my hand a quarter-shekel of silver. I will give it to the man of God, and he will tell us our way." ⁹(In former times in Israel, when someone went to inquire of God, they would say, "Come, let us go to the seer" — because the one now called a prophet was formerly called a seer.) ¹⁰Saul said to his servant, "Good idea. Come, let's go." So they went to the town where the man of God was. ¹¹As they were going up the ascent to the town, they encountered young women coming out to draw water, and they asked them, "Is the seer here?" ¹²They answered, "Yes — he is just ahead of you. Hurry now, because he has come to the town today since there is a sacrifice for the people today at the high place." ¹³As soon as you enter the town you will find him, before he goes up to the high place to eat. The people will not eat until he arrives, because he blesses the sacrifice — and after that, the invited guests eat. Go up now, because right about now you will find him." ¹⁴They went up to the town. As they were entering the town, there was Samuel, coming out toward them on his way up to the high place. ¹⁵Now the LORD had uncovered Samuel's ear the day before Saul arrived, saying: ¹⁶"About this time tomorrow I will send to you a man from the territory of Benjamin. You will anoint him as leader over my people Israel, and he will deliver my people from the hand of the Philistines — because I have seen my people, for their cry has reached me." ¹⁷When Samuel saw Saul, the LORD answered him: "This is the man I told you about. He is the one who will govern my people." ¹⁸Saul approached Samuel in the gateway and said, "Please tell me — where is the seer's house?" ¹⁹Samuel answered Saul: "I am the seer. Go up ahead of me to the high place, and you will eat with me today. In the morning I will send you on your way, and everything that is in your heart I will tell you." ²⁰"As for your donkeys that went missing three days ago — don't worry about them; they have been found. And to whom does all that Israel desires belong? Is it not to you and to your father's entire house?" ²¹Saul answered, "Am I not a Benjaminite, from the smallest of the tribes of Israel? And my clan is the least of all the clans of the tribe of Benjamin. Why would you say such a thing to me?" ²²Samuel took Saul and his servant and brought them into the hall, and he gave them a place at the head of the invited guests — about thirty people. ²³Samuel said to the cook, "Bring the portion I gave you — the one I told you to set aside." ²⁴The cook lifted up the thigh and what was on it and set it before Saul. Samuel said, "Here is what has been reserved — set it before you and eat, because it was kept for you for this appointed time when I said, 'I have invited the people.'" So Saul ate with Samuel that day. ²⁵They came down from the high place into the town, and Samuel spoke with Saul on the rooftop. ²⁶They rose early, and as dawn was breaking, Samuel called to Saul on the rooftop: "Get up, and I will send you on your way." Saul got up, and the two of them — he and Samuel — went out into the street. ²⁷As they were going down to the edge of the town, Samuel said to Saul, "Tell the servant to go on ahead of us" — and he went on — "but you, stand here for a moment, so I can make you hear the word of God."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The genealogy traces five generations, grounding Kish firmly in Benjamin. The phrase ish yemini ('a man of the right hand,' i.e., a Benjaminite) is a play on the tribal name Binyamin ('son of the right hand'). The final descriptor gibbor chayil is applied to Kish, not to Saul — the father's social position is what matters for the introduction. In context, gibbor chayil likely denotes a man of wealth, social prominence, and capability rather than strictly a warrior. The same phrase describes Boaz in Ruth 2:1, where it clearly means a man of means and standing.
1. The five-generation genealogy (ben Avi'el ben Tseror ben Bekhorat ben Aficah) is unusually deep, paralleling the genealogy of Elkanah in 1 Samuel 1:1. Both introductions invest heavily in lineage, signaling that family identity matters in this narrative world.
2. The name Sha'ul means 'asked for' or 'requested' — from the verb sha'al ('to ask'). This is profoundly ironic: the man whose name means 'asked for' is the answer to Israel's demand for a king (1 Samuel 8:5-6). The wordplay with Samuel's name (connected to sha'al in 1:20) binds the two figures linguistically.
2. The physical description emphasizes height (gavoah mi-kol ha-am, 'taller than all the people') as Saul's defining visible trait. This is not neutral observation — it sets up the theological contrast with David's selection in chapter 16, where God explicitly rejects the criteria of height and appearance. Saul is everything the human eye would choose.
3. The verb avad ('to be lost, to perish, to wander') is used for the donkeys. The same verb will carry heavier meaning later — things that are 'lost' in 1 Samuel often turn out to be divinely redirected. The donkeys' disappearance is the mundane mechanism God uses to move Saul toward Samuel. The Hebrew atonot (female donkeys) were valuable work animals; their loss was a genuine economic concern for even a wealthy household.
3. Kish's command uses three verbs in sequence: qach ('take'), qum ('arise'), lekh ('go') — an urgent, stacked imperative. He is not making a casual suggestion. The addition of na ('please, now') softens the command slightly, but the father's authority is clear.
4. The repetitive structure — passed through X, did not find; passed through Y, nothing; passed through Z, did not find — creates a rhythm of futility. Each region yields emptiness. The Hebrew va-ayin ('and nothing,' 'and there was not') is starkly abrupt, even more terse than the surrounding negations. The geographic sweep covers a wide area: from Ephraim's hills through Shalishah (possibly northwest of Benjamin) to Shaalim (possibly 'land of foxes') and back into Benjamin. Saul has circled extensively and found nothing.
4. The place names may carry symbolic weight. Shalishah may relate to shalosh ('three') and Shaalim to shu'al ('fox'). If so, the names paint a landscape of fragmented, wild territory — fitting for a search that leads nowhere by human reckoning but everywhere by divine design.
5. The land of Zuph connects directly to Samuel's genealogy — Zuph is Samuel's ancestor (1 Samuel 1:1). Without knowing it, Saul has wandered into Samuel's ancestral territory. The verb da'ag ('to worry, to be anxious') reveals Saul's concern for his father's emotional state — a detail that humanizes him and shows filial loyalty. The verb chadal ('to cease, to stop') paired with min ('from') gives the sense of Kish redirecting his anxiety from the donkeys to his missing son.

5. Saul's impulse to return home is the natural, sensible response. The narrative tension depends on what happens next: the servant's suggestion will redirect Saul toward Samuel and toward his destiny. Human wisdom says go home; divine providence says keep going.
6. The servant calls Samuel ish Elohim ('man of God') — a title that designates a person who carries divine authority and whose words have demonstrable power. The phrase nikhbad ('honored, weighty, respected') comes from the root kavod ('glory, weight, honor'). The servant's recommendation is grounded in Samuel's track record: kol asher yedabber bo yavo ('all that he speaks surely comes') uses the infinitive absolute construction (bo yavo) to emphasize certainty — his words never fail.
6. The servant's knowledge of Samuel suggests he is more informed about the religious landscape than his master. The phrase et darkenu asher halakhnu aleha ('our way on which we have gone') is specific — the servant is asking not for general prophecy but for practical direction about their journey. They are consulting a seer about donkeys, not about kingdoms.
7. Saul's concern about arriving empty-handed reflects the cultural expectation that one does not consult a man of God without a gift. The word teshurah ('gift, present') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible — it is a rare term for a token of respect or a consultation fee. The verb azal ('is spent, is gone, is used up') describes the bread as entirely consumed. Saul's practical concern — we have nothing to offer — reveals both proper etiquette and his limited perspective. He is worried about protocol while God is arranging a coronation.
8. The servant produces reva sheqel kesef ('a quarter-shekel of silver') — a small amount, but enough to serve as a consultation gift. The servant's resourcefulness advances the narrative at every turn: he knew about the man of God, and now he has the means to pay. The verb nimtsa ('is found') in nimtsa be-yadi ('is found in my hand') suggests the silver was unexpectedly available — even this small detail serves the theme of divine provision through ordinary circumstances.
8. The servant's confidence — veheggid lanu et darkenu ('and he will tell us our way') — contrasts with Saul's hesitation. The servant expects results; Saul was ready to go home.
9. We preserve the parenthetical format because the verse is not part of the narrative flow — it is a scholarly note embedded in the text. The phrase le-fanim be-Yisra'el ('in former times in Israel') signals that the narrator is speaking from a later vantage point. The verb darash ('to inquire, to seek') when paired with Elohim ('God') is a technical term for seeking divine guidance through a prophet or oracle.
9. The distinction between ro'eh and navi is historically significant. The ro'eh tradition appears to be older, associated with individual seers who could locate lost objects, identify hidden information, and perceive divine intent. The navi tradition emphasizes the prophetic office as a channel of God's proclaimed word. Samuel bridges both roles — he is the last of the old seers and the first of the institutional prophets.
10. Saul's response tov devarkha ('good is your word') is brief and decisive — once persuaded, he commits. The phrase is literally 'your word is good,' affirming the servant's suggestion. The pace of the narrative accelerates here after the slow, repetitive searching of verse 4. The shift from wandering to purposeful movement signals that the story is converging on its goal.
11. The scene of meeting women at a water source is a recurring biblical type-scene — encounters at wells typically signal pivotal moments (Genesis 24:11-14 for Rebekah, Genesis 29:1-12 for Rachel, Exodus 2:15-21 for Zipporah). Here the pattern is adapted: instead of a betrothal, the women direct Saul toward his anointing. The word na'arot ('young women') and the activity of drawing water (lish'ov mayim) deliberately invoke the convention, and the audience would have recognized the echo.
11. The use of ha-ro'eh ('the seer') rather than ha-navi ('the prophet') in their question follows the narrator's explanation in verse 9 — they use the older terminology that fits the pre-prophetic idiom of the story's setting.
12. The young women's response is surprisingly detailed and urgent. They use maher ('hurry') and atah ('now') to press speed. The mention of the bamah ('high place') is significant — before the centralization of worship in Jerusalem under Josiah's reform (2 Kings 23), local high places served as legitimate worship sites. Samuel presides over sacrificial worship at a bamah without any narrative disapproval, reflecting the pre-Deuteronomic setting of the story.
12. The word zevach ('sacrifice') here refers to a communal sacrificial feast — the meat of the offering would be shared among the participants after the sacred portion was offered. This is the feast at which Saul will receive the place of honor.
13. The women's knowledge of Samuel's schedule and role reveals his authority in the community. He is the one who mevarekh ha-zevach ('blesses the sacrifice') — without his blessing, no one eats. The word ha-qeru'im ('the invited ones, the called ones') indicates that this is not an open public meal but a curated guest list. Saul will be seated among the qeru'im as a guest of honor — an invitation he does not yet know is waiting for him.
13. The repetition of timtse'un oto ('you will find him') at the beginning and end of the women's speech creates a frame of certainty: you will find him, so go now, you will find him. The verb matsa ('to find') echoes the search for the donkeys — they could not find (lo matsa'u) the animals, but they will find the seer.
14. The timing is precise to the point of being providential — just as Saul enters, Samuel exits, heading in their direction. The phrase yotse liqratam ('coming out to meet them') uses the same construction used for deliberate encounters elsewhere, but here Samuel does not yet know who they are. The convergence is orchestrated from above: God has placed these two men on a collision course, and the narrator presents the moment with understated drama — vehineh Shemu'el ('and there was Samuel').
15. The idiom galah ozen ('to uncover the ear') appears in 2 Samuel 7:27, Ruth 4:4, and Job 33:16, always denoting the private disclosure of information that would otherwise remain hidden. We retain the literal image ('uncovered Samuel's ear') rather than flattening it to 'told Samuel' because the idiom preserves the physicality of prophetic experience — revelation is not merely informational but sensory.

15. The temporal marker yom echad ('one day') is precise. God prepared Samuel exactly twenty-four hours before the moment of meeting. The narrative is structured so the reader learns God's plan (verses 15-16) before Saul does, creating dramatic irony that will persist through the entire chapter.
16. The title nagid is theologically charged and deliberately chosen over melekh ('king'). A nagid is appointed by God and accountable to God; the term preserves divine sovereignty over Israel's governance. We render it 'leader' because the term conveys appointed authority without implying autonomous royal power. The word will recur at critical moments in 1-2 Samuel.
16. The phrase ba'ah tsa'aqatam elai ('their cry has come to me') uses tsa'aqah — the same word for the cry of Israel in Egyptian bondage (Exodus 3:9). God responds to the Philistine oppression with the same language used for the Egyptian oppression, framing Saul's appointment as a new exodus-type deliverance.
17. The verb atsar is rendered 'govern' rather than 'reign' to reflect its restraining connotation. The word does not appear in the standard vocabulary of kingship — it carries overtones of holding, checking, and containing. Some scholars translate it 'restrain' (i.e., Saul will hold back the people from disintegration), which fits the political context of Philistine pressure and internal tribal fragmentation.
17. The divine identification of Saul — zeh ya'atsor be-ammi ('this one will govern my people') — uses the emphatic demonstrative zeh ('this one'), physically pointing to Saul. God identifies the future leader not by name or genealogy but by pointing: this one, right there.
18. The dramatic irony reaches its peak. Saul asks the seer where the seer lives — he is speaking to the very man he is looking for and does not know it. The sha'ar ('gate') was the public gathering place where legal and social transactions occurred; it is the town's center of activity. Saul's request is polite — haggidah na li ('please tell me') uses the particle na for courtesy — and entirely mundane. He has no idea he is standing before the man who will change his life.
18. The verb nagash ('to approach, to draw near') often carries ritual or formal connotations in Hebrew (approaching an altar, drawing near to God). Its use here may subtly signal that Saul is approaching something far more significant than he realizes.
19. Samuel's self-identification anokhi ha-ro'eh ('I am the seer') is direct and authoritative. His instructions reverse the expected social hierarchy — he tells Saul aleh le-fanai ('go up before me'), giving Saul the position of precedence by having him walk ahead. The promise vekhol asher bilvavekha aggid lakh ('everything that is in your heart I will tell you') goes far beyond donkey-finding. Samuel claims to know the contents of Saul's heart — a seer's knowledge that extends to inner thoughts and unspoken desires.
19. The sequence of Samuel's commands — eat with me today, I will send you tomorrow, and I will reveal your heart — creates a structured program: fellowship, then revelation, then commission. Samuel is not improvising; he is following the divine plan disclosed to him the day before.
20. Samuel demonstrates his identity as seer by knowing about the donkeys before Saul mentions them. The phrase al tasem et libbkha lahen ('do not set your heart on them') means 'stop worrying about them' — the verb sum ('to set, to place') with lev ('heart') describes where one directs attention and concern. Samuel redirects Saul's heart from donkeys to destiny.
20. The phrase kol chemdat Yisra'el ('all the desire of Israel') is ambiguous and provocative. Chemdah means 'desire, delight, precious thing' — Samuel is saying that everything Israel longs for now belongs to Saul and his father's house. The statement hints at kingship without naming it, leaving Saul to grasp the implication. The inclusion of kol beit avikha ('all your father's house') extends the promise beyond Saul individually to his dynasty.
21. Saul's response mirrors Gideon's protest in Judges 6:15 ('my clan is the weakest in Manasseh, and I am the least in my father's house') — both men respond to divine selection with claims of insignificance. Whether Saul's humility is genuine or performative is debated. Benjamin was indeed the smallest tribe after the near-annihilation recorded in Judges 20-21, so his claim has historical basis. The phrase mi-qatannei shivtei Yisra'el ('from the smallest of the tribes of Israel') uses qatan ('small, insignificant') — the same word used when God chose David over his brothers (1 Samuel 16:11).
21. The question lamah dibbarta elai ka-davar ha-zeh ('why have you spoken to me a thing like this?') reveals Saul's bewilderment. He came looking for donkeys and is hearing intimations of national destiny.
22. The lishkah ('hall, chamber, room') is the dining room attached to the high place where the sacrificial feast takes place. Samuel seats Saul be-rosh ha-qeru'im ('at the head of the called ones') — the position of highest honor among the invited guests. This is a public act of distinction: in a room of thirty prominent people, the unknown stranger from Benjamin is placed first. The number thirty (kishloshim) may suggest a formal council or representative gathering rather than a casual meal.
22. Samuel's actions speak before his words. By seating Saul at the head, he signals Saul's importance to the entire assembly without yet explaining why. The guests witness the honor without understanding its full significance.
23. The word tabbach ('cook, butcher') comes from the root tavach ('to slaughter'). Samuel had pre-arranged this: he gave the cook a specific portion (manah) with instructions to keep it in reserve (sim otah immakh, 'place it with you'). This advance preparation reveals that Samuel expected Saul's arrival — the divine revelation of verse 15-16 had already been translated into practical action. The seer does not merely receive knowledge; he acts on it.
24. The shoq ('thigh') is the priestly portion in the Levitical system. Its presentation to Saul carries implicit sacral significance — he is being treated as someone who holds a sacred office. The phrase ve-he'aleha ('and what was upon it') likely refers to the fat or additional meat on the thigh portion, indicating a generous, complete serving.

- 24. The Hebrew of this verse is textually difficult. The phrase la-mo'ed shamur lekha le'mor ha-am qarati has been interpreted variously. Our rendering takes it as: 'for this appointed time it was kept for you, since I said I have invited the people' — meaning Samuel set aside the portion when he organized the feast, knowing that God's appointed guest would arrive. The word mo'ed ('appointed time') resonates with its use for Israel's sacred festivals, elevating this meal beyond ordinary hospitality.
- 25. The gag ('roof, rooftop') was a flat surface used for private conversation, sleeping, and retreat in ancient Israelite homes. Samuel's choice to speak with Saul al ha-gag ('on the rooftop') signals a private, confidential conversation — above the household, away from listening ears. The verb dibber ('he spoke') without specifying the content creates suspense. The narrator withholds what Samuel told Saul on the rooftop, preserving the mystery of this private revelation. The reader knows from verses 15-16 what the subject must be, but the conversation itself remains unrecorded.
- 26. The phrase ka'alot ha-shachar ('as the dawn was rising') uses the verb alah ('to go up') for the dawn — the sun ascends as Saul's destiny ascends. Samuel's command qumah va-ashallchekka ('get up and I will send you') uses the same verb shalach ('to send') that God used in verse 16 ('I will send to you a man'). God sent Saul to Samuel; now Samuel sends Saul forward into his commission. The word ha-chutzah ('outside, into the open') indicates they moved from the private rooftop into the public street — the transition from private revelation to the beginning of public action.
- 27. The phrase amod ka-yom ('stand here for a moment,' literally 'stand as the day' or 'stand now') signals a pause in movement — physical stillness before a life-altering word. The verb ashmi'akha ('I will make you hear') uses the causative stem, emphasizing that this is not casual information but divinely authorized communication that Samuel will actively transmit. The word davar ('word') in davar Elohim means both 'word' and 'thing/matter' — the word of God is not merely speech but reality-creating substance.
- 27. The chapter ends mid-action, with Saul standing still and Samuel about to speak. This is a deliberate cliffhanger — the anointing itself is reserved for chapter 10:1, creating a chapter break that suspends the reader at the moment of maximum anticipation.

Summary: Samuel privately anoints Saul as ruler over Israel and gives him three signs to confirm the divine appointment: he will meet men near Rachel's tomb who tell him the donkeys are found, then three men going up to God at Bethel will give him bread, and finally he will encounter a band of prophets at Gibeah and the Spirit of the LORD will rush upon him and he will prophesy with them. All three signs come true that same day. Samuel then convenes Israel at Mizpah, where the lot falls on Saul of the tribe of Benjamin. When they search for him, Saul is found hiding among the baggage. Samuel presents him to the people — taller than anyone — and declares him God's chosen. Some valiant men rally to Saul, but certain worthless men despise him and bring him no tribute. Saul keeps silent.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains the most detailed anointing scene in the Hebrew Bible. Samuel does not merely pour oil; he kisses Saul, explains the significance of the act, and then provides three escalating confirmatory signs — each more supernatural than the last. The first sign involves ordinary information (the donkeys are found), the second involves unsolicited provision (bread from strangers), and the third involves radical personal transformation (the Spirit of God changing Saul into a different man). The progression mirrors how God confirms a calling: through circumstances, through provision, and finally through inner transformation. The proverb 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (hagam Sha'ul banneviim) became a lasting idiom in Israel — the skeptic's question about whether an unlikely person truly belongs among the inspired. That Saul hides among the baggage at Mizpah is one of the Bible's most psychologically revealing moments: the man God has chosen does not want to be found.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 1 in the Masoretic Text is unusually long and some scholars believe the opening phrase ('Then Samuel took a flask of oil...') originally began a sentence that continued into what is now verse 2 — the verse division may be secondary. The Hebrew of verse 1 also contains the phrase halo ki meshachakha YHWH al nachalato lenagid ('Has not the LORD anointed you as ruler over his inheritance?'), which the Septuagint expands significantly, adding an entire clause about Saul saving Israel from their enemies. We follow the MT but note the LXX divergence. The word tsemach in verse 2 (rendered 'Zelzah' as a place name) is obscure and its location uncertain. The phrase vayyitnabbe betokham ('he prophesied among them') in verse 10 raises the question of what prophesying means here — ecstatic behavior, musical worship, or spoken oracles. The Hebrew hitpa'el form of n-b-a suggests ecstatic or reflexive prophetic behavior rather than formal oracular speech.*

Connections: The anointing of Saul connects directly to Samuel's warning in chapter 8 about what a king will do, and to God's instruction in 9:16 to anoint a man from Benjamin. The oil flask (pak hashemen) echoes priestly anointing in Exodus 29 and Leviticus 8, but here it is applied to a political-military leader — the first time in Israel's history that royal anointing occurs. The Spirit rushing upon Saul (ruach Elohim tsalach) uses the same verb (tsalach) later applied to Samson (Judges 14:6, 19; 15:14) and to David after his anointing (1 Samuel 16:13). The lot-casting at Mizpah recalls Joshua's distribution of land by lot (Joshua 18-19) and anticipates the Urim and Thummim decisions of Israel's later history. Saul hiding among the baggage will find its dark mirror in his later disobedience when he spares Agag and the best livestock (chapter 15) — a man who hides from authority eventually abuses it.

¹Samuel took the flask of oil and poured it over Saul's head. He kissed him and said, "The LORD has anointed you as leader over his own inheritance." ²"When you leave me today, you will find two men near Rachel's tomb, at the border of Benjamin in Zelzah. They will tell you, 'The donkeys you went looking for have been found. Your father has stopped worrying about the donkeys and is now anxious about you, saying, What can I do about my son?'" ³"From there, continue on until you reach the oak of Tabor. Three men going up to God at Bethel will meet you there — one carrying three young goats, another carrying three loaves of bread, and another carrying a skin of wine." ⁴"They will greet you with a blessing of peace and give you two loaves of bread. Accept them from their hands." ⁵"After that you will come to Gibeah of God, where the Philistine garrison is stationed. As you enter the town, you will encounter a band of prophets coming down from the high place, with lyres, tambourines, flutes, and harps playing before them, and they will be prophesying." ⁶"The Spirit of the LORD will rush upon you, and you will prophesy with them, and you will be transformed into a different man." ⁷"When these signs come to you, do whatever your hand finds to do, because God is with you." ⁸"Then go down ahead of me to Gilgal. I will come down to you to offer burnt offerings and to sacrifice peace offerings. Wait seven days until I come to you, and I will tell you what to do." ⁹As Saul turned his shoulder to leave Samuel, God gave him a different heart. And all those signs were fulfilled that same day. ¹⁰When they arrived at Gibeah, a band of prophets came to meet him. The Spirit of God rushed upon him, and he prophesied among them. ¹¹Everyone who had known him before saw him prophesying with the prophets, and the people said to one another, "What has happened to the son of Kish? Is Saul really among the prophets?" ¹²A man from there responded, "And who is their father?" That is why it became a proverb: "Is Saul really among the prophets?" ¹³When the prophesying ended, Saul went to the high place. ¹⁴Saul's uncle asked him and his servant, "Where did you go?" Saul said, "To look for the donkeys. When we could not find them, we went to Samuel." ¹⁵Saul's uncle said, "Tell me — what did Samuel say to you?" ¹⁶Saul told his uncle, "He assured us that the donkeys had been found." But about the matter of the kingship — what Samuel had said — he told him nothing. ¹⁷Samuel summoned the people to the LORD at Mizpah. ¹⁸He said to the Israelites, "This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'I brought Israel up from Egypt. I rescued you from the power of Egypt and from the power of all the kingdoms that oppressed you.'" ¹⁹"But today you have rejected your God — the one who saves you from all your disasters and distresses — and you have said to him, 'No — set a king over us.' Now then, present yourselves before the LORD by your tribes and by your clans." ²⁰Samuel brought all the tribes of Israel forward, and the tribe of Benjamin was selected by lot. ²¹He brought the tribe of Benjamin forward by its clans, and the clan of Matri was selected. Then Saul son of Kish was selected. But when they searched for him, he could not be found. ²²They inquired of the LORD again, "Has the man come here?" And the LORD said, "He is there, hiding among the baggage." ²³They ran and brought him out from there. When he stood among the people, he was taller than everyone else from his shoulders up. ²⁴Samuel said to all the people, "Do you see the one the LORD has chosen? There is no one like him among all the people!" All the people shouted, "Long live the king!" ²⁵Samuel explained to the people the rights and duties of kingship, wrote them in a document, and deposited it before the LORD. Then Samuel dismissed all the people, each to his own home. ²⁶Saul also went home to Gibeah, and with him went valiant men whose hearts God had touched. ²⁷But certain worthless men said, "How can this one save us?" They despised him and brought him no tribute. But Saul kept silent.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The pak hashemen ('flask of oil') uses pak, a small vessel — not the shofar (horn) used for David's anointing in 16:13. Some commentators see the fragile flask as foreshadowing Saul's fragile reign versus David's more enduring horn-anointing. The verb mashach ('to anoint') is the root of mashiach ('messiah/anointed one'). The term nagid ('ruler, leader, one placed at the front') differs from melek ('king') — nagid emphasizes appointed military-political leadership under God's authority, while melek carries connotations of sovereign rule. The LXX significantly expands this verse, adding 'over his people, over Israel, and you shall reign over the people of the LORD, and you shall save them from the hand of their enemies round about.'
2. Rachel's tomb (qevurat Rachel) near the Benjamin border is a significant landmark — Rachel was the mother of Benjamin, making this location ancestrally meaningful for Saul the Benjaminite. The place name Zelzah (betseltsach) is obscure; its location remains uncertain and the word may be corrupt. The shift from Kish worrying about donkeys to worrying about his son (mah e'eseh livni) is poignant: the mundane search for livestock has escalated into a father's fear for his child. The verb da'ag ('to be anxious, to worry') conveys genuine emotional distress, not casual concern.
3. The elon Tavor ('oak of Tabor') is a sacred tree serving as a landmark — trees frequently mark holy sites in the patriarchal narratives (Genesis 12:6; 35:8). The three men are pilgrims heading to Bethel ('House of God'), carrying offerings: young goats (gedayim) for sacrifice, bread (lechem) for a grain offering or communal meal, and wine (yayin) for a drink offering. This is a complete sacrificial provision. The term nevel-yayin ('skin of wine') uses nevel for a leather wineskin — the same word that elsewhere means a stringed instrument (both have rounded, bulging shapes).
4. The phrase sha'alu lekha leshalom ('they will ask about your peace/welfare') is the standard Hebrew greeting — but here strangers will spontaneously offer both greeting and provision to a man they do not know. That pilgrims carrying offerings to God would divert part of their provision to Saul is a sign of unsolicited divine favor. The instruction velaqachta miyyadam ('accept from their hands') is significant: Saul must receive, not refuse. Accepting provision from strangers is an act of trust in the God who arranged the encounter.
5. Gibeah ha'Elohim ('Hill of God') is likely Saul's own hometown of Gibeah in Benjamin — the Philistine garrison there underscores how deeply Philistia has penetrated into Israelite territory. The chevel nevi'im ('band/company of prophets') uses chevel, literally 'cord, rope,' suggesting a bound-together group — these are not isolated individuals but a prophetic community. The instruments — nevel (lyre), tof (hand-drum/tambourine), chalil (flute/pipe), and kinnor (harp) — indicate that prophetic activity was accompanied by music. The hitpa'el form mitnabbe'im ('prophesying') suggests ecstatic, Spirit-driven behavior rather than formal oracular proclamation.
6. The verb tsalach (from tsalach, 'to rush upon, to prosper') is the characteristic verb for the Spirit's powerful, sudden action on individuals — it is used of Samson (Judges 14:6, 19; 15:14) and later of David (1 Samuel 16:13). The phrase ruach YHWH ('Spirit of the LORD') denotes God's active, empowering presence — not an abstract force but the personal energy of the living God directed at a specific person for a specific purpose. The phrase le'ish acher ('into a different man') uses acher ('other, different') — this is not improvement but replacement; Saul will become someone he was not before.
7. The phrase asheh lekha asher timtsa yadekha ('do for yourself what your hand finds') is an idiom for seizing the opportunity at hand — acting decisively when the moment comes. Samuel does not give Saul a detailed action plan; he gives him signs to confirm God's presence and then tells him to act on his own judgment. This is the essence of Spirit-empowered leadership: God confirms the calling, then the leader must act with courage. The grounding clause ki ha'Elohim immakh ('because God is with you') is the ultimate authorization — not strategy, not resources, but divine presence.
8. This instruction becomes critically important in chapter 13, where Saul fails to wait the full seven days and offers the sacrifice himself — the act that costs him his dynasty. Samuel is establishing a chain of authority: Saul leads, but Samuel mediates between God and king. The burnt offerings (olot) represent total consecration to God; the peace offerings (zivchei shelamim) represent communion and covenant fellowship. Gilgal, near Jericho, was the site of Israel's first camp after crossing the Jordan (Joshua 4:19-20) — a place of new beginnings. The seven-day wait is a test of obedience embedded within the commission.
9. The phrase kehafnoto shikhmo ('when he turned his shoulder') is vivid physical description — the narrative captures the exact moment of departure. The verb hafakh ('to turn, transform, overturn') is used for dramatic reversals throughout the Hebrew Bible: the overthrow of Sodom (Genesis 19:25), turning water to blood (Exodus 7:17), and turning mourning to joy (Esther 9:22). Lev acher ('a different heart') uses the same adjective acher ('other, different') as ish acher ('a different man') in verse 6. The confirmation vayyavo'u khol-ha'otot ha'elohim bayyom hahu ('all those signs came that day') compresses what must have been hours of travel into a single summary statement.
10. The third sign is now fulfilled. The verb vatitslach ('rushed upon') is the same tsalach promised in verse 6, now narrated as accomplished fact. The phrase vayyitnabbe betokham ('he prophesied among/in the midst of them') uses the hitpa'el form of n-b-a, which suggests ecstatic, Spirit-driven prophetic behavior — Saul is swept up into something larger than himself. The plural 'they arrived' (vayyavo'u) indicates Saul was traveling with companions, possibly including the servant from chapter 9. The scene is public: Saul prophesies in the open, and the people who know him are watching.
11. The phrase kol-yode'o me'itmol shilshom ('all who knew him from yesterday and the day before,' i.e., 'from before') establishes that this behavior is unprecedented for Saul. His neighbors know him as a farmer's son, not a prophet. The question mah-zeh hayah leven-Qish ('what has happened to the son of Kish?') expresses genuine bewilderment — they identify him by his father's name, emphasizing his ordinary family origin. The question hagam Sha'ul banneviim ('Is Saul also among the prophets?') becomes a proverbial saying in Israel (referenced again in 19:24), expressing incredulity when an unlikely person displays unexpected spiritual capacity.

12. The phrase umi avihem ('and who is their father?') is one of the most debated lines in 1 Samuel. The pronoun 'their' could refer to the prophets (challenging the assumption that prophecy requires noble lineage) or could be a rhetorical challenge about Saul specifically. The word mashal ('proverb, parable, byword') indicates that the saying transcended this specific event and entered Israel's cultural vocabulary. A mashal is a compressed piece of wisdom that captures a recurring human situation in a memorable phrase.
13. The verb vaykhal ('he finished, he completed') indicates the prophetic episode was temporary — it had a beginning and an end. The Spirit's rushing was for a specific moment, not a permanent state. Saul then goes to the bamah ('high place'), the elevated worship site. This may be the same high place the prophets were descending from in verse 5, or a different one. High places were the standard local worship sites before the temple was built — they were elevated platforms, sometimes with structures, used for sacrifice and prayer.
14. The dod ('uncle') of Saul appears without prior introduction — the narrative assumes the reader knows the family context. The uncle's question is casual, but Saul's answer is carefully edited: he mentions Samuel but omits the anointing entirely. The phrase vanir'eh ki-ayin ('we saw that they were nowhere') explains the escalation from donkey-search to prophet-consultation, making the visit to Samuel sound practical rather than revelatory.
15. The uncle's follow-up question (mah-amar lakhem Shemu'el, 'what did Samuel say to you?') presses further. The particle na ('please, I ask') adds urgency — he senses there is more to the story than a donkey search. The uncle uses the plural lakhem ('to you all'), including the servant in the question.
16. The infinitive absolute haged higgid ('declaring he declared / he certainly told') gives emphatic force to Saul's partial truth — he makes the donkey report sound thorough while omitting everything that matters. The term melukhah ('kingship, royal authority') is the narrator's word, not Saul's — Saul does not use it because he does not speak of it at all. The narrator's aside (ve'et devar hammelukhah lo-higgid lo) breaks the dialogue pattern to make a psychological observation: Saul is already managing information, already guarding the secret of his anointing.
17. The verb vayyats'eq ('he cried out, he summoned') conveys urgent, authoritative calling — this is a national assembly, not a casual gathering. Mizpah (hammitspah, 'the watchtower') was a traditional assembly site in Benjamin (Judges 20:1; 1 Samuel 7:5-6). The phrase el-YHWH ('to the LORD') indicates this is a sacred convocation — the people are summoned not just to hear Samuel but to stand before God. What follows is a public, lot-based selection to confirm what has already been determined privately.
18. Samuel speaks with prophetic authority — koh amar YHWH ('thus says the LORD') is the standard messenger formula used by prophets throughout the Hebrew Bible. God recites his own resume: He'eleiti ('I brought up') references the Exodus, and va'atsil ('I rescued') from the root n-ts-l references ongoing deliverance. The phrase kol-hammamlakhot hallochatsim etkhem ('all the kingdoms that oppressed you') summarizes the entire Judges period — Moab, Canaan, Midian, Ammon, Philistia. God's point is: I have been your deliverer all along. The request for a king is a rejection of that history.
19. The verb me'astem ('you have rejected') is strong — ma'as means to refuse, reject, despise. God does not describe the people's request as misguided or premature but as rejection. The participle moshi'a ('who saves') is in the present tense — God is not merely their past deliverer but their ongoing savior. The phrase ra'oteikhem vetsaroteikhem ('your disasters and your distresses') covers both external calamities and internal pressures. The command hityatssevu ('present yourselves') uses the hitpa'el, implying deliberate, formal positioning — they must stand formally before God for the lot to be cast. The organization leshivteikhem ule'alpeikhem ('by your tribes and by your thousands/clans') follows the military census structure.
20. The verb vayyiqqarev ('he brought near') is a technical term for presenting before God, often used in sacrificial contexts. The verb vayyillakhd ('was taken, was captured') from l-k-d means literally 'was seized' — the lot 'captures' the chosen party. The mechanism of the lot is not described — it may have been Urim and Thummim, casting stones, or another sacred lot procedure. The passive voice ('was taken') emphasizes that the selection is not Samuel's doing but God's. Benjamin, the smallest tribe (Judges 21:6), is chosen — God's pattern of selecting the least continues.
21. The Matri clan (mishpachat hammaTri) appears only here in the Hebrew Bible; nothing else is known about it. The triple narrowing (tribe, clan, individual) follows the procedure used when Achan was identified in Joshua 7:16-18. The phrase vayvaqshuhu velo nimtsa ('they sought him and he was not found') creates dramatic tension: God's lot has identified Saul, but Saul himself is absent. The verb biqesh ('to seek') echoes the donkey search of chapter 9, creating an ironic reversal — the seeker has become the sought.
22. The verb vayyish'alu ('they inquired') puns on Saul's name (Sha'ul, 'asked for / requested'). The inquiry of the LORD (ba-YHWH) likely involved Urim and Thummim or another oracular device — God gives a direct, locational answer. The verb nechba ('has hidden himself') from ch-b-a means to hide deliberately; this is not accidental absence but intentional concealment. The kelim ('baggage, vessels, equipment') refers to the assembled supplies and gear the people brought to Mizpah. The image of Israel's first king hiding among luggage has generated centuries of commentary on the psychology of divine calling.
23. The verb vayyarutsu ('they ran') conveys urgency and excitement — the crowd rushes to retrieve their king. The verb vayyityatsev ('he stood, he positioned himself') uses the same root as hityatssevu ('present yourselves') in verse 19: the people were told to present themselves before God, and now Saul finally does the same. His physical stature — taller than everyone mishikhmo vama'lah ('from his shoulders and upward') — is emphasized as visible confirmation of his selection. The same description appeared in 9:2. In a culture that associated height with leadership capacity, Saul looks the part, whatever his internal reluctance.
24. Samuel's presentation uses bachar ('to choose, to elect') — the verb of divine selection used for Israel itself (Deuteronomy 7:6). The rhetorical question hare'item ('do you see?') forces the crowd to look and acknowledge. The phrase ein kamahu bekol-ha'am ('there is none like him among all the people') is ambiguous — it could refer to his height, his character, or simply his unique divine selection. The acclamation vayyari'u ('they shouted') followed by yechi hammelekh ('long live the king!') is Israel's first royal acclamation — the birth of the monarchy in a single shout. The word melekh ('king') is now spoken aloud by the people; the transition from theocracy to monarchy is verbally enacted.

25. The mishpat hammelukhah ('the rights/manner of kingship') is a constitutional document — mishpat here means 'established ordinance, regulation, charter.' This may be distinct from the mishpat hammelekh ('the manner of the king') in 8:11-18, which was a warning; this appears to be a positive charter defining how kingship should function under God. Samuel writes it bassefer ('in the/a document') and places it lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') — likely at a sanctuary, as a covenant witness. This is Israel's first written constitution, stored in sacred space to indicate that the king's authority derives from and answers to God.
26. Saul returns not to a palace but to his home in Gibeah — the monarchy has no infrastructure yet. The chayil ('valiant men, men of substance') who accompany him are not conscripts but volunteers drawn by divine impulse: asher-naga Elohim belibbam ('whose hearts God had touched'). The verb naga ('to touch, to strike') suggests direct divine contact — God physically reaching into these men's hearts to stir loyalty toward Saul. This is a small, Spirit-formed entourage, not an army. The new king goes home with a handful of God-touched followers.
27. The phrase benei veliyya'al ('sons of worthlessness/wickedness') is a Hebrew idiom for morally bankrupt troublemakers — beliyya'al may compound beli ('without') and ya'al ('worth, profit'). The verb vayyivzuhu ('they despised him') from b-z-h is the same verb used when Esau 'despised' his birthright (Genesis 25:34) — it indicates contemptuous disregard. The minchah ('tribute, gift, offering') they withhold is the standard acknowledgment of a new ruler's authority; refusing it is a political act of defiance. The final phrase vayyehi kemmucharish ('he was as one being silent') uses the hiphil participle of ch-r-sh ('to plow, to be silent, to be deaf'). The comparative ke- ('like, as') is unusual — he was 'like' one who keeps silent, as if the narrator sees him choosing silence rather than silence being his natural state.

Summary: Nahash the Ammonite besieges Jabesh-gilead and offers a humiliating treaty: he will gouge out every man's right eye as a disgrace to all Israel. The elders of Jabesh ask for seven days to seek help. When the news reaches Gibeah, the Spirit of God rushes upon Saul in fierce anger. He butchers a pair of oxen, sends the pieces throughout Israel as a summons, and musters a massive army. Saul divides his forces into three companies, attacks at the morning watch, and shatters the Ammonites so completely that no two survivors remain together. The people then gather at Gilgal to renew Saul's kingship with sacrifices and celebration.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is Saul at his absolute best — the leader Israel hoped for. The Spirit of God (ruach Elohim) comes on him not in a worship setting but in response to injustice: he hears about Nahash's cruelty and the Spirit transforms his anger into decisive military action. This is the intended design of charismatic kingship — divine empowerment channeled through righteous fury on behalf of the vulnerable. Saul's dismemberment of the oxen deliberately echoes the Levite's dismemberment of his concubine in Judges 19:29, but where that act led to civil war and near-annihilation of Benjamin, Saul's act unites all Israel for the first time since the conquest. The chapter also preserves one of the most generous moments in Saul's life: when the people want to execute those who doubted his kingship (10:27), Saul refuses, declaring that no one will be put to death on a day when the LORD has given deliverance to Israel. This is the Saul who could have been — magnanimous in victory, attributing success to God, restraining vengeance.

Translation Friction: *The relationship between this chapter and the preceding narratives of Saul's selection presents a well-known source-critical puzzle. In chapter 10, Saul has already been publicly chosen by lot at Mizpah, yet 11:15 describes the people going to Gilgal to 'make Saul king' (vayyamlikhu sham et-Sha'ul) as though it were a fresh installation. The verb chadesh ('renew') in Samuel's phrase nachdeshshah sham hammelukhah ('let us renew the kingship there') attempts to harmonize the accounts — this is a renewal, not a first coronation. The Septuagint (especially 4QSam) preserves a longer introduction to this chapter that provides context about Nahash's prior atrocities against the Gadites and Reubenites, material absent from the Masoretic Text. Whether this is original text lost from MT or a later expansion in the LXX tradition remains debated.*

Connections: The Jabesh-gilead connection is deeply layered. In Judges 21, after the civil war against Benjamin, the other tribes attacked Jabesh-gilead for not joining the fight, killed most of its inhabitants, and gave 400 surviving virgins to the Benjaminites as wives. Saul is a Benjaminite. The people of Jabesh-gilead may be his kinsmen through those forced marriages — which gives his rescue a personal dimension the text does not make explicit but the original audience would recognize. This bond endures: when Saul and his sons die at Gilboa (1 Samuel 31:11-13), it is the men of Jabesh-gilead who risk their lives to recover and bury the bodies. The dismemberment of oxen sent throughout Israel echoes Judges 19:29 (the Levite's concubine) but reverses its outcome: that act produced tribal civil war, this one produces tribal unity. Saul's declaration in verse 13 that 'the LORD has accomplished deliverance in Israel' (asah YHWH teshu'ah beYisra'el) uses vocabulary that will later describe David's victories — and that Saul himself will never use again with such unguarded faith.

¹Nahash the Ammonite marched up and laid siege to Jabesh-gilead. All the men of Jabesh said to Nahash, "Make a treaty with us and we will serve you." ²Nahash the Ammonite said to them, "On this condition I will make a treaty with you: I will gouge out every one of your right eyes. I will set this as a disgrace on all Israel." ³The elders of Jabesh said to him, "Give us seven days so we can send messengers throughout all the territory of Israel. If no one comes to rescue us, we will surrender to you." ⁴The messengers came to Gibeah of Saul and reported the situation to the people. All the people raised their voices and wept. ⁵Just then Saul was coming in from the field, behind his oxen. Saul asked, "What is wrong with the people? Why are they weeping?" They told him what the men of Jabesh had reported. ⁶The Spirit of God rushed upon Saul when he heard this report, and his anger blazed fiercely. ⁷He took a pair of oxen, cut them into pieces, and sent them throughout all the territory of Israel by messengers, saying, "Whoever does not march out after Saul and after Samuel — this is what will be done to his oxen!" The dread of the LORD fell on the people, and they marched out as one. ⁸He mustered them at Bezek: the Israelites numbered three hundred thousand, and the men of Judah thirty thousand. ⁹They told the messengers who had come, "Say this to the men of Jabesh-gilead: 'Tomorrow, by the time the sun grows hot, you will have deliverance.'" The messengers went and reported this to the men of Jabesh, and they rejoiced. ¹⁰The men of Jabesh then said to the Ammonites, "Tomorrow we will come out to you, and you may do to us whatever seems good to you." ¹¹The next day Saul divided the army into three companies. They entered the Ammonite camp during the morning watch and struck Ammon until the heat of the day. The survivors scattered so completely that no two of them were left together. ¹²The people said to Samuel, "Who was it that said, 'Should Saul reign over us?' Hand those men over so we can put them to death!" ¹³But Saul said, "No one will be put to death today, because today the LORD has accomplished deliverance in Israel." ¹⁴Then Samuel said to the people, "Come, let us go to Gilgal and renew the kingship there." ¹⁵All the people went to Gilgal and made Saul king there before the LORD at Gilgal. They offered fellowship sacrifices there before the LORD, and Saul and all the men of Israel celebrated with tremendous joy.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayya'al ('he went up') indicates military advance from the east, ascending from the Jordan valley toward the Gilead highlands. Nahash is both a personal name and the Hebrew word for 'serpent' — the narrator may intend the resonance. The phrase kerot-lanu verit ('cut a treaty with us') uses the standard Hebrew idiom for covenant-making (literally 'cut'), which involves ritual animal slaughter to solemnize the agreement. The verb na'avdekka ('we will serve you') implies vassal tribute and political subjection — not slavery in the chattel sense, but the surrender of sovereignty.
2. The verb naqar ('gouge out, bore out') is graphic and specific — this is not wounding but deliberate mutilation. The phrase kol-ein yamin ('every right eye') applies to the entire male population, not select individuals. The word cherpah ('disgrace, reproach, shame') is a strong term for public humiliation — it appears elsewhere for the 'reproach of Egypt' removed by circumcision at Gilgal (Joshua 5:9) and for Goliath's defiance of Israel's armies (1 Samuel 17:26). Nahash intends this as a national statement: Israel is too weak to protect its own people.
3. The verb heref ('give respite, let go, relax') asks Nahash to ease the pressure temporarily. The phrase bekhol gevul Yisra'el ('throughout all the territory of Israel') shows that the elders plan a national appeal, not a local one — they need someone with authority over all tribes. The word moshi'a ('savior, deliverer, rescuer') is the participle of y-sh-, the root behind the name Yehoshua/Joshua and the noun yeshu'ah ('salvation'). The elders are asking whether Israel has a deliverer. The verb veyatsa'nu ('we will come out') means surrender by exiting the city gates — opening themselves to Nahash's terms.
4. Gibeah is identified as Giv'at Sha'ul ('Gibeah of Saul') — his hometown and de facto capital. The messengers speak be'oznei ha'am ('in the ears of the people'), a public declaration. The people's response is weeping (vayyivku), not action — they grieve but have no plan. This is the state of Israel without activated leadership: they feel the pain but cannot organize a response. Saul is notably absent from this scene; he will arrive in the next verse from the fields, still living as a farmer despite having been chosen as king.
5. The phrase acharei habaqar min-hassadeh ('behind the cattle from the field') paints Saul as still fully embedded in agrarian life. He is literally following oxen home from plowing or grazing. The question mah-la'am ki yivku ('what is with the people that they weep?') shows he is unaware of the crisis — no messenger system, no intelligence network. The verb vayesapperu-lo ('they recounted to him') uses the Piel intensive of s-p-r, suggesting a full and detailed account of the situation.

6. The verb tsalach ('to rush, to advance powerfully') in the Qal describes the Spirit's violent onset — this is not gradual inspiration but sudden seizure. The same verb describes the Spirit coming on Samson before he tore a lion apart (Judges 14:6). The phrase vayyichar appo ('his anger burned') uses the standard Hebrew idiom for fierce anger — literally 'his nose burned,' since the flaring of nostrils was associated with rage. The adverb me'od ('greatly, exceedingly') intensifies: this is not irritation but consuming wrath. The combination of ruach Elohim and anger is theologically significant — the Spirit does not suppress Saul's emotion but sanctifies it for action.
7. The phrase tsemed baqar ('a pair/yoke of oxen') — likely Saul's own working animals, the ones he was just walking behind. The verb vayenattechehu ('he cut it into pieces') uses the same Piel of n-t-ch used for butchering sacrificial animals (Leviticus 1:6) and for the Levite's dismemberment of his concubine (Judges 19:29). The allusion is unmistakable. The phrase pachad YHWH ('dread/terror of the LORD') indicates a supernaturally induced fear — not merely intimidation by Saul's threat but a divine compulsion that unites the tribes. The phrase ke'ish echad ('as one man') denotes perfect unanimity — a united Israel that has not been seen since Joshua's generation.
8. Bezek is located in the central hill country, strategically positioned for a march east to the Jordan valley and across to Jabesh-gilead. The separate counting of Judah from the rest of Israel (benei Yisra'el ... ve'ish Yehudah) may reflect an early political distinction between Judah and the northern tribes that will later become the divided monarchy — or it may simply reflect separate tribal musters. The numbers (300,000 and 30,000) are large by any ancient standard; the Hebrew word elef can mean 'thousand' or 'military unit/clan,' and some scholars read these as 300 units and 30 units respectively. The verb vayyifqdem ('he mustered/counted them') uses the root p-q-d, which implies both numbering and assuming command responsibility.
9. The word teshu'ah ('deliverance, rescue, salvation') is from the same y-sh- root as moshi'a ('deliverer') in verse 3 — the elders asked for a moshi'a, and now teshu'ah is promised. The time marker bechom hashemesh ('when the sun grows hot') means mid-morning, approximately 9-10 AM — indicating the attack will come at dawn and the battle will be decided by mid-morning. The messengers' return with good news transforms the mood of Jabesh: vayyismachu ('they rejoiced'). The promise is specific — not 'soon' but 'tomorrow by mid-morning.'
10. The verb netse' ('we will come out') is the same verb from verse 3 (veyatsa'nu), where it meant surrender. Here it functions as deliberate misdirection — the Ammonites hear capitulation, but the men of Jabesh mean something quite different. The phrase kekhol-hattov be'eineikhem ('according to all the good in your eyes') is an idiom of total submission, but in context it is strategic deception: keeping Nahash complacent until Saul's army arrives.
11. The division into sheloshah rashim ('three heads/companies') is a standard ancient Near Eastern tactical formation — it allows a three-sided attack that creates confusion and prevents organized retreat. Gideon used the same tactic (Judges 7:16), as will Abishai and David later (2 Samuel 18:2). The ashmoret habboqer ('morning watch') is the last watch of the night, roughly 2-6 AM — Saul attacks in the pre-dawn darkness when the Ammonite camp is least alert. The phrase ad-chom hayyom ('until the heat of the day') matches the promise of verse 9: deliverance by mid-morning. The final clause velo nish'aru-vam shenayim yachad ('not two of them remained together') is a Hebrew idiom for total rout — the army disintegrated so completely that survivors fled individually, unable to regroup.
12. This refers back to the benei veliyya'al ('worthless men') of 10:27 who despised Saul and refused to bring him gifts. Now, after the decisive victory, the people's loyalty has swung to the opposite extreme — they want blood vengeance against Saul's critics. The verb nemitem ('we will put them to death') shows the crowd demanding execution. They address Samuel, not Saul, indicating that Samuel still holds judicial authority alongside Saul's military authority. The mob's zeal, while understandable, reveals the danger of populist energy: yesterday's indifference has become today's demand for purges.
13. The phrase lo-yumat ish ('no man will be put to death') is a royal decree — Saul exercises his authority not to punish but to show mercy. The verb asah ('accomplished, made, did') credits the LORD as the active agent of the teshu'ah ('deliverance'). Saul does not say 'I won' or 'we won' but 'the LORD accomplished.' The same root y-sh- (teshu'ah) has run through the chapter from the elders' plea for a moshi'a (v3) through the promise of teshu'ah (v9) to this theological declaration. Saul's magnanimity here contrasts sharply with the vindictive kings who will follow in Israel's history.
14. The verb nachdeshshah ('let us renew') from ch-d-sh ('to make new, to renew') is carefully chosen — it does not say 'let us establish' (which would imply this is the first coronation) but 'let us renew' (which acknowledges prior installations at Mizpah in chapter 10). Gilgal is a site loaded with covenantal memory: it is where Israel first camped after crossing the Jordan (Joshua 4:19-20), where circumcision was renewed (Joshua 5:2-9), and where the 'reproach of Egypt' was rolled away. Samuel's choice of Gilgal for the kingship renewal connects Saul's reign to the conquest narrative — a new chapter in the same story. The word melukhah ('kingship') refers to the institution and office, not just the person.
15. The verb vayyamlikhu ('they made king') is a Hiphil of m-l-kh — the people actively install Saul as king. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') indicates a sacral ceremony at a recognized worship site. The zevachim shelamim ('fellowship/peace sacrifices') are from the root sh-l-m ('wholeness, peace, completion') — these are offerings of celebration and communion, where God, priest, and worshiper all receive portions. The communal eating makes this a covenant meal binding the nation to its new king. The final phrase vayyismach sham Sha'ul vekhol anshei Yisra'el ad-me'od ('Saul and all the men of Israel rejoiced there exceedingly') places Saul and his people in perfect harmony — a unity that will not survive the next few chapters.

Summary: Samuel gathers all Israel and delivers his farewell address as judge, formally transferring leadership to the newly anointed king. He challenges the people to testify whether he has ever defrauded them, then prosecutes a covenant lawsuit (riv) against Israel, rehearsing God's righteous acts from the exodus through the judges. He declares their demand for a king an act of rejection against the LORD, then calls down thunder and rain during wheat harvest as a divine sign confirming his words. The people, terrified, beg Samuel to intercede for them. Samuel closes with a warning: if Israel and their king serve the LORD faithfully, all will be well — but if they turn to empty things (tohu), both they and their king will be swept away.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is structured as a formal covenant lawsuit — the Hebrew riv pattern found in the prophets (Micah 6:1-8, Hosea 4:1-3). Samuel stands as both plaintiff's attorney and witness, arraigning Israel before God. The lawsuit follows a recognizable Near Eastern legal form: the summoning of witnesses (verses 1-5), the recitation of the suzerain's past faithfulness (verses 6-11), the accusation of breach (verses 12-13), and the pronouncement of conditional sentence (verses 14-15). What makes this passage extraordinary is that the judge who prosecutes the case simultaneously announces his own retirement — Samuel is dismantling the system he embodied. He is the last judge, and the thunder he calls down is not merely a miracle but a divine seal on the lawsuit, God's own testimony entering the court record. The wheat harvest setting is also significant: thunder and rain during wheat harvest (late May to early June) is virtually unheard of in the Levant, making the sign unmistakable.

Translation Friction: The central tension is theological: Samuel declares that asking for a king was a great evil (ra'ah gedolah, verse 17), yet God has already granted the king (verse 13). The text does not resolve whether monarchy is inherently wrong or merely wrongly motivated. Samuel's statement in verse 12 — 'the LORD your God is your king' — frames the issue as competing kingships, but verse 14 immediately offers a path forward where both the human king and the divine king coexist. Translators must decide whether ra'ah here means 'evil' (moral fault) or 'disaster' (harmful consequence). We render it as 'evil' because the context treats the request as a breach of covenant loyalty, not merely a strategic mistake. Verse 21 introduces tohu ('emptiness, chaos'), the same word used in Genesis 1:2 for the formless void before creation. Applying this cosmic term to idols is a deliberate theological claim: to follow other gods is to choose pre-creation nothingness over the God who orders existence.

Connections: Samuel's covenant lawsuit echoes Moses' farewell in Deuteronomy 31-32, where Moses also recites God's faithfulness, predicts Israel's unfaithfulness, and calls witnesses. The formula 'the LORD and his anointed' in verse 3 anticipates the pairing that will define the rest of 1-2 Samuel: God and his chosen king, a relationship that will fracture with Saul and be restored with David. The thunder-and-rain sign connects to Elijah's drought on Mount Carmel (1 Kings 18) — both are weather events that serve as divine testimony in a covenant dispute. Samuel's promise in verse 23 that it would be sin for him to stop praying for Israel establishes intercessory prayer as a prophetic obligation, a thread that runs through Jeremiah (7:16, 11:14) and into the New Testament's understanding of Christ's ongoing intercession (Hebrews 7:25). The word tohu in verse 21 deliberately evokes Genesis 1:2, framing idolatry as a return to primordial chaos.

¹Samuel said to all Israel, "I have listened to your voice in everything you said to me, and I have set a king over you. ²Now — the king walks before you. As for me, I have grown old and gray, and my sons are here among you. I have walked before you from my youth until this day. ³Here I am. Testify against me before the LORD and before his anointed: Whose ox have I taken? Whose donkey have I taken? Whom have I cheated? Whom have I crushed? From whose hand have I accepted a bribe to look the other way? Tell me, and I will make it right." ⁴They said, "You have not cheated us. You have not crushed us. You have not taken anything from anyone's hand." ⁵He said to them, "The LORD is witness against you, and his anointed is witness this day, that you have found nothing in my hand." And they said, "He is witness." ⁶Samuel said to the people, "It is the LORD who appointed Moses and Aaron and who brought your ancestors up from the land of Egypt. ⁷Now then, stand here, and I will bring a case against you before the LORD — the case of all the righteous acts of the LORD that he performed for you and for your ancestors. ⁸When Jacob went into Egypt and your ancestors cried out to the LORD, the LORD sent Moses and Aaron, and they brought your ancestors out of Egypt and settled them in this place. ⁹But they forgot the LORD their God, so he sold them into the hand of Sisera, commander of the army of Hazor, and into the hand of the Philistines, and into the hand of the king of Moab — and these made war against them. ¹⁰They cried out to the LORD and said, 'We have sinned, because we abandoned the LORD and served the Baals and the Ashtaroth. Now rescue us from the hand of our enemies, and we will serve you.' ¹¹The LORD sent Jerubbaal, and Bedan, and Jephthah, and Samuel, and he rescued you from the hand of your enemies on every side, so that you lived in safety. ¹²But when you saw that Nahash king of the Ammonites came against you, you said to me, 'No — a king must reign over us!' — even though the LORD your God was your king. ¹³Now then — here is the king you chose, the one you asked for. The LORD has set a king over you. ¹⁴If you fear the LORD and serve him and listen to his voice and do not rebel against the command of the LORD — then both you and the king who reigns over you will follow the LORD your God. ¹⁵But if you do not listen to the voice of the LORD and you rebel against the command of the LORD, then the hand of the LORD will be against you, as it was against your ancestors. ¹⁶Now stand and witness this great thing that the LORD is about to do before your eyes. ¹⁷Is it not wheat harvest today? I will call on the LORD, and he will send thunder and rain. Then you will know and see that your evil is great — this thing you have done in the eyes of the LORD, asking for a king." ¹⁸Samuel called on the LORD, and the LORD sent thunder and rain that day. All the people feared the LORD — and Samuel — greatly. ¹⁹All the people said to Samuel, "Pray for your servants to the LORD your God, so that we do not die! For we have added to all our sins this evil — asking for a king." ²⁰Samuel said to the people, "Do not be afraid. You have indeed done all this evil — but do not turn away from following the LORD. Serve the LORD with all your heart. ²¹Do not turn aside after empty things that cannot help and cannot rescue — for they are emptiness itself. ²²For the LORD will not abandon his people, for the sake of his great name — because the LORD was pleased to make you his own people. ²³As for me — far be it from me to sin against the LORD by ceasing to pray for you. I will teach you the good and straight path. ²⁴Only fear the LORD and serve him faithfully with all your heart. For consider what great things he has done for you. ²⁵But if you persist in doing evil, both you and your king will be swept away."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb shamati ('I have listened') is the same root as Samuel's own name (shemu'el, popularly connected to shama, 'to hear'). The man whose name means 'heard by God' has now heard the people — but what they asked for grieves him. The verb himlikhti ('I have caused to reign') is the Hiphil form of malakh, indicating that Samuel served as the agent of royal installation, though God was the ultimate authority behind it.
2. The repetition of mithallekh/hithallakhti ('walks/I have walked') creates a deliberate handoff: Samuel's public conduct is now being transferred to the king. The Hithpael form of halakh carries the sense of ongoing, visible conduct — how one lives in full view of others. Samuel's claim that he walked before them from his youth (min-ne'uray) reaches back to his childhood service at Shiloh (chapter 2-3).
2. The mention of 'my sons are with you' is a painful concession. Samuel's sons were corrupt judges (8:1-3), and their failure was the stated reason Israel demanded a king. Samuel does not defend them here — he simply notes their presence and moves on to his own record.
3. The phrase neged YHWH ve-neged meshicho ('before the LORD and before his anointed') establishes the two witnesses required by Deuteronomic law: God and the king. The word mashiach ('anointed one') here refers to Saul — this is one of the earliest uses of the term that will later develop into the concept of the Messiah. Samuel places his entire career under oath before both divine and human authority.
3. The verb ratsoti ('I have crushed') comes from ratsats, meaning to crush, oppress, or break — it describes the abuse of judicial power to destroy the vulnerable. This is stronger than mere exploitation; it implies using authority to grind people down. Samuel's rhetorical questions follow the pattern of Mosaic judicial ethics (Deuteronomy 16:19) and anticipate the prophetic indictments of corrupt leaders (Ezekiel 34, Micah 3).
4. The people's threefold denial precisely mirrors Samuel's questions from verse 3 — using the same verbs ashaqta ('you cheated'), ratsota ('you crushed'), and laqachta ('you took'). The repetition functions as formal legal testimony: the community publicly certifies Samuel's integrity. The word me'umah ('anything at all') is emphatic — not even the smallest thing was taken. This public acquittal is Samuel's vindication before he prosecutes Israel's case.
5. The word ed ('witness') appears three times in rapid succession — Samuel declares it twice and the people confirm it once. The legal procedure is now sealed: God and the king serve as witnesses, and the people have ratified the verdict. The phrase bakhem ('against you') is striking — the witnesses are against the people, not against Samuel. By clearing Samuel, Israel has inadvertently placed themselves under scrutiny. Samuel's clean hands become the foil for Israel's guilty request. The stage is set for the prosecution to shift from Samuel's defense to Israel's indictment.
6. The verb asah here means 'made' in the sense of 'appointed, established' — God made Moses and Aaron into what they were. This opening line sets the framework for the covenant lawsuit: before any accusation, the prosecutor establishes the suzerain's credentials. The pattern mirrors Hittite treaty forms where the great king recites his benevolent acts before listing the vassal's obligations. Samuel begins with the foundational saving act: the exodus from Egypt (he'elah, 'brought up'), using the same verb that will recur throughout the historical review.

7. The word tsidqot (plural of tsedaqah) here means 'righteous acts' or 'acts of covenant faithfulness' — not abstract righteousness but concrete historical interventions where God proved faithful. The term carries legal weight: these are God's demonstrations of covenant loyalty that obligate a response from the vassal. Samuel will now recite these acts as a prosecutor presents evidence.
7. The construction ishafetah itkhem ('I will judge/argue with you') uses the same root as Samuel's title — he is the shofet ('judge'). His final act as judge is not to adjudicate between two Israelites but to adjudicate between God and Israel. The preposition lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') indicates that God is both the offended party and the presiding authority — the covenant lawsuit is tried in God's own court.
8. Samuel compresses centuries into a single sentence: Jacob's descent into Egypt, the oppression, the cry (za'aqu, a cry of distress in covenant context), the sending of deliverers, and the settlement in Canaan. The verb za'aqu ('they cried out') is the technical term for covenant appeal — the cry of the vassal to the suzerain when the treaty is being violated by a third party. God's response (sending Moses and Aaron) is presented as fulfilling his covenant obligation.
8. The phrase ba-maqom hazzeh ('in this place') likely refers to the land of Canaan generally, though some interpreters connect it specifically to the location of the assembly (Gilgal or Mizpah). The settlement in the land is the culmination of God's saving act — not just rescue from Egypt but establishment in the promised territory.
9. The verb shakhchu ('they forgot') is not mere forgetfulness but covenantal amnesia — deliberate failure to remember God's acts. In covenant theology, to 'remember' (zakhar) is to act on the relationship; to 'forget' (shakhach) is to abandon it. The consequence is expressed with the commercial verb vayyimkor ('he sold them'), depicting God handing Israel over to enemies as one transfers property. The metaphor is deliberately degrading: the people who forgot their Redeemer are sold like goods.
9. The three enemies — Sisera (Judges 4-5), the Philistines (Judges 13-16), and the king of Moab (Judges 3:12-30) — represent threats from the north, west, and east respectively. Samuel selects enemies that encircle Israel, showing that covenant unfaithfulness exposed them on every front.
10. The cry follows a fixed pattern from the book of Judges: sin, suffering, crying out, deliverance. The confession chatanu ('we have sinned') is paired with the specific charge azavnu ('we abandoned') — the same verb used for covenant breach. The Baals (ba'alim, plural 'lords, masters') and Ashtarothe (plural of Ashtoreth, the Canaanite fertility goddess) represent the full spectrum of Canaanite worship. The people's promise ve-na'avdekka ('and we will serve you') uses the same verb (avad) they used for serving the Baals — the question of whom Israel will serve is the chapter's central issue.
11. Jerubbaal is Gideon's alternate name (Judges 6:32), meaning 'let Baal contend' — Samuel pointedly uses this name rather than Gideon, keeping the anti-Baal polemic alive. Bedan is debated: some identify him with Barak (Judges 4-5), others with Samson, and some see it as an otherwise unknown judge. The Septuagint reads 'Barak' here. Jephthah delivered Israel from the Ammonites (Judges 11). Samuel includes himself in the list — he is the last in the chain of deliverers God sent.
11. The verb vayyatsel ('he rescued') and the phrase vateshvu vetach ('you lived in safety') complete the cycle: Israel sinned, cried out, and God delivered. Samuel's point is that this pattern should have been sufficient — God always answered. The demand for a king breaks this established pattern of trust.
12. The clause ki melekh yimlokh aleinu ('a king must reign over us') uses the emphatic construction of the verb malakh with the cognate noun melekh — 'a king must king over us.' The intensity of the demand is embedded in the grammar. Samuel juxtaposes this with va-YHWH Eloheikhem malkekhem ('and the LORD your God is your king'), creating an irreconcilable collision: Israel already has a king, but they demanded another.
12. Nahash's invasion (detailed in chapter 11) was the immediate trigger for the monarchy demand, but Samuel frames it as the latest iteration of the Judges cycle — another enemy, another moment where Israel should have cried out to God but instead sought a structural solution. The shift from 'cry out to God' to 'give us a king' is the covenant breach Samuel is prosecuting.
13. The verb she'eltem ('you asked for') is from sha'al ('to ask'), the root embedded in the name Sha'ul (Saul). The wordplay saturates 1 Samuel: Hannah 'asked' for a son, the people 'asked' for a king, and the king's very name means 'asked for.' Samuel distinguishes between two agents: bechartem ('you chose') places the initiative on Israel, but natan YHWH ('the LORD has given') acknowledges that God ratified the request. The tension is unresolved — the king is simultaneously Israel's choice and God's gift, a paradox that will define Saul's entire reign.
14. The conditional im ('if') introduces a fork in Israel's future — one path leads to flourishing, the other to destruction (verse 15). The four verbs (fear, serve, listen, not rebel) are not synonyms but an ascending sequence of covenant commitment: reverence, active service, attentive obedience, and refusal to resist.
14. The phrase gam attem ve-gam hammelekh ('both you and the king') binds the people and their ruler to the same standard. The king is not above covenant law — he stands under the same conditions as every Israelite. This principle, articulated here, becomes the theological standard by which every king in 1-2 Samuel and 1-2 Kings will be judged.
15. The apodosis — ve-hayetah yad YHWH bakhem ('the hand of the LORD will be against you') — uses the image of God's hand as an instrument of judgment. The same 'hand of the LORD' that delivered Israel from Egypt (Exodus 9:3) and struck the Philistines (1 Samuel 5:6-9) will now turn against his own people. The phrase u-va'avoteikhem ('and against your ancestors') is textually difficult; the Septuagint reads 'and against your king,' which fits the context better since verse 14 addressed both people and king. The MT reading may preserve the original, connecting Israel's future disobedience to their ancestors' pattern of rebellion.

16. The verb hityatsvu ('stand') echoes the same legal summons from verse 7 — the defendants who were called to hear the case are now ordered to stand for the verdict's demonstration. The phrase ha-davar ha-gadol hazzeh ('this great thing') signals a theophanic event — God is about to intervene visibly. The construction oseh le-eineikhem ('doing before your eyes') emphasizes eyewitness experience: this will not be reported secondhand but seen in real time.
17. The rhetorical question halo qetsir chittim hayyom ('is it not wheat harvest today?') forces the audience to acknowledge what they already know: this is the dry season. Any rain that follows will be impossible to explain naturally. Samuel is engineering a situation where the sign is self-authenticating.
17. The phrase ra'atkhem rabbah ('your evil is great') uses ra'ah ('evil, wickedness, disaster') paired with rabbah ('great, much'). Samuel classifies the monarchy request not as a mistake or a preference but as a great evil (ra'ah gedolah). The word lish'ol ('to ask') — from sha'al — continues the wordplay with the name Sha'ul. Israel's 'asking' for a king produced 'the asked-for one,' but the asking itself was the transgression.
18. The sequence is immediate: Samuel called (vayyiqra), the LORD gave (vayyitten) — no delay, no waiting. The storm arrives as a divine response to prophetic prayer in real time. The word qolot ('thunderclaps,' literally 'voices') is the same word used for God's voice at Sinai (Exodus 19:16), connecting this moment to the original covenant-making event. The people's fear (vayyira) extends to both God and Samuel — the prophet's authority is confirmed alongside the divine demonstration. The phrase et YHWH ve-et Shemu'el ('the LORD and Samuel') pairs God and prophet just as verse 3 paired God and the anointed king. Samuel's authority, now publicly vindicated, is the very authority he is laying down.
19. The people's plea hitpallel be'ad avadekha ('pray on behalf of your servants') uses the same verb for intercessory prayer (hitpallel) that will anchor Samuel's commitment in verse 23. They call themselves avadekha ('your servants'), submitting to Samuel's authority even as he retires from office. The phrase yasafnu al kol chatoteinu ra'ah ('we have added to all our sins an evil') is a remarkable confession: the people acknowledge not just the sin of asking for a king but that it was added to an already existing accumulation of sins. The verb lish'ol ('to ask') appears yet again — the 'asking' that produced Saul is now confessed as the crowning transgression.
20. Samuel's response is pastorally remarkable: he confirms the sin (attem asitem et kol ha-ra'ah hazzot, 'you have done all this evil') but immediately pivots to the path forward. The conjunction akh ('but, only, nevertheless') is the hinge — it acknowledges the past without letting it determine the future. The prohibition al tasuru me-acharei YHWH ('do not turn aside from after the LORD') uses sur ('to turn aside, to depart'), the verb that will later describe Saul's own falling away. The command va-avadtem et YHWH be-khol levavkhem ('serve the LORD with all your heart') echoes the Shema's language (Deuteronomy 6:5) — total devotion, not partial compliance.
21. The Hebrew ha-tohu ('the emptiness') is deliberately shocking in context. This is the word from Genesis 1:2 — tohu va-vohu ('formless and void'). Applying it to idols equates them with pre-creation chaos: they are not merely powerless but anti-real, the negation of everything God's creative word brought into being. Samuel is not saying idols are weak; he is saying they are nothing.
21. The double negation — lo yo'ilu ('they do not profit') and lo yatsilu ('they do not deliver') — eliminates both categories of divine benefit. A god who cannot profit you in peace or deliver you in war is not a god at all. The clause ki tohu hemmah ('for they are tohu') delivers the verdict: emptiness is not what they produce but what they are.
22. The verb yittosh ('he will cast off, abandon') is a strong term for total rejection — it means to hurl away, to fling aside. Samuel's assurance is that God will not do this, despite the evil Israel has committed. The ground of this assurance is ba'avur shemo ha-gadol ('on account of his great name') — God's reputation among the nations is bound to Israel's existence. To destroy Israel would be to unmake his own testimony.
22. The verb ho'il ('he was pleased, he undertook willingly') appears in the Hiphil and carries the sense of free, gracious initiative. God was not compelled to choose Israel; he delighted to do so. This is the doctrine of election stated in its simplest form: God's choice preceded Israel's performance and is not contingent on it. The phrase etkhem lo le-am ('you as his people') uses the possessive — Israel belongs to God not by their decision but by his.
23. The word chalilah ('far be it, God forbid') derives from chalah ('to profane, to desecrate'). Samuel is saying that ceasing to intercede would be an act of profanation — not merely neglect but sacrilege. This elevates intercessory prayer from a spiritual practice to a covenant duty. The construction me-chato la-YHWH me-chadol lehitpallel ('from sinning against the LORD by ceasing to pray') makes the cessation of prayer the sin itself, not merely a path to sin.
23. The verb horeithi ('I will teach/instruct') comes from arah, the same root that gives us Torah ('instruction, law'). Samuel's teaching role continues after his judicial role ends — he transitions from judge to prophet-teacher. The phrase be-derekh ha-tovah ve-ha-yesharah ('in the good and straight path') uses two adjectives: tov ('good' — morally excellent) and yashar ('straight, upright' — without deviation). The path is both ethically good and directionally clear.
24. The particle akh ('only, but') narrows everything to a single demand: fear and serve. The phrase be-emet ('in truth, in faithfulness') adds the quality of consistency — not sporadic devotion but truthful, reliable service. The verb re'u ('consider, see') calls the people to review the evidence Samuel has just presented: the historical recital of God's acts. The phrase et asher higdil immakhem ('what he has made great with you' or 'the great things he has done for you') summarizes the entire covenant lawsuit — God's track record of faithfulness is the ground for Israel's obligation.
25. The infinitive absolute hare'a tare'u ('doing evil you will do evil') conveys not a single act but a sustained pattern of wickedness. Samuel is not warning against a momentary lapse but against a settled trajectory of rebellion.
25. The verb tissafu ('you will be swept away') carries the force of sudden, total destruction. Its use in the Sodom narrative (Genesis 19:15, 17) gives it eschatological weight — this is not gradual decline but catastrophic erasure. The pairing gam attem gam malkekhem ('both you and your king') is Samuel's final word on the monarchy: the king does not exempt the people from covenant consequences, nor do the people exempt the king. They rise or fall together.

Summary: Saul has reigned for two years when his son Jonathan strikes the Philistine garrison at Geba, provoking a massive Philistine mobilization. The Philistines assemble an overwhelming force at Michmash — chariots, cavalry, and infantry described as numerous as the sand on the seashore. The Israelite army disintegrates: soldiers hide in caves, thickets, and cisterns; others flee across the Jordan. Saul waits at Gilgal for Samuel, who had set a seven-day deadline. When the prophet does not appear and the army is melting away, Saul offers the burnt offering himself. Samuel arrives immediately afterward, condemns Saul's disobedience, and declares that his dynasty will not continue — the LORD has already sought out a man after his own heart. The chapter closes with a portrait of Philistine military supremacy: they have monopolized ironworking so completely that not a single sword or spear can be found among the Israelites except with Saul and Jonathan.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter marks the pivotal hinge in Saul's story — the moment his kingship begins its irreversible decline. The theological logic is precise: Saul was given the kingdom conditionally (chapter 10), proved himself worthy in battle (chapter 11), received Samuel's farewell charge with its demand for obedience (chapter 12), and now fails the first real test of faith under pressure. What makes the scene devastating is that Saul's reasoning is entirely logical from a military standpoint — his army is deserting, the enemy is overwhelming, and he needs divine favor before battle. His sin is not that he wanted to worship God but that he seized a priestly prerogative that was not his to take. The phrase ish kilbavo ('a man after God's heart') in verse 14 is one of the most consequential in the Hebrew Bible — it introduces the unnamed David as God's chosen replacement before David has appeared in the narrative. The reader knows Saul is finished before David has even been born into the story.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 1 contains one of the most discussed textual problems in the Hebrew Bible. The Masoretic Text reads ben-shanah Sha'ul bemalko — literally 'Saul was a son of [X] year(s) when he became king' — but the number is missing. The text then says 'and he reigned two years over Israel,' which contradicts the extended timeline of his reign in the rest of Samuel and in Acts 13:21 (which gives forty years). The Septuagint omits the verse entirely. Some scholars argue the number was lost through scribal damage; others suggest the formula was inserted later by an editor following the standard regnal formula pattern (compare 2 Samuel 5:4) but the original text never contained Saul's age. The 'two years' may refer not to his total reign but to the period before the events of this chapter. Additionally, Saul's sacrifice raises questions about the rigidity of cultic roles in this period — in 1 Samuel 6:14-15 the men of Beth-shemesh offered sacrifices, and in 2 Samuel 6:17-18 David himself offers burnt offerings. The severity of Samuel's rebuke may reflect prophetic-royal tension as much as strict priestly law.*

Connections: *The seven-day wait at Gilgal connects directly to Samuel's instructions in 10:8, where the prophet told Saul to go down to Gilgal, wait seven days, and Samuel would come to offer sacrifices and reveal what Saul should do. Saul's failure is therefore not spontaneous but a violation of a specific, prior command. The phrase ish kilbavo ('a man after his heart') will be explicitly applied to David in Acts 13:22 and echoes throughout the Davidic covenant theology — God's choice of David is not based on appearance or lineage but on the orientation of the heart toward God (cf. 1 Samuel 16:7). The Philistine iron monopoly in verses 19-22 provides essential military context for the entire Saul-David narrative: Israel fights at a catastrophic technological disadvantage, making Jonathan's solo attack in chapter 14 and David's victory over Goliath in chapter 17 all the more extraordinary. The three Philistine raiding parties (v.17-18) anticipate the ongoing Philistine pressure that will define Saul's reign and ultimately kill him at Mount Gilboa.*

¹Saul was [—] years old when he became king, and he reigned two years over Israel. ²Saul selected three thousand men from Israel. Two thousand were with Saul at Michmash and in the hill country of Bethel, and one thousand were with Jonathan at Gibeah of Benjamin. The rest of the troops he sent home, each man to his tent. ³Jonathan struck down the Philistine garrison at Geba, and the Philistines heard about it. Saul sounded the ram's horn throughout all the land, saying,

"Let the Hebrews hear!" ⁴All Israel heard the report: "Saul has struck down the Philistine garrison" — and Israel had made itself repulsive to the Philistines. The people were summoned to join Saul at Gilgal. ⁵The Philistines assembled to fight against Israel: thirty thousand chariots, six thousand cavalry, and foot soldiers as numerous as the sand on the seashore. They marched up and encamped at Michmash, east of Beth-aven. ⁶When the men of Israel saw how desperate their situation was — for the army was hard-pressed — the soldiers hid themselves in caves, in thorn thickets, among rocks, in underground vaults, and in cisterns. ⁷Some Hebrews crossed the Jordan into the territory of Gad and Gilead. Saul remained at Gilgal, and the entire army that stayed with him was trembling. ⁸He waited seven days, until the appointed time that Samuel had set. But Samuel did not come to Gilgal, and the army was scattering away from him. ⁹Saul said, "Bring the burnt offering and the fellowship offerings to me." And he offered up the burnt offering. ¹⁰Just as he finished offering the burnt offering, Samuel arrived. Saul went out to meet him and greet him. ¹¹Samuel said, "What have you done?" Saul answered, "I saw that the army was scattering away from me, and you had not come within the appointed days, and the Philistines were assembling at Michmash —" ¹²"I thought, 'The Philistines are about to march down against me at Gilgal, and I have not sought the LORD's favor.' So I forced myself and offered the burnt offering." ¹³Samuel said to Saul, "You have acted foolishly. You have not kept the command of the LORD your God that he gave you. Had you obeyed, the LORD would have established your kingdom over Israel permanently." ¹⁴But now your kingdom will not endure. The LORD has sought out for himself a man whose heart is aligned with his own, and the LORD has appointed him as leader over his people — because you have not kept what the LORD commanded you. ¹⁵Samuel got up and went from Gilgal to Gibeah of Benjamin. Saul counted the troops remaining with him — about six hundred men. ¹⁶Saul and his son Jonathan, along with the troops remaining with them, were stationed at Geba of Benjamin, while the Philistines were encamped at Michmash. ¹⁷Raiding parties went out from the Philistine camp in three divisions. One division turned toward the road to Ophrah, toward the territory of Shual. ¹⁸The second division turned toward the road to Beth-horon, and the third division turned toward the border road that overlooks the Valley of Hyenas, toward the wilderness. ¹⁹No metalsmith could be found anywhere in the land of Israel, because the Philistines had said, "The Hebrews must not be allowed to make swords or spears." ²⁰All Israel had to go down to the Philistines to sharpen their plowshares, their mattocks, their axes, and their plowpoints. ²¹The charge was a pim for the plowshares and the mattocks, and a third of a shekel for sharpening the three-pronged forks, the axes, and for setting the ox-goads. ²²So on the day of battle, not a sword or spear could be found in the hands of any of the troops with Saul and Jonathan. Only Saul and his son Jonathan had them. ²³A Philistine outpost had moved forward to the pass of Michmash.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ben-shanah Sha'ul bemalko follows the standard Deuteronomistic regnal formula (cf. ben-sheloshim shanah David bemalko in 2 Samuel 5:4, 'David was thirty years old when he became king'), but the numeral before shanah is absent. The Masoretic Text preserves this gap faithfully rather than inventing a number. The phrase ushtei shanim malakh ('and two years he reigned') uses the standard reign-duration formula, but the number is almost certainly incomplete or refers to a partial period. Some scholars emend to read 'Saul was thirty years old' or 'forty years old' based on parallel formulae, but no manuscript evidence supports a specific number.
2. The verb vayyivchar ('he chose/selected') indicates a deliberate military reorganization — Saul has moved from calling up the entire tribal levy (chapter 11) to maintaining a standing force. The number sheloshet alafim ('three thousand') may mean three thousand men or three military units (elef as 'clan/unit'). Michmash (Mikhmas) is strategically positioned on the northern side of a deep ravine (the Wadi Suweinit) that forms a natural border with Philistine-controlled territory. Jonathan's posting at Gibeah of Benjamin (Giv'at Binyamin) puts him at Saul's home base. The phrase ish le'ohalav ('each man to his tent') is the standard dismissal formula for tribal militia.
3. The word netsiv can mean 'garrison,' 'pillar,' or 'prefect/governor' — in context it refers to a Philistine military outpost or its commanding officer. The location Geva (Geba) is distinct from Giv'ah (Gibeah) though the names are similar and both are in Benjaminite territory. The verb vayyakh ('he struck') indicates a decisive military attack, not a skirmish. The shofar (ram's horn) was the standard instrument for military mobilization and alarm. The term ha'Ivrim ('the Hebrews') is used rather than benei Yisra'el — this designation appears primarily in contexts involving foreign relations or foreign perception of Israel.
4. The verb niv'ash (Niphal of b-'sh, 'to stink, become odious') is vivid and visceral — Israel has made itself stink in the perception of the Philistines. The same root appears in Exodus 5:21 where the Israelite foremen say Moses has made them 'stink' before Pharaoh. The attribution of Jonathan's attack to Saul (hikkah Sha'ul, 'Saul struck') may reflect how the news traveled or may indicate Saul's public claim of the act. The verb vayyitsa'au ('they were summoned/cried out') at Gilgal indicates an urgent military assembly at the traditional mustering site in the Jordan valley.

5. The number sheloshim elef rekhev ('thirty thousand chariots') is textually suspect — the Syriac Peshitta and some LXX manuscripts read sheloshet alafim ('three thousand'), which is militarily more plausible. Even three thousand chariots would represent an enormous force. The phrase ke'chol asher al-sefat-hayyam larov ('like the sand on the lip of the sea for multitude') deliberately echoes the Abrahamic blessing language of Genesis 22:17 — applied here to the enemy, a devastating inversion. Beth-aven ('house of wickedness/emptiness') is either a separate location east of Bethel or a polemical renaming of Bethel itself ('house of God' becomes 'house of nothing').
6. The verb vayyitchab'u ('they hid themselves') uses the Hitpael reflexive — they actively sought concealment. The five hiding places form a comprehensive catalog: me'arot (caves, natural limestone cavities abundant in the central highlands), chavachim (thorny thickets — the word is rare and may relate to choach, 'thorn'), sela'im (rock formations, cliff crevices), tserichim (vaulted chambers, possibly underground tombs or cellars — the word is debated), and borot (cisterns, water storage pits cut into rock, which when dry could conceal a person). The phrase ki tsar-lo ('because it was narrow/tight for him') uses tsar in its spatial sense — the people feel trapped.
7. The term Ivrim ('Hebrews') rather than 'Israelites' reappears — in contexts of flight and subjection, the less dignified ethnic designation is used (cf. verse 3). The verb avru ('they crossed') creates a wordplay with Ivrim — 'the Hebrews (Ivrim) crossed (avru),' both from the root 'v-r ('to cross over'). The verb chardu ('they trembled') from ch-r-d denotes fear-induced shaking — physical trembling, not mere anxiety. The phrase acharav ('after him') indicates they followed Saul, but their following was characterized by terror, not confidence.
8. The verb vayyochel ('he waited') from y-ch-l indicates patient, expectant waiting — Saul endured the full duration. The phrase lammo'ed asher Shemu'el ('until the appointed time that Samuel [set]') refers back to the specific instruction in 10:8. The verb vayyafets ('scattered, dispersed') from p-w-ts describes the army breaking apart and drifting away — a stronger image than mere desertion, suggesting dissolution. The phrase me'alav ('from upon him') indicates the troops were departing from Saul's immediate presence — he could see them leaving.
9. The verb haggishu ('bring near, present') is the Hiphil imperative of n-g-sh — a priestly term for presenting offerings at the altar. The olah ('burnt offering') is the whole-animal sacrifice consumed entirely by fire, representing complete consecration to God (see Leviticus 1). The shelamim ('peace/fellowship offerings') involve shared eating — portions for God (burned fat), the priest, and the worshiper (see Leviticus 3). The phrase vayyaal ha'olah ('and he offered up the burnt offering') uses the Hiphil of 'l-h ('to cause to go up'), the technical term for making a sacrifice ascend as smoke to God. The brevity of the narrator's report — no divine response, no fire from heaven — is itself a theological statement: this offering is not accepted.
10. The temporal clause kekhallo leha'alot ('as he finished offering up') uses the infinitive construct — the action of offering is literally just completed. The particle vehineh ('and look!') introduces sudden, dramatic appearance — Samuel materializes at the worst possible moment. The verb vayyetse' ('he went out') indicates Saul leaves whatever sacrificial area he was in to approach Samuel. The infinitive levarkho ('to bless him') can mean 'to greet him' — barakh in the Piel is the standard greeting verb, though its root meaning ('to bless') adds layers of irony: Saul comes to bless the prophet whose blessing he has just forfeited.
11. The question meh asita ('what have you done?') is a confrontational formula — it demands an accounting, not an explanation. Saul's response begins with ki-ra'iti ('because I saw') — he frames his action as a rational response to observed conditions. The verb nafats ('scattered, shattered') is stronger than the earlier vayyafets — the army is breaking apart violently. The phrase ve'attah lo-va'ta lemo'ed hayyamim ('and you did not come within the appointed days') directly blames Samuel for the delay. Saul's defense is logically structured: three ki ('because') clauses presenting escalating threats.
12. The phrase penei YHWH lo chilliti ('I had not softened the face of the LORD') uses the Piel of ch-l-h ('to make weak, to entreat, to soften') with panim ('face') — a standard idiom for seeking God's favor through prayer or sacrifice. The verb va'et'appaq (Hitpael of 'p-q, 'to restrain, force, compel oneself') is rare and suggests internal struggle — Saul claims he acted against his own reluctance. The same root appears in Genesis 43:31 and Isaiah 42:14 for restraining powerful emotions before finally acting. Saul's self-presentation is as a man driven to act by desperate circumstances, not as one who casually overstepped his authority.
13. The verb niskalta (Niphal of s-k-l, 'to be foolish, act foolishly') is a moral-intellectual judgment — not 'sinful' in the cultic sense but 'stupid' in the consequential sense. Saul made a catastrophically wrong choice. The phrase mitsvat YHWH Elohekha ('the command of the LORD your God') specifies that this was a direct divine instruction mediated through Samuel (10:8), not a general principle. The phrase hekhin YHWH et-mamlakhtekha ('the LORD would have established your kingdom') uses the Hiphil of k-w-n ('to establish, make firm') — the same verb used for God establishing David's throne in 2 Samuel 7:12. The conditional ki attah ('for then/had you obeyed') reveals that Saul's dynasty could have been the permanent one.
14. The verb taqum ('will stand/endure') from q-w-m — Saul's kingdom will not 'rise' into permanence; it is structurally doomed. The verb biqqesh (Piel of b-q-sh, 'to seek, search for') is in the perfect tense — the seeking is already completed, the man already found. The phrase ish kilvavo ('a man according to his heart') is one of the most debated in the Hebrew Bible: does kilvavo mean 'after God's own heart' (a man whose heart matches God's desires) or 'a man of God's choosing' (a man whom God's heart has selected)? Both readings are grammatically valid. The word nagid ('leader, designated one, prince-regent') implies appointment for future rule rather than immediate enthronement — the nagid is the one God has designated, who will rule when the time comes.
15. The verb vayyaqom ('he arose/got up') followed by vayyaal ('he went up') describes Samuel's physical departure — the verbs convey decisive, final movement. The absence of any further interaction between Samuel and Saul at this point is narratively significant. The verb vayyifqod ('he counted/mustered') from p-q-d indicates a military census of available forces. The number ke-shesh me'ot ish ('about six hundred men') is precise enough to convey the catastrophic attrition: from three thousand (v.2) to six hundred — a loss of eighty percent before any battle has been fought.

- 16. The text reads Geva Binyamin (some manuscripts read Giv'ah, 'Gibeah') — the two towns are close together in Benjaminite territory and the names are frequently confused in the manuscripts. The verb yoshvim ('sitting, dwelling, stationed') suggests a defensive posture — Saul is not advancing but holding position. The contrast between Saul's six hundred at Geba and the Philistine host at Michmash — separated by the deep Wadi Suweinit ravine — establishes the military geography for the events of chapter 14, where Jonathan will cross the pass with only his armor-bearer.
- 17. The noun hammashchit ('the destroyer/devastator') from sh-ch-t indicates organized raiding — not a pitched battle but systematic plundering and destruction. The division into sheloshah rashim ('three heads/companies') mirrors Saul's own three-company tactic in 11:11, but here it is the enemy employing the strategy. Ophrah is likely the Benjaminite Ophrah (distinct from the Ophrah of Judges 6:11 in Manasseh). The 'land of Shual' (erets Shu'al, 'land of the fox/jackal') is a district north of Michmash — the name may reflect the terrain's wild character.
- 18. Beth-horon (Beit Choron, 'house of the hollow/cave') refers to the twin towns of Upper and Lower Beth-horon on the main east-west route through the Ajalon valley — a strategically vital pass. The phrase hannishqaf al-gei hatsevo'im ('overlooking the Valley of the Hyenas') uses the Niphal participle of sh-q-f ('to look down upon, overlook') — the road gives a commanding view down into the valley. Tsevo'im means 'hyenas' (from tsavoa, 'hyena'), indicating a desolate, predator-inhabited ravine. Hammidbarah ('toward the wilderness') points east, toward the Judean desert descending to the Dead Sea and Jordan valley.
- 19. The word charash ('craftsman, smith, metalworker') from ch-r-sh ('to engrave, plow, work skillfully') here refers specifically to a metalsmith — someone who could forge iron or bronze into weapons. The phrase lo yimmatse' ('could not be found') uses the Niphal of m-ts- — they were not merely rare but entirely absent. The Philistine rationale is stated directly: pen ya'asu ha'Ivrim cherev o chanit ('lest the Hebrews make sword or spear'). The term Ivrim ('Hebrews') is again used in a context of foreign domination — the Philistines use the ethnic label rather than 'Israel.' The word cherev ('sword') and chanit ('spear') represent the two basic infantry weapons of the period.
- 20. The verb vayyerdu ('they went down') indicates geographical descent from the Israelite highlands to the Philistine coastal plain. The verb liltosh ('to sharpen, to hammer sharp') describes the metalworking process of re-edging dulled tools. The four implements are: maharashtah ('plowshare,' the cutting blade of the plow), et ('mattock,' a heavy digging tool), qardummo ('his axe,' a cutting/chopping tool), and maharashtah (variant form, 'plowpoint' or possibly a second type of plow blade — the text may list two plow-related tools with different functions). The exact identification of all four tools is debated among scholars.
- 21. The word pim (also spelled payim) was a mystery until the discovery of inscribed stone weights in archaeological excavations. It equals approximately two-thirds of a shekel (about 7.6 grams of silver). The word happetsirah ('the charge, the price, the sharpening fee') from p-ts-r is also rare. The shelosh qilleshon ('three-pronged fork') is an agricultural pitchfork. The darvan ('ox-goad') is a long pointed stick used to drive oxen — even this simple tool required Philistine metalworking for its iron point. The verse catalogs every agricultural implement that required periodic sharpening, demonstrating the total scope of Philistine economic control.
- 22. The phrase beyom milchemet ('on the day of battle') marks the moment of truth — when the Philistine iron monopoly translates into battlefield reality. The phrase velo nimtsa' cherev vachanit ('neither sword nor spear was found') uses the Niphal of m-ts- again — weapons simply do not exist in the Israelite ranks. The phrase beyad kol-ha'am ('in the hand of all the people') is comprehensive — not one soldier among the six hundred is properly armed. The final clause vattimatse' leSha'ul uleYonatan beno ('but there was found for Saul and Jonathan his son') isolates the two as the only armed Israelites. The contrast is absolute: two weapons versus an entire Philistine army.
- 23. The word matsav ('outpost, standing garrison, stationed force') from n-ts-v is related to netsiv (verse 3) but indicates a forward-deployed position rather than a permanent garrison. The phrase ma'avar Mikhmas ('the pass/crossing of Michmash') refers to the narrow rocky defile between Michmash and Geba — identified with the modern Wadi Suweinit, a deep ravine with steep cliffs on both sides. This is the exact location described in 14:4-5, where two rocky crags named Botsets and Seneh flank the passage. The Philistine control of this pass effectively traps Saul's force south of the ravine.

Summary: Jonathan, without telling his father Saul, takes only his armor-bearer on a daring two-man assault against a Philistine garrison at the pass of Michmash. God confirms the mission through a sign, and Jonathan and his armor-bearer kill about twenty men, triggering a divinely amplified panic throughout the Philistine camp. Saul's watchmen see the confusion, and Saul musters his small force to pursue. Meanwhile, Saul has bound the army with a rash oath — a curse on anyone who eats food before evening. Jonathan, who never heard the oath, eats wild honey in the forest. When Saul attempts to inquire of God through the sacred lots, God does not answer. The lots identify Jonathan as the oath-breaker. Saul declares that Jonathan must die, but the people intervene and ransom Jonathan, declaring that he fought alongside God that day. The chapter closes with a summary of Saul's wars and family.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is a study in contrasts between two models of faith and leadership. Jonathan acts with stunning theological clarity: 'Nothing prevents the LORD from saving by many or by few' (v6). He does not presume on God — he proposes a sign, waits for confirmation, and only then attacks. His faith is bold yet submitted. Saul, by contrast, sits under a pomegranate tree with a shrinking army (v2), issues an oath that harms his own troops (v24-30), and nearly executes his own son for an oath Jonathan never heard (v44). The irony is devastating: the man who should be leading is sitting, and the prince is doing the king's work. The chapter also preserves a critical textual moment in verses 41-42 where the Septuagint (drawing from a Hebrew Vorlage likely reflected in 4QSam) preserves a much longer and more explicit description of the Urim and Thummim lot-casting procedure, material almost certainly lost from the Masoretic Text through haplography. Jonathan's rescue by the people using the verb padah ('ransom/redeem') in verse 45 introduces sacrificial substitution language — the people redeem Jonathan from death, insisting that his victory was accomplished 'with God.'

Translation Friction: The textual history of this chapter is among the most significant in Samuel. The MT of verse 41 reads simply 'Give a perfect lot' (havah tamim), while the LXX preserves a substantially longer text in which Saul explicitly addresses God, asks why he has not answered, and requests that the Urim and Thummim distinguish between himself and Jonathan on one side and the people on the other. Most text critics regard the LXX as preserving the earlier reading, with the MT having lost material through homoioteleuton (the scribe's eye skipping between similar phrase endings). This matters theologically: the longer text makes explicit that Urim and Thummim are the mechanism of divine inquiry, information only implied in the MT. Additionally, verse 18 presents a discrepancy — the MT says Saul called for the 'ark of God,' while the LXX reads 'ephod,' which fits the context far better since the ephod (containing the Urim and Thummim) is the instrument of priestly inquiry, and the ark was at Kiriath-jearim, not with Saul's army. Most scholars follow the LXX here. Saul's oath in verse 24 and its consequences raise questions about the theology of rash vows — the text never endorses Saul's oath as righteous, and Jonathan's critique of it (vv29-30) stands unchallenged by the narrator.

Connections: Jonathan's faith declaration in verse 6 ('Nothing prevents the LORD from saving by many or by few') establishes a theological principle that echoes forward to David and Goliath (chapter 17), where another young man confronts a vastly superior enemy trusting in divine, not numerical, advantage. The Michmash pass assault recalls Gideon's reduction from 32,000 to 300 (Judges 7) — God's pattern of delivering through the few to ensure that credit belongs to him alone. Saul's rash oath belongs to a biblical pattern of devastating vows: Jephthah's vow that cost his daughter's life (Judges 11:30-40) is the closest parallel, and the text invites comparison — both are military leaders whose misguided oaths threaten their own children. But where Jephthah carried out his vow, the people prevent Saul from doing so. The verb padah ('ransom') used for Jonathan's rescue is the same verb used for the redemption of firstborn sons (Exodus 13:13-15) and for God's redemption of Israel from Egypt — the people are performing a theological act, not merely a political rescue. The chapter's closing genealogical note (vv49-51) introduces names that will dominate the coming narrative: Abner the commander, and the daughters Merab and Michal — Michal will become David's wife and the hinge of the Saul-David conflict.

1One day Jonathan son of Saul said to the young man who carried his weapons, "Come, let's cross over to the Philistine outpost on the other side." 2But he did not tell his father. 3Saul was sitting at the edge of Gibeah under the pomegranate tree at Migron, and the force with him was about six hundred men. 4Ahijah son of Ahitub — brother of Ichabod, son of Phinehas, son of Eli, priest of the LORD at Shiloh — was wearing the ephod. And the people did not know that Jonathan had gone. 5Between the passes by which Jonathan intended to cross to the Philistine outpost, there was a rocky crag on one side and a rocky crag on the other. One was named Bozez and the other Seneh. 6One crag rose as a cliff face on the north, facing Michmash, and the other on the south, facing Geba. 7Jonathan said to his armor-bearer, "Come, let's cross over to the outpost of these uncircumcised men. Perhaps the LORD will act for us, because nothing prevents the LORD from saving — whether by many or by few." 8His armor-bearer said to him, "Do everything that is in your heart. Go forward — I am with you, heart and soul." 9Jonathan said, "Right — we are going to cross over toward those men and let them see us." 10If they say to us, 'Stay where you are until we come down to you,' then we will stand in place and not go up to them." 11But if they say, 'Come up to us' — then we will climb up, because the LORD has given them into our hands. That will be the sign for us."

¹¹The two of them revealed themselves to the Philistine outpost. The Philistines said, "Look — Hebrews coming out of the holes where they have been hiding." ¹²The men of the outpost called out to Jonathan and his armor-bearer, "Come up to us and we will teach you a lesson!" Jonathan said to his armor-bearer, "Climb up behind me — the LORD has given them into Israel's hand." ¹³Jonathan climbed up on his hands and feet, with his armor-bearer right behind him. The Philistines fell before Jonathan, and his armor-bearer finished them off behind him. ¹⁴That first strike by Jonathan and his armor-bearer killed about twenty men within roughly half the area a team of oxen could plow in a day. ¹⁵Terror struck the camp — in the field, among all the troops, the outpost, and the raiding parties — they all trembled. The ground itself shook. It became a God-sent panic. ¹⁶Saul's lookouts in Gibeah of Benjamin watched as the Philistine horde was dissolving, scattering in every direction. ¹⁷Saul said to the troops with him, "Take a count and find out who has left us." They took the count, and Jonathan and his armor-bearer were missing. ¹⁸Saul said to Ahijah, "Bring the ephod of God here" — for the ephod of God was with the Israelites at that time. ¹⁹While Saul was still speaking to the priest, the commotion in the Philistine camp kept growing louder and louder. Saul said to the priest, "Pull your hand back." ²⁰Saul and all the troops with him rallied and advanced to the battle. When they arrived, every Philistine's sword was turned against his neighbor — the confusion was catastrophic. ²¹The Hebrews who had previously been with the Philistines — who had gone up with them into the camp from the surrounding area — even they turned to join the Israelites under Saul and Jonathan. ²²And all the Israelites who had been hiding in the hill country of Ephraim heard that the Philistines were fleeing, and they too joined the pursuit in battle. ²³The LORD saved Israel that day, and the battle moved past Beth-aven. ²⁴The men of Israel were hard-pressed that day, because Saul had bound the troops with an oath, saying, "Cursed is the man who eats any food before evening, until I have taken vengeance on my enemies!" So none of the troops ate anything. ²⁵The whole army entered a forest, and there was honey on the surface of the ground. ²⁶When the troops entered the forest, honey was flowing freely, but no one raised his hand to his mouth, because the troops feared the oath. ²⁷But Jonathan had not heard when his father bound the troops with the oath. He reached out the tip of the staff in his hand, dipped it into the honeycomb, brought his hand to his mouth — and his eyes brightened. ²⁸One of the soldiers spoke up and said, "Your father strictly bound the troops with an oath, saying, 'Cursed is the man who eats food today.'" The troops were exhausted. ²⁹Jonathan said, "My father has brought trouble on the land. Look at how my eyes have brightened because I tasted just a little of this honey." ³⁰How much greater would the victory have been if the troops had eaten freely today from the plunder of their enemies! The slaughter among the Philistines would have been far greater. ³¹They struck down the Philistines that day from Michmash to Aijalon, and the troops were utterly exhausted. ³²The troops rushed at the plunder, seizing sheep, cattle, and calves, and slaughtered them right on the ground. The troops ate the meat with the blood still in it. ³³Someone reported to Saul, "Look, the troops are sinning against the LORD by eating meat with the blood." He said, "You have acted treacherously! Roll a large stone over to me right now." ³⁴Saul said, "Spread out among the troops and tell them: Every man bring his ox, every man his sheep — slaughter them here on this stone and eat. Do not sin against the LORD by eating meat with the blood." All the troops brought their animals that night, each man leading his ox by hand, and slaughtered them there. ³⁵Saul built an altar to the LORD. It was the first altar he had ever built to the LORD. ³⁶Saul said, "Let's go down after the Philistines tonight and plunder them until dawn, and not leave a single man alive." The troops said, "Do whatever seems good to you." But the priest said, "Let us approach God here first." ³⁷Saul inquired of God: "Should I go down after the Philistines? Will you give them into Israel's hand?" But God did not answer him that day. ³⁸Saul said, "Come forward — all the leaders of the troops. Find out and determine what sin has been committed today." ³⁹"As the LORD who saves Israel lives — even if the guilt lies with my son Jonathan, he will certainly die." But not a single person among all the troops said a word. ⁴⁰He said to all Israel, "You will stand on one side, and I and my son Jonathan will stand on the other." The people said to Saul, "Do what seems good to you." ⁴¹Saul said to the LORD, the God of Israel, "Why have you not answered your servant today? If the guilt is in me or in my son Jonathan, LORD God of Israel, let the answer be Urim. If the guilt is in your people Israel, let the answer be Thummim." Jonathan and Saul were selected by lot, and the people were cleared. ⁴²Saul said, "Cast the lot between me and my son Jonathan." And Jonathan was selected. ⁴³Saul said to Jonathan, "Tell me — what have you done?" Jonathan told him: "I tasted a little honey with the tip of the staff in my hand. Here I am — I am ready to die." ⁴⁴Saul said, "May God do this to me and worse — you will certainly die, Jonathan." ⁴⁵But the people said to Saul, "Should Jonathan die — the one who accomplished this great deliverance in Israel? Absolutely not! As the LORD lives, not a single hair from his head will fall to the ground, because he fought alongside God today." The people ransomed Jonathan, and he did not die. ⁴⁶Saul broke off the pursuit of the Philistines, and the Philistines returned to their own territory. ⁴⁷Saul had secured the kingship over Israel and waged war on every side against all his enemies: against Moab, the Ammonites, Edom, the kings of Zobah, and the Philistines. Wherever he turned, he inflicted defeat. ⁴⁸He mustered a fighting force and struck Amalek, and he rescued Israel from the hands of those who plundered them. ⁴⁹The sons of Saul were Jonathan, Ishvi, and Malki-shua. The names of his two daughters: the firstborn was Merab, and the younger was Michal. ⁵⁰The name of Saul's wife was Ahinoam daughter of Ahimaaz. The name of his army commander was Abner son of Ner, Saul's uncle. ⁵¹Kish was Saul's father, and Ner, Abner's father, was the son of Abiel. ⁵²The war against the Philistines was fierce throughout Saul's entire reign. Whenever Saul saw a strong warrior or any capable fighting man, he would recruit him into his service.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase vayehi hayyom ('it happened one day') is a standard narrative opener indicating an unspecified but significant day. Jonathan is identified as ben-Sha'ul ('son of Saul') to establish the royal connection. The na'ar nosei khelav ('the young man carrying his weapons') is a military attendant — an armor-bearer who also fights. The verb na'averah ('let us cross over') from 'v-r implies crossing a geographic barrier (the wadi between the two cliff faces described in v4-5). The final clause ule'aviv lo higgid ('but to his father he did not tell') uses the Hiphil of n-g-d ('to declare, to report') — Jonathan deliberately withheld this plan from Saul.
2. The participle yoshev ('sitting') contrasts sharply with Jonathan's initiative in v1. Migron is a location near Gibeah; some scholars identify it with a site north of Michmash. The rimmon ('pomegranate tree') is a specific landmark — the definite article ha-rimmon indicates a known tree. Six hundred men is all that remains of Saul's army after the desertions described in 13:6-7 — a catastrophic reduction from the original force. This number echoes the 600 Benjaminite survivors of the civil war in Judges 20:47, another Benjaminite remnant.
3. The genealogy traces Ahijah (Achiyyah, 'my brother is YAH') through Ahitub, past Ichabod (I-khavod, 'where is the glory?'), through Phinehas (Pinechas) to Eli — the entire priestly line that fell under God's judgment in chapters 2-4. The ephod (efod) here is the priestly vestment containing the pocket (choshen) that held the Urim and Thummim for divine consultation. The phrase nosei efod ('wearing/carrying the ephod') identifies Ahijah as the active consulting priest. The clause veha'am lo yada' ki halakh Yonatan ('the people did not know that Jonathan had gone') — even Saul did not know, as v17 will confirm.
4. The ma'averot ('passes, crossing-points') are the narrow defiles in the wadi system. The phrase shen-hasela' ('tooth of the rock') is a vivid geographic term — a jagged, protruding crag. Two such formations face each other across the pass. Bozez (Botsets) likely derives from b-ts-ts ('to gleam, to shine'), suggesting a light-colored or sun-facing cliff. Seneh (Senneh) likely relates to seneh ('thorn-bush'), the same word used for the burning bush in Exodus 3:2-4. Whether this connection is coincidental or narratively significant is debated.
5. The noun matsuq ('cliff, pillar of rock') intensifies the description — these are not gentle slopes but sheer rock faces. The northern crag faces Michmash (Mikmash), where the Philistines are encamped. The southern crag faces Geva' (Geba), where Jonathan's starting position is. Jonathan must climb the northern cliff to reach the Philistine outpost — ascending a sheer face toward an enemy looking down. The geography is preserved in the modern Wadi Suweinit near the Palestinian village of Mukhmas.
6. The term ha'arelim ('the uncircumcised') is Israel's standard term of contempt for the Philistines — it identifies them as outside the Abrahamic covenant and therefore outside divine protection. The particle ulay ('perhaps') is theologically important: Jonathan does not presume on God but expresses hopeful openness. The noun ma'atsor ('restraint, barrier, hindrance') from '-ts-r means there is literally nothing that can hold God back. The Hiphil infinitive lehoshi'a ('to save, to deliver') is from the root y-sh- — the salvation root. The contrast berav o vim'at ('by many or by few') states the theological principle in its purest form: divine deliverance is independent of human resources.
7. The phrase kol-asher bilvavekha ('all that is in your heart') grants Jonathan complete authority — the armor-bearer submits fully to his commander's judgment. The imperative neteh lekha ('turn, go forward, proceed') expresses readiness to move. The declaration hinneni immekha kilevavekha ('here I am with you according to your heart') is a triple affirmation: presence (hinneni), companionship (immekha), and shared purpose (kilevavekha). The word levav ('heart') appears twice in this verse, emphasizing that the armor-bearer's inner conviction matches Jonathan's own.
8. The verb overim ('crossing over') resumes the language of v1 and v6 — they will cross the wadi. The Niphal veniglinu ('we will reveal ourselves, we will be disclosed') from g-l-h means they will deliberately make themselves visible. This is part of Jonathan's sign: they will expose themselves to the enemy and let the Philistines' response determine whether God has granted them the initiative. Stealth is abandoned in favor of a faith-test.
9. The first option of the sign: if the Philistines say dommu ('stand still, wait, be silent') — a command to halt — and declare they will come down, Jonathan reads this as God withholding the signal. The phrase ve'amadnu tachteinu ('we will stand in our place') means they will hold position and abort the mission. Jonathan's sign is not arbitrary; it has tactical logic — if the enemy comes to them on the cliff face, the disadvantage of terrain belongs to Jonathan. He needs them to stay put and invite the climb.

10. The imperative 'alu ('come up') from the Philistines is intended as mockery — inviting two men to climb a cliff toward an armed garrison is a taunt. Jonathan reads this taunt as the sign (ot) of divine authorization. The verb netanam ('he has given them') is a prophetic perfect — future action described with past-tense certainty because God's decision is already made. The phrase beyadenu ('into our hand') is the standard expression for military victory granted by God. The word ot ('sign') links Jonathan's method to the broader prophetic tradition of seeking and receiving divine confirmation before action.
11. The Niphal vayyiggalu ('they revealed themselves') from g-l-h — the deliberate exposure described in v8. The word Ivrim ('Hebrews') is used by non-Israelites throughout Samuel and Exodus — it may be an exonym (outsider-name) with condescending overtones. The chorim ('holes') are the caves and crevices mentioned in 13:6. The participle yotse'im ('coming out') and the relative clause asher hitchabbe'u sham ('where they hid themselves') — the Philistines read the situation as desperate refugees emerging from hiding, not as warriors attacking.
12. The phrase venodi'ah etkhem davar (literally 'we will cause you to know a thing') is an idiomatic threat — 'we'll give you something to remember.' It functions as the sign Jonathan specified in v10. Jonathan's command 'aleh acharai ('climb up behind me') shows he leads the assault personally, going first up the cliff face. The shift from beyadenu ('into our hand,' v10) to beyad Yisra'el ('into Israel's hand') widens the scope — this is not Jonathan's private victory but God's deliverance for the nation.
13. The phrase al-yadav ve'al-raglav ('on his hands and on his feet') describes literal hand-and-foot climbing — scrambling up the rock face. This is not metaphor; the terrain requires it. The verb vayyippeleu ('they fell') before Jonathan could indicate they collapsed in panic, were struck down, or stumbled — the text leaves the mechanism ambiguous. The participle memottet ('putting to death, finishing off') from m-v-t (Polel) describes the armor-bearer's role as executioner of those Jonathan has already downed. The combat choreography is precise: Jonathan leads and strikes first, the armor-bearer follows and ensures the kill.
14. The phrase makkah rishonah ('first strike, initial slaughter') implies there will be more killing to follow — this is just the opening blow. The measurement keba'chatsi ma'anah tsemed sadeh ('about half a furrow of a yoke of field') is an agricultural land measure — the area one team of oxen could plow in a single pass, roughly half an acre. Using farming units for a battlefield measurement is distinctly Israelite. The number ke'esrim ish ('about twenty men') is modest enough to be credible — the narrator is not inflating the count.
15. The noun charadah ('trembling, terror, anxiety') from ch-r-d appears three times in this verse (charadah, chardu, cherdat), creating an intensifying repetition. The categories of troops affected expand outward: the camp (machaneh), the field (sadeh), all the people (kol-ha'am), the garrison (matsav), and the raiding parties (mashchit, literally 'destroyers'). The verb vattirgaz ('it quaked') from r-g-z describes seismic trembling. The climactic phrase cherdat Elohim ('trembling of God') uses the divine name as a superlative intensifier — this is not ordinary panic but supernaturally induced, overwhelming terror.
16. The tsolim ('lookouts, watchmen') are Saul's scouts stationed to observe Philistine movements. From Gibeah they can see across to Michmash. The verb namog ('melting, dissolving') from m-u-g describes the army losing cohesion — troops flowing away like liquid. The phrase vayelexh vahalom ('going and striking') is difficult — it may mean the Philistines were scattering in confusion while striking each other, or it may describe the mass moving and collapsing. The LXX reads the scene as the camp dissolving in all directions.
17. The imperative piquedu-na ('muster, take a count, please') from p-q-d shows Saul trying to understand the situation through administrative means — counting heads rather than inquiring of God. Only after the count reveals Jonathan's absence does Saul begin to understand what has happened. The verb halakh me'immanu ('has gone from us') — Saul does not yet know that Jonathan left deliberately to attack; he only knows someone is missing.
18. TEXTUAL NOTE: The MT reads aron ha-Elohim ('ark of God') but the LXX reads efod ('ephod'). The rendering follows the LXX. The ark was at Kiriath-jearim (7:1-2), not with Saul's army. Ahijah was already identified as wearing the ephod in v3. The verb haggisah ('bring near') is a Hiphil imperative of n-g-sh, commonly used for bringing sacred objects or offerings close for ritual use. The entire context — Saul wanting to inquire of God before battle — points to the ephod (and its Urim and Thummim), not the ark.
19. The phrase halokh varav ('going and increasing') is an intensifying construction — the noise continually grows. The command esof yadekha ('gather in your hand') tells the priest to stop the Urim and Thummim procedure. The 'hand' likely refers to the priest reaching into the ephod's pouch to draw the lots. Saul's impatience here echoes his premature sacrifice in 13:8-12 — both are moments where Saul acts before the proper ritual or prophetic process is complete. The narrator records this without explicit condemnation, but the pattern is unmistakable.
20. The verb vayyiza'eq ('he cried out, he rallied') from z-l-q is the war cry that musters the troops. The phrase cherev ish bere'ehu ('the sword of each man against his neighbor') describes the Philistines killing each other in the panic — a phenomenon that occurs repeatedly in biblical holy war narratives (Judges 7:22, 2 Chronicles 20:23). The word mehumah ('confusion, tumult, panic') is a technical term for divinely induced battlefield chaos — it shares a root with the tohom of Genesis 1:2, primordial disorder. The phrase gedolah me'od ('very great') intensifies: this is total disintegration of military order.
21. The Ivrim ('Hebrews') here are Israelites who had defected to or been conscripted by the Philistines — collaborators or forced laborers who served in the Philistine army. The phrase ke'etmol shilshom ('as yesterday and the day before,' i.e., 'previously, in earlier times') indicates an established arrangement. When the panic breaks out, these Hebrews switch sides — they turn (lihyot im, 'to be with') Israel. The narrator distinguishes between these turncoats and the Israelites who had remained with Saul, without explicit condemnation of the former. Battlefield loyalty shifts were common in ancient Near Eastern warfare.

22. The Hithpael participle hammitchabbe'im ('those hiding themselves') from ch-v- recalls 13:6 — these are the deserters and refugees who fled Saul's army. When word spreads that the Philistines are in full retreat, they emerge and join the pursuit. The verb vayyadebiqu ('they pursued closely, they clung after') from d-v-q indicates aggressive, close pursuit — staying right on the enemy's heels. The phrase behar-Efrayim ('in the hill country of Ephraim') places these refugees north of the battlefield, in territory the fleeing Philistines would pass through.
23. The Hiphil vayyosha' ('he saved, he delivered') from y-sh- is the central salvation verb of the Hebrew Bible — the root of the names Joshua and Jesus. Its subject is YHWH alone. Beth-aven (Beit Aven, 'house of wickedness') is located near Bethel; some scholars suggest it is a polemical renaming of Bethel ('house of God') after it became associated with idolatrous worship. The phrase vehamillchamah averah ('and the battle passed beyond') indicates the pursuit continued well past the initial engagement zone.
24. The verb vayyoel ('he made swear, he adjured') from 'l-h is related to alah ('oath, curse') — Saul binds the people under a self-imprecating oath. The word arur ('cursed') invokes covenant-curse language — whoever breaks this oath falls under divine malediction. The phrase veniqamti me'oyevai ('and I will be avenged on my enemies') centers the entire military campaign on Saul's personal vendetta rather than God's deliverance. The verb nigas ('pressed, distressed, oppressed') describes the physical and psychological toll of fighting all day without food. The phrase lo ta'am kol-ha'am lachem ('all the people did not taste food') confirms universal compliance — except for Jonathan, who never heard the oath.
25. The phrase kol-ha'arets ('all the land/earth') here functions as 'the whole group' or 'everyone.' The ya'ar ('forest, woodland') is likely in the hill country west of Michmash. The devash ('honey') on penei hasadeh ('the face of the field/ground') is wild honey — probably from a ground-level or low-hanging hive. The forest dripping with honey creates a scene of abundant provision: God has just given them victory and now provides sustenance — but Saul's oath prevents them from receiving it.
26. The phrase helekh devash ('a flow of honey') describes honey actively dripping or running — the hive is overflowing. The image is almost torturous: exhausted, starving soldiers walking through a forest dripping with honey, and no one dares eat. The verb massig ('bringing, reaching') with yado el-piv ('his hand to his mouth') — the most basic human gesture of eating. The noun shevu'ah ('oath, sworn declaration') from sh-v- is the binding force that restrains them. The fear (yare') is not of Saul personally but of the sacred curse — breaking a sworn oath in Israel's worldview invited divine retribution.
27. The clause lo shama' behashbi'a aviv et-ha'am ('he had not heard when his father made the people swear') establishes Jonathan's complete ignorance — the oath is not binding on one who never heard it, though Saul will not see it that way. The matteh ('staff, rod') is Jonathan's walking/fighting stick. The ya'arat haddevash ('honeycomb,' literally 'forest of honey') is a dense mass of wild honeycomb. The phrase vatta'ornah einav ('his eyes brightened/became light') from 'v-r ('to be light') is an idiom for physical revitalization — the opposite of the dim eyes of exhaustion or fasting (cf. v29). The brightening of eyes signals that the honey did exactly what food should do for exhausted warriors.
28. The phrase hashbe'a hishbi'a ('he made solemnly swear, he strictly adjured') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis — the oath was emphatic and public. The soldier informs Jonathan of what he missed. The final clause vayya'af ha'am ('the people were faint/exhausted') from 'y-f uses a verb meaning to be weary to the point of collapse — the oath's toll on fighting men who have been pursuing all day without food. The narrator places this observation right after Jonathan's eyes brighten from eating, creating an implicit contrast: Jonathan is revived, everyone else is collapsing.
29. The verb akhar ('to trouble, to stir up disaster') is loaded — it connects Saul to Achan (Akhan from the same root) whose trespass at Jericho brought defeat on all Israel (Joshua 7). Jonathan's use of this word is a serious accusation. The phrase re'u-na ('look, please') invites the soldiers to observe the evidence. The clause ki oru einai ('because my eyes have brightened') from 'v-r proves his point physically — the honey worked. The phrase me'at devash hazzeh ('a little of this honey') minimizes the amount: even a tiny portion of what God provided through the forest would have transformed the army's effectiveness.
30. The particle af ki ('how much more') introduces an a fortiori argument — if a little honey did this much, imagine if the whole army had eaten. The phrase akhol akhal ('had freely eaten') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis — unrestricted eating. The noun mishellal oyeveihem ('from the plunder of their enemies') — the food seized from the fleeing Philistines was available but forbidden. Jonathan argues that the oath limited the scope of God's victory: the makkah ('strike, slaughter, defeat') against the Philistines would have been ravetah ('greater, more extensive') if the army had been properly fed. Jonathan's critique is both military and theological: Saul's oath hindered what God was doing.
31. The pursuit extended from Mikhmash (Michmash, the starting point) to Ayyalon (Aijalon), a distance of roughly 15-20 miles westward through the hill country toward the coastal plain — a full day's hard march and fighting. The phrase vayya'af ha'am me'od ('the people were very faint') repeats the exhaustion motif from v28 with the intensifier me'od ('very, exceedingly'). These men have been fighting and running all day on empty stomachs because of Saul's oath. The narrator ensures the reader understands the human cost of Saul's reckless vow.
32. The phrase vayya'as ha'am el-hashalal ('the people rushed/flew at the plunder') uses a verb suggesting violent, undisciplined haste. The animals — tso'n (sheep/goats), baqar (cattle), benei vaqar (calves) — represent significant captured livestock. The phrase vayyishchatu al-ha'arets ('they slaughtered on the ground') means they killed the animals where they stood rather than using a proper slaughtering site with drainage for the blood. The critical phrase vayyokhal ha'am al-haddam ('the people ate with/on the blood') indicates they consumed meat without properly draining the blood — a violation of the prohibition in Leviticus 17:10-14 and Genesis 9:4.
33. The report uses the participle chot'im ('sinning, missing the mark') — the people are in active violation of Torah. Saul's response begadtem ('you have acted treacherously, you have dealt faithlessly') from b-g-d is a strong accusation of covenant betrayal. The command gollu elai even gedolah ('roll to me a large stone') — Saul improvises a solution: a large stone will serve as a raised slaughtering surface so the blood can drain properly. The stone elevates the killing above ground level, allowing blood to flow away rather than pool around the meat. This shows Saul can think practically about religious law, even though his oath caused the problem.

34. The imperative putsu ('scatter, disperse') sends messengers throughout the camp. The phrase ish shoro ve'ish seihi ('each man his ox and each man his sheep') requires orderly, individual slaughter on the elevated stone. The verb ushechatetem bazzeh ('and you shall slaughter on this') — bazzeh ('on this') refers to the great stone. The prohibition velo-techetu laYHWH le'ekhol el-haddam ('do not sin against the LORD by eating with the blood') shows Saul correctly identifying the theological issue. The nighttime setting (hallaylah) indicates this continued after dark — the troops were so hungry they slaughtered and ate through the night.
35. The verb vayyiven ('he built') from b-n-h is the standard term for altar construction. The phrase oto hechel livnot mizbe'ach laYHWH ('it he began to build an altar to the LORD' — i.e., 'that was the first altar he built to the LORD') uses hechel ('he began') in a way that emphasizes the novelty of the act. Some read this as 'he began by building' (i.e., this was his first), others as a comment on his overall reign. The repeated phrase laYHWH ('to the LORD') twice in one verse may emphasize that this altar is properly dedicated — unlike the improper ground-slaughter.
36. The cohortative neredah ('let us go down') from y-r-d suits the geography — the Philistines are retreating westward and downhill toward the coastal plain. The verb navozah ('let us plunder') from b-z-z means to strip the defeated of all valuables. The phrase ad-or habboqer ('until the light of morning') — a night operation extending to dawn. The troops' kol-hattov be'einekha aseh ('do whatever is good in your eyes') is formulaic deference. The priest's niqerevah halom el-ha-Elohim ('let us draw near here to God') uses language of sacred approach — qerev is the verb for approaching the divine presence, and halom ('here, to this place') suggests using the ephod right where they are.
37. The verb vayyish'al ('he inquired') from sh-'l — the same root as Saul's own name (Sha'ul, 'asked/requested'). The two questions follow the binary format required by the Urim and Thummim: yes/no answers. The crushing phrase velo anahu bayyom hahu ('he did not answer him that day') — God's refusal to communicate through the appointed channel indicates a breach in the relationship. In 28:6, this same silence will recur when Saul desperately seeks guidance before his final battle, and 'the LORD did not answer him, not by dreams, not by Urim, not by prophets.'
38. The imperative goshu halom ('draw near here') summons the leaders for investigation. The pinnot ha'am ('corners of the people') is an idiom for the leaders — the 'cornerstones' who hold the community together. The verbs ude'u ur'u ('know and see') demand both intellectual understanding and visible evidence. The noun hachattat ('the sin') from ch-t-t' — Saul assumes that God's silence must be caused by sin, which is correct in the framework of holy war theology. But the irony is that the 'sin' is Jonathan eating honey he never knew was forbidden.
39. Saul swears by the living God (chai-YHWH) — another oath on top of the first one. The phrase hammoshi'a et-Yisra'el ('who saves Israel') is bitterly ironic: Saul invokes God as Israel's savior in the same breath that he threatens to kill the man through whom God just saved Israel. The phrase mot yamut ('he will surely die') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis — death is certain. The people's silence (ein onehu mikkol-ha'am, 'none answering him from all the people') is pregnant: they know Jonathan ate the honey, they know the oath was unjust, but no one dares contradict a king swearing by God's name.
40. Saul divides the lot-casting into two groups: the people on one side (ever echad) and the royal house (Saul and Jonathan) on the other. This is the initial binary division for the Urim and Thummim process — the lots will determine which side bears the guilt. The people's repeated deference hattov be'einekha aseh ('do what is good in your eyes') shows compliance but not enthusiasm. They are watching Saul move toward a conclusion they fear.
41. CRITICAL TEXTUAL NOTE: The MT reads only havah tamim ('give perfection/completeness'), which is grammatically awkward and widely regarded as a truncation. The LXX (and 4QSam) preserves the full text of Saul's prayer, which explicitly names the Urim and Thummim as the two possible lot-outcomes. This longer reading is followed by most modern text critics (McCarter, Cross, Tov) and is almost certainly original. The loss in the MT is best explained by homoioteleuton — the word Yisra'el appears multiple times in the full text, and a scribe's eye skipped from one occurrence to a later one, dropping the intervening material. The verb vayyillakhed ('he was taken/caught') from l-k-d is the technical term for being identified by sacred lot (cf. Joshua 7:14-18, where Achan is 'taken' by lot).
42. The imperative happilu ('cast') is the standard term for lot-casting — literally 'cause to fall.' The phrase beini uvein Yonatan beni ('between me and between Jonathan my son') sets up the final binary. The verb vayyillakhed ('was taken/caught') identifies Jonathan. The brevity of the verse is striking — no editorializing, no divine speech, just the stark result. The narrative tension is at its peak: Saul has sworn Jonathan will die (v39), the lots have identified Jonathan, and the audience knows Jonathan is innocent.
43. The imperative haggidah li ('tell me') from n-g-d demands full disclosure. Jonathan's response uses the infinitive absolute ta'om ta'amti ('I certainly tasted') — an honest, unvarnished admission. The phrase me'at devash ('a little honey') — minimizing the quantity emphasizes the absurdity: death for a taste of honey. The declaration hinneni amut ('here I am, I will die') combines hinneni (the response of covenant readiness) with amut ('I will die') — Jonathan accepts the sentence with the composure of a man whose conscience is clear. He does not say 'I deserve to die' — only that he is prepared to.
44. The formula koh ya'aseh Elohim vekhoh yosif ('thus may God do and thus may he add') is a conditional self-curse — if I fail to carry this out, may God punish me and then some. The phrase mot tamut ('dying you will die,' i.e., 'you will certainly die') is the strongest possible death sentence in Hebrew. Using it for Jonathan — the hero of the day — reveals the full absurdity of Saul's oath-driven logic. The narrator records the sentence without endorsement.
45. The rhetorical question haYonatan yamut ('should Jonathan die?') expects a forceful 'no.' The noun yeshu'ah ('salvation, deliverance') from y-sh-' attributes the victory to Jonathan as God's agent. The oath formula chai-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') matches Saul's own oath formula, creating a direct confrontation of sworn declarations. The idiom im-yippol missa'arat rosho artsah ('if a hair of his head falls to the ground') — a guarantee of absolute safety. The phrase im-Elohim asah ('with God he acted/worked') — the people declare Jonathan's battle was a partnership with God. The verb vayyifdu ('they ransomed/redeemed') from p-d-h is the critical term — redemption language typically reserved for God's saving acts or the substitutionary redemption of firstborn sons.

46. The verb vayya'al ('he went up') from 'l-h here means Saul ascended back from the lowland pursuit — returning eastward and upward from the coastal plain toward the hill country. The phrase halekhu limqomam ('they went to their place') — the Philistines retreated to Philistia (the coastal cities of Gaza, Ashkelon, Ashdod, Ekron, and Gath). The pursuit ends without a decisive Philistine defeat.
47. The phrase lakhad hammelukhah ('he seized/secured the kingship') from l-k-d uses the same 'capture' verb as the lot-casting — Saul took hold of royal power. The list of enemies covers all compass directions: Moab (east of the Dead Sea), Ammon (Transjordan), Edom (south, Negev to the Gulf of Aqaba), Zobah (Aramean kingdom north of Damascus), and Philistines (western coastal plain). The phrase uvkhol asher-yifneh yarshi'a ('wherever he turned, he condemned/defeated') — the Hiphil of r-sh-' normally means 'to condemn, to declare guilty,' which is an unusual way to describe military victory. Some emend to yatsliyach ('he succeeded') or read it as 'he prevailed.' The MT reading may be deliberately ambiguous.
48. The phrase vayya'as chayil ('he made/gathered strength/valor') can mean either 'he acted valiantly' or 'he mustered an army.' The Amalek campaign described here will be narrated in full in chapter 15 — and it will become the occasion of Saul's definitive rejection by God. The verb vayyatsel ('he rescued, he delivered') from n-ts-l credits Saul with rescuing Israel from the shosehu ('the one plundering him'). This summary presents Saul in the best possible light as a military king, which makes the coming narrative of his disobedience and rejection all the more tragic.
49. The three sons listed here do not include Ish-bosheth (Eshbaal), who appears in 2 Samuel 2:8 — either Ishvi is an alternate name or Ish-bosheth is omitted. Malki-shu'a means 'my king is noble/generous.' The daughters are listed by birth order: Merav (firstborn) and Mikhal (younger). Both names will feature prominently: Merav in the broken betrothal to David (18:17-19), Michal in the love story and later estrangement (18:20-28, 2 Samuel 6:16-23). The genealogical format follows ancient Near Eastern royal chronicle conventions.
50. Achinoam (Ahinoam, 'my brother is delight/pleasantness') daughter of Achimaaz (Ahimaaz) — a different Ahinoam from the one David later marries (25:43). Avner (Abner, 'my father is a lamp') son of Ner is identified as Saul's dod ('uncle' or 'kinsman'). Abner will become a major figure: he will champion Ish-bosheth after Saul's death, oppose David, and eventually be killed by Joab (2 Samuel 3). As sar-tseva'o ('commander of his army'), Abner holds the most powerful military position in the kingdom.
51. The genealogy clarifies the family relationships: Kish (Qish) is Saul's father (as established in 9:1), and Ner is Abner's father. Both Kish and Ner are identified as sons of Abiel (Avi'el, 'my father is God'), making Saul and Abner cousins. This explains Abner's fierce loyalty to Saul's house — they are close kin. The genealogy also anchors the royal house in the tribe of Benjamin.
52. The adjective chazaqah ('strong, fierce, hard') describes the Philistine war as a grinding, sustained conflict. The phrase kol yemei Sha'ul ('all the days of Saul') encompasses his entire reign — the war never ends. The verb vayya'asfegu ('he gathered him, he recruited him') from 's-f shows a systematic policy of military conscription based on observed ability. The phrase ish gibbor ('mighty man, warrior') and ben-chayil ('son of valor, capable man') are the elite warrior designations that David will embody. This recruiting policy ironically sets the stage for David's arrival at court and the beginning of Saul's undoing.

Summary: Samuel delivers the LORD's command to Saul: march against Amalek and execute total cherem — devoted destruction of everything and everyone. Saul wages a successful campaign, crushing the Amalekite forces from Havilah to Shur. But he spares King Agag alive and allows his troops to keep the best livestock, claiming the animals are for sacrifice to the LORD. God tells Samuel he regrets making Saul king. Samuel confronts Saul at Gilgal with one of the most devastating theological verdicts in the Hebrew Bible: 'To obey is better than sacrifice, and to listen than the fat of rams.' Saul is rejected as king. He begs Samuel not to humiliate him publicly, and Samuel briefly accompanies him — but as Samuel turns to leave, Saul tears his robe, and Samuel declares that the LORD has torn the kingdom from him and given it to a neighbor who is better. Samuel then personally executes Agag before the LORD at Gilgal. The two men part and never see each other again, though Samuel grieves over Saul for the rest of his life.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains what may be the single most important theological statement about worship in the entire Hebrew Bible: hashmoa' mizzevach tov lehaqshiv mechelev elim — 'to obey is better than sacrifice, to listen than the fat of rams' (v22). This is not a late prophetic innovation; it is placed in the mouth of the last judge and first prophet of the monarchical period, at the very inception of kingship. The statement does not abolish sacrifice — it subordinates it. Ritual without obedience is not merely insufficient; it is rebellion (meri) and divination (qesem). Samuel equates Saul's self-willed 'worship' with the pagan practices Israel was commanded to destroy. The chapter also introduces an extraordinary theological tension around the verb nacham ('relent, repent, be grieved'). In verse 11, the LORD says 'I regret (nichamti) that I made Saul king.' In verse 29, Samuel declares 'the Eternal One of Israel does not lie and does not relent (yinnachem), for he is not a human being that he should relent (lehinnachem).' Then in verse 35, the narrator states 'the LORD regretted (nicham) that he had made Saul king.' The same verb is both affirmed and denied of God within a single chapter. This is not carelessness — it is the text wrestling with divine sovereignty and divine grief simultaneously, refusing to resolve the tension.

Translation Friction: The cherem command against Amalek raises profound moral questions that the text itself does not soften. The instruction in verse 3 is comprehensive: kill men, women, children, infants, and all livestock. Modern readers recoil; ancient readers would have understood cherem as the total consecration of war spoil to God — nothing may be profited from, everything belongs to the divine realm. The tension is compounded by the fact that Saul is condemned not for excessive violence but for insufficient obedience to the destruction order. Critical scholarship identifies multiple layers: the Amalekite conflict tradition (Exodus 17:8-16, Deuteronomy 25:17-19), the Deuteronomistic theological framework that interprets Saul's reign as failed, and the possible retrojection of later anti-Amalekite sentiment. The Kenites receiving advance warning (v6) shows that the narrator recognizes ethical distinctions within the campaign — innocents can be spared. The nacham tension (vv11, 29, 35) has generated centuries of theological debate: does God change his mind? The text presents both positions without harmonizing them, suggesting that divine constancy and divine responsiveness to human action are both true and irreducible.

Connections: The Amalekite war connects directly to Exodus 17:8-16, where Amalek attacked Israel's rear — the weak, the exhausted, the stragglers — during the wilderness journey, and to Deuteronomy 25:17-19, which commands Israel to 'blot out the memory of Amalek from under heaven.' Saul's failure to complete cherem mirrors Achan's violation of cherem at Jericho (Joshua 7), where one man's retention of devoted goods brought disaster on all Israel. The verb ma'as ('reject') creates a devastating wordplay: because Saul rejected (ma'asta) the word of the LORD, the LORD has rejected (vayyima'asekha) him as king — the punishment mirrors the crime in the same root. Samuel's statement about obedience and sacrifice anticipates the prophetic tradition of Hosea 6:6 ('I desire loyal love and not sacrifice'), Isaiah 1:11-17, Amos 5:21-24, Micah 6:6-8, and Psalm 51:16-17. The tearing of the robe in verse 27 becomes a recurring symbol of torn kingship: Ahijah will tear a garment into twelve pieces before Jeroboam (1 Kings 11:30-31). Agag's death at Gilgal brings the Amalekite thread to a temporary close, but Amalek resurfaces: David will fight them (1 Samuel 30), and an Amalekite will claim to have killed Saul (2 Samuel 1:8-10). The Amalekite line persists all the way to Haman the Agagite in Esther — a descendant of the royal house Saul was supposed to destroy.

¹Samuel said to Saul, "The LORD sent me to anoint you as king over his people, over Israel. Now listen to the voice of the LORD's words. ²This is what the LORD of Armies says: 'I have called to account what Amalek did to Israel — how he set an ambush against him on the road when he came up from Egypt. ³Now go and strike Amalek. Devote to destruction everything that belongs to him. Do not show him pity. Kill man and woman, child and nursing infant, ox and sheep, camel and donkey.'" ⁴Saul summoned the people and mustered them at Telaim: two hundred thousand foot soldiers, along with ten thousand men of Judah. ⁵Saul advanced to the city of Amalek and set an ambush in the wadi. ⁶Saul said to the Kenites, "Go — withdraw — get away from the Amalekites before I sweep you away with them, because you showed faithful love to all the Israelites when they came up from Egypt." So the Kenites withdrew from among the Amalekites. ⁷Saul struck the Amalekites from Havilah all the way to Shur, which is east of Egypt. ⁸He captured Agag king of Amalek alive, but he devoted all the people to destruction by the edge of the sword. ⁹But Saul and the people showed pity on Agag and on the best of the flock and the herd — the fattened animals, the lambs, and everything of value. They were unwilling to devote these to destruction. Only what was worthless and unwanted did they devote to destruction. ¹⁰Then the word of the LORD came to Samuel: ¹¹"I regret that I made Saul king, because he has turned away from following me and has not carried out my commands." Samuel was deeply grieved, and he cried out to the LORD all night long. ¹²Samuel rose early to meet Saul in the morning, but he was told, "Saul went to Carmel, and there he set up a monument for himself. Then he turned and moved on down to Gilgal." ¹³Samuel came to Saul, and Saul said to him, "Blessed are you by the LORD! I have carried out the word of the LORD." ¹⁴Samuel said, "Then what is this sound of sheep in my ears? And the sound of cattle that I am hearing?" ¹⁵Saul said, "They brought them from the Amalekites, because the people showed pity on the best of the sheep and cattle in order to sacrifice them to the LORD your God. But the rest we devoted to destruction." ¹⁶Samuel said to Saul, "Stop. Let me tell you what the LORD said to me last night." Saul said to him, "Speak." ¹⁷Samuel said, "Were you not small in your own eyes when you were made head of the tribes of Israel? The LORD anointed you king over Israel. ¹⁸The LORD sent you on a mission and said, 'Go and devote to destruction the sinners — the Amalekites. Fight against them until you have finished them off.' ¹⁹So why did you not obey the voice of the LORD? Why did you pounce on the plunder and do what is evil in the LORD's eyes?" ²⁰Saul said to Samuel, "But I did obey the voice of the LORD! I went on the mission the LORD sent me on. I brought back Agag king of Amalek, and I devoted the Amalekites to destruction. ²¹But the people took sheep and cattle from the plunder — the best of what was devoted to destruction — to sacrifice to the LORD your God at Gilgal." ²²Samuel said, "Does the LORD delight in burnt offerings and sacrifices as much as in obeying the voice of the LORD? To obey is better than sacrifice; to listen is better than the fat of rams. ²³For rebellion is the sin of divination, and defiance is wickedness and idolatry. Because you rejected the word of the LORD, the LORD has rejected you as king." ²⁴Saul said to Samuel, "I have sinned. I violated the command of the LORD and your instructions, because I was afraid of the people and I listened to their voice. ²⁵Now please forgive my sin and come back with me so I can worship the LORD." ²⁶Samuel said to Saul, "I will not go back with you, because you rejected the word of the LORD, and the LORD has rejected you from being king over Israel." ²⁷As Samuel turned to leave, Saul grabbed the edge of his robe and it tore. ²⁸Samuel said to him, "The LORD has torn the kingdom of Israel from you today and has given it to a neighbor of yours who is better than you. ²⁹Moreover, the Enduring One of Israel does not lie and does not relent, for he is not a human being, that he should relent." ³⁰Saul said, "I have sinned. But now, please honor me before the elders of my people and before Israel. Come back with me so I may bow down to the LORD your God." ³¹So Samuel went back with Saul, and Saul bowed down to the LORD. ³²Then Samuel said, "Bring Agag king of Amalek to me." Agag came to him in chains. And Agag said, "Surely the bitterness of death has turned away." ³³Samuel said, "Just as your sword made women childless, so your mother will be childless among women." And Samuel hacked Agag to pieces before the LORD at Gilgal. ³⁴Samuel went to Ramah, and Saul went up to his home at Gibeah of Saul. ³⁵Samuel never went to see Saul again until the day of his death, for Samuel mourned over Saul. And the LORD regretted that he had made Saul king over Israel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening oti shalach YHWH ('me the LORD sent') places the pronoun oti ('me') in emphatic first position — Samuel is asserting his prophetic credentials before delivering a divine command. The verb limshochakha ('to anoint you') recalls the private anointing of 1 Samuel 10:1. The phrase al-ammo al-Yisra'el ('over his people, over Israel') uses double specification: the people belong to God first, and Israel is their name. The imperative shema ('hear, listen, obey') is the same root that will appear in verse 22 as the chapter's theological climax. Samuel front-loads the key verb: everything depends on hearing.
2. The messenger formula koh amar YHWH ('thus says the LORD') marks this as direct prophetic oracle — Samuel speaks as God's mouthpiece. The title tseva'ot ('of armies/hosts') encompasses both heavenly and earthly forces; its use here militarizes the context. The verb paqadti from p-q-d ('to visit, attend to, call to account, muster') carries judicial force — God has reviewed the case and reached a verdict. The phrase asher-sam lo baderekh ('who set [an ambush] for him on the road') refers to Amalek's attack during the Exodus journey. The participle implies premeditated aggression: Amalek chose to attack Israel on the vulnerable march from Egypt.
3. The verb vehachramtem from ch-r-m ('devote to destruction, place under the ban') is the Hiphil imperative plural — the entire army is commanded to execute cherem. This is the same root used for the destruction of Jericho (Joshua 6:17-21). The phrase lo tachmo alav ('do not show him pity') uses ch-m-l ('to spare, have compassion'), preemptively forbidding exactly what Saul will do. The merism me'ish ad-ishah me'olel ve'ad-yoneq ('from man to woman, from child to nursing infant') covers the entire human population. The livestock list (mishor ve'ad-seh migamal ve'ad-chamor) covers the entire economic wealth of a pastoral-nomadic society.
4. The verb vayeshamma ('he summoned, he caused to hear') is the Piel of sh-m' — Saul 'makes the people hear' the call to war. Telaim is likely in the southern Negev, near Amalekite territory. The separate count of Judah from the rest of Israel (as in 11:8) again reflects the political distinction between the southern and northern tribes. The numbers (200,000 foot soldiers plus 10,000 from Judah) are large; as with other biblical military censuses, elef may indicate 'military unit/clan' rather than the literal number 1,000. The verb vayyifqdem ('he mustered them') from p-q-d echoes verse 2, where God uses the same root to 'call Amalek to account.'
5. The phrase ir Amaleq ('city of Amalek') likely refers to the principal settlement or capital of the Amalekite confederation. The verb vayyarev ('he set an ambush') from 'r-v shows tactical planning — Saul conceals forces in the nachal ('wadi, dry riverbed, seasonal streambed'), which is characteristic of Negev terrain and provides natural cover for concealed troops. The irony is sharp: Amalek ambushed Israel on the road from Egypt (v2), and now Saul ambushes Amalek. The same verb root ('r-v) connects the two actions.

6. The triple imperative lekhu suru redu ('go, turn aside, go down') conveys urgency — Saul wants the Kenites out before the attack begins. The verb pen-osifkha ('lest I gather you up / sweep you away') from '-s-p' warns of collateral destruction. The word chesed ('loyal kindness, covenant faithfulness') is one of the richest terms in Hebrew — it denotes not mere kindness but obligation-based loyalty within a relationship. The Kenites' chesed toward Israel during the Exodus creates an enduring claim on Israel's protection. The verb vayyasar ('he withdrew') shows the Kenites comply — the separation of innocent from guilty is accomplished before the battle.
7. The geographical markers describe a vast sweep of territory. Havilah is in the Arabian interior (possibly eastern Arabia or northern Yemen); Shur is the wilderness region east of Egypt's border (the Sinai). The phrase bo'akha Shur ('as you approach Shur') uses the standard directional idiom. The phrase asher al-penei Mitsrayim ('which is on the face of / opposite Egypt') locates Shur on Egypt's eastern frontier. This merism — from Havilah to Shur — indicates that Saul's campaign covered the entire range of Amalekite territory. The military victory is comprehensive; Saul's failure lies not in the battle but in its aftermath.
8. The verb vayyitpos ('he captured, he seized') implies taking prisoner rather than killing. The adjective chai ('alive') is emphatic — the text stresses that Agag was not killed. The title melekh Amaleq ('king of Amalek') identifies Agag as the royal figure whose survival most directly violates cherem. The phrase hecherim lefi-charev ('devoted to destruction by the mouth/edge of the sword') combines the cherem root (ch-r-m) with the standard expression for death by sword. The contrast between chai for the king and hecherim for the people is the structural hinge of the narrative.
9. The verb vayachmo ('he showed pity, he spared') from ch-m-l directly violates the prohibition lo tachmo of verse 3. The word meitav ('the best, the choicest') from y-t-v emphasizes that Saul retained only premium goods. The word mishneim is debated — possibly 'second-born' animals (fattened for quality) or 'well-fed' livestock. The karim ('fatted lambs') are choice sacrificial-quality animals. The phrase lo avu hacharimam ('they were unwilling to devote them to destruction') reveals volition — this is not accidental oversight but deliberate refusal. The contrast terms nimvezah ('despised, contemptible') and nameis ('melting away, wasting, worthless') describe the rejected dregs. The chapter's moral calculus is razor-sharp: Saul destroyed trash and called it obedience.
10. The prophetic reception formula vayehi devar-YHWH el-Shemu'el ('the word of the LORD came to Samuel') marks a direct divine communication. This is the same formula used throughout the prophetic literature (Jeremiah, Ezekiel, Hosea) to introduce divine speech. Samuel will receive God's verdict on Saul's actions before confronting Saul himself. The verse is brief — a narrative hinge shifting the scene from the battlefield to the prophetic chamber.
11. The verb nichamti from n-ch-m is the theological crux of the chapter. It appears here (v11), is denied of God in verse 29, and reaffirmed in verse 35 — creating an unresolved tension the text does not harmonize. The root can mean 'regret, relent, change one's mind, be grieved, be consoled.' The phrase shav me'acharai ('he turned back from after me') uses the language of covenant defection — Saul has abandoned the path of following God. The phrase devarai lo heqim ('my words he has not carried out') uses q-w-m in the Hiphil ('to establish, fulfill, carry out'). The verb vayyichar ('it burned/grieved') for Samuel uses the same root as anger (ch-r-h) but here expresses anguished distress. The phrase vayyiz'aq el-YHWH kol-hallailah ('he cried out to the LORD all night') shows sustained, desperate intercession.
12. The verb vayyashkem ('he rose early') shows Samuel's urgency — he has been awake all night and moves at first light. The phrase matsiv lo yad ('setting up a hand/monument for himself') is telling: yad as 'monument' appears in 2 Samuel 18:18 for Absalom's memorial pillar. The reflexive lo ('for himself') is the narrator's implicit critique — Saul commemorates himself. Carmel (hakkarmelah) is a town in the Judean highlands (modern Khirbet el-Kirmil), not the northern Mount Carmel. Gilgal is the site of Saul's kingship ceremony (11:15) and will now become the site of his kingship's undoing — a savage geographical irony.
13. The greeting barukh attah laYHWH ('blessed are you by the LORD') is a standard blessing formula, but in context it functions as deflection — Saul leads with piety. The phrase haqimoti et-devar YHWH ('I have carried out the LORD's word') uses the Hiphil of q-w-m ('to cause to stand, to establish, to fulfill'). This is precisely the verb God denied of Saul in verse 11 (devarai lo heqim). The contradiction between God's assessment and Saul's self-assessment could not be sharper. Saul does not say 'most of' or 'largely' — he claims complete fulfillment.
14. The phrase qol-hatson hazzeh be'oznai ('this sound of sheep in my ears') makes the evidence sensory and immediate — Samuel is not citing a report but hearing living proof. The word qol ('voice, sound') is the same word used in verse 1 for the 'voice' of God's words (qol divrei YHWH). Samuel's ears should contain God's voice; instead they contain sheep sounds. The verb shomea ('hearing') is a participle of sh-m' — the chapter's governing verb. The question is rhetorical: Samuel knows exactly what the sounds mean. He is forcing Saul to account for the discrepancy between his claim and the audible evidence.
15. The subject shift from 'I have carried out' (v13, first person singular) to 'they brought them' (hevi'um, third person plural) is a transparent attempt to transfer responsibility. The verb chamal ('showed pity, spared') is the same prohibited verb from verse 3 and described in verse 9. The phrase lema'an zevoach laYHWH Elohekha ('in order to sacrifice to the LORD your God') wraps disobedience in liturgical language. The pronoun Elohekha ('your God') rather than Elohai ('my God') or Elohenu ('our God') creates theological distance — Saul treats God as Samuel's deity rather than his own sovereign. The phrase ve-et-hayyoter hecheramnu ('and the rest we devoted to destruction') quietly admits that cherem was applied only to what remained after the best was removed.
16. The imperative heref ('stop, cease, let go') cuts Saul off — Samuel has heard enough of his excuses. The phrase et asher dibber YHWH elai hallailah ('what the LORD spoke to me last night') refers to the revelation of verse 11. Samuel has been carrying this word all night, agonizing over it, and now delivers it. Saul's response dabber ('speak') is a single word — perhaps confident ignorance, perhaps growing dread. The brevity of both speakers creates taut narrative tension.

17. The phrase qaton attah be'einekha ('small in your own eyes') recalls 9:21 and 10:22 (Saul hiding among the baggage). The rhetorical question halo' ('is it not the case that...?') expects affirmation — Saul cannot deny his humble origins. The phrase rosh shivtei Yisra'el ('head of the tribes of Israel') identifies Saul's position as representative of the entire nation. The verb vayyimshachakha ('the LORD anointed you') repeats the claim of verse 1 — the anointing came from God, and God's authority over the anointed one is absolute.
18. The phrase vayyishlachakha YHWH baderekh ('the LORD sent you on a road/mission') uses the same verb as verse 1 (shalach, 'send') — Samuel recapitulates the commission. The designation hachatta'im ('the sinners') applies a moral category to the Amalekites — they are not merely enemies but offenders against God. The phrase ad-kallotam otam ('until you finish them off, until you consume them') from k-l-h ('to complete, finish, consume') demands total completion. Samuel is quoting back to Saul what God's command actually required — not the selective version Saul carried out, but the exhaustive one.
19. The interrogative lammah ('why?') demands explanation. The phrase lo-shamata beqol YHWH ('you did not obey the voice of the LORD') is the chapter's central indictment, using the verb sh-m-' that Samuel introduced in verse 1. The verb vatta'at from 'y-t ('to swoop, pounce, rush greedily') appears also in 14:32, where the people 'pounced' on spoil after Saul's foolish oath — a recurring pattern of undisciplined greed. The phrase hara' be'einei YHWH ('the evil in the eyes of the LORD') is the Deuteronomistic judgment formula applied to Israel's worst kings.
20. The emphatic asher shamati ('indeed I obeyed') uses the relative pronoun asher as an emphatic particle — Saul is insisting, not conceding. The phrase va'elekh baderekh asher-shelachani YHWH ('I went on the road/mission the LORD sent me on') echoes verse 18 word for word, claiming complete compliance. The verb va'avi ('I brought') from b-w-' in the Hiphil ('to bring, to lead') treats Agag as acquired goods — something brought back from the campaign. The phrase ve'et-Amaleq hecheramti ('I devoted the Amalekites to destruction') is first person singular — Saul now claims personal credit for the cherem he actually carried out, even as he disclaims responsibility for the cherem he didn't.
21. The phrase reshit hacherem ('the first/best of the devoted things') is deeply problematic theologically. Reshit normally describes premium offerings (reshit bikkurim, 'first of the first-fruits,' Exodus 23:19), but hacherem ('the devoted things') are not eligible for sacrifice — they are already claimed by God for destruction. Saul treats cherem as interchangeable with sacrificial offerings, which is a fundamental misunderstanding of the categories. The repeated Elohekha ('your God') again distances Saul from covenant relationship with God. The location baGilgal ('at Gilgal') is where Saul's kingship was renewed (11:15) — the site of his coronation feast will now become the site of his condemnation.
22. The noun cheftes ('delight, desire, pleasure') asks what God actually wants — not what humans assume God wants. The pair olot uzvachim ('burnt offerings and sacrifices') covers the two major categories of offering. The infinitive absolute shemoa' ('to obey/hear') functions as a verbal noun — obedience as a concept, a way of life. The adjective tov ('good, better') establishes the comparison: obedience is tov ('better') than sacrifice. The verb lehaqshiv from q-sh-v ('to attend, to listen attentively, to heed') adds nuance — this is not just hearing but careful, focused attention. The chelev eilim ('fat of rams') refers to the suet surrounding the kidneys and liver, the choicest sacrificial portion reserved for God alone (Leviticus 3:3-4, 3:16). Samuel's point: even the fat — the part that is entirely God's — is less important to God than a listening heart.
23. The noun meri ('rebellion, defiance') from m-r-h characterizes willful disobedience against known commands. The noun qesem ('divination') refers to pagan techniques for discerning or manipulating the divine will — strictly forbidden in Deuteronomy 18:10. Samuel's equation is not metaphorical but categorical: rebellion against God's word and divination against God's sovereignty are the same sin — both attempt to impose human will on the divine realm. The noun haftsar ('defiance, insistence, pushiness') from p-ts-r describes aggressive stubbornness. Terafim ('household gods, idol figurines') are condemned throughout the Hebrew Bible (Genesis 31:19, Judges 17:5, 2 Kings 23:24). The verb ma'as ('reject, refuse, despise') creates the wordplay: ma'asta (you rejected) vayyima'askha (he rejected you). The preposition mimmelekh ('from being king') specifies what is lost — not Saul's life, but his dynasty and kingship.
24. The confession chatati ('I have sinned') uses ch-t-' ('to miss the mark, to sin'). The verb avarti ('I violated, I crossed over') from 'v-r means to transgress a boundary — he crossed a line God drew. The phrase pi-YHWH ('the mouth/command of the LORD') personifies God's command as speech from God's mouth. The phrase ve'et-devarekha ('and your words') acknowledges that Samuel's instructions carried divine authority. The verb yareti ('I feared') from y-r-' admits the wrong kind of fear — Saul feared the people rather than God. The phrase va'eshma' beqolam ('I obeyed their voice') uses the same shama' + qol construction that should have been directed at God (v1: shema' leqol divrei YHWH). Saul obeyed the wrong voice.
25. The imperative sa na' ('please carry, please bear') asks Samuel to lift the sin from Saul — literally to 'carry' (nasa') his transgression. The plea veshuv immi ('return with me') reveals Saul's deeper concern: he wants Samuel's public presence as prophetic endorsement. The phrase ve'eshtachaveh laYHWH ('so I may worship the LORD') uses the Hishtaphel of sh-ch-h ('to bow down, prostrate oneself'). Saul's request is ambiguous — does he want genuine worship, or does he want the appearance of prophetic approval? The fact that his concern shifts immediately to public image (v30) suggests the latter.
26. The declaration lo ashuv immakh ('I will not return with you') uses the same verb shuv ('return') from Saul's plea in verse 25. The ma'as wordplay is repeated with fuller specification: miheyot melek al-Yisra'el ('from being king over Israel') rather than just mimmelekh (v23). The rejection is now explicitly over all Israel — Saul's authority over God's people is revoked. The repetition of the full formula (you rejected the LORD rejected) emphasizes the irreversibility of the divine decision.
27. The verb vayyissov ('he turned') from s-v-v indicates Samuel physically rotating to walk away. The verb vayyachazek ('he grasped, he seized') from ch-z-q indicates forceful gripping — Saul is not gently touching but clutching. The kenaf me'ilo ('the edge/corner of his robe') refers to the hem or decorative border of the outer garment. The me'il is a significant garment — it is the robe Samuel's mother made for him yearly (2:19). The verb vayyiqqara' ('it tore') from q-r-' provides the word Samuel will use in his interpretation. The ambiguity of the subject (whose robe?) has generated centuries of commentary; the narrative logic favors Samuel's robe tearing in Saul's hand.

- 28. The verb qara' ('to tear, to rip') verbally links the torn garment to the torn kingdom — the physical act becomes a sign-act (ot). The phrase mamleket Yisra'el ('kingdom of Israel') is the political entity itself, not just the throne. The preposition me'alekha ('from upon you') images the kingdom as a garment worn by the king — God is stripping it off. The time marker hayyom ('today') makes the verdict present and immediate. The phrase lere'akha hattov mimmekka ('to your neighbor, the better one than you') introduces the unnamed successor. The word re'a can mean 'companion, friend, fellow, neighbor' — it is deliberately unspecific, prolonging the mystery of identity.
- 29. The title Netsach Yisra'el ('the Enduring One / Glory / Permanence of Israel') is a hapax as a divine title — it appears only here. The root n-ts-ch relates to perpetuity, victory, and endurance. The verb lo yeshaqer ('does not lie') from sh-q-r affirms divine truthfulness — God's word is reliable. The verb lo yinnachem ('does not relent') from n-ch-m is the Niphal ('he does not cause himself to relent'), directly contradicting the Niphal nichamti of verse 11 ('I regret'). The phrase ki lo adam hu lehinnachem ('for he is not a human being, that he should relent') grounds the assertion in ontology — divine and human responses are categorically different. The theological puzzle of nacham affirmed (v11) and denied (v29) of God within 18 verses has generated vast rabbinic, patristic, and modern commentary.
- 30. The repeated chatati ('I have sinned') is verbally identical to verse 24, but the context shifts its meaning — this time it is followed not by repentance but by a request for political face-saving. The imperative kabbedeni ('honor me') from k-v-d ('to be heavy, to honor') asks Samuel to give him public weight/dignity. The phrase neged ziqnei ammi ('before the elders of my people') and veneged Yisra'el ('before Israel') specifies two audiences: the political leadership and the general populace. Saul wants to avoid both audiences learning of his rejection. The persistent Elohekha ('your God') rather than Elohai ('my God') is now devastating — after being told God has rejected him, Saul still speaks of God as belonging to Samuel's sphere, not his own.
- 31. The verb vayyashav ('he turned back, he returned') from sh-w-v reverses Samuel's earlier refusal (lo ashuv immakh, v26). The phrase acharei Sha'ul ('after Saul') positions Samuel as following Saul — a reversal of the proper prophetic relationship where the king follows God's prophet. The verb vayyishtachu ('he bowed down, he worshiped') from sh-ch-h is the Hishtaphel indicating prostration. Saul worships — but worship after disobedience, as the chapter has established, is not what God desires.
- 32. The imperative haggishu ('bring near') from n-g-sh commands Agag's presentation — this is judicial language, bringing the accused before the judge. The word ma'adannot is a crux interpretum. It may derive from '-d-n ('to be delicate, to be pampered') yielding 'pleasantly, cheerfully'; from m-'-d-n related to 'bonds, fetters'; or be an adverbial form meaning 'haltingly, falteringly.' The LXX reads tremon ('trembling'). Context favors either 'in fetters' (a prisoner presentation) or 'cheerfully' (false confidence). Agag's statement akhen sar mar-hammavet uses akhen ('surely, truly') as an emphatic particle, sar ('has turned aside, departed') from s-w-r, and mar-hammavet ('the bitterness of death'). The phrase may also be read as a question: 'Has the bitterness of death truly passed?' — expressing hope rather than certainty.
- 33. The verb shikkelah ('made childless, bereaved') from sh-k-l is a devastating word in Hebrew — it describes the specific grief of a parent who has lost children. The structure ka'asher ... ken ('as ... so') establishes lex talionis (proportional justice). The phrase tishkal minnashim immekha ('your mother will be childless among women') makes the punishment personal and genealogical — Agag's line ends here. The verb vayeshassef from sh-s-f ('to hew, to hack, to cleave') appears only here and in uncertain form — it describes violent dismemberment. The phrase lifnei YHWH ('before the LORD') marks this as a sacral execution, the completion of the cherem that Saul failed to carry out. Gilgal, the site of Israel's first Passover in the land (Joshua 5:10) and Saul's kingship renewal (11:15), now hosts the execution that seals Saul's rejection.
- 34. Ramah (haRamatah, with directional heh) is Samuel's home base (7:17, 8:4). Gibeah of Saul (Giv'at Sha'ul) is identified as Saul's beit ('house/home') — still his hometown, not a royal capital. The verb alah ('went up') for Saul indicates ascending elevation — Gibeah sits on a hill. The parallel construction (Samuel went to X, Saul went to Y) creates a visual of two figures walking apart, a narrative image of permanent separation.
- 35. The verb lo-yasaf ('he did not again, he never again') from y-s-f with the negative indicates permanent cessation. The phrase lir'ot et-Sha'ul ('to see Saul') means purposeful visit — Samuel did not seek Saul out. The phrase ad-yom moto ('until the day of his death') creates ambiguity: 'his' could refer to Samuel or Saul. Given that Samuel and Saul do meet again in 19:24 (at Naioth in Ramah, though that encounter is not initiated by Samuel) and in 28:11-19 (posthumously, at En-dor), the verse likely means Samuel never again sought Saul out in an official prophetic capacity. The verb hit'abel from '-v-l ('to mourn') in the Hitpael describes prolonged, active mourning — the kind displayed for the dead. The final clause vaYHWH nicham ('and the LORD regretted') uses the same Niphal of n-ch-m as verse 11 (nichamti), forming an inclusio around the chapter. The narrator gives the last word to divine grief — not divine anger, not divine punishment, but divine sorrow.

Summary: The LORD rejects Saul and sends Samuel to Bethlehem to anoint one of Jesse's sons as king. After passing over seven older brothers, Samuel anoints David — the youngest, a shepherd — and the Spirit of the LORD rushes upon him from that day forward. Simultaneously, the Spirit departs from Saul and a harmful spirit from the LORD torments him. Saul's servants recommend a skilled musician; David is summoned, enters Saul's household as armor-bearer and harpist, and whenever the harmful spirit comes, David plays and Saul finds relief. The future king enters the present king's service, and neither knows the full weight of what has begun.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter stages the most important theological pivot in the entire monarchy narrative: the transfer of the Spirit. In a single literary movement, the ruach YHWH ('Spirit of the LORD') rushes upon David (v13) and departs from Saul (v14). The Spirit is not a reward for good behavior — David has done nothing yet. It is sovereign election, the same kind of unearned choosing that marked Israel itself. The anointing scene at Bethlehem contains the theological center of gravity: 'The LORD does not see as a human sees — a person looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart' (v7). This is not a proverb about inner beauty. It is a direct rebuke of the criteria that produced Saul, who was chosen in part because he stood a head taller than everyone (9:2, 10:23). God is explicitly repudiating his own people's selection logic. The irony deepens when David is finally brought in and described as admoni ('ruddy'), with beautiful eyes and good appearance (v12) — he is physically attractive too, but that is not why he is chosen. The chapter also introduces one of Scripture's most disturbing theological claims: a ruach ra'ah me'et YHWH ('harmful spirit from the LORD') afflicts Saul. The narrator does not soften this. The spirit is explicitly 'from the LORD.' Whatever theological framework one brings to this — divine permission, judicial consequence, the dark side of sovereignty — the text refuses to let God off the hook.

Translation Friction: The relationship between this chapter's introduction of David to Saul and the next chapter's (1 Samuel 17) creates one of the most discussed tensions in Samuel scholarship. In 16:14-23, David enters Saul's service, becomes his armor-bearer, and Saul 'loved him greatly' (v21). Yet in 17:55-58, after David kills Goliath, Saul asks Abner 'whose son is this youth?' as though he has never met him. The Septuagint actually omits large portions of chapter 17 (including 17:55-58), suggesting the Greek translators were aware of the tension and resolved it by excision. The Masoretic Text preserves both accounts, leaving the tension visible. Harmonization attempts range from the plausible (Saul is asking about David's family lineage for military-exemption purposes, not his personal identity) to the strained (Saul's mental instability caused memory loss). Source-critical scholars typically assign 16:14-23 and 17:1-58 to different literary traditions about David's introduction to the court. The verb vatitslach ('rushed upon') used for the Spirit coming on David in v13 is the same verb used for the Spirit coming on Saul in 10:6 and 11:6 — the narrator uses identical language to mark the transfer of divine favor from one king to the next.

Connections: The Bethlehem anointing connects backward and forward across the entire biblical narrative. Backward: Ruth ends with a genealogy tracing Perez to David through Jesse of Bethlehem (Ruth 4:17-22). This chapter picks up exactly where Ruth left off — same town, same family, the promise embedded in Ruth's genealogy now fulfilled. Forward: Micah 5:2 will prophesy that a future ruler will come 'from Bethlehem Ephrathah,' and Matthew 2:1-6 will cite this prophecy at Jesus' birth. The shepherd motif is equally layered: David is taken from tending sheep to shepherd Israel (2 Samuel 5:2, 7:8, Psalm 78:70-72), and the image of the shepherd-king becomes central to messianic expectation (Ezekiel 34:23, John 10:11). The phrase 'the LORD looks at the heart' (el-halevav) establishes a criterion that will haunt David's own story — his heart will prove both magnificent (2 Samuel 7) and catastrophically flawed (2 Samuel 11), yet he remains 'a man after God's own heart' (1 Samuel 13:14). The harmful spirit from the LORD anticipates the 'lying spirit' God sends in 1 Kings 22:19-23, where the divine council explicitly dispatches a deceptive spirit — another text that refuses to separate God from the darker instruments of his sovereignty.

¹The LORD said to Samuel, "How long will you grieve over Saul? I have rejected him as king over Israel. Fill your horn with oil and go — I am sending you to Jesse the Bethlehemite, because I have chosen a king for myself from among his sons." ²Sa muel said, "How can I go? If Saul hears about it, he will kill me." The LORD said, "Take a young cow with you and say, 'I have come to offer a sacrifice to the LORD.'" ³ "Invite Jesse to the sacrifice, and I will show you what to do. You will anoint for me the one I point out to you." ⁴ Samuel did what the LORD instructed and came to Bethlehem. The elders of the town came trembling to meet him and asked, "Do you come in peace?" ⁵ He said, "In peace. I have come to sacrifice to the LORD. Consecrate yourselves and come with me to the sacrifice." Then he consecrated Jesse and his sons and invited them to the sacrifice. ⁶ When they arrived, he saw Eliab and thought, "Surely this one standing before the LORD is his anointed." ⁷ But the LORD said to Samuel, "Do not look at his appearance or how tall he stands, because I have rejected him. For the LORD does not see as a human sees — a person looks at the outward appearance, but the LORD looks at the heart." ⁸ Then Jesse called Abinadab and had him pass before Samuel. But Samuel said, "The LORD has not chosen this one either." ⁹ Jesse then had Shammah pass before him, but Samuel said, "The LORD has not chosen this one either." ¹⁰ Jesse had seven of his sons pass before Samuel, but Samuel said to Jesse, "The LORD has not chosen any of these." ¹¹ Samuel asked Jesse, "Are these all your sons?" Jesse replied, "There is still the youngest — he is out tending the sheep." Samuel said to Jesse, "Send for him and bring him here. We will not sit down to eat until he arrives." ¹² So Jesse sent for him and brought him in. He was ruddy, with beautiful eyes and a handsome appearance. The LORD said, "Rise — anoint him. This is the one." ¹³ Samuel took the horn of oil and anointed him in the presence of his brothers. The Spirit of the LORD rushed upon David from that day forward. Then Samuel set out and went to Ramah. ¹⁴ Now the Spirit of the LORD had departed from Saul, and a harmful spirit from the LORD tormented him. ¹⁵ Saul's servants said to him, "Look — a harmful spirit from God is tormenting you." ¹⁶ "Let our lord give the order, and your servants here before you will search for a man skilled at playing the lyre. When the harmful spirit from God comes upon you, he will play and you will feel better." ¹⁷ Saul said to his servants, "Find me someone who plays well and bring him to me." ¹⁸ One of the young servants spoke up and said, "I have seen a son of Jesse the Bethlehemite who is skilled at playing, a brave and capable warrior, articulate in speech, a man of fine appearance — and the LORD is with him." ¹⁹ Saul sent messengers to Jesse with the message: "Send me your son David, the one who is with the sheep." ²⁰ Jesse took a donkey loaded with bread, a skin of wine, and a young goat, and sent them with his son David to Saul. ²¹ David came to Saul and entered his service. Saul loved him deeply, and David became his armor-bearer. ²² Saul sent word to Jesse: "Let David remain in my service, for he has found favor in my eyes." ²³ Whenever the spirit from God came upon Saul, David would take the lyre and play. Saul would find relief and feel better, and the harmful spirit would leave him.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb me'astiv ('I have rejected him') uses the root m-'-s, the same word used in 15:23 and 15:26 for Saul's rejection — this is a completed divine verdict, not a process still underway. The phrase mimmelokh al-Yisra'el ('from reigning over Israel') specifies that the rejection is functional, not personal — Saul is rejected as king, though he remains alive and on the throne. Malle qarnekha shemen ('fill your horn with oil') refers to the ram's horn flask used for sacred anointing oil; this is the same instrument Samuel used to anoint Saul (10:1, though there a flask/pakh was used — the horn here may signal greater permanence). The phrase Beit-halLachmi ('the Bethlehemite') identifies Jesse by his town — Bethlehem, literally 'house of bread,' in the tribal territory of Judah. The verb ra'iti ('I have seen/chosen') carries the sense of divine selection through seeing: God has surveyed and chosen.
2. Samuel's fear is striking — the prophet who anointed Saul and pronounced divine judgment on him (chapter 15) is now afraid of him. The verb vaharagani ('he will kill me') is direct and unhedged: Samuel genuinely believes Saul would murder him for anointing a rival. God's response is not to dismiss the danger but to provide cover: eglat baqar tiqqach beyadekha ('take a heifer/young cow in your hand'). This is not a lie — Samuel will actually sacrifice — but it is a deliberate concealment of his primary mission. The verb lizbo'ach ('to sacrifice') provides legitimate reason for a prophetic visit to a town. The text presents God himself authorizing strategic concealment, a detail that has generated extensive discussion in Jewish and Christian interpretation.
3. The verb qara'ta ('you will call/invite') means to summon Jesse as a participant in the sacrificial meal — a normal social-religious function that arouses no suspicion. The phrase anokhi odi'akha ('I myself will make known to you') uses the emphatic first-person pronoun anokhi, stressing that God will personally direct the selection — Samuel is not to choose on his own. The verb umashachta ('you will anoint') introduces the key action of the chapter: mashach, to smear with oil as an act of consecration and divine appointment. The phrase li ('for me') makes the anointing explicitly for God's purposes, not for Israel's request — a contrast with Saul's anointing, which responded to the people's demand for a king (8:5-6).
4. The verb vayyecherdu ('they trembled') from the root ch-r-d describes physical trembling from fear or alarm. The elders of Bethlehem are terrified by Samuel's arrival — a prophet's unannounced visit to a small town could mean divine judgment. Samuel's reputation as the one who pronounced doom on Saul's dynasty and personally executed Agag (15:33) precedes him. Their question shalom bo'ekha ('is your coming peace?') is literally 'peace is your coming?' — an anxious inquiry about whether he brings blessing or catastrophe. The same root ch-r-d describes Isaac's trembling when he realized he had blessed the wrong son (Genesis 27:33).

5. Samuel's answer shalom ('peace') directly answers the elders' fear. The command hitqaddesh ('consecrate yourselves') requires ritual purification — washing, abstaining from sexual contact, and other preparations for approaching the sacred. The Hitpael verb form indicates reflexive action: they must purify themselves. Samuel then personally consecrates (vayyqaddesh) Jesse and his sons using the Piel intensive, indicating a more active, direct consecration by the prophet himself. The separate consecration of Jesse's family singles them out from the rest of the town — Samuel is creating the conditions for the private anointing within the public sacrificial gathering.
6. The verb vayyar ('he saw') begins the theme of seeing that dominates this passage — Samuel sees Eliab and immediately draws a conclusion based on appearance. The name Eliab means 'my God is father.' Samuel's internal declaration akh neged YHWH meshicho ('surely before the LORD is his anointed') reveals that the prophet himself is making the same mistake the people made with Saul — judging by external appearance. The word meshicho ('his anointed') uses the same root mashach that God just commanded Samuel to perform, but Samuel is jumping ahead of divine instruction, selecting by sight rather than waiting for God's direction.
7. The verb tabbet ('look at, gaze at') from n-b-t implies focused, evaluative looking — not a casual glance but the kind of assessment one makes when sizing up a candidate. Mar'ehu ('his appearance') and govah qomato ('the height of his stature') are the two criteria Samuel is using, both external. The verb me'astihu ('I have rejected him') uses the same root m'-s applied to Saul in verse 1 — Eliab is rejected by the same verb. The word la'eynayim ('at the eyes,' meaning 'at what is visible, the outward appearance') uses the dual form of ayin ('eye'). The word lallelav ('at the heart') uses the form levav rather than the shorter lev — both mean 'heart' in the sense of the inner person, the seat of will and moral orientation. The contrast is not between superficiality and depth but between human cognitive limitations and divine omniscience.
8. The verb vayya'avirehu ('he made him pass before') uses the Hiphil of 'v-r', suggesting a formal presentation — Jesse is parading his sons before the prophet like candidates being reviewed. The name Abinadab means 'my father is generous/noble.' Samuel's declaration gam-bazeh lo-vachar YHWH ('also in this one the LORD has not chosen') uses the verb bachar ('to choose, to elect'), the standard term for divine election. The word gam ('also, even') links this rejection to Eliab's — the same verdict, the same divine refusal. Samuel has now learned to wait for God's indication rather than jump to his own conclusion.
9. The name Shammah (Shammah) may derive from the root sh-m-m ('to be desolate, astonished'). The repetitive formula gam-bazeh lo-vachar YHWH ('the LORD has not chosen this one either') builds narrative tension through its very monotony — son after son is rejected, and the reader begins to wonder whether any of Jesse's sons will be selected. The three-fold rejection of named sons (Eliab, Abinadab, Shammah) before the unnamed four creates a sevenfold refusal that heightens the drama of David's eventual selection.
10. The phrase shiv'at banav ('seven of his sons') summarizes the parade of candidates. There is a text-critical question here: if Eliab, Abinadab, and Shammah are three of the seven, then four additional sons passed unnamed. Yet 1 Chronicles 2:13-16 lists only seven sons of Jesse total (with David as the seventh), while this passage implies eight (seven rejected plus David). The discrepancy may reflect different traditions about Jesse's family, or Chronicles may count differently. Samuel's declaration lo-vachar YHWH ba'elleh ('the LORD has not chosen among these') uses the preposition be- with the demonstrative elleh ('these'), sweeping all seven into a single rejection.
11. The verb hatammu ('are they finished/complete?') from t-m-m asks whether all the young men have been presented. The word hanne'arim ('the youths/young men') is a general term for sons of military or marriageable age. Jesse's answer od sha'ar haqqatan ('there still remains the smallest/youngest') uses sha'ar ('to remain, be left over') — David is literally the leftover son. The participle ro'eh batson ('tending the sheep') establishes David's occupation as a shepherd, which becomes theologically loaded throughout his story. Samuel's command lo-nassov ('we will not go around' or 'we will not recline [at the meal]') may mean either 'we will not sit in a circle for the sacrificial meal' or 'we will not proceed' — either way, everything stops until David arrives.
12. The adjective admoni ('ruddy, reddish') describes a reddish complexion or reddish hair — the same word describes Esau (Genesis 25:25). The phrase yefeh einayim ('beautiful of eyes') and tov ro'i ('good of appearance, handsome to look at') describe David's physical attractiveness. The irony is potent: after God has just declared that he does not look at outward appearance (v7), the narrator lavishes attention on David's looks. The text does not resolve this tension — David is both handsome and chosen for his heart. God's command qum meshachehu ('arise, anoint him') uses the imperative with urgency. The phrase ki-zeh hu ('for this is he') is strikingly brief and absolute — no explanation, no criteria listed, just divine identification.
13. The phrase qeren hashemen ('the horn of oil') refers to the ram's horn container holding the sacred anointing oil. The verb vayyimshach ('he anointed') is the Qal of mashach — the act that gives David the status of mashiach ('anointed one'). The phrase beqerev echav ('in the midst of his brothers') means the anointing was witnessed by the family, though its full significance may not have been understood by them. The verb vatitslach ('rushed upon') from ts-l-ch describes violent, sudden onset of the Spirit — the same word used for the Spirit coming on Samson (Judges 14:6) and on Saul (1 Samuel 10:6, 11:6). The phrase mehayyom hahu vama'lah ('from that day and upward') indicates permanent duration — unlike the episodic Spirit-empowerment of the judges. Samuel's departure to Ramah (haRamatah, with directional he) closes the anointing scene abruptly.
14. The verb sarah ('departed, turned aside') from s-w-r indicates the Spirit's active withdrawal — it did not fade but left. The preposition me'im ('from with') suggests the Spirit had been dwelling alongside Saul and has now removed itself. The verb bi'attattu ('terrified/tormented him') from the root b-'-t appears in the Piel intensive, indicating repeated or intense action — this is ongoing torment, not a single episode. The phrase ruach ra'ah ('evil/harmful spirit') uses ra'ah, which can mean morally evil, harmful, injurious, or calamitous. The phrase me'et YHWH ('from the LORD') uses the preposition me'et indicating origin or source — the spirit comes from God's own presence or by God's own sending. The Septuagint translates this as pneuma poneron para kuriou ('an evil spirit from the Lord'), preserving the divine source without softening it.

15. The servants use ruach Elohim ra'ah ('a harmful spirit of God') rather than ruach YHWH ra'ah — switching from the covenant name YHWH (used by the narrator in v14) to the generic Elohim ('God'). This may reflect the servants' outsider perspective: they observe the phenomenon but use the general term for deity rather than Israel's covenant name. The participle meva'ittekha ('is terrifying you') from b-'-t in the Piel indicates ongoing, visible symptoms — the servants can see that Saul is being tormented. They diagnose the cause as divine, which presupposes a worldview where spiritual affliction is recognized as coming from God. Their willingness to name it openly to the king suggests the symptoms are severe and undeniable.
16. The phrase yode'a menaggen bakkinnor ('one who knows how to play the lyre') describes musical competence. The kinnor is a stringed instrument — not a harp in the modern sense but a lyre, a smaller instrument held in the arms and plucked. The verb menaggen ('to play a stringed instrument') from n-g-n appears throughout the David narratives. The servants' proposal assumes that music can counteract spiritual affliction — a belief attested in ancient Near Eastern therapeutic texts. The phrase vetov lakh ('and it will be good for you') promises relief, using the simple adjective tov ('good') for wellbeing. The servants' prescription — music as therapy for divine affliction — creates the narrative mechanism by which David enters Saul's court.
17. The verb re'u ('see, look for') from r-'-h is ironic given the chapter's emphasis on seeing: Saul tells his servants to 'see' a musician for him, while God has told Samuel that divine seeing operates on entirely different criteria (v7). The participle metiv lenaggen ('one who excels at playing') uses the Hiphil of y-t-v ('to make good, to do well') with the infinitive of n-g-n ('to play') — literally 'one who makes playing good,' i.e., a skilled musician. Saul's command is simple and direct, with no awareness that the musician who will be brought is the very person anointed to replace him.
18. The phrase gibbor chayil ('mighty man of valor') is a military-social title denoting both fighting ability and social standing. The phrase ish milchamah ('man of war') indicates combat experience or readiness — surprising for a youth but possibly reflecting David's known courage. Nevon davar ('discerning of word/matter') can mean either 'prudent in affairs/matters' or 'articulate in speech' — both senses may be intended. Ish to'ar ('man of form') describes physical attractiveness. The climactic phrase vaYHWH immo ('and the LORD is with him') is the narrator's theological assessment placed on a servant's lips — the most important credential, saved for last. This phrase will become a refrain in David's story (18:12, 14, 28).
19. Saul sends mal'akhim ('messengers') — a formal, royal summons, not a casual request. The identification asher batson ('who is with the sheep') reduces David to his current occupation: the shepherd boy. This is how Saul understands David — a talented musician who tends sheep. The dramatic irony is severe: the king is summoning his own replacement, identifying him by the very occupation (shepherd) that will become the metaphor for ideal kingship in Israel. David is named by name here for the first time in Saul's mouth.
20. Jesse sends gifts with David — a donkey-load of bread (chamor lechem, literally 'a donkey of bread,' meaning a donkey's load), a skin of wine (no'd yayin), and a young goat (gedi izzim). These are tribute gifts appropriate from a subject to a king: sustenance provisions that acknowledge Saul's authority and express gratitude for the honor of the summons. The quantity is modest — Jesse is not wealthy. The gifts also function as the social protocol for placing one's son in royal service: you do not send your son empty-handed to the king.
21. The phrase vayya'amod lefanav ('he stood before him') is the standard idiom for entering someone's service or standing in attendance — it indicates a formal relationship of service, not a casual visit. The verb vayye'ehavehu ('he loved him') from '-h-v with the adverb me'od ('greatly, deeply') describes intense personal affection. This love — Saul's genuine attachment to David — makes the later hatred and jealousy all the more tragic. The phrase nose' kelim ('bearer of weapons/equipment') designates David as Saul's personal armor-bearer, a position of close physical proximity and trust. The armor-bearer carried the king's weapons and fought alongside him. David's first role in Saul's household is thus both intimate and military.
22. The phrase ya'amod-na David lefanai ('let David stand before me') is a formal request to retain David permanently in royal service — Saul is asking Jesse's permission to keep his son at court. The phrase matsa chen be'ainai ('he has found favor in my eyes') is a standard idiom for gaining someone's approval and goodwill. The same phrase is used of Noah before God (Genesis 6:8), of Joseph before Potiphar (Genesis 39:4), and of Ruth before Boaz (Ruth 2:10). Saul's use of it here indicates genuine warmth and satisfaction with David. The irony is layered: David has found favor in Saul's eyes, but God has already looked past eyes to the heart (v7).
23. The construction vehayah biheyot ('and it would happen when') indicates repeated, habitual action — this was a regular occurrence, not a one-time event. The phrase ruach Elohim ('spirit of God') appears here without ra'ah ('harmful'), though the context makes clear this is the tormenting spirit. David takes et-hakkinnor ('the lyre') and veniggen beyado ('played with his hand'). The verb veravach ('he found relief') from r-v-ch means literally 'it became wide/spacious for him' — the opposite of the constriction of anguish. It describes a psychological opening, a release of pressure. The phrase vetov lo ('and it was good for him') echoes the servants' prediction in verse 16. The closing phrase vesarah me'alav ruach hara'ah ('and the harmful spirit turned aside from upon him') uses the same verb sarah ('departed') from verse 14, creating a literary bracket: the Spirit of the LORD sarah from Saul, and now the harmful spirit sarah from Saul when David plays.

Summary: The Philistines and Israelites gather for battle in the Valley of Elah, but the contest narrows to a single challenge: Goliath, a massive Philistine warrior, demands a representative combat — one man against one man. For forty days Israel's army cowers in fear. Young David, a shepherd sent by his father to bring food to his brothers, hears the giant's taunts and is outraged that an uncircumcised Philistine dares defy the battle lines of the living God. Refusing Saul's armor, David goes out with a staff, five smooth stones, and a sling. He declares that the battle belongs to the LORD and that God will deliver Goliath into his hand — not by sword or spear but by the name of the LORD of Armies. A single stone from David's sling strikes Goliath in the forehead and the giant falls face-down. David takes Goliath's own sword and cuts off his head. The Philistines flee, and Israel pursues them to the gates of Ekron.

What Makes This Remarkable: This is the longest chapter in 1 Samuel and one of the most narratively detailed battle accounts in the Hebrew Bible. The Hebrew text constructs the scene with extraordinary literary precision. Goliath is introduced as ish ha-benayim — literally 'a man of the between,' the one who stands in the no-man's-land between the two armies. This term appears only here in the Hebrew Bible and designates a champion fighter who represents his entire nation. The narrative deliberately slows down to catalogue Goliath's armor piece by piece (helmet, coat of mail, greaves, javelin, spear) using weights and measurements, creating a sense of overwhelming material power. David's speech in verses 45-47 is the theological center of the entire chapter — arguably of the entire David narrative. He reframes the contest from a military clash to a demonstration of divine sovereignty: 'You come against me with sword and spear and javelin, but I come against you in the name of the LORD of Armies.' The phrase shem YHWH Tseva'ot ('the name of the LORD of Armies') reduces all of Goliath's catalogued weaponry to irrelevance. The chapter also features a striking textual variant: the Masoretic Text gives Goliath's height as six cubits and a span (approximately 9 feet 9 inches), while the Septuagint and a Dead Sea Scroll fragment (4QSam-a) read four cubits and a span (approximately 6 feet 9 inches). Both traditions are ancient, and the discrepancy raises important questions about the transmission of the text.

Translation Friction: The chapter presents several well-known difficulties. First, the height variant: the MT reads shesh ammot va-zaret ('six cubits and a span') while the LXX and 4QSam-a read 'four cubits and a span.' The shorter reading may be older, and the taller figure may represent a later scribal amplification — or the MT may preserve the original and the shorter reading may be a rationalization. We render the MT reading but note the variant. Second, the end of the chapter (verses 55-58) has Saul asking whose son David is, which seems to contradict chapter 16 where Saul already knows David as his personal musician and armor-bearer. Various explanations exist: Saul may be asking about David's family status for the promised reward (marriage into the royal family requires knowing the father's house), or these may represent different literary sources woven together. We render the text as it stands and note the tension. Third, the verb charaf ('to defy, to taunt, to reproach') recurs throughout the chapter and is difficult to capture with a single English word — it carries overtones of shaming, exposing to disgrace, and verbal assault. We vary the rendering based on context while noting the Hebrew consistency.

Connections: The champion-combat motif (representative warfare where one fighter decides the outcome for both armies) appears in ancient Near Eastern literature and has parallels in the Iliad and Mesopotamian texts, but in the Hebrew Bible it is unique to this passage. David's declaration that God 'does not save by sword and spear' (verse 47) echoes the theology of holy war found in Deuteronomy 20:1-4 and anticipates the repeated theme in Samuel-Kings that military hardware is not the basis of divine deliverance (see also 2 Kings 6:16-17). The Valley of Elah (emeq ha-elah, 'valley of the terebinth') becomes a geographical marker in Israel's memory — it is the place where God's power was demonstrated through human weakness. David's selection of five smooth stones from the wadi has generated extensive commentary; some connect the five stones to Goliath and his four brothers mentioned in 2 Samuel 21:15-22. The phrase 'the battle belongs to the LORD' (la-YHWH ha-milchamah, verse 47) will echo through Israel's military theology and appears in modified form in 2 Chronicles 20:15 ('the battle is not yours but God's'). David bringing Goliath's head to Jerusalem (verse 54) is geographically anachronistic — Jerusalem is still Jebusite at this point (it falls to David in 2 Samuel 5) — which may indicate either editorial updating or David storing it there later.

¹The Philistines gathered their forces for war. They assembled at Sokoh, which belongs to Judah, and camped between Sokoh and Azekah, at Ephes-dammim. ²Saul and the men of Israel gathered and camped in the Valley of Elah, and drew up their battle lines to face the Philistines. ³The Philistines stood on the hill on one side, and Israel stood on the hill on the other side, with the valley between them. ⁴A man-of-the-between came out from the Philistine camp — his name was Goliath, from Gath. His height was six cubits and a span. ⁵He had a bronze helmet on his head, and he wore a coat of scaled armor. The weight of the armor coat was five thousand shekels of bronze. ⁶He had bronze greaves on his legs and a bronze javelin slung between his shoulders. ⁷The shaft of his spear was like a weaver's beam, and the iron head of his spear weighed six hundred shekels. A shield-bearer walked ahead of him. ⁸He stood and shouted to the battle lines of Israel, saying to them, "Why do you come out to form a battle line? Am I not the Philistine, and you — servants of Saul? Choose a man for yourselves and let him come down to me. ⁹If he can fight me and strike me down, then we will become your servants. But if I overpower him and strike him down, then you will become our servants and serve us." ¹⁰The Philistine said, "I have taunted the battle lines of Israel this day! Give me a man so we can fight each other!" ¹¹When Saul and all Israel heard these words from the Philistine, they were shattered and deeply afraid. ¹²Now David was the son of an Ephrathite from Bethlehem in Judah named Jesse, who had eight sons. In the days of Saul, the man was old, advanced in years among men. ¹³Jesse's three oldest sons had gone to follow Saul into the war. The names of the three sons who went to the war were Eliab the firstborn, Abinadab his second, and Shammah the third. ¹⁴David was the youngest. The three oldest had followed Saul. ¹⁵David would go back and forth from attending Saul to shepherding his father's flock at Bethlehem. ¹⁶The Philistine came forward morning and evening and took his stand for forty days. ¹⁷Jesse said to his son David, "Take this ephah of roasted grain and these ten loaves for your brothers, and hurry to the camp to your brothers. ¹⁸Bring these ten cuts of cheese to the commander of the thousand. Check on your brothers' welfare and bring back a token from them." ¹⁹Saul and they and all the men of Israel were in the Valley of Elah, facing the Philistines in battle. ²⁰David rose early in the morning, left the flock with a watchman, loaded up, and went as Jesse had commanded him. He reached the encampment just as the army was going out to the battle line, shouting the war cry. ²¹Israel and the Philistines drew up battle line facing battle line. ²²David left his supplies with the baggage keeper and ran to the battle line. He went and greeted his brothers, asking about their welfare. ²³While he was speaking with them, the man-of-the-between was coming up — Goliath the Philistine, from Gath — out of the Philistine battle lines. He spoke the same words as before, and David heard. ²⁴Every man of Israel, when they saw the man, fled from his presence and were deeply afraid. ²⁵The men of Israel said, "Do you see this man who keeps coming up? He comes up to taunt Israel. The man who strikes him down — the king will make him very rich, will give him his daughter, and will make his father's house tax-free in Israel." ²⁶David spoke to the men standing near him, saying, "What will be done for the man who strikes down this Philistine and removes the disgrace from Israel? For who is this uncircumcised Philistine, that he should taunt the battle lines of the living God?" ²⁷The people answered him the same way, saying, "This is what will be done for the man who strikes him down." ²⁸Eliab his oldest brother heard him speaking to the men, and Eliab's anger burned against David. He said, "Why did you come down here? And with whom did you leave those few sheep in the wilderness? I know your arrogance and the wickedness of your heart — you came down to watch the battle!" ²⁹David said, "What have I done now? Can't I even ask a question?" ³⁰He turned away from him to someone else and asked the same thing, and the people gave him the same answer as before. ³¹When the words David had spoken were heard, they reported them to Saul, and he sent for him. ³²David said to Saul, "Let no man's heart fall on account of him. Your servant will go and fight this Philistine." ³³Saul said to David, "You cannot go against this Philistine to fight him. You are just a boy, and he has been a man of war since his youth." ³⁴David said to Saul, "Your servant has been shepherding his father's flock. When a lion came — or a bear — and carried off a sheep from the flock, ³⁵I went out after it, struck it, and rescued the sheep from its mouth. When it rose against me, I grabbed it by the jaw and struck it dead. ³⁶Your servant has struck down both the lion and the bear, and this uncircumcised Philistine will be like one of them — because he has taunted the battle lines of the living God." ³⁷David said, "The LORD who rescued me from the paw of the lion and from the paw of the bear — he will rescue me from the hand of this Philistine." Saul said to David, "Go, and may the LORD be with you." ³⁸Saul dressed David in his own garments, placed a bronze helmet on his head, and put a coat of armor on him. ³⁹David strapped the sword over the garments and tried to walk, but he could not — he had never tested them. David said to Saul, "I cannot go in these. I have not tested them." And David removed them. ⁴⁰He took his staff in his hand, chose five smooth stones from the wadi, and put them in his shepherd's pouch — in the bag — with his sling in his hand. Then he approached the Philistine. ⁴¹The Philistine advanced, coming closer and closer to David, with the shield-bearer ahead of him. ⁴²The Philistine looked and saw David, and he despised him — for he was just a youth, ruddy and handsome in appearance. ⁴³The Philistine said to David, "Am I a dog, that you come at me with sticks?" And the Philistine cursed David by his gods. ⁴⁴The Philistine said to David, "Come here to me, and I will give your flesh to the birds of the sky and the beasts of the field." ⁴⁵David said to the Philistine, "You come against me with sword and spear and javelin, but I come against you in the name of the LORD of Armies — the God of the battle lines of Israel, whom you have taunted. ⁴⁶This very day the LORD will deliver you into my hand. I will strike you down and cut your head from your body. I will give the corpses of the Philistine camp this day to the birds of the sky and the wild animals of the earth — so that all the earth will know that there is a God in Israel, ⁴⁷and all this assembly will know that the LORD does not save by sword and spear. For the battle belongs to the LORD, and he will give you into our hands." ⁴⁸When the Philistine rose and advanced to meet David, David ran quickly toward the battle line to meet the Philistine. ⁴⁹David reached his hand into the bag, took out a stone, slung it, and struck the Philistine on the forehead. The stone sank into his forehead, and he fell face-down to the ground. ⁵⁰David overpowered the Philistine with the sling and the stone — he struck the Philistine and killed him. There was no sword in David's hand. ⁵¹David ran and stood over the Philistine, took his sword, drew it from its sheath, finished him off, and cut off his head with it. When the Philistines saw that their champion was dead, they fled. ⁵²The men of Israel and Judah rose up, shouted the war cry, and pursued the Philistines all the way to the entrance of Gath and to the gates of Ekron. Philistine dead fell along the road to Shaaraim, all the way to Gath and to Ekron. ⁵³The Israelites returned from their hot pursuit of the Philistines and plundered their camp. ⁵⁴David took the head of the Philistine and brought it to Jerusalem, but he put his weapons in his own tent. ⁵⁵When Saul saw David going out to face the Philistine, he said to Abner, the commander of the army, "Whose son is this young man, Abner?" Abner said, "As your life endures, O king, I do not know." ⁵⁶The king said, "Find out whose son this young man is." ⁵⁷When David returned from striking down the Philistine, Abner took him and brought him before Saul — with the head of the Philistine in his hand. ⁵⁸Saul said to him, "Whose son are you, young man?" David answered, "The son of your servant Jesse, the Bethlehemite."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb va-ya'asfu ('they gathered') is repeated twice in this verse — first for the gathering of the army camps (machaneihem), then for the assembly at the specific location. Sokoh (Sokho) was a fortified town in the Shephelah, the low hill country between the coastal plain and the Judean highlands. The name Ephes-dammim (efes dammim) means 'boundary of blood' or 'end of blood' — an ominous place name that foreshadows the violence to come. The Philistine advance into Judean territory indicates an aggressive incursion, not a border skirmish.
2. The Valley of Elah (emeq ha-elah) means 'the valley of the terebinth tree,' named for the large oaks or terebinths that grew there. The verb va-ya'arkhu ('they arranged, drew up') comes from the root arekh, which means to set in order or arrange — a military term for forming ranks. The same root gives us ma'arakhah ('battle line, array'), which will become a key word in this chapter. The geography places the two armies on opposing ridges with the valley between them — a natural setting for the champion combat that follows.
3. The Hebrew draws the scene with geometric precision: omedim el ha-har mi-zeh ('standing toward the hill from this side') is repeated for both armies, with ve-ha-gay beineihem ('and the valley between them') as the dividing line. The word gay ('valley, ravine') is distinct from emeq ('broad valley') used in verse 2 — the gay is the narrow ravine or wadi at the bottom between the two ridges. This topography creates a natural arena: neither side wants to descend into the valley to attack uphill. The stalemate demands a different kind of resolution.
4. The term ish ha-benayim appears only here and in verse 23 in the Hebrew Bible. Standard translations render it 'champion,' which loses the spatial and conceptual force of the Hebrew. The benayim ('between') is the same word used in verse 3 for the valley 'between them' (beineihem). Goliath is literally the man who inhabits the gap between the two armies. We render it with a hyphenated phrase to preserve the Hebrew's strangeness.
4. Goliath's height in the Masoretic Text is shesh ammot va-zaret ('six cubits and a span'), approximately 9 feet 9 inches using the standard cubit of about 18 inches plus a span of about 9 inches. However, the Septuagint (LXX) and the Dead Sea Scroll fragment 4QSam-a read 'four cubits and a span' (approximately 6 feet 9 inches). The shorter reading may be the earlier tradition — a man of 6'9" would still be extraordinarily tall in the ancient world and would not require supernatural explanation. The taller reading may reflect later amplification to heighten the miracle. We follow the MT but note the variant as textually significant.

5. The armor catalogue begins here and extends through verse 7, building an overwhelming picture of military hardware. The shiryon qasqassim ('armor of scales') describes overlapping metal plates sewn onto a garment, like fish scales — the word qasqassim is the same word used for fish scales in Leviticus 11:9. Five thousand shekels of bronze equals approximately 125 pounds (57 kg). The narrator is not simply describing equipment; he is constructing a portrait of material power that will be rendered irrelevant by a shepherd's sling.
6. The mitschat nechoshet ('bronze greaves') are shin guards — protective armor for the lower legs. The kidon nechoshet ('bronze javelin') carried bein ketefav ('between his shoulders') was slung across his back. The word kidon is distinct from chanit ('spear') mentioned in the next verse; it refers to a shorter throwing weapon or scimitar-type javelin. The repetition of nechoshet ('bronze') in every piece of equipment (helmet, armor, greaves, javelin) creates a literary effect — Goliath is encased in metal from head to foot.
7. The comparison ki-menor orgim ('like a weaver's beam') refers to the horizontal bar of a loom — a thick, heavy wooden rod. The spearhead alone weighed six hundred shekels of iron, approximately 15 pounds (7 kg). The shift from bronze (nechoshet) to iron (barzel) for the spearhead is significant: iron was the superior military technology of the Philistines, who controlled iron-working (1 Samuel 13:19-22). The shield-bearer (nosei ha-tsinnah) carried the large body-shield (tsinnah), distinct from the smaller Magen. Goliath enters the scene with a personal entourage — he does not even carry his own shield.
8. Goliath's opening taunt is carefully constructed. He calls himself ha-Pelishti ('the Philistine') — with the definite article, as if he alone embodies the entire nation. He reduces Israel to avadim le-Sha'ul ('servants of Saul'), implying they are slaves rather than warriors. The command beru lakhem ish ('choose for yourselves a man') issues the formal challenge of representative combat. The verb yered ('let him come down') reflects the topography — the Israelites are on the ridge and would have to descend into the valley to face him.
9. The terms of the challenge are presented in a perfect chiasmic structure: if he kills me, we serve you / if I kill him, you serve us. The verb hikani ('strike me') and hikkitiv ('strike him') use the same root nakah ('to strike'). The stakes are national servitude — avadim ('servants, slaves'). Goliath frames the combat as a winner-take-all contest that decides the political fate of both peoples. This was a recognized form of warfare in the ancient Near East, designed to avoid the mass casualties of a full battle.
10. The verb cherafti ('I have taunted, defied') is from the root charaf, which carries a weight far heavier than simple challenge — it means to expose to shame, to reproach, to strip of honor. When Goliath charaf the battle lines of Israel, he is not merely challenging them to fight; he is publicly shaming them, declaring them unworthy of their God and their national identity. This verb will recur throughout the chapter (vv. 25, 26, 36, 45) and becomes the theological trigger for David's response: the shame of Israel's God is at stake.
11. The verb va-yechatu ('they were shattered, dismayed') comes from the root chatat, which means to be broken, shattered, terrified. It is stronger than ordinary fear — it describes a collapse of morale, a breaking of the will. Paired with va-yir'u me'od ('and they feared greatly'), the verse presents Israel's response as both psychological collapse (chatat) and visceral terror (yare'). Saul is named specifically — the tallest man in Israel (9:2), the king chosen for battle, is as paralyzed as the rest.
12. The narrative reintroduces David with a formal genealogical notice, as if the reader has not yet met him — a feature that has led many scholars to see chapter 17 as drawing from a different source than chapter 16. The term Efrati ('Ephrathite') here refers to the clan of Ephrath associated with Bethlehem (see Ruth 4:11, Micah 5:1), not to the tribe of Ephraim as in 1:1. Jesse is described as zaken ba ba-anashim ('old, coming among men'), an idiom meaning advanced in age. The number eight sons conflicts with 1 Chronicles 2:13-16, which lists seven — a minor textual discrepancy.
13. The narrative carefully names the three brothers who are at the front. Eliab (Eli'av, 'my God is father') is the firstborn whom Samuel initially thought was God's chosen in 16:6. Abinadab (Avinadav, 'my father is generous') and Shammah (Shammah, possibly 'desolation' or 'astonishment') are second and third. The repetition of 'three' — sheloshet benei Yishai ha-gedolim ('the three great/eldest sons of Jesse') — emphasizes that all the fighting-age sons are already at the battle. David, the youngest, is conspicuously absent from the military camp.
14. The word ha-qatan ('the small one, the youngest') defines David's position: he is the runt, the afterthought, the one left behind. The contrast between the three gedolim ('great ones, eldest') who follow the king and the one qatan who stays home is deliberate — the narrative is setting up the reversal where the smallest and least likely will accomplish what the warriors cannot.
15. The phrase holekh va-shav me'al Sha'ul ('going and returning from upon Saul') describes a pattern of movement — David oscillates between two worlds, the royal court and the pastoral field. The verb lir'ot ('to shepherd') places David back in his primary role: he is a shepherd, not a soldier. This verse bridges the tension between chapter 16 (where David serves Saul) and the narrative here (where he seems unknown) — the text suggests David's court service was intermittent, not permanent.
16. The verb va-yityatsev ('he stationed himself, took his stand') conveys deliberate, defiant positioning — Goliath plants himself in the open as a provocation. The phrase hashkem ve-ha'arev ('early and late,' literally 'the making-early and the making-evening') means he came at both ends of the day, twice daily. The number forty (arba'im) is loaded in Hebrew narrative — it is the number of testing (forty days of flood, forty years in the wilderness, forty days on Sinai). Goliath's forty-day stand is a period of testing for Israel's faith.
17. Jesse's instructions are mundane — a father sending food to his sons at the front. The qali ('roasted grain') was parched wheat or barley, a standard field ration. An ephah is approximately 22 liters (about 3/5 of a bushel). The verb haretz ('hurry, run') conveys urgency. The ordinary domesticity of this errand — grain and bread for brothers — sets up the extraordinary confrontation that follows. God's providence operates through a lunch delivery.

18. The charitsei he-chalav ('cuts of milk') are cheese — literally 'sliced milk products.' The ten cheeses are not for the brothers but for the sar ha-elef ('commander of the thousand'), likely a gift to maintain the officer's goodwill toward Jesse's sons. The verb tifqod ('you shall attend to, check on') means to visit and assess — Jesse wants a report on his sons' condition. The arubbatam ('their pledge, their token') is obscure; it may refer to a sign or proof of their well-being, or possibly something they had pledged or left as security.
19. The participle nilchamim ('fighting') is ironic — the narrative has just told us that for forty days no actual fighting has taken place. The Hebrew may indicate their posture (drawn up for battle) rather than active combat. The phrase 'Saul and they' (ve-Sha'ul ve-hemmah) has an oddly disjointed quality, as if the narrator is listing participants in a conflict that is all stance and no substance.
20. The verb va-yitosh ('he abandoned, left') is a strong word — David does not gently hand off the sheep but drops them with a guard and goes. The timing is providential: he arrives at ha-ma'galah ('the wagon circle, the encampment') precisely as the army is marching out to form ranks. The verb here'u ('they shouted') is the battle cry — the teruah, the war shout that was both a military signal and a liturgical act (see Numbers 10:9). The army shouts but does not fight.
21. The Hebrew is compact and vivid: ma'arakhah liqra't ma'arakhah ('array to meet array, line facing line'). The repetition of ma'arakhah creates a visual mirror — two armies standing as reflections of each other across the valley. The verb va-ta'arokh ('they arranged') comes from the same root as ma'arakhah, reinforcing the sense of ordered military formation.
22. David deposits the kelim ('vessels, supplies, equipment') with the shomer ha-kelim ('keeper of the equipment') — a designated supply guard. Then he runs (va-yarots) — the same urgency Jesse commanded in verse 17. The verb va-yish'al ('he asked') is from the root sha'al ('to ask'), the wordplay root that connects to both Samuel and Saul throughout 1 Samuel. He asks le-shalom ('concerning peace/welfare'), fulfilling his father's instruction from verse 18.
23. The timing is again providential: ve-hu medabber immam ('while he was speaking with them') — at the precise moment David is present, Goliath emerges. The verb oleh ('coming up, ascending') suggests Goliath is climbing from the valley floor toward the Israelite position. The narrator repeats the full identification — ish ha-benayim, Goliath the Philistine, from Gath — as if reintroducing him for David's benefit. The phrase va-yishma David ('and David heard') is the turning point of the chapter: what Israel had heard with terror (v. 11), David hears with something else entirely.
24. The verb va-yanusu ('they fled') is stark — trained soldiers run away at the sight of one man. The phrase mi-panav ('from his face, from his presence') indicates they cannot even bear to be near him. The narrator says kol ish Yisra'el ('every man of Israel') — the fear is universal. This sets up the contrast with David, who alone does not flee and does not fear. The verse functions as a lens through which to measure David's response.
25. The soldiers' speech reveals the triple reward Saul has offered: osher gadol ('great wealth'), marriage to the king's daughter (et bitto yitten lo, 'his daughter he will give him'), and tax exemption for the family (beit aviv ya'aseh chofshi, 'his father's house he will make free'). The word chofshi ('free') denotes freedom from royal obligations — corvée labor, military levies, and taxes. The verb lecharef ('to taunt, to defy') appears again — the soldiers correctly identify Goliath's purpose. They know the problem but cannot act on it. The rewards are extraordinary, yet no one steps forward.
26. David's question reframes the entire situation. The soldiers focused on the reward (v. 25); David focuses on the disgrace (cherpah) and the identity of the challenger. His use of arel ('uncircumcised') is a covenant term — circumcision marks membership in God's people (Genesis 17), and Goliath's uncircumcision places him outside the covenant and therefore outside the sphere of divine protection. The phrase ma'arkhot Elohim chayyim ('battle lines of the living God') is David's interpretive key: these are not merely Israel's battle lines but God's. To taunt them is to taunt God.
26. The term Elohim chayyim ('living God') appears relatively rarely in the Hebrew Bible and always in contexts of confrontation with human presumption or pagan power (see Deuteronomy 5:26, Joshua 3:10, 2 Kings 19:4). The 'living' God is the one who acts — in contrast to idols who have mouths but do not speak, eyes but do not see (Psalm 115:4-7).
27. The people repeat the promised reward — ka-davar ha-zeh ('according to this word') refers back to the triple reward of verse 25. Their answer confirms the offer but also underlines that no one has yet claimed it. The verb yakkenu ('who strikes him') uses the same root nakah that appeared in Goliath's own challenge (v. 9). Everyone talks about striking; no one acts.
28. Eliab's anger (va-yichar af, 'his nose burned') erupts immediately. His accusations are three: David has abandoned his responsibilities (the sheep), he is driven by zedon ('arrogance, presumption, insolence'), and he has a ra lev ('wicked heart'). The phrase me'at ha-tson ha-hennah ('those few sheep over there') is dripping with contempt — Eliab minimizes David's role to make him seem insignificant. The irony is sharp: Eliab, who is afraid to face Goliath, accuses David of coming merely to spectate. Eliab's resentment may also echo 16:6-13, where he was passed over and David was chosen.
28. The accusation of zedon ('arrogance') is the same word used for willful, high-handed sin in Numbers 15:30 and Deuteronomy 17:12. Eliab is not just calling David proud — he is accusing him of rebellious presumption against proper authority.
29. David's response is brief and composed: meh asiti attah ('what have I done now?'). The phrase halo davar hu is ambiguous and has been rendered many ways. It could mean 'Is it not just a word?' (I was merely speaking), 'Is there not a matter/cause?' (is there not reason for this?), or 'Is it not a thing?' (isn't this worth talking about?). The root davar means both 'word' and 'matter.' We render it as a question about David's right to speak, since Eliab's accusation was about David talking to the men.
30. The verb va-yissov ('he turned') shows David physically rotating away from Eliab's anger and repeating his question to others. He is not deterred by his brother's rebuke. The phrase ka-davar ha-zeh ('according to this word') and ka-davar ha-rishon ('according to the first word') indicate that David persists and the crowd consistently confirms the reward. David is not asking for information — he is building momentum.

31. David's words travel through the camp by oral report — va-yishma'u ha-devarim ('the words were heard'), using a passive construction that suggests the news spread organically. The verb va-yaggidu ('they reported, they told') indicates formal communication to the king. Saul's response — va-yiqqachehu ('he took him, he sent for him') — is immediate. David's theology has reached the ear of the king.
32. David's declaration is direct and bold: al yippol lev adam alav ('let not a man's heart fall upon him'). The verb nippol ('fall') is the same root that will describe Goliath falling (v. 49) — the word that now describes Israel's collapsing courage will soon describe the giant's collapse. David calls himself avdekha ('your servant'), adopting the formal posture of a subject before the king. The contrast between the young shepherd volunteering and the entire army cowering is the narrative's sharpest edge.
33. Saul's objection is logical: ki na'ar attah ('for you are a youth') versus ve-hu ish milchamah minne'urav ('and he is a man of war from his youth'). The word na'ar can mean boy, youth, or young man — it implies inexperience and low status. The irony is that Goliath has been a professional warrior since he himself was a na'ar, while David is still in that stage. Saul measures by military calculus: age, training, experience. David will measure by a different standard entirely.
34. David's resume is pastoral, not military. The phrase ro'eh hayah avdekha le-aviv ba-tson ('your servant has been a shepherd for his father among the flock') establishes his credentials through experience in the wild, not in the barracks. The Hebrew u-va ha-ari ve-et ha-dov ('and the lion came and the bear') uses the definite article — 'the lion' and 'the bear' — suggesting specific, remembered encounters, not hypothetical ones. The verb nasa ('carried off') indicates the predator snatching a seh ('sheep or goat, a small animal') from the flock.
35. The verbs come in rapid sequence: yatsati ('I went out'), hikkitiv ('I struck it'), hitsalti ('I rescued'), hechezaqti ('I seized'), hikkitiv ('I struck it'), hamittiv ('I killed it'). This is not boasting but a recitation of facts. The word zeqano ('its beard/jaw') when applied to a lion likely means the mane or the jaw area — the most dangerous place to grab a predator. David's willingness to pursue, strike, and kill a lion or bear bare-handed establishes a pattern: he does not calculate odds, he acts on responsibility. The sheep were his charge; he defended them.
36. David draws a direct theological line from predator to Philistine: the lion and the bear were threats to his flock; Goliath is a threat to God's flock. The phrase ke-achad mehem ('like one of them') equates the human giant with the animal predators — in David's framework, Goliath is not a superhuman threat but another beast menacing the sheep. The reason is stated explicitly: ki cheref ma'arkhot Elohim chayyim ('because he has taunted the battle lines of the living God'). This is the second time David uses this exact phrase (see v. 26), establishing it as his theological thesis.
37. David's logic is not reckless courage but theological reasoning: the same God (hu, 'he' — emphatic pronoun) who delivered from the lion and the bear will deliver from the Philistine. The verb hitsil ('rescue, deliver') is repeated three times — past deliverance is the ground for present confidence. The shift from mi-yad ha-ari ('from the paw of the lion,' literally 'from the hand of') to mi-yad ha-Pelishti ('from the hand of this Philistine') makes the parallel explicit: animal paw and human hand are equally powerless against God.
37. Saul's response — lekh va-YHWH yihyeh immakh ('go, and may the LORD be with you') — is both a commission and a blessing, but it also reveals Saul's abdication. The king who should fight for Israel sends a boy, with a prayer instead of a strategy.
38. The verb va-yalbbesh ('he clothed, he dressed') is significant — Saul is not merely equipping David but re-clothing him, imposing his own identity (maddav, 'his garments/uniform') on the boy. The qova nechoshet ('bronze helmet') and shiron ('armor coat') echo the same equipment Goliath wears (vv. 5-6). Saul's solution is to make David a miniature version of Goliath — to fight the enemy's way. The theological point is that David must reject the king's armor to fight in God's way.
39. The verb va-yo'el ('he attempted, tried') indicates an actual physical attempt — David tried to move in Saul's armor and found he could not function. The reason given is lo nissah ('he had not tested/tried them'). The repetition — lo nissah in the narrator's voice, then lo nissiti in David's — underscores that this is not about the armor being bad but about it being untested and foreign. The verb va-yesirem ('he removed them') is decisive. David strips off the conventional military solution because it does not belong to him. He will fight with what he knows.
40. The inventory of David's equipment is deliberately contrasted with Goliath's arsenal (vv. 5-7): a maqel ('staff' — a shepherd's walking stick), chamishah challuqei avanim ('five smooth stones' — waterworn, rounded by the stream), a keli ha-ro'im ('shepherd's vessel/pouch'), a yalqut ('bag, wallet'), and a qela ('sling'). The five smooth stones from the nachal ('wadi, stream bed') have been shaped not by human craft but by water and time. The sling was a lethal weapon in ancient warfare — Judges 20:16 records Benjaminite slingers who could hit a hair's width target — but in this narrative it reads as pastoral equipment pressed into military service.
40. The number five has generated much discussion. Some connect it to Goliath and his four brothers (2 Samuel 21:15-22); others see it as simply practical preparedness. The verb va-yivchar ('he chose') implies careful selection — David does not grab random rocks but selects specific stones, as a warrior would select arrows.
41. The participle construction holekh ve-qarev ('going and coming near') conveys continuous, steady advance — Goliath keeps closing the distance. The shield-bearer (nosei ha-tsinnah) walks before him, carrying the large defensive shield. The scene is visually imposing: a giant, his personal shield-carrier, and the full weight of Philistine military technology bearing down on a boy with a stick and stones.
42. The verb va-yivzehu ('he despised him') is from bazah ('to despise, to hold in contempt'). Goliath's contempt has a specific basis: ki hayah na'ar ('because he was a youth'), ve-admoni ('and ruddy/reddish'), im yefeh mar'eh ('with a handsome appearance'). David looks like a beautiful boy, not a warrior. The word admoni ('ruddy, reddish') was used to describe David at his anointing (16:12) — his physical beauty, which marked him as God's chosen, now provokes the enemy's scorn. What God sees as chosen, Goliath sees as contemptible.

43. Goliath's question ha-kelev anokhi ('Am I a dog?') is an expression of outrage — being treated as an animal is the deepest insult to a warrior's honor. He sees the maqelot ('sticks, staffs') and interprets David's approach as an insult: you bring a dog-beating stick to face a champion? The verb va-yeqallel ('he cursed') is from qalal ('to make light of, to curse') — Goliath invokes his own gods (be-elohav, 'by his gods') to place a curse on David. The Philistine deity would likely be Dagon (see 1 Samuel 5:2). The scene sets up the clash of divine names: Goliath curses by his gods, David will come in the name of the LORD of Armies.
44. Goliath's threat follows ancient Near Eastern battle rhetoric: to leave an enemy's body unburied, exposed to scavengers, was the ultimate degradation. The phrase le-of ha-shamayim u-le-behemot ha-sadeh ('to the birds of the sky and to the beasts of the field') appears in covenant curse language (Deuteronomy 28:26, Jeremiah 7:33). Goliath unwittingly speaks in covenantal terms, invoking a curse that will boomerang: it is the Philistine dead, not David, who will be left exposed (v. 46).
45. The three weapons — cherev ('sword'), chanit ('spear'), kidon ('javelin') — constitute the full armament of a heavy infantry warrior. Against this David sets a single phrase: be-shem YHWH Tseva'ot ('in the name of the LORD of Armies'). The word shem ('name') in Hebrew is not merely a label but the full reality, character, and authority of the one named. To come 'in the name of' someone is to come bearing their authority and power. David is not invoking magic; he is declaring allegiance and trust.
45. The title YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Armies') was introduced in 1:3 at the beginning of the book. Its appearance here, at the moment of Israel's greatest military crisis, completes a narrative arc: the God first named in the context of a barren woman's prayer now fights through a shepherd boy against a giant. The 'armies' (tseva'ot) of God stand against the army of the Philistines.
46. David turns Goliath's own threat (v. 44) back on him with devastating escalation. Goliath threatened David's flesh to the birds; David promises the peger machaneh Pelishtim ('corpses of the Philistine camp') — not just Goliath but the entire army. The verb yesaggerkha ('he will deliver you, shut you up') uses the root sagar ('to close, to deliver'), the same verb used in 1:5-6 for God closing Hannah's womb. God closes and God delivers — the same sovereign hand.
46. The purpose clause ve-yede'u kol ha-arets ki yesh Elohim le-Yisra'el ('so that all the earth may know that there is a God in Israel') expands the scope from personal combat to universal witness. The battle is not about David's glory but about God's reputation among the nations. The word yesh ('there is') is an assertion of existence and presence — there is a God, a real and active God, belonging to Israel.
47. The sentence ki la-YHWH ha-milchamah ('for the battle belongs to the LORD') is one of the most important theological statements in the Hebrew Bible. It summarizes the doctrine of holy war: God is the true warrior, and human instruments are secondary. This principle appears in the Song of the Sea (Exodus 15:3, 'the LORD is a man of war'), in Deuteronomy's war regulations (20:1-4), and will echo in 2 Chronicles 20:15 ('the battle is not yours but God's').
47. The shift from singular (v. 46, 'I will strike you') to plural (etkhem, 'you' plural; yadenu, 'our hands') in this verse is significant — David speaks as the representative of all Israel. His singular combat is for the benefit of the collective. The 'our' in 'our hands' includes the whole Israelite army.
48. The contrast in speed is telling: the Philistine qam va-yelekh va-yiqrav ('rose and went and drew near') — a measured, heavy advance. David va-yemaher va-yarots ('hurried and ran') — explosive speed toward the enemy. The verb va-yarots ('he ran') describes David sprinting directly at the giant. While Israel ran away from Goliath (v. 24, va-yanusu), David runs toward him. The narrator uses the same root (ruts, 'to run') for both movements, creating an exact reversal.
49. The sequence of four verbs without any conjunction except va- ('and') creates a staccato rhythm that mirrors the speed of the action. The entire combat — from David reaching into his bag to Goliath hitting the ground — is narrated in a single verse. After forty days of standoff and an elaborate verbal exchange, the actual fight takes seconds.
49. The mitscho ('his forehead') is mentioned twice — the narrator emphasizes the precision of the strike. The forehead is the gap in Goliath's armor, the one vulnerability in his otherwise total coverage. Ancient slingers could achieve velocities of over 100 mph with lead or stone projectiles; a smooth stone from a skilled slinger was a lethal weapon, not a toy.
50. This verse is the narrator's summary and theological commentary. The verb va-yechezaq ('he overpowered, prevailed') from the root chazaq ('to be strong') describes David's victory in terms of strength — but the strength was exerted through a sling and a stone, not through conventional weapons. The final clause is devastating in its simplicity: ve-cherev ein be-yad David ('and a sword — there was none in the hand of David'). The narrator drives home the point: no sword. The weapon Goliath wielded, the weapon Saul offered, the weapon every soldier carried — David had none of it. The victory confirms David's theology from verse 47: the LORD does not save by sword and spear.
51. David uses Goliath's own sword (charbo, 'his sword') to complete the kill and sever the head. The verb va-yemottehu ('he finished him off, he put him to death') indicates Goliath was not yet dead from the stone but was incapacitated — David's sword stroke was the killing blow. The irony is complete: Goliath is killed by his own weapon. The phrase va-yikhrot bah et rosho ('he cut off his head with it') is graphic and intentional — the removal of the head is both a military act (proof of kill) and a symbolic reversal of power.
51. The Philistine response is immediate: va-yanusu ('they fled'). The word gibboram ('their champion, their mighty one') comes from gibbor ('mighty warrior, hero'). When the gibbor falls, the army's morale collapses. The representative combat has worked exactly as designed — the loss of the one means the loss of all.
52. The army that had fled (v. 24, va-yanusu) now rises (va-yaqumu), shouts (va-yari'u), and pursues (va-yirdefu). The reversal is complete. The pursuit extends to the Philistine heartland — Gath (Goliath's own city) and Ekron (a major Philistine center). The word challelei ('slain, pierced') indicates heavy Philistine casualties along the pursuit route. The mention of both 'Israel and Judah' (anshei Yisra'el viYehudah) may reflect the later political division or may simply indicate tribal units fighting together. Shaaraim means 'double gates' — the topography of the Elah valley region.

53. The verb mi-deloq ('from pursuing hotly') uses a rare word that implies burning, eager chase — not a casual follow-up but an energetic rout. The verb va-yashosu ('they plundered') indicates a thorough stripping of the abandoned Philistine camp. The army that had cowered for forty days now takes the enemy's supplies, weapons, and equipment. The plundering of the camp is the final proof that the Philistine army has been completely broken.
54. This verse raises a well-known geographical difficulty: Jerusalem was still a Jebusite city at this time (it will not be captured by David until 2 Samuel 5:6-9). Several explanations have been proposed: the verse may be an editorial addition written from the perspective of a later time when Jerusalem was the capital; David may have brought the head there later after taking the city; or there may have been an Israelite presence near Jerusalem that the text does not elaborate. The kelav ('his weapons/equipment') — Goliath's captured arms — David places in his own tent (oholo), keeping them as trophies. Goliath's sword will later appear in the sanctuary at Nob (21:9).
55. This passage (vv. 55-58) has long troubled interpreters because Saul appears not to know David, despite having made him his personal musician and armor-bearer in chapter 16. The question ben mi zeh ha-na'ar ('whose son is this youth?') may not be about David's identity but about his family's status — Saul promised his daughter to the champion (v. 25), so he needs to know the father's household for the marriage alliance. Abner's oath chei nafshekha ha-melekh ('as your soul/life endures, O king') is a strong asseveration — he genuinely does not know. Alternatively, the two chapters may preserve parallel traditions about how David entered Saul's service.
56. The word ha-elem ('the young man, the adolescent') is a different term from na'ar used earlier. It comes from the root alam ('to be hidden, to be vigorous') and may emphasize youth and obscurity. Saul's command she'al attah ('inquire, you') uses the root sha'al — the same wordplay root that has threaded through the entire book. The king whose name derives from sha'al now asks about the boy who will replace him.
57. The image is vivid and unsettling: David stands before the king holding a severed head. The phrase ve-rosh ha-Pelishti be-yado ('and the head of the Philistine in his hand') is placed at the end of the sentence for maximum impact. The verb me-hakkot ('from striking') uses the hiphil infinitive of nakah — the same root that has described every blow in the chapter. Abner fulfills Saul's command by bringing David directly to the throne.
58. The chapter ends not with triumph but with a question and answer about identity — ben mi attah ha-na'ar ('whose son are you, young man?'). Saul asks the question that will dominate the rest of the book: who is David? The answer — ben avdekha Yishai beit ha-Lachmi ('the son of your servant Jesse the Bethlehemite') — places David in the humblest possible frame. He is the son of a servant, from a small town. Yet this son of a servant has just done what the king and all his army could not. The phrase beit ha-Lachmi ('the Bethlehemite') connects David to Bethlehem — the town whose name means 'house of bread' and which will become, in Israel's prophetic tradition, the birthplace of the future messianic king (Micah 5:1).

Summary: After David's victory over Goliath, Jonathan — Saul's own son and heir to the throne — forms a covenant bond with David so deep that the text says Jonathan's soul was 'bound' (niqsherah) to David's soul. Jonathan strips himself of his royal robe, armor, sword, bow, and belt and gives them to David — a symbolic abdication of his claim to the throne. David succeeds in every military mission Saul assigns him, earning the admiration of the people and Saul's own servants. But when the women of Israel greet the returning army with the song 'Saul has struck down his thousands, and David his ten thousands,' Saul's jealousy ignites into murderous rage. An evil spirit from God overwhelms Saul, and he hurls a spear at David twice while David plays the lyre. Saul removes David from his presence by appointing him commander over a thousand — ostensibly a promotion, actually an exile to the front lines. Saul offers his older daughter Merab as a wife, hoping David will die in battle against the Philistines, but ultimately gives her to another man. When Saul learns that his younger daughter Michal loves David, he sees another opportunity to use marriage as a death trap, demanding a bride-price of one hundred Philistine foreskins. David delivers two hundred, and Saul is forced to give Michal as David's wife. The chapter closes with Saul recognizing that the LORD is with David and that Michal loves him, and Saul becomes David's permanent enemy.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most extraordinary covenantal acts in the Hebrew Bible.

Jonathan's giving of his robe (me'il), military equipment, sword, bow, and belt to David is not a casual gift — it is a voluntary renunciation of royal succession. The me'il is the same word used for the priestly robe and for the robe Samuel wore that Saul tore in chapter 15, symbolizing the kingdom being torn from him. Jonathan, who has every human reason to view David as a rival, instead recognizes what God is doing and aligns himself with it at total personal cost. The verb niqsherah ('was bound, was knit') describing Jonathan's soul-attachment to David is the same root (q-sh-r) used elsewhere for conspiracies and binding agreements — this is not mere friendship but a covenantal fusion of identity. Equally remarkable is the narrator's repeated use of sakal ('to act wisely, to prosper') for David — appearing in verses 5, 14, 15, and 30. The word carries a double meaning: David succeeds because he is wise, and he is wise because God is with him. Saul's tragedy is that he can see God's hand on David clearly (verse 28) and rather than submitting to it, he opposes it — making himself an enemy not just of David but of God's purpose.

Translation Friction: The chapter raises uncomfortable questions about divine agency and human suffering. In verse 10, an 'evil spirit from God' (ruach elohim ra'ah) overwhelms Saul and he attempts to murder David. The text does not soften this — the spirit is explicitly 'from God.' How does this square with the God who patiently warned the people through Samuel in chapter 8? The theological tension is that Saul's madness is both a divine judgment and a psychological deterioration — the spirit exploits what is already in Saul's heart. Saul's jealousy in verse 8 precedes the evil spirit in verse 10; the spirit amplifies what Saul has chosen but did not create it. There is also tension in Saul's manipulation of his daughters. He uses Merab as bait (verse 17), then reneges and gives her to Adriel. He uses Michal's genuine love for David (verse 20) as another trap. The text does not condemn this explicitly — the narrator simply reports it — but the reader is meant to feel the horror of a father weaponizing his own children. The contrast with Jonathan, who freely gives away his royal inheritance, makes Saul's grasping all the more grotesque.

Connections: Jonathan's covenant with David in verses 1-4 connects forward to 2 Samuel 1:26, where David will lament Jonathan's death saying 'your love (ahavah) was more wonderful to me than the love of women,' and to 2 Samuel 9, where David will honor the covenant by caring for Jonathan's crippled son Mephibosheth. The verb niqsherah ('was bound') uses the same root as Genesis 44:30, where Jacob's soul is 'bound up' (qeshurah) with Benjamin's — both describe a love so deep that the death of one would mean the death of the other. The women's song in verse 7 ('Saul has struck his thousands, David his ten thousands') will be remembered and repeated in 1 Samuel 21:11 and 29:5, becoming a political liability that follows David into exile. Saul's spear-throwing in verse 11 inaugurates a pattern that continues through chapters 19 and 20, and the spear itself becomes a symbol of Saul's kingship — he is always pictured with his spear (19:9, 22:6, 26:7), while David refuses to use the spear even when he has the chance to kill Saul with it (26:11). The bride-price of foreskins (verse 25) connects to the broader theme of Philistine uncircumcision — the mark that separates covenant people from non-covenant people — which David invoked in his challenge to Goliath (17:26, 36).

¹When David had finished speaking to Saul, Jonathan's soul became bound to David's soul, and Jonathan loved him as his own life. ²Saul took him into his service that day and would not let him return to his father's house. ³Jonathan and David cut a covenant, because Jonathan loved him as his own life. ⁴Jonathan stripped off the robe he was wearing and gave it to David — along with his military tunic, his sword, his bow, and his belt. ⁵David went out on every mission Saul assigned him and acted with skill. Saul placed him over the fighting men, and it was pleasing in the eyes of all the people — and even in the eyes of Saul's own officials. ⁶As the army returned — after David had struck down the Philistine — women came out from all the cities of Israel, singing and dancing to welcome King Saul, with tambourines, celebration, and three-stringed instruments. ⁷The women sang out to one another as they celebrated: "Saul has struck down his thousands, and David his ten thousands!" ⁸Saul burned with anger. The song was wrong in his eyes, and he said, "They credit David with ten thousands and credit me with only thousands — what is left for him but the kingdom itself?" ⁹Saul watched David with suspicion from that day on. ¹⁰The next day, a harmful spirit from God rushed upon Saul, and he raved inside the house while David played the lyre with his hand as he did every day — and a spear was in Saul's hand. ¹¹Saul hurled the spear, thinking, "I will pin David to the wall." But David dodged away from him — twice. ¹²Saul was afraid of David, because the LORD was with David — and had turned away from Saul. ¹³So Saul removed David from his presence and appointed him commander over a thousand. David went out and came back at the head of the troops. ¹⁴David acted with wisdom in everything he did, and the LORD was with him. ¹⁵When Saul saw that David acted with extraordinary skill, he dreaded him. ¹⁶But all Israel and Judah loved David, because he led them in battle and brought them home safely. ¹⁷Saul said to David, "Here is my older daughter Merab — I will give her to you as a wife. Just be a warrior of valor for me and fight the LORD's battles." For Saul was thinking, "My hand should not be against him; let the Philistines' hand be against him instead." ¹⁸David said to Saul, "Who am I, and what is my family — my father's clan in Israel — that I should become the king's son-in-law?" ¹⁹But when the time came to give Merab, Saul's daughter, to David, she was given instead to Adriel the Meholathite as his wife. ²⁰Now Michal, Saul's daughter, loved David. When this was reported to Saul, it pleased him. ²¹Saul thought, "I will give her to him, and she will become a trap for him, and the Philistines' hand will be against him." So Saul said to David, "Today, through the second daughter, you can become my son-in-law." ²²Saul commanded his servants, "Speak to David privately and say, 'Look — the king is delighted with you, and all his servants are devoted to you. Now become the king's son-in-law.'" ²³Saul's servants spoke these words directly to David, and David said, "Does it seem like a small thing to you — becoming the king's son-in-law? I am a poor man, of no standing." ²⁴Saul's servants reported back to him, saying, "These are the words David spoke." ²⁵Saul said, "Tell David this: 'The king wants no bride-price — only one hundred Philistine foreskins, to take vengeance on the king's enemies.'" But Saul's calculation was to make David fall at the hands of the Philistines. ²⁶When his servants relayed these terms to David, the idea pleased David — to become the king's son-in-law. And the allotted time had not yet passed. ²⁷David set out with his men and struck down two hundred Philistines. David brought their foreskins and presented the full count to the king, in order to become the king's son-in-law. So Saul gave him his daughter Michal as a wife. ²⁸Saul saw and understood that the LORD was with David, and that Michal his daughter loved him. ²⁹Saul's fear of David only deepened, and Saul became David's enemy for the rest of his days. ³⁰Whenever the Philistine commanders marched out to battle, David acted with greater skill than all of Saul's other officers — and his reputation became very great.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase niqsherah benepshesh David ('was bound to the soul of David') uses the Niphal (passive/reflexive) stem, suggesting this happened to Jonathan — it was not a calculated decision but an overwhelming recognition. The timing is critical: this occurs immediately after David spoke with Saul following the Goliath victory. Jonathan heard David's words and saw in him something that seized his entire being. The preposition be- ('in, with') rather than el ('to') or im ('with') suggests interpenetration — Jonathan's soul was bound in David's soul, not merely alongside it.
2. The verb vayiqqachehu ('he took him') indicates Saul's appropriation of David into the royal household — the same verb used for taking a wife, taking possession, or conscripting into service. The phrase velo netano lashuv beit aviv ('he did not give him to return to his father's house') marks a permanent transfer of David's social location. David is no longer Jesse's son tending sheep; he belongs to the court. Ironically, Saul's act of taking David into his household plants the very rival he will spend the rest of his life trying to expel. The phrase beit aviv ('his father's house') carries weight in a culture where identity was defined by patrilineal household — Saul is, in effect, transferring David's primary allegiance from Jesse's house to Saul's.
3. The phrase vayikhrot berit ('cut a covenant') uses the root k-r-t, which always implies a solemn, binding agreement with consequences for violation. The same phrase describes God's covenant with Abraham (Genesis 15:18), the Sinai covenant (Exodus 34:10), and Joshua's covenant with the Gibeonites (Joshua 9:15). Jonathan is placing his relationship with David on the same level as the most sacred bonds in Israel's history. The causal clause be'ahavato oto ('because of his loving him') makes love the foundation of the covenant — an extraordinary reversal of the usual order, where covenant creates obligation and obligation produces loyalty. Here, love comes first and covenant formalizes what love has already established.
4. The me'il (robe) is specifically a garment of rank — worn by priests (Exodus 28:31), by Samuel (1 Samuel 2:19), and by royalty. When Jonathan removes his me'il and gives it to David, the political symbolism would have been unmistakable to ancient readers. The word maddav is debated — it likely refers to military garments or a tunic worn under armor. The sequence from robe to belt moves from the outermost symbol of identity to the most personal piece of a warrior's equipment. The repeated ve'ad ('and even to, up to') emphasizes that Jonathan held nothing back — he gave everything, down to the last item. This is the Hebrew narrative's way of saying Jonathan made a total transfer of royal identity to David.
5. The verb yaskil (from sakal, 'to act wisely, to prosper, to have insight') is the chapter's signature word for David. It carries a double sense: David was both shrewd in his conduct and successful in his outcomes. The Hiphil form implies causative success — David 'caused things to go well.' Saul's response of placing David over the anshei hamilchamah ('men of war') is both recognition and, as the chapter unfolds, strategic positioning — keeping the rising star at the front where battle might solve Saul's problem. The phrase vayyitav be'einei kol ha'am ('it was good in the eyes of all the people') is politically devastating for Saul — universal popularity is the one thing a jealous king cannot tolerate. The addition of vegam be'einei avdei Sha'ul ('and also in the eyes of Saul's servants') means David has won over even the king's inner circle.
6. The phrase mehakkot et haPlishti ('from striking the Philistine') uses the singular — this refers to Goliath specifically, placing the scene after the events of chapter 17. The verb vattese'nah ('they came out') uses the feminine plural, emphasizing this is a women's celebration — a known cultural pattern in ancient Israel where women greeted returning warriors with song and dance (cf. Exodus 15:20, Miriam after the Red Sea; Judges 11:34, Jephthah's daughter). The word mecholat ('dances, dancing') suggests circular or processional dancing. The word shalishim is debated — traditionally rendered 'three-stringed instruments' or 'triangles,' but possibly 'officers of the third rank' or simply a type of musical instrument. The celebration is directed liqrat Sha'ul hamelekh ('to meet King Saul') — the women intend to honor Saul, which makes the content of their song all the more devastating to him.
7. The verb vatta'enenah ('they answered, sang responsively') indicates antiphonal singing — two groups of women singing back and forth. The word hamsachaqot ('the ones playing, celebrating, making merry') comes from the root s-ch-q, which can mean play, laugh, celebrate, or mock — an ambiguity that Saul will interpret in the worst possible direction. The song itself uses standard Hebrew poetic parallelism: Saul/David, thousands/ten thousands (alaphav/rivevotav). In normal poetic convention, the second line intensifies the first without necessarily being a literal comparison — it is a formulaic way of saying 'great victory.' But Saul hears it as a ranking. The word revavah ('ten thousand, myriad') is the standard poetic intensification of eleph ('thousand'), but to a man already insecure on his throne, poetry becomes political threat.

8. The verb vayyichar ('it burned') describes the kindling of anger — the same word used for God's anger throughout the Torah. Saul's rage is immediate and visceral, a fire that ignites at the sound of the song. The phrase vayyera be'ainav haddavar hazzeh ('this thing was evil in his eyes') echoes the identical phrase used when Samuel was displeased by the people's demand for a king (8:6) — Saul's reaction to David mirrors Samuel's reaction to Saul's own appointment. The word melukhah ('kingdom, kingship, royal power') reveals Saul's deepest fear: he interprets a folk song as a political succession plan. The phrase ve'od lo akh hammelukhah ('and still for him is only the kingdom') shows Saul has leaped from poetic hyperbole to political conspiracy in a single breath. His jealousy is prophetically accurate — David will indeed receive the kingdom — but his response to the truth is rage rather than surrender.
9. The verb oyen ('eyeing, watching suspiciously') comes from the root 'y-n, related to ayin ('eye'). This is not neutral observation but hostile surveillance — the watchful stare of a predator tracking prey. The phrase mehayom hahu vahal'ah ('from that day and onward') marks a permanent shift in Saul's posture toward David. Before this verse, Saul loved David (16:21) and kept him in his household (18:2). After this verse, every interaction between Saul and David is poisoned by suspicion and fear. The brevity of the verse — just eight Hebrew words — mirrors the suddenness of the transformation. One song rewrites the entire relationship.
10. The verb vatitslach ('rushed upon, came mightily upon') is the same verb used when the Spirit of God empowered Saul for battle (11:6) and Samson for feats of strength (Judges 14:6) — the same divine power that once enabled Saul now torments him. The phrase ruach Elohim ra'ah ('an evil/harmful spirit of God') attributes the spirit's origin to God without making God the author of evil — the theological tension is deliberate. The verb vayitnabe ('he prophesied') is deeply ironic: the same word described Saul's ecstatic behavior when the Spirit first came upon him (10:10-11), and people asked 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' Now the ecstasy has curdled into madness, and the same verb describes raving. David's playing (menaggein beyado, 'making music with his hand') is therapeutic — he was originally brought to Saul for this purpose (16:23). The final clause — vehachanit beyad Sha'ul ('and the spear was in Saul's hand') — is ominous narrative foreshadowing. The spear is simply there, waiting.
11. The verb vayyatel ('he hurled') describes a violent throwing motion. The inner speech vayomer ('he said/thought') reveals Saul's murderous intent: akkeh veDavid uvaqir ('I will strike through David and into the wall') — the preposition be- on both David and the wall suggests pinning him like an insect. This is not a warning throw but an assassination attempt. The verb vayyissov ('he turned aside, evaded') describes David's evasion — the root s-b-b means to go around or turn, suggesting David dodged laterally rather than retreating. The word pa'amayim ('twice') means Saul threw the spear two times, and David escaped both. The repetition transforms this from a moment of madness into a sustained attempt at murder. The man who was brought to soothe the king's troubled spirit now must dodge the king's spear.
12. The verb vayyira ('he feared') marks a critical shift: Saul has moved from jealousy (v8) to suspicion (v9) to murderous rage (v11) and now to fear (v12). The king is afraid of his own servant. The reason the narrator gives is theological, not military: ki hayah YHWH immo ('because the LORD was with him'). The phrase YHWH immo ('the LORD with him') is the covenant formula of divine presence — the same assurance God gave to Jacob (Genesis 28:15), Joseph (Genesis 39:2,21), and Joshua (Joshua 1:5). The devastating contrast — ume'im Sha'ul sar ('and from Saul he had departed') — uses the verb sur ('to turn aside, depart, remove'). God's presence, which once rushed upon Saul (11:6), has now turned away. Saul can see God's presence on David precisely because he can feel its absence from himself.
13. The verb vayasirehu ('he removed him') uses the same root s-u-r ('to turn aside, remove') that described God's departure from Saul in verse 12 — Saul removes David just as God removed himself from Saul, creating a bitter verbal echo. The appointment as sar-eleph ('commander of a thousand') looks like a promotion but functions as an exile from the royal court to the battlefield. Saul wants David in harm's way. The phrase vayyetse vayyavo lifnei ha'am ('he went out and came in before the people') is a military leadership formula — 'going out and coming in' means leading troops in campaign and returning safely. The phrase lifnei ha'am ('before the people') means David was visibly leading from the front, which only increased his popularity — the opposite of what Saul intended.
14. The participle maskil (from sakal) reappears here as a comprehensive assessment: lekhol-derakhav maskil ('in all his ways acting wisely/prospering'). The phrase covers every domain — military, social, political, personal. David's sakal is total and visible. The concluding clause vaYHWH immo ('and the LORD was with him') provides the theological explanation for the human observation. David's wisdom is not self-generated; it flows from divine presence. This verse functions as the narrator's thesis statement for the entire chapter: David succeeds because God is with him, and God's presence manifests as comprehensive wisdom. The simplicity of the Hebrew — just eight words — creates a stark contrast with the complexity of Saul's scheming that surrounds it.
15. The verb vayyar ('he saw') followed by asher hu maskil me'od ('that he was exceedingly wise/successful') means Saul's fear was based on clear-eyed observation, not paranoia. Saul could see the reality of David's competence and divine favor. The verb vayyagor ('he dreaded, was in dread of') is stronger than the vayyira ('he feared') of verse 12. The root g-u-r means to dread, to be terrified, to shrink back in fear — it describes a visceral, ongoing terror rather than a momentary fright. Saul has progressed from fear to dread. The irony is that David's maskil — the very quality that makes him an effective servant of Saul's kingdom — is what terrifies Saul. The better David serves, the more Saul fears him. Competence itself has become a threat.
16. The phrase vekhol-Yisra'el viYhudah ('all Israel and Judah') is striking because it distinguishes the northern tribes from Judah — a political division that will not formally exist until after Solomon's death (1 Kings 12). The narrator either writes from a later perspective or signals an existing tribal consciousness that predates the official split. The verb ohev ('loving') is the same root as Jonathan's ahavah for David — the entire nation shares

Jonathan's response. The reason given — ki hu yotse vava lifneihem ('because he was going out and coming in before them') — is the military leadership formula from verse 13. David is a leader who shares the danger with his people, and this earns their love. The contrast with Saul is implicit: Saul stays in the house with his spear while David goes out with the troops.

17. Saul's offer of Merab (biti hagedolah, 'my great/elder daughter') may fulfill the promise made in 17:25, where the king offered his daughter to whoever killed Goliath — though Saul now attaches new conditions. The phrase heyeh-li leven-chayil ('be for me a son of valor') is ironic: ben-chayil is exactly what David already is, but Saul frames it as a future requirement to justify sending David into more battles. The phrase milchamot YHWH ('the LORD's battles') is especially cynical — Saul invokes divine warfare as a pretext for engineering David's death. The narrator then breaks the fourth wall with ki Sha'ul amar ('for Saul said/thought'), revealing the inner calculation: al-tehi yadi vo ('let not my hand be on him') — Saul wants plausible deniability. He wants the Philistines to do his killing for him. The yad ('hand') of the Philistines is contrasted with the yad of Saul — he is transferring the murder weapon from his own hand (which already failed with the spear) to the enemy's.
18. David's response mi anokhi ('who am I?') echoes Moses at the burning bush (Exodus 3:11) and Gideon's call narrative (Judges 6:15) — the conventional response of the humble when called to something beyond their station. The phrase umi chayyai ('and what is my life/family') is debated: chayyai could mean 'my life' (what is my life worth?) or 'my living relatives, my clan.' The clarifying phrase mishpachat avi ('my father's clan') suggests the social dimension: David is saying his family's rank does not merit royal marriage. The word chatan ('son-in-law, bridegroom') creates a kinship bond — becoming the king's chatan means entering the royal family. David's humility may be genuine or diplomatic or both — it is the appropriate response in a culture where self-promotion would be offensive.
19. The phrase be'et tet ('at the time of giving') marks the moment when the promise should have been fulfilled. The passive nittanah ('she was given') obscures the agent — the text does not say 'Saul gave her' but 'she was given,' perhaps reflecting the narrative's subtle distancing from Saul's broken word. Adriel the Meholathite (haMecholati) is from Abel-Meholah, a town in the Jordan valley associated with Elisha's home (1 Kings 19:16). This broken promise sets up a later tragedy: Merab's five sons by Adriel will be handed over to the Gibeonites and executed in 2 Samuel 21:8-9. Saul's political manipulation of his daughter's marriage will have lethal consequences for his grandsons. The verse is a single sentence of devastating narrative economy — a promise made, a promise broken, a life redirected, all in one line.
20. The statement vatte'ehav Mikhal bat-Sha'ul et-David ('Michal daughter of Saul loved David') is remarkable because it is one of the very few places in the Hebrew Bible where a woman is the stated subject of the verb 'to love' (ahav) directed toward a man. The narrator gives Michal her own agency and emotional voice. The phrase vayyiggidu leSha'ul ('they reported to Saul') indicates court informants — the royal household is a place of surveillance and intelligence. The phrase vayyishar haddavar be'ainav ('the thing was straight/pleasing in his eyes') uses the root y-sh-r ('straight, right, upright') — ironically, the word for moral uprightness is used to describe Saul's pleasure at finding a new opportunity for treachery. Saul is pleased not because his daughter is happy but because her love gives him another weapon against David.
21. The word moqesh ('snare, trap') is hunting vocabulary — it refers to a bird trap or animal snare. Saul views his own daughter as a device for catching prey. The phrase utehi-vo yad-Pelishtim ('and the hand of the Philistines will be upon him') repeats the same scheme from verse 17 — the Philistines are Saul's proxy assassins. The phrase bishtayim titchatten bi hayyom ('with two/the second you will become my son-in-law today') is ambiguous: bishtayim could mean 'by the second (daughter)' — i.e., through Michal after the Merab arrangement failed — or 'a second time' — another chance at the royal marriage. The verb titchatten (Hitpa'el of ch-t-n) is reflexive: 'you will make yourself a son-in-law to me.' Saul frames the offer as David's opportunity, disguising his trap as generosity.
22. The adverb ballat ('in secret, privately, in a whisper') reveals the manipulative nature of Saul's approach — this is not a public offer but a covert campaign of persuasion. Saul stages the proposal to come from servants rather than himself, creating the appearance of organic encouragement rather than royal pressure. The phrase chafets bekha hammelek ('the king delights in you') uses chafets, a word of genuine pleasure and desire — Saul instructs his servants to lie, attributing to himself an affection he does not feel. The addition of vekhlo-avadav ahevukha ('and all his servants love you') piles on social pressure — you are loved by everyone, so why hesitate? The entire verse is a masterclass in manipulation: private approach, false warmth, peer pressure, and the framing of a trap as an honor.
23. The phrase be'oznei David ('in the ears of David') means they spoke directly and privately to him, fulfilling Saul's instruction for a covert approach. David's response uses the Niphal of q-l-l: haneqallah ('is it considered light/trivial?') — does becoming royal kin seem easy or insignificant to you? The self-description ish rash veniqleh ('a poor man and of low esteem') uses rash ('poor, impoverished') and niqleh (Niphal of q-l-l, 'lightly esteemed, insignificant'). David emphasizes his economic inability to pay a bride-price worthy of royalty. In ancient Israelite marriage, the groom's family paid a mohar (bride-price) to the bride's family — David's poverty would make a royal bride-price impossible. Whether this is genuine humility, social convention, or strategic positioning (inviting Saul to name alternative terms), it opens the door for Saul's lethal counteroffer.
24. This brief verse functions as a narrative hinge — the servants are intermediaries shuttling between Saul and David, maintaining the fiction of distance. The phrase kaddevarim ha'elleh dibber David ('according to these words David spoke') indicates they relayed David's response verbatim. The verse reveals the court's architecture of communication: Saul does not speak directly to David about the marriage but operates through layers of intermediaries. This indirection serves Saul's purposes — it maintains deniability and creates the appearance of David pursuing the marriage rather than being lured into it.
25. The phrase ein chafets lammelek bemohar ('the king has no desire for a bride-price') waives the standard mohar — the financial payment from groom to bride's father. Instead, Saul demands me'ah orlot Pelishtim ('one hundred foreskins of Philistines'). The orlah ('foreskin') is the mark of non-covenant identity — Philistines were 'uncircumcised' (arelim), and collecting foreskins meant killing the enemy and taking proof. This demand requires David to engage in close combat with one hundred Philistine warriors — a near-certain death sentence. The phrase lehinnaqem be'oyvei hammelekh ('to take vengeance on the king's enemies') cloaks personal murder-by-proxy in the language of national warfare. The narrator again reveals Saul's inner calculation: veSha'ul chashav lehappil et-David beyad-Pelishtim ('Saul was reckoning to make David fall by the hand of the Philistines'). The verb chashav ('to reckon, calculate, plan') presents Saul as a cold strategist, and hippil ('to cause to fall') means he wanted David dead.

26. The phrase vayyishar haddavar be'einei David ('the thing was straight/pleasing in David's eyes') uses the same expression applied to Saul in verse 20 — both men find the arrangement pleasing, but for entirely different reasons. David sees an opportunity for honor and marriage; Saul sees a death trap. The phrase velo male'u hayyamim ('the days were not fulfilled/completed') indicates a deadline had been set for the bride-price, and David acted before it expired. This detail emphasizes David's eagerness and confidence — he did not need the full allotted time. It also heightens the narrative tension: Saul expected David to die in the attempt, but David moved quickly and decisively.
27. David delivers matayim ish ('two hundred men') — double the required one hundred. The doubling is not accidental; it is a statement of overwhelming competence and, perhaps, a pointed echo of the women's song that credited David with 'ten thousands' against Saul's 'thousands.' David doubles the bride-price just as the women doubled his kill count. The verb vaymalle'um ('they filled them up, completed the full number') uses the same root m-l' as verse 26's 'the days were not fulfilled' — David fills the count before the days are filled. The phrase vayyitten-lo Sha'ul et-Mikhal bitto le'ishah ('Saul gave him Michal his daughter as a wife') is terse and forced — Saul is trapped by his own scheme. He set the price hoping David would die; David paid double, and Saul must honor the deal. The verb vayyitten ('he gave') is the same word used for the broken promise about Merab (verse 19) — this time Saul cannot renege.
28. The paired verbs vayyar vayyeda ('he saw and he knew') indicate both empirical observation and deep understanding — Saul is not guessing but perceiving with certainty. The clause ki YHWH im-David ('that the LORD was with David') repeats the narrator's own assessment from verses 12 and 14, but now Saul himself has arrived at the same conclusion. The addition of uMikhal bat-Sha'ul ahevathu ('and Michal daughter of Saul loved him') adds personal devastation to Saul's political crisis — not only is God with David, but Saul's own daughter has given her loyalty to his rival. The verb ahavathu ('she loved him') echoes the same ahavah vocabulary used for Jonathan in verse 1. Both of Saul's children love David more than they love their father's interests. Saul is losing everything — divine favor, popular support, military prestige, and now his own family.
29. The verb vayyosef ('he added, continued, increased') with lero ('to fear') indicates Saul's fear is escalating — each verse has pushed it higher: jealousy (v8), suspicion (v9), fear (v12), dread (v15), and now intensified, permanent fear. The phrase vayyehi Sha'ul ohev et-David kol-hayyamim ('Saul was an enemy of David all the days') is the narrator's final verdict on the relationship. The word ohev ('enemy') is the standard term for a military or national adversary — Saul, the king of Israel, has become David's enemy in the same way the Philistines are Israel's enemies. The phrase kol-hayyamim ('all the days') means this enmity is permanent and total. There will be no reconciliation. The chapter that began with Jonathan's covenant love ends with Saul's covenant hatred — the father and son have taken opposite positions toward the same man.
30. The final verse returns to the chapter's key verb: sakhal David ('David acted wisely/prospered'). The comparative mikkol avdei Sha'ul ('more than all of Saul's servants') positions David as the most capable officer in the army — not just competent but preeminent. The phrase vayyiqar shemo me'od ('his name became very precious/honored') uses the verb y-q-r ('to be precious, honored, rare'). David's shem ('name') — his reputation, public identity, renown — has become yaqar ('precious, weighty, valuable'). This closes the chapter by circling back to the women's song: the very popularity Saul feared has only grown. The narrator's final word on the chapter is David's ascending glory, implicitly contrasted with Saul's descending spiral. The chapter opened with covenant love and closes with covenant skill — Jonathan's berit and David's sakal are both gifts from God, and both are things Saul cannot defeat.

Summary: Saul openly commands his servants and Jonathan to kill David. Jonathan intercedes, persuading his father to swear an oath sparing David's life. But after David's next military victory, the evil spirit returns and Saul hurls a spear at David in his own house. Michal, David's wife, helps him escape through a window and deceives Saul's messengers using household idols (terafim) arranged in David's bed. David flees to Samuel at Ramah, where the two of them settle in Naioth. Saul sends three waves of messengers to capture David, but each group falls into prophetic frenzy upon arriving. Finally Saul goes himself — and the Spirit of God seizes him too, stripping him of his royal garments as he lies naked and prophesying all day and all night before Samuel. The chapter closes with the proverb resurfacing: 'Is Saul also among the prophets?'

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is structured as a cascading failure of royal power. Saul issues a direct kill order (verse 1), but every instrument of his authority — his son, his daughter, his messengers, and finally his own body — is turned against him. The narrative architecture is precise: Jonathan subverts the order through persuasion (verses 1-7), Michal subverts it through deception (verses 11-17), and God subverts it through overwhelming prophetic seizure (verses 18-24). The terafim scene in verse 13 is one of the most vivid domestic tableaux in the Hebrew Bible — Michal stuffs a household idol into David's bed with a goat-hair pillow, creating a decoy that buys David time to flee. The narrator neither condemns nor commends her possession of terafim; the idol simply serves the escape. The final scene, where Saul strips naked and lies prophesying before Samuel, is a deliberate inversion of his anointing in chapter 10. There, the Spirit clothed Saul with prophetic authority as he entered kingship; here, the same Spirit strips him bare as he chases the man who will replace him. The repeated question 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' (verse 24, echoing 10:11-12) now carries an entirely different valence — not wonder at Saul's elevation but shock at his humiliation.

Translation Friction: The terafim in verse 13 present an immediate translation challenge. The word refers to household idols or cultic figurines, yet Michal — David's wife, Saul's daughter — apparently keeps one in the house and it is large enough to simulate a human body in bed. The text shows no interest in condemning this; the narrator reports it without editorial comment, leaving translators to decide how much interpretive weight to place on the idol's presence. We render terafim as 'household idol' and note its significance without forcing a moral judgment the text itself does not make. The prophetic frenzy in verses 20-24 also presents difficulty: the verb hitnabbe (Hithpa'el of naba) can mean 'prophesied' in the sense of ecstatic behavior, not necessarily delivering intelligible oracles. Saul's naked prophesying looks more like involuntary divine seizure than voluntary worship. The phrase ruach Elohim ('Spirit of God') is used for both creative empowerment (as with the judges) and overwhelming compulsion (as here) — the same Spirit that once empowered Saul now immobilizes him. Translators must resist the temptation to sanitize this scene; the text intends the reader to see the king of Israel lying helpless and exposed.

Connections: The spear-throwing in verse 10 echoes the first attempt in 18:10-11 and will recur in 20:33 (aimed at Jonathan) — the spear becomes Saul's signature weapon of failed violence, always missing its target. Michal's window escape parallels Rahab lowering the spies through her window in Joshua 2:15 and anticipates Paul's basket escape in Acts 9:25 — each time, a person under death threat is saved through an opening in a wall. The terafim recall Rachel stealing Laban's household gods (Genesis 31:19, 34-35), another story where a woman uses deception involving idols to protect someone from a pursuing patriarch. The prophetic frenzy at Naioth connects to the band of prophets Saul encountered in 10:5-13 after his anointing. The stripping of Saul's garments prefigures David cutting the corner of Saul's robe in chapter 24 — in both cases, the loss of royal clothing symbolizes the transfer of kingdom authority. The phrase 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' forming a bookend with 10:12 creates an inclusio around Saul's decline: the same words mark both the beginning and the end of his credibility.

¹Saul told Jonathan his son and all his servants to put David to death. ²But Jonathan son of Saul was deeply devoted to David. Jonathan warned David, saying, "My father Saul is seeking to kill you. Be on your guard in the morning — stay in a hidden place and conceal yourself. ³I will go out and stand beside my father in the field where you are hiding, and I will speak to my father about you. Whatever I learn, I will tell you." ⁴Jonathan spoke well of David to Saul his father and said to him, "The king must not sin against his servant David, because he has not sinned against you — and because what he has done has been very good for you. ⁵He put his life in his hands and struck down the Philistine, and the LORD accomplished a great deliverance for all Israel. You saw it — you rejoiced! Why then would you sin against innocent blood by putting David to death for no reason?" ⁶Saul listened to Jonathan's voice, and Saul swore, "As the LORD lives, he will not be put to death." ⁷Jonathan called David and told him everything. Then Jonathan brought David to Saul, and David served in his presence as before. ⁸War broke out again, and David went out and fought the Philistines and struck them with a massive blow, and they fled before him. ⁹An evil spirit from the LORD came upon Saul while he was sitting in his house with his spear in his hand, and David was playing the lyre. ¹⁰Saul tried to pin David to the wall with the spear, but David pulled away from Saul's presence. The spear struck the wall, and David fled and escaped that night. ¹¹Saul sent agents to David's house to watch it and to kill him in the morning. But Michal, David's wife, warned him, saying, "If you do not save your life tonight, tomorrow you will be dead." ¹²Michal lowered David through the window, and he went out, fled, and escaped. ¹³Michal took the household idol and laid it in the bed. She placed a tangle of goat hair at its head and covered the whole thing with a garment. ¹⁴When Saul sent agents to seize David, she said, "He is ill." ¹⁵Saul sent the agents back to see David for themselves, saying, "Bring him to me in the bed itself, so I can kill him." ¹⁶The agents came in, and there in the bed was the household idol, with the goat-hair tangle at its head. ¹⁷Saul said to Michal, "Why have you deceived me like this and let my enemy go, so that he escaped?" Michal said to Saul, "He said to me, 'Let me go — why should I have to kill you?'" ¹⁸David fled and escaped and came to Samuel at Ramah. He told him everything Saul had done to him. Then he and Samuel went and stayed at Naioth. ¹⁹It was reported to Saul: "David is at Naioth in Ramah." ²⁰Saul sent agents to seize David. But when they saw the band of prophets prophesying with Samuel standing over them as their leader, the Spirit of God came upon Saul's agents, and they too fell into prophetic frenzy. ²¹When this was reported to Saul, he sent a second group of agents — and they too fell into prophetic frenzy. Saul sent yet a third group — and they too fell into prophetic frenzy. ²²Then Saul himself went to Ramah. He came to the great cistern at Secu and asked, "Where are Samuel and David?" Someone answered, "At Naioth in Ramah." ²³He went toward Naioth in Ramah, and the Spirit of God came upon even him. He walked along prophesying until he arrived at Naioth in Ramah. ²⁴He too stripped off his garments and prophesied before Samuel. He fell down and lay exposed all that day and all that night. This is why people say, "Is Saul also among the prophets?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb dibbēr ('spoke') with the infinitive lehamit ('to kill') presents the assassination order as casual royal speech — Saul issues the command as though it were ordinary court business. The verb hamit (Hiphil of mut) means 'to cause death,' the technical term for judicial or military execution. By addressing both Jonathan and 'all his servants,' Saul makes this a public decree, not a private conspiracy. The narrative tension is immediate: Jonathan, David's covenant brother (chapter 18:1-4), is the first person named as recipient of the kill order.
2. The phrase hishamer na babboqer ('take care in the morning') suggests that the danger will be most acute at daybreak, when Saul's agents would be dispatched. The word seter ('hidden place, secret spot') often refers to a place of divine shelter in the Psalms (Psalm 27:5; 31:20), though here it is a practical hiding location. Jonathan positions himself as the intermediary — he will test his father's mood and relay the outcome.
3. Jonathan's plan places him physically between David and Saul — he will stand 'beside his father' (leyad avi) in the same field where David hides. The spatial arrangement is a physical expression of his mediating role. The verb adabber bekha ('I will speak about you') uses the same verb (dibber) that Saul used in verse 1 when issuing the kill order. Jonathan will use speech to undo what Saul's speech commanded. The phrase ra'iti mah ('I will see what') indicates that Jonathan does not yet know whether his intervention will succeed — he is genuinely testing his father's resolve.
4. Jonathan addresses Saul as 'the king' (hammelekh) rather than 'my father,' adopting formal court language to give his plea institutional weight. The accusative construction al yecheta hammelekh be-David ('let the king not sin against David') treats the murder plot as a covenant violation by the king himself — a remarkably bold statement from son to father, from subject to sovereign.
5. The phrase dam naqi ('innocent blood') is a legal category in Deuteronomic law (Deuteronomy 19:10, 13; 21:8-9). Shedding innocent blood defiles the land and brings guilt upon the community. Jonathan is warning Saul that killing David would trigger the blood-guilt provisions of the covenant — the same provisions that protect against unjust execution. The verb techeta ('you would sin') makes Saul the subject of the sin for the third time in two verses, driving home Jonathan's point.
6. The oath formula chay YHWH ('as the LORD lives') is the most solemn oath available in Israelite culture — invoking God's own life as the guarantee. The passive im yumat ('he will not be killed') distances Saul from the killing while appearing to grant clemency. The narrator's terseness here — no inner thoughts, no qualifying clauses — allows the reader to wonder how sincere Saul's oath truly is. The verb shama ('listened') echoes Jonathan's role as persuader, but the oath's brevity contrasts sharply with Jonathan's lengthy argument, hinting that Saul's compliance may be shallow.
7. The phrase ke'etmol shilshom ('as yesterday and the day before') is a Hebrew idiom meaning 'as in former times' or 'as previously.' The repetition of Jonathan's name three times in a single verse — 'Jonathan called,' 'Jonathan told him,' 'Jonathan brought' — emphasizes that Jonathan is the active agent of reconciliation at every stage. The verb vayyhi lefanav ('he was before him') indicates David resumed his position as court musician and attendant. The restoration appears complete, but the reader already suspects it will not last.
8. The phrase vattosep hammilchamah lihyot ('the war continued to be') uses the verb yasaf ('to add, to do again') — war keeps returning as the background condition of Saul's reign. David's victory is described with makkah gedolah ('a great striking'), the same phrase used for decisive battlefield victories throughout the Deuteronomistic History. The irony is sharp: David's very success — the quality Jonathan cited to save his life — reignites Saul's jealousy. Each Philistine victory makes David more popular and Saul more threatened.
9. The narrator sets the scene with deliberate visual contrast: king and musician, spear and lyre, seated authority and kneeling servant. David was originally summoned to play music to soothe Saul's tormented spirit (16:14-23). The same remedy that once brought relief now provides proximity for murder. The phrase ruach ra'ah ('evil spirit') here likely means 'harmful spirit' or 'spirit of distress' rather than morally evil — the Hebrew ra'ah encompasses harm, disaster, and malice.
10. The verb vayevaquesh ('he sought') indicates intention rather than immediate action — Saul aimed to pin (lehakkot) David to the wall (baqqir), a verb that means to strike through and fasten. The image is of David impaled like a trophy. The verb vayyiptar ('he slipped away, pulled free') suggests David dodged at the last moment. The spear embedding in the wall — vayyakh et hachanit baqqir — is a vivid detail that emphasizes both Saul's violent force and his utter failure to hit his target. David's escape into the night (ballaylah hahu, 'that night') marks the beginning of his fugitive life. From this point forward, David will not safely return to Saul's court.

11. Saul sends mal'akhim ('messengers, agents') — the same word used for angels and divine messengers, here repurposed as instruments of assassination. The infinitives leshomro velahamiento ('to guard him and to kill him') reveal a two-stage plan: surveillance through the night, execution at dawn. Michal's warning — im einkha memallet et nafshekha hallaylah ('if you do not save your life tonight') — is blunt and urgent. The word mumat ('you are a dead man,' Hophal participle of mut) presents David's death as a certainty unless he acts immediately. Michal, Saul's own daughter, now becomes the third member of Saul's family to work against his plan to kill David.
12. The verb vattored ('she lowered') indicates that the house had an upper story or was built into a wall — Michal physically lowers David, suggesting he could not simply walk out the door because Saul's agents were watching the entrance. The triple verb sequence vayyēlekh vayyivrach vayyimmalet ('he went, he fled, he escaped') creates an accelerating rhythm of flight. Each verb intensifies the previous one: departure, then panicked running, then successful evasion. This window escape places Michal in the tradition of Rahab (Joshua 2:15), who also lowered men through a window to save them from a king's agents.
13. The terafim present several unresolved questions. Why does Michal have a human-sized idol in the house? Is this a Canaanite religious object, a decorative figure, or something with apotropaic (protective) function? The text offers no explanation and passes no judgment — it is simply a useful prop in an emergency. Rachel also possessed terafim (Genesis 31:19), and they appear in Judges 17:5 and 2 Kings 23:24 in contexts ranging from household religion to condemned idolatry. The narrator's silence here is deliberate: the story is about Michal's resourcefulness, not her theology.
13. The word kevir appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, making its precise meaning uncertain. The traditional rendering 'pillow of goat hair' is plausible — goat hair was used for weaving coarse fabrics (Exodus 35:26) and could simulate the appearance of human hair on a bed pillow. Whatever its exact form, the goat hair serves as a visual stand-in for David's head.
14. Michal's lie — choleh hu ('he is sick') — is a masterpiece of economy. Two words buy David critical hours of escape time. The agents apparently accept this without entering the house, suggesting that either Michal's status as the king's daughter gives her authority, or that illness was taken seriously enough to delay the arrest. The verb laqachat ('to take, seize') is the same verb used for taking prisoners or capturing — Saul's agents are not there for a conversation.
15. Saul's command ha'alu oto vammittah elai lahamito ('bring him up in the bed to me to kill him') reveals both his paranoia and his cruelty — he does not care if David is sick; he wants the bed carried to him with David in it. The phrase lahamito ('to kill him') is stated openly, not concealed. Saul has dropped all pretense. The irony is that when the agents finally approach the bed, they will find not David but a goat-hair-covered idol — the king's agents will carry an idol to the king.
16. The particle ve-hinne ('and look!') conveys the agents' shock at the discovery — the narrative camera enters the room with them and registers their surprise. The careful arrangement Michal constructed in verse 13 is now exposed. The narrator's repetition of the same elements — terafim, mittah, kevir ha'izzim — from the setup scene creates a moment of dark comedy: the feared warrior David has been replaced by a household idol wearing a goat-hair wig.
17. Saul's rage at Michal reveals his isolation: his son, his daughter, and his servants have all failed to carry out his orders. The phrase vateshalechi et oyvi ('you sent my enemy away') uses the Piel of shalach ('to send'), implying active assistance rather than passive negligence. Saul sees Michal as a co-conspirator. Michal's lie — claiming David threatened her — mirrors Rachel's deception of Laban in Genesis 31:35, where Rachel also lied to her father to protect stolen household objects. Both daughters deceive their fathers using domestic items and fabricated excuses.
18. David's flight to Samuel is theologically significant: the fugitive king-elect seeks refuge with the prophet who anointed him. The verb vayyagad ('he told') suggests a full account — David lays out the entire history of Saul's persecution. The location Naioth (navyot) is related to the word naveh ('dwelling, pasture') and may refer to a prophetic settlement or compound near Ramah where Samuel's school of prophets was based. The Targum renders it 'house of study.' David positions himself within the prophetic community — the very community that anointed him and that Saul cannot control.
19. The passive vayyuggad ('it was told') leaves the informant unnamed — Saul has a network of loyalists who track David's movements. The report is terse: hinneh David be-Nayot ba-Ramah ('David is at Naioth in Ramah'). The hinneh ('look, here') conveys urgency, as though the informant is presenting actionable intelligence. Saul now knows exactly where David is, and what follows will be a systematic attempt to extract him from prophetic sanctuary.
20. The phrase omed nitsav ('standing, stationed') uses two verbs of standing to emphasize Samuel's commanding presence. He is not merely present but presiding — the prophetic company operates under his authority. The ruach Elohim ('Spirit of God') in this context functions as a protective force: it does not inspire the agents to deliver oracles but incapacitates them for their original mission. The word gam hemmah ('they too, even they') emphasizes the surprise — Saul's own enforcement arm has been absorbed into the prophetic community.
21. The threefold repetition — three groups of agents, each neutralized by the Spirit — follows a folktale pattern common in Hebrew narrative (compare Elijah and the three captains in 2 Kings 1:9-14). The repetition serves both literary and theological purposes: it demonstrates that this is not a one-time fluke but a systematic divine blockade. The verb vayyosep ('he added, he did again') shows Saul's stubborn persistence — each failure only intensifies his determination. The phrase gam hemmah ('they too') tolls like a refrain, each repetition further humiliating Saul's authority. His agents, sent to capture a fugitive, become involuntary worshippers instead.
22. The phrase gam hu ('he himself, even he') signals the narrative climax — the king who sent wave after wave of agents now goes personally. The bor haggadol ('great cistern') at Secu serves as a geographic marker, locating Saul's journey on a specific route. That Saul must ask for directions — eifoh Shemu'el ve-David ('where are Samuel and David?') — is subtly humiliating: the king of Israel is wandering the countryside searching for a prophet and a fugitive. He names Samuel first, suggesting he views the prophet as the greater problem. The respondent's answer places both men at Naioth, where the Spirit has already defeated three groups of Saul's agents.

23. The verb vayyitnabbe (Hithpael of naba) describes involuntary ecstatic behavior, as in verses 20-21. The infinitive absolute construction halokh vayyitnabbe ('going along and prophesying') creates a picture of Saul stumbling forward in a prophetic trance, unable to arrest either his movement or his utterance. The narrative deliberately mirrors Saul's first prophetic experience in chapter 10, but with inverted meaning: there, the Spirit confirmed his kingship; here, it prevents him from exercising it.
24. The word arom is rendered 'exposed' rather than strictly 'naked' because the Hebrew term can indicate either full nudity or being stripped to a basic loincloth. In either case, the point is the same: the king has been reduced to a state incompatible with royal dignity. A king without his robes is a king without his authority — the garments are not merely clothing but signs of office.
24. The phrase lifnei Shemu'el ('before Samuel') is the chapter's final irony: Saul lies helpless at the feet of the very prophet who anointed him and who has already anointed his replacement. Samuel does not speak in this scene — he does not need to. The Spirit has said everything. The closing proverb — 'Is Saul also among the prophets?' — creates an inclusio with 10:11-12. In chapter 10 the question expressed astonishment that an unknown farmer could receive the Spirit; in chapter 19 it expresses astonishment that a reigning king could be reduced to a prophesying heap on the ground. Same words, opposite meanings — a literary device that encapsulates Saul's entire tragic arc.

Summary: David flees from Samuel's compound at Naioth and confronts Jonathan with a desperate question: why is your father trying to kill me? Jonathan cannot believe it. The two men devise a test — David will be absent from the New Moon feast, and Jonathan will gauge Saul's reaction. They renew their covenant, binding not only themselves but their descendants. At the feast, Saul's rage explodes against Jonathan for protecting David. Jonathan goes to the field, shoots the arrow signal, and the two friends embrace in grief before parting. David goes into permanent exile; Jonathan returns to the city.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter is the emotional center of the David-Jonathan narrative, and it is structured around three covenants that escalate in scope. In verse 8, Jonathan invokes the existing covenant (berit) between them. In verse 16, Jonathan cuts a new covenant with the house of David — extending the bond beyond two individuals to two dynasties. In verse 42, both men swear by the LORD that the covenant holds 'between my descendants and your descendants forever.' The chapter transforms personal friendship into a political-theological commitment that will outlast both men. The arrow signal (verses 20-22, 35-40) is an elaborate espionage device, but its narrative function is to create a moment where the two friends must communicate without words — the opposite of the direct, intimate speech that fills the rest of the chapter. The New Moon feast provides the setting, and Saul's escalating fury across three days reveals how deeply David's absence threatens the king's sense of control. Jonathan's loyalty is tested from both sides: his father demands filial obedience, his covenant partner demands faithfulness. He chooses covenant over bloodline.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 30 contains one of the most offensive insults in the Hebrew Bible: Saul calls Jonathan ben-na'avat ha-mardut, which KJV renders 'thou son of the perverse rebellious woman.' The phrase is difficult because na'avat is a rare form — possibly from 'avah ('to twist, pervert') with a feminine ending, meaning something like 'son of a twisted rebellious woman.' It attacks Jonathan's mother to shame Jonathan, a tactic with deep cultural force in the ancient Near East. We render it to preserve the maternal insult and the shame-rage dynamic without sanitizing or amplifying. In verse 3, David swears ki-khe-fesa' beynei uveyh ha-mavet ('there is barely a step between me and death') — the word pesa' ('step') is concrete and physical, measuring the gap between life and death as a single stride. In verse 30, Saul also accuses Jonathan of choosing David le-boshtekha u-le-boshet ervat immekha ('to your own shame and to the shame of your mother's nakedness'). The word ervah ('nakedness, exposure') suggests sexual dishonor; Saul is accusing Jonathan of a loyalty so perverse it shames his own mother's body. We translate with maximum clarity about what Saul is actually saying.*

Connections: *The Jonathan-David covenant echoes the covenant-cutting pattern established in Genesis 15 (God's covenant with Abraham) and Genesis 31:44-54 (Jacob and Laban). The phrase 'the LORD be between me and you' (verse 42) mirrors Genesis 31:49, the Mizpah benediction. Jonathan's request that David show chesed ('faithful love') to his house (verses 14-15) will be fulfilled in 2 Samuel 9, when David seeks out Jonathan's son Mephibosheth and* restores his grandfather's land. The New Moon feast (chodesh) connects to Numbers 28:11-15, where the first day of each month required special sacrifices — Saul's feast is a royal observance of this calendar marker. David's hiding at the stone Ezel (verse 19) will be echoed by his later fugitive movements in the Judean wilderness. Jonathan's arrow signal anticipates the coded communications that will characterize David's years on the run.

¹David fled from Naioth in Ramah and came to Jonathan. He said, "What have I done? What is my guilt? What is my offense against your father, that he is hunting my life?" ²Jonathan said to him, "Never! You will not die. My father does nothing — whether large or small — without uncovering it to my ear. Why would my father hide this from me? It is not true." ³David swore again and said, "Your father knows very well that I have found favor in your eyes, so he has said to himself, 'Jonathan must not know about this, or he will be devastated.' But as the LORD lives, and as your own life endures — there is barely a step between me and death." ⁴Jonathan said to David, "Whatever you want — I will do it for you." ⁵David said to Jonathan, "Tomorrow is the New Moon, and I am expected to sit with the king to eat. But let me go, and I will hide in the open country until the evening of the third day. ⁶If your father misses me at all, say: 'David urgently asked my permission to run to Bethlehem, his hometown, because the whole clan has a yearly sacrifice there.' ⁷If he says, 'Good' — then your servant is safe. But if he flares with anger, know that he has fully decided on harm." ⁸Show faithful love to your servant, because you brought your servant into a covenant of the LORD with you. But if there is guilt in me, kill me yourself — why would you hand me over to your father?" ⁹Jonathan said, "Never! If I learn for certain that my father has decided to bring harm against you, would I not tell you?" ¹⁰David said to Jonathan, "Who will tell me if your father answers you harshly?" ¹¹Jonathan said to David, "Come, let us go out to the open country." And the two of them went out to the open country. ¹²Jonathan said to David, "By the LORD, the God of Israel — when I have sounded out my father by this time tomorrow or the day after, if things look favorable for David and I do not send word to you and uncover it to your ear — ¹³— then may the LORD do thus to Jonathan and even more! But if my father intends harm against you, I will uncover it to your ear and send you away so you can go in safety. May the LORD be with you as he was with my father." ¹⁴"And if I am still alive — will you not show me the faithful love of the LORD, so that I do not die? ¹⁵And do not ever cut off your faithful love from my household — not even when the LORD has cut off every one of David's enemies from the face of the earth." ¹⁶So Jonathan cut a covenant with the house of David: "May the LORD call it to account from the hand of David's enemies." ¹⁷Jonathan again made David swear by his love for him, because he loved him as he loved his own life. ¹⁸Jonathan said to him, "Tomorrow is the New Moon, and you will be missed because your seat will be empty. ¹⁹On the third day go down quickly and come to the place where you hid on the day of the incident, and wait beside the stone Ezel. ²⁰I will shoot three arrows to the side, as if aiming at a target. ²¹Then I will send a boy, saying, 'Go, find the arrows.' If I say clearly to the boy, 'The arrows are on this side of you — pick them up,' then come out, because it is safe for you and there is nothing wrong, as the LORD lives. ²²But if I say to the young man, 'The arrows are beyond you' — then go, because the LORD has sent you away. ²³As for the matter we have spoken of, you and I — the LORD stands between me and you forever." ²⁴David hid in the open country. When the New Moon came, the king sat down at the meal to eat. ²⁵The king sat in his seat as usual — the seat by the wall. Jonathan stood, and Abner sat at Saul's side. But David's place was empty. ²⁶Saul said nothing that day, because he thought, "Something must have happened to him — he is not ritually pure. He must be unclean." ²⁷On the second day after the New Moon, David's place was still empty. Saul said to Jonathan his son, "Why has the son of Jesse not come to the meal, either yesterday or today?" ²⁸Jonathan answered Saul, "David urgently asked my permission to go to Bethlehem. ²⁹He said, 'Let me go, please, because our clan has a sacrifice in the city, and my brother has ordered me to be there. So now, if I have found favor in your eyes, let me slip away and see my brothers.' That is why he has not come to the king's table." ³⁰Saul's anger blazed against Jonathan. He said to him, "You son of a twisted, rebellious woman! Do I not know that you have chosen the son of Jesse — to your own shame and to the shame of your mother's nakedness? ³¹For as long as the son of Jesse is alive on this earth, neither you nor your kingdom will be established. Now send for him and bring him to me, because he is a dead man." ³²Jonathan answered Saul his father and said to him, "Why should he be put to death? What has he done?" ³³Saul hurled his spear at him to strike him down. Then Jonathan knew that his father was fully determined to kill David. ³⁴Jonathan rose from the table burning with anger. He did not eat any food on that second day of the New Moon, because he was grieved for David and because his father had humiliated him. ³⁵In the morning, Jonathan went out to the open country at the time appointed with David, and a small boy was with him. ³⁶He said to his boy, "Run — find the arrows I am about to shoot." The boy ran, and Jonathan shot an arrow past him. ³⁷When the boy reached the place where Jonathan's arrow had landed, Jonathan called out after the boy, "Isn't the arrow beyond you — farther out?" ³⁸Jonathan called after the boy, "Hurry! Be quick! Do not stop!" Jonathan's boy gathered the arrows and came back to his master. ³⁹The boy knew nothing at all. Only Jonathan and David knew what was happening. ⁴⁰Jonathan gave his weapons to the boy who served him and said, "Go, take these back to the city." ⁴¹As soon as the boy was gone, David rose from beside the south side and fell on his face to the ground. He bowed three times. Then they kissed each other and wept together, until David wept uncontrollably. ⁴²Jonathan said to David, "Go in safety. What the two of us have sworn in the name of the LORD stands firm: 'The LORD will be between me and you, and between my descendants and your descendants, forever.'" Then David got up and left, and Jonathan went back into the city.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

- David's three questions — meh asiti, meh avoni, u-meh chattati — escalate from general action ('what have I done?') to moral failing ('what is my guilt?') to covenant violation ('what is my offense?'). The word avon denotes guilt or iniquity in its moral weight, while chattat specifically means 'sin' in the sense of missing a mark or violating a standard. David is not merely asking what happened; he is insisting that he has violated no law, no moral code, and no covenant obligation.
- The verb mevaqesh ('he is seeking') paired with nafshi ('my life/soul') is a fixed Hebrew expression for intent to kill — Saul is not searching for David's presence but for his death. David has just fled from the prophetic protection at Naioth (19:18-24), where even Saul fell into prophetic ecstasy. That supernatural intervention has not changed Saul's underlying intent.
- Jonathan's opening word chalilah is an oath-like expression of strong denial — literally 'far be it' or 'profane the thought.' It carries the force of 'God forbid' without explicitly invoking the divine name. His certainty rests on his assumption that Saul shares everything with him: lo ya'aseh avi davar gadol o davar qatan ('my father does not do a thing great or small'). The idiom 'uncover the ear' (yigleh et ozni) means to reveal something privately — literally peeling back the covering over the ear to whisper a secret.
- Jonathan's confidence is genuine but mistaken. Saul has already attempted to kill David multiple times (18:10-11, 19:1, 19:10) and explicitly ordered Jonathan himself to kill David (19:1). Jonathan successfully intervened once (19:4-6), but Saul's subsequent attempts show that the king's intent has not changed. Jonathan's denial reflects the impossible position of a son who loves both his father and his friend.
- The double oath formula chai YHWH ve-chey nafshekha ('as the LORD lives and as your soul/life lives') is the strongest available assurance — David swears by God and by Jonathan himself. This formula appears repeatedly in the David narratives and always marks a moment of utmost seriousness.
- The word pesa ('step') appears only here and in a handful of other passages. Its concreteness is the point: David is not speaking metaphorically about danger. He is saying that death is literally one step away. The vivid physicality of the image — a single human stride — makes the abstract threat immediate and bodily.
- Jonathan's response is total commitment compressed into a single sentence. The phrase mah tomar nafshekha ('what does your soul say?') asks not merely for David's wish but for the deepest expression of his inner being — nafesh here means the whole person, not just desire. Jonathan's ve-e'eseh-lakh ('and I will do it for you') is an unconditional pledge with no qualifications. This is the turning point where Jonathan stops defending his father and begins acting as David's ally.
- The phrase hinneh chodesh machar ('tomorrow is the New Moon') establishes the calendar setting. The chodesh was the first day of the lunar month, marked by special sacrifices (Numbers 28:11-15) and communal feasting. The royal household observed it as a formal banquet where assigned seats mattered — absence would be noticed and interpreted.
- David's plan involves three days of absence. The phrase ad ha-erev ha-shelishit ('until the evening of the third day') gives the test a defined timeframe. David will hide ba-sadeh ('in the field/open country') — the same word used for the place where Cain killed Abel (Genesis 4:8) and where Esau hunted (Genesis 25:27). The sadeh is the space outside the city, beyond the reach of walls and social order.
- The phrase paqod yifqedeni ('he will surely miss/notice me') uses the infinitive absolute of paqad — a verb meaning 'to attend to, visit, notice, muster.' Saul will not merely notice David's absence; he will actively register it as significant. David's cover story involves a zebach ha-yamim ('sacrifice of the days,' meaning annual sacrifice) for his entire mishpachah ('clan, extended family') at Bethlehem. This is plausible — clan sacrifices were real events — but it is a deliberate deception. The text does not moralize about the lie; it presents it as survival strategy.
- The verb laruts ('to run') rather than lalekhet ('to walk/go') conveys urgency — David's story is that the summons from Bethlehem was pressing enough to override his royal obligation.
- The test is binary. If Saul says tov ('good'), then shalom le-avdekha ('peace to your servant') — David is safe. But if charoh yechareh lo ('he burns with burning,' another infinitive absolute construction for emphasis), then kaletah ha-ra'ah me'immo ('the evil is completed/determined from him'). The verb kaletah comes from kalah, meaning 'to be complete, to be finished, to be determined' — the evil is not a passing mood but a settled resolution.

David is asking Jonathan to read Saul's reaction as a diagnostic of fixed intent versus temporary suspicion.

8. The word chesed is the chapter's theological anchor. It denotes the faithful, loyal love that covenant partners owe each other — not as sentiment but as binding obligation. When David says 'show chesed,' he is calling in a covenantal debt, not asking for a favor. The prepositional phrase al avdekha ('upon your servant') positions David as the vulnerable party who is owed protection.
8. The phrase berit YHWH ('covenant of the LORD') elevates the Jonathan-David covenant above a personal agreement. God is the witness and guarantor. David's willingness to die at Jonathan's hand rather than Saul's is both a test of loyalty and a theological statement: covenant justice is preferable to royal caprice.
9. Jonathan's chalah lakh ('far be it from you') mirrors his earlier chalah in verse 2, but this time it carries a different force. In verse 2 he denied that Saul intended evil; here he promises that if evil is confirmed, he will not withhold the information. Jonathan is shifting from denial to readiness — he is beginning to accept the possibility that David may be right.
9. The rhetorical question ve-lo otah aggid lakh ('would I not tell it to you?') expects a strong affirmative. Jonathan is binding himself to transparency. The verb nagad ('to declare, tell, report') is the standard term for official communication in covenant contexts.
10. David's question is practical and urgent: mi yaggid li ('who will report to me?'). Even if Jonathan learns the truth, the intelligence must reach David in the field. The word qashah ('harshly, roughly') describes a severe or hard response — David anticipates that Saul's reaction might be violent enough that Jonathan himself could be in danger and unable to deliver the message. This prompts the arrow-signal plan in the verses that follow.
11. The move to the sadeh ('field, open country') takes the conversation out of earshot — away from the royal compound where walls have ears. The narrator's repetition of ha-sadeh twice in one verse emphasizes the shift of setting. The phrase shenehem ('the two of them') highlights their solidarity; they move as a pair into the exposed landscape where their private covenant talk can happen without surveillance.
12. Jonathan begins a formal oath invoking YHWH Elohei Yisra'el ('the LORD, the God of Israel') — the full covenantal title. The verb echqor ('I will sound out, investigate') comes from chaqar, meaning to search deeply, to probe, to investigate thoroughly. Jonathan is promising a genuine intelligence operation, not a casual observation. The phrase galiti et oznekha ('I will uncover your ear') repeats the idiom from verse 2 — the same intimacy Jonathan assumed his father showed him, he now promises to show David.
13. The self-curse formula is deliberately vague — koh ('thus') gestures toward an unspecified punishment too terrible to name. The phrase ve-koh yosif ('and may he add more') intensifies the curse beyond the unnamed first portion. This is the most solemn form of oath available.
13. Jonathan's blessing — 'may the LORD be with you as he was with my father' — is the chapter's most politically loaded sentence. It implicitly acknowledges that God's presence has departed from Saul and now rests on David. Jonathan the crown prince is pronouncing a transfer of divine legitimacy to the man who will replace his father on the throne. The word ka'asher ('as, in the same way') draws a direct equivalence between Saul's early anointing and David's current calling.
14. The syntax of this verse is difficult in Hebrew, with the negative particles creating a tangled conditional. Jonathan is asking David to extend chesed YHWH ('the faithful love of the LORD') to him — not ordinary kindness but the kind of loyal protection that God himself shows to covenant partners. The phrase ve-lo amut ('so that I do not die') reveals Jonathan's awareness that when David becomes king, Jonathan's life will be in danger. Ancient Near Eastern succession typically involved killing all potential rival claimants. Jonathan is asking David to break that pattern.
15. The scope of Jonathan's request is remarkable. He is not asking for a temporary favor but for a permanent policy: ad olam ('forever, to perpetuity'). The mention of 'cutting off enemies from the face of the earth' uses the language of total military victory — the same vocabulary applied to God's destruction of the wicked (Genesis 6-7). Jonathan foresees a world in which David has won completely and every rival is gone. In that world, only David's chesed will stand between Jonathan's family and annihilation.
15. This verse will be directly fulfilled in 2 Samuel 9, when David actively seeks out Jonathan's surviving son Mephibosheth and restores the house of Saul's land to him, declaring 'I will surely show you chesed for Jonathan your father's sake.'
16. The phrase 'cut a covenant with the house of David' is extraordinary because at this point David has no house — he is a fugitive. Jonathan is covenanting with a dynasty that exists only in prophetic anticipation. The language mirrors the Davidic covenant that God will establish in 2 Samuel 7, where YHWH promises to build David a 'house' (dynasty). Jonathan's covenant thus runs parallel to God's own future commitment.
16. The verb biqqesh ('to seek, to require, to call to account') when applied to God means divine reckoning. God will demand an accounting from anyone who breaks this covenant — the enforcement mechanism is not human justice but divine judgment.
17. The verse is saturated with the language of love: be-ahavato oto ('by his love for him') and ki ahavat nafsho ahevo ('because the love of his own life/soul he loved him'). The word ahavah ('love') appears in both its noun and verb forms. The phrase ahavat nafsho ('the love of his soul/life') means Jonathan loved David with the same intensity that a person loves their own existence — this is total identification, not merely affection. The verb lehashbia ('to make swear') means Jonathan administered an oath to David, binding David to the same covenantal commitments. The love is the motive; the oath is the binding mechanism.
18. Jonathan confirms the plan's timing: machar chodesh ('tomorrow is the New Moon'). The verb nifqadta ('you will be missed/noticed') is the Niphal (passive) form of paqad — David will be attended to, his absence will be registered. The phrase ki yippaqed moshavekha ('because your seat will be noticed empty') makes clear that the royal New Moon feast had assigned seating. David's empty chair will be a visible, conspicuous absence that demands explanation.

19. The phrase ve-shilashta tered me'od ('on the third day descend greatly/quickly') uses the verb shillesh ('to do on the third day') and me'od ('very, exceedingly') as an adverb of speed — Jonathan wants David to move fast. The reference to 'the day of the incident' (yom ha-ma'aseh) points to a previous meeting at this location, likely the events of chapter 19. The stone Ezel (ha-even ha-azel) may mean 'the stone of departure' or 'the stone that goes' — from the root azal ('to go away, to depart'). The name is fitting for a landmark that will mark David's permanent departure from Saul's court.
20. Jonathan introduces the arrow signal. The phrase sheloshet ha-chitsim ('three arrows') and the verb oreh ('I will shoot') set up the coded communication system. The word tsiddah ('to the side') indicates direction, and le-mattarah ('at a target') provides the cover story — Jonathan will appear to be practicing archery. The entire plan is an intelligence operation disguised as a routine training exercise.
21. The na'ar ('boy, attendant, servant') is an unwitting participant — he will not know he is carrying a coded message. The key signal for safety: ha-chitsim mimmekha va-hennah ('the arrows are on this side of you and toward here') — meaning the arrows fell short, close by. If the arrows are nearby, David can come out safely. Jonathan seals this with chai YHWH ('as the LORD lives'), the same oath formula David used in verse 3.
22. The danger signal: ha-chitsim mimmekha va-hal'ah ('the arrows are beyond you and farther') — meaning the arrows overshot, far away. The command lekh ('go!') doubles as both instruction to the boy and a warning to David. Most strikingly, Jonathan frames David's flight as divine action: ki shillachakha YHWH ('because the LORD has sent you away'). David's departure is not merely an escape from Saul; it is a divine commission. The verb shillach with God as subject carries the weight of prophetic sending.
23. Jonathan closes the oath with the definitive covenant formula: hinneh YHWH beyni u-veynekha ad olam ('the LORD is between me and you forever'). The preposition beyn ('between') positions God as the mediator, witness, and enforcer standing in the space between the two covenant partners. The phrase ad olam ('forever, to perpetuity') removes any time limit. This covenant does not expire when circumstances change, when one party gains power, or when the other dies. It is permanent because its guarantor is permanent.
24. The narrative shifts from dialogue to action: vayyissater David ba-sadeh ('and David hid himself in the field'). The verb nistar (Niphal of satar, 'to hide') conveys deliberate concealment. The scene then cuts to the royal feast: vayyeshev ha-melekh el ha-lechem le-ekhol ('and the king sat down at the bread/food to eat'). The word lechem means both 'bread' and 'food' more generally — this is the formal New Moon banquet, not a casual meal.
25. The seating arrangement reveals court hierarchy: Saul takes the seat by the wall (moshav ha-qir) — the protected position with his back guarded. Abner, the army commander, sits at Saul's side (mi-tsad Sha'ul). The phrase vayyaqom Yehonatan ('and Jonathan arose/stood') is puzzling — some read it as Jonathan standing to yield the seat beside Saul to Abner, others as Jonathan taking a different position. The Greek (LXX) reads 'Jonathan sat opposite' rather than 'arose.' The critical detail is the final clause: vayyipaqed meqom David ('and David's place was noticed empty'). The verb paqad appears again — the empty seat registers as a presence through its very absence.
26. Saul's internal reasoning (ki amar, 'because he said [to himself]') provides a plausible explanation for David's absence: miqreh hu ('it is an accident/occurrence') — something unexpected happened, and bilti tahor hu ki lo tahor ('he is not pure, for he is not clean'). The word tahor ('pure, clean') refers to ritual purity required for participation in sacred meals. Contact with a corpse, bodily discharge, or other sources of impurity (Leviticus 11-15) would disqualify someone from eating the sacrificial food. The repetition — bilti tahor... ki lo tahor — suggests Saul is convincing himself. On day one, he accepts the innocuous explanation.
27. The second day shatters Saul's ritual-purity theory — most impurities lasted only until evening (Leviticus 15:5-8), so a two-day absence demands a different explanation. Saul's question uses the patronymic ben Yishai ('son of Jesse') rather than David's name — a distancing gesture that reduces David to his family origin and strips him of the personal identity Saul once honored. The phrase gam temol gam ha-yom ('both yesterday and today') emphasizes the pattern: this is no accident.
28. Jonathan deploys the cover story exactly as David scripted it in verse 6. The infinitive absolute nish'ol nish'al ('he urgently asked, he emphatically requested') mirrors David's original phrasing precisely. The phrase me'immedi ('from me, from my presence') positions Jonathan as the authority who granted the leave — a subtle assertion of his own standing in the court hierarchy.
29. Jonathan embellishes David's script slightly — adding the detail that David's brother (achi) commanded his presence, which strengthens the cover story by making it about family obligation, not personal choice. The verb immaltah ('let me slip away, let me escape') is telling — it comes from malat, which means 'to escape, to deliver oneself.' Even in the fabricated speech, the vocabulary of flight bleeds through. The phrase shulchan ha-melekh ('the king's table') names the specific obligation David has violated: the royal table carries political and social weight far beyond a meal.
30. The maternal insult is culturally devastating. In the honor-shame matrix of the ancient Near East, attacking a man's mother was the deepest form of personal assault. The phrase strikes at Jonathan's identity, legitimacy, and family loyalty simultaneously. Saul is not merely angry; he is attempting to shame Jonathan into breaking the covenant with David.
30. The word boshet ('shame') will later be used as a substitute for 'Baal' in Israelite names (Ish-bosheth for Ish-baal in 2 Samuel 2:8). Its appearance here in connection with ervah ('nakedness') creates a cluster of shame-vocabulary that reveals Saul's view of Jonathan's choice: it is not merely politically wrong but morally obscene.
31. Saul names the political reality that drives his rage: lo tikkon attah u-malkhutekha ('you will not be established — you or your kingship'). The verb tikkon (from kun, 'to be firm, established, secure') is the same word used in God's promise to establish David's throne forever (2 Samuel 7:16). Saul perceives that David's survival means the end of his dynasty. The phrase ben mavet hu ('he is a son of death') is an idiom meaning 'he deserves to die' or 'he is marked for death' — it is a death sentence pronounced by the king.

- 31. Saul again uses ben Yishai ('son of Jesse') rather than David's name, three times in this exchange (verses 27, 30, 31). The patronymic is deliberate: Saul reduces David to his father's son, stripping him of the name and identity that Israel has come to honor.
- 32. Jonathan's response echoes David's own words from verse 1 — meḥ asah ('what has he done?') mirrors David's meḥ asiti ('what have I done?'). The verb yumat ('he shall be put to death') is the Hophal (causative passive) of mut — it refers to judicial execution, not casual killing. Jonathan is demanding legal grounds for a death sentence. By asking lammah ('why?'), Jonathan challenges his father to provide evidence that would justify execution under Israelite law. It is a brave and dangerous question to ask a king in a rage.
- 33. Saul answers Jonathan's legal question with a spear. The verb vayyatel ('he hurled') describes a violent throw — the same action Saul directed at David twice before (18:11, 19:10). Now he turns the weapon on his own son. The spear (chanit) is Saul's characteristic weapon throughout 1 Samuel, functioning almost as an extension of his disordered will. The clause vayyeda' Yehonatan ki khalah hi me'im aviv le-hamit et David ('and Jonathan knew that it was a completed thing from his father to kill David') uses the same word kaletah ('completed, determined') from verse 7 — the very word David predicted. Jonathan now has his answer: the test is over. The 'completed' evil David feared has been confirmed by the spear that nearly killed Jonathan himself.
- 34. Jonathan's departure from the table ba-chori af ('in burning anger') mirrors Saul's anger in verse 30 — father and son now share the same emotional intensity but directed in opposite directions. Jonathan's refusal to eat (lo akhal lechem) echoes Hannah's grief in 1:7 — not eating is the body's expression of grief too deep for words. The narrator provides two reasons: ki ne'etsav el David ('because he was grieved for David') and ki hikhlimo aviv ('because his father had shamed him'). The verb ne'etsav (from atsav, 'to grieve, to be pained') is the same word David used in verse 3 when predicting Jonathan would be devastated. The verb hikhlimo ('he had shamed/humiliated him') comes from kalam, meaning to wound through public disgrace.
- 35. The phrase le-mo'ed David ('at the appointed time of David') uses mo'ed — the same word used for the appointed festivals and the Tabernacle ('tent of meeting'). The scheduled rendezvous carries the weight of a sacred appointment. The na'ar qaton ('small boy') is deliberately chosen — young enough to be unaware of the signal's meaning. Jonathan has engineered the communication so that only he and David understand what is happening.
- 36. The boy runs first, then Jonathan shoots — the arrow flies over the running boy and lands beyond him. The verb le-ha'aviro ('to make it pass beyond him') uses the Hiphil (causative) of avar, meaning Jonathan deliberately overshot. The signal is being transmitted: the arrow beyond means danger. The word chets (singular 'arrow') appears here though three arrows were mentioned in verse 20 — the singular may indicate the signal arrow that carries the coded message.
- 37. Jonathan delivers the danger signal: halo ha-chetsi mimmekha va-hal'ah ('is not the arrow beyond you and farther?'). These are the exact words from the prearranged code in verse 22. The boy hears an instruction about archery; David, hiding nearby, hears a death sentence confirmed. The double meaning is the chapter's most dramatic moment of dramatic irony — the same words carry two completely different messages depending on who is listening.
- 38. Jonathan adds urgency beyond the prearranged signal: meherah chushah al ta'amod ('hurry, be quick, do not stand still'). Three rapid commands — each one escalating the pace. These words serve double duty: they move the boy along so he does not linger near David's hiding place, and they communicate to David that the danger is immediate and flight must be swift. The boy gathers the arrows (ha-chitsim, plural — returning to the three arrows of verse 20) and returns to Jonathan with no awareness of what he has just participated in.
- 39. The narrator makes the dramatic irony explicit: ve-ha-na'ar lo yada' me'umah ('and the boy did not know anything'). The word me'umah ('anything, at all') is emphatic — the boy's ignorance is total. The contrast is sharp: akh Yehonatan ve-David yade'u et ha-davar ('only Jonathan and David knew the matter'). The verb yada' ('to know') connects to the chapter's opening, where Jonathan insisted he would know if Saul intended evil (verse 2). Now knowledge has been confirmed, transmitted, and received — and a boy who carried the message remains completely in the dark.
- 40. Jonathan hands over his kelav ('his equipment, his weapons') — the bow and arrows that served as the signal apparatus. The verb lekh havi ha-'ir ('go, bring them to the city') dismisses the boy and creates the privacy needed for what comes next. By surrendering his weapons, Jonathan is also symbolically disarming himself — he enters the farewell unarmed, vulnerable, stripped of the tools of the signal plan that has now served its purpose.
- 41. The phrase ad David higdil is ambiguous — it could mean 'until David wept more' or 'until David could take no more.' Most interpreters read it as David's grief exceeding Jonathan's in intensity. The verb gadal ('to be great, to grow') in the Hiphil means 'to make great, to exceed.' David, the one being sent into exile, grieves more than Jonathan, the one returning to the palace. This asymmetry reflects their different futures: Jonathan goes back to a doomed dynasty; David goes forward into suffering that will eventually become kingship.
- 41. The combination of formal prostration followed by mutual kissing and weeping moves from protocol to raw emotion. The three bows acknowledge Jonathan's rank and sacrifice; the tears acknowledge the human cost of what is happening.
- 42. The covenant formula in this verse is the chapter's theological climax. It mirrors Genesis 31:49 (the Mizpah benediction between Jacob and Laban: 'the LORD watch between me and you') but exceeds it by including descendants. This is a dynastic covenant — not merely a pact between two friends but a permanent treaty between two houses, guaranteed by the divine name.
- 42. The final narrative detail — 'David got up and left, and Jonathan went into the city' — is devastating in its simplicity. No further speech, no lingering. The two men go in opposite directions. David will spend the next decade as a fugitive; Jonathan will die with his father on Mount Gilboa (1 Samuel 31:2). They will never see each other again. The covenant they sealed in this chapter will be fulfilled posthumously when David shows chesed to Jonathan's son Mephibosheth (2 Samuel 9).

Summary: David, newly fugitive from Saul's court, arrives at the priestly city of Nob alone and desperate. He deceives the priest Ahimelech to obtain consecrated bread and Goliath's sword, is spotted by Saul's chief herdsman Doeg the Edomite, then flees south to the Philistine city of Gath — where he must feign madness to escape King Achish alive.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is a masterclass in desperation theology. David, the anointed king-in-waiting, is reduced to lying to a priest, eating bread reserved for God's table, and scratching at door frames while drool runs down his beard. The text makes no effort to sanitize him. Yet Jesus himself reaches back to this chapter in Matthew 12:3-4 and Mark 2:25-26, citing David's eating of the bread of the Presence as a precedent for human need overriding ceremonial regulation — making this one of the few Old Testament narratives that Jesus explicitly interprets. The showbread episode also sets a trap: Doeg the Edomite witnesses everything at Nob, and his silent presence in verse 8 is a ticking bomb that will detonate in chapter 22 with the massacre of an entire priestly city. The chapter's architecture moves David through three stages of descent — from priest's sanctuary to enemy armory to madman's disguise — each one stripping away another layer of dignity from the man God chose.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew versification of this chapter differs from the English. WLC verse 1 corresponds to the end of KJV 20:42 or stands as a separate transitional verse; WLC verses 2-16 map to KJV 21:1-15. We follow the WLC versification as primary. The word lechem ha-panim ('bread of the Presence,' literally 'bread of the face') in verse 7 is theologically loaded — it is bread that exists 'before the face' of God, not merely decorative temple furniture. Rendering it as 'showbread' (following the KJV tradition) would obscure the relational theology embedded in the term: this bread symbolizes the perpetual covenant between God and Israel, set before God's presence. We render it as 'bread of the Presence' and explain the Hebrew construction in the notes. David's feigned madness before Achish (verses 14-16) uses the verb shinnah ('he changed, disguised'), the same root as the superscription of Psalm 34, which tradition links to this episode — though Psalm 34's heading names 'Abimelech' rather than Achish, a discrepancy scholars have long debated.

Connections: Jesus' citation of this episode in Matthew 12:3-4 and Mark 2:25-26 makes this chapter a hinge between Testaments — the principle that covenant mercy outweighs ceremonial restriction becomes a cornerstone of New Testament ethics. The bread of the Presence itself connects backward to Leviticus 24:5-9, where its weekly preparation is prescribed, and forward to the Last Supper tradition, where Jesus identifies bread with his own body. Goliath's sword reappearing here (verse 10) creates a narrative loop with 1 Samuel 17 — the weapon David refused to use is now the only weapon available to him in his flight from Israel's king. Doeg the Edomite, silently watching in verse 8, connects forward to the slaughter at Nob (22:18-19) and backward to the Edomite-Israelite tension that runs from Genesis 25 through Obadiah. David's madness performance before Achish connects to the Psalm 34 superscription and to the broader wisdom tradition's interest in the boundary between wisdom and folly — David survives by becoming what the wise despise.

¹David rose and left, and Jonathan went back into the city. ²David came to Nob, to Ahimelech the priest. Ahimelech came out trembling to meet David and said to him, "Why are you alone? Why is no one with you?" ³David said to Ahimelech the priest, "The king has charged me with a matter and told me, 'No one is to know anything about the mission I am sending you on or what I have ordered you to do.' As for my men, I have directed them to meet me at a certain place." ⁴Now then, what do you have on hand? Give me five loaves of bread — or whatever you can find." ⁵The priest answered David, "There is no ordinary bread on hand — only consecrated bread, if your men have kept themselves from women." ⁶David answered the priest, "Women have certainly been kept from us for the past three days. Whenever I set out, my men's bodies are consecrated — even on an ordinary mission. How much more so today, when the bread will be made holy by being carried in their packs?" ⁷So the priest gave him consecrated bread, because there was no bread there except the bread of the Presence — the loaves that had been removed from before the LORD and replaced with warm bread on the day they were taken away.

⁸Now a man from Saul's servants was there that day, detained before the LORD — his name was Doeg the Edomite, the chief of Saul's herdsmen. ⁹David said to Ahimelech, "Is there a spear or a sword here that you could give me? I did not bring my own sword or any of my weapons, because the king's mission was urgent." ¹⁰The priest said, "The sword of Goliath the Philistine, whom you struck down in the Valley of Elah — it is here, wrapped in a cloth behind the ephod. If you want to take it, take it, because there is no other weapon here besides it." David said, "There is nothing like it. Give it to me." ¹¹David set out and fled that day from Saul, and he went to Achish, king of Gath. ¹²The servants of Achish said to him, "Is this not David, the king of the land? Is this not the one they sang about in their dances: 'Saul has struck down his thousands, and David his ten-thousands'?" ¹³David took these words to heart and became very afraid of Achish, king of Gath. ¹⁴He disguised his behavior in their presence and acted like a madman while in their custody — scratching on the doors of the gate and letting his saliva run down into his beard. ¹⁵Achish said to his servants, "Look — you can see the man is out of his mind. Why did you bring him to me? ¹⁶Am I so short of madmen that you had to bring this one to rave in front of me? Should this man be allowed into my house?"

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. This transitional verse completes the farewell scene of chapter 20. The WLC places it as 21:1, while English Bibles typically attach it to 20:42 or number it differently. The stark brevity — two clauses, two men moving in opposite directions — captures the finality of the parting. The verb vayyaqom vayyeilakh ('he rose and went') is the standard departure formula, but its placement between the weeping embrace of 20:41 and David's arrival at Nob makes the silence between these movements deafening. Jonathan returns to the city (ha-ir, likely Gibeah, Saul's capital); David walks into the wilderness. Their paths will rarely cross again.
2. The verb vayyecherad ('he trembled') signals genuine fear, not mere surprise. The root charad describes the shaking response to something alarming — a priest trembling at the sight of David tells the reader something is already wrong. Nob was a priestly settlement near Jerusalem (Isaiah 10:32), apparently where the tabernacle and its priests had relocated after the destruction of Shiloh. Ahimelech's two questions — 'why are you alone?' and 'why is no one with you?' — are not redundant; the first asks why he lacks his military retinue, the second why he has no companion at all. A man of David's rank traveling utterly alone was deeply irregular and immediately suspicious.
3. David's lie is carefully constructed — he claims royal authority (ha-melekh tsivvani, 'the king commanded me') to explain both his secrecy and his lack of escort. The phrase peloni almoni ('a certain place,' literally 'such-and-such, so-and-so') is a Hebrew idiom for an unnamed or deliberately concealed location. It appears only here and in Ruth 4:1 and 2 Kings 6:8, always when the specific identity is being suppressed. David uses it to create the impression of a covert royal mission. The irony is bitter: the king has indeed sent David away, but to die, not on a mission. David's deception of the priest will have catastrophic consequences — Ahimelech's innocent cooperation will become the pretext for the massacre of Nob in chapter 22.
4. The phrase tachat yadkha ('under your hand') is an idiom meaning 'in your possession, available to you.' David asks specifically for five loaves (chamisha lechem), a modest amount suggesting he either has a small group to feed or is simply desperate and asking for what seems reasonable. The phrase o ha-nimtsa ('or whatever is found') reveals the urgency — David will take anything. He is not negotiating; he is begging. The number five may echo the five smooth stones David selected against Goliath (17:40), though the text does not make this connection explicit.
5. Ahimelech draws a sharp distinction between lechem chol ('ordinary bread,' literally 'profane bread') and lechem qodesh ('holy bread, consecrated bread'). The word chol is the opposite of qodesh — it describes what belongs to the common, everyday realm rather than the sacred. The priest's condition — im nishmeru ha-ne'arim akh me-ishah ('if the young men have kept themselves from women') — reflects the purity requirement of Leviticus 15:18, where sexual contact renders a person ritually unclean until evening. The priest is not making a moral judgment but a cultic one: contact with the holy requires ritual purity. This exchange becomes theologically significant when Jesus cites it to argue that human need creates a legitimate exception to ceremonial law (Matthew 12:3-4).
6. This verse is notoriously difficult to translate with certainty. The phrase derekh chol ('an ordinary way/mission') contrasts with the consecrated status David claims for his men. The argument seems to be: even on routine missions we observe purity disciplines, so a fortiori (kal va-chomer) we are pure enough for holy bread on this special mission. David may be lying about everything — his mission, his men, their purity status — but his ritual argument is technically sound, which is what makes the deception so effective.
6. The word kelei-ha-ne'arim ('the young men's vessels') likely serves as a euphemism for their bodies, as kelei functions elsewhere as a euphemism for male genitalia (1 Samuel 9:7, Isaiah 32:7 in some readings). David is assuring Ahimelech that his men are ritually clean in the specific sense the priest's question required.
7. The verb lasum ('to place, to set') describes the replacement of old bread with fresh loaves, confirming this took place on or near the Sabbath. The phrase lechem chom ('warm bread,' literally 'hot bread') suggests the replacement loaves were freshly baked, possibly that same morning. The entire transaction — holy bread given to a fugitive based on a lie — will be reinterpreted by Jesus not as David's sin but as God's provision, a reading that privileges mercy over ceremonial precision.

7. The construction ha-musarim millifnei YHWH ('removed from before the LORD') uses the Hophal participle of sur ('to turn aside, remove'), indicating the bread was formally taken away from the divine Presence. The preposition millifnei ('from before the face of') reinforces the spatial theology: this bread occupied the place directly before God and has now been handed to a hungry, desperate, lying fugitive.
8. This verse is a narrative time bomb. The phrase ne'etsar lifnei YHWH ('detained before the LORD') indicates Doeg was at the sanctuary under some form of ritual obligation — perhaps fulfilling a vow, undergoing purification, or observing a required period of worship. The irony is layered: Doeg is 'before the LORD' at the same moment David receives holy bread, and his presence will lead directly to the massacre of the priests who served before the LORD. The term abbir ha-ro'im ('chief of the herdsmen') uses abbir, which can mean 'mighty one, champion, chief' — the same word used for 'the Mighty One of Jacob' in Genesis 49:24. Applied to a herdsman, it likely means 'head herdsman' or 'foreman,' but the narrator may intend a subtle ironic elevation: this 'mighty one' among shepherds will prove to be a butcher of priests.
8. Doeg's identification as ha-adomi ('the Edomite') marks him as a foreigner in Saul's service. The Edomites, descendants of Esau (Genesis 36), had a fraught relationship with Israel. His foreign status may explain his willingness to do what Saul's Israelite servants refused to do in 22:17 — strike down the priests of the LORD.
9. David extends his deception — now claiming the king's mission was so urgent (nachuts, from the root chuts meaning 'to press, to hasten') that he left without weapons. The request for weapons from a priest would be unusual but not impossible, since sanctuaries sometimes housed war trophies and dedicated objects. The phrase gam-charbi ve-gam-kelai ('both my sword and my equipment') uses gam...gam ('both...and') to emphasize that he has absolutely nothing — no primary weapon, no backup, no gear at all. David the warrior-hero is completely unarmed. The stated reason — the king's urgency — adds another layer of bitter irony: the king indeed created this urgency, but by trying to pin David to the wall with a spear (18:11, 19:10), not by assigning him a mission.
10. The narrative creates a powerful loop: the sword David took from Goliath after defeating him with a sling and a stone (17:51) has been stored as a trophy at the sanctuary, wrapped in a simlah ('garment, cloth') behind the ephod — the priestly vestment used for inquiring of God. The weapon of Israel's greatest military victory rests behind the instrument of divine consultation. Now the hero who won that sword must reclaim it as a fugitive. David's response — ein kamoha ('there is none like it') — can be read as both practical assessment and emotional recognition. This is the sword that made him famous, the sword that proved God's power over Philistine might. Taking it now, while running from the king whose throne he saved, carries enormous ironic weight.
10. The verb lutah ('wrapped') from the root lut ('to wrap, to cover') indicates the sword was carefully preserved, not carelessly stored. The location acharei ha-efod ('behind the ephod') places it in the sacred precinct of the sanctuary, likely in a storage area near the priestly garments and instruments of worship.
11. The verb vayyivrach ('he fled') is blunt — the narrator does not soften David's flight. The man who once ran toward Goliath now runs from Saul to the Philistine city of Gath — Goliath's own hometown (17:4). David flees from Israel's king to the capital of Israel's enemy, carrying the sword of the champion he killed there. The situational irony could not be thicker. Achish (akhish) is likely the Philistine royal title or name attested in Egyptian sources as 'Ikausu' or similar. The Septuagint calls him 'Anchus.' Gath was one of the five Philistine city-states and the one most directly connected to the Goliath narrative.
12. The Philistine courtiers call David melekh ha-arets ('king of the land') — a title he does not yet hold. Either they are using the title loosely (as the champion or de facto leader) or their intelligence about Israel's internal politics is better than David expected. The song they quote — hikkah Sha'ul ba-alafav ve-David be-rivevotav ('Saul has struck his thousands and David his ten-thousands') — is the same victory chant from 18:7 that first provoked Saul's jealousy. The song that destroyed David's relationship with Saul now threatens to destroy David himself among the Philistines. What was a celebration in Israel is an intelligence report in Gath. The verb ya'anu ('they sang responsively,' from anah, 'to answer, to respond') indicates antiphonal singing — two groups calling and responding — which means the Philistines know not just the words but the performance style of the Israelite celebration.
13. The phrase vayyasem et ha-devarim ha-elleh bilvavo ('he placed these words in his heart') means David internalized the danger — he understood what the courtiers' recognition meant. The verb vayyira me'od ('he was very afraid') is the same construction used for Israel's terror before Goliath (17:24). The champion who was not afraid of the giant is now terrified of the giant's king. The phrase mippnei akhish ('from the face/presence of Achish') mirrors mippnei Sha'ul ('from Saul') in verse 11 — David is caught between two kings who both threaten his life. The Hebrew Bible does not romanticize David's fugitive period; he is genuinely, deeply afraid.
14. The verb vayshanno ('he changed, disguised') from the root shanah ('to change, to be different') is the same root found in the superscription of Psalm 34 (le-David be-shannoto et ta'mo lifnei avimelekh), which tradition connects to this episode — though the psalm names 'Abimelech' rather than Achish, a discrepancy that may reflect an alternate tradition or a Philistine throne-title. The word ta'mo ('his judgment, his sense, his behavior') from ta'am ('taste, discernment, good sense') indicates David altered not his appearance but his mental comportment — he made himself appear to have lost his capacity for rational behavior.
14. The physical details are deliberately degrading: vaytav al daltot ha-sha'ar ('he scratched/made marks on the gate doors') and vayyored riro el zeqano ('he let his drool run down onto his beard'). The verb tav means to make marks or scratch, and rir is saliva or drool. The future king of Israel, carrying the sword of Goliath, is scratching at doors and drooling. The narrator spares David no dignity. This is survival by humiliation.
15. The participle mishtage'a ('acting insane, behaving as a madman') from the root shaga ('to be mad, to go insane') is in the Hithpael form, which can indicate either genuine madness or pretended madness — the form itself is ambiguous, which serves David's purpose perfectly. Achish's irritation is directed at his servants, not at David — the deception has worked. The question lammah tavi'u oto elai ('why did you bring him to me?') implies

David was escorted or reported to the king rather than arriving of his own accord. Achish sees not a dangerous enemy warrior but a pathetic lunatic — exactly the perception David constructed.

16. Achish's retort is laced with sarcasm: chasar meshugga'im ani ('am I lacking madmen?') uses chasar ('to lack, to be short of') with the plural meshugga'im ('madmen, insane people'). The implication is that he already has enough unstable people in his court without adding another. The verb lehishtage'a ('to act insane') repeats the Hithpael form from verse 15, and the preposition alay ('upon me, in my presence') suggests David's performance was directed at or in front of Achish personally. The final rhetorical question — hazeh yavo el beiti ('shall this one come into my house?') — is David's salvation. 'My house' could mean either Achish's palace or his household. The king dismisses David as beneath concern, which is precisely the verdict David was performing toward. The anointed king of Israel escapes the Philistine court by being deemed too worthless to detain.

Summary: David flees from Gath to the cave of Adullam, where his family and a ragged company of debtors, outcasts, and desperate men gather around him. He secures his parents' safety with the king of Moab, then returns to Judah on the prophet Gad's instruction. Meanwhile, Saul accuses his own Benjaminite officials of conspiring with David, and Doeg the Edomite reports that the priest Ahimelech aided David at Nob. Saul summons the entire priestly house and orders their execution. When his own guards refuse to strike the LORD's priests, Doeg carries out the slaughter — killing eighty-five priests and annihilating the town of Nob with the same total warfare Saul refused to apply to Amalek. Only Abiathar, son of Ahimelech, escapes and flees to David, who accepts responsibility for the massacre and pledges to protect him.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains one of the most devastating ironies in all of Scripture. In chapter 15, Saul was stripped of the kingship because he refused to carry out cherem — the complete destruction of Amalek. Here, Saul inflicts that same total destruction on an Israelite priestly city: men, women, children, infants, and livestock (v. 19). The Hebrew phrasing in verse 19 — me-ish ve-ad ishah, me-olel ve-ad yoneq, ve-shor va-chamor va-seh — deliberately echoes the language of the Amalek ban in 15:3. Saul would not do to Israel's enemy what he now does to Israel's priests. The man who spared Agag butchers the servants of God. The chapter also marks the birth of David's band — the four hundred misfits who will become his core fighting force and eventually form the backbone of his kingdom. That God builds a monarchy from debtors and fugitives is consistent with the entire biblical pattern: power forged from the discarded.*

Translation Friction: *Verse 2 describes David's followers with three Hebrew terms — kol ish matsok, kol ish asher lo noshe, kol ish mar nefesh ('every man in distress, every man in debt, every man bitter of soul'). These are not flattering descriptions. The future king's first subjects are society's rejects. We render these categories plainly rather than softening them, because the text intends the contrast between this ragged assembly and the royal court Saul commands. In verse 17, Saul orders his runners (ratsim, the royal guard) to kill the priests, and they refuse — ki lo avu ('they were not willing'). The same verb of refusal (avah) was used when Saul's soldiers would not destroy the best livestock of Amalek (15:9). The verb links both acts of disobedience, but with opposite moral valences: the soldiers' refusal here is righteous, while their earlier refusal was sinful. David's confession in verse 22 — anokhi sabboti be-khol nefesh bet avikha ('I am the one who caused the death of every person in your father's house') — raises the question of moral responsibility. David did not wield the sword, but he recognizes that his deception at Nob set the chain of events in motion. We translate sabboti as 'I am responsible for' rather than the weaker 'I have occasioned' to preserve the weight of David's self-accusation.*

Connections: The destruction of the priestly city of Nob fulfills the curse pronounced on the house of Eli (2:27-36, 3:11-14). The priestly line that was told 'all the increase of your house shall die by the sword' now perishes at Doeg's blade. Abiathar's survival as the lone priest carrying the ephod connects forward to David's repeated use of priestly inquiry (23:6-12, 30:7-8) and ultimately to Solomon's removal of Abiathar from the priesthood (1 Kings 2:26-27), which the narrator calls the final fulfillment of the word against Eli's house. David's cave at Adullam becomes the subject of Psalm 142 (titled 'when he was in the cave') and possibly Psalm 57 ('when he fled from Saul, in the cave'). His placement of his parents in Moab recalls Ruth's Moabite ancestry — David's great-grandmother was Ruth the Moabitess (Ruth 4:17), so he is sending his family to their ancestral kin. The four hundred men who gather to David here will grow to six hundred (23:13, 27:2) and become the 'mighty men' catalogued in 2 Samuel 23.

¹David left that place and took refuge in the cave of Adullam. When his brothers and his entire father's household heard, they went down to him there. ²Every man in distress, every man crushed by debt, and every man bitter in spirit gathered around him. He became their commander, and about four hundred men were with him. ³From there David went to Mizpeh in Moab and said to the king of Moab, "Please let my father and mother come and stay with you until I know what God will do with me." ⁴He brought them before the king of Moab, and they stayed with him the entire time David was in the stronghold. ⁵The prophet Gad said to David, "Do not stay in the stronghold. Go — enter the land of Judah." So David left and came to the forest of Hereth. ⁶Saul heard that David and his men had been located. Saul was sitting in Gibeah under the tamarisk tree on the height, his spear in his hand, with all his officials standing around him. ⁷Saul said to his officials standing around him, "Listen, men of Benjamin! Will the son of Jesse give all of you fields and vineyards? Will he make all of you commanders of thousands and commanders of hundreds? ⁸Is that why you have all conspired against me? Not one of you told me when my own son made a pact with the son of Jesse. Not one of you is troubled on my behalf or tells me that my son has set my servant against me to ambush me, as he does today." ⁹Doeg the Edomite, who was stationed among Saul's officials, spoke up: "I saw the son of Jesse come to Nob, to Ahimelech son of Ahitub. ¹⁰He inquired of the LORD for him, gave him provisions, and gave him the sword of Goliath the Philistine." ¹¹The king summoned Ahimelech the priest, son of Ahitub, along with his entire father's house — the priests who were at Nob. They all came before the king. ¹²Saul said, "Listen, son of Ahitub." He answered, "Here I am, my lord." ¹³Saul said to him, "Why have you conspired against me — you and the son of Jesse? You gave him bread and a sword and inquired of God on his behalf, so that he could rise against me and lie in ambush, as he does today." ¹⁴Ahimelech answered the king: "And who among all your servants is as trusted as David — the king's own son-in-law, who serves at your command and is honored in your household? ¹⁵Was that day the first time I inquired of God for him? Absolutely not! Let the king not bring any charge against his servant or anyone in my father's house, because your servant knew nothing at all about any of this — nothing small or great." ¹⁶The king said, "You will certainly die, Ahimelech — you and your father's entire house." ¹⁷The king ordered the guards stationed around him, "Turn and kill the priests of the LORD, because they too sided with David. They knew he was fleeing and did not tell me." But the king's servants refused to raise their hand against the priests of the LORD. ¹⁸The king said to Doeg, "You — turn and strike down the priests." Doeg the Edomite turned and struck them down himself. He killed eighty-five men that day, each one a wearer of the linen ephod. ¹⁹He also struck down Nob, the city of the priests, with the sword — men and women, children and nursing infants, oxen, donkeys, and sheep — all by the sword. ²⁰But one son of Ahimelech son of Ahitub escaped. His name was Abiathar, and he fled to David. ²¹Abiathar told David that Saul had killed the priests of the LORD. ²²David said to Abiathar, "I knew that day — when Doeg the Edomite was there — that he would certainly report to Saul. I am responsible for the death of every person in your father's house. ²³Stay with me. Do not be afraid, because whoever seeks my life seeks yours as well. You are under my protection."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayimmalet ('he escaped, he slipped away') carries the sense of slipping out of danger, narrowly evading capture. It implies urgency and relief. The cave of Adullam (me'arat Adullam) sits in the Shephelah, the low hill country between the coastal plain and the Judean highlands — strategically positioned for both defense and flight. The name Adullam may derive from a root meaning 'justice' or 'retreat.'
1. That David's entire father's house comes to him indicates that Saul's hostility now threatens the whole family. Jesse's household is no longer safe in Bethlehem. The descent of David's family to a cave marks the inversion of their status: a family that was hosting the king's son-in-law is now hiding as fugitives.
2. The three categories describe Israel's underclass. The word matsoq ('distress, pressure') suggests being squeezed or confined — men trapped by circumstances. The phrase asher lo noshe ('who had a creditor') identifies men in financial ruin, possibly facing debt slavery under Israelite law (Exodus 21:2-7, Deuteronomy 15:1-2). The phrase mar nefesh ('bitter of soul') describes men whose inner life has soured — men broken by grief, injustice, or despair. The same phrase described Hannah in 1:10.
2. That David becomes sar ('commander, chief') over this group transforms a collection of fugitives into a military unit. The number four hundred is significant — it represents a substantial fighting force in Iron Age Israel, roughly the size of a tribal militia. David is building an alternative power base outside Saul's control, composed of men who have nothing left to lose.

3. Mizpeh (Mitspeh) means 'watchtower' or 'lookout point' — a common place name in the ancient Near East. David's decision to shelter his parents in Moab reflects the family's Moabite connection through Ruth (Ruth 4:13-17). Jesse's grandmother was a Moabite woman, making this not a plea to strangers but an appeal to extended kin.
3. The phrase ad asher eda mah ya'aseh li Elohim ('until I know what God will do with/for me') uses the general term Elohim rather than the covenant name YHWH. David acknowledges divine sovereignty over his situation while expressing genuine uncertainty about the outcome. The verb eda ('I will know') implies that David is waiting for divine clarity, not acting on his own plan.
4. The verb vayyanichem ('he led them, he settled them') comes from nachah ('to lead, to guide'), suggesting David personally escorted his parents to safety. The phrase kol yemei heyot David ba-metsudah ('all the days of David's being in the stronghold') introduces the key term metsudah.
4. The metsudah ('stronghold, fortress') could refer to the cave of Adullam itself, to a separate fortified position in the Judean wilderness, or even to Masada. The term implies a naturally defensible location — a rocky height or walled refuge. David's time in the metsudah represents his period of fugitive leadership before he establishes a more permanent base.
5. Gad the prophet appears here without introduction, suggesting he was already attached to David's company. He will later serve as David's seer during his reign (2 Samuel 24:11). His instruction — lo teshev ba-metsudah ('do not sit/stay in the stronghold') — uses the verb yashav, which can mean 'sit, dwell, remain.' The command is to stop hiding and reenter covenant territory.
5. The directive lekha u-vata lekha erets Yehudah ('go and come for yourself into the land of Judah') sends David back into the tribal territory where he will eventually be crowned king (2 Samuel 2:4). The prophet is pushing David out of defensive isolation and into the arena where God's promises will unfold. The forest of Hereth (ya'ar Charet) is otherwise unknown; the name may derive from charut ('engraved') or charah ('to burn'). It was likely dense woodland in the Judean hills providing natural cover.
6. The scene shifts abruptly from David's fugitive camp to Saul's court. The image is carefully composed: Saul sits under the eshel (tamarisk tree) — the same kind of tree under which he will be buried (31:13). His spear (chanit) is in his hand, the weapon he has already hurled at David twice (18:11, 19:10). The spear has become Saul's signature prop, symbolizing his volatile authority.
6. The word ba-ramah ('on the height') may refer to the town of Ramah or simply to an elevated spot — a high place where the king holds court. The phrase kol avadav nitsavim alav ('all his servants standing over/around him') describes a formal court scene. The verb nitsavim ('standing, stationed') implies soldiers or officials at attention. Saul is surrounded by loyalty, yet consumed by suspicion.
7. Saul appeals to tribal loyalty by addressing his court as benei Yemini ('sons of Benjamin, Benjaminites'). This reveals that his inner circle is drawn primarily from his own tribe — and that he fears losing them to David. The phrase ben Yishai ('son of Jesse') is deliberately dismissive: Saul refuses to use David's name, reducing him to his father's son, a nobody from Bethlehem.
7. The gifts Saul describes — sadot u-kheramim ('fields and vineyards') and military rank — are the standard rewards a king bestows on loyal followers. Saul is essentially asking: 'What can David offer you that I cannot?' The question betrays both his political calculation and his paranoid insecurity. He assumes loyalty is transactional and fears being outbid.
8. The phrase galah et ozni ('uncover my ear') is an idiom meaning 'to inform, to reveal a secret to.' It pictures lifting the hair or headdress away from someone's ear to whisper confidential information. Saul uses it twice, emphasizing his sense of isolation. The verb choleh ('is sick, is pained') here means 'is troubled, grieves' — Saul accuses his officials of emotional indifference to his suffering.
8. Saul's accusation mixes legitimate intelligence (Jonathan and David did make a covenant, 18:3, 20:16-17) with paranoid distortion. The word le-orev ('to ambush, to lie in wait') mischaracterizes David's defensive flight as offensive aggression. Saul is rewriting reality to match his fear. The phrase ka-yom ha-zeh ('as on this day, as it is today') expresses Saul's sense that the conspiracy is ongoing and current.
9. Doeg (Do'eg) was introduced in 21:8 as 'detained before the LORD' at Nob — he was present when David deceived Ahimelech. The designation ha-Adomi ('the Edomite') marks him as a foreigner in Saul's service. That an Edomite serves in Saul's court is unremarkable for the period, but the narrator's consistent use of the ethnic label keeps his outsider status visible. His willingness to strike priests that Israelite soldiers refuse to touch (v. 18) will be connected to his non-Israelite identity.
9. Doeg adopts Saul's dismissive language — ben Yishai ('son of Jesse') rather than David's name — aligning himself with the king's perspective. His report is factually accurate but presented in a way designed to implicate Ahimelech in conspiracy.
10. Doeg's report lists three acts of priestly aid: (1) sha'al lo ba-YHWH ('he inquired of the LORD for him') — this refers to consulting the divine oracle, likely through the ephod and its Urim and Thummim; (2) tseidah natan lo ('he gave him provisions') — the consecrated bread from chapter 21; (3) cherev Golyat natan lo ('he gave him Goliath's sword'). Each act, presented neutrally by the narrator in chapter 21, now becomes evidence of conspiracy in Doeg's telling.
10. It is debated whether Ahimelech actually inquired of the LORD for David in chapter 21, where no such inquiry is explicitly mentioned. Either Doeg is embellishing, or the narrator omitted the detail earlier. Ahimelech will deny this charge in verse 15, claiming that inquiring on David's behalf was routine — not evidence of a conspiracy.
11. Saul summons not just Ahimelech but kol beit aviv ha-kohanim asher be-Nov ('all his father's house, the priests who were in Nob'). This is the entire priestly establishment at Nob — the community that had assumed the sanctuary role after Shiloh's destruction. That they all come voluntarily suggests they have no awareness of danger; they respond to a royal summons as loyal subjects.

11. The phrase vayavo'u khullam el ha-melekh ('they all came to the king') is heavy with dramatic irony. The priests come in obedience to royal authority, not knowing they are walking into a death sentence. The narrator's simple statement underscores the horror that follows.
12. Saul again uses a patronymic rather than the man's name — ben Achituv ('son of Ahitub') instead of Ahimelech. This may be dismissive or may reflect court formality, but given Saul's pattern of calling David 'son of Jesse,' it reads as deliberate depersonalization. You strip a man of his name before you strip him of his life.
12. Ahimelech's response — hinneni adoni ('Here I am, my lord') — uses the same word (hinneni) that Abraham used before God (Genesis 22:1) and that Samuel used as a child (3:4). It is a declaration of availability, of readiness to serve. The irony is devastating: the priest presents himself in obedience to a king who intends to destroy him.
13. Saul's accusation reframes every act of priestly hospitality as conspiracy (qesher). The verb qasharthem ('you conspired') is the same root used for political rebellion throughout Kings and Chronicles. By using it, Saul elevates Ahimelech's assistance from naivete to treason. The three charges — bread, sword, and divine inquiry — exactly mirror Doeg's report in verse 10 but in a different order, placing the mundane provisions first and building to the spiritual charge.
13. The phrase la-qum elai le-orev ('to rise against me to ambush') again distorts David's flight into offensive aggression. Saul interprets every event through the lens of conspiracy. The structural irony is that Ahimelech was deceived by David (21:2) — he assisted David precisely because he believed David was on royal business.
14. Ahimelech's defense is both courageous and logical. He lists David's credentials: ne'eman ('faithful, trusted') — the highest commendation for a royal servant; chatan ha-melekh ('the king's son-in-law') — bound to the crown by marriage; sar el mishma'tekha ('turns to your obedience, serves at your command') — obedient to royal orders; nikhbad be-veitekha ('honored in your house') — holding an esteemed position at court.
14. Every point Ahimelech makes is factually true from his perspective. He had no reason to suspect David was a fugitive. His defense implicitly challenges Saul: if David held all these positions of trust, why would a priest suspect him of treason? Ahimelech is defending not only himself but the reasonableness of trusting the king's own arrangements.
15. Ahimelech's defense of the divine inquiry is revealing: ha-yom hachilloti lish'ol lo ve-Elohim ('Was today the beginning of my inquiring of God for him?'). He claims this was routine — he had consulted God on David's behalf before, presumably as an authorized royal officer. The word chalilah ('far be it, God forbid') is a strong oath of denial.
15. The phrase davar qaton o gadol ('a small thing or a great thing') is a merism meaning 'absolutely nothing at all.' Ahimelech's plea of total innocence is emphatic: he knew nothing about any rift between Saul and David. His defense is convincing, but it will not save him. Saul has already made his decision — the trial is a performance, not a proceeding.
16. The sentence mot tamut ('dying you will die') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute construction — the same formula God used in Eden: 'you shall surely die' (Genesis 2:17). Saul speaks with the finality of a divine decree, but he is pronouncing it against God's own priests. The sentence extends beyond Ahimelech to kol beit avikha ('all your father's house') — collective punishment of an entire priestly clan for the alleged actions of one man.
16. The brevity of the sentence is itself terrifying. Ahimelech has just offered a careful, logical defense. Saul responds with six Hebrew words that condemn an entire family to death. No deliberation, no counter-argument, no witnesses beyond Doeg. This is royal power exercised without restraint.
17. The ratsim ('runners') are the royal guard — elite soldiers who serve as the king's bodyguard and executioners. Saul orders them to kill kohanei YHWH ('priests of the LORD') — the text emphasizes the title twice in this verse. The narrator wants the reader to feel the full weight of what Saul is demanding: the execution of God's consecrated servants.
17. The guards' refusal — lo avu avdei ha-melekh lishloch et yadam lifgo'a be-khohanei YHWH ('the king's servants were not willing to extend their hand to strike the priests of the LORD') — is an act of conscience that defies royal command. The verb avah ('to be willing, to consent') indicates a moral choice, not inability. These soldiers, who would kill in battle without hesitation, recognize a boundary that their king does not. The irony is sharp: Saul's own men show more reverence for God's servants than Saul does.
18. When Israelite soldiers refuse, Saul turns to the Edomite. The verb paga ('to strike, to encounter, to fall upon') carries lethal force here — it is the same verb used for judicial execution. Doeg does not hesitate. The narrator specifies: vayipga hu ('he himself struck') — the pronoun hu is emphatic, underscoring that Doeg personally carried out the killing.
18. The eighty-five victims are identified as nosei efod bad ('wearers of the linen ephod'). The efod bad was the distinctive garment of active priestly service — a linen vestment worn during sanctuary duties. By specifying this detail, the narrator ensures the reader understands that these were not random citizens but consecrated ministers in full priestly status. The slaughter of eighty-five serving priests in a single day is an atrocity without parallel in the biblical record.
19. The formula me-ish ve-ad isah, me-olel ve-ad yoneq, ve-shor va-chamor va-seh ('from man to woman, from child to nursing infant, and ox and donkey and sheep') is the language of total annihilation — cherem warfare. This exact catalogue echoes the command given to Saul regarding Amalek in 15:3. The devastating irony is the chapter's central theological claim: Saul, who was rejected as king because he refused to carry out the ban against Israel's enemies, now inflicts that same ban on an Israelite city of priests.

- 19. The phrase le-fi cherev ('by the mouth of the sword') appears twice in the verse, bracketing the list of victims. The sword's 'mouth' is a Hebrew metaphor — the blade devours its victims. Nob, which had become the priestly center after Shiloh's destruction, is itself now destroyed. The cycle of sanctuary devastation continues: Shiloh fell to the Philistines, and Nob falls to Israel's own king.
- 20. The verb vayimmalet ('he escaped') is the same word used for David's escape to Adullam in verse 1 — the chapter is bookended by narrow escapes. Abiathar (Evyatar) means 'my father is great' or 'the father excels,' a name that now carries painful irony: his father has just been killed.
- 20. Abiathar's escape preserves a thread of the priestly line and, critically, he will bring the ephod with him (23:6), giving David access to divine oracular guidance that Saul has just destroyed for himself. By massacring the priests, Saul has cut himself off from the very means of consulting God, while David now gains that access through the sole survivor. Saul's violence against the priesthood becomes the mechanism of his own spiritual isolation.
- 21. The verb vayyagad ('he told, he reported') indicates a formal disclosure of terrible news. Abiathar's report is compressed to its essence: harag Sha'ul et kohanei YHWH ('Saul killed the priests of the LORD'). The narrator again uses the full title kohanei YHWH rather than simply 'the priests,' keeping the theological horror of the act in view. Saul has killed not merely men, but men who belonged to God.
- 22. David's confession — anokhi sabboti be-khol nefesh beit avikha ('I am the one who turned/caused regarding every life of your father's house') — is remarkable for its moral clarity. The verb sabboti (from savav, 'to turn, to cause to turn') here means 'I set in motion, I am responsible for.' David does not blame Saul, Doeg, or circumstances. He accepts that his deception at Nob (21:1-9) created the chain of events that led to the massacre.
- 22. The phrase ki haged yaggid le-Sha'ul ('that telling he would tell Saul') uses the emphatic infinitive absolute — David had been certain of Doeg's betrayal but acted anyway. This intensifies his guilt: he saw the danger, proceeded regardless, and now eighty-five men and an entire city are dead. David's willingness to own this distinguishes him sharply from Saul, who consistently deflects blame (13:11-12, 15:15, 15:21).
- 23. David's final words to Abiathar contain a promise that binds their fates together: asher yevaquesh et nafshi yevaquesh et nafshekha ('whoever seeks my life seeks your life'). The verb biqesh ('to seek') is the same word used throughout the Saul-David conflict for Saul's pursuit of David's life. David recognizes that the priest and the fugitive king are now joined by a common enemy.
- 23. The closing phrase ki mishmeret attah immadi ('for you are a guarded one with me') uses mishmeret, a term from the sanctuary vocabulary meaning 'guard duty, protective charge, sacred trust.' David is not merely offering Abiathar a hiding place — he is placing the priest under his solemn charge, using language that evokes the Levitical guard of the tabernacle. The hunter becomes the guardian. The chapter ends with the last priest of Nob under the protection of the man whose deception destroyed Nob — a covenant of shared guilt and shared survival.

Summary: David receives word that the Philistines are raiding the threshing floors of Keilah and inquires of the LORD twice before going to rescue the town. After the victory, Saul learns David is in Keilah and mobilizes for siege. David inquires of the LORD a third time through Abiathar's ephod and learns that the citizens of Keilah will surrender him to Saul. David and his six hundred men flee into the wilderness of Ziph. There Jonathan comes to David one final time and strengthens his hand in God, and the two renew their covenant. The Ziphites betray David's location to Saul. Saul closes in on David at the Rock of Division in the wilderness of Maon, but a Philistine raid forces Saul to break off pursuit at the last possible moment. David escapes to the strongholds of En-gedi.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is built on two opposing verbs of seeking: sha'al (to inquire, to ask of God) and biqesh (to seek, to hunt). David sha'al-s the LORD three times (verses 2, 4, and the sequence at verses 10-12), each time receiving clear divine guidance. Saul biqesh-s David throughout the chapter (verses 14, 15, 25) but never once inquires of the LORD. The contrast is devastating: the man God rejected consults no one but his own paranoia, while the fugitive anointed one submits every decision to divine inquiry. The chapter also contains the last meeting between David and Jonathan, compressed into two verses (16-18) that carry enormous emotional weight. Jonathan's act of 'strengthening David's hand in God' is a priestly act performed by a prince — he ministers to David's faith at the cost of his own future, openly acknowledging that David will be king and that he himself will be second. They will never meet again. The chapter's climactic scene at the Rock of Division (sela ha-machlekot) is a masterpiece of narrative suspense: Saul and David are on opposite sides of the same mountain, Saul closing in, when a messenger arrives with news of a Philistine attack. Providence intervenes at the seam between capture and escape.

Translation Friction: Verse 6 presents a textual difficulty: it says that when Abiathar fled to David at Keilah, 'an ephod came down in his hand.' This note appears to be an editorial insertion clarifying how David had access to priestly inquiry — Abiathar brought the ephod from Nob. But the narrative timeline is complicated: Abiathar's flight was narrated in 22:20-23, apparently before the Keilah episode. Some scholars argue that 23:6 is a displaced note or that the events overlap chronologically. We render the verse as it stands, treating it as the narrator's parenthetical explanation. The Ziphites' betrayal (verses 19-20) raises the question of why Judahites would betray David to Saul. The answer likely involves Saul's threat to their safety and the political reality that harboring a fugitive endangered the entire community. David's escape in verse 28 is narrated with almost frustrating brevity — the theological claim is clear (God delivered him) but the mechanics are left to the reader's imagination.

Connections: David's repeated inquiries of the LORD through the ephod connect backward to the legitimate priesthood destroyed at Nob (chapter 22) and forward to David's consistent pattern of seeking God before acting (2 Samuel 2:1, 5:19, 5:23). Saul's failure to inquire connects to his final desperate consultation of the medium at Endor (chapter 28), where he seeks guidance from the dead because the LORD will not answer him. Jonathan's words in verse 17 — 'you will be king over Israel, and I will be second to you' — recall the original anointing of David in chapter 16 and anticipate the covenant theology of the Davidic line (2 Samuel 7). The Rock of Division prefigures the psalm tradition of God as rock and refuge (Psalm 18, which is attributed to David's deliverance from Saul). The Ziphites' betrayal is remembered in the superscription of Psalm 54: 'When the Ziphites went and told Saul, David is hiding among us.'

¹They reported to David, "The Philistines are attacking Keilah and plundering the threshing floors." ²David inquired of the LORD, saying, "Should I go and strike these Philistines?" The LORD said to David, "Go. Strike the Philistines and rescue Keilah." ³But David's men said to him, "We are already afraid here in Judah. How much more if we go to Keilah against the battle lines of the Philistines!" ⁴So David inquired of the LORD a second time. The LORD answered him and said, "Get up. Go down to Keilah, because I am giving the Philistines into your hand." ⁵David and his men went to Keilah, fought the Philistines, drove off their livestock, and struck them with a devastating blow. David rescued the inhabitants of Keilah. ⁶Now when Abiathar son of Ahimelech fled to David at Keilah, an ephod had come down in his hand. ⁷When Saul was told that David had come to Keilah, Saul said, "God has handed him over to me, because he has trapped himself by entering a town with double gates and a bar." ⁸Saul summoned all the troops to war, to march down to Keilah and besiege David and his men. ⁹David learned that Saul was forging evil against him in secret. He said to Abiathar the priest, "Bring the ephod here." ¹⁰David said, "O LORD, God of Israel, your servant has heard with certainty that Saul is seeking to come to Keilah to destroy the city on my account." ¹¹"Will the citizens of Keilah hand me over to him? Will Saul come down, as your servant has heard? O LORD, God of Israel, please tell your servant." The LORD said, "He will come down." ¹²David said, "Will the citizens of Keilah surrender me and my men into the hand of Saul?" The LORD said, "They will surrender you." ¹³David and his men — about six hundred — got up, left Keilah, and moved from place to place wherever they could go. When Saul was told that David had escaped from Keilah, he abandoned the expedition. ¹⁴David settled in the wilderness, in the strongholds, and he stayed in the hill country of the wilderness of Ziph. Saul hunted for him every day, but God did not give him into his hand. ¹⁵David saw that Saul had marched out to seek his life. David was in the wilderness of Ziph, at Horesh. ¹⁶Jonathan son of Saul set out and went to David at Horesh, and he strengthened his hand in God. ¹⁷He said to him, "Do not be afraid, because the hand of Saul my father will not reach you. You will reign as king over Israel, and I will be second to you — and even Saul my father knows this." ¹⁸The two of them cut a covenant before the LORD. David stayed at Horesh, and Jonathan went home. ¹⁹Then the Ziphites went up to Saul at Gibeah and said, "Is David not hiding among us in the strongholds at Horesh, on the hill of Hachilah, south of the wasteland?" ²⁰So now, whenever your soul desires to come down, O king, come down — and it will be our task to surrender him into the king's hand. ²¹Saul said, "May you be blessed by the LORD, for you have shown compassion to me." ²²"Go now, make further preparations. Learn and observe his exact location — where his feet tread, and who has seen him there. For I have been told that he is extremely cunning." ²³"Observe and learn every hiding place where he conceals himself, then return to me with certain information. I will go with you, and if he is anywhere in the land, I will search him out among all the clans of Judah." ²⁴They set out and went to Ziph ahead of Saul. David and his men were in the wilderness of Maon, in the Arabah south of the wasteland. ²⁵Saul and his men went to hunt for him. When David was told, he went down to the rock and stayed in the wilderness of Maon. Saul heard this and pursued David into the wilderness of Maon. ²⁶Saul moved along one side of the mountain, and David and his men along the other side. David was racing to escape from Saul, while Saul and his men were closing in around David and his men to capture them. ²⁷Then a messenger came to Saul: "Hurry! Come quickly! The Philistines have raided the land!" ²⁸Saul turned back from pursuing David and went to confront the Philistines. That is why they called that place the Rock of Division. ²⁹David went up from there and settled in the strongholds of En-gedi.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb shosim ('plundering') describes the systematic stripping of grain at the most vulnerable moment — when it has been harvested and is being processed at the open-air threshing floors. This is economic warfare: seize the food supply at the point of maximum exposure. Keilah was a fortified town in the Judean lowlands (Shephelah), near Philistine territory. David, himself a fugitive with no settled base, receives intelligence about a town under attack — placing him in the position of deciding whether a man on the run can afford to fight someone else's war.
2. The verb sha'al ('inquired') is the same root as Saul's name (Sha'ul, 'asked for'). The irony pervades the chapter: David does what Saul's name implies but Saul himself never does. David asks God; Saul asks no one. The medium of inquiry is likely the Urim and Thummim associated with the priestly ephod, though the text does not specify the method until verse 6 clarifies that Abiathar brought the ephod.
2. God's response adds a dimension David did not ask about: vehoshata et-Qe'ilah ('and you will rescue Keilah'). David asked only whether he should go and fight; God answers with a mission that extends beyond military victory to the salvation of a community. This pattern — David acting as protector of vulnerable Israelites while Saul hunts him — is the chapter's central irony.
3. The men's objection follows a qal va-chomer ('light and heavy') argument — a logical escalation that would become a standard rabbinic reasoning form. If they are already afraid (yere'im) as fugitives hiding in Judah, how much more terrified will they be marching into an open confrontation with Philistine military formations (ma'arkhot, 'battle lines, arranged ranks')? The word ma'arkhot is the same term used for the Philistine battle arrays that Goliath challenged in chapter 17 — David's men may be remembering what Philistine formations look like.
3. The men's fear is entirely rational. They are a band of roughly four hundred fugitives (22:2), many of them debtors and malcontents, not a trained army. They are being hunted by their own king. And now David proposes to fight the Philistines — the dominant military power in the region. Their objection reveals the gap between David's faith-informed decision-making and the raw terror of those who must carry it out.
4. The verb vayyosef ('he added, he did again') indicates David's persistence in seeking God — a pastoral detail showing that divine inquiry is not a one-time formality but an ongoing dialogue, especially when circumstances generate doubt. The second divine response is tailored to the men's fear: the first answer told David to go; the second tells him God will personally deliver the enemy. The addition of ki ani noten ('because I myself am giving') addresses the fear directly — the outcome does not depend on David's military strength but on God's sovereign action.
5. The verb vayyinbag ('he drove off') specifically refers to driving livestock — David not only defeats the Philistines but captures their supply train. This detail transforms a defensive action into an offensive victory with material gain, feeding David's fugitive band. The closing statement vayyosha David et yoshvei Qe'ilah ('David rescued the inhabitants of Keilah') echoes the language of the judges (Judges 2:16, 3:9, 3:15). David is doing what the king should be doing — protecting Israelite towns from foreign enemies — while the king hunts the man doing his job.
6. The efod in priestly contexts refers to the linen garment worn by the high priest, which contained the breastplate (choshen) holding the Urim and Thummim — the sacred lots used to receive yes-or-no answers from God. This is the mechanism behind David's inquiries in this chapter. The text emphasizes that the ephod 'came down in his hand' (yarad beyado), a phrase that may indicate Abiathar was carrying it when he fled, or it may be a theological statement: the instrument of divine communication descended to the true anointed one.
7. The verb nikkar is debated. Some derive it from nakhar ('to treat as foreign, to alienate') — meaning God has estranged David, cast him out. Others derive it from makar ('to sell') with a textual corruption. We follow the reading that Saul claims God has delivered David into his power, treating nikkar as meaning 'handed over' in context. Saul's interpretation of events is consistently self-serving throughout 1 Samuel: every development confirms his paranoid narrative.
7. The phrase delatayim u-veriach ('double gates and a bar') refers to the standard fortification of a Judean town — heavy wooden doors reinforced with a crossbar. Saul sees the fortification as a trap for David. What he does not see is that David's presence in the town was an act of divine obedience, not strategic blundering.
8. The verb vayyeshamma ('he summoned, he called to hear') is from the Piel of shama, meaning to call together or muster. Saul mobilizes the entire military apparatus of Israel — not against the Philistines who were just raiding Keilah, but against the man who drove them off. The verb latsur ('to besiege') is a technical military term for surrounding a fortified position and cutting off supply lines. Saul is prepared to lay siege to an Israelite town to capture David — an act that would harm the very citizens David just rescued.
9. The verb charash in the Hiphil can mean 'to devise silently, to plot' — combining the ideas of secrecy and deliberate crafting. David's intelligence network has detected Saul's mobilization, and his first response is not tactical but theological: bring the ephod. The command hagishah ('bring near, present') is a priestly technical term — the same verb used for presenting offerings. David is requesting a formal priestly consultation, not an informal prayer.
10. The infinitive absolute construction shamoa shama ('hearing, he has heard' — rendered 'heard with certainty') conveys absolute confidence in the intelligence: David is not guessing. The verb mevaqesh ('is seeking') is the chapter's hunting verb — biqesh, to seek or pursue — here applied to Saul's pursuit of David. The phrase leshachet la'ir ('to destroy the city') reveals the full horror of Saul's intention: he will destroy an entire Israelite town to catch one man. The word ba'avuri ('on my account, because of me') shows David's awareness that his presence endangers others — a moral burden that drives his inquiry and his eventual departure.

11. David asks two questions, and the ephod-based inquiry yields answers to one at a time. The verb yasgiruni ('will they hand me over, will they shut me in') is from sagar, meaning to close, deliver up, or surrender — the same verb used for handing over prisoners or betraying fugitives. The ba'alei Qe'ilah ('citizens of Keilah,' literally 'lords/masters of Keilah') are the leading men of the town. David is asking whether the very people he just saved will betray him. God answers the second question first: Saul will indeed come down. The first question — about betrayal — is reserved for verse 12.
12. The divine answer reveals a conditional future — what will happen if David remains. David's departure changes the outcome: Saul does not attack Keilah (verse 13). This raises a profound question about the nature of prophetic knowledge: God tells David what the citizens of Keilah would do under certain conditions, and David uses that knowledge to alter the conditions. The ephod inquiry here functions less like prophecy and more like divine counsel — God advising David based on knowledge of human hearts and intentions.
13. The phrase vayyithallekhu ba'asher yithallakhu ('they moved about wherever they could move about') describes aimless, survival-driven wandering — the Hithpael of halakh repeated to convey continuous, directionless motion. David has gone from commander of a rescue mission to a nomad with six hundred mouths to feed. The number shesh me'ot ('six hundred') has grown from the four hundred of 22:2, suggesting David's band is expanding even as his situation deteriorates.
13. The verb vayyechdal ('he abandoned, he ceased') shows Saul's siege plan collapsing the moment David leaves. Saul had no interest in Keilah itself — only in David. Without the target, the military operation has no purpose. The narrator's dry report of Saul's cancellation highlights the absurdity of his campaign: the king of Israel mobilized the entire army to besiege a town David had just saved, then went home when David left.
14. The theological summary — 'God did not give him into his hand' — uses the same verb (natan, 'to give') that Saul used in verse 7 and that God used in verse 4. In verse 4, God gives the Philistines into David's hand. In verse 7, Saul claims God has given David into his hand. In verse 14, the narrator settles the matter: God gave nothing to Saul. The verb natan becomes a marker of divine allegiance — God gives victory to David and withholds David from Saul.
15. The phrase levaqesh et-nafsho ('to seek his life/soul') intensifies the hunting language: Saul is not just looking for David's location but seeking his nefesh — his life, his very self. The word bachorshah is debated: it could mean 'in the forest/thicket' (from choresh, 'wooded area') or it could be a place name, Horesh. Given that the wilderness of Ziph is largely scrubland with limited tree cover, many scholars read this as a proper noun. We render it as the place name Horesh, following the Septuagint's treatment of it as a location rather than a generic description.
16. The phrase vaychazzeq et-yado be-Elohim resists easy translation because English has no single verb that captures the Hebrew chazaq in the Piel — it means to make strong, to grasp firmly, to reinforce from outside. Jonathan is not cheering David up; he is actively transferring courage by redirecting David's gaze toward God. The preposition be ('in') is locative: the strength is located in God, and Jonathan's act is to reconnect David to that source. This is the last act of the Jonathan-David relationship, and it is purely theological — not military, not political, but faith sustaining faith.
17. Jonathan's fourfold declaration is structured as a covenant oracle: reassurance, promise of protection, announcement of kingship, and personal pledge of loyalty. The phrase ehyeh-lekha le-mishneh ('I will be second to you') is poignant because it will never be fulfilled — Jonathan will die with his father at Mount Gilboa (31:2) before David takes the throne. Jonathan is offering a future he will not live to see.
17. The claim that Saul 'knows' (yodea) David will be king echoes Saul's own admission in 24:20: 'I know that you will certainly be king.' Jonathan's statement here either reflects private knowledge of his father's inner awareness or is a prophetic insight into Saul's psychology. Either way, it frames Saul's pursuit as rebellion against known truth — not ignorance but willful resistance.
18. The brevity of the closing — vayyeshev David bachorshah viYhonatan halakh le-veito ('David stayed at Horesh and Jonathan went to his house') — is one of the most understated farewells in scripture. The narrator does not describe an emotional parting, tears, or embraces. The two simply separate: one into wilderness, one into a doomed household. The lack of sentiment makes the scene more, not less, powerful. The reader knows what the characters do not yet know — that Jonathan will die at Gilboa and the promise of verse 17 will go unfulfilled.
19. The Ziphites are inhabitants of Ziph, a town in the tribal territory of Judah — David's own tribe. Their betrayal is an intra-tribal act, not an inter-tribal one. They travel to Gibeah, Saul's capital in Benjamin, to volunteer intelligence. The phrase mistatter immanu ('hiding among us') uses the Hithpael of satar ('to hide'), the reflexive form suggesting David is actively concealing himself in their territory. Their report is geographically precise: the strongholds at Horesh, the hill of Hachilah, south of the Yeshimon ('wasteland, desolation'). This level of detail suggests they are offering to guide Saul's forces directly to David — not merely reporting a rumor but providing tactical coordinates.
19. The Yeshimon ('wasteland') refers to the barren eastern slopes of the Judean hill country descending toward the Dead Sea — a landscape of extreme aridity and deep wadis. The hill of Hachilah will reappear in chapter 26 as the site of David's second opportunity to kill Saul.
20. The phrase lekhoh-avvat nafshekha ('according to all the desire of your soul') is obsequious flattery — the Ziphites frame the operation around Saul's personal desire (avvah, 'craving, longing'), treating his obsession as a legitimate royal prerogative. The verb hasgiro ('to hand him over, to surrender him') is the same root (sagar) that appeared in David's inquiry at verses 11-12 — the very betrayal David feared from Keilah is now being offered by the Ziphites. The word lanu ('for us, our part') indicates the Ziphites are volunteering as active collaborators, not passive informants. They will do the work of cornering David if Saul will come.

- 21. The irony of Saul invoking the LORD's blessing here cannot be overstated. The LORD has explicitly rejected Saul (15:26), refused to answer him (14:37, and later 28:6), and is actively protecting David (verse 14). Saul's use of God's name to validate his manhunt represents the final corruption of his theological language — he uses covenant vocabulary to authorize covenant-breaking behavior. The verb chamal ('to have compassion, to spare') is the same verb used in 15:9 where Saul 'spared' Agag and the best livestock against God's command. Saul's pattern is consistent: he applies compassion where it does not belong and withholds it where it does.
- 22. Saul's instructions reveal both tactical sophistication and personal anxiety. The verbs pile up in rapid succession: lekhu ('go'), hakhinu ('prepare'), de'u ('know'), re'u ('observe') — four commands before the main intelligence request. The phrase asher tiyeh raglo ('where his foot will be') is a tracking idiom: Saul wants to know David's movement patterns, not just his current position. The admission arum ya'arim li ('he is extremely cunning toward me') uses the verb aram ('to be shrewd, crafty'), the same root used for the serpent in Genesis 3:1 (arum). Whether intentional or not, the echo is suggestive: Saul perceives David as a dangerous adversary of serpentine cleverness, when in fact David's 'cunning' consists primarily of inquiring of the LORD.
- 23. The word machabo'im ('hiding places') is from the root chava, 'to hide' — the same root used for Adam and Eve hiding from God in Genesis 3:8. Saul commands a systematic intelligence sweep of David's positions. The phrase el-nakhon ('with certainty, with what is established') demands verified intelligence, not rumors. Saul's promise vechipassti oto bekhool alfei Yehudah ('I will search him out among all the clans of Judah') reveals the scale of his obsession: he will comb through every military unit (elef, 'thousand/clan') in David's own tribe. The word alfei can mean either 'thousands' (military units) or 'clans' (tribal subdivisions) — either way, Saul is planning a territory-wide sweep of Judah to find one man.
- 24. The Ziphites depart as advance scouts, heading back to Ziph lifnei Sha'ul ('ahead of Saul') to finalize David's location before Saul arrives. Meanwhile, David has moved south from Ziph to the wilderness of Maon — a more remote and rugged area deeper into the Judean desert. The Arabah here likely refers to the dry depression running south toward the Dead Sea. The narrator tracks both parties simultaneously, building narrative tension: the Ziphites are heading to Ziph, David is in Maon, and Saul is mobilizing. The geography tightens like a noose.
- 25. The verb levaqesh ('to seek, to hunt') returns — Saul's defining action throughout the chapter. David receives intelligence (vayyaggidu le-David, 'they told David') — his network of informants continues to function even in the wilderness. The sela ('rock, crag') is a specific geological feature, likely a cliff face or rock formation that David uses as a defensive position. The verb vayyeradof ('he pursued') is from radaf, the standard verb for military pursuit or hunting — Saul is now in active chase mode, closing the distance in the wilderness of Maon.
- 26. The spatial arrangement — both parties moving along opposite sides of the same mountain — creates an almost cinematic image. The narrator achieves maximum suspense with minimal language: David is running, Saul is encircling, capture is imminent. The verb otrim ('encircling') is a military technical term for surrounding an enemy position to cut off escape routes. David appears to be trapped. The chapter has moved from divine guidance (verses 1-12) through theological encouragement (verses 16-18) to this moment of raw physical danger where no human solution is visible.
- 27. The narrative structure is masterful: the messenger's arrival interrupts the most suspenseful moment in the chapter with a single-verse pivot. The verb pashat ('to spread out, to raid') is the same verb used for stripping and spreading — it conveys an enemy spreading across the land like a flood. Saul must choose between his private obsession (David) and his public duty (national defense). The Philistines force the choice, and Saul has no option but to turn away. The narrator attributes no theological explanation — the bare sequence of events carries the theological weight.
- 28. The etiology (origin story for a place name) is a common narrative device in the Hebrew Bible (cf. Genesis 22:14, Judges 15:17). Sela ha-Machlekot becomes a physical marker in the landscape testifying to David's deliverance. The verb vayyashav ('he turned back') marks Saul's forced retreat — not a voluntary decision but a compelled one. The phrase vayyelekh liqra't Pelishtim ('he went to meet/confront the Philistines') uses the verb qara't, which implies moving toward a confrontation. Saul finally does what a king is supposed to do — fight the national enemy — but only because God's timing removed every other option.
- 29. The final verse is a single sentence of geographical transition. David ascends (vayyaal, 'went up') from the wilderness of Maon to the metsadot ('strongholds') of En-gedi — the oasis on the western shore of the Dead Sea, famous for its spring, its waterfall, and its network of caves in the surrounding cliffs. The name En-gedi means 'Spring of the Young Goat,' and the ibex that still inhabit the area provided both the name and the imagery for David's life in this period: a nimble creature surviving in impossible terrain. The caves of En-gedi will be the setting for the next chapter's dramatic encounter, where Saul enters the very cave where David is hiding. The chapter ends where it began — with David in motion, seeking shelter, guided by God but homeless in his own land.

Summary: Saul returns from pursuing the Philistines and takes three thousand men to hunt David in the wilderness of En-gedi. He enters a cave to relieve himself — the very cave where David and his men are hiding deep in the recesses. David's men urge him to strike, claiming this is the LORD's promised moment, but David only cuts the corner of Saul's robe. Immediately his conscience strikes him, and he restrains his men from attacking. After Saul leaves the cave, David emerges, bows to the ground, and delivers a speech that is both legal defense and theological argument: he will not raise his hand against the LORD's anointed. He holds up the cut piece of robe as evidence that he had the power to kill but chose restraint. Saul weeps, acknowledges that David is more righteous than he is, and extracts an oath that David will not destroy Saul's descendants. The two part — Saul to his home, David to the stronghold.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter stages one of the most psychologically complex scenes in the Hebrew Bible. The cave at En-gedi becomes a moral theater where David holds absolute power over his enemy and refuses to use it. The Hebrew narrator builds the tension with exquisite economy: Saul comes into the cave 'to cover his feet' (a euphemism for relieving himself) — he is at his most vulnerable and undignified, and David is armed and hidden in the darkness behind him. David's men interpret the situation theologically, claiming God has delivered Saul into David's hand. David's act of cutting the kanaf (corner/wing) of Saul's robe is more significant than it appears: the robe's corner carried symbolic weight in ancient Israel, representing authority and identity (the same word appears in Ruth 3:9 where Ruth asks Boaz to spread his kanaf over her). By cutting Saul's kanaf, David symbolically severed Saul's royal authority — and his conscience immediately recognized it. His refusal to go further establishes a principle that will echo through the entire Davidic narrative: legitimate kingship cannot be seized by violence against God's current anointed. The chapter's theology of restraint — that the right thing done the wrong way is still wrong — is one of the most mature ethical statements in the Old Testament.

Translation Friction: The central translation difficulty lies in verse 5 (WLC), where David's heart 'struck him' (vayyakh lev David oto). The verb nakhah is the same word used for a physical blow — David's conscience did not merely trouble him but hit him with the force of a weapon. Translators must decide whether to soften this to 'his conscience bothered him' or preserve the violence of the metaphor. We preserve the blow. A second friction point is the phrase mashiach YHWH ('the LORD's anointed') in verses 7 and 11, which David invokes as an inviolable category. The term does not yet carry its later messianic weight, but it establishes a theological principle — that God's chosen agent, even when corrupt, is not for humans to remove. This creates genuine moral tension: David's restraint is not because Saul is good but because Saul's anointing is God's business, not David's. Translators who flatten mashiach to a mere political title miss the theological nerve of David's argument. A third issue is the relationship between WLC versification (23 verses) and KJV (22 verses): WLC verse 1 corresponds to the chapter division note, and the remaining verses are offset by one.

Connections: The cave scene directly parallels 1 Samuel 26, where David again spares Saul (this time taking his spear and water jug). The two episodes form a deliberate doublet, reinforcing the pattern of David's restraint. The cutting of the kanaf connects backward to Ruth 3:9, where kanaf symbolizes protective covenant covering, and forward to 1 Samuel 15:27-28, where Samuel's robe is torn as a sign that the kingdom is torn from Saul. David's argument that 'the LORD will strike him' (verse 7) — letting God handle Saul's fate rather than seizing it — anticipates 2 Samuel 1, where David executes the Amalekite who claims to have killed Saul. The principle is consistent: no human hand may touch the LORD's anointed. Saul's acknowledgment that David is 'more righteous' (tsaddiq) than he is echoes Judah's confession about Tamar in Genesis 38:26 — both are moments where a powerful man admits that the person he wronged holds the moral high ground. David's oath not to cut off Saul's descendants connects directly to 2 Samuel 9, where David shows kindness to Mephibosheth for Jonathan's sake.

¹David went up from there and stayed in the strongholds of En-gedi. ²When Saul returned from pursuing the Philistines, he was told, "David is in the wilderness of En-gedi." ³Saul took three thousand men, chosen from all Israel, and went to search for David and his men along the rock faces where the wild goats climb. ⁴He came to the sheep pens along the road, where there was a cave. Saul went inside to relieve himself, while David and his men were sitting deep in the recesses of the cave. ⁵David's men said to him, "This is the day the LORD told you about: 'I am giving your enemy into your hand, and you may do to him whatever seems good to you.'" David got up and secretly cut off the corner of Saul's robe. ⁶Afterward, David's heart struck him over the fact that he had cut Saul's corner. ⁷He said to his men, "The LORD forbid that I should do this thing to my lord — to the LORD's anointed — to stretch out my hand against him, for he is the LORD's anointed." ⁸David tore into his men with these words and did not allow them to rise against Saul. Saul got up from the cave and went on his way. ⁹Then David got up, went out of the cave, and called after Saul, "My lord the king!" Saul looked behind him, and David knelt with his face to the ground and bowed low. ¹⁰David said to Saul, "Why do you listen to the words of people who say, 'David is seeking to harm you'? ¹¹This very day your own eyes have seen that the LORD gave you into my hand in the cave. Someone urged me to kill you, but I had compassion on you and said, 'I will not stretch out my hand against my lord, for he is the LORD's anointed.' ¹²Look, my father — yes, look! The corner of your robe is in my hand. When I cut the corner of your robe and did not kill you, know and see that there is no evil or rebellion in my hand. I have not sinned against you, yet you are hunting me to take my life. ¹³May the LORD judge between me and you. May the LORD take vengeance for me against you — but my hand will not touch you. ¹⁴As the ancient proverb says, 'From the wicked comes wickedness' — but my hand will not touch you. ¹⁵After whom has the king of Israel marched out? Whom are you chasing? A dead dog! A single flea! ¹⁶May the LORD be the judge and render judgment between me and you. May he see and take up my case and deliver me from your hand." ¹⁷When David finished speaking these words to Saul, Saul said, "Is that your voice, my son David?" Then Saul lifted his voice and wept. ¹⁸He said to David, "You are more righteous than I am, for you have repaid me with good while I have repaid you with evil. ¹⁹You have shown today how you dealt well with me: the LORD handed me over to you, and you did not kill me. ²⁰When a man finds his enemy, does he send him on his way unharmed? May the LORD repay you with good for what you have done for me today. ²¹Now I know that you will certainly be king, and that the kingdom of Israel will be established in your hand. ²²Now swear to me by the LORD that you will not cut off my descendants after me and that you will not wipe out my name from my father's house." ²³David swore to Saul. Saul went to his home, and David and his men went up to the stronghold.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. WLC verse 1 corresponds to the final clause of KJV 23:29. The noun metsadot ('strongholds, fortified places') refers to the natural rock fortifications in the cliffs above the oasis of En-gedi on the western shore of the Dead Sea. The terrain is riddled with caves and narrow passes — ideal for a fugitive band to defend. En-gedi means 'spring of the young goat,' named for the ibex that still inhabit the area. David moves from the wilderness of Maon to these natural fortifications, trading open desert for defensible high ground.
2. The narrative resumes Saul's obsession with David. The Philistine incursion (23:27-28) had momentarily diverted Saul from the hunt, but the moment the external threat passes, Saul returns to his internal fixation. The verb shuv ('returned') carries ironic weight throughout 1 Samuel: Saul keeps returning to hunt David but never returns to the LORD. The informants who report David's location are unnamed — the text repeatedly shows that David's movements are betrayed by locals (the Ziphites in 23:19, unnamed sources here), heightening the sense that David has no safe refuge except God.
3. The ye'elim ('ibex, wild goats') are the Nubian ibex native to the Judean desert cliffs. The place name later associated with this area is 'the Craggs of the Ibex' (tsurei hayye'elim). The irony is architectural: Saul brings an overwhelming force into terrain that nullifies numerical advantage. The caves, narrow ledges, and vertical rock faces favor the small, mobile band hiding in them — not the army searching from below.
4. We render lehasekh et raglav as 'to relieve himself' — modern, clear, and dignified without being euphemistic to the point of obscurity. The KJV's 'to cover his feet' is a literal rendering of the Hebrew euphemism that no modern English reader would understand. The Vulgate's purgare ventrem ('to empty his belly') was more explicit. The narrative point is vulnerability: the king of Israel is exposed and defenseless in the very cave where his enemy hides.
4. The detail that David's men were 'sitting' (yoshvim) suggests they were encamped, not merely passing through. They had been living in these caves. The participle form indicates ongoing habitation — this was their base of operations.
5. The word ballat ('secretly, stealthily') appears only here and in verse 5 of Ruth 3:7 in this form. David moves with stealth — the act is furtive, not bold. He creeps close enough to Saul to cut his robe without detection, which means he was close enough to kill. The narrative forces the reader to feel the proximity and the restraint.

5. We render kenaf as 'corner' rather than 'skirt' (KJV) because 'skirt' in modern English carries misleading connotations. The kenaf was the border or wing of the outer garment, often bearing tassels (tsitsit) as commanded in Numbers 15:38. It was the part of the garment that carried legal and symbolic significance.
6. We preserve the violent metaphor 'his heart struck him' rather than softening to 'his conscience troubled him' or 'he felt guilty.' The Hebrew is intentionally physical — the verb nakhah makes David's conscience a weapon turned inward. This same verb will describe David 'striking' enemies throughout 2 Samuel. Here, the only blow David lands in this entire chapter is against himself.
6. The connection between this verse and the earlier tearing of Samuel's robe (15:27-28) is unmistakable. In chapter 15, a torn robe signified the kingdom torn from Saul by God's decree. David's cutting of the kanaf flirts with the same symbolism — and David recoils, recognizing that he was acting out a divine prerogative that belongs to God alone.
7. The double use of meshiach YHWH ('the LORD's anointed') is emphatic and deliberate — David is establishing a principle, not making a one-time judgment. This principle will govern his behavior through the rest of 1 Samuel and into 2 Samuel 1, where he executes the man who claims to have killed Saul. The mashiah concept here is political-theological, not yet eschatological, but it plants the seed: there is a category of person whom God has set apart, and human hands must not presume to remove what God has installed.
7. David calls Saul adoni ('my lord') even while hiding from Saul's death squads. This is not sycophancy but covenantal respect for the office. David consistently distinguishes between Saul's personal wickedness and Saul's divinely granted role.
8. We render vayshassa as 'tore into' to preserve the violent energy of the verb. The KJV's 'stayed' is far too mild — this root carries the force of physical rending. David's restraint of his men required the same intensity that killing Saul would have required, channeled in the opposite direction.
8. The juxtaposition of David's inner turmoil and Saul's oblivious departure creates one of the great dramatic ironies in biblical narrative. Saul has no idea that his life was held in another man's hands and returned to him — he simply 'went on his way.'
9. The address adoni hammelekh ('my lord the king') maintains David's consistent stance: he treats Saul as the legitimate sovereign. This is not performance — David uses this title even in the internal dialogue of verse 7. The prostration is likewise genuine, not theatrical. David's theology of anointed kingship requires this posture regardless of Saul's murderous behavior.
9. The narrator builds the scene cinematically: David emerges, calls out, Saul turns, David drops to the ground. Every action is visible against the desert landscape. The private moment in the dark cave has given way to a public confrontation in full daylight.
10. David opens his defense by challenging the source of Saul's hostility — not Saul's own judgment but the divrei adam ('words of men, human speech') that have poisoned his thinking. The verb mevaqesh ('is seeking') is the same verb used of Saul's search for David (verse 3, levaqesh). David reverses the accusation: Saul is seeking David, but the slanderers claim David is seeking Saul's ra'ah ('harm, evil'). David's rhetorical strategy is to separate Saul from his informants, appealing to what Saul can verify with his own eyes rather than what he has been told by others.
11. The textual tradition here has some variation. The MT reads vayyomer ('and he said' or 'and one said') while some manuscripts and the Septuagint read va'amar ('and I said'). We follow the MT, which creates a more honest picture: David acknowledges the pressure to kill without specifying whether it was his own temptation or his men's urging.
11. This is the third occurrence of meshiach YHWH in the chapter (after two in verse 7). The repetition functions like a legal citation — David is building a case on a single foundational principle and returning to it with each argument.
12. The address avi ('my father') is the only time David uses this term for Saul in the chapter. It likely reflects the father-in-law relationship (David married Saul's daughter Michal) but also carries rhetorical weight: a father hunting his own son's life is a perversion of the natural order. David forces Saul to confront the monstrous nature of his pursuit.
12. The word pesha ('rebellion, transgression') is a covenant term — it describes willful breach of a binding agreement, not accidental wrongdoing. David is asserting that he has maintained covenant loyalty to Saul despite Saul's aggression. The three-term denial (ra'ah, pesha, chet) echoes judicial oath formulas where the accused categorically clears himself of all charges.
13. The juxtaposition of 'may the LORD avenge me' and 'my hand will not touch you' is the chapter's ethical thesis in a single verse. David holds simultaneously that he has been genuinely wronged (vengeance is warranted) and that he has no right to execute that vengeance himself. This is not passivity — it is an active theological commitment to let God resolve what human hands must not touch.
14. The phrase mashal haqqadmoni ('proverb of the ancients') suggests an established oral tradition of wisdom sayings predating David's time. The word qadmoni ('ancient, eastern, former') indicates this proverb was already old when David cited it. This is one of our earliest glimpses of proverbial culture in Israel prior to the formal wisdom literature associated with Solomon.
14. David's rhetorical strategy is subtle: he never directly accuses Saul of being wicked. He cites a general principle and lets Saul draw the conclusion. This is more damaging than a direct accusation because Saul must convict himself.
15. The 'dead dog' (kelev met) is the lowest possible self-reference in biblical Hebrew. Dogs in ancient Israel were not domesticated companions but semi-feral scavengers associated with garbage and carrion. A dead dog was worthless refuse. David uses this image in 2 Samuel 9:8 as well (through Mephibosheth). The addition of 'single flea' (par'osh echad) takes the diminishment to the microscopic — David claims he is not even worth the energy required to scratch an itch.

15. The fourfold repetition of acharei ('after') creates a rhythmic, almost mocking cadence. David is not merely arguing — he is performing the absurdity of Saul's pursuit. The rhetoric functions as both self-abasement (a political survival strategy) and genuine theological argument (the king's attention should be on matters worthy of a king, not on a fugitive who poses no threat).
16. The density of legal language in this verse is extraordinary — five judicial terms in a single sentence. David has constructed his entire speech as a legal brief, and this verse is his closing argument. He rests his case not on his own strength but on God's role as cosmic judge. The phrase veyarev et rivi ('may he contend my contention') uses the figura etymologica (cognate accusative) for emphasis — 'may he argue my argument, may he fight my fight.'
16. This verse closes David's speech. Everything from verse 10 through verse 16 forms a coherent courtroom address: evidence presentation (the robe corner), witness testimony (Saul's own eyes), character defense (the proverb), and the final appeal to the supreme Judge.
17. The question 'Is this your voice?' may suggest distance — David called from far enough away that Saul could hear words but not clearly identify the speaker. Or it may be an emotional question: 'Can it really be you saying these things?' The ambiguity is productive and we preserve it.
17. Saul's weeping here must be read against 1 Samuel 26:21-25, where Saul makes a nearly identical response after David spares him a second time. The pattern — Saul weeps, acknowledges David's righteousness, then resumes hunting — raises the question of whether Saul's repentance is genuine or merely situational. The narrator does not resolve this; Saul's sincerity is left to the reader's judgment.
18. The phrase tsaddiq attah mimmenni echoes Genesis 38:26, where Judah says of Tamar tsadqah mimmenni ('she is more righteous than I'). Both are moments where a man in power confesses that the person he wronged is in the right. The verbal parallel is unlikely to be accidental — the narrator invites the reader to see David in the role of the wronged party who holds moral authority over the powerful.
18. The verb gamal has agricultural overtones — 'to ripen, to bring to full growth.' Applied to human actions, it means to bring an action to its full consequence: to repay in kind. Saul acknowledges that David's actions have matured into goodness while his own have matured into evil.
19. The verb siggerani ('he shut me in, he delivered me') comes from sagar, meaning 'to close, to shut, to hand over.' It portrays God closing Saul into David's hand the way a gate closes around a prisoner — Saul was trapped, enclosed, and entirely at David's mercy. Saul now interprets the cave encounter from David's perspective: God did deliver Saul into David's power, and David chose mercy. The acknowledgment higadta ('you have declared, you have shown') uses the Hiphil of nagad, a verb of public disclosure — David's act of mercy was not merely felt but demonstrated, made visible and undeniable.
20. Saul's blessing here is genuine in the moment, though the narrative will show that it does not last. The reader must hold two truths simultaneously: Saul is sincerely moved, and Saul will resume his pursuit. The text does not psychoanalyze Saul's inner state — it simply records his words and leaves the tension unresolved.
20. The verb yeshallemechah ('may he repay you') uses the same root as Solomon's name (Shelomoh) and the city of Jerusalem (Yerushalayim). The prayer is for God to bring David to shalom — a state of completeness and wholeness that stands in stark contrast to David's current condition as a hunted fugitive.
21. The phrase malokh timlok echoes God's own speech patterns — the infinitive absolute plus finite verb construction is characteristically divine in the Hebrew Bible. Whether Saul is consciously echoing prophetic language or simply using emphatic grammar, the effect is the same: his statement carries the weight of inevitability.
21. This verse connects directly to Jonathan's earlier acknowledgment in 23:17: 'You will be king over Israel, and I will be second to you — and even my father Saul knows this.' Jonathan was right. Saul did know. The difference is that Jonathan embraced it while Saul has fought against it with three thousand soldiers.
22. Saul's request anticipates a common practice in ancient Near Eastern dynastic succession: the incoming king would eliminate all potential rivals from the previous dynasty. This actually happened in the northern kingdom of Israel repeatedly (1 Kings 15:29, 16:11, 2 Kings 10:17). Saul's fear was entirely realistic. David's oath here will be honored in 2 Samuel 9, where he brings Jonathan's son Mephibosheth to the royal table — though it will be complicated by the Gibeonite incident in 2 Samuel 21.
22. The pairing of 'seed' (zera) and 'name' (shem) covers both biological and memorial continuation. To have descendants but no name is to be forgotten; to have a name but no descendants is to have no one to carry it. Saul asks for both forms of survival.
23. The word metsudah ('stronghold, fortress') is the same word from verse 1 (metsadot is the plural). The chapter forms an inclusio — it begins and ends with David in the strongholds of the wilderness. The narrative cycle is complete but unresolved: the theological argument has been made, the moral verdict rendered, and yet the political situation remains unchanged. David will not seize the kingdom; he will wait. This patient endurance — the willingness to live in the metsudah while God works out the transfer of the mamlakhah — is the chapter's final statement about what it means to trust the LORD's timing.
23. The contrast between beito ('his home') and hametsudah ('the stronghold') encapsulates the two men's situations: Saul has a house but is losing a kingdom; David has no house but is gaining one. The narrator does not editorialize — the geography does the work.

25

Summary: Samuel dies, and all Israel gathers to mourn him at Ramah. The narrative immediately shifts to David in the wilderness of Paran, where he encounters a wealthy Calebite named Nabal whose name means 'Fool.' David's men have been protecting Nabal's shepherds, but when David sends messengers requesting provisions during sheep-shearing, Nabal insults David and refuses. David straps on his sword and marches with four hundred men to destroy Nabal's household. Abigail, Nabal's wise and perceptive wife, intercepts David with generous provisions and delivers one of the most theologically sophisticated speeches in the Hebrew Bible — invoking the bundle of the living, divine restraint from bloodguilt, and David's future kingship. David relents, crediting God for sending Abigail to prevent him from avenging himself. When Abigail tells Nabal what happened, his heart dies within him and he becomes like a stone; ten days later the LORD strikes him dead. David then sends for Abigail and takes her as his wife.

What Makes This Remarkable: Abigail's speech in verses 24-31 is extraordinary in scope and theological precision. She is the first person in the narrative to speak of David's kingdom as an established certainty — a 'secure house' (bayit ne'eman) that the LORD will build, the same language later used in the Davidic covenant of 2 Samuel 7. She introduces the image of the 'bundle of the living' (tseror ha-chayyim), a metaphor for divine safekeeping that has no parallel elsewhere in the Hebrew Bible and became central to Jewish memorial tradition. She speaks of David's enemies being 'slung out as from the hollow of a sling' — a deliberate echo of David's victory over Goliath using the same weapon. This woman, married to a fool, articulates covenant theology with a clarity that surpasses anything Samuel's own sons managed. The chapter also functions as a moral test for David: he passed the test of not killing Saul (chapters 24, 26) but nearly fails here, ready to massacre an entire household over an insult. It takes a woman's wisdom to do what the prophet Samuel's death left undone — speak God's restraining word to the future king.

Translation Friction: The central tension is David's near-descent into blood vengeance. His oath in verse 22 — to destroy every male in Nabal's household by morning — would have made him no different from Saul, who slaughtered the priests of Nob over a perceived slight (chapter 22). The text presents David's rage as genuine and his intent as murderous, not ceremonial. Translators must render his oath with its full violence: this is not a frustrated outburst but a military operation already underway. The chapter also raises the uncomfortable question of divine violence: the LORD strikes Nabal dead (verse 38), executing the judgment David was prevented from carrying out. The narrator treats this as justice, but the mechanism — Nabal's heart 'dying within him' after hearing what almost happened — blurs the line between divine act and natural consequence. The name theology is also challenging: verse 25 has Abigail say 'as his name is, so is he — Nabal is his name, and foolishness (nevalah) is with him.' This is not gentle wordplay but a wife publicly declaring her husband's character as definitional ruin.

Connections: Samuel's death in verse 1 bookends his birth narrative in chapter 1, completing the arc of the last judge. The wilderness setting connects David to Moses and Elijah — leaders tested in the desert before assuming their roles. Abigail's phrase 'bundle of the living' (tseror ha-chayyim, verse 29) became the basis for the Jewish memorial formula 'may his/her soul be bound in the bundle of life,' inscribed on tombstones for centuries. Her prediction that God will 'sling out' David's enemies (verse 29) recalls the sling of chapter 17, linking David's identity as shepherd-warrior to his future as king. The 'secure house' (bayit ne'eman) that Abigail promises anticipates the Davidic covenant in 2 Samuel 7:16, where God promises David's house and kingdom will endure forever. Nabal's connection to Caleb (verse 3) ties this story to the conquest tradition — the Calebites received Hebron as their inheritance (Joshua 14:13-14), and it is Hebron where David will first be crowned king (2 Samuel 2:1-4). David's marriage to Abigail, alongside the note about Ahinoam of Jezreel and the loss of Michal to Palti (verses 43-44), maps the political marriages that will shape his dynasty.

¹Samuel died. All Israel gathered and mourned for him, and they buried him at his home in Ramah. Then David set out and went down to the wilderness of Paran. ²There was a man in Maon whose business was in Carmel. The man was very wealthy — he had three thousand sheep and a thousand goats — and he was shearing his sheep in Carmel. ³The man's name was Nabal, and his wife's name was Abigail. The woman was intelligent and beautiful, but the man was harsh and destructive in his dealings. He was a Calebite. ⁴David heard in the wilderness that Nabal was shearing his sheep. ⁵David sent ten young men and told them, "Go up to Carmel. When you come to Nabal, greet him in my name with peace. ⁶Say to him: 'Life to you! Peace to you, peace to your household, and peace to everything you have. ⁷I have heard that you have shearers. Now, your shepherds were with us, and we did not mistreat them, and nothing of theirs went missing the whole time they were in Carmel. ⁸Ask your own servants and they will tell you. So let my young men find favor in your eyes, for we have come on a feast day. Please give whatever you have at hand to your servants and to your son David.'" ⁹David's young men came and delivered all these words to Nabal in David's name, and then they waited. ¹⁰Nabal answered David's servants and said, "Who is David? Who is this son of Jesse? These days, runaway slaves are everywhere — servants breaking away from their masters. ¹¹Should I take my bread, my water, and the meat I have slaughtered for my shearers and give it to men I do not even know where they come from?" ¹²David's young men turned around and went back. When they arrived, they reported all of this to him. ¹³David said to his men, "Every man strap on his sword." Each man strapped on his sword, and David strapped on his sword as well. About four hundred men went up behind David, while two hundred stayed with the supplies. ¹⁴But one of the servants told Abigail, Nabal's wife, "David sent messengers from the wilderness to bless our master, and he screamed at them. ¹⁵But those men were very good to us. We were never mistreated, and we never lost anything the whole time we moved about with them in the open country. ¹⁶They were a wall around us, both night and day, the entire time we were with them tending the flock. ¹⁷So know this and consider what you will do, because disaster is closing in on our master and on his entire household. And he is such a worthless wretch that no one can speak to him." ¹⁸Abigail moved quickly. She took two hundred loaves of bread, two skins of wine, five sheep already dressed, five measures of roasted grain, a hundred clusters of raisins, and two hundred fig cakes, and loaded them on donkeys. ¹⁹She told her servants, "Go on ahead of me. I will be right behind you." But she did not tell her husband Nabal. ²⁰As she was riding her donkey down a hidden path on the mountain, David and his men came descending toward her, and she met them face to face. ²¹Now David had been saying, "It was all for nothing that I guarded everything this man owns in the wilderness, so that nothing of his went missing — and he has repaid me evil for good. ²²May God do the same to David's enemies — and worse — if by morning I leave alive a single male of everything he owns." ²³When Abigail saw David, she quickly dismounted from the donkey, fell on her face before David, and bowed to the ground. ²⁴She fell at his feet and said, "On me alone, my lord — let the guilt fall on me. Please, let your servant speak in your hearing, and listen to the words of your servant. ²⁵Please, my lord, do not give this worthless man a second thought — this Nabal. For as his name is, so is he: his name is Fool, and foolishness clings to him. But I, your servant, did not see the young men my lord sent. ²⁶And now, my lord — as the LORD lives, and as you yourself live — it is the LORD who has held you back from bloodshed and from delivering justice with your own hand. Now let your enemies and those who seek to harm my lord become like Nabal. ²⁷And now, let this gift that your servant has brought to my lord be given to the young men who march at my lord's side. ²⁸Please forgive your servant's offense. For the LORD will certainly build my lord a lasting house, because my lord fights the battles of the LORD, and no evil has been found in you all your days. ²⁹Should anyone rise up to pursue you and seek your life, the life of my lord will be bound secure in the bundle of the living with the LORD your God. But the lives of your enemies — he will sling them away like a stone from the hollow of a sling. ³⁰And when the LORD has done for my lord everything good that he has promised concerning you, and has appointed you as leader over Israel — ³¹then this will not be a staggering burden or a stumbling block on my lord's conscience — the shedding of innocent blood, or my lord taking vengeance into his own hands. And when the LORD has dealt well with my lord, remember your servant." ³²David said to Abigail, "Blessed be the LORD, the God of Israel, who sent you this day to meet me. ³³Blessed be your discernment, and blessed be you yourself, who kept me this day from bloodshed and from delivering justice with my own hand. ³⁴But as the LORD, the God of Israel, lives — the one who held me back from harming you — if you had not hurried to meet me, by the light of morning not a single male would have been left to Nabal." ³⁵David accepted from her hand what she had brought him and said to her, "Go up to your home in peace. See — I have listened to your voice and granted your request." ³⁶Abigail came home to Nabal, and there he was — holding a feast in his house like the feast of a king. Nabal's heart was merry, and he was extremely drunk. So she told him nothing at all, small or great, until the light of morning. ³⁷In the morning, when the wine had left Nabal, his wife told him everything. His heart died within him, and he became like a stone.

³⁸About ten days later, the LORD struck Nabal, and he died. ³⁹When David heard that Nabal was dead, he said, "Blessed be the LORD, who has taken up my case against the insult from Nabal's hand, and who held back his servant from doing wrong. The LORD has brought Nabal's wickedness down on his own head." Then David sent word to Abigail and proposed marriage to her. ⁴⁰David's servants came to Abigail at Carmel and said to her, "David has sent us to you to take you as his wife." ⁴¹She rose, bowed with her face to the ground, and said, "Here is your servant — a maidservant ready to wash the feet of my lord's servants." ⁴²Abigail quickly rose, mounted her donkey, and with five of her attendants walking behind her, she followed David's messengers and became his wife. ⁴³David had also married Ahinoam of Jezreel, so both of them became his wives. ⁴⁴Meanwhile, Saul had given his daughter Michal, David's wife, to Palti son of Laish, who was from Gallim.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The burial at 'his house in Ramah' echoes the opening of Samuel's story — Ramah was his family's home (1:19), the place of his birth and now his burial. The phrase bevento ('in his house') may indicate burial in a family tomb on the household property, a common practice in ancient Israel.
1. The wilderness of Paran is a vast desert region in the northern Sinai, far from Saul's reach. Some manuscripts and the Septuagint read 'Maon' instead of 'Paran,' which would place David closer to the events that follow. The Masoretic text's 'Paran' emphasizes David's isolation — he is as far from power as a person can be in the land of Israel.
2. The word gadol ('great') here refers primarily to wealth and social standing, not moral greatness. The narrator sets up the contrast immediately: this man is great in possessions but, as we will learn, small in character. Three thousand sheep and a thousand goats represents enormous wealth by ancient Judean standards. Carmel here is not Mount Carmel in the north but a town in the hill country of Judah, south of Hebron (modern Khirbet el-Kirmil). Sheep-shearing was a festive occasion — a time of abundance when generosity was culturally expected, making Nabal's refusal in verse 11 all the more egregious.
3. The name Naval (often spelled Nabal) means 'fool, senseless one' in Hebrew. It is almost certainly a pejorative characterization rather than a birth name — no parent would name a child 'Fool.' The narrator may be using the name the community gave him, or it may function as a literary device. Either way, verse 25 will make the name theology explicit.
3. The phrase ra ma'alalim ('evil of deeds/dealings') uses ma'alalim, which refers to habitual actions or practices — this is not a single bad act but a pattern of destructive behavior. The same word appears in prophetic indictments (Jeremiah 4:4, Micah 3:4) to describe Israel's persistent unfaithfulness.
4. Sheep-shearing was the ancient equivalent of harvest festival — a time of feasting, generosity, and open hospitality. For David and his men, who had been protecting Nabal's flocks in the wilderness (as the servants will confirm in verses 15-16), this was the natural moment to request compensation. David's approach follows established custom, not extortion.
5. The phrase ush'eltem-lo vishmi leshalom ('ask after him in my name for peace') is a formal diplomatic greeting — David sends an official delegation, not a raiding party. The number ten suggests a significant embassy. The word shalom here functions as both greeting and implicit request: David offers peace and expects the reciprocal obligations that peace entails.
6. The greeting koh lechai ('thus to the living one' or 'life to you') is a festive salutation appropriate for the sheep-shearing celebration. The threefold repetition of shalom — to Nabal personally, to his household, and to all his possessions — is extravagant courtesy. David is doing everything right by the conventions of the culture: formal delegation, proper greeting, blessing before request. This makes Nabal's response in verse 10-11 all the more shocking.
7. The verb hiklamnum ('we shamed/mistreated them') comes from kalam, meaning to humiliate, insult, or harm. David's claim is that his men not only avoided harassing Nabal's shepherds but actively protected them — a claim the servants will independently verify in verses 15-16. The phrase lo nifqad lahem me'umah ('nothing was missing to them, not anything') uses the Niphal of paqad ('to reckon, to miss upon counting') — when the flock was tallied, not a single animal was unaccounted for. This was the result of David's protection.
8. David's self-designation as 'your son' (binekha) is deliberate diplomatic humility — he places himself in the position of a junior relation seeking a patron's generosity. The phrase yom tov ('good day, feast day') refers to the sheep-shearing festival, when abundance made generosity easy and refusal shameful. David's request — 'whatever your hand finds' (et asher timtsa yadekha) — is intentionally open-ended, leaving the amount to Nabal's discretion rather than naming a specific demand. This is the language of a respectful petitioner, not a warlord issuing demands.
9. The verb vayyanuchu ('and they rested/waited') indicates the messengers finished speaking and stood in respectful silence, awaiting a response. The verb nuach can mean 'to rest' or 'to settle, to wait.' They have delivered the message exactly as instructed and now pause — the ball is in Nabal's court.
10. Nabal's response is a calculated insult on every level. The question 'Who is David?' feigns ignorance of the man all Israel knows as Saul's former champion and the anointed future king. Calling him 'son of Jesse' reduces David to his father's obscure household rather than acknowledging his public identity. The word hammitparetsiym ('those who break loose, who burst away') characterizes David as a fugitive slave, not a legitimate leader. Nabal is publicly framing David as a rebellious servant of Saul — a politically dangerous accusation that aligns Nabal with the ruling king and brands David's band as outlaws.

11. The possessive pronouns are emphatic and repeated: my bread, my water, my slaughtered meat. Nabal sees everything as his own property, owed to no one. The phrase lo yadati ei mizzeh hemmah ('I do not know from where they are') is not geographic ignorance but social dismissal — he refuses to acknowledge David's people as having any standing or claim. The irony is thick: Nabal's own servants know exactly who David is and what his men have done (verses 14-17), but Nabal either will not or cannot see past his own possessiveness. The verb tavachti ('I have slaughtered') emphasizes the labor of preparation — this feast is for his shearers, his workers, his celebration. No outsider will share it.
12. The verbs pile up in rapid succession — vayyahpekhu ('they turned'), vayyashuvu ('they returned'), vayyavo'u ('they came'), vayyaggidu ('they reported') — conveying the urgency of messengers who know the insult will provoke a violent response. They deliver the words exactly as spoken, letting Nabal's contempt arrive at David's ears without softening.
13. The threefold repetition of 'sword' (cherev) — strap on his sword, they strapped on his sword, David strapped on his sword — creates a drumbeat of escalation. The narrative slows down to let the reader feel the momentum of violence building. David does not deliberate, does not pray, does not consult God. The contrast with chapter 23, where David repeatedly 'inquired of the LORD' before any military action, is striking and deliberate. Four hundred armed men against a sheep-farmer's household is not a proportional response — it is a punitive massacre force. The two hundred who stay with the supplies (kelim) follow standard military protocol (see 30:24), confirming this is a full military operation.
14. The servant goes directly to Abigail, bypassing Nabal entirely — a detail that reveals the household's internal dynamics. The servants know who actually manages crises. The verb vayyaat ('he flew at them, he screamed at them') comes from a root meaning to rush at or pounce, suggesting Nabal did not merely decline but verbally attacked the messengers. The servant's choice of the word levarekh ('to bless') rather than 'to ask' frames David's approach in the most favorable light possible — the messengers came with blessing, and the master responded with abuse.
15. The servant independently confirms David's claims from verse 7 — the verb hiklamnu ('we were shamed/mistreated') and the phrase lo faqadnu me'umah ('we did not miss anything') mirror David's own words exactly. This is unsolicited corroboration from Nabal's own household. The phrase hithallakhnu ittam ('we walked about with them') uses the same Hithpael of halakh that described Samuel's public conduct in chapter 12 — David's men conducted themselves honorably alongside the shepherds.
16. The metaphor chomah ('wall') is powerful — David's men were not merely present but formed a protective barrier around the shepherds and their flocks. This is military-grade protection described in architectural terms. The emphasis on 'both night and day' (gam-laylah gam-yomam) means continuous security, the kind that prevents losses from both predators and raiders. The servant is making the case that David has already earned compensation through concrete service.
17. The phrase ben-beliyya'al is notoriously difficult. Beliyya'al may derive from beli ('without') and ya'al ('worth, profit'), yielding 'worthless one,' or from beli ('without') and ol ('yoke'), yielding 'without restraint, lawless.' In either case, it describes someone who has placed themselves outside the obligations of community and covenant. The term appears throughout Judges and Samuel to describe the worst kinds of people — the men of Gibeah (Judges 19:22), Eli's sons (1 Samuel 2:12), and now Nabal. A servant applying this term to his own master is an act of social desperation.
18. The verb vattamaher ('she hurried') opens Abigail's response and sets the pace for everything that follows — urgency drives every action. The provisions are lavish and precisely enumerated: this is not a token offering but a feast on the move. The 'five sheep already dressed' (asuyot, literally 'made, prepared') means they are already slaughtered and ready to eat — Abigail raids the sheep-shearing feast to provision David. The five seahs of roasted grain (qali) is a substantial quantity, roughly equivalent to about seven gallons of parched wheat. The raisins and fig cakes are concentrated, portable, high-energy foods — trail provisions for fighting men. Abigail is not merely generous; she is tactically precise, assembling exactly what a wilderness military company needs.
19. Abigail's decision not to tell Nabal is both practical and subversive. Practically, he would have refused or interfered. Narratively, it positions Abigail as acting independently of her husband's authority — a bold move in a patriarchal society that the text presents without criticism. The servants go ahead to create a procession of gifts that David will encounter before Abigail arrives, softening the approach. Abigail is staging the encounter with the same care a diplomat would bring to a hostage negotiation.
20. The phrase beseter hahar ('in the cover/hidden part of the mountain') suggests a concealed ravine or path where the mountain blocks the view — Abigail and David cannot see each other until they are suddenly face to face. The verb vatifgosh ('she met, she encountered') implies an unexpected meeting at close range. The scene is cinematic: the woman descending with provisions meets the armed column ascending for slaughter, both hidden from each other by the terrain until the last moment.
21. The narrator inserts David's inner monologue (or words to his men) using the pluperfect 'had said' (amar with context indicating prior speech), showing what was driving him as he marched. The phrase akh lashseger ('surely for falsehood/in vain') expresses bitter disillusionment — David's service was wasted, treated as if it never happened. The formula ra'ah tachat tovah ('evil in place of good') is a standard biblical expression for betrayal of kindness (see Psalm 35:12, 38:20). David is not merely angry about provisions; he feels the moral outrage of violated reciprocity.
22. We render mashtin beqir as 'a single male' because the Hebrew idiom, while anatomically specific, functions as a comprehensive term for all males. The oath formula koh ya'aseh... vekoh yosif ('may God do thus and add more') appears frequently in Samuel and Kings as the most binding form of self-curse. David has placed himself under divine penalty if he fails to carry out the massacre. The mention of 'by morning' (ad-habboqer) gives the timeline: this is tonight's operation.
23. Every verb conveys speed and submission: vattamaher ('she hurried'), vattered ('she descended'), vattippol ('she fell'), vattishtachu ('she bowed down'). Abigail's physical posture — face down on the ground before an armed and furious David — is total vulnerability. She places herself between David's army and her household, using her own body as the first line of negotiation. The word aretz ('to the ground/earth') emphasizes how completely she prostrates herself.

24. Abigail's speech (verses 24-31) is carefully structured rhetorical art. She begins with self-abasement (v24), deflects blame to Nabal's character (v25), reframes the situation theologically (v26), offers gifts (v27), requests forgiveness (v28a), delivers a prophetic promise about David's dynasty (v28b-29), warns against bloodguilt (v30-31a), and asks to be remembered (v31b). This is not spontaneous pleading — it is a masterwork of persuasion under mortal pressure.
25. A wife publicly declaring her husband a fool whose name defines his character is extraordinary in the ancient Near East. Abigail is not merely being diplomatic — she is throwing Nabal under the rhetorical chariot to save her household. The distinction between naval (fool) and nevalah (disgraceful folly, outrage) is important: naval describes the person; nevalah describes the moral quality of his actions. Together they form a complete condemnation.
26. The phrase mibbo vedamim ('from coming into bloods') uses the plural damim, which in Hebrew specifically denotes bloodguilt — the stain of unjust killing. Abigail is not merely saying David would have killed people; she is saying he would have incurred guilt that would follow him into his kingship. This is prophetic counsel of the highest order: she is protecting David's future moral authority.
26. The curse-wish 'let your enemies become like Nabal' is both brilliant rhetoric and prophecy. If Nabal is the fool whose own name condemns him, then to wish someone 'become like Nabal' is to wish them into self-destructive futility — which is exactly what will happen to Nabal himself within days.
27. The word berakhah ('blessing') for the provisions elevates a food delivery into a covenantal act — this is not payment or bribery but blessing, the overflow of goodwill. Abigail directs it to the soldiers (hanne'arim hammathalkhim beraglei adoni, 'the young men who walk at the feet of my lord'), acknowledging David's military company with respect while also subtly reminding him that his men need food, not vengeance.
28. The phrase bayit ne'eman ('lasting house, faithful house') is among the most significant theological terms in the Davidic tradition. When Abigail speaks these words, David is a fugitive living in caves. She sees through his present circumstances to his covenant destiny. The same language appears in 1 Kings 11:38 when God promises Jeroboam a lasting house if he obeys — a promise Jeroboam will forfeit. Abigail's use of this language is prophetic in the fullest sense.
29. The phrase tseror ha-chayyim has been rendered various ways: 'bundle of life,' 'bundle of the living,' 'pouch of life.' We choose 'bundle of the living' to preserve both the concrete image (a tied bundle) and the theological meaning (belonging among those who live in God's care). The preposition et ('with') after tseror ha-chayyim indicates that David's life is bound up together with the LORD — not merely protected by God but held in the same bundle, in intimate proximity.
29. The sling imagery (yeqalle'ennah betokh kaf haqqala, 'he will sling them in the hollow of the sling') is a brilliant double reference. On the literal level, it recalls David's victory over Goliath. On the theological level, it describes divine expulsion — the enemies' lives will be hurled away from God's presence with the same force and finality as a sling stone.
30. The word nagid is distinct from melekh ('king'). A nagid is one designated by God to lead — the term emphasizes divine appointment rather than human political authority. Abigail's use of this specific word rather than 'king' shows theological precision: David's authority comes from God's command, not from military conquest or popular acclaim.
31. The word puqah is a hapax legomenon — it occurs only here in the entire Hebrew Bible. Its meaning must be derived from context and cognate languages: something that causes staggering, wavering, or moral disorientation. Abigail is coining a word for the psychological torment David would carry if he follows through with the massacre.
31. Abigail's speech ends where it began — with herself. She opened by taking the blame (verse 24) and closes by asking to be remembered (verse 31). The request vezakharta et amatekha ('and you will remember your servant') is both a plea for future patronage and, as the narrative will reveal, a subtle opening for the relationship that follows Nabal's death.
32. David's first word is barukh ('blessed') — directed not at Abigail but at God. He immediately recognizes divine providence in the encounter: asher shelachekh ('who sent you'). David sees Abigail's arrival as God's intervention, not human initiative. This is the theological reading Abigail herself proposed in verse 26 — the LORD held David back — and David accepts it completely. The phrase hayyom hazzeh ('this day') marks the encounter as a turning point: today, God acted through a woman to prevent a king from becoming a murderer.
33. David pronounces a threefold blessing: on God (verse 32), on Abigail's discernment (ta'amekh, literally 'your taste, your judgment'), and on Abigail herself (berukhah att). The word ta'am means taste or discernment — the ability to judge rightly, to distinguish what is fitting. David then echoes Abigail's own language from verse 26: mibbo vedamim ('from coming into bloodshed') and hosheet yadi li ('saving my hand for myself'). He has fully internalized her argument. By repeating her exact theological framing, David acknowledges that he was on the wrong path and that Abigail's intervention was God's own restraint.
34. David acknowledges how close the massacre came with chilling specificity. The oath formula chai-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') makes this a sworn statement. The counterfactual lulei mihhart ('if you had not hurried') credits Abigail's speed — her repeated vattamaher ('she hurried') — as the decisive factor. David repeats his original oath language from verse 22 (mashtin beqir, 'one who urinates against a wall' — any male) but now speaks of it as averted catastrophe rather than determined purpose. The phrase mera aotakh ('from doing evil to you') is revealing: David recognizes that the massacre would have been evil done to Abigail, not just to Nabal. He has come to see the innocent who would have been swept up in his vengeance.

35. The phrase vaessa panayikh ('I have lifted your face') is an idiom for showing favor, accepting a person's petition. David uses the same verb (nasa, 'to lift') that Abigail used when she asked him to 'lift away' her transgression (verse 28). The language of lifting — lifting guilt away, lifting the face in acceptance — threads through the exchange. David's dismissal leshalom ('in peace') is the same word that opened his embassy to Nabal (verse 5-6). The peace that Nabal refused, David now returns to Abigail. The phrase shamati beqolekh ('I have listened to your voice') echoes the opening of chapter 12 (Samuel saying 'I have listened to your voice') — David, the future king, heeds wise counsel as Samuel heeded Israel's demand, but this time the counsel is wise rather than misguided.
36. The phrase kemishteh hammelekh ('like a king's feast') is loaded with political irony. Nabal, who dismissed David as a runaway slave (verse 10), feasts as royalty while the actual anointed king marches in the wilderness. The narrator's contempt is barely concealed.
37. Medical commentators have speculated about the nature of Nabal's condition — stroke, heart attack, or severe shock leading to a catatonic state. The text is more interested in theological than medical precision: the man who lived as a fool dies as a stone, his inner life extinguished before his body follows. The ten-day interval before actual death (verse 38) may indicate a coma or progressive organ failure.
38. The verb vayyiggo ('he struck') is a divine action verb — the LORD is the explicit subject. The narrator leaves no ambiguity: this is not a natural death following illness but a divine execution. The same verb (nagaf) is used for God striking the Egyptians (Exodus 12:23) and for divine punishment of Israel (2 Samuel 24:17). The ten-day interval between the heart-death and the body-death creates a grim symmetry with the ten days of sheep-shearing festivity. The man who feasted while others went hungry now lies dying for ten days. God does what David was restrained from doing — but in God's own time and by God's own hand.
39. The speed of David's proposal raises questions about motive. Is this a love story, a political acquisition of a wealthy Calebite estate, or both? The narrator offers no internal commentary on David's feelings — only his theological speech and his immediate action. The verb vayedaber ba'avigayil ('he spoke concerning Abigail') uses the preposition be, which in this context means 'concerning' or 'about' — he sent messengers to negotiate the marriage, following proper protocol.
40. The messengers come to Carmel — the same location where the whole crisis began with the sheep-shearing. The proposal is direct and unadorned: David shelachanu elayikh leqachtekh lo le-ishah ('David has sent us to you to take you to him as a wife'). In ancient Israelite marriage practice, the groom's representatives negotiate with the bride's family. With Nabal dead, Abigail is the head of household, and the proposal comes directly to her.
41. Abigail's response is an extravagant act of humility: she offers to wash the feet not of David himself but of his servants — placing herself beneath even the lowest member of David's household. The word shifchah ('maidservant') is a lower status term than amah ('female servant'), which she used in her earlier speech. She deliberately lowers her self-designation for the acceptance. The phrase lirchots raglei avdei adoni ('to wash the feet of the servants of my lord') reflects ancient Near Eastern hospitality customs where foot-washing was typically performed by the lowest-ranking household member. Abigail's offer is both culturally appropriate humility and a rhetorical masterstroke — the wealthy widow of a great landowner presents herself as willing to serve at the most basic level.
42. Once again the verb vattamaher ('she hurried') characterizes Abigail — the same urgency that drove her to intercept David now drives her toward marriage. The five attendants (na'aroteyha) indicate that Abigail brings her own household retinue, confirming her status and wealth. She follows David's messengers (mal'akhei David) rather than preceding them, maintaining the posture of one who has been summoned. The final clause — vattehi-lo le-ishah ('and she became his wife') — is terse and final, closing Abigail's transition from Nabal's household to David's.
43. Ahinoam of Jezreel is mentioned with minimal introduction — she appears to have married David before Abigail, though the timeline is uncertain. The Jezreel here is likely a town in the Judean hill country, not the more famous Jezreel in the north. The narrator notes David's growing household without comment, but the accumulation of wives signals David's increasing status as a political figure. In the ancient Near East, multiple marriages were instruments of alliance and wealth consolidation as much as personal choice.
44. The chapter closes with a devastating political note. Michal, identified pointedly as eshet David ('David's wife'), has been given by Saul to another man. The verb natan ('he gave') treats Michal as property transferred by royal authority — Saul is dissolving David's marriage to his daughter, severing the dynastic tie that once bound them. This is both a personal betrayal and a political act: by removing David's connection to the royal family, Saul attempts to delegitimize David's claim to the throne. Palti (or Paltiel, as in 2 Samuel 3:15) son of Laish from Gallim is otherwise unknown — a nobody who receives a king's daughter because the king wants to erase his son-in-law. The placement of this verse at the end of the chapter creates a bitter frame: David gains two wives but loses the one who was his first and who represents his connection to Saul's house. The full weight of this verse will not be felt until 2 Samuel 3:14-16, when David demands Michal back and Palti follows her, weeping.

Summary: The Ziphites again betray David's location to Saul, and Saul pursues him into the wilderness of Ziph with three thousand chosen soldiers. David scouts Saul's camp and discovers it unguarded in the night, the entire army fallen into a supernatural deep sleep (tardemah) sent by the LORD. Abishai urges David to kill Saul, but David refuses to touch the LORD's anointed (mashiach YHWH), taking only Saul's spear and water jug as proof. From a distant hilltop, David calls out to Abner, shaming him for failing to guard the king, then addresses Saul directly. Saul acknowledges his own guilt a final time, blesses David, and the two separate — never to meet face to face again.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is structured as a mirror of chapter 24 (the cave at En-gedi), yet every detail has been intensified. In chapter 24, David stumbled upon Saul in a cave by accident; here, David deliberately infiltrates the enemy camp at night. In chapter 24, David cut Saul's robe — a symbolic act he immediately regretted; here, David takes Saul's spear (chanit) and water jug (tsapachath hammayim), symbols of royal power and basic sustenance. The spear is Saul's signature weapon, the same one he hurled at David (18:11, 19:10) and at Jonathan (20:33), and the one he planted in the ground beside his head as a royal standard. By removing it without violence, David performs a devastating symbolic act: he disarms the king without drawing blood. Most remarkable is the tardemah in verse 12 — the same word used for the deep sleep God placed on Adam before creating Eve (Genesis 2:21) and on Abraham during the covenant of the pieces (Genesis 15:12). This is not ordinary exhaustion. The narrator explicitly states it came from the LORD, marking the entire scene as divinely orchestrated. God opened the way for David to kill Saul and David chose restraint.

Translation Friction: The central theological tension is David's twice-stated principle that the LORD's anointed must not be struck by human hands (verses 9-11). David insists that the LORD himself must deal with Saul — through natural death, battle, or divine judgment. This raises a difficult question: if God sent the tardemah to give David access to Saul, was God testing David or tempting him? Abishai reads the situation as divine permission to kill ('God has delivered your enemy into your hand today,' verse 8), while David reads the same situation as a divine test of loyalty to the principle of mashiach YHWH. The text does not resolve this explicitly — it lets David's interpretation stand by showing Saul's subsequent acknowledgment. A second tension emerges in verses 19-20: David's complaint that his enemies have 'driven him out from sharing in the LORD's inheritance' and told him to 'go serve other gods.' This is not hyperbole. In the ancient Near Eastern worldview, to be exiled from your god's territory was to be cut off from that god's presence. David is making a theological protest: forced exile is spiritual violence, not merely political displacement. His request that his blood not fall 'to the ground far from the LORD's face' reveals a man genuinely afraid of dying outside God's domain.

Connections: The tardemah (deep sleep) connects this passage to Genesis 2:21 (Adam's sleep before the creation of Eve) and Genesis 15:12 (Abraham's sleep during the covenant ceremony). In all three cases, God acts decisively while the human sleeps — creating, covenanting, and here, demonstrating David's worthiness to rule. David's refusal to harm the LORD's anointed anticipates 2 Samuel 1:14-16, where David executes the Amalekite who claims to have killed Saul, applying the same principle retroactively. The spear (chanit) as a symbol of Saul's kingship connects to 1 Samuel 22:6, where Saul holds court with his spear in hand, and to its final appearance planted in the ground at Gibeah. David's lament about being 'driven from the LORD's inheritance' (nachalat YHWH, verse 19) anticipates the theological geography of the Psalms, where exile from God's land equals exile from God's presence (Psalm 42:1-2, 63:1). Saul's final words — 'I have played the fool and gone badly astray' (verse 21) — echo and surpass his partial confession in 24:17, and stand as the last direct words Saul will speak to David in the entire narrative.

¹The Ziphites came to Saul at Gibeah and said, "David is hiding on the hill of Hachilah, overlooking the wasteland." ²Saul set out and went down to the wilderness of Ziph, and with him three thousand of Israel's picked soldiers, to hunt for David in the wilderness of Ziph. ³Saul made camp on the hill of Hachilah, overlooking the wasteland, beside the road. David was staying in the wilderness, and when he learned that Saul had come after him into the wilderness, ⁴David sent out scouts and confirmed that Saul had arrived for certain. ⁵David set out and came to the place where Saul had encamped. David observed the spot where Saul was lying, with Abner son of Ner, the commander of his army, beside him. Saul was lying inside the circle of wagons, with the troops camped all around him. ⁶David spoke to Ahimelech the Hittite and to Abishai son of Zeruiah, Joab's brother, and said, "Who will go down with me into Saul's camp?" Abishai said, "I will go down with you." ⁷David and Abishai made their way into the camp at night. There was Saul, lying asleep inside the circle of wagons, his spear thrust into the ground by his head. Abner and the troops lay sleeping around him. ⁸Abishai said to David, "God has handed your enemy over to you today. Now let me pin him to the ground with a single thrust of the spear — I will not need a second." ⁹David said to Abishai, "Do not destroy him. For who has ever raised his hand against the LORD's anointed and remained innocent?" ¹⁰David said, "As the LORD lives, the LORD himself will strike him — either his day will come and he will die, or he will go down into battle and be swept away. ¹¹The LORD forbid that I should raise my hand against the LORD's anointed! But take the spear by his head and the water jug, and let us go." ¹²David took the spear and the water jug from beside Saul's head, and they left. No one saw. No one knew. No one woke — because all of them were asleep, for a deep sleep from the LORD had fallen on them. ¹³David crossed over to the far side and stood on top of a hill at a distance — a wide gap between them. ¹⁴David called out to the troops and to Abner son of Ner: "Are you not going to answer, Abner?" Abner answered, "Who are you, calling out to the king?" ¹⁵David said to Abner, "Are you not a man? And who is your equal in all Israel? Then why did you not guard your lord the king? Someone entered the camp to destroy the king, your lord. ¹⁶What you have done is not good. As the LORD lives, you all deserve death, because you did not guard your lord — the LORD's anointed! Now look — where is the king's spear? And where is the water jug that was beside his head?" ¹⁷Saul recognized David's voice and said, "Is that your voice, my son David?" David said, "It is my voice, my lord the king." ¹⁸He said, "Why does my lord pursue his servant? What have I done? What wrong is in my hand? ¹⁹Now please, my lord the king, hear the words of your servant. If it is the LORD who has stirred you up against me, let him be appeased by an offering. But if it is human beings, let them be cursed before the LORD, because they have driven me out today from sharing in the LORD's inheritance, saying in effect, 'Go serve other gods.' ²⁰So now, do not let my blood fall to the ground far from the LORD's face. The king of Israel has come out to hunt a single flea — like someone chasing a partridge through the hills." ²¹Saul said, "I have sinned. Come back, my son David. I will not harm you again, because you treated my life as precious today. I have played the fool — I have gone badly, badly astray." ²²David answered, "Here is the king's spear. Let one of the young men come over and retrieve it. ²³The LORD repays each person according to his righteousness and faithfulness. The LORD gave you into my hand today, but I refused to raise my hand against the LORD's anointed. ²⁴Just as your life was precious in my eyes today, so may my life be precious in the LORD's eyes, and may he deliver me from every distress." ²⁵Saul said to David, "Blessed are you, my son David. You will certainly accomplish great things, and you will surely prevail." David went on his way, and Saul returned to his place.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The Ziphtes' second betrayal (the first was in 23:19) establishes them as consistent collaborators with Saul. Their report uses the interrogative halo ('is it not the case that...'), which functions rhetorically as a confident assertion. They are not asking whether David is hiding; they are handing Saul actionable intelligence. The geographical markers — Gibeah (Saul's capital), Hachilah (a known ridge), and ha-yeshimon (the wasteland east of Ziph) — ground the narrative in real terrain that both parties would recognize.
2. The verb yared ('went down') is geographically accurate — Gibeah sits at a higher elevation than the Judean wilderness. The number shelosheth alafim ('three thousand') represents a massive force deployed against one fugitive and his band of roughly six hundred men (23:13). The word bechurei ('chosen, picked') indicates elite troops, not a general levy. The verb levaqesh ('to seek') carries predatory overtones in this context — Saul is not searching; he is hunting. The repetition of 'wilderness of Ziph' at the beginning and end of the verse frames the entire action within this desolate landscape.
3. The verb chanan ('he encamped') indicates a military encampment, not a casual stop. The phrase al ha-derekh ('beside the road') suggests Saul positioned himself along a known route, likely trying to cut off David's escape. The contrast between Saul's organized camp on the hill and David's residence in the open wilderness (yoshev ba-midbar, 'dwelling in the wilderness') underscores the power imbalance. The verb vayyar ('he saw' or 'he perceived') indicates David had scouts monitoring Saul's movements — intelligence was flowing both ways.
4. The word meraggel ('scouts, spies') comes from the root ragal ('to go on foot, to spy out'), the same word used for the spies Moses sent into Canaan (Numbers 13:2). David operates as a military commander, gathering intelligence before acting. The phrase el nakhon ('to a certainty, for certain') emphasizes that David verified the report — he did not act on the Ziphtes' word alone but confirmed Saul's presence through his own reconnaissance.

5. The phrase shar tseva'o ('commander of his army') identifies Abner not merely as a general but as the one personally responsible for Saul's safety. His position next to the king makes the coming scene all the more damning — David will penetrate to the very center of the camp, past thousands of soldiers and past the army commander himself. The verb shakhav ('lying, sleeping') appears three times in this verse, emphasizing the vulnerability of the entire camp.
6. Ahimelech the Hittite (not to be confused with Ahimelech the priest of Nob, chapter 21-22) is a foreign warrior in David's band — his presence confirms that David's company included non-Israelites. The identification of Abishai as achi Yo'av ('Joab's brother') is important for the larger narrative: the sons of Zeruiah — Joab, Abishai, and Asahel — will become David's most capable and most problematic military leaders. Abishai's immediate willingness to descend into the enemy camp reveals his characteristic boldness, but also his recklessness, which the next verses will demonstrate.
6. The verb yered ('go down') is literal — the camp was below David's observation point, and the descent was physical as well as metaphorical. David is entering the place of maximum danger.
7. The phrase chanitho me'ukhah va-arets mera'ashotav ('his spear thrust into the ground at his head') is one of the most visually striking images in the David narrative. The spear planted beside the sleeping king is both a military marker and an ironic symbol — the weapon Saul used to try to kill David now stands unguarded within David's reach. The verb me'ukhah ('thrust in, stuck') comes from a root meaning to press or drive in, indicating the spear was firmly planted, not casually laid aside.
8. Abishai's theological interpretation — 'God has delivered your enemy into your hand' — echoes the exact language used in 24:4 when David's men urged him to kill Saul in the cave. The repetition of this claim across two separate incidents forces the reader to ask whether providential opportunity equals divine permission. Abishai assumes it does. David will argue it does not.
8. The phrase pa'am achat ('one time, a single stroke') and lo eshneh lo ('I will not do it to him a second time') is a soldier's pledge of efficiency. Abishai is not asking for permission to fight — he is asking for permission to execute, and he guarantees it will be clean and quick.
9. The phrase meshiach YHWH ('the LORD's anointed') appears four times in this chapter (verses 9, 11, 16, 23), making it the dominant theological concept. David's ethic is not based on Saul's merit but on God's act of anointing. The verb niqqah ('be clean, be innocent, be acquitted') is a legal term — David is asking whether anyone could stand before God's court after killing the one God consecrated. The answer is built into the question.
10. The threefold enumeration — divine stroke, natural death, or battle death — covers every possibility except assassination. David is not expressing indifference about how Saul dies; he is systematically eliminating the one option Abishai proposed. The verb yigpenu ('will strike him') uses nagaf, which typically describes divine blows — plagues, sudden judgments, military defeats sent by God. The phrase yomo yavo ('his day will come') treats death as an appointed event, part of the divine calendar. The verb nispah ('be swept away') is the same verb Samuel used in 12:25 for the fate of a wicked king — David echoes the prophetic warning without claiming the right to carry it out.
11. The juxtaposition of what David refuses to take (Saul's life) and what he does take (the spear and water jug) creates a powerful contrast. The chanit ('spear') is Saul's weapon and royal emblem; the tsappachath hammayim ('water jug') is a clay or leather container for drinking water — an utterly ordinary object. Together they serve as undeniable proof that David stood over the sleeping king and chose restraint. The phrase nelkha lanu ('let us go for ourselves') ends the scene with decisive withdrawal — David has made his point and leaves.
12. The three-part negation (no one saw, no one knew, no one woke) uses a literary technique called climactic enumeration, building from external perception (seeing) to internal awareness (knowing) to physical response (waking). The entire sensory apparatus of three thousand soldiers has been disabled.
12. The word tardemah appears only seven times in the Hebrew Bible, and each occurrence involves divine action during human unconsciousness. Its use here is the narrator's explicit theological commentary: this was not luck, exhaustion, or coincidence. God orchestrated the scene.
13. The phrase rav ha-maqom beinehem ('the space between them was great') is both geographical and symbolic. David has placed a valley between himself and Saul's camp before he speaks — he is beyond reach of pursuit. The verb avar ('crossed over') suggests he traversed a wadi or ravine. The positioning on rosh ha-har ('the top of the hill') gives David both safety and acoustic advantage — sound carries across the Judean wilderness valleys, and the hilltop position ensures his voice will reach the camp below.
14. David calls to the troops generally (ha-am, 'the people') but singles out Abner by name. The taunt halo ta'aneh ('will you not answer?') is deliberately provocative — David is waking the camp commander and immediately putting him on the defensive. Abner's response — mi attah qarata el ha-melek ('who are you, calling to the king?') — is both a challenge and an admission that he does not know who is speaking. The irony is thick: Abner, whose job is to protect the king, cannot even identify the voice of the man who just stood over the king's sleeping body.
15. The phrase halo ish attah ('are you not a man?') is cutting sarcasm. David is questioning Abner's competence, courage, and basic manhood all at once. The follow-up umi khamokha be-Yisra'el ('and who is like you in Israel?') intensifies the mockery — if Abner is the greatest warrior in Israel, how did an intruder reach the king? The verb le-hashchit ('to destroy') is the same root David used in verse 9 (al tashchitehu), creating a deliberate echo: David commanded Abishai not to destroy the king, but someone could have destroyed the king because Abner failed. The double use of adonekha ha-melek ('your lord the king') hammers Abner's duty and his failure.
16. The phrase benei maveth (literally 'sons of death') is a Hebrew idiom for those under sentence of death. David pronounces this sentence with covenant authority — he is not threatening personal revenge but declaring a legal verdict based on the dereliction of sacred duty. The identification of Saul as meshiach YHWH rather than simply 'the king' elevates the charge from military negligence to sacrilege.

16. The demand to look at the missing spear and water jug is David's proof. Physical evidence replaces verbal accusation — the empty ground beside Saul's head speaks louder than any testimony.
17. The exchange of titles — 'my son' and 'my lord the king' — captures the fractured relationship in miniature. Saul uses kinship language; David uses political language. Both are technically accurate (David was Saul's son-in-law and Saul was still the reigning king), but neither captures the full reality of their situation. The voice recognition across the valley in the pre-dawn darkness adds an intimate quality to this confrontation between two men who once loved each other.
18. David's speech shifts from addressing Abner (verses 14-16) to addressing Saul directly. His self-designation as avdekha ('your servant') maintains the fiction of feudal loyalty even while protesting persecution. The two questions — meh asiti ('what have I done?') and mah be-yadi ra'ah ('what evil is in my hand?') — are not requests for information but legal challenges. David demands that Saul produce a charge. The word ra'ah ('evil, wrong') in David's hand is contrasted with what was actually in David's hand moments ago: Saul's own spear, which David chose not to use.
19. The verb hesitkha ('has stirred you up, has incited you') is striking because it attributes potential hostile agency to God. The same verb is used in 2 Samuel 24:1 when God incites David to take a census and in Job 2:3 when God says the Adversary incited him against Job. David entertains the possibility that his suffering is divinely caused — and if so, the proper response is worship, not resistance.
19. The phrase nachalat YHWH ('the LORD's inheritance') refers to the promised land as God's personal estate. Israel does not merely live in the land; they share in God's own inheritance. Exile from this land is theological catastrophe, not merely geographical displacement. David's anguish here is not primarily about safety but about access to God's presence.
20. The phrase minneged penei YHWH ('from before the face of the LORD') is theologically critical. David links his physical location to God's presence — to die in exile is to die outside God's sight. This reflects the ancient Israelite conviction that the land of Israel was uniquely God's territory and that God's 'face' (panim) was accessible primarily there.
20. The partridge (qore, likely the chukar partridge common in the Judean hills) was hunted by persistent chase. Hunters would flush it repeatedly until it could no longer take flight, then catch it by hand. David is saying: you are expending royal resources on an exhausting pursuit of something worthless. The self-deprecation is strategic — by minimizing his own importance, David maximizes the absurdity of Saul's obsession.
21. Saul's threefold confession — I have sinned, I have played the fool, I have gone far astray — surpasses his admission in 24:17 ('you are more righteous than I'). Here Saul does not merely compare himself unfavorably to David; he indicts himself absolutely. Yet the narrator offers no indication that this confession leads to changed behavior. The reader knows from the larger narrative that Saul will not seek David again, but neither will he abdicate or restore David to his place. The confession is genuine but ultimately impotent — Saul sees the truth but cannot reorganize his life around it.
21. The double intensifier harbeh me'od ('greatly, exceedingly') is rare and emphatic. Saul is not minimizing his failure; he is drowning in the recognition of it.
22. David does not return the spear personally. He offers it back through an intermediary — a deliberate choice that maintains the distance between them. The phrase hinneh chanith ha-melekh ('here is the king's spear') presents the weapon as evidence one final time before releasing it. The spear will return to Saul, but the point has been made: David held the instrument of royal power and gave it back. The verb yiqqacheha ('let him take it') is matter-of-fact — David treats the spear as an object to be retrieved, not a trophy to be bargained over.
23. David now openly states what he implied to Abishai: God did deliver Saul into his hand. He accepts Abishai's reading of the situation as providentially arranged but rejects the conclusion. The distinction is crucial for the theology of the chapter: divine opportunity is not the same as divine command. God may open a door without requiring you to walk through it.
23. The pairing of tsedaqah ('righteousness') and emunah ('faithfulness') represents the full scope of covenant loyalty — right action and consistent character. David claims both, not arrogantly but as evidence submitted to the divine court.
24. The symmetry of the verse is deliberate: your life / my eyes becomes my life / the LORD's eyes. David has acted as God's representative toward Saul — protecting the anointed, refusing violence — and now he asks God to act toward him with the same protective care. This is not a quid pro quo but a prayer grounded in the conviction that God's character mirrors the mercy David has shown.
25. The infinitive absolute pairs (aso ta'aseh and yakhol tukhal) represent the highest degree of certainty Hebrew grammar can express. Saul is not wishing David well; he is declaring an outcome he can see but cannot prevent. There is something prophetic and tragic in a king blessing the man who will replace him.
25. The final sentence — David went his way, Saul returned to his place — is one of the great narrative closings in the Hebrew Bible. No further commentary is offered. No reconciliation occurs. No promise is extracted. The two men simply walk apart, and the narrator lets the silence speak. This is the last direct encounter between Saul and David in the entire narrative of 1 Samuel.

Summary: David, exhausted by years of fleeing Saul through the Judean wilderness, concludes that he will eventually be killed unless he escapes Israelite territory entirely. He crosses the border into Philistia with his six hundred men and their households, placing himself under the protection of Achish son of Maoch, king of Gath. When Saul learns David has fled to Philistia, he stops pursuing him. David requests and receives Ziklag, a town in the southern frontier, as his base of operations. From Ziklag, David conducts raids against the Geshurites, Girzites, and Amalekites — peoples of the deep south — while telling Achish he has been raiding Judean territory and its allies. David leaves no survivors from his raids to prevent anyone from reporting his deception to Gath. Achish, completely deceived, believes David has made himself permanently hated by Israel and will serve as his vassal forever.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter presents David at his most morally ambiguous. The man anointed by God's prophet now swears fealty to a Philistine king, lives among Israel's archenemies, and sustains himself through a systematic campaign of deception and total warfare. The narrator offers no divine oracle, no prophetic word, no consultation of the ephod — the silence of God in this chapter is deafening. David's opening soliloquy in verse 1 ('I will be swept away one day by the hand of Saul') is the only time in the narrative where David's reasoning is presented without divine input, and his conclusion — to flee to Philistia — appears to be entirely his own strategic calculation. The text neither condemns nor approves. It simply records. What makes this especially striking is the contrast with David's earlier refusals to kill Saul (chapters 24 and 26), where he explicitly invoked covenant theology. Here, covenant language disappears entirely. David operates in a theological vacuum, surviving by wit and brutality rather than by faith. The chapter is also structurally pivotal: it removes David from Israelite soil, setting up the catastrophic collision at the battle of Gilboa where David will be expected to fight against his own people.

Translation Friction: The deepest tension is theological: is David outside God's will, or is God's providence operating through David's morally compromised choices? The text refuses to answer. The verb amar in verse 1 ('David said in his heart') presents David's reasoning as internal deliberation, not divine instruction — a sharp contrast with earlier episodes where David 'inquired of the LORD' before acting (23:2, 23:4). Translators must also navigate the ethical horror of verse 11: David kills every man and woman in his raids specifically to eliminate witnesses to his deception. The Hebrew lo yechayah ('he would not let live') uses the Piel of chayah, an intensive form indicating deliberate, systematic killing. This is not battlefield casualties but calculated extermination for the purpose of maintaining a lie. The translator's challenge is to render this without either sanitizing the violence or sensationalizing it — the Hebrew text states it flatly, and so must the rendering. Finally, the phrase 'to this day' in verse 6 (regarding Ziklag belonging to the kings of Judah) is a rare editorial note that reveals the narrator is writing long after the events, during or after the divided monarchy.

Connections: David's flight to Gath recalls his earlier, disastrous visit in chapter 21, where he feigned madness to escape Achish. Now he returns with an army of six hundred, and Achish welcomes him — the power dynamic has completely shifted. The Ziklag gift connects forward to 2 Samuel 1:1, where David receives news of Saul's death while at Ziklag, and backward to the tribal allotments, since Ziklag was originally assigned to Simeon within Judah's territory (Joshua 19:5). David's raids against the Amalekites continue the unfinished business of Saul's failed war in chapter 15 — the very mission whose botched execution cost Saul his kingdom. There is deep irony: the exile is completing the holy war the king could not. David's deception of Achish foreshadows the larger deception that will nearly trap him at the battle of Gilboa (chapters 28-29), where Achish expects David to fight against Israel. The Geshurites mentioned here should be distinguished from the Geshurites of the Transjordan, whose princess Maacah will later become David's wife and Absalom's mother (2 Samuel 3:3) — a connection that suggests David's time in the south was laying political groundwork for his future reign.

¹David said to himself, "One of these days I will be swept away by the hand of Saul. There is nothing better for me than to escape — escape completely — into the land of the Philistines. Then Saul will give up searching for me anywhere in the territory of Israel, and I will slip out of his grasp." ²So David set out and crossed over — he and the six hundred men with him — to Achish son of Maach, king of Gath. ³David settled with Achish in Gath — he and his men, each man with his household. David brought his two wives: Ahinoam of Jezreel, and Abigail of Carmel, the widow of Nabal. ⁴When Saul was told that David had fled to Gath, he stopped searching for him entirely. ⁵David said to Achish, "If I have found favor in your eyes, let them give me a place in one of the outlying towns so I can settle there. Why should your servant live in the royal city alongside you?" ⁶So Achish gave him Ziklag that day. This is why Ziklag has belonged to the kings of Judah to this day. ⁷The total time David lived in Philistine territory was a year and four months. ⁸David and his men went up and raided the Geshurites, the Girzites, and the Amalekites — for these were the peoples who had inhabited the region from ancient times, along the road toward Shur and as far as the land of Egypt. ⁹David would strike the region and leave no man or woman alive. He would take the sheep, cattle, donkeys, camels, and clothing, then return and come to Achish. ¹⁰When Achish would ask, "Where did you raid today?" David would say, "Against the Negev of Judah," or "Against the Negev of the Jerahmeelites," or "Against the Negev of the Kenites." ¹¹David would leave no man or woman alive to be brought to Gath, reasoning, "Otherwise they will report against us and say, 'This is what David did.'" This was his practice the entire time he lived in Philistine territory. ¹²Achish trusted David completely, thinking, "He has made himself so repulsive to his own people Israel that he will be my servant permanently."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The absence of divine consultation is conspicuous. In the preceding chapters, David repeatedly 'inquired of the LORD' through Abiathar's ephod (23:2, 23:4, 23:9-12). Here, no inquiry is made. David's reasoning is entirely pragmatic: probability of death under Saul versus probability of survival under Achish. Whether this silence represents a lapse in faith or simply a narrative choice to focus on David's strategic mind, the text does not say.
1. The doubling of the verb malat (himalet immalet, 'escaping I will escape') mirrors the emphatic construction Saul used when God rejected him — the same grammatical intensity that marked Saul's doom now marks David's survival strategy. The irony is layered: David flees to the very people whose champion he killed in chapter 17.
2. The verb vayyaqom ('he rose up') followed by vayyaavor ('he crossed over') is a formulaic pair indicating decisive departure. The verb avar ('to cross over') carries weight in biblical narrative — it is the verb used for crossing the Jordan, crossing boundaries, and transitioning between states. David is not merely traveling; he is crossing a theological and political boundary from the LORD's land into Philistine territory. The six hundred men represent the loyal fighting force that has been with David since Adullam (chapter 22), now a mobile army-in-exile. Achish ben Maach is identified by patronym and title, establishing him as a legitimate vassal king, not a minor chieftain.
3. The identification of Abigail as 'wife of Nabal the Carmelite' rather than 'wife of David' is narratively significant. The text preserves her former identity, perhaps as an editorial reminder that David's household has a complicated history. The phrase ish u-veito ('each man and his house') totals a community of several thousand people when women and children are included — this is a mass emigration, not a covert operation.
4. The verb barach ('he fled') is the standard term for flight from danger — the same verb used of Jacob fleeing Laban (Genesis 31:20-21) and Moses fleeing Pharaoh (Exodus 2:15). It frames David's departure not as a strategic relocation but as a fugitive's desperate escape. The phrase lo yosef od levaqsho ('he did not continue again to seek him') uses the verb yosef ('to add, to continue') with the infinitive, a construction meaning complete cessation. David's calculation from verse 1 has proved correct: crossing into Philistia ended Saul's pursuit. But the irony is severe — David is safe from the king of Israel only because he is now a vassal of the king of Gath.
5. The phrase ir hamamlakhah ('the royal city') is literally 'the city of the kingdom,' meaning the capital or seat of royal power. David's stated reason for leaving — that he is unworthy to live alongside the king — is deferential on the surface but deceptive in purpose. By relocating to the periphery, David creates the operational freedom he needs to maintain his double life. The request also benefits Achish by removing a large, potentially destabilizing foreign military force from his capital — a point David may have calculated as well.
6. The editorial note lakhen hayetah Tsiqlag le-malkhei Yehudah ('therefore Ziklag has belonged to the kings of Judah') uses the preposition le- indicating ongoing possession. This is an etiological note — it explains a present reality by narrating its origin. The plural 'kings of Judah' dates the narrator (or a later editor) to the period of the divided monarchy at the earliest. The irony is thick: a Philistine vassal grant becomes permanent Judean royal property, a piece of the promised land recovered not through holy war but through political asylum.
7. The phrase yamim ve-arba'ah chodashim is literally 'days and four months.' The word yamim ('days') here functions idiomatically to mean 'a year' — the same usage appears in Leviticus 25:29 and Judges 17:10. Some interpreters read it as 'some days and four months,' yielding a shorter period, but the traditional understanding as 'a year and four months' (sixteen months total) is supported by the Septuagint and the scope of activity described in the following verses. This chronological note serves a structural function, marking the duration of David's Philistine exile as a defined period with a beginning and an end.
8. The Geshurites here (ha-Geshuri) must be distinguished from the Geshurites of 2 Samuel 3:3 and 13:37, who lived east of the Sea of Galilee. These southern Geshurites occupied the Negev frontier. The Girzites (ha-Gizri) appear nowhere else in the Hebrew Bible, making them one of the text's small mysteries — a people remembered only because David raided them.

8. David's choice of targets is strategic: he attacks peoples who are enemies of both Israel and Judah, gaining plunder while eliminating groups that might threaten Judean settlements. The Amalekites in particular are the people Saul was commanded to destroy in chapter 15 — David is finishing work the rejected king failed to complete, though his motive here is survival, not obedience.
9. The grammar here shifts to habitual aspect — the Hebrew uses converted perfects (vav-consecutive) in a way that describes repeated, customary action. This was not a single raid but David's sustained practice throughout his sixteen months in Philistine territory. The phrase lo yechayeh ish ve-ishah ('he would not let man or woman live') is chilling in its matter-of-fact delivery. The narrator reports extermination without comment, leaving the moral weight entirely on the reader.
9. The five categories of plunder (sheep, cattle, donkeys, camels, clothing) form a complete inventory of movable wealth in the ancient Near East. Clothing (begadim) was a significant form of portable wealth — garments were expensive, durable, and easily transported, functioning almost as currency in the ancient world.
10. The rendering adjusts the grammar to habitual aspect ('would ask,' 'would say') to match the iterative nature of the Hebrew, which describes a repeated pattern rather than a single conversation. The word Negev (negev) means 'south' or 'dry region' and functions both as a compass direction and as a proper regional name for the arid zone south of the Judean hill country.
10. David's three named targets — Judah, the Jerahmeelites, and the Kenites — are precisely the groups he was actually cultivating as allies (see 30:29 where David sends gifts to these same groups). The deception is architecturally perfect: the peoples David claims to be attacking are the ones he is actually protecting and courting for his future kingdom.
11. The phrase ve-khoh mishpato ('and such was his practice') uses mishpat in its sense of 'customary procedure' or 'established pattern.' This is the same word that elsewhere means 'justice' or 'judgment' — its application to David's extermination policy creates a disturbing semantic collision. The narrator does not editorialize; the word choice does the work.
11. The clause kol hayyamim asher yashav bisdei Pelishtim ('all the days he lived in the territory of the Philistines') confirms that this was not an isolated incident but David's sustained operational method for sixteen months. The totality of the statement — all the days, no survivors, every raid — forces the reader to sit with the full scope of what David's survival required.
12. The root aman ('to trust, to believe') connects to one of the deepest theological terms in the Hebrew Bible — it is the root of emunah ('faithfulness') and amen ('it is firm, it is sure'). The application of this word to Achish's misplaced confidence is richly ironic: the vocabulary of covenant faithfulness describes a pagan king's naivety. Achish 'amens' a lie.
12. The phrase le-eved olam ('as a permanent servant') uses the same language found in the law of the Hebrew slave who chooses perpetual bondage (Exodus 21:6). Achish sees David as having voluntarily entered permanent Philistine servitude. The dramatic irony is at its peak: David, the LORD's anointed king over Israel, is confidently classified as a Philistine possession forever. The chapter ends on this note of total deception — Achish deceived, David compromised, God silent, and the future entirely uncertain.

Summary: *The Philistines muster for war against Israel, and Saul — terrified, abandoned by God, and desperate — seeks out a woman at Endor who traffics with the dead, the very practice he himself had banned. He asks her to summon Samuel from death. What rises is described by the woman as an elohim ascending from the earth, and Samuel himself appears — not as a pale ghost but as a speaking, judging presence who delivers God's verdict: tomorrow Saul and his sons will die, and Israel will fall to the Philistines. Saul collapses face-first on the ground, broken by the sentence. The woman, showing unexpected compassion, persuades the king to eat before he goes out to meet his death.*

What Makes This Remarkable: This is one of the most theologically volatile chapters in the Hebrew Bible. The narrator never hedges: the figure who rises is called Samuel (verse 12, 14, 15, 16). The text does not say 'a spirit claiming to be Samuel' or 'what appeared to be Samuel.' The woman sees him; Samuel speaks; his prophecy comes true the next day. Yet the entire episode takes place through a practice that the Torah explicitly condemns (Leviticus 19:31, 20:6, 20:27, Deuteronomy 18:10-12) and that Saul himself had outlawed (verse 3). The text offers no resolution to the tension. It does not explain how a banned ritual could produce a genuine prophetic word, nor does it validate necromancy by the outcome. Instead, it lets the contradiction stand as testimony to how far Saul has fallen: the king who once stood among the prophets (10:11) now crouches in disguise before a medium, begging the dead for what the living God will no longer give him. The woman's terrified scream when Samuel actually appears (verse 12) suggests that even she did not expect this to work — something beyond her craft has intervened.

*Translation Friction: The word elohim in verse 13 is the primary translation flashpoint. The woman says 'I see an elohim ascending from the earth.' Elohim can mean 'God,' 'gods,' 'divine being,' 'supernatural being,' or even 'judges' depending on context. The KJV renders it 'gods,' the LXX has theoi. We render it 'a divine being' because the singular description that follows (an old man wrapped in a robe) indicates a single figure, and because the term here functions as a category marker — the woman is telling Saul that what she sees belongs to the supernatural realm, not the human one. This is not a statement about Samuel's deity but about his post-mortem status. The second major difficulty is the phrase ba'alat ov (verse 7), traditionally 'a woman with a familiar spirit.' The word ov refers to the pit or the spirit summoned from it, and ba'alat means 'mistress of, one who controls.' We render it 'a woman who commands a spirit-pit' to preserve the sense of professional expertise in necromancy without importing later demonological frameworks. The chapter also raises the question of whether God himself sent Samuel or whether the medium's ritual succeeded on its own power — the text deliberately refuses to answer.*

Connections: Saul's nocturnal journey to Endor inverts his earlier journey to find Samuel in chapter 9 — there he was looking for lost donkeys and found a kingdom; here he is looking for lost guidance and finds his death sentence. The disguise motif connects to later royal disguises in the tradition (Jeroboam's wife in 1 Kings 14:1-6, Ahab at Ramoth-gilead in 1 Kings 22:30), all of which fail because God sees through them. Samuel's pronouncement that 'the LORD has torn the kingdom from your hand' (verse 17) reprises his earlier declaration at the robe-tearing incident (15:27-28), creating a frame around Saul's entire reign. The woman's preparation of food for Saul — slaughtering a fattened calf and baking unleavened bread — carries sacrificial overtones; it is almost a funeral meal before the death has occurred. The Philistine gathering at Shunem (verse 4) sets the stage for the battle of Mount Gilboa in chapter 31, where every detail of Samuel's prophecy will be fulfilled.

¹In those days the Philistines assembled their forces for war, to fight against Israel. Achish said to David, "You must understand clearly that you and your men will march out with me in the army." ²David said to Achish, "Then you yourself will see what your servant can do." Achish said to David, "Then I will make you my permanent bodyguard." ³Now Samuel was dead. All Israel had mourned for him and buried him in Ramah, his own city. And Saul had expelled the spirit-conjurers and the diviners from the land. ⁴The Philistines assembled, advanced, and encamped at Shunem. Saul gathered all Israel, and they encamped at Gilboa. ⁵When Saul saw the Philistine camp, he was afraid, and his heart shook violently. ⁶Saul inquired of the LORD, but the LORD did not answer him — not by dreams, not by the Urim, not by prophets. ⁷Saul said to his servants, "Find me a woman who commands a spirit-pit, so I can go to her and seek answers through her." His servants said to him, "There is a woman who commands a spirit-pit at Endor." ⁸Saul disguised himself, put on different clothing, and set out — he and two men with him. They came to the woman at night. He said, "Conjure for me through the spirit-pit and bring up for me whoever I name to you." ⁹The woman said to him, "You surely know what Saul has done — how he cut down the spirit-conjurers and the diviners from the land. Why are you setting a trap for my life, to get me killed?" ¹⁰Saul swore to her by the LORD: "As the LORD lives, no punishment will fall on you for this." ¹¹The woman said, "Whom should I bring up for you?" He said, "Bring up Samuel for me." ¹²When the woman saw Samuel, she screamed aloud. The woman said to Saul, "Why have you deceived me? You are Saul!" ¹³The king said to her, "Do not be afraid. What do you see?" The woman said to Saul, "I see a divine being rising from the earth." ¹⁴He said to her, "What does he look like?" She said, "An old man is coming up, and he is wrapped in a robe." Saul knew it was Samuel. He bent down with his face to the ground and prostrated himself. ¹⁵Samuel said to Saul, "Why have you disturbed me by bringing me up?" Saul said, "I am in terrible distress. The Philistines are waging war against me, and God has turned away from me and answers me no longer — not through prophets, not through dreams. So I have called on you to tell me what I should do." ¹⁶Samuel said, "Why do you ask me, when the LORD has turned away from you and become your adversary?" ¹⁷The LORD has done to you just as he spoke through me: the LORD has torn the kingdom from your hand and given it to your neighbor — to David. ¹⁸Because you did not obey the voice of the LORD and did not carry out his burning anger against Amalek, therefore the LORD has done this thing to you today. ¹⁹The LORD will also hand Israel over, along with you, into the power of the Philistines. Tomorrow you and your sons will be with me. The LORD will give the army of Israel into the hand of the Philistines. ²⁰Saul immediately fell full-length on the ground, terrified by Samuel's words. There was no strength left in him, because he had eaten no food all that day and all that night. ²¹The woman came to Saul and saw that he was deeply shaken. She said to him, "Your servant listened to your voice. I put my life in my hands and obeyed the words you spoke to me. ²²Now please, you too listen to the voice of your servant. Let me set a piece of bread before you. Eat, so that you will have strength when you go on your way." ²³He refused and said, "I will not eat." But his servants, along with the woman, pressed him until he gave in. He got up from the ground and sat on the bed. ²⁴The woman had a fattened calf in the house. She quickly slaughtered it, took flour, kneaded it, and baked unleavened bread. ²⁵She set it before Saul and before his servants, and they ate. Then they rose and went out into the night.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ba-yamim hahem ('in those days') signals a temporal overlap with the events of chapters 26-27. The Philistine muster is the military backdrop that will drive the entire chapter. The verb yiqbetsu ('they assembled') uses the root qavats, denoting the deliberate concentration of scattered forces into a unified army.
1. Achish's statement to David assumes complete fealty. David has been living under Achish's protection in Ziklag (chapter 27), raiding Israelite enemies while pretending to raid Israelites. The moment of reckoning has arrived: Achish expects David to fight Israel. David's response in verse 2 is masterfully ambiguous.
2. The adverb lakhen ('therefore, accordingly') appears in both David's and Achish's statements, creating a false sense of mutual agreement. David's lakhen is evasive; Achish's is decisive. The disconnect between what David means and what Achish understands is the engine of dramatic irony throughout the Ziklag narrative.
2. The phrase kol ha-yamim ('all the days') means permanently — Achish envisions David as his personal guard indefinitely. This scene is cut short and will not resolve until chapter 29, where the Philistine lords will refuse to let David march into battle, providentially rescuing him from the impossible dilemma.
3. This verse is nearly identical to 25:1, where Samuel's death was first reported. The repetition here serves a narrative purpose: the reader must be reminded that Samuel is dead before he appears. The redundancy is deliberate, emphasizing the impossibility of what is about to happen.
3. The term ha-ovot ('the spirit-conjurers') is the plural of ov, referring to those who practice necromancy — summoning the dead through a ritual pit or spirit. The yidde'onim ('the diviners' or 'knowing ones') are a related class of occult practitioners who claim access to hidden knowledge. Saul's ban on both classes fulfills the Deuteronomic mandate (Deuteronomy 18:10-12) — which makes his later violation of his own law all the more self-condemning.
4. The geography is critical. Shunem sits in the Jezreel Valley at the foot of the Hill of Moreh; Gilboa is the mountain ridge to the south across the valley. The two armies face each other across open ground — terrain that favors the Philistines with their chariots and iron weapons. Saul has allowed the Philistines to penetrate deep into Israelite territory, far north of their traditional coastal base. The strategic situation is already catastrophic before any spiritual crisis begins.
4. The verb vayyiqbetsu ('they assembled') mirrors verse 1 — the Philistine war machine is in motion. Saul's parallel gathering (vayyiqbots) uses the same root, but the symmetry is deceptive. The Philistines assemble with confidence; Saul assembles in terror (verse 5).
5. The verb charad appears elsewhere for the trembling of Isaac when he discovers Jacob's deception (Genesis 27:33) and for the trembling of the earth at Sinai (Exodus 19:18). It denotes a violent, involuntary shaking that signals the loss of composure and control. Saul's heart — the seat of will and courage in Hebrew thought — is no longer his own.
6. The triple gam construction ('also by...also by...also by') is emphatic in Hebrew — it lists every available channel and slams each one shut. The order may be ascending in directness: dreams are indirect and ambiguous, the Urim gives a yes-or-no answer, and prophets deliver articulated messages. God refuses all three levels of communication.
6. The silence of God is one of the most terrifying themes in the Hebrew Bible. In 1 Samuel 14:37, Saul experienced a similar silence when he inquired about pursuing the Philistines, and that silence was connected to Jonathan's unwitting violation of Saul's oath. Here the silence is total and final — it is the covenant relationship itself that has gone dark.
7. The speed of the servants' reply is narratively significant. They do not hesitate or express surprise at the request. They know exactly where a medium is operating despite the ban. This suggests either that the purge was superficial or that the servants were already aware of Saul's desperation.
7. Endor (Ein Dor, 'spring of the dwelling') is located on the northern slope of the Hill of Moreh — which means it is on the far side of the Philistine camp from Saul's position at Gilboa. To reach the medium, Saul will have to skirt or pass through enemy territory at night. The geography underscores his desperation: he risks his life just to reach the woman.
8. The verb qasam ('to divine, to practice divination') is from the same root as qosem ('diviner'), one of the forbidden practitioners listed in Deuteronomy 18:10-12. Saul is not merely bending the rules; he is commanding a woman to perform the exact practice he banned and that the Torah condemns.
8. The phrase et asher omar elayikh ('whoever I name to you') delays the revelation of whom Saul wants summoned, building narrative tension. The reader already knows — the dead prophet has been on Saul's mind since verse 3 — but the woman does not.

9. The verb hikhrît ('he cut down, he cut off') comes from karat, the covenant-cutting root — the same verb used for making covenants and for the penalty of being 'cut off from the people.' Saul did not merely banish these practitioners; he annihilated them. The woman's fear is justified: the penalty for necromancy is death (Leviticus 20:27).
9. The verb mitnaqesh ('setting a trap, ensnaring') comes from naqash or yaqosh, meaning to lay a snare as a hunter traps prey. The woman suspects entrapment — that this stranger is an agent provocateur sent by Saul to flush out surviving mediums. The irony, unknown to her, is that the man asking her to break Saul's law is Saul himself.
10. The oath formula chai YHWH ('as the LORD lives') is the most solemn oath available in Israelite speech. David uses it repeatedly throughout 1 Samuel (as in 20:3, 25:26). To use it in this context — guaranteeing immunity for necromancy — is to weaponize sacred language for profane purposes. The narrator records this without comment, letting the reader absorb the full weight of the contradiction.
11. The exchange is terse — two short sentences that carry enormous theological weight. The verb a'aleh ('I will bring up') and ha'ali ('bring up') both use the Hiphil of alah, the causative form meaning 'to cause to ascend.' The dead are imagined as below, in Sheol, and must be brought upward through ritual action. Saul names Samuel without hesitation — this has been his intention all along. The dead prophet is his last hope.
12. The woman's scream is the strongest evidence that what occurred transcended her normal practice. Mediums who regularly performed seances would not scream at their own results. The implication is that genuine contact with the dead was not what her rituals typically produced — this time, something real broke through, and it terrified her.
12. Her instant recognition of Saul suggests a connection between the apparition and the revelation of identity. Some interpreters argue that Samuel told her; others that the sheer magnitude of the event made her realize only a king would dare seek such consultation for such a figure.
13. We render elohim as 'a divine being' rather than 'gods' (KJV) or 'a spirit' (NIV) because the term here functions as a category designation: the woman is telling Saul that what she sees belongs to the supernatural order. The plural form elohim is used elsewhere for single supernatural beings (as in Psalm 82:1, where God stands in the assembly of el, among the elohim). The woman is not making a theological claim about Samuel's nature; she is reporting what category of entity she perceives.
13. The participle olim ('ascending, rising') confirms the vertical cosmology assumed throughout: the dead are below, in Sheol, and must come up. The preposition min ha-arets ('from the earth/ground') locates the point of emergence.
14. The me'il ('robe') is the connecting thread. In 2:19, Hannah brings a small me'il to the boy Samuel at Shiloh each year. In 15:27, Saul seizes the hem of Samuel's me'il and tears it, and Samuel turns the torn robe into a prophetic sign: 'The LORD has torn the kingdom of Israel from you today.' In 24:4, David cuts the hem of Saul's me'il and is immediately stricken with guilt. The robe carries symbolic weight throughout 1 Samuel as a marker of authority and identity. That Samuel appears still wearing it in death suggests that his prophetic identity persists beyond the grave.
14. The verb vayyeda ('he knew, he perceived') indicates recognition without sight — Saul identifies Samuel from the woman's verbal description alone. The verb vayyishtachu ('he prostrated himself') is from shachah, the standard verb for worship or deep obeisance. Whether this constitutes worship of the dead or simply the prostration of a desperate man before a greater authority, the text does not distinguish.
15. The narrator identifies the speaker as shemu'el ('Samuel') without qualification — not 'the apparition' or 'the spirit' but Samuel by name. The text commits fully to the reality of Samuel's presence. Whatever theological difficulties this creates, the narrative does not flinch.
15. Saul's list of failed channels differs slightly from verse 6: here he mentions prophets before dreams (reversing the order) and omits the Urim entirely. The omission of the Urim may be significant — Saul may not want to remind Samuel (or himself) that the priestly oracle is unavailable because he massacred the priests.
16. The word arekha is one of the more debated forms in this chapter. Some derive it from 'ar' ('enemy'), while others connect it to the root 'ur' ('to rouse, to be hostile'). The Septuagint reads meta tou plesion sou ('with your neighbor'), interpreting it as a reference to David. We follow the reading 'your adversary' because it maintains the theological focus: God himself has crossed to the other side of the conflict.
16. Samuel's question is not a request for information but a rhetorical demolition. If God has departed, what can a dead prophet do? The answer, as verses 17-19 will show, is deliver the verdict God has already decided.
17. The phrase beyadi ('by my hand') is the prophetic agency formula, marking the prophet as the instrument through which God's word comes. Samuel uses it even in death, asserting the continuity of his prophetic office beyond the grave.
17. The naming of David is significant. In chapter 15, Samuel said 'your neighbor who is better than you' without naming anyone. Now the name is spoken aloud: David. The obscure prophecy has become a specific sentence. Saul hears his replacement named to his face by the prophet who anointed both of them.
18. Samuel identifies the specific cause: Saul's failure to execute the cherem (total destruction ban) against Amalek in chapter 15. The phrase charon apo ('his burning anger, his fierce wrath') describes God's settled fury against Amalek, rooted in the Amalekite attack on Israel's rear guard during the exodus (Exodus 17:8-16, Deuteronomy 25:17-19). Saul was commanded to be the instrument of that centuries-old sentence and failed by sparing King Agag and the best livestock.
18. The phrase ha-yom hazzeh ('this day') gives the judgment immediacy. The consequences that began in chapter 15 have now reached their terminal point — 'this day' is the day before Saul's death.

- 19. The phrase attah u-vanekha immi ('you and your sons with me') is one of the most haunting lines in the Hebrew Bible. 'With me' means in Sheol, in the realm of the dead. Samuel does not promise paradise or punishment — only shared residence in the underworld. The theology of the afterlife here is minimal: the dead are together, below, at rest (until disturbed, as Samuel was). There is no developed eschatology, no heaven or hell — only the grave.
- 19. The prophecy is fulfilled with exact precision in chapter 31: Saul and three of his sons die on Mount Gilboa the next day, and the Israelite army is routed by the Philistines. Samuel's word, delivered from beyond death, proves as reliable as any prophecy he gave in life.
- 20. The phrase melo qomato ('the fullness of his stature') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible. It is a unique construction that forces the reader to see Saul's entire body — the same body singled out for its impressive height at his coronation — stretched flat on the ground. The narrative arc from 'head and shoulders above everyone' to 'full-length on the floor' is complete.
- 20. The detail about not eating serves a dual purpose: it explains why Saul has no physical strength to absorb the shock, and it sets up the woman's act of feeding him in verses 21-25. The fasting may also carry ritual significance — those who approached the divine or the dead sometimes fasted in preparation.
- 21. The verb nivhal ('he was shaken, devastated') comes from bahal, meaning to be terrified, dismayed, or overwhelmed. It describes not mere fear but a shattering of composure — Saul is undone. The woman's approach shifts the scene from prophetic judgment to unexpected human compassion. Her self-designation as shifchatekha ('your maidservant') is the formal language of a subordinate addressing a superior, but the power dynamic has reversed: the outlaw medium is now caring for the broken king.
- 21. The phrase va-asim nafshi bekhappi ('I put my life in my hands') is an idiom for risking one's life (also in Judges 12:3, 1 Samuel 19:5). She reminds Saul that she took a mortal risk to serve him — now she asks him to do something far simpler: eat.
- 22. The verbal echo is unmistakable: Saul did not shema beqol YHWH ('listen to the voice of the LORD,' verse 18), but the woman asks him to shema beqol shifchatekha ('listen to the voice of your servant'). The chapter's architecture turns on the question of whose voice Saul will heed. He rejected God's voice, sought a dead prophet's voice, and now accepts a medium's voice.
- 23. The verb parats ('to breach, to press through') is unusually forceful for a scene of persuasion. It suggests that Saul's refusal was serious and required real effort to overcome. The same verb describes the LORD 'breaking out' against Uzzah (2 Samuel 6:8) and water bursting through (2 Samuel 5:20). The servants and the woman had to break through Saul's death-wish to make him eat.
- 23. The mittah ('bed, couch') is likely the woman's own furniture — a raised platform or frame with a mat, standard in modest homes. Saul moves from the floor to the bed, the first step in a physical recovery that will get him out the door and back to his army, where he will die the next day.
- 24. The egel marbeq ('fattened calf') appears in other hospitality scenes: Abraham slaughters a calf for his angelic visitors (Genesis 18:7), and the prodigal son's father kills the fattened calf (Luke 15:23). The motif signals extravagant generosity. This woman — an outlaw medium operating under a death sentence — gives the king who banned her profession the best she has.
- 24. The matstsot ('unleavened bread') may carry Passover echoes, though the text does not make this connection explicit. The association of unleavened bread with deliverance and departure adds a layer of unintended meaning: Saul is about to depart, but not toward deliverance.
- 25. The phrase ballaylah hahu ('that night') bookends the chapter with verse 8, where Saul arrived at night (laylah). He came in darkness and leaves in darkness. The narrator offers no commentary, no moral, no theological resolution. The events speak for themselves: a king who lost God, consulted the dead, received his death sentence, was fed by an outlaw, and walked into the night to die.
- 25. The unnamed woman of Endor is one of the most complex minor characters in the Hebrew Bible. She is a lawbreaker, a necromancer, and a practitioner of everything the Torah condemns — yet she is also the only person in this chapter who shows Saul genuine compassion. She risks her life, sacrifices her best animal, bakes bread, and feeds a broken man. The text refuses to resolve her moral status, leaving the reader to hold both realities together.

Summary: The Philistines muster their forces at Aphek for war against Israel, with David and his men marching in the rear guard under Achish. The Philistine tyrants spot the Hebrews in their ranks and demand their removal, invoking David's reputation as a killer of tens of thousands. Achish defends David's loyalty but is overruled by the furious tyrants, who fear David will turn on them mid-battle to regain Saul's favor. Achish reluctantly sends David away with an oath affirming his personal trust, and David departs early the next morning to return to Ziklag — arriving just in time for the crisis that awaits him in chapter 30.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter is a masterpiece of providential narrative engineering. David has spent sixteen months living a double life in Philistine territory (27:7), raiding non-Israelite settlements while telling Achish he was attacking Judah. Now the deception reaches its breaking point: David is marching to war against his own people, against Saul whom he has twice refused to kill, against the very nation he is anointed to rule. The narrator never tells us what David intended to do if the battle proceeded — that moral crisis is left deliberately unresolved because God removes it before it arrives. The Philistine tyrants, acting entirely from self-interest and military pragmatism, become the unwitting instruments of divine rescue. The Hebrew word seren (used exclusively for Philistine rulers, never for Israelite leaders) appears at the critical decision points, emphasizing that these foreign tyrants — not prophets, not priests, not the LORD speaking directly — are the mechanism through which David is extracted from an impossible situation.*

Translation Friction: The most uncomfortable feature of this text is David's protest in verse 8. When Achish tells him to leave, David objects: 'What have I done? What fault have you found in your servant from the day I entered your service until now, that I should not go and fight against the enemies of my lord the king?' Translators must decide who 'my lord the king' refers to — Achish or Saul. The ambiguity may be deliberate, reflecting David's double life. If David means Achish, his protest is either genuine (he actually intended to fight Israel) or calculated (maintaining his cover). If David means Saul, the phrase 'enemies of my lord the king' would refer to the Philistines themselves — a subversive declaration hidden in plain sight. The narrator provides no internal monologue, no divine oracle, no authorial comment to resolve this. We are left with the surface of David's words and the providence of his removal. The rendering preserves this ambiguity without forcing a resolution, because the Hebrew text itself refuses to resolve it.

Connections: David's situation in Philistine territory connects backward to his flight from Saul (21:10-15, 27:1-4) and forward to the Ziklag crisis (chapter 30) and ultimately to his ascension as king over Judah (2 Samuel 2:1-4). The Philistine muster at Aphek echoes 1 Samuel 4:1, where the Philistines previously assembled at Aphek before capturing the ark — the narrator signals that history is repeating with heightened stakes. The phrase 'Is this not David, of whom they sang in the dances' (verse 5) reaches back to 18:7, where the women's victory song first created the rift between Saul and David. That song, born from triumph over Goliath, has followed David into exile and now both endangers him (the tyrants recognize him as a threat) and saves him (their fear removes him from the battle). Achish's oath 'as the LORD lives' (verse 6) is striking — a Philistine king swearing by Israel's God, either as diplomatic courtesy or as evidence of David's theological influence during his stay in Gath.

¹The Philistines gathered all their forces at Aphek, while Israel was encamped by the spring in Jezreel. ²The Philistine tyrants marched past with their units of hundreds and thousands, and David and his men marched in the rear guard with Achish. ³The Philistine commanders said, "What are these Hebrews doing here?" Achish answered the Philistine commanders, "Is this not David, the servant of Saul king of Israel, who has been with me now for a year or more? I have found no fault in him from the day he defected to me until this day." ⁴But the Philistine commanders were furious with him and said, "Send this man back! Let him return to the post you assigned him. He must not go down with us into battle — he could turn against us in the fighting. How better to buy back his master's favor than with the heads of our own men?" ⁵Is this not the David they sing about in their dances: 'Saul has struck down his thousands, and David his ten thousands'?" ⁶So Achish summoned David and said to him, "As the LORD lives, you have been honest, and your service with me in the camp — going out and coming in — has been good in my eyes. I have found nothing wrong with you from the day you came to me until this day. But you are not acceptable to the tyrants. ⁷So now, go back and go in peace. Do nothing that the Philistine tyrants would consider hostile." ⁸David said to Achish, "But what have I done? What have you found against your servant from the day I entered your service until now, that I should not go and fight against the enemies of my lord the king?" ⁹Achish answered David, "I know — you are as trustworthy in my eyes as a messenger of God. But the Philistine commanders have said, 'He must not go up with us into battle.' ¹⁰So rise early in the morning — you and the servants of your lord who came with you. Rise at first light and go." ¹¹David and his men rose early in the morning to head back to Philistine territory, while the Philistines advanced to Jezreel.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. Aphek appears multiple times in the Old Testament as a mustering point for armies moving against Israel. Its mention here deliberately recalls 1 Samuel 4:1, where the same location preceded catastrophic Israelite defeat and the loss of the ark. The narrator is loading the scene with ominous historical resonance.
1. The ayin ('spring, fountain') in Jezreel is a landmark identification, not a symbolic term. Jezreel sits at the southeastern end of the valley bearing its name, controlling a critical pass. Saul's decision to camp here suggests a defensive posture against Philistine advance from the coastal plain.
2. The word seren is rendered 'tyrant' rather than 'lord' to distinguish it from adon ('lord, master') and melek ('king'). The term is specific to Philistine political structure and carries connotations of autocratic rule within a confederation. The Philistine pentapolis operated as a league of five city-states, each governed by its seren, who held equal authority within the council.
2. David's position ba-acharonah ('in the rear') is ambiguous in its implications. It could indicate a subordinate, less trusted position — or it could reflect the role Achish assigned David as his personal bodyguard (28:2). The narrator lets both readings coexist, building tension about David's actual status and intentions.
3. The text uses sarei pelishim ('commanders of the Philistines') rather than sarnei ('tyrants') here — this may reflect a broader group of military officers beyond the five city-state rulers, or it may be a stylistic variation. Some scholars see the two terms as interchangeable in this context; others distinguish between the sarnei (political rulers) and sarim (military commanders).
3. Achish's defense of David is unwittingly ironic. David has been systematically deceiving Achish for over a year (27:8-12), raiding Geshurites, Girzites, and Amalekites while reporting that he was attacking Judean clans. Achish's confidence that David has been faultless is itself evidence of how thorough the deception was.
4. The word satan here is not the personal name 'Satan' as it develops in later biblical and intertestamental literature. It is the common noun meaning 'adversary, accuser, opponent' — someone who opposes you in a legal or military context. The same word appears in Numbers 22:22 where the angel of the LORD stands as a satan (opponent) to Balaam, and in 1 Kings 11:14 where God raises up a satan (political adversary) against Solomon. The rendering uses 'turn against us' to capture the military sense without importing later theological connotations.
4. The verb yitratseh ('he would reconcile himself, make himself pleasing') comes from the root ratsah, which carries connotations of restoring favor, gaining acceptance, making amends. The commanders understand the political calculus perfectly: a defector who returns bearing enemy heads is a defector who has proven his loyalty has shifted back.
5. This victory song first appeared in 18:7 after David's defeat of Goliath. It provoked Saul's jealousy (18:8-9), contributed to Saul's attempts on David's life, and now resurfaces in the mouths of Philistine commanders who use it as evidence against David. The song has become a narrative thread connecting David's greatest triumph to his present entanglement — the fame that made him a hero in Israel makes him a suspected traitor among the Philistines.
5. The verb hikkah ('he struck down') is the same martial verb used for David's killing of Goliath (17:50) and his slaughter of two hundred Philistines for the bride price (18:27). The Philistine commanders are reciting a song that celebrates the killing of their own people — the irony is savage and their alarm entirely rational.
6. Achish's oath chai-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') is one of the most remarkable features of this chapter. A Philistine king invoking the personal name of Israel's God is either an extraordinary theological concession, a calculated diplomatic gesture to put David at ease, or evidence that David's presence in Gath has had a religious influence. The narrator does not explain; the oath stands as an unexplored detail that invites reflection.
6. The contrast between be-einay ('in my eyes') and be-einei ha-seranim ('in the eyes of the tyrants') structures Achish's speech: what is good in his eyes is not good in theirs. Achish is caught between personal loyalty and political reality. The seranim as a governing body hold collective authority that overrides any individual seren's judgment, including the king of Gath.
7. The phrase be-shalom ('in peace') appears frequently as a dismissal formula (Genesis 26:29, 44:17; Judges 18:6). It does not necessarily mean 'at peace' but rather 'whole, unharmed, without incident.' Achish is telling David to leave cleanly, without creating a confrontation.
7. The verb ta'aseh ra ('do evil') is deliberately vague — Achish does not specify what hostile act he fears. The ambiguity may reflect his own uncertainty about David's true loyalties, or it may be a diplomatic way of saying: whatever you are planning, do not do it where the tyrants can see.
8. This verse is the single most ambiguous speech in David's narrative. The phrase 'enemies of my lord the king' permits David to mean the exact opposite of what Achish hears. Maintaining this ambiguity in translation is essential — resolving it in either direction would impose a clarity the Hebrew text deliberately withholds. David may be performing loyalty to maintain his cover, or he may be subtly declaring that he would have fought for Israel from within the Philistine ranks. The narrator provides no interior access to David's thoughts.
8. The repeated mah ('what') in David's double question (meh asiti / mah-matsata, 'what have I done / what have you found') mirrors Samuel's self-defense before Israel in 12:3. David is borrowing the language of judicial innocence — presenting himself as a servant wrongly dismissed. Whether this is genuine hurt, political theater, or relief disguised as protest, the text does not say.
9. The phrase mal'akh elohim ('messenger of God') appears again in 2 Samuel 14:17 and 14:20, where it describes someone with supernaturally reliable judgment. Achish may be using a known idiom rather than making a specific theological claim — but the narrator's decision to record it on Philistine lips is notable. David, the man after God's own heart, is recognized as godlike even by Israel's enemies.

9. The tension between Achish's personal trust and the commanders' collective veto illustrates the limits of Philistine political structure. Achish governs Gath but cannot override the confederacy's military decisions. This structural constraint becomes God's instrument for extracting David from the impossible situation.
10. The urgency of Achish's command — rise early, leave at first light — suggests he fears what might happen if the Philistine commanders find David still in camp. The doubled imperative is not merely rhetorical emphasis but practical urgency: the window for a peaceful departure may be narrow.
10. The phrase avdei adonekha ('servants of your lord') has generated significant textual discussion. The Septuagint expands this verse considerably, adding a reference to the place Achish assigned David. The shorter Hebrew (Masoretic) text preserved here is more terse and more ambiguous, which is characteristic of the narrator's approach throughout this chapter.
11. The verb alu ('they went up') is the standard military term for advancing to battle — the same verb the commanders used in verse 9 when forbidding David to 'go up' (ya'aleh) with them. The Philistines go up without David, and this decision — made by suspicious tyrants for purely strategic reasons — saves David from the impossible choice of fighting his own people and positions him to be absent when Saul dies, preserving his innocence in the succession.
11. The narrator's silence at the chapter's close is theologically significant. There is no prophetic word, no angelic intervention, no dream or vision. God acts entirely through secondary causes: Philistine military paranoia, political confederation dynamics, and Achish's inability to overrule his peers. The providence is total but invisible — discernible only in retrospect.

Summary: David and his men return to Ziklag after being dismissed by the Philistine commanders, only to find the city burned and all their families taken captive by an Amalekite raiding party. Grief turns to mutiny as David's own warriors talk of stoning him. In his lowest moment, David strengthens himself in the LORD his God, inquires through the priest Abiathar, and receives divine authorization to pursue. A collapsed Egyptian slave leads them to the Amalekite camp, where David recovers everything — every person, every possession — and takes additional plunder. When some of David's men refuse to share the spoils with the two hundred who stayed behind at the Wadi Besor, David overrules them and establishes a permanent legal precedent: those who guard the supplies share equally with those who fight.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter contains the most compressed emotional arc in the David narrative. Within a span of verses, David passes through catastrophic loss, near-assassination by his own men, spiritual renewal, divine consultation, providential guidance through a dying slave, total military victory, and legislative innovation. The pivotal sentence — vayyitchazzeq David ba-YHWH Elohav ('David strengthened himself in the LORD his God') — is one of the most theologically dense single clauses in Samuel. The verb chazaq in the hitpaal stem means David actively seized strength from God; it was not passive comfort but a deliberate act of will directed toward the divine. This is the only time in the narrative that David is described this way, and it comes at precisely the moment when every external support has been stripped away: his city burned, his family captured, his men turned against him. The chapter also quietly demonstrates David's fitness for kingship in contrast to Saul. Where Saul consulted God and received silence (28:6), David inquires and receives immediate, specific guidance. Where Saul hoarded or mismanaged plunder (chapter 15), David distributes it with justice. Where Saul's authority fractured under pressure, David's leadership emerges stronger from crisis.*

Translation Friction: *The relationship between this chapter and the preceding Philistine narrative requires careful attention. Chapter 29 ends with David dismissed from the Philistine army at Aphek; chapter 30 opens with him arriving at Ziklag 'on the third day.' The Amalekite raid happened while David was away marching with the Philistines — a consequence of his dual allegiance. The text presents this without moralizing, but the reader should notice that David's attempt to serve two masters (Achish and the LORD) nearly cost him everything. The phrase 'statute and ordinance' (choq u-mishpat) in verse 25 raises a question of legal authority: David is not yet king, but he legislates as if he were. The narrator validates this by saying it has been binding 'from that day forward, even to this day' — the formula for established law in Israel. David exercises royal judicial function before he holds the royal office.*

Connections: The Amalekite raid connects directly to Saul's failure in chapter 15. Saul was commanded to destroy the Amalekites utterly and did not; now the Amalekites raid with impunity, and it falls to David to do what Saul could not. David's inquiry through the ephod (verse 7-8) recalls the pattern established in 23:1-6 when Abiathar brought the ephod to David — the priestly instrument of divine consultation that Saul forfeited when he slaughtered the priests of Nob (22:18-19). The spoil-sharing law of verse 25 has precedent in Numbers 31:25-27, where Moses divided plunder between warriors and the congregation after the Midianite war. David adapts this Mosaic precedent to his own situation, functioning as a second Moses. The gifts sent to Judah's elders in verses 26-31 are a masterful political act — David shares the plunder from defeating Judah's enemies with the very towns that sheltered him during his fugitive years, building the loyalty base that will make him king at Hebron in 2 Samuel 2:1-4.

¹When David and his men reached Ziklag on the third day, the Amalekites had already raided the Negev and struck Ziklag — they had attacked it and burned it to the ground. ²They had taken captive the women and everyone in it, from the youngest to the oldest. They killed no one but drove them away and went on their way. ³When David and his men came to the city, they found it burned — and their wives, sons, and daughters had been taken captive. ⁴David and the men with him raised their voices and wept until they had no strength left to weep. ⁵David's two wives had been taken captive — Ahinoam of Jezreel and Abigail, the widow of Nabal of Carmel. ⁶David was in severe distress, because the men were talking of stoning him — the soul of every man was bitter over his sons and daughters. But David strengthened himself in the LORD his God. ⁷David said to Abiathar the priest, son of Ahimelech, "Bring me the ephod." So Abiathar brought the ephod to David. ⁸David inquired of the LORD: "Should I pursue this raiding party? Will I overtake them?" And He answered him, "Pursue — for you will certainly overtake them, and you will certainly recover everything." ⁹David set out with the six hundred men who were with him. When they reached the Wadi Besor, those who were left behind stopped there. ¹⁰David continued the pursuit with four hundred men, while two hundred stayed behind — too exhausted to cross the Wadi Besor. ¹¹They found an Egyptian man in the open field and brought him to David. They gave him bread to eat and water to drink. ¹²They gave him a piece of pressed fig cake and two raisin cakes. He ate, and his spirit returned to him, for he had not eaten bread or drunk water for three days and three nights. ¹³David asked him, "Who do you belong to? Where are you from?" He said, "I am an Egyptian youth, a slave of an Amalekite man. My master abandoned me because I fell ill three days ago." ¹⁴We raided the Negev of the Cherethites, the territory belonging to Judah, and the Negev of Caleb — and we burned Ziklag. ¹⁵David said to him, "Can you lead me down to this raiding party?" He replied, "Swear to me by God that you will not kill me or hand me back to my master, and I will lead you down to them." ¹⁶He led him down, and there they were — spread out across the open ground, eating and drinking and celebrating over all the vast plunder they had taken from the land of the Philistines and from the land of Judah. ¹⁷David struck them from twilight until the evening of the next day. Not a man of them escaped, except four hundred young men who mounted camels and fled. ¹⁸David recovered everything the Amalekites had taken. David also rescued his two wives. ¹⁹Nothing was missing — from the youngest to the oldest, sons and daughters, plunder and everything the Amalekites had taken. David brought it all back. ²⁰David also took all the flocks and herds. They drove these animals ahead of the other livestock, and the men declared, "This is David's plunder." ²¹David came to the two hundred men who had been too exhausted to follow him and had been left at the Wadi Besor. They came out to meet David and the men with him. When David approached, he greeted them warmly. ²²But every worthless and wicked man among those who had gone with David spoke up and said, "Because they did not go with us, we will not give them any of the plunder we recovered — except for each man's wife and children. Let them take those and go." ²³David replied, "You must not do this, my brothers — not with what the LORD has given us. He protected us and handed over to us the raiding party that came against us." ²⁴Who would agree with you in this? The share of the one who goes down into battle and the share of the one who stays with the supplies will be the same — they will divide equally. ²⁵From that day forward he established it as a binding statute and rule for Israel, and it remains so to this day. ²⁶When David returned to Ziklag, he sent portions of the plunder to the elders of Judah — to his allies — saying, "Here is a gift for you from the plunder of the enemies of the LORD." ²⁷He sent gifts to those in Bethel, to those in Ramoth of the Negev, and to those in Jattir, ²⁸to those in Aroer, to those in Siphmoth, and to those in Eshtemoa, ²⁹to those in Racal, to those in the towns of the Jerahmeelites, and to those in the towns of the Kenites, ³⁰to those in Hormah, to those in Bor-ashan, and to those in Athach, ³¹and to those in Hebron — and to every place where David and his men had moved about.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The 'third day' marks the travel time from Aphek, where the Philistine commanders dismissed David (chapter 29). The verb pashtu ('they raided') is the standard term for a sudden military incursion — a fast, violent sweep through undefended territory. The Negev ('the south,' 'the dry land') is the arid region south of the Judean hills, where Ziklag is located. The Amalekites' target was the same region David had been raiding on behalf of Achish (27:8-10), suggesting a retaliatory strike.
1. The verb yisrefu ('they burned') with the object ba-esh ('with fire') is emphatic — Ziklag was not merely damaged but reduced to ash. David returns from one war front to discover devastation at home, a consequence of his absence while playing the double agent with the Philistines.
2. The verb vayyishbu ('they took captive') indicates that the Amalekites seized the population for enslavement or ransom, not slaughter. The phrase mi-qaton ve-ad gadol ('from small to great') encompasses the entire population — children, women, elderly. The narrator pauses to note lo hemitu ish ('they did not kill anyone'), which is both a relief and a narrative necessity: the captives must be alive for David to recover them.
2. The Amalekite restraint stands in ironic contrast to Saul's incomplete destruction of the Amalekites in chapter 15. The Amalekites take captives alive; Saul was supposed to leave none alive but spared King Agag. The reversal is pointed.
3. The particle ve-hinne ('and behold') marks the moment of horrified discovery. This is the narrator's way of placing the reader inside the soldiers' experience — they arrive expecting home and find ruin. The verb serufah ('burned') is a passive participle indicating a completed state: the city was already fully consumed. The possessive pronouns shift to first-person perspective — neshehem u-vnehem u-vnotehem ('their wives and their sons and their daughters') — making the devastation personal for every man in David's force.
4. The phrase vayyis'u et qolam vayyivku ('they lifted up their voice and wept') is a formulaic expression for loud, public grief — not private tears but the communal wailing of men who have lost everything. The clause ad asher ein bahem koach livkot ('until there was no strength in them to weep') is extraordinary: these are battle-hardened warriors who weep themselves into physical exhaustion. The verse makes no distinction between David and his men — the king-in-waiting and the common soldier share the same collapse.
4. This level of grief from fighting men signals total devastation. These six hundred veterans (27:2) have survived years of pursuit by Saul, but the loss of their families breaks them in a way that no battlefield ever did.
5. The narrator specifies David's personal loss within the collective disaster. Ahinoam is identified by her hometown (Jezreel in the southern hill country, not the northern Jezreel Valley), and Abigail is still identified in relation to her first husband Nabal despite being married to David. The designation eshet Naval ('wife of Nabal') may be a legal or customary identifier — she was known by her previous marriage — or it may remind the reader of her story from chapter 25, where she emerged as a woman of extraordinary wisdom. David's most personal stakes are named.
6. The verb tsarar ('to be narrow, distressed, pressed in') conveys constriction — David is hemmed in by simultaneous catastrophes. The phrase amru ha-am lisqolo ('the people spoke of stoning him') uses the standard vocabulary for mob execution (saqal, 'to stone'). Stoning was both a legal punishment and a mob action; here it is the latter — grief-driven fury seeking a target.
6. The clause vayyitchazzeq David ba-YHWH Elohav is the theological hinge of the chapter. The hitpa'el stem of chazaq indicates reflexive, deliberate action: David strengthened himself, seized strength, took hold of firmness. The preposition ba- ('in') indicates the source and ground of this strength. Elohav ('his God') is a possessive construction expressing personal covenant relationship. No external agent intervenes — no prophet, no angel, no miracle. David turns inward to a relationship with God and draws from it what he needs to act.
7. David's first act after strengthening himself in the LORD is to summon the priestly instrument of divine inquiry. Abiathar is identified as ben Ahimelekh ('son of Ahimelech'), connecting this moment to the massacre at Nob (22:20-23) — Abiathar is the sole surviving priest, and he carries the ephod that enables communication with God. The ephod here is the priestly garment containing the Urim and Thummim, the oracular devices used to receive yes-or-no answers from God.
7. The request haggisha-na li ha-efod ('please bring near to me the ephod') uses the polite particle na ('please'), showing that even in crisis David addresses the priest with respect for his office. The verb higgish ('bring near') is the same verb used for bringing an offering before God — there is a liturgical quality to this request.
8. The verb sha'al ('to inquire') is the same root that gives us the name Sha'ul (Saul). David does what Saul's name promises — he asks of the LORD — while Saul himself has been cut off from divine response (28:6). The irony is profound: the man named 'Asked' cannot get an answer, while the man named 'Beloved' asks and is answered immediately.
8. The double infinitive absolute construction in God's reply — hasseg tassig ve-hatsel tatsil — is emphatic beyond English translation. Each pair intensifies the verb to its maximum: 'overtaking you will overtake, rescuing you will rescue.' We render this with 'certainly' to convey the guarantee, though the Hebrew is more forceful than any single English adverb can express.
9. The nachal Besor ('Wadi Besor') is a seasonal streambed in the northern Negev, typically identified with Wadi Shallaleh or Wadi Gaza. The name Besor may derive from basar ('flesh, good news') or be of non-Hebrew origin. The phrase ve-hannotarim amadu ('and the remaining ones stood/stopped') introduces the group that will become central to the legal dispute in verses 21-25. The verb amad ('to stand, to stop') simply indicates they halted — the reason is given in the next verse.

10. The verb piggeru ('they were too exhausted, they collapsed') derives from pagar, meaning to be faint, exhausted, or spent beyond the ability to continue. These two hundred men had already marched three days from Aphek to Ziklag, wept until they had no strength (verse 4), and now faced a forced pursuit south — their bodies simply gave out. The narrative does not criticize them; it records their exhaustion as fact.
10. The division of forces — four hundred pursuing, two hundred remaining — will become the basis for the legal dispute in verses 21-25. The narrator sets this up without commentary, allowing the reader to hold the question: are the exhausted men lesser partners or equal sharers?
11. The discovery of the Egyptian slave is the chapter's providential hinge — a seemingly random find in the wilderness that becomes the key to recovering everything. The phrase ish Mitsri ba-sadeh ('an Egyptian man in the field') presents him as abandoned and alone in open country. David's men feed him before questioning him, an act of practical compassion that also serves their tactical needs — a starving man cannot speak coherently. The provision of lechem ('bread') and mayim ('water') are the basic elements of sustaining life.
12. The pelach develah ('piece of fig cake') and tsimmuqim ('raisin cakes') are concentrated, high-energy foods carried on military campaigns — ideal for reviving a starving man. The phrase vattashov rucho elav ('his spirit returned to him') uses ruach ('spirit, life-breath') to describe his revival from near-death. The three-day period without food or water (sheloshah yamim u-sheloshah lelot) means the Egyptian was abandoned roughly when the raid occurred — he collapsed during or just after the Amalekite attack on Ziklag, placing his abandonment contemporaneous with the raid.
13. David's two questions — le-mi attah ('to whom are you?') and ei mi-zeh attah ('from where are you?') — ask about ownership and origin, the two essential identifiers for a person found alone in the wilderness. The young man identifies himself as a na'ar Mitsri ('Egyptian youth') who is an eved ('slave, servant') of an Amalekite master. The verb azaveni ('he abandoned me') reveals the Amalekite's character: a slave too sick to keep up is left to die. This disposable treatment of a human being contrasts sharply with David's feeding of the man before questioning him.
13. The detail that he fell ill 'three days ago' (ha-yom sheloshah) synchronizes his abandonment with the Ziklag raid, confirming that he was part of the raiding party.
14. The Egyptian slave reveals the full scope of the Amalekite raid: three distinct regions were hit. The Negev of the Kerethi ('Cherethites') refers to the territory of a Philistine-associated group (the Cherethites later appear as part of David's royal guard in 2 Samuel 8:18). The territory 'belonging to Judah' is the tribal allotment, and the Negev of Caleb is the area around Hebron granted to Caleb's clan (Joshua 15:13). This was not a pinpoint strike but a sweeping raid across the entire southern frontier.
14. The slave's admission ve-et Tsiqlag sarafnu va-esh ('and Ziklag we burned with fire') gives David exactly the intelligence he needs. The abandoned slave becomes the instrument of divine provision — the very cruelty of the Amalekite master produces the guide who will lead David to the enemy camp.
15. The Egyptian's two conditions reveal his situation: he fears death at David's hand (im temiteni, 'if you kill me') and return to his master (im tasgireni be-yad adoni, 'if you hand me over into the hand of my master'). The verb hisgir ('to deliver up, to hand over') is the same verb David's enemies used when trying to get towns to 'deliver' David to Saul (23:11-12). The slave bargains with the only leverage he has — information — and secures an oath by God (hishave'ah li be-Elohim) as his guarantee. He trusts David's God-oath more than his own master's loyalty.
16. The particle ve-hinnech ('and behold') again marks a dramatic discovery — but this time it is David finding the enemy. The Amalekites are described as netushim al penei khol ha-arets ('spread out over the face of all the land'), a picture of a force so confident in its safety that it has dispersed without any defensive posture. The three participles — okhelim ve-shotim ve-choggim ('eating and drinking and celebrating') — paint a scene of total revelry. The verb chagag ('to celebrate, to hold a festival') is the same word used for Israel's religious festivals. The Amalekites are holding a feast with stolen goods.
16. Their tactical negligence — no sentries, no defensive perimeter, scattered across open terrain in drunken celebration — makes them perfectly vulnerable. The narrative presents their overconfidence as the setup for David's strike.
17. The battle lasted from neshef ('twilight' — either dawn-twilight or dusk-twilight; most interpreters read this as predawn darkness) until erev le-mochoratam ('the evening of the next day'), a sustained assault lasting up to twenty-four hours. David attacked while the Amalekites were incapacitated from their celebration. The scope of the victory is near-total: only four hundred men on camels — the fastest means of desert escape — got away. The camel detail is specifically Amalekite; this nomadic people's expertise with camels appears as early as Judges 6:5.
17. The four hundred who escape on camels is a notable detail — it matches exactly the number of David's attacking force. The narrator may be drawing attention to the symmetry, or simply recording the fact.
18. The verb hitsil ('he rescued, delivered') fulfills God's promise from verse 8 (hatsel tatsil, 'you will certainly rescue'). The narrator states the recovery in two stages: first the collective — kol asher laqchu Amaleq ('everything the Amalekites had taken') — then the personal — et shtei nashav ('his two wives'). The repetition of David's name in both clauses (vayyatsel David... hitsil David) emphasizes that this is David's victory, achieved under divine authorization.
19. The emphatic accumulation of categories — min ha-qaton ve-ad ha-gadol ('from the small to the great'), banim u-vanot ('sons and daughters'), mi-shalal ('from the plunder'), kol asher laqchu ('everything they had taken') — builds to the comprehensive conclusion ha-kol heshiv David ('David returned everything'). The verb ne'dar ('was missing, was lacking') is negated: nothing was unaccounted for. This total recovery is the fulfillment of the double infinitive absolute promise in verse 8. God said 'you will certainly rescue' and not one person or possession was lost.

- 20. This verse distinguishes between the recovered property (which belonged to the original owners) and additional Amalekite livestock captured in the battle. The phrase nahagu lifnei ha-miqneh ha-hu ('they drove before that livestock') separates the newly captured animals from the recovered ones. The declaration zeh shelal David ('this is David's plunder') attributes the surplus to David personally — it is his by right of military command. This additional plunder will become the basis for the gifts David sends to Judah's elders in verses 26-31.
- 21. The verb piggeru ('they were exhausted') is repeated from verse 10 without any added shame — the narrator maintains a neutral description of their physical condition. The phrase vayyets'u liqrat David ('they went out to meet David') shows these men coming forward eagerly, not hiding in embarrassment. David's response — vayyiggash et ha-am vayyish'al lahem le-shalom ('he drew near to the people and asked them about their welfare') — uses the standard greeting formula sha'al le-shalom ('to ask about peace/well-being'). David treats the exhausted men as comrades, not as failures.
- 22. The narrator's moral judgment is explicit: kol ish ra u-veliyya'al ('every bad and worthless man'). The term beliyya'al ('worthlessness, wickedness') is the same label applied to the sons of Eli (2:12) and to Nabal (25:17, 25) — it marks a person as a violator of social bonds and covenant norms. These men claim the plunder as exclusively theirs because they fought while the others rested. Their concession — 'each man can have his wife and children' — is technically generous (they could have claimed even the families), but the narrator's label makes clear that their position is morally defective.
- 22. The phrase asher hitsalnu ('which we rescued') uses the first person plural possessively — 'we rescued,' claiming the victory as solely their achievement, ignoring both the divine promise and the collective effort.
- 23. David's response begins with a prohibition — lo ta'asu khen achai ('you shall not do this, my brothers') — that is both authoritative and fraternal. He calls them achai ('my brothers'), maintaining solidarity even while overruling them. His argument is theological, not tactical: the victory belongs to God, not to the fighters. The clause et asher natan YHWH lanu ('that which the LORD gave to us') reframes the plunder as a divine gift rather than a military earning. The verb shamar ('he guarded, protected') and natan ('he gave, delivered') attribute both safety and victory to God's action. If God gave it, no human faction can claim exclusive ownership.
- 24. David's rhetorical question — u-mi yishma lakhem la-davar ha-zeh ('and who would listen to you in this matter?') — dismisses their claim as self-evidently unreasonable. He then states the principle: ke-cheleq ha-yored ba-milchamah u-ke-cheleq ha-yoshev al ha-kelim ('like the share of the one going down into battle and like the share of the one sitting by the equipment') — the combatant and the guard receive identical portions. The verb yachdav yachaloqu ('together they will divide') makes equal distribution the rule. The word kelim ('equipment, vessels, supplies, baggage') refers to the gear and provisions that must be guarded — a military necessity, not a luxury assignment.
- 25. The verb vayyesimeha ('he set it, he placed it') indicates a deliberate legislative act — David does not merely suggest a policy but formally institutes it. The combination choq u-mishpat appears throughout the Pentateuch as a description of God's laws given through Moses (Exodus 15:25; Joshua 24:25). By using this phrase, the narrator places David's ruling in the same category as Mosaic legislation.
- 25. The precedent has roots in Numbers 31:25-27, where Moses divided Midianite plunder between soldiers and the congregation. David's innovation is to explicitly equate the guard detail with the combat force — the one who stays by the baggage shares equally with the one who fights. This principle will endure as Israelite military law.
- 26. David's distribution of plunder to the elders of Judah (ziquei Yehudah) is both generous and strategic. The word re'ehu ('his friends, his allies, his companions') identifies these elders as men who supported David during his fugitive years. The term berakhah ('blessing, gift') reframes war plunder as a covenant blessing — David does not say 'here is plunder' but 'here is a berakhah for you.' The phrase oyvei YHWH ('enemies of the LORD') elevates the Amalekite conflict from personal vengeance to holy war — the plunder comes from God's enemies, which makes the gift sacred.
- 26. This political act builds the loyalty network that will make David king over Judah at Hebron (2 Samuel 2:1-4). Every gift creates an obligation; every elder who accepts becomes invested in David's future.
- 27. The list of recipient towns begins. Bethel here likely refers to a southern town distinct from the famous Bethel in Benjamin — possibly a variant of Bethul (Joshua 19:4) in the Simeonite territory. Ramoth Negev ('Heights of the South') is a town in the Negev region. Yattir is a Levitical city in the hill country of Judah (Joshua 15:48, 21:14). Each of these towns is located in territory where David operated as a fugitive and where the elders provided shelter or intelligence.
- 28. Aroer is a town in the southern Judean territory (distinct from the Aroer east of the Jordan in Moab). Siphmoth is otherwise unknown — it appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, suggesting it was a small settlement in David's network that did not survive as a significant town. Eshtemoa (modern es-Semu) is a Levitical city in the Judean hills (Joshua 15:50, 21:14). The inclusion of Levitical cities alongside unknown villages shows the breadth of David's alliance network.
- 29. Racal (or Rachal) is another town known only from this passage. The Jerahmeelites and Kenites are the same groups David claimed to raid when deceiving Achish (27:10) — in truth he was raiding Israel's enemies while protecting these allied peoples. Now he rewards them with plunder from the very Amalekites who threatened them all. The Kenites were descendants of Moses' father-in-law (Judges 1:16), traditionally allied with Israel and living in the Negev. The Jerahmeelites were a clan affiliated with Judah (1 Chronicles 2:9). David's gift-giving honors the real alliances he maintained while appearing to serve the Philistines.
- 30. Hormah ('Destruction') is a significant town in the southern Negev with a history reaching back to the conquest period (Numbers 21:3; Judges 1:17). The name itself commemorates Israel's early victory there. Bor-ashan ('Well of Smoke' or 'Cistern of Smoke') is likely the same as Ashan in Joshua 15:42. Athach is unattested elsewhere and may be a variant of Ether (Joshua 15:42) or a small settlement lost to history. The list continues to trace David's network across the southern frontier of Judah.

31. Hebron's placement at the end of the list is climactic. This is the city of Abraham's burial, the future site of David's coronation over Judah, and the political center of the southern tribe. By sending gifts last to Hebron, the narrator (or David himself) gives it the position of honor. The verb hithalekh ('moved about, walked about') in the hitpael stem indicates habitual action over time — David and his men were a mobile force who ranged across all these territories during the fugitive years. The verse functions as a summary: everywhere David had traveled, he now sends blessing. The seeds planted during years of flight produce a harvest of loyalty that will make him king.

Summary: The Philistines engage Israel in battle on Mount Gilboa, and the rout is total. Saul's three sons — Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchi-shua — fall in combat. Saul himself is critically wounded by archers and, rather than face capture and humiliation, asks his armor-bearer to kill him. When the armor-bearer refuses in terror, Saul falls on his own sword, and the armor-bearer follows him in death. The next day the Philistines find the bodies, behead Saul, strip his armor, and send word throughout Philistia. They fasten Saul's body to the wall of Beth-shan and place his armor in the temple of Ashtaroth. But the men of Jabesh-gilead — the very people Saul rescued in his first act as king — march through the night, recover the bodies from the wall, burn them at Jabesh, bury the bones under the tamarisk tree, and fast seven days.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter is the mirror-image of chapter 11. There, Saul burst onto the scene by rescuing Jabesh-gilead from Nahash the Ammonite; here, Jabesh-gilead repays the debt by rescuing Saul's body from the Philistines. The literary structure is an inclusio — Saul's public story begins and ends with the men of Jabesh-gilead. The chapter also records the first explicit suicide in the Hebrew Bible: Saul's falling on his own sword (naphal al-charbo). The narrator offers no theological commentary on the act itself — no condemnation, no approval. The silence is deafening, leaving the reader to reckon with the tragic end of a king who began with such promise. The Philistines' treatment of Saul's body — beheading, armor-stripping, display on the walls of Beth-shan — mirrors what David did to Goliath (chapter 17), creating a grim symmetry: Israel's champion once desecrated a Philistine giant, and now Philistia desecrates Israel's king.*

Translation Friction: *The central translational tension lies in verse 4, where Saul fears the Philistines will 'thrust him through and abuse him' (or 'make sport of him'). The verb hit'allelu (from alal in the Hithpael) can mean 'to deal wantonly with, to make a toy of, to torture' — the same root used for what the Egyptians did to Israel (Exodus 10:2). Saul's fear is not merely of death but of degradation: being kept alive as a trophy, mocked and mutilated. This raises the question of whether Saul's suicide was despair or a final act of royal dignity — the text does not resolve this. Another friction point: verse 12 says the men of Jabesh-gilead 'burned' the bodies (saraph), which is unusual in Israelite practice where burial, not cremation, was normative. Some scholars argue the burning removed the decomposed flesh so the bones could be properly interred; others see it as an emergency measure to prevent further Philistine desecration. We render saraph straightforwardly as 'burned' and let the translator's note address the anomaly.*

Connections: The Jabesh-gilead connection to chapter 11 forms the most prominent literary link — the men Saul once delivered now deliver what remains of him. David's lament over Saul and Jonathan in 2 Samuel 1 immediately follows this chapter, and the burning/burial at Jabesh will be revisited when David honors the men of Jabesh-gilead in 2 Samuel 2:4-7. The fastening of bodies to the wall of Beth-shan anticipates the Gibeonite execution of Saul's descendants in 2 Samuel 21, where bodies are again exposed and must be recovered. Saul's armor placed in the temple of Ashtaroth inverts the pattern from chapter 5, where the Philistine god Dagon fell before the captured ark — now it is Israel's king whose spoils adorn a Philistine temple. The death of Jonathan here sets up the covenant loyalty David will show to Mephibosheth in 2 Samuel 9, honoring the oath he swore to Jonathan.

¹The Philistines were fighting against Israel, and the men of Israel fled before the Philistines and fell, fatally wounded, on Mount Gilboa. ²The Philistines pressed hard after Saul and his sons. The Philistines struck down Jonathan, Abinadab, and Malchi-shua — Saul's sons. ³The battle pressed heavily against Saul, and the archers found him — the bowmen — and he was severely wounded by them. ⁴Saul said to his armor-bearer, "Draw your sword and run me through with it, or these uncircumcised men will come and run me through and make sport of me." But his armor-bearer refused — he was too terrified. So Saul took the sword and fell on it. ⁵When his armor-bearer saw that Saul was dead, he too fell on his sword and died with him. ⁶Saul, his three sons, his armor-bearer, and all his men perished together on that day. ⁷When the men of Israel on the other side of the valley and on the other side of the Jordan saw that the men of Israel had fled and that Saul and his sons were dead, they abandoned their cities and fled. The Philistines came and occupied them. ⁸The next day, when the Philistines came to strip the dead, they found Saul and his three sons fallen on Mount Gilboa. ⁹They cut off his head and stripped his armor, and they sent messengers throughout the land of the Philistines to carry the news to the temples of their idols and to the people. ¹⁰They placed his armor in the temple of Ashtaroath, and they fastened his body to the wall of Beth-shan. ¹¹When the inhabitants of Jabesh-gilead heard what the Philistines had done to Saul, ¹²All the fighting men set out and marched through the night. They took down the body of Saul and the bodies of his sons from the wall of Beth-shan, brought them to Jabesh, and burned them there. ¹³They took their bones and buried them under the tamarisk tree in Jabesh, and they fasted for seven days.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The opening conjunction u ('and') connects this chapter directly to the preceding narrative — there is no fresh beginning, only the continuation of a disaster already set in motion. The verb nilchamim ('were fighting') is a participle, indicating ongoing action: the battle is already in progress when the narrative camera arrives.
1. The phrase vayyipplu chalalim ('they fell as pierced ones') uses the same root chalal that will recur throughout the chapter. The word carries a sense of violent penetration — these men died from sword, spear, or arrow wounds. Mount Gilboa sits at the southeastern edge of the Jezreel Valley, a strategic position whose loss would expose the entire central highlands to Philistine advance.
2. The verb davaq in military contexts means to pursue so closely that the gap between hunter and hunted collapses. The Philistines are not merely chasing Saul; they have locked onto him. The three sons are named in order: Jonathan (yehonatan, 'the LORD has given'), Abinadab (avinadav, 'my father is generous'), and Malchi-shua (malki-shua, 'my king is salvation' or 'my king is noble'). The irony of these theophoric names — invoking God's giving, generosity, and salvation — against the scene of their violent deaths is a silence the narrator lets speak for itself.
2. Jonathan's death fulfills the narrative trajectory set in motion when he made his covenant with David (chapter 18, 20). He chose loyalty to David over dynastic succession, and now he dies alongside the father whose throne he voluntarily relinquished. The text does not separate Jonathan's death from his brothers' or grant him a special scene — he dies as a son of Saul, on a battlefield, unnamed in any speech.
3. The phrase anashim ba-qashet ('men of the bow') is an appositional clarification of ha-morim ('the shooters') — the narrator specifies that these are archers, long-range killers. Saul is being struck from a distance, unable to close with his enemies. For a warrior-king, this is a particularly degrading way to fall.
3. The crux of the verse is vayyachel me'od. If from chul ('to writhe, tremble'), Saul is terrified; if from chalal ('to be pierced, wounded'), he is already critically injured. The Septuagint renders it as 'he was wounded' (etraumatishe), supporting the chalal reading. The ambiguity may be intentional — Saul is both wounded and terrified, his body and his nerve both broken.
4. The construction pen yavo'u ('lest they come') reveals Saul's motive: he is acting to prevent a worse outcome, not choosing death for its own sake. The narrator offers no moral verdict on the act — no 'he sinned' or 'the LORD struck him.' This silence is itself significant, as the Chronicler's account (1 Chronicles 10:13-14) will add explicit theological commentary that the Samuel narrator withholds.
4. The armor-bearer's refusal (lo avah, 'he was not willing') uses the same construction that described Saul's own refusal to eat in 28:23. The verb avah implies a deep, dispositional unwillingness — the armor-bearer cannot bring himself to strike the LORD's anointed, even at the anointed's own command. This echoes David's repeated refusal to harm Saul in chapters 24 and 26.
5. The armor-bearer's death mirrors Saul's exactly: vayyipol gam hu al-charbo ('he also fell on his sword'). The phrase vayyamot immo ('he died with him') creates a bond in death that echoes the loyalty oaths of the ancient world — the attendant follows his lord into death. The armor-bearer who could not bring himself to kill Saul can, it seems, bring himself to follow him. The narrator records this second suicide with the same terse silence, offering no commentary.
5. The word gam ('also, likewise') carries weight: the armor-bearer's death is derivative, an echo of Saul's. He does not die for his own reasons but because his master has died. This pattern of the subordinate dying alongside the king will recur in different forms throughout the David narrative.
6. The summary verse functions as an obituary for the Saulide dynasty. The phrase kol anashav ('all his men') likely refers to Saul's personal guard or household warriors, not the entire Israelite army — the flight described in verse 7 implies many soldiers survived. The word yachdav ('together') carries a tragic finality: the house of Saul, which rose together, falls together.
6. This verse forms a structural parallel with the death of Eli's house in chapter 4: there too, father and sons died on the same day, and the ark (symbol of divine presence) was lost to the Philistines. Saul's dynasty ends the way the old priestly dynasty ended — in a single catastrophic day.

7. The verb azvu ('they abandoned') describes the evacuation of entire populations from their cities. This is the catastrophic consequence Samuel warned of in chapter 8: the king who was supposed to protect them has died, and without him the social order collapses. The Philistine occupation of Israelite cities reverses the conquest under Joshua and fulfills the worst-case scenario of the covenant curses (Deuteronomy 28:49-52).
7. The geographical scope — spanning from the Jezreel Valley to Transjordan — indicates that the Philistine victory at Gilboa effectively cut Israel in half, severing the northern tribes from the south. This fragmentation sets the stage for the divided loyalties of 2 Samuel, where David will rule Judah from Hebron while Ish-bosheth claims the north.
8. The verb leshashet ('to strip') refers to the standard post-battle practice of looting corpses — removing armor, weapons, and valuables. The word chalalim ('the slain, the pierced ones') recurs from verse 1, binding the chapter together. The phrase vayyimtse'u ('they found') echoes verse 3 where the archers 'found' Saul alive; now new seekers find him dead. The participle nofelim ('fallen') rather than the perfect metim ('dead') captures the scene visually: the bodies lie where they collapsed, still in the postures of their dying.
8. The day-after sequence (mimmacharot) creates a gap in the narrative — the night between the battle and the stripping is a silence in which the bodies lay exposed on the mountain. This delay is significant for the Jabesh-gilead narrative that follows: the bodies have been dead at least a full day before the Philistines even begin their desecration, and longer still before Jabesh-gilead can act.
9. The verb lesaser ('to carry good news') is from the root basar, which means 'to announce good tidings.' The same root gives us the word mevaser ('herald of good news') used in Isaiah 52:7. Here the 'good news' is Saul's death — what is gospel for Philistia is catastrophe for Israel. The ironic use of basar anticipates David's reaction in 2 Samuel 1, where the Amalekite who brings the 'good news' of Saul's death is executed for it.
9. The phrase beit atsabeihe ('the house of their idols') refers to Philistine temple complexes. First Chronicles 10:10 specifies the head was placed in the temple of Dagon, while this verse mentions the armor going to the temple of Ashtarothe (verse 10). The distribution of body parts and armor across multiple temples suggests a deliberate parceling of the spoils among different Philistine cult sites.
10. Beth-shan (beit shan) occupied a strategic position controlling the eastern approach to the Jezreel Valley. Its walls would have been visible from a great distance, making the display of Saul's body a message to the entire region. Archaeological excavations at Beth-shan have uncovered both Egyptian and Philistine temple complexes, confirming the city's role as a major religious and administrative center during this period.
10. The word geviyyah ('body, corpse') is a term for the physical frame — the shell left behind when life departs. Its use here emphasizes the materiality of the degradation: this is flesh and bone being nailed to stone. The pairing of armor in the temple and body on the wall creates a grotesque dismemberment of Saul's identity — his warrior self displayed in one place, his physical self in another.
11. The construction vayyishme'u elav ('they heard about him') directs the hearing specifically toward Saul — this is news about a person, not an event. The phrase et asher asu pelishtim le-Sha'ul ('what the Philistines had done to Saul') frames the Philistine actions as something done to Saul personally, not merely to a king or a corpse. For Jabesh-gilead, this is personal: the man who marched through the night to save them (11:11) now needs someone to march through the night for him.
12. The night march echoes Saul's own nighttime march to relieve Jabesh-gilead in chapter 11:11, where he divided his forces and struck the Ammonites 'in the morning watch.' The symmetry is precise: Saul marched through the night to save Jabesh-gilead's living bodies, and now Jabesh-gilead marches through the night to save Saul's dead body. The inclusio is complete.
12. The verb saraph ('to burn') is the same word used for the burning of sacrifices and the destruction of idolatrous objects. Its use here is debated: some scholars see it as evidence of Transjordanian burial customs distinct from western Israelite practice; others read it as an emergency measure. The Chronicler's account (1 Chronicles 10:12) omits the burning entirely, which may reflect later discomfort with the practice or simply a different textual tradition.
13. The word eshel is traditionally rendered 'tree' (KJV) or 'tamarisk' (most modern translations). The tamarisk is a hardy, long-lived tree common in semi-arid regions of the Levant, and its shade made it a natural gathering place. First Chronicles 10:12 reads elah ('oak' or 'terebinth') instead of eshel, suggesting textual variation in the tradition. We follow the Masoretic text's eshel.
13. The seven-day fast marks the conclusion of both the chapter and the book. In narrative terms, 1 Samuel opened with Hannah's tears and fasting at Shiloh (1:7-10) and closes with the men of Jabesh-gilead fasting at Jabesh. The book is framed by grief, by people who pour out their anguish before God. Hannah's grief produced Samuel; Jabesh-gilead's grief honors Saul. Between those two acts of mourning lies the entire experiment of Israel's first king.

Summary: After Saul's death on Mount Gilboa, an Amalekite messenger arrives at David's camp in Ziklag claiming to have delivered the killing blow to the wounded king. Rather than rewarding him, David has the man executed for daring to strike the LORD's anointed. David then composes a formal lament over Saul and Jonathan — the Song of the Bow — one of the most celebrated poems in the Hebrew Bible. Its refrain, 'How the mighty have fallen,' echoes three times as David mourns the loss of Israel's king and his own covenant brother.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains the oldest securely datable poem in the Davidic corpus. The Song of the Bow (vv. 19-27) is a qinah, a formal lament composed in the distinctive 3:2 'limping meter' that Hebrew poets reserved for dirges — the longer first line followed by the shorter second line creates a rhythmic stumbling, as if the verse itself is collapsing under the weight of grief. David orders it taught to the people of Judah and attributes it to the Book of Jashar, an ancient collection of heroic poetry now lost. The poem contains no theology: there is no mention of God, no appeal to divine justice, no comfort of resurrection. It is pure grief rendered as art. The Amalekite's story in verses 6-10 contradicts the account of Saul's death in 1 Samuel 31:4, where Saul falls on his own sword. Whether the Amalekite lied to curry favor or whether both accounts preserve different traditions, the narrator does not resolve — but David's response is unambiguous: to claim credit for killing the LORD's anointed is a capital offense regardless of the circumstances.

Translation Friction: The central friction is the discrepancy between 1 Samuel 31:4 (Saul fell on his own sword) and the Amalekite's account here (he delivered the final blow at Saul's request). Three interpretive options exist: (1) the Amalekite fabricated the story hoping for reward, (2) both accounts are partially true — Saul fell on his sword but did not die immediately, and the Amalekite finished the act, or (3) the two sources preserve rival traditions. We render the Amalekite's speech straightforwardly and let the translator's notes address the tension. A second friction point lies in verse 18, where the Hebrew says 'He said to teach the sons of Judah the bow' — the word qeshet ('bow') appears to be a title for the lament, but its abrupt insertion is syntactically awkward. Some manuscripts and the Septuagint omit it or rearrange. We retain 'the Bow' as the poem's title, following the Masoretic text. Verse 26 presents a third tension: David's declaration that Jonathan's love surpassed 'the love of women' (ahavat nashim) has generated extensive debate about its meaning. The Hebrew ahavah encompasses the full range of covenantal loyalty, political alliance, deep friendship, and emotional attachment. We render it faithfully and address the semantic range in the key terms.

Connections: The Song of the Bow connects backward to the Jabesh-gilead rescue of Saul's body (1 Samuel 31:11-13) and forward to David's honoring of those same men (2 Samuel 2:5-7). David's insistence on the sanctity of the LORD's anointed (mashiach YHWH) in verse 14 echoes his repeated refusal to harm Saul in 1 Samuel 24:6 and 26:9-11 — the theological principle that governed his fugitive years now governs his response to Saul's death. The reference to the Book of Jashar (v. 18) connects to Joshua 10:13, where the same source is cited for Joshua's command to the sun. The 'mighty' (gibborim) who have fallen will become a key category in David's kingdom — his elite warriors are called gibborim (2 Samuel 23:8-39). Jonathan's bow, celebrated in verse 22, recalls the covenant gift of his bow to David in 1 Samuel 18:4. The chapter's geographic movement — from Gilboa to Ziklag — bridges the Saul narrative and the David narrative, placing the reader at the threshold of David's rise to kingship.

¹After the death of Saul, David had returned from striking down the Amalekites and stayed in Ziklag for two days. ²On the third day, a man arrived from Saul's camp with his clothes torn and dirt on his head. When he came before David, he fell to the ground and bowed low. ³David asked him, "Where have you come from?" He answered, "I escaped from the camp of Israel." ⁴David said to him, "What happened? Tell me." He said, "The army fled from the battle, and many of the troops fell dead. And Saul and his son Jonathan are dead as well." ⁵David asked the young man who had brought the report, "How do you know that Saul and his son Jonathan are dead?" ⁶The young man reporting to him said, "I happened to be on Mount Gilboa, and there was Saul, leaning on his spear, with the chariots and cavalry closing in on him." ⁷He turned and looked behind him, saw me, and called out to me. ⁸He asked me, 'Who are you?' and I answered him, 'I am an Amalekite.' ⁹He said to me, 'Stand over me and kill me, because the death agony has seized me — yet my life is still in me.' ¹⁰So I stood over him and killed him, because I knew he could not survive after he had fallen. Then I took the crown from his head and the armband from his arm and brought them here to my lord. ¹¹David seized his own garments and tore them, and so did all the men who were with him. ¹²They mourned, wept, and fasted until evening — for Saul, for his son Jonathan, for the people of the LORD, and for the house of Israel, because they had fallen by the sword. ¹³David said to the young man who had brought the report, "Where are you from?" He answered, "I am the son of an Amalekite resident alien." ¹⁴David said to him, "How is it that you were not afraid to reach out your hand and destroy the anointed of the LORD?" ¹⁵David summoned one of the young men and said, "Go, strike him down." The man struck him, and he died. ¹⁶David said to him, "Your blood is on your own head, because your own mouth testified against you when you said, 'I killed the anointed of the LORD.'" ¹⁷David chanted this lament over Saul and over his son Jonathan: ¹⁸He ordered that the sons of Judah be taught 'The Bow.' It is recorded in the Book of Jashar:

¹⁹The splendor of Israel lies slain on your heights.
How the mighty have fallen!

²⁰Do not tell it in Gath,
do not proclaim it in the streets of Ashkelon — lest the daughters of the Philistines rejoice, lest the daughters of the uncircumcised celebrate.

²¹Mountains of Gilboa — let no dew fall on you,
no rain upon your terraced fields!
For there the shield of the mighty was defiled,
the shield of Saul — no longer rubbed with oil.

²²From the blood of the slain,
from the flesh of the mighty,
the bow of Jonathan never turned back, and the sword of Saul never returned empty.

²³Saul and Jonathan — beloved and cherished in life, and in death they were not divided.
They were swifter than eagles, stronger than lions.

²⁴Daughters of Israel, weep over Saul, who clothed you in scarlet and fine garments,
who adorned your clothing with gold ornaments.

²⁵How the mighty have fallen in the thick of battle!
Jonathan lies slain on your heights.

²⁶I am in anguish over you, my brother Jonathan.
You were so dear to me.
Your love for me was extraordinary — surpassing the love of women.

²⁷How the mighty have fallen, and the weapons of war have perished!

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase mehakkot et ha-Amaleq ('from striking the Amalekites') uses the Hiphil infinitive of nakah, which denotes a decisive military blow — David did not merely skirmish with the Amalekites but struck them decisively. This is the same campaign narrated in 1 Samuel 30.
1. Ziklag's status is ambiguous: it was a Philistine city given to David by Achish of Gath (1 Samuel 27:6), making David technically a Philistine vassal at this moment. The narrator does not comment on this political awkwardness. The 'two days' of waiting create narrative tension — the reader already knows Saul is dead, but David does not.
2. The description of torn clothes and dirt on the head exactly mirrors the messenger who brought news of the ark's capture in 1 Samuel 4:12. The narrative pattern signals that another national disaster is being reported. The two scenes share the same vocabulary of catastrophe.
2. The verb vayyishtachu ('he prostrated himself') is the Hishtaphel of chavah, the most intense form of physical reverence in Hebrew. The man's posture toward David is politically charged: he is approaching David as one approaches a sovereign, possibly calculating that David will now claim the throne and reward anyone who facilitated the transition.
3. The verb malat in the Niphal implies narrow escape from mortal danger. The same verb is used of David's escapes from Saul (1 Samuel 19:10, 19:17). The man presents himself as a survivor of catastrophe, establishing credibility before delivering his report.
4. The structure of the report is rhetorically deliberate: general flight, mass casualties, then the specific royal deaths. Each clause escalates the disaster. The verb nas ('fled') signals complete rout, not orderly retreat. The phrase gam Sha'ul vi-Yehonatan beno metu ('also Saul and Jonathan his son died') delivers the two deaths in a single clause, binding father and son together in the messenger's grammar as they were bound on the battlefield.
5. The term na'ar is deliberately vague regarding the messenger's exact social position. He could be a battlefield attendant, a young soldier, or even a camp follower. His identity as an Amalekite will emerge only later (v. 8), and the narrator withholds this detail to build suspense.
6. The construction niqro niqreiti is the Niphal infinitive absolute plus finite verb of qarah ('to encounter, to happen upon'). The messenger frames his presence as pure chance, perhaps to deflect suspicion that he was looting the battlefield. Mount Gilboa is named, anchoring the account to the same location described in 1 Samuel 31.
6. The word chanit ('spear') rather than cherev ('sword') differs from the account in 1 Samuel 31:4, where Saul falls on his sword. This may support the interpretation that the Amalekite is fabricating or embellishing, or it may indicate a different moment in the sequence of events. The chariots (rekhev) and horsemen (ba'alei ha-parashim) represent the Philistine heavy forces — exactly the kind of units that would dominate in the open terrain near Gilboa.
7. The three-verb sequence creates a cinematic progression: turn, see, call. Each verb advances the action with no wasted words. If the Amalekite's account is fabricated, this is skillful storytelling designed to make David believe he was summoned, not that he acted on his own initiative.
8. The emphatic pronoun anokhi ('I myself') rather than the shorter ani adds weight to the self-identification. The Amalekite declares his ethnicity without hesitation, apparently unaware of the lethal history between Saul and his people. Whether this is historical or fabricated, the narrator exploits the dramatic irony to its fullest.

9. The word shavats occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible, making its precise meaning uncertain. The Septuagint renders it as skotos ('darkness'), suggesting unconsciousness or dimming vision. Targum Jonathan reads 'trembling.' We render it as 'death agony' to capture the sense of a terminal but prolonged state of suffering.
9. The phrase kol od nafshi bi ('all my life is still in me') emphasizes that Saul is fully conscious and aware of his condition. This is not a quick death — it is drawn out, and Saul's request reflects the horror of being alive enough to suffer but too wounded to act.
10. The nezer is distinct from a full crown (atarah) — it is a diadem or band signifying consecrated authority, closely linked to the concept of being set apart (nazir). Saul's nezer represents his anointed status. The ets'adah ('armband') was a marker of military rank or royal status. Together these items function as regalia — proof of identity and proof of the messenger's claim.
10. The phrase el adoni hannah ('to my lord, here') positions David as Saul's successor in the messenger's own calculus. He has read the political situation — David is the obvious heir — and is attempting to position himself as the man who facilitated the transition. The irony is that this political calculation will cost him his life.
11. The verb chazaq in the Hiphil ('to seize, to grasp firmly') emphasizes the violence of the gesture. Garment-tearing in grief was not a gentle rip but a forceful act — the physical destruction of clothing externalized the internal shattering of grief. The communal tearing indicates that David's men follow his lead in honoring Saul, despite their history as fugitives from Saul's court.
12. The phrase am YHWH ('the people of the LORD') is theologically loaded — David identifies the fallen soldiers not merely as Israelite troops but as the covenant people of God. Their death in battle is a disaster not only for the nation but for God's purposes. The distinction between am YHWH and beit Yisra'el may be intentional: the first is a theological designation (the covenant people), the second is a political one (the national household).
12. Fasting until evening was a standard mourning practice (Judges 20:26, 2 Samuel 3:35). The three actions — lamenting, weeping, fasting — form a complete ritual of grief, performed communally and lasting the full day.
13. The term ger is one of the most significant social categories in the Torah — the resident alien who dwells among the people of Israel and is entitled to protection, justice, and inclusion in certain religious observances. By identifying himself as a ger's son, the Amalekite claims legal standing within the Israelite social order. David will use this very status against him in verse 16: as a resident within Israel, the man should have known better than to strike the LORD's anointed.
14. The phrase meshiach YHWH ('the LORD's anointed') is the theological heart of this exchange. The mashiach is untouchable — not because of personal merit but because of divine designation. David's entire fugitive career was governed by this conviction: even when Saul was trying to kill him, David would not raise his hand against the one God had anointed. The Amalekite's claim to have killed the mashiach places him in direct violation of the principle that David holds most sacred.
15. The verb paga ('to encounter, to strike') in the imperative carries the force of an execution order. It is the same verb used for the killing of the priests at Nob (1 Samuel 22:18), where Doeg the Edomite was willing to 'strike' them when Saul's own servants would not. The economy of the narration — a single sentence for the execution — mirrors the swift finality of the act.
16. The formula 'your blood is on your own head' appears throughout the Hebrew Bible as a declaration that the executed person bears responsibility for their own death (Joshua 2:19, Ezekiel 33:4). David uses it here to establish that the execution is just — the Amalekite's own testimony condemned him.
16. The repetition of meshiach YHWH from verse 14 frames the entire exchange: David's question ('how were you not afraid to destroy the LORD's anointed?') and his verdict ('you said you killed the LORD's anointed') form an inclusio around the execution.
17. The qinah is a recognized poetic genre in the Hebrew Bible, characterized by its distinctive 3:2 'limping meter' — a longer line followed by a shorter one, creating a rhythmic sense of falling or stumbling that mirrors the emotional content of grief. Jeremiah, Ezekiel, and the book of Lamentations all employ qinah meter. David's lament over Saul and Jonathan is one of the earliest and finest examples of the form.
18. The word qeshet ('bow') as a poem title is attested in the Masoretic text but absent from some Septuagint manuscripts. Some scholars emend it or treat it as a marginal gloss. We retain it as the title following the MT, understanding it as David's designation for the lament — 'The Bow' — likely honoring Jonathan's weapon of choice.
18. The Book of Jashar (sefer ha-yashar) is mentioned only here and in Joshua 10:13 (and possibly 1 Kings 8:53 in the LXX). It was evidently a collection of ancient poems celebrating Israel's heroes. Its loss means that the biblical quotations from it are our only surviving fragments.
19. The opening word ha-tsevi has been rendered many ways: 'the beauty' (KJV), 'the glory,' 'the gazelle,' 'thy glory, O Israel.' We chose 'the splendor' to capture both the aesthetic and the honorific senses without limiting it to a single referent. The word functions as a title for those who have fallen — they were Israel's splendor, and now that splendor is dead.
19. The refrain eikh nafelu gibborim is the poem's signature line. The interrogative eikh ('how!') is not a question expecting an answer but an exclamation of disbelief and grief — 'How is it possible that the mighty have fallen!' The qinah meter is audible here: three beats (eikh nafelu gibborim) followed by the silence of what cannot be said.
20. The phrase al taggidu ve-Gat has become proverbial in Hebrew — it is the idiom for suppressing shameful news. The parallelism between Gat and Ashkelon follows standard Hebrew poetic convention of pairing cities. The 'daughters of the uncircumcised' (benot ha-arelim) echoes Saul's final words in 1 Samuel 31:4, binding the lament to the death scene.

- 20. The verb alaz ('to exult, to celebrate with triumph') in the second motivation clause intensifies beyond the simple simchah ('joy') of the first. David imagines escalating Philistine celebration — first rejoicing, then exultation. The poet's craft is visible in the building parallelism.
- 21. The curse on Gilboa's fertility echoes ancient Near Eastern curses on battle sites — the earth that drank warriors' blood is condemned to perpetual barrenness. The double meaning of mashiach (anointed king / oiled shield) is one of the most celebrated wordplays in Hebrew poetry. David does not say directly that Saul the anointed one has been rejected; he says the shield is no longer oiled. The reader hears both meanings simultaneously.
- 21. The phrase sedei terumot is difficult. Terumot usually means 'heave offerings' or 'contributions' (a priestly term), but here it may mean 'uplifted fields' — terraced agricultural land. Some emend to sedei re'umot ('fields of deception') or sedei terumah ('fields of the offering'). We render 'terraced fields' as the most geographically concrete reading.
- 22. The word chelev is usually rendered 'fat,' but in poetic contexts it can mean 'the best part, the richest portion.' We chose 'flesh' to avoid the modern connotation of adipose tissue and to convey the sense of bodily substance. The phrase lo nasog achor ('did not draw back') uses the military language of retreat — Jonathan's bow is personified as a warrior that never retreated from the front line.
- 22. The pairing of Jonathan's bow with Saul's sword matches each man to his signature weapon. Jonathan was an archer (1 Samuel 20:20-22, 35-40), and the bow was the weapon he gave David as a covenant gift (1 Samuel 18:4). Saul was associated with the sword — and ultimately fell on one (1 Samuel 31:4).
- 23. The phrase u-ve-motam lo nifradu ('in their death they were not divided') may also carry a polemical edge: despite the political rupture between Saul and Jonathan over David's future (1 Samuel 20:30-34), David insists that father and son died united. The poet reclaims the relationship from its political fractures.
- 23. The nesher is most likely the griffon vulture (Gyps fulvus), not the modern bald eagle — the largest raptor in the Levant, known for soaring at immense heights and diving with devastating speed. The ari is the now-extinct Asiatic lion (Panthera leo persica), which inhabited the Jordan Valley and hill country into the medieval period.
- 24. The appeal to women as professional mourners is consistent with Israelite practice — women led formal keening and lamentation (Jeremiah 9:17-20). But David's address is broader: all the daughters of Israel are to mourn because all benefited from Saul's reign. The word shani ('scarlet') denotes a luxury textile associated with wealth and royalty (Proverbs 31:21). The adanim ('delights') may include fine fabrics, jewelry, or other imported goods.
- 24. The emphasis on material prosperity is not shallow. In the ancient world, a king's ability to provide luxury goods to his people was the tangible proof of his military and economic success. David is saying: Saul enriched you — honor him with your grief.
- 25. The shift from third-person plural (the mighty) to second-person singular (your heights) is a characteristic qinah technique — the poet moves from public grief to private address, collapsing the distance between the mourner and the dead. The word bamotekha ('your heights') echoes verse 19, creating a structural echo: the poem's opening and closing movements both invoke the heights where the blood was shed.
- 26. The phrase me'ahavat nashim ('beyond the love of women') has generated extensive scholarly discussion. In context, ahavah is the covenant loyalty that bound David and Jonathan from 1 Samuel 18:1 onward — a love that survived Saul's attempts to kill David, Jonathan's renunciation of his own dynastic claim, and years of separation. David declares that this covenantal bond surpassed every other intimate relationship in his life. The word ahavah in the Hebrew Bible ranges from romantic desire (Song of Songs) to political treaty loyalty (1 Kings 5:1) to God's covenant love for Israel (Deuteronomy 7:8). Here it functions in its broadest and deepest sense: total, sacrificial commitment.
- 26. The word nifl'atah ('it was extraordinary, it was wonderful') belongs to the vocabulary of divine action — the nifla'ot are God's wonders, the acts that exceed human comprehension (Exodus 15:11, Psalm 77:11). David applies this theological vocabulary to a human relationship, elevating Jonathan's love to the level of the miraculous.
- 27. The three occurrences of the refrain (vv. 19, 25, 27) create the structural architecture of the poem: opening statement, central development, final summation. The addition of vayyovedu kelei milchamah in the closing refrain prevents the ending from being a mere repetition — it adds the finality of utter destruction. The poem that began with 'the splendor of Israel' ends with 'weapons of war' — the full arc from glory to wreckage.
- 27. The absence of any mention of God in the entire lament (vv. 19-27) is remarkable. David makes no appeal to divine justice, offers no theological explanation for the disaster, and provides no eschatological hope. This is a poem of pure human grief, uttered by a man who elsewhere attributes everything to God but here speaks only of what has been lost on earth. The silence about God may itself be the poem's deepest theological statement: some losses are too large for easy piety.

Summary: David inquires of the LORD and is directed to Hebron, where the men of Judah anoint him king. David sends a message of blessing to the men of Jabesh-gilead for burying Saul, invoking the LORD's faithful love (chesed) and pledging his own good will. Meanwhile, Abner son of Ner installs Saul's surviving son Ish-bosheth as king over a rival Israelite kingdom. The two factions meet at the pool of Gibeon, where Abner proposes a contest between young warriors that erupts into full battle. David's forces prevail. Asahel, Joab's youngest brother, pursues Abner with reckless speed; Abner warns him twice to turn aside, then kills him with a backward thrust of his spear. Joab and Abishai pursue Abner until sunset, when Abner rallies the Benjaminites on a hilltop and calls for an end to the bloodshed. Joab sounds the trumpet and the pursuit stops. Abner's forces lose three hundred and sixty men; David's forces lose nineteen men plus Asahel. The chapter ends with Asahel buried in his father's tomb at Bethlehem and both armies returning to their respective capitals.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter narrates the formal beginning of the divided kingdom — not the later split under Rehoboam, but the first fracture in Israelite unity. Two anointed kings now reign simultaneously: David over Judah at Hebron, Ish-bosheth over the remaining tribes at Mahanaim. The political geography is telling: David holds the southern heartland, while Ish-bosheth governs from a city east of the Jordan — a refugee capital, not a power center. The contest at the pool of Gibeon (vv. 14-16) is one of the most unusual military episodes in the Hebrew Bible: twelve men from each side are paired in single combat, and all twenty-four die simultaneously, each grabbing his opponent's head and driving a sword into his side. The site is named Helkath-hazzurim ('Field of Flint-Edges' or 'Field of Sword-Edges'), preserving the memory of this mutual slaughter. Asahel's death at Abner's hand sets in motion the blood-feud that will dominate the next several chapters, culminating in Joab's murder of Abner in chapter 3. The narrator emphasizes Abner's reluctance — he warns Asahel twice, knowing that killing Joab's brother will create an unresolvable vendetta.

Translation Friction: The primary translational tension lies in verse 14, where Abner says yaqumu na ha-ne'arim vi-yesachagu lefanenu — 'let the young men arise and make sport before us.' The verb sachag (Piel: yesachagu) can mean 'to laugh, to play, to sport, to perform' and even 'to engage in combat as entertainment.' Is Abner proposing a harmless display, a formalized duel, or a fight to the death? The ambiguity may be deliberate — what begins as sechok ('sport') escalates into milchamah ('battle'). We render it as 'compete before us' to capture the controlled-contest sense, while the translator's notes address the darker possibilities. A second friction point is in verse 8: Ish-bosheth's name. The Masoretic text reads Ish-boshet ('man of shame'), but this is almost certainly a scribal alteration of the original Ish-baal ('man of Baal' or 'man of the lord'). The name change reflects later scribal discomfort with the element baal. We render the name as given in the MT (Ish-bosheth) and explain the likely original in the notes. Verse 16 presents a third crux: the place-name Helqat ha-Tsurim is variously interpreted as 'Field of Flint-Edges,' 'Field of Sword-Edges,' 'Field of Adversaries,' or 'Field of the Sharp Ones.' The etymology is genuinely uncertain, and we retain the Hebrew transliteration with explanation.

Connections: David's anointing at Hebron fulfills the trajectory begun with Samuel's secret anointing in 1 Samuel 16. Hebron itself is Abraham's city (Genesis 13:18, 23:2), the place where the patriarchal promises were first rooted in the land — David's reign begins at the covenant's geographic origin. The message to Jabesh-gilead (vv. 5-7) directly connects to the closing scene of 1 Samuel, where the men of Jabesh recovered Saul's body from the walls of Beth-shan (1 Samuel 31:11-13). David's use of chesed in verse 6 echoes the covenant vocabulary that runs throughout the David-Jonathan narrative (1 Samuel 20:8, 14-15). The pool of Gibeon will appear again as a significant site in 2 Samuel 20:8 (the assassination of Amasa). Asahel's fatal pursuit of Abner anticipates Joab's revenge killing in 3:27, which in turn becomes a burden David carries to his deathbed (1 Kings 2:5-6). The civil war between Benjamin and Judah prefigures the permanent tribal division after Solomon's death (1 Kings 12).

¹After this, David inquired of the LORD: "Should I go up to one of the cities of Judah?" The LORD said to him, "Go up." David asked, "Where should I go?" He answered, "To Hebron." ²So David went up there, along with his two wives — Ahinoam of Jezreel and Abigail, the widow of Nabal of Carmel. ³David also brought up the men who were with him, each with his household, and they settled in the towns surrounding Hebron. ⁴The men of Judah came and anointed David king over the house of Judah. David was also informed, "It was the men of Jabesh-gilead who buried Saul." ⁵David sent messengers to the men of Jabesh-gilead and said to them, "May the LORD bless you, because you showed this faithful love to your lord Saul by burying him." ⁶Now may the LORD deal with you in faithful love and trustworthiness. And I myself will also treat you well, because you have done this. ⁷So now, let your hands be strong and be courageous, for your lord Saul is dead — and the house of Judah has anointed me as king over them. ⁸Meanwhile, Abner son of Ner, the commander of Saul's army, had taken Ish-bosheth son of Saul and brought him across to Mahanaim. ⁹He made him king over Gilead, the Ashurites, Jezreel, Ephraim, Benjamin, and all Israel. ¹⁰Ish-bosheth son of Saul was forty years old when he became king over Israel, and he reigned for two years. But the house of Judah followed David. ¹¹The total time David reigned as king in Hebron over the house of Judah was seven years and six months. ¹²Abner son of Ner marched out from Mahanaim to Gibeon with the servants of Ish-bosheth son of Saul. ¹³Joab son of Zeruiah and David's servants also marched out, and the two forces met at the pool of Gibeon. They took up positions on opposite sides of the pool — one group on one side, the other group facing them. ¹⁴Abner said to Joab, "Let the young men get up and compete before us." Joab said, "Let them." ¹⁵They rose and crossed over by count — twelve for Benjamin and Ish-bosheth son of Saul, and twelve from David's servants. ¹⁶Each man seized his opponent by the head and drove his sword into his opponent's side, and they all fell together. So that place was named Helkath-hazzurim — it is in Gibeon. ¹⁷The battle that day was extremely fierce. Abner and the men of Israel were defeated by David's servants. ¹⁸Three sons of Zeruiah were there — Joab, Abishai, and Asahel. Asahel was as fleet-footed as one of the wild gazelles. ¹⁹Asahel chased after Abner and did not veer to the right or the left from pursuing him. ²⁰Abner looked back and said, "Is that you, Asahel?" He answered, "It is." ²¹Abner said to him, "Turn aside — go right or left. Seize one of the young soldiers and take his equipment for yourself." But Asahel refused to stop pursuing him. ²²Abner warned him again: "Turn away from me! Why should I strike you to the ground? How could I face your brother Joab?" ²³But he refused to turn aside. So Abner struck him in the belly with the butt-end of his spear, and the spear came out through his back. He fell there and died on the spot. Everyone who came to the place where Asahel had fallen and died stopped and stood still. ²⁴Joab and Abishai pursued Abner. By the time the sun was setting, they had reached the hill of Ammah, which faces Giah along the road to the wilderness of Gibeon. ²⁵The Benjaminites rallied behind Abner, forming a single unit, and took a stand on the top of a hill. ²⁶Abner called out to Joab: "Must the sword consume forever? Don't you realize how bitter this will end? How long before you order your men to stop pursuing their own brothers?" ²⁷Joab replied, "As God lives, if you had not spoken, the men would have continued pursuing their brothers until morning." ²⁸Joab sounded the ram's horn, and all the troops halted. They no longer pursued Israel, and the fighting ceased. ²⁹Abner and his men marched through the Arabah all night, crossed the Jordan, and traveled through the whole Bithron before arriving at Mahanaim. ³⁰Joab returned from pursuing Abner and assembled all his troops. When David's servants were counted, nineteen men were missing — and Asahel. ³¹David's servants had struck down three hundred and sixty of the Benjaminites and Abner's men — they were dead. ³²They carried Asahel and buried him in his father's tomb at Bethlehem. Then Joab and his men marched all night and reached Hebron at daybreak.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb sha'al ('to ask, to inquire') indicates formal oracular inquiry, likely through the ephod carried by the priest Abiathar (1 Samuel 23:6, 30:7-8). David's consultation of the LORD before every major move contrasts sharply with Saul, who in his final days could get no answer from the LORD by any means (1 Samuel 28:6). The dialogue structure — question, answer, follow-up question, specific answer — shows David's posture of dependent obedience.
1. Hebron (chevronah) sits in the Judean hill country, roughly 19 miles south of Jerusalem. It was the burial site of Abraham and Sarah (Genesis 23:19) and a city of refuge under the Levitical system (Joshua 20:7). The LORD's direction to Hebron is not random — it is the patriarchal capital of the south, the place most associated with the Abrahamic covenant in Judah's territory.
2. The narrator specifies David's wives by name and origin, anchoring his household in known geography. Ahinoam (achinoam, 'my brother is delight') came from Jezreel in Judah (not the northern Jezreel Valley). Abigail is still identified in relation to Nabal (naval, 'fool'), whose story in 1 Samuel 25 resulted in both his death and David's marriage to his widow. Identifying Abigail as eshet Naval ('wife of Nabal') rather than by her own patronymic keeps the Nabal episode in the reader's memory.

2. The phrase va-ya'al sham David ('David went up there') uses the same verb alah ('to go up') that the LORD commanded. David's obedience is immediate and complete — no delay, no negotiation.
3. The phrase ish u-veto ('each man and his household') indicates that David's band of warriors — the four hundred, later six hundred, who gathered around him during his fugitive years (1 Samuel 22:2, 27:2) — relocated as complete family units. This is not a military deployment but a migration, a resettlement of David's entire community from Philistine territory into Judah.
3. The plural arei Chevron ('cities/towns of Hebron') refers to the satellite villages and settlements in the Hebron district. David's group was too large to fit within the city walls alone, so they spread across the surrounding area — effectively occupying the Hebron region.
4. The verb mashach ('to anoint') is the same verb used when Samuel secretly anointed David in 1 Samuel 16:13. That was a prophetic, hidden anointing; this is a public, tribal anointing — the first of David's three anointings (the third will come in 2 Samuel 5:3, when all Israel anoints him). The formula le-melek al bet Yehudah ('as king over the house of Judah') is precise: David's authority extends over one tribe only. The ten northern tribes are not represented.
4. The report about Jabesh-gilead is syntactically connected to the anointing scene, suggesting that David received this intelligence shortly after his coronation. The verb qaveru ('they buried') is the standard term for honorable interment. The men of Jabesh-gilead had recovered Saul's body from the wall of Beth-shan (1 Samuel 31:11-13), an act of extraordinary loyalty.
5. The blessing formula beruchim attem la-YHWH ('blessed are you by the LORD') invokes divine favor. David speaks not merely as a grateful politician but as the newly anointed king pronouncing a royal benediction. The preposition la-YHWH marks the LORD as the source of the blessing — it is God's blessing David channels, not his own.
5. The phrase im adoneikhem im Sha'ul ('with your lord, with Saul') uses the preposition im ('with') twice, creating emphasis. The word adon ('lord, master') acknowledges Saul's legitimate authority over them — David does not diminish Saul's kingship even after his own anointing. This diplomatic sensitivity is characteristic of David's posture toward Saul throughout the narrative.
6. The conjunction of divine chesed ve-emet with David's personal ha-tovah ha-zot ('this good thing') creates a parallel structure: God will repay them with covenant love, and David will repay them with practical benefit. The word tovah ('good, goodness') is less theologically loaded than chesed — David carefully distinguishes what God can offer (chesed ve-emet) from what he can offer (tovah, political good will).
6. The phrase ve-gam anochi ('and also I myself') uses the emphatic independent pronoun. David is not merely promising — he is binding himself personally alongside God's promised blessing. This is the language of political alliance dressed in theological garments: David is courting Jabesh-gilead's loyalty.
7. The phrase techezaqnah yedeikhem ('let your hands be strong') is an idiom of encouragement that appears throughout the Hebrew Bible in moments of political and military transition (Judges 7:11, Zechariah 8:9). Strong hands can work, fight, and govern; weak hands signal despair and collapse. David is urging Jabesh-gilead not to lose heart despite their king's death.
7. The phrase bene chayil ('sons of valor/strength') means men of military capability and social standing — warriors who are also men of substance. David is affirming their identity and calling them to continue in strength. The final clause — 'the house of Judah has anointed me as king over them' — is a carefully worded political overture. David does not claim kingship over Jabesh-gilead or over Israel broadly; he states a fact about Judah and lets the implication settle: there is now a new king in the south, and he remembers who showed loyalty to the old king.
8. The adversative transition signals the narrative's pivot from David's consolidation in the south to the rival power structure in the north. Abner (avner, 'my father is a lamp') was Saul's cousin and the real military power behind the throne. The verb laqach ('he took') implies initiative: Abner is the actor, and Ish-bosheth is the object. The power dynamics are transparent from the first verb — Abner is the kingmaker, not the king.
8. The name Ish-boshet ('man of shame') is almost certainly a scribal emendation of the original Ish-baal ('man of Baal' or 'man of the lord'). The element baal was originally a legitimate title meaning 'lord' or 'master,' but later scribes replaced it with boshet ('shame') to avoid any association with the Canaanite deity. The original name appears in 1 Chronicles 8:33 as Esh-baal. Mahanaim ('two camps'), east of the Jordan, was Jacob's camp when he encountered angels (Genesis 32:2). Its use as Ish-bosheth's capital signals weakness — the new king governs from the Transjordanian fringe, not from any major Israelite city.
9. The list of territories under Ish-bosheth's nominal rule moves from east to west: Gilead (Transjordan), the Ashurites (possibly the Geshurites or Asherites — the identity is debated), Jezreel (the great northern valley), Ephraim (the central hill country), and Benjamin (Saul's home tribe). The final phrase ve-al Yisra'el kulah ('and over all Israel') is the narrator's summary claim, though the reality falls far short — David already holds Judah, and Philistine control over key areas renders Ish-bosheth's sovereignty largely theoretical.
9. The identity of ha-Ashuri is a long-standing textual crux. The Septuagint reads 'Geshur,' some manuscripts suggest 'Asher,' and the Vulgate has 'Gessuri.' No identification is certain. We follow the MT form and note the ambiguity.
10. The regnal formula — age at accession and length of reign — follows the standard pattern for Israelite kings. The number forty may be formulaic (indicating a generation or full maturity) rather than precise. His two-year reign contrasts sharply with David's seven-and-a-half years at Hebron (v. 11), suggesting that Ish-bosheth's kingdom was short-lived and contested.
10. The adversative akh ('but, however') introduces a sharp contrast: whatever Ish-bosheth claims, the house of Judah belongs to David. The verb hayu acharei David ('were after David, followed David') uses acharei in the sense of political allegiance — they walked behind David as subjects walk behind their king.

11. This chronological note provides the framework for the events narrated in chapters 2-4. The precision — seven years and six months — suggests access to official court records. This number recurs in 2 Samuel 5:5 and 1 Kings 2:11, confirming its place in the royal chronology. David's Hebron period is longer than Ish-bosheth's two-year reign, implying a period of interregnum or contested rule between Ish-bosheth's fall and David's anointing over all Israel.
12. The verb yatsa ('went out') in military contexts means to march out for war, to deploy forces. Abner's movement from Mahanaim westward to Gibeon is an aggressive strategic move — Gibeon sits in Benjaminite territory, only six miles northwest of Jerusalem. This is a bid to assert control over the central highlands and press Ish-bosheth's claim into Judah's proximity.
12. Gibeon was a significant city in Israelite history: the site of Joshua's treaty with the Gibeonites (Joshua 9) and the great battle where the sun stood still (Joshua 10:12). It also housed the tabernacle in this period (1 Chronicles 16:39, 21:29). Abner's choice of Gibeon as his staging ground may have been strategic, political, or both.
13. The verb pagash ('to meet, to encounter') can denote a chance meeting or a deliberate confrontation. Given the military context, this is a face-off, not an accident. The pool of Gibeon (berekhat Giv'on) has been identified archaeologically as a large, rock-cut water installation at the site of el-Jib, approximately 37 feet in diameter. It served as a natural dividing line between the two forces.
13. The spatial description — elleh al ha-berekhah mizzeh ve-elleh al ha-berekhah mizzeh ('these on one side of the pool and those on the other side of the pool') — creates a visual tableau of two armies in mirrored positions, separated by water. The symmetry of the description foreshadows the symmetry of the combat that follows.
14. The verb sachaq (Piel: yesachagu, here vi-yesachagu) has a broad semantic range: to laugh, to play, to jest, to perform, to engage in combat as sport. The same root describes Isaac's play (Genesis 21:9), Samson's forced performance for the Philistines (Judges 16:25), and children playing in the streets (Zechariah 8:5). In a military context between opposing armies, the 'play' is almost certainly representative combat — a formalized contest between chosen warriors whose outcome may determine or initiate the broader battle.
14. Joab's curt response — yaqumu, a single word ('let them arise') — gives consent without enthusiasm. The brevity may signal agreement, indifference, or calculated willingness to let the other side take the initiative and the blame. Joab is David's nephew (son of David's sister Zeruiah) and already functions as David's chief military commander.
15. The phrase va-ya'avru be-mispar ('they crossed over by number') indicates a formal, counted selection — this is not a spontaneous brawl but an organized contest with precisely matched sides. The number twelve on each side echoes the twelve tribes of Israel, suggesting that these champions represent the whole nation in microcosm.
15. The fighters from Ish-bosheth's side are identified as le-Vinyamin ('for Benjamin') — they are Benjaminites, Saul's own tribesmen and presumably his most loyal warriors. The narrator's identification of them by tribe rather than just by king underscores the tribal nature of this civil war.
16. The verb chazaq ('to seize, to grasp firmly') describes each warrior grabbing the head of the man opposite him — likely gripping the hair or the back of the skull to hold him in place for the killing blow. The phrase ve-charbo be-tsad re'ehu ('and his sword in his opponent's side') describes simultaneous mutual kills: each man stabs the other while being stabbed himself. The result — vayyiylu yachdav ('they fell together') — is total mutual annihilation. Twenty-four men enter the contest; twenty-four die.
16. The place-name Helqat ha-Tsurim is notoriously difficult. Tsurim could derive from tsur ('rock, flint'), tsur ('sharp edge, blade'), or tsar ('adversary'). Possible meanings include 'Field of Flint-Edges,' 'Field of Sword-Edges,' or 'Field of Adversaries.' The Septuagint reads 'portion of the plotters' (meris ton epibulon). The ambiguity preserves the horror of the scene: the name memorializes violence, whatever its exact etymology.
17. The adjective qashah ('hard, severe, fierce') intensifies the violence — the mutual slaughter of the twenty-four champions did not settle the conflict but ignited a full-scale battle. The verb vayyinnagef ('he was struck, defeated') is a Niphal passive: Abner was defeated. The passive construction places the focus on the result rather than the agent — David's men won, but the narrator does not celebrate the victory. This is, after all, Israelite killing Israelite.
17. The phrase anshei Yisra'el ('the men of Israel') refers to the northern forces under Abner. The narrator's use of 'Israel' for Ish-bosheth's faction and 'servants of David' for the southern forces avoids calling the Judahites 'Israel' — the name belongs, at this point, to the larger tribal confederation that has not yet accepted David.
18. The phrase qal be-raglav ('light on his feet') describes exceptional running speed. The comparison to the tsevi ('gazelle') is not ornamental — the mountain gazelle of the Judean hills was proverbially the fastest creature in the Israelite landscape. The phrase ke-achad ha-tseva'im asher ba-sadeh ('like one of the gazelles that are in the open field') specifies wild, not domesticated — these are creatures of pure speed in open terrain.
18. Zeruiah was David's sister (1 Chronicles 2:16), making Joab, Abishai, and Asahel David's nephews. The three brothers function as David's military inner circle. The introduction of Asahel here, with his defining characteristic of speed, is narrative preparation for his death — the very quality that makes him exceptional will be his undoing.
19. The verb radaph ('to pursue, to chase') indicates single-minded pursuit. The phrase lo natah ('he did not turn aside') combined with al ha-yamin ve-al ha-semo'l ('to the right or to the left') is a totality expression: Asahel was locked onto Abner with absolute focus, ignoring every other combatant on the field. This kind of fixation on a single enemy commander was either extraordinarily brave or fatally reckless — the narrator lets both possibilities stand.

19. Asahel's pursuit of Abner, the enemy commander, suggests ambition beyond the battle itself. Killing or capturing Abner would end the war in a single stroke. The young warrior's speed gives him the physical ability to catch the older general, but the text is about to reveal that speed is not the only factor in combat.
20. Abner's question ha-attah zeh Asa'el ('are you this one — Asahel?') shows that Abner recognizes his pursuer. The demonstrative zeh ('this') suggests visual identification under difficult conditions — mid-flight, looking over his shoulder. The recognition is crucial: Abner knows exactly whose brother he will have to kill if Asahel does not relent. The exchange is remarkably brief: question and answer, two words from Asahel — anokhi ('I am'). There is no bravado, no taunting — just identification.
21. Abner's command neteh lekha ('turn aside for yourself') is his first attempt to save Asahel's life. The offer — take the armor-strip (chalitsah) from a lesser soldier — gives Asahel a way to claim a trophy and save face without forcing a confrontation with the commander himself. The word chalitsah refers to the stripped equipment of a defeated enemy, a standard spoil of war that proved combat valor.
21. The refusal formula lo avah Asa'el lasur me-acharav ('Asahel was not willing to turn from behind him') uses the same construction (lo avah) that described Saul's armor-bearer refusing to strike the king (1 Samuel 31:4). In both cases, the refusal is a deep dispositional unwillingness — but with opposite moral valences. The armor-bearer refused out of reverent terror; Asahel refuses out of reckless ambition.
22. Abner's second warning is more urgent and more personal. The question lammah akkekah artsah ('why should I strike you to the ground') is not a bluff — it is a statement of certain outcome. Abner knows he can kill Asahel. The verb nakah ('to strike') in the Hiphil conveys a decisive, lethal blow. Abner frames the killing not as a question of ability but of consequence.
22. The phrase ve-eikh essa fanay el Yo'av achikha ('how would I lift my face to Joab your brother') reveals Abner's strategic calculus. Killing Asahel would create a blood-feud with Joab that could never be resolved through normal political negotiation. The idiom nasa panim ('to lift the face') means to face someone without shame or fear — Abner is saying that killing Joab's brother would make any future peace between them impossible. This warning proves prophetically accurate: Joab will murder Abner in chapter 3.
23. The verb me'en ('he refused') is stronger than lo avah in verse 21 — it is an active, emphatic refusal. Abner responds with lethal precision: be-acharei ha-CHANIT ('with the back-end of the spear') means the blunt, metal-tipped butt-end of the shaft, not the spearhead. That Abner kills Asahel with the wrong end of the spear — without even turning to face him — underscores the vast gap in combat experience between the two men. The blow lands el ha-chomesh ('to the fifth [rib]' or 'to the abdomen'), a vulnerable spot below the ribcage.
23. The detail va-tetse ha-CHANIT me-acharav ('the spear came out from behind him') indicates the force of the blow drove the butt-end entirely through Asahel's body. The phrase vayyamot tachtav ('he died in his place' or 'he died under himself') means he dropped dead where he stood — instant death, no lingering. The final image — everyone who reaches the spot stops and stands still (vayyaamodu) — is cinematic: Asahel's body becomes a landmark on the battlefield, a marker of horror that freezes every passing soldier in his tracks.
24. The pursuit now shifts from Asahel (dead) to his two brothers, Joab and Abishai. The temporal marker ve-ha-shemesh ba'ah ('the sun was coming/going') indicates late afternoon or early evening — the battle has lasted most of the day. The geographic markers — giv'at Ammah ('hill of Ammah') and Giach — are otherwise unknown and cannot be identified with certainty. They function as waypoints in a running pursuit through the Gibeonite countryside.
24. The phrase derekh midbar Giv'on ('the road to the wilderness of Gibeon') indicates Abner is retreating eastward, back toward the Jordan and his base at Mahanaim. The 'wilderness' (midbar) here refers to the sparsely settled terrain descending from the central ridge toward the Jordan Valley.
25. The verb hitqabtsu ('they gathered themselves together') is a Hithpael reflexive — the Benjaminites regroup on their own initiative, rallying around their commander after a rout. The phrase la-aguddah echat ('into one band/unit') indicates tactical consolidation: scattered troops forming a defensive cluster. The hilltop position (al rosh giv'ah achat) gives them the defensive advantage of high ground, turning a retreat into a defensible stand.
25. The identification of the rallying troops as bene Vinyamin ('sons of Benjamin') rather than 'men of Israel' narrows the focus: it is Saul's own tribe that forms Abner's last-stand force. Tribal loyalty, not pan-Israelite nationalism, is what holds this army together.
26. Abner's speech contains three rhetorical questions, each escalating in urgency. The first — ha-la-netsach tokhal cherev ('will the sword eat forever?') — personifies the sword as a devouring beast, an image found throughout Hebrew poetry (Deuteronomy 32:42, Isaiah 1:20). The verb akhal ('to eat, to consume') makes warfare into predation.
26. The second question — ki marah tihyeh ba-acharonah ('it will be bitter in the end') — warns of consequences. The adjective marah ('bitter') evokes the bitterness of death, grief, and regret. Abner is not making a moral argument but a practical one: this fratricidal fighting will produce a bitterness that outlasts the battle itself. The third question — ad matay lo tomar la-am lashuv me-acharei achehem ('how long until you tell the people to turn back from behind their brothers') — introduces the devastating word achehem ('their brothers'). Abner names the fundamental horror of civil war: these armies are brothers pursuing brothers.
27. Joab's oath formula chai ha-Elohim ('as God lives') solemnizes his statement. The conditional clause lu-le' dibbarta ('if you had not spoken') is ambiguous: does Joab mean 'if you had not called for the contest in verse 14, none of this would have happened,' or 'if you had not just now called for a cease-fire, I would not have stopped until dawn'? Both readings are grammatically possible. The first is an accusation (you started this); the second is a concession (I accept your terms).

- 27. The phrase me-ha-boqer na'alah ha-am ('from the morning the people would have gone up') refers to the pursuit continuing through the night until the next morning. The verb alah ('to go up') in military context means to advance, to press the attack. Joab's response accepts the cease-fire but refuses to accept blame — the ambiguity of his words preserves his dignity while ending the bloodshed.
- 28. The shofar blast serves as the formal signal to break off combat. The verb taqah ('to thrust, to blow') combined with shofar indicates a clear, recognized military signal — the troops respond immediately: vayyaamdu kol ha-am ('all the people stood still'). The cessation is total: lo yirdephu od ('they no longer pursued') and lo yasephu od le-hillachem ('they no longer continued to fight'). The double negative construction emphasizes the completeness of the disengagement.
- 28. The narrator's reference to the opposing force as 'Israel' (acharei Yisra'el) is significant: from Joab's army's perspective, the enemy is 'Israel' — the larger entity from which Judah has separated. The term carries weight: David's men are fighting against Israel, not merely against Abner's faction.
- 29. The Arabah (aravah) is the rift valley running from the Sea of Galilee south through the Dead Sea basin. Abner's night march through this low-lying terrain and across the Jordan River represents a retreat of considerable distance — roughly thirty to forty miles from Gibeon to Mahanaim. The urgency of the march (kol ha-laylah ha-hu, 'all that night') suggests Abner feared Joab might resume the pursuit at dawn.
- 29. The Bithron (ha-bitron) is an otherwise unknown locality, possibly a ravine or district in Transjordan. The word may derive from batar ('to cut, to cleave'), suggesting a cut or gorge through which the road passed. The arrival at Mahanaim brings Abner's forces full circle — they departed from Mahanaim in verse 12 and return to it here, having accomplished nothing except losses.
- 30. The verb paqad ('to count, to muster, to take account of') is the standard military census verb. The total losses from David's side: nineteen men and Asahel — twenty total. The narrator separates Asahel's name from the count with the conjunction ve ('and Asahel'), giving him a distinct place in the casualty list. He is not merely one of the twenty; he is named individually because his death carries consequences that the nineteen anonymous dead do not.
- 30. The relatively low number (twenty) compared to the losses on Abner's side (three hundred and sixty, v. 31) confirms the decisive nature of David's military victory at Gibeon, despite the emotional cost of Asahel's death.
- 31. The casualty ratio is stark: twenty to three hundred sixty, an eighteen-to-one disparity. The dead are identified as mi-Vinyamin u-ve-anshei Avner ('from Benjamin and from Abner's men'), again using the tribal name alongside the commander's. The verb hikku ('they struck') is a Hiphil of nakah, the standard verb for inflicting lethal military blows.
- 31. The final word metu ('they died') is blunt and unadorned. The narrator does not celebrate the victory or moralize about the losses. Both sides are Israelites; every death is a loss to the covenant people. The body count simply stands as evidence of what happens when brothers make war on brothers.
- 32. The verb nasa ('to carry, to lift') describes the bearing of Asahel's body — the same verb used for carrying the ark, for bearing burdens, and for the solemn transport of the dead. The burial in qever aviv ('his father's tomb') at Bethlehem follows standard Israelite practice of interment in the family burial site. Bethlehem is identified here as the ancestral home of Jesse's family — David's family — confirming that Asahel, as David's nephew, belongs to the Bethlehemite clan.
- 32. Joab's night march from the Gibeon area to Hebron (roughly 20 miles through the hill country) mirrors Abner's night march to Mahanaim. Both commanders return to their respective capitals under cover of darkness. The phrase vayyeor lahem be-Chevron ('it grew light for them in Hebron') is a beautiful temporal marker: dawn breaks as they arrive home, the first light after a dark day of fratricidal war.

Summary: The prolonged civil war between the house of Saul and the house of David tilts decisively toward David as Abner, Saul's military commander, breaks with Ish-bosheth and negotiates defection to David's side. Abner brokers a covenant with David and begins rallying the northern tribes, but Joab — David's own general — assassinates Abner in cold blood at the gate of Hebron, avenging his brother Asahel. David publicly disavows the killing, curses Joab's house, leads the mourning, and composes a lament declaring that Abner did not die a deserved death but fell as one falls before treacherous men. All Israel recognizes that the murder was not the king's doing.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is a masterclass in the politics of legitimacy. David is gaining power, yet the narrator shows him constrained at every turn — by Joab's independence, by the fragility of tribal loyalty, by the blood-debt system he cannot simply overrule. Abner's defection is triggered not by ideology but by a concubine dispute: Ish-bosheth accuses Abner of sleeping with Rizpah, Saul's concubine, and Abner erupts in fury. The accusation — whether true or false — touches the ancient Near Eastern convention that taking a king's concubine signals a claim on his throne (the same logic drives Absalom's act on the palace roof in 2 Samuel 16:22). Abner's rage reveals that he has been the real power behind Ish-bosheth's throne all along; once insulted, he discards the puppet king without hesitation. David's lament for Abner in verses 33-34 is genuine poetry embedded in prose narrative, structured as a rhetorical question that refuses to let the audience see Abner's death as justice. The line 'Your hands were not bound, your feet were not placed in bronze chains' insists that Abner was no prisoner led to execution — he walked freely into a trap. David names the death for what it is: a fall before sons of wickedness.

Translation Friction: The phrase dam naqi ('innocent blood') in verse 28 presents a significant rendering challenge. David declares that he and his kingdom are 'clean from the LORD forever' regarding the dam naqi of Abner. The Hebrew naqi means 'clean, free from guilt, innocent' — but applied to Abner's blood it does not mean Abner was morally innocent in some absolute sense. Rather, his blood was 'undeserved' — he did not merit execution, he came under a guarantee of safe conduct, and his killing was therefore juridically wrongful. We rendered this as 'innocent blood' while noting in the translator notes that the innocence is juridical rather than moral. The word berit ('covenant') in verse 12-13 is another friction point: Abner proposes a berit with David, but David's condition — the return of Michal — transforms a political alliance into something touching personal honor, dynastic legitimacy, and the reversal of Saul's insult. The berit here is political compact, not the theological covenant between God and Israel, yet the same word carries all its covenantal freight.

Connections: Abner's death at the gate of Hebron by Joab connects directly to the earlier killing of Asahel at the battle of Gibeon (2 Samuel 2:18-23), creating a blood-vengeance chain that will not resolve until Solomon's reign (1 Kings 2:5-6, 28-34), when David's deathbed instructions finally authorize Joab's execution. The demand for Michal's return (v13-16) reaches back to 1 Samuel 18:20-27, where Saul gave her to David as a bride-price trap, and 1 Samuel 25:44, where Saul gave her to Palti. Rizpah daughter of Aiah reappears in 2 Samuel 21:8-11, where her vigil over the bodies of her executed sons becomes one of the most haunting images in the entire Hebrew Bible. David's public mourning and fasting for Abner foreshadows his later mourning patterns — his response to Absalom's death (2 Samuel 18:33) and his behavior during the child's illness (2 Samuel 12:16-23). The curse David pronounces on Joab's house in verse 29 is among the harshest in Scripture, invoking discharge, skin disease, the spindle, the sword, and hunger — a five-fold curse that shadows Joab for the rest of the narrative.

¹The war between the house of Saul and the house of David dragged on. David grew steadily stronger, while the house of Saul grew steadily weaker. ²Sons were born to David at Hebron. His firstborn was Amnon, by Ahinoam of Jezreel. ³His second was Chileab, by Abigail the widow of Nabal from Carmel. The third was Absalom, son of Maacah daughter of Talmai king of Geshur. ⁴The fourth was Adonijah, son of Haggith. The fifth was Shephatiah, son of Abital. ⁵The sixth was Ithream, by Eglah, David's wife. These were born to David at Hebron. ⁶During the war between the house of Saul and the house of David, Abner was consolidating his own power within the house of Saul. ⁷Now Saul had a concubine named Rizpah daughter of Aiah. Ish-bosheth said to Abner, "Why have you slept with my father's concubine?" ⁸Abner burned with anger at Ish-bosheth's words and said, "Am I a dog's head — loyal to Judah? To this day I have shown faithful loyalty to the house of your father Saul, to his brothers, and to his allies, and I have not handed you over to David — yet now you charge me with wrongdoing over this woman?" ⁹"May God do the same to Abner and worse if I do not carry out for David exactly what the LORD has sworn to him —" ¹⁰"to transfer the kingdom from the house of Saul and to establish the throne of David over Israel and over Judah, from Dan to Beersheba." ¹¹Ish-bosheth could not say another word to Abner, because he was afraid of him. ¹²Abner sent messengers to David on his behalf, saying, "Whose land is this, really? Make a covenant with me, and my hand will be with you to bring all Israel over to your side." ¹³David replied, "Good — I will make a covenant with you. But I have one condition: you will not see my face unless you bring Michal daughter of Saul when you come to appear before me." ¹⁴David also sent messengers directly to Ish-bosheth son of Saul, saying, "Give me my wife Michal, whom I betrothed to myself at the price of a hundred Philistine foreskins." ¹⁵Ish-bosheth sent and took her from her husband, from Paltiel son of Laish. ¹⁶Her husband walked behind her, weeping as he went, all the way to Bahurim. Then Abner told him, "Go back." And he went back. ¹⁷Abner had already been speaking with the elders of Israel, saying, "For some time now, you have been wanting David as your king." ¹⁸"So now, act! For the LORD has declared concerning David: 'Through my servant David I will deliver my people Israel from the Philistines and from all their enemies.'" ¹⁹Abner also spoke directly to the Benjaminites. Then Abner went to Hebron to report to David everything that Israel had agreed to, and everything the whole tribe of Benjamin had approved. ²⁰Abner came to David at Hebron with twenty men, and David prepared a feast for Abner and the men with him. ²¹Abner said to David, "Let me go and gather all Israel to my lord the king so they can make a covenant with you, and you will reign over everything your heart desires." David sent Abner on his way, and he left in peace. ²²Just then, David's men and Joab arrived from a raid, bringing a large amount of plunder with them. But Abner was no longer with David in Hebron — David had already sent him away, and he had gone in peace. ²³When Joab and all the troops with him arrived, someone reported to Joab, "Abner son of Ner came to the king. David sent him away, and he left in peace." ²⁴Joab went to the king and said, "What have you done? Abner came right to you — why did you let him leave? Now he is gone!" ²⁵"You know Abner son of Ner — he came to deceive you! He came to learn your movements — where you go out and where you come in — and to find out everything you are doing." ²⁶After Joab left David's presence, he sent messengers after Abner and they brought him back from the cistern of Sirah. David knew nothing about it. ²⁷When Abner returned to Hebron, Joab drew him aside into the gateway as though to speak with him privately. There he stabbed him in the stomach, and Abner died — because of the blood of his brother Asahel. ²⁸When David heard about it afterward, he said, "I and my kingdom are clean before the LORD forever regarding the innocent blood of Abner son of Ner." ²⁹"Let it fall on the head of Joab and on all his father's house! May the house of Joab never be without someone suffering from a bodily discharge, or skin disease, or who grips the spindle, or who falls by the sword, or who lacks bread." ³⁰Joab and his brother Abishai killed Abner because he had killed their brother Asahel at Gibeon during the battle. ³¹David ordered Joab and all the people with him: "Tear your clothes, put on sackcloth, and walk in mourning before Abner's body." King David himself walked behind the bier. ³²They buried Abner in Hebron. The king raised his voice and wept at Abner's grave, and all the people wept as well.

³³The king raised a lament over Abner. He said:

"Should Abner have died the way a worthless fool dies?"

³⁴"Your hands were not bound;
your feet were not placed in bronze chains.
As one falls before sons of wickedness —
so you fell."

And all the people wept over him again.

³⁵All the people came to urge David to eat while it was still daylight, but David swore an oath: "May God do the same to me and worse if I taste bread or anything else before the sun goes down." ³⁶All the people took notice, and it seemed right to them — indeed, everything the king did met with the approval of all the people. ³⁷All the people — indeed all Israel — recognized that day that the killing of Abner son of Ner had not come from the king. ³⁸The king said to his servants, "Do you not understand that a commander — a great man — has fallen today in Israel?" ³⁹"I am vulnerable today, even though I have been anointed king. These men, the sons of Zeruiah, are too fierce for me. May the LORD repay the one who does evil according to his wickedness."

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The paired participles holek vechazek ('going and growing strong') and holkhim vedalim ('going and becoming weak') create a Hebrew idiom for progressive, ongoing change. The construction holek + second participle means 'continually becoming more so.' The narrator compresses what may have been years of attrition into a single contrastive sentence.
1. The word arukkah ('long, prolonged') applied to milchamah ('war') indicates not a single battle but an extended period of hostility — likely guerrilla conflict, border skirmishes, and political maneuvering rather than set-piece battles. The chapter will show that this war was decided more by political defection than by military victory.
2. The genealogical list in verses 2-5 interrupts the war narrative to establish David's growing family during the Hebron period. In the ancient Near East, the number of a king's sons signaled dynastic strength and divine blessing. Each son is identified by his mother, reflecting the political significance of each marriage alliance.

2. Amnon, the bekhor ('firstborn'), will later become the perpetrator of the assault on Tamar (2 Samuel 13), making this seemingly neutral genealogical notice carry dark foreshadowing for the reader who knows the full story.
3. Abigail is still identified by her former marriage to Nabal ('the fool'), linking back to the narrative in 1 Samuel 25. Chileab (also called Daniel in 1 Chronicles 3:1) disappears from the narrative entirely — he plays no further role, suggesting he may have died young or been otherwise sidelined.
3. Absalom's maternal lineage is given special attention: his mother Maacah was a foreign princess, daughter of the king of Geshur, a small Aramean kingdom northeast of the Sea of Galilee. This was a diplomatic marriage, and Absalom's half-foreign royal blood will factor into his later revolt — Geshur becomes his place of exile after he kills Amnon (2 Samuel 13:37-38).
4. Adonijah will later attempt to seize the throne after David's death (1 Kings 1-2), making his appearance in this birth list another instance of the narrator planting seeds for future conflict. Each of these sons represents a potential succession crisis — and the house of David will indeed be torn apart from within.
4. The names themselves carry theological weight: Adonijah means 'my lord is Yah(weh)' and Shephatiah means 'the LORD has judged.' Whether these names reflect parental piety or narrative irony depends on the reader's vantage point.
5. Eglah alone among the mothers listed here receives the title eshet David ('David's wife') — a peculiar distinction since all the women named were David's wives. Some ancient interpreters speculated this was another name for Michal, though there is no textual evidence for that identification. The designation may simply reflect Eglah's status as a particularly favored wife.
5. The summary statement 'these were born to David at Hebron' closes the genealogical insert and signals a return to the political narrative. Six sons by six different women in the Hebron period alone demonstrates the dynastic momentum the narrator is establishing.
6. The hitpael form mitchazzeq ('making himself strong') is reflexive-intensive: Abner was actively strengthening his own position, not merely serving the house of Saul. The verb chazaq in the hitpael carries the sense of self-aggrandizement — consolidating personal power under the cover of institutional loyalty. This single verb telegraphs the power dynamic that will explode in the next verses.
6. The narrator positions this detail immediately after David's growing family (vv2-5) to create a contrast: David's strength comes through dynasty-building and divine favor, while Abner's comes through political maneuvering within a weakening regime.
7. The verb ba'tah ('you went in to') is the standard Hebrew euphemism for sexual intercourse, literally 'you entered.' The accusation may or may not have been factually true — the text never confirms it. But the political implications were unmistakable: in the ancient Near East, taking a predecessor's concubine was a public claim to his authority (cf. Absalom with David's concubines in 2 Samuel 16:21-22, and Adonijah's request for Abishag in 1 Kings 2:17-22).
7. The word pilegesh ('concubine') denotes a secondary wife with recognized legal status but lower rank than a full wife. Rizpah will reappear in 2 Samuel 21:8-11, where her extraordinary vigil over the exposed bodies of her sons constitutes one of the most powerful acts of maternal resistance in the Hebrew Bible.
8. The phrase rosh kelev ('dog's head') is an intensified insult — not merely 'dog' (which is already degrading in Hebrew culture) but the head of a dog, the most worthless part of a despised animal. Abner uses it sarcastically, asking if Ish-bosheth truly regards him as something contemptible and aligned with Judah (David's tribe). The rhetorical question expects the answer 'no' while simultaneously revealing how expendable Abner now considers Ish-bosheth.
8. The word chesed ('loyal love, faithful loyalty') is loaded terminology: Abner claims he has shown covenantal faithfulness to Saul's house. When a military commander invokes chesed, it signals that he considers the relationship reciprocal — loyalty given should produce loyalty returned. Ish-bosheth's accusation, in Abner's view, has violated this reciprocity.
8. The phrase tifqod alai avon ha'ishah ('you charge me with wrongdoing concerning the woman') uses paqad ('to visit, to attend to, to call to account') in its judicial sense. Abner reframes the concubine accusation as an offense against himself rather than addressing whether it is true — a classic deflection that reveals more about the power dynamic than about the facts.
9. The self-imprecation formula koh ya'aseh Elohim... vekoh yosif ('may God do thus... and add more') is a standard oath formula in which the speaker invokes divine punishment on himself if he fails to keep his word. Abner swears against himself in the third person, which is unusual — he distances himself even from his own oath. The content of the oath is stunning: Abner now explicitly acknowledges that the LORD has sworn to give the kingdom to David, meaning he has known all along that his support for Ish-bosheth was against God's declared will.
9. The shift from fury at Ish-bosheth to a vow to serve David happens in a single sentence, revealing that Abner's allegiance was always pragmatic rather than principled. The moment the political calculus changes, he pivots entirely.
10. The phrase leha'avir hamamlakah ('to transfer the kingdom') uses the hiphil ofavar ('to cross over, to pass'), meaning to cause the kingdom to pass from one house to another. This is regime change described in a single verb.
10. The merism 'from Dan to Beersheba' (middan ve'ad be'er shava) is the standard way of expressing the full territorial extent of Israel — Dan being the northernmost recognized Israelite settlement and Beersheba the southernmost. Abner is promising not just a factional shift but total unification under David.

11. The verb yakhol ('to be able') negated — lo yakhol lehashiv davar ('he was unable to return a word') — reveals the total collapse of Ish-bosheth's authority. The man who is nominally king cannot even speak in response to his own general's threat of defection. The narrator exposes the power structure in a single verse: Ish-bosheth has always been Abner's creation, and without Abner's support, he is nothing.
11. The phrase miyyir'ato oto ('because of his fear of him') uses yir'ah ('fear'), the same word used for fear of God. Ish-bosheth's fear of Abner is an inversion of the proper order — a king should be feared, not fearful. The puppet king stands exposed.
12. The rhetorical question lemi erets ('to whom belongs the land?') is a power play. Abner is not asking for information — he is asserting that the land's future is in his hands, not Ish-bosheth's. It is simultaneously an offer and a boast: 'I am the one who decides where this nation goes.'
12. The imperative kartah veritkhah itti ('cut your covenant with me') uses the standard Hebrew idiom for making a covenant — karat berit, literally 'to cut a covenant,' referring to the ancient practice of cutting sacrificial animals as part of covenant ratification (cf. Genesis 15:9-18). Abner wants a formal, binding agreement — protection and position in exchange for delivering the northern tribes.
13. David's demand for Michal is politically brilliant on multiple levels. As Saul's daughter and David's first wife (1 Samuel 18:27), Michal is a living claim to dynastic legitimacy — her presence at David's court would signal to the northern tribes that David is Saul's rightful successor by marriage, not merely a rival warlord. The demand also reasserts David's personal honor: Saul took Michal away and gave her to another man (1 Samuel 25:44), and David is reclaiming what was stolen.
13. The phrase lo tir'eh et panai ('you will not see my face') uses the language of royal audience — 'seeing the king's face' means being received in his presence. David is wielding court protocol: no audience, no covenant, unless the condition is met first.
14. David bypasses Abner and sends directly to Ish-bosheth — a power move asserting that he deals with the nominal king as an equal (or superior), not through intermediaries. The message is simultaneously a legal claim and a humiliation: David names the bride-price he paid (me'ah orlot pelishtim — 'a hundred Philistine foreskins'), reminding everyone that he earned Michal through extraordinary military valor.
14. The verb erastiy ('I betrothed') is from aras, a technical legal term for the formal betrothal process. David's language is juridical: this is not a request but a demand based on established marital rights. The bride-price has been paid; the marriage was legitimate; Saul's subsequent transfer of Michal to Palti was the illegal act.
15. Ish-bosheth's compliance is immediate and unconditional — he does not negotiate, object, or delay. This confirms what verse 11 already revealed: he cannot resist anyone's demands. The powerless king simply obeys, whether the command comes from Abner or from David.
15. The text identifies Paltiel as Michal's ish ('husband'), granting full legitimacy to the relationship Saul arranged. Michal is being taken from a real marriage, not merely relocated. The narrator's recognition of Paltiel as 'husband' adds moral complexity to what David frames as a straightforward legal recovery.
16. This is one of the most poignant single verses in the Deuteronomistic History. Paltiel (called Palti in 1 Samuel 25:44) is a man who apparently loved Michal genuinely, and the narrator pauses the political narrative to let us see him walking behind her, weeping. The participle halokh uvakhoh ('walking and weeping') creates an image of sustained grief — he did not cry out once and stop but wept continuously along the road.
16. Abner's curt command lekh shuv ('go, return') is two words in Hebrew. The general has no patience for a grieving husband — this is statecraft, and personal loss is irrelevant. Paltiel's silent obedience (vayyashov, 'and he returned') closes the scene without resolution. The narrator never tells us what became of him. This brief, devastating portrait is the human cost of political realignment, and the text refuses to look away from it.
17. The phrase gam temol gam shilshom ('both yesterday and the day before') is an idiom meaning 'previously, for some time now.' Abner reveals that support for David among the northern tribal leaders was not new — it had been building quietly even while Abner himself propped up Ish-bosheth's regime. The elders' latent pro-David sentiment now has a military champion willing to act on it.
17. The participle mevaqshim ('seeking, wanting') indicates ongoing desire, not a sudden change of heart. Abner presents himself as the facilitator of what the people already want, not as a traitor — a masterful piece of political rhetoric.
18. Abner invokes divine authority — 'the LORD has declared' (YHWH amar) — to legitimate the political transition. The oracle he cites ('through my servant David I will deliver my people Israel') uses the language of the judges and the language of covenant: avdi ('my servant'), ammi ('my people'), and the hiphil of yasha ('to deliver, to save'). Whether Abner is quoting an actual prophetic oracle or constructing one for rhetorical effect, the text does not say.
18. The phrase beyad David ('through the hand of David') positions David as God's chosen instrument — his 'hand' is the means of divine deliverance. This echoes the theological pattern of the entire Deuteronomistic History: God saves through chosen human agents.
19. Benjamin receives special attention because it was Saul's own tribe. Winning Benjamin's consent was the critical piece — without it, the defection could be framed as every tribe except Saul's own people abandoning his dynasty. Abner's diplomacy with Benjamin transforms the political shift from a betrayal into something approaching consensus.
19. The phrase be'oznei ('in the ears of') indicates direct, personal communication — Abner did not send messengers to Benjamin but spoke to them face to face, underscoring the delicacy and importance of this particular negotiation.
20. The twenty men accompanying Abner represent a diplomatic delegation, not a military force — this is a negotiation party, large enough to signal seriousness but small enough to signal trust. David's response — preparing a mishteh ('feast, drinking banquet') — is the standard protocol for covenant-making in the ancient Near East. Eating together creates bonds of mutual obligation; a shared meal is a performed covenant.

- 20. The detail about the feast becomes critical in retrospect: Abner came to Hebron under the protection of hospitality, ate at David's table, and departed in peace. Joab's subsequent killing of Abner therefore violates not only the safe-conduct but the sacred obligations of shared food.
- 21. Abner's address adoni hammelek ('my lord the king') is the full formal title of royal submission — Abner already treats David as his sovereign. The verb yikhretu ('they will cut') refers again to covenant-making: the goal is a formal, binding agreement between all Israel and David.
- 21. The phrase vayyeylekh beshalom ('and he went in peace') is the chapter's pivot point. Shalom here is not merely 'peace' as an emotional state but a covenantal condition — Abner departed under safe conduct, with the host's guarantee of security. Everything that follows must be read against this detail: Abner left David's presence beshalom, under protection. What Joab does to him is therefore a violation of David's shalom.
- 22. The narrator's timing is precise and deliberate: Joab arrives immediately after Abner has departed. The repetition of vayyeylekh beshalom ('and he had gone in peace') — already stated in verse 21 — emphasizes the point a second time. The narrator wants the reader to hold this fact firmly: Abner was sent away under David's personal guarantee of safe conduct.
- 22. Joab returns from a gedud ('raiding party') with shalal rav ('great plunder'), arriving in the flush of military success — confident, aggressive, and about to discover that his king has been making peace with the man who killed his brother.
- 23. The phrase vayyeylekh beshalom ('and he left in peace') now appears for the third time in three verses (21, 22, 23). This extraordinary triple repetition is the narrator's hammer blow: the reader cannot possibly miss that Abner's departure was peaceful, authorized, and protected. Whatever happens next cannot be attributed to David or to any legitimate process.
- 23. The report to Joab is factual and neutral — the informants simply relay what happened. But the information itself is explosive to Joab: the killer of his brother Asahel was in Hebron, within reach, and the king let him walk away.
- 24. Joab's opening meh asita ('what have you done?') is sharp and borders on insubordinate — a general questioning his king's judgment to his face. The verb halokh ('going, gone') with vayyeylekh intensifies the finality: Abner is truly gone, and Joab frames this as a strategic blunder rather than a diplomatic success.
- 24. Joab does not mention Asahel, his dead brother, in this confrontation. His stated objection will be strategic (v25), not personal. Whether this restraint is calculated or genuine, the narrator leaves ambiguous — but the reader already knows that blood vengeance is the real engine driving Joab's fury.
- 25. Joab frames Abner's visit as espionage: lefatotekha ('to deceive you, to seduce you') uses the piel of patah, which means to entice, to persuade with ulterior motives. The language is that of deception and manipulation. Joab's argument is that Abner came as a spy, not a defector.
- 25. The phrase motsa'akha umvo'akha ('your going out and your coming in') is a military idiom for troop movements and strategic patterns. Joab speaks as a general assessing a security threat. Whether he believes his own argument or is constructing a pretext for personal vengeance, the text does not say — but the narrator has already made clear (through the triple beshalom) that David authorized Abner's visit and departure. Joab's characterization contradicts the narrator's framing.
- 26. The statement veDavid lo yada ('and David did not know') is one of the most consequential editorial insertions in the chapter. The narrator explicitly exonerates David: whatever Joab is about to do, the king had no part in planning it. The verb yada ('to know') is used in its fullest sense — David was not informed, not complicit, and not aware.
- 26. Bor hasirah ('the cistern of Sirah') identifies a specific location, likely a well or water collection point along the road north from Hebron. Abner had not traveled far — he was still within messenger range. The detail makes the treachery more vivid: Abner was practically still under Hebron's shadow when he was called back.
- 27. The phrase vayyattehu el tokh hasha'ar ('he turned him aside into the interior of the gate') is chilling in its detail. The city gate complex was a public space — a place of justice, commerce, and legal proceedings. Joab chose this location deliberately: it was public enough to lure Abner without suspicion but contained recesses and chambers where the actual killing could happen semi-privately. The word basheli ('quietly, privately') confirms the deception: Joab pretended to want a confidential conversation.
- 27. The word chomesh ('the fifth [rib], the abdomen') refers to the lower torso area. This is the same location where Abner himself struck Asahel in 2 Samuel 2:23, creating a grim symmetry — the avenger wounds the victim in the same place the victim once struck.
- 27. The closing clause bedam Asah-el achiv ('because of the blood of Asahel his brother') provides Joab's motive. The narrator names it as blood vengeance (dam, 'blood'), connecting the killing to the death at Gibeon. However, Abner killed Asahel in battle — an act of war, not murder — which means Joab's vengeance may not meet the legal standard for justified blood redemption.
- 28. David's declaration naqi anokhi umamlakhti ('I am clean, and my kingdom') uses naqi ('clean, innocent, free from guilt') — a juridical term declaring formal innocence. This is not merely a personal protest but a royal legal declaration intended to shield the entire kingdom from the consequences of bloodguilt. In the ancient Near East, unpunished murder polluted the land and its ruler; David must formally separate himself from the deed.
- 28. The phrase me'im YHWH ad olam ('from before the LORD forever') invokes God as witness to his innocence — this is sworn testimony before the divine court, not just a political statement.
- 29. David's curse is a five-fold imprecation — one of the most severe in the Hebrew Bible. Each element targets a different dimension of well-being: (1) zav — a person with a bodily discharge, rendering them ritually unclean and socially isolated; (2) metsora — a person with a serious skin disease (traditionally 'leprosy'), carrying both physical suffering and permanent ritual exclusion; (3) machaziq bapelek — 'one who grasps the spindle,' meaning someone reduced to women's work (in the ancient context, a mark of humiliation for a warrior household); (4) nofel bacherev — 'one who falls by the sword,' meaning violent death in war; (5) chasar lachem — 'one lacking bread,' meaning poverty and hunger.

29. The verb yachulu ('let them whirl, let them fall') uses chul, which can mean to writhe, to dance, to whirl, or to fall upon. The curse is directed not just at Joab personally but at kol beit aviyyv ('all his father's house') — his entire lineage. David cannot execute Joab (the political cost would be too high, as he acknowledges in verse 39), but he can place him and his descendants under a prophetic curse.
30. This verse reveals that Abishai was complicit in the killing — it was not Joab acting alone. The narrator adds bamilchamah ('in the battle') as a pointed qualifier: Abner killed Asahel in combat, during a legitimate military engagement, not by treachery. The narrator thus undercuts the justification for blood vengeance even as he explains its motive. Abner's killing of Asahel was an act of war; Joab and Abishai's killing of Abner was an act of murder.
30. The verse functions as a narrative summary that steps back from the scene to provide the reader with the full causal chain connecting 2 Samuel 2 (the battle at Gibeon) to the present moment.
31. David commands Joab to mourn the man Joab killed. The bitter irony is deliberate and public — this is not private grief but a political demonstration. By forcing Joab to participate in the mourning rituals, David simultaneously honors Abner and humiliates Joab before the entire court.
31. The phrase hammelekh David holekh acharei hamittah ('King David walked behind the bier') places the king in the most prominent position of mourning. Walking behind the bier was the position of the chief mourner — typically a close family member. David assumes this role for a former enemy, making the strongest possible public statement of respect and grief.
32. The phrase vayyissa hammelekh et qolo ('the king lifted up his voice') signals public, audible weeping — not quiet tears but the open lamentation of a king who wants everyone to see and hear his grief. The verb bakah ('to weep') appears twice in this verse — first of David, then of all the people — showing that the king's grief drew the people into shared mourning.
32. Burial in Hebron itself — David's own capital — was an extraordinary honor for a man who had spent years fighting against David. This burial site declares publicly that David considered Abner a man worthy of honor, not an enemy.
33. The verb vayyeqonen ('he lamented') indicates a formal qinah — a structured poetic lament, the same genre David used for Saul and Jonathan in 2 Samuel 1:19-27. This is not spontaneous weeping but composed funeral poetry, which in the ancient Israelite context was a high literary and social act.
33. The word naval ('fool') does not mean merely 'silly' or 'ignorant.' In Hebrew, naval denotes a person who is morally senseless, socially degraded, someone who acts in violation of all norms — the same word used as the name of Abigail's brutish husband in 1 Samuel 25. David's rhetorical question insists that Abner was not a naval — his death was not the consequence of his own foolishness or wickedness. He deserved better.
34. The poetry's structure is devastating in its logic. David addresses Abner directly in death: 'Your hands were not bound' — you were not a prisoner. 'Your feet were not placed in bronze chains' — you were not condemned. The implication is clear: Abner was a free man, not a criminal being executed. He had no reason to suspect danger. The death was therefore not justice but ambush.
34. The phrase kifnol lifnei venei avlah nafalta ('as one falls before sons of wickedness, you fell') names the killers without naming them. Benei avlah ('sons of wickedness, sons of injustice') is a Hebrew idiom for people characterized by avlah — moral crookedness, perversion of justice. David calls Joab and Abishai 'sons of wickedness' publicly, through the veil of poetic language, at Abner's own graveside.
34. The phrase vayyosifu khol ha'am livkot alav ('and all the people continued to weep over him') shows the lament's effect: David's words renewed the people's grief. The king's poetry did its political and emotional work — the nation mourned, and David's hands were publicly clean.
35. The verb lehaverot ('to cause to eat bread, to console with food') is the hiphil of barah, a technical term for the mourning meal — the food brought to the bereaved to break their fast of grief. It was customary for the community to provide food to mourners. David refuses this customary comfort with a self-imprecation oath (the same formula Abner used in verse 9), declaring he will not eat until sunset.
35. David's public fast accomplishes two things simultaneously: it expresses genuine grief (or at least performs it convincingly) and it demonstrates to all Israel that the king is deeply troubled by Abner's death. In a political environment where David could easily be suspected of ordering the assassination, this visible mourning is essential to his legitimacy.
36. The verb hikkiru ('they recognized, they took notice') is the hiphil of nakar, meaning to perceive, to recognize, to discern. The people did not merely observe David's mourning — they recognized its significance and judged it genuine. The narrator's summary vayyitav be'eineihem ('and it was good in their eyes') is the language of public approval.
36. The sweeping statement 'everything the king did was good in the eyes of all the people' is both a narrative assessment and a political one. David's handling of the Abner crisis — the public mourning, the lament, the fast, the curse on Joab — was a masterclass in crisis management, whether motivated by genuine feeling, political calculation, or both.
37. The verb vayyede'u ('and they knew') — from yada — indicates settled conviction, not mere suspicion. All Israel reached the conclusion that David was not behind the assassination. The phrase lo haytah mehammelekh ('it was not from the king') is a formal verdict of royal innocence, declared not by a court but by the consensus of the people.

37. The narrator distinguishes 'all the people' (those present in Hebron) from 'all Israel' (the broader nation, including the northern tribes). Word of David's public mourning traveled beyond Hebron, and the verdict reached the very people Abner had been trying to deliver to David. The political damage that could have been catastrophic was contained.
38. The words sar vegadol ('commander and great man') are David's assessment of Abner's stature. Sar means 'prince, commander, chief' — a military and political title — while gadol ('great') adds personal magnitude. David is not speaking of Abner as an enemy defeated but as a peer lost. The rhetorical question format (halo ted'u, 'do you not know?') implies that his servants should already understand the gravity of the loss.
38. This verse, spoken to David's own servants (avadav), represents a more private moment than the public mourning — David is explaining to his inner circle why the loss matters, or perhaps processing his own frustration that he could not prevent it.
39. The adjective rakh ('soft, tender, vulnerable') is a startling self-description for a king. David is admitting that despite his anointing (mashiach melekh, 'anointed king'), he lacks the power to punish Joab. The sons of Zeruiah — Joab, Abishai, and Asahel (now dead) — are David's own nephews through his sister, making this a family conflict as well as a political one. The adjective qashim ('hard, fierce, harsh') applied to them contrasts with David's rakh: they are hard where he is soft, ruthless where he is constrained.
39. David's final words yeshalleem YHWH le'oseh hara'ah kera'ato ('may the LORD repay the evildoer according to his evil') transfer justice to God because David cannot execute it himself. This is not pious resignation but political realism: executing Joab immediately would risk civil war within his own camp. David defers the reckoning — but he does not forget it. On his deathbed (1 Kings 2:5-6), David will instruct Solomon to settle the account.
39. The phrase benei tseruyah ('sons of Zeruiah') identifies Joab and Abishai through their mother rather than their father — an unusual patronymic convention that may reflect Zeruiah's prominence as David's sister or the obscurity of their father. This maternal identification becomes a recurring formula throughout the David narrative whenever the brothers act with excessive violence.

Summary: When Saul's son Ish-bosheth learns that Abner is dead, his nerve collapses and all Israel is thrown into confusion. Two of his own military captains, Recab and Baanah, sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, enter his house during the midday heat, murder him in his bed, behead him, and carry his head overnight to David at Hebron, expecting a reward. David responds not with gratitude but with outrage, invoking the precedent of the Amalekite who claimed to have killed Saul: if David executed that man for striking down the LORD's anointed, how much more will he punish those who murdered an innocent man in his own house. David orders the assassins killed, their hands and feet cut off, and their bodies displayed at the pool of Hebron. Ish-bosheth's head is buried in Abner's tomb.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter reveals David's extraordinary and consistent theological principle: he will not profit from the murder of his political rivals, even when those murders serve his strategic interests. Ish-bosheth's death removes the last obstacle to David's kingship over all Israel, yet David treats the act not as providence but as an abomination. His reasoning is covenantal rather than political: the blood of an innocent man (ish tsaddiq) demands an accounting. David insists that the LORD Himself is the one who redeems his life from every adversity -- human assassination of his enemies is an affront to divine sovereignty, not an aid to it. The narrator presents David as a king who refuses to build his throne on blood-guilt, in direct contrast to the kind of king Israel will later endure.

Translation Friction: The Hebrew text of verse 6 presents a significant textual difficulty. The Masoretic Text reads awkwardly, with the assassins coming 'to the middle of the house, fetching wheat,' which seems to describe a mundane errand as cover for the assassination. The Septuagint (LXX) offers a different version in which the doorkeeper of the house falls asleep while cleaning wheat, allowing Recab and Baanah to slip past undetected. We follow the MT while noting the LXX variant. The phrase ish tsaddiq ('an innocent/righteous man') applied to Ish-bosheth in verse 11 is striking -- the narrator and David do not call him a great king or a worthy ruler, only an innocent man who did not deserve to be murdered in his bed. This minimal commendation is itself significant: righteousness before David means at minimum not deserving violent death, regardless of political competence.

Connections: David's response directly parallels his treatment of the Amalekite messenger in 2 Samuel 1:14-16, creating a deliberate pattern: those who kill the LORD's anointed or their house, expecting David's favor, receive death instead. The burial of Ish-bosheth's head in the tomb of Abner (v. 12) ties together the two assassinations of chapters 3-4 under a single theme of unjust bloodshed that David publicly repudiates. The Mephibosheth notice in verse 4 -- seemingly a parenthetical about Jonathan's crippled son -- anticipates David's covenant loyalty in chapter 9, where he will seek out Mephibosheth to honor his oath to Jonathan. With Ish-bosheth dead, Mephibosheth becomes the sole surviving male of Saul's line, making David's later kindness to him all the more politically significant. The blood-guilt theology David articulates here (requiring the blood of the murderers from their own hand) echoes Genesis 9:5-6, where God establishes the principle that the blood of the innocent demands a reckoning.

¹When Saul's son heard that Abner had died in Hebron, his hands went slack, and all Israel was thrown into panic. ²Now Saul's son had two men who were captains of raiding bands. One was named Baanah and the other Recab -- sons of Rimmon the Beerothite, from the tribe of Benjamin. (Beeroth is counted as part of Benjamin's territory, ³though the Beerothites had fled to Gittaim and have lived there as resident aliens to this day.) ⁴Now Jonathan son of Saul had a son who was crippled in both feet. He was five years old when the report about Saul and Jonathan arrived from Jezreel. His nurse picked him up and fled, but in her frantic rush to escape, he fell and was permanently injured. His name was Mephibosheth. ⁵The sons of Rimmon the Beerothite -- Recab and Baanah -- set out and arrived at the house of Ish-bosheth during the heat of the day. He was lying down for his midday rest. ⁶They entered the interior of the house as if collecting wheat, and they stabbed him in the stomach. Then Recab and his brother Baanah escaped. ⁷They entered the house while he lay on his bed in his sleeping chamber, struck him down, killed him, and cut off his head. They took his head and traveled the Arabah road all night long. ⁸They brought the head of Ish-bosheth to David at Hebron and said to the king, "Here is the head of Ish-bosheth son of Saul, your enemy, who sought your life. The LORD has granted my lord the king vengeance this day against Saul and his offspring." ⁹David answered Recab and his brother Baanah, the sons of Rimmon the Beerothite. He said to them, "As the LORD lives -- the one who has redeemed my life from every adversity -- ¹⁰when a man reported to me, 'Saul is dead!' -- thinking he was bringing good news -- I seized him and executed him at Ziklag. That was the reward I gave him for his news. ¹¹How much more, then, when wicked men have murdered an innocent man in his own house, on his own bed! Will I not now demand his blood from your hands and purge you from the earth?" ¹²David gave the order to his soldiers, and they killed them, cut off their hands and feet, and hung their bodies beside the pool in Hebron. They took the head of Ish-bosheth and buried it in the tomb of Abner in Hebron.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The narrator refers to Ish-bosheth only as ben-Sha'ul ('Saul's son'), not by his own name -- a subtle diminishment that reinforces his identity as an appendage to his father's legacy rather than a ruler in his own right. His hands 'going slack' (rafu) uses the same root as raphah ('to let go, to sink, to become weak'), conveying both physical collapse and the loss of grip on power.
1. The verb nivhalu ('were terrified/confused') from the root bahal describes sudden, overwhelming alarm -- not slow worry but the immediate shock of realizing the center cannot hold. Without Abner, there is no army, no strategy, and no credible resistance to David's expanding authority.
2. The term sarei-gedudim ('captains of raiding bands') identifies Recab and Baanah not as high-ranking army officers but as leaders of guerrilla-style units -- small, mobile strike forces. The word gedud ('raiding band, troop') appears frequently in the David narratives for irregular military units that operate semi-independently. These are men accustomed to quick, violent action.
2. The parenthetical about Beeroth belonging to Benjamin is geographically and legally significant. Beeroth was one of the four Gibeonite cities that had made a treaty with Israel (Joshua 9:17). The narrator pauses to clarify the tribal affiliation because it matters: these men are Benjaminites -- Saul's own tribesmen are about to murder Saul's own son. The betrayal comes from within.
3. The flight of the Beerothites to Gittaim and their status as garim ('resident aliens, sojourners') hints at a displacement event -- possibly connected to Saul's violence against the Gibeonites mentioned in 2 Samuel 21:1-2. The Beerothites, as Gibeonites under treaty protection, may have fled when Saul broke that treaty. If so, Recab and Baanah are men with a personal grievance against Saul's house, adding a motive of revenge to their opportunism.
3. The phrase ad ha-yom ha-zeh ('to this day') is a narrator's aside that anchors the text in a later perspective -- the author writes from a time when the Beerothite community at Gittaim is a known, ongoing reality. This is one of several 'to this day' markers in Samuel that point to a compositional distance between the events and their recording.
4. The phrase nekheh raglayim ('struck in the feet, crippled in both legs') uses the same root nakah ('to strike') that appears throughout the David narratives for violent injury. Mephibosheth's disability is described as the result of a fall -- vayyippol vayyippaseach ('he fell and became lame') -- where the verb pasach means to limp or be lame. His condition was permanent and would have disqualified him from kingship in the ancient Near Eastern world, where physical wholeness was expected of rulers.

4. The name Mephibosheth (mephi-boshet) is likely an altered form of the original Merib-baal ('contender of Baal' or 'Baal contends'), changed by later scribes who replaced the theophoric element ba'al ('lord/master') with boshet ('shame'). This scribal practice reflects the later disgust with Baal worship and is applied to several Saulide names in the text.
5. The timing is precise and damning: kechom ha-yom ('during the heat of the day') places the assassination at the hottest part of the afternoon, when a king would be resting and his guard at its most lax. The phrase mishkav ha-tsohorayim ('the lying-down of noon') is the midday rest -- a standard practice in the ancient Near East during the brutal afternoon heat. Ish-bosheth is at his most vulnerable: asleep, in his own bedroom, in his own capital.
5. The narrator calls him Ish-boshet ('man of shame'), using the altered form of what was likely Ish-baal ('man of Baal' or 'man of the lord'). The name change, whether by the narrator or later scribes, casts a shadow over his entire reign -- he is remembered not as 'the lord's man' but as 'the man of shame.'
6. The Masoretic Text reads loqechei chittim ('fetchers of wheat'), suggesting the assassins used a mundane errand as their pretext for entering the house. Military captains collecting grain rations from the royal storehouse would not have aroused suspicion. The Septuagint offers a different version in which the doorkeeper falls asleep while cleaning wheat, and the brothers slip past -- a variant that smooths the narrative but may reflect an independent textual tradition. We follow the MT.
6. The phrase vayyakkuhu el-ha-chomesh ('they struck him to the fifth [rib]') describes a fatal blow to the abdomen -- the chomesh is the belly or the area of the fifth rib, a vulnerable spot targeted in close combat. This is the same method by which Abner killed Asahel (2:23) and Joab killed Abner (3:27) -- the belly-stab is becoming a grim motif in these chapters, a signature of treacherous killing.
7. The phrase ba-chadar mishkavo ('in his sleeping chamber') emphasizes the intimacy and violation of the murder -- this is the innermost room of the house, the place of greatest privacy and vulnerability. To kill a man in his bed, in his own room, during sleep, compounds the treachery beyond ordinary assassination.
7. The verb vayyasiru ('they removed') from the root sur ('to turn aside, remove') is used for the beheading -- a clinical word for a brutal act. The Arabah route (derekh ha-Aravah) runs through the Jordan Valley, allowing them to travel under cover of darkness through sparsely populated terrain. The phrase kol-ha-laylah ('all the night') emphasizes the urgency and premeditation: they had planned the escape route in advance.
8. The assassins' speech is theologically loaded: vayyitten YHWH la-adoni ha-melekh neqamot ('the LORD has given my lord the king vengeance'). The word neqamot (plural of neqamah, 'vengeance, retribution') frames the murder as divine payback. They assume David operates by the same logic they do -- that political advantage is proof of divine approval. This is precisely the theology David will reject.
8. The phrase mi-Sha'ul u-mi-zar'o ('from Saul and from his seed/offspring') reveals the assassins' view that the entire Saulide line is David's enemy. They present the extinction of Saul's house as a service to David. But David's covenant with Jonathan (1 Samuel 20:14-17) committed him to protecting Saul's descendants -- the assassins have struck at the very people David swore to preserve.
9. David opens with an oath formula: chay-YHWH ('as the LORD lives') -- the most solemn form of declaration available, invoking God as witness. The relative clause asher-padah et-nafshi mikkol-tsarah ('who redeemed my life from every adversity') is David's counter-theology: it is God alone who delivers him, not human assassins. The verb padah ('to redeem, ransom, rescue') is covenant language -- God buys back, recovers, and liberates. David's point is that God's redemption operates through legitimate means, not through the murder of sleeping men.
9. The word tsarah ('distress, adversity, trouble') encompasses everything David has endured -- Saul's pursuit, exile, war, and political danger. David credits God for bringing him through all of it. The implicit argument: if God has delivered me from every crisis so far without my needing to murder rivals, why would God now require the assassination of Ish-bosheth?
10. The phrase vehu-hayah khimvasser be'einav ('he was like a bearer of good news in his own eyes') exposes the Amalekite's fatal miscalculation: he assumed David's perspective matched his own. The verb achar ('to seize') followed by vahargahu ('and I killed him') is blunt and declarative -- David does not soften the account. The location be-Tsiqlag ('in Ziklag') grounds the precedent in a specific, known event.
10. The clause asher letitti-lo besorah ('which was my giving him his reward for news') is bitterly ironic. The word besorah means 'good news' or 'reward for bringing news' -- David redefines the reward: execution. The parallel to the present situation is unmistakable, and David is building toward the sentence he will pronounce in verses 11-12.
11. The phrase ish tsaddiq ('a righteous/innocent man') applied to Ish-bosheth is a legal designation rather than a character endorsement. David is not calling Ish-bosheth a great or good king; he is declaring that Ish-bosheth did not deserve to be murdered. The word tsaddiq in a judicial context means 'not guilty of a crime warranting death' -- the man was innocent of any offense that would justify assassination.
11. The verb bi'arti ('I will purge, burn away, remove') from the root ba'ar carries overtones of ritual cleansing -- the same word used in Deuteronomy's formula u-vi'arta ha-ra miqirbekha ('you shall purge the evil from your midst,' Deuteronomy 13:5, 17:7, 19:19). David frames the execution not as personal revenge but as judicial purification of the land from blood-guilt. The blood of the innocent pollutes the earth and must be answered.
12. The term ne'arim ('young men, soldiers') refers to David's personal military retainers -- the same group that has served him since his outlaw days. The mutilation of hands and feet (vayqatsetu et-yedeihem ve-et-ragleihem) is an ancient Near Eastern practice of public justice: the offending limbs are severed and the bodies displayed as a deterrent. The pool of Hebron (ha-berekhah be-Chevron) was the central water source and public gathering place -- equivalent to displaying the bodies in the town square.

12. The burial of Ish-bosheth's head in Abner's tomb (qever Avner) is a significant act of political reconciliation. David unites in death the two most important northern leaders, both of whom were killed by treachery rather than by David's hand. The tomb becomes a monument to David's consistent position: he honors the house of Saul even as it passes from power. This gesture would have been noted by northern leaders considering whether to accept David as king over all Israel -- the event that follows immediately in chapter 5.

Summary: All the tribes of Israel come to David at Hebron, acknowledge him as their rightful shepherd and commander, and formally anoint him king over a united Israel. David captures the Jebusite stronghold of Zion, renames it the City of David, and establishes it as his capital. Hiram of Tyre sends materials and craftsmen to build David a palace, confirming his international legitimacy. David takes additional wives and concubines, and a list of sons born in Jerusalem is recorded. The Philistines twice challenge David's new kingship, and twice the LORD grants him decisive victory -- first at Baal-perazim and then in the Valley of Rephaim, where God Himself leads the assault through the sound of marching in the treetops.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter records the political and theological climax of David's long ascent: the anointing that was private in 1 Samuel 16 is now ratified publicly by every tribe. The Hebrew makes the transition stark -- the same nation that followed Saul and then fractured between Ish-bosheth and David now speaks with a single voice: 'We are your bone and your flesh.' The capture of Jerusalem is equally significant. The Jebusites taunt David that even the blind and the lame could defend their fortress, yet David takes it anyway, seizing a city that belonged to no Israelite tribe and making it the capital of all twelve -- a stroke of political genius that avoids tribal jealousy. The Philistine battles at the end reveal a David utterly unlike Saul: he inquires of the LORD before each engagement and obeys precisely, even when God gives different instructions for the second battle. The sound of marching in the balsam trees (v. 24) is one of Scripture's most vivid images of divine warfare -- God's invisible army moving ahead of David's visible one.

Translation Friction: Verse 6 contains one of the most debated passages in Samuel. The Jebusites' taunt about 'the blind and the lame' and David's apparent counter-statement that 'the blind and the lame shall not come into the house' has generated centuries of interpretive difficulty. Does David issue a permanent ban on disabled persons from the temple? Is this a proverb about the Jebusites? The Hebrew is compressed and likely idiomatic. We render the exchange as a military taunt and counter-taunt about the Jebusites' confidence, not as legislation about disabled persons. The phrase in verse 8 about the tsinnor ('water shaft' or 'gutter') through which the city was taken is also notoriously obscure -- the word occurs only here and in Psalm 42:8, and its exact meaning remains uncertain. We render it as 'water channel' with a note on the ambiguity. Verse 2 uses nagid ('prince, designated ruler') rather than melek ('king'), preserving the theological distinction that God designates and the people confirm.

Connections: David's anointing at Hebron fulfills Samuel's anointing in 1 Samuel 16:13, completing a journey that spans nearly twenty chapters. The covenant (berit) David cuts with the elders in verse 3 echoes the covenant-making pattern established at Sinai (Exodus 24:7-8) and renewed by Joshua (Joshua 24:25) -- Israel's leadership transitions are marked by formal covenant ratification. The capture of Zion anticipates the Ark's arrival in chapter 6 and Solomon's temple in 1 Kings 6 -- David is preparing the stage for God's permanent dwelling. The Philistine defeats reverse the disaster of 1 Samuel 4 and 31; the nation that killed Saul on Gilboa is now routed by Saul's successor. God's instruction to circle behind the Philistines and wait for the sound in the trees (v. 24) echoes the holy-war pattern where the LORD fights while Israel follows (Exodus 14:14, Joshua 5:13-15, Judges 4:14).

¹All the tribes of Israel came to David at Hebron and declared, "We are your bone and your flesh." ²Even before, when Saul was king over us, you were the one leading Israel out and bringing them back. And the LORD said to you, 'You will shepherd My people Israel, and you will be leader over Israel.' ³All the elders of Israel came to the king at Hebron, and King David cut a covenant with them at Hebron before the LORD. Then they anointed David king over all Israel. ⁴David was thirty years old when he became king, and he reigned for forty years. ⁵He ruled over Judah from Hebron for seven years and six months, then ruled from Jerusalem over all Israel and Judah for thirty-three years. ⁶The king and his men marched to Jerusalem against the Jebusites, the inhabitants of the land. They said to David, "You will never get in here -- even the blind and the lame could turn you back!" They were certain David could not enter. ⁷But David captured the stronghold of Zion -- that is, the City of David. ⁸David said on that day, "Whoever strikes down the Jebusites -- let him reach the water channel! -- and the lame and the blind whom David despises..." For this reason people say, "The blind and the lame will not enter the house." ⁹David settled in the stronghold and named it the City of David. Then David built up the surrounding area from the Millo inward. ¹⁰David continued to grow greater, and the LORD God of Armies was with him. ¹¹Hiram king of Tyre sent envoys to David, along with cedar timber, woodworkers, and stonemasons, and they built David a palace. ¹²David recognized that the LORD had established him as king over Israel and had elevated his kingdom for the sake of His people Israel. ¹³David took more concubines and wives from Jerusalem after he came from Hebron, and more sons and daughters were born to David. ¹⁴These are the names of those born to him in Jerusalem: Shammua, Shobab, Nathan, and Solomon, ¹⁵Ibhar, Elishua, Nepheg, and Japhia, ¹⁶Elishama, Eliada, and Eliphelet. ¹⁷When the Philistines heard that David had been anointed king over Israel, all the Philistines came up to find him. David heard of it and went down to the stronghold. ¹⁸The Philistines came and spread out across the Valley of Rephaim. ¹⁹David inquired of the LORD, "Should I go up against the Philistines? Will You give them into my hand?" The LORD said to David, "Go up, for I will certainly give the Philistines into your hand." ²⁰David came to Baal-perazim and defeated them there. David said, "The LORD has burst through my enemies before me like a flood breaking through!" That is why he named that place Baal-perazim. ²¹The Philistines abandoned their idols there, and David and his men carried them away. ²²The Philistines came up yet again and spread out across the Valley of Rephaim. ²³David inquired of the LORD, and He said, "Do not go straight up. Circle around behind them and come at them from in front of the balsam trees." ²⁴When you hear the sound of marching in the tops of the balsam trees, then move decisively, for at that moment the LORD will have gone out ahead of you to strike the Philistine camp. ²⁵David did exactly as the LORD commanded him, and he struck down the Philistines from Geba all the way to Gezer.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The tribes come to David, not the reverse. The verb vayyavo'u ('they came') emphasizes that this is a voluntary convergence -- David does not summon or coerce. Hebron, David's capital during the seven-year civil period, serves as the meeting place. The declaration hinnenu ('here we are') carries overtones of covenant readiness, the same word Abraham uses in response to God (Genesis 22:1).
2. The phrase gam temol gam shilshom ('also yesterday also the day before') is idiomatic for 'in the past, previously.' It acknowledges David's leadership during Saul's reign without directly condemning Saul -- a diplomatically careful statement.
2. The verb tir'eh ('you will shepherd') frames kingship as pastoral care, not domination. Israel's king is a shepherd first -- responsible for feeding, protecting, and guiding the flock. This metaphor governs the entire Davidic theology and reaches forward to Ezekiel 34 and the messianic 'good shepherd' tradition.
3. The sequence matters: covenant first, then anointing. David binds himself to obligations toward the people before receiving the oil of kingship. This pattern distinguishes Israelite monarchy from ancient Near Eastern despotism -- the king serves under covenant, not above it.
3. This is David's third anointing: first by Samuel privately (1 Samuel 16:13), then by the men of Judah (2 Samuel 2:4), and now by all Israel. Each anointing expands the scope of his authority -- from divine designation to tribal recognition to national confirmation.
4. This summary formula is characteristic of the regnal records embedded in Samuel-Kings. Thirty was the age of full maturity in ancient Israel -- the age at which Levites entered full service (Numbers 4:3). Forty years is the conventional number for a complete generation of leadership (Moses, the wilderness period, Eli, Solomon). Whether precisely literal or typological, it signals that David's reign was complete and full.
5. The precision of 'seven years and six months' for the Hebron period contrasts with the round number of thirty-three for Jerusalem, suggesting the narrator drew on different record sources. The distinction between reigning 'over Judah' and 'over all Israel and Judah' marks the political transformation: David's move to Jerusalem coincides with his authority expanding from one tribe to the entire nation.
6. This verse is notoriously difficult in Hebrew. The phrase ki im hshirekha ha'ivrim vehapiskhim is compressed and likely idiomatic. The meaning appears to be a scornful challenge: you cannot enter unless you first remove even the blind and lame (who are sufficient to defend it). The Jebusites are not describing their actual garrison but mocking David's capacity to breach their walls.
6. Jerusalem (Yerushalaim) was strategically positioned between the tribal territories of Judah and Benjamin, belonging fully to neither. By capturing a non-Israelite city, David avoided the political problem of ruling from any single tribe's territory -- a masterstroke that would make Jerusalem a truly national capital.

7. The word metsudah ('stronghold, fortress') comes from the root ts-w-d, meaning 'to hunt, to capture' -- the stronghold is named for its capacity to trap and defend. That David captures the capture-proof fortress is embedded in the word itself.
7. The identification hi ir David ('that is the City of David') is an editorial note that fixes the name for all subsequent readers. The City of David is not the entirety of later Jerusalem but specifically the original Jebusite citadel on the Ophel ridge -- a narrow spur south of what would become the Temple Mount.
8. The tsinnor is the crux of this verse. The word appears only here and in Psalm 42:8 (where it means 'waterfall' or 'water channel'). Most scholars connect it to Warren's Shaft or a similar underground water access point in ancient Jerusalem. The strategy would involve soldiers ascending through the water system to bypass the walls -- a commando-style infiltration that renders the 'impregnable' fortress vulnerable from within.
8. The verse's grammar is broken or compressed, likely because the narrator is summarizing a well-known military tradition in shorthand. The 1 Chronicles 11:6 parallel clarifies that Joab was the first to go up and thereby earned the position of commander -- a detail this verse implies but does not state.
9. The verb vayyeshev ('he settled, dwelt') marks the transition from conquest to residency -- David does not merely capture the citadel but makes it his permanent home. The renaming is an act of political claim: the anonymous Jebusite fortress becomes ir David, permanently associated with the new dynasty.
9. The Millo (from the root m-l-l, 'to fill') refers to a terraced fill structure that expanded the usable area of Jerusalem's narrow ridge. Archaeological work on the southeastern hill has uncovered massive stone terracing that may correspond to this Millo. Building 'from the Millo inward' suggests David constructed or reinforced the outer terracing and then developed the interior -- a program of urban expansion that transformed a captured citadel into a royal capital.
10. The title YHWH Elohei Tseva'ot ('the LORD God of Armies/Hosts') appears here to frame David's expanding power as divine, not merely political. The 'armies' may refer to Israel's forces, the angelic hosts, or the cosmic powers under God's command -- likely all three simultaneously. We render Tseva'ot as 'Armies' rather than the traditional 'hosts' to preserve the military force of the title.
11. Hiram's initiative is significant: a foreign king sends materials and skilled labor to David unsolicited. This is diplomatic recognition from the most powerful commercial city on the Mediterranean coast. Tyre's cedar wood was the premier building material of the ancient Near East -- its use signaled wealth, permanence, and royal status. The construction of a bayit ('house, palace') in Jerusalem transforms David from a military occupier into an established monarch with international standing.
11. The word bayit ('house') will become theologically loaded in chapter 7, where God promises to build David a 'house' (dynasty) in return. Here the physical house foreshadows the dynastic house -- David builds a palace, and God will build a lineage.
12. The verb hekino ('He established him') from the root k-w-n is the same root used in God's promise to establish David's throne forever (2 Samuel 7:12-16). The narrator anticipates the dynastic covenant by using its key vocabulary here.
12. The phrase ba'avur ammo Yisrael ('for the sake of His people Israel') is the theological corrective to royal self-aggrandizement. David's kingdom is instrumental -- it exists as a means to bless Israel, not as an end in itself.
13. The narrator records this without explicit commentary, but the placement immediately after David's recognition that his kingdom serves God's people creates an implicit tension. Multiple marriages were standard practice for ancient Near Eastern kings -- they cemented political alliances and demonstrated royal status. Yet Deuteronomy 17:17 warns that the king 'must not acquire many wives for himself, or his heart will turn away.' The seeds of future crisis (Amnon, Absalom, Adonijah) are planted in this single verse.
13. The distinction between nashim ('wives') and pilagshim ('concubines') reflects legal status: wives had full marriage contracts and inheritance rights for their children, while concubines had a recognized but subordinate position.
14. The list of sons born in Jerusalem signals dynastic establishment. Of these four, Nathan and Solomon are the most significant for later history. Solomon will succeed David as king, and Nathan appears in the genealogy of Jesus in Luke 3:31. The names themselves carry meaning: Shammua ('heard'), Shobab ('returned' or possibly 'rebellious'), Nathan ('He gave'), and Shelomoh/Solomon ('his peace, his wholeness').
15. The names continue the dynastic register. Ibhar ('He chooses'), Elishua ('My God is salvation'), Nepheg ('sprout'), and Japhia ('He shines'). Several of these names are theophoric -- containing embedded references to God's character and action. The naming of royal sons was itself a theological statement: each name proclaimed something about the God who gave the king his dynasty.
16. The final three sons all bear names beginning with El- ('God'): Elishama ('My God has heard'), Eliada ('God knows'), and Eliphelet ('My God is deliverance'). The concentration of theophoric names in David's household reflects the theological conviction that every child is a gift from God and every name is a confession of faith. The parallel list in 1 Chronicles 3:5-8 includes additional names, suggesting that this list may be selective rather than exhaustive.
17. The Philistines had tolerated David as a Judahite vassal king ruling from Hebron -- a divided Israel served their interests. A united Israel under David was a different matter entirely, demanding immediate military response. The phrase kol Pelishtim ('all the Philistines') indicates a full military mobilization, not a raiding party.
18. The verb vayyinaleshu ('they spread out, deployed') is military language describing an army taking up battle positions across a wide area. The Valley of Rephaim (emeq Refa'im) lies southwest of Jerusalem, providing a natural invasion corridor toward the new capital. The name Rephaim carries overtones of the ancient giant warriors (cf. Genesis 15:20, Deuteronomy 2:11) and of the shades of the dead -- an ominous valley for a decisive confrontation.

18. The Philistines' choice of terrain is strategic: by occupying the valley between their territory and Jerusalem, they threaten to cut David off from Judah and reverse his consolidation of power.
19. The inquiry was likely made through the priestly ephod, using the Urim and Thummim (cf. 1 Samuel 23:9-12, 30:7-8). David's two questions -- 'Should I go up?' and 'Will You give them to me?' -- seek both tactical permission and theological assurance. God answers both with a single response: go, and I will give.
19. The infinitive absolute construction naton etten ('giving I will give') expresses certainty and emphasis. God's promise is not conditional or tentative -- it is guaranteed.
20. The imagery of flooding water (perets mayim) would have been powerfully concrete in the Judean landscape, where flash floods in dry wadis could obliterate everything in their path. David compares God's assault on the Philistines to a flash flood -- sudden, total, and irresistible.
20. The name Ba'al Peratsim is provocative: ba'al ('master, lord') was the chief Canaanite deity, but David uses it as a common noun meaning 'master, possessor.' The LORD is the true Ba'al -- the true Master -- of the breakthrough. There may be deliberate theological polemic in this naming.
21. The MT reads vayyissa'em ('they carried them away'), while the parallel in 1 Chronicles 14:12 reads vayyisarefu ba'esh ('they burned them with fire'), following the command of Deuteronomy 7:5, 25. The Chronicles version reflects the Torah's mandate to destroy captured idols. We follow the MT of Samuel, which simply records removal. Both traditions agree on the essential point: the Philistine gods were powerless.
22. The Philistines' return to the same valley demonstrates both their determination and their failure to learn. The verb vayyisufu ('they did again, they continued') shows persistence -- a single defeat did not break their resolve. They deploy in the same location, expecting perhaps a different outcome. But this time God will give David a completely different strategy, demonstrating that the LORD is not bound to a single method and that David must inquire fresh each time.
23. The bekha'im (plural of bakha, possibly related to bakhah, 'to weep') are usually identified as balsam trees, which exude a resinous sap that 'weeps' from the bark. Some scholars connect the name to the 'Valley of Baca' in Psalm 84:7. The exact species is uncertain, but the trees served as a geographic marker and would play a crucial role in the next verse.
23. The verb hasev ('circle around') is a military maneuver term -- David is to execute a flanking movement, coming at the Philistines from behind rather than meeting them head-on. This requires discipline and trust: the army must resist the instinct to charge and instead execute a patient encirclement.
24. The qol tse'adah berashei habekha'im ('sound of marching in the tops of the balsam trees') has fascinated interpreters for millennia. The word tse'adah means 'a step, a marching pace' -- it is the sound of feet, not wind. The narrator presents this as the audible evidence of God's heavenly army deploying through the forest canopy. Whether understood as a supernatural phenomenon or as God using the sound of wind as a tactical signal, the theological point is the same: God fights ahead of David.
24. The verb techarats (from the root ch-r-ts, 'to be sharp, to decide, to act decisively') appears only here and in a few other places. It conveys urgency and sharpness -- the moment the sound comes, David must strike without delay.
25. The phrase ka'asher tsivvahu YHWH ('just as the LORD commanded him') is the narrator's final verdict on David's military conduct: complete obedience. This stands in sharp contrast to Saul, who repeatedly modified or ignored divine commands (1 Samuel 13:8-14, 15:1-23). The theological point is clear: obedience to God's specific instructions, even unconventional ones, produces victory.
25. Geba (or Gibeon, as some manuscripts and the LXX read) was a Benjaminite town north of Jerusalem. Gezer was a major Canaanite city on the western edge of the Shephelah, guarding the approach to the coastal plain. A rout extending from Geba to Gezer covers roughly twenty miles of pursuit -- the Philistine army was completely shattered.

Summary: David gathers thirty thousand chosen men to bring the Ark of God from Baalah of Judah to Jerusalem. The Ark is placed on a new cart driven from the house of Abinadab, with Uzzah and Ahio guiding it. When the oxen stumble, Uzzah reaches out and steadies the Ark, and God strikes him dead on the spot. David, shaken with anger and fear, diverts the Ark to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite, where it remains three months and brings blessing. Hearing of that blessing, David returns to bring the Ark into Jerusalem with sacrifices every six steps, dancing before the LORD in a linen ephod with abandon. His wife Michal watches from a window and despises him. David installs the Ark in a tent, offers burnt offerings and peace offerings, blesses the people, and distributes food to every person. When he returns home, Michal confronts him for exposing himself before servant girls. David declares he was dancing before the LORD who chose him over Saul's house, and Michal remains childless to the day of her death.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter stages one of the Hebrew Bible's sharpest theological collisions: the holiness of God versus the enthusiasm of his worshipers. Uzzah's death is not a punishment for malice but for presumption — he treated the Ark as an object that needed human rescue rather than as the throne-seat of the living God. The same chapter that records sudden death for touching the Ark also records David's ecstatic, half-naked dancing before it. The difference is not proximity but posture: Uzzah reached for the Ark as if God needed help; David threw off his royal dignity as if God deserved everything. Michal's contempt for David's worship becomes a lens through which the narrative examines what it costs to worship without self-consciousness — and what it costs to withhold that worship. Her barrenness is not an arbitrary curse but a narrative verdict: the house of Saul, which clung to dignity over devotion, produces no heir.

Translation Friction: Verse 2 presents a textual difficulty: the Masoretic Text reads 'from Baalei Judah' (mibba'alei Yehudah), while the parallel in 1 Chronicles 13:6 identifies the location as Baalah, which is Kiriath-jearim. The name itself is theologically charged — ba'al can mean 'lord, master, owner' and is also the name of the Canaanite deity. Some manuscripts read 'from Baale-judah' as a place name; others treat it as 'from the lords/citizens of Judah.' The cause of Uzzah's death (v6-7) is described differently in the parallel account: here the MT reads ki shalach yado ('because he reached out his hand') while Chronicles specifies he touched the Ark. The word shegal in verse 7 (rendered 'error' or 'irreverence') is a hapax legomenon whose exact meaning is debated — proposals include 'rashness,' 'stumbling,' and 'irreverence.' David's ephod (v14) raises the question of whether a non-priest could legitimately wear priestly garments, and Michal's accusation about David 'uncovering himself' (v20) may imply the ephod was the only garment he wore.

Connections: This chapter completes the Ark's journey that began in 1 Samuel 4-6. The Ark left Shiloh for battle, was captured by the Philistines, returned to Beth-shemesh with death, sat dormant at Kiriath-jearim for decades, and now finally enters Jerusalem — again accompanied by both celebration and sudden death. The death of Uzzah echoes the deaths at Beth-shemesh (1 Samuel 6:19) and the deaths of Nadab and Abihu (Leviticus 10:1-2): in all three cases, well-intentioned proximity to holiness without proper protocol proves fatal. David's linen ephod connects him to Samuel, who wore a linen ephod as a boy serving at Shiloh (1 Samuel 2:18), and to the high priest's garments (Exodus 28:6-14). Michal's barrenness closes the door on any fusion of Saul's dynasty with David's — the house of Saul ends without issue. The tent David pitches for the Ark (v17) is deliberately not called the Tabernacle; the old Mosaic tent was at Gibeon (1 Chronicles 16:39), and David's tent represents something new — a provisional dwelling awaiting the permanent Temple his son will build (2 Samuel 7).

¹David again assembled every picked fighting man in Israel — thirty thousand. ²David set out with all the people who were with him from Baalah of Judah to bring up from there the Ark of God, over which a Name is invoked — the Name of the LORD of Armies, who is enthroned above the cherubim. ³They loaded the Ark of God onto a new cart and carried it from the house of Abinadab, which was on the hill. Uzzah and Ahio, sons of Abinadab, were driving the new cart. ⁴They brought it from the house of Abinadab on the hill, with the Ark of God, and Ahio was walking ahead of the Ark. ⁵David and the entire house of Israel were celebrating before the LORD with every kind of cypress-wood instrument — with lyres, harps, tambourines, rattles, and cymbals. ⁶When they came to the threshing floor of Nacon, Uzzah reached out toward the Ark of God and grabbed hold of it, because the oxen had stumbled. ⁷The anger of the LORD blazed against Uzzah, and God struck him down there for his irreverence. He died there beside the Ark of God. ⁸David burned with anger because the LORD had torn open a breach against Uzzah. He named that place Perez-uzzah — and it is called that to this day. ⁹David was afraid of the LORD that day. He said, "How can the Ark of the LORD ever come to me?" ¹⁰David was unwilling to move the Ark of the LORD to himself in the City of David. Instead, David diverted it to the house of Obed-edom the Gittite. ¹¹The Ark of the LORD remained in the house of Obed-edom the Gittite for three months, and the LORD blessed Obed-edom and his entire household. ¹²When King David was told, "The LORD has blessed the household of Obed-edom and everything he has because of the Ark of God," David went and brought the Ark of God up from the house of Obed-edom to the City of David with celebration. ¹³When the bearers of the Ark of the LORD had taken six steps, he sacrificed a bull and a fattened calf. ¹⁴David was whirling with all his strength before the LORD. David was wearing a linen ephod. ¹⁵David and the entire house of Israel brought the Ark of the LORD up with shouts of triumph and the sound of the ram's horn. ¹⁶As the Ark of the LORD entered the City of David, Michal daughter of Saul looked down through a window and saw King David leaping and whirling before the LORD — and she despised him in her heart. ¹⁷They brought the Ark of the LORD in and set it in its place inside the tent that David had pitched for it. Then David offered burnt offerings and peace offerings before the LORD. ¹⁸When David finished offering the burnt offerings and the peace offerings, he blessed the people in the name of the LORD of Armies. ¹⁹He distributed to all the people — to the entire assembly of Israel, both men and women — a loaf of bread, a portion of meat, and a raisin cake to each person. Then all the people went home. ²⁰David returned home to bless his household, and Michal daughter of Saul came out to meet him. She said, "How honored the king of Israel made himself today — exposing himself today before the eyes of his servants' slave girls, the way some worthless man strips himself bare!" ²¹David said to Michal, "It was before the LORD — who chose me over your father and over his entire house, appointing me as ruler over the LORD's people, over Israel — that I celebrated. And I will celebrate before the LORD. ²²I will make myself even lower than this — I will be humbled in my own eyes. But with those slave girls you mentioned? By them I will be honored." ²³And Michal daughter of Saul had no child to the day of her death.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayyosef ('he again gathered') implies a prior military assembly; David is repurposing his military infrastructure for a sacred mission. The term bachur ('chosen, picked') is a military term for select warriors in their prime. Thirty thousand men to escort the Ark is a statement of national priority: this is not a private errand but a state event. David treats the Ark's transfer as an operation requiring the same scale as warfare.
2. The location mibba'alei Yehudah is textually difficult. The parallel in 1 Chronicles 13:6 identifies this as Baalah, which is Kiriath-jearim (Joshua 15:9-10), where the Ark had rested since 1 Samuel 7:1. The phrase asher niqra shem shem ('over which a Name — the Name — is invoked') contains the unusual doubling of shem, likely for emphasis or as a scribal duplication. The divine title YHWH Tseva'ot ('LORD of Armies') appears for the first time in 1 Samuel 1:3 and becomes a dominant title in the prophets. The cherubim (keruvim) are the golden winged figures on the Ark's cover (Exodus 25:18-22) between which God's presence was understood to dwell.
3. The phrase ba-giv'ah ('on the hill') identifies Abinadab's house as being on elevated ground — the same location described in 1 Samuel 7:1 where the Ark was brought after leaving Beth-shemesh. Uzzah (Uzza, 'strength') and Ahio (Achy, 'his brother' or a proper name) are identified as Abinadab's sons — the family that has housed the Ark for approximately twenty years. The repeated emphasis on the cart being chadashah ('new') may echo the Philistine cart of 1 Samuel 6:7, subtly inviting the reader to notice that Israel is imitating pagan transport methods rather than following Mosaic protocol.
4. The verse restates the departure, with the added detail that Ahio walked in front of the Ark — presumably guiding the oxen or clearing the path. The repetition of the departure scene (overlapping with v3) is characteristic of Hebrew narrative style, adding a new detail with each pass. Ahio's position in front of the Ark and Uzzah's implied position beside or behind it will become critical in verses 6-7.
5. The verb mesachaqqim ('playing, celebrating, making merry') from the root s-ch-q conveys exuberant joy — this is not solemn liturgy but a street festival. The instruments listed form a complete ancient orchestra: kinnorot (lyres, stringed), nevalim (harps, larger stringed instruments), tuppim (tambourines, hand-drums), mena'an'im (rattles or sistrams — a shaken percussion instrument), and tsetselim (cymbals). The phrase bekhol atsei veroshim ('with all manner of cypress-wood instruments') likely refers to the wooden-bodied instruments. The parallel in 1 Chronicles 13:8 reads bekhol oz ('with all their might') instead, which some scholars consider the original reading. The celebration is wholehearted, full-bodied, and loud.
6. The threshing floor of Nacon (goren Nakhon) is identified in 1 Chronicles 13:9 as the threshing floor of Chidon — the name differs between accounts. Nakhon may mean 'fixed, established' — possibly a proper name or a descriptive term. The verb shamtu (from sh-m-t, 'to release, slip, drop') describes the oxen losing their footing or the cart lurching. The verb vayyochez ('he grabbed hold') indicates a firm grip, not a light touch — Uzzah seized the Ark to prevent it from falling.
7. The word hashal is a hapax legomenon — it occurs only here in the Hebrew Bible — and its meaning is debated. Proposals include 'rashness,' 'error,' 'irreverence,' and 'his stumbling' (taking it as related to the oxen's stumble). The Septuagint reads propetieia ('rashness'). The Chronicler's parallel (1 Chronicles 13:10) replaces this with 'because he stretched out his hand to the Ark.' The phrase vayyichar af YHWH ('the anger of the LORD burned') uses the standard idiom for divine wrath. The repetition of sham ('there') twice in the verse anchors Uzzah's death to the precise location — it becomes a place marked by death, which David will name in the next verse.
8. The verb parats ('to breach, break through') gives us the place name Perets Uzza ('Breach of Uzzah'). The same root appears in the name Perez (Genesis 38:29) and in descriptions of God 'breaking out' against people (Exodus 19:22, 2 Samuel 5:20). David's anger (vayyichar) mirrors God's anger from the previous verse — the same verb charah is used for both, creating a startling parallel between divine wrath and human outrage. The phrase ad hayyom hazzeh ('to this day') is the narrator's voice, indicating the name persisted long after the event.
9. The verb vayyira ('he feared') marks a sharp emotional turn from the anger of verse 8. David moves from charah (burning anger) to yare (fear, awe, dread) — the two responses are sequential, not contradictory. The question eikh yavo elai aron YHWH ('how can the Ark of the LORD come to me?') echoes the Beth-shemesh question of 1 Samuel 6:20 and anticipates the resolution in verse 12, when David hears that God has blessed Obed-edom's house and finds the courage to try again.

- 10. The phrase lo avah David ('David was not willing') expresses a deliberate refusal born of fear. The verb hissir ('to turn aside, divert') indicates the Ark was redirected from its intended destination. Obed-edom (Oved-Edom, 'servant of Edom') is called haGitti ('the Gittite'), which could mean he was from Gath (a Philistine city) or from Gath-rimmon (a Levitical city in Dan, Joshua 21:24). The Chronicler identifies him as a Levite (1 Chronicles 15:18, 21), which would explain why the Ark could legitimately rest at his house. If he was a Philistine convert from Gath, the irony is striking: the Ark that devastated Gath now blesses a Gittite's household.
- 11. The verb vayyeshev ('it remained, sat, dwelled') is the same verb used for human habitation — the Ark 'dwells' in Obed-edom's house as a guest. The phrase vayevarekh YHWH ('the LORD blessed') does not specify the nature of the blessing, but the context suggests material prosperity, fertility, and general flourishing. Three months is the same duration the Ark spent in each Philistine city during its captivity (cf. 1 Samuel 5), but now the result is blessing rather than plague.
- 12. The report that reaches David — berekh YHWH et beit Oved-Edom ('the LORD has blessed the house of Obed-edom') — is the turning point. What broke David's fear was not a theological argument but evidence: the Ark can bring life, not just death. The phrase besimchah ('with joy, gladness') marks a recovery from the terror of verse 9. David's fear has been replaced not by recklessness but by informed confidence. The Chronicler's account (1 Chronicles 15) specifies that David also corrected the transport method, appointing Levites to carry the Ark on their shoulders — he learned from Uzzah's death.
- 13. The key detail is nos'ei aron YHWH ('the bearers of the Ark of the LORD') — the verb nasa ('to carry, bear') indicates the Ark is now on human shoulders, not a cart. This corrects the error of verse 3. The phrase shishah tse'adim ('six steps') uses tsa'ad ('step, pace'), a specific measure of walking. The sacrifice of a shor umerio ('bull and fattened calf') is lavish — these are premium animals. Whether the sacrifice was a one-time confirmation or repeated at every six steps is grammatically ambiguous; the Chronicler mentions seven bulls and seven rams as the total (1 Chronicles 15:26).
- 14. The verb mekharker (from k-r-r) is rare in the Hebrew Bible and denotes whirling, spinning, or dancing in circles. It appears again in verse 16. The phrase bekhol oz ('with all his strength/might') emphasizes total physical commitment — this is not symbolic swaying but exhausting, full-body movement. The efod bad ('linen ephod') was a priestly undergarment (1 Samuel 2:18, 22:18) — lighter and less ornate than the high priest's decorated ephod of Exodus 28. That David wears only this garment means he has removed his royal clothing and dressed as a servant of God.
- 15. The word teru'ah ('shout, blast, war cry, acclamation') is the same term used for the shout at Jericho (Joshua 6:5) and the blasts on the Day of Atonement (Leviticus 25:9). It is not polite applause but a roar — the sound of a nation greeting its God. The shofar (ram's horn) is the quintessential instrument of divine encounter: it sounded at Sinai (Exodus 19:16), it will sound at the final ingathering (Isaiah 27:13). The combination of human voice (teru'ah) and sacred instrument (shofar) creates a wall of sound accompanying the Ark into Jerusalem.
- 16. Michal is called bat Sha'ul ('daughter of Saul') rather than 'wife of David' — a deliberate narrative choice that frames her reaction as an extension of Saul's house and its values. The verb nishqefah ('she looked down through') implies looking downward from an elevated position, reinforcing the spatial and emotional distance between her observation and David's participation. The verb mefazzez (from p-z-z, 'to leap, spring') is combined with mekharker ('whirling') to create a picture of wild, full-body movement. The verb bazah ('to despise') is the same verb used when Esau 'despised' his birthright (Genesis 25:34) — it indicates a fundamental devaluation of something.
- 17. The tent (ohel) David pitched is not the Mosaic Tabernacle (mishkan), which was at Gibeon (1 Chronicles 16:39, 2 Chronicles 1:3). David has prepared a new tent specifically for the Ark — a provisional shelter anticipating the permanent Temple he will later propose (2 Samuel 7). The verb vayyatssigu ('they set it') means to station or establish in a fixed position. The Ark now has bimqomo ('its place') — for the first time since leaving Shiloh, the Ark has a designated, permanent home. David offers olot (burnt offerings, entirely consumed) and shelamim (peace offerings, shared between God and worshipers) — a complete liturgy of dedication combining total consecration and communal celebration.
- 18. David performs a priestly function: vayevarekh et ha'am ('he blessed the people'). The blessing is given beshem YHWH Tseva'ot ('in the name of the LORD of Armies') — the same divine title used in verse 2 to describe the God enthroned above the Ark's cherubim. David acts as both king and mediator, bridging the people and God. The priestly blessing was normally a Levitical prerogative (Numbers 6:22-27), but David's assumption of this role fits the broader pattern of this chapter: he wears a priestly ephod, he offers sacrifices, and he blesses the assembly. He is acting as priest-king, a role that will later be theologized in Psalm 110.
- 19. The distribution covers kol hamon Yisra'el ('the entire multitude of Israel') and explicitly includes both men (me'ish) and women (ve'ad ishah) — a notable specification in ancient Near Eastern royal generosity. The three items are: challat lechem (a ring-shaped bread loaf), eshpar (a debated term — possibly a portion of meat, a date cake, or a measured portion; the exact meaning is uncertain), and ashishah (a raisin cake, pressed dried fruit). These are festival foods, not staples — David is not feeding the hungry but celebrating with the nation. The final clause vayyeylekh kol ha'am ish leveito ('all the people went each to his house') sets up the domestic confrontation that follows: everyone goes home satisfied, and David goes home to Michal.
- 20. Michal is again identified as bat Sha'ul ('daughter of Saul'), reinforcing the dynastic tension. The verb niglah ('he uncovered himself') from g-l-h is loaded with connotations of nakedness and shame — the same root used for sexual exposure in Leviticus 18 and 20. The comparison kehiggallot niglot achad hareqim ('as one of the worthless men shamelessly exposes himself') uses the infinitive absolute for emphasis: thorough, complete exposure. The word reqim ('empty, worthless') is a social judgment — Michal sees David's behavior as beneath his station. Her objection is not moral but aristocratic.

- 21. The phrase asher bachar bi me'avikh ('who chose me over your father') uses the verb bachar ('to choose, elect'), the same verb used for God's election of Israel. David locates his authority not in royal dignity but in divine election. The title nagid ('ruler, designated leader') is the same title given to Saul at his anointing (1 Samuel 9:16) and to David at his (1 Samuel 25:30) — David is claiming Saul's title by divine right. The verb sichaqti ('I celebrated, played') from s-ch-q is the same root used in verse 5 for Israel's celebration — David identifies his dancing as continuous with the nation's worship.
- 22. The verb neqalloti (from q-l-l, 'to be light, trivial, cursed') is the opposite of nikhbad (from k-v-d, 'to be honored, heavy') — David accepts being 'light' in order to be 'heavy' with God. The phrase vehayiti shapal be'ainai ('I will be lowly in my own eyes') anticipates a theology of humility that runs through the Psalms attributed to David. The final clause immam ikkaveda ('by them I will be honored') uses the same k-v-d root: the slave girls will give David the kavod that Michal withholds. David is redefining where honor comes from: not from royal bearing but from abandoned worship.
- 23. The phrase lo hayah lah yaled ('she had no child') uses the simple existential construction — there was no child for her. The text does not specify whether this was divine punishment, David's decision to stop relations with her, or natural infertility — the ambiguity is deliberate. The phrase ad yom motah ('until the day of her death') makes the barrenness permanent and final. Michal is called bat Sha'ul one last time — her identity as Saul's daughter, not David's wife, is the lens through which the narrative frames her fate. The verse functions as a closing verdict on the Saulide dynasty: it produces no future.

Summary: David, now settled in his cedar palace with rest from his enemies on every side, proposes to build a permanent temple for the Ark of God. The prophet Nathan initially approves, but that night the LORD sends Nathan back with a stunning reversal: God does not need David to build Him a house (bayit, 'temple'); instead, God will build David a house (bayit, 'dynasty'). The oracle traces God's faithfulness from the day He took David from following sheep, through the promise of a secure place for Israel, to the climactic announcement: David's offspring will sit on an eternal throne, and God will be a father to David's son. When the son sins, God will discipline him with human instruments but will never withdraw His loyal love as He withdrew it from Saul. David's throne, dynasty, and kingdom will endure forever. David enters the tent of the Ark and responds with one of the most profound prayers in Scripture -- a prayer of astonishment, gratitude, and bold faith that takes God at His word and asks Him to do exactly what He has promised.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains the foundational oracle of the Davidic covenant, one of the two or three most consequential theological moments in the Hebrew Bible. The entire chapter turns on a single Hebrew word -- bayit -- which means both 'house' (a physical building, a temple) and 'house' (a dynasty, a royal lineage). David wants to build God a bayit; God responds by promising to build David a bayit. This wordplay is not decorative -- it is the theological engine of the passage. God reframes the entire relationship between divine and human initiative: David's impulse to do something for God is answered by God's determination to do something far greater for David. The unconditional nature of the promise is striking: unlike the Sinai covenant with its blessings and curses, the Davidic covenant survives even the sin of David's descendants. God will discipline but never abandon. This promise reverberates through the rest of the Hebrew Bible -- in the Psalms (especially 89 and 132), in the prophets (Isaiah 9, 11; Jeremiah 23, 33; Ezekiel 34, 37), and ultimately in the messianic hope that shapes Second Temple Judaism. David's prayer in response (vv. 18-29) is remarkable for its theological sophistication: David does not merely thank God but interrogates the nature of divine promise-making, marvels at the uniqueness of Israel's God, and boldly asks God to fulfill what He has spoken -- turning prayer into a claim on the divine word.

Translation Friction: Several features of this chapter demand careful handling. First, the bayit wordplay -- the pivot of the entire oracle -- is invisible in most English translations because English uses different words for 'temple' and 'dynasty.' A rendering that fails to preserve the single-word ambiguity loses the theological architecture of the passage. We retain 'house' throughout and use expanded renderings to surface the wordplay at every occurrence. Second, the relationship between this oracle and the word 'covenant' (berit) is complex: the word berit never appears in 2 Samuel 7 itself. It is applied retroactively in Psalm 89:3-4, 28-37 and in David's last words (2 Samuel 23:5). We render the passage as covenantal in nature while noting this terminological absence. Third, verse 14's promise that God will be 'a father' to David's son and will discipline him 'with the rod of men' raises the question of whether the oracle refers to Solomon specifically, to the Davidic line generally, or to an eschatological figure. The Hebrew text supports all three readings simultaneously, and we do not collapse the ambiguity. Fourth, David's prayer in verse 19 contains the famously difficult phrase ve-zot torat ha-adam ('and this is the law/instruction of humanity'), which has generated centuries of interpretive debate. We render it transparently and discuss the options in the translator notes.

Connections: The Davidic covenant stands alongside the Abrahamic covenant (Genesis 12, 15, 17) and the Sinai covenant (Exodus 19-24) as one of the three great covenantal pillars of the Hebrew Bible. God's promise to Abraham of land, offspring, and blessing finds its royal crystallization here: David's 'seed' (zera, v. 12) echoes Abraham's 'seed,' and the promise of an everlasting kingdom extends the Abrahamic 'everlasting covenant.' The oracle explicitly recalls the Exodus and conquest traditions (vv. 6-7, 23-24), anchoring the Davidic promise in the larger story of God's redemption of Israel from Egypt. Nathan's prophecy will be tested almost immediately: Solomon will build the temple (1 Kings 5-8) but also fall into idolatry (1 Kings 11), triggering the division of the kingdom -- yet the promise holds, and Judah retains a Davidic king. The prophets return to this chapter repeatedly: Isaiah's Emmanuel prophecy (7:14) and the shoot from Jesse's stump (11:1), Jeremiah's righteous Branch (23:5-6), and Ezekiel's shepherd-prince (34:23-24) all presuppose Nathan's oracle. Psalm 89 is an extended meditation on the Davidic covenant's apparent failure after the exile, wrestling with how God's 'forever' can coexist with the collapse of the monarchy. The chapter also connects backward to 2 Samuel 6, where David brought the Ark to Jerusalem -- having installed God's presence in a tent, David now proposes to upgrade the dwelling, and God responds by upgrading David's entire future.

¹When the king had settled into his house and the LORD had given him rest on every side from all his enemies, ²the king said to Nathan the prophet, "Look -- I am living in a house of cedar, while the Ark of God sits inside tent curtains." ³Nathan said to the king, "Whatever is in your heart -- go, do it. The LORD is with you." ⁴But that very night, the word of the LORD came to Nathan: ⁵"Go and say to my servant David: This is what the LORD declares -- Will you build me a house for me to dwell in? ⁶I have not dwelt in a house from the day I brought the children of Israel up from Egypt until this day. Instead, I have been moving about in a tent -- in a tabernacle. ⁷In all my traveling with the children of Israel, did I ever speak a word to any of the tribes of Israel -- those I commanded to shepherd my people Israel -- saying, 'Why have you not built me a house of cedar?'" ⁸"Now then, say this to my servant David: This is what the LORD of Armies declares -- I took you from the pasture, from following the flock, to be ruler over my people, over Israel. ⁹I have been with you wherever you went. I cut down all your enemies before you. And I will make your name great -- like the name of the greatest in the earth. ¹⁰I will establish a place for my people Israel and plant them there, so that they may dwell in their own land and be disturbed no more. The sons of injustice will no longer oppress them as they did before -- ¹¹from the time I appointed judges over my people Israel. I will give you rest from all your enemies. And the LORD declares to you that the LORD will build you a house. ¹²When your days are complete and you lie down with your ancestors, I will raise up your offspring after you -- one who will come from your own body -- and I will establish his kingdom. ¹³He is the one who will build a house for my name, and I will establish the throne of his kingdom forever. ¹⁴I myself will be a father to him, and he will be a son to me. When he goes astray, I will discipline him with a human rod and with blows that people inflict. ¹⁵But my loyal love will never be withdrawn from him, as I withdrew it from Saul, whom I removed from before you. ¹⁶Your house and your kingdom will stand firm before you forever. Your throne will be established forever." ¹⁷Nathan spoke to David in accordance with all these words and this entire vision. ¹⁸King David went in and sat before the LORD. He said: "Who am I, Lord GOD, and what is my house, that you have brought me this far? ¹⁹And even this was too small in your eyes, Lord GOD -- you have spoken concerning your servant's house far into the future. And this is the charter for humanity, Lord GOD! ²⁰What more can David say to you? You yourself know your servant, Lord GOD. ²¹For the sake of your word and in accordance with your own heart, you have done all this greatness -- and revealed it to your servant. ²²This is why you are great, Lord GOD -- there is no one like you, and there is no God besides you, according to everything we have heard with our own ears. ²³And who is like your people Israel -- a singular nation on earth -- for whom God went out to redeem them as His own people? You made a name for yourself and did great and fearsome things for your land, driving out nations and their gods before your people whom you redeemed from Egypt. ²⁴You established your people Israel as your own forever. And you, LORD, became their God. ²⁵And now, LORD God, the word you have spoken concerning your servant and his house -- establish it forever and do as you have spoken. ²⁶Let your name be magnified forever, so that it will be said, 'The LORD of Armies is God over Israel!' And let the house of your servant David be established before you. ²⁷For you, LORD of Armies, God of Israel, have uncovered your servant's ear by saying, 'I will build you a house.' That is why your servant has found the courage to pray this prayer to you. ²⁸And now, Lord GOD -- you are God, and your words are truth, and you have spoken this good thing to your servant. ²⁹Now then, be pleased to bless the house of your servant so that it will endure forever in your presence -- for you, Lord GOD, have spoken it. And by your blessing, let the house of your servant be blessed forever.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase yashav ha-melekh be-veito ('the king sat/settled in his house') uses yashav in its sense of permanent dwelling -- David has taken up residence, not merely paused. The word beito ('his house') is the first occurrence of bayit in a chapter that will use it in radically different senses. Here it means David's physical palace; by verse 11, it will mean David's eternal dynasty.
1. The verb heniach ('gave rest') from nuach is theologically loaded. Deuteronomy 12:10-11 promises that when God gives Israel rest from their enemies, they will bring their offerings to the place God chooses. David's situation precisely fulfills this Deuteronomic condition -- rest has been granted, and David's impulse to build a temple is the natural next step in the covenantal logic. The irony is that God will accept the impulse but redirect the builder.
2. The phrase beit arazim ('house of cedars') refers to David's palace constructed from Lebanese cedar, a luxury material that signified royal power throughout the ancient Near East. Cedar was prized for its durability, fragrance, and resistance to insects. That David has a cedar palace while God has a tent is the disproportion that drives his proposal.
2. The word yeri'ah ('curtain, tent-panel') refers to the fabric panels of the tabernacle. The Ark has been housed in a tent since David brought it to Jerusalem in chapter 6. David's sensitivity to this contrast reveals a king who thinks theologically about architecture: physical structures express relational realities. If God is Israel's true King, His dwelling should surpass the dwelling of Israel's human king.
3. Nathan's immediate approval is prophetic intuition without prophetic revelation -- he speaks from his own judgment, not from a divine oracle. His reasoning is sound by human standards: David's track record of divine favor makes the temple proposal seem like a natural next step. The phrase YHWH immakh ('the LORD is with you') is the recurring refrain of David's life (1 Samuel 16:18, 18:12, 18:14), and Nathan invokes it as warrant for David's plan. But God has not yet spoken, and that night God will override Nathan's endorsement.
3. The phrase kol asher bilvavekha ('all that is in your heart') gives David blanket approval based on his character and God's evident blessing. Nathan will learn before dawn that even a prophet's well-reasoned counsel must yield to direct divine speech. This correction is gentle -- God does not rebuke Nathan -- but the reversal demonstrates that prophetic authority rests not in the prophet's wisdom but in God's word.
4. The phrase ba-laylah ha-hu ('that very night') signals urgency: God does not let Nathan's unauthorized approval stand even until morning. The divine word arrives with the speed of a correction that cannot wait. The formula devar-YHWH ('the word of the LORD') marks the transition from Nathan's human judgment to genuine prophetic revelation. Everything that follows -- the entire Davidic covenant -- is framed as direct divine speech delivered through the prophetic channel that night.
4. The timing is significant: revelation comes in the night, when human plans have been laid and human endorsements given. God waits until the day's conversation is complete, then speaks into the darkness with a word that will reshape Israel's entire future.
5. The rhetorical question ha-attah tivneh-li bayit leshivti ('Will you build me a house to dwell in?') uses the emphatic pronoun attah ('you') in a position of stress. Hebrew does not normally require an explicit pronoun with the verb (the conjugation already indicates the subject), so its presence here is emphatic and slightly incredulous: 'Will YOU -- you, David -- build ME a house?' The implied contrast is between human initiative and divine sovereignty.
5. The title avdi ('my servant') applied to David is one of the highest honors in the Hebrew Bible, placing David in the company of Abraham, Moses, and the prophets. The term expresses not degradation but intimate relationship and commissioned authority.
6. The verb mithallekh (hitpael participle of halakh, 'to walk') describes continuous, habitual movement. God has been 'walking about' -- the same verbal form used of God walking in the Garden of Eden (Genesis 3:8, mithallekh ba-gan). The tabernacle is not a prison but a means of divine mobility, allowing God to accompany Israel through wilderness and war.
6. The pairing of ohel ('tent') and mishkan ('tabernacle, dwelling-place') refers to the portable sanctuary constructed at Sinai (Exodus 25-27). The mishkan is literally 'the dwelling-place' -- from the root shakan ('to dwell, to tabernacle'). God has been dwelling (shakan) without needing a permanent dwelling (bayit). The theological point is that divine presence does not require human architecture.
7. The parallel text in 1 Chronicles 17:6 reads 'judges of Israel' (shoftei Yisra'el) where 2 Samuel 7:7 reads 'tribes of Israel' (shivtei Yisra'el). The difference is a single consonant (shin-bet-tet vs. shin-peh-tet). Many scholars regard the Chronicles reading as more original, since 'judges' pairs naturally with the verb 'commanded to shepherd.' The MT of Samuel may preserve a scribal error, but we follow the received text while noting the variant.
7. The verb lir'ot ('to shepherd') from the root ra'ah places Israel's rulers in the category of shepherds -- the dominant metaphor for kingship in the ancient Near East and in the Hebrew Bible. God appointed these shepherd-rulers, and none of them was asked to build a temple. The implication is that temple-building is not the essence of faithful leadership; shepherding God's people is.

8. The word naveh ('pasture, meadow, dwelling-place for flocks') places David's origins in the rural landscape of Bethlehem. The phrase me'achar ha-tson ('from behind the flock') captures the shepherd's position -- walking behind the sheep, guiding them. God took David from this position and made him nagid ('ruler, prince, designated leader'). The term nagid is distinct from melek ('king') and carries the sense of one appointed and commissioned by God, rather than one who inherits or seizes a throne.
8. The divine title YHWH tseva'ot ('the LORD of Armies') appears here for the first time in the oracle, adding military weight to the declaration. The God who commands the armies of heaven is the same God who plucked David from a sheep pasture -- divine sovereignty operates across the full spectrum from pastoral humility to cosmic power.
9. The verb vaakritah ('I cut off, cut down') from karat uses the same root as 'to cut a covenant' (karat berit), creating an ironic echo: God 'cuts' David's enemies even as He is about to 'cut' a covenant for David's benefit. The phrase mippanekha ('from before your face') means God cleared the path ahead of David -- his enemies were removed before he arrived.
9. The promise ve'asiti lekha shem gadol ('I will make you a great name') echoes the Abrahamic promise of Genesis 12:2 (va'agaddelah shemekha, 'I will make your name great'). The Davidic covenant is being woven into the fabric of the Abrahamic covenant -- David inherits the trajectory of blessing that began with Abraham. The 'great ones of the earth' (ha-gedolim asher ba-arets) refers to the legendary rulers and empire-builders of the ancient world. God promises David a reputation to rival any of them.
10. The verb unta'tiv ('I will plant him/them') uses the metaphor of planting -- Israel is a tree that God will root in its own soil, stable and permanent. This agricultural image for national settlement appears throughout the prophets (Amos 9:15, Jeremiah 24:6, 32:41). A planted people cannot be uprooted by human force.
10. The phrase benei-avlah ('sons of wickedness/injustice') is a Semitic idiom meaning 'wicked people' or 'agents of injustice' -- those who belong to the category of avlah ('wrongdoing, perversion of justice'). The term encompasses both foreign oppressors and internal tyrants. The promise that they will no longer 'afflict' (le'annoto, from anah, 'to oppress, humble, cause suffering') Israel envisions a future of security that transcends any single military victory.
11. The clause ki-bayit ya'aseh-lekha YHWH ('for a house the LORD will make for you') reverses the entire direction of the conversation. The word bayit now means 'dynasty, royal house' -- the same word David used for 'temple' is repurposed for 'lineage.' The verb ya'aseh ('will make, will build') has God as its subject: God is the builder, David is the recipient. This reversal is the core theological move of the Davidic covenant.
11. The grammar is emphatic: bayit is placed before the verb for emphasis -- 'A HOUSE the LORD will build for you.' The focus falls on the house itself, on its nature as something God constructs rather than something David constructs. The declaration is presented as both promise and announcement: God 'tells' (higgid) David what He intends to do, using the language of prophetic revelation.
12. The phrase yimle'u yamekha ('your days will be full/complete') is a dignified way of referring to death that emphasizes the fullness of life rather than its end. The idiom veshakhavta et-avotekha ('you will lie down with your ancestors') is the standard Hebrew expression for death and burial, carrying no implications about an afterlife but expressing continuity with the ancestral line.
12. The verb vahaqimoti ('I will raise up') from qum ('to rise, to stand') is used for establishing something that will endure. God raises up David's seed as one raises a building -- setting it in place so it stands. The verb vahakinoti ('I will establish') from kun ('to be firm, to be established') intensifies the promise: this kingdom will not merely exist but will be made stable, secure, and permanent.
13. The pronoun hu ('he') is emphatic: 'HE will build a house for my name' -- not you, David, but your son. The identification with Solomon is implicit but clear from the narrative context. The phrase lishmi ('for my name') introduces the 'name theology' that will dominate the Deuteronomistic understanding of the temple: God's shem ('name') dwells in the temple as a mode of divine presence that maintains God's transcendence while affirming His accessibility.
13. The phrase ad-olam ('forever, into perpetuity') appears here for the first time in the oracle and will recur in verses 16, 24-25, and 29. The word olam does not mean 'eternal' in a timeless philosophical sense but 'into the far distant future, beyond the visible horizon, as far as the eye of time can see.' It expresses permanence within the framework of ongoing history rather than abstraction from history.
14. The formula ani ehyeh-lo le-av vehu yihyeh-li le-ven ('I will be to him a father and he will be to me a son') is adoption language -- the formal declaration by which a father claims a son. This formula appears in ancient Near Eastern adoption contracts and here establishes the Davidic king as God's adopted son. The relationship is covenantal, not ontological: the king does not become divine but enters a relationship of filial privilege and responsibility.
14. The phrase be-shevet anashim ('with a rod of men/humans') has been interpreted in two ways: (1) God will use human agents -- enemy nations, political adversaries -- as His rod of discipline; (2) the discipline will be proportionate to human capacity, not the devastating judgment God could unleash directly. Both readings are compatible. The word nega ('blow, plague, stroke') from naga ('to touch, to strike') refers to afflictions that leave a mark -- the discipline will be real and painful, not merely verbal.
15. The word chesed ('loyal love, covenant faithfulness, steadfast love, mercy, kindness') is one of the most theologically dense words in the Hebrew Bible. It combines the ideas of loyalty, love, faithfulness, and obligation within a covenantal relationship. When God promises that His chesed will not depart (lo-yasur) from David's son, He is pledging the full weight of His covenantal character -- not merely warm feelings but binding, active, enduring commitment.

15. The verb hasiroti ('I removed') from sur ('to turn aside, remove') is used twice: God removed His chesed from Saul, and God removed Saul from before David. The parallelism makes withdrawal of chesed and removal from power equivalent events. What happened to Saul will never happen to David's line. This is an extraordinary and unparalleled promise in the Hebrew Bible.
16. The Masoretic Text reads lefanekha ('before you'), meaning David will see or know that his dynasty endures. The Septuagint and some Hebrew manuscripts read lefanai ('before me'), meaning the dynasty endures before God. Either reading is theologically powerful: the MT suggests David himself witnesses the enduring promise; the LXX suggests the dynasty stands perpetually in God's presence.
16. The threefold structure -- house, kingdom, throne -- moves from bloodline (bayit) to realm (mamlakhah) to seat of power (kisse). All three are modified by ad-olam ('forever'). This is the fullest expression of the Davidic covenant's scope: it promises not just a surviving family but a functioning kingdom with real authority, extending into a future without visible end.
17. The narrator confirms that Nathan delivered the oracle faithfully: kekhol ha-devarim ha-elleh ('according to all these words') and kekhol ha-chizzayon ha-zeh ('according to all this vision'). The word chizzayon ('vision') from the root chazah ('to see, to perceive prophetically') classifies the revelation as visionary -- Nathan received it not merely as words but as a prophetic vision in the night. The verse serves as a narrative seal: what God said, Nathan said. The prophetic transmission is complete and accurate.
17. This verse also marks a structural break in the chapter. The oracle (vv. 4-16) is complete; David's prayer (vv. 18-29) is about to begin. The narrator's summary bridges the two halves, confirming that David received the full content of the divine word before he responds to it.
18. The verb vayyeshev ('he sat') before the LORD is unusual. The normal posture for prayer or worship was standing or prostration. Some scholars interpret this as David sitting on the ground in overwhelmed humility; others see it as the posture of a vassal receiving terms from a suzerain. Either way, David is positioned before the Ark -- the visible sign of God's presence -- in a posture of sustained contemplation rather than quick petition.
18. The double question mi anokhi ('who am I?') and umi beiti ('what is my house?') uses the emphatic first-person pronoun anokhi rather than the common ani, adding weight and formality to the question. David asks about both himself and his dynasty, recognizing that the promise extends beyond his own person to his entire lineage.
19. The phrase ve-zot torat ha-adam ('and this is the torah/instruction of humanity') is famously difficult. The word torah means 'instruction, law, teaching, direction' -- it is the word for the Mosaic law but has a broader semantic range encompassing any authoritative instruction or established principle. Ha-adam means 'the human being, humanity, humankind.' Possible renderings include: 'this is the law for humanity,' 'this is the way you deal with humans,' 'this is the charter for the human race,' or even 'this is the destiny of humankind.' The Chronicler's parallel (1 Chronicles 17:17) reads differently, suggesting the phrase was already obscure in antiquity.
19. The verb vatiqtan ('it was small, it was insufficient') reveals God's generosity in theological terms: the past blessings were not the full measure of what God intended. They were the prelude, not the climax. God's promise extends lemerachok ('to a distant point, far into the future') -- the dynasty is not for David's generation alone but for a future David cannot see.
20. David's question is not despair but the silence of a man who has run out of adequate words. The phrase mah-yosif David od ledabber elekha ('what can David add further to speak to you?') acknowledges that no human response can match the magnitude of what God has promised. David refers to himself in the third person -- 'What can David say?' -- a rhetorical device that creates distance between the speaker and the enormity of what he is processing.
20. The clause ve-attah yada'ta et-avdekha ('you know your servant') turns the conversation from David's inadequate knowledge to God's perfect knowledge. David cannot fully articulate what he feels, but God already knows. The verb yada ('to know') in Hebrew implies intimate, comprehensive knowledge -- not mere awareness but deep understanding of character, need, and heart.
21. David identifies two sources for God's action: ba'avur devarekha ('for the sake of your word') and kelibbekha ('according to your heart'). The first points to God's faithfulness to His own prior commitments -- the promises to Abraham, to Israel, to David through Samuel. The second points to God's own character and desire -- God does this because He wants to, because it flows from who He is. Together they describe a God whose actions are both principled (grounded in His word) and personal (flowing from His heart).
21. The verb lehodia ('to make known, to reveal') adds a dimension of revelation: God has not only acted but has disclosed His plan to David. The promise would have been effective even if David never knew about it, but God chooses to reveal it -- making David a conscious participant in the covenant rather than an unwitting beneficiary.
22. The phrase ein kamokha ('there is none like you') asserts divine incomparability -- not merely that God is the greatest among gods but that no being in the same category exists. The parallel clause ve-ein Elohim zulatekha ('there is no God besides you') moves from incomparability to exclusivity: God is not merely the best; He is the only.
22. The phrase bekhol asher-shama'nu be-ozneinu ('according to all that we have heard with our ears') grounds the theological claim in Israel's collective historical memory. The 'we' shifts from David alone to the entire community -- Israel's tradition of divine acts, transmitted orally from generation to generation, is the evidence base for monotheistic faith.
23. The phrase goy echad ba-arets ('one/singular nation on the earth') emphasizes Israel's unique status -- not one of many but the only one of its kind. The word echad ('one') echoes the Shema's declaration of God's oneness (Deuteronomy 6:4): as God is one, so Israel is one.

- 23. The text of this verse is notoriously difficult in the MT, with shifts between second and third person and between singular and plural that suggest either textual corruption or a rhetorical style that freely alternates perspectives. The parallel in 1 Chronicles 17:21 is smoother and may preserve a less corrupted form. The phrase goyim ve-elohav ('nations and their gods') is striking: God drove out not only the human inhabitants of Canaan but their gods as well. The Exodus and conquest were a defeat of rival deities, not merely rival armies.
- 24. The verb vattekhonen ('you established') from kun ('to set firmly, to establish') is the same root used for the establishment of David's throne in verse 16. God established Israel as His people with the same permanence He promises to David's dynasty. The phrase lekha le-am ad-olam ('as a people for you forever') binds Israel to God in an unbreakable relationship: Israel belongs to God, and God belongs to Israel, and this mutual belonging extends ad-olam.
- 24. The concluding phrase ve-attah YHWH hayita lahem le-Elohim ('and you, LORD, became their God') is the covenant formula in its simplest form -- the declaration that defines the Sinai relationship (Exodus 6:7, Leviticus 26:12). David places the Davidic covenant within the larger framework of God's covenant with Israel: the promise to David's house is an extension of God's commitment to His people.
- 25. The imperative haqem ('establish!') from qum ('to stand, to rise') is remarkably bold -- David is issuing a command to God. But the command is grounded entirely in God's prior word: David does not invent a request but asks God to fulfill His own promise. This pattern -- praying God's promises back to God -- becomes a model for Israelite prayer and appears throughout the Psalms.
- 25. The phrase ka'asher dibbarta ('as you have spoken') makes God's word the standard of fulfillment. David is not asking for more than God promised or for something different; he is asking for exactly what God said. This grounds the prayer in divine reliability rather than human desire.
- 26. David's prayer links God's reputation to the Davidic dynasty: when people see the enduring house of David, they will magnify the name of the LORD of Armies. The phrase yigdal shimkha ad-olam ('let your name be great forever') connects the Davidic covenant to the Abrahamic promise of a great name (Genesis 12:2) and to God's own purpose in the Exodus (to make a name for Himself, v. 23). The fulfillment of the promise to David becomes evidence for the greatness of David's God.
- 26. The final clause u-veit avdekha David yihyeh nakhon lefanekha ('the house of your servant David will be established before you') uses nakhon ('established, firm, fixed') -- the same word from verse 16. David echoes God's own vocabulary, demonstrating that his prayer is shaped by the divine oracle he received.
- 27. The idiom galita et-ozen ('you uncovered the ear') appears in 1 Samuel 9:15 and 20:2 and means 'to reveal, to disclose privately.' The image is intimate: God pulls back the covering from David's ear and speaks a word meant for him alone. This private revelation is the ground of David's public prayer.
- 27. The phrase matsa et-libbo ('found his heart') is a Hebrew idiom meaning 'to summon the courage, to find the resolve.' The heart (lev) in Hebrew is the seat of will, thought, and decision -- not merely emotion. David found within himself the will and the courage to approach God with this prayer. The implication is that without the promise, David would not have had the boldness (or the content) for such a prayer.
- 28. The phrase attah-hu ha-Elohim ('you -- you are THE God') uses the emphatic pronoun hu ('he') as a copula, creating a declaration of identity: you and no one else are God. This is not generic theism but the specific monotheistic confession of Israel.
- 28. The clause u-devarekha yihyu emet ('your words will be / are truth') uses emet in its fullest sense: truth, faithfulness, reliability, permanence. The root aman (from which emet derives) is the root of 'amen' and of ne'eman ('faithful, established') used of David's house in verse 16. God's word is 'amen' -- confirmed, established, trustworthy. David's entire prayer rests on this foundation: if God's words are emet, then the promise to David's house is as secure as the character of God Himself.
- 29. The verb ho'el ('be willing, be pleased, consent') is a remarkably gentle word for a prayer's climax. David does not demand or plead; he asks God to be willing. The word carries the sense of gracious consent -- David trusts that God will find it good to do what He has promised.
- 29. The final clause umibbirkatekha yevorakh beit-avdekha le-olam ('from your blessing, let the house of your servant be blessed forever') creates a theological closed loop: God's blessing is both the cause and the content of the prayer. David asks for nothing outside of what God has already given; he simply asks that the blessing continue doing what blessings do -- extending, enduring, multiplying. The word olam appears here for the last time in the chapter, bringing the 'forever' theme to its conclusion. The house that God builds, the throne that God establishes, and the blessing that God speaks will endure into a future that only God can see.

Summary: David wages a series of devastating military campaigns that transform Israel from a regional tribal kingdom into a small empire. He defeats the Philistines and breaks their power, subjugates Moab with brutal severity, crushes Hadadezer king of Zobah and the Aramean forces who come to his aid, garrisons Damascus, subdues Edom, and receives tribute from Hamath. The chapter concludes with a summary of David's administration: he reigns over all Israel, executing justice and righteousness for his entire people, supported by a cabinet of named officials who manage military, priestly, scribal, and administrative functions.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter functions as a theological catalogue of fulfilled promise. The narrator compresses what must have been years of warfare into a single rapid-fire account, and the repetitive structure -- David struck, the LORD gave victory, David struck, the LORD gave victory -- is deliberate. The refrain vayyosha YHWH et-David bekhoh asher halakh ('the LORD gave David victory wherever he went') appears twice (verses 6 and 14), framing the entire military narrative as divine action through a human agent. David is not conquering by his own strength; the LORD is fulfilling the territorial promises made to Abraham (Genesis 15:18) and delivering the security promised to David through Nathan (2 Samuel 7:9-11). The chapter's concluding verse -- David executing mishpat u-tsedakah ('justice and righteousness') for all his people -- is the narrator's verdict on David at his zenith: this is what a king looks like when he governs under covenant with God.

Translation Friction: The treatment of Moab in verse 2 is jarring and has troubled readers for centuries. David measures the Moabite captives with a cord, executing two-thirds and sparing one-third. No explanation is given for this severity, which is especially striking because David had previously entrusted his own parents to the king of Moab's protection (1 Samuel 22:3-4) and his great-grandmother Ruth was a Moabite. The narrator offers no moral commentary -- the act is simply recorded. Some rabbinic traditions suggest a Moabite betrayal of David's family provoked this response, but the text itself is silent. The verb vaymaddem ('he measured them') suggests a deliberate, systematic process rather than battlefield rage, which makes the act more unsettling, not less. We translate what the Hebrew says without softening or explaining away the difficulty. The numbers of chariots, horsemen, and foot soldiers vary between the MT and Chronicles parallel (1 Chronicles 18), presenting textual difficulties in verses 4-5 that we note where relevant.

Connections: The territorial conquests fulfill the Abrahamic land grant of Genesis 15:18, which promised territory from the River of Egypt to the Euphrates. David's empire, reaching to the Euphrates via the defeat of Zobah and Damascus, represents the maximum historical extent of that promise. The Nathanic covenant of 2 Samuel 7 promised David rest from enemies and a great name -- chapter 8 records the fulfillment of both. The gold shields taken from Hadadezer's servants and the bronze from his cities (vv. 7-8) anticipate Solomon's temple construction, as the narrator explicitly notes that Solomon later used these materials. The closing formula -- mishpat u-tsedakah -- connects David to the royal ideal articulated in the Psalms (Psalm 72:1-2, 89:14) and the prophetic expectation of the future Davidic king (Isaiah 9:7, Jeremiah 23:5), who will reign with justice and righteousness. David at this moment embodies the covenant ideal that later kings will fail to sustain.

¹Some time later, David struck down the Philistines and brought them under his control. David took the bridle of the mother-city from the Philistines' hand. ²He also struck down Moab. He made them lie on the ground and measured them with a cord: two cord-lengths were marked for execution, and one full cord-length to be kept alive. Moab became subject to David, bringing tribute. ³David also struck down Hadadezer son of Rehob, king of Zobah, as Hadadezer was going to reassert his control at the Euphrates River. ⁴David captured from him one thousand seven hundred horsemen and twenty thousand foot soldiers. David hamstringed all the chariot horses but kept enough for a hundred chariots. ⁵When the Arameans of Damascus came to help Hadadezer king of Zobah, David struck down twenty-two thousand Aramean soldiers. ⁶David stationed garrisons in Aram of Damascus, and the Arameans became subject to David, bringing tribute. The LORD gave David victory wherever he went. ⁷David took the gold shields that had belonged to Hadadezer's officers and brought them to Jerusalem. ⁸From Betah and Berothai, cities belonging to Hadadezer, King David took an enormous quantity of bronze. ⁹Wh en Toi king of Hamath heard that David had defeated the entire army of Hadadezer, ¹⁰Toi sent his son Joram to King David to greet him with peace and to congratulate him on his victory in battle against Hadadezer -- for Hadadezer had been at war with Toi. Joram brought with him vessels of silver, gold, and bronze. ¹¹King David consecrated these as well to the LORD, along with the silver and gold he had consecrated from all the nations he had subdued: ¹²from Aram, from Moab, from the Ammonites, from the Philistines, from Amalek, and from the plunder taken from Hadadezer son of Rehob, king of Zobah. ¹³David made a name for himself when he returned from striking down eighteen thousand Edomites in the Valley of Salt. ¹⁴He stationed garrisons in Edom -- throughout all Edom he stationed garrisons -- and all the Edomites became subject to David. The LORD gave David victory wherever he went. ¹⁵David reigned over all Israel, and David administered justice and righteousness for his entire people. ¹⁶Joab son of Zeruiah commanded the army. Jehoshaphat son of Ahilud served as royal herald. ¹⁷Zadok son of Ahitub and Ahimelech son of Abiathar served as priests. Seraiah served as royal scribe. ¹⁸Benaiah son of Jehoiada commanded the Cherethites and the Pelethites. And David's sons served as royal advisors.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase meteg ha-ammah is notoriously difficult. Meteg means 'bridle, bit' -- the device used to control a horse. Ammah can mean 'cubit' (a unit of measure), 'forearm,' or 'mother-city' (the metropolitan center of a region). The most coherent reading treats ammah as 'mother-city' (i.e., the capital), making the whole phrase a metaphor for seizing political control: David took the bridle -- the instrument of governance -- from the Philistine capital. The Chronicles parallel (1 Chronicles 18:1) replaces the idiom with the literal statement that David captured Gath and its daughter-towns.
1. The verb vayyakni'em ('he subdued them, brought them into subjection') from the root kana' indicates permanent subordination, not merely a battlefield victory. This is the decisive end of Philistine independence. The nation that captured the Ark, killed Saul, and terrorized Israel for generations is now a vassal state.
2. The verb vaymaddedem ('he measured them') from the root madad ('to measure, stretch out') is typically used for measuring land or materials. Its application to human captives lying on the ground creates a disturbing image of dehumanization -- people treated as territory to be divided. The phrase hashkev otam artsah ('making them lie on the ground') places the captives in the posture of total submission, face-down in the dirt.
2. The word minchah ('tribute, gift, offering') is the same term used for grain offerings brought to God. When applied to vassal tribute, it carries overtones of compulsory worship -- the subjected nation must continually bring offerings to acknowledge the overlord's supremacy. Moab's tribute to David mirrors what Israel owed to God alone.
3. Hadadezer (hadad-ezer, 'Hadad is help') bears a theophoric name invoking Hadad, the Aramean storm god -- the chief deity of the Aramean pantheon. His father Rehob ('broad place, open square') is otherwise unknown. Zobah was a powerful Aramean kingdom located in the Beqa Valley of modern Lebanon, controlling territory between Damascus and Hamath. It was the dominant Aramean state of the period, and its defeat would have sent shockwaves through the entire region.
3. The phrase lehashiv yado binehar-Perat ('to restore his hand/control at the River Euphrates') is ambiguous in its subject. Most naturally it refers to Hadadezer going to reassert his authority at the Euphrates -- perhaps to reclaim territory from a rival or to reinforce his northern frontier -- when David intercepted him. This campaign brought David's power to the Euphrates, fulfilling the geographic scope of the Abrahamic promise (Genesis 15:18).
4. The textual numbers here differ from the Chronicles parallel. The MT of 2 Samuel 8:4 reads 'one thousand and seven hundred horsemen' (elef usheva-me'ot parashim), while 1 Chronicles 18:4 reads 'one thousand chariots and seven thousand horsemen.' The discrepancy likely reflects either a scribal confusion between similar-looking Hebrew numerals or different textual traditions. We follow the MT of 2 Samuel.
4. The verb vay'aqqr ('he hamstrung') from the root aqar ('to uproot, sever the tendon') describes the deliberate crippling of horses by cutting the rear leg tendons. This was a known ancient practice for neutralizing captured chariot forces you did not intend to use. David's decision to hamstring rather than keep these horses aligns with the Deuteronomic kingship law prohibiting the multiplication of horses (Deuteronomy 17:16), though the narrator does not cite that law explicitly.
5. Aram Dammeseq ('Aram of Damascus') refers to the Aramean kingdom centered on Damascus, distinct from Zobah. Damascus intervened as an ally of Zobah, likely because Hadadezer's defeat would leave Damascus exposed as the next target -- which is exactly what happened. The Aramean coalition failed to contain David, and the result was the loss of twenty-two thousand men and the garrisoning of Damascus itself.
5. The verb vayyakh ('he struck') from nakah is the chapter's dominant verb -- it appears repeatedly as David strikes one enemy after another. The narrator's relentless repetition creates a drumbeat of conquest: David struck the Philistines, struck Moab, struck Hadadezer, struck Aram. The verb carries the force of decisive military defeat, not merely skirmishing.
6. The term netsivim ('garrisons, deputies, pillars') from the root natsav ('to stand, be stationed') refers to military outposts with standing troops. These are permanent occupying forces, not temporary camps. The same word described the Philistine garrisons in Israelite territory in 1 Samuel 10:5 and 13:3 -- a deliberate reversal. Israel once groaned under foreign garrisons; now David plants his own in foreign capitals.

6. The refrain vayyosha YHWH et-David bekhoh asher halakh ('the LORD saved/gave-victory-to David wherever he went') uses the verb yasha ('to save, deliver, give victory') -- the same root as the names Joshua and Jesus. The narrator attributes David's military success entirely to divine action. This refrain appears again in verse 14, bracketing the conquest narrative in a theological frame: everything between these two statements is the LORD's doing.
7. The shiltei ha-zahav ('shields of gold') were likely ceremonial or parade shields carried by Hadadezer's elite guard -- not battlefield equipment but symbols of royal wealth and military prestige. The word shelet can mean 'shield' or 'quiver,' but the gold construction points to ornamental function. By bringing them to Jerusalem, David transfers the symbols of Aramean royal power to his own capital, visually declaring Jerusalem the new center of regional authority.
7. The phrase el avdei Hadadezer ('belonging to the servants/officers of Hadadezer') uses avadim in its sense of 'royal officials, courtiers' -- high-ranking military officers, not slaves. These were the king's personal retinue, and their golden equipment represented the wealth of the Zobahite court. According to 1 Kings 14:26, Shishak of Egypt later carried these shields away when he invaded Jerusalem under Rehoboam.
8. The place names Betah and Berothai appear as Tibhath and Cun in the Chronicles parallel (1 Chronicles 18:8), suggesting either variant traditions or different names for the same locations. Both were cities in the Zobahite kingdom, likely in the northern Beqa Valley of modern Lebanon, an area rich in mineral resources.
8. The phrase nechoshet harbeh me'od ('bronze very much exceedingly') piles up intensifiers to emphasize the staggering quantity. Nechoshet can refer to either copper or bronze (a copper-tin alloy); in this military context, bronze is more likely, as it was the primary metal for weapons, armor, and ceremonial objects in the ancient Near East before the full iron age.
9. Hamath was a major city-state on the Orontes River in what is now central Syria, located north of Zobah. Toi (called Tou in 1 Chronicles 18:9) was evidently a rival or enemy of Hadadezer, which explains his enthusiastic response to David's victory. The phrase kol-cheil Hadadezer ('the entire army of Hadadezer') emphasizes the totality of the defeat -- not a single engagement but the complete destruction of Zobah's military capacity.
9. The geopolitical logic is clear: Hadadezer had been the dominant power in the region, and his neighbors either served him or competed with him. His destruction creates a power vacuum that David fills. Toi's embassy in the next verse is the response of a pragmatic king: better to befriend the new superpower than to resist it.
10. The name Joram (yoram, 'the LORD is exalted') is a Yahwistic name, which is surprising for the son of an Aramean king. The Chronicles parallel gives his name as Hadoram (haduram, 'Hadad is exalted'), which fits an Aramean theophoric pattern. The Samuel text may reflect an Israelite adaptation of the name, or Joram may have adopted a Yahwistic name for diplomatic purposes when approaching David's court.
10. The phrase ish milchamot To'i hayah Hadadezer ('a man of wars of Toi was Hadadezer') is compressed but clear: Hadadezer had been Toi's persistent military adversary. The kelei-kesef ukelei-zahav ukelei nechoshet ('vessels of silver and vessels of gold and vessels of bronze') represent portable wealth of the highest order -- diplomatic gifts that doubled as tribute and would later be consecrated to the LORD (verse 11).
11. The verb hiqdish from the root q-d-sh ('to be holy, set apart') is the technical term for dedicating something to sacred use -- removing it from the profane sphere and assigning it to God. When David consecrates the spoils, he is making a theological claim about the purpose of his conquests: the wealth belongs to the LORD who gave the victories.
11. The verb kibbesh ('he subdued, conquered') from the root k-b-sh means 'to tread down, bring into bondage, subdue.' It is the same verb used in Genesis 1:28 for humanity's mandate to 'subdue the earth.' David's dominion over the nations mirrors, in miniature, the creational mandate -- though the narrator is careful to attribute David's success to the LORD, not to David's inherent authority.
12. This verse functions as a catalogue of David's empire, listing the conquered peoples in geographic sweep: Aram (northeast), Moab (east), Ammon (east-southeast), Philistia (west), Amalek (south), and Zobah (far north). The list represents a nearly complete circle around Israel, demonstrating that David has secured his borders in every direction. The mention of Ammon anticipates the war narrated in chapters 10-12, while Amalek recalls David's earlier campaigns from his Ziklag days (1 Samuel 27:8, 30:1-20).
12. The phrase mishellal Hadadezer ('from the plunder of Hadadezer') singles out the Zobahite spoils as a separate and particularly significant category, likely because of the enormous quantity of bronze noted in verse 8. Hadadezer's defeat was the crown jewel of David's campaigns, and his spoils merited special mention.
13. The MT reads Aram but the context demands Edom. The Valley of Salt (gei-melach) is located near the southern end of the Dead Sea, well within Edomite territory. The Chronicles parallel (1 Chronicles 18:12) reads Edom, as does the Psalm title of Psalm 60. The confusion arises because the Hebrew letters dalet (ד) and resh (ר) are nearly identical, differing by a single stroke. We render 'Edomites' following the geographic logic and the parallel texts.
13. The phrase vayyaas David shem ('David made a name for himself') directly fulfills the Nathanic promise of 2 Samuel 7:9, where God declared ve'asiti lekha shem gadol ('I will make you a great name'). The narrator uses the identical vocabulary to connect military conquest to covenant promise.
14. The repetition bekhoh-Edom sam netsivim ('throughout all Edom he placed garrisons') is emphatic in Hebrew -- the narrator says it twice to stress the completeness of the occupation. No region of Edom was left ungarrisoned. The Edomite subjugation lasted until the reign of Jehoram (2 Kings 8:20-22), when Edom revolted and regained independence.

14. The refrain vayyosha YHWH et-David bekhoh asher halakh appears here for the second and final time, identical to verse 6. This literary bracketing (inclusio) turns the entire conquest narrative into a theological statement: everything within these markers is the LORD's saving action through David. The verb yasha ('to deliver, save, give victory') keeps the focus on God as the true warrior.
15. The verb vayyimlokh ('he reigned') from the root m-l-k marks a transition from the military catalogue to the administrative summary. The phrase al-kol-Yisra'el ('over all Israel') is significant: David now rules the united kingdom -- all twelve tribes, north and south -- a unity that will fracture permanently under his grandson Rehoboam.
15. The phrase oseh mishpat u-tsedakah ('doing/executing justice and righteousness') uses the active participle oseh, indicating ongoing, habitual action -- not a single act of justice but a continuous pattern of governance. This is what David does as a matter of course. The word pair mishpat u-tsedakah appears together throughout the Hebrew Bible as the definitive description of godly rule (Genesis 18:19, 1 Kings 10:9, Psalm 89:14, Isaiah 5:7, Jeremiah 22:3).
16. The administrative list that follows in verses 16-18 is a royal cabinet roster, a standard feature of ancient Near Eastern royal records. Joab's position al-ha-tsava ('over the army') made him the highest military official in the kingdom -- commander-in-chief of all Israelite forces. His appointment is unsurprising given his role throughout David's rise, though his methods (the murders of Abner and later Amasa) cast a shadow over his tenure.
16. The title mazkir for Jehoshaphat is often translated 'recorder' but more accurately describes a royal herald or chief of protocol -- the official responsible for public proclamations, diplomatic communications, and the administration of state affairs. The root z-k-r ('to remember, mention, proclaim') suggests the mazkir was the king's voice and institutional memory, managing the official narrative and bureaucratic records of the kingdom.
17. The genealogy of this verse presents a difficulty: elsewhere Abiathar is called the son of Ahimelech (1 Samuel 22:20), not the reverse. The phrase Ahimelekh ben-Evyatar ('Ahimelech son of Abiathar') may reflect a textual corruption, a grandson bearing his grandfather's name, or a reversal of father-son names in the transmission of the text. The Chronicles parallel (1 Chronicles 18:16) reads the same, suggesting the variation is ancient.
17. The title sofer ('scribe') for Seraiah (called Shavsha in 1 Chronicles 18:16) designates the royal secretary -- a position of enormous importance in ancient Near Eastern administration. The sofer managed royal correspondence, treaties, tax records, census data, and legal documents. The word derives from the root s-p-r ('to count, recount, write'), indicating both literary and administrative functions.
18. The Cherethites (kerethi) and Pelethites (pelethi) appear throughout the David narratives as the king's personal guard force (2 Samuel 15:18, 20:7, 23). The Cherethites are connected etymologically and geographically to Crete (Caphtor), and their presence in David's guard reflects the cosmopolitan nature of his military -- a king who attracts foreign warriors to his service. The Pelethites may derive from palat ('to escape, deliver') suggesting 'runners' or 'couriers,' or from pelishti ('Philistine') in an abbreviated form.
18. The phrase uvnei David kohanim hayu ('and the sons of David were kohanim') is rendered 'served as royal advisors' because the context demands a non-priestly meaning. David's sons were from the tribe of Judah, not Levi, and could not have served as priests in the Levitical sense. The word kohen has a broader semantic range including 'minister, chief officer, one who officiates' -- a meaning preserved in the Chronicles parallel which reads harishonim le'ayad hammelekh ('the chief ones at the king's side'). The term reflects an early, pre-centralized usage of kohen for any person serving in a position of intimate authority.

Summary: David, now secure on the throne over all Israel, asks whether any survivor remains from Saul's house to whom he can show faithful love for Jonathan's sake. A former servant of Saul named Ziba informs him that Jonathan's son Mephibosheth is alive, crippled in both feet, living in obscurity at the house of Machir in Lo-debar. David summons Mephibosheth, who falls on his face in terror, expecting execution. Instead, David restores to him all the land that belonged to Saul, assigns Ziba and his household to work the land on Mephibosheth's behalf, and grants Mephibosheth a permanent place at the king's table -- the same honor given to a royal son. Mephibosheth eats at David's table for the rest of his life.

What Makes This Remarkable: *This chapter is the fulfillment of the covenant David swore to Jonathan in 1 Samuel 20:14-17 and 1 Samuel 20:42, where Jonathan made David promise to show chesed to his descendants forever. David does not merely refrain from killing Saul's remaining heir -- the expected political move for a new dynasty -- he actively seeks him out, restores his inheritance, and elevates him to the status of a royal son. The phrase 'he shall eat at my table' appears four times in this short chapter (verses 7, 10, 11, 13), hammering its significance: the table of the king is the place of belonging, provision, and protection. Mephibosheth's crippled feet, mentioned at both the beginning and end of the chapter, frame the narrative with his vulnerability -- he cannot run, cannot fight, cannot flee. He is entirely dependent on David's faithfulness to a dead man's covenant. The theological weight is unmistakable: this is what chesed looks like when it has the power to act. David's* question in verse 1 -- 'Is there still anyone left?' -- echoes God's own covenant-seeking posture throughout Scripture, the divine impulse to find someone on whom to lavish faithful love.

Translation Friction: The name Mephibosheth itself presents difficulty. The form in the MT appears to derive from mephi-boshet ('from the mouth of shame'), but this is almost certainly a scribal alteration of the original Merib-baal ('contender of Baal' or 'Baal is advocate'), preserved in 1 Chronicles 8:34 and 9:40. The scribes replaced the theophoric element ba'al ('lord/master,' also the name of the Canaanite deity) with boshet ('shame') -- a theological censoring that occurs with other names in Samuel (compare Ish-bosheth for Esh-baal). We retain the MT form Mephibosheth since it is the text we are rendering, but the reader should know the original name carried no shame. The town Lo-debar (verse 4) may itself be significant: the name can be parsed as lo-davar ('no-thing' or 'no-word'), suggesting a place of nothingness or desolation. Whether this is folk etymology or genuine wordplay, the narrative effect is potent -- Mephibosheth has been living in a place whose name means 'nothing,' and David brings him to the king's table. Mephibosheth's self-description as a 'dead dog' (verse 8) is the lowest possible self-assessment in ancient Near Eastern culture, combining the uncleanness of a dog with the worthlessness of a corpse.

Connections: The covenant chain runs directly from 1 Samuel 18:3 (Jonathan cuts a covenant with David), through 1 Samuel 20:14-17 (Jonathan extracts David's promise to show chesed to his house forever), to this chapter where David fulfills that oath. The phrase chesed Elohim ('faithful love of God') in verse 3 is extraordinary -- David is not merely showing human kindness but enacting the very chesed that God shows to His covenant partners. This language connects to Exodus 34:6-7, where YHWH proclaims Himself as rav chesed ('abounding in faithful love'). The restoration of Saul's land anticipates the Jubilee principle of Leviticus 25, where alienated land returns to its original family. Mephibosheth eating at the king's table 'like one of the king's sons' (verse 11) echoes the adoption language of covenant theology -- the outsider brought inside, the vulnerable made secure. David's treatment of Mephibosheth stands in sharp contrast to the standard ancient Near Eastern practice of eliminating a predecessor's surviving family to prevent rival claims (seen in the Jehu narratives of 2 Kings 10).

¹David said, "Is there still anyone remaining from the house of Saul, so that I may show him faithful love for Jonathan's sake?" ²Now the house of Saul had a servant whose name was Ziba. They summoned him before David, and the king said to him, "Are you Ziba?" He said, "Your servant." ³The king said, "Is there no one left from the house of Saul, so that I may show him the faithful love of God?" Ziba said to the king, "There is still a son of Jonathan -- crippled in his feet." ⁴The king said to him, "Where is he?" Ziba said to the king, "He is in the house of Machir son of Ammiel, in Lo-debar." ⁵King David sent and brought him from the house of Machir son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar. ⁶When Mephibosheth son of Jonathan son of Saul came before David, he fell on his face and prostrated himself. David said, "Mephibosheth." He answered, "Here is your servant." ⁷David said to him, "Do not be afraid, because I will certainly show you faithful love for the sake of Jonathan your father. I will restore to you all the land of Saul your grandfather, and you yourself will eat at my table continually." ⁸He prostrated himself and said, "What is your servant, that you would turn your attention to a dead dog like me?" ⁹The king summoned Ziba, Saul's attendant, and said to him, "Everything that belonged to Saul and to his entire house I have given to your master's son." ¹⁰You will work the land for him -- you, your sons, and your servants. You will bring in the harvest so that your master's son will have food. But Mephibosheth, your master's son, will eat at my table continually." Now Ziba had fifteen sons and twenty servants. ¹¹Ziba said to the king, "Your servant will do exactly as my lord the king commands his servant." And Mephibosheth ate at David's table like one of the king's own sons. ¹²Mephibosheth had a young son whose name was Mica. And everyone living in Ziba's household served Mephibosheth. ¹³So Mephibosheth lived in Jerusalem, because he ate continually at the king's table. He was crippled in both his feet.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase ha-ki yesh od ('is there still anyone?') carries an urgency that suggests David has been thinking about this obligation and is now acting on it. The particle ki intensifies the question -- David is not idly wondering but actively inquiring with purpose.
1. The phrase ba'avor Yehonatan ('for Jonathan's sake') grounds the entire chapter's action in a relationship between David and a dead man. Everything that follows -- the inquiry, the summoning, the land restoration, the table invitation -- flows from David's faithfulness to Jonathan's memory and to the covenant they swore.

2. Ziba is identified as an eved ('servant, slave') of the house of Saul -- someone who survived the collapse of the Saulide household and retained knowledge of its affairs. His survival and availability suggest he had adapted to the new political reality. His terse response avdekha ('your servant') is the standard formula of submission before a king, but it also signals a transfer of loyalty: Ziba was Saul's servant, but he now addresses David as master.
2. The fact that David already knows Ziba's name ('Are you Ziba?') suggests prior intelligence-gathering. David has done his homework before this audience. The scene is not spontaneous generosity but deliberate covenant fulfillment.
3. The phrase chesed Elohim ('faithful love of God') appears nowhere else in the historical narratives with this exact force. David is not saying 'godly kindness' in a generic sense -- he is declaring that the chesed he intends to perform participates in and reflects the chesed that God Himself exercises toward covenant partners. This elevates the entire chapter from political generosity to theological enactment.
3. Ziba's description of Mephibosheth as nekeh raglayim ('crippled in his feet') is the same phrase used in the narrator's introduction in 4:4. The repetition emphasizes that Mephibosheth's disability is his defining social reality -- in the ancient world, a man who could not walk unaided was excluded from military leadership, priestly service, and most forms of political power. Ziba may be subtly reassuring David: this surviving heir poses no political threat.
4. David's question eifoh hu ('where is he?') is immediate -- there is no deliberation, no council, no weighing of political risk. The king hears that Jonathan's son exists and instantly moves to locate him. This urgency characterizes chesed in action: it does not calculate, it acts.
4. Machir son of Ammiel is a man of means in the Transjordan region who has been sheltering Mephibosheth. He will reappear in 2 Samuel 17:27-29, providing supplies to David during Absalom's rebellion -- suggesting he is a loyalist to David's house despite harboring Saul's grandson. Lo-debar is in Gilead, east of the Jordan, far from the centers of Israelite power. The name Lo-debar can be parsed as lo-davar ('nothing' or 'no-word'), suggesting a place of obscurity and desolation -- Jonathan's son has been living in the land of nothing, hidden from both danger and dignity.
5. The verb vayiqqachehu ('and he took/fetched him') carries the weight of royal authority -- David did not send an invitation but a summons. Mephibosheth had no choice in this matter, which explains the terror of his response in the next verse. From Mephibosheth's perspective, a royal summons to the grandson of the previous king could mean only one thing: execution. The narrative's power depends on the gap between what Mephibosheth expects and what David intends.
5. The repetition of the full location -- the house of Machir son of Ammiel, from Lo-debar -- slows the narrative deliberately. The reader is meant to feel the distance: from the land of nothing to the palace of the king.
6. The full genealogical identification -- Mephibosheth ben Yehonatan ben Sha'ul -- is rare three-generation naming that serves a dual purpose. It identifies Mephibosheth as the legitimate heir of both Jonathan and Saul, and it reminds the reader (and David) exactly who is prostrate on the floor: the grandson of the king David replaced and the son of the friend David loved.
6. The verbs vayippol al-panav vayishtachu ('he fell on his face and prostrated himself') describe the full prostration of a subject before a king -- face to the ground, body flat. For a man crippled in both feet, this posture would have been physically difficult and painful to assume. Mephibosheth's single word hinneh ('here') combined with avdekha ('your servant') is the response of a man who believes he is about to die and is submitting to whatever comes. David speaks only the name: 'Mephibosheth.' It is an address that recognizes personhood before delivering a verdict.
7. The phrase al tira ('do not be afraid') recognizes what Mephibosheth is experiencing: mortal terror. David does not dismiss the fear or pretend it is irrational. In the ancient Near East, a new dynasty routinely exterminated the previous royal family. Mephibosheth's fear is entirely justified; David's response is entirely extraordinary.
7. The word tamid ('continually, always, perpetually') at the end of the sentence transforms the table invitation from a single gesture into a permanent arrangement. This is not a banquet invitation but a change of status. Mephibosheth will eat at the king's table for the rest of his life -- he becomes, in effect, an adopted member of the royal household.
8. The dog metaphor appears throughout the David narratives as the ultimate expression of worthlessness. Goliath asked David, 'Am I a dog?' (1 Samuel 17:43). Abner raged at being called a 'dog's head' (2 Samuel 3:8). But only Mephibosheth calls himself a dead dog -- the superlative of the superlative of worthlessness. David's response to this self-assessment is not words but actions: he has already pronounced the verdict of chesed, and no amount of self-deprecation will change it.
8. The verb panita ('you have turned') from the root panah means to turn one's face toward someone -- to pay attention, to regard. Mephibosheth is astonished that the king's face has turned toward him at all. In a court culture where the king's gaze conferred status and his turned back meant rejection, David's decision to face Mephibosheth is itself an act of honor.
9. David now addresses Ziba as na'ar Sha'ul ('attendant/servant of Saul'), reminding both Ziba and the court that his primary loyalty obligation is to the Saulide house, not to David. The royal decree is comprehensive: kol asher hayah le-Sha'ul u-le-khol beito ('everything that belonged to Saul and to his entire house'). This includes agricultural land, estates, and whatever property rights the crown had confiscated or held in trust after Saul's death.
9. The phrase natatti le-ven adonekha ('I have given to the son of your master') uses the perfect tense -- the gift is already decided and irrevocable. David is not offering or promising; he has given. The legal transfer is complete by royal decree. By calling Mephibosheth 'the son of your master,' David also reestablishes the social hierarchy: Ziba served Saul, and he will now serve Saul's heir.

10. David's instructions create a two-tier arrangement. Ziba and his household -- a substantial labor force of fifteen sons and twenty servants, totaling thirty-five workers plus their families -- will farm Saul's restored estates and deliver the produce to Mephibosheth. This ensures Mephibosheth has both income from the land and status at the royal table. The word ve-avadta ('and you will work/serve') uses the root avad, which means both 'to serve' and 'to work the ground' (the same verb used for Adam's task in Genesis 2:15). Ziba is being assigned to serve the land on Mephibosheth's behalf.
10. The repetition of al shulchani tamid ('at my table continually') for the second time reinforces that Mephibosheth's place at the king's table is not a temporary honor but a permanent status. The narrator's aside about Ziba's household size establishes the scale of the operation -- this is not a small garden but a significant agricultural enterprise requiring dozens of workers.
11. Ziba's response is formulaic obedience: ke-khol asher yetsavveh adoni ha-melekh et avdo, ken ya'aseh avdekha ('according to all that my lord the king commands his servant, so your servant will do'). The language is correct and complete, but subsequent events (2 Samuel 16:1-4; 19:24-30) will raise serious questions about Ziba's true loyalty -- he will later accuse Mephibosheth of treason during Absalom's rebellion, and the truth of that accusation is never fully resolved.
11. The narrator's concluding statement is the chapter's theological climax: u-Mephiboshet okhel al shulchani ke-achad mi-bney ha-melekh ('and Mephibosheth ate at his table like one of the king's sons'). The phrase ke-achad mi-bney ha-melekh ('like one of the king's sons') is adoption language -- Mephibosheth is given the status, provision, and dignity of a royal son without being a biological son. This is the fullest expression of chesed: the covenant outsider is brought inside and treated as family.
12. The notice about Mica (Mikha) extends the narrative's horizon into the next generation. Jonathan's line continues through Mephibosheth to Mica, and 1 Chronicles 8:35-38 traces the genealogy further still. David's chesed has preserved not merely an individual but a lineage.
12. The final clause -- ve-khol moshav bet Tsiva avadim li-Mephiboshet ('and all who dwelt in Ziba's house were servants to Mephibosheth') -- establishes the new social order. Ziba's entire household, including his fifteen sons and twenty servants, is subordinate to the crippled grandson of Saul. The reversal is complete: the man who lived in the land of nothing now commands a workforce of dozens.
13. The word pisasech ('lame, limping, crippled') is a stronger term than the earlier nekeheh raglayim ('struck in the feet'). It describes a permanent, visible disability. The narrator places this detail last, after the table and the city, to create a final image that refuses sentimentality: Mephibosheth is honored, provided for, and permanently injured. Chesed does not undo the past; it redeems the present.
13. The fourfold repetition of eating at the king's table (verses 7, 10, 11, 13) creates a literary inclusio that frames the entire chapter. The table is the dominant symbol: it represents belonging, provision, protection, and dignity. For a man who cannot stand, the table is the great equalizer -- seated, Mephibosheth is indistinguishable from any of the king's sons.

Summary: Following the death of Nahash king of Ammon, David sends ambassadors to express covenant loyalty to Nahash's son Hanun. Hanun's advisors convince him that the delegation is a cover for espionage, and Hanun humiliates David's men by shaving half their beards and cutting their garments at the hip. When the Ammonites realize they have made themselves repugnant to David, they hire Aramean mercenaries from Beth-rehob, Zobah, Maacah, and Tob. Joab splits the Israelite army, taking the elite troops against the Arameans while assigning Abishai the Ammonite front. Joab delivers a remarkable speech: 'Be strong, and let us prove ourselves strong for the sake of our people and the cities of our God -- and may the LORD do what is good in His eyes.' Israel routs both the Arameans and the Ammonites. When Hadadezer rallies a second Aramean coalition from beyond the Euphrates, David personally leads the army to Helam and destroys it. The Aramean vassals make peace with Israel and refuse to help Ammon again.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter contains one of the most theologically significant battlefield speeches in the Hebrew Bible. Joab's exhortation in verse 12 combines human resolve with radical divine submission: 'Be strong' (chazaq) is a command for maximum human effort, but 'may the LORD do what is good in His eyes' surrenders the outcome entirely to God's sovereign judgment. Joab does not say 'the LORD will give us victory' -- he says the LORD will do whatever the LORD considers good. This is not triumphalism but covenantal realism: we fight with everything we have, and then we trust God with the result, even if the result is defeat. The speech is all the more striking because it comes from Joab, a man remembered elsewhere for ruthless pragmatism, political murder, and self-interest. Here, at the moment of genuine military crisis with enemies closing from two directions, Joab articulates a theology of warfare that David himself could not have said better.

Translation Friction: The relationship between David and Nahash is never explained. Verse 2 states that Nahash 'showed chesed' to David, but the narrative provides no account of what this loyalty looked like. The most common scholarly reconstruction suggests Nahash supported David during his fugitive years on the principle that 'my enemy's enemy is my friend' -- Nahash and Saul were adversaries (1 Samuel 11), and David was Saul's refugee. This would mean the chesed between them was political alliance rather than personal affection, though David treats it as a genuine obligation. The Hebrew of verse 6 names the Aramean contingents in a way that creates geographic difficulties: the 'Arameans of Beth-rehob' and the 'Arameans of Zobah' may overlap, since Beth-rehob appears to be associated with Zobah elsewhere. The numbers -- twenty thousand foot soldiers, plus the king of Maacah with a thousand, and the men of Tob with twelve thousand -- represent a massive mercenary force, underscoring the severity of the threat.

Connections: This chapter is the immediate prelude to the Bathsheba crisis. The narrator places the Ammonite war here so that the reader understands the military context of 2 Samuel 11:1 -- 'at the time when kings go out to battle... David remained in Jerusalem.' The siege of Rabbah that begins in this chapter does not conclude until 12:26-31, creating a narrative frame around David's adultery and murder. Joab's speech in verse 12 echoes the chazaq ('be strong') commands given to Joshua (Joshua 1:6-9) and anticipates David's final charge to Solomon (1 Kings 2:2). The humiliation of David's ambassadors -- beard-shaving and garment-cutting -- is an assault on masculine honor and national dignity that parallels the ancient Near Eastern treaty-violation motif: to humiliate a king's envoys is to humiliate the king himself and to declare the relationship void. David's response, sending the men to Jericho until their beards regrow, shows both compassion for their shame and restraint before military action.

¹Some time after this, the king of the Ammonites died, and his son Hanun succeeded him on the throne. ²David said, "I will show faithful love to Hanun son of Nahash, just as his father showed faithful love to me." So David sent his servants to offer Hanun condolences for his father. When David's servants arrived in Ammonite territory, ³the Ammonite commanders said to Hanun their lord, "Do you really think David is honoring your father by sending you these men to offer condolences? Has David not sent his servants to you to scout the city, spy out its defenses, and prepare to overthrow it?" ⁴So Hanun seized David's servants, shaved off half of each man's beard, cut their robes at the waist so that their buttocks were exposed, and sent them away. ⁵When David was told what had happened, he sent messengers to meet the men, because they were deeply humiliated. The king said, "Stay in Jericho until your beards have grown back, and then return." ⁶When the Ammonites realized they had made themselves repulsive to David, they sent and hired the Arameans of Beth-rehob and the Arameans of Zobah -- twenty thousand foot soldiers -- along with the king of Maacah with one thousand men, and twelve thousand men from Tob. ⁷When David heard this, he dispatched Joab with the entire army -- the professional warriors. ⁸The Ammonites marched out and formed their battle line at the entrance of the city gate, while the Arameans of Zobah and Rehob, along with the men of Tob and Maacah, took position separately in the open field. ⁹When Joab saw that the battle lines were closing on him from the front and from behind, he selected the best fighters in all Israel and deployed them against the Arameans. ¹⁰The rest of the troops he placed under the command of his brother Abishai, who deployed them to face the Ammonites. ¹¹He said, "If the Arameans prove too strong for me, you will come to reinforce me. And if the Ammonites prove too strong for you, I will come to reinforce you. ¹²Be strong! Let us prove ourselves strong for the sake of our people and the cities of our God -- and may the LORD do what is good in His eyes." ¹³Joab advanced with his troops into battle against the Arameans, and they fled before him. ¹⁴When the Ammonites saw that the Arameans had fled, they also broke and ran from Abishai, retreating into the city. Joab then withdrew from the Ammonite campaign and returned to Jerusalem. ¹⁵When the Arameans saw that they had been routed by Israel, they regrouped as a unified force. ¹⁶Hadadezer sent messengers and mobilized the Arameans from beyond the Euphrates River. They assembled at Helam, with Shobach, commander of Hadadezer's army, leading them. ¹⁷When David received the report, he mustered all Israel, crossed the Jordan, and marched to Helam. The Arameans formed their battle lines to meet David and engaged him in combat. ¹⁸The Arameans fled before Israel. David destroyed seven hundred Aramean chariot crews, forty thousand cavalry, and struck down Shobach the army commander, who died on the field. ¹⁹When all the vassal kings under Hadadezer saw that they had been crushed before Israel, they made peace with Israel and became subject to them. From that point on, the Arameans were afraid to come to the aid of the Ammonites again.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase vayehi acharei-khen ('it happened after this') is a standard temporal connector linking this episode to the preceding narrative of David's consolidation of power. The Ammonite king is not named here, though verse 2 will identify him as Nahash. The succession formula -- vayyimlokh beno tachtav ('his son reigned in his place') -- is the standard Hebrew expression for dynastic transition, the same formula used across Kings and Chronicles.
1. The Ammonites (benei Ammon, literally 'sons of Ammon') occupied the territory east of the Jordan, centered on the capital Rabbah (modern Amman, Jordan). The death of a king and the accession of a new ruler was a moment of diplomatic vulnerability in the ancient Near East -- alliances had to be reaffirmed, and new kings were often tested by neighbors probing for weakness.
2. The verb e'eseh-chesed ('I will do/show chesed') uses the same construction found in David's covenant language with Jonathan (1 Samuel 20:14-15). Chesed is not mere kindness but obligated loyalty flowing from relationship -- David is not being generous; he is paying a debt. The preposition im ('with') marks the relational dimension: chesed is always done with someone, never merely to them.
2. The verb lenachamo ('to comfort him') from the root nacham carries the sense of consolation in grief, the same root found in the name Nahash's own name is unrelated (nachash, 'serpent'). The delegation be-yad avadav ('by the hand of his servants') indicates these are official emissaries -- the 'hand' idiom means 'through the agency of.' These are not casual visitors but royal representatives whose treatment reflects directly on David's honor.
3. The phrase ha-mekhabbed David et-avikha be'einekha ('is David honoring your father in your eyes?') uses the verb kibbed ('to honor, give weight to') with a skeptical interrogative force -- 'do you really think?' The construction be'einekha ('in your eyes') implies Hanun is seeing what he wants to see rather than what is actually there.
3. The three infinitives -- lachqor ('to search, investigate'), uleraggelah ('to spy it out'), and ulehophekhah ('to overthrow it') -- form a military sequence from reconnaissance to destruction. The verb ragal ('to spy') is the same root used for the spies sent into Canaan (Numbers 21:32), carrying overtones of covert hostile activity. The verb haphakh ('to overturn, overthrow') is the word used for the destruction of Sodom (Genesis 19:21, 25), implying total annihilation.
4. The verb vaygallach ('he shaved') from the root galach is the standard term for removing hair, but its application to half the beard (chatsi zeqanam) makes it an act of deliberate disfigurement. In ancient Israelite and broader Near Eastern culture, the beard was sacrosanct -- to touch another man's beard was an intimate act (cf. Joab seizing Amasa's beard in 2 Samuel 20:9), and to forcibly shave it was a profound violation of personhood.
4. The phrase vayyikhrot et-madveihem ba-chetsi ad shtothehem ('he cut their garments in the middle, up to their buttocks') describes cutting the robes short enough to expose the men's nakedness. The word madve (plural madveihem) is a rare term for a robe or outer garment. The word shtothehem ('their buttocks') is direct and unambiguous -- the exposure is deliberate and sexual in its shaming force. Sending ambassadors home in this condition is the diplomatic equivalent of a declaration of war.
5. The verb niklamim ('humiliated, ashamed, disgraced') from the root kalam describes a shame that is social and public, not merely internal embarrassment. These men have been stripped of their dignity before foreign eyes, and returning to Jerusalem in their current state would compound the humiliation by displaying it to their own people. David's response is immediate and compassionate: he sends someone to intercept them before they reach the capital.
5. Jericho (Yericho) sits in the Jordan Valley near the border with Ammonite territory -- it is the first major Israelite settlement the men would reach on their return journey. David's instruction to remain there until their beards regrow is both practical and merciful: he spares them the shame of appearing in Jerusalem while disfigured. The period needed for beard regrowth -- several weeks to months -- also serves as a cooling period before David must respond to the provocation.
6. The verb niv'ashu ('they had become odious, they stank') from the root ba'ash is strikingly physical -- it means to emit a foul smell, to become repugnant. The same verb describes the stench of the Nile turning to blood (Exodus 7:21) and the rotting manna (Exodus 16:20). The Ammonites have not merely offended David; they have made themselves stink in his nostrils, a metaphor that signals irreversible hostility.
6. The Aramean city-states named here -- Beth-rehob, Zobah, Maacah, and Tob -- represent the network of small but militarily capable kingdoms in the region between Damascus and the Transjordan. Beth-rehob was located near the headwaters of the Jordan; Zobah was a larger Aramean state whose king Hadadezer will feature prominently in verse 16. The hiring (vayyiskkeru, from the root sakhar, 'to hire for wages') emphasizes that these are mercenaries, not allies motivated by loyalty -- a pointed contrast to the chesed David offered freely.
7. David's response is immediate but delegated: he sends Joab rather than leading the campaign himself. This detail matters for the larger narrative arc -- David's decision to stay behind during the Ammonite war will be repeated in 11:1, where his absence from the battlefield leads directly to the Bathsheba affair. The pattern of delegation begins here.
7. The phrase kol-ha-tsava ha-gibborim ('the entire army, the mighty warriors') likely refers to the professional military corps as distinguished from a general militia call-up. The gibborim ('mighty men, elite warriors') are David's veteran soldiers -- the core fighting force described in detail in 2 Samuel 23. David commits his best troops, recognizing the scale of the threat.

8. The phrase petach ha-sha'ar ('the opening of the gate') places the Ammonite line at the most defensible position available -- the gate complex of Rabbah, where the walls channel any attacker into a narrow killing zone. Ancient Near Eastern city gates were fortified chokepoints, and an army arrayed before one could retreat inside if pressed.
8. The word levaddam ('by themselves, separately') is tactically significant. The Aramean mercenaries are not standing alongside the Ammonites but are operating as an independent force in the open ground (ba-sadeh, 'in the field'). This separation is what creates the two-front crisis for Joab and necessitates the division of the Israelite army described in the following verses.
9. The phrase penei ha-milchamah ('the face of the battle') treats the battle as a living entity with a face that turns toward Joab from two directions. The prepositions mippannim ('from the front') and me'achor ('from behind') describe encirclement -- the worst tactical position a commander can face.
9. The word bechurei (from bachur, 'chosen, select, young warrior') describes the elite troops -- Israel's best and most experienced fighters. Joab assigns himself the harder task, which is both tactically sound (the elite troops have the best chance against the Aramean professionals) and characteristically bold. The verb vayyikhchar ('he chose') emphasizes deliberate selection, not a random division.
10. The phrase yeter ha-am ('the remainder of the people') indicates the troops Joab did not select for the Aramean engagement -- still a substantial force, but not the elite corps. Placing them be-yad Abishai ('in the hand of Abishai') uses the standard idiom for military command. Abishai was one of David's most capable warriors (cf. 2 Samuel 23:18-19), and his assignment to the Ammonite front was not a demotion but a recognition that the city-gate engagement required a different kind of fighting -- more defensive and positional than the open-field combat Joab would face.
10. Abishai (Avshai) was Joab's brother and one of the three sons of Zeruiah, David's sister. The family bond between the two commanders adds a personal dimension to the military division: each brother trusts the other with half the army and, implicitly, with his life.
11. The verb techezaq ('proves stronger, overpowers') from the root chazaq uses the same word that will appear in Joab's exhortation in the next verse. Here it describes the enemy's potential strength; in verse 12 it will become a command for Israel's own strength. The conditional structure im... im ('if... if') creates a balanced tactical plan that accounts for both possible scenarios.
11. The phrase vehayitah li lishu'ah ('you will be for me for deliverance/help') uses the noun teshu'ah ('salvation, deliverance, victory') -- the same word used elsewhere for God's saving acts. In military context, it means reinforcement that turns the tide. Joab's plan assumes that both fronts may be under pressure simultaneously, but that one will break before the other, freeing troops for mutual support.
12. The imperative chazaq ('be strong!') is the same command given to Joshua (Joshua 1:6, 7, 9, 18) and later charged by David to Solomon (1 Kings 2:2). It is the quintessential Hebrew command for courage in the face of overwhelming odds -- not emotional optimism but the resolve to stand and fight regardless of the odds. The hitpa'el form venitkchazzaq ('let us make ourselves strong, let us show ourselves courageous') adds reflexive and reciprocal force: we will strengthen ourselves and each other.
12. The phrase be'ad ammeinu ('for the sake of our people') and be'ad arei Eloheinu ('for the sake of the cities of our God') name the stakes in covenantal rather than political terms. The cities are not 'our cities' but 'the cities of our God' -- they belong to the LORD, and Israel fights to protect what belongs to God. The final clause vaYHWH ya'aseh ha-tov be'einav is not fatalism but faith: Joab trusts that whatever God decides is, by definition, good.
13. The verb vayyiggash ('he drew near, advanced') implies deliberate, aggressive forward movement -- Joab does not wait to be attacked but takes the initiative. The phrase vayyanusu mippanav ('they fled from before him') records the Aramean rout in five words. The brevity is itself a literary judgment: the mercenaries who were hired for their military prowess collapse at the first real engagement. Hired soldiers who fight for wages rather than homeland or covenant tend to break when the cost of staying exceeds the value of the pay.
13. The speed of the Aramean collapse suggests that Joab's elite troops attacked with overwhelming aggression, likely targeting the command structure. Professional mercenary armies of this period were organized around their commanders; once the leadership was neutralized or fled, the rank and file had no reason to stand and die for someone else's war.
14. The verb vayyanusu ('they fled') repeats from verse 13, creating a chain reaction: the Arameans fled, so the Ammonites fled. The phrase vayyavo'u ha-ir ('they entered the city') marks the Ammonites' retreat behind Rabbah's walls -- a defensive survival move, not a strategic withdrawal.
14. Joab's return to Jerusalem (vayyavo Yerushalayim) without completing the conquest of Rabbah is a significant narrative choice. The Ammonite war is suspended, not concluded. This open-ended status creates the conditions for chapter 11: the army will return to besiege Rabbah, but David will not go with them, and in his idleness the Bathsheba catastrophe will unfold.
15. The verb niggraph ('was struck, was defeated') from the root nagaph describes a decisive military defeat -- the same word used for plagues and catastrophic blows. The Arameans recognize the totality of their defeat: they were not merely pushed back but shattered. Their response -- vayyei'asphu yachad ('they gathered themselves together') -- signals a second mobilization, this time not as scattered mercenary contingents but as a unified coalition. The defeat has paradoxically united them.
15. This verse begins the second phase of the conflict: the Aramean war escalates from a mercenary engagement to a full-scale regional confrontation. The Arameans' decision to regroup rather than accept defeat transforms what began as an Ammonite problem into the most serious military challenge of David's reign.
16. The name Hadadezer (Hadad'ezer, 'Hadad is help') identifies the king of Zobah, the most powerful Aramean ruler of this period. The theophoric element Hadad refers to the Aramean storm deity. Hadadezer had already been defeated by David in 2 Samuel 8:3-8, making this remobilization an attempt to reverse that earlier humiliation.

16. The phrase me'ever ha-nahar ('from beyond the River') is a standard geographic designation for the territories east of the Euphrates -- the Aramean heartland in what is today northeastern Syria and northern Iraq. The mobilization of these distant forces represents a massive escalation: Hadadezer is calling in the full weight of the Aramean world. Helam (Chelam) is likely a site in the northern Transjordan, chosen as the assembly point because it lies between the Euphrates forces and the Israelite frontier.
17. The phrase vayyesoph et-kol-Yisra'el ('he gathered all Israel') indicates a comprehensive military mobilization -- not just the professional army but the full fighting strength of the united kingdom. This is the largest force David has deployed, commensurate with the largest threat he has faced.
17. The crossing of the Jordan (vayyaavor et-ha-Yarden) marks a deliberate march into the Transjordan, taking the fight to the enemy rather than waiting for them to cross into Israelite territory. David's advance to Helam (vayyavo Hel'amah) is an aggressive strategic move -- he chooses the ground and forces the engagement on his terms rather than allowing the Arameans to dictate the battlefield.
18. The parallel passage in 1 Chronicles 19:18 reads 'seven thousand chariot crews' rather than 'seven hundred,' and 'forty thousand foot soldiers' rather than 'horsemen' (parashim). The textual discrepancy between Samuel and Chronicles is well known and may reflect different manuscript traditions or a scribal error in transmission. The word parashim can mean 'horsemen' or 'cavalry' -- the Chronicles variant reading ragli ('foot soldiers') may preserve an earlier form.
18. The phrase vayyamot sham ('he died there') about Shobach is terse and final. The adverb sham ('there') anchors the death to the battlefield at Helam -- Shobach did not escape to die later of wounds but fell in the engagement. The loss of the supreme commander was catastrophic for the Aramean coalition, as it depended on centralized command under Hadadezer's appointed general.
19. The verb vayyashlimu ('they made peace') from the root shalam ('to be complete, to be at peace') in the hiphil means to submit, to enter into a peace agreement -- here with overtones of capitulation rather than negotiated settlement. The following verb vayyaavdum ('they served them') confirms the relationship: these kings are now David's vassals, paying tribute and providing military support.
19. The final clause vayyir'u Aram lehoshi'a od et-benei Ammon ('the Arameans were afraid to help the Ammonites again') closes the Aramean phase of the conflict with a psychological verdict: fear (yir'ah) now governs the Aramean posture toward Israel. The verb lehoshi'a ('to save, deliver, help') is ironic -- the Arameans were hired to 'save' Ammon, but they proved unable to save even themselves. The word od ('again, anymore') is permanent: this is not a temporary hesitation but a lasting strategic realignment.

11

Summary: At the turn of the year, when kings go out to war, David sends Joab and the army to besiege Rabbah of the Ammonites -- but David himself stays in Jerusalem. From the roof of the palace he sees a woman bathing, learns she is Bathsheba daughter of Eliam and wife of Uriah the Hittite, sends for her, and sleeps with her. She conceives. David attempts a cover-up by recalling Uriah from the front and urging him to go home to his wife, but Uriah -- with devastating integrity -- refuses to enjoy the comforts of home while the Ark and his fellow soldiers sleep in the open field. David tries again, this time getting Uriah drunk, but still Uriah will not go home. Out of options, David writes a letter to Joab carried by Uriah's own hand, ordering Joab to place Uriah at the fiercest point of battle and then pull back so that he dies. Joab complies. Uriah is killed. Bathsheba mourns. David takes her as his wife. She bears a son. The chapter closes with a single devastating sentence: the thing that David had done was evil in the eyes of the LORD.

*What Makes This Remarkable: The narrator of 2 Samuel 11 is one of the most restrained voices in all of ancient literature. There is no moral commentary, no authorial outrage, no theological editorializing -- until the final clause. The narrator simply reports actions. David stayed. David saw. David sent. David took. David lay with her. She conceived. David sent for Uriah. Uriah refused. David wrote a letter. Uriah carried his own death warrant. Joab obeyed. Uriah died. The entire catastrophe unfolds through a chain of verbs -- above all the verb shalach ('to send'), which appears at least eight times and structures the chapter as a study in the abuse of royal power. A king who should be at war is instead sending: sending armies, sending messengers, sending for a woman, sending for her husband, sending a letter, sending a man to his death. The one thing David never does in this chapter is go himself. He acts entirely through intermediaries, and the verb 'sent' becomes the sound of royal corruption. Equally devastating is the narrator's treatment of Uriah. His speech in verse 11 is the moral center of the chapter, and it is placed in the mouth of a Hittite -- a foreigner, a man outside the covenant -- who displays more covenant loyalty than the king of Israel. Uriah refuses to go home because the Ark of God, Israel's army, and Judah are camping in the open field. He cannot enjoy comfort while his comrades endure hardship. The king who should embody Israel's covenant faithfulness has abandoned it; the foreign soldier carries it in his bones.*

Translation Friction: The Hebrew of verse 4 contains the parenthetical clause ve-hi mitqaddeshet mi-tum'atah ('and she was purifying herself from her uncleanness'), which most scholars read as a reference to Bathsheba having just completed her menstrual period. This detail serves a narrative function: it establishes that any pregnancy could only be David's, since she had not recently been with her husband. Some interpreters read the clause differently, as referring to purification after the sexual encounter itself, but the timing logic favors the first reading. We render the clause straightforwardly and note its narrative purpose. The question of Bathsheba's agency is a persistent tension. The Hebrew text gives her no speech until the two-word message 'I am pregnant.' She is the object of verbs: she is seen, she is sent for, she is taken. Whether this reflects coercion by royal power (a king's summons is not a request) or willing participation is debated, but the narrator's grammar places all initiative with David. The verb laqach ('took') in verse 4 is the same verb used for royal seizure throughout the Hebrew Bible, and the narrator appears to frame this as an act of power, not romance.

Connections: The opening phrase li-teshuvat ha-shanah le-et tset ha-melakhim ('at the return of the year, at the time kings go out') immediately frames David's failure: he is a king who does not go out. This inverts the trajectory of 1 Samuel, where David was always the one who went -- who pursued, who fought, who led from the front. The verb shalach ('sent') that dominates this chapter echoes its use in 1 Samuel 17, where Saul sends David out against Goliath; now David sends others to do what he should do himself. Uriah's reference to the Ark dwelling in booths (sukkot) in the field connects to the theology of divine presence: God's own dwelling is exposed to the elements alongside the soldiers, while David lounges on the palace roof. Nathan's confrontation in chapter 12 will reframe this entire chapter through the parable of the rich man who takes the poor man's lamb -- the verb laqach again. The letter David sends via Uriah is one of the most chilling devices in biblical narrative, echoing the motif of the unwitting bearer of his own doom found in other ancient Near Eastern literature (notably the tale of Bellerophon in Homer's Iliad 6.155-195). David's marriage to Bathsheba after Uriah's death sets the stage for the birth and death of the first child (chapter 12), the birth of Solomon (12:24), and ultimately the entire Davidic dynasty's entanglement with the consequences of this act.

¹At the turn of the year -- the season when kings march out to war -- David sent Joab, along with his officers and the entire army of Israel. They ravaged the Ammonites and laid siege to Rabbah. But David stayed behind in Jerusalem. ²One evening David got up from his couch and walked on the roof of the royal palace. From the roof he saw a woman bathing. The woman was strikingly beautiful. ³David sent someone to inquire about the woman. The report came back: "This is Bathsheba daughter of Eliam, wife of Uriah the Hittite." ⁴David sent messengers and took her. She came to him, and he lay with her -- she had just purified herself after her monthly period -- and she returned to her house. ⁵The woman conceived. She sent word to David: "I am pregnant." ⁶David sent word to Joab: "Send Uriah the Hittite to me." So Joab sent Uriah to David. ⁷When Uriah came to him, David asked about the welfare of Joab, the welfare of the troops, and the welfare of the war. ⁸Then David said to Uriah, "Go down to your house and wash your feet." Uriah left the palace, and a gift from the king was sent after him. ⁹But Uriah slept at the entrance of the palace with all the servants of his lord. He did not go down to his house. ¹⁰When they told David, "Uriah did not go down to his house," David said to Uriah, "Haven't you just come from a journey? Why didn't you go down to your house?" ¹¹Uriah said to David, "The Ark, and Israel, and Judah are dwelling in temporary shelters. My commander Joab and my lord's soldiers are camped in the open field. And I -- should I go to my house to eat and drink and lie with my wife? By your life and by the life of your soul, I will not do this thing." ¹²David said to Uriah, "Stay here today as well, and tomorrow I will send you back." So Uriah remained in Jerusalem that day and the next. ¹³David summoned him, and Uriah ate and drank in his presence, and David got him drunk. But in the evening Uriah went out to lie on his bedroll with the servants of his lord. He did not go down to his house. ¹⁴In the morning David wrote a letter to Joab and sent it by Uriah's own hand. ¹⁵He wrote in the letter: "Place Uriah at the front of the fiercest fighting, then pull back from behind him so that he is struck down and dies." ¹⁶When Joab was besieging the city, he assigned Uriah to the position where he knew the most formidable defenders were stationed. ¹⁷The men of the city came out and fought against Joab. Some of David's soldiers fell, and Uriah the Hittite also died. ¹⁸Joab sent a messenger and reported to David all the details of the battle. ¹⁹He instructed the messenger: "When you have finished reporting all the details of the battle to the king, ²⁰if the king's anger flares and he says to you, 'Why did you advance so close to the city to fight? Didn't you know they would shoot from the wall? ²¹Who struck down Abimelech son of Jerubbesheth? Didn't a woman drop an upper millstone on him from the wall, and he died at Thebez? Why did you advance so close to the wall?' Then you are to say: 'Your servant Uriah the Hittite is also dead.'" ²²The messenger went. He came to David and reported everything Joab had sent him to say. ²³The messenger said to David, "The enemy overpowered us and came out against us in the open field, but we drove them back to the entrance of the gate. ²⁴The archers shot at your soldiers from the wall. Some of the king's men died -- and your servant Uriah the Hittite is also dead." ²⁵David said to the messenger, "Say this to Joab: 'Do not let this trouble you -- the sword devours one man as easily as another. Press your attack against the city harder and destroy it.' Encourage him." ²⁶When Uriah's wife heard that her husband Uriah was dead, she mourned for her lord. ²⁷When the mourning period passed, David sent and brought her into his house. She became his wife and bore him a son. But the thing David had done was evil in the eyes of the LORD.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The phrase li-teshuv at ha-shanah ('at the return/turning of the year') marks the spring campaign season, when the winter rains have ended and roads become passable for military movement. The construct le-et tset ha-melakhim ('at the time of the going-out of kings') uses the active participle -- kings go out, it is what kings do. The verb shalach ('he sent') will recur throughout this chapter as its structuring verb: David sends Joab (v. 1), sends to inquire about the woman (v. 3), sends messengers for her (v. 4), sends word to Joab (v. 6), sends Uriah back with food (v. 8), sends Uriah to his death via letter (v. 14), and Joab sends word back to David (v. 18, 22, 27). The narrator presents an entire catastrophe conducted by proxy.
2. The contrast between va-yishlach David ('David sent') and ve-David yoshev ('David was staying') is the narrative hinge. The verb yashav can mean simply 'to dwell' or 'to remain,' but in this military context it carries the weight of absence -- David is sitting when he should be marching.
3. The timing is le-et ha-erev ('toward the time of evening') -- late afternoon or early evening, when the heat breaks and rooftops become living spaces. David rises me-al mishkavo ('from upon his bed'), meaning his afternoon rest. A king at war would not be napping; a king at home has nothing else to do. The verb va-yar ('he saw') initiates the disaster. The narrator does not say David went looking for anything -- he simply saw. But everything that follows will flow from the decision to act on what he saw.
4. The phrase tovat mar'eh me'od ('very good of appearance') is the narrator's only description of Bathsheba. It is the same construction used for the patriarchs' wives (Sarah, Rebekah, Rachel) and carries similar narrative weight: beauty in these stories is never merely decorative; it sets plots in motion. The narrator reports this as a fact, not as a justification.
5. The verb darash ('to inquire, to seek out, to investigate') means David made a deliberate inquiry -- this is not casual curiosity but active intelligence-gathering about the woman's identity. The response is structured as a triple identification: bat-Sheva ('daughter of Sheba/oath'), bat-Eliam ('daughter of Eliam'), eshet Uriyah ha-Chitti ('wife of Uriah the Hittite'). Eliam may be the son of Ahithophel the Gilonite (2 Samuel 23:34), which would make Bathsheba Ahithophel's granddaughter and potentially explain Ahithophel's later defection to Absalom's rebellion (2 Samuel 15:12).
6. The identification eshet Uriyah ('wife of Uriah') is the critical datum. Uriah appears in the list of David's thirty mighty warriors (2 Samuel 23:39), meaning David would have known him personally. The narrator ensures the reader understands: David is not taking an unknown woman -- he is taking the wife of one of his own most loyal soldiers, a man currently risking his life in David's war.
7. The verb laqach ('he took') is the defining verb of this verse, and its weight in the Hebrew Bible cannot be overstated. It is the verb used for taking a wife in marriage, but also for taking by force, seizing property, and royal appropriation. In this context -- sent messengers and took her -- it echoes the warning of 1 Samuel 8:11-17, where the verb laqach appears seven times to describe the expropriations of kingship. Bathsheba is grammatically passive throughout: she is taken (va-yiqqacheha), she comes (va-tavo), he lies with her (va-yishkav immah), she returns (va-tashav). The narrator assigns her no speech, no initiative, no agency.
8. The clause ve-hi mitqaddeshet mi-tum'atah ('and she was purifying herself from her uncleanness') is a participial clause most naturally read as a temporal marker: she had just completed her purification from menstrual impurity (see Leviticus 15:19-28). This detail is not incidental -- it establishes that Bathsheba has not been with any man recently, so the coming pregnancy can only be David's. The narrator inserts this biological fact with the same clinical detachment that characterizes the entire chapter.
9. The brevity of harah anokhi ('I am pregnant') is extraordinary even by the standards of Hebrew narrative economy. Two words. No elaboration, no emotion, no appeal. The narrator gives Bathsheba the minimum possible speech, which functions in two ways: it maintains the chapter's devastating restraint, and it conveys the irreversible nature of the situation. A pregnancy cannot be unsent.
10. The verb va-tishlach ('she sent') marks the first time in the chapter that shalach has a subject other than David. Bathsheba's sending is reactive -- she sends information, not agents or armies -- but it nonetheless shifts the dynamic. David has been the sole actor; now a consequence has arrived that requires his response.
11. This verse contains three forms of shalach in rapid succession: va-yishlach David ('David sent'), shelach elai ('send to me'), and va-yishlach Yo'av ('Joab sent'). The triple repetition in a single verse is a deliberate literary effect -- the narrator is hammering the verb into the reader's consciousness.

The entire machinery of royal bureaucracy is activated to solve a personal crisis. Joab obeys without question; the text gives no indication that he knows David's motive.

7. David asks about shalom three times: li-shlom Yo'av ('the peace/welfare of Joab'), li-shlom ha-am ('the peace of the people/army'), li-shlom ha-milchamah ('the peace of the war'). The triple shalom is bitterly ironic -- David inquires about peace while plotting a man's destruction. The phrase shalom ha-milchamah ('the welfare of the war') is almost oxymoronic: shalom ('peace, wholeness, well-being') applied to milchamah ('war'). David performs the role of concerned commander, but every question is a smokescreen. He does not care about the answers; he needs Uriah in Jerusalem long enough to sleep with his wife and obscure the paternity.
8. The instruction red le-veitekha u-rechatz raglekha ('go down to your house and wash your feet') is a euphemistic invitation to go home, relax, and enjoy the comforts of domestic life -- including, by implication, his wife. The phrase 'wash your feet' is a standard idiom for rest and refreshment after travel (Genesis 18:4, 19:2). David is engineering a scenario in which Uriah will sleep with Bathsheba, so that the pregnancy can be attributed to a conjugal visit.
8. The mas'at ha-melekh ('gift/portion of the king') sent after Uriah is a further inducement -- royal food and wine to sweeten the homecoming. David is generous with Uriah's comfort while plotting Uriah's destruction. The narrator reports the gift without commentary, letting the reader feel the grotesque disparity between the king's outward kindness and his inward scheming.
9. The clause ve-lo yarad el-beito ('and he did not go down to his house') is a hammer blow to David's plan. Uriah sleeps at the petach beit ha-melekh ('entrance of the king's house') with the royal servants -- in solidarity with the common soldiers, not in the comfort of home. The narrator's restraint is total: no explanation of motive yet, just the bare fact. Uriah did not go down. The verb yarad ('to go down') is the same verb David used in his command (red le-veitekha, 'go down to your house'). Uriah's refusal is narrated as the direct negation of David's order.
10. David's question feigns bewilderment: ha-lo mi-derekh attah ba ('haven't you come from a road/journey?') -- after such a long march, wouldn't any man want his own bed, his own wife? The double use of lo yarad ('did not go down') -- first in the report to David, then in David's question -- repeats the phrase that is ruining his plan. David's tone is casual, almost fatherly: You've been traveling, go rest. But the reader knows the desperation behind the concern.
11. Uriah's mention of the Ark (ha-aron) in the field is theologically loaded. The Ark of the Covenant -- the physical symbol of God's presence with Israel -- is exposed to the elements alongside the soldiers. God, as it were, is camping in the open. If the divine presence endures hardship with the troops, how can a mere soldier seek comfort? Uriah's covenantal reasoning surpasses David's: the Hittite understands what the king of Israel has forgotten.
11. The phrase yoshevim ba-sukkot ('dwelling in booths/shelters') uses the same participle (yoshev) applied to David in verse 1, where he was 'sitting in Jerusalem.' The verbal echo is lacerating: David sits in his palace; the Ark sits in a field shelter. The narrator never makes this connection explicit -- he simply uses the same word and lets the reader hear it.
11. Uriah's oath formula chayyekha ve-chei nafshekha ('by your life and by the life of your soul') is the strongest available oath in Hebrew -- swearing by the life of the person addressed. He swears on David's life that he will not do the thing David desperately needs him to do.
12. David's command shev ba-zeh ('stay here') uses the same root (yashav, 'to sit, dwell, remain') that has characterized David's own inaction. The promise u-machar ashallechekha ('and tomorrow I will send you off') contains yet another form of shalach -- even David's future plans are expressed in terms of sending. He needs one more night to make his scheme work. Uriah obeys the order to stay, but he will again refuse to go home, thwarting David's plan through simple, unconquerable integrity.
13. The verb va-yeshakkrehu ('he made him drunk') is in the Piel (intensive/causative) form -- David actively caused Uriah's intoxication. This is not a convivial evening; it is a calculated attempt to override Uriah's conscience through alcohol. The failure of this attempt intensifies the crisis: David has tried direct invitation (v. 8), a royal gift (v. 8), a personal appeal (v. 10), an extra night (v. 12), and deliberate intoxication (v. 13). None of it works.
13. The phrase ve-el-beito lo yarad ('and to his house he did not go down') repeats verse 9 almost verbatim, creating a narrative refrain. The repetition signals finality: Uriah will not be moved. David's options for a peaceful cover-up are exhausted. What follows will be murder.
14. The noun sefer ('letter, document, writing') indicates a formal written communication -- possibly a sealed scroll or tablet. Written orders carried royal authority and could not be questioned by the bearer. Uriah, a soldier who obeys commands, would carry a sealed letter from his king without opening it. The narrator lets the full weight of this land without explanation.
14. The phrase va-yishlach be-yad Uriyah ('he sent it by the hand of Uriah') is the most devastating use of shalach in the chapter. David sends death by the hand of the man who will die. The motif of the unwitting bearer of his own doom appears in other ancient literature -- notably in Homer's Iliad (6.155-195), where Bellerophon carries a sealed letter requesting his own execution. Whether the biblical narrator knew this motif or arrived at it independently, the literary effect is identical: the horror of a man who obediently delivers the instrument of his own destruction.
15. David's written order is precise: havu et-Uriyah el-mul penei ha-milchamah ha-chazaqah ('set Uriah toward the face of the fierce battle'). The phrase mul penei ('opposite the face of') places Uriah directly facing the most intense combat. The second command -- ve-shavtem me-acharav ('and you shall turn back from behind him') -- orders the other soldiers to withdraw, leaving Uriah exposed and unsupported. The final clause ve-nikkah va-met ('and he will be struck and will die') states the intended outcome with bureaucratic clarity.

15. The letter makes Joab complicit in the murder. David cannot kill Uriah himself -- it would be too obvious, too traceable. Instead he uses the war itself as a murder weapon, turning Joab's military operation into an assassination. The order implicates the entire chain of command: David orders it, Joab executes it, and the Ammonite enemy delivers the killing blow. The guilt diffuses through the system, which is exactly what David intends.
16. Joab modifies David's order slightly but achieves the same result. Rather than staging an obvious withdrawal from behind Uriah (which might alert other soldiers to the plot), Joab simply places Uriah at the point where the enemy resistance is strongest -- asher yada ki anshei-chayil sham ('where he knew that men of valor were there'). The phrase anshei chayil ('men of valor, formidable warriors') describes the best Ammonite fighters. Joab is a pragmatic general; he adapts the king's order to fit tactical reality while ensuring the outcome David demands.
16. The verb shamar ('to watch, to observe, to guard') in bi-shmor Yo'av el-ha-ir ('when Joab was watching/besieging the city') carries the double sense of conducting a siege and carefully observing the enemy's defenses. Joab knows the city's weak and strong points, and he uses that intelligence to place Uriah where death is most certain.
17. The phrase va-yippol min-ha-am me-avdei David ('and some of the people, of David's servants, fell') indicates that Uriah was not the only casualty. David's murder scheme cost additional lives -- soldiers who died because Joab placed troops in an unnecessarily dangerous position to fulfill the king's order. The narrator notes these deaths without commentary, but their presence implicates David in multiple killings, not just one.
17. The construction gam Uriyah ha-Chitti met ('also Uriah the Hittite died') uses gam ('also, even') to attach Uriah's death to the larger casualty list. The effect is deliberately understated -- the word 'also' makes Uriah's death sound incidental, which is exactly the cover story David needs. But the reader knows better.
18. Shalach again -- now Joab sends. The verb that has moved through the chapter like a current now flows back toward David. Joab sends a full battle report (kol divrei ha-milchamah, 'all the matters/words of the war'), embedding the news of Uriah's death within a larger military briefing. The tactic is deliberate: Uriah's death will arrive as one detail among many, further normalizing what was in fact a targeted assassination.
19. Joab anticipates David's reaction and coaches the messenger. The verb va-yetsav ('he commanded, instructed') shows Joab managing the flow of information with the same tactical precision he applies to warfare. He knows David will be angry about the losses, so he scripts the messenger's response in advance. Joab is now implicated in the cover-up: he understands what David has done and is helping manage the narrative.
20. Joab's scripted scenario reveals his understanding of military protocol: approaching too close to a fortified wall is a tactical blunder, because defenders shoot down from above. Joab expects David to rage about this apparent incompetence -- ta'aleh chamat ha-melekh ('the king's fury will rise up'). The verb alah ('to go up, to rise') applied to the king's anger is vivid: rage rising like heat. Joab knows that placing troops dangerously close to the wall was his own deliberate choice, done on David's orders, but he must maintain the fiction that it was a battlefield miscalculation.
21. The reference to Abimelech ben-Yerubbesheth recalls the story from Judges 9:50-54, where Abimelech (son of Gideon/Jerubbaal) besieged Thebez and was killed when a woman dropped a pelach rekhev ('a piece of a millstone,' literally 'a fragment of a riding-stone,' the upper stone of a hand mill) on his head from the city wall. The name Yerubbesheth is an altered form of Yerubbaal (Gideon's alternate name), with boshet ('shame') substituted for ba'al -- the same scribal practice applied to Ish-bosheth and Mephibosheth.
21. Joab's coaching reveals the complicity between king and general. Joab knows that the news of Uriah's death will function as a password -- it will instantly transform David's anger into relief. The word gam ('also') reappears: Uriah 'also' died. The same minimizing word from verse 17 is now deployed as a strategic communication tool.
22. The verse is pure mechanics: the messenger went, came, and reported. The verb shalach appears again in the phrase kol asher shelach-o Yo'av ('everything that Joab had sent him [to report]'). The chain of sending continues its circuit: David sent to Joab, Joab sent to David, and now the message arrives. The narrator compresses the journey and the delivery into a single verse, maintaining the chapter's relentless pace.
23. The messenger's report describes a sortie by the defenders: the Ammonites came out (va-yetse'u) from the city into the open field and initially had the upper hand (gavru aleinu, 'they were stronger against us'). But the Israelites rallied and pushed them back to the city gate (ad petach ha-sha'ar). This is where the fighting would have been fiercest and where the wall defenders could shoot down at the Israelite troops -- exactly the scenario Joab anticipated David would criticize. The messenger delivers a report that sounds like a near-victory, setting up the casualty news.
24. The messenger delivers the line exactly as Joab scripted it: ve-gam avdekha Uriyah ha-Chitti met ('and also your servant Uriah the Hittite is dead'). The word gam ('also') appears for the third time in connection with Uriah's death (vv. 17, 21, 24), each time burying it deeper in the casualty report. The phrase ha-morim ('the shooters, the archers') describes defenders firing from the wall -- precisely the danger Joab anticipated David would cite. The messenger has followed Joab's script, but in this version he does not wait for David's anger to erupt; he delivers the Uriah line as part of the report, preempting the objection.
25. The phrase al yera be-einekha ('let it not be evil in your eyes') is deeply ironic in light of verse 27, where the narrator will say that the thing David did was ra be-einei YHWH ('evil in the eyes of the LORD'). David tells Joab not to see this as evil; God sees it as evil. The same word -- ra ('evil, bad, displeasing') -- frames both David's dismissal and God's judgment.
25. The proverb ki khazoh ve-khazeh tokhel ha-cherav ('for like this and like that the sword devours') uses the verb akhal ('to eat, devour') for the sword's action -- a common Hebrew metaphor in which the sword is a hungry predator that consumes indiscriminately. David deploys a general truth to cover a specific crime. The instruction ve-chazzqehu ('and encourage him') at the end is addressed to the messenger about Joab -- David wants Joab reassured that the king is not displeased. The complicity is now fully mutual.

- 26. The narrator refers to Bathsheba only as eshet Uriyah ('Uriah's wife') -- never by name in this verse. She is defined entirely by her relationship to the man David killed. The verb va-tispod ('she mourned, she lamented') indicates the formal mourning rites -- weeping, wailing, possibly tearing garments and sitting in dust. The term ba'al ('lord, husband, master') used for Uriah in the phrase *al ba'al*ah ('for her lord/husband') carries more weight than ish ('man, husband'); ba'al conveys ownership, headship, and personal authority. The narrator's restraint continues: we are told she mourned, nothing more. No inner thoughts, no indication of her feelings about David, no hint of what comes next. Just the fact of grief.
- 27. The verb va-ya'asfeha ('he gathered her, he brought her in') from the root asaf ('to gather, collect, take in') is the language of incorporation -- David absorbs Bathsheba into his household as if acquiring property. The sequence va-tishlach... va-ya'asfeha... va-tehi lo le-ishah ('he sent... he gathered her... she became his wife') recapitulates the entire chapter's pattern: David acts through sending, taking, and possessing.
- 27. The final clause va-yera ha-davar asher-asah David be-einei YHWH ('and the thing that David had done was evil in the eyes of the LORD') is the narrator's only evaluative statement in the entire chapter. The word ra ('evil, bad, displeasing') is the same word David used in verse 25 when he told Joab al yera be-einekha ('do not let it be evil in your eyes'). David told a man not to see evil; God sees evil. The phrase be-einei YHWH ('in the eyes of the LORD') places divine perception in direct contrast with human perception. What David managed to normalize -- a battlefield death, a reasonable marriage -- God names as what it is. The narrator has held this judgment in reserve for the entire chapter, releasing it only in the final words, where it lands with the accumulated weight of everything that preceded it.

Summary: The LORD sends the prophet Nathan to David with a parable about a rich man who steals a poor man's only lamb to feed a guest. David erupts with outrage and pronounces a death sentence -- whereupon Nathan delivers the devastating verdict: 'You are the man.' Nathan then delivers a detailed oracle of judgment: the sword will never depart from David's house, his wives will be taken publicly by a neighbor, and the child conceived through his adultery with Bathsheba will die. David confesses immediately -- 'I have sinned against the LORD' -- and Nathan tells him the LORD has transferred his sin so that he will not die, but the child will. The infant becomes ill and dies after seven days of David's fasting and prostration. David's servants are afraid to tell him, but David perceives the truth, rises, washes, worships, and eats -- shocking his household with a theology of grief that accepts what cannot be reversed. David then comforts Bathsheba, and she bears a second son, Solomon, whom the LORD loves. Through Nathan, God gives the child a second name: Yedidyah, 'beloved of the LORD.' The chapter concludes with Joab's siege of Rabbah, the Ammonite capital, where Joab summons David to deliver the final assault so that the victory will bear the king's name.

What Makes This Remarkable: *Nathan's parable is one of the most celebrated passages in the Hebrew Bible and a masterwork of prophetic rhetoric. Rather than confronting David directly -- which would have allowed the king to marshal his defenses -- Nathan constructs a juridical parable (mashal) that weaponizes David's own sense of justice. David condemns himself before he knows he is the defendant. The phrase attah ha-ish ('you are the man') is among the most famous sentences in Scripture, the hinge on which the entire Davidic narrative turns. Before this verse, David is ascending; after it, the consequences of his sin cascade through the rest of 2 Samuel. Equally remarkable is David's response: no evasion, no self-justification, no appeal to royal prerogative. His confession -- chatati la-YHWH ('I have sinned against the LORD') -- is three words in Hebrew, the shortest and most unguarded royal confession in the ancient Near East. Where Saul, confronted by Samuel, deflected and blamed others (1 Samuel 15:20-21), David absorbs the blow without flinching. The narrator presents this not as adequate atonement but as the quality that distinguishes David from Saul: David can be broken by the truth.*

Translation Friction: *Several translational tensions require careful navigation. First, Nathan's oracle in verses 11-12 uses language that is deliberately shocking: God declares He will take David's wives and give them to his neighbor, who will lie with them 'in the sight of this sun.' This prophecy is fulfilled in Absalom's public act on the palace roof (16:22). The theological difficulty is acute -- God announces He will cause something that would elsewhere be condemned as a grave violation. The text does not soften this; neither do we. Second, David's statement in verse 23, 'I will go to him, but he will not return to me,' has been read as an expression of afterlife hope, but in context it more likely means David will join the child in death (Sheol) eventually -- it is a statement of resignation, not consolation. Third, the transition from David's intense grief during the child's illness to his calm acceptance after the death seems abrupt and has puzzled readers ancient and modern. David's own explanation (verse 22-23) reveals a theology of prayer that is willing to petition God while the outcome remains open but refuses to rage against what God has decided. Fourth,* the Yedidyah naming in verse 25 is textually unusual -- the phrase ba'avur YHWH ('because of the LORD' or 'for the LORD's sake') is difficult, and the relationship between the names Solomon (Shelomoh) and Yedidyah is never fully explained. The child is called Solomon throughout the rest of Scripture; Yedidyah appears only here.

Connections: This chapter is the direct consequence of 2 Samuel 11 (the Bathsheba affair and Uriah's murder) and the fulfillment of the prophetic pattern established in 1 Samuel 2:27-36 (the man of God's warning that those who honor themselves above God will be cut down). Nathan's oracle -- 'the sword will never depart from your house' -- becomes the interpretive key for everything that follows in 2 Samuel: Amnon's rape of Tamar (chapter 13), Absalom's rebellion and death (chapters 15-18), and Sheba's revolt (chapter 20) are all read through the lens of this pronouncement. David's confession, chatati la-YHWH, stands in deliberate contrast to Saul's self-justifying response to Samuel in 1 Samuel 15:24-25, where Saul also says 'I have sinned' but immediately adds excuses and asks Samuel to maintain his public honor. The birth of Solomon connects forward to the succession narrative (1 Kings 1-2) and to the temple-building promise of 2 Samuel 7. The name Yedidyah ('beloved of the LORD') echoes the covenant love language of Deuteronomy and anticipates the special divine favor that will mark Solomon's reign. The siege of Rabbah at the chapter's end completes the military campaign that began in 11:1 -- the war that David should have been fighting when he stayed behind in Jerusalem and saw Bathsheba.

¹The LORD sent Nathan to David. He came to him and said, "Two men lived in a certain city -- ²one rich and the other destitute. ³The rich man had vast flocks and herds, ⁴but the destitute man had nothing at all except one small ewe lamb he had bought and raised. It grew up alongside him and his children. It ate from his own plate and drank from his own cup and slept in his arms. It was like a daughter to him. ⁵A traveler came to the rich man, but the rich man could not bring himself to take from his own flocks and herds to prepare a meal for his guest. Instead he took the destitute man's lamb and prepared it for the man who had come to him. ⁶David's anger blazed against the man, and he said to Nathan, "As the LORD lives, the man who did this deserves death! ⁷He must repay four times over for the lamb, because he did this thing and because he had no compassion." ⁸Nathan said to David, "You are the man! This is what the LORD, the God of Israel, says: 'I myself anointed you king over Israel, and I myself rescued you from the hand of Saul. ⁹I gave you your master's house and your master's wives into your arms. I gave you the house of Israel and Judah. And if that was not enough, I would have added as much again and more. ¹⁰Why have you treated the word of the LORD with contempt by doing what is evil in His sight? You struck down Uriah the Hittite with the sword. You took his wife as your own wife. And you killed him by the sword of the Ammonites. ¹¹This is what the LORD says: 'I am going to raise up disaster against you from within your own house. I will take your wives before your eyes and give them to your neighbor, and he will lie with your wives in broad daylight. ¹²You acted in secret, but I will do this thing before all Israel and in full view of the sun.' ¹³David said to Nathan, "I have sinned against the LORD." Nathan said to David, "The LORD has also transferred your sin -- you will not die. ¹⁴However, because you have given the LORD's enemies an occasion to scorn Him through this act, the son born to you will certainly die." ¹⁵Then Nathan went home. The LORD struck the child that Uriah's wife had borne to David, and the child became desperately ill. ¹⁶David pleaded with God on behalf of the boy. David fasted, went inside, and spent the night lying on the bare ground. ¹⁷The senior members of his household rose and went to him to lift him from the ground, but he refused. He would not eat food with them. ¹⁸On the seventh day the child died. David's servants were afraid to tell him the child was dead, because they said, "While the child was still alive we spoke to him and he would not listen to us. How can we tell him the child is dead? He may do something desperate." ¹⁹David noticed his servants whispering to one another and understood that the child had died. David said to his servants, "Is the child dead?" They said, "He is dead." ²⁰David rose from the ground, washed, anointed himself, and changed his clothes. He went into the house of the LORD and worshipped. Then he went home, asked for food, and when it was set before him, he ate. ²¹His servants said to him, "What is this you have done? While the child was alive you fasted and wept, but the moment the child died you got up and ate food!" ²²He said, "While the child was still alive, I fasted and wept because I thought, 'Who knows? The LORD may show me grace, and the child may live.' ²³But now he has died. Why should I fast? Can I bring him back? I will go to him, but he will not return to me." ²⁴David comforted Bathsheba his wife, went to her, and lay with her. She bore a son, and he named him Solomon. And the LORD loved him. ²⁵He sent word through Nathan the prophet, who named him Yedidyah -- 'beloved of the LORD' -- on account of the LORD. ²⁶Meanwhile

Joab fought against Rabbah of the Ammonites and captured the royal citadel. ²⁷Joab sent messengers to David saying, "I have fought against Rabbah and have also captured the water supply. ²⁸Now muster the rest of the army, camp against the city, and capture it -- otherwise I will capture the city and it will bear my name." ²⁹David mustered the entire army, marched to Rabbah, fought against it, and captured it. ³⁰He took the crown from the head of their king -- its weight was a talent of gold, set with a precious stone -- and it was placed on David's head. He also carried off an enormous quantity of plunder from the city. ³¹He brought out the people who were in the city and set them to labor with saws, iron picks, and iron axes, and put them to work at the brick kilns. He did the same to all the Ammonite cities. Then David and the entire army returned to Jerusalem.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayyishlach ('he sent') deliberately echoes its repeated use in chapter 11, where David sent messengers to take Bathsheba (11:4), sent Uriah to Joab (11:6), and sent the letter ordering Uriah's death (11:14). God now enters the sending chain. The verb carries the force of authoritative commission -- Nathan does not volunteer; he is dispatched.
1. Nathan's parable opens with the formulaic shenei anashim hayu be'ir echad ('two men were in one city'), a construction that mimics the style of a judicial case brought before a king. David would have heard hundreds of such cases as part of his royal duties. Nathan exploits the king's judicial reflexes to make David pronounce his own sentence.
2. The Hebrew rash ('poor, destitute') describes someone at the very bottom of the economic order -- not merely modest but impoverished. The contrast between ashir ('rich, wealthy') and rash ('destitute') is drawn as starkly as possible. In the parable's logic, the rich man is David (who had many wives) and the poor man is Uriah (who had one). The single-word descriptions set up the moral outrage that follows: the powerful taking from the powerless.
3. The phrase tson u-vaqar harbeh me'od ('sheep and cattle exceedingly many') emphasizes surplus to the point of absurdity. The rich man has more livestock than he could ever need. In the allegorical framework, this corresponds to David's many wives -- a point Nathan will make explicit in verse 8, where God reminds David of all that was given to him. The abundance makes the theft that follows not just criminal but senseless.
4. The verb vaychayeha ('he kept it alive, he nourished it') from the root chayah ('to live') indicates the poor man personally sustained the lamb's life. The series of feminine singular verbs (to'khal, tishteh, tishkav) personifies the lamb with almost human characteristics. The word cheiq ('bosom, lap, embrace') is the same word used for the intimate embrace between husband and wife (Deuteronomy 28:54, Micah 7:5), making the allegorical connection to Bathsheba unmistakable.
4. The phrase kevat ('like a daughter') is the parable's emotional apex. In a patriarchal society, a daughter represents the most tender, protected relationship a man can have. Nathan has made David feel the full weight of the poor man's loss before revealing that David is the thief.
5. The word helekhh ('traveler, wayfarer') appears only here in the Hebrew Bible, though the related word oreiach ('guest, traveler') appears in the same verse. Some commentators see the traveler as representing David's desire or lust -- a passing appetite that arrives and demands to be fed. The rich man's refusal to use his own resources (vayyachmol laqachat mitsono) is the heart of the parable's indictment: David had wives; he did not need to take Uriah's.
5. The verb vayyiqach ('he took') is the same verb used for David's taking of Bathsheba in 11:4 (vayyiqach). Nathan's diction mirrors the narrator's diction from the previous chapter, creating a verbal bridge between parable and reality that will become explicit in Nathan's accusation.
6. The phrase vayyichar af David me'od ('David's anger burned greatly') uses the standard Hebrew anger idiom -- af means both 'nose/nostril' and 'anger,' reflecting the physical sign of fury (flared nostrils, heavy breathing). David's response is visceral, not calculated. He is genuinely outraged, which makes the coming revelation all the more devastating.
6. The expression ben mavet ('son of death') is a judicial idiom meaning 'worthy of the death penalty.' David uses it elsewhere (1 Samuel 20:31, 26:16) for those who deserve execution. By uttering it under oath (chay YHWH), David has bound himself: if the man deserves death, and David is the man, then David deserves death. Nathan will address this directly in verse 13.
7. The verb yeshalle ('he must repay') from the root shalam ('to make whole, to complete, to restore') is the legal term for restitution. The fourfold amount (arba'tayim) matches Exodus 22:1 for the theft of a sheep. David applies the Torah's economic penalty on top of the death sentence, demonstrating his thorough engagement with the case as a judge.
7. The phrase ve'al asher lo chamal ('and because he did not have compassion') adds a moral dimension to the legal verdict. It is not just the theft but the callousness that enrages David -- the rich man could have spared the poor man but chose not to. This is precisely Nathan's point: David could have restrained himself but chose not to.
8. The phrase attah ha-ish ('you are the man') uses the definite article ha- to point back to the man in the parable. David pronounced judgment on 'the man' (ha-ish), and Nathan now identifies David as that same man. The economy of the accusation is devastating -- no argument, no buildup, just identification.

8. The messenger formula koh amar YHWH ('thus says the LORD') marks the transition from Nathan speaking as a prophet to God speaking through Nathan. The repeated anokhi ('I, I myself') is emphatic personal pronoun use -- God is insisting on His own role as the source of every good thing David possesses, establishing the baseline of ingratitude against which David's sin will be measured.
9. The phrase beit adonekha ('your master's house') refers to Saul's royal household, which David inherited upon becoming king. The reference to Saul's wives entering David's 'embrace' (cheiq) may reflect a royal succession practice in which the new king inherited the previous king's harem as a symbol of legitimacy. Whether David actually took Saul's wives as his own or merely assumed legal responsibility for them is debated, but God counts them among His gifts.
9. The conditional clause ve'im me'at ('and if it was too little') is rhetorically crushing. God is not merely accusing David of theft but of ingratitude toward infinite generosity. The phrase ve'osifah lekha ('I would have added for you') uses the verb yasaf ('to add, to continue'), implying that God's gifts were an ongoing, open-ended stream that David chose to bypass by stealing.
10. The Qere (spoken reading) has devar YHWH ('the word of the LORD'), while the Ketiv (written text) reads et YHWH ('the LORD Himself'). The difference is significant: the Ketiv suggests David despised God personally, while the Qere specifies that David despised God's commandment. Both readings are theologically operative -- despising God's word is despising God.
10. The double mention of killing Uriah (hikkita bacharev at the beginning, haragta becherev at the end) creates an envelope structure around the theft of Bathsheba. The murder frames the adultery, indicating that in God's reckoning, the murder is the greater crime -- it was committed to conceal the lesser one. The phrase becherev benei Ammon ('by the sword of the Ammonites') makes clear that using intermediaries does not dilute culpability.
11. The participle meqim ('raising up') indicates imminent and ongoing action -- the disaster is not a single event but a process that will unfold across years. The word ra'ah ('evil, disaster, calamity') is the same word David 'did' in verse 10 (ha-ra); the evil he sowed will be harvested from his own household.
11. The phrase le'einekha ('before your eyes') inverts David's attempt to conceal. In chapter 11, David operated through intermediaries and letters to keep his hands apparently clean. Now God promises that the retribution will happen in plain sight -- David will see it and be unable to prevent it. The specificity of the punishment is characteristic of prophetic judgment oracles: the penalty corresponds to the crime.
12. The word bassater ('in the secret place, in concealment') comes from the root satar ('to hide, to conceal'). It encompasses not just the adultery but the entire cover-up operation David ran through chapter 11 -- the attempt to make Uriah sleep with Bathsheba, the drunken dinner, and the murder-by-proxy.
12. The phrase neged ha-shamesh ('before the sun') personifies the sun as a witness. In ancient Near Eastern legal and religious thought, the sun deity (Shamash in Mesopotamia) was the god of justice who sees all hidden things. The Hebrew text uses this imagery not to invoke a sun deity but to express total exposure -- nothing will remain concealed.
13. The verb chatati ('I have sinned') from the root chata ('to miss the mark, to sin, to go astray') is the foundational confession verb in the Hebrew Bible. David uses it without qualification -- no 'but' follows, no explanation, no context. This unqualified confession is what distinguishes David's repentance from Saul's. The Psalms tradition attributes Psalm 51 to this moment, elaborating at length what the narrative presents in three words.
13. The Hiphil verb he'evir ('he has caused to pass over, he has transferred') is a rich theological term. The same root appears in the passing over of the firstborn at Passover and in the crossing of the Jordan. Nathan's declaration does not mean the sin is erased from memory or consequence but that the death penalty David pronounced on himself has been diverted. The sin 'passes' from David to another bearer -- the child, as verse 14 will specify.
14. The phrase ni'ets ni'atsta uses the Piel infinitive absolute followed by the Piel perfect of na'ats ('to spurn, to scorn, to treat with contempt') for maximum emphasis. The tiqun soferim (scribal emendation) replacing 'the LORD' with 'the enemies of the LORD' is well attested in rabbinic tradition, which lists this as one of eighteen passages where scribes altered the text to protect God's honor. Whether we read 'you scorned the LORD' or 'you gave the LORD's enemies cause to scorn,' the result is the same: David's sin has public theological consequences.
14. The death of the child raises acute theological questions that the text does not resolve. The child is punished for David's sin, which seems to contradict Ezekiel 18:20 ('the son shall not bear the iniquity of the father'). The narrator does not attempt theodicy; he reports the oracle and its fulfillment. David's response in verses 15-23 will reveal how he processes this theologically.
15. The persistent identification of Bathsheba as eshet Uriyyah ('Uriah's wife') rather than by her own name or as David's wife is a narratorial judgment. The text refuses to normalize the relationship that began with adultery and murder. This designation appears also in Matthew's genealogy of Jesus (Matthew 1:6), where 'the wife of Uriah' is the only woman identified by her connection to a husband rather than by her own name.
15. The verb nagaf ('to strike, to smite, to plague') carries associations of divine punishment throughout the Hebrew Bible. It is used for the plagues on Egypt, for the striking of Uzzah at the threshing floor (2 Samuel 6:7), and for various instances of divine judgment. The child's illness is presented as a direct act of God, not a natural misfortune.
16. The phrase vayavo velan veshakhav artsah ('he went in and spent the night and lay on the ground') describes a sustained posture of penitential grief. The verb lan ('to spend the night, to lodge') indicates this was not a momentary gesture but an ongoing practice sustained through the night. The word artsah ('on the ground, earthward') emphasizes the total prostration -- David abandons every marker of royal comfort.
16. The phrase ba'ad hanna'ar ('on behalf of the boy') uses the preposition ba'ad ('for the sake of, on behalf of'), indicating intercessory prayer. David is not confessing further or pleading his own case; he is advocating for the child. This distinction matters for understanding David's theology of prayer in verses 22-23.

17. The verb bara ('to eat') in the phrase velo vara ittam lechem ('he did not eat food with them') is an alternate form of the more common akhal. The communal aspect -- eating 'with them' -- matters: shared meals were acts of social participation and normalcy. David's refusal to eat with his household signals a complete withdrawal from ordinary life into the space of penitential petition.
17. The attempt by the elders to 'raise him from the ground' (lahaqimo min ha-arets) may reflect concern for the king's health and for the functioning of government, not merely personal compassion. A king lying on the floor refusing food is a king unable to rule, and David's court would have been anxious about the political implications of prolonged royal incapacitation.
18. The seventh day (ha-yom hashevi'i) may carry symbolic weight -- seven is the number of completion and divine action throughout Scripture (creation, Sabbath, purification cycles). The child's death on the seventh day marks the completion of the judgment Nathan announced.
18. The phrase ve'asah ra'ah ('he will do something harmful') uses ra'ah in a broad sense -- the servants fear David will hurt himself or act destructively. The same word ra'ah has appeared throughout the chapter for the 'evil' David did (verse 9) and the 'disaster' God will bring (verse 11). The servants inadvertently echo the chapter's key word without understanding its theological weight.
19. The Hitpa'el form mitlachashim ('whispering among themselves') suggests secretive, conspiratorial speech. The servants are trying to discuss the child's death without David overhearing, which ironically alerts David to what has happened. The verb bin ('to perceive, to understand') implies David drew an inference from observed evidence -- he did not hear the words but read the situation.
19. The brevity of the exchange -- ha-met ha-yeled / met ('is the child dead / dead') -- mirrors the compression of David's confession in verse 13 (chatai la-YHWH). At the chapter's critical moments, the text strips language to its minimum, letting the weight of the content speak without elaboration.
20. The verb vayyishtachu ('he bowed down, he worshipped') from the root shachah ('to prostrate oneself, to worship') is the same posture David has maintained during his petition -- lying on the ground. But now the prostration is worship, not pleading. The physical act may look identical, but the internal orientation has shifted from petition to surrender.
20. The sequence of verbs (rose, washed, anointed, changed, entered, worshipped, came home, asked, ate) is one of the longest action chains in the David narrative. Each verb marks a distinct step in David's transition from the space of grief to the space of ordinary life, with worship as the pivot point between the two.
21. The servants' question follows the standard pattern of bewildered inquiry in the narrative: mah hadavar hazeh ('what is this thing?'). The contrast they articulate -- fasting while alive, eating when dead -- perfectly frames the explanation David will give in the next two verses. Their confusion is the narrative's setup for David's theology of prayer and acceptance.
21. The verb vatevk ('you wept') adds weeping to the earlier description of David's grief, which mentioned only fasting and lying on the ground. The servants reveal that David's prostration included audible weeping -- further evidence of the intensity of his petition and the strangeness of his sudden composure.
22. The phrase mi yodea ('who knows?') is a theological idiom in the Hebrew Bible that holds space for divine freedom -- it acknowledges that God's decisions cannot be predicted or compelled but might be influenced by genuine repentance and petition. David uses it not as a guarantee but as a reason to try.
22. The verb vechananni (Qal perfect with waw consecutive from chanan, 'to be gracious') frames the child's survival as an act of divine grace, not as something David has earned through his fasting. This is critical: David's theology does not treat fasting as a mechanism that forces God's hand but as an expression of dependence that may move God's heart.
23. The phrase ani holekh elav ('I am going to him') uses the active participle holekh ('going, walking'), which can indicate both present intention and inevitable future reality. David is not saying he plans to kill himself to join the child; he is acknowledging that death comes for all, and in death he will be where the child already is.
23. The contrast between holekh ('going') and yashuv ('return') is the theological crux: the living move toward death, but the dead do not move back toward life. This statement operates within the Hebrew Bible's general reticence about the afterlife -- Sheol is a destination, not a place of reunion or consciousness. David's acceptance of this reality is what allows him to rise, worship, and eat.
24. The name Shelomoh (Solomon) is derived from the root sh-l-m, which yields shalom ('peace, wholeness'), shillem ('to repay, to complete'), and shalem ('whole, complete'). The name may mean 'his peace,' 'his replacement,' or 'his restoration.' Given the context -- a second child born after the death of the first -- the name carries overtones of both peace and completion: God has completed His judgment and opened a new chapter.
24. The clause va-YHWH ahev ('and the LORD loved him') is one of the most remarkable sentences in the Hebrew Bible. It is a direct statement of divine love for an individual, applied to a newborn child. The verb ahev is the same word used in Deuteronomy 7:8 for God's love for Israel and in 2 Samuel 7 for the covenant relationship with David's house. Solomon enters the world marked by the love of the same God who executed judgment on his older brother.
25. The verb vayyishlach ('he sent') echoes the chapter's opening (verse 1), where the LORD sent Nathan to David. Now God sends Nathan again, but with a radically different message. The prophet's role encompasses both judgment and grace, demolition and restoration.
25. The name Yedidyah (yadid + Yah) uses the same root as David's own name (David/Dawid), which many scholars connect to yadid ('beloved'). If so, Solomon's God-given name echoes his father's name: David the beloved produces Yedidyah, the beloved of the LORD. The dynastic promise of 2 Samuel 7 -- 'I will be a father to him, and he will be a son to me' -- finds its personal expression in this name.

- 26. The phrase ir hammelukha ('city of the kingdom') likely refers to the inner citadel or royal quarter of Rabbah, the most heavily fortified section of the city. Joab has taken this critical position, meaning the city's fall is now inevitable. He pauses before the final conquest to summon David, as the next verse will explain.
- 26. The abrupt transition from Solomon's birth to Joab's siege creates a deliberate juxtaposition: domestic restoration and military victory occur simultaneously. The narrator reminds the reader that the public world of warfare continued throughout David's private crisis.
- 27. The phrase ir ha-mayim ('city of waters') refers to the water source or the fortified section of Rabbah that controlled access to water -- likely the citadel near the Jabbok River's headwaters. In ancient siege warfare, capturing the water supply was often the decisive move. Rabbah's water system has been partially identified archaeologically in the area of the modern Amman citadel.
- 27. Joab's message uses first-person verbs -- nilchamti ('I fought'), lakhadti ('I captured') -- that could be read as self-aggrandizing, but verse 28 reveals his true motive: he wants David to receive credit for the final victory. Joab's political loyalty, however self-interested, consistently serves to protect David's public image.
- 28. The expression niqra shem al ('a name is called over') is a formula of ownership and authority in the Hebrew Bible. It is used for God's name being called over Israel (Deuteronomy 28:10), over the temple (Jeremiah 7:10), and over the city of Jerusalem (Daniel 9:18-19). For Joab's name to be called over Rabbah would imply that Joab, not David, was the sovereign conqueror -- a politically dangerous situation for both men.
- 28. The imperative sequence -- esof ('gather'), chaneh ('camp'), lekhada ('capture') -- gives David a clear set of orders. The irony is sharp: a general is instructing his king, but the instruction is designed to protect the king's honor. Joab's competence and David's absence from the battlefield are both quietly noted.
- 29. The phrase kol ha-am ('all the people/army') suggests a full national mobilization for the final assault -- David brings the remaining forces that had not been deployed with Joab. The verb vayyilkeda ('he captured it') gives David the credit Joab intended him to have, even though the siege was Joab's operation from start to finish.
- 29. The narrative structure of chapters 11-12 forms a chiasm: war (11:1) / sin / judgment / repentance / restoration / war (12:29). David's return to Rabbah completes the literary frame and signals that the immediate crisis, though not its long-term consequences, has passed.
- 30. The ambiguity of malkam ('their king' vs. 'Milcom') is debated. The Masoretic vowels point to malkam ('their king'), but the consonantal text allows Milkom, the name of the Ammonite national deity (1 Kings 11:5, 33). If read as Milcom, the verse describes David taking a crown from an idol's statue -- an act of theological conquest. Either reading works within the narrative's framework of total Ammonite defeat.
- 30. The weight of a kikkar (talent) of gold presents a practical difficulty: no human head could support 75 pounds of gold. Possible solutions include: (1) the crown was held above David's head briefly in a coronation gesture, (2) the 'talent' is being used loosely to indicate great weight and value rather than a precise measure, or (3) the precious stone, not the entire crown, weighed a talent. We translate straightforwardly and let the note address the difficulty.
- 31. The phrase vayyasem bamegera ('he set them with the saw') is the crux of the interpretive difficulty. If bamegera means 'at the saw' (as a labor assignment), then David is imposing forced labor. If it means 'under the saw' (as an instrument of execution), then David is carrying out mass torture. The parallel passage in 1 Chronicles 20:3 uses the verb vayyasar ('he sawed'), which supports the harsher reading. We follow the forced labor interpretation because the context of brick kilns (a construction site, not an execution ground) and the application to 'all the Ammonite cities' (impractical for mass execution) better fits the evidence.
- 31. The return to Jerusalem (vayyashov David vekhol ha-am Yerushalaim) closes the narrative bracket opened in 11:1. The last time David was in Jerusalem, he committed adultery and murder. He returns now having been judged, having repented, having lost a child, having received a new son beloved of God, and having conquered Rabbah. The city is the same; the king is not.

Summary: Amnon, David's firstborn, becomes consumed with desire for his half-sister Tamar. His cunning cousin Jonadab devises a scheme in which Amnon feigns illness and requests that Tamar come to his quarters to prepare food. When she brings the food, Amnon seizes her, ignores her desperate pleas and legal arguments, and rapes her. Immediately afterward, his obsession inverts into revulsion; he throws her out with more cruelty than the assault itself. Tamar tears her royal robe, puts ash on her head, and goes away screaming. Her full brother Absalom takes her in, tells her to be silent for now, and nurses a cold, patient hatred. David hears and is furious but does nothing. Two full years later, Absalom orchestrates Amnon's assassination at a sheep-shearing festival, then flees to his maternal grandfather, King Talmai of Geshur, where he remains in exile for three years. David mourns for his dead son daily while his living son waits across the border.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is one of the most psychologically detailed and unflinching narratives in the Hebrew Bible. The narrator gives Tamar more direct speech than almost any woman in the Davidic narratives, and every word she speaks is legally precise, theologically grounded, and completely ignored. She argues from shame, from law, from practical alternatives, and from Israel's identity as a people who do not commit such acts. Amnon hears none of it. The reversal in verse 15 is devastating in its precision: the Hebrew says the hatred with which he hated her was greater than the love with which he had loved her. The narrator uses the same grammatical construction for both emotions, exposing the 'love' of verse 1 as never having been love at all but an appetite that, once satisfied, becomes disgust. The chapter is also the narrative fulfillment of Nathan's prophecy in 2 Samuel 12:11 that the sword would never depart from David's house and that evil would rise against him from within his own family. Every act of violence in this chapter is committed by David's own children against each other, and David's paralysis mirrors his own moral failure with Bathsheba: the man who took another man's wife cannot bring himself to punish the son who took his own sister.

Translation Friction: *Verse 13 presents the most debated textual and legal question: Tamar tells Amnon to 'speak to the king, for he will not withhold me from you.' If taken at face value, this implies that marriage between half-siblings was permitted or at least negotiable in the early monarchy, despite the prohibition in Leviticus 18:9 and 20:17. Some scholars argue Tamar was bluffing to escape the immediate danger; others propose that the Levitical prohibitions were not yet codified or universally enforced in David's era; still others suggest the patriarchal precedent of Abraham and Sarah (Genesis 20:12) created an exception. The Hebrew word innah (verses 12, 14, 22, 32) is rendered variously as 'humble,' 'violate,' 'force,' or 'afflict' — it carries a legal-covenantal weight broader than modern terms for sexual assault, encompassing humiliation of status, violation of bodily autonomy, and destruction of social standing simultaneously. The Masoretic pointing of verse 21 includes 'for he was his firstborn' (ki bekhlor hu) as David's reason for inaction, but this clause is absent from many Septuagint manuscripts, and its presence or absence changes the characterization of David significantly.*

Connections: *This chapter is the second act of Nathan's prophecy (2 Samuel 12:10-12). The sword that enters David's house here will not leave until Absalom himself is dead on the end of Joab's spears (2 Samuel 18). Amnon's rape of Tamar structurally mirrors David's taking of Bathsheba (2 Samuel 11): a powerful man sees a woman, desires her, uses royal authority to bring her to him, and violates her. The differences are as instructive as the parallels: David at least kept Bathsheba; Amnon discards Tamar with contempt. Absalom's two-year silent rage anticipates his later patience in building a political rebellion over four years (2 Samuel 15:7). Jonadab's role as the 'very wise' friend who engineers disaster echoes the Ahithophel tradition of intelligence deployed without moral compass. Tamar's torn robe connects to the ketonet passim (ornamental tunic) of Joseph in Genesis 37 — the same rare garment is mentioned in verse 18, and in both cases the garment torn or stripped symbolizes the destruction of a favored child. Absalom's flight to Geshur connects to his mother Maacah, daughter of Talmai king of Geshur (2 Samuel 3:3), reminding the reader that David's polygamous political marriages have created a household where half-siblings with competing maternal loyalties share a single court.*

¹Sometime after this, Absalom son of David had a beautiful sister named Tamar, and Amnon son of David became consumed with desire for her. ²Amnon was so tormented that he made himself sick over his sister Tamar. She was a virgin, and it seemed impossible to Amnon to do anything to her. ³Now Amnon had a companion named Jonadab son of Shimeah, David's brother. Jonadab was a very shrewd man. ⁴Jonadab said to him, "Why are you so gaunt morning after morning, prince? Tell me." Amnon said to him, "I am in love with Tamar, my brother Absalom's sister." ⁵Jonadab said to him, "Lie down on your bed and pretend to be ill. When your father comes to see you, say to him, 'Please let my sister Tamar come and prepare food for me. Let her make the food where I can see her, so that I can watch and eat from her hand.'" ⁶So Amnon lay down and pretended to be ill. When the king came to see him, Amnon said to the king, "Please let my sister Tamar come and shape a couple of heart-cakes where I can watch, so I can eat from her hand." ⁷David sent word to Tamar at the palace: "Go to your brother Amnon's house and prepare food for him." ⁸Tamar went to her brother Amnon's house, where he was lying down. She took dough, kneaded it, shaped the heart-cakes where he could watch, and cooked them. ⁹She took the pan and served the cakes before him, but he refused to eat. Amnon said, "Everyone get out." And everyone left his presence. ¹⁰Amnon said to Tamar, "Bring the food into the inner room so I can eat from your hand." Tamar took the heart-cakes she had made and brought them to her brother Amnon in the inner room. ¹¹When she brought the food close to him to eat, he grabbed her and said, "Come to bed with me, sister." ¹²She said to him, "No, brother! Do not humiliate me! This is not done in Israel — do not commit this outrage!" ¹³Where would I carry my disgrace? And you — you would be like any common fool in Israel. Please, speak to the king instead. He will not refuse to give me to you. ¹⁴But he refused to listen to her. He overpowered her, violated her, and raped her. ¹⁵Then Amnon hated her with an overwhelming hatred — the hatred with which he hated her was greater than the desire with which he had desired her. Amnon said to her, "Get up. Get out." ¹⁶She said to him, "No — this cruelty of sending me away is worse than what you already did to me." But he refused to listen to her. ¹⁷He called the young man who served him and said, "Get this creature away from me and bolt the door behind her." ¹⁸She was wearing an ornamented tunic — for this was the garment worn by the king's virgin daughters as their robe. His servant put her outside and bolted the door behind her. ¹⁹Tamar put ash on her head, tore the ornamented tunic she was wearing, placed her hand on her head, and went away screaming. ²⁰Her brother Absalom said to her, "Has Amnon your brother been with you? For now, sister, be silent. He is your brother. Do not take this to heart." And Tamar remained — devastated — in her brother Absalom's house. ²¹When King David heard about all of this, he was furious. ²²Absalom said nothing to Amnon — not a hostile word, not a civil one — because Absalom hated Amnon for violating his sister Tamar. ²³Two full years later, Absalom had sheep-shearing at Baal-hazor near Ephraim, and Absalom invited all the king's sons. ²⁴Absalom went to the king and said, "Your servant has sheep-shearing. Please, let the king and his servants come with your servant." ²⁵The king said to Absalom, "No, my son. We should not all go — we would be too much of a burden on you." Absalom pressed him, but David was unwilling to go. He did, however, give him his blessing. ²⁶Absalom said, "If you will not come, at least let my brother Amnon go with us." The king said to him, "Why should Amnon go with you?" ²⁷But Absalom pressed him until David sent Amnon and all the king's sons with him. ²⁸Absalom had already commanded his young men: "Watch for the moment when Amnon's heart is happy with wine. When I say to you, 'Strike Amnon!' — kill him. Do not be afraid. Am I not the one commanding you? Be strong and prove yourselves men of valor." ²⁹Absalom's young men did to Amnon exactly as Absalom had commanded. All the king's sons leaped up, each mounted his mule, and fled. ³⁰While they were still on the road, a report reached David: "Absalom has struck down all the king's sons — not one of them is left alive." ³¹The king stood, tore his garments, and threw himself on the ground. All his servants stood around him with their garments torn. ³²But Jonadab son of Shimeah, David's brother, spoke up: "My lord should not think that all the young princes have been killed. Only Amnon is dead. This has been fixed in Absalom's intent since the day Amnon violated his sister Tamar." ³³So let my lord the king not take it to heart, thinking all the king's sons are dead. Only Amnon is dead. ³⁴Meanwhile, Absalom had fled. The young watchman raised his eyes and saw a large group coming along the road from the hillside behind him. ³⁵Jonadab said to the king, "Look — the king's sons are arriving. It is just as your servant said." ³⁶Just as he finished speaking, the king's sons arrived. They raised their voices and wept, and the king and all his servants also wept — a great and bitter weeping. ³⁷Absalom fled and went to Talmai son of Ammihud, king of Geshur. And David mourned for his son day after day. ³⁸Absalom had fled to Geshur, and he remained there three years. ³⁹The spirit of King David wasted away with longing to go out to Absalom, for he had exhausted his grief over Amnon, who was dead.

TRANSLATOR NOTES

1. The verb vayyehaveha ('he loved her') uses the standard root a-h-v, the same word used for God's love of Israel and Jacob's love for Rachel. The narrator deploys it without commentary, letting the story itself expose whether this feeling deserves the name. Tamar's name means 'date palm' — a symbol of beauty, fertility, and uprightness. Amnon (Amnon, from aman, 'faithful, reliable') carries an ironic name given what he is about to do. The phrase achot yafah ('beautiful sister') introduces the two elements that drive the plot: kinship and beauty.
2. The verb vayyetser (from tsarar, 'to be narrow, constricted, distressed') conveys both emotional anguish and physical constriction — Amnon feels trapped by his own desire. The phrase lehitchallot ('to make himself sick') is in the hithpael (reflexive) stem, which some commentators read as genuine psychosomatic illness and others as indicating that the sickness was self-induced or exaggerated — foreshadowing the feigned illness in verse 6. The word betulah ('virgin') indicates both sexual status and social restriction: virgins of the royal house lived in supervised quarters (cf. verse 18). The verb yippale ('it was extraordinary, impossible') from pala is usually positive (Psalm 139:6) but here describes Amnon's frustrated assessment of a logistical barrier.

3. The word re'a ('friend, companion') indicates a close personal relationship — Jonadab is not a casual acquaintance but a confidant. The adjective chakham ('wise, shrewd, clever') is the same word used for Solomon's wisdom (1 Kings 3:12) and for the wise woman of Tekoa (2 Samuel 14:2). The narrator uses it without irony markers, forcing the reader to supply the moral judgment as the story unfolds. Shimeah (also spelled Shammah in 1 Samuel 16:9) is David's brother, making Jonadab and Amnon first cousins.
4. The adjective dal ('thin, lean, gaunt') describes visible physical wasting — Amnon's obsession is consuming him bodily. The repetition babboqer babboqer ('morning by morning') suggests Jonadab has been observing Amnon's decline over an extended period. Amnon's self-description uses the participle ohev ('loving, in love') — present and ongoing, not a past event. His identification of Tamar through Absalom (achot Avshalom achi, 'sister of Absalom my brother') rather than simply as 'my sister' may indicate he is emphasizing the half-sibling distinction, or it may be the narrator's way of placing Absalom's name in the scene from the very beginning.
5. The verb vehitchal ('make yourself sick, feign illness') is hithpael — reflexive/pretend — confirming this is deliberate performance, not genuine sickness. The verb tavrenni ('let her feed me, give me food') from barah ('to eat, take a meal') is intimate language — it implies personal feeding, not institutional meal service. The word biryah ('food, something prepared') comes from the same root and emphasizes food made with personal care. The phrase le'einai ('before my eyes, in my sight') and miyyaddah ('from her hand') create a chain of sensory intimacy: sight and touch, watching and receiving. Jonadab constructs a scenario that is entirely plausible as sick-care and entirely functional as a trap.
6. The verb telavvev ('let her shape heart-cakes') from the root l-v-v ('heart') is unique to this passage. The levivot ('heart-shaped cakes' or 'heart-cakes') are formed from the word for heart (lev), suggesting either heart-shaped pastries or food meant to comfort the heart of an invalid. The intimate, almost tender terminology creates a surface meaning (a sister nursing a sick brother with hand-shaped comfort food) that conceals the predatory reality beneath. Amnon follows Jonadab's script almost verbatim but adapts the specific food — where Jonadab said biryah ('prepared food'), Amnon specifies levivot, adding an element of tenderness and domesticity. David, hearing nothing suspicious in a brother's request for his sister's cooking, complies.
7. The verb vayyishlach ('he sent') is the same verb used when David 'sent' for Bathsheba in 2 Samuel 11:4 — the verbal echo is likely deliberate. David addresses Tamar with lekhee na ('please go') — polite but carrying the weight of a royal command. The phrase achikh ('your brother') reinforces the family setting that makes the request seem safe. David has no reason for suspicion: a sick son asking for his sister's cooking is entirely normal in this cultural context.
8. The narrative pace slows to show every step of Tamar's labor: she takes the dough (habatseq), kneads it (vattalosh), shapes the heart-cakes (vattelavvev), and cooks them (vattavshel). The detailed, step-by-step description creates a domestic scene of care and normalcy that makes the coming violence more shocking by contrast. Amnon lies watching (le'einav, 'before his eyes') as Tamar performs an act of sisterly devotion that he is using as a mechanism to get her alone. Every moment of her labor is a moment of his calculation.
9. The word masret ('pan, baking dish') is a rare term, appearing only here and possibly related to the root s-r-t. The verb vattisoq ('she poured out') suggests the cakes were turned out of the pan onto a serving dish. Amnon's refusal to eat (vayema'en le'ekhol) signals the shift from pretense to predation — the food has served its purpose by getting Tamar into the house. The phrase kol ish ('every man, everyone') indicates there were servants present, meaning Amnon needed privacy to act.
10. The cheder ('inner room, bedroom, private chamber') is the most enclosed space in the house — it is the room where one sleeps and where outsiders do not enter. The phrase ve'evreh miyyadeykh ('so I can eat from your hand') maintains the fiction of an invalid needing hand-feeding. The narrator notes that Tamar took the levivot 'which she had made' (asher asatah), emphasizing her labor and care — she has invested herself in this act of service.
11. The verb vayyachazzeq (hiphil of chazaq, 'be strong') in this context means to seize, overpower, physically restrain. The same root appears in Deuteronomy 22:25 for a man who 'seizes' (hecheziq) a woman and lies with her — the legal term for rape. The command shikhebi immi ('lie with me') is the same phrase Potiphar's wife used with Joseph (Genesis 39:7, 12), creating a deliberate narrative echo. The word achoti ('my sister') in this context is grotesque — it acknowledges the kinship bond in the very act of violating it.
12. The verb te'annenni (piel of innah, 'to afflict, humble, violate') is the standard legal term for sexual violation in the Hebrew Bible (Genesis 34:2, Deuteronomy 22:24, 29, Judges 19:24, 20:5). It encompasses forced intercourse, degradation of status, and social ruin. The phrase lo ye'aseh khen beYisra'el ('this is not done in Israel') appeals to communal moral standards — Israel has an identity as a people who do not commit certain acts. The word nevalah ('outrage, sacrilege, moral disgrace') is the term used for the rape at Gibeah (Judges 19:23-24, 20:6) and for Shechem's rape of Dinah (Genesis 34:7). It describes an act that is not merely sinful but that violates the moral fabric of the community.
13. The word cherpah ('disgrace, reproach, shame') describes the social consequences Tamar will bear — it is the permanent stigma attached to a violated woman. The phrase anah olikh et cherpati ('where would I take my disgrace?') is a question without an answer: there is nowhere to go with this shame. The word nevalim ('fools') here carries the same moral weight as nevalah in verse 12 — these are not intellectually foolish people but morally debased ones. The final clause ki lo yimna'eni mimmekka ('for he will not withhold me from you') is the interpretive crux: does Tamar genuinely believe David would approve a half-sibling marriage, or is she saying anything to prevent the imminent assault? The Levitical prohibition (Leviticus 18:9) would seem to rule out such a marriage, but the patriarchal precedent and the early monarchic period's relationship to codified law remains debated.
14. The phrase velo avah lishmo'a beqolah ('he refused to hear her voice') uses avah ('to be willing') — this is a choice, not an inability. The verb vayyechezaq ('he overpowered') from chazaq appears in the legal formulation of Deuteronomy 22:25 for rape. The verb vaye'anneha ('he violated her') is the piel of innah — the intensive form, indicating completed, thoroughgoing violation. The final clause vayyishkav ota ('he lay with her') uses

- the accusative marker et/otah rather than the preposition im ('with'), which some scholars see as indicating coercion rather than mutuality — he lay her rather than he lay with her.
15. The verb vayyisna'eha ('he hated her') uses the same intensive grammatical pattern as vayyeehaveha ('he loved her') in verse 1, creating a deliberate structural mirror. The noun sin'ah ('hatred') and the noun ahavah ('love') are placed in direct comparison using the comparative min ('greater than'). The phrase qumi lekhi ('get up, go') is curt to the point of cruelty — two feminine singular imperatives with no softening particles, no name, no reason given. The immediate post-coital reversal from obsessive desire to visceral hatred is one of the Hebrew Bible's most psychologically acute observations about the nature of lust versus love.
 16. The phrase al odot hara'ah hagedolah hazzot me'acheret ('on account of this great evil, worse than the other') identifies two separate wrongs: the rape and the expulsion. The Hebrew construction me'acheret ('than the other') treats them as two distinct acts that can be compared. The verb leshallecheni ('to send me away, to expel me') is the piel of shalach, which in marital contexts is the verb for divorce (Deuteronomy 24:1). Tamar may be invoking the legal framework: sending her away is functionally a rejection that leaves her without recourse. The repeated phrase velo avah lishmo'a ('he refused to listen') creates a structural bracket around the assault — refusal to hear in verse 14, refusal to hear in verse 16.
 17. The phrase et zo't ('this one') is dehumanizing — zo't is a feminine demonstrative pronoun ('this'), used here as a noun. Amnon avoids Tamar's name entirely. The verb shillechu ('send out, expel') is a plural imperative directed at the servant(s). The command un'ol haddellet ('and bolt the door') uses the verb na'al, which means to lock or bolt — the door is to be barred after her, preventing return. The servant is called na'aro meshareto ('his young man, his attendant'), indicating a personal servant who would have been aware of everything happening in the house.
 18. The ketonet passim ('ornamented tunic, multi-colored robe') is the same garment Jacob gave Joseph (Genesis 37:3). The exact meaning of passim is debated — proposals include 'many-colored,' 'long-sleeved,' 'reaching to the palms and soles,' or 'ornamented with applique.' Its rarity (only two occurrences) creates a powerful intertextual link between Joseph and Tamar — both are favored children of their father, both are stripped of their distinguishing garment in an act of familial violence. The explanatory note ki khen tilbashna ('for thus were dressed') is a narratorial aside informing the reader of court custom, indicating this detail was worth preserving because the garment signifies what Tamar is about to lose.
 19. The ash (efer) on the head is a mourning custom (Joshua 7:6, Job 2:12, Esther 4:1). Tearing the ketonet passim destroys the garment that identified her as a virgin princess — the ripping is both grief and truth-telling: the status the garment represented no longer exists. The hand on the head (yad al rosh) is attested in ancient Near Eastern iconography as a gesture of mourning and lament. The phrase halokh veza'aqah ('going and crying out') uses the infinitive absolute construction to indicate continuous action — she did not stop screaming as she walked. The verb za'aq ('to cry out, scream') is stronger than bakah ('to weep') — it is the cry of the oppressed demanding justice (Exodus 2:23, Judges 4:3).
 20. The name Aminon (with the he- prefix ha'Aminon) appears to be a diminutive or contemptuous form of Amnon — possibly reducing his name to something small or mocking. Absalom's command hacharishi ('be silent, keep quiet') is the hiphil imperative of charash ('be silent, be still'). In context, it may be protective (do not make a public accusation that could backfire) or strategic (silence preserves my ability to act later without warning). The phrase al tashiti et libbekh ('do not set your heart upon') means 'do not fixate on this' — it does not mean 'do not care' but rather 'do not act rashly.' The word shomemah ('desolate') is the same adjective used for the desolation of the land in Leviticus 26:34 and for destroyed cities in Ezekiel — it describes the total emptying of vitality and joy.
 21. The phrase vayyichar lo me'od ('he was very angry') uses the same verb charah that described David's anger at Uzzah (2 Samuel 6:8) and at Nathan's parable (2 Samuel 12:5). David's anger is consistent; his follow-through is not. The Septuagint (LXX) adds: 'but he did not grieve the spirit of Amnon his son, because he loved him, because he was his firstborn.' This addition appears in 4QSama (Qumran) and may reflect an original Hebrew reading lost from the Masoretic tradition. If original, it explains David's inaction as favoritism toward his firstborn; if secondary, it represents an early interpretive attempt to explain the MT's stark silence.
 22. The phrase lemera ve'ad tov ('from evil to good') is a merism — a figure of speech that names two extremes to indicate the entire range between them. Absalom speaks neither hostility nor courtesy, which means he speaks nothing at all. The verb sane ('to hate') is the same root as sin'ah in verse 15 but in a completely different emotional register: Amnon's hatred was post-coital revulsion; Absalom's is moral judgment hardened into intention. The verb innah ('violated') appears here for the third time (after vv. 12 and 14), and its repetition functions as a refrain of accusation that the narrative will not let the reader forget.
 23. The phrase lishenatayim yamim ('at two years of days') marks a precise time gap — the delay is deliberate and important to the narrative. Sheep-shearing (gozezim) was a festive occasion involving feasting and wine (cf. Genesis 38:12-13, 1 Samuel 25:2-8). Baal-hazor ('lord of Hazor') is a location near Ephraim — in Absalom's territorial sphere, giving him control of the environment. The invitation to kol benei hammelekh ('all the king's sons') is broad enough to include Amnon without signaling that he is the target.
 24. Absalom uses the language of courtly deference: avdekha ('your servant') for himself and hammelekh ('the king') for David. The initial invitation includes David himself — this may be genuine or strategic. If David had come, Absalom could not have killed Amnon without killing the king's bodyguard-protected presence. By inviting David first, Absalom sets up the negotiation that will follow: when David declines, Absalom can ask for a specific substitute.
 25. David's refusal uses the verb nikhbad ('be heavy, burdensome') — a royal retinue visiting a sheep-shearing would strain Absalom's resources. The verb vayyiprots bo ('he pressed him, urged him') shows Absalom's persistence, which both maintains the appearance of sincerity and sets up the transition to the request for Amnon specifically. David's blessing (vayevarkhehu) authorizes the celebration without David's personal attendance — it gives Absalom cover of royal approval for the event.

26. Absalom's request for Amnon specifically — Amnon achi ('Amnon my brother') — is the critical pivot. By naming Amnon after David's refusal, Absalom makes it seem like a consolation request: if the king will not come, at least send the crown prince as representative. David's counter-question lammah yelekh immakh ('why should he go with you?') suggests a flicker of suspicion or at least surprise at the specificity. The question goes unanswered in the text — Absalom's response in verse 27 simply consists of continued pressing.
27. The verb vayyiprots ('he pressed, urged') is the same verb used in verse 25 — Absalom applies the same insistent pressure that wore David down before. The result: David sends (vayyishlach) both Amnon specifically and all the king's sons with him. Once again, David's word of royal authority sends a family member into danger — just as he sent Tamar to Amnon's house in verse 7. The pattern of David's authority being the instrument through which his children are harmed continues.
28. The timing — ketov lev Amnon bayyayin ('when Amnon's heart is merry with wine') — ensures the target is intoxicated and unable to react or defend himself. The phrase hakku et Amnon ('strike Amnon') uses the verb nakah ('to strike, smite'), the standard verb for a killing blow. The phrase benei chayil ('sons of valor') is a military designation for brave warriors (1 Samuel 14:52, 2 Samuel 2:7). Absalom's speech has the structure of a pre-battle exhortation: identification of the target, the signal for attack, reassurance against fear, invocation of authority, and a call to courage.
29. The phrase ka'asher tsivvah Avshalom ('as Absalom had commanded') emphasizes that the servants acted under orders — the responsibility is Absalom's. The response of the other princes is instant panic: vayyaqumu ('they rose'), vayyirkevu ('they mounted'), vayanusu ('they fled') — three rapid verbs describing a stampede. The mule (pered/pirdah) was the riding animal of royalty in this period (cf. 2 Samuel 18:9, 1 Kings 1:33). Each prince having his own mule indicates these are wealthy royal sons who came prepared with their own transport.
30. The shemu'ah ('report, news, rumor') is a distorted version of events — fear and distance have inflated a targeted assassination into a massacre. The phrase velo notar mehem echad ('not one of them remains') is the language of total annihilation. This false report creates maximum terror for David, who believes all his sons are dead. The narrative technique — showing the reader the truth (one death) while showing David a lie (total slaughter) — creates dramatic irony and intensifies the emotional chaos.
31. The tearing of garments (qeri'at begadim) is the primary ritual expression of grief and mourning in the Hebrew Bible (Genesis 37:34, Job 1:20, 2 Samuel 1:11). David lying on the ground (vayyishkav artsah) recalls his prostration during the illness of Bathsheba's child (2 Samuel 12:16). The servants standing (nitsavim) with torn garments creates a formal court mourning scene. The participial construction indicates a sustained state: they remain standing in mourning posture.
32. The verb innah appears for the fourth and final time in this chapter (anoto, 'his violating'), maintaining the verbal thread that ties the entire narrative together. Jonadab's knowledge that the assassination was 'determined' (sumah) from the day of the rape implies either that Absalom confided in him or that Jonadab's 'wisdom' allowed him to read Absalom's silence correctly. Either way, his failure to warn anyone makes him complicit in both the rape and the murder. The phrase al pi Avshalom ('by the mouth/deed of Absalom') uses the idiom al pi ('by the mouth of') which normally introduces authoritative commands or divine decrees.
33. Jonadab repeats his correction — ki im Amnon levaddo met ('for only Amnon alone is dead') — reinforcing the limited scope of the killing. His phrase al yasem adoni hammelekh el libbo ('let my lord the king not set upon his heart') echoes Absalom's instruction to Tamar in verse 20 (al tashiti et libbekh). Both use the idiom of 'setting on the heart' to mean 'do not fixate on this.' The repetition of Amnon levaddo met ('Amnon alone is dead') provides cold comfort — one son is still dead, murdered by another son.
34. The narrative splits into simultaneous tracks: Absalom's flight and the arrival of the surviving princes. The na'ar hatsofeh ('the young watchman') is a sentinel positioned on the walls or a high point, whose job is to report approaching groups. The phrase am rav ('many people, a large crowd') describes the approaching party — the surviving princes and their retinues. The phrase miderekh acharav mitsad hahar ('by the road behind him from the hillside') gives geographical detail that locates the approaching group on the road from Baal-hazor.
35. The phrase kidvar avdekha ken hayah ('according to the word of your servant, so it was') is a formula of prophetic confirmation, often used when a prediction comes true. Jonadab applies this language to himself with an audacity that borders on the prophetic — he speaks as though he is interpreting events rather than having helped cause them. His identification as avdekha ('your servant') maintains the posture of courtly deference while asserting his superior understanding of the situation.
36. The phrase vayyis'u qolam vayyivku ('they raised their voices and wept') describes loud, vocal mourning — the arriving princes are wailing as they enter. The phrase bekhi gadol me'od ('very great weeping') describes the intensity of the communal grief. The king, his servants, and his surviving sons all weep together, creating a scene of collective mourning that engulfs the entire court. The simultaneity of the princes' arrival and the eruption of grief is captured by the temporal construction kekhalloto ledabber ('as he finished speaking') — Jonadab's calm analysis is immediately drowned by the sound of weeping.
37. Geshur was an Aramean city-state east of the Jordan, allied with David through marriage (2 Samuel 3:3). Talmai (Talmay) is called ben Ammihud ('son of Ammihud') here but ben Ammihur in some manuscripts — a minor textual variant. The verb vayyit'abbel ('he mourned') is the hitpa'el of aval, indicating sustained, demonstrative mourning. The phrase kol hayyamim ('all the days') means continuously, without cessation. The ambiguity of 'his son' (beno) — does David mourn Amnon the dead or Absalom the exiled? — is a characteristic Hebraic device that allows both readings to stand simultaneously.
38. The repetition of Absalom's flight (already stated in v37) creates a narrative bracket: verse 37 told where he went and why; verse 38 tells how long he stayed. Three years (shalosh shanim) is the duration of Absalom's exile before Joab engineers his return (2 Samuel 14). The verb vayyehi sham ('he was there') emphasizes static residence — Absalom is waiting, not wandering. Three years in Geshur gives him time to plan, to build resentment, and to sharpen the political instincts that will drive his rebellion in chapters 15-18.

39. The verb vattekhēl (from kalah, 'to be finished, consumed, spent') is debated: some read it as 'longed' (from a different root or nuance of kalah), others as 'ceased' or 'was restrained.' The Septuagint reads 'the spirit of the king ceased to go out after Absalom' — meaning David stopped pursuing Absalom, which is the opposite reading. The Masoretic pointing supports 'was consumed/exhausted with longing,' but the ambiguity affects the chapter's emotional conclusion significantly. The verb nicham (niph'al of nacham, 'to be comforted, to relent from grief') indicates that the initial intensity of David's mourning for Amnon has subsided — time has done its work. The final phrase ki met ('because he was dead') is the chapter's last word: death. It is the word that hangs over everything — over Amnon who is dead, over Tamar who is desolate as death, over the family that Nathan said the sword would never leave.

Summary: Joab perceives that David's heart is turned toward Absalom -- three years exiled in Geshur after killing Amnon -- and orchestrates an elaborate scheme to bring him home. He recruits a wise woman from Tekoa to play the role of a grieving widow whose surviving son is threatened by blood-avengers after killing his brother. David rules in her favor, and she then turns the parable back on him: if the king protects her fictional son from the avenger of blood, why does he leave his own banished son in exile? David detects Joab's hand behind the performance, and Joab admits it. David relents and permits Absalom to return to Jerusalem -- but refuses to see him face to face. For two full years Absalom lives in Jerusalem without entering the king's presence. When Joab ignores his repeated summons, Absalom sets Joab's barley field on fire to force a meeting. Joab intercedes again, and David finally summons Absalom, who prostrates himself before the king. David kisses him. The reconciliation is formal but the fracture remains.

What Makes This Remarkable: This chapter is a masterclass in indirect speech and political manipulation, rivaling Nathan's parable in chapter 12 in both structure and theological weight. The wise woman of Tekoa constructs a juridical fiction that forces David to rule against his own practice -- and then reveals that his ruling applies to himself. Her argument reaches a theological climax in verse 14: 'God does not take away life; instead, He devises plans so that the banished one is not cast out from Him forever.' This is one of the most extraordinary theological statements in the entire Deuteronomistic History -- a claim about the restorative character of God that pushes against the retributive logic of blood-guilt. Yet the chapter is deeply ambiguous: Absalom's return plants the seed of the rebellion that will nearly destroy David's kingdom. What looks like mercy and reconciliation becomes the staging ground for civil war. The narrator forces the reader to hold both truths simultaneously: the theological principle is sound, but its political application is catastrophic.

Translation Friction: *The Hebrew of verse 14 is notoriously difficult and has generated centuries of interpretive debate. The phrase ki mot namut u-kha-mayim ha-niggarim artsah asher lo ye'asefu ('for we will surely die, and are like water spilled on the ground that cannot be gathered up') is clear enough, but the following clause -- ve-lo yissa Elohim nefesh ve-chashav machashavot le-vilti yiddach mimmennu niddach -- is syntactically ambiguous. Does it mean God does not take away life but instead plans for restoration? Or does it mean God does not show partiality but has devised means of restoration? The rendering must choose, and we have followed the reading that emphasizes God's restorative intent while noting the ambiguity. Additionally, the relationship between this chapter's theology and the larger narrative arc is uncomfortable: the wise woman's argument for mercy and restoration is theologically compelling, but the narrator will show that Absalom's return leads directly to treason, rape of David's concubines, and civil war. The text does not resolve whether David's decision was right or wrong -- only that it was consequential.*

Connections: *The Tekoa woman's parable deliberately mirrors Nathan's confrontation with David in chapter 12: both use a fictional legal case to trap the king into ruling against himself, both employ the mashal (parable/juridical fiction) form, and both pivot on the moment of unmasking. But the parallel contains a reversal: Nathan's parable led to judgment and punishment, while the Tekoa woman's leads to mercy and restoration. The avenger-of-blood motif (go'el ha-dam) invokes Numbers 35:9-28, where cities of refuge protect the manslayer from the blood-avenger until proper judgment can be rendered -- the wise woman argues that exile in Geshur has functioned as Absalom's city of refuge and that perpetual banishment exceeds the intent of the system. Absalom's physical beauty, described in verses 25-26, echoes Saul's imposing appearance in 1 Samuel 9:2 and* foreshadows a recurring biblical warning: external magnificence does not guarantee internal faithfulness. The two-year estrangement in Jerusalem (v. 28) parallels the two years Absalom waited before killing Amnon (13:23), establishing a pattern of patient, calculated waiting that will characterize his rebellion in chapter 15.
